Project Note – V2

This Work is Licensed Under 4.0 International (CC BY-NC-SA 4.0)

The initial content of this document was downloaded from the Early English Books Online (EEBO-TCP) website. The books were transcribed in a character for character manner and since there was no standard spelling during that time, it can be a bit cumbersome to read, with variations such as "unlesse", "vnlesse", and "vnles" appearing regularly.

With that in mind, this project is intended to clean up those books as much as possible and make them more accessible to the interested reader. A list of variant spellings and their corrections was utilized to clean up the text, but this is only as comprehensive as the list itself. Because of the nature of the original transcription, some words have missing characters or places where the original language (e.g., Greek) was not transcribed. The original text also contained linked footnotes and these have not been incorporated. Included in these works are some, but very limited text taken from other public domain sources.

Although this is admittedly no substitute for a properly proofread and scholarly edition, we believe that the result is a body of work which is far more accessible, particularly for searching and reading, than its predecessor (though our thankfulness for EEBO-TCP cannot be expressed.) The documents have been cleaned and presented to the best of our present ability, in what we hope is a pleasing and useful format for the vast majority of Christian brothers and sisters who desire to access and read these spiritually nourishing works.

For the sake of this collection, it has attempted to take a traditional theological as well as historical approach to Puritan research, meaning that, while there were some Arminian Puritans, those have been omitted if observed, and also, while there were other Non-Conformists that were Catholic, Quaker, Brownist, Pilgrims, etc., this collection has tried to observe only works from theologically reformed Puritans; Baptist, Presbyterian, and Congregational Non-Conformists; as well as CoE or Anglican clergy that were sympathetic or assistive to the Puritan cause. Furthermore, this collection only contains works from the period between 1500-1700, not just because that is the standard historical period of Puritanism, but because this is also the limit of the works found on EEBO-TCP. This is not an exhaustive collection of Puritan/Non-Conformist works, but a collection of those pertinent works which were located on EEBO-TCP which enables the searching thereof by their conversion from facsimile to text. The reason the alphabetical flow of the authors in these titles are not perfectly in order, is because many names were added well into the compiling of these texts, and we had to choose between prolonging publication to start over, or continue and publish with the names somewhat out of order.

Finally, please forgive our eagerness in the midst of imperfection in offering such an errant publication. Given the sheer number of texts, time constraints, and other duties; this is the best we can offer for now; yet, knowing the spiritual treasures within these pages, we pray that this effort, though feeble, will still result in the edification of His Church, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the glorification of our Gracious God. \**All of the text and titles included in these works are in the public domain, and can be used in any way; for profit or otherwise, by anybody or entity. Only this specific derivative and creative work is bound by the creative common license listed above.* -- Soli Deo Gloria

THE PREFACE.

THE desire of happiness is so coessential with our nature, so interwoven and incorporate with it; that nothing but the dissolution of the whole frame can extinguish it. This runs thro the whole race of mankind, and amidst the infinite variety of other inclinations, preserves its self entire. The most various contradictory tempers do yet conspire in this, and men of the most unequal fortunes, are yet equal in their wishes of being happy.

But this concurrence as to the end is not more universal then the disagreement about the way. Every man would have happiness, but wherein that consists, or how it is to be attained, has been very diversely opin'd. Indeed the ultimate supreme happiness as it is originally inherent in God, so it is wrapped up in those clouds and darkness, which, as the Psalmist says, are round about him Psal. 18. 11. And we can see nothing of it, but in those gleams and rays he is pleased to dart out upon us; so that all our estimates as to our final felicity, must be mesur'd by those revelations he has made of it.

But one would think our temporal happiness were as much a mystery as our eternal, to see what variety of blind pursuits are made after it. One man thinks tis seated on the top pinnacle of honor, and climbs till perhaps he falls head-long. Another thinks it a mineral, that must be digged out of the earth, and toils to lade himself with thick clay, Hab. 2. 6. and at last finds a grave, where he sought his treasure. A third supposes it consists in the variety of pleasures, and wearies himself in that pursuit, which only cloies, and disappoints. Yet everyone of these can read you lectures of the gross mistake and folly of the other, whilst himself is equally deluded.

Thus do men chase an imaginary good, till they meet with real evils; herein exposing themselves to the same cheat Laban put upon Jacob, they serve for Rachel, and are rewarded with Leah, court fancied beauty, and marry loath'd deformity. Such delusive felicities as these are the largesses of the Prince of the Air, who once attempted to have enveigled even Christ himself, Mat. 4.

But God's proposals are more sincere: he knows how sandy, how false a foundation all these external things must make, and therefore warns us not to build so much as our present satisfaction upon them, but shows us a more certain, a more compendious way to acquire what we gasp after, by telling us that as Godliness in respect of the next, so contentment for this world is great gain 1 Tim. 6. 6. It is indeed the unum necessarium, the one point in which all the lines of worldly happiness are concentred, and to complete its excellence, tis to be had at home: nay indeed only there. We need not ramble in wild pursuits after it, we may form it within our own breasts: no man wants materials for it, that knows but how to put them together.

And the directing to that skill is the only design of the ensuing Tract, which coming upon so kind an errand, may at least hope for an unprejudic'd reception. Contentment is a thing we all profess to aspire to, and therefore it cannot be thought an unfriendly office to endeavor to conduct men to it. How far the ensuing considerations may tend to that end, I must leave to the judgment, and experience of the Reader, only desiring him that he will weigh them with that seriousness which befits a thing wherein both his happiness and duty are concerned: for in this (as in many other instances) God has so twisted them together, that we cannot be innocently miserable. The present infelicities, have an appendant guilt, which will consign us to a more irreversible state of dissatisfaction hereafter.

THE ART OF CONTENTMENT.

SECT. I.

Of the necessary Connection between Happiness and Contentment.

1. GOD who is essentially happy in himself, can receive no accession to his felicity by the poor contributions of men. He cannot therefore be supposed to have made them upon intuition of increasing, but communicating his happiness. And this his original design is very visible in all the parts of his Economy towards them. When lapsed man had counterplotted against himself, defeated the purpose of the Divine goodness, and plunged his whole nature into the opposite state of endless misery; he yet reinforc'd his first design, and an expedient as full of wonder as mercy, the death of his Son, recovers him to his former capacity of bliss. And that it might not only be a bare capacity, he has added all other methods proper to work upon a rational creature. He has shown him his danger, set before him in perspective that eternal Tophet, which he is advised to shun. On the other side he has no less lively described the heavenly Jerusalem, the Celestial country to which he is to aspire: nay farther has level'd his road to it, leads him not as he did the Israelites thro the wilderness, thro intricate mazes to puzzle his understanding; thro a land of drought wherein were fiery Serpents and Scorpions, Deut. 8. 15. to discourage and affright him: but has in the Gospel chalkt out a plain, a safe, nay a pleasant path; as much superior both in the ease of the way, and in the end to which it leads, as heaven is to Canaan.

2. BY doing this he has not only secured our grand and ultimate happiness, but provided for our intermedial also. Those Christian duties which are to carry us to heaven, are our refreshments, our viaticum in our journey: his yoke is not to gall and fret us, but an engine by which we may with ease (and almost insensibly) draw all the clogs and incumbrances of human life. For whether we take Christianity in its whole complex, or in its several and distinct branches, tis certainly the most excellent, the most compendious art of happy living: its very tasks are rewards, and its precepts are nothing but a divine sort of Alchymy, to sublime at once our nature and our pleasures.

3. THIS may be evidenc'd in every particular of the Evangelical law: but having formerly made some attempt towards it in another tract, I shall not here reassume the whole subject. I shall only single out one particular precept, wherein happiness is not (as in the others) only implied, and must be catched at the rebound by consequence and event; but is literally expressed, and is the very matter of the duty; I mean the precept of acquiescence and Contentment. Happiness and this true genuine Contentment, being terms so convertible, that to bid us be content, is but another phrase for bidding us be happy.

4. TEMPORAL enjoyments, such as are pleasure, wealth, honor, and the rest, though they make specious pretences to be the measure of human happiness, are all of them justly discarded by the Philosopher in his Ethics, upon this one consideration, that coming from abroad they may be withheld or taken from us: and our tenure being precarious, we even for that reason are unhappy in our most desirable possessions, because we still are liable to be so. And therefore he concludes, that felicity must be placed in the mind and soul, which stands without the reach of fortune; and in the practice of virtue, which in its own nature, and not in its contingent use is truly good, and therefore certainly renders the possessors such.

5. BUT this practice being diffused thro the whole extent of Moral duty, Epictetus thought he had deserved well of human nature, when he drew it up in two short words, to sustain and abstain: that is to bear with constancy adverse events, and with moderation enjoy those that are prosperous. Which complexure of Philosophy is yet more fully, as well as more compendiously expressed in the single notion of Contentment: which involves the patient bearing of all misadventures, and generous contempt of sensual illectives. This state of mind the Greeks express by calling it 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 or self-sufficiency, which, we know properly speaking, is one of the incommunicable attributes of the divine nature: and the Stoics expressly pretend, that by it mortal men are enabled to rival their God's; in Seneca's phrase, to make a controversy with Jupiter himself. But abating the insolent blasphemy of an independent felicity, Christianity acknowledges a material truth in the assertion: and St. Paul declares of himself, that having learnt how to want and how to abound, and in whatever state he happens to be in, therewith to be content: he is able to do all things thro Christ that strengthens him, Phil. 4. 11. 12, 13. and having nothing, to possess all things. 2 Cor. 6. 10.

6. WHICH great event comes about, not only because all good things are eminently in the divine nature, and he who by Virtue and Religion possesses Him, thereby by, in a full equivalence has everything; but also upon human measures, and the principles of Philosophy: the compendious address to wealth, as Plato rightly observed, being not to increase possessions, but lessen desires. And if so, twill follow that the contented man must be abundantly provided for, being so entirely satisfied with what he has, as to have no desires at all. Indeed tis truly said of covetous men, and is equally verified of all who have any desire to gratify, that they want no less what they have, then what they have not: but the reverse of that Paradox is really made good by Contentment, which bestows on men the enjoyment of whatever they have, and also whatever they have not; and by teaching to want nothing, abundantly secures not to want happiness.

7. ON the other side this one grace being absent, it is not in the power of any success or affluence to make life a tolerable thing. Let all the materials of earthly happiness be amast together and flung upon one man, they will without contentment be but like the fatal prize of Tarpeia's treason, who was pressed to death with the weight of her booty. He that has the elements of felicity, and yet cannot form them into a satisfaction, is more desperately miserable then he that wants them: for he who wants them has yet something to hope for, and thinks if he had them he might be happy; but he who insignificantly possesses them, has no reserve, has not so much as the Flattery of an expectation: for he has nothing left to desire, and yet can be as little said to enjoy.

8. HE therefore that would have the extract, the quintessence of happiness, must seek it in Content. All outward accessions are but the dross and earthy part: this alone is the spirit, which when tis once separated, depends not upon the fate of the other; but preserves its vigor when that is destroy'd. St. Paul whom I before mentioned, is a ready instance of it, who professes to be content in what ever state. Contentment being not so inseparately link'd to external things, but that they may subsist apart. That those are often without it we are too sure, and that it may be without them is as certainly true; though by our own default we have not so many examples of it. A heart that rightly computes the difference between temporals and eternals, may resolve with the Prophet, Altho the fig tree shall not blossom, neither shall fruit be in the vines, the labor of the olive shall fail, and the fields shall yield no meat; the flocks shall be cut off from the fold, and there shall be no herds in the stall; yet I will rejoice in the Lord, I will joy in the God of my Salvation. Hab. 3. 17. 18. He that has God need not much deplore the want of anything else: nor can he that considers the plenty and glory of his future state, be much dejected with the want or the abjectness of his present.

9. YET so indulgent is God to our infirmities, that knowing how unapt our impatient natures are to walk only by faith, and not at all by sight 2 Cor. 5. 7. he is pleased to give us fair antepasts of satisfaction here, dispenses his temporal blessings though not equally, yet so universally, that he that has least, has enough to oblige not only his acquiescence, but his thankfulness. Tho every man has not all he wishes, yet he has that which is more valuable then that he complains to want; nay which he himself could worse spare were it put to his option.

10. AND now from such a disposure of things who would not expect that mankind should be the cheerfullest part of the creation: that the sun should not more rejoice to run his course Psal. 19. 5. then man should to finish his: that a journey which has so blessed an end, and such good accommodation by the way, should be past with all imaginable alacrity, and that we should live here practicers and learners, of that state of unmix'd interminable joies to which we aspire. But alas if we look upon the universality of men, we shall find it nothing so; but while all other creatures gladsomly follow the order of their creation, take pleasure in those things God has assigned for them, we with a fullen perverseness quarrel at what we should enjoy, and in everything make it our business, not to fit it for our use, but to find out some concealed quality which may render it unfit. We look insidiously upon our blessings, like men that designed only to pick a quarrel, and start a pretence for mutining. From hence it is that man who was designed the Lord of the world, to whose satisfaction all inferior beings were to contribute, is now the unhappiest of the creatures: nay as if the whole order of the universe were inverted, he becomes slave to his own vassals, courts all these little sublunary things with such passion, that if they prove coy and fly his embraces, he is mad and desperate: if they fling themselves into his Arms, he is then glutted and satiated; like Amnon he hates more then he loved 2 Sam. 13. 15. and is sicker of his possession, then he was of his desire.

10. AND thus will it ever be till we can keep our desires more at home, and not suffer them to ramble after things without our reach. That honest Roman who from his extraordinary industry upon his little spot of ground received such an increase as brought him under suspicion of witchcraft, is a good example for us. God has placed none of us in so barren a soil, in so forlorn a state, but there is something in it which may afford us comfort; let us husband that to the utmost, and tis scarce imaginable what improvements, even he that appears the most miserable may make of his condition. But if in a sullen humor we will not cultivate our own field, because we have perhaps more mind to our neighbors, we may thank ourselves if we starve. The despising of what God has already given us, is sure but a cold invitation to farther bounty. Men are indeed forced sometimes to reward the mutinous: but God is not to be so attacked, nor is it that sort of violence which can ever force heaven. The Heathen could say that Jupiter sent his plagues among the poorer sort of men, because they were always repining: and indeed there is so much of truth in the observation, that our impatience and discontent at our present condition, is the greatest provocation to God to make it worse.

11. IT must therefore be resolved to be very contrary to our interest, and surely tis no less too our duty. It is so if we do but own ourselves men, for in that is impli'd a subordination and submission to that power which made us so; and to dispute his managery of the world, to make other distributions of it then he has don, is to renounce our subjection, and set up for dominion. But this is yet more intolerable as we are Christians, it being a special part of the Evangelical discipline, cheerfully to conform to any condition: to know how to be abased, and how to abound, to be full and to be hungry, Phil. 4. 12. to be careful for nothing ver. 6. Nay so little do's Christ give countenance to our peevish discontents, our wanton out-cries when we are not hurt, that he requires more then a contentment, an exultancy and transport of joy even under the heaviest pressures, under reproaches and persecutions. Rejoice ye in that day, and leap for joy Lu. 6. 23. And sure nothing can be more contrary to this, then to be always whining and complaining, crying in the Prophets phrase, my leanness my leanness, woe is me. Isa. 24. 16. When perhaps Moses's simile do's better fit our state, Iesurun waxed fat and kicked. Deut. 32. 15.

12. AND as this querulous humor is against our interest and duty, so is it visibly against our ease. Tis a sickness of the mind, a perpetual gnawing and craving of the appetite without any possibility of satisfaction: and indeed is the same in the heart which the Caninus appetitus is in the stomach, to which we may aptly enough apply that description we find in the Prophet, he shall snatch on the right hand and be hungry, and he shall eat on the left and not be satisfied, Isaiah. 9. 20. Where this sharp, this fretting humor abounds, nothing converts into nourishment: every new accession do's but excite some new desire; and as tis observed of a trencher-fed dog, that he tastes not one bit for the greedy expectation of the next; so a discontented mind is so intent upon his pursuits, that he has no relish of his acquests. So that what the Prophet speaks of the Covetous, is equally applicable to all other sorts of Malecontents: he enlarges his desire as hell, and is as death, and cannot be satisfied, Hab. 2. 5. And sure if the desire accomplished be as Solomon says sweet to the soul, Prov. 13. 19. it must be exceedingly bitter, to be thus condemned to endless unaccomplishable desires; and yet this is the torture which every repining uncontented spirit provides for itself.

13. WHAT a madness is it then for men to be so desperately bent against their interest and duty, as to renounce even their ease too for company? One would think this age were sensual enough to be at defiance with the least shadow of uneasiness. It is so I am sure where it ought not, everything is laborious when tis in compliance with their duty, a few minutes spent in prayer Oh what a weariness is it! Mal. 2:13. If they chance but to miss a meal, they are ready to cry out, their knees are weak thro fasting. Psa. 109. 23. yet they can without regret, or any self-compassion, macerate and cruciate themselves with anxious cares and vexations, and as the Apostle speaks 1 Tim. 6. 10. pierce themselves thro with many sorrows. That proposal therefore which was very rashly made by St. Peter to our Savior, Master pity thyself, Mat. 16. 22. which we render be it far from thee, would here be an advised motion to the generality of mankind, who are commonly made unhappy not by anything without them, but by those restless impatiencies that are within them.

14. IT may therefore be a seasonable office to endeavor the appeasing those storms, by recalling them to those sober rational considerations, which may show as well the folly, as uneasiness of this repining unsatisfiable humor. Tis certain that in true reasoning, we can find nothing whereon to found it, but a great deal to enforce the contrary. Indeed tis so much against the dictate of reasonable nature to affect damage, sin, and torment, that were there nothing else to be said but what I have already mentioned, it might competently discover the great unreasonableness of this sin.

15. BUT we need not confine our appeal to reason, as it is only a judge of utility and advantage; but enlarge it to another notion, as it is judge of equity and right: in which respect also it gives as clear and peremptory a sentence against all murmuring and impatience. To evince this I shall insist upon these particulars. 1. that God is debtor to no man, and therefore what ever he affords to any, it is upon bounty not of right, a benevolence not a due. 2<sup>lie</sup>. that this bounty is not straight or narrow, confined to some few particular persons, and wholly overskipping the rest, but more or less universally diffused to all. So that he who has the least, cannot justly say but he has been liberally dealt with. 3<sup>lie</sup> that if we compare our blessings with our alliaies, our good things with our evil, we shall find our good far surmounting. 4<sup>lie</sup> that we shall find them yet more so, if we compare them with the good we have don, as on the contrary we shall find our afflictions scarce discernible if balanced with our sins. 5<sup>lie</sup> that as God is Rector of the universe, so it appertains to him to make such allotments, such distributions, as may best preserve the state of the whole. 6<sup>lie</sup> that God notwithstanding that universal care, has also a peculiar aspect on every particular Person, and disposes to him what he discerns best for him in special. 7<sup>lie</sup> if we compare our adversities, with those of other men, we shall always find something that equals if not exceeds our own. All these are certain irrefragable truths, and there is none of them single but may, if well pressed upon the mind, charm it into a calmness and resignation; but when there is such a conspiracy of arguments, it must be a very obstinate perverseness that can resist them: or should they fail to enforce a full conviction; will yet introduce those subsidiary proofs which I have to allege, so advantagiously, as will being put altogether, amount unto perfect and uncontrollable Evidence.

SECT. II.

Of God's Absolute Sovereignty.

1. THE first proposition that God is debtor to no man, is too clear and apparent to require much of illustration: for as he is a free agent and may act as he pleases, so he is the sole proprietary and can wrongfully detain from none, because all original right is in himself. This has been so much acknowledged by the blindest Heathens, that none of them durst make insolent addresses to their God's, challenge anything of them as of debt, but by sacrifices and prayers owned their dependence and wants, and implor'd supplies. And sure Christianity teaches us not to be more saucy. If those Deities who ow'd their very being to their votaries, were yet acknowledged to be the spring and source of all, we can with no pretence deny it to that supreme power in whom we live, move, and have our being. Acts. 17. 28. For if it were merely an act of his choice to give us a being, all his subsequent bounties can have no other original then his own good pleasure. We could put no obligation upon God before we were: and when we began to be, we were his creatures, and so by the most indisputable right owe ourselves to him, but can have no antecedent title on which to clame anything from him: so that the Apostle might well make the challenge which he doth on God's behalf, who hath given anything unto him, and it shall be recompenc'd to him again? Rom. 11. 35.

2. Now ordinary discretion teaches us not to be too bold in our expectations from one to whom we can plead no right. It has as little of prudence as modesty, to press impudently upon the bounty of a Patron, and do's but give him temptation (at least pretence) to deny. And if it be thus with men, who possibly may sometimes have an interest, sometimes a vanity to oblige us; it must be much more so towards God, who cannot be in want of us, and therefore need not buy us: our good, as the Psalmist speaks, extends not to him. Psal. 16. 2. He has a fundamental right in that little we are, which will stand good though it should never be corroborated by greater benefits. With what an humble bashfulness should we then sue for anything, who have no argument to invite the least donation? being already so preingag'd, that we cannot mortgage so much as ourselves in consideration of any new favor: and surely extravagant hopes do very ill befit people in this condition. We see the modesty of good Mephibosheth, who though he was by a slanderous accusation outed of half the estate David had given him, yet upon a reflection that he derived it all from his good pleasure, disputed not the sentence, but cheerfully resigned the whole to the same disposure, from which he received it, saying, Yea, let him take all. 2 Sam. 19, 30. A rare example and fit for imitation, as being adapted to the present case, not only in that one circumstance of his having received all from the King, but also in that of the attainder of his blood, which he confesses in the former part of the verse, for all of my fathers house were but dead men before my Lord. And alas may we not say the very same? was not our whole race tainted in our first Parent? So that if God had not the primary title of vassalage, he would in our fall have acquired that of confiscation and escheat. And can we think ourselves then in terms to capitulate and make our own conditions, and expect God should humor us in all our wild demands?

3. THIS is indeed to keep up that old rebellion of our Progenitor, for that consisted in a discontent with that portion God had assigned him, and coveting what he had restrain'd him. Nay indeed it comes up to the height of the Devils proposal, the attempting to be as God. Gen. 3. 5. For tis an endeavor to wrest the managery out of his hands, to supersede his Authority of dispensing to us, and to carve for ourselves. This is so mad an insolence, that were it possible to state a case exactly parallel between man and man, it would raise the indignation of any that but pretended to ingenuity. Yet this is, without Hyperbole, the true meaning of every murmuring repining thought we entertain.

4. BUT as bad as it is, who is there of us, that can in this particular say we have made our heart clean? Prov. 20. 9. Tis true we make some formal acknowledgment sometimes that we receive all from God's gift, custom teaches us from our infancy after every meal we eat to give him thanks (though even that is now thought too much respect, and begins to be discarded as unfashionable.) Yet sure he cannot be thought to do that in earnest, that has all the time of his eating been grumbling that his table abounds not with such delicacies as his neighbors. And yet at this rate God knows are most of our thanksgivings. Indeed we have not so much ordinary civility to God, as we have to men. The common proverb teaches us not too curiously to pry into the blemishes of what is given us: but on God's gifts we sit as Censors, nicely examine everything which is any way disagreeable to our fancies, and as if we dealt with him under the notion of chapmen, disparage it, as Solomon says buyers use to do, it is naught, it is naught, saith the buyer Prov. 20. 14. Nay we seem yet more absurdly to change the scene, and as if God were to make oblations to us, we as critically observe the defects of his benefactions, as the Levitical priests were to do those of the sacrifice, and (like angry Deities) scornfully reject, what ever do's not perfectly answer our wanton appetites.

5. AND now should God take us at our words, withdraw all those blessings which we so fastidiously despise, what a condition were we in? Tis sure we have nothing to plead in reverse of that judgment. There is nothing in it against justice: for he takes but his own. This he intimates to Israel Hos. 2. 9. I will return and take away my corn in the time thereof, and my wine in the season thereof, and will recover my wool and my flax: in which he asserts his own propriety, my corn, my wine &c▪ and recalls them to the remembrance that they were but usufructuaries: and tis as evident that our tenure is but the same. Nay this proceeding would not be repugnant even to mercy, for even that is not obliged still to prostitute its self to our contempt. I am sure such a tolerance is beyond all the measures of human lenity. Should any of us offer an alms to an indigent wretch, and he when he sees tis Silver, should murmur and exclaim that it is not Gold, would we not draw back our hand, and reserve our charity for a more worthy object? Tis true indeed God's thoughts are not as our thoughts, nor our narrow bowels equal measures for the divine compassions, and we experimentally find that his longsuffering infinitely exceeds ours, yet we know he do's in the parable of the Lord and the servant Mat. 18. declare that he will proportion his mercy by ours, in that instance; and we have no promise that he will not do it in this: nay we have all reason to expect he should; for since his wisdom prompts him to do nothing in vain, and all his bounty to us is designed to make us happy, when he sees that end utterly frustrated by our discontents, to what purpose should he continue that to us which we will be never the better for?

6. BESIDES though he be exceedingly patient, yet he is not negligent or insensible, he takes particular notice, not only with what diligence we employ, but with what affections we resent every of his blessings. And as ingratitude is a vice odious to men, so it is extremely provoking to God: so that in this sense also, the words of our Savior are most true, from him that hath not (i.e.) that hath not a grateful sense and value, shall be taken away even that he hath Mat. 25. 29. But we may find a threatening of this kind yet more express to Israel, because thou servedst not the Lord thy God with gladness and with joyfulness of heart for the abundance of all things, therefore shalt thou serve thine enemies, whom the Lord God will send among thee, in hunger and in thirst and in nakedness and in want of all things Deut 28. 27. 28. a sad and dismal inversion, yet founded wholly in the want of that cheerful recognition which God expected from them. And if Israel the lot of his own inheritance, that people whom he had singled out from all the nations of the world, could thus forfeit his favor by unthankfulness, sure none of us can suppose we have any surer entail of it. In a word as God loves a cheerful giver, so he also loves a cheerful receiver. One that complies with his end in bestowing, by taking a just complacence in his gifts. But the querulous and unsatisfied, reproach his bounty: accuse him of illiberality and narrowness of mind. So that he seems even in his honor engaged to bring them to a righter apprehension of him, and by a deprivation teach them the value of those good things, which they could not learn by the enjoyment.

7. IF therefore ingenuity and gratitude cannot, yet at least let prudence and self-love engage us against this sin of Murmuring, which we see do's abundantly justify the character the Wise man gives when he tells us tis unprofitable Wis. 1. 11. he might have said pernicious also, for so it evidently is in its effects. Let us then arm ourselves against it, and to that purpose impress deeply upon our minds the present consideration, that God owes us nothing, and that what ever we receive is an alms, and not a tribute. Diogenes being asked what wine drank the most pleasant, answered, that which is drunk at another's cost. And this circumstance we can never miss of to recommend our good things to us: for be they little or much, they come gratis. When therefore in a pettish mood we find ourselves apt to charge God foolishly, and to think him strait-handed towards us, let us imagine we hear God expostulating with us, as the householder in the parable, Friend I do thee no wrong: is it not lawful for me to do what I will with mine own? Mat. 20. 15. If God have not the right of disposing, let us find out those that have, and see how much better we shall speed, but if he hath, let us take heed of disputing with him: we that subsist merely by his favor, had need court and cherish it by all the arts of humble observance. Every man is ready to say how ill beggary and pride do agree. The first qualification we cannot put off; O let us not provide it of the other so inconvenient so odious an adjunct. Let us leave off prescribing to God (which no ingenuous man would do to an earthly benefactor) and let us betake ourselves to a more holy and succesful policy, the acknowledgment of past mercies, and our own unworthiness. This was Jacob's method, I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, and of all the truth which thou hast showed unto thy servant: for with my staff I passed over this Jordan, and now I am become two bands, and with this humble preface he introduces his petition for rescue in his present distress, Deliver me I pray thee from the hand of my brother, &c. Gen. 32. 10. 11. An excellent pattern of Divine Rhetoric, which the success demonstrates to have been very prevalent. And we cannot transcribe a better copy, to render our desires as succesful. Indeed we are so utterly destitute of all arguments from ourselves, that we can make no reasonable form of address, if we found it not in something of God: and there is nothing even in him adapted to our purpose, but his mercy; nor can that be so advantageously urged by anything, as by the former instances, it has given of itself: for as God only is fit to be a precedent to himself, so he loves to be so. Thus we find, not only Moses, but God often recollecting his miraculous favors towards Israel, as an argument to do more: let us therefore accost him in his own way, and by a frequent and grateful recounting of his former mercies, engage him to future. Nor need we be at a loss for matter of such recollection, if we will but seriously consider what we have already received, which is the subject of the next Section.

SECT. III.

Of God's Vnlimited Bounty.

1. IT is the known character of an unworthy nature, to write injuries in Marble, and benefits in dust: and however some (as Seneca well observes) may acquit themselves of this imputation as to man, yet scarce any do so in relation to God. Tis true indeed the charge must be a little varied; for God neither will nor can do us injury: yet we receive anything that is adverse with such a resentment as if it were, and engrave that in our memories with indelible characters, whilst his great and real benefits are either not at all observed, or with so transient an advertence, that the comparison of dust is beyond our pitch, and we may be more properly said to write them in water. Nay so far are we from keeping records and registers of his favors, that even those standing and fixed ones which sense can prompt us to (without the aid of our memories) cannot obtain our notice.

2. WERE it not thus, it were impossible for men to be so perpetually in the complaining Key, as if their voices were capable of no other sound. One wants this, and another that, and a third something beyond them both, and so on ad infinitum; when all this while everyone of them enjoys a multitude of good things without any remark. That very breath wherewith they utter their complaints, is a blessing, and a fundamental one too: for if God should withdraw that, they were incapable of whatsoever else they either have, or desire. Tis true that some men's impatiencies have risen so high, as to cast away life, because it was not clothed with all circumstances they wisht. Yet these are rare instances, and do only show such men's depraved judgment of things. A rich Jewel is not the less valuable, because a mad man in his raving fit flings it into the fire: but as to the generality of men, the devil (though a liar) gave a true account of their sense, when he said, Skin for skin, and all that a man hath will he give for his life. Job. 2. 4. And though perhaps in an angry fit many men have with Jonas Chap. 4. 3. wisht to die, yet ten to one should death then come, they would be as willing to divert it, as was the man in the Apologue, who wearied with his burden of sticks, flung it down and called for death, but when he came, owned no other occasion for him, but to be helped up again with his bundle. I dare in this appeal to the experience of those, who have seemed very weary of life, whether when any sudden danger has surprised them, it has not as suddenly altered their mind, and made them more desire life, then before they abhorred it. Tis the common saying, As long as there is life there is hope: there is so as to secular concerns, for what strange revolutions do we often see in the age of a man? from what despicable beginnings have many arrived to the most splendid conditions? Of which we have divers modern as well as ancient instances. And indeed tis admirable to see what time and industry will (with God's blessing) effect. But there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave. Ecc. 9. 10. we can improve no more when we are once transplanted thither.

3. BUT this is yet much more considerable in respect of our spiritual state. Our life is the day wherein we are to work. Joh. 9. 4. (yea to work out our Salvation:) but when the night comes (when death overtakes) no man can work. Now alas when tis considered how much of this day the most of us have loiter'd away, how many of us have stood idle till the sixth or ninth hour, it will be our concern not to have our day close before the eleventh. Nay alas tis yet worse with us: we have not only been idle, but very often ill busied; so that we have a great part of our time to unravel, and that is not to be don in a moment. For though our works may fitly enough be represented by the Prophets comparison of a spiders web, Isaiah. 59. 5. yet they want the best property even of that; they cannot be so soon undon. Vices that are radicated by time and custom, lie too deep to be lightly swept away. Tis no easy thing to persuade ourselves to the will of parting with them. Many violences we must offer to ourselves, a long and strict course of mortification must be gone thro, ere we can find in our hearts to bid them be gone: and yet when we do so, they are not so tractable as the Centurions servants. They will indeed come whenever we bid them, but they will scarce go so: they must be expel'd by force and by slow degrees; we must fight for every inch of ground we gain from them: and as God could not assist the Israelites to subdue the Canaanites, at once Deut. 7. 22. so neither ordinarily do's he us to master perfectly our corruptions. Now a process of this difficulty is not to be dispatched on a sudden. And yet this is not all our task, for we have not only ill habits to extirpate, but we have also good ones to acquire: tis not a mere negative virtue will serve our turns, nor will empty lamps enter us into the marriage chamber, Mat. 25. 10. We must add to our faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, &c. 2 Pet. 1. 5. No link must be wanting of that sacred chain, but we must (as the same Apostle advises) be holy in all manner of conversation. 1 Pet. 1. 15.

4. AND now I would desire the Reader seriously to consider, whether he can upon good grounds tell himself that this so difficult (and yet so necessary) a work is effectually wrought in him. If it be, he is a happy man, and can with no pretence complain of any external want: (he that is fed with Manna, must be strangely perverse if he murmur for a belly-full of leeks and onions. Num. 11. 5.) But on the contrary he owes infinite thanks to God, that has spared him time for this important business, and did not put a period to his natural life, before he had begun a spiritual. For I fear there are among the best of us few of so entire an innocence, but they may remember some, either habits or acts of sin, in which it would have been dreadful for them to have been snatched away. And then how comprehensive, how prolific a mercy has life been to them, when it has carried eternity in its womb, and their continuance on earth has qualified them for heaven? Neither are such persons only to look on it as a blessing in the retrospect, as it relates to the past, but also in the present and future: which if they continue to employ well, do's not only confirm, but advance their reward. Besides God may please by them to glorify himself, make them instrumental to his service; which as it is the greatest honor, so it is also the greatest satisfaction to a good heart. He shows himself too mercenary that so longs for his reward, as to grow impatient of his attendances: he that loves God, thinks himself blest in the opportunity of doing work, as well as in receiving wages. Thus we see how life is under all these aspects a mercy to a pious man, and such as not only obliges him to contentment, but gratitude.

5. BUT supposing a man cannot give this comfortable account of his life, but is conscious that he has spent it to a very different purpose, yet do's not that at all lessen his obligations to God, who meant he should have employ'd it better, and that he has not don so is merely his own fault. Nay indeed the worse his state is, the greater mercy it is, that God has not yet made it irreversible, that he has not cut him off at once from the earth and the possibility of heaven too, but affords him yet a longer day, if yet he will hear his voice Psal. 95. 7. This longsuffering is one of the most transcendent acts of divine goodness, & therefore the Apostle rightly stiles it the riches of his goodness and longsuffering and forbearance Rom. 2. 4. and so at last we commonly acknowledge it, when we have worn it out, and can no longer receive advantage by it. What a value do's a gasping despairing soul put upon a small parcel of that time, which before he knew not how fast enough to squander? Oh that men would set the same estimate on it before, and then certainly, as it would make them better husbands of it, so it would also render them more thankful for it, Accounting that the longsuffering of our Lord is Salvation. 2 Pet. 3. 15.

6. INDEED did men but rightly compute the benefit of life upon this score, all secular encumbrances and uneasinesses of it would be overwhelmed, and stand only as Cyphers in the account. What a shame is it then that we should spend our breath in sighs and out-cries? which if we would employ to those nobler ends for which twas given, would supersede our complaints, and make us confess we were well dealt with, that our life (though bare and stripped of all outward accessories) is given us for a prey. Jer. 45. 5. And indeed he that has yet the great work of life to do, can very ill spare time or sorrow to bestow upon the regretting any temporal distress, since his whole stock is little enough to bewail and repair his neglects of his eternal concerns. Were our lives therefore destitute of all outward comfort, nay were they nothing but a scene of perpetual disasters, yet this one advantage of life would infinitely outweigh them all, and render our murmurings very inexcusable.

7. BUT God has not put this to the utmost trial, has never placed any man in such a state of unmixed calamity, but that he still affords many and great alliaies: he finds it fit sometimes to defalk some of our outward comforts, and perhaps embitter others, but he never takes all away. This must be acknowledged, if we do but consider how many things there are in which the whole race of mankind do in common partake. The four Elements, fire and water, air and earth, do not more make up every man's composition, then they supply his needs: the whole host of heaven, the Sun, Moon, and Stars, Moses will tell us, are by God divided to all nations under the whole Heaven, Deut. 4. 19. Those resplendent bodies, equally afford their light and influence to all. The sun shines as bright on the poor Cottage, as on the most magnificent Palace; and the stars have their benign Aspects, as well for him, that is behind the Mill, as for him that sitteth on the Throne. Ex. 11. 5. Propriety (the great incendiary below) breeds no confusion in those celestial Orbs, but they are every man's treasure, yet no man's peculiar (as if they meant to teach us, that our love of appropriation descends not from above Jam. 3. 15. is no heavenly quality.)

8. AND as they make no distinction of the ranks and degrees of men, so neither do they of their virtues. Our Savior, tells us God causes his Sun to rise on the good and on the evil, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust, Mat. 5. 45. If now we descend lower to the sublunary creatures, they equally pay their homage to man, do not disdain the dominion of the poor, and submit to that of the rich, but show us that that their instinct extends to the whole nature. An horse draws the poor man's plough, as tamely as the Princes chariot, and the beggars hungry cur follows him with as much obsequiousness and affection as the pamper'd lap-dogs of the nicest Ladies. The sheep obey a poor mercenary shepherd as well as they did the Daughters of the wealthy Laban Gen. 29. 9. or of Jethro a Prince Exod. 2. 16. and as willingly yield their fleece to clothe Lazarus, as to make purple for Dives. And as animals, so vegetables are as communicative of their qualities to one man as another. The corn nurishes, the fruits refresh, the flowers delight, the simples cure the poor man as well as the rich.

9. BUT I foresee it will be objected, that these natural privileges are insignificant, because they are evacuated by those positive laws which bound propriety, and that therefore though one man could use the creatures as well as another, yet every man has them not to use. I answer, that for some of the things I have mentioned, they are still in their native latitude, cannot be enclosed or monopoliz'd. The most ravenous oppressor could never yet lock up the sun in his chest: he that lays house to house and land to land, till there be no place Isaiah. 5. 8.

cannot inclose the common air: and the like may be said of divers of the rest, so that there are some (and those no mean) blessings, which continue still the indefeisible right of mankind in general.

10. As for those other things which are liable to the restrictive terms of meum and tuum, tis not to be denied but there is vast difference in the dispensing them; as great as Nathan's parable describes, when he speaks of the numerous flocks of the rich man, and the single ewe lamb of the poor, 2 Sam. 12. 2. yet there is scarce any so deplorably indigent, but that by one means or other, he has or may have the necessary supports of life. Perhaps they fall not into his lap by birth-right and inheritance, yet they are acquirable by labor and industry, which is perhaps the better tenure. They cannot it may be arrive to Sodom's fullness of bread: yet if they have not her abundance of Idleness, Ez. 16. 49. they commonly need not want that, which was the height of Agurs wish, food convenient, Pro. 30. 8. Tis true indeed, if they will fold their hands in their bosom, if with Solomon's Sluggard, they will not plough by reason of the cold, they must take his fate in the summer, as they have his ease in the winter, they may beg in harvest, and have nothing, Prov. 20. 4. But then tis visible they are the Authors of their own necessities. And indeed to men of such lazy careless natures, tis hard to say, what degree of God's bounty can keep them from want, since we often see the fairest fortunes dissipated as well by the supine negligence, as the riotous prodigality of the owners. And therefore if men will be idle, they are not to accuse God, but themselves if they be indigent.

11. BUT then there is one case wherein men seem more inevitably exposed, and that is when by age, sickness, or decrepitness, they are disabled from work; or when their family is too numerous for their work to maintain. And this indeed seems the most forlorn state of poverty: yet God has provided for them also, by assigning such persons to the care of the rich; nay he has put an extraordinary mark of favor on them, given them the honor of being his proxies and representatives, made them letters of Attorney (as it were) to demand relief in his name, and upon his account. And though tis too true, that even that Authority will not prevail with many of the rich to open their purses, yet even in this Age of frozen charity, there are still some who remember upon what terms they received their wealth, and employ it accordingly. And though the number of them is not so great as were to be wisht, yet there are in all parts some scattered here and there like Cities of refuge in the Land, Deut. 19. 2. to which these poor distressed creatures way flee for succor. And I think I may say, that between the legal provisions that are made in this case and voluntary contributions, there are not very many that want the things that are of absolute necessity: and we know St. Paul comprises those in a small compass, food and raiment, and proposes them as sufficient materials of Content. 1 Tim. 6. 8. I say not this to contract any man's bowels, or lessen his compassions to such poor wretches. For how much soever they lend, I wish as Joab did in another case to David, the Lord increase it a hundred-fold, 2 Sam. 24. 3. I only urge it as an evidence of the assertion I am to prove, that no man is so pretermitted by God or his disposal of temporals, but that even he that seems the most abandoned has a share in his providence, and consequently cannot justly murmur, since even this state which is the highest instance of human indigence, is not without its receipts from God.

12. BUT the number in this form are but few, compared to those in a higher, for between this and the highest affluence, how many intermedial degrees are there, in which men partake not only of the necessaries, but comforts of life; that have not only food and raiment, but their distinction of holy-day and working-day fare and apparel? He that is but one step advanced from beggary has so much, he that has got to a second has more then is necessary, and so every degree rises in plenty till it comes to vanity and excess, and even there too there are gradual risings, some having so much fuel for luxury, that they are at as great a loss for invention, as others can be for materials, and complain that there are no farther riots left for them to essay. How many are there who have so cloi'd and glutted their senses, that they want some other inlets for pleasure, and with the rich man in the Gospel, are in distress where to bestow their abundance?

13. AND sure such as these cannot deny that they have reciev'd good things, yet generally there are none less contented, which is a clear demonstration that our repinings proceed not from any defect of bounty in God, but from the malignant temper of our own hearts. And as it is an easier thing to satisfy the cravings of an hungry, then to cure the nauseous recoilings of a surfeited stomach; so certainly the discontents of the poor, are much easier allai'd then those of the rich; the indigence of the one has contracted his desires, and has taught him not to look farther then a little beyond bare necessaries, so that a moderate Alms satisfies, and a liberal transports him: but he who by a perpetual repletion has his desires stretched and extended, is capable of no such satisfaction: when his enjoyments forestall all particular pursuits, and he knows not upon what to fasten his next wish; yet even then he has some confused uniform'd appetites, and thinks himself miserable because he cannot tell what would make him more happy. And yet this is that envi'd state which men with so much greediness aspire to, every man looks on it as the top of felicity to have nothing more to wish in the world. And yet alas even that when attained, would be their torment. Let men never think then that contentment is to be caught by long and foreign chaces; he is likliest to find it who sits at home, and duly contemplates those blessings which God has brought within his reach, of which every man has a fair proportion, if he will advert to it.

14. FOR besides these external accessions (of which the meanest have some, the middle sort a great deal, and the uppermost rather too much) man is a principality within himself, and has in his composure so many excellent impresses of his Makers power and goodness, that he need not ask leave of any exterior thing to be happy, if he know but aright how to value himself: the very meanest part of him, his body is a piece of admirable workman-ship, of a most incomprehensible contrivance, as the Psalmist says, he is fearfully and wonderfully made; and tis astonishing to think of what a symmetry of parts this beautiful fabric is made up. Nor are they only for show, but use: every member, every limb is endowed with a particular faculty to render it serviceable to the whole; and that admirable contexture of veins and arteries, sinues and muscles, nerves and tendons, none are superfluous, but some way or other contributes to vegetation, sense, or motion, nay the most noble and most useful parts are all of them double, not only as a reserve in case of misadventure of one part; but also as an instance of the bounty of the Donor. And indeed it is observable of Galen in his writings, that after he had taken great care to exemt himself and all of his Profession from taking notice of the Deity, by saying that to discourse concerning the God's, was the task of speculative Philosophers; yet coming to write de usu partium, and considering the frame of human bodies, and therein discovering the wonderful contrivance of every part in reference to its self, and also to the whole; their strength, agility, and various movement, infinitely surpassing the powers of all Mechanic engines; he seems to have had the fate we read of Saul in holy Scripture, and against his genius and purpose, to become a Prophet; breaking frequently out into Hymns and sacred raptures; saying, these Mysteries are more divine than the Samothracian or Elusinian; and confessing they both strictly require, and infinitely excel the low returns of human praise. But beyond the fabric of parts as organic, what an extract of wonder are our senses, those five operations of the Lord as the son of Sirach rightly (and by way of eminence) stiles them, Ecclus. 17. 5? By these we draw all outward objects to ourselves; what were the beauties of the universe to us, if we had not sight to behold them, or the most melodious sounds, if we had not hearing? and so of the rest. And yet these are not only generally given, but also preserved to the greater part of men, and perhaps would be to more, did not our base undervaluing of common mercies, force God sometimes to instruct us in their worth, by making us feel what it is to want them.

15. MULTITUDE of refreshments also God has provided for our bodies, particularly that of sleep, of which he has been so considerate, as in his distributions of time, to make a solemn allotment for it: yet who almost when he lies down considers the mercy, or when he rises refreshed, rises thankful also? But if our rest at any time be interrupted by the cares of our mind, or pains of our bodies, then, (and not till then) we consider, that tis God who gives his beloved sleep Psal. 127. 2. and think it a blessing worth our esteem. Thus it is with health, strength, and everything else, we despise it whilst we have it, and impatiently desire it whilst we have it not; but in the interim sure we cannot complain, that God's hand is shortened towards us, when in the ordinary course of his providence we commonly enjoy these mercies many years, which we find so much miss of, if they be withdrawn but for a few hours. And indeed there is not a greater instance of human pravity then our senseless contempt of blessings, merely because they are customary; which in true reason is an argument why we should prize them the more. When we deal with men, we discern it well enough, he that gives me once a 100. pounds, I account not so much my benefactor, as if he made it my annual revenue; yet God must lose his thanks, by multiplying his favors; and his benefits grow more invisible by their being always before us.

16. BUT the body (with its enjoyment) is but the lowest instance of God's bounty, tis but a decent case for that inestimable Jewel he has put in it: the soul, like the Ark, is the thing for which this whole tabernacle was framed, and that is a spark of Divinity in which alone it is that God accomplished his design of making man in his own image Gen. 1. 26. Twould be too long to attempt an exact survey of its particular excellencies, the mere intellectual powers wherewith it is endued, have exercised the curiosity and raised the admiration of the great contemplators of nature in all ages, yet after all, of so subtle composure is the soul, that it is inscrutable even to itself: and though the simplest man knows he has the faculties of Imagination, Apprehension, Memory, Reflecting; yet the learnedst cannot assign where they are seated, or by what means they operate. Tis enough to us that we have them, and many excellent uses for them; one whereof (and a most necessary one) is a thankful reflection on the goodness of God who gave them. He might have made us in the very lowest form of creatures, insensible stocks or stones; or if he had advanced us a step-higher, he might have fixed us among mere animals, made us perhaps of the noxious, at best of the tamer sort of beasts; but he has placed us in the highest rank of visible creatures, and not only given Dominion over the works of his hands Psal. 8. 6. but has given us reason wherewith to manage that sovereignty, without which we had only been the more masterful sort of brutes.

17. YET still the soul is to be considered in a higher notion, that of its immortality and capacity of endless bliss: and here indeed it owns its extraction, and is an image of the first being, whose felicity is coexistent with himself; this as it is the most transcendent accomplishment of our nature, so it is most universal. Whatever disparity there may be between man and man in other respects, yet in this all are equal, the poor beggar at the gate has a soul as capacious of eternal happiness, as he whose crumbs he begs for (nay sometimes better prepared for it, as that parable shows Luke 16. 21.) And though the dignities of earth are the prize of the rich and noble, the subtle and designing; yet heaven is as easily mounted from the dung-hill as the throne, and an honest simplicity will sooner bring us thither, than all the Machiavelian policy. Nay God has not only designed us to so glorious an end, but has don all on his part to secure us of it, sent his Son to lead us the way, his spirit to quicken us in it. We need not dispute how universal this is; tis sure it concerns all to whom I am now speaking, those that are within the pale of the church: and if it should prove confined only to them, the more peculiar is their obligation, that are thus singled out from the rest of the world, and the greater ought to be their thankfulness. The heathen Philosopher made it matter of his solemn acknowledgment to fortune, that he was born a Grecian and not a Barbarian: and sure the advantages of our Christianity are of a much higher strain, and ought to be infinitely more celebrated. The Apostle we find often applauding this glorious privilege, as that which makes fellow citizens with the Saints, and of the household of God, Ephes. 3. 19. nay which elevates us to a higher state, the adoption of sons, Gal. 4. 5. nor only Sons, but Heirs also of God, and joint Heirs with Christ, Rom. 8. 17. And what ambition is there so greedy which this will not satisfy? yet this is our common state, the birth-right of our regeneration, if we do not degrade ourselves, and with Esau basely sell our title.

18. AND now methinks every man may interrogate himself in the same form, wherein Jonadab did Amnon 2 Sam 13. 4. why art thou, being the Kings son, thus lean from day today? Why should a Person who is adopted by the King of Kings, thus languish and pine? What is there below the sun worthy his notice, much less his desires, that hath a Kingdom above it? Certainly did we but know how to estimate ourselves upon this account, twere impossible for us with such sordid condescensions to court every petty worldly interest, and so impatiently vex ourselves when we cannot attain it. Alas how unworthily do we bear the name of Christians, when that which carried the Forefathers of our Faith thro the most fiery trials, cannot support us under the disappointment of any extravagant desire? They had such respect to the recompense of the reward, Heb. 11. 26. as made them cheerfully expose their Fame to ignominy, their Goods to rapine, their Bodies to the most exquisite tortures, and their Lives to death. Yet the same hopes cannot work us to any tolerable degree of patience, when we suffer but the smallest diminution in any of these. What shall we say? Is Heaven grown less valuable, or Earth more then it was then? No surely, but we are more infatuated in our estimates: we have so long abetted the rivalry of the hand-maid, that the Mistress, like Sarah, appears despicable. Like Jonah we sit down sullen upon the withering of a gourd, never considering that God has provided us a better shelter, a building of God eternal in the Heavens. 2 Cor. 5. 1. Indeed there can be no temporal destitution so great, which such an expectation cannot make supportable. Were we in Job's condition sitting upon a dunghill, and scraping ourselves with a potsherd, yet as long as we can say with him our Redeemer liveth. Job. 19. 25. we have all reason to say with him also, blessed be the name of the Lord. Chap. 1. 21. What a madness is it then for us to expose ourselves to be pierced and wounded by every temporal adversity, who have so impenetrable an armor? nay what an ungrateful contumely is it to that goodness of God, to show that we cannot make him a counterpoise to the most trivial secular satisfaction? on which account sure he may again take up that exprobrating complaint we find in the Prophet, A goodly price that I was valued at by them. Zac. 11. 13.

19. BUT how mean soever he is in our eyes, though Christ seem the same to us in his glory which he did in his abjection, to have no beauty that we should desire him; yet he puts another rate upon himself, and tell us that he that loves Father or Mother, Son or Daughter more than me, is not worthy of me. Mat. 10. 37. Now our love and our joy are passions coincident, and therefore whatever we joy more in then we do in him, we may be presumed to love better; and if he cannot endure the competition of those more ingenuous objects of our love he there mentions, how will he suffer that of our vanities, our childish wanton appetites? And yet those are the things after which we so impatiently rave. For I believe I may truly affirm, that if there were a scrutiny made into all the discontents of mankind, for one that were fastened upon any great considerable calamity, there are many that are founded only in the irregularity of our own desires.

20. BY what has been said we may justly conclude in the Prophets phrase, God hath not been to us a wilderness, a land of darkness, Jer. 2. 31. but has graciously dispen't to us in all our interests. Yet the instances here given are only common, such as relate to all, or at least the far greater part of mankind: but what volums might be made, should every man set down his own particular experiences of mercy? In that case twould be no extravagant Hyperbole we find Joh. 22. 25. That even the world itself could not contain the books which should be written. God knows our memories are very frail, and our observations slight in this point: yet abstracting from all the forgotten or neglected favors, what vast catalogues may every man make to himself, if he would but yet recollect, what effects he has had of God's bounty in giving, of his providence in protecting, of his grace in restraining, and exciting, of his patience in forbearing? And certainly all these productions of the divine goodness were never designed to die in the birth. The Psalmist will tell us, the Lord hath so don his marvelous works, that they ought to be had in remembrance. Ps. III. 4. Let every man then make it his daily care to recount to himself the wonders God hath don, as for the children of men in general, so for himself in particular. When the Israelites murmured under their bondage, Pharaoh imputes it to their idleness, and prescribes them more work, as the readiest cure: a piece indeed of inhuman

Tyranny in him, but may with equity and success be practiced by us upon ourselves. When we find our appetites mutinous, complaining of our present condition, let us set ourselves to work, impose it as a task upon ourselves to recollect the many instances of God's mercies. And surely if we do it sincerely, and with intention, we cannot have past thro half our stages, before our sullen murmurs will be beat out of countenance, and retire with shame, when they are confronted with such a cloud of witnesses, such signal testimonies of God's goodness to us: for when we have mustered up all our little grievances, most critically examined all our wants, we shall find them very unproportionable to our comforts, and to our receipts; in which comparative notion, the next Section is to consider them.

SECT. IV.

Of the Surplusage of our Enjoyments above our Sufferings.

1. TO regulate our estimate of those things which we either enjoy or suffer, there are three precedent queries to be made: the first of their number or plenty, the second of their weight, the third of their constancy and continuance; for according as they partake more of these properties, every good is more good, and every evil is more evil. It will therefore be our best method of trial in the present case, to compare our blessings and our calamities in these three respects.

2. AND first in that of plenty, the mercies of God are the source of all our good, are set out to us in holy scripture in the most superlative strain, They are multitudes, Psal. 102. 20. Plenteous redemption, Psal. 130. 7. as high as the heaven, Psal. 103. 11. He fills all things living with plenteousness, Psal. 145. 16. His mercies indeed are such as come not within the compass of number, but stretch themselves to infinity, and are best represented by such a calculation as God made to Abraham, when he showed him the numerousness of his posterity by the innumerableness of the stars, Gen. 15. 5. Were there but a single mercy apportion'd to each minute of our lives, the sum would arise very high: but how is our Arithmetic confounded, when every minute has more then we can distinctly number? for besides the original stock mentioned in the last section, and the accession of new bounty, the giving us somewhat which we had not before; what an accumulative mercy is it, the preserving what we have? We are made up of so many pieces, have such varieties of interests, spiritual, temporal, public, and private; for ourselves, for our friends, and dependants; that it is not a confused general regard that will keep all these in security one moment. We are like a vast building, which costs as much to maintain, as to erect. And indeed considering the corruptibleness of our materials, our preservation is no less a work of omnipotence, then our first forming: nay perhaps tis rather a greater. Our original clay though it had no aptness, yet it had no aversions to the receiving a human form; but was in the hand of the potter to make it what he pleased: but we now have principles of decay within us, which vehemently tend to dissolution; we want the supplies of several things without us, the failing whereof returns us again to our dust. Nay we do not only need the aid, but we fear the hostility of outward things. That very air which sometimes refreshes us, may at another starve and freeze us: that which warms and comforts us, has also a power of consuming us. Yea that very meat which nurishes, may choke and stifle us. In a word, there is no creature so despicable, so inconsiderable, which may not sometimes serve us, and which may not at any time (if God permit) ruin us. Now whence is it that we so constantly, so frequently find the good, the benign efficacy of these things, and so seldom, so rarely the evil? whence I say is it, but from the active unwearied providence, which draws forth the better properties of the creatures for our use, and restrains the worsers for our security? which with a particular advertence watches not only over every Person, but over every several concern of that person. And how astonishing a contemplation is this? If the mere ebbing and flowing of the sea, put the Philosopher into such an ecstasy, that he flung himself into it, because he could not comprehend the inscrutable cause of it; in what perpetual raptures of admiration may we be, who have every minute within us, and about us, more and greater wonders, and those too in our favor, when we deserve rather the divine power should exert itself in our destruction?

3. BUT alas our danger from the visible creatures, is little compared with those from the spirits of darkness. We wrestle not only with flesh and blood, but with Principalities and Powers, with spiritual wickedness, &c. Eph. 6. 12. So inveterate is the enmity between the Serpent and the seed of the Woman in general, that he watches all advantages against us, not only in our souls, but even our bodies, our goods, and in every part of our concerns. Thus we see he not only assaulted Job's soul by the wicked insinuations of his Wife, but (with more effect) his body with boils and sores, his possessions by the Chaldeans and Sabaeans, and the images of himself, his dearest Children, by a wind from the wilderness. Job. 1. And can we think his malice is now worn out? no surely he still wishes as ill to mankind as ever, and we should soon see the woeful effects of it, did not the same power which let him loose for Job's trial, restrain him for our safety. Nay had he but power to affright, though not to hurt us, even that would make our lives very uncomfortable. We cannot hear the relation of Sprights or apparitions, but our blood chills upon it, and a horror runs thro our veins: what should we then do if he should make his night-walks thro our chambers, and with his illusory terrors disturb our rest? Yet all this and much more he would do, if God did not chain up this old Dragon, Rev. 20. Nay if he were not at the expense of a guard about us, and those no less than Angels. I shall not dispute whither every person hath not his peculiar Guardian: for though many have not improbably asserted it, we have ground enough of acquiescence in the general affirmation of the Apostle, that they are all ministering Spirits, sent forth to minister for them, who shall be heirs of Salvation, Heb. 1. 14. And now if the Reader please to sum up how many are his concerns, and how many are the dangers which await him in them all, he cannot sure render the account of those mercies which preserve the one, and divert the other, in any other phrase than that of the Psalmist. They are more then I am able to express. Psa. 40. 7.

4. WE may now challenge the most miserable, or the most querulous man living, to produce causes of complaint, proportionable to those of thanks-giving. He that has the greatest stock of calamities, can never vye with the heaps of benefits; the disproportion is greater then that of the Armies of Ahab and Benhadad. 1 Kings. 20. 27. whereof the one was like two little flocks of Kids, the other filled the country. God has told us that he afflicts not willingly, nor grieves the children of men. Lam. 3. 33. whereas on the contrary, he delighteth in mercy. Mich. 7. 18. We may judge by ourselves which he is likeliest often to repete, those acts which he doth with regret and reluctancy, or those which he do's with pleasure and delight. But we need no inferences where we have the attestation of experience. Let every man therefore make this his judge in this case, let him every night recollect, how many things within and about him he is concerned in, and consider how many of those have been preserved entire to him, still accounting everything so continued as a new donation. If he begin with his Spiritual state, tis too possible he may sometimes find he has lost his innocence, committed some, perhaps many sins: but even in these he will find cause to justify God, if he do but recollect with what inward checks and admonitions, and outward restraints, God has endeavored to bridle him. If he will break thro those fences, that do's not at all derogate from the mercy of God which so guarded him, but it rather illustrates his goodness, that after so many quenchings of his Spirit, do's yet continue its influence. So that even he that has the most deplorably violated his integrity, is yet to confess that God's purpose was to have preserved it entire: and he might really so have kept it, had he compli'd with those aids which were afforded him. But in temporal concerns we are not so apt to undermine ourselves, and therefore shall much more rarely find we have suffered detriment in them, then in our spiritual; but are there ordinarily like to meet with a better account. Let a man therefore consider what is lacking to him of all the secular good things he had in the morning, and tell me whither for the most part he may not give such an account, as the Israelitish officers did of their men after the slaughter of the Midianites, that he hath not lost one. Num. 31. 39. Or if sometimes he do suffer a diminution, yet at the worst he will find that many more good things have been preserved to him, then have been taken from him. A man may perhaps meet with some damage in his estate, yet tis manifold odds that that damage is but partial, and that he has still more left then is lost. Or if it be more entire; yet if he have his health, his limbs, his senses, his friends, and all things beside his estate left him, so that for one thing he has lost, he still retains a multitude, he may say of it as the Disciples of the few Loaves, what is this among so many? Mat. 14. 17. Aristippus being bemoan'd for the loss of a Farm, repli'd with some shaprness upon hsi Condoler, you have but one field, and I have yet three left, why should I not rather grieve for you? intimating that a man is not so much to estimate what he has lost, as what he has left. A piece of wisdom which if we would transcribe, we might quickly convince ourselves, that even in our most adverse estate there are as Elijah speaks, more with us then against us, 2 King. 6. 16. that our enjoyments are more then our sufferings, and God's acts of grace, do far outnumber those of his severity.

5. AND as they do out-number, so also do they out-weigh them. The mercies we receive from God are (as the last Section has showed) of the greatest importance; the most substantial solid goods, and the greatest of all, I mean those which concern our eternal state, are so firmly fixed on us, that unless we will voluntarily quit our clame, tis not in the power of men or devils to defeat us. Light bodies are easily blown away by every gust of wind, but this weight of glory, as the Apostle calls it, 2 Cor. 4. 17. continues firm and stable, is proof against all storms, like the shadow of a great rock in a weary Land. Isai. 32. 2. Those dark adumbrations we have of it, might have served to refresh and deceive the tediousness of our pilgrimage, and therefore the most formidable calamities of this life are below all measures of comparison with this hope of our calling, this riches of the glory of our inheritance. Eph. 3. 16. The heaviest and most pressing of our afflictions are to that, but like the small dust of the balance: Esa. 40. 15. so that if we should here stop our inquisition, we have a sufficient resolution of the present question, and must conclude, that God has given us an abundant counterpoise of all, we either do or can suffer here.

6. IF therefore there be any so forlorn as to temporals, that he can fetch thence no evidence of God's fatherly care of him, yet this one consideration may solve his doubts, and convince him that he is not abdicated by him. We read of no gifts Abraham gave Isaac, yet to the sons of the concubins tis said he did Gen. 25. 6. It had been a very fallacious inference, if Isaac should have concluded himself neglected, because his far greater portion was but in reversions. And it will be the same in any of us, if we argue an unkindness from any temporal wants who have the entail of an eternal inheritance. But surely God do's not leave himself without witness, Act. 14. 17. even in secular things; there is no man breathing but has some blessings of his left hand, as well as his right, as I have already mentioned: and unless it be some few prodigies of Calamity in whose punishment or patience God designs signally to glorify himself, there are none who enjoy not greater comforts of life then those they want, I mean such as are really greater, though perhaps, to their prejudicate fancies they do not appear so. Thus in point of health, if a man be disaffected in one part, yet all the rest of his body may be (and often is) well; or if he have a complication, and have more then one disease, yet there is no man that has all, or half so many as are incident to human bodies, so that he is comparatively more healthy then sick. So again it is not very common for a man to loose a limb, or sense, the generality of men keep them to their last; and they who do, have in that an overbalance to most outward adversities; and even they who are so unhappy to loose one, yet commonly keep the rest; at least the Major part: or if at any time any man is left a mere breathing trunk, yet it is by such stupefying diseases as dead the sense, or such mortal ones as soon take them away; and so the remedy overtakes the Malady. Besides it pleases God very often, to make compensation for the want of one member or faculty by improving the use of another. We have seen feet supply all the necessary uses of hands to those who have had none; and it is a thing of daily observation that men that are blind, have the greater internal light: have their intellects more vigorous and active, by their abstractions from visible objects.

7. THUS also it is in the matter of wealth, he that is forced to get his bread by the sweat of his brows, tis true he cannot have those delicacies wherewith rich men abound; yet his labor helps him to a more poignant, more savory sauce then a whole College of Epicures can compound. His hunger gives a higher gust to his dry crust, then the surfeited stomach can find in the most costly, most elaborate mixtures: so verifying the observation of Solomon, the full soul loatheth the honey comb, but to the hungry soul every bitter thing is sweet, Prov. 27. 7. He cannot indeed stretch himself upon his bed of Ivory, Am. 6. 4. yet his sleeps are sounder then those that can. The wiseman tells us, and experience dos so too, that the sleep of a laboring man is sweet. Eccles. 5. 12. He is not clothed Gorgeously, has not the splendor of glittering apparel, so neither has he the care of contriving it, the fears of being forestal'd in a new invention, or any of those unmanly sollicitudes which attend that vanity. He has the proper genuine use of clothing; the preventing shame and cold, and is happily determined to that which the wiser men of the world have voluntarily chosen. To conclude, he has one advantage beyond all these; his necessities rescue him from idleness, and all its consequent temptations; which is so great a benefit, that if rich men be not their own taskmasters as his wants are his, if they do not provide themselves of business; that one want of theirs is infinitely more deplorable than all his: and he is not only happy comparatively with himself, in having better things than he wants, but with them also.

8. IF we come now to reputation and fame, the account will be much the same, he that is eminent in the world for some great achievement, is set up as an object of every man's remark; when as his excellencies on the one hand are visible, so his faults and blemishes are on the other. And as human frailty makes it too probable these later will be really more, so human envy makes it sure that they shall be more precisely, more curiously observed, and more loudly blazon'd. So that upon the whole, a good quiet security, though it be not the road to glory, yet is the likeliest fence against infamy. And indeed he that can keep up the repute of a sober integrity within his own private sphere, need not envy the triumphant sallies of others, which often meet with a fatal turn at the later end of the day. But twill be said that even that more moderate sort of reputation is not every man's portion, but that many lie under great ignominy and scandals. I shall here ask whither those be just or unjust: If they be just they belong not to our present subject, which relates only to those inflictions which are the effects of God's immediate providence, not of our own crimes; for I never doubted but that by those we may divest ourselves of any, nay of all the good things God has designed us. But if the obloquy be unjust, tis probable that tis taken up only by ill men, and that the good pass a more equitable sentence; and then surely the attestation of a few such, is able to outweigh a multitude of the others. And in this case a man may not only find patience but pleasure in reproaches. Socrates looked with trouble and jealousy on himself when ill men commended him, saying what ill have I don? and sure a Christian has a farther reason to be pleased with their revilings, they being his security againsts the woe pronounced to those whom all men speak well of, Luke 6. 26. But sometimes it happens, that even good men are seduced, and either by the artifices of the wicked, or their own too hasty credulity, give credit to unjust reports. And this I confess is a sharp trial to the injured person, yet even this cannot often be universal, there can scarce be any innocence so forlorn but that there may be opportunities of clearing it to some or other, and by them propagating it to more, and if the cloud ever come to be dispers'd, their fame will appear with the brighter luster. But if none of this happen, they have yet a certain and more blessed retreat, even an appeal to the unerring judge, who never beholds us with more approbation, than when we are under the unjust condemnation of men. Indeed we have then a double tie upon him, not only his justice but his pity is concerned in our cause. God particularly owns himself as the refuge of the oppressed, and there is scarce a sharper and more sensible oppression than this of Calumny: yet even this proves advantage, whilst it procures God's immediate patronage, makes us the objects of his more peculiar care and compassion, who can make our righteousness as clear as the light, Psa. 37. 6. if he see it fit; but if in his wisdom he choose not that for us, tis comfort enough for us that we have approved it to him. Twas

Elkanah's question to Hannah in her disconsolation, Am not I better to thee than ten Sons? I Sam. 1. 8. And sure we may say the like of God's approbation, that tis better to us I say not than ten, but ten thousand Eulogies of men. The very Echo of it in the testimony of a good conscience is an unspeakable comfort, and this voice sounds more audibly, more sweetly, among the loudest, the harshest accusations of men. So that we see even this assault too is not without its guard, and these waters of Marah. Exod. 15. 23. may be rendered not only wholesome but pleasant.

9. I have now instanced in the three most general concerns of human life, the Body, Goods, and Fame, to which heads may be reduced most of the afflictions incident to our out-ward state, as far as immediately concerns ourselves. But there is no man stands so single in the world, but he has some relations or friends in which he thinks himself interested, and many times those oblique strokes which wound us thro them, are as painful as the more direct: yet here also God is ordinarily pleased to provide some alliaies, if we would but take notice of them. He who has had one friend die, has ordinarily divers others surviving; or if he have not that, usually God raises him up others. Tis true we cannot have a succession of Fathers and Mothers, yet we often have of other friends that are no less helpful to us: and indeed there are scarce in anything more remarkable evidences of Providence, then in this particular. He that is able out of stones to raise up children to Abraham, Mat. 3 9. do's many times by as unexpected a production supply friends to the desolate. But we do sometimes loose our friends while they are living, they withdraw their kindness which is the soul of friendship: and if this happen by our own demerit, we can accuse neither God nor them for it: nor can we rationally expect that God shall provide supplies, when we willfully despoile ourselves. But when they are unkind without provocation, then is the season for his interposition, who uses to take up those whom Father and Mother forsake, Psa. 27. 10. and we frequently see signal proofs of his care in exciting the compassions of other friends and relatives, or perhaps of mere strangers. Nay sometimes God makes the inhumanity of a man's relations, the occasion of his advantage. Thus the barbarous malice of Joseph's brethren was the first step to his Dominion over Egypt. And it is a common observation in Families, that the most discountenanc'd child oft makes better proof, then the darling.

10. WE are yet liable to a third affliction by the calamity of our friends, which by the Sympathy of Kindness presses us no less (perhaps more) sensibly than our own: but then tis to be considered, that theirs are capable of the same allaying circumstances that ours are, and God has the same arts of alleviating their burdens; so that we have the same arguments for acquiescence in their sufferings that we have in our own, and shall do a more friendly office in impressing those upon them, then in the most passionate adopting their sorrows.

11. THE last and greatest discomfort from friends, is that of their sin: and if ever we may be allowed that disconsolate strain of the Prophet, Esa. 22. 4. Turn away from me, I will weep bitterly, labor not to comfort me; this seems to be the time: yet even this valley of Achor is not without a door of hope, Hos. 2. 15. A vicious person may be recalled, multitudes have been; so that as long as God continues life, we ought no more to deposit our hope, then to quit our endeavor. Besides there are few that make this complaint that have not something to balance, or at least to lighten it. I shall instance in that relation which is the nearest and most tender, that of a Parent. He that has one bad child may have divers good. If he have but one virtuous tis a very great mercy, and tis another that he may be the better taught to value it by the opposition of the contrary. But if any be so unhappy as to have many children, and all to consume his eyes and grieve his heart, 1 Sam. 2. 33. it may be a seasonable reflection for him to examine how far he has contributed to it either by Eli's fond indulgence, or by a remiss and careless education: or which is worst of all, by his most impious example. If any, or all of these be found the cause, he is not so much to seek for alliaies to his grief, as for pardon of his sin: and when he has penitently retracted his own faults, he may then have better ground of hope that God may reform those of his children. In the mean time he may look on his own affliction in them as God's discipline on him, and gather at least this comfort from it, that his heavenly Father has more care of him, then he had of his; and do's not leave him uncorrected.

12. THUS we see in all the concerns (which are the most common and important of human life, and wherein the justest of our complaints are usually founded) there is such a temperature and mixture, that the good do's more then equal the ill, and that not only in the grosser bulk, when our whole state is weighed together, but in every single branch of it. God having herein dealt with this little world Man, as he has don with the greater, wherein he is observed to have furnished every country with Specific remedies for their peculiar diseases. I have only given these short hints by way of essay and pattern for the Readers contemplation, which when he shall have extended to all those more minute particulars wherein he is especially concerned, more curiously compared his sufferings with his alliaies and comforts; I cannot doubt but he will own himself an instance of the truth of the present Thesis, and confess, that he has much more cause of thankfulness then complaint.

13. THIS I say supposing his afflictions to be of those more solid and considerable sorts I have before mentioned. But how many are there who have few or none of such, who seem to be seated in the land of Goshen, in a place exemt from all the plagues that infest their Neighbors? And those one would think should give a ready suffrage to this conclusion, as having no temptation to oppugn it; yet I doubt tis far otherwise, and that such men are of all the most unsatisfied. For though they have no crosses of God's imposing, they usually create a multitude to themselves. And here we may say with David, it is better to fall into the hand of God, then into the hand of man, 2 Sam. 24. 14 tis easier to bear the afflictions God sends, then those we make to ourselves. His are limited both for quantity and quality, but our own are as boundless as those extravagant desires from which they spring.

14. AND this is the true cause why contentment is so much a stranger to those who have all the outward causes of it, they have no definite measure of their desires; tis not the supply of all their real wants will serve their turn, their appetites are precarious and depend upon contingencies. They hunger not because they are empty, but because others are full. Many a man could have liked his own portion well enough, had he not seen another have something he liked better. Nay even the most inconsiderable things acquire a value by being another's, when we despise much greater of our own. Ahab might well have satisfied himself with the Kingdom of Israel, had not Naboth's poor plot lain in his eye: but so raving were his desires after it, that he disrelishes all the pomps of a Crown, yea the ordinary refreshments of Nature, can eat no bread till he have that to furnish him with Sallads. 1 King. 21. 2. And how many are there nowadays whose cloths sit uneasy if they see another have had but the luck to be a little more ingenuously vain; whose meat is unsavory if they have seen but a greater rarity, a newer cookery at another's Table: in a word who make other people's excesses the standard of their own felicities.

15. NOR are our appetites only excited thus by our outward objects, but precipitated and hurried on by our inward lusts. The proud man so longs for homage and adoration, that nothing can please him if that be wanting. Haman can find no gust in all the sensualities of the Persian Court, because a poor despicable Jew denies his abaisance, Est. 5. 13. The lustful so impatiently pursues his impure designs, that any difficulty he meets in them, makes him pine and languish like Amnon, who could no way recover his own health but by violating his sisters honor. 2 Sam. 13. 14. The revengeful labors under an Hydropic thirst till he have the blood of his enemy: all the liquor of Absalom's sheep-sheering could not quench his, without the slaughter of his brother, 2 Sam. 1•. 29. And thus everyone of our passions keeps us upon the rack till they have obtained their designs. Nay when they have, the very emtiness of those acquisitions is a new torment, and puts us upon fresh pursuits. Thus between the impetuosity of our desires, and the emtiness of our enjoyments, we still disquiet ourselves in vain, Psa. 39. 7. And whilst we have such cruel task-masters, tis not strange to find us groaning under our burdens. If we will indulge to all our vicious or foolish appetites, think our lives bound up with them, and solicit the satisfaction of them with as impatient a vehemence, as Rachel did for children, Gen. 30. 1. give me them or I die: no wonder that we are always complaining of disappointments, since in these the very success is a defeat, and is but the exchanging the pain of a craving ravenous stomach, for that of a cloi'd and nauseated. Indeed men of this temper condemn themselves to a perpetual restlessness, they are like phantastic mutineers, who when their superiors send them blanks to write their own conditions, know not what will please them: and even Omnipotence itself cannot satisfy these till it have new molded them, and reduced their desires to a certainty.

16. BUT in the mean time how unjustly do they accuse God of illiberality, because everything answers not their humor? He has made them reasonable creatures, and has provided them satisfactions proportionable to their nature; but if they will have wild irrational expectations, neither his wisdom, nor his goodness is concerned to satisfy those. His supplies are real and solid, and therefore have no correspondence to imaginary wants. If we will create such to ourselves, why do we not create an imaginary satisfaction to them? Twere the merrier frenzy of the two, to be like the mad Athenian that thought all the ships that came into the harbor his own: and twere better Ixion like to have our Arms filed with a cloud, then to have them perpetually beating our own breasts, and be still tormenting ourselves with unsatisfiable desires. Yet this is the state to which men voluntarily subject themselves, and then quarrel at God because they will not let themselves be happy. But sure their very complaints justify God, and argue that he has dealt very kindly with them, and afforded them all the necessary accommodations of life: for did they want them, they would not be so sensible of the want of the other. He that is at perfect ease may feel with some vexation the biting of a flea or gnat, which would not be at all observable if he were upon the rack. And should God change the scene, and make these nice people feel the destitution of necessaries; all these regrets about superfluities would be overwhelmed. In the mean time how deplorable a thing is it, that we are still the poorer for God's bounty, that those to whom he has opened his hand widest, should open their mouth so too, in outcries and murmurs? For I think I may say that generally, those that are the farthest removed from want, are so from content too; they take no notice of all the real substantial blessings they enjoy, leave these (like the ninety nine sheep in the wilderness) forgotten and neglected, to go in quest after some fugitive satisfaction, which like a shadow flies still faster in proportion to their pursuit.

17. AND now would God they could be recalled from this unprofitable chace, and instead of the Horsleeches note, Give give, Prov. 30. 15. take up that of the Psalmist, what shall I render to the Lord for all the benefits he hath don unto me? Psa. 116. 12. Let them count how many valuable or rather inestimable things, they have received from his mercy▪ and then confront them with those corrections they have found from his justice; and if they do this impartially, I doubt not they will find wherewithal to check their highest mutinies; and will join with me in confessing, that their good things abundantly outweigh their ill.

18. IF now we carry on the comparison to the last circumstance, and consider the constancy, we shall find as wide a difference. Let us take the Psalmists testimony, and there will appear a very distant date of his mercies and punishments. His mercies endure forever Psal. 136. whereas his wrath endures but the twinkling of an eye Psal. 30. 5. And accordingly God owns his acts of severity as his strange work Isa. 28. 21. that which he resorts to only upon special emergencies; but his mercies are renewed every morning, Lam. 3. 25. and doubtless we may all upon trial affirm the same. There are many of the most necessary comforts of life which do not only sometimes visit us as guests, but dwell with us as inmates and domestics. How many are there who have lived in a perpetual affluence from their cradles to their graves, have never known what it is to want? And though the goods of fortune are perhaps less constant to some, yet the refreshments of nature are usually so to us all. We eat and drink, we sleep, we recreate, we converse in a continued circle, and go our round almost as constantly as the sun do's his. Or if God do's sometimes a little interrupt us in it, put some short restraint upon our refreshments, yet that comparatively to the time we enjoy them, is but proportionable to the stop he has sometimes made of the Sun, Jos. 10. 13. 2 Kings 20. 8. or of the sea, Exod. 14. 21. which as they were no subversions of the course of nature, so neither are those short pauses he sometimes makes, a repeal of those fixed and customary benefits his providence usually allots us. But who is there can say that any one of his afflictions has been of equal continuance, or has pressed him with so few intermissions? Perhaps he may have mist some few nights sleep: but what is that to a twelve-months, or perhaps a whole lives enjoying it? Tis possible his stomach and his meat have not always been ready together; but how much oftener have they met to his delight? and generally those things that are most useful, are but rarely interrupted. Nay to a great many even the delicacies of life are no less constant, and their luxuries are as quotidian as their bread: whereas unless their vices or their fancies create uneasinesses to them, those that come immediately from God's hand, make long intermissions and short stays. Yet for all this they that should measure by the uncessantness of men's complaints, would judge that the scene was quite reversed, and that our good things are as Job speaks, swifter then a wavers shuttle, Job. 7. 6. whilst our ill, like Gehazies Leprosy, cleave inseparably to us. 2. King 5. 10.

19. THE truth is we will not let ourselves enjoy those intervals God allows us, but when a calamity do's retire we will still keep it in fiction and imagination; revolve it in our minds, and because tis possible it may return, look upon it as not gone. Like Aguish patients we count ourselves sick on our well-day, because we expect a fit the next. A strange stupid folly thus to court vexation, and be miserable in Chimera. Do's any man or indeed any beast desire to keep a distasteful relish still in his mouth, to chew the cud upon gall and wormwood? yet certainly there are a multitude of people whose lives are embitter'd to them merely by these fantastic imaginary sufferings. Nor do we only fright ourselves with images and Ideas of past calamities, but we dress up new bugbears and mormoes, are Poetic and aerial in our inventions, and lay Romantic scenes of distresses. This is a thing very incident to jealous natures, who are always raising alarms to themselves. A suspicious man looks on everybody with dread. One man he fears has designs upon his fortune, another on his reputation, perhaps a third upon his life: whilst in the mean time, the only ill design against him is managed by himself; his own causeless fears and jealousies which put him in a state of hostility with all the world; and do often betray him to the very things he groundlessly suspected. For it is not seldom seen that men have incur'd real mischiefs by a fond solicitude of avoiding imaginary ones. I do not question but this is a state calamitous enough, and shall acknowledge it very likely that such persons shall have little or no truce from their troubles, who have such an unexhausted spring within themselves; yet we may say to them as the Prophet did to the house of Jacob, Is the spirit of the Lord straitened? are these his doings? Mich. 2. 7. Such men must not cry out that God's hand lies heavy upon them, but their own; and so can be no impeachment to the truth of our observation, that God's blessings are of a longer duration, keep a more fixed steady course then his punishments. The result of all is, that the generality of mankind have good things (even as to temporals) which do in the three respects fore-mentioned exceed the ill. I mean the true and real ills which God sends, though not those fanciful ones they raise to themselves.

20. AND now why should it not appear a reasonable proposition that men should entertain themselves with the plesanter parts of God's dispensations to them, and not always pore upon the harsher: especially since the former are so much a fairer object, and perpetually in their eye, why should we look on the more sadening spectacles of human frailty or misfortune, thro all the magnifying optics our fancies can supply, and perversely turn away our eyes from the cheerfuller? Yet this God knows is too much the case with most of us. How nicely and critically do we observe every little adverse accident of our lives? what tragical stories of them do our memories present us with? When alas a whole current of prosperity glides by without our notice. Like little children our fingers are never off the sore place, till we have picked every light scratch into an Ulcer. Nay like the leuder sort of beggars, we make artificial sores to give us a pretence of complaint. And can we then expect God should concern himself in the cure? Indeed in the course of his ordinary providence there is no cure for such people, unless it be by revulsion, the making them feel the smart of some very great and pressing affliction. They therefore put themselves under an unhappy dilemma, either to continue their own tormentors, or to endure the severest course of God's discipline. Tis true the last is the more eligible, but I am sure the best way is to prevent both, by a just and grateful sense of God's mercies, which will be yet farther illustrated if we compare them with our own demerits.

SECT. V.

Of our Demerit towards God.

1. IT is the common fault of our nature, that we are very apt to be partial to ourselves; and to square our expectations more by what we wish, than by what we deserve. Something of this is visible in our dealings with men. We oft look to reap where we have not sowed, Mat. 25. 25. expect benefits where we do none: yet in civil transactions there are still remaining such footsteps of natural justice, that we are not universally to unreasonable: all traffic and commerce subsisting upon the principle of equal retribution, giving one good thing for another equivalent; so that no man expects to buy corn with chaff, or Gold with dross. But in our dealings with God, we put off even this common equity; are vast in our expectations, but penurious and base in our returns; and as if God were our steward not our Lord, we require of him with a confidence proper only to those who ask their own: whilst in the interim, what we offer to him is with such a disdainful slightness, as if we meant it rather an alms than an homage.

2. GOD indeed is so munificent, that he prevents us with his blessings, Psal. 21. 3. gives us many things before we ask: had he not don so, we could not have been so much as in a capacity of asking. But though the first & fundamental mercies are absolute and free, yet the subsequent are conditional: and accordingly we find in scripture, that God makes no promise either concerning this life or a better, but on condition of Obedience. The jews who had much larger proposals of temporal happiness than Christians have, yet never had them upon other terms. God expressly articed for the preformance of his commands, and made all their enjoyments forfeitable upon the failure, as we may see at large in the book of Deuteronomy. And under the Gospel St. Paul appropriates the promises as well of this life as of that to come unto godliness, 1 Tim. 4. 8. It will therefore be a material inquiry for every man, whether he have kept his title entire, and have not by breach of the condition forfeited his clame, even to the most common ordinary blessings; for if he have, common reason will tell him he can challenge none: and that the utmost he can hope for, must be only upon a new score of unmerited favor.

3. And here certainly every mouth must be stopped, and all the world become guilty before God, Rom. 3. 19. For alas who is there that can say his obedience has been in any degree proportionable to his obligation? Tis manifest we have all received abundantly from God's hand, but what has he had from ours? I may challenge the best man, to cast up the account of his best day, and tell me whether his receipts have not infinitely exceeded his disbursments: whether for any one good thing he has don, he has not received many. Nor is the disparity only in number, but much more in value. God's works are perfect, all he do's for us like the first 6 days productions, are all very good, Gen. 1. but alas our very righteousness is as filthy rags, Isaiah. 64. 6. we offer him the blind and the lame, Mal. 1. 9. a few yawning drowsy prayers perhaps, wherein he has the lest share: the fuller current of our thoughts running towards our secular or sinful concerns. We drop it may be a scanty Alms, wherein tis odds our vain-glory scrambles for a share with him, if it do not wholly ingross it. We sit an hour at a sermon, but tis rather to hear the wit or eloquence of the preacher, then the word of God. Like the duller sort of animals, we like well to have our itching ears scratcht, but grow sturdy and restive when we should do what we are there taught. In a word all our services at the best are miserably maim'd, and imperfect; and too often corrupt and unsound. So that God may well upbraid us as he did Israel, Offer it now to thy governor, will he be pleased with it? Mal. 1. 8. These very iniquities of our holy things, are enough to defeat all our pretences to any good from God's hand; yet God knows this is much the best side of us: tis not everyone that can make so fair an appearance as this amounts to. With many, there is no place to complain of the blemishes of their sacrifices, for they offer none; of whom we may say in the words of the Psalmist, God is not in all their thoughts, Psal. 10. 4. I fear there want not those who drive away the day, the week, nay the year, without remembering in whose hand their time is, Psal. 31. 18. or paying him any solemn tribute of it; who enjoy the services of all inferior creatures, without considering that theirs are more due to the supreme Lord: in a word, who live as if they were absolutely independent; had their existence purely from themselves, and had no Creator to whom they owed their being, or any consequent duty. And sure men who thus discard themselves from God's family, have very little reason to expect the provisions of it: yet even such as these have the impudence to complain, if anything be wanting to their needs (shall I say) or to their lusts; can ravingly profane God's name in their impatiencies, which they know not how to use in their prayers: as if the Deity were considerable in no other notion, then that of their caterer or steward.

4. IF now we seriously reflect, what can be more admirable then that infinite patience of God; who notwithstanding the miserable infirmities of the pious, and the lewd contempt of the impious, still goes on resolutely in his bounty, and continues to all mankind some, and to some all his temporal blessings? He has no obligation of justice to do so, for it is no part of his compact; he has none of gratitude, for he is perpetually affronted and disobliged. Surely we may well say with David, Is this after the manner of men, O Lord? 1 Chro. 17. 17. Can the highest human indulgence bear any proportion with this divine Clemency? no certainly, no finite patience but would be exhausted with the thousandth part of our provocations.

5. BUT is not our dealing too as little after the manner of men? I mean of reasonable creatures: for us who have forfeited our right to all, and yet by mere favor are still kept in the possession of many great blessings: for us to grow mutinous, because there is perhaps something more trifling which is denied us, is such a stupid ingratitude, as one would think impossible to human nature. Should a Tenant with us have at once forfeited his lease and maliciously affronted his Landlord, he would sure think himself very gently dealt with, if he were suffered to enjoy but a part of his first estate; but we should think him not only insolent, but mad, who when the whole were left him, should quarrel and clamor if he might not have his Cottage adorned with marble floors, and gilded roofs. Yet at this wild rate we behave ourselves to our great Landlord, grow pettish and angry if we have not everything we can fancy, though we enjoy many more useful, merely by his indulgence. And can there be anything imagined more unreasonable? Let us therefore if not for piety, yet at least to justify our claim to rationality, be more ingenuous; let us not consult only with our fond appetites, and be thus perpetually soliciting their satisfaction; but rather reflect on what tenure we hold what we already have, even that of superabundant mercy; and fear, least like insolent beggars by the impudence of our demands we divert even that charity which was designed us. In short let every man when he computes what he wants of his desires, reckon as exactly how much he is short of his duty; and when he has duly ponder'd both, he will think it a very gentle composition to have the one unsupplied, so he may have the other remitted; and will see cause contentedly to sit down and say with honest Mephibosheth, What right have I to cry anymore unto the King? 2 Sam. 19. 28. But if it be thus with us upon the mere score of our imperfections or omissions, what an obnoxious state do our innumerable actual sins put us in? If the spots of our sacrifices are provoking, what are our sacrileges and bold profanations? If those who neglect or forget God are listed among his enemies, what are those who avowedly defy him? Indeed he that soberly considers the world, and sees how daringly the divine Majesty is daily affronted, cannot but wonder that the perversions of our manners, those prodigies in morality, should not be answered with as great prodigies in calamity too; that we should ever have other ruin than that of Sodom, or the earth serve us for any other purpose than to be, as it was to Korah, Num. 16. our living sepulcher.

6. NOR is this longanimity of God observable only towards the mass and collective body of mankind, but to every man in particular. Who is there that if he ransack his conscience, shall not find guilts enow to justify God in the utmost severities towards him? so that how much soever his punishments are short of that, so much he evidently owes to the lenity and compassion of God. And who is there that suffers in this world the utmost that God can inflict? We have a great many suffering capacities, and if those were all filled up to the height, our condition would scarce differ from that of the damned in anything but duration. But God is more merciful, and never inflicts at that rate on us here. Every man's experience can tell him, that God discharges not his whole quiver at once upon him, but exemts him in many more particulars than he afflicts him; and yet the same experience will probably tell most of us, that we are not so modest in our assaults upon God; we attacque him in all his concerns (as far as our feeble malice can reach) in his Sovereignty, in his honor, in his relatives, nay sometimes in his very essence and being. And as they are universal in respect of him, so also in regard of ourselves: we engage all our powers in this war, do not only yield (as the Apostle speaks) our members instruments of unrighteousness, Rom. 6. 18. but we press them upon the service of sensual and vile lusts, even beyond our native propensions. Nor are only the members of our body, but the faculties of our souls also thus employed; our understandings are busied first in contriving sins, and then excuses and disguises for them; our wills are yet more sturdy rebels, and when the understanding is beat out of all its out-works, yet sullenly keep their hold in spite of all conviction; and our affections madly rush on like the horse into the battle, Jer. 8. 6. deterred by nothing of danger, so there be but sin enough in the attempt.

7. AND now with what face can people that thus pursue an hostility, expect that it should not be returned to them? do's any man denounce war, and yet expect from his adversary all the caresses, the obligations of friendship? self-defense will prompt even the meekest nature to despoil his enemy at least of those things which he uses to his annoyance; and if God should give way even to that lowest degree of anger, where or what were we? for since we employ our whole selves against him, nothing but destruction can avert our injuries. But tis happy for us we have to do with one who cannot fear us, who knows the impotence of our wild attempts, and so allai's his resentment of our insolence, with his pity of our follies. Were it not for this, we should not be left in a possibility so oft to iterate our provocations; every wicked imagination and black design, would be at once defeated and punished by infatuation and frenzy: every blasphemous Atheistical speech would wither the tongue, like that arm of Jeroboam which he stretched against the Prophet, 2 King. 13. 4. and every impious act would like the prohibited retrospect of Lots Wife, fix us perpetual monuments of divine vengeance.

8. AND then how much do we owe to the mercy and commiseration of our God, that he suffers not his whole displeasure to arise, Psa. 78. 39. that he abates anything of that just severity he might use toward us? He that is condemned to the Gallows, would think it a mercy to scape with any inferior penalty: why have we then such mean thoughts of God's Clemency, when he descends to such low compositions with us? corrects us so lightly as if twere only matter of ceremony and punctilioe, the regard of his honor, rather than the execution of his wrath. For alas let him among us that is the most innocent, and undeservedly afflicted, muster up his sins and sufferings, and he will see a vast inequality: and (had he not other grounds of assurance) would be almost tempted to think those were not the provoking cause, they are so unproportionably answered. He sins in innumerable instances, and is punished in few; he sins habitually and perpetually, and suffers rarely and seldom; nay perhaps he has sometimes sinned with greediness, and yet God has punished with regret and reluctancy, How shall I give thee up O Ephraim? Hos. 11. 8. And when all these disparities are considered, we must certainly join heartily in Ezras confession, Thou O God has punished us less then our iniquities deserve, Ezra. 9. 13.

9. NAY besides all our antecedent, we have after guilts no less provoking, I mean our ungracious repinings at the light chastisements of our former sins, our out-cries upon every little uneasiness, which may justly cause God to turn our whips into scorpions; and according as he threatened Israel Lev. 26. 18. to punish us yet seven times more. And yet even this do's not immediately exasperate him. The Jews were an instance how long he could bear with a murmuring generation; but certainly we of this nation are a greater, yet let us not be high-minded but fear, Rom. 11. 20. for we see at last the doom fell heavy though it was protracted, a succession of miraculous judgments pursued those murmurers, so that not one of them entered Canaan. And tis very observable that whereas to other sins God's denunciations are in scripture conditional and reversible; this was absolute and bound with an oath, He sware in his wrath that they should not enter into his rest, Psa. 95. 11. And yet if we compare the hardships of the Israelites in the wilderness, with most of our sufferings, we shall be forced to confess our mutinies have less temptation, and consequently less excuse; from whence tis very reasonable to infer, as the greatness of our danger if we persist, so the greatness of God's long suffering towards us, who yet allows us space to reform: and sure new complaints sound very ill from us, who are liable to so severe an account for our old ones. I fear the most resigned persons of us will upon recollection find, they have upon one occasion or other out-vied the number of the Israelites murmurs, therefore unless we will emulate them in their plagues, let us fear to add one more, lest that make up the fatal sum, and render our destruction irrevocable.

10. UPON all these considerations it appears how little reason any of us have to repine at our heaviest pressures; but there is yet a farther circumstance to be adverted to, and is too applicable to many of us, that is, that our sins are not only the constant meritorious cause of our sufferings, but they are also very often the instrumental cause also; and produce them not only by way of retaliation from God, but by a natural efficacy. Solomon tells us he that loves pleasure, shall be a poor man, and that a whorish woman will bring a man to a piece of bread Prov. 6. 26. that he that sits long at the wine shall have redness of eyes, Chap. 23. 29. 30. that the slothful soul shall suffer hunger, 19. 15. and all these not by immediate supernatural infliction from God, but as the proper genuine effects of those respective vices. Indeed God in his original establishment of things, has made so close a connection between sin and punishment, that he is not often put to exert his power in any extraordinary way, but may trust us to be our own Lictors, our own backslidings reprove us Jer. 2. 19. and our iniquities are of themselves enough to become our ruin, Exod. 18. 38.

11. It may therefore be a seasonable question for every man to put to himself, whether the troubles he labors under; be not of this sort; whether the poverty he complains of, be not the effect of his riot and profusion, his sloth and negligence? whether when he cries out that his comeliness is turned into corruption, Dan. 10. 8. he may not answer himself, that they are his visits to the harlots houses which have thus made rottenness enter into his bones, Hab. 3. 16. whether when he is beset with contentions, and has wounds without cause, he have not tarried long at the wine; when he has lost his friend, whether he have not by some treacherous wound Eccle. 22. 22. forced him to depart: or when he lies under infamy, whether it be not only the Echo of his own scandalous crimes. If he find it thus with him, certainly his mouth is stopped, and he cannot without the most disingenuous impudence complain of any but himself. He could not be ignorant that such effects did naturally attend such causes, and therefore if he would take the one, he must take the other also. No man sure can be so mad, as to think God should work miracles (disunite those things which nature hath conjoin'd) only that he may sin at ease, have all the bestial pleasures he can project, and none of the consequent smart. We read in deed God divided the sea, but it was to make the way for the Ransomed of the Lord to pass over Isa. 51. 10. those who were his own people, and went in at his command; but when they were secured, we find the waters immediately returned to their channel, and overwhelmed the Egyptians, who ventured without the same warrant. And sure the case is alike here, when any man can produce God's mandate for him to run into all excess of riot, to desecrate the temple of the holy Ghost, and make his body the member of an harlot, 1 Cor. 6. 15. In a word when God bids him do any of those things, which God and good men abhor, then and not before he may hope he may sever such acts from their native penal effects; for till then (how profuse soever some Legendary stories represent him) he will certainly never so bestow his miracles.

12. But I fear upon scrutiny there will appear a yet farther circumstance upon which to arraign our mutinies, for though it be unreasonable enough to charge God with the ill effects of our own leudness, yet tis a higher step to murmur because we have not materials to be wicked enough. And this I fear is the case with too many of us, who though they are not so dispoil'd by their sins, but that they can keep up their round of vicious pleasures, yet are discontented because they think some others have them more exquisite, think their vices are not Gentile enough, unless they be very expensive, and are covetous only that they may be more Luxurious. These are such as St James speaks of, who ask amiss, that they may consume it upon their lusts. Jam. 4. 3. and sure to be mutinous on this account is one of the highest pieces of frenzy. Would any man in his wits tell another he will cut his throat, and then expect he should furnish him with a knife for it? And yet to this amount our murmurs against God, for his not giving us those things wherewith we only design to wage war with him. For surely if the discontents of mankind were closely inspected, I doubt a great many would be found of this kind. It concerns the Reader therefore to make the inquisition in his own breast, both in this and all the former particulars, and I doubt not, if he do it with any ingenuity and uprightness, he will be abundantly convinced that for his few mites of obedience he paies to God, he receives talents of mercies (even temporal) from him: and that on the other side, that God as much underpaies his sins, as he overpaies his services: by which God do's sufficiently attest how little he delights in our affliction, how gladly he takes any light occasion of caressing and cherishing, and over-skips those of punishing us. Which sure ought to make us convert all our displeasures against our sins, which extort those acts of severity from him, to which his nature is most averse. And here indeed our resentments cannot be too sharp, but towards God our fittest address will be in the penitential form of the prophet Daniel, O Lord, to us belongeth confusion of face, but to the Lord our God belong mercies and forgiveness, though we have rebelled against him, Dan. 9. 8. 9. And as his justice is to be revered in his inflictions, so is his wisdom also, in so disposing of events to particular persons, as may best consist with the universal Economy and managery of the world, the consideration whereof is the design of the next Section.

SECT. VI.

Of God's general Providence.

1. WHEN God made the universe, he intended not only to glorify himself in one transient act of his power, and then leave this great and wonderful production of his, as the Ostrich her eggs in the wilderness, Lam. 4. 3. but having drawn it out of its first Chaos, he secured it from returning thither again, by establishing as a due symmetry of parts, so also a regular order of motion: hence it is that the heavens have their constant revolutions, the earth its succession of determinate seasons, animals their alternate course of generation and corruption: and by this wise Economy, the world after so many thousand years, seems still in its spring and first beauty. But it had been in vain to have thus secured the defection of the creatures, if man for whose sake they were made had been excluded from this care. His faculty of reason would have made him but the more fatal instrument of confusion, and taught him the more compendious ways of disturbing the world. Job compares him to the wild asses colt. Job 11. 12. which takes its range without adverting to anything of the common good. God has therefore doubly hedged in this unruly creature, made a fence of laws about him (both natural and positive) and besides has taken him into the common circle of his providence, so that he, as well as the rest of the creation, has his particular station assigned him; and that not only in reference to other creatures, but himself; has put a difference between one man and another, ordained several ranks and Classes of men, and endowed them with special and appropriate qualifications for those stations wherein he has set them.

2. THIS, as it is a work of infinite wisdom in God, so it is of unspeakable advantage to men. Without this regular disposure, the world would have been in the same confusion which we read of in the host of the Midianites, every man's sword against his fellow, Jud. 7. 22. Nothing but force could determine who should do, or enjoy anything; and even that decision also would have been repelable by a greater force: so that we have all reason to confess the utility of that order God has set among men: and even he that bears the lowest and most despicable place in it, is certainly infinitely more happy by contributing to that general Harmony, than he could be in any state of discord.

3. WERE this now well considered, methinks it should silence all our complaints, and men should not be so vehemently concerned in what part of the structure it pleases the great Architect to put them: for every man is to look on himself only as a small parcel of those materials which God is to put into form. Every stone is not fit for the corner, nor every little rafter for the main beam: the wisdom of the Master builder is alone to determine that. And sure there cannot be a more vile contempt of the divine wisdom than to dispute his choice. Had God wisdom enough to contrive this vast and beautiful fabric, and may he not be trusted with one of us poor worms? Did he by his wisdom make the heavens, and by his understanding stretch out the clouds, Pro. 3. 19. and shall he not know where to place a little lump of figur'd earth? this is certainly the most absurd distrust imaginable, and yet this is really the true meaning of our repining at the condition he has placed us in.

4. THE truth is, we are so full of ourselves, that we can see nothing beyond it: every man expects God should place him where he has a mind to be, though by it he discompose the whole scheme of his providence. But though we are so senselessly partial, yet God is not so: he that comprehends at once the whole concern of mankind, applies himself to the accomodating those, not the humoring any particular person. He has made the great and the small and careth for all alike, Wisd. 6. 7. He is the common Father of mankind, and disposes things for the public advantage of this great family, and tis not all the impatient cravings of a froward child that shall make him recede from his designed method. We are apt enough, I am sure, to tax it not only as a weakness, but injustice too in a Prince, when he indulges anything to a private favorite to the public disadvantage; yet so unequal are we, that we murmur at God for not doing that, which we murmur at men for doing.

5. BESIDES a man is to consider, that other men have the same appetites with himself. If he dislike an inferior state, why should he not think others do so too? and then as the wise man speaks, whose voice shall the Lord hear? Ecclus. 34. 24. Tis sure great insolence in me to expect that God should be more concerned to humor me, then those multitudes of others who have the same desires. And the more impatient my longings are, the less in reason should be my hopes; for mutiny is no such endearing quality as to render any man a dearling to God. But if all men should have equal satisfactions, we should puzzle even Omnipotence itself. Every man would be above and superior, yet those are comparative terms, and if no man were below, no man could be above. So in wealth, most men desire more, but every man do's at least desire to keep what he has; how then shall one part of the world be supplied without the diminution of the other, unless there should be as miraculous a multiplication of treasure for men's avarice, as there was of Loaves for their hunger, Mat. 16. 9. It was a good answer which the Ambassadors of an oppressed Province made to Antony, If O Emperor, thou wilt have double taxes from us, thou must help us to double Springs and Harvests. And sure God must be at the expense of a new Creation, make us a double world, if he should oblige himself to satisfy all the unreasonable appetites of men: and if he satisfy not all, why should any particular person look that his alone should be indulged to?

6. YET as unreasonable as it is, the most of us do betray such a persuasion. No man is discontented that there are lower, as well as higher degrees in the world, that there are poor as well as rich, but all sensible men assent to the fitness of it: yet if themselves happen to be set in the lower form, they exclaim as if the whole order of the world were subverted; which is a palpable indication that they think that Providence which governs others, should serve them, and distribute to them not what it, but themselves think good. This immoderate self-love is the spring and root of most of our complaints, makes us such unequal judges in our own concerns, and prompts us to put in Caveats and exceptions on our own behalf, as David did on his sons, See that thou hurt not the young man Absalom? 2 Sam. 18. 15. as if God were to manage the government of the world with a particular regard to our liking, and were like the Angels at Sodom, Gen. 19. 22. to do nothing till we had got into Zoar, had all our demands secured to us.

7. IT would indeed astonish a considering man to see, that altho the concerns of men are all disposed by an unerring Wisdom, and acknowledged by themselves to be so, yet that scarce any man is pleased. The truth is, we have generally in us the worser part of the Levelers principle, and though we can very contentedly behold multitudes below us, yet are impatient to see any above us; not only the foot (to use the Apostles simile) complains that it is not the hand, but the ear because it is not the eye, 1 Cor. 12. 15. 16. Not only the lowermost, but the higher ranks of men are uneasy, if there be any one step above them. Nay so importunate is this aspiring humor, that we see men are forced to feed it though but with air and shadows. He that cannot make any real advance in his quality, will yet do it in effigie, in all little gaities and pageantries of it. Every degree in these respects not only emulates, but imitates its superior, till at last by that impatience of their proper distance they make it greater, and sink even below their first state by their ridiculous profusion. Indeed the world seems to be so over-run with this vanity, that there is little visible distinction of degrees, and one had need go to the Heralds office to know men's qualities, for neither their habit nor equipage do nowadays inform us with any certainty.

1. BUT by all these it appears that men look on themselves only as single persons, without reference to the community whereof they are members. For did they consider that, they would endeavor rather to become the places wherein they were set, by doing the duties belonging to them, then be perpetually projecting for a change. A tree that is every year transplanted will never bear fruit, and a mind that is always hurried from its proper station, will scarce ever do good in any. This is excellently expressed to us by Solomon, As a bird that wandereth from his nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place. Pro. 27. 8. 'Tis easy to divine the fate of those young ones from whom the damn wanders, and 'tis as easy to guess how the duties of that place will be performed, whose owner is always upon the wing and making towards another. I wish we had not too costly experiments both in Church and State of the truth of this observation. Alas we forget that we are all servants to the same Master, and that he is to appoint in what office we shall serve him. How should we like it in any of our own families, to have an inferior officer leave his work undon, because he has more mind to be Major-Domo? Yet this insolence we every day repete towards God, sullenly dispute his orders, and unless we may choose our own employments, will do nothing.

9. 'TIS evident this perverse temper of mankind breeds a great deal of mischief and disturbance in the world, but would breed arrant confusion and subversion, if it were suffered to have its full range. If God permit but one ambitious spirit to break loose in an age as the instrument of his wrath, what destruction do's it often times make? How do's it cause the whole earth to tremble, and shake Kingdoms as is said of Nebuchadnezzar, Isa. 14. 16. and may be said of many others of those whole-sale robbers who have dignified the trade? But if every aspiring humor should be as prosperous, where would it find fuel to maintain the flame? No doubt every age produces men of as unbounded desires as Alexander or Caesar, but God gives them not the same opportunities to trouble the world. And accordingly in the more petty ambitions of private men he often orders it so, that those soaring minds can find no benign gale to help their mounting. He that sets bounds to the sea, saying, hitherto shalt thou come and no farther, and though the waves thereof toss themselves yet can they not prevail, though they roar yet can they not pass over, Jer. 5. 22. do's also depress the swelling pride of men, hangs clogs and weights upon them that they cannot rise to their affected height. For though we are all willing to forget it, yet God remembers that he is the Rector of the Universe, and will assert his Dominion. The subtlest contrivance cannot circumvent him, the most dareing pretender cannot wrest anything out of his hand, the Lord will still be King, be the people never so impatient, Psa. 99. 1. 'Twill therefore sure be as well our prudence as our duty to be still and know that he is God, Psal. 46. 10. with an humble dereliction of our own wills acquiesce in his, and not by ineffective strugglings provoke, whom we are sure never to subdue. We may like unmanaged horses foam and fret, but still God has the bridle in our jaws, and we cannot advance a step farther then he permits us. Why should we then create torment to ourselves by our repinings, which only sets us farther from our aims. Tis God's declared method to exalt the lowly, and tis observable in the first two Kings of Israel who were of God's immediate election, that he surprised them with that dignity when they were about mean and humble employments, the one searching his fathers Asses, the other keeping his fathers sheep: and would men honestly and diligently exercise themselves in the business of their proper calling, they might perhaps find it a more direct road to advancement, then all the sinister arts by which ambitious men endeavor to climb. Solomon sets it down as an Aphorism, seest thou a man diligent in his business he shall stand before Kings, he shall not stand before mean men Pro. 22. 29. But whether it happen to have that effect or no, it will have a better, for it will sweeten his present condition, divert his mind from mutinous reflections on other men's height, and his own lowness, for tis commonly men who mind not their work that are at so much leisure to gaze. He that carefully plies his own business will have his thoughts more concentred: and doubtless tis no small happiness to have them so, for tis their gadding too much abroad, looking on other men's conditions that sends them back (like Dianah deflowered) to put all in uproar at home. The son of Sirach speaks with transportation of the state even of him that labors and is content, and calls it a sweet life, Ecclus. 40. 18. And certainly tis infinitely more so then that of the greatest Prince whose mind swells beyond his territories.

10. UPON all these considerations it cannot but appear very reasonable that we should leave God to govern the world, not be putting in like the sons of Zebedee for the highest seats; but contentedly rest ourselves where he has placed us, till his providence (not our own designs) advance us. We can nowhere be so obscure as to be hid from his eyes, who as he valued the widows mite above the great oblations of the rich; so he will no less graciously accept the humble endeavors of the mean, then the more eminent services of the mighty; himself having declared, that he accepts according to what a man hath, and not according to what he hath not, 2 Cor. 8. 12. so that in what rank soever a man is set, he has still the opportunity of approving himself to God, and though in the eye of the world he be a vessel of dishonor, yet in the day when God comes to make up his Jewels Mal. 3. 17. there will be another estimate made of him who regularly moves in his own sphere. And sure he that sits down in this acquiescence is a happier man, then he that enjoys the greatest worldly splendor: but infinitely more so then he who impatiently covets but cannot attain them; for such a man puts himself upon a perpetual rack, keeps his appetites up at the utmost stretch, and yet has nothing wherewith to satisfy them. Let therefore our ease if not our duty prompt us to acquiescence, and a ready submission to God's disposals, to which we have yet a farther inducement from that distinct care he hath over every man's peculiar, by which he proportions to him, what is really best for him; of which we are farther to consider in the next Section.

SECT. VII.

Of God's particular Providence.

1. IT is the imperfection of our finite nature that we cannot at once attend to divers things, but the more vehement our intention is upon one, the greater is our neglect of the rest. But

God's infinity cannot be so bounded; his eyes at once see, and his providence at once orders all the most distant and disparate things in the world. He is not such an Epicurean Deity, as to sequester himself wholly to the enjoyment of his own felicity, and to despise the concerns of poor mortals; but though he have his dwelling so high, yet he humbleth himself to behold the things in heaven and earth, Psal. 113. 5. Nor do's his providence confine itself to the more splendid and greater parts of managery, the conduct of Empires and states, but it descends to the lowest parts of his creation, to the fowls of the air, to the lilies of the field, and then sure our Saviors inference as to mankind is irrefragable, are ye not much better then they? Mat. 6. 26. If a sparrow (as he elsewhere tells his disciples) cannot fall to the ground without God's particular notice, surely no human creature is less considerable to him; nay if our very hairs are numbered, we cannot think the excrescence is of more value then the stock, but must conclude that God with a particular advertence watches over the concerns of every man.

2. NOW God being infinitely good, cannot thus attend us upon any insidious design of doing us mischief, he watches over us as a guardian not as a spy; and directs his observation to the more seasonable adapting his benefits: and as he is thus gracious in designing our advantage, so is he no less wise in contriving it. All things says the wiseman are not profitable for all men Eccus. 37. 28. Indeed nothing is absolutely good but God, all created things are good or ill in reference to that to which they are applied. Meat is good, but to a surfeited stomach tis not only nauseous but dangerous. Fire is good, but if put in our bosoms, not only burns our cloths but flesh.

And as human wisdom directs the right application of these and the like, so the supreme and divine orders events according to the disposition of the person concerned; he knows our frame Psal. 103. 14. and discerns what operation such or such things will have upon us, while we who know neither ourselves nor them can make but random guesses, and worse choices. And sure he that do's but thus in the general acknowledge God's providence, goodness and wisdom (which he is, no Christian who do's not) has a sufficient amulet against all his solitudes, much more his repinings. He cannot think he suffers unawares to him who sees all things. He cannot think his sufferings are designed for ill to him because they are disposed by him who intends and projects his good. Nor can he fear those intentions can miscarry, which are guided by an infinite and unerring wisdom, and backed by an uncontrolable power. And sure this is as the Apostle speaks Heb. 6. 18. strong consolation if we would but duly apply it.

3. YET because general notions do often make but light impressions on us, it may not be amiss to make a little more inspection, and to observe how applicable they are to the several kinds of our discontents. Now those may be reduced to two, for either we are troubled at the want of something we desire, or at the suffering of something we would avert; so that the two notions of privative and positive, divide between them all our affliction.

4. THE first of these is usually the most comprehensive, for there are few who have not more torment from the apprehension of somewhat they want, then from the smart of anything they feel. And indeed whilst our desires are so vagrant and exorbitant, they will be sure to furnish matter enough for our discontents. But certainly there is not in the world such a charm for them, as the consideration that God is more wise to discern, and more careful to provide what is really good for us than we ourselves. We poor purblind creatures look only on the surface of things, and if we see a beautiful appearance, somewhat that invites our senses, we court it with the utmost earnestness; but God penetrates deeper, he sees to the bottom both of us and those things we desire, and finds often that though they may please our appetite, they will hurt our health: and will no more give them to us, than a careful father will to his child those gilded poisons he cries for. Perhaps this man is taken with the enchanting music of fame, likes not his own obscure station, but would fain present himself upon a more public Theater, come into the eye and crowd of the world; but how little do's he know how he shall act his part there: whither he shall come off with a plaudite or a hiss? he may render himself but the more public spectacle of scorn; or if he do not that, he may by a better success feed up his vain glory to such a bulk as may render him too great a weight for that tottering pinnacle whereon he stands: and so after he has made a towering circle, he may fall back with more ignominy to his first point. Another it may be no less eagerly desires wealth, thinks (as once Cresus did) that he that abounds in treasure cannot be empty of felicity; but alas how knows he how he shall employ it? There are two contrary temptations that attend riches; riots, and covetousness: and he is sure a little too confident, that dares promise himself that when there is such odds against him, he shall certainly choose the one just mean, and if he do not, he do's only inflame his account at the great Audit: Besides the more wealth he has, the fairer booty he is to the avarice of others; and it has been often seen, that many a man had not died so poor, if he had lived less rich. Another perhaps thinks not himself so much to want wealth as children to heir it, and complains with Abraham, Lord what wilt thou give me seeing I go childless? Gen. 15. 2. yet how knows he whether that child he so much desires shall be a wise man or a fool, Eccle. 2. 19. a comfort or a vexation to himself if he live to see his proof? and if he do not, he do's but project for an access to his dying cares in what hands to leave him. Rachel solicited this satisfaction with the greatest impatience, give me children or I die, Gen. 30. 1. and tis observable that the grant of her wish proved the loss of her life.

5. THUS in these and innumerable other instances we drive on blindfold, and very often impetuously pursue that which would ruin us: and were God as shortsighted as we, into what precipices should we minutely hurry ourselves? or were he so unkind as to consider our importunity more than our interest, we should quickly sink under the weight of our own wishes; and as Juvenal in his tenth Satyr excellently observes, perish by the success and grant of our Prayers. I suppose there is no man that soberly recollects the events of his life, but can experimentally say, he has sometimes desired things which would have been to his mischief if he had had them, and that himself has after looked on the denial as a mercy: as on the other side when he has prosper'd in his aims, and had what his soul lusted after, it has been but like the quail to the Israelites, a conviction and punishment, rather than a satisfaction. And now surely God may complain of us as he did of Israel, How long will it be ere you believe me? Num. 14. 11. After all the attestations he has given of his care and Providence over us, after all the experiments we have had of the folly of our own elections, we cannot yet be brought either to distrust ourselves, or rely upon him. We will still be choosing and look on him as no farther concerned, then as the executioner of our designs.

6. THIS is certainly a strange perverseness, and such as no sensible man would be guilty of in any other instance. In all our secular affairs we trust those whom we have cause to think understand them better then ourselves, and rely upon men in their own faculty. We put our estates in the Lawiers hand, our bodies into the Physicians, and submit to their advice though it be against our humor, merely because we account them more competent judges. Yet this deference we cannot be persuaded to pay to God, but will still be prescribing to him, and are very angry if his dispensations do not exactly answer our fancies. And can we offer him a greater affront then thus to distrust him? What is it but interpretatively to deny either his wisdom, or his goodness, or both? and so derogate from him in two of his essential attributes. For there can be no rational account given by any who believe those, why they should not remit their whole concerns to him. So that the short account is, that in our distrusts we either deny him to be God, or ourselves to be men, by resisting the most evident dictates of that reason which distinguishes us from brutes. For certainly there is not in human discourse a more irrefragable Maxim, then that we ought for our own sakes, to resign ourselves to him, who we are infallibly sure, can, and will, choose better for us, then we for ourselves.

7. THIS was so apparent by mere natural light, that Socrates advised men to pray only for blessings in general, and leave the particular kinds of them to God's election, who best knows what is good for us. And sure this is such a piece of divinity, as extremely reproaches us Christians, who cannot match a Heathen in his implicit faith in God. Nay indeed tis the vilest defamation upon God himself, that we who pretend to know him more, should trust him less. So that we see our repinings do not terminate in their own proper guilt, but do in their consequences swell higher, and our discontents propagate themselves into Blasphemy. For while we impatiently complain of our wants, we do tacitly tax God to want either that wisdom, power, or love, whereby he should supply us. And sure he must be very Atheistical to whom this will not give a competent prejudice against this sin.

8. AND this very consideration will equally prejudge the other branch of our discontents, I mean those which repine at the ills we suffer. And not only our privative, but our positive afflictions may by it have their bitterness taken off: for the same goodness and wisdom which denies those things we like, because they are hurtful for us, do's upon the very same reason give us those distasteful things which he sees profitable. A wise Physician do's not only diet, but if occasion be purge his patient also. And surely there is not such a purifier, such a cleanser of the soul as are afflictions, if we do not (like disorderly patients) frustrate their efficacy by the irregular managery of ourselves under them.

SECT. VIII.

Of the Advantage of Afflictions.

1. IT were the work of a volume to give an exact and minute account of the benefit of afflictions. I shall only point at some of the more general and obvious. And first it is one of the most awakening calls to repentance; and to this end it is that God most usually designs it. We see the whole scene of it, Hos. 5. 15. I will go and return to my place, till they acknowledge their offense, and seek my face: in their affliction they will seek me early: and in the very next verse we find this voice of God echoed forth by a penitential note, Come and let us return unto the Lord, for he hath torn, and he will heal us, he hath smitten, and he will bind us up. Thus we find the Brethren of Joseph, though there had a long interval passed betwixt their barbarous usage of him, and his feigned rigor to them, yet when they saw themselves distrest by the one, then they begin to recollect the other, saying, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, Gen. 42. 21. Prosperity is an intoxicating thing, and there are few brains strong enough to bear it; it lays us a sleep, and amuses us with pleasant dreams, whilst in the mean time Satan rifles our treasures, and spoils us, by the deceitful charms of sin, of our innocence and real happiness. And can there be a more friendly office don for a man in this condition, then to rouse him, and bring him to apprehend the designs that are laid against him? And this is the errand on which afflictions are sent: so that we have reason to look on them as our friends and confederates that intend our rescue, and to take the alarm they give us, and diligently seek out those intestine enemies of which they warn us. And he that instead of this, quarrels at their interposing, thinks them his enemies because they tell him the truth, Gal. 4. 16. do's miserably pervert the counsel of God against himself, Luk. 7. 30. and may at last verify his own jealousies; and by so provoking an ingratitude, convert those into the wounds of an enemy, which were originally meant as the corrections of a Father.

2. AND as afflictions do thus in general admonish us of sins, so it pleases God most frequently so to model and frame them, that they bear the very image and impress of those particular guilts they are to chastise, and are the dark shadows that attend our gay delights, or flagrant insolencies. The wise man observes that the turning the Egyptian waters into blood, was a manifest reproof of that cruel commandment for the murdering of the Hebrew infants, Wisd. 12. 5. And surely we might in most if not all our sufferings, see some such corresponding circumstances; as may lead us to the immediate provoking cause of it. God who do's all things in number, weight, and measure, do's in punishments also observe a symmetry and proportion, and adapts them not only to the heinousness, but even the very specific kind of our crimes. The only fixed immutable rule he has given for his Vice-gerents on earth to punish by, is that in the case of murder, which is we see grounded on this rule of proportion, He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, Gen. 9. 6. And though he have now rescinded the inferior retaliations of the eye for the eye, the tooth for the tooth, Exod. 21. 24. (probably for the hardness of our hearts, because he saw our revengeful natures would be too much pleased with it) yet he has not precluded himself from acting by those measures, but we see it do's very often signally make men feel the smart of those violencies or injustices they have used to others. Of this the Sacred story affords several examples (as Adonibezek, Jud. 1. 6. and Ahab, 1 King. 21. 19.) and profane many more, and daily experience and observation most of all. And though this method of retaliation is not always so evident and apparent to the world, because men's sins are not always so, yet I believe if men would duly recollect, it would be for the most part discernible to their own consciences, and they would apparently see, that their calamities did but trace the footsteps of their sins.

3. NOW if we rightly weigh this, we cannot but think it a very advantageous circumstance. We are naturally blind when we look inward, and if we have not some adventitious light to clear the object, will be very apt to overlook it. Therefore since the end of all our afflictions is our repentance, it is a wise and gracious disposal, that they do thus point to us those particular sins of which we are to repent. The body of sin will not be destroyed in the whole entire bulk, but must be dismembered, pulled to pieces limb by limb. He that attacks it otherwise, will be like Sertorius's soldier, who ineffectively tugg'd at the horses tail to get it off at once, when he that pulled it hair by hair, quickly did it. Therefore as it is a great part of our spiritual Wisdom to know in what especial parts the Sampson-like strength of our corruptions lie, so is it a great instance of God's care of us, thus by his corrections to discipline and instruct us in it.

4. In all our afflictions therefore it is our concern, nicely and critically to observe them. I mean not to enhance our murmurs and complaints, but to learn by them what is God's peculiar controversy against us. This is indeed to hear the rod, and who hath appointed it, Mic. 6. 9. Let him therefore that suffers in any of his concerns, examine whether he have not some corresponding guilt which answers to it, as face answers face, Prov. 27. 19. He that is impoverished in his estate, let him consider first how he acquired it, whether there were not something of fraud or injustice, which like a cancrus humor, mixed in its very elements and constitution, and eat out its bowels: or whether some sacrilegious prize, some coal from the altar have not fired his nest. Or if nothing can be charged upon the acquist, let him consider how he has used it; whether he have not made it the fuel of his lusts, in riot and excesses, or the object of his adoration in an inordinate value of it. In like manner he who is afflicted in his body, groans under the torment of some grievous disease, may very seasonably interrogate himself, whether it have not been contracted by his vice, whether his bones be not (in a more literal sense than Job meant it) full of the sins of his youth, Job. 20. 11. and his furfeting and drunkenness be not the cause, that his soul, as the Psalmist speaks, abhors all manner of meat, and is even hard at deaths door, Psal. 107. 18. or at least whether the not employing his health and strength to those purposes for which twas given, is not the reason of its being withdrawn. He also that is invaded in his reputation, that lies under some great infamy, is to consider whether it be not deserved; whether some part if not the whole guilt of which he is accused, stick not to him: or if he be clear in that particular instance, whether some concealed sin of his would not if it were known, incur as great scandal: for in that case he has in right forfeited his reputation, and God may make the feizure as well by an unjust, as a just accusation. Or if his heart accuse him not here, yet let him farther reflect, whether his vain-glorious pursuits of praise and high conceits of himself, have not made this an apt and necessary humiliation for him. Or lastly let him recollect how he has behaved himself towards others in this kind: whether he have had a just tenderness of his neighbors fame, or have not rather exposed and prostituted it. In these and many other instances such a particular scrutiny, would (in all probability) discover the affinity and cognation between our guilts and our punishments, and by marking out the spring and fountain head, direct us how to stop or divert the current. And he that would diligently employ himself in this inquisition, would find little leisure and less cause to condole his afflictions, but would divert all his complaints upon himself, accept of the punishment of his iniquity, and thank the Lord for thus giving him warning, Psal. 16. 8.

5. A second benefit which God designs us in our afflictions is the weaning us from the world, to disentangle us from its fetters and charms, and draw us to himself. We read in the story of the Deluge, that so long as the earth was covered with waters, the very Raven was contented to take shelter in the Ark, but when all was fair and dry, even the Dove finally forsook it, Gen. 8. 12. And tis much so with us, the worst of men will commonly in distresses have recourse to God (the very heathen mariners in a storm could rebuke Jonah for not calling upon his God, Jon. 1. 6.) when yet the very best of us, are apt to forget him amidst the blandishments and insinuations of prosperity. The kind aspects of the world are very enchanting, apt to inveigle and besot us, and therefore it is God's care over us, to let us sometimes see her more averting countenance in her frowns and storms; that, as children frightened by some ugly appearance, we may run into the arms of our father. Alas were all things exactly fitted to our humors here, when should we think of a remove? and had not death some harbingers to prepare us or him, what a surprising guest would he be to us? Tis storied of Antigonus, that seeing a soldier in his camp of so daring a courage that he always courted the most hazardous attempts, and observing him also of a very infirm sickly habit, he took a particular care of him, and by medicines and good attendance recovered him; which no sooner he had don, but the man grew more cautious, and would no longer expose himself as formerly; and gave this reason for it, that now he was healthy his life was of some value to him, and not to be hazarded at the same rate, as when it was only a burden; and should God cure all our complaints, render us perfectly at ease, I fear too many of us would be of the soldiers mind, think our lives too good to resign to him, much more to hazard for him, as our Christianity in many cases obliges us. The son of Sirach observes how dreadful death is to a man that is at rest in his possessions, that hath abundance of all things, and hath nothing to vex him, nay he descends much lower; and puts in him who is yet able to receive meat, Ecclus. 14. 1. The truth is we do so passionately dote upon the world, that like besotted lovers, we can bear a great deal of ill usage, before we quit our pursuit. Any little slight favor atones us after multiplied affronts, and we must be disciplined by repeated disappointments, ere we can withdraw our confidence. But how fatally secure should we be, if God should permit this Siren always to entertain us with her music, and should not by some discordant grating notes, interrupt our raptures, and recall us to sober thoughts?

6. INDEED tis one of the highest instances of God's love, and of his clemency also, thus to project our reducement. We were all in our Baptism affianced to him, with a particular abrenunciation of the world, so that we cannot without the greatest disloyalty cast ourselves into its embraces; and yet when we have thus broken the covenant of our God, Prov. 2. 17. he do's not pursue us with a jealous rage, with the severity which an abused rival'd kindness would suggest, doth not give us a bill of divorce and disclame his relation; but contrives how he may reclame and bring us back to himself. The transcendency of this lenity God excellently describes by the prophet in the case of Israel They say if a man put away his wife, and she become another man's shall he return unto her again? but thou hast played the harlot with many lovers, yet return unto me saith the Lord, Jer. 3. 1. And this though a great height of indulgence, is no more then he daily repetes to us. After we have basely adulterated with the world, converted our affections from God to it, he do's not give us over, abandon us to our lewd course, and consequent ruin; but still invites our return, and lest that may not serve, he do's with a great deal of holy artifice essay to break that accured League into which we are entered, pulls off the disguise in which the world courted us, and makes us see it as it is itself, a scene of vanity and vexation of spirit, Eccles. 1. 14.

6. AND as he do's this in general, so also with a particular application to those temporal satisfactions wherewith we were most transported; the things to which we are more indifferent do not so much endanger us, tis those upon which we have more vehemently set our hearts which become our snares, and awake his jealousy; and accordingly we frequently see that tis in those he chooses to cross us. How often do's it happen that those which are enamored of themselves, dote upon their own features, do meet with some disease or accident which blasts their beauty, withers that fair flower, and makes their winter overtake their spring? So in our friends and relations tis usually seen, we soonest loose those for whom we have the greatest, the most immoderate passion. If there be one fondling among our children, tis odds but that is taken away, or made as much the object of our grief and sorrow, as ever it was of our joy and love. When God sees our hearts so excessively cleave to any transitory thing, he knows tis necessary to sever them, for whilst we have such clogs upon us, our souls will cleave to the dust. Psa. 119. 1. will not be able to soar up to the higher region for which they are designed.

7. IN a word God so loves us, that he removes what ever he sees will obstruct that intimate union which he desires with us, and sure this is so obliging, that though he should bid us to our loss, though he could not recompense us for what he takes from us, yet we must be very ill natured if we can be angry at so much kindness. But when to this is added that all this is principally, nay solely designed for our advantage, that God takes from us all these empty delusory contentments merely that he may instate us in solid and durable joies; we betray as much ignorance of our interest, as insensibleness of our obligation, if we repine that God makes us so much his care. Tis true indeed, the things to which we have so inordinately adhered, do stick so close, that they cannot be pulled away without some pain: yet for our corporal security we can endure the sundring of parts that do not only cleave, but grow to us. He that has a gangrend member suffers it to be cut off to save his whole body, and do's not revile, but thank and reward the Surgeon. Yet where our souls are concerned, and where the things have no native union with us, but are only cemented by our passions, we are impatient of the method, and think God deals very hardly with us, not to let us perish with what we love. The sum of all is this, God though he be abundantly condescending, yet he will never stoop so low as to share his interest in us with the world: if we will devote ourselves to it, tis not all our empty forms of service will satisfy him, if he cannot divorce our hearts from it, he will divorce himself eternally from us. And the case being thus, we are sure very ill advised if we do not contentedly resign ourselves to his methods, and cheerfully endure them how sharp soever. The only expedient we have for our own ease, is to shorten the cure by giving our assistance, and not by strugglings to render it more difficult and painful, let us entirely surrender our wills to him, and when we have don that, we may without much pain let him take anything else. But the more difficult we find it to be disentangled from the world, the greater should our caution be against all future engagements to it. If our escape hath been as the Apostle says, so as by fire, Jud. 23. with much smart and hazard, let us at least have so much wit, as the common proverb allows children, and not again expose ourselves: let us never glue our hearts to any external thing, but let all the concerns of the world hang loose about us: by that means we shall be able to put them off insensibly when ever God calls for them, or perhaps we shall prevent his calling for them at all, it being for the most part, our too close adhesion to them which prompts him to it.

8. A third advantage of afflictions is, that it is a mark and signature of our adoption, a witness of our legitimation. What son is he (saith the Apostle) whom the Father chastiseth not? but if ye be without chastisement whereof all are partakers, then are ye bastards and not sons, Heb. 12. 7. 8. Jacob clad his dearling Joseph in a party-coloured Coat, and God's favorites do here wear a Livery inter-woven with a mixture of dark and gloomy colors; their long white robes are laid up for them against they come to the marriage of the Lamb, Rev. 19 7. Indeed we much mistake the design of Christianity, if we think it calls us to a condition of ease and security. It might suit well enough with the votaries of the Golden Calf, to sit down to eat and drink and rise up to play, Exod. 32. 6. but the disciples of the crucified Savior are trained to another discipline, our profession enters us into a state of warfare, and accordingly our very Baptismal engagement runs all in military terms, and we are not only servants of Christ's family, but soldiers of his camp. Now we know in a war men must not expect to pass their time in ease and softness, but besides all the dangers and difficulties of the combat, have many other hardships to endure; hunger and thirst, heat and cold, hard lodgings and weary marches: and he that is too nice for those, will not long stick to his colors. And it is the same in our spiritual warfare, many pressures and sufferings are annexed to it, and our passive valor is no less tried then our active. In respect of this it is that our Savior admonishes his Profelytes to compute first the difficulties incident to their profession, and that he may not ensnare us by proposing too easy terms, he bids us reckon upon the worst, and tells us, that he that forsakes not all that he hath, shall not be his disciple, Luk. 14. 26. and that we must thro much tribulation enter into the kingdom of God, Act. 14. 22. Indeed twere very absurd for us to expect easier conditions, when these are the same to which our Leader has submitted, the Captain of our Salvation was perfected by sufferings. Heb. 2. 10. and if it behooved Christ to suffer before he entered into his glory, Luk 24. 46. it were insolent madness for us to look to be carried thither upon our beds of Ivory, of from the noise of our harps and viols, be immediatly wrapped into the Choire of Angels.

8. THIS has been so much considered by pious men, that they have looked upon their secular prosperities with fear and jealousy, and many have solemnly petition'd for crosses, as thinking them the necessary attestation of their son-ship, and means of assimilation to their elder brother. Why then should that which was so desirable to them, appear so formidable to us? or why should we so vehemently deprecate, what they so earnestly invited? If we indeed think it a privilege to be the sons of God and fellow-heirs with Christ, why do we grudge at the condition? The Roman Captain tells St. Paul that he obtained the immunities of a Roman with a great sum, Act. 22. 28. and shall we expect so much a nobler and more advantageous adoption perfectly gratis? look that God should change his whole Economy for our ease, give us an eternal inheritance discharged of those temporal incumbrances himself has annexed to it This were sure as unjust a hope as it would be a vain one. When David had that ensnaring proposal made him of being the Kings son in law, 1 Sam. 18. 21. he set such a value upon the dignity, that he despised the difficulty of the condition: and sure we must have very low abject souls, if when so infinitely a higher advancement is sincerely offered us, we can suffer any apprehension of hardship to divert us. In a word let us remember that of the Apostle, if we suffer, we shall also reign with him, 2 Tim. 2. 12. And though our afflictions be in themselves not joyous but grievous, yet when they are considered as the earnest of our future inheritance, they put on another face, and may rather enamour than fright us.

9. A fourth advantage of afflictions is, that they excite our compassions towards others: there is nothing qualifies us so rightly to estimate the suffering of others, as the having ourselves felt them: without this our apprehensions of them are as dull and confused, as a blind man's of colors, or a deaf man of sounds. They that stretch themselves upon their couches, that eat the lambs out of the flock, and the calves out of the midst of the stall: that chaunt to the sound of the viol, drink wine in bowls, and anoint themselves with the chief ointments, will not much be grieved with the afflictions of Joseph. Am. 6. 4. Nay so necessary is our experience towards our commiseration, that we see twas thought a requisite accomplishment of our high Priest (that highest example of unboundded compassion) and therefore saith the Apostle, It behooved him in all things to be made like his brethren, that he might be a merciful and faithful high priest in things pertaining to God, to make reconciliation for the sins of the people, for in that he himself hath suffered being tempted, he is able also to succor them that are tempted, Heb. 2. 17, 18. But if he whose mere sense of our miseries brought him down to us, chose this expedient to advance his pity, how necessary is it to our petrified bowels? And since God has assigned our mercies to our brethren, as the standard by which he will proportion his to us, tis more ours then their advantage to have them enlarged: so that when by making us taste of their cup, acquainting us with the bitter relish of their sufferings, he prepares us to a Christian sympathy with them, tis but a remoter way of obliging and qualifying us for a more ample portion of his mercy. Nay besides the profit there is honor accrues to us by it; compassion is one of the best properties of our nature, and we unman ourselves when we put it off; nay more tis an attribute of the Divinity, and the more we advance in it, the closer approaches we make to him. And therefore we have all reason to bless him for that discipline by which he promotes us in so excellent, so necessary a grace.

10. A fifth benefit of afflictions is that it is an improvement of devotion, sets us with more heartiness to our prayers. Whilst prosperity flows in upon us we bath ourselves in its streams, but are very apt to forget its source; so that God is fain to stop the current, leave us dry and parched that our needs may make us do what our gratitude would not, trace our blessings up to the original spring, and both acknowledge and invoke him as the Author of all our good. This effect of afflictions is observed by the prophet, Lord in trouble have they visited thee, they poured out a prayer when thy chastening was upon them, Isa. 26. 16. And I believe I may appeal to every man's experience whether his prayers be not more frequent and more hearty too, when he is under some distress. Then how importunate are we in our petitions? how profuse in our vows and promises? saying with Israel deliver us only we pray thee this day: and they put away the strange God's from among them, and served the Lord. Jud. 10. 15. I confess tis no good indication of our temper that we need thus to be put in the press ere we will yield anything? yet since we are so disingenuous, tis a mercy in God to adapt his methods to us; to extort when we will not give, and if he can have no free will offerings, yet at least to exact his tribute. Nor do's he design the effect of this should cease with the calamity that raised it, but expects our compelled addresses should bring us into the way of voluntary ones, and happily ensnare us into piety. And indeed herein are we worse then brutish if it do not. We think it a barbarous rudeness to engage a man in our affairs, and as soon as we have served our own turns, never take farther notice of him. Nay indeed the very beasts may lecture us in this piece of Morality, many of them paying a signal gratitude where they have received benefits, and shall we not come up at least to their pitch? shall not the endearment of our deliverance bring our deliverer into some repute and consideration with us, and make us desire to keep up an acquaintance and intercourse with him? Yet if ingenuity work not with us, let interest at least prevail, and the remembrance how soon we may need him again, admonish us not to make ourselves strangers to him. God complains of Israel wherefore say my people we are Lord's? we will come no more at thee, Jer. 2. 31. A very insolent folly to renounce that dependence by which alone they subsisted, and no less will it be in any of us if we stop our recourse to him because we have had advantage by it. We have no assurance that the same occasion shall not recur, but with what face can we then resume that intercourse which in the interval we despised? So that if we have but any ordinary providence we shall still so celebrate past rescues as to continue in a capacity of begging more, and then we cannot but also confess the benefit of those first calamities which inspirited our devotion, and taught us to pray in earnest, and will be ashamed that our thanks should be uttered in a fainter accent then our petitions; or our daily spiritual concerns should be more coldly solicited then our temporal accidental ones.

11. NOR is it only our devotion that is thus improved by our distresses, but many other Graces; our faith, our hope, our patience, our Christian sufferance & fortitude. It is no triumph of faith to trust God for those good things which he gives us in hand, this is rather to walk by sense then faith, but to rely on him in the greatest destitution, and against hope to believe in hope, this is the faith of a true child of Abraham, and will be imputed to us (as it was to him) for righteousness Rom. 4. 23. So also our patience owes all its opportunities of exercise to our afflictions, and consequently owes also a great part of its being to them, for we know desuetude will loose habits. What imaginable use is there of patience, where there is nothing to suffer? In our prosperous state, we may indeed employ our temperance, our humility, our caution; but patience seems then a useless virtue: nay indeed for ought we know may be counterfeit, till adversity bring it to the test. And yet this is the most glorious accomplishment of a Christian, that which most eminently conforms him to the Image of his Savior, whose whole life was a perpetual exercise of this grace; and therefore we love our ease too well if we are unwilling to buy this pearl at any price.

12. LASTLY our thankfulness is (at least ought to be) increa'st by our distresses. Tis very natural for us to reflect with value and esteem upon those blessings we have lost, and we too often do it to aggravate our discontent: but sure the more rational use of it is to raise our thankfulness for the time wherein we enjoyed them. Nay not only our former enjoyments, but even our present deprivations deserves our gratitude, if we consider the happy advantages we may reap from them. If we will perversely cast them away, that unworthy contempt paises no scores, for we still stand answerable in God's account for the good he designed and we might have had by it, and we become liable to a new charge for our ingratitude in thus despising the chastisement of the Lord, Heb. 12. 5.

13. AND now if all these benefits of afflictions (which are yet but imperfectly recited) may be thought worth considering, it cannot but reconcile us to the sharpest of God's methods; unless we will own ourselves such mere animals, as to have no other apprehensions then what our bodily senses convey to us; for sure he that has reason enough to understand that he has an immortal soul, cannot but assent that its interests should be served, though with the displacency of his flesh. Yet even in regard of that, our murmurings are oft very unjust, for we do many times ignorantly prejudg God's designs towards us even in temporals, who frequently makes a little transient uneasiness the passage to secular felicities. Moses when he fled out of Egypt, probably little thought that he should return thither a God unto Pharaoh, Exod. 4. 16. and as little did Joseph when he was brought thither a slave, that he was to be a ruler there: yet as distant as those states were, the divine providence had so connected them, that the one depends upon the other. And certainly we may often observe the like over-ruling hand in our own distresses, that those events which we have entertained with the greatest regret, have in the consequences been very beneficial to us.

14. To conclude, we have certainly both from speculation & experience abundant matter to clam all our disquiets, to satisfy our distrusts, and to fix in us an entire resignation to God's disposals, who has designs which we cannot penetrate, but none which we need fear, unless we ourselves pervert them. We have our Saviors word for it, that he will not give us a stone when we ask bread, nor a scorpion when we ask a fish, Mat. 7. 9. Nay his love secures us yet farther from the errors of our own wild choice, and do's not give us those stones and scorpions which we importune for. Let us then leave our concerns to him who best knows them, and make it our sole care to entertain his dispensations with as much submission and duty, as he dispences them with love and wisdom. And if we can but do so, we may dare all the power of earth and hell too, to make us miserable: for be our afflictions what they can, we are sure they are but what we in some respect or other need; be they privative or positive, the want of what we wish, or the suffering of what we wish not, they are the disposals of him who cannot err, and we shall finally have cause to say with the Psalmist, It is good for me that I have been afflicted, Psal. 119. 71.

SECT. IX.

Of our Misfortunes compared with other men's.

1. WE come now to impress an equally just and useful consideration, the comparing our misfortunes with those of other men's: & he that do's that, will certainly see so little cause to think himself singular, that he will not find himself superlative in calamity; for there is no man living that can with reason affirm himself to be the very unhappiest man, there being innumerable distresses of others which he knows not of, and consequently cannot bring them in balance with his own. A multitude of men there are whose persons he knows not, and even of those he do's, he may be much a stranger to their distresses; many sorrows may lie at the heart of him who carries a smiling face, and many a man has been an object of envy to those who look but on the surface of his state, who yet to those who know his private griefs appears more worthy of compassion. And sure this confused uncertain estimate of other men's afflictions, may divert us from all loud out-cries of our own. Solon seeing a friend much oppressed with grief, carried him up to a town that overlooked the City of Athens, and showing him all the buildings, said to him, consider how many sorrows have, do, and shall in future ages inhabit under all those roofs, and do not vex thyself with those inconveniencies which are common to mortality, as if they were only yours. And sure twas good advice: for suffering is almost as inseparable an adjunct of our nature, as dying is: yet we do not see men very apt to embitter their whole lives by the fore-sight that they must die, but seeing it a thing as universal as inevitable, they are more forward to take up the Epicures resolution, Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die, 1 Cor. 15. 32. And why should we not look upon afflictions also as the common lot of humanity, and as we take the advantages, so be content to bear the incumbrances of that state?

2. BUT besides that implicit allowance that is thus to be made for the unknown calamities of others, if we survey but those that lie open and visible to us, the most of us shall find enough to discountenance our complaints. Who is there that when he has most studiously recollected his miseries, may not find some or other that apparently equals, if not exceeds him? He that stomachs his own being contemned and slighted, may see another persecuted and oppressed. He that groans under some sharp pain, may see another afflicted with sharper: and even he that has the most acute torments in his body, may see another more sadly cruciated by the agonies of his mind. So that if we would but look about us, we should see so many foreign occasions of our pity, that we should be ashamed to confine it wholly to ourselves.

3. IT will perhaps be said that this cannot be universally true, for that there must in comparative degrees be some lowest state of misery: I grant it, but still that state consists not in such an indivisible point, that any one person can have the inclosure; or if it do, twill be so hard for any to discern who that one person is; that I need desire no fairer a composition, then to have every man suspend his repinings, till he can evince his title. But alas there are but few that can make any approaches to such a pretenec: for though if we advert to men's complaints, we should think all degrees of comparison were confounded, and every man were equally the greatest sufferer; yet certainly in the truth of things tis nothing so: for (not to repete what was before mentioned, that probably no man is miserable in any proportion to the utmost degree of possibility) the remarkably unhappy are very far the less number. And how passionatly soever men exaggerate their calamities, yet perhaps in their sober mood, they will scarce change states with those whom they profess to think more happy than themselves. It was the saying of Socrates, that if there were a common bank made of all men's troubles, most men would rather choose to take those they brought, than to venture upon a new dividend. And indeed he had reason for his supposition; for considering how great a part of many men's afflictions are of their own making, fictitious and imaginary, they may justly fear least they should exchange feathers for lead, their own empty shadows for the real and pressing calamities of others, and cannot but think it best to sit down with their own, which serves their declamations as well, and their ease much better. We oft see men at a little mis-shaping of a garment, a scarce discernible error in their cook, or their shortest interruption in their sports, in such transports of trouble, as if they were the most unfortunate men in the world; yet for all that you shall hardly persuade them to change with him whose course clothings supersedes all care of the fashion, whose appetite was never disappointed for want of sauce, and whose perpetual toil makes him insensible what the defeat of sport signifies.

4. NAY even where the exchange seems more equal, where the afflictions are on both sides solid and substantial, yet a prudent man would scarce venture upon the barter. 'Tis no small advantage to know what we have to contest with, to have experimented the worst of its attacks, by which we become better able to guard ourselves: but a new evil comes with the force of a surprise, and finds us open and disarmed. It is indeed almost a miraculous power that custom has in reconciling us to things otherwise displeasing; all our senses are taught to remit of their aversion by familiarity with ungrateful objects: that ugly form which at first makes us start, by use divests its terror, and we reconcile ourselves to harsh-sounds & ill relishes by long custom. And sure it has the very same effect upon our minds, the most fierce calamities do by acquaintance grow more tractable; so that he that exchanges an old one for a new, do's but bring a wild Lion into his house instead of a tame: it may for ought he knows immediately tear him in pieces, but at least must cost him a great deal of pains to render it gentle and familiar, and certainly no wise man would wish to make such a bargain.

5. BY all this it appears that how extravagantly soever we aggravate our own calamities and extenuate other men's, we dare not upon recollection stand to our own estimate, and what can be said more in prejudice of our discontents? 'Tis a granted maxim that every man must have afflictions, man that is born of a woman, says Job, is of few years, and full of trouble Job. 14. 4. and we must reverse God's fundamental law, before we can hope for a total exemption. All that any man can aspire to, is to have but an equal share with others, and the generality of men have so, at least none can prove he has not so; and till he can, his murmurs will sure be very unjustifiable, especially when they have this convincing circumstance against them, that he dares not upon sober thoughts change his afflictions with most of his neighbors. He is an ill member of a community, who in public assessments would shuffle off all payments: and he is no better who in this common tax God has laid upon our nature, is not content to bear his share.

6. AND truly would we but consider that in all our sufferings nothing befalls us but what is common to our kind, nay which is extremely exceeded by many within the verge of our own observation, we must be senselessly partial to be impatient. The Apostle thought it a competent consolation for the first Christians that there had no temptation befallen them but what was common to men, 1 Cor. 10. 13. and we betray very extravagant opinions of ourselves if it be not so to us. Indeed twas scarce possible for us to be so unsatisfied, as the greatest part of us are, did we in the comparing ourselves with others, proceed with any tolerable ingenuity.

7. BUT alas we are very fallacious and deceitful in the point, we do not compare the good of others with our good, not their evil with our evil; but with an envious curiosity we amass together all the desirable circumstances of our neighbors condition, and with as prying discontent we ransack all our grievances, and confront to them. This is so insincere a way of proceeding, as the most ordinary understanding can detect. If I should wager that my arm were longer than another man's, and for trial measure my arm with his finger, he must be stupidly silly, that should award for me; and yet this were not a grosser cheat, than that which we put upon ourselves, in our comparisons with others. And tis a little strange to observe unto what various purposes we can apply this one thin piece of Sophistry, for when we compare our neighbors and ourselves in point of morality, we do but reverse the fallacy, and presently make his vices as much exceed ours, as our calamities did his in the other instance. They are indeed both great violences to reason and justice, yet the later is sure the pleasanter kind of deceit. A man has some joy in thinking himself less wicked than his neighbor, but what imaginable comfort can he take in thinking himself more miserable? certainly he that would submit to a cozenage, had much better shift the scene, and think his sufferings less than they are, rather than more; for since opinion is the thing that usually sets an edge upon our calamities, it might be a profitable deceit that could steal that from us.

8. BUT we need not blindfold ourselves if we would but use our eyes aright, and see things in their true shapes; and if we did thus, what a strange turn would there be in the common estimates of the world? How many of the gilded troubles of greatness, which men at a distance look on with so much admiration and desire, would then be as much contemned as now they are courted? A competency would then get the better of abundance, and the now envied pomp of princes, when balanced with the cares and hazards annexed, would be so far from a bait, that men like Saul 1 Sam 10. 22. would hide themselves from the preferment; and he that understood the weight, would rather choose to wield a Flayle than a Scepter: yet so childishly are we besotted with the glittering appearance of things, that we conclude felicity must needs dwell where there is a magnificent Portico, and being possessed with this fancy we overlook her in our own humbler Cottages, where she would more constantly reside, if she could but find us at home: but we are commonly engaged in a rambling pursuit of her where she is seldomest to be found, and in the interim miss of her at our own doors.

9. INDEED there is scarce a greater folly or unhappiness incident to man's nature, than this fond admiration of other men's enjoyments, and contempt of our own. And whilst we have that humor, it will supplant not only our present, but all possibilities of our future content: for though we could draw to ourselves all those things for which we envy others, we should have no sooner made them our own, than they will grow despicable and nauseous to us. This is a speculation which has been attested by innumerable experiments, there being nothing more frequent, than to see men with impatient eagerness, nay often with extreme hazards pursue those acquets, which when they have them, they are immediately sick of. There is scarce any man that may not give himself instances of this in his own particular: and yet so fatally stupid are we, that no defeats will discipline us, or take us off from these false estimates of other men's happiness. And truly while we state our comparisons so unequally, they are as mischievous as the common proverb speaks them odious: but if we would begin at the right end, and look with as much compassion on the adversities of our brethren, as we do with envy on their prosperities, every man would find cause to sit down contentedly with his own burden, and confess that he bears but the proportionable share of his common nature, unless perhaps it be where some extraordinary demerits of his own have added to the weight; and in that case he has more reason to admire his afflictions are so few, than so many. And certainly every man knows so many more ills by himself, then it is possible for him to do by another, that he that really sees himself exceed others in his sufferings, will find cause enough to think he do's in sins also.

10. BUT if we stretch the comparison beyond our contemporaries, and look back to the generations of old, we shall have yet farther cause to acknowledge God's great indulgence to us. Abraham though the friend of God was not exempted from severe trials; he was first made to wander from his Country, and betake himself to a kind of vagrant life, was a long time suspended from the blessing of his desired offspring, and when at last his beloved Isaac was obtained, it caused a domestic jarre, which he was fain to compose by the expulsion of Ishmael though his son also. But what a contest may we think there was in his own bowels when that rigorous task was imposed on him of sacrificing his Isaac? and though his faith gloriously triumpht over it, yet sure there could not be a greater pressure upon human nature. David the man after God's own heart is no less signal for his afflictions then for his piety, he was for a great while an exile from his Country, and (which he most bewailed) from the Sanctuary by the persecutions of Saul: and after he was settled in that throne to which God's immediate assignation had intitled him, what a succession of calamities had he in his own family? the incestuous rape of his Daughter, the retaliation of that by the as unnatural murder of Amnon, and that seconded by another no less barbarous conspiracy of Absalom against himself, his expulsion from Jerusalem, the base revilings of Shimei, and finally the loss of that dearling son in the act of his sin. A cluster of afflictions in comparison whereof the most of ours are but like the gleanings (as the Prophet speaks) after the vintage is don. It were indeed endless to instance in all the several Fore-fathers of our Faith before Christ's incarnation, the Apostle gives us a brief, but very comprehensive compendium of their sufferings, They had trial of cruel mockings and scourgings; yea moreover, of bonds and imprisonments: they were stoned, were sawn asunder, were tempted, were slain with the sword: they wandered about in sheep-skins, and goat-skins, being destitute, afflicted, tormented: they wandered in deserts, and in mountains, and in dens, and caves of the earth, Heb. 11. 36. 37. 38. And if we look on the Primitive Christians, we shall see them perfectly the counrerpart to them, their privileges consisted not in any immunities from calamities; for their whole lives were scenes of sufferings. St. Paul gives us an account of his own, in labors more abundant, in stripes above measure, in prisons more frequent, in deaths oft: of the Jews five times received I forty stripes save one. Thrice was I beaten with rods, once was I stoned, thrice I suffered shipwreck, a night and a day have I been in the deep, in journeying often, &c. 2 Cor. 11. 23. and if his single hardships rose thus high, what may we think the whole sum of all his fellow-laborers amounted to together, with that noble Army of martyrs who sealed their faith with their blood; of whose sufferings Ecclesiastic history gives us such astonishing relations?

11. AND now being compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, the Apostles inference is very irrefragable, let us run with patience the race which is set before us, Heb. 12. 1, 2. But yet it is more so, if we proceed on to that consideration he adjoins, Looking unto Jesus the Author and finisher of our faith, who for the joy that was set before him, endured the cross, despising the shame, verse 3. Indeed if we contemplate him in the whole course of his life, we shall find him rightly styled by the Prophet a man of sorrows, Isai. 51. And as if he had charged himself with all our griefs as well as our sins, there is scarce any human calamity which we may not find exemplified in him. Do's any complain of the lowness and poverty of his condition? Alas his whole life was a state of indigence: he was forced to be an inmate with the beasts, be laid in a stable at his birth, and after himself professes that he had not where to lay his head, Luk. 9. 58. Is any oppressed with infamy and reproach? he may see his Savior accused as a glutton and a wine-bibber, Luke 7. 34. a Blasphemer, Joh. 10. 33. a sorcerer, Mat. 12. 24. a perverter of the nation, Luk. 23. 2. yea to such a sordid lowness had they sunk his repute, that a seditious thief and murderer was thought the more eligible person, not this man but Barabbas, Joh. 18. 40. And finally all this scene of indignities clos'd with the spiteful pageantry of mockery acted by the soldiers, Mat. 27. 28. and the yet more barbarous insultings of Priests and Scribes, verse 41. Is any man despised or deserted by his friends? he was contemned by his countrymen, thought frantic by his friends, betrayed by one of his disciples, abandoned by all, unless that one who followed him longest, to renounce him the most shamefully by a threefold abjuration. Nay what is infinitely more than all this, he seemed deserted by God also, as is witnessed by that doleful exclamation, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Mar. 27. 64. Is any dissatisfied with the hard-ships or laboriousness of his life? let him remember his Saviors was not a life of delicacy or ease, he was never entered in those Academies of luxury, where men are gorgeously appareled and live delicately, Luk. 7. 25. but he was brought under the mean roof of a Carpenter, and consequently subjected to all the lowness of such an education. His initiation to his Prophetic office was with the miraculous severity of a 40. days fast, and in his discharge of it, we find him in perpetual labors, going about doing good, Act. 10. 38. and that not in triumph (like a prince bestowing his largesses) but in weary peregrinations, never riding but once, and that only upon a borrow'd beast, and to fulfil a prophecy, Mat. 24. Do's any man groan under sharp and acute pains? let him consider what his redeemer endured, how in his infancy at his circumcision he offered the first fruits, as an earnest of that bloody vintage when he trod the wine-press alone Isai. 63. 3. Let him attend him through all the stages of his direful passion, and behold his arms pinion'd with rough cords, his head smote with a reed, and torn with his crown of thorns, his back ploughed with those long furrows (Psal. 120. 3.) the scourges had made, his macerated feeble body oppressed with the weight of his cross, and at last racked and extended on it; his hands and feet, those nervous and consequently most sensible parts transfixt with nails, his whole body fastened to that accursed tree, and exposed naked to the air in a cold season; his throat parched with thirst and yet more afflicted with that vinegar and gall wherewith they pretended to relieve him; and finally his life expiring amidst the full sense of these accurate torments. Lastly do's any man labor under the bitterest of all sorrows, importunate temptations to, or a wounded spirit for sin? even here also he may find that he has an high Priest who hath been touched with the sense of his infirmities, Heb. 4. 15. He was violently assaulted with a succession of temptations, Mat. 4. and we cannot doubt but Satan would on him employ the utmost of his skill. Nor was he less oppressed with the burden of sin, (ours I mean though not his own.) What may we think were his apprehensions in the Garden, when he so earnestly deprecated that which was his whole errand into the world? What a dreadful pressure was that which wrung from him that bloody sweat? and cast him into that inexplicable agony, the horror whereof was beyond the comprehensions of any, but his who felt it? and finally how amazing was the sense of divine wrath, which extorted that stupendous complaint, that strong cry on the cross, Heb. 5. 7. the sharp accent whereof, if it do aright sound in our hearts, must certainly quite overwhelm our loudest groans? And now certainly I may say with Pilate, Ecce homo behold the man, or rather with a more divine Author, Behold if ever there were sorrows like unto his sorrows, Lam. 1. 12.

12. AND sure it were but a reasonable inference, that which we find made by Christ himself, if these things be don in a green tree, what shall be don in the dry? Luk. 23. 31. If an imputative guilt could nurish so scorching a flame, pull down so severe a wrath, what can we expect who are merely made up of combustible matter; whose proper personal sins cry for vengeance? Sure were we to judge by human measures, we should reckon to have more than a double portion of our Saviors sufferings entailed upon us: yet such is the efficacy of his, that they have commuted for ours, and have left us only such a share, as may evidence our relation to our crucified Lord: such as may serve only for badges and cognizances to whom we retain. For alas, let the most afflicted of us weigh our sorrows with his, how absurdly unequal will the comparison appear? And therefore as the best expedient to baffle our mutinies, to shame us out of our repinings, let us often draw this uneven parallel, confront our petty uneasinesses with his unspeakable torments; and sure tis impossible but our admiration and gratitude must supplant our impatiencies.

13. THIS is indeed the method to which the Apostle directs us, Consider him that endured such contradiction of sinners against himself, lest ye be weary and faint in your minds: ye have not yet resisted unto blood, Heb. 12. 34. Was he contradicted, and shall we expect to be humor'd and compli'd with? Did he resist to blood, and shall we think those pressures intolerable, which force only a few tears from us? This is such an unmanly niceness, as utterly makes us unfit to follow the Captain of our Salvation. What a soldier is he like to make, that will take no share of the hazards and hardships of His General? Honest Uriah would not take the lawful solaces of his own house upon the consideration that his Lord Joab (though but his fellow subject) lay incamped in the open fields, 2 Sam. 11. 11. yea though he was sent by him from the Camp. And shall we basely forsake ours in pursuit of our ease? He is of a degenerous spirit, whom the example of his superior will not animate. Plutarch tells us that Cato marching thro the deserts, was so distressed for water, that a small quantity was brought to him in a helmet as a great prize, which he refused because he could not help his soldiers to the like, they were so transported with that generosity, that it extinguished the sense of their thirst, and they were ashamed to complain of what their Leader voluntarily endured for their sakes. And surely we extremely discredit our institution, if we cannot equal their ingenuity, and follow ours with as great alacrity thro all the difficulties he has traced before us, and for us.

14. NOR let us think to excuse ourselves upon the impotency of our flesh, which wants the assistance which his divinity gave him: for that plea is superseded by the fore-mentioned examples of the Saints, men of like passions with us, who not only patiently, but joyfully endured all tribulations, by which it appears it is not impossible to our nature, with those aids of grace which are common to us with them: for certainly the difference between them and us, is not so much in the degrees of the aids, as in the diligence of employing them. Let us therefore, as the Apostle advises, lift up the hands which hang down, and the feeble knees, Heb. 12. 12. and with a noble emulation follow those heroic patterns they have set us: and since we see that even those Favorites of heaven, have smarted so severely, let us never dream of an immunity, but whenever we find ourselves inclining to any such flattering hope, let everyone of us upbraid ourselves in those terms the Jews did our Savior, Art thou greater than Abraham, and the Prophets, whom makest thou thyself? Joh. 8. 52. Nay we may descend lower and take in not only all the inferior Saints of former times, but all those our contemporaries in sufferings, which are most within our view, and may ask the Apostles question, what then are we better than they? Rom. 3. 9. If we think we are, tis certain we are so much worse by that insolence; and if we confess we are not, upon what score can we pretend to be better treated? To conclude, let us not pore only upon our peculiar evils, but attentively look about us, and consider what others endure: and since in frolics we can sport ourselves with many uneasinesses for company sake, let us not be more pusillanimous in our soberer moods, but every man cheerfully take his turn in bearing the common burden of mortality, till we put off both it and its appendages together, when this mortal shall put on immortality, 1 Cor. 15. 54.

SECT. X.

Of particular Aids for the gaining of Contentment.

1. WE have now past thro all those considerations we at first proposed, and may trust the considering Reader to make his own collections: yet because impatience is the vice that has been all this while arraign'd, I am to fore-see it possible, that those who have the greatest degree of that, may be the least willing to attend the whole process, and therefore I think it may not be amiss, for their ease to suit and reduce all into some short directions and rules for the acquiring contentment.

2. THE first and most fundamental is, the mortifying our pride, which as it is the seminary of most sins, so especially this of repining. Men that are highly opinion'd of themselves are commonly unsatisfiable: for how well soever they are treated, they still think it short of their merits. Princes have often experimented this in those who have don them signal services; but God finds it in those who have don him none, and we expect he shall dispence to us according to those false estimates we put upon ourselves. Therefore he that aspires to Content, must first take truer measures of himself, and consider that as he was nothing till God gave him a being, so all that he can produce from that being, is God's by original right, and therefore can pretend to nothing of reward; so that whatever he receives, is still upon the account of new bounty; and to complain that he has no more, is like the murmurs of an unthankful debtor, who would still increase those scores which he knows he can never pay.

3. IN the second place, let every man consider how many blessings (notwithstanding his no clame to any) he daily enjoies: and whether those he so impatiently raves after be not much inferior to them. Nay let him ask his own heart, whether he would quit all those he has, for them he wants, and if he would not (as I suppose no man in his wits would, those wits being part of the barter) let him then judge how unreasonable his repinings are, when himself confesses he has the better part of worldly happiness, and never any man living had all.

4. IN the third place therefore let him secure his duty of thankfulness for those good things he hath, and that will insensibly undermine his impatiencies for the rest, it being impossible to be at once thankful and murmuring. To this purpose it were very well, if he would keep a solemn catalogue of all the bounties, protections, and deliverances he has received from God's hand, and every night examine what accessions that day has brought to the sum: and he that did this, would undoubtedly find so many incitations to gratitude, that all those to discontent would be stifled in the crowd. And since acknowledgment of God's mercies is all the tribute he exacts for them, we must certainly look on that as an indispensable duty: and therefore he that finds that God shortens his hand, stops the efflux of his bounty towards him, should reflect on himself, whether he be not behind in that homage by which he holds, and have not by his unthankfulness turned away good things from him, Esa. 59. 8. And if he find it so (as who alas is there that may not) he cannot sure for shame complain, but must in prudence reinforce his gratitude for what is left, as the best means to recover what he has lost.

5. BUT his murmurs will yet be more amazingly silenced, if in the fourth place he compares the good things he enjoies with the ill he has don. Certainly this is a most infallible cure for our impatiencies, the holiest man living being able to accuse himself of such sins, as would according to all human measures of equity forfeit all blessings, and pull down a greater weight of judgment then the most miserable groan under. Therefore as before I advised to keep a catalogue of benefits received, so here it would be of use to draw up one of sins committed. And doubtless he that confronts the one with the other cannot but be astonished to find them both so numerous, equally wondering at God's mercy in continuing his blessings, in despite of all his provocations, and at his own baseness in continuing his provocations, in despite of all those blessings. Indeed tis nothing but our affected ignorance of our own demerits, that makes it possible for us to repine under the severest of God's dispensations. Would we but ransack our hearts, and see all the abominations that lie there, nay would the most of us but recollect those barefac'd crimes which even the world can witness against us, we should find more then enough to balance the heaviest of our pressures. When therefore by our impatient strugglings we fret and gall ourselves under our burdens, let us interrogate our souls in the words of the Prophet, Why doth a living man complain, a man for the punishment of his sin? Let us not spend our breath in murmurs and outcries, which will only serve to provoke more stripes: but let us search and try our ways, and turn again to the Lord, Lam. 3. 39. diligently seek out that accursed thing which has caused our discomfeiture, Jos, 6. 18. and by the removal of that, prepare the way for the access of mercy. But alas how preposterous a method do we take in our afflictions? We accuse everything but what we ought, furiously fly at all the second causes of our calamity, nay too often at the first by impious disputes of providence, and in the mean time, as Job speaks, the root of the matter is found in us, Job. 19. 28. We shelter and protect in our bosoms the real Author of our miseries. The true way then to allay the sense of our sufferings, is to sharpen that of our sins. The prodigal thought the meanest condition in his fathers family a preferment, Make me one of thy hired servants, Luk. 15. 19. And if we have his penitence, we shall have his submission also, and calmly attend God's disposals of us.

6<sup>lie</sup>. As every man in his affliction is to look inward on his own heart, so also upward, and consider by whose providence all events are ordered. Is there any evil (i. e. of punishment) in the city, and the Lord hath not don it? Am. 3. 6. and what are we worms that we should dispute with him? Shall a man contend with his Maker? Let the potsherd strive with the potsherds of the earth, Isa. 45. 9. And as his power is not to be control'd, so neither is his justice to be impeach'd. Shall not the judge of all the earth do right? Gen. 18. 25. And where we can neither resist nor appeal, what have we to do but humbly to submit? Nor are we only compel'd to it by necessity, but induced and invited by interest, since his dispensations are directed not barely to assert his dominion, but to evidence his paternal care over us. He discerns our needs, and accordingly applies to us. The benignity of his nature permits him not to take delight in our distresses, he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men, Lam. 3. 33. and therefore when ever he administers to us a bitter cup, we may be sure the ingredients are medicinal, and such as our infirmities require. He dares not trust our intemperate appetites with unmixed prosperities, the lushiousness whereof though it may please our palats, yet like St. Johns book Rev. 10. 9. that honey in the mouth may prove gall in the bowels, ingender the most fatal diseases. Let us therefore in our calamities not consult with flesh and blood, Gal. 1. 16. (which the more it is bemoan'd, the more it complains) but look to the hand that strikes; and assure ourselves, that the stripes are not more severe, then he sees necessary in order to our good: and since they are so, they ought in reason to be our choices as well as his; and not only religion, but self love will prompt us to say, with old Eli, it is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good, 1 Sam. 3. 11. But alas we do not understand what is our interest, because we do not rightly understand what we are ourselves. We consider ourselves merely in our animal being, our bodies and those sensitive faculties vested in them, and when we are invaded there, we think we are undon, though that breach be made only, to relieve that diviner part within us, besieged and oppressed with the flesh about it (for so God knows it too often is;) or if we do not consider it in that notion of an enemy, yet at the utmost estimate, the body is to the soul but as the garment to the body, a decent case or cover: now what man (not stark frantic) would not rather have his clothes cut then his flesh?

and then by the rate of proportion, we may well question our own sobriety, when we repine that our souls are secured at the cost of our bodies, and that is certainly the worst, the unkindest design, that God has upon us; and our impatient resistances serve only to frustrate the kind, the medicinal part of afflictions, but will not at all rescue us from the severe. Our murmurings may ruin our souls, but will never avert any of our outward calamities.

7. A seventh help to contentment is to have a right estimate of the world, and the common state of humanity: to consider the world but as a stage and ourselves but as actors, and to resolve that it is very little material what part we play so we do it well. A Comedian may get as much applause by acting the slave as the conqueror, and he that acts the one today, may tomorrow reverse the part, and personate the other. So great are the vicissitudes of the world, that there is no building any firm hopes upon it. All the certainty we have of it, is, that in every condition it has its uneasinesses: so that when we court a change, we rather seek to vary than end our miseries. And certainly he that has well imprest upon his mind the vanity and vexation of the world, cannot be much surprised at anything that befalls him in it. We expect no more of anything but to do its kind, and we may as well be angry that we cannot bring the lions to our cribs, or fix the wind to a certain point, as that we cannot secure ourselves from dangers and disappointments in this rough and mutable world. We are therefore to lay it as an infallible maxim, that in this vale of tears every man must meet with sorrows and disasters: and then sure we may take our peculiar with evenness of temper, as being but the natural consequent of our being men. And though possibly we may everyone think himself to have double portion, yet that is usually from the deceitful comparisons we make of ourselves with others. We take the magnifying glasses of discontent and envy when we view our own miseries and others felicities, but look on our enjoyments and their sufferings thro the contracting optics of ingratitude and incompassion: and whilst we do thus, tis impossible but we must foment our own dissatisfactions. He that will compare to good purpose must do it honestly and sincerely, and view his neighbors calamities with the same attention he do's his own, and his own comforts with the same he do's his neighbors; and then many of the great seeming inequalities would come pretty near a level.

8. BUT even where they do not, it in the 8th place deserves however to be considered how ill natured a thing it is, for any man to think himself more miserable because another is happy: and yet this is the very thing, by which alone many men have made themselves wretched: for many have created wants, merely from the envious contemplation of other men's abundance. And indeed there is nothing more disingenuous, or (to go higher) more Diabolical. Lucifer was happy enough in his original state, yet could not think himself so because he was not like the most high Isa. 14. 14. And when by that insolent ambition he had forfeited bliss, it has ever since been an aggravation of his torment, that mankind is assumed to a capacity of it; and accordingly he makes it the design of his envious industry to defeat him. Now how perfectly are the two first parts of this copy transcribed, by those who first cannot be satisfied with any inferior degree of prosperity, and then whet their impatiencies with other men's enjoyments of what they cannot attain? And tis much to be doubted, that they who go thus far may complete the parallel, and endeavor when they have opportunity to undermine that happiness they envy. Therefore since Satan is so apt to impress his whole image, where he has drawn any of his lineaments, it concerns us warily to guard ourselves, and by a Christian sympathy with our brethren, rejoice with them that do rejoice, Rom. 12. 15. make the comforts of others, an allay not an improvement of our own miseries. Charity has a strange magnetic power, and attracts the concerns of our brethren to us, and he that has that in his breast can never want refreshment, whilst any about him are happy, for by adopting their interest, he shares in their joys. Jethro though an alien rejoiced for all the good God had don to Israel, Exod. 18. 9. and why should not we have as sensible a concurrence with our fellow Christians? And he that has so, will still find something to balance his own sufferings.

9. Let him that aspires to contentment set bounds to his desire. Tis our common fault in this affaire, we usually begin at the wrong end, we enlarge our desires as hell, and cannot be satisfied, Hab. 2. 5. and then think God uses us ill, if he do not fill our insatiable appetites: whereas if we would confine our expectations to those things which we need, or he has promise'd, there are few of us who would not find them abundantly answered. Alas how few things are there which our nature (if not stimulated by fancy and luxury) requires? And how rare is it to find them who want those? Nay who have not many additional for delight and pleasure? And yet God's promise under the Gospel extends only to those necessaries, for where Christ assures his disciples that these things shall be added unto them Mat. 6. 33. the context apparently restrains these things to meat and drink and clothing. Therefore take no thought for the life what you shall eat, or what you shall drink, nor yet for the body what you shall put on, verse 25. now what pretence have we to clame more then our Charter gives us? God never artiled with the ambitious to give him honors, with the covetous to fill his bags, or with the voluptuous to feed his luxuries. Let us therefore, if we expect to be satisfied, modestly confine our desires within the limits he has set us: and then every accession which he superadds will appear (what it is) a largess and bounty. But whilst our appetites are boundless, and rather stretched then filled with our acquist's, what possibility is there of their satisfaction? And when we importune God for it, we do but assign him such a task the Poets made a representation of their Hell, the filling a sieve with water, or the rolling a stone up a precipice.

10<sup>lie</sup>. A great expedient for contentment, is to confine our thoughts to the present, and not to let them loose to future events. Would we but do this, we might shake off a great part of our burden: for we often heap fantastic loads upon ourselves by anxious presages of things which perhaps will never happen, and yet sink more under them, then under the real weight that is actually upon us. And this is certainly one of the greatest follies imaginable: for either the evil will come or it will not, if it will, tis sure no such desirable guest that we should go out to meet it, we shall feel it time enough when it falls on us, we need not project to anticipate our sense of it: but if it will not, what extreme madness is it for a man to torment himself with that which will never be, to create engines of tortures, and by such aerial afflictions, make himself as miserable as the most real ones could do? And truly this is all that we usually get by our fore-sights. Prevision is one of God's attributes, and he mocks at all our pretences to it, by a frequent defeating of all our fore-casts. He do's it often in our hopes: some little cross circumstance many times demolishes those goodly machins we raise to ourselves: and he do's it no less in our fears, those ills we solemnly expected often baulk us, and others from an unexpected coast suddenly invade us. And since we are so blind, so short-sighted, let us never take upon us to be scouts, to discover danger at a distance (for tis manifold odds we shall only bring home false alarms) but let us rest ourselves upon that most admirable Aphorism of our blessed Lord, Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof, Mat. 6. 34. apply ourselves with Christian courage to bear the present, and leave God either to augment or diminish, as he sees fit for the future. Or if we will needs be looking forward, let it be in obedience not contradiction to our duty: let us entertain ourselves with those futurities which we are sure are not Chimera's, death and judgment, heaven and hell. The nearer we draw these things to our view, the more insensible will all intermedial objects be; they will deceive our sense of present, and much more fore-stal the apprehension of future evils: for tis our neglect of things eternal, that leaves us thus at leisure for the transitory

11. IN the last place let us in all our distresses supersede our anxieties and sollicitudes by that most effectual remedy the Apostle prescribes, Is any man afflicted let him pray, Jam. 5. 14. And this sure is a most rational prescription: for alas what else can we do towards the redress of our griefs. We who are so impotent, that we have not power over the most despicable excrescence of our own body, cannot make one hair white or black, Mat. 5. 36. what can we do towards the new moulding our condition, or modelling things without us? Our sollicitudes serve only to bind our burdens faster upon us, but this expedient of Prayer will certainly relieve us. Call upon me, says God, in the time of trouble, and I will hear thee, and thou shalt praise me, Psal. 50. 15. Whenever therefore we are sinking in the floods of affliction, let us thus support ourselves by representing our wants unto our gracious Lord, cry unto him as St. Peter did, Mat. 14. 30. and he will take us by the hand, and be the winds never so boisterous or contrary, preserve from sinking: the waves or billows of this troublesome world, will serve but to toss us closer into his arms, who can with a word appease the roughest tempest, or rescue from it. O let us not then be so unkind to ourselves, as to neglect this infallible means of our deliverance! but with the Psalmist take our refuge under the shadow of the divine wings till the calamity be over-past Psal. 57. 1. And as this is a sure expedient in all our real important afflictions, so is it a good test by which to try what are so. We are often peevish and disquieted at trifles, nay we take up the quarrels of our lusts and vices, and are discontented when they want their wisht supplies. Now in either of these cases, no man that at all considers who he prays to, will dare to insert these in his prayers, it being a contempt of God to invoke him in things so slight as the one, or impious as the other. It will therefore be good for every man when he goes to address for relief, to consider what of his pressures they are, that are worthy of that solemn deprecation: and when he has singled those out, let him reflect, and he will find he has in that prejudg'd all his other discontents as frivolous or wicked. And then sure he cannot think fit to harbor them, but must for shame dismiss them, since they are such, as he dares not avow to him, from whom alone he can expect relief. God always pities our real miseries, but our imaginary ones dare not demand it. Let us not then create such diseases to ourselves, as we cannot declare to our Physician: and when those are precluded, for all the rest St. Paul's recipe is a Catholicon, Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayers and supplications, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known to God. Phil. 4. 6.

SECT. XI.

Of Resignation.

1. AND now amidst such variety of receipts, twill be hard to instance any one sort of calamity which can escape their efficacy, if they be but duly appli'd. But indeed we have generally a compendious way of frustrating all remedies by never making use of them: like fantastic patients we are well enough content to have our disease discourst, and medicines prescribed, but when the Physic comes, have still some pretence or other to protract the taking it. But I shall beseech the Reader to consider, that counsels are not charms, to work without any cooperation of the concerned person: they must be adverted to, they must be ponder'd and considered, and finally they must be practic'd, or else the utmost good they can do us, is to give us a few hours divertisement in the reading: but they do us a mischief that infinitely out-weighs it, for they improve our guilts by the ineffective tender they make of rescuing us from them, and leave us accountable not only for the original crimes, but for our obstinate adhesion to them in spite of admonition.

2. I say this because it is a little too notorious, that many take up books only as they do cards or dice, as an instrument of diversion. Tis a good entertainment of their curiosity to see what can be said upon any subject, and be it well or ill handled, they can please themselves equally with the ingenuity or ridiculousness of the composure, and when they have don this, they have don all they designed. This indeed may be tolerable in Romances and Play-books, but sure it ill befits Divinity. And yet I fear it oftneft happens there: for in the former some do project for some trivial improvements, as the embellishing of their style, the inspiriting of their fancies; and some men would scarce be able to drive their pedling trade of wit, did they not thus sweep the stage: but alas how many books of piety are read, of which one cannot discern the least tincture in men's conversations, which sure do's in a great measure proceed from the want of a determinate design in their reading, men's practice being not apt to be less rovers then their speculation. He that takes a practical subject in hand, must do it with a design to conform his practice to what he shall there be convinced to be his duty, and he that comes not with this probity of mind, is not like to be much benefited by his reading.

3. BUT one would think this should be an unnecessary caution at this time, for since the intent of this tract, is only to show men the way to contentment, tis to be supposed the Readers will be as much in earnest as the writer can be, it being every man's proper and most important interest, the instating him in the highest and most supreme felicity that this world can admit: yet for all this fair probability, I doubt many will in this instance have the same indifference they have in their other spiritual concerns.

4. TIS true indeed that a querulous repining humor, is one of the most pernicious, the most ugly habits incident to mankind, but yet as deformed people are oft the most in love with themselves, so this crooked piece of our temper, is of all others the most indulgent to itself. Melancholy is the most stubborn and intractable of all humors; and discontent being the offspring of that, partakes of that inflexibility: and accordingly we see how impregnable it often is, against all assaults of reason and religion too. Jonah in a sullen mood would justify his discontent even to God himself, and in spite of that calm reproof, dost thou well to be angry? Jon. 4. 9. aver he did well to be angry even to the death. And do we not frequently see men upon an impatience of some disappointment, grow angry even at their comforts? Their friends, their children, their meat, their drink, everything grows nauseous to them, and in a frantic discontent, they often fling away those things which they most value. Besides this peevish impatience is of so aerial a diet, that tis scarce possible to starve it. Twill nurish itself with Phantasms and Chimeras, suborn a thousand surmises & imaginary distresses to abet its pretences: and though everyone of us can remonstrate to another, the unreasonableness of this discontent; yet scarce any of us will draw the argument home, or suffer ourselves to be convinced by what we urge as irrefragable to others. Nay farther this humor is impatient of any diversion, loves to converse only with itself. In bodily pains, men that despair of cure are yet glad of alliaies and mitigations, and strive by all arts, to divert and deceive the sense of their anguish; but in this disease of the mind, men cherish and improve their torment, roll and chew the bitter pill in their mouths, that they may be sure to have its utmost flavor; and by devoting all their thoughts to the subject of their grief, keep up an uninterrupted sense of it: as if they had the same Tyranny for themselves which Caligula had for others, and loved to feel themselves die. Indeed there is not a more absurd contradiction in the world, then to hear men cry out of the weight, the intolerableness of their burden, and yet grasp it as fast as if their life were bound up in it; will not deposit it, no not for the smalest breathing time. A strange fascination sure, and yet so frequent, that it ought to be the fundamental care of him that would cure men of their discontents, to bring them to a hearty willingness of being cured.

5. IT may be this will look like paradox, and every man will be apt to say he wishes nothing more in earnest, then to be cured of his present discontent. He that is poor would be cured by wealth, he that is low and obscure by honor and greatness: but so an Hydropic person may say he desires to have his thirst cured by a perpetual supply of drink: yet all sober people know, that that is the way only to increase it: but let the whole habit of the body be rectified, and then the thirst will cease of itself. And certainly tis the very same in the present case, no outward accessions will ever satisfy our cravings, our appetites must be tam'd and reduced, and then they will never be able to raise tumults, or put us into mutiny and discontent: and he (and none but he) that submits to this method, can truly be said to desire a cure.

6. BUT he that thus attests the reality of his desires, and seeks contentment in its proper sphere, may surely arrive to some considerable degrees of it. We find in all ages men, that only by the direction of natural light have calmed their disquiets, and reason'd themselves into contentment even under great and sensible pressures; men who amidst the acutest torments, have still preserved a serenity of mind, and have frustrated contentments and reproaches by disregarding them: and sure we give a very ill account of our Christianity, if we cannot do as much with it as they did without it.

7. I do not here propose such a Stoical insensibility as makes no distinction of events, which, though it has been vainly pretended to by many, yet sure was never attained by any upon the strength of discourse. Some natural dullness or casual stupefaction must concur to that, and perhaps by doing so, has had the luck to be canoniz'd for virtue. I mean only such a superiority of mind as raises us above our sufferings, though it exemt us not from the sense of them. We cannot propose to ourselves a higher pattern in any virtue then our blessed Lord: yet we see he not only felt that load under which he lay, but had the most pungent and quick sense of it, such as prompted those earnest deprecations, father if it be possible let this cup pass: yet all those displacencies of his flesh were surmounted by the resignation of his spirit, nevertheless not what I will, but what thou wilt, Luk. 22. And certainly he that in imitation of this pattern, do's in spite of all the reluctancies of his sense, thus entirely submit his will, however he may be sad, yet he is not impatient; nor is he like to be sad long, for to him that is thus resigned, light will spring up, Psal. 97. 11. some good Angel will be sent like that to our Savior to relieve his disconsolation. God will send either some outward allaies, or give such interior comforts and supports, as shall counterpoise those afflictions he takes not off.

8. INDEED the grand design of God in correcting us is (the same with that of a prudent parent towards his child) to break our wills. That stubborn faculty will scarce bend with easy touches, and therefore do's require some force: and when by that rougher handling, he has brought it to a pliantness, the work is don. Tis therefore our interest to cooperate with this design, to assist as much as we are able towards the subjugating this unruly part of ourselves. This is that Sheba 2 Sam. 20. the surrendering of whom is God's expectation in all the close sieges he lays to us. Let us then be so wise, as by an early resigning it to divert his farther hostilities, and buy our peace with him.

9. AND truly this is the way not only to gain peace with him, but ourselves too: tis the usurpation of our will over our reason which breeds all the confusion and tumults within our own breasts, and there is no possibility of curbing its insolence, but by putting it into safe custody, committing it to him who (as our Church teaches us) alone can order the unruly wills of sinful men. Indeed nothing but experience can fully inform us of the serenity and calm of that soul, who has resigned his will to God. All care of choosing for himself is happily superseded, he is tempted to no anxious forecasts for future events, for he knows nothing can happen in contradiction of that supreme will, in which he hath sanctuary: which will certainly choose for him with that tenderness and regard, that a faithful-Guardian would for his pupil, an indulgent father for his child that casts its self into his arms. Certainly there is not in the world such a holy sort of artifice, so Divine a charm to tie our God to us, as this of resigning ourselves to him. We find the Gibeonites by yielding themselves vassals to the Israelites, had their whole army at their beck to rescue them in their danger Jos. 10. 6. and can we think God is less considerate of his homagers and dependents? No certainly, his honor as well as his compassion is concerned in the relief of those who have surrendered themselves to him.

10. FARTHER yet, when by resignation we have united our wills to God, we have quite changed the scene, and we who when our wills stood single were liable to perpetual defeats, in this blessed combination can never be crossed. When our will is twisted and involved with God's, the same omnipotency which backs his will, do's also attend ours. God's will, we are sure, admits of no control, can never be resisted, and we have the same security for ours, so long as it concurs with it. By this means all calamities are unsting'd, and even those things which are most repugnant to our sensitive natures, are yet very agreeable to our spirits, when we consider they are implicitly our own choice, since they are certainly his, whom we have deputed to elect for us. Indeed there can be no face of adversity so averting and formidable, which set in this light will not look amiable. We see daily how many uneasiness and prejudices men will contentedly suffer in pursuit of their wills: and if we have really espoused God's, made his will ours, we shall with as great (nay far greater) alacrity embrace its distributions, how uneasy soever to our sense; our souls will more acquiesce in the accomplishment of the Divine will, than our flesh can reluct to any severe effects of it.

11. HERE then is that footing of firm ground, on which whosoever can stand, may indeed do that which Archimedes boasted, move the whole world. He may as to himself subvert the whole course of sublunary things, unvenem all those calamities which are to others the gall of Asps; and in a farther sense verify that Evangelical prophecy, of beating swords into ploughshares, and spears into pruning hooks, Isaiah. 2. 4. the most hostile weapons, the most adverse events, shall be by him converted into instruments of fertility, shall only advance his spiritual growth.

12. AND now who can choose but confess this a much more eligible state, than to be always harrassed with sollicitudes and cares, perpetually either fearing future defeats, or bewailing the past. And then what can we call it less than madness or enchantment, for men to act so contrary to their own dictates, yea to their very sense and experience, too see and acknowledge the inexplicable felicity of a resigned will, and yet perversely to hold out theirs, though they can get nothing by it, but the sullen pleasure of opposing God, and tormenting themselves? Let us therefore if not for our duty or ease, yet at least for our reputation, the asserting ourselves men of sobriety and common sense, do that which upon all these interests we are obliged; let us but give up our wills, and with them we shall certainly divest ourselves of all our fruitless anxieties, and cast our burdens upon him who invites us to do so. He who bears all our sins, will bear all our sorrows, our griefs too: if we will but be content to deposit them, he will relieve us from all those oppressing weights, which make our souls cleave to the dust, Psal. 119. 25. and will in exchange give us only his light, his pleasant burden, Mat. 11. 33. In a word there will be no care left for us, but that of keeping ourselves in a capacity of his: let us but secure our love to him, and we are ascertain'd that all things shall work together for our good, Rom. 8. 28.

To conclude, Resignation and Contentment are virtues not only of a near cognation and resemblance, but they are linked as the Cause and the Effect. Let us but make sure of Resignation, and Content will flow into us without our farther industry: as on the contrary whilst our wills are at defiance with God's, we shall always find things at as great defiance with ours. All our subtiletes or industries will never mould them to our satisfactions, till we have molded ourselves into that pliant temper that we can cordially say, It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good. 1 Sam. 3. 18.

The Close.

1. THIS short institution of the Art of Contentment, cannot more naturally, or more desirably draw to a conclusion, then in the resort we have given it, in the bosom of divine Providence. The Roman conquerors as the last pitch of all their triumphs, went to the Capitol, and laid their Garlands in the lap of Jupiter: but the Christian has an easier way to Triumph, to put his crown of thorns (for that is the trophy of his victories) within the arms of his gracious God; there lodge his fears, his wants, his sorrows, and himself too, as in the best repository.

2. THE Gospel command of not caring for the morrow, Mat. 6. 34, and being careful for nothing, Phil. 4. 6. nakedly proposed, might seem the abandoning of us to all the calamities of life: but when we are directed to cast all our care upon a gracious and all-powerful Parent, and are assured that he cares for us, 1 Pet. 5. 7. that though a woman may forget her sucking child, that she should not have compassion of the son of her womb, yet will he not forget his children, Isa. 49. 15. this will abundantly supersede all cavil and objection. Whilst worldly men trust in an arm of flesh, lay up treasure on earth, a prey for rust and moth, Mat. 6. 19. and a torment to themselves, Jam. 5. 3. the Christian has Omnipotence for his support, and a treasure in heaven, where no thief approaches, nor moth corrupts, Mat. 6. 20. Whilst bold inquirers call in question God's secret will, oblige him to their sub or supralapsarian schemes, their absolute or conditional decrees, their grace foreseen or predetermin'd; the pious man with awful acquiescence submits to that which is revel'd: resolves forever to obey, but never to dispute; as knowing that the beloved Disciple lean'd on his Masters bosom; but tis the thieves and traitors part to go about to rifle it.

3. TIS surely a modest demand in the behalf of God Almighty, that we should allow him as much privilege in his World, as every Pesant clames in his Cottage; to be Master there, and dispose of his household as he thinks best: to say to this man, Go, and he goeth: and to another, Come, and he cometh: and to his servant, Do this, and he doth it, Mat. 8. 9. And if we would afford him this liberty, there would be an immediate end put to all clamor and complaint.

4. WE make it our daily prayer that the will of God may be don in earth as it is in heaven, with a ready, swift, and uninterrupted constancy. As tis Giantlike rebellion to set up our will against his, so is it mad perverseness to set it up against our own; be displeas'd that our requests are granted, and repine that his, and therewith our will is don. It were indeed not only good manners, but good policy, to observe the direction of the Heathen, and follow God: not prejudg his determinations by ours; but in a modest suspension of our thoughts, hearken what the Lord God will say concerning us, for he will speak peace unto his people, and to his Saints that they turn not again, Psa. 85. 8.

5. OR however upon surprise we may indulge to a passionate affection, and dote upon our illegitimate offspring, our dearling guilts or follies, as David did upon that Child, who was the price of Murder and adultery: yet when the brat is taken from us, when the Child is dead, it will become us to do as he did, rise from our sullen posture on the earth, and worship in the house of the Lord, 2 Sam. 12. 20. It will behove us, as he says in another place, to lay our hand upon our mouth, because it was his doing, Psal. 30. 10. and with holy Job Chap. 40. 4. when charged with his murmurings, Behold I am vile, what shall I answer? Once have I spoken, but I will not answer: yea twice, but I will proceed no farther.

6. Socrates rightly said of Contentment, opposing it to the riches of fortune and opinion, that tis the wealth of nature; for it gives everything that we have learnt to want, and really need: but Resignation is the riches of Grace, bestowing all things that a Christian not only needs, but can desire, even Almighty God himself. He indeed, as the Scholemen teach, is the objective happiness of the Creature; He who is the fountain of being, must be also of blessedness: and though this be only communicable to us, when we have put off that flesh which cannot enter into the kingdom of God, and laid aside that corruption which cannot inherit incorruption, 1 Cor. 15. yet even in this life, we may make approaches to that blessed state, by acts of Resignation and denial of ourselves. It was the generous saying of Socrates being about to die unto his friend; O Crito, since it is the will of God, so let it be: Anytus and Melitus may kill me, but cannot hurt me. But such a resignation as tis infinitely a greater duty to a Christian, so it is also a more firm security. In that case tis not the Martyr, but Jesus of Nazareth who is thus persecuted, and he who attacks him will find it hard to kick against the pricks, Act. 9. 5.

7. THERE could not be a greater instance of the profligate sensuality of the Israelites, then that they murmured for want of leeks and onions, Num. 11. 5. when they ate Angels food, and had bread rain'd down from heaven. Tis impossible for the soul that is sensible of God Almighty's favor, to repine at any earthly pressure. The Lord is my shepherd, saith David, therefore can I lack nothing, Psa. 23. 1. And, thou hast put gladness into my heart, more then when their corn, and wine, and oil increased, Psa. 4. 7. and in passionate rapture he cries out, Psa. 73. 25. Whom have I in heaven but thee: and there is none upon earth that I desire in comparison of thee? my flesh and my heart faileth: but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever. And likewise Psal. 46. 1. God is our hope and strength, a very present help in trouble. Therefore will we not fear, though the earth be moved: and though the hills be carried into the midst of the sea. Tho the waters thereof rage and swell, and though the mountains shake at the tempest of the same. If God be in the midst of us, we shall not be removed, he will help us, and that right early. Let us therefore possess ourselves of this support, and as the Prophet advises Isa. 8. 12. neither fear, nor be afraid, in any exigence how great soever; but be still and quiet, and sanctify the Lord of hosts himself, and let him be our fear, and let him be our dread.

THE INTRODUCTION.

MAN in his original condition, when he first came out of the hands of his Maker, was a very noble and venerable Creature, adorned with many peculiar excellencies; and as the Psalmist observes, Only made a little lower than glorious Angels: But of all his perfections, Holiness, as it was the principal and most oriental, so did it also give a beauty and luster to the rest; It made his Authority and Power lovely and desirable, his Wisdom and Knowledge venerable, and every other attribute, which without this is terrible and dreadful, to be comely and praise-worthy. This was that single perfection that raised Man above the beasts that perish, and made him Heavens great favourite and darling; which if it had been carefully preserved, had undoubtedly secured our first Parents in Paradise, and prevented that dreadful calamity that hath seized upon their Posterity.

But alas! how are we fallen from Heaven to Earth? from a Paradise of pure pleasures, to a miserable and painful Prison? We have lost that divine Image that was impressed upon Man in his primitive state, which indeed completed, and alone preserved its beauty and comeliness; and with it have also lost everything that did then contribute to make us happy; and are now become vile and abominable, and as miserable as we were formerly happy.

How much a serious view of that primitive felicity Man in his innocent state enjoyed, would contribute to plant in us a holy life, I know not: but I am sure it could not but mightily inhaunce the value of Holiness, and make it lovely and desirable. That man that reflects upon the dismal miseries he is exposed to in this lapsed estate, to what an infinite number of inexpressible evils, of insupportable pains he lies upon; how he is hurried from a state of perfect bliss, to a woeful hell of extreme torments: How exceedingly amazing is this? The very Poet could say, Miserum est suisse heatum.

But, God knows, this is out very seldom (and if ever, but faintly) reflected upon: we are (to our sharow) become contented slaves, and satisfied to bear Fetters and Chains; we continually live in the midst of all evil, never enjoy a moments solace or comfort: notwithstanding of which, like mad-men we are content with our state, and like the Sow take pleasure to puddle in the mire.

And although that same diffusive and boundless goodness that first breathed in us the breath of life, and framed us in his own likeness and image, again pitied us in our low estate, and provided the most valuable and Sovereign remedy to recover us from this mortal disease; though he has procured a complete Ransom to liberate us from the insupportable slavery and tyranny of sin; has offered to restore our former beauty, to repossess us of that happiness we had lost, and to make us again Favorites and Freemen; yet how insolently have we rejected this kind offer? how impiously have we cut those cords of love asunder, and refuse to be healed?

'Tis, indeed, matter of great sadness to consider the lofty and intolerable affronts that are now cast upon Holiness; how men are arrived at that pitch of impiety, to scorn and deride Religion, which former ages were at some pains to advance; as if Holiness were inconsistent with the principles of Generosity, and only becoming mean and morose spirits.

How transcendent a folly and madness this is, will easily appear by what I shall afterwards lay down. Methinks the naked representation of Holiness, should be motive enough (if not to court it, yet) to engage men to correct their unreasonable prejudices they entertain against it; and even force its greatest Antagonists to become its Advocates. But alas! vice hath cast such a dark shadow upon men's Judgments, that they are become as unfit Judges of its beauty, as blind men are of colors; otherwise we might yet expect to see contemned Virtue much more in vogue than ever Vice was.

To excite our desires, Scripture has represented it under the most comely dress, has discovered its beauty and excellency, and recommended it by the most endearing motives which are apt to work both upon our hope and fear: Upon our hope, by proposing an infinitely valuable reward to the righteous, besides the present advantages that attend it. Upon our fear, by opening to our view the powers of the world to come, and discovering the insupportable misery that the damned suffer day and night; so that if men would but so far actuate their Reason, as soberly to consult their own interest and happiness, I doubt not but this alone should be motive enough to excite them to the practice of Holiness, and scare them from those ways of sin that lead down to the chambers of death.

It would make (one would think) the greatest Sensualist to relinquish the momentary pleasures he enjoys here, to be possessed of those eternal joys that the pure in spirit shall reap in the Kingdom of their Father: and the most hardened and impregnable sinner tremble, to think of dwelling with devouring flames.

Now the only infallible way to attain those coelestial felicities, and to evite the miserable consequences of vice, and those pains and tortures that it exposeth its votaries to, is to abandon every lust, be it never so impetuous, and to cleanse ourselves (as the Apostle adviseth us) from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and to perfect holiness in the fear of God.

For the better directing our present inquisition, I shall first briefly represent the nature of true Holiness, and show the beauty and excellency of it. Secondly, I shall discourse of its rule, and more parricularly discover the several branches of Holiness. Thirdly, I shall propound several motives and inducements to engage blen to the practice of Holiness; and indeed, this is what I chiefly intend to insist upon. Fourthly, I shall remove all those Cavils and Objections that are urged against Holiness. And Lastly, conclude with some short Reflections and Inferences.

CHAP. I. Of the nature of Holiness.

I Intend not here to descend to the consideration of every particular branch of Holiness, but to discourse of it in the general, as it is the combination of all Christian virtues: and as it is thus considered, I need not, I think, in the description of it, accurately study all those Logical rules Philosophers require in a good definition. For may part, it fully enough satisfies me to know, that holiness is a conformity to the Divine Law, and a hearty and sincere compliance with those original dictates of human nature, and the Commands revealed in sacred Writ.

So long as Man remained obedient to the Laws of his Maker, his holiness was untainted, and his Beauty and primitive congenite comeliness continued; but by his woeful apostasy he lost that noble embellishment of his nature, which did indeed give a grace to all his other accomplishments, and is now become ugly and deformed Holiness and purity of Spirit are different words, but of the same signification, and are promiscuously used in Scripture to express the same thing. Opposite to which are Sin and Uncleanness: Sin being that which contaminates the Soul, and robs it of that beauty which formerly did of right belong to it.

Although 'tis not one particular good action that denominates a man holy; yet every willful aberration from, and transgression of the Law, constitutes man a sinner, and makes him liable to the demerit of the offense. Whosoever therefore intends to perfect holiness, must (according to the Apostle's advice) cleanse himself from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, abstain from every appearance of evil, and sincerely endeavor to perform all good actions.

In a word, Holiness in its general notion, is the comprehensive sum of the moral Law; and may be very aptly described to be a ceasing from evil, and doing good; which in this lapsed estate consists in the sincerity of our intentions and actions, and shall be perfected when mortality is swallowed up of life, when those imperfections and spots that attend our natural state, shall be quite removed and done away. So long as our souls actuate their impure bodies, sins and infirmities will cleave to the best: an absolute innocence and perfect holiness is reserved for that state, where all things are become new. But yet so far as the frailty of our nature, and the imperfection of our present state will suffer, we ought sincerely to study to walk (as it is said of Zacharias and Elizabeth) in all the Commandments of God blameless; the general course and tenor of our lives should correspond and keep a conformity with the divine precepts, which, as I shall just now show, are the rule of holiness.

Almighty God, who well considers the nature of man, does not esteem men to be either vicious or holy, from the performance of some particular acts: There is not a just man who liveth and sinneth not. It is the peculiar motto of our Lord Christ, That he did no sin, neither was there guile found in his mouth. But the imperfect obedience of good men, who in the general course of their life sincerely study an universal conformity and respect to the divine Laws, is esteemed by him who judgeth righteously to be sufficient in order to our acceptance with him, upon the account of the merits and perfect obedience of our blessed Savior. The wise God, who considers the frailties and imperfections that attend our present state, expects not more from us than we are able to perform. He is not so rigorous a Lord, to require Brick where there is no Straw: the terms of the Gospel are accommodated to our capacities, and only require a holiness which is possible for the Creature to attain; at least it exacts and expects no more, but that we endeavor sincerely and unfeignedly to obey all those precepts he has enjoined; that we habituate ourselves to perform good actions; that the general propension and inclination of our wills and appetites be towards the doing of what is imposed upon us, and abstaining from all kind of evil.

By what hath been said, it may appear, that holiness consists not in Speculation, but in Practice: 'Tis not the knowledge of duty, but the actual performance of it that entitles men to be holy; and that too, not superficially, or in a good mode, and rarely performed; but sincerely, and throughout the whole course of our lives. For men to know their duty and not perform it, is to inhaunce their own misery, and to secure to themselves double stripes: and to perform some good actions, and abstain from the grosser pollutions of the world, and yet to be vicious in the general course of their lives, this is such a holiness that will never profit any man. The rule of holiness, to which we must heartily study an actual conformity, does not dispense, no not with the commission of the least sin, nor omission of the smallest duty.

But because general descriptions of things are frequently overlooked, I shall not think it unnecessary to descend to a more particular survey, and consider Holiness in its several branches, as they are plainly described by the Christian rule of Holiness.

CHAP. II. Of the Rule of Holiness.

Although the whole Canon of Scripture is useful to instruct us in our duty; yet because many things, if not approved, yet dispensed with under the old dispensation, are now quite antiquated and abrogated, I shall therefore at present confine my discourse to the Gospel Economy, and by the rule discover wherein the Nature of true Holiness and undefiled Religion before God consists.

I am a little confident, it will not be expected I should prove that the New Testament is of Divine Authority, and consequently an infallible rule to direct us in the way of holiness: the numerous late Discourses, which have excellently well performed this task, against the prodigiously profane Atheists this impure age hath to its lasting reproach hatched, makes me without the least fear of censure supersede this undertaking.

I shall take it then for granted, (it being acknowledged by all rational men) that the Gospel is the great and certain Standard whereby we may truly judge of any man's holiness; and never doubt to conclude, that he who in the general course and tenor of his life walks contrary to the Rule, can lay no claim, plead no interest to the title of Holiness; this being no other thing (as I have already shown) but a combination of those virtues the Gospel-precepts enjoin.

Now the precepts of Christianity which point us our duty, may, for brevity, be reduced to these three general Heads. For first, they are either such as enjoin Piety towards God. Secondly, or such that require the good government of ourselves. Or thirdly, those that prescribe our carriage and be haviour towards others. Of these I shall take a brief survey; and as I go along, excite men to the practice of every particular duty, by rational motives and inducements; and withal discover the perfection and completeness of the Christian Rule, above all the Institutions that ever were or can be devised.

First, amongst those Laws of Christianity which enjoin Piety towards God, we find Love to him standing in the front, and claiming the precedency. This is (as our blessed Savior informs us) the first and great Commandment, it being indeed the source and original of all acts of obedience.

To excite our Love, let us but present to our view his infinite and transcendent perfections, the undeserved favors he every minute bestows upon us, the innumerable dangers and accidents we are daily preserved from: Arguments forcible enough to draw Love from the most rocky and obdurate heart. 'Tis indeed an amazing thing, to see those into whom he has breathed the Breath of Life, on whom he has rained so many floods of favors, to remain notwithstanding as frozen, as ground which the Sun-rays never touch. 'Tis an odd and strange operation, that streams of Love only meet with contempt and disdain.

Sure I am, there is a concurrence of all sorts of motives and arguments to engage us to love God; and those indeed so charming and endearing, that it is strange anybody should fail in it. Methinks the work itself is so sweet and delectable, so ravishing and lovely, that men need not be courted to it by persuasion. O what a great deal of satisfaction, of ineffable delight, does the devout soul find in those actings of love towards God! And if the Voluptuous and Sensualist would but abandon those sinful delights he now finds so charming and bewitching, and betake himself to the practice of holiness: If he would change the object of his love, and place it where it ought to be; I doubt not but he should quickly perceive there is more pleasure, more contentment and satisfaction in the love of God, than in the enjoyment of all carnal pleasures.

That man that shall make a just estimate of things, shall be easily convinced there is nothing worthy of love in comparison of God. Alas! the pleasures of this world are but shadows and fancies, which will soon disappear. Its beauty and splendor is but gilded and delusory: and is it reasonable, nay, is it not extreme madness, to place the strength of our affections on such uncertain and quickly-removed vanities?

The usual arguments of love amongst men, are Relation, Interest, or the Beauty and Excellency of the Object. Now all these lay much stronger obligations upon us to love God. For Relation, is he not our Lord and Maker, who gave us life and being, who as a tender Father kindly compassionates our condition, and in our low estate has carefully minded us, when our other Relations have accounted us aliens and strangers? This the Royal Psalmist experimented; and I make no question but many good men have been, and are living instances of this truth.

And indeed, that man that consults his own interest, cannot but be strongly excited to love that God who is the best benefactor, and equally willing and able to bestow favors upon him. It is an argument of a very base and mean spirit, to despise our benefactors: but thus have we requited God, who daily loadeth us with mercies, and reneweth his blessings every morning: we have, God knows, most insolently carried ourselves, even then, when he has been displaying a banner of love over us.

As for Beauty and Excellency, what in the world can compete with him, who is glorious in holiness, and whose Name is excellent in all the earth? How quickly are all created beauties winked into darkness? At the best they are but streams derived from this glorious being; and is it not hugely reasonable, that he who is the original of these, should be the chief object of our love, and make us with the Psalmist say, Whom have I in the heaven but thee; and there is none upon the earth I desire besides thee?

I know there is no man would take it well, nay who would not be highly incensed, and think himself much wronged, to have his Love called in question; but God knows how little reason the far greater part of Mankind have to pretend love, who stand not to break his Laws, to cast behind them and lightly esteem his precepts, the obedience of which is made the best and surest character of Love.

Would God it were as easy to persuade as it is to propose our duty. But how hard is it to convince men of the folly, the extreme and strange madness, of being lovers of pleasures more than lovers of God? But the truth is, there is such a mire and puddle of pollution in our hearts, that it quite choaks & extinguisheth all sparks of Love, makes us violate the principles of humanity, and become more unguete than the beasts who have no understanding.

But if this Divine flame be kindled in our Hearts, if it be sincere and superlative as it ought to be, it will easily employ all the faculties of our Soul in his service; it will engage, and enable us too, to perform the several Duties of Piety the Laws of Christianity enjoin: which because they are some of the particular branches of Holiness, I shall briefly mention, with their encouragements; and for method and order reduce to four Heads. First, it will instruct and enable us to trust and depend upon God. Secondly, to submit and obey his Will. Thirdly, to honor and reverence his great and sacred Name. And Lastly, to worship and adore him according to the method he hath himself prescribed.

I begin with the first, namely, That Love where it is sincere, is a noble and generous passion, apt to excite and enable us to depend on God. This is, I confess, a duty very useful, and never out of season: the Psalmist wisely adviseth us, to trust in him at all times, when we are in the midst of all trouble, as well as when our condition is serene, and wholly exempt from outward fears. When the divine Providence hath placed us in the most dismal circumstances, even in this sad and comfortless state, our fears ought to give place to faith; we would do well to repose a special confidence in him, who is hereby become engaged to secure and defend us. This method the excellent Psalmist observed, and resolved constantly to heed in times of imminent danger: What time I am afraid I will trust in thee, Psal. 56.3. and we find that faithful men in former times took this course also: We know not what to do, only our eyes are to thee, 2 Chron. 20.12.

In this lapsed state we lie open to a multitude of accidents; every place is attended with dangers; our enemies are as subtle and cunning, as they are strong and numerous. The Prince of the power of the Air has his wit always upon the rack, in inventing stratagems and devices to undo us; and his Emissaries slip no opportunity of our ruin: and is there a safer course than to trust in Jehovah, who is everlasting strength? who is indeed, as the Psalmist says, a present help in time of need. Sure I am, it is man's greatest interest to flee to the Divine Providence, which is the best guard against all dangers; for we need not doubt to conclude with the Apostle. If God be with us, who can be against us?

'Tis also the Law of Heaven, that in times of want we confide in God, 1 Pet. 5.6. Cast all your care upon him, for he careth for you. I confess, we must not expect to be fed miraculously, to have the Ravens to bring bread and flesh to us morning and evening, or that the meal in our Barrel should increase and never waste, but be multiplied as the Loaves and Fish were by our Savior: We must not foolishly dream that Manna shall fall about our Tents, when we may use the lawful means; this sure were rather a tempting of, than trusting in God But yet, after we have experimented all lawful means and probable ways, and find it utterly impossible for us to help ourselves; then may we safely repose our confidence upon him, who feeds the young ravens when they cry unto him. Therefore (says our Lord) I say unto you, Take no thought for your life, what you shall eat, or what you shall drink; neither for your body, what ye shall put on: Is not the life more than meat? and the body than raiment? Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns; yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better than they? &c. Matth. 6.25, 26. 'Tis rejected and condemned as a Pagan & Heathenish sin, to be querulons and solicitous of what we shall eat, or what we shall drink, or wherewithal we shall be clothed: for after all these things do the Gentiles seek, v. 31, 32.

I confess, as I cannot sufficiently enough pity the madness of some men, who will trust God with their Souls, but not with their secular Concerns; so could I never yet project what may be the reason why better men than the former are so apt to distrust God in times of danger and want. I wish such men would consider how shrewd a presumption this is of Atheism, at least of establishing the Epicurean notion of a Deity who is quite unconcerned about inferior beings, and sequestered from the care of sublunary affairs. For if we did indeed think that he takes notice of us, we could not but confidently rely upon his care.

Secondly, we are by the perfect rule of Piety and Holiness instructed to submit to the divine Will, and comply with the Gospel precepts, which concerning all things are right. Perhaps the lot infinite Wisdom has carved out to us, is no ways relishing to flesh and blood. Whilst others are walking amongst roses, enjoy all seoular advantages, and are placed in the sunshine of prosperity; may be we are forced to hang our harps upon the willows, and spend our few days in sorrow and grief. However, let us not, even under these sad circumstances, charge God foolishly, or be impatient under the severity of his correction; for this is no argument of the hatred of a Father. Let us rather in this case view the unspeakable reward, and the divine promises, which are sufficiunt arguments to revive our s••ing and most languishing hopes, and able to form our souls to true patience.

Philosophers, if ever they attained to a perfection in any virtue, it was in their patience under the instability of worldly things; and yet their grounds and motives to patience were sandy and ineffectual, and no ways comparable to the arguments and inducements laid down in the Scheme of Christian Religion. Epicurus his calling to mind his former pleasures, was but a weak plea to form him to patience under the tormenting pains of the Gout. And the Stoics notion that sufferings were no real evils, was really a fancy easily conquered by the extremity of pain.

And as we are thus obliged to submit to the severest dispensation of Providence, so we ought to comply with the divine will exhibited in his Precepts. Obedience is undoubtedly the best evidence of Love; for hereby is our love manifested, that we do his will: and indeed the divine injunctions are so natural, so equitable and just, that we can allege no impossibility in performing them. His Commands, as the Apostle informs us, are not grievous, 1 Joh. 4.3. they require not things incommodious and burthensome, as the most of other Religions do.

The third duty we are instructed in, is to reverence and honor his sacred Name, to have apprehensions and affections suitable to his glorious perfections. When we seriously reflect on the purity of his nature, and the infinity of his cognizance; our esteem and veneration of him should be truly elevated, and raised as high as possible, and make us with Moses (in a holy rapture) say, Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the God's! who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders? Exod. 15.11.

How impious then and unlawful is it, to profane and violate the sacred Name of that God we should adore, by a multitude of rash and customary oaths! Sure those who own any relation to that God who is so dishonored, will be so generous as to express their displeasure, when in company with those who thus revile him. But if God be so friendless as to have none to appear thus for him, yet such profane wretches may know, that God himself will resent those injuries and affronts put upon him; he will vindicate his own glory of which he is so jealous, and surely will not hold them guiltless that take his Name in vain.

Of all sins, this of Swearing is the most unreasonable, and cannot pretend the ordinary incentives of Pleasure or Profit, that most of Vices lay some claim to. How desperate a frenzy then is it, for men without any probability of allurements, to draw down upon themselves the vengeance of an incensed God? 'Tis sure but a mean Apology, to allege an habit and custom, while this is the very thing that enhances their guilt: neither will it, I think, a whit lessen the Crime, that Great persons have given it such a vogue in the world.

The Name of God is a sacred thing, which must not be appealed to, but in the most weighty and serious cases: Thou shalt swear (says the Prophet) that the Lord liveth, in truth, justice, and judgment. If we either affirm or promise anything by oath, it must be after mature deliberation, after we have ascertained ourselves of the truth and lawfulness of it: this the very Poet could dictate,

It were to be wished, that the Hectors of this age would learn of the very Heathens more reverence; and that those men that pretend to good breeding, would be so civil, even sometimes for the companies sake, as to forbear those Oaths that tender ears cannot hear without offense.

In the last place, the Divine Love, if scattered in our Hearts, will excite us to worship God after the method himself hath prescribed: It will direct us to the rule of Piety, where we shall find everything that relates to our immediate intercourse with God in Divine Ordinances and Worship exactly ordered. I confess, the Heathen world, as they were confused in their notions of a Deity, and almost quite ignorant of the eternal reward; so were they superstitious in their Worship, and sometimes ignorantly erected Altars to an unknown God. Their Worship was attended with a great deal of external pomp, was very grateful to their external senses; but it reached not the Heart. But the Christian rule instructs us to worship God in Spirit, and prescribes the best method of devotion: It requires that We worship and bow before the Lord our maker, with all possible humility and reverence; that we possess our Hearts with the greatness and glory of that Majesty we adore; that we be intent in our devotion, and not suffer s•nlar concerns to intrude and interrupt us; that we act faith upon him, and believe that he is a rewarder of those that diligently seek him; and that we approach the throne of grace in the Name of the Lord Jesus Christ.

If Devotion were not a duty, yet methinks the advantages thereof should invite us to the performance: But since God has coupled our duty and interest together, how amazing is it to think we should so neglect it? How many attractives are there to approach his presence, who dwells in light unaccessible? Have we not a multitude of sins to confess? many wants we would fain have suppli'd? How many temptations does every place present? How numerous are the dangers and accidents to which we lie open? and should not all these excite us to render homage to that omnipotent power, which alone can guard us from inconveniences? But besides our dangers we are freed from, the mercies and favors he daily confers upon us, the fresh communications of his bounty every morning, nay minute, require at least a return of praise, and a grateful acknowledgment. But yet alas! in spite of all these inducements, how is Devotion contemned by some, and neglected by most?

But I dare not enlarge now on the particular Branches of Holiness, nor insist in the recommendation of every particular duty, lest I seem to digress from my proper subject. I shall therefore proceed to the other two Branches of Holiness, namely, those duties that respect ourselves and others.

As to the first, we are by the perfect rule of Holiness instructed to live soberly, to be moderate in all things, and to shun every kind of excess, as equally hurtful to Soul and Body: it forbids complacency in those lusts that war against both; restrains all irregular and impetuous inclinations; retrenches all inordinate desires, the first motions to forbidden objects, and, in a word, enjoins all those virtues which respect either our Bodies or Souls.

For those that respect our Bodies, how straitly is chastity commanded? For this is the will of God, even your sanctification, that ye should abstain from fornication, 1 Thes. 4.3. We are urged with the most affectionate earnestness, to abstain from the very first motions to forbidden objects, from the polluted glances and wanton lascivious speeches that are windows at which uncleanness enters; and that by such invincible and cogent arguments, as might prove effectual with men who but consider what they do; Lust being a Vice mischievous to the body, Prov. 7.26. hurtful to the Soul, Prov. 6.32. casting an everlasting stain upon a man's good Name, Prov. 6.33. undoing his Substance, Prov. 6.26. Job 31.12. and that which finally excludes from the Kingdom of Heaven, where nothing that pollutes can enter, 2 Cor. 6.9. Rev. 21.27.

'Tis indeed no wonder though the Religion of the Gentiles, which contained a prodigious mixture of vanity and impiety, gratified the inclinations of uncleanness: for if we consult their writings, we shall observe, that the most abominable vice wanted not a Deity to patronize it amongst them; which upon the matter was an establishing iniquity by Law, and an argument more sufficient to encourage than to correct vice: And although the Writings of some Philosophers have been more refined, yet the Lives even of such were full of the foulest actions. Nay, the rules which the best Masters of Morality amongst them prescribed, never reached to the purifying of the Heart.

I confess, that man that shall take notice (and who, having eyes in his head, can avoid this, when men proclaim their sin like Sodom?) of the prodigious uncleanness this profane age has arrived at, shall be strongly tempted to suspect the purity of the Christian Rule, if he make no farther enquiry than to the practices of most that are called Christians. We may indeed very aptly write to the professors of this age, as the great Apostle did to the Church of Corinth: It is reported commonly that there is fornication among you, and such fornication as is not so much as named amongst the Gentiles, 1 Cor. 5.1. And I am a little afraid, if the Church should strictly observe that charge that the Apostle gives there, and excommunicate all such wicked persons, that our Church should not need to brag much of the number of Christians.

'Tis indeed matter of great sadness, to consider how much the Christian Religion has suffered, upon the account of the scandalous practices of Titular Christians; and I make no doubt but this age has been at more pains than any that precedes it, to increase the scandal: but sure 'tis but a silly artifice to challenge the exactness of the Rule, and with Celsus impudently allege that the Christian Religion encourageth men to the practice of immorality and vice; since of all Religions, the Christian only can produce the strictest Laws against all filthiness of flesh and spirit. 'Tis a Doctrine, as the blessed Apostle tells us, according to godliness, and lays undispensible obligations upon its followers, both to think upon, and to do, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are of good report, and suchlike things, which being general, include all particulars; and yet it doth not only prescribe general rules, but descendeth to the commanding of all particular virtues, and the equal prohibition of particular vices.

Next to Chastity, we might discourse largely of the commendation of Moderation in eating and drinking, and show that the excess of both is condemned, as being mean and ignoble; that it is the true cause of many loathsome diseases, is attended with a prodigious multitude of temporal evils, Prov. 23.22. and threatened with lasting & eternal torments hereafter. Hence our Royal Master fails not to exhort his Disciples, to Take heed to themselves, lest at any time they be overcharged with surfeiting and drunkenness, Luke 21.34. And one of his blessed Apostles tells us, that Drunkards shall not inherit the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6.10. And indeed, daily experience puts it beyond all doubt, that those ignoble sins naturally tend to impoverish men, and fully verify the wise man's prediction, That the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty, Prov. 23.21.

But passing those virtues that concern our Bodies, I come now to consider those that adorn our Souls; and I shall confine my discourse to those which are the peculiar graces of Christians, and which the Christian rule does more particularly recommend: Such as Humility, Meekness, Contentment, and Self-denial.

If we enquire narrowly into the Lives of Heathen Philosophers, we shall find their pride and vain-glory stained the best of their actions. Self-denial was a virtue never taught in their Schools; and for Contentment, the rules they prescribed were but ineffectual to recommend it.

But the Gospel couples our Duty and Interest together; it commands Humility, and recommends its advantages and alluring attractives. It discovers the dangers that attend Pride; and the great folly of being vain of Beauty, Strength, Wit, Riches, Honors, or Preferments: Of all these I may use the Apostle's phrase, 'Tis not expedient doubtless for men to glory, 2 Cor. 12.7. Are not these the free gifts of Divine goodness? and what can be more unreasonable than for dependent creatures to be proud?

Humility is indeed so amiable, so endearing dearing a quality and so noble an embellishment of our nature, that where this is wanting, all other advantages are little regarded; and not only men, but the great God also resists the proud, it being a vice which, besides Christianity, Morality also condemns, as universally unbecoming to Humane nature; and that which not only disturbs ones self, but also disquiets whole societies: But God gives grace to the humble; he takes such persons into favor, as being more pliable to receive the impress of his love.

And as a humble, so also a meek and quiet spirit is in the sight of God of great price. And can there be a more convincing motive than this, to recommend meekness to Christians? And indeed we cannot pretend to be the Disciples of holy Jesus, if we refuse to learn that lesson he hath copied out to us, Matth. 11.29. Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart.

Although a calm and quiet spirit is a reward to itself, as every virtue is; yet it wants not a claim to a temporal felicity also, Matth. 5.5. Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth. These be the persons to whom by right of promise this stately Fabric of earth belongs. And if we now view that unpleasant vice of Anger opposite to it, this will yet add more to its luster, and help to recommend it the more effectually. Anger being such an unpleasant humor, that it makes those men it possesses unfit for human society, it being not unfitly defined by the Poet to be a short madness; which indeed agrees very well with the Wise man's verdict of it, Eccl. Anger rests in the bosom of fools. If then men would but compare the calm and happy serenity of Meekness, with that inward and outward trouble and disquietment that is the effect of Anger, they could not but esteem the one, and declaim against the other.

In the next place, our Christian rule recommends Contentment as the most precious Jewel in the Saints Diadem; 'tis that noble ingredient that makes the most bitter cup sweet and pleasant: it renders things, otherwise unsavory and burthensome, to be indeed relishing and easy. This is it that seasons the meanest meal; makes a dish of herbs a feast, and a cup of cold water please the palate: This is that virtue which makes men in the midst of storms represent a calm, and in the saddest circumstances to sing sweetly. He who has learned St. Paul's lesson how to want, and how to abound, is not discomposed either by Prosperity or Adversity; but in both cases can behave himself like a man in reason. This is it which is inseparably connected with Godliness, is the same thing expressed by different names. This is a virtue so lovely and desirable, attended with so many advantages, that we have all imaginable encouragements to hearken to the Apostles advice, Heb. 13.5. Be content with such things as ye have; and in the evil day to heed that advice Christ gives his Disciples, to possess our souls with patience.

But how disquieting and tormenting are its contraries? Ambition makes men restless in raising their own value and esteem above others; it prompts them to be always in dislike with their own present condition; the least advancement of others above them, gnaws and torments their spirits, and oftentimes hurries them headlong to the greatest dangers. Murmuring is a most fretting evil, a most painful distemper, a sin attended with the most dangerous consequents, and which imbittereth the happiest state of life here. Envy is a vice nothing less criminal, attended with as dismal effects as any, as the Apostle St. James tells, Jam. 3.16. Where envying and strife is, there is confusion and every evil work. And lastly, Covetousness is so mean and ignoble a vice, that I think although it were not (as the Apostle describes it) the root of all evil; yet gallant spirits should dislike it, as being base and contemptible.

In the last place, the Gospel recommends Self-denial as the Christians peculiar Character: If any man (says our Master Christ) will come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me: And this precept he backs with the most powerful incitement; For whosoever will save his life shall lose it, and whosoever will lose his life for my sake, shall find it, Mat. 16.24, 25. I doubt not but flesh and blood will cry out, as once Christ's own Disciples did in another case, This is a hard saying, who can bear it? 'Tis indeed no small matter to bring down the carnal part of man to submit to the loss of Relations, Interest, and Life: But since the advantage and danger of both cases is so clearly revealed, what fools will men prove, if to gain this life, they lose the recompense of a better reward?

As the rule of Holiness does thus instruct us in those duties that concern ourselves; so it also teacheth us how to carry towards others. And in the first place, it recommends the Royal Law of love, as the spring and source of all other duties, Rom. 13.9. If there be any other commandment, 'tis briefly comprehended in this saying, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself. This, for its excellency and comprehensiveness, is said to be the fulfilling of the Law, as those who neglect it are said to sin against the Law.

Now if this rule of Charity were well• observed, it would help to correct, first all undue Thoughts and Wishes. Secondly, all injurious Words and Speeches. And thirdly, all unjust Actions and Dealings towards our Neighbors.

First, it would very much conduce to the regulating of our wishes, and to the keeping of our minds in a meek and peaceable temper towards others. Charity, if sincere, is a noble and generou• virtue, which believeth and hopeth the best of all men: It thinketh no evil, as the Apostle amongst many of its other good properties observeth, 2 Cor. 13.5. It eradicates and supplants all censoriou• thoughts, and is incompatible with those tormenting passions of Malice and Revenge, which, as the Wise man describes, suffer not men to sleep except they have done mischief, Prov. 4.16.

And indeed this is but the least part of a Christians duty, 'tis but an evidence of the lowest degree of Charity, to retrench those irregular and undue wishes, which oftentimes do more prejudice to ourselves than others: If it be sincere, it will have a further and more important influence; it will help us to govern our tongues also, that we may, as the great Apostle adviseth us, speak evil of no man, Tit. 3.2. to lay aside all malice, and all guile and hypocrisy, and evil speaking, 1 Pet. 2.1. and according to this precept did primitive Christians walk.

But alas! we have degenerated in nothing more conspicuously from their practice than in this: In place of their love, we have substituted an industrious search into the iniquities of others, Psal. 64.4. and have fully verified the Apostles description of the tongue, Jam. 3.8. that it is an unruly evil which no man can tame, a world of iniquity that sets the whole creation on fire.

Neither Majesty nor innocence can now guard against its darts; its malignity reacheth through all the earth; nay indeed it were good if it were bounded by this. May not the Majesty of Heaven resume that same complaint he expresseth Mal. 3.14. Your words have been stout against me; and charge the profane Atheists of this age, for opening their mouths against the Heavens?

As for Innocency, although it is truly in itself a strong fence, yet it cannot escape the assaults of a licentious tongue: but with the Psalmist may complain; Behold, they belch out with their mouths, swords are in their lips, Psal. 56.7. and I think there are few men so happy, who cannot with the same holy man regret, They lay to my charge things I know not: but how much this violates all the obligations of Charity, and Justice also, every man's reason will easily instruct him.

To secure men from being culpable in this, it were enough only to represent the meanness of it: but as a more noble enforcement, the Gospel prescribes the strictest rules against it, Matth. 7.1, 2. Judge not, that ye be not judged; for with what judgment ye judge, ye shall be judged. A sentence which methinks should even strike terror in the consciences of the guilty; and sure if men would but mind their own concern and interest, they should more attentively hearken to the counsel of the Apostle, Eph. 4.31, 32. Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking, be put away from you, with all malice. And be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another, even as God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you.

But our love must not consist in word only, but in deed and in truth, as the blessed Apostle exhorts the primitive Christians, 1 Joh. 3.18. It is a vain thing to pretend love, when we refuse to evidence it by our deeds: If a brother or sister be naked, and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be you warmed, and filled, notwithstanding ye give them not those things which are needful to the body, what doth it profit? Jam. 2.15, 16. We must make our actions and dealings the test whereby we may evidence our love, otherwise the sincerity of it may be justly suspected; and therefore in the first place we must actually endeavor to supply the wants of our indigent Brethren: This is above all things recommended to Christians, 1 Pet. 4.8. especially to those who have received a large allowance of outward blessings, v. 10. and it is noted as an evidence that the love of God dwelleth not in those persons, who having this worlds goods, shut up their bowels of compassion from those that have need, 1 Joh. 3.17. Alas! little do men know how quickly the balance may change; how soon the richest may be in poverty, and stand in need of that supply that they now in the days of their plenty deny others: the instances to prove this, are more numerous than that they can be doubted, or need to be related.

Indeed the performance of this duty passeth not without a temporal reward; God, who accounts it a lending to himself, hath promised to repay it; and sure there cannot be better security than his promise. And I question not but all ages can attest the truth of what the wise man observeth, Prov. 11 24. There is that scattereth, and yet increaseth; and there is that withholdeth more than is meet, but it tendeth to poverty.

*I confess, I know no virtue more becoming a Christian than Charity, and scarce anymore scandalously neglected; and I am sorry to think that those good men who compassionate the wants of the indigent, should be so unworthily scandalized, as if they were but lukewarm Protestants, and established the Popish Merit: but this is a piece of madness I shall rather pity than inveigh against; and although I be no friend to merit, yet I cannot but speak honourably of those whose charity and good works make them lovely in the sight of God, who has accounted it pure religion and undefiled, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, Jam. 1.27.*

In the next place, the Christian rule requires Justice in our intercourse and commerce, and that in our dealings we be exactly conscientious, according to that great rule of equity, Matth. 7.12. All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them; for this is the law and the prophets. Injustice is a vice so mean and ignoble, that I cannot but admire how great men should court it: and if men would but actuate their Reasons, I am sure they should never become guilty of that which, if charged with, they cannot patiently endure, nor be reconciled with the persons which freely reprove them. There is no man, I think, that would be satisfied to be called a Cheat; and is it not unreasonable to think they shall evite this character who practice injustice?

The great bait and allurement to Injustice, is gain and advantage; but how visibly hath Almighty God by a wise providence defeated men's designs in this! There is (as Eliphaz observed) a fire that consumeth the tabernacles of bribery, Job 15.34. and as the wise man tells us, An inheritance may be gotten hastily at the beginning, but the end thereof shall not be blessed, Prov. 20.21.

Thirdly, The Christian rule is a most compendious and complete directory to men in every station and place: Parents and Children, Masters and Servants, Husband and Wife may from hence learn their duty▪ As it gives no encouragement to Tyrants, so neither does it allow Rebellion in Subjects; but condemns it as a sin heinous and unnatural. But I cannot stand to enlarge upon every particular duty; only I shall infer, that from the accomplishment of those duties enjoined by the Christian rule, is formed that Holiness I would fain persuade men to follow.

To put a close to this Chapter, it will not, I think, be amiss to show, that the Christian rule of Holiness is the most noble and most excellent that was ever extant; that it far excels the Schemes of Morality drawn by the best and most celebrated Masters of Pagan Philosophy, and is more comprehensive and effectual to form men to true Holiness than the Mosaical Law.

I confess, the Heathen Religion does not in the least deserve to be compared with the Christian, no more (I may say, much less) than the light of the dimmest Candle should be compared with the Sun in its brightness, when all mists and clouds are dispelled. It were indeed too great an honor to name the Alcoran with the New Testament; the one being corrupt and imperfect, the other pure and perfect in its tendency, designing to make men truly virtuous and holy.

If we view the rules which the best and most refined Moralists prescribed, we shall find much Brass amongst their Gold, many things exceedingly faulty, which, instead of forbidding, encouraged many foul Vices. Thus concerning piety towards God, what unbecoming thoughts did they entertain of him? They changed (as the Apostle to the Romans observes) the glory of an incorruptible God into an Image made like corruptible man, Rom. 1.23. and in those moral duties that concerned themselves and others, it were easy to show how miserably they failed. The famous Peripatetick pleaded for the revenging of Injuries: The divine Plato allowed the community of Wives: The strict Stoics patronized the lawfulness of Self-murder; and thus professing themselves to be wise, they became fools.

And yet (to the shame of Christians) how conspicuous was the moral gallantry of the Romans! how famous and glorious are they esteemed for their Justice and Constancy in friendship by all succeeding ages! their virtue did conquer respect and esteem from their Enemies, and made them beloved by those who feared their power. And here I cannot but take notice of St. Augustine's commendation of the old Romans: Because God (says he) would not bestow Heaven upon the Romans, they being Pagans, he bestowed the Empire of the world upon them, because they were virtuous.

And yet the best rules those Illustrious Heroes and Law-givers taught, are not comparable to the Laws of Christianity, upon these three accounts. First, the Pagan Law is deficient in many things, and many particular Laws mightily tend to the promoting of vice; their Law-givers being ignorant of the introduction of sin, never made any precepts against the first motions to forbidden objects. Secondly, those good Laws they taught, are more clearly revealed in the Gospel, Which hath brought life and immortality to light. As the Gospel commands only such things that are good, and forbids only vice; so it more conspicuously manifests what is good, that we may do it, and what is evil, that we may evite it. The good Laws that Epaminondas in Thebes, Lycurgus in Lacedemon, and Aristides in Athens taught, are in the Gospel-Economy more excellently confirmed; and we are now undoubtedly secured, that we do well in observing what is commanded, and in abstaining from what is prohibited; which Numa Pompilius, Marcus Antonius, and all the Law-givers either of Greece or Rome, could never be fully ascertained of. Thirdly, we have better encouragements and inducements to obey the Gospel-precepts, than any other Religion prescribes. The best motive to virtue amongst the Heathens was, that virtue is a reward to itself; that it is the means to be celebrated by after-ages, and such-like; which were but insignificant encouragements, if compared with the eternal and unspeakably glorious reward which Christianity holds forth, and those severe threatenings by which it secures its Laws; of which I shall speak anon.

As for the Mosaical Law, which, next to the Christian, is the most exact and incomparable, there are three reasons why it is not to be compared with, it being so far exceeded by the Gospel. First, the Mosaical dispensation is not unfitly called by the great Apostle, A law of a carnal commandment, Heb. 7.16. and A law which made nothing perfect, v. 19. but the Gospel, which is there called the bringing in of a better hope, is more spiritual and refined; and Jesus is said to be a surety of a better covenant, v. 22. So that we may argue as the Apostle in the 11th verse of that cited Chapter doth: If therefore perfection were by the Levitical Priesthood, (for under it the people received the Law) what further need was there that another Priest should arise? I confess, the legal Sacrifices did shadow forth the satisfaction of Christ's; but yet I make no doubt but we may now understand the intent and meaning of all those Types much better than they could. Secondly, the Ceremonial Law, as it was very burthensome, so did it chiefly tend to make the observers thereof externally righteous, and did not so strongly enforce the purifying of the heart. As for the Moral Law, the Christian rule as it does as strictly enjoin it, so it does much more powerfully excite men to the performance of it, promising not a temporal but a eternal reward. Thirdly, the Mosaical dispensation did indulge many practices which the Christian rule justly condemns; such as Polygamy and Divorce, and several Marriages allowed by no other Law: and indeed the whole contexture of the Jewish Religion seems to be only calculate as it did well correspond with the humor and genius of that people, and could not therefore be a general Law, agreeing with, and well temperate to the inclinations and humors of all Nations, as the Christian rule is.

Any man that shall compare the Jewish Religion with the Christian, shall be easily convinced that this does more effectually conduce to the purifying of us from all filthiness both of the flesh and of the spirit than the former; and that of all the Schemes of Religion that ever were published, none does deserve to be paralleled with Christianity; nor can adopt to them that noble character the great Apostle gives of the Gospel, Rom. 1.16. That it is the power of God to salvation.

CHAP. III. Motives and inducements to the practice of Holiness.

AS the naked proposal and representation of an excellent and beautiful object, is motive enough to excite our love, and draw out our affections to it: so methinks Holiness, which of all things is the most noble, most excellent, and the most lovely, should, even abstracted from the considerations of its utility and advantages, conquer our esteem, But God knows how much our depraved natures in this lapsed estate stand in need of encouragements to excite us to our duty; and I wish common experience did not make it too certain, that all motives are little enough to form us to Holiness.

In the former Chapters I have only laid a foundation to this: for I thought it fit to tell men what I understand by Holiness, before I should excite them to it. In this dark age of the world we want not instances (God knows, too many) of men's too frequent mistaking vice for virtue; to prevent which error, it was thought necessary to show men their duty; and having done this, the next thing I proposed, was to lay down several motives and inducements to engage men to the practice of Holiness, founded solely upon this, that all those endearing arguments that prevail with us to perform any duty or action relating to our secular concerns, do more powerfully oblige us to be holy.

This is, I confess, a subject which for its nobleness deserves a better judgment, a more clear wit, and a more enlivened and quick fancy to handle it than I can pretend to: yet if I can but prevail with others to perfect what I have begun, I shall not think I have much mis-employed my time in writing this Discourse.

This Chapter is like to be somewhat disproportionable to the rest in length, it being at first the only designed subject to be discoursed on; I shall therefore divide it into several Sections.

SECT. 1. The Noble Pattern of Holiness.

The great inclination of Mankind to Imitation, gave ground (I doubt not) to that old Maxim, Plus docent exempla quàm praecepta; our depraved natures are very apt to contemn Precepts, and to court forbidden objects: The tie of a Commandment is become (by our increased guilt) too weak to bind us to our duty, & is made as light of as Sampson made of those ropes with which he was bound before his locks were cut. But O what a secret and powerful influence have Examples on the spirits of men! I have seen Servants and Children who have contemned Commands, yet shamed to their duty by the Example of their Masters and Parents. The courage and valor of a Captain, proves frequently more powerful to inspire inferior Soldiers, than the most forcible injunctions and helps to make even cowards stout; whileas a timorous Commander disheartens the bravest Soldiers, and by his flight will make them who feared no danger turn their backs.

Common experience makes it past doubt, that the patrociny and example of great men is enough to render anything fashionable. We daily have proofs of this before our eyes: nay, so powerful do examples sometimes prove, that not only the silly modes and gestures of men have been imitated, but also their natural imperfections, as Nero's wry Neck was at Rome. It is the Poets observation:

Upon which account, I heartily wish the Nobles and Great men of this age would illustrate Holiness by their Examples; and I doubt not but contemned Holiness should be as fashionable as they have now made Vice by their patrociny. In sacred Writ we read, that when the Rulers of Judah and Israel were religious, and examples of Virtue, that the whole people imitated their footsteps, and worshipped the Lord God of their Fathers: But when the Rulers became patrons of Vice, then the whole people sacrificed in the high places, and worshipped their Calves at Dan and Bethel.

It is indeed a case that well deserves to be regretted with floods of tears, that the footsteps of those who transgress should prove more efficacious and effectual, and have a greater influence on men, than the presidents of good men: but more lamentable is it, that despised virtue lies like the contemned ashes on the level, and has so few to raise up its esteem by their examples.

And now, seeing Examples have so much force, methinks I hear the Captain of our salvation saying, as Abimelech said to the men that were with him, Judge. 9.48. Make haste, and do as I have done. Christ Jesus hath by his example taught us our duty, 1 Pet. 1.15, 16. As he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written, Be ye holy as I am holy. Upon which account we are seriously exhorted in Scripture to look unto Jesus, and to walk as he walked; and can any consideration more abundantly serve to inspirit and excite us to live holy, than this? Methinks our having so brave an example should provoke us to follow his footsteps, who did no sin, neither was guile found in his mouth.

There are two chief reasons that greatly prevail with us to imitate other examples. First, the dignity and greatness of the person. Secondly, Interest and advantage. Now both these motives should most powerfully prevail with us to make Christ the copy of our lives: For first, if we consider the dignity and worth of his person, is he not the Son of the living God, who in the days of his humiliation thought it no robbery to be called equal with God? He was not a person of a mean and low extraction, how meanly soever he lived here, but one of extraordinary worth, who by partaking of human nature elevated it to the highest degree of honor: He was not only the chiefest among stten thousands, but the delight of Heaven and Earth, before whom the Princes of the Earth must appear, and the great men, to give him an account of their works. And as for Interest, I shall afterwards make it plain, that we in nothing more cross our advantage, than in walking contrary to Christ.

But alas! how little are we moved by this noble president to mind Holiness? how seldom do we express in our actions the virtues of our spiritual King? although there is nothing more rational, more equitable and just, than to follow his footsteps who hath called us to his Kingdom and Glory; nothing more honorable, nor can advance our happiness more, than to be conform to the image of Christ; yet in opposition to the most endearing encouragements, we have as much set at naught his example, as Herod and his men of war did his person, Luke 23.11. Alas! what tears are sufficient to express and set forth this exceeding great madness and insolvency?

Methinks I hear our blessed Prince speaking thus in his own vindication: Ye unwise and foolish sons of men, how long will ye prefer imperfect and ignoble patterns to one that is every whit perfect and complete? In your secular concerns ye judge more rationally, prove a thousand times wiser; for who amongst you does not make diligent enquiry for the most exact pattern, that ye may conform what ye design according to it? but in matters of everlasting moment, how careless, how negligent and foolish do ye prove? If I had not been held forth as the most desirable copy, as a pattern most accommodate to your state, your case had been more tolerable; but since you can pretend no rational excuse for your rejecting of me, Behold, ye despisers, wonder and perish.

I confess, our blessed Prince performed many extraordinary and miraculous actions, which could have no other author but one invested with omnipotency; and although we cannot, are not required to set Christ as our president in these, as likewise in many other special actions he performed, as his fasting forty days, &c. yet even these we are called to admire; and must in so far imitate, as they were expressions of his great charity and kindness to men, and of his trust and dependancy upon his Heavenly Father. But as for those moral actions he performed, we are extremely culpable if we do not make him our pattern, if we walk not as he walked: And it is sure the most unaccountable thing that can be, to profess ourselves to be his Disciples, and to despise the lessons he hath copied out to us.

The whole life of Christ being one continued lecture of Holiness, presents to our view a large field to discourse upon: but my intended brevity will not allow me to mention all those particular actions and virtues of his, which we ought to imitate. I shall therefore contract my discourse to those more remarkable instances, wherein we should industriously endeavor to imitate the holy Jesus in his spirit and actions: and sure there cannot be a more powerful motive to form us to holiness than his most excellent life, which is a pattern absolutely perfect, and designed as a fair copy after which we should write.

In the first place, our blessed Leader (for so he is called, Isa. 55.4.) hath by his precept, as well as his practice, enjoined us to learn meekness and humility of him, Mat. 11.29. Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart. Throughout the whole course of his life he did evidence a spirit full of calmness and quietness. If we trace his footsteps from the Cradle to the Cross, we shall not find him either by his words or actions discovering the least expression of wrath, or revenge; but the most admirable disposition of gentleness and meekness, even then when his insulting Enemies endeavored to cast upon him the most ignominious affronts. We read, Numb. 12.3. of Moses his great meekness; but how was he once and again transported with passion! but never did our meek Jesus, by the most insufferable abuses he received, ever discover a discomposed spirit. Isa. 53.7. He was oppressed, and he was afflicted, yet he opened not his mouth: he is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth. He did indeed frequently meet with extraordinary provocations to anger; but yet how sweet were his reproofs? when the Samaritans refused to receive him. Luke 9.53. he did not treat them with contumelious speeches, nor revenge himself upon them, although he could have done it with ease; but being desired by his exasperated Disciples to call for fire from Heaven to consume them, he rebuked their revengeful motion with The Son of man is not come to destroy men's lives, but to save them. It would be too prolix a business to instance the several examples of his Gentleness and Meekness; only let us view the last scene of his life, where we shall behold lively instances to confirm this. When he did find his three Disciples, whom he had commanded to watch, sleeping, he did not upbraid them for their negligence, but gently asks them, What, could not ye watch with me one hour? and when he was treacherously accosted by his own Disciple, who became leader to a great multitude who came out with Swords and Staves to apprehend him, with what astonishing mildness did he entertain this Traitor, who had the impudence to betray him with a kiss? Friend, wherefore art thou come? Mat. 26.50. or, as another of the Evangelists expresseth it, Judas, betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss? This was all the hard language he treated him with. And after he was apprehended, with what horrid contumelies and affronts did his barbarous Enemies entertain him? they did spit in his face, and buffet him; (the highest affronts imaginable) they stripped him of his ordinary clothes, and put upon him a fools robe, and a Crown of Thorns; and being thus disguised, they expose him to the mockery and contempt of the Spectators. Notwithstanding of all which, he opened not his mouth; but with a most sedate and serene temper he received all these abuses, as the Apostle Peter expresseth it, 1 Pet. 2.23. When he was reviled he reviled not again, when he suffered he threatened not, but committed himself to him that judgeth righteously.

Meekness, I confess, is so noble a virtue, accompanied with so many admirable and charming advantages, that it needs (as one would think) but few words to recommend it to men; but no argument is like to prevail more with generous minds, than the example of so excellent and perfect a Pattern. Sure I am, it is the most unaccountable thing imaginable, for the Disciples of so meek a Master to be of a disposition and temper quite opposite to his.

But as his meekness, so is his humility also recommended to our imitation: As he was of a meek, so also of a lowly spirit. His first appearance upon earth was but mean and despicable; he was born (as the Scripture informs us) in a low estate, more fit for the meanest of his Disciples, than for so great a Prince. He was not brought forth in some stately Palace, nor born in a Chamber curiously decked, but in a vile Stable where the brute beasts had their residence. Nay, after he had discovered himself by his illustrious works to be a great Prophet, the true Messiah who enlighteneth everyone that cometh into the world, yet how humbly did he walk! his Companions he did choose were but mean Fishermen; his Occupation and Employment was no ways honorable; and his Revenues were but small, as he himself did testify, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air nests, but the Son of man hath not where he may lay his head.

Although his descent and extraction was incomparably great, yet he rather endeavored to conceal than to brag of it; and so humble was he, that he chose rather to attribute the praise of his admired works to his Father, than take the honor of them to himself, Joh. 8.28. I do nothing of myself, but as my Father hath taught me I speak these things.

He was not ambitious of Rule and Government, but modestly refused to be a Ruler and Judge. Nay, when the multitude thought to make him a King, he shunned their society by an invisible removal, it being quite contrary to his design in coming into the world, (as he tells us, Matth. 20.28.) he came not to be ministered unto, but to minister. And to correct the insolent pride and ambition of his followers, how did he stoop to wash his Disciples feet! a most admirable evidence of his lowliness of spirit.

And now since our great Lord and Master did so wonderfully debase himself to the form of a Servant; since in all his actions he did manifest that he was meek and lowly, how prodigiously incongruous is it for those who profess themselves to be his Disciples to be proud and lofty?

I confess, Humility is a grace well becoming our state as creatures; we are but dependent beings, having life and motion, and all those endowments we are proud of, from the Father of spirits, from whom every good gift cometh. The fresh communications of his love we constantly participate of, are freely bestowed; which he may therefore, when he thinks fit, with an equal freedom and ease remove, without being guilty of injuring us.

Humility is that peculiar grace that qualifies and fits us to receive the divine aid and assistance; as the Apostle St. James tells us, he gives grace to the humble. Upon which account we may with the Wise man well conclude: Better is it to be of an humble spirit with the lowly, than to divide the spoil with the proud, Prov. 16.19.

I doubt not but every considering man will find his own Reason suggest a sufficient store of arguments to confute the imperious assaults of Pride and Ambition: but methinks none can more powerfully prevail with ingenuous spirits, than the consideration of Christ's humility: with this how effectually may he repel every temptation to pride, by saying, Was my Master lowly of spirit, and does it become me to be proud?

Thirdly, Christ is also set forth as our Pattern in his sufferings: If when ye do well (saith the Apostle) and suffer for it ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God; for even hitherto were ye called: for Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that we should follow his steps, &c. 1 Pet. 2.20, 21. &c. Heb. 12.1, 2. His patience under his sufferings was very admirable: for although he was flouted and contemned by his unworthy creatures, was exposed to the base outrages of scandalous sinners, was made a spectacle, set at naught, spit upon, and smitten by unworthy worms, whom with a word he could have easily dashed into nothing; in a word, though he endured all that malice could invent, suffered the worst of temporal evils, and became obedient to the cursed death of the cross; yet notwithstanding, how patiently did he endure the contradiction of sinners? how entirely did he submit to his Fathers Will? Although he was extremely sensible of the weight of his sufferings, yet he did not in the least evidence any revengeful mind in the midst of his extreme tortures, but sweetly recommended his soul into his Fathers hands. And now can any motive more effectually convince us to suffer patiently?

But God knows how much we set at naught this president: fain would we enjoy a continual prosperity, a life of ease, without the least mixture or allay of trouble. When we meet with anything that imbitters our condition, like the murmuring Israelites, we fret and repine, and our spirits begin to boil with rage and discontent; we cannot endure to have our pleasures impaired, but Jonah-like we are discontented, and ready to say, we do well to be angry: we aggravate the most minute trouble with imagined circumstances, and are ready to say, Come, behold and see if there be any affliction like mine. And although we are assured that our repinings cannot remove or lighten our burden, cannot give us the least ease or relief; yet we never rest till those puddled streams be stirred up. Our grumblings are almost inseparable concomitants of our sufferings; and if our Father smite us, we begin to accuse his love and tenderness, notwithstanding he hath instructed us that whom he loveth he chasteneth.

If we meet with reproaches, our revenge is on the wing; the least affront kindles this unsanctified fire: No arguments can tame our Fury; no president proves effectual to form our Souls to true patience. If we drink of the waters of Marah, we complain of their bitterness, & like foolish Children, think we are hardly dealt with.

And although impatience enflames rather than allays the distemper, though it augments the degrees of our trouble, and disables us to bear the stroke of Adversity; yet we will not be persuaded to a calm and quiet submission to the Divine Will. Though impatience exasperates the pain, yet we think we do well to be angry. If we meet with injuries, our appetite of revenge is stirred up; flesh and blood we say cannot endure such affronts; we imagine it stains our Reputation and Honor in the world, and is degenerate and servile.

Thus do we sew Fig-leaves to cover our nakedness; but the all-seeing God knows that all these repinings are arrows directed against his Providence; otherwise we should with the Royal Psalmist say, I will not open my mouth, for thou didst it. To this impregnable Fortress he had his recourse, when causelessly cursed and reviled by Shimei: it was this that silenced old Eli, It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good: he durst not quarrel at the message, but quietly he submits. There is a secret Providence which doth overrule the most terrible accidents, and is not accountable to human Reason. All those calamities and sufferings we undergo, are ordered by infinite Counsel; and in repining at such dispensations, we indirectly blame Almighty Goodness and Wisdom.

Is it fit and congruous that God should take measures from men in his Economy of the World? is it reasonable that the whole course of things should be put out of order, to satisfy every private man's humor? can there be any greater madness, than to prescribe rules of Government to infinite Wisdom? Why then are we dissatisfied with our adverse state? why do we repine and complain?

If we did indeed compare our Mercies with our Sufferings, our Receipts with our Merits, or our Condition with that of some others, we could not but be convinced of our folly: but we still pore upon the sore; all our thoughts are taken up and in exercise about our affliction: if we would deal rationally, let us view the sufferings of our blessed Redeemer, and see if we dare make a contrary conclusion to that of the Apostle, 1 Pet. 4.1. Forasmuch then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, let us arm our selves likewise with the same mind: He suffered patiently and calmly for us; and it is but reasonable that Servants imitate their Master, and suffer the disasters they meet with, with the same mind that he did; that being thus made conform to our head, we may be also partakers with him of his joy.

'Tis indeed an unchild-like behavior, to quarrel at the dispensations of our Heavenly Father: Alas! all we merit by our sins, is stripes and chastisements; and it is of the Lord's mercy that we are not consumed: sure many who have offended less, have been justly sent to everlasting burnings, do now dwell with devouring flames; and why should a living man complain? it were certainly more rational to be humbled for the evil that occasioned the rod, that our present misery may not be the prelude to more lasting torments. Nay, there is nothing that more offends God, that is more contrary to the pattern set before us, than to murmur and repine; let us therefore study to bear the resemblance of our eldest Brother, that our Heavenly Father may acknowledge us for his Children.

In the next place, Christ's obedience to the Will of his Father, is set forth as our president; and can anything more powerfully persuade us to obedience than his example? which not only discovers our duty, but also inspirits and enables us to perform it. If the marvelous pattern of Christ's entire obedience does not form our wills to do what God enjoins, I scarce know any argument that will prove effectual.

And now, how serious was our Lord Christ in dispatching that business his Father entrusted him with? The work that his Father gave him to do he finished it, Joh. 17.4. and he testifieth of himself, That he did always those things that pleased his Father, Joh. 8.29. and that he might more emphatically express this, he tells us, Joh. 4.34. My meat is to do the will of him that sent me, and to finish his work: and indeed, in that he so entirely resigned the whole power of his Will to his Father, Not my will, but thy will be done, we have the most unquestionable proof of his perfect obedience. He was, as the great Apostle tells us, Obedient to the death of the Cross, submitted to the most dreadful sufferings, that he might instruct us to keep his commandments, even as he kept his Fathers commandments, Joh. 15.10. and that the same mind be in us that was in him.

But God knows how little we regard either his Precepts or Examples: for although our great Master has made his obedience our rule, yet how ready are we to despise it, if in the least it cross our humors or carnal interest? Alas! little do we consider, that obedience is essentially necessary in order to our supreme happiness; and that torments, as severe and intolerable as they are lasting, are the lot of the disobedient.

It were to be wished that the rebellious posterity of Adam would but seriously ponder what they will be able to say in the great day of Audit. Sure I am, the whole Contexture and Harmony of the divine Precepts and Doctrines are equitable and just, and therefore call for our hearty compliance with them. The wise God never issued out any Command which could not be obeyed; He is not like the Egyptian Task-masters, to require Brick while there is no Straw. Nay, indeed, our duty and interest are coupled together so closely, that if we disobey and rebel, we may thank ourselves for the misery we have chosen.

And as his obedience is set before us for imitation, so is his Love, Charity, and Compassion also. His whole life was spent in doing good to men: how transcendent is, his love in pitying us in our degenerate and forlorn estate? when we were at odds with Heaven, and incapable to help ourselves, then, even then, did he commiserate our case, and by his own Blood reconciled us to the Father. It is the greatest demonstration of love imaginable, for a man to lay down his life for his friend, Joh. 15.13. and yet more wonderful was the love of our Redeemer in passing through so many cruel sufferings for us, who were but Rebels and Enemies. O how should the remembrance of his boundless compassions transport and ravish us with love! how strange is it, that the highest endearments of Love have not inflamed our spirits, and made Love mutual and reciprocal!

Love is a most excellent affection, of a noble original, by which we resemble the best of beings; the great God being by the beloved Disciple described to be Love: and indeed well does this description suit with his dealings with men. But alas! how unlike are we to God in this! there is scarce any duty more frequently inculcated by our Savior than Love, John 15.12. This is my commandment, that ye love one another as I have loved you: and yet how little efficacy has either his precept or example with us?

Blessed Redeemer! how unworthy do impure Earth-worms require thy love? thou hast not been wanting to conquer our affections, and to inflame our frozen hearts with love to thee, and to our Neighbors also: Thy life and Death comprehend the most endearing arguments imaginable; and yet well mayest thou ask us as once thou didst Peter, Love you me? but God knows there are but a very few who can unfeignedly say as this Disciple did, Lord, thou knowest that I love thee. We can remember all thy sorrows without tears, and look upon thy agonies with an unconcerned eye: We can view thee in the Garden, when grief and pain made thee sweat drops of blood, and behold thee as thou stoodst accused as a Malefactor before Pilate, as thou wert contemned, scourged, and derided by impure worms, and most spitefully represented in a fools habit: we can ascend Mount Calvary, and contemplate thee as enduring the most shameful death of the Cross, and hanging betwixt two Thieves, and all this time have Adamantine hearts, which receive no impression. Blessed Redeemer! come, touch these hearts of ours, that they may be overcome with love, that our wills and affections may be perfectly molded according to thy pleasure.

Sure if we had any sparks of Generosity or common Ingenuity, we could not thus despise so much love: The very Publicans (who were reputed the worst of men) yet loved those that loved them: And it hath even in the most degenerate times been reckoned the highest baseness to contemn Benefactors; yet more brutish are we become than these, and may very fitly be ranked in a Category inferior to that of bruits: For the Ass (as sacred Writ tells us) knoweth his masters crib, and the Ox his owner, Isa. 1.3. The very beasts in their own manner express a kind of love to their Benefactors; and yet although our Redeemer hath made our peace by his blood on the Cross, and hath reversed that sentence of Damnation passed upon us; although he hath endured the greatest dishonor and pain imaginable, that we might be delivered from the wrath to come, yet this unparalleled kindness, the greatest endearment of love, hath not had the kindly effect to quicken our dead and benumbed hearts, but like a lifeless carcass we remain insensible without the least return of love.

And indeed it can scarce be well expected that the example of his love to us should engage us to love one another, since it hath produced so little love in us to himself. But however, I need not take much pains to prove that hereby we demonstrate ourselves to be of all men the most ungrate, and justly liable to the severest punishment ever inflicted upon the greatest criminal.

It would be too prolix to enumerate the several instances wherein Christ is set forth as our Pattern: sure I am, he hath by his example taught us the exercise of all virtues; and I may say (as himself said in another case) If we know these things, happy are we if we do them.

To sum up this Section, it will not be amiss to obviate an Objection, which is indeed but very trivial, although it be too commonly urged: the Objection is, How is it possible for men to conform to Christ, and be holy as he is holy? Ans. I have already told, that it is not expected that we should imitate our blessed Redeemer in all and every of those actions he performed; but in all those moral duties which he hath enjoined by his righteous precepts, and encouraged us by his example to perform, these we must by no means neglect: and to manifest the possibility of doing these, we may satisfy ourselves by viewing the pious and devout lives of primitive Christians. It is a great mistake to think we are commanded to a rigorous and strict conversation which cannot be attained; the faithful in former ages have run the same race that is set before us; they have fully enough cleared the possibility of our duty: Wherefore seeing we also (as the Apostle argues) are compassed about with so great a cloud of witnesses, let us lay aside every weight, and the sin that doth so easily beset us, and let us run with patience the race that is set before us, Heb. 12.1. For shame, let us rather imitate the excellent holiness of primitive Christians, than the impure practices of those who are strangers from the sacred Covenant.

O the perfect love and imitable kindness of the first professors of the Gospel! what purity, what integrity and innocence appeared in their lives? how ravishing and splendid were their virtues and graces; their Patience in suffering, their Courage and Magnanimity in death, their Temperance and Moderation, their Charity and Compassion, their Equality and Justice, and their Contempt of this World and all earthly concerns for the sake and honor of their Master? These were the virtues they were adorned with, which made the Heathen world, who hated the Doctrine they professed, yet esteem and reverence them. Bonus vir Cajus Sejus, nisi Christianus.

SECT. 2. Holiness the condition of future Happiness.

The desire of Happiness is so natural to all that partake of human nature, that it can no more be separate from it than heat can be from fire. 'Tis true, the mistakes concerning happiness are as numerous as dangerous; everyone in this corrupt state is apt to frame a happiness which best suits his inclinations: but yet there is no man so devoid of reason, who doth not desire to be happy; although indeed there be but a few who make use of the right means to attain to true felicity.

Daily experience puts it beyond doubt, that a carnal and fictitious felicity is by the unwise sons of men pursued with the most indefatigable pains and industry possible. Now how strange, to amazement, is it to think, that men should be so sedulous in hunting after a fancied felicity, and yet so negligent, so careless and unconcerned about a real happiness which is both satisfying and lasting?

*But not to digress; that which I am now to urge, is: since happiness is that which excites men to perform anything cheerfully in order to the attaining of it, how mightily should the expectation of a future felicity induce them to the practice of Holiness? for betwixt the two our blessed Savior has made an inseparable connection, Matth. 5.8. Blessed are the pure in spirit, for they shall see God: and indeed it is the height of folly and madness, for impure wretches to expect they shall be partakers of the inheritance of the Saints of light; for as the Apostle tells us, There shall in no wise enter into it anything that defileth, Rev. 21.27. Holiness is the established condition of happiness, Heb. 12.14. Without holiness no man shall see God. Hence is it that all the promises concerning our future felicity are only made to those men who purify themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit; and the great design of them is to encourage us to Holiness; upon which account St. Paul draws a very pressing inference, 2 Cor. 7.1. *Having therefore these promises, (of which he spake in the foregoing Chapter) let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

There is nothing more certain, than that only holy souls are in a capacity of participating of that future felicity; and these may without the least charge of presumption claim an interest in it: But for those vicious wretches, who are wholly polluted, who have devoted themselves to commit sin with greediness, and take pleasure in doing evil; how utterly incapable are they (if they continue such) to dwell in his presence, who is not a God that taketh pleasure in wickedness?

And now seeing there is such an inseparable connection between Happiness and Holiness, it cannot be amiss if we take a short view of the excellency of this coelestial felicity, that it may more plainly appear what a notable encouragement and motive it is to holiness.

There be two things that forcibly recommend the excellency of that future state of bliss. First, A perfect freedom and immunity from all evils. And Secondly, a perpetual enjoyment of the chief good.

First, it is a blessedness wholly exempt from evils whether of sense or loss; 'tis a happiness attended with no inconveniencies, nor dismal circumstances, as the happiest state here is: we now walk in the midst of perplexing doubts and fears; temptations increase our inquietudes, and dangers our continual fears: our complaints are by far more numerous than our joys; nay, what is our whole life, but a scene where sorrow and fears act their parts! Man that is born of a woman is of few days, and full of evil.

But our future blessedness quite excludes all those evils; there is nothing admitted to embitter that pleasant state, Rev. 21.4. And God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes, and there shall be no more death, neither sorrow, nor crying, neither shall there be anymore pain; for the former things are passed away. The holy soul shall then no more complain of any dolorous hours; the heavenly Jerusalem is a place unacquainted with everything that is uneasy and troublesome.

And yet this is but the least part of the Saints felicity: for as they shall enjoy a perfect freedom from evil, so shall they also be advanced to the fullest fruition of that God, where all the streams of goodness do finally empty themselves: Blessed are the pure in spirit, for they shall see God, Matth. 5.8. They shall see him, not as now through a Glass darkly, but then face to face, 1 Cor. 13.12. they shall, as the Angels in Heaven, always behold the face of their Father, Matth. 18.10. in whose presence (as the Psalmist assures us) is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore, Psal. 16.11. O the unspeakable delectability of the Saints future state! where the most blessed God shines forth in his Glory, where the beams of beauty ravish the beholders, who stand continually in his presence receiving the manifestations of his Glory!

Sure if the faint expectation of enjoying the company of virtuous men in their fancied Elyzium, did instigate some Heathens to imitate their virtues; how much more persuasive should the heavenly Jerusalem, and the City of the living God be? where the holy Soul shall be admitted to converse with an innumerable company of holy Angels, and taken into the blessed Society and Church of the first-born; where all those imperfections that embitter our communion here, are removed; where the holy Soul shall see Jesus the blessed Mediator of the new Covenant, Heb. 12. who suffered so much for sinners, now sitting in glory and majesty; not crowned (as once he was) with thorns, nor wearing a purple robe; but having on his head the most transplendent Diadem, and clothed with Majesty and Beauty. Methinks the thoughts of beholding this glory, and participating of so much felicity, should excite the most lazy to follow Holiness, and to walk worthy of him who hath called us to his Kingdom and glory.

But I confess I am not able to express half of the glory of that future felicity: The blessed Apostle seems to intimate, that all Hyperbolical expressions fall short in describing it, 2 Cor. 4.17. where he stiles it, A far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory: and 1 Cor. 2.9. he tells us, Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the heart of man to conceive what God hath prepared for those that love him. For although we may be assured that the reward is of infinite value, and that the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father: yet the most glorious part is hid from the eyes of viators; 'tis only those who taste the Honey-comb that can best discover its sweetness.

And yet it is prodigiously strange, that the imperfect glance of future Glory that men may here behold, is so ineffectual to form them to Holiness; that men who know they may be forever happy, if they would study and endeavor to be holy in all manner of conversation, yet live as if they thought such a happy state not worthy to be noticed.

I confess, if the faithful and true God had not promised this state of blessedness, and discovered by revelation the truth and reality of it, we could never have dreamed of partaking of so much happiness. The Heathen world could never be ascertained (by Nature's dim light) that the Soul is beyond all doubt immortal, and that there is a future state of rewards and punishments. The wisest of their Philosophers, by their most laborious search, were exceedingly confused in their thoughts about it, and could at the most only entertain some probable guesses and conjectures, founded upon moral arguments, which could never perfectly conquer their doubts: They did indeed think it was very reasonable to believe that God (who is holy, just, and good) would in another life (since he did it not in this) reward good men, and punish the bad; but they could not be, beyond all doubt, ascertained that it would be so. The most celebrated Socrates, who parted with this life in expectation of a better, plainly told his Friends, it was God only who knew whether there were a future felicity or not; much less could either he or any other, without revelation, discover the nature and quality of the blessedness of that future state. And indeed, although they entertained some imperfect notions of a future life of bliss for the Soul, yet they never thought of the resurrection of the Body: although 'tis true, the felicity they formed, was more congruous by far to satisfy sensual appetites, than rational Souls: The Poets Elyzium being much of the same nature with the Mahometan Paradise, exactly accommodated to their flesh and senses.

In these thick clouds of darkness and ignorance did the wisest of the Heathens walk: Exceedingly perplexed they were what to think, their doubts being greater than their hopes. But the arising of the Sunshine of Righteousness hath wholly dispelled all that darkness; the Gospel hath brought life and immortality to light, 2 Tim. 1.10. and hath undoubtedly assured us that there is a reward for the Righteous, and that Holiness shall be crowned with Happiness.

SECT. 3. Holiness the only safe way to escape the wrath to come.

Fear is a passion so extremely violent, and repugnant to Humane nature, that nothing imaginable is of more force to conquer the unruly wills of men to duty. Hence is it, that even human Laws are much more secured by punishments than rewards: Therefore if the promise of Heaven be not forcible enough to work upon our rebellious Wills, we have a Map of eternal and intolerable torments to excite our fear, and to affright us from the commission of those sins that lead down to the chambers of death; and that drawn so exactly, that it is the greatest miracle, that men will notwithstanding slight Holiness, which is the only means to evite these lasting tortures.

In sacred Writ, the torments of the damned are represented by such terrifying expressions, that it is a wonder they impress not a fear and terror upon the most daring sinner. The Apostle St. Jude describing Hell, calls it, The vengeance of eternal fire, and the blackness of darkness forever, Jude 7, 13. And the Apostle St. John calls it, A lake of fire and brimstone, Rev. 20.10, 15. Our Savior more emphatically describes it to be A fire that can never be quenched, and where the worm dieth not, Mark 9.46. All which phrases do most significantly express the severity and intolerableness of the torments: for what punishment is so terrible as that of Fire? and how unspeakably does it inhanse the misery, in that it is eternal? and that too, as inflicted by an offended God, who is executing his vengeance upon sinners.

Would God sinners would seriously consider whether they are able to endure the eternal pains of a gnawing Conscience? or can patiently dwell with devouring Flames? Whether the momentary pleasures of sin, are to be balanced with those furious reflections, those horrid stings and intolerable tortures the damned suffer day and night, where nothing of life remains but the sense of pain? Alas! will no argument prevail with men? how amazing is it to think that the everlasting God has used all the methods of love to excite men to Holiness, and to reclaim them from sin, and all to no purpose? May I not well say to such men, as St. Paul said to the Galatians, Unwise sinners, who hath bewitched you?

Did men seriously believe the threatenings of the Gospel, I am sure they would not, for the fullest enjoyment of carnal felicity, run the hazard of dwelling with everlasting burnings. That man that soberly considers, that the wrath of God is revealed from Heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men, will, I think, easily be scared into reformation, and be thereby excited to be diligent in the pursuit of substantial Holiness, which is the safe course to escape that wrath.

Alas! that men who are so wise and diligent in their secular concerns, should prove so foolish, so remiss and careless in matters of the greatest weight, and which require the utmost diligence! That rational creatures should so willingly purchase their own misery, and be at so much pains to damn themselves! 'Twill surely be an aggravating circumstance of their misery, to think that they might have been happy, if they had but taken as much pains to live holily, as they took in the pursuit of sinful pleasures. How astonishing a consideration will it be to the damned, to think of their treading underfoot the Son of God, and their counting the blood of the Covenant whereby they were sanctified, an unholy thing? Heb. 10.29. to think, that the time was, when they enjoyed not only a possibility, but a fair probability also of escaping the fury and indignation of God!

But men will not believe that a merciful God will thus torment his creatures; that he who delights not in the death of sinners, will execute his vengeance upon them. Alas! what delusory imaginations are these? for although fury is not in God, yet his honor calls for the execution of Justice upon ungodly sinners, who obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus. He has waited long upon sinners, and has fully testified that he is a God long suffering, and slow to wrath: He has not instantly resented every injury offered to him; but day from day has been entreating sinners to turn from the evil of their ways: and now seeing they set at naught all his counsel, and will not hearken to his reproof, what wonder is it though he laugh at their calamity, and mock when their fear cometh? Prov. 1.25.26. How heavy is that threatening, Deut. 28.63. As the Lord rejoiced over you to do you Good: so the Lord will rejoice over you to destroy you?

To complete the misery of the damned, besides the intolerable and eternal pains they endure, we may also add that celestial felicity they are forever excluded from. How tormenting will it be to think of an everlasting separation from the divine Presence, and instead of a holy Society, to keep a continual correspondency with impure Spirits?

Would God that this brief discovery of the powers of the world to come, might prevail with men to be holy in all manner of conversation.

But methinks I hear the over zealous Professor too ignorantly objecting, that it is servile, mercenary, and legal, to be holy for love of Heaven, or fear of Hell. Truly if it were so as these men teach, I know not what can be the intent and design of all the promises and threatenings of the Gospel. And although I question not but it is a generous and Christian principle, to serve God out of pure love; yet I can never be induced to think, that to be holy for love of Heaven and fear of Hell, can be separate from that principle of love to God.

God knows how much in need men stand, both of arguments to work upon their hope and fear, to excite them to duty. And since he who knows our natures, has used promises to allure us, and threatenings to awaken us, we must not pretend to be wiser than God, and reject those motives he has thought fit to prescribe: and indeed, if it were not for the fear of evil, and the hope of good, 'tis to be feared, the pressing of other motives should be but a mere beating of the Air.

But that this is not servile and mercenary, needs no other argument to prove it, but our Savior's enduring the Gross, and despising the Shame, for the joy that was set before him; a Scripture sufficient enough to stop the mouths of all opponents.

SECT 4. Holiness the main design of the Gospel, and the end of all Christ's sufferings.

Subjects who know the intent and design of those Laws issued forth by their Prince, will be loath to condemn his Authority, especially when the whole intent of these is to make them by their obedience the more happy; and sure 'tis the most unaccountable thing that can be, if they notwithstanding despise his Laws, and quite counter-act his design.

*Now the main design of the Christian precepts, is the promoting of Holiness, and planting a good life in men: This also was the only intent of our Sovereign and Law-giver; and it is certain the whole advantage redounds to us. How impious then is it to despise the Authority of Heaven! If God had made Holiness a matter of indifferency, the want of such a qualification had not been criminal: but since sacred Writ has declared, *That this is the will of God, even our sanctification, and that we must be holy as he is holy; if we rebel, the indignity and contempt we cast upon him, is insufferable.

I have already shown, that it is the great design of the Gospel-Precepts, Promises, & Threatings, to exalt Holiness. Hence the Apostle very aptly calls it, A doctrine according to godliness: and he tells us, that the design of it is, to teach men to deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and to live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world: and the Character of its nature is, to turn men from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan to God, that they may receive forgiveness of sins, and an inheritance among them that are sanctified by faith in Christ.

I wish the effect were answerable to the design. I doubt not but the Gospel has had a kindly influence upon some, to form them to Holiness, I would fain wish upon all: But alas! the perverse and corrupt conversations of men plainly tell us, that there are but a few who have answered its design.

In the next place, it were easy to demonstrate, that to plant Holiness amongst men, was the end of Christ's descending from Heaven to Earth, and of all that he suffered. This the Apostle plainly enough holds forth, Tit. 2.14. He gave himself for us, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purifie unto himself a peculiar people zealous of good works. Now what argument should be so powerful and prevalent to engage Christians to be universally holy, as the due consideration of Christ's redeeming them for that end?

*Men who are endu'd with any sparks of ingenuity, cannot but be inspirited to be separate from the pollutions of this world, when they reflect what their Redeemer hath suffered in order to the purchasing of their pardon and reconciliation: For when poor Man had cast himself headlong from Heaven to Earth, had lost his pristine purity, and subjugated himself to the cruel tyranny and dominion of sin; in this deplorable state being utterly unable to help himself, our blessed Lord redeemed us from our captivity, by offering up himself a ransom to satisfy divine Justice; and all this, that we might walk in newness of life. And now what ingratitude is it to despise so much love? Sure, If he that despised Moses law died without mercy, of how much sorer punishment shall he be thought worthy, who hath trodden underfoot the Son of God, and hath counted the Blood of the Covenant wherewith he was sanctified an unholy thing? Heb. 10.28, 29.*

He must certainly be of a very base and disingenous spirit, who takes pleasure in sin, when he considers how dearly Christ paid for it. Hath he been at so much pains, undergone such dismal sufferings to purchase our peace, and will we notwithstanding frustrate his design? how strange to astonishment is this, that men should prefer captivity to freedom!

Alas! is it not enough that our blessed Master was so barbarously and despitefully used by the Jews and Roman Soldiers, but must we be also Actors in the Tragedy, and by our sins crucify him again?

Did he not die that we might live? and shall we spend our life in offering despite unto him? Strange, that so much madness should lodge in the breasts of any into whom God hath breathed the breath of life!

I might here also add, that it is a contemning, and offering of the greatest despite to the Holy Spirit, to despise Holiness: for upon this account is the third person of the blessed Trinity called the Holy Ghost, because his peculiar office is to enable us to perform holy actions: now if we continue in our rebellion, if we reject the offers of grace, and the internal motions of the Spirit to Holiness, we do hereby become guilty of quenching the Spirit of God, and offering despite unto him; which is so horrid a piece of villainy, that Heaven threatens it with the severest torments.

SECT. 5. Holiness the most proper and effectual means for attaining length of days.

Of all outward and temporal blessings, length of days hath justly the precedency, since without this, all others can afford little or no comfort: The possession and enjoyment of other mercies, can bestow no satisfaction to men lying on their beds of languishing: nay, there is no comfort, be it never so great, but men would willingly quit with, to acquire this. Now since this is above all things so universally desired, it cannot but very much enhance the value of Holiness, to demonstrate that there is nothing so proper, nor more effectual to procure length of days than this.

In order to my proving of this, I shall first make it plain from Scripture, that length of days is due to holy men by virtue of the many true and faithful promises; and secondly, I shall appeal to common experience to determine the case.

First, there is nothing more evidently asserted in Scripture, than that Holiness hath the promise of length of days annexed to it, Prov. 3.1, 2. My son, forget not my law, but let thine heart keep my commandments; for length of days and long life shall they add unto thee. This encouraging motive is pressed very effectually by Moses, in his exhortation to obedience, Deut. 4.40. Thou shalt keep therefore his statutes and his commandments which I command thee this day, that it may go well with thee, and with thy children after thee, and that thou mayest prolong thy days upon the earth. Upon this account we also find that there are many promises of this nature to obedient Children, Exod. 20.12. Honor thy father and thy mother, that thy days may be long upon the land which the Lord thy God giveth thee.

And as Righteousness tendeth to life, (as the Wise man observes) so he that pursueth evil pursueth it to his own death, Prov. 11.19. There is nothing more evident from Scripture, than that sin hath a natural tendency to shorten men's lives; nay, the great God, who is serious in his threatenings, hath assured us it is so: upon which account we may well conclude with the Wise man, Prov. 10.27. The years of the wicked shall be shortened.

The whole tenor of the Scripture abounds with many such promises and threatenings; and the thing is so plain, that I need not stand to transcribe many texts.

But besides Scripture, this truth is also plainly attested by common experience: for if we examine who are the men who for ordinary are most obnoxious to diseases, and live shortest; we shall find it true enough, that the vicious are the men, who live not out half their days, Prov. 23.29, 30. Who hath woe? who hath sorrow? who hath wounds without cause? they that tarry long at the wine, &c. Holiness is repugnant and inconsistent with excess, which naturally puts a period to the lives of men: It forbids all manner of vice, which leads down to the chambers of death; and keeps men within due bounds in their eating and drinking.

Before mankind had corrupted themselves by their notorious and impudent vitiousness, we read of their great length of days; but the increase of sin multiplied diseases, which hurry men to untimely deaths.

I deny not but the great Lord and Master of the Universe may, for holy and wise ends known unto himself, cut short the lives of the righteous; yet surely if we consult either Experience or Reason, we shall find it certain beyond doubt, that virtuous men enjoy, for ordinary, far the longest lives.

Some good men may be naturally of a brittle constitution, yet how strangely has their life been protracted by their moderation and sobriety? and how many strong men have had their days shortened by their intemperance and excess?

Indeed, he that considers this well, shall find, that Holiness is the most effectual means to promote long life, both upon a moral and natural account. Upon a moral account, long life is the reward which the divine promises do secure to such men; and on the contrary, wickedness is threatened with shortness of days. Upon a natural account, the fire doth not more naturally produce heat, than Holiness does procure health and length of days; and there is nothing more evident, than that the most of vices have a physical efficacy in the shortening of human life. That this is the necessary product and genuine effect of intemperance and lasciviousness, needs no other argument to prove it, but the daily examples of multitudes, whom those sins have hurried to their graves. And truly there is not any vice which does not like fire in men's bosoms torture and consume them; and so disorders and discomposes them, that they even neglect the necessary means of their health. See Period of Humane life, pag. 111, 124, Edit. 2.

SECT. 6. Holiness that which makes men honorable; vice rendering men mean and ignoble.

Honor is an ornament so noble and venerable, that he is but very sottish, if not quite brutish, who doth not court and caress it. Upon this account it is nothing strange, that ancient Philosophers, who wanted the assistance of revelation, placed man's happiness in it.

How many brave and gallant actions have been performed, which if they had wanted the bait of Honor had never been attempted! Gallant souls, who despise all other rewards, have been hereby excited to undergo the greatest dangers.

Now, since honor is so highly esteemed, especially by those who pretend to generosities; I shall, to encourage such to befriend Holiness, endeavor to prove, that the most effectual means to procure Honor, and to be in esteem both with God and man, is to live (as the Apostle adviseth men) soberly, righteously, and godly.

Only before I proceed to prove this, I shall premise one Caution, namely, that by Honor I do not chiefly understand one dignified with any extrinsical honor arising either from his Birth or Office; though both these are to be highly esteemed, and must not be denied that external respect due unto them: but by Honor I understand that esteem and reputation that the best and wisest men do give to any whose Moral honor is conspicuous; and under this notion the Stoic-Moralist hath very well expressed it, which upon the matter disagrees not much from that sacred position of the Wise man, Prov. 22.1. A good name is rather to be chosen than great riches.

Having premised this, I come now to prove that Holiness is the path-way to Honor. And indeed, this is so plainly asserted in Scripture, that it is needless to insist. The God of Heaven hath assured us, that those that Honor him, he will honor; and those that despise him shall be lightly esteemed, 1 Sam. 2.30. Much like to this, is that inducement to Holiness urged by our Lord Christ, Joh. 12.26. If any man serve me, him will my Father honor. Now men cannot honor God more, than by being holy: for the word is comprehensive, and includes all those duties that God hath enjoined; but every vice is a despising of his sacred Authority. If then holy men are those only whom God will honor, and vicious men those whom he will contemn, we may easily conclude, who are the honorable, and who are the base and ignoble. Sure those men must be honorable, whom the Fountain of Honor esteems such.

'Tis upon this account that the Saints are called (in Scripture) the excellent of the earth, and the worthies of the world, (how meanly soever men esteem them) of whom the world is not worthy: And the righteous is said to be more excellent than his neighbor. And indeed, Holiness doth not only promote the honor and esteem of private persons, but of public Communities and Kingdoms also, Prov. 14.34. Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is a reproach to any people.

This is a truth which the wisest of the Heathens, who yet wanted Revelation, constantly taught, namely, That Honor is the reward of virtue. Hence the large Lectures they have written in the commendation thereof: it would be too tedious to transcribe even the Elogies that they have written in the praise of Virtue; and indeed it is well worthy of our observation, that as they have illustrated Virtue by their large Encomiums of it, so Virtue (which they courted) hath made them venerable to posterity, and transmitted to us their memories under the most amiable Encomiums imaginable: And however their birth was but mean and almost regardless, yet their virtues have made them more famous than Princes and Emperors. The virtues of Aristides, Socrates, Seneca, Marcus Regulus, and many others, have made their renown glorious; whileas many Emperors and great men have had their names buried in silence.

Let a man be as rich as ever any of Adam's posterity was, or (that I may extend it farther) as high as his ambitious thoughts can wish; let him be wise as Solomon, and endued with all other perfections and advantages; yet if he want virtue, how insipid will his Name be to posterity? It is Virtue alone that conduceth to same. 'Tis true, some wicked men (called in Scripture vile, notwithstanding their authority) have been set in high places, and honored for fear, when alive; yet they never received that honor which hath in all ages accompanied the Righteous. They have had the external, (which is indeed due to men by virtue of their Descent or Office) but wanted that internal reverence and honor which is only due to good men: and I doubt not to say, that there is nothing more incongruous and unsuitable, than to see Honor given to such men. As snow in summer, and as rain in harvest; so honor is not seemly for a fool, Prov. 26.1.

Vice is in the judgment of all considering men so mean and base, that it casts a stain and reproach upon men; makes their names unsavory, and stink in the nostrils of after-ages: but Holiness forces a veneration from men, and makes posterity raise Elogies in their memory; but the memory of the wicked shall be forgotten.

Virtue was that alone whereby many Kingdoms and Empires have been raised; was that which made them so flourishing and potent, and prevailed more to their establishment and advancement, than Strength or Policy. Thus it was with the old Romans, (for their virtues are a shame to the present state of that Empire) their Clemency and Justice conquered Kingdoms, and made Rome renowned and glorious beyond all other Kingdoms and Commonwealths: and as Virtue hath raised Kingdoms, so hath it also particular Persons; whileas Vice hath cast Emperors from their Thrones, and made them as unfortunate as they were wicked.

Many of the primitive Martyrs, who were renowned by Kingdoms and Commonwealths (who keep Festivals in honor of their memories) were but of an inferior degree, and had nothing to recommend them to posterity but their Holiness and Sanctity; and indeed, any man that consults Reason, will easily find himself constrained to reverence and esteem virtuous men.

'Tis a wonder that any man who pretends to generosity should be vicious, there being nothing so mean and base as Vice, which like to cowards always lurketh, and dares not approach the light. I doubt not but this present age hath arrived at as high a confidence in proclaiming their sins as Sodom, as ever any former age acquired; and it may (to the reproach of it) be said, as ever any is like to reach to: yet till men cast quite off humanity, it cannot be expected that Vice shall have Advocates to plead in its defense. 'Tis a noble saying of the great Moralist Seneca; Licet Deus nesciret nec homo puniret peccatum, non tamen peccarem ob peccati vilitatem.

'Tis no wonder then though Vice appear (as the Devil in Samuel's mantle) under the cloak of Virtue; though Lust mask itself with the pretence of Love, and Cruelty of Zeal: but by this means it proclaims its timorousness, not daring to own publicly what it really is.

It were a large field, to descend to the consideration of every particular virtue and vice, and to show that there is not any virtue but tends to the advancement of a man's honor and fame, and no vice which is not ungentile, mean, and base: But the brevity I have designed will not allow me to enlarge; only in brief I shall demonstrate the truth of this by some few Instances.

Justice is so gallant a virtue, that it advanced the renown of those whom it adorned, beyond what riches or preferment could ever bestow. The Romans were more famous, and (where they were Enemies) more formidable for their Justice than their Power: it was this virtue which in a peculiar manner made Scepters and Kingdoms submit to their Governments. But

Injustice is so base and contemptible a vice, that it hath made those who are captivated by it, despised as the unworthiest of men, not deserving to be taken into friendship, but to be excluded from human Societies. How unsavory hath the name of unjust Judges been to posterity, while everyone is ready to strew some Elogies in honor of the just!

To this I may annex Constancy in friendship, as a virtue as noble as amiable: For who will not admire and celebrate the man who remains fixed to his friend, whatever alterations or changes there may be in his condition? And sure whosoever fails in his friendship, lays himself open to the most merciless condition, and needs expect to be left to befriend himself when the wheel of Providence lays him below those he thought unworthy of his favor.

Of all virtues, Liberality, Charity, and Compassion are so noble, that common speech adapts this Elogie to them by way of emphasis; and indeed, I think I need not say much to raise an estimate of these: for no man can be so base as to despise those who bestow favors upon him. Sure there is no virtue that makes men more famous, that wins the hearts and affections of people more, than Liberality: but Avarice is ungentile and sordid; and so odious a vice, that it ever lessens all other virtues, and makes those it possesses the most hateful of men.

Charity is an obliging virtue; and as it hath its original from, so doth it also necessarily produce Love, and esteem too: he who prefers the necessities of others before his own superfluities, and who does supply the wants of others, does so cheer the languishing hearts of the needy, that nothing can be more generous, nor generally meets with a greater recompense of honor and esteem.

To compassionate the case of the Fatherless, of the Poor and Needy, is so noble a virtue, that the Apostle makes this qualification alone the evidence of pure and undefiled religion. It is a most unnatural and more than brutish sin, to slight and forget such.

Meekness and Humility are such noble embellishments of human nature, as I have formerly shown, that none but proud and insolent spirits, who have been always condemned as insufferable, durst ever disesteem them.

To these I may join Affability or Courtesie, as a virtue near allied to Humility and Meekness; which being noble in its causes and effects, cannot but denominate the person it illustrates both noble, and amiable, and lovely: 'Tis indeed an evidence of a very base and abject spirit, to be sullen and morose. Persons of a noble education and original, are frequently known by their condescending and obliging behavior; and I am sure Reputation and Esteem are the apparent effects of Courtesie.

Temperance and Moderation are virtues more noble than that they need eloquence to advance their value, as its contraries are too mean and beastly to be inveighed against. How brutish and contemptible is a drunken man, who is rather an object of pity, (as mad-men are) than reproach! who being a more apt resemblance of a beast than a man, deserves as little Honor, as he is ignorant what Honor means.

SECT. 7. Holiness attended with the most solid and real pleasures.

In all things that concern practice, there is scarce any motive more forcible than Pleasure; and of all pleasures, those that entertain the Soul are the most excellent. We indeed need no argument but experience, to demonstrate how ravishing sensual pleasures and delights are, how much they are caressed and courted, till men be glutted and filled with them. But alas! how inconsiderable are all sensitive delights? the enjoyment of these cannot raise us above the beasts that perish; but those pleasures which are fitted for the rational nature, are noble and lasting; and such are all those delights that arise from a holy conversation; no joy, without this, being able to make a man's life pleasant and delightful.

There is in Holiness an internal delectability, that is better felt, than it can be expressed; but how loathsome and odious is Vice? it is compared in Scripture to the most ugly and unpleasant things: But Holiness is so comely, so delightful, and ravishing, that it is very fitly (according to the Scripture-Epithet of it) called, the Beauty of Holiness. It is this alone that produces a calm and serene Conscience; from which necessarily results acquiescence and delight: and indeed, this is no fantastick and imaginary joy, (as the Atheists of this Age would make men believe) but a true and real one, affording much more complacency and satisfaction, than all the pleasures of sense. To the truth of which, I doubt not but those men who question it should assent, if they would but make the experiment; and till they do this, they give us too evident an instance of their folly, in denying the reality of those raptures of joy resulting from a holy conversation.

But besides Experience, this truth is likewise confirmed by Reason: For who is in more probable circumstances to participate of Pleasures, than he who is Master of his Passions, who hath subdued his appetites, and freed himself from those imperious Lord's, who denied him the liberty of tasting and relishing pleasures? The pious Soul may have no large allowance of temporal mercies; yet having Contentment, he is richer than the wicked man whose coffers are full.

But we need not doubt of the reality of those pleasures; the Wise man hath long since put this out of question, Prov. 3.17. Her ways are ways of pleasantness. There is here a concurrence of all those circumstances that contribute to make anything delectable: 'tis a way pleasant for its plainness, and desirable for its end. There is not indeed anything wanting in it, that usually draws out men's delight.

All beauty falls inconceivably short of this; it being Holiness alone, that makes the righteous shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father: without this, all natural comeliness is imperfect, and, as the Wise man expresses it, is deceitful and vain, Prov. 31.30.

And yet what an universal Empress is external beauty become? nothing being of equal force to attract the eye of beholders as it doth. How hath she conquered the mighty, and made the Nobles of the Earth Vassals to lacquey after her? There is an almost irresistible power and force in her charmings, which conquereth the hearts of men insensibly.

Now if Beauty mixed with so much deformity, accompanied with so much attendance and slavery, be so enchanting and attractive; how much more powerfully should the Beauty of Holiness, which is every whit perfect and unspotted, and attended with no dismal accidents, raise our admiration, and make us say (as David of Goliath's Sword) There is none like it?

Alas! all earthly beauty will be quickly laid in the dust! a little time will deface the fairest face, and make its beauty consume like a Moth: an unexpected accident may disfigure it, and mar the most lovely features; and there is no doubt but old Age, which draws on a pace, will make wrinkles in the smoothest face, and make it wither as a flower: But the Beauty of Holiness is lasting; it fades not with time, nor can it be impaired by the most loathsome and nauseating disease.

Since then Pleasure is so ready to excite our affections, and draw out our complacency, 'tis pity that the noblest, the most satisfying, and the most lasting should be so much contemned. Eccl. 5.10. He that loveth silver, shall not be satisfied with silver; nor he that loveth abundance, with increase. All the caresses of this World are unable to satisfy the Soul; but how ravishing are the joys of a holy conversation! The pleasures of this world are short and momentary, are only (as the Apostle phraseth them) for a season, which quickly passeth; but the joy of the Holy Ghost is as lasting as unspeakable; and this joy (saith Christ to his Disciples) no man shall take from you. It is without the reach of the malice of men and Devils too.

Alas! how diminutive does it make the pleasures of the wicked, to say they are short? how exceedingly does this one circumstance diminish them? But indeed this were not so very considerable, if there were a concurrence of no worse circumstances: but that which mostly is an allay and damp to temporal pleasures, is the consequence, a painful and lasting eternity of the severest punishments. 'Tis this life that puts a period and conclusion to the joys of wicked men; whileas the pious have Rivers of pleasures for evermore to delight and ravish them: 'tis at Death that they enter into the joy of their Lord.

This is a subject so ravishing and pleasant, that I cannot without reluctancy conclude it. O how unsatisfactory are all the delights of Sense, if compared with those Spiritual Joys the holy Soul partakes of! The delights that the Drunkard hath in his Cups and Companions, the Covetous in his Riches, the Ambitious in his Preferments, &c. fall all incomparable short of that joy that is the lot of the righteous.

The delights that the holy man enjoys do upon a double account far over-poise the transitory pleasures of the wicked. First, the present satisfaction that the holy Soul tastes of in this valley of tears, is incomparably greater than the delights that arise from sense. The soul that hath once tasted of the love of God, finds more pleasure in the very acts of mutual love, than in all the feasts of delight that sense is capable to enjoy. Food is indeed sweet to the hungry, and drink to those who are languishing with thirst: the taste does without doubt find some meats sweet and relishing, even where there is no extremity of hunger, much more where it is: for, to the hungry every bitter thing is sweet. Beauteous Sights ravish the Eye, melodious Music the Ear, and Odoriferous things please the Smell: But alas! how far beyond these is the delight which the devout soul receives in Ordinances! the antipasts of joy which their Heavenly Father bestows upon them, are more delightful than the concurrence of all sensual pleasures. The soul that is in trouble can fetch more consolation from the promises of the Word, than the carnal man can from his pleasures: Unless thy Law had been my delight (saith the Psalmist) I had perished in my affliction. Other things could not avail him, they could afford no relief: but to have access to God in prayer, and to pour out our complaints to our willing God, this is more ravishing than I can express. And I am sure there is no man who hath tasted these joys, who would part with them for sensual pleasures; and no man dare inveigh against those spiritual delights, but strangers who intermeddle not with this joy.

The very Heathens have taught us, that Virtue is a reward to itself; they experimented more real satisfaction in moderation and temperance, than in Drinking and Whoring. But Christianity gives us more uncontrolable evidences of the reality of that joy that good men even in this state of absence taste of. Into what a rapture and inexpressible ecstasy of joy did the abundance of revelation St. Paul met with put him! and the Apostle St. Peter was so transported with joy when he did see Christ in his Transfiguration, that he could not forbear crying, Master, it is good being here. How full of joy have Martyrs been in the midst of the flames! what comforts have they even then expressed! And is not all this evidence, that the joy of holy men is more real, more sweet and ravishing, than the transitory pleasures of the wicked, which in several seasons can afford no delight? a little pain or disease is such an ally and damp to their pleasures, that it quite extirps them.

But besides those foretastes of joy that the holy Soul experiments here, which, as I have shown, infinitely overwhelms all trouble and pain; that which contributes most to advance the joy of good men, are those felicities above, which are prepared for them; and to these wicked men can lay no claim, their farthest prospect being confined to temporal delights.

*What abundance of delights and inexpressible pleasures are laid up for the holy Soul above! How delectable will it be, to be constant residents in the Heavenly Jerusalem, whose Streets are pure Gold, and whose Gates are Pearl! how ravishing will it be, to be always in his presence, where there are Streams and Rivers of perpetual pleasures? How sweet will it be, to be a member of that blessed Society of the first-born in Heaven, where there is a perfect concord and agreement? But I confess, I am not able to express half the joy of this future felicity: *Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither hath it entered into the hearts of men to conceive, what a store of happiness God hath laid up in Heaven for those who are holy in all manner of conversation.

SECT. 8. Holiness accompanied with Peace.

There is nothing more suitable to, and agreeable with Humane nature, than Peace; as those who endure trouble and vexation can fully attest: Amongst earthly blessings it deserves not the last place, it being a mercy which crowns all others, and without which, the fullest fruition could not prove satisfactory.

Those languishing, and much to be pitied, Kingdoms, which now lie bathed in blood, can attest the evils and mischiefs of War, much more pathetically than words can express. How sweet and acceptable would Peace (a word always sounding sweetly) be to them?

Now the Apostle St. James hath given us a brief, but unquestionably true, account of the real causes of Wars and Fightings, Jam. 4.1. From whence come wars and fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members? From these sinful causes have all the disorders and jars in Kingdoms and private Societies had their real (I speak not of their pretended) original. How impetuous are the lusts of turbulent spirits! like the raging waves of the Sea, they are still in motion, casting forth filth and dirt. Ambition is so unquiet and restless a passion, that no man is ignorant what desolations it hath wrought in the earth: How many famous Kingdoms hath it ruined and destroyed? what inquietudes and disorders are occasioned by discontentment? All these are things so evident, that I need not enlarge upon them: but how repugnant are these vices to Holiness? and can it be rationally imagined that their genuine and proper effects can be more reconcilable with it?

I confess, Religion hath too frequently been pretended as a Cloak to dover the greatest Villanies, Confusions, and Rebellions: but sure I am, nothing imaginable contains a greater contradiction, than to say these impieties have a warrant from the sacred Laws of the Gospel, the combination of which is the rule of Holiness, as I have formerly explained. Is not Christ called the Prince of Peace, and the Gospel the Gospel of Peace? And it is certain, if men would be ruled by the Laws of so peaceable a Prince, they should be of a calm and quiet spirit: then should we indeed see Righteousness and Peace kissing each other.

When ever therefore we read in ancient prophesies of the great peace that shall be in the Messiahs reign, we must thereby understand, that the nature of the Gospel and its precepts are such, that if men would conform their lives to them, there should be an universal Peace. How strictly are all the causes of Envy, Contention, Ambition, and Rebellion, prohibited? and sure if these causes were removed, their effect should have no place: Then should the Bow be broken, and the Spear cut in sunder: Swords should be turned into Plough-shares, and the Instruments of War into more necessary uses: War should cease unto the ends of the earth, and Peace should be within each wall.

By this it is apparent how much holiness conduceth to the establishment of public peace. But that which I would more especially take notice of, is, the internal serenity and calmness of Conscience, which is the only effect of holiness: and truly upon this account there is no peace to the wicked.

I might here appeal to every man's breast, whether Holiness does not calm and quiet the Consciences of men; whileas a natural horror results from the commission of vice, more heavy than the severest lashes ever inflicted by Tityus or Rhadamanthus. What unspeakable peace and ease does attend holiness of life! there is no jar nor contention, no check of Conscience, nor wound of spirit, to disturb the inward repose of the Righteous: but that remorse that results from the commission of sin, even after men have acquired what they sinfully lusted after, is like that hand-writing, Dan. 5.5. which made the stout heart Belshazzar to tremble, and his knees to smite one against another: It troubles the thoughts of the most daring sinner, and makes him a terror to himself. There is no imaginable torment that can equal the terrors of an awakened guilty Conscience; it hath put men to choose strangling and death rather than life: all which is fully verified by the Word of truth: The spirit of a man can sustain his infirmity; but a wounded spirit who can bear?

O the secret pangs and fears that possess the spirits of wicked men! the severe checks and lashes of Conscience that seize upon transgressors, which all imaginable divertisements cannot quite stifle and suppress! All the attendance of the most dear Relations cannot give ease and comfort to them. How dismal and inconsolable was Spira's condition? how amazing are the very thoughts of those gnawings and horrors of Conscience he suffered? The fears and apprehensions of a future misery, mar all the joy and mirth of carnal men. In their most flourishing state it continually haunts them, and so fills them with horror and inquietude, that they cannot quietly enjoy themselves. Whilst the Soul acts within the Body, it cannot but present those horrid and disquieting reflections.

These are the men who in the midst of outward felicity are amazed with tormenting fears, which cannot be eradicated but by a sincere repentance.

But the holy Soul, in the extremity of outward troubles, enjoys an internal calmness and quiet of mind: the very Pagan, who could not be beyond doubt assured of the certainty of a future reward, could yet say,

—Hic murus athenaeus esto,

Nil conscire sibi, nulla palescere culpa.

But the Word of truth hath made this more unquestionably sure: Psal. 119.165. Great peace have they that love thy Law, and nothing shall offend them.

SECT. 9. Holiness the best evidence of true Wisdom, and real Worth, and Courage.

Wisdom and Courage having their rise and source from nobler Principles than external helps, have therefore in all Ages been esteemed excellent and venerable virtues, and much preferable to those others which depend upon external advantages. Wisdom is (as the Wise man speaks) the principal thing, Prov. 4.7. It is that virtue which in a peculiar manner raiseth the Humane nature above that of Brutes, who act without consideration and counsel. And Courage is that which subdueth that ignoble passion of fear, which hindereth men from attempting actions praise-worthy. Hence it is, that to be called a Fool, or Coward, are such reproachful denominations, that nothing imaginable is more shameful.

That Holiness is an infallible evidence of true Wisdom, is more plain than it can be doubted. In sacred Writ, Wisdom and Religion are used as convertible terms, as words expressing the same thing. And unto man he said, Behold, the fear of the Lord, that is wisdom, and to depart from evil, that is understanding, Job 28.28. Hence the impious and wicked are frequently called Fools, and men void of understanding and wisdom. And however this profane Age of ours hath accounted those men great Wits, who have cast off all Religion, and who Burlesque Scripture; who think it the greatest folly to be kept in awe by the fears of future danger, and to be kept in thralldom by the apprehension of an invisible being: yet men who consider things aright, have in all ages accounted those Atheists both fools and mad-men.

Fools, in condemning that which all wise men have assented to. But 'tis no wonder, since sin is that which overclouds and stupifies the judgment, and deprives them of those intellectual abilities whereby men acquire a right judgment of things. Alas! why should such be accounted wise, who cast themselves in the dirt and puddle, who contaminate and pollute their Souls, who prefer a temporal to an eternal felicity, who blindly and inconsiderately expose themselves to the wrath of a God-revenging sin? Sure the greatest Idiots are not comparably so unwise as these men, who venture their Souls upon such hazards.

There is nothing that doth so much debase Humane nature, as sin: the Psalmist, who but upon a surprisal vented his impatience and envy, yet characterizeth himself a fool for doing so, Psal. 73.22. So foolish was I, and ignorant: I was as a beast before thee. 'Tis Religion alone that is the most certain and uncontrovertable difference betwixt men and bruits. The very Pagan Satirist could say,

—Separat haec nos

A grege brutorum—

Reason will easily convince every man that will but take pains to consider, that those men who neglect their greatest interest, can never shun to be esteemed fools. Now to be serious and careful about the Soul, to be ascertained how it shall go with us in the other world, this is the greatest concern of man, about which the greatest care and diligence possible is little enough: and sure those men who design happiness (a thing implanted in the natures of men) must either make use of the right means in order to their acquiring of it, otherwise they too plainly proclaim their folly: but the holy Soul makes Religion its whole business; he knows that it is his greatest interest to be holy, and that without this he can never expect to be happy hereafter. And indeed, whatever may be the present apprehensions and thoughts of men, yet they shall ere long pass this verdict of circumspect walkers, That they were the only wise men: and the God of wisdom, who can give the best judgment in the case, does account the Saints to be wise men. Let us then hearken to the Apostles advice, Eph. 5.15. See that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise.

But as Holiness doth thus entitle men to wisdom, so doth it also promote true valor; it mightily conduceth to inspirit men with courage and magnanimity: The righteous are bold like a lyon; but the wicked flee when no man pursueth. And the reason of both is plain: the one hath secured his future state; but the other expects no better inheritance. And however wicked men may be very daring, yet they cannot be said to be truly valiant; for this is always rational and deliberate: but if wicked men should soberly consider the unspeakable hazard they run upon, they durst not be so daring; for what considering man would thus expose himself to danger to be esteemed gallant, who knows if he miscarry he is everlastingly miserable? If this merits the Encomium of courage, why may not those mad-men who inconsiderately expose themselves to danger, be also accounted valiant? Nay, the Horse that undauntedly, but inconsiderately, runs so many dangers, encounters so many perils in battle, may be as truly said to be valiant, as those men: But this is to mistake quite the true notion of courage.

That man that is affrighted with a small danger because it is present, but nothing amazed with a future danger which is certain and intolerable, is certainly both Fool and Coward. A Fool, in judging so badly, and mistaking his own interest and well-being: A Coward, in being afraid for a danger because it is present. He who runs from his Colours in time of Battle, proclaims himself to be a coward, although thereby he exposeth himself to a greater danger if he be apprehended, even the severe Sentence of the Martial Law justly inflicted upon Fugitives. How then can those men be accounted valiant, who for fear of some small danger they may run the hazard of here for Holiness, expose themselves to those vials of fury which is the portion of ungodly men hereafter?

SECT. 10. Holiness universally profitable, and above all things most advantageous.

In all secular affairs that concern practice, Gain and Advantage is the great argument and attracting inducement that prevails upon men; it is like oil to the wheel, making its motion more easy and swift. There is no danger so terrifying, but men have hazarded on, who have had this motive to animate them: this is it that prompts the Mariner to expose himself to the dangers of the merciless Ocean, that excites Servants to toil so industriously, and encourageth Soldiers to fight battles.

*That men may also be inspirited and allured to court Holiness upon the account of its utility and profit, I shall (abstracting from those advantages I have already instanced) now briefly discover that Holiness is, first, positable to men in every condition and state. Secondly, that it is attended with all outward blessings, and wants not a claim to a temporal felicity. Thirdly, That without it all other mercies are useless, and unable to quiet the Soul. Fourthly, That it is the most incomparable blessing, and frees the Soul from the worst of evils. Fifthly, That it is the best evidence of our being in favor with God, and of our adoption to God's Family. And Lastly, That it is the best cordial against the fears of death, and affords the greatest satisfaction to men lying on their beds of languishing.*

*That Ho••ness is proficable and advantageous to men in every condition and state, seems to be clearly enough asserted by the Apostle, when he says, Godliness is profitable for all things. But besides Scripture, Experience and Reason do jointly agree in the proof of this. That man that is advanced above others in riches, has no ground to expect honor and reverence from men, if he walk not according to the rule of Holiness; that is, if he be not moderate and compassionate, if he restrains not his ambition and pride: And sure, without this love and reverence from others, his condition is not very happy, he lies exposed to infinite dangers.*

Again, if a man be exposed to a mean and adverse estate, is environed with an infinite number of perplexing difficulties; yet this case is not altogether hopeless; for if he be not vicious, but on the contrary religious, besides the divine aid that is engaged for his relief, the circumstances he is stated in are apt motives to stir up bowels of compassion towards such a person.

Unless the Magistrate, who is invested with Supreme Power and Authority, imitate God in goodness as well as in greatness, his Authority will produce fear rather than love. The very Moralist could say, Sine bonitate nulla majestas. Those who will be at the pains to consult Experience, shall find that good Princes have always been in the greatest esteem; and sure it is the most unpardonable villainy, to attempt any evil against religious Kings.

Holiness is also profitable for Subjects to teach them obedience, and to submit, not merely upon the account of wrath, but for Conscience sake; which is certainly the only safe expedient to secure the obedience of Subjects: And, I confess, I know not how that man can be a true Subject to his earthly Prince, who stands not to offend the God of Heaven. I know some who have pretended to much Holiness, have been the greatest villains; but this proves not that the rule of Holiness gives a Supersedeas or allowance to any to disobey Authority.

Art thou a Parent? the rule of Holiness (to which holy men conform) will instruct thee to be gentle and tender to thy Children, and not to provoke them to wrath, which is the only thing that lessens their affection. Art thou a Child? it will teach thee to reverence and honor thy parents; in doing of which, thou entitlest thyself to the promise annexed to the fifth Commandment. In a word, it is profitable to make all manner of Relations live in quietness and peace, and to bestow mutual offices of love upon each other. It instructs men to be faithful in every calling and employment: and certainly the good man is to be trusted far rather than the wicked; for Religion lays an awe and restraint upon the one, but the other pretends no such motive to engage him to fidelity, especially if he may deceive and not be noticed. To this purpose Plutarch hath a notable saying: Pietate (saith he, Nat. Deor. lib. 1.) sublata, fides etiam & Societas humanae generis, & una excellentissima virtus justitia tollitur.

There are several things useful for some men, but altogether unprofitable for others; but Holiness is equally profitable for all; there are none exempt from tasting its utility, but those who exclude themselves by a vicious conversation.

Secondly, Holiness is attended with all outward blessings, and wants not a claim to a temporal felicity, Matth. 6.33. Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all other things shall be added unto you. The promise of inheriting the Earth (by which all temporal felicity is meant) is made to the meek: Matth. 5.8. Blessed are the meek; for they shall inherit the earth. And indeed, we find this blessing even promised to the posterity of those that fear the Lord, Psal. 25.13. And to put this beyond all doubt, we find the Psalmist repeating this five times in one Psalm, Psal. 37.9, 11, 22, 29, 34. And the great Apostle tells us, that it is Godliness that hath the promise of the life that now is, and of that which is to come, 1 Tim. 4.8. The God of Heaven hath also assured us, that he will withhold no good thing from them that walk uprightly. Upon this account well might Wisdom say, Prov. 8.18. Riches and honor are with me: a plain instance of which, we have in Solomon, who because of his asking Wisdom to govern his Subjects, when he might as freely have asked Riches and Honor, he receives this answer from God, I have also given thee both riches and honor, 1 King. 3.13.

But however this discriminating providence doth not so discernedly appear here, yet there is no man but can attest Vice hath impoverished thousands; there being several sins that have a natural tendency to poverty. By means of a whorish woman, a man is brought to a piece of bread, Prov. 6.26. The like we may truly enough say of several other sins. I have seen (saith the Psalmist) the wicked great in power, and spreading himself like a green bay-tree; yet he passed away, and lo, he was not: yea, I sought him, but he could not be found, Psal. 37.35, 36. I confess, good men may be reduced to great wants, may be destitute of necessary provisions; nay, how frequently is this the lot of the most excellent and gallant Souls? yet this may be safely said, That a little that a righteous man hath, is better than the riches of many wicked.

But then those things that best deserve the name of riches, because of their enriching the Soul, which being more excellent than the Body, must upon that account be of greater value than these things that only respect the Body, these are only peculiar to holy men: and such are the graces of the Holy Spirit, the combination of Christian virtues, the price of which is above that of Rubies. These are riches which are of a more lasting nature than those which the ignoble of the world call riches; they are not subject to the casualties which Gold and Silver and precious Stones are; which upon that account cannot be called a man's own, as Pagan Moralists have largely and excellently confirmed: And if we will not dispute with God, and contest his determination, we shall find one single virtue receiving a more ample commendation than ever riches did; 1 Pet. 3.4. The ornament of a meek and quiet spirit is in the sight of God of great price.

Although the holy and devout Soul may be reduced to our Savours straits, not to have where to lay his head; yet how can he be said to be poor, since he possesses him who is All? The most adverse chances that befall such a Soul, cannot denominate it poor; there is a Crown and Princely Inheritance which belongs to it. Nay, besides that glorious reversion, we have express promises that such Souls shall not be altogether destitute of necessaries to sustain and support them in this their pilgrimage.

I have already shown, that Honor and Pleasures are the attendants of Holiness: What in the world is more glorious, than for a man to conquer those lusts and inordinate appetites that seek the mastery over him? what pleasure is able to contest with those ravishing joys which result from a holy conversation? There is nothing imaginable that so exhilarates and revives men, as a calm and quiet Conscience. But I pass this.

In the next place I come to show, that the enjoyment of all other blessings can never profit that man that wants Holiness. This is plainly attested by our Savior, saying, What hath a man profited if he should gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? To have an affluence of temporal mercies, cannot so much as contribute to a present felicity, where the forementioned qualification is lacking. Outward favors, not attended and chained with real Holiness, contribute only to enhance the misery of their possessor; they being proper fuel to increase the flame of inquietude and restlessness, but unfit to allay it. The greatest plenty of riches cannot satisfy the covetous mind, which like the Grave cries Give, give. The whole world could not satisfy Alexander's insatiable ambition; but, as the Poet speaks,

Aestuat infoelix angusto limite mundi.

'Tis indeed impossible for a man to enjoy that earthly felicity he designs, if he want Holiness: For, suppose he be possessed of it, yet the secret acknowledgement of a superior power, impairs the delights that do arise from such a state, and makes him in the height of his fancied felicity startle and quake. Conscience, upon the apprehension of guilt, and the vengeance due to it, recoils upon the sinner, and disturbs his quiet enjoyment of the pleasures he might otherwise freely enough delight in. O how does it molest and torment him to have an inward principle of Fear haunting the sinner in his most retired enjoyment of pleasures, which cannot be silenced by his utmost endeavors! This, this is it that torments him with anguish and confusion, that allays the imaginary pleasure of the most charming Lust, and in the midst of laughter makes his heart heavy: which fully verifies the truth of what I said, that the enjoyment of all other blessings can never free a man from torment, nor a whit profit him that is destitute of Holiness.

Fourthly, Holiness is the most incomparable blessing, and frees the Soul from the worst of evils. What David said of Goliath's Sword, I may more safely say of Holiness, There is none like it; nothing in the world so apt to remove those disasters and turmoiling fears that inwardly work upon and damp the minds of men with severe checks and lashes, as Holiness, which being diametrically opposite to sin, which is the worst of evils, must therefore by a necessary consequence be the best of blessings.

Now seeing contraries placed near to other are the more discernible, I shall therefore take a short view of the evil and malignity of sin, that hereby the beauty and excellency of Holiness may appear the brighter, and have the greater force to conquer our affections.

To express the evil and malignity of sin, Scripture represents it by the most ugly and abominable things, by the most dangerous and terrible Diseases: Nay, the great Apostle seems to want language and comparisons too, to express the evil of it, when he calls it exceedingly evil, as if he had said, it infinitely transcends all other evils; the malignity of which, no Pen can fully delineate and describe, either in its nature or consequences.

In its Nature; the Scripture-character of it is, it is an enmity against God; a transgression and voluntary violation of his most holy and righteous Law; a disobedience of his Authority, and a wicked contempt of all the divine Attributes: 'tis the woeful stain and blemish of our Natures, the disease of our Souls, and the reproach of our Reason.

The consequences of sin are fearful and fatal. So bad a cause can never fail to produce the worst effects; for besides all the temporal calamities and mischiefs that befall Mankind, those unspeakable miseries and extreme torments that accompany men to the other world, are also the dreadful and sad effects of sin. I have already shown, that every vice is naturally attended with some particular punishment: but that indeed which is most terrible, which should mightily amaze and startle the sinner, are the dreadful miseries of another world: Alas! how dismal is the condition of those men who have lost the divine Image, and consequently his love and favor, and are liable to his fury and wrath? who are possessed with a legion of impure lusts, which lead them captive, and hurry them headlong to perdition, where they must have their everlasting abode with impure spirits and devouring flames.

How impossible is it to give a just List and Catalogue of the sad and dreadful consequences of sin, or fully describe the evil and malignity of it! But yet this imperfect glance may in part satisfy and inform us, that a holy and virtuous life, which excludes all those mischiefs and inconveniencies which both in this and the next life attend sin, is the best of blessings, and frees us from the worst of evils.

Fifthly, Holiness is the best evidence of our being in favor with God, and of our adoption to God's Family. How sedulous and inquisitive are many good Christians to understand their spiritual state and condition, that they may know into which of the two regions of the other world they shall be stated after death? This is certainly a matter of the greatest consequence, and deserves every man's most serious consideration; a mistake here being so exceedingly dangerous, like a wound in the vital parts, it proves mortal and incurable if continued in. Now the most infallible mark and character of our being in favor with God, and that which comprehends all others, is that which the beloved Apostle sets down, 1 Joh. 3.7, 8, 9, 10. Little children, let no man deceive you: he that doth righteousness is righteous. (And everyone that doth righteousness is born of God, Chap. 2.29.) He that committeth sin is of the Devil—Whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin—In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the Devil: Whosoever doth not righteousness, is not of God. Let men pretend what they will, if they be destitute of righteousness, they are of their Father the Devil, and can claim no interest in God as their Father; seeing it is purity of Spirit that gives us a title to be the Children of the most high; 2 Cor. 6.17, 18. Be ye separate, and touch not the unclean thing, and I will receive you, and will be a Father unto you, and ye shall be my sons and daughters, saith the Lord Almighty. The whole tenor of the Scripture abounds with so many such instances, that I shall supersede a tedious citation of texts.

This then being so infallible and certain a character, methinks every rational man may quickly come to the knowledge of his spiritual estate. A bad man may certainly enough know whether he breaks the divine Laws, and goes in a continued course of sin; and a good man may sufficiently know whether he obeys the divine Laws, and is sincere in his actions. These are things so plain and undeniable, that all doubts of this kind are ridiculous. Now 'tis no difficulty to draw these plain inferences: I break the divine Laws, therefore I am not of God: or, I obey them, therefore I am a Child of God. And thus every considering man, who impartially considers, and exactly examines his life and actions, may be fully enough ascertained whether he be a Child of God or not. Alas! how useless and dangerous is it to ascend unto Heaven to search the secret and eternal Decrees of God, which belong not to us to pry into, that we may know whether our Names be written in the Book of Life or not? He that doth righteousness needs not fear any latent Decree concerning his reprobation; and it is the vainest thing imaginable, for impenitent and obstinate sinners to dream that God hath from eternity elected them to life. The pure nature of God is so perfectly opposite to sin, that it is quite impossible there can be any agreement betwixt him and sinners, no more than there can be betwixt light and darkness. The Psalmist acquaints us, That he is not a God that hath pleasure in wickedness. And the Apostle hath told us, That the wrath of God is revealed from Heaven against all ungodliness and unrighteousness of men. But yet the righteous Lord loveth the righteous: These are the men whom he esteems his Children, to whom the promises of eternal life belong.

In the last pace, there is nothing in the world that will prove so effectual to comfort men at the hour of death, as the sweet thoughts of their being separated from the pollutions of the world. How unspeakably comfortable is it for men, when they are just stepping into the other world, to reflect upon the good life they have led, and that they carry in their bosoms Consciences void of offense both towards God and towards man? This is indeed that noble and Sovereign Cordial that revives the spirits of good men, in their passage through the valley and shadow of death, and makes their comforts abound and overflow.

Death is not so small a matter as some men think; in Scripture it is not unfitly called the King of terrors: Now nothing can free men from the terror of it, but a good Conscience; and this cannot be had without Holiness, which makes all calm and serene within. It will afford men little pleasure when they come to die, to reflect upon the earthly pleasures they have enjoyed: these things profit not in the day of wrath; but the Conscience of well doing makes men salute death without dread and astonishment, and lift up their heads with joy, because the day of their redemption approacheth.

But with the ungodly and wicked it is not so; then their sins stare them in their face, and so terrify and affright them, that no wonder though in the extremity of their agony they prefer strangling and death to life. If holy Job doth so heavily complain of the terrors of God, how much more terrifying shall the apprehensions of a severe and terrible judgment be to the unsanctified and polluted? To think how shortly he must be everlastingly separate from the good things he enjoyed here, and be cast into utter darkness, to have his portion with the damned in devouring Flames, to be an everlasting resident in the Lake of fire and brimstone, where he shall be continually tormented with that gnawing worm that never dies: These are the amazing thoughts that will seize upon the sinner: his Conscience then will not sleep; nothing will be able to allay those Storms and Tempests that are raised by the fearful expectation of the reward due to sin. At death, men are generally wiser than at other times; then they begin to consider what they have been doing, and call themselves fool a thousand times for their disobedience and wickedness. The smoke of worldly cares that formerly blinded their eyes, are now dispelled; they see their folly, when it is too late to mend it; and if they do no more, yet Balaam-like, they will cry, O that I might die the death of the righteous!

CHAP. IV. Frivolous Cavils and Objections removed.

The former Chapters having discovered the Beauty of Holiness, and the mighty power and force of Arguments that excite to the practice of it; one who weighs all this by the measures of equity, cannot (as any man would think) but look upon it as the strangest prodigy, that so just a Cause should miss of its effect, and find the sons of men, who pretend to be such Masters of Reason, so monstrously foolish in rejecting it upon the account of some frivolous and very fallacious cavils: But the truth is, resolute Impiety is set upon the Bench and made Judge; and no wonder though it pass an unjust sentence, and condemn Holiness because of its opposition to Vice.

The common imputations and prejudices which wicked men load Holiness with, I shall reduce to the four following Heads, First, Holiness lays upon men heavy burdens, and grievous to be born: which makes human life joyless and uneasy, they being so inconsistent, first, with Peace; and secondly, with Pleasure and Satisfaction.

Secondly, Experience informs us, that wicked men enjoy pleasure and satisfaction in their ways, there being no men so jovial and merry as they; and that men who pretend to Holiness are sullen and melancholy, and are exposed to heavy sufferings and trials.

Thirdly, 'Tis singularity and ambition that prevail more with men than any other motive to be holy.

Fourthly, 'Tis the greatest piece of folly, ignorance, and impudence, for men to quit with present pleasures for mere uncertainties.

The first being the most material Objection, I shall therefore more largely and distinctly examine it; and in doing of this, I shall desire these four things may be considered. First, that the divine Laws are not grievous and uneasy. Secondly, that Vice is much more troublesome and difficult than Virtue. Thirdly, that Holiness conduceth both to the Peace and Happiness of human Societies, and to the temporal Advantage of private persons. And Fourthly, that there is a great deal of more pleasure in the ways of Holiness, than in the commission of sin.

That the divine Laws are not grievous and uneasy, but extremely reasonable and wise, is a truth I have already made plain, when I discoursed of the rule of Holiness. The whole tenor of the Laws of Christianity being so exceedingly suitable to the very nature of men, it cannot be rationally supposed that they can be grievous to them. St. Paul to the Philippians, gives us a brief and compendious, but very full and comprehensive, account of what things the Laws of our Christianity enjoin, viz. Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, and whatsoever things are of good report: all which are so agreeable to Reason, that even the light of Nature prompts men to the doing of them, and fully discovers itself to be an irreconcilable Enemy to all kind of vices.

'Tis not then Reason, but the impetuous Lusts of men, that determines a holy Law to be grievous and uneasy: and indeed, no wonder though this unjust Judge make Holiness appear formidable, and represent it as grievous to Mankind; it being so much the interest of this partial Judge to condemn it as criminal, and to decry it as a yoke intolerable and grievous to be born. 'Tis not probable that the most innocent shall pass uncondemned, when an Enemy is set up in the Judgment seat to pass Sentence: our blessed Savior must be pronounced guilty by Pilate, although even this unjust Judge openly professed, he found no fault in him. And seeing our great Law-giver met with so severe a sentence, who can expect anymore upright verdicts should pass upon his Laws?

But that the divine Laws are not indeed grievous to be born, may easily appear from plain Texts of Scripture (which is the only infallible rule.) Our great Lord hath himself taught his Disciples, That his yoke is easy, and his burden light. And one of his inspired Disciples has assured us, that his commands are not grievous: two Texts sufficient methinks to remove all those prejudices that are cast upon a holy life, as if it were full of fatigue and trouble.

But besides Scripture, Reason and Experience too, come in to witness this truth. First, Reason bears witness that the divine Commands are extremely reasonable and natural; and is it not against the common vote of Mankind, to say, What is natural, is uneasy and difficult? Men who impose hard and grievous tasks upon others, are by all men condemned as unreasonable; which certainly implies, that whatever is reasonable, is not grievous and difficult. 'Tis true, sinners, who by their many-repeated acts of disobedience have contracted a habit of sin, do indeed commit it with less trouble than those who first engage to this Tyranny; as Slaves, who by custom look upon that as easy, which at their first entrance upon such a slavery was very difficult and grievous: And yet whatever ease the most daring sinner may pretend is to be found in the acts of sin, I durst appeal to his own breast, whether he might not with a great deal of more ease, and less fatigue, have kept the divine Laws, than he met with in breaking of them.

*I confess, the Laws of Christianity are not natural in a strict and confined sense; but only in so far as they correspond with, and are suitable to, the nature of Mankind: hence some sins are said to be unnatural; not because all sins may not adopt to themselves that title, but because upon a more peculiar and special account, all men are sensible that they are brutish, and unbecoming any who carry in their bosom a rational Soul. There is not any vice, but it infests and prejudges Nature. Anger is a degree of Madness, that violently transports men, and quite mars their inward ease and repose. Revenge, a more lasting and deliberate fury, preys upon the Soul where it resides, and so distracts and hurries it with inquietude and restlessness, that nothing imaginable can be supposed a greater Enemy to Nature, how sweet soever and luscious it may seem to depraved nature. Intemperance, and Uncleanness, are sins which debase Humane nature below that of beasts, and are the cause of many intolerable pains and Diseases, which make Humane life but an uneasy burden. But besides all these troubles, we may add that horror of Conscience that haunts the sinner with fear and astonishment. All which contribute to clear the truth of what I assert.*

Again, Reason tells a man, that it cannot be grievous to him to perform that which is so much his interest and advantage. Men in their secular concerns find no difficulties in any undertaking wherein their interest is concerned; and sure it is man's greatest interest to keep the divine Precepts, as I have already at some length discovered. 'Tis an excellent saying, of as excellent an Author: Reason (says he) must first cease to be Reason, and commence Phrenzie, before 'tis possible it can set itself in defiance of those Laws of Christ, which are accommodated to its greatest interest. Causes of the decay of Christian Piety, Chap. 5.

But besides Reason, Experience bears also witness to this truth, that the divine Laws are not grievous. But before I proceed to prove this, I shall premise two Cautions: First, when I say that Experience makes it plain, that the Laws of Christianity are not grievous; I do not mean that a sinner when he first forsaketh his sins, and betakes himself to a holy and virtuous life, shall encounter with no difficulties; no sure, this cannot reasonably be expected: for his former habit in sin will at the first give him work enough; he has an old custom to oppose and struggle with, which will cost him no small pains to overcome. Secondly, far less must we fondly imagine that the Law of Christianity is so easy, as supersedes and gives a discharge to human industry, vigilancy, and care: they are but strangers to a holy life, and never knew what it is to obey God's Commands, who never were at any pains, nay who are not very industrious and careful to observe them. When our Savior says, his yoke is easy, he does not hereby intend to persuade men to be like Solomon's sluggard; sure Heaven was never designed for loiterers in God's Vineyard: but his intent there, is to remove a common prejudice men were like to entertain against Christianity, as if it were an intolerable yoke, and insupportable task: now this Christ forewarns his Disciples is not true.

These two things being premised, I now appeal to Experience (which often corrects error in speculation) whether the Laws of Heaven or Hell are most grievous. And to condescend as far as possible, I shall not here call in the Experiences of good men, who all unanimously assent that there is more ease and less fatigue in obeying, than in breaking the divine Laws; but I shall submit to the sinners own testimony, when he is in his most sober state; I mean, when he is under the extremity of some pain inflicted by his sins, or when he lies upon his death-bed: at other times, when he is in the pursuit of some Lust, no wonder though he pass as unjust a sentence as sick men do of tastes, who having their palates infected with some venomous and filthy humor, judge everything, be it really never so pleasant, to be bitter and harsh.

Go then to sinners when they come to themselves (as it is said of the Prodigal, He came to himself, as if he had been before mad or distracted) and ask them whether they sinde more trouble in their doing or omitting of sin? Ask the Drunkard, who by his intemperance lies smarting under the tormenting pains of the Gout, whether he had been wiser, and suffered less trouble, if he had been temperate, and abstained from excess? Nay, besides the diseases that many, if not most of vices bring upon men, there are some sins that make men sensibly in the time find pain and trouble. Go to the Lascivious and Wanton person who is tormented with the Pox, and ask whether his sin be grievous to him or not? There are few sins which are not attended with grievous concomitants. But I shall not insist.

I confess, no men's Experiences are so likely to demonstrate this truth, nor are more pertinently appealed to, as theirs who have once experimented the pleasures and pains of both states: Ask therefore those who were once Drunkards and Adulterers, but are now sanctified and settled in a course of Holiness; and I am sure they shall verily testify, that it is only Satan's Yoak that is uneasy and burthensome.

But granting that there is some difficulty in the exact observation of the Laws of Christianity, (as sure any man who consults the corruption of his own nature, and the depraved inclinations thereof, against which they are levelled, will never deny) yet if this shall be judged a good Argument to cancel the Laws of Christianity, all Laws whatsoever shall be quite dashed out, and banished the world; for who shall be guilty, if he may have the liberty to use this for a relevant excuse?

This being then so unreasonable to imagine, (and if it should be admitted, should yet never a whit excuse the sinner, who to his experience finds sin to be so uneasy and troublesome) yet I shall add two Considerations that demonstrate, the Laws of Christianity are more easy than any other Laws that ever were invented; and that they are not (as carnal men represent them) hard sayings which none can bear. First, the Author of the Gospel-precepts hath offered to us an assistance, able to conquer all the difficulties that can be supposed to attend the keeping of his Mandates. 'Tis true, if Christ had enjoined his followers to obey a Law which could not possibly be kept; I confess, in that case, his Commands had been grievous, and his Yoak insupportable: Or if he had been satisfied with no less than perfect innocence, and unsinning obedience, I do not see how this prejudice and cavil could have been removed. But he who prescribed those Precepts, considered the frailties of our nature, and the weakness of man in this lapsed estate; and therefore he has provided help for us, if we will but be at the pains seriously to implore it; For he giveth his Spirit to them that ask it. And upon this account the beloved Apostle encourageth Christians to obey the precepts of the Gospel, because, Greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world.

Secondly, The excellency of the Reward that is promised to the obedient, is a most noble consideration to make men (as the Psalmist speaks) run the way of God's Commandments. The promissory part of the Gospel, renders the preceptive part easy. Methinks the holy Soul should with comfort thus express itself, when the greatest difficulties offer: Good God! shall I be discouraged to obey the hardest (if anything proceeding from infinite Wisdom and Goodness can be said to be difficult) of thy Commandments, when so glorious a prize is the reward thereof? If a terrene and temporal felicity animates others to encounter the most Giant-difficulties, how much more unconcernedly should I slight all hazards, and contemn by a fearless courage all dangers, for that blessed hope that is set before me? Can I remember there is a Kingdom promised, and yet be terrified from it by supposed difficulties, or complain that the way is inaccessible? Do I really know that it is indeed a good Land, and am yet discouraged to attempt the taking of it, because it will require some violence? Shall I, like the Reubenites and Gadites, set up my rest on this side of Jordan, notwithstanding this proposal of Canaan? No sure, eternal Life is too noble a prize to be lost, for fear of fighting the Good fight. I regard no difficulties while I eye the Crown; I cannot think those Precepts grievous, that are enforced by so many excellent promises. So great a recompense of reward should, methinks, inspire the dullest Heart, and sweeten the hardest Service; should make any one willing and content to sacrifice his most beloved lusts, to cut off the right Hand, and pluck out the right eye, which stand in the way, and hinder him from entering into Heaven.

Having thus endeavored to explain upon what account the Laws of Christianity are not grievous, I hope I shall not need to insist long upon the following particulars. At first sight it seems plain, that since the case is so, Vice must certainly be more troublesome than Virtue; and that it is easier for men to live holily, than wickedly: and yet, I know not by what strange artifice, Holiness has had the bad luck to be represented as being extremely difficult. I confess, I intend not to inveigh against the sacred Tribe of Levi, who have represented Heaven almost as unaccessible, as the Israelitish Spies did the good Land of Canaan; knowing they thereby only design to raise men's endeavors: although I could have wished that they had considered better, how readily men of corrupt minds and vicious practices lay aside all care of God's Commandments, upon this suggestion, that they are grievous; and are deterred from a holy and virtuous life.

But that Vice is more troublesome and uneasy than Virtue, will (besides what I have formerly said) appear to be so, from the following Considerations. First, Sacred Records represent sinners as men who wear themselves with sin; and the Prophet Isaiah describes their trouble by a very apt similitude, Isa. 57.20. The wicked is like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt. The ways of sin are frequently called crooked paths, and wicked men are said to walk astray; whileas the way of Holiness and Virtue is said to be a straight and high way: All which Phrases plainly enough imply, that the former is full of intricacy and perplexities, and the latter plain and easy.

Experiences to prove this, are every day so multiplied, that they may abundantly serve to silence all doubts. The Drunkard can experimentally tell the costliness of his sin, and the tormenting diseases that are frequently the effect of an overcharged Stomach; the uneasy belchings and overturnings within, the grievous pains of Head and Joynts. The Wanton and Lascivious can produce his painful boils and sores, to witness the uneasiness of Lust; at best, he can only produce an hectic Body. But besides those loathsome diseases that are the effects of Lasciviousness, how restless and uneasy is the condition of such persons? But how impossible is it to give a just list of those miseries that Wantonness and Intemperance hurry men to? To what a multitude of amazing difficulties does Pride expose men! what mischiefs, jars and contests does it raise? Envy and Revenge torment men's spirits, and so disquiet and perturb them, that men may as well take fire into their bosom, and pretend they perceive no torment, as lodge those horrid lusts in their breasts without the sense of their extreme misery and pain. The Covetous mind is never at rest, but is ever craving and desirous of more. But to show how troublesome the practice of every sin is, requires a larger discourse than I can well allow.

But how easy is Virtue, if compared with Vice? At what trouble and pains are men, to invent a lie? and when they have contrived it, they cannot but be afraid lest it be discovered. But how easy is it to speak the truth? With how much art and pains do men trouble themselves to conceal their vices? The Adulterer is wearied with watching convenient opportunities, and afraid lest he be discovered; whileas the chaste person enjoys himself quietly, and is troubled with no such attender. The covetous Miser is cruciate and tormented with a desire of what he cannot expect; is extremely tormented by an incessant care, lest he lose what he hath, and ever toiling to acquire more; whileas the virtuous Soul is contented with what he enjoyeth, and grudgeth not to bestow a part of what is his to others.

There is no man who is not quite given up to commit all manner of wickedness, and whose conscience is not seared as with a hot Iron, but can tell by his experience, how perplexing and uneasy Vice is. And to make this yet more plain, I shall add these few following Reasons. First, the nature of Vice is so reproachful, that men are even troubled to coin shifts to avoid the owning it; and sure this cannot but be uneasy to men. Secondly, the most viciously inclined persons, who will not practice, yet are forced for their interest to pretend Virtue, and usually indeed become greater Zealots than those who are really virtuous: But this cannot but be exceedingly troublesome to them, it being against their inclinations, and contradictory to the internal sentiments of their minds. And besides, at what pains are they to make other men believe that they are real in what they only pretend? Thirdly, Vice is very perplexing and difficult, upon the account that it requires hard, if not impossible performances: the Covetous mind is prompted to attempt many difficulties to obtain what it craves, and after all is disappointed. Nay, indeed, Covetousness is a vice so uneasy and troublesome, that it proposeth what can never be acquired: for after it hath got what is designed, it is restless, and as ready to say Give, give, as ever. But Lastly, that which contributes most to render Vice uneasy, are those after-pangs of Conscience which fill the Soul with horror and amazement; the consciousness of guilt stings and torments it, and makes the sinner a terror to himself. 'Tis impossible either to gag or corrupt Conscience, that it shall never give any check. But now how quieting and solacing is Virtue? no man ever yet complained that terrors haunted him for living holily. O how do the thoughts of a virtuous life refresh men in the midst of greatest dangers? Let us go to sinners on their deathbed, and then we shall find this truth preached to the full; an evidence valid enough to condemn sin as the uneasiest thing imaginable.

And thus we have seen how many difficulties attend sin, both before, and after it is committed. And now what reason can any man allege for the pretended easiness of sin? I confess, I know not anything, except it be custom, that can be pertinently adduced; but how weak is this Plea? for although Custom, which is a second nature, may contribute very much to stupefy the Judgment, and harden the Conscience, and so consequently make Vice the more easy; yet we can hardly suppose that ever Humane nature will so far assimilate the nature of mere Animals, as to be deprived of Reason and Conscience: And sure, so long as any of these remain, Vice must needs meet with opposition. But Secondly, if men will compare the easiness of Virtue and Vice, they must put them in equal circumstances; and then I doubt not but Vice shall stand condemned, as the great troubler of peace and quietness. For instance, let us suppose that a man is accustomed to a holy life, and is habituate to live soberly, righteously, and godly; in this case, let any man make but the experiment, and I am sure he shall ingenuously acknowledge, that a good life affords more tranquility and peace, than Vice dares lay claim to.

And yet, I know not by what bad luck, Holiness has been represented as opposite to men's present welfare, and hurtful to their peace and tranquility. How groundless this prejudice is, I have already endeavored to show. I shall therefore now only in a few words make it plain, that Holiness is the most effectual method that can be taken, to exalt the public peace and happiness of a Nation. And Secondly, that it infinitely conduceth to the happiness, peace, and tranquility of particular persons; and that nothing is so inconsistent with, and hurtful to both, as sin.

How much Holiness tends to the advancement of public peace in a Kingdom and Nation, appears very plainly from the Wise man's observation, Prov. 14.34. Righteousness exalteth a nation; but sin is the reproach of any people. And the Apostle St. James gives us a true account of the causes of public jars, Jam. 4.1. From whence come wars and sightings amongst you? are they not hence, even from your lusts that war in your members? If mankind had not corrupted their ways, and degenerated from their pristine purity, how peaceable and happy had human societies been? but in this lapsed state, Ambition, Pride, and Injustice act their tragical parts, and so tend to the destruction of human societies, that if there did not remain some sparks and remainders of Religion, 'tis not possible that human society could evite an utter ruin. And he that well ponders the settled course of divine Providence, shall easily assent, that in all Ages Righteousness and Virtue have been rewarded with a temporal tranquility and happiness; and that fruitful lands have been turned into barrenness, for the wickedness of them that dwell therein. And indeed 'tis very reasonable to think that the divine Justice will reward a righteous Nation, and punish a rebellious People. 'Tis true, he may defer his Judgments for a while, yet his Justice will not always give place to mercy and forbearance; but a Nation that continueth and increaseth its provocations, must expect to be punished in this world, (which is the only proper place) as a righteous Land may expect a present reward.

That Holiness doth also conduce to the peace and quietness of particular persons, is nothing less evident from Scripture: Psal. 119.165. Great peace have they that love thy Law, and nothing shall offend them: but the wicked is like the troubled sea when it cannot rest, whose waters cast up mire and dirt, Isa. 57.20. I have once and again shown, that there can be no inward tranquility and peace, where Holiness is wanting: the very thoughts of God, which above all things are most sweet, are notwithstanding troublesome to wicked men. But because Humane nature is in this degenerate state extremely sunk down into Sense, and more apt to be wrought upon by temporal advantages, than what only concern the Soul, and have a prospect to things that are future; I have also in the former part of this Discourse endeavored to make plain, how advantageous Holiness is upon the foresaid account; and that length of days are in her right hand, and in her left hand riches and honor: That her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths peace: That Godliness is great gain, having the promises of the life that now is, as well as of that which is to come. And indeed, any man, who considers the nature and reason of the thing, cannot but be inclined to think it must be so: For how can that man be exposed to trouble and disquietment, who hath gotten the mastery over his Passions? And I dare appeal to the sinners own experience, whether vices have not been prejudicial to his health, macerated his Body, and filled him with tortures and pains? whether some sins have not brought him to poverty and disgrace, ruined both his estate and fame? Can any man produce any good effect that ever sin caused? sure, if men would speak impartially, they should acknowledge all this to be true.

That there is a great deal of more pleasure in the ways of Holiness than in the commission of sin, (which is the fourth thing proposed to be considered) needs not puzzle any man to prove it. How delightful are all acts of Piety and Virtue? how inexpressible is that comfort that the devout Soul finds in conversing with God? Well might the Psalmist say, Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart, Psal. 97.11. he often experienced that sweetness and satisfaction that is the result of obedience; whileas Solomon, who could pass the best verdict of sensual pleasures, yet concludes them to be but vanity and vexation of spirit.

There be two things that allay the pleasures of sin: First, the unruliness of immoderate passions, which fret and vex the minds of men, and hinder the sinner from tasting its pleasure. Secondly, the fear of an invisible being, armed to punish them for their misdemeanors: Conscience, upon the apprehension of guilt, recoils upon the sinner, and mars all the pleasure he promised himself to enjoy: This made Belshazzar, a King, and environed with his Nobles, tremble and quake in the midst of his cups. But supposing vices did bring as much pleasure along with them as they pretend, yet upon two accounts they are not half so delicious as the pleasures that spring from a good life. First, the pleasures of sin are so interrupted, of a short duration, or, as the Apostle expresseth them, they are but for a season: how quickly will a period be put to all these pleasures, which now make so much noise? They are very fitly compared by Solomon, to the crackling of thorns under a pot, which are scarce sooner in a blaze, than they vanish; but the joys that spring from a good conversation, are at their lowest ebb here: they do indeed continue, for no man taketh away this joy; but Heaven is the designed place for the good Soul to feed upon those Rivers of pleasures that are at God's right hand for evermore. Secondly, sensual pleasures do soon cloy men's appetites: we cannot enjoy long any sensual delight, but we are quickly weary of it: but it is not so with spiritual delights; 'tis only the absence of them, when suspended for our sins, that troubles and molests us. 'Tis impossible that sensual pleasures can satisfy the soul of man, which was never framed for a Mahometan Paradise; nor can it be rationally expected, that he who is conscious to himself of guilt, should be free from fear; which being so tormenting, can never permit men to enjoy pleasure freely.

But let us descend to sensual pleasures, and we shall find, that he who is temperate and moderate, is more likely to relish the pleasantness of Meat, Drink, and Pastime, than the intemperate and immoderate. He who relieves the Poor, and refresheth the Needy, cannot but find more real sweetness and satisfaction in doing so, than he who drinks away his Estate. He who speaks the truth, finds not those tormenting checks of Conscience which are the just reward of lying. But all this will more plainly appear, by the Solution of the next Objection.

The second Imputation is brought from Experience; namely, that wicked men are for ordinary very jovial and cheerful, and enjoy a great deal of satisfacton in their ways; whereas men who pretend to Piety and Holiness, are very sad and disconsolate.

To this I answer; That the Question is not, whether wicked men have some pleasure in their sins, or not? but, whether that pleasure that ariseth from a good life, be not infinitely preferable to these? Alas! the most promising sensual pleasure (supposing it to be lawful) is much inferior to the satisfaction and comfort that springs from a good Conscience. How much more inconsiderable must sinful pleasures be, which are attended with so black and dismal consequences? Indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish upon every soul of man that doth evil. Sinful pleasures are at the best but short; and sure this, consideration contributes very much to lessen their value; But that which makes them so mean, and not worth the enjoying, is the painful Eternity that succeeds to them.

However then the wicked may appear jovial and merry, yet their inward thoughts (if we could discover them) cannot be at quiet and ease: Whatever pleasure they may reap in the present act, yet they cannot afterwards look unto themselves without horror and amazement: The after-stings of sin are so painful, that he buys those present pleasures at a rate no reasonable man would purchase them.

But that wicked men cannot really enjoy that pleasure and contentment they pretend to, seems very plain from Reason. For first, How can any man be satisfied with those actions which are so cross to his very nature, and opposite to Reason, as every sin is? Can a man find pleasure in doing that which he knows he ought not to do? sure the reboundings of Conscience, upon the apprehension of doing amiss, will soon rase out any pleasure that sin affords; and a sick man may more rationally expect rest, than those men pleasure and contentment. Secondly, it can afford little pleasure to men, to act quite contrary to their own interests; it is rather like the laughter of fools and mad men, than a real pleasure, that such men can pretend to. Now every sinner quite ruins his interest and happiness, while he runneth headlong to destruction; and for a present pleasure, which is only grateful to the sensual appetite, loseth those lasting Rivers of pleasure, which, though future, are yet certain, and which are calculated for the Soul. Thirdly, What pleasure can any man enjoy, who is sure to be eternally tormented? As there is no peace, so no pleasure to the wicked, who are at odds with God, whose favor is better than life.

But what reason have good men to be sad and disconsolate, since all the causes of grief are removed from them? Light is sown for the righteous, and gladness for the upright in heart; so that the Apostle had good reason to double that Exhortation, Rejoice in the Lord, again I say rejoice. O how satisfying and pleasant is it for men to act reasonably, and to be assured that they have done their duty, and have acted for their own interest! Our rejoicing is this, (saith the Apostle) the testimony of our consciences, that in all simplicity and godly sincerity we have had our conversation in the world.

Sure there was never any man who was troubled for living holily, there being no reason why any should: 'Tis true, good men may be of a melancholy disposition, and naturally inclined to sadness; but this can be no reflection on Holiness, as if it were the cause of that melancholy temper: nay, the best of men have their own failings, and no wonder though these breed some trouble and disquiet: But this is not to be disconsolate for being good, but for doing evil. And indeed, I may add, that the great abominations and profanity, the contempt of Religion, and dishonor that is done to God that abounds, may very rationally make good men with the Psalmist say, Rivers of tears run down my eyes, because men observe not thy Law.

And thus this imputation cast upon Holiness, is easily wiped off. Grief and sadness are not the effect of a good life; but of an imperfect obedience: And while our sins call for mourning and fasting, it were a piece of madness for men to be jovial and merry, and entertain themselves with those deceitful melodies, which will end in weeping and gnashing of teeth.

And yet the sorrow of truly good men is not so obvious to the eye of men, as it is to him who is the searcher of the heart; it is rather the artifice of the formal Penitent, and hypocritical Professor, than the character of the Righteous, to disfigure their faces, and appear sad and demure. A good man chooseth rather, with David, to mourn in secret, and when he appears in public to wash his face, than with those Hypocrites of whom Isaiah speaks, who bow down their head like a bull-rush, who have chosen affliction rather than innocence.

The next imputation cast upon Holiness is, that it is but a piece of singularity, and a vain ambition to walk alone. Ans. I am heartily sorry that the universal deluge of Impiety should make good men say as once Elijah did in another case, I am only left: the few number of good men, compared with the vast multitude and Armies of transgressors, makes them to be esteemed singular and precise; and brings upon them the wrath and fury of ungodly sinners, because they will not run with them to the same excess of riot, and wallow in the mire as they do. But truly this charge is not more rational, than if a company of mad men should call one a singular fool, because he does not comply with them in all their extravagant actings, which do really rather require pity and compassion than imitation.

I doubt not but Singularity in some cases is a very intolerable temper, and unbecoming any man who pretends wisdom: but yet, if it be universally condemned, and in no case admitted as reasonable, I do not see but the charge will rebound upon the sinner, who in this degenerate age thinks the worse of himself, if he exceed not others in wickedness.

But since Holiness is so conformable to Humane reason, so advantageous and beneficial to every man; what madness is it to condemn it as singular? Sure, he who intends to walk as a man who is of a good understanding, (as good men are said to be) who intends to mind his interest and happiness, will never be frightened from Holiness, because may be it is not in vogue, nor become the mode of the Kingdom. If a whole Kingdom (excepting a few) should rebel against their Prince, would it be any blot upon these sew Loyal Subjects, that they affected Singularity?

But this cavil is so insignificant and silly, that I need not enlarge. Sure, since Holiness is the peculiar excellency and noble embellishment of Humane nature; since it is so venerable and lovely, and of all perfections the most excellent; he must be degenerate to the brutal nature, who condemns Singularity in Holiness; for this is in truth a condemning a man because he is more excellent than his neighbor, as the righteous is said to be in Scripture.

The last heavy Charge is, that it is folly and madness for men to quit with their present pleasures, and expose themselves to grievous troubles, for a future reward which is uncertain, and which nobody ever saw. To this I Answer, First, it is a great mistake to think that Holiness exposeth men to relinquish temporal and sensual pleasures; there being no men in the world so qualified to experiment the sweetness of these, none who live in so happy and flourishing condition, who are more healthful, and enjoy a greater measure of peace and quietness, than good men. The only inconveniency they are exposed to, is affliction upon the account of Religion; which when Christianity did commence, was no rare thing, but now is not so ordinary. But supposing good men were exposed to greater afflictions than other men, yet there is a great deal of satisfaction in submitting to them, since they are but light afflictions, and momentary too, which work for us a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory. These small evils are rather to be endured, than lasting pains and torments. Sure, Of two evils, the least is to be chosen.

Secondly, Although the reward of Holiness be future, yet 'tis not uncertain. We have as great assurance that there will be a reward for the Righteous in another world, as the nature of the thing is capable of: and sure he is an unwise man that asks any other demonstration or proof. Now that there is a reward laid up for good men, which though unseen, is yet as certain as if it were obvious to sense, we have the greatest rational evidence, and the best moral arguments to confirm it. For first, if there be a God; Secondly, if the Scriptures be the Word of God, then there is not anything more certain, than that there is a state of rewards and punishments after this life. First, if there be a God, then we can have no reasonable scruple about the future reward: for since God is holy and just (perfections essential to a Deity) then certainly he will, as the great Governor of the World, reward Virtue, and punish Vice. But this doth not always fall out so here; therefore it is reasonable to conclude, that he hath reserved the wicked till that great day of wrath, and prepared a reward for the righteous. Secondly, if the Scripture be the Word of God, then he who runs may read this truth.

We have then the greatest moral assurance possible, that there is a future reward; which may sufficiently encourage men to hazard all they enjoy here, for the expectation of it. But I shall only suppose that the future reward is possible; (which I think few will deny, or can prove it to be impossible) yet even upon this supposition, good men who part with the transitory things of this life, prove a great deal wiser than those who condemn them: For if there be no life after this, all the loss a good man suffers, is that of temporal conveniency; he hath denied himself the enjoyment of sensual pleasures, so far as he judgeth them sinful; he is not so intemperate as other men, and perhaps is exposed to some hazards for his Religion; at the most, all that he is to hazard is but very small. But if there be a future reward, in what a dismal state are the wicked, who shall everlastingly be deprived of it, and be irrecoverably plunged into a state of lasting and severe torments?

But since we are assured of a future reward, and know certainly, that the righteous shall shine forth as the sun in the Kingdom of their Father, and that the wicked shall be cast into utter darkness; What folly and madness is it to be careful for the Body, and careless what becomes of the Soul; to provide for Time, and neglect Eternity? Sure 'tis no wonder though the Wise man does so frequently characterize the sinner a fool, and represents him as one that lacketh understanding: And indeed, we may rationally say, This their way is their folly; their foolish choice proclaims, that those workers of iniquity have no knowledge.

The Conclusion.

WE have now seen the Excellency and Beauty of Holiness, have discovered the absolute Perfection of its Nature, and the Compleatness of its Rule; have taken a view of its Allurements and powerful Motives, and have discovered the weakness of those Cavils that are urged against it: and what remains, but that we set about this work with the greatest seriousness imaginable; that we give no sleep to our eyes, nor slumber to our eye-lids, till we forsake our sins, and enter upon a course of Holiness?

If God had imposed upon us a heavy and intolerable yoke; if he had commanded us to perform some grievous and uneasy service, had we not been obliged to have obeyed? But since he only commands us to wash and be clean, requires only our consent to what is so much our own interest, only exacts that we separate ourselves from those lusts that pollute and defile us, that vex and torments our minds, and which (if continued in) will certainly ruin and undo us; what fools and mad-men are we if we refuse to hear his voice?

Almighty God has been drawing us with the Cords of Love; has presented to us the most charming motives to excite our love and esteem; has carried us (as it were) to the Pinnacle of the Temple, and discovered to us all the glory and beauty of this world; has taken us to Pisgah, and given us a view of the good Land of Canaan, of the City of the living God, of which glorious things are spoken; and promised, that all these things shall be ours, if we will but be holy in all manner of conversation: And to excite our fear, he has opened to our view, the powers of the world to come; has plainly told us of the pains and torments that the damned suffer day and night, and that indignation and wrath, tribulation and anguish, remains as the due portion of those that do evil. And now may he not take up that same protestation that he used to his ancient People the Jews; What more can I do for you? But alas! we have in the most insolent manner despised all these charms of Love, and, like the mad-man in the Gospel, have broken to pieces the strongest Fetters and Chains. We are, God knows, as deeply sunk into sensuality and brutishness, as those to whom the Grace of God that bringeth salvation hath never appeared. 'Tis not credible, (I may say possible) that men could have been more wicked than they now are, supposing they had never heard of Heaven or Hell.

'Tis a wonder (as any one would think) that those very men who profess they believe in Christ, should so grossly and openly contradict his plain Precepts; that those who believe, that without holiness no man shall see the Lord, and that the wrath of God is revealed from Heaven against all ungodliness, yet persist in their abominable wickedness, and are neither awed with fears, nor animated with hopes. What is all this, but for men to expose themselves to the contempt rather than pity of discerning men?

We have surveyed the several advantages which attend Holiness; have discovered how much man's temporal as well as his eternal welfare and happiness depends upon it: We have explained how in her right hand is length of days, and in her left hand are riches and honor: that her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths peace. And now may we not give the same testimony of it which Joshua and Caleb did of Canaana, Numb. 14. The land which we passed through to search, it is an exceeding good land? The Sons of Anak (I mean the pretended difficulties) are not so strong as some men represent them to be; we need not be discouraged to encounter with them; greater is he that is in you, than he that is in the world. Alas! what

Objection can men possibly make against a Duty that is so excellent, useful, and necessary, that is founded upon such mighty motives, as may prevail with any who is not quite petrified in desperate Impiety? Good God! what stupid folly is this, that men hide their hands in their bosom, and will not so much as stretch them out to this tree of Life, that they may eat of this fruit, which is pleasant to the eye, and profitable both to our present and future happiness.

'Tis indeed pity, that men should be thus permitted to run headlong to destruction. Alas! is perdition so lovely and desirable, that, like Rachel, a double servitude is thought light for it? and shall wise and discerning men be Eye-witnesses of the bad bargain those men make, and not warn them of their folly? I know this is a duty chiefly incumbent to our spiritual Watchmen to discharge; I doubt not but many of them stand upon their watch, and warn men of their danger. It were to be wished that all and every of them were thus faithful; but sure every man is in some manner concerned to be his brothers keeper; and he is highly criminal, who should see a mad man running upon danger, and not stop him in his course.

I wish some new-coined Doctrines had not an inauspicious influence upon the bad practices of many, had not too much countenanced and authorized vice: but my present design is so far from controversial, that I shall rather think myself concerned to inveigh against needless disputes, than start any. If I may speak from my own experience, I ingenuously confess, I find Disputes so insipid and fruitless, and in the review so unsatisfactory, that I am resolved henceforth to bid an eternal adieu to them, and to condemn them as the great underminers of Christian Piety: And if any shall after this fair warning assault any Doctrine I have elsewhere owned, I hope discerning men will neither esteem me nor the Cause the worse, that I draw not my Sword in its defense.

And now what shall I say more, but conclude with Moses's passionate Exhortation, Deut. 32.46. Set your hearts to the words which I testify to you this day: for it is not a vain thing, because it is your life. Let us no longer delay and put off this duty; while it is called today, let us not harden our hearts through the deceitfulness of sin; but seriously search and try our ways, and turn to the Lord: this is the proper season for so necessary a work; ere long, there will be no time left us to consider our ways: O that in this our day we did understand the things that belong to our peace, before they be hid from our eyes! If men would but be induced to imitate the Psalmists Example, Psal. 119.59. I thought on my ways, I doubt not but they should also imitate the course he did take, I made haste and delayed not to keep thy commandments: But men consider not what they are doing, and so no wonder though they perish, no wonder that they prefer darkness to light, and despise Holiness as a thing of no value. Let us therefore humbly and heartily invoke the Father of Lights to open the Eyes of men, whom the God of this world hath blinded, that they may flee from the wrath to come, by cleansing themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

Holy Devotions: OR, A COLLECTION OF PRAYERS AND THANKSGIVINGS, Fitted to the main uses of a Christian Life.

PHILIP. 4.6.

Be careful for nothing: but in everything by Prayer and Supplication, with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.

HOLY DEVOTIONS: OR, A Collection of Prayers.

A Prayer for Families on the Lord's day in the Morning.

O Most holy and eternally blessed, The heavens and the heaven of heavens is thine, the earth also, with all that therein is. Thou art everywhere, and canst not be excluded from any place; but art present to the greatest secrets of our Souls, and seest the closest and most retired thoughts of our Hearts. Thou knowest very well with what designs and Affections we now bow ourselves before thee, and canst not be deceived by any words that we are able to speak in thy praise, whilst our Hearts are far from thy fear and love.

Behold, O Lord, our Hearts are full with desires to be possessed with a mighty reverend sense of thee, and all the benefits thou hast bestowed on us; and be lifted up to Heaven in Love to thee, and Joy in thee, whilst we bless and praise thee, and speak good of thy Name. We here remember with all humility and thankfulness that thou art our Creator, and acknowledge thy care and providence over thy ancient People, in blessing and Sanctifying a day, wherein thou thyself restedst from thy works, that they might cease from all other employments, and admire thy wonderful works, extol thy Power, bless thy Goodness, and be astonished at thy Wisdom, in making, preserving, adorning and governing this excellent frame of the World. The Heavens declare thy glory, O God, and the Firmament showeth thy handy-work. The Sun, the Moon, and all the Host of Heaven, proclaim the greatness and splendor of thy Majesty: The whole Earth is full of thy rich goodness, so is the great and wide Sea, wherein are things moving innumerable, both small and great living Creatures. There is nothing but what speaks of thee; and above all, the Children of men, whom thou hast wonderfully made, curiously wrought, and impressed with thy own Image; that they might understand thee, and love thee, in all, and above all things.

The variety, the order, the stedfastness of all thy works in this great World, abundantly utter thy adorable perfections. But thou, O Lord, by thy goodness in giving thy Son for us, and then raising him up from the Dead, and setting him at thy right hand, hast given us new matter of wonder and praise; and consecrated a better rest, and holy day of rejoicing: wherein we should behold the glories of another World, and have before our Eyes the happiness thou intendest for us there, together with all the excellent means which lead unto it. Thou givest us occasion not only to reflect upon all the good things thou hast provided for our bodies; (which we can never acknowledge enough, the very Health and Ease of one day deserving the thankfulness of many) but we must also remember, that we are thy redeemed ones, and that thou hast done great things for our Souls in thy Son Jesus, who is entered into the Heavens for us, and gone to prepare a resting place for all those that follow him. This exceeding riches of thy grace infinitely surpasses all our acknowledgments; since all the praises we are able to render thee, are less than is due for thy temporal blessings.

To this Love we owe the knowledge of thee, the true and only God; our freedom from Idolatry, and a vain Conversation; the true principles of Holy living; the benefit of repentance; the promise of a pardon; the assistance of thy Holy Spirit; the ministry of thy Angels; the hope of immortal Life; and the pledges our Lord hath left us of his endless love. To this we owe thy forbearance in the days of our ignorance, thy unwearied patience towards us in a continued Rebellion, and thy earnest entreaties of us, when we were passionately bent upon our own destruction. Thou hast sent us, in much love, many Holy Instructors and Guides to blessedness; we have had the benefit of sundry Pious Sermons, good Examples, holy Admonitions, and serious Councils, of the Power of the Holy Ghost, and divers restraints of Fear, and Shame, and Love; and thou still pursuest us with thy merciful kindness, and beseechest us to attend to thy gracious invitations, and receive thy blessings, and make thee our choice, and be Eternally happy in thy divine favor and likeness. What shall we render to the Lord for all his benefits towards us?

O help us to manifest our real and unfeigned desires to make some worthy returns to thee, by our careful improvement of the Holy opportunity which thou this day putttest into our hands.

O that our minds may be more enlightened to understand the Truth as it is in Jesus; that our wills may be more steadfastly resolved to cleave unto it; that our Affections may be excited to a stronger and more ardent Love to thee, and a greater delight in thee; and all the powers of our Souls disposed to serve thee at all other times, more cheerfully and readily, in all the Duties of Piety, Soberness, Righteousness, and Mercy. So that every day may become an Holy rest to the Lord, by ceasing to do Evil, and constantly doing well: that we may Glorify thee throughout our whole life, in all our actions showing forth thy praise, who hast called us out of Darkness into thy marvelous Light. And enlighten, good Lord, the whole World with the beams of thy Glorious Gospel, and dispose the Hearts of all Christian People, among whom the Son of righteousness hath shone so long, to walk as Children of the Light: that so they may offer unto thee this day most acceptable Sacrifices for themselves and for all mankind; and be fitted and prepared by serving thee in Righteousness and true Holiness here, to shine forever in his Heavenly Kingdom, with Christ Jesus our Savior, by whom thou hast given us good hope in thee, that thou will hear our Prayers, and do for us above all that we can ask or think; which we humbly beg, in those Holy words which he hath taught us, saying,

Our Father, &c.

Another for the Lord's-day at Night.

O Most blessed for evermore, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort. How precious are thy promises to us-wards, how great is the sum of them! Thou renewest thy favors continually, and art still pouring upon us innumerable benefits; of which, this is not the least, that thou givest us leave to come into thy Presence, to call thee Father, and to make known our requests to thee, by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving. We accept, O Lord, with all thankfulness this thy great Grace and Loving kindness to us; and are here again prostrate before thee this Evening, to acknowledge thy goodness in making us such excellent Creatures, capable to know thee, and acknowledge thee, and love thee; and by being made like thee, to be Eternally happy with thee.

Blessed be thy Name, that we are now alive, and that we have lived so long in health, and strength, and peace, and plenty of all good things; whereas our Eyes might have been consumed with grief, our Bones sore vexed, and, we might have mingled our Drink with continual weeping. We are bound unto thee for the free use of our understandings, for the good inclinations we find in our will, for any devout affections which are stirring in our Hearts; for all the advantages we have had by our educations, good company, and holy Examples: and more especially, for the Illuminations of the Holy Ghost, by thy blessed Gospel; the breathings of it frequently into our Spirits; the importunities thou hast used to draw us to thee, and the great and precious promises whereby thy love in Christ Jesus constrains us to resign ourselves entirely to the Obedience of thy Precepts.

We ought likewise to admire and praise thee, for thy Goodness to all thy Creatures, who live daily upon thy bounteous allowance. The eyes of all wait on thee, and thou givest them their Food in due season; thou diffusest thy blessings in several Streams to everyone of them, according to their needs. That thou givest them, they gather: thou openest thy hand, they are filled with good. We give thee the Glory of thy plentiful provision thou hast made for them: and more particularly admire thy great liberality to the Children of men, under whose Feet thou hast put in subjection all Sheep and Oxen, yea, and the Beasts of the field, the Fowl of the Air, and the Fish of the Sea, and whatsoever passeth through the Paths of the Waters. O Lord, we praise thee for thy Goodness to those who praise thee not themselves. Be thou adored and acknowledged in thy bounty, which bestows so many blessings unasked and unsought, and continues them notwithstanding abundance of provocations, and most high Offences that they have given to thy merciful kindness. And let thy Goodness to thy Church be never forgotten by us, which thou hast in all Ages Protected and defended, in a marvelous manner propagating the Gospel of our Savior, confounding its opposers, and spreading it by the power of the Holy Ghost over the face of the Earth. We thank thee for thy singular favor to these Countries wherein we live, to whom these glad tidings of Salvation have reached, and who have long enjoyed a more glorious light than many other places, and been delivered from the Darkness of Popish superstition, and from sundry attempts that have been made to bereave us of this Happiness: and are again settled after many Confusions in a peaceable enjoyment of thy true Religion; which thou hast also continued to us, though we have not brought forth Fruit worthy of the Gospel of thy Grace.

O that all thy undeserved Goodness may have this effect upon us, to make us heartily love thee, and devoutly worship thee, and zealously obey thee, and steadfastly trust and hope in thee forever. That by a careful improvement of the knowledge of thee our God, and our Lord Jesus Christ, by whom thou hast given us all things that pertain unto life and goodness, we may still enjoy this inestimable treasure, and all thy love to us may at last be finished in those eternal Joys, which he hath promised to the Faithful. And as we have been taught, exhorted and encouraged this day out of thy holy word, and have likewise publicly acknowledged our obligations to thee, and made profession of Love and Gratitude, and Durifulness to thy Divine Majesty: So help us all the Week following openly to testify the Truth and Honesty of our Hearts, in all this, by a blameless conversation; in all Humility, Meekness, Temperance Righteousness, Charity and Peace, with all them that call on the Lord out of a pure Heart.

Bless our Sovereign, the defender of the Faith we profess, and all employ'd under him, in their several Offices: that they may be Instruments of continuing to us these Holy opportunities, with all other good things that may make these Kingdoms happy.

O that all our friends may be thine; and if we have any Enemies, Father, forgive them: comfort and support the Sick, the Needy, and all other distressed persons, with an immovable belief of thy wise and good Providence; to which give them Grace patiently and obediently to resign themselves. And when all our senses this Night shall be bound up with sleep, be thou, O Lord, our keeper: and after the refreshment of that repose, and this Holy rest from our Labors, raise us in the Morning to return unto them with cheerful minds, and ready wills; Praising still and Magnifying thy multiplied Mercies to us in Christ Jesus, by whom we present ourselves and petitions to thee, saying farther as he hath taught us.

Our Father, &c.

A Prayer for a Family on any Morning.

O Most holy, most glorious, and eternal Lord God; we thy poor and unworthy Servants, in all humility of Soul and Body, and unfeigned acknowledgements of our duty, prostrate ourselves before the throne of thy Mercy, praising & magnifying thy Fatherly goodness for the abundance of thy blessings, and for the multitude of thy Mercies heaped upon us; beseeching thee for Christ his sake, to be merciful to all our sins committed against thy Divine Majesty; upon the consideration of which, we confess we are not worthy to appear in thy presence, much less to ask a blessing at thy hands: for, by reason of our corrupt Nature in us, derived from our first Parents, our inclinations have been prone to commit all manner of sin and wickedness against thy Goodness. Thy Laws and Precepts we have broken, both in thought, word, and deed; out of our hearts proceed evil and wicked imaginations which defile the soul and body. Yet, O Lord, thou art our Creator, thou hast sent thy dear Son Jesus Christ to die for us, and thy Holy Spirit to sanctify us; and many are the benefits and blessings which thou hast bestowed upon us, and which by thy goodness we enjoy both of soul and body: and therefore by the Testimony of our own Consciences, we stand convicted; and the thoughts of our great sins and transgressions do much astonish us. What shall we say therefore, or wherein shall we open our mouths! who shall deliver us from the misery due unto us for our transgression! nothing can be expected in this life, but misery and confusion; and in the world to come, eternal condemnation. But yet, O Lord, in obedience to thy command, and in confident assurance of thy endless and unspeakable mercy, promised in Jesus Christ to all sinners which come unto thee with sorrow in our hearts, shame in our faces, and in all humility of spirit. And we would appeal from thee, a just Judge, to thee a merciful Father; from the Throne of thy Justice, to the Seat of thy Mercy; beseeching thee, O

Lord, to have mercy upon us, and to turn away thy face from all our sins, and to blot out all our transgressions, for the only meritorious Death and Passion of Jesus Christ, who so abundantly shed his Blood on the Cross, to take away the sin of the world: and be pleased now to reform our affections, transform us out of sin, into the glorious liberty of thy own Children, to live in newness of Life, in a holy conversation, and continual obedience to thy divine Majesty.

And now we further entreat thee, O Lord, for a blessing upon the Church universal: more especially we beseech thee, to continue the peace and prosperity of these Churches wherein we live, and every member thereof; and in a more especial manner, bless, with the chiefest of thy blessings, our King, Queen, Duke, and the rest of the Royal Family; bless our Counselors, Ministers, and Magistrates; bless our Friends; Kindred and Acquaintance; bless the whole Church, & every afflicted member of it: accept of our morning-sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving, for all thy mercies and favors, comforts and deliverances, which from time to time thou hast afforded and continued to us. We thank thee for thy last mercy, in preserving us from the dangers of this night past; for refreshing our bodies with seasonable rest, and bringing us safe to the beginning of this day. Lord, what is man, that thou art so mindful of him, and the Son of man, that thou shouldst thus visit and remember him? Give us grace, O Lord, to remember thee, and to be mindful of thy mercies, that we may praise thee for all the truth and faithfulness which thou showest to us in the land of the living; that as thou hast brought us to the comforts of this day, so thou mayst go along with us in the same, to enable us for the Duties of those callings wherein we are placed, and to deliver us from those dangers to which we are exposed, even for Jesus Christ his sake; in whose most blessed name and words, we conclude these our weak and imperfect prayers, saying as he himself hath taught us in his holy Gospel,

Our Father, &c.

A Prayer for a Family at Night.

MOST glorious, and everlasting Lord God, which inhabitest eternity, and dwellest in that light which no mortal Eye can attain unto; the God in whom we live, and move, and have our being; we thine unworthy Servants do here in all lowliness and humility present our Persons and Prayers before thy Divine Majesty; confessing and acknowledging, that we were conceived in sin, and brought forth in iniquity; and as if that had been but a small matter, we have heaped up our Actual transgressions, as the sand upon the Sea-shore, and as the Stars in the Firmament for number: we have broken thy Commandments, we have profaned thy Sabbaths, we have dishonor'd thy Name, we have abused thy Creatures, we have neglected the day of our Visitation, and turned thy Grace into wantonness, whereby we have most justly provoked thy wrath and everlasting displeasure; we have wounded our own consciences, weakened our assurance of Salvation, and grieved thy good Spirit, which seaeth us up unto the day of our Redemption. And now, O Lord, if thou shouldst deal with us after our deservings, thou mightest pour upon us the deluge of thy wrath and fury, to sweep us out of the Land of the living, into that place of torment prepared for the Devil and his Angels. But thou hast revealed thyself to the Sons of men, to be the Lord, the Lord merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and of great goodness, who pardons sins, and passeth by the transgressions of thy People; this is thy Name forever, and thy Memorial throughout all Generations. We beseech therefore, for Jesus Christ his sake, to be merciful unto us, in the free pardon and forgiveness of all our sins, that we have ever committed against thee: Accept of his obedience, for our disobedience; of his righteousness, for our unrighteousness; of his sufferings, for all our sins: wash them away in his blood, nail them to his Cross, hide them in his Wounds, and bury them in his Grave, that they may never rise up for our confusion here, or for our condemnation hereafter. O Lord, be unto us a Father of mercy, and a God of consolation; speak peace unto our Souls and consciences, and say unto us, that thou art the God of our Salvation. And give us Grace, for the time to come, to die daily unto sin, by virtue of thy Sons death, and to rise up to newness of life, by the power of his resurrection. Wean our Hearts, and take off our Affections from the things of this world, which endure but for a season; and raise them up unto those things which are at thy right hand for evermore. Enlighten the darkness of our understanding, subdue the stubbornness of our wills, rectify the disorder of our affections, and bring into obedience whatsoever exalteth itself against thy will; that at last we may become such as thou wouldest have us to be.

Continue and enlarge thy blessings upon the Church and Land wherein we live, upon the Person and Government of our King: bless all the Royal family, together with his Majesty's Councils; the Nobility, Magistracy, Clergy, and Gentry of the Land: Be merciful to all those who are afflicted with any cross or calamity, all our relations and acquaintance, and all others whom we are bound to pray for.

O Lord accept our thanksgivings this Evening, for all the mercies and favors which thou hast afforded for our Souls or Bodies, for this Life, or a better; more especially, that thou hast preserved us and our Family this day, in health and happiness. Now, holy Father, seeing the Night is upon us, and we are ready to take our rest, in thy hands we commit our Souls, and Bodies, and all that we have; beseeching thee, who art the keeper of Israel, that neither sleepest nor slumberest, to take care of us; for if thou protect us not, Satan will devour us; yea, we shall sleep a perpetual sleep, and never arise up to praise thee: we pray thee therefore to be good to us this night, defend us from danger, refresh us with comfortable rest, and raise us up to glorify thee in the duties of the day following; that thou mayst still be our God, and we may be thy People. Hear us and graciously answer us in these our requests, and what else thou knowest needful and expedient for us, and that for Jesus Christ his sake, in whose most blessed Name and words, we conclude these our imperfect prayers, saying as he himself hath taught us,

Our Father, &c.

A Morning-prayer for a private person.

O Lord my God, merciful and loving to all thy servants, pitiful and patient to me thy child, gracious and favorable to all those that meekly come unto thee; I dare not with the proud Pharisee justify myself, or say, I have not sinned: I dare not press into thy presence with hope or confidence through mine own merits to be saved; but, with the poor Publican, laying my Soul upon the work of Repentance, and with an unfeigned sorrow casting myself down at the footstool of thy Majesty, I cry, and say, O Lord, be merciful to me a sinner.

O my God, the horn of my Salvation, and my refuge, my stony Rock, and my defense, in whom only I trust, and to whom alone I flee for succor; miserable wretch that I am, how have I provoked thee! I have done evil in thy fight, I have stirred up thine anger, I have deserved thy displeasure. I have sinned, I have offended, yet thou bearest with me. One deep calleth to another, the depth of misery to the depth of mercy.

I feel, O Lord, (but it is thy Spirit that giveth me this feeling) that mine Understanding is darkened, Conscience seared, Memory decayed, Will bewitched, Heart hardened, Affections disordered, Conversation corrupted; my thoughts, desires, & best actions are abominable in thy sight. Mine eyes cannot see thee in thy Creatures, mine ears cannot hear thee in thy Word, my mouth cannot praise thee in thy Works, my hands and feet cannot serve thee in my Calling: destruction and calamity are in all my ways, and the way of peace I have not known. Unto whom now shall I come for comfort, unto whom now shall I sue for succor, but to thee, O Lord, whom I will look up to, as unto the Brazen Serpent! If I repent, thou sparest; if I return, thou embracest: yet beside all this, though I defer, thou waitest. Thou teachest the ignorant, thou comfortest the pensive, thou liftest up from destruction after a fall, thou givest to him that asketh, thou reclaimest him which wandereth, thou invitest him that resisteth, thou lookest for him that sleepeth, and him thou embracest which returneth.

Now, O Lord, what to answer for my disobedience I am ignorant; for what am I not subject to, by reason of my sins! I cannot hide myself from thy presence: I could not abide it, if thou shouldst enter into Judgment.

O Father of mercies, and God of all comfort, pierce my flesh with thy fear, so that by fearing I may escape such things as thou dost threaten; and restore to me the Joy of thy Salvation, that by loving I may taste the felicity which thou hast promised. Put thou into my remembrance, O Lord, the things I should conceive of thee; teach me by what words I may call upon thee, instruct me with what good works I may please thee. Cover thou mine head in the day of battle: Let me not be of that number which for a time believe, but, when temptation cometh, go back.

Grant me, I beseech thee, the gifts of regeneration, to become thy child of Faith, to believe thy promise; of obedience, to do thy will; of prayer, to seek thy presence; of comfort, to endure thy trials; and of strength, to continue thy servant to my life's end.

Open my blind eyes, to see the sins I am most given to: give me grace to sigh and groan under the burden of them: and give me spiritual understanding to discern and judge betwixt good and evil.

Thou hast been good unto me, O Lord, many ways, in my creation, redemption, vocation, sanctification, in preserving me all the days of my life hitherunto, and in opening thy hand continually, and filling my mouth with good things. Thou hast preserved me from all dangers of this night past, and brought me safe to the beginning of this day: whereas thou mightest have made my bed my grave; thou mightest have turned my sleep into death unto me, but thou lendest me a longer and a larger time to repent. Lord, increase my zeal, further my repentance, make me sincerely to embrace thy mercies. I will take the Cup of Salvation, and call upon thy Name. Receive, O Lord, this early sacrifice both of my soul and body. I offer them up into thy hands to be disposed at thy pleasure, and with them unfeigned sighs for offending thee. Go on with thy favors towards me thy humble servant; go along by me and with me all this day, and all the days of my life, that I may not step into the path of sin, but that thy Law may be my delight all the day long.

Thou, O Lord Christ, art risen from the dead. Let the power of thy resurrection make me rise unto newness of life: And that which is impossible to flesh and blood, make it possible by the virtue of thy blood. And so in thy Name I shut up my imperfect prayers, both for myself and others, in that manner and form of prayer which thou hast taught me;

Our Father, &c.

An Evening-prayer for a private person.

O Lord my God, who aboundest in all good things, and art a liberal bestower of the dainties of heavenly safety; I praise and glorify thee for thy love and bounty towards me this day past, having bestowed upon me all things necessary for the day, with-holding nothing from me that might be beneficial to me. The night now stealeth upon me like a thief, and I am nearer to old age than I was in the morning, though not nearer to goodness. I know not whether thou wilt this night make my bed in the dark, and the hour of my visitation be this present evening. A wake me then out of that slumber of sin, remove from me that sloth that hath all this while hindered thy Grace: Forgive me my sins, which are more infinite than the stars, and more heavy than if mountains lay upon my bosom: but thy mercy and the merits of my Redeemer do I trust in; in his Name do I sue for a pardon.

Let my mind, O Lord, fly from the parching heat of worldly cares, under the shadow of thy wings; that being hid in temperate coldness, it may joyfully sing and say, I will lay me down, and also sleep in peace. Let my memory sleep, O Lord my God; let it sleep from all evil. Suffer not unclean thoughts this night to pollute my body and soul; but keep my cogitations chaste. Let not the Sun go down upon my wrath; but if any man this day have done me wrong, grant that I may freely and heartily forgive him, as I desire at thy hands to be forgiven. Keep me from the adversary, who sleepeth not, but seeketh how he may devour me. Anoint me, O Lord, with the Oil of thy Spirit, that of thy fullness I may be filled with Grace, even that Grace, which may further my Salvation. Keep me, O Lord, in my old age, forsake me not when I am gray-headed. And whensoever it shall please thee to cast me upon my sick bed, grant that I may take my sickness patiently; and at the last gasp let not either sin or Satan take such hold upon me, that I depart this life with cryings, and screechings, and words of despair; but that, believing thy word, and yielding to thine ordinance, my last hour may be my best hour, and I may say with the Psalmist, Lord into thy hands I commend my Spirit; for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord God of Truth.

Pardon, O Lord, my misspending the time, my unprofitableness, my unthankfulness for thy goodness. Supply what is wanting in me; through the fire of compunction make me at all hours to seem a living sacrifice in thy sight. Continue towards me thy love, and make me to love thee again. Without thee, alas! I die; but when I think on thee, I revive again. To thee therefore be ascribed all honor and glory world without end.

Our Father, &c.

A Prayer before the receiving of the Sacrament.

O Most gracious and merciful Lord God, thou hast called all those that are weary and heavy laden with their sins to come unto thee, and hast promised to ease and refresh them; thou hast invited all those that hunger and thirst after thy Kingdom and the righteousness thereof, to come to thy Table, to taste of thy supper, and hast promised that thou wilt satisfy them: in assurance therefore of these promises I come to thee, blessed Lord Jesus, beseeching thee to ease me, to refresh me, to satisfy me with thy mercy; for my Soul hungers and thirsts after thee and thy Salvation. I confess and acknowledge that my daily sins have made me unworthy of my daily Bread, much more of this Manna, this Bread of Life that came down from Heaven. I confess, O Lord, I am not prepared according to the preparation of thy sanctuary; yet for as much as this day I have set my Heart to seek to thee, thou, O God, be merciful unto me: and though I cannot bring with me a clean Heart, (for who can say his Heart is clean?) yet behold, O Lord, I bring with me a contrite Heart and a broken Spirit; despise not, O God, this Sacrifice. As for the sins that I have committed against thee, bind them up in one bundle, and cast them into the bottomless Sea of thy mercy; bury them in thy Wounds, and wash them away in the blood of that immaculate Lamb Christ Jesus: and for the time to come sprinkle my conscience with the same blood, that being cleansed from dead works, I may serve thee the Living God in righteousness and true holiness all the days of my life. That so this blessed Sacrament may be a means to quiet my conscience, to increase my Faith, to inflame my Charity, to amend my life, to save my Soul, and to assure me that I am of the number of those blessed ones who shall eat at thy Table, and be called to the Marriage-supper of the Lamb. Grant this, O Lord, for Jesus Christ his sake, in whose Name and words I conclude these my imperfect prayers, saying as he himself hath taught me.

Our Father, &c.

A Prayer after the receiving of the Sacrament.

O Most gracious God, from whose bounty every good and perfect gift is derived; I and all that is within me praise and magnify thy holy Name for all thy mercies and favors which from time to time thou hast bestowed upon me. But especially I thank thee for Jesus Christ thy Son, the fountain and foundation of all blessings and benefits; that thou hast sent him into the World to take our nature upon him, and to die for us; and that thou hast fed me, who am unworthy of the least of thy favors, with the precious merits of his death and passion. Blessed Lord God, thou hast been pleased this day to set thy Seal to the Pardon and forgiveness of all my sins: Oh, let me not lose it again by unthankfulness, or relapsing into my old sins from which thou hast purged me, lest my last end be worse than my beginning. But if hereafter I shall be tempted by the Devil, allured by the World, or provoked by my own flesh, then set before mine eyes, by the remembrance of thy Spirit, how dear the expiation of my sins cost my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, even the effusion of his most precious and holy blood; that in the contemplation of his death, and application of his most bitter passion, I may die daily unto sin, and so may show forth the Lord's death till he come and bring his reward with him; I may receive the Crown of Righteousness which he hath purchased and prepared for all those that love and expect the day of his appearing, with the precious price of his incorruptible blood. And whereas I have this day renewed my covenant with thee my God in vows and purposes of better obedience, assist me by thy grace, and strengthen me by thy power, that I may pay the Vows which I have made unto thee, and that by virtue of thy heavenly nourishment I may grow up in grace and godliness, till at last I come to be a perfect man in Christ Jesus.

Preserve and maintain always this thine Ordinance, that it may be a note and a badge of my public profession: and give unto all of us that have been partakers of thy body and blood, one heart and one mind in the unity of Spirit, for the worthy and reverend receiving of the same whensoever we shall come to thy holy Table again. And for this thy mercy towards me, do I yield unto thee all praise, and glory, and power, and might, and majesty, through Jesus Christ our Lord, in whose most blessed Name and words I further pray,

Our Father, &c.

Another Prayer before the Sacrament.

DEpart from me, for I am a sinful man, O Lord. I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof. For the house of my Soul, which thou hast made a fit Temple for thy holy Spirit to inhabit in, I have defaced and defiled with all manner of pollutions and abominations. It is become a den of ravenous Beasts, and a cage of unclean Birds, and every corner so crowded with filthiness, that thou wilt not find where to lay thy head, Luk. 9.58.

But thou, O Lord, which despisest not a penitent sinner, but hast promised to dwell with the humble and contrite Spirit, I beseech thee cast me not away from thy presence, but cast out all profaneness and uncleanness out of my Heart, and remove everything that may offend the pure Eyes of thy glory, and the holiness of thy presence: and then, O Lord, vouchsafe to come and enter in, and dwell there, and abide with me forever.

Behold, O Lord, I am before thee in my sins, clothed with filthy garments, and Satan standing at my right hand, accusing me, and bringing my transgressions into remembrance before thee, with loud clamours for justice against me. O Lord, I acknowledge and confess myself guilty, and that I have deserved the utmost of thy wrath and indignation. But, O Lord, I appeal from thy seat of judgment to thy throne of Grace and Mercy, humbly beseeching thee to rebuke and repel the malicious accuser of thy servants, and hearken to the intercession of our advocate in thine own bosom: for his sake have mercy upon me, and pardon my offenses, and blot out the hand-Writing that is against me, and put away all mine iniquities, and drown them in the depth of the Sea.

Wash me thoroughly from all my pollutions in that Fountain which thou hast opened for Judah and Jerusalem to purify in; and then cloth me with that white robe of thy Son's righteousness, the Wedding-garment requisite at this feast, and admit me to thy Table which thou hast prepared for thy Children.

And grant, O Lord, that when I have tasted of these thy Heavenly dainties, I may no more return like the Dog to his vomit, or the Sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire; but I may keep myself unspotted from the World, and walk before thee in all purity and holiness.

And now, O Lord, thou invitest and exhortest me to come to thy holy Table.

O my God, I know mine own unworthiness, yet in the multitude of thy mercies I will humbly approach to thine Altar, beseeching thee to behold me not with a severe, but a gracious eye.

Thou knowest the earnest desire of my Soul: be thou pleased to pass by the weakness of the flesh, and accept the willingness of the Spirit, and grant that I may now receive this holy Sacrament to the honor and glory of thy Name, and the good and comfort and Salvation of my own Soul.

The Good Lord pardon everyone that prepareth his heart to seek God, the Lord God of his Fathers, though he be not purified according to the purification of the Sanctuary. Amen.

After the Sacrament.

LORD, what is man that thou art mindful of him, or the son of man that thou visitest him?

What is thy servant, that thou shouldest look upon such a dead Dog as I?

The Dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from their Masters Table, but thou hast fed me with the bread of thy Children, and given me to drink of thine own cup.

Thou hast fed me in a green Pasture, and leadest me forth beside the waters of comfort.

O taste and see how gracious the Lord is: blessed is the man that trusteth in him.

What reward shall I render unto the Lord for all his benefits toward me?

Lord, I offer up unto thee myself, my soul and body, and all that I am and have; beseeching thee graciously to receive me for thy servant, to dwell in thy House, and praise thy Name for evermore.

Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive Glory, and Honor, and Power; for thou hast created all things, and for thy pleasure they are and were created.

Thou art worthy to take the Book, and to open the seals thereof: for thou wast slain, and hast redeemed us to our God, out of every Kindred, and Tongue, and People, and Nation, and hast made us unto our God Kings and Priests.

Salvation to our God which sitteth upon the Throne, and to the Lamb. Amen.

Blessing, and Glory, and Wisdom, and Thanksgiving, and Honor, and Power, and Might, be unto God forever and ever. Amen.

An Admonition after Receiving.

AND now you have thus solemnly devoted and consecrated yourself to God and his Service, beware that you do not fall back, and return to your former course of sin, like the dog to his own vomit; or as the Serpent, which casts up his Poison when he goes to drink, and when he hath quenched his thirst, returns and sucks it up again. And thus some are content to leave their sins at the Churchdoor, but with an intent to take them up again when they come out.

But God will not be so mocked.

And know this, that if you have well and worthily performed this Duty today, yet if you do not persevere in Piety, as you have promised and begun, not only your former sins, but even the Piety of this day shall one day rise up in Judgment against you.

But a diligent watching and wariness over your ways after this, will be the best preparation against the next time.

A Prayer for one that is troubled in mind.

O Lord, the Father of mercies, and the God of all comfort, I acknowledge and adore thy eternal Power, and Wisdom, and Goodness. I render thee my most hearty thanks for all the benefits thou hast bestowed on me, from my first coming into the world until this time. Many, O Lord my God, are the wonderful works which thou hast done, and thy thoughts which are to us-ward; they cannot be reckoned up in order unto thee: if I would declare and speak of them, they are more than can be numbered. Above all, I bless thee for that great demonstration of thy Love and Goodwill to Mankind by Christ Jesus, whom thou hast sent into the world to save sinners; and for bringing me to the clear knowledge of him, and unfeigned affection to thy holy Will declared to us in his blessed Gospel.

O God, thou hast taught me from my youth up, and hitherto been marvelously gracious to me. Hide not, I beseech thee, thy face now from me, and put not thy Servant away in displeasure. Thou hast been my help, leave me not; neither forsake me, O God of my Salvation. But for Jesus Christ his sake, I humbly entreat thee to pardon and pass by all my neglects of thee, and unthankfulness to thee, and offenses against thee. And as I here sincerely devote and dedicate my whole self, soul and body to thy service; so help me, O my God, and further me in the performance of my duty, by the grace of thy holy Spirit. To thee all hearts are open, and from thee no secrets are hid: deal with me according to the earnest desire and full purpose of my soul, to conform myself in all things to thy holy Will.

Settle in me an immovable faith in thy infinite Mercies, a constant love and cheerful affection to my duty, and a readiness of heart to obey thee, and to submit to thy wise appointments in every condition. The whole Earth is full of thy Mercies. That I may rejoice and be glad all my days, compose my broken and disturbed thoughts, quiet my troubled and disordered spirit, and appease all the ragings and tumults there, by a sweet sense of thy most tender mercies, which have been ever of old, and endure continually.

Banish from me all causeless fears and jealousies; deliver me from all unprofitable sadness and dejections of spirit: keep me from charging thee foolishly. Bestow upon me a cheerful spirit, by an humble hope in thee, and by referring myself wholly to thee. Endue me with such wisdom and uprightness, that I may neither neglect my duty, nor suspect thy gracious acceptance of me. Give me an hearty zeal to do the best that I am able; and a settled persuasion that thou requirest no more of me.

Defend me, O my gracious God, from dishonoring thee, and my Religion, by distrusting thy goodness, and calling thy loving kindness in question towards those that are sincerely bent to please thee. Remove all troublesome imaginations from me, and give me a clear understanding of thee, and of myself; or when I am in darkness and confusion of thoughts, grant me so much light and judgment, as not to conclude myself forsaken by thee, but to reflect upon thy long-continued favors to me, and many deliverances of me; that so I may resolve still to hope in thee, to bear my present trouble patiently, and to resign my will absolutely to thy good pleasure. And good Lord, enable me to look beyond these clouds, to that blessed state whither my Savior is gone, in which there is no darkness at all: and in an humble hope of coming to the same place where he is, to content myself with any condition whilst I am here, so far remote from that Region of light and glory.

Hear me most loving and merciful Father, I most humbly beseech thee; Pity my great dullness and deadness of heart. Strengthen my weak and feeble endeavors, support my fainting spirit, and cause it humbly to hope in thee forever. Confirm and establish every good thought, desire and purpose which thou hast wrought in me; perfect that which thou hast begun; make me to grow in wisdom, faith, love, and willing obedience: conduct me hereafter so evenly and steadily, so peaceably and quietly, so cheerfully and sincerely in thy ways, that I may Glorify thee whilst I live, by encouraging others to accompany me in thy service; and when I come to die, may resign my Soul unto thee with an undisturbed mind, and in an holy hope also of a joyful resurrection of the body, at the great day of the Lord Jesus, to whom be glory and dominion forever. Amen.

The Prayer for a Woman with Child.

MOST merciful and gracious God, who wilt not turn away thine ear from those that call upon thee in sincerity and truth; look down with an Eye of pity and compassion upon thy unworthy Servant. I must confess, my sins are very great, and so is my danger which is at hand; my pains to come will be grievous, and my life is now most uncertain. Assure me, I beseech thee, of the forgiveness of all my sins, mitigate my fear and sorrows, strengthen me with the comforts of thy Spirit, confirm me in the faith of my Savior, and bless all good means appointed for my comfort; that in due time I may be a joyful Mother, and see the fruit of my Body, safe, sound, and perfect, without blemish or deformity.

O Lord, I know not how soon my travel will steal on me, when I must fight that battle of Life and Death: one drop of thy mercy hath sovereign power to cure all the Wounds of those sorrows; shed therefore, O holy Father, that drop of grace upon me, in that minute when I am to encounter with so stern an adversary; strengthen me with patience; bless me that I perish not: bless the work of my Midwife; let not the Child yet unborn, the Babe in my womb, be punished for mine offenses; but give it growth, give it flourishing, and form; and when the time is come, that thou wilt call it out of this close House of flesh, where it now inhabiteth, to dwell in the open World, sanctify thy Creature, make it by Baptism, a member of thy Church, a Lamb of thy flock, and direct it in the ways of Godliness to its lives end. And all through Jesus Christ our Lord, in whose blessed words I continue to pray,

Our Father, &c.

A Thanksgiving by the Woman after safe deliverance, to be used when she is able.

MY Soul doth magnify the Lord, and my Spirit rejoiceth in God my Savior. He hath given me my Hearts desire, and not denied me the request of my lips. Children are his heritage, and the fruit of the Womb is his reward.

Glory be to thee, O Lord God eternal, who hast now delivered me from the great pains and peril of Child-birth, who hast taken away my reproach, and made me an instrument to increase thy Kingdom. It is in thy power to strike death into my Womb, but thou hast given me a double life: all mine anguishes thou hast sweetened with gladness. Continue thy mercies and favors to me thy servant; put strength into my blood, blood into my Veins, and courage into mine Heart; that my lips may render thee deserved thanks.

Thou that art the Father of love and life, look upon this mine Infant, which thou hast given me; preserve it in health, quicken it with grace, crown it with long life, that it may grow up to be a servant in thy household. Send the Father of it and me much comfort by it, that it may be a staff to our old age. Bless it with store of friends in this World, and be thou the chief friend to it for evermore: and for the better growth in godliness, feed it with the Milk of thy Word, defend it from all dangers, and all enemies Bodily and Ghostly.

And whereas it is written, that the great red Dragon stood before the Woman which was ready to be delivered, that he might devour her Child when she had brought it forth; so guard me, and regard this my birth, that Satan rule not nor reign within us; but deliver us still out of his Jaws, as a Bird out of the Snare of the Fowler. Let thy blessing, O Lord, be upon me and my Children, strongly to help, keep and defend us, from this time forth for evermore. Amen.

A Prayer to be used by one that is sick.

O Eternal and most merciful Father, look down I beseech thee upon thy poor servant, who is punished and afflicted in Body with the smart of my pain and sickness; and who is also troubled with the fear of thy heavy displeasure for my many sins and iniquities, wherewith I have provoked thy holy Majesty in the time of my health. I confess that of very faithfulness and goodness to me, thou hast laid this scourge upon me, to the end that by the stripes of my flesh, my Spirit might be healed, and saved in the day of the Lord Jesus. I valued not the benefit of health as I should have done, and therefore thou hast made me sensible of it by the want of it: in prosperity I remembered not the afflictions of my Brethren, and therefore thou hast afflicted me like unto them. I was in a kind of Spiritual lethargy, till thou didst awake me with the stroke of thy hand. And because I know that it is good for me to be thus disciplined by thee, I humble myself under thy mighty hand, and kiss this thy rod, which I trust through thy grace shall make my Soul appear fair and beautiful in thine Eyes. Comfort O Lord, my fainting Spirit, and strengthen my feeble knees, and support my weak hands, and revive my deaded heart; and so powerfully assist me with the Spirit of strength, that I may with confidence call upon thee, with patience endure this trial, with hope expect thy good pleasure, with wisdom make use of this thy visitation, and with thankfulness ever praise thy goodness and mercy for my safe recovery, if it may be with thy sacred will, whereunto I submit and wholly resign now and forever, through Jesus Christ my blessed Lord and Savior, in whose most holy words I further pray,

Our Father, &c.

A Prayer to be said by them that visit the sick.

O Eternal God, who in thy holy word by the Apostle hast promised, that the Prayer of faith shall save the sick, and thou wilt raise him up; and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him; We come unto thee in the behalf of our diseased and distressed friend, visited under thine hand. Speak comfortably, O Lord, unto his Soul; seal in his heart by thy holy Spirit the forgiveness of all his sins. Have mercy upon him, and according to the multitude of thy mercies do away all his offenses: blot all his sins out of thy remembrance.

Grant him thy grace to bear willingly this Cross, the Cross of sickness; to drink heartily of this Cup, the Cup of affliction; to endure patiently this Yoak, the Yoak of tribulation; and to suffer meekly this Rod, the Rod of correction. He hath received good things of thee, make him willing to receive evil also: as heretofore he rejoiced in his health, so teach him now to rejoice in his sickness: and as he was not ashamed to live, so let him not be afraid to die, because his life is hid with Christ in Heaven.

Let the sweet feeling and taste of a lively faith distaste all the filthy corruptions that are in him; and after the example of the good Samaritan, after the sharp wine of grievous tribulation, instill also the suppling Oil of comfort, whereby he may be able to endure those troubles which otherwise would be intolerable unto him. Strengthen his memory, whereby to call upon thy glorious Name. Settle his Spirits, that they may not wander and fly out into any unruly motions. Lay thy finger upon his lips, that they may not fall into cursing or blaspheming thy Deity, or into any vain language. Take from his Eyes all delight of this frail world, and let his Soul make ready only for a voyage to Heaven. Set thy saving mark upon his Soul, and give order to the destroyer that he hurt it not. But having fought a good fight, let him now triumphantly exult and say, O Death, where is thy sting; O Hell, where is thy victory? I thank thee, O Lord, who hast given me victory by Jesus Christ. Be merciful unto us here present, who as feeling members of one body, adore thy holy Name, and implore thy Divine help, for this thy servant; grant him assistance of thy Spirit to the last gasp, and us assurance to be heard of thee for him, and all others upon the like occasion We could wish that thou shouldst speak to this our friend, as thou didst unto thy servant, when thou saidst, Arise, take up thy bed, and walk: but yet alas! we know not whether we ask aright or not; thy will be fulfilled; we know that he shall but change this life transitory for Eternity, cast off mortality, and be clothed with immortality; and this light affliction, which is but for a moment, shall cause unto him a far more excellent and eternal weight of glory. Wherefore make us all wise to salvation; and teach us so to number our days aright, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom. Give both this thy servant and all of us grace, willingly to forsake this present evil world, and so to live in thy fear, that we may die in thy favor, and so reign with thee forever hereafter. Grant this for Jesus Christ his sake, our only Lord and Savior. Amen.

A Thanksgiving after Sickness.

O Most merciful Lord God, I thy late sick and sorrowful servant do with bended knees, and a thankful heart, prostrate myself before thee at this time, acknowledging that thou hast been a loving Father unto me, not only before I was yet born, but ever since I hung upon my Mothers breast.

Manifest experience have I had of thy manifold mercies many times, but never more than in my late and last visitation. I offer now unto thee a sacrifice of praise. Because I employed not the faculties of my Soul and members of my Body as I should have done, thou didst bereave me of the strength, and vigor, and use of them for a season; but now because thy compassions fail not, thou hast returned them to me again: wherefore I consecrate and devote them perpetually to thy service; and as I am in the state of my Body, so by the power of thy renewing grace I will become in the estate of my soul a new man. My broken heart which thou hast healed, shall now entirely love thee; my feeble knees and weak bones which thou hast settled, shall night and day bow to thee; my weak hands which thou hast strengthened, shall continually be lifted up unto thee. I confess unto thee, O Lord, that in my health I often read and heard that worldly delights and comforts were vain, and much like Flags and Bulrushes, which men in danger of drowning catch to bear them up, but they sink down under water with them; yet did I not learn till I suffered, till thy rod had imprinted it even in my flesh. Now O Lord I beseech thee to knit my heart unto thee, that I may fear thy Name: create in me a new heart, and renew a right Spirit within me. I asked life of thee, and thou gavest it me. I now desire and crave thy salvation; O my God, with-hold it not: make me to repent of my sins (the cause of my sickness) and to depend upon thee, the giver of all good things; and make me in the time of prosperity to think of adversity, in health to think of sickness, in sickness to think of death, and at all times so to think of judgment, that whether I wake or sleep, eat or drink, or whatsoever I do else, I may ever have this sounding in mine ears, Arise ye dead and come to judgment Give me grace, O Lord, to make this use of mine affliction past, and to cleave and stick fast unto thee in all holiness for the time to come, through my Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, in whose Name and words I further pray,

Our Father, &c.

Of DEATH.

AND now I cannot think any conclusion more fit and proper for a devout life, than a short meditation on that which shall be the conclusion of life itself. First therefore, consider the shortness and miseries of this life; That our days consume in vanity, and our years in trouble; That our whole life is but a Dream, and when Death awakes us, we find our hands empty of all that which hath cost us so much labor, and travail, and sorrow, and sin.

Remember the swiftness and suddenness of Death; That our days are but a span-long, and our flourishing but a flower of the field, which though it be not plucked up, yet soon withers of itself, and falls away.

The young may die soon, but the old cannot live long.

Remember that in this short life, we are yet to provide for an Eternity either of weal or woe; and therefore cannot be too careful how we spend every minute of that upon which depends a matter of so great, so lasting importance.

There is but one way of Birth, but many ways and means of Death: and our life hangs by so small a thread, that every little chance is ready to break it off.

After Death we are immediately called to judgment before the high Court of Heaven, to give a severe account how we have performed that duty to which we were Created; and accordingly to receive an irrevocable sentence of eternal happiness or misery.

The Judge, before whom we shall stand, is infinite both in Knowledge and Power; so that it is impossible either to hide anything from his all-seeing Eye, or to escape out of the reach of his Almighty hand.

The Lord cometh in a day when we look not for him, and in an hour when we are not aware. Let us therefore watch, and wait for his coming, that when he knocketh, we may open unto him immediately.

How dangerous and deplorable a condition would it be, to be found and taken away in the midst of any sin, or in a continued course of sinful life.

On the contrary, how happy, and blessed, and joyful a thing would it be, to be found practicing and persevering in that which is good!

Blessed is that servant, whom his Lord when he cometh shall find so doing.

A Prayer preparatory to Death.

O Eternal Lord God, who hast Created the world and all Time, who hast made my days as it were a span-long, and mine Age even as nothing in respect of thee: Teach me so to number my days, that I may apply my heart to thy Heavenly wisdom, and so carefully employ this short time which thou hast appointed me to spend here, so make up my reckonings before that great day come, that whensoever thou shalt call me hence, I may give such an account of the Talent where with thou hast entrusted me, that I may receive that joyful sentence, Will done, good and faithful servant.

Grant that I may be always provided with Oil in my Lamp, and ready to enter in with the wise Virgins whensoever the Bridegroom shall come, and receive a blessing among those which watch and wait for thy coming: so come Lord Jesu, come quickly. Amen.

Grace before Meat.

HUMble our Souls before thee, O Lord, and cause us to see the smallness of our desert, even in respect of the least of thy mercies; and bless these thy Creatures to us at this time, to the rejoicing of the Soul of thy servants, through Jesus Christ. Amen.

Grace after Meat.

O Lord, we return thee most hearty thanks for the mercy we have enjoyed in receiving these thy Creatures for our Bodily relief, and let us also labor for the meat that perisheth not, for the sake of our Savior Jesus Christ. Amen.

Grace before Meat.

WE look up unto thee, O Lord, who givest us life and breath, and all things; beseeching thee to forgive us all our sins, and to make us such thankful partakers of these thy good Creatures, that by a moderate use of them our Bodies may be refreshed, and made more fit to accompany our Souls in hearty endeavors to do thee faithful service, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

Grace after Meat.

WE return unto thee, O Lord, our hearty thanks for these and all other the like mercies bestowed upon us, even since we had a being; especially for the promises thou hast given us of eternal life, by thy Son Christ. Enable us, we beseech thee, to continue so patiently in all good works, that at last we may attain it. And bless thine Universal Church, these Realms, the King, the Queen, and all the Royal Family; and grant us thy grace, mercy and peace, through Christ Jesus. Amen.

THE PREFACE.

THOUGH this be the first appearance this Tract has made in the world, yet its Being is of somewhat a more ancient date; it having received its lineaments and perfect form some years since: when the Author not having partiality enough to think it worthy public view; had adjudg'd it, if not to perpetual darkness, yet at least to a long indefinite suspension from seeing light. In this interval, 'tis more than probable some passages may have lost much of their propriety to the present state of affairs, they having been adapted to circumstances which may since have received some change: and herein I must be speak the Readers candor, to make such allowances as the matter shall require; of which yet I suppose there will not occur very many, or very important occasions.

BUT would God I were to apologize for a yet far greater absurdity, that our scene were so shifted, that the whole design of the ensuing discourse, might become one entire impertinence, and that our more eminent conformity to the rules of our Christian institution, might supersede these disquisitions above our failances and aberrations. But alas, I find I have pitched upon a subject not like to be out-dated; vice daily gaining not only strength, but impudence: nay we are not only become witnesses against ourselves by declaring our Sin as Sodom, but we have forced God also to attest against us by punishing us in a manner no less conspicuous and manifest. And surely then 'tis more than time for us to take the Prophets advice, Hag. 1. 7. to consider our ways, to reflect not only on those robust, giant-like provocations which have thus bid defiance to Heaven; but also to sift out those secret incendiaries that have inflamed us to this mad daring; to examine what that 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, that inflammable bitumen, the untemper'd mortar is with which we build our Babel, by discovering those misperswasions and false confidences, wherein many of our other guilts are founded: in order to which this slight Tract offers its feeble, yet well meant aids; being forced out of its retirement, and like Croesus his dumb Son, compel'd to speak by impulse of the present exigent: and how despicable soever the Mite contributed be in its self, yet if it may provoke the more wealthy to cast in richer gifts, it may prove no unprofitable agent for the Corban. 'Tis evident this is a season which not only warrants, but exacts the most importunate endeavors of persuading men to those things that belong to their Peace.

FOR although 'tis true that every state of sin, sets us also in a state of hostility with God, yet our present condition seems to have advanced us beyond the common degrees even of that. 'Tis we know, high insolence against a Prince to despise and violate his laws, but when to that are superadded contumelies, and designed affronts to his person, this is such an accumulated outrage, as will vanquish the most resolved Patience. And this alas appears to be our case: we have long indulged to ourselves the breach of all Divine laws, gratified every appetite, every passion and lust with the forfeiture of our allegiance, and as if this would not serve to render us irreconcilable enough to God, we are now grown to subjoin malice to licentiousness; project not so much to please ourselves, as to displease him; profess a contempt not only of his commands, but himself; and seek no less to dethrone Him, than abrogate those. Thus have we made it a kind of personal quarrel, and by those impious blasphemies we daily dart against Heaven, do as it were dare the Divine Majesty to vindicate its self. Whether his great longanimity may have given our Hectors a fancy, that they had vapor'd God (as they are used to do men) into a tameness, I shall not examine: but his late proceedings with us sufficiently testify that he means no longer to decline our challenge. He now appears to avow the enmity as openly as we have done; and has already given us competent essays, how fearful a thing it is to fall into the hands of the living God, Heb. 10. 31.

'TIS true indeed that he has formerly owned his controversy with our Land, and by a long series of great and heavy calamities attested himself the God to whom vengeance belongeth, Psal. 94. 1. Yet as great Monarchs use to quell lesser insurrections by their Lieutenants, and subordinate Officers, but when the rebellion grows high and desperate, then to encounter it in their own persons; so is it here observable that God then Chastised, and tried to reduce us by inferior instruments, found us out Lictors among ourselves, and made one man's sin the punishment of another's: but now as if he had the same jealousy for his honor which Joab had at the siege of Rabba for David's, 2 Sam. 12. 28. as if he feared to be rival'd in the glory of our ruin, he takes us into his own hand, marks us out, as he did Pharaoh, to be the Trophies of his own peculiar vengeance, appearing signally against us in all the dreadful solemnities of an enraged enemy.

FOR first, has he not as Moses speaks, Deut. 32. 41. whet his glittering Sword? Nay, has he not moreover (in the Scripture style) made it drunk with blood? by sweeping away multitudes of us in a raging PESTILENCE, which Marcht from one part of the Nation to another in a kind of Triumphant progress, as if it had received the same mandate God gave Abraham, Gen. 13. 17. Arise walk through the land, in the length thereof and in the breadth thereof, for unto thee will I give it. Whether it may not thus fatally complete its course, notwithstanding the halt it seems to make, and pass from our Dan to our Beersheba, is a question that can with no probability be resolved in the negative; for as it is not to be doubted but there were in Judea as great sinners as those on whom the Tower of Siloam fell, Luke 13. that those who have hitherto escaped have an equal share in the provoking cause of the Judgment: So also that great unsensibleness many of us show of what others groan under, is a very ominous abode; it being not only a dangerous symptom, but a probable means of drawing that calamity to ourselves. When God sees we will suffer nothing by way of consent and sympathy with others, 'tis but equal we have our part in a more direct and immediate infliction, and feel what we would not compassionate. Thucydides mentions it as the effect of the great Plague at Athens that it had extinguished humanity; brought in a kind of ferity and barbarousness among them, rendering them openly villanous to men, and blasphemous against God; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, there was no restraint of law or religion, one part being desperate upon prospect of their danger, the other presumptuous upon the contemplation of their Escape; and sure if we look impartially, ours will appear to have had somewhat of the same operation. Those compassions which the novelty it seems at first gave us to sufferers in this kind, seems now quite extinct; so unconcerned are we grown to everything that touches us not in our individuals, as if we owned no relation to the species of mankind, though backed also with that closer tie, which the spiritual consanguinity has superadded. A pregnant indication of this may, I doubt not, be collected (as from many other circumstances, so particularly) from the great hast has in many places been made, to lay aside those public Humiliations & intercessions which were recommended to us as well by the command of Authority, as the common distress; but have been cast off without the subtraction of either of those motives. Whether we are duly mindful of the afflictions of Joseph, that cannot afford one day in a month for a solemn reflection on them, I must leave to every man's conscience to discuss. But sure we are no less wanting to ourselves than them in this neglect; the office being no less designed for Antidote than cure, to prevent the Judgment where it is not, than to remove it where it is: and if we will neither deprecate on our own behalfs, nor intercede on others; we are sure as improvident, as uncharitable, and may justly expect the fatal event of both.

IN the interim, although the present respite from destruction, and our own deceitful hearts flatter us and say Peace, Peace; we have all reason to conclude that God is not attoned, the quarrel and hostility goes on, and his hand is stretched out still, Es. 5. 25. And so indeed we find it in other dismal events. Slaughter we know is not the only effect of War; which as it destroys the lives of many, blasts the supports and Joys of more. This consequence of hostility we find well expressed by the Prophet Joel 2. 3. The land is as the Garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness, and herein also hath the Lord of Hosts, the great God of battle shown himself mighty against us, he has invaded us not only with Sword, but FIRE: and in so stupendous manner desolated the glory of our Land, that no human fury, could have procured, or even have wisht the like vastation and ruins. That City which was great among the Nations, and Princess among the Provinces, Lam. 1. 1. lies buried in her own Ashes, and is both Funeral-pile and Urne to herself, and what neither foreign nor domestic enemies could in a succession of many ages effect, one blast of the breath of his displeasure, Psal. 18. has performed in a moment. So verifying even in a literal sense the Apostles affirmation, Heb. 12. 29. that our God is a consuming fire. Plutarch tells us when Fabius sacked Tarentum, he took not away their Images, but said, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 let us leave the Tarentines their God's that are offended with them. 'Tis our Calamity to be signally under the indignation of our incensed God, which in that great Captains judgment, was somewhat more dreadful than the worst inflictions of War: for what industry soever has been used to entitle either the negligence or designs of men unto our overthrow, yet sure never any judgment had more legible marks of God's immediate hand: such as show he meant to revenge the abuse of his former gentle methods: that those who would not be reformed by the slighter corrections wherein he dallied with them, might find a judgment worthy of God, Wisd. 12. 26. And sure such was this, which both for its greatness and irresistibleness does well own its Author, and shows his wrath was accended to a very excessive heat, that thus poured out its self not only like, but in Fire, Lam. 2. 4.

I shall not here assume the Politicians part, and weigh the detriment we have sustained by it in our civil interest, of which perhaps nothing but time and experience can give us a full estimate; it rather suits my design to observe what relates to our spiritual concerns, whilst God's dwelling places were involved in the same ruin with ours; his own peculiar portion not exempted, but as the Prophet complains, Es. 64. 11. Our holy and beautiful houses where our fathers praised him are burnt with fire: this though perhaps least considered, is sure not the least sad circumstance, had only the scenes of our luxury, or our fraud been destroyed, it might have sent us with more fervency to the places of our devotion, and we might have frequented God's houses the better, for being destituted of our own; but when these also are made parts of the common heap, 'tis a sad testimonial that our very religion was provoking; That that pageant-like piety which we deposited in our CHURCHES, only to make a show with on holy-days, served only to defile those holy places, and rendered them so polluted as required no slighter purgation than that of FIRE. 'Tis we know-not long, since those mansions sacred to the Prince of Peace, were even in the vulgar obvious sense, made magazines for War; but yet more so in reference to that Pulpitwild-fire, which set the Nation in combustion; whether that strange Fire which some of our Nadabs and Abihu's introduced there, may not (even at this distance) have done its part to the drawing down this FIRE from Heaven, I leave to their serious reflection. But neither the Hypocrite nor the Seditious must ingross the guilt of this ruin: The Atheist vies with both; for alas what should God do with Temples among those, who pay him no worship? or why should he let those sacred monuments remain among them, to whom all memorials of him serve but as occasions, and incentives to blaspheme him? They have long said with those in Job, Depart from us, for we desire not the knowledge of thy ways; and now 'tis but equitable (I had almost said Civil) to take them at their word, and no longer reside among those who so avowedly disclaim him.

AND this, 'tis much to be feared, may be the portent of this dismal vastation: we know men use not to deface those houses, where they intend to inhabit: and sure this abhorring his Sanctuary, and casting off his Altar, Lam. 2. is a dreadful sign, that he means no longer to continue his residence among us; indeed we find in Scripture that his promise of cohabiting is always limited to those who own themselves his people; and therefore when so many of us have openly renounced that relation, we can with no justice expect the blessing appendant to it.

BUT perhaps this will seem to such no formidable thing; God's so withdrawing of himself is but agreeable to their wishes, a kind of quitting the field to them, and so rather matter of complacency than regret: but 'tis to be considered that there is another presence of God that will infallibly succeed this; when he removes that of his grace, 'tis to make way for that of his anger; like the Philistines we shall know the God of Israel is among us by his Plagues, 1 Sam. 5. or to make a yet more dreadful comparison, we shall like the damned in hell, discern his presence only in the punitive effects of it, and read his nearness in our sufferings. And sure this will be but an ill exchange, even to the profanest of us, those that have most despised or loathed the soft breathings of his Word and Spirit; will find it yet harder to endure the whirlwinds of his wrath, which will snatch from us those secular advantages for whose pursuit we have neglected the better part, Luke 10. 42. and leave us as little of worldly enjoyments, as we desired to have of spiritual.

OF this our late Calamities have given us a sad Preludium, and God knows how soon we may see the last scene of the fatal Tragedy, it being too probable that this is God's last Experiment upon us, like the Causticks and Scarifyings to a Lethargick patient; if this bring us not to sense we are like to sleep on to destruction: And alas what uncomfortable symptoms appear even in this point also. Who is there that (unless awakened by his personal concernments) seems at all to startle at the noise of public ruin? When God in displeasure threatened the Israelites that he would remit their conduct to his Angel, and not go himself with them. The text says, they mourned and no man put on his ornaments on him, Exod. 33. 4. or as the LXX, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, and the Syriac, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, they stripped themselves of their Armor, their ruffling garb of War, and appeared in the penitential dress of sackcloth and ashes: but now that we are given up not to a conducting but destroying Angel, what signs of remorse do we show? What vanity (I fear I may ask what vice) have we substracted, upon the sense of God's anger? What nicety in clothes or diet have we cut off in sympathy with the nakedness and hunger of our afflicted brethren? Nay, do not the unreasonable Iollities of too many among us, look as if we triumpht in their miseries, found Music in the discordant sounds of their groans, and our own laughter; and emulated that infamous barbarity of Nero, who played while Rome burned? 'Tis mentioned by the Prophet as a most preposterous thing, a kind of impious Solecism to revel under the menace of judgments. Thus saith the Lord, A sword, a sword, it is sharpened to make a sore slaughter, it is furberish that it may glitter, should we then make mirth? Ezek. 21. 9, 10. and certainly it less befits us against whom God has not only prepared, but used his sword; who are not only under the threats, but actual Execution of his vengeance, and what is it but interpretatively to prompt him, to yet sharper inflictions, by showing him that these have not edge enough to penetrate us? With how much indignation God resents this perverse, this contumelious behavior, we may read, Isaiah 22. 12, 13, 14. In that day did the Lord call to weeping, and mourning, and to baldness, and to girding with sackcloth, and behold joy and gladness, slaying Oxen and killing Sheep, eating Flesh and drinking Wine; eating and drinking for tomorrow we shall die: Upon which follows, that severe denunciation: Surely this iniquity shall not be purged from you till you die. Of so deep a tincture is this guilt, that 'tis as lasting as our lives, and like the fretting leprosy in the house, Levite. 14. 45. can be removed by nothing but its dissolution.

O then let us not add this to the heap of our other provocations, mistake impudence or desperation for courage; and frantically defy that omnipotence which we are sure we cannot resist: but since it has pleased God even in wrath to remember mercy, let us transcribe his copy, be as kind to ourselves as he has been to us, and stop in our career as he has done in his; not so madly affect a full parallel with Sodom and Gomorrah, as to force him to destroy that remnant, Es. 1. 9. which alone distinguishes our case: but rather take pattern from Nineveh; cry, and cry mightily to God, join humiliation to our prayers, and reformation to both. And could we be persuaded to do this with the same sincerity, and universality, we might hope it may be with the same success also: would everyone who has contributed to the accending, as industriously contribute to the appeasing of God's wrath: would all who have brought their fire-brands bring also their tears to quench them, as there would be no dry Eyes in the Nation at the present, so might it prevent as great a Generality of weeping ones for the future; secure us such a tranquility here, as may calmly convoy us to that impassible state, where all tears shall be wiped from our eyes, where there shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor pain, Rev. 21. 4.

CHAP. I. The Character of Christian Religion, demonstrating its aptitude to plant exemplary Virtue and Sanctity.

THE holy Psalmist gives it as part of the Character of Pious persons, and therewithal a description of their felicity, Psal. 92. 13. That they shall bring forth more fruit in their Age: and what he thus observes of the members disjunctively and apart, reason suggests to be in a higher, and more eminent manner applicable to the whole body united: And it being as well the mark as duty of every single Christian to grow in grace, 2 Pet. 3. 18. we may by all rules of Proportion, conclude that the collective mass of such, the whole Church is by this time near attained to the measure of the stature of the fullness of Christ, Eph. 4. 3. And indeed this is so regular an inference, that whilst the premises stand firm 'tis impossible to shake the conclusion, the entire body must necessarily augment answerably to the growth of its several parts. And if we should so far let loose to speculation as to forget our experience: If we measure the effect only by the power and energy of the cause, we should surely be as far from doubting the premises also. Christianity is in its self of so prolifick a nature, so apt to impregnate the hearts and lives of its proselytes, that it is hard to imagine, that any branch should want a due fertility that is engrafted into so vigorous a stock.

FOR first, in its spring and original it is most supernatural and divine, derived immediately from him, who had nothing more of man than he purposely assumed to draw us the nearer to him as God. He it was that disseminated this doctrine, and that in order to the purifying to himself a peculiar people zealous of good works; and certainly his choice abundantly justifies its propriety to that end, and his descent from Heaven on that errand puts so venerable a solemnity upon it, that though his descent were very astonishing, yet it will be much more so, that it should fail of the designed effect.

AND indeed did our Faith give us no clue to lead us to the author, yet its composition would speak it to be of no human extraction, its precepts are so excellent and refined, so agreeable to the more spiritual part of our temper, and so apt, as to forestall, so to cleanse and sublimate the more gross and corrupt, as shows flesh and blood never revealed it. Nay farther, so effectually providing for all those advantages to mankind, which the wisest of men's laws have in vain attempted, that methinks they all stand before it like the Magicians before Moses, and by their impotence tacitly confess it to be the finger of God. 'Twere too large a Theme to confront them in the several instances, let it suffice to observe one which has a common influence on all; and that is the immaculate cleanness of heart, which Christ's, and only Christ's law requires. This is the only proper basis on which to superstruct, first innocence, and then virtue, and without this the most rigid exactors of outward purity, do but transcribe the folly of him, who Pumps very laboriously in a Ship, yet neglects to stop the Leak: or the worse tyranny of Pharaoh in requiring Brick without Straw: so far is it from a severity in our law-giver, thus to limit and restrain our thoughts, that it is an act of the greatest indulgence: by no means the laying on a new burden, but the furnishing us with an Engine to bear with ease that weight which otherwise the stoutest Atlas must sink under. And were but this one precept sincerely conformed to, it would not only facilitate but ascertain the obedience to all the rest. If the first sparks of ill were quenched within, what possibility is there they should ever break out into a flame? How shall he kill that dares not be angry? Be Adulterous in act, that did not first transgress in his desire? How shall he be perjured that fears an oath? Or defraud that permits not himself to covet? In the like manner all positive acts of virtue, are but the natural effects of the interior habit. Where the love of God is seated in the Heart, 'twill operate in all the faculties, keep them in a busy endeavor of doing acceptable service: when fear is planted there, it will break forth in outward reverence and duty; and so proportionably 'twill be in every other instance. 'Tis therefore an advice well becoming the wisdom of Solomon, Prov. 4. to keep the heart with all diligence: but then it is withal the work of him who is greater than Solomon, to teach us how to do this: for unless he keep that City the watchman waketh but in vain. If he instruct not to secure those issues of life, they will betray and ruin, appear indeed the savor of death unto death. Now of this divine art of Tactics and defense, Christianity is the only School, and therefore most fitly qualified for the producing all those supernatural excellencies to which the timely prepossession of the heart, is the rudiment and principle.

AND as the preceptive part enjoins the most exact, and elevated virtue, so is it most advantageously enforcit by the Promissory, which both in respect of the kind and value of the rewards; and also the manner of proposing them, is most exquisitely adapted to the same end.

FOR first, if we consider the nature of the things promised, we shall find they are not gross and carnal, such as may court and gratify the bestial part of us; but such as are proportioned to the supreme and leading principle, as feast a Soul, and suit with the capacities of an intelligence. All the beatitudes the Gospel tenders to its votaries, either relate to the purity or peace of the mind in this life; or else to its completer felicity hereafter. And though 'tis true, the body is not wholly unconsidered, though the addition of all temporal necessities be promised, yet even those are for the Souls sake, either to secure it from the sin of solicitude and distrust, or to preserve it a useful instrument for the others service. And as for the future glory in which the body is to partake, 'tis to be observed, that flesh and blood cannot inherit it; that load of earth which now engages to corruption must be put off, must be calcin'd and spiritualiz'd; and thus made glorious, be clothed upon with Glory. So that in all the Gospel dispensation, there is no provision for the flesh, its lusts and sensualities. And then sure there cannot be a more unanswerable argument against our providing for it, than to see it left out of God's care. Indeed had we proposals of a Mahumetan Paradise, were we to expect our bliss only in the satiating our appetites, it might be reasonable here to whet them before hand, to stretch them to the utmost wideness, or in the Prophets phrase, to enlarge our desires as Hell, and by frequent antepasts excite our gust for that profuse perpetual meal. Or were we only to have our portion in this life, to enjoy an uninterrupted affluence of outward comforts, 'twere but good husbandry to improve them to the height, and the Wise man's advice would then cease to be Eirony, Eccles. 11. 9. Rejoice O young man, and let thy heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, and walk in the ways of thy heart, and the sight of thine Eyes. Had we only the prospect of a Canaan, such an eternal inheritance as a conquering Sword could give, as the salvation of a Joshua, and the affluence of milk and honey could produce. 'Twould be no wonder, if we never voluntarily endured the thirst and famine of the wilderness, but be always as they desiring meat for our lust, projecting the gratifying those desires in whose repletion we placed our happiness. But when our Religion makes us no such tender, when all its hopes are of another make, invite to those Diviner joys of which sensuality has no capacity or taste. What pretence can we have to cherish that here, which we must wholly be divested of hereafter, those immaterial felicities we expect, do naturally suggest to us, the necessity of preparing our appetites, and hungers for them, without which Heaven can be no Heaven to us: for since the pleasure of anything results from the agreement between it and the desire, what satisfaction can Spiritual enjoyments give unto a Carnal mind? Alas, what delight would it be to the Swine to be wrapped in fine Linnen, and laid in Odours: his senses are not gratified by any such delicacies, nor would he feel anything besides the torment of being withheld from the mire. And as little complacency would a brutish Soul find in those purer and refined pleasures, which can only upbraid, not satisfy him. So that could we by an impossible supposition fancy such a one assumed to those fruitions, his pleasure sure would be as little as his preparation for it was. Those Eyes which have continually beheld vanity, would be dazzled, not delighted with the Beatifick vision; neither could that Tongue, which has accustomed its self only to Oaths and Blasphemies, find Harmony or Music in a Hallelujah. 'Tis the peculiar privilege of the pure in heart, that they shall see God; and if any others could so invade this their enclosure, as to take Heaven by violence, it surely would be a very joyless possession to these men, and only place them in a condition to which they have the greatest aversion and Antipathy. So that holiness here, is not only necessary to the acquiring, but the enjoyment of Bliss hereafter: and therefore unless men will contrive to annihilate their joys, and affect the monstrous riddle of being tormented in Heaven, they cannot but from this Spirituality of the promises, infer a necessity of purifying themselves, and being capable at least of innocent Celestial joys: and since that only can be done by virtuous practice here on Earth, the Obligation thereto must needs be very pressing and indispensable. And as the nature of the promises directs to this, so does the great transcendent value encourage and animate. Hope is the grand exciter of industry, and as the object of Hope is more or less desirable, so is the endeavor more intense or remiss; and upon this ground we must conclude the Christian has all reason to be the most indefatigable, seeing his expectations are the noblest and most encouraging. That they are so, we cannot but acknowledge, if we admit of the description which the Spirit gives: that Spirit which as he seals us to it, so is himself the earnest of that Inheritance. He in the Sacred Scriptures has drawn us a Map of the Country which we are to enter: and sure we may say of it as Caleb and Joshua did of Canaan, Numb. 14. 7. the land is an exceeding good land. For first, if we consider the Negative advantages it has, we shall find there is an absence of all the Ills, destructive or affrightful unto human Nature. There shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor pain, Revel. 21. 4. Here alas we are infested by all these. Sorrow and Pain, prey and insult on all the comforts of our lives; leave us not a Gourd, which is not like that of Jonah, smitten with these Worms: and then comes death, the grand devourer, and spares not life itself. Nay, those little respites which we have from these, are so embittered by unpleasant expectations and Presages, that we are sad before we are afflicted: in pain without a disease, and in death in the midst of life: and then a State exempted, not only from the Calamities but the Fears of these, may well deserve to be looked upon with appetite.

BUT Heaven is designed for our reward, as well as rescue, and therefore is adumbrated by all those positive excellencies which can endear or recommend. It is a Crown, and that not of thorns, such as our Savior's was, and such as the more affected Diadems of the world oft prove unto the wearer, but one of Glory: nor is that Crown, nor that Glory like our sublunary splendors, which suddenly vanish, and leave the possessors to the greater obscurity and contempt: but 'tis permanent, such as fades not away, 1 Pet. 5. 4. or in St. Paul's phrase, an eternal weight of Glory. But to give you its more comprehensive Character, 'tis a being with the Lord, 1 Thess. 4. 17. Nay, 'tis a possessing even God himself. He shall be their God, Rev. 21. 3. and what can he want who possesses him who is all things? How can he fail of of the most ravishing delight, that stands before him in whose presence is the fullness of Joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures, and those not short or transient, but for evermore? So indefeasible is our estate in those *Joy*s, that if we do not like mad prodigals sell it in reversion, we shall when we are once invested, be beyond the possibility of ill husbandry, not have it in our power to undo ourselves. Now surely these are great and precious promises, such as may well sustain the weight of that inference the Apostle builds upon them; and engage us to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness both of flesh and spirit, and to perfect holiness in the fear of God, 2 Cor. 7. 1. for they address to that Principle which is confestly Predominant in our Nature; so that if the love of Christ cannot, yet the love of our selves may constrain us. How must it then affront and baffle the enticements of sin, when we compare its empty vanishing pleasures with those solid and durable joys? What a forestalling will it be of Satan's markets, that God bids so much fairer for us: offers us that to which his 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 all this will I give (could he make such a whole-sale) can bear no proportion, and how then shall we ever barter it away for those little petty commodities he retails to us; or make any other reply to his proffers, than a get thee behind me Satan? For alas! can we remember that we are candidates for a Kingdom, and yet retain the abject spirits of slaves? Do we expect to reign hereafter, and yet depose ourselves before hand here? Suffer every the vilest lust to rule over us? Is so glorious a prize annexed to the victory, and will it not animate the faintest heart, and feeblest hands to the combat? What Lions can we fear in the way which this hope is not Sampson enough to encounter? How light are our heaviest, how momentary our most lasting Afflictions, if balanced with that eternal weight of Glory? Are we spoiled of our goods, here is a reserve of treasure which no Thief, neither the slye, nor the avowed, the pilferer, nor the sequestrator can invade. Are we reduced to our Savior's destitution, not to have where to lay our head, yet we have a building of God, an house not made with hands eternal in the Heavens. Are we reproacht for the name of Christ, that Ignominy serves but to advance our future Glory, every such Libel here, becomes Panegyric there. Nay, are we persecuted to death, that sends us but to take possession of the Crown of Life. Upon such sure grounds does our Christianity set us. While we make good its condition it pulls out the sting of all that is most deadly. And in a more comprehensive sense, possesses us of the privilege promised the Disciples, that nothing should by any means hurt them, Mar. 16. The most adverse chances being but like the ploughing and breaking the ground, in order to a more plentiful harvest. And yet we are not so wholly turned off to that reversion, as to have no supplies for the present; for besides the comfort of so great and certain an expectation in another life, we have promises also for this. Even of all those internal and spiritual satisfactions which attend the practice of piety. The feast of a good Conscience is the true Christians daily diet, and sure whatever the rich men of the world think, he only can be said to fare deliciously: nay, he has yet more supernatural food, Manna rain'd down immediately from Heaven: the Holy Spirit sent on purpose to refresh and support him: those Joys which differ rather in degree than kind, from those which are to be his final portion. And that the Soul may not be too much incommoded in her house of clay, there is provision made for that also, such necessaries secured to the body, as may keep it in Tenantable repair: we have Christ's express promise for it, that to those that seek the Kingdom of God, and his righteousness, all these things shall be added: not that superfluity which may oppress and load, (render the body rather the Tomb than Mansion of the Soul) yet such as may sustain and support us: and sure 'tis easy to decide which is the happier lot. In short, we are sure of enough to defray the charge of that voyage, which lands us at Eternal Bliss: and certainly he must be of a very sluggish or querulous humor, that shall demur upon setting out, or demand higher encouragements.

AND as the nature and value of the Promises render them most proper engagements and incentives to all virtue; so if we consider the manner of proposing, we shall find them in that respect also highly contributive to the same end. For first, they are clear and express, not wrapped up in dark enigmatical insinuations, wherein men must exercise their sagacity as well as their faith: but revealed with that plainness, that 'tis impossible for any who knows but the letter of the Gospel to be ignorant of the Eternal rewards it proposes. And herein the difference belongs to Christianity above all other Religions, some whereof have left men so much in the dark, that many Sects among them have denied the immortality of the Soul, and sure they were but faint encouragements they could propose unto that virtue which was to perish with them. What should animate them to the rugged severe tastes of restraining appetites, subduing passions, eradicating habits who discerned no rewards for blameless Souls. 'Tis true indeed virtue is in herself perfectly amiable, though she brought no dowry, but experience shows us she has not many Platonic lovers: and when so few are ambitious to wed Her, when she brings an Eternal inheritance with her, we may easily guess how little she will be sought without it. When men once conclude that their Spirits shall vanish into the soft Air; the inference is very obvious, Come on, let us use the creatures as in youth; as we find it elegantly pursued, Wisd. 2. But of those who acknowledged a future being, their preceptions were very misty and obscure. The Heathens had such confused notions of their Elysium, that the Epithet of shades belonged more properly to the darkness than the refreshment, and was a reward fit for the votaries of those ambiguous Oracles they consulted. And proportionably to the obscurity of their hopes were the Exercises of their virtue: their Piety was even overwhelmed and confounded by the multitude of their Deities; nay, which is yet stranger, their God's themselves seem to have been lost in their own crowd: else sure the Athenians would never have inscrib'd an Altar to the unknown God: and indeed their offices were generally such, as if they had been devoted to no other, they having as little discerning of their Worship as of their God. 'Twas wrapped up in clouds and darkness; had mysterious recesses to which the common worshipper had no admittance; such as were to acquire a veneration only by not being understood: and though this must needs deprive their services of that spirit and quickness, which constitutes the virtue of devotion, yet alas their Religion had more than that negative contrariety to Virtue. Many of their worships being nothing but a solemnity of the foulest vices: and their Divinity taught them to violate Morality. A deceit Satan could not probably so long have triumpht in, had they had the Gospel notion of Heaven, for sure they could not have supposed their God's of such mutable inclinations, as to affect purity in their cohabitants, and pollution in their Votaries: or such incongruous dispensers of rewards, as to apportion an impeccable state hereafter to the most flagitious criminals on Earth.

AS to the Jews 'tis true, they derived their light from a clearer Fountain, were under the Economy of immediate Revelation, and therefore might be supposed to have had a freer prospect into that Heaven, from whence their Law descended, yet even they were in this, as in many other particulars, under Moses his veil, had rather dark adumbrations, and those too overwhelmed with the multitude of express temporal promises. The earthly Canaan lay so fair and open to their prospect, as easily intercepted their view of the Heavenly; and their faith must remove, at least overlook, that mountain before it could come to any sight of the Horizon and extended Sky. Nay, when 'tis remembered that the Sadducees a great and learned part of their Doctors denied all future being, we must think the intimations of it were very obscure; it being scarce imaginable, that any considering men should think the Souls expired with the Body upon any other ground, but that they knew not what after State to assign it. So that though they wanted not figures and shadows, or as the Apostle calls them, patterns of Heavenly things, Heb. 9. 23. yet they seemed not to have been well understood, and the generality of men were not only in their Persons, but their Understandings denied entrance into the holy of holies; penetrated not that mystical representation, which was within the Veil: and answerable to this dimness of their perceptions, was the whole system and body of their Religion, which rather entertained its self in those external bodily performances, which affected the sense, than in those Divine and Spiritual raptures, which purified and elevated the Soul. 'Tis the Apostles affirmation, Heb. 9. that the sacrifices there offered could not make him that did the service perfect, as pertaining to the conscience, and he gives the reason in subjoyning, that they stood only in meats and drinks, and carnal ordinances. Alas what propriety had all their legal purifications towards the cleansing of the mind? That might be in the Mire while the body was in the Laver: and while the surface of the man was sprinkled with blood, the heart might be more bestial than those creatures who lent the ablution. And indeed if we consider their morality, we shall find that outside formal ceremony had proceeded to infect and poison that also. The outward restraint, the bare forbearance of an actual commission, being by them thought a full compliance with all the Negative precepts: so that we see Christ is fain to assert the Internal part of the Obligation, and extend the duty to the thoughts and inclinations. Besides, those acts of virtue they performed were commonly such as had an Aspect, rather on their temporal well-being, than distant and unseen rewards their Justice, and Charity confined to their own Nation, directed to the flourishing of their own Commonwealth: whereas Aliens were devoted to their rapine and despite; so that if they were virtues, they were rather Political than Moral, and indeed while they placed so much of their hopes on Earth, looked on secular plenty and tranquility as their reward, 'twas but consonant they should square their endeavors by that measure, and consider things not simply in their native properties of good or ill, but according to their tendency towards that they esteemed their felicity.

BUT God has provided, as the Apostle says, Heb. 11. 40. better things for us, has not only made a better Covenant with us, but has established it upon better promises, Cap. 8. 6. given us clearer revelations, not only of our duty, but our recompense, the veil in Christ is done away, and we all with open face, Behold as in a glass the glory of the Lord, 2 Cor. 3. 18. The Gospel puts the evidences of our inheritance into our own hands, sealed by his explicit and direct promise, who cannot lie: and that not only engaged by way of munificence, but bargain and contract, as the purchase of that price, which our Redeemer fully paid in our behalf. And sure this is in the Apostles phrase strong consolation; and if so, it must be forcible excitement likewise, he cannot but run alacriously, who has the prize in his Eye, nor can S. Paul use a more pressing argument to his Corinthians, To be steadfast, unmovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, than this assurance, That their labor shall not be in vain in the Lord, 1 Cor. 15. 58.

AND as this clear proposal of the promises is most proper to encourage and inspirit our endeavors, so is the conditionality most efficacious to necessitate and engage them. Had Heaven been only promise'd as a largess, and with a blind promiscuous bounty dispenc'd without discrimination, how much it might have raised our gratitude, I know not, but sure it would not have excited our industry, which in all instances we find is whetted by interest: and where that is otherwise secured, men generally estimate it a part of the benefit that their labor is superseded; and please themselves no less in a lazy bequest, than a full enjoyment. So that indeed it is this circumstance of the promises that must give life to all the rest, and make them operative toward the producing of good life; for admit the joys we expect never so Divine and Spiritual for their kind; never so great and transcendent for degree, and these also represented to us in the most clear and convincing manner, yet if they be tendered not as objects of our choice, but the certainty of our fate, felicities which we are only concerned to enjoy, but not to acquire, they may make us glad, but surely not diligent; it being but a cold inducement to any undertaking to be assured 'tis perfectly needless: we have therefore all reason to confess it our greatest advantage towards virtue, that God has so linked our hopes and our duty together: and indeed when we consider the great disproportion between the one and the other; the infinity of the reward, with the despicableness of the service, we must resolve that he had no other design in making his promises conditional, than to engage us by our interest to that holiness, to which he saw our inclinations did not bind us: that it was an artifice of his love to ensnare us into two felicities by proposing of one, enforce us to take one good in the way to another, virtue in passage to glory.

AND indeed who would not think this method so invincibly efficacious, as might supersede the necessity of any other, but God who understands our thoughts, long before, Psal. 139. 1. foresaw, that notwithstanding this proposal of a Canaan, there would be Rubenites and Gadites, who would set up their rest on this side of Jordan; so intent on the commodity of their Cattle, as to be content themselves to be part of the Herd, and become like the Beasts that perish: That there would be men of so ignoble, disingenuous tempers, as none of these cords of a man would be able to draw; and therefore there is another part of the Gospel-Economy fitted to their capacities; the threats and interminations, those terrors of the Lord, which as Goads may drive those brutish Creatures who will not be attracted: that those who think themselves perfectly unconcerned in David's question, who shall ascend unto the hill of the Lord, Psal. 24. 3. may yet startle at Esays, who among us can dwell with everlasting burnings? Of so formidable a kind are those menaces, as is sufficient to awake the most drowsy stupid Soul, and are most apt to operate upon that part of their temper, which evacuated the gentler method: that very sensuality which made them despise Heaven, may help to enhance the dread of Hell; the lack of a drop of water will be most insupportable to him who fared deliciously every day; those flames will be yet more scorching to those bodies, who by studious effeminacies and softness have superadded an artificial tenderness to the natural; nor will the gnawing of the worm appear more intolerable to any, than those who here make it their business to tie up its Jaws, gag or stupefy that Conscience which would now admonish, but will there torment. And when to this is added the perpetuity of these pains, that the worm shall never die, the fire never be quenched, certainly this puts such an edge upon the terror, as may well make it in the Apostles phrase, quick and powerful, searching even to the dividing asunder of the Soul and Spirit, the joints and marrow. When we are assured that the Axe is thus laid unto the root of the tree, and that every tree that brings not forth good fruit must be hewn down and cast into the fire, we shall sure be warned to bring forth meet fruits of repentance, and fly from the wrath to come.

BUT because neither invitations nor threats can avail with those who are any way invincibly impeded to apply them to their benefit: since the most glorious prize, the most formidable danger, is insignificant to him, who wants power to run unto the one, or from the other; it has pleased God to inspirit and actuate all his Evangelical methods, by a concurrence of supernatural strength, makes it not only eligible but possible, I may say easy and pleasant for us to do whatever he commands us: and notwithstanding our natural debility, makes us through Christ which strengthens us, able to do all things: by his Spirit he prevents, assists, restrains, excites, comforts, convinces; gives grace and adds to that the happier largess of a will to use it, and knowledge to discern the want of more: infusing to the Soul an ardent thirst of greater powers, and readier means of service, which the performance actuates to greater strengths, and yet enflames to new desires, and more importunate pursuits, whilst God at once bestows and crowns his own donations; still giving unto him that has, till that at last he gives himself; and grace is swallowed up in glory. And to assure us of this aid, he has been pleased to oblige himself: descends to the solemnity of a Pact and Covenant; has indented with us, and constituted it a principle part of the new and everlasting Covenant made with mankind in the blood of the Son of God, to send the comforter, his Holy Spirit, to be with us till the end of the world, and do all this. So that the Gospel is at once the assigner of our tasks, and the Magazeen of our strength; so much Spirit goes along with that Letter; so much internal grace is annexed to its outward administration, as will to all, who do not resist it, infallibly render it the power of God to salvation. For 'tis not the sole privilege of a S. Paul, but the common portion of all Christians, That God's grace shall be sufficient for them; which is sure a more Gospel-like promise, than that it should be too strong for them: so violent and irresistible as to commit a rape upon their Spirits; such a mighty wind as drives them headlong upon duty. Indeed this competency is of all other proportions the most incentive to industry; we see in Temporals, too little makes men desperate, and too much careless; and certainly 'twould be the same in Spirituals: but now when we have stock enough to set up with, and that too of so improvable a nature, that is capable of infinite advancement, and yet on the other side no less capable of total decay also, it being given with this express condition, that upon neglect it shall be withdrawn: so that our own sloth may make us poor, but nothing else can keep us from being abundantly rich: what can be imagined more animating to diligence and endeavor? And this being the condition wherein our Christianity has placed us, added to the former considerations, will beyond exception or subterfuge, evince its perfect aptitude and fitness for the End to which it was aimed, the Planting and nourishing all true Virtue among men, the introducing the tree of life into the world again, and so forming us a Paradise even amidst the briers and thorns of our Exil'd state.

CHAP. II. The Character of Christian-men's Practice, showing their multiplied failance both from the rule of that holy profession, and its genuine effect.

AND now who can suspect that a cause so rightly disposed, should miss of its effect? That this so auspicious Planet should be counter-influencit by any malevolent Star? Or that what has so many tenures in us, should be finally disseis'd? For, admit we have not the Piety to be prevailed upon by the reverence of the Author; yet the excellency of its composition does so much recommend it to our reason, that we must put off the best part of our Nature to evacuate the force of our Religion: nay, supposing us to have done that too, to have struck ourselves out of the list of Rationals, yet if we keep but the rank of Animals, if we have not extinguished passion and sense, it descends even to them; addresses to our hopes and fears with most importunate sollicitations, and convincing motives: So that unless we have the absurd ill luck to have much of the Stoic, and nothing of the Philosopher, 'twill be impossible to resist its impressions, and sure he that comtemplates this, will be apt with some confidence to conclude Christendom to be the Goshen of the world, not only in respect of its light, but of its immunity from all those Locusts and Caterpillars, those swarms of mean and sordid Vices which both cover and devour the rest of the Earth.

BUT this must be the inference of a mere contemplative, a Recluse that converses only with his own meditations: for let him be so much secular, as once to look abroad, the most transient glance will serve to unravel all this hopeful speculation, & show him that Christendom may be as much Heathen as America: whereas 'tis usually said, that ill Manners produce good Laws, we have reversed the Aphorism, and our good Law has introduced the most corrupt manners. Our holy faith which like a foundation should support good works, has like a gulf swallowed them up. And so universal a depravation is there among us, that we have scarce anything left to distinguish us from the most barbarous people, but a better name and worse vices.

AND here, what terms of wonder or of grief can be significant enough to express or to bewail, so strange and so perverse degeneration, that the light of the world should thus darken it: the salt of the Earth be the means of putrifying and corrupting it: that those who were by God drawn out from the Heathen world should so outvie the Gentiles crimes, as if they had forsaken them, only because they were too innocent. This indeed is one of Satan's subtlest stratagems, to fill Christ's Camp thus with his Soldiers, by whose intestine treacheries, he has been more triumphant than by all his open assaults and avowed hostilities. What a late States-man said (Prophetically, if we may judge by the event) of England, that it was a vivacious animal that could never die except it killed itself, is no less true of the Church, which has always been invulnerable against all darts, but what have been taken out of its own quiver. Of this the Primitive times were pregnant testimonies, where all the most witty cruelties, the most bloody persecutions, never made any breach in her: but she stood firmer for all those batteries, and like an Arch'd Building, became more strong and compact, by that weight which was designed to crush her: but the Vice of Professors undermines her very foundation, and does as much exceed the destructiveness of the most hostile assaults, as intestine treachery is more ruinous and fatal, than foreign violence.

AS long as the lives of Christians were the transcripts of their doctrine they rendered it venerable to all, and gave a presumption there was something more than human in it, that could work such signal effects, that could so transform men as to make the adulterer chaste, the drunkard temperate, the covetous liberal, the contentious peaceable. This, this was the way to adorn the doctrine of God our Savior in all things, as the Apostle speaks, Tit. 2. 10. And then the rule of contraries directs us to conclude very distant effects from our now so distant practices, that our very religion should partake of the infamy of our lives, and be thought rather a mystery of iniquity than godliness.

THUS is Christ wounded in the house of his friends, and has more reproach cast on him by those that profess his name, than by the loudest blasphemies of those that oppose it. For when those who have not opportunity to examine our faith, see the enormousness of our works, what should hinder them from measuring the Master, by the disciples? it being scarce imaginable that any one Sect of men should so universally run counter to all the rules of their profession: For let any sober Heathen look upon Christendom, as it is at this day weltering in the blood, not of Martyrdom but War, and will it be possible for him to think it owns a Gospel of Peace; or that those who so perpetually do those outrages they are unwilling to suffer, profess obedience to the the Royal Law of love thy neighbor as thyself, Jam. 2. 8. Can he see the violence and oppressions, the frauds and underminings, the busy scramblings for little parcels of Earth; and yet believe we count ourselves strangers and pilgrims in it, and have laid up our treasure in Heaven? Can he observe the strange and almost universal distortion of speech, whereby it has lost its native property of being interpreter of the mind, and under intelligible words so far exhibits the Babel confusion, that no man understands another's meaning? And can he imagine we have any such Precept, as lie not one to another, or any such penalty upon the infringer, as exclusion from the new Jerusalem? Shall he hear our God mentioned more frequently and earnestly in our imprecations than our prayers, and every part of our crucified Savior, recrucified in our horrid oaths; and shall he not think that his second executioners bear him as little reverence as his first: or that he has given no such command as swear not at all? When he discerns self preservation bow'd to as the Supreme Law, can he ever dream of another so inconsistent obligation as that of taking up the cross? Or that suffering for righteousness sake is one of our greatest felicities when he sees us run so affrighted from it, that no crime, perjury, rebellion, murder, is block enough in our way to stop our flight? In fine, when he considers how much of our business it is, first to excite, and then to cloy the flesh, to spur it on to riots even beyond its own propensions, that the whole year is but one mad carnival, and we are voluptuous not so much upon desire or appetite, as by way of exploit and bravery: when I say he considers this, can he possibly guess our institution directs us to beat down the body, to mortify the flesh with the affections and lusts, interdicts us all rioting and drunkenness, chambering and wantonness, and all provision for the flesh to fulfil the lusts thereof. Certainly all rules of discourse will direct him to the quite contrary conclusion. And when he sees a Set of men that have enhans'd the common human pravity, he will be apt to infer their Principles have taught them the improvement: And upon that supposal he wanted not temptation to his Option that said, Let my soul be with the Philosophers.

AND while we thus misrepresent our holy profession to others, it will be no wonder if we finally do it to ourselves, that we forget its native shape, and look on her only in the ugly dress ourselves have put on, and that effect seems already too visible among us: our lives have so long confuted it that we triumph over it as a baffled thing; and like Amnon loath it because we have ravished and defiled it. Many of us take notice of the better Morals of Turks and Infidels not in reproach of ourselves but our Religion, and because we have so many Lepers, think Abanah and Pharphar, better than all the waters of Israel, this is openly in the mouths of many, but is so prodigiously irrational as well as unjust, that one can scarce think it possible to be in their hearts, unless they be pursued by the fate of habitual liars, that at last come to persuade themselves.

CERTAINLY there is no other parallel instance wherein men conclude so perversely: he that shows a man that precipice upon whose brink he stands, that intreats, yea importunes him to retire from the danger; nay bribes him with the greatest rewards to choose safety, has done all that can be expected from a friend, or charitable man: and if after all, the wretched person so advised, shall cast himself headlong upon ruin; assuredly no Inquest would return his murder in any other form than that of Felo de se. And why then should our Christianity be accused of those ills which it would infallibly averr, if our obstinacy would permit it: indeed the charge is so wild, that it seems rather designed as an artifice of diversion, a sprout of that first fig-tree which was to hide the nakedness of lapsed Adam. Men think it policy to transfer their guilts, and are willing, the violence of their lusts should pass for the impotence of their religion. Like irregular patients blaming their Physician for those ill accidents which they know owing only to their own unruliness. A pregnant testimony of the reproachful nature of sin, that men are content to betake themselves to the most forlorn shifts to avoid the owning it: but the consciousness is so pressing and intolerable, that with many it drives on to yet higher outrages: 'tis not enough for men to decry their Christianity as a feeble insignificant thing, but they load it even with contradictory imputations, and that which sometimes they call the foolishness of preaching, to bring it in scorn and contempt,, shall at another be stiled an Art and trick to bring it into suspicion and hatred, be arraign'd for imposture and deceit, a project of imposing upon credulous souls, and gaining real advantages to the managers while they feed the silly Proselyte with imaginary ones. How groundless a calumny this is, as it appears from the sanctity, and eminent simplicity of Christian Religion, which above all things excludes fraud and falsehood; so also from the designments and aims of its first promulgators, who as they cannot be supposed dextrous enough to lay such a scene of taking Pageantry; so all their visible acquests were scourgings and imprisonments, persecutions and death. If this were the case it would indeed go near to reconcile the before mentioned contradictory imputations, whilst the imposing upon credulous souls at this dear rate, would be in very deed the foolishness of Preaching, the greatest madness in the world. Men of common reason would be ashamed to use such frivolous cavils: but who can without horror hear them from professed Christians? that while Infidels are modest in their reproaches, look upon our Doctrine only as erroneous, Disciples should be bitter and charge it as insidious and treacherous. Thus does the Church experiment the truth of her blessed Lord's Predictions, and finds her foes are those of her own house: and though she be Christ's Dove, yet is subjected to the fate of the Viper, and has her bowels torn out by those that spring from them.

THESE are the growing consequences of resolute impiety, he who will not be kept within the bounds of duty, seldom contents himself with that bare violation: he not only breaks the bonds in sunder, but casts them away too; is impatient they should keep a reputation to upbraid him, when he has robbed them of the power of restraining him: and this sure is the bottom of all that deep reasoning, by which men have learnt to argue themselves and others out of their Creed: And though this be indeed the great Arcanum the Philosophers Stone they aim at; yet they have met with another good experiment by the way: and have, by I know not what Chimistry, extracted a reputation out of these most unapt materials. He passes for a considering man that disputes principles, and is thought most to own his reason that least owns his faith: and then 'twill be no wonder if this success animate, and give them not only confidence, but vanity to avow what is thus creditable.

Indeed Satan is too subtle a manager to lose this advantage, and the event sadly shows, he has not neglected to improve it, as appears not only by the number of such pretenders unto reason, but even by their advancing to higher degrees. The voluptuary who likes his portion in this world, and fears that in another, is at first only prompted by his interest to quarrel the last Articles of the Creed, and so in his own defense denies the life everlasting: but when he finds his necessity made a virtue, and himself struck into the repute of a wit; upon that account he doubts not, his fame will increase with his irreligion, and so proceeds still to unravel farther, till at last he leaves not so much as I believe in God, that many have advanced so far is too evident: and by some so owned that they will not thank his charity, that shall hope better of them.

'T'WAS once the triumph of infant Christianity, that it silenced all the Heathen Oracles, and within a while demolish'd even the Synagogue too: but alas its mature age gives us that effect in a most inverted sense, it now has served to suppress even the common notions of a Deity, turned out the one as well as the many God's, and instead of Polytheists and Idolaters has made Atheists, and that which Christ tells us was designed to perfect and fill up the Law, has by the strange pravity of its professors at once obliterated both Law and Law-giver out of men's minds, thereby exemplifying the old Axiom, Corruptio optimi est pessima; and the Saint as well as the Angel, if he desert his innocence, commences Feind and Devil. These are such sad, such direful transmutations as excite not so much wonder, as grief and lamentation; and what rivers, what Oceans of Tears are competent to bewail such unutterable evils.

THE removal of the Candlestick is so formidable a judgment that the threatening of it, is used by Christ as the most awaking menace to the Seven Churches Revel. 2. 3. but the removing it by our own hands is yet an enhansment of that highest calamity; when men are come to such an insensate obduration, that they court their Plagues, become their own Lictors and make that their choice which is their extremest punishment, they are certainly too secure of that ruin they call for; And may we not fear it may prove general, and involve us all: that while so many cry out to be delivered from their Christianity as their load and pressure, and so few express their dissent to that demand: God may in judgment grant it, hearken to those that cry loudest, rescue his Gospel from our profane and impious violations and give it to others that may bring forth the fruits of it.

NOR is this to be feared only from the explicit importunities of the blasphemous, for it is interpretatively the vote of many others; whoever give themselves up to the dominion of any lust, do implicitly renounce their obedience to Christ, and say we will not have this man to rule over us. And when he is thus depos'd from his regal and directive power, we have reason to believe he will despise a mere titular sovereignty, not suffer the Scepter of his Word to remain as an Empty Ceremony among those, who pay it no real obedience: nor be again clothed with Purple, crowned, and saluted King to advance the triumph of his scorn and crucifixion.

Nor will the fawning Professions of the demure hypocrite avert, but accelerate this Fate: He that makes the Golden Scepter in Christ's hand, a rod of iron in his own, that thinks his Sainthood licenses him to all the severe censures, and the yet severer (because more effective) oppressions of others, he is certainly to be looked on not only as a Rebel, but an Usurper too, and is of all others the highest provoker. He that tramples underfoot the Son of God, does not so much violate him, as he that pretends to erect him a Throne upon blood and rapine, on perjury and sacrilege: nor does he that accounts the Blood of the Covenant an unholy thing, so much profane it, as he that uses it as a Varnish to paint over his foulest lusts. The Apostle has long since told us, there is no concord between Christ and Belial, and can we think he will be patient thus to be made subservient to his enemy: or suffer his Ark to be set for the support, which should be the confusion of Dagon. Do we find him so severely upbraid the hypocrisy of the Jews, that stole, murdered, committed adultery, and swore falsely, and yet came and stood before him in his house, Jer. 7. 9. and shall we hope he will connive at it in Christians? Was it intolerable profanation in them to account his house a den of robbers, and shall we be permitted to make it so: they are sent to Shiloh to read their own destiny, and surely we are as likely to find ours there too; to be deprived of those advantages which we have so unworthily abused: nor can we expect, that though God cause the natural Sun to rise still as well on the evil as the good, yet that the Sun of righteousness shall continue to shine on those who will only bask themselves in his Rays, grow Aethiops from his neighbourhood; but will not work by his light.

WHEN all this is considered, what a sad abode does it make? When the blasphemies of the Profane, the sensualities of the Voluptuous, and the mockeries of the Hypocrite, send, as it were, daily challenges to Heaven, we cannot but look it should at last overcome its longsuffering, awake God to vindicate the honor of his Name, and not suffer it any longer to be thus prostituted and polluted: that when he sees his light serve only to aid us the more subtly to contrive our deeds of darkness, he should withdraw it, smite us with blindness like the Sodomites, whom he finds in such impure pursuits: and were that blindness such as our Savior speaks of, Io. 9. 41. that infer'd the no sin, 'twere a desirable infliction, but alas it has none of that property: That which is designed for the punishment can never be the extenuation of our guilt; but as in Hell there is an happy Separation of effects, the scorching of the flame without the light, and the blackness of night without the rest: so in this nearest approach to it; this Portal to those Chambers of death, there is the ignorance without the excuse, the darkness divested of its native quality of hiding: and when we are entered among Heathens here, we must yet expect the sadder portion of Apostatiz'd Christians hereafter.

AND O that this consideration might at last have its proper operation, rouse and awake us timely to prevent those evils which it will be impossible to cure. That by bringing forth some more genuine and kindly fruits, we may avert that dismal sentence, Cut it down, why cumbreth it the ground. That men would generally lay to heart both the sin and infamy of being promoters of public ruin; and quench that fire with their tears which their sins have kindled, that the fasting and prayers, the sighs and groans of the Primitive Christians may supplant the profane luxuries, the carnal Jollities of the Modern: and that Sackcloth and Ashes may become the universal mode, the only fashionable dress among us. This both Reason and Religion suggest as matter of our most importunate wishes; would God our hopes were but half as pregnant.

BUT the less appearance there is of this universal reformation, the more jealousy ought every single person to look on himself, lest he be one that obstruct it: for so he does who stays till it be a fashion, but neglects to contribute his part to the making it so. Men are willing to discourage themselves from attempts of this kind, and with an unseasonable modesty can reflect what a nothing one man is to so many millions, when alas all that vast Empire Vice has got in the world, is founded in the pravity of single persons, & would certainly be ruined by their reformation. The more reasonable Collection would be, that he who considers himself but as one, should not suffer himself to grow into less; to fall from that Unit to a Cypher, by permitting sloth or cowardice to enfeeble and Emasculate him, but on the contrary should recollect his spirits, actuate all his strength, and therefore be sure to do his utmost, because that utmost is but a little.

AND to this certainly there want not encouragements, we see in common affairs the wonders that industry and resolution are able to effect, and a single courage being exerted has often without Romance, overcome giantly difficulties. 'Tis a great prejudice is cast upon virtue by the pusillanimity of those that like, but dare not abet her. When most men commit all impieties daringly▪ and openly, and those few that do mourn for it, do it but in secret, the example of the one is contagious, but the other has no means to diffuse its self. Would men stoutly own duty, and not like Peter, follow Christ afar off, they might yet hope to make a party and gain ground in the world. And how noble an attempt were this, thus to encounter Satan in his highest triumph, and recover a lost field: and methinks those who have any warmth of Piety glowing within, may easily thus improve it into a flame, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 add to their faith virtue, as that signifies courage: and then readily would succeed, that train of Christian excellencies reckoned up by St. Peter, 2 Ep. 1. 5. knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, and superstruct on these, as it there follows, brotherly kindness, and the most comprehensive charity. We should be not only devout towards God, but zealous towards Men, endeavoring by all prudent means to recover them out of those snares of the Devil, whereby they are taken captive. And since among all those snares there is none more entangling, than the creditableness and repute of customary vices, to set themselves especially against that overgrown covering and ornament; those Locks wherein its great, its Sampson-like strength lies: and strive to render it as contemned as it is base: and to this purpose nothing is so apt, as the exalting its competitor, fetching virtue out of the Dungeon, that darkness and obscurity wherein it has long lain forgotten, and by making it illustriously visible in their own practice, put it into the possibility of attracting others. Indeed there only it appears in its true splendor, they are but dead colors the Sublimest speculation can put on it, he that would draw it to the life, must imprint it upon his own. And thus every pious person may, nay ought to be a Noah, a preacher of righteousness: and if it be his fortune to have as imperswasible an Auditory, if he cannot avert the deluge, it will yet be the providing himself an Ark, the delivering, yea advancing his own soul, if he cannot benefit other men's.

NAY, this being a Noah may qualify him to be a Moses too, give him such an interest with Heaven, that he may be sit to stand in the gap, to be an intercessor and Mediator for a provoking people. And God knows never any generation more needed that office: nor any part of this more than our sinful Nation, which having long been in the furnace, is indeed now come out, but so unpurified, that we have all reason to expect a return, and that not upon the former frustrated design of refining; but upon that more infallible and fatal one of consuming us. This is so dreadful, but withal so just an expectation, that if there be any Jacob's among us; any, who can wrestle and prevail with God, there never was so pressing need of their intercession. O let all that are thus fitted for it, vigorously undertake this pious work, let no Moses's hands ever wax heavy, but be always held up in a devout importunity, let them transcribe that holy Oratory, which he so often effectually used, plead to God his own cause, with a what wilt thou do to thy great Name, and when there is nothing in us that can pretend to anything but vengeance, ransack God's bosom, rifle his bowels for arguments of compassion, repeat to him his own titles, that he is longsuffering and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity, transgression and sin, Numb. 14. 18. And by these solicit, yea, conjure him to pity. And how great an ardency is required to this intercession? What strong cries must they be that shall drown so loud a clamor of impieties. And how does it reproach the slightness of our sleepy heartless addresses? Can we hope to bind God's hands with Withs and Straws? To arrest his vengeance with such faint and feeble assaults? And when nature and danger suggest to Heathen Nineveh, not only to cry, but cry mightily to God, shall the superaddition of our Religion damp ours into a whisper, a soft unaudible sound. A storm will teach the profane Mariner to pray in earnest, and alas, we have not wanted that discipline. 'Tis not long since we might have said with those, Acts 27. No small tempest has long lain on us, neither Sun nor Stars in many days, nay in many years appearing, nothing but black and dismal portents of a final wreck to a poor weather-beaten Church, and then sure 'twas time to be importunate, to learn so much of instruction from the waves that tossed us, as to make our prayers keep pace with them, in swift uninterrupted succession, in loud and not to be resisted violence. That we did so then I dare not affirm, but sure I am the necessity of it is not yet out-dated; for though the Sky however black with clouds carry no thunder in it, though the impetuous winds that blow from every quarter, should not break out in tempest, and bring shipwreck to us; yet we too fully exemplify the truth of the Prophets Axiom, That the wicked are like the troubled Sea, that cannot rest: we have within us a principle of ruin, which can operate though nothing from without excite it. A tempest is not always necessary to sink a Ship, one treacherous leak may do it in the greatest calm, and what security can there then be to our torn Vessel, whose rents our continued divisions do still keep open. Indeed our preservation must be as our restoration was, the work of Omnipotence; thither therefore let us address with St. Peters pathetick Prayer, Save Lord or we perish. O that all who are concerned in the grant of that Petition, would qualify themselves to present it. Lift up such pure hands, that God who hears not sinners, Io. 9. may yet hear them, afford a gracious ear, and give an answer of Peace.

CHAP. III. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Inconsideration.

THE last Section having defeated all the promising hopes of the former, by showing us how sadly we have frustrated all the designs and engagements of our profession, enervated all those apt and powerful methods, and how perfectly contrary our practices are to our rules, mere curiosity would more prompt us to enquire what are the hidden causes of those so strange effects, what unhappy propriety there is in the soil, that after so much culture and husbandry it should produce nothing but wild Grapes: and by what arts and wiles Satan has not only evaded, but even retorted those blows which were aimed at him. But as in diseases the pains and languishings are obvious to the grossest sense, but the springs and originals of them most frequently lie deep, and are so complicated and interwoven, that they require much art to search and to distinguish them: nay, do often mock the most subtle inquisitor, and send him back with mere conjectures and uncertain guesses: so in this Epidemick Spiritual distemper, the malady is notorious and visible, but the causes of it not so easily determined, yet that not so much from the darkness as the number of them; so many do pretend, and that with very good color, to this unhappy, this monstrous birth, that a Solomon himself must have made the proposal of dividing it, as not being able to have assigned it entire to any one Mother.

INDEED so many are the concurrents towards it, that it would far exceed the limits of this little Tract, but to point at them: I shall not therefore undertake any such exact enumeration, but shall only take notice of those which either for the generality or degree of their efficacy appear the most eminent.

AND first the great and stupid Inconsideration which most men have concerning their Religion, may well pass for a main cause of its frustration. Christianity may make Archimedes his challenge, give it but where it may set its foot, allow but a sober advertence to its proposals, and it will move the whole world: it comes with most invincible and controuling arguments, but still they are arguments, and those must first obtain attention, before they can force assent; they will most infallibly weigh down the scales, though the whole world were the counter-balance, but then that must presuppose their being put into those Scales: being entertained with so much of deliberation, as may try and examine their weight. In a word, they address to us as men, that is creatures endued by God, with rational Souls and discursive faculties, but if we will suppress these, and set up only the brute to give audience, we must not expect Balaam's prodigy shall be every day repeated, that the beast should be wiser than the rider, and consequently cannot wonder if the Success vary with the Auditors.

AND 'tis to be feared, this is the state of most of us, that all the convincing Logic, that demonstration of the Spirit, as St. Paul calls it: and all the persuasive Rhetoric of the Gospel, find us so stupid and unconcerned, that they can make no impression: all the avenues are so blockt up, that they can find no way of approaching us. We are like the Indian Serpents Phylostratus mentions, proof against all charms, but such as with their glittering splendor assault our Eyes: nothing moves us but what courts our Senses, and what is not gross enough to be seen, we think too nice to be considered. The form and name of Christianity men find ready to their hands, and it costs them no labor to put it on: but should they be interrogated of the import and significance of it, I fear many would be at a loss what to answer. Men call themselves Christians as they do French or English, only because they were born within such a territory, take up their Religion as a part of their fate, the temper of their Climate, the entail of their Ancestors, or anything most remote from their choice, the profession of it descends to them by way of inheritance, and like young careless Heirs, they never are at the charge to survey it, to inform themselves either of the Issues, or Revenues of it; what burdens it lays or what advantages it promises. Every man sees they are vast multitudes that have entered the Baptismal vow, and I fear no small numbers of them, that weigh it as little when they should perform it, as they did when they made it. Have no other notion of Baptism, but as a custom of the place, or a time of festivity: consider no farther significance in these spiritual bands, than they do in the Swadling-clothes of their infancy, and can give no better account why they took on them Christ's livery, than why they wear such garments as the common fashion of their Country prescribes them.

THIS is in many the effect of gross ignorance, that really know nothing that borders upon Religion: and where that is the principle, we cannot think it strange to see their practices proportionable; this returns them into the state of Heathenism, and while they walk in that darkness, it is no wonder if they often fall: the only matter of admiration is, that there should be any such darkness among us; that the glorious light, as St. Paul terms it, of the Gospel of Christ, should not long ere this have dispel'd it out of our Horizon, and certainly that it has not, must be owing to some very great guilt, so that concerning such persons the Disciples question, Jo. 9. is very pertinent, Who did sin, this man or his Parents? Where men are so ignorant it must necessarily infer their Parents negligence in infusing, or their own stubborn perverseness in resisting instruction, but 'tis more probable to conclude the former, since if Children were early instituted, knowledge would insensibly insinuate its self, before their years had armed them with obstinacy enough to make head against it: but when by the Parents remissness the proper Seeds-time is lost; the soil grows stiff and intractable; the labor of learning averts their Childhood, and the shame of it their Manhood, and so they grow old in their ignorance, are ready to leave this world before they come to know anything of that which is to succeed it. This is a common, but certainly a most deplorable case, and as it loudly accuses those Parents, who thus wretchedly hazard their Children's greatest concernments, so certainly it reflects not very laudably upon those, who by slighting that excellent Order of Confirmation in this Church, have besides all other advantages of it, robbed them of that happy reserve, which the care of their Spiritual Parent, had provided to repair the negligence of their Natural; but guilt has a miserable kind of infinity, and lessens not by being communicated; and therefore though these unknowing persons may with justice enough accuse others, yet can they never the more absolve themselves. Indeed they cannot tax others omissions towards them, without a tacit reproach of their own: for if it were a fault in the Parent, to let their infancy want those necessary infusions, 'tis surely so in themselves, to let their riper years continue in that destitution. And sure 'tis not probable there could be a more irrational motive to the former, than that which prevails with the later; to wit, the fear of shame, which certainly much more properly belongs to him that lies stupidly under his want, than he that industriously sets to cure it: so that while they go thus preposterously to avert reproach, they invite it; nay, and do besides betray one of their most important secrets, discover themselves more solicitous about appearances than realities; to be thought knowing than to be so. A strange kind of speculative Hypocrisy, which yet leads to all the practical profaneness incident to those, who live without God in the world.

BUT would God the unchatechiz'd were the only persons we had to complain of in this matter: There is another sort as ignorant, who have not that plea; who by a wretchless Inconsideration, have made a shift to unlearn what they had once been taught. That this is naturally very possible no man can question, that observes how desuetude will rob a man of any Science, or other habit. But in this case there is yet a farther concurrent towards it, Christ's parable tells us of Fowls that devoured the Seed, which himself interprets to be the wicked one, which catcheth away the word sow'n in men's hearts: When that spiritual seed lies loose and scattered upon the surface, and is not by deep and serious meditation, harrowed as it were into the ground, it offers itself a ready prey to the devourer, and God knows the event is too ready to attest the truth of the observation: For do we not see many whose childhoods have wanted nothing of Christian nurture, that have had all advantages to the making them wise unto salvation, yet suffer their manhood to wear out and obliterate all those rudiments of their youth; and that not only out of their practice, but even out of their memory too: this (would we be patient to have the experiment made) would, I doubt not, be found too true in divers, and they would appear less able to approve themselves not only to the Confessor, but even to the Catechist in their adult age, than they were in their Minority: as having scarce ever thought of the principles of their religion, since they conn'd them to avoid correction; and then 'tis no wonder if they pass into the same forgetfulness with other the occurrences of that slippery age.

BUT if with some the memory have been so invincibly faithful, as not to have resigned its depositum: if it do happen obstinately to retain those early impressions which were made on it. Yet alas that alone will be of little avail: 'tis true that is the storehouse, and 'tis good to have that well replenisht; but if its plenty be only within its self uncommunicated, if the granary though never so full, be sealed up, it gives no security against a famine: a man's remembrance of his Creed may tell him there is a God, and that he is Almighty; but if his reason be so much a sleep, as not to infer from thence the necessity of reverencing and obeying him who is all powerful to revenge our contempts: he may repeat the Article every day and yet never the less Atheistically. In like manner he may go on to the Birth, Death, and Resurrection of Christ, but if he weigh not the obligations to gratitude and duty which devolve on him from thence he may remember his Birth, and yet never be regenerate: his Death, and yet not die to sin: and his Resurrection, and yet lie rotting in his own corruption, and not rise with him to newness of life. So he may proceed to his coming to Judge the quick and the dead, but if he reflect not on his own particular concernment in it, if he consider not that for every the secretest thing, Eccl. 11. God will bring him, as well as others to judgment: he may talk of Dooms-day as men do of such Assizes as they have no trial at, but it will never set him a trembling, or give him the providence to anticipate his sentence; so judge himself here, that he may not be judged of the Lord. And so proportionably in all the parts of our Christian Faith: he that does not extract from them their proper and just inferences, shall never feel their efficacy. He has indeed in that excellent System, a most infallible Catholicon, against all his spiritual Maladies, but 'tis a Medicine, not a Charm; to be taken, not laid by him; and if he fail in application, he will as certainly miss of the cure: and this gives us one too clear a reason, why so many, in the most fatal sense, are weak and sick among us, and fallen asleep; are first lethargick, and then stark dead in trespasses and sins. Men do not by sober consideration suck out the virtue which would heal them: they look on the Creed as Christ's badge, and so long as they bear that they think none must question their Christianity: whereas 'tis indeed more properly his Military Symbolum, or recognition of the cause, and General they fight for; an engaging them to all the obedience, fidelity and constancy of resolute soldiers: and to this purpose it is that we stand up at the recital of the Creed, as owing our Baptismal promise to fight manfully under our Savior's Banner against Sin, the World, and the Devil; and if we do not thus, 'tis not material what professions we make, we are the same desertors whether we stay in our own Camp, or run over to the enemies; throw away our Arms, or not use them; renounce our Christian faith, or not improve it. Sloth is as mischievous in war as treachery or cowardice, and he that keeps his sword in the sheath, is as unformidable an enemy, as he that brings none into the field.

AND how many such insignificant combatants are there in the Christian Camp: that only lend their Names to fill up the Muster-roll: but never dream of going upon service. 'Tis certain there are as many such, as there are careless unconsidering Professors: and these 'tis to be feared make so great a number, that were the Church put to estimate her forces, and examine what effectively her strength is, she would find the deceit of false musters as great among the Spiritual as the Civil Soldiery. It is indeed a most amazing thing to see, that that which is the one great and important interest of all men, should of all other things meet with the least regard. If we make a proposal of worldly profit, though encumbered with many difficulties and liable to many uncertainties, we shall not only have an attentive hearing, but active care and diligent pursuit of the design, it will be driven to the last glimpse of hope and if the first attempt miscarry, the next occasion is laid hold of; but here where the prize is so rich, the conditions so easy, the acquest so certain, yet (as if these were deterring, averting qualities) we cannot be got to take the matter into our deliberation. Alas, what stupid folly has possessed men? and by what measures do they make their estimates? how are their precious Souls become so vile in their eyes, that they are the only part of them, which they think below their regard? In an Epidemick disease every man looks out for Antidote or Medicine for his own peculiar, and does not acquiesce in that silly confidence that he shall do as well as other men: yet in this greater danger, that is their avowed comfort, and keeps them as cheerful as if they had the most solid grounds of security. Alas, can numbers out-face damnation, or do men hope that by going in troops to hell they shall master the native inhabitants, subdue those legions of tormentors, and become conquerors instead of sufferers? This is sure too wild an imagination for any to entertain, yet what more sober one can any pretend, in favor of so stupendous an improvidence?

BUT 'twill be much more seasonable to reform than Apologize or Rhetoricate; and therefore 'twill import those men, who like the inhabitants of Laish, dwell careless, quiet, and secure, to look about them: to enter into serious consultation how they may avert that ruin which waits upon such a supine temper, not to suffer themselves to perish in the midst of such possibilities, nay solicitations to be saved: but at last afford an audience to that Embassy which is sent them from Heaven. Ponder well those easy terms of reconciliation which are proposed: the inestimable advantages consequent to the embracing that amity; and the as inestimable detriment of refusing it: in a word, not to please themselves with the empty title, but to penetrate the full purport and significancy of their Christianity, and when they have done this soberly and attentively: having removed this first and most general obstruction to piety, they will find themselves assaulted by such force of reason that they must either be very ill Logicians, or very good Christians.

CHAP. IV. A Survey of the Mischiefs arising from Partial Consideration.

NEXT to the stupid and merely vegetable state of total incogitancy: we may rank that partial and piece-meal consideration, by which Christianity is mutilated and deformed, deprived of all its force to attract and subdue men's hearts: for as in artificial Movements, there is such a dependence of one part upon another, that the subtracting of any one destroys the whole frame: so in this spiritual Machin designed to raise our dull mortality to heaven; the divine wisdom of its maker has combined its several parts, that he who severs ruins, he that applies it not in its united strength will find no aid from its unjoynted scattered particles. S. Paul tells us 1 Cor. 12. that in the natural body the making it all Eye, or Hand, the reducing the many members to one is destructive to its being (if they were all one member where were the body v. 20.) and we in reason must expect the same event will follow here. If we advance one part of our Christian Faith to the annihilation of the rest, 'tis impossible that should supply the place of the whole; but the more that member is swoln above its native size, the more unwildy, not the more strong it grows: and loses that active vigor, which it received by a social communication with the other parts.

'TIS God's charge against the Priests, Mal, 2. that they have been partial in the Law, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 lifters up of faces in it; prefer'd some more agreeable parts, and discountenanc'd others; were not only judges of the Law, but unjust judges too. And I fear the enditement may now run more generally against the People also; that they have been partial in the Gospel: culled and chosen out those softer and more gentle dictates which should less grate and disturb them: like well the Oil that makes them have a cheerful countenance, but are not so forward to deal with the Wine which should search and cleanse their sores. We make all our addresses to the promises, hug and caress them, and in the interim let the commands stand by neglected. A divinity indeed fitly apportion'd to the devotion of these times, which loves to make an offering to God of that which costs them nothing, and yields a preference to that way of worship which assures Salvation best cheap, and at the easiest terms; but would men consider, they would find, that the commands are the supreme and most eminent part of the Evangelical Covenant, the promises come but as hand-maids and attendants: an honorable retinue to invite the more respectful entertainment, and it should be remembered that of this sort are the threatenings too; and therefore they have surely an equal right to our regard especially when many of them have the accession of God's Oath, to bind and strengthen their performance. And what a scandalous and absurd partiality is this, that when the precepts come with this solemnity the more to command our reverence, we single out this one part of the Train and pay our homage unto it; lay hold on the Promises, not those that speak damnation to impenitence, but the other half of them which give assurances of favor. And like the Benjamites to the daughters of Shiloh, run away with them, possess ourselves of these by rape, in spite of all the incapacities we lie under; though God has sworn, that no disobedient provoker, shall enter into his rest.

THAT this is really the case of many is more than probable, for by what other artifice is it possible for them to reconcile their large hopes, with their no purifying, their confident expectations of heaven, with their greedy rapacious pursuits of Earth: their secure dependence on the Blood of their Savior with their remorseless effusions of that of their Brethren? did they consider the inseparable connection between the Precepts and the Promises, 'twere hard for them to be so wicked, but impossible to be so sanguine. Did the unclean person believe that none but the pure in heart shall see God, if he could be so much Swine, as still to choose the mire: yet sure he could not expect to be Rapt from thence into heaven. Did the Drunkard consider the sentence of the Apostle excluding all such from the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6. 10. if he can be content so sadly to oberbuy his sin; as to pay that Kingdom for his shot: yet certainly even he cannot be sot enough to expect the possession of what he has so sold, or hope that from one of his drunken trances, he shall awake to glory: did the Covetous extortioner observe that he is involved in the same sentence, remember that such Violents shall take not heaven, but hell, by force; if the terrors of the Lord could not have force enough to melt his bowels, to unclutch his griping hand, or disseize him of his prey: yet sure it must discourage him from grasping of heaven too, from hoping to defraud God as he has done men, and striking himself into an estate in the land of the living; and in like manner all other hoping sinners if they would ruin, yet must cease from flattering themselves, must choose damnation bare-faced, and not fancy that their posting on in the broad way shall ever bring them to life. And sure this discovery of their estate, were a very good step to the curing it: for though 'tis possible some few may be of so sturdy an impiety as to choose their sin with all its consequents, yet sure all sinners are not of that strong complexion, and therefore Satan is put to his wiles and artifices, is fain to hoodwink those that are apt to start: and disguises the danger when he sees the true appearance of it will terrify and avert. This was his old policy with our first parents; he dazzles their eyes with the glorious but abusive proposal of becoming like God's, that they might not discern how near they were approaching to become like Devils: and this under the pretence of confidence and friendship, discovering as it were a secret to them, that God envied them that promotion, which his greater kindness was solicitous to procure for them. And as if the ruin of mankind, in Massa had been too slight a Trophy for that one Stratagem, he repeats it again to the individuals, persuades men that the path of obedience which God has chalkt out is strait, and narrow, rugged and encumbered; that there is a shorter cut, an easier passage to life: that they may be led into Canaan a nearer way, step into it immediately from the flesh pots of Egypt, and scape the tedious weary March in the Wilderness: never so much as call at Mount Sinai, or be affrighted with the Thunders of the Law. In a word, they need not work out their Salvation, but be they never so slothful they may inherit the promises, Heb. 6. 12. this is his one grand Conclusion, though he has several mediums to infer it by: wherewith as with so many tools and Engines he furnishes men for the filing or breaking of that sacred link between duty and reward; and of these he has great variety fitted to the hands, and skill of those that manage them. I shall not undertake to ransack his workhouse, or give an inventory of his utensils, but shall rather in general beseech all those, who have made this unhappy separation to remember from whose Forge they took their Instruments: and then consider whether his officiousness in supplying them, can argue anything but that 'tis his work they are about. Can any think that he whose eternal pastime it will be to torment men, can really be solicitous of their ease that he would choose out for them the pleasantest paths, were it not that he knows they lead to the chambers of death? when Christ whose sole business it was to save men's souls, has prescribed us a course which shall assuredly conduct us unto happiness, what can it be but frenzy to resort to Abaddon, the destroyer for an easier method, or expect more gentleness and compassion from the roaring Lion than from the Lamb of God.

NAY indeed this is not only to attribute to him more tenderness, but fidelity too: to believe him in opposition to all the express affirmations of God; and when he who is truth its self has told us, that except we repent we shall all perish, Luk. 13. 5. and that without holiness no man shall see the Lord, Heb. 12. 14. to disbelieve this only upon his bare credit, who was a liar from the beginning: This indeed is a prodigious composition of blasphemy and folly: a strange contumely to God, but fatal treachery to our selves: For alas Satan entertains us all this while but with a trick of Leger de main, and as Iuglers make us believe we have cut the string, which yet presently after they show us whole: so he persuades us he has thus sever'd the Condition from the Promises, when to our grief it will finally appear their union was inviolable. 'Tis not all our vain confidence that can reverse the immutable divine Law, we may, 'tis true, delude ourselves, keep up our spirits high; in a secure jollity eat and drink, and rise up to play, and so not only loiter, but revel out our day, till the night overtake us wherein no man can work, but we shall never be able to propagate the deceit, where only it could avail us, to persuade God to pay the hire to those that have been no laborers, or give the prize to any who have not run to obtain it. Let every man therefore in a just tenderness to his own Soul, strictly examine his hopes, try not how high they tower, but how deep they are founded; whether on the sand or on the rock; the flattering delusions of Satan, and the dreams of his own Phancy, or on the Promises of God: for though all pretend to build on the latter, yet God knows, a multitude of foolish Architects there are, which mistake their ground, take that for assurance that is not: and this truly is a thing deserves to be soberly considered, they that most greedily catch at the Promises, do often embrace a cloud instead of the Deity which they so eagerly grasp, and thereby think to enjoy. But faithful obedience, and not insolent hopes, commend us unto God. The Gospel indeed describes to us great and inestimable felicities, but he that can think this gives him Title to them, may as well pretend to the whole World, because he has the Map of it in his house: for though it mentions them to all, yet it promises them to none but the obedient. And those Israelites which fled from the sight of Goliath, 1 Sam. 17. 25. might as reasonably challenge the reward proposed to the victor, as men can pretend to enter into life without keeping the Commandments: this then is the one Criterion, by which a man may judge of his hopes; if they be but proportionable to his obedience, they are then regular, and such as will not make him ashamed, but prove incentives and engagements to every good work. Let him obey as much as he can, and then he need not deny himself the comfort of hoping as much as he can too. But if his hopes exceed this measure, and square themselves only by his wishes; if he look for Heaven, not because he is qualified for it, but because he wants or covets it; this is rather to dream than hope, and such whimsies will as soon invest the beggar in wealth, the defam'd in honor, the sick in health, or any man in anything he has but a mind to, as compass Heaven for the bold Fiduciary.

IT is indeed like those Lunacies wherein men's fancies adopt them Heirs to those Kingdoms, they know nothing more of, than the names: and sure the Analogy holds as well in the cure as the disease; let these Patients awhile be kept dark, taken from the dazzling contemplations of their imaginary privileges, to the sad reflection on their sins: and as God expostulates with Israel, Ezek. 33. 26. Ye stand upon the sword, ye work abomination, and ye defile every man his neighbors wife, and shall ye possess the land? So let them recite to themselves the Catalogues of their impieties, and then ask their own hearts, whether these be the qualifications of those that shall rest in God's holy hill? Whether these marks of the Beast can ever rank them among the followers of the Lamb? And let these Considerations be pressed home, reiterated so often, till by repeated strokes they have made good the other part of the method, made their Souls bleed, and by that Spiritual Phlebotomy, tempered their swelling veins, allayed the over-sanguiness of their constitution: and then there remains but one thing more to complete the course, and that is bringing them into the Work-house, setting them really to work out their salvation with fear and trembling, which they had so near played away by confidence and presumption: And when they have done thus, they have verified their hopes, and then may safely reassume them: They are returned again with advantage to their first point, and are that in soberness and reality, which they then were only in fiction and imagination.

AND now would God men would once be content to be thus disabus'd, that they would not be so in love with deceit, as in the Prophets phrase, Ier. 8. 5. to hold it fast: that they would not choose Chymaera's and fantastic Images before real and substantial Felicities: and prefer that hope which will be sure to ship-wrack them, before that which will be an Anchor of the Soul, sure and steadfast, Heb. 6. 19. and if this so reasonable a proposal may be embracit; if the World should, as the Spaniard said, but rise wise one morning, what a deal of dead merchandize would Satan have upon his hands: Many of those they call the comfortable Doctrines would want vent, which are now the staple commodity of his Kingdom. What those are, 'tis no part of my design to examine, it will be every man's particular concern to do it for himself; which he may do by this one test; whether they more animate men to hope well, than to live well? Whether they bring Alexanders sword to cut asunder the Gordian knot, to sever between the promise and the condition? Or the sword of the Spirit to subdue all to the obedience of Christ? If the former, we may expect the fruits of such will be all that licentiousness which St. Paul describes, as the works of the flesh, Gal. 5. 19. it being not to be imagined, that the precepts of the Gospel, which they divide from the promises only, that they might fall off, shall then be voluntarily taken up in mere good nature and heroic Generosity; that those who are so industrious to avoid the necessity of Christian practice, will make it their free-will-offering. If there should happen to be some few of so ingenuous a gratitude; yet 'tis certain, that is not our common mould; few men will be better than they think their interest bids them be, and therefore such principles are dangerous Seminaries of Libertinism: and 'tis men's very important concernment not to admit them. Let not then their cheerful aspect recommend them to our embraces; men may be killed with too much Cordial; that which seems to refresh the Spirits may enflame the Blood, and though cold poisons have gotten the fame of being the most malignant, yet there are hot that are as infallibly mortiferous. Let it be our care in opposition to both, to keep ourselves in that moderate, equal temper, which belongs to healthy Souls: and since that is the vitallest heat which is gotten by exercise, set to our business, employ ourselves diligently in all those duties the Gospel exacts, and then we shall not want such an hope as may warm our hearts, keep us in a cheerful expectation, till we come to the glorious fruition of that Eternal Salvation which God has promised to all them, and only them that obey him. And till we do thus, till we consider as well what we are to do, as what we are to receive: there will be no hope of restoring Christianity to its native vigor; we shall make it evaporate all its strength in unsignificant hopes, convert it into Air, to bear up our Bubbles, instead of that firm ground, whereon we should build virtue here, and glory hereafter.

CHAP. V. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Carnal Consideration.

AFTER the disadvantages of partial Consideration, may fairly be subjoin'd the ills of that advertency, which is impregnated by sensuality and sloth, and makes pretence unto right reason, but tends indeed as much as anything to the frustrating the design, and enfeebling the force of our Religion: such close reserves of deceit and malice have men to their own Souls, that when they quit one strong hold of Satan's, 'tis only to retreat to another. When they are not so brisk and Aerial, as lightly to skip over those precepts, that lie in their way: they are so gross and unwary as to fall at them; if they may not pass for Straws and Chaff, such as every blast of vain confidence may blow away, they shall then be improved into Heaps and Mountains, become stones of stumbling and rocks of offense; and when they are called upon to Consider them, they do it in so perverse a manner, as if they meant to revenge themselves on that unwelcome importunity: their consideration is worse than neglect. They look into them insiduously, not as Disciples, but as Spies, not to weigh the obligingness, but to quarrel the unreasonableness or difficulty of the injunctions, not to direct their practice, but excuse their prevarications.

FROM this unsincere kind of inspection it is, that the Precepts have got so formidable appearance with many, that they have fallen under such heavy prejudices, as to resolve them intolerable yokes, insuperable tasks: that this Canaan is a land that eats up its inhabitants, wherein there is so little of enjoyment that it scarce affords a being. Men count a life under such restraints, so joyless and uneasy, that it differs from death only, by being more passive. They think Zeal like a Hectick Fever, in a slow but certainly fatal Fire exhausts and consumes the Spirits. Mortification and self-denial macerate and decay the body; and liberality dissipates and wastes the estate: and with these Apparitions which themselves have conjur'd up; men run frighted from duty, resolve the burden is unsupportable, or at least grievous to be born, and therefore, as our Savior says of the Pharisees, will not touch it, no not so much as with one of their fingers, Mat. 23. 4. never make any attempt to try what indeed they are; but take their measures from their own, or perhaps other men's prejudicate opinions, and thence take out an Authentic Record and Patent for sloth, fancy the journey too long for them, and therefore sit still; first call Christ's commandments grievous, and then improve that slander into a manumission; absolve themselves from obeying them. And unless they may have the Gate to life cut wider, made capacious enough to receive them with all their lusts about them, will never essay to enter it.

BUT if the Prince of darkness have enacted it a Law, that difficulty shall pass for excuse, yet if real uneasiness may be admitted to be as deterring as imaginary ones, his own decree will retort the most ruinously on himself, and men may plead it as their discharge, from all those base drudgeries, those tyrannous impositions wherewith he loads them. The Drunkard may experimentally tell him, the pain of an aking head, of an overcharged stomach, the ruin of a wasted Estate, and claim a dispensation from pursuing that uneasy and costly sin. The Wanton may bring his macerated body like the Levites Concubine Iud, and urge it as an evidence how cruel a Master he serves; and from thence emancipate and free himself: and indeed every sin carries in it so much of visible toil, or secret smart, as would by force of this rule supplant and undermine its self; and sure Satan would never have armed men with so dangerous a weapon, had he not discerned them so in love with slavery, as secures him it should never be used against him; for if it should, nothing could give him a more mortal wound, more irrecoverably shake his Kingdom. Nor would only that infernal Region feel the force of that destructive principle; it would make as strange confusions in secular Regiments.

FOR if such pleas as these may be admitted, they will easily cancel all Humane, as well as Divine Laws, and every malefactor will transfer his guilt on the severity of the Legislator: the Thief may say it is too great a difficulty for him to resist the temptation of an apt opportunity; a rich prize that his fingers are too slippery even for himself, and he cannot restrain them, and then quarrel the strictness of the Law, which has raised so high a fence about men's properties, that he who climbs it must endanger his neck. The Rebel may complain that the bands of Allegiance are too strait, the yoke sits too close, galls and frets his tender flesh, exclaim loudly at the Tyranny of those that laid it on, and in that out-cry drown the noise of his own Treason. And so every other transgressor may accuse the rule, as accessory to his swervings, till at last the Laws be made the only Criminals.

I leave every man to judge both of the equity and consequences of such discourings in Civil matters, and shall only desire he will apply them to Spiritual also, where certainly they are neither more just, nor less ruinous; and whilst such absurd pretences as these pass curreant, no wonder if Christianity languish and grow impotent, want strength to impress its self on the lives of its professors. The most infallible receipt can work no cure on him, who upon the suspicion of its bitterness, refuses to taste it. The most excellent Laws must look their regulating power, where the execution of them is obstructed; and we may as reasonably look for the efficacy of Christianity among those who never heard the name, as among those, who owning the name, do yet disclaim its precepts; and so all those interpretatively do, who by accusing them of too great rigor, avert both themselves and others from their Obedience.

THAT the Charge is scandalously unjust will appear to any, who shall allow themselves the just means of information; but alas the way of Process men take in this affair is so inequitable, as certainly presages the partiality of the sentence, what Person ever was there so innocent, so excellent, who if arraign'd at the Tribunal of his mortal enemy could be acquitted, Christ himself shall be pronounced a Blasphemer, when a Caiaphas is to examine him: and no wonder if his precepts find proportionable dealing, if they be decried as impossible, tyrannical, perhaps ridiculous too, where the scanning of them is refer'd to those, whose interest it is to defame them. Men enthrone their lusts, set them up in the judgment seat, and none can expect they shall pass such a sentence, as shall include their own condemnation: if they own the Commandment to be holy, just and good, they must tacitly accuse themselves to be impure, unjust and wicked, and as such to be consign'd to wrath and judgment.

HERE then we have the true account how Christ's commands, which are in themselves so far from grievous, have gotten so unkind a reputation among us; this is so direct a course for it, that we may cease our wonder, though not our grief to see it, for we behold them stand to the award of those with whom they have a professed enmity: the Goal gives sentence on the Bench; the Bar arraigns the Judgment Seat. Certainly when that Law which is Spiritual is submitted to the arbitriments of gross carnality, the Law of liberty is taxed and rated by those worst bondmen who are sold under sin; 'tis impossible to find any fairer treatment. That which comes on purpose to dethrone sin, dispossess it of the Empire it has usurpt, will certainly be entertained with the same exclamation the Devils used to Christ, Why art thou come to torment us? But as if this general Antipathy were not enough to ascertain the rejection of Christ's command; as if the National feud, as I may call it, between Heaven and Hell were not thought irreconcilable enough, men offer yet harder measure, call in the aid of personal quarrels, and when the precepts come to be considered, refer each of them single to that particular Vice to which it has the directest contrariety.

THUS when Christ's command of meekness and forgiveness, of loving enemies, and turning the cheek, bearing the Cross, or self-denial calls for audience; they consult (as Rehoboam did with his young hot-spurs) with their anger and malice, their rankor and revenge, and they soon give their Verdict; that to be meek is to be servile, a temper fit only for the object. That to forgive enemies is a principle of cowardice that would emasculate the world; to love them a piece of Spaniel-like fawning; but to turn the Cheek; not only to hazard, but invite new injuries by owning them as benefits, paying blessing for curses, kindness and good-turns for hatred, is such a ridiculous patience, as must expose to the insolence of many, and the scorn and derision of all men. And then the resolution is ready they will be no such fools for Christ's sake. So when the precept of humility and lowliness comes to be considered, their Pride is deputed to hear its plea, and then though it bring the authority of Christ's example as well as his command, it will be judged invalid: Christ indeed took upon him the form of a Servant, and to that humility was a proportionable Adjunct; but what is that to them whose aspiring humor abhors subjection, 'tis not calculated for their Meridian, they are of another manner of Spirit, and would not have it embased by the admission of so mean a quantity: and though Christ have put poverty of Spirit among his Beatitudes, they resolve he shall not ensnare them with that artifice, they will not take his measures of felicity; or resign that pleasure they have in valuing themselves, for anything he proposes in exchange. In like manner the precepts of temperance, sobriety and chastity, are not permitted to the judgment of sober reason, nay, nor of mere natural desire; but to appetites vitiated and inflamed, by radicating habits; and then the Glutton thinks to eat moderately, is to be starv'd; and will as soon put a knife, Prov. 23. to his throat, in the vulgar sense of cutting it, as in Solomon's notion of restraining his excess. Thus the Drunkard with his false thirsts looks on sobriety as a kind of Hell, where he shall want a drop to cool his tongue, and thinks the abandoning his debauched jollities is an implicit adieu to all the comforts of life. The Unclean person when his blood is high scoffs at Chastity as a religious kind of impotence, and only so far considers the precept of pulling out the Eye, as to infer that it were as easy literally to part with it, as to restrain its lustful range: not look at all, as not look to lust. And proportionably it fares with Charity and bounty, which though our Savior recommend, Mammon arraigns of robbery, and stigmatizes as a Thief that picks the Purse, and riffles Coffers. But amidst all these the taking up the Cross, suffering for righteousness sake, and the doctrine of self-denial, fall under the heaviest prejudice. These are opposed not by someone single vice, but the confederate arms of all; even those whose interests are flatly opposite do here unite: Herod and Pilate, Sadducees and Pharisees accord against Christ, and all are freely suffered, nay invited to exhibit their complaints against these Mandates. Covetousness cries out that this is the most ruinous prodigality, casts away an estate in a lump, and lays all open to forfeiture and confiscation: and Prodigality takes it as ill to be forestall'd, and have nothing left for it to dissipate. Profaneness avows a contempt of it as a folly, and most open madness to part with real pleasure for an empty name, or profit for that Bankrupt thing called Conscience: and Hypocrisy has a more secret hatred of it, as its detector; that which will bring it to a Test which it cannot pass. Malice puts in a Caveat, that this is to gratify enemies, and lose the satisfactions of revenge: and Self-Love puts in another, that it is to destroy ones self. In short, every limb of the body of sin discharges a blow at this innocent and Divine Sanction; as if they meant it should exemplify its own doctrine by assuming that passive temper it recommends.

BUT alas, who can expect anymore upright verdicts from such pact, such corrupt Juries, and why may not Christ be permitted to claim the common benefit of our Laws, to make his challenge and exceptions against this so incompetent impanel. 'Tis the counsel of the Wise man, not to advise in common affairs with those whose tempers may be supposed to bias them, consult not, says he, with a coward in matters of war, nor with a sluggard of much business, Eccl. 37. 11. and sure if they be ill Counsellors, they must be worse Judges: but why then do we set pride to judge of humility, lust of purity, covetousness of liberality: and make our vices the arbitrators of those Laws which should restrain them? This is such a gross injustice as common humanity abhors; we deal by other measures with men, the most notorious and flagitious criminals: and reserve this way of process for those things only wherein our God may be concerned. 'Tis a severe exprobration of a profane people, Malachi. 1. 8. Where God accuses them for treating him with less reverence than they would do a mortal Prince. Offer it now to thy Prince: but alas we shall force him to descend far lower in his expostulation, so far we are from paying him the duty and regard belonging to a Prince, that we yield him not the rights of common men: force him to stand to those measures which we think too unequitable to press upon a murderer, a thief, or rebel at the Bar.

BUT this waving of common rules is a plain confession that we need more indulgence, than those will allow: when men's lusts thus usurp the Tribunal and judge in their own cause, 'tis a palpable discovery they dare not remit themselves to anymore equal determination. And indeed in this point of their interest, they pass a right judgment: for 'tis certain were the case refer'd to any competent Judge, indeed to any but themselves they would inevitably be cast; and sure 'tis high time that some should assist oppressed virtue in its appeal; find it out some Court of equity where its plea may be heard: and we need not travel far for that purpose, every man may do it in his own breast, where in his little Common-wealth he shall find a Court of God's erecting: let him but draw the Cause thither, discuss the matter in his own conscience; and he will soon find the former unrighteous sentences reversed: let him but seriously reflect on his violations of those sacred Precepts of Christ; and observe what a sting and secret remorse every such breach leaves within him: and that will be a competent attestation of the equity and obligingness of those Mandates: for from whence else can the regret arise? those things that are either impossible in their nature, or unconcerning to us cannot beget it. No man accuses himself for not flying in the air, or walking upon the water: nor owns himself guilty in the non-observance of any Laws, but such as have power to oblige him: and therefore these close pangs and checks of Conscience are an irrefragable evidence, that men do inwardly assent to the justice and authority of those divine rules; which their actions, yea often their words too, do most oppugn.

BUT over and above the throws and afterpains of conscience, when sin is brought forth, the self-accusation of the Criminal, when none beside controuls, nay many flatter and commend: I say beyond this secondary and reflex Apology, for Christ's Law, owed to the foregoing prevarication of it; there is an early and immediate verdict past in its behalf, in the esteem and liking which those documents command, where ere they pass: creating an assent and veneration not only when obeyed, but from professed despisers; who cannot choose to think well of that virtue they desert, and the necessity of their affairs compel them to speak ill of. An event visible in the condemnation of our Savior, where the Judge who gave Sentence against him, at the same moment washed his hands, and openly professed he found no fault in him.

AND indeed this very reflection on the Author of these precepts, if well considered would supersede all other arguments. The Mandates of the Gospel on this one score, that they are Christ's, are certainly both pure in themselves, and possible to us: and so most worthy not only of all Obedience, but all Love too. He who is our Lord upon both the titles of Creation and Redemption, may certainly with all justice impose what laws he pleases on us. Yet he, who laid down his life for the redemption of the transgressions which were under the first Testament, cannot be imagined so inconsiderate of our frailty which himself had smarted for, as to introduce another of equal rigor, or be so prodigal of his blood, as to pour it out for those who by a new set of impossible commands should infallibly forfeit themselves again: and if this cannot be supposed, the contrary may be concluded, that he hath so far condescended to our imbecility, as not to prescribe us anything which he either finds or makes us not able to perform. 'Tis true indeed, his Laws are above the reach of our corrupt and debased nature; and they were unfit to be his, were they not so: but when he by his grace offers to elevate and refine this nature, bring it up to the pitch and purity of those Laws, this is a far greater mercy than if he had descended to our corruption; so he might have contaminated himself, given laws unworthy of him: but alas what advantage would it be to us, to have the Blasphemy mentioned, Psal. 50. so verified to have our God in this sense, such a one as ourselves? but by this other Method he purifies, and exalts us: puts us in a capacity of being like unto him, in which is sum'd up at once, all both virtue and felicity.

AND on this glorious end every particular command of his, has a direct aspect, everyone of them tending to re-impress on us some part of that divine image which was raz'd out by the first sin: and this one would think enough to recommend them to our highest value.

Certainly, if Conscience may be Judge, it will be so: there being in this case no middle between devout reverence, and horrid blasphemy; for he that despises such an assimilation, must necessarily also despise him who is so resembled: he who thinks meekness, purity, humility, &c. unamiable qualities, can have little esteem for him, in whom they are so transcendently eminent, but will take the Prophet at his word, and say, there is no form nor comeliness in him, Es. 53. But this sure can never be the Verdict of Conscience; he that can thus pronounce, must be supposed to have suppressed and silenced that. It being one of the most indelible notions there, that all that is in God, is sublimely excellent. But because 'tis indeed too possible that conscience may be put under such an undue restraint, suffer the violence of a Prisoner, when it should sustain the place of a Judge: because many men dare not permit their consciences to speak, lest they should say more than they are willing to hear. And lastly, since these persons make their appeal to reason, pretend the aids, and boast in the advantages of that, it may not be amiss to bring the Cause unto that Bar: whose Empire and Authority none must disclaim that own the Style, and least of all those Skeptics in Religion with whom we have to do: who will allow of no conviction but from it.

AND God, who as the Apostle says, leaves not himself without witness, has so tempered and disposed his Precepts as to qualify them to pass even this Test also, they being not the contradictions but improvements of natural Reason: and so most apt to recommend themselves to all that is Man, not Brute about us. Indeed they have the very same aim and design with that. It has ever been the grand business of sober reason first to discover, and then to attain that one supremegood, which would give rest and felicity to the soul: in this inquisition have the Philosophers and greatest Masters of Reason, laid out their most serious studies and deepest contemplations; and in their indefatigable pursuits seem jointly to sigh out David's question, Who will show us any good? and now the Gospel comes a solution of this so important a Query, brings these glad tidings of joy to all people, and that not only in its credenda, by informing us what that Good is: but in its agenda too, by tracing us out the Way to it: beating us a path which will certainly lead us to that summum bonum which our very Nature implicitly gasps after; and sure Reason can never jar with this, which comes thus as a happy Auxiliary to succor its impotence: as an infallible Guide to conduct its steps: and as a glorious Light to give it a clear view, of what it before blindly groped after. 'Tis a certain Indication of Madness, to tear and mischief those things that would be useful to us, to curse and revile a friend, or fly in the face of those whose charity brings them to our aid; and therefore 'tis most evident that Reason must first cease to be reason, and commence Frenzy, before 'tis possible it can set its self in defiance of those Laws of Christ, which are thus accommodated to its greatest Interests.

AND as the accord is thus observable in the ultimate, so is it in the intermediate design also. Reason had by its twilight discerned that, that Sovereign Bliss it aimed at, would never be hit by an unsteady hand; by him who was perpetually tossed and agitated by his turbulent inordinate appetites. Therefore young men, yet in the heat and ferment of their blood were solemnly proscrib'd and banished from the Schools and Lectures of Philosophy; therefore lustrations and Catharticks of the mind were sought for, and all endeavor used to calm and regulate the fury, if not extirpate (which some contended for) the very being of the Passions:

that so a preparation might be made first for the knowledge and then the attainment of felicity: Now the Gospel Precepts have visibly the same end and purpose: everyone of them expressly singling out some irregular affection to combat and subdue: so that right Reason and They are evidently of a Sect and Party, insomuch that several of the ancientest Fathers of the Church attributed the excellent documents of Heathen Philosophers to the Divine 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the reason and essential Word of God which after was incarnate upon earth; and brought auxiliary strengths of Grace, to aid the weaknesses of Nature. The blessed Jesus whose bare word Checkt the Sea in its highest fury, and by that Miracle attested his Divinity; as much exerts himself in silencing the louder Tempests, and calming the intestine storms within our breasts. And certainly Reason will not quarrel to have been thus reliev'd, it being the property only of proud Folly to choose rather to lose a victory than owe it to the aid of an Allie.

FROM this general view, it were easy to descend to observe the exact concurrence of particulars. God loves a reasonable service, and has so tempered his commands, that every Act of obedience we perform may be so qualified: and gain unto its votaries the Elogium promise'd in the Law of Moses, Deut. 4. 9. Surely this people is a wise and understanding People. And first that the command of Meekness is a most rational Precept can never be doubted by any who remember but the common definition of Anger, that it is Furor brevis, and sure 'tis very reasonable not to be mad, and he that has observed the unmanly transportations of that wild passion, how that the first violence it offers is to the man within him, will certainly think it the interest, not only of his Religion, but common prudence, and right Reason to suppress it. And the like is to be said of the more solemn Frensy of deep malice and deliberate Revenge, where the fury wants the alloy of being transient and short lived, is embodied into Complexion and temper, and grows inveterate into Nature. Anger indeed is a fire, and he that touches it though but lightly, will find it scorch him: but the Malicious lays himself as it were to roast at it; prolongs and spins out his own Torment as if he meant to anticipate his Punishment in his very crime, and commence his Hell here, in unquenchable fire. Truly no sin does more represent that state of horror to which it tends; it gives a man not only a certain Title, but an ample Earnest, pays him part in hand of those dismal wages. This was so well understood even by the Heathens that we see the Poets knew not how more Emphatically to describe the future torment of an envious and malicious person, than by the representation of his sin. Prometheus Vultur begins her quarry in this life; every malignant Thought, every spiteful Wish preys upon his Heart that harbours it: every revengeful project puts him in the pangs of labor till it be brought forth; and when it is, it commonly rebounds so mischievously upon the Parent, that the birth seems like that of Agrippina when she bare Nero that murder'd her. And surely not only reason, but common sense, will say this is a state to be detested, and consequently must give its suffrage to those Laws of Meekness and Charity which are the only expedients to prevent it. Peace is deservedly reckoned among the highest blessings of communities, and sure it has a proportionable value, in every single member of those greater bodies, it being that which is indispensably requisite to the enjoying of any other good. A War we know interrupts at once all the profits and pleasures of a Nation: and this hostile Temper in a man's mind does the very same, and like Choler in the stomach, takes off all gust of the most delightful things, and so becomes a Hell in the poena damni, as well as that of Sense: and then how absurd an impatience is it, for men to think every the slightest injury from another insupportable, and yet heap such heavy pressures upon themselves, like froward Children roar out for the least touch from another hand, yet knock and batter themselves without complaint: as if their only contention were, that they may be the sole Authors of their own Calamity. And that which adds yet more, if it be possible, to add to so vast a folly, is, that Revenge never repairs any Injury: if I have been reproacht or defam'd, 'tis not the wounding of my enemies body that will heal my fame, I may by that means help to spread the Libel by inviting many to enquire the cause of our quarrel: but that is no Medium to prove him a slanderer, the world being too well acquainted with the nature of revenge to imagine it an argument of his innocence that acts it: so far it is from being such, that it gives a most violent presumption of guilt, according to that notable Observation of the Historian, Convitia spreta exolescunt, si irascare agnita videntur. In like manner suppose me hurt in my body, Retaliation brings no balm to my sores: my pains abate not by his having the like or greater; nor would my Wounds fester the less though his should Gangrene. So if I am endammag'd in my goods, I may contrive to repay him that ill turn, and yet not recover my own loss; and generally the spiteful spoils that are made, are of that nature. 'Tis true, the Law may in some cases repair the injured person: but then that is owing to the Justice of the Law, not to the malice of the Plaintiffe: for he that sues upon the naked intuition of recovering his Right, without any aspect of Revenge on the invader, has as fully the benefit of the Law (and indeed none can innocently have it otherwise) and then to what serves the vindicative humor, what increment or advantage can the superaddition of his revenge bring him in? 'Tis sure in all these instances it often does the quite contrary: plunges him in farther troubles and dangers, and when all this is considered, we may certainly pronounce Christ's precept of Meekness, partakes as well of the Serpent as the Dove, is as well prudent as innocent: nor is this Conclusion at all shaken, by that Objection which men make from the danger of inviting more injuries and affronts by this tameness: for first suppose there were truth in it; that hazard could not balance the many certain mischiefs which have been evinced inseparably to follow the contrary temper: and it were certainly less penal to endure multitudes of light and transient Abuses, than those far more uneasy ways of Redress, which men's revenges suggest to them: and then 'twill be perfectly reasonable, of these two evils to choose the less. As for the greater and more important violations, there are legal ways which may prove redress in some cases, or prevention in others: He that is slandered or impoverished, may take a course to clear his Innocence, or recover his Goods: he that is hurt or maim'd, though he is incapable of reparations, yet the Law provides for his future security, by awarding such Penalties, as may discourage the Offender from repeating the violence: and to these aids, a man may resort with these Proviso's, first, that he abstract from all design of Revenge; and secondly, that the matter be of Weight; and certainly he that by these legal means cannot be secured, can be much less so by any private attempt of his own: For he that despiseth the coercive power of Laws, will much more condemn the enmity of a single person. The only difficulty in this case is, when a state is in such a confusion that there is no lawful Judicature to appeal to, but that implies so many sadder miseries, than the want of such a redress amounts to, that every man may patiently enough cast this into the heap of greater evils; and not consider that one pressure, when so much weightier calamity exacts his grief: But sure the Suspension of Law in this particular does no more qualify a private person to be his own Revenger, than it invests him in any other part of Authority, and he may with as good right place himself on the Bench, and become a Judge in other men's causes, as thus become both Judge and Executioner in his own.

BUT in the last place, the ground of this objection seems weak and sandy; for that meekness is not the way to expose a man, generally speaking, to more suffering: 'tis possible indeed through the barbarity of some few insulting cowards, who love to vapor good cheap, that they may trample on those who give least resistance; but this is not the common bent of human Nature, (which ought to be the measure in this case) we find men usually exasperated by Opposition, who are calm'd and appeas'd by Gentleness. Anger is not of the nature of that monstrous Fire the Historian tells us of, which nothing but blows could extinguish. It is the Observation of the wisest of Men, that a soft answer turneth away wrath, and men's Passions are like Bullets which batter the walls which stand inflexible, but fall harmlesly into Wool or Feathers; and I doubt not common experience will attest it, that none do generally fall under fewer of these storms than they, who are thus prepared to bear them. Let a meek and an angry person cast up their Accounts together, and compare the number of affronts and contumelies they have met with, and I believe the Odds will be as great, as between Saul's thousands and David's ten thousands. 'Tis certain that the return made to the first injury provokes a new one; men being so partial to themselves, that he who receives a harm by way of Retaliation, never reflects on his own first guilt, but looks on it as a naked Injury, and so pursues his Revenge, which has again the same effect on the other, and so this wild-fire runs round, till it have set all in a flame; made the saddest vastations, not only in men's Minds, but their outward Concernments too, in the many fatal outrages, which these eager contentions occasion, all which would be avoided by a meek disregard of the first provocation: So that although some injuries may fall upon the Passive man, yet infallibly there would be no broils and quarrels, which are alone the great accumulators and multipliers of injuries; which alone demonstrates how unjustly Meekness is charged with so much as an accidental production of them; and vindicates that precept of Christ which has fallen under so much, not only Cavil but Scorn; it appearing that to abstain from revenge, and refer the hazards of that to God's providence (which is the importance of his command to turn the Cheek) is the greatest even moral Security against Violence, and so approves our Lawgiver (in this so decried particular) to be as well the wonderful Counselor, as the Prince of Peace.

IN the next place, if we weigh the precept of humility and lowliness in the balance of sober discourse, we shall certainly find it hold a just weight. Indeed Pride is nothing but Deceit, a mere cheat and delusion, and so every man can discern it in another, we there are able to trace the windings of this Serpent, and say this man thinks himself more wise, this more learned, a third more holy than he is: yet alas in our own breasts we discern not the Abuse, suffer him to persuade us what he but promise'd to our first Parents, that we are as God's, something so super-excellent, that all must reverence and adore: And herein we take him at his word, never suspect these glorious Attributions may be no more than Complement or Flattery; or what is no less obvious, Derision and Scorn. To a considering man 'twould be a shrew'd presumption against whatever Pride suggests, that 'tis attended always by self-love, which is, as it were, the common setter to all those cheats which circumvent and fool us: But there want not also more convincing proofs of its deceit and unsincerity. When e're we overween and believe well of ourselves, it is in contemplation of some imaginary or else real good; somewhat a Man has not, or somewhat that he has: If we do it upon the former account, that is undeniably a gross Delusion; a kind of deceptio visus, a filling the Eye with fantastic Aerial Images, which have no solid Being: And God knows, such Phasmes, such Apparitions are most of those excellencies which men applaud in themselves; things conjur'd up by the Magic of a strong imagination, and are only seen within that Circle in which the Enchanter stands: And though Satan be the grand Master of this black Art, yet his Pupils are now grown so dextrous, that he seldom needs to be called in; our own partialities and fondnesses to ourselves, are abundantly sufficient for the purpose. But if in the second place we suppose the things to be really existent in us, yet Pride runs us upon an other error no less dangerous than the former, for it betrays us to mistake the true Owner of them, emboldens us to set our own mark upon those rich Wares, in whose acquist we have not been so much as Factors; God is the one great Author and proprietor of all that is or can be valuable in us; to his Providence or his Grace we owe all the accomplishment of our outward or inward man, and though he allows us the use and benefit of them, yet the Glory is a special Royalty, which (as the Gold or Silver Mines of a Nation) is reserved to his Crown, an incommunicable piece of his Regality. And how woefully does our Pride befool us, when it brings us in such false Inventories of our goods, makes us dream ourselves rich by another's wealth; like Children that call everything theirs which looks splendidly, or the mad Athenian celebrated by Horace for his happy frenzy, that resolved all the Ships and Wares his own that came into the Cities harbor: But how more sadly does it betray us, when it thus puts us upon the invasion of his propriety, who is not as the impotent Monarchs of the earth, unable to assert his own Rights, but can certainly Vindicate himself to our Confusion, against whom no rebellion can be any longer prosperous than he willingly permits it, and who has solemnly avowed he will not give his glory to another: And when our Pride makes us thus both ridiculous and miserable, when it seduces us not only into the folly of Children and extravagancies of Lunaticks, but at once into the guilt of bold, and punishment of improsperous Rebels: Certainly Reason can never become its Advocate, or put in any demur to that Sentence which excludes so treacherous a guest out of men's hearts; which is the sole aim of those laws of humility which Christ has given us.

NOR will the Precepts of Temperance and Purity find any worse doom at this Bar, the contrary Vices being such indignities and contumelies unto human nature, as can never find any countenance from this Supreme part of it: 'Tis the prerogative of our Reason, that it discriminates us from, and elevates us above beasts: Nor can it ever be brought to resign this so glorious a privilege, assent to the admission of those brutish appetites which would overrun the Soul, level its superior with its inferior faculties; confound the distinction of Rational and Sensitive, and in a word, render the Beast so ravenous as to eat up the Man. Yet thus it is in those sordid Sins of Intemperance and Uncleanness, unless perhaps they are so much worse than Beastial that I wrong the generality of the Brutes in the comparison, it being only some few of them, the very Beasts of the Beasts that are guilty of any such Excesses, for generally their Appetites do not transgress the regular ends of Nature, they know no such disease as Surfetting, but eat to satisfy Hunger, and couple at such seasons as best tend to preserve their kind; and then 'tis to be considered how base, how degenerous a descent it is for us to stoop, not only below our own nature, but theirs; what a solitude these vices reduce us to, that not so much as the nobler sort of Beasts will bear us company, we must wander upon the mountains to court a Goat, we must rake the mire to find a Swine, before we can furnish ourselves with any Associates: And sure all this so open an Hostility against-Reason, that it can by no means be her interest to abet it. Ask her whether she would be pressed to death with loads of meat, whether she would be drowned in floods of drink, whether she would be suffocated with the noisome vapors of putrefaction and rottenness, and the answer she gives to these tells you her sense of Gluttony, Drunkennes and Uncleanness: Alas she suffers from them the most barbarous outrages, is invaded not only in her Authority, but her very Being, and therefore even upon the so celebrated principle of selfpreservation, must muster all her forces to vindicate the injury and defend herself. And then certainly Christ's Commands of Sobriety and Purity must needs be entertained with all Alacrity and Gladness, as an accession of strength to her party, an aid to assist her in that just and necessary War.

AND as Reason thus pronounces against the sins of the Flesh, so in the next place does it certainly against those of the World. Mammon himself will not be able to bribe this Judge, but when Christ's Precept of Charity and liberality comes before this Tribunal, it will infallibly be not only acquitted but magnified and applauded, be called from the Bar to the Bench, Commissioned like the Jews, Hest. 9. To bear rule over them that hated them, to dissipate at once the wealth and the covetousness of the Worldling; have the Keys put into its hand, that it may have free access to his Coffers; this certainly must be the event of this trial, for 'tis confessedly the part of Reason to dispose everything to those uses which are most proper and advantageous, such as may bring in most real benefit to the owner. Now what other employment of wealth is there (after competent accommodations are provided) which can contribute to a man's Felicity? If it be laid out like the Rich man's in the Gospel in delicious Fare, or Purple and fine Linnen; certainly it makes no least approach towards it. First, for excessive Fare, if a man be not excessive too in the eating, what does he enjoy of it? Meat has no natural propriety to the Eye, and can make no impressions of pleasure there; but if he be voracious and intemperate, 'tis then so far from making him happy, that it dejects him into the forlorn condition, even now mentioned, sets him at odds with his reason, his very manhood, nay, I may add with his very sense too; the displacencies that he receives by the consequences of his excess, far outweighing all that is grateful in it. This is well described by the Wise man, Ecclus. 31. 19.

AS for the gayety of Apparel that can never in sober judging be thought any advantage, 'tis that which only Youth and Folly puts a value upon, and as we out-grow the one, so we do the other: All that is convenient in Cloaths is as well, nay, better provided for without it: A rich suit is only heavier, not warmer than a plain; and it is a kind of prodigy to see how heavily vanity, which is in its self so light, sits upon some men; who are content even to make themselves Porters, so their Tailors may lay on the burden: And thus in many other instances the fineness of Cloaths destroys the ease, so that it often helps men to pain, but can never rid them of any;

the body may be languishing and infirm under the most splendid cover: Herod's royal apparel secures him not from being eaten with Worms; and Lazarus his Ulcers would have been never the less painful, though they had been wrapped in Dives his fine Linnen.

OR if the Wealth be laid out on any other part of that the world calls greatness, as an Honourableretinue, Troops of attendants, and the like; the return will be no less empty: Multitudes of unprofitable Servants being a geat burden, but no degree of advantage; alas does my Meat relish ever the better, because my Table is surrounded with Waiters; or when I go out, does my train of followers make the Air the more refreshing to me, does not rather the Dust they raise make it less, annoy and stifle me? As for matter of business, the number of Servants tends rather to hinder than advance it; daily experience attesting, that in crouds of domestics everyone of them thinks his idleness will be hid: The care of doing and the guilt of omitting is transferr'd from one to another, and none has any farther thought, than how he may quit himself either of the burden or the blame; so that upon the final account all that accrues to a Master by the greatness of his family is the increase of his care in the regiment of it: A great deal of vigilance and circumspection being required, to keep it in any tolerable order, and if it be not so kept, his House becomes a wilderness, and himself a prey to the Beasts he feeds: The licentiousness of the Servant redounding more ways than one to the damage of the Master.

IF we should now proceed more minutely to every other single expense which vanity and pride suggests, we should certainly find the like success of our inquest; nothing of real felicity, but on the contrary the vanity so interwoven and incorporate with vexation of Spirit, that 'tis impossible to sever them: So that thus to employ ones riches is rather to suffer than enjoy them; but if we suppose a man on the other side such a Reverer of his wealth, that he dares not employ it at all, unless it be at the bank, for the bringing in of more, that keeps it as men do beasts reserved for breed, manumit them from all work but that of propagation. Such a person is surely of all others, the farthest from receiving any advantage by it: he converts it from a Servant into a Tyrant, and sad experience shows us the calamity of such a transmutation. It has been always hold the severest treatment of Slaves and Malefactors damnare ad Metalla, force them to dig in Mines; now this is the Covetous man's lot, from which he is never to expect a release, as being his own remorseless and more than Egyptian task-master: and the parallel holds too, in the gainlessness as well as laboriousness of the work; Those wretched creatures buried in Earth and darkness were never the richer for all the Ore they dig'd, no more is the insatiate Miser, he has no power to dispose of any of his acquests; and though he calls them his, yet alas he possesses them no otherwise than a Prisoner does his Goal, a Mad-man his Chains, they are only Instruments of his Thraldom, and the getting more serves only to add more weight to his Shackles; and certainly Wealth can be no way worse disposed, than thus to buy so base a Servitude.

AND now since neither the luxurious spending, nor the covetous keeping can advantage us one step towards anything that can be called happy; but do on the contrary engage us upon toil and misery: Wealth seems to be a very oppressive burden, such as we can neither cast off, nor safely bear; and truly so it is till Charity comes into our Aid; which as the proper Element of Wealth, renders that light which gravitates elsewhere, and as the Elixir unto Metals transforms them into Gold, stamps purity and price upon them: by freely giving, endows the Donor with what ever he bestows; enriches him, and what is more, enriches wealth its self. Without this Art of using, and disposing our estates, we are those Indians who change their Gold for Glass: that silly Fisher-man, who having found a Mass of Ambergreece, employd it to the liquoring of his boots; are foolish to the height of Midas in the Fable, who being promise'd to have what ever he would wish, made his demand that everything he touched might presently be Gold, and run the hazard that he did of being starv'd by our unhappy affluence: men say indeed that Gold by preparation becomes a sovereign Cordial, but certainly it never does rejoice the heart so much as when Charity is the Chymist, the poor man's hand is the best Limbeck to extract this Magistery and tincture, the flames of love will really perform those Miracles, they of the Furnace boast of, and would they employ themselves in this laboratory, they would find the omnipotent efficacy they dream of, sooner in this way of dissipating, than in all their Arts, or rather Fancies of generating Gold. 'Tis certainly a most generous and enlivening pleasure which results from a seasonable liberality: When I see a man struggling with want, his very spirit as well as body stooping under the pressure; if I then relieve him, the human nature within me which is common to us both, does by a kind of Sympathetick motion exult and raise up its self, but if I have any piety that must do it much more; for as the former showed me my own image in my poor brother, so this shows me God's; and how transcendent a satisfaction must it be, to have thus rescued him who bears so divine an impress, to have paid some part of gratitude to my Creator for my own being, by making myself in my low sphere the giver or preserver of that life, which he first breathed into another. This, and this only is the way to raise a felicity out of wealth; and surely since the attaining of happiness, is the one grand pursuit of our Reason, that must even before it has subjected its self to the Faith of Christ, give assent to the Prudence of his Command in this as well as the former instances.

BUT there remains a Precept of our Savior's allied to this; which seems by no means to comport and hold a correspondence with the dictates of right Reason: the taking up the cross, and suffering for righteousness sake; which contradicts the fundamental law of self preservation; and the great end of being, felicity and happiness. But this suggestion, how specious soever it appear, is utterly fallacious; for 'tis no good consequence, that because Reason aims at our being happy, therefore it forbids us all voluntary sufferings, since that the case may be so set, that such a suffering may be the fairest medium left us to our happiness. 'Tis a known rule that of two evils, the least is to be chosen; and the election of the lesser ill, though it be no absolute, yet is a comparative good; and its attainment as far as the necessity of our affairs permit, is our felicity: and reason can provide no farther. Now this is the estate of the present instance: two evils are proposed, a Natural and a Moral; the Natural, though in its self to be averted, yet much inferior to the Moral, and then Reason soon resolves the Dilemma, that the Natural is to be chosen: all that can be questioned in this affair, is whether Reason define the moral evil to be the greater, but this can bear no long dispute with any who consider but the Nature of Reason, which being seated in the upper soul of a man, is no way concerned in those Ills, which make their impression on the sensitive part, but Moral ill's strike higher, invade the mind, cloud the reason; nay, often depose it from its regiment, as is too frequently exemplified in the force of vicious habits, and therefore by how much our reason is superior to our sense, so much are those to be accounted the greatest evils, which assault that nobler part of us. This certainly will now be the determination of Reason, if she may be permitted the freedom of her vote: for thus was it formerly where she bare the most sway, and uncontrolled rule: The wisest and best considering of human, as well as divine Authors having established it as an undoubted Aphorism, that honest is to be prefer'd before both gainful and pleasant: so that nothing renders a man so deplorable, as that which violates his integrity; nay they have generally gone higher, exhorted men to become volunteers in virtues warfare, not to suspend their sufferings till they were forced out by the competition of a crime; but offer themselves free oblations. Thus to suffer for ones Country or ones Friend, was thought so worthy, so heroic a thing, that noble and ingenuous spirits were aemulous of it: and it was so stated a case that Epictetus forbids a man, on such an occasion to consult with the Oracle, whether he should do it or no, it being necessary to be done, what ever ill success or ruin be predicted, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, and how serious they were in these persuasions, some of them have practically evidenced, as having suffered very inconsiderable pressures, nay death its self rather than they would bow to the praedominant vices of their Age, or omit the occasion of eminent virtue. Aristides would be just in spite of Ostracism. Regulus observant of his Oath made to a faithless Enemy, though Death and Torment attended the Performance. Lycurgus to perpetuate to his Citizens the benefit of his good Laws, as subtly designs perpetual Banishment unto himself, as others use to contrive for Honor and for Empire there. Codrus redeems the safety of his Army with his own Death: Curtius makes himself a Martyr for his Country, and Socrates in the stricter sense becomes one for his God: laid down his life in attestation of that most fundamental truth and leading article of Faith, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the belief of one God. And yet we find not that those Times, which were so ill as to shed his Blood, were yet so bad as to defame his Memory, he's not recorded either as fool or hypocondriack; nor have his sufferings struck him out of the list of Philosophers: but he stands there the more conspicuously in those bloody Characters; and however the credit of the Oracle may be otherwise disparaged, it never was on this account, that it had declared Socrates to be the wisest of Men. And yet both he and the rest, had either none, or very imperfect confused apprehensions of a future reward, when they engaged on present Suffering, and death its self: So that we might be tempted to imagine, that some strange change and transmutation has now befallen Virtue, that it has put on so much a distant appearance from its ancient self, that the accession of new obligations, and higher hopes, should absolve, avert and utterly dispirit us; insomuch that what was Constancy in a Heathen, should be Folly in a Christian. Certainly this is a Metamorphosis of our own making, we look through deforming optic glasses, such as our Avarice or effeminate Sensualities convey into our hands, which give not only strange and gastly, but withal ridiculous shapes; but if we would consult our Reason, that would show us things in their proper forms. Virtue and Reason are both the same they were so many hundred years ago, and where the Object and the faculty admit of no mutation, 'tis impossible there should really be any such variable appearance. If Socrates were so zealous for the one God, that he chose rather to relinquish his life, than to consent to, or but connive at the profane rivalry of Polytheisme, and yet be no Fool; certainly we may as surely transcribe his copy: and though the particular Article may not be the same; yet if it be anything wherein virtue is concerned, the cause is no less warrantable: he that suffers for a practical Point, is no more a prodigal of his pains, than he that lays them out on the highest Speculative. The Commandments may have as good Martyrs as the Creed; for the same Authority has required our Obedience to the one, that exacts our Faith of the other. Nor is there any necessity of Heathen or Jewish Tribunal, to convert our sufferings to Martyrdom; we may receive that crown from the hands of those that own the same faith with us. Those that say with the most seeming vehemence let the Lord be glorified, may yet hate and cast out their brethren for his name sake, Isa. 66. 5. He that tells me I fear not God so much as he, may yet persecute me for honoring the King more; and my Blood poured out upon that account, becomes an acceptable Sacrifice to him, who has commanded my Subjection to the Higher Powers. He who calls Christ his Head, may yet rend and tear his Body; and if I love its communion so well, as to take my share in the Massacre, I approach toward that dignity and comfort S. Paul so glories in, of filling up that which is behind, of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh, for his bodies sake which is the Church, Col. 1. 24. He that mulcts the more Indeliberate Oaths, may yet enjoin a solemn Perjury: and if I choose he should rather make havoc of my Goods than my Conscience; my Spoils become not more monuments of his rapine, than my piety; they plead my Innocence before him who will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain: and how profanely soever my Wealth is disposed by him that seizes it: 'tis accounted to me as cast into the Treasury; and so 'tis possible I may at once vie with the Rich-men in the greatness of the oblation, and with the poor Widow too in that higher circumstance of its being all. In sum, the opportunities of Martyrdom are not restrained to those points wherein Christians differ from Jews or Heathens, but extend to all wherein we Christians differ from our rule, the commands of our blessed Master. If I suffer for my Constancy to any of them, I have certainly my place in God's Martyrology, as well as if I had fallen under any of the ten Persecutions. God was not so partial to the primitive Christians as to allow them the Monopoly and enclosure of that dignity; if they as our elder Brethren had a double portion, yet there is still a child's part left, for everyone of us enough to testify our Legitimation, and secure us from the brand of Bastardy, Heb. 12. 'twas S. Paul's indefinite Affirmation, and all times since have born witness to the truth of it. That all that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution. Some unfashionable Virtues there have been in every Age, which have whetted, if not the Swords, yet the Tongues of men: and those that happen not to fall under Abel's persecution, must not hope to escape that of Isaac: if they meet with no Cain to kill, they will undoubtedly with an Ishmael to mock them. But in what dress soever our Sufferings appear, a good Cause divests them of their frightful shape, pulls off the ugly vizard, and shows us a Beauty that lay there concealed; and that not only to the Eye of our Faith but our Reason too. Fortitude was a Virtue before Christianity had a name in the world; and the very instinct of our Nature whispers within us, the baseness of being baffled out of a Truth or Virtue; yet such a despicable Coward, is every man that wants this passive Valour, without which the active must find another name, Rage or Frensy it may be, in some perhaps natural Courage, or sanguineness of temper in others, but true Valor it is not, if it knows not as well to suffer as to do. That mind is truly great, and only that which stands above the power of all extrinsic violence; which keeps its self a distinct principality independent upon the outward man, so that it is not subjected to its fate, that can be free, when the body is fast bound in Misery and Iron, sound and healthy when that groans under torture, and is never more strong and vital, than when that languishes and expires; and this is so desirable, so transcendent a privilege, as

Reason cannot but aspire to: and this is it to which this excellent Precept of Christ advances us when we thus suffer for righteousness sake, our Minds are all light what darkness soever involve our exterior part, and is like Goshen exempt and secure, when that falls under all the Plagues of Egypt.

'AND what reason thus embraces for its self, 'tis not imaginable that it should reject, because 'tis richly clad, that the Race should seem the more tedious, because there is a Crown within view; or that the glorious Rewards our Christianity proposes to our constancy, should be esteemed as Menaces and Threats, Temptations to desert or turn Apostates. No certainly, Reason cannot dispute, and make an Inference so utterly Illogical, but will rather use it as an enforcement of its former Conclusion, establish it the more firm and immovable by having the Basis thus enlarged, having Reward added to Virtue, and Happiness entailed on Duty. If in the competition between two Evils, Reason pronounce the lesser eligible: Much more will she resolve, when the contest is 'twixt good and evil, the greatest Evil and the greatest Good; and choose that Excellence which though Superlative in its self, is more endeared and heightened by Comparison. If I violate my Reason, if I renounce Virtue, though bare and naked, then surely I do it yet more when she is thus accomplisht and adorned; when beautified on purpose to allure the eye and take the Heart. When over and above the positive donation of Happiness, she adds a rescue and release from Misery, and equally obliges by the distant prospects of a Hell and Heaven. So that not only the Gospel promises, but even menaces and threats become a Weapon in the hand of Reason, when she stands upon her guard, and fights for Virtue. If sin present its self as my Protector from a temporal Calamity, Reason will tell me hence, that the profer is insidious, it exposes me to that which is infinitely worse than what it pretends to save me from; and that not only in the former respect of Guilt, but in that of Punishment also. What a cheat is it to keep me out of the Dungeon, and send me to the bottomless Pit, to save me from a temporary Fire, and thereby mark me out as Fuel for eternal Flames; to take me out of their hands who can kill the Body, to put me into his who can destroy both Soul and Body in Hell. Reason tells me I am to abhor the Turpitude and foulness of a Crime; and it tells me too, I am to dread the Misery and Smart of it also. It would not have me wallow in the mire, though it were safe, much less when it is full of Asps and Vipers, which will infallibly sting me to death. It cries out with Joseph, How shall I do this great wickedness, and sin against God? And it cries out with Isaiah too, Who can dwell with everlasting Fire? In a word, by the domestic native light of the Candle of the Lord set up within our breast, it shows the ugliness of Sin; and shows it too by the affrightful dismal blaze of those unquenchable flames it kindles: Thus by the different Arguments of terror and endearment, of love and fear, of interest and duty, Reason asserts this scorned, decried, neglected Precept: Take her as mere Paynim abstracting from the expectation of reward or punishment; or take her as a Proselyte to Christ, contemplating his promises and threats, if there be Honesty or if there be Religion, in either instance the Soul must still conclude, that Affliction is to be chosen rather than Iniquity.

AND if it be reasonable thus to resist even unto blood striving against sin, if Reason blow the Trumpet, sound the Alarm to this solemn War, then surely it prescribes something of Martial discipline to prepare and dispose us for those Combats. No expert General will bring a company of raw untrain'd men into the Field, but will by little bloodless skirmishes instruct them in the manner of the Fight, teach them the ready managery of their Weapons; and of this sort are all those voluntary Self-denials, and lighter austerities which Christianity commends to us, which become necessary not simply for themselves, but as instruments towards a higher end. The Military fame the Romans had in the world was achieved by the exact discipline of their Camps, enuring their Soldiers to labor and hardship. And, as Tacitus tells us, when a long Peace had slackned the reins of discipline, that active Humour, which was wont to be spent on the Enemy, recoil'd, and flew in the face of their Commanders, begat nothing but Mutinies and disorders; and certainly 'twill be the same in our Christian warfare, if we abandon ourselves to Ease and Sloth, never attempt to wrestle with a difficulty, but keep ourselves in the posture the Israelites Camp was in at Moses's descent from the Mount, eating and drinking, and rising up to play; our appetites will grow licentious and insolent, past our control and guidance. If we treat them with such an indulgence as is recorded of David to Adoniah, never say so much as why hast thou done this; 'tis not to be expected but they will Rebel though a Solomon sit in the Throne. For alas, how is it imaginable, that he who never denied himself any the smallest or most trifling pleasure he had a mind to, shall on a sudden deny all in the gross; he who has projected many, but never wav'd one Opportunity of showing his Wit, how shall he find in his heart to become a Fool for Christ. He that has gratified his Palate with all that pretends to be gustful to it, how shall he descend to the bread of Affliction; or he that never tried to miss a Meal, how will he entertain the unwelcome contrariety of not knowing where to get one. He who has never abated anything of the utmost Pomp he could reach, how will he brook the want of necessaries; or from his House seil'd with Cedar, and painted with Vermilion, be content with his Savior's Lot, not to have where to lay his head. In short, how shall he who never could pare off any of the Excrescencies, the mere Vanities and Gaieties of an estate, part with it all; or lay down that life for Christ's sake, from which he never substracted one smallest Pleasure. Suffering is a thing to which the sensitive part of us has an Innate Aversion, and Aversions are not to be subdued at once, but by gentle and easy degrees; and custom must have introduced a second nature, before that original part of our temper will be supplanted. As 'tis therefore highly reasonable for every man to aspire to the Dominion of himself, to keep his Affections within his own Power and Command; and though he have no Interest at all in the greater, enjoy a sovereignty in the lesser World: So in order to that, 'tis as reasonable to discipline and tame them by some voluntary Acts of restraint, like Hannibal, sometimes to pass by that water to which his thirsts do most importunately invite him. To try by little skirmishes what strength and skill he has, before he runs the fatal hazard of a Battle. To deny himself in the lesser instances, that so when the greater come, they may not have the disadvantage of Uncouthness and perfect Strangeness to inhance their Difficulty; and this must certainly be acknowledged reasonable, or else we must condemn almost all the received Rules of human transactions, which generally have this for their ground-work, that men must pass through the first Principles and lowest Rudiments of any Art, before they can arrive at its height. Men serve Apprentiships to Trades, and think not themselves the first day Masters of their craft; we advance in Learning by leisable and slow steps, and skip not from the ABC to the Metaphysics: And certainly the skill of Christian suffering is not the easiest of all Trades or Sciences; but will require some time of Initiation, many repeated Trials and Essays to bring us into an acquaintance with it: To convince our Understandings, and persuade our

Wills, that to lose our lives is to save it; and to be faithful unto the death, is the best way to gain a Crown of life.

IF I should now proceed to every other Precept of Christ, and examine it by the Rules of sober Discourse, we should infallibly find them so rational as befits the Laws of him who is the eternal Reason, but having made these Essays in some of the most opposed Instances, I shall presume these may pass as the Representatives of all the rest; and the acquittal these have received at the Tribunal of Reason virtually involve them all.

AND now since both Conscience and Reason have pronounced the same of Christ's Laws that Pilate did of his Person, that they find in them no fault at all; methinks Judges should have the same privilege that is allowed to private Men, that in the mouth of two every word may be established: But if any man be so scrupulous as not to rest in the sentence of less than a Triumvirate, let him in God's name bring in a Third, and when his vicious Appetites (which were before excepted to as parties) are set aside, he cannot be distracted in his Choice, there being but One more that can possibly be called in, and that is Experience, which being a Judge that himself must create, he cannot fear it should be prejudic'd against him; so that he may entertain full confidence of its Integrity: And no less may he do of its Ability, this being the most infallible of human determinations, such as often corrects the error of Speculation; and shows us the vanity of concluding what is practicable in matter from being demonstrated in the Scheme or Diagram: The guidance of an illiterate Traveler in the way that he has gone, being far more useful to a Stranger in his journey, than the best Maps and most exact Descriptions of Geographers. But then it must be indeed Experience, and not only some slight and transient Essay. We call not him an experienc'd Physician that has had one Patient, or a Lawyer that has pleaded one Cause. Experience is the daughter of Time, and is made up of many successive Trials, as a Habit is of multiplied Acts: And to the Verdict of such an Experience Christ's Precepts will not fear to stand; let a man put himself into a settled course of Obedience to them, abstain so long from all prohibited Commissions, as may wear out the rank Taste wherewith his Palate has been seasoned, and leave it free and disengag'd, and then infallibly he will find such a savor and sweetness in those virtues, that he will wonder how he came to be cheated into an opinion of their being bitter and unsavory; and will have no appetite to return to his Onions and his Garlic after he has thus been fed with Quails and Manna. That this will be the event of this experiment there is all ground of certainty, and when the trial is once made, so irrefragable an evidence will follow, that it will not leave a man the power to doubt: Only in the interim so much belief is requisite, as may let him in to the demonstration, make him set to that Practice from whence he is to reap all this: And if any man be so much a Sceptic, as not to have faith enough to put him on the adventure, I should at once for his conviction and punishment, wish but that he might a while extend the same distrust to Affairs of common life: Let him doubt whether his meat be savory and refuse to eat; whether his clothes be warm and so go naked; whether his house be firm and lie without doors: and when he has a while thus smarted under his own discipline, let him but apply the wisdom he has thus bought to the present instance, and it will unquestionably resolve his scruple; or if he be still too Impatient to attend the ripening of his own Experience, let him make use of other men's. Let him appeal to any who has inur'd his neck to Christ's yoke, and ask him whether it be galling and pinching, or whether it be not easy, nay gracious. Let him ask one who by repeated restraints hath subdued and tamed his natural rage or pride, how he likes the change, and undoubtedly he will tell him, 'tis no less happy than a calm is after the noise and danger of a violent Tempest, or the ease of a broken Imposthume, after the painful gathering and filling of it. Let him ask one who has divested himself of all his sensual sins, whether by their absence he now discern not their necessity, and he will tell him, 'tis but the same the primitive Christians had of those Beasts skins wherein their persecutors had clad them, whose only use was by deforming to fit them for devouring. Let him come to the converted Mammonist, and ask him which he finds the better Treasury, his own Coffer or the poor man's Bowels, and he will be able to assure him, he is become much richer by having less in store. Let him come to the devout Ascetick, and ask him what taste he finds in Daniel's unpleasant bread, Dan. 10. 3. and he will tell him infinitely more than ever he did in Dives delicious fare, that cloy'd and surfeited the flesh, this nourishes and supports the spirit. Nay finally, let him come to him that is actually suffering for righteousness sake, and he will exemplify to him the Beatitude which Christ has pronounced of such: Let him visit Paul and Silas in the prison and he shall hear them singing; Peter and the other Apostles after their stripes and beating, and he shall find them rejoicing: And Stephen amidst the Throng of his murderers and Tempest of their stones, and he shall observe him overlooking them all, and entertaining himself with a more pleasant prospect, seeing the Heavens opened and Jesus standing at the right hand of God; and why should not other men's successes animate our endeavors here? In temporal affairs it seldom misses to do it. The Trophies of Miltiades at Marathon disturbed Themistocles his sleeps, till he had raised unto himself and Country more glorious ones at Salamine: Caesar while he views Alexanders Image upbraids his own slackness with the memory of his conquests, and inspirits himself to great attempts. He that returns with a rich freight from a new-found-Land encourages others to Trade thither also: Nay, even a beggar speeds not well at an Hospitable door, but he is able to send sholes upon the like hopes: Much less does he that has found a treasure need to use his Oration to invite partakers; and why then should those few that have made this more precious discovery be forced to monopolize it, as not being able to draw in partners; yet God knows, thus it is, those that hear of no rarity but they long for it, as David after the waters of Bethlehem, can yet hear the same David cry out, how sweet the Lord is! and yet have no curiosity to taste it: Those whom the very name of Liberty so captivates, that they sacrifice all that is really valuable to that Chimaera; can hear the Apostle speak of the glorious liberty of the sons of God, and yet like hardened Gally-slaves despise the Manumission. Those that hunt after pleasures till the very pursuit become an unsupportable pain, can be told of those rivers of pleasures wherewith God offers to quench their thirst, and yet inflict on themselves the rich man's torment, and deny so much as to dip the tip of their finger toward the cooling their own flames. Good God what strange infatuation is this, that while there is so much of vicious envy in the world, there should be nothing of virtuous emulation: That men's heat and vigor should all spend its self in childish pursuits, and leave them thus cold and stupid to their great and serious concernments. And what remains to him that ponders this Epidemick folly, but to breath out Moses's Wish; O that men were wise; or if that be too hopeless a vote, O that men were not so destructively foolish; that their rashness and Error might be confined to their lower interests: And as fools are treated, be kept from dealing in things of consequence; that they would not govern their Souls by such an absurd kind of managery, as they will not trust with the meanest of their outward concerns. And if this might but be obtained, if this fatal Oscitancy which has benumm'd and frozen them were but cast off, they would then from the report of the good Land be animated to their journey; and rather choose to make the concurrent Testimonies of others arguments to encourage them, than leave them as Hand-writings to appale, or Witnesses to condemn them. And he that shall thus borrow other men's experience with this design of copying it out, and lays it as a foundation for his own, thereby possesses himself of one of the greatest advantages of the communion of Saints; kindles himself at their fire till he grows bright and high as it; combines his flame with theirs, and so increases the Ardors of them both; follows Example till himself grows exemplary, and in one Act receives and gives. But he that thus sets out, must remember, that it is more than the Journey of one day he has to go; he must not think (as I said before) that every little superficial attempt is that Experience which he is in quest of: He that thus fancies will be exposed to a very dangerous deceit, for 'tis sure there is in all habits such a force, that they are not to be dispossessed but by a contrary violence, and therefore he that has been under the power of any vicious custom, enters at first into a state of hostility, has such a tough opposition, as rather finds him Work than Pleasure: Now if he shall upon this first Essay pronounce, he is like to pass a very unjust sentence: Let him fight on a while till he have got some ground, and then though the War afforded him little pleasure, the Victory will yield him much. Every repeated defeat he gives his Adversary will be a new triumph to him, and what the Romans courted as so great a Dignity he may every day enjoy. But then as he advances farther to the completing of his victories, so he does of his Pleasures too: when his irregular appetites are so subdued, that they rarely make insurrection, this is such a state of tranquility as gives him leisure to discern, and enjoy the delights of Christian virtue, and will teach him to reproach the highest Panegyric he ever heard of it as flat and imperfect: so infinitely will he find it exceed the utmost description, that he will say with the Queen of Sheba, the one half was not told him. This is the rich prize which they shall obtain that run the race, but it is not awarded to the first step; and hence it is so many fail of it, that when they find the uneasiness which attends the breaking off a custom; this is such a Giant, a son of Anak, as turns them back discouraged from the Canaan they went to view. But alas this discovers how small a stock of Resolution they carried out with them; for where men set out with heart and appetite, 'tis not such little difficulties that will dismay them: if it be but their sports they are engaged in, it serves to deceive the sense of many uneasinesses, nay often dangers, he that is but in chase of a silly Hare is so keen upon it, that he feels not the weariness of a whole days motion, and if he meet with a hedge in his way will rather leap it with hazard than be diverted from his Game. But 'tis sure in their sins they suffer far greater hardships without discouragement. The puny drunkard is not disheartened by the first qualm, but repeats his excesses till he have overcome his queasiness. The cast Litigant sits not down with one cross verdict, but recommences his suit, passes it through all Courts, and considers not his own pains, so he may either weary or force the other out of his right. The Unclean person falls not out with his sin, how sadly soever it hath macerated him, but steps out of the hot-house into the Stews, and shall men be so indefatigable in their pursuits of Infelicity, buy one Torment with another, and drive on the year in a circle of such woeful Traffick, and shall virtue and pleasure be thought not worth the smallest labor? Can they keep themselves in a perpetual contention with their ease, their reason, and their God; and can they not endure a short combat with a sinful custom, which if it have some uneasiness, yet its both infinitely short of what they have suffered in the contrary compliance, and besides carries its remedy in its hand: For if the Difficulty arise only (as doubtless it does) from the confirm'dness of the Habit, every Act of resistance as it weakens the Habit, so it abates the Difficulty. It is therefore a most unreasonable inference, from the trouble of the first opposition, to conclude the Impossibility of the future; for if the first were but troublesome and not impossible, the second will have yet less of the trouble, and so be yet farther removed from impossibility, and the third than the second, and so on till the difficulty vanish and disappear. And if men would but assume such a moderate courage, as but to keep the field, and not to run away upon the first gun-shot, they would soon find how impotent Assailants they had to deal with, who can never subdue any man by strength, who is not first Emasculated by his own fears. Let us therefore to shun the reproach of so dishonorable a Defeat awake and rouse ourselves, put us in a posture of defense: And Satan, who is as cowardly as anything in the world but we, will as St. James assures us, fly from us. Let us upbraid ourselves with our unseasonable hardness and resolution in our impieties, till we have changed the scene, grow impatient of those servile drudgeries, and ambitious of these honorable adventures. And to animate us the more, let us fix our eyes upon the glorious prize of the victory; and that not only the final and eternal in future Glory; but that Intermediate which offers its self as the earnest of That, the calm and pleasure of a conquering piety. The Roman story tells us that the Flavianists had so possessed their minds with the spoils of Vienna, that they grew insensible of all dangers in the way to it, and even forced their General Antonio to put them upon those hazards, which his wiser conduct would have declined. And why should not our more worthy Hopes excite as great an earnestness? why should not we have as great an Appetite to the pillaging of Satan's Camp, plundering that infernal Magazine of all its Engins both of Mine, and battery, its stores of arms and Ammunition, leaving him naked and defenceless, unable to make any impression upon us? and this he certainly does, who by a steady practice of virtue, comes to discern the contemptibleness of those baits wherewith he allures us. He that seeks only the praise of God, looks upon the applause of men as a blast of Air, which possibly may demolish and destroy a glorious building, but cannot give foundation or Materials to it; and therefore will not seek for, or solicit its unhappy courtships. He who desires to be great only in the Kingdom of Heaven, laughs at the busy Aspirings to secular greatness, and wonders at the force of that enchantment, which engages men with so extreme toil, to climb a tottering pinnacle, where the standing is uneasy, and the fall deadly. He that covets to be rich towards God, and has inur'd his eyes to that divine Splendor which results from the beauty of holiness, is not dazzled with the glittering shine of Gold: considers it as a vein of the same earth he treads on, and despises that absurd partiality whereof the Prophet accuses Idolaters, to employ one part to the meanest uses, and fall down to the other. In a word, he that looks on the eternal things that are not seen, will through those Opticks exactly discern the vanity, and inconsiderableness of all that is visible and temporary; and so will be equally unmoved with the terrors or allurements of the world, and neither frightened nor flatter'd out of his duty. And he that is thus fortified discourages and wearies out his Tempter, deprives him not only of weapons but of heart too, and drives even Satan himself to desperation; and when the Enemy is thus beat out of the field, there remains nothing but to enjoy the victory. When that reluctance and resistance of the corrupt Appetite is so weakened and subdued that a man acts with freedom, he acts with pleasure too. A heart thus set at liberty, alacriously runs the ways of God's commandments: it faring with it as with a Patient that is prescribed exercise for health; who at first perhaps finds lassitude and trouble in it: but when the obstructions are removed, and nature disburthened of those noxious humors that encumbered her, that which was at first his task, becomes his recreation. For we are not to think, that it is any innate harshness in piety that renders the first essays of it unpleasant, that is owing only to the indisposedness of our own Hearts. We are in the Prophets phrase bullocks unaccustomed to the yoke; and if we be galled and fretted by it, 'tis because of our impatient strivings, and irregular motions under it, the yoke is really no heavier than it is afterwards when it is more tamely born: and yet the Ease is very different and unequal. And this teaches us a short way to that felicity we now speak of, to wit, That we compose ourselves to such a submiss and malleable temper, that Christ may come only to govern us as sheep, not to be put to tame us as Tigers, let us withdraw all supplies from our lusts, and not by any secret reserved affection give them clancular aids to maintain their Rebellion, and then they will not be able long to make any vigorous opposition, nor consequently much to disturb the tranquility of those who have thus resigned themselves to the government of the Prince of Peace: and if this cannot be done in such an instant, but that there will be some previous displacencies, and uneasy strugglings, yet even those like the Scorpion, carry Antidote against their stings, when 'tis considered that they are but the pangs of the new-birth, they will become very supportable by the expectation of that Joy to which they tend. An enslaved people think themselves fairly advanced to happiness, if they can get but to make head against their oppressors, though they must expect many sore conflicts and sharp engagements before they become Victors: and certainly 'tis matter of inestimable joy to him, who has been under that sad spiritual slavery to be set thus upon even terms, with his sword in his hand against those, who once had him in such vassalage that he durst not lift up a thought against them; but especially when 'tis remembered with what invincible aids he is backed, such as will ascertain him of victory, if he do not treacherously defeat himself. And surely he must be of a strange phlegmatic temper, whom all these considerations will not enliven, convey into him so much spirit as to make an attempt, and engage him to do that upon so pressing, so great a concern which mere curiosity prompts men daily to in common affairs. And he that is not molded of this cold and stubborn clay, he that has not lost one of the elements of man's composition, and has but a spark of fire in his temper, will surely have some warmth towards this so inviting an experiment: and when he has once made it, I doubt not, it will then join with the suffrages both of reason and conscience in approbation of Christ's Laws, and will with Solomon pronounce of this spiritual wisdom, her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace, Prov. 3. 17.

AND now it must be a strange Violence of impiety, that must break this threefold cord, that shall disannul the joint sentence of all that are competent Judges in this matter. This is not the strength of Samson that brake withs and cords, but of the Legion that pulled in pieces fetters and chains; and though too many men make it their own work; yet certainly 'tis only the Devils Interest: he aspires to the rule and government of us; and to that end nothing can be more contributive than these prejudices we take up against Christ's conduct. A Soul like a Nation, can neither bear two Legislators, nor be without one: And Satan having but that single competitor, our quarrelling with Christ's Laws, is virtually an embracing of his. When we send Christ that rebellious message, Nolumushunc regnare, we say to the other as the Trees to the Bramble, Jud. 9. 14. come thou and reign over us. And to this defiance of the one, and invitation of his opposite, he very nearly approaches, that thus defames Christ's commands as irrational or severe. The traducing of a government being, we know, the immediate praeludium to the casting it off; libelling the forlorn-hope to rebellion. But would God men would soberly weigh whither such a mutinous humor tends; and when our outward Condition has given us so many pregnant and costly Proofs of its ruinous effects, take caution that it make not the like wrack within us: that we do not madly exchange Christ's gentle service, and glorious Rewards; for Satan's cruel bondage, and crueller Wages: the golden chains of the one which do more adorn than tie us; for the Iron, the Adamantine links of the other, which bind us till they deliver us over to those Chains of darkness, where our captivity shall be irreversible. If this so reasonable, so necessary a care may be admitted; 'twill certainly confute the profane sophistry of our Age, silence our impious Cavils, and instead of providing us of the color of an austere Master to excuse our sloth: will engage us to that diligence that shall supersede the use of such shifts, and then we may hope to see Christianity have a Resurrection day again, assume a Body somewhat of solidity and substance; which now wanders about like a ghost or spectre, a shade or vanishing apparition which leaves no footsteps behind it: and to the re-union, O let us all emulously contribute, take up everyone of us his dry Bones and bring it to the Prophet, or rather to Him who spake by that Prophet, to breath upon them, till at last they be cemented and inspirited in active Duty to show forth the Praises of that God who hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light, 1 Pet. 2. 9.

CHAP. VI. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Partial Obedience.

ANOTHER sort of preposterous Considerers there are, by whom the power and force of Christianity is no less obstructed: and those are they that contrive not how they may most comply with it, but how they may best bend it to comport with them. That rebate its edge, or turn it only against such of their corruptions as they have least kindness for. That weigh the Precepts with no other design but that of taking the lightest: those to which their constitutions or other circumstances carry least repugnance; and come unto the Gospel not to as a law, but to a Market; cheapen what they best like, and leave the rest for other customers.

THAT thus it is with, many needs no other proof than the variety visible in the lives of several professors. One man behaves himself modestly, and tells you his religion commands him humility, yet at the same time transgresses the as strict precept of Justice, and will defraud him he bows to. On the contrary another is Just but Insolent, and though his Sentence do not bend, expects his Clients should. That man owns the purity of his religion in visiting the fatherless and widows, yet disclaims it again by not keeping himself unspotted of the world. This person is Abstemious but Uncharitable, will drink no wine but thirsts for blood. He prays much, yet curses more; whilst he is meek but indevout. Now while the Rule is one and the same, how should it come, that men's Practices should so vary, were it not for the unequal Application: did they take it entire, though there might be difference in the degrees, yet sure not in the kinds of their Virtues, and as men would not differ so from one another, so neither would they from themselves, there would be then no such thing as a charitable Drunkard, a devout Oppressor, a chaste Miser; Monsters engendered by this unnatural commixture of light with darkness, but Piety would be uniform and extensive, and bring into captivity every thought unto the obedience of Christ, 2 Cor. 10. 5. And till it be thus, Christianity can never be thought to have atchiev'd any part of its design, which was not aimed against any one single limb, but against the whole body of sin. Alas, 'tis not the lopping off one of the remote members, that will render the remaining ones any whit the less vital, the having a part less to animate, will rather serve to concenter the spirits, and make them more active in the rest: as we see the pruning of Trees, makes them more prolifick. And this effect is very obvious among men: he who has no general dislike to vice, if he repudiate one, 'tis commonly that he may cleave closer to another; and what he defalks from some dry, insipid sin, is but to make up a Benjamin's Mess for some other more gustful. If the Wanton be sober, 'tis odds he thinks excess a Rival to his lust, if the Proud man be liberal, 'tis because covetousness is inglorious; such unevennesses are caused not by an unkindness to any Sin (unless possibly that aversion which natural constitution raises in some) but by a partiality to one or more favourite Vices, for whose better accommodation, and securer reign, not only Virtue, but other Vices also must give place.

AND this 'tis much to be feared will upon a true account, be found to be the sum of many men's piety, something they think they must pay to the importunity of their Religion, which upbraids them so loudly that they are willing to stop its mouth, but yet would do it with as much frugality, and good managery as may be, and so consider what 'tis they can best spare: what refuse Sin which brings them in little of satisfaction, and is perhaps in competition with some other more agreeable: and this they can be content to devote to the slaughter, set it to receive all the impressions of the sword of the spirit; and so use it as a buckler to their darling lusts, to ward off those blows which must else fall heavy on them; but alas this is not to obey, but to delude: to ransom a greater Sin with a less, and to transcribe in this matter the Counsel of Caiaphas: to let one die for the People, that the whole nation Perish not. To make one forlorn guilt a Patriot to the rest, whilst in the tempest which threatened a general shipwreck, the precious wares are preserved, by throwing the less valuable over board.

AND truly that is commonly the event, men are so jolly and triumphant when they have worsted a trivial inconsiderable sin, as if they had defeated the whole army: this poor despicable spoil, is set up as their Trophe, and must they think witness for them both to God and man, that they are good soldiers of Jesus Christ: they can like Saul with full confidence meet the Prophet, and tell him they have fulfilled the Commandment of the Lord, 2 Sam. 15. 13. though Agag and the best cattle, the reigning and fattest sins be spared: and while they are thus secure, their sins will certainly be so also, have no disturbance or disquiet from them, but lie at Ease and rest, feed like Cannibals upon their own kind, be nourished by the carcasses of those unlucky vices, on whom the exterminating lot happened to fall: and by that means grow to a prodigious bulk and corpulency. And upon these terms Satan himself will allow us to mortify some sins, nay will himself cast the first stone at them: and like a rooking gamester purposely lose these petty stakes, that he may afterwards sweep the board.

FOR if men should give themselves up universally to all sorts of Ill, if they should set themselves in a total opposition to all the documents of their profession, he would lose one of his most useful engins; there could be no such thing as a false delusive hope: they might possibly by obstinacy harden, or by diversion gag Conscience, but they could not bribe and corrupt it, make it sit down well pleased and satisfied with its self. For when the threats against disobedience shall occur to the mind of one who has in all instances disobey'd, 'tis impossible he should find any salve, any way of Evading the Threats, they make so directly at him: but he who can allege for himself that he obeys in some things, confronts that to all Objections, and resolves he is not in the list of the disobedient: One or two such comfortable instances are as mighty; as God promise'd the Israelites should be, Deut. 32. 30. one able to chase a thousand, and two to put ten thousand to flight; all fears and misgiving thoughts are dissipated and fled before them: and as once the French King in his return to the numerous swelling titles of the Spaniard, thought the bare repetition of France, France, France, was a full balance to them all; so when whole files of great and scandalous Crimes present themselves, one single virtue is thought a sufficient counterpoize. He whose Conscience upbraids him with all Profaneness towards God, and in Sobriety towards himself: yet if he can but answer that he is just to his neighbor, he thinks he has quit scores, and fears no farther reckonings: he who is immersed in all the filthiness both of flesh and spirit, has abandoned his Mind to pride and envy, his Body to lust and intemperance; and so sacrificed both those to Devils: yet if he cast but some grains of this estate upon the Altar; devote any small part of that to God, for the uses of Piety or Charity; he concludes that Incense will send up a Cloud thick enough, to obscure the other from the Eyes of Divine Justice, and yield so sweet a savor as will perfume him in spite of all that Noisomness: so extending old Tobits words beyond his meaning, that alms, though alone, delivereth from death, and cleanseth from all sin. He who is deep in sacrilege and rebellion, that can daringly swallow repeated deliberate perjuries; yet if he can get but the demure tenderness, to fear a sudden oath, he is Chymist enough to extract a confidence out of that fear, and presumes that formal Civility to God's name, shall expiate all the real Violations and Contempts of him: and while men make such use of their partial peecemeal obedience, it can never be the Devils interest to disturb them in it, to awake them out of their pleasant dream, or to exact of them to deposit those poor insignificant remains of their Christianity, which serve only to make them more Supine, not more Safe.

NAY indeed his affairs are so stated, that to some he can and does, and without danger allow a yet far greater indulgence, he can permit them to bid much fairer than this for Heaven, and yet knows the purchase is far from being made; he can see them cashier not someone single sin, but whole troops together, and yet not fear the sinking of his Cause: He can trust them so far, that as the young man in the Gospel, they may be pronounced, Not far from the Kingdom of God: yet as long as there is but one unmortified Lust, that can send them away sad from Christ, his tenure is firm enough. Herod may hear John the Baptist gladly, nay do many things upon it, yet let him but keep Herodias, and she will soon be able to secure both herself and Satan against the danger of that Competition. This is indeed his main advantage that he can hold fast by the smallest thread; and whereas to our bliss a conspiracy and union of all Virtues is required; our ruin can spring from any one solitary Crime: many rounds make that Ladder wherewith we must scale heaven: whereas one step serves to precipitate us into the Abyss; so sadly verifying the Poetical Axiom, Facilis descensus Averni. In sum, while there is but any one single sin indulged to: that is the Devils tedder; and though it should be imagined so loose, as to give men scope to range over all other sorts of Virtues, to taste the sweet and feed liberally on them; yet still the beast is in the power of him who has fixed the line, not only to be finally led away to slaughter, but also to have the length shortened, and be either put out of the reach, or quite removed from the view of those pleasant pastures.

FOR though the security raised by such an ununiform piety is in many so exactly apportioned to Satan's interest, that he has no cause to wish the change of his tenure; yet where the circumstances are such, as will make it useful, he can easily twist his thread into a Cable. When he thinks one Monarch Lust too mild a regiment, he can set up an Athenian Tyranny, or which is yet worse, let in the whole populacy of Sin upon the Soul, which like the Egyptian Locusts shall overrun and devour it, not leave any green thing on the ground, and that this is in his power we have too much reason to conclude. He is we know a cunning sophister, and if he has abused us so far as to impose one sin upon us, he may thence very regularly deduce many more, as one false Premise admitted, may be improved into thousands of false Conclusions. Indeed supposing a man resolute to adhere to one sin, he may with very good Logic persuade him to multitudes of others. There are but two Objections usually made to any Temptation; either the offense, or the danger; and these are usually objectable to one sin as well as to another; so that this dilemma readily offers its self: either it is reasonable to buy a pleasure at that price, or it is not: If it be, then contrive that the crime be pleasant, and that brings its dispensation with it: If it be not, then why doest thou live in this one sin in despite of both guilt and punishment; the later part of the Dilemma 'tis no part of Satan's business to press, but the former he has too much advantage of pursuing successfully; if he can but dress up a temptation to look invitingly, the business is done. So ridiculous a thing is an uneven Piety, that it even laughs itself out of countenance, and wants only temptation to become uniform Vice. How absurdly looks it, to see a man run away with Joseph from the embraces of his Mistress, and yet with full as great a speed accompany Gehazi in the pursuit of a bribe; and how obvious is it to conclude that the former assault was improsperous only because not managed with the right weapon; that he might have been hir'd that would not be woed? What a mockery is it for a man to be zealous for God, and rebellious against his King? as in the reverse, for a man to be true to his King, and a rebel to his God: and who can but think, that had either of the averted Crimes been cookt to their Palats, they might have changed Messes. Indeed 'tis not imaginable by what rules of discourse, he that embraces one sin should reject another: if it be done only upon fancy and humor, as the repulst vice will have reason to complain of great partiality, when as bad as its self is received and cherished; so it points out a way to attacque him more prosperously: let it shape its self to the fancy, and sure Satan, who can transform himself to an Angel of light, can soon work that easy change: let the younger Brother get on the clothes of the favourite Esau, transform its self into the shape and interest of the darling sin, and it need not doubt of a free admission. But all this while to pretend conscience for such an abstinence, is of all other pleas the most absurd, for why should he scruple at one, that abandons himself to another. As S. James argues concerning the guilt, so may we for the act of Sin: He that said do not commit adultery, said also do not kill; and 'tis abusive mockery, the Soldiers Ave Rex, to bow to his authority in the one, and resist it in the other. Thus unhappy is the case of him who entertains one sin, his enclosure is broken down, and he's a common for all: he is left destitute of a reply to any temptation, and like a bashful person will be in danger of yielding, because he is ashamed to deny: and this I doubt not, many have found experimentally true, some sins have been committed not so much upon the force of inclination, as to be consentaneous to themselves, to silence the upbraidings of their understandings for acting so unevenly, it being impossible to give a reasonable account, why this and not that, or that; for when by one bold willful sin a man entered into a state of hostility with God, 'tis not a tenderness in all others will make up the breach: and then they think the rule of known enemies takes place, where all civilities are disclaim'd, and the quarrel managed to the most advantage. The resolved Adulterer could perhaps without much difficulty be just, but when he considers that that one Helena of his, will certainly make a war, he thinks 'tis an impertinent niceness to lose a good prize, or dismiss his covetousness while he resolves to retain his lust. The incorrigible drunkard could perchance easily enough be chaste, but when he remembers that drunkenness excludeshim from the Kingdom of Heaven: having made that sale of his eternal inheritance, he thinks 'tis but good husbandry to get as much as he can for it: So treacherous a guest is any one Sin admitted, and lodged in the heart, it despoils it of all its armor of defense, leaves it nothing wherewith to guard its self against any assailant; and be it never so small a one, 'tis like those little thieves which being put in at the window set the doors open to all the rest.

BUT perhaps this danger may be thought in some degree warded by the natural temper and constitution of men, which necessarily renders them unapt to contradictory vices, and so will secure them at least from so many as are disagreeable to their Temper: but if this should be granted, yet it confessedly leaves them open to all others, and that were certainly bad enough: he that is as wicked, as his complexion cannot only incline, but permit him to be, will not want much of the utmost number of sins: but whatever we can suppose that to strike off from the tale; yet in the second place, 'tis very much to be feared, that will defalk nothing of the weight; he that sins to the height of his appetite, perhaps power, shall he be ever the more innocent because there were some nauseated sins which he had not Self denial enough to commit. God absolves us in proportion to the rectitude of our Wills, not the niceness of our Complexions: he that wills to pursue whatever he can find gustful, how impious soever; shall it be virtue in him that some Sins are unsavory and disagreeing to his Palate; if it should, there may so many extrinsic things be by Analogy brought in, either to swell or abate the accounts of our sin, that we shall be much to seek in the estimate of it.

BUT in the third place, even these very aversions are no infallible preservative, for if they happen to be more moderate and remiss, than the love of some other sin; that predominant inclination will subdue those dislikes, when ever its interest is to be served, by those otherwise not gustful commissions. There is nothing more ordinary than to see one appetite pursued to the violation of another. A man perhaps hates drunkenness, not only as a bestial, but uneasy vice; yet if his love to Gain exceed his dislike to that; when that is requisite to make up the price of a good bargain, that aversion must stoop, and give way. A man despises swearing, as an insipid impertinent Sin, yet if he set any great value upon being in the mode, and complying with the gentile Dialect, that will soon debase him to what he so much contemned: and truly there is scarce any other account to be given of that great and foolish sin. But in no other instance is this so notoriously visible as in that of duelling. I need not single out any one man's particular inclination, the nature of mankind doth certainly avert both killing and being killed: yet when that Phantasm, that Chimera honor, has once possessed the mind, no reluctance of humanity is able to make head against it: but it commands as uncontroul'dly, as the Centurion in the Gospel, says to this man go and he goes, to another come and he comes: nay as Tyrannically as the great Cham of Tartary, who as an Essay of his Sovereignty commands whole troops to ride down precipices; nay these Aversions are not only thus violently subdued by some foreign lust, but are many times destroyed even by force of that very vicious principle which gave them birth: for we mistake if we think they are always virtuous, or so much as innocently founded; Vice is often at civil wars with its self; and the vehement inclination to one, engenders a displacency to another; but yet such a riddle is this mystery of Iniquity, that upon the very same basis is built both the abhorrence and commission of the same Sin. For example, a Proud man as much hates to fawn and flatter others, as he loves to be flatter'd himself; yet let his pride but once work the other way, and set him upon an ambitious project, then all the mean condescensions imaginable are with ease digested, he can crouch and prostrate, and as the Psalmist speaks, fall down and humble himself, that by that descent he may rebound to the height he aims at: but still pride is the common cause of these so distant effects. In like manner the Riotous Prodigal detests covetousness, looks upon it as so sordid and base, that he brands even prudent frugality as approaching too near it; yet let him but once find the springs to grow dry which should feed his luxury; when he feels his Riot begins to exhaust and prey upon its self, then even that despised Covetousness shall be called in to its aid, to dig metal for the Furnace to melt, and so by a strange Antiperistasis, prodigality shall beget rapine. Thus unhappily prolifick is every Sin, that it carries in its bowels the seed and principle even of those that seem the most Heterogeneous; and then how shall a man that has admitted but any one such teeming lust be secured that it shall not thus propagate, till his Soul become a mere desert, filled with all sorts of wild and noxious creatures.

THERE is but one hope imaginable to interpose, and that is that God's grace shall prevent this exorbitant growth of impiety in him, and I acknowledge that is sufficient to do it, where it may have its kindly operation; but where it has so, it will uniformly suppress all sin, and therefore where any one continues in Force and Vigour, 'tis manifest that operation of Grace is obstructed, and such a man I should desire soberly to consider what assurance he has, that he who has so evacuated God's grace in one instance, shall not do so in another? If in spite of that grace he can be lustful, why shall he not be as able to resist it in favor of Drunkenness, Sacrilege, Rebellion, or any other crime to which he shall at any time have appetite. Can he imagine that God sends forth an irresistible strength against some sins, whilst in others he permits men a power of repelling his Grace? That were to transcribe the Syrians absurd Phansie, that he is a God of the hills and not of the valleys: No certainly, he who has his own unhappy experience to attest the possibility of frustrating the Divine succors in one particular, has too sure grounds to infer the like in others. Nay alas, it does not only infer it by way of argument and deduction, but it is very apt to produce it by way of cause and efficiency: We gain a readiness to anything by custom and assuefaction, and he who has habitually opposed Grace in the defense of a Lust, has delivered himself from that modesty which makes the first defiance uneasy, and so runs on with ease and boldness to future resistance. It faring with men in this violation of God's grace as it does in that of his Patrimony, the first Sacrilege is looked on with some horror, and men are fain to devise arguments and colors to delude their reluctant Consciencs; but when they have once made the breach, their scrupulosity soon retires; one draught of that impious gain, has such a stupefying effect, that they can without check swallow on, till the Sin flame so fiercely, that nothing but mere want of Matter can extinguish it. But admit it were possible for a man to be secured of his own compliance with some parts of restraining grace whilst he impugnes it in others, yet who shall ascertain him of that grace? It being God's, implies 'tis not in our power, he may surely do what he will with his own, and though his promise has made a sure entail of it to all those, who humbly seek and diligently use it: yet it nowhere engages that it shall be the portion of any other; much less that it shall importunately and endlessly renew its assaults on those who have often repulst and put it to flight: In that case God's resolution concerning the old world becomes applicable, My spirit shall not always strive with man; and Christ who forbids us to cast our pearls before swine, will certainly never prostitute what is infinitely more precious, his Grace to those, who have so long trampled it under their feet; and so those must be concluded to have done, who have persevered in any one sin: for Grace is uniformly opposite to all, and therefore the cleaving to any is defiance and affront to it. But we need not the help of inferences and deduction, the threats of God are express in this matter: The Talent is decreed to be taken from the unprofitable servant, who has not employed it to the proper use, and such infallibly is every man who has not actuated the Grace given him to the subduing of every reigning sin; and the reprobate mind mentioned in Scripture as the most dismal of all Plagues, the 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 which yields not to the melting and the purging force of Fire, and therefore does consign to that of Hell, is founded upon the voluntary rejection of God in particular instances, Rom. 1. How then can he, that in any one single thing so rejects him, assure himself that shall not be the event of it: That he who would not have Christ rule entirely in his heart, shall at once be put out of his Government and protection: have all those spiritual aids withdrawn, which should either assist him to good, or fortify him against ill; and like an outlaw'd person be exposed to the outrage of all that will assault him.

AND now would God this might be sadly pondered, that men would not be their own Sirens, and entertain themselves with those deceitful melodies, which will end in howlings and gnashings of teeth; that they would not think their having some few virtues, and but some few vices will serve to satisfy the design, or procure them the rewards of their Christianity: for if they should continue in this posture, and not be tempted to grow worse, they may certainly conclude 'tis because Satan finds they need not. And can they be proud of that Virtue which the Devil himself will allow them? And think themselves good enough when they are as bad as he wishes them? But even in this they have no other tenure than his Will. When he pleases for his interest▪ or even for his divertisement and recreation he may hurry them to all that is most enormous; convert their Hypocrisy to profaneness, their partial Piety to universal Ungodliness; they have nothing to interpose in their own Defense, not so much as a reasonable Argument to oppose to him, they have made a voluntary sale of themselves for one or more beloved sin, and now as his vassals he may impose on them what others he pleases: and by their doting affection to their Rachel take advantage also to obtrude the despised Leah upon them. And how wretched, how deplorable is this state? What a Piety is this that we must owe to the Devil, while we can be no better than he will let us?

YET this is without Hyperbole, the condition of every man that is not sincerely uniformly Christian; every indulged sin gives Satan livery and seisin of his heart, and a power to dispose of it as he please. I know men are apt to flatter themselves with other hopes, and think that those obediences they pay to God shall like a pre-engagement disannul all after contracts made by guilt, and put them into the possession of Him who is able to bind that strong man. But God will not be accessory to such a fraud, even towards the Devil while they keep the price, enjoy that pleasure or profit wherewith he bought them, God will never interpose to defeat him of his purchase.

AND as God will not thus forcibly wrest them out of his hands, much less will he descend to a capitulation and composition with him. God is a jealous God, and what jealous husband did ever by compact divide his right with the Adulterer. Where he finds a persevering disloyalty he gives a bill of divorce and disclaims his relation. Yet so besotted are men, as to hope God will ratify that alienation they have made of one part of their heart, and contentedly enjoy the rest; and as competitors use sometimes to do, share with his Rival. But alas that immortal quarrel will not be thus taken up, the difference between these irreconcilable Antagonists will not be so compromised. God disdains such a Treaty, nor will ever come so much as to an interview with his enemy, within the lists and recesses of one Heart. And while men labor such an accord, they are but combining with Satan against God and their own Souls: he knows well that while he holds any part, God will have none, and so the whole falls to him, and then he may very safely be modest, and demand but moderately, and by that seeming difference and yielding, gain more than by all his most eager contendings. I suppose every man will disown the having this ridiculous design of compounding the strife between Heaven and Hell; but certainly it is the natural interpretation of such partial obediences, when two Litigants contend for something which I have in my keeping, if I divide it between them, is it not obvious to conclude I desire to compose the dispute and satisfy both parties, and is not this the very case here? 'Tis true indeed, it carries a very absurd sound, but then how more absurd is it for men to act at such a rate, that when 'tis represented to them in the truest colors, themselves are ashamed to own what they have done? And this calls loudly upon them to put themselves out of the lash of their own discipline: to recover such an innocence that they may not be forced with David to sentence themselves, when that their crimes appear in the light disguise of a Parable.

AND this indeed is the only proper use of all these considerations, the danger and folly are as unuseful as unpleasant speculations, unless it be in order to the reforming that wherein both are founded. Let men consider themselves, as engaged in those wild projects which even themselves look on with scorn; as ensnar'd in that unhappy contract which has rendered them part of the Devils possession, and contrive how they may obliterate that reproach, and disentangle their Mortgag'd Souls.

AND for this there is but one way imaginable, and that is by quitting their hands of that which they took as the valuable consideration in that mad bargain; restoring Satan's coin to him, not only principal but use also: casting away the main sin and all the little appendages, which like offesets have shot out from that root; retaining nothing that has his mark and impress upon it, that so he may not pretend to anything of theirs by right of barter or exchange. This, and this only is the way to disseise him of his Estate, to cancel those fatal Indentures which bound them to him, and till this be done, as long as they keep any part of his wages of iniquity, his title remains in full force, they are still his servants, his vassals.

EVEN that redemption of Christ has no efficacy towards the enfranchizing of such, for though it proclaim a universal Jubilee, yet it forces liberty upon none, he that will nail his Ear to the door-post and defy a manumission, may continue his slavish state still, and indeed though Christ's death was designed to rescue us from the power of Satan; yet the first essay of that rescue was to redeem us from our vain conversation: And where that is not done, which is so essentially fundamental to all the rest, 'tis not possible any other part of that Redemption should be achiev'd, unless we will confound the order of Nature as well as Grace, and make the consequent precede the antecedent.

LET no man therefore upon any vain hopes delay the one only expedient to his security, but pay back the earnest-penny he has received from Satan, fling away his sin, how pleasant or profitable soever, with the greatest Abhorrence, as knowing 'tis the price of blood, and that not only his Savior's, but his own too; and this immediately, lest the forfeiture be irreversible. We know the danger of lapsing time in case of Mortgage, but here our danger is greater, because the time is so uncertain, for though God had nothing else to do in the whole transaction ('twas wholly our own work) yet 'tis he that assigns the time of forfeiture: he alone knows how far we may go in sin, before we pass the possibility of a retreat; how long he will be provoked before he suffer his whole displeasure to arise; and how many repellings of his Grace, and quenchings of his Spirit they are to which his desertions are apportion'd. Pharaoh's heart was hardened by God after the Eighth resistance, and we have no security but ours may be sooner: yet if that should be taken as the standing measure, how dreadful an abode would it make to many of us? Who is there that has espoused any one beloved sin, that has not much oftener repeated the acts of it, everyone of which is a resistance and a contumacy against God? Who is there that has not done it against so many express warnings and loud calls of God in his own Conscience, which renders it yet a fuller parallel, and 'tis to be feared, too many agree with it even in the last and highest circumstance, that of the Plagues too, by an obstinate persisting after so many Judgments sent to mollify and reclaim them; and then where the premises are the same, 'tis too likely the conclusion may be so also.

I SHALL not wish any Person so strictly to apply this case, as to conclude, that he is already in this state, but I should wish all men would apply it so far, as to infer how possible, nay how probable it is, that the very next resistance shall put them in it. 'Tis not Pharaohs being a Heathen and they Christians that will give them any security; it being no part of the Gospel-Covenant, that men shall be ever the longer allowed to trample upon Grace. All the difference it makes is rather on the other side; the contempts are enhans'd to a higher guilt, and consequently, the fewer acts may now serve to fill up the measure. And if their experience testify to them, that in their particular God has used a greater long suffering, than he has given any grounds to expect, if the guilt of their Consciences testify that they have committed many more acts; and yet some remaining tendernesses and regrets witness also, that they are not yet given up to an utter hardness and obduration, O let them not presume themselves safe, because they are not utterly desperate; but lay their hearts open to be stamped and imprest by grace, before they grow utterly inflexible; timely consider what is the design of this long animity, and without anymore strugglings and resistance suffer it to attain its aim and lead them to repentance.

FOR though their Souls be not yet wholly petrified, yet how know they in what an instant that unhappy Metamorphosis may be wrought, or if it should not be so sudden, yet 'tis certain every act of sin makes gradual approaches towards it: so that if God should not inflict it by way of punishment, yet the mere force of Habit would produce it by way of natural efficacy: And to be convinced of this, I should require no more, but that men would reflect, and see what effects it has already wrought, how far it has advanced towards that fatal point. Let them send their thoughts back through every stage and period of their sin, and observe whether as that has grown, so their tenderness and reluctance of Conscience has not abated and decreas'd: Let them but recollect what regrets and disquiets they had, when they ventured upon the first unlawful commission, and compare it with their present, and I doubt not they will discern a great inequality; they will find that every act of sin hath allayed somewhat of the sharpness of those pangs, and proportionably to the frequency of the repetition they approach toward insensible: and then let him whose older Habit has multiplied those Acts, sadly consider how few steps he has to the end of his unhappy journey, though no extrinsic concurrent should hasten his pace. But when God's desertion shall, as for ought he knows, it may the next minute supervene: that as a full and violent Wind drives him in an instant, not to the Harbour, but on the Rock where he will be irrecoverably split.

NOR let any man fortify himself against these terrors, by hoping that his one single (perhaps small) sin shall not have this destructive force; for if it be willful it carries in it that which is properly the malignity of all sin, to wit, a resistance and opposition against God, and this is so mortal a Venome, that the least Dose of it is deadly, as a man may as certainly be poisoned by a dram of Arsenick, as with the largest draught.

THE more natural inference lies the other way, if it be but a single or petty sin, 'tis so much the easier to part with; he that is bound with a strong Cable, or with a multitude of lesser Cords, may pretend some necessity of his Captivity from the strength of his bonds; but he that is tied with one slender string, such as one resolute struggle would be sure to break: he is prisoner only to his own sloth or humor, and who will pity his thralldom, where 'tis so apparently his choice? Do not therefore say my sin is inconsiderable and therefore I need not relinquish it, but my sin is inconsiderable therefore I need not keep it. So slight a pleasure I may part with and find no miss: this peddling profit I may resign and 'twill be no breach in my Estate. And if Christ require a renunciation of those sins which are as the Hand and Eye, shall I scruple to deposit those which are but as the Hair or Nails.

NAY he may yet argue higher, and from the smallness of the sin deduce the enhancement of the Guilt: great acquisitions carry some temptation in their face, but despicable prizes do rather avert than tempt. 'Twas the sign of a common harlot to be hired with a Kid, Gen. 38. and sure he must be of a strange prostitute Soul, that can adulterate for such low trivial wages. To dishonor God, though the whole world were to be acquired by it, were great impiety, but to do it for handfuls of Barley and pieces of Bread, Ezek. 13. 19. himself brands as a yet higher pitch. And sure it argues a very light esteem of God, when one poor contemptible lust shall be able to overpoize him in our hearts.

NOR is the folly less than the profaneness, when there is but one Jonah to be cast over-board, 'tis the greater madness to hazard a wrack; and let such a man pretend what he pleases in extenuation of his sin, make that appear never so minute and despicable, yet 'tis apparent all the love which other men scatter and distribute upon several, he has united and centred in this one lust. The most doting affection when it is summed up can amount to no more than this, that it makes a man expose himself to the greatest pain, the greatest loss for the thing beloved. And this is most visible here, Hell is as certainly acquired, and Heaven as certainly forfeited by one sin as many; and then though there may be odds in other respects, yet what is there in this, between this more modest and the most licentious Sinner, but that the former puts the same value upon one, that the other does upon many sins, and sells his Soul so much the cheaper.

AND now would God such men would review their bargain, soberly consider what there is in this Idoliz'd sin of theirs, which should exact such costly sacrifices. Let him whose long intimacy and experience has given him access to its most secret recesses, that has rifled its bowels, and knows the utmost whether of pleasure or profit that lies there concealed. Let him I say, that is thus qualified for it, make an exact inventory of its wealth, and then let him compare it with what he is to pay for it; weigh its flat and momentary Pleasures, with those most transcending and perpetual Joys which are at God's right hand; its base and perishing commodities, with those unfailing treasures in the Heaven; and then judge of his purchase in respect of that part of his prize: And if that be not convincement enough, let him weigh the other also; those sad pains which are too intolerable to be suffered, and yet so eternal, that they can never cease to be suffered, and think whether that be not too dear a rate for that pleasure, whose gust is so little, and whose duration is less: or what profit he will have in the revenue of his sin, that Gold and Silver which will finally eat his flesh as it were fire, Ia. 5. 3. and prove the unhappy fuel of his flames.

FROM all these premisses, certainly Reason and Religion do equally infer the same conclusion, to wit, that men should not tolerate themselves one minute in any known sin of how small a size soever it be; nor so impertinently betray their Souls to ruin for that which they call light and trivial; and is so indeed in respect of the acquest, but overwhelmingly ponderous in regard of the effects and pernicious consequents. And O that men's practices might evince them to have made this just deduction, that those who have in many things preserved an innocence, would not be so ill husbands as to forfeit all the advantage of that Care for want of extending it a little farther, nor suffer the whiter parts of their Soul to be discolour'd or tinted by the reflection of one crimson sin; but rather let their tears wash that into a whiteness, that they may be uniform and of a piece. For though Jacob clad his darling Joseph in a party-color'd garment; yet God owns none either for favourite Son, or so much as Servant that he finds so arrayed. The followers of the Lamb are all clad in white, and in that attire we must be sure to put ourselves if we mean to go in with him to the marriage. And since the Gospel is the invitation to that feast, let none imagine he has complied with it till he have thus fitted himself: till then he affronts and baffles his Christianity, sends it away empty without its errand; nay, which is worse prostitutes and profanes it, makes it serve only for a Gourd, that he may sit under the shadow of it, and commit his sins the more undisturbed; but let him remember that he is all this while breeding that worm, which will smite this Gourd, and leave him unsheltred to that scorching wrath of God, which will make the improvement of Jonah's passionate Wish, that God would take away his life, his most rational Desire; render not Death only, but Annihilation also, as eligible as it will be impossible.

CHAP. VII. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Mistakes concerning Repentance.

ANOTHER dangerous Underminer of Christian Practice is the many affected mistakes in the business of Repentance. Men look upon that as the grand recipe of the Gospel, an infallible Catholicon against all their spiritual maladies; and so far they judge right, for so indeed it is. But when they proceed to compound this sovereign Medicine for their own use, they do it most deceitfully; leave out the principal and most operative ingredients: and by being such ill Apothecaries defame the Gospel as the Dispensatory, and Christ as the Physician, and likewise ruin themselves as the Patients. But of those who make this imperfect and Defective composition, all do it not alike; some leave out one part, some another, and some so many that they retain nothing of its substance and reality. Eat out all the heart and virtue of it, and leave only an empty shell, the gilding as it were of the Pill, the Form and mere outside of Repentance.

IN this later rank I place those who suffer repentance to pass no farther than their Frontiers, and Outworks; assign it its quarters in the superficies of the man, the Face, or Tongue, or Gesture; but if it attempt to penetrate any deeper, if it send but one serious thought to alarm the heart, then like the Edomites against Israel, Num. 20. all the forces are mustered to impede its passage; such formal Penitents as these all ages have producit. Christ tells of those who disfigured their faces, Mat. 6. 16. put on as it were a vizard only to act this part: and Isaiah 58. 5. long before describes them, by the bowing down the head like a bull-rush, and certainly the race of them is not worn out in our days; a demure or rather a lugubrious look, a sad or whining tone, makes up, 'tis to be feared, the sum of many men's Humiliations. Nay as the world has of late gone, that alone were but a modest pretence: such theatrical forms stickle hard for the prize, not of that one part but of all religion: a distorted countenance is made the Mark of an upright heart, and none is thought to speak the Language of Canaan, that dresses it not in an uncooth sound: and then what wonder is it that they are impatient others should worship God, as David invites, in the beauty, while themselves choose to do it in the Deformity of holiness.

BUT others make somewhat a fairer advance towards repentance, by taking in some of those things which are indeed its necessary concomitants; of this kind is in the first place confession of Sin: and this after some sort is stuck at by few; no man who hath not herded himself with the worst sort of Fanatics, imagines himself sinless, or pretends to be thought so by others, but will very readily acknowledge to all the world that he is a sinner: and as to men, so especially and more solemnly to God. Every man that but offers at praying at all, thinks confession a necessary Branch of his devotion: all public forms have ever carried that in the front, as supposing it the most principal, universal, and daily requisite to the lapsing state of human corruption: And perhaps 'tis the general innate persuasion of this, that hath secured that part of our Liturgy, from those impertinent cavils, which have particularly aimed at most other members of it. And I suppose this is as frequent in the Closet as in the Church: the only fear is, that there it is as loose and general too: that those private and particular guilts which are neither fit nor possible to be distinctly inserted in public, do many times lose their place even in private Confessions also. The shortness and the ease of general forms being very likely to recommend them to those whose numerous sins threaten too great a length, and whose confused snarl'd consciences render it difficult, thus to pull out thread by thread: but where Sins are thus molded up in a lump, they will like great masses of Pills or confections keep the more undecay'd, retain more of their strength and vigor. So that such Confessions are very indulgent to Satan's interest, who fears not the impressions that can be made upon him, while his body remains entire: the great execution then beginning when 'tis broken and scattered, and each sin is singled out for a particular pursuit: and where that is not attempted, the war can never be successful, nor thought in earnest.

BUT suppose this be done; and by exact enumeration, each sin is parted from its fellows, as when a conqueror pursues the flying troops of routed Enemies: yet if this be all, if quarter be allowed, and any mercy given, no real prize is gained by this achievement. He who recounts his sins with milder purpose towards them than utter excision, he makes no approach towards the essential part of Repentance. He may bring out large Catalogues of his sins, and call them confessions; but he may better express his own sense, if he term them rather inventories of his goods, for such 'tis apparent he reckons them, whilst he resolves to keep them. Indeed there is not a more absurd piece of Pageantry, than these formal Confessions, and such as shows how little, God is considered in his great Attribute the searcher of hearts. 'Tis certain no man would hope to atone an offended superior, by a submissive acknowledgment of his fault, did he know that his purpose of reiterating it were discerned: and what a tacit blasphemy is it then, to treat God at such a rate as presumes him as deceivable as a poor Mortal; and sure this were a strange Ingredient in repentance. We look on it as a high pitch of impiety boastingly to avow our sins, and it deserves to be considered whether this kind of confessing them have not some affinity with it. Should I tell a man I have injured and provoked you thus and thus, and so I resolve to do again at the next opportunity: I refer it to common construction, whether this were not to justify, not retract the unkindness. Now what

I suppose thus said to man, is in the secret purpose of our heart, no less articulately spoken to God, who needs not our words to discern our meaning. Therefore whoever intends to repeat his sins, nay does not seriously intend to forsake them, does in truth maintain and defend his vicious practice, how loudly soever his Tongue accuses it. And such clamors are but like the feigned Quarrels of combined cheats, in order to delude some third person. But alas, the scene is here unluckily laid, for God will not be mock'd, nor will the Mercy promise'd to him that confesseth and forsaketh, ever reach him that confesseth and retaineth. Confession is no farther acceptable than as it either flows from, or tends to beget an abhorrence of Sin, and abstracted from those qualifications it becomes loathsome and distasteful to God. Alas, can we think our Historical vein so pleasant, that he shall be delighted with the narrative of those crimes, whose perpetration he detested. Can it be Incense in his nostrils, to have our Dunghils displayed? or can his pure eyes be gratified with such polluted prospects? True indeed, he gladly descends to all this as a Physician; nauseats not our foulest ulcers, when we bring them for cure: but when like beggars we make them openly our form of address, and dread nothing more than their healing; certainly their View will only excite his indignation, not his pity. And this, 'tis to be feared abodes sadly to many of us, 'tis our vulgar Objection to the Romanist, that they make their confessions contributive rather to their confidence than to their reformation: what their share is in that guilt, I shall not here examine, but I may too truly pronounce they have not enclos'd it, that black circle of Sin and confess, Confess and sin, encompasses as well Protestants as Papists; if possibly not quite so many, the cause 'tis doubtful is (what we need not boast) not that More of us confess aright, but that Fewer confess at all. But of those that do, if we may but cross, examine, and interrogate their actions against their words, these will soon confess (and that not auricularly, but in a loud and audible voice) the invalidity of their solemnest Confessions. When we see a man that yesterday kept a Humiliation, today trampling on the necks, invading the possessions of his Brethren, we need no other proof how vainly and unprofitably, if not how hypocritically and provokingly, he confessed his Pride, or Covetousness; and the like we may infer when we see any man persevere in any gross willful sin. And of such, God knows there are such multitudes, as will give us instances more than enough, how wide a difference there is, between a mere Confitent & a true Penitent.

BUT in the next place, a passionate regret at Sin, a grief and sadness at its Memory, more speciously pretends to enter us into God's roll of Mourners: Sorrow has (in vulgar acceptance) so engrost the whole notion of repentance, that men are apt to secure themselves, that the Wind of a penitential Sigh is so mighty, as will blow away the guilt of the most mountainous Sin: that if they have but wept a little upon their crimes, they have quite extinguished the wrath they kindled: but alas these are vain dreams, God who delights not to grieve the children of men, does not project for our sorrow, but our innocence; and would never have invited us to the one, but as an expedient to the other. 'Tis natural even to mere Animals to shun that by which they have smarted, and therefore sorrow for sin is a very proper means to avert our appetite from it: but if we have learnt the unhappy skill of separating the effect from the cause, if our Grief abate not our Love; if we can cast kind looks at our sins, even through those Tears wherewith our Eyes are glas'd, this will sure be as far from accomplishing our design, as God's: leave us equally unpardon'd, as unreform'd.

NAY alas, such Sorrows as these will rather serve to enhance than Expiate our guilts; they are loud witnesses against us that we know the malignity of those sins we commit; that we have pois'd them, and find them as a talent of lead upon our Souls, and yet prefer them before Christ's light burden: that we have outvied that perverse Election wherewith Elihu charges Job, and chosen affliction rather than innocence, Job 36. 21. and though we have felt the gnawing of the Worm, yet still resolve to cherish it, till it gain its woeful Concomitant of unquenchable fire, and sure this resolvedness, this high fortitude in Sin, can with no reason be imagined a preparative to its remission, 'twill rather serve to list us among Satan's Martyrs, than God's Penitents.

AND indeed if we examine the original of this kind of Sorrow, what is there that an with any face pretend to an acceptation? alas, 'tis apparent there is no dislike to the sin; for the natural effect of that, would be the abandoning it. If I have fallen into the mire, common reason directs me, not to sit down and cry that I am so defiled; but to cleanse and wash myself, and beware of such another misadventure. Now God's enmity is purely with the sin: and if we think to contract a league with him; we must espouse his quarrel, hate what he hates: But in this case 'tis quite otherwise, we dislike only the consequence, not the crime; are dissatisfied to see that what is so pleasant, will not be safe: detest those temporal or eternal miseries, which God has annexed to it: which is upon the matter to grieve, not because we are guilty, but God is just; and to avert only that part of the evil, of which he owns to be the author, that of Punishment: whilst that of Sin, as our own creature we dandle and caress. And can we think it sufficient to atone an incensed Majesty, that we love our own ease, while yet we love our sin so much better? is it a virtue to have some ineffective regrets to damnation, and such a Virtue too, as shall serve to balance all our vices? this were indeed a compendious course to block up Hell gates, and leave none a possibility of ever getting thither, but those who scaled the wall and desperately resolved to possess themselves of that place of Torment. But alas, they are other fruits of Repentance that must deliver us from the wrath to come: for though I deny not, that the apprehension of Danger, is extremely both reasonable and useful, yet 'tis only by way of preparative: 'tis like the Trumpet that gives the Alarm, and sets us to the battle, but it must not pretend to be like those of Gideon that atchiev'd the whole victory. To see our danger, may occasion, but does not cause, or necessarily infer an escape. I may madly leap into that pit which I see gaping to swallow me, and then my fore-sight serves only to render me my own murderer. In short, if that formidable aspect of our Sins, make us run from them, it has done us the happiest office; plucked us as S. Jude says, out of the fire: but if our love be so dotting, as to counter-charm our fear; if we be so bewitched with the deceitfulness of sin, that we will have its Embraces, though we know them deadly; if we weep that we have sin'd, and yet go on to sin; our willful Guilt will defile our Tears, but our tears will never cleanse our guilt. We only assist in the judicature against ourselves; and to God's condemnation add our own: and what we call our Penitence, becomes a sad Attestation of our Incurribleness.

AND as this mere Sorrow will never avail, so neither will a partial and imperfect reformation, and that whether it be defective in respect of the kind, or of the Duration: to the former we have spoken elsewhere, and shall not need to repeat: but of the later there will need no less caution; men being apt to obtrude fallacies on themselves in this as much as in the other. Every transient gleam of Piety is concluded to be that flame in which the Holy Ghost descended, and though it want the main circumstance of resting on them, yet serves to personate the Comforter. He that whilst the soreness of his late pangs of conscience remains, finds himself a little indispos'd for a new carier in sin, presently concludes repentance hath had its perfect work in him, made that change and transmutation, which certainly denominates him a new creature, and pronounces his vicious appetites extinct and mortified: when alas they are but strewed over with a little penitential Ashes, and will as soon as they meet with combustible matter, any apt temptation, flame out as fierce as ever, and God knows the event does too often actually attest this after all the ablutions, and purification of their repentance, their next work is to divest themselves of their white robe, and those whom yesterday you saw in the laver, today you shall find wallowing in the mire: and as with far the more guilt, so sometimes with much the greater confidence, for having been so washed: yet so strongly are some men's fancies possessed with their imaginary purity, that they are the last that take notice how the scene is changed: they comfort themselves, that sin and they have had some little skirmishes, though but preparatory to a closer league; that they had fixed good purposes, though there remain nothing visible but their violation; and so will call themselves Christ's Sheep, though their notorious impurities witness them to belong only to that herd into which the Legion entered.

THIS is a deceit which one would think should immediately detect its self, but 'tis strange to see, how our wishes can prescribe to our faith; and what a more than omnipotent power our self-love has in reconciling contradictions: yet I can scarce think this innate strength of corruption had been sufficient for the purpose, had it not had the auxiliary aid of some commodious doctrines. My present design is so far from controversial, that I am loath to point out any to which I must express unkindness: yet upon this occasion, I shall refer it to consideration, whether that method which has been used to quiet some Consciences, be not very apt to stupefy more. When I see one who from his present reigning sins, regularly infers the illness of his state; that is yet by his Casuist, diverted from that prospect, and bid look back to see, whether no part of his life afforded any Evidence of true Grace, and if he can but remember any such time; is warranted to make that his Epocha, from whence to date his infallible assurance; is told that that immortal seed, though it may be covered, yet cannot be choked; but will most certainly spring up unto Eternal life: When I say I see this easy remedy prescribed to his fears, 'twill be obvious for me to compound myself an Antidote from the same Ingredients: To fix my Eye upon some mark of Regeneration which at some time or other, I either have, or phancied to have had upon me, and with the steadfast beholding of that, as of the brazen Serpent be fortified against all the venom of my fiery lusts. Cast in this one stick, and with it sweeten all the waters of Marah, secure me against all the bitter effects of my present guilts. How fatal an influence such discoursings as these are apt to have on practice, is too obvious both in the cause, and effect: I need not examine the authority of that grand Principle on which they are founded; since if that were admitted, yet it will not justify the before mentioned Superstructure: for suppose it received as an infallible truth, that grace if true can never be lost: yet 'tis, by the confession of all, so easy to be deceived in judging what is so, and our partialities to ourselves are so likely to betray us to that deceit; that these Corallaries men deduce thence for their personal assurance, can never partake of the supposed infallibility of those premises they derive from, and consequently are much too slight a basis for men to trust with so great a weight, as is that of their present comfort and future state.

SEVERAL other pernicious errors there are in the matter of Repentance which men fall into, shall I say, or rather aspire to; make it their ambition to be under their covert and patronage, and with extreme Violence to their reason as well as religion, climb up to those castles in the air, and there fortify themselves impregably against all the sacred Artillery of Divine threats. Their false confidences serve them as feather-beds, not only to sleep securely in, but to dead all bullets that are shot against them. But of all those deceitful refuges, there is none more treacherous, & yet more confidently and universally resorted to, than that of a Repentance in reversion, to commence nobody knows when, some months or years hence, when this business is dispatched, that lust satiated; or indeed to bear the same date (if not a later) with their last Will and Testament. This is that unhappy retreat to which thousands fly as the routed Syrians to Aphek, 1 Kings 20. 30. till they are entomb'd in that wall, whose shelter they solicited: How desperate the hazard of such procrastination is, hath been so convincingly demonstrated by better Pens; that trumpet hath been blowed so loud by all our spiritual watchmen, that there remains nothing seasonable, but to wonder whence men have got that Lethe which secures them their sleep in spite of that Alarm: and certainly 'tis matter of the greatest astonishment to observe the stupid, yet common boldness of men, who so fearlessly expose themselves to this most formidable of perils; who yet in things of far less danger and lighter consequence are so nicely timorous, that no security is thought enough, every the remotest danger to their outward concerns, excites their present vigilance to avert it: but here that order is most absurdly inverted, and the present eminent danger is assigned and put off to their future care. Let the Physician tell them he observes some Symptoms of a latent Malady, some aptitudes or first Causes of a Disease; what hast is there made to meet that Enemy in the frontiers, before it advance too far? All Arts of prevention are used, and such uneasy remedies submitted to, as perhaps out-bid the pain of the Disease. In like manner let a Lawyer tell them he has spied some defect in an entail, which may perhaps in the next age give some interruption to their design of having their houses endure forever, Psal. 47. how solicitous are they to repair that error, and leave nothing to the mercy of a Law-quirk? And in both cases thank the vigilant care of their informer that gave them notice of their danger: but let the Divine tell them he sees their Souls languishing under the most mortal diseases; that they have actually forfeited their inheritance in the land of the living, they can hear it unconcernedly; say, or at least think those cares are to be remitted to Felix his more convenient season, that when their Bodies are as infirm as their Souls, then care may be taken for both together. That 'tis enough for their spiritual Life to commence when the natural is expiring, and then to provide for everlasting Habitations, when they are putting off their Earthly Tabernacle: as for the thanks they give their Monitor, 'tis generally the same that St. Paul received from the Galatians, to count him their enemy for telling them the truth, Gal. 4. 16. but alas he has no reason to resent the injury, since 'tis but the same they offer to their nearest and most intimate friend, that Angel guardian which God and Nature has placed within their own breasts, I mean their Conscience: let that at any time whisper the same admonition, and immediately they cry out as Ahab to Elijah, Hast thou found me O my Enemy. All arts are used to convey themselves out of its Reach, Business, or Company, or Drink, or anything is solicited to come in to their rescue, that in that throng they may deceive its pursuit, or at least in that louder noise drown its voice; and is not this to look on it as their Enemy, while they shun it as a Malefactor does the Officer. Yet I appeal to the breasts of those, who lean upon the broken reed of a late Repentance, whether this be not the case with them: let them tell me whether they dare trust themselves alone with their Conscience, give it opportunity of speaking freely to them, of laying before them the mad adventure they make of their precious Souls; which they do not only expose to as many hazards of a swift damnation, as there are accidents which may surprise their bodies with a sudden death; but do besides by this resistance repel and quench that Spirit, without which they can never hope to effect that so necessary, so difficult a work; nay, I may, I fear, ask some of them whether they have not so often shunned these parleys, that their Consciences like an abused Friend, has at last given them over, ceased to pursue them with more of those unwelcome importunities; and by its silence left them secured from all noise which may disturb that treacherous sleep into which they have lulled themselves. To those who are thus given up to the spirit of slumber, I cannot hope to speak loud enough to rouse them; but to those that are but of the former rank, that have not yet so prosper'd in their unkind design against themselves, as quite to have alienated their bosom friend, that are yet within the reach of those amica verbera, the stripes and reproofs of their own Conscience; to such I would address with this most affectionate petition, that they would not seek to remove themselves from that wholesome discipline; that they would not fly that Surgeon whose Lancet threatens none but the imposthumated parts; but rather choose to be shown the formidableness of their Danger, than by a blind embracing it, to perish in it. And if they have but any general confused inclinations to this so reasonable a request, I shall then put on more solemnity, assume to come as an Envoy from those dreaded Consciences of theirs, to mediate an interview, to propose the fixing some time of parley, and bespeak their patience to hear it out: And let them but grant this, let them but dare to do so much in order to their own safety, and I can scarce think it possible they should after retain that daring, which only tends to their ruin. In a word, let men seriously and attentively listen to that voice within them, and they will certainly need no other medium, to convince them either of the error or danger of thus procrastinating their Repentance, which themselves acknowledge must not upon their utmost peril be finally omitted, and yet nothing but an immediate dispatch can secure it shall not.

'TWILL be needless to descend to a particular view of more of these deceits, they will easily be detected by this one general Rule, that whatsoever falls short of a present, universal, permanent Change, falls as much short of Repentance. All the pretences that are made upon any other score are but the Garments of the elder brother put upon the back of the younger, which though they might delude a blind Isaac, will never be able to deceive an all-seeing God. All that remains is to offer to the Readers consideration, how nearly he is concerned to guard himself against all delusions in this so important an affair. It was an ancient Stratagem of War to poison the waters in an Enemies Camp, that so they may drink their own deaths: but Satan has here far out-vied that Policy. Were but our Nourishment infected, we had still a recourse left us to Medicine, but here he has envonom'd our very Physic, and what cure remains for those whose very remedies are their disease: when that Bath which was designed to cleanse us, is its self polluted, we may well cry out as Dyonisius of the corrupted River of Alexandria, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 what Flood shall cleanse these Waters? Where can we be secure, when our Repentance (which the Apostle, 2 Tim. 2. 26. supposes the Means of disentangling us) is its self become our Snare. This as it loudly proclaims our danger, so surely in all reason it should awake our care, teach us not to suffer ourselves to be abused with delusive appearances and shadows of Repentance, lest we finally find that Ixion-like we have embraced a Cloud. What an amazing defeat will it be to him, who presumes his Tears have blotted out the hand-writing against him; to find the full Bill brought in at the great Assize, and those he called his penitential sorrows here, to prove but the Prologue to that Tragedy which ends in weeping and gnashing of teeth. And therefore let everyone timely provide against that fatal surprise, use this excellent receipt, not as a Cosmetick only to beautify the face, give him some fair appearance to himself, but as Medicine to restore health; reduce him to such an Athletick vigorous Habit, as may evidence its self in all vital Actions, which will prove the best evidences in our last trial, where the inquisition will not be so much upon our Mouths or Eyes, as upon our Hands: not how many confessions we have made, or how many tears shed, but what acts of Virtue we have substituted in the room of our Vices: whether we have broke off our Sins by righteousness, and our Iniquities by showing mercy to the Poor, and without this 'tis infallibly certain, our Christianity will be as ineffectual to our Bliss, as it is to our Piety: if we will not permit it here to bring us to the obedience of Servants, it shall never instate us hereafter in the inheritance of Sons.

CHAP. VIII. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Mistakes concerning Almighty God, and the methods of his Providence.

TO these Mistakes of ourselves and interests, we have added others also concerning God, which are no less destructive to Christian Practice, for as the right knowledge of God is by our Savior, Jo. 17. 3. put as the Epitome and sum of all that leads to bliss, so our misprisions and misapprehensions of him, are no less remarkable for the contrary effects; nor can we suppose it otherwise, when we remember that this is the grand work and basis of all Religion, and therefore if this foundation be deceitfully laid, the superstructure must necessarily sink and perish: and in this sense 'tis possible for us at once to build on the Rock and the Sand too, we may fix our faith intentionally on God, and yet by absurd notions and unwarranted conceits of him, defeat in the particulars what we established in the gross: represent him so utterly distant from what he is, that under that disguise he will not much appear, either an Encourager or Rewarder of our Piety, and then we may guess how 'tis like to flourish, since the Apostle gives it as a Fundamental Axiom, Heb. 12. 6. That he who comes to God must believe that he is a rewarder of them which diligently seek him.

OF these Mistakes concerning God, there are divers; many more than the designed brevity of this discourse will admit me to examine. I shall only mention three, those are, First, concerning his Decrees, Secondly, his Attributes, Thirdly, his Providence.

BY his Decrees, I mean not those standing rules which he has in his Word set forth as the measures by which he will distribute rewards and punishments; but those secret purposes of his Will, which he neither commands us to search after, nor will permit us to know. That there are many Mistakes concerning these, the numberless Disputes that have been raised about them will sufficiently attest, it being impossible for two Contradictory Opinions to be both true, though in things of this abstruse nature 'tis very possible both may be false. 'Tis not my purpose to wade into those bottomless controversies, which like a Gulf have swallowed up so much time and industry of learned men: I shall only in general commend it to the Readers consideration, whether it be probable or indeed possible for those Opinions to be true which infer falsehood in God: And then let the second enquiry be, whether that be not too evidently the result of those discourses, which set an Opposition between his revealed and his secret Will, his Commands and his Decrees, making the one a blind for the better execution of the other, as if all the Transportation and Zeal he expresses for us, all the passionate enamoring invitations he makes to us, were only to sport himself with our credulity: like the divertisement of those Men, who court them for Wives, whom they would abhor to marry: nay, as if all the protestations and most solemn oaths of God, were designed but to advance the delusion, and raise expectations merely to defeat them. This is such a severe sort of Irony, as we would all think not only unkind but unjust in a man; and 'tis not possible that God, who appeals to us concerning the equality of his ways, should fall short of the strictest measures among us, or exemplify to us an unsincerity he forbids us to follow.

HOW very inauspicious influence such doctrines are apt to have on practice is too visible, for since 'tis as well the instinct as duty of our nature to aspire to an assimilation with God, even that most laudable and generous ambition shall by this means become our snare; for when God shall be thus misrepresented to us, drawn out by the black Lines, not only of severity, but deceit, rendered a Falsifier of his Word, nay Oath; 'twill give not only temptation but warrant to the like Practices: we shall easily swallow up all the particular commands of God, in that fundamental one of being like him; as we are taught himself has done both his commands and promises in his hidden Decrees. This is so natural a piece of Logic, that 'tis very unsafe men should be trusted with those premises whence 'tis derived. And though we are not over apt to transcribe that Copy God does really set us, yet this spurious one will not miss to be taken out: that pravity of our nature which hinders in the one, exciting and spurring us on in the other. This is a way to reconcile our Vices with our reputation, and sin cum Privilegio; and there is little doubt of men's aptness to use that advantage, we see it in lower instances. The Vices of a Prince draw shoals of followers, when his virtue leaves him the more eminent, because single, and renders him rather revered than imitated: And certainly 'twas none of the Devils slightest stratagems on the Gentile world, to give them such God's as might exemplify to them all those odious crimes, wherein he desired to immerse them. Whether this may not be a branch of the same Illusion, I wish the Propugners of this doctrine would seriously consider.

AND as several ills are hereby countenanc'd and authoriz'd, so is all virtue in general discouraged and disheartened; this benumbs us in our Christian course, substracts that spirit and vigor, which should carry us through the weary stages of duty: indeed it cuts the very sinews of Industry, baffles and makes ridiculous all purposes of Labor; for what should invite a man to strive for that, from which he knows he is either irreversibly precluded, or else so infallibly ascertain'd, that his negligence cannot defeat him. These are such extremes as afford no middle, wherein the virtue of industry may exist, hope being equally out-dated by the desperateness or unnecessariness of an undertaking: and how necessary hope is to excite endeavor we may learn of St. Paul, 1 Cor. 15. 5. where he presses his Corinthians to the constancy of Christian Practice upon this ground, that their labor shall not be in vain in the Lord. But according to some men's doctrine, 'tis scarce possible for a man to know whether his labor be in vain or no; since the effect of it depends not upon the revealed promise but secret purpose of God, and who knows whether there may not lie some dormant Decrees against him, which when he thinks he has run his race shall yet defeat him of his Crown. Whether a reward thus stated will much animate men's diligence, I may leave every man to judge by the like circumstances in their secular concerns; and if they find they would there damp their courage, dispirit and dishearten them from attempting, there will be sure more reason to conclude it in these spiritual Affairs, wherein our industry is commonly much less indefatigable.

BUT I shall not farther insist on the ill consequences of particular mistakes; there is one fundamental error, which if it could be cured, would supersede all the rest, I mean our bold Folly in meddling with God's Decrees, which we call hidden, and yet ridiculously confute that Epithet by pretending to know them. This is so much an insolence as forfeits the comparison, which might belong to it as an error; we see secular States jealously reserve their private Councils, and shall we think God so scrutible, or ourselves so penetrating, that none of his secrets can escape us: or if we think him, as indeed he is, unfathomable, why do we thus madly attempt what we confess impossible; especially since we shall not only lose the thing we so vainly pursue, but others which we might else enjoy. 'Tis as if a man should be so transported with a busy earnestness of knowing his Princes Secrets, as quite to forget his Laws, and incur capital punishment. God has given us rules of life, which upon the severest penalties he requires us to study and practice; and we divert from these, and make it our business to trace his Counsels. We are gazing at the Stars to read our destiny, and look not to our feet; and by that negligence experiment the worst fate they could have portended: for I think we may say our wild Phancies about God's Decrees, have in event reprobated more than those Decrees upon which they are so willing to charge their ruin, and have bid fair to the damning of many, whom those left salvable. And indeed 'tis to be expected from Divine Justice, that such bold Inquisitors should find nothing but their own Destruction. That Ark which devoutly revered brought blessings, when curiously pried into diffus'd Pestilence and Death, 1 Sam. 6. 19. Nay the very Poets will tell us, that if we will have Prometheus his Fire, we must take Pandora's Box also: and sure Industry cannot be worse laid out than thus to fetch home Plagues, and while so much of it runs waste to such unhappy purposes, 'tis no wonder if we want for better; forget our calling by contemplating our predestination; and let the Opinion of our fate be at once the Encouragement and Excuse of our sloth, than which nothing can more evacuate the purpose and design of our Christianity, which Divines have truly defin'd to be not a contemplative but active Science.

TO the same unhappy Effect concur our Mistakes of God's Attributes, if I may call them Mistakes, which seem to be rather willful Nescience, they being so delineated to us both in his Word and his Providences, that 'tis not want of light, but winking against it that must leave us ignorant. What the speculative errors are in this matter concerns not my present design to examine: but there seem to be some Misperswasions concerning the Divine Attributes, which do remarkably tend in their consequence and effect, to the corrupting men's manners; nay, look as if they were designed, and affectedly chosen for that purpose; I mean especially those concerning his Justice and Mercy, which being the Attributes in which we have the most immediate Concern, the Errors in them are the more noxious and destructive. Of this sort is that narrow scanty notion too many have of God's Justice, which we measure not by him but ourselves, and therefore proportion it not according to his infinity, but our own concerns. That is an Attribute from which we promise to ourselves no advantage, and therefore we are willing to contract and shrink it up, make it serve only as a Cypher to advance mercy, but are unwilling to understand it in its proper Extent; think it a word of form put in to complete the greatness of God's Style, rather than any intrinsic part of his nature, which he must deny himself to put off.

THUS do we sacrilegiously steal from God a part of his being, and while other Sacrileges invade only his patrimony, this commits a riot upon his very nature, yet as if we meant the Proverb should indemnify us, and Exchange extinguish the Robbery, we add to another attribute what we have default from this, and amplify and extend his Mercy, as much as we confine and limit his Justice; that is the one infinite Ocean, wherein not only we, but himself must be swallowed up. We will think of him under no other notion, nor allow him to be any other thing, but what shall be in subserviency to this: we will have him Powerful to relieve our Distresses, but not to revenge our Crimes; Wise to defeat the machinations of our Enemies, but not to circumvent our own indirect or impious Policies; All-seeing to behold our Wants and Grievs, but not to discern our closer Guilts; True to perform his Promises, but not his Threats. In short, we model all that is in God to our own wishes; and instead of believing him what he is, fancy him what we would have him. Like Micah, Jud. 17. 5. making us a God for our own peculiar use, and forming the Deity we mean to worship. A strange bold Inversion, for Creatures thus to fashion their Creator, put their own stamp and impress upon him, and shape him to their Phancies. And indeed 'tis nothing but Phancy that has to do in this Attempt, and accordingly it must vanish as the operations of that illusive Faculty use to do. We may represent God to ourselves as we please, but that has no more real influence on him, than a deforming Optick-glass has on the Object it disguises, he is still the same amidst all our wild conceits of him, and will always make good the title, by which he delivered himself to Moses, Ex. 3. 14. I am that I am. All that is in him is equally immense and infinite, his mercy need not invade his justice to gain its self a larger field of action, which is already (as the Psalmist speaks) over all his works; neither his justice encroach upon his mercy, that having also a Province wide enough; all impenitent sinners being within its Verge, and God knows how much soever we straighten it in our opinions, we do ⟨◇⟩ indeed too much extend it in its real force, by rendering ourselves the proper objects of it. In short, God who is the author of order and peace, cannot be supposed to be in confusion within himself; the divine Attributes are not in strife, but perfect harmony; 'tis we only that have raised this more than Gygantick war, not only against Heaven, but in it. The several Luminaries pursue the regular motions of the Spheres; but we confound at once the Laws of their Creation, and their Author too, strive to eclipse and darken the father of light. But if the removing of an earthly Land-mark be a crime punishable both by God and man, what Thunder-bolts belong to those who thus attempt to set new Boundaries in heaven, to limit and measure out even the divine Nature by the proportions of their own Phancies, and indeed such temerity as this, is too like to confute its self, and feel that Justice it will not believe: yet as great and daring a crime as it is, I fear there are few that can totally acquit themselves of it: for though all avow it, yet he that shall narrowly search his own heart, will scarce find it clear from all degrees of it: We are all apt to cherish a flattering hope, that God is not so severe as he is represented, or that if in respect of his Justice he be a consuming fire, yet that Mercy will be sure to snatch us out of the burning; like the Angels to Lot, assist our Escapes, and provide us a Zoar, that our souls may live: and this Hope though founded only in our wishes, is very apt to slide into our faith, and make us believe what we would have: by which means this becomes a kind of Epidemick Heresy, the most frequent and common mispersuasion that occurs concerning the divine Attributes.

IT would be a work more long than useful to recite the several errors that have sprung from this one. That of Origen, that the Devils should finally be saved, is a noted and pregnant Instance, which could be derived from nothing but this unequal apprehension of God's Justice and Mercy: And besides all other ancient, we have many branches of a later growth, that spring from the same root, a set of plausible falsities, which would quench the unquenchable Fire, and kill the never dying Worm; I mean those allaying softening descriptions some of this age have made of Hell, some changing the kind, others abating the intensness, or at least the duration of those Torments, each substracting so much from this Tophet, that they have left Atheism an easy task to take away the rest: and may give suspicion they mean to visit that place, which they are so industrious to make easy.

BUT whatever they do themselves, 'tis sure this is the way to send others thither, to take off their fears of it, to make them think it not so dreadful a place as they once supposed, and consequently less careful to decline the ways that lead to it. 'Tis indeed too obvious that such persuasions do mightily impugn Christian practice, and embolden men in sin: and God knows we need no such encouragement; the more general fallacious hopes of Mercy being too sufficient for that purpose without these supernumerary deceits: but between the one and the other, Libertinism is like to outgrow all restraints, and the Opinion of God's goodness instead of leading men to repentance, will slacken those reigns wherewith our brutish Nature should be bridled and restrained, and we thus left unto the sway of lust and passion, must run headlong upon ruin, as the Horse rusheth into the Battle. For alas, we are not so generous as to do well for Virtues sake, nay nor so provident as to do it for Reward, 'tis our fear that is the most prevalent incentive, and accordingly we find religion generally makes her first impressions there. They are the terrors of the Lord that do most usually, and most effectually persuade men, 2 Cor. 5. 11. our Hearts must be pricked, and at those Orifices piety enters. Now when all these terrors shall be superseded by the opinion of an overwhelming mercy, when Hell shall either be annihilated, or supposed so to annihilate us, that we shall lose our passiveness with our being, and be as incapable of suffering, as even Heaven its self can make us, what will be left to engage us to virtue, or deter us from vice: Alas, do we not often see a daring Lust bid battle to all the artillery of Heaven, meet God in his loudest Thunder, and venture on damnation in its dreadfulest form? and can we think it will be more modest, when it shall be told that they are only edgeless weapons it hath to encounter? that God's Thunder amidst all its noise carries no bolt? and that the Flames of the bottomless pit, are but a painted fire, that at a distance may fright but not hurt us, or at least so hurt us, that we shall not feel it? When those rubs which fear interpos'd are thus removed, there is nothing to stay the course of headlong riot, but precipiciously it will on, where ever strong desire shall drive, or flattering lust allure: he that loved his sin, even when it threatened him ruin, served it assiduously, when it promised no other wages than death, Rom. 6. 23. how will he hug this viper when he thinks 'tis stingless, and give up his ear to be bored by that Master, which affords him present pleasures without future stripes: we see even in Civil matters the presumption of Impunity is the great nurse of Disorders, and if it were not for the coercive power of Laws we should soon see how little the directive would signify; and doubtless 'tis the same in spiritual or rather worse, by how much we are more bent upon the breaking of God's Laws than men's, and consequently will be the more apprehensive of any Encouragement.

OF the truth hereof our experience gives too sad proof, none rushing so boldly upon God's justice, as those who have most fortified themselves against the dread of it, as if they meant their practice should experiment the truth of their speculation, and make the utmost trial whether God can be provoked or no. Indeed men use mercy as amazed Passengers sometimes do a plank in a shipwreck, lay so much weight upon it, as sinks both it and themselves; so perishing by too great a confidence of their rescue, and finding a Gulf where they expected an Ark: not that I suppose Mercy unable to support the weight of all the Persons, nay, and of all the sins in the world, which have not the one ponderous adherent of Impenitence superadded; but that is a burden which even the divine Clemency sinks under, refuses to plead such a cause, and refers it to Justice as its proper Court: And therefore to sin on, in hope of mercy, is to undermine ourselves, and commit a folly as absurd as ruinous, I wish I could say 'twere not also as frequent: but God knows 'tis everywhere too apparent; men openly avow it, so that 'tis become the vulgar Answer to every convicting Reproof, that God is merciful: And surely they that observe the growth of vice, since our new descriptions of Hell came abroad, will have cause to think the one has had no small influence on the other, and that while some have made it borrow the uneasiness of our human state to make up its torments; they have taken care it should be just, and lend us back sins of a greater magnitude: This miserable traffic have these Factors settled, between the present world and the infernal region, that Hell should have Earths pains, and Earth Hells wickedness; the later alas we are too fully possessed of, which is like to send too many souls to discover the deceit of the other. In fine, our groundless confidences of mercy, and those other Chimera's we forge out of that, are certainly the most frequent and dangerous underminers of Christian practice: these like the Sun give heat and vigor to those inordinate lusts, which a just fear of vengeance would as a winters frost nip, and destroy: And till we lay by these easy slight thoughts of God, and consider him in those more awful attributes which exact our reverence, his mercy will only serve to ripen us for his judgment, that smooth and gentle property in God, which to all who abuse it not is indeed the oil of gladness, will thus perverted acquire the more fatal quality of Oil, serve only to intend our flames, and remove us as far from the rewards of Piety, as our bold fancies have done from the practice.

A third sort of mistakes there are by which Piety is obstructed, and those are such as concern God's providence, about which the world has long since had many disputes; some entirely denying it, as presuming God so wholly taken up with the contemplation and enjoyment of his own felicity, that he was utterly inconsiderate of that of his creatures, and an unconcerned spectator of human affairs; others limiting and restraining it to those things only which themselves were pleased to think worthy of the divine inspection and conduct: But these questions have been more bandied among Philosophers than Christians, and therefore are beyond our present enquiry. Yet give me leave by the way to express my fears, that these errors have yet some secret rooting in too many hearts; that there are many who rather formally say, then cordially believe, that God governs the World, and disposes as well of human as divine things; a suspicion that is rendered too probable by those indirect arts men use, to possess themselves of secular advantages; for did they seriously think that all those things are in God's hands, from whence they are neither strong nor cunning enough, either to wrest or pilfer them, 'tis scarce imaginable they should attempt such painful impossibilities, disquiet themselves in vain as the Psalmist speaks, and which is worse, forfeit all title to them as God's gifts, by thus assuming to make them their own. But this is a disquisition I must leave every man to make in his own heart; only let me say, that he that has there any doubt of God's universal or particular providence, has also in it the root of all unchristian Sins, of Distrust, Solicitude, and Fraud: there being nothing that can effectually supersede our own carkings and contrivances for ourselves, but the assurance that God cares for us. Men being still apt to scramble, where there is none from whom they expect an orderly and sufficient distribution, and therefore this error where ever it is found, may well be reckoned among the impeters of Christian duty.

BUT besides those who thus doubt of Providence, there are others liable to great mistakes, I mean those who to their just belief of God's Providence, superadd a groundless confidence of their own skill in fathoming it, that are not content to know it in its product and event, but pretend to discern it in its most secret designments and purposes; and do not so much revers God's dispensations, as interpret them: I do not here mean to condemn all particular applications of providential Events, which are sometimes so extraordinary and remarkable, that they are their own expositors, and point out the construction we are to make: and an humble advertence unto such, is not only innocent but necessary: but when men shall attempt to read every line in God's hand, to make their own inference from every efflux of Providence; these pretenders to divine Palmistry, seem to differ only thus much from those who make a trade of the natural, that they Cheat themselves as well as others.

YET there want not some who have gone yet farther, and think not only to understand Providence, but assist it: not only trace it in all its intricate windings, and concealed intendments, but help it in the execution, and give birth to its conceptions: Of this sort especially are those, who having possessed their brains with some conjectural expositions of obscure prophecies, will administer to providence, and call out those events they expect: and as if they were conscious that God would not make good their dreams, endeavor to do it themselves. This Age has afforded too many instances of this, when the fulfilling of Prophecies has by some been made the solemn summons to rebellion and blood: and in order to the hating and destroying the whore, Rev. 17. 1. Men have been animated to hate and destroy all who were not infected with their own Frensy. This we know has been called the helping of the Lord against the mighty, and something more than votive Curses awarded to those who refused to assist. Thus have they first wildly mistaken, and then no less wildly out-run God's designs: as if like Baal, Iud. 6. he were unable to plead for himself, to vindicate his own cause, or effect his purposes without their help: and having resolved what he shall do, obtrude themselves upon him as his instruments; how repugnant such anticipations of Providence are to the interests of Christianity is too apparent from the many detestable effects they have produced.

BUT setting aside these, let us return to those we spake of before; who presuming to expound providential Events, make them the Criterion by which to judge both of persons and of causes, concluding the one loved or hated, the other approved or disallowed by God, according to their prosperous or adverse Success. The first of these was by our Savior exploded, as an undue way of process in the Jews, in the case of the Galileans, and before him Solomon had given it as a Maxim, that no man could know love or hatred by all that is before him: Eccl. 9. 2. And if under the Jewish Economy, where temporal Blessings made up so great a part of their Promises, it was so; much more is it under the Gospel, whose frame and composure is quite distant; which instead of proposing secular prosperities to its proselytes, assures them the contrary; sets up the Cross as the Standard under which they are to fight, and affords no temporal Hopes but with an allaying proviso of Persecutions and Afflictions; nay, the Apostle to the Hebrews goes farther, makes them not only incident but necessary to Christians, the badge and cognizance of Sonship, whilst the no chastening is the fatallest Sign, a token of bastardy and abdication, Heb. 12. 7, 8. And doubtless the experience of every Christian asserts the doctrine; we are all apt with the Prodigal to forsake our fathers house, and as long as we can have the riot and not the wants, shall never think of returning; we must be famished into consideration, and our husks alone will send us home to the fatted Calf. And can there be a greater indulgence in God, than thus to make our Iniquity our Punishment, that it may not be our Ruin; to embitter those sensualities whose lusciousness serves to intoxicate us, and to clip those wings which he sees carry us from him. Stories tell us that the Trojan Wives after the destruction of their Country, being wearied with their restless vagrant life, necessitated their Husbands to a settlement by burning their Ships. And the same kind stratagem God has upon us: he sees that our worldly accessions do rather enlarge than fill our appetites, and carry us on to farther pursuits, and by drawing us still more from him the Center of rest, exposes us to endless wanderings, and then what can be kinder than to rescue us from such a condition, that Curse of Cain, to be a fugitive, and a vagabond in the earth, to deprive us of our treacherous prosperities, and fire those Ships wherein we are preparing like Jonah, to fly from the presence of the Lord: so by a happy necessity forcing us to fix ourselves on him. And this is the worst God designs us in every adversity: and did we mean but as well to ourselves, we should not miss of receiving the happiest Effects, even that peaceable fruit of righteousness the Apostle speaks of, Heb. 12. This holy men so well understood, that we find them dread nothing so much as an uninterrupted prosperity; they like the Muscovite Women, grew jealous of God's love when he forbore to strike, upon which score it is, that in the Ancient Fathers, there are so many solemn petitions for stripes; such importunate solicitations for those medicinal corrections, wherein they judged both God's kindness and their own safety to consist.

AND then how perverse, how preposterous are our measures, when we conclude quite the other way, estimate God's love only from outward successes, and think he is never angry but when he smites: a Perswasion, which as it is very false in its grounds, so very pernicious in its effects, and creates hopes and fears, as fallacious as its self. For first, if we apply it to ourselves, it produces mischiefs proportionable to the divers states under which we are. If a man be full and prosperous, it makes him proud and secure, for when he has not only the possession of those things the World values, but takes them as an attestation of God's peculiar kindness and approbation, what should make him either consider or reform his guilts? If he have sanctity enough to possess him of God's favor, and all these profitable effects of it, he will not easily be persuaded he needs more: and any man that shall tell him he does, shall be heard with the same indignation wherewith Croesus entertained Solon, when he found him question that happiness, which he expected he should have admired. Prosperity is in its self an emboldening thing, but when backed by this Opinion of it, grows into all insolence, till at last it even recoil in the face of the Donor, and dare God by all those enormous riots, to which it enables Men.

ON the other side, this Opinion presents a less merry, but not less dangerous Temptation to those in adversity; for when they shall look on themselves only as the Anvil for God's strokes, they will be too apt to complete the parallel by answering it in hardness and inflexibility; have the 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 as the Father calls it, which reverberates the blow on him that gave it. Persevering wickedness is so naturally the issue of Desperation, that we find the Jews take up the one merely to countenance the other, pretend hopelessness to avoid reformation: Thus we find it, Ezek. 33. 10. Our iniquities are upon us, and we pine away in them, how should we live? And again more plainly, Ier. 18. 12. There is no hope, and then the Inference is ready, let us walk everyone in his own ways. Endeavour is the child of hope, and we attempt not to atone one whom we conclude implacable, so that Wrath may consume, but will never melt us, 'tis Love only that has that softening, dissolving Power, and unless we discern a mixture of that in God's infections, they will never render us malleable to his impressions. We kiss a Fathers hand and rod, when an Executioners stroke we suffer rather than bear. St. John tells us we love God because he loved us, 1 John 4. 19. I wish all men would make good the Inference; but 'tis sure they are too apt to do it in the reverse, and will hate if they apprehend themselves hated; a state which at once exemplifies, and anticipates the worst part of Hell to us, yet very incident to those who interpret every stroke of God's, as the effect of enmity and utter aversion. This is to do that to ourselves which the Devils so deprecated from Christ, to torment us before our Time, it being peculiar to the vengeance of the other World to be merely punitive, that here being rather discipline than vengeance designed to reduce, not destroy us: and indeed besides the pain of sense which this Error creates, it does (to perfect the Hell) give that of loss also; deprives us of one of the great Evangelical felicities, that of rejoicing in Tribulations, which our Savior thought so considerable, as to insert amongst his Beatitudes; and his Apostles frequently mention triumphantly as the great privilege and prerogative of a Christian. For if all adverse successes be a note of God's disfavour, there will be no place for joy even in the most pious sufferings. St. Stephens ravishing prospect will be intercepted, and a Martyrs death be as uncomfortable as a Malefactors. But if these were the only sufferings to which joy were annexed, there would be but too few concerned in the deprivation; those wherein we are more universally interested, are those Chastisements of God which our Guilts provoke; which though in respect of their cause they are Matters of the greatest sadness, yet in regard of their significancy and effect, they are Grounds of comfort, they signify that God (however displeased) yet has not abandoned the care of us; thinks us worth his correction, and designs our reducement: and the Effect will (if not obstructed by us) be answerable to that design: our Chastening here rescues us from the sins, and consequently the condemnation of the world, 1 Cor. 11. 32. and this is sure no slight motive of rejoicing; and we are very unjust to God and ourselves, if we will exchange it for the sullen murmurs of a desperate incorrigibleness.

AND as this persuasion is thus pernicious in reflection on ourselves, so neither is it more innocent when applied to others; for first, if we look on the men that prosper in the world, as the Psalmist speaks, Psal. 73. 12. we shall too often find them answer the character he gives them in the former part of the Psalms, and when from their temporal affluence, we shall conclude God's favor to them, 'twill be hard resisting the temptation, which (without that Argument) the Psalmist was under, of thinking it vain to cleanse our hearts, or wash our hands in innocence. Nay, we shall be apt to join our suffrage to those in Malachi 3. 15. and call the proud, happy: and if we esteem them so, 'tis natural to desire to be like them; so we shall quickly grow to despise a poor or afflicted Innocence, and embrace all thriving prosperous sins.

ON the other side, if we look on others in an adverse calamitous state, this Opinion suggests hard and severe sentences concerning them, inclines us to judge where we should succor, and how great an accumulation of Misery that is, we may learn from Job, whom we find not so often nor so passionately complaining of any of his pressures, as of the unkind censures of his Friends, who weighing in this deceitful balance of temporal successes, made very false judgments of him, and as if they were to Glean after Satan, endeavored to despoil him of that only comfort his malice had left, the Conscience of his Innocency. This is as the Psalmist speaks, to persecute him whom God has smitten, and to talk to the grief of those whom he hath wounded; a thing repugnant to the common temper of humanity, and much more to that tenderness, those affections and bowels Christianity requires; and therefore in this respect also, we may reckon this persuasion very injurious to Christian duty.

NOR is it less so when applied to Causes, in which it is full as deceitful a Rule as it is in Persons: God has designed us another measure of our undertakings; his word and law, by the general proportions whereof, we are to square and accommodate our particular actions: he sends us not to his providence, and the various distributions of that, or allows us to judge of the Justice, by the Success of our Attempts. If that were the trial, 'twere impossible for any enterprize to be lawful, since that which should legitimate it, is subsequent to it, and can have no influence on it, to the making it good or bad: and as it does not make, so neither does it infallibly signify it to be either: and of those who presume it does, I should ask whence it came to do so? If by any assignation of God let them produce it; and if not thence, I'me sure it can make no pretence to certainty, God having nowhere obliged his Providence to make good our fancies and conjectures. Nay, if we look into Scripture examples, we shall find this irrefragably confuted; the same Cause having at several times differing success. Thus the Israelites were discomfited at their first assault upon Ai, and yet succesful after; 'twas something extrinsic to the cause that made the variation, that still continuing the same. The like we find in the case of the Benjamites, who though in as ill an engagement as can well be imagined, had yet two victories over the other Tribes, Judge. 20. But there is one instance that may serve for all, and that is the taking of the Ark by the Philistines, he that shall contemplate that, will sure never think fit to measure causes by success, unless he will give the difference also to Dagon, who then triumpht in the spoils of the God of Israel. In short, 'tis evident victories are not so entailed upon the justest causes, but that they may be, and often are cut off, either by the guilts of the undertakers, or by some other secret disposal of the Divine wisdom; but the former is so frequently the obvious cause of it, that we are not often put to resort to the later. 'Tis no strange thing to see all Israel troubled by an Achan, or have the Ark taken captive from off the shoulders of a Hophni and Phineas, nor will it ever be possible for the best cause to secure its self from the blasting influence of its Abettors crimes.

THIS is so clear and evident a Truth, that 'tis matter of some wonder, how the contrary persuasion should ever insinuate its self; and indeed it is not probable it ever had, if Interest, that grand Sophister, had not introduced it. Men engage in designs not on intuition of their lawfulness, but profit, and when they are such as nothing can warrant à priori, their only reserve is to make them good à posteriore; to bring a license after the fact, and justify their beginning by their end; which how ridiculous soever it may seem to sober reason, yet such is the natural shame, or secular inconvenience of owning an unjust Act, that men will wrap themselves, though in the thinnest and most diaphanous veils, make use of the absurdest pretences, and faintest colors to shadow their Guilt, and whilst consciousness bids them say somewhat for themselves, and the case affords no solid plea, they are driven to these deplorable sleights and subterfuges. Indeed this is an argument that stands single, and is seldom used but in those causes that admit of no better; which we may reasonably conclude to be the reason, why it was so much insisted on by our late disturbers, who in such abundance of light, as they owned, could not be supposed ignorant enough to believe themselves: 'twas certainly the destitution of better arguments that cast them upon this, forced them to ransack the Alcoran, and rifle a piece of Turkish Divinity to make good their Saintship. They now discern the unskillfulness of that plea, which a little time has converted to an accusation. The great change it has pleased God to make among us, retorting their conquering Syllogisms, and making them need a new success to justify their vaunts of the old. God grant we may not here relieve them again, and by our personal sins, help them to that which the justice of their Cause never did, nor is like to acquire them.

BUT though this plea of success be frequently urged in policy, yet it prevails with many who know not that it is so; indeed the vulgar are so much subjected to their senses, that generally the conclusions drawn thence are easily embraced, when those from Reason and Conscience have a double difficulty, first to be understood, and next to be admitted, and the most elaborate discourse shall not convince them of the right of that cause, which in the last appeal to God's Tribunal by War, has been openly condemned; whilst the spoils of victory as much satisfy the Understanding of the justice of the Prize, as the Desire with the wealth or glory of it. And this is it which renders such kind of arguings very pernicious, they being so fitted to the common temper, that they seldom miss to be effectual; and engage the heady multitude in the Prosecution of the worst designs, that are recommended to them by the one Catholic virtue of Success. This is indeed as the Prophet speaks, Ez. 13. 22. to strengthen the Hands of evil doers, that they turn not from their wickedness; to dazzle their Eyes so with the splendor of prosperous iniquity, that they can never come to take an exact view, and discern it in its true form: And doubtless this was none of the less-prevailing arts of seducement among us, and drew in many to abet those seditious practices, which all Laws of God and Man prohibited, and whereby Christian Religion has at once been violated and defam'd; has not only her precepts broken, but herself asperst with the foul consequences of that disobedience, and so buys one injury with another; the contempt of her Authority with the loss of her Reputation.

WE have now seen the ill consequences issuing from these mistakes of God's Providence, but we must take notice that there remains yet as great or greater danger on the other side; and that a total neglect is worse than an erroneous construction of it. For though God have secluded us from that more exact minute discerning of his purposes, yet he means not his dispensations should be looked on as wholly insignificant, and therefore has given us the general scope and meaning of them, according to which we are to limit and restrain our wandering guesses, and also judge of particular events. Now as God's original and primary design in the creation of Man, was to render him a subject capable of eternal happiness; so also have all his subsequent Acts toward him aimed at the same end: and because there is nothing removes man so far from that grand purpose of his being as Sin; therefore God has made the suppressing of that, the universal intendment of his disposals concerning us: so that the most different dispensations do severally pursue that one end; prosperity and adversity in their successive changes are sent to reclaim us from the error of our ways, with this only difference, that the one leads, the other drives. This is asserted by St. Paul, who tells us, that the goodness and longsuffering of God is to lead us to Repentance, Rom. 2. 5. And also that when we are judged, we are chastened of the Lord, that we may not be condemned with the World, 1 Cor. 11.

32. And indeed the whole Scripture runs in the same strain; and both from prosperous and adverse successes urges the obligation to obedience. This is the notice God expects we should take of all his dealings towards us. And the want thereof we find often sharply upbraided by God to the Jews: how often does he recount his redeeming them from Egypt, his enstating them in Canaan, and all his wonderful works for them, with an accusing reflection upon their ingratitude; and that we may know his Judgments are no less to be accounted for than his Mercies, we find him, Amos 4. making a Catalogue of them, and closing every period with this Pathetick reproof of their obstinacy, Yet have ye not returned to me saith the Lord. In short, God requires that we should observe every turn of his hand, in order to the reforming our own lives, and by the several mediums of Gratitude or fear, infer that necessary Conclusion of a sincere universal Obedience; and the neglect of this is the crime the Psalmist mentions, Psalm 28. 5. with so severe a menace. They regard not the works of the Lord, nor the operation of his hands.

AND as this is required from single persons, so also from societies and communities, which as they are in their public capacities the most eminent subjects of Judgments or Mercies, so are they the most eminently accountable for both. And though the Neglect and Abuse of God's methods be a very provoking guilt when 'tis only personal, yet is it much more so, when it becomes national: And therefore as it is every man's concern for his own peculiar to examine how he has answered God's methods towards him, so is it an enquiry very pertinent in relation to the Public also; especially where the dispensations have been remarkable and extraordinary; in which respect the Inquisition cannot appear more necessary for any than this Nation; upon which consideration I hope the Reader will think it no unpardonable digression, if we awhile turn aside after it.

IT is the affirmation of our Blessed Savior, that where much is given, there shall be much required; a thing so consonant with natural Equity, that we all give our suffrage to it, by making it the measure of our expectations in secular things, wherein every man looks for returns proportionable to his expense or Industry. The Husbandman expects a Crop answerable to his Seed and Labor: and in the nobler cultures of the Mind, we justly exact of our Pupils to let their manners attest the discipline they have been under: According to which estimate we must resolve▪ that God's expectations from us of this Nation cannot but be very high, there being no people under the Sun, whom he has more signaliz'd as his own immediate care, on whom the Divine Economy has more constantly and even solicitously attended in all the variety of seasonable and powerful applications.

I SHALL not assume the work of a Chronicle, by giving a series of all those mercies, we received in the loins of our Ancestors; and of which we have provided one unhappy memorial, I mean our nauseating and despising them; it having been the business of our days, to disentail those two most inestimable Blessings, of a pure Religion and outward Peace, which our immediate Progenitors left us; and to derive to our posterity the contrary mischiefs of impiety and confusion.

BUT not to ravel so far back, I shall confine my reflections to so late a date, that I shall not need to bespeak the faith afforded to Historians; scarce any that can be my Reader, but is qualified to be my witness too; and must acknowledge that there has on God's part been no Method wanting, that might purify us to himself a Peculiar people zealous of Good works. To that end of refining and cleansing us it was, that he kept us so long in the furnace, permitted us to those many Fiery trials of our late calamitous days. 'Twere impertinent here to give a Description of those sufferings, which every man's Memory can so readily represent to him; or to paint that Flame whose scorchings we have felt; 'tis enough to say, that God appeared in them, earnestly industrious to have reduced us; like a skilful Captain besieg'd us closely, straitened us so in all our interests, that it was scarce possible for us to fly anywhere but to himself. Indeed he that would make up an exact Catalogue of our Calamities must calculate in how many instances human nature may be passive; there being scarce any of our suffering capacities, to which they were not liberally apportioned, our Estates, our Persons, our Friends, and which is more than all our Consciencences, all groaning under the weight of that Yoke, which our own Sins prepared, and other men's sins put on. Which way soever we looked, we saw nothing but that which might consume our Eyes and grieve our Heart: If on the Church, we saw that torn by Schism, spoiled by Sacrilege; the abomination of desolation standing in the Holy place, and the house of Prayer made in the most literal sense a den of Thieves. If on the State, we saw the breath of our Nostrils, the Anointed of the Lord taken in their Pits, Imprison'd, and Arraign'd, and barbarously Murder'd, by those who slew him like the Heir in the Gospel, that they might seize on his Inheritance. We saw this and all other Mischiefs established by a Law, and made as irreversible as powerful malice could render them. And now in such a distress, who would not think that such a necessity should have become our virtue? And so perfect a destitution compel'd our resort to the Divine aid. And as little oppressed States used to make themselves homagers to the Romans, to engage their protection; so we should have made an entire surrendry of ourselves to God, that we might have gained a title to his rescues and deliverances.

THIS genuine and kindly effect I doubt not but it had in some, I would fain think in many; but we are not now considering particulars, but the community; and therefore how sincere soever such personal reformations were, they must not come under the account of public and general, unless for their Number and Eminency they had been sufficient to have overwhelmed the contrary perverseness: Many there might be whose hearts (as 'tis said of Iosiahs, 2 Chron. 34. 27.) did melt, and yet the far greater number of the obdurate, still justly denominate us a stiff neck'd people; an Epithet wherewith God often reproaches the Jews, and sure we have no less evidenced our title to it; for alas, as if we had meant to revenge the inexorableness of our oppressors towards us, in our obstinacy to God; as if when we could keep nothing else, we had yet reserved this sullen comfort, of having our hearts impregnable, we made a shift to hold out against all these batteries; there was little appearance, and less reality of Repentance; and if some of our lusts were at all less raging, 'twas only because they were starved into a little tameness, the supplies cut off which should maintain our Riot: but when any recruits could be had, they were devoted that way, and even in the worst of times we mist not to be as luxurious as we were able: and as though we resolved that vice like the Sea, should gain in one part what it lost in another; we took order that what was thus inevitably defalkt from those expensive Sins, should be made up in the cheaper: we could curse, and swear, & blaspheme in spite of Sequestration, and this wretched Immunity we made abundant use of, till we even became Proverbial for it; and gave our enemies pretence, to fasten it on us as our distinctive Character. Yet to show ourselves generous sinners, there was one vice we bought at a dear rate, I mean our as imprudent, as unchristian animosities, and picques among ourselves; a sin that helped to revenge all the rest: and was as well upon a human, as divine account a grand instrument of our ruin. To these we may add our impatient murmurs at our sufferings, which did in some work so preposterously, as to reconcile them to the inflictors, made them unworthily desert that cause, they found chargeable to maintain, and contrary to the advice of Solomon, Choose the ways of those oppressors whose prosperity they envied, Prov. 3. But of these real Apostates the number I hope was not great, I wish I could say so also of those seeming desertors, whose knees bowed to Baal, though their hearts did not: who belied their own loyalty, and in a show of compliance prostituted conscience in several Engagements as inconsistent with each other, as they all were with duty; and such as they pretended no excuse for their taking, but their resolutions of breaking. I was indeed a sad spectacle to see what shouls every menacing Edict brought in; while men ran in as much haste to take the opportunity of Perjury, as the primitive Christians were wont to do of Martyrdom: Indeed herein we seemed to invade our enemies peculiar, would not suffer them to enjoy those marks of distinction, they had framed to themselves; so that as far as Oaths could signify we were all one Party. And yet while we thus disclaim'd God's reliefs by these indirect attempts of our own, we took it very ill that he left us to the success of them: That he prosper'd not those methods he had interdicted, and made us Triumphant, not only over our Enemies but himself too: and upon this score many mutinous blasphemies were uttered and perhaps some more thought, though I confess, generally we were not so modest, as to stick at saying the worst we could think, and indeed they that heard the frequent doubts men owned of God's justice, providence, nay his very being, would not think they suppressed anything as too ill to be spoken: we laid boundless expectations upon the justice of our cause, and as if we had extremely obliged God by not being Traitors, or Schismatics, thought he wronged us extremely that he made us not Victors. Samuel tells Saul that Rebellion was like Witchcraft, but we seemed to think Loyalty was so; that like a spell it was to keep us invulnerable, not only against our enemies but our Selves: and so countercharm all our crimes, that they should only be active to please, not hurt us. But if in the last place we reflect on our selves even in relation to that cause in which we so much confided, 'tis to be feared all men will not be able to evince they suffered for God and the King, though they did it in their quarrel: 'tis the Intent must denominate whose Martyrs they were, it being too frequent for private passions and interests, to march under the banner of conscience; and we call that sometimes taking up the Cross, which is only the taking up an animosity or humor. Indeed 'tis not possible for any to be God's Martyr, who is not first his Servant: none of us will suffer the greatest things for a person for whom we will not do the least; and 'tis absurd Hypocrisy for a man to pretend he has left all for God, who we see cannot be woe'd to leave the most despicable lust for him. He that will not part with the noise of a loud Oath, the pleasure of an intemperate Cup, the applause of a profane Iest for God, will surely much less expose his liberty, his estate, his life for him: and therefore what hazards soever any man ran in any of those, he can with no justice set it upon God's account, unless he can produce such other acts of obedience, as may witness this to be true and genuine. And upon this trial, I fear God's party will appear to have been but small among us, and perhaps the King's not much greater, it being not very probable that those should have any great sense of duty to him, that had none to God: or that those should religiously revere one Commandment, who despised the other nine. But we need not the help of inference and probability in this matter, the mutinous and insolent behavior of many who professed loyalty, did too clearly evince it: And as it is said of Joab, that he turned after Adonijah, though he turned not after Absalom, 1 King. 2 28. and some of ours had little private rebellions of their own even while they opposed the more public. I love not to pass censures on men's thoughts, yet I doubt some would be too conscious to confute me, if I should say there wanted not those, who owed their zeal to their Spleen, and did not so much love those they fought for, as hated those they fought against. And it may perhaps deserve enquiry, whether that demure pretence of holiness their Adversaries had put on, did not more avert some of our Libertines from them, than all their real crimes: They perhaps so far mistook them, as to suspect they might be in earnest, when they professed to advance the power of Godliness, and at that took an Alarm, and such Men (if such there were) contended not for the Liberty of their Country, but their Lusts; and could with no justice, expect either a reputation, or success from that cause which they at once helped to defame and defeat. I am loath to go farther, and suspect that even some of the devouter sort were inspired more by the Spirit of opposition than Piety; yet I confess 'tis hard to resist that surmise, when 'tis considered that our Liturgy never had its due veneration, but when the Directory was set up against it. Indeed he that shall remember how our private Oratories were then throng'd and crowded; and shall now compare it with our empty Churches, will be tempted to think our devotion was of that sort, which is excited by interdict, and deadned by invitations; a perverse kind of Zeal kindled only by Antiperistasis or collision; none of that pure flame which descends from heaven. And then as our Savior in another case says, if the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness, Mat. 6. If this fairer and more specious part of us were thus reprovably, how obnoxious were the other? and if our Earnestness in a righteous cause, by its Sinister motives or adherencies be unable to justify its self, how shall it bear that heavier task we laid on it, and plead for our other Guilts.

THIS is the true though not full account of our behavior under God's Discipline, thus did we fructify upon his pruning us; brought forth indeed, nothing but degenerous fruit. The holy Writ leaves it as a brand of most inveterate Impiety upon Ahaz, that in the time of his distress he sin'd yet more against the Lord, 2 Chron. 28. 22. and sure we have too just title to the same Character of infamy; those sufferings which were sent to chastise our sins, served but to increase them, and like the Israelites in the Brick-kilns, they multiplied the more for their oppression; we debauched even our Executicners, and made every new calamity supply us with some new vice. And now when God's rod was thus despised, we were in all reason to expect he should draw his sword, revenge our resistance of his methods, by somewhat we could not resist, make our Plagues as obstinate as our selves, and involve us in hopeless inevitable ruin. This certain fearful looking for of Judgment, Heb. 10. 27. was all we had left ourselves, of all the rich patrimony we were once possessed of; and our present misery seemed impossible to expire any way but by dying into greater.

BUT as great artificers are used to magnify their Art, by choosing the most unlikely materials; so did it please God in this total indisposedness of ours, when we were so unapt subjects to illustrate his mercy, and as if he designed this national deliverance should (in its proportion) be the Transcript of our more universal redemption, he visited us not only in this state of misery, but enmity; when we had set ourselves in defiance of his judgments, he laid as it were an Ambush of mercy for us, and surprised us with safety: by such undiscernible ways returned the captivity of our Zion, that we were indeed delivered like them that dream, Psal. 126. 1. gave us a victory without a war: without the intervention of garments rolled in blood, Esa. 9. 5. invested us in our Triumphant robes, and in a word, made us insensibly to glide into our long forgotten prosperity.

AND now who can imagine, but this miraculous Mutation without us, must also work a Change within us. Indeed they must have a very ill opinion of human nature, that can think it possible it should have perverseness enough to resist such endearments; such kindly Heat must needs be supposed to melt us; and if before our Pride disdain'd to be compel'd, yet even that stubbornest part of us cannot object against the being courted into amendment. So that when God has thus yielded to our terms, left us not so much as a Punctilio in our way to Piety, 'tis but a reasonable expectation we should embrace it with as great an Earnestness, as it was formerly rejected by us.

AND would God we could say we did so; but alas, we still affect prodigies, take a kind of wanton Joy in defeating God's designs, and as if we aspired to vye Miracles with him, have made our returns as unparalleled as his mercies; so that the sum of our account is this. No Nation was ever more signaliz'd by God's goodness, or its own perverseness, it being hard to determine in which of those respects it is most eminent. That this is in the general perfectly true, there are too many particulars ready to testify, indeed a whole cloud of Witnesses do concur to the proving the charge, I shall not undertake to examine all, yet some of the principal it will not be amiss to take notice of.

BEFORE we enquire into the use we have made of God's Mercies, let us a little consider what our sense of them is; and sure of all the interrogatories we can put to ourselves, this appears the easiest, the most gentle favorable Test, that even our own partialities could elect for us; it being so natural to men in misery to value a rescue, and celebrate their deliverers, that the contrary would be the only wonder: we see even the Jews, who were none of the most malleable people, yet deliverances made impressions on them, set them to their devout processions and solemn hymns in praise of God: nay such a piece of native Religion is this, that the Heathens exemplify it to us. The Philistines when they had taken Samson, magnified their Dagon, as having delivered their enemy and the destroyer of their country into their hands, Judge. 16. 24. So upon the victory over Saul, 1 Sam. 31. 9. they sent round about to publish it in the house of their Idols. And in all stories we find, the Heathen Altars were never so loaden with Sacrifices, as upon such occasions: and the Gospel tells us that those on whom Christ bestowed miraculous cures, were so transported with them, that their gratitude supplanted their obedience, and made them notwithstanding his prohibition proclaim the wonders he had done for them: But I fear if we reflect upon ourselves, we shall not be able to match any of these instances. 'Tis true our late change was entertained with a Joy profuse enough, but not enough religious. We saw that great things were done for us, and thereof we rejoiced, but we did not so much consider that the Lord had done them, Ps. 114. and so were rather affected with the rarity and profitableness, than the mercy and kindness of the Dispensation: and though the care of our Governors have provided for the religious part also, assigned days of Purim for the perpetual commemoration of our deliverance, yet our slight observance of them does too fully evince our Joy was merely secular; and surely he that observed the numerous and loud acclamations in the streets, and the few faint Hallelujahs in the Temple, must needs say they were very disproportionate, and that how much soever the most of us rejoic'd, it was not in the Lord: and then we are not to wonder that it was so transient; since it was merely earthly it must needs partake of the fadingness of its original: whereas had we derived it higher,, it would have been lasting and durable; it could not so suddenly have expired, had we fetched it from him, in whose presence is fullness of joy, and at whose right hand are pleasures for evermore. But alas, our transports were such as exhausted themselves in their own noise, we expressed our Joy in Bonfires, and it vapor'd away in the smoke; there wanted that mixture of Piety which should have fixed that volatile passion, and we who at first were much more glad than thankful, within a very short time ceased to be either.

AND then as violent Heats when once expired, are succeeded by the extremest Cold, so has it fared with us; we fell from our Extasies not to the mean, but the contrary extreme; our vast complacencies at their parting, carried with them, even ordinary contentation, and left us not only joyless, but impatient. It was indeed matter of Equal shame and wonder, to see a scene so suddenly changed, wherein as in many other instances, we seemed to have transcribed the copy of the mutinous Israelites, who we find in the very same Chapter, Ex. 15. triumphing and repining; and no sooner were the Timbrels out of their hands, but Complaints were in their mouths, verse. 24. What shall we drink? and in the beginning of the next, with the same querulous importunity they require meat. But not to wrong them in the comparison, their Murmurs had some extenuating circumstances which ours have not; they looked indeed with some appetite upon Egypt, and made some proposals of Return, but it was while they suffered the hardships of the wilderness; they prefer'd a repleted slavery, before a hungry freedom; but even they were not so frantic in their mutinies, as to make any such offer in Canaan, or have any Emulation to the Garlic and Onions, amidst the affluence of Milk and Honey: No 'tis we Alone that have the unhappy skill of reconciling the sins of Canaan, and the Wilderness; murmur as much under our Vines and Fig-trees, as at Rephidim, or Marah, and make all the outcries of want and slavery, whilst we wallow in the utmost luxury of plenty and freedom. I need not hear specify the particulars of our Murmurings, this discourse being not likely to find many whose innocence will need that information, this malignant humor having spread so, that 'tis now become almost a scandalous (because a singular) thing to be contented. And certainly a considering Foreiner, that should come among us, could not but be astonished to see a Nation so full of all those things which use to create temporal satisfactions, and yet to find nobody in it satisfied; to see so many parties among us, and none prosperous. This is such a riddle as would tempt a man to suspect his senses, and think we had all this while but dreamt of a restoration: been under the delusion the Prophet describes of the hungry and thirsty man, that at his waking, finds he is empty and his soul hath appetite, Isaiah 29. 8. 'Tis a sad, but visible truth, that all that God has done for us, hath been so far from filling our desires, that it has only served to enlarge them: for I appeal to any of our loudest mutineers, whether if some years since the present state of affairs had been represented to them, dressed in the worst circumstances they now complain of, they would not then have thought it extremely amiable, worth Rachel's prize of seven years more hardship; nay whether they would not willingly have made some abatements, relinquish part of what they now enjoy, to have had the rest secured? And when God has granted us all we then asked, shall we murmur because we could now perhaps ask something more; and like ingrate Debtors, pick a quarrel to evade payment? Was it not enough that he engaged his Omnipotence for us, but must his Omniscience also be pressed upon the same service? and provide all he could foresee we would wish? Alas, do we think we have the same hank upon God that some Gallants have on their trusting Merchants, that upon Peril of losing all former scores, he must still go on to supply us? shall we think nothing fit for oblivion but our obligations, and in this perverse sense transcribe S. Paul, Phil. 3. 13. forgetting those things which are behind, reach forward to the things that are before: this indeed too fully speaks us the offspring of our first Parents, we can find no gust in all the fruits of Paradise, if any one be denied us; and still look not on what we have, but what we want; and as it is observed of the greedier sort of creatures that they relish not one bit for the vehement expectation of another: So is it with us, we devour, but do not enjoy our Blessings; and to require him to satisfy us, is to assign him the Poets Hell, set him with Belus daughters to the task of filling a sieve with water, or rolling Sisyphus's stone; our growing appetites still keeping us empty and restless amidst all endeavors to make us otherwise; so that whereas God uses to commit his favors to Men, as seed to the Earth, in expectation of an harvest, some fruits of gratitude and obedience; they seem with us rather to be flung into a Gulf, whose property is only to swallow never to fructify.

I KNOW men's Minds are so possessed with their discontents, our daily mutinous blasts have puffed up and swelled our grievances to such a vastness, that he must expect to be very impatiently heard, that shall attempt to represent them in a lesser size; yet sure 'twere not impossible even upon a direct view, to demonstrate them very light and moderate: but upon a comparative, perfectly trivial and inconsiderable; and 'tis a little strange, that we who bare our late suffering estate with so much Impatience, should not have impressions enough left in our memory, to confront to all our present regrets. Do we not quietly now possess the fruits of our own, or our Progenitors industry, without danger of any Sequestration, but what our own Luxuries inflict? Are not our Persons at freedom; delivered from that kind word, and unkind thing, SECURING? So that when we rise in the Morning, we need not fear our next lodging shall be in the Goal or dungeon; nor when we sit down to our Meal, suspect the intrusion of armed uninvited Guests, who, ere whiles we know, were wont to surprise us, as the Plague did the Israelites, even while the meat was yet in our mouths; are not our Lives under the custody of known Laws, so that no man is in danger that will but keep himself within those Boundaries;

nor need fear to be mocked into his grave by shows and Pageantries of Justice? And besides these real escapes from slavery, are we not rescued from the most imbittering circumstance of it, the having servants rule over us, a thing which rendered our subjection as mean and servile, as it was sharp and pressing, and which we were then so sensible of, that it never mist to bring up the rear of our Complaints. Lastly, if we reflect upon our higher spiritual concerns, are we not freed from those boisterous robust temptations, which with the violence of Famine and Sword, Beggary and Death assaulted our constancy, and left no mean between Martyrdom and Apostasy? Are we not also restored to all those spiritual advantages which we once professed so much to value? That well of life now lies open before us, after which we once panted like the Hart after the water-springs; our ancient worship is revived, and wants only our attendance to make it solemn; whereas the abomination of Desolation stood in the holy place, our prayers were turned to sin; needed, but were denied the Liturgy to pray against them, or atone their guilts. We have no longer stones given us for bread, nor experiment that sad riddle of being at once cloyed and starved amidst excess of preaching, suffering a Famine of the Word. And now are all these worth no regard, if they are not, why did we exclaim so loudly when we wanted them? if they are, why are we still as querulous now we have them? 'Tis sure, these include all our great and substantial interests as men, and Christians, and those being provided for, 'tis not easily imaginable what others we should have important enough to make us querulous, unless it be those of Passion and Humour. One man's ambition perhaps wants a satisfaction, another man's avarice, a thirds spleen; and this discord makes up the very unmusical Harmony of our murmurs. If we see but a Mordecai in the Kings gate whom we wish removed, we can like Haman find no gust in anything we enjoy. If we see some, who we think have born less of the burden and heat of the day, rewarded equally or perhaps above ourselves, we are sure to make out the Parable, by murmuring at the good man of the house: Or if Nineveh be spared, if all be not executed to whom we have denounced destruction, we like Jonah sit down in a sullen discontent, and grow weary of our lives, because others are permitted to enjoy theirs. To these and other heads of the like nature, 'tis apparent our grievances may be reduced; and then if the balance be put into any dispassionate hand, 'tis sure they can never become a counterpoize to the other real benefits we enjoy, but will in the Prophets phrase, appear lighter than vanity and nothing.

BUT I suppose some will say, 'tis not only present uneasinesses of which they are impatient, but the possibility of future, a fear of relapsing into our former estate by the ill managery of our present: To these I shall answer, That admit it were so, yet sure 'twill be no wisdom to anticipate our miseries, to forestall discontents, and make foresight as painful as actual suffering. In other forbidden instances we choose to enjoy the present, and with an Epicurean Indifferency cry, Let us eat and drink for tomorrow we die, 1 Cor. 15. 32. How is it that we here become so unluckily sagacious, unless it be that murmuring is a Sensuality we count equivalent, nay superior to all rational satisfactions; and therefore that we may have no intermission of that delight, suborn our fancies to find occasions, and fetch in from the future those supplies which the present affords not: But besides this, I should in the second place ask these great Diviners, why they do not also foresee, that this very mutinous temper of theirs is the most direct and infallible means of bringing those mischiefs they pretend to fear; that it is so, is most evident, and so well observed by our Adversaries, that there is little doubt, they have not only pleasure, but designs upon it; and to that purpose have their Engins on work to blow up the hot Spirits among us, in expectation from thence to raise a flame. So blind a thing is Passion, that it hurries on to the things which in their issue we most abhor; makes us our Enemies drudges, and the forgers of our own shackles; and whilst we cry out of petty Indulgences, we ourselves give them in the lump, what we grudge them in parcels: This is a miserable infatuation, and while we act thus unreasonably, we are sure no competent declamers against ill managery. But besides this natural effect of our murmurs, we are also to remember that there is a Divine vengeance attending it: when bounties and largesses are quarrel'd at, we necessitate God to another Method, nay indeed, not only his vengeance, but even his kindness seems to suggest it, when he sees our constitutions such, that his gentle applications work contrary effects: 'tis very apposite for him to try whether the Antiperistasis will operate on the other side; if we smart thus under lenitives, 'tis but fit to essay, if corrosives will ease us; and the only remaining experiment for the making us happy, is to make us miserable.

BUT would God we might yet prevent the need of such unkindly expedients, and by a sober estimate, and thankful sense of what we have, provide to conserve it: not fastidiously despise great and eminent blessings, because perhaps they come not home to every part of our wishes. Alas, those plenary satisfactions agree not with the nature of Earthly things: 'tis an observation long since raised from the Globular and Triangular form of the World and our Hearts, that 'tis impossible the one should be filled with the other, there will still be some angles, some vacuities left; our very accessions create new wants, and like an unsound limb, the healing of one Sore is the breaking out of another. Every thing under the Moon partakes of her vicissitudes, augments and decreases only with this Difference, that though their wains be to as low a degree as hers, they never are perfectly at the full. There never was, nor never will be a State here completely happy: And as the Philosopher handsomely reproacht the impatience of the Persian King for the death of his Wife, by undertaking to revive her, if he could help him but to the names of three men that had never grieved to write upon her Tomb; so surely we may make the like offer to our malecontents, and engage to redeem all their uneasinesses, if they can point us out (I say not three, but) one age wherein there were no complaints. What then are our clamorous Repinings, but so many loud invectives against God's decree; a Desire to subvert his fundamental Law, and confound the distinction he has irreversibly set between our Earthly and our Heavenly state: and alas, What mad insolence is this, to expect that the whole Economy of the world must be changed only to humor us? that God must replant us a Paradise, pluck up everyone of the Briers and Thorns which were our native curse? nay, bring down Heaven to us, and enstate us in undisturb'd unmix'd felicities? This is indeed simply considered a very wild expectation, but yet more so when 'tis considered how we qualify ourselves for such a privilege: for let me ask, are we as eager to anticipate the holiness, as the happiness of Heaven? Do we as passionately desire to do God's will, as that God should do ours? And emulate the Angelical obedience and purity, as much as bliss? These are Interrogatories which need no verbal Answer, our lives do too fully resolve them in the negative, and then how shameless a partiality is it, thus to carve to ourselves, and choose out of either state what we best like, reserve all the sensualities of this world, and yet cry out for the impassibleness of the next; but alas, these are pretensions as inconsistent as they are bold, our vices having such a native inseparable adherency of pain and vexation, that 'tis not the most dexterous managery of a sin that can ever sever them, but if we will retain the one, we must the other also: A Truth which might be exemplified to us throughout the whole Catalogue even of sensual sins; but it is most eminently visible in this of murmuring, which stays not as others do to take Pain at the rebound, and by way of result, but has it as its first Element and principle; it being its self almost as great a pain, as any it can betray us to: and yet to secure an advance and perpetuity of Torment, every Event serves to foment and heighten it, and the most desperate things are equally combustible to that flame. Indeed he that is possessed with that humor, has a kind of fury within him, that will never let him rest: And alas, what Legions of such evil Spirits are now among us? How are we as it were inspired with Mutiny, it being the universal dialect of the Nation; and of many in it, who cannot be supposed to found it in any observation of their own, but are led by the common genius, and bellow rather by consent with the rest of the herd, than for any uneasiness, at least of injustice and oppression (for such only give pretence for Mutiny) that themselves feel. And since 'tis become a Plebeian vice, would God our Gentry would use it as they do their fashions, and leave it off (if for no better reason) for its being vulgar: And indeed 'twere but equitable, that those who have taken up so many sins upon punctilio, should for once lay down one upon the same score. The Athenian State put down their Ostracisme (which otherwise they were fond enough of) because it was debased, by happening to fall on Hyperbolus, a despicable and abject person: and there seems not much difference in the cases, save only that we are more tenacious of Sins, than they of Punishments; and I fear we shall so long retain this, till we find it its own Lictor, not only in the present uneasiness, but in that more fruitful harvest of Mischiefs, whereof it has now sown the seeds. We see here what our thankfulness is, for those eminent miraculous mercies we have received, and the account of that is an unhappy specimen, what we are like to find, when we survey the uses we have made of them, which God knows have been so unnatural and perverse, as does too fully parallel the former instance.

FOR first, if we reflect upon our spiritual blessings, what has the enjoyment of those advantages produced, but the contempt of them; we have an easy free access to God in his Sanctuary, our Churches are no longer Garrisons to keep out the worship, to which they were devoted, but like hospitable doors, are open to the regular piety of any that will enter. And now we have this liberty, now the flaming sword is removed, we have lost all appetite to the Tree of life, can willingly let those Everlasting gates (as the Psalmist styles them) Psal. 21. stand as everlastingly open ere we enter them: And though the Fabricks are by God's providence rescued from their dust and ruins, yet many of us endeavor to reduce them to a yet worse desolation, strive to depopulate those sacred Mansions, and execute against them that prophetic threat concerning Nineveh, Nahum. 1. Leave them empty, void and waste. And indeed so they are, if not in an absolute, yet in a Comparative sense; for could we at any time of Divine Service make an estimate of all the persons that are absent, 'twould scarce be discerned that any are there; were all corners ransackt, what a multitude of Recusants should we find upon a far differing account from that of Conscience? Some we should see stretching themselves upon their beds, keeping a Sabbath indeed, but to their floth, not their God; others perhaps we may find rous'd from their Couches, upon the summons not of Religion but Vanity; some new garment is to be fitted, some exotick dress essayed, and they who grudge one hour to the Preachers glass, can spend many at their own; where they are so taken up with their Idolatries to themselves, that they think of no other worship; nay, as the world goes, 'twere well this were the worst diversion, that some did not keep from Church, that they might in the interim, defile those lesser Temples of God they carry about them, and cut themselves off from the Communion of Christ's body, to make themselves members of an Harlot: or that others were not Bacchus his Votaries when they should be God's, spend that time in their frantic revels, and sing a Dithyrambick instead of Te Deum. As for the Mammonist, if he keep any holy day, 'tis like the Israelites to his God's of Gold, Exod. 32. 31. He is looking with veneration on his Idoliz'd treasure, numbering those bags he dares not use, or perhaps with a more active Zeal pursuing the means of increasing them. Thus alas, may we go from one to another, and as it was in Ezekiel's vision, see still greater abominations, Ezek. 8. And certainly that All-seeing Eye, which discerns what multitudes do thus busy themselves, at the times even of his solemnest worship, cannot but adjudge us most profane despisers of his mercy in restoring it: Yet would to God 'twere only the absent upon whom that sentence would fall; but alas, the behavior of many in the Church does too loudly testify how little of devotion brings them thither, and at how mean a rate they value all that is done there: Those Eyes which there should wait on God, as those of a Servant on the hands of his Master, Psal. 123. 2. are rolling about to fetch in all the vanities and temptations which can occur to them, and look every way, but towards Heaven. Our Tongues which should be touched with a Coal from the Altar, devoted wholly to Hymns and Prayers, are busied in private Colloquies with those about us: Business, News, nay, all the impertinent chat of our most vacant hours, is then taken up to entertain us; so that he who would know the talk of the Town or neighbourhood, need go neither to Exchange nor Market, the Church will as certainly supply him: And this ill employment of our Tongues, engages the like of our Ears, which when they should be hearkening what the Lord God will say concerning us, are listening to those vain discourses we hold with one another, from all which outward indecencies we may too surely collect the inward irreverence of our heart. And is it possible that this should now be the Temper of those, who not long since seemed to bewail their exclusion from those sacred Assemblies: Did we long for them as David for the waters of Bethlehem, when they appeared unattainable, and when they are brought to us, refuse to taste them, pour them out not as he did in devotion, but in contempt? 'Tis true indeed, in temporal Delights possession usually proves a nauseating thing, and takes off our appetite; but it uses not to be so in spiritual, whose peculiar property it is not to satiate, but excite by fruition: But alas, though the Things we converse with are spiritual, our Hearts are carnal, and that is the cause why instead of crying out with the Psalmist, When shall I come to appear in the presence of God, Psal. 42. We, like those in Malachi, Chap. 1. 13. Snuff at his service, and say, What a weariness is it? A weariness indeed it appears in the literal sense with many, who sleep at it as men over-labor'd, and scarce take so sound repose in their own houses as in God's; indeed such is the variety of rude behavior that is there used, that should an unbeliever come into their Assemblies, he must surely (as St. Paul supposes in another case, 1 Cor. 14. 23.) say we are mad; to see some gazing, some whispering, some laughing, others sleeping, and perhaps the far fewer number praying; is such a medly, as the most brutish Idolaters never admitted in their worships; and the way of worshipping Mercury, by throwing stones, or Hercules by cursing, is a sober and decent kind of service compared with this. And now alas, when will the Church recover its ancient Title, and become the house of prayer; 'tis sure according to the present appearance it may have many more proper names, that being the least part of the business done in it: 'Tis true, there are some that make it a Sanctuary, but 'tis only against the penalties of the Law, or reproach of errant Atheism; they come to save their money or their credit; others perhaps shun the solitariness of being at home, and come not as to a place of Devotion, but Concourse; and 'tis to be doubted, some visit that place as they do many others, because they have nothing else to do: They want their weekdays diversion, and so are driven thither upon mere destitution of more grateful entertainments; make it a kind of Sunday play-house, sit there as Spectators or Judges, to see the company, or censure the Preacher, but never remember that themselves have any other part to act; or are beheld by Him, who will not always be patient of such profanation; but will, as the Scripture speaks, Repay them to their face, who thus contemn him to his. We know among men, everyone counts his House his fortress; and an Affront offered him there, doubles the Injury, and is not only a contempt, but an invasion: and shall it not be a proportionable enhancement with God also, thus to defy him within his own doors, and approach his presence in an impious bravery, the more fully to show him, how little we regard him. At this rate while we address ourselves, we may as ill mannered Guests be forbid his house: Interrogated by God as the Jews were, Is. 1. Why doest thou tread my Courts? A total abandoning of Worship being more fair and ingenuous than such Devotion: wherein like the barbarous soldiers, we bring Christ a Scepter only to smite him on the head with it; and make a preface of homage to give ourselves the sport of the mockery: nay, 'tis sadly to be feared, that God may thrust us out of his House, shut his Doors against us, rescue his Service and himself from our profanation, and put us again under the same, (or a worse interdict than that) which lately lay upon us.

HAVING now seen our scandalous Irreverence towards God's worship in general, 'tis too easy to make Application to the several parts of it; everyone of which must necessarily partake of the contempt which falls upon the whole; for while we bring no thoughts but secular with us; those are equally disagreeing to all the Divine offices: 'twill be needless therefore to trace our wanderings in each of those, since our whole behavior in the Church is one great deviation from the business we should come about: yet that supersedes not to every guilty person himself the necessity of a more distinct and particular reflection. 'Tis sure at the last dreadful Audit, we must account for every of those spiritual advantages we have abused; and alas, what a dismal reckoning will many of us have then to give up, when our prayers which we now turn into Sin, shall be turned into perdition: and We who would not supplicate our God, shall in vain invoke the mountains and hills to hide us from the face of the lamb, when that Word which we now so fastidiously despise, that it must be dressed up in the colors of human Rhetoric, to make us at all patient of it, and becomes then only tolerable to us when it is farthest removed from being God's: when that word, as our Savior speaks, shall judge us, and that gracious invitation to life end in that fatal sentence, Go ye Cursed. Nay, when our very Propitiation shall plead against us, and the crucified Body of our Savior, which we have in Effigie so often recrucified, in our unworthy approaches, or impious neglect of the holy Eucharist, shall witness against us as its murderers, when we shall be found not sprinkled as with the blood of a sacrifice, but imbrued as with that of slaughter: when all these means of our salvation, shall thus miserably convert, and from the savor of life, become that unto death, 2 Cor. 2. 16. then we shall to our amazement find, how differing our estimates of them were from God's; and in his vengeance read the value he put upon them. What then have we now to do, but to anticipate our dooms-day, and judge ourselves that we may not be judged of the Lord: To make an impartial account of all these our profanations, and accuse ourselves before his mercy seat, that so we may prevent the arraignment at his bar of Judgment. And as Offenders are usually enjoin'd to acknowledge their guilts in the very places where they committed them; so let us make the Church the Scene of our penitence, as we have of our faults: By our strong crying and tears, deprecate our former indevotion, and by an exemplary Reverence, redress the scandal of our Profaneness. This, and only this is the way to secure us against the final Vengeance of these sins; nay, and against the intermedial also: for we are not to expect that so unkind abuse of mercy shall be wholly respited to another world, it being so exasperating a crime, as must in all probability awake God's fury, and pull down present Judgments, I wish the Event do not too soon attest the reasonableness of this supposal.

IF from our spiritual Blessings, we now descend to our temporal, we shall not appear much better managers of those; they being generally employed to purposes the most distant from those, for which they were given. And first for our peace, that great comprehensive enjoyment, upon which all others are dependent, and which is to our civil Capacities, the same that health is to our natural; the thing by which we relish and taste the rest of our comforts, we may from the Song of Zacharias, Luk. 1. learn for what intent God bestows it: Deliverance from enemies is to no other end, but that we may serve God in holiness and righteousness all the days of our life: But alas, he that observes how we employ our quiet, must surely say it serves little to the advancement either of Holiness or Righteousness: For the first of these we have already seen, how little of holiness we show even in that place where nothing else should be admitted; and we are not so preposterously religious, to show more in others. That Piety which is so cold and benumb'd under the warm breath of the public Ordinances; we may well presume stark frozen, in our more retired offices: and if it thus faint and sink in consort, 'tis sure more liable to the Wise man's Vae soli, and utterly dies when we are alone. 'Tis true indeed, these Closet transactions are immediately visible to none but the searcher of hearts, yet in true Devotion there is such a Symmetry and proportion, that the Inferences we make by analogy may be very irrefragable; nay, 'tis to be feared many lie open to a yet clearer conviction, and may be proved to have few or none of those private intercourses with heaven; for though a negative be not simply evincible, yet as in civil cases we prove a man not to have been at this time in such a place, by his having actually been in another; so were the whole Week, Moneth, perhaps Year: of some men exactly traced, we should find them so engrossed with other diversions, that there will scarce be found any Minute for devotion to interpose: Men's worldly or fleshly Concerns so divide their time, that God from whom 'tis all derived can be afforded no tribute out of it. Yet alas, 'twere well if this privative sort of impiety were all we had to answer for: but 'tis too apparent we do not only neglect God, but reproach and violate him: what else are those bold and insolent blasphemies wherewith we daily assault him, making him the mark at which all our wild Passions are shot. Do we want anything either for our use or delight, presently God is accused, his providence or his goodness questioned; and he declaim'd against either as impotent or illiberal. Does any body vex or disquiet us, God must have his share of our displeasure, his sacred name must be profaned, and we count our fiercest Revilings of men, faint and insignificant, if not inspired with the most dreadful and horrid Oaths; Nay, he stands obnoxious to all the displacencies we receive even from inanimate creatures, if a Die or a Card run amiss, our resentments are presently vented upon him; he is profaned and vilified, as if he were the Cheat that rookt us of our money, because he does not secure us from those losses, to which we wantonly expose ourselves; nor is it only our eager and warmer passions that thus invade him: Our pleasanter moods do the very same, and we blaspheme by way of divertisement; every impertinent story or insipid Jest, must have the haut-goust of an Oath to recommend it, as every incredible Narration has to attest it: to say nothing of those more solemn and deliberate perjuries, wherein we impiously suborn God's venerable and dreadful name, to be the Engin of our fraud and malice: and as if we thought he would forswear as well as we, bring him to countenance those Crimes he has vowed to punish. Thus do we with a prodigious impiety contaminate even divinity its self, make it the sink for all our puddles to run into; and prostitute that name which as the Psalmist speaks, is great, wonderful and holy, to all the unholy purposes, our Passions, our Interest, or our Phancies can suggest to us.

THIS profaneness is so proper a foundation for Atheism, that we are not to wonder to see so many advance from the one to the other, they pay so little of the reverence due to God, that at last they turn their impiety into argument, and infer him not to be God, whom they treat so unlike one. And truly this seems to be the grand piece of Logic, which has disputed many, not only out of Christian, but all native Religion. How unhappily successful it has proved among us is too apparent in those impious discourses which are everywhere heard, wherein men are arrived to such a licentiousness, that David's Atheist was a modest Puny, who only said in his Heart there is no God, and perhaps upon that account shall by some be adjudged to deserve the Epithet the Psalmist gives him, and be indeed thought a fool that would not own what would now a-days so certainly denominate him a Wit, or in the solemn style a Master of Reason. And indeed they will attest the propriety of the style, they rather governing Reason, than being governed by it; otherwise 'twould be hard to discern, how from different premises the same conclusion should be induced: and those who in the late adverse times denied God in revenge of their sufferings, should now pay their gratitude also in the same manner, and renounce him as (or more) loudly since his signal attestation of that righteous cause; his not owning whereof was then their principal plea. The truth is, 'tis a little strange how Atheism could admit such enhancing accessions as we find it has; for it being the completion and highest step of Ill, and that to which all others do but subordinately tend, one would think it should from its first appearance in the world, have been so mature and full grown a sin, as could be capable of no improvement; but so subtly wicked are these later days, that we can never be brought to a non ultra, but still find something to add to the compleatest sin: therefore though of those that are really Atheists, one cannot be said to be more so than another, yet some may be more daringly, and mischievously so; and sure in that respect our modern, surmount all former: They were generally on the defensive part, took up the tenet as a buckler against the unwelcome invasions and Checks of conscience, and designed nothing but the more peaceable enjoyment of their lusts; but now men do not only use, but love it; make themselves its avowed Champions, seek to win it Proselytes; and in short, appear so zealous for it, as if they made it their religion to have none. And God knows, too many such reversed kinds of Evangelists we now have, who with as great design unteach Divinity, as the first Propugnors taught it, and their number and boldness have so encreas'd since the return of our peace, that sure the next Age will have little cause to think Religion had any share in the Restoration. Thus have we done our parts to supersede that obligation of serving God in holiness, by leaving no God to serve; and after the most signal attestation of his Deity in our rescue, we do like those ingratepersons, who seek to subvert those by whom themselves were established, and deny him because he has owned us.

THIS is the holiness wherewith we have served him, since our being delivered from the hands of our Enemies, and our righteousness has been very proportionable, for if we look into the dealings of all ranks of men; we shall find the same vein of deceit run through all transactions. A few years since Sequestration and plunderings, those whole-sale robberies had so over-topt the rest, that like an Epidemick disease they had overwhelmed, if not the kind, yet at least the notice of all other Injustices: but since those Leviathans are withdrawn, the lesser Devourers supply their place; Fraud succeeds to Violence; and in all places, all occasions of commerce, we still meet with Sequestrators. The adulterated wares, and false measures in Shops; the dilatory proceedings, and evasive tricks in Law; the various and unworthy Cheats of Creditors, and the mean and dishonest advantages which are watched in all sorts of Contracts, are too irrefragable proofs hereof. Nay, not only our Business, but our very recreations expose us to these deceits, as some of our bankrupted Gamesters can too sadly witness, what troops of Harpyes attend those sports is every man's observation: 'Tis strange so many should yet be to learn the prudence to avoid so known a danger, wherein a man is at once made active and passive in the same Robbery, and does himself defraud his family of that, whereof he is defrauded by another. But amongst these many injustices, there is none wherein Men seem generally to find such a gust and sensuality, as those wherein God is concerned; twenty Laybooties humor them not so much as one from the Clergy; and if the Quakers should be mustered according to that one Tenet of not paying Tythes, we should indeed find their numbers formidable. How subtle even the rudest persons are in defaulting those dues, we see by every days experiment, the over-reaching their Minister being the grand Triumph of a Rusticks wit; so that not only their covetousness but their vanity is concerned in it: I know 'tis the usual apology for this kind of Sacrilege, that either the maintenance of the Clergy is too much, or their merit too little; for the first, I think it may be demonstrated, That there is no liberal Science, and but few Mechanic trades, from which a man may not hope as plentiful a subsistence, as this affords to the generality of its professors:

However I shall leave those that make this objection to dispute it with that authority, which has allotted them this proportion; desiring them to consider, that whatever the support of the Clergy is, it costs them nothing; no man having Purchast more, than what remains of the Estate, after his Tyth is paid. As to the second, I confess 'tis extremely to be wisht, that the negligence and vice of Some did not give too much pretence to the Allegation; and to such I cannot but apply the words of our Savior, Mat. 18. 7. woe be to theman by whom the offense cometh; yet certainly 'tis very incompetent, to justify the detention of their legal rights: for till the Law which has assigned them, delegate the Forfeiture to me, the greatest enormities of my Pastor, cannot entitle me to anything that is his: And indeed what blame soever is really due to some, we must expect it should extend to all, if the Accusers were to have the benefit of the Mulct; and (as in the late confusions) all Ministers should be made scandalous, in order to the making them poor.

'TWERE easy to draw up a far larger Catalogue of those injustices we daily commit; for as a man has divers other concerns besides his goods, so he may be injured in all those: and truly the iniquity of these days, seems fully commensurate to all the suffering capacities of mankind: we weigh our own and others Concerns, in very differing balances, and offer those Injuries without any regret, which we can with no patience suffer: How nicely Jealous is everyone of us of his own Repute, and yet how maliciously Prodigal of other men's? so that Defamation is become one of our main Topics of discourse, furnishes entertainment to all companies; the present owe their Divertisement to the absent, and many would be drein'd quite dry, were it not for this reserve, which like an unexhaustible spring, still supplies fresh matter of talk. In like manner how carefully do we avert any hurt or mutilation of our own bodies, and yet how barbarously inconsiderate are we of others, to whom we do the greatest outrages rather than use any violence to our Passion, or restrain an angry Humor: only I confess there is one Instance, wherein though we are unjust, we are not so partial; but expose ourselves also, and that is in the case of Duells, a barbarous custom wherein 'tis hard to define, whether the Wickedness or Folly be greater; yet it maintains its way in spite of all the methods God has used to make us better or wiser: Of this there are too many, and too noted instances since our restoration, as if we were so enamour'd of destruction, that when we are prevented of it from our Enemies, we seek it from one another, or thought public Peace so intolerable, that when 'tis cast upon us (as sure ours, if ever any may be said to be) we are fain to take in private quarrels, as our rescue from that dull quiet, and court the utmost mischiefs, to avoid the oppression of the greatest happiness. Thus perversely do we countermine God's purposes of kindness, and when he has secured us, solicitously seek to be delivered from our safety; project new dangers, and dare his power with a yet harder Task, the delivering us from ourselves: And whilst we thus avert our quiet, 'tis no wonder that we produce no better effects of it; nor fructify under that, which we will not permit ourselves to enjoy.

AND as upon this general view, we appear very ill managers of our Peace, so shall we much more, if we reflect on those many particular blessings which are wrapped up in that, of which we make so perverse use, that we therein no less violate Sobriety, than we have already appeared to do piety and righteousness; so filling up the measure of our iniquity by transgressing all the fundamental rules of Christianity, living neither soberly, righteously, nor Godly in this present world, Tit. 2. 12. And of those advantages which are the appendages to Peace, there are two most eminent; Plenty and Liberty, both of which are the more remarkable in our present quiet, by how much the deprivation of each was the greater. For the first, we know the late times of rapine, had torn from many among us their whole subsistence, so entirely despoil'd them that they were reduced to Job's condition, and connected the two extreme points of Birth and Death, by a middle state of the like nakedness and destitution: and to such, our late restoration was a kind of Civil resurrection; raised them like Elisha's dry bones, from the most hopeless state, and by a successive possession of their own Inheritances, made them heirs to themselves. And though all were not so wholly divested, yet like those Canaanites whom the Jews did not extirpate, they were put under Tribute: and while persons who knew so well how to exact were Lord's Paramount, a bare being was all that could be expected, they seemed rather Stewards than Owners of their fortunes, and had rather the trouble than advantage of their Managery: And who would not think that this so long want of plenty, should have taught us sobriety in the using it; that desuetude should have worn out the skill of luxury, and we should not have known how to be riotous: but alas, our memories have been too faithful to us in this particular, no one of our vanities is fallen into oblivion, but on the contrary the art of Voluptuousness so improved, as if all the time that was lost from the Practick, had been spent in the Theory, and we had for so many years been contriving new kinds and degrees of excess. Indeed it is too sure we retained the affection when we had lost the power of rioting; and 'tis not our prosperity seduces us, but we it. For as the Sun though it lends its rays to the begetting of the vilest Insects, yet makes no such production but upon apt matter, slime and putrefaction: so neither would the most opulent fortune make us sensual, did it not find us disposed and prepared for it. How forcible those propensions are, appears by the multitude of objects on which they work; For they had need be strong Inclinations that take in all Opportunities, nay possibilities of actuating themselves, and such 'tis evident ours are, there being nothing capable of ministering to luxury, which we use not to that purpose. Our Meat is no longer apportioned to our Hunger, but our Tastes: so that the Stomach is made merely passive in the matter of Eating; serves only to receive those loads we charge it with, whilst its Elections and Choices are forestall'd by the palate or fancy; nay, 'tis not permitted so much as a negative voice, not allowed to refuse what is either for kind or quantity destructive to it: We do with studied mixtures force our reluctant appetites, and with all the Spells of Epicurism, conjure them up that we may have the pleasure of laying them again. Thus unworthily treacherous are we to Nature, which while we pretend to relieve, we oppress, by giving her not only beyond her need, but sufferance: And to show we are no less dextrous in mixing sins than meats; our very Pride (though in its self an intellectual vice) mingles with our Gluttony, everything is insipid that is not costly; and it is thought an ignoble Peasant-like thing to eat a plain meal: Nor is he now to be looked on as a Gentleman, whose single Ordinary costs not as much as would be (and himself would perhaps some years since have thought) a fair exhibition for some whole families. And that we may not be charged with partial intemperance, we go not less in that of drink, wherein we are so nice and critical, that 'tis become a special skill and faculty to judge of liquors: But how great soever our curiosity be, 'tis sure our excess is greater, and does not only over-match but supplant it; there being no drink so unpleasant which the love of a debauch will not reconcile us to. So great a malice do we bear to our reason, that to oppress it, we are content to expose our darling, and do violence to our very sense. How unhappily predominant this brutish Vice is, need not here be told, since it too evidently attests its self, to every man's observation, it no longer seeking the shelter of night and darkness, but impatient of such delay, appears in the broadest light; and he is now a slow-paced drunkard, that has not finished his course, perhaps begun another, before the Sun has ended his: nay, so is the Scene changed, that sobriety is become the reproachful thing, such as even those who value it dare not own, and are either driven to preserve it by shifts and artifices, or else choose to abandon it rather than hazard the scandal. And certainly this is the great advantage this sin has for the propagating its self, for 'tis impossible Bestiality should be so universally agreeable to mankind, that all should pursue it out of appetite and liking: 'tis this Fear that engages many in it; and though it have too many volunteers, yet sure 'tis this press that helps to make up its numbers, which as it speaks the great baseness of those who are thus ashamed both of Piety and Humanity, and had rather cease to be men, than appear to be Christians; so is it a sad indication of National impiety, a fatal Symptom that we have near filled up the measure of our iniquities, and are ripened for the woes denounced against those who call evil good, and good evil, Esa. 5. 20. which sure was never more palpably done than in this instance, wherein temperance is branded for ill nature, and dullness of humor; whilst the most swinish Excess must pass for sociableness, friendship, and hospitality; names which have been so long prostituted that they have lost their native use, and men have forgot those very distant things to which they originally belonged, yet sure such once there were: God made us sociable creatures, and we might still continue so upon the strength of that first principle, and need not owe our intercourse to our debaucheries; no, nor our friendships neither, which have been so far from being preserved that way, that there is nothing more obviously, and frequently violates them; nay, indeed the whole species of real Friendships seems to be extinct, since this fictitious sort took place. Men think it enough (as indeed 'tis too much) to damn themselves with their friends, and all other communications are transmuted into that of Sin, for we daily see those, who cleave the most inseparably in this kind to each other, will yet neither do nor suffer anything else: And sure if this be friendship, 'tis such a reversed kind of it as must have as preposterous a Definition; for none that have yet been given by Divines or Philosophers will fit it. The like may be said of hospitality, which sure is in its proper nature of a very distant make from this; designed to relieve Strangers, not burden them; to cure their wants indeed, but not by the worse exchange of a Surfet: So that the ancient and the modern Hospitality, differ as much as that of Melchizedek from that of Circe; the one refreshes, the other transforms: And how great a show soever of liberality this later may have, yet he is not to be thought to have drunk gratis, that has paid his reason for his shot.

AND to both these parts of Intemperance, our Uncleaness bears full proportion, the one makes provision for the flesh, and the other fulfils the lusts thereof. To how brutish an impudence this sin is grown is too visible: we need not trace men into their privacies and recesses, themselves willingly proclaim their guilts; nay, dread nothing so much as the opinion of being innocent: yea so out-dated a virtue is Modesty now become, that even that Sex to which it was once accounted the greatest ornament, have put it off, look on it as a piece of Rusticity, and country breeding: whether this pulling down the fence be an Indication they are willing to lie common, I shall not determine: but sure that very free, and confident behavior now in use, is too apt to invite assaults, and takes off all that Extenuation of crime, which was wont to be allowed that Sex upon the supposition of their being seduced? Thus do we publish our sin as Sodom, and if we consider how much boldness it has gained since the return of our prosperity; twill be probable that ours also has been fomented by fullness of bread, and abundance of Idleness, Ez. 1. 6. That our Plenty is very subservient to it, appears by the vast expense wherewith many men manage this vice: And that our Idleness is so too, is no less evident by the large portions of time that are spent in those pursuits, it being as the great design, so the especial business of too many men's lives. As for the remedy which God has assigned, it serves now only to exasperate the disease. Marriage with too many only advances simple-fornication to adultery, and superadds perjury to uncleanness; those sacred bands are like Samsons withs, broken upon every assault of the Philistines, and the very thought of being confined makes men more apt to range; For alas, 'tis not their needs but their Phancies they are to provide for, and that is so endless, that the greatest liberty of Polygamy would never satisfy it: the same quarrel would lie then to multiplied wives, which does now to single; I mean, that they were their own: And how numerous soever their flock were, 'twould not secure their poor neighbors only Lamb, especially when 'tis considered, that in this they gratify two sins at once, their vanity as well as their lust; their complacence in undermining the Husband, being generally as great, as that in enjoying the Wife. And if Pride abstractedly and in its own nature be, as Solomon says, an abomination to the Lord, certainly when 'tis thus complicated, it must be infinitely more so, and ascertain a concurrence of those Judgments, which are singly threatened to each of those Sins; what those are, I wish guilty persons would seriously ponder, and then they would surely think their momentary pleasures much overbought. But alas, such a fascinating sin this is, as allows men no liberty of consideration, they go on as the wise-man says, Prov. 7. 22. with the same stupidity that an Ox goeth to the slaughter: or, a fool to the correction of the stocks; and while everybody else observes the Effects of their Vice in their wasted bodies, and ruined estates; themselves are the last that discern it, pursue the course till the very last remains of strength and wealth are exhausted, and nothing left them but disease and beggary. Of the truth of this, there have been too many sad examples, though it seems not yet enough, to give caution to others.

And to these lusts of the flesh, we spare not to add those of the Eye also, for so surely we may properly call all those Luxuries which adapt themselves peculiarly to that Faculty, such are the gaity of Apparel, richness of Furniture, and all the splendor of Equipage, which has no propriety to any other sense, but that of seeing, and is lost if it be not looked on: And though these seem to differ much from that Covetousness which St. John is supposed to comprehend in that Phrase, the one being the tenacity, the other the profusion of Money; yet they are but several branches of the same Sin, and are diversified only by a various application to the Object: for in strict speaking, he that covets Gold and Silver to lay on his back, is as properly covetous, as he that designs it only to fill his coffers. But besides the propriety these excesses have to that title, they have no less claim to that ensuing, The Pride of Life; it being evident that they are both Effects and Fomenters of Pride: and sure this sets but an ill Character upon them, that when the Apostle has divided all the lusts of the world into three sorts, these bid so fair to two of them. I would not here be understood to condemn that Decency and moderate Expencc, which agree to the several ranks and qualities of Persons, there being not only a lawfulness, but some kind of civil necessity for such Distinctions: nor is the levelling principle fitter to be admitted in Habit, than in Title or Estate: That which I accuse is quite another thing, it being that inordinate profusion which does not only exceed the ability and fortune of the Person, but the proportion of his rank and condition; and so confounds that distinction it should preserve, and levels us the wrong way: it being more tolerable that all should be Peasants, than all Lord's. And this is the irregularity that many seem to affect, there being not only an emulation of pomp and bravery among equals, but those of the most distant qualities, there seeming now no other measure than the utmost extent of their money or credit; the later whereof is often so stretched, that it not only cracks its self, but by an unhappy contagion, breaks those it deals with, and like a Granado tears Towns in pieces: The many ruined Families of Tradesmen do too sadly attest this; would God our Gallants would consider how unequal it is, that many should want necessary clothing, only to maintain the superfluity of theirs; an Injustice which not only upon a religious, but politick account deserves the severest Reproof, and since Divine Laws will not restrain it, 'twere well if Humane were provided: though I confess, 'twere not easy to find out penalties to deter those whom the wants so usually attending these excesses will not discourage. This sort of vanity was once thought peculiar to women, and though I cannot say that the sexes have exchange'd faults, (because each still keeps its own, together with those of the other) yet 'tis evident they have communicated them, and as the women of this Age have transcribed masculine Vices, so the men have feminine; this particularly, wherein they seem fully to answer the Copy, they being as Critically knowing in all the mysteries of vanity, and as diligent in reducing their speculations to practice, as any the most extravagant female. Indeed both the one and the other pursue this folly with so great an expense of Care, Time, and Money, as if to be fine and happy were the same thing, and their bodies had been designed for their Cloaths, rather than their clothes for their Bodies.

AND now when all these luxuries are to be served, it had need be an exorbitant plenty that shall supply them; and that will unfold the riddle so frequent among us, of so many being poorer since they recovered their estates, than when they wanted them: Our revenue how large soever, is so clogged and encumber'd with our vices, that they molder away, and only serve to carry other men's with them, by giving credit to run in debt. There are indeed no such unmerciful extractors as our own Lusts, the one gleans after the other, till they induce such a scarcity as the Prophet Joel describes 1. 4. That which the Palmer-worm hath left, hath the Locust eaten, and that which the Locust hath left, hath the Canker-worm eaten, and that which the Canker-worm hath left, hath the Caterpillar eaten: So that in effect we have only changed our oppressors, and are as much or more exhausted by our sins, as we were before by other men's; with this woeful circumstance that now we have the guilts as well as the sufferings: Thus do we rob ourselves, and create want in the midst of all that abundance God has given us, using our plenty as the Benjamites did the Levites Concubine, Judge. 19. force and prostitute it till we destroy it; and the similitude holds in this also, that what we thus violate is not our own; for let us fancy what we will, certainly our superfluities are more the poors Right than ours, assigned to them by God the grand Proprietor. So that our Excesses have besides their proper guilt, that of injustice superadded; and when the cry of the poor shall be join'd to those of our riots, they will certainly be too clamorous to let vengeance any longer sleep.

THIS is the account we can give of our plenty, and that of our liberty is not much better; 'tis not long since that arbitrary tyranny expired, which gave us no other measures of our duties or punishments, than the will or avarice of the Imposers: And then how did we gasp to be under the conduct and Protection of known determinate Laws? Yet now we have them, who considers them, or is regulated by them? Between the licentiousness of Inferiors, and the remissness of Superiors, they are rendered things only of form, not use; for while the one violates, and the other connives, what can they signify, and though there be never so many new Laws made to assert the old, yet we see they serve for little but to partake of the same contempt with the others, and are but like the Chimeras of an Utopian State, sagely contrived, but to no purpose. 'Tis the Execution of Laws that gives them a real and effective being, and without that, amidst our great volumes we are yet destitute, and may too probably experiment the truth of that Axiom, that 'tis better to live where nothing is lawful, than where all things are. Indeed if we remember how the Statutes of Omri were kept, with what a tameness the severest Impositions of the late Usurpers were submitted to, we have reason to think coercion is the surest Principle of vulgar obedience; though withal it sets but an ill mark upon us, who know so much better how to be slaves than subjects. And as we are restored to our civil Liberty, so as a branch or consequent of that, we are to our personal also: We were lately in the condition Christ foretold to St. Peter, carried by others whither we would not, Io. 21. 18. but now we gird ourselves and go whither we will; and alas, what use do many of us make of this freedom? Is it not visible, that neither our public or private affairs are the better attended: But on the contrary we are in a restless pursuit of impertinent or vicious pastimes, go pilgrimages to our pleasures, wander about from this sport, that meeting to another, till many of us forget we have any other concerns in the world, and are as much strangers to our own homes, as when we were forcibly detained thence: And for such I know not whether the former restraint be not eligible, to be a prisoner being a kind of rescue to him, that would otherwise be a vagrant.

THESE are the uses we make of those advantages whereof God has repossess us. I know 'tis too envious a task to distribute these accusations to every Rank and Order of men among us; I have here given them in the lump, and wish that not only such degrees, but each person would adapt to himself his peculiar share, wherein contrary to other dividends, I fear the only Immodesty and Injustice too will generally be, for everyone not to carve liberally for himself. However, 'tis sure in the gross they make up the Character of a most barbarously ungrateful Nation. God was pleased to return our peace, before we had forsaken our sins, as if he meant to try our ingenuity; that we who had been so much worse than beasts under the former method, that no stripes would discipline us, might have this advantage to redeem our credit, and be drawn with these cords of a man: but we have put off not only piety but humanity, and are equally intractable to all methods. And now who can refrain from Moses's passionate Apostrophe, Do ye thus requite the Lord O foolish people and unwise, Deut. 32. 6. Unwise indeed, that from the most benign purposes of God, extract nothing but our own mischiefs: are the poorer for his Liberalities, and the worse for his Goodness; by a preposterous use so wear out our Blessings, that they cease to be, at least to be Blessings: And if they once fall from that, there is no middle form for them to assume, they convert into the direct contrary, and become the fatallest Curses, more heavy than those which were originally designed as such; that degeneration adding malignity, and no Fury being so extreme, as that which bottoms upon repe'l'd and irritated Love. God's mercies are like those pictures, which according to the different position of the beholder, carry different Representations, if we will still stand on the wrong side, and not take them in their more amiable appearance, we shall find they can put on a dreadful: his Goodness will not be finally unoperative, if we will not permit it to lead us to repentance, 'twill drive us to destruction. I am sure we have all reason to expect he should exert his power as eminently against us, as he has done for us, unless perhaps he sees that is not necessary to our ruin, for indeed let him but stand by and not interpose his omnipotence for us, he may trust us to be his Executioners, our Vices having a natural as well as moral Efficacy to destroy us. And who knows whether that be not the reason of his seeming connivance, that he forbears to strike us, to give us up to those more fatal wounds we inflict on ourselves; this alas we have too much cause to fear, for 'tis sure 'tis not our innocence that gives us Impunity, but 'tis more than probable 'tis our incorrigibleness; that God gives us over with a why should ye be smitten anymore? Will not prostitute his Judgments, but as the basest of Malefactors leave us to the basest of Executioners, and let our iniquities become our ruin. This as it is the severest purpose God can entertain towards us, so 'tis our most important concern to avert. And O that we, who have so perversely resisted all the designs of his love, would now try to defeat that of his anger, rob him of those intestine avengers within our own breasts, those fleshly lusts which fight against the Soul, 1 Pet. 2. 10. which do not only provoke, but execute his Wrath, and make us more miserable than Hell its self could do without them; and God knows 'tis more than time for us, to seek an escape from so formidable mischiefs: O let us not contract one minutes delay, let us cast ourselves at the feet of our offended God, and as those who are condemned to disgraceful Executions, use to petition for some death of less Infamy, as a boon and favor, so let us beg, that he will please to think us worth his own correction; that whatsoever we suffer from his hand, yet that we may not (like to Herod) be delivered up to the loathsome fortune of being devoured by our own putrefaction. In a word, let us form David's choice into an importunate prayer, and earnestly beg that we may fall into the hands of God, and not into the hands of men, at least not of ourselves, who are more to be dreaded than all our other Enemies.

INDEED till we do thus, our prosperities are far from real, and do in this justify our most mutinous repinings, that we are never the better for them, nay, much the worse, yet since 'tis only we that have enervated them, they will stand upon our account in their proper weight and value: When our receipts are summed up, God will charge us with them, not as those empty uselessthings we have made them, but as those great and solid blessings he intended them. And certainly this is most deplorable ill managery, to reserve nothing to ourselves but the burden and account of our good things; to enjoy nothing, and yet be answerable for all. In secular things men usually pay with some regret, for those things of which they have only anticipated the use: But with what dismal reluctancies shall we come to pay for these, of which we have made no advantage, and must therefore pay the dearer because we have not; it being not so much the things, as our employing of them to our benefit, whereof God will exact account. His anger is then only incens'd, when we resist his love; and his only quarrel to us is, for frustrating his design of making us happy. And sure those well deserve his wrath, that will provoke it on such terms; yet so perverse is the choice, as of all sinners in general, so especially of this Nation at this time, who have all before us which might make us happy in both worlds, if we did not Madly affect to be so in neither, God grant we may recover the Sobriety to make wiser elections, before it be out of our power to make any, and we be found to stand to the mischiefs of our own wild Option.

THE Reader will perhaps think, I have gone beyond the limits of a moderate digression, but the too great copiousness of the Theme, must be my excuse: such overgrown Vices cannot well be drawn in little, and where there is such a multitude, the most superficial view of Each, is rather proportional to a distinct Tract, than to the few Pages it has borrowed in this. My greater fear is, that the event may prove it impertinent, there being not much hope that a private whisper shall be heard by those, who are deaf to the loudest calls of Heaven, and have made no other use of those various and signal Providences we have been under, than to defeat the design of them.

CHAP. IX. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Disputes in general.

THESE are some of those many artifices, whereby Satan like a cunning Picklock, slyly robs us of our grand treasure, the power and efficacy of our Christianity, and leaves us only the empty Casket, the name and formal Profession, that which serves only to make us proud, not rich, confident, not safe: And God knows, so many are daily thus befooled by him, so many fall as preys to these his Stratagems, as might, one would think, glut the eagerest malice, and supersede all farther designs: but so insatiate is this grand Devourer, that retail-prizes, though never so frequent, do rather enrage than satisfy his appetite: He is Enemy not only to this or that man, but to mankind in gross, and therefore as if he feared that even his malice might not prove indefatigable enough for so many distinct pursuits, he contrives more compendious methods of destruction: Frames such Engines as take off whole ranks, nay, troops; compounds such active Poison, as like a Pestilence, kills multitudes at once. It is too trivial a Mischief to annoy the outward parts, it is his Mastery to spread an unseen venom in the Bowels, thence to diffuse its self throughit, mix with the vital spirit, and convert that kindly heat which should animate, into those wild irregular flames which ravine and consume. And this is done, by that Pestilential spirit of division, that heat of disputation, which has for so many ages possessed and wasted the Catholic Church; and by an unhappy kind of Magic transformed the zeal of Christian practice, into an itch of unchristian Dispute; made the questions about our Creed more numerous than the letters of it; and by multitudes and contrariety of Paraphrases so confounded and obscured the Text, that what was anciently the badge and tessera of Christian Communion, serves us for no other purpose but as an occasion of breaking it.

SO long as the Church retained the simplicity of Christian doctrine, looked on her faith as the Foundation of her obedience, and endeavor'd to propagate to her Children such an understanding of the one, as was most apt to promote the other; She happily made good the title Christ gives her, Can. 6. of his love, his dove, his undefiled one: but when the Serpent had once got into this Paradise, infus'd his subtleties, and nice intricacies into men's Brains; and least that should not be ruinous enough, his venom also into their Hearts: Then began all those unhappy Metamorphoses, in comparison of which, those of the Poets are as trivial as they are Fabulous: then that faith which was once inseparably join'd with the patience of the Saints, forsook that tame company, and linked its self with the most contrary qualities of wrath and bitterness; and those whose Profession it was to resist unto blood, striving against sin, pursued to blood those that resisted them in any of their speculations: Then that passive Valour which had rendered them so venerable to their Heathen Enemies, converted some, tired out others, and amazed all; sadly degenerated into that active malice, which from persecuted Christians, entitled them to that monstrous style of Christian persecutors. And that ardent love, which had offered up so many Holocausts to God, was supplanted by that fiery hatred, that made no less acceptable oblations to Satan.

THIS miserable and destructive change was so much the interest of the Enemy of Souls, that we cannot wonder he should so studiously promote it; and indeed never did he at once so approve his malice and subtlety, I would I could not say success also, as in this design; in comparison whereof, all his other Projects speak him but a Puny, this is his one Goliath Stratagem which has served him not only to defy, but even defeat the Armies of the living God.

NOR is his Sagacity more observable in the choice, and main drift of the Design, than in the ways of Effecting it; had he brought into the Primitive Church those large scrolls of disputable points, wherewith he has filled the Modern; that more charitable Age must needs have startled and discerned, that that seeming Jealousy for Truth, was indeed nothing but a real design against Peace, and would surely never have parted with that sacred depositum, that precious legacy so lately bequeath'd by Christ, for those vain janglings, those School subtleties which now entertain the world. But as he that would divert a man from the guard of some important Treasure, alarms him in some other of his greatest interests; so he at first raises up Heresies of the greatest magnitude, whose blasphemous consequences so shook the whole Fabric of Religion, that what was Uzzahs Rashness seemed then every man's advised Duty, to put his hand to the upholding of the tottering Ark. How could those who had been baptized into the faith of the Blessed Trinity, suffer the Arians to rob them of the Second Person, the Macedonians of the Third, the Valentinians and Manichees so to despise the First, as to set up against him a Rival principle of being: How could those who had so solemnly renounced the World, the Flesh and the Devil, see them all bowed to by the temporizing, unclean, idolatrous Gnostics? these were such invasions as seemed to commissionate all that could wield the sword of the Spirit to take it up, and engage in this Warfare. But all this while 'twas a sad Dilemma to which the Church was driven; if she gave countenance to these seducers, she betrayed her faith; if she entered the contest she violated her unity; the one would undermine her foundation, the other would make a breach in her walls.

AND the Devil was too old an Artist to lose the advantage, he knew well that even a just and necessary defense, does by giving men acquaintance with War take off somewhat from the abhorrence of it, and insensibly dispose them to farther Hostilities, and therefore he failed not to provide sparks for that matter, which was now grown so combustible; nor did he always send them from the bottomless pit, but sometimes borrowed fire from the Altar to consume the Votaries, and by the mutual collision of well meant zeal set even Orthodox Christian in flame. A memorable instance of this was the dispute about Easter, wherein while the veneration they had of the glorious Resurrection of Christ, prompted them to commemorate it in the exactest manner they could, the Serpent creeps into this Paradise, and though they had the same common end, yet on occasion of some little dissenting in the way, the heat of devotion insensibly degenerated into that of contention; and by being very tenacious of a circumstance of that celebration, they lost the more essential requisite that of Charity: kept the Feast indeed, but with the leaven of malice, and absurdly commemorate the redintegration of his Natural Body, by mutilating and dividing his Mystical. So likewise in the business of Rebaptization, while one side in a pious abhorrence of Heresy, thought the stain like that of Original Sin could not be done away by any Purgation less solemn than that of Baptism, and the other in a just reverence of ancient custom, and jealousy of innovation opposed it: the Dispute lasted till the Scene was changed, and those who deliberated of the manner of receiving Heretics into the Church, were themselves as such turned out of it. No less well meant were the Originals of the Novatian and Donatist Heresies, as equally unhappy were their issues: For in them all, when bitter Zeal was once fermented, through its aptitude to receive, and the Devils vigilance to administer occasions, the Orthodoxy or Heresy of lives soon became terms out-dated, and men were measured only by opinions: That sword of the spirit which was at first designed against vicious practices had its edge turned against speculative notions, in so much, that at last like that of Joab, 2 Sam. 28. 8. it had got such an aptness to fall out, that it was always a ready instrument of Execution, till even a Philosophical point, as that of the Antipodes was resolved with an Anathema, and not to know the System of this present World, made forfeiture of that to come.

BUT alas these, though great defections from Primitive unity, were but modest essays, and feeble assaults, compared with those which infested the succeeding ages: This root of bitterness was then but a probationer in the soil, and though it sent forth some offesets to preserve its kind; yet Satan was fain to be at some pains to cherish and nurse them up, placed them under the shadow of the Sanctuary, and got them like the treacherous Ivy, supported by that piety they were designed to destroy; but it was not long ere they had got firmer rooting and strength, not only to propagate, but multiply. Every Dispute in Religion grew proliferical, and in ventilating one question, many new ones were started: And as questions grew numerous, so did Sects too; every Opinion almost constituted a new party, and those again subdivided into many others, so that of all the first Violators of Primitive unity, we scarce find any, who did not revenge their Schism upon themselves, by separating from one another, as they had all done from the Church; till at last the progeny both of Sects and Opinions grew so numerous, that he who would exact an account, must be sent like Abraham, to the Sky or to the Shore: The Stars or Sands, being as apt a subject of Arithmetic as they. Whence it is brought to pass, that Satan now may leave his toilsome labor of compassing the Earth; men do his business for him, giving him leisure to be only a Cheerful Spectator of their Divinityprizes; the bloody combats of Ecclesiastic Gladiators.

AND that he may be secured never to want that pleasing divertisement, the later Ages have been careful to train him up Combatants, it being now become a distinct sort of Learning, a new Species of Divinity, to raise nice questions, create new difficulties, branch out with fond distinctions our holy Faith, which the pious Simplicity of the first Christians, received to practice; not to read upon as an Anatomy, unbowel and dissect to try experiments, much less to bring into the Theatre, there made to fight and bleed, to show men sport, and try the skill of the unhappy sword-men, and Masters of defense. The form of sound words, which in its native frame and constitution, was most enlivening and Salubrious, dissolved and melted by Chimical preparation, ceases to be nutritive; and after all the labors of the Alembeck, and hopes of an Elixir, insensibly evaporates, and vanishes to Air; or leaves in the recipient a foul Empyreuma, or fretting corrosive. An endless dotage about names and words, and then as endless quarrel for them; appearing the commensurate effect of the long studies of those Distillers in Divinity, who boast its Sublimation.

IT is indeed a thing worthy of the greatest both wonder and lamentation to see how the plainest, and most simple proposition, when it falls into the hands of these Artists, is mangled and disjointed, is rarified, exalted, and refined: He whose leisure, or indeed whole life, would serve him to survey all the subtle Divisions, and Distinctions of the School-men, would sure resolve, they had the power of working Miracles. Questions in their hands multiplying in the breaking, like the loaves in our Savior's. But sure the event of the Miracles are very desperate, no solid nourishment being derived by the one, but on the contrary, Stones given us instead of Bread, and those too for the worst purposes, even to fling at one another, as if because stoning was the death of the first Christian Martyr, we designed his Charity to the same fate with himself; that divine Gospel grace having since fallen under as thick a shower, and with this sharp aggravation too, that whereas he suffered from Jews, Christians are become its executioners: whilst those who pretend to be Champions of the Faith, Irrefragable, Angelical, and Seraphical Doctors, not only fill the Church with quarrels whilst they live, but bequeath them in their writings to posterity; as Zizka is said to have done his skin, to be made an Incentive to war and confusion.

IT was the policy of Julian to shut up the Fountains of human learning from the Christian youth, lest they should there gain such acuteness, as might render them the more formidable Adversaries to Paganism: but could he have foreseen that they would have employed those Weapons not against the common Enemy, but one another, he would surely have reversed the Stratagem, freely opened those Magazeens whence they might furnish themselves for their mutual ruin, and have as solicitously promoted their Learning, as ever he obstructed it. I am very far from abetting their arrogant folly, who either decry human learning in general, or make it such a Moabite, or Ammonite, that however it be admitted in civil Converse, must be interdicted the Sanctuary. Our Religion prescribes us rational not brutish Sacrifices, and therefore despises not any of those advantages which may improve our reason, exalt the man and depress the beast in us: yet sure we shall derogate very impiously from Christ's prophetic office, if we allow not divinity to be the Supreme and noblest Science; such as is to be served and attended, not regulated and governed by those inferior: but that just order seems now to be inverted; divine learning is brought down to human; the Simplicity of Christian doctrine so perplexed and confounded with Philosophical nicities, that Plato and Aristotle are become the Umpires of our Religion, and we must go ask Heathens how far we shall be Christians. Those deep things of God as the Apostle calls them 1 Cor. 2. 10. and of which he pronounces the natural man an incompetent Judge, are yet brought before that Tribunal, subjected to be scanned by rules of Art: but alas, our line is too short to sound those Depths. Men rashly undertake to understand incomprehensible, to order infinite, define ineffable things: and then no wonder if their conceptions differ; for where there is no visible truth, wherein to Center, error is as wide as men's Phancies, and may wander to Eternity: while multitudes run carriers in the dark, it is not strange to have them justle, and overthrow each other.

AND doubtless were the Controversies which have so long harrassed the Church thoroughly examined, many of them would be found of this nature. An humble belief has been judged too sluggish and dull an exercise for men of acute parts, and therefore they would not take faith's word that so it is, unless reason will be her surety, and show them how; but sure it had been much for the peace of the Church and safety of Souls, if Mysteries had been permitted to be Mysteries; that those sublimer parts of our faith had been entertained with more veneration, and less of disquisition, and that while even the learned'st do acknowledge them to be Abysses, they would not confute that confession, by attempting to fathom them. But alas, so preposterous has been the procedure, that those things which were indeed inexplicable, have been racked and tortured to discover themselves, while in the mean, the plainer, and more accessible truths, as if despicable while easy, are clouded and obscured; so many subtle queries raised about them, that the Theorick of Christianity is become harder than the Practick; a grace is much more readily acquired than defin'd, and that key of knowledge which should give us entrance into the closets and recesses of religion, is by so much tampering and wrenching made useless; serves only to busy us at the door, and so in effect proves rather a bar to keep us out, than a key to let us in. Thus perverse are the contradictions of human depraved nature, which like our first parents take it unkindly, that God has reserved anything from us, and boldly attempt to break down his enclosures, to rob him of his peculiar; and yet in the mean, as industriously contrive to rob ourselves of our own, to cancelling both parts of God's distribution, neither leaving secret things to the Lord our God, nor the revealed ones to us and our children, Deut. 29. 29. Certainly the first propagators of our Faith, proceeded at another rate, they well knew that not the brain but the heart, was the proper soil for that celestial Plant, and therefore did not amuse their Proselytes with curious questions, but set them to the active part of their religion. We see what brief and plain instructions S. Peter gives his Catechumen, Act. 2. 38. Repent and be baptized everyone of you for the remission of sins: and this it seems as a full preparation for the gift of the Holy Ghost, which he there promises upon these only conditions. This was that vigorous Seed which at once sprung up suddenly, and rooted deep too, and produced the liberal harvest of that day: but sure had those three thousand souls, been Catechiz'd by our modern Casuists, we had seen a wide difference, not only in the expedition but success. In like manner we see Act. 8. how short a Creed qualified in S. Philip's judgment for the Eunuchs baptism: and we find S. Paul whose education enabled him for the subtlest definitions, yet delivers his whole doctrine in this compendium, Act. 20. 21. Repentance towards God, and faith towards our Lord Jesus Christ; and 'tis observable how he introduces this with a profession that he had kept back nothing that was profitable for them, Vers. 20. and seconds it V. 27. with another, that he had not shunned to declare unto them the whole council of God; from whence 'tis obvious for the shallowest discourser to infer, that the whole council of God as far as it is incumbent for man to know, at least necessitate medii is compriz'd in that one breviat of Evangelical truth: and certainly whilst all the devision of these generals, was the distributing them into practice, they were found most fertile seminaries of all Virtue; but when they came to be dichotomiz'd, and cantond out into curious aerial notions, they lost their prolifick nature: that fruitful land became a wilderness, a wild and intricate maze, where men sooner lose themselves than find either truth or holiness.

WHEN Christianity first attested its self by miracles, it produced in the hearts of its converts, a firm assent to the truth of the Doctrine, and an awful reverence and adoration of that God, who had given such power unto men, awaking them to an Enquiry after duty, so to propitiate that omnipotence whose Fury it appeared impossible to bear: And this sure was a much more genuine effect, than if they had busied themselves in those many unprofitable curiosities, nice, yet bold enquiries into the divine attributes which now a-days serve only to supplant that pious veneration we owe to them.

IN like manner the comprehensive enunciation of Christ, Mar. 16. 16. He that believeth shall be saved, and he that believeth not shall be damned, was received by the first Christians, as the condition on which the two so distant states of Salvation or damnation depended, and accordingly excited their diligence, to attain the one, and avoid the other. And this certainly was a much more concerning employment, than to have entertained themselves with the modern dispute, whether some antecedent decree of God had not irreversibly determined them, to the one or other; a disquisition that has served only to keep us Idly busy, set our heads a working, but folds up our hands like Solomon's sluggard in our bosoms. So also when S. Paul affirms it the design of Christ's giving himself for us, to purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; the Primitive Christians had no other design than to comport with that his purpose; to be what he died to make them, and to attest their Zeal to good works, by being actually rich in them. They took Christ's word, that he that gave the meanest dole for his sake, should not lose his reward; thought themselves sure enough upon his promise, and never disputed the proportion either of Worth or Congruity between the work and wages; and had the Modern done the like, our works had not so unhappily evaporated into words, we had talked less and done more.

'TWERE easy to draw the Parallel through all the points which busied the devotion of the first Ages, and the curiosity of the later: By all which it would be evident, how much Christian doctrine has lost in its Efficacy, since it gained in its Bulk: how we have embased our Coin by multiplying it; and have divided our sum into so many, and so small Fractions, as our Arithmetic can scarce number, never unite. We should think him very ridiculous, that should hope to advance his crop, by grinding the corn he sows: yet methinks, this has been the Method of our Spiritual husbandmen, who have scarce suffered one grain of our faith to scape Entire. 'Tis said that the Ant, when she lays in her winter stock, bites the ends of the Corn, as being Naturalist enough to know that will certainly prevent its sprouting: And sure that little contemptible creature whom Solomon appoints to preach industry to the sluggard, may in this point read Philosophy too, to our greatest Doctors; convince them that that seed which they mangle with so many Distinctions and Divisions, will never spring up into Christian practice: It will rather be like the Dragons teeth, Cadmus is said to have sown, whose immediate production was a hostile band combating one another. A fable which God knows we have found too sadly moralized in our School contentions, only with this unhappy difference, that ours are more immortal, our Serpentine breed fight but never die, oppose but destroy not one another.

AND then 'twill not appear strange to see the first seeds of discord, so prodigiously encreas'd, that they now overspread the face of the Earth: for whereas in all other things there is a succession, one generation goes and another comes▪ and so though the species continue, the Individuals perish; these seem to have the accurst Privilege of propagating and not expiring, and to have reconciled the procreativeness of corporeal, with the duration of incorporeal Substances: This is such an advantage toward their multiplication, that we may grieve, but cannot wonder to find them Swarm; not like Bees to bring profit, but like Locusts to devour every green thing in the land; nor is it now in the power of all the Magicians of Egypt to cast them out: for were it possible ever to become Satan's interest to suppress them, he would certainly find himself in the case of one of his young Conjurers, to have raised more spirits than he could lay. Men's now irritated Passions, and formed interests, the great fomenters of disputes, would prove too sturdy Devils, even for Beelzebub himself to Exorcise.

BUT 'tis too sure his Kingdom will never so divide against its self; it suits not only with his Nature, but with his Ends to perpetuate our Strifes, and therefore as if our doctrinal debates were not enough to secure his purpose, he has an auxiliary troop of ritual differences to attach us. The Leprosy which infests the sollider parts of our Religion, has past from the body to the very Garments; the most exterior adherencies, Habits, Gestures, Days, everything that has but the remotest subserviency to Piety, are become the objects of fierce Contests, and have so encreas'd the number and heat of our quarrels, that 'tis unnecessary, perhaps impossible to add more if he can but keep up these, as God knows he is too like to do, his Kingdom will be competently guarded, they being his greatest security against that power of Godliness, that vital force of Christianity, he so much dreads: that they are so, is obvious enough to him that takes but the grossest confused view of them. But that we may better discern the degrees of his advantage and our own mischief, 'twill not be amiss to consider them more attentively, make some distinct observations, not of all, for that were endless, but of some of their most eminent Effects, which we shall find so pernicious and destructive, as sufficiently speak their relation, and subserviency to the great Abaddon.

AND in the first place if we consider them only privatively as they supplant and justle out our greater concerns, we shall find them sadly mischievous, indeed to such a degree that were they not chargeable with any positive Ill, they were by this their mere negative Force, competent Instruments of our ruin. Did they actually convey no venom, yet while they subtract our nourishment, their effects will be sure to be deadly; Grace as well as Nature being liable to be starv'd as well as poisoned, Christianity is not a dull unactive, but stirring busy State, and therefore we still find it in the Gospel represented under the Metaphors which imply the greatest Industry and Activity; tis a trade, a watch, a race, a combat, and it assigns us tasks enough to justify the propriety of the Tropes: And therefore as on the one hand the sleepy Professor will at last find he has but dreamt of those glorious Rewards he expects; so on the other, he that frames himself another Scheme, that labors but not in God's vineyard, that busies himself in things extrinsic to that one great Sphere of motion the Evangelical Precepts, will finally discern that he has but rolled Sisyphus his stone, espous'd a toil under which he may indeed be weary and heavy laden, but will never find rest to his Soul.

AND then what can be more perfectly adapted to his aim, who desires to propagate his own eternal restlessness unto us, than thus to commute our tasks, exchange these pleasant and gainful ones, which God assigns us, for those uneasy and fruitless, we impose on ourselves. 'Tis true we find too many of those unprofitable works of darkness to busy and employ us: but I think no one, nay I am apt to say not all others together, have proved so effectual to his purpose, as this of raising and maintaining parties in Religion. 'Tis too usual a policy of States to secure themselves from the fear of a potent Neighbor, by fomenting a civil discord in his Kingdom: Satan has in this instance found it a lucky Stratagem, it having proved the most powerful revulsive of his danger. I will not examine, whether he borrowed it from, or lent it to our Machavilians, but sure he may from his own experience recommend it with the attestation of a Probatum est.

INDEED this art of diversion gives him a full security against all he fears in our Christianity, for 'tis not the title he envies to us, or dreads himself; we know he long since had courage to contemn the name even of Christ, when invoked by those whose practices join'd with him in defying it; while we are but Jewish Exorcists, make no other use of Christ, but to get us a reputation and a trade, he can deal well enough with us. Seven sons of Sceva are not half so terrible to him as one St. Paul, 'tis him only he fears, that to the form has join'd the power of Godliness: That Exorcisme he knows he cannot resist, and therefore has very dexterously found a way to divert it, by engaging us in those contentions which allow us not to think of the practical part of our profession. By the confused noise of Battle, quite drowning that voice behind us, which says, This is the way walk in it. Nay, by this subtlety he does not only divert, but forestall also; like the Philistines, allows no Spear or Sword that may be used against him, but takes up all those Instruments by which we should work the work of God. We know to all affairs of Importance there are three necessary concurrents without which they can never be dispatched; Time, Industry, and Faculties; and the more weighty and difficult the Business is, the greater Degree of each of these is requisite. Now certainly the interest of our Souls is not the slightest concern we have: the avoiding eternal misery, the acquiring endless bliss is not so trivial, or so easy a matter, as to be the Work of a moment, the purchase of some few yawning wishes, or volatile fancies: He who is to dispense the Rewards, has proposed us other Conditions, assigned us Work which takes up no less time than that of our whole lives; no less intention than of our whole powers: And then if we suffer anything else to interpose, and default what is thus entirely requisite, if we cut new Channels for that which should run in this one full current, 'tis easy to divine what the Event will be: For man being finite both in his nature and operations, the time and attention he bestows on one thing, must necessarily be substracted from another. And therefore if our Disputes about Religion entertain and busy us, they must unavoidably interrupt our attendance on practic Duties; and so whilst we quarrel with one another, give our great Master too just ground of quarrel with us all, by neglecting the great, and indeed only Business entrusted to us.

NOW indeed that our contentions do thus divert us, is too apparent to any that shall consider it in any of the three forementioned particulars; for, first for our time, they do not only insensibly steal away much of it (a modesty which most other diversions do still retain) but Magisterially exact it, and accordingly have large parcels of it solemnly and avowedly devoted to them; the scanning old questions, and raising new ones, having been the professed Business of many men's lives; their very Vocation and Trade wherein they have arrived to such eminence, as shows they made liberal oblations of their Time to it: And of this every age has left so many Records, as the mere reading them would allow few vacant minutes to the succeeding: And had not time a little revenged his own quarrel, and consumed many of those writings, by which himself was wasted, the Hyperbole would not be very extravagant in this case, which we find warrantably used in another, Io. 21. that even the world its self could not contain the Books which have been written. As it is, there are more than enough to employ, nay, devour time; for when men once launch into the vast Sea of Controversy, they are tossed there endlessly, and seldom recover a harbor, Difficulties like waves crowding one upon the neck of another; And accordingly we see in Polemick Disputes, how every rejoinder swells bigger and bigger, till like Gehazies cloud, from a hand breadth it over-spread the Heavens; every little Manual becomes the Parent of vast Volumes; and unless the evil cure its self by majoration, unless the greatness of the task bring in despair to supplant curiosity, and keep men from reading, the spectators will have as little respite, as the Combatants, both Writers and Readers will be so ingrossed, that they will have little leisure for anything else. And I dare in this appeal to any that have engaged deep either way, whether they have not found it experimentally true: I wish they would but snatch some broken parcel as a plank from the common shipwreck of their time; rescue a few minutes for a sober reflection, and audit what real Profit accrues to them, from the expense of so many precious Hours; how much it advances that grand business for which their Time here was allotted, and according to which their Eternity hereafter will be awarded: always remembering, that if it promote it not, it hinders it, by diverting that time which should have been so employed: And indeed there cannot be a more comprehensive mischief than this of the loss of time, it being that which virtually contains the frustrating of all other Advantages, whereby we should work out our Salvation. The operations even of Christ himself were, he tells us, limited to a certain season: I must work the work of my Father whilst it is day, the night cometh when no man can work; and if the Night overtake us, it matters not how we are stored with instruments of Action, since they all at once then become useless. Our Laws anciently set a greater penalty upon the stealing Beasts of breed, than on other Cattel of the same species, as calculating the damage by the possibilities of which the Owner was robbed. Time is the universal womb of things and actions; and therefore when we lose that, we suffer an accumulative prejudice, forfeit our Rights in reversion as well as our Possessions, our capacities as well as enjoyments. As in an Abortion the unhappy Mother, besides the frustration of her hopes, and child-birth pains sustained, acquires an aptitude to miscarry for the future, and never to be able to bring forth a vital birth: And thus God knows multitudes of Embryon purposes perish, and the misery of it is, they are our best that do so. We generally pursue our frivolous projects with an active vigor, but keep our great and concerning affairs only in design till death come and surprise us, which like the fatal Metamorphoses the Poets talk of, fixes us in the posture it finds us, and so presents us to Judgment. Now I would know of the most eager Contender, whether he would not choose then to be found with his hands stretched out in prayer to God, or alms to the poor, rather than dealing blows amongst his fellow servants; if he would, certainly 'tis his concern to put himself into that form he would then appear in, to husband his little span of time so, as may stand him instead when time shall be no more.

BUT if men will needs be improvident, yet why will they be ridiculous too, if they will barter away their time, methinks they should at least have some ease in exchange: but to be industrious ill-husbands, to lose all their advantage, and none of their toil, is such a solemn piece of folly, as is at once matter of Scorn and Wonder; yet this is the very case here, our wranglings do not only exhaust our time, but our strength too: We pursue them with so vehement an intention, as if our Faith proposed not to us any other victory, but over this sort of Opponents: We run ourselves breathless in this race, where the prize is only a few fading Leaves, or what is more transitory, a little popular applause; and make not towards the incorruptible Crown, till we are grown too feeble and decrepit for the other pursuit. Men macerate their Bodies, and waste their Spirits in Polemick studies, prescribe themselves no time of discharge from that War, till they are able no longer to wield their weapons, and then when mere Impotence makes them peaceable, begin to cry out of contention, snatch up Devotion when Controversy begins to be too heavy for them, and at their Death pray for that peace of the Church, which they have made it the business of their life to disturb. This as it sufficiently attests what men's thoughts are in their cool blood, what apprehensions they have of the way when they draw near their journeys End; so does it abundantly evince the unspeakable prejudice, Piety receives from our Disputes; Those have the active and vigorous Abettors, while That is turned off to languishing bed-rid Votaries. So that the division between these two, is like that of the Cattel between Jacob and Laban, all the stronger to the one, and feebler to the other: Would God the Scene were not in one respect changed, and that the Syrian had not here got the better share. But in the mean time what greater advantage can Satan wish for, our strength and industry is diverted upon these foreign expeditions, and Zion is left to be guarded by the lame and the blind, such only as are not able to follow the Camp, and then 'tis not strange to see what successful assaults he has made, that that true practic virtue which once made such victorious salleys on the heathen World, is now baffled in its own Quarters, beaten from its Works, and driven to seek shelter in obscure corners, immures its self in some few private breasts, and so like an exil'd Prince, makes only shift to live when it should reign. But alas, shall we forever suffer ourselves to be thus befooled, shall this his stale stratagem after so many hundred years use, nay, and detection too, lose nothing of its Efficacy? Must we always waste our strength in forging shackles for ourselves? This is such an infatuation as Hosea speaks of, Chap. 9. 7. The Prophet is a fool, the Spiritual man is mad: Would God we would once put ourselves under the discipline of serious recollection, it might perhaps cure the Frensy: Let him who has with unwearied diligence watched all advantage against his Antagonist; rack'd and tortured every period of his discourse, to make it confess an absurdity: Let him, I say, consider, how much better that industry had been employed in discovering the fallacies of our common Adversary, that old Sophister, who puts the most abusive Elenchs on us, whilst we are most busy in putting them upon one another. Good God, how might true vital Christianity at this day have flourisht, if we would have bestowed our pains the right way? At how much a cheaper rate might we have cherished, than we destroy her. All parties pretend to be very careful of this Vine, are very busy in setting traps for the little Foxes, all whom they are pleased to call Heretics; and in the mean time take no care of the wild Boar, let that not only spoil her branches, but stock up her roots, suffer the most savage beastial vices to destroy both Power and Form of Godliness together. Thus unhappily do we divert our intentions, from our most important concerns. And as Archimedes is said to have been so vehemently intent upon a Geometrical figure, that he heard not of the taking of the City, till an Enemy gave him his information and death together: So do we so busy ourselves in drawing our several Schemes of Religion (every of which will pretend to no less than Demonstration) that in the mean, that which alone is true Religion, is exposed to the fury of the Enemy, sack'd, ruined, and like the plough'd up Jewish Sanctuary, not one stone left upon another. Certainly most of the questions which at this day disturb Christendom, have in respect of their matter no Propriety toward the propagating good Life, but, in reference to their way of managery, all aptness to hinder it; how much were it then for our Ease as well as profit, to turn us into the plain road, where none of these Thorny difficulties will encumber us. Alas, why should the Romanist so sweat to maintain his Purgatory flame, as if he already felt its heat, and would in this world antedate those pains, when the same Industry bestowed here to purify himself from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, would subtract the matter of that Fire, and leave little for that furnace to refine; which were doubtless a much securer way, even according to his own principles, than to trust to the uncertain devotion of others, to fetch him out when once deeply ingulphit: 'Tis surely much better to starve that Fire, by ones own innocence, than to leave it to be extinguished by the Tears and Piety of surviving friends. Why should the Socinian so eagerly contend for the possibility of keeping the Law, when one example would convince more than a thousand arguments. Let him bend his study to make himself an instance of his own doctrine; and then though he do finally fail in proving his Hypothesis, yet, if he do his utmost, he will not fail of a better triumph, than that which the Schools can give; and so will even from his error extract advantage, his very straying will by a happy Antiperistasis, lead him into the way. Why does the Predestinarian so adventerously climb into Heaven, to ransack the celestial Archives, read God's hidden Decrees, when with less labor he may secure an Authentic transcript within himself; let him according to Saint Peters advice, add to his faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, and to knowledge temperance, &c. and that chain of virtues will stand him in much more stead, than if he could as infallibly (as some have confidently) demonstrate every link of Predestination: 'Tis the assiduous practice of Duty will make his calling and election sure; and unless he can confute that divine Axiom, that without holiness none shall see the Lord; he cannot but confess he may more profitably busy his thoughts in laboring to become holy, than in disputing whether he can choose to be so or not. Or lastly, why do we Christians of several persuasions, so fiercely argue against the salvability of each other, as if it were not only our Opinion, but our Interest and our Wish, that all should be damned, but those of our particular Sect; when God knows not only every society, but every single person has enough to do, to work out his own salvation, which if we will take the Apostles word, is to be done with fear and trembling, Phil. 2. 12. A temper very widely distant from that of censuring and judging. And sure we should not think that malefactor more meriting, or more likely to be acquitted, who should leap from the Bar to the Bench, and there condemn the whole Goal but himself. 'Twas a sober and Christian reply of a late learned Gentleman, who being asked by one whether a Papist might be saved, answered, you may be saved without knowing that. And would we confine our cares and enquiries, to those things which concern that one great Interest, we might take less pains, and yet do more work, be less busy-bodies, but more fruitful Christians, and then sure 'tis time we ask ourselves the Wise man's question, Eccles. 5. 16. What profit hath he that laboreth for the wind; and at last give over this unthriving diligence, and not so emulate the most stupid of Beasts, as to make ourselves burdens, only that we may couch under them.

AND were this only Issachars lot, 'twere the less to be regretted, but also Zebulon herein invades his portion; 'tis they that handle the pen of the Writer, that have engrosted this error, and will not suffer it to be a Plebeian one. None do so much this way mis-employ the two vulgar talents of Time and Industry, as those who have a third superadded to them, that of Extraordinary Faculties and endowments which they do as prodigally lavish as either of the former. The Beginners or Abettors of contentions have generally been Persons of the most acute refined wits and excellent learning, which has enabled them for those quirks and subtleties, of which grosser understandings would have remained more happily ignorant: A strange production that the greatest beauties of Nature and Art, should ingender the foulest deformity in Religion. Thus alas have Satan's altars the pre-emption of God's, the fattest Oblation brought to feed the fire of contention, whilst that of devotion expires for want of Nourishment. It was indeed no wonder, that the blind zeal of Pagans had made him so wantonly nice, that none but the choicest victimnes would serve his turn; none but an Andromeda and an Iphigenia, Royal and Virgin sacrifices propitiate his infernal Deities: but that among Christians he should still have the same Election, have the richest treasures of those, who say they war against him, laid at his feet, have his choicest weapons out of his Enemies magazine, is a riddle that can scarce be solved, but by concluding Idolatry has only changed its form, and that he sits as securely enshrin'd in men's passions and animosities, as ever he did in an Idol Temple; so that he seems rather to have lost the pomp, than the power of

Regiment. But admit, that he were not herein so immediately God's rival, that these speculative debates had none of those adherencies, which do so directly gratify him, yet still he is secured of gaining somewhat at rebound; for alas, when men's faculties are thus employed, what Weapons are there left for the defense of true practic virtue, and God knows, she needs them but too much: Men's lusts are grown subtle Disputants, so that the most improved reason may find work enough to manage the Contest; And surely would men of parts timely have bent their endeavors this way, vice could not have got so strong a party. Men are ashamed to be Proselytes to a weak Arguer, as thinking they must part with their reputation, as well as their sin: and certainly nothing is a more general discouragement from Piety, than the opinion of its votaries not being Persons of Parts, and exalted Understandings; a Prejudice as old as the time of our Savior, as may appear from Io. 7. Would God our greatest Rabbies would sadly consider how much they have contributed to this scandal, while by laying out their parts on Polemick niceties, they have neglected the more weighty part of their business, & given too much Attestation to that scandalous Maxim, that Ignorance is the mother of Devotion: Certainly this is quite to mistake their Commission, which is not that of a Herald, to proclaim War amongst men, but that of an Embassador, to reconcile them first to holiness, and by it to God: And doubtless one soul gained to Piety, would more promote their account, than manythousands secured to a Sect or Party. We find how sad the doom was of that Servant who wrapped up his Talent, but we have no cause to think it would have been at all easier, if he had melted the Talent into bullets, to maintain the skirmish with his fellows: Whether that be not the case of some who have received not the one Talent but the five, I leave it to be discussed between God and their own Consciences; but in the interim, 'tis sad to see how unhappily men engage their endeavors, which seems to represent the reverse of Isaiah's Prophecy, we having beat our ploughshares into swords, and our pruning hooks into spears, all the Instruments of fertility and growth in Grace, into Engins of War and discord; and then it must needs be a most deplorable condition to which Christianity is reduced; which seems in this to be under the same calamity, which her distress professors suffer from the Turkish tyranny, whilst her hopefulest and most pregnant Children, are like Ianizaries and Timariots trained up to fight against her. And let none wonder that I call it fighting against her, when yet perhaps none of them do formally renounce her; for that Circumstance only determines the War to be intestine, not foreign; and if our own sad Experiences had not too much qualified us to judge, I might appeal to the universal vote of mankind, which of those were the most destructive. Indeed were there no other Act of hostility discernible, but that which we have hitherto insisted on, the intercepting her supplies, the cutting off from her that time, industry and gifts, whereby she would be nourished and supported, that were irreparably injurious to her, and consequently most grateful to that grand Enemy who as hath been showed, makes advantage of our Wranglings of Dissensions with one another, to reak his more inveterate Malice on us all.

CHAP. X. A Survey of the Mischiefs arising from disputes, as they supplant Charity.

BUT alas, the mischief of these debates, can never be described by bare negatives, there are multitudes of positive ills, that inseparably adhere to them, and those of so destructive a force, that if Christianity were beleaguered and famished by the former, she is storm'd and battered by these, and so is ascertain'd to sink under all the methods of ruin. In the front of these we may well rank those displacencies and animosities which are the product of our speculative differences, and which do indeed so naturally result from them, that 'tis not to be hoped so long as the one continues that the other will ever cease. For though in practice we often see a bewitching Sin dethrone the Reason, and make men act as if they had no such superior principle to guide them, yet in matters of Speculation their affections are generally strongly influenc'd by their understandings. We do not only approve, but love those notions wherewith we are prepossessed, which kindness as it propagates its self to the abettors of the same Tenets, so also it insinuates dislikes to the opposers. And as that opposition advances, so the disgust does too, till at last the Scene shifts, and the Persons are at a greater war than the Opinions. But we need not thus derive a proof from the causes, when the thing does too demonstrably attest its self by the effects; for what issues are there of the mortallest hatred, which do not plentifully flow from this fountain. Humane nature we know has but three ways of actuating its Passions; by thought, by word, and by deeds; and we may surely conclude the feud very bitter that employs all these Engines, as 'tis too visible this does; for though the former of these be in their own nature inscrutable, to all but omniscience, yet the two later are, according to Christ's own Rule of the Tree by the fruits, infallible Criteria of them; and those make such liberal discoveries, that I think I may appeal to any who have espous'd a party, whether they have not with the first discriminating rudiments of their own Sect, imbib'd a secret confused prejudice to all others. Nay, I fear there are but few of so mortified passions, as to have stopped there, and not advanced to a direct aversion, and alienation of mind. Indeed were it not for this, 'twere scarce possible for so many of the vulgar, to be such Bigots in their several factions; for alas, their Intellects are generally too gross, to have any clear apprehension of the Points they contend for; their Leaders only give them some general confused notions, just enough to excite their displeasure against all Dissenters, and then their anger must presently be called zeal, and instead of the more uneasy task of suppressing their passion, this expedient serves at once to hallow and gratify it: Nay, so ridiculous have some men's prepossessions of this kind been, that they would scarce allow those to be entire men whom they thought not sound believers, but have phancied I know not what bodily as well as mental Monstrosities in those they were pleased to call Heretics; a piece of childish credulity which the emissaries of some factions have not disdain'd to make their advantage of. But these inward disgusts and rancours are but the first bound of this ball of contention, when this leaven is once in the heart, it will quickly diffuse its self, and both tongue and hands will be tainted with it. Hence comes it, that disputes in religion are managed with such virulency and bitterness, that one would think the Disputants had put off much of Humanity, before they come thus to treat of Divinity. The government of the Tongue is a piece of morality which sober nature dictates, which yet in this instance many even of our greatest Scholars seem totally to have unlearn't; For whether we consider the unseemly reproaches, or rigid censures, wherewith almost all parties pursue their Antagonists, we have reason to say with S. James, The tongue is an unruly evil, full of deadly Poison: would God their guilt of this kind, did not so loudly proclaim its self, as to supersede the need of proof. 'Tis too obvious that the Satyr has usurpt the chair, and polemick Discourses are degenerated into libels and invectives, our Controvertists fall from arguments to reproaches, as if their Zeal lay more to blast their adversaries fame, than confute his error; and were this only in personal extemporary debates, it might have the excuse of an indeliberate passion. Indeed it were to be wisht that all words of this sort, might vanish in that breath that utters them; that as they resemble the Wind in fury and impetuosity, so they might do also in transientness, and sudden expiration: But alas, a course is taken to immortalize them, they become records, and our most elaborate controvertial writings, like the Earth after the curse, over-run with these briars and thorns, Sarcasms, contumelies and invectives filling so many Pages, that were those weeded out, many volumes would be reduced to a more moderate bulk as well as temper. Nor are our censures anything more modest than our reproaches, every petty difference is mutually upbraided, to each party as a defection from the faith, so that we scarce know a milder name than Heresy, nor doom than Damnation. And as if the visible obliquities of errors would not afford us inditements enough against one another, there is a closer inspection made, every position is ripped up, and curiously dissected, to see what Embryo is in its womb, what seeds there are of monstrous productions, which though perhaps the native strength of the Principle would never have animated, yet the preternatural heat of an Antagonist can quickly hatch them (like the Chickens at grand-Cairo) into life, and vigorous being: and if by a long chain of (perhaps fallacious) Inferences, some such Imputation is fastened upon a Thesis, then all who embrace that, are charged also with all this spurious brood, though they never so solemnly renounce and disclaim them. A practice sure very uncharitable, for suppose such consequences never so regularly deduced from my opinion, yet so long as I seriously disavow and detest them, I may indeed be thought unwise in not discerning the connection, but sure not impious. So that unless want of Logic be a damning sin, no man can hence be authoriz'd to pronounce me reprobate: and I cannot think that God, whose rigor bends against the faults of our wills, rather than our understandings, and who at the last great assize will assume our own consciences into the judicature upon us, will ever sentence me for those deductions how horrid soever which I never made mine, or that I shall ever find myself in Hell for a mispersuasion which I never entertained. But there are some whose Censures are not so artificial, yet no less severe, who beg their Postulata, and taking it for granted that such and such are the only sanctified opinions, make them the Shiboleth by which to discriminate not only their own Friends, but God's too, lock up heaven gates against any who bring not that Ticket for admittance; and though they make the way wide enough to receive the most overgrown Sinner of their own Opinion, yet they pronounce it impossible to the strictest piety of a Dissenter. And upon such grounds as these do we mutually doom one another to perdition, never considering that whilst we so briskly presage others Damnation, we really prepare for our own. Alas, our eagerness to heat the Furnace seven times hotter for all that bow not to our dictates, does but expose us to the fate of Nebuchadnezzar's officers, Dan. 3. to be ourselves consumed in that flame, wherein we cast them. 'Tis indeed to be wisht we would cease to invade God's peculiar, by judging those that must stand or fall to him: but if we will needs take his office, 'tis but equitable, we take his rules too; and in our Wrath remember Mercy: But God be blessed 'tis the Judgment of our upright, yet gracious Master that shall finally determine us; and not that of our passionate fellowservants: If these were irreversible, and the Key of the bottomless pit were in our custody, we might give Satan a writ of Ease, discharge him from his perambulations, he would need no more to walk about as a

Lion, but might still lie in his Den, and we should bring in prey enough to glut the Devourer: For could we execute all we condemn, we might ask the Disciples question, Mat. 19. 25. Who then can be saved? But as these severe censures, are a present violation of Charity, so they tend to the perpetuating it by obstructing a return to that unity of Judgment, which might make up the very original breach: for while men reciprocally load each others opinions and persons with detestable imputations, if they really speak what they think, they do still more deeply impress upon themselves the prejudice to that which they accuse: (hatred as well as love gathering strength by being actuated): but if they do indeed not believe their own charge, yet having once made it, either upon Interest or Passion, 'tis not probable they will want pride to maintain it; and when we consider how ruling a piece of carnality that is, we cannot wonder if it indispose men to retractions. I wish we had not too many, and too late instances of some whose weightiest objection against a cause, has been their own former violence against it. When men have once fastened the brand of Heresy, Profaneness or Blasphemy upon an opinion, they think they cannot afterwards become its Proselytes, without either seeming to assume those Guilts, or at least that of having falsely charged them upon others: and the Horns of such a Dilemma do so gore their reputation, that it often tempts to salve that with the wounding of conscience, and persuades them rather to reject their convictions, than expose their credits And certainly were this the only ill consequent of our rigorous accusations, it would be enough to prejudice them as unfit Instruments in a Gospel design; but though they suit not with that work to which they solemnly pretend, they are most accommodate to that they really produce: For if we examine in the third place, what influence these our eager contests have upon our actions, we shall find them fully proportionable to our words. And first negatively, 'tis apparent in too many, that they are apt to confine even the common offices of humanity to their own Sect: and others who do not so, yet show so great partiality in dispensing them, as discovers the Name of Christian is not half so charming, as that of their own particular Faction. Were Instances of this kind as needful as they are numerous, 'twere easy to give multitudes: but I think none that has lived in our late confusions can have wanted occasions of observing it in others, at least, if not in himself. But alas, omissions are scarce worth our notice, when there are so many positive Acts of unkindness so visible among us: They know little of ancient and less of modern Times, that are unacquainted with the mutual persecutions, which almost all parties have alternately raised, one against another among Christians: Confiscations and banishments, Gibbets and flames; Weapons God knows much too carnal for a spiritual warfare, yet much more in use than those S. Paul recommends to Timothy, gentleness, and meek instructing of Opposers, 2 Tim. 25, 26. And when 'tis considered that those Opposers too were Heathens, 'twill be more than a little strange, that Severity should be allowable to Brethren, which was interdicted against Aliens. Is it an easier crime to reject the entire body of that Faith which was once delivered to the Saints, than to differ in the explication of some one branch of it? nay, perhaps only of some corollary and deduction from it, which as far as it is human may be fallible, and therefore can no more command my assent than it satisfies my judgment; yet this is generally the most that can be affirmed of our differences; For almost what Party is there which do not avowedly own all that Faith which constituted the first Christians; would God we did as uniformly embrace the Charity too; and then most of our disputes would be superseded, at least so calm'd, that there should be none of those destructive effects which they now produce: For alas, how many funeral piles has this preposterous zeal kindled? So that what some said of Draco's Laws may too justly be applied to our arguments, that they have been writ rather in blood than Ink. But as Christ when he forewarn'd his disciples of the ensuing persecution, tells them not only they shall be killed, but they shall be put out of the Synagogue: So now as if Christians were aemulous of every branch of Jewish cruelty, we transcribe that part of the copy too, and either by causeless excommunicating others, or separating ourselves, we deny the benefit of public communion to each other: And this is a greater severity than the former, by how much more implacable our hate is against what we count error, than what we know to be vice; and by how much the concerns of the Soul are more estimable than those of the Body. The inveterateness of those Feuds which rise from Opinion, may clearly be discovered in this instance; let a man have committed all the outrages which may render him unworthy to live, yet when we prosecute him to death, we willingly afford him all helps towards his future state, and no man is so inhumane as to refuse to pray, either for or with a Malefactor; yet some few speculative differences are such a gulf betwixt us, that we cannot meet even in that we all acknowledge our common Duty, the worship of our God. Certainly among all the accursed issues of our contention, there is none more malignant and criminal, than this of Schism and Separation, and would men judge dispassionately, more irrational neither: For doubtless were our case stated to any sober Heathen, he would never be able to guess, why they who equally acknowledge the advantage and necessity of prayer, confess the same God, have the same common wants in this world, and hopes in the next, may not ask in the same form, and in the same place. Alas, is it not enough to be at distance where we differ, but must we be so also where we agree? Is unity so dreadful to us, that we must act contradictions to escape it. Surely this is a stranger fascination of the spirit of Division, than that in the Gospel Demoniac, which enabled him to break all bonds in sunder, and like it, abhors the approaches of a Savior, crying out, What have we to do with thee, thou Jesus the Son of God, art thou come to torment us? Who knows what a powerful Exorcism the united intercessions of the Christian world might have been; had we jointly deprecated our quarrels, God might have found a way to have composed them, though we could not; and our tears might have cemented those breaches which our dissents made, but our separation widens. I know the venerable names of the Sanctions of Holy Church, the hundred thirty seventh Canon of the Code of the universal Church, which says in express terms, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, that we ought not to pray with Heretics or Schismatics, and very many warm expressions of the Fathers, are producible in this case: But till we Excommunicate with the Tears and Sorrows, and public concernment of the Primitive Christians, who refused all acts of kindness only out of love, and the most ardent Charity, we may by no means lay claim to their pattern, whose estrangements only flow from malice and inveterate hate. Would we indeed comport with the Example of those happy Times, we should have feared the guilt of Schism in ourselves so much, as not to have lightly charged it upon others; we should have prayed for the conversion of Dissenters, not laid Anathemas upon them, and prayed for their confusion. St. Paul we see, Heb. 10. 25. reckons the forsaking of Assemblies, as a degree, at least preparative of Apostafie; and from his time throughout all the purer ages of the Church the holy Fathers have generally branded it, as the highest impiety; and no marvel, for it is one of those Giant-like sins, which not only oppresses men, but invades even God himself. 'Tis the mangling and assassinating that body to which Christ owns an inseparable connection; the putting him to head scattered limbs, instead of an entire compact body, as if we meant to refute St. Paul, show him 'tis possible that Christ may be divided. Good God, what shall we say when we see Heathen Soldiers estimate Christ's coat higher than Christians do his body! they thought the one too good to be parted, but we cease not to tear and mangle the other, and which is yet more monstrous, make it a part of our Religion to do so. We name our Opinions our Faith, and when under that Title we have enshrin'd them, we make more barbarous Immolations than ever the most savage Heathens did. They sacrificed some few objects of their Love, their Children, but we sacrifice the very affection, and think our Zeal lukewarm till it have reduced our Charity to ashes. And now if we compare these our Divisions, Wrath and Bitterness, with those fundamental, Gospel precepts of Unity, Love and Meekness, we must surely say we have not there so learned Christ. And then how ridiculous is it, to pretend a Zeal to that Gospel, whose very foundations we undermine. Peace is at once the blessing and duty of Christians, and those heats of speculative Contests which violate it, will certainly never serve to make us either good or happy. And therefore till Charity cease to be an Essential part of Christianity (which certainly we must burn our Bibles ere we can suppose) we must conclude, that our Disputes, and the ways whereby we manage them, how much soever they pretend to Preserve, do indeed evacuate and destroy true, that is, Practick Christianity.

CHAP. XI. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Disputes, as they engage upon ill Arts and Scandalous Practices, to sustain the espoused Cause and Party.

AND yet so unhappily are many men mistaken, that these irregular heats which thus waste the vital spirits of Religion, are thought the most Sovereign Cordials to support them. The highest Paroxism of this Feaver are deemed the perfectest Health. Men esteem the overflowing of their Gall, the exuberance of their Zeal, and then all the Promises to the faithful combatant in Christ's camp, they confidently appropriate to that their so eminent Grace; though indeed it can with no more propriety be called so, than Pharaohs lean Kine might be said to be fat, because they had devoured those that were so. In plain terms, men lay so great weight upon their being of right opinions, and their eagerness of abetting them, that they account that the unum necessarium, and think the propagating of those so important a service to God, as will justify the use of the most interdicted instruments, legitimate the most enormous Commissions, that they can fancy contributive to that pious End: And moreover commute for the neglect of Practick duties in the general tract of their lives. I shall not here urge the hazard of men's erring in the choice of opinions, nay, the certainty that of many opposite, one only can be the right; and then to all such as miss, that their very groundwork fails them. I shall only confine myself to the malignant influence this Perswasion has on practice, and in that respect I cannot but affirm it a most pernicious delusion, which as it tends extremely to the enhancing the bitterness of our contests, so it may justly be reckoned among the worst effects of them, and is a most irrefragable proof how much they obstruct the vital efficacy of Religion in our hearts. Nor is it any new thing for men thus to deceive themselves, for we find such Confidences as these frequently upbraided to the Jews, both by the Prophets and Christ himself, they thought their Zeal to the Temple and ritual observances, so invincibly meritorious, as no Crime could defeat, and that their legal purifications would render them acceptable in God's Eyes, in spite of all their Moral pollutions: But how fallacious a hope this was, the many severe increpations of God do sufficiently attest. Yet certainly their guilt was far below ours, the things they so depended on were parts, though not the whole of their Duty; those Ordinances, though perhaps somewhat adulterated by Rabbinical mixtures, yet for the main were instituted by God himself, and that with a design of discriminating, and separating them from the rest of the world; and such peculiarities and privileges as these, might have an aptness to excite that presumption: But alas, the case is otherwise with most of us; they are not the Revelations of God's will, not the Testament of our dying Redeemer, but some Codicils and Annexes of our own we so earnestly abet. 'Tis not the Text (for then 'twere impossible for any that received the same Canon of Scripture to differ) but our glosses to which we pay such Reverence; and when on that account we sever ourselves from those to whom the Commands of God, the Blood of our Savior have most closely united and cemented us: We can yet make a shift to think that there is so much of Sacred in this, as shall not only render it highly rewardable, but also hallow all other profanations of our lives; and in our Jehu march upon such an expedition, can turn all regrets of conscience (like Iorams messengers) behind us. That this is so, none can doubt who observe with what boldness men rush upon the most unchristian sins, in pursuit of what they Phancy a Christian cause. Were it not for this amulet, how were it possible for any to think they may venture upon Perjury, Sacrilege, Murder, Regicide, anything without impeachment to their Saintship; nay, to think that the only danger lies on the other side, in being remissly wicked, that to slack anything of the utmost speed, is to do the work of the Lord negligently. Yet that this has been a prevailing Perswasion, we have had too many, and too sad instances; and God grant we may not find them so repeated, that our sense may supersede the use of our memories concerning them; nor has this been peculiar to one only Sect, but those who are otherwise at the widest distance unite in this Principle. They are not only Phanaticks that can say grace over the foulest crimes, and consecrate them to the use of a good cause; if we examine the Dypticks either of Conclave or Consistory, we shall find some Saints upon that account, who could never have been so upon any other. And when we consider how often Heaven has been mortgaged to gain Auxiliaries from Hell, how men have been encouraged to the most damning sins, by promises of being certainly saved; we must either think that a Holy cause is omnipotent enough to reverse God's decrees, to save whom he would damn, or else that this pretence is one of the most ruinous deceits, the most fatal Treachery to souls that ever Satan contrived, who though he do in all instances play the Mountebank, yet sure never more than when on confidence of this Antidote he persuades us thus to swallow down his deadliest Poison.

I MUST not here attempt to enumerate all the unchristian practices, that have on this score been made, not only lawful but meritorious; yet there is one of so frequent use, that I must needs advert unto it, and that is, those calumnies and falsehoods, which are now become a piece of Ecclesiastic as well as state policy, and a great part of that offensive armor wherewith our controvertists assault one another. Indeed if we consider how many forges are daily going for these Engines, we shall have reason to think, all Parties have an high esteem of their usefulness. Of these Calumnies there are too many sorts and degrees to be here particularized: And indeed those, who permit themselves to use any, can be supposed to have no other boundaries than the advantage of their cause: And accordingly as that seems to exact, they lay their Scene; sometimes they traduce the persons of their opposers, and by raising prejudices against them, hope some of it will reflect upon their doctrine: did men generally know how to distinguish between reports and certainties, this stratagem would be as unskillful as it is uningenuous: But considering the vulgar temper, its not unaptly suited to it. This it seems was anciently understood, it being the old Greek advice, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . To calumniate stoutly, for that how perfectly soever the wound of reproach be healed, there will remain a scar; and though we wipe away with never so much care the dirt thrown at us, there will be left some sulliage behind: And accordingly this was the Expedient the Pagans used against the Primitive Christians, to put them thus in the skins of beasts, and shapes of monsters, and then worry them to death. And this is the method still, though heightened and improved, and our Religion has suffered infinitely more since we used it against each other, than when they managed it against the whole community. But besides this defamation of Persons, another branch of this black Art is the depraving of Writings, both in the sense and very letter, and direct words; for the former of these, whosoever observes the strange perversions, and affected mistakes of men's meanings visible in many of our Polemick discourses, will sure resolve that a man's intentions, as well as his words and actions may be calumniated: Nor does the letter scape better, every period which threatens danger to the cause must be mutilated and dismembered, and as Sampson was by the Philistines, lose its Hair and Eyes, and then be made sport for the whole party. And I fear there are too few, who do not in this case take the Jewish reparation, an Eye for an Eye, &c. retaliate to the adversary the foul play they receive. But some advance yet higher, and think it not enough to make an Argument or Testimony useless to the Enemy, unless they draw it over to themselves, make it betray the side it was to maintain, and as a Conqueror uses to restore Arms to such of the adverse party, as will turn to his, so after they have by satisfactions secured themselves of its aid, it shall then be made as potent as is possible, and with such kind of Renegado troops as these, some causes have been much supported. Yet were this violation offered only to the writings of living men, who might vindicate it, 'twere not so transcendently ignoble, but it most frequently falls upon those, who have made their beds in the dust; who have changed their own Form, and cannot secure their Writings from the same fate: Nay, 'tis yet more frequently those, whom we have all reason to suppose, and most of us profess to believe, glorified Saints; and this superadds a daring presumption to all other circumstances of the guilt, and heightens an injustice into Sacrilege. It has always been held the most detestable sort of forgery to counterfeit Testaments, though the Testator were of never so low a quality, or his bequests of never so mean a value: And shall it now pass for a piece of commendable dexterity, an art of manage to falsify those writings by which the Fathers of the Church designed to entail truth and piety, not strife and faction upon her. We know Necromancy has justly been reputed one of the most horrid forms of Sorcery, because it enforced dead men to speak what the living were inquisitive to hear. I leave it to be considered what this wants of that, besides the dreadful ceremonies of the Incantation; certainly 'tis a guilt which nothing but our too familiar acquaintance with it could make unformidable. And indeed this whole method of serving a cause by such sinister means is so utterly repugnant to the Principles even of ingenuous nature, that we can scarce cast a greater scandal upon an Opinion, than to show it needs such Aids. 'Tis by Historians branded as an execrable fact in him, who to secure himself from a neighbour Prince, called in the Turk into Christendom: But sure those who to fortify their side have brought in this Artifice of calumniating and falsifying, have done an Act no less impious; the constitution of Christianity agreeing full as well with the Alcoran as with these Piaefraudes; as some of them who perhaps mean the fraud more than the Piety are pleased to call them. Nay indeed, they accord not much better with Philosophy than Divinity, every man knows the nature of contraries is to combat and expel, not to cherish and support one another. How absurd is it then for those, who say they design to advance truth, to make falsehood their Instrument. I wish they would experiment to accommodate their secular concerns at the same rate, let them cool them in the Fire, warm them in the Frost, and feed themselves by perpetual Fasting, and when they find cause to commend the efficacy of that Method, they may with fairer pretence in this higher instance reconcile the feuds of Reason and of Nature, and make a lie the Evidence of Truth. In the interim, it may well pass for Sophistry as well as sin; and doubtless whatever advantages are hop'd for to private Sects and Parties by this art, Christian Religion in general is hugely prejudiced by it: For when men shall compare the veracity of Heathens with our falsehoods; learn from Historians, that among the Persians, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , to lie was deemed a fault of the greatest turpitude, and they therefore laid an ill Character upon persons in debt, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , because he that is so must needs tell lies: And when they shall see in the Laws of Cingis a barbarous Tartar, Lying made a capital crime, and yet among Christian Casuists made a holy artifice, they will be tempted to think our end as fictitious as our way; and that our Religion has little countenance from truth, which is thus fain to make lies its Refuge. Thus unhappily do these Arrows revert, not only on those who shoot them, but in the face of Christianity its self, which is defam'd, and traduced by those slanders, we aim at our private adversaries.

BUT besides this direct, there are other more oblique Ways of making vice subservient to Religion, or to speak more properly, of making Religion subservient to vice; for some Zealots of several parties, who more regard the numerousness than purity of their Professors, discerning how much the sensual part of mankind startle at the strictness of Gospel precepts, are industrious to take off that discouragement; not by convincing them of the real divine sweetness and pleasantness of them, but by debasing and accommodating them more to the carnal appetite: Yet here men proceed not all alike, some use Christ's yoke, as Hananiah did that of Jeremiah, break it quite off; others only essay to slacken and alleviate it, that it may not pinch the lusts of libertine Proselytes: Of the first sort are such, as having made the adherence to their Party, the infallible mark of Sanctification, and that Sanctification of Election, do from thence proclaim to all who are so qualified a general Jubile and manumission from the bond even of Christ's as well as Moses's Law: or if some of them allow it to remain an impotent director, yet while they affirm that God sees no sin in his Elect, or if he do, beholds them as a Father does the harmless falls of his Child, rather with smiles than anger, they make the violations of it so safe, that they are too sure to be many, and between abrogating and thus enervating a law, the difference is merely verbal.

OF the second sort are some, who by indulgent and partial glosses, seek to mollify the severity of Christ's commands. That contrive for their Clients not the means of Obeying, but the arts of Escaping them. Like the unjust Steward teach their lords Debtors to write fifty instead of a Hundred; and decide Cases of conscience more according to the interests and passions of men, than the will of Christ. There are a generation of men of whose Dexterity in this faculty the world has taken so much notice that I need not name them, a sort of easy Casuists who seem to have erected a Court of Equity to relieve men against the rigor of divine Law; and there is little doubt but they shall find enough ready to make such appeals: Men love to be Christians as Cheap as they can, and therefore will close with that party, which offers the easiest terms: And then while these spiritual Pioneers do thus enlarge the narrow way, make it a road as well for the Beast as the Man, the brutish sensual, as well as rational divine Part of us, no wonder though Shoals of Converts throng in to them. But 'tis to be considered that all this while this is winning Proselytes to themselves not to God: the gaining them to a Sect not a religion; at least not to that pure religion, and undefiled which the grand Author of our Faith has both exemplified, and proposed to us; for how much that suffers by this way of propugning private opinions, is more than enough apparent. Yet so ambitious are our prime leaders of such Trophies that in order to them some are said to ascend yet a step higher, and besides this general encouragement they give to men's lusts by taking off Restraints, do in some cases actually promote and excite them. For when they see a licentious person whose acquiescence they judge beneficial to their cause, they have artifices of fomenting his riots, do not only take off the bridle, but use the spur also, hoping that at the rebound it may conduce to their End. If any think it impossible it should do so, let them consider that among our various Opinions some there are which sell heaven much cheaper than others dare, that allow such easy attonements as the most habituated sinner need not despair of: and then the most infallible means to ascertain such to that side, is to make them too bad for any other. For when a man is resolute to keep his sins while he lives, and yet unwilling to relinquish all hopes when he dies, 'tis more than probable he will embrace that profession which bids fairest to the reconciling those so distant interests; and therefore the greater malefactor he is, the more sure he will be to fly to the horns of this Altar; the nearer sinking, the apter to catch at these reeds; so that the Project is not impolitick, though God knows so impious that 'tis much fitter for the School of Machiavil than of Christ; and seems to verify that imputation as to a part of Christians, which Julian once as falsely as maliciously affixt upon the whole: that their Church was an Asylum and sanctuary for the most flagitious offenders, and protected those guilts to which no other religion allowed any Expiation. 'Tis indeed so horrid that I cannot think there are many consciences so cauteriz'd by this fiery zeal as to admit it, yet that some have done it, there is too much certainty, and therefore 'tis no improper instance in our present argument, for if men's eagerness to support their several sides, can transport them to such attempts as these, 'tis abundant Evidence how much Christianity loses by these contests of under factions, which while they pretend to guard, do indeed invade her under her own Colours.

BUT besides the faults men commit with this immediate avowed aspect upon their religion, there are others which slyly shroud themselves under the skirt of its mantle: I mean those Sins of common life, which though they pretend not to advance the cause, yet when acted by a Zealot are thought to be overwhelmed by his heroic Piety. Indeed men who make themselves so much work about others faith, are seldom at leisure to regulate their own practice, and so have no way of stating their accounts with God, but by balancing the excess of the one against the defects of the other: How such reckonings will pass the grand Audit, 'tis I think not hard to divine, but in the interim, it keeps them very cheerful and secure, teaches them a Receipt to retain all their Sins, and yet lose none of their confidence; so that when they have immersed themselves in all filthiness both of flesh and Spirit, they can trust their zeal to refine them from all that Dross. Nor does it only thus reconcile them to their own vices, but to other men's also, whose most brutish sensualities they can look on with perfect patience, nay even Atheism its self can have fair Quarter: They are not much discomposed to see men have no religion, 'tis only the having one different from their own that awakes their indignation; then like Saul when seized on by the evil spirit, they cast about their Javelins, think no rigor too great on such a provocation, yet even here they have intervals, and the very same persons who are thus at odds upon a religious, can unite upon a vicious account. Those who mutually denounce damnation to each other, can with full accord combine in those practices which will ascertain it to them both, as if they so much feared to have their predictions defeated, that they would be each others convoy to the land of darkness. Those that will by no means meet at the Church, know not when to part at the Tavern, and though they will not jointly partake of the Cup of the Lord, are yet very sociable at the Cup of Devils; I mean those excessive debauches, which are a most acceptable drink-offering to those infernal spirits. Have we not seen many whose distant opinions have fastened upon one another the brand of Antichristianism, who have yet like Gog and Magog join'd against the holy city: and those who could never agree on the way of setting up Christ's Throne, have yet been very unanimous in pulling down the Kings. Thus alas do we justle one another out of the narrow path that leads to life, but can hand in hand run our Carrier in the broad way of destruction. And doubtless this great unevenness, these spiritual feuds, and carnal endearments between the same persons; this impetuous zeal, and as impetuous lusts in the same breasts could never be, did not men depend so confidently on the one, as to think it will commute, and satisfy for the other. But alas, how groundless a Presumption this is, the whole tenor of the Gospel does abundantly witness. In all that grand Charter where is there the least Clause importing such an immunity. I am sure there are multitudes that assert the contrary. Indeed the whole frame of the Evangelical covenant is totally against it: That requiring an entire uniform Sanctity, and allowing no other privilege to the sins of the most knowing Professors, but a preeminence in punishment, the being beaten with many stripes. And when 'tis considered that the end of all religion is but the drawing us to a conformity with God, the impressing on us some Character of his eternal goodness and holiness, 'twill be as absurd as impious to believe that our zeal to any Religion can absolve us from that purity which is the end and design of all. And while this is the way men take to approve their piety, 'tis no marvel to find so many Christians, and so little Christianity in the world: for that is not to be estimated by the number of its professors, but by their obedience to its Rules, and he that gives up his name to it and not his heart, will receive as little advantage by it, as he brings honor to it, and how little that is in respect of its internal Efficacy, is I presume competently evidenced.

BUT that we may more thoroughly discern how universally destructive our wranglings are to it, in all its concerns, let us a little examine whether they do not endamage it even in respect of outward profession also. This may seem a strange Quaere to those who think their disputes about Religion are to denominate them the great confessors of the Age: yet certainly there is but too much ground not only for the enquiry, but to resolve it in the affirmative. And if it prove so, 'twill infer but sadly to those who having laid the whole stress of their Hopes upon their zeal to advance their Faith, will be found to have pulled down more than they have built up. Now Christianity may in respect of profession decay two ways, either in its hopes, or in its possession, the one in relation to Aliens, the other to Disciples. The first by hindering the access of new Converts, the second by staggering or alienating the old, and both these ways she visibly appears to suffer by our divisions. And first if we consult but our experience, if we trust but our own observations, we cannot but confess that the Gospel has long been at a great stand. That that Sun which at its first arising was like David's, Ps. 19. surrounded the world in a vigorous efficacious motion, is since become like Joshua's, Josh. 10. 12. arrested in its course: Nay like Hezekiah's, gone backward, Is. 38. 8. Mahumetism (if not Paganism) having long taken up its seat in divers of the most flourishing Apostolic plantations. A sad change, that from the daily and numerous accession of the first times, it should now become a kind of Prodigy, a piece of news, scarce heard in an Age, that one single Proselyte is gained to the Church, yet that thus it is, is too obvious to be denied. And truly it is not much less apparent that our dissensions have in a great degree contributed to it. For first, as to the extirpation of the Eastern Churches, he that shall examine the records of those times, will have cause to say their Janglings and Divisions were not only in a moral or divine, but even in a proper natural sense, the Instruments of it. The Turk only coming in at those breaches which themselves had made, nor had their Candlestick probably been removed, had they not first abused its light, to the setting themselves in Combustion. That the same cause has not yet had the same effect among us, is owing not to its unaptness to produce it, but to the admirable patience and mercy of God, who yet withholds that fatal Judgment, which we do our parts to pull upon ourselves; our mutual violences against one another herein unhappily combining and making one united force against us all. But though the divine goodness have hitherto so countermined our treachery to ourselves, as not to suffer us to enjoy that state of darkness we have so courted, yet certainly our contentions are extremely accessory to the continuing it upon others, our many new and wandering lights, however they fail of having that Property of the Pillar of fire, Ex. 14. of illuminating and conducting the Israelites, yet too much answer its other, in becoming cloud and darkness to the Egyptians; there being scarce anything more apt to intercept the beams of the Sun of righteousness from the Heathen world, every of those little enclosures our Factions have made in the Church, becoming a great partition wall to keep others out of it. This may be made evident in several respects. As first, in relation to those many moral obliquities in which our eager disputes do (as hath already been shown) betray us, which cannot but give so much scandal to any considering man, that we can scarce hope any can turn to us as to a better Religion, but will rather think it the way to relinquish all; to obliterate those native impressions of Piety and Honesty they brought with them into the world, so that if we expect any Proselytes it must be only such as would live worse than mere nature allows them.

BUT this though as important a consideration as can well be, I shall not here insist on, having in the second Section given some instances how apt our Morality is to defame our Divinity, and confirm men in Opposition to it. But though this be a great, yet 'tis not the only means by which our Dissensions hinder the progress of the Gospel, for they do not only make infidels less inclinable to receive it, but us to propagate it. Those do so busy and engross us, that there is neither leisure nor heart left for this. Our activest spirits are so engaged at home in asserting their private quarrels, that all such foreign designs are forgot. For as in Civil, so in Ecclesiastical concerns, everyone is more industrious to advance his peculiar interest than that of the community, accordingly we find innumerable promulgers of every new Opinion. No Sect wants its Apostles to propagate and diffuse it; but where are there any that have the like care for the main Root of Christian Religion, which they have for these little Twigs and Offsets which they have planted in their own Gardens; how many ages must we look back to find a man that has made it his business to convert Infidels to the Faith. 'Tis true indeed there are some very magnificent relations of modern attempts this way, of great industry some have used to bring the most savage nations to the obedience of Christ: but if we examine 'twill be obvious, the main design was to subject them to themselves. 'Twas not so much their Heathenism as their territories they invaded, and such Apostles as these are ill qualified to make S. Paul's profession, 2 Cor. 12. 16. I seek not yours but you. And the success of such Essays have been answerable to the motive; they have won riches but not Souls. The Gospel in one hand and a sword in the other has made many slaves, but I fear few Christians. Indeed, what encouragement had those poor creatures to receive a Religion from their Oppressors? why should they think that those who tortured and killed their bodies, were really concerned to save their Souls? or that those who would not permit them to enjoy what was their own, meant to help them to anything better? And while the felicities of another world were recommended to them only by such, as had deprived them of all in this, we cannot wonder at their little appetite to embrace them; or to find the oppressed Indians protest against that heaven where the Spaniards are to be their cohabitants. In short, this is sure such a method of Evangelizing, as too widely differs from that which first planted the Church, to be likely to advance its growth: so that notwithstanding all pretences of this kind, we may resume our assertion, and conclude that our intestine discords (perhaps not those alone) have diverted the Zeal of this more Christian undertaking, and left a great part of the world under that invincible Ignorance S. Paul mentions, Rom. 10. 14. How shall they call on him, in whom they have not believed, and how shall they believe in him, of whom they have not heard; and how shall they hear without preacher: and God knows whether we have not herein provided better for their Excuse than our own.

THERE is yet another way by which our divisions impede their conversion, and that is by giving them prejudice to that Doctrine about which ourselves cannot agree. 'Tis an universal Maxim that truth is always consonant to its self; and therefore where they see so little unity they have too much temptation to doubt of Truth. He that wandering should meet a Company that offer to conduct him to his journeys end, might reasonably incline to deliver himself up to their guidance; but if he find them unagreed upon the way, one Disputing for this, and another for that, and everyone protesting against all but his own; he would sure retract his confidence, and think they offered him only more variety of mistakes, resolve it as safe to trust himself to his own Errors as other men's. And this alas seems to be too exact a parallel of the present case; we Christians do so mutually damn one another, that a poor Turk or Heathen will think, he rather multiplies than ends his Danger by associating himself with us; for there being so many parties, which soever he joins himself to, there will be abundant odds against him; so that if he could be secured the truth were among us, yet the great difficulty of finding it out, would be a very disheartening consideration. Besides men love in transactions of great Importance to have as many, and as credible Vouchers as may be, and upon that score 'twill sure be but a cold inducement, to any to turn Christian to foresee, that when he has done so, he shall be disown'd by far the greater part of that number, and that at his entrance into the Church, he shall be met with almost as many Anathemas, as when he was an Infidel. Nay, I scarce know whether I may call it an entrance into the Church, or rather into a Conventicle, or particular Congregation, our Schisms and Separations having hardly left a possibility of external communion with the universal Church, since the Communicating with one part of it, does infallibly Excommunicate from another. Thus have we placed our flaming Sword (though God knows no Cherubim) at the gate of our Paradise, and when God calls all men to the waters of life, our Contentions have made them like those of Marah, so bitter and unpleasant, as deters and averts men from them: Which as it is in the highest degree injurious to them, so is it contumelious to him, whose invitations are by this means frustrated; 'tis in some degree the evacuating one of the main purposes of Christ's coming into the World, which was to call men out of darkness into his marvelous light, and as He was thus sent by his Father, so also were the Apostles solemnly commissioned by him to preach to the Gentile world, who with indefatigable industry and resolute sufferings pursued the charge; and sure this is competent evidence, that the design was of the greatest and most weighty importance, and such as can never be out-dated, till there cease to be objects of it, unbelievers to convert: And by that let us measure the guilt of obstructing it, which if we would impartially do, I assure myself the most passionate Bigot of any Party must confess, that it infinitely out-weighs all the Piety his doctrine can pretend to, that his peculiar Church gains not so much as the Catholic loses: And that how confidently soever he have Canoniz'd his quarrels, they are indeed but the worst sort of Heathens, and serve to keep out the better. Yet besides the mischief they do in relation to those that are without, they are extremely pernicious to those that are within, and that not only to some one Sect, but like an universal poison, that is equally deadly to the most contrary complexions, they operate on the most distant ranks of Professors, the tender and the obdurate, the scrupulous and the profane. And first for the tender tremulous Christian, 'tis easy to discern how much he must be distracted and amazed by them, for while he hears each Sect thunder out Damnation against each other, he cannot but be startled at the danger of adhering to the wrong, and though that may a while excite his diligence to discover the right, yet when he comes to that inquisition, he will meet with so many Polemick intricacies to entangle him, that after many turns, first to one side, and then to another, he will be apt to think the only clue to extricate him out of this labyrinth of many Religions, is to abandon all. Nor is this mere Speculation and Conjecture, God knows we have had successively through the whole round of Error too many practic experiments of it. Several persons there have been, whose Zeal to find out truth by an unhappy rule of False, directed them to allow of every Error: While like sick men, who desire to die good cheap, they put themselves into the hands of any Empirick; follow each bold pretender, that has the impudence to talk of Truth, till Superstition ends in Profanation, Godliness proves Atheism, and by having been of many Sects, at last have no Religion. And surely this is a most unhappy Effect of our discords, thus to be stumbling-blocks in our brothers way, and when we remember the woes pronounced against those that shall Scandalize any of the little ones, 'twill be strange how men can think to approve their Christianity, by the ruin of their Brothers, or secure themselves of Heaven by keeping Others thence: For though Christ tells his Disciples there should be some that should think it a service to God to kill their Bodies, yet to fancy the destroying of Souls so too, is a Deception of which we have neither record nor prediction in Holy Writ, and is a superfaetation of the spirits of delusion, peculiar to those who have placed their own sanctity in these religious wranglings, which serve to destroy it in other men. And as they thus serve on the one side to shipwreck the faith of these weak unstable Souls; so do they on the other advance the impiety of the daring sinner; for as they are Temptation to the one, so are they Pretence and Excuse to the other to bid defiance to all Religion. He whose dissolute affections have so long been courting his understanding to turn Atheist, will sure not lose the advantage of so plausible an Argument as our divisions afford him; and since his lusts engage him in an irreconcilable War against the practic part of Piety, he will most gladly embrace this occasion of quarrel against the Theory also: So making himself entire, and extinguishing those uneasy regrets and misgivings arising from the repugnancy of his life to his belief. It were not hard to give a compendium of these men's Logic, and draw out those Schemes of Discourse, by which from our differences in Religion they infer the discarding of all. But I fear these are already too well known, and where they are not, I should be loath to be any man's Instructor. This is I am sure too palpable, that how fallacious soever these Reasonings are, they have been very operative, as appears by the number of those avowed Atheists among us, who placing themselves in the seat of the scorner, give themselves much pleasing Divertisement by deriding our eager scuffles about that which they think nothing. If any man thinks that the Church is no loser by the defection of such Libertines, I must be allowed to dissent from him: For first, there are examples of the most vicious Persons, that have been reduced, and while they retain their Christian belief, that lays such undeniable obligations to good life, that whenever they resume their reason, they must take up virtue also with it; so that there is an equal possibility of their being good, that there is of their being rational: But when all hope and fear of a future estate is disclaim'd, when those cords are broken which should pull them up from the Dungeon, then, and not before is their state visibly desperate. But besides this possibility of recovering them, the danger of losing others is to be considered. Bold Atheism is like a raging Pestilence, which taints the very Air, so that those impious discoursings which are the effects of some men's Vices, may be the cause of others; and we too often see that those who ascended themselves by degrees, do in an instant advance their Proselytes to the height of Irreligion, as appears by the strange proficiency of some, whose Years allow them not to have arrived to it otherwise than per Saltum. And sure this spreading Contagion has been so destructive to the Church, that it were to be wisht, the mere titular Christians had rather remained such, than thus to have averted others from being so much.

AND now if all these scandals be worth our regret, if the emboldening and exasperating the bad, the corrupting the innocent, and the decay of Christian profession consequent to both be formidable Evils, we know where to charge the guilt. Our contentions must be arraigned as accessories, if not principals in the case: And then sure it will befit our angry Zealots to consider, whether this be the way of advancing God's truth, or what account they will give to the Lord of the Vineyard, who while they pretend to dress and prune the branches, do thus debilitate and destroy the roots. Nay, indeed in this they are treacherous even to their own pretensions, for all those several Religions which they so tenderly cherish, have no proper root of their own, but like Excrescencies, spring out of the main stock of Christianity, live by its juice and moisture, and consequently, can never hope to survive it. And then certainly there can be nothing more ridiculous, than to express their kindness to the one, by ways that are so ruinous to the other. 'Tis as if a Passenger in a Ship should to fortify his private Cabin, tear up the planks and expose the whole Vessel to sinking: Yet thus preposterously do many of our chief Pilots apply their care. In the mean time, it cannot but be a very delightful prospect to the grand Enemy of Souls, to see us thus busily promote his interest, lay snares for ourselves, and by our own folly do that which all his subtleties could never compass. Nor can we think but he will be as officious to us as is possible, while we are thus employed, will help us to contrive our Turrets, whilst he sees we pluck out stones from the foundation to build them with; nor shall we ever want new models of Churches, so long as they thus help to destroy the old; and how aptly they are fitted for that Purpose, needs (I suppose) no farther Demonstration.

CHAP. XII. A survey of the Mischiefs arising from Disputes, in reference to Civil Peace.

AND now sure we cannot but conclude our Contentions highly injurious to Christianity, that thus assault it both in the Practick and Theory: And indeed how fierce soever our quarrels are with one another, the heaviest blows are sure to fall on that, which as in its constitution is of the most Pacifick temper imaginable, so it has the common fate of reconcilers to suffer from all parties. But Godliness having the promise as well of this life as of that which is to come, it often happens that there is such a consent between our spiritual and secular Concerns, that the Mischiefs that oppress the one do reflect on the other: And indeed Religion when entire and united, is one of the best bonds of Civil as well as Ecclesiastical Peace, (as even those attest, who defying all other ends of it, do yet admit it a useful state Engine;) from whence 'tis consequent, that the distractions and divisions in that must have proportionably a contrary influence, and infect communities with Discord, Tumult and Disorders. And this is an effect with which I think not unfit to bring up the rear of the foregoing Mischiefs, it being not so purely Secular as not to suit our present subject; for outward order and unity can never be so innocently disturbed, but that Christianity must be wounded in it also: And besides, it may perhaps obtain more consideration than the former, as being of a nature wherein the generality of men will think themselves the most concerned; for though there be many that can look on the ruin both of Christian practice and profession, with Gallio's indifference, Acts 18. 17. and care for none of those things, yet when the siege draws closer, when they find themselves begirt in their worldly interests, and that the same Deluge that overwhelms Churches, may bear down Palaces also, perhaps they may think the matter not so contemptible. And first, as to the truth of the observation the World has too long groaned under the Experiment to need farther proof. That bitterness which first tainted the waters of the Sanctuary, hath from thence diffus'd its self into our common streams, and like the Egyptian Plague, left none uncorrupted: For whether we look upon Families, Neighbourhoods, Kingdoms, any the least, or any the greatest Societies, we find the miserable Trophies of our holy Wars, in Factions and Confusions; I wish I could not say Rapine and Blood also. For the first of these, the domestic Jarrs caused by different Opinions, the Instances are numerous, or rather innumerable, which our own age and nation affords us. How many Servants have on this score been at defiance with their Masters? Children with their Parents? nay, Wives with their Husbands? Such an unhappy force is there in mistaken Zeal, that it dissolves the closest bonds, violates all obligations natural or civil, while under pretence of service to God, like the Pharisees Corban, it evacuates all duty to man; and this has made such ruptures and divisions in Families, that that delightful prospect the Psalmist so much commends, that of Brethren's dwelling together in unity, Psal. 133. is scarce anywhere to be met with; but instead of that, such rancor and bitterness, treachery and malice, as if men either mistook Christ's prediction, Luke 12. 52. for a precept, or at least were willing to advance his Prophetick Office upon the ruin of his Kingly, and to verify his praesage by breaking his command. And as the Oeconomical order and peace is thus disturbed, so if he that misses quiet at home should seek for it abroad, he will soon find himself disappointed, and discern that as the societies grow greater, so do the disorders also, and that private Strifes do as much combine to make parties and factions, as Families do to make Cities and Corporations. By this means that mutual communication by which the Members of civil bodies should not only benefit one another, but secure the whole is interrupted, and men live not as neighbors but spies, always upon designs of Entrapping and Ensnaring, for while they look on one another as enemies to God, they think that rescinds all obligations of friendship among themselves, and when Religion bears the Standard, the War will be concluded necessary and honorable. But though it be so in imagination only, 'tis sure there are some, who make it really profitable; for as in most Camps, the greater Number are attracted rather by hope of booty than concern for the cause; so here, many men list themselves under one Party, that they may have pretence to prey upon the rest. And to that End several very commodious Axioms have been taken up. As that no faith is to be kept with Heretics; that Dominion is founded in Grace, &c. by such measures as these the goods of the Egyptians become lawful prizes to any, that please to call themselves Israelites; and indeed Jews they may be called in that notion we vulgarly use it of unjust and cruel extortioner: But sure not such Israelites as Christ defines Nathaniel, Io. 1. 47. without guile: For having thus consecrated their frauds, and found an expedient of serving God and Mammon together, there is no piece of deceit either too big, or too little for them; no transaction so important, which can oblige their fidelity; none so trivial as to discourage their rapine: Opportunity is the only measure and rule of their attempts, by this means no Obligation of Contract, no Laws of Commerce can escape unviolated, everything is lawful that may weaken the wicked, and that zeal which makes men Saints in the Church or Conventicle, can make them Thieves in the Shop or Market. Thus is Piety made an Engine of rapine, and by these religious riots, all boundaries wherewith Laws or Equity have fenc'd men's distinct properties, are thrown down: And sure this is a most carnal consequent of our spiritual debates, and bids fair towards the reducing us to that state of common Hostility, which some have phancied to be the Original condition of mankind: For it renders commerce so dangerous, that men may within a while think it safer to trust their own strengths, than to the shelter of those Laws and Civil compacts, which they see so avowedly evacuated. And upon this account, though the Injury be immediately done to private persons, it becomes a public mischief: Yet alas, these are but the more moderate effects of our Dissensions; they afford more expedite and compendious ways of public ruin; the defrauding or undermining of a few Neighbors, are petty prizes for those that think they have the sole right to the Creature, and are those Meek who are to inherit the Earth, and every such acquest only serves to flesh them for a farther chase. The spoils of a broken Kingdom will afford something worth the scrambling for: And nothing more fit to break it than a pretence of Religion, which like the stone that smote Nebuchadnezzar's Image, has shivered the most goodly Monarchies. And accordingly, we see no Engine is more constantly used by men of Seditious spirits, to disturb and subvert Governments: Indeed there can be nothing so advantageously fitted for the purpose. For should such persons unmask their design, and show it in its native ugliness, should they avow the shaking of a Kingdom merely to establish themselves in a condition of wealth and grandeur, the new moulding of a Government only that they might shape their own shares in it, 'twere impossible they should find any abettors; for though the multitude are always in preparation for change, yet 'tis not on Intuition of benefit to some private persons, but of somewhat wherein themselves may partake: Nor is even the madness of the people mad enough, to expose all their own interest, and most important concerns only to promote those of others. It has therefore always been both the rule and practice for such designers to suborn the public interest to countenance and cover their private; to cry up Diana to secure their own gain, and to make the seduced Populacy like the Iackeal to the Lion, hunt that prey which themselves mean to devour. And of all those artifices by which such Incendiaries have set Kingdoms in a flame, none has been more universally succesful than the praetext of Religion, which is thought so creditable a cause to engage in, as can convert the infamous titles of Rebel and Traitor into those of Patriot and Saint, and consequently, take off all discouragement arising from the disreputation of such an enterprize: And no less potent is it in solving the scruples of its unlawfulness; for by a dexterous anticipation, it makes Conscience a party, that it may exclude it from being judge, and by that one fallacy of supposing Religion to be a just ground of quarrel, make way for all the wild consequences deducible from that false principle: And indeed where that is thoroughly fastened, the mischiefs are not only great but incurable, & yet the more so by how much the person is more zealous. For alas, what will it avail to tell such a man, 'tis a sin to fight against his King: when he will tell you 'tis a greater not to fight for his God: That he contracts a heinous guilt in violating the peace of the Church, when he with as great confidence believes, he merits in propagating its truth. That he is accountable for the blood of his Brethren; when he thinks he has like the Levites, Ex. 32. consecrated himself in it, and offered it an acceptable sacrifice to God. Thus unhappily are these men fortified in their sin, by presuming it their Virtue, and while the furious zeal of such is made subservient to the wicked craft of others, 'tis a most apt instrument of public Mischief, there being no attempt so desperate, which such may not be put upon, who are methinks used as Hanibal is said to have done those Oxen, whose horns he first fired, and then sent them to disturb the Roman camp: These men as those beasts are found very useful for the molesting of others; but commonly all they acquire to themselves, is the smart of their own flames. Few of those who thus in the simplicity of their heart follow an Absalom or a Sheba, that do not either miscarry together with the design, or else live to discern how much their credulity was abused; and that both religion (however pretended) and those that fought for it, were only made properties to promote the lusts of those who despised both. But 'tis unnecessary to insist farther on the effects of such religious Fury, of which we of this Nation have had so many and so costly evidences, as far transcend the most tragical descriptions. God grant we may never have other than our past experiences to measure them by: But certainly there is little reason to be secure, so long as the root of them, our speculative differences daily increase; for unless we could suppose an Age of such innocence, that there should be none who would take and undue Advantages, 'tis sure there will be enough given: And indeed when we reflect upon our past Distractions, and consider how trivial the matter of most of those Debates was, whose manner has been so cruelly solemn; how our slightest problemes have been writ in blood, that many Thousands have been made naked to keep the Surplice off a few men's backs, and we have pulled down our Churches in displeasure at the windows, when I say these and a Thousand the like are considered, we must conclude that there can never want Occasion to them that (in the Apostles Phrase) desire Occasion. The lightest distempers in the Church being contagious, and most apt (when fomented by ambitious designers) to beget an universal Plague in the Common-wealth. And now who can without horror consider these miserably perverted effects of Christian Religion, that that which was designed the most inviolable bond of unity, should like those curles of entangled snakes with which Erinnys is said to have infuriated Athemias and Ino, become the fatal incendiary of the mortallest hatred. That that Economy which was meant to regulate, should be the Instrument of confounding and embroyling the World; and a Gospel of Peace should thus be made the Incentive to war, and create fiercer quarrels than those it was to have composed. To turn the Grace of God into wantonness, is justly branded as a great Crime, but sure to turn it into malice is yet a greater. And though every sin offers violence to our religion, yet this is of all others the most barbarous, thus to make it Assassinate its self, become a kind of Felo de se, and contribute to its own ruin. And that this is the case, is I presume sufficiently evident in all the foregoing instances, which as they are most obviously the effect of our eager Disputes, so are they no less visibly destructive to Christianity in all its interests, leaves it neither root nor branch, neither inward Vigor, nor outward Luster; so at once rendering it both unfertile and unamiable. 'Twas a piece of hostile Severity against Moab, to fill the land with stones, thereby to render it barren, 2 King. 3. 25. The slingers went about, and smote it: but what that suffered from professed Enemies, the Church daily sustains from those that call themselves her best friends. Our Benjamites are so in love with their skill of slingling to a hairs breadth, their nice Criticisms, Distinctions, and Subtilties, have cast abroad so many stones of contention, that the Church is become perfect quarry, utterly steril and unfruitful, as to all those good works for the production whereof, she was so peculiarly fenced and cultivated by God; nay, 'twere well if barrenness were the worst, and that she had not on the other side acquired an unhappy degenerous fertility: But what a numerous and accursed Issue spring from this unpeaceable temper, the foregoing considerations do too sadly demonstrate; and I doubt not every attentive Observer will be able to add more (though not truer) Instances; and besides to discern that this spurious brood like that of Hagar is grown so wantonly insolent as to despise the right heir of the Promise. The true Gospel Graces of Meekness, Peaceableness and universal Charity are accounted Earthy phlegmatic qualities, we disclaim that Holy Ghost which descends in the appearance of the Dove, nay or in fire either, unless it be like that of Elijah, to consume all that disgust us. Nor do we measure our Religion so much, by the opposition it makes to our lusts, as to those whom we first make, and then call our enemies. Thus miserably have we changed the Scene, and by calling evil good, and good evil, have accumulated injuries upon our oppressed Christianity, not only robbed it of its rule, but of its reputation also. And do we daily thus see Ishmael mocking Isaac, and shall we not think it time to cast out the Bond-woman and her Son? shall we forever cherish this generation of Vipers to tear out the bowels of our common Mother? I pray God the Question have not as much of praesage as expostulation. For if we consider the present state of things, how our contentions plead not only right but prescription, there seems not much hope of dispossessing them, and yet less, when 'tis remembered, how they have entwisted themselves, not only with the passions, but interests of men; two such potent Abettors as will buoy up the most forlorn cause. The truth is, there are many subterraneous springs which feed this Ocean, and though religion and piety be on all hands demurely pretended, yet as we have seen the effects of our debates very disconsonant to such a Profession; so if we examine the originals and causes, we shall find them for the most part as widely distant. It may not be amiss to take a short view of some of them; for though I cannot hope the discovery of the Causes will contribute to the general cure, yet perhaps it may prove Antidote to some particular persons, who will be the less apt to admire the verdure of the leaves (the flourishing appearances of zeal and piety) when they find both fruit and root of so poisonous a quality.

CHAP. XIII. A Survey of the Causes of Disputes; and first, Pride.

AND in this inquest we find Pride already arraigned to our hands, by the wisest of Men, Prov. 13. 10. only by pride cometh contention. It is indeed a most prolifick vice, and there are few sins to which it is not either a parent or nurse: but there is scarce any which does more betray its immediate descent from it than this of strife and debate, which has so many of the lineaments and features of the deformed Mother, as sufficiently attest its extraction. And as this is true of all strifes in general, so particularly of those whereof we now treat: for Pride being its self an internal sin, it has such a neighbourhood with all the notions and speculations of the mind, that it easily makes impressions on them: Nor are we to wonder that the Sacredness of divine things is not Amulet enough against its Charms, when we remember that the first act of Pride that ever was committed, was levelled even at God himself; and as it took up its first seat in a spiritual substance, so has it ever since, never acted more naturally, and therefore more vigorously than about spiritual matters. Of this the Church in all ages has had many costly Experiments, for if we trace the Catalogues of Heresies from Simon Magus his days down to our own, we shall find Pride a principal Actor in every Scene, though perhaps in various dresses. For though Pride be always in the general an affectation of some transcendency, yet it differs as to the particular object, according to the several estimates men make of excellencies. So that the propugners of new Opinions, though they have this common aim, that they seek their own exaltation, yet do not always do it in the same instances. For example, some have coveted the repute of profound inquisitors, and this Vanity has prompted them to dive so deep into the bowels of every the plainest doctrine, till at last they have twisted and entangled them into the most perplexing difficulties. These Navigators think they have never sail'd successfully till they have found out a Terra incognita, though God knows they bring nothing from thence for the benefit of the habitable world; nor make it their business to resolve Doubts, but start them. Another sort of men there are of so fastidious and petulant wits, that they disdain an opinion of which themselves are not the Authors; they love not to have their understandings prescribed to, by the preconceptions of others, how divinely soever inspired, and will rather have a Religion of their own making, than of his whom they pretend to worship. And this, 'tis to be doubted is the bottom of the great veneration some have paid to Reason, which they have set up in the Throne, not only in defiance of blind implicit assent, but even of divine revelation. But in the mean time 'tis to be observed, that 'tis not reason in general, the common excellency of our nature that is thus advanced, but every man's own private and individual; which upon a just scanning will often be found the most distant thing from what it is called: Passion and Phancy, by that omnipotent advantage of being a man's own, often passing for deep discourse and ratiocination: and what a fruitful harvest of Tares such seed is apt to produce, our reason would inform us if our experience did not. To these we may add another rank of men, who vehemently thirsting after a name in the world, hope to acquire that by being the disseminators of novel doctrines; they think while they go on in the beaten track, they shall be obscured in the Throng; the only way to make themselves conspicuous is to be singular: Thus fondly choosing to be eminent, though by the infamous Characters of Heretic or Schismatic, and (like him that fired Diana's Temple to secure himself from oblivion) build themselves Monuments of the Churches ruins: and sure this Theudas his ambition of being somebody, has helped to raise more opinions than he did men. Yet commonly it answers it even in that circumstance also; for when by separating themselves from the unity of the faith, they have rendered themselves remarkable, their next aim is to have others join to them; and so they may have the honor of being leaders, care not though it be into the ditch. To be called of men Rabbi Rabbi, is enchanting Music to any Pharisee, and serves like the Timbrels in Tophet to drown the cries not of their Children, but Mother scorching in the flames of their contention. Indeed so impetuous and uncontrollable is this kind of vanity, that like a mighty torrent, it bears down all before it, overwhelms not only the opposite virtues, but even all vices that are not of its own confederacy. Men can in this case lay severe restraints upon their most intimate sensualities, when they suspect them treacherous to this grand Design. The Wolf shall be muzzled and made to behave himself with the meekness beseeming the Sheeps clothing. The Swine shall be washed and by an unnatural violence withheld from the mire: All their rapacious and bestial appetites control'd and made tame, that they worry not their reputation. And all this for a little naked popularity, for whose dear purchase, very many have thought fit to divest themselves, both of lawful and unlawful enjoyments; and have thought the tumultuous applause of a few factious spirits worth all that self-denial. But all Pride is not so perfectly Camaelion as to subsist upon this mere air, there is another kind of it that proposes to its self something beyond this: such is the affectation of rule and dominion, which though in respect of any real good to the ruler, is as very a Chimera as the former; yet commonly they that are under such a Jurisdiction, find to their cost 'tis more than Imaginative. And God knows this aspiring humor, has been no less fatally active in Ecclesiastic than in Civil affairs; nor has the Church ever been in more danger of Anarchy than by those who most impatiently coveted a share in its government; for where this spirit of ambition is the Impellent, it does like the Demoniac in the Gospel, burst asunder all fetters and chains, violates the unity both of doctrine and discipline, nor is any attempt too bold for men thus animated: They who long to be in authority think the door opens not quick enough for their entry, and impatient of so tedious an expectation, choose rather to make breaches in the walls (nay sometimes to undermine the foundation) than to want an access to their Desires. Neither is there anything so sacred, which upon this occasion they cannot prostitute; when Diotrephes, 3 John. 9. seeks preeminence, the Dictates even of an Apostle shall be rejected, and even the divinity of Christ, God blessed forever, be trampled on, when Arius wants a footstool to climb up to his affected greatness. In a word, if we Examine the occurrences of all ages, we shall find that either the eagerness of acquiring, or the Revenge of missing dignities, have been the great instigators of Ecclesiastic Feuds; and sure our Modern stories, are not likely to fall short of the Ancient, in examples of this kind. And as Pride makes some thus passionately desirous of rule, so it makes others as impatient of being ruled, and even those who cannot hope to arrive to give Laws, will not endure to be under those already established. That this is indeed the Christian liberty for which many in our days have so unchristianly contended, is too apparent, the fundamental quarrel has been against subjection: Yet to countenance and abett that, whole Armies of frivolous cavils have been raised, and the Church attacqued in every its remotest concern, and though there be nothing farther from that unity of mind, to which the simile was first affixt, yet in a perverse sense it imitates the Ointment of Aaron in descending from the head to the skirts of the clothing: not only the supreme and more eminent parts, but the most slight extrinsic and inferior relatives to Religion being asperst and depraved; and the most innocent Circumstances of Civil or Natural actions made criminal, when applied to Divine things. A strange infective power, which these men have conveyed into God's service, that it must thus pollute everything that approaches it. That the place where his Honor dwells, must become a Pesthouse, and diffuse contagion to all in it. (I wish by the way their Sacrilege had not been too valiant in despising the Danger of those infected utensils, which may perhaps sadly verify the reproach, and prove treacherous prizes) and when men's zeal operates thus unkindly, when the pretence of internal sanctity devours all outward decency, and God is to be honored and exalted by those ways, whereby men would think themselves affronted, and vilified; we have too great reason to think such a zeal as little according to godliness as knowledge, and that it is not so much the tenderness of their Consciences, no nor generally the weakness of their Brains, but the Iron sinew in their Necks, which makes them at once so scrupulous, and so clamorous; for though the former might be supposed owing to Error, the later can surely proceed from nothing but Pride. Several other instances might be given to show how that pernicious temper has contributed to the rise and first being of our divisions; and having thus given them birth, it does not like the Ostrich abandon its Brood, but has as great an influence in the cherishing and maintaining, as it had in creating them. Of this there need no other proof than the mere nature of Pride, which as it averts nothing more than self-condemnation; so upon pain of that appearance, 'tis irreversibly engaged in the pursuit of its first undertakings, any desisting being interpretatively a confession either of an Error or a Defeat, both which are insupportable to an assuming temper: So that besides the original incentives forementioned, it has this of disdain superadded to actuate its motions. And accordingly we find they are at this rebound the more violent, not only the success, but the credit of the first enterprize depending upon a vigorous prosecution: So that Catilines Maxim of Villany seems to have been adopted into some men's divinity, and they think past Crimes are only to be secured by more and greater. Nor is it only hope to achieve their design, or hide their shame which thus animates them, despair will do it to a yet higher degree. Our Concupiscible and Irascible appetites dwell not so remote, but they are ready reserves to one another, and what was desire in the pursuit, becomes anger and revenge in the disappointment; and sure we need not be told the wild effects of those passions. How many men have in a furious despair over-acted even their own projects, and have made it a malicious consolation in their ruin, to get it attended with that of the public? As Herod, who to secure a lamentation at his death, commanded a Massacre should accompany it, or (to give a more Ecclesiastical instance) like Arius, who sought the abolishing of that order in the Church, whereof himself could not partake. I wish no man's Conscience in our days were qualified to suggest a fresher example. But whilst 'tis so many ways the interest of Pride to abet our contentions, we cannot think it so sluggish or unindustrious an agent, as not to find out expedients for its purpose. I shall not attempt to give a particular of its instruments, when I have said that Schism is one of them, I need not add more, since that alone serves both to complete and perpetuate the Mischief of all our speculative dissensions. How close a Band of concord the communicating in holy duties is, we may learn by Jeroboam, who seems so well to have understood its unitive efficacy, that he durst not trust the newly divided Tribes in a joint resort to the Temple; and therefore least the rupture he had made in the State should close again, he thinks it necessary to make another in the Church, and secure his defection from his Prince, by that from his God. But we need not borrow a testimony from that his impious Policy, we have a more Authentic attestation from the holy Psalmist, who when he would describe the greatest entireness, Exemplifies it by the walking to the house of God as friends, Psal. 55. 14. And the Apostle goes yet higher, and from our common participation of the Eucharist, infers not only our union, but our incorporation. We being many are one bread, and one body, for we are all partakers of that one bread, 1 Cor. 10. 17. And then sure we may on the contrary conclude, that our separation must have the quite distant effects; alienate our affections, and by that means still more estrange our Judgments. For besides that 'tis natural to men to think they can never run far enough from that they begin to loath, they are in their own defense to amplify the differences, that they may acquit themselves from the scandal of a causeless separation, and this God knows is the usual Method among us, when we have broken communion, our only study is not how to repair, but justify it. The adversaries Tenets are rigourously scanned, new Charges exhibited, and the Schism defended upon those later discoveries, which were no motives to the making it. And then sure no man can doubt but this is a proper way, both to multiply and Eternize disputes; and 'tis abundantly manifest, that vanity and elation of mind is the cause that Men thus prefer a mistaken reputation, before their own innocence or the Churches peace. Indeed if we thoroughly consider it, we shall find Pride is one of the fatallest instruments of Excision, the twoedg'd sword by which adverse parties do mutually cut themselves from one another. The very elements and constitutive parts of a Schismatic, being the Esteem of himself, and the Contempt of others. I am not as this Publican was, we know, the voice of the proud Pharisee, whose very name signifies separation, and our modern Separatists do but Echo the same note, when they pronounce all those Heretical or Carnal from whom they have withdrawn. Or perhaps they derive from a yet more ancient president, those of whom the Prophet Isaiah speaks, Isaiah 65. 5. which say, Stand by thyself, come not near me, for I am holier than thou; an Insolent kind of language which the Cathari in the primitive times did not more exactly transcribe, than many Sects of differing denominations have done in ours. But 'tis to be remembered, that while the Pharisee looked so fastidiously on the poor Publican, he renounced communion in prayers much more acceptable than his own; and those refined Zealots who feared contagion from the approach of their more innocent Brethren, could boldly venture on the pollutions of the most detestable Idolatries: And God knows the note has too ready an application in both instances. In the mean time 'tis a sad contemplation, that so much of that zeal which makes such a glistering in the World, shall when brought to the Touch, be found adulterate, that the transcendent purity men boast of, should prove but a more sublimated wickedness, and their pretence to spirituality be verified only in spiritual pride. Alas, is not the whole circuit of Secular things wide enough to contain this swelling humor? Are there not Pomps and Vanities of the world enough to entertain this one Lust, but must this Moabite be brought into the Sanctuary? Can we not be elevated enough unless we trample upon all that is holy, and make Religion Factor for our Ambition? We find some very confidently point out Antichrist upon the strength of this one praedicted circumstance, that he was to sit in the Temple of God. But what need we travel beyond the Alps to find out that, which everywhere presents its self? Our Pride does too unhappily answer the description; and though there is no instance wherein it can cease to be Antichristian, yet surely it is more eminently so, when it thus usurps God's seat, and rules in Sacred things. Would God the pains and animosity which has been spent in discovering and reviling other Antichrists, had been diverted to the pulling down of this, the labor would have been more effectual even to the immediate end of the Designers, for were this Pride Eradicated, the Foundation of all Spiritual usurpations were undermin'd. But alas, those who exclaim the most loudly against all foreign Tyranny on their Consciences, do obsequiously bow to this intestine Usurper, make an entire dedition of themselves, and submit to the severest and ignoblest vassallage. They have invested it with so absolute and sovereign a Power, that (as Samuel warns the Israelites of their King, 1 Sam. 8.) they are not to call anything their own when it is useful to its service: All their powers, all their interests are devoted to it, and that not only to adorn its pomp, but to fight its battles. Men quarrel and contend till not only themselves, but even Christianity its self expire in the contest. But if it be indeed certain that every War is so far unjustifiable, as are the causes of it, 'twill surely be a competent prejudice against our contentions, that our Pride is so much concerned in them, which is so unchristian a motive, as all the holy-water wherewith men have sprinkled it, can never baptize into a cleanness; all the borrowed dresses of Zeal and Sanctity, however they may disguise, can never legitimate it. Those Arts of concealment may indeed add a new guilt, that of Hypocrisy, but can never expiate, no nor extenuate the old: And how Saint-like a form soever our Vain-glory puts on, it does but the more own its derivation from him, who can transform himself into an Angel of light, whose aspirings have first subverted himself, and now go on to propagate both his Crime and Ruin to us; nor has he ever managed that design with more Art or Success, than by thus making our Pride a partition wall to divide us from one another, and consequently from God too; who being, as our Church styles him, the author of Peace and lover of Concord, can never join himself with the disturbers of both, but must necessarily be disobliged by our Dissensions and Schisms.

CHAP. XIV. A survey of the Causes of Disputes; Secondly, Curiosity.

IF now we proceed farther in our enquiry we shall find, that another grand incendiary of our Disputes is Curiosity: A vice which though in some respects it may be reckoned a species of the former, that of Pride, yet in others it admits a distinct consideration. This is that baneful weed which the Devil made a shift to steal even into Paradise, and which has ever since affected the richest soils, the most pregnant and polite Wits; nor did it only eject man from thence, but it has improved the original curse, and multiplied those briers and thorns among which he was cast, yea, transplanted them from the Earth, where they could only raze the skin, into the Brain, where they pierce and torture the intellectual and immortal Part of Man. Nay farther, even that sweat of his brows, which was to extirpate them from the ground, serves but to water and cherish them in his mind; his very industry being in this case the extremest ill-husbandry, and the more pains he takes, the farther he removes himself from all real advantages of his toil.

THERE are some parts of Knowledge which God has thought fit to seclude from us, to fence them not only as he did the interdicted Tree, by Precept and Commination, but with Difficulties and Impossibilities; made it not only our sin and danger, but our Folly and madness to attempt them. Of this kind are the Mysterious parts of our Religion, which he shows us as it were a-far off to exercise our faith and reverence, but stoops them not to our sense and disquisition. These he has placed like the Sun, where they may influence, not annoy; warm, not scorch us. And would we still permit them to remain at that safe and wholesome distance, we should find none but benign effects; but so importunate are the instigations of Curiosity, that no bounds will keep us from the Mount: We will needs break through into the thick darkness, how dreadful soever the thunders and lightnings are in the way. Like bold Phaetons we despise all benefits wherewith the Father of light and us can court us; unless we may guide his Chariot; and we moralize the Fable as well in the tragicalness of the event, as the insolence of the undertaking; this unhappy Curiosity having not only ruined many of the inquisitors, but set the whole world also in a conflagration. Nor is this temerity more fatal in its Success, than impious in its Foundation: For besides that, it is a direct invasion of God's peculiar, and violation of his Command, it does evidently imply a distrust, either of his Wisdom or his Goodness; supposes him either so ignorant of the strength of those faculties himself has made, that he has assigned them unproportionable objects, and so they must have new work cut out for them by ourselves; or else presumes his Eye evil towards his own Creatures; that as the Devil once suggested to our first Parents, he fears the rivalry of poor mortals, and by an envious detention of some parts of felicity, like one that had been Bountiful only upon surprise and incogitancy, illiberally retracts and contradicts his original design of making Man completely happy. Nay, indeed this represents him unkind, not only to us his created Images, but even to that Eternal and express image of his Person, the Son of his bosom, who may well be thought to have been, as despised in his Eyes, as he was once in ours, Isaiah 53. 3. if he have so cheaply exposed him for their sakes, to whom he denies any of those intellectual advantages, which difference them from Beasts. Thus wickedly curious are we, that rather than converse with vulgar ordinary things, we create prodigies, put new forms upon him that is unchangeable, rob divinity of its most inseparable attribute, and not only disobey God, but reproach him. And then 'tis no wonder if that which affords so little glory to God, hath no more good-will for Men, and that which thus wars with Heaven, leave little peace on Earth. Indeed if we will be building our Babels, and thus assault Omnipotence, 'tis but just we should have our language confounded, and that that knowledge for which we boldly attempt to rifle God's cabinet, should like the Coal from the Altar, serve only to embroil and consume the sacrilegious invaders. Yet besides what is owing to divine vengeance in the case, the thing has in its self a proper, natural efficiency toward it; for when so many men are engaged in a blind search, 'tis not imaginable they should all stumble upon the same Notions, and supposing them to fall upon variety, 'tis impossible but men's fond overweening of their own conceits and petulant disdains of others, will improve that variety into Opposition, and that opposition into set and Solemn Feuds. And God knows, the Church is too effectively acquainted with this fatal gradation, and can experimentally attest the unhappy propriety of this sort of Curiosity towards the engendering of discord and confusion.

BUT besides this higher rank of things which God hath set so much above us, there are others of an inferior sort, as much below us, which are concealed from us, not for their sublimity, but their uselessness; for as God on the one hand remembers that we are but flesh, unable to bear the nearer approaches of divinity, and so talks with us as once with Moses through a cloud: So on the other he forgets not that he breathed into us the breath of life, a vital active spirit, whose motions he expects should own the dignity of its original, and as it was its self an emanation of the Essential Goodness, should aim at only real and solid good, and not evaporate and exhaust its powers in mean and impertinent pursuits. And upon this score also, he has found it necessary to hide many things from us, not that they would dazzle, but misemploy our Eye; not swallow up our Understanding, but divert our Attention, from what is more important: Of this sort are those many thin aerial speculations, the certain knowledge whereof would bring us no real advantage, make us at all the wiser to Salvation; yet such a value does our inquisitive Nature set upon everything for its being hid, that as if our Life were bound up with these Secrets, and all our Felicity dwelt in the Shade of these recesses, we pursue this search with indefatigable industry, ransack all corners with as great diligence as the Woman for her lost piece of Silver, Luk. 15. 8. And as if this were indeed the treasure hid in the field, sell all that we have, lay out our whole selves upon the purchase. Indeed he that shall consider what solemn Disquisitions there are upon the slightest, and inconsiderable Subjects, with what Advertence and concern Questions of this kind are bandied in the world, must wonder how men can at once be so serious and so trifling; or that those who can say so much, should not once ask themselves to what purpose they say anything. Yet what multitudes of men are there engaged in such chases as this? when alas, the quarry is not worth half the toil, could it be gotten: but what Solomon says of the sluggard, Prov. 12. 27. that he roasteth not that which he took in hunting, is true of the contrary temper, these over-busy spirits whose labor is their only reward, they hunt a shadow, and chase the wind; and when they strain to their utmost speed, there is still the wonted Distance between them and their aims; all their eager pursuits bring them no acqurest; but after they have traversed so much ground, traced all the mazes that learned Curiosity could contrive to perplex men, and staid to the weariness of the flesh, if not to the quenching of the Spirit too, they are still in the same ignorance from whence they set out, and 'twere well if they were also in the same doubtfulness: But the unhappiness of it is, they acquire a confidence without any true ground of it; and get such a Knowledge as may puff up, but not edify. This was eminently exemplified in the Gnostics of old, whose vain Chimaeras, and foolish questions, as the Apostle calls them, Tit. 3. 9. past with them for such a superlative wisdom, as gave them Insolence to discriminate themselves from others by that swelling Title, and monopolize the reputation of Science, which yet if we will believe the great Doctor of the Gentiles, and he too brought up at the feet of Gamaliel, the greatest Rabbi of the Jews, was science falsely so called. And God knows, they want not successors in this as well as in other particulars, men are so possessed with their own Phancies that they take them for Oracles, and think they see visions, and are arrived to some Extraordinary revelations of Truth, when indeed they do but dream dreams, and amuse themselves with the Phantastick Ideas of a busy imagination. Yet would they only please themselves in the delusion, the Frensy were more innocent; but like the prouder sort of Lunatics, they will needs be Kings and Rulers, impose their wild conjectures for Laws upon others, and denounce War against all that receive them not: And this is that which makes the great combustion, and confusion among us; for while one man Opines one way, another another, and each will obtrude his opinion on every-body else; 'tis impossible but the contests should be sharp and endless; for each man labors under a double Impatience, the one of having his own notions rejected, the other of having the quite contrary imposed on him; and though 'tis true the reciprocalness of the Injury ought to allay the displeasure at it, yet men so much more consider what they suffer than what they do, that everyone cries out aloud of that hard measure, which himself offers without regret. And between winds so contrary and so fierce, 'tis no wonder if storms arise; and in such Tempests has Religion so long been tossed, that it now needs the interposition of a divine Miraculous power, to keep it from sinking; for alas, these Skirmishes expire not with the first Propugners of the Opinions; they perhaps began as single Duellers, but then they soon get their troops about them, have their partisans and abettors, who not only enhance, but entail the feud to posterity. And indeed this propagation of Strife, both in these trifling, and the former more profound speculations, is the most fatal circumstance of the whole Case: Were it not for this, though we might have many Errors, we could have no Sects. And if the Church might be sometimes wounded with the darts of single Adversaries, yet she could not be surrounded and besieg'd with combinations and confederacies. Some straggling Soldiers might prove renegados, but they would not revolt in troops and legions. We should not have such numerous Parties, who with the greatest violation of Christian unity, denominate themselves, not from the grand author and finisher of our Faith; but from the first brocher of their Idoliz'd opinions. In the mean time, 'tis a sad contemplation, that a little vain curiosity should weigh so much, or the Churches peace so little with us: that we should sacrifice the one, to the satisfaction shall I say, or rather to the whetting and inflaming of the other. But 'tis a yet sadder, that this should chiefly be done by those whose learning enables, and whose profession should devote to the most noble and most profitable Studies; nay have the highest obligations to correct those exorbitances in others, which with such Art and labor they propagate and teach. How wounding a spectacle is it to see our greatest Heroes like Hercules at the Distaffe, thus degenerously employed, and to find those who were by Christ designed for fishers of Men, thus entertain themselves like Children, with picking up Shells and Pebbles on the shore; and which is yet more unmanly wrangling about them too. Indeed at this rate, 'tis no wonder if they make the disciples Complaint, we have travailed all night and have taken nothing. This sure is so little the way to win Souls, that he whose business it is to destroy them, can very contentedly refer them to this method; can gladly leave us all our nice and subtle disquisitions, upon the very same score that one of the Gothick Commanders, advised the sparing of the Italian Schools and Libraries; Let us, says he, leave them their Books, that whilst they amuse themselves with such follies, we may subdue them at our pleasure. It is the saying of the Wiseman, there is a wisdom that multiplieth bitterness; and sure if there be a wisdom acquired by these curious Enquiries, 'tis of this sort, like the Knowledge of Good and Evil attained by our first Parents, which taught them to know the Good only by its loss, and the Evil by its smart. Indeed our too high, and transcending speculations on the one hand, and our too trivial and unprofitable on the other; are like the torrid and frigid Zone, the one consumes us with its heat, the other chills, and benumns us with its cold; that turns us to Cinders, this to Ice. These little trifling Notions being too slight an exercise to keep heat in our Christianity, which not only expresses but maintains its life by strong and vigorous Motions. And therefore between these two intemperate, God has provided us an habitable Clime, I mean that middle rank of divine truths which tend to practice. Here he would have us dwell and converse, fix our thoughts and studies: Nor need we fear that they are too dry a subject for our contemplation. We see as deep Speculators, as any now assume to be, found it far otherwise. David could entertain himself with the Meditation of God's Law (not his hidden Decrees or counsels) all the Day, Psal. 119. 97, Nay it seems the Matter was so copious and redundant, that it could not be confined within that narrow boundary of Time, but invaded the night also; forced him to default from his rest, to bestow on his meditations, I have thought of thy Name O Lord in the night season, and have kept thy Law, Vers. 55. Neither is it a vain expense of Time, which it thus tempts to, but gives the happiest improvement; lands at that harbor to which all rational studies tend, gives understanding, Vers. 130. makes wise the simple, Psal. 19. 7. and this also in an eminent degree, such as set him above his teachers, and his Elders also. Thou through thy commandments hast made me wiser than mine Enemies. I have more understanding than my teachers, for thy testimonies are my study. I am wiser than the aged, because I keep thy commandments, Psal. 119. 98, 99, 100. These are high and liberal Elogies of this divine study: and if any shall seek to divert an unwelcome inference by saying that David spoke them only in pious raptures, that they were the transport of his zeal, rather than the estimate of his judgment; we must resolve the objector far removed from such religious excesses, and under the contrary defect: yet the cause will so well bear an appeal, that he may be trusted to consult farther, let him advise with Solomon, whose large desires and possessions too of wisdom, must suppose him no stranger to its nature, and he will tell him the very same, and that not in his devouter ecstasies, but in his most composed sedate temper, when he solemnly seats himself in his School, reads Ethics to his disciples, and professes his design of giving subtlety to the Simple, and to the young man knowledge and discretion, Prov. 1. 4. for if his whole book of Proverbs be scanned, the sum of it will be found to be nothing else but an exhortation to the study of this practic Wisdom. Nay when his own understanding was improved and advanced by Experience also, when he had not only begged, but bought wisdom, after he had given his Curiosity its full unbounded Range, compassed the whole Universe, and examined not only in contemplation, but by sensitive experiment, whatever therein could pretend to be that good for the sons of Men, Eccl. 2. 3. we find after all this busy inquest, he gives up his verdict in this form, Eccl. 12. 13. Let us hear the end of the whole matter, Fear God and keep his Commandments, for this is the Whole Duty of Man: And now methinks so solemn a decision of the wisest of Men, and he too inspired by the Omniscient God, may be thought of weight enough to acquiesce in. Yet since there are some who love not to weigh in the balance of the Sanctuary, and that had rather receive Responses from Delphos than from between the Cherubims: Let such at least hear even the Heathen Oracle attesting Socrates to be the wisest man, because he directed his studies to the moral part of Learning, which he did to such a degree, as to disparage all those more Airy speculations, which bettered not men's Manners, but were only 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, a noise and clattering of Words. And Pythagoras his School defines Philosophy, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the cleansing and perfecting of human life, which two things are said to be done, first by Virtue, whose business it is to remove 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the inordination of our Passions: Secondly, by Truth, which restores 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, the Image and pourtraicture of God. And since this is the joint suffrage both of Religion and Reason, why should those that pretend to either defy both, and vainly consume themselves in unprofitable searches? Why should men wander to seek beggary and emptiness, who may with far less labor be rich at home? Alas, 'tis not bare knowledge, how great or universal soever, that can possess us of felicity. Were it possible for us to have a window into Heaven, to see all the Divine secrets, yet that might be but like the Rich man's prospect into Abraham's bosom, while himself was in the bottomless pit. They are not only the gross and illiterate Souls that must feed those flames, the most Aerial and Sublimated, are rather the more proper fuel for an immaterial Fire, and the knowledge we carry thither, render us the fitter company for him, who knew everything but how to keep himself happy. It was at once the Observation and Wonder of Plutarch, that whereas God has several incommunicable properties as Power and Immortality, &c. these all men aspir'd to, in the mean time neglected that of Goodness, wherein he was willing all men should share. And sure there is now cause of the same complaint, we would have Omniscience and all parts of Divinity besides the holiness, yet alas, those without these would prove but fatal acquests, and that approach towards being God's, would only make us the more Devils. The only advantageous as well as possible way of Assimilation with God is by purity, and the means of that an Attentive consideration of those Divine revelations, which are to regulate our practice; these at once dispence light and warmth, direct and revive the Soul: And if men would not exhale vapors to cloud and darken them, Eclipse the clearest Truths by difficulties of their own creating, no man could miss his way to Heaven for want of light, and yet so vain are they as to think they oblige the world by involving it in darkness, as if their Mists should like that which Watered the new-formed Earth, Gen. 2. 6. supply the place of the dew of Heaven. But certainly to all such in their profusest liberalities, we need make no other Request than Diogenes did to Alexander, desire them only that they will not stand between us and the Sun, intercept its rays, and rob us of that which is infinitely better than anything they can give us. Were this but obtained, we should soon discern the inconsiderableness of those things whose effects have been so sadly considerable to Christendom; those many Chimaeras which we wrangle and fight about, would in this Sun-shine appear but Motes that dance in the Air, (though God knows as we manage them, they are the most luxurious Revels to the Prince that rules there.) Were but a St. Paul's doctrine thoroughly imbib'd, our Curious Arts, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, superfluous unconcerning studies, would as it happened, Acts 19. be supplanted; and our devotion if sufficiently accended, would as theirs, burn up innumerable books of this sort. And sure as this would be the greatest, so it would be the most triumphant Bonfire Christendom ever saw, as being not only an indication, but a means of the mighty growth, and prevailing of the Word of God, which our vain Curiosities serve only to impede and obstruct, while they do as mightily advance dissensions & animosities amongst men.

CHAP. XV. A survey of the Causes of Disputes; Thirdly, Interest.

BUT besides these two, there is a third Fomenter of divisions, which either for its activity or success must not subscribe to either of them, and that is Interest. This is the great Idol to which the world bows: To this we pay our devoutest homage, give it not only our knees, but our hearts; and as if the making us rich were a second Creation, that could cancel all the obligations of the first: We sacrilegiously entitle our profit to all the Prerogatives of a Creator, give it an absolute unlimited dominion over us, allow it to prescribe us all our measures of good and evil; to rule not only our Reason but our Passions too, (a Sovereignty alas we would never yield to our God) and as if the giving us laws were not Empire enough, we permit it to impose Religions also; for sure they that observe how great an influence it has in Church affairs, will conclude it governs more than the secular part of the world. And indeed if we look back, we shall find 'tis no novel usurpation, but though void of other Title, has the Prescription of many ages. Divinity has long since been made the handmaid of Policy, and Religions modelled by conveniencies of State. The golden Calves became venerable deities, when they were found apt to secure Jereboam's Jealousies: And Machiavil's policy, that States should serve themselves of Religion, was a common practice long before 'twas his Rule. And this Example of Communities has been transcribed by single Persons. In the Old Testament we find frequent mention of those mercenary Prophets, that turned the office into a trade, divin'd for money, nay, sometimes for more contemptible hire, handfuls of Barley and pieces of Bread: And in the New we see the same motive of Secular advantage had force enough to turn an

Ecclesiastic into a Laick, make Demas degrade himself, and desert his Ministry, and as it thus stopped his mouth from preaching the Truth, so it opened those of Others to divulge Errors. Such were those deceivers of whom St. Paul speaks, Tit. 1. 11. who spake things they ought not for filthy lucre's sake. So when the same Apostle declaims the most earnestly against the love of money as the root of all evil, we find he fetches his proof of that Charge, from its having made men err from the faith, 1 Tim. 6. 10. And 'tis St. Peter's prediction, that the most damnable Heresies, even the denying of the Lord that bought them, should be introduced by those, who through Covetousness should make merchandize of their Proselytes, 2 Pet. 2. 4. and sure the event attests the presage to have concerned more than the Age immediately succeeding, there being none of the subsequent which hath not in some degree assisted its completion, nor have we cause to wonder here-at, since 'tis obvious to discern the conjunction and dependence between Covetousness and Heresy. For the Itching ears the Apostle speaks of, being an Epidemick disease, give fair opportunity to every Mountebank to try his Experiments. When men nauseate Old truths, because they are acquainted with them, and embrace doctrines for the very same reason, they should reject them, even because they are New: When they love no Teachers, but such as thus entertain them, and are bountiful to none but such as they love; there is little doubt, but there will be Mints enough set on work, when the Coiners can thus at once stamp new opinions for their Disciples, and Money for Themselves: And God knows they are not a few of our Divisions, that have thence taken birth. It will be needless to ravel far into the Records of Elder times, every man's memory will be able to suggest to him too many, and too pertinent instances. Upon which reflection 'twill be too visible, that much of some men's late pretence to Godliness was but a real pursuit of Gain; and the new light served to guide them to their neighbors Coffers: And probably many of our Disputes had been superseded, had not the Authors foreseen, that though they lost the Question, they should gain what they more sought. A few essays had discovered how much the Populacy were pleased with Novelties, especially such as at once gratified their Levity and their Pride, by casting ill reflections on the things or Persons to whom they owed a reverence; and the liberal contributions such Teachers met with, served still to invite more laborers into that work, where without the uneasiness of a long Expectation, their very seedtime was their Harvest, and by sowing Tares, they immediately reaped Gold: And 'tis no wonder if such quick returns made them diligent at the trade, industrious to provide those wares they saw they could put off so well. And would to God we were secure, that this way of Traffick were yet at an end, for so long as these spiritual Merchants can thus impose on their credulous Chapmen, make them buy one mischief with another, and exhaust their Estates to endanger their Souls, we must not hope our dissensions will ever cease, our flames ever be extinct, that have so much matter to feed them, and such importunate blasts to blow them up.

BUT covetousness is of too insatiable a nature to be contented with one way of supply, 'tis like the Sea, that receives the Tribute of all Rivers (though far unlike it in lending any back again) and therefore those who have resolved upon the thriving sort of Piety, have seldom embarkt all their hopes in one bottom, nor so depended on the bounty of their Proselytes, as to neglect other ways of preying for themselves. They wanted not providence to foresee, how uncertain a revenue popular benevolence is: That the same giddy and violent humor, which had opened their hands so wide, might by working another way close them as fast; or if their inclinations continued, their abilities might fail; (a thing very possible to those, who have such suckers) or if both these remained, yet that they were unlikely to grow in proportion to their own appetites, and therefore found it necessary to have some other reserve; and besides this way of flattering, their willing benefactors out of part, contrived another of forcing their unwilling Neighbors out of all their possessions: So making the spoils of some men's honesty a richer booty than that of others folly. Hence Shiboleths found out of Covenants and engagements, to give opportunity of destroying a dissenting brother; by this Art a fat benefice became crime and witness too against its Incumbent, and he was sure to be unorthodox, that was worth the plundering. Thus alas has the Altar of God been attended, or rather invaded by those whose very approach was a guilt, that qualified them rather to lay hold on its horns, than pretend to its service; for sure that God, who has declared he hates robbery for burnt-offering, cannot much affect Robbers for Priests. But this is a Theme, so unpleasant I delight not to enlarge on it, and rather wish that the memory of it were so extinct, that it might remain nowhere but in the penitential Litanies of the Offenders; my design in the present reflection is only to make it an evidence how much covetousness promotes our contentions, which sure is not more visible anywhere than in this instance: For where there is a design of supplanting, that necessarily requires another of accusing; (even Jezebel herself projects not to seize on Naboth's Vineyard without a precedent Charge) to comply with which necessity, not only the lives and conversations, but the doctrines and opinions of our most eminent Divines have been strangely misrepresented, and when that proved not fence enough to the reputation of their Oppressors, they have thought fit to change the Scene, and to combat those opinions in their true shape, upon which they could not so well fasten their disguise. I shall not here need to say with how much, or how little pretext of reason they managed those Disputes: 'Tis enough to my purpose that such Disputes there were, and those founded in the desire of acquiring secular advantages, which sufficiently attests Interest to be a potent Abettor of our quarrels.

BUT God knows that is a truth of which the world affords so many proofs, that we need not confine ourselves to this little Angle of it, or owe our convictions only to our domestic transactions; if we look abroad we shall find it too often exemplified. The memorable disturbance given to the Church, as well as State of Germany by the Anabaptists, is a pregnant instance; whose new opinion was but an expedient of investing themselves in new possessions, and their second Baptism but the Solemnity of espousing, not only the flesh, but the world also, which they had renounced in the first.

AND would God they had been the only set of Men, whose doctrines were subservient to their interests, for such tumultuous and Plebeian projects, though like a land-flood they make great spoil at the present, yet soon sink again. Such avowed and excessive greediness devours its self, and the instruments by which it wrought: so that the defeat of the secular Design, is commonly the routing those Opinions, which were formed for the promoting it. But when the same desire has the advantage of a sober guidance; when Avarice puts on the Canonical habit, and twists its self not only with the practice of Men, but the doctrines of the Church; when articles of Religion shall be estimated by their profitableness, and Ecclesiastics dispute, as Laymen fight for Money; then alas the mischief seems fatal, the disease so fixed and radicated, as at once discourages, and mocks the attempts of cure.

THAT this is the case not only in a particular and private Church, but that which assumes to be the Universal and Catholic is too apparent. The one Position of the Popes right to dispose Kingdoms, outstrips all other principles of rapine: this is to drive a whole-sale trade, when all other petty Merchants, deal but for parcels: which as it is a much bolder, so is it a more prejudicial attempt than the invading of private possessions, and this Duo gladii, the double armature of S. Peter, a more destructive Engin, than the tumultuary weapon snatched up by a Fanatick: but sure S. Peter's sword though once rashly managed by himself, was never designed to arm his successors to invade Kingdoms: This property of it seems rather to have been derived from the Praetorian soldiers, who insolently assumed the disposing of the Empire, wherein they at the last arrived to that impudence, that after the Death of Pertinax they made open port sale of it, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, in a base and sordid manner, as if it had been of common marketable wares: I cannot say the Court of Rome transcribes that indecent owning of the traffick; but it has in other instances so well attested its good managery, that 'tis not very credible, that Crowns and Scepters are conferred gratis. And to this so advantageous a Doctrine others bear proportion: Those of Purgatory, Indulgences, and Supererogation, are ready instances, wherein the Assertors themselves seem to be unanimous in nothing but in a joint reference to profit, for when they come to minute definitions they vary and disagree; satisfy one another, as little as their common Antagonists: and therefore in the Council of Trent they prudently chose in their decrees to propose the bare Articles backed by the Authority of the Church, and Anathemas of the Council, as having by precedent discussions of the points in their congregations discerned the small accord that was among themselves, when they descended to particulars. And indeed the Opinions were so various as to the grounds of the Doctrines, that one would wonder how from so differing premisses, they should all infer the same conclusion; were it not that the conspiration of Interest was too potent for the diversity of Judgment. And sure 'twas a strange deference was given to it, when in the matter of Indulgences, there was (by the Testimony of their own Writers) four different Opinions, and yet all Catholic: which moderation towards Speculative dissenters, compared with the great severity against those that opposed its Practice, speaks loud enough that the Orthodoxy of the point, lay wholly in the Profitableness: and that Luther himself had been no Heretic, had he busied himself only in such disquisitions, as impeded not the gain of that Doctrine. Nor is this merely surmise and conjecture, for if we consult the memorials of those transactions, we shall find this was the thing that most alarmed Rome, put that Court in almost as great a commotion as the birth of Christ did Herod's: and accordingly in their private consults, the closer cabals of the College; the securing this part of their invaded treasure was the grand deliberation, upon which account it was, that when Adrian shown some Inclination to the reforming abuses both in this and other instances, one of his Cardinals who better knew the intrigues of affairs, admonisht him against that unskillful piece of Ingenuity, not only from the Example of his Predecessors, who were resolute never to confess Faults by mending them, but by representing to him,

That no reformation could be made, which would not notably diminish the rents of the Church, which having four foundations, the one Temporal, the other three Spiritual, Indulgencies, Dispensations, and Collations of Benefices; no one of them could be stopped but that one quarter of the revenues would be cut off.

What a resemblance this advice carries to the oration of Demetrius to his fellow craftsmen, Act. 19. 25. I need not stand to demonstrate, but while such considerations as this, bear sway in Church matters, where Profit shall be the Touch-stone both for faith and manners, we are not to wonder if no gainful Tenet be deposited; or Peace bought with that which in most men's esteem is of far more value.

AND this is it which ominates sadly as to our divisions with the Romanists, were our differences merely the product of Heat and Passion, they would like the smaller clefts in the ground, want nothing but a cooler season to cement and close them: but when they are thus formed into an interest, become the Design not of single persons or ages, but of corporations and successions; the Breach seems like the scissures and ruptures of an Earthquake, and threatens to swallow all that attempt to close it, and reserves its cure only for omnipotence. Indeed till spiritual and secular Concerns be reduced into their proper ranks, which are now mixed and confounded, the better to disguise the preposterous subordination of the nobler to the inferior; till we have forgotten the unhappy Chymistry of turning all even Religion its self into Gold, we must never hope to get out of the Furnace; our flames will still grow fiercer, and with this unnatural effect to consume not the Dross, but the purer Metal. In a word, till men can sever themselves from their Avarice and mean pursuits of gain, they will never cease to separate from their brethren. For as the most sovereign Balsoms cannot cure a hurt while the arrow remains in the flesh: so neither can the most pacifick Remedies at all avail, so long as the same worldly Aims, which made the wound, still stick in it.

BUT in the mean time 'tis a Melancholick consideration that Christianity should be by its Professors thus unworthily prostituted; that the many various and opposite Religions for which we severally pretend so much zeal, should be but divers ways to the same irreligious End; wherein our Elders seem to resemble those in the Story of Susanna, who when they meant to part with each other, yet did unawares meet by the impulse of the same Lust. We find it moved the patience even of the Lamb of God, to see his Fathers house made a house of merchandize, though the Traffick was for the furnishing of Sacrifices: with what abhorrence must we think does he now behold those, who drive so much a worse trade in it: who sell not accommodations for worship, but the worship its self to accommodate their interests, and do not only make Gain in the Temple, but of it. A thing the sacrilegious Rapine of our days has made literally true, where besides the revenues, the very fabric and materials of Churches, have been marketable ware: Judas's good husbandry has been taken up, and ad quid Perditio haec? put as the common Motto upon everything that could be sold for more, nay sometimes for less than Three hundred pence. And as Dionysius took away the golden beard from Aesculapius, to rectify the indecency of the Sons having a beard when the Father had none: and Julian robbed the Christian altars with this impious Sarcasm, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ; that 'twas unfit the Son of Mary should be served in Plate. So do men now a-days make themselves regulators of holy things, correct the indecorums of the sanctuary, that they may rifle its treasures. Thus do we see the Apostles affirmation sadly verified that those who will be rich fall into Temptation, and a snare, 1 Tim. 6. 9. Such is the greediness of a covetous appetite, that it swallows indiscriminately whatever looks like prize, and rather than it want its prey, God Himself shall be robbed. Nay, 'twere to be wisht in this instance, that That were all; but alas he is mocked too, used not only unjustly, but contumeliously; we thus make him a property to our sordid designs, and when he has professed that he will not be served together with Mammon, we attempt that which is yet far more blasphemous, and make him pay service to him with whom he disdains to share it when paid by others.

NEITHER is Covetousness the only Vice that serves its interest upon Religion: but as 'tis made a factor for that, so is it a cloak and disguise for many other. Of this the Catalogues of primitive Heretics give sufficient witness; divers whereof as the Nicolaitans, Cerinthians, Carpocratians and Gnostics seem to have constituted distinct sects in Christianity, only that they might introduce the most bestial parts of Heathenism, and pretended an association in Religion, when indeed it was in lust. How far some of our modern Sects resemble them in this Particular, I will not undertake to pronounce: though there want not those who make severe, and not improbable Conjectures concerning it. But whether that be the main design or no; 'tis certain both that wickedness, and many other find great shelter among them. He that brings resolution to uphold a Faction shall not miss of Entertainment, how many or how great vices soever he brings with it; and he that is of a godly party, shall in spite of the loudest Guilts be a godly man. So meritorious a thing is it in some men's account to be factious, that it covers the multitude of sins: hence it is that Criminals so frequently fly to new Churches for Sanctuary: and 'twill still be the concern of such to have so creditable a Refuge; and therefore we are not to wonder if this Interest combine with the former in promoting our Dissensions.

BUT alas, as it advances those, so does it our guilt too, that have more than on vile End to which we accommodate our Piety: and still implies the greater affront to our God, by how many the more and baser interests we shroud under his Patronage. Alas, is it not enough as Job speaks to hide our iniquities in our own bosoms, but must we wrap them in the Veil of the Sanctuary. We read that Goats once lent a covering for the Tabernacle; but here by an impious Inversion, the Tabernacle must lend a covering to the Goats. The most bestial appetites be both concealed and preserved under the Shadow of Religion. Plutarch tells us that when Marcellus would have consecrated a Temple jointly to Honor and Virtue, the Priests resisted it, saying, Two God's dwelt not in one Church: and if their vain deities exacted such a solemnity of Respect, and would not be Inmates to one another, can we think the true God will be content to be made so to all our vilest lusts. This is sure the highest Contumely to the divine Majesty; and never could the abomination of desolation more properly be said to stand in the holy place than in this sense: for as the natures of these Guilts are fitly expressed by abomination, so is the effect of them by desolation; they having brought the most fatal mischiefs on the Church.

AND now would God all that are concerned in this guilt, would soberly ponder the weight of it, There are two things of which God has expressed himself peculiarly Tender, his honor and his Church; this is the invading him in both; the exposing the one to Reproach and Contempt, and the other to Ruin and Destruction; and doubtless were there nothing of the former, this later alone must be sadly accounted for. It remains yet a Character of infamy upon Achan, that he troubled Israel to enrich himself: and on Balam that he not only loved the wages of iniquity, but ensnared the people in uncleanness: and sure the same with many aggravations belongs to those, who by the like unworthy practice, have not only rendered the Church a prey to foreigners, but made it so to its self; engaged one part of it against another, till the whole is so wasted, that our Religion seems now nearer extinction, than our quarrels about it.

CHAP. XVI. A Survey of the Causes of Disputes; Fourthly, Passion.

A FOURTH grand contributor to our dissensions is Passion, which being by God and nature placed in a subserviency to reason, when it quits its proper station and assumes empire, it must needs disorder and subvert not only the State of the Mind, but of Every thing upon which it has an Influence. I shall not here attempt any Philosophical discourse either of their nature or number; all that concerns the present enquiry falls under one of these two, our love, or our hate; and is either Kindness and Prepossession, or Spight and Prejudice: For the first of these 'tis a thing which common experience attests to be a most forcible corrupter of the understanding, which being by native right designed a Judge, is by this interrupted in its office, not permitted to make those impartial Enquiries, on which a right sentence should be founded. But (as it fares sometimes with Magistrates in Popular insurrections) forced to give countenance to its own violation, to own not its proper native dictates, but such as are presented to it, by the prejudicate Phancy. And as it thus lays restraint upon the superior part of the Mind, keeps the understanding in fetters, so (to complete the inversion) it takes off all ties from the inferior: Gives not only license, but incitation to the other Passions to take their freest range, to act with the utmost impetuosity. And sure there can nothing more be required, to render it a most apt instrument of Tumult and Confusion. For when every opinion that is taken up, shall instead of reason and argument, arm its self with heat and violence, there can be no end of contending. And the truth of this is, God knows, too sadly discernible in our Church-controversies, which derive a great deal of their warmth and bitterness from this Fountain.

OF this prepossession there are two Sorts, the one relating to Doctrine, the other to Persons; by the first I mean not a sober constancy to those principles which being first imbibed by education, are afterwards retained upon Judgment, but an eager tenacity of Opinions, not so much upon Truth or Evidence, as upon a confused irrational kindness; a Platonic love of some Doctrine merely for themselves, and then making them the standards, by which all others are to be measured: And this kind of Prepossession is no Stranger in the world, there being multitudes of men, who assert opinions with all imaginable vehemence, who can give no better ground of it, but because they like them: And as the wiser sort choose a Tenet, because 'tis right, so these conclude 'tis right, because they have chosen it. And having thus enamour'd themselves of their Helena, they expect all should adore, nor can he scape the note of Profaneness that refuses. By this absurd partiality it is that some doctrines, which would themselves ill abide the Test, are become the Touch-stone both of Doctrines and Men, and no Opinion or Person sanctified which bears not this impress. I need not stand to give instances, either of the Doctrines or the unhappy influence this espousing of them has had on our dissensions; but indeed this kind of Prepossession is oftentimes the consequent of another; and this great veneration of some Opinions is founded in the reverence of their Authors. Men take up a confidence of the learning or sanctity of a Person, and then all his notions are received implicitly, strictly embraced, but not so much as slightly examined; and this admiration of men's Persons, has in all ages been of huge mischief to the Church, has nursed up private Phancies into solemn public Errors, and given an unhappy perpetuity to many Heterodox opinions, which would else have expired with their first Propugners. This seems to have been foreseen by St. Paul, when he so earnestly exhorts the Corinthians against the ascribing their Faith, to their several respective Teachers: But sure I am, 'twas sadly experimented by the succeeding Christians, who owed many of their divisions to it. A pregnant instance hereof was the Millennium, which in spite of its improbability prevailed long, and almost universally against the Truth upon the strength of Authority. Papias a holy man and Scholar of St. John, having delivered it, the esteem of his Person canoniz'd his mistake, and men chose rather to admit a doctrine, whose unagreeableness to the Gospel Economy rendered it suspicious, than think an Apostolic man could seduce them. And the force of this is yet more considerable, when 'tis remembered that it found Proselytes, not only among the Vulgar, who are commonly flexible to any new Impression, but among those of a higher rank, men that were lights in their generation: Justin Martyr and Irenaeus having owned the Opinion, and intimated it to have been received by many others no less Orthodox; and if such a seduction could prevail, so early in those purer times, before men's interests or spleen were adopted into their Religion, and begot voluntary errors, if I say the mere reputation of a Teacher, was then singly so operative; we cannot wonder at its efficacy in conjunction with those auxiliaries, which worse times have brought in. What concurrence of those there was in the several Heresies, which after infested the Church, I shall not now examine, but 'tis visible that many of them grew considerable, chiefly from the fame of their Authors, thus Tatianus upon the credit of being Justin Martyr's disciple, had an advantage to disseminate his errors, and not only his, but those of Origen Apollinaris and Novatus, gained abettors from the reputed Orthodoxy of the Persons, that proposed them, who having asserted the Faith in some points, were qualified the more prosperously to appose it in others.

NOR has it been only the mishap of elder times to have felt the mischiefs of such praepossession; the disease has still advanced, and every day improved in worse effect, by how much men have more degenerated from primitive integrity, so that the easy Proselyte is now in danger, not only from the blindness, but the treachery of his guide, and is often led out of the common road, as thieves draw passengers into by-ways for the better opportunity of robbing them: But 'tis not my present business to send Hue and cry after them, to examine what the intentions of those leaders are, who misguide their tractable admiring followers, 'tis enough for my purpose to observe, that those who so deliver up themselves in a blind assent to the dictates of any man, are in his power to be abused by him if he pleases: I shall leave it to others, to estimate the probability that they shall not be actually so: But certainly this may be said, that these later ages have beyond all the former given Opportunities of seducing to any that will use them. The one established Doctrine of infallibility among the Romanists is eminent for its propriety that way, while under pretence of submission to something they call Infallible, 'tis evident that the faith of the ignorant Vulgar resolves its self into that which they acknowledge most fallible; the Doctrine of their immediate Teachers. But indeed take it at the best, such a persuasion is not only an error in its self, and an apt foundation for innumerable others, but it necessarily renders them incorrigible; the least retractation of a mistake being so inconsistent with the claim of infallibility, that while they retain the one, they must never attempt the other, nor can they cease to Err, till they confess it possible they may do so. How much more than possible that has been, the many Innovations of that Church sufficiently witness; and consequently the danger of presuming upon the unerrableness of a guide. But would all that upbraid it there, were themselves secure from it, and that many did not in their practice transcribe that decried doctrine, and that too with the improvement of worse circumstances. I must call them worse, by how much the probabilities of Erring are greater under the extemporary conduct of a Private person, than the fixed rules of a community, and by how much again the voluntary enslaving myself is more excuseless, than that which the principles of my Profession, and consequently a seeming obligation of Conscience exposes me to. And as to the matter of Fact, I think 'tis evident enough, that the admiration of men's Persons is a spreading disease that has overrun Christendom, and though a great part of it inveigh against implicit faith, yet if it be thoroughly scanned, 'twill appear 'tis rather the object than the act we differ about. He that vehemently opposes that homage to the Conclave, will yet tamely pay it to a Classis: and he that refuses it there, yields it to the Votes of a Congregational Church; or if he hold out against that too, yet chooses to himself some private Teacher on which to cast it: Like Micah, Judge. 16. Makes him a Teraphim and a Priest too, for his private use; and then confidently consults his Oracle, and has nothing to do but believe its responses. Nay, that which makes the matter yet more sadly ridiculous, is that the very Opposition to one Usurpation makes them deliver themselves up to another. How many when they have heard a Preacher rail fiercely at the Pope, have presently made him theirs, and supposing that Zeal an indication of a safe guide, have given him as absolute a rule of their Consciences, as that he exclaim'd against (perhaps Envied) elsewhere: And the like instances might be given among our other dissenting parties. And this has taught some Seducers a lucky artifice, made them observe to what opinions their Proselytes had the greatest aversion, and by complying with their anger so steal away their love, that they might after lead them to what they pleased, yea, perhaps to that which they so much detested: For there want not examples of some, who have by back ways been brought to those Opinions, which at first they most defied. What have been the attempts or success of the Emissaries of Rome this way, I shall not pronounce, though some (not improbably) speak them great.

FROM this blind and passionate esteem of several Teachers have flowed many pernicious consequents, particularly those distinct Appellations, which form differences into Sects, many of which expressly own this original, by bearing the names of their first Authors. I might here put them in mind, that they are illegitimate persons, whom our Law directs to write with an alias, and ask them, whether the Church from their superinduced name, has not cause so to repute them. But I am sure I may with the utmost seriousness say, that this practice is to the great violation of Christian unity, and reproach of Christian profession, which seems to be abandoned and disown'd by us, who instead of denominating ourselves from the Author and finisher of our Faith, find out new Patrons, as if we were ashamed of our first Relation. Alas, how is the title of Christian, which was so glorious to the Primitive owners, that they gladly bought the occasion of boasting it with Torments and Death, become so despicable to us, that every the obscurest name is courted to supplant it. Have any of our Idolized readers bought their Interest in us so dear as Christ has done, why then are we rather ambitious to be accounted their dependants than his? 'Tis the Apostles own argument, 1 Cor. 1. 13. when he refutes their factious entitling themselves to Paul and Apollo, &c. by asking them if Paul were crucified for them: And indeed he there says so much upon this point, that I need only refer the Reader thither to learn, either the unreasonableness of this Schismatical zeal for our several Teachers, or the inevitable contentions and animosities which spring from it; only let me observe, that every of his Arguments are more pressing upon us, than on the Corinthians; those taken from the unreasonableness sure are, by how much the names we so adore are less venerable than those of Paul and Cephas or Apollo, and those from the consequences are so also. For those Teachers were industrious to prevent, whereas ours commonly are no less busy to promote contentions on their behalf, and so we are more ascertain'd never to want them.

BUT besides this kinder prepossession towards some men's persons, there is another of a different nature, a sinister one. I mean prejudice and disgust, and this has done no less harm in Ecclesiastical affairs than the former. Men take up piques and displeasures at others, and then every opinion of the disliked person must partake of his fate, and be engaged in the quarrel: Nor will those that are enemies ever allow one another the honor of being in the right: Nay, some have been so perversely malicious, that they have given up their understandings to their spleen, forsaken an Opinion themselves approved, only that they might find matter of contest with one they maligned. A memorable instance of this Socrates gives in his Eccl. Hist. in Theophilus Bishop of Alexandria, who having formerly attested the Orthodox belief, that God was incorporeal; yet upon a sudden indignation against Dioscorus and his brethren, who maintained the Tenet, he embraced the contrary Heresy of the Anthropomorphites, that so under the Colour of a difference in faith, he might the more advantageously pursue his malice; & the Effects of it were very Tragical, not only to private persons in Tumult and Bloodshed, but to the Church by reviving that Error, which was before near expiring, and might as Socrates affirms, have lain in the dust, had it not been thus awakened. And indeed in Church story scarce anything occurs more frequently than examples of those, who upon private grudges have either begun or fomented Heresies and Schisms. Thus Marcion being denied the Communion of the Roman Church, having before by a scandalous crime been cut off from his own, he revenged himself by publishing his detestable doctrine: In like manner Miletius upon a displeasure at Peter Bishop of Alexandria, first separated from the Church, and after took part with the Arians: So also Lucifer incensed at Eusebius for not approving of his Electing Paulus to the See of Antioch, broke Communion, and gave both rise and denomination to a new Sect. The like is said of Apollinaris, that he was excited to the broaching his Heresy by his impatience of the Excommunication inflicted on him and his Father, by Theodotus Bishop of Laodicea; and several others might be given to the same purpose, out of the Records of those first Ages.

AND certainly the World seems not to have so much improved in meekness since, as that we should think the same principle is not still as active, and if the Task were not more envious than hard, many recent instances might be given to Parallel the former, especially of such as having justly smarted under the stroke of Ecclesiastical discipline, have sought to revenge themselves both on it and the inflictors, by Factions and Tumults; so making the public at once cloak the Infamy, and bear the charge of their particular rancors. But this is a Subject neither grateful nor necessary to be more distinctly spoken to. One may however in the general say, that where these private Animosities are anything violent, they usually beat down all Consideration of public good. Historians observe of Themistocles, that he always thwarted the Councils of Aristides, not that he thought it the Interest of the Common-wealth, but his own, to keep down the growing reputation of his Competitor: And I fear that envious artifice has been too often transcribed, as well in Ecclesiastic, as in Civil Transactions: No detriment is thought so formidable to a malicious mind, as the prosperity of his Adversary; and public Ruptures shall still be allowed to widen, till they swallow up the whole, rather than he will close with his Antagonist. The History of the Scottish Church gives an apposite Example of this, in a ruling Presbyter, who being by King James advised with about the readmitting Marquess Huntley, and pressed with the present exigencies of Church and State, which required it, gave his final answer in these terms. Well Sir, I see you resolve to take Huntley in favor, if you do, I will opposit, choose whether you will lose him or me, for both you cannot have. Some may think the greatest propriety of this instance lies to show the insolence of that Tribe towards Majesty; but however 'tis not impertinent to the matter in hand also; and shows how light the greatest public concerns are, when malice is the counterpoize: And indeed the Naturalists experiment, that flame will not mingle with flame, never justifies its self better than when applied to minds thus accended, which however they may meet in mutual flashes, can never unite and incorporate: The sadness of it is, that they should only conspire to common vastation, and make the Church its self a burnt-offering.

THUS fatal have our several sorts of prepossions been to our Religion, for as if that were the common Enemy, our most distant contrary Affections, our love and our hate equally annoy it; those brutish parts of us our Passions, which like the beasts under the Law, were never to be brought into the Temple, but for sacrifice, are now found there upon a far differing account, not to be slain, but adored; like the Egyptian Isis and Osyris, enshrin'd to receive our Devotions, for that the Zeal we pretend elsewhere is really paid to them, is alas too manifest.

CHAP. XVII. A survey of the Causes of Disputes; Fifthly, Zeal.

TO these several causes of our distractions we may add another, which though in its original it may seem more innocent, yet is in its consequents no less pernicious, and that is a mistaken Zeal, which as it is fire to all about it, so is it wind to its self, fans and irritates its own flames, and by a confidence that it does well, gathers still fresh vigor to do more. How great the force of such an Erroneous persuasion is, we may collect from our Savior's premonition to his Disciples, when he tells them, that those who killed them should think they did God service; and if

Murder, and that of Apostles too, could by the Magic of blind Zeal be so transformed, we must not wonder to find other Crimes so too. And what Christ thus foretold was after eminently exemplified in St. Paul, whom the Holy Writ represents under all the Phrases that may denote a virulent persecutor, as breathing out threatenings and slaughter, making havoc of the Church, and in his own words, Persecuting that way unto the Death, and being exceedingly mad against them; and all this he did being Zealous towards God, and out of a persuasion that he ought to do many things contrary to the name of Jesus, as we find in his Apology to his country-men and King Agrippa, Act. 22. 2. & 26. 9.

AND of the abettors of those Novel doctrines which after times produced, we have reason to think many were of this Sort, especially in those Heresies which though they carried secret venom in them had yet a plausible appearance of Sanctity and Devotion; such was that of the Encratites, which seemed to be founded in the veneration of two great Virtues Continence and Temperance, though by extending them beyond the due limits, they lost that Sobriety they too strictly embraced, and became inordinate in their Continence, and excessive in their Abstinence: Such again were the Euchitae or Massalians, who made the whole business not only of religion but even of life to consist in praying; and though by it they evacuated all other ends of both, yet having the letter of a Precept, and the pretence of Devotion on their side, 'twas a proper bait for those who had much Zeal and little Knowledge. In like manner the Novatians Heresy had so glorious an inscription of Purity as was very apt to attract well meaning Souls; who seeing it bid such express defiance to Apostasy, could not suspect that it was its self any defection from the faith; and accordingly some of that Sect approved their constancy in times both of Heathen and Arian persecutions. Nor must we be so uncharitable to the modern times, as not to believe many, have acted upon the like Principles, and meant truth and piety, even while they actually promoted the contrary. But how sincere soever the purposes of such seduced Persons were, yet 'tis evident the Church has suffered no less by them, than by the more crafty designers: their misguided piety has made as great and incurable Ruptures, as the most flagitious blasphemies of others. And when a rent is once made, it matters little whether it were done by error or malice; nay perhaps as to the hopes of repairing, the former may be the more desperate: for whereas he that knowingly commits an Ill, has the Upbraidings of his own Conscience towards his reducing; these on the other side have its Cherishings and Encouragements, to confirm and animate them. And doubtless they are great advantages which Satan has in all ages made of Such Persons, whom he seems to have deluded in the same manner, that Medea is said to have done the daughters of Peleas, whom she persuaded to hack their aged Father in pieces, in hope that by her Magic, he should not only recover life but youth: so these rend and tear their Mother the Church out of a hope, no less delusive, of restoring her pristine beauty and vigor; how far the Event parallels it also, the dying state of Christianity does too sadly testify.

NOR has it only been the Heat of Erring persons that has been thus mischievous, but sometimes men of right judgments have too much contributed to the breach of Unity, and the intemperate and imprudent Zeal of these hath served to exasperate the mistaking earnestness of the other: this happens sometimes for want of distinguishing between the Essentials and *Circumstantial*s of Religion, and so looking upon a mistake in the later with the detestation proper only to the perverting of the former; by this means those who have entirely embraced the same faith, have yet violated charity and broken communion: such slight minute differences when managed by eager Spirits being easily blown up into solemn and lasting contentions; so that the Disputes raised about some pin or nail of the Temple, have sometimes shaken and endanger'd the whole Fabric, robbed the Church of that fraternal unity which was its fastest cement, and surest support. Of this we need no more apt instance from antiquity than that which has been already mentioned upon another occasion, I mean Victors unbrother-like Heat towards the Eastern Churches in the controversy about Easter, which had fomented that Difference into a Schism, which the meeker Piety of his Predecessors thought no ground of unkindness, much less of Separation, as Irenaeus more at large tells him; And probably had men in all the succeeding Ages deliberately poiz'd the Errors they opposed, and proportioned their Displeasure but to the just weight of them, many of our disputes would have been so calm'd, that they should never have become quarrels. But many in this particular have only used the Touchstone, not the Scales: and of Opinions that are erroneous, consider not which are more or less pernicious, but with an equal violence fly at all, as if the Stoical opinion concerning Sins had prevailed in Errors also, and that all were resolved to be of the same size.

BUT even in those of the highest kind it may perhaps be doubted, whether too eager an opposition have not sometimes done hurt, especially in those Doctrines which relate to the mysterious parts of Religion, wherein a novelty is at first looked upon with some horror, and many are willing rather to condemn in gross than nicely to examine: Who yet when they find this done for them by Orthodox persons, they think they may with such a guide venture to wade into the question, where many times the insinuations of Error are so subtle, that all their Antidotes secure them not from infection, but they are themselves captivated where they expected only to triumph. Neither want there those of the Vulgar that are of a more insolent temper; and out of a vanity of making themselves Umpires between learned men, greedily read the writings of both Parties, who yet are able to make no solid judgment of either; and when 'tis remembered how many popular artifices there are to byasse such persons, we must confess that Truth hath many to one, Odds against her: Besides, public arguing oft serves not only to exasperate the minds, but to whet the Wits of Heretics, and by showing them the weak parts of their Doctrines, prompts them to rally all their Sophistry to fortify them, that what they want of truth and reason, may be supplied with fallacy and little colors; and Experience shows how fitly that kind of Logic is accommodated to the greatest part of the World. In short it seems not improbable, that many Heresies owe much of their growth to the improper means of eradicating them: and have acquired a reputation from the stir that was made about them. Thus Socrates tells us that Alexanders letters about the Arian Heresy served to scatter that pestilent infection the more abroad, and combined men into parties, so that the whole world became the Scene of that long Tragoedy, which possibly might have had a shorter and better issue, had not the notice of the Controversy been so early dispersed.

BUT if the Attempts of the Pen have often proved so unfit, it may be considered whether those of the sword are not more so, and fighting be not a worse expedient than disputing: and certainly we have great reason to conclude in the affirmative, if we weigh either the Injustice, or Unreasonableness of it. I know there want not those who have thought the propagating Religion by Arms not only lawful but meritorious, and that in order to the planting it in a Nation, the soil may be mellowed with the blood of the Inhabitants; nay the old extirpated, and new Colonies planted. But we are to remember that as God is the universal Monarch of the World, so We have all the relation of fellow subjects to him, and can pretend no farther jurisdiction over each other, than what he has delegated to us: and sure 'twould be hard to produce any commission from him for the invading a Nation only because 'tis not of our Faith. 'Tis sure, those to whom he first entrusted the promulgating of the Gospel had far different instructions, and 'twere fit our new Evangelists should show their later authority for this sanguinary Method, in order to which though some have made use of the Opinion of some Schoolmen that dominion is founded in Grace, yet as that is but an Opinion, so were it admitted as the most certain Truth, it could never warrant any enterprize of this kind, for supposing that a people by wanting spiritual Blessings did lose all their right to temporal, yet that Forfeiture must devolve only to the Supreme Lord, and when as God in another case asks, where is the bill of divorce? Isaiah 50. 1. so we may demand of these zealous Invaders, where is the bill of assignment, by which that right was transferr'd to them? In short, peace is the most valuable blessing of human life, and we cannot without injustice deprive man of it, though we could as we pretend, give them truth in lieu of it; for maugre the Proverb, that Exchange will still be robbery, where the parties are compel'd to make it. But alas, 'tis a vain imagination to think that Religion can be thus imposed: or that we can bind the understandings and wills of men, with the same fetters we do their bodies; 'tis true indeed the Apostle tells us there is a way of bringing every thought into Captivity to the obedience of Christ, but he tells us withal that the weapons, by which that Victory is achieved, are not carnal, 2 Cor. 10. 4. Indeed did Religion consist only in some external conformities, external force might bear some proportion to it (which perhaps is the cause that the one is most used by those whose religion is most eminent for the other) but 'tis seated in those faculties to which outward violence can have no access. Alas, 'tis not whole Armies can besiege my reason, nor Canons batter my will, 'tis conviction not force, that must induce Assent; and sure the Logic of a conquering Sword has no great propriety that way; Silence indeed it may, but convince it cannot: Its efficacy rather lies on the other side, breeds aversion and abhorrence of that Religion, whose first address is in blood and rapine: nor do such attempts gain anything to the Cause but the infamy of those rigors which are used to promote it. And sure since this piece of Mahumetan Zeal has been transplanted into Christendom, it has been much more mischievous than in its native soil. Christianity having been infinitely more oppressed by those that thus fought for it, than those that were in Arms against it. Whether upon this score the Pope have not done her more harm than the Turk, I leave to consideration.

BUT what is here said of the military Sword, I intend not should be applied to the Civil; for I treat not here of those legal punishments, which Magistrates inflict upon their disobedient Subjects; who indeed may justly, nay indeed must necessarily require Conformity to Ecclesiastical laws, as well as the Civil: the Eruptions in the one commonly overflowing the other also, and Schism usually ending in Rebellion; so that 'tis apparently their interest to guard themselves from those riotous effects of pretended zeal, nor is it less their duty, they being as the Ancients express it, Custodes utriusque tabulae in S. Paul's language, the ministers of God, Rom. 13. and in Constantine's dialect 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Bishops in the whole outward administration of the Church, and if Heresy or Schism be a sin, are by their places obliged to approve themselves avengers; to execute wrath no less there, than in other circumstances: And that they are sins and of no small bulk; none can doubt that observes Heresy ranked, Gal. 5. with Idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, murders, and other sins of the flesh; or Schism, marked out by the Apostle to the Hebrews, as a kind of petrifying crime, which induces that induration, to which the fearful expectation of wrath is consequent, for so we find, Heb. 10. 26. that forsaking the assemblies is looked on as previous to Apostasy and final defection: And therefore sure the Magistrate can do nothing kinder even to the Offenders than by taking their sin early, prevent that fatal growth of it. But that his just power thus rescued I may assume my former assertion, and conclude, that all other Violences are so far from advancing Christianity, that they extremely weaken and disadvantage it.

BUT of no sort is this more eminently true than of those popular heats, where the People undertakes to chastise error: for besides that the outrages then committed are very apt to avert men even from truths which they see so barbarously defended, it often happens that the multitude take causeless alarms, and think their Faith is invaded when it is not. A memorable instance of this kind Euagrius gives in his Eccl. History, where he tells us that the Emperor Anastatius having added to the Trisagium this Clause, Who was crucified for our Salvation, the whole City of Constantinople was in an uproar, upon an ignorant jealousy that those words had some Heretical meaning; in which fury they happening to light upon a poor silly Monk, they immediately kill him as the Inventor of that clause, and a conspirer against the Trinity: So unhappily absur'd are the Transports of wild zeal, which where it rules, does besides the direct mischiefs of Tumult and Sedition create others at the rebound, which are more permanent, and discompose and embitter men's spirits, and render them so ambitiously greedy of quarrels for their Religion, that they are not only prepared to receive but to seek Encounters: and 'tis too sure they can never be wanting to persons of such tempers, since the adversaries of Truth cannot have more advantage or Encouragement against it, than this unpeaceful humor of those that profess it.

BY these several ways has it come to pass, that even that zeal which should be the life of Christianity, is become its disease; and Religion like a Hectick body is consumed by its own heats, if at least I may call those its own, which derive not from its proper and native constitution; but are the accidents of its declining state: for how confidently soever men pronounce of themselves, and believe that they are then most pious, when they are most eager and unquiet; yet 'tis sure this is far removed from the true genius and temper of religion, which like the God it worships, makes its approaches not in winds and Earthquakes, but in the still small voice, 1 Kings 19. 12. and when 'tis considered, that the greatest part of the Evangelical Law is made up of precepts of Meekness, Long-suffering, and Condescension; we must conclude that zeal very preposterous, that pretends to obey by violating them; or to establish Religion by undermining the most essential parts of it: and to Persons under that mistake, we may most properly apply the reproof given by Christ to his Disciples upon the same occasion, you know not, what manner of Spirit you are of.

IT will therefore become men to look with Jealousy on themselves in this particular; not too confidently to pursue every Incitation which carries a show of Piety; but soberly to weigh how it agrees with the Rules and Economy of that Gospel for which it pretends so much concern; for though the true Christian Zeal can never be too much cherished; yet alas 'tis not every warmth we feel about Religion that can own that Title; and sure we do not more often, or more fatally mistake anything than in applying that venerable name to things of a far inferior, nay sometimes of a contrary nature. How often upon this Error, have men ascribed that to their piety which they owed to their complexions, and thought 'twas their religion made them Earnest, when 'twas merely their constitution: Nay, how often has Satan taken this advantage of transforming himself into an Angel of light, and insinuating his illusions under this disguise. And truly they must still be liable to both these deceits, so long as they place the essence of Christian zeal in heat and eagerness. 'Tis true indeed it has its heats, but actuated in a far different way; it has flames of Love, not of Anger; to melt, not consume our Enemies; and makes us apter to pour out our own blood a Sacrifice to Truth than that of gain-sayers. In short, if it be a Fire, 'tis that pure Elemental which the Peripatetics talk of, which is but of a moderate heat; apt to cherish, not devour.

AND would God men would so far believe this, as to think there may be moderation, without the danger of Laodicean luke-warmness, and upon that supposition suffer themselves to cool into a treatable Temper, and then I should humbly offer to them these few Considerations.

FIRST the great and universal fallibility of human Nature, which renders it not only possible that we may, but certain that everyone of us shall err in something or other; and this sure is very proper to persuade lenity to those whom we find actually erring. 'Tis the Apostles argument in the case of Sin, Gal. 6. 1. Brethren if a man be overtaken in a fault, you which are spiritual, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. Where the common Peccability of mankind is urged to induce Commiseration and Gentleness towards the Offenders; and if this be of force in sin, where the concurrence of the will renders the person more inexcusable, it will surely hold much more in bare Error, which being purely involuntary, (for nothing is properly Error farther than it is so) 'tis to be looked on rather as the disease than crime of the Person: and since we use not to exclaim against men for being sick, but compassionately to endeavor their recovery, why should we here use so much a contrary method. 'Tis true indeed, 'tis necessary sometimes in order to the Cure, and sometimes for preventing the infection of others, to do some things uneasy to the Patient; and what tends regularly to either of these Ends, may in this case also be Charitably done, by those that have Authority: but that differs as far from our usual severities, as the lancings of a Physician do from the wounds of an Adversary; or public Discipline from private Spleen. So that notwithstanding this, we may resume our conclusion and infer from the Errableness of our Nature, the reasonableness of compassion to the seduced. And as it thus prompts us to look gently upon others, so also to reflect impartially upon ourselves; and consider how possible it is, that even whilst we condemn others, we may indeed be in the wrong; and then all the Invectives we make at their supposed Errors; fall back with a rebounded force upon our own real ones. If this possibility were but adverted to, it would make us less positive and Dogmatical in our opinions, and so consequently take away one main ground of contention; for though we often quarrel about matters, which are indeed but conjectural, yet not till we esteem them otherwise; and when we consider how many men have vehemently believed apparent falsehoods, it may well allay our confidences in all those cases, where we have not some firmer ground than our own (or indeed any human) judgment to build it on.

AS for those who have the surest grounds of Perswasion, and by their security of being themselves in the Truth, have the more reason to be earnest in propagating it to others: let them in the second place consider how necessary 'tis to choose appropriate means to that good end, without which they do but undermine themselves, and defeat their own aims. Indeed Prudence is not only a Moral, but Christian Virtue; and such as is necessary to the constituting of all others: without it Devotion degenerates into Superstition, Liberality into Profuseness, and this of Zeal becomes only a Pious kind of Frensy. And of Persons so possessed, God may say as Achish did of David, 1 Sam. 21. 15. have I need of mad men? no sure, the defense of Truth is too noble a cause to be so managed; its Champions are not like men in a fray to make everything a weapon that they can first snatch up, and lay on as chance or fury guides, but are deliberately to consult the properest expedients, use not only force but Stratagem against the Enemy, and yet withal to take care that while they oppose one, another gain not advantage: For alas, 'tis indifferent to our grand Adversary, by which of his temptations we fall, and if by subverting the faith of some, he shipwreck the charity of others, he has his End, and triumphs at once both over the speculative and practic part of our Religion.

AND this may induce a farther consideration, and prompt us to examine what degree of guilt lies on those who either out of a blind, or rash zeal have given him this advantage. And here though I cannot doubt, but God makes great allowances to the Miscarriages of sincere intentions, yet perhaps we have carv'd more liberally to ourselves than he designs us, and presume our Security greater than in truth it is. For how innocent soever a good purpose may make our Error, yet 'tis a privilege beyond all possibility of grant, that our sins should be so also; therefore if our Misperswasions beget wicked practice, we may be accountable for the one, though not for the other. We find indeed S. Paul alleges his ignorance, as the Cause of his finding mercy, for his persecuting the Church, but we are to remember what that mercy he there refers to is; not that of absolution, but conversion; and had he resisted the later, though with never so full a persuasion of his doing well in it, I much doubt whether his good meaning would have secured him the former; so that all the Encouragement, that Example can afford it, that God may probably do more for the reducing an Erring than a malicious Persecutor: And when 'tis considered that all the odds that Christ makes between him that does ill knowingly and ignorantly, is in the number of Stripes: we must resolve our mistakes are no such Amulets as totally to secure us. And then whether our guilts shall not swell in proportion to the ills we do, is a question that sure can never be resolved in the negative: for if a good intention cannot alter the nature of Sin, sure it can as little change their degree, or make that of two Persons equally mistaken, the Murder of the one, shall not be a greater Crime than an intemperate speech of the other. And upon this measure the accounts of erring zeal are like to rise very high with many; unless we can think Rebellion and Bloudshed, Sacrilege and Sachism, with all that train of zealous Enormities to be light and trivial.

NOR will it at all legitimate these, or any other, Crimes, though they should happen to be committed in the defense of Truth: Of this St. Peter is a ready instance, who when to guard Him, who was Truth its self, he had violated the Authority of the Magistrate in wounding an Officer: Christ apprehends his rashness, and instead of applauding his zeal, upbraids his absurdity, that could think his mean aids considerable to him, who could command Legions of Angels to his rescue. And sure he is not so much more impotent in his glory, than he was in his exinanition, as now to need our Sins to secure any of his concerns; and if St. Peter were thus check'd for using that Sword which he was a little before warned to buy, it must sure set an ill Character upon those tumultuous reformations which have so much employed the zeal of later ages, to which there can never want a concurrence of several great sins, the guilt whereof will scarce be wiped off, by their designed subserviency to Truth; what Degree of extenuation it may afford is hard to pronounce, since we have no rule to measure it by. But whatsoever it is, we are to remember, that it can belong only to such a Zeal as is purely religious, that mixes not with our Passions or Interests; and therefore before men be too forward to appropriate any Indulgence of that kind, 'twill be necessary to Examine, whether no sinister Adherent have vitiated that integrity of their purpose to which alone it can (even by their own award and sentence) appertain.

I HAVE insisted the more on this, because many are apt to ascribe too unlimitedly to the Force of a good meaning, to think that is able to bear the stress of whatsoever Commissions they shall lay on it; and by thus presuming on their Antidote, venture boldly on the deadliest poisons. To such the foregoing considerations may be useful; and by robbing them of that imaginary Security, help them to a real one, by making their good purposes the Director of good actions, not the Apology for bad. This would make Religion look consonant to its self, which now groans under the reproach of all those Ills, that are acted under its Patronage; and sure to rescue her from such a scandal, is but a very moderate piece of compassion: Yet would God she might obtain it even from those who profess themselves her greatest Votaries: But alas, 'tis one sad circumstance of her ruin, that she owes it to such; that those Weapons which should defend her, thus recoil into her Bowels, and zeal should do her more mischief than profaneness; for while she is but scoffed at by that, she is wounded by this: nor are those wounds ever like to close, till our Zeal grow more balsamick, partake of those healing qualities of Love and Meekness, the Want whereof has rendered it so unhappily instrumental to our Distractions.

CHAP. XVIII. A survey of the Causes of Disputes; Sixthly, Idleness.

BUT as this over-active humor has done abundant Mischief to the Church, so is it observable, that the direct contrary has done as much, nay, which is yet stranger, the one is frequently the product of the other, and our too busy zeal, springs from our too great Idleness. How much soever this may sound like Paradox, yet both reason and experience attest the Truth of it; for we are to consider that God has put an active principle into man, which 'tis impossible so to suppress, as that there shall be a total cessation from motion: And therefore every intermitting of sober, regular actings, makes way for wild Extravagant ones; for as nature is said so vehemently to abhor vacuity, that the very inanimate bodies would forsake their specific motions to prevent it. So when the mind is Empty, when it has no worthy and profitable speculation to Entertain it, every the most improper and preternatural Object offers its self, and importunately crouds in to fill the vacuum. This seems to have been well understood, though ill applied by Pharaoh, when he thought the Israelites proposal of Travelling into the Wilderness to their Devotions, was the Effect of their to 〈...〉 sure at home; and therefore increases their tasks as the properest way of diverting their design: And in like manner we find those that treat of Politicks, insist upon the necessity of keeping the People busy, in order to which it is, that they mention the use of Mathematics and other contemplative Sciences, to entertain the active spirits of a Nation, in demonstrating of Problemes, solving Phaenomenas, and drawing Schemes and Diagrams, who else would be practicing upon the Government, making new Ideas and Platforms for the Common-wealth: And doubtless there is parity of reason in the Ecclesiastic State, which would have been at more peace, had some men found themselves other diversions.

AND this is confirmed to us by experiment and observation of Event, for if we look into the Primitive times, we shall find that when there was a necessity of defending the common faith against Heathenism, when Christians were employed in writing apologies and vindications, there were much fewer of these intestine debates (at least such as were Metaphysical and purely National) they had their hands full of the foreign Enemy, and had the less temptation to jangle among themselves. So also when they were under the greatest storms of persecution, when the Church was most violently assaulted from without, it had the greatest Calm within. They were then incessantly employed, and busied their Thoughts in preparing for the fiery trial. Those cloudy days made them keep close at home waiting for the Bridegrooms coming, and suffered them not to wander abroad for those unprofitable Curiosities, which though like Oil they might nourish flame, yet would never furnish their Lamps, or gain them admission to the wedding but in the intervals, and especially after the total cessation of their calamity, when their Peace had taken them off their Vigilance, than while they slept, the Envious man had advantage to sow his Tares. Rest made them idle, Idleness made them curious, and Curiosity contentious; and those who under the Tyranny of a Nero or Domitian were in perfect harmony under the gentle pious regiment of a Constantine, grew to the greatest discord, and perhaps (besides the Divine and extraordinary supports the Church had in her greatest conflicts) this may be one of the best natural accounts, how she came to flourish most under her heaviest pressures.

BUT our observation ends not here, for besides this extraordinary importunity of thoughts, which persecuting times occasioned, Christianity is in its frame and constitution an active State, has its standing business, and besides all accidental, a Series of determinate, constant employments, sufficient to entertain men's minds: from which we may infer, that when this is thoroughly adverted to, there will be few chasms of Time to be filled with foreign impertinences. And this gives a clear account how our divisions have come to grow upon us, namely, by the Neglect of practic duties, for as every age degenerated more from Primitive piety, so they advanced farther in nice enquiries and new opinions; and as the zeal of practice grew cool, so that of dispute gathered heat and vigor. So that if we consider how far our good works fall short of the first Christians, we need not wonder to see our controversies so far exceed them; that Time which was gained from the one, being employed in hammering and forging the other. I do not forget that I have before ranked this diversion of Christian Practice among the effects of our Contentions, and foresee it may be thought very inartificial here, to make it the cause also: But alas, its concern in them is so extravagantly great, as to have at once the relation of Child and Parent, to be both Root and Branch, Fountain and Stream, and like a circle unites in its self Beginning and End: For as it first gave birth to our quarrels, so it finally receives increase from them. In short, our oscitant lazy piety gave vacancy for them, and they will now lend none back again, for more active duty. And as this neglect of our general calling of Christianity has been thus pernicious, so have the ill effects thereof been improved by the like ill attendance on our particular ones. We find St. Paul takes notice, that the younger widows, who deserted their own Ecclesiastical Office, grew busy-bodies in the Secular affairs of others; and sure we may with truth invert the note, and observe that those, who either desert or neglect their Secular Callings, are the most perniciously meddling in Ecclesiastic matters. Did men conscientiously employ themselves in their honest occupations, their Minds would be sufficiently diverted, and it would not become the work of Artificers to make new Schemes of Doctrines or discipline; Divinity would not then pass the Yard and Loom, the Forge and Anvil, nor Preaching be taken in as an easier supplementary Trade, by those that disliked the pains of their own. But all this alas we have seen to the equal shame and detriment of Piety. Mechanicks of all sorts have presumed to teach what themselves never learnt; and those that served long Apprentiships to other Crafts, have become Divines in a moment, and with the same aemulous industry wherewith they used to invent new fashions, have made new Religions. And as Idleness has thus made some Preachers, so it has made more hearers, those who either by the easiness of their Callings, or their slight managery of them, have had the most vacant time, have been the aptest to run after new teachers: Hence it is that Towns and Cities have been the great nurseries of faction, the leisure of Shop-men making them more inquisitive after, and receptive of Novelties. And were that over-grown zeal of Sermons, which has now devoured all other parts of Religion, among that sort of men thoroughly scanned, we should find Idleness goes very far in its composition, for besides that Hearing is the most lazy of all religious Offices, as appears by the undisturb'd sleeps men can take at Sermons; it is manifest this insatiate appetite of it, is originally founded either in the not having business, or not attending to it. For should I ask such men, whether if necessity had enforced St. Paul's rule upon them, that without their labor they should not eat, they would have spent their whole week at Lectures, and trusted to be fed by the Ear. I believe few could pretend to have begun with so exorbitant a zeal, though the truth is in the issue it sometimes arrives to it; and men that have itching Ears forget the rest of the body, whilst to gratify them, they totally neglect all care of their Secular concerns, and bring Themselves and Families to want and beggary.

NOR is it only this one rank of Persons whom Idleness has betrayed to faction, Servants we have frequently seen under the same Seducement, while either having but little work, or but little diligence in it, they have found time to listen after novel doctrines, with which being once tainted, they impatiently thirst after more, and neglecting the duties of their place, spend their time, which by compact is their Masters (and can with no more justice be purloin'd from him than his goods) in following factious Teachers, who instruct them so in their Christian liberty, that they bring them to defy all subjection: And by telling them they are to call no man Master upon Earth, that they are to own no King nor Priest but Christ; teach them to contemn all Authority, Domestic, Civil or Ecclesiastic.

IF we look farther into families, we shall find also that many of our She-zealots become so upon the very same ground, when Women neglect that which St. Paul assigns them as their proper Business, the guiding of the house, their Zeal is at once the product and excuse of their Idleness; and in spite of the ill Character the Wiseman has set on her, whose feet abide not in her house, Prov. 7. 11. it becomes the mark of a Saint, when a Lecture or Conventicle is taken in the way: And though these feminine Irregularities may seem to be of no great concern to the public, yet experience convinces the contrary; it having been the unhappy privilege of that Sex (as ancient as their Mother Eve) to be able to do great and important mischiefs; and doubtless many men may give the same account of their Schism and Sedition, that Adam did of his first sin, The woman that thou gavest me, &c. This has always been well understood by Seducers, who have found it the most compendious way to their designs, to lead captive silly women, and make them the Duck-coys to their whole Family: But even those who have mist of this influence over the minds of their Husbands, have yet had it over their Purses, and out of them supported the Rabbies of the Faction; who in gratitude to those wise Abigail's give their Husbands the title, and perhaps wish them the fate of Nabal. And God knows, how many men have thus been made contributors to the cause they have most detested, maintained that fire which those incendiaries have kindled in the Holy place; Money being no less the sinews of Ecclesiastical than Secular War.

THUS we see how the Idleness even of the most inconsiderable persons has at the rebound been extremely pernicious to the Church, which like a Clock or Watch may be disordered by the rust of the least Pin; how much more then, by that of the main wheels and springs; if Negligence in lay-callings have though but an oblique, yet so inauspicious an Influence, the like Neglect in Ecclesiastic must needs have a worse, because more immediate and direct. And would to God we could say this had been wanting to the completing the mischief: But alas, many of those who are called to labor in the Lord's Vineyard, seem to have forgot their Errand, and stand there all the day Idle (a much worse sight than to have seen them so only in the Market-place;) so that I fear there is too evident ground of saying, that the slight execution of the Pastoral Office, has been one of the most eminent Contributors to our distractions. And among all the parts of that Charge, none has been more generally, or more perniciously neglected than that of Catechizing; the want whereof has left People so unbottom'd, that like a house built on the sand, every Wind of Doctrine blows down that Faith which they only professed, but understood not. This is that which has made so many unstable Souls, as St. Peter observes, 2 Pet. 2. 14. to be the proper prey of Deceivers. And God knows, we may from sad experiment confirm the note. I wish the same negligence do not again evidence its self by the same effects: But besides this, which is part of the Public Ministry, (and deservedly is so, being useful to the whole Church, the aged as well as children) there are private Intercourses between Pastor and People which are of great use, would God they were of equal practice: We know a careful Shepherd does not only turn his flock into a common

Pasture, and then think he has done his work, but does with a particular advertence observe the thriving of everyone of them, takes notice of their single strayings and diseases, and accordingly applies himself to reduce or cure them, and surely the like care is full as necessary in the spiritual Shepherd, 'tis not the counsel which is promiscuously dispensed in a Sermon (and whereof 'tis odds every man takes that which is least proper for him) that will do the business: Converts come not in now as in St. Peters days, in throngs and shoals, a more distinct and particular application is now necessary; men must be treated with apart, their particular wants discerned, and applications accordingly made of instructions, reproof or comfort, and 'tis these appropriate Medicines, that are like to make sound flocks. Had Ministers generally bestowed more pains this way, they might probably have frustrated the attempts of Seducers, who could not so easily have insinuated themselves into the people, had they found them thus prepossessed: but while these with all the arts of a subtle industry infuse their poisons into everyone they meet, nothing but the like diligence in administering Antidotes, is like to countermine them. How much of that has been used I shall leave to the Consciences of concerned persons to determine. But besides the ill influence the Pastors negligence has on the People, it has in respect of themselves an immediate propriety to the advancing our debates, the leisure which is thus acquired, being apt to betray speculative persons, to the study of those curious questions, which are the great disturbers of our Peace; and of those that study them so few keep themselves in neutrality, that parties are still fomented by it: whereas were the practical business of their Charge thoroughly attended, the remainder of time would not be more than the study of the more solid, useful parts of Divinity would exact, and consequently there would no surplus be left for those dangerous impertinencies, which as the Apostle says, serve to no profit, but to the subverting of the hearers, 2 Tim. 2. 14. But when our Watchmen sleep, 'tis no marvel if they dream too, and entertain themselves and others with those Phantastick notions, which the great day will manifest to have had nothing of weight and reality, besides the Mischiefs they wrought.

AND indeed if we scan the volumes of those vain Speculations, we shall have cause to conclude that Idleness has created as well as fomented them; and they had as well wanted Authors as abettors, had men found themselves more useful business: and that not only the extemporary Chimoera's of Phanaticks, but the more elaborate nicities of the Schools, have been thus derived: we know Air possesses no place, where it first finds not a vacuity, nor could those lighter notions, have filled men's brains, had they found them prepossessed with what was more solid: but when men wanted more substantial work for their Understandings, they were fain to employ them thus in making Cob-webs, of which they have made a worse sort of Jewish veil in the Sanctuary, and have now involved the Gospel in greater Obscurities, than the Law, was before: whence our Bezaleels and Aholiab's have been inspired for this work I shall not determine; but sure not from him whose Character S. John gives us (in peculiar reference to gospel revelation) that he is light, and in him is no darkness at all, 1 Jo. 1. 5.

THUS we see even Idleness wants not its operation; but is productive of great and mischievous effects; it being the unhappy property of that Vice, that it supplants its Self, and by a fatal Antiperistasis makes men perniciously active: so that we may truly say sloth has made more Business than industry. I am sure in this instance it has cut out work for many ages, though of such a kind, that we have little reason to wish that our Lord at his coming should find us so doing: yet for ought now appears, our activity is so wholly bent that way, that 'tis like to be the only, at least the most intense business we shall be found at.

I MIGHT here take a very apt occasion to declaim against Idleness, as the unhappy fountain of so great mischiefs, but that is a vice that has been so often arraign'd, that I need not repeat those charges which all Authors, Natural, Moral and Divine have laid against it. Let but this of its being the Original of faction be added, and there can be nothing wanting to render it a most dangerous crime: yea, and a most monstrous one too, that operates thus preternaturally, that freezes and yet inflames men at once, stupifies and enrages: And yet alas, there is as much riddle in its fate as its nature; 'tis hated, and yet embraced; generally decried, and yet as generally cherished: and though it have no advocates, has many friends. Would God men would at last be ashamed to be what they are ashamed to own, and by a diligent attendance on their proper business, secure themselves first from doing nothing, and then from doing ill; the one being so close an Attendant on the other, that 'tis scarce possible to sever them. And God knows the Church finds too sad proof of their connection. Idleness having served as Ashes to keep alive that fire which has set her in combustion. Thus unhappily passive is she in our disorders, and accessory to all our Guilts and Punishments: All our peccant humors concur to her disease, and like a common mark she receives arrows from all Quarters, we have seen how many Contributers there are to her ruin, everyone whereof with a wanton cruelty (like Caesar's murderers) are ambitious to inflict new wounds, and to give her Supernumerary deaths; and whilst she is thus surrounded with Assassins, what can we expect but that her present languishings should End in death. That Christian Religion now crumbled into so many minute fractions, should like dust be scattered, and irrecoverably dissipated, and thus infallibly it must be, if either God do not miraculously countermine us, and do more for us than we can do against ourselves, or we recover so much sobriety, as to forbear to Massacre what we pretend to Love, and endeavor to bind up those wounds at which our own Souls are like to Expire.

CHAP. XIX. The Conclusion drawn from all the Premises.

WE have hitherto examined the effects and originals of our contentions, and now the only remaining Enquiry is concerning the ways of redress. And that will exact no long disquisition: for as in diseases 'tis said, the knowing the cause is one half of the cure; so more especially is it here, where the remedies are merely privative, and we are not to be healed by external applications, but only by subtracting those Humors which feed the Malady: There will therefore need no other prescription than to advise the exterminating of all those Passions and Interests which have appeared accessory to our quarrels, which though they are become the public Epidemick disease, yet as the infection did, so must the cure arise from single persons: for as we look not a common Pestilence should cease without due care and manage both of the sick and sound: so neither can this Church plague ever abate, but by the cure, or fortifying its individual members.

LET every man therefore who has any way made himself a Party to these contests, seriously interrogate his own heart; what it is that has engaged Him in them: if any of the sinister motives before rehearst, let him for a while shift the Scene, and instead of accusing others as Opposites to Truth, condemn himself as Enemy to Peace: remembering that how just or important soever the cause be, it is no so to him; whilst he serves his humors and designs under its covert. The Philosophers in their darker notions of Truth could yet discern, that she was not accessible to any who sought her not purely for herself, with sincere and single Intentions, and if she entertain no Pupils that are not so qualified, is it fit she should have Guardians and Champions of a quite distant Temper? No, he that undertakes the defense of Speculative Verity, must first possess himself of that practic Truth the Psalmist speaks of, Ps. 51. That in the inward parts, such a simplicity and integrity of Purpose, as may supplant all those indirect Aims, purge out every prejudice and passion, which may bias, and pervert him; and by that time he has done this, 'tis odds but he will find a new face of affairs, and discern that many of those things he so fiercely contended about, were either false or trivial; acquired their considerableness only from those magnifying perspectives of his own Lusts, through which he viewed them. However till he have thus denudated himself of all these encumbrances, he is utterly unqualified for these Agones; and how lawfully soever others may strive, 'tis sure he cannot, that does it upon so unlawful grounds, and therefore upon pain of losing much more than a corruptible crown must withdraw himself. As for those who can yet acquit themselves from having fomented our Distractions, I shall not forbid them to look with great complacency upon it, but rather by considering how valuable a piece of Innocency it is, engage and encourage themselves to preserve it; and to that purpose, jealously to examine the first overtures of a Temptation. When they find any proneness to immerse in Faction, any unwonted heat towards a Dissenter, to trace it to its fountain and original; nicely to observe whether it issue not from some of those envenom'd springs forementioned, and make as much hast to stop its currant, as they would to impede the most overwhelming inundation; for such 'twill infallibly prove to those who indulge to its course. But as a Turf will at first close the breach, which neglected becomes the inlet of a mighty Torrent: so had this early vigilance been used, it might with ease have prevented those Distempers, in private Beasts, from whence the general Confusion has sprung. As it is, might but these two things be obtained, would but the Guilty purge, and the Innocent guard themselves, we might yet hope to see an end of our Discords: not that I suppose it possible to extinguish all diversity of Opinions among men, who from their differing faculties, and other guiltless occurrence, may and will have their judgments severally disposed. But first, were all, who have upon the former culpable motives entered the lists, excluded, we should find They would amount to such a Number, that there would be few left to maintain the Combat. Nay, secondly, were it not for those concealed inducements, there would scarce be any Combat to maintain, those are the things that convey the sting and malignity into our Differences, without those we might dissent, but not fall out; and should no more be angry to see another opine contrary to us, than we are to see him of a differing stature, or complexion. In fine, let us pretend what we will, 'tis the Carnality within, that raises all the Combustions without: This is the great wheel to which the Clock owes its motion, while the pretext of Truth and Piety is but like the hand, set indeed more conspicuously, but directed wholly by the secret movings of the other. This, this alone is it which creates and continues our broils, and by a monstrous conjunction of Properties, is its self both flame and fuel: Nor can we doubt that from hence spring those railing accusations, we bring one against another, if we remember what St. Jude tells us that the Angel brought them not even against the Devil himself, he could calmly manage a dispute with the most execrable and provoking adversary, because his Angelic nature had none of that carnal leaven which ferments to the souring of ours, an evident Indication what it is that has rendered our arguings so invective, that divinity seems now an Artifice to elude law by daily patronizing those Libels, which would else be Obnoxious to civil Justice.

BUT I presume there need no more be said to evince this, which has, I fear, the attestation of too many consciences, to be generally doubted; the greater difficulty will be, to persuade the depositing of those lusts, which though they are confestly the Boutefieus among us, have yet by I know not what Fascination so endeared Themselves, that we tenaciously retain them in spite of all their appendent Mischiefs; nay, we cherish and foster them, and for that very purpose bring them under the covert of Religion. He that has but a puny vice, if he get it like Joash concealed and shelter'd in the Sanctuary, 'twill not only live, but reign too. Put on a Port and Majesty, and appear venerable upon the pretence of that Piety, whose Essence and Being it evacuates and undermines.

INDEED sin never arrives at so luxuriant a growth, as when it roots in hallowed ground, which Satan so well knows, that he has ever been industrious to plant it in that soil. Thus we find he had introduced the most brutish crimes into the religion of the Gentiles, interwoven them into their Sacred Rites and Mysteries, till virtue and vice had changed names, and it became piety to be Wicked, and profaneness to be Innocent. And when that gross deceit became detected by Gospel light, when he could not in the same manner obtrude upon Christians, he yet found the way to do it more obliquely, and by starting these religious quarrels, gave at once employment and reputation to the most irreligious vices. For alas, what part of wild fury was there in the Heathen Bacchanals, which we have not seen Equall'd if not Exceeded by some intoxicated zealots? Or what cruelty in their most barbarous rites, which has not been matched by the inhumanity of dissenting Christians? So that upon a just scanning, all our splendid pretence of Sanctity is but an emulation of Gentile Impurity under a better name; and while we damn Heathens for their Moral virtues, We are yet so stupid as to hope ourselves to be saved by their worst vices.

AND now who that does enough consider can think he can enough bewail this sad state of affairs: That Christianity should thus out-run its self▪ and bring us round to Gentilism again, whilst her Professors ridiculously contend for the title of the best Christians, by such acts as denominate them none at all. Thus have we inverted the significancy of that Sacred Name, and made it serve only to upbraid the contrariety of our practice; so that that which was once the Index to point out all Moral and Divine virtues, does now on the contrary mark out that part of the World, where least of them reside. This, this alone is the prize we have acquired with so much sweat and blood, this the Triumph we have brought to our Religion, which indeed could never have sunk to such a despicableness by any Endeavors but our own; for so long as Christianity waged war only with foreign enemies she never mist to be victorious, but since that these intestine discords have turned her force against herself, Bella geri placuit nullos habitura triumphos, there is no possibility of success, the mere fight implies a defeat, and the swords of all Parties meet in her bowels. 'Twas a passionate expostulation that Julia is said to have used with her two sons Antonine and Geta, whose animosities having prompted them to divide the Empire, which they were jointly to have enjoyed, she asked them whether they would divide their Mother also; implying how much their discords had racked and torn her. And sure our common Mother may make a yet sadder complaint of her Sons, by whose unkind dissensions she is so miserably mangled, that she may cry out with the Psalmist, My soul is among Lions, and I lie among the Children of men that are set on fire.

AND now if amidst all our importunate pretences to Piety, there be indeed any such thing among us, methinks it should give us some relentings, make us sadly consider to what a deplorable condition we have brought that very religion on which we profess to hang all our hopes; and would God those who are the most nearly concerned in this Contemplation would pursue it to the utmost; let them on the one hand set the most glittering temptations to Discord, and on the other let them view the dismal effects of it, and then consider at how dear a rate they gratify a few impotent Passions. Can any man without Horror think that his thirst of Glory has brought dishonor to his Religion, and consequently to his God; that his curious enquiries into things secret, has helpt to Evacuate the more useful things Revealed; or in short, that his pursuit of his various interests and appetites has destroyed what was so incomparably more valuable, the honor of the Gospel, the unity of the Church, and as many souls as have perished by that scandal. 'Twas as infamous a Character of inhumanity as the very Poets could feign of Diomedes, that he fed his horses with man's flesh; but alas, that barbarity is here infinitely out-done, when Men nourish far worse bruits, their own unreasonable lusts, with those things that are most sacred. Certainly were the vastness of this guilt thoroughly weighed, 'twould make men sick of those petty wretched acquests they have thus purchased, make them fling back this price of blood, I say not with the same despair, but with as great remorse and detestation as Judas did the silver pieces for which he sold his Master. 'Tis sure the crimes have too great an affinity, as in all other circumstances, so especially in this, that as the one was, so the other is most frequently the Guilt of an Apostle, I mean of those to whom Christ has committed the dispensing of that Gospel which they thus evacuate, and doubtless this is a consideration of great enhancement, as that which superadds treachery to all the other pestilent ingredients of the Crime; 'tis the falsifying the most important trust, for under words of that signification we find the office of the Ministry everywhere represented in Scripture, as Stewards, Ambassadors, Shepherds, and consequently the accounts of the sin must swell so much the higher. For a Steward to embezle those Goods he undertakes to manage; an Ambassador to betray his Prince for whom he should negotiate; a Shepherd to worry that Flock which he is set to guard, these are crimes that double their malignity from the quality of the Actors; and yet this is undeniably the Guilt of all those whose profession having devoted them to the Church, have impiously changed the Scene, and devoted the Church to them, served all their mean degenerate ends upon her; and as Chyrurgeons are said sometimes to deal with profitable Patients, kept open, nay, widened her wounds for their own advantages.

IT has been the Priests Litany as ancient as Ioels time, Spare thy people O Lord, and give not thine heritage to reproach; but now alas, who shall prevail with them to do that themselves which they beg of God, to spare his people and his heritage; to prostitute them no more to their own sinister designs, nor by their vain and endless contentions, expose them as well to ruin as contempt. He were indeed a happy Orator that could in this effectually intercede with them, though One would think the wonder should lie on the other side, and the only strange thing be, that they should either need or resist such a solicitation, it being so much the concern of all that ought, as well upon the score of advantage as duty, to be dear to them; so that the Church may most aptly address to these her Sons in the same form St. Paul does to the Philippians when he conjures them to unity, Phil. 2. 1. If therefore there be any consolation in Christ, if any comfort of love, if any fellowship of the Spirit, if any bowels and mercies, fulfil you my Joy that you be like minded. And can it be possible for any who have tasted all or any of these, to think fit to wrangle them away; to exchange these divine irradiations, the Antepast and Emblem of Heaven, for those bitter dissensions, whose Alpha and Omega, their original and end are Hell, and do as lively represent as they certainly lead to the horror and confusion of that land of Darkness.

BUT if some men's appetites be so depraved, that they find more Melody in discord, than in the harmony of the Angelic Quires, yet even these can discern Music in a consort of Plaudites, and seldom miss to be affected with those Eulogies which are given themselves; and therefore though they disjoyn the Apostles motives, Phil. 4. 8. and will do nothing for virtue, yet they may be presumed more considerate of Praise: And God knows, in a wrong sense they are too much so; and sure, as we have already observed by it, have made no small contributions to our discords: yet did they measure Glory by its right and proper standard, they would find they have all this while courted a shadow, and that the substance will never be acquired by being fomenters of public Mischief; but the unhappiness of it is, that our Ecclesiastic as our Secular Duellists abuse themselves with false notions of Honor, novel Opinions and subtle Questions they think attest the pregnancy and acuteness of their Understandings, and give them reputation; but alas, how vain an imagination is this? Who admires the Sagacity of the Viper, that Eats her way through her mothers bowels? Or who reverences a man for the sharpness of that Sword wherewith he commits his Paricide? Nay, what more infamous brands have Records of all ages stuck upon any, than those who were Ingeniosissime nequam, & facundi malo publico, who used the best Parts to the worst Ends, and with the greatest cunning and artifice have contrived their mischiefs?

BUT could we abstract from these pernicious effects, and suppose that this exercise of their Faculties were innocent, yet sure it would be too light and impertinent to become matter of praise. He that should spend all his Time in tying inextricable Knots, only to baffle the Industry of those that should attempt to unloose them, would sure be thought not much to have served his generation. 'Tis one of the certainest Estimates we can make of a man, to measure him by the employments he chooses, if those be slight and trifling, they suggest the Person to have low thoughts; what an abasement of Majesty was it thought in Nero to become a Fidler and Stage-player; and Herodian tells us, that men hoped no longer for anything princely from Commodus the Emperor, when he had once lifted himself among the Fencers, and instead of the magnificent styles of his Predecessors, derived from the conquests of great and populous Nations, assumed This, The vanquisher of a Thousand Gladiators: And certainly

'tis no less a descent and diminution for those who were designed by God for the highest achievements, the subduing the Kingdom of Satan, and pulling down his strong holds, to devote themselves to these so much ignobler contests, and account their conquests, not from the number of Souls won to God, but of Opposers worsted in Argument. Indeed, as we before observed, they have now rendered the Church a kind of Theatre, Disputes are managed with such Sleight and Sophistry, that at the best, the litigants do but set forth a show of Fencers: 'Twere well if they did not sometimes play the Gladiators, by that wounding deadly sharpness they use, and 'twould be considered what a change is now made: In the Primitive times, none that owned any relation to the Church were allowed to be spectators of those Games, now That is made the Stage, and her ablest Persons the Actors. But certainly 'tis very little to the reputation of those who have so unworthily debauched both it and themselves; and therefore to all other disswasives we may add this of the Uncreditableness: For let men fancy what they please of the Glory acquired in these opportunities of showing their parts, the best that can be said of them is, that they use Wit foolishly; A character whereof the one part devours the other, and leaves not so much as a mouthful of that popular air which these Camaelions gasp after. In a word, though vain-glory be a principle I shall commend to no man, yet in this case 'twere more tolerable if it would work the right way, put them upon what were really praise-worthy, and then sure 'twould incline them rather to close than widen the breaches of Zion. To inflict wounds on an unresisting Patient, is a thing that requires neither courage nor skill: Every man can do that who has but ill nature enough, but to cure them is an act at once of Art and Mercy, and entitles to the Praise of both; and therefore if any man's eagerness of Glory, have made him over-see the way to it, let him now at last recover his wanderings, and seek it in this one only proper Method.

BUT this is, I confess, a Topick of Perswasion fitter for Philosophers than Divines, and I wish I may have urged it impertinently; it being much less shame for me to have done so, than for them to need such an Argument. There is another more genuine and proper, derived from the nature of distributive Justice, which requires a man to do his Utmost to repair the injuries he has done to any, this is so stated a rule, that all our Casuists justly press it in all cases of damage: But are there not many of them, who while they so eagerly assert that obligation in other men's cases, do as David did in the matter of the poor man's Lamb, severely sentence that injustice, whereof themselves are more highly Guilty. To every such I would speak in the words of Nathan, and say thou art the Man. Alas, shall every little trifle I purloin from my Neighbor have weight enough to sink me to the abyss, and shall thefts of the greatest magnitude, the robbing God of his honor, the Church not only of her Patrimony, but her Peace, and the World of those inestimable benefits, which from a uniform consonant Christianity were to have been transmitted to it? Shall these I say be so slight and inconsiderable, as not to hinder his ascent to the hill of the Lord? Shall the least violence I offer to the person of an Enemy oblige me to satisfaction, and shall he rend and tear the body of his Savior (who willingly exposed his natural body only in tenderness to that mystical one, which is thus violated) and shall this criminous barbarity exact no offers towards amends? Certainly no man can have partiality enough to think it, and if he do not, he is to remember himself indispensably engaged to take the same course he prescribes to others, and with his utmost industry endeavor to repair the injury he has done.

AND O that we might see this so essential a piece of Justice assumed among us, that our impertinent strifes might be superseded, and all molded into the one noble Emulation, who shall fastest unravel his own mischiefs, and promote that peace he has hitherto disturbed. This indeed were worthy to be the united design of all learned men; and were it once so, who knows how prosperous it might be: For though some single attempts have miscarried, yet probably one great cause why they do so, was because they were single. When one Person comes with pacifick arguments to part an enraged multitude, let his Reasons be never so convincing, they are not like to be much adverted to; the only effect is, that he who designed himself the common Friend, is taken as the common Enemy; but where many associate in such a design, and make a party for peace, their numbers give a considerableness to their proposal, and prepare for their success. And were there such a combination in order to the Churches Quiet, it were more than possible they might undermine the contrary attempts of Faction and Discord.

AND why should not every man be ambitious to make one in this so pious a confederacy, and resolve most studiously to endeavor the composing the Distractions of the Church, in which they may borrow something of instruction even from their past guilts, and copy out their own industry to this better purpose. This is sure; our disputes had never so multiplied, had there not been a great deal of unhappy diligence in nourishing the seeds of them: Every controverted Tenet has been heightened and improved, till it have spawn'd a numerous brood, so that those who at first differ'd, perhaps but in some few things, wrangle on, till at last they agree in fewer: Now were the like Industry applied the other way, it might sure do much to the changing the whole Scene. If men would as nicely observe the Principles of agreement between dissenting parties, and with as much Art and Care seek to dilate and spread them; why might not they as much overwhelm our Differences, as they have been overwhelmed by them? 'Tis sure that those Universal truths, to which all Parties assent, are, as the clearest for their Evidence, so the most important for their Consequence: And why should not these, if rightly managed, be a more enforcing motive to Unity, than the more singular opinions (perhaps fancies) of some men, can be to Discord? Certainly would but our Moses's try what this rod of God in their hand could do, they would find it able to devour all those of the Magicians. Would they like Benhadabs Ambassadors, catch hold of every amicable expression, anything that looks towards Peace, and close in with it, they might probably see Effects, beyond what can at distance be expected. For sure Peace is not such a dry Tree, such a Sapless unfertile thing, but that it might fructify and increase as well as Discord, were there a just care taken to Cherish and nourish it.

INDEED this Design is the only Amulet which can render it safe to look into controversies, which are else apt to infuse a kind of acrimony, and venom into men's spirits; For we see many, whose curiosity at first brought them as unconcerned spectators, do within a while engage with all earnestness in the contest: but those who study differences only with an aim of composing them, these have their thoughts determined and fixed, and so not left loose to the enticements of any Party. Aristotle says that on the Hill Olympus the Air is so subtle and piercing, that those who ascend thither, are forced to carry with them wet Sponges, by that moisture somewhat to allay that extreme tenuity which otherwise would be deadly; and sure they that deal in controversies, live in no less corrosive an Air, and therefore had need make the like provision, and carry with them this Pacifick purpose, as a lenitive and Emollient against the infectious sharpness they will there meet with.

AND now how blessed a thing were it, if we could once thus follow the things that make for Peace, that the numberless mutual enmities which are now among us, may all be reduced into one, that we may fight not against single Adversaries, but against War its self, and contend against nothing but contention. And sure our victory here were worth millions of those petty conquests wherewith men please themselves, and which acquire them so little of real advantage, that the same account which was given of Otho and Vitellius, that the war would swallow up the one, and the victory the other, is too applicable to our combatants, who are like to be equally unhappy in defeat or success. The Spartans had an Order that when any of their Generals had compassed his Design by policy or treaty, he should sacrifice an Ox, but when by force and bloodshed, a Cock only: from the distant values of which oblations, Plutarch observes how much they prefer'd the Atchievements of calm and sober counsels, before those of strength and power: but sure the disparity is more eminent in the present instance, where if we fight we wound our Brethren, but if we unite we destroy our Enemy: baffle and circumvent Satan's Master-stratagem, and not only worst but outwit him. Indeed this and this only is worth our Industry, whereas those little defeats we give Each other, are like those in a civil War, wherein the public is still sure to be a Loser; upon which consideration the Romans allowed not their Captains to triumph for such Victories; and sure our Christianity is very ill bestowed on us, if it have made us so much worse natured, as to choose those ruinous Conquests at home, before the most glorious and profitable ones abroad.

'TWAS Abner's admonition to Joab, when he was in a hot pursuit of the Israelites, 2 Sam. 2. 26. Shall the sword devour forever? knowest thou not that it will be bitterness in the later end? and sure 'tis more than time for our Leaders to make the same reflection, and as Joab did there, call back the People from following their Brethren: Nay indeed, would they but attend, they might hear themselves called back; the great Captain of their Salvation sounding a retreat from these fatal skirmishes. Xenophon in the institution of Cyrus tells us of one Chrysanthus, who in the heat of battle had his hand lift up to strike an Enemy, but hearing in the very instant the Trumpet sound a retreat, stopped his blow. A great sobriety of courage so to show more Zeal to the obeying his General, than the annoying his Enemy; and an Instance of much reproach to our Spiritual Combatants, who have shown themselves so much worse discipline'd, as in spite of daily repeated calls to Peace, still to pursue their Hostility: But sure such an insolence is so inconsistent with the pretence they make of fighting God's Battails, that they must either reform the one, or disclaim the other.

AND now if after all that hath or can be said of the obligation, necessity, or advantages of Peace, we are put to the Psalmists Complaint, that there are still those that will make them ready to battle: if men are of so untreatable a Temper, that nothing can be obtained of them: what remains for those that are Peaceable and Faithful in Israel, but to bewail those Mischiefs they cannot redress? If the Church must perish, at least to give her Funeral rites, and if they cannot quench her flames, yet to bedew her ashes with their tears. 'Tis true, we cannot yet say she is quite dead; but though she breaths yet in a few pious peaceful Souls, yet like a Palsied person, she scarce moves a Limb, she wants vigor to actuate the generality of her professors, and remains rather a trunk than a body: and sure if there be truth in that Physic Aphorism, which says that diseases which cross the temper and constitution of the Patient are most dangerous; we may well conclude her desperate, there being nothing more repugning to the very Elements and Principles of her Being, than those contentions under which she now groans.

YET there is an omnipotent Power to whom no Difficulties are insuperable, an unerring Physician who makes the most hopeless Diseases, but the Triumph of his Art. O let us resort to him, and invite his Aids in the same pathetick form, wherewith he was solicited for Lazarus, Jo. 11. 3. Lord behold she whom thou lovest is sick: She for whose sake thou enduredst such contradiction of sinners against thyself, is now by the contradiction of her own Children, languishing and expiring: she for whom thou pouredst out thy blood, lies weltering in her own, Lord save or she perisheth: Were such Petitions enforced and ingeminated by the daily breathing of humble devout hearts, who knows how prevalent they might be. In this sense also Heaven might suffer violence; nor is there any better countermine to all the outrages acted upon Earth than by making them thus reverberate in our cries and prayers.

AND perhaps this Consideration will draw us all, even the most peaceful of us into the guilt of a negative Accessariness to the present Mischiefs. There are divers that dislike our contentions, and blame the abettors; but yet with such Unconcern'dness and Indifferency, as that wherewith we commonly talk of the combustions of foreign States, wherein we rather express our Judgment than our resentments, and do make it more our discourse than our concern. And even of those who have in some degree laid it to heart, who is there that has not been some way wanting in the ardency, or frequency of his intercessions? let everyone seriously interrogate his own Heart, and I fear 'twill witness to him, that his own private concerns are much apter to excite his devotions. Let us remember with what passion and importunity we invoke God in our particular Exigents, and consider whether we are equally affected with those of the Church: Hast thou been like Hezekiah, sick unto death? and hast thou with him wept sore, and vehemently solicited a recovery? has thy estate been invaded by Oppression, thy fame by Slander and Detraction? and hast thou with loud and earnest cries, appealed to that God to whom vengeance belongs? or hast thou been in that condition which is proverbial for setting men to their prayers? hast thou like Jonah been in a storm, in minutely expectation of being swallowed up by the waves, if not the Whale; and in this Extasie of fear, when as thy soul was as the Psalmist speaks, even melted away because of the Trouble, hast cried unto the Lord, and even out-noys'd the billows in thy clamorous importunities for aid? Hast thou in all, or any of these estates been thus affected for thyself? then remember whether thy resentments have been proportionable for that which is much better than thyself: If the no less imminent and pressing dangers of the Church, have not as much awakened thy fervor, given as sharp and piercing an accent to thy Prayers, thou must needs confess, thou hast fallen short, of what thou shouldest and mightest have done towards her rescue.

AND if this Inquisition be impartially made, who among us can plead not guilty? and therefore in reflections upon our past omissions, we are in justice obliged to redouble our Zeal, to say over again our Tepid heartless prayers, and inflame them with a Cole from the Altar; an earnest affectionate Concern for all that is holy, such as may prompt us to cry, and that mightily to God: We see the Ninevites could do it when there was no visible approach of danger, but merely upon the presage of a stranger Prophet, backed with the consciousness of their own Guilt: I fear we more than equal them in the later Motive, I am sure we far exceed them as to the former. The miseries we are to deprecate being not only under denunciation and threat, but actually upon us, though withal so improvable, that after all the black Catalogue our Experience brings in; our Fears meet us with the bottomless Prophetick menace, Isaiah 5. 25. for all this his Anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still. 'Tis the usual Economy of divine Justice to make our Crimes our Punishment, and to give us up to those ills, which were at first, our own depraved choice: and God knows we have too much reason to fear this may be our case: That we who have so perversely violated all the bands of Unity, wantonly wrangled ourselves out of all inclinations to Peace, should never be able to resume them; that all those gentle breathings of Grace, by which exasperated Passions are to be cool'd and tempered, should be withdrawn, and we finally be given up to be dissipated by those Whirl-winds ourselves have raised: That Christianity which we have made the stale and Property to our irregular appetites, used only as figleaves to hide our shame, should wither and shrink into nothing; and that we who could not agree in what manner to retain it, should at last too well agree to renounce it.

THIS alas, as it is the fearfullest, so is it the probablest Issue of our wild Contentions, such as nothing but the miraculous Effluxes of divine Clemency can avert. O let us with all the groans and tears, so deplor'd a Condition exacts, address thither, importune the father of Mercies to pity us, who know not how to pity ourselves, and that though we have cast off all bowels, yet that we may find them all concenter'd in him: that he will heal our wounds; and which of all others is the most desperate, our unwillingness to be healed: that the Spirit of Peace may overshadow us, and impress on us the dove-like qualities of Meekness and Gentleness: that he would rescue our Religion from our Profanation not by taking it from Us, but by conforming us to It: Finally that he would do for us, not only above what we can ask or think, but beyond what we would wish or choose, and not suffer us to acquire the Miseries we so eagerly pursue.

THIS divine interposition alone is it that can possibly secure us, and indeed the suit amounts to no less, than that he will force upon us the Blessing we resist, and do us good against our wills, which is so bold a request, that they had need be more than ordinary Favorites that shall prefer it. Those hands must be very pure, that are lift up in such an intercession: and therefore all that undertake it are obliged to qualify themselves for it, by purging out not only the levain of Malice and Strife, but all other filthiness of the Flesh and Spirit: without This, we can never approve ourselves to intercede in earnest; for what can be more ridiculous than to deprecate the ruin of Christianity by the contentions of other men; when ourselves contrive it by some other vice of our own? This is not to desire it should live, but that none but we should kill it. 'Twill therefore concern those who wish the Peace of the Church, to examine whether they do as much project for her Purity; otherwise 'tis a mockery to pretend such a jealous tenderness for her. We have seen there are more ways than one, by which Christian practice may be evacuated, and it matters little from whence that Wind blows that ship-wracks our Piety. Yet 'tis not to be denied that of all those tempestuous blasts, this of our contentions is the roughest and most fatal. 'Tis indeed not a single gust, but an encounter and struggling of several contrary winds; and God knows no poetical description can out-do the horror of the storms they have raised; yet for ought I discern, there is nothing that is less vulgarly accused, which I must account to the Reader, as the cause why I have detained him so long upon this Head; and given it a length so unproportionable to the preceding parts of this Discourse.

CHAP. XX. The Close.

WE have now seen the unhappy riddle of the Unchristianness of Christians unfolded, have observed the Originals and Causes of That which is too notorious to all the world in its Effects. And though in this cursory view the Reader is not to think he has any such complete discovery, as should supersede his own farther inquisition, yet as it may serve to awaken, so somewhat to assist his Industry, give him some light and insight into the wiles of Satan: and by branding some of the chief of those cheats which have robbed us of our Piety, prepare for the detection of the whole Confederacy: in the interim this Specimen may serve to stop his wonder at the ruinous estate of Christianity, for though 'tis true that it was compacted of all the most incorruptible materials, had all the harmony of parts which the most exact Frame and Composure could give it, and so was qualified both for strength and beauty, to have defied all the injuries of Time; yet while she has so many Underminers, 'tis not strange to see her in the dust, there being no one of these, especially that I last insisted on, which has not destructive efficacy enough; first to deface, and then to ruin her.

BUT it is but an unprofitable acquist to know the Authors of our mischiefs if we stop there, this enquiry being matter not of mere Curiosity, but of the nearest and most pressing Interest: we search not after Malefactors for their acquaintance, but for their punishment, and our own security; and all our discoveries of this kind are vain, if we apply them not to that purpose. Let me therefore conclude with this earnest Petition to the Reader, That he will not to all the native Defects of this discourse, add this accidental one that it shall be perfectly impertinent; a mere waste of his Time and my own; which it will inevitably prove, if it engage him not in an earnest prosecution of those Delinquents it hath appeacht; and in as earnest an endeavor to repair the Mischiefs they have wrought.

IN short, let every man deposit what he has here read, not with his memory only but his conscience, let him there seriously ponder the Excellency of that holy vocation, as S. Paul terms it, Eph. 4. 1. to which he is called: and then as seriously consider, whether he have as the Apostle there exhorts, walked worthy of it; if he find he have not (as alas who is there that has?) let him search out as the particulars, so the causes of his Miscarriages: diligently sift out those Fallacies of Satan, or his own heart; those sly Delusions which have made him act thus preposterously against all the Convictions of common reason, natural conscience, or Christian experience; and when he has discovered, let him make no delay to rescue himself from their Treacheries, but manfully break those withs and ords (which are too weak to hold any that will but in earnest remember, he is a Nazarite, a Person consecrate to God) resolutely resist the insidious caresses of those Delilah's, which will deliver not Himself only, but the Ark to the Philistines. Nor is he to content himself with his own single escape, but to propagate the deliverance, to as many as he can; let him blazon and stigmatize those Imposters (for 'tis a combining with them to conceal them) warn and caution others against those juggling Artifices, by which himself was entrapped, and make his own ship-wracks a Sea-mark for the securing the course of other Passengers. This is the Effect of Christ's admonition to S. Peter, when thou art converted strengthen thy brethren; and a piece of that Fraternal charity we all owe to every particular Soul, to whom we have opportunity to dispence it.

BUT besides that private Obligation, it becomes a duty upon a higher, and more public Account, it being the only way to take off that Scandal we have brought upon our Religion; which as it was not contracted by the irregularities of one or two persons, but by associated and common crimes; so neither will it be removed by a few single, and private Reformations; there must be combinations, and public Confederacies in Virtue, to balance and counterpoise those of Vice, or she will never recover that pristine honor which she acquired by the general Piety of her Professors. In those primitive days there was such an abhorrence of all that was Ill, that a vicious person was looked on as a kind of Monster or Prodigie, and like a putrefied Member cut off, as being not only dangerous, but noisome to the Body: but alas, the Scene is so changed, that the Church is now made up of such as she would then have cast out; and 'tis now as remarkable an Occurrent to find a good Christian, as it was there to see a bad: and since everything is estimated not according to its rare and casual, but frequent usual Operations, 'tis easy to conclude, that Christianity has lost as much in its Repute, as it appears to have done in its Efficacy: nor will there be any way of repairing it, till We be generally rendered so malleable to its impressions, that our Lives may attest its Force and Energy.

NAY indeed 'tis not only its honor, but its being is concerned in it, active Principles cease to be when they cease to act. You cannot hinder the fire to burn but by putting it out: and to suppress the Operation of our Religion is indeed to extinguish it; at least to deprive it of its proper and specific act: so that if it can be said to be; 'tis only by that abuse of speech which calls a dead or painted man, a Man: It may perhaps be a vizor for the Hypocrite, a Stale for the Ambitious, a wash or tincture for the Covetous; but where it is these, it ceases to be its self. The essence and being of Christianity is practice; and according to that Test and proof thereof, where almost can it be said to Exist in the world? we have indeed some images and shadows of it: Some have taken its picture, but the substance and solid body is vanished, resolved into Air, and seems sadly to have moralized the poetick Fable of Sybills being worn into a voice, we have turned it into a mere noise and sound; nay, which is worse, into an Echo, that flattering complying voice, which reverberates every man's own language to him: Men dictate to their Religion, and then will needs persuade themselves and others, that their Religion dictates to them, will have the rebounds of their own Fancy or Lust pass for Divine Oracles; so suborning this Aiery fantastick Christianity to legitimate those practices, which the real solid one forbids and Execrates.

To this dismal forlorn estate have we brought that which was designed to bring us to bliss, herein far exceeding the barbarity of the brutish Sodomites, they would have violated the Messengers of their ruin, but we those of our safety: We having not only neglected, but vilified and reproacht the Embassy sent us from Heaven, and instead of embracing that purity and peace it recommended to us, have done our Parts to make it forgotten that ever it was sent upon any such Errand; and indeed so it is like to be, if some Heroic piety do not revive its Memory, and teach us to record it not so much in our books as lives: There, and there only it will be universally legible, there it would indeed appear, what it is in its own nature, the power of God unto Salvation.

AND now why should we not all Emulously contend, who shall first put off that ugly vizer we have put upon our Religion, and restore it to its native form; especially considering that with its Beauty we lose its Dowry too; forfeit all those glorious Rewards which it promises to them that preserve it immaculate. 'Tis only a pure and undefiled Religion that will invest us in those white robes, wherein we are to follow the Lamb. And sure those who have here endeavored to darken and extinguish all the rays of Spiritual Light, that have lived as if they professed Christianity merely in spite to defame it, must never hope it shall bring them to shine as the Sun in the Kingdom of their Father, or procure them the reward of blameless Souls. No, it promises no other Crown than that of Righteousness, and therefore they that want the Righteousness must want the Crown also: Nay, besides that so inestimable a Reversion, they lose all those present Joys and satisfactions which true Christian practice would afford them, and which both in respect of the intenseness and duration, infinitely exceed the most profuse sensualities the World ever tasted.

THESE are interests that are sure Important enough, and yet we must be woed to consider them, nay, that does not prevail neither, but with a perverse Coyness we hold off; all the solicitations and importunate Calls of God are looked upon as Artifices and Designs, as if he had some Ends of his own to serve upon us, and (as the Corinthians suspected St. Paul) meant to make a gain of us; we treat with him as if he were the Person to be advantaged, and barter for Heaven with such an Indifference, as if it would want Us more than We It; never considering that 'tis impossible for him to have any other Concern, than that which his Compassion to us creates, and the more earnest and passionate That is, the more it should excite our own care, it being the Extremest degree of perverse Folly, to abandon and despise our own Interest merely because a Friend or Patron considers and prizes it. And this brand must lie upon everyone of us, who still refuse to discern the things that belong to our Peace, after God has done so much to render them not only visible but attainable.

WHAT shall I say more, but conclude with Christ's passionate wish, that we might in this our day, understand the things that belong to our Peace, and O that the Spirit of Peace and Light would descend among us, illuminate us with that true practical Wisdom, which may convince us, that our Duty and Interest are the same thing under several forms, and that while we impiously cast off the one, we do as foolishly betray the other. That so those inestimable advantages our Christianity gives towards both, may not be thus madly lost, serve only as a price in the hand of a Fool, who hath no heart to it, Prov. 17. And to this end let us humbly and earnestly invoke the Father of lights, to illuminate all those whom the God of this world hath blinded, that after he hath sent into the world the Image of his own eternal brightness; caused the Sun of Righteousness so long to shine upon us, it may not serve only to involve us in that most dreadful condemnation, which awaits those who love darkness more than light; but that answering the purpose of our holy calling, walking as Children of light, we may vindicate that Christian profession which we have so defamed, secure to ourselves the light of God's countenance here, and that of his glory hereafter.

THE Divine Authority AND USEFULNESS OF THE Holy Scripture ASSERTED IN A SERMON On the 2 Timothy 3. 15.

By R. ALLESTREE D. D. and Chaplain in Ordinary to his Majesty.

OXFORD At the THEATER. 1673.

2. Tim. 3. 15.

And that from a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

THE words are part of St. Paul's reasoning, by which he presseth Timothy to hold fast the truth he had received, and not let evil men, seducers, work him out of what he had been taught: urging to this end both the authority of the Teacher, himself, who had secured the truth of his doctrine by infallible evidence; and beyond that, as if that were a more effectual enforcement, pressing him with his own education in the Scriptures; how he had been nursed up in that faith, sucked the Religion with his milk, that it was grown the very habit of his mind, that which would strengthen him into a perfect man in Christ, and make him wise unto salvation if he did continue in the faith and practice of it; which he proves in the remaining verses of the Chapter.

In the words read there are three things observable.

1. Here is a state supposed, Salvation; and put too as of such concernment, that attaining it is looked upon as wisdom; wise unto salvation.

Now since true wisdom must express itself both in the end that it proposeth, and the means it chooseth for that end to be pursued with and attained by, and take care both these have all conditions that can justify the undertaking, and secure the prudence of it, and this wisdom to salvation therefore must suppose both these; in order to them both we have here

2. That which with all divine advantage does propose this end, and also does prescribe most perfect means for the attaining it; and that is Holy Scripture through faith which is in Christ Jesus. Thou hast known the holy Scriptures which are able to make thee wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. Holy Scripture probably of the Old Testament; for there was hardly any other Timothy could know from a child, scarce any other being written then. The faith of that then through the faith which is in Christ Jesus, that is, together with the faith of all things necessary to be known concerning Christ, is meant. Now since St. John, after the view of all that the other three Evangelists had wrote concerning Christ, adding his story also says, that Christ did and spoke more then what is written, yet affirms most positively that those things were written that we might believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God, and believing might have life through his name; and so enough is written for that faith which is in Jesus that is necessary to eternal life: therefore the Holy Scripture of the Old Testament, together with the faith of what is written in the New, is that which St. Paul affirms is able to make us wise unto salvation.

3. Here is the advantage Timothy had above others as to Faith in these, and consequently the far greater obligation to continue in it. He had known them from a child. And that from a child thou hast known the holy Scripture, &c.

The first thing that does offer itself to our consideration is the state supposed, Salvation. But because my Text supposes it, I shall do so too, nor shall think it needful to prove here, that there is such a state, nor consequently that all those are stupid, who propose not to themselves this everlasting safety for their main end, and by strict care in the duties of Religion and God's service aim at it: for if that state be granted, nay if it be but possible, it must be granted that there can be no security but in doing so, nor consequently any wisdom without being wise thus unto salvation.

But then if this were granted, that the wisest thing man could propose to himself, were by strict care in all the duties of Religion to design God's honor and his own salvation; still, as to the other part of prudence which consists in the choice of means, we are to seek for that Religion we are to pursue this end by and attain it; since there are so many and so opposite Religions in the world, that 'tis not easier to reconcile them, then to make peace betwixt enemies and contradictions. And it always was so; for excepting that mankind agree'd still in the notion of the necessity of Religion, that all had apprehensions of invisible powers above us, and differ'd not much in the rules of Justice and Morality, in other things there was no nearness. Almost from the beginning there was more variety of God's then Nations, I had almost said then Worshippers. Beasts were their Sacrifices and their Deities, and therefore the votaries were certainly no better. Vices also were their worships; things which their Cities and their Camps would not endure, found Sanctuary in their Temples; and the actions which were whipt in the Judgment-hall, were their piety in the holy places. And though some wise men among them found good reason to decry this, yet they knew not what to take up in the stead. I need not add the present differences of the world, even that called Christian too, great part of which as heretofore they sealed their faith with their own blood, now seal it in the blood of all that differ from them; and by their persecutions hope to merit Heaven more, then those did hope to gain it by their Martyrdoms. But these I need not add to make up this into a demonstration, that it is impossible for lapsed men, so far as they are left to themselves, and have no other guide to follow but their reason, to find out what they are to believe of God, and how to serve him, and save themselves. The Fathers and Philosophers too conclude that we can learn from none but God, what we must understand of God; who must be known only as he himself is pleased to revele himself. His worship also, how he will be served, and what observances he does require, or will admit, since it depends on his own good pleasure, therefore without his directions 'tis in vain to hope to please him with our Religious service whatever it be, and by consequence impossible without his guidance and assistance to acquire the end of all our Service and Religion, the salvation of our souls. So that how wise soever he be who does propose this blessed end to himself, if yet withal he be not some way from the Lord instructed by what means he must pursue that end, and do not make choice of, and use those means, it is impossible he can be wise unto salvation. Now for this St. Paul assures us most expressly, here we may be furnished: For he says, The Holy Scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation, through faith which is in Christ Jesus. And he does assert this on the very ground we mentioned, for they are 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 inspired by God; they come from him. All which must be made out in the next place.

That those Holy Scriptures which St. Paul first mentions, those of the Old Testament were so, and did contain sufficient revelation both of God, and of the way of worship of the Jews, that Nation did so perfectly believe, that neither Sufferings nor Miracles could persuade the contrary; neither the Roman persecutors that destroyed their worship, nor the Son of God that changed it, could yet take them off from Moses and his Scriptures. Now that this Moses led that Nation out of Egypt with an high hand, and made himself their Prince and Law-giver, multitudes of foreign Histories of the first times, and the best account assure us: whose relations we cannot question as derived from themselves, because they hated Jews beyond all possibility of such compliance. But the Scriptures also tell us, how in Egypt by strange wonders, (such as their Magicians could not imitate nor bear, who though they had permission to do some, it was that so they might appear to be outdone the more miraculously, themselves confessing God's hand in those prodigies) Moses wrought on the Egyptians to give leave the people should depart: and how when yet notwithstanding that leave given they were pursu'd, he made way for them through the Sea by Miracles, which was a rampart and defense to them, a ruin to their enemies: How they were fed for forty years with Manna raining down from Heaven in the wilderness: and that they might depend on Providence for their daily provision, when he forbad them to take care or gather for the morrow, whatsoe're their greediness or want of faith provided, strait bred worms and stank, except that on the Sabbath eve, to keep off such cares from the day of their Religion, they gathered double which corrupted not: How when they mutined for flesh, would have variety, Paradise in the desert, such great plenty of Quails flew to them as fed the whole Nation till their very lust was surfeited; and they had no more will then hunger to them: How Moses Rod did strike a living stream, a River that suffic'd that people and their cattle out of a Rock: How in the midst of lightning and thunder God himself promulgated his Law to the whole Nation audibly at once: How his glorious presence showed itself in all necessities upon the Ark, in which the Tables of the Law were laid up: How the waters of the river Jordan fled from that Ark both ways, flow'd upwards to give passage to the people into Canaan: How the walls of Ierichó without any other battery, any other force but that the Ark was there, fell down before it.

But to name no more, If these be true; that power by which these were wrought, was great enough to give that Law, require obedience to it, and reward it, and to punish all transgression according to the tenor of these Scriptures: that is▪ it was God; and he that wrote those Scriptures must have had communication with, and been inspired from, God to write them. But,

2. Whether they were true or no according as they are recorded in those Scriptures, that whole people from the greatest almost to the least must know; because they are recorded as all don, not only in the presence of them all, but as the objects and the entertainments of their senses, everyone; so that if they were forged, not one of the whole Nation could be ignorant of it. And then,

3. If they knew them forged all; that 600000 men, besides their wives and families, should endure this Moses, having brought them forth only into a wilderness, there to lay such a heavy Law, and so severe a yoke upon them, with such penalties annexed to every least transgression, and adjure them to observe it on the account of all those prodigies that had been wrought among them, and upbraid them with stiffneckedness, rebellion, and appeal to their own senses for the truth of all this, and record all to posterity in this Scripture, cause all to be read before them; and that they should bear all this from him they knew so impudent a deceiver, and convey that Scripture and the faith of it to their posterity, ground their so strict, so chargeable Religion on that book, which they were certain had no word of truth in it: this sure transcends belief and possibility.

'Tis certain therefore, since the Jews of that age did perform the services required, and in performing them according as that book directs, did teach their children the great works that God had don in their sight, therefore they believed those Miracles and Scriptures. And since it was impossible that they should be deceived; if they believed them, they were true: and their posterity received from them the faith of this, and so derived it on, that neither God's dread judgments, nor man's cruelty can yet shake it. Now had they not been don, and on that account conveyed; when ever they were broacht, and that book first appeared, the men of that age must needs know their Fathers never had performed such services, had such a book read to them constantly, nor told them of such Miracles that had been wrought: and therefore 'twas impossible that they could have believed it had been so from Moses, if it had been true that it had first begun to be taught in their own time, or in theirs with whom they lived. And this discourse must be of force concerning every age, if we ascend until we come to that of Moses wherein all was effected. Yet besides this, they had also that perpetual Miracle in the High Priest's Pectoral, the Oracle of Vrim and Thummim, that did keep alive their faith and strengthen it: and they had Prophets constantly foretelling, as from God, things that were sometimes suddenly to come to pass, and sometimes not till many ages after, the event of which depended often on the will of those that would not of some hundred years be born; others on God's own immediate will and hand: and therefore none but God could look into, foretell, and bring to pass all those events. Now such were Jeremiah's predictions of the taking of Jerusalem, and the captivity of the people, and the express number of years it would continue; Esays naming Cyrus, who was to release it, near two hundred years e're he was born; All Daniel's prophecies, particularly that most eminent one of the Messiah this Christ Jesus, of whose Scriptures we are next to speak.

That that Jesus, whom Cornelius Tacitus the heathen historian in the fifteenth book of his Annals, calls Christiani dogmatis autorem, the Author of the Christian Doctrine, did work Miracles, and prophesy, both Jews and learned Heathens do confess. But these Books tell us, when he first began to preach, he publicly cast out a Devil in the Synagogue on the Sabbath day; and at even, when the whole City was assembled, he healed all their sick, and cast out many Devils, which confessed before all, that he was the Son of God. Then he cast out a Legion of such mischievous malign Spirits, as having got license, drove two thousand Swine headlong into the Sea & choked them, which was known to the whole Country of the Gadarenes. Before the Pharisees and Doctors, that came out of all the Cities both of Galilee, and Iewry, and Jerusalem, and so great a crowd as forced them to unroof the house to come to him, he freed one from his palsy and his sins. A multitude was witness of the death of fairus's daughter, and bewailing her laughed him to scorn that undertook to raise her, yet he called her into life. And on a feast day in the Temple, before all the people, he recovered one that had lain lame eight and thirty years: and when a widows son was carried to his funeral, and all the City followed him, he only touched the bier, and bid him live. With two fishes and five loaves he fed 5000 men besides women and children, and with what they left they filled twelve baskets, when one basket carried all before they ate; so that they were convinced, he was that Prophet that was to come into the world: and with seven loaves he filled 4000 afterwards and seven baskets. He commanded a dumb spirit out of him that had been Lunatic, vext with a Devil from his infancy, before the people and the Scribes, whom his Disciples could not cast out. And when Lazarus had been dead four days, and buried till he stank, yet at his call, altho bound hand and foot with grave clothes, he came forth, all the multitude beholding. From so many more I chose out these, because they are reported don before the people, and the Scribes, and Pharisees, and Doctors. I might name his Prophecies of the destruction of Jerusalem, and of the propagation and continuance of his Religion; even of the woman's box of Spikenard, which event hath made notorious to the world. But his death was so even at the present: when if the rending of the veil of the temple was apparent Miracle to all Jerusalem, the suns prodigious Eclips, when it was impossible by nature he should be eclipsed (it being then full moon,) was so to the whole Hemisphere. It serves the use I am to make of this, that 'tis here recorded, but withal Heathen<sup>d</sup> Historians and Chronologers bear witness to it: for when they relate that in the 4th year of the 202 Olympiad, the year that is assigned to Christ's death, there was such a great Eclipse as never had been, day at noon turned into night, the stars appearing, and earthquakes as far as Bythynia, since 'tis apparent by the motions of the Heavens and the calculations of Astronomy, there could be none such then according to the course of nature, it must be this the Gospel speaks of. But beyond all this, 'tis registered here, that according as he had foretold, he raised himself from death the 3<sup>d</sup> day; yea and many bodies of the Saints that had been buried, long it may be some of them, he raised with him. That notwithstanding all the art and treachery of the Cheif Priests to conceal it, yet that very day he appeared First to Mary Magddalen, 2<sup>dly</sup> the Women, 3<sup>dly</sup> Peter, 4<sup>thly</sup> to them that went to Emans, last of all on that day to the Eleven except Thomas, being seen and handled by and eating with them; 6<sup>thly</sup> eight days after to the same eleven with Thomas; 7<sup>thly</sup> at the sea of Galilee appearing in a miracle of fishes; 8<sup>thly</sup> to all his Disciples and 500 Brethren more in Galilee, then to James, then to all his Apostles, promising them the Holy Ghost; and lastly all of them beholding he ascended into Heaven, and ten days after as he promised sent the Holy Ghost upon them in the shape of fiery tongues, so as that they spoke all Languages immediately, to the amazement of the Jews of every Nation under Heaven to which they were scattered, that the Miracle might spread as far.

Now if all this be true, he that did these must have communication with a power above all that we account the powers of Nature; such an one most certainly as can perform whatsoever he in this book promises, inflict what e're he threatens; such as is divine. And since he wrought all these, on purpose to evince he came commissioned from that divine power, brought these Miracles as seals of that commission, that we might believe him, therefore whatsoever he delivers must be embracit by us, as we hope for those blessed rewards that he proposeth, and on pain of those eternal torments if we do not; of both which it is not possible to doubt if these accounts be true.

2<sup>dly</sup> Since the most and greatest of these must be don but once; he could not be incarnated, and born, and live, and preach, and die, and rise again, and go to Heaven every day, of every age, in every place, to convince every man by his own senses; to all those that did not see the matter of fact, therefore faith of all these must be made by witnesses. And

3<sup>dly</sup> If we can be sure the witnesses that do assert a fact understand it exactly, if the things be palpable, and they must certainly know whether they were really don or no; and if we can be sure too, that they are sincere, will not affirm that which they do not know, and do not lie, their testimony of it must be most infallible: because it is impossible such witnesses can be deceived, or will deceive.

4<sup>thly</sup> The witnesses in this case, the Apostles and the 70 Disciples (for I will name no more) must needs know most perfectly: For they not only saw the Miracles, but were instruments and parties in some of them; sent to cure diseases, cast out Devils, and knew whether all this were in earnest. And most certainly they saw (as all the Jews did too) Christ crucified, his heart peircit with a spear, and his body buried; and whether they did see him risen, handle him, and eat with him they knew. And if they might mistake in his Ascension, yet the fiery tongues, if such did light on them, they must needs see; and whether they themselves, who spoke no Languages, could then speak Tongues, it cannot be but they must know. In these there is no possibility they could err, unless they did it willfully: but then 'tis as impossible that they could do it willfully, if they were sincere and honest, such as would not lie.

Now that they were such, I might urge their simplicity and openness, without disguise, not covering their own errors; men who seemed to live as well as preach against all artifice, and to have no design on anything but the amendment and salvation of mankind. For he that can suppose it possible that they were otherwise, men of art and finess, that they contrived the story, must needs know; First, that such would not seal their falsehood with their blood; design no recompense to all their travels but contempt, and hatred, persecutions, prisons, whippings, wounds and death, to be the scum and the offscouring the world; lay out their lives against their conscience to preach that Jesus, who did only call them out to be aspectacle to all the world, just such as Malefactors when exposed to fight with, and to be devoured of wild beasts. Their sufferings are too known to stay upon: S<sup>t</sup> Paul's own catalogue of his for five whole verses 2 Cor. 11. is such, that to sustain them only for this end, to put a cheat on mankind; count a so laborious, vexed, torn, miserable life and an infamous death gain, so the fable might be believ'd: to think they could do this, is sure as great a madness as to do it. But yet I will suppose that possible; that those who wove the fable pleased themselves so infinitely with the expectations of imposing on mankind, as that those hopes could make misery and death itself look lovely to them. But

Then 2<sup>dly</sup> that all and every of them should be of that mind, that amongst so many that bare witness of Christ's Miracles and resurrection not a man should discover the cheat; that when their persecutors did with arts of torment as it were examine them upon the rack, they should work not one single confession out of them; that no ones courage should be broke, nor have a qualm so far as to acknowledge how it was, disclose the plot, lay open the confederacy, the whole mystery and the contrivance of it: When of twelve Disciples one was so false to betray his Masters person at a vile rate, yet that all of them, and many more, in a feign'd story of his Miracles should be so true to one another, that no engine of man's cruelty ever could screw out the secret, not one should betray the forgery and be a Judas where he ought to be: no not that Judas, whose concern it was, whose treason to his Master had been justified had he been an impostor: yet that he should stir no least suspicion of it, but should burst, choked with his grief because he had betrayed innocent blood: This, if he knew it had all been imposture, must be most stupendous.

But yet we will give them this too, that vainglorious hopes of drawing in the world to follow them, might make all of them obstinate in secrecy against all attempts of cruelty; or if some weak brethren did perchance discover, we may not have heard of it. But

For them 3<sup>dly</sup> to begin their preaching at Jerusalem is yet more strange. To hope to draw men into a persuasion, and to bottom that persuasion upon Miracles, and a resurrection don amongst them there, where if discovery were made it must be made, and where it could not but be made if there were fraud. For to relate and write those works with every circumstance of persons, place, and time, where they not only could examine every circumstance, but where they rather than their lives would find them false, if nothing else would, this must needs discover it. They preach them to the face of the whole multitude and of the Pharisees, and tell them they were don before their eyes, sometimes 500 and sometimes 5000 being by and the chief Priests and Pharisees and Doctors: so that 'twas most impossible they should not know if they were true or false, as sure as there was never a Jew in all the Land, but knew whether there were a darkness over all the land when Christ was crucified. Now if these were forged to hope to draw Jews out of their Religion with apparent forgeries, which they knew such, speaks these Apostles men so far from art to manage a design of changing the Religion of the world, that they were mad beyond recovery and president.

But let us give them that too. Yet tis certain 4<sup>thly</sup> that the Jews, if any such were wrought on by them, must be much more stupid to believe them upon the account of such things don in all the country, in their Cities, and the Temple, before all the Nation, when they could not choose but know they were not don, if they were not don, but were fain'd all. For what ever might be motive to Christ's followers and his Apostles, with the certain danger of their lives to forge the cheat, what possible temptation could there be so great to incline Jews, the most stiffnecked people, the most stubborn in Religion in the world, to embrace a faith which nothing but the Cross and shame and misery attended, and which they must know false too? Had they so great lust to die, as for that to bid farewell to their Moses, their Religion and their Law? It is impossible had they not known the truth of those things, that in waters of affliction, in Jerusalem, ipsis persecutionum fontibus, in that fountain, that springhead of persecutions, as the Fathers call it, they would ever have been baptized into Christ.

Yet suddenly in one day at one sermon of S<sup>t</sup> Peter we read near 3000 were baptized. Act. 2. at another strait 5000 Act. 4. and such beginnings, such sums are required to make good what the Governor of Palestine Tiberianus tells the Emperor, that he was not sufficient to put to death all those that confessed themselves Christians. All which must needs have either been convinced those things were true, or else as well against their conscience as against the powers, thus embracit that faith and death together.

Neither was this a first surprise of Christianity, as it had seized men's minds at unawares; for it went on conquering till the world came into it, receiving the Religion with the loss of all that was dear to them in this world. For in one age from Christ's death, what with the Apostles sermons, miracles, and <sup>a</sup> writings also to confirm and keep men in the truth, and to convey it better to posterity, and their disciples after them, who went forth delivering those writings, preaching on, and doing wonders also, very many Nations are recorded by Historians as converted almost wholly. And the truth of it is evident, since nothing but almost whole Nations, nor yet they but as buoy'd up by the wonders and the graces of God's spirit, ever could be able to endure, or be sufficient to employ the Swords, the Flames, the Lions, and the other numberless tortures which the Jews and Nero and Domitian, and above all Trajan in that first age rag'd with, till they made their Cities, villages and provinces so desolate, that the Proconsul Pliny, being frighted with the multitude of murder'd Christians, did advise with him about relaxing his edicts, as he himself assures us.

It was the same the next age, when the power of Miracles yet lived, and those which Christ himself wrought were scarce all dead, (some lived till near that time, who rose up with him at his resurrection;) when these books, (writ by the will of God to be the pillar and foundation of men's faith in after ages, as saith Irenaeus in that age,) were also read in the assemblies weekly; when not only those that did assemble were by Hadrian martyr'd, but they put men to their oaths, to find out whether they were Christians, that they might massacre them.

And in the 3<sup>d</sup> it was the like, when Miracles they say were not yet ceased, yet sure the greatest was the constancy of Christians in adhering to this book & patience in suffering for it. For they report the sands on the sea shore almost as easy to be numbered as the Martyrs of that age; what by Valerian, Decius, Maximinus and Severus, but especially by Dioclesian, who put so many men to death for not delivering up their Bibles to be burnt, and refusing to Sacrifice to his God's, as if he meant to have depopulated the whole earth. And this is as notorious as that men do now profess that they are Christians, and that these are holy Scriptures. Therefore I shall need to go no further.

Now among so many myriads who on the account of all these Miracles (whate're they were) suffered themselves to be converted to the faith of Christ, and then as if they car'd for nothing but Religion and their Bibles, for them bore the loss of goods, and life itself, and engaged their posterity to do so also; that not one of these should know whether indeed any such miracles were wrought, if any were restored to life or no: (for if they knew, then they were true:) and that among so numberless a crow'd of teachers, who by assuming to speak languages, raise the dead, work signs, drew in those Myriads to Religion and the stake, and went before them, gave them an example both in faith and death; that not one of all those should believe either the Miracles or himself that did them: for if any one that did them did believe them, since he knew who did them, they must needs be certain: but not one of them to know it, sure is such a thing as neither could be don nor be imagined.

He therefore that requires strict evidence in things of faith which cannot bear it, he that calls for Mathematical demonstration, nor will believe on easier terms, yet is so credulous and so unwary, that he can believe so many things which by the nature and the disposition of mankind I have demonstrated not possible, which yet must be true, unless these scriptures be from God: 'tis plain he does not seek for certainty, but for a pretence of not believing; would fain have his Infidelity and Atheism look more excusable, and is not fit to be disputed with but to be exploded.

But if these scriptures be from God, then whatsoever they affirm (with modesty I may conclude) is true. And therefore when S<sup>t</sup> Luke Acts. 1. 1. declares his former treatise contained all that Jesus began both to do and teach until the day in which he was taken up: since Christ before he did ascend taught everything that was required to be believed and don in order to salvation, and more too; therefore if his Gospel did contain all that he taught, and did, since it did not contain all absolutely, it must needs mean it contained all that was necessary, or it must mean nothing. And since the same S<sup>t</sup> Luke in the beginning of that Gospel does affirm he wrote it, that Theophilus might know the certainty of those things wherein he had been instructed; 'Tis plain he avers that the certain knowledge of all those things wherein the having been instructed made Theophilus a Christian, might be had out of that Gospel: and when S<sup>t</sup> Paul says here, that the Holy Scriptures are able to make us wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus, and S<sup>t</sup> John in his 20 chap. v. 31. that though he had not wrote all the things that Jesus did, yet those that he had wrote were written, that we might believe that Jesus was the Christ the son of God, and that believing we might have life through his name; 'Tis evident the Scriptures say that what was written was sufficient to work that belief which was sufficient to life and salvation, as far as the credend• do concur to it. And when S<sup>t</sup> Paul in that verse that succeeds my text, in most express particular words sets down the usefullness of Scripture in each several duty of a man of God, or preacher of the Gospel, both for Doctrine of faith, for reproof or correction of manners, and instruction unto righteousness, and tells you God's express end in inspiring it, and consequently its ability when so inspired was, that the man of God might be made perfect, thoroughly furnished unto every good work that belongs to his whole office; 'tis most certain that what is sufficient for that office to instruct, reprove, correct and teach in, must needs be sufficient to believe and practice in for all men: i. e. what my text affirms, they are able to make us wise unto salvation.

I might call in Tradition universal to bear witness to this truth for holy Scriptures, if having once demonstrated that they are God's word, when that does affirm it, and bears witness to it, there were need of any other. And this I dare boldly say, that if the Scripture did say as expressly, that the Pope had a supremacy or sovereignty over the whole Church, or that he or the Roman Church were infallible; their definition, or the living voice of their present Church, a most sure rule of Faith, as it does say Scripture is able to make us wise unto salvation, those Articles would suffer no dispute, it would be blasphemy or sacriledg to limit or explain them by distinctions, when those sayings of the perfectness of Scriptures are forced to bear many. Then we should have no complaints of the obscurity of those books; if those articles were either in the Greek or Hebrew, they would never say the Bible were not fit to be a Rule of Faith, because the Language were unknown to the unlearned, and they could not be infallibly secure of the Translation; were they there they would account them sure enough, who think them plain enough already there, and that we must believe them because, Thou art Peter, Feed my sheep, and Tell the Church, are there.

And for him that shall affirm, all necessaries that must make us wise unto falvation are not in the Scripture, 'tis impossible to give a rational account how it should come to pass that some are there, the rest are not.

It must be either on design, or else by chance. Now 1. That God should design, when very many things that were not necessary were to be written, that the main and fundamental ones should be omitted: and when of the necessaries most he did design for Scripture, then He should not suffer the Apostles to write the remainder of them: and yet what he would not suffer them to write, designed that the Trent Fathers (who I hope have perfected the Catalogue) should write all: of these since 'tis not possible to give a reason, 'tis not therefore rational to affirm it was upon design. But

2. If he shall say it only happened so by chance, he does affront both Scriptures, and God's Holy Spirit, who, as they affirm, inspired them for this very end, to bring men to the faith and to salvation. But there is no place for chance in those things that are don in order to an end, by the design, impulse and motion of the infinite wisdom of God's holy Spirit. He certainly does most unworthily reproach his Maker, who can think it possible, that what he did design expressly and on that account alone to attain such an end by (namely that men should believe and be saved) and inspire it for that purpose, should yet fail, not be sufficient for that purpose. And sure if it be sufficient it contains all necessaries, otherwise it were deficient in the main; yea so clearly also, as that they, for whose salvation they are intended, may with use of such methods, as are obvious and agreed upon by all men, understand them: for otherwise they could not be sufficient: if men could not be instructed by them in things necessary both to faith and life, they could not make them wise unto salvation.

I must confess the Scripture labors under a great prejudice against this doctrine, from the different senses and interpretations that are made of it, even in the most fundamental points, by them that grant it is the word of God; when yet all use the same means to find out the meaning, and no doubt they seek sincerely after it. But yet I think it evident this happens not from the obscurity of Scripture, since it is not only in the most express texts; but also if you should suppose the doctrines were as plain set down there as words can express them, yet there are such principles assumed into the faith of different sects, as must oblige them to interpret diversely the same plain words. I am not so vain as to imagine that no places are obscure in Scripture, and I know that learned men have arts by obscure places to confound the plainest, just as the Philosopher did motion. Neither am I so perverse and singular not to think that universal practice and profession of the Church does much assure and confirm explications of Scriptures, whether obscure or plain. But this I say, that the diversities of explication come, as I now said, from the diversity of principles or rather prejudices, and that this only is the cause of it I thus demonstrate.

First in the Socinian, who interprets all those Scriptures, which the Catholic world hath still applied to the Divinity and satisfaction of Christ, that I name no more points, otherwise then the Church did always; and I affirm he does it, not because he thinks the words do favor his interpretation, but because his principle requires it; namely this, To admit nothing into his faith but what agrees with that which he counts reason, which in a Socinians faith is judge of all points in the last resort. And I mean reason upon natural principles, and thus I prove it. Socinus speaking of Christ's satisfaction, says the word is not in Scripture, yet if it were there very often I would not believe it, because it does not consist with right reason, that is with the arguments that he had brought against it drawn from human principles. And therefore he there adds; those things which 'tis apparent cannot be, (i. e. that appear such to him who judges by the principles of natural reason, which yet cannot judge of supernatural and infinite beings,) though the Holy Scripture does expressly say they are, yet must not be admitted; & idcirco sacra verba in alium sensum quam ipsa sonant per inusitatos etiam tropos quando{que} explicantur: and for this reason we make use of even unusual tropes, strain'd figures to explain the words of Holy writ to other senses then the words themselves import. And so he therefore serves that great variety of words by which the Scripture does express Christ's suffering for our sins, in our stead, as our sacrifice; against the universal notions of those words, not only which the Church of Christ, but which the Jew's and which the heathen world had of them. And when his reason told him that Christ could not be God one with his Father, that he was so far from having any being from eternity, as that he was not at all, till he had a being from the Blessed Virgin; Therefore when the Scripture says directly I and the Father are one, he must strain it to this meaning, are of one mind, we agree in one: altho S<sup>t</sup> John avert that, by distinguishing those two expressly. Yea worse, when to prove that Christ had a being e're the world was made, we urge from the first Chap. to the Hebr. what S<sup>t</sup> Paul produces from the Psalms, and does apply to him most particularly. Thou Lord in the beginning hast lai'd the foundation of the earth, and the Heavens are the works of thine hands; they shall perish, but thou remainest, and they all shall wax old as does a garment; and as a vesture shalt thou fold them up, and they shall be changed: but thou art the same, and thy years shall not fail. They explain it thus: that God by Christ will at last destroy these Heavens, and this Earth, and change them, according to that saying in the Psalms; which altho the Apostle produce at length, as it stood there, both concerning the Creation and destruction of the world, yet he intended only to apply this last to Christ. And though he say as well of the same Lord, Thou Lord in the beginning didst lay the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the works of thine hands, as, thou shalt change them; yet he meant no more but that this change God would effect by Christ. It is not possible that the text can give any the least countenance to this interpretation. The different explication of this Scripture does not come from the obscurity of any words in it; for in the Psalm they and we understand the same words in the same sense exactly: therefore that we differ here, is not from anything in the words quoted, but is wholly from the Principle. And we may not wonder, for the plain sense will not suit with their Hypothesis.

There are no other that are instanc'd in as differing from us in points of faith but the Romanists. I know not whether they account those differences to be in things necessary to salvation. If that be true that they allow (for what cause they know best,) some that are reconciled to their Church to communicate with ours, that is, join in our worship, and by doing so own the profession of our faith in distinction to that of others, or at least espouse the scandal of the owning it; Then one would think they must account that there is nothing in our worship don that is unlawful, nor omitted that is necessary, nor anything Heretical professed, at least that there's no scandal in the owning that profession. For if there were, they did allow them only to profess and act gross sin, which certainly they would not do. So that poor Protestants when they are pleased to give leave may be no Heretics, and therefore there is nothing of itself in that profession faulty. But yet on the other side since we see they call us Heretics, and when they have no power over us, damn us to Hell fires, and when they have had power, damned us to the fire and fagot also; sure they think the differences to be in things necessary. But yet the account is easy, how not the obscurity of Scripture, but a Principle or prejudice does cause this. For We are bound in conscience to grant they believe their own Principles. Now 'tis a Principle with them, that their Church cannot err, and therefore that their present faith and consequent depending practice was their faith and practice always. That it may appear so, they must seek for countenance from Scripture: and if anything there seem to thwart their faith or practice, they must smooth and disguise it, that it may look friendly. And 'tis most certain if the Scripture should be never so express against them, whilst they think it is not possible that they can err, they cannot think it possible Scripture can mean what it pretends to speak. Twere easy to make instances. As first for invocation of the Saints departed, which with them is a point of faith, Bellar. and Cochleus produce that of the Psalms, I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills from whence cometh my help. Psalm. 121. 1. and altho the text directs that looking up expressly to the Lord that made heaven and earth. v. 2. and though it be a Principle with them, that on those everlasting hills there were no Saints in David's time that could be invoked, they were all in limbo then they say; yet as I said, they would have countenance from Scripture, and for want of better they are therefore forced to interpret those words, I will lift up mine eyes unto the Hills, thus, I will invoke the Saints. Now will any say 'tis the obscurity of this Scripture that does hinder Protestants from seeing the bright evidence of this argument, and not rather that it is the weak foundation of this practice that does make the Romanists seek to build it on those mountains? So among those several texts which in the 2<sup>d</sup> Nicen general Council are producit for adoration of the images of Christ and of the Saints, and are expounded to evince it, none is plainer then that which I produced now from Bellarmino. I shall give one or two examples from the Psalms: Thy face Lord will I seek: and, Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon us: and again, the rich among the people shall entreat thy face: therefore David thought the picture of Christ was to be adored. It is their own conclusion from these texts, And they have no better for it. Yet they saw the doctrine in these so apparently, as that with great opposition to great Councils, and more blood shed I think then yet ever any doctrine hath been settled with, it was imposed. Yea more, the first experiment of the Popes power over Sovereign Princes was on the account of this same doctrine: when for opposing Image-worship Gregory the 2<sup>d</sup> excommunicated the Greek Emperor. Pope Constantine for the same cause indeed had 14 years before don so to Philippicus, but he did not go much further, whereas Gregory absolved the Emperors subjects in the Roman Duchy from their Allegiance; commanded them not to pay him any tribute, nor in any wise obey him; whereupon they killed their Governors, and swore obedience to the Pope. And this was the beginning of S<sup>t</sup> Peters patrimony, and it was thus gotten by this doctrine, which they saw so clearly in these Scriptures; when they cannot see the contrary in those plain words, Thou shalt not make to thyself any whether Graven image or idol it matters not, since it follows, nor the likeness of anything which is in heaven above, &c. nor in those where God takes care expressly that himself be not worshipit by an image Deut. 4. 15. and then judge if 'tis obscurity or plainness that makes them see or not see doctrines in the Scripture: rather if it be not merely the necessity of prejudice. So again we differ in the meaning of the 14th chap. of the 1. Cor. where we think S<sup>t</sup> Paul asserts and argues, yea and chides against all service in an unknown tongue in the public assemblies, saying all must be don there so as it may be understood, and to edification. But that which is performed there in an unknown tongue does not edify says he there: yet to justify this practice they must make it have a different meaning, which no Fathers countenance, but which several expound as we do, yea and diverse of their own do so too, and particularly their Pope John 8th in his 247th Epistle writing expressly on that Subject. Once more, so their half communion, that it may be reconciled with that express command Drink ye all of it: and this do, obliges them to find another meaning: drink ye all must be directed to them only as Apostles; and do this must signify consecrate the Elements, altho S<sup>t</sup> Paul apply it most directly to the drinking, and the drinking to his lay Corinthians. Nor dare they say in truth it means the other, for S<sup>t</sup> Paul when he does say do this, did not intend to make his Lay Corinthians male and female all priests, and give them power to consecrate. The words are plain, there's nothing in the text obscure that makes us differ; but the practice had by little & little grown upon them, till it became Universal, and so grew into their faith: and then since they believe they cannot err, they must expound Christ's words so as they may not contradict their practice; because that would overthrow their Principle.

But the Church that builds upon no Principle but God's word, can have no temptation to pervert or strain it, since what ever does appear to be the meaning of it, that their Principle must needs engage them to believe. And therefore if it say This is my body, we believe it; if it says too after consecration it is bread, we believe that also: and because it therefore says 'tis both, we so believe it one that it may be the other: which since both say it is impossible that it can be substantially, neither hath God in express words told us which it is substantially; therefore seeing when he calls it body, he is instituting his Sacrament, there's all reason in the world he should mean Sacramentally; since 'tis the most proper meaning: and by consequence 'tis bread substantially, as all ways of judging in the world assure us. Here's no stress on Scripture, as there is no Principle to serve; when as the other makes us differ, not in Scripture only, even where 'tis plainest; but tradition too. For the most express and evident sayings of the primitive Fathers are on every head of difference, as much the matter of contention as the texts of Scripture are; as it were easy to demonstrate if that were my business. So that it is mere deceit to lay our quarrels to defects in God's word, and particularly to its obscurity, which a man would think were evident enough from this that Children knew it. The last thing I am to speak to.

And that from a child thou hast known the holy Scriptures, which are able to make thee wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus.

I cannot pass this, that it is S<sup>t</sup> Chrysostom's observation, that Timothy was nursed up in the Scriptures from his childhood. Yea and since his Father was an Heathen, he must have been taught them by his Grandmother Lois, and his Mother Eunice, whose faith S<sup>t</sup> Paul speaks of 2 Tim. 1. 5. Children therefore then, and Women, and they sure are Laics, read the Bible. Yea and since they knew it, they must read it in a language which they understood: and we know where that is unlawful now. If we consider the first prohibition that appeared in that Church with Synodical authority against such men's having any Bibles in their own tongue, we shall find it was immediately upon the preaching of the Waldenses, one of whose doctrines it was, that the Scripture was the rule to judge of faith by: so that whatsoever was not consonant to that must be refused. This they preached in France and over Europe in the latter end of the 12th Century: and that Council which forbade their having of the Bible, we find lately put forth by the frier D. Achery as held at Toulouse in the beginning of the 13th Century. It seems they apprehended then their doctrines hardly would abide that touchstone: And they therefore had no surer, more compendious way for its security then to prevent such trial, taking care men should not know what was or what was not in Scripture. And it is not possible for me to give account why in their catechizing they leave out all that part of the commandments, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image, &c. but this only, that they dare not let the laity compare their doctrine and their practice with that Scripture. But though it is possible they might conceive some danger if the whole Scripture should be exposed, yet in those portions which the Church itself chose out for her own offices, the little lessons, and Epistles, and Gospels, those sure one would think were safe: no, not their Psalter, Breviary, nor their Hours of the Blessed Virgin must they have translated in their own tongue; as that Council did determine. And truly when the Roman Missal was turned lately into French, and had been allowed to be so by the general Assembly of the Clergy in the year 1650. and when it was done it had the usual approbation of the Doctors and some Bishops, and then was printed at Paris with the license of the Vicars general of their Archbishop. Yet another general assembly of the Clergy the year 1660, whereat there were 36 Bishops, upon pain of excommunication forbid any one to read it, and condemn not only that present traduction, but the thing in general as poisonous, in an Encyclical Epistle to all the Prelates of the Kingdom: and in another they say of him that did translate it, and the vicars general that did defend him in it, that by doing so they did take arms against the Church, attacking their own Mother (namely by that version) at the Altar, in that sanctuary, that closet of her spouses mysteries to prostitute them: and in another Epistle they beseech his Holiness Pope Alexander 7th to damn it not in France alone but the whole Church; which he then did by his Bull, forever interdicting that or any other version of that book, forbidding all to read or keep it on severest pains; commanding any one that had it to deliver it immediately to the Inquisitor or Ordinary that it might be burnt forthwith. Now thus (whatever it be otherwise) the mass is certainly a sacrifice when 'tis made a burnt offering to appease his holiness's indignation: when that very Memorial of Christ's passion again suffers, and their sacred offices are martyr'd. To see the difference of times; 'twas heretofore a Pagan Dioclesian, a strange prodigy of cruelty, who by his edict did command all Christians to deliver up their Bibles or their bodies to be burnt: 'Twas here his Holiness, Christ's Vicar, who by his Bull orders all to give up theirs, that is all of it that they will allow them, and their prayers also, that they may be forthwith burnt, or themselves to be excommunicated, that is their souls to be devoted to eternal flames. And whereas then those only that did give theirs up were excommunicate, all Christians shun'd them as they would the plague; and multitudes, whole regions rather gave themselves up to the fire to preserve their Bibles: now those only that have none, or that deliver up theirs, are the true obedient sons of that Church, and the thorough Catholics. I know men plead great danger in that book: it is represented as the source of monstrous doctrines and rebellions. I will not say these men are bold that take upon them to be wiser than Almighty God, and to see dangers he foresaw not, and to prevent them by such methods as thwart his appointments; but I will say that those who talk thus certainly despise their hearers; as if we knew not Heresies were hatched by those that understood the Bible untranslated: and as if we never heard there were rebellions among them that were forbid to read the Bible. For if there were a Covenant among them that had it in their own tongue, so there was an Holy League amongst those men that were denied it. While those that had the guidance of the subjects conscience were themselves subject to a foreign power, as all Priests of that communion are, How many Kings and Emperors have there been that did keep the Scriptures from their people, but yet could not keep their people from sedition, nor themselves from ruin by it? In fine when God himself for his own people caused his Scripture to be written in their own tongue, to be weekly read in public to, and day and night in private by the people; and when the Apostles by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost indited Scripture for the world, they did it in the language that was then most vulgar to the world: what God and the Holy Spirit thus appointed as the fittest means for the Salvation of the world, to define not expedient, as the Holy Fathers of Trent did, looks like blasphemy against God and the Holy Spirit. But blasphemies of this kind are not to be wonder'd at from that kind of men, that call the Scripture a dumbjudge, a black Gospel, incken Divinity, written not that they should be the rule of our faith and Religion, but that they should be regulated by, submitted to our faith; that the authority of the Church hath given canonical authority to Scriptures, and those the chief, which otherwise they had not neither from themselves nor from their authors; And that if the Scriptures were not sustained by the authority of the Church they would be of no more value than Aesop's fables. And lastly, that the people are permitted to read the bible was the invention of the Devil.

But to leave the controversy and speak to the advantages which may be had from early institution in the Scripture; 'tis so evident that I need not observe how 'tis for want of principles imprest and wrought into the mind in Childhood, that our youth is so licentious. And 'tis not possible it can be otherwise, when they have nothing to oppose to constitution, when 'tis growing, and to all the temptations both of objects and example; no strict sense of duty planted in them, no such notions as would make resistance to the risings of their inclination, and seducements of ill company: and they therefore follow and indulge to all of them. And in God's name why do parents give their Children up to God in their first infancy, deliver him so early a possession of them? as if they would have Religion to take seizure on them strait, as if by their baptizing them so soon, they meant to consecrate their whole lives to God's service, make them his as soon as they were theirs, as if they had been given them merely for God's uses? And they therefore enter them into a vow of Religion almost as soon as they have them: why all this? if accordingly they do not season and prepare them as they shall grow capable. Why when they are but newly born their children, do they take care they shall be regenerate and born again God's children? if they do not furnish them with necessaries, educate them into all the qualities and hopes that appertain to the condition of God's children, as well as they do to that of their own. That parent which not only, like some delicate ones refuses her own breasts to her own infant, but provides no other to sustain it; that does only wash her babe from its first blood and uncleanness to expose it the more handsome prey to wolves and tigers in the desert, is more savage then those tigers: even the sea monsters draw out the breasts, they give suck to their young ones, saith lamenting Jeremiah, but he adds the daughter of my people is cruel like the Ostrich in the wilderness, which leaveth her eggs in the earth, and forgetteth that the foot may crush them, or that the wild beast may break them, she is hardened against her young ones: such are they who when their children are so born again to God, yet as they shall wax capable provide not that which S<sup>t</sup> Peter calls the sincere milk of the word that they may grow thereby: but from their being washed so in the laver of regeneration, take no more care, but expose them forthwith to such lusts and conversations, as are much more wild and savage then those beasts in the comparison; to which they cannot choose but be a prey. They strive indeed, they say, to educate them into men betimes, that is, make them conversible and bold: and since for that they must engage them into frequent company, where they see and hear men's follies, that I say no worse; by that means they come to have their understandings stored with nothing but the Modes, and sins of conversation; filled with froth and puddle; men betimes only thus, as they have forwarded their inclinations to, and got an early understanding and experience of, those vices, which one would think men only could be equal for. But by this means the mind, that only part that makes us be men, is not only not improved, but dwarfed. They do not only still continue children in their understanding, as to anything that's real and solid; but the hopes of reason are destroyed in them, and its growth killed, by turning all its nourishment to feed the beast part; and the Christian is quite starv'd. There needs no other cause be given for the most part, why so many men have no Religion, own being Libertines, and profess vice; for want of education they have nothing in them that does check this, for they had no principles of a Religion instill'd into them. And if at any time it comes to pass that they think it is their interest to take upon them the profession of some Religion, they therefore, since they have no Principles nor rules to judge by, are most apt to choose to profess that Religion, which is like to be most gentle to the courses they have steer'd, and are engaged in. Now that men hope to find such an one, (whether by its constitution I shall not enquire but,) by i'ts practice is but too appaernt. Accordingly when they go over to it, they carry with them, and preserve in it the vices of their no Religion; and by consequence they went not over seriously for Religion: and are therefore so much worse now then when they owned no Religion, that they do their wickednesses with certainty of easy absolution, and so hopes of salvation; and by this are likely to be made twofold more children of Hell then before: and let them triumph in such conquests. Ther's nothing in the world that contributes so much to this as men's being not acquainted early with, instructed in, those divine rules and obligations to piety and virtue, which this book the Bible does afford. If men had been seasoned first with the knowledge and the sense of duty, with the comforts that are in it, with the apprehensions of great blessings that attend it; and the mischiefs that are consequent, indeed essential to impiety and vice here; and their minds were furnished with examples of both, which this book abounds with; and their hearts too raised with expectations of far greater blessedness in a life hereafter, and with the belief that both that blessedness and life shall have no end: and were made sensible also of strange dreadful torments that await the breach of duty, which shall also last forever: If these impressions I say, did prevent all other, and take up the mind, and had in them the stamp and character of God, and so there were a reverence and awe of him wrought in them, and they looked upon him as concerned in all this; how it was his word that said; and these sentiments were grown into the very habit of their mind; as it would not be easy to corrupt or soften such, so 'twould be much more difficult to shake them, since their faith is founded on the rock of ages. Besides the Holy Scriptures carry in them such an obligation of adhering to them, and to them alone, since they are sufficient to make us wise unto salvation, and are God's word, that men would not be apt to exchange them for Legends, pious forgeries, for things that can make good no certain title from the Lord: for let them show an equal derivation of it, bring it down through all the ages ae we have don the Scriptures title to him. Otherwise it justly may provoke God's exclamation in the Prophet

Jeremy: Be astonished O ye Heavens, and be horribly afraid, be ye very desolate; saith the Lord, for my people have committed two evils, they have forsaken me the fountain of living waters, and hew'd them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water:

cisterns therefore that may leave them in a state to want a drop of water, when their tongue shall be horribly tormented: whereas he that drinks that living water which Christ gives, hisword, shall never thirst, but it shall be a well of water in him springing up to everlasting life.

THE PREFACE.

1. The Authority of Custom hath so much a more general praevalency then that of Truth; that he that shall adventure to assault that with this, may be thought not to have well digested the prudent Caution of our Savior, Luk. 14. 31. To sit down and consider whether he be able with ten thousand to meet him, that cometh against him with twenty thousand; for doubtless such, and much greater is the ods between the Abettors of these two Litigants. And to the imputation of this unwariness I cannot but foresee the present design very liable.

2. GENTILITY has long since confuted Jobs Aphorism, Man is born to labor, and instead thereof, has pronounced to its Clients the Rich man's Requiem, Soul take thine ease, eat drink and be merry. A Gentleman is now supposed to be only a thing of pleasure, a creature sent into the World, as the Leviathan into the deep, to take his pastime therein (and the better to complete the Parallel to devour his underlings too) and then 'twill be no wonder if it be adjudged a ridiculous soloecisme to attempt to define his Calling, whose very Essence is thought to consist in having none. Nay perhaps it will be deemed not only absurd but malicious, a Levelling project, of robbing him of his Birth-right, of degrading him from those privileges, which belong to his quality, and of moulding him again into that vulgar Mass, from which divine Providence and human Laws have distinguished him. But from this jealousy I dare trust the ensuing leaves to be their own vindicators.

3. I have been no unconcerned (much less insulting) spectator of the depressions the Gentry have fallen under in these latter years, but have pay'd them my just tribute of compassion, yet I confess, I think those scarce worthy a regret, in comparison with those voluntary descents, too many of them have made from true worth and virtue. 'Tis sure a far less deplorable spectacle to see a Gentleman spoiled of his Fortune by his Conscience, then his Luxury, & to behold him under the stroke of the Headsman, then under those more infamous Executioners, his Lust, or Intemperance. Yet I fear if the Martyrologie even of these suffering times were scanned, Venus and Bacchus would be found to have had many more Martyrs, then God and Loyalty.

4. But I confess it an impertinence thus to balance the two mischiefs of doing and suffering ill, since 'tis certain the latter is to be resolved into the former, and has no existence of itself, but what it derives from that. Punishments are but the results of sins, and therefore whatever Malignity is in the Effect, becomes entirely chargeable upon the Cause, and we are to look upon our Vice not only as our greatest, but our only unhappiness. This Consideration shows us the source of all our sufferings, and is itself no less obvious, then those; though one would think it as concealed as the head of Nile, that should only observe how many other Originals of our Calamities are assigned, whilst this is scarce dreamt of. This Jonah is suffered to sleep securely in the ship, while her more innocent fraught is cast over board, Jon. 1. 5. Every the least sparkle from without is charged as an Incendiary, when alas, like Aetna, our own bowels send out that fire, which has so near reduced us to ashes. But as in Diseases we account the discovery of the Cause the first and most necessary step to the Cure, so certainly is it here, the conviction of our guilt is a most indispensable preparative towards the ease of our Pressures, and we must be heavy laden in the Christian sense, Matth. 11. 28. before we shall cease to be so in the Civil.

5. But I fear men proceed in this affair rather like Mountebanks then good Physicians, use some palliating Medecines to allay the Effects, or perhaps Anodynes to stupefy the patient, and wholly neglect the root of the malady. Nor do I appropriate this error to the Gentry, 'tis too visible that all sorts and qualities have too just a claim to it, to let any one go away with the inclosure: But because the present design makes them my peculiar Province, I shall, waving all others, address myself at this time to them only, with this most passionate request, that they would not use that cruelty to themselves, for which Amalek stands branded towards Israel, Deu. 25. 18. By their persevering impieties smite and destroy those feeble and faint remains of their former felicities, but that they would now at last seriously advert to this their so great and important concernment, and pitch upon the true Achan, that has thus long troubled their Israel; and that being done, that story directs the next step of the Process, even the bringing him to execution, cutting that off, which will else infallibly bring down a fatal excision upon themselves. Nor is this to be deferred, for alas the Disease is come to too great a height, too dangerous a Crisis, to admit any delay of the remedy.

6. When Egypt had smarted under a succession of miraculous plagues for detaining the Israelites, the Servants of Pharaoh importune him to release them, and conclude their advice with this Pathetique enforcement, Knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed? And God knows I may but too properly give the same edge to mine; For alas, Gentlemen, are not your Estates wasted, your Privileges violated, your Splendors eclipsed, your Persons restrained, your Families broken and shattered, your Dignities trampled upon by the meanest of the Vulgar, and finally yourselves quite transposed in your station, now made the Tail who were once the Head, Deut. 28. 44. And is it not yet time to dismiss those Sins which are the Authors of all this? If you are still of Pharaohs mind, and resolve to retain them, you are certainly no less obstinate than he, but much more irrational: he had somewhat of visible advantage to tempt him to detain the Israelites, they were his Slaves, wrought hard at his work, built him Cities. But how far is that from the case here, they are not your Slaves, but your Task-masters, which you are so unwilling to part with, those that set you to the vilest and most servile drudgeries, and are so far from bringing you in profit, that I may boldly make the Apostles challenge, Rom. 6. 21 What fruit have you had of those things? and doubt not the only account you can bring in of your harvest, must be the Inventory of your miseries; we are witnesses of many Houses, many Cities they have demolish'd and laid waste, but we have no structure of theirs to show, but a Babel of confusion.

7. But alas, these your secular Ruines are but their modest and petty outrages, Take another view of them, and it will like Ezekiel's vision, Ezekiel 8. 6. present you with more and greater abominations than these, even the abomination of desolation in the holy place. Your sins have not only desolated your own houses, but God's: That Beauty of his Ornament which he set in Majesty, Ezek. 7. 20. hath by these your detestable things been exposed to spoil and pollution; we are not yet grown so old in our miseries as to have out-worn the aggravation of remembering our happier estate, and how sad, how wounding a contemplation is it to compare the past and present condition of this Church? When the Temple was rebuilding, the joy of that restauration could not suppress the grief of those who remembered the so much more Glorious Fabric of the first, but they laid the foundation in their tears, the text says, They wept with a loud voice, Neh. 3. 12. But what tears, what ejulations can be bitter or loud enough for us, who are to lament not partial and imperfect repairs, but total ruins and vastations, that see the materials of our Zion now reduced to dust and rubbish, who once saw them happily compacted, built together as a City at unity in its self!

8. And while we thus remember Zion, and are ourselves by the waters of Babylon, 'tis sure but proper we sit down and weep, bid, as those Captives Ps. 37 a solemn Adieu to all entertainments of joy and pleasure; and would God we all, particularly you to whom I now speak, did as exactly parallel them in this sad and pious resentment, as we do in the motives of it, that so your quarrel to sin might be accended to its full height, as that which robs you not only of your spiritual, but (that which many of you have more gust of) your carnal joys also. Tis your sins, I would I could say, yours alone, which have been the persecuting Saul's, that have thus made havoc of the Church; The Securities, Profaness, and Licentiousness of your prosperous days made the first breaches in her walls, and now the Impenitence and Incurribleness of your calamitous, like the Edomites, cry down with her, down with her even to the ground. 'Twas among the Jews a Capital Guilt to curse a Parent, and shall it now pass for an easy, or no crime, not only to curse, but destroy our common Mother, to abette and maintain those Troops which thus defy, yea invade her? O why should you not at last recall your exiled Piety, and assume a holy and becoming indignation against these her cruel her implacable Enemies?

9. But this you cannot be supposed to do, whilst You arraign only other men's sins, and leave your own out of the Indictment. I doubt not many of you do with displeasure, perhaps more then enough, charge her ruin upon the immediate Instruments, accuse the bold Intrusion of ignorant Teachers, of having depraved her Doctrine, Ambition & Envy of impatient inferiors, of subverting her Discipline, the Pride and Faction of busy Spirits, of disturbing her Peace, the greedy Avarice of Sacrilegious persons, of devouring her Patrimony; & these I shall not deny to have been the Weapons, that have thus mortally wounded her, but let it be remembered that these were wielded & whetted by the more general impieties, from whence they borrowed their destructive power, & therefore to transfer the guilt here, is but the artifice of slaying Uriah with the sword of the Children of Ammon, which you know acquitted not David from being a murderer. No, God knows, here lies a Carcass of a poor bleeding Church, but which of you our Elders are qualified for the purgation the Law assigns in that case Deu. 21. 8. which of you can say, our hands have not shed this blood, neither have our eyes seen it.

10. Yet the less capable you are of thus washing your hands in innocence the greater need you have to Wash them in Penitence, and therefore since as you are Sons to this Mother, the Office of Avenger of blood devolves on you. O bring forth fruits of repentance by discharging that part faithfully, drag out these Criminals which have taken Sanctuary in your breasts, and there dwell securely, asin a City of Refuge, and hew them in pieces, as Samuel did Agag before the Lord. And as your incentives to this are infinitely greater and more pressing, then in other murders, so will the effects also vastly transcend those of Common Justice, that only revenges, but this may repair the mischief, recall the vital spirits and reunite the scatterd limbs of this mangled body, such an Omnipotencie is there in sincere Repentance, that it is able even to effect a resurrection. O that you would be ambitious of working this Miracle, and by this pious Prodigie beget your Mother, that you would weep so long over her ashes, till that moisture had rendered them prolific, and you see her spring out of her Urne.

11. This, this is your only way of reversing that extirpating Decree which these Haman's, your sins have procured, and if You neglect this, Mordecai's menace to Hester, will be too applicable to you, if God in his unfathomable mercy should cause deliverance and enlargement to arise from some other place to this poor desolate Church, Yet yourselves can expect nothing but Destruction. If you have no sense of the desolations of Zion, no pity to see her in the Dust, but still choose to Cherish those impieties, which have brought her thither, yet even they will at the last avenge her quarrel, bring You those miseries, the sense whereof it will be impossible for You to avoid, or extinguish.

12. For alas to represent your sins to you as the Originalls merely of Temporal, whether Private or Publick Ruines, is to give you too fair and flattering a portraicture of them; these are but the light prelusory skirmishes to a more dismal Slaughter, the Prologue to the fa•...all Tragedie; Take their fuller character from the Apostle, Ro. 6. 21. The end of these things is death, even death eternal. It is our usual comfort against the persecutions of men, that they can pursue us no farther then to the Grave, there, as Job speaks, the weary be at rest; But this Tyrant in our own breasts has no such limits to its malice, but then especially begins, when all other cruelties cease, tortures infinitely by the g•...wings of that worm which never dyes, and the scorchings of that fire which never shall be quenched.

13. And now who can sufficiently wonder at the Infatuation, that you should demure upon the dismissing of so treacherous a Guest, that you should cherish this Viper in your Bosoms, which you already feel cating your Bowels, devouring all your temporal Felicities, and yet takes those but in the way to your Heart, your more precious and eternal part. Tis the common Maxim even of those that receive advantage by the perfidiousness of Others, to love the treason but hate the Traitor, but here is that Rule quite inverted; you hate the treason, are impatient of the afflicting Consequences of your sin, yet love the Traitor, hug that in your closest Embraces. The Apostle indeed forwarnes us of the Deceitfulness of sin, Heb. 3. 13. but sure this is a pitch beyond that, this is not deceit, but enchantment, some powerful Philtrum it must needs be, that can thus make men in love not only with deformity, but disease.

14. But all the Magicians of Egypt are not able to stand before Moses, this Magic is not so irresistible, but that Reason and Religion will yield you countercharmes, able to disenchant You, if You will but suffer them to come in to your aid. Do but once step out of the Devils Circle, the actual vertiginous pursuit of Your sinful appetites and give your Faculties some intermission, so much breath from that hot chase as may qualify them for a calm considerate view of Other things, and then 'tis certain You will discern that Virtue has a much more ravishing appearance, infinitely more delectable and enamouring, then all the Devils Opticks could put upon your highest and most gustfull sensualities. Do you only bestow some attentive looks upon her, let her once in at your eyes, and then leave her to make her own way to your heart. And this is sure a very moderate request, that you will but vouchsafe to look upon what is thus amiable, and with what pretence can you deny it; You who to gaze on those transitory beauties which are only your snares, stick at no difficulty, will be content to come (those of you that have no other motives) even to Church upon that errand, O do not here put off your curiosity, where alone it may Availle You, but rather take this opportunity of hallowing that (hitherto profane) part of your temper.

15. It has been none of the Devills meanest or unluckiest Arts to infuse prejudices into men's minds against Christian practice, by representing it in the most averting forms, he changes shapes with it, and as he transforms himself into an Angel of light, so he does this into one of Darkness, makes it appear a State of the most dismal sadness, and horror, a region of Antipodes to all Joy and Cheerfulness. And how much more ready men are to take the Devil at his word, then Christ at his, who professes his Yoke easy and his Burden light, appears too visible in the general aversation those have to Piety, who never so much as tried it, but take up implicit confused prejudices against it, and retain those as fast, as if they were the products of many years costly experiences, and 'tis to be feared these have taken the deepest root in the richest Soil, they seeming nowhere more to flourish, then among You of the highest Quality, yet sure, of all others You are most obliged to eradicate them, they implying such a gross injustice, as any ingenious mind must be ashamed of.

16. You will yourselves readily pronounce, that Judge not only corrupt, but impudent, that condemns a person whose plea he never heard, yet if you will but reflect, You will find your own verdict rebound upon yourselves, with a Tu •...s homo, for 'tis evidently your case here. It is time for you therefore to be so just, if not to Virtue, yet to your own Reputations, as to retract that condemnatory sentence, you have past upon her, and put on so much at least of the form of Justice, as to give her a fair Trial. But this you cannot do by hearing the tongues of men and Angels plead for her, none but herself can manage her cause, you must admit her into your society, and converse, take her into such a familiarity, as may bring her within distance of your Observation, before you pronounce of her. In short if you will indeed render yourselves competent Judges, whither a Virtuous life be a pleasant or a dismal thing, enter upon it, and let your own experiences be your informers.

17. I cannot suspect the age so degenerate, as not to believe there are divers particular persons among you, who have made the experiment, and to their Testimony I dare appeal, and doubt not they will from Judges turn Advocates, and recommended it to you, and sure you will have no cause in this instance to wave your wonted Privilege of being tried by your Peers, to except against their judgment in the case, who being placed in equal circumstances with you must be supposed to understand your utmost Temptations to Vice, from whence alone all the seeming difficulties and uneasinesses of Virtue do arise.

18. It were the work of many Volumes to describe the several distinct Advantages towards a pleasant Being, which are wrapped up in this one comprehensive Felicitie. I shall instance only in that, to which the ensuing Tract particularly relates, and that is that it furnishes you with a succession of very Agreeable and Cheerfull Employments. Virtue is of a busy and active Nature, and as in its several Operations it has an opposition to all the several sorts of Vice, so in its very Constitution and Principle it bears an avowed Antipathie to that one fertile Seminary of most other Sins, Idleness; and sure the rescuing you from that is no contemptible Benefit. For though you seem to challenge it as a considerable part of your Inheritance, that you may live and do Nothing, and are very tenacious of that Claim, yet, 'tis most evident, that what you contend for, as your Priveledge, yourselves esteem your burden, yea so much so, that to be rid of it, you cast away Estate, Health, Soul and all for Company, employ yourselves the most ruinously, rather than endure to be Idle; nay, quite confute your own Pretensions to ease, by those laborious and toilsome Vices, wick you are fain to call Pleasures, to render them tolerable; but have certainly no pretence to that Title on any other score, but that they keep you doing.

19. And now what more grateful Office can possibly be done for men in this Condition, then to show them how they may free themselves of this load without contracting a worse; I mean the guilt of those sins which like Rehoboam converts Whips into Scorpions, yet are now fain to be resorted to, as the only instruments of their relief. And this a Christian Life will be sure to do for you, It will constantly provide you with innocent divertisements, nay much more, it will give You business, so excellent, and worthy the dignity of Your Natures, so Noble and answerable to the Splendour of your Qualities, so every way agreeable to the aims of Rational Men, that You will have cause to acknowledge with Our Church, that God's Service is perfect Freedom.

20. I shall not undertake to give you a particular view of all the Severals of those Emploiments; Those Precepts of the Gospel which assign your Tasks, do sufficiently inform You of the Nature and Excellencie of them, my whole Scheme is comprised in that One, which directs an Attendance on that Calling wherein God hath placed men, and therefore I am to treat only of those particular Duties which are incumbent on You as Gentlemen, and therein show You that considered as such, You have a Calling, and so free you of that reproach and misery of being unprofitable burdens of the earth, and then evince to you also that that Calling is so far from implying anything of real toil or uneasiness, that it is only an Art of refining and sublimating your Pleasures, rendering them more gustfull and exquisite and so will (if attended to) make good to you in earnest your mistaken pretence to a Life of sensuality and delight.

Mr. Garthwait,

I Need not tell you with what success you published the Excellent Treatise, The whole Duty of Man: It is your Felicity to be again instrumental to the profit of this Church and Nation, by your Edition of these Religious and Prudent Instructions. And although the Address be not so Universal in this, as in the former; yet this will have a large influence upon other Conditions besides Gentlemen: Their Converse, if reformed, will be exemplary, and operative upon others. A Gentry that would afford an obedient Ear to these Admonitions, and a Clergy that would to Piety and Learning, join Humility, Modesty, and Sobriety, will be the best Humane means to recover this sinful Nation, and oppressed Church, from the miseries, Spiritual and Civil, under which we now groan. So that the Argument is well chosen, and it is so managed, that I know not what a Reader that is somewhat morose can desire, which is not here. The Author keeps close to his intended province and design, his Reasons are sinewy and convincing, his Reproofs are severe and grave, yet pleasing; and they whom he chides, must needs love him. There is nothing in his Periods redundant or defective; he hath a Native Elegancy that invites his Reader; variety of Learning couched, not vaunted; and a Perspicuity such, as will make his Reasonings appear to a weak Eye: A Manual which is enriched with all these Graces, shall (I trust) not only be frequently and attentively perused, but that it will lively affect, and sit close to the Reins, and penetrate the Heart of the Reader, especially that Reader for whom it is designed; and for this Blessing on the Gentry, it is our Duty to solicit the Divine Goodness.

SECT. I. Of Business and Callings in general.

1. HE that by sloth and improvidence dissipates and consumes that Stock which is properly his own, falls justly under the blunt censure of folly, and usually under the sharper and more smarting penance of poverty and want: But he that is but a deputed manager, if he neglect his depositum, is liable to a heavier weight both of obloquy and discipline: The weakness of the one may possibly meet with somewhat of pity; but the falseness and treachery of the other is the object of an universal detestation, and is oftentimes very severely sentenced by those, who, if they would impartially reflect, would find themselves deeply involved in the same guilt.

2. God has placed Man in the world not as a Proprietary, but a Steward; he hath put many excellent things into his possession, but these in trust to be not only kept, but negotiated with, and by traffick improved to the use of the true owner: Yet herein dealing as a most bountiful Master by not only promising transcendent rewards in the future to his fidelity, but even annexing at the present (as to the Heifer that treadeth out the corn) a most liberal subsistence, interweaving his Interest so with his Duty that the discharge of it is his only means of being happy even in this world.

3. This certainly is the state of mankind in general; every (I mean Rational) person having something of this kind entrusted to him: No man that hath understanding, be that of a higher or lower size, but hath variety of abilities of one sort or other, and withal that actuating power, which should set them on work; and then surely he that hath not been excluded from the receipts, must not pretend an exemption from the disbursements, the tasks, but is under a strict obligation of improving what he hath thus received, of bringing in fruit to the granary, as well in order to his own account and joy in the auditing of the harvest, as also to the glory of God from whom alone he derives (and must impute) both the seed, and irrigation, and the very increase. And he that on these grounds and according to these measures decently administers his province, sedulously attends his duty in this matter, will find himself placed in such an active state of business, that he shall have little cause to suspect himself neglected, or forgotten by God and Nature, or placed in the world without a Calling.

4. From what is thus indispensably required of all men, no one rank or individual of that species can plead an immunity: And therefore till those whom birth, education and wealth, and the common dialect of the world hath made known by the style of Gentlemen, shall think fit to expunge the latter part of that title and disclaim the nature of men, as they are willing to do the duty, they must certainly retract this error, and acknowledge they have their shares in this common obligation.

5. Nay indeed if they could so far imitate the Prince of the morning, as to succeed to that rank which he was willing to leave, I mean to ascend above humanity and assume the nature of Angels, yet even thither would this pursue and overtake them. Among all the orders of that divine Hierarchy they would not find one patron or president of Idleness: For as the spirituality of their essence renders them more agile and active, so that activity is perpetually exercised in employing the divine abilities they have received, to the glory of God the donor, and that not only in bearing a part in that Celestial quire which incessantly sings his praises, but in the more laborious and servile offices of being ministering spirits, yea even to those to whom both in respect of nature and innocence they are entirely superior. And this they do with perfect alacrity and cheerfulness, thinking it their greatest honor and dignity to be thus busied; their regitive power over the world, saith Gerson, is not so suitable an ingredient for a Magnificat of their composing, as that greater dignity of receiving, and performing God's commands: An evidence how much the measures of honor differ between the Courtiers of heaven, and earth; the inhabitants of that refined, and this gross region. Thus then the prospect lies before the Gentleman; if he choose either to look level on the same nature with himself, or direct his eyes upward on that of the glorious spirits that encompass God's throne, he will not in all the records of earth or heaven find ever a patent for sloth, any clause of exemption in this universal law.

6. Nay if this man in honor would bid farewell to his birthright, and become like the beasts that perish, Ps. 49. 20. if he could be content, in pursuit of this one fancied privilege of a Gentleman, to renounce all the real ones of a man, and make Nebuchadnezzar's punishment his option, yet neither the field nor forest could give him sanctuary, afford him any number of associates to aid, or but countenance him in his muting against this divine decree, they would rather be his tutors and monitors to obey it: For what rank even of the most savage animals is there, which we can indict of the not employing those faculties they have received? Are they not generally in a perpetual and regular motion to those ends for which they were created? in continual exercise of those powers with which they are endued? yea some of them with such improvement to all their necessary purposes, that it hath raised a doubt whether they act by instinct or reason, by fancy or judgment: Pythagoras is discernibly on their side; and Aristotle that was less kind to them, seems by one saying to have yielded the cause, when of those creatures which he saith want reason, he confesseth that fancy supplies its place. I need not take part in this dispute; whatsoever their faculties or talents are, none can doubt of their use of them, or whether this their uninterrupted obedience to the law of their creation reflects the proportionable glory on their Creator.

7. To descend one degree lower yet; The very inanimate creatures afford their consort to this divine harmony; everyone of them perform those offices, fail not in the exercise of all those (not unactive) qualities God hath put into them: The Sun hath received a power of cherishing and enlivening terrestrial bodies, and it folds not up its rays, but communicates and dispenceth them freely; the Earth has received a power of fructifying, giving sap and verdure to that which grows upon it, and it withholds not that vital moisture, but like a tender nurse sends it forth liberally to all that expect nourishment from her breasts; and so proportionably do all other parts of this great body; and that all this serves to illustrate the glory of that omnipotent wisdom which hath placed them in this so excellent a subordination, is most visible without the help of a perspective. When the Queen of Sheba saw the magnificence and regularity of Solomon's Court, she brake out into an admiration of his wisdom: And surely a far greater occasion is ministered to all those who contemplate the admirable order of the Universe, with all transportation of soul to magnify and adore the Divine Disposer of it, as we see frequently exemplified to us in the sublime raptures of the holy Psalmist, who never better approves his right to be called the sweet singer of Israel, then on this ravishing theme.

8. And now can it be fancied a privilege and dignity, to be the one jarring string in this great instrument? to discompose this divine melody, and become the only unprofitable useless part of the creation? Shall those whom God hath made little lower then the Angels, subdue and debase their natures beneath the very lowest rank of creatures? and shall this (not humble but) sordid exinanition be looked upon with reverence, courted as a preferment? This certainly is such an absurdity, as wants nothing to its confutation, but merely to be considered: And therefore if Gentlemen would but soberly reflect, there is little doubt but they would resign at once their claim, and their value of this so defaming a piece of honor, so abasing an exaltation.

9 We can let down our thoughts but one step lower, and that is into the bottomless pit; and from thence sure none will desire to fetch a president; yet if he did, even that black region could not afford it: For though it must be confessed, those accursed spirits accord not with the former instances, in respect of the end of their actions, yet they do in the activity itself; theirs is a busy state, though to an ill purpose; Satan goes to and fro in the earth, Job 2. 2. and he walks about seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet 5. 12. yea he imployes all his faculties too, makes diligent use of all that acuteness and dexterity which either his nature or experience have furnished him with, towards that end he pursues; so that it were a wronging, a calumniating even of the very Devil, to charge him with idleness; which though it be a sin which yields him such liberal crops, that he may well seek both to plant and cherish it in human nature, yet he cannot offer such violence to his own, as to become an example of it.

10. We may hence make a measure, how scandalous, reproachful a thing this is, which neither Heaven Earth, nor Hell itself will own, but is like an illegitimate birth, disclaimed by all: How unreasonable, nay how infamous will it then be, for those to take up this exposed brat, to foster this vice in their bosoms, who have of all others the greatest and most particular obligation to detest it, as having received the most of those Talents which engage them to action. And that such is the Gentleman's condition, a slight inspection will serve to demonstrate.

SECT. II. Of Varieties of Callings.

1. NOW since the universal obligation, which is incumbent upon all and renders it strict duty to have a Calling, rests upon this undeniable ground, that all men have received from God some abilities to actuate, some Talents to improve; it follows by all laws of inference, that those who have received the most of these, can of all others the least reasonably pretend to an exemption, but must on the contrary be acknowledged under the constraint of the stronger and more numerous ties, the general duty which herein lies upon all, extending and spreading itself into several branches, according to the quality and proportion of men's re...its.

2. Hence it comes to pass, that men's callings and employments become so various, not only by the free choices of the several men, but even by the direction and assignation of God and nature, because one man is furnished with an ability, which qualifies him for one sort of calling, another is by his distinct propriety marked out for another. And hence also it is, that those callings, which are distinct in several persons, may come to be united in one man, because the several abilities, which constitute those Callings, concurring in him, the duties must by unavoidable consequence do so also. This is in some degree observable in most men, who besides the general powers common to mankind, do receive some peculiar in order to some special end, and so are obliged not only to those exercises which belong indifferently to their whole species, but to those also for which they are individually qualified. Thus those whom God hath called to Christianity, are by that empowered for those performances which that holy profession exacts; and so have the calling of Christians superadded to the other, which either natural or civil obligation had laid upon them; so that the same man may have various callings, in relation to his differing capacities, unless as we distinguish men's souls into the vegetative, the animal and the rational, which in stricter speaking may be said to be only divers operations of the same soul; so in truth what we term several callings, be but the same comprehensive one, stretching itself into the several faculties of the person.

3. I need not attempt to evince the impropriety of the phrase 'twill serve my end as well that they pass for several, and the application I shall make of it, is to show those who are unwilling to hear of any Calling at all, that they have obligations indispensable to more than one. They have whatever can belong to them as men, they have also what belongs to them as Christians; and they have also a peculiar addition appertaining to them as Gentlemen, that is by interpretation, those who are distinguished from the vulgar, not only by empty names and aery titles, but by real donatives, distributed to them by God, as so many distinct advantages, fertile and prolifical abilities, towards the bringing him in his expected harvest of honor and glory.

4. It is too much to be doubted, many of them may need admonition concerning the two former of these callings; the duties even of men, much more of Christians being so far worn out of practice, that they seem to be out of memory too, or if they be at all reflected on, 'tis with the same scorn that the antiquated habits of our forefathers are, as things fit only to dress a man up, an object of laughter and derision. But this would be too vast a Theme, and besides is superseded by the many pious labors of others; my purpose therefore is not to crea... at all of them, otherwise then they shall happen to be linked and interwoven, •...s in many particulars they are, with the third that of the Gentleman

5. And here they need not fear that I mean to put the Spade or Hammer into their hands, to require them to become either Husbandmen or Mechanicks; my whole design is founded in their distinction from these, namely in those things; wherein either in kind or degree they excel them. That many such things there are, they will need no Monitor at another time, when the Question is only of the Reverence and Respect due from such their Inferiors: In such cases everyone can m...ke large Scrolls and Catalogues (written, like •...kiel's Roll, within and without) of his Advantages and Prerogatives, and stretch them to the exacting the very last mite of Tribute they can possibly pretend to But let them remember, that God is as jealous of his Ho...r, as they can be of their own; and therefore as th...y make those Pre-eminences, instruments of attracting Glory from those below them, so they must also of reverberating and returning it home to that divine Power above them, who bestowed them to that end, and will not finally be deluded; but if they will disappoint his primary intention, that of having his Grace glorified in their faithful managery of those Talents, they shall not be able to defeat his secondary, that of having his Justice magnified in the fatal doom of such slothful Servants; if they will envy him the more agreeable satisfaction of bestowing rewards, they cannot defraud him of that (though inferior) of executing vengeance.

SECT. III. The Particulars of the Gentleman's Advantages above others.

1. BUt to dwell no longer on Generals, I shall descend to Particularize those Advantages, by which they are severed and discriminated from the vulgar, and which consequently by being peculiar to them, devolve on them an obligation of a distinct Duty. And here I shall be careful to prevent dispute, and therefore take in none but what are so obvious, as to be universally acknowledged; and then having my premisses granted, I shall hope they will not betray themselves such ill Logicians, as to resist or disclaim the Conclusion.

2. I begin with that advantage which they are earliest possessed of, that of an ingenuous and refined Education; of which, I hope none that hath had it, will so far confute the Efficacy, as to despise and undervalue. What the Apostle urges in a higher Argument, Rom. 9. may be applicable here. Men's minds are naturally of the same Clay, Education is the Potters hand and wheel that forms them into Vessels of honor or dishonor; and though experience shows us, it is too possible for Men to deface those nobler Impressions which they have thus received, yet that makes it not cease to be in itself a most estimable Blessing, anymore then that excellency of God's Image wherein Man was created, could be defamed by his fall. It is certain, there is no Humane means more effectual towards the refining and sharpening Men's intellects, giving them an edge and quickness, and that the more, because it takes them in that Age wherein their faculties are, as their joints, pliant and tractable, and so capable of being by exercise improved into great degrees, both of strength and activity. This Advantage the meaner sort generally want, the expencefulness of such a breeding, sets it beyond their reach: The indigence of whose condition, doth on the contrary determine their pursuits to that only, which may bring them in a subsistence, fastens them to the Shop or Plough, and so leaves their minds uncultivated and unapt for those more excellent productions which the happier Institution of Gentlemen enable them for; as we see it observed by the Wiseman, Eccles. 38. 25. to the end of that Chapter.

3. A second Advantage is that of Wealth which to Gentlemen seems to be, as it were, rained down from the Clouds, both in respect of the plenty and the easiness of its acquisition Fair Patrimonies, large Inheritances descend on them without one drop of their sweat, one minutes toil or solicitude, as if they were the undoubted Heirs of the Israelites Blessings, Successors in their Canaan, who were to Possess Houses full of all good things which they finished not, and Wells digged which they digged not; Vineyards and Olive-trees which they planted not, as it is D...ut 6 11. The Poet hath placed it in the front of his Inventory, the prime ingredient in the compleatest felicity of this life, Reserta labor sed relicta; whereas on the other side the lower rank of Men fetch their mere necessaries out of the Earth, which being, as it were, hardened and petrified by Adams sin, must be mollified and suppld with their sweat, before it will become penetrable, will not yield them food, but gives them also a portion of sorrow with it: They must first be torn with those Thorns and Briars which cover her surface, before they can fetch nourishment out of her Bowels, they must buy their Bread with their sweat, as if they had engrossed the penalty of their first Fathers sin, whilst Gentlemen sweat only by the engagement of their sports, or by the direction of the Physician, to digest their fullness of Bread, which everyone must confess a sufficient inequality.

4. A third is that of Time. This depends by way of consequence on the former; for God having made such liberal provisions for them, thus prevented them with the Blessings of his Goodness, they can have no need to employ their time to gain that, wherewith they already abound; and so being exempted from that one devouring expense of it, have a great stock to bestow on other more excellent purposes; whereas the poor Man hath scarce any vacant minute, or such as he can call his own; they are all forestalled by those pressing necessities which lie unremovable upon him; his day-hours are challenged by his labor, his nights by his rest; and the satisfying of these Claims so necessary, that his own support, perhaps that also of a numerous family depends upon it; and therefore he may not attempt to defeat them: So that if Time be to be accounted a Treasure, as undoubtedly it is, here is a second sort of Poverty to which he is exposed as a result of the former; and another manifest inequality between him and the Gentleman.

5. A fourth is that of Authority, by which I mean not that which belongs to those which are advanced to Public Office; for that being peculiar to some few only, will not bear a distinct part in my present consideration; but I understand by it that more private influence which Gentlemen generally have on those that are their Dependents. And this also may be reckoned an effect of the former, their Wealth. For in proportion to that, the number of Servants, Tenants, and Pensioners, (yea, perhaps of Friends too) is to be measured; and over all these they have somewhat (though not o... absolute despotical dominion, yet) of sway and prevalency. On the other side, the poor Mans authority is bounded within the narrow circuit of his little Cottage, being in effect no other then the propagation of that Pow... Nature hath given him over his own Body to those Branches that spring from it, hi... Children; and to that Cien which is ingraf... into it, his Wife: And if he shall but pee... out of this little Principality, attempt to enlarge his Territories, and prescribe to any forreigner, he will soon be taught how little hi... power is acknowledged, and consequently a... how great a distance he stands in this particula... also from the Gentleman.

6. The fifth is that of Reputation and Esteem; which as the World goes is a shadow that waits only on the greater Bodies. Wealth and Honor, are the things that render any person considerable amongst Men, prepar... them with an aptness to embrace his Dictates to consider his Counsels, to transcribe hi... Copies; and though now it often falls out to be an unjust measure, yet perhaps it may have no unjust Original: For if such persons did make use of those advantages they have, to make their Minds as rich as their Fortunes, this were but their due: And therefore if it be paid them upon this supposition, it is they only that are guilty of the injustice, by defeating the ground of it. But by what tenor soever they hold it, 'tis sure; it may be made an apt Instrument to many good purposes, and therefore well deserves to be accounted into the number of their advantages. But now if you look on the poor Man, you shall see him loaded with Contempts; from which, no inward Excellencies he possesses can rescue him. It is the observation of the wisest of Men, that the poor man's wisdom is despised, Eccles. 9. 16. So hated and scorned a thing is Poverty, that it seems the Fate of it is infectious, and casts reproach upon the most estimable things that cohabit with it The World is so full of instances of this truth, that we need go no higher then our own times; but if we should look back, we may find one as ancient as Job, who in his own person experimented these distant effects of Prosperity and Adversity; while he was in a flourishing condition Men gave ear to him, and waited, and kept silence at his counsel. After his words, they spake not again, and his soul dropped on them, Job 29. 21, 22. But in the next Chapter we find the Scene quite changed, and this revered and adored person is become a song and a by-word to the basest of men I shall readily acknowledge this injurious treating of the poor to be a great Barbarism: But though there can nothing be inferred from it as de jure, yet its being so d... facto, proves all I am about to assert, vi... The great unevenness that is (in this instance as well as the former) between Gentlemen and their Inferiors.

7. Having given this Schedule of undeniable Privileges they enjoy, I shall before I proceed farther, beseech them here to make... stand, and sob...rly to consider whither it be imaginable, that God hath put so many excellent Instruments of Action into their hand... only to make them less active. That were t... accuse the Divine Wisdom of such an unskil... kind of managery, as the shallowest Huma... Providence falls not under. Will any of them be at the care and expense to furnish a Servan... with all Materials and Utensils for Work, with no other design, but that he may spend h... time either in sleep or riot. If they will not, <◇ > shall ask how they would like a Servant tha... should so absurdly pervert their intentions And according to the answer they give to that, leave them to conclude of their own acceptableness, with their great Master; who no... only in a single instance, but in an habitu... course behave themselves as preposterously. ⟨◇⟩ cannot see how such a reflection, if made wit... any seriousness, can miss of being attend... with a severe self condemnation, and then that ...eing so proper a basis and ground-work, ...hold me thinks by a kind, even of natural ...nergy, invite them to superstruct on it more Noble and Christian purposes; that they who ...re so apt to expect Adoration from others, ⟨◇⟩ willing to be Idolized, may not yet any ...nger be willing to be indeed Idols (have ...ouths and speak not, &c. Psal. 135, as many ...nactive powers, as those have Organs) but ...ay rather aspire to some degree of resem...lance to that Divine Essence, whose opera...ons are as Incessant as Excellent, and by an ...intermitted Industry in employing those ad...antages God hath put into their hands, answer ...s design in bestowing them.

SECT. IV. The Branches of his Calling founded in the first Advantage, that of Education.

1. I Presume it is by this time rendered sufficiently evident, that a Gentleman hath a Calling; it is now seasonable to advance, and show what that is, and o... this the ground hath already been laid in the last Section by the enumeration of those peculiar Advantages he possesses; which being those Talents committed to his managery, h... Calling will be the most exactly anatomize... and distributed into its parts, by unfolding those several Branches of his Receipts, and e...aming what improvements each of them ⟨◇⟩ capable of, which as so many distinct Lim... make up the entire Body of his Calling.

2. This I shall do, not only in the gro... but severally, through everyone of them, an... shall take the liberty of doing it with the addition of a double reflection; the one on t... contrary practice, the other on the pleasu... and satisfaction that will infallibly attend the discharge of this Duty.

3. I begin with that of their Education; the former part whereof commonly Commences as timely as the first Exercises of their Reason: It is so creditable a thing to have Children put into an early nurture, that there are few Parents so careless of their own reputation, as to neglect it, but do either by themselves, or some others to whom they assign the charge, put them under such a Discipline as may break their natural rudeness and stubbornness, mould them into some form of Civility, and teach them that first Fundamental Lesson of Obedience, on which all future Instructions must be built. And this is a huge Advantage, not only towards the succeeding parts of Education, but towards the regularity of the whole life: For by having their Infant-Passions thus checked and bridled, they become more tame and governable ever after. The next part of Education, is Erudition and Instruction, and under a Succession of this they are for many years: Scarce any that owns the name of Gentleman, but will commit his son to the care of some Tutor, either at home or abroad, who at first instils those Rudiments, proper to their tenderer years, and as Age matures their parts, so advances his Lectures, till he have let them in to those spacious Fields of Learning, which will afford them both Exercise and Delight. This is that Tree of Knowledge, upon which there lies no interdict, which instructs not, as that in Ed... did, by sad and costly experience, but by fai...

and safe intuitions, and may well be looked upon as a principal Plant in that Paradise, wherein God hath placed this rank of Men.

4. These two parts of Education united qualify a man for many excellent purposes. It will be impossible to enumerate all, because a mind thus subdued and cultivated, must owe the opportunities of many actions to outward circumstances and occasions, which being various and accidental, can with no certainty be brought into the account, but abstracting from these, there are divers more intrinsic benefits, which nothing but a Man's self can frustrate; and those alone I shall insist on.

5. First, a Man thus Educated, is better prepared to resist all Errors that may invade his Understanding, his discerning Faculty is more nimble and agile, can suddenly surround Proposition, and discover the infirm and sensible parts; and so is not to be imposed upon by such slight Sophisms as captivate whole herds of the vulgar. This Advantage, it appears he hath, and it is his duty to make use of it, to examine cautiously the ground of an Opinion, before he give up his assent to it, and not to betray his Reason, either his Sloth by neglecting to give it a competent discussion; or to his Interest, by electing Tenants rather by their profitableness than their truth. This certainly is the least that is supposeable to be required of them in this particular, and sure it is so moderate an injunction, as the most mutinous humor can have no temptation to quarrel at; For who could think him a severe imposer, who having furnished a man with a light to direct him through some dark passage, should only require him not to blow it out?

6. And as he hath this Advantage in respect of his Understanding, so hath he in the second place, in relation to his Will; which though it be a free faculty, and consequently cannot be forcibly determined to anything, yet it is capable of persuasions and inducements, and is usually bended and inclined by them; it must therefore be a fair step towards the rectifying of the Will, when the intellect is stored with Arguments and Incentives to goodness: And this Learning must be supposed to provide for, unless we will exclude out of the Scheme, both Morality and Divinity; for each of those will yield variety of such Arguments: Morality will present Virtue as perfectly amiable in itself, and so fit to be embraced for its own sake, and not only so, but also as highly profitable and advantageous to us, as being that which gives the sublimest perfection to our Natures, the sweetest rest and tranquility to our Minds; and in a word, a full satisfaction to all our Rational Appetites: Divinity confirms all this, and superadds what infinitely transcends it, the assurance of those eternal and glorious rewards in another world; and these surely are such tempting allecives, as are very proper to attract the will to choose what appears thus excellent, thus desirable, provided they be justly represented to it. And the doing that, the pressing these motives home upon the will, and that in refutation of all the contrary deceiveable pretensions of vice, is the first part of their obligation. But then there is also a second, and that is, that they permit themselves to be persuaded by such efficacious arguments, and actually conform their wills to these dictates of their understanding, that is, that they really and effectively be such men, as their education directs and requires them to be: Which being the work of their wills, 'twill be absurd to plead impossibility or infirmity, since 'tis manifest they may if they will; which is such a degree of liberty, as serves in all other instances to denominate a man a free agent, and such as all punishments and rewards both divine and human are founded on

7. A third advantage is in relation to his Affections; which being the inferior and more brutish part of the man, are yet so impetuous and assuming, that they are very apt to usurp the dominion over the nobler faculties; and where they gain it, the event is answerable to what we see in States where the Commonpeople have wrested the Scepter, all is put into confusion. Now that which may prevent these civil broils in the soul, and secure the government to the proper Sovereign, may well be reputed an advantage And to this, nothing merely human is more conducing then Education. For first, that early discipline which we presumed, one part of it puts a bridle in the mouths of these headstrong passions, which by many repeated acts of restraint at last forget their native feritie, and become more calm and tractable. But then Erudition completes this conquest, backs this unruly beast, and by a dextrous managerie not only restrains, but guides him, and makes him serve to many useful purposes, renders these mutinous Rebels not only captived Slaves, but good Subjects, obedient to the laws of Reason All this Education is of itself aptly disposed to do, if men will not take the Beasts part against it, encourage him to plunge, till he have thrown the Rider. And all that is in this particular required of them, is but to hold fast those reins that are thus put into their hands, to keep their Affections in such a just subjection, that they may receive, not give laws. Thus we see the influence which Education hath on all the essential parts of a man's mind: And were it here so immured and closed up, that it could make no sallies at all thence; did the soul, like Gideon's fleece, ingross all this precious dew; yet whilst that received such liberal infusions, it would irrefragably evince this to be no mean inconsiderable advantage. But it is indeed impossible it should be so confined; for if it be permitted to make these impressions within, as heat in the center fails not to diffuse itself to the circumference, so certainly will it extend and manifest itself in the more visible effects, all the products and emanations of a mind thus regulated will own their original, bear the image of the...r parent.

8. And first his Behaviour will be affable and civil, not insolent and imperious; as one that knows humanity and gentleness is a common debt to mankind, and therefore will not think fit to contract or dam up his civility into so narrow a compass, that it shall swell into complement, and mean flattery towards those above, and not suffer one drop to descend on those beneath him; but disperse its streams so, that all channels may be filled with it. 'Tis true, the depth of some will require a greater proportion to that filling, then others; and there 'tis not to be doubted but he may be more liberal; only in the mean time the shallower are not to remain dry: Let the inequality be such as proceeds only from the capacities of the Subjects, not from the partiality of the Agent, and he prevaricates no part of his duty in this matter.

9. S...condly, his Words will be temperate and decent, the product of judgment, not of rage: For he that hath calmed his passions hath nothing to betray him to rash, angry, or rude language; this is a foam which is cast up only by the billows of a turbulent tempestuous mind, and can never be the issues of a serene composed temper. To this it is but proportionable, that they be also weighty and material. A wise man's words, saith the Son of Sirach, are weighed in the balance; and therefore he that hath improved his Education to that pitch of proficiencie, will surely look his discourse be such, as may answer that character, which must at the least suppose it to have something of solidity, no man ever attempting to put froth and bubbles into the scales: And not only so, but it must also presume it to have something of use and value; for, whoever takes pains to weigh what for its uselessness and meanness he intends to cast out as refuse? And both these qualifications are very essential parts of a Gentleman's dialect, the one opposed to light and foolish, the other to unseasonable discourse: For as the one hath nothing of weight (unless it be that of a burden to the hearers) so the other can have nothing of use, nor consequently of worth, that being to be measured by the aptness of it to the persons to whom it is addressed. It should be the endeavor of those whom God hath endued with knowledge, to convey as much of benefit and instruction to others, as they can; in order whereunto 'tis necessary they adapt their speech to the capacities of those they treat with, otherwise let them discourse never so elaborately, they will rather confound then edify, and appear to affect more to boast, then communicate their knowledge.

10. Lastly, his Employments will be worthy and ingenuous. A Man that hath this inward Nobility of Mind superadded to that of his Birth, will abhor to busy himself viciously or impertinently; he hath those qualifications, which render him useful, and he must give himself those Exercises, whereby he may become the most eminently so. If by just authority he be assigned to any public charge, he is to embrace it cheerfully; not as a prize either to Ambition or Covetousness, but as an opportunity of Virtue; a sphere wherein he may move the most vigorously in the service of God, and his Country. But this hapning but to few, it is necessary he have some other reserve of action, and such surely, he that industriously designs it, cannot want, wherein though perhaps his influence will not be so general as in that, yet it may fall very auspiciously on many; and when all those occasions are exhausted too, when all direct operations are at a stand, he may yet betake him to the reflex'd, employ his activity upon himself, which will always remain a proper object of his Industry, he being, though a rich, yet still such an improveable soil, as will encourage and reward his Husbandry, though never so often repeated. And now I shall presume it apparent, That Education is a most estimable Treasure, a precious Mine that contains so many rich veins. O, why should any that possess it, suffer themselves to be poor, merely for want of diligence in digging out the Ore!

11. And would to God that were an impertinent complaint, such as none were concerned in: But they that look on the Manners of many that have had this happy Institution, will find too great cause to wonder and bewail, that so hopeful a Seeds-time should produce so slender, nay, so degenerate a Crop: As if Jobs curse were here exemplified, Job 31. 40. Thistles to grow instead of Wheat, and Cockle instead of Barley. Plutarch tells us of a voice frozen in the midst of a River, that became audible by the thaw, and applies it to Moral Precepts taught in youth, but actuated by age. The Simile speaks him to have lived in better times; for in these, the voice dissolves with the Ice, leaves not so much as an e...ho behind it. Men now make it the business of their riper years, to unravel not the follies, but the learning of their youth;

no sooner are they got from under the Discipline of others, but the first act of it they exercise, is upon those notions which have been instilled into them: And here they are such severe Lictors, that the mildest infliction is to gag and bind them, deprive them both of voice and motion; nor are they ordinarily satisfied with this, but as if they feared they would, like impatient Captives, watch some advantage to break loose again, their final doom is Ostracism, they and their Linage; all sober Counsels derived from them, are utterly expulst, so totally rased out of their minds, that not the least footsteps of them remain; and all this under the name of Pedantry, a title, which it is probable their great aversion to their Teachers, suggests to them, as the most pathetick reproach, as if they meant now to be revenged on Learning and Tutor together, for attempting to make them wise against their wills.

12. And now when the Root is thus stockt up, there is little expectation of Fruit; and therefore he that shall here look for those forementioned effects of Education, will be more disappointed, then Christ seemed to be by the Fig-tree, That, though fruitless, yet afforded leaves; but here we are not to hope for so much, no sign that ever there was such a plant in the soil: Let us briefly review those severals, and see what of them is ordinarily to be met with.

13. And first for the resisting of Errors, we usually find Gentlemen, no Heroes in this point, their Understandings are as pliant, as seducible, as those who never had their means of fortifying them; and if they do indeed reject Errors, it is commonly by the same Engine, wherewith they cast off Truth, viz. Their inconsideration of both, as not being able to endure so much seriousness and intention of mind, as may serve to enter them of any opinion: They have transplanted their discerning faculty from their Intellect to their Senses, and find it there so full, so incessant employment, that it can never be at leisure to revert to Scholastic disquisitions. They can discern exactly the most minute error in their garment, hold their Artificer most rigidly to the Laws of the Mode, are most exquisite Judges in all that relates to vanity or pleasure, and can they ever think fit to trouble their heads (whose least Lock must not for a world be disturbed) with abstruser speculations, who have found out so much a more easy exercise of their faculties; if any shall think this character partakes of the Satire, I shall beseech him to compare it with the true state of our young Gallants in this point, and then upon the same account that cold and scanty praises go for detraction, I shall expect this very imperfect and partial accusation may pass for Panegyric.

14. Next for the regulation of their Wills, that advantage depends so much on the former, that of their Understandings, that what evacuates that, must necessarily be supposed to do the same for this also. It is not imaginable that he who hath defaced all his principles, whether moral or divine, or at least never revolves or considers them, should receive any influence from them, since they operate not but by a distinct application. And here should I ask many Gentlemen, when they ever so much as attempted anything of this sort, I fear they would be forced to quarrel at the incivility o•... the question, to evade the necessity of answering it; But God knows their actions speak too loud, that their business is to obey, no•... prescribe; to fulfill, not regulate their wills, Nay indeed 'tis too frequent, that instead o•...

conforming their wills to their principles, they model and transform their principles to their wills, herein verifying Aristotle's observation that Pleasures are corruptive of Principles and so by this one art of inversion, the face o... things is quite changed; Virtue which their books represented to them as lovely and honorable, is now thought to have gained that luster only by the flattery and varnish of the painters, and so is decried as the most unamiable, despicable creature; and on the other side, all the contrary vices are taken from under that black veil, Philosophers or Divine... have put upon them, and are furbished and trim'd up, set to open view, as the most splendid, glorious things, the most adorning accomplishments of a Gentleman.

15. And to secure this transmutation, even God himself must have his part in it, be concluded to have been all this while misrepresented in those characters of Purity and Justice, his word has made of him, and to have laid no such severe restraints upon men, as that tell... us of. That Temperance, Chastity, Self-denial Mortification, &c. were but the creations of some melancholy Recluses, who would then enviously impose those bands upon others, wherewith they had foolishly fettered themselves, that God is more indulgent to Men's appetites, which they may satiate here, as they please, without those future dangers Preachers fright them with. That this is the new Gentile Divinity, we need not appeal to Men's lives, their words openly proclaiming it, not without much scorn and contempt of their easy simplicity, who govern themselves by the other; yet as if this would not sufficiently provide for impiety, as if they were conscious of that absurdity, which indeed there is in defining God an abettor and favorer of vice, many have advanced a step higher, taking a more compendious course, and since they cannot bring God over to their party, make him such as will serve their turn, will unmake him, by becoming flat Atheists; Of this there are too too many instances, and 'tis to be feared will be many more, whilst to all other sensual allurements that opinion makes to its Proselytes, this is added, that it is become a creditable thing, the badge and signature of a modern Wit, thus to be one of David's fools, in saying there is no God.

16. In the next place, let us descend to the Affections, and see what effects of their education is discernible there. And truly tha... seems to be no other, then what is observable... of a dam, put to intercept the course of some rapid stream, which so soon as it is either removed or borne down, the torrent gushes with so much the greater violence for having had that opposition; so here when the restraints, which bridled their minority, are taken off, their passions swell to a higher degree of impetuosity, they cease to be boys and men together, the Man is dismounted, looses the reins, and is dragged whither the fury of the beast directs; A sad change, yet daily too visible in many, for alas what is more ordinary then to see Gentlemen, under the dominion of these brutish appetites; sometimes transported by a Rage to the greatest Undecencies, nay Dangers; sometimes hurried by a Lust like the possessed person. Mar. 9, 22, through fire and water, the most desperate destructive attempts, and have nothing but rottenness and disease as the final prize of all those difficult adventures; sometimes drowned in swinish Intemperance; and sometimes again intombed in the Earth, buried as it were alive by fordid covetuousness, as if they meant to transcribe though not the innocence, yet the sufferings of the Primitive Christians, in being torn in pieces by wild

Beasts. Oh, that they might once be brought to relinquish this absur'd fortitude, that those who laugh at the precept of turning the other cheek, Mat. 5. 39 would not here infinitely over-act it; and give up themselves to be •...uffed, yea slaughter'd by these their cruellest Enemies, nor be such Platonic lovers of Martyrdom, as to choose only this, whereto there is no Crown annexed, but what is worn in the Kingdom of darkness

17. And now since we are thus to seek of these inward effects, we can with no reason hope for any of those outward, which are the results and consequences of these. And then 'twill be no wonder to observe Gentlemen behave themselves disdainfully and imperiously, as if they could not set a just value on themselves, without the unjust contempt of others. 'Tis true indeed, this is commonly a Wind that blows but one way, down the hill, only upon those below them, upwards they breathe gentle gales; it being one of their most studied faculties, to perform all acts of the most supererogating Civility to those above them; but when that Civility is thoroughly scanned, it will prove a greater injury then the contrary Rudeness; 'tis made up of such hollow possessions, such gross flatteries, as are much worse then reproaches, nay seldom fail to be actually seconded with them; there being nothing more usual, then to revile and deride those at a distance, whom, when present, they admire and adore. And these now become such essential indispensable parts of good breeding, that the want of either inevitably betrays a man to the title of a silly Rustick; Flatteries and Despisings being the two contrary elements, whereof he whom they call a Fine Gentleman, is to be compounded.

18. This gives an account also of some part of his Dialect, which thus far answers little to those requisite qualifications, Weight and Usefulness; there being nothing more trivial or useless, then these two parts of conversation, and 'twere well if no worse epithers belonged to them. But if we look also into the rest, they will ordinarily appear to carry proportion with these: 'Tis every man's observation, that no spring will rise higher then its first head; And then words being but the issues of the Mind, where that wants the ballast of sober and virtuous Notions, 'tis no wonder if the discourse be light and aery. 'Twere easy to exemplify in the several sorts of it adapted to the several humors of men; but 'tis also so needless, that the copy would be too exact by transcribing the impertinence too. But what such frothy discourse is naturally, the most serious may become by accident: And thus we see it the infirmity of some, who so far retain their Education, as to have their Minds better replenished, to vent their plenty so unseasonably or affectedly, that it produces nothing of benefit to the hearers, but rebounds injuriously with the aspersion of vanity upon themselves.

19. But such is the misery of this Age, that it were a fair composition, if Gentlemen could be persuaded to reduce their Discourse only to a privative sort of Illness; 'twere somewhat tolerable, if as on the one side they did not minister grace, Eph. 4. 29. so on the other they did not breathe infection on the hearers. But alas, what are all those profane scoffings at Piety, so frequent among them, but as so many blasts and malevolent vapors to nip and destroy the practice of it; and so we see it too commonly does among those whose greener resolutions set them not above their malignant influence. How does their immodest and obscene talk disperse and scatter their own impure fires, to the inflaming of others! and whilst they inscribe upon these Poisons the inviting names of Ingenuitie and Esprit, they do not only tempt men greedily to imbibe them, but even defame and prostitute that Wit they pretend to, render it a Wilderness for all savage rudeness to range in, and make as many Candidates for that reputation, as there are impious and bestial men in the world. And to this sort of Wit they have found out a very proportionable Rhetoric, I mean that of their Oaths, that hellish piece of Oratory, which so overspreads their language, that (like a prosuse Embroidery that even quite hides the Stuff) it becomes the most remarkable part of it. 'Tis not a little strange how this foulest deformity hath gotten to pass for an embellishment and ornament of Style; but that it doth so, is very visible not only from the no pretence of other temptation to it, but also from that affected and studied variety observable among them, as if they had the same concernment for their Discourse, which they have for themselves, viz. that it may every Year appear in some new piece of Dress, have some Oaths fresh minted to set it off.

20. To all these we may add their vain Boastings and Assumings, which are often so deplorably ridiculous, that 'tis doubtful whether more of pity or contempt belongs to them. Thus oftentimes, he that has but crossed the Seas to fetch a Feather and fantastick Meen, brags more of his Travels, then if he had passed the Line, and felt the scorplings of the Torrid Zone; and upon the strength of this he takes authority to impose on others the most absurd and incredible Relations; yet still imposing more perniciously on himself, i. e. a belief that he appears very illustrious and glorious in all this, and on that confidence the smiles which his auditors mean in scorn, shall be taken in applause of him, and so encourage those follies they deride.

21. Indeed where this vain humor dwells, it will betray itself in innumerable indecencies of speech; but never does it give itself a fuller or worse character, then when it lets loose to anger and rage, one of the most genuine and fruitful branches of this bitter root. And this we frequently see overflow in all the invenomed reproachful language imaginable, such as one would wonder should fall from the mouth of any, whose education had not been wholly barbarous; An inverted kind of Eloquence, whereto some who have been taught the rules of better Rhetoric, have a great fluencie.

22. If now we should proceed to take a view of their Imploiments, there is little doubt but that Tekel Dan. 5. 27. might be a proper inscription on them, yea a mild one too, Lightness and Vanity being many times the most innocent ingredient in them: And this is but a natural inference from the former; for since the Principles of Actions as well as Words is within, it will certainly operate alike in both; as water sent from one fountain through several pipes, is the same, and hath equal virtues or faults in each. It were too easy to give as particular an account of these as the former; but foreseeing an occasion to do that in another place, I shall transfer it thither, as not desiring to iterate the importunity on so ungrateful a subject.

23. And now he that shall consider, that all this is the but partial image and representation of those, who have had that Education we so much magnified, will sure be tempted to ask Judas's question, Ad quid perditio haec? Why was all this waste of Discipline and Literature? to what purpose was so costly a foundation laid, when the superstructure is in the Apostles phrase 1 Cor. 3. 12. nothing but hay and stubble? And I doubt many defeated Parents have cause to make this complaint; but I fear also divers of them may with justice accuse themselves as Accessories to their own disappointments, who by an overhasty desire of seeing their Sons men, do at once anticipate and frustrate their hopes, evacuate the benefit of many years Education, by taking them too soon from under its benign influence; which though it usually spring from immoderate indulgence, is yet really the greatest severity: For what can be more so, then to tie them to all the labor and toil of the Seeds time, force their Childhood to that Study and Intention of which that giddy age is most impatient, and then snatch them away at the Harvest; suffer them to converse no more with Learning, when once they grow capable of receiving either delight or profit by it? Thus of late it hath been the method of Breeding, to post them with an inconvenient speed from one Stage to another, many times bringing them too soon to the University, but much oftener taking them too early from it, before they have near gained what they came thither to furnish themselves with; and from thence the next step is over the Sea, which soon washes away those Notions, which lie crude in their brains, but have wanted maturity of years to digest into their manners. Indeed 'tis not imaginable how they should retain them, they being at their coming abroad solemnly put in a direct course of forgetting speedily what they formerly learnt, their whole time being then by order to be taken up in other unspeculative Exercises, wherein if they do happen to attain to some eminency, yet 'tis sure but a dry exchange for what they quit for it: But then 'tis not one in twenty, that arrives to that; the negligence of Governors, or their own headiness, when they find the rein thus slackned, often makes their progress little in anything they are appointed to; but instead of that, they run a full carere in all debauch Pleasures, advance there in an instant to the highest proficiencie. I say not this to decry Travelling in general, but only the unseasonable time that is chosen for it: He that would really improve his Son by that means, should send him at such a mature age, when by the help of his foregoing education his Judgment is settled, and qualified to make useful observations, his Manners well weighed and fixed, that so he may be capable of all the good Foreign climes can afford, and secured from the infection of the ill; like a Loadstone, attract things of weight only, and not, like Jet, draw nothing but chaff and straws. But I confess this a digression, and therefore return to those who have thus embezled this precious Advantage, (and who have too much of their own wills in it, to be able to transfer the guilt upon any error of their Parents) beseeching them seriously to lay to heart this their so ruinous ill husbandry, and to let at last some better fruits of that seed appear; Not to suffer a Piece of Plate, left to the School or College, to be the only Testimonials that ever they were there, and so bring those societies under the reproach of extortion, or fraud, of professing learning, but imparting none, of having taken something from them without giving them any valuable consideration, making them any proportionable returns. But that they would at last take up this Talent thus long buried in the napkin, and yet fall a trading with it; and though the time they have lost should render them desperate of the reward of the Ten Cities, 'tis yet motive enough to industry, to rescue themselves from the sentence of the Slothful servant, and yet that will not be all, for there being no middle state between reward and punishment, he that delivers himself from the one, puts himself likewise into a certain capacity of the other. But besides all, he is to expect hereafter, he is sure at the time of a very fair Antepast of pleasure here which he will immediately reap from it, as the first fruits of the future rich harvest, which though the Law commanded to be sacrificed, yet such is the indulgence of the Gospel, that it exacts nothing, but that men would themselves enjoy them.

24. For such is the admirable goodness of God, that he is generally pleased to adapt his commands not only to our Eternal, but Temporal concerns, for knowing the impatience of our nature, that we love not to depend wholly upon reversions, he hath been pleased to put somewhat of present gust and relish upon every part of duty This might be evinced distinctly through the whole Codex of Christian Precepts, his Yoke is an easy, nay •...racious Yoke; his burden, a light burden, Mat. •...1. 28. and from this general ground, I may have Warrant sufficient to affirm the like of •...his particular I am now upon. But it may be yet more clearly evinced, by reflecting on the •...veral improvements of this Talent, which have been mentioned, as the Duty of all those that possess it.

25. And first, for that of an acute and elevated Understanding, I need appeal no further then to common Vote, to have that pronounced a very desirable thing, it being hard •...o pick out a man of such an avowed brutality, that will own the despising it; even those who will be at no pains to acquire, will yet profess to esteem it, and we may believe them •...n earnest, if from no other argument, yet from this, that every man affects the reputation of being Wise, is pleased when he succeeds in that aim, and on the contrary is not more troubled and discomfited at anything, then to be taxed of Ignorance or Error. If any shall deny this, 〈◇〉 shall suspend his confutation, till somebody reproach him with folly, and then from the displeasure he finds in himself, leave him to conclude his own value of Wisdom; and indeed why do good men look upon a fool with so much pity, and ill men with so much scorn, if knowledge be not both a Felicity and a Credit. Nor is this the sentence only of the vulgar who usually admire those things most, from which they stand at the greatest distance, but especially of the more discerning sort of men who from every taste they have had of it, have had their appetites so raised, that they have insatiably thirsted after the fuller draughts, that made so many of the old Philosophers renounce the enjoyment of those sensual Pleasures, that offered themselves, to go in quest after this one transcendent delight, and Solomon to present this in his election before Riches and Honor the two principal parts of worldly splendor to the rectitude of which choice God himself bears Testimony. And now if this be in itself so valuable, so ravishing a thing, shall its being here connected with duty, prove such an alloy, as to deprive it of all the gust; certainly if it do, it must argue the palate very perverse and distempered; for to all other, that one consideration would give a relish and flavor to the dryest, the most unpleasant undertaking: The conscience that I am now employed as I ought is such a refreshment as is able to sweeten the severest labor, yea the greatest suffering; shame is a thing to which human nature hath an innate abhorrence, yet that Apostles made it matter of joy, when it befell them for Christ's sake. Acts 5. 41. and shall this blessed Copy of theirs be transformed instead of transcribed; shall those who have not so much Christian patience, as to bear the slightest reproach for him, have yet so much unchristian stupidity, as to endure the greatest opposition to him; choose rather to be ignorant, when 'tis both their sin and shame, •...hen wise, when 'tis their duty and reward, •...vert St. Paul's choice, and be fools against Christ, as he owns to be for him: If there be •...ny such Antipodes in our clime, their unha•...iness will yet serve to illustrate what they •...fuse to partake of, viz. the felicity of having performed this part of duty in the improvement of the understanding.

26. In the next place the regularitie of the •...ill is extremely both amiable and profitable, for that being an uncontrollable faculty, •...f it be wrong set, what torrents of mischief •...nd confusion does it let in; if in all its con•...eptions it permit the sensual appetite to lay, •...ke Jacob, its pilled rods before it, all its births will be ring-straked, speckled and spotted. The •...uinousness of a perverse will is so generally understood, that there is nothing renders a man •...ven in common account more miserable and •...plored; he whose Will runs counter to his Reason, every man is Astrologer enough to •...ead his destiny, and presage his destruction. And by the undecent and pernicious effects of <math>\langle \diamond \rangle</math> disordered, we may make an estimate of the beauty and advantage of a rectified Will; the •...ormer, like a vicious improvident Governor, exposes his Territories to a deluge, first of luxury, and then of ruin, but this latter like a virtuous and prudent Prince, at once secures the innocence, and felicity of his Subjects. Indeed it is this alone, that really and effectively gives us the preeminence above beasts, they have choices as well as we, and they have affections, but wanting the higher principle of reason, their choices are necessarily determined by their affections; now if we who have both, are guided only by the latter, wherein does our state differ from theirs, save only that our liberty makes us guilty, whereas their necessity leaves them innocent. I presume I need say no more, to evince the happiness of a well ordered will, since none can contest it, but he must tacitly confess himself weary of his human nature, and emulous, not of a greater dignity, but of a degradation to tha•... of the Bruits.

27. And as much may be said concerning the Affections, which if they be not curb•... and held in by the understanding, will have as free and uncontrolled a sway in men, as they have in mere animals, but with worse effects, by how much we have more objects to incite them; more instruments to actuate them than these have. If any man can b•... tempted to think this no unpleasant condition, let him yet further consider, that thi•... metamorphosis is not like the fancied transmigration of the soul, wherein it was supposed to assume the nature, and consequently the passions but of one beast alone, no, here is the whole Wilderness let loose upon a man, with all their contrary appetites perpetually combating one with another. He that hath the rapaciousness of a Wolf, may yet have the •...imorousness of an Hare, and so is racked between the desire of having, and the fear of suffering: He that hath the lust of a Goat, may yet have the intemperance of a Swine, and be distracted to which of the appetites to give up himself. He that hath the cruelty of a Tiger, may yet have the wiliness of the Fox, which will give him the pain of many irksome delays, in attending an advantageous opportunity; and so proportionably in others: And what can be more unsupportably uneasy, then to have these continual tumults within, to be in a state of hostility not only with other men, but with himself? or what can there need beyond this consideration, to recommend the contrary condition to us? The subduing these brutish Inclinations, is the introducing Peace into a Land, harrass'd and wasted with intestine War; and sure none need be told (at least in this Age) that that is a most ravishing pleasure: And I may with the same confidence appeal to the verdict of any who hath tried these two contrary states, and doubt not but he will from his experience confirm the most profuse and even Poetique declamation that can be made on this Theme.

28. All I shall add is, in a joint relation to this and the two former, by observing that illuminated Understandings, regulated Wills and Affections, make up a great part of the celestial happiness. The Angels of light would no longer have right to that title, without these, The spirits of just men made perfect, were improperly so styled, Heb. 12. 22. had they not received this accomplishment of their nature: And the greater degrees hereof we arrive to here, so much the more sensible anticipation have we of those divine joys. And sure thus to partake with Angels and Saints, is to be happy, and will be acknowledged so by all, whose value and wishes of a Mahometan Paradise render them not uncompetent to estimate these purer and refined pleasures.

29. If from hence we proceed to those outward effects, which are the results of these inward, we shall find they are all full of delight and satisfaction. Courtesie and friendliness of Behaviour does not only cast a glorious luster round about, attract the eyes and hearts of others, but it also reflects with cheerful and comfortable gleams upon ourselves: For, Man being designed by God for a sociable creature, hath such propensions and Inclinations put into him, as are proper to that end; and these are gratified and pleased, when we so demean ourselves, as may answer that intention, towards which nothing can be more necessary then this debonaire and gentle carriage, for that allures people to our conversation, whereas the contrary roughness frights and deters them, (the churlishness of a Nabal makes men they cannot speak to him, 1 Sam. 25. 17.) it gives a man part of Nebuchadnezzar's fate, separates him from among men, by forcing them to withdraw from him; and that the worst part of it too; the hairs like Eagles feathers, and the nails like birds claws, being much the lighter degree of the infliction, fit to pass for dress and ornament, compared with that more deforming disguise this rugged temper puts upon a man. And as on the one side, this morosity and sourness of humor is very uneasy, so on the other is that form of fawning and flattering compliance, which some call Civility: It obliges men in many circumstances to renounce their ease, their health, yea their understandings too, and keeps them in such constraint, that one may truly say, a less measure of self-denial would serve to constitute a man a good Christian, then an exact Courtier; whereas he that keeps himself in a just mean, neither drives away one sort of company, nor buys the other so dear: He has a standard measure, by which to dispence his Civilities, viz. The quality and worth of the persons; and confounds not himself with those more unjust and mutable rules of their expectations. So in the first of the instances he keeps himself a Man, whilst the other is in some respect a Beast; in the second he preserves himself a Freeman, whilst the other is a Slave: And sure I may refer it to any man's decision, which is the pleasanter state.

30. Next for the Words, 'tis not to be doubted but that calm and temperate Language has the advantage of that which is passionate and rageful; and that not only in respect of decency, but ease too; of which there needs no other testimony, then that visible perturbation and uneasiness observable in all who are under such a transportation. So in like manner, when the words are pertinent and weighty, they give not only more satisfaction to the hearer, but to the speaker also: This may be judged by the contrary displacencie men have at themselves, when they are conscious to have spoken impertinently or undecently. By satisfaction I mean not that vanity, which men too often affect of showing their parts, but a just and sober complacency, arising from the conscience of having regulated their discourse by the measures of a Wise man and a Christian, the having said that which may be of benefit, but cannot be of mischief to his auditors; And this surely is a much more real pleasure then any can be had in the contrary kind of dialect. If to this it be objected, that generally none are so much delighted with their own discourses, as they who talk the most vainly and absurdly: I answer, that even these are not pleased with the vanity and absurdity; their pleasure results from a mistake, supposing it to be the quite contrary. And this helps to evince, that solid and prudent speaking gives satisfaction, since even the shadow and fiction of it can be made to yield it.

31. Lastly, for the Imploiments, they surely must afford most of contentment, when they are most noble and excellent: They do so at the time, in the direct line, they having more of agreeableness to the nature and dignity of a man; but they do yet more so in the reflection, when a man looks back upon his day or week spent, and finds his business has been worthy of him, it exhilarates and revives him, enables him to pass his own, approbation on himself, and as it were to anticipate the Euge he shall one day receive from his great Master. But he that gives himself only the idle divertisements of a Child or sets to the baser drudgeries of Vice, cannot reflect without confusion: which is so well understood by such persons, that they are fain to take sanctuary in a total Inconsideration, never daring to ask themselves. What have I done? Which bears full testimony to the excellency and felicity of ingenuous Imploiments, since they that decline those, are forced also to decline themselves, grow out of their own acquaintance and knowledge.

32. And now what Objection can there lie against this duty, which is in all the parts of it so advantageous and eligible, that it becomes duty not only to God, but even to themselves, their own present interests and satisfaction. Shall Pleasure itself lose its nature, adopt the properties of its direct contrary, and become irksome and abhorred, only because 'tis twisted with Obedience? Is there so perfect an antipathy between God and them, that 'tis impossible they should have the same objects of delight? or can no Joyes have any taste with them, that are not the causes and forerunners of eternal sorrows? This were such a degree of perverseness, as common charity bids me no•... to expect; and I see not what else can evacuate•... the pleasure that attends the improvement of this talent of Education.

33. After all this, I foresee it not impossible that some may plead an exemption from th•... Obligation, by affirming they want the ground of it, that they never had this Education. I am not willing to fancy there have been so many unjust and un•...ind Parents as may qualify any considerable number of Gentlemen for this plea: But to those few that can really make it, I shall not thicke the foregoing Discourse wholly impertinent; for•... by showing them the advantages of what they say they thus want, it may incite them (not to murmur•... at the negligence of their Parents, but) to attempt the repairing of it by becoming the•... own Guardians, putting themselves into Discipline, and by the strict Laws of Reason governing and restraining these Passions, which by the liberty of their Breeding have got them by this means supplying to themselves the first part of Education: And the like may certainly be done for the latter also, if they will but deposit that common error, of thinking it more manly to be ignorant than to learn, and be content to put themselves in a course of Erudition, which a man may do for himself in his Cloister, as well as a Tutor may do for his Disciple in a School; and though he want many of those advantages the other hath, yet 'tis possible they may be in a good degree supplied by that industry and desire, which all those are supposed to have, who are thus their own Pupils; And there want not instances of the success of them who have thus attempted, but I confess there are too few examples of the attempt, men being too apt to sit down contentedly under this want; whereas let the same persons have an entailed Estate alienated from them by any act of their Fathers, they are not then so come, but will struggle to the death to recover their rights; Yet certainly an Ingenuous Education is as properly the Birthright of a Gentleman, as any the most firmly settled Inheritance can be: Why should they then acquiesce in that so injurious an Alienation, and not seek by all endeavors of their own to retrieve this so precious a Possession?

SECT. V. Of the second Advantage, Wealth.

1. The second advantage we are to consider is that of Wealth, which that it is a blessing will I know readily be assented to by all, men's desires and earnest pursuits after it sufficiently evidencing the general esteem is had of it. Yet though the Conclusion be right, it is to be doubted many infer it not upon due Premises. 'Tis not Riches simply considered, that are the felicity, much less those luxuries, to which they are often made to minister; but they are like to a fertile ground, which if left without culture, none bears so rank weeds, but if rightly husbanded yields abundant profit; and thus to manage and improve them is not only the Interest, but the Duty of all those to whom God hath committed them, this being the one designed advantage, for which they were entrusted to them.

2. Several improvements there are, of which they are capable; but before I proceed to them, I must mention one part of duty, as fundamental to all the rest. And that is the well husbanding of them, not in a figurative, but real sense, the having such a provident care of those goods, and possessions, wherewith God hath blest a Man, as may secure them from that Consumption, to which carelessness and sloth will infallibly betray them. This surely is obligatory in many respects. First, in Thankfulness (I had almost said civility) to God, who having dispenc'd them as a liberality 'tis ingratitude, yea affront to give them no regard. Secondly, in Justice to a man's posterity: He that has received a fair Inheritance from his Ancestors, if he suffer his supine negligence to cut off the Entaile, he defrauds those that were to have succeeded him in it, and becomes that troublers of his own house, to whom Solomon, Prov. 11. 29. assigns no other Inheritance but the Wind, which is indeed all such a person is like to derive upon his issue, the common air being oftentimes their only patrimony. Thirdly, in order to all those ends to which Wealth was designed by God, which depend on this, as accidents on their subjects, and so are all at once evacuated and nulled by the dissipating of that wherein they are founded▪ All which considerations, do naturally enforce upon men the necessity of a prudent managery.

3. This being supposed, and the person having, as in our Law-forms is usual, covenanted to stand seised of the Estate, let us now see what are the proper uses, to which it is to be limited. In the first place, we may rank that of Contentedness in his portion; which though to one that is set to wrestle with want it might seem a hard precept, yet to him that flows with abundance it might be thought rather a needless then difficult injunction, if experience did not testify, that contentment is oftentimes as great a stranger in Palaces as Cottages.

4. Of this excellent both virtue and felicity, there are two parts, the one a cheerful enjoyment of so much of his Wealth, as may decently (I say not vainly) support him in that quality wherein he is placed: God does not make Rich men such mere Conduit-pipes of Wealth, that they must pass all, without retaining anything themselves; but rather like the Earth, which though she conveys the springs through her veins, yet is allowed to suck in so much, as may give her a competent refreshment; and he that does this moderately, and with a thankful reflection on that liberal Providence, which thus gives him all things richly to enjoy, 1 Tim. 6. 17▪ falsifies no part of his trust, nor abuses his stewardship, this being as it were the allowed sees of his place, a pension allotted him by the bounty of his Lord.

5. The other part of contentment is that, by which the desires are terminated within the bounds of his own possessions; and not suffered to range wildly into other men's, like Ahab's, into Naboth's vineyard, using their Wealth, as Anglers do their Fish, to bait hooks for more, by making it an Instrument of extorting from others; which is so great a guilt, that it nearly concerns them to secure themselves against it, by a perfect satisfaction in what is properly their own. Nay even in what is said, there is caution to be had, that there be not too eager and vehement endeavors of multiplying it, and that not only by an unlawful commixture with other men's, which is the sin either of oppression or fraud, but even from its own stock, for that may be covetousness, and is surely a direct opposition to the divine dispensation. For when God hath given a man a full fortune, and by that manumitted him from those carkings and sollicitudes to which needier persons are exposed, for him to make it his grand business to project how he may add to that heap, or in the Prophets phrase lade himself with thick clay, Hab. 2. 6. what is it but the degrading and •...ulling himself from that Sphere wherein God hath placed him, a voluntary sale of himself to the Gallies or Mines? In this respect therefore I may not unaptly apply that exhortation which the Apostle makes in another, •...all. 5. 1. Stand fast in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free. Let not him whom God hath by a gracious and peculiar providence exempted from this meaner servitude; and vassalage to the world, relinquish that so valuable a privilege, give up his ear to be bored by Mamm•...n, when God proclaims ⟨◇⟩ Jubily. Yet 'tis possible the quality of some men's estates may be such, that they may be capable of advancement by a moderate an•... easy Industry, such as may no way diver•... them from more excellent Imploiments, b•... may rather be a recreation then a toil: An•... in that case I know no obligation lies on the•... so to defy an Improvement, as not to choose ⟨◇⟩ profitable, before an expensive divertisement to spend those vacant hours upon that, which remain by way of overplus from more worthy designs and entertainments. But the perpetua... follicitous pursuit after more wealth, is certainly a culpable inordinacie, as being inconsistent with that contentment and acquiescence which is the duty of every man for whom God hath thus liberally provided, and such as wi... besides be likely to undermine another main part of his obligation.

6. Such in the next place we are to account the Charitable dispensing of his store, to supply the indigencies of wanting persons; which surely is to be looked on as the grand and mo... considerable end of his receipts. God, who ‹◊› the common Friend, as well as Father of ‹◊› men, is not to be imagined so partial, as ‹◊› provide pomps and luxuries for some, and ‹◊› the mean time leave others destitute of the necessary supports of life; yet if we look ‹◊› deeper then the visible portions of Poor and Rich, there is no evidence of the contrary. But when we examine upon what Conditions and Proviso's that Abundance is conveyed, we shall have no temptation so to asperse or charge God foolishly: For though he have not dispensed so immediatly to the Poor, yet he gives them as it were Bills of Assignment upon the plenty of the Rich, a right to be supplied by them: so that the difference seems to be only that of an elder, and younger brethren; the Elder usually carries the bulk of the Estate, but then that is charged with provisions for the younger; and if the quantity of those be not distinctly expressed, but left indefinitely, that act of Trust in the Father lays the greater obligation on him, not to deceive it by too mean and scanty a distribution; for now himself is become a Father to them, and therefore should proportion his bounty by the tenderness and bowels of that most affectionate relation. And this may not improperly be deemed one reason, why among such multitudes of commands of Charity in the Gospel, there is yet none that expressly allots the proportion of our Alms, that by this act of confidence, as it were, men might be obliged to the higher liberality: And he that shall make this incentive to it, a pretence to excuse the want of it, is sure a most criminous perverter of the Divine intention, treacherously countermining God's sacred arts, as if 'twere not enough to rebel, unless in a further contempt he assaulted him with his own weapons. Certainly God never designed Lazarus's portion should be made up only of the Crumbs from the table; For though indeed Dives is taxed that he gave him not them yet if he had, such a dole would sure never have rescued him from the place of torment. He who rests in a Rich man's bosom in Heaven, is to have some proportionable treatment from those on Earth, some more hospitable reception then a lying at the gate some better Surgeons then Dogs to cure his sores; and those that refuse it him, must be presumed to contemn not only the Lazarus, but the Abraham, yea the Heaven too that receives him, since that which qualifies him for an admittance there, is not able to recommend him to their least regard.

7. I shall not attempt to proportion men's Charities, since God hath not; yet there are some general measures to be made to bound them on the sinking side, that they fall not to too scandalous a lowness; which having been done already by a better Pen, I shall refer the Reader thither. But those yet leave men's Compassions full scope to grow up to what greater height God's grace and men's exigencies shall advance them: And surely the latter may sometimes be such, that it will become every Rich man not only to rifle his coffers, pour out whatsoever his superfluites have there ammassed, but also to defalk much of his own accustomed enjoyments, cause the Razor to pass even upon his whole Equipage, to cut off all excrescencies, all exuberant expenses, that so the stream may run the fuller in that one channel which God's providence thus cuts out for it. Whether this may not be a proper season for it, I leave every considering person to judge At the present I shall beseech every man to whom God hath given wealth, sadly to ponder how scandalous a thing it will be for him who has been the Object of so great Bounty, to decline the being an Agent in any; to discover himself to have sucked in nothing of the virtue, amidst such an affluence of the commodities; and to defy the example of that Liberality, by whose effects he lives. But withal let him consider the danger of it also, how dreadful a guilt (and consequently vengeance) he draws upon himself, if he shall defeat this so main end of his receipts. It is indeed a complication of many crimes not only against man, but God also: I shall instance only in two, most generally decried, and yet most eminently contained in it, Unthankfulness, and Falsness.

8. God in his wisdom discerning that Equality of Conditions would breed confusion in the world, has ordered several states, designed some to Poverty, others to Riches; only annexing to the rich the care of the poor; yet that rather as an advantage, then a burden, a seed of more wealth both temporal and eternal. Now in this division of men, those on whom he hath caused the better lot to fall, can owe it to nothing but his gracious disposal; and therefore had been certainly obliged to submit to any the most difficult tasks he should have dispenc'd with it. But now that in his great indulgence he has so tempered the command, as to render it not an allay, but an enhancement of the mercy, he that gives it only a bare tastless compliance, betrays himself to want a just sense of it, but he that flatly resists it, is in the most transcendent degree, barbarously ingrate. Nay I think I might have laid the charge higher, and called it malice; for what beneath that can provoke a man thus to resist his duty and interest together?

9. Nor is this all, 'tis also the greatest Perfidiousness: Every rich man is, as I said before, God's Steward, and particularly entrusted to provide for the indigent parts of his family, such are the poor and needy. Now if he leave them destitute, and suffer either his riot or covetousness to feed upon their Portions, what more detestable falseness can be committed, not only in respect of them, whose right he thus invades, but of God also, whose trust he abuses? Many other enormities there are in Uncharitableness, which as so many misshapen limbs concur to the making up this deformed Monster; but I shall suppose it sufficient to have pointed out these two, which being the most profestly contrary to ingenuity, I must hope will carry a very averting appearance •...o those who so especially pretend to that quality.

10. To this positive part of duty, the being •...ich in good works, we find the Apostle connects ⟨◇⟩ negative. 1 Tim. 6. 17. Charge them that •...e rich in this world that they be not high-minded, •...or trust in uncertain riches: And we need not resort to implicit faith in the Author, to persuade us of the great propriety and fitness of these cautions; 'tis too evident that Pride and Confidence are diseases, that usually breed in •...ull and opulent fortunes, and as they spring from the same root, so do they, like neighboring branches, mutually shelter, and support one another. He that is high-minded, abhors the submission of any foreign dependence, and therefore gladly anchors on anything he •...an call his own; and thinking his wealth most properly so, he has as great an aptness, as holy Job expresses an aversion, to make gold his •...pe, and to say to the fine gold, thou art my confidence, Job. 31. 24. On the other side, he that trusts in his Wealth, is by that fortified in his pride. It is Aristotle's observation, that wealth makes contumelious and insolent; which I presume lie infers not only from experience, but reason also; for the groundwork of humility being the sense of impotence and defect, he that assumes a self sufficiency, undermines that foundation, and instead of it lays the Basis of the quite contrary temper, all haughtiness and elation of mind. A memorable, example of this we have in the insolent reflections of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 4. 30. which had withal so dismal a consequent, as me thinks should like Lots wife remain a perpetual monument to deter others from all approaches towards the like vanity.

11. And certainly it is a most important concernment of rich men, to fence themselves against this double temptation; to which purpose they can hardly find a more complete armor, then what they may borrow from one short sentence of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 4. 7. What hast th•... that thou hast not received? Let them look on themselves as mere receivers, and then with what pretence can they pride themselves in that wherein they are barely passive; Nay indeed if it be thoroughly scann'd, these receipts imply cause rather of shame then boasting; the being filled from another's hand, is a sure argument (and tacit reproach) of a natural and original emptiness; and if God have dealt, so liberally with them, they may collect 'tis in compliance not with their merits, but infirmities; his having made them rich is a strong presumption, he saw them not prepared to be innocently poor: And sure Pride must be a subtle Alchemist, that can hence extract matter of vanity, and might with equal logic have persuaded the Jews to glory in those indulgences, which were granted them only for the hardness of their hearts.

12. In like manner if they reflect on their riches as received, it renders them also a most unfit object of trust; for if they were given, they may also be taken away. We hold all by that old tenure, which the Lawyers style Alodium, because it is from none but God; and his gifts (of this kind at least) are never so absolute, as to exclude power of revocation. He then that enjoys a thing not upon right but bounty, must ask his benefactor how far he is to presume on it: And if they would do so in this case, they would soon be resolved how little confidence were to be reposed in Wealth. They may hear God the great Patron tell them by Solomon, that riches make themselves wings and fly away as an eagle, Pro. 23. 5. by Christ, that the Treasures which they lay up here are liable to the Moth and r•...st, and Thieves; and by the Apostle, that they are uncertain riches. Nay indeed if they would but ask themselves their own daily experience and observation, that would bear the same testimony; Every day almost gives some renewed instance of it. What multitudes of accidents are there to which men's goods are liable? a rough Wind, a tempestuous Sea sinks at once the Merchant and his ship; an ill season, a hungry soil eats out the Husbandman; and they who run not either of these hazards, those whom neither the water nor the earth swallow up, a fire may yet consume. And can there any security be fanci'd in that wealth, which is thus a prey to each element single, and yet more often to them united in man, to whose frauds or violences more have owed their impoverishing, then to any of the former accidents. And now what greater infatuation can there be, then to place a trust on that which is so fleeting and unsteady, to lean on a broken reed, or in Solemons phrase to set ones eyes upon that which is not?

13. But if by an impossible supposition, we should imagine Riches to be as Permanent, as they are indeed transitory, yet unless they had as well Strength as constancy, they could with no reason be depended on. He that stays by his friend to the last minute, if he have no power to assist him, is only a spectator, not a reliever of his sufferings: And alas, how many miseries are men subject to, in which wealth can give them no aid! Is a man afflicted in his body with pain, the Indies are not a competent price for a minutes ease, an hours sleep; Is he persecuted in his Name with reproach, 'tis not whole Ingots of gold that will stop the mouth of Fame, nay oftentimes the obloquy is itself merely the progeny of his wealth, that breeding envy, and envy detraction. But if the sore lie yet deeper. if it be the Soul that suffers, that is yet farther removed from possibility of relief this way; If it suffer as a slave under the dominion of sin, no treasure can redeem from that vassalage: Wealth does indeed too often by administering temptations strengthen those chains, but it cannot break them, as appears too evidently by the number of such rich bondmen. If it groan under the guilt of sin, labor under the terrors of an accusing Conscience, alas gold is no balm to a wounded spirit: the luxuries which that has supported may help to pierce, but it has no power to heal. Or lastly, if the soul fall finally under the punishment of sin, there is no commuting that penance, buying off that smart; Riches abused may indeed swell the accompt, and multiply the stripes, but they can never bribe the remission of any. The Wiseman hath assured us this, Pro. II. 4. Riches profit not in the day of wrath. Nor does this carry any opposition to the council of our Savior Luke 16. 9. of making friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness; for he refers not there to any natural or inherent property of riches, but only to that extrinsic and accidental advantage may be made of them, proportionably to what was said before of the unjust Steward whose dexterous managery was it that rendered his Lord's debts so useful to him, not that they had any proper innate virtue to secure him from the necessity either of begging or diging; and therefore we see Christ's words run not in an Annunciative, but an exhortatory style, He tells us not that Mammon shall make us friends, but excites us to make that our own care, and by a prudent disposeure to make it subservient to an end above its native efficacy; But all this is sure very reconcilable with that natural impotency we have observed in it: wealth charitably disposed may have excellent effects, but yet those are to be ascribed to the charity, not the wealth, which still remains in its own essence the same unactive lump in the Chest that it was in the Mine, like the heathen Deities unable to protect its most zealous Idolaters; as a further instance whereof I may add that which will Sound very like riddle, That riches cannot deliver even from present Want; which yet is demonstrably true in all those rich Misers, whose bellies are lank, while their coffers are full, a sort of Tantalized creatures, not peculiar only to this latter age, for we find them described by Solomon, Ecclesiastes 6. 2. A man to whom God hath given riches, wealth and honor, so that he wanteth nothing for his soul of all that he desireth, yet God giveth him not power to eat thereof. So insignificant a thing is wealth, that without the addition of a new power it enables him not to receive the least benefit from it.

14. When all this is considered, what is there in wealth that can invite the least confidence, since it appears so utterly unable to secure men in their most important interests, nay to do that which it most immediately and most colourably pretends to, the keeping them from want. And therefore he that will not run himself upon that sad defeat of being disappointed in his trusts, failed in his greatest exigence, must look out for some firmer ground whereon to build. But alas, our soil affords it not: Al here below was long since pronounced by one that wanted neither wisdom nor experience, to be Vanity; such mutations and vicissitudes attend all sublunary things, that he that attempts to erect any durable satisfaction on them, outdoes the folly of that absurd architect Christ mentions, and builds not on the sand, but water; and in this sense the world is still under a deluge, not so much dry ground, as where a dove may rest her foot.

15. We are then driven by way of necessary refuge, to that which should be our voluntary choice, to come home to the Ark to shelter ourselves under his wings, where alone we may securely rest, and according to the advice which the Apostle subjoins to these cautions, to trust in the living God. And to do this amidst all the seducements of Wealth, to see through all those mists which the fumes of Plenty raise, and whilst they enjoy the gift, to confide only in the Giver, is indispensably the duty, and should be the care of everyone, to whom S. Paul directs this charge, All that are rich in this world.

16. And such in the last place are to take notice of another branch of their obligation, and that is to use that advantage which their Wealth gives them, towards the exercise of Temperance; which indeed can never be known to be truly such, but when there are opportunities and temptations to the contrary. He that hath nothing wherewith to maintain a Riot, leaves it doubtful both to others and himself, whether his Abstinences be the effects of Poverty or Temper; but he that has all the suel for Luxury, and yet permits it not to kindle, he approves his Sobriety to be indeed his Choice, not his fate. And this is a most excellent privilege of Wealth; and though 'tis to be doubted it scarce finds room in most of our Catalogues, yet certainly it merits a principal place, as being much the greatest of all those, which reflect only upon the Person himself. This resisting of Temptations, is truly that Heroique courage worthy of those that pretend to Honor, fit to denominate...a Gallant man: I wish those who seek that reputation by many rash and unwarrantable Adventures, would here entertain their youthful Ardors, this being a Field where they may be assured never to want Combatants. One while Gluttony presents itself, armed with the allurements of a full and delicate Table; and though one would think him but a despicable Assailant, that has only the Kitchen for his armory, yet experience shows us, those edgless weapons may vie with the keenest, for the mortalness of their effects. At another time Drunkenness sends a Challenge by delicious Liquor, cheerful and diverting Company, and that not without menace of infamy to him, who shall own so much religious cowardice, as to fear to hazard his Sobriety in the encounter. Sometimes again Lust attacks him with the piercing darts, the killing glances of a prostitute Beauty. In the mean time Pride, the most fly and treacherous of all the rest, is perpetually laying ambushes for him in the adorations of his Flatterers, the vanity of his Attire, and innumerable kinds of Excesses. And now what Knight-Errant would wish for more Encounters? or why should men range abroad to invite Quarrels, whilst they tamely suffer such Troops of enemies to bid them daily defiance? 'Tis, they say, a Maxim among the Swordmen, That he that has once been baffled, is ever after an incompetent Challenger: I wish it might have this one sober application, That men would suspend all other Duels, till they have righted themselves on their Vices, and by some signal Conquests redeemed themselves from that obloquy and defamation, which these mean, yet insulting Adversaries have exposed them to.

17. Having shown what uses are duly to be made of Wealth, let us now look back, and consider whether any of them be ordinarily discernible in Practice. And here we shall meet with one sort of men, who stumble at the very threshold, that fail in that first part of duty, on which all the rest depend: I mean those who by a supine negligence suffer their Estates to molder and consume insensibly, for want of an easy inspection and oversight. Of such as these former Ages have afforded instances, and doubtless the present also, though the number of the luxurious wasters do now so overwhelm them, that they are the less discernible. And though this seem to be the effect only of sloth, yet certainly there are other concurrents to it, generally these two: First such an overweening of their wealth, that they think it Inexhaustible; And secondly an opinion that it is a mean and peasantly thing for a Gentleman to give himself the trouble of looking after his fortune. The motives are too ridiculous to deserve a confutation; but in the mean time it cannot but extort pity, to see Families ruined by such vain whimsies: And what tolerable account can such a Parent give to his beggar'd Offspring, to whom 'tis very likely he may propagate the pride and sloth which made the mere managery of an Estate too hard for him, and yet withal bequeaths them the sadder toil of getting one? Nay, what account can he give to God, from whom he received it, in order to several ends, if he thus at once defeat them all? 'Twas a Command to the Jews, that they should not cut down Fruit-trees, though it were for so necessary a use as to advance a Siege, Deut. 20: 19. But this is the hewing down that Stock, from which so much good Fruit should spring, and that without any pretence either of necessity or reason.

18 Our next view will present us with another sort of person, who as much transgresses the duty of Contentedness in both the parts of it. 'Tis no prodigy to see men, whom God hath afforded the portion of the rich, scarce to allow themselves that of the poor; so letting their eye be evil even to themselves, because God's is good. The Egyptians were such jealous Reverers of those Creatures which they worshipped, that he that violated them was in danger of stoning, Ex. 8. 26. So these men who have set up their Wealth for their God, pay it so much veneration, that as they are impatient to have it invaded by others, so they are afraid to offer the least violence to it themselves; they have Inshrined it to receive their adorations, and it is now become sacrilege (indeed the only one they scruple) to debase it to the supply of their necessities: They are strange austerities which the Votaries of this Deity will endure, even beyond the mortifications of the most rigid Ascetick, their whole lives are a perpetual contradiction to all the appetites of Nature; yet alas, that infers here no compliance with those of Grace, but as if they meant to set up a Third party in the world, they equally oppose these. And now he that thus oppresses himself, no wonder if he do the like to others, if he extort the utmost that either power or fraud can wring from any. And that this work may not be retarded, he is provided of variety of instruments for it. Sometimes Bribery must give him a legal color to rob his neighbor; or if a Witness prove a better pennyworth than the Judge, Subornation shall do the business. Sometimes Extortion shall prey upon a needy Creditor, and that not only with the flower gnawings of the Canker, but with the more ravenous devourings of the Vulture. Sometimes the Rack is brought out, and a poor Tenant fastened on it, and there so strained and distorted, that he can never knit again to any competent subsistence. Sometimes again a poor neighboring Prodigal shall be spurred on to farther riot, fed with money, that so by a forfeited Mortgage he may seize on his Estate. In a word, 'twere endless to reckon up all the engines of rapine which this greedy Invader hath in his magazine; and of such a one I presume every man will pronounce, that he notoriously violates the precept of Contentedness.

19. But though this be the grossest, yet is he not the only Transgressor; there is also another more plausible sort, who though they do not thus seek to increase their wealth at other men's costs, yet do it too much at their own; whose Brains are mere forges of Projects, perpetually hammering out some new Contrivance for gain, that continually travel in birth of some fresh Improvement, suffer all the pangs and throws of a carking solicitude in pursuit of it. I know this piece of Covetousness hath better luck than the rest, and passes for a creditable thing, under the specious name of Good husbandry; but sure if it be broughtly penetrated, it will appear no less opposite to Contentment than the former. Nor can that guilt be evaded by those that say, they seek to advance their Fortunes, not out of the miser's design of hoarding up, but out of the more generous purpose of living more splendidly; for sure he that covets more to spend, <math>\langle \diamond \rangle</math> as little contented in his portion, as he that covets more to lay up; he that thinks his Table too scanty, his equipage too low, is as far from being satisfied, as he that thinks his land too little, his bag too empty; so that 'tis apparent these arrows come out of the same quiver, though they be shot at several marks

20. And between both these motives of grieving, no wonder if the duty of Alms giving were crowded into a very narrow compass. That excellent virtue of Charity has indeed much of the Image and impress of Christ upon it, but the world has given it a further kind of conformity with him than he ever designed, its crucifixion between Covetousness and Luxury, being the counterpart of his hanging between the Thieves; there wants only one member of the parallel, the breaking the legs of these Malefactors, which God knows our Soldiers, may many Armies of them have not been able to do. The many instances these times have given of the sudden dissipation of men's idolized heaps, have not yet so discipline'd the Worldling, as to persuade him to lay up his treasure in heaven; and the loud calls of God to weeping and mourning and girding with sackcloth have most preposterously been echoed back with the louder noise of men's revellings, and wild jollities. And then they who thus despise the judgments of God, are very unlikely compassionate the miseries of men, and I do see there are many who thus answer the character of the unjust Judge, Luc. 18. that neither fear God nor regard man, nay that far outgo him in inexorableness of temper: he was to be wrought upon by importunity; but so petrified are these men's bowels, that no prayers nor tears can dissolve them. 'Tis a much easier task to dig Metal out of its native Mine, than to fetch it out of the covetous man's Coffers; the Earth, though she hide, yet she guards not her treasure, 'tis a... cessible to the industry of any that will sear... for it, but he like an Argus stands sentinel abo... his, and sounds an alarm upon the remot... appearance of a poor suppliant; with wh... jealousy does he eye any that he can but fan... to come upon that ungrateful errand, and th... how many arts has he to prevent the assaul... Thus totally have men forgot ...pon what terms their wealth was given them, ...nd thereby like miserable Chymists, extract ...oyson out of Cordials, a Curse out of a Blessing. Riches were designed by God to ...e subservient to that Compassion which he ...as implanted in human nature, but now ...hey are become the means of suppressing and ...radicating it; Rich men look upon poor, ...s if they were creatures of another species, ...hings wherein they were perfectly unconcer...ed. 'Tis Strada's fancy, that there is such a sympathy raised between two Needles touched by the same Loadstone, that persons at the greatest distance may by the consent of their motion maintain a correspondency: I shall not undertake for the truth of the Experiment, but however methinks 'tis matter of reproach to us, that these inanimate creatures should have so much observable accord, as to give pretence for such a conjecture, whilst men who have so many undoubted principles of union both from nature and grace, have quite extinguished all effects of them. That too many have so, there needs no other evidence then the many unsuccour'd extremities of the Poor: For how else can it become possible, that one rank of men should gluttonize, and another starve? that he that thinks it death to endure either the want or moderation of a Meal, should never consider what are the gripings of the still empty stomach; that he should without all regret see his own human nature pining and languishing in the person of his poor brother, whilst in himself 'tis oppressed with the quite contrary excesses, and might be relieved in both by a more equal distribution?

21. And now who can sufficiently deplore, the wants of the Poor, shall I say, or rather the inhumanity of the Rich! This surely is the sadder spectacle of the two; the one only suffers, the other sins; and that suffering too may end in eternal refreshment, whereas the other in endless torment. Lazarus rests in Abraham's bosom, when the uncharitable Glutton frie... in perpetual flames: And oh that this were thoroughly weighed, that they would consider that every degree of unmercifulness they show to others, reverts with a rebounded force upon themselves! Alas, 'tis not so much the poor man's body, as their own souls, that sue for their alms; And whenever they shut up their ...owels of compassion from the one, what do ...hey but <math>\langle \text{in non-Latin alphabet} \rangle</math> , seal up God's store...uses and treasuries from the other?

22. But I fear this of Illiberality may pass or a moderate crime in this Age, when so any are guilty of another so far transcending  $\langle \diamond \rangle$ . For do we not see divers, who instead of bating their Excesses to relieve the Poor, do maintain their Riot upon them? If the desperate Debts of poor Tradesmen were examined,  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  doubt not this would appear a sad truth; 'tis become so fashionable a thing to run into cores, and so unfashionable to pay them, that e is scarce thought well bred, that has not bankrupted one at least of each Trade he deals with: Their only care is to get credulous Merchants, who so long as they trust stoutly shall have fair words, but if once their faith ail, then, as if the Solifidian doctrine had stretched itself into Traffique as well as Divinity, they are pronounced Reprobates, and as solicitously avoided as the Separatist shuns  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  person whom he is pleased to call carnal: Posterns and obscure passages are contrived, on purpose to escape them; so that a poor Creditor must give many days, nay months attendances, before he can so surprise a Gentleman, as to come but to ask his own; and then the best return he usually meets with, is some empty Promises, to bribe a delay; but sometimes he fares much worse, and as if 'twere a crime not to starve silently, he is reviled and reproached, and harsh and contumelious language become his only payment It has been received as a Maxim, That we are all kind to our own creatures: But this case shows 'tis no universal rule; for those who thus make poor men, are of all others the most barbarous to them in their poverty. But let those who thus shuffle off their Reckonings with men, remember that there will come a day, when they shall not be able to decline their Account to God; And with what horror and confusion must they appear at that Audit, when they shall be charged not only with the misspending their own estates, but other men's, the having added Robbery to unmercifulness?

23. If in the next place we shall reflect on the Apostles caution of not being high-minded or trusting in uncertain riches, we must turn to our Bibles to be satisfied there was ever any such charge given, there is so little of it to be read in men's practices. Humility is a plant, that is carefully weeded out of all rich grounds, accounted a mean degenerate quality, that like Treason attaints the blood, and sorfeits Nobility. Gentlemen, though they are for the most part very guiltless of the Pharisees abstinence, the fasting twice a week, do yet transcribe the worse part of his copy, the thinking they are not like other men; and believe it a justice they owe their birth to do so: They have mounted themselves aloft, and looking down from those pinacles of Honor, all below seem little and contemptible, creeping things of the earth, worms and no men. I am not so for confounding of Qualities, as to exact they should choose their Intimates and Companions out of the lowest rank; I know prudence as well as pride has drawn a Partition-wall between them (though perhaps the later has raised it to an unnecessary height) but I wish it might be remembered, that as the precept of Not eating Blood was designed not for its self, but as a hedge against Murder, so that just distance which order recommends between the Noble and the mean, is valuable only as a fence against base and ignoble practices, true greatness consisting in despising not the persons, but the vices of the vulgar; Yet here alas the sense is quite changed, and many who look the most fastidiously on the one, will yet mix freely with the other; and while they so are the highest in the opinion of their superiority, do yet stoop to the sordid bestialities of the most abject of men, Nay, indeed this lure does sometimes make many of them descend even from their punctilioes, and those who at another meeting must have looked for no other treatment but what St. James describes, Ia. 2. 3. stand thou there or fit here undermy foot-stool, shall in the rounds of good fellowship be equal with the best, such a Leveller is debauchery, that it takes off all distinctions. But in the mean time how great a shame is it, that such vicious motives shall have force enough to make them thus degrade themselves, when all the Engagements of Christianity are not able to do that which is much less to abate anything of those tumors those swelling conceits of their own greatness, or (in the Psalmist... phrase) to make them know themselves to be but Men.

24. Nor has the other branch of the caution any better success among them; 'Tis in many of them too discernible, that they place that trust in uncertain •...iches, which they should repose only in the living God, so making his gifts his rivals, and raising him a competitor even of his own bounty, For this we need no other ways of probation, then only to examine, whither it is, that in any case of difficulty or distress they make their earliest and most importunate addresses, for there we may conclude them to fix the greatest confidence. And I fear 'tis too apparent, that where wealth makes but any the slightest pretences, promises the least aid, though but remote, and at the second hand, it has most of their applications. Thus in case of Disease, they whose plenty enables them for the costlier methods of cure, is not their first resort thither, do not their Fees fly faster then their Prayers? and are they not much hastier to invite the Physician, then the Divine! Nay, indeed the latter is scarce ever admitted, till the former have forsaken them, a shrew'd indication, where their prime hopes are built; so again in any disastrous event, the first essay is whither money will heal the wound; He that is under the displeasure of a Superior, seeks to appease by presents or buys the friendship of a Blastus, Acts. 12. 20. to mediate for him; He that is brought before a Tribunal, endeavors with the same golden Engine to draw off his Prosecutor, to bend and incline his Judge; He whose Wealth makes him pursued as a desireable prey, expects his safety even from that which is the original of his danger; and as if like a Scorpion it alone could cure its own sting, tries whether a part will secure the whole. And in the mean time no attempt is made to call in God to their rescue, as if he were an idle unconcerned spectator of human affairs, or so inconsiderable an Ally, as not to be worth the care of engaging him on their side. Nay even in their last and dreadfulest danger, many seem not to quit their dependence on their wealth, some Testamentary charities must then do wonders for them, and pass for all those fruits of repentance, which should secure them from the wrath to come; Even those that have drunk the blood of the poor, suffered the most of it to incorporate into their Estates, think by disgorging some small part of it (which perhaps lies crude, not yet so digested) in a Legacy to ease their consciences, so adapting their restitutions to their rapines, only in this one respect, that those as well as these are of another man's goods; they never commencing, till death hath disseized them of all propriety, as if the iniquity of the Fathers were in this sense to be visited upon the Children. Thus their Wills become their only pass-port, to convey them to Abraham's bosom, and by thus cajoling the poor at parting, they trust to extinguish the clamors of all former oppressions, and in spite of Solomon will hope, that Riches shall profit in the day of wrath. It will not here be pertinent to inquire how many other objects of trust they have, which divert them from that one, to which the Apostle directs them. It may suffice in general to say, that none can be supposed indeed to trust on the living God, but those who by sincere piety qualify themselves for his protection; according to which measure 'tis to be feared many even of the fairest pretenders will be excluded.

25. If now we proceed to the last part of the Rich man's Duty, the exercise of Temperance, we may without an Augur divine the return of that Inquest; For it having formerly appeared, that they turn that stream which should flow in Charity, to make the fuller current for their Luxury, 'tis visible they are far from designing any self-denial. But if that inference were not proof enough of it, they daily give us ocular demonstrations: What studious provisions do they make for the flesh to fulfill the lusts thereof? Rom. 13. 14. Nature affords not Meat delicate enough for their palats, it must be adulterated with the costly mixtures of Art, before it can become Gentile nourishment; and in this they are arrived to such a niceness, that Cookery is become a very mysterious trade, the Kitchen has almost as many intricacies as the Schools. And the quantity of their meat is not less extravagant then the kind; One that did but examine their Bills of fare, would think the Dogs appetite were the epidemick disease among them, if he did not consider they had Eyes to be fed as well as bellies. Nor will they be so Ununiform, as not to have their Drink bear a full proportion with their Meat; and 'twere well if it did no more, that their Drinking had but those set hours of their Meals, that so there might be at least some intervals and pauses in their Debauches, whereas now many persons allow themselves no longer intermissions then may just qualify them for a new Excess; recover their wits only so far, as may put them in capacity of losing them again.

26. But besides these, there is another sort of provision for the flesh, of which they are no less solicitous, and which many buy in at very dear rates: The embraces of a Wife are as nauseous to them, as Manna to the Israelites; 'tis Variety they hunt after; and so they might have the Turks Sevaglio, they would not stick to take his Mahomitanism withal; Nay if that were as agreeable to their reason to believe, as to their inclinations to embrace, they would certainly reckon it a considerable part of the prize, as that which to the present possession superadds a liberal reversion of those brutish delights, and would think they had made a very commodious bargain, to have so exchanged the Christians present purity, and future heaven.

27. To all these excesses, that of their Apparel does perfectly correspond; so much cost, so much business goes to it, that one may almost as cheaply and easily rig out a Ship, as set out a Gentleman in his complete Equipage. How many Artificers go there to the peeing him up! He that should assign him one to each Limb, would much contract the number, which is indeed so great, that if it were computed 'twould be found it constituted most of the Trades in a Commonwealth. A strange disproportion, that the Little world should so much outvie the Greater; and a lively instance it is of the multiplying faculty of Vanity, that can improve Natures simple necessity of covering, to such an exorbitant excess, and has nursed up the first Fig-leaves to such a luxuriant growth, that the Hercynian Oaks which Mela tells such wonders of, are but a kind of Pigmyplant to them that thus overspread the world, and from covering of Shame, are grown to shadow and darken Reason itself, so creating a Moral nakedness, whilst they hide a Natural.

28. To all the rest we may add their Sports and Recreations, the expensiveness whereof is no way inferior to all the former: Gaming, like a Quicksand, swallows up a man in a moment; and how many such Wrecks have these latter Ages produced? Hawks, and Hounds, and Horses, &c. are somewhat slower devourers, yet as they are managed by some, tend much to the same end: So that methinks such men seem to make the same menace to their Estates, which Goliath did to David, 1 Sam. 17 44. I will give thee to the fowls of the air, and to the beasts of the field. Such vast numbers of them they have and those kept with such niceness and curiosity, as if they had a design to debauch the poor animals, and infect them with their luxury. 'Tis now no news in the literal sense, to have the Children's bread given to Dogs; and it may within a while be as •...ittle, to have not only their children, but themselves want it: For Prodigality is of the nature of the Viper, and eats out the bowels of that Wealth which gave it birth; and Actaeon's fate was both Emblem and Story, to be eaten up with his Dogs

29. We have seen now how much their Practice swerves from their Duty: Let us next a little consider, whether they might not be happier, if they were regulated by it. And first, a prudent oversight of their Estates is sure far from being such an oppressing burden as some are willing to fancy it: For if it be moderate, and such only I recommend, it is supposed to exclude all painful and disquieting sollicitudes, and then it becomes only of the nature of a Divertisement, helps them off with some of those spare hours, whose emptiness becomes their load, and which they would else be in pain, and probably at no small cost to dispose of. And I see not why it should not be full as pleasant at the instant, to talk of their own affairs, as of other men's, (which yet are the usual entertainment of those that neglect their own;) to take up Accompts at home, as Reckonings at the Tavern: And I am sure 'tis much more so in the consequences of it, as much as peace is above discord and tumult, plenty above indigence and necessity.

30. Next for Contentment, universal consent superadds the labor of proving that a happiness, it being unanimously accorded to be the Elixar and quintessence of all that pretends to that title; to be to all these outward things, as the soul is to the body, that which animates and inspirits them, without which they are but dead, yea noisome carcasses, pressures instead of enjoyments. This is the true Philosophers stone, that turns all it touches into gold; the poor man is Rich with it, and the Richest poor without it. Whoever therefore desires to improve his estate, let him begin his culture or husbandry upon his mind, plant there this Tree of life, the shade whereof will yield him a perpetual refreshment, 'twill make him always as Rich as he desires to be; and he certainly knows not what he asks, that demands more.

31. The next duty, that of Liberality, may perhaps be thought not to have so amiable an aspect; but it is only by those who look upon it through false Glasses: men generally consider it as a piece of spiritual rapine, an Engine framed by Divines to force open their Coffers, and plunder them without a War: but if they would but turn the right end of the perspective,

'twould then have a quite contrary appearance, they would discern that it is the means to multiply, not diminish their store, a more profitable way of usury, than any the greediest extortioner hath ever found out. 'Tis a lending to the Lord. Prov. 19. 17. who surely is the most solvent Debtor any can deal with, and one who never makes scanty retributions. This I am confident might be attested eventually true by all those who have attempted to make the experiment; the only prejudice that can lie against their Testimony is the paucity of those that have so attempted (and would to God men would conspire to solve that objection) for were all charitable persons summoned to give in their accounts, I doubt not it would appear their bounty had enriched not impoverished them I am sure I have met with several remarkable instances of it, but never yet with one to the contrary, and therefore if either reason or president may have force, he that considers but rightly his own temporal Interest, cannot but have appetite to this Duty, in respect of himself. And yet where there are any bowels, this is but a faint inducement compared with that which arises from the calamities of the persons to be relieved, The wants of the Poor are loud and passionate Orators, such as cannot miss to work upon any, on whom covetousness hath not first wrought the unhappy Metamorphosis, of turning them into stone; and these having once conveyed into a man's mind a compassionate regret, himself groans under that pressure, which he sees crushing the other, and then what can be more pleasant than by a seasonable charity to ease both. None doubts of the Receivers delight, but sure that is short of the Givers, by how much the interior sense is more subtle and acute than the exterior; would God those who make it their trade to hunt after pleasures, would try but this One piece of Epicureanism, and then I doubt not, they would acknowledge that all meat is insipid, compared with that, which they eat with the poor man's mouth; the most splendid apparel sordid and inglorious, in respect of that they were upon his back; and all pleasures and recreations joyless and uneasy, balanced with those transcendent delights, which attend the exercise of Christian liberality.

32. Nor have they in the next place any reason to suspect the Apostle treacherous to their present interest, when he seeks to dispoyle them of that either Pride, or confidence, which their riches are apt to create. For the former 'tis certain all haughty persons may very properly interrogate themselves in that form, we find Wis. 5. 8. What hath Pride profited us, or what good hath riches with our vaunting brought us? It would surely puzzle the most experienced man to define what there is in Pride, that can afford any felicity; The utmost that can be pretended is that it is a lively cheerful thing to have good thoughts of ones self, but he that can in earnest make this plea for Pride, does in justice owe as fair an encomium to Bedlam, for according to this measure that contains the happiest people, there being those, that are the most highly wrapped in the opinion of their own excellencies Yet sure we should judge him in good Election for the place, that should look upon it with appetite. But admit this might indeed pass for a pleasure, yet it is the parent of a far greater uneasiness, and like a carcass breeds a worm, that devours itself; For he that looks on himself with such reverence, exacts that all others should do so too, and when he fails in that aim (as none so frequently does, as the proud) what disquiets and impatiencies is he under, such as infinitely overwhelm all the pleasure of his vain complacencies; A little disrespect from Mordecai is able to evacuate all Haman's prosperity; such a cheat and impostor is Pride, that whilst it pretends to exalt, it debases whilst it elevates a man above others, it really subjects him to them, puts him in their power to torment and cruciate, and whilst it makes show of advancing, 'tis but in the same manner that the Rack extends the stature by dislocating the joints. And then I hope 'twill be no unfriendly office to persuade men, to keep themselves from that engine of pain, or to recommend to them such an humility of mind, as may preserve them in that security and composedness, which is fundamentally necessary to all true happiness.

33. The very same judgment is to be made of the other branch of the caution, the not trusting in uncertain riches, but in the living God, which is most visibly every man's present concernment, he that can entertain a doubt of it, let him but fall into the hands of some treacherous or but impotent person, that shall in some important affairs betray his trust, or deceive his hopes, and then let him tell me whether it be not a man's immediate and most pressing interest, to build his confidences on the rock, not on the sand. Nothing but the amazing exigencies of a sinking man, can excuse the folly of catching at reeds; but he that should deliberately elect such supporters, would be thought as mad, as he is sure to be miserable. Yet this is but the faint and imperfect emblem of him who rests upon his wealth, whereas on the other side he that shelters himself under the shadow of the Almighty, is possessed of a most inexpugnable fortress; for how can he fail of security, that has Omnipotence for his guard, or be deluded in his trusts, that depends on Truth itself? Let these so distant states be compared, and then sure I shall not need to anticipate any man's judgment, but may leave him to pronounce on which side his Interest, as well as Duty lies in this particular.

34. Lastly, Temperance also puts in her claim to Pleasure, which I presume those will be sure to resist, who place that wholly in the satisfaction of the sensual appetite; yet I believe one might take even these men in such a season, when they should be forced to give up their verdict for it. Come to the Glutton when he is laboring under the load of an overcharged stomach; to the Drunkard when his mornings qualm is revenging on him his last nights debauch; to the lustful person, when the torment of his bones admonish him of the sins of his flesh, and then ask them whether Temperance be not more pleasant than its contrary. I can scarce think the Devil has any such stout Confessors, but will then betray his cause. But this virtue is in itself too amiable to need any of these foils to illustrate it; the pleasure of subduing a lust, of denying an appetite, is not only nobler, but greater than any is to be had in the most transporting moment of satisfying them. Every man will call him a brute, that when an Enemy is in the field loses the opportunity of a glorious victory, and exposes himself to certain Captivity, rather than forsake his liquor, or other sordid pleasure. And this is just the decision of the present case, our lusts are our mortallest Enemies, and every time they assault us, 'tis in our choice either by resisting them to gain a signal conquest, or else by stooping to those despicable cures they hold out to us, to be vanquished by them. He that chooses the last, if he have any shadow of pleasure, 'tis only that of a Beast, (like a horse who though he hath indeed the satisfaction of receiving meat, yet he also takes the bridle, yea the whip too from the same hand) 'Tis the former only, that is the pleasure of a man, which I suppose sufficient to evince to which the difference belongs, for sure none can think

God hath been so unkind to his own image in human nature; as in the dispensation of felicity to assign the larger share to the Bruits. And therefore in this particular as well as the rest we may conclude, that he is not only the most pious but the most happy person, that makes the right uses of his wealth.

SECT. VI. Of the third Advantage, that of Time.

1. LET us now proceed to the third advantage, that of Time, which though men do often so industriously wast, as if it were rather a burden than an advantage, yet the differing estimates they make of it, when it is near expiring, the passionate Death-bed wishes of a few days reprieve, witness that it has a real value; For were it an empty useless thing, it would not then begin to appear considerable, when all other vanities grow in contempt with us. The unhappiness of it is, that men learn to prize it, as they do most other good things, rather by the want, than the enjoying, buy the skill of trading with the loss of the Talent, which should maintain the traffick, and then only come to account it a treasure, when they can no longer dispose it to any benefit; and that disposing alone is it that can render it truly valuable. It is therefore a most necessary providence to learn this art of improvement, this piece of spiritual husbandry, without which a man's self becomes that accursed soil, the Apostle mentions, Heb. 6. 8. whose end is to be burned. Let us therefore a while examine what are those employments of our Time, which may render it most fertile to our present comfort, and future accompt.

2. Every man says (though perhaps few consider) that our time here is but a prologue to Eternity else where, and that the condition of that eternity, whether happy or miserable, depends upon the well husbanding of this time; That therefore and that only can be the right managery of it, which tends to make our future estate as happy, as it is sure to be lasting. To this purpose God hath chalked us out some great lines of Duty, from whence so many lesser do arise, as will, if we will permit them, twist and wind themselves with every hour of our lives. And though these duties are in the kind of them obligatory to all conditions of men, yet frequenter Acts of them are expected from those, whose Qualities and fortunes gives them more vacancy from secular toyles.

3. For certainly it is not to be fancied, that God who has put an active principle into our nature, should industriously provide for the suppressing its operations in any, devote such a Select number of men, as an Hecatomb to be offered up to Idleness; and yet much less can it be thought, that he should so promote that iniquity, which he professes to hate, as to design them to the pursuits of that, Manumit them from labor, to leave them freer for vice. And if neither of these can be supposed, if their leisure were not indulged them either that they might do nothing, or do ill, there remains only a third end imaginable, and that is the doing good; (For as for Sports and Pastimes, the best of them come so near to Idleness, and the worst of them to Vice, as the one is not to be allowed any, so the other no considerable part of their time.) Now because none is good but one, that is God, Mar. 10. 18. we can take our measures of good actions only from his prescription; and so those which he has commended as such to Mankind in general, point out to this particular rank of men the nature of their Exercises, as their especial Vacancie and leisure does the higher degrees of them.

4. And first those of Piety towards God justly challenge a great share of their Time: For whereas God may seem to have limited and confined the poor man's zeal, by that rule of preferring mercy to themselves before sacrifice to him, he does by exempting the rich from those necessities tacitly require their devotion to swell up to some proportion with his bounty to them, who being freed from those weights wherewith others are clogged and encumbered, even nature itself suggests the expectation of their soaring higher; He has put them at a distance from the meaner cares and sollicitudes of life, as if he were jealous those might prove his rivals, and keep them from growing into a closer intimacie with himself. And shall this design of love be defeated? and when he has thus secured himself from one sort of Competitor, shall more and baser be sought out, every the triflingest and vilest Entertainment be courted to come and supplant him? This were indeed to answer that odious character of the Adulteress, Ezek. 16. 34. which was not solicited, but did solicit. And those that can make such unworthy and provoking returns to so endearing a kindness, evince themselves destitute not only of grace, but of all degrees of common good nature: For when he so projects for their familiarity and converse, what can be more inhumane and ingrate, then thus scornfully to decline it? Yet under this charge all those will certainly fall, who do not employ (nay devote) every day some considerable part of this their vacant time to the keeping up their intercourse with God, by Reading, Prayer, and Meditation.

5. In the next place, Themselves put in for a part: But here I mean not those brutish sensual selves, which have in many (like Pharaoh's lean kine) devoured the nobler and more excellent; but it is the more divine and sublimated part of them, on which their time is to be laid out; and here they can never want business, that being in several respects a very proper object of their diligence. For first, their Understandings, how clear and vigorous soever, attain not their height at once, are not like Adam created in a state of maturity and perfection, but like his degraded posterity make gradual motions towards it, advance by several steps and degrees of proficiencie; nor can we in this life ascend to such a Non ultra, as excludes a possibility of growth. So that no advantage of Education can supersede the use of After-industry, that being still able to make farther improvements, bring in new accessions to their Knowledge: And this is so inviting an entertainment, as may very reasonably expect their companies some hours of the day in their Studies.

6. But though this be a considerable, yet is it not the weightiest part of that care they owe themselves. For as the Soul considered in its Intellect, may thus become their Pupil, so in its Morals it has often need to be their Patient: For though in its Original institution it was perfectly pure and healthy, yet by inhabiting in this pesthouse the Flesh, it hath contracted much of its contagion; and by how much the more delicate and refined its composition is, so much the more mortal are the diseases to which it is subject; It will therefore require a close and wary attendance. A Physician that has a nice and tender Patient, must be very assiduous in his care, observant of all symptoms, watchful against all accidents. And so certainly should men be here; they should make daily observations how their ghostly strength increases or decays, what Humor most predominates, whether Choler boil up into rage, Phlegm freeze into sloth; whether the Sanguineness of their temper make them lustful, or the Melancholy revengeful, and accordingly apply their spiritual Purgatives, the Baths, or the Palaestra, prescribe rules of of Diet and Exercise: and doubtless whoever makes these daily strict inspections into himself, will by the inestimable benefit he receives from it, be taught how great a blessing his Time is, and how much a greater to have grace thus to employ it.

7. But though a Mans self be a Province wide enough to take up a good part of his time, yet must he not so ingross it, as to defraud his Neighbor, who has also a right to share in it. God having made man after his own Image has (as part of that) stamped upon him the Bounty and Communicativeness of his nature: And therefore when we live wholly to ourselves, we rase and deface that Impress; and when 'tis remembered that the heinousness even of Murder is by God pronounced to arise from the violation of His Image, Gen. 9. 6. parity of reason must conclude this no light guilt. Nor is it only our Goods we are to impart (for that were a very partial Transcript of that Bounty we are to imitate, which gives us so much besides) but in general whatever other Ability we have by which our neighbor may receive advantage; and so a man has as many employments of his time, as he either finds or can make opportunities of doing good to others. I say make; for sure since God hath constituted Love to our neighbor one of the fundamental laws to Mankind, we are not to look upon it only as an accident or casualty, but as a main and deliberate business of our lives; not refer it wholly to chance whether ever we shall do an act of this kind, or no, but industriously seek out and improve occasions. Thus we find the Liberality of our Blessed Lord represented to us in the parable of the great Supper, Luk. 14. 16. where there was not only liberal provisions made for such as would come in, but importunity used to draw them, particular invitations made to the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind; and when that brought not in Guests enow, the Highways and Hedges were to be ransacked, and a general Press, as it were, made of men, to receive not the Earnest-penny of Death, (which is usually the signification of our Pressmoney) but the Antepast of Eternal Life. Oh that all those who pretend to Greatness of Mind, would copy out this Munificence, that they would prevent men's desires, and invite them to come and be obliged by them. For want of this, many occasions of doing benefits are lost; the modesty of some, perhaps the pride of others, averts them from requesting those assistances they most need: It were therefore the noblest Study a Gentleman could entertain himself with, to search the various Wants of those within his sphere; but then he must be sure to do it with a candid design, the more opportunely to apply himself to their aid; he must not treacherously inquire, who wants knowledge, to deride, but instruct them; not hunt out a debauched person, to make him his Companion, but his Convert; not find out quarrels to foment, but compose them; in a word, not pry into other men's concernments, like a busy-body, but a Friend; not to comply with his own curiosity, but their need. And now he that pays a just Tribute of his Time to these three grand Duties, will (when the other dues to Nature, temporal Affairs, and necessary Civilities are deducted) not have much to sacrifice either to Idleness or Vice, but will rather think he wants Time than Business.

8. But alas, the full leisure they generally find for the direct contrary employments, witnesses too irrefragably that they are not thus taken up. It is true indeed, we find God often in their Mouths, but it is rather in Oaths, then Prayers; as if they meant their profanations should be the only testimony that they believed a Deity. How many are there such professed Votaries to Bacchus, That their Knees are reserved only for him, never to be bent but in drinking of Healths; that seem to have enacted to themselves the profaner part of Darius's Law, Dan. 6. 7. that of asking no P...tition of God, only herein out-vying him; that their's is for an indefinite, not limited time, who reckon saying of Prayers among those pedantick tasks of their childhood, which expire with the Rod and Ferula, and can never think fit to debase their more Manly state to it, unless perhaps a restless night may force them to call it in to supply the place of a more usual and pleasing Anodyne. Whether this be not the pitch of many Gentlemens Devotion, I appeal to any that observes their practice.

9. Nor have they much more to do in the Library, then the Oratory, unless it be stored with Romances: Any deeper sort of reading is as formidable to them, as the Mines or Galleys; nor do they without wonder look at those who can voluntarily set themselves to tug at those Oars: But Divinity is beyond all others under prejudice with them, decried not only as a crabbed, but ungentile study; so that upon pain of Reproach, none are to know more of it, then may just qualify them to deride it; or read the Bible to any other purpose, then to enable them to blaspheme God in his own style. If these men may be said at all to converse with God, it is in the same manner, that the Pharisees did with our Savior, with the insidious design of entangling him in his talk, Matth. 22. And sure the more time is thus spent, the worse.

10. Proportionably to this they acquit themselves of the other parts of this Duty; that time which they should bestow either in preventing or curing their spiritual Maladies, they lay out wholly in contracting or increasing them; they have made a most strict league with the Flesh, and like faithful Confederates they omit no endeavor to strengthen its Party, to supply it with fresh forces, the expense of their whole day is managed wholly in order to that end. Thus that they may be sure to keep their Lust high and vigorous, they give it a nourishing breakfast of Sloth in the morning, a full meal of Gluttony at noon, besides multitudes of collations in obscene Discourse and Fancies, all the day: And with these Auxiliaries, it need not doubt to maintain the Field against poor macerated Chastity. So again, lest Sobriety should happen to surprise them, and gain but the honor of one Day, how vigilant are they to give it the first assault? scarce a day that they draw not up in Battalia against it, and seldom miss giving it a total Rout; and if Sleep like a Mist befriend it to steal upon them in the morning again, yet that little Success is but a preparation to a more signal Defeat in the afternoon, which is with many, a time allotted wholly to these skirmishes; perhaps the chace followed all night, nay▪ pursued so far by some, till an habitual Sottishness save them the labor of these Quotidian Combats. Nor is their Pride so affronted, as to be forgot in the distribution of their time, a good scantling of it is cut out to its use; some in contriving and designing their Cloaths, and some in putting them on; some in admiring themselves, and some in projecting to be admired by others; some in hearing flatteries, and more in reflecting and ruminating upon them.

11. As for those broken parcels of Time, which are not thus devoted to these or some other set and solemn Sensualities, they are gleaned up by Sports and insignificant pastimes; nay, even some who abstain from the former, do yet so wholly abandon themselves to the latter, that their lives become utterly unprofitable. Under this number I have no intention to include all who allow themselves Recreations; I know some divertisement is so necessary both to the Body and Mind of a man, that if it keep within moderate bounds, it is but a just debt to himself, and cannot fall under any ill character; but that which is reprehensible in this matter is the excess and inordinacy of it, the making that a business, which should be but a diversion: And this we see too usual with many, who absurdly stretch this privilege of their Gentility, even till it break; pursue their sports of Hawking and Hunting, &c. so vehemently and assiduously, that ere they are aware, they adopt these their Callings; never considering that a Faulconer or Huntsman is indeed as mean a Vocation, as those they most despise. But whatever other pastimes of this nature any man suffers to usurp his time, he does in it extremely reproach himself, tacitly confesses, That he is unfit for generous and manly employments, and calls himself Child, while he thus trifles and plays away his days.

12. I know not whether I may rank the great and deep Gamesters in this File; for though the nature of their employment belong to it, yet there are such considerable ruinous effects of it, as seem to place it in the number of more serious Ills And indeed, though Custom hath called it Play, yet the many anxious fears and uneasy Commotions which usually attend it, evince the great impropriety of the Title, and would more reasonably have given it a name of the direct contrary importance. But as feigned names are commonly an art of concealing persons, so this Trade assumes the style of Divertisement, indeed to disguise its true original, which undoubtedly is Covetousness: For what imaginable cause can there be assigned, besides the desire of Winning, that should make men venture what they are so unwilling to loose? It is certain, he that plays for a Peece, has as much of the divertive part, as he that stakes a thousand; and were that all were designed, men need not, and certainly would not so profusely overbuy what offers itself at so much a cheaper rate. I know this is a motion men think too sordid to own, but would God they would once learn (in this better sense) to revere themselves as well as others, and despise to be prevailed on by what they are ashamed to avow: But the event ordinarily speaks it as great a Folly, as Meanness, of which there are too many sad instances in the shipwrecked Fortunes of these Adventurers; and indeed there is nothing wonderful in it, but that men will be so mad as to run the hazard: For that being supposed, it is not at all strange to see them sink under it; for a man has here to deal not with Chance alone (which yet were but a tickle bottom to imbarck in) but with such combinations of Deceit, that even good Fortune itself will not secure him; so that he that has not learnt to Plough with the same Heifer, is like to make but sad Husbandry of it; and even those that have, if they happen to get some few good Crops, yet they quite wear out the soil with them, forfeit that Reputation with all considering men, which should let them in to farther opportunities, and leave themselves to live not so much upon their own Wits, as other men's Follies. It is true indeed, that hath in these latter days proved a pretty large Common to graze on, and some have seemed to thrive well upon it; but generally such Cattle meet at last with a pinching Winter, which leaves them as bare and meagre, as ever. In short, Cheating has usually a reflexed efficacy, and deceives none more then those that use it; yet such a stroke hath it now got in Gaming, that in most Companies it leaves men only this miserable choice, Whether they will be active or passive in it, which methinks should be enough to awake men, as immoderate Tyrannies use to do, to vindicate their Liberties, and reduce Gaming from this exorbitancy to its Primitive use, make it cease to be a Trade, and become a Recreation; and that too bounded within such just limits, that it may not encroach on those hours which should be destined to greater concernments. But as it is, between this and the rest, either Impertinencies or Vices, all their time is so pre-engaged and fore-stalled, that their most important interest is left forlorn and neglected; they have as little leisure as Will to consider the poor Soul, or scarce to remember that they carry any such trifle about them.

13. And now they that thus forget God and themselves, no wonder if they afford little consideration to their brethren; they will not be guilty of such an Indecorum, or deny the Body of Sin its exact symmetry, by making this part unproportionable to the rest, and therefore they either allow no part of their time to others, or do it to such inverted perverse purposes, as makes the payment worse then robbery. Thus many bestow Visits on others not out of any purpose of kindness, but either to trifle away their own time, or to make observations, what they can spy of ridiculous to entertain their laughter. A mystery the London-visitants are generally well read in, who have put this business long since into a settled course; so that the discoveries of one Visit sets them in a stock of defaming, backbiting discourse for the next, and so successively ad infinitum. So again, many who call themselves Gentlemen▪ much to the reproach of that title, if they can find out a young Heir of much wealth and little prudence, how officious, how diligent are they in attending him? watching him as gladly as a Vulture does the fall of a Carcass, till they find an advantage to rook him at Play, entangle him in Suretyship, or perhaps betray him to some mean and unequal Match. So if they hear but of a beautiful Woman, what contrivances, what designs do they lay, first to see, and then to corrupt her; make it a business to themselves, as well as a trade to their agents and factors, to spring such game? And upon such occasions as these can liberally sacrifice their Time, of which when any Charitable office would borrow from them but some few minutes, they are then such busy persons, they can by no means afford it: A Nabal's blunt and churlish refusal, or at best a Felix's put-off to a convenient season, are the usual returns to such motions. But to anticipate the Proposal, to go in quest of such Opportunities, looks with them like a piece of Knight-errantry, has so little of their practice, that it scarce escapes their scorn.

14. And now what a heavy Bill of Indictment is like one day to be brought in against them, when God, their Souls, and their Neighbors shall all join in the Charge! Oh that they would seasonably consider how sadly obnoxious they are to it, and that condemnation which will inevitably follow it; that so they may, according to Christ's council, Mat. 5. 25. agree with these adversaries while they are in the way, and by yielding to each of them for the future a just portion of their Time, compound the business, stop the Process against them. That they would remember, that of all their prodigalities, this of their Time is the most desperate, such as is most impossible to redeem, and yet that wherein they are of all others the deepliest concerned. And this they would certainly be convinced of, if their Aery fancies could but so condense into Earth, as to bring them into any acquaintance with their Beds of dust, give them some foretaste of their Dying terrors: For let them but sadly think what they would then give for some few of those Days they now study to fling away, and they cannot choose but infer the necessity of being better Husbands. We read in Scripture of the Demoniacks dwelling among the Tombs; but the Devil has sure changed that habitation; for, those whom he now Possesses he permits not to converse at all there, as knowing it is the properest preparative to his dispossession: And doubtless it would be the most powerful Exorcism, as of all others, so of this Evil spirit (this filching Devil, that thus steals from men their precious hours) often to descend into the Vault or Charnelhouse, and by serious consideration how short their Time is, to enforce upon themselves a care of redeeming it.

15. Nor need they fear, that to redeem their Time, they must sell their Pleasures, give up themselves to a joyless state of life; for though it is true they must resign their counterfeit, they shall have real Delights in exchange; they must part with their Glass, but shall have Gold instead of it; and as none but a rude Indian will repine at that bargain in the Literal, so none but a ruder Christian can dislike it in the Moral sense. For in the first place, he that employs his time in conversing with God, is not only more honorably and more profitably, but also more pleasantly busied then he can possibly be any other way. We all say, That God is the center of Felicity; but he gives himself the lie, that does not withal confess, that the closer acquaintance we have with him, the nearer approach we make to happiness: For whoever believed the Sun to be the Fountain of heat, and yet feared to freeze by drawing near its Rays? Indeed none but the down-right Atheist can with any tolerable Logic* dispute the pleasantness of this Duty: For can any whose Faith has set up a God, suffer their fancies to dress him like a Fiend? Put on him such unlovely shapes, as may beget aversion, defer them from approaching to him? Can they call him a Deity, to whom they will not attribute so much as they will to every ingenuous man, the honor of being good Company? This is to be not only profane, but absurd; and if there be any of so short Discourse, I suppose him incapable of conviction by Argument; the common Proverb hath assigned him his Teacher, viz. Experience; let him by frequent, yet reverent Addresses to God, grow into some familiarity with him, bring himself within distance of receiving his refreshing Influences, and then he will discover how very unkind he hath been to himself in thus long holding off. In Humane Conversations we use not to find the gust and relish of them, till we arrive to some degree of freedom; they that converse as strangers, are under constraints and uneasiness; and certainly the main cause of that disgust men have to this Spiritual intercourse, is their unaccustomedness to it: They address to God perfectly as strangers, now and then pay him a slight Visit, as it were by way of formality and Complement; and then no wonder if it be neither satisfactory to God nor themselves: But then 'tis sure great injustice to defame that as unpleasant, which becomes so only by their own ill managery; To say there is no water in the Well, only because they neglect to provide a Bucket for the drawing of it up.

16. In the next place 'tis sure, their Souls mean them no malice, in exacting part of their Time. For first, what they bestow in improving and exalting their Understandings, does not only bring them in vast advantages in the end, but affords them also very fair accommodations by the way: Learning yields such variety of agreeable entertainments, that like the Manna in the Wilderness it adapts itself to every man's taste, he that likes not one sort may fit himself with another; and sure he must have a strangely vitiated palate, to whom none of them will relish. I can scarce think Nature has produced anything so distempered; but men take up general and implicit prejudices, and will look on Books in no other notion but as Taskmasters, whereas if they would but consider them as Companions, they could not miss of one kind or other, to find a pleasant conversation among them.

17. As for that portion of their Time which is spent in attendance on the yet more spiritual part of them, 'tis rather a gift than a robbery, to help them to such a way of expense. Ingenuous men think it a prize, when they meet an opportunity to rescue from the sullage of time anything that carries the stamp of ancient worth and Nobility: But this is a piece of the greatest antiquity, of the noblest, yea divinest Impress; how can men's hours be better laid out, then in restoring it to its primitive luster, in wiping off that soil wherewith the steam of boiling passions hath obscured it, and by disburdening it of those loads of noxious humors under which it labors, like good Physicians recover it from a languishing, infirm, to a vigorous athletique habit: And sure the satisfaction of this must far exceed all other entertainments. Indeed that which is usually taken up instead of it, can with no justice pretend to any tolerable complacency: No man envies his felicity, but contemns his sordid and abject spirit, that picks out the basest and unworthiest company; And shall it here pass for pleasure to consort only with the plebeian part of himself, those sensual Appetites, which are the Common people of this Little world, to spend all his time in treating and Caressing of these, and in the interim let the Soul, which is of so noble an extraction, so excellent endowments, stand by neglected, nay be trodden to death in the crowd of this vulgar rabble, Certainly this is a Tragedy, that no man could see upon the Stage without indignation; yet God knows, this is it men daily act over with applause to themselves. Would God they would once shift the Scene, and let the oppressed Soul have its season of triumphing; doubtless they would find it more pleasant to share in its conquests then in its ruin. We read indeed of some Nations, that have by the rites of a barbarous religion been forced to make Humane sacrifices; yet we find not that they had so slaughtered Humanity itself, as to make it matter of delight: And has our Civility so far outdone their Barbarism, that it shall be pleasure to do that in spite of our Religion, which they did in obedience to theirs? To butcher the Man within us, and leave nothing but our outward Form and inward Guilt to difference us from Beasts? He that disclaims this, must necessarily confess the pleasure lies on the other side, in rescuing the Spirit from the usurpations, yea tyranny of the Flesh; and consequently, that the Time he thus bestows is not lost, but improved to his own greatest present, as well as future advantages.

18. The like may (in the last place) be said of that part of it which is laid out to the benefit of others, which is that which brings us to taste the most delicious of human delights, the pleasure of Obliging being of all those the most ravishing and transporting: And for this we need not the verdict of Christianity, the Philosopher attests it as well as the Divine, nay it is so received a truth, that scarce any man will avow so much ill nature as to resist it in discourse, how much soever his practice disowns it. Indeed this is a pleasure of so exalted, so quintessential a kind, that what Herod's auditors said in flattery of his Oration, we may say in truth of this, 'Tis the delight rather of a God than a man. That Sovereign Being, though he were eternally happy in himself, yet as if he had wanted of his complete felicity, whilst he enjoyed it alone, was pleased rather to create, than want objects of his goodness: And a pleasure to which God himself has given such an attestation, as to make a World in order to it, sure cannot, without the most impious contradiction of his choice, be despised by man. And certainly 'tis none of the least of those benefits he hath vouchsafed our nature, that he hath given us a capacity of it, by affording us those powers by which we may advantage and oblige one another; so pointing us out a course, whereby we may not only innocently, but successfully entertain Lucifers design, of being like the most High: It really makes Men what the Heathens vainly fancied their Heroes, even Demy-gods. O that those who think it Noble to be aspiring, would thus verify the opinion, by terminating all their wishes and endeavors in this one Generous Ambition; and then 'tis sure they would not need to be told the happiness of this so Deifying an employment!

1. IN the fourth place we are to consider the Gentleman's advantage, in respect of his Authority over those that relate to, or depend on him: And this, if rightly managed, is of excellent use, though as capable of being perverted, as any of the former. He who has secular ties upon men, may often, by those cords which bind their worldly interest, draw them to a consideration of their spiritual. A Tenant who thinks his livelihood concerned in the good Will of his Landlord, a Pensioner whose subsistence rests upon the bounty of his Patron, will strive to model themselves to such a form, as may best suit the inclinations of the person they desire to endear; they are usually Wax to him, that are Flint to others: But then, as variety of Seals make differing Impressions, so this flexibleness of theirs may be either abused to ill, or improved to good; this Wax may receive the image of a Beast or an Angel. It is therefore the duty of those who are possessed of this advantage, to use it to the impressing not of Vice, but Virtue; to contrive how they may most effectually discountenance the one, and encourage the other; and this they may doubtless have frequent opportunities of towards either of those relations forementioned.

2. But to none so often as to their Domesticks and Menial servants; these are always so much in their road, that they seem to be marked out by God as their most peculiar Province: Every Master has so much of the Prophet, that he is set as a Watchman, Ezek. 3. 17. over his Family, and ought as jealously to observe the approach of any Vice towards it, as a Centinel does that of an Enemy. 'Tis a very pernicious error for men to think themselves no otherways concerned in their Servants, then they are in their Horses or Oxen, to look upon them only as another species of Working-cattle, and so they do their business, care not how errant Brutes they be: whereas they should remember, that they with themselves are Common servants to the one Great Master, and that the subordination of the one to the other is but the wise Oeconomie of their Lord, who has (as in great Families we see it usual) constituted the one as Stewards or Supervisors, to regulate the rest; and then 'twill appear a piece of enormous unfaithfulness, to neglect this charge. To avoid which guilt, it will concern Gentlemen to have a sedulous care over those that are thus entrusted to them, to make strict inspections into the manners of their servants, and accordingly to apply instructions, and admonitions, reproofs, or encouragements. And that they may not transcribe Pharaoh's Tyranny of exacting brick without straw, require the superstructure of Christian lives, where there wants the necessary foundation of Christian knowledge, they must provide that none under their charge be destitute of the means of laying that groundwork, of knowing so much of Religion as may bring them into an acquaintance with their duty. But to give life to all these endeavors 'tis indispensably necessary for them to avow such a Love to piety and virtue, and such a Detestation of the contrary, that their servants may see that there is but one way of approving themselves both to their earthly, and heavenly Master.

3. If it be here objected, That it is but a counterfeit virtue, which derives itself from the care of pleasing men, and so that this is but to teach them to convert profaneness to hypocrisy: I must yield so far as to confess, that where that continues the final motive, it will never avail any man. But as God often uses temporal and outward occurrences, to produce inward and spiritual effects, so it may here happen, that those whose first approaches to Goodness were mercenary, and out of compliance to others, may by coming within view of it discern it so amiable, that they may after love it for its self, and indeed considering the rude ignorance usual among the vulgar, tis scarce imaginable they should embrace it upon the bare strength of speculation, and therefore must be allowed secular invitations, as baits to allure them. As for those that never advance higher then the mere Form of Godliness, what weight soever it may add to their own doom, yet perhaps that may justly be accounted less mischievous to the world, then the contrary extreme, Hypocrisy being a sin that cannot well set up for Proselytes, because it never owns itself of a distinct party from true Piety; and 'tis not impossible, that the example of a feigned Christian, may teach others to surmount their copy, and be that in sincerity, which he is but in appearance: whereas open Vice pretends to no such possibility, breaths nothing but contagion, and like a pest infects communities. We have therefore reason to conclude, that if this care were generally taken, 'twere a service not only to God, but the Commonwealth, which has not more unprofitable, nay noxious burdens lying on her from any rank of men, then from lewd and idle Servants, who using their places only as a shelter for their sloth and licentiousness, when that Gourd withers, know not whither to retire, but usually either live Beggars, or die Thieves: whereas if Gentlemens families were so ordered, as to become Seminaries of Industry and Sobriety, the number of them is so great, that they might be able to send out many Colonies of useful and civil persons.

4. There is also another sort of relative, viz a Friend, over whom though they have not that Authority, which springs from this servile stock of hopes and fears, yet they have one of a much more noble descent, and more vigorous efficacy; Friendship has a key to the heart, which it may use not only to let itself into its secrets, but also to introduce its own conceptions, Sentiments, and inclinations, it so mixes with the mind, that it may insensibly convey into it any Idea. Now to use this intimacy to the bringing in anything base and unworthy, is the vilest treachery, such as is but imperfectly represented by the treason of him, who requites his friends Hospitality by bringing in Thieves or Murderers upon him: A guilt so vehemently to be abhorred, that none is to think himself at a sufficient and just distance from it, but he that industriously pursues the direct contrary. He therefore that hath a Friend, ought studiously to contrive how he may most promote his advantages, and those not only his outward and secular, but also (yea principally) his inward and spiritual. This is the only sense wherein 'tis lawful to have designs upon him, and in this he is not only licensed, but obliged to have so; he must here use all friendly stratagems, to recommend and endear virtue to him, make his kindness the Vehicle, wherein the more gratefully to administer whatever is most wholesome, even reproofs, when they appear so; and yet by taking his own turn in being the Patient, evince, that 'tis no assuming humor, that creates him a Physician. If friendships were thus managed, it would be indeed a most sacred relation, such as would be above the violations of those petty trivial distastes, which nowadays dissolve them, Hearts that are tied together with these consecrated bands, are like man and wife joined together inseparably by God, and much for the same end of propagation; only herein as far superior to their pattern, as the mind is to the body, the divine excellencies of a Saint to the natural composition of a man. We may reasonably believe they were Friendships of this making, that first brought that name into so much veneration, and were they again reduced to this, no Encomiums could be too lavish for them: such a reducement were a work well worthy the spirit and ingenuity of Gentlemen, who since they generally profess much reverence to the Word, 'tis pity they should cast away their adorations on an empty shrine. The Heathens had Incantations to recall their displeas'd Deities into their forsaken Images; I wish they would also try some holy magick to bring back somewhat of the primitive divine spirit, to animate this now lifeless trunk; that they who justly think it an ungentile reproachful thing, not to have somebody whom they call Friend, may think it much more so, not to pay all the real kindness due to that appellation.

5. Having thus far given an account what are the proper and just employments of this Authority over their several Relations, our method now requires us to reflect a little on their Practice, and that in the most we shall find as far swerving from the rule in this particular, as any of the former. So far, alas, are Gentlemen from making their Power instrumental to the infusing good, that there is nothing more ordinary then to see them dispose it to the direct contrary. The scorn and contempt they publicly cast upon all piety and virtue, teaches their Dependants, how dead a trade that is like to prove to them; and then 'tis very improbable that Godliness shall with them cast the scales against Gain; he that aims to get an Exhibition, or anything proportionable will soon discern his way lies in a quite opposite road, he must find out what Vice of the Gentleman he may be most serviceable to, sometimes he must purvey for his Lust, sometimes for his Intemperance; and even when he has cloyed those grosser appetites, yet his Pride will always remain insatiable; he must still provide air for that Chameleon, lay out his whole breath in flatteries (a more hellish wind then any the Laplanders sell;) 'tis this enshrining his Diana which is the craft by which he expects his wealth, and therefore whatever other office he execute by starts, a Parasite is to be his constant trade.

6. In like manner their Servants are disciplined to be the Ministers of their Luxuries, and not only to serve but transcribe them; the Master's Vices seldom miss to be taken up by the whole House, as if they were to be the Cognisances and Badges, to witness to whom they retained: And though for this they might very well trust to the efficacy of their bare Example, yet as if they could never be secure enough of corrupting their Families, they too often add to it Precepts and Rules of Institution. Thus it is one of the Fundamental Laws of their Hospitality, That no stranger be sent Sober away; so that their Houses may well pass for enchanted Castles, no Man scarce that comes into them, being able to guide himself out: They keep, as it were, solemn Justs and Turnement of Debauchery, to challenge all comers, and have variety of Champions to deal with Combatants of all ranks. In short, Gentlemens Families are become such perfect Academies of Licentiousness, that the most innocent Puny will there in a very short time become proficient. And this God knows is the ordinary improvement they make of their Authority; As if they affected to outbid the tyranny of the Turk, in sending a Halter to his Vassals, and making them their own Executioners; or thought it a disparagement to their Qualities, to go to Hell without an honorable Retinue.

7. As for the other sort of Power, that which they have over their Friends and Intimates, 'tis not discernible that they manage that better; Who almost is there, that seems at all to advert to the Essential part of Friendship? What a Rarity, I had almost said a Prodigy is it, to find (even amongst those that profess the greatest dearness) any that hath either the Courage to give, or the Humility to receive an Admonition? But instead of those wounds of a Friend, Prov. 27. 6. there is nothing more common among them, then the kisses of an Enemy, such mutual soothing in ill, as renders it inveterate and incurable; and like Joab to Amasa, 2 Sam. 20. 10. sheds out the bowels, when it pretends to kiss; nay, as if it were not sufficient for them to nourish those Vices they find already planted, they sow new Seeds, communicate their personal ones to each other, as if the community of Friendship obliged them mutually to diffuse their poisons. Were many of the closest intimacies nowadays ransacked to the bottom, it is to be feared this would be found the basis and ground-work of them. He that hath advanced above the beaten road, arived to the more elevated mysterious parts of wickedness, (The depths of Satan, as they speak, Revel. 2. 24.) would loose much of the gust, if he should not get some Confident, to whom at once to boast, and propagate his Proficiency. Thus sacrilegiously is this venerable relation of Friendship profaned, by being prostituted to the vilest and most detestable purposes; and by this accursed abuse suffers the saddest Metamorphosis, becomes only a Confederacy in sin, a Combination and League against what they account the common Enemies, God and Virtue.

8. These are such wretched perversions of their power, that one would guess it were some great and very considerable weight of present Interest, that should thus bias and distort them. But when that is examined, 'twill be found to lie wholly on the other side. The former Section gave us occasion to discern how transporting a delight it is, to be the Instruments of any good to others: But as there is no good can bear proportion with that which is done to the Soul, so certainly to be an Agent in that, must far transcend the pleasure of all other Benefactions. He that so dispences his Bounty, as to engage Men to Virtue by it, is indeed the magnificent Person, outvies the most profuse Donations of the greatest Potentates; They can give but some little parcels of Earth, he gives Heaven, and like a mighty Monarch hath Kings to do him homage: So he that by well ordering his Family, makes his Servants to be God's, does not only oblige the Commonwealth, but is as it were a Patriot even to Heaven itself; provides it with Inhabitants, and helps to secure it from that emptiness and depopulation, wherewith the general wickedness of men seem to threaten it; and then in relation to such his Servants, he is of all other Masters the most bountiful and obliging; they provide perhaps some petty Annuities, he gives a state of Inheritance, nay of Eternity.

9. This is a vast Munificence, yet that which the arrantest Worldling can have no temptation to grudge. A Man may thus without a Riddle give much, yet part with nothing, nay, acquire that very thing to himself, which he dispenses to others; so that here is no place for the usual (though unjust) Objection of impoverishing ones self, which is that alone which often deads the relish, or diverts the attempt of other Liberalities; and therefore this sort which is rescued from that one possible allay, must certainly yield the most vigorous and unmixed Pleasure, it being sure, that Bounty has in itself so much of agreement with Humane Nature, as will inevitably produce Complacency and Delight, where it is not so interrupted or allayed.

10. I might here add ex abundantia, that there is likewise a secular Profit attending it: For if Gentlemen had their Dependents truly conscientious, they would be of very much more use to them, they might employ them securely, and need no other Spies upon them but their own Consciences; 'twould not then be so many Servants, so many Thieves and Harpies, but so many Factors and Traffickers for the Masters advantages: So that here again their own Interest engages them to this Care, though I confess 'tis to be wished, that the former more ingenuous Motive may be so prevalent, as to supersede all use of this, it being very unreasonable that God should need Auxiliaries from Mammon. Yet as once the Israelites borrowed of the Egyptians, so it may not be amiss to make this Inferior consideration a step to the other more Noble, that even they who have yet no gust of that more Heroic Pleasure, may on the intuition of this Worldly advantage, endeavor to improve their Authority to the Spiritual good of all that belong to them.

11. But from no part of this Performance may they reap so rich a satisfaction, as from that which is exercised towards a Friend; for as their Concernment is nearer in him, then in the former more distant Relations, so the Pleasure of doing good to him, must proportionably increase, as that heat is most intense which is conveyed by the nearest Reflexion. He who so maintains his Vital station in the great Body, as to sympathize with every Member of it, must yet necessarily have the most acute sense of what befalls those parts, to which he is most immediately conjoined: But there is no stricter Union upon Earth, then that of a Virtuous Friendship; and then what can be more satisfactory, then to preserve or advance the Health of that, whose Maladies himself is sure to feel, to improve and benefit that person, who is thus become a part of him. Persons of quality love to deck and imbellish the place where they inhabit, abhor to dwell in a Stie or Dungeon, but Friends dwell in each other; and therefore cannot but be delightful in beautifying and adorning those Minds they have thus chosen to live in, in purging them from all foulness and pollutions, and rendering them as pure and immaculate; nay, as splendid and illustrious, as is possible. Certainly, there is nothing upon Earth more ravishing, then a Friendship thus entertained, 'tis some Anticipation of Heaven, where those lines of Love which stretch themselves to every part of the Circumference, do all meet in God as their Centre. It is indeed that which surmounts the possibility of an exact description, and reserves its full discovery to be the prize of Experience. Let it be tried, and then I doubt not, but he that hath made the Experiment, will readily attest the Pleasure of thus employing this part also of his Authority.

SECT. VIII. Of the last advantage, that of Reputation.

1. The last advantage is that of Reputation and Esteem, which is generally presumed the due of Persons of Quality, unless where some personal unworthiness hath cut off the Entail, and forfeited that right. And though these days have taught the Vulgar to defalk much of that respect which former Ages paid to Superiors of all sorts, yet I cannot think the Levelling principle has so universally diffused itself, as totally to rase out all impressions of reverence towards them; so that there still remains somewhat of this Talent for them to negotiate with. It will be their part so to manage and dispose it, as to bring in profit to their Lord, by making it also an engine to draw men to piety and virtue.

2. This they may sometime do by Council; to the success whereof there is nothing more contributive than an esteem of the Adviser, most men being rather apt to consider who speaks, then what is spoken: And therefore persons, whose Quality and Education have prepossessed them with an opinion of their Wisdom, have a great advantage towards the working on them. And this it will befit them to make diligent use of, by seasonable advices and exhortations to those whom they shall discern thus prepared for the entertaining of them, to take all prudent occasions to recommend Christian-Practice to them, and by pulling off those disguises which the false measures of the world have put upon Vice and Virtue, to represent them in their true and native shapes, the one the object of horror and detestation, the other of love and delight. 'Tis the want of this discovery, that has given Impiety so free a range, it has dressed itself up in a counterfeit splendor, false Gemms and Tinsel-gaudery; and in this glittering appearance it marches on triumphantly, receives acclamations, yea and Obeisance too, nay commands not only the knees (as every prosperous Usurper can do) but even the hearts of men. And will none have so much charity, so much zeal for public Concern, as to uncloak this Impostor, and show the dazzled world what it is it thus bows to? Perhaps this is looked on only as the business of Divines; but certainly would Gentlemen also set to it, they were like to prove the more prosperous undertakers: What comes only out of the Pulpit, passes for the foolishness of preaching, 1 Cor. 1: 21. or for the discourses of those whose trade it is to inveigh against sin; All their Thrusts being of course, and expected, their Wards are as well known too, and we daily see Vice approve itself an expert Fencer against them. But the endeavors of these would not be liable to those prejudices; a Blow from them would come (like the Revolt of a Confederate) with the advantage of a Surprise; and there is little doubt, but by friendly and familiar Conferences they might many times insinuate that into men's breasts, which the more solemn and Authoritative Exhortations of Ministers often fail of.

3. But Council will be of little efficacy, if it be not seconded by Example; they must therefore look their Lives be such, as may show they believe themselves, whilst they go about to persuade others. He that shall with never so pressing Arguments dehort a man from that Sin, which himself at the next opportunity commits; will never be supposed to have any real ill opinion of it, but rather so passionate a love, that he is jealous any but himself should have its embraces: And then surely this will be so far from averting, that it will excite the appetite of the other to taste of that which he sees is thought so desirable as to be Monopolized.

4. Indeed there is nothing by which they have so universal an influence, as their Example: Things that are set in some high and eminent place, do naturally attract men's eyes to them; so that eminency of condition wherein Gentlemen are placed, renders their actions more observable. They are like the City our Savior speaks of, set on an hill, and have by that advantageous situation the means of making their light shine further than other men's. And therefore it ought to be their constant care, by the bright luster of their exact and exemplary Conversations, to enlighten the whole sphere wherein they move. Would Gentlemen make this their united design, what a happy Constellation of auspicious Stars would they prove, by whose benign Aspect the sterility of Vulgar minds might be cured, and even those Clods be inspirited, and rendered capable of excellent productions.

5. For what can be more persuasive to those of the lower Ranks to embrace Virtue, than to see it made the election of those whom they suppose to have most judgment to discern its value, and so fall not on it blindfold, and who have also all the contrary pleasures of Sin within their reach, nay prostrate at their feet, suing for entertainment, and so are not cast on it by impotence. What a blur and infamy would it cast upon Vice, if it were once banished out of Gentile company, and how fair a step would it be towards its exclusion out of all? We see what a natural aspiring the lower sort have to approach to the condition of their Betters; and though that being now aimed only at their Poms and Greatness, be no commendable temper, yet sure it were much in the power of those emulated persons to make it so: For would they so order the matter, that their Virtue should outshine all their outward splendors, that it should become the character and distinctive note of a Gentleman, to be eminently good, this were a way to consecrate even Ambition itself, by making it an engine not to rack and torture men, as common ambitions do, but to advance them to all virtuous industry.

6. He that desired to ennoble his Family, would then begin at his Mind, cast out thence all base and degenerate Inclinations, and make himself a Gentleman without help of Heraldry. Thus hapily might they deceive men into Piety, and make those Emulations, whose first rise was merely from Earth, a ladder wherewith to scale Heaven. And how noble, how excellent a charity is this, and yet of all others the cheapest, it having that Proverbial property of Charity, To begin at home: The being good, is primarily a kindness to themselves, and to others only by way of result, and propagation, and easy consequence? How unchristian, unmanly, yea unskillful too will it then be, to deny this benefaction, which has that very argument on its side, which is opposed to other kinds of Liberalities; that fear of lessening a man's self which in those contracts and shuts up the bowels, is here in all reason to enlarge and dilate them; for in this case men cannot deny, without their own greatest injury, and diminution: And sure 'twould justly pass for a prodigy both of malice and folly, for one so to avert the benefiting another, as to incur the greatest damage to himself in avoiding it.

7. But alas, it is not only Charity either to others or themselves, which exacts of them thus to promote Piety among men: They have brought themselves under another more constraining obligation, I mean that of Justice, particularly the justice of Restitution, for 'tis too visible they have been deeply accessory to its decay: so far have they been from advising and exciting men to good, that I fear their persuasive faculties have generally been employed •...o a quite distant purpose. There are few or none, that by their own pious endeavors do at all abate the need of the Priests exhortations; but many that do evacuate their efficacy, by decrying it as the greatest folly, the most unmanly submission, to yield them any consideration: As for their own Councils, they are too often in earnest, what Solomon's was by way of irony, Eccl. 11. 9 Walk in the ways of thine heart & in the sight of thine eyes, encouraging and animating men to all Sensuality; and if they discern any begin to startle at the course, to entertain but a sober thought of that dismal end to which it leads, he is to be •...aught out of that Hypochondriack fit, taught •...o look upon it as a spice of Frensy, the loud noise of roaring Mirth is reinforced to drown that poor whisper of Conscience, and by the sound as it were of those Trumpets he is incited to turn to his course, as the horse rusheth into the battle, Jer. 8. 6. all arts of encouragement used to embolden him to run fearlessly on to Damnation. This is their one known Recipe—for all pangs and gripes of Soul; And if it be not of every days practice, 'tis not that they have any better method of Cure, but such arts of prevention, such means of stupefaction and obduration, that the disease seldom occurs among them.

8. Nor do they omit to back and fortify this with proportionable Examples, which God knows are so many and so efficacious, that like a dismal Cloud they overspread our whole Horison. They who are by God designed as lights to illuminate all aboutthem, have been the instruments of introducing a more then Egyptian darkness, thereby exemplifying that Aphorism of our Savior's, Mat. 6. 23. If the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness?

9. What a deluge of Profaneness and Impiety at this day overflows this poor Nation, is too visible not only by the direct, but th•... reflexed beams, those sad Judgments they have brought down upon it; and though there be too many springs which feed this Ocean, ye•... there will scarce any be found to have more liberally contributed, then the open and scandalous viciousness of the Gentry. They who are placed as Stars in our Firmament, if they dart nothing but malignant Influences, what wonder is it, if an universal Pest ensue? 'Tis they that have brought Vice into countenance, made it the Mode and fashion of the times, so that people dread the singularity of being innocent, and a man may with less peril of scorn appear in the most superannuated dress, then own the Obsolete qualities of Meekness, Purity, Sobriety, &c. How great and fatal a snare this creditableness of sin has proved: I fear there are too many thousands of entangled Souls can witness; and on whom can they more properly charge their ruin, then on those who have advanced it to this repute in the world? Men's natural pravity gives them propension more then enough to ill, and therefore it hath been the business of Laws both human and divine to put a bridle upon those inclinations, by fear and shame to restrain their inordinacy; but this converts the bridle into a spur when those that should discountenance Vice, thus animate and encourage it.

10. For what a Temptation is it to the vulgar to run to all excess of Riot, when they see their superiors have beaten the path before them, and are themselves immersed in the most brutish sensualities? which of them will endure to be sober, when Drunkenness shall be accounted so dignifying a quality, that it may make a Peasant company for a Lord? when Gentlemen are Atheistical, Clowns will think themselves very modestly wicked, if they be but profane; and when they hear their Betters discharge loud Volleys of Oaths, they will soon find they are as well qualified for that part of greatness as the best, their Tongues are as much their own, Psa. 12 4. and will be glad that by such an easy employment of them they can be Gentlemen so good cheap. 'Twere as endless as unnecessary to enumerate the several sorts of infection, which the ill examples of great men have diffused; 'tis too obvious in the mortal effects to need any other way of discovery; and I am sure it ought to be matter of the saddest reflection to all who are involved in that guilt, it being a most direful account, which they will one day have to make, who have been the Authors of such miserable vastations, turned Communities of Men, of Christians, into Herds of Beasts, nay into Legions of Devils.

11. Every sin even of the privatest obscurest person carries much of contempt and affront to the Divine Majesty, but Great men's vices are of a yet more Giantly frame, they proclaim solemn War with Heaven, levy forces, and draw in multitudes of abettors and confederates in their hostilities; and God knows this kind of Unevangelical violence the kingdom of Heaven daily suffers. Oh that the Chieftaines and leaders of these unhappy troops, would at last think fit to sound a retreat; that they would, in pity if not to themselves, yet to their seduced followers, cease thus desperately to rush on upon the mouth of the Canon the Jaws of Hell. And not only so, but that they would also endeavor to bring them into some terms of accord with that omnipotent Enemy they have provoked, by their own penitent and reformed lives teach them the postures of humility and submission, as they have formerly done that of defiance. This certainly is that to which common equity obliges them, reparation of injuries being confessedly an indispensable part of justice; and certainly there can no injury exceed, nay equal this of betraying men to eternal ruin, and consequently nothing less than the utmost industry to repair it, can be any competent expiation. God grant all those, whose guilt gives them a peculiar title to this admonition, may own their right to it by a particular and serious application, such as may for the future engage them to the most zealous endeavor of reforming not only themselves, but others, for rescuing their reputation from that foulest blot, of being an agent for Satan, and advancing it to that highest dignity of being serviceable to God.

12. But there is little hope they will rightly consider the use, who are so utterly mistaken in the nature of true reputation; A man of Honor is now understood only to be one that can start and maintain a Quarrel, that for every the triflingest injury expects like Lamech, Gen. 4. 24. to be avenged seventy and seven fold; that despises the Christian precepts of Meekness long suffering, and Forgiveness, as rudiments of cowardice and unmanly pusillanimity, and has no other measure of courage and gallantry, but by an utter opposition to all those; and whilst reputation is thus hung only at the point of the sword, 'tis a very fit instrument to destroy bodies, but sure not to save Souls. We find daily many occasions to complain of the Tyranny of Custom and Opinion, but scarce anywhere so much as in those unjust and absurd Laws they have imposed in this matter, which were they consideringly weighed would surely evince them such contemptible Legislators, as would be enough to dethrone and depose them from that usurped Empire they now maintain in the world.

13. To take only a short and cursory view of them, we shall in the first place find them to be horribly impious; for what can be more so, then thus to tear off those signatures of Honor, which God himself hath imprest, and vilify those whom he hath dignified? God has pronounced that it is the discretion of a man that deferreth his anger, and it is his glory to pass over a transgression▪ Prov. 19. 11. and again he that is slow to anger is better then the mighty, and he that ruleth his spirit, then he that taketh a City. Pro. 16. 32. But this new notion of Honor proclaims the quite contrary; he passes for a Phlegmatick fool, whose blood boils not at the first glimpse of an Affront; and 'tis Gallantry to offer many Injuries, but ignominious Tameness to bear one. It has always been the indisputable prerogative of Kings to be the Fountains of Honor; what an impious daring is it then to divest him of that privilege, by whom Kings reign? to cancel his Patents, and mark them out as the objects of scorn, to whom God gives so glorious a testimony? Yet thus is it daily done to the men, whom the King of Kings will honor; these are all the Triumphs these Mordecai's must expect; An evidence how much worse they are then Haman, that allot them. Certainly there cannot be an act of greater defiance against the Divine Majesty, then thus to reverse his Decrees; And upon this hostility and opposition against Heaven it is, that all the private Quarrels and Combats on Earth are (as on their foundation) superstructed; so that to initiate a Duellist, his first Challenge must be directed against God himself.

14. Nor are these false measures of Honor more opposite to Religion, then Prudence: The glosses the Sword-men have put upon the one fundamental Law of Not bearing an Injury, have introduced such a multitude of ridiculous Punctilio's, that the next Age will be in danger of receiving the Fable of Don Quixot for Authentic History; and I see not with what justice this can laugh at them in him and his Squire Sancho, and yet think them serious enough to govern men in their most real and weighty concernments. It would indeed astonish any sober person to consider, what Chimera's they are to which men sacrifice all that ought to be dear to them; How many Duels have been fought, how many men killed, (when neither of the Combatants were so implacable but that they could willingly have compounded the matter) only because they thought Point of Honor exacted it, and the declining it would be inglorious? Certainly the Gallies is a state of perfect liberty, compared with this bondage; And were the Release from those necessarily to infer a subjection to this, were those Slaves obliged thus to become Gentlemen; I should cease my wonder why so many of them have despised a manumission: For, thus to have a man's Estate, his Life, yea Soul too, at the mercy of Popular breath, (not only to be lost, but lost by his own act) is a Slavery beyond all that the most abject creature ever groaned under. And yet so prodigiously absurd is the World, as to cut this out for the Benjamins portion, make it the especial and peculiar privilege of Gentlemen; they are set upon a Theatre, and as the Gladiators of old must kill one another, only to entertain Spectators. And who would not think Bedlam the only Seminary to breed men up for such a Trade? Yet so universal is this Lunacie, that one may suspect the Institution of that Hospital is perverted, that that incloses only the Sober persons, whilst the Frantick run loose about the world.

15. But perhaps the more Malicious Duellers will think themselves exempt from this number, because 'tis their own satisfaction which they design in it; their Enemies blood will make so delicious a draught for their revenge, that they gasp after it, and think it a pleasure well worthy their pursuit. But sure these differ from the former, not as Wise men from Fools, but as a worse Natured Fool from a better. He that would justify the rationalness of any Adventure, must prove the Prize at least to equal the worth of that he hazards for it: But who that considers he has a Soul, can seriously set it at so contemptible a rate? or what man in his wits, that believes a Hell, will say the pleasure of a Revenge can countervail those pains? Nay indeed, none can with any pretence put it in balance with the mere loss of Life; for he that is killed (as every man may be that fights) can have no sense of that pleasure, and so becomes incapable of the compensation, if that were able to make it. Nay I shall descend yet lower, and with some confidence affirm, that the uneasy consequences even of the Victory do quite overwhelm the satisfaction. For this I dare refer myself to any of those who have had the unhappy Triumph of a Murderer, and doubt not that if they will speak their experiences, they will tell us that the cry of their Adversaries blood in their Conscience, did utterly extinguish the relish of it in their Fancie; or if they were persons who were hardened against all sense of Divine vengeance yet the fear of Humane was abundantly enough to defeat them of that pleasure they expected; so impossible is it to gather grapes of these thorns, to reap any contentment from so unchristian an Attempt: Their Revenge is not completed without Blood; and if they have it, it proves a Torrent to carry away that imaginary Delight they projected from it: And then what color of reason can any man bring, why he should thus sell his soul for naught, and become a Platonic to Damnation?

16. But Revenge has two ill-matched qualities, Blindness and Impetuosity; and so all its darts, though they carry force and venom enough to destroy all about them, yet by being ill aimed revert mortally on the breast whence they were shot. Certainly there is not in the world a more prodigious Infatuation, then that which rules in this Affair: What can be more senseless, then for me, when a man has done me an Injury, to think to wipe off that by exposing myself to more? when he has given me the Lye, to invite him to give me the Stab too? Did ever any man attempt to make up a breach, by widening it? to close his wound, by tearing it further? The Physicians indeed talk of a method of curing some Diseases by Majoration; but sure Injuries are not in the number of those maladies, nor capable of that way of remedy: The greater may, 'tis possible, overwhelm, but not cure the less, as the more moderate Pains become insensible by the superveniencie of the more acute; yet I presume none would applaud his choice, that should call for the Rack to drown the pain of a Cut finger, which yet is no hyperbolical emblem of this sort of Revenge.

17. But besides all this our modern Gallantry is treacherous to its self, confutes its own pretension, and whilst it vainly assumes the Monopoly of Courage, is indeed the meanest Cowardice in the world. That by which we use to discriminate base Fear from just Caution, is the formidableness of the object feared: No man is reproached for not standing the inundation of the Sea; but to quake at stepping over a Gutter, would be a ridiculous timorousness: 'Twould be neither wonder nor shame to run from the pursuit of a Lion; but to be chased by a barking Whelp, is the property of an Hare, not of a Man. And according to this measure, what wretched Cowards are our greatest Hectors? For what can be more contemptible then those unjust Scorns of men they so tremble at? which if they were sure to be universal, yet what real ill can they do a man, who does not by his own fan•...y lend them an edge wherewith to wound him? But neither can this be the Case, till all both Christianity and Sobriety be quite worn out of the world: For to a Christian, 'tis certain the irreligion of Fighting a Duel would be the most infamous thing, and even to a sober Heathen the folly of it would be so too; so that he can be in no danger of either of their reproaches, for declining it: And when these are set aside, who is there whose censure can be at all considerable? Yet this so pitiful despicable thing is it, which so terrifies and amazes them; And how shall we define Cowardice, if this be not it?

18. And as it has the nature, so has it the Fate of it too, which usually is by fleeing an imaginary danger, to fall into a real: Men fight, that they may not be thought Cowards; and by fighting they do not only become indeed so, but also rush themselves upon other far more formidable mischiefs, run from a Scarcrow into a Precipice. And now what a riddle is this thing they call Gallantry, which so startles at the weakest noise, yet stands undauntedly the stroke of a Thunderbolt? They who so dread the reproach of vain impotent men, do yet confidently encounter the anger of the omnipotent God; and if Valor and Fool-hardiness were not very distant things, would confute my whole argument by making it evident, that they dare be damned. Thus by a strange kind of inverted operation their Fear makes them bold; would God that Antiperistasis might go on to work, till that Boldness have again brought them to a fear, I mean that penitential Fear, proper to those who thus deliberately provoke the Divine Majesty.

19. And that very Deliberation is a circumstance of so great an enhancement, as immeasurably heightens the sin: Sudden acts may be capable of some alleviations by the surprise they make on a man's spirit; but contrived and premeditated Crimes can have no milder appearance then of obstinate Rebellion. And this aggravation can scarce ever be wanting to a Duel, many hours, if not days intervening between the designment and the execution; and in that interval 'tis not possible for all the Opiate Receipts in Satan's Dispensatory to keep the Conscience so drowsy, that it shall not startle, but it will undoubtedly represent to a man the horror of that he is going about, which is no less then the engaging himself in a double Murder, his own, and his Adversaries, (for the willful hazard of both fastens on him the guilt, though both happen to survive the Combat;) but if it be his own fate to fall (as he has much reason to expect, who thus puts himself out of God's protection, nay dares his vengeance) what possible hope can remain for him, who thus dies in that very act of the greatest sin? We are generally apt to think but uncomfortably of those who make away themselves; but certainly many of those deserve to be Canonized, in comparison with a man that dies in Duel; the principle of that being often an excessive Fear of God, which sure is less culpable, then a profane contempt of him Besides the temptation in that case is usually more violent and impetuous, it being (if not begot, yet) cherished and fomented by melancholy, the most intractable and obstinate of all humors, whereas the suggestion to this hath no such Auxiliary to aid it, the original of quarrel... being frequently from too free a jollity. And lastly, that, of how heinous a kind soever, is yet but a single sin, whereas this, as I said before, involves a twofold guilt; And of how crimson a color must that soul appear before God's Tribunal, that is thus double-died in blood!

20. And now who can choose but cry out in the Prophet Isaiah's style, Hear O Heavens, and hearken O Earth! What strain of wonder and amazement can bear proportion with the desperate madness of men, that can thus knowingly and consideringly rush themselves upon such unspeakable mischiefs; especially since here they want even that miserable reserve, which serves to embolden them to other sins, viz. the hope of a future repentance: for those that make but the slightest measures of that, can scarce fancy any opportunities of it in this case, since to him that dies there seldom remains any space of interval between his sin and his death, no time for those clouds to gather, those penitential showers to descend, which should wash away his blood-guiltiness; or if there did, yet what expectation is there he should employ it to any effect? such Presumptuous considerate sins naturally work an obduration in the heart, which nothing but an extraordinary grace can remove, and after such a high and daring provocation 'tis very reasonable to expect God should withdraw even the lowest degrees, but sure not that he should add higher.

21. These Considerations are all of them so obvious, that they naturally suggest themselves, and certainly they are so weighty and pressing that 'tis a Prodigie to see they should be so universally ineffectual, which can proceed from nothing but the want of close and serious application. Would men dare but to meet single with their own sober thoughts, 'twould certainly supersede all other Duels, there remains therefore nothing more for me to add but to invite them to this one encounter, to beseech them to grapple a while but with the force of Reason, a combat of all others the securest, where to be subdued is more glorious then to conquer in any other; and when it has despoiled them of that false courage, which exposes them to such dismal ruins, to permit it to reinspirit them with a true one, such as may give them daring enough to stand up against this so more then Barbarous a custom, to endeavor to banish it out of Christendom, and so take of that reproach which our profession lies under from so impious a practice, which having no other Tenure but Prescription, there needs nothing but Desuetude to destroy it. Let every man for his own part strictly abstain from it, and avow the doing so, and then by ceasing to be a fashion, it will cease to be at all.

22. But the misery of it is, no man will assume to be leader in this so noble an enterprise, to begin this so necessary a reformation; which though it have so much more of compliance even to carnal Interests, then its contrary, that I doubt not many wish it were universal, yet till it be so, they think 'twill be uncreditable to any particular person; But were that the certain event of it, 'tis sure that reproach ought to be despised, when it comes in competition with Duty; In this case the resolution of David (as great a Swordman as any of them) is most proper; I will yet be more vile then thus. 2 Sam. 6 22. and certainly a man cannot pass a more glorious Martyrdom, then to suffer ignominy upon such an account. I am sure 'tis a real shame to see that men can offer violence to all their dearest complicated Interests, to comply with that unchristian custom, yet cannot cross a single imaginary one, to suppress it.

23. Nay the truth is, they create Punctilioes in this case, by which themselves will not be governed in any other. In a common Fire does any man suspend his own endeavors, till he see the whole Town running to quench the flame? or if one of these popular persons had been of the Philistines company, when the house began to fall, Iud. 16. 30. would he have so dreaded the singularity of a solitary escape, as not to have attempted it, till sholes of others had led the way? We have had some experience, under what prejudice a public Act falls, that is by its makers precluded from being a president, and sure these men do tacitly (yet very intelligibly) accuse the unreasonableness of this fear, whilst they confine it to this single instance; and me thinks 'twere but just, they should be required to be consentaneous to themselves, and act in other things by the same measures; which would prove so sharp a penance, as were more likely to reduce them to sobriety, then all the force of Argument.

24. But besides this severe remedy, there is sure an antidote against this malady, a way to separate the duty from the Contempt which their fancies have so closely annexed to it, and that is by making their lives so uniformly Christian, that it may be evident, 'tis Conscience, not fear that works with them. Without this I know indeed no security from reproach: For to see a man who tramples upon all other commands of God, catch up this, as a buckler against a Challenger, who can be so blindly charitable, as to impute this to anything but Cowardice but when the whole tract of a man's Life is one continued course of Obedience, no man will expect he should violate that upon this occasion. To this may be added a cheerful and free exposing himself to all warrantable dangers, when any public occasion of hazard is offered; if he then show himself daring, 'twill be apparent, that 'tis not the fear of Death, but Sin, which locks up his sword from private Duels. Or when there is no opportunity of this active valor, let him approve his passive by a contented, nay joyful submission to any suffering that attends the discharge of a good conscience; and of this there is little fear (in these days especially) to want occasions. He that does this, will be in no danger to be defamed for declining Duels, but on the contrary such an aequable piety will extort reverence from all, there being such a venerable amiaebility in it, that the most profane do, even against their wills, bear it some inward respect.

25. Let not men therefore pretend the fear of reproach, as an excuse, since here is so ready a Salvo to that objection, but let them by an assiduous practice of all other Christian virtues, render this also secure to them, and qualify themselves for the propagating it to others. And Oh, that we could once see all other quarrels amongst Gentlemen converted into this one holy contention, who should be forwardest in this Heroic attempt. 'Tis the false notion of Honor, that is one of Satan's principal Citadels, like Zion to the Jebusites, and the assaulting of that, would be an atchivement of so much glory that he that could prosper in it, might justly challenge the dignity which David there promises, 2 Sam. 5. 8. of being Chief and Captain. Here then they may lawfully quench their thirst of Honor, yea and that of Revenge too, by wrecking their utmost malice on this their so grand Enemy: Let it be remembered how long it hath befooled and cheated the world, and be exposed to all the shames and detestation of a discovered Impostor; nay let it be brought to a solemn arraignment, those innumerable murders of which it has been guilty, charged on it, and prosecuted to death, so utterly extinguished, that it may never again appear in the world, whilst all good men applaud the justice, and say, So let all thine enemies perish, O Lord.

26. Having thus reflected on the common abuses of Reputation, all that remains is to consider how injurious men are to themselves in their ill managery of this Talent, which might be improved not only to their final account, but even their present pleasure. For first, he that by seasonable advice rescues any man from a course of sin, will infallibly feel so unutterable a complacency in having done so, that he will find he was kind to himself, as well as the other and will have no temptation to think himself unprofitably employed, though that were to be his only reward. This bringing sinners to repentance is so noble, so tempting a design, that it drew even God himself from Heaven to prosecute it; and that not by cheap and easy means, but by all those Sufferings, which human nature most trembles at: yet such was the joy of Mans salvation▪ which was set before him, as enabled him to endure the cross, and despise the shame, Heb. 12. 2. How rich a bargain will it then be to a man to partake with him in that joy, to share with him in that prize, upon so much easier terms, to pay but a little breath for that, which exhausted his blood, and to become (in a lower inferior sense) a Savior without a Cross?

27. In like manner, he that by a strict and exemplary conversation sets himself up a landmark to direct men in this turbulent and dangerous Sea▪ his light, 'tis true go•...s forth to others, but the warmth and cherishing heat of it remains within his own breast. What cheerful what exulting reflections may he make upon himself, that can make good St Paul's protestation, Acts. 20. 26. that he is pure from the blood of all men; that he hath not by any scandalous example ensnared any soul; but on the contrary hath by positive illustrious acts of Virtue endeavored so to adorn his Christian profession, as to draw in Proselytes not to the name, but the obedience of Christ; That hath made it his business to stand in the gap, not only by his Intercessions with God against the Plagues, but by his endeavors with Men against the sins of the Nation, and by a steady opposing himself against the inundation of profaneness and licentiousness, hath invited others to give some stop to those impure torrents? It has always been accounted so glorious a thing to redeem ones Country from slavery, that men have thought their greatest hazards amply paid with the Title of a Patriot: but there is no vassalage so ignoble, no servitude so miserable, as that of Vice, and consequently no attempt so worthy, so ingenuous, so satisfactory to the undertaker, as to break that yoke. He that aspires to no more then a private Innocence▪ is only on the defensive part, stands upon his guard against Satan; but he that aims at this sort of public reformation, maintains an invasive War against him, and so more shakes his kingdom; The reducing of any sinner is the dispossessing him of so much of his usurpt territory, and weakens his Empire in the world. This is indeed the true Public Spirit, which though many have pretended to from whom we discern nothing of these effects, yet those very pretensions bear witness to the excellency of the thing, and ought to animate men to be indeed, what so many have coveted to be thought.

28. I suppose I need not go on to the other instance; every man's sense, without consulting either his Reason or Religion, will be able to pronounce that 'tis better to be in Peace than Hostility, to have a whole than a wounded body, to keep securely his own station, than to be hunted like a Partridge on the Mountains by the Avenger of blood. The greater is the miracle, that men who in all other instances devote themselves wholly to their sensuality. should here only abjure it; that when body and soul come in competition, live as if they had no soul, yet upon this occasion can dare, as if they had no bodies. Oh that men should be such ill husbands of their sufferings, and thus enhance Satan's markets! Alas, Hell is a purchase will never be taken out of their hands, how many chapmen soever they see about it, they may secure their Estate there firm enough by those sins they have more gust of; why should they be thus madly prodigal to outbid the common rate? Must Gentlemen buy Damnation, as they usually do Wares, dearer than other men? How is perdition become so amiable, that like Rachel a double servitude is judged light for it; whilst Heaven in the mean time, like Leah, is so much despised, that 'tis thought an injury to have that obtruded on them, though upon the easiest terms? Certainly they are strange transforming Optick's which these men make use of; would God they could be but persuaded, if not to break yet at least for a while to lay by those false Glasses, and behold things in their genuine and proper shapes, and then I doubt not they will discern That Honor to be infamy, which sets men at defiance with God; and that Reputation then alone becomes estimable, when like a River it paies its Tribute to the Ocean, promotes His Glory, at whose feet Kings (without diminution) cast both themselves and Crowns.

SECT. IX. The Conclusion.

1. WE have now according to our proposed Method, surveyed distinctly those several Advantages which Gentlemen enjoy, and may surely give the same Testimony, which Caleb and Joshua did of Canaan, Num. 14. The Land which we passed thorough to search it, is an exceeding good Land. 'Tis a rich and fertile soil wherein these men are planted, such as hath a natural aptitude and vigor to produce the most excellent fruits. But Paradise itself required dressing, and therefore we find Adam had that work assigned him in his Innocence; and surely these his Sons may well submit to the same task, by the faithful discharge whereof they may make some approaches towards that his pristine state.

2. It need not be again inculcated, that all these their Receipts have their special and particular ends in God's assignment; 'twill be more useful to remember them, how nearly they are concerned not to pervert the Council of God against themselves, by neglecting to give them their due expected improvements: For though he be a most liberal, yet is he not a negligent Master, but keeps an exact and punctual account of whatever he thus delivers out, and will not fail severely to avenge the embezeling of his goods; Indeed such an abuse has so Fatal an Efficacy, that it quite changes their nature, converts them from Blessings to the heaviest Curses: would God too many men had not thus exemplified their own destructive power, and by a kind of Anti-creation brought darkness out of light.

3. But 'tis pity they should be permitted to sleep in that darkness, which themselves have made; and therefore if this little Tract shall fall into any such hands, it must avow to come upon that uncivil, yet friendly Errand, to disturb their rest, to awake them to some Consideration, and as Philip's Monitor was to remember him, that he was but a man, so to put them in mind, that in the midst of their freest enjoyments they are still but Stewards and know not how soon their Lord may summon them to their Accounts. And with what confusion and consternation must they appear at the great Audit, who have so unfaithfully managed their trust; 'Tis therefore now no longer time to dally, but by an assiduous care and diligence to endeavor to Redeem their past ill husbandry, lest they run the Fate of that Evil-servant mentioned, Mat. 24. be surprised in the midst of their Inordinacies, and have their portion assigned them in weeping and gnashing of teeth.

4. And now what Objection can they possibly make against this so necessary a Caution, which is founded upon such Motives, as should me thinks infallible prevail upon all sorts of tempers? If they have any sense of Fear, here are those Terrors of the Lord, which are amazing enough to set even a Belshazz... (though with the Cup at his mouth, his Concubines by his side) a trembling. Certainly he must not be only frozen but petrified in desperate impiety, whom even a glimpse of those eternal flames will not be able to dissolve.

5. But if Fear (though of God) be too degenerate a Passion for a Gentleman to own, this advice can upon as good grounds Address itself to their Hope; there is as well the Joy of the Lord for the Faithful, as the outter darkness for the unprofitable servant. For though God have Right of absolute Dominion, and might exact obedience on his bare command, yet he is more pleased to show himself a Benefactor than a Lord, and therefore descends to treat with men by the more gentle, and inviting methods of Promises and Rewards. Nay, indeed the end of his Commands is only to make us capable Subjects of those Eternal Felicities he desires to bestow. And this surely is enough to excite men to a diligent negotiating with those Talents they have received, since it is indeed themselves they are trading for. The stock it is true is God's, but all the increase of it will by his bounty certainly devolve on them. And therefore as Naaman's Servants thought the cure he was in pursuit of, deserved a submission to the severest Prescriptions, If the Prophet had bid thee do some great thing, wouldstthou not have done it? 2 Kings 5. 3. So surely we may conclude those endless joys proposed by God, are cheaply earned even by the most exhausting Labors, the most vigorous Tasks.

6. But such is the Tenderness and Indulgence of our gracious Master, so earnest his desire of dispensing his Rewards, that he will not trust men's sloth and folly with such a pretence of defeating themselves; and therefore hath annexed no such condition. We have seen, through all the several parts of Duty, which constitute the Gentleman's Calling, that they are of a quite distant frame, not Toils but Refreshments, not Yokes but Crowns, such as differ only in size from those Celestial ones to which they tend; so that here is bait even to the greatest voluptuary. And who that observes how many such there be, would expect this Fruit of Paradise should still hang untouched; yet such a preposterous Temperance have they put on, that they are proof against all these allurements. Good God! what contradictions are men made up of? It is the business of their lives to pursue pleasures, and yet when those of the most resined and exquisite sort would run into their embraces, they grow coy, and cannot be courted to receive them. We daily see the Devil hath his Martyrs, it seems he hath his Asceticks too; and so witty is the World grown in creating sins, that they have found out a sin of self-denial. Would God these absurd Mortifiers might be persuaded to remit somewhat of their severity, the most rigid Orders in Religion have still indulged some relaxation, sometimes of Festivity; why should Satan's Votaries be so much more zealous, then God's, as to make their abstinences so perpetual?

7. It speaks indeed the Cruelty of that Master they serve, but so it does his Policy also, he well knows that if these Divine Lights should but insinuate themselves, they would soon undermine his whole Foundation; so ravishing and attractive are they, that nothing but a perfect Ignorance of them can be Amulet sufficient against their Charms; and therefore it is his necessary concern to keep men from ever tasting of them, the least relish whereof would be sure to make them despise all his adulterated delicacies. So we see he can give some rational account of his part of the matter. But what can Men say for themselves, who play his game for him, even when their own souls are at the stake, that at once renounce that Eternal interest, and Present pleasure? This is indeed in David's phrase, 2 Sam. 3. 33. to die as a fool dieth. Their hands are not bound, nor their feet put into fetters; no extrinsic hindrance lies on them, why they may not stretch forth their hand to this Tree of life, and eat and live happily here, and gloriously sor ever. And yet like Solomon's Sluggard, they hide their hands in their bosom, and will not so much as bring them to their mouths, Pro. 19. 24.

8. This is so stupid a Folly, as none that pretends to common sense, would in any worldly concernment be guilty of, Will any man renounce a rich unchargeable Reversion, when he is not only wooed, but bribed by a considerable sum in hand not to disclaim it? I fear there are few so mortified to Wealth, as to do it upon the score of Self-denial; and sure no man would be thought in his wits, that should do it upon any other; for what jealousies soever he had entertained of the Security, or Value of that future Estate, yet the present visible profit would deserve his consideration: There is but one circumstance imaginable, that could reasonably avert him, and that is the suspicion of Deceit, that the Coin which is offered him is false and adulterate. And that I may not be under a necessity of pronouncing so many men mad, I shall suppose it not unlikely that this scruple may occur to them in the present Case: They have so long brought all their Bullion to Satan's Mint, suffered him to stamp their Pleasures, that none will now pass for current with them, which has not his Impress; and upon this account 'tis too probable they may distrust the validity of the present Paiment, disbelieve the pleasantness of those Duties I have here recommended to their Enjoyment, as well as Practice. Nor shall I desire to impose on their belief, but shall very willingly wave their Faith, and appeal to their Sense. But then they must remember, that that is incapable of judging by any other means but Experience; and therefore if all that has been addrest to their Reason be ineffectual, that remains as the last reserve for their convincement. Let everyone of them seriously and conscientiously set to the Practice, (and allow only for so much of difficulty, as naturally attends the interrupting a contrary Custom) and then let him, if he can, doubt of the Pleasure: Let him allow himself but this one Medium to infer it, and I shall defy his dissent to the Conclusion. Let him sow with me this handful of seed in the tears of true contrition for remembering his Duty and Interests so late, and I shall rest confident he will reap in joy in this world, and carry the news of it to another, even thither also bring his sheaves with him, abundance of fruit to his account, be blest here, and crowned eternally.

A Confession.

O Blessed Lord, I thy wretched Creature, thy not only unprofitable, and slothful, but wicked Servant, do here. prostrate myself at thy Feet, humbly acknowledging that I have most perversely and most treacherously mis-employed those many precious Talents wherewith thou hast entrusted me. I have, O Lord, unworthily abused those common Mercies which thou hast afforded me as a Man, and a Christian, my whole life having been a continued resistance to the dictates both of Reason and Religion. But I have yet farther perverted those more special Liberalities of thine, whereby thou hast essayed to vanquish and melt an ungrateful heart. My Knowledge hath had no influence on my Choices, but I have obstinately pursued those ways, which I knew led to the Chambers of Death, and by advancing my Sins from Ignorances to Presumptions, hath served only to render me liable to the greater number of stripes. That Wealth whereby I should have glorified Thee, and succoured my Brethren, I have converted into fuel to maintain and accend my Covetousness, Pride, and Luxury, so levying war against Thee with thine own Treasure. Thus unfaithful, O Lord, have I been in the unrighteous Mammon; and who then shall commit to my trust the true Riches? I have wasted that Time thou hast given me to work out my own Salvation, vainly and impertinently, nay often so viciously and impiously, that Idleness, though a Crying sin of Sodom, hath been the silentest of my guilts, the greater portion of my Days having been devoted either to the pursuit or enjoyment of my brutish Pleasures, so making it my business to provide for the Flesh to fulfil the Lusts thereof; and of those many Days and Years thou hast afforded me, how few minutes are there of which I can give any tolerable account to Thee, or my own Soul? Nay, O Lord, as if my single and personal Impieties had been too little, I have propagated them to Others, and have made that Authority and Esteem, which thou gavest me for better purposes▪ the means of ensnaring all whom my Interest or Example could seduce. And now, O Lord, how unknown astonishing a weight of guilt do I lie under, that am to answer for so many Sins of Other men, as well as myself, that have thus been a Snare on Mizraim, and a Net spread on Mount Tabor, the Instrument of entangling and betraying so many Souls? O merciful Lord; who delightest not in the death of a sinner, look with pity both on them, and me; Give me a sincere and earnest Repentance for my own offenses, and if it be thy blessed will, make me some way instrumental to the begetting the like in them, that I may be as contributive to their Recovery, as I have been to their Fall: And let the consciousness of my great Sloth and Unfaithfulness in all the parts of my Stewardship, excite me to a more diligent and industrious improvement of all those advantages thou hast put into my hands, for thy glory, the benefit of my Brethren, and the eternal joy of my own Soul. Grant this, O gracious Lord, for his sake who came to Call sinners to Repentance, Jesus Christ our Lord.

A Thanksgiving.

O Most gracious and most bountiful Lord, who doest good unto all, but hast in an extraordinary measure abounded to me thy unworthiest Servant, I desire with all exuberant thankfulness of heart, to confess and celebrate this thy great goodness. Lord, Thou hast not been to me a Wilderness, a Land of Darkness, but hast caused my Lot to fall in a fair ground. Thou hast not only given me a Natural, and a capacity of a Spiritual life, but hast also enriched me with many Advantages for the comfortable support of the one, and the happy improvement of the other, above what thou affordest to multitudes of others. Thou hast liberally given me of the Dew of Heaven, and fatness of the Earth, an Assurance of all those good things which may both oblige and assist me cheerfully to serve Thee. O let not my Heart like Gideon's Fleece remain dry, whilst all about it is thus plentifully watered from Heaven; but give me, I beseech thee, such a sense of thy Mercy, as may express itself in a constant and zealous Obedience. Thou hast done so much for this meanest Plant in thy Vineyard, dressed it and fenced it about with Thy Grace and Providence; and having built a Wine-press, mayest most reasonably expect some Clusters to be brought to it at the Vintage. O let not so gracious, so equitable a demand be frustrated, when thou lookest it should bring forth Grapes, let it not bring forth wild Grapes; let not those Advantages I enjoy above others, tempt me to exalt myself, or despise them, but grant me always to remember that it is Thou only that makest me differ from another. Lord, let thy Methods be my Documents, thy Dispensations of Indulgence towards me, the Engagements and Bands of the closest and most inviolable Duty, that that Eminency of Condition wherein Thou hast placed me in this World, may be an effectual Admonition to me to be eminent in Virtue that Men seeing my good Works, may glorisise Thee my Heavenly Father, through Jesus Christ our Lord and Blessed Savior.

A Prayer.

O Thou most Righteous and Impartial Judge, who despisest not the mean, nor acceptest the persons of the Mighty, Make me always to remember and seriously to consider, that none of those outward privileges I enjoy among men, can exempt me from thy severe Tribunal, but that I shall one day be brought to Judgment, as for all that I have done in the flesh, so particularly for those special and peculiar Advantages, whereby thou hast discriminated me from my meaner brethren: And oh let these Terrors of the Lord timely persuade, yea constrain me to a careful employing of all I have received, to those ends for which thou hast bestowed them. Lord, grant that the Knowledge thou hast given me may have such an efficacy on my Practice, that it may always guide, never upbraid me. And as thou hast opened thy hand wide to me in temporal Plenty, so enlarge my heart in Thankfulness toward thee, and in Compassion and bounty toward thy poor members: I am not straitened by thee, O let me not be straitened in my own bowels; let neither Covetousness nor Riot make me poor in the midst of Riches, but grant me that true Enjoyment which consists in a Charitable dispensing of them, that forsaking all the unsatisfying nauseated pleasures of Luxury, I may purchase to myself that more solid transcending delight of succoring the distresses of my fellow Christians. Lord, suffer not my Wealth to be only a lading with thick clay, nor the rust of it to bear witness against me, but rather make me of the number of those that need relief, then of those who want hearts to give it. And since in thy gracious Providence thou hast placed me in a condition of ease and vacancy, O let me not pervert it into a life of Idleness and Sensuality, let me not be less, but better busied then other men. O never suffer me to incur the guilt or reproach of being more remiss or indifferent in my intercourse with Thee, then others are of their traffic with the World, of having less care of my own and other men's immortal souls, then they have of their corruptible bodies; but make me so industriously to husband every minute of that precious Time thou lendest me here, as may be in order to a blessed Eternity both of myself, and as many more as thou shalt put within my reach. O let not any persons ever have cause to accuse their Relation to me, for betraying them to Sin here, or Misery hereafter; but grant that all that are under my care or power, may receive such wholesome influence from me, as may nourish all Christian Practice among them; And, Lord, grant that my Example may be such to all, that I never prove to any an occasion of Falling: Let me never contribute to that power and empire which Vice has gotten in the world, but with a steady courage oppose all Impiety, how customary or successful soever; Let me think nothing Honorable, but what bears Thy stamp and impress on it, but engage, and animate, and inflame my benumm'd breast, to the most eager and vigorous endeavor of recovering discountenanced Virtue to some esteem and reputation among men. And, O Lord, grant that by an assiduous Practice of all Duty, I may arrive to such a gust and relish of it, as may utterly supplant any sensual delights in my own heart, and may also qualify me experimentally to assure others how sweet the Lord is, that I may be an effectual (though unworthy) Instrument in thy hand of drawing many to the Obedience of Christ, and that renouncing all the vain torturing Ambitions of this world, I may aspire to no other honor but that of being approved by Thee as a good and faithful Servant; That by thy mercy having my Infirmities covered, and my Sincerity accepted, I may at last be admitted into the Joy of my Lord, through the merits of Jesus Christ my blessed Savior and Mediator.

Amen.

THE PREFACE.

THE Government of the Thoughts was some Years since designed for the Press, but not till this opportunity, thought fit to make its Appearance. The Tract indeed in point of Justice, must own its Original Theme, to that Most Excellent and Learned Author of The Whole Duty of Man; and had not the Grave and Darkness deprived us of so great a Luminary, this Treatise would have appeared in perfect Luster, with all those Embellishments which so Exquisite a Pen could have rendered it.

The main Subject Matter of this Discourse, is to persuade Men to regulate their inordinate Thoughts and Affections, that such an unruly Member, as St. James affirms the Tongue to be, may not break out into that Conflagration, as all their Reason cannot easily quench: For out of the Heart proceeds all Evil Thoughts, the product of bad Actions, which are concomitant to contumelious Speeches: And indeed I presume, we cannot place too strong a Guard on that which appears so formidable an Enemy, and threatens us with so much Violence, which if not speedily prevented, may in the end prove Destructive.

I cannot reasonably expect, that this Product of my Labors should find a candid Acceptance of all Persons; or like the Manna, accomodate every Palate, especially in this Censorious Age, wherein some approve of nothing but the Minerva of their own Brain; I wish I could not say many, (like those foolish Heathens) Adore their own Maladies, applauding themselves for Benevolent and Prudent, by disgusting all that's good and wholesome, which is indeed a Symptom of a disaffected Palate.

I am not ignorant, that a Speaker ventureth within the reach of Censure; and that a Writer fixes himself to the Stake: Yet in hope that some may reap benefit by my Labors, I resolve not to be discouraged, if any shall prove so malign as to render Evil to my good Intentions, my Labor is with that Omnipotency who appointed some cheap Sacrifices, that the Poor might serve him as well as the Rich, and requiring principally willing Hearts, Exod. 35.6, 7, &c. And he that possessed not Jewels, Gold, Silver, Silk, Purple, or of the like Estimation, might produce Skins and Goats-hair, which were of inconsiderable Value, but proved Acceptable. You who enjoy a greater share of Heavenly Treasures, offer of your Fulness; for the Almighty accepteth the poor Widows Mites where no more is Expected.

And now let us hasten to enter into that sacred way of Charity, which directeth to Salvation, and persevere in that Truth which never Deceiveth, nor is Deceived; so that at the last we may enter into the Kingdom of Glory. To conclude, I shall only add what St. Paul said upon his departure, to the Elders of Miletum, Acts 20.32. And now Brethren, I commend you to God, and to the Word of his Grace, which is able to build you up, and to give you an Inheritance among all them which are Sanctified. Read Happily, and Practice Diligently, not omitting St. Paul's Instructions to Timothy, in his Second Epistle, 2 Chap. ver. 2. Consider what I say, and the Lord give you Understanding in all things.

THE Government of the Thoughts.

CHAP. I. Of the Chief Governor, the Soul.

THERE are diversity of Things, of whose Being we know, whose Quality we know not: All confess we enjoy a Soul which Commandeth, and Restraineth, in us. What a one it is, none can tell. Hence are those many Disputes concerning its Essence, Seat and Subject, with the subordinate Faculties of it. No Person hath thoroughly been acquainted with this secret Governor in Man. Some Philosophers have defined it a Harmony: Some a Divine Virtue, a Particle of the Deity: Some the most exile and slender Air: Some, a Blood: Some, Heat, or Fire: Some, Number. So innate is Error, that we most Err concerning our own selves.

2. MORE judiciously do they define it, who attest it an Immortal Spirit, an Incorporeal Substance, Created by Infusion, and Infused in its Creaation, made to the Image of the Creator, capable of the light of Understanding, Wisdom, Holiness, Blessedness, and Eternity: So that in its conjunction with the Body, it Animateth, giveth Life, Action, and Motion, (wherein it differeth from an Angel) and in its separation from the Body for a time (until it shall be reunited at the Resurrection) it Subsisteth, as the Angels, and hath its proper Acts and Apprehensions, as they have: Now, as the Eye beholds the Eye in a Glass; so the Soul discerneth itself by a kind of Reflex.

3. THE Soul is a divine Ghost sent from Heaven, into these Tabernacles of Clay, to give them Life and govern them; yet is it neither visible coming nor departing: It is an Immortal Form of Mortality: The Body Decayeth, the Soul doth not, being neither subject to Time nor Age: The Motions thereof are Eternal; it apprehendeth things Present, Absent, Past, and Future; it Deliberateth, Formeth, Directeth, Discourseth, Judgeth, Doubteth, Concludeth: So excellent it is, that Cicero the Orator said, God hath not given anything so Divine to Man; and that there are certain Lineaments thereof more beautiful than of the Body.

4. THE Body is adorned by the Soul; without which, Beauty itself appears Gastly: And good Abraham said, Give me a possession of a Burying-place, that I may Bury my Dead out of my sight,

Gen. 23.4. The Soul cannot be Deformed by any unevenness, discomposure, or disproportion of the Body which it Animateth: As a beautiful Creature is the same in a poor Cottage, as in a magnificent Palace: So is Virtue, which is the Beauty of the Soul. Could we but behold the Soul of a Saint, there's no Embellishment on Earth so Glorious; no Created Beauty here of so divine a Luster.

5. THE Soul, though now enclosed in Obscurity (having only some diviner Breathings in the Raptures and Heavenly Contemplations, which sometimes allurum it up, like Moses, to the Mount, or like a Jacob's Ladder, ascendeth it into God's Presence) hath some knowledge of its Original by Faith and Joy unspeakable in the apprehension thereof, 1 Pet. 1.8. which arresteth the Desire, as appeared in St. Peter seeing Christ's Transfiguration, Matt. 17. and St. Paul's wishing to be Dissolved, was a signal Evidence of our interest in Heaven; therefore our Pusillanimity cannot deter us from it, Phil. 1.

6. HE knoweth whether he shall go who remembereth whence he came: But what shall be the transcendent Beauty of a Devout Soul in its Separation, when it shall be restored to its native Heaven; when it shall be all Illumination, and God shall be all in all? Christ's Raiment on the Mount became shining white as Snow, so as no Fuller on Earth could white them, Mark 9.3. And Moses Face when he talked with God, became so Glorious, that Israel could not behold it without a Veil, 2 Cor. 3.13. What then shall our Glory be when we shall be like Christ? 1 Joh. 3.2.

CHAP. II. Of the Faculties of the Soul.

THE Faculties of the Soul are the Understanding, Will, Memory, Affections, and Senses Internal and External. My purpose being not to enter the List with Philosophers, but to direct Christians, I shall not further consider these, but what concerns the Practical part, and right governing the thoughts of the Heart and Mind, to the Service of God and our Mortification, and the means of qualifying ourselves for it.

2. THE Heart, in Scripture often taken for the principal Seat of the rational Soul, imparteth any Faculty hereof: The Mind is the inward act, the result and product of its Reason, and Discourses the Thoughts. The Learned affirm, the Mind is the fountain of Counsel, and Soul of Life: And again, we understand by the Mind, and live by the Soul. The Mind of Man is sometimes a Sovereign, to govern in Virtue and Sanctimony itself; and the Body sometimes a Tyrant, and indulging to Vice, which like the Worm bred in the Wood destroyeth its own Original: It is often misled by tumultuous Passions, Lusts, Vain-desires, and other Perturbations of a discomposed Mind, which unthron'd Reason dangerously gains an Usurpation.

3. A prudent Man, whose Knowledge is his Life, in the light, height, and use thereof, differing him not only from the Brutes, but ignorant Men; doth principally enjoy himself in his Mind and inward Man. There is indeed in human Possessions, nothing great and excellent, but a magnanimous and good Mind; contemning External Greatness, or supposed Excellencies, such as Power, Strength, Riches, Beauty, Wit, &c. obvious to Sense in respect of that which is within, apprehensible by the enlightened Understanding.

4. AND certainly the All-wise God, who Created the Affections, ordained them to some excellent end and use in the Soul, as Hand-maids to Devotion and Religion: neither would he in our Regeneration, kill, but correct them, by moderating them, where they grow extreme; and retrenching them into their own Channels, where they over-flow their banks, like over-rank Water Sources, becoming muddy and choked up with that which they fetch in from without; or reducing them, where they are Exorbitant.

5. ALL Extreams are foolish and dangerous: A Stoical Apathy is incompatible with a well-composed Mind, as a violent Passion with a Prudent: The dead Calm corrupteth Air and Water, and violent Blasts disturb them; the moderate more safely purify; but the mean is best. Affections are, as it is said of Caligula, There is no better Servant, nor worse Master; they are good commanded, but mischievous reigning; like Fire, and Water, very necessary, and very destructive.

6. WITHOUT Love there can be no acceptable Service; without Anger, no Zeal; without Fear, no co-ercive power in the Soul; without Hope, no Comfort; which bringeth us to a necessary Consideration of the Hearts Corruption; the vanity and exorbitancy of the Thoughts; and the necessity of their Regulations by some Rules of Practice.

CHAP. III. Of the Hearts Corruptions.

THE Corruptions of the Heart, are, as in the Primitive Age of the World, Gen. 6.5. Only evil continually. The Heart is the fountain of Sin; and the Evangelist tells us, Mat. 15.19. from thence spring evil Thoughts, Murders, Adulteries, Fornications, Thefts, false Witnesses, Blasphemies, all the Sins of Man. All Iniquity is here forged; as it is written, Isai. 32.6. His Heart will work Iniquity; hence words of falsehood are conceived and uttered, Isai. 59.13. Here the kingly Prophet declares is the root of War, Psal. 55.21. And the Royal Preacher acknowledges it the seat of Mischief, Prov. 6.18. Error, Frowardness, and that Obdurateness, which excludeth all capacity of hearing God's Word and Judgments, which should lead us to Repentance whereby we may be healed, Psal. 95.10. Prov. 11.20.

2. THE Heart is deceitful above all things; who can know it? Jer. 17.9. There lodgeth Hypocrisy, Jer. 3.10. and many secret Sins; like that unseen Multitude, which rangeth through the Paths of the Deeps, such are the dark Councils of the Heart of Man, which Solomon informs us, Prov. 20.5. Nor is this the Condition of some few, but the secret Corruption of all natural Men; nor are the Regenerate absolutely freed from these Pollutions, being yet partly flesh: We have St. Paul's word for it, Gal. 5.17. For the flesh lusteth against the Spirit, and the Spirit against the Flesh: and these are contrary the one to the other; so that ye cannot do the things that ye would.

3. THE danger hereof fully appears, that these are the Seeds of every Sin, and fomenters thereof; yea, that which obstructeth Faith and Repentance; for as the Physicians affirm, if there be a fault in the first Concoction, there will follow the like in the rest; so it is here, the Hearts Sickness is derived to the Tongue, and all the Actions of Man: It is a People, said the Lord, that do err in their Hearts, and they have not known my ways, Psal. 95.10. As the Eye is deceived through a false Medium; So is the Mind through the cloud of false Opinion: And the Wise Man tells us, Prov. 24.9. That the thought of Foolishness is Sin, into which they must needs run, says the Psalmist, Who set not their heart aright, and whose Spirit is not steadfast with God, Psal. 78.8.

4. THE Almighty searcheth the Secrets of all Hearts, and will at the Great Audit, make all the Thoughts thereof manifest: God requireth the Heart, says Solomon, Prov. 23.26. and David tells you, If a Man regard Iniquity in his Heart, the Lord will not hear him, Psal. 66.18. and Wisdom expresses, Prov. 16.5. That the Thoughts of the Wicked are an abomination to the Lord; and they who have wicked Thoughts, run swiftly to iniquity; and Destruction is in their Paths, Isai. 59.7. In the Corruption of the Heart, the very fibrae and remainders of Sins reviving root, Satan's venom remaineth: The Hydra's ever-growing Heads, which (when occasions and ability so fail, that the impious cannot serve the Devil in External Actions) will show its venom in their will to Sin.

5. IN the next place, it is a very difficult thing rightly to compose the Thoughts, in respect of the Hearts unfathomed Deceitfulness, and the Mind's unlimited Agility; in these depths of quick-shifting Thoughts, Sin easily hideth itself: External Sins in Words or Works, are (like the Plague of Leprosy, Levite. 13.12, 13. broken all abroad and covering all the Skin) nearer the Cure, and by so much the more easily amended, or overcome, by how much more evident they are, not only to others, but also to ourselves.

6. THE Sins of the Heart are harder to be cured, the more secret, and invisibly they are Committed: The Thoughts are more securely Extravagant, Negligent and Presuming by how much less they are obvious, to any Pretender, or Censurer without: And where the Heart is smitten with some awful fear of God, and resolution to Repent, maketh Inquest after Sin; that which is in Word, or Action, is more easily and frequently found: But the sin of the Mind, like Jonathan and Ahimaaz at Bahurim, is let down into the depth of the Heart, whose secret Enemies are like those Ligurian Mountainers, whom the Roman's Chased, more hardly found, than Vanquished. Moreover, Man's innate Self-Love and natural Complacency, makes him unapt, and loath to Condemn himself, in anything wherein he conjectures others cannot.

7. LASTLY, The restless machination of Satan is to suggest Self-delusions, as he doth Temptations to Sin, whereby his Baits may be swallowed. His policy is to keep the Heart for his Retreat; and if any reproof happily chase away Profaneness, Anger, Obscenity, or Calumny out of the Tongue, or Adultery, Theft, Murder, or the like, from the outward Man; yet if he can but foment and maintain any of these in the impure Heart, he will find opportunity and diabolical Suggestions, to make an Eruption: Or if not, he knoweth where he has Possession, be the Words and Actions never so well framed, that God hath no part there, which brings me to the next Consideration.

CHAP. IV. The necessity of Governing our Thoughts.

THERE is great necessity of Regulating our Thoughts and Heart, without which, as the Prophet says, Isa. 29.13. It is in vain to draw near to God with our Lips. And the art of governing the Affections and Thoughts, must be performed by Wisdom and Integrity. Wisdom is as a Mistress to tumultuous Servants, at whose Presence the most Disorderly are suddenly Composed and Silenced. An understanding Heart is the inward illumination of the Soul, which God beholds; without which, all External appearances of Sanctity make formal Hypocrites no better than Egyptian Temples, grave and decent outwardly, but within, very ridiculous; setting up for God's, Apes, Serpents, Cats and Crocodiles.

2. SOLOMON, to whom God granted a free choice of anything he would request, desired, an Understanding Heart, 1 Kings, 3.5.9.12. This was more estimable to him than Riches or Life; and he, whom God was pleased to make the Wisest of Men, of all the Holy Pen-men, gave most Precepts concerning the Heart and Mind; and we are commanded for our further directions, to search the Scriptures, which as the Apostle tells us, are only able to make us wise to Salvation, 2 Tim. 3.15. And St. James requires us to ask Wisdom of God, that giveth to all Men liberally, and Upbraideth not, James 1.5. He that trusteth in his own Heart, is a Fool, Prov. 28.26. Again, the Wise Man like a true Prognostick, tells you, That the Heart of the Sons of Men is full of Evil, and madness is in their Heart while they live, Eccl. 9.3. Unhappy is he who goeth on perversely in the way of his own Heart, or walks contrary to the Apostle's Rule, 1 Cor. 3.19. persuing the Wisdom of this World, which is foolishness with God.

3. WE must so compose our Hearts, that they may be upright and sincere in the sight of God. Without this, our best actions, as Prayer, Hearing, Repentance, Alms, and whatever else we do, is worth nothing. O Jerusalem, saith the Lord, wash thy Heart from wickedness, that thou mayest be Saved: How long shall thy vain thoughts lodge in thee? Jer. 4.14. It is but folly to labor the Cure in the outward part, while the Contagion and Venom of Sin invades the inward; or to wash the Eyes with floods of Tears, where the sin of Judah is written with a Pen of Iron, and graven with the point of a Diamond, upon the Table of the Heart, Jer. 17.1.

4. THE Psalmist tells us, Psal. 84.5. Blessed are they in whose Heart are the ways of God: And that he is good unto such as are of a clean Heart, Psal. 73.1. And the Prophet tells you, Jer. 29.13. They shall find him who seek him with all their Heart. And they that know righteousness, have the Law of God in their Heart, Isa. 51.7. And Psal. 37.31. Their steps shall not slide; they delight to do God's Will, Psal. 40.8. And Psal. 119.11. They hide up the Law of God in their heart, that they might not sin against him: The knowledge of God is pleasant unto their Soul, Prov. 2.10. and Prov. 3.2. They shall have length of days and Peace; and when they go, it shall lead them; when they sleep, it shall keep them; when they wake, it shall talk with them, Prov. 6.22. It is a Lamp and Light to direct them in the ways of Life to preserve them from Sin.

5. NOW, however the ways of an Hypocrite may seem clean in his own Eyes, yet seeing the God of Justice Weigheth the Spirits, Prov. 16.2. it highly concerneth every Man to look to the ordering of this inward House, that it may be a clean Temple, for God's Spirit to dwell in, without whose guidance, Man runs to Destruction, both Body and Soul. If we govern our Thoughts aright, we have our conversation in Heaven, we walk with God: And in our many dangerous sicknesses of Mind, sundry Distempers, and Perturbations of fluctuant Thoughts, the wearied Soul shall ever have recourse unto this Ark for Rest.

6. THERE are troublesome Errors of sick minds which see false Comforts instead of true. There is Anxiety, Impatience and Grief which devoureth the Heart: There is the fire of Anger to inflame, Envy and Malice to transport, vain Hopes and Fears, whose vicissitudes do miserably afflict the disquiet Mind. There are many Perturbations, which if not prudently managed, will master Reason, and violently carry Men into the most dangerous Precipices, from whence they cannot, when they would retrieve themselves: All which to a wise and good Man, shall prove but Exercises to make his Victory over his own Passions more Glorious.

7. NOR is he less Honorable who is victor over himself, than he that conquereth others. The great Conquerors of Kingdoms have been overcome of their own Affections; whereby they have foolishly eclipsed all the Glory of their Victories. The Strong may vanquish others; but only the Good can overcome themselves. I shall conclude with the Saying of a Pious Man, I had rather overcome my own Mind, than all my Enemies; and I would I were secure of myself: All the Powers of Hell, cannot overcome me, nor make me unhappy if my own Affections betray me not.

CHAP. V. Rules of Practice.

FOR the right composure of Mind and Thoughts, it is very requisite to consider those Rules of Practice which concern the same in general; and then that which appertaineth to some particular Passions of the Mind. First, Have a care of thy Soul as thy greatest Interest, and that which surpasseth all things in the World: Next have a care of thy Mind, which, if well composed, is prudently Content in every Estate, without which Even Temper, nothing can prove good, or comfortable. What is Strength? Sickness may anticipate, but Age must bow down to the Grave. What is Beauty? Why those Flowers quickly fade, and many times become the Snare and Destruction of foolish and unhappy Owners.

2. WHAT are Honors, where a qualification of Mind is wanting to manage them? Those Phaetons precipitate themselves, and set the World on fire. What are Riches without a Mind well qualified, but snares, and easy ways to Hell? All things duly weighed to a prudent Mind, which can limit itself within the desires of Necessaries, a little is enough; but to an ambitious Mind, nothing can satisfy. Alexander had a monstrous Mind when he was grieved, that there was but one World for him to Conquer. 'Tis the Mind that maketh truly Rich or Poor; That, contented in every Estate, aboundeth in its own Happiness; but discontented, can be blessed in none.

3. THE way to gain Riches, is not so much by adding to an Estate, as by depriving the Mind of that foolish desire of having Superfluity beyond use. Temporal Riches are but a burden to him, who hath truly placed his Affections on Heaven, where neither Moth nor Rust doth corrupt, and where Thieves do not break through and steal, Matth. 6.20. That which must once be lost, is nothing worth; which Consideration possibly made Stilpo answer like a Philosopher, who when Demetrius had taken Megara, and out of a noble Care to give him Protection from Plundering, asked him if the Soldiers had taken ought from him, he answered, No; for, said he, I saw no Man that would take any Knowledge, or Learning from me.

4. THE Mind is Sacred, and out of the reach of violent hands; so that to make thee happy, which is the scope of a prudent Desire, the way is not to labor so much, and disquiet thyself in things External, but to compose thy Mind aright, to value and make a good Use of what thou hast; to get true Wisdom and Understanding, and well-ordered Affections, quietly to endure want, or enjoy plenty: In which there is not only an admirable skill and strength of Mind requisite, but also an holy Habit. No Precepts can suddenly make a Man practically wise, or good; which must make us resolve quickly to study this Divine Philosophy: And indeed, Experience here discovereth a marvelous Stupor, and Incogitancy of most Men. In any bodily Dissection, we speedily consult the Physician; but in our Soul's Distempers, we not only delay our seeking help, but are too often impatient of offered Remedies. That which thou designest to do well, speedily put in practice.

5. SOLOMON's advice is, Prov. 4.23. To keep thine Heart with all diligence; for out of it are the issues of Life. Many think it enough to keep their Tongues and their Hands. But it highly concerneth all Christians to keep their Hearts from Satan's Snares; there he beginneth all his Stratagems which afterwards break out into Words and Actions. It is true, that bare Suggestions without any delight, or consent of our own, are no more our Sins, than any Robbery or Murder committed without our Consent or Knowledge: But except we are vigilant over our Thoughts, and carefully stand upon our guard, Satan's deluding Influences will create a Delight, and excite in us a Consent, and concession to them; Therefore the Counsel of the Wise Man is this, Prov. 7.25. Let not thine Heart decline to her ways, go not astray in her paths.

6. CHECK the first beginnings of Sin in thy Thoughts use them roughly at the door, and think of the Prophet Elisha's saying, 2 Kings 6.33. Is not the sound of their Masters Feet behind them? We must there chiefly observe and extinguish Sin, where 'tis born, and quench the Sparks, before they break out into masterless Flames. We must crush the Cockatrice in the Egg, before it proves a fiery flying Serpent. We neglect not the biting of a Serpent, but presently seek remedy to keep the Venom from the Heart: With how much more care and diligence should we look to the biting of the Old Dragon, Rev. 12.9. who is able, if a little neglected, to kill Body and Soul? Of evil Seeds, spring evil Plants. Murder from Revenge in the Heart; Adultery from Lust unextinguish'd there; and God justly castigateth evil Intentions, though they do not always break forth into Actions.

7. KEEP a good Conscience, and put on Sanctity. The Wicked meditate on Evil; and the Prophet Isaiah affirms, cahp. 59.7. That their Thoughts are Thoughts of Iniquity; Wasting and Destruction are in their paths. As our Actions follow our Thoughts, so do they leave Impressions in them, which prove occasions of their further Operation; and Solomon tells you, Prov. 12.5. That the Thoughts of the Righteous are right; but the Counsels of the Wicked are deceit. Love good Thoughts, and thou shalt be furnished with them; as Flowers spring out of Buds, so good Desires flow from Celestial Thoughts. We often think of those we Love, and are ambitious of their Acquaintance. Think often of God, for his Love will cause thee to detest all thoughts of Evil, and will hinder the approaches of that old malicious Serpent to thy Heart.

8. FIX thy Thoughts on something certain. The Heart is a spiritual Labyrinth, in whose perplexed turnings we often lose ourselves; and the best fruits of idle and extravagant Fancies, are but as the Eyes, continually rolling up and down, seeing nothing intently, but a wandering Mind. It is a signal Token of a composed Mind, if it can contain itself, and not launch out into those vain Evagations and wandering Thoughts: From whence waking as out of some feverish Dream, after much thinking, we can give ourselves no true account, what the Mind has busied itself about; but that in long thinking, we thought on nothing to the Purpose.

9. THE Mind is Man's most active Faculty: In a Moment, with the flight of a Thought, it mounts from Earth to Heaven, and back again from Age to Age; from Present, to Future: Like Lightning, it shoots from East to West, vanishing in the Appearance. It is not a little skill to arrest it so, as that we may say with David, Psal. 108.1. My heart is fixed; O God, my heart is fixed. Without this we can neither Hear nor Pray, otherwise than profane Hypocrites, provoking God's Anger, by drawing near him with their Lips, when their Hearts are far from thinking on him.

10. SEEK Peace with God through Faith in Christ; for therein consists the true Composure and happy Rest of the Mind. The Prophet tells you, Isa. 57.21. There's no Peace to the Wicked; neither is there any true Rest out of Christ Jesus. Sin is the distemper and disquiet of the Soul. Until that Jonah be cast over-board, we can never appease the Surges of a troubled Mind. This thou mayest seek by hearty sorrow for thy Sins; this restringent Acrimony shall heal the Fountains, that Death and Barrenness may no more fluctuate from the Mind into thy Words and Actions. 'Tis a good symptom of Recovery when the Disease changeth Place: So when we are pleased with Repentance, who were wont to please ourselves with Sin, 'tis a token that Sin declineth in us.

11. BY Committing thy works unto the Lord, thy thoughts shall be Established, Prov. 16.3. and by filling thy Soul with such happy thoughts, as constant Meditation, or God's Word will furnish thee: And Wisdom, as a Monitor advises thee, Ecclus. 6.37. Let thy mind be upon the Ordinances of the Lord, and meditate continually on his Commandments; he shall establish thine Heart and give thee Wisdom at thine own desire. Overcome thine own Mind, and in everything as much as possibly thou canst, subject it to right Reason, and let not Affection or Passion master it.

12. SET thy Mind ever upon some good, to prevent the rising of evil Thoughts, that the Tempter may never find thee at leisure to entertain him. The Mind is naturally active and prone to thoughts: Even when thou liest Dormant it hath its Motions. Employ it then in some Business, it cannot be Idle. As the Earth neglected, for want of Culture, bringeth forth noisome Weeds; so will the Mind evil and vain extravagant Thoughts, if it be not duly Cultivated. Often the light of Reason is Eclipsed by the mischievous interposition of vicious Thoughts: Yet perplex not thy Mind with too much, or too weighty Affairs: Proportion thy undertakings to thy Strength: The Mind requireth some intermissions and rest, which otherwise, like the Fields, with perpetual Bearing, will grow Fruitless. The Unballanced Ship is easily Overset with every gust of Wind: And too much Burden Sinketh her.

13. THERE is an Ark of God's secret Counsel, which our thoughts must not pry into. There are also admirable Mysteries, from whence God calleth out of the fiery Bush, Exod. 3.2, 5. Come not nigh hither, put off thy Shoes from off thy Feet, &c. Resign thy Thoughts to God's Immensity: It is enough to believe his Truth, though thou canst not examine his incomprehensible Secrets. If thou wilt play with these Flames, thou wilt burn thy Wings: God hath revealed sufficiently enough to make thee Happy: Ambition of knowing more, destroyed Mankind.

14. COMMUNE with thine own Heart concerning that, which may advantageously make thee Happy. Divine Soliloquies are Heavenly Raptures and the Soul's prepossession of that Blessedness. Inure thy Heart to ponder on good and heavenly things; and such will thy Thoughts, Words and Actions be. The Heart of the Wise teacheth his Mouth, says Solomon, Prov. 16.23. Custom grows habitual; therefore also the Wise man saith, Wisdom resteth in the heart of him that hath Understanding, Prov. 14.33. If the Wicked, the worst of Fools, have any notion thereof, it can no more rest with them, than Lightning in the Air.

15. TAKE the Prophet's advice, Jer. 17.10. To set God ever before thee, as a Searcher of hearts: And that which thou wouldst detest to speak before others, abhor to think with thyself. Thoughts are the words of the Heart, which God heareth; who therefore saith, Matt. 9.4. Wherefore think you Evil in your hearts? And Solomon gives us this Charge, Eccles. 10.20. Curse not the King, no not in thy Thought. Thou must be pure in Heart, if ever thou meanest to see God. Let not thy Heart dissent from thy Tongue; neither desire to appear more Holy than thou art, if thou intendest to please him who is Omniscient.

16. PRAY, and beseech the Lord with the earnest Supplication of the Psalmist, to Create a clean heart, and to renew a right Spirit within thee, Psal. 51.10. To incline thy heart unto his Testimonies, Psal. 119.36. Then Pray with the Prophet, Jer. 24.7. That God would give thee a heart to know him: To prepare thy Heart that thou mayst truly fear him, Meditate on him, and Love him above all: And That he who cast out the tumultuous Rabble from Jairus's House, would also be pleased to cast out of thy Soul and Mind, all those thoughts which offend him, or hinder the raising up thy Soul to the life of Grace here, whereby it may be fit for the life of Glory hereafter.

CHAP. VI. Of the affections of Love and Delight.

FOR the right governing the Thoughts arising from some particular Affections, or Passions, which usually discompose and render the Mind less apt for the Service of God, and less comfortable to ourselves, we must ever have in mind the General Rule before laid down, that extreme and violent Passions of any kind, are Distempers of the Soul, which at best befool a Man, if not, as Hypocrates thinketh, maketh him Lunatick; they are like a Deluge, which rather overflow and drown, than refresh the Mind; they are like an enraged Sea, full of hazard; they disturb the Intellectuals, and distract the Will. Behold, how all things in troubled Waters, seem wreathed, and disordered, which in the still are clearly seen; so is it here: The calm Affections are more fit for God's Service, and our own.

2. LOVE and Delight, are great Actors in this present Life; and every Man hath some share in them. Now our main skill is to fix 'em on right Objects, as God, Psal. 37. and upon heavenly Things, as St. Paul directs us, Col. 3.1. By this means we cannot fall into any Excess, but shall be undoubtedly happy; that we pervert not the Order, we must not delight in, or love any object but God; let him be our first and chief Love and Delight, and we shall have Felicity in all that is subordinate.

3. LET no inferior Love or Delight allure us away from him who is perfect Love. Tho there is a time, place, and measure for Secular Delights, so far as they are subordinate to God's Will, which may make us fit for his Service, and administer occasion of Expressions of Thankfulness to him: But if on the contrary, they prove hurtful to us, if God loves us, he will take that away from us, which else would wean us from him. A necessary Rule for them to consider, who too impatiently bear the loss of that they so much loved or delighted in.

4. LET us neither love nor delight in any temporal things, otherwise than to hold it with a loose Hand; and let us follow the Apostles advice, 1 Cor. 7.31. To use this World as not abusing it; for the fashion of this World passeth away. And St. John commands us in his first Epistle, chap. 2.15. That we should not love the World, nor the things that are in the World. We must be contented to part with all, when God in his good pleasure sees convenient. It was Job's Resolution, chap. 1.21. The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away, and blessed be the name of the Lord.

CHAP. VII. Of Joy.

CONCERNING Joy, Rejoicing and Mirth, the Rules are, That God would not have us disconsolate, but to rejoice and be cheerful in him evermore, 1 Thess. 5.16. Melancholy, Dejectedness, worldly Sorrow, bitterness of Spirit, and secret repining against God's Providence, are dangerous Symptoms of Incredulity: For if, as the Apostle says, Rom. 5.1. Being justified by Faith, we have peace of Conscience, and cheerful access to God through Christ; there will be joy in the Holy Ghost: We shall rejoice in hope, and glory in our Tribulations, being assured of a blessed issue thereof.

2. JOY and Rejoicing in God, in things Divine and Spiritual we are secure and happy. The end of Temporal Rejoicing, is many times clouded in sudden and unexpected Sorrow. Such was Belshazzar's Feast with a thousand of his Princes, Dan. 5.1, 5, 6. The scene of Joy was changed into sudden Astonishment, at the sight of that dreadful Hand which decypher'd his doom upon the Palace Wall. Secular Joy▪ entertaineth deluded Men, as that old lying Prophet of Bethel did the Man of God, first feeding, then afflicting with the sad Intimation of ensuing Destruction, 1 Kings 13.11, 22. Acquaint thyself with true good, that thou mayst rejoice securely. They most delight in Secular things, who are ignorant of Eternal.

3. LET not thy Heart be too much transported with Secular Joy; they that superabound in Mirth and Joy in Prosperity, are too much cast down and dejected in Adversity: For both Extrems proceed from impotency of Mind. In every Exultation look with a thankful Heart on the Lord that gave it, and with a prudent Heart on that which may quickly change this Scene of Mirth into Heaviness. Taste thy Joy as the Israelites did their Passover, with bitter Herbs, and prepared to be gone, Exod. 12.8. Let the thoughts of Sorrow season all thy Mirth, lest a sudden Surprizal astonish and vanquish thee: For foreseen Dangers least prejudice the Wise.

4. KEEP Innocency and a good Conscience: These shall Comfort thee, as Lamech said of his Son Noah, Gen. 5.29. The Wise Man tells you, Prov. 15.15. All the days of the afflicted are Evil; but he that is of a Merry heart, that is, a good Conscience, hath a continual Feast. Wicked Mirth, Sardonick Laughter, and foolish Jestings, as they demonstrate much Levity, so do they dangerous Uncomposedness, Vanity and weakness of Mind. In such Laughter, the heart is Sorrowful, says Solomon, Prov. 14.13. And the end of that mirth, is heaviness: And Eccl. 2.1. Behold, this also is Vanity. Again, The heart of the wise is in the House of Moorning: But the Heart of Fools is in the House of Mirth, Eccl. 7.4.

5. WE read that Christ Wept over Jerusalem, Luke 19.41. and over Lazarus, John 11.35. But we never read of his Laughter: 'Tis a rare Government of the Mind to have Mirth seasoned with Wisdom, wherein a prudent Cheerfulness commendeth Mirth, well regulated in an holy thankful use of that we enjoy, as the best of things, merely Secular: To imitate the Austerity of Cato, or the Sullenness of Crassus, who is reported to have Laughed but once in his Life; or to be an ever Weeping Heraclite, or an ever Laughing Democritus, is to launch out into vain and unsafe Extrems. Indeed, of the two, Tears are to be preferred before excessive Laughter: For too much Mirth is a symptom of Folly, which fluctuates from the Heart, and a true Signet of Forgetfulness, or ignorance of this mutable Life.

6. AND indeed Voluptuousness is Satan's Hook which produces to Destruction; it is the Mother of Sin, and the Nurse of the never dying Worm: And as Oil killeth Insects, but Vinegar restores them; so Joy and Pleasure destroy incautious Sinners; but sharp Afflictions safely Cure them: So that they at last arrive to that apprehensive sense of understanding, That it is good for them to be Afflicted, Psal. 119.71. Never rejoice at another's Affliction, for it is Odious to the Almighty, and seldom evadeth such Revenge as pointeth out the Sin.

7. IT is a Maxim of Wisdom to weigh the Joy, which will prove an excellent Gage for thy Heart: For the Prophet Jeremy tells you, Chap. 17.9. That, The Heart is deceitful above all things, and desperately wicked; who can know it? If thou rejoicest in Evil, thy Heart must be agreeable to it; but if thou delightest in Goodness, then a secret Power and Spirit of Sanctity ruleth in thee. Observe in Musical Instruments, how some Strings sound at the Moving of others, and accord very Harmoniously: So it is with the Strings of thy Heart, which internally Assenteth to any wicked external Action. The uncircumcised Heart rejoiceth at that Obscenity that vexed Righteous Lot: The Holy are cheerful and glad, like the wise Merchant, Matt. 13.44, 45, 56. Who when they find the treasure of God's inestimable Mercy opened to them, go away rejoicing with that happy Convert, Acts 8.39. While he that hath no interest therein, sitteth numbering the Minutes, and thinking every Divine Exercise long; goeth away either as Ahab, with Indignation, or with Sorrow, like the rich young Man in the Gospel, Matt. 19.22.

8. DANGEROUS Perturbations of the Mind, are in the dominion of Sorrows; and there is as much occasion of prudent Rules to be used, as of a Rudder in a Storm. In every affliction, examine well thy Heart for the Cause: Wherefore is the living Man Sorrowful? Man suffereth for his Sin. Let us search and try our ways, and turn again unto the Lord, Lam, 3.39, 40. It is a vain attempt, and a high presumption to seek for any Relief from Affliction; but by this means all other Lenitives are as Draughts of Cold Water in a hectic Fit; it is more Inflaming, like David's Harp to a moody Saul, where the vexing Spirit returneth with greater Violence.

9. PLACE thy Sorrow upon Sin, which is the right Object: It is the vulgar Error and danger of many, to be dejected for that loss which indeed cannot prejudice their Bodies; but take a delight in Sin, which woundeth the Soul, and may make them forever Unhappy. We many times grieve for that which should occasion us to Rejoice. And St. Paul tells us, Rom. 8.26. That all things work together for good; and whom the Lord loveth, he Chasteneth, Heb. 12.6. Next, let us consider the comfortable effects of God's Chastisements; It yieldeth the peaceable fruit of Righteousness, unto them which are Exercised thereby, Heb. 12.11. We are impatient and roar out as Men under the hands of a skillful Chirurgeon, when he exerciseth the Lancet or Cauterie to Cure us. It was David's Complaint, who said, I have roared by reason of the disquietness of my Heart, Psal. 38.8. Yet in the issue confessed, It is good for me that I have been Afflicted; and declares this Experience, Before I was afflicted, I went astray, but now have I kept thy Word, Psal. 119.67, 71.

10. GIVE not thy Heart over to excessive Sorrow; for there is a Worldly Sorrow to Death; and a Sorrow to Repentance not to be Repented of, 2 Cor. 7.10. Exorbitant Grief is like the immoderate Overflowing of Nile, a presager of dangerous Sterility. Stand ready prepared for sharp Encounters. Ships are built to endure Storms and raging Seas. And prudent Minds are composed to endure and make good use of Sorrows. Let every Distress awaken thy mind to fly to thy Redeemer: And then Afflictions will appear like that Rain which fell on the Ark; the more it poured down, the more that was lifted up, and saved from the fury of the Waves: Or like Moses Rod, to open a way through the briny Floods, to our promised Rest, Exod. 14.21, 22.

CHAP. VIII. Of Anger and Malice.

ANGER is an Appetite of punishing any Injuries Received, or Conceived: The product is Malice, which is inveterate Anger: The Fruit of it is Revenge, or at least a well-wisher to it; but being weak it becomes vain. The Accomplices are Hatred and Envy; which shows an abhorrency to anything which displeases our querulous Palate; for we think everything, though good, and never so well performed, to be evil, because we may have an Antipathy to the party that transacts them.

2. ANGER is an Amarulency, embittering the Soul: A turbulent Passion, an usurped Power, deposing the Sovereignty of right Reason: It is a Spiritual infernal Fire, the Souls Tyrant, the seed of Malice, and an Enemy to good Council. Its Rage is a Precursor of Destruction, Ruin, and Desolation; a Companion of Misery, and the Souls Precipice. This Affection is of so high a concernment, that some have writ whole Tracts upon this Subject: But my design in this Treatise is only to consider the Government of the Mind and Thought in relation to the service of God: With some Rules of practice for the better performance of it.

3. THERE is an impious and foolish Anger; whereof Christ said, Mat. 5.22. Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause, shall be in danger of the judgment: And St. Paul advises us, Col. 3.8. with this friendly Exhortation, But now put off all these, anger, wrath, malice, &c. And the Wise man Philosophically informs you, that a stone is heavy, and the sand weighty; but a fools wrath is heavier than both. And he gives you further notice, that wrath is cruel, and anger outrageous, Prov. 27.3, 4. An Example of which, we have in Gen. 4.5. When Cain committed that Fratricide upon Abel: Furthermore, Solomon the chief Anatomizer of Anger, and Dissector of that Passion, affirms, that an angry man stirreth up strife, and a foolish man aboundeth in transgressions: Prov. 29.22. And Eliphaz the Temanite, when he reprov'd Job for Cursing the day of his Birth, admonish'd him in this Phrase, that Wrath killeth the foolish man, and Envy slayeth the Silly one.

4. THERE is a good Anger, such as was in Moses, Exod. 16.20. Phinehas, Numb. 25.7. And Nehemiah, Nehem. 5.6. Without which there can be no Zeal: For Stoical Apathy agreeth not with true Religion: Observe what a Bee is without is sting, nothing but a Drone; even such is man which cannot, or will not be angry. Some anger is necessary, which the holy Spirit mentions, Ephes. 4.26. Be ye angry, and sin not; let not the Sun go down upon your wrath. There is such use of this Souls Fire, that the inward man cannot subsist without it. But the skill is how to reduce it to practice: It must be as the Celestial Fire, wherewith the Sacrifice was to be offered, which we may discern by these Three Distinctions: First, It is Incensed only against Sin, and that which any way displeaseth God, and Obstructeth his Service. Secondly, It Launcheth out only upon some particular Causes and Occasions, but not Unadvisedly. Thirdly, It goeth, like that Burning Lamp between the pieces of Abraham's divided Sacrifice, Gen. 15.17. That is, between the Person, and the Offence, proportionably loving the one, and hating the other: This being without Gall and Bitterness, but zealous in opposition to evil: For it is sin not to be angry with Sin.

5. THIS Affection is an Excellent Subservant to the Mind, exciting the Faculties; it is Fortitudes Incentive, and Zeals Natural heat; it is Modesties Centinel, and Temperances Guardian: And doth by an Excellent Allay of Pleasure, Contract the Dilated Heart and Mind, with some unpleasing but profitable Austerities; which otherwise, would be exposed to dangerous and wicked Temptations.

CHAP. IX. Rules of Practice, concerning Anger, and Malice.

IN every Apprehension of injury, look up to God, and say with David when Shimei cursed him, Let him Curse for the Lord hath bidden him, 2 Sam. 16.11. Consider if thou hast not offended thy Maker, and provoked him to Excite Enemies against thee; if upon thy Inquest thou findest out the Sin thou standest guilty of; hasten and make thy Peace betimes with him. Think not thyself Competent for greater Matters, and all others Inferior to thee: That Pride is like Tinder in the Heart, where every Spark is apt to foment Indignation, and kindle Anger's Fire. Be ever Composed rather to bear an Injury, than to Retaliate it: Indeed it is grievous to suffer; but it is dangerous to requite it: Seeing God saith, Vengeance is mine, Deut. 32.35.

2. MAKE a right use of all injuries: Let them be as so many Exercises to thy Wisdom, Meekness and Patience; And then thine Enemy shall study to be thy Friend: So that thou mayst express that with Verity, which Demosthenes affirmed but Ironically, at his sentence of Banishment: Thy Enemies are so Courteous, that it is a very hard task to find anywhere so good Friends. Be angry with Evil, and imitate the Example of Moses the meekest man, who was so provoked with the Idolaters, that he exposed many of them to the Sword, Exod. 32.19.

Basil fitly compared this anger to a Dog which Barks at Strangers, chases away Wolves, and other Instruments of Evil, but forgets not to fawn on his Master.

3. SUFFER not Anger to be of a long Duration, lest it Engender into Malice; but take St. Paul's advise, Eph. 4.26. Let not the Sun go down upon your wrath, neither give place to the Devil. As he must do, who sleeps with his Anger, which indeed is the Devils Anvil on which he Forgeth his Mischiefs. When we compose our Bodies to rest, we commonly secure our Fire from doing any harm; and why should we be so Negligent of that Precious Part, the Soul, as to sleep with this fire of Hell in our Bosoms? We are ignorant, when we close our Eyes, whether we shall ever open 'em in this World, or have any time to agree with our Adversary, before we appear at the great Tribunal.

4. ACT nothing in furious Anger; but endeavor to allay it. A Prudent Man, will not put to Sea in a Storm, but will wait in Expectation of fair Weather: So in Anger we must expect Calm Affections before we can act anything prudently: We have a frequent Proverb, and not unfit here to be used, that, a hasty man can never want Woe: And Solomon furnishes us with many, pertinent to our Purpose, Eccles. 7.9. Be not hasty in thy Spirit to be angry: And Prov. 12. 16. A Fools wrath is presently known, and he that is slow to anger appeaseth strife, Prov. 15.18. And St. James gives this candid advice, in his Epistle, Chap. 1.19. That we should be slow to speak, slow to wrath.

5. THAT Advice was good which the Philosopher Prescribed to Caesar, When you are angry, answer not, until you have first Repeated the Letters of the Alphabet: By that time the Choler being a little digested, his Judgment might be Recollected, whose sudden Excursion out of its Seat of Passion leaveth a Man an Incompetent Judge; for it is natural to frail Mortality to think them evil, whom they have any Antipathy against. Architas Considered well, when he said to his offending Servant, 'Tis well for you that I am angry: And Socrates, who in like case said, I would beat thee, but that I am angry. Other Passions, in Extrems, discompose the Mind, but anger Precipitateth it: To be a Master of other Affections, demonstrateth him very Moderate; but to gain a Conquest over Anger declares him to be Prudent.

6. IN no Passion do we more lose our Friends, our Advantages, our Judgment, our Selves; nor give an Enemy more Advantage, than in Anger. He is a Fool that can be angry at nothing; and he Wise who will not at everything: It is as great a Virtue to Conquer thy Self, as it is to encounter with the fiercest Lyon: He made a good choice who chose rather the Meekness of Moses, than the strength of Sampson: He that hath vanquished his Anger, hath gained the Victory over a dangerous Enemy. Allay and overcome thine Anger with Reason, that chasing it with due Revenge, it may prove Justice's Hand-maid, not its Mistress.

7. DID we Consider the dangerous Effects it brings, we would hasten and wean ourselves from it. I shall Endeavour to give you a Catalogue of some of the accomplices of Anger, and then tell me whether it be not a Passion of a Pernicious Consequence: To begin, it is a short madness, differing from it only in point of time; it distorts the Countenance, precipitates the Mind, and so disturbeth the Reason, that, for the time, it converts Man to a Beast: From hence proceed, the Unguarded Mouths, Unbridled Tongues; Reproaches, Calumnies, Contumelies, Conflicts, and Fruits of Fury spring from that Fountain: This whets the Sword, and breaks the Sacred Bands of Nature and Religion, provoking men at that height by their Assassinations to be Butchers of Men.

7. OBSERVE how a sudden Deluge, sweeps along the Verdant Fields, and destroys the Husband-man's most flourishing Hopes; even so rusheth the most impious deluge of Anger into the Mind, covering dangerously for the time, if not drowning the fairest Plants of Virtue, Wisdom and Temperance, under that bitterness of Mind, and breathing of Revenge, leaving neither Venerable Age, Tender Youth, nor anything Sacred or Unspar'd. It depriveth thee of Council, rendereth thee Obnoxious to thy Friends, exposeth thee to thine Enemies, and maketh thee altogether Fruitless; when Patience and Mildness would leave better Impression and Root, then the best Precepts sowed in Storms: In short, it makes thee assume the shape of an Unjust Judge, who Correctest thy Child, or Servants Fault with a greater fault of thine own Intemperance.

8. DESIRE and Anger are the worst Counsellors; they not only disturb the Soul, but deform the whole Frame of the outward Man: Could the angry man but take a Prospect of himself, and steadfastly behold, what change that Passion worketh in his Countenance, its impossible he could be Enamoured with that Distemper: He would find it as much altered from its Native Beauty, as the Face of the Thundring Sky, differs from the lovely Serene, or the Enraging Boysterous Sea does from a Pleasant Calm: Plato advised his Scholars, when they were Angry, to look into a Glass: And if ever the Odious Spirit of Satan looked out of the Windows of Man's Face, 'tis in his Exhorbitant Anger: What a Deformity does it Operate in the Divine Soul, Obvious to the Eye of God? It brings along with it the same disadvantage, as those Dogs of the Profane Donatists, whom they fed with the Bread of the Holy Eucharist; for which they escaped not, without an evident Sign of God's Justice; for the Dogs were so Inflamed with Raging Madness that they fastened upon their own Masters, as Strangers and Enemies, Tearing them with Revenging Teeth: Even so it often comes to pass that impious Anger, destroyeth the Angry.

9. HE that can by a Regular Reason, Bridle his Anger, reaps great Advantage: First, In Point of Pacification, according to Solomon's Counsel, Prov. 15.1. A soft Answer turneth away Wrath. Secondly, In respect of Victory; for as the Patient Man enclineth the Prudent as Witnesses to his Party; So that shall more Foil the Outragious and Violent with Meekness, than by Retaliation of Injuries and Contumelies: In which Sense, what Solomon says, confirms it for a Truth, A soft Tongue breaketh the Bone, Prov. 25.15. Next, thy Council better recovereth its Seat by thy forbearance, and thou lovest nothing of thy Interest, by delaying that which thou once must express, or act. To conclude, in the most just Occasions of Anger, remember God's indulgence with thee: Be not like that Evil Servant, who having found much Mercy would show none, lest thy Judgment be equivolent, Matth. 18.34.

10. MALICE is the Venom of the Old Dragon; Satan's bitter Influence on the Wicked, and his lively Image in them. It is the Fire of Hell breaking out on the Men of this World: It is the Mother of Revenge, and Symptom of an Unregenerate Heart, the Affection of a Reprobate Mind, the Devils Leaven, which must be purged out of those, who will Communicate with Christ our Passover. Malice, is the Fuel of God's Anger, and an Obstruction to his Mercy, who cannot justify the Malicious, for what he has said is just and true, Mat. 6.15. If ye forgive not Men their Trespasses, neither will your Father forgive you. And seeing it is wholly disagreeable with the Love of God; therefore it is impossible, as St. John says, To Love God, and hate thy Brother, 1 John 4.20. Concerning which, I need prescribe no other Rule, than this; If Malice possess thy Heart, then desert all Pretences and immediately cast it out, if ever thou hopest to enter into that Kingdom, where inhabits all Love, Peace and Tranquility, with Joy unspeakable, and full of Glory.

CHAP. X. Of Envy.

ENVY is an inveterate Grief at others Welfare and Prosperity; and an Evil Perturbation of the Mind, so odious, that to expose it to View, is a Motive sufficient to make us loath and detest it: It is a Tare of the Wicked's sowing, and worthy of Divine Revenge and Punishment; it is an impediment to Piety, a path to Hell, and a secluder from the Kingdom of Heaven: It is a Pernicious Attendant to Posterity, A Vanity and Vexation of Spirit, Eccles. 4.4. A Fruit of Unregeneration, Rom. 1.29. It is the Daughter of Self-Love and Pride, the Result of Carnal Minds, 1 Cor. 3.3. A Work of the Flesh, Gal. 5.21. It is an Obstruction of Edification, and Growth by the sincere Milk of God's Word, 1 Pet. 2.1, 2.

2. IT is a Blasphemous Censure of the Most High, whose Judgment it disalloweth, secretly Murmuring and Repining at his Providence, who Wisely Disposeth of all things in Heaven and Earth, Setting up and pulling down, and distributing to everyone, according to his good Pleasure, Dan. 4.25. To display it farther, it is a Diabolical Wisdom, a Companion of Confusion and every evil Work, James 3.14, 15, 16. It is the mischievous Canker, which nippeth the choicest Buds of Virtue, attempting either to cloud them with Incredulity, by reason the Envious cannot attain thereto, or laboring to blast them with impious Calumnies.

3. I need not here cite the Example of Antigones, and Teutamus, Conspiring against the truly Noble Eumenes; or of Philip's Sycophants against Aratus: Nor of Domitians envying Agricola his worth: Nor Saul's envying David, Cain Abel, Rachel her Sister, the Patriarchs Joseph: Seeing it is manifest that Christ Jesus, in whom were all Perfections, was envied. There's nothing so little, but stimulateth it: Nothing so Sacred or High, but this Hellish Fury will fly at. Joseph's Party-Coloured Coat awakened it, and it was vigilant to strike at the Savior of the World: The Natals hereof were in Lucifer, envying God's Monarchy, and ambitious to share in his Sovereignty.

4. NATURAL Historians acquaint us of some Countries free from Serpents; but who can inform me of any barren of Envy? I doubt it is the common Plague that visits all places: Like those Croaking Plagues of Egypt, which did not spare Pharaoh's Bed-Chamber; it deludeth the Country with False Opticks, thinking our Neighbors Fields more Fruitful than our own: 'Tis a Monster; not of God's making, but born of depraved Affections, as Anger, Fear, Jealousy, Self-Love, which creates Indignation, if another attain to a Happy and Prosperous Condition: Envy thinks all the World too little for its own Orifice: All this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting at the Kings Gate; said ambitious Haman in his Envy, Esth. 5.13. And again, To whom would the King delight to do Honor more than to myself, Chap. 6.6.

CHAP. XI. Arguments to be Considered, by way of Dissuasion against Envy.

THAT Envy hurteth the Invidious most, is apparent, that there is not a greater Torment invented by the worst of Tyrants: Nothing can be more unjust to others, nor nothing more just to themselves. The Serpent's Poison infecteth not himself; but Envy proves fatal to them that embrace it: For as the Moth eateth the Garment which breeds it; and as the Rust consumes the Iron, so Envy preys upon the Mind that entertains it. It is more Miserable that can be expressed; for it is not only afflicted with its own Misfortune, but it is disquieted at others Exhilaration: Whatever is a Pleasure to others, is but a Torment to him. Another Man's Store, is the Envious Man's Want; another Man's Health, is his Sickness; and another Man's Praises, his reputed Dishonor.

2. OTHER Sins have some Remisness, Anger will waste itself in time: Hatred may be extinguished in the end, but Envy never ceaseth: Fierce Lions are Tamed and become Tractable, but the Envious grow worse and worse. The more Christ did good to the Jews, curing their Sick, healing their Infirm, and bestowing the words of Eternal Life upon them, the more destructively did they Envy him. It is the Canker that blasteth Friendship: The corruption of Life and plague of Nature. It is the Devil's incentive to Rebellion, who when he could not in his Malice hurt God, assailed Man: For it instigated Cain to Murder his Brother Abel; and the Jews to Crucify the Savior of the World.

3. BESIDES, it hath irrational Effects: It would stop up the Fountains, and veil the Sun-beams: It regardeth neither bounds of natural Civility, or Religion. Rachel Envied her Sister, Gen. 31. Jacob's Sons their Brother Joseph, Gen. 37.11. The Jews, the very Preaching and Hearing the Gospel, Acts 13.45. It is the rottenness of the Bones, Prov. 14.30. It slayeth the Silly, Job 5.2. And lastly, it excludeth from Heaven; for what should Envy lay claim to so blessed a Habitation; where there is nothing but love and rejoicing in each other's Happiness?

4. FURTHERMORE, it is a perverse Distemper of a diseased Mind, rendering the Envious his viewing of the good of others, as it were with sore Eyes grieved with seeing. It delighteth and triumpheth in Men's Miseries: As Flies feed themselves upon others Ulcers, so the Envious propose to themselves a pleasant Entertainment by Discoursing upon others Misfortunes and Afflictions: And to set a gloss upon their Hypocrisy, they will sometimes personate the Compassionate and Merciful, and like subtle Alchemists, pretend to Extract Pity, when indeed it is only to stretch their Malice to a larger Extent, by which means it might not be acquainted with any Limitations.

5. SOMETIMES Proteus like, they will pretendedly act on the Theatre of Justice; then will they seem zealous of Laws, and due Punishment of Delinquents, when indeed they do but pervert Judgment into Wormwood, and Kill or Rob by Authority, whom they durst not Assassinate or Assault by the Sword, or open Violence. Sometimes they will assume large pretences of Sanctity, appearing like the Devil at Endor, in the Prophet Samuel's Mantle, performing some things externally good, whereby they may achieve some greater Evil. Even so the false

Apostles Preached Christ, of mere Envy to St. Paul, that they might add more affliction to his Bonds, Phil. 1.15, 16.

6. IT is at best but a fruit of the Flesh, Gal. 5.21. Meer Folly, Tit. 3.3. Devilish, Sensual, Earthly, St. James, 3.14, 15. A dangerous Signal of a Reprobate Mind, given up to Destruction, Rom. 1.28, 29. The most that Envy can acquire towards its own Satisfaction, is to Mourn when others Rejoice, and possibly to hurt Temporally, with its own external Destruction of Body and Soul. To define it further, It is no better than the Spirit of Satan reigning in the Envious.

7. THIS Mischief sometimes craftily steals on incautious good Men: As Joshua was Envied, for Moses's sake, Num. 11.28, 29. And the Psalmist confesseth, My feet, saith he, were almost gone, for I was Envious at the foolish, when I saw the prosperity of the Wicked, Psal. 73.2, 3. The Prophet Jeremiah and Habakkuk, were a little infected with this Contagion, which the Scripture as a Monitor, admonisheth all Men to beware of that Snare, which entrapped such good Men.

8. THE acts thereof are inconsistent with right Reason, if we respect the Supreme Giver of that which stimulateth Envy; for how irrational a presumption is it in Man, to control the providence of God? If Jacob's Eyes wax dim with Age, and would not permit his dear Joseph to alter the Imposition of his Hands, or to transpose the Blessing at his pleasure, how much less will the all-seeing God, permit the Envious Man to pervert his Hands? Next we must respect the quality of the Envied; Is he Evil whom thou Enviest? Then thy Compassion is summoned to pity him, because his Sin represents him more Wretched than all the World can do. Is he Good? How guilty then must thou be in Envyng his Felicity?

CHAP. XII. Remedies against Envy.

ENDEAVOUR to put on Christ, and then thou art sure to chase away Envy. It is the Apostle's Rule, Rom. 13.13, 14. Let us walk honestly as in the day, not in Strife and Envyng, but put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, and make not provision for the Flesh, to fulfil the Lusts thereof. Strive by a Holy imitation, to follow the Example of thy Lord and Master, who was meek and lowly in Heart, and envied no Man, Matt. 11.29. Christ loved all respectively: For Love envieth not, 1 Cor. 13.4. If we love for the sake of him who first loved us, we shall never be perplexed for any competent Blessings he in his good pleasure bestows, but should rather wish them greater: We shall wash off that guilt of undervaluing others, and abandon that presumption of over-rating ourselves; and this sort of Ambition which acts contrary to these Remedies, reigns only in the Dominion of the Envious.

2. THE Meek Moses was so free from Pride and Ambition, that he reprehended those that Envied for his sake; and wisht that all God's People could Prophecy; and besought the Lord, that he would put His Spirit upon them, Num. 11.29. Discipline thyself in God's School, for there is the best and safest cure of Emulation. It was a Paradox to David, Psal. 73.16. Until saith he, I went into the Sanctuary of God; then understood I their end. There thou mayst learn not to value Transitory things too much; to consider well his Hand, which setteth up, and pulleth down: To refer all thy Desires to the advancement of his Glory; and humbly to acknowledge, and in a high manner express thy thankfulness for those favors of Providence he hath conferred on thee; having the possession of these thoughts, thou mayest quite Banish Envy.

3. NEXT consider where thou placest thy Enmity. The Psalmist found in the Sanctuary, that his Enemies were not to be Envied: Surely, said he, thou didst set them in slippery places: Thou castedst them down to Destruction, Psal. 73.18. Let not this Memento flip out of thy Mind, That God mixeth Bitter with Sweetness to all in this Life. One hath great Riches, but no Child to enjoy it; nor perhaps a generous Heart to make use of those goods of Fortune God hath been pleased to bestow upon him; Another is in perfect Bodily Health, but his Soul may be sick unto Death: Others contrive and hoard up Wealth, but with such a seared Conscience, that the poorest Saint is incomparably more happy. Another is advanced to Honors, perhaps only to make his Fall the greater. Another in divers respects may be very Prosperous in the Eye of the World; but may resemble the Moon, who is most tenebrous towards Heaven, when she Illuminates the Earth. So it is with Man very observable. that the greater Luster they shine with in the Eye of the World, the more despicable they are in the sight of Heaven; for God abhorreth all those Poms and Vanities, and layeth up such severe Judgments for the Owners, that a Soul in the midst of Torments is as proper an Object of Envy, as the glittering Shadows, who are hasting thither.

4. O let us not forget then that we are Brethren, Members of one Body, whereof Christ Jesus is the Head; therefore let us with all Gentleness and Meekness take St. Paul's advice, Gal. 6.1. Brethren, if a Man be over-taken in a Fault, restore such a one in the Spirit of Meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. Let us support one another through Love, and mutually rejoice at each others Happiness; and by these means we shall cast away the works of Darkness, Strife and Envy.

CHAP. XIII. Of Impatience.

IMPATIENCE is a Distemper of the Mind, proceeding from several Causes, as Indignation, Anger, Envy, Sorrow, apprehension of Injuries, Affliction, deluded Hopes, and the like. As the diseased Body cannot endure Heat or Cold; so an impatient, and discontented Mind, cannot comply with Prosperity, or Adversity. Every present Estate seemeth uneasy, wanting a true relish to make it palatable; it is not only a Guilt, but a Punishment of the Sin of Ingratitude against God; Therefore the Almighty threatened to send them trembling Hearts, Sorrow of Mind, and pendulous Thoughts, and Fears, Deut. 28.65, 66, 67. In the Morning thou shalt say, would God it were Evening: and at Even thou shalt say, would God it were Morning.

2. SICK of this wayward Distemper was he, who being at Rome, lik'd Tyber best, but when at Tyber gave Rome the Preference; the sick Person shifteth Rooms and Beds, as the wounded Hart flieth from Brake to Brake, but can find no ease, whilst the fatal Arrow, that Messenger of Death sticks fast in his side. So it is observable Malecontents waver, between contempt of the present, and vain hopes of the future. But Coelum, non animum mut at, he transmutheth the Air, not his Mind; that crosseth the Ocean. Wherever thy Progress is, thy Mind bears thee company, and according to its Malignancy, a proportionable Remedy must be applied.

3. TRIVIAL matters doth not perturb the the Healthy, but a small Accident discomposeth the Sick. The sound and strong Man can rest anywhere, but to the infirm, a Bed of Gold, or Wood, produces the same ease; and a rich Palace, or a poor Cottage, affords him equality of rest. So it is observable, a fixed and stable Mind will rest contented anywhere; he is become a Proficient, and can say with St. Paul, I have learned in whatsoever state I am, therewith to be Content, Phil. 4.11. And a Mind so serene and calm, is Health to the Sick, Enlargement to the Prisoner, and far excels a Kingdom to the Possessor; whereas the impetuous Mind is troubled and discomposed with every trifle. I do well, said peevish Jonah, to be angry even unto death, Jonah 4.9. And all this Morosity was but for a poor Gourd, when at that juncture he ought to have been more concerned at so many thousand Lives, which were near Destruction.

4. TO cure this, no Cataplasm Externally applied can afford any Operation; but it must be a Catholicon Internally used, which must purge the Mind of these Malignant Perturbations which disaffect it, and to strengthen it by a right Informatio• of the Understanding, and rectifying th• distempered Affections, until the Mind enjoy a Calm of Patience. And indeed Patience is a Magnanimous Virtue, and attended with a Train of •piritual Qualifications• First, It is Afflictions Cordial, and Despair Antidote, the Daughter and Nurse of Hope, Rom. 8.25. And the Saints Communio• with Christ, Rev. 1.9. It is the way to th• Inheritance, Heb. 12.1. The Seal of Salv•tion, 2 Pet. 1.10. A Symptom of Fait• and Hope in Christ, 1 Thess. 1.3. Patie• is an Equanimity in bearing Adversity; an• a Fruit of Charity: And the Apostle gi•• you this Certificate, That the Fruit of th• Spirit is Love, Joy, Peace, Long-suffering, Gal. 5.22. And Charity suffereth long, 1 Cor. 13.4.

5. IMPATIENCE is a Perturbation of the Mind, a Self-corroding, Tormenting bitterness of the Soul, proceeding from Impotency, or Levity of Mind: A secret contest with, and repining at the Providence of God. It is the absurdity of Rich Men, and the vexation of the Poor: The Mother of Despair, and sad fury of the Internal habitation; every Room, and Recess thereof, it disturbeth with hideous Cries, like Ziim and Ohim, doleful Beasts in the Desolations of Babylon, Isai. 13.21.

6. IT is a folly and sober distraction, wherein the diseased Mind rejecteth all wholesome Prescriptions; it Rebelleth against the Physician, and lacerateth open its own Wounds; it is an Heart-corroding canker, the internal Man's Woolf, which devoureth that which feedeth it; the Worm which gnaweth the Soul, which Prometheus-like, cherisheth the Vulture which afflicteth it, and delighteth in that which grieves it: Nor is the best of Men free from this Distemper, for David with his Soul made this inquest, Why art thou so sad, O my Soul, and why art thou so disquieted within me, Psal. 43.5.

7. OUR Blessed Savior, who was free from Sin, who bare all our Sorrows, in the sense of his Father's wrath, acknowledged, that his Soul was heavy to the death: And wrestling with that most unknown Passion, cried out upon the Cross, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? He could no otherwise be sensible of Hell Torments, (due to us) in his Humane Soul, than by losing the present sense of the Deities Assistance, <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> which wheresoever it is, makes Eternal Happiness: He lost in that Agony a present sense, not an Indeficient Interest: For even then, he called God, his God; which Demonstrated a vast distance between the Impatience, of Desperate and Irrecoverable Sinners, and the Estate of those Good Men who are under Tribulation for the Infirmary of their Souls: The just Man may be compared to the Israelites, marching with the Egyptians through the Red-Sea, where there is a way opened to their Promised Rest, but the Waters return with a full force and drown the Enemy.

8. AS to this Malady we must not plead ignorance, but be sensible that it groweth Gradually: First, In unadvised Anger mix• with Sorrow; which are the Seminaries of Impatience: Next, it goes forward, to a dislike of every Accident and Estate; from thence to an internal Repining: So like a Gangrene, it invadeth the Souls Vitals, Hope, Content, and a Cheerful dependence upon God's Providence, and then marches forward to violent Despair; so that it behooves a Man highly to prevent this danger by checking its Primitive Motions; and learning to make a Prudent use of every Affliction, and to Expel all those discomposed Thoughts which nourish it; likewise to practice in the whole Course of Life, that Christian Patience, and Moderation, which becometh those, who depend on the Providence of God: Some Motives to it, I shall show in the next Chapter.

CHAP. XIV. Motives to Patience and Contentedness.

FIRST, God Commandeth us, by his Holy Apostle in several places; as Rom. 12.12. 1 Thess. 5.8. 1 Tim. 6.8. Heb. 13.5. And David earnestly persuades us to this duty, Psal. 37. from the first, to the fourteenth Verse. Secondly, Consider well the disadvantages of Impatience, and the Advantages of Patience; Seneca was of that good Opinion, that no man could be happy who did not think himself so: It imports not what thy Condition is, if thou thinkest it evil? The Patient Man is happy in every Estate; because God will hear him, Psal. 40.1. And the Wise Man gives this Result, Eccles. 7.8. The Patient in Spirit is better than the Proud in Spirit. And the Apostle gives us this assurance, Rom. 2.7. That the Lord will give him Eternal Life. And the Evangelist gives us this Encouragement, by Patience a Man possesseth his own Soul, Luke 21.19. All Affliction to him is but a wholesome Bitter Potion, which he freely swalloweth, as being prescribed to Operate his Cure, and to produce him the quiet Fruits of Righteousness, Heb. 12.11. The Apostle likewise tells you, 1 Tim. 6.6. That Godliness with Contentment is great gain.

2. PATIENCE allays a ponderous burden, and makes it easy; and therein defeateth the adverse Party; the product of whose Injury is the Perplexity and Impatience of the injured. When Job Exercised his Affliction with Patience, Satan was foiled at his own Weapon. As Ballast, if it be well placed that it cannot move, or shoot, the Sailing Ship Rides secure; but if otherwise, she is Foundred: Even so it is with Patience in the Soul. It was a Blessed Victory obtained at Job's first encounter, at which the Angels of Heaven could do no less than give a Plaudite; for when Satan had fully charged him with all his Machinations, and Job had received all those fierce Blows on his Shield of Patience; he made this meek Reply, The Lord gave, and the Lord hath taken away; Blessed be the Name of the Lord: And the Holy Ghost thus testifieth, In all this Job sinned not, Job 1.21, 22. And Job was happy in being so great a Victor; and happy are all they who imitate that invincible Patience in their sufferings.

3. THOSE who are Impatient, must submit to that Term of being Evil; and the Almighty will not lend an Ear to them: They are by every Condition made worse, being Authors of their own misery; and make their own Burdens intolerable, by striving under that, which no violence can cast off: They are Satan's Captives, introducing their Fretful Impatience only to adorn his Triumphs; they prove scorns to Men, who can no less than deride, if not loath that Morosity, and peevish Waywardness, which causeth the Impatient malcontent neither to enjoy Friends nor himself. An Example we have of that Mirror of Impatience Diogenes the Cynick, who being Asked by Alexander the Great, if he lacked anything; to which he Morosely Replied Yea, I do, Stand out of my Light. Now whether he embraced this Churlish Humour, to profess himself a Votary to his own Passions, or to lay Claim to an equal Capacity and Right of Contemning his Friends Greatness, as much as he slighted his Poverty; that I cannot Expostulate: But he chose rather to Inhabit in a Tub, than expect the delayed Beneficence of him that promised to build him a House: And certainly by this his Impatience, he reaped no Advantage.

4. CONSIDER that Momentary Afflictions are of no Duration: If all the World, Men and Devils, Conspired to vex and molest thee, they could not long make thee an Object of their Fury and Malice. The Apostle like a good Prognostick foretells our Necessities, Heb. 10.37. Ye have need of Patience, that after ye have done the will of God, ye might receive the promises: For yet a very little while, and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. Then Blessed are all they, who with meekness and a patient Confidence expect him. Be therefore Patient, Stablish your hearts: For the coming of the Lord draweth nigh, James 5.8. Heaviness may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning, Psal. 30.5. However the longest day as its due must accept of a period: And the most tedious misery of a good Christian shall have such a Counsumation as may render him happy.

5. CONSIDER the extent of thy suffering: Perhaps thou art envied without Cause: Thou owest thanks to God for that Conformity to his dear Son: Thou art Oppressed, Plundered, Imprisoned, Exiled: But yet thou hast not resisted unto Blood▪ Thou art Listed, and Enrolled a Soldier under Christ's Banner; in whom Believing and Patiently bearing Trial, thou canst not miscarry; and dost thou Recoil at those Military Charges, which have not exposed thy Life to danger? What if Heavens General drew thee out, and posted thee for one of the Forlorn Hope of Martyrdom, and the Fiery Trial? Wouldst thou desert the Service? Or complain of Danger?

6. CONSIDER nothing is befallen you, but what is common to many: Paulus Aemilius well observed in his sudden Victory over Perseus, that there is nothing durable in this World: Dost thou in the loss of some Secular Comfort, Cry with the afflicted. Church, behold, and see, if there be any sorrow like unto my sorrow, Lam. 1.12. If it be any comfort to have Partners in mighty Woe, consider well that thousands of others suffer at a higher rate: As he said, who, to Comfort an Embittered Friend, as they beheld a Populous City from the House Top, considered how many heavy Hearts, and weeping Eyes, are now under these Roofs? From hence may be Learned, that in thy afflictions, thou art not singular.

7. CONSIDER that many good Christians excelling thee in Perfections, have had a greater share of Afflictions than thou couldst undergo: And St. James makes no scruple in his 5 Chap. v. 11. But that ye have heard of the patience of Job: And therein the issue of Patience: God delivered him to Satan: Behold he is in thine hand, Job 2.6. Yet all that the Devils Malice could Inflict upon him, redounded the more to Illustrate his Happiness: For the Almighty had Pronounced him Righteous, and knew his Strength was of that Extent, loud enough to proclaim him a Champion. If Saul was unwilling to expose David to an unequal Conflict, shall we think the Almighty would hazard us, if we were not certain to gain the Conquest? He will not venture thee into the Lists, without his Grace, which makes thee invincible: He views thy Trials with delight, and has a Proportionable reward always ready.

8. THEREFORE be not deceived nor discouraged, they are not miserable, whose Sufferings are ample: 'Tis honorable to receive Wounds in War; for Scars are Honors Characters, written in the Face and Breast of the Valiant: Enquire into thy own Heart, and then thou canst not but express thy Thankfulness, for his afflicting thee so lightly; for no Man is so miserable as wicked. Consider the issue of Afflictions, and the end why God afflicteth thee. The Physician prescribes not bitter Pills, nor doth the Surgeon exercise his Lance or Cautery to kill, but to cure the Patient. So God doth not delight in the death or afflictio<sup>n</sup> of a Sinner, but he permitteth thee to we<sup>e</sup> now, to prevent Eternal Weeping hereafter<sup>n</sup>. It is not thy Misery that affects him, but th<sup>e</sup> Health; and he prescribeth such bitter things as are proper to thy Malady; and if lenitiv<sup>e</sup> Physic, or a less quantity would effect the operation, he would not have exhausted one dra<sup>g</sup> or scruple more than he thought necessary.

9. PATIENTS undergo much under Physicians Skills, when their promising helps ar<sup>e</sup> uncertain; how much rather ought we pat<sup>i</sup>ently to submit ourselves under the Hand ⟨◇⟩ God, who will not fail of his promise to us<sup>n</sup>. But upon serious Consideration, thou reportest that this Objection will arise, That though<sup>n</sup> invocatest him for help, and he heareth not: T<sup>h</sup> which I answer, That it is God's infinite<sup>n</sup> Mercy not sometimes to hearken to thy request, but to fulfil his own Will and Pleasure in order to thy Salvation. Thus the Almighty, who is the great Physician of Souls, deals indulgently with all his Patients.

10. SEEING then Calamity is often the Discipline of Virtue; Shall his Stomach be averse to the Antidote, who greedily swallowed down the Poison? All Impatience receives its Nativity from Satan, who Conspires by all his treasonable diabolical Arts to poison the Soul of Man, and to plunge him into the Pit of Despair, and by Rebellion to murmur at the taste of the Marahs of Affliction; For it is very infallible, that Satan envies the Image of God in Man, and is displeased when God bestows his Favors on frail Mortality. Strive therefore in storms of Misery, to calm thy Mind, and be patient under every Affliction; which that thou mayst the better do, observe these Rules laid down in the next Chapter.

CHAP. XV. Rules for Contentment.

LOVE and Honor God above all things, and thou wilt not repine at any order of his Providence. It was the saying of Old Eli, It is the Lord, let him do what seemeth him good, 1 Sam. 3.18. When we express our love to God in a regular Manner; we shall truly discern that all his Judgments are Just, and what he inflicts on us. His fatherly Corrections, are the Products of his Love and Wisdom for our Amendment, who therefore correcteth every Son, out of an earnest Desire, that none should perish; and he that indulgeth himself to his pleasure, profit, or ease, and omitteth his duty towards God, must needs be impatient of any loss which may befall him. Next to thy Maker, love thy Neighbor as thyself; and a trifling Injury shall not molest thy quiet.

2. LET us take the Apostles advice, to be content with Necessaries, 1 Tim. 6.8. Having Food and Raiment, let us be therewith content. And what can the richest Treasures of Princes afford them more than Tranquility of Mind? It was a prudent Speech of that Indian King Taxiles, to the invading Alexander, What occasion have we, said he, to fight and wage War one with another, if thou comest not to take away our Water, and our Necessaries, by which we must subsist? As for other Goods, if I abound more in Riches than you, I am ready to acquit some of them to you; and if I have less, I will not think scorn to receive from you the like favor. And I would to God that all Societies of Men were so happily composed.

3. FREQUENTLY and thankfully recount what God hath done, and still doth for thee. Foolish Men by their Impatience, create an over-sight, and look through false Opticks upon their happy Estates; and reversing often something to nothing, by which means showers of Blessings are turned into Curses, which brings a severe Doom upon themselves. 'Tis the part of a Fool rather to mourn for a Loss, than rejoice for any Profit, or Gain. Many reckon what they are not possessed of, not what they enjoy beyond many thousands that are dignified because, prudential and more thankful: They imagine their morose Humor must not be contradicted, and their Sweets must not be mixed with Bitter; but I may say to them, as Job said to his Wife, tempting him, Thou speakest as one of the foolish Women; what, shall we receive good at the Hands of God, and shall we not receive Evil? Job 2.10.

4. IN all Discontents look up to him, who is the Author and Finisher of our Faith, Christ Jesus: Consider that he suffered and underwent what thou couldst not perform; yet not for himself, for he knew no Sin; but it was to work thine and the World's Salvation: If through Faith in him, thou canst have Peace with God, thou shalt not only bear, but rejoice in Tribulation, knowing as the Apostle says, that it worketh Patience, Rom. 5.3. If thou wilt preserve Innocency and a good Conscience, thou wilt advantageously acquire peace and contentment of Mind, which shall Compose thee in the midst of Tumults in things External: But as a Seditious City, or a Discorded House cannot be Happy; so a discorded Mind, cannot be at Unity in itself.

5. KEEP within the Jurisdiction of thy proper Business, Employment, or Calling. Undertake not, neither propound to thyself anything too great for thy Management. Overgrasping thy Hand, Enervates it, and torments it with fruitless Pain: And aiming too ambitiously, crucifies the Heart, when they fall from the Precipice of their vain Proposals. Art thou endowed with Riches? Actively offer them to that use for which they were sent; which is God's Glory. Is thy Fortune slender? Contract thy Mind within its Limits, which is to Necessity, not Opinion: We read of a Philosopher in his Journey, which drank Water in his Hand, and cried out, With how few Utensils is Nature content! I could wish many would follow his Example, that they might enjoy that Peace and Tranquility of Mind.

6. BUT many become their own Tormenters and Authors of their own Discontents, proposing such strange Fabricks of their Babels, erecting airy Castles and Towers to Heaven; adding House to House, and Land to Land, Province to Province, and Kingdom to Kingdom; chasing for their main Concernments in the dangerous attempts of doubtful Adventures, Grandeur, and affluence of Riches. They go Remote to find that which with Prudence may be produced at Home, in our own Bosoms, which is to be satisfied in that which God hath allotted for us, with a contented Mind.

7. IT was remarked of Pyrrhus that active Epirot, that Fortune made him happy enough with Sufficiency, to live Peaceably at Home, if he could have contented himself only with the Sovereignty over his own Subjects: But his insatiable Avarice, (which neither the Sea, Mountains, Inhabitable Deserts, nor the Confines which separate Asia from Europe could Limit) instigated him perpetually to seek out new matter of Trouble to himself and others: Which his faithful Friend Cineas, did once Prudently, though without Effect, intim... ⟨◇⟩ him, whereupon new Overtures of honorable and profitable Undertakings for the Tarentines, occasioned by Cineas Quaeres. Pyrrhus had said, When we have Overcome the Romans, there can neither-Grecian nor Barbarous City in all the Country withstand us, but we shall Conquer all the rest of Italy with Ease. And what shall we do then, (said Cineas?) Pyrrhus replying, telleth him of Conquering commodious Sicily. Again he demanded, That being Won, shall our Wars end? Pyrrhus replied, The way was then open enough to attain great Conquests, and who would not afterwards go into Africa, and so to Carthage? But when we have all in our Hands, (said Cineas) what shall we do in the end? We will then (good Cineas, said he) be quiet and take our Ease, make Feasts every day, and be as Merry one with another as we can possibly. Cineas having brought him to that point, said to him, My Lord, What hindereth us now to be Quiet and Merry together, since we enjoy that presently without farther Travel and Trouble, which we should now go seek for Abroad with such shedding of Blood, and so manifest Dangers? And we know not whether we shall ever attain unto it, after we have both suffered, and caused others to suffer infinite Sorrows and Troubles.

8. LEARN to obtain a faithful dependence on God's Providence. This ground of Content the Holy Ghost proposeth, Heb. 13.5. Let your Conversation be ⟨◇⟩ Covetousness, and be content with such things as ye have; for he hath said, I will never leave thee, nor forsake thee. When Men too much depend on second Causes, they are impatient at every Cross. They would impiously prescribe God the time, as Jehoram would, 2 Kings, 6.33. and rebellious Israel, Exod. 32.1. Or in the Means, as Naaman, 2 Kings, 5.11. But in assurance that God will never fail us, we must patiently expect his help. In every Affliction remember that God beholdeth thee, and his Providence will give the issue with the Trial.

9. ART thou in Want, which excites thy Discontent? Then call to mind what thou broughtest into this World, and what thou shalt carry out: Thou hast not such Possessions, Houses, Riches, Apparel as some have; yet no Man liveth so poor as he was Born. This was that which that Exemplar of Patience said in all his Losses, Naked came I out of my Mothers Womb, and Naked shall I return thither, Job 1.21. So St. Paul maketh it a ground of his Exhortation to Contentedness, We brought nothing into this World, and it is certain we shall carry nothing out, 1 Tim. 6.7. Kings and Princes are cast out Naked in the day of their Nativity, and are beheld as Weeping little Masters of the World. The Great Saladine will inform you what they carry hence; who ordered, that at his Funeral one should carry a Shirt or Winding-sheet, on the Point of an advanced Lance, and go before the Herse and proclaim thus, Saladine the Conqueror of the East, carrieth hence with him only this of all that he hath gotten.

10. FEED not the bitter humor of Discontents, for the growths thereof are sad and dangerous. Give not over thy mind to heaviness, and afflict not thyself in thine own Counsel, Ecclus. 30.21. The exhilaration of the Heart is the Life of a Man, and prolongeth his days. Some Minds are like the Sea, which instantly turneth sweet Showers into its own Bitterness; because they indulge to Impatience, pleasing themselves with that which tormenteth them: But the prudent in every Affliction, elevate their Souls to God, seeking Comfort in him, and consider of the Life to come; where there shall be no more Curse, Rev. 22.3. no more Discontent, but every Heart shall be filled with Joy.

A Prayer for Patience and Contentment.

MOST Gracious God, I humbly acknowledge thy fatherly goodness, in measuring to me those Corrections which my Sins daily provoking thy Justice, most justly deserve; and thy stupendous. Mercy in sparing me, whom in thy severity thou mightest not only have made the most Miserable of all Men living, but mightest have cast me into that Lake, which burns with Fire and Brimstone. Lord, as thou hast in a bleeding Jesus afforded me this Mercy, so for his sake blot out the Hand-writing of all my Offences: Lay no more upon me than thou wilt enable me to bear; and never suffer me, frail Dust and Ashes for any Temptation, to fall from thee, but give me a blessed issue out of every Trial.

2. AND O holy Father, correct me not in thine Anger, lest I perish in thy fierce Wrath; neither chasten me in thy heavy Displeasure, lest I am utterly Consumed. Let thy Corrections work in me a true sense and detestation of all my Sins; a filial fear to offend thee, and a fixed resolution to love and serve thee more carefully for the future: To this end, I humbly beseech thee give me assurance of my Justification by Christ's Righteousness; my atonement with thee, and such a peace of Conscience, as the world can never give nor take from me; that I may adore thee above all, and render thee a sincere thankfulness for all thy Mercies Temporal and Eternal; Entertaining always in my Heart that assurance of my Savior, who suffered such great great, things for me, that he will not suffer me to fall under any of Satan's Conflicts.

3. LORD Sanctify all my Afflictions to me by thy good Spirit: Cast out of my Soul all those Sins and Corruptions which lie lurking to betray me to Ruin: Let the sum and height of my Ambition be only to be thine; give me a prudent and contented Heart in every estate and condition, a faithful dependence on thy Good Providence, in assurance that thou who hast promised, will never fail me, nor forsake me; that in every Affliction, I may expect thy gracious Deliverance. Give me Patience and meekness of Spirit, that I may in the midst of all my troubles, find rest to my Soul: Let not my Heart be fixed on Transitory things, but on things which are above, where Christ my Peace, sitteth at thy right hand making Intercession for me.

4. CHASE from me all Impatience, bitterness of Spirit, Diffidence, and the secret Murmurings of Flesh and Blood. Let thy Holy Spirit, the Comforter, dwell in me to keep and counsel me in all affairs and interests Spiritual and Temporal: Let his joyful Presence so sweeten all those Marahs of Affliction which thy Providence shall appoint in my way to the Promised rest. O let me ever rejoice in thee, and in every Estate live cheerfully before thee, until thou in thy good pleasure bring me unto the fullness of eternal Joys in thy blessed Presence, where thou wilt wipe away all Tears from my Eyes: Make me glad with the light of thy Countenance, and unite me to that Triumphant Society of Saints and Angels, which in perfect Harmony Sing their Hallelujahs to thee Eternally, through Jesus Christ, my only Savior and Redeemer.

Amen.

CHAP. XVI. Of Hope.

HE is not living in the World that is void of Hope: The Child hopes to arrive to Manhood, the Aged to linger out a Year longer: The Poor hopes for Wealth; the Sick for Health: The Imprisoned for Liberty: And the Afflicted that Joy may be the Scene of the Morning: Hope induces the Husband-Man to Sow, and Manure his Ground, the weary Traveler to endure his tedious Ways, and the Experienced Swimmer to spread his tired Arms upon the Death-threatening Waves: Thus is the whole Span of Man's Life Employed, in Suffering and Hoping.

2. BUT in Hopes, there's a vast difference: As for Example, the Human vain Hope is of all others the most pernicious: Such a Hope is but the Denomination of an uncertain Good; 'tis a treacherous Guide, leading to desperate Precipices; the Ignis fatuus of the Mind and the Waking Man's Dream. It was the Tempters Artifice first to assail Man's Innocency, with vain hope grounded on a lying Promise; without this flash of Vanity, Satan had never gained so many Vassals. Imprimis, He showeth the forbidden Fruit; and in a wicked Elegancy Preached this Doctrine, In the day ye Eat thereof ye shall be as God's, Gen. 3.5. Thus was unhappy man caught by this alluring Bait.

3. SO he Accosted the Second Adam, the Lord of Glory, when he represented to him the Kingdoms and Glory of the World, Matth. 4.8. Satan still makes it is his Business to give us a Prospect of false Heavens, to precipitate us into a true Hell; suggesting vain hopes that he might deprive us of the real: There is none commits the least sin, but a Train of vain Hopes attends it: Several instances we have, as in Cain's Murder, Ammons Lust, Judas's Treason, or Achitophel's Despair: The Sinner many times hopes for some other product of his Resolutions, than from the Sin he transacts.

4. THE worst have not lost their hopes of some good; but all their wishes are in vain: For the hopes of the Wicked are often frustrated, but the Justice of the most just Judge cannot. We must expect from Reason's Providence; and when Time's Glass is fully run, there must be something future, all which carries the face of Goodness; yet so flattering a Liberty is Self-hopes, that every man, especially the Juvenile, who are least acquainted with Fascination, and Constant Inconstancy of the World, relying much on hope, and depending little on Memory, promise themselves great things: But when the Malignants Sing Requiems to their Souls, sudden Destruction is the more terrible in its assault, by Reason it poured upon them unsuspectedly; The Hypocrites hope shall perish; their hope shall be Sorrow of Mind, Job 11.20.

5. AND truly such is Worldly Confidence in an Evil Conscience: However it may appear to have purchased thee A Covenant with death, and an Agreement with Hell, Isai. 28.15. yet it will deceive thee: However it fawns, and promises long Life, and vigor in an Arm of Flesh, and the vain Councils of Men, raising thy Hopes to high Flights; yet they are but Phantasms of deluded Men, and create an Eruption in the midst of their full Career, delivering up their Mind to dangerous Convulsions; and by the Ascent, is cast down from so high a Pinnacle, as renders the Fall the more desperate: How often do despairing Wretches wish they had never hoped, when the vanity of it is plainly Demonstrated, like Pharaoh's Chariot-Wheels, they fall off, where they are most deeply engaged, between Floods of returning Miseries, Exod. 14.25.

6. NOW I come to show you, there is a hope of the Righteous, which never fails; this is a prudent Expectation of future Happiness; fulfilling of his Promises who is Yea, and Amen, both in this Life, and that which is to come. This is a Virtue infused into our Hearts by God's Holy Spirit, who cannot deceive, as the Psalmist confirms it, Psal. 31.24. Be of good Courage, and he shall strengthen your heart, all ye that hope in the Lord. The Eye of the Lord is upon them, Psal. 33.18. And they trust in him<sup>a</sup> who will certainly perform his Promise And thrice happy are they in whom the Lord taketh pleasure, their Expectation shall be Gladness.

7. SOLOMON says, They have hope in death, Prov. 14.33. And the Apostle tells you, they are saved thereby, Rom. 8.24. Hopes in any Creature may be frustrated, but hope in God maketh not ashamed; for he is good to all them that trust in him, Lam. 3.24, 25. This hope is not Humane, or Conjectural, liable to Fraudulency, but Theologically grounded on the infallible Word of God, in whom is only our Confidence, Psal. 119.81. Now the Object of this Hope, is what God has promised; Remission of Sins, Grace, Glory, and all things necessary for this present Life, and the future; and the instrumental Motive is justifying Faith, from whence it springs; for the Apostle tells you, Heb. 11.1. Faith is the Substance of things hoped for. The supreme end, God's Glory; the subordinate, our own Salvation, and present Comfort, whereby we may effectually offer up our Thankfulness to God to who begetteth us again to a lively hope in Christ, 1 Pet. 1.3.

8. St. John tells you in his first Epistle, 3.3. That he which hath this Hope is purified; and the Psalmist animates you, saying, It is an Expulsion of servile Fear, Psal. 5.6.4.5. As also a dependence on God, and casting all our Care upon him, a Fortitude in bearing Afflictions, and a Joy in Adversity. The Subject of this Hope, are God's Saints; Faith and Hope accord in the Cause, and God's Spirit giveth both; and in the certainty, as we believe, so we hope. All they differ in is this, That Faith begetteth Hope, whereby Faith hath the Preference. Secondly, Faith beholdeth the the verity of God's Promises, Hope on the Goodness of them; as Faith can entertain nothing but infallible Truth for its Object, so Hope can enjoy nothing but Goodness. Faith apprehendeth the Truth, and Hope patiently expects the fulfilling of it. Now the Object of this Hope hath four Qualifications, Good, Future, Difficult, and Possible.

9. GOOD: Whatsoever is contrary to it, may be an object of Fear, which has no coherence with this Hope. Now whereas there is a real Good, so there is an appearing or seeming one, which being not sincere, creates a vain, or impious Hope; as if a Man hopes for Ease, Pleasure, Riches and Honors: These are not Verities, nor good of themselves, but in their use; and so their hopes may be vain and of no duration. A Man hopes a Revenge on his Enemy, a Satisfaction of his Lusts, or the like. This Hope is impious, and not durable; and must in the end render a Man unhappy. But if we hope for the Glory of God, our Soul's Health and Comfort, or what is really good in itself; this is true Hope, and shall attain to that height of Perfection, though to transitory Eyes it seems not to be durable; as when we invoke for some Temporal Things, which Omnipotency discerneth not to be agreeable to our Necessities, or for him to grant; as when Christ prayed that the Cup might pass from him; and when Moses hoped to go into Canaan, Christ was heard, and Moses not defeated of his hope, because in both God decreed that which was best; and that is ever consistent with true Hope, which gives not the Deity Prescriptions, but confidently expecteth, either what it hopeth, or something better.

10. FUTURE Rom. 8.24, 25. Joy is of things Present, or so represented; as when we rejoice in Hope, Rom. 12.12. Hope maketh that present, by a Prepossession of that which is to come; for Hope acts contrary to that which is present. Difficult: Such are all things Excellent; perhaps deluded Hope makes it an easy step to Heaven and Salvation. But they that indeed go that Path, shall find it narrow, and environ'd with a World of Difficulties. Lastly, Possible; That which is impossible to Carnal Reason, may be hoped for, because 'tis possible to God; therefore Abraham believed above Hope: And we expect the Resurrection of the Dead; and some things which sinful Men think possible, are impossible.

11. ALL things are possible to Omnipotence, which he will perform; and he will perform what he has Promised. But some things he disannuls, and so are impossible. Omnipotency will not lie, nor be unjust; for that importeth Impotency, and is a declining of his Attributes: To hope that those Asseverations God hath pronounced concerning Supine Sinners, shall not be accomplished, is a Hope altogether vain and fruitless; for it is impossible for the Divine Majesty to be untrue: To be resolute in Sinning, and yet to hope for Pardon, is a frivolous Hope, because it is impossible for God to be unjust; a severe Lesson for Presumptuous Sinners, who resolve to enjoy their Lusts and Pleasures, glut themselves with Revenge, and yet hope when this Life's Scene is ended, the few Petitions of their Epilogue shall purchase favor.

12. IF thou goest on in this Career, thou wilt be guilty of a gross Absurdity; for if thou resolvest to Sin, and invocatest the Almighty to be Merciful, thou dost in effect beseech God to unthroned himself of his Justice, and to be indulgent to an Impenitent Sinner. This being impossible, it concerns thee, to arise from sleep, and shake off all vain and deluding Hopes, that thou mayst fix on the true and never failing, which is the Anchor of the Soul, a laying hold on the Land of the Living; it is the ease of Sorrows, Grief's Asswager, Affliction's Comforter, and Despair's Antidote. Again, it is Faith's Perspective; the Nebo where we take a view of the Promised Rest, and the Faithful Spy to discover the Holy-Land, bringing us the Tastes from Escoll, the Fruits of the Spirit, the Possession which they hold, who enjoy no more, and yet are Rich in all Things.

CHAP. XVII. Rules to govern our Hope.

IN order to this Governance, endeavor to fortify thy Mind with Resolution and Sobriety; which will guide to Purity of Life. For everyone that hath this Hope, purgeth himself as he is pure, 1 John 3.3. A true Hope, with a Resolution to persist in any known Sin, is incompatible. The Devout Man's Hope never faileth, of which Seneca could say, That Fortune hath often deserted the Innocent, but good Hope never. Hope to the End; for the Perfection of that Virtue is Perseverance. We must wait for the Adoption, to wit, the Redemption of our Body, Rom. 8.23. Though deferred Hope disturbs the Heart; Though it tarry, wait, for it shall surely come, Hab. 2.3. What ever Trials we undergo, let us put on Job's Resolution, Chap. 13.15. Though he stay me, yet will I trust in him. We belong to him that Redeemed us; If we hold fast the Confidence, and the rejoicing of the Hope firm unto the End, Heb. 3.6.

2. THOUGH through Humane Frailty thou sometimes art assaulted with Fear; yet be confident, and pursue the Psalmists Rule, who expresses, What time I am afraid, I will trust in thee, Psal. 56.3. Fear and Hope may inhabit together, especially where the fear of the Lord doth not abrogate Faith's Confidence, but Carnal Security. Treasure up the Promises of God; to that intent were they written, and divulged, That we through Patience and Comfort of the Scriptures might have hope, Rom. 15.4. Fix not thy rest on this World, or place thy Confidence on anything in it; it is but comparable to a broken Reed, a slack Rope, on the raging Sea, or a false Friend in Adversity; and like the Quick-Sands, on which infatuated Builders lay their Foundations: As Moses told Israel, Ye are not come to your rest, Deut. 12.9.

3. ALL temporal Enjoyments are liable to Vicissitudes, and no Constancy to be found among the Sons and Daughters of Men. Prosperity is like a Fair Morning, quickly overcast with hideous Storms; like the Morning Dew, soon vanishing; or like a pleasant Flower, or a Jonah's Gourd; such are all Humane Enjoyments. So that there is no sure Hope, but in the Almighty, who is immutable, neither deceiveth those that trust in him; therefore, beware of vain Hopes, especially those which are Irrational, (lest thou tempt the Lord) for they are fraudulent to Men. Such is their Reliance who contemn the ordinary means in Expectation of Miracles, and act contrary to the express Word of the most High, in vain hope of obtaining a Pardon.

4. PROPOSE not too great things to thyself; for we are frequently the evident Authors of our own Misfortunes, when we promise Peace, Health, and Prosperity to ourselves. This soaring Ambition's Wings are sometimes deplumed, and we fall into bitterness, when we come short of that which to ourselves we so vainly promised. So that it were much better never to climb too high, than put ourselves in so much danger as falling from so great a Precipice; but rather let us invoke the Great Being, who is the Author of our Hope, and the Donor of all Consolation, to infuse a sure Hope and a steadfast Confidence, by a Divine Inspiration into our Souls.

A Prayer for Hope.

O Almighty God, my earnest Expectation and Hope, my Fortress, Helper and Deliverer; though my numberless Sins have deserved thy Wrath, insomuch as thou mayst justly cast me off into hopeless Despair, and final Destruction; yet look upon me with thy Eye of Mercy, through the Wounds of a bleeding Jesus, in whom thou hast commanded me to believe, and hast promised Remission of my Sins, and Eternal Life. For his sake alone I humbly beseech thee, give me that assurance, that in the end, I may obtain my hope, even the Salvation of my Soul. And though thou dost now fill my wounded Spirit with Bitterness, and remove from me Peace and Comfort, so that I forget my Prosperity, and go mourning all the day long:

2. YET, O Lord, though thou humblest my dejected Soul, with ponderosity of Sorrows, and makest my Eyes fountains of Tears, driving me to Solitude and Silence, with them that mourn in Zion; Yet thou dost extend thy Goodness to them that wait for thee, and to the Soul which seeketh thee. Thy Mercies are renewed every Morning, and thy Compassions fail not, to frail Dust and Ashes. Thou hast opened unto me the rich treasure of thy transcendent Mercies, and enabled me to trust in thee: Thou hast according to thy stupendous Mercy begotten me again to a lively Hope, by the Resurrection of thy dear Son from the dead, of an Inheritance Incorruptible: For all these Blessings my Soul hath acknowledged thee, to be my Portion; therefore will I trust in thee.

3. O Lord, I know, that the Hopes of the Hills are vain, and so is all Confidence in frail Mortality; and no hope can be happy, which is not fixed in thee. But in defiance to all Satan's devices, thrice blessed must he be, whose hope thou art. He shall be like a Tree planted by the Waters of Life, which shall never wither, but prosper; for thou art Truth itself. And O thou God, of all Consolation, now speak Peace to my afflicted Soul, and let me not be disappointed of my Hope. Thou art pleased to wean me from the Allurements of an unkind and diffident World, by suffering me to endure such Grief and Sorrow; yet seeing thou art my Hope from my Youth, let me not be ashamed of my Confidence; let thy Mercy be still my Hope, and thy Grace my Strength; amidst all the Storms and Surges of Affliction, fasten my Soul's Anchor on the Land of the Living, my Rock, who is entered within the Vail, to make requests for me.

4. INVRE me with Patience, until the time of Comfort, and refreshing shall return from thy gracious Presence. Give me the Helmet of Salvation, and an Assurance of what thou hast graciously promised in thy Word, and laid up for me in Heaven. Let the Experience of thy former Goodness in many Deliverances give me a Door of Hope for the future, that I may more and more trust in thee. And, O thou, who art the God of Hope, fill me with Joy and Peace in Believing, that I may abound in Hope, through the Power of thy holy Spirit. Give me a strong Consolation, and full assurance of thy Mercy, that continuing grounded, and established in a steadfast Hope of my Resurrection to a Life of Glory, at the appointed hour, my Flesh may rest in Hope, and my Soul be cheerfully rendered into thy Gracious Hands, to rest with thee, through Jesus Christ, my ever blessed Lord and Savior.

Amen.

CHAP. XVIII. Of Fear.

FEAR is a pensive and anxious Expectation, of some danger approaching, either Imminent, or a Supposition of appearing so. We are timorous at any Malevolency, which is real, or apparent; and many times at that which proves not so. Fear is opposite to Fortitude, as one extreme of Participation; and as it allayeth too much Presumption by its limitation, it becomes beneficial; but when it exceeds its Extent, it grows Pernicious. Virtue is absent, when Fortitude is not present: And he can never express his Duty towards God well, or demonstrate his Justice to the World, who acts contrary; for Satan is vigilant in his diabolical Operations upon the Timorous, offering to his View continual Objects of imposterous and vain Fears; like Hunters Suels to chase the fearful Deer from the safe ways: So Satan driving through Pusillanimity and Timidity, that he maketh them Evil for fear of Men, whom the fear of God cannot make Good.

2. TO omit many acceptations of the Word: I shall only handle some few; First, there is a natural Fear, and that of two sorts, in respect of the Object: First, Concerning the avoidance of Sin, for the love of him who knew no Sin. It happened so with Adam in his state of Innocency, who having heard the Threatning, feared to Sin, signaling he would not be guilty of offending his Creator, whom he loved above all: But however Adam in the Temptation lost this Fear, and so Sinned, yet in the rectitude of his Mind, he reassumed it. Secondly, In relation to the avoidance of Sorrow in apprehension of God's Anger against Sin committed. In this Christ Feared, Matt. 26.38. Heb. 5.7. He that knew no Sin.

3. THE nearest to this, is the filial fear of the Regenerate, who though through Infirmary they frequently Sin, and fear to displease God by any Offence; as Solomon declares, Prov. 8.13. The fear of the Lord is to hate Evil. This is the beginning of Wisdom, and it is principally demonstrated in four things: First, That we place God ever before our Eyes, moving as always in his Presence. Secondly, That we acknowledge him as the Omniscient Witness and supreme Judge of all our Thoughts, Words and Actions. Thirdly, That we fear not the Creatures, as we do the Creator. Fourthly, That we ever perform that which is just and acceptable to him; though no Mortal Eye can testify against us, or the World may be offended; yet let us follow those Patterns of Goodness, as Joseph, Daniel, and many other Servants of the Most High.

4. THERE is a fear of Infidelity in them that love the Sin, but fear the Punishment. This is that servile Fear which the Wicked affect; which though perhaps it may restrain them from sinful external Acts, yet it is not predominant over any constant Duty: For no sooner their dread is vanished, but they turn with as great eagerness in pursuit of their sinful Game, as the Dog to his Vomit, or the Sow to her wallowing in the Mire. This fear is not consonant to God's Children, because a guilty Conscience ever attends it, as incredulity and expectation of God's just Judgments on their Sins, without hoping and trusting in Christ's Merits. A Christian Fortitude dissipates Fears, which made the Psalmist animate himself, Psalms 49.5. Wherefore should I fear in the days of Evil? And Psalms 23.4. I will fear no Evil, for thou art with me. Again, Psalms 27.1. The Lord is my Light and my Salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my Life, of whom shall I be afraid?

5. THE Wicked fear where no fear is: They fear not God for love of him, but for Self-ends and fear of Punishment; as the Grecians Worshipped their false God's; and the Commonalty the great Lord's▪ Which is a Symptom of a base and impious Mind, prohibited to them that are adopted Heirs of the Heavenly Jerusalem, to whom the Wise Man speaks, Prov. 3.25, 26. Be not afraid of sudden fear, neither of the Desolation of the Wicked when it cometh; for the Lord shall be thy Confidence, and shall keep thy Foot from being taken. And Isaiah, encourages us in Chap. 4.1.10. Fear thou not, for I am with thee: Be not dismay'd, for I am thy God, I will strengthen thee, and I will help thee. And in the 43 Chap. ver. 1. Fear not, for I have Redeemed thee.

6. ALL which Precepts are to be apprehended of servile fear, which is to despond of God's Mercy, rendering Men Desperate, not provident to avoid Danger, nor importunate to fly to God for help. The first is evident in Jehoram's Message, Behold, said that Prophaner, beheld, this evil is of the Lord, what should I wait for the Lord any longer? 2 Kings. 6.33. And in that precipitate Counsel, Job 2.9. Curse God and die. The second Effect we read in Jacob, who being in danger of his Life, instantly Prayed, and sent Presents to appease his revengeful Brother. Not to be afraid of God's Judgments on Sin, is carnal Security, and stupid Carelessness of Seared Consciences, 1 Tim. 4.2. Not to fear imminent Dangers, demonstrates an improvident Mind. And not to fear God's dreadful Presence, must needs be imputed to sinful Mortals as an ignorance of the Deity, and a Man's own self.

7. BUT to be a timorous Antemon, who was possessed with so large a stock of Fear, that he durst not stir abroad; but kept Two Servants at home to guard his Head, with a Brass-Shield; is not only an impious but ridiculous Fear. To stand in awe of Men, more than God, is the fear of Hypocrites: To fear without Confidence in God, for the diversion of evil (as Belshazzar, when seeing the Hand-writing upon the Wall, his Knees trembled, and the joints of his Loins were loosed; or as Saul at Endor) is such a Fear, as God Challenges no share in it. This Fear is a perpetual torment to the wicked, and can by no means quiet the voice of their Conscience: It is an Imperious Mischief, an Anticipation of Evil, not yet come, an Inducement to a Man's unhappiness, not only with present evils, but with future, which, were Fear banished, they could not molest him; Semblant to that Fear of Enevitale death, which forceth men continually to die, for fear of Dying once.

8. BUT to fear God with a filial Fear, proceeding of Love to him, as in Christian verity, the fountain of Wisdom and true Happiness: And with such a Fear, God is well pleased; he will deliver them, and fulfill their desire; he will learn them the way of Righteousness: They shall enjoy all that is good, and when they seem to lack, they shall be supplied most; it shall be Health, and Strength to 'em, Prov. 3.8. They shall have Understanding, Blessings Temporal and Eternal, and be Animated to perform Acts of Goodness, and deal Uprightly with all Men: Examples of which we have in Obadiah, 1 Kings 18.3, 12, 13. and Joseph, Gen. 42.10.

9. THIS Fear brings more advantage to the Possessor, than great Riches to the Wicked: It is the Souls Angel-Guardian, Innocencies Keeper; it is Securities Antidote, the Minds Centinel to awaken it, and give the Alarm against the assaults of the Subtile Enemy. This armeth a Man, with a true and unfailing Confidence: 'Tis indeed the sum of what God requires of us, Deut. 10.12. And what the Preachers Doctrine, informs us of, even, the whole Duty of Man. Eccles. 12.14. Of this only is that saying true, The Mother of the Fearful, never weeps much; because such are truly Blessed.

10. NOW by reason, we are but Men, even frail Mortals, not yet perfect in Love, and so liable to many Fears, and subject to many Sins, Failings and Hazards, and thereby exposed to many dangerous and servile Fears: Which by the stupendous and tender Mercy of the Almighty, may convert it in the Issue to our Happiness; but if we are so prone to Sin, even under so much Fear, what would we be if we were secure from all? Therefore I have thought it necessary to lay down some Rules for the Governing of our Thoughts in Fears; which I shall show in the next Chapter.

CHAP. XIX. Rules for Governing our Thoughts in Fears.

FIRST, for God's Glory, and the Salvation of thine Immortal Soul, contemn any danger: It was our Savior's Precept, Fear not them who are able to destroy the Body only; for they cannot diminish thy happiness: They may indeed make an Addition to thy Felicity, if thou bearest well thy injuries. These Objects are only dreadful to the ignorant; like that Cumane Ass in the Lions Skin, or the Crocodile, fierce against the timorous, but fearful of the Couragious; so is the Impatient, who cannot submit to take up the Cross, which like Moses Rod, thrown down became a dreadful Serpent; but at God's Command, re-assumed; an harmless-Rod; to divide the Briny Floods, and open a way into the Promised Rest: Many men heighten their own Fears, deluding Fancy, representing that monstrous, which right Reason would discover Innocent; in a constant and Prudent Resolution to meet with difficulties.

2. FEAR God, and be not dismayed, Josh. 1.9. Endeavour to fix thy Mind upon such a Basis of Moderation, that thy Resolution neither rise to Temerity, nor fall to Timidity; neither to be Obstinate, nor to be afraid of anything: But in a Medium, carry such an even temper, as that Prudence may claim that privilege to fit at the Helm without the Interruption of either Extrems: Take the Prophets Counsel, Isai. 8.13. Sanctify the Lord of Hosts, and let him be your Fear, and your Dread, and he shall be your Sanctuary: But fear not their Fear, who say a Confederacy. The present fear of God Createth us an Eternal Security: Fear him and he will banish all other fears from thee. Behold the Psalmist how he is fortified; Though I walk in the Valley of the Shadow of Death, I will fear no evil; for thou art with me, Psal. 23.4. And Psal. 118.6. The Lord is on my side, I will not fear what man can do unto me. And in Conclusion, the fear of the Lord immergeth all other fears.

3. IN every danger, impress on thy heart the Omnipotency of God, and endeavor to have an Affiance in him: He that pursues this Rule, shall act safely: When a Fiery-Furnace was threatened, Shadrach, Meshac, and Abednego answered the Incens'd King, Our God whom we serve is idle to deliver us, Dan. 3:17. And David tells you, Psal. 34.7. The Angel of the Lord encampeth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them. And when our Enemies seem most formidable, there are more for us than can be against us: As it appeared in the case of the Prophet Elisha, 2 Kings 6.16. It animated the Royal Prophet to cry out, In the Lord put I my trust; how say ye then to my Soul, flee, as a Bird to your Mountain? Psal. 11.1. All Confidence in Men, even their Councils, or an Arm of Flesh, is unhappy, and must come to nothing; but God endures to all Eternity: Which made the Psalmist declare; Therefore will we not fear, though the Earth be removed: And though the Mountains be carried into the midst of the Sea.

4. TAKE Solomon's Counsel, and hearken unto the Word of God, Pro. 1.33. Whose hearkeneth unto me shall dwell safely, and shall be quiet from fear of evil. And Prov. 3.23, 34. Then shalt thou walk in thy way safely; when thou liest down thou shalt not be afraid. Herein shall be made manifest God's Power, Truth, Providence, Mercy and Justice that thou mayest trust in him; according to the Expression of the Psalmist, They that know thy Name, will put their trust in thee, for thou, Lord, hast not forsaken them that seek thee, Psal. 9.10. Love the Lord thy God with a sincere heart: And the more thou lovest him, the more thou wilt rest assured of his Love and Protection: and the more perfect thy love is, the more it casteth out fear, 1 John 4.18.

5. TAKE Job's advice, Chap. 22.24. Depart from iniquity, and say of it, as the Princes of the Philistines said of David, Let him not go down with us to the Battle, lest in the Battle he be an Adversary to us, 1 Sam. 29.4. Fix thyself to seek the Lord, as Jehoshaphat did, when the Armies were upon their March towards him, against whom he Atchieved a Glorious Victory, 2 Chron. 2.3. Entertain a good Conscience, it shall be a Wall of Brass unto thee: The safety of that makes a man assume the Courage of a Lyon: But if we perceive the smoke of Infernal Brimstone ascend there, we must needs faint, like the men of Ai when they beheld their City on Fire, Josh. 8.20. Guilt of Sin in the Conscience creates Sordidness in Men; they may possibly express Transcendent Words who possess a Timorous Conscience; but as one said of the fearful Dog, He must needs fear, who hath no peace in himself.

6. CONSIDER with David, Psal. 37.37. The end of the Saints and Apostles sufferings, which hath ever been happy; and they are the more Partakers of Christ's Glory, for bearing a share in his sufferings: Consider how long they have suffered, and then thou canst not fear any of those things which thou shalt suffer: Behold the Devil shall cast some of you into Prison, that you may betryed —be thou faithful unto Death, and I will give thee a Crown of Life, Rev. 2.10. True it is, Flesh and Blood claims Allowance for its Infirmity; but the more we can apply to our hearts the end of the Saints, and the quiet fruits of Righteousness, to them that are exercised, the less we must needs be sensible of the Malignity of any Creature.

7. ENDEAVOUR for Peace with God; give him no rest till he speaks unto the Voice within thee, thy Conscience: And firmly resolve not to let him go, until he Bless thee, and assure thee of thy Remission in Christ Jesus. He hath nothing to fear or molest him, whose sins are forgiven. When the sting of Death is taken out, who would not be Valiant? Which occasioned St. Paul to express himself, 1 Cor. 15.57. But thanks be to God, which giveth us the Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. And St. John says in his first Epistle, Chap. 5.4. And this is the Victory that overcometh the World, even our Faith.

8. IN thy greatest Fears pray most fervently: Even so did our Savior, being in an Agony, He prayed more earnestly: So did Jacob in fear of his Brother's long studied Revenge, Gen. 32.9. Pray and beseech God that he would illuminate and open thine Eyes to behold his saving Health. God many times sounds his Allarm to awaken our drouzy Souls, and open our Mouths to earnest Prayer, which in Prosperity are too prone to the Spirit of Slumber and Coldness: Fear hath many Tongues, and can open the Mouth of the Dumb: Even Jonahs Mariners in their Fear will pray, and instigate others to the same Duty: That one Example of Athis, Croesus's Son, showeth what the violence of Fear can do; he who before was dumb, on a sudden cried out, O Cyrus spare my Father, and by our Misfortunes, learn, that thou also art but a Man.

A Prayer against Fear.

O Almighty Lord God, who art in thy Wrath and Indignation dreadful against Sinners, I humbly acknowledge and confess, that there is not one of thy Judgments, but what the Guilt of my Sins have long since deserved; even the miseries of this Life, terrors of Death, and future Condemnation: But, O thou great God of Consolation, assure me of a full and free Pardon, and a remission of all my Sins, and Seal my Peace with thee, through the Blood of a Crucified Jesus. Fill my Heart and Affections with that measure of thy Love, as may exclude all servile fear: Give me the testimony of a good Conscience, to comfort me against all vain fears of the Wicked. Lift up the light of thy Countenance upon me, and give me that assurance that thou art, and will be my Defense and Confidence.

2. AND, O thou who rulest in Heaven and Earth, from the Angel to the Worm, the lowest of Creatures; and from the swayer of the Scepter, to the drawer of Water: Thou art Omnipotent, and canst do what thou pleasest, and no other God besides thee, can Deliver after this sort: Lord, let it be thy Divine will and Pleasure to deliver me from those Afflictions which I fear and so much tremble at; that I may live to Praise thee, and declare thy goodness towards me in the Land of the Living.

3. AND I humbly beseech thee, O Father, if it be possible, let this Cup pass from me; yet nevertheless not my Will, but thy holy Will be done. Lord, suffer me not for any trials in Afflictions or under any Temptations to fall from thee: Consider my Frailty, remember whereof thou hast Made and Fashion'd me, that I am but sinful Dust and Ashes, which soon fade and pass away.

4. GIVE me Patience to endure thy Fatherly hand of Correction, and a full assurance that all things shall work together for my advantage: Give me a fervent frame of Spirit, to Pray more Earnestly; and give me that Faith, to which thou, who canst not be guilty of the breach of it, hast made the promise of Audience and granting my Petitions. Give me an invincible Resolution, not to let thee depart until thou doest bless me with some happy Issue, through Jesus Christ, my Lord and only Savior

Amen.

CHAP. XX. Of Cares.

CARE is the Child of Providence: Some say, the Soul's Apparator to Summon all its Faculties to its Senate or Counsel. It is rather Counsel's President, determining what to pursue and what to decline: It is the Weight which moveth all the Wheels; which taken off, or quite run down, all the Nerves of Providence are loosed, and the Souls Faculties become inactive and resty, so as we neither affect the Good, nor fear the Bad.

2. CARE is the Centinel which gives the Allarm to awaken Wisdom to its Offices, and the Steward of the internal Habitation: It is the Pilot which sitteth at the Helm, to steer and direct the Course; lest Industry be wanting to prudent Decrees and Resolutions, or success to Industry. So necessary is this Vigilancy of the Soul, that without it we can neither be profitable to ourselves or others, in things Divine or Humane: Tho Salvation shall neither be in his Care, as the Apostle mentions, Who Willeth, nor of him that Runneth, but of God, that showeth Mercy, Rom. 9.16. Yet if thou use not thy diligence to lay hold on his Promises, thou shalt find, that he which Created thee without thy Care, will not Save thee without it; for he hath made thee a voluntary Agent, and hath endowed thee with Reason, that thou mightest use his Ordinance, for the benefit of thy own Salvation.

3. THO, as the Apostle says, 1 Cor. 3.7. It is neither in him that Planteth, nor in him that Watereth, but in God who giveth the Increase: Yet if the Dispensation be committed to thee, Woe be to thee if thou Preach not the Gospel: And Cursed is he that doth the work of the Lord negligently: Tho, as the Psalmist mentions, Psalm 127.1. Except the Lord build the House, they labor but in vain that build it: And, Except the Lord keep the City, the Watchman Waketh but in vain; and the Builder shall work to Confusion: Yet if thou art a careless Inhabitant of Laish; if thou art not vigilant, or in necessity Build not, thou temptest the Lord thy God, Judges 18.7. It is in the power of Omnipotency, who said at first, Gen. 1.11. Let the Earth bring forth Grass, the Herb yielding seed, and the Fruit-Tree yielding Fruit after his Kind. Which to this day are duly performed: But except thou Plant and Sow, thou must not expect to Reap: Neither hath the Almighty Wisdom fixed this care in our Hearts for ourselves only, but likewise for them to whom he hath given dependence on us. So that if any Man will not Work, according to the Apostle's Order, Let him not eat, 2 Thes. 3.10. And, If any provide not for his own, and especially for those of his own House, he hath denied the Faith, and is worse than an Infidel, Tim. 5.8.

4. IT is an exquisite care which the great Being hath Implanted in the Hearts of Mothers, for the Preservation of their Children, in which, They shall be saved if they continue in the Faith and Charity, 1 Tim. 2.15. Neither is any Employment, Calling, or Person among the Sons of Men exempt from Care. Kings, as the honored Parents of Kingdoms, embrace Care of the largest size, like those Egyptian Plagues, Exod. 8.3, &c. Not forbearing their Sacred Beds: They must take care for the Weal of their Subjects. It was a mark of Shame and Dishonor which the Holy Ghost fixed on Gallio, Acts 18.17. But Gallio cared for none of these things.

5. CHRIST in his suffering for us, omitted not this Emblem in his Crown of Thorns. Nor can the Brutes and Animals subsist without their Care: God hath given them a marvelous Instinct and natural Sagacity, to build and lay up for themselves and their Young: So that the Sluggard may well be sent to School to Solomon's Industrious Ant, laboring in Summer against the Winter, Prov. 6.6. And the Careless Daughters, who think they were Born to live at Ease, may learn of the provident Bee, and other Creatures, Prudent in their Kind, Isa. 32.9, &c.

6. CARE there must of necessity be used, and the best are not secluded from it; but the malicious Enemy striveth to pervert it to Man's Destruction, endeavoring to make some so Ebrious with desire of Ease, that they sleep Negligently: And where he encounters with an active and industrious nature, he laboreth to introduce some vain or impious Object of Cares, to extract a distraction from that which should conduce to their Happiness. The misery that attends Infatuated Mankind, is, when their Cares, like the River Jordan, empty their sweet Streams into a dead Sea of unprofitable desires and vanities.

7. THERE is no sin which hath not some unhappy Cares to surround and foment it: And commonly more Acts of Supererogation, than Salvation requireth. Impious Cares are Revenge's, Brokers, Lust's Panders, Avarices Vassals, Errors Nurses, Mothers sin, and Vice's Hand-Maids, in all which they but fight for a destructive Helena, or a mischievous Gain. How happy might Adulterers, Murderers and Robbers be, were so much Adventure, Vigilancy, Charge and Care bestowed on God's Service, as they employ in their Sins! Taking more care and pains to go to Hell, than by the tender Mercy of God, would guide them to Heaven.

CHAP. XXI. Rules Concerning Cares.

SEEK first the Kingdom of God, and his Righteousness, Mat. 6.35. That all things necessary may be Administred unto thee: Let thy main Care be for God's Glory and thy own Salvation; to acquire that one necessary thing, which on<sup>ce</sup> gained, shall never be taken away or lost, Luke 10.42. Martha's many Incumbrances in this case, cannot avoid Subordination: This is Treasure in Heaven, neither in Danger of Thieves, or Moths. That same Hysteron Proteron, wherein Worldly desires appear like those unmannerly Imps in Eli's discomposed time, claiming to be served before God himself, must needs come to naught; and it proves but lost labor to rise early, late take rest, and eat the bread of Carefulness, Psal. 127.2. That Manna which was kept all Night, except only for the Sabbath, was Corrupted, Exod. 16.20, 24. All our labor to lay up, except for Salvation (the eternal Sabbath) is but lost: Therefore Labor for the Meat which endureth to Eternal Life, John 6.27.

2. SET your affections on things above, Col. 3.2. And study a holy Contempt of this World: It is Affection creates us Care; and where that is, there our Cares and our Minds will be fixed. 'Tis the highest Prudence to lop off vain Cares, that our better placed Care may be more Fruitful, and to thrust out worldly thoughts: As Christ did the tumultuous Company at Jairus house, which otherwise like those Guests at Bethlehem, would afford him no room: As when the Superfluity of the Branches are pruned off, the Vine is recompensed in the Fruit: So it is in the cutting off vain Cares; the more thou diminishest from them, the more fruitfully shall thy Soul be augmented in Spiritual things: As when Elijah was taken up to Heaven, his Mantle fell off, 2 King. 2.13. So do the Cares of this World, when our Hearts are addicted to Heavenly things.

3. HOW properly may vain, childish things, like dead Leaves near the fruitful Autumn, fall off our minds, when we subscribe ourselves Men? And when that which we have in possession is perfect, how easily do our Worldly Cares wither and fall away; even like the Glow-worms fraudulent Luster, which vanishes at the approach of the Morning Light? In whatsoever State thou art, learn therewith to be content: Discontent and avaritious Desires force the heart, upon the sharp Tenters of Care: If a Man be content with little, he will not care for much: Cares follow Riches, and augment with their Encreases, Mat. 13.22.

4. TRUST in the Lord, and commit thy ways to him, and he will bring it to pass, Psal. 37.5. Cast thy care upon him, for He careth for thee, 1 Pet. 5.7. and hath Promised, He will never leave thee, nor forsake thee, Heb. 13.5. And the Prophet declares this comfortable Report, Jer. 17.7, 8. Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is; for he shall be as a tree planted by the Waters; and shall not be careful in the year of drought. God's Providence is vigilant over his Servants, and it can neither err, nor be defeated: He that gave us Life, will not fail to give us Meat and Cloathing; he that feeds the Fowls of the Air, and adorns the fading Flowers, with such varieties of Beauty, will not forget to Feed and Cloath Man, whom he has appointed to be Lord over them.

5. HE knoweth our Necessities before we ask, and that all our Care cannot add one Cubit to our Stature: Riches and Honors, for which men take such indefatigable care, come neither from the East, nor from the West, nor yet from the South; but it is God which both giveth and taketh away. Some increase in Wealth, Sleeping, or Waking; others with unwearied industry wax poor: Labor to perform thy endeavor with Cheerfulness, and commit the Issue to God: By which means thou wilt avoid all Diffidence and Distracting Care.

6. BE vigilant over thy Soul; otherwise Cares will choke up the holy Seed of God's Word, whereby it will become unprofitable to thee: It will Eclipse the light of Heavenly Knowledge, it will clog the Heart, and creep on like an Ephialt, which having seized us, we groan under it, and can neither shake it off, nor awake to an holy Expectation of the coming of Christ. Frequently Recollect thy Mind of thy Mortality, Frailty of Life, and the Vanity of all Transitory things: What are Riches and Magnificence in this World? They are like Children's Bubbles filled with Air, which vanishes in their breaking: Even such are we, like Dreams, or a Scene, wherein our parts once Acted, we must shrink into Natures Tying-room, never to return.

7. IT is uncertain what hour may be our last; but it is certain one must come, and how nigh it may be at hand, is beyond our knowledge; perhaps this night the Sentence may come forth, and a Writ of Alienation on thy Store laid up for many years; and this harsh Summons may reach thy Ears; Thou Fool, this night shall thy Soul be required of thee; then whose shall all those things be? Luke 12.20. When the Hives in their Plenitude warn the Masters of their Republic, that they want a Deduction of their Colony, they Swarm and Fly: But if you cast a little Dust among them, they presently settle. So the only Expedient to settle our Swarm of Busie Cares, is the memento of our Original, That Dust thou art, and to Dust thou shalt return, Gen. 3.19. Lastly, to remember the Apostles Rule, Phil. 4.6. Be careful for nothing, but in everything by Prayer and Supplication, let your Requests be made known unto God: Those wants and cares are happy which chase us to him: Therefore let us depend and hope in him, and Invoke him by Prayer.

The Prayer.

O MOST Gracious and Merciful Lord God, who Feedest the young Ravens, Clothest the Lilies of the Fields, and fillest all things with thy Goodness: Thou Governest in Heaven, and in Earth, and givest to every Creature Subsistence and Preservation in its kind: O Lord I humbly acknowledge thy goodness towards me, even from the Womb unto this present moment: Thou hast preserved me, when I neither knew what human necessities were, nor which way to relieve them: When I reposed myself, thou preservedst me; when I did not foresee any evil approaching, thou dissipatedst it; when I was kept ignorant of my Necessities, thy infinite Mercies Prevented me with Blessings and Provisions; when I was lost, thou recoveredst me: And when I was dead in trespasses and sins, thou didst quicken me by thy Grace; when I understood nothing of the Way of Life, thou meekly didst inform me, and didst guide me in the way wherein I should walk: But above all, before ever I was, thou gavest thy Son Christ Jesus to be the Inestimable price of my Redemption.

2. AND now, O Lord, I who am less than the least of all thy Mercies, what shall I render thee? Nay, what can I, for all thy Transcendent Blessings? Thou hast not only once, like the good Samaritan, but many times, as a God of Infinite Mercy, bound up the wounds of my Soul, and taken care of me: O let thy Mercy still continue towards me, and create, O God, in me a clean and a contrite heart, and renew a right Spirit within me, that it may express my thankfulness aright to so great a Majesty as thou art: The Lions want, the Mighty suffer hunger: Thou hast sent a Fire among, them that live at ease and carelessly, even unto the Proud and Rejoicing Cities; and what am I, O Lord, that thou pleasest to spare me, and dost not still feed me with the Bread of Anxiety and Affliction, and make me drink the Waters of Astonishment?

3. LORD, fix my Hopes on thy Providence, and give me Assurance thy Mercy shall never fail me: I humbly cast all my Cares upon thee, who art a Protector of thy Children: Prosper thou my Labors, whose Providence descendeth to the Preservation of the poorest and meanest of all thy Creatures: Feed me with Bread of my Stature, and let me never want that which thou knowest needful for me: O thou, who didst increase the Sareptan's Oil and Meal, so that it failed not in all the Famine, Bless that portion which thy Providence hath measured out to me, and mine; let thy Blessing descend upon it, whether it be much or little, so that finding a sufficiency therein, I may in a Thankful, Holy, and Prudent Use thereof, Glorify thy Holy Name, and live Contentedly and Cheerfully before thee.

4. GIVE me in every estate, both in prosperity and adversity, a faithful dependence on thy Gracious Providence, which never faileth them that trust in thee: Thou best knowest, O Lord, my necessities before I ask; let no Cares of this World distract me from thy Service, neither make my Confidence in thee, incline to any distrust of thy Goodness, or fixing my heart on the love of this present World: Thou hast given thy Holy Son Jesus; assure me by his infallible Spirit, that with him thou wilt also give me all things.

5. GIVE me a heart to rest in thee, and to put all my trust and confidence in thy Mercy; instruct me, to seek thy Kingdom, and the Righteousness thereof, before all things which this World can give or take away: So that thou who providest for me, mayest in thy good pleasure administer to me all those things, which thou seest necessary for the relief of this Lifes present necessity; and let thy Blessing evermore attend it, until having passed through this World of Cares, and Valley of Miseries, I may arrive to that Blessed Life, thy Kingdom of Glory, through Jesus Christ, our Lord and only Savior,

Amen.

CHAP. XXII. Of Jealousy.

AMONG those thoughts which discompose the Mind, the Jealous are not the least: And the Wise Man acknowledges, Prov. 6.34. that Jealousy is the rage of a Man; and it is frequently so exasperating to un placable. Anger, That he will not regard any Ransom, neither will he rest content, though thou givest many Gifts, Verse 35. I mention not here that Jealousy, as 'tis Attributed to God, and sometimes importeth Anger, as in Ezek. 8.3. and Chap. 16.42. or execution of Justice, Deut. 29.20. nor Indignation at that which molesteth those the Almighty loveth, Ezek. 39.25. Zach. 1.14. or Pitty to his People, Joel 2.18, 19. nor as in Man, signifying only Envy and Emulation, as Rom. 10.19. and Chap. 11.11. or Fear of Danger to those whom we are most Indulgent, as 2 Cor. 11.2. Neither do I mean that of Ambition, to exclude Corrivals of Sinister Ends, such as St. Paul charged the false Apostles amongst the Galatians: Nor of Suspicion, which is an opinion or dread of some evil, sprung from Symptoms of Levity, or Airy notions, which sometimes set Friends at a great distance, and embitter Humane Societies: But of that which God gave a Law to Israel, Numb. 5.14.

2. THIS is a perturbation of Mind, compounded of Fear, Love, Indignation, and Suspition; a bitter Electuary of Ingredients, though good and proper in themselves if applied to their distinct uses: This Jealousy is the Bane of unhappy Love; the Gall of Wedlock; the sad Asmodeus, which makes the most flourishing Families detestable, if not desolate: It is a Tenebrous Apparition of disturbed Thoughts, restless in the inquest after that which they most abhor, and dread to find: It is the Souls Absynthium, and overflowing bitterness, the Scourge and Torture of Afflicted Minds, really tormenting sometimes with Imaginary, but often with vain Evils: It is the Devils Master-piece, and Quintessence of his Envy, rendering the Honorable, and (otherwise) Happy Estate of Matrimony, which the Almighty appointed to be the greatest Worldly Comfort; he by his Diabolical Malice strives to make it the most odious and unhappy: Therefore it may well be nominated in Numb. 5.30. The Spirit of Jealousy. For a worse Fury could never have been contrived to perplex frail Mortality.

3. NOW whereas the Drama in this unhappy Scene, is of two Persons at least, the Rules of Advice in this case, must have a double Address; which is to the Jealous of either Party: And first, Espouse not another's sin by a foolish and impious Connivance at the basest Action. He that inhibiteth Divorce in any other cause, as 1 Cor. 7.12. permitteth it in the cause of Adultery, Mat. 19.9. And the Law allows, when the Jealous man shall have set his Wife before the Lord, and Justice shall be executed upon her, Then shall the Man be guiltless from iniquity, and the Woman shall bear her iniquity, Numb. 5.31.

4. BE not rash, lest thou prove injurious to the Innocent; it is an innate Corruption, to view others faults, rather than their Virtues, and to surmize that to be Evil which may be transacted: And this Axiom may be fitly applied, That they who are evil themselves, claim that privilege of being Jealous of others: And he that looks through a yellow Glass, thinks all the World of the same Colour: Consider well, and then tell me, if it be not thy own guiltiness which is the false medium, that casteth that Complexion on others, which indeed thou only retainest thyself.

5. GIVE not place to the Devil; his Malice is like those Envious Philistines, who cast filth into the pure Fountains of Humane Propagation, to create a jealousy between the Married Pair, that by this Venom he may put them at variance, whom God commanded to a perfect Union. Sometimes he will aggravate slight suspicions, which so increases the rage of each other, that Reason is many times lost in the Battle: Or else, rather than lose his Game, he will suggest some vain Chimera of that which never was, or perhaps never like to be accomplished: Sometimes he will throw Temptations before 'em, such as private Meetings, Whispering, or some such loose Behaviour and Familiarity with others, as may unhappily create suspicion in the Good and Prudent.

6. NEITHER shall he be destitute of the service of other Mischievous Tongues to foment and feed this Malignant Humour: He that said Matrimony might be happy, if the Wife were blind, and the Man deaf, either did, or might mean, if the Wife had not wandering Eyes, she would never spy out Vanity, nor the Husband open Ears, he could not hearken to Malicious Reports: Seriously consider the vanity of this Evil, and then thou wilt prudently acknowledge, that all self-vexation is folly; and to invert the Theme, all folly is self-vexation: If with all thy Art and Care, thou couldst invent any Stratagem beyond tormenting thyself, there were some Plea for thy vexation: But none can be Chast against their Will, was a Sentence among the Heathens; and Argus's hundred Eyes cannot be so vigilant, but opportunity may prove too crafty for him.

7. IF thy Jealousy be fruitless, then thou hast occasion to vex at the Levity and Vanity of thy own Mind: If it be just, what is the monstrous Object of thy Hatred and Malice? Assure thyself the Adulteress is unhappy enough; and there is no Creature on Earth more despicable and odious, nor no Sin in this Life, accompanied with so many varieties of Plagues and Judgments; so that indeed they are great Objects of Pity, if all these wretched Ingredients can render them to be so, as a wounded Conscience, the Devil's Earnest to the Impenitent, and assurance of Hell and Damnation.

8. IN the next place, my address shall be to those in whom there is occasion of Suspicion. And first, Let Man himself consider how odious Adultery is, and out of all measure sinful; for he sinneth against his own Body, defileth the Temple of the Holy Ghost, Cor. 6.18, 19. and pierceth through his own Bowels with a Dart of Rottenness, Prov. 7.23. And that which will render him in the end mournful: But beyond all this, in case of Impenitency, which the stubborn Presumer may justly suspect, it is that whereby he excludeth himself from the Kingdom of Heaven, 1 Cor. 6.9, 10. And in the Adulteresses Crime, some Aggravations are appertaining to it, as robbing her Husband of his Posterity; obtruding a base and adulterous Issue, and so stealing away his Estate and Inheritance, by giving it to a Stranger, and fixing on an indelible Character of Dishonor and Bastardy upon her Child, who but for her impotent and ungovern'd Lust, might have proved noble and legitimate. An Injury which she can never exiate, nor repair to the innocuous Son with Rivers of Tears, and streams of her infected Blood. This multiplied Sin is sometimes concealed from Men, but never from the All-seeing God, who is a severe Revenger of all Iniquity.

9 OTHER Sins are grievous and pernicious; yet neither Lying, Stealing, Idolatry, Murder, nor Witchcraft, can of itself dissolve the Sacred Bond of Wedlock, as this only base act of Adultery doth: Therefore our Savior admits of no Divorce but upon that occasion. And it is remarkable, that when God would display the loathsomeness of Idolatry, which most displeased him, he still'd it Whoredom, and himself a jealous God; and certainly, though that be abolished of the bitter Water, causing the Curse, and rotting of the Thigh with swelling, which attended that antiquated Ceremony; yet the bitter Moral and Substance are not quite extinguished, Numb. 5.18.

10. AVOID what you are sensible of hath created your Suspicion; otherwise you are guilty, if not of Adultery, yet of a just Cause of Jealousy. Lysander punished one of his Soldiers for going out of his Quarters, resolving that he would have none of his, look, or go out like a Plunderer. Dinah's idle visits, Gen. 34.1, 2. proved her dishonor, effusion of guiltless Blood; her Father's Trouble, and her Brother's Curse: The wisest of Men recordeth it, as the mark of an Harlot, Prov. 7.11, 12. Her feet abide not in the house; now she is without, now in the streets, lying in wait at every corner.

11. IT was an Italian Severity in Sulpitius, and a Disposition to part with his Wife, who divorced her for going out of doors bareheaded: The Law, said he, confined thee to mine Eyes and Approbation, and not to please others. The common Law noted any, going out unvail'd, with the odious brand of Adultery. So careful were they to avoid all occasions or suspicions of that Sin. However foolishly strict they were, I am sure Jerome's Rules fore-noted is good; Whatsoever, saith he, may probably be feigned, be thou cautious it may not be feigned: Thou owest this to thy Husband's Love, thine own Indemnity and Honor, and the Right and Credit of thy Children.

The PRAYER.

O Eternal and Almighty God, Father of Lights, and of the First-born who are written in Heaven, and of the Spirits of Just Men made Perfect. Thou art the Searcher of all Hearts and Reins, to whose All-seeing Eye every Creature is manifest, and every thought of the Heart naked and open: We humbly beseech thee to take from us our stony Hearts, and to give us Hearts of flesh; to subdue in us by thy omnipotent Spirit, the miserable remainders of the First Adam, that native inclination to Sin, which continually carrieth us away Captive to the Laws thereof, even to that Evil which we would not commit, but utterly detest, and in bitterness of Soul repent of.

2. LORD create clean Hearts, and renew right Spirits within us; root out that raging Spirit of Jealousy, that infernal Fire which lies scorching in our bosoms; and enlighten our Understandings with a sound Knowledge of all the Mysteries of Eternal Life and Salvation. Sanctify our Wills and Affections, and according to thine own gracious promise, six thy Law in our inward Parts, and write it deeply in our Hearts, that we may know thee, from the least to the greatest. Heal up those Wounds which our Sins have made so wide, that none but thine own Hands can close them, and forgive our Iniquity, and remember our Sins no more.

3. O Lord, thou didst by thy holy Word, so heal the fountains, that death and barrenness was no more therein; heal, we humbly beseech thee, the wretched Corruptions of our hearts; cleanse and sanctify all the thoughts thereof, by the sweet and blessed influence of thy Holy Spirit, and so guide, govern, and direct us in the way which thou wilt have us to walk in, as that we may in all our Thoughts, Words and Actions, be acceptable to thee: Mortify and subdue, all our evil Desires and Thoughts, and bring them all into Subjection to thy Holy Will and Pleasure, that we may constantly resist all Temptations to Sin and Wickedness.

4. KEEP us, and Counsel us, in all our Affairs Spiritual and Temporal, that we may be filled with the holy Fruits of the Spirit of Sanctification, appearing in new and hallowed Thoughts, Words, and Actions, to thy glory, and our farther assurance before thee; so that in our Bodies and in our Spirits, we may be kept blameless in this sinful and miserable World, unto the appearing of our Lord Jesus Christ; To whom with thee, O Father of Mercy, and the Holy Spirit, the Comforter of the Elect, be rendered all Honor and Glory, in Heaven and in Earth, from this time forth, and to all Eternity.

Amen.

CHAP. XXIII. Of External Actions.

THE External Actions of Men are the product and fruit of their Thoughts; and as we owe Sanctimony to God, and our own Consciences within, so do we good Examples to our Neighbors in things External. And our blessed Savior in his Sermon on the Mount, excites us with this Doctrine, Mat. 5.16. Let your Light so shine before Men, that they may see your good Works, and glorify your Father which is in Heaven.

2. GOOD Actions proceed from a sound Credence, without which they cannot be good, nor pleasing in the Sight of Heaven, For whatsoever is not of Faith is Sin, Rom. 14.23. For Faith apprehending Christ to our Justification, renders our Works acceptable to him, if they extend to Fruits of Regeneration; and uniting us to Christ, dedicateth us to a Capacity of his Sanctifying Spirit, and enableth us in some measure to vanquish Sin, and perform that which is holy in his sight. Now the Apostle mentions, St. James 2.18. Shew me thy Faith without thy Works, and I will show thee my Faith by thy Works. And St. Paul says, Rom. 3.28. A Man is justified by Faith only, without the Deeds of the law.

3. THOUGH our best Performances cannot justify us before the Almighty, because imperfect, yet are they never separated from true Faith; and they are the Path-way to the heavenly Jerusalem, though they cannot finish our happy Arrival. Therefore to the Young-Man's Query, who desired to be justified by Works; our Savior replies, Mat. 19.16. Keep the Commandments: Thus he was convinced, who had not yet learned the Righteousness of Faith, which saith, Believe and thou shalt be Saved; thereby implying, that yet he was wanting in some things, who was excellent in others, and therefore must seek Salvation by Faith, and the way to Heaven by Sanctity. This is a Condition, not an Obligation of our Salvation; for as we can never acquire Salvation by it, so we can never expect any without it, because our very best Endeavors and Performances we owe to God's Honor and Glory.

4. IT is not sufficient to have a good Intention, either to speak, or to do good; for Satan is well-pleased, that Men should draw near unto God with their Lips, if their Hearts be far from him; or that they speak well, if they will perform Evil. Words at best are but Feminine Virtues, but Works are M•sculine; Of these the Spiritual Pharaoh giveth charge to smother them. But we desire to convert our Words into Actions, and not only to speak, but to Effect holy Performances.

5. ACTIONS Humane, Natural, or Civil, are no otherwise here concerned, than as they are in order to the Moral, and so regulated by the Law, and holy Word of God, in the affirmative or negative Precepts, which is the only Rule of all our Moral Actions towards God or Man. Neither Examples, Prescriptions, Universality of Consent, nor Commands of Men, must be prevalent with us, against the express Word of God: For these claim Privilege only in those things which God's Law alloweth, and refereth to our Authority.

CHAP. XXIV. Rules in External Actions.

FIRST, Neither Propose, nor Act anything Evil or Unjust, for any Worldly profit, Honors, or Pleasures: For it is an apparent detriment to acquire the World with the loss of thy Soul, Mat. 16.26. What can Secular Honors advantage thee, when thou art condemned by the Almighty? Should all the World extol thee, and thou be Canonized a Saint in the opinion of the multitude, or thy Actions be highly applauded, equivalent to Herod's Speech, and be rendered Supernatural: God's Angel may smite thee, and the Worms destroy thee. What are Pleasures? In their Birth they look towards a Precipitate End; and the Vicissitude of this Scene serveth only to aggravate the misery: Like that ungrateful sound, which reached the Ears of Dives in Hell, Son remember that thou in thy life time, receivedst thy good things, Luke 16.25. Present remembrances of past pleasures, embitter the Torment.

2. LET God's Law be thy Rule and Counselor, and weigh all thy Actions by his Standard, before thou Execute any Purpose. David could not enterprize before he had consulted God's Oracles: Nor the very Heathens, before they sent for the double Effataes of their Priests. When the Word of God is our Rule, we abhor setting up strange God's in our Hearts, like those who adore their own Inventions, in Will-worship and voluntary Religion; wherein all, even the most zealous and painful Actions, as Pilgrimages, superstitious Fasts, foolish Penance and idolatrous Oblations, or costly Dedications, shall be rejected, with a Who required this at your Hands? Isa. 1.12. And the Prophet tells you, Micah 6.7, 8. The Lord will not be pleased with thousands of Rams, or with ten thousand Rivers of Oil: And, He hath shown O Man, what is good: And what doth the Lord require of thee but to do justly, and to love Mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?

3. IN Religious Acts, God left not Israel to their own disposing in minor things, but commanded Moses, See thou make all things according to the Pattern shown thee in the Mount, Heb. 8.5. Also when God's Word is our Rule, we will neither lay Snares upon our own Consciences, placing Religion in those things which God hath left Indifferent, (as they who prohibited certain Meats or Marriage, 1 Tim. 4.3.) Nor will we dispense with that Word in any one point which any human Authority pretends, or imposes to the Contrary.

4. IN all thy acts and designs, before thou execute them, duly and seriously consider the Event, which is like a Ship's Rudder, though it comes last, it directs first and last. Endeavour to gain a fore-sight, and consider the Sequel. O that they were Wise, saith the Lord; That they understood this; That they would consider their latter End, Deut. 32.29. By which means thou wilt in all sinful Actions, with the Holy Apostle, be ever ready to conclude, That the end of those things is Death, Rom. 6.21.

5. IN all thy actions fix thyself in the presence of God, by following David's Example, Psalm 16.8. Ever remember thou art in his Sight, and that neither thy Thoughts nor Actions can be excluded from him; for neither Solitude nor Darkness can veil thee from his All-seeing Eye, Psalm 139.11, 12. In all thy Undertakings accustom thyself to the rule of Charity, for that is the fulfilling of the Law, Rom. 13.10. and the Fruit of God's Spirit, Gal. 5.22. And there can be no performances acceptable to God, if we omit this Duty and Command of the Apostle, Let all things be done in Charity, 1 Cor. 16.14.

6. IN all Religious Duties, act not the Impostor, for the Hypocrite doth but personate, act and counterfeit the Saint; he seems good, but is doubly Impious, as the Orator said of the Servilii, which were very like, but not the same; so resembling, that they were not distinguished abroad amongst Strangers, but were known at home by their own Acquaintance. But when the Hypocrite hath deceived all the World, he can never defraud his own Conscience. Therefore let this advice be thy faithful Monitor, to be just and sincere in thy Deportment, before God and Man: Let Christ's Rule be thy constant Pattern, Whatsoever ye would that Men should do to you, do ye even so to them: For this is the Law and the Prophets, Matt. 7.12.

7. TRANSACT nothing which must cost thee a bitter Repentance. When the Philosopher had a great price set him upon Folly, replied, I will not buy Repentance so dear. Never act anything against thy Conscience, for fear or favor of Men; but rather esteem a good Conscience before all Treasure on this side Heaven: In some things we Sin all, But happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth, Rom. 14.22. Lastly, In all thy undertakings beseech and humbly implore the Almighty to Direct, Counsel and Bless thee; and according to the Apostle's Direction, In everything by Prayer and Supplication, let your requests be made known unto God, Phil. 4.6. For he is unworthy to receive a Blessing, who omits the duty of Asking.

A Prayer for Directions in all our Actions.

MOST Merciful Father, who hast promised, that if the Wicked turns from his Sins that he hath committed, and doth that which is lawful and right, he shall live, and his Transgressions shall not be remembered. In humble acknowledgment of our manifold sins, the equity of thy Judgments to give us over to our own unhappy Ways, who have so long refused to be guided by thy holy Word, and our own helpless Impotency, to stay ourselves, turn unto thee, or fix ourselves in any good way to Serve and Please thee.

2. WE humbly beseech thee O Father, for the sake of thy dear Son, to pardon all our Offences, and to vouchsafe to lead us in thy Paths, and the way thou appointest us to walk in: We have long gone astray like lost Sheep; and thou best knowest, O, our God, how dangerous Satan's Snares are to us, how many the Distractions of a deceitful vain World; how frail and infirm sinful Flesh and Blood; and how many our Errors: But, O Lord, thy Wisdom cannot Err, which is immutable; therefore renouncing our own Conduct, we render ourselves into thy Gracious Hands, humbly beseeching thee, who freely givest Wisdom to all that ask, and upbraidest no Man; hold thou up our goings in thy Paths, that our Footsteps slide not; direct all our ways, that we neither incline to the right nor to the left hand to offend thee; but give us the Shield of our Salvation, and let thy Right hand uphold us.

3. O thou that hearest the Prayers of them that call upon thee, hear us, for our Souls wait on thee; direct and guide us; keep us and counsel us in all our Actions, that we neither design nor perform anything but that which is pleasing to thee, and which thou wilt bless unto us; that we may walk unblamably and prudently towards all Men, and in Sanctity before thee: And grant that in all our actions we may Glorify thee, and adorn the Gospel of Christ by our holy Conversations, give good Examples to our Neighbors, and stop the Mouths of all malicious Adversaries; so that when these days of Sin are ended, that we rest from our Labors, we may enter into that promised Rest which remaineth for thy People, where shall be no more Sin, Error, nor Curse. Hear us, O Lord, in these and all other things necessary for our Bodies or Souls, for Jesus Christ his sake.

Amen.

CHAP. XXV. Of a Wounded Spirit, what it is.

SOLOMON tells you, Prov. 18.14. The Spirit of a Man will sustain his Infirmities, but a wounded Spirit who can bear? The word signifies a smitten, contrite, or broken Spirit. It is a kind of Speech borrowed from corporal Affliction, by Stripes, Contusions, Bruises, or Wounds, wherein by Incision and Launcing the Sinews and Veins, the Body is debilitated and endangered to Death, and Disabled so, that it is void of Supportation; it is liable to Inflammations and Distempers, that every slight touch prejudices it: It depriveth a Man of Rest, so that he is impatient of this present Posture, and more perplexed at a Mutation. To express it further, it is the intense sorrow of the Soul, a weak Confidence, and an enfeebled life of the Spirit; so that God may well nominate it, A wounded Spirit.

2. THIS Affliction is of that Magnitude, that it exceeds all other Temporal Sorrows: And none can truly give their Verdict of it, but they who can join and say with David, The sorrows of Death compassed me, and the pains of Hell gat hold upon me, Psal. 116.3. Other Sorrows may be Mitigated, by administering to the Afflicted something equivalent to the loss sustained; as where one Treasure is lost, another may be found; or by some compensation or repair, may be Retaliated; as Job had a second Posterity and increase of Wealth: And Elkanah declared such a Medium of Consolation to Afflicted Hannah, when he said to her, Am I not better to thee than ten Sons, Sam. 1 1.8.

3. BUT these Comforts are no ways conducive to an afflicted Spirit; for furnish him with Riches, the company of the dearest Friends, or that which might afford Relief, Refreshment and Delight to others, yet to him it procures no Ease, no more than if you put on a rich Purple Robe upon broken Bones: No, no, the Grief is internal, and no external means can Cure it. In other Crosses, time will assuage, by Prudence and persuasive Arguments, excellent lenitives of Sorrow: In some cases to divert, Wine, merry Society, Music, or the like means, may bear some part, which the Wise Man accords to, Give strong Drink to him that is ready to perish, and Wine to those that be of heavy Heart▪ Let him drink and forget his Poverty, and remember his Misery no more, Prov. 31.6, 7.

4. DAVID'S Harp did for the time refresh Saul, and Charm the Evil Spirit: But this grief admits of no Efficacy in such Comforts. In other Pressures we may receive Ease, or be conducted from the Evil, as St. Paul was from the Jews Conspiracy, Acts 23.31. and David from Saul, 1 Sam. 19.12. But there is no flying from a wounded Spirit: Where ever we go our Affliction attends us, even our secret Tormentor in our own Bosoms In short, as it is in one sense a Separation from God, so no Creature in Heaven or Earth can Cure it: There is no Sanctuary for a troubled Soul, but only God's favorable Presence: No other Expedient can be used, till he return and Comfort it.

5. SO Horrid in the mean time is this Affliction, that the desperate Traitor Judas took Death for his Sanctuary, as an Antidote against his guilty Conscience • but with what ponderosity it sits upon the Hearts of God's Servants, may appear by the Complaints of Job and others; Wherefore is light given to him that is in Misery, and Life unto the bitter in Soul, which long for Death, but it cometh not, and, dig for it more than for hid Treasures; which rejoice exceedingly, and are glad when they can find the Grave, Job 3.20, 21, 22. This was Job's Complaint. And the Prophet complained of his Birth, Jer. 20.14, 15, 16, 17, 18. And the Prophet Elijah being threatened by Jezebel at Beer-sheba, poured out himself, It is enough now, O Lord, take away my Life, for I am not better than my Fathers, 1 Kings, 19.4. And Jonah at the loss of his Gourd, expressed himself, saying, It is better for me to die than live, Jonah 4.8.

CHAP. XXVI. What the Conscience is, and the Tranquility of it.

THE Conscience is the Cognition of the Heart, and is a divine internal Light, which we cannot Extinguish; a Supreme Court of Judicature within us, and above us; and a silent Register of our Thoughts and Words: It is a thousand Witnesses, as the Apostle says, Accusing, or Excusing, Rom. 2.15. Such is the Impartiality of this Judge, that no Bribery can tempt him to Justify the Wicked, nor Condemn the Just; but he is the first Revenger of Impiety, and an excluder of the Guilty from Absolution.

2. IN true Tranquility of Conscience, the Heart is cheerful in every Estate and Condition, Rom. 5.1, 3. and dreadeth no Judge nor Witness: It is a continual Feast; the Soul's Paradise; the Mind's fair Haven; an invaluable Possession, which renders every owner Happy: It is an immovable Comfort, the first Fruits of Heaven, and Riches which shall never be taken away. As no Wind can move or shake the Sun-beams, so neither Life nor Death, Prosperity or Adversity can Transfix this. While this is secure, though Men receive many sharp Encounters, as the Citizens of Ai did, Josh. 7. Yet are they confident to resist; they can resolve with that pattern of Patience, Job 13.15. Tho he Kill me, yet will I trust in him: But if that fail, and the Smoak ascendeth, their Hearts are under a great Consternation, Josh. 8.20.

3. THE Almighty Woundeth and Healeth, Deut. 32.39. Job 5.18. But it is with his Justice and Mercy. The Wise Man says, Prov. 6.32, 33. We wound our selve by Sin: and God healeth us by Afflictions, as Surgeons do with the Lancet and Cautery. Sins are the Thieves which rob us, and leave us wounded us by the way, till the good Samaritan appears with his Wine and Oil, to cleanse, supple and bind up our Wounds: He scourgeth the Conscience with a sense of his Anger, to make us sensible of our Sins, and to bring us to an abhorrence of them. And thus he sometimes Disciplines us with external Afflictions.

4. GOD sometimes wounds the Heart and terrifies the Conscience, by the Word Preached; and then we are Pricked at the Heart, and with St. Peter's Auditors cry out, Men and Brethren, what shall we do? Acts 2.37. Sometimes he smites the Conscience with an inward sense and apprehension of his fierce Wrath, and severe imminent Judgments; in which, as the Psalmist complains of, Psalm 55.4, 5. An Horrible fear overtaketh them (like the Earthquake at Horeb, preceeding the Still small voice of Mercy, 1 Kings 19.11, 12.) In sense of a Spiritual Desertion, while he hideth away his Face; Spiritual Wants, or permission to some grievous Temptation, cold Fits of Despair and Buffetings by the Messengers of Satan, in all which though there be means of Comfort appointed, yet none can prevail, till the Spirit of God the Comforter, return and Heal.

5. THE same Hand giveth the Wound, and prescribeth the Plaister; as it was said, Hos. 5.13. The Assyrians and Jareb could not heal Judah and Ephraim of their Wound; so no Mortal Creature can administer Comfort whereby to heal a wounded Spirit, till he who correcteth in Measure approaches and bindeth it up, Jer. 30.11. &c. He, only he, says the Psalmist, Psalm 147.3. He healeth the broken in Heart, and bindeth up their Wounds: Even he who was Wounded for our Sins, and bruised for our Iniquities, and by whose Stripes we are Healed, Isa. 53.5.

CHAP. XXVII. What things principally wound the Conscience.

THERE are some things which Principally afflict and wound the Conscience, and comes up, as the Prophet mentions, 1 Sam. 13.17. like those Philistim Spoilers, in three Companies, to destroy and drive Men into Despair: And the first Apparition and Assault, is the apprehension of God's Wrath, for some Hainous Sin committed: An Instance we have in Cain, having Murdered his Brother, cried out, My Sin, or Punishment is greater than I can bear, Gen. 4.13. And Judas having betrayed his Lord and Master, durst not approach to him to beg Mercy, by reason he apprehended an implacable Anger in Christ.

2. IT is certain, according to the Apostles saying, That the Wrath of God cometh on the Children of Disobedience, Col. 3.6. And that his Wrath is revealed from Heaven against all Ungodliness and Unrighteousness of Men, Rom. 1.18. And that the Impenitent by their hardness of Heart, treasure up to themselves Wrath against the day of Wrath; That the•e shall be Indignation and Wrath to them that obey not the Truth, Rom. 2.5, 8. But when thou, who art of a wounded Spirit, and broken Heart, hast well considered, perhaps thou wilt find that these things are of no Concernment to thee, but to those who live in Sin.

3. THE second Obstacle in wounding the Conscience, is sense of Spiritual Wants, as Hope, Faith, assurance of Salvation, the Spirit of Sanctification and Prayer. These being the Graces of the Almighty, and the Presence of his Holy Spirit in the Regenerate, may yet for the time be an hidden Treasure, an Immortal Seed under the frozen Clods, without any appearance of Life. And the truly Devout may weep and complain, like the Penitent Magdalene in the Garden, for the loss of Christ, when at the same season he is discoursing with them; but they are ignorant of his Presence, John 20.14.

4. THE third Obstacle, is fear of some strong Temptations and Trials, at which the afflicted and affrighted Conscience is Amazed, as the Disciples were when Jesus slept in the Storm, and the Ship was Overmastered with Waves, and ready to Travel to the bottom of the Sea, upon Death's Errand, Matt. 8.24, 25. Or like St. Peter on the Water, when he beheld the rough Billows come Plowing before him, crieth out, Save Master, we Perish, Matt. 14.30. When it evidently appears, they cannot Perish who are with Christ; nor they cannot be Safe who are without him.

CHAP. XXVIII. Divine Considerations of the Afflicted.

AS God is Just, so he is Merciful; he is no enexorable Radamanth, but he is easy to be entreated: Concerning whom we have a Word more sure, than any Testimony of Man; for the Almighty, in Exod. 34.6. being his own Herald, thus proclaims himself, The Lord merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abundant in Goodness and Truth, keeping Mercy for Thousands, forgiving Iniquity, and Transgression, and Sin. Now if that which others report of the Kings of Israel, 1 Kings 20.31. That they were merciful Kings, Could persuade them to seek Mercy, and to enjoy their Lives and Liberties; how much more should that, which God, who cannot lie, hath declared himself, Tit. 1.2. move the afflicted Soul humbly to Petition him for Mercy; who is more ready to grant it, than we are, or can be to entreat it; for ask it we never could, except his preventing Grace and holy Spirit invisibly moved us.

2. GOD delights not in the Death of Sinners, but in their Conversion, Ezek. 18. And as it is a true Prognostick of a Guests being welcome by the good Aspects and Deportment of the Family; So it is an evident signal that a Penitent Sinner is welcome to Heaven, by the Angels loud Exultations. If God in his good Pleasure would have destroyed thee; how often and justly might he have taken thee away in thy Sins? But now that his Eye hath spared thee, his Goodness is to lead thee to Repentance, which never comes too late, if seriously performed. He terrifieth with present Sense of his Anger against Sin, that Men may be excited to Repentance, and by forsaking their Sin, be more assured of the Mercy of God, and their own Salvation. As stormy Winds by shaking the Trees, do fix and root them deeper, and seasonable Weather purifies the Air and Water by their Agitation; so doth the Almighty mundifie the Minds and Hearts of his Servants, by Menaces, Judgments, and Afflictions, 1 Cor. 7.11. Psal. 119.

3. IT is God's Mercy to afflict thee now, that thou mayst Repent and be Saved. It is the most unhappy Condition of a Sinner, when God concealeth his Anger to the last, and then denounceth the Impenitent as incorrigible, Isai. 1.5. So that if no Remorsness of Conscience appears, thy Case is desperate. But this Soul's Conflict, concludes another Co-ercive Power in thee, resisting Sin, whereby thou mayst be capable of a state of Regeneration; for though the Spirit of God at the present in its Motions are but weak in thee, yet it is invincible.

4. St. Paul tells you, Rom. 3.23, 24. All have sinned, and come short of the Glory of God; being justified freely by his Grace, through the Redemption that is in Jesus Christ. Which plainly demonstrates, that 'tis not a Man's own Righteousness that can contribute to his Salvation; and David, in Psal. 32.1, 2. says, Blessed is the Man whose Sins are covered, and to whom the Lord imputeth no Sin. Not who hath no Sin; for on those Terms none could be blessed. It is not in the quantity of the Debt, as in St. Luke 7.42, 43. where fifty and five hundred are equally forgiven: And where an Infinite Majesty is offended in the least, never any of God's Servants were Saved, for being less guilty than thou art. Thou fearest God's Wrath, because thy Sins are great, and appear so to thy Conscience. They which are Saints had some, and he that breaketh one Commandment is guilty of the breach of all, and liable to the Curse of the Law, James 2.10, 11. A diminutive wound to the Heart will as surely Kill, as the deepest and widest Orifice. A small Shelf of Sands will as surely bulge the Ship, as the greatest Rocks. A little Postern-gate, or breach in a City Wall unguarded, will let in the Enemy: So the smallest Sins, if not covered by Faith, and cured by Repentance, will destroy the Soul.

5. WHEN we consider Noah's Drunkenness, David's Murder and Adultery, Solomon's Idolatry, Manasseh's Murder, Witchcraft, and Idolatry; St. Paul's Persecution, and St. Peter's denial of Christ; it is apparent, that these committed sinful Acts of a deeper die than thou canst charge thy Conscience withal; and that if God's Justice should be executed according to the rigor of his Law, No flesh living could be justified, Psal. 143.2. Rom. 3.20. Therefore is Christ the End of the Law, to everyone that believeth, Rom. 10.4. An Instance of which we have in the Patriarch Abraham, the Prophet David, the Apostles St. Peter and St. Paul, and all those that are Saved; when we rely on him and his Merits, by God's own Covenant of Grace, and the Rigor and Curse of the Law is suspended. God therefore gave us his Son, with this Proviso, That whosoever believeth in him should not perish, but have everlasting Life, John 3.16. And the Apostle intimates, Rom. 5.1. Being justified by Faith, we have Peace with God. And Rom. 8.1. There is no Condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. And if God Justifies, who shall Condemn?

6. NO Sin is of that extent, or Equivalent to the Mercy of God, and the Merits of Christ. All Actions of the Creature are finite; but the Mercy of the Creator, and the Merits of a Savior are infinite. A drop of Water holds some Proportion with the Sea, being both finite; but finites with infinites holds none: Fear not then, nor let Pusillanimity over-rule thee if thou canst Repent and Believe, for there is Balm in Gilead, there is a Physician there; Therefore let not Despair seize upon thee.

CHAP. XXIX. Considerations of Humility.

HUMILITY is Religion's Basis; and God giveth Grace to the Humble, but resisteth the Proud. When the subtle Tempter cannot prevail in his Perswasions to evil, he insinuateth himself into the Minds of them who have performed some Pious Acts of Christianity, by his mischievous Suggestions, elevating them to a secret Admiration of the same, whereby they may be deprived of that Grace which enabled them to that Performance. The Poor Publican in his Humility not daring to lift up an Eye toward that heavenly Majesty, he had so grievously offended, having nothing to say, but only, God be merciful to me a Sinner, went home justified rather than the Proud Pharisee, who boasted of much Sanctity.

2. HUMILITY is the securest Virtue; but Pride the Worm at the Root of Religion, eateth up the Vitality of it. Now by reason it is difficult for Dust and Ashes to enjoy any extraordinary Temporal Blessings, without being puffed up in Mind, above his Opinion of others in a lower Sphere; God justly permits many of his Servants to depend on their own Strength, (like a tender Nurse, who withdraws her Hand a little from her Charge, to make it sensible of its own Weakness, and to check it from a dangerous Presumption) so that by falling under some great Temptation, they may be disciplined in Humility safely to distrust their own Strength, and fix their Dependence on God. For St. Peter was in a better posture Weeping, than when he presumed to lay down his Life for his Master; then he fell by abjuring his Lord; but now he rose again by his bitter, but sincere Repentance. Now if the serious Considerations of thy Sins do truly humble thee, thou hast acquired a speedy way to thy Repentance.

3. THE Almighty often in his great Council orders the greatest Enormities of some of his People to stand upon Record; that we may draw from thence this Conclusion, That if we can Repent sincerely of Sins, of as deep a Die as they are, we also shall find Mercy; but by the way, with this deep Consideration, that we never entertain any of them in our Thoughts, to be guilty of Presumption, but as Motives to Repentance, whereby we may lay hold with Faith on him, who freely forgiveth the Penitent, not the obstinate Presumptuous Sinner; and nothing more offends the Divine Providence, than a despairing of his Mercy, (which is a secret questioning the Veracity of his Promises) and Impenitency, which is the undoubted Issue of Incredulity. Indeed there is no greater Injustice to God's Mercy, than by Despair to persevere in Sin, seeing his Truth is engaged for our Pardon, if we believe and Repent, for he has not declared in vain, Isai. 1.18. Though your Sins be as Scarlet, they shall be white as Snow; though they be red like Crimson, they shall be as Wool.

CHAP. XXX. Divine Considerations of our Repentance, forgiving Enemies, and the Love of God.

CONSIDER why Christ came into the World: The beloved Disciple informs you, John 3.16. Because he so loved it. God sent him to save Sinners; not only them who had broken some of his Commandments: But as St. Paul saith, He came into the World to save Sinners, of whom I am chief, 1 Tim. 1.15. He came to call, (as himself professeth) Not the Righteous, but Sinners to Repentance, Mat. 9.13. Mark 2.17. He called the heavy laden not fallaciously, but indeed to ease and disburthen them of their Sins, Mat. 11.28. He saved the Publicans and notorious Sinners, and to manifest the same in contempt of Pharisical Calumnies, conversed with them.

2. CONSIDER, that God who commanded us to forgive, not only seventy times, but oftener, would not enjoin us that which himself could not, or would not perform. He is essentially, and so infinitely gracious, that his Mercy is more than thousands of Oceans, which can never be exhausted. Man hath but a slender Stock, a finite Mercy at the best, and such as may be diminished and vanquished by Injuries. He that enjoineth Man to forgive without Exception, could not in his Justice command and require Man to forgive more than himself in his abundant Mercy could or was willing to assent to. Add to this a Consideration of his tender

Love; He hath planted a Paternal Love and Care, not only in Parents for their Children, but (lest we should suppose it rather habitual than natural, taught by Precept or Example, rather implanted by the Almighty in their Natures) in the very brute Beasts of the Field, and Birds of the Air, for the Preservation of their Young; All this Love in the Creature is but momentary, but in God it is Essential, Infinite, and Unchangeable.

3. NOW consider, did God give Man (suppose David) so much Love and Mercy, as that upon the Mediation of the Tekoite, he could presently be reconciled to a Rebellious Absalom; hath he given thee Bowels of Compassion, and an ardent Zeal for thy Children's Good and Safety, to mourn for their Transgressions, and to be ready upon the least appearance, or signs of amendment, to enter into a Reconciliation with them, and canst thou conceive that God will not be much more ready to Pardon thee, if thou canst heartily Repent and Implore Forgiveness, through the Merits of a Crucified JESUS, the Son of his Love, and in whom he hath proclaimed from Heaven, He is well pleased, Matt. 3.17.

4. THE Custom among the Molossians was, whom Plutarch mentions, that the Petitioner should take up the King's Son in his Arms, and so kneeling before the Altar, nothing was denied for the Protection and Safety of the Suppliant. So Themistocles found favor with King Admetus. So likewise will our Heavenly King give Audience to our Petitions, if we present him in the Arms of Faith, his Beloved Son Christ Jesus with the Merits of his Death and Passion. A wounded Spirit, a broken and a contrite Heart, is an acceptable Sacrifice to God, and that which he will not despise, Psalm 51.19. Thou canst not reasonably think thy Case detestable, for that which God approveth and loveth in thee, and hath so mercifully Cherished in those he dearly loved. The Royal Psalmist, the Man after his own Heart, felt this which thou art afraid of, My Heart, saith he, is Wounded within me, Psalm 109.22.

5. CONSIDER seriously, that a calm Conscience is not always the best, nor a Tempestuous the worst: There is a Lethargy and Stupidity of an evil Conscience in a Carnal Security: This Calm is such a Storm, wherein the Soul, (like the Men of Laish) is quiet and secure, until some Spiritual Danites awake it, and the Sinner goeth on like Agag, thinking surely that the Bitterness of Death is past: As some Heart-sick Patient, in whom Nature's strength is so far decayed, that he is insensible of the undiscovered approaches of Death now imminent; even such is the calm Conscience of a secure Sinner.

6. NOW, if that Angel Guardian, the Conscience, which God and Nature has placed within the Breast of a Righteous Person, be sometimes at Variance and upon the seasonable point of Admonition for some Sin Unrepented; we may infer it to be like the Ship in which Jonah fled, followed with Storms, until he was cast forth, whereby his Happiness might be the greater: But the danger is desperate with those, when the Mind is Drowsie and will not be awakened from its Guilt and Impenitency; but are given up to the Spirit of Slumber; those I say, if at any time their Conscience within 'em whispers and severely Checks 'em, then are they ready to cry out as Ahab to Elijah, Hast thou found me, O mine Enemy? If we are not sensible of our Wounds, the sign is Mortal; therefore let us not ourselves remove from that wholesome Discipline, or fly that Surgeon, whose Lancet threatens none but the imposthumated Parts; but rather choose wisely that main skill of knowing, whether our Consciences thus lull'd up in treacherous sleep, or disturbed by that Voice within us; which of these two, I say prognosticates the most Danger.

CHAP. XXXI. The Examination of the Conscience, concerning our Repentance, &c.

TO this a serious Examination is requisite; wherein I shall lay down these Particulars: First, some Reasons why we must seriously examine our Consciences. Secondly, The main Lets incident thereto. Thirdly, Certain Rules by which we may thoroughly Examine. Fourthly, Interrogatories to be proposed to the afflicted Conscience. Fifthly, Some Conclusions necessary to be drawn from the Whole.

2. FIRST, We ought to Examine ourselves; for certainly God hath not so often Comanded it in vain, Lam. 3.40. Psal. 4.4. 1 Cor. 11.28. 2 Cor. 13.5. Secondly, Without this we cannot know our Sins, and so not Repent, nor have any solid Comfort in Impenitency. We are extreme apt to mistake ourselves; which if we do, we can have no sound Comfort in the Testimony of a good Conscience, which presupposeth Faith and Illumination. Thirdly, Without this, we cannot possibly know which way we are going, the Broad way to Destruction, or the Narrow to Salvation, which were very necessary to comfort us, if we go right, or to recall and rectify us, if wrong. Fourthly, Without this, we can never make a right use of God's Chastisements, nor obtain any comfortable way out of 'em: Neither can we distinguish his Operations of Mercy in us, when he Humbleth us here, that we may be Exalted hereafter.

3. NOW, the common Obstructions to this Duty, are first an Evil Conscience, which being wounded by a deep Guilt, cannot endure any Searching. Secondly, Native Hypocrisy, misrepresenting us to ourselves, by denominating us highly Pious, and looking upon it as an important Injury not to be counted so. Thirdly, distracting Cares of this Life, and Carnal Security, which say with those Jews, Hag. 1.2. The time is not come: These make Men refer their Repentance to the last Hour, even to the hazard of their Immortal Souls.

4. NOW, the Rules to be observed, are these: First, Earnestly endeavor to find out and abandon all thy known Sins. Secondly, Rest not in outward appearances, but entertain the illumination of God's Word into the secret and dark recesses of thy Heart: For, the Woman in the Gospel, first lighted, and then swept the Room, Luke 15.8. Thirdly, Judge thyself as impartially as thou wouldst do an Enemy. Skillful Painters place their Work at some distance from 'em, that they may be able to judge and amend their Errors. So must thou fix thy actions upon some other Person; like David, who could not behold his Sin in himself, till Nathan shown it him in another, 2 Sam. 12. I need not instance in Judah, Gen. 28. Or in Ahab, 1 Kings, 20.4.

5. BEGIN Early, and be constant in this Duty. If thy Thoughts, after some slender pursuit, return as those Men of Jericho, with a Non est Inventus, Josh. 2.22. Know that thou hast more need of greater diligence to repeat often thy Examination. Examine thyself by the whole Law of God: And enquire what thou hast done in opposition to Sin. Few wicked Men, but are content to observe some of God's Laws, if thou wilt grant them Naaman's Plea only, The Lord pardon thy Servant in this thing. And sometimes Herod, Ahab and Pharaoh, will have certain fits of seeming Devotion and Repentance. The Brazen Serpent will not Sting: And Men's Corruptions are most apparent when opportunity gives them Birth.

6. NOW, The Interrogatories to be propounded to thy Conscience, are these: First, doth Sin reign in thee, so that thou yieldest a willing obedience to it? Or doth it bear sway and tyrannize over thee? For between these there is an immense difference. True it is, all Men sin, but Sin reigneth only in the Unregenerate; Let not sin reign in your mortal Body, Rom. 6.12. And St. Paul further tells ye, that the Regenerate sin, Rom. 7.15.19. That which I do, I allow not; for what I would, that do I not, but what I hate, that do I: For the Good that I do, I would not: But the Evil which I would not, that I do. From this Inference, ask thy Conscience whether thou wouldst have committed this Evil which now wounds it? If not, it is no more thou, but Sin that dwelleth in thee.

7. DOST thou detest all Sin, because it is contrary to God's Holy Will? And rather more for the love of God, than for fear of his Judgments? Dost thou not only grieve for every Sin which thou hast committed, but also for the Ravinity and Corruption of thy Will, and the infirmities of Flesh and Blood, disabling thee to the purer service of God? If thou art in this State, thou art not disesteemed in the Eye of the Almighty: Neither will God ever Condemn thee, for that, which he hath given thee a competency of Grace to abhor and condemn in thyself: For if we would judge ourselves, we should not be judged, 1 Cor. 11.31. The Unregenerate Person Idolizes Sin, but is afraid of the Punishment; but the Regenerate abhors it, therefore God will not judge him for it, but will rather say what he said to the Woman taken in Adultery, Neither do I Condemn thee, go and Sin no more, John 8.11.

8. WOULDST thou embrace Sanctity, and is it thy Heart's desire to serve God in sincerity? So that thou canst say with the Church, Isa. 26.8. The desire of our Soul is to thy Name, and to the remembrance of thee. If thou dost hunger and thirst after Righteousness, be assured thou shalt be satisfied, Matt. 5. Dost thou in the inward Man consent to the Law of God? 'Tis Infallibly certain, if thou dost pursue after Holiness, without which, none can see God, thou art esteemed of the Almighty. For our best Perfection at present is this, not that we are thoroughly Pious, but that we chase after it.

9. HAST thou with the Kingly Prophet, Psalms 119.6. a respect to all God's Commandments, so that thou dost not in thy Heart dispense with any of them, for Pleasures, Profits, or any secular Advantage, but wouldst earnestly enjoy that Privilege of keeping them all? If so, let not slip the Anchor of thy Hope, but receive Comfort: For hour Satan's Delusions may allure thee, and thy own Corruptions may betray thee, yet thy minor serving of thy Creator without Exemption or dispensation to any Sin, concludeth thee in a State of Regeneration, the Denomination following the better Part, as appears in St. Paul's Expression of himself in the same case, Rom. 7.25. With the Mind I myself serve the Law of God; but with the Flesh, the Law of Sin. That is, groaning under the Tyranny, but not dispensing with its Reign.

10. DOST thou resolve to oblige thyself to avoid Sin? Then God will accept thee, 2 Cor. 8.12. David said, I will keep thy Statutes, and I have sworn, and I will perform it, that I will keep thy Righteous Judgments, Psal. 119, 8.106. It is evident he made a breach of his Performance, though his Intentions were quite contrary, 2 Sam. 12.9. Dost thou conscientiously and diligently use the means to take cognizance of thy Sins; as by applying the word of God home to thy Conscience? for by the Law comes the knowledge of Sin. Rom. 7.7. Dost thou carefully shun all occasions and incentives moving thee and enticing thee to Sin and Wickedness? It is a vanity in him to detest Drunkenness, who will not restrain his boon Companions: It is impossible for him to hate Adultery, who fixeth his Eye upon the Lascivious, and is entangled in the snare of the Adulterer: Such are apt then to forget what was mentioned in our Savior's Sermon on the Mount, Matt. 5.28. Whosoever looketh on a Woman to Lust after her, hath committed Adultery with her already in his Heart. And Solomon's Advice is very proper, Come not near the Door of her House, Prov. 5.8. For Opportunity and Occasion is Lust's Pander.

11. ASK thy Conscience whether it can presume to sin wittingly and willingly? And whether it can be sedate in any known and unrepented Sin? If it be disturbed, dissipate thy Fear; for this very disturbance of Conscience, which so much appalls thee, is a principal Mark of a good Conscience. It is true, as the Woman sang of Saul and David, 1 Sam. 18.7. Saul hath slain his Thousands, and David his ten Thousands: So, Despair hath cast away some, but Presumption, Multitudes. Hath not thy Conscience at some time, in a particular Measure, been refreshed by a Divine assurance of thy Interest in a Savior, a resolution to forsake all thy Sins, Peace with God, and Salvation by the Merits of Christ? We commit a gross Mistake, if we always judge of our State by present Sense: For there are certain hours of Tentation, wherein the light of Grace is obscurely Eclipsed to our Sense, and the stupid or afflicted Conscience feeleth no present Illumination of God's Spirit, which yet in due time shall return, and compensate our Trials, with greater advantage of Assurance.

12. NOW the Conclusions necessary to be considered are these: First, The Almighty's Judgments are ever just, yea, when Flesh and Blood says with Nichodemus, How can these things be? John 3.9. When the too Curious Inquests after them are to be Stayed with a, Nay but, O Man, Who art thou that Repliest against God, Rom. 9.20. And so also his Mercies are as the unsounded Deeps, beyond all apprehension of carnal Reason; often Medicable by Wounding and Afflicting the Guilty Conscience; Comforting by terrifying, introducing to Glory and Immortality through Corruption; killing Sin in the Flesh by Death, the Fruit of Sin, and guiding to Heaven, (as I may say) by the Gates of Hell, and fear of Damnation.

13. THE most Notorious Sins committed in Ignorance and Incredulity, after Repentance, are no Arguments to Despair: For the Apostle tells you, 1 Cor. 6.9, 10, 11. Neither Fornicators, nor Idolaters, nor Adulterers, nor Effeminate, nor Abusers of themselves with Mankind, nor Thieves, nor Covetous, nor Drunkards, nor Revilers, nor Extortioners shall Inherit the Kingdom of God; and such were some of you: But ye are Washed, but ye are Sanctified, but ye are Justified in the Name of the Lord Jesus, and by the Spirit of our God. And the same Apostle, was a Blasphemer, and a Persecuter, and Injurious; but obtained Mercy, forasmuch as he did it ignorantly, and in unbelief, 1 Tim. 1.13. In his Conversion these Sins fell off, as the Viper of Melita from his hand, without any danger to his Life, Acts 28.5. So God pronounceth of the Convert by the Mouth of his Prophet, Ezek. 18.22. All his Transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him.

14. SINS of the Regenerate, though violent Perturbations of Mind, or Tentations ensnaering them, are not to be reckoned among Symptoms of Reprobation, or Apostasy: Such was Peter's denial, and David's Adultery, and Murder: Therefore the Apostle's, Counsel is very charitable, Gal. 6.1. If any Man be overtaken in any fault, ye that are Spiritual restore such a one with the Spirit of Meekness, considering thyself, lest thou also be tempted. And Christ hath taught us, without distinction of great and little Sins, to say daily, forgive us our trespasses: This Life is a Spiritual Combat, a Truceless War against the Powers of Darkness, wherein the Strongest may be, and often are carried away Captive, and yet be healed and recovered, Eph. 6.12. Their Captivity concludeth not their not being true Israelites, who would fain return.

15. EVERY Sin against Knowledge doth not presently infer a Reprobate Mind: The most Exquisite and Dexterous are sometimes taken in Satan's snares; St. Peter, though forewarned, denied Christ through sudden apprehension of fear: Not out of Malice, but infirmity: We, nay the best of Men, are but partly Flesh and partly Spirit, so that we can neither perform the good we are inclined to, nor avoid the evil which we behold and detest. St. Paul, and all that are Regenerate, doth allow the Law of God, yet sometimes feel another lawless Law, carrying them away Captive to Sin, Rom. 7.23.

16. THOUGH every Sin against Conscience is very dangerous, and every perseverance therein, the very Suburbs of Hell; yet every such Enormity excludeth not Repentance and Remission: Because sin not only allureth, but sometimes exerciseth the rage of a Tyrant, and Captivates us against our Wills. There may also be a Lethargy or Epilepsie of the Soul: There is such mischievous subtlety in Satan, that his Snares, though visible, are not always avoided; whose Messengers, though felt with grief of Soul, are not always overcome; yet he that gave Waters to the Horeb Rock, Exod. 17. 6, 7. can smite our harder Hearts, and make the Waters of Life flow Plentifully, to Repentance, never to be repented of.

17. THOUGH every Relapse into Sin is very dangerous, yet if a man be not entangled and vanquished, those breaches may be repaired by Repentance, 2 Pet. 2.20. And Solomon tells you, The Just man falleth seven times a day, Prov. 24.16. Satan doth not always present New Scenes, but sometimes dresses up his Old Artifices, therewith to beguile: Though our Infirmities are numerous, God's Power is made manifest, by sustaining us, that though we fall, we shall not fall away. Though Satan's power, subtlety, and restless malice, are very potent, yet he and his Messengers are limited by their Chain, and can receive no Commission, if it be but to enter into a Herd of Swine, but from the Almighty, Mat. 8.31. And the Apostle tells us, 1 Cor. 10.13. That God will not suffer us to be tempted, above what we are able: So that we may resolve, that neither Life, nor Death, nor any Creature shall be able to separate us from the love of God in Christ Jesus, Rom. 8.39.

CHAP. XXXII. Rules of Practice.

FIRST, use thy utmost endeavor to possess the Testimony of a good Conscience, which thou canst by no means attain, but by being vigilant over thy Soul, and with a fixed Constancy resisting Temptations. Every Sin, yea, even the least, woundeth the Soul afresh: Be not secure of minor Sins, but let a good Conscience be most precious unto thee; part not from it for any Pleasures, Honors, or Riches of this World; but rather part from Life itself. Enjoy a tender Conscience: A seared one, like Callous Flesh, is insensible of that which toucheth it; to this, Custom creates a proneness to sin, and takes away the sense of it, 1 Tim. 4.3. Tit. 15.

2. APPROVE thyself in every Action to God, fixing thyself ever in his presence, who beholdeth a far off all thou thinkest or actest, 1 Pet. 3.12. And value not whoever is disgusted, if God approveth thee Walk not according to the Wisdom of the Flesh, but by the Rule of God's Grace, which shall at last be thy rejoicing, 2 Cor. 1.12. Resign not thyself to Sins Dominion; which is impossible, except thou wholly deliverst up thyself, by consenting to thine own Captivity; as the Ear-bored Servants, who professed love to their Masters; and so would not be Manumitted and freed from them, Exod. 21.5, 6. Detest Sin and it shall not prejudice thee: No sin is so pernicious as that which is most facetious; but espically beware of presumptuous sins, lest they get the Dominion over thee, Psal. 19.13. Numb. 15.30, 31. Deut. 17.12.

3. CONTEMPLATE on God's Justice and Mercy together; let them be inseparable in thy Thoughts. For if thou inspectest into his Justice only, thou art liable to Despair upon the sight of thy sins: And if thou viewest his Mercy only, thou wilt with facility presume, when thou beholdest that transcendent Immensity, which is ever ready upon unfeigned Repentance to pardon Sinners: The Sailors of Old, upon the Yards of their Ships, conjectured the Ignis lambens for a good or a bad fatality; if they beheld but one flame, they denominated it an unlucky Helena; but if two, they accepted it for Castor and Pollux, Good Prognostics of fair and prosperous Weather: Even so it is in Mercy and Justice, the Consideration of them singly, may prove pernicious, but both linked together may complete thy Happiness.

4. LABOUR for true Faith in Christ, who is the Propitiation for our sins, 1 John 2.2. Whose Blood cleanseth us from all sin; 1 John 1.7. And holding Faith and a good Conscience, That we may avoid being Shipwreck'd, 1 Tim. 1.19. 1 Tim. 3.9. There was no cure for a wounded Israelite against the venom of Fiery Serpents, but to look up to the Brazen Serpent, which Prefigured Christ apprehensible by Faith; the only Medicament for Sin-wounded-Consciences: Permit but this very sense and apprehension of God's Wrath which now appaaleth thee, to induce thee the more arduously to detest all Sin; and thou shalt thereby be ascertain'd, that God hath wounded thee, only to heal thee.

5. REMEMBER that what the Law averrs, it declares only to them who are under the Law, not under Grace, Rom. 3.19. They are under the Law who plead Not guilty, and insist upon their Justification by works of the Law: We are under Grace, who perceiving our Sin and Misery by the Law, fly wholly to him for Mercy, who freely justifieth the Sinner, Rom. 3.24. The Imprecations and Menaces of the Law are not to break the bruised Reed, nor quench the Smoaking Flax, but to depress the heart that is elevated with an opinion of self merit, who safely go on to undo themselves after a presumptuous manner.

6. LET thy Repentance be speedy, that Sin take no root in thy heart. Neither let thy Wound putrefy before thou apply the Remedy: But ascend with all diligence to the Throne of Grace to implore Mercy, before Wrath is gone out against thee: Rely on this Second Table, Repentance, who hast lost the first, of Innocency: Condemn thyself, and Christ will Justify thee: He only expects thy voice, to give thee audience: When thou comest with thy Accusation and confessest thou hast sinned, then Christ he readily receiveth the Humble Penitent, and Proclaims thy Sins are forgiven thee. Observe how quickly the Pardon followed David's Confession; no sooner had he acknowledged, I have sinned against the Lord, but Omnipotency declares by the Prophet, The Lord also hath put away thy Sin, 2 Sam. 12.13. St. Peter quickly Repented, and as quickly found Mercy: Esau stayed too long, and so found no place for Repentance, though, He sought it carefully with Tears: Heb. 12.17. If the Granado fired, be suddenly retorted, it proves prejudicial to the Assailant: Such are the product of Satan's Fire-Works, if thou cast out his Temptations, and heartily repent thee, where any of his Darts pierce thee.

7. GIVE not thyself up to pensive Dedolency, mundane Sorrow, and fruitless Solitariness; that will but animate the bitterness of Spirit: Think not too much of thy Afflictions, but dulcifie them with remembrance of God's Mercy towards thee: Assume not to thyself a Worldly Sorrow that is unto death, 1 Cor. 7.10. But comfort up thyself in God, as David did, Psal. 43.5. Why art thou so sad, O my Soul, and why art thou so disquieted within me? Trust in God, for I shall yet praise him. And Solomon tells ye, A merry heart doth good, like a Medicine, but a broken Spirit drieth the Bones, Prov. 17.22. And again, a merry heart maketh a Cheerful Countenance, but by the Sorrow of the heart the Spirit is broken, Prov. 15.13.

8. BE very attentive to God's Word: For he is the God of all Consolation, and the Word is his Mind and Revealed Will for the benefit of our Salvation: It is a full Magazine, and there is no Affliction incident to frail Mortality, but may there meet with a proper Antidote: There thou shalt find Rules to guide thee, and preserve thee from sin: There thou shalt have a prospect of the Divine Mercy of God in Christ Jesus to wash away the guilt of all thy Transgressions: But then appear not only to be a hearer, but a doer of the Word, and Treasure up those Gracious Promises in thy heart; so shalt thou in due season feel the Operation of the Holy Spirit distilling the former, and the Latter-Rain upon the seed, whereby it may take root and be fruitful.

9. LASTLY, Add Zealous and Frequent Prayer, as God's Servants have practiced in all their distresses, Psal. 6.9. And be ascertain'd that he will not leave thee Comfortless, but will at length appear with great assurance of thy Salvation, and will infinitely recompense thy Patience in suffering and perseverance in invocating for pardon. Satan is never more baffled and infatuated in his own Stratagems, than when he gains a License to wound the hearts of those who are precious in the sight of the Almighty: For, as Romanus the Martyr told the Tormentor, Look how many Wounds thou givest, so many Mouths thou settest open, to cry to God for help; and indeed these Jewels cannot arrive to their Glorious Luster, without being Ground hard by Affliction.

The Prayer.

O MOST Gracious and Merciful Lord God, rebuke me not in thine Anger, neither chasten me in thy hot Displeasure: My Soul is sore vexed, but Lord, how long wilt thou punish me? Have Mercy upon me, for I am weak: Lord heal my Soul and deliver it, for I have sinned against thee; O save me for thy never failing Mercies sake: I am weary of my continual Groaning, mine Eyes are consumed with my grief of Tears: But Lord, hear thou my Supplication, and receive my Prayer.

2. O Lord, I am sorely afflicted, but quicken me in thy Righteousness according to thy word: In thy loving kindness, and multitude of thy tender Mercies, blot out my transgressions; wash, O wash me, and purge me thoroughly from my sins, and cleanse me from all my iniquities, the magnitude and number being of that Extent, that my guilt flieth in my Face, and I am afraid of thy Blessed Presence. I acknowledge myself unworthy to look up to Heaven, to appear before thee with a Petition of Mercy, who have so incessantly provoked thy Justice: The filthy Leprosy of my sins, stink and are corrupt, that they stop my own mouth; but my heart readily answereth, that I am of all men, most unworthy of this thy Condescension, in inclining thy Gracious Ear unto so wretched a Creature as I am.

3. THESE Terrors of Conscience wherewith thou hast now afflicted my Soul, are thy just Judgments: The fears of Hell, and eternal Condemnation, wherewith thou hast wounded me, are incomparably less than my sins have deserved: But, Lord, remember them not, who canst not forget the sufferings of thy blessed Son Jesus for them all. Lord, I am not able to answer thee one word of a thousand, nor can thy Justice require that of me, for which my Savior and Redeemer hath satisfied: Therefore I renounce myself, that I may be found in a bleeding Jesus, not having on my own Righteousness, according to the Condemning Letter of the Law, but that I may be Clothed in his Righteousness, who hath long since Cancelled the Hand-writing of Ordinances that were against me, and hath paid the debt for me.

4. O Lord, for His sake I humbly implore thee, to convert this Judgment I now labor under, into Mercy: Let it operate in my Soul a true detestation of all Sin; a steadfast purpose to forsake all my evil ways; a comfortable experience of thy Mercy, pronouncing Pardon to my afflicted Conscience, by the infallible Evidence of thy Holy Spirit, and assurance of Peace with thee: O make me to hear of Joy and Gladness, that the Bones which thou hast broken may rejoice. Cast me not away from thy presence, neither take thy Holy Spirit, the Comforter, from me; but restore me to the joy of thy Salvation, and uphold and establish me with thy free Spirit.

5. O thou who despisest not a broken and contrite heart, pour the Oil of thy Mercy, and heal my wounded Spirit: Then will I teach Transgressors thy way, that they may fear thee, and melt at the sight of thy Judgments; then shall Sinners be Converted unto thee, who art the Fountain of all Mercy and Consolation: Lord hear me, and incline thine Ear, in this day of my Calamity: Lord Consider, and perform thine own promise made through thy beloved Son Jesus Christ the Righteous, to whom with thee, O Heavenly Father, and the Holy Spirit, be all Honor and Glory, in Heaven and Earth, from this time forth and forever more,

Amen.

CHAP. XXXIII. The Sense of Spiritual Wants.

THE next thing which wounds and afflicts the Conscience, is Sense of defects, and Spiritual Wants: As want of Faith, Hope and Assurance of Salvation; Want of Sanctification, Purity of Heart, the Spirit of Prayer, and Hearing, and want of ability to perform other Holy Duties. In these the Spirit is stupefied, and overcast even in the best of Christians for a time: The Religious Person sometimes is sensible of a dullness, and want of Fervency in Prayer, and of a comfortable assurance, that God heareth or regardeth it, because he doth not presently answer, or not grant our Petitions. Sometimes they feel a Deviation of the Mind, and discomposure of thoughts, in attention, and unbelief in hearing and reading the Word: Sometimes want of Patience, want of Love to God, and Charity to Men: In short, such a general debility, or distemper of the Internal Man, that he readily concludes with St. Paul, That in his Flesh dwelleth no good thing, Rom. 7.18. These are great Maladies of the Soul, and Wounds of the Spirit; but it inferreth a good Prognostick of a bad Cause: Where these are and the Sinner is insensible, they are desperate Symptoms.

2. IN this Case let us consider, that the very same measure of Grace, which to the present sense of a Regenerate Man, seemeth incompetent, may yet be a sufficient measure to save him: And when he Invokes the Divine Assistance, he is most strong, though in his own sense he is weak and deficient: For in St. Paul's distress the Lord thus answered his Petition, My Grace is sufficient for thee, 2 Cor. 12.8. It saith not it shall be, but it is sufficient, meaning the present measure of Grace he had in his Possession, when he looked upon himself as a weak Vessel.

3. THE most Pious, their measure of Assurance is such, as they are not only enjoined to give diligence to make their Calling and Election sure, that so an entrance may be administered to them abundantly into the Everlasting Kingdom, but they are in duty bound also to Work out their own Salvation with fear and trembling, Phil. 2.12. All Incredulity inferreth not a Reprobate sense: There is Incredulity in the very Elect before, and a perplexing Remnant after their Calling; yea, even in their best Estate here; else why did the Holy Apostles pray, Lord increase our Faith, Luke 17.5. And why did our Savior upbraid them with unbelief, Mark 16.14.

4. AND Saving Faith differeth in degrees: So that there is a stronger and a weaker Faith, yet both true, and justifying: So do all other Graces, one hath a greater and more Excellent measure of the Spirit of Prayer than another: One hath a more discerning and attentive Spirit of Hearing than another, and yet in either instance, the minor may be true and sufficient: For to every Man is given according to the measure of Christ, Ephes. 4.7. One hath ten Talents, and another but two: Nay, even in one and the same Person's Faith, there is sometimes a grander, and sometimes a diminutive measure of Confidence and Assurance: And so we must judge of other Gifts; sometimes there is more fervency in Prayer, and other times less. The Sun doth not display his Radiant Beams on us always alike, neither doth the light of God's Grace illuminate us after one manner.

5. A true saving Faith may be very impotent, and the Believer may be insensible for some space, but yet the Gates of Hell shall never prevail against it, as may appear in St. Peter's Example. There are doubtings and failings in the best on Earth, by Reason we are but here partly Spiritual: We are not yet arrived to perfection: Faith here must receive continual increases, and be subject to Trials: And the like does ensue to all other Virtues and Graces: That true Faith, never shall finally fall away, or utterly fail, though it be subject to Intension and Remission; because Christ interceded for us, as he said to St. Peter, behold, Satan hath desired that he may sift you as wheat, but I have prayed for thee, that thy Faith fail not, Luke 22.31, 32. Because his Grace by which we are called, and stand, is immutable in the Counsel and Decree of Heaven, and are Sealed up by the Holy Spirit of Promise, 2 Cor. 1.22. And the like we are to judge of of all the Fruits of Sanctification, which being the Donations and Graces of God, are such as he repenteth not of, neither finally withdraweth, Rom. 11.29.

6. THOU hast indeed a true sense of thy Spiritual wants, and mournest at thy Corruptions of Heart, which on every occasion produce sinful Acts against thy Maker; if this be a heavy burden unto thee, receive this Comfort, that thy sin is excluded its proper place, and become a Stranger unto thee: For nothing in its own proper station is so ponderous. The danger is want of Sense, and taking pleasure in Unrighteousness: If a wounded Person is insensible, he is either dead, or in some dangerous Extacy: No part hath sense but the Living; though it were for the present more comfortable to be whole, yet sense of smart in thy wounds inferreth Life; and indeed in God's Medicaments, who makes all things operate for the best to them that love him, 'tis a better State, (in respect of the quiet Fruits of Righteousness, accruing to them that are thereby Exercised, and the Ulcerous Corruptions of our Souls, often necessitating our wounding that we may be healed) than the secure prosperity of Sinners; for it is good and beneficial at the last for the just that they have been afflicted, Psal. 119.67.

7. WHEN thou hearest, or readest the Scriptures, art thou sensible of the want of Faith, Assurance, Sanctification, and the Spirit and Fervency of Prayer? If so, be comforted: For as the Solar Eclipse, and Descension of Light towards us, can be discerned by no Luster, but its own; so neither can the want of Grace be possibly discerned by anything but Grace. Hast thou a hearty desire to have these wants of Grace supplied? Then that very holy Ambition is Grace itself; without which thou couldst not desire it: Our blessed Lord in his Sermon on the Mount, Math. 5.6. pronounces, Blessed are they who do hunger and thirst after Righteousness; for they shall be filled: God will never desert that Soul which desireth him, and his saving health: None can hunger but the Living; and none hungers for Grace, but he that subsisteth by it: But then thy desire of that Seed must be ardent, not languid, such as cannot rest unsatisfied with anything else in the World.

8. THERE may be an Enervate, and Oblique appetite of Salvation in Balaam, for fear of Damnation; but he more loved the Wages of Unrighteousness: The happiest thirsts for the Waters of Life, and afflicteth the Soul till it be obtained; and enjoys no rest, or peace without it: So that indeed this very State which so much afflicteth thee is the most secure and happy; and thou shalt once know, that which one said in the happy Event of his unhappy Shipwrack, We had perished, if we had not thus perished. And when thou hast received the Spirit of God in such a measure as thereby to discern the things that are freely given thee of God; then thou shalt find, That Blessed is the Man whom the Lord chasteneth and teacheth in his Law, that he may give him rest from his days of adversity, Psal. 94.12, 13.

9. MAKE that inquest with thy Soul, whether ever thou wert possessed of that, which thou art now sensible thou wantest? If so, be assured it shall revive again, and finally overcome; For whatsoever is born of God overcometh the World; and this is the Victory that overcometh the World, even our Faith, 1 John 5.4. And this sense and sorrow is a signal of the recovery of the health of thy most precious part, thy Soul; as the seven times Neezing of the Shunamite's Child presaged his reviving, 2 Kings 4.35. If thou never yet enjoyd'st the Grace which thou now beginnest to be sensible of, it now evidently is apparent thou shalt acquire it; for this internal perplexity, is but as the motion of the Waters of Bethesda, a certain Prognostick of a healing Power descending on thee.

10. NEXT ask thyself, according to that saying of the Prophet, Jer. 2.17. Hast thou not procured this unto thyself? Even this which thou now complainest of? Hast thou not neglected the appointed means? If want of Faith perplex thee; hast thou not negligently heard the Gospel? Hast thou laid it up in a Solicitous Heart? Hast thou valued it, and begged it fervently and frequently of God, above all things in the World? Thou art querulous for want of the Spirit of Prayer; Hast thou not neglected this Duty formerly; and dost thou now duly prepare thyself for that holy Office? Dost thou use that vigilancy which Christ enjoin'd, of Watch and Pray; by recalling thy profane and wandering Thoughts from their Extravagancies, and all attention of Spirit, fixing them on the Holy Jesus? Thou art sensible thy Heart, Tongue, nor Actions are not Sanctimonious: Appeal to thy own Conscience, and then tell me, if thou hast not heretofore used all Arts, and solicited all things to appear in the throng, to drown the loud checks of that voice within thee, and hast looked upon it as thy utter Enemy? Now if thou wouldst cease the Effect, remove the Occasion; duly observe God's holy Ordinances, and he will infallibly perform his Promises.

11. ENQUIRE whether thou dost not persevere in some habitual sin? It is a great folly to cry out of the Heat, and still cast oil on the Fire: If it be an Achan's Wedge hidden, search for the Cursed thing, Josh. 7.25, 26. and the Plague in thine own heart, 1 Kings 8.38. And by removing the Impediment and Obstruction, thou shalt be Comforted: If it be a sleeping Jonah, cast him over-board: And as Eliphaz said to Job, If thou return to the Almighty, thou shalt be built up, thou shalt put iniquity far from thy Tabernacles: The Almighty shall be thy defense; then shalt thou have delight in the Almighty, and shalt lift up thy face unto God: Thou shalt make thy Prayer unto him, and he shall hear thee, Job 22.23. &c.

12. TO reduce what has been said into practice, follow these Rules; Give an audit to God's Word preparedly, that is, renew thy Repentance, and Invoke the Father of Lights to Illuminate thee, that thou mayst be a Reverend and an Attentive Auditor: Faith comes by Hearing; so doth Sanctification, God's Spirit operating upon his own Ordinance to make it Active: The occasion why so many hear, so often; and so few so seldom practice and receive true Comfort by it, is for want of a due preparation; resembling them that sow among Thorns: Let Faith and all Christian Graces be valuable to thee for his sake who is the Author of all our Happiness. How few set a right Estimate on Heavenly things till it be too late?

Mundane Vanities, are Rated high, and often purchased at a dear Rate; but where are those that rise Early, rest Late, Eat the Bread of Carefulness, venture Sea, and Land to obtain the holy City, even the New Jerusalem? Be eager in the pursuit of these things thou standst in need of, and the Almighty will not with-hold them from thee.

13. OUR Savior affirms to us, John 7.38, 39. He that believeth in me, out of his Belly shall flow Rivers of Living Waters: That is, fluency of Graces proceeding from the Holy Ghost. If thou wilt labor, and endeavor to attain unto this Faith, chase away all Obstructions that do oppose thee: For a Resolution to persevere in any known Sin, and True Faith▪ are inconsistent. An obdurate Heart is like the great stone on the mouth of the Well at Padan-Aram, which kept Men back from the Waters of Refreshment: These Impediments, I say, must first be removed; for sin in the Affections, is like a venomous Toad in the Mouth of the Fountain, obstructing the Waters of Life.

14. CONSIDER the Operation of the Almighty in thee, and compare thy misfortunes with others: If thou art not heard by the Great Being, perhaps thy Supplication is not consonant to his Will: For his design is to save thee, and infallibly to bless thee; and if he performs that by a means suitable to Omnipotency, wilt thou be impatient, with Naaman, if thou art not healed according to thy way which thou proposest? Is not it enough that he will effect that which is properest and best for thee and canst thou pretend to outvie his Wisdom? Perhaps he thinks it requisite to try thy perseverance and patience, whereof I confess, I know no severe object, than an opinion of his not hearing our Prayers. It was no small trial, when David cried out, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Why art thou so far from helping me, and from the Words of my Roaring? Psal. 22.1. But the Acclamation on the Cross, carried a louder sound, Mat. 27.46. Moses was denied entrance into Canaan, but was received into Heaven: The Cup did not pass away from Christ, but God's Will was performed in the operation of Man's Redemption; and so, he was heard, Heb. 5.7.

15. DOTH thy Faith endure many sharp encounters of the Tempter? Then observe the Almighty by this means doth more confirm it. Is not every Temptation as the shaking of Trees, which loosing the ground, Engrafts them the deeper? Thou art sensible of thy great defects in Sanctity, and of many dubious conflicts between the Flesh and the Spirit, provoking thy Soul to cry with Rebecca, when perplexed with her wrestling Twins, Why am I thus? Gen. 25.22. Despond not, but consider the work of him, with whom we have to do: Thus he chaseth thee often to fly to him, and to Consult his Oracles: Thus he exerciseth thee to humility, without which the most Excellent Graces could not save thee. He that Prayed for St. Peter's falling, could have prevented him from falling into that Sin: But in so doing he kept him from presumption, and fitted him to confirm his Brethren.

16. IN all Humility beg Holiness of God, who hath expressly said, ask and ye shall have: And to consider that God is perfect Holiness, is a vehement Motive conducing to it; and certainly he cannot choose but love his own Image in us, and freely give us that which he loveth: It pleased the Author of our Being, that Solomon, before Riches, Revenge, and Life itself, should petition him for Wisdom; upon which, he did not only grant his request, but additionally gave him Riches and Honor: And undoubtedly it doth so much please God, that any of his Servants doth in the sense of their wants, before all things give Grace the Preference; and they that in the sincerity of their heart Petition to him for Sanctity of Life, he will not deny them, but will insert to their grant, more than we are able to ask or think of.

The Prayer.

O Almighty God, Infinite in Mercy, and perfect Verity, who delightest not in the destruction of Wretched Creatures, nor despisest the Groans of a Troubled Spirit; Lord, I am poor and afflicted, and do in bitterness of Soul acknowledge my vileness and vacancy of Grace, the Corruption of my sinful nature, the misery which I have procured myself by my willful disobedience to thy Holy Laws, and my Impotency to anything that is good: Lord, I am as that wretched Traveler, wounded and cast down; only sensible of my Wounds, but utterly unable to move, or help myself: The Priest and Levite pass by and afford me no relief; neither is it in the power of the Creature to assist me: Nay, even thy just and holy Law, which wholsomely instructs, Do this and live, is so far from aiding me, or administering Comfort, that my sins make it appear to me a killing Letter; or at best resembling the Prophets Staff, sent before by the Ministry of thy Servant, not able to give Life, but a Prospect of my Sins, and rendering me guilty, before thy dreadful Tribunal, and at the Bar of my terrified Conscience.

2. BUT, O Lord, let the good Samaritan, the Prophet himself, Christ Jesus, thy dear Son, and my alone Savior, inspire me with his Holy Spirit; for he only can bind up my wounded Soul and heal it: Thou hast wounded me by an heavy apprehension of thy Justice; O now heal me by the assurance of thy Mercy: Strengthen my Faith in Christ, who freely justifieth Sinners: And as thou hast in thine Eternal Love, given him to Death for my Redemption, so give me an infallible assurance that he is my Savior and Deliverer: That according to thine own Gracious Promise in him, I may live with thee.

3. AND O thou, who art the Savior of all the World, who sentest the Holy Ghost the Comforter of all thy Servants, to thy Afflicted Disciples to strengthen them, send him to my Enervated and Wretched Soul: It is neither of him that Willeth, nor of him that Runneth, but of thine own Infinite Goodness, showing Mercy: Thy Omnipotence is effectual in the Operation of thy good Will and Pleasure. O, be Graciously pleased to Sanctify my Corrupted will and affections: And as thou hast freely given me a will and a hearts desire to serve and please thee, that I might be saved; so perfect thine own work in me, and establish what thou hast begun: Give me, O Lord, true Holiness, and repair thine own Image in me, that thou mayst own me for thine; and then manifest thine own work in me, and unto me.

4. LET not the good Spirit which has possession of me, remain any longer in obscurity; but blessed Lord, manifest thyself unto my Soul: And let the Illumination of thy Spirit break out in full assurance of Faith, that I may no more doubt of thy Mercies: Grant me an entire Victory over Sin and Despair, by the apparent presence of the Comforter: My afflicted Soul, O Lord, knoweth no Sanctuary to fly unto, but thy infinite mercy: Unto thee, alone it Gaspeth as a thirsty Land; O shower down such a plentiful Dew of thy Grace, which may refresh my wearied Spirit, and fill me with the Fruits of Righteousness, which may evidently appear in my Life and Conversation, to thy Glory, and the assurance of my Election, Vocation, Sanctification, Perseverance and Salvation in thy beloved Son, and my alone Savior, to whom with thee and the Holy Spirit, Three Persons, one Immortal, Incomprehensible, Omnipotent, only Wise God, be rendered all Honor and Glory, in Heaven and Earth, now and to all Eternity.

Amen.

CHAP. XXXIV. Fear of Temptations.

NEXT We are to Consider the Conscience afflicted with Fear of Temptations, and a defection through them, inclining it to a despair of Grace sufficient to resist them; by this means the Soul is immersed with heaviness, through manifold Temptations, 1 Pet. 1.6. In which case it is necessary to consider, That first, A Temptation is a Trial, or taking an Experiment of something or other: The Devil who cannot compel, trieth men whether he can allure them to Sin; and this is apprehensively Temptation.

2. THERE is a Temptation of Trial, which you see, Acts 20.19. 1 Cor. 10.13. Rev. 3.20. and St. James saith, My Brethren, count it all joy when ye fall into divers Temptations: And Blessed is the man that endureth Temptation. For when he is tried, he shall receive the Crown of Life, which the Lord hath promised to them that Love him. St. James 1.2, 12. God is said to tempt no man, (that is, to Evil: Evidently implying, as there is no Sin in him, so neither is there any occasioned by him) yet tried Abraham (to manifest him openly to others and himself: For no man knoweth himself, which is untried) which denominates tempting, or proving: As you will find in Exod. 15.25. and Ch. 16.4. Deut. 8.16. and Chap. 13.3. Psal. 26.2. 1 Pet. 1.7. And there is a Temptation of seducement, which is a Solicitation to defection and falling from God, by sinning, and committing evil, 1 Tim. 6.9. 1 Thes. 3.5. So that God tempteth, that he may Discipline us, but the Devil that he may destroy us.

3. SOME Temptations spring from the Corruption and Sin Inherent in the Flesh, St. James 1.14. Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own Lusts; such as are mentioned, Gal. 5.19, 20. Some are suggested by the Tempter, who being a Spirit hath power to insinuate and convey his impious notions into our minds: Suggestion between Spirits, are as Contiguity and touching of Bodies; for whereas he cannot discover the unuttered secrets of the heart, (it being the Almighty's peculiar Prerogative) but he observes men's natural inclinations and habits, by their Words and Actions, and so prepares Baits accordingly; thus he fishes in these depths, till he perceives his Suggestions are swallowed, and the Sinner taken: And by this means he presenteth such Thoughts, as he conjectureth will take, by that which is obvious to the Senses of men: As he fitted an opportunity of Treason to impious Judas, by the malice of the high Priests: Of Lust to Amnon; of venturing on the cursed thing to Achan; of the Revenge to Cain; of Idolatry to Ahaz, by the Altar of Damascus, 2 Kin. 16.10. &c.

4. OF Temptations, there are four degrees, by which it ariseth to full Maturity: First, Suggestion. Secondly, Delight therein. Thirdly, Consenting. Fourthly, Acting the same: As St. James tells ye, Chap. 1.14, 15. Man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own Lusts, and enticed; then when Lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth Sin, and Sin when it is finished, bringeth forth death.

The first of these (a bare Suggestion) is not our Sin, if there be no delight, or consenting to it: For Christ was tempted, Mat. 4.1. Luke 4.2. in all points as we are, yet without sin, Heb. 4.15. The Sin is Satan's, when ever he Suggesteth evil: The Second (as the Third and Fourth) is Sin in its degree; for every delight in evil, declares a Mans inclination to be such: A declining from Good, and a proneness to consent and act evil.

5. A trial of Temptation to the Just, is but as Fire to Gold; it purifieth, and createth a valuation in God's Esteem; as the Psalmist tells ye, Psal 116.15. Precious in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints; and the Apostle informs ye, 1 Pet. 1.7. That the trial of your Faith being much more precious than of Gold which perisheth, though it be tried with Fire, might be found unto praise, &c. And that mirror of Patience is Comforted, Job 23.10. When he hath tried me I shall come forth as Gold. Temptation therefore burneth out the dross, and is as a Wincing Wind; For Satan by a Temptation winnowed St. Peter: Now Consider with thyself, can the Refiner of Gold take that Care, that he will not lose it in the Furnace? Can the Husbandman, so opportune the Wind, that he will not lose the Corn, but cleanse it from the Chaff? And canst thou think that the Almighty will suffer thee to be lost, by permitting thee to Temptations? No, assure thyself he cannot err: He measureth all, Is Faithful, and will not suffer thee to be tempted above what thou art able, 1 Cor. 10.13. He knoweth how to deliver his out of Temptations, 2 Pet. 2.9. Therefore God commands us not to fear any of these things, which they should suffer, whom Satan should cast into Prison, Rev. 2.10.

6. THERE can be no Conquest gained without an Enemy, nor no Crown without a Conflict: No Faith without Troubles, nor no Combat without some Adversary: When the Almighty puts thee to Trials, he steadfastly beholds how thou entertainest the Enemy, and as thou standest the Shock, he supplieth thee with fresh aids, as necessity requireth, and in the mean time prepareth the Crown: Many by a long and secure peace grow Impotent; and for want of Experience unable to resist an enemy when he invadeth, perhaps their own Pride (born out of self-ignorance) overcome them; or fullness may debauch them; whereas Exercise makes them Vigorous, and Temptations humble: Lest I should be Exalted above measure, saith Saint Paul, There was given to me a Thorn in the Flesh, the Messengers of Satan to buffet me, 2 Cor. 12.7. And indeed Conscience of a Sin, and fear of punishment, makes the Regenerate more Religious; and is much the firmer Faith, which Repentance storeth up, That ye Sorrowed after a Godly sort, what Carefulness it wrought in you, 2 Cor. 7.11.

7. THE Spiritual Pharaoh most eagerly pursueth those who are departing out of his Kingdom: He passeth by his own, as Captives: And chaseth those in whom he perceiveth Christ liveth: When he must be cast out, then he teareth most furiously, Luke 9.42. So that his rage against thee is no Argument of Despair, but rather of great Affiance, that Satan himself, finds thou art none of his Disciple; were he secure of thee, he would let thee go unmolested to destruction, and never disquiet thee, lest any agitation should bring thee to Repentance, and him to loss: This Lesson our Savior taught, When a strong Man armed keepeth his Palace, his Goods are in peace, Luke 11.21.

8. CONSIDER well that the best have been, and the best that live are tempted: The Jebusites were left in Jerusalem, for an Exercise of Virtue, 2 Sam. 5.6. The Apostle wrapped up into the third Heaven, was buffeted by Satan's Messengers, 2 Cor. 12.12. EVERY day dedicate thy first and last 2, 7. Once for all, Christ in whom was no sin, was tempted, Heb. 4.15. That thou are tempted, is no inference of Despair: It seems a Paradox, how Heaven and Earth are here so annexed; we being partly Spirit, and partly Flesh; that we cannot appear as we would, Gal. 5.17. We find an irksome Law in ourselves, opposing us: Our Reparation is something, and Supernatural, but so short of that which shall be, that ourselves (like the Israelites in Ezra's time) sound a discordious Concord of sharps and flats, joy and sorrow, Ezra 3.13. We must expect perfection in Heaven, for our present freedom from sin, is rather a desire to be free, than our being so.

9. NEXT let us consider that God's Grace (who at his pleasure chaineth up the Tempter) is sufficient for thee, Rev. 20.1. 2 Cor. 12.9. He restraineth him so much, that he cannot be a lying Spirit in the Mouths of Ahab's Prophets, until he have leave (to tempt him out to his destruction) from him who justly permitteth to strong Delusions, that they should perish in believing Lies, who receive not the love of the Truth, that they might be saved: Omnipotence knows best how far he will suffer thee to be tempted, and accordingly measureth out a sufficiency of Grace to all the Regenerate: Why he suffered David so dangerously to fall, or St. Peter, and St. Paul is dubious, except to humble them, and leave us motives to Repentance; and as for his Judgments be assured they are ever just.

10. WHEN thou art under any Temptation examine thyself whether thou delightest in it? If thou takest no pleasure in it, nor consentest to it, but rather startlest at it, as a thing which thy Soul detests, and abhors, it shall not prejudice thee: Now consider whether the Temptation which commonly assaulteth thee is such as probably ariseth from the Corruption of thine own heart, which is usually inferred by the Thoughts Parley from one thing to another, by direct or natural mediums: But if it be a Temptation of Satan's cast into thy Soul, it is vulgarly abrupt, and such as thou didst not think of, Incongruous, Sudden, Unnatural, and such as thou tremblest at, as Blasphemous, Sanguine, or Desperate: Though in some Temptations he takes the opportunity of deluding our sight and hearing, joining himself with our natural inclination to sin: And these are his Messengers the Apostle mentions, 1 Cor. 12.21, 22. Gal. 5.20. Who are like Traitors Corrupted by some Foreign State, against their native Country: Now if a Temptation arise of Corrupted nature, the Remedy must be the depression of carnal Reason and Affections: For if it be Satan's Instigations, the very discovery will infer a Detestation whereby thou mayest gain the Conquest; for if we yield not to his allurements, he is utterly vanquished.

11. WHEN any motion excites thee, either Internally, by Suggestion, or Externally by persuasions of Men, observe the Apostles Rule, 1 Job. 4.1. Believe not every Spirit, but try the Spirits, whether they are of God: because many false Prophets are gone out into the World; and by this thou art proved, whether thou lovest the Lord thy God with all thy Heart: And St. Paul tells ye there must be also Heresies among you, 1 Cor. 11.19. Therefore Examine whether they bring any Propositions against Faith, the substance of the Gospel, Sanctimony commanded in God's Law, Peace, Order, Charity, and Unity: To this end, that if we discern anything in Men's persuasions or any internal Suggestions, contrary to our great Law-Giver, we may conclude them Carnal, Earthly, Sensual and Devilish, and so use our utmost endeavor to resist them, which may be performed by the practice of these Rules following.

Thoughts to the Almighty in Sincere and Fervent Prayer, to preserve thee from Temptations, and to guide all thy Thoughts, Words and Actions, so that waking thou mayst walk sincerely in his presence, and sleeping rest assuredly in his Protection: Prepare and fortify thyself against these encounters of Temptations with the whole Armor of God, Eph. 6.12. Thou must expect Trials, for thy Adversaries are Formidable, such as Flesh and Blood, Principalities and Spiritual Wickednesses: It is a Conflict the more terrible, by being Abstruse, and with an invisible, puissant, indefatigable, and restless Antagonist, with whom thou canst not Truce safely: Therefore contrive beforehand, like the Wise Master-Builder, to fix the Basis upon a Rock; against which no Winds, Storms, or Floods can prevail, Mat. 7.24, 25.

13. THE Mariner doth not design his Ship only for a Calm, but also against furious Storms and rough Seas: Prepare thyself with the Anchor of the Soul, Heb. 6.19. Hope to lay hold on Christ, who therefore suffered, and was tempted, that he might deliver thee from, and in Temptations: Next, Fraught thyself with Patience, and all things necessary for Trials, which thou must in reason expect, before thou canst arrive at thy desired Haven: It were great Incogitancy to think that Satan, who could not abstain from tempting the Lord Jesus, in whom was found no sin, will ever give thee a Cessation from Temptations, in whom he conceives some hopes of prevailing; for he will endeavor to perplex thee, though he cannot attain to vanquish thee.

14. BE vigilant, lest ye enter into Temptation: Because your Adversary the Devil, as a roaring Lyon, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet. 5.8. And be not less vigilant for your own Salvation. Some have not observed whether a mischievous Temptation hath hurried them, but hath been surprised and led into some desperate sins, which upon true Opticks have abhorred and trembled at: Thou must expect many assaults, for Satan leaves them sometimes, to return with seven worse Spirits, Luke 11.26. That security may destroy thee, when no other means are prevalent. Be not Precipitated into any sudden undertaking, but consult first the Oracles of God, and there receive direction: Let them be as the Cloudy Pillar to Israel, and where that directeth, Steer thy Course accordingly.

15. FOLLOW the Apostle's advice, St. James 4.7. Resist the Devil, and he will fly from you: If thou Surrendrest, or givest him the least advantage, he is Tyrannical: Next observe St. Paul's Exhortation to his Son Timothy, to fly youthful lusts, 2 Tim. 2.22. For they are like Serpents, and there's no safe debate with them, except by fasting and Prayer: Therefore the exquisitest way is flight: Stop thy Ears to the Enchanting Sirens; and with the Patientest of Men, make a Covenant with thine Eyes, not to behold that which shall prejudice thee, Job 31.1. Take heed of all Incentives, and Inauspicious motives; beware of Tamar's ways, and Delilah's Embraces; Solomon's Curtisans Invitations, and presented Opportunities, Suspected Company, Lascivious Entertainments, Betraying Gifts, and whatsoever may lead thee to the paths of Death.

16. AS the subtle Enemy fixes his Gins, according as he finds the assaulted inclinable to be ensnared; so be thou careful most to fortify thyself where thou findest him placing his main Batteries: And most carefully watch over thyself, where he most frequently assaileth thee: In this use Perseverance, which will prove an Antidote against that Malice which else would destroy thee. To reckon up all the Artifices of this Tempter would be Voluminous; I shall only instance some few: And first he represents himself in the shape of a Serpent, with his destructive Commentaries on the forbidden fruit. Secondly, He appears like a holy Prophet, with lying Visions to Bewitch the foolish and impotent: Next he comes like a Court like Sophister with ample promises of Wealth, Honor and Pleasure; another time he Acts the Pander, and produces a Bathsheba, bathing herself. And lastly, He hellishly studies the secret Conspirator, and assists Judas in the betraying of his Lord and Master; and for revenge of so horrid a Fact, makes him become his own Executioner; therefore search into his Gifts, and whatever they are fear the Enemy: As Saul said of David, 1 Sam. 23.22. See his place where his haunt is, for he dealeth very subtly: He never pretends the least shadow of Goodness, but there's some mischief in the end of it; he is studious of Men, and where a Gentle disposition is evident, he tempts to Luxury; an Ambitious, to some lofty and impious designs; and the Angry to Revenge: In this so important Affair, thou canst not be too Politick; therefore where thou art most weak, let thy Fortifications and Guards be strongest.

17. FLY Idleness, that lazy Matron of all Evil, and Basis of Mischief. Ever employ thyself about acts of Virtue, and then there will be no space or room for the Tempter. What advantage did he reap upon the Royal Prophet, by staining so glorious a Life, which was produced by his few hours Vacancy? Dally not with Temptations; for happy shall he be who parleys not with them, but is Careful and Vigilant, and is ready to say as Elisha said of Jehoram's Messenger, 2 Kings, 6.32. When he cometh, shut the Door, and hold him fast there: Is not the sound of his Master's Feet behind him? The same Remedy we must use to Satan's Messengers, who are sent to Destroy us: We must crush the Cocatrice Eggs, lest breaking out into a fiery Serpent, we cannot Conquer it, but say too late, as the Turk mentioned of Scanderberg,

This Enemy should have been Subdued in his Minority; for a Attemptation is Nourished that Hour it is not Mastered.

18. INVOKE the Almighty constantly and fervently; use his own Words, Lead us not into Temptation. In many Instances, these are a Divine Revenge on some precedent unrepented Sin; against which the Sanctimonious frequently make their Supplications: And if, as often as Satan assaileth, we could address ourselves to earnest and zealous Prayers, we should worst him at his own Weapon, & receive frequenter Allarms to awaken us to a stronger Guard; even the shadow of the Almighty. The first Enemy that assailed Israel in his way to Canaan, was vanquished by Prayer. When Moses held up his Hands, Israel prevailed, Exod. 17. The same repulse we must use to our grandest Enemy.

The Prayer.

O LOD God Almighty, the Examiner of all Hearts, and the Tryer of the Reins, who knowest before we ask, what our Necessities are, and by thy Holy Spirit helpst our Infirmities; Lord,

I acknowledge my Ignorance in not Praying unto thee as I ought; but thou alone canst make request for me, according to thy blessed Will, with unutterable Groans, which thou only understandest: Help, I beseech thee, my Infirmities, regulate my Devotion, and restrain the busy Malice of the Tempter: Direct and accept my Prayers as Incense in thy sight, and let them enter thy Presence, through Jesus Christ, my only Redeemer and Advocate.

2. THOU, who art Truth itself hast promised, that all things shall work together for good, to them that love thee, and keep thy Commandments: Lord, I put all my trust and confidence in thee, and do steadfastly believe that it is good for me that I have been afflicted; for I am assured that after the trial of my Faith, and exercise of my Patience, I shall receive of thee, (the only giver of all good things) the quiet Fruits of Righteousness: But, O Lord, how shall frail dust and ashes appear before thee, which is full of Infirmities, Fears, Doubtings and Failings; for mine Iniquities have taken such hold upon me that I am not able to look up: Nay, they are more in number than the hairs on my head, and my heart hath failed me: Neither have I to deal, O Lord, with Flesh and Blood only; but with Invisible Powers of Darkness, which with restless encounters assault my Soul to destroy it.

3. BUT, O Lord God, of my Salvation, be not thou far from me: Shew thy Power, and deliver me from the Messengers of Satan, which are too mighty for me: O rescue me, and bridle their Insolent Malice; bind the Strong man, and deliver thy Vessel from his Usurping Tyranny, that I may in every faculty of my Soul, serve and please thee. Pardon all my sins for thy Blessed Son's sake, who died for me: Heal my wounded Soul, which hath to the anguish of my heart, so often sinned against thee: Hide not thy face from me in time of my trouble, forget not my bitter affliction, which makes me go mourning all the day long, while the insulting Enemy heavily oppresseth me: Thou art my King, O God, and canst Command deliverances: Lord, I am poor, needy and destitute of help and strength to resist the Fiery Darts of Satan.

4. PUT thy whole Armor upon me, I beseech thee, that I may be able to stand. Arise for my aid, O thou preserver of all Men; redeem me from the devouring Lions Mouth, and for thy Infinite Mercies sake think upon me; make hast to help me, and make no long tarrying, O my God: O suffer me not for any trials to fall from thee: Lay no more upon me, than thou wilt be pleased to give me Strength, Patience and Perseverance to bear Cheerfully: Confirm me unto the end, that I may be blameless in the day of the Lord Jesus: Give me a blessed Effect and Issue out of every trial; that the more thou permittest me to suffer, the more Experience I may acquire of thy Mercy, and the greater assurance that thou wilt never fail me, nor forsake me: That I may through him, who hath by suffering vanquished death, hell, and him who hath the power of death, overcome all these Spiritual wickednesses, which war against my Soul.

5. LORD, I have trusted only in thy Mercy; thou hast ordained Strength in the Mouths of Babes and Infants: O strengthen me unto the end, that my heart may rejoice in thy Salvation: Lord, spare me, that I may recover my strength: Put thou a new song into my mouth, that I may praise thee for my deliverance, and declare unto afflicted Sinners, what thou hast done for my Soul: Lord hear me, and have mercy upon me. Thou who art ever readier to give, than poor Mortals are to ask, deny not the Humble and Earnest Requests of me the vilest and worst of Sinners: This I beg, O Lord, through the Merits and Mediation of Jesus Christ my only Savior and Redeemer,

Amen.

The Close.

HAVING run through the several Parts I intended, I shall now Calculate the whole, and give a Specimen of Reducing it into Practice. Be very careful to stifle every Sin in its primitive motion, and give no place to the Wiles of Satan, but crush, betimes the Cockatrice Egg, lest it break out into a Serpent: Permit not vain Imaginations to possess thy Mind, which are impossible for thee to attain, or unprofitable if they are attained; but rather contemn, and behold them as empty shadows, and lighter than Vanity.

2. BUT labor daily more and more to inspect into thyself, that thou mayst attain to that cognizance. If thou shouldst upon the Enquiry be asked what is the vilest Creature in the whole Earths Circumference, thy nearest and most intimate Friend, thy Conscience may report, thy own self, by reason of thy Sins: And if on the contrary thou wert asked the Question, What is the truest Catholicon for it? Thy Heart may readily reply, The Blood of Christ, which speaks better things than the Blood of Abel. Affect not vain Glory, nor Popularity, lest it prove more pernicious than Contempt, and avoid entertaining a male-contented mind, for that may produce thee more misery than thou art sensible of; but think it the greatest Mercy of the Almighty, that in the multitudes of those Blessings thou enjoyest, thou hast some Crosses. God showers upon thee many Blessings, lest through want thou shouldst despond; and he mixes with them some Crosses, lest by too much Prosperity thou shouldst forget thy Maker.

3. WHEN the Subtile Tempter, by his Instigations offers any Motion of Discontent, referring to thy present Station; remember St. Paul's saying, which must be allowed a Maxim, 1 Tim. 6.7, 8, 9. We brought nothing into this World, and it is certain we can carry nothing out; and having Food and Rayment, let us be therewith content; but they that will be Rich, fall into temptation and a snare, and into many foolish and hurtful Lusts, which drown men in Destruction and Perdition. Invoke the Almighty, and with wise Agur let this be thy Petition; O Lord, Give me neither Poverty, nor Riches; feed me with Food convenient for me, lest I be full and deny thee, and say who is the Lord; or lest I be poor and Steal, and take the Name of my God in vain, Prov. 30.8, 9.

4. BE not opinionated that any sin is diminutive, for Heavens Vengeance is due to the least, and without God's Infinite Goodness and Mercy, is enough to cast thee into unquenchable fire, from whence there is no Redemption: Remember that Christ died for thee, and when thou hast committed any sin, mourn for it, and earnestly deprecate the Almighty for Pardon and Forgiveness: Often Contemplate on the Frailties of thy Transitory Life, and of Deaths Infallibility: Wish rather a good, than a long Life, and let thy Verdict agree with the Royal Prophet's; That one day in God's House is better than a thousand elsewhere, so that one week Religiously employed is more estimable, than a Life annually consumed in Debauchery.

6. CALCULATE once a day thy thoughts, and for what good ones thou hast entertained, return thy Lands to him from whom cometh every good and perfect gift: And for what vain and idle ones has possessed thy Memory, humbly implore his Remission, to whom alone belong Mercies and Forgiveness: St Matthew as a good Monitor, gives thee this Memento, that for every idle word that men shall speak, they shall give an account thereof at the day of Judgment, Mat. 12.36. Therefore shun all frivolous and prolix Discourse, which will but infest thy Ears, and prove insignificant, and petulant answers, which many times prove very pernicious: The words were thine when locked up in silence, but once uttered they are out of thy Possession; and what folly and madness is it, when that sharp weapon thy Tongue shall attest against thee?

6. AVOID Hypocrisy, and let thy Heart and Tongue agree in a direct Harmony; for where Truth and Justice is the Basis, no evil Politicks can undermine the Foundation: Abhor all Falsity and Dissimulation in another, and Contemn it in thyself, else the Almighty will detest thee, and forever banish thee his presence; of which the Prophet David gives us that assurance, He that telleth Lies shall not tarry in his sight, Psal. 101.7. Set a Guard upon the Door of thy Lips, that no Obscene words proceed from thence, as thou wouldst preserve thy Food from being Poison'd; but let thy Discourse favor of Virtue and Piety, that the Hearers may be Improved and well Instructed: And when Religion is the Theme, use that Reverence which so Important a Subject requires.

7. STUDY to be a good Proficient in Three things, which are very necessary: First, to understand with Discretion, to speak with Prudence, and to perform with Alacrity; be not too Credulous to all Informations, neither report totally what you have lent an ear too: For if thou dost, those which were thy Friends will become thy Enemies, and thou wilt expose thyself to perpetual Vexation: This is well observed by the Son of Sirach, Ecclus. 19.8, 9. Whether it be to Friend or Foe, talk not of other Men's Lives, and if thou canst without offense reveal them not, for he heard and observed thee, and when time cometh he will hate thee.

8. LET not Malice provoke thee to divulge that which the Bonds of Friendship obliges thee to Conceal; but to prevent so great an Eruption, make choice of such a Familiar Friend, who is inspired with Evangelical Graces, from whom thou canst never receive any prejudice; for though there may arise some particular dissension, yet the operation of those Graces will infallibly conduce to a Reconciliation. Next, act nothing which may be offensive to Sobriety, or uneasy to thyself, neither be guilty of anything which may induce thy Friend to become thine Enemy; but when thou hast, through Supineness or Ignorance, committed even the least sin, with all the speed thou canst hasten to the Throne of Grace; and there thou wilt upon thy true Repentance, find Mercy in the time of need.

9. BE not too liberal in declaring all thou knowest, but rather dissuade thyself, than thy Friend to keep thy own Council: Scoff not at other's Infirmities, but consider and pity thy own, by endeavoring to Rectifie and Reform that in thyself which afterwards thou mayest be capable of performing to others: Prefer not the little Ebullitions of Frothy Obscene Wit before Solid Reason and Judgment: But if thou art disposed to use that freedom in Mirth, confine it within the bounds of Legality, and level it at nothing that is Sacred or Religious; lest we provoke God to anger, and pull down a Judgment for our Profaneness.

10. BE no Contriver of Evil, though it lies in thy power to Act it, for the Almighty will not permit the least sin, without bitter Repantance, to escape unpunished: Omit not any good Duty, neither enter upon any, before thou hast humbly besought God for a Blessing upon thy endeavors in the performance; and whatever thy task and undertaking is, let the Operation be effected, with all Diligence of Alacrity; committing the Event unto him, whose Omnipotence doth Benedict with his Grace, whatsoever Action is intended for his Glory: Be not puffed up by any good performance, for the Judgment of God is far differing from the judgments of Men: Avoid that in thyself, which doth most displease thee in others; and remember that as thou inspects into others, so art thou inspected by Omniscieny, Angels and by Men.

11. EXERCISE thyself as often as thou canst in Religious Duties; and abridge thyself of Worldly Pleasures by entertaining them seldom; That if Death should suddenly Summon thee, thou mayst not be Surprized, but stand ready prepared: Render to every Man the Honor due unto his Function; but Esteem and Venerate him more for his Goodness, than Greatness: And from whom thou hast received a Gratuity, according to thy ability express thy Thankfulness. Be apprehensive of the dreadful Events of Notorious Evil Men, and detest their Wicked Actions: But observe the Life of the Sanctimonious, that thou mayst effectually imitate their Blessed Example, to thy Joy and Comfort: Obey thy Superiors, attend the Prudent, accompany the Just, and love the Religious.

12. IT is evident that Corrupted Nature is prone to Hypocrisy, therefore it behooves us to take heed that we exercise our Religion not merely as Customary, but to those higher ends for which it was designed, as the Glory of God and the Salvation of our Immortal Souls: Be not Rash in thy proceedings, nor Confident and Pertinacious in thy own Opinion; but seek advice of him that is Prudent, and receive Instruction of him whose Judgment exceeds thy own. Petition not for a long Life, but a happy one; for length of days oft times prolongs the Evil, and augments the Guilt: Therefore it would deserve Applause if that little time we had allotted us, were employed to the best advantage.

13. LASTLY, In thy Supplications wait with Patience, and be not dissatisfied if thy Requests are not speedily granted; but search the Scriptures and there thou wilt find, holy Job and others, that far out-stripped thee in Sanctity of Life, did not murmur or repine and charge God foolishly, but on the contrary did resign themselves up to his good Will and Pleasure: An Instance we have in that Pattern of Patience, Job 14.14. All the days of my appointed time will I wait, till my Change comes. He that fixes his Trust in the most High, shall not miscarry; he is neither puffed up in Prosperity, nor cast down in Adversity, but continually fears him, who is his Salvation, and his Refuge.

THE PREFACE

THE Government of the Tongue has ever been justly reputed one of the most important parts of human Regiment. The Philosopher and the Divine equally attest this; and Solomon (who was both) gives his suffrage also; the persuasions to, and encomiums of it taking up a considerable part of his Book of Proverbs. I shall not therefore need to say any thing, to justify my choice of this subject, which has so much better authorities to commend it: I rather wish that it had not the super addition of an accidental fitness grounded upon the universal neglect of it, it now seeming to be an art wholly out-dated. For though some lineaments of it may be met with in Books, yet there is scarce any footsteps of it in practice, where alone it can be significant. The attempt therefore of reviving it I am sure is seasonable, I wish it were half as easy.

2. Indeed that skill was never very easy, it requiring the greatest vigilance and caution, and therefore not to be attained by loose trifling spirits. The Tongue is so slippery, that it easy deceives a drowsy or heedless guard. Nature seems to have given it some unhappy advantage towards that. 'Tis in its frame the most ready for motion of any member, needs not so much as the flexure of a joint, and by access of humors acquires a glibness too, the more to facilitate its moving. And alas, we too much find the effect of this its easy frame: it often goes without giving us warning; and as children, when they happen upon a rolling Engine, can set it in such a carriere, as wiser people cannot on a sudden stop; so the childish parts of us, our passions, our fancies, all our mere animal faculties, can thrust our Tongues into such disorders, as our reason cannot easily rectify. The due managery therefore of this unruly member, may rightly be esteemed one of the greatest mysteries of Wisdom and Virtue. This is intimated by St. James, if any man offend not in word, the same is a perfect man, and able also to bridle the whole body, Ja. 3.2. 'Tis storied of Bembo a primitive Christian, that coming to a friend to teach him a Psalm, he began to him the thirty ninth, I said I will look to my ways, that I offend not with my Tongue; upon hearing of which first verse, he stopped his Tutor, saying, This is enough for me if I learn it as I ought; and being after six months rebuk'd for not coming again, he replied, that he had not yet learned his first Lesson: nay, after nineteen years he professed, that in that time he had scarce learned to fulfill that one line. I give not this instance to discourage, but rather to quicken men to the study, for a lesson that requires so much time to learn, had need be early begun with.

3. But especially in this age, wherein the contrary liberty has got such a prepossession, that men look on it as a part of their birth-right, nay do not only let their Tongues loose, but studiously suggest inordinances to them, and use the spur where they should the bridle. By this means conversation is so generally corrupted, that many have had cause to wish they had not been made sociable creatures. A man secluded from company can have but the Devil and himself to tempt him; but he that converses, has almost as many snares as he has companions. Men barter vices, and as if each had not enough of his own growth, transplant out of his neighbors soil, and that which was intended to cultivate and civilize the world, has turned it into a wild desert and wilderness.

4. This face of things, I confess, looks not very promising to one who is to solicit a reformation. But what ever the hopes are, I am sure the needs are great enough to justify the attempt. For as the Disease is Epidemic, so it is mortal also, utterly inconsistent with that pure Religion, which leads to life. We may take St. James's word for it, If any man seem to be religious, and bridleth not his tongue, that man's religion is vain, James 1.26. God knows we have not much Religion among us: 'tis great pity we should frustrate the little we have, render that utterly insignificant, which at the best amounts to so little. Let therefore the difficulty and necessity of the task, prevail with us to take time before us, not to defer this so necessary a work till the Night come; or imagine that the Tongue will be able to expiate its whole age of guilt by a feeble Lord have mercy on me at the last. Tho indeed if that were supposable, 'twere but a broken reed to trust to, none knowing whether he shall have time or grace for that. He may be surprised with an Oath, a Blasphemy, a Detraction in his mouth: many have been so. 'Tis sure there must be a dying moment; and how can any man secure himself, it shall not be the same with that in which he utters those, and his expiring breath be so employed? Sure they cannot think that those incantations (though hellish enough) can make them shot-free, render them invulnerable to deaths darts; and if they have not that, or some other as ridiculous reserves, 'tis strange what should make them run such a mad adventure.

5. But I expect it should be objected, that this little despicable Tract is not proportionable to the encounter to which it is brought, that besides that unskillful managing of those points it do's touch, it wholly omits many proper to the subject, there being faults of the Tongue which it passes in silence. I confess there is color enough for this objection, but I believe if it were put to votes, more would resolve I had said too much, rather than too little. Should I have enlarged to the utmost compass of this Theme, I should have made the volume of so affrighting a bulk, that few would have attempted it; and by saying much, I should have said nothing at all to those who most need it. Men's stomachs are generally so queasy in these cases, that 'tis not safe to over-load them. Let them try how they can digest this; if they can so as to turn it into kindly nourishment, they will be able to supply themselves with the remainder. For I think I may with some confidence affirm, that he that can confine his Tongue within the limits here prescribed, may without much difficulty restrain its other excursions. All I shall beg of the Reader, is but to come with sincere intentions, and then perhaps these few Stones and Sling used in the name, and with invocation of the Lord of hosts, may countervail the massive armor of the uncircumcised Philistin. And may that God, who loves to magnify his power in weakness, give it the like success.

OF THE Government of the Tongue.

SECT. I. Of the use of Speech.

1. MAN, at his first creation, was substituted by God as his Vicegerent, to receive the homage, and enjoy the services of all inferior Beings: nay farther, was endowed with Excellencies fit to maintain the port of so vast an Empire. Yet those very excellencies, as they qualified him for dominion, so they unfitted him for a satisfaction or acquiescence in those his Vassals: the dignity of his nature set him above the society or converse of mere Animals: so that in all the pomp of his Roialty, amidst all the throng and variety of creatures, he still remained solitary. But God, who knew what an appetite of society he had implanted in him, judged this no agreeable state for him; It is not meet that man should be alone, Gen. 2.18. And as in the universal frame of Nature, he engrafted such an abhorrence of vacuity, that all Creatures do rather submit to a preternatural motion than admit it; so, in this empty, this destitute condition of man, he relieved him by a miraculous expedient, divided him that he might unite him, and made one part of him an associate for the other.

2. NEITHER did God take this care to provide him a companion, merely for the entercourses of Sense: had that been the sole aim, there needed no new productions, there were sensitive Creatures enough: the design was to entertain his nobler principle, his Reason, with a more equal converse, assign him an intimate, whose intellect as much corresponded with his, as did the outward form, whose heart, according to Solomon's resemblance, answered his, As in water face answers face, Prov. 27.19. with whom he might communicate minds, traffic and interchange all the notions and sentiments of a reasonable soul.

3. BUT though there were this sympathy in their sublimer part, which disposed them to the most intimate union; yet there was a cloud of flesh in the way, which intercepted their mutual view, nay permitted no intelligence between them, other than by the mediation of some Organ equally commensurate to soul and body. And to this purpose the infinite wisdom of God ordained Speech; which, as it is a sound resulting from the modulation of the Air, has most affinity to the spirit, but as it is uttered by the Tongue, has immediate cognation with the body, and so is the fittest instrument to manage a commerce between the rational yet invisible powers of human souls clothed in flesh.

4. AND as we have reason to admire the excellency of this contrivance, so have we to applaud the extensiveness of the benefit. From this it is we derive all the advantages of society: without this men of the nearest neighborhood would have signified no more to each other, than our Antipodes now do to us. All our Arts and Sciences for the accommodation of this life, had remained only a rude Chaos in their first matter, had not speech by a mutual comparing of notions ranged them into order. By this it is we can give one another notice of our wants, and solicit relief; by this we interchangeably communicate advises, reproofs, consolations, all the necessary aids of human imbecility. This is that which possesses us of the most valuable blessing of human Life, I mean Friendship, which could no more have been contracted amongst dumb men, than it can between Pictures and Statues. Nay farther, to this we owe in a great degree the interests even of our spiritual being, all the oral, yea and written revelations too of God's will: for had there been no language there had been no writing. And though we must not pronounce how far God might have evidenced himself to mankind by immediate inspiration of every individual, yet we may safely rest in the Apostles inference, Rom. 10.14. How shall they believe in him whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a preacher?

5. FROM all these excellent uses of it in respect of man, we may collect another in relation to God, that is, the praising and manifesting his goodness, as for all other effects of his Bounty, so particularly that he hath given us language, and all the consequent advantages of it. This is the just inference of the son of Sirach, Ecclus. 51.22. The Lord hath given me a tongue, and I will praise them therewith. This is the sacrifice which God calls for so often by the Prophets, the calves of our lips, which answers to all the oblations out of the herd, and which the Apostle makes equivalent to those of the floor and wine-press also, Heb. 13.15. The fruit of our lips, giving thanks to his name. To this we frequently find the Psalmist exciting both himself and others, Awake up my glory, I will give thanks unto thee, O Lord, among the people, and I will sing unto thee among the nations, Psal. 57.9, 10. And O p raise the Lord with me, and let us magnify his name together, Psal. 34.3. And indeed whoever observes that excellent magazine of Devotion, the Book of Psalms, shall find that the Lands make up a very great part of it.

6. BY what hath been said, we may define what are the grand uses of speech, viz. the glorifying of God, and the benefiting of men. And this helps us to an infallible test by which to try our words. For since everything is so far approvable as it answers the end of its being, what part soever of our discourses agrees not with the primitive ends of speech, will not hold weight in the balance of the sanctuary. It will therefore nearly concern us to enter upon this scrutiny, to bring our words to this touch-stone: for though in our depraved estimate the Eloquence of Language is more regarded than the innocence, though we think our words vanish with the breath that utters them, yet they become records in God's Court, are laid up in his Archives as witnesses either for, or against us: for he who is truth itself hath told us, that by thy words thou shalt be justified, and by thy words thou shalt be condemned, Matth. 12.37.

SECT. II. Of the manifold abuse of Speech.

1. AND now since the original designs of speaking are so noble, so advantageous, one would be apt to conclude no rational creature would be tempted to pervert them, since 'tis sure he can substitute none for them, that can equally conduce either to his honor or interest.

2. YET Experience (that great baffler of speculation) assures us the thing is too possible, and brings in all Ages matter of fact to confute our suppositions. So liable alas is speech to be depraved, that the Scripture describes it as the source of all our other depravation. Original sin came first out of the mouth by speaking, before it entered in by eating. The first use we find Eve to have made of her Language, was to enter parly with the temter, and from that to become a temter to her husband. And immediately upon the fall, guilty Adam frames his tongue to a frivolous excuse which was much less able to cover his sin, than the fig-leaves were his nakedness. And as in the infancy of the first world, the tongue had licked up the venem of the old Serpent, so neither could the Deluge wash it off in the second. No sooner was that small colony (wherewith the depopulated Earth was to be replanted) come forth of the Ark, but we meet with Cham a delator to his own father, inviting his brethren to that execrable spectacle of their Parents nakedness.

3. NOR did this only run in the blood of that accursed person; the holy seed was not totally free from its infection, even the Patriarchs themselves were not exemt. Abraham use a repeated collusion in the case of his Wife, and exposed his own Integrity to preserve her Chastity. Isaac the Heir of his blessing, was Son of his Infirmary also, and acted over the same scene upon Rebecca's account. Jacob obtained his Fathers Blessing by a flat lie. Simeon and Levi spake not only falsely, but insidiously, nay hypocritically, abusing at once their Proselytes, and their Religion, for the effecting their cruel designs upon the Sichemites. Moses, though a man of an unparelled meekness, yet spake unadvisedly with his lips, Psal. 106.33. David uttered a bloody Vow against Nabal, spake words smoother then oil to Uriah, when he had don him one injury, and designed him another. 'Twere endless to reckon up those several instances the Old Testament gives us of these lapses of the Tongue: neither want there divers in the new; though there is one of so much horror, as supersedes the naming more, I mean that of St. Peter in his reiterated abjuring his Lord, a crime which (abstracted from the intention) seems worse then that of Judas: that traitor owned his relation, cried Master, Master, even when he betrayed him, so that had he been measured only by his tongue, he might have past for the better Disciple.

4. THESE are sad instances, not recorded to patronize the sin, but to excite our caution. It was a Politic inference of the Elders of Israel in the case of Jehu, Behold two Kings stood not before him, how then shall we stand? 2 Kings 10. And we may well apply it to this; if persons of so circumspect a Piety, have been thus overtaken, what Security can there be for our wretchless oscitancy? If those who kept their mouths as it were with a bridle, Psal. 39.1. could not always preserve them innocent, to what guilts may not our unrestrained licentious Tongues hurry us? Those which, as the Psalmist speaketh, Psalm 73.9. go thro the world, are in that unbounded range very likely to meet with him who walks the same round, Job 2.2. and by him be tuned and set to his key, be scrued and wrested from their proper use, and made subservient to his vilest designs.

5. AND would God this were only a probable supposition! but alas, experience supplants the use of conjecture in the point: we do not only presume it may be so, but actually find it is so. For amidst the universal deprivation of our Faculties, there is none more notorious then that of Speech. Whither shall we turn us to find it in its pristine integrity? Amidst that infinity of words in which we exhaust our breath, how few are there which do at all correspond with the original designation of speech; nay, which do not flatly contradict it? To what unholy, uncharitable purposes is that useful faculty perverted? That which was meant to serve as the perfume of the Tabernacle, to send up the Incenses of Praises and Prayers, now exhales in impious vapors, to eclipse if it were possible the Father of Light, That which should be the storehouse of relief and refreshment to our brethren, is become a magazine of all offensive weapons against them, spears, and arrows, and sharp swords, as the Psalmist often phrases it. We do not only fall by the slipperiness of our Tongues, but we deliberately dicipline and train them to mischief. We bend our tongues as our bows for lies, as the Prophet speaks, Jer. 9.3. And in a word, what God affirmed in the old World in relation to thoughts, is too applicable to our words, they are evil, and that continually, Gen. 6.5. and that which was intended for the instrument, the aid of human society, is become the disturber, the pest of it.

6. I shall not attempt a particular discussion of all the vices of the Tongue: it doth indeed pass all Geography to draw an exact Map of that World of iniquity, as St. James calls it. I shall only draw the greater lines, & distribute it into its principal and more eminent parts, which are distinguishable as they relate to God, our Neighbor, and ourselves; in each of which I shall rather make an Essay by way of instance, then attempt an exact enumeration or survey.

SECT. III. Of Atheistical Discourse.

1. I Begin with those which relate to God; this poor despicable member the Tongue, being of such a gigantic insolence, though not size, as even to make war with Heaven. 'Tis true, every disordered speech doth remotely so, as it is a violation of God's Law; but I now speak only of those which as it were attaque his person, and immediately fly in the face of Omnipotency. In the highest rank of these we may well place all Atheistical Discourse, which is that bold sort of rebellion, which strikes not only at his authority, but himself. Other blasphemies level some at one Attribute, some another; but this by a more compendious impiety, shoots at his very being, and as if it scorned those piece meal guilts, sets up a single monster big enough to devour them all: for all inferior profaneness is as much out-dared by Atheism, as is Religion itself.

2. TIME was, when the inveighing against this, would have been thought a very impertinent subject in a Christian nation, and men would have replied upon me as the Spartan Lady did, when she was asked what was the punishment for Adulteresses, There are no such things here. Nay even amongst the most barbarous people, it could have concerned but some few single persons; no numbers, much less societies of men, having ever excluded the belief of a Diety. And perhaps it may at this day concern them as little as ever; for amidst the various Deities and Worship of those remoter Nations, we have yet no account of any that renounce all. 'Tis only our light hath so blinded us: so that God may upbraid us as he did Israel, Hath a nation changed their God's which yet are no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit, Jer. 2.11. This madness is now the inclosure, the peculiarity of those who by their names & institutions should be Christians: as if that natural Aphorism, that when things are at a height they must fall again, had place here also, and our being of the most excellent, most elevated Religion, were but the preparative to our being of none.

3. 'TIS indeed deplorable to see, how the Professors of no God begin to vie numbers with all the differing persuasions in Religion, so that Atheism seems to be the gulf that finally swallows up all our sects. It has struck on a sudden into such a reputation, that it scorns any longer to skulk, but owns itself more publicly than most men dare do the contrary. 'Tis set down in the seat of the scorner, & since it cannot argue, resolves to laugh all Piety out of countenance; and having seized the mint, nothing shall pass for wit that hath not its stamp, and with it there is no metal of so base an alloy, but shall go current. Every the dullest creature that can but stoutly disclaim his Maker, has by it sufficiently secured its title to Ingenuity; and such measures being once established, no wonder at its sholes of proselytes, when it gives on the one hand license to all sensual inordinances, permits them to be as much beasts as they will, or can; and yet tells them on the other, that they are the more men for it. Sure 'tis not strange that a hook thus doubly baited should catch many. Either of those allurements single, we see has force enough. The charms of sensuality are so fascinating, that even those who believe another world, and the severe revenges that will there attend their Luxuries, yet choose to take them in present with all the dismal reversions. And then sure it cannot but be very good news to such a one to be told, that that after-reckoning is but a false alarm; and his great willingness to have it true, will easily incline him to believe it is so. And doubtless were Atheism traced up to its first causes, this would be found the most operative; 'tis so convenient for a man that will have no God to control or restrain him, to have none to punish him neither; that that utility passes into argument, and he will rather put a cheat upon his understanding, by concluding there is no future account, then leave such a sting in his pleasures, as the remembrance of it must needs prove. This seems to be the original and first rise of this impiety, it being impossible for any man that sees the whole, nay but the smallest part of the Universe, to doubt of a first and supreme Being, until from the consciousness of his provocations, it becomes his interest there should be none.

4. THIS is indeed, considering the depravation of the world, a pretty fast tenure for Atheism to hold by; yet it has of late twisted its cord, and got that other string to its bow we before mentioned. Its bold monopolizing of wit and reason compels, as the other invited men. This we may indeed call the Devils press, by which he hath filled up his Troops: men are afraid for being reproached for silly and irrational, in giving themselves up to a blind belief of what they do not see. And this bugbear frights them from their religion; resolving they will be no fools for Christ's sake, 1 Cor. 4.13. I dare appeal to the breasts of many in this age, whether this have not been one of the most prevalent temptations with them to espouse the tenet: and though perhaps they at first took it up, only in their own defense, for fear of being thought fools, yet that fear soon converts into ambition of being thought Wits. They do not satisfy themselves with deserting their Religion, unless they revile it also; remembering how themselves were laughed out of it, they essay to do the like by others. Yea so zealous propugners are they of their negative Creed, that they are importunately diligent to instruct men in it, and in all the little sophistries and colors for defending it: so that he that would measure the Opinions by their industry, and the remissness of Believers, would certainly think that the great interest of Eternity lay wholly on their side. Yet I take not this for any argument of the confidence of this persuasion, but the contrary: for we know they are not the secure, but the desperate undertakings, wherein men are most desirous of partners, and there is somewhat of horror in an uncouth way, which makes men unwilling to travel it alone.

5. THE truth is, though these men speak big, and prescribe as positively to their pupils, as if they had some counter revelation to confute those of Moses and Christ; yet were their secret thoughts laid open, there would scarce be found the like assurance there. I will not say to what reprobate sense some particular persons may have provoked God to deliver them, but in the generality, I believe one may affirm, that there is seldom an infidelity so sanguine as to exclude all fears. Their most bold Thesis, That there is no God, no Judgment, no Hell, is often met with an inward tremulous Hypothesis, What if there be? I dare in this remit me to themselves, and challenge (not their consciences, who profess to have none, but) their natural Ingenuity to say, whether they have not sometimes such damps and shiverings within them. If they shall say, that these are but the relics of prepossession and education, which their reason soon dissipates, Let me then ask them farther, whether they would not give a considerable sum to be infallibly ascertained there were no such thing: now no sensible man would give a farthing to be secured from a thing which his reason tells him is impossible; therefore if they would give anything (as I dare say they themselves cannot deny that they would) 'tis a tacit demonstration, that they are not so sure as they pretend to be.

6. I might here join issue upon the whole, and press them with the unreasonableness, the disingenuousness of embracing a Profession to which their own hearts have an inward reluctance, nay the imprudence of governing their lives by that position, which for ought they know may be (nay they actually fear is) false, and if it be, must inevitably immerse them in endless ruin. But I must remember my design limits me only to the faults of the Tongue, and therefore I must not follow this chase beyond those bounds. I shall only extend it to my proper subject, that of Atheistical talk, wherein they make as mad an adventure as in any other of their enormous practices, nay perhaps in some respects a worse.

7. IN the first place 'tis to be considered, that if there be a God, he, as well as men, may be provoked by our words as well as deeds. Secondly, 'tis possible he may be more. Our ill deeds may be don upon a vehement impulse of temptation; some profit or pleasures may transport and hurry us; and they may at least have this alleviation, that we did them to please or advantage ourselves, not to spite God. But Atheistical words cannot be so palliated: they are arrows directly shot against Heaven, and can come out of no quiver but malice: for 'tis certain there never was man that said, There was no God, but he wished it first. We know what an enhancement our injuries to each other receive from their being malicious: and sure they will do so much more to God, whose principal demand from us is, that we give him our heart. But thirdly, This implieth a malice of the highest sort. Human spite is usually confined within some bounds, aims sometimes at the goods, sometimes at the fame, at most but at the life of our Neighbor: but here is an accumulation of all those, backed with the most prodigious insolence. 'Tis God only that has power of annihilation, and we (vile Worms) seek here to steal that incommunicable right, and retort it upon Himself, and by an anticreative power, would unmake Him who has made us. Nay lastly, by this we have not only the utmost guilt of single rebels, but we become ring-leaders also, draw in others to that accursed association: for 'tis only this liberty of Discourse that hath propagated Atheism. The Devil might perhaps by inward suggestions have drawn in here and there a single Proselyte; but he could never have had such numbers, had he not used some as decoies to ensnare others.

8. AND now let the brisk Atheist a little consider, what these aggravations will amount to. 'Twas good counsel was given to the Athenians, to be very sure Philip was dead, before they expressed their joy at his death, lest they might find him alive to revenge that hasty triumph. And the like I may give to these men, Let them be very sure there is no God, before they presume thus to defy him, lest they find him at last assert his being in their destruction. Certainly nothing less then a demonstration can justify the reasonableness of such a daring. And when they can produce that, they have so far outgon all the comprehensions of mankind, they may well challenge the liberty of their Tongue, and say, They are their own, who is Lord over them, Psalm 12.4.

6. BUT 'till this be don, 'twere well they would soberly balance the hazards of this liberty with the gains of it. The hazards are of the most dreadful kind, the gains of the slightest: the most is but a vain applause of wit, for an impious jest, or of reason for a deep considerer: and yet even for that they must encroach on the Devils right too, who is commonly the promter, and therefore if there be any credit in it may justly challenge it. Indeed 'tis to be feared he will at last prove the master wit, when as for those little loans he makes them, he gets their souls in morgage. Would God they would consider betimes, what a woeful raillery that will be, which for ought they know may end in gnashing of teeth.

10. THE next impiety of the Tongue, is Swearing, that foolish sin, which plays the Platonic to damnation, and courts it purely for itself; without any of the appendant allurements which other sins have: a vice, which for its guilt, may justify the sharpest; and for its customariness, the frequentest invectives which can be made against it. But it has been assaulted so often by better Pens, and has shown itself so much proof against all Homily, that it is as needless as di•couraging a task for me to attempt it. 'Tis indeed a thing taken up so perfectly without all sense, that 'tis the less wonder to find it maintain its self upon the same Principle 'tis founded, and continue in the same defiance to Reason wherein it began.

11. ALL therefore that I shall say concerning it, is to express my wonder, how it has made a shift to twist itself with the former sin of Atheism, by which, according to all rules of reasoning it seems to be superseded: and yet we see none own God more in their oaths, then those that disavow him in their other discourse. Nay, such men swear not only to swell their Language, and make it sound more full and blustering, but even when they most desire to be believed. What an absurdity of wickedness is this? Is there a God to swear by, and is there none to believe in, none to pray to? We call it frenzy to see a man fight with a shadow: but sure 'tis more so, to invoke it. Why then do these men of reason make such solemn appeals (for such every Oath is) to a mere Chimera and Phantasm? It would make one think they had some inward belief of a Deity, which they upon surprisal thus blurt out: if it argue not this, it does something worse, and becomes an evidence how much the appearance of a sin recommends it to them, that they thus catch at it, without examining how it will consist with another they like better. These are indeed wholesale chapmen to Satan, that do not truck and barter one crime for another, but take the whole herd: and though by reason of their disagreeing kinds they are apt to gore and worry each other, yet he still keeps up his old policy, and will not let one Devil cast out another. A league shall be made between the most discordant sins, and there shall be God, or there shall be none, according as opportunity serves to provoke him: so assuming to himself a power which even Omnipotence disclaims, the reconciling contradictions. And he succeeds it in as far as his concerns reaches: for though he cannot solve the repugnancies in reason, yet as long as he can unite the sins in men's practice, he has his design; nay, has at once the gain and the sport of fooling these great pretenders to ratiocination.

12. A third sort of impious discourse there is, which yet is bottomed on the most sacred, I mean those profane paraphrases that are usually made upon the Holy Text, many making it the subject of their cavils, and others of their mirth. Some do it out of the former Atheistical principle, and I cannot but confess they act consonantly to themselves in it, for 'tis but a needful artifice for men to disparage those testimonies, which they fear may be brought against them. But there are others who not only profess a God, but also own the sacred Scripture for his word, and yet use it as coarsely as the others. And these I confess, are riddles of profaneness, that hang, as some have pictured Solomon between Heaven and Hell, borrow the Christian Faith, and the Atheists drollery upon it: and 'tis hard to say in which they are more in earnest. It is indeed scandalous to see, to what despicable uses those holy Oracles are put: such as should a Heathen observe, he would little suspect them to be owned by us as the rule of our Religion, and could never think they were ever meant for anything beyond a whet-stone for wit. One tries his Logic upon them, and objects to the sense; another his Rhetoric, and quarrels at the phrase; a third his contrivance, and thinks he could have woven the parts with a better contexture: never considering, that unless they could confute the Divinity of their original, all these accusations are nothing else but direct blasphemy, the making God such a one as themselves, Psal. 50.21. and charging him with those defects which are indeed their own. They want learning or industry to sound the depth of those sacred treasures, and therefore they decry the Scripture as mean and poor; and to justify their own wisdom, dispute God's. This is as if the mole should complain the Sun is dark, because he dwells under ground, and sees not his splendor. Men are indeed in all instances apt to speak ill of all things they understand not, but in none more than this. Their ignorance of local Customs, Idioms of Language, and several other circumstances, renders them incompetent Judges (as has been excellently evinced by a late Author.) Twill therefore befit them, either to qualify themselves better, or to spare their Criticisms. But upon the whole, I think I may challenge any ingenious man, to produce any Writing of that antiquity, whose phrase and genius is so accommodated to all successions of Ages. Stiles and ways of address we know grow obsolete, and are almost antiquated as garments: and yet after so long a tract of time, the Scripture must (by considering men) be confessed to speak not only properly, but often politely and elegantly to the present age: a great argument that it is the dictate of him that is, The same yesterday, today, and forever, Heb. 13.7.

13. BUT besides these more solemn Traducers, there are a lighter ludicrous sort of Profaners, who use the Scripture as they do odd ends of Plaies, to furnish out their Jest; clothe all their little impertinent conceits in its Language, and debase it by the mixture of such miserable trifles, as themselves would be ashamed of, were they not heightened and inspirited by that profaneness. A Bible phrase serves them in discourse as the haut-goust do's in diet, to give a relish to the most insipid stuff. And were it not for this Magazine, a great many men's raillery would want supplies: for there are divers who make a great noise of wit, that would be very mute if this one Topic were bar'd them. And indeed it seems a tacit confession, that they have little of their own, when they are fain thus to commit sacriledg to drive on the Trade. But sure 'tis a pitiful pretence to Ingenuity that can be thus kept up, there being little need of any other faculty but memory to be able to cap Texts. I am sure such repetitions out of other books would be thought pedantic and silly. How ridiculous would a man be, that should always enter lard his discourse with fragments of Horace, or Virgil, or the Aphorisms of Pythagoras, or Seneca? Now 'tis too evident, that it is not from any speculative esteem of sacred Writ, that it is so often quoted: and why should it then be thought a specimen of wit to do it there, when 'tis folly in other instances? The truth is, 'tis so much the reserve of those who can give no better testimony of their parts, that methinks upon that very score it should be given over by those that can. And sure were it possible for anything that is so bad to grow unfashionable, the world has had enough of this to be cloied with it: but how fond soever men are of this divertisement, 'twill finally prove that mirth Solomon speaks of, which ends in heaviness, Prov. 14.13. for certainly whether we estimate it according to human or divine measures, it must be a high provocation of God.

14. LET any of us but put the case in our own persons: suppose we had written to friend, to advertise him of things of the greatest importance to himself, had given him ample and exact instructions, backed them with earnest exhortations and conjurings not to neglect his own concern; and lastly, enforced all with the most moving expressions of kindness and tenderness to him: suppose, I say, that after all this, the next news we should hear of that letter, were to have it put in doggrel rime, to be made sport for the rabble, or at the best have the most eminent phrases of it picked out and made a common by-word: I would fain know how any of us would resent such a mixture of ingratitude and contumely. I think I need make no minute application. The whole design of the Bible do's sufficiently answer, nay outgo the first part of the parallel, and God knows our vile usage of it do's too much (I fear too literally) adapt the latter. And if we think the affront to base for one of us, can we believe God will take it in good part? That were to make him not only more stupid then any man, but as much so as the heathen Idols, that have eyes and see not, Psalm 115.5. And 'tis sure, the highest madness in the world, for any man that believes that there is a God, to imagine he will finally sit down by such usage.

15. BUT if we weigh it in the scale of religion; the crime will yet appear more heinous. Mere natural Piety has taught men to receive the Responses of their God's with all possible veneration. What applications had the Delphic Oracle from all parts, and from all ranks of men? What confidence had they in its prediction, and what obedience did they pay to its advice? If we look next into the Mosaical Economy, we shall see with what dreadful Solemnities that Law was promulged, what an awful reverence was paid to the Mount whence it issued, how it was fenced from any rude intrusions either of Men or Beasts: and after it was written in Tables, all the whole equipage of the Tabernacle, was designed only for its more decent Repository, the Ark itself receiving its value only from what it had in custody. Yea such a hallowing influence had it, as transfused a relative sanctity even to the meanest Utensils, none of which were after to be put to common uses: the very Perfume was so peculiar and sacred, that it was a capital crime to imitate the composition. Afterwards, when more of the Divine Revelations were commieted to Writing, the Jews were such scrupulous reverers of it, that 'twas the business of the Masorites, to number not only the Sections and Lines, but even the words and letters of the Old Testament, that by that exact calculation they might the better secure it from any surreptitious practices.

19. AND sure the New Testament is not of less concern then the Old: nay the Apostle asserts it to be of far greater, and which we shall be more accountable for, For if the word spoken by

Angels were steadfast, and every transgression and disobedience received a just recompense, how shall we escape if we neglect so great salvation, which at the first began to be spoken to us by the Lord, and was confirmed unto us by them that heard him? Heb. 2.23. And it is in another place the inference of the same Apostle, from the excellency of the Gospel above the Law, that we should serve God acceptably with reverence and godly fear, Heb. 12.28. And certainly 'tis but an ill essay of that reverence and godly fear, to use that very Gospel so irreverently and ungodly as men now do. If we pass from the Apostolic to the next succeeding ages of the Church, we find the Primitive Christians looked on their Bibles as their most important treasure. Such was the outward respects they paid to them, (of which the standing up at the reading of the Gospel, still in use among us, is a faint memorial) that the Heathen Persecutors made it one part of their examination of the Christians brought to their Tribunals, What those Books were which they adored while they read them? Such was their intimate esteem, that they exposed all things else to the rapine of their Enemies, so they might secure those Volumes. Nor was this only a heroic piece of zeal in some, but indispensably required of all: insomuch, that when in the heat of Persecution, they were commanded to deliver up their Bibles to be burnt, the Church gave no indulgence for that necessity of the Times, but exhorted men rather to deliver up their lives: and those whose courage failed them in the encounter, were not only branded by the infamous name of Traditors, but separated from the communion of the Faithful, and not readmitted till after many years of the severest penance.

17. I have given this brief narration, with a desire, that the Reader will compare the practice of former Times with those of the present, and see what he can find either among Heathens, Jews, or Christians, that can at all patronize our profaneness. There was no respect thought too much for the false Oracles of a falser God: and yet we think no contents too great for those of the true. The Moral Law was so sacred to the Jews, that no parts of its remotest retinue, those ceremonial attendants, were to be looked on as common: and we who are equally obliged by that Law, laugh at that by which we must one day be judged. The Ritual, the Preceptive, the Prophetic, and all other parts of sacred Writ, were most sedulously, most religiously guarded by them: and we look upon them as a Winter nights tale, from which to fetch matter of sport and merriment. Lastly, the first Christians paid a veneration to, nay sacrificed their Lives to rescue their Bibles from the unworthy usage of the Heathens, and we ourselves expose them to worse: they would but have burnt them; we scorn and vilify them, and outvy even the Persecutors malice with our contempt. These are miserable Antithesis's; yet this God knows is the case with too many. I wonder what new state of Felicity hereafter these men have fancied to themselves: for sure they cannot think these retrograde steps can ever bring them so much as to the Heathens Elyzium, much less the Christians Heaven.

18. IT will therefore concern those who do not quite renounce their claim to that Heaven, to consider soberly, how inconsistent their practice is with those hopes. A man may have a great Estate conveyed to him; but if he will madly burn, or childishly make paper Kites of his Deeds, he forfeits his Title with his Evidence: and those certainly that deal so with the Conveiances of their Eternal Inheritance. will not speed better. If they will thus dally and play with them, God will be as little in earnest in the performance, as they are in the reception of the promises; nay he will take his turn of mocking too, and when their scene of mirth is over, his will begin. A dreadful menace of this we have, Prov. 1.24. which deserves to be set down at large, Because I have called, and ye refused, I have stretched out my hand▪ and no man regarded: But ye have set at nought all my counsel, and would none of my reproof, I also will laugh at your calamity, I will mock when your fear cometh. When your fear cometh as desolation, and your destruction cometh as a whirlwind: when distress and anguish cometh upon you, then shall they call upon me, but I will not answer, they shall seek me early, but they shall not find me. Would God I could as well transcribe this Text into men's hearts, and there would need no more to secure the whole Canon of Scripture from their profanation. Could men but look a little before them, and apprehend how in the days of their distress and agony, they will gasp for those comforts which they now turn into ridicule; they would not thus madly defeat themselves, cut off their best and only reserve, and with a pitiful contempt cast away those Cordials, which will then be the only support of their fainting spirits. As for those who deride Scripture upon Atheistical grounds, all I shall say, is, to refer to what I have said in the beginning of this Section; they had need be very well assured that foundation be not sandy: for if it be, this reproaching God's Word will be a considerable addition to the guilt of all their other hostility, and how jolly soever they seem at present, it may be when that question they are so willing to take for granted, is by death drawing near a decision, some of their confidence will retire, and leave them in an amazed expectation of somewhat, which they are sure cannot be good for them, who have so ill provided for it. Then perhaps their merry vein will fail them, and not their infidelity, but their despair may keep them from invoking that Power they have so long derided. 'Tis certain it has so happened with some: for as Practical, so Speculative wickedness, has usually another aspect, when it stands in the shadow of death, then in the dazzling beams of health and vigor. It would therefore be wisdom beforehand to draw it out of this deceitful light, and by sober serious thoughts place it as near as may be in those circumstances in which 'twill then appear: and then sure to hearts that are not wholly petrified, 'twill seem safer to own a God early and upon choice, then late upon compulsion.

19. HOWEVER, if they will not yield themselves Homagers, yet the mere possibility of their being in the wrong, should methinks persuade them at least to be civil adversaries. A generous man will not pursue even a falling enemy with revilings and reproach, much less will a wise man do it to one who is in any the lest probability of revenging it: it being a received Maxim, That there is no greater folly, then for a man to let his tongue betray him to mischief. Let it therefore in this case at least stand neuter, that if by their words they be not justified, yet by their words they may not be condemned. They can be no losers by it: for at the utmost, 'tis but keeping in a little unsavory breath, which (supposing no God to be offended with it) is yet nauseous to all those men who believe there is one. To those indeed who have a zeal for their Faith, there can be no Discourse so intolerable, so disobliging: it turns conversation into skirmishing, and perpetual disputes. The Egyptians were so zealous for their brutish Deities, that Moses presumed the Israelites sacrificing of those Beasts they adored, must needs set them in an uproar, Exod. 8.26. And sure, those who do acknowledge a Divine Power, cannot contentedly sit by to hear him blasphemed. 'Tis true, there are some so cool, that, they are of the same mind for God, that Gideon's father was for Baal, Judge. 6.31. Let him plead for himself, they will not appear in his defense: yet even these have a secret consciousness that they ought to do so, and therefore have some uneasiness in being put to the Test: so that it cannot be a pleasant entertainment even for them. And therefore those who have no fear of God to restrain them, should methinks, unless they be perfectly of the temper of the unjust Judge, Luke 17.1. in respect of men, abstain from all sorts of impious discourse; and at least be civil, though they will not be pious.

SECT. IV. Of Detraction.

WE have seen in the last Section, the insolence of the Tongue towards God; and sure we cannot expect it should pay more reverence to men. If there be those that dare stretch their mouths against Heaven, Psalm 7.39. we are not to wonder if there be more that will shoot their arrows, even bitter words, against the best on Earth, Psalm 64.3. I shall not attempt to ransack the whole quiver, by showing every particular sort of verbal injuries which relate to our neighbors, but rather choose out some few which either for the extraordinariness of their guilt, or the frequency of their practice are the most eminent. I begin with Detraction, in which both those qualities concur: for as in some instances 'tis one of the highest sins, so in the general 'tis certainly one of the most common, and by being so becomes insensible. This vice (above all others) seems to have maintained not only its Empire, but its reputation too. Men are not yet convinced heartily that it is a sin: or if any, not of so deep a die, or so wide an extent as indeed it is. They have, if not false, yet imperfect notions of it, and by not knowing how far its Circle reaches, do often like young Conjurers, step beyond the limits of their safety.

THIS I am the apter to believe, because I see some degree of this fault cleave to those, who have eminently corrected all other exorbitancies of the Tongue. Many who would startle at an Oath, whose stomachs as well as consciences recoil at an obscenity, do yet slide glibly into a Detraction: which yet methinks, persons otherwise of strict conversations should not do frequently and habitually, had not their easy thoughts of the guilt smoothed the way to it.

IT may therefore be no unkind attempt, to try to dis-entangle from this snare by displaying it; showing the whole contexture of the sin, how 'tis woven with threads of different sizes, yet the least of them strong enough to nooz and entrap us. And alas, if Satan fetter us, 'tis indifferent to him whether it be by a cable or a hair. Nay, perhaps the smallest sins are his greatest stratagems. The finer his line is spun, the less shadow it casts, and is less apt to fright us from the hook: and though there be much odds between a talent of lead and a grain of sand, yet those grains may be accumulated till they out-weigh the talent. It was a good reply of Plato's, to one who murmured at his reproving him for a small matter, Custom, says he, is no small matter. And indeed, supposing any sin were so small as we are willing to fancy most, yet an indulgent habit, even of that, would be certainly ruinous: that Indulgence being perfectly opposite to the love of God, which better can consist with the indeliberate commissions of many sins, than with an allowed persistence in any one.

BUT in this matter of Detraction, I cannot yield that any is small, save only comparatively with some other of the same kind which is greater: for absolutely considered, there is even in the very lowest degrees of it, a flat contradiction to the grand rule of Charity, the loving our Neighbor as ourselves. And surely, that which at once violates the sum of the whole second Table of the Law, for so our Savior renders it, Luke 10.7. must be looked on as no trifling inconsiderable guilt. To evidence this, I shall in the Anatomizing this sin, apply this Rule to every part of it: first consider it in gross, in its entire body, and after descend to its several limbs.

1. DETRACTION in the native importance of the word, signifies the withdrawing or taking off from a thing: and as it is applied to the reputation, it denotes the impairing or lessening a man in point of fame, rendering him less valued and esteemed by others, which is the final aim of Detraction, though pursued by various means.

2. THIS is justly looked on as one of the most unkind designs one man can have upon another, there being implanted in every man's nature a great tenderness of Reputation: and to be careless of it, is looked on as a mark of a degenerate mind. On which account Solon in his laws presumes, that he that will sell his own fame, will also sell the public interest. 'Tis true, many have improved this too far, blown up this native spark into such flames of Ambition, as has set the World in a combustion; Such as Alexander, Caesar, and others, who sacrificed Hecatombs to their Fame, fed it up to a prodigy upon a Canibal diet, the flesh of men: yet even these Excesses serve to evince the universal consent of mankind, that Reputation is a valuable and desirable thing.

3. NOR have we only the suffrage of man, but the attestation of God himself, who frequently in Scripture gives testimony to it: A good name is better than great riches, Prov. 22.1. And again, A good name is better than precious ointment, Eccles. 7.1. And the more to recommend it, he proposes it as a reward to Piety and Virtue, as he menaces the contrary to wickedness. The memory of the just shall be blessed, but the name of the wicked shall rot, Prov. 10.7. And that we may not think this an invitation fitted only to the Jewish Economy, the Apostle goes farther, and proposes the endeavor after it as a duty, Whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if there be any praise, think on these things, Phil. 4.8.

4. AND accordingly good men have in their estimate ranked their names the next degree to their Souls, prefer'd them before Goods or Life. Indeed 'tis that which gives us an inferior sort of Immortality, and makes us even in this world survive ourselves. This part of us alone continues verdant in the grave, and yields a perfume, when we are stench and rottenness: the consideration whereof has so prevailed with the more generous Heathens, that they have cheerfully quitted life in contemplation of it. Thus Epaminondas alaciously expired, in confidence that he left behind him a perpetual memory of the Victories he had achieved for his Country. Brutus so courted the fame of a Patriot, that he brake through all the obstacles of gratitude and humanity to attempt it: he cheerfully bare the defeat of his attempt, in contemplation of the glory of it. 'Twere endless to recount the stories of the Codri, Decii, and Curtii, with the train of those noble Heroes, who in behalf of their Countries devoted themselves to certain death.

5. BUT we need no Foreign Mediums to discover the value of a good name: let every man weigh it but in his own Scales, retire to his Breast, and there reflect on that impatience he has when his own Repute is invaded. To what dangers, to what guilts does sometimes the mere fancy of a reproach hurry men? It makes them really forfeit that Virtue from whence all true Reputation springs; and, like Esops Dog, lose the substance by too greedy catching at the shadow; an irrefragable proof how great a price they set upon their Fame.

6. AND then, since Reason sets it at so high a rate, and Passion at a higher, we we may conclude the violating this interest, one of the greatest injuries in Human commerce; such as is resented not only by the rash, but the sober; so that we must pick out only blocks and stones, the stupid and insensible part of mankind, if we think we can inflict this wound without an afflictive smart. And though the power of Christianity does in some so moderate this resentment, that none of these blows shall recoil, no degree of revenge be attempted; yet that does not at all justify or excuse the inflicter. It may indeed be a useful trial of the patience and meekness of the defamed, yet the defamer has not the less either of crime or danger: not of crime, for that is rather enhanced then abated by the goodness of the person injured; nor of danger, since God is the more immediate avenger of those who attempt not to be their own. But if the injury meet not with this meekness (as in this vindictive Age 'tis manifold odds it will not) it then acquires another accumulative guilt, stands answerable not only for its own positive ill, but for all the accidental which it causes in the sufferer, who by this means is robbed not only of his repute, but his innocence also, provoked to those unchristian returns, which draw God also into the enmity, and set him at once at war with Heaven and Earth. And though as to this immediate judgment, he must bear his iniquity, answer for his impatience: yet as in all civil Insurrections, the ring-leader is looked on with a peculiar severity, so doubtless in this case, the first provoker has by his seniority and primogeniture a double portion of the guilt, and may consequently expect of the punishment, according to the doom of our Savior, Woe be to that man by whom the offense cometh, Matth. 28.7.

8. INDEED there is such a train of mischiefs usually follow this sin, that 'tis scarce possible to make a full estimate of its malignity. 'Tis one of the grand Incendiaries which disturbs the peace of the world, and has a great share in most of its quarrels. For could we examine all the feuds which harrass Persons, Families, nay sometimes Nations too, we should find the greater part take their rise from injurious reprochful words, and that for one which is commenced upon the intuition of any real considerable interest, there are many which owe their being to this licentiousness of the Tongue.

9. IN regard therefore of its proper guilt, and all those remoter sins and miseries which ensue it, 'tis every man's great concern to watch over himself. Neither is it less in respect both of that universal aptness we have to this sin, and its being so perpetually at hand; that for others we must attend occasions and convenient seasons, but the opportunities of this are always ready: I can do my neighbor this injury, when I can do him no other. Besides the multitude of objects do proportionably multiply both the possibilities and incitations; and the objects here are as numerous, as there are Persons in the World I either know, or have heard of. For though some sorts of Detractions seem confined to those to whom we bear particular malice, yet there are other kinds of it more raging, which fly indifferently at all. Lastly, this sin has the aid almost of universal example, which is an advantage beyond all the others, there being scarce any so irresistable insinuation as the practice of those with whom we converse, and no subject of converse so common as the defaming our Neighbors.

10. SINCE then the path is so slippery, it had not need be dark too. Let us then take in the best light we can, and attentively view this sin in its several branches, that by a distinct discovery of the divers acts and degrees of it, we may the better be armed against them all.

SECT. V. Of Lying Defamation.

1. DETRACTION being (as we have already said) the lessning and impairing a man in his repute, we may resolve, that what ever conduces to that end, is properly a Detraction. I shall begin with that which is most eminent, the spreading of Defamatory Reports. These may be of two kinds, either false, or true; which though they seem to be of very different complexions, yet may spring from the same stock, and drive at the same design. Let us first consider of the false.

2. AND this admits of various circumstances. Somtimes a man invents a perfect falsity of another: sometimes he that does not invent it, yet reports it, though he know it to be false: and a third sort there are, who having not certain knowledge whether it be false or no, do yet divulge it as an absolute certainty, or at least with such artificial Insinuations, as may biass the hearer on that hand. The former of these is a crime of so high, so dis-ingenious a nature, that though many are vile enough to commit it, none are so impudent as to avow it. Even in this age of insulting Vice, when almost all other wickedness appears bare-fac'd, this is fain to keep on the vizard. No man will own himself a false accuser: for if modesty do not restrain him, yet his very malice will; since to confess would be but to defeat his design. Indeed it is of all other sins the most Diabolical, it being a conjunction of two of Satan's most essential properties, Malice and Lying. We know 'tis his peculiar title to be the Accuser of the brethren: and when we transcribe his copy, we also assume his nature, entitle ourselves to a descent from him, Ye are of your father the Devil, Joh. 8.44. We are by it rendered a sort of Iacubus brats, the inf•mous Progenies of the Lying spirit. It is indeed a sin of so gross, so formidable a bulk, that there needs no help of Optics to render it discernible, and therefore I need not farther expatiate on it.

3. The next degree is not much short of it; what it wants is rather of invention than malice: for he that will so adopt another's lie, shows he would willingly have been its proper father. It does indeed differ no more then the maker of adulterate wares, does from the vender of them: and certainly there cannot be a more ignominious Trade, then the being Hucksters to such vile Merchandize. Neither is the sin less then the baseness: we find the Lover of a lie ranked in an equal form of guilt with the Maker, Rev. 21. And surely he must be presumed to love it, that can descend to be the broker of it, help it to pass current in the World.

4. THE third sort of Detractors look a little more demurely, and with the Woman in the Proverbs. chap. 30. wipe their mouths, and say they have don no wickedness. They do not certainly know the falsity of what they report, and their ignorance must serve them as an Amulet against the guilt both of deceit and malice: but I fear it will do neither. For first, perhaps they are affectedly ignorant: they are so willing it should be true, that they have not attempted to examine it. But secondly, it does not suffice that I do not know the falsity; for to make me a true speaker, 'tis necessary I know the truth of what I affirm. Nay, if the thing were never so true, yet if I knew it not to be so, its truth will not secure me from being a liar: and therefore whoever endeavors to have that received for a certainty, which himself knows not to be so, offends against truth. The utmost that can consist with sincerity, is to represent it to others as doubtful as it appears to him. Yet even that how consonant soever to truth, is not to charity. Even doubtful accusations leave a stain behind them, & often prove indelible injuries to the party accused: how much more then do the more positive and confident aspersions we have hitherto spoken of? Let me add only this concerning this latter sort, that they are greater advancers of defamatory designs, then the very first contrivers. For those upon a consciousness of their falseness, are obliged to proceed cautiously, to pick out the credulous and least discerning persons, on whom to impose their fictions, and dare not produce them in all companies for fear of detection: but these in confidence that the untruth (if it be one) lies not at their door, speak it without any restraint in all places, at all times; and what the others are fain to whisper, they proclaim; like our new Engine, which pretends to convey a whisper many miles off. So that as in the case of Stealing 'tis proverbially said, that if there were no receivers there would be no thieves; so in this of Slander, if there were fewer spreaders, there would be fewer forgers of Libels: the manufacture would be discouraged, if it had not these retailers to put off the wares.

5. Now to apply these practices to our rule of Duty, there will need no very close inspection to discern the obliquity. The most superficial glance will evidence these several degrees of Slanderers to do what they would not be willing to suffer. Who among them can be content to be falsely aspersed? Nay, so far are they from that, that let but the shadow of their own calumny reflect on themselves, let any but truly tell them that they have falsely accused others, they grow raving and impatient, like a dog at a Looking-glass, fiercely combating that Image which himself creates: and how smoothly soever the original lie slides from them, the Echo of it grates their ears. And indeed 'tis observable, that those who make the greatest havoc of other men's reputation, are the most nicely tender of their own; which sets this sin of calumny in a most Diametrical opposition to the Evangelical Precept of loving our neighbors as ourselves.

6. THUS much is discernible even in the surface of the crime: but if we look deeper, and examine the motives, we shall find the foundation well agrees to the superstructure, they being usually one of these two, Malice or Interest. And indeed the thing is so dis-ingenuous, so contrary to the dictates of Humanity as well as Divinity, that I must in reverence to our common nature, presume it must be some very forcible impellent, that can drive a man so far from himself. The Devil here plays the Artist: and as the fatallest Poisons to man are (they say) drawn from human bodies, so here he extracts the venem of our Irascible and Concupiscible part, and in it dips those arrows, which we thus shoot at one another.

7. 'Tis needless to harangue severally upon each. The World too experimentally knows the force of both. Malice is that whirl-wind, which has shook States and Families, no less than private Persons; a passion so impetuous and precipitate, that it often equally involves the Agent and the Patient: a malicious man being of like violence with those who flung in the three Children, Dan. 3. consumed by those flames into which he cast others. As for Interest, 'tis that universal Monarch to which all other Empires are Tributaries, to which men sacrifice not only their Consciences and Innocence, but (what is usually much dearer) their Sensualities and Vices. Those whom all the Divine (either) threats or promises, cannot persuade to mortify, nay but restrain one Lust; at Mammons beck will disclame many, and force their inclinations to comply with their Interest.

8. AND whilst this sin of Calumny has two such potent Abettors, we are not to wonder at its growth: as long as men are malicious and designing, they will be traducing; those Cyclops's will be perpetually forming Thunder-bolts against which no Innocence or Virtue can be proof. And alas, we daily find too great effects of their industry. But though these are the forgers of the more solemn deliberate Calumnies, yet this sportive Age hath produced another sort; there being men that defame others by way of divertisement, invent little stories that they may find themselves exercise, and the Town talk. This, if it must pass for sport, is such as Solomon describes, Prov. 26.18, 19. As a mad man that casteth fire-brands, arrows and death, so is he that deceiveth his neighbor, and saith, am not I in sport? He that shoots an arrow in jest, may kill a man in earnest; and he that gives himself liberty to play with his Neighbors fame, may soon play it away. Most men have such an aptness to entertain sinister opinions of others, that they greedily draw in any suggestion of that kind; and one may as easily persuade the thirsty Earth to refund the Water she has soaked into her veins, as them to deposit a prejudice they have once taken up. Therefore such experiments upon Fame, are as dangerous as that which Alexander is said to have made of the force of Naptha upon his Page, from which he scarce escaped with life. These jocular slanders are often as mischievous as those of deeper design, and have from the slightness of the temptation an enhancement of guilt. For sure, he that can put such an interest of his Neighbors in balance with a little fit of laughter, sets it at lower price than he that hopes to enrich or advance himself by it: and though it pass among some for a specimen of Wit, yet it really lists them among Solomon's fools, who make a mock at sin, Prov. 14.9. In the mean time, since slander is a Plant that can grow in all Soils; since the frolic humor as well as the morose betrays to the guilt, who can hope to escape this Scourge of the Tongue, as the Wiseman calls it, Ec. 26.6. which communicates with all? Persons of all ranks do mutually asperse, and are aspersed: so that he who would not have his credulity abused, has scarce a securer way, than (like that Astrologer, who made his Almanac give a tolerable account of the weather by a direct inversion of the common Prognosticators) to let his belief run quite counter to reports. Yea so Epidemic is this Disease grown, that even Religion (at least those Parties and Factions which assume that name) has got a taint of it; each Sect and Opinion seeking to represent his Antagonist as odious as it can. And whilst they contend for speculative Truth, they by mutual calumnies forfeit the practic: a thing that justly excites the grief of good men, to see that those who all pretend to the same Christianity, should only be unanimous in the violating that Truth and Charity it prescribes.

10. AND if these be the weapons of our spiritual warfare, what may we think of the carnal? How are our secular animosities pursued, when our Speculations are thus managed? How easily do we run down the reputation of any who stand in the way either of our spleen or avarice? When Josephs resolute purity had changed the scene of his Mistress's passion, she does readily shift that of guilt too, and fixes her crime upon him, Gen. 39.14. So when Ziba had a mind to undermine Mephibosheth in his estate, he first practices upon his fame in a false accusation, 2 Sam. 16.3. And alas, how familiarly do we now see both these scenes reacted? Those who will not take vice in their bosoms, shall yet have it bespatter their faces: they who will not run to the same excess of riot, must expect to be evil spoken of, 1 Pet. 4.4. Nay not only pious men, but Piety itself partakes of the same fate, falls under the two-edge'd slander both of deceit and folly. And if men cannot be permitted quietly to enjoy their Piety, much less will they those things whereof the World hath more gust, I mean secular advantages. There are still crimes to be discovered in the possessors of Honors or Estates, and they wonderfully excite the zeal of those who would supplant them. What artifices are there to make them appear unworthy of what they have, that others more unworthy may succeed them? Nor are those storms only in the upper region, in the higher ranks of men; but if we pass thro all degrees, we shall find the difference is rather in the value of the things, then in the means of pursuing them. He that pretends to the meanest office, does studiously disparage his competitor, as he that is rival'd for a kingdom. Nay, even he that has but a merry humor to gratify, makes no scruple to do it with the loss of another man's reputation.

11. THUS do we accomodate every petty temporal interest at the cost of our eternal: and as an unskillful Fencer, whilst he is pursuing his thrust, exposes his body; so whilst we thus actuate our own malice, we abandon ourselves to Satan's, receive mortal wounds from him, only that we may give a few light scratches to one another. For as I have before said, there is nothing does more secure his title to us, then this vice of Calumny, it bearing his proper impress and figure. And we may fear, Christ will one day make the same Judgment of Persons as he did of Coin, and award them to him whose Image and superscription they bear, Matth. 22:20.

12. AND now how great a madness is it to make costly Oblations to so vile an Idol? This is indeed the worshipping our own Imaginations, preferring a malicious fiction before a real felicity: and is but faintly resembled by him, who is said to have chosen to part with his Bishopric, rather than burn his Romance. Alas, are there not gross corporal sins enough to ruin us, but must we have aëreal ones too, damn ourselves with Chimera's, and by these forgeries of our brains dream out selves to destruction?

13. LET all those then who thus unhappily employ their Inventive Faculty, timely consider, how unthriving a trade 'tis finally like to prove; that all their false accusations of others will rebound in true ones upon themselves. It does often so in this world, where many times the most clandestine contrivances of this kind meet with detection. Or if they should happen to keep on the disguise here, yet 'twill infallibly be torn off at the great day of manifestation, when before God, Angels, and Men, they will be rendered infinitely more vile, then 'twas possible for them here to make others.

SECT. VI. Of Vncharitable Truth.

1. IN the next place we are to consider of the other Branch of Defamatory reports, viz. such as are true: which though they must be confessed to be of a lower form of guilt then the former, yet as to the kind, they equally agree in the definition of Detraction, since 'tis possible to impair a man's credit by true reports as well as by false.

2. To clear this I shall first observe, that altho every fault hath some penal effects which are coetaneous to the act, yet this of Infamy is not so: this is a more remote consequent; that which it immediately depends upon, is the publishing. A man may do things, which to God and his own conscience render him abominable, and yet keep his reputation with men: but when this stifled crime breaks out, when his secret guilts are detected, then, and not till then, he becomes infamous: so that altho his sin be the Material, yet it is the discovery that is the formal cause of his Infamy.

3. THIS being granted, it follows, that he that divulges an unknown concealed fault, stands accountable for all the consequences that flow from that divulging; but whether accountable as for guilt, must be determined by the particular circumstances of the cause. So that here we must admit of an exception: for though every discovery of another's fault be in the strict natural sense of the word a Detraction, yet it will not always be the sin of Detraction, because in some instances there may some higher obligation intervene, and supersede that we ow to the fame of our neighbor; and in those cases it may not only be lawful, but necessary to expose him.

4. Now all such cases I conceive may summarily be reduced to two heads, Justice and Charity. First as to Justice: that we know is a Fundamental Virtue, and he that shall violate that, to abound in another, is as absurd, as he that undermines the foundation to raise the walls. We are not to steal to give alms, and God himself has declared, that he hates robbery for a Burnt-offering; so that no pretence either of Charity or Piety can absolve us from the duty we ow to Justice. Now it may often fall out, that by concealing one man's fault, I may be injurious to another, nay to a whole community: and then I assume the guilt I conceal, and by the Laws both of God and Man am judged an accessory.

5. AND as Justice to others enforces, so sometimes Justice to a man's self allows the publishing of a fault, when a considerable Interest either of Fame or Fortune cannot otherwise be rescued. But to make loud outcries of injury, when they tend nothing to the repress of it, is a liberty rather assumed by rage and impatience, then authorized by Justice. Nay, often in that case the complainer is the most injurious person; for he inflicts more then he suffers, and in lieu of some trivial right of his which is invaded, he assaults the other in a nearer interest, by wounding him in his good Name: but if the cause be considerable, and the manner regular, there lies sure no obligation upon any man to wrong himself, to indulge to another.

6. NEITHER does Charity retrench this liberty: for though it be one act of Charity to conceal another man's faults, yet sometimes it may be inconsistent with some more important Charity, which I owe to a third person, or perhaps to a multitude; as in those cases wherein public benefit is concerned. If this were not allowable, no History could lawfully be written, since if true, it cannot but recount the faults of many: no evidence could be brought in against a Malefactor: and indeed, all Discipline would be subverted; which would be so great a mischief, that Charity obliges to prevent it, what Defamation soever fall upon the guilty by it. For in such instances 'tis a true rule, That Mercy to the evil proves cruelty to the innocent. And as in a competition of mischiefs we are to choose the least, so of two goods the greatest, and the more extensive, is the most eligible.

7. Nay, even that Charity which reflects upon myself, may also sometimes supersede that to my Neighbor, the rule obliging me to love him as, not better than myself. I need not surely silently assent to my own unjust Defamation, for fear of proving another a false accuser, nor suffer myself to be made a beggar, to conceal another man's being a Thief. 'Tis true, in a great inequality of interests, Charity whose Character it is, Not to seek her own, 1 Cor. 13.5.) will prompt me to prefer a greater concern of my Neighbors, before a slight one of my own: but in equal circumstances, I am sure at liberty to be kind first to myself. If I will recede even from that, I may; but that is then to be accounted among the Heroic flights of Charity, nor her binding and indispensable Laws.

8. HAVING now set the boundaries, the excepted cases; as all instances within them will be legitimated, so all without them will (by the known rule of Exceptions) be precluded, and fall under that general duty we owe to our Neighbor, of tendering his credit: an Obligation so universally infringed, that 'tis not imaginable the breach should always happen within the excepted cases. When 'tis remembered how unactive the Principles of Justice and Charity are now grown in the World, we must certainly impute such incessant Effects, to some more vigorous Causes: of which it may not be amiss to point out some of the most obvious, and leave every man to examine which of them he finds most operative in himself.

9. IN the first place, I may reckon Pride, a humor which as it is always mounting, so it will make use of any footstool towards its rise. A man who affects an extraordinary splendor of Reputation, is glad to find any foils to set him off; and therefore will let no fault nor folly of another's enjoy the shade, but brings it into the open light, that by that comparison his own Excellences may appear the brighter. I dare appeal to the breast of any proud man, whether he do not upon such occasions, delight to make some Pharisaical reflections on himself, whether he be not apt to say, I am not like other men, or as this Publican, Luke 18. though probably he leave out the God I thank thee. Now he that cherishes such resentments as these in himself, will doubtless be willing to propagate them to other men; and to that end render the blemishes of others as visible as he can. But this betrays a degenerate spirit, which from a consciousness that he wants solid worth, on which to bottom a reputation, is fain to found it on the ruins of other men's. The true Diamond sparkles even in the Sun-shine: 'tis but a glow-worm virtue, that owes its luster to the darkness about it.

10. ANOTHER promoter to Detraction is Envy, which sometimes is particular, sometimes general. He that has a pique to another, would have him as hateful to all man-kind as he is to him; and therefore as he grieves and repines at anything that may advance his estimation, so he exults and triumphs when anything occurs which may depress it, and is usually very industrious to improve the opportunity, nay has a strange sagacity it hunting it out. No vultur does more quickly scent a carcass, then an envious person does those dead flies which corrupt his Neighbors ointment, Ecclesiast. 10.1. the vapor whereof his h••e, like a strong wind, scatters and disperses far and near. Nor needs he any great crime to practice on: every little infirmity or passion, looked on thro his Optics, appears a mountainous guilt. He can improve the least speck or freckle into a Leprosy, which shall overspread the whole man: and a cloud no bigger then a man's hand, like that of Elisha, 1 Kings 18.44. may in an instant, with the help of prejudice, grow to the utter darkening of the brightest reputation, and fill the whole Horizon with tempest and horror. Somtimes this envy is general, not confined to any man persons, but diffused to the whole nature. Some tempers there are so malign, that they wish ill to all, and believe ill of all; like Timon the Athenian, who professed himself a universal Man-hater. He whose guilty Conscience reflects dismal Images of himself, is willing to put the same ugly shape upon the whole Nature, and to conclude that all men are the same, were they but closely inspected. And therefore when he can see but the least glimmering of a fault in any, he takes it as a proof of his Hypothesis, and with an envious joy calls in as many spectators as he can. 'Tis certain there are some in whose ears nothing sounds so harsh as the commendation of another; as on the contrary, nothing is so melodious as a Defamation. Plutarch gives an apt instance of this upon Aristides's banishment, whom when a mean Person had proposed to Ostracism, being asked what displeasure Aristides had don him, he replied, None, neither do I know him, but it grieves me to hear everybody call him a just man. I fear some of our keenest accusers now a days may give the same answer. No man that is eminent for Piety (or indeed but Moral Virtue) but he shall have many insidious eyes upon him, watching for his halting: and if any the least obliquity can be espied, he is used worse then the vilest Malefactor: for such are tried but at one bar, and know the utmost of their doom; but these are arraigned at every Table, in every Tavern. And at such variety of Judicatures, there will be as great variety of Sentences; only they commonly concur in this one, that he is an Hypocrite: and then what complacency, what triumph have they in such a discovery? There is not half so much Epicurism in any of their most studied luxuries, no spectacle affords them so much pleasure, as a bleeding fame thus lying at their mercy.

11. ANOTHER sort of Detractors there are, whose designs are not so black, but are equally mean and sordid, much too light to be put in balance with a Neighbors credit. Of those some will pick up all the little stories they can get, to humor a Patron: an artifice well known by those Trencher-guests, who, like Rats, still haunt the best Provisions. These men do almost come up to a literal sense of what the Psalmist spoke in a figurative, Psalm 14. and eat up people for bread, tear and worry men in their good names, that themselves may eat. It was a Curse denounced against Eli's offspring, that they should come and crouch for a morsel of bread, 1 Sam. 2.39. But such men court this as a preferment, and to bring themselves within the reach of it, stick not to assume that vilest office of common Delators. There are others, who when they have got the knowledge of another man's fault, think it an endearing thing to whisper in the ear of some Friend or Confident. But sure, if they must needs sacrifice some secret to their Friendship, they should take David's rule, and not offer that which cost them nothing. If they will express their confidence, let them acquaint them with their own private crimes. That indeed would show something of trust: but those experiments upon another man's cost, will hardly convince any considering person of their kindness.

12. THERE still remains a yet more trifling sort of Defamers, who have no deliberate design which they pursue in it, yet are as assiduous at the Trade as the deeper contrivers. Such are those who publish their Neighbors failings as they read Gazets, only that they may be telling news; an Itch wherewith some Peoples tongues are strangely over-run, who can as well hold a glowing Coal in their mouths, as keep anything they think new; nay will sometimes run themselves out of breath, for fear lest any should serve them as Ahimaaz did Cushi, 2 Sam. 18.23. and tell the tale before them. This is one of the most Childish Vanities imaginable: and sure men must have Souls of a very low level, that can think it a commensurate entertainment. Others there are who use Defamatory discourse, neither for the love of News, nor Defamation, but purely for love of talk: whose speech, like a flowing current, bears away indiscriminately whatever lies in its way. And indeed such incessant Talkers, are usually people, nor of depth enough to supply themselves out of their own store, and therefore can let no foreign accession pass by them, no more then the Mill which is always going, can afford any Waters to run wast. I know we use to call this Talkativeness a Feminine vice; but to speak impartially, I think, though we have given them the inclosure of the Scandal, they have not of the fault, and he that shall appropriate Loquacity to Women, may perhaps sometimes need to light Diogenes's Candle to seek a man: for 'tis possible to come into masculine company, where 'twill be as hard to edge in a word, as at a Female Gossiping. However, as to this particular of Defaming: both the Sexes seem to be at a vie: and I think he were a very Critical Judge, that could determine between them.

13. NOW lest these later sort of Defamers should be apt to absolve themselves, as men of harmless intentions, I shall desire them to consider, that they are only more impertinent, not less injurious. For though it be granted, that the proud and envious are to make a distinct account for their pride and envy; yet as far as relates to the Neighbor, they are equally mischievous. Anacreon that was choked with a Grape-stone, died as surely as Julius Caesar with his three and twenty wounds; and a man's reputation may be as well fool'd and prated away, as maliciously betrayed. Nay perhaps more easily; for where the speaker can least be suspected of design, the hearer is apter to give him credit: this way of insinuating by familiar discourse, being like those Poisons that are taken in at the pores, which are the most insensibly sucked in, and the most impossible to expel.

14. BUT we need not dispute which is worst, since 'tis certain all are bad, none of them (or any that hold proportion with them) being at all able to pretend their warrant either from Justice or Charity. And then what our Savior says in another case, will be applicable to this, He that is not for us, is against us, Matth. 12.30. He that is publishing his Neighbors faults, acts not upon the dictates of Justice or Charity, acts directly in contradiction to them: for where they do not upon some particular respects command, they do implicitly, and generally forbid all such discoveries.

15. FOR first, if a fault divulged be of a light nature, the offender cannot thereby merit so much as to be made a public Discourse. Fame is a tender thing, and seldom is tost and bandied without receiving some bruise, if not a crack: for reports we know, like snowballs gather still, the farther they roll: and when I have once handed it to another, how know I how he may improve it? And if he deliver it so advanced to a third, he may give his contribution also to it, and so in a successive transmitting, it may grow to such a monstrous bulk, as bears no proportion to its Original. He must be a great stranger to the World, that has not experimentally found the truth of this. How many persons have laid under great and heavy scandals, which have taken their first rise only from some inadvertence or indiscretion? Of so quick a growth is Slander, that the least grain, like that of Mustard-seed, mentioned Matth. 13.32: immediately shoots up into a Tree. And when it is so, it can no more be reduced back into its first cause, then a Tree can shrink into that little seed from whence it first sprang. No ruins are so irreparable as those of reputation: and therefore he that pulls out but one stone towards the breach, may do a greater mischief then perhaps he intends; and a greater injustice too: for by how much the more strictly justice obliges to reparation in case of injuries done, so much the more severely does it prohibit the doing those injuries which are incapable of being repared. In the Levitical Law, he that knew his Ox was apt so gore, and yet kept him not up, stood responsible for any mischief he happened to do, Exod. 21.29. I think there is no considering man can be ignorant how apt little trivial accusations are, to tear and mangle ones Fame: and yet if the lavish Talker restrain them not, he certainly stands accountable to God, his Neighbor, and his own Conscience, for all the danger they procure.

16. BUT if the report concern some higher and enormous Crime, 'tis true, the delinquent may deserve the less pity, yet perhaps the reporter may not deserve the less blame: for often such a discovery serves, not to reclame, but to enrage the Offender, and precipitate him into farther degrees of ill. Modestly and fear of shame, is one of those natural restraints, which the Wisdom of God has put upon mankind, and he that once stumbles, may yet by a check of that bridle recover again: but when by a public detection he is fallen under that infamy he feared, he will then be apt to discard all caution, and to think he owes himself the utmost pleasures of his vice, as the price of his reputation. Nay, perhaps he advances farther, and sets up for a reversed sort of Fame, by being eminently wicked: and he who before was but a clandestine Disciple, becomes a Doctor of Impiety. And sure it were better to let a concealed crime remain in its wished obscurity, then by thus rousing it from its covert, bring it to stand at bay, and set itself in this open defiance; especially in this degenerate age, when vice has so many well-willers, that, like a hoping party, they eagerly run into any that will head them.

17. AND this brings in a third Consideration relating to the public, to which the divulging of private (especially if they be novel unusual) Crimes, does but an ill piece of service. Vice is contagious, and casts pestilential vapors: and as he that should bring out a Plague-sick person, to inform the World of his disease, would be thought not to have much befriended his Neighborhood; so he that displaies these vicious Ulcers, whilst he seeks to defame one, may perhaps infect many. We too experimentally find the force of ill Examples. Men often take up sins, to which they have no natural propension, merely by way of conforty and imitation. But if the instance happen in a crime, which more suits the practice of the hearers, though it cannot be said to seduce, yet it may encourage and confirm them; embolden them not only the more frequently to act, but even to avow those sins wherein they find they stand not single, and by discovering a new accessory to their Party, to invite them the more heartily and openly to espouse it.

18. These are such effects as surely do not very well correspond with that Justice and Charity we owe either to particular persons, or to mankind in general. And indeed no better can be expected, from a practice which to perfectly contradicts the grand rule both of Justice and Charity, the doing as we would be don to. That this does so, every man has a ready conviction within him, if he please but to consult his own heart. Alas, with what solicitude do we seek to hide our own guilts with false dresses, what varnishes have we for them? There are not more arts of disguising our Corporal blemishes, then our Moral: and yet whilst we thus paint and parget our own deformities, we cannot allow any the least imperfection of another's to remain undetected, but tear off the veil from their blushing frailties, and not only expose but proclaim them. And can there be a grosser, a more detestable partiality then this? God may sure in this instance (as in many others) expostulate with us as he did with Israel, Ezek. 33. Are not your ways unequal? What Barbarism, what Inhumanity is it thus to treat those of the same common nature with ourselves, whom we cannot but know have the same concern to preserve a Reputation, and the same regret to lose it, which we have? And what shame is it, that that Evangelical Precept, of doing as we would be don to, which met with so much reverence even from Heathens, that Severus the Emperor prefer'd it to all the Maxims of Philosophers; should be thus contemned and violated by Christians, and that too, upon such slight inconsiderable motives, as usually prevail in this case of Defamation?

19. BUT we are not to consider this fault only in its root, as it is a defect of Justice and Charity, but in its product too, as it is a Seminary of more Injustice and Uncharitableness. Those disadvantageous reports we make of our neighbors, are almost seen to come round: for let no man persuade himself, that the hearers will keep his counsel any better then he does that of the defamed person. The softest whisper of this kind, will find others to Echo it, till it reach the ears of the concerned Party, and perhaps with some enhancing circumstances too. And when 'tis considered how unwilling men are to hear of their faults, though even in the mildest and most charitable way of admonition, tis not to be doubted a public Defamation, will seem disobliging enough to provoke a return; which again begets a rejoinder, and so the quarrel is carried on with mutual recriminations; all malicious inquiries are made into each others manners, and those things which perhaps they did in closets, come to be proclaimed upon the house top: so the wild-fire runs round, till sometimes nothing but Blood will quench it; or if it arrive not to that, yet it usually fixes in an irreconcilable feud. To this is often owing those distances we see among Friends and Relations; this breeds such strangeness, such animosities amongst Neighbors, that you cannot go to one, but you shall be entertained with invectives against the other; nay perhaps you shall lose both, because you are willing to side with neither.

20. THESE are the usual consequences of the liberty of the Tongue: and what account can any man give to himself, either in Christianity or Prudence, that has let in such a train of mischiefs, merely to gratify an impotent childish humor of telling a tale? Peace was the great Legacy Christ left to his followers, and ought to be guarded, though we expose for it our greatest Temporal Concerns, but cannot without despite to him, as well as our brethren, be thus prostituted.

21. YET if we consider it abstractedly from those more solemn mischiefs which attend it, the mere levity and unworthiness of it sets it below an ingenuous Person. We generally think a tatter and busy-body a title of no small reproach: yet truly I know not to whom it more justly belongs, then to those, who busy themselves first in learning, and then in publishing the faults of others: an employment which the Apostle thought a blot, even upon the weaker sex, and thinks the prevention of such importance, that he prescribes them to change their whole condition of life; to convert widow-hood (though a state which in other respects he much prefers, 1 Cor. 7.8.) into marriage, rather then expose themselves to the temptation, 1 Tim. 5.13.14. And if their impotence cannot afford excuse for it, what a debasement is it of men's nobler Faculties to be thus entertained? The Historian gives it as an ill indication of Domitians temper, that he employ'd himself in catching and tormenting Flies: and sure they fall not under a much better Character, either for Wisdom, or good Nature, who thus snatch up all the little fluttering reports, they can meet with to the prejudice of their Neighbors.

22. BUT besides the divulging the faults of others, there is another branch of Detraction naturally springing from this root, and this is Censuring and severe Judging of them. We think not we have well plaid the Historians, when we have told the thing, unless we add also our Remarks, and Animadversions on it. And altho 'tis, God knows, bad enough to make a naked relation, and trust it to the severity of the hearers; yet few can content themselves with that, but must give them a sample of rigor, and by the bitterness of their own censure invite them to pass the like: a Process contrary to all rules of Law or Equity, for the Plaintiff to assume the part of a Judge. And we may easily divine the fate of that man's fame, that is so unduly tried.

23. 'TIS indeed sad to see how many private Tribunals are everywhere set up, where we scan and judge our Neighbors action, but scarce ever acquit any. We take up with the most incompetent Witnesses, nay often suborn our own surmises and jealousies, that we may be sure to cast the unhappy Criminal. How nicely and scrupulously do we examine every circumstance; (Would God we were but half as exact in our own penitential inquisitions) and torture it to make it confess something which appears not in the more general view of the fact, and which perhaps never was in the actors intention? In a word, we do like witches with their Magical Chymistry, extract all the venem, and take none of the allay. By this means we confound the degrees of sins, and sentence deliberate and indeliberate, an habit or an act all at one rate, that is commonly, at the utmost it can amount to, even in its worse acception: and sure this were a most culpable corruption in judgment, could we show our commission to judge our brethren.

24. BUT here we may everyone of us interrogate ourselves in our Savior's words, Who made me a Judge? Luke 12.14. And if he disclaim'd it, who in respect of his Divinity had the Supreme right, and that too in a case wherein one (at least) or the Litigants had desired his interposition, what a boldness is it in us to assume it, where no such appeal is made to us, but on the contrary, the party disowns our Authority? Nay (which is infinitely more) tis superseded by our great Law-giver, in that express prohibition, Matth. 7.1. Judge not, and that backed with a severe penalty, that ye be not judged? As God hath appropriated Vengeance to himself, so has he Judicature also; and tis an invasion of his peculiar, for any (but his Delegates the lawful Magistrates) to pretend to either. And indeed, in all private judgment, so much depends upon the intention of the Offender, that unless we could possess ourselves of God's Omniscience, 'twill be as irrational as impious to assume his Authority. Until we know men's hearts, we are at the best but imperfect Judges of their actions. At our rate of judging, St. Paul had surely passed for a most malicious Persecutor, whereas God saw he did ignorantly in unbelief, and upon that intuition had mercy on him, 1 Tim. 1.13. 'Tis therefore good counsel which the Apostle gives, 1 Cor. 4.5. Judge nothing before the time until the Lord come. For though 'tis said, The Saints shall judge the World, 1 Cor. 6.3. yet it must be at the great Assize, and he that will needs intrude himself into the office before the time, will be in danger to be rather passive then active in the Judicatory. I do not here advise to such a stupid charity as shall make no distinction of Actions. I know there is a woe pronounced as well to those who call evil good, as good evil. Surely when we see an open notorious sin committed, we may express a detestation of the Crime, though not of the Actor; nay it may sometimes be a necessary Charity, both to the Offender, and to the innocent Spectators, as an Amulet to keep them from the Contagion of the Example. But still even in these cases, our Sentence must not exceed the evidence, we must judge only according to the visible undoubted circumstances, and not aggravate the crime upon presumptions and conjectures; if we do, how right soever our guesses may be, our judgment is not, but we are as Saint James speaks, Judges of evil thoughts, Chap. 2.4.

25. INDEED this rash judging is not only very unjust both to God and man, but it is an act of the greatest pride. When we set ourselves in the Tribunal, we always look down with contempt on those at the Bar. And certainly there is nothing does so gratify, so regale a haughty humor, as this piece of usurpt Sovereignty over our Brethren: but the more it does so, the greater necessity there is to abstain from it. Pride is a hardy kind of vice, that will live upon the barest pasture: you cannot starve it with the most industrious mortifications: how little need is there then of pampering and heightening it, which we cannot more effectually do, then by this censorious humor? for by that we are so perpetually employ'd abroad, that we have no leisure to look homeward, and see our own defects. We are like the inhabitants of Ai, Jos. 8. so eager upon the pursuit of others, that we leave ourselves exposed to the ambushes of Satan, who will be sure still to encourage us in our chase, draw us still farther & farther from ourselves, and cares not how zealous we are in fighting against the crimes of others, so he can but keep that zeal from recoiling upon our own.

26. LASTLY, This judging others, is one of the highest violations of Charity. The Apostle gives it as one of the properties of that grace, that it thinks no evil (i. e.) is not apt to make severe constructions, but sets everything in the fairest light, puts the most candid interpretations that the matter will bear. And truly, this is of great importance to the reputation of our Neighbors. The world we know is in many instances extremely governed by Opinion, but in this 'tis all in all; it has not only an influence upon it, but is that very thing: Reputation being nothing but a fair opinion and estimation among others. Now this Opinion is not always swayed by due motives: sometimes little accidents, and often fancy, and ofttest prepossession governs in it. So that many times he that puts the first ill Character, fixes the stamp which afterwards goes current in the World. The generality of people take up prejudices (as they do Religions) upon trust: and of those that are more curious in inquiring into the grounds, there are not many who vary on the more charitable hand, or bring the common sentence to review, with intent to moderate but enhance it. Men are apt to think it some disparagement to their acuteness and invention, if they cannot say something as sharp upon the subject, as has been said before; and so 'tis the business of many to lay on more load, but of few to take off: and therefore he that passes the first condemnatory sentence, is like the Incendiary in a popular Tumult, who is chargeable with all those disorders to which he gave the first rise, though that free not his Abettors from their share of the guilt.

27. AND as this is very uncharitable in respect of the injury offered, so also is it in reflection on the grand rule of Charity. Can we pretend to love our Neighbors as ourselves, and yet shall our love to him have the quite contrary effects to that we bear ourselves? On self-love lessen our beam into a mote, and yet can our love to him magnify his mote into a beam? No certainly, true Charity is more sincere, does not turn to us the reverse end of the Perspective, to represent our own faults at a distance, and in the most diminutive size, and yet shuffle the other to us when we are to view his. No, these are Tricks of Legerdemain we read in another Schole, even in his, whose style is the accuser of the brethren. We know how frequently God protests against false weights and false measures. And sure 'tis not only in the shop or market that he abhors them, they are no less abominable in conversation than in traffic. To buy by one measure and sell by another, is not more unequal, than it is to have these differing standards for our own and our neighbors faults, that our own shall weigh, in the Prophet Jeremiah's phrase, lighter than vanity, yea nothing, and yet his (though really the lighter) shall prove Zacharies talent of lead. This is such a partiality, as consists not with common honesty, and can therefore never be reconciled with Christian Charity: and how demurely soever such men may pretend to Sanctity, that interrogation of God presses hard upon them, Shall I count them pure with the wicked balances, and with the bag of deceitful weights? Mich. 6.11. Such bitter invectives against other men's faults, and indulgence or palliation of their own, shows their zeal lies in their spleen, and that they consider not so much what is done, as who does it: and to such the sentence of the Apostle is very applicable, Romans 2.1. Therefore thou art inexcusable, O man, whosoever thou art that judgest, for wherein thou judgest another, thou condemnest thyself, for thou that judgest dost the same thing. But admit a man have not the very same guilts he censures in another, yet 'tis sure every man has some; and of what sort soever they be, he desires not they should be rigorously scan'd, and therefore by the rule of Charity, yea and Justice too, he ought not to do that which he would not suffer. If he can find extenuations for his own crimes, he is in all reason to presume others may have so for theirs: the common frailty of our nature, as it is apt alike to betray us to faults, so it gives as equal share in the excuse; and therefore what I would have pass for the effect of impotency or inadvertence in myself, I can with no tolerable ingenuity give a worse name to in him.

28. WE have now viewed both these branches of Detraction, seen both the sin and mischiefs of them; we may now join them together in a concluding Observation, which is, that they are as imprudent as they are unchristian. It has been received among the maxims of civil Life, not unnecessarily to exasperate anybody; to which agrees the advice of an ancient Philosopher, Speak not evil of thy Neighbor, if thou dost thou shalt hear that which will not fail to trouble thee. There is no person so inconsiderable, but may at some time or other do a displeasure: but in this of Defaming men need no harnessing, no preparation; every man has his Weapons ready for a return: so that none can shoot these arrows, but they must expect they will revert with a rebounded force: not only to the violation of Christian Unity (as I have before observed) but to the Aggressors great secular demerit, both in Fame, and oftentimes Interest also. Revenge is sharp-sighted, and over-looks no opportunity of a retaliation; and that commonly not bounded as the Levitical ones were, An eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth, Exod. 21.24. no nor by the larger proportions of their restitutions four-fold, Exod. 21.1. but extended to the utmost power of the Inflicter. The examples are innumerable of men who have thus laid themselves open in their greatest concerns, and have let loose the hands as well as tongues of others against them, merely because they would put no restraint upon their own; which is so great indiscretion, that to them we may well apply that of Solomon, A fools mouth is his destruction, and his lips are the snare of his soul, Prov. 18.7.

29. AND now who can sufficiently wonder, that a practice that so thwarts our interest of both worlds, should come universally to prevail among us? Yet that it does so, I may appeal to the Consciences of most, and to the Observation of all. What so common Topic of Discourse is there, as this of back-biting our Neighbors? Come into company of all Ages, all Ranks, all Professions, this is the constant entertainment: And I doubt, he that at night shall duly recollect the Occurrences of the day, shall very rarely be able to say, he has spent it without hearing or speaking (perhaps both) somewhat of this kind. Nay even those who restrain themselves other liberties, are often apt to indulge to this: many who are so just to their Neighbors property, that as Abraham once said, Gen. 14.23. they would not take from him, even from a thread to a shoe latchet, are yet so inconsiderate of his Fame, as to find themselves discourse at the expense of that, though infinitely a greater injury then the robbing of his Coffer: which shows what false measures we are apt to take of things and evinces that many of those, who have not only in general abjured the world in their Baptism, but do in many instances seem to themselves (as well as others) to have gained a superiority over it, do yet in this undiscernibly yield it the greatest Ensign of Sovereignty, by permitting it to set the standards and estimates of things, and taking its customary Prescriptions for Laws. For what besides this unhappy servility to Custom, can possibly reconcile men that own Christianity, to a practice so widely distant from it? 'Tis true, those that profess themselves men of this world, who design only their portion in this life, may take it up as sometimes conducting (at least seemingly) to their end: but for those who propose higher hopes to themselves, and know that Charity is one of the main props to those hopes, how foolishly do they undermine themselves, when they thus act against their Principles, and that upon no other Authority, but that of popular usage? I know men are apt to excuse themselves upon their indignation against vice, and think that their zeal must as well acquit them for this violation of the second Table, as it once did Moses for the breaking both, Exod. 32.19. But to such I may answer in Christ's words, Luke 9.55. Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of. Meekness and Charity are the Evangelical Graces, which will most recommend and assimilate us to him, who was meek and lowly in heart. But after all this pretext of Zeal, I fear it is but a cheat we put on ourselves, the elder Brothers raiment only to disguise the Supplanter, Gen. 27. Let men truly ransack their own breasts, and I doubt the best will find there is something of vanity that lies at the bottom, if it be not the positive sort mentioned before, of designing to illustrate myself by others blemishes, yet at least the negative, that I am unwilling to incur the contempt incident to those, who scruple at small sins. Besides I observe perhaps, that 'tis the common entertainment of the World, to defame their Neighbors, and if I strike not in upon the Theme, I shall have nothing to render me acceptable company; perhaps I shall be reproached as morose or dull, and my silence shall be construed to proceed not from the abundance of my Charity, but the defect of my Wit.

20. BUT sure they that can thus argue, do hereby give a more demonstrative proof of that defect. He whose Wit is so precarious, that it must depend only upon the folly or vice of another, had best give over all pretence to it. He that has nothing of his own growth to set before his Guests, had better make no invitations, then break down his Neighbors Inclosure, and feast them upon his plunder. Besides, how pitiful an attestation of Wit is it, to be able to make a disgraceful relation of another? No scolding Woman but may set up such Trophies: and they that can value a man upon such an account, may prefer the Scarabes, who feed upon dung, and are remark'd by no other property, before the Bee that sucks Flowers and returns Honey.

31. BUT in the next place, admit this restraint should certainly expose one to that reproach; methinks this should be no news to those who know the condition of Christianity is to take up the Cross: and sure it cannot weigh lighter then in this instance. What am I the worse, if a vain Talkative Person think me too reserved? Or if he, whose frolic levity is his disease, call me dull, because I vapor not out all my spirits into froth? Socrates when informed of some gating Speeches one had used of him behind his back, made only this facetious reply, Let him beat me too when I am absent. And he that gets not such an indifference to all the idle censures of men, will be disturbed in all his Civil Transactions, as well as his Christian: it being scarce possible to do anything, but there will be descants made on it. And if a man will regard those winds, he must, as Solomon says, never sow, Eccl. 11.4. He must suspend even the necessary actions of common life, if he will not venture them to the being mis-judged by others.

32. BUT there is yet a farther consideration in this matter: for he that upon such a despicable motive will violate his duty in one particular, lets Satan get a main point of him, and can with no good Logic deny to do it in others. Detraction is not the only sin in fashion: Profaneness, and Obscenity, and all sorts of Luxury are so too, and threaten no less reproach to those who scruple at them. Upon the same grounds therefore that he discards his Charity to his Neighbor, he may also his Piety, his Modesty, his Temperance, and almost all other Virtues. And to speak the truth, there is not a more fertile womb of sin, then this dread of all men's reproach. Other corruptions must be gratified with cost and industry, but in this the Devil hath no farther trouble then to laugh men out of their souls. So prolific a vice therefore had need be weeded out of men's hearts: for if it be allowed the least corner, if it be indulged too in this one instance, 'twill quickly spread itself farther.

33. YET after all, this fear of reproach is a mere fallacy, started to disguise a more real cause of fear: for the greatest danger of reproach does indeed lie on that other side. Common estimation puts an ill Character upon pragmatic meddling people. For though the inquisitiveness and curiosity of the hearer, may sometimes render such discourses grateful enough to him, yet it leaves in him no good impressions of the speaker. This is well observed by the Son of Sirach, Ecclus. 19.8, 9. Whether it be to friend or foe, talk not of other men's lives, and if thou canst without offense, revele them not, for he heard and observed thee, and when time cometh he will hate thee. In a word, all considering Persons will be ever upon their guard in such company, as fore-seeing that they will talk no less freely of them, then they do of others before them. Nor can the commonness of the guilt obviate the censure, there being nothing more frequent then for men to accuse their own faults in other Persons. Vice is like a dark Lantern, which turns its bright side only to him that bears it, but looks black and dismal in another's hand: and in this particular none has so much reason to fear a Defamer, as those who are themselves such: for (besides the common prudential motive) their own consciousness gives them an inward alarm, and makes them look for a retribution in the same kind. Thus upon the whole matter we see, there is no real temptation, even to our vanity, to comply with this uncharitable custom, we being sure to lose more repute by it then we can propose to ourselves to gain. The being esteemed an ill man, will not be balanced by being thought pleasant, ingenuous company, were one sure to be so. But 'tis odds, that will not be acquired by it neither, for the most assiduous tale-bearers, and biterest revilers, are often half-witted people: there being nothing more frequently observed, then such men's aptness to speak evil of things they understand not, Jude v. 10.

34. O let not then those that have repudiated the more inviting sins, show themselves philter'd and bewitched by this, but instead of submitting to the ill example of others, set a good one to them, and endeavor to bring this unchristian custom out of fashion. I am sure if they do not, they will be more deeply chargeable then others: for the more command they have over their other corruptions, the more do they witness against themselves. Their remissness and willing subjection to this, besides their example when ill, is more ensnaring then other men's, and is apt to insinuate easy thoughts of the sin. Men are apt to think themselves safe while they follow one of noted Piety, and the authority of his Person often leads them blindfold into his failings. Thus when Peter dissembled, St. Paul tells us, that the other Jews, and even Barnabas also, was carried away with his dissimulation, Galat. 2.13. And I doubt not in this particular many are encouraged by the liberty they see even good men take. So that such have a more accumulative guilt, for they do not only commit, but patronize the fault: the consideration whereof has kept me, I confess, longer upon this Head, then is proportionable to the brevity of the rest; but I think not longer then agrees to the importance of the subject.

35. AND now since we have considered the malignity of this sin of Detraction, and yet withal find that 'tis a sin, which as the Apostle speaks, doth so easily beset us, 'tis but a natural Corollary that we enforce our vigilance against it. And where the importance and difficulty are both so great, 'twill be a little necessary to consider what are the likliest means, the most appropriate Antidote against this so dangerous, and yet so Epidemic a disease.

36. AND here the common rule of Physic is to be adverted to, viz. to examine the causes, that the remedies may be adapted to them. I shall therefore in the first place desire every man seriously to study his own constitution of mind, and observe what are his particular temptations to this sin of Detraction, whether any of those I have before mentioned, as Pride, Envy, Levity, &c. or any other which lies deeper, and is only discernible to his own inspection. Let him, I say, make the scrutiny, and then accordingly apply himself to correct the sin in its first principle. For as when there is an eruption of Humor in any part, 'tis not cured merely by outward applications, but by such alterative Medicines as purify the blood; so this Leprosy of the Tongue will still spread farther, if it be not check'd in its spring and source, by the mortifying of those corrupt inclinations, which feed and heighten it.

37. THIS is an inquisition I must leave to every man's own Conscience, which alone can testify by what impulses he acts. Yet as the Rabbins were wont to say, that in every signal Judgment which befell the Jews, there was some grain of the Golden-calf; so I think I may venture to say, that in all Detraction, there is some mixture of Pride: and therefore I suppose, a Caution against that, will be so generally seasonable, that it may well lead the Van of all other advices in this matter. And here 'tis very observable, that God who has made of one blood all Nations of the Earth, Acts 17. has so equally distributed all the most valuable privileges of Human-nature, as if he designed to preclude all insulting of one man over another. Neither has he only thus insinuated it by his Providence, but has inforc'd it by his commands In the Levitical Law we find what a particular care he takes to moderate the rigor of Judicial correction, upon this very account, lest thy Brother be despised in thine eyes, Deut. 25.3. So unreasonable did he think it, that the crime or misery of one, should be the exultation of another. And S. Paul brands it as a great guilt of the Corinthians, that they upon the occasion of the incestuous person were puffed up, when they should have mourned, 1 Corin. 5.2. When we see a dead Corps, we are not apt to insult over it, or brag of our own health and vigor; but it rather damps us, and makes us reflect, that it may (we know not how soon) be our own condition. And certainly the spectacles of Spiritual mortality should have the same operation. We have the same principles of Corruption with our lapsed Brethren, and have nothing but God's grace, to secure us from the same effects, and by these insulting reflections we forfeit that too; for he gives grace only to the humble, James 4.6. Saint Paul's advice therefore is very apposite to this case, Gallat. 6.1. Brethren, if a man be overtaken in a fault, restore such a one in the spirit of meekness, considering thyself, least thou also be tempted. In a word, the faults of others ought to excite our pity towards them, our caution as to ourselves, and our thankfulness to God, if he hath hitherto preserved us from the like, For who made thee to differ from another? 1 Cor. 4.7. But if we spread our Sails and triumph over these wrecks, we expose ourselves to worse. Other sins like Rocks may split us, yet the lading may be preserved: but Pride like a Gulf swallows us up; our very virtues when so leavened, becoming weights and plummetts to sink us to the deeper ruin. The counsel therefore of the Apostle, is very pertinent to this matter, Rom. 11.20. Be not high minded, but fear.

38. BUT God knows we can insult over others when we are not only under a possibility, but are actually involved in the same guilt: and then what are all our accusations and bitter censures of others, but indictments and condemnatory sentences against ourselves? And we may justly expect God should take us at our word, and reply upon us as the Prophet did upon David, Thou art the man, 2 Sam. 12.7. For though our officious vehemence against another's crime, may blind the eyes of men, yet God is not so mocked. As therefore when a thief or murderer is detected, it gives an alarm to the whole confederacy; so when we find our own guilts pursued in other men's Persons, tis not a time for us to join in the prosecution, but rather by humble and penitent reflections on ourselves to provide for our own safety. When therefore we find ourselves (upon any misdemeanor of our brother) ready to mount the Tribunal, and pronounce our sentence, let us first consider how competent we are for the office, calling to mind the decision Christ once made in the like case, He that is without sin let him first cast a stone, Job. 8.7. And if we did this, many perhaps of our fiercest impeachers, would think fit to retire, and leave the delinquent (as they themselves finally desire to be) to the merciful indulgence of a Savior. In short, would we but look into our own hearts, we should find so much work for our inquisitions and censure, that we should not be at leisure to ramble abroad for it. And therefore as Lycurgus once said to one, who importun'd him to establish a popular parity in the state, Do thou, says he, begin it first in thine own family: so I shall advise those that will be judging, to practice first at home. And if they will confine themselves to that, till there be nothing left to correct, I doubt not their neighbor will be well enough secured against their Detractions.

39. ANOTHER preservation against that sin is the frequent contemplation of the last and great judgment. This is indeed a Catholicon against all: but we find it particularly appli'd by St. Paul to this of judging and despising our Brethren. Why dost thou judge thy brother? or why dost thou set at naught thy brother? We shall all stand before the Judgment Seat of Christ, Rom. 14.10. That is the great day of Revelation and Retribution, and we are not to anticipate it by our private inquests or sentences: we have business enough to provide our own accounts against that day. And as it were a spightful folly for Malefactors, that were going together to that bar, to spend their time in exaggerating each others crimes: so surely is it for us, who are all going toward the dreadful tribunal, to be drawing up Charges against one another. And who knows but we may then meet with the fate of Daniel's accusers, see him we censured acquit, and ourselves doomed. The penitence of the criminal may have numbered him among the Saints, when our unretracted uncharitableness may send us to unquenchable Flames. I conclude this consideration with the words of St. James, There is one Lawgiver who is able to save and to destroy, who art thou that judgest another? Jam. 4.12.

50. A third expedient may be, to try to make a revulsion of the humor, to draw it into another channel. If we must needs be talking of other people's faults, let it not be to Defame, but to amend them, by converting our Detraction and backbiting into Admonition and fraternal correption. This is a way to extract medicine out of the viper, to consecrate even this so unhollow'd a part of our temper, and to turn the ungrateful meddling of a busy-body, into the most obliging office of a friend. And indeed had we that zeal for virtue, which we pretend when we inveigh against vice, we should surely lay it out this way; for this only gives a possibility of reforming the offender. But alas we order the matter so, as if we feared to lose the occasion of Clamor, and will tell all the world but him that it most concerns. Indeed tis a deplorable thing to see how universally this necessary Christian duty is neglected; and to that neglect we may in a great degree impute that strange over-flowing of Detraction among us. We know the receiving anything into our Charge, insensibly begets a love and tenderness to it (a nurse upon this account comes often to vie kindness with the mother:) and would we but take one another thus into our care, and by friendly vigilance thus watch over each others souls, tis scarce imaginable what an endearment it would create: such certainly as would infallibly supplant all our unkind reportings and severe descants upon our brethren; since those can never take place, but when there is at least an indifference, if not an enmity.

41. THE next cure I shall propose for Detraction, is to subtract its nourishment, by suppressing all Curiosity and inquisitiveness concerning others. Were all supplies thus cut off, it would at last be subdued. The King of Ethiopia in a vie of Wit with the King of Egypt, proposed it as a Problem to him, to drink up the Sea, to which he repli'd, by requiring him first to stop the access of Rivers to it: and he that would drain this other Ocean, must take the same course, dam up the avenues of those Springs which feed it. He that is always upon the scent, hunting out some discovery of others, will be very apt to invite his neighbors to the quarry; and therefore twill be necessary for him, to restrain himself from that range: not like jealous States, to keep Spies and pensioners abroad to bring him intelligence, but rather discourage all such officious pick-thanks: for the fuller he is of such informations, the more is his pain if he keep them in, and his guilt if he publish them. Could men be persuaded to affect a wholesome ignorance in these matters, it would conduce both to their ease and innocence: for 'tis this Itch of the ear which breaks out at the Tongue: and were not Curiosity the Purveior, Detraction woud soon be starved into a tameness.

42. BUT the most infallible receipt of all, is the frequent recollecting, and serious applying of the grand rule, of doing as we would be don to: for as Detraction is the violation of that, so the observation of that must certainly supplant Detraction. Let us therefore when we find the humor fermenting within us, and ready to break out in Declamations against our brethren, Let us, I say, check it with this short question, Would I myself be thus used? This voice from within, will be like that from heaven to St. Paul, which stopped him in the height of his carrier. Act. 9.4. And this voice every man may hear, that will not stop his ears, nor gag his conscience, it being but the Echo of that native Justice and equity which is planted in our hearts: and when we have our remedy so near us, and will not use it, God may well expostulate with us, as he did with the Jews, Why will ye die, O house of Israel? Ezek. 33.11.

43. THESE are some of those many receipts which may be prescribed against this spreading disease. But indeed there is not so much need to multiply remedies, as to persuade men to apply them. We are in love with our Malady, and as loath to be cured of the Luxury of the Tongue, as St. Augustine was of his other Sensuality, against which he prayed with a Caveat, that he might not be too soon heard. But 'tis ill dallying, where our Souls are concerned: for alas tis they that are wounded by those darts, which we throw at others. We take our aim perhaps at our Neighbors, but indeed hit ourselves: herein verifying in the highest Sense that Axiom of the Wiseman, He that diggeth a pit, shall fall into it, and he that roleth a stone, it shall return upon him, Prov. 25.27. If therefore we have no tenderness, no relenting to our Brethren, yet let us have some to ourselves; so much compassion, nay so much respect to our precious immortal Souls, as not to set them at so despicable a price, to put them in balance with the satisfying of a petulant peevish vanity. Surely the showing ourselves ill-natured (which is all the gain Detraction amounts to) is not so enamouring a design, that we should sacrifice to it our highest interest. 'Tis too much to spend our breath in such a pursuit; O let not our souls also exhale in the vapor; but let us rather pour them out in prayers for our brethren, then in accusations of them: for though both the one and the other will return into our own bosoms, yet God knows to far differing purposes, even as differing as those wherewith we utter them. The Charity of the one like kindly exhalations will descend in showers of blessings, but the rigor and asperity of the other, in a severe doom upon ourselves: for the Apostle will tell us, He shall have judgment without mercy, that hath shown no mercy, James 2.13.

SECT. VII. Of Scoffing and Derision.

THERE is also another fault of the Tongue injurious to our neighbor, and that is Derision and Mockery, and striving to render others as ridiculous and contemptible as we can. This in respect of the subject matter differs from the other of Detraction, as much as folly or deformity do's from vice: yet since injuries as well as benefits, are to be measured by common estimation, this may come in balance with the other. There is such a general aversation in human nature to contempt, that there is scarce anything more exasperating. I will not deny but the excess of that aversation may be leveled against Pride: yet sure scorn and disdain never sprung from humility, and therefore are very incompetent Correctors of the other; so that it may be said of that, as once it was of Diogenes, that he trampled on Plato's Pride with greater of his own.

2. NOR is this injury enhanced only by the resentment of the sufferer, but also by the way of inflicting it. We generally think those are the severest marks of infamy, which are the most indelible. To be burnt in the hand or pilloried, is a more lasting reproach than to be scourged or confined; and it is the same in this case, for here commonly Wit is the Lictor, which is armed with an edge'd tool, and leaves scars behind it. The reproach of rage and fury seem to be writ in Chalk or Lead, which a dispassionate hearer easily wipes out, but those of wit are like the Gravers burine upon Copper, or the corrodings of Aqua-fortis, engrave and indent the Characters that they can never be defaced. The truth of this daily experience attests. A dull contumely quickly vanishes, nobody thinking it worth remembering, but when tis steel'd with Wit, it pierces deep, leaves such impressions in the fancy of the hearers, that thereby it gets rooting in the memory, and will scarce be eradicated: nay sometimes it happens to survive both speaker and hearer, and conveys itself to posterity; it being not unusual for the sarcasms of Wit to be transmitted in story. And as it thus gives an edge, so also do's it add wings to a reproach, makes it fly abroad in an instant. Many a poor man's infirmities had been confined to the notice of a few relations or neighbors, had not some remarkable strain of drollery scattered and dispersed them. The jest recommends the Defamation, and is commonly so incorporate with it, that they cannot be related apart. And even those who like it not in one respect, yet are many times so transported with it in the other, that they choose rather to propagate the contumely, then stifle the conceit. Indeed Wit is so much the Diana of this Age, that he who goes about to set any bounds to it, must expect an uproar, Acts 19.28. or at least to be judged to have imposed an envious inhibition on it, because himself has not stock enough to maintain the trade. But how ever sharp or unexpected the censure may seem to be, yet tis necessary that plain downright truth should sometimes be spoken; and I think that will bear me out, if I say tis possible men may be as oppressive by their parts, as their power; and that God did no more design the meaner intellectuals of some for triumphs to the pride and vanity of the more acute, then he did the possessions of the less powerful, as a prey to the rapine and avarice of the mighty.

3. AND this suggests a yet farther aggravation of this sin, as it is a perverting of God's design, and abuse of the talent he has committed to men in trust. Ingenuity and quickness of parts, is sure to be reckoned in the highest ranks of Blessings, and an instrument proper for the most excellent purposes: and therefore we cannot suppose the Divine Wisdom so much short of Human, as not in his intention to assign it to uses worthy of it. Those must relate either to God, ourselves, or our neighbors. In respect of God, it renders us more capable of contemplating his Perfections, discerning the Equity and Excellence of his Laws, and our obligations to obedience. In regard of ourselves it makes us apprehend our own interest in that obedience; makes us tractable and perswasible, contrary to that Brutish stub bornness of the Horse and Mule, which the Psalmist reproaches, Psal. 32.9. Besides it accommodates us in all the concerns of Human life, forms itself into all those useful contrivances, which may make our being here more comfortable: especially it renders a man company to himself, and in the greatest dearth of Society, entertains him with his own thoughts. Lastly, as to our neighbors, it renders us useful and assistant. All those Discoveries and Experiments, those Arts and Sciences, which are now the common treasure of the world, took their first rise from the ingenuity of particular persons: and in all personal Exigencies wherein any of us are at any time involved, we need not be told the usefulness of a wise adviser. Now all these are employments commensurable to the faculty from whence they flow, and that answer its excellence and value; and he that so bestows his talent, gives a good account of his trust. But I would fain know under which of these Heads Derision of our Neighbor comes in: certainly not under that of being assistant to him. It would be a sorry relief to a poor indigent wretch, to lavish out wit upon him, in upbraiding of his misery. And is not this a parallel case? Is it not the same Barbarism, to mock and reproach a man that wants the gifts of Nature, as him that wants those of Fortune? Nay perhaps it may be more, for a Beggar may have impoverisht himself by his own fault, but in Natural defects there is nothing to be charged, unless we will fly higher, and arraign that Providence that hath so dispensed. In a word, as the Superfluities of the Rich are by God assigned as the storehouse of the poor, so the Abilities of the Wise are of the ignorant: for tis a great mistake, to think ourselves Stewards in some of God's gifs, and proprietaries in others. They are all equally to be employed, according to the designation of the Donor, and there is nothing more universally designed by him, then that mankind should be equally helpful to one another. Those therefore whom God hath blest with higher degrees of sagacity and quickness, ought not to look down on others as the objects of their contempt or scorn, but rather of their care and pity, endeavoring to rescue them from those mischiefs, to which their weakness may expose them, remembering still, that God might have changed the Scene, and made themselves what they see others. It is part of Jobs justification of his integrity, that he was eyes to the Blind, and feet to the Lame, Job. 29.25. (i. e.) he accommodated his assistances to all the wants and exigencies of others: and sure tis no less the part of a good man to do it in the Mental then in the Corporeal defects.

4. BUT alas many of us would rather put a stumbling block in the way of the Blind, pull away the Crutch from the Lame, that we may sport ourselves to see them tumble: such a sensuality we have in observing and improving the imperfections of others, that it is become the grand excellence of the Age to be Dextrous at it, and Wit serves some men for little else. We are got indeed into a merry world, Laughing is our main business; as if because it has been made part of the Definition of man, that he is Risible, his man-hood consisted in nothing else. But alas, if that be all the use men have of their understandings, they were given them to little purpose, since mere Idiots can laugh with as much pleasure and more innocence then they; and it is a great instance how extremes may be brought to meet, that the excess of Wit in the one, and of Folly in the other, serve to produce the same effect.

5. YET so voracious is this humor now grown, that it draws in everything to feed it. There is not game enough from the real folly of the world, and therefore that which is the most distant from it must be stamped with its mark. Tis a known story of the Frier who on a fasting day bid his Capon be Carp, and then very Canonically ate it; and by such a transubstantiating power our Wits bid all seriousness and consideration be formality and foppery, and then under that name endeavor to hunt it out of the world. I fear moral honesty fares not better with some of them then moral prudence. The old Philosophical virtues of Justice, Temperance, and Chastity are now hist off the stage, as fit only for the Antiquated set of Actors, and he that appears in that equipage, is by many thought more ridiculous, then he that walks the street in his Ancestors trunk-hose. Nay indeed vice its self is scarce secure if it have not the grand accomplishment of impudence: a puny blushing sinner is to be laughed out of his Modesty, though not out of his sin; and to be proof against their scorns he must first be so against all the regrets of his own mind.

6. AND if mere Ethnic virtue, or shame-fac'd vice have this treatment, Christian Piety must expect worse: and so indeed it finds, its possessors being beyond all others exposed to their scorn and contempt. Nor is it strange it should be so, such men being made, as it is Wisd.

2.14. to reprove their ways, they think in their own defense they are to deride theirs. This is it indeed which gives a secret sting and venom to their reproaches: other men they abuse as an exercise of their Wit, but these in defense of the party. So Julian after his Apostasy, thought it a more effectual way to persecute the Christians by taunts and ironies, then by racks and tortures, as thinking it more possible to shame, then fright them out of their religion. And the stratagem seems to have been reassumed by many in this Age, and I fear with too great success: for I doubt not there are divers who have herded themselves amongst these profane Scoffers, not that they are convinced by their reasons, but terrified by their contumelies; and as some Indians are said to worship the Devil, that he may not hurt them; so these choose to be active, that they may not be passive in the contemts flung upon Religion: such men forget the dreadful denunciation of Christ against those that shall be ashamed of him and his words, Mat. 8.38.

7. As for those who, upon a juster estimate, find the advantages of piety worthy to be chosen, and take it with all its necessary ignominies, they have the encouragement of very good company in their sufferings. The Psalmist long ago had his share, when not only Those that sae in the gate spake against him, but the drunkards made songs upon him, Psalm. 69.12. 'Twas also the Prophet Jeremies complaint, I am in Derision daily, everyone mocketh me, Jer. 20.7. Nay our blessed Lord himself was derided in his life by the Pharisees, Luke 16.14. mocked and reviled at his death by the Priests, the Elders, the Soldiers; nay by casual passengers, Mat. 27.39. And shall the servant think himself greater then his Lord? Shall a Christian expect an immunity from what his Savior has born before him? (He that do's so, is too delicate a member for a crucified head.) No sure, let us rather animate ourselves, as the Apostle exhorts, by considering him who as well despised the shame, as endured the cross for us, Heb. 12.3. and who has not only given an example, but proposed a reward, a Beatitude to those who are reviled for righteousness sake, Mat. 3.11. And when this is soberly ponder'd, 'twill sure make it easy for us to resolve with holy David in a like case, I will be yet more vile, 2 Sam. 6.22.

8. BUT to return from this digression, to those who thus unhappily employ their parts, let me propose to them, that they would borrow every day some few minutes from their mirth, and seriously consider, whether this be (I need not say a Christian, but) a manly exercise of their faculties. Alas when they have rallied out the day from one company to another, they may sum up their account at night in the wise man's simile, their Laughter has been but like the crackling of Thorns under a pot, Eccclus. 6.7. made a little brisk noise for the present, and with the sparkles perhaps annoyed their Neighbors, but what real good has it brought to themselves? All that they can fancy is but the repute of Wit. But sure that might be attainable some other way. We find the world affected to new things, and this of Derision and Abuse to others is so beaten a road, that perhaps the very variety of a new way would render it acceptable. They are the lighter substances that still swim away with the stream, the greater and more solid bodies do sometimes stop the current: and sure 'twere a noble essay of man's parts to stem this tide, and by a more useful application of their own faculties, convince others that theirs might be better employed. Tis said of Anacharsis, that at a feast he could not be got to smile at the affected railleries of common Jesters, but when an Ape was brought in he freely laughed, saying, an Ape was ridiculous by nature, but men by art and study. And truly tis a great contempt of human nature to think their intellects were given them for no better end than to raise that laughter, which a brute can do as well or better.

9. I would not be thought to recommend such a Stoical sourness, as shall admit of nothing of the cheerful pleasant part of Conversation. God has not sure been more rigid to our Minds than to our Bodies: and as he has not so devoted the one to toil, but that he allows us some time to exercise them in recreation as well as labors, so doubtless he indulges the same relaxation to our Minds; which are not always to be scrued up to the height, but allowed to descend to those easinesses of Converse, which entertain the lower Faculties of the Soul. Nor do I think those are ill employed in those little skirmishes of Wit, which pass familiarly between intimates and acquaintances, which besides the present divertisement, serve to whet and quicken the fancy. Yet I conceive this liberty is to be bounded with some Cautions: as first in these encounters, the Charge should be Powder, not Bullets; there should nothing be said that should leave any ungrateful impressions, or give any umbrage of a spiteful intent. The world wants not experiments of the mischiefs have happened by too severe Railleries: in such Fencing, jest has proved earnest, and Florets have oft turned to Swords, and not only the Friendship, but the Men have fallen a Sacrifice to a Jest.

19. SECONDLY this is to have the same restriction with all other recreations, that it be made a divertisement, not a trade. Tis an insinuating thing, and is apt to encroach too much upon our time, and God knows we have a great deal of business of this world, and much more for the next, which will not be don with laughing, and therefore tis not for us to play away too much of that time, which is exacted by more serious concerns. Tis sure we shall die in Earnest, and it will not become us to live altogether in Jest. But besides this stealth of our time, tis apt to steal away men's hearts too, make them so dote upon this kind of entertainment, that it averts them from anything more serious. I believe I may appeal to some who have made this their business, whether it go not against the hair with them to set to anything else: and having espoused this as their one excellence, they are willing to decry all others, that they may the more value themselves upon this. By this means it is, that the gift of Raillery has in this Age, like the lean kine, devoured all the more solid worthy qualifications; and is counted the most reputable accomplishment. A strange inverted estimate, thus to prefer the little ebullitions of Wit, before solid reason and judgment. If they would accommodate their Diet at the same rate, they shall eat the Husk rather than the Kernel, and drink nothing but froth and bubbles. But after all, Wisdom is commonly at long running justified even of her Despisers; these great Idolaters of Wit often dashing themselves upon such Rocks, as make them too late wish, their Sails had been less, and their Ballast more. For the preventing therefore of more such wracks, I wish the present caution may be more adverted to, not to bestow an unproportionable part of our time or value on this slight exercise of man's slightest Faculty.

11. A third Caution in this matter, is to confine ourselves to present Company, not to make absent Persons the Subject of our mirth. Those freedoms we use to a man's face as they are commonly more moderate, so they are more equitable, because we expose ourselves to the like from him; but the back blows are disingenuous, and give suspicion we intend not a fair trial of Wit, but a cowardly murder of a man's fame. Twas the precept of the Philosopher, Deride not the absent, and I think it may well be so of the Politician: there being nothing more imprudent as to our civil concerns then the contrary liberty. For those things never die in the company they are first vented in (nay perhaps the hearer is not willing his wit should so soon expire;) and when they once take air, they quickly come to the notice of the derided Person, and then nothing in the world is more disobliging. Twas a sober precept given one, not so much as to laugh in compliance with him that derides another, for you will be hated by him he derides. And if an accessory be hated, sure much more the principal: and I think I may say, there are many can sooner forgive a solemn deep contrivance against them, then one of their jocular reproaches: for he that designs seems to acknowledge them considerable, but he that mocks them, seems to think them too low for anything but contempt: and we learn from Aristotle, that the measure of anger is entirely taken thence; men being so far provoked, as they imagine they were slighted or affronted. In mere secular wisdom it will therefore become men to consider, whether this trade be like to turn to account, or whethere it be worth the while, at once to make a jest and an enemy.

12. AND if it be imprudent to make man our enemy, tis much more to make God so, by levelling our blows at anything sacred: but of that I have already had occasion to speak, and shall not repete; only give me leave to say, that besides the profaner sort of jests, which more immediately reflect on him, he is concerned in all the unjust reproaches of our brethren, our love to them being confirmed by the same divine Sanction with our reverence to him: and sure nothing is more inconsistent with that love, then the exposing them to that contempt we are ourselves so impatient of. In a word what repute soever this practice now has of Wit, it is very far from wisdom to provoke God that we may also disoblige man: and if we will take the Scripture estimate, we shall find a Scorn is no such honorable Epithet as we seem to account it. Solomon do's almost constantly set it in opposition to a Wise man: thus it is, Prov. 9.8. and again, Chap. 13.1. and many other places; and on the other side, closely links it with the Fool: and that not only in title, but in punishment too, Judgments are prepared for scorners, and stripes for the back of fools, Prov. 19.29. So that if our Wits think not Solomon too dull for their Cabal, we see what a turn he will give to their present verdict.

13. AND if these reproaches which aim only at ostentation of Wit, be so unjustifiable, what shall we say to those, that are drawn with blacker lines, that are founded in Malice or Envy, or some undermining design? Every man that is to be supplanted, cannot always be attacked with a down-right battery: perhaps his integrity may be such, that, as 'twas said of Daniel, Chap. 6.4. They can find no occasion against him: and when they cannot shake the main Fort, they must try if they can possess themselves of the out-works, raise some prejudice against his discretion, his humor, his carriage, and his most extrinsic adherents, and if by representing him ridiculous in any of these, they can but abate men's reverence to him, their confidence of him will not long hold out; bare honesty without some other adornment, being looked on as a leaf-less tree, nobody will trust himself to its shelter. Thus the enemies of Socrates, when they could no other way suppress his reputation, hired Aristophanes a Comic Poet to personate him on the stage, and by the insinuations of those interludes, insensibly conveyed first a contempt, and then a hatred of him into the hearts of the people. But I need not bring instances of former times in this matter, these being sufficiently verst in that mystery.

14. IT is not strange that men of such designs, should summon all their Wit to the service, make their Railleries as picquant as they can, that they may wound the deeper: but methinks 'tis but a mean office they assign their Wit, to be (I will not say the Pander, that being in this Age scarce a title of reproach, but) the executioner or hangman to their malice. Christ bids us be wise as Serpents, yet adds withal harmless as Doves; Mat. 10.18. but here the Serpent has quite eat up the Dove, and puts a Vultur in the place, a creature of such sagacity and diligence in pursuit of the prey, that 'tis hard for any art or innocence to escape its talons.

15. THERE is yet another sort of Contumelious Persons, who indeed are not chargeable with that circumstance, of ill employing their Wit, for they use none in it. These are people whose sole talent is Pride and Scorn; who perhaps have attained the Sciences of dressing themselves finely, and eating well, and upon the strength of those excellences, look fastidiously, and speak disdainfully on any that want them; concluding if a man fall short of their Garniture at the Knees and Elbowes, he is much inferior to them in the furniture of his Head. Such people think crying, O ridiculous! is an ample Confutation of anything can be said; and so they can but despise enough, are contented not to be able to say why they do so. These are, I confess, the most innocent kind of Deriders in respect of others, what they say having not edge enough to cause any smart. The greatest hurt they do is to themselves, who though they much need, yet are generally little capable of a rescue, and therefore I shall not clog the present discourse with any advise to them: I shall choose rather to conclude with enforcing my Suit to the former, that they would soberly and sadly weigh the account they must one Day give of the Employment of their Parts, and the more they have hitherto embeazled them, the more to endeavor to expiate that unthriftiness, by a more careful Managery for the future; that so instead of that vain, empty, vanishing Mirth they have courted here, they may find a real, full, and eternal Satisfaction in the Joy of their Lord.

SECT. VIII. Of Flattery.

1. THE last of Verbal injuries to our Neighbor which I shall mention, is Flattery. This is indeed the fatallest wound of the Tongue, carries least Smart, but infinitely more of Danger, and is as much superior to the former, as a Gangrene is to a Gall or Scratch; this may be sore and vexing, but that stupefying and deadly. Flattery is such a Mystery, such a Riddle of iniquity, that its very softnesses are its cruellest rigors, its Balm corrodes, and (to comprize all in the Psalmists excellent Description) its words are smoother then oil, and yet be they very swords, Psalm. 56.21.

1. BUT besides the mischiefs of it to the Patient, 'tis the most dishonoring, the most vilifying thing to the Agent. I shall not need to empanel a Jury either of Moralists or Divines, every man's own breast sufficiently instructing him in the unworthiness of it. Tis indeed a Collective accumulative Baseness, it being in its Element a compound and complex of the most sordid, hateful qualities incident to Mankind. I shall instance in three, viz. Lying, Servility, and Trechery, which being detestably deformed single, must in Conjunction make up a loathsome Monstrous guilt. Now though Flattery has two Branches, yet these lie so at the Root as equally to influence both: for whether you take it as it is the giving of praise where it is not due, or the professing of kindness which is not real, these Properties are still its Constitutive parts.

3. AND first we may take Lying to be the very corner Stone of the Fabric; for take it away, and the Whole falls to the ground. A Parasite would make but a lean trade of it, that should confine himself to truth. For though tis possible so to order the manner and circumstances, as to flatter even in the representing a man's real virtues to him, yet commonly if they do not falsify as to the kind, they are forced to do it as to the degree. Besides as there are but few such subjects of Flattery, so neither are men of that Worth so receptive of it. Such sort of addresses are less dangerous to those who have the perspicacity to see thro them: so that these Merchants are under a necessity of dealing with the more ignorant Chapmen, and with them their counterfeit wares will go off best. It is indeed strange to consider, with what gross impudent falsehoods men of this trade will court their Patrons. How many in former Ages have not only amass'd together all sublunary excellences, but have even ransacked heaven to supply their Flattery, Deified their Princes, and persuaded them they were God's, who at last found they were to die like men? And though this strain be now out-dated, yet perhaps tis not that the vice is grown more modest, but that Atheism has robbed it of that Topic. Those that believe no God, would rather seem to annihilate then magnify the person to whom they should apply the title. But I do not find that the practice has any other bounds. A great man's vices shall still be called virtues; his deformities, beauties; and his most absurd follies, the height of ingenuity. Such a subtle Alchemist is this Parasite, that he turns all he touches into gold, imaginary indeed as to the deluded Person, but ofttimes real to himself. Nor is Lying less natural to the other part of Flattery, the Profession of service and kindness. This needs no evidencing, and to attempt it would be a self-Confutation: for if those Professions be true, they are not Flattery, therefore if they be Flattery, they must needs be Lies. It will be almost as needless to expatiate on the baseness and meanness of that sin; for though there is no Subject that affords more matter for Declamation, yet Lying is a thing that is ashamed of itself, and therefore may well be remitted to its own convictions. Tis Aristotle's observation, that all Elements but the Earth, had some Philosopher or other, that gave it his vote to be the first productive Principle of all things: and I think we may now say, that all Crimes have had their Abettors and fautors, somebody that would stand up in their defense; only Lying is so much the dregs and refuse of wickedness, that none has yet had Chymistry enough to sublimate it, to bring it into such a reputation, that any man will think fit to own it: the greater wonder that what is under so universal a reproach, should be so commonly admitted in practice. But by this we may make an estimate, what the whole body of Flattery is, when in one limb of it we find so much corruption.

4. A second is Servility and Abjectness of humor: and of this there needs no other proof than has been already given; this charge being implicitly involved in the former of Lying, the condescending to that, being a mark of a disingenuous spirit. And accordingly the nobler Heathens looked on it as the vice of Slaves and vassals, below the liberty of a free man, as well as an honest. But though I need no other evidence to make good the accusation, yet every Sycophant furnishes me with many supernumerary proofs. Look upon such a one, and you shall see his eyes immoveably fixed on his Patrons face, watching each look, each glance, and in every change of his countenance (like a Star-gazer) reading his own destiny, his Ears chain'd (like Gally-slaves at the oar) to his dictate, sucking in the most insipid discourses with as much greediness, as if they were the Apothegms of the seven Sages, his Tongue tuned only to Panegyrics and Acclamations, his feet in winged motion upon every nod or other signification of his pleasure: in a word, his whole body (as if it had no other animal spirits than what it derived from him) varies its postures, its exercises, as he finds agreeable to the humor he is to serve. And can humanity contrive to debase itself more? Yes it can, and do's to often, by enslaving its Diviner part to, taking up not only opinions, but even crimes also in compliance, playing the incarnate Devil, and helping to act those villainies which Satan can only suggest: and if this be not a state of abject slavery, sure there is none in the world. Plutarch tells us, that Philoxenus for despising some dull Poetry of Dionysius, was by him condemned to dig in the Quarries: from whence being by the mediation of friends remanded, at his return Dionysius produced some other of his verses, which as soon as Philoxenus had heard, he made no reply, but calling to the Waiters, said, Let them carry me again to the Quarries. And if a heathen Poet could prefer a corporeal slavery before a mental, what name of reproach is low enough for those, who can submit to both, in pursuit of those poor sordid advantages they project by their Flatteries? Nor is this baseness more observable in these mean fawnings and observances, than it is in the protestations of kindness and Friendship. Love is the greatest gift any man has to bestow, and Friendship the sacredest of all moral bonds, and to prostitute these to little pitiful designs, is sure one of the basest cheats we can put upon our common nature, in thus debasing her purest and most current coin, which by these frequent adulterations is become so suspected, that scarce any man knows what he receives. But Christian Charity is yet worse used in the case: for that obliging to all sincerity, is hereby induced to give gold for dross, exhibit that Love indeed, and in truth, which is returned only in word and in Tongue, 1 Joh. 3.18. And so it do's in those who observe its rules: but in those who own, yet observe them not, 'tis yet a greater sufferer, by laboring under the scandal of all their dissimulations. It was once the Character given Christians, even by their Enemies, Behold how they love one another: but God knows we may now be pointed out by a very differing mark, Behold how they deceive and delude one another. And sure this violation we herein offer to our Religion, do's not allay but aggravate the baseness of this practice: for if in the other we sell ourselves, in this we sell our God too, sacrifice our interest in him to get a surreptitious title to the favor of a man. And this I conceive do's in the second place not much commend the art of Flattery, which is built up of so vile materials.

5. AND to complete this infamous composition, in the third place Trechery comes in; a crime of so odious a kind, that to name it is to implead it: yet how intrinsic a part this is of Flattery, will need no great skill to evidence, daily experience sufficiently doing it. Tis a common observation of Flatterers, that they are like the Heliotrope, open only towards the sun, but shut and contract themselves at night, and in cloudy weather. Let the object of their adoration be but eclipsed, they can see none of those excellences which before dazzled their eyes: and however inconstant they may seem in it to others, they are indeed very constant to themselves, true to their fixed principle, of courting the greatness, not the man; in pursuit whereof their old Idol is often made a sacrifice to their new: all malicious discovery is made of their falling friend, to buy an interest in the rising one. Of this there are such crouds of examples in Story, that it would be impertinent to single out any, especially in an Age that is fitter to furnish presidents for the future, than to borrow of the past-times. But supposing the Parasite not actually guilty of this base revolt (which yet he seldom fails to be upon occasion) yet is he no less Trecherous even in the height of his Blandishments; and while he most courts a man, he do's the most ruinously undermine him. For first he abuses him in his understanding, precludes him from that which wise men have judged the most essential part of Learning, the knowledge of himself, from which 'tis the main business of the Flatterer to divert him. And to this abuse there is another inevitably consequent: for this ignorance of his faults or follies, necessarily condemns him to the continuing in them, it being impossible for him to think of correcting either the one or the other, who is made believe he has neither. This is like the trechery of a bribed officer in a Garrison, who will not let the weak parts be fortified, and lays the man as open to assaults as that doth the Town. Yet this is not all, he do's not only provide for the continuance, but the improving of his crimes and errors, which alas are too prolific of themselves, but being cultivated and manured with perpetual soothings and encouragements, grow immesurably luxuriant. And accordingly we see that men used only to applauses, are so swelled with them, that their insolences are intolerable. And this they are sometimes taught to their cost, when they happen among free-men, who will not submit to all they say, nor commend all they do. And finding these uneasy contradictions when they come abroad, they are willing to retire to their most complaisant company: and so this Sycophant Devil having once got them within his circle, may enchant them as he pleases, lead them from one wickedness to another, And as Caligula and other voluptuous Emperors, by being adored as God's, sunk in their sensuality below the Nature of man, so these celebrated Persons are by that false veneration animated to all those reprochful practices, which may expose them to a real contempt; their follies, as well as their vices still get head, till they answer the description the Wise man gives of the old Giants, Who fell away in the strength of their foolishness. Ecclus. 16.7.

6. AND sure he that betrays a man to all these mischiefs, may well be thought perfidious. But that which infinitely amplifies and enhances the Trechery is, that all this is acted under the notion and disguise of a friend; a relation so venerable, that methinks tis the nearest secular transcript of the treason, which is storied of those who have administered Poison in the Eucharist. The name of a friend is such an endearment, as nothing human can equal. All other natural or civil ties take their greatest force from this. What signifies an unfriendly

Parent, or Brother, or Wife? Tis friendship only that is the cement which really and effectively combines mankind: and therefore we may observe, that God reckoning up other relations, illustrates them by several notes of endearment, but when he comes to that of friendship, tis the friend who is as thine own soul, Deut. 13.6. nothing below the highest instance was thought expressive enough of that union. What a Legion of Fiends then possesseth men that can break these chains Mat. 5.4. nay that can hammer and forge those very chains into Daggers and Stilletoes, and make their friendship an engine of ruin? This is certainly the blackest color wherein we can view a Parasite, his false light makes the shadow the more dismal. As the Ape has a peculiar deformity above other brutes by that aukward and ungraceful resemblance he has to a man, so sure a Flatterer is infinitely the more hateful for being the ugly counterfeit of a Friend. And as this Trechery lies at the bottom of the Panegyrics, so also do's it of all the caresses and exuberant kindness of a Flatterer, which if they aimed not at any particular end of circumvention, must yet in the general be treacherous by being false. A man looks on the love of his friend as one of the richest possessions (upon which account the Philosopher thought friends were to be Inventoried as well as goods.) What a defeat and discomfiture is it to a man when he comes to use this wealth, to find it all false metal, such as will not answer any of those purposes for which he depended on it. There cannot sure be a greater Trechery, then first to raise a confidence and then deceive it. But besides this fundamental falseness, there are also many incidental Trecheries, which fall in upon occasion of particular designs. A pretence of kindness is the universal stale to all base projects: by this men are robbed of their fortunes, and women of their honor: in a word all the wolfish designs walk under this sheep's clothing; and as the world goes, men have more need to beware of those who call themselves friends, then those who own themselves enemies.

7. THESE are the lineaments of this vice of Flattery, which sure do together make up a face of most extreme deformity. I might upon a true account add another, and charge it with folly too. I am sure according to the Divine estimate it is always so: and truly it do's not seldom prove so in the secular also. Men of this art do sometimes drop their vizard before they have got the prize, and then there is nothing in the world that appears to contemptible, so silly; a barefaced Flatterer being everybody's scorn. The short is, wherever this game is played there is always a fool in the case: if the parasite be detected, it falls to his share: if he be not, to his whom he deludes. But at the best tis but subtlety and cunning he can boast of; and if he can in his own fancy raise that to the opinion of true Wisdom, tis a sign he is come round to practice his deceits upon himself, and is as much his own Flatterer as he has been others.

8. AND now I know not whether it be more shame or wonder, to see that men can so put off ingenuity, and the native greatness of their kind, as to descend to so base, so ignoble a vice: yet alas we daily see it don, and that not only by the scum and refuse of the people, such as Job speaks of, who are viler then the earth, Cap. 30.8. but by Persons of all conditions. Flattery like a spring forced upwards ascends, as cares are by the wise man said to descend, Ecclus. 40.4. from him that weareth a linen frock to him that weareth a crown: all intermedial degrees are but like pipes, which as they suck from below, so transmit it still upwards. There are few so low but find somebody to cajole and flatter them. Some interest or other may sometimes be to be served even upon the meanest; and those that find themselves thus solicited for benefits, are easily taught by it how to address to their immediate superiors, from whom they expect greater: and as 'tis thus handed from one rank to another, the art still is more subtilized and refined (God help poor Princes the while, who commonly meet with the Elixir, and quintessence of this venom:) and thus it passes thro all states and conditions: as they are passive on the one side, and are flattered by some, so they are active on the other, and flatter others.

9. I say all conditions, I do not say all Persons in those conditions, for no truly generous soul can stoop so low: but tis too evident to what a low ebb Generosity as well as Christianity is grown, by the numbers of those who thus degrade themselves, every little petty interest being thought worth these base submissions. And truly it is hard to find, by what Topic of persuasion to assault such men. The meanness, or the sin will scarce be dissuasives to those who have reconciled themselves to both: if anything can be pertinently said to them, it must be upon the score of Interest, for that being their grand principle, they can with no pretence disclame the inferences drawn thence.

10. LET them therefore duly balance the advantages they project from this practice with the mischiefs and dangers of it. What they expect is commonly either Honor or wealth, these they hope may be acquired by their prostrations to those, who can dispense or procure them. Tis true, as Honor signifies Greatness and Power, it is sometimes attained by it, but then as it signifies Reputation and Esteem, 'tis as sure to be lost. He that thus ascends, may be looked on with fear, but never with reverence. Now I think tis no good bargain to exchange this second notion of Honor for the first: for besides the difference in the intrinsic value, tis to be considered how tottering a Pinnacle unmerited Greatness is. He that raised him to satisfy his humor at one time, can (with more ease and equal justice) throw him down at another: and when such a man do's fall, he falls as without pity, so without remedy, has no foundation on which to rebuild his fortune. His Sycophanting arts being detected, that Game is not to be plaid the second time: whereas a man of a clear reputation, though his barque be split, yet he saves his Cargo, has something left towards setting up again, and so is in capacity of receiving benefit not only from his own industry, but the friendship of others. A sound piece of Timber, if it be not thought fit for one use, yet will be laid by for another: and an honest man will probably at one time or other be thought good for something.

11. As for the other aim, that of Wealth, 'tis very possible that may sometimes be compassed; and well it may, the flatterer having several Springs to feed it by. For he that has a great Patron, has the advantage of his countenance and Authority, he has that of his bounty and liberality, and he has another (sometimes greater then both) that of his negligence and deceivableness. But yet all these acquisitions are many times like Fairy money, what is brought one night is taken away the next. Men of this mold seldom know how to bear prosperity temperately, and it is no new thing to see a Privado carry it so high, as to awaken the jealousy of his promoter, which being assisted by the busy industry of those who envy his fortune, twill be easy enough to find some flaw in the Gettings, by which to unravel the whole Web: an event that has been oft experimented not only in the private managery of Families, but in the most public administrations. And these are such hazards, that laid all together would much recommend to any the Moral of Horaces Fable, and make one choose the Country Mouses plain fare and safety, rather than the delicacies of the City with so much danger. This then is the state of the prosperous Parasite. But alas how many are there who never arrive to this, but are kickt down ere they have climb'd the two or three first rounds of the Ladder, whose designs are so humble, as not to aspire above a Major-Domo, or some such domestic preferment (for, in this trade there are adventures of all sizes.) But upon all these considerations, methinks it appears no very inviting one to any. At the long run an honest freedom of speech will more recommend a man, than all these sneaking flatteries: we have a very wise man's word for it, he that rebuketh a man, afterwards shall find more favor, then he that flattereth with his lips, Prov. 28.23.

12. BUT after all that hath or can be said, the suppression of Flattery will most depend upon those Persons to whom it is address: if it be not repuls'd there, nothing else will discourage it; and if it be, 'tis crushed in the egg, and can produce no viper. These Vulturs prey only on carcasses, on such stupid minds, as have not life and vigor enough to fray them away. Let but Persons of quality entertain such customers with a severe brow, with some smart expression of dislike, those Leeches will immediately fall off. In Sparta when all laws against theft proved ineffectual, at last they fixed the penalty on them that were robbed, and by that did the business: and in the present case, if 'twere made as infamous to be flatter'd as 'tis to flatter, I believe it might have the like effect. Indeed there is pretence enough to make it so: for first as to Wit, the advantage is clear on the Flatterers side: he must be allowed to have more of that (which in this Age is more than a counterpoise to honesty; and as for virtue, the balance (as to the principal motive) seems to hang pretty even: tis the vice of Avarice that temts the one to flatter, and the vice of Pride that makes it acceptable to the other. The truth is, there is the bottom of the matter: tis that secret confederate within, that exposes men to those assaults from without. We have generally such an appetite to praise, that we greedily suck in without staying to examine whether it belong to us or no, or whether it be designed as a kindness or an abuse. Other injuries rush upon us with violence, and give us notice of their approach: they may be said to come like water into our bowels; but this like oil into our bones, Ps. 109.18. penetrates easily, undiscernibly, by help of that native propension we have to receive it. Tis therefore the near concern of all, especially of those whose quality most exposes them, to keep a guard upon that treacherous inmate, not to let that step into the scale to make a base Sycophant out-weigh a true friend. And when ever they are attacked with extravagant Encomiums, let them fortify themselves with this Dilemma, either they have those excellences they are praised for, or they have not: if they have not, tis an apparent cheat and gull, and he is of a pitiful forlorn understanding that delights to be fool'd; but if they have, they are too good to be exposed to such worms who will instantly wither the fairest gourd, John. 4.7.

For as it is said of the Grand Signior, that no grass grows where his horse once treads: so we may say of the Flatterer, no virtue ever prospers where he is admitted: if he find any he hugs it till he stifles it, if he find none, he so indisposes the soil, that no future seeds can ever take root. In fine, he is a mischief beyond the description of any Character. O let not men then act this Part to themselves by being their own Parasites! and then twill be an easy thing to escape all others.

SECT. IX. Of Boasting.

1. WE have now seen some effects of an ungovern'd Tongue, as they relate to God and our Neighbor. There is yet a third sort which reflect upon a man's self. So unboundedly mischievous is that petulant member, that heaven and earth are not wide enough for its range, but it will find work at home too; and like the viper, that after it had devoured its companions, prei'd upon its self, so it corrodes inward, and becomes as fatal to its owner, as to all the world besides.

2. OF this there are as many instances, as there are imprudent things said, for all such have the worst reflection upon the speaker: and therefore all that have given rules for civil life, have in order to it put very severe restraints upon the Tongue, that it run not before the judgment. Twas the advice of Zeno to dip the Tongue in the mind before one should permit it to speak. Theophrastus used to say, It was safer trusting to an unbridled, horse, then to intemperate speech. And daily experience confirms the Aphorism; for those that set no guard upon their Tongues, are hurried by them into a thousand indecences, and very often into real considerable mischiefs. By this means men have proved their own delators, discovered their own most important secrets: and whereas their heart should have kept a lock upon their Tongues, they have given their Tongue the key of their heart, and the event has been oft as unhappy as the proceeding was preposterous. There are indeed so many ways for men to lose themselves in their talk, that I should do the like if I should pretend to trace them. Besides my subject leads me not to discourse Ethically, but Christianly of the faults of the Tongue, and therefore I have all along considered the one no farther then it happens to be twisted with the other.

3. IN the present case I shall insist only upon one fault of the Tongue, which partakes of both kinds, and it is at once a vice and a folly, I mean that of Boasting and vaunting a man's self: a strain to which some men's tongues have a wonderful glibness. No discourse can be administered, but they will try to turn the tide, and draw it all into their own Chanel, by entertaining you with long stories of themselves: or if there be no room for that, they will at least screw in here and there some intimations of what they did or said. Yea so stupid a vanity is this, that it works alike upon all materials: not only their greater and more illustrious acts or sentences, but even their most slight and trivial occurrences, by being theirs, they think acquire a considerableness, and are forcibly imposed upon the company; the very dreams of such people strait commence prophesy, and are as seriously related, as if they were undoubted revelations. And sure if we reflect upon our Saviors rule, that Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh, we cannot but think these men are very full of themselves; and to be so, is but another phrase for being very proud. So tis Pride in the heart, which is the spring that feeds this perpetual current at the mouth, and under that notion we are to consider it.

4. AND truly there is nothing can render it more infamous, Pride being a vice that of all others is the most branded in Scripture as most detestable to God, and is signaled by the punishment to be so. This turned Lucifer out of Heaven, Nebuchadnezzar out of his Throne, nay out of Human society. And indeed it seems still to have something of the same effect, nothing rendering a man so inconsiderable; for it sets him above the meaner sort of company, and makes him intolerable to the better, and to complete the parallel, he seldom comes to know himself till he be turned a grazing, be reduced to some extremities.

5. BUT this Boasting arrogant humor, though always bad, yet is more or less so according to the Subject on which it works. If it be only on Natural excellences, as Beauty, Wit; or accidental acquisitions, as Honor, Wealth, or the like, yet even here tis not only a Theft, but a Sacrilege; the glory of those being due only to the Donor, not to the receiver, there being not so much as any predisposition in the subject to determine God's bounty. He could have made the most deformed Beggar as handsome and as rich, as those who most pride themselves in their wealth and beauty. No man fancies himself to be his own Creator, and though some have assumed to be the Architects of their own fortunes, yet the frequent defeats of men's industry and contrivance, do sufficiently confute that bold pretence, and evince, that there is something above them, which can either blast or prosper their attempts. What an invasion then is it of God's right, to ingross the honor of those things being don, which were not at all in their power to do? And sure the folly is as great in respect of men, as the sin is towards God. This boasting like a heavy Nurse, over-lays the Child: the vanity of that quite drowns the notice of the things in which tis founded; and men are not so apt to say, such a man is Handsom, Wise, or Great, as that he is proud upon the fancy of being so. In a word, he that celebrates his own excellences, must be content with his own applauses, for he will get none of others, unless it be from those fawning Sycophants, whose praises are worse then bitterest Detraction.

6. AND yet so sottish a vice is Pride, that it can make even those insidious Flatteries matter of boast, which is a much more irrational object of it then the former. How eagerly do some men propagate every little Encomium their Parasites make of them? With what gust and sensuality will they tell how such a Jest of theirs took, or such a Magnificence was admired? Tis pleasant to see what little arts and dexterities they have to wind in such things into discourse: when alas it amounts to no more then this, that some have thought them fools enough to be flatter'd, and tis odds but the hearers will think them enough so to be laughed at.

7. BUT there is yet another Subject of Boasting more foolish, and more criminal too then either of the former, and that is when men vaunt of their Piety, which if it were true, were yet less owing to themselves then any natural endowment. For though we do not at all assist towards them, yet do we neither obstruct; but in the operations of Grace tis otherwise; we have there a principle of opposition, and God never makes us his own till he subdue that: and though he do it not by an irresistible force, but by such sweet and gentle insinuations, that we are sometimes captivated ere we are aware: yet that do's not impeach his right of conquest, but only shows him the more gracious conqueror. Tis true in respect of the event we have great cause of exultance and joy, God's service being the most perfect freedom; yet in regard of the efficiency, we have as little matter of Boast, as the surprised City has in the triumphs of its victor.

8. BUT secondly either this vaunted Piety is not real, and then tis good for nothing, or else by being vaunted becomes so. If it be not real, tis then the superadding Hypocrisy to the former sacriledg, an attempt at once to rob God and cheat men, and in the event usually renders them hateful to both; to God (who cannot be mocked) it do's so at the instant, and seldom misses to do so at last to men. An Hypocrite has a long part to act, and if his memory fail him but in any one scene, his play is spoiled: so that his hazards are so great, that tis as little prudent as tis honest to set up the trade, especially in an age when Piety itself is at so low a price, that its counterfeit cannot pass for much. But if the Piety be indeed true, the Boasting it blasts it, makes it utterly insignificant. This we are told by Christ himself, who assures us that even the most Christian actions of prayer, alms, and fasting, must expect no other reward (when boasted) then the sought-for applause of men. Mat. 6. When a man shall make his own tongue the trumpet of his Alms, or the echo of his Prayers, he carves, or rather snatches his own reward, and must not look God should heap more upon him: the recompense of his pride he may indeed look for from him, but that of his virtue he has forestall'd. In short, piety is like those lamps of old, which maintained their light some ages under ground, but as soon as they took air expired. And surely there cannot be a more deplorable folly, then thus to lose a rich Jewel, only for the pitiful pleasure of showing it: its the humor of Children and Idiots, who must be handling their birds till they fly away, and it ranks us with them in point of discretion, though not of innocence.

9. FROM the view of these particulars we may in the gross conclude that this ostentation is a most foolish sin, such as never brought in advantage to any man. There is no vice so undermines itself as this do's: tis glory it seeks, and instead of gaining that, it loses common ordinary estimation. Every body that sees a bladder puffed up, knows tis but wind that so swells it: and there is no surer argument of a light frothy brain then this bubbling at the mouth. Indeed there is nothing renders any man so contemptible, so utterly useless to the world: it excludes him almost from all commerce, makes him incapable of receiving or doing a benefit. No man will do him a good turn, because he fore-sees he will arrogate it to himself, as the effect of his merit: and none (that are not in some great exigence) will receive one from him, as knowing it shall be not only proclaimed, but magnified much above the true worth. There seems to be but one purpose for which he serves, and that is to be sport for his company: and that he seldom fails to be, for in these gamesome days men will not lose such an opportunity of divertisement, and therefore will purposely give him hints, which may put him upon his Rhodomontades. I do not speak this by way of encouragement to them, but only to show these vaporers, to what scorn they expose themselves, and what advantage they give to any that have a mind to abuse them: for they need not be at any pains for it, they do but swim with their stream; an approving nod or smile serves to drive on the design, and make them display themselves more disadvantageously, more ridiculously, then the most Satyrical Character could possibly do.

10. BUT besides these sportive projects, such a man lays himself open to more dangerous circumventions. He that shows himself so enamour'd of praise, that (Narcissus like) dotes on his own reflections, is a fit prey for Flatterers, and such a Carcase will never want those Eagles: when his weak part is once discerned (as it must soon be when himself publishes it) he shall quickly be surrounded with assailants. The last Section has shown the misery of a man so besieged, therefore I shall not enlarge on it here, this mention being only intended to evince how apt this vain glorious humor is to betray men to it.
