11. THESE are competent Specimens of the folly of this vice: but it has yet a farther aggravation, that it precludes all means of growing wiser. Tis Solomon's assertion, Seest thou a man wise in his own conceit? there is more hope of a Fool then of him, Prov. 26.12. and the reason is evident, for he discards the two grand instruments of Instruction, Admonition and Observation. The former he thinks superseded by his own Perfections, and therefore when any such friendly office is attempted towards him, he imputes it either to Envy, and a desire to eclipse his luster by finding some spot, or else to Ignorance and incapacity of estimating his worth: the one he entertains with Indignation, the other with disdainful Pity. As for observation, he so circumscribes it within himself, that it can never fetch in anything from without. Reading of men has been by some thought the most facile and expedite Method for acquiring Knowledge; and sure for some kinds of Knowledge it is: but then a man must not only read one Author, much less the one worst he can pick out for himself. Tis an old true saying, He that is his own Pupil shall have a Fool for his Tutor: and truly he that studies only himself, will be like to make but a sorry Progress. Yet this is the case of arrogant men: they lose all the benefit of Conversation, and when they should be enriching their Minds with foreign treasure, they are only counting over their own store. Instead of adverting to those sober discourses which they hear from others, they are perhaps watching to interrupt them by some pompous Story of themselves, or at least in the abundance of their self-sufficiency, think they can say much better things, Magisterially obtrude their own notions, and fall a teaching when tis fitter they should learn: and sure to be thus forward to lay out, and take no care to bring in, must needs end in a Bunkrupt state. Tis true I confess the study of a man's-self is (rightly taken) the most useful part of Learning, but then it must be such a Study as brings him to know himself, which none do so little as these men, who in this are like those silly women the Apostle describes, 2 Tim. 3.7. who are ever learning yet never attain. And 'tis no wonder, for they begin at the wrong end, make no inquiry into their faults or defects, but fix their Contemplation only on their more splendid qualities, with which they are so dazzled, that when you bring them to the darker parts of themselves, it fares with them as with those that come newly from gazing on the Sun, they can see nothing.

12. AND now having dissected this swelling vice, and seen what it is that feeds the tumor, the cure suggests itself. If the disease be founded in Pride, the abating that is the most natural and proper remedy: and truly one would think that mere weighing of the foregoing considerations, might prove sufficient allaiies to it. Yet because where humors are turgent, tis necessary not only to purge them, but also to strengthen the infested parts, I shall adventure to give some few advices by way of Fortification and Antidote.

13. IN the first place, that of the Apostle offers itself to my hand, Look not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others. Phil. 2.4. A counsel which in a distorted sense seems to be too much practiced. We are apt to apply it to worldly advantages, and in that notion not to look on our own things with thankfulness, but on other men's with envy. We apply it also to errors and sins, and look not on our own to correct and reform, but on others to despise and censure. Let us at last take it in the genuine sense, and not look on our own excellencies, but those of others. We see in all things how desuetude do's contract and narrow our faculties, so that we can apprehend only those things wherein we are conversant. The droiling Pesant scarce thinks there is any world beyond his own Village, or the neighboring Markets, nor any gaiety beyond that of a Wake or Morrice; and men who are accustom'd only to the admiration of themselves, think there is nothing beside them worthy of regard. The unbred minds must be a little sent abroad, made acquainted with those excellencies which God has bestowed on other men, and then they will not think themselves like Gideon's fleece to have sucked up all the dew of heaven: nay perhaps, they may find they rather answer the other part of the miracle; and are drier then their neighbors. Let them therefore put themselves in this course, observe diligently all the good that is visible in other men: and when they find themselves mounting into their altitudes, let them clog their wings with the remembrance of those who have out-soar'd them, not in vain opinion, but in true worth. Tis nothing but the fancy of singularity that puffs us up To breath, to walk, to hear, to see, are excellent powers, yet nobody is proud of them, because they are common to the whole kind: and therefore if we would observe the great number of those that equal, or exceed us, even in the more appropriate endowments, we should not put so excessive a price upon ourselves.

14. SECONDLY if we will needs be reflecting upon ourselves, let us do it more ingenuously, more equally: let us take a true survey, and observe as well the barren as the fertile part of the soil: and if this were don, many men's value would be much short of what they are willing to suppose it. Did we but compare our crop of Weeds and Nettles, with that of our Corn, we must either think our ground is poor, or ourselves very ill husbands. When therefore the recollection of either real or fancied worth begins to make us aëry, let us condense again by the remembrance of our sins and folly: tis the only possible service they can do us, and considering how dear they are to cost us, we had not need lose this one accidental advantage. In this sense Satan may cast out Satan, our vilest guilts help to eject our pride; and did we well manage this one stratagem against him, 'twould give us more cause of triumph, then most of those things for which we so spread our plumes: I do not say we should contract new guilts to make us humble, God knows we need not, we have all of us enough of the old stock if we would but thus employ them.

15. IN the last place I should advise those who are apt to talk big things of themselves, to turn into some other road of discourse: for if they are their own Theme, their tongues will as naturally turn into Eulogies, as a horse do's into that Inn to which he is custom'd. All habits do require some little excess of the contrary to their cure: for we have not so just a scantling of ourselves, as to know to a grain what will level the scales, and place us in the right Mediocrity. Let men therefore that have this infirmity, shun (as far as prudence and interest permits) all discourse of themselves, till they can sever it from that unhappy appendage. They will not be at all the less acceptable company, it being generally thought none of the best parts of breeding, to talk much of ones self: for though it be don so as not to argue pride, yet it do's ignorance of more worthy subjects.

16. I should here conclude this Section, but that there is another sort of vaunting Talk, which was not well reducible to any of the former Heads, the Subject matter being vastly distant: for in those the Boasting was founded in some either real or supposed worth, but in this in Baseness and villainy. There are a Generation of men, who have removed all the Land-marks which their Fathers (nay even the Father of Spirits) have set, reversed the common notions of Humanity, and call evil good, and good evil, and those things which a moderate impudence would blush to be surprised in, they not only proclaim but boast of, blow the Trumpet as much before their crimes, as others before their good deeds. Nay so much do they affect this inverted sort of Hypocrisy, that they own more wickedness then they act, assume to have made Practical the highest Speculations of villainy, and like the Devils Knights errant, pretend to those Romantic achievements, which the veriest Fiend incarnate could never compass. These are such Prodigies, such Monsters of villainy, that though they are the objects of Grief and Wonder, they are not of Counsel. Men who thus rave, we may conclude their brains are turned, and one may as well read Lectures at Bedlam as treat with such. Yet we know that there sharp corrections recover crazed men to Sobriety; and then their Cure lies only in the hand of Civil Justice: if that would take them at their words, receive their brags as Confessions, and punish them accordingly, it may be a little real smart would correct this mad Itch, and and teach them not to glory in their shame, Phil. 3.19.

IN the mean time let others who are not •et arrived to this height, consider betimes, that all indulgent practice of sin is the direct Road to it, and according to the degrees of that indulgence, they make more or less hast. He that constantly and habitually indulges, rides upon the Spur, and will quickly overtake his Leaders. Nay if it be but this once vice of vanity, it may finally bring him to their state. He that loves to brag, will scarce find exercise enough for that faculty in his virtues, and therefore may at last be tempted to take in his vices also. But that which is more seriously considerable is, that Pride is so provoking to Almighty God, that it often causes him to withdraw his Grace, which is a Donative he has promised only to the humble, Jam. 4.6. And indeed when we turn that Grace into wantonness, as the Proud man do's who is pamper'd by it into high conceits of himself, tis not probable God will any longer prostitute his favors to such abuse. The Apostle observes it of the Gentiles, who had in contradiction of their natural light abandoned themselves to vile Idolatries, that God after gave them up to a reprobate mind and vile affections▪ Rom. 1.25 26. But the Proud now stifle a much clearer light, and give up themselves to as base an Idolatry, the adoration of themselves. And therefore tis but equal to expect God should desert them, and (as some Nations have De•fied their diseases) permit them to celebrate even their fowlest enormities. The application of all I shall sum up in the words of the Apostle, Rom. 11.21. Take heed also that he spare not thee.

SECT. X. Of Querulousness.

1. TO this of Boasting may not unfitly be subjoin'd another inordinancy of the Tongue, viz. murmuring and complaining. For though these faults seem to differ as much in their complexions, as Sanguine do's from Melancholy, yet there is nothing more frequent then to see them united in the same Person. Nor is this a conjunction of a later date, but is as old as St. Jude's days, who observe •hat the murmurers and complainers are the very same with those who speak great swelling words, Jude 16.

2. NOR are we to wonder to find them thus conjoined, if we consider what an original cognation and kindred they have, they being (however they seem divided) streams issuing from the same fountain. For the very same Pride which prompts a man to vaunt and over-value what he is, do's as forcibly incline him to contemn and disvalue what he has; whilst mesuring his enjoyments by that vast Idea he has formed of himself, 'tis impossible but he must think them below him.

3. THIS indeed is the true original of those perpetual complainings we hear from all sorts and conditions of men. For let us pass thro all Degrees, all Ages, we shall rarely find a single Person, much less any number of men, exempt from this Querulous, this sullen humor: as if that breath of life wherewith God originally inspired us, had been given us not to magnify his bounty, but to accuse his illiberality, and like the dismaller sort of instruments, could be tuned to no other Streins but those of Mourning and Lamentation. Every man contributes his note to this doleful Harmony, and after all that God has don to oblige and delight mankind, scarce any man is satisfied enough, I will not say to be thankful, but to be patient. For alas what Tragical complaints do men make of their infelicity, when perhaps their prosperity is as much the envious outcry of others? Every little defeat of a design, of an appetite, every little dis-regard from those above them, or less solemn observance from those below them, makes their Heart hot within them, Psal. 39.3. and the tongue (that combustible part) quickly takes fire and breaks out into extravagant exclamations. It is indeed strange to see how weighty every the triviallest thing is when a passion is cast into the scale with it, how every the slightest inconvenience or petty want preponderates hundreds of great substantial blessings: when indeed were it in an instance never so considerable, it could be no just Counterpoise. Yet so closely is this corruption interwoven with our constitution, that it has sometimes prevailed even upon good men. Jacob though he had twelve sons, yet upon the supposed death of one de•pis'd the comforts of all the rest, and with an obstinate sorrow resolves to go mourning to his Grave, Gen. 35.37. David after that signal victory which had preserved his life, reinstated him in his Throne, and restored him to the Ark and Sanctuary, yet suffered the loss of his rebellious son, who was the Author of his danger, to overwhelm the sense of his deliverance, and instead of Hymns and praises, breaks out into ejulations and effeminate wailings, 2 Sam. 18.33.

4. BUT God knows the most of our complaints cannot pretend to such considerable motives: they are not the bowels of a Father, the impresses of Nature that excite our repinings, but the impulses of our lusts and inordinate appetites. Our discontents are usually such as Ahab's for his neighbors vineyard, Haman's for Mordecai's obeisance, Achitophel's for having his counsel rejected. Every disappointment of our avarice, ambition, and pride, fill's our heart with bitterness and our mouths with clamors. For if we should examine the numerous complaints which sound in every corner, it would doubtless be found that the greatest part of them have some such original: and that, whether the pretended grievances be public or private. For the first: many a man is a state male-content, merely because he sees another advanced to that honor or wealth which he thinks he has better deserved. He is always inveighing against such unequal distributions, where the best services (such you may be sure his own are) are the worst rewarded: nor do's he ever cease to predict public ruins, till his private are repaired. But as soon as that is don, his Augury grows more mild: and as if the estate and he were like Hippocrates's twins, his recruits give new vigor to that, and till his next suit is denied, everything is well administered. So full alas men are of themselves, that tis hard to find any the most splendid pretence which has not something of that at the bottom: and would every man ransack his own heart, and resolve not to cast a stone till he had first clear'd it of all sinister respects, perhaps the number of our complainers would be much abated.

5. NOR is it otherwise in private discontents. Men are apt to think themselves ill used by any man who will not serve their interest or their humor, nay sometimes their vices; and are prone in all companies to arraign such an unpliant Person, as if he were an enemy to mankind, because he is not a slave to their will. Nay many have quarrel'd even with their dearest friends, because they would not assist them to their own ruin, or have striven to divert them from it: so forcible are our propensions to mutiny, that we equally take occasions from benefits or injuries.

6. BUT the highest and most unhappy instance of all is our behavior towards God, whose allotments we dispute with the same or rather greater boldness then we do those of men. What else mean those impatient murmurs at those things which are the immediate issues of his Providence? Such are our native blemishes, diseases, death of friends, and the like. Nay what indeed are our displeasures even at those things which we pretend to fasten upon a Second Cause? For those being all under this subordination of the first, cannot move but by its permission. This holy Job well discerned, and therefore do's not indite the Chaldeans or Sabaeans for his plunder, but knowing they were but instruments, he submissly acknowledges, that there was a higher agent in his loss, The Lord hath taken away, Job. 1.28. When therefore we ravingly execrate the rapine of one man, the deceit of another for our impoverishment, when we angrily charge our defamation on the malice of our maligners, our disappointments on the treachery or negligence of our friends, we do interpretatively conclude either that there is no over-ruling providence which could have restrained those events, or else (which is equally horrid) we accuse it as not having don well in permitting them. So that against whomsoever we direct our clamors, their last rebound is against Heaven: this Querulous humor carrying always an implicit repugnance to God's disposals: but where it is indulged to, it usually is its own expositor, and explicitly avows it, charges God foolishly, and by impious murmurs blasphemes that power which it cannot resist. Indeed the progress is very natural for our impatiences at man to swell into mutinies against God: for when the mind is once imbiter'd, it distinguishes not of objects, but indifferently lets fly its venom. He that frets himself, the Prophet tells us, will curse his King, nay his God, Isa. 8.21. and he that quarrels at God's distributions, is in the direct road to defy his Being.

7. BY this we may estimate the danger of our discontents, which though at first they are introduced by the inordinate love of ourselves, yet are very apt to terminate in hatred and Blasphemies against God. He therefore that would secure himself from the highest degree, must watch against the lowest; as he that would prevent a total Inundation, must avert the smallest breach in his Banks. Not but that even the first beginnings are in themselves well worth our guarding: for abstracting from all the danger of this enormous increase, these murmurings (like a mortiferous Herb) are poisonous even in their first Spring, before they arrive to their full maturity. To be always moralizing the Fable of Prometheus upon one's self, playing the Vultur upon one's own entrails, is no desirable thing, though we were accountable to none but ourselves for it: to dip our tongues in gall, to have nothing in our mouth but the extract, and exhalation of our inward bitterness, is sure no great Sensuality. So that did we consult only our own ease, we might from that single Topic draw Arguments enough against our mutinies.

8. BUT besides our duty and ease, our credit and reputation make their plea also. Fortitude is one of the noblest of moral virtues, and has the luck to appear considerable even to those who despise all the rest. Now one of the most proper and eminent acts of that is, the bearing adverse events with an evenness of temper. This passive valor is as much the mark of a great mind as the active, nay perhaps more, the later being often owing to the Animal, this to the Rational part of man. And sure we must strangely have corrupted the principles of Morality as well as Religion, if every turbulent unruly Spirit, that fills the world with blood and rapine, shall have his ferity called gallantry; yet that sober courage, that maintains itself against all the shocks of Fortune, that keeps its Post in spite of the rudest encounters, shall not be allowed at least as good a name. And then on the contrary we may conclude, that to sink under every cross accident, to be still whining and complaining, crying out upon every touch, is a note of a mean degenerate soul, below the dignity of our reasonable nature. For certainly God never gave us reason for so unkind a purpose, as only to quicken and enhance the resentment of our sufferings, but rather to control those disorders, which the more tumultuous part of us, our senses, are apt to raise in us: and we are so far men and no farther, as we use it to that end. Therefore if the dictates of Religion cannot restrain our murmurs, if we are not Christians enough to submit to the divine precepts of meekness and acquiescence: yet let us at least keep within these bounds which ingenuous nature has set us, and not by our manly impatiencies enter common with Brutes and Animals.

9. NAY I may farther add, if neither for God's nor our own sakes, yet for others, for human society sake, this querulous inclination should be suppressed; there being nothing that renders a man more unpleasant, more uneasy company. For (besides that 'tis very apt to vent itself upon those with whom he converses, rendering him capricious and exceptious; and tis a harsh, a grating sound to hear a man always in the complaining Key) no man would willingly dwell within the noise of shrieks and groans; and the exclamations of the discontented differ from those only by being more articulate. It is a very unwelcome importunity, to entertain a man's company with remonstrances of his own infelicities and misadventures; and he that will relate all his grievances to others, will quickly make himself one to them. For though he that is full of the inward sense of them, thinks it rather an ease than oppression to speak them out, yet the case is far otherwise with his Auditors: they are perhaps as much taken up with themselves; as he is, and as little at leisure to consider his concerns, as he theirs. Alas we are not now in those primitive days, when there was as it were one common sense among Christians, when if one member suffered, all the members suffered with it, 1 Cor. 12.26. That Charity which gave that sympathetic motion to the whole, is now itself benumbed, flows rarely beyond the narrow compass of our personal interest; and therefore we cannot expect that men should be very patient of our complaints who are not concerned in the causes of them. The Priests answer to Judas do's speak the sense of most men in the case, What is that to us? See thou to that, Mat. 27.4. I do not deny but that the discharging ones griefs into the bosom of a true friend, is both innocent and prudent: nay indeed he that has such a treasure, is unkind to himself if he use it not. But that which I would dissuade, is the promiscuous use of this liberty in common conversation, the satisfying our Spleen, when we cannot ease our hearts by it, the loud declamings at our misery, which is seldom sever'd from as severe reflections on those whom we suppose the causes of it; by which nothing can be acquired but the opinion of our Impatience, or perhaps some new grievance from some, who think themselves concerned to vindicate those whom we asperse. In a word 'tis as indecent as it is unacceptable, and we may observe all men are willing to slink out of such company, the Sober for the hazards, and the Jovial for the unpleasantness. So that the murmurer seems to be turned off to the company of those doleful Creatures which the Prophet mentions, which were to inhabit the ruins of Babylon, 13.21. For he is ill Conversation to all men, though the worst of all to himself.

10. AND now upon the force of all these considerations, I may reasonably impress the Wise man's Counsel, Therefore beware of murmuring, Wisd. 1.11. And indeed it is not the precept of the Wise man alone, but of all who have made any just pretence to that title. For when we consider those excellent lectures of contentation and acquiescence, wherewith the writings of Philosophers abound, 'tis hard to say whether they speak more of instruction or reproach to us. When their confused notions of a Deity had given them such impressions of his Wisdom and goodness, that they would not pretend to make any elections for themselves: how do's it shame our more explicit knowledge, who dare not depend on him in the smallest instance? who will not take his disposals for good, unless our senses become his sureties? which amounts but to that degree of credit, which the most faithless man may expect from us, the trusting him as far as we see him. This is such a contumely to him, as the Ethnic world durst not offer him, and is the peculiar insolence of us degenerated Christians, who sure cannot be thought in earnest when we talk of singing Hallelujahs in the next world to him, whilst we entertain him here only with the sullen noise of murmurs and repinings. For we are not to think that Heaven will Metamorphose us on a sudden, and turn our exclamations and wild clamors into Lauds and Magnificats. It do's indeed perfect and crown those graces which were here inchoate and begun, but no man's conversion ever succeeded his being there: for Christ has expressly told us, That except we be converted, we shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven, if we go hence in our froward discontents, they will associate us with those, with whom is weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth.

SECT. XI. Of Positiveness.

1. ANOTHER very unhandsom circumstance in discourse is the being over confident and peremptory, a thing which do's very much unfit men for conversation, it being looked on as the common birth-right of mankind, that every man is to opine according to the dictates of his own understanding, not another's. Now this Peremptoriness is of two sorts, the one a Magisterialness in matters of opinion and speculation, the other a Positiveness in relating matters of fact: in the one we impose upon men's understandings, in the other on their faith.

2. FOR the first, he must be much a stranger in the world who has not met with it: there being a generation of men, who as the Prophet speaks, Are wise in their own eyes, and prudent in their own sight, Isa. 5.21. Nay not only so, but who make themselves the standards of wisdom, to which all are bound to conform, and whoever weighs not in their balance, be his reasons never do weighty, they write Tekel upon them. This is one of the most oppressive Monopolies imaginable: all others can concern only something without us, but this fastens upon our nature, yea and the better part of it too, our reason; and if it meet with those who have any considerable share of that within them, they will often be tempted to rally it, and not too tamely resign this native liberty. Reason submits only to Reason, and he that assaults it with bare Authority (that which is Divine always excepted) may as well cut flame with his sword, or harden wax in the sun.

3. TIS true indeed these great Dictators do sometimes run down the company, and carry their Hypothesis without contest: but of this there may be divers reasons besides the weight of their arguments. Some unspeculative men may not have the skill to examine their assertions, and therefore an assent is their safest course; others may be lazy and not think it worth their pains; a third sort may be modest and awed by a severe brow and an imperious nod: and perhaps the wiser may providently fore-see the impossibility of convincing one who thinks himself not subject to error. Upon these or other like grounds tis very possible all may be silenced when never a one is convinced: so that these great Masters may often make very false estimates of their conquests, and sacrifice to their own nets, Heb. 1.16. when they have taken nothing.

4. NAY indeed this insolent way of proposing is so far from propagating their notions, that it gives prejudice against them. They are the gentle insinuations which pierce, (as oil is the most penetrating of all liquors;) but in these Magisterial documents men think themselves attackt, and stand upon their guard, and reckon they must part with Honor together with their Opinion, if they suffer themselves to be hector'd out of it. Besides, this imposing humor is so unaimable, that it gives an aversion to the Person; and we know how forcible personal prejudices are (though tis true they should not be) towards the biassing of Opinions. Nay indeed men of this temper do cut themselves off from the opportunities of Proselyting others, by averting them from their company. Freedom is the endearing thing in Society, and where that is control'd, men are not very fond of associating themselves. Tis natural to us to be uneasy in the presence of those who assume an Authority over us. Children care not for the company of their Parents or Tutors, and men will care less for theirs, who would make them Children by usurping a Tutorage.

5. ALL these inconveniencies are evidently consequent to this Dogmatizing, supposing men be never so much in the right: but if they happen to be in the wrong, what a ridiculous pageantry is it, to see such a Philosophical gravity set to man out Solecism? A concluding Face put upon no concluding Argument, is the most contemptible sort of folly in the world. They do by this sound a trumpet to their own defeat: and whereas a modest mistake might slip by undiscerned, these Rodomontade errors force themselves upon men's observation, and make it as impossible for men not to see, as it is not to despise them when they do. For indeed Pride is as ill linked with Error, as we usually say it is with Beggary, and in this as well as that, converts pity into contempt.

6. AND then it would be considered, what security any man that will be imposing has, that this will not be his case. Human nature is very fallible, and as it is possible a man may err in a great many things, so tis certain every man do's in something or other. Now who knows at the instant he is so positive, but this may be his erring turn? Alas how frequently are we mistaken even in common ordinary things! for as the Wise man speaks, hardly do we judge aright even in things that are before us, Wisd. 9.16. our very senses do sometimes delude us. How then may we wander in things of abstruse speculations? The consideration of this hath with some so prevailed, that it has produced a Sect of Scepticism, and though I press it not for that purpose, yet sure it may reasonably be urged to introduce some modesty and calmness in our assertions. For when we have no other certainty of our being in the right, but our own persuasions that we are so: this may often be but making one error the gage for another. For God knows confidence is so far from a certain mark of truth, that 'tis often the seducer into falsehood, none being so apt to lose their way as those who, out of an ungrounded persumption of knowing it, despise all direction from others.

7. LET all this be weighed, and the result will be, that this peremptoriness is a thing that can befit no form of understanding. It renders Wise men disobliging and troublesome, and fools ridiculous and contemptible. It casts a prejudice upon the most solid reasoning, and it renders the lighter more notoriously despicable. Tis pity good parts should be leaven'd by it, made a snare to the owners, and useless to others. And 'tis pity too that weak parts should by it be condemned to be always so, by despising those Aids which should improve them. Since therefore 'tis so ill calculated for every Meridian, would God all Climes might be purged from it.

8. AND as there are weighty objections against it in respect of its effects, so there are no inconsiderable prejudices in relation to its causes, of which we may reckon Pride to be the most certain and universal: for whatever else casually occurs to it, this is the fundamental constitutive principle; nothing but a great overweening of a man's own understanding being able to instate him in that imaginary empire over other men's. For here sure we may ask the Apostles question, Who made thee to differ from another? When God has made Rationality the common portion of mankind, how came it to be thy inclosure? or what Signature has he set upon thine, what mark of excellency, that thine should be paramount? Doubtless if thou fanciest thou hast that part of Jacob's blessing, To be Lord of thy brethren, and that all thy mothers sons should bow down to thee, Gen. 27.29. thou hast got it more surreptitiously than he did, and with less effect: for though Isaac could not retract his mistaken benediction, God will never ratify that fantastic, thou hast pronounced to thyself, with his real effective one.

9. BUT there happens many times to be another ingredient besides Pride, and that is Ignorance: for those qualities however they may seem at war, do often very closely combine. He who has narrow notions, that knows but a few things, and has no glimpse of any beyond him, thinks there are no such: and therefore as if he had (like Alexander) no want but that of worlds to conquer, he thinks himself the absolute Monarch of all knowledge. And this is of all others the most unhappy composition: for ignorance being of its self like stiff clay, an infertile soil, when Pride comes to scorch and harden it, it grows perfectly impenetrable: and accordingly we see none are so invincible as your half-witted people, who know just enough to excite their pride, but not so much as to cure their ignorance.

10. THERE remains yet a 2<sup>d</sup> kind of Peremptoriness which I am to speak to, and that is of those who can make no relation without an attestation of its certainty: a sort of hospitable people, who entertain all the idle vagrant reports, and send them out with passports and testimonials, who when they have once adopted a story, will have it pass for legitimate how spurious soever it originally was. These somewhat resemble those Hospitals in Italy, where all bastards are sure of reception, and such a provision as may enable them to subsist in the world: and were it not for such men, many a Fatherless he would be stifled in its birth. It is indeed strange to see, how suddenly loose rumors knit into formal stories, and from thence grow to certainties; but 'tis stranger to see that men can be of such profligated impudence, as knowingly to give them that advance. And yet 'tis no rarity to meet with such men who will pawn their honor, their souls, for that unworthy purpose: nay and that too with as much impertinence as baseness, when no interest of their own, or perhaps any man's else is to be served by it.

10. THIS is so prodigious a thing, as seems to excite ones Curiosity to inquire the cause of so wonderful an effect. And here, as in other unnatural productions, there are several concurrents. If we trace it from its original, its first Element seems to be Idleness: this diverting a man from serious useful entertainments, forces him upon (the usual refuge of vacant Persons) the inquiring after News; which when he has got, the venting of it is his next business. If he be of a credulous Nature, and believe it himself, he do's the more innocently impose it on others: yet then to secure himself from the imputation of Levity and too easy Faith, he is often tempted to lend some probable circumstance. Nay if he be of a proud humor, and have that miserable vanity of loving to speak big, and to be thought a man of greater correspondence and intelligence than his Neighbors, he will not bate an Ace of absolute certainty; but however doubtful or improbable the thing is, coming from him it must go for an indisputable truth. This seems to be the descent of this unhappy folly, which yet is often nursed up by a mean or imprudent Education. A man that hath conversed only with that lower sort of company, who durst not dispute his veracity, thinks the same false Coin will pass over the world, which went currant among his Fathers Servants or Tenants: and therefore we may observe that this is more usual in young men, who have come raw into company with good fortunes and ill breeding. But it is too true also that too many never lose the habit, but are as morosely positive in their Age, as they were childishly so in their Youths. Indeed <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> tis impossible they should be otherwise, unless they have the wit to disentangle themselves first from the love of Flattery, and after from the company of Flatterers: for (as I have before observed) no vice will ever wither under their shade. I think I shall do the Reader no ill office to let in a little light upon them, and show him some of those many mischiefs that attend this unworthy practice.

12. FIRST, it engages a man to Oaths, and for ought he knows to Perjuries. When he has lancht out boldy into an incredible relation, he thinks he has put his Credit upon the forelorn hope, and must take care to relieve it: and there is no succor so constantly ready at hand as that of Oaths and imprecations, and therefore whole vollies of them are discharged upon the doubtful. Thus do we make God a witness, and our Souls parties in the cause of every trifling rumor, as if we had model'd our Divinity by the Scheme of that Jesuitical Casuist, who legitimates the Killing of a man for an Apple.

13. A second mischief is, that it betrays man to quarrels. He that is peremtory in his own Story, may meet with another that is as peremtory in the contradiction of it, and then the two Sr. Positives must have a skirmish indeed. He that has attested the truth of a false, or the certainty of a doubtful thing, has brought himself into the same strait with Baalams Ass, he must either fall down flat, or run upon a sword, Num. 22.27. For if his Hearers do but express a diffidence, either he must sink to a downright Confession that he was a Liar: or else he must huff and bluster till perhaps he raise a counter-storm, and as he fool'd himself out of his truth, so be beaten out of his pretence to it. Indeed there is scarce any quality that do's so temt and invite affronts as this do's: for he that can descend to such a meanness, may reasonably enough be presumed to have little (as of true worth, so) even of that which the world calls Gallantry, and so every puny sword-man will think him a good tame Quarry to enter and flesh himself upon.

14. IN the third place it exposes him to all the contempt and scorn which either good or ill men can fling upon him: the good abominate the sin, the ill triumph over the folly of it. The truth is there can be nothing more wretchedly mean. To be Kinght of the Post to every fabu•ous relation, is such a sordid thing, that there can scarce be any name of reproach too vile for it. And certainly he that can pawn his faith upon such miserable terms, will by those frequent mortgages quickly be snapt upon a forfeiture; or however will have his credit so impar'd by it, that no man will think his word a competent gage for the slightest concern.

15. AND this may pass for a fourth consideraton, That this Positiveness is so far from gaining credit to his present affirmation, that it destroys it for the future: for he that sees a man make no difference in the confidence of his asserting realities and fictions, can never take his measures by anything he avers, but according to the common Proverb, will be in danger of disbelieving him even when he speaks truth. And of this no man can want conviction, who will but consult his own observation. For what an allay do we find it to the credit of the most probable event, that it is reported by one who uses to stretch? This unhappily do such men defeat their own designs: for while they aver stoutly that they may be believed, that very thing makes them doubted, the world being not now to learn how frequently Confidence is made a supplement for Truth. Nor let any man who uses this, flatter himself that he alone do's (like Jobs messenger) escape the common fate: for though perhaps he meet with some who in civility or pity will not dispute the probability of his narrations, or with others who for raillery will not discourage the humor, with which they mean (in his absence) to divert themselves, yet he may rest assured he is discerned by all, and derided for it.

16. IT therefore concerns men who either regard their truth, or their reputation, not to indulge to this humor, which is the most silly way of shipwrecking both. For he that will lay those to stake upon every flying story, may as well wager his estate which way the wind will sit next morning, there being nothing less to be confided in, than the breath of fame, or the whispers of private tale-bearers. Wise men are afraid to report improbable truths: what a fool-hardiness is it then to attest improbable falsities, as it often is the luck of these Positive men to do?

17. CERTAINLY there is nothing which they design by this, which may not be obtained more effectually by a modest and unconcerned relation. He that barely relates what he has heard, and leaves the hearer to judge of the probability, do's as much (I am sure more civilly) entertain the company, as he that throws down his gauntlet in attestation. He as much satisfies the itch of telling news; he as much persuades his hearers: nay very much more; for these over earnest asseverations serve but to give men suspicion that the Speaker is conscious of his own falseness: and all this while he has his retreat secure, and stands not responsible for the truth of his relations. Nay indeed though men speak never so known and certain truths, tis most advisable not to press them too importunately. For boldness, like the Bravoes and Banditti, is seldom employed but upon desperate services, and is so known a Pander for lying, that truth is but defam'd by its attendance.

18. To conclude, modesty is so amiable, so insinuating a thing, that all the rules of Oratory cannot help men to a more agreeable ornament of discourse. And if they will try it in both the foregoing instances, they will undoubtedly find the effects of it: a modest proposal will soonest captivate men's reasons, and a modest relation their belief.

SECT. X. Of Obscene Talk.

1. THERE is another vice of the Tongue which I cannot but mention, though I knew not in which of the former Classes to place it: not that it comes under none, but that 'tis so common to all, that 'tis not easy to resolve to which peculiarly to assign it, I mean obscene and immodest talk, which is offensive to the purity of God, dammageable and infectious to the innocence of our Neighbors, and most pernicious to ourselves: and yet is now grown a thing so common, that one would think we were fallen into an Age of Metamorphosis, and that the Brutes did, not only Poetically and in fiction, but really speak. For the talk of many is so bestial, that it seems to be but the conceptions of the more libidinous Animals clothed in human Language.

2. AND yet even this must pass for Ingenuity, and this vile descent below Humanity, must be counted among the highest streins of Wit. A wretched debasement of that sprightful Faculty, thus to be made the interpreter to a Goat or Boar: for doubtless had those Creatures but the organs of Speech, their Fancies lie enough that way to make them as good company, as those who more studiously apply themselves to this sort of entertainment.

3. THE crime is comprehensive enough to afford abundance of matter for the most Satyrical zeal: but I consider the dissecting of putrid Bodies may cast such pestilential fumes, as all the benefits of the scrutiny will not recompense. I shall therefore in respect to the Reader dismiss this noisome Subject, and thereby give an example with what abhorrence he should always reject such kind of discourse, remembering the advice of St. Paul, That all uncleanness should not be once named among those who would walk as becometh Saints, Eph. 5.3.

The Close.

1. I Have now touched upon those enormities of Speech which I principally designed to observe, wherein I have been far from making a full and exact Catalogue: therefore I would have no man take this little Tract for a just Criterion, by which to try himself in reference to his words. Yet God grant that all that read it, may be able to approve themselves even by this imperfect essay, and he that do's so, makes fair approaches towards being that perfect man St. James speaks of, chap. 3.1. these being such faults of the Tongue as are the harder to avoid, because they are every day exemplified to us in common practice (nay some of them recommended as reputable and ingenuous.) And it is a strange insinuating power which example and custom have upon us. We see it in every trivial secular instance, in our very habit: those dresses which we laughed at in our forefathers wardrobes or pictures, when by the circulation of time and vanity they are brought about, we think very becoming. Tis the same in our diet: our very palates conform to the fashion, and everything grows amiable to our fancies, according as tis more or less received in the world. And upon this account all sobriety and strict virtue lies now under a heavy prejudice, and no part of it more, then this of the Tongue, which custom has now enfranchized from all the bonds Moralists or Divines had laid upon it.

2. BUT the greater the difficulties are, the more it ought to awake our diligence: if we lie loose and carelessly, tis odds we shall be carried away with the stream. We had need therefore fix ourselves, and by a sober recollection of the ends for which our Speech was given us, and the account we must one day give of it, impress upon ourselves the baseness and the danger of misemploying it. Yet a negative innocence will not serve our turns, twill but put us in the condition of him, who wrapped up the talent he was commanded to employ, Mat. 25.25. Nay indeed twill be impossible to preserve even that if we aspire no farther. The Tongue is a busy active Part, twill scarce be kept from motion: and therefore if that activity be not determined to good objects, twill be practicing upon bad. And indeed I believe a great part of its licentiousness is owing to this very thing. There are so few good themes of discourse in use, that many are driven to the ill for want of better. Learning is thought Pedantic, Agriculture Peasant-like, and Religion the most insufferable of all: so by excluding all useful subjects of converse, we come together (as St. Paul in another case says) Not for the better but for the worse, 1. Cor. 11.17. And if the Philosopher thought he had lost that day wherein he had not learnt something worthy his notice, how many days do we worse then lose, by having them not only empty of solid useful acquisitions, but full of noxious and pernicious ones? And indeed if they be the one, they will not miss to be the other also: for the mind is like the stomach, which if it be not supplied with wholesome nourishment, will at last suck in those humors with which the body most abounds. So that if in our converse we do not interchange sober useful notions, we shall at the best but traffic toies and baubles, and most commonly infection and poison. He therefore that would keep his tongue from betraying himself or others to sin, must tune it to a quite contrary Key, make it an instrument, and incentive to virtue, by which he shall not only secure the negative part of his duty, but comply with the positive also, in employing it to those uses for which it was given him.

3. IT would be too vast an undertaking to prescribe the particular subjects of such discourse, nay indeed impossible, because many of them are occasional, such as cannot aforehand be reduced to any certain account. This only in the general we may rest upon, that all speech tending to the Glory of God or the good of man, is aright directed. Which is not to be understood so restrictively, as if nothing but Divinity or the necessary concerns of human life, may lawfully be brought into discourse: something is to be indulged to common civility, more to the intimacies and endearments of friendship, and a competency to those recreative discourses which maintain the cherefulness of society; all which are, if moderatly used, within the latitude of the rule, as tending (though in a lower degree) to the well-being of men, and by consequent to the honor of God, who indulges us those innocent refreshments. But if the subordinate uses come to encroach upon the higher, if we dwell here and look no farther, they then become very sinful by the excess, which were not so in their nature. That inordinacy sets them in opposition to God's designation, in which they were allowed only a secondary place. We should therefore be careful to improve all opportunities of letting our tongues pay their more immediate homage to God, in the duties of prayers and praises, making them not only the interpreters of our pious affections, but the promoters of the like in others. And indeed he can scarce be thought in earnest, who prays, Hallowed be thy name, and do's not as much endeavor it with men, as he solicits it from God.

4. AND if we answer our obligations in this point, we shall in it discharge the highest part of our duty to man also: for in whose heart soever we can implant a true reverential law of God, we sow the seed of immortality, of an endless happy being, the greatest the most superlative good whereof he is capable. Besides in the interim, we do by it help to manumit and release him from those servile drudgeries to vice, under which those remain who live without God in the world. And these indeed are benefits worthy the dignity of human nature to communicate. And it is both sad and strange to see among the multitude and variety of Leagues that are contracted in the world, how few there are of these pious combinations; how those who show themselves concerned in all the petty secular interests of their friends, never take this at all into their care; a pregnant evidence how little true friendship there is among men:

5. I Know some think they sufficiently excuse themselves when they shift off this office to Divines, whose peculiar business they say it is. But this is as if one who sees a poor fainting wretch, should forbear to administer a Cordial he has at hand, for fear of entrenching on the Physicians Faculty. Many opportunities a Friend or Companion may have which a Divine may want. He often sees a man in the very fit, and so may more aptly apply: for where there is an intimacy of Converse, men lay themselves open, discover those passions those vices, which they carefully veil when a strange, or severer eye approaches. Besides, as such a one may easier discern the disease, so he has better advantages for administering remedies: so Children will not take those Medicines from the Doctors hand, which they will from a Nurse or Mother: and we are usually too Childish in what relates to our Souls; look on good counsel from an Ecclesiastic as a Divinity Potion, and set our stomachs against it; but a Familiar may insensibly insinuate it into us, and ere we are aware beguile us into health. Yet if Lay Persons will needs give the Clergy the inclosure of this office, they should at least withdraw those impediments they have laid in their way, by depositing those prejudices which will certainly frustrate their endeavor. Men have in these later days been taught to look on Preaching as a thing of form to the Hearers, and of profit only to the Speakers, a craft whereby, as Demetrius says, They get their living, Acts 16.25. But admit it were so in this last respect, yet it do's not infer it should be so in the former. If it be a Trade, twas sure thought (as in all Ages but this) a very useful one, else there would never have been such encouragement given to it. No state ever allotted public certain Salaries for a set of Men that were thought utterly useless: and if there be use to be made of them, shall we lose our advantages merely because they gain theirs? We are in nothing else so senseless, no man will refuse counsel from a Physician, because he lives by the Profession. Tis rather an argument on his side, that because such an interest of his own depends on it, he has been the more industrious to fit himself for it. But not to run farther in this digression, I shall apply it to my purpose, by making this equitable proposal, that Lay men will not so moralize the common Fable, as neither to admonish one another themselves, nor suffer Ministers to do it without them. And truly tis hard if neither of these can be granted when both ought. I am sure all is little enough that can be don, though we should have, as the Prophet speaks, Precept upon precept, Line upon Line, here a little and there a little, Is. 28.13. Mans nature is so unattentive to good, that there can scarce be too many monitors. We see Satan, though he have a much stronger party in our inclinations, dares not rely upon it, but is still employing his emissaries, to confirm and excite them: and if whilst he has so many Agents among us, God shall have none, we are like to give but an ill account of our zeal either to God or our neighbor, or of those tongues which were given us to glorify the one, and benefit the other. Indeed without this, our greatest officiousness in the secular concerns of others is no kindness. When we strive to advance the fame, to increase the fortune of a wicked man, what do we in it, but enable him to do the more mischiefs, by his wealth to foment his own luxuries, and by his reputation commend them to the practice of others? He only makes his friend truly rich and great, who teaches him to employ those advantages aright: and would men turn their tongues to this sort of Oratory, they would indeed show they understood for what ends they were given them.

6. BUT as all good receives enhancement from its being more diffusive, so these attempts should not be confined to someone or two intimates or relatives, but be as extensive as the common needs, or at least as our opportunities. Tis a generous ambition to benefit many, to oblige communities: which can no way so well be don, as by endeavoring to subvert vicious customs, which are the pests and poisons of all societies. The heathens had many ceremonies of lustrations for their cities and countries, but he that could purify and refine their manners, would indeed attain to the substance of those shadows. And because the Apostle tells us, that Evil words corrupt good manners, Cor. 15.33. twould be a fundamental piece of reformation, to introduce a better sort of converse into the world: which is an instance so agreeable to my present subject, that I cannot close more pertinently, then to commend the endeavor to the Readers; who, if he have been by this Tract at all convinced of the sin and mischief of those Schemes of discourse deciphered in it, cannot be more just to his convictons, then by attempting to supplant them.

7. IT were indeed a design worthy of a noble soul, to try to new model the Age in this particular, to make it possible for men to be at once conversable and innocent. I know twill be objected, tis too vast a project for one or many single Persons to undertake: yet difficulties use to animate generous spirits, especially when (as here) the very attempt is laudable. But as Christ says of Wisdom, so may we of Courage, The Children of this world are more daring then the Children of light. The great corrupters of discourse have not been so distrustful of themselves: for tis visible to any that will reflect, that tis within man's memory since much of this monstrous exorbitancy of discourse grew in fashion, particularly the Atheistical and Blasphemous. The first propugners of it were but few, and durst then but whisper their black rudiments: yet the world now sees what a harvest they have from their devilish industry.

8. AND shall we give over our Clime as forlorn and desperate, and conclude that nothing which is not venomous will thrive in our Soil? Would some of parts and authority but make the experiment, I cannot think that all places are yet so vitiated, but that they may meet with many, who would relish sober and ingenuous discourse, and by their example be animated to propagate it to others: but as long as Blasphemy, Ribaldry, and Detraction set up for Wit, and carry it without any competition, we do implicitly yield that title we dispute not: and tis hard to say, whether their triumphs be more owing to the boldness of ill men, or the pusillanimity of the good. What if upon the trial they should meet with the worser part of St. Paul's fate at Athens, That some will mock, Acts 17.32. yet perhaps they may partake of the better also, and find others that would be willing to hear them again, and some few at least may cleave unto them. And sure they are too tender and delicate, that will run no hazard, nor be willing to bear a little share in that profane drollery, with which an Apostle was, and their God is daily assaulted: especially when by this exposing themselves, they may hope to give some check to that impious liberty. However besides the satisfaction of their own consciences, they may also gain this advantage by the attempt, that it may be a good test by which to try their company. For those whom they find impatient of innocent and profitable converse, they may assure themselves can only ensnare, not benefit them; and he is a very weak Gamester, that will be drawn to play upon such terms as make it highly probable for him to lose, but impossible for him to win. Therefore in that case the advice of Solomon is very proper, Go from the presence of a foolish man, when thou perceivest not in him the lips of Knowledge, Prov. 14.7.

9. BUT he that will undertake so Heroic an enterprize, must qualify himself for it, by being true to his own pretensions. He must leave no uneven thread in his loom, or by indulging to any one sort of reprobable discourse himself, defeat all his endeavors against the rest. Those aëry Speculators that have writ of the Philosophers Stone, have required many Personal qualifications, strict abstinences and purities in those who make the experiment. The thing may have this sober application, that those who would turn this Iron Age into Gold, that would convert our rusty drossy Converse into a purer strain, must be perfectly clean themselves. For alas what effect can that man hope from his most zealous reprehensions, who lays himself open to recrimination? He that hears a man bitterly inveigh against blasphemy and profaneness, and (yet in that almost the same breath) hears his monitor inveigh as bitterly against his Neighbor, will scarce think him a good guide of his tongue, that has but half the mastery of his own. Let every man therefore be sure to begin at the right end of his work, to wash his own mouth clean, before he prescribe Gargarisms to others. And to that purpose let him impartially reflect on all the undue liberties he has given his tongue, whether those which have been here remarked, or those others which he may find in all Practical books, especially in (the most Practical of all books) his own Conscience. And when he has trac'd his talk thro all its wild rambles, let him bring home his stray; not like the lost sheep with joy, but with tears of penitence and contrition, and keep a strict watch over it that it break not loose again; nay farther require it to make some restitution for the trespass it has committed in its former excursions: to restore to God what it has robbed of his Honor, by devoting itself an instrument of his service; to his Neighbor what it has detracted from him, by wiping off that sullage it has cast upon his Fame, and to himself by defacing those ill Characters of vanity and folly it has imprinted on him. Thus may the Tongue cure its own sting, and by a kind of Sympathetic virtue, the wound may be healed by dressing the weapon. But alas when we have don all, the Tongue is so slippery that it will often be in danger to deceive our watch: nay it has a secret intelligence with the heart, which like a corrupted Goaler is too apt to connive at its escape. Let us therefore strengthen our guards, call in him who sees all the secret practices of our treacherous hearts, and commit both them and our tongues to his custody. Let us say with the Psalmist, Try me, O Lord, and seek the ground of my heart, Psa. 229.23. And with him again, Set a watch, O Lord, before my mouth, and keep the door of my lips, O let not my heart be inclined to any evil thing, Psa. 141.3. And if hand thus join in hand, Prov. 16.5. if God's grace be humbly invoked, and our own endeavor honestly employed, even this unruly evil of the Tongue (as St. James calls it) Chap. 3.8. may be in some degree tamed. If now and then it get a little out by stealth, yet it will not like the Demoniack be so raving, as quite to break all its chains. If we cannot always secure ourselves from inadvertence and surprise, but that a forbidden word may sometimes escape us, yet we may from deliberate willful offenses of the Tongue. And though we should all aspire higher, yet if we can but reach this, we ought not to excuse ourselves (upon remaining infirmities) from the Christian generous undertaking, I was recommending, the reforming of others. Indeed I had made a very impertinent exhortation to that, if this degree of fitness may not be admitted; for I fear there would be none upon earth could attempt it upon other terms: the world must still remain as it is, and await only the Tongues of Angels to reduce it. Nor need we fear that censure of Hypocrisy which we find, Mat. 7.5. for the case is very differing. Tis indeed as ridiculous as insolent an attempt, for one that has a Beam in his own eye, to pretend to cast a Mote out of his brothers: but it holds not on the contrary, that he that has a Mote in his own, should not endeavor to remove the Beam in his Brothers. Every speck do's not blind a man, nor do's every infirmity make one unable to discern, or incompetent to reprove the grosser faults of others.

10. YET after all let us as much as is possible clear our eyes even of this Mote, and make our Copy as worth transcribing as we can: for certainly the best instrument of reformation is example: and though admonition may sometimes be necessary, yet there are many circumstances required to the right ordering of that, so that it cannot always be practicable, but a good example ever is. Besides it has a secret magnetic virtue: like the Loadstone it attracts by a power of which we can give no account: so that it seems to be one of those occult qualities, those secrets in nature, which have puzzled the enquirers, only experience demonstrates it to us. I am sure it do's (too abundantly) in ill examples, and I doubt not, might do the like in good, if they were as plentifully experimented. And that they may be so, let every man be ambitious to cast in his mite: for though two make but a farthing, yet they may be multiplied to the vastest sum. However if a man cannot reform others, yet I am sure twill be worth his while, so to save himself from this untoward generation, Act. 2.40. I have now presented the Tongue under a double aspect, such as may justify the ancient Definition of it, that it is the worst and best part of man, the best in its original and design, and the worst in its corruption and degeneration. In David the man after God's heart it was his glory, Ps. 57.8. The best member that he had, Psal. 108.1. But in the wicked it cuts like a sharp Razor, Psal. 52.2. Tis as the venom of Asps, 140.3. The Tongues from heaven were Cloven, Act. 2.2. to be the more diffusive of good: but those that are fired from hell are forked, Jam. 3.6. to be the more impressive of mischief: it must be referred to every man's choice, into which of the forms he will mold his. Solomon tells us Death and Life are in the power of the Tongue, and that not only directly in regard of the good or ill we may do to others, but reflexively also, in respect of what may rebound to ourselves. Let Moses then make the inference from Solomon's premises, Therefore choose life, Deut. 30.15. a proposal so reasonable, so agreeable to nature, that no flourishes can render it more inviting. I shall therefore leave it to the Readers contemplation, and shall hope that if he please but to revolve it with that seriousness which the importance exacts, he will new set his tongue, compose it to those pious Divine streins, which may be a proper prelude to those Allelujahs he hopes eternally to sing.

FINIS.

P-RA-20. The ladies calling in two parts - Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681., Pakington, Dorothy Coventry, Lady, d. 1679., Sterne, Richard, 1596?-1683., Fell, John, 1625-1686., Henschman, Humphrey, 1592-1675.

The ladies calling in two parts

Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681., Pakington, Dorothy Coventry, Lady, d. 1679., Sterne, Richard, 1596?-1683., Fell, John, 1625-1686., Henschman, Humphrey, 1592-1675.

[illustration]

The Ladies calling

THE LADIES CALLING.

IN TWO PARTS.

By the Author of the whole Duty of Man, The Causes of the Decay of Christian Piety, and The Gentleman's Calling.

Favor is deceitful, and Beauty is vain: but a Woman that feareth the Lord, she shall be praised.

Prov. 31. 33.

OXFORD, Printed at the THEATER.

M. DC. LXXIII.

[illustration]

The Editor to the Reader.

IT is a popular reproach usually cast upon writers in morality, and persuaders to devotion, that while they with pompous words represent vertu as a sufficient reward to •...er self, and exhort to the contempt of Glory; they prefix their names to their labors, and make the Title-page a confutation of the Book that follows it.

Our Author has effectually averted this objection, having been so far from seeking a name from others, as not to have left a possibility for the discovery of his own: but like the river Nile that gives fertility and blessing wheresoe're he passes, hides his head; and permits himself to be only known in the benefits which he dispenses.

By what methods the other most useful works of this excellent Author have st•...ln themselves into the world, I am not enabled to relate; but having been made a party to the publication of this present, it may be expected that I render some account thereof. For altho the curiosity of inquiring into that which is industriously concealed, be such a rudeness, and injustice also, as by no means deserves to be encouraged; yet where a benefit has been received, for those who are obliged, to desire to acquaint themselves with the Person unto whom they stand endebted, that they may pay a respect at least, if they can reach at no more equal retribution; this has such a pretence to gratitude, as may justly demand to be considered. And it will be some satisfaction to the ingenuous enquirer, that though he have not inform'd himself in the particulars which he desires, he has not been deficient in the inquest, & knows as much as is possible.

The Reader therefore may please to understand, that somewhat more then two months since, I received a Letter, accompanied with a roll of Papers; opening the which, I found it was written by a hand which I was utterly a stranger to, and that had no name subscribed; the purport thereof was as follows.

SIR,

The general report of your candor persuades me you will not reject an address, though from an unknown hand, which encourages me to the sending these Papers to you, with a desire you would please to peruse them, and commit them either to the Press, or the Fire as you find them worthy. I shall not need to tell you who I am, for if my suit be accepted, I have what I desire without it if it b... not, 'tis my interest you should not know who 'tis that has thus importun'd you. Your Charity I assure myself will at a venture pardon,

SIR,

Your humble Servant.

'Twill be superfluous to say how much I was surpris'd with this so unusual address, how much affected with the singular modesty and humility which it ex...rest: and after all how much transported upon viewing the Treasure, which was thus •...s from the Clouds dropt into my hands▪ Nor was I long to determine which of the two ways of disposal proposed unto me, was to be made use of: and indeed I should much so...ner have performed my trust, and taken care that this excellent Tract •...ad immediately seen the light, had it not been needful to transcribe the whole, before it could safely be committed to the Press.

This I mention not only to excuse the delay of the Edition, but more especially to beg a pardon for the misadventu...es of it. It being not easy in a written Copy where a recourse is not to be had unto the Author, to do him justice; and avoid faileurs and mistakes: which in the present instance was the more hazardous, in that every departure from the Authors i...itable pattern, would certainly be for the worse.

But Excuse and complement are anywhere a very insipid foolish thing, and most intolerable in a serious concern: I shall not therefore say ought that looks that way; only offer a short request▪ which I suppose will be equally in-the behalf of the▪ Author of this Tract▪ the Editor▪ and the Readers of it, Which is, that whoever takes this book in hand would seriously consider it; and doing so, receive the infinite benefits of uniform vertu, and sincere pie...y; the documents whereof, are herewith all possible advantages proposed: and thereby give the Author, that greatest of blessings, the being an instrument to the eternal happiness of souls: and as to us who deal in the affair of Printing▪ afford some share in this most desirable event▪ absolving us from the Charge of having don mischief, instead of service to the world. For, to say the truth, no book is so fatally destructive as that which convinces of duty▪ but fails of persuading to it. And if the best books can do harm, 'twill certainly be difficult to make a plea for the mul•...tudes of a contrary kind▪ which now especially (∅) upon the Age▪

THE PREFACE

THo the smallness of this Tract will scarce justify the solemnity of a Preface; yet remembering 'tis designed for those who are accustomed to Ceremonious Addresses, I think it not best to approach them too abruptly. And indeed besides the Civility, there seems some use of it in order to my design. To advise, or reprove, is so ungrateful an Office, that he that undertakes it, had neee•... use all previous arts to vindicate the sincerity of his purpose, and to convince the person admonished, that 'tis neither spleen no•... prejudice, but the mo•...t real exuberant kindness which prompts him to inflict those wounds of a friend, Prov. 27. 6. and that he is never less an enemy, then when he thus tells them the truth, Gal. 4. 16: Therefore, though they may in the ensuing leaves meet with some things which may have a show of severity, yet let me assure my Reader, they have indeed a design of the greatest service, by correcting the extravagance of some, to rescu the whole Sex, as from the contagion of the example, so from the community of the blame. For such is either the inadvertence, or malice of a great part of mankind, that (against all Rules of Discourse) they deduce Generals from Particulars, make every woman so far an Eve, that her depravation shall forfeit her whole kind; and because there are foolish and scandalous women, will scarce allow there are any other.

The truth is, the Error seems in many men to be affected; they propose to themselves unworthy ends on women, and make all their observations wholly in order to those. He that is upon a base pursuit, takes particular notice of all that he thinks for his turn; the rest fall not within his Sphere: and 'tis too probable he is so abundantly supplied for that absolute consideration, that he never descends to the comparative. Nay, perhaps there may be a yet deeper original of the scandal: the world is much governed by estimation; and as applause encourages & exalts, so a universal contempt debases & dejects the Spirit. If it can once pass into a Maxim, that women are such silly or vicious creatures, it may put fair for the making them so indeed. Themselves may imbibe the common opinion, charge all their personal faults on their Sex, think that they do but their kind, when indeed they most contradict it, and no more aspire to anything worthy, then a man can pretend to the excellencies of an Angel. And indeed this seems to be the practical inference of some women, who could hardly have descended to such dishonors, had they not before been as vile in their own eyes, as they have afterwards rendered themselves in others.

It may therefore upon this account be a necessary Charity to the Sex, to acquaint them with their own valu, animate them to some higher thoughts of themselves; not to yield their suffrage to those injurious estimates the World hath made of them, and from a supposed incapacity of nobler things to neglect the pursuit of them; from which God and Nature have no more precluded the Feminine, then the Masculine part of mankind.

In reference to secular Considerations, their advantages are most important; Women have a very powerful Influence upon all sorts of Transactions in the World: the engaging of the Delilah, and plowing with the Heifer, Judge: 14. & 16. being ever the surest way to undermine the Counsels, and master the force of the Stoutest Samson. And accordingly, Hictories of all kinds assure us, that Gyneceum has still had a Rival suffrage with the Senate. I might urge the more regular Powers which appertain unto that Sex; that all mankind is the Pupil and Disciple of Female Institution: the Daughters till they write women, and the Sons till the first seven years be past; the time when the mind is most ductile, and prepared to receive impression, being wholly in the Care and Conduct of the Mother. And whereas 'is observed by Aristotle in his Politics, (and is a proof of his being as wise, as he was a learned man) that the Estate of Republics entirely hangs on private families, the little Monarchies both composing & giving law unto the great; 'tis evident that the disposal of Families and all Domestic concerns therein lies chiefly on the Wife; whence the same Aristotle declares, that the Spartans notwithstanding their ready address to Empire by their great frugality, industry, and military virtue, could have but half a happiness, as failing on the part of their Wives. But waving these reflections I shall fix only on the personal accomplishments of the Sex, and peculiarly that which is the most principal endowment of the rational nature, I mean their understanding. Where▪ first it will be a little hard to pronounce, that they are naturally inferior to men; when 'tis considered how much of extrinsic weight is put in the balance to turn it on the men's side. Men have their parts cultivated and improved by Education, refined and subtilized by Learning and Arts, are like an enclosed piece of a Common, which by industry and husbandry becomes a different thing from the rest, though the natural turf owned no such inequality. And truly had women the same advantage, I dare not say but they would make as good returns of it; some of those few that have been tried, have been eminent in several parts of Learning. To omit the modern instances, Theano after the death of Pythagoras kept up his School; Socrates confesses himself to have been instructed not only in Rhetoric by Aspasia, but even in the highest Points of Philosophy by Diotima: the Roman Story enforms us of the deep wisdom of Tanaquil, Cornelia, Livia, to pass by others. And were we sure they would have ballast to their sails, have humility enough to poize them against the vanity of Learning, I see not why they might not more frequently be entrusted with it; for if they could be secured against this weed, doubtless the soil is rich enough to bear a good crop. But not to oppose a received opinion, let it be admitted, that in respect of their intellects they are below men; yet sure in the sublimest part of humanity, they are their equals: they have souls of as divine an Original, as endless a Duration, and as capable of infinite Beatitude. That spiritual Essence, that ray of Divinity owns no distinction of Sexes; so that in this sense also that Aphorism of the Apostle holds good; there is neither Male nor Female, but all are one, Gal. 3. 28. And sure this is the one transcendent Excellency of Human Nature. For alas, what valu can comparatively be s...t upon all other Qualifications, which will finally-leave us but like the Beasts that perish. And this as it is the highest pitch of their worth, so it is the safest subject of their Contemplations: other Knowledge, as the Apostle speaks, 1 Cor. 8. 1. may puff-up, this only will edify.

As therefore when we would pride ourselves, we use not to boast our meaner, but our best qualities: so let me solicit Ladies to be so just to themselves, as not to take their own measures by anything below this. Why should they take so low a level of Greatness, as to valu themselves upon a title which is but a bigger blast of air, when they may derive their descent from above the Stars, claim cognation with Divinity? Why should they dote on the fictitious image, of a perhaps more fictitious beauty, which their glass presents them, when they need but look inward to see an infinitely fairer Idea, an emanation of the eternal Brightness? Indeed did they make a just estimate of themselves in this respect, it would overwhelm the vanity of those inferior things wherein they now have such complacency, nor would they suffer their nobler part to be affronted by the unequal competition of their meaner.

But there is also another consequent which would flow from that esteem; they would solicitously preserve what they so highly prize, it being natural for us to proportion our care to our valu. They would be jealously vigilant against everything, that might eclipse the radiancy or contaminate the purity of their souls. 'Twas the advice of a Heathen moralist, Revere thyself; and 'twas very wholesome counsel: for next our due veneration to God, a reverence to ourselves is the most severe controller of all exorbitancies. How can a soul that remembers its celestial extraction, wallow itself in the mire, sto...p to any sordid degenerus practices? 'Tis said of Themistocles, that seeing once a rich booty about the dead corpses of his enemies, he touch... itnot, but pointing to another, said, Take thou that, for thou art not Themistocles. If then a little military fame could so elevate his thoughts, tis a shame that any who carry an immortal spirit about them, should not be raised above all the contemptible baits of this sublunary World. Why should they not with the like disdain turn over all sensual inordinacies to mere Animals, and creatures that have no higher principle then that of Sense, whilst themselves soar up to those more sublimated pleasures, which are at God's Right Hand for evermore, Psal. 16. 12.

We may therefore conclude, that what ever vicious impotence Women are under, it is acquired, not natural; nor derived from any illiberality of God's, but from the managery of his bounty. He has placed within them a pillar of Cloud and Fire, sufficient to shelter and conduct them through all the storms, all the intricacies that can occur in their journey to Canaan; if they will forget that more intrinsic part of their being, live as if they were all body, reject the Manna, and rave after the Quails, that destruction which will thereby be induced they must own to spring from themselves. Let them not charge God foolishly, or think that by making them women, he necessitated them to be proud, or wanton, vain, or peevish; since 'tis manifest he made them to better purposes, was not partial to the other Sex, but that having, as the Prophet speaks, abundance of spirit, Mal. 2. he equally dispenc'd it, and gave the feeblest woman as large and capacious a soul as that of the Greatest Hero.

Nay give me leave to say farther, that as to an Eternal well being, he seems to have placed them in more advantageous circumstances then he has don men. He has implanted in them some native propensions, which (as i shall hereafter have occasion to observe) do much facilitate the operations of Grace upon them. Besides, there are many temptations to which men are exposed that are out of their road. How hard is it for a man to converse in the World, but he shall be importun'd to debauchery and excess, must forfeit his sobriety to maintain the reputation of a sociable Person? Again, how liable are they by a promiscuous conversation among variety of humors, to meet with affronts, which the Maxims of Honor will tell them, must (in spite of all Christ's interdicts) be revenged? And this engages them in Quarrels, sometimes in Murders. Now none of these are incident to women: they must in these and some other instances attaque temptation, violently ravish guilt, and abandon their Sex, the whole Economy of their state, e're they can divest themselves of their innocence. So that God seems in many particulars to have closelier fenced them in, and not left them to those wilder excursions, for which the customary liberties of the other Sex afford a more open way. In short, they have so many advantages towards Vertu, that though the Philosopher made it one of his solemn acknowledgments to God, that he had made him a man, and not a woman: yet I think Christian women have now reason enough to invert that form, and to thank God that he made them women, and not men.

But we know advantages which are only in speculation, are looked on with some diffidence, till there have been some practical experiment made of them; I shall therefore evidence the problem by demonstration, and instance; desiring my Readers to measure the possibilities of their arriving to eminent degrees of Vertu and Piety, by what others have attained to. I shall not fetch examples of Morality from Heathen Women, because I am now upon a higher strain; (yet many such might be brought to the reproach of many Women, who pretending to more, fall infinitely short of that:) 'tis Christian Vertu that I am now recommending, and which has been eminently exemplified in many of their Sex. How •...any Women do we read of in the Gospel, who in all the duties of assiduous attendance on Christ, liberalities of love and respect, nay even in zeal and courage, surpassed even the Apostles themselves? We find his Cross surrounded, his Passion celebrated by the avowed tears and lamentations of devout Women, when the most sanguine of his Disciples had denied, yea forswore, and all had forsaken him. Nay, even Death itself could not extinguish their love; we find the devout Mary's designing a laborious, chargeable, and perhaps hazardous respect to his Corps. And accordingly 'tis a memorable attestation Christ gives to their Piety, by making them the first Witnesses of his Resurrection, the prime Evangelists to Proclaim those glad Tidings; and as a Learned man speaks, Apostles to the Apostles. Nor is the devotion of that Sex to be found only in the sacred Records; the Primitive times have left us many Memorials of the like, and the Martyrologies are full of Female sufferers of all Ages and conditions, who by the fervor of their Zeal had overcome the timorousness of their Nature, and wearied the cruelty of their Persecutors. And as Women help to augment the number of Martyrs, so did they of Confessors also, in a stout owning, & diligent practice of Christianity. Queens and Empresses knew then no Title so Glorious as that of a nursing Mother to the Church, have often exchanged their Palaces for little Cells and Oratories, and valued not their own Diadems in comparison with their Savior's Crown of Thorns. And though by a perpetual declination from that pristine Zeal, the instances have in every Age grown less numerous, yet none has wanted some very illustrious Examples. Nay even in our dregs of time, in this common decay of all good, there are, I doubt not, many who (according to their opportunities) transcribe the former Copies, live like People that know they must live hereafter, and present us yet with some specimen of ancient Virtue. Nay, to speak an impartial Truth, 'tis not to be denied, but the reputation of Religion is more kept up by women than men; many of the one countenancing it by their Practice, whereas more of the other do not only neglect, but decry it. And now since Women are compassed about with so great a cloud of Witnesses, who by doing the thing, give the surest evidence that 'tis not unfeasible, why should any plead an impossibility? In matters of Vanity and Pomp they they are not so easily disheartened, no pattern of that kind can be •...et which will not be industriously imitated; nay in •...he greatest inequality of materials for it. Why •...hen should their emulation leave them where only it could do them good? How comes it, that of those who have equal Principles of a spiritual Being, some live according to the Dignity of it; and others who see them do so, do yet live as if they assented to that Philosophers Paradox, who said, Women had no souls; or at least were of the Pythagorian Sect, and looked upon themselves only as the Jails and Prisons of former offending Spirits, which they resolved to fit for a yet viler transmigration; give them the appetites of Beasts before they assume the Bodies? This is indeed an unlucky Humility, that those who in all other instances are apt to overween, should here sink so much below themselves. And I hope 'twill not appear an uncivil address, to persuade them to a juster estimate of their own worth. And if what has been said to that end may have any effect, I shall not desire a better Preparative to the ensuing Tract; since she that duly considers her own capacity of Eternal Bliss, and withal, the possibility of as Endless a Misery, according as she performs or neglects the several Parts of Duty, will sure need no other incentive to the diligent Pursuit of it.

THE LADIES CALLING

Part I.

Sect. I. Of Modesty.

1. IT is now many years since an Address was made to the Gentry of this Nation, to persuade them to that Virtue, which would be both their Pleasure and Reward. I cannot, I confess, boast any such Effect of that, as should much inspirit the hopes of a new Attempt; yet since we see in our proper secular Concerns, Defeats do many times animate no less than Success, I know not why in this more charitable Design I should sit down discouraged. Men usually raise not a siege upon the first repulse, but reinforce their Batteries, observe more curiously which are the most assailable accessible parts, and accordingly dispose their assault: It will then be no unreasonable imitation in the present case, if, after a succesless Attempt upon the more impregnable Masculine part of the Gentry, I now essay the Feminine, whose native Softness and Gentleness may render them less apt for that resistance of good Counsel, wherein too many Men place their Gallantry.

2. I presume those to whom that little Tract was at first designed, will be so willing to relinquish their Title, that I might without imputation of robbery, exchange my Patrons, and by a new Dedication supersede the labor of a new Book. And indeed, since what was there said was founded more on the distinction of Qualities than of Sex, there would not need many razures to render it as proper for the one as the other; and I shall take so much advantage of it, as to assure the female Gentry, that they may there find much of the Duty incumbent on them, in respect of that Rank and Condition they hold in the World: and therefore, though I shall sometimes make some reflections on it; yet, as to the main, I shall think it the easiest course, as well for them as myself, to direct them thither.

3. But it may seem to have too much of the Pedant, to entertain new Scholars only with the cast or nauseated learning of the old; and when I remember I write to Ladies, who use to think the newness of anything a considerable Addition to its valu; I conceive myself obliged as well in civility to their humor, as charity to their needs, to give them something which they may own as their peculiar. And to render it the more unalienable, I shall affix it to their Sex; and make it the Subject of my present inquisition, what in respect of that, are the proper and distinct Obligations, under which, by the assignment of God and Nature, they are placed.

4. That the Obligation to Moral & Christian Virtues is in itself universal, and not confined to any Sex or Person, is not to be denied: yet, as in human Constitutions there are often Precepts, which (though not exclusive of any, do yet) more peculiarly and eminently level at some particular rank or order of Men; so in the laws of God and Nature, there appears the like distinction. That all-wise Creator, who hath put peculiar proprieties and inclinations into his Creatures, hath accordingly designed their actuating and improving them: and altho in mankind, which differs nor in species but in gender, the variety may seem less; yet there is still enough to found some diversity, either in the kind or degree of duty. This sure is shadowed to us in that particular caution given to the Jews, not to confound the habit of the several Sexes, Deut. 22. 5. and yet more clearly evinced in the Precept which the Apostles address to women, 1 Tim. 2. and 1. Pet. 3. Nay, this is so granted a truth, that all Ages and Nations have made some distinction between masculine & feminine Virtues, Nature having not only given a distinction as to the beauties of their outward form, but also in their very mold and constitution implanted peculiar aptnesses and proprieties of mind, which accordingly vary the measure of decency; that being comely for the one Sex, which often is not (at least in the same degree) for the other. It will therefore be no absurd attempt to decipher those excellencies, which are the genuine and proper ornaments of Women: which though in some instances they may perhaps prove coincident with those of Men; yet even those which are equally inclusive of both, by the divine command may have some additional weight on the female side, in respect of decency, fame, or some other (not despicable) consideration.

5. For the better directing our present inquisition, it will be most regular, first to inquire what those Virtues are which are universally necessary to Women in all Ages and circumstances of their lives: such which, like the first matter, are prerequir'd for all forms; which, like a firm and solid Basis, must support all various events, all changes of their condition or relations. And secondly, we shall consider them in those changes, track them through the several stages and periods of life, through those several states which create the most considerable mutations to them; and in each of those consider, what are the new and proportionate accessions of duty.

6. As in the outward accommodations of life▪ the things of most daily and indispensable use deserve the greatest valu; so in moral or divine Endowments, the benefit of possessing is best measured by the misery of wanting them. This first rank therefore of female Virtues which we are to treat of, will have that to recommend them; they being so strictly necessary, that their absence is not only a privative ill, but also exposes to a deluge of all positive mischiefs consequent to that privation.

7. This will be found true in all the severals we are to pass through, but in none more eminently then in that we shall choose to begin with, the Virtue of Modesty; which may be considered in a double notion, the one as it is opposed to boldness and indecency, the other to leightness and wantonness. In the first acception, Zeno has not ill defin'd it, to be the Science of decent motion, it being that which guides and regulates the whole behavior, checks and controles all rude exorbitancies, and is the great civilizer of conversations, It is indeed a vertu of a general influence; does not only ballast the mind with sober and humble thoughts of ones self, but also steers every part of the outward frame. It appears in the face in calm and meek looks, where it so impresses itself, that it seems thence to have acquired the name of shamefacedness. Certainly, (whatever the modern opinion is) there is nothing gives a greater luster to a feminine beauty: so that St. Paul seems, not ill to have consulted their concerns in that point, when he substitutes that as a suppletory ornament to the deckings of Gold & Pearl and costly Array, 1 Tim. 2. But I fear this now will be thought too antiquated a dress, and an Apostle be esteemed no competent Judge in this Science; which is now become so solemn a thing, that certainly no Academy in the World can vie numbers with the Students of this Mystery. Yet when they have strain'd their art to the highest pitch; an innocent modesty, and native simplicity of Look, shall eclipse their glaring splendor, and triumph over their artificial handsomness: on the other side, let a Woman be decked with all the embellishments of Art, nay and care of Nature too, yet if boldness be to be read in her face, it blots all the lines of beauty, is like a cloud over the Sun, intercepts the view of all that was otherwise amiable, and renders its blackness the more observable, by being placed near somewhat that was apt to attract the eyes.

8. But Modesty confines not its self to the face, she is there only in shadow and effigie; but is in life and motion in the words, whence she banishes all indecency and rudeness, all insolent vauntings and supercilious disdains, and what ever else may render a person troublesome, or ridiculous to the company. Nor does she only refine the language, but she tunes it too, modulates the tone and accent, admits no unhandsome earnestness or loudness of Discourse, the latter whereof was thought so undecent in Carneades (though in his public Lectures) that the Gymnasiarch reprov'd him for it: and sure, if 'twere not allowable in a Philosopher in his School, 'twill less become a woman in ordinary converse; and if we consult Prov. 7. 11. and 9. we shall find loudness and clamor in women coupled with such other epithets, as will surely not much recommend it. A woman's tongue should indeed be like the imaginary Music of the spheres, sweet and charming, but not to be heard at distance.

9. And as Modesty prescribes the manner, so it does also the measure of speaking; restrains all excessive talkativeness, a fault incident to none but the bold; the monopolizing of discourse being one of the greatest assumings imaginable, and so rude an imposing upon the company, that there can scarce be a greater indecency in conversation. This is ingeniously expressed by our divine Poet Herbert,

A civil guest,

Will no more talk all, then eat all the Feast.

He that engrosses the talk, enforces silence upon the rest, & so is presumed to look on them only as his auditors & Pupils, whilst he magisteriously dictates to them: which gave occasion to Socrates to say, It is arrogance to speak all, and to be willing to hear nothing. It is indeed universally an insolent unbecoming thing, but most peculiarly so in a woman.

10. The ancient Romans thought it so, much so▪ that they allowed not that sex to speak publicly, though it were in their own necessary defense; insomuch that when Amesia stood forth to plead her own cause in the Senate, they looked on it as so prodigious a thing; that they sent to consult the Oracle what it portended to the State: and though these first severities were soon lost in the successes of that Empire, Valerius Maximus could find but two more, whose either necessity or impudence, persuaded them to repete this unhandsom attempt▪

11. And this great indecency of Loquacity in Women, I am willing to hope is the reason why that Sex is so generally charged with it; not that they are all guilty, but that when they are, it appears so unhandsom, as makes it the more eminent and remarkable. Whether it were from that ungracefulness of the thing, or from the propension Women have to it, I shall not determine; but we find the Apostle very earnest in his cautions against it; 1 Cor. 14. 35. he expressly enjoins Women to keep silence in the Church, where he affirms it a shame for them to speak: and though this seems only restrained to the Ecclesiastical Assemblies, yet even so it reaches home to the gifted Women of our age, who take upon them to be Teachers; whereas he allowed them not to speak in the Church, no not in order to learning, though a more modest design then that of teaching. But besides this, he has a more indefinite prescription of silence to Women, 1 Tim. 2. 11. Let Women learn in silence; and again, v. 12. to be in silence. The Apostle seems to ground the Phrase, not only on the inferiority of the woman in regard of the creation and first sin, v. 13, 14. but also on the presumption that they needed instruction; towards which, silence has always been reckoned an indispensable qualification, the introductory precept in all Schools, as that wherein all attention is founded. If some women of our age think they have outgon that novice state the Apostle supposes, and want no teaching; I must crave leave to believe, they want that very first Principle which should set them to learn, viz. the knowledge of their own ignorance: a science which so grows with study and consideration, that Socrates after a long life spent in pursuit of Wisdom, gave this as the sum of his learning, This only I know, that I know nothing. This proficiency seems much wanting to our female Talker, who, in this, seem to confute the common maxim, and give what they have not, by making their ignorance visible to others, though it be undiscernable to themselves: and to such we may not unfitly apply the Sarcasin of Zeno to a talkative Youth; their ears are fallen into their tongue.

12. But besides this assuming sort of talkativeness, there is another usually charged upon the Sex, a mere chatting, prating humor, which maintains itself at the cost of their neighbors, and can never want supplies as long as there is anybody within the reach of their observation. This I would fain hope is most the vice of the vulgar sort of Women; the education of the Nobler setting them above those mean entertainments. Yet when 'tis remembered that St. Paul▪ 1 Tim. 5. 13. makes Tatling the effect of Idleness, it may not unreasonably be feared, that where there is most of the Cause, there will be some of the Effect. And indeed, it would puzzle one to conjecture, how that round of formal Visits among Persons of Quality should be kept up without this: That their Visits should be only a dumb Shew, none will suspect among women; and when the unfashionable themes of Housewifery, Piety, &c. are excluded, there will not remain many Topics of Discourse, unless this be called into supply. And this indeed is a most inexhaustible reserve, it having so many springs to feed it, that tis scarce possible it should fail. And when 'tis farther considered, how apt a minister it is to Envy, Spleen, Revenge, and other feminine Passions, we cannot suppose it can be unacceptable where any of those bear sway. But I believe it is not more frequently introduced by anything then the vanity of Wit, which has nowhere a more free and exorbitant range than in censuring and deriding; nay, finds not only Exercise but Triumph too, vain Persons seldom considering the Infirmities or Follies of others, without some Complacencies, and assuming reflections on themselves; which how unagreeable it renders this liberty of talking to that Modesty we recommend, is obvious enough, and would God 'twere only opposit to that; but it is no less so to all the obligations of Justice and Charity also, which are scarce so frequently violated by anything, as by this licentiousness of the tongue.

13. There yet another vice of it, for which the female Sex has been generally accused, and that is reveling of secrets; an infirmity presumed so incident to them, that Aristotle is said to have made it one of the three things he solemnly repented of, that he had ever trusted a Secret with a Woman. But by how much the greater prejudice they lie under in this respect, the greater ought to be their caution to vindicate not only their Persons, but their Sex, from the imputation, which is indeed extremely reproachful: this blasting humor being a symptom of a loose, impotent soul, a kind of incontinence of the mind, that can retain nothing committed to it; but as if that also had its Diabetic passion, perpetually and almost insensibly evacuating all. And indeed however we are willing to appropriate this to the Sex, yet the fault is owing only to this ill constitution of the mind, which is oftentimes no less visible in men; as on the contrary, those women who by reason and vertu have acquired a Solidity and Firmness of mind, are as sure repositories of a Secret, as the most masculine confident: and such I have no intent to involve in this charge, but rather, by proposing their example to the rest, show that nature has put them under no fatal necessity of being thus impotent. A secret is no such unruly thing, but it may be kept in: they may take the Wise man's word for it, Ecclus. 19. 10. If thou hast heard a word let it die with thee, and be bold, it will not burst thee.

14. This is a piece of daring manliness, which they may affect without breach of Modesty; would God they would take it in exchange for that virile Boldness, which is now too common among many even of the best Rank. Such a degenerate age do we now live in, that everything seems inverted, even Sexes; whilst men fall to the Effeminacy and Niceness of women, and women take up the Confidence, the Boldness of men, and this too under the notion of good Breeding. A blush (though formerly reputed the color of Vertu) is accounted worse manners than those things which ought to occasion it, and such as nothing but the simplicity of a Country Girl can excuse. But the infirmity for the most part proves very corrigible; a few weeks of the Town Discipline wears off that piece of Rusticity, and advances them to a modish Assurance. Nor is that designed to terminate in itself, but it is to carry them on, till they arise to a perfect Metamorphosis, their Gesture, their Language, nay sometimes their Habit too being affectedly masculine; so that what Tacitus speaks of Vitellius in relation to his being a Prince, we may apply to them and say, that If others did not remember them to be women, themselves could easily forget it.

15. Yet, were this affectation confined only to the more innocent indifferent things, 'twere more tolerable; but alas it extends farther, and there are women who think they have not made a sufficient escape from their sex, 'till they have assumed the Vices of men too. A sober modest dialect is too effeminate for them: a blustering ranting style is taken up, and (to show them proficience in it) adorned with all the Oaths and Imprecations their memory or invention can supply; as if they meant to vindicate their sex from the imputation of Timorousness by daring God Almighty. 'Tis true indeed, an Oath sounds gratingly out of whatever mouth, but out of a woman's it hath such an uncouth harshness, that there is no noise on this side Hell can be more amazingly odious; yet this is a music this discordant age hath introduced, no former having I think ever heard it in places at all civiliz'd: so that the female swearers want that poor shadow of excuse the men pretend to, it having been so far from customary, that the unwontedness could not but force them to some industry and pains, ere they could acquire the habit, and set up for female Hectors; an essay, wherein they have been very kind to the masculine, by showing the world there can be something worse.

16. 'Tis said there want not some who complete the demonstration by the other parallel quality of Drinking also; a vice detestable in all, but prodigious in women, who put a double violence upon their nature, the one in the intemperance, the other in the immodesty; and though they may take their immediate copy from men, yet (to the praise of their proficiency) they outdo their Exemplar and draw near the original: nothing human being so much beast as a drunken woman. This is evident enough if we look only on the mere surface of the crime; but if we dive farther into its inferences and adherencies, the assirmation is yet more irrefragable. She who is first a prostitute to Wine, will soon be to Lust also; she has dismissed her Guards, discarded all the suggestions of reason, as well as Grace, and is at the mercy of any, of every assailant. And when we consider how much fuller the world is of Amnons then Josephs, it will not be hard to guess the fate of that woman's Chastity, which has no other bottom then that of men's. So that unless her vice secure her virtue, and the loathsomeness of the one prevent attempts on the other; 'tis scarce imaginable a woman that loses her Sobriety should keep her honesty: so that indeed I might more properly have made this reflection when I come to speak of Modesty in the second notion of it, as it is opposed to Lightness and Wantonness, but it falls not much amiss now, to be the introduction to it.

17. And if we consider Modesty in this sense, we shall find it the most indispensable requisite of a woman; a thing so essential and natural to the sex, that every the least declination from it, is a proportionable receding from Womanhood, bu... the total abandoning it ranks them among Brutes, nay sets them as far beneath those, as an acquired vileness is below a native. I need make no collection of the verdicts either of the Philosophers or Divines in the case, it being so much an instinct of nature, that though too many make a shift to suppress it in themselves, yet they cannot so darken the notion in others, but that an Impudent woma... is looked on as a kind of Monster; a thing diverted and distorted from its proper form. That there is indeed a strange repugnancy to nature, needs no other evidence then the struggling, and difficulty in the first violations of Modesty, which always begin with regrets and blushes, and require a great deal of Self-denial, much of vicious Fortitude, to encounter with the recoilings and upbraidings of their own minds.

18. I make no doubt but this age has arrived to as compendious arts of this kind, as industrious vice can suggest, and we have but too many instances of early proficiencie in this learning; yet I dare appeal even to the forwardest of them, whether at first they could not with more ease have kept their vertu then lost it. Certainly such are the Horrors and Shames that precede those first Guilts, that they must commit a rape upon themselves (force their own reluctancies and aversions) before they can become willing prostitutes to others. This their Seducers seem well to understand, and upon that score are at the pains of so many preparatory courtings, such expense of presents too; as if this were so uncouth a crime, that there were no hope to introduce it but by a confederacy of some more familiar vices, their Pride or Covetousness.

19. The best way therefore to countermine those Stratagems of men, is for women to be suspiciously vigilant even of the first approaches. He that means to defend a Fort, must not abandon the Outworks, and she that will secure her Chastity, must never let it come to too close a siege, but repress the very first and most remote insinuations of a tempter. Therefore when we speak of modesty in our present notion of it, we are not to oppose it only to the grosser act of Incontinentcy, but to all those misbehaviors, which either discover or may create an inclination to it; of which sort is all lightness of carriage, wanton glances, obscene discourse; things that show a woman so weary of her honor, that the next comer may reasonably expect a surrender, and consequently be invited to the Assault. Indeed they are such, that one would rather think them the result of many acts, then merely the Prologue to one, and yet nothing but a custom of private sin, could supply impudence enough to do what is so publicly scandalous; and where this is found in those of any considerable age, charity itself can scarce pass a milder censure. Yet possibly in those of the youngest sort, they may at first be taken up (as their dress is) merely in imitation of others, embraced implicitly upon the authority of those, whose examples govern the modes. When a poor girl, who has still so much of the child as to admire everything that glitters, sees these things used by the gay people of the world, 'tis no wonder if she take these as part of their accomplishments, and, upon peril of that formidable calamity of being unfashionable, conform to them: Which yet does not so much extenuate the guilt of those few seduced persons, as it aggravats that of the Seducers, and attests the strange corruption of the age, that those things which the less hardened sort of prostitutes were formerly ashamed of, should now pass into the frequency and avowedness of a fashion, become a part of Discipline and Institution of youth; as if vice now disdain'd to have any punies in its school, and therefore by a preposterous anticipation, makes its pupils begin where they were wont to end, initiates them at first into that shamelesness, which was wont to be the product only of a long habit: what the end will be of these Piqueerers in impudence, who thus put their vertu on the forlorn hope, is easy to divine. Yet is not this the only state of danger: they who keep their ranks, and though they do not provoke assaults, yet stay to receive them, may be far enough from safety. She that lends a patient ear to the praises of her Wit or Beauty, intends at first perhaps only to gratify her vanity; but when she is once charm'd with that Sirens song, bewitcht with that Flattery, she insensibly declines to a kindnefs for that person that values her so much▪ and when that spark shall be blow'd up by perpetual remonstrances of Passion, and perhaps little Romantique artifices of pretending to die for her, with a thousand other tricks, which lust can suggest, 'twill like the Naptha Naturalists speak of, in a moment grow to an unquenchable flame, to the ruin both of her vertu and honor.

20. Let no woman therefore presume upon the innocence of her first intentions; she may as well upon confidence of a sound constitution, enter a pest-house and converse with the plague, whose contagion does not more subtly insinuate itself, then this sort of temptation. And as in that case she would not stay to define what were the critical distance, at which she might approach with safety, but would run as far from it as she could; so in this, it no less concerns her, to remove herself from the possibility of danger, and (how unfashionable soever it be) to put on such a severe Modesty, that her very looks should guard her, and discourage the most impudent assailant. 'Tis said of Philopemen, that the Lacedemonians finding it their interest to corrupt him with money, they were yet so possessed with the reverence of his virtues, that none durst undertake to attack him; and sure 'twere not impossible for women to arrive at the same security: such an authority there is in Vertu, that where 'tis eminent, 'tis apt to control all loose desires, and he must not be only lustful but sacrilegious, that attempts to violate such a Sanctuary.

21. But perhaps that sex may fear, that by putting on such a Strictness, they shall lose the glory of their Beauty, which is now chiefly estimated by the number of those who court and adore them. To this in the first place I must say, that they are miserable Trophies to Beauty that must be built on the ruins of vertu and honor; and she that to boast the length of her hair should hang herself in it, would but act the same folly in a lower instance.

22. But then secondly, 'tis a great mistake to think their Beauty shall be the less prized, since 'tis incident to man's nature to esteem those things most that are at distance, whereas an easy and cheap descent begets contempt. So long as they govern themselves by the exact rules of Prudence and Modesty, their luster is like the Meridian Sun in its clearness, which though less approachable, is counted more glorious; but when they decline from those, they are like that Sun in a cloud, which though safer gazed on, is not half so bright. But besides these collateral advantages, 'tis certain that Modesty gives an immediate and direct improvement to Beauty; for though men for their own vicious ends wish them sever'd, yet they cannot but think they are the most amiable when united, and you shall hear them often commend the aspect of that Modesty, which they would fain circumvent.

23. But in the 3d. place, there is nothing but such a Reservedness that can indeed make their Beauty triumphant. Parly and conquest are the most distant things; and she that descends to treat with an assailant, whatever he may tell her of his being her captive, 'tis but in order to the making her his; which when she once is, there is no state of servitude half so wretched, nothing in the world being so slavishly abject as a prostitute woman. For besides all the interest of another life which she basely resigns, she sacrifices all that is valuable in this: her reputation she puts wholly in his power that has debauched her, and which is worse her reformation too. If she should have a mind to return to vertu, she dares not for fear he should divulge her former strayings from it: so that, like Catiline, she is engaged to future evils to secure the past. Yea she subjects herself not only to his lust, but to all his humors and fancies, may even to all those who have been instrumental to their privacies, none of them all being to be displeas'd for fear of blabbing: and when 'tis remembered, what a sort of cattle they are, which are the engines in such affairs, There can fierce be anything more deplorable then to be within their lash. 'Tis true indeed, some have found a way to cure this uneasiness by being their own delators, not only confessing but boasting their crime, and by an impudent owning prevent all accusations: yet even this serves but to attest the intolerableness of the former condition, when this worst of mischiefs is chose as a rescue. Their impatience of being always in awe, makes them take up that resolution for infamy, which Caesar did for death, who said 'twas better to die once then to be always in fear. And though this desperate remedy may cure the fear, yet it ascertains the reproach; for whereas in the impeachment of others there is place for doubt, and charity may prompt some to disbelieve it, yet when the fact is justified by the offender, the evidence is uncontrollable, and withal doubles the infamy. For, besides that which adheres to the crime there is a distinct portion due to the impudence; yet like the Scorpion it must cure its own sting, and though it increases the obloquy, yet it deadens the sense of it.

24. But when they have thus steel'd their forheads against all impressions of Shame, they are still liable to many other painful effects of their sin. What fears of being abandoned, what jealousies of rivals, do often torture them? And indeed not without ground: for they cannot but know, that the same humor of variety which engaged their Paramors in their love, may do the same for another, and another, and so on; it being as possible to grasp the air, as to confine a wandering lust. Besides, what anxious apprehensions have they of the approach of age, which they are sure will render them loathed and despicable, as also of all intermedial decays of Beauty? How critically do they examine their glass? and every wrinkle that it represents in their face, becomes a deep gash in the heart. But if they have at any time the leisure (or indeed the courage) to look inward the view is yet more dreadful, a deformed fowl, spoild of its innocence, and rendered almost as brutish as the sin it hath consented to. But though it be in some respects like the beast that perisheth, it is not, it cannot be, in that which would most avail it; an endless being it cannot lose, nor can it expect anything from that preeminence of its nature, but an infinity of misery. This is such an amazing contemplation, as, methinks, were it insisted on, should allay the hottest blood; no impure flames being so fierce as to contest with those of unquenchable fire. It is therefore though a very impious, yet no unskillful artifice of those, who would vitiate women in their manners, to corrupt them in their Principles, and by extinguishing all hopes or fears of another World, persuade them to immerse boldly into all the abominations of this. 'Tis said, this is now an art of wooing, the modern prelude to the basest proposals: it seems this age dares not trust only to the former ways of seducement, fears there will not be women enough that will forget the interests of another World; and therefore is fain to set up a new party of others to disbelieve it. And I fear that design has been too prosperous; many women are so much more concerned for their bodies than their souls, that they are contented the one should be elevated upon the depression and debasement of the other; and whilst with a vain transport, they can hear their outward form applauded as Angelical, or Divine, they can very tamely endure to have their better part vilified and despised, defin'd to be only a puff of air in their nostrils, which will scatter with their expiring breath, or, in the Atheist's phrase, Wisd-6. 6. vanish as the soft air. Whereas they should consider, that they who preach this doctrine to them, design it only to infer a pernicious use. 'Tis a maxim in Politics, that those counsels are suspiciously to be scan'd, which carry in their front the advisers interest; which certainly is never more visible then in this case, he that once gains this point, never needing to contest for all the rest. For he that can persuade a woman out of her soul, will soon command her body, and then what was at first his interest, becomes hers at last; and her wishes of the mortality of her soul, are much stronger then 'tis possible her belief of it could be: which confirms abundantly my affirmation of the servile, wretched condition of such a person. For if we judge that a very severe slavery, which makes people desirous to resign a temporal being, what shall we think of that which provokes them to renounce an eternal?

25. And now by this gradation of mischiefs we may judge of the deplorable state of those who have abandoned their Vertu; wherein I doubt not the consciences of many cannot only attest, but much improve the description; and all I shall say to such, is, only to consult that bosom monitor, which till they do all Homilies will be insignificant. My design was not therefore to tell them what they too well feel, but only to point out their wracks as warnings others.

26. Let those therefore who are yet untainted, and by being so, have their judgments clear and unbiast, consider soberly the misery of the other condition, and that not only to applaud, but secure their own; and when ever the outward pomps and gaudy splendors of a vitiated woman seem, like that of Cresus, to boast their happiness, let them look through that Fallacy, and answer with Solon, that those only are happy who are so at their end. Their most exquisite deckings are but like the garlands on a beast designed for Sacrifice; their richest gems are but the chains, not of their ornament but slavery; and their gorgeous apparel, like that of Herod, covers perhaps a putrid body, (for even that doth not seldom prove their fate) or however, a more putrid soul. They who can thus consider them, will avoid one great snare; for 'tis not always so much the lust of the flesh, as that of the eyes which betrays a woman. 'Tis the known infirmity of the Sex, to love gaiety, and a splendid appearance, which renders all temptations of that sort so connatural to them, that those who are not arrived to a more sober estimate of things, will scarce be secure. It will therefore be necessary for them to regulate their opinions, and reduce all such things to their just valu, and then they will appear so trifling, that they can never maintain any competition with the more solid interests of Vertu and Honor. For though those terms seem in this loose age to be exploded; yet where the things are visible they extort a secret veneration, even from those who think it their concern publicly to deride them: whereas on the other side a defection from them exposes to all the contempt imaginable, renders them despised even by those who betraid them to it, leaves a perpetual blot upon their Names, and their Family. For in the character of a woman, let Wit and Beauty, and all female accomplishments stand in the front; yet if wantonness bring up the rear, the Satyr soon devours the Panegyric, and (as in an Echo) the last words only will reverberate, and her vice will be remembered when all the rest will be forgot. But I need not declame upon this theme; the Son of Syraeh has don ittomy hand, in many passages, but especially Ecclus. 23. to which I refer the reader.

32, What hath been already said, is I suppose, sufficient to convince every woman how much it is her concern to keep herself strictly within the bounds of Modesty and Vertu. In order to which, there is nothing more important then a judicious choice of their Company; I mean not only for men, but women also: vice is contagious, and this especially has that worst quality of the Plague, that 'tis malicious, and would infect others. A woman that knows herself scandalous, thinks she is reprocht by the vertu of another, looks on her as one that is made to reprove her ways, as it is, Wisd. 2. 14. and therefore in her own defense strives to level the inequality, not by reforming her self, (that she thinks too hard a task) but by corrupting the other. To this end, such are willing to screw themselves into an acquaintance, will be officiously kind, and by all arts of condescension and obliging, endeavor to ensnare a woman of reputation into their intimacy. And if they succeed, if they can but once entangle her into that cobweb-friendship; they then, spider-like, infuse their venom, never leave their vile insinuations till they have poisoned and ruined her. But and if on the other side they meet with one of too much sagacity to be so entrapped; if they cannot taint her Innocence, they will endeavor to blast her Fame; represent her to the World to be what they would have made her; that is in the Psalmists phrase; such a one as themselves, Psal. 50. 24. so that there is no conversing with them, but with a manifest peril either of Vertu or Honor, which should methinks be a sufficient disswasive. 'Tis true, 'tis not always in ones power to shun the meeting with such persons, they are too numerous, and too intruding to be totally avoided; unless, as St. Paul says, 1 Cor. 5. 10. one should go out of the World. But all voluntary converse supposes a choice, and therefore everybody that will may refrain that, may keep on the utmost frontiers of civility, without ever suffering any approach towards intimacy and familiarity.

33. And sure were this distance duly observed, it might be of excellent use, a kind of lay Excommunication, which might come very seasonably to supply the want of the Ecclesiastic now out-dated. And this seems very well to agree with the sense of Solon, the wise Athenian Law-giver, who, besides that he shut the Temple-doors against them, interdicted them the sacred Assemblies; made it one of his laws, that an Adulteress should not be permitted to wear any ornaments, that so they might in their dress carry the note of their infamy. Should we have the like distinction observed, I sear many of our gaiest birds would be unplumed, and though the same be not now an expedient practicable; yet the former is, and might be of very good use. For beside that already mentioned of securing the innocent, it might perhaps have a good effect on the guilty, who could not but reflect with some shame on themselves, if they were thus singled out and discriminated; whereas whilst they are suffered to mix with the best Societies, (like hurt Deer in a herd) they flatter themselves they are undiscernable.

34. But indeed the advantage of this course is yet more extensive, and would reach the whole Sex, which now seems to lie under a general scandal, for the fault of particular persons. We know any considerable number of smutty ears casts a blackness on the whole field, which yet were they apart, would perhaps not fill a small corner of it; and in this uncharitable age, things are apt to be denominated not from the greater but worsier part: whereas, were the precious severed from the vile, by some note of distinction, there might then a more certain estimate be made: and I cannot be so severe to womankind, as not to believe the scandalous part would then make but a small show which now makes so great a noise.

35. Besides this I can suggest but one way more for women of honor to vindicate their Sex, & that is by making their own vertu as illustrious as they can; and by the bright shine of that draw off men's eyes from the worser prospect. And to this there is required not only innocence, but prudence; to abstain, as from all real evil, so from the appearance of it too, 1 Thess. 5. 22. not, by any doubtful or suspicious action, to give any umbrage for censure but as the Apostle says in another case, 2 Cor. II. 11. to cut off occasion from them that desire occasion; to deny themselves the most innocent liberties, when any scandalous inference is like to be deduc'd from them. And though perhaps no caution is enough to secure against the malicious, and the jealous; though 'tis possible some black mouth may asperse them, yet they have still Plato's reserve, who being told of some who had defam'd him, 'tis no matter said he, I will live so that none shall believe them. If their lives be but such, that they may acquit themselves to the sober and unprejudiced, they have all the security can be aspir'd to in this world; the more evincing attestation they must attend from the unerring Tribunal hereafter; where there lies a certain appeal for all injured persons who can calmly wait for it.

SECT. II. Of Meekness.

1. IN the next place we may rank Meekness as a necessary feminine Vertu; this even nature seems to teach, which abhors monstrosities and disproportions, and therefore having allotted to women a more smooth and soft composition of body, infers thereby her intention, that the mind should correspond with it. For though the adulterations of art, can represent in the same Face beauty in one position, and deformity in another, yet nature is more sincere, and never meant a serene and clear forehead, should be the frontispiece to a cloudy tempestuous heart. 'Tis therefore to be wisht they would take the admonition, and whilst they consult their glasses, whether to applaud or improve their outward form, they would cast one look inwards, and examine what symmetry is there held with a fair outside; whether any storm of passion darken and overcast their interior beauty, and use at least an equal diligence to rescu that; as they would to clear their face from any stain or blemish.

2. But it is not nature only which suggests this, but the God of nature too, Meekness being not only recommended to all as a Christian vertu, but particularly enjoined to women as a peculiar accomplishment of their Sex, 1 Pet. 3. 4. where after the mention of all the exquisite and costly deckings of art, this one ornament of a meeek and quiet spirit, is confronted to them, with this eminent attestation, that it is in the sight of God of great price, and therefore to all who will not enter dispute with God, and contest his judgment, it must be so too. Now though Meekness be in itself a single entire vertu, yet it is diversifi'd, according to the several faculties of the soul, over which it has influence; so that there is a Meekness of Understanding, a Meekness of the Will, and a Meekness of the Affections; all which must concur to make up the Meek and quiet spirit.

3. And first for the Meekness of the Understanding, it consists in a pliableness to conviction, and is directly opposite to that sullen adherence observable in too many; who judge of tenets not by their conformity to truth and reason, but to their prepossessions and tenaciously retained opinions, only because they (or some in whom they confide) have once owned them; and certainly such a temper is of all others the most obstructive to Wisdom. This puts them upon the chance of a Lottery, and what they first happen to draw, determines them merely upon the privilege of its precedency, so that had Mahomet first seized them, his tenure would have been as indeseable, as Christ's now. How great the force of such prejudices are, we may see by the oppositions it raised against Christian doctrine in gross at its first promulgation; the Jews blind Zeal for the Traditions of their Fathers, engaging them in the murder even of that very Messiah whom those Traditions had taught them to expect, and after in the persecution of that doctrine which his Resurrection had so irrefragably attested. And to justify the propriety of this observation, to those I now write to, 'tis expressly affirmed, Acts. 1. 3. 50. That they made use of the zeal of the female Proselytes for that purpose. The Jews stirred up the devout and honorable women, and raised a persecution against Paul and Barnabas. So that 'tis no unseasonable advice to such, to be sure they see well their way before they run too fierce a carriage in it; otherwise the greatest heat without light, does but resemble that of the bottomless pit, where flames and darkness do at once cohabit.

4. But whilst I decry this prejudicate stiffness, I intend not to plead for its contrary extreme, and to recommend a too easy flexibility; which is a temper of equal, if not more ill consequence than the former. The adhering to one opinion can expose but to one error, but a mind that lies open to the effluxes of all new tenets, may successively entertain a whole ocean of delusions; and to be thus yielding, is not a Meekness but Servileness of Understanding. Indeed 'tis so great a weakness of mind, that the Apostle sinks it somewhat below the impotence of women, and resembles it to that of children, Eph. 4. 14. yet it seems the folly of some women had levelled them with children in this matter, for the same Apostle takes notice of such, to whom as he gives the Epithet of silly, so the latter part of the Character speaks them incorrigibly so, ever learning, and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth, 1 Tim. 3. 6. a description which if we compare with our times, we must think prophetic. For how many instances hath this age given us of women so led captive; who being either affected with the novelty, or seduced by the pretended zeal of a new teacher, have given up their understanding to him: and for a while this strong man has kept possession, but when a stronger than he hath come it has fared as with him in the Gospel, a louder zeal or a newer doctrine soon divides his spoils; and that by force of the very same principle, on which he set up, which within a while undermines the latter also, and so successively; till the poor Proselite has been hurried through all the mazes of wild error, and at last perhaps (like a palate distracted by too much variety) she fixes upon that which at first she most decried. This has been eventually true in some, who setting out in the fiercest detestation of Popery, have wandered so long like the blinded Syrians, 2 King. 6. 20. that they have at last found themselves in the midst of Samaria; by an insensible circular motion been brought about to that Religion, from which alone they designed to fly. So little do itching ears know whether they may be carried: and indeed the ear when infected with that prurient humor may vie Mischief with the tongue, which St. James tells us, Chap. 3. 15. is (though a little member) a world of iniquity.

5. 'Tis therefore the most important concern of all, to fortify that so assailable part; but 'tis especially so of women, not only in respect of that natural imbecility, which renders them liable to seducement, but also because the opinion of their being so, makes them particularly aimed at by seducers. For as he who is to put off adulterated wares, will choose the most unwary chapmen, so these Sophisticators of Divinity, desire the most undiscerning Auditors. And truly that so many of that Sex are so, I do not so much impute to any natural defect, as to the loose notions they have of Religion, of which they have perhaps some general confused apprehensions, but have so little penetrated the depth of it, that they know not why they are Christians, rather than Turks, why of the Church of England, rather than of that of Rome, or Geneva. And while they are thus unfixed, and have no better principle than custom and compliance; they have nothing to answer to any the grossest deceit that can be obtruded upon them, which for ought they know or have considered, may be as true as anything they formerly professed. Now when any one in this condition shall be assaulted, not only by the repeated importunities of false teachers, but also by ingeminated threatenings of hell and damnation, she is like one awaked by the outcry of fire, and in that amaze will be apt to run where-ever the first discoverer of her danger shall lead her.

6. I shall therefore most earnestly recommend it as the best Antidote against the poison of novel doctrines, to examine well the grounds of the old; for want of this it is that our Church has been exposed to so many frivolous cavils, it being too incident to the perverse Pride of humane nature, to speak evil of things we understand not. And had our she-zealots first consulted some sober guides, and from them understood upon what grounds the Practice as well as Doctrine of our Church was founded, they could not so easily have been carried away by every wind of doctrine, as the Apostle phrases it, Eph. 4. 14.

7. Indeed this is no more than common justice exacts, which forbids the condemning even the vilest malefactor unheard, (& unheard and not understood, are in this case terms equivalent) yet sure they owe something more to that Church from whose ministry themselves must confess to have derived their Christianity, in whose bosom they have been cherished, and consequently may plead a mothers right in them; so that unless possession, which fortifies Civil rights, destroy the Ecclesiastic; she may challenge besides that natural justice, (which is the common due of humanity) a parental respect and reverence, a debt which is sure very ill answered by those, who cast off her obedience before they have at all considered what it is she commands. And if the abdicating a child be a thing so unnatural, as needs some very important cause to justify it; the renouncing of a Parent must require a reason as far transcending that, as the guilt does, if it be causeless; and such it must inevitably be in all, who for want of due examination, suffer themselves to be led into groundless prejudices and disgusts.

8. To prevent that guilt, and a multitude of others which spring from it; I must again repeat my Proposal, that women of Quality (who are presumed to want neither Parts nor leisure for it) would a little look into the inside of the Religion they profess; if it be a true one, 'twill bear the inspection, truth never shunning the light; if it be not, the discovery cannot be too early. And indeed among the many remarkable impresses of truth our Church bears, this is one, that she does not blindfold her Proselytes, leaves them the use of their discerning Faculty, and does not by obtruding upon them an implicit belief, force them to lay down their Reason when they take up their Faith. And now why should not Ladies spend a few of their many idle hours in this inquisition, I mean not to embark them in a maze of controversies, but only to discern those plain grounds of Truth on which our Church builds; which if well digested, will prove a better amulet against delusion than the reading whole Tomes of Disputations, more apt to distract than fortify their understandings. And had they thus done, had their minds been ballasted by sober principles, so many of them had never made up the triumphs of so many and so various seducers. And though to such this advertisement may come too late (like assistance after a defeat) yet it may be a seasonable caution to others; and to those I offer it, as that very temper wherein consists that rational Meekness of the understanding I would recommend to them, which is equally violated by a blind obstinacy, or as blind a flexibility.

9. A second sort of Meekness is that of the Will, which lies in its just subordination, and submission to a more supreme Authority, which in Divine things is the Will of God; in Natural or Moral right Reason; and in human Constitutions the command of Superiors: and so long as the Will governs itself by these in their respective Orders, it transgresses not the Meekness required of it. But experience attests, that the Will is now in its depravation an imperious Faculty, apt to cast off that subjection to which it was designed; and act independently from those motives which should influence it. This God knows is too common in all Ages, all Conditions, and Sexes: but the Feminine lies more especially under an ill name for it. Whether that have grown from the low opinion conceived of their Reason, less able to maintain its Empire, or from the multiplied...d habitual instances themselves have given of unruly Wills, I shall not undertake to determine; but either way 'tis, I am sure, so great a reproach, as they should be very industrious to wipe off. And truly I know nothing more incentive to that endeavor, than the having a right estimate of the Happiness as well as Vertu of a governable Will. How calmly do those glide through all (even the roughest) events, that can but master that stubborn Faculty? A will resigned to God's, how does it enervate and enfeeble any calamity? Nay indeed it triumphs over it, and by that conjunction with him that ordains it, may be said to command even what it suffers. 'Twas a Philosophical Maxim, that a Wise moral man could not be injured, could not be miserable. But sure 'tis much more true of him who has that divine Wisdom of Christian resignation, that twists and inwraps all his choices with God's, and is neither at the pains nor hazard of his own elections; but is secure, that unless Omniscience can be deceived, or Omnipotence defeated, he shall have what is really best for him.

10. Proportionable (though not equal) to this, is the happiness of a Will regulated by Reason in things within its Sphere: 'tis the dignity of human Nature, and that which distinguishes it from that of Beasts. Yea, even those grow more contemptible in their kinds, the farther they are removed from it. The stupid sturdiness of an Ass has rendered it Proverbial for folly, when the tractableness of other Animals has tempted some to list them among rationals.

Besides, reason affords something of a Basis and Foundation for the Will to bottom on. He that governs himself by reason (that being still the same) will act equally and consonant to himself; but he that does a thing this moment, only because he will, may the next have as weighty an argument to do something quite contrary; and so may spend his whole time in unravelling his Spiders webs, as the Prophet rightly calls the vain designs of such brutish men, Isa. 59. 5. Not to speak of those recoilings and upbraidings of the rational faculties, which are the uneasy attendants of those who resist its more direct admonitions; there is nothing exposes to more secular ruins. An ungovernable Will is the most precipitous thing imaginable, and like the Devil in the Swine, hurries headlong to destruction, and yet deprives one of that poor reserve, that faint comfort of the miserable, Pitty; which will not be so much invited by the misery, as averted by that willfulness which caused it. Nay indeed, so little can such persons expect the compassion of others, that 'twill be hard for them to afford themselves their own: the consciousness that their calamities are but the issues of their own perverseness, being apt to dispose them more to hate than pity. And this is no small accumulation of wretchedness, when a man suffers not only directly, but at the rebound too; reinflcts his miseries upon himself by a grating reflection on his own madness. Yea, so great an aggravation is it, that even Hell itself is enhauced and completed by it; all the torments there being edged and sharpened by the woeful remembrance, that they might once have been avoided.

11. In the last place a Will duly submissive to lawful Superiors, is not only an amiable thing in the eyes of others, but exceedingly happy to ones self; 'tis the parent of peace, and order both public and private. A blessing so considerable, as is very cheaply bought with a little receding from ones own will or humor, whereas the contrary temper is the spring and original of infinite confusions, the grand incendiary which sets Kingdoms, Churches, Families, in combustion; a flat contradiction not only to the word, but even the works of God; a kind of Anticreative power, which reduces things to that Chaos from whence God drew them. Our age has given us too many and too pregnant instances of its mischievous effects, which may serve to enhaunce the value of that governable malleable temper I now recommend. And as a Will thus resigned to Reason and just Authority, is a felicity all rational natures should aspire to; so especially the feminine Sex, whose passions being naturally the more impetuous, ought to be the more strictly guarded and kept under the severe discipline of Reason; for where 'tis otherwise, where a woman has no guid but her Will, and her Will is nothing but her Humor, the event is sure to be fatal to herself, and often to others also.

12. And the hazard of this renders that other restraint of the will, I mean that of obedience to Superiors, a very happy imposition, though perhaps 'tis not always thought so, for those who resist the government of Reason, are not very apt to submit to that of Authority. Yet sure God and nature do attest the particular expediency of this to women, by having placed that Sex in a degree of inferiority to the other. Nay farther 'tis observable, that as there are but three states of life, through which they can regularly pass, viz. Virginity, Marriage, and Widowhood, two of them are states of Subjection, the first to the parent, the second to the husband; and the third, as it is casual, whether ever they arrive to it or no, so if they do, we find it by God himself reckoned as a condition the most desolate and deplorable. If I should say this happens upon that very score that they are left to their own guidance, the sad wracks of many would too much justify the gloss; but however it evinces, that God sets not the same value upon their being masterless, which some of them do, whilst he reckons them most miserable, when they are most at liberty.

13. And since God's assignation has thus determined subjection to be the women's lot, there needs no other argument of its fitness, or for their acquiescence. Therefore when ever they oppose it, the contumacy flies higher then the immediate Superior, and reaches God himself. And I am apt to think there would not many of that timorous Sex dare so far, were it not for some false punctilioes of honor, which (like those among our Duellists) have imposed themselves. These represent Meeknes and Submission as a silly sheepish quality unfit for women of breeding and spirit: whilst an imperious obstinacy passes for nobleness and greatness of mind. But alas they are woefully mistaken in their notion of a great spirit, which consists in scorning to do unworthy and vile things, and courageously encountering the adverse events of life, not in spurning at duty, or seeking to pull themselves from that Sphere where the divine Wisdom hath placed them. No sure, stubbornness is the mark only of a great stomach, not of a great mind; and the cruelty of a coward may as well denominate him valiant, as the ungovernableness of a woman can speak her generous.

14. In this I presume I speak the common sense of all, for what value soever they put upon themselves, nothing renders them less acceptable to others; an imperious woman being a plague to her relatives, and a derision to strangers, yea and a torment to herself. Every the least contradiction (which a meek person would pass over insensibly) inflaming such an unruly temper, and transporting her to such extravagances, as often produce very mischievous effects. On the other side if she be humor'd and complied with, that serves only to make her more insolent and intolerable; makes her humors grow to such a height, that she knows not herself what would please her, and yet expects that others should...: so that to such a one, we may apply what Hannibal said of Marcellus, that if he were vanquished; he never gave rest to himself, nor if he were victorious, to others. Certainly the uneasiness of a perverse spirit is so great, that could such come but to compare it with the calm and happy serenity of Meekness and Obedience, there would need no other Lecture to commend them to their esteem or practice.

15. The last branch of Meekness is that of Affections, and consists in reducing the passions to a temper and calmness, not suffering them to make uproars within to disturb ones self, nor without to the disquieting of others, and to this regulation Meekness is generally subservient. Yet because the correcting of some particular passions are more immediately assignable to other virtues, I shall insist only upon that, on which this has a more direct and peculiar influence, I mean Anger, a two edged passion, which whilst it deals it blows without, wounds yet more fattally within. The commotion and vexation which an angry man feels, is far more painful then anything he can ordinarily inflict upon another: herein justifying the Epithet usually given to Anger, that it is a short madness, for who that were in his right wits, would incur a greater mischief to do a less. It is indeed so great a distemper of the mind, that he that is possessed with it, is incompetent for any sober undertaking, and should as much be suspended from acting, as one in a Phrensy or Lunacy. This was the judgment and practice too of Plato, who going to chastise a servant, and finding himself grow angry, stopped his correction, a friend coming in and asking what he was doing, punishing replies he, an angry man, as thinking himself unfit to discipline another, till he had subdued his own passion. Another time his slave having offended him, I would beat thee, says he, but that I am angry. It were endless indeed to recite the black Epithets given by all Moralists to this vice. It shall suffice to take the suffrage of the wisest of men, one that had acquainted himself to know madness and folly, Ecl. 1. 17. and we find it his sentence, that anger rests in the bosom of fools, Ecl. 7. 11.

16. And what is thus universally unbecoming to human nature, cannot sure be less indecent for the gentler Sex: 'tis rather more so, everything contracting so much more of deformity, by how much it recedes from its proper kind. Now nature hath befriended women with a more cool and temperat constitution, put less of fire and consequently of choler, in their compositions; so that their heats of that kind are adventitious and preternatural, raised often by fancy or pride, and so both look more unhandsomely, and have less of pretence to veil and cover them. Besides women have a native feebleness, unable to back and assert their angers with any effective force, which may admonish them 'tis never intended they should let loose to that passion, which nature seems by that very inability to have interdicted them. But when they do it, they render themselves at once despised and abhorred; nothing being more ridiculously hateful, then an impotent rage.

17. But as the most feeble insect may sometimes disturb, though not much hurt us, so there is one feminine weapon which as 'tis always ready, so proves often troublesome, I mean the tongue, which, though in its loudest clamors can naturally invade nothing but the ear, yet even that is a molestation. The barking of a dog, though we are secure he cannot bite, is a grating unpleasant sound; and while women seek that way to vent their rage, they are but a sort of speaking brutes, and should consider whether that do not reflect more contempt upon themselves, then their most virulent reproaches can fix upon others.

18. But some things have had the luck to acquire a formidableness nobody knows how, and sure there is no greater instance of it, then in this case. A clamorous woman is looked on, though not with reverence, yet with much dread, and we often find things don to prevent or appease her storms, which would be denied to the calm and rational desires of a meeker person. And perhaps such successes have not been a little accessory to the fomenting the humor; yet sure it gives them little cause of triumph, when they consider how odious it makes them, how unfit (yea intolerable) for human society; let them take the verdict of Solomon who declares it better to dwell Pro. 25. 24. in a corner of a house top, then with a brawling woman in a wide house. Nor does the son of Sirach speak less sharply though more ironically, Ecl. 18. 16. A loud crying woman and a scold, shall be sought out to drive away the enemy. And though he taxes the feminine vices impartially enough, yet there is scarce any of them which he more often and more severely brands then this of unquietness. It seems 'twas a thing generally looked on, as very insufferable; as appears by Socrates, who when he designed to discipline himself to perfect patience and tolerance, knew no better way of exercise, then to get a shrew to his wife, an excellence that may perhaps again recommend a woman, when we fall to an age of Philosophers; but at present 'twill be hard for any of our Xantippes to find a Socrates; and therefore that quality is as destructive to their interests in getting husbands, ⟨ϕ⟩ it is to the husbands quiet when he is got. ⟨ϕ⟩ I presume I need not declame farther against this fault, which I suppose cannot be frequent among that rank of women to whom this tract is intended: for if neither moral nor divine Considerations have prevented it, yet probably civility and a gentile education hath: a scold being a creature to be looked for only in Stalls and Markets, not among persons o... quality. Yet if there be any that have descended to so sordid a practice, they have so far degraded themselves, that they are not to wonder if others subtract that respect, which upon other accounts they might demand.

19. And to such I should recommend the usual method of Physic, which is to cure by revulsion, let that sharp humor which so habitually flows to the tongue, be taught a little to recoil, and work inward; and instead of reviling others, discipline and correct themselves: let them upbraid their own madness, that to gratify an impotent, nay a most painful passion, have degenerated from what their nature, their qualities, their education, designed them. And if they can thus reverse their displeasures, 'twill not only secure others from all their indecent assaults, but it will at last extinguish them: for anger is corrosive, and if it be kept only to feed upon its self, must be its own devourer; if it be permitted to fetch no forage from without, nor to nourish itself with suspicions and surmises of others, nor to make any sallies at the tongue, it cannot long hold out.

20. And how much they will herein consult their interest and their reputation too, they may be taught by Solomon, who makes it the distinctive sign of a foolish woman to be clamorous, Prov. 9. 13. whereas when he gives the character of his Excellent woman, he links Wisdom and Gentleness together, she openeth her mouth with wisdom, and in her tongue is the law of kindness, Prov. 31. 26. If this verdict may be admitted (as sure it ought, whether we consider his wisdom, or dear bought experience in women) it will confute the common plea of querulous spirits, who think to seem insensible of any the least provocation, is to appear silly and stupid; though truly if it were so, 'twould be full as eligible as to appear mad and raving, as they commonly do in the transport of their fury.

21. To conclude, Meekness is so amiable, so endearing a quality, and so peculiarly embellishing to women, that did they but all consider it with half the attention they do their more trivial exterior ornaments, 'twould certainly be taken up as the universal mode, in all the several variations of it this Section has presented.

SECT. III. Of Compassion.

1. OF near Affinity to the Vertu of Meekness, is that of Mercy and Compassion, which indeed can scarce thrive in any place where the former hath not prepared the soil: Anger and Obstinacy being like that rough East-wind which brought the Egyptian Locusts, Exod. 10. 13. to eat up every green thing in the Land. A mind harrassed with its own impatency, is not at leisure to observe, much less to condole the calamities of others. But as a calm and clear day befriends us with a more distinct Prospect of distant Objects; so when all is quiet and serene within us, we can then look about us, and discern what exigencies of others invite our pity.

2. I need not say much to raise an estimate of this Vertu, since 'tis so essential to our Nature, so interwoven in the composition of Humanity, that we find in Scripture phrase, compassion is generally seated in the most inward sensible part of our frame, the bowels, so Col. 3. 12. Put on therefore bowels of mercy; and Phil. 2. 1. Bowels and mercies. So that a cruel ruthless person unmans himself, and is by the common vote of mankind to be listed among brutes; nay, not among the better, but only the more hateful, noxious sort of them.

3. But this is yet more unnatural in the female Sex, which being of softer mold, is more pliant and yielding to the impressions of pity, and by the strength of fancy redoubles the horror of any sad object; yea so remarkable is this tenderness, that God, when he would most magnify his own compassion, illustrates it by that of women, as the highest human instance. Indeed such a propension have women to commiseration, that they are usually taxed with an excess in it; so that any imprudent lenity is Proverbially called, A womanish Pity, and therefore it may be thought an impertinence to exhort them to that which they can scarce avoid. But to this I answer; first, that in this degenerate age, 'tis no news to see people violate their instincts, as well as their duties, and be worfe then their nature inclines them; many sins being committed even against the grain, and with violence to constitution.

4. Yet secondly, 'tis not a mere melting of the eyes, or yerning of the bowels I design to recommend: Alas, their tears will not be drink to a thirsty soul, nor will shivering at his nakedness cloth him, this is such an insignificant mercy as St. James describes, saying to a brother or sister, be ye warmed, be ye filled, but not giving them •...hings needful to the body, c. 2. 16. Indeed, she that weeps over those distresses she will not relieve, might have been fit to be entered in the list of the mourning women among the Jews and Heathens, who were hired to make up the Tragic pomp of Funerals with their mercenary sorrow, but had no real concern in that loss they seemed to bewail. 'Tis therefore a more active sort of Compassion to which I would invite them; and yet for method sake, I shall consider it under two distinct Heads, Giving, and Forgiving.

5. By Giving, in this place, I mean not a general liberality, (though that prudently bounded, is an Excellence well becoming Persons of Fortune) but only such a Giving as terminates upon the needy, and is applied to succor their indigencies. To give to those from whom they may expect returns, may be a design, but at the best can be but generosity and frankness of humor. 'Tis only then mercy (as Christ Himself has defined it) when it is to those from whom they can hope for nothing again.

6. And in this Vertu women have in form•... Ages eminently excelled, yea so essential was it, that we find Solomon thought not their characte•... complete without it, but numbers it among the properties of his Virtuous Woman, Prov. 31. 20. She stretcheth forth her hand to the poor, & reacheth her hand to the needy. And it is a little observable, that after he has described her Industry and Diligence for the acquiring of Wealth, this is se•... in the front of her disbursements, as the principa•... use she made of it; and precedes her providing Scarlet for her Household, or fine Linnen and Purple for herself, v. 21, 22. The application is very obvious, and admonishes all that own the same Title of Virtuous Women, to prefer the necessities of others before their own superfluities and delicacies. Nay, if they look farther; and consider who it is that is personated in the poor, that begs in every needy distrest suppliant, and that will finally own every act of mercy as don to himself: methinks they should sometimes think fit to sacrifice even their most moderate enjoyments to their charity; be ashamed to serve themselves before their Savior, or let him stand naked and hungry, whilst they are solacing with that which would relieve him.

7. But how then shall they answer it, who suffer him to be supplanted, not by their needs, but excesses; who have so devoted their hearts and purses to vanity and luxury, that they have neither will nor power to succor the wants of others? How unequal and disproportionate is it, that those who study to fling away money upon themselves, cannot be tempted by any opportunity and distress, to drop an alms to the poor? What a preposterous sight is it to see a Lady, whose gay Attire gives her the glittering of the Sun, yet have nothing of its other properties, never to cheer any drooping, languishing creature by her influence? 'Tis the counsel of the son of Sirach, not to give the poor any occasion to curse thee. Ecclus. 4. 5. But sure such persons do it, if the poor happen not to have more Charity then they exemplify to them. For when they shall find such haughty hearts under such soft raiment, see them bestow so much upon the decking their own bodies, and do nothing towards the necessary support of theirs; 'tis a shrewd trial of their Meekness. Poverty is apt of itself to embitter the spirit, and needs not such an additional temptation.

8. Nay farther, when a poor starving wretch shall look upon one of these gay creatures, and see that any one of the baubles, the loosest appendage of her dress; a fan, a busk, perhaps a black patch, bears a price that would warm his empty bowels; will he not have sharp incitations not only to execrate her pride, and his own poverty, but consequently to repine at the unequal distribution of Providence, and add sin to his misery? The denial therefore of an alms may be a double cruelty, to the soul as well as to the body. 'Tis said of Xenocrates, that a chased Bird flying to his bosom, he rescued it with much satisfaction, saying he had not betray'd a suppliant; but this is in that case reversed, and in an higher instance; for what can be more the betraying of a suppliant, then instead of supplying his wants, to rob him of his innocence, and be his snare in lieu of his refuge? This is a consideration I wish more deeply imprest upon the women of this Age; and truly 'tis their concern it should be so; for since at the last day the inquest shall be so particular upon this very thing, 'tis but necessary they should examine how they are fitted to pass that test.

9. Let them therefore keep a preparatory audit within their own breast, reflect upon the expenses of their vanity, what the delicacy of their food, what the richness and variety of their cloths, nay what the mere hypocrisies of their dress, in false hair, and complexion has cost them; to which they may also add the charge of their recreations and divertisements, those costly arts of chasing away that time, which they will one day wish to recall: let them I say compute all this, and then confront to it the account of their charity, and I much fear the latter will with many of them be comparatively as undiscernible, as Socrates found

Alcibiades's lands in the Map of the whole world, be so perfectly overwhelmed, that it will appear little in their own sight and nothing in God's.

10. For if the poor Widows mite acquired a valu merely from her poverty, that she had no more; by the rule of contraries we may conclude, how despicable the scanty oblations of the rich are in God's account. If even their liberality who gave much, was outvied by a farthing, Mar. 12. 41- to what point of diminution must their niggardly offerings, who give little, be reduced? especially when they shall be compared with the numerous and costly sacrifices they make to pride and luxury; nay I wish some were not guilty of more then the disproportion, even the total omission of charity, that in a multitude of Tailors bills cannot produce the account of one Garment for the poor, that amidst the delicacies of their own diet (nay perhaps of their dogs too) never order...d so much as the crumbs of their Table to any hungry Lazarus. But let all such remember, that there will come a time, when one of Tabitha's coats Acts 9. 39. will be of more valu then all their richest Wardrobes, though they could number Gowns with Lucillus's Cloaks, which the Roman Story reports to be 5000, and that when their luxurious fare shall only feast the worms, and render them passive in that Epicurism they acted before, they will wish they had made the bellies of the poor their refectory, and by feeding them nurished themselves to immortality.

11. Let this I say be seriously remember'd now, l...st hereafter they fall under the same exprobrating remembrance with the rich man in the Gospel, Luke 16. 25. Remember that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things, and Lazarus that which was evil, but now he is comforted and thou a...t tormented. A Text which St. Gregory professes was ever sounding in his ears, and made him look with suspicion and dread upon that grandeur to which he was advanced, as fearing it might be designed as his final reward. With what terror then may those look upon their present good things, who by ingrossingthem wholly to themselves, own them as their entire portion, and implicitly disclaim their share of the future? For to that none must pretend, who receive their transitory goods under any other notion, then that of a Steward or Factor: as we may see in the parable of the Talents, where those that had the reward of the five and ten Cities were not such as had consumed their Talents upon their own riot and excesses, but suchas had industriouslyemployed them according to the design of their Lord: and if it there fared so ill with the mere unprofitable servant, who had hoarded up his Talent, what shall become of those, who squander away theirs, and can give no account either of use or principal?

12. Were these considerations duly laid to heart, we might hope to see some of the primitive charity revive, when women of the highest rank converted their ornaments and costly deckings into clothing for the poor, and thought no retinue so desirable, so honorable as a train of Alms-folks: but I speak improperly, when I make the poor their attendants, for indeed they rather attended the poor, did not only order the supply of their wants, but were themselves their ministers, waited about their sick beds, dressed their most loathsome ulcers, and descended to all the most servile offices about them.

13. But these were such heights, such transcendendies of mercy, as required a deeper foundation of humility then will now be often met with: yet let me take the occasion to say, that it may be a good managery of a charity to act (as far as they can) personally in it. For besides that it prevents some abuses and frauds, which deputed agents may sometimes be tempted to; they pay God a double tribute in it, of their persons as well as their fortunes; next they bring themselves into acquaintance with the poor, and by that means correct those contentments and nice disdains, which their own prosperity is too apt to create farther yet, they excite their own compassion, which being a motion of the sensitive part of the mind, cannot be stir'd so effectually by anything, as by the presence of the object, the most pathetic tragical description of a distress, being not able to affect us half so much as one ocular demonstration. Lastly 'tis an apt means to increase their thankfulness to Almighty God, whose bounty to themselves must needs make a deeper impression, when 'tis compared with the necessitous condition of others: for things are best illustrated by their contraries, and 'tis too observable in our depraved nature, that we value not things by their real positive worth, but comparatively as they excel others, nor ever make a right estimate of what we enjoy, till our own or others wants instruct us.

14. Upon all these considerations it may be a very becoming useful circumstance in any charitable ministry to be themselves the actors; and to that end 'twill be a very commendable industry to qualify themselves to be helpful to the poor in as many instances as they can; not only opening their purses, but dispensatories too, providing medicines for such as either by disease, or casualty want that sort of relief. A charity which I doubt not is practiced by many, and I wish it were by more, that our nicer Dames who study only Cosmetics for themselves, would change the Scene, & instead of repairing or disguising their own complexions, study the restauration of their decrepit patients limbs. And sure though it be a less fashionable, 'tis a much better sight, to see a Lady binding up a sore, then painting her face; and she will cast a much sweeter savor in God's nostrils, with the smell of unguents and balsoms, then with the most exquisite odors and perfumes. For since God professes Isaiah 1. that that very incense which was designed as a part of his worship, was an abomination to him, because not accompanied with the acts of Mercy, we cannot think he will better like of those, which have no higher aim then delicacy and sensuality.

15. But besides this part of mercy in giving, there is another, that of forgiving; which may happen to be of a larger extent then the former: for whereas that was confined to the poor, this has no such limits, but as it is possible to be injured by persons of all ranks, so this pardoning mercy is to reach equally with that possibility. This is that part of Charity which we peculiarly call Clemency, a Vertu which not only Christianity but Morality recommends. The Ancient Romans had it in such veneration, that they number'd it not only among Virtues but Deities, and built it a Temple: and they were somewhat towards the right in it, for it was, though not God, yet so eminent an attribute of his, that nothing can more assimilate man unto him.

16. There are many Heroic acts of this kind to be met with among the virtuous Hethens. Lycurgus not only forgave Alcander who had struck out his eye, but entertained him in his house, and by his gentle admonitions reclaim'd him from his former vicious life. Aristides being after signal services and without crime, unjustly banished by his Citizens, was so far from acting or imprecating against them, that at his departure from Athens he solemnly prayed the God's, that they might never by any trouble or distress be forced to recall him. So Phocion being unjustly condemned, left it as a solemn charge to his son Phocas, that he should never revenge his death. A multitude of the like examples might be produced, but we need not borrow light from their faint Tapers, when we have the Sun beams, I mean the Sun of righteousness our blessed Savior, who as he has recommended this grace by his precept, so he has signally exemplified it to us in his practice; the whole design of his descent to earth being only to rescue his enemies from destruction, and as every part of his life, so the last Scene of it was particularly adapted to this end, and his expiring breath expended in mediating for his crucifiers; father forgive them, Luk. 23. 34. And this copy of his was transcribed by his first followers, the Primitive Christians in their severest Martyrdoms praying for their persecutors.

17. Thus are we in the Apostles phrase compassed about with a cloud of witnesses, Heb. 12. 1. of eminent examples, which ought to have a forcible influence upon all, but methinks should not fail to have it on that Sex, whose native tenderness predisposes them to the Vertu, and who need but swim with the stream of their own inclinations. How can we think that their melting eyes should ever sparkle fire, or delight in spectacles of cruelty, that their flexible tender hearts should turn into Steel or Adamant, be incapable of all impressions of pity? Yet God knows such changes have too often been seen: women have not only put off that softness peculiar to them, but the common instincts of humanity, and have exceeded not only savage men, but beasts in cruelty. There have been too frequent instances of the implacable malice, and insatiable cruelties of women: I need not call in the aid of Poetique fiction and tell them of Clytemnestra, Medea, or the Belides, with hundreds of others, celebrated as instances of Heroic wickedness. There are examples enough in more authentic Stories, The Roman Tullia, the Persian Parysatis; and that we may not pass by the sacred Annals, Jezebel, and Athalia. I forbear to multiply examples of this kind, of which all ages have produced some so eminent, as have rendered it a common observation, that no cruelty exceeds that of an exasperated woman: & it is not much to be wonder'd at, since nothing can be so ill in its pristine state as that which degenerates from a better. No enmity we know so bitter, as that of alienated friends; no such persecution as that of Apostates, and proportionably no such ferity as that of a perverted mildness. So that the Poets were not much out, who as they represented the Graces under the figures of women, so the Furies too: and since 'tis in their election which part they will act, they ought to be very jealous over themselves. The declinations to any vice are gradual, sometimes at first scarce discernible; and probably the greatest monsters of cruelty, would at the beginning have detested those inhumanities which afterwards they acted with greediness.

18. It concerns them therefore to ward those beginnings whose end may be so fatal. She that is quick in apprehending an affront perhaps will not be so quick in dismissing that apprehension; & if it be permitted to stay, 'twill quickly improve, twenty little circumstances shall besuborn'd to foment it with new suspicions, till at last it grow to a quarrel; from thence to hatred, from that to malice, and from that to revenge: and when that black passion has overspread the mind, like an Egyptian darkness it admits no gleam of reason or Religion, but hurries them blindfold to their own ruin often as well as others.

19. Let none think this only a fancy or scheme of Discourse: there have been too many tragical experiments of its truth: how many men have been mortally engaged upon no weightier original, than the spleen of a woman? the frantic notion of honor among our Duellists fitly corresponding with the as frantic impulses of feminine revenge, and any imaginary injury (or perhaps but just imputation) to the Lady, obliging her Gallant to rush upon the most real sin and danger. A madness something beyond that which the Romances describe of Knight Errantry; for that generally is for the relief of distressed Damsels, but this is only to humor the too prosperous ones, the insolent and the proud. Those therefore that have observed the common occasions of Duels, have not unfitly divided them between Wine and Women; it being hard to say which is the most intoxicating and besotting. The Son of Sirach couples them together, Ecclus. 19. 2. Wine and Women will make men of understanding fall away. The many modern examples of this mischief, as it should strike an extreme terror into those Women who have been any way accessory to the death, or but danger of any man; so it is just matter of caution to all, so to regulate their Passions, that they never come within distance of implacability; for if once they arrive there, themselves can give no stop.

20. In order to this, 'twill be well to consider at the first incitation, what the real ground is; perhaps sometimes they are angry (as the Galatians were at St. Paul, Gal. 4. 16.) at those that tell them the Truth; some scandalous, or at least suspicious behavior, may have engaged a friend to admonish them; (an office that has sometimes proved very fatal; those commonly that have most guilt having less patience to hear of it.) And if this be the cause, 'tis the greatest injustice in the world to make that a quarrel which is really an obligation: and therefore instead of maligning thei... Monitor, they ought to thank and reverence him. Nay, though the accusation be not with that candi... design, but be meant as a reproach; yet if it b... true, it should not excite anger at their accusers▪ but remorse, and reformation in themselves.

21. It was the saying of a Wiseman, that h... profited more by his enemies than his friends because they would tell him more roundly of hi... faults: and this is excellently improved by Plutarch, in his Tract, Of the benefits to be reap'... from Enemies: so that even a malicious accusation may be a kindness, and consequently oug... not to be repaid with an injury. But suppo... in the last place, that the aspersion be not onl... unkind, but untru, it will not even then be safe t... let loose to their indignation: first, in respect... Prudence, an angry vindication serving the d... sign of the enemy, and helping to spread the c... lummy; whereas a wise neglect and dissembli... does often stifle and suppress it. Secondly, respect of duty, for all that own themselves Ch... stians, must confess they are under an obligati... to forgive, and not to revenge. Now if they i... tend to pay a real obedience to this Precept, 'tw... be the more easy, the sooner they set to it. He th... sees his house on fire, will not dally with the flam... much less blow, or extend it, resolving to quen... it at last. And anger is as little to be trust... which if once thoroughly kindled, will scarce expire but with the destruction of the subject it works on.

22. Let therefore the disoblig'd not look back upon the injury, but forward to those mischiefs which too sharp a resentment may betray them to: let them consider, that the boiling of their blood may finally cause the effusion of another's, and wrath may swell into murder. If they would do thus, and instead of those magnifying optics wherein they view the wrong, make use of the other end of the perspective, to discern the dismal event at distance; it would sure fright them from any nearer approach, would keep them within those bounds which their duty prescribes them; and thereby acquaint them with a much greater, and more ingenious pleasure than their highest revenge can give•... them; I mean that of forgiving injuries, and obliging the injurious. This is a pleasure so pure and refined, so noble and heroic, that none but rational natures are capable of it; whereas that of spite and revenge (if it can be called a pleasure) is a mere bestial one; every the most contemptible animal can be angry when 'tis molested, and endeavor to return the mischief.

23. It should therefore, methinks, be an easy determination, whether to embrace that clemency and compassion which we see exemplified in the wisest and best of men, nay in the Omniscient, Immortal God, or that savage fierceness of the ignoblest creatures. This is certain, that no woman would be content to assume the outward form of any of those; why then should they subject their nobler part, the mind, to such a transformation? For, as there are no monsters so deformed, as those which are compounded of man and beast: so among them all, nothing can be more unnatural, more odious, than a woman-Tiger. I conclude all with the advice of Solomon, Prov. 17. 14. The beginning of strife is as when one letteth out water: therefore leave off contention before it be meddled with. When once a breach is made upon the spirit by immoderate anger, all the consequent mischiefs will flow in, like a rapid stream when the banks are broken down; nor is there any way to prevent it, but by keeping the bounds entire, preserving that tenderness and compassion which God and Nature do equally enforce and recommend.

SECT. IV. Of Affability.

1. IN the next place we may reckon Affability and Courtesie, which as it is amiable in all, so it is singularly so in women of Quality, and more universally necessary in them than in the other Sex; for men have often charges and employments which do justify, nay perhaps require somewhat of sternness and austerity; but women ordinarily have few or no occasions of it, and those who have well digested the former Lectures of Meekness and Compassion; will not be apt to put it on unnecessarily. Now Affability may be•... considered either as a mere human Accomplishment, or as a divine Vertu; in either notion 'tis commendable; but 'tis the latter that gives it the highest Excellence and Perfection.

2. To begin with the first notion of it, we may take an estimate of its worth by its Cause, and by its Effects. For its Cause, it derives itself either from a native candor, and generosity of mind; or from a noble and ingenious Education, or something jointly from both; and these are as good originals as anything merely moral can flow from. And that these are indeed its sources; common• experience will attest: those of the greatest Minds, & best Extractions, being usually most condescending and obliging; whereas those of most abject Spirits and Birth, are the most insulting and imperious. Alexander the Great, though terrible in the field, yet was of a gentle, complaisant conversation, familiarly treating those about him: yet Crispinus, Narcissus, Nymphidius, and other enfranchised bondmen, we find insolently trampling upon the Roman Senators and Consuls. 'Tis therefore a great error for Persons of Honor, to think they acquire a reverence by putting on a supercilious gravity, looking coily and disdainfully upon all about them; 'tis so far from that, that it gives a suspicion that 'tis but a pageantry of greatness, some mushroom newly sprung up, that stands so stiff, and swells so much. But instead of teaching others to keep their distance, this fastidious d...in invites them to a closer inspection, that if there be any flaw either in their life or birth, 'twill be sure to be discovered, there being no such prying inquisitor as curiosity, when 'tis egg'd on by a sense of contempt.

3. On the other side, if we consider the effects of Courtesie, they are quite contrary; it endears to all, and often keeps up a Reputation in spite of many blemishes: a kind look or word from a Superior, is strangely charming, and insensibly steals away men's hearts from them. This the Wise man refers to Ecclus. 18. 16. when he prefers a Word before a Gift. And 'tis Plutarch's observation of Cleomenes King of Sparta, that when the Grecians compared his Affability and easiness of Access with the sullen state and pride of other Princes, they were so enamored with it, that they judged him only worthy to be a King. And as there is no certainer, so also no cheaper way of gaining love: a friendly salutation is as easy as a frown or reproach; and that kindness may be preserved by them, which if once forfeited, will not at a far greater price be recovered.

4. Besides, when human vicissitudes are considered, it may be a point of Providence too; the greatest Persons may sometimes want assistance from the meanest; nay sometimes the face of affairs is quite changed, and the wheel of Fortune turns them lowest that were uppermost, and proportionably elevates the meanest. 'Tis wisdom therefore so to treat all, as to leave no impressions of unkindness, since none is so despicable, but may possibly at one time or other have an opportunity to retaliate. 'Twas therefore a prudent as well as an equitable resolution of the Emperor, who said he would so entertain the addresses of his Subjects; as, if he were a Subject, he would wish the Prince should entertain him. A rule very worthy to sway all Persons of Honor in their intercourse with others. And since even among Persons in Command there are degrees, and she which is superior to one, is inferior to another; they have a ready way to compare the civility they pay, with that they expect. Let therefore one who meets with a cold, neglectful Treatment from any above her, examine her own resentments, and then reflect, that if she give the like to those below her, they will doubtless have the same sense; and therefore let her resolve never to offer what she so much dislikes to bear: and she that does thus, that makes such inferences, will convert an injury into a benefit; civilize herself by the rudeness of others, and make that ill nurture her own discipline.

5. But hitherto we consider Affability only in its ethnic dress, as it is a human ornament; 'twill appear yet more enamoring upon a second view, when we look on it as bearing the impress of the Sanctuary, as a divine Vertu. And that it is capable of being so, we have the authority of St. Paul, who inserts it in the number of those Christian Graces which he recommends to his Roman Proselytes; condescend to them of low estate, Rom. 12. 16. and that we may the better discern its valu, 'tis observable that he links it with the most eminent Vertu of Humility; for it immediately follows his Precept of be not high minded. Indeed 'tis not only joined with it as a Friend or Allie, but derived from it as its stock and Principle: and certainly a more divine extraction it cannot have, Humility being the Alpha and Omega of Virtues, that which lays the foundation, (without which the most towering Structure will but crush itself with its own weight) and that which perfects and consummates the building also, secures and crowns all other Graces; which when they are most verdant•... and flourishing, are like Jonas his gourd, that may afford some shadow and refreshment for a while, but are apt to breed that worm which will destroy them. When once they are smitten with Pride, they instantly fade and wither; so necessary is humility both for the acquiring and conserving, all that is good in us.

6. We may therefore conclude; that courtesy and obligingness of behavior which proceeds thence, is in respect of its spring and original, infinitely to be prefer'd before that which descends from no higher stock than natural or prudential motives; and since 'tis natural for every production to have some similitude to that which produces it, we shall find it no less excellent in respect of its properties than its descent, I shall instance only in two, Sincerity and Constancy.

7. For the first as far as Affability partakes of Humility it must of Sincerity also, that being a vertu whose very elements are plainness and simplicity: for as it has no designs which want a cover, so it needs none of those subtleties and simulations, those pretences and artifices requisite to those that do. 'Tis the precept of the Apostle, Phil. 2. 3. In lowliness of mind let each esteem others better than himself, where we see 'tis the nature of a lowly mind to transfer that esteem to others which he substracts from himself: how where such an esteem is planted into the heart, it verifies all the expressions and outward significations of respect, and renders the greatest condescensions (which to an insolent humor may seem extravagant and affected) real and unfeigned.

8. On the contrary that courtesy which derives no higher than from mere human principles, is not much to be confided in. 'Tis the Psalmists affirmation that all men are liars. And therefore there is more than a possibility of deceit in their fairest shows. Somtimes we know smooth & plausible addresses have been designed as the stale to vile and treacherous practices. The extraordinary blandishments and endearing behavior of Absalom to the people, was only to steal their hearts, and advance his intended rebellion, 2 Sam. 15. and David tells us of some, whose words were softer than butter, having war in the heart, whose words were smoother than oil, and yet were very swords, Psal. 55. 21. and God knows this age has not so much improved in sincerity, that we should think the same Scenes are not daily acted over among us.

9. But besides all the blacker projects of this kind, which nothingbut the event can detect, there is a lower sort of this treachery, which is visible, nay so avowed, that it is one of the most common subjects of mirth and entertainment, I mean that of scoffing and derision, a thing too frequent among all, but I fear I may say very peculiarly so among Ladies, those at least of the modish sort, their very civilities and caresses, being often designed to gain matter of scorn and laughter. Mutual visits we know are an expression of respect, and should flow from a real kindness, but if those now in use be sifted, how few will be found of that make? They are at the best formal, a tribute rather paid to custom than friendship, and many go to see those, for whom they are perfectly indifferent whether they find them alive or dead, well or sick. Nay very often they are worse than thus, designed only to make observations, to bolt out something ridiculous wherewith to sport themselves as soon as they are gone; and least the inquest should return with a non inventus, they will accept of the slightest discoveries, the least misplacing of a word, nay of a hair shall be theme enough for a Comedy.

10. But if a poor Country Gentlewoman fall within their circuit, what a stock of mirth does she afford them, how curiously do they anatomise every part of her dress, her meen, her dialect, nay perhaps to improve the Scene, will recommend yet greater absurdities to her, under the notion of the mode, that so she may be the more ample subject of their scorn. Such visits as these are but insidious intrusions, the insinuations of a spy rather than the good office of a neighbor; and when 'tis remembered how great a portion of some women's time is spent in this kind of diversion, we must conclude there have a multitude of acts gone to make up the habit. I wish they would seriously reflect on it, and unravel that injurious mirth by a penitential sadness, and either spend their time better than in visiting, or else direct their visits to better purposes: and this they would certainly do if they would exchange their mere popular civilities (that kind of paint and varnishing manners) for that true Christian condescension; which admits of no deceit, but is as transparent as Drusus wished his house should be, that has no secret screws and springs, to move the eyes or tongue a contrary way from the heart, but is in reality all that it pretends to be.

11. A second property of it is Constancy, for as it is true to others, so it is to its self; 'tis foundid on the solidest of virtues, and is not subject to those light and giddy uncertainties, that the vulgar civilities are. For he that out of a disesteem of his proper worth, has placed himself in a state of inferiority, will think it not an arbitrary matter, but a just debt to pay a respect to those he thinks his betters; and an humble mind will in everybody find something or other to prefer to himself. So that he acts upon a fixed principle, and is not in danger of those contradictions in his manners, which shall render him one day sweet and affable, and another sour and morose. But such mutations are frequently incident to those who are swayed by other motives, sometimes an interest changes, and then the most fawning Sycophant can transplant his flatteries, and court a new Patron; yea many times to the despite and vilifying of the old.

12. Sometimes again, fortune may change; a man may fall from a prosperous to an adverse state, and then those who were prodigal of their civilities whilst he needed nothing else, will withdraw even those from him, least they should encourage him to demand something more; an experiment of this Job made in his friends (or rather flatterers) whom he fitly compares to winter brooks, running over when not needed, but quite dry when they are.

13. But the most frequent change is that of fancy and humor, which has a much more general sway than reason and judgment. This is so observable in the vulgar rabble, that often in an instant they will shift passions, and hate this hour what they doted on the last. Of this all popular states, have afforded many costly experiments, but we need not go farther than the sacred Story, where we find the Acclamations and Hosannahs of the multitude, quickly converted into crucify him, crucify him. This levity of mind has been observed so incident to women, that 'tis become almost proverbial; for by how much their passions are more violent, they are commonly the less lasting, and as they are reckoned among those colder bodies that are particularly influenced by the Moon, so they seem to bear a great resemblance to her in her vicissitudes and changes; yet still with a greater degree of uncertainty, for she in all her revolutions observes some constant periods, and we can tell in her wain when she will be at full, so that she has a kind of certainty even in her planetary errors; but what Ephemerides can be framed for some women's humors? who can tell how long the present will last? and what will be the next that will succeed?

14. I need not bring instances of their inconstancy from that common place of passionate widows, who have let a new love sail even through those floods of tears wherewith they bewailed the old: for (besides that that is a case wherein possibly they may find matter enough for retortion) it is here a little wide from my purpose, which designs no farther inquisition than into their ordinary conversation, wherein that love o•... variety which is so remarkable in their habit, their diet, their diversions, extends itself often to their company, their friendships also and converse. Those intimacies which they cherished lately, quickly grow despicable, and at last nauseous, and consequently their behavior falls from kind and civil, to cold and disdainful. I doubt not this has often been proved by many of those humble companions, which officiously attend them, who cannot always fix themselves, no not by those flatteries that first introduced them; some new comer perhaps has better refined the Art, and do's the same thing more acutely and ingeniously, and then the old one is to be turned off as too gross a Sycophant; or if they have been so happy as to light upon some of a more generous temper, who instead of a servile compliance with their humor, and high characters of their worth, entertain them with the true images of themselves, and endeavor to make what others only speak them, this is that unpardonable crime which forfeits all degrees of favor, and does not only avert, but incense. A faithful Monitor is as unacceptable as a true Looking-glass to a deformed person, which at the best will be set aside, and escapes well if not broken; and while great persons dispence their favors or their frowns by such perverse measures as these, they will be sure to do it unjustly, as well as unconstantly.

15. I am far from making this an universal charge, I know there are women of the highest quality, that guide themselves by other rules, that are deaf to all the songs of Sirens, and have the prudence to value a seasonable reproof before the most extravagant Panegyric; but this is owing to that humility which I am now recommending, without which 'tis as impossible for greatness to be proof against flattery, as it is for a Pinnacle with spreading sails, and a violent gust of wind, to sail steddily without ballast. And the frequent want of this is it which makes it no less frequent •...o see those unevennesses and inequalities in be...avior; those partialities in dispensing even the •...ommonest civilities, which I have now repre...ented.

16. And sure 'tis none of the meanest attri...utes due to that excellent vertu of humility that •...t can thus fix and poise the mind, cure those ver...igoes and giddy humors, incident to those who •...re mounted aloft: and above all that it is a sure Antidote against the most insinuating poison of flattery, a holy spel or amulet against the venom of a Parasite, which the Philosopher justly calls the worst of tame beasts, as a Detractor is of wild: He being indeed a kind of vulture, in the way of seizure, noless than ravine, who firstpicksout the eyes of that which he designs to prey upon; suffering not the person concerned, to see anything of that destruction which he is to feel. And certainly none of the ominous Birds, no night-Raven or screech-Owl can abode half so dismally as these domestic Birds of prey, which are not only presages, but instruments of ruin wheresoever they haunt.

17. 'Tis therefore the universal concern o... those that are great and prosperous, to chase them away, as Abraham did the Fowls from his Sacri ⟨◇⟩ , Gen. 15. 11. but yet more peculiarly so o... those to whom fortune hasgiven a sudden rise, and unexpected grandeur, they being of all others th... most obnoxious to this sort of Harpies. The surprizes of prosperity do no less disturb the judgment then those of adversity: and as one who i... in an instant snatched up to some high Tower, is s... amazed to see himself there, that he has no ju... measure of the altitude, but thinks every thin... farther below him then it is: so they that ascen... to greatness by swift and rapid motions, hav... their heads so turned that they are apt to overvalu it; and to look with contempt on those wh... before perhaps they thought worth their envy... And on a mind thus prepared, flattery may mak... any impressions, it suborning even Providence as a witness on its side, and inferring from the Dignities obtained, the transcending merit of the obtainer. A piece of Sophistry which the slightest observer may easily confute, all Ages giving instances of those whose Vices have preferred them, and by a strange Chimistry have extracted Honor out of infamous acts. Yet to a mind possessed with its own admiration, this shall pass for a demonstration: so treacherous a thing is Pride, that it combines with all who design to cheat us: and indeed 'tis not only an accessory, but the principal; none being in danger by others flatteries, who are not first seduced by their own,

18. It will therefore be a point of Wisdom for all Persons of Honor to increase their caution with their fortune, and as they multiply their Retinues without, so especially to enforce their Guard within, that they become not slaves to their own Greatness, fix not themselves in such a posture of State, as to become immovable to all the offices of Humanity and Civility; nor think that their admission to Greatness is upon the same terms on which the Jews were wont to receive their Proselytes, that they must renounce all their former relations; but to remember that they differ no more from others then as a counter set in the place of thousands or hundreds, does from one set in the place of tens or units. A little transposition may quite alter the case; or however, when they are all taken off the score, they are then indiscriminaty tumbled together, and one has no precedence of another, either in place or valu. So undiscernible will be the difference between the greatest Queen, and the meanest

Servant, when Death, that great Leveller, shall have mixed them; there will be no inquisition in the Grave who came embalmed, or perfumed thither. And, as a Learned man says, the Ulcers of Lazarus will make as good dust as the Paint of Jezebel.

19. But I shall be thought to have out-run my Subject, or instead of that amiable Image of Affability, and universal Obligingness, the great Ornament of Life, introduce the grim figure of Death, that sullen Executioner, whom no Gifts, no Prayers can mollify. Yet I cannot yield it wholly impertinent; for, as its final stroke cures all the infirmities of the body, so the foresight and contemplation of it is, as much a Catholicon for all the maladies of the mind; especially that of insolence and disdain. For sure they cannot much pride themselves in any exaltation, that remember they must finally fall into the dust: nor arrogantly despise others, who consider that themselves shall one day be insulted over by worms and insects. Such mental descents into the vault or charnel-house, are the best disciplines for the demeanor in other places, according to the admonition of the Wise man, Remember thy end, and thou shalt never do amiss.

SECT. V. Of Piety.

1. LASTLY, To complete and crown all other Excellencies, nothing is so proper, so necessary as Piety and Devotion. This is the salt which seasons all Sacrifices; yea, the Altar which sanctifies the Gift, no good (how splendid soever in the sight of men) being acceptable to God, till it be thus consecrated, and have the seal of the Sanctuary upon it. This is a Vertu truly Divine, as well in its original as its end; for as it comes from Heaven, (is an afflation of the blessed Spirit) so it tends thither also, and thither raises its Votaries. This is it which sublimates and spiritualizes Humanity, defecates and refines it from all the dregs of morality; and so wings our earthly lumpish nature, that we can soar aloft to the region of Spirits, and by its raptures make some essay of that state of separation, even while we are linked to the body. This is it which combines us so with God, that we have the same interests, the same choices; nay it does in a sort communicate and enterchange properties with him; the all-Powerful God seems impotent and unable to resist its influence, whilst it invests us feeble wretches in a kind of Omnipotence, by engaging him for us who can do all things.

2. Now this Piety may be considered either in a larger, or more limited sense: in the former 'tis as wide as the whole scheme of Duty, not confined to any one act, but extended to all the commands of God. For as the animal Spirit diffuses its self into all the most distant members of the body; so this more vital Principle has as universal an influence on the mind, stamps that with such an admiration and reverence of God, such a love and complacency in him, that every act is (at least habitually) designed to obey and glorify him.

3. In the more limited sense, Piety is taken for our more immediate intercourse with God, in things purely divine, as Adorations, Prayers, Aspirations, and all pantings and breathings of the soul after him; and in this notion 'tis more particularly called Devotion. And this is comprehended it: the other, as a part in the whole; nay indeed, as an effect in its cause; for where Piety has not first formed and modelled the soul, there can be no true Devotion.

External forms of it there may be, but that is but ceremony and pageantry, the most submissive prostrations are there but like that of Dagon before the Ark, the fall of a lifeless trunk; the most elevated eyes but a kind of convulsive motion; and the most rigid mortifications, but like the cuttings and launcings of Baal's Priests. Of this the very Heathen had some notion, and therefore in their worships had many preparatory ceremonies of lustration, and purifying, as being conscious of the incongruity, that unholy Persons should be admitted to Sacred things. And accordingly Socrates has excellently (I had almost said Evangelically) defined, the best way of worshipping God, to be the doing what he commands. Indeed without this, our Devotion is mere stratagem and design: we invoke God as we use to cajole men, only to serve a present turn; and of such disingenious addresses, 'tis easy to read the event; or, if we cannot, Solomon will instruct us, Prov. 15. 8. The Prayers of the wicked are an abomination to the Lord.

4. To treat of the several branches of Piety in the first notion, is not agreeable to the intended brevity of this Treatise; nor necessary, because there are so many distinct Tracts extant on that Subject; yet I shall the more closely to adapt it to my female Readers, observe the propriety of it to women, not only as it is their greatest ornament and advantage, but especially as they have somewhat more of predisposition towards it in their native temper. God's Laws, which are the rule of Piety, have this common with men's, that they are enforced upon us by the proposal both of punishments and rewards, by that means engaging two of our most sensible passions, Fear and Love; and the female Sex being eminent for the pungency of both these, they are consequently the better prepared for the impressions of Religion.

5. This is so much acknowledged, that our masculine Atheists make an ill use of it, and are willing to think that Religion owes its force only to the impotence of the subject on which it works, that 'tis only an imposition upon the easy credulity of women, and are content to allow them the inclosure of it; wherein, though they sufficiently show their contempt of Piety, yet they unawares give a greater honor to that Sex than they intend, whilst they confess it more capable of an assimilation to the supreme Goodness, and of the renewal of God's Image (for to that all Piety is designed) than their own. And therefore women have so little reason to be ashamed, that they ought to glory in the concession, and gratefully to celebrate the goodness of God to them, who, as he brings light out of darkness, so converts their natural infirmities into a means of spiritual strength, makes the impotencies and defects of their nature subservient to the operation of Grace; and by consecrating their very Passions, makes even those Gibeonites serviceable to the Tabernacle. But then 'tis to be remembered, that the greater is their obligation to comply with this design of God's, to let their passions run in the channel he has cut for them; so to confine their Fear and Love to spiritual Objects, that they make no inordinate eruptions to anything else, but in all their estimations of things dreadful or desirable, to give still the just deference to that which is eternal.

6. And, as Women in General have this advantage towards Piety, and obligation to it; so particularly those of Quality, who we may suppose to have generally a more early institution and instruction in it then those of a meaner rank: and besides, have afterwards more opportunities of being built up in the knowledge of their duty, and (by the help of an ingenious education) clearer apprehensions to discern it; and when they do so, have greater obligations to perform it, both in respect of God, of others, and themselves.

7. In respect of God they have the greatest tie of gratitude, not only for the common mercies which they partake with the rest of mankind, but for those peculiar, by which they are differenced from others; of which, if they want a just value, let them ask themselves how willing they would be to part with them, how she that has fed delicately, would like to be desolate in the street, or she that has been brought up in Scarlet, to embrace the Dunghil, Lam. 4. 5. and according to the aversion they find to such a change, let them estimate their present enjoyment, and the thankfulness it exacts.

8. Secondly, in regard of others, their Piety backed with their secular advantages, may be of a more extensive benefit; they have many opportunities of doing good by their influence on others; or if no way else, yet the splendor of their example, will by the eminency of their conditions shine (as a light on some high Tower) more perspicuously, and guide many into the same path of Vertu. And certainly 'tis no small obligation that lies on them in this respect; for God, who does nothing without an end worthy of his wisdom, can never be thought to have selected some persons as the objects of his bounty, merely that they may swill and glut themselves with sensual pleasures. No doubtless, he who is the great Master of the universe, disposes all things for common benefit; and therefore, if He have placed some in an higher Orb than others, it is that they may have an auspicious influence on those below them; and if they fail in this, they are no longer Stars but Comets, things of ominous and unlucky abode to all about them. I might enlarge on this Subject, but having don it already in the Gentleman's Calling, I suppose it unnecessary, since that part is equally adapted to both Sexes.

9. In the last place, they have all obligation to Piety, in respect of themselves, and that in two considerations; the first, of their present danger; the second, of their final account. For their danger, 'tis evident they do not more outnumber their inferiors in anything then in the opportunities, nay solicitations to sin. Wealth... and Honor have many snares, and which is worse, do often dispose the mind to such an heedless security, that it takes no care to avoid them: and as in the body, the diseases of repletion are far... more numerous than those of emptiness, so the... mind is oftener vitiated by affluence and prosperity, then by indigence and adversity. It becomes therefore those who are so surrounded with enemies to fortify themselves: and that they can no way do, but by a sincere Piety, that whole Armor of God which the Apostle describes, Eph. 6. 13. by which alone they may repel all the darts of temptations; nay not only ward the blow, but wrest the weapon out of Satan's hand, so that when he urges to them the opportunities, the impunity which their wealth and greatness gives them to be bad, they may retort his Argument, & by a wholsomer inference collect thence their great obligation to be good, and that not only upon the score of gratitude (though that were enough to an ingenious soul) but in the second place of interest also, in respect of that account they must finally give. For though God be not an unjust exactor to reap where he has not sowed, yet he is not so negligently profuse, as to do that which no prudent man will do, scatter his goods promiscuously, without taking notice where they fall; but as he dispences all things by particular providence, so he does it to a particular end, and will exact as particular an account how that end has been complied with.

10. It is a smart exprobration of God's to Israel, Ezek, 16, 17, 18, 19. that she had sacrilegiously employed his silver and gold, his oil, his flower and honey which he had given her in the service of her Idols, by which as we may see he takes notice how we dispose of our temporal possessions, so it shows us how the enditement will proceed against all those who so pervert their use: with what confusion must they appear at the great Audit who can give no other account of their receipts, but that they consumed them upon their lusts, waged war against God with his own treasure, and been as well thieves as rebels? What a Luciferian fall will they have from their honors, who have endeavored to undermine God's? thought themselves too great to pay him homage, and by their profane and vicious example, induced a contempt of him? In short what a retaliation of inversions will there then be? those that have turned God's grace into wantonness, converted his bounty into the fuel of their pride and luxury, shall then have their glory turn'd into sham, their riots and excesses into the want of a drop of water, and shall retain nothing of their greatness, but the guilt, the grating remembrance of having abused those temporal blessings, which if well managed might have received them into everlasting habitations. How necessary then is it for all who have received so much upon account, to be often reflecting on it, examining what charges, the great owner has imposed upon so ample an income? what God requires of them for whom he hath don so much? And this is particularly the business of Piety, which in all the forementioned respects, is as the usefulest, so the noblest accomplishment of greatness

11. And such it hath been accounted till this profane Age of ours, which has removed all the boundaries of the former, reversed even the instincts of nature, and will not leave us so much of Religion as had the very worst of Heathens. For how erroneous soever they were in the choice of their Deities, they always honored and reverenc'd those they chose, committed most of their enormities in obedience not in affront to them: did not assign the votaries as Jeroboam did his Priests of the meanest of the people, but thought themselves dignified by their service, but esteemed it an infamy not to be pious. But alas now we adiaies make other estimates, Religion is so abject so contemptible a thing, as is thought fit to influence none that are great either in parts or quality: and therefore though too many are willing to appropriate it to women, upon the first account, as the Gospel is the foolishness of preaching, 1 Cor. 1. 21. yet they make exceptions upon the latter, and are not willing to afford it any of the nobler Proselits even of that Sex.

12. I doubt not there are many Lectures read to such, to fortify them against all impressions of piety, to raise out the common notion of a God, & in order to that to depose his Vicegerent within them, discard their conscience, that unmannerly inmate, which is still speaking what they have no mind to hear, and will be apt sometimes to question their grand principle, and tell them they have souls. And truly 'tis no wonder if the abettors of Athism take this course; for since they have no solid foundation of truth or reason, 'tis but necessary they support their Party by Authority; the countenance and applause of Great Persons, & God knows they have too much succeeded in the design. But, in the mean time, what security do they give for the truth of their pretensions? We know 'tis still required of those that will practice upon other people's concerns, that they put in caution to secure the owner from damage, But alas, what gage can they give for a soul? Who can contrive a form of Indemnity where that is the thing hazarded?

13. 'Tis easy indeed for one of these Apostles of Satan, to tell a Lady that she has nothing to do but to indulge to her pleasure; that 'tis the extremest folly to be frighted from a present enjoyment, by a fear of I know not what future smart; that God, and Sin, and Hell, are but names, certain Mormos and Bug-bears conjur'd up by Divines, to work upon her fear, and abuse her crudelity. This, and much more of this kind may be said, and I doubt often is; but all this while the question is beg'd, and a strong affirmation must pass for proof: for I defy all the Doctors of Atheism to make any demonstration of their Tenet; and yet, though they pretend to no Demonstration themselves, Religion must be condemned merely for the want of it: that is for not making spiritual things liable to sense, for distinguishing between belief and science; which is indeed for doing the most reasonable thing in the world, viz. the remitting every object to the trial of its proper faculty: and they who suspect it upon that account, may by the same kind of Logic wrangle us out of all our senses, may persuade us we hear nothing because the eye discerns not sounds, that we taste not, because the ear understands not gusts and •...apors, and so on to the rest.

14. And yet this is the bottom of those Arguments which the great pretenders to reason make against Religion, and in the mean time have so little ingenuity as to exclaim on the light credulity of fools and women, that embrace the dictates of faith, whilst the same instant they exact a more implicit assent to their negative Articles, their no Religion. A strange magisterial confidence so to impose on this Age, what is so universally contradictory to all former, and to the common verdict▪ of mankind. For 'tis observable through all the successions of men, that there were never any society, any collective body of Atheists; a s•...gle one perhaps might here and there be found (as we sometimes see monsters or misshapen births) but for the generality they had always such instincts of a D•...ety, that they never thought they ran far enough from Atheism; but rather choose to multiply their God's, to have too many then none at all: nay were apt to descend to the adoration of things below themselves, rather than to renounce the power above them. By which we may see that the notion of a God is the most indelible character of natural reason, and therefore whatever pretence our Atheists make to ratioci•...ation and deep discourse, it is none of that primitive fundamental reason coetaneous with our humanity; but is indeed a reason fit only for those who own themselves like the beasts that perish.

15. But admit we could be more bountiful to them, and allow their opinion an equal probability with our Faith, yet even this could never justify anybody in point of prudence, that should adhere to them. Common discretion teaches us that where two propositions have an equal appearance of truth, there is no rational inducement to prefer one before the other, till we have examined the consequences, and find something in the one which may over-poise and outweigh the contrary. Now in all things that concern practice, there are no motives so considerable, either to invite or avert, as advantage or danger.

16. Let us apply this to the present case, and examine the pretensions of the Atheist and the Christian in both respects. But first we are to remember, that both advantage and danger are to be viewed under a double notion, either as present or as future. The former is the Atheists most proper subject, and indeed all he can pertinently speak to, who professes himself only a man of this world. Here he will tell us that the disbelief of God and another life, is the great enfranchiser of mankind, sets us at liberty from that thralldom, those Bonds wherewith our superstitious fears had fettered us, that it supersedes all those nice and perplexing inquiries of lawful and unlawful, and reduces all our inquisitions only to this one, how we shall most please ourselves. The glutton need not put a knife to his throat, but is only to put an edge upon his Palate. The drunkard need not refrain his cups, but only take care that they be filled with the most delicious liquor. The warrior need not pull out his eye, but only content to possess what that tempts him to desire... and in a word none of our appetites need be restrained, but satisfied. And this uncontrolled licentiousness, this brutish liberty, is that summum bonum, that supreme happiness which they propose to themselves, and to which they invite others.

17. On the other side the Christian is not without his claim to a present advantage, though of a far differing nature: he is not so preposterous as to think it a preferment to sink below his kind; to aspire to an assimilation with mere animals, which is the utmost the former amounts to, but he proposes to himself the satisfaction of a man...; those delights which may entertain his reason not his sense; which consist in the rectitude of a well informed mind. His Religion is the perfectest Scheme of Morality, and makes him a Philosopher without the help of the Schools, it teaches him the art of subduing his appetites, calming his passions, and in a word makes him Lord of himself; and by that gives him all the pleasures which result from such a sovereignty, Nor is he totally void even of the pleasures of sense, which in many instances are greater to him than to those that most court them. Temperance cooks his coarsest diet to a greater gust, than all their studied mixtures; chastity makes one lawful embrace more grateful to him, than all the nauseating variety of their unbounded lusts; and contentment swells a little into a talent, makes him richer than the Indies would do if he desired beyond them. Nor is it a lamentable benefit that his moderation gives him immunity from those sensitive pains which oft bring up the rear of inordinate sensual pleasures. So that his condition even set in the worst light in that very particular wherein the Atheist most triumphs over him, is not so deplorable as 'tis represented.

18. But if it were, he has pleasures that would infinitely overwhelm that smart, and that not only in his reason (as hath been said before) but in his more sublime diviner part, such irradiations from above, such antepasts of his future bliss, such acquiescence in a calm & serene conscience, as is every cheaply bought with all he can suffer here. I know the profane laugh at these things as Chimera's and the illusions of a prepossessed fancy (& truly if they were so, they might yet come in balance with many of their pleasures which are as much owing to opinion and imagination:) but if we consider what supports they have given under the heaviest pressures, how they enabled the primitive Martyrs, not only to suffer, but even to court all that is formidable to human nature, we cannot think that a mere phantastic imaginary joy could deceive the sense of such real, such acute torments. And though in this great declination of zeal, there be perhaps few that can pretend to those higher degrees of spiritual raptures, yet certainly were the votes of all devout persons collected, they would all concur in this testimony, that even in the common offices of Piety, the ordinary discharge of a good conscience, there is an infinitely greater complacency, a higher gust and relish than in all the pleasures of sense. But of this the most irrefragable witnesses are those who from great voluptuaries have turned devotees, and I dare appeal to their experience, whether of the two states is the most pleasant. I wish those who will not believe this on others words, would themselves make the trial, and till they do so they are notoriously unjust to pronounce that a fiction, of whose reality they refuse to make proof.

19. By what hath been said, some estimate may be made which bids fairest) the Atheist or Christian) as to present temporal felicity: but alas what an allay, what a damp is it to felicity to say 'tis themporal, yet we may give it a term below that, and say 'tis momentary. For since our life is so, nothing that depends on that can be otherwise, and yet in this shallow bottom the irreligious embark their all. For, as to all future advantage, 'tis their Principle to disclaim it, they discer*...no reward for blameless souls, Wisd. 2. 22. So that in this particular the Christian does not compare with, but triumph over them. He knows that if his earthly house of this Tabernacle be dissolved, he hath a building of God; an House not made with hands, eternal in the Heavens, 2 Cor. 5. 1. That when he parts with his life, he does not resign his happiness, but shall receive it infinitely improved both in degree and duration. And now certainly 'tis visible enough which opinion proposes the fairer hopes, and consequently which (supposing but an equal probability of truth) is the most inviting.

20. But some spirits there are so ignoble, that the most glorious Prize cannot animate them; that like a swine, the muscles of whose eyes, they say, permit him not to look upwards, is not concerned in all the felicities above, but would at a venture resign his share in those, so he may securely enjoy his husk and draff. But yet even these who are incapable of the more generous resentments, may be apt enough to the more servile; and danger may fright, though glory cannot allure them. It concerns such therefore to compare the mischiefs which each Opinion threatens to their opposites, and from thence make an estimate which is safest to be chosen. And here let the Atheist himself cast up the account of the dangers consequent to Christianity, and it can all amount but to this, the deprivation (or rather moderation) of some present sensual pleasures, or the incurring of some present sensitive pains; the former in the daily exercise of Temperance, and mortification; the latter, (more rarely and ostner in purpose then act) the suffering for Righteousness sake. And both these the Christian balances, nay out-weighs by two more important present hazards on the other side. To the former, he opposes the danger of being enslaved to the brutish part of a man's self, a thing so deplorable even in the judgment of humanity, that all Writers of Ethics have uniformly declared no servility to be so sordid and intolerable as that of the vicious man to his Passions and Lusts. To the latter, he confronts the mischief of being a slave to every man else; for such he certainly is, whom the fear of suffering can baff•...e outof anything he thinks just and honest. For if all the men in the World could successively have the power to afflict him, they wouldalso have to command and rule him; and what can be more abject, more below the dignity of human nature, then to have a spirit always prepared for such a servitude? Besides, even the utmost sufferings which Christianity can at any time require, is outvied daily by the effects of luxury and rage; and for one that has opportunity to be a Martyr for his God thousands become so to their Vices.

21. If from the present we look forward to futuredangers, the Atheist must here be perfectly silent; he cannot say that the Christian after this life shall be in any worse estate than himself, since he concludes they shall both be the same nothing. But the Christian threatens him with a more dismal state, he allows him indeed a being, yea an eternal one; but it is only such as qualifies him for a misery as eternal; the worm that never dies, the fire unquenchable, where all the excesses of his short pleasures shall be revenged with more excessive, endless torments: his senses which were here the only organs of his felicity, shall then be (though not the only) the very sensible mediums of his wretchedness; and that conscience which he here suspended from its office, shall then take our its arrears, and return all its stifled admonitions in perpetual horrors, and desperate upbraidings. I need not now sure ask on which side the greater danger lies.

22. To conclude, the result of all is, that the transitory pleasures of the Atheist are over-poised even by the present satisfactions of the Pious And the eternity of unbounded, unconceivable joies he expects hereafter, comes in ex abundantia, having nothing on the other side that offers at a competition with it. And at the very same rate of Proportion we have seen the dangers also are so, that we can easily compute the utmost mischief our Christianity can do us, if it should be false; but the damage of the other is inestimable, both for the penalty of loss, and sense. I may now appeal to common prudence to judge of the vast inequality, and to pronounce, that sure there had need be some great evidence of truth on the Atheists side, to preponderate all these disadvantages. Indeed, nothing much below a demonstration can justify the choice of so dangerous Principles; I am sure an equal probability can never do it, where the danger is so unequal; and were the veriest Atheist consulted in a secular case of the like circumstances, he would certainly pronounce him a mad man that should make such an election. How desperate a phrensy then is it to do it, without so much as that equal probability: nay indeed, without any probability at all? And yet this madness sets up for the monopoly not of Wit only, but Reason too; and by confidence and clamor, seeks to run down those Arguments it can never confute.

23. I may be thought here to have made too long a d•...gression from my proper Subject, but I cannot confess it so; for since my present business is to recommend Piety, I can no way do that so effectually as by showing its consonancy to right reason, especially considering the busy industry is now used to represent it under another form, and to alienate from it those persons whose Greatness may give it any luster or repute in the World; of which sort I suppose there are few more frequently attacked then Women of Quality, that converse among those who call themselves the wits of the Age; who living in so infectious an air, had need of some antidotes about them; and if what I have now offered, appear not forcible enough, (for it pretends not to the tith of what may be said on the Subject) yet it may at least do them this service, to put them in mind of what they need, and send them to the fuller dispensatories of others.

24. And that is the thing. I should earnestly beg of them, that they would be so just to their own interest, as not to combine with seducers against themselves; but if they have been so unhappy as to lend one ear to them, yet at least not to give up both to be forced in a slavish submission to their dictates, but hear what may be said on the other side. And sure 'tis but a low composition for God thus to divide with Satan, yet 'tis that of which his Emissaries are so jealous that 'tis one of their grand Maxims, that none who professes Divinity is to be advised with; and therefore by all Arts they are to be rendered either ridiculous, or suspected; to which methinks may be applied that Fable (which Demosthenes once recited to the Athenians, when Alexander demanded of them to deliver up their Orators) of the Wolves and the Sheep, who coming to a Treaty, the first Article of the Wolves was, that the sheep should give up their mastives which guarded them: the resemblance is too obvious to need a minute application.

25. But this is manifestly to reverse all former Rules, and to trust a man rather in any Faculty than his own, and would never have prevailed in anything but where the soul is concerned, that poor despicable thing whereon alone we think fit to make experiments. 'Tis sure, that if any should dispute their title to an earthly Possession, they would not so tamely resign it, nor would trust their own selves in its defense, but would consult their ablest Lawyers, and, by them, sift out every circumstance that might establish their claim. Why should they then suffer themselves to be talked out of an Heavenly Inheritance, without so much as once proposing their doubts to those whose study and profession it is to resolve them? But as in all other ills, so in this, prevention is better than cure; and therefore to those that are yet untainted, the securest course will be to stop both ears against all profane insinuations. and to use those who tempt them to be disloial to their God, that spiritual adultery, as they should do those who solicit them to the carnal, not so much as to enter parly, but with the greatest indignation detest and reject them. 'Tis the saying of the Wise man, Prov. 25. 23. that an angry countenance driveth away a back-biting tongue. And certainly, would great Persons look severely on such defamers of Religion, they would give some check to that impudence of profaneness which has given it such a vogue in the World.

26. And sure this is much their Duty to do, if they own any relation to that God who is so dishonored. They would think it a very disingenious thing to sit by to hear a Friend or Benefactor reviled, and express no displeasure; and is God so friendless among them, that only his traducers and blasphemers can be patiently heard? Among the Jews, at the hearing of any Blasphemy, they rent their clothes; but I fear we have some of our nice Dames that would be much more concerned at a rip in their garment, then at the rending and violating God's sacred Name; and could more patiently behold the total subversion of Religion, then the disorder or misplacing of a lock or riband. But 'tis to be hoped there are not many so impious, and those that are not, will surely think themselves obliged with all their power, to discountenance all the Fautors of irreligion, whether they be the solemn sedater sort that would argue, or the jollier that would rallery them out of their Faith.

27. But when they have thus provided against the assaults of others, and secured the speculative part of Religion, they have only established a Judicatory against themselves, stored up matter of Conviction and Accusation, if they answer it not in the practic. I must therefore after this long excursion, return to my first Point, and beseech them seriously to weigh the obligations they have to Piety in the general notion of it, as it comprehends all the duties of a Christian life, of which as I intend not to speak particularly; so I know not where to find a better summary, then that which S. James has drawn up, Chap. 1. verse. 27. Pure Religion and undefiled before God even the Father is this, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world.

28. But besides this general, there is (as I said before) another more restrained notion of Piety, as it relates to our more immediate intercourse with God in divine Ordinances and Worship, in which respect it commonly passes under the name of Devotion, and thus considered it has a great propriety to the female Sex. For Devotion is a tender Plant, that will scarce root in stiff or rocky ground, but requires a supple gentle soil, and therefore the feminine softness and pliability is very apt and proper for it. And accordingly there have been very eminent growths of it in that Sex. I need not he...p up examples of former Ages, but rather persuade this to leave some at least to the following; and the more considerable the persons are the more conspicuous will be the example, which seems themore toadapt it to those I now speak to. Devotion in a Cloister is as recluse as the Votary, a light rather under a ⟨◇⟩ then on a candlestick: and in an obscure Cottage 'tis either not observed, or else thought to be but the effect of destitution and secular wants a reserve rather than a choice: but when those who are in the ei... of the world, the most eminent Actors on the Theater of human life, shall choose the part of a Saint, when those who want none of the divertisments or blandishments of earth, shall have their conversation in Heaven, this recommends it to the Spectators, as the true and greatest object of human choice; since 'tis chosen by those who know the utmost pretence of all its competitors.

29. Nor is devotion only more excellent in them in regard of its effects, but 'tis also more necessary in respect of their obligation. Devotion is an abstraction from the world, and therefore cannot in any eminent degrees, be practiced by those whose necessities or business do much entangle them in it. So that from such, a far less proportion will be accepted, then from those whose plenty and ease give them no other want but that of employment. And certainly if there be any of whom that can truly be said; women of quality are the persons: for they in this respect exceed even men of the like rank, for the men are often engaged in public employments, and must l...nd most of their time to the use of others; or however all have the care of their own private affairs, the managery of their fortunes to employ them. But of women the utmost that is ordinarily required, is but a little easy inspection within their own walls, the oversight of a few children, and servants, and even from this how many are by their condition of life exemted? and how many more do by their niceness and delicacy exempt themselves? And surely so perfect a vacancy is neither happy nor safe. And therefore God who projects we should be both, never designed it for any of mankind: but where he gives so much liberty from secular, he expects a greater diligence in spiritual employments.

30. And indeed 'tis an amazing thing to see, that any into whom he has breathed the breath of life, on whom he has stamped the image of his own eternity, can think those immortal souls were given them only to serve the mean and abject uses of their corruptible bodies, (for which the soul of the dullest Animal would have don as well;) that eating and drinking, sleep and recreations, which are only useful to the supporting us in this world, are the only things for which we were sent hither. And yet if we may measure their opinions by their practice, this seems to be the persuasion of many of our female Gentry, who look upon it as a degrading, a kind of attainder of their blood, to do anything but please their senses. An error sure of the most pernicious consequence imaginable. We know a Lady of pleasure is in one sense a very scandalous Epithet, and truly 'tis no very laudable one in the other, nay which is worse, they are often coincident, and fall in with each other. She whose sole universal aim is pleasure, will not think herself much out of her road, in the pursuit of any particular. And she that thinks she lives for no other purpose, will so often be at a loss for innocent pleasure, that she is almost under a necessity to call in the nocent, to serve the very end (as she supposes) of her being. Aut indeed were they sure to confine themselves to such as are harmless in their kind, yet the excess of them renders them sinful, and the dotting pursuit denominates them lovers of Plesures more then lovers of God, a character so black that the Apostle completes his Catalogue of the worst vice; of the worst times with it, 1 Tim. 3. 4.

31. It is therefore the great goodness of God to design a rescu for those whose condition exposes them to that danger, and by exacting a liberal expense of time in their devotion, divert them from lavishing both it and their souls together. Neither does he by this defeat their aim of a pleasant life, but rather assist it: for whereas sensual delights are vagrant, and must be chased through a hundred turnings and wild Mazes, the spiritual are fixed, and one may always know where to find them. How often are the voluptuous in pain to know which pleasure to choose? like a surfeited stomach the greater variety is set before it, the more it nauseats all. What difficulties hath a Lady many times to resolve whether an afternoon shall be spen at the Court, or at the Theater; whether in dancing or at cards, in giving or receiving visi•...s, as not knowing which will best please her? But she that knows the delights of devotion, knows withal that there is no other fit to come in competition with it; and so is not distracted in her choice, nor need go farther then her Closet for the most agreeable entertainment. I know this will sound a little incredible to those that know no other use of Closets then as a conservatory of gauds and baubles; that aspire to no pleasure there above that of children, the playing with the Pictures and Popets that adorn it. Nor indeed do I pretend that such shall find those satisfactions I speak of. Those whose errand is to Beelzebub the God of flies, must not expect to be treated by the God of Israel. An ingenious man will scorn to obtrude himself on those who desire not his company, and sure God will not make himself more cheap. Those that will meet him in their Closets, must come with that design, resort thither as to an Oratory; nay more then so, they must come frequently. Spiritual joies know not the way to a place where they are not often invited: and as men seek for each other not in places where they seldom or never come, but where they daily frequent; so God contrives, not to meet us in that place where we appear rarely and accidentally, but where we usually resort.

32. I shall not need to branch out devotion into the several parts, that being don already in a multitude of other Treatises, of which if they please to consult any one, they cannot want a Directory for their worship, whether private or public. Only let me observe the order and connection of those two, that they are neither to be sever'd, nor yet to be ranged preposterously. The private must not justle out the public, for God expects his solemn homage: and their hudling it up in private, as it may give men Ground to suspect they pay none at all; so neither God nor man can collect anything better from it, then that they are ashamed of the Deity they pretend to serve. On the other side the public must as little swallow up the private, and where it does, there may be a just doubt of its sincerity, Many attractives there may be to Church besides that of Piety, and indeed where that is really the motive, it teaches so much reverence to that awful presence they are to approach, as not to come without some preparation. What solicitude, what critical niceness will a Lady have for her dress, when she is to appear at a solemn meeting at Court, and shall she take no care how sordidly, how undecently she appear when the King of Kings gives audience? Shall many hours, days, nay perhaps weeks, be taken up in contriving for the one, and shall there never be a minute allotted for the other? This were sure very unequal, and yet this is the case where the devotion of the Closet does not prepare for that of the Church. If the mind be not tuned first there, it will be very ill qualified for that harmony of souls, which is the only thing God regards in our public offices. So that were there no other use of private devotion, but as it relates to the public, that were enough to speak the necessity of it.

33, But indeed 'tis not only a needful preparative to that sacred commerce, but to our civil. The World is but a larger sort of Pesthouse, in every corner of it we meet with infectious airs, and those that converse in it had need of this Antidote. How many temptations does every place, every hour, every interview, present to the shocking even of that moral integrity which a sober Heathen would judge fit to preserve; much more of that strict Piety our Christianity exacts.

34. 'Twas the observation that Origen made of himself, that the day in which he so shamefully fell by sacrificing to Idols, he had ventured out in the morning before he had completed his usual prayers; the Devil finding him so unarmed took advantage to assault him, as knowing he had then but a single impotent man to wrestle with, who had forfeited, by not invoking, the protection of God. And indeed since prayer is the most powerful exorcism to eject him, we may well conclude the omission of it is a likely means to invite him: for if God have not the prepossession, if we do not by hearty prayer surrender our souls to him in the morning, they are then all the day after like that empty house mentioned in the Gospel, a fit receptacle for as many evil spirits as please to inhabit there. Nor are these spiritual the only dangers that attend us, we are liable to a multitude of secular ones also: our persons, our fortunes, our reputations, everything wherein we can receive a benefit, renders us equally capable of a prejudice. What multitudes of accidents are there to which we lie open, and nothing to guard us from them but the divine Providence? which if we neglect to solicit we are sure very unworthy of its defense. And this is a consideration that methinks should bring even the most sensual persons upon their knees: for though too many may be found that despise the former danger, and can contentedly enough expose their souls, yet such are usually the most tender of their temporal concerns it being commonly the excessive love of those which makes them neglect the other. She that fears not the fall into sin, will yet fear the tumbling into a precipice, and though she care not for the spotting of her innocence, would be very loath any accident should blemish her face, disparage her fame, or impoverish her fortune, and yet from any or all of these she is utterly unable to guard herself. So that if Piety will not, yet interest me thinks should render her an homager to that omnipotent power, from whence alone she can derive her safety.

35. And now methinks a Duty that is thus bound on with the cords of a man, with human as well as divine perswasives, should not easily be shaken off. I wish I could say it never is, but I fear there are some of those I now speak to, who neglect it in spite of all these inducements; who though they can pretend nothing serious enough to own the name of business, do yet suffer a succession of I know not what impertinencies to divert them. And indeed were the expense of some Ladies days calculated, we should find every hour so full of emptiness, so overladen with vanities that 'tis scarce imaginable where an office of devotion should crowd in.

36. The morning is divided between sleep and dressing, nor would the morning suffice, but that they are fain to make a new computation to measure it not by the Sun, but by their time of dining, which is often as late as the stationary hours of the Primitive Fasts, though upon a far differing motive. The afternoons being by this means reduced, are too short for those many divertisements that await them, and must therefore borrow as much of the night as they lent to the morning. And when the mere fatigues of pleasure send a Lady to her rest, 'tis not imaginable that she will permit Devotion to induce a yet greater, and more disagreeable lassitude; so that the whole round of her time seems to be a kind of magic circle, wherein nothing that is holy must appear. And indeed 'tis none of the highest stratagems of Satan thus to forestal their time; and by a perpetual supply of diversions, insensibly steal from them the opportunities of divine offices; an artifice by which I presume he prevails on some, who would startle at his grosser and more apparent temptations.

37. Nor needs he more then the success of this project; for if this habitual neglect of Piety should not finally end in great and criminal commissions, (as 'tis naturally very apt to do) yet his interest is sufficiently secured by such a customary omission, which amounts to no less then the living without God in the World: a state so hopeless, that when the Apostle recollects to the Ephesians the wretchedness of their Gentile State, he does it in those very words, Eph. 2. 12. And sure, those that live so under Christianity, are not in a better, but worse condition, by how much contempt of God is more unpardonable then ignorance.

38. It therefore infinitely concerns those who are in danger of so fatal a snare, to look about them, and endeavor to countermine Satan, and be as industrious to secure their duty, as he is to supplant it; and to this purpose, one of the usefulest expedients I know, is to be aforehand with him; I mean, to make their Devotions the first business of the day; by which I intend not only those Ejaculations wherewith we all should open our eyes, but their more set and solemn Prayers; a Practice so highly expedient to the persons forementioned, that it falls little short of necessary; and that upon several reasons.

39. First, in relation to one of the great ends of Morning Prayer, which is to supplicate the guidance and protection of God for the whole day. Now if this be not don till some Ladies Dressings be finished, 'twill be half a mockery, a most preposterous request, as to the greatest part of the day, which will be past before; and besides absurdity, there is danger in it; for all the preceding time is as it were outlawed by it, put from under the Divine Protection. Alas, are God's safeguards to be only meridional, to shine out only with the noon-day Sun; Do they suppose Satan keeps their hours, and stirs •...ot abroad till the afternoon, that there is no danger either of corporal or spiritual mischiefs before that time of the day? Certainly, if the noise of the harp and the viol which Isa. mentions, Chap. 5. 12. do not drown it, they may often hear a morning as well as evening Passing-bell; with how many others does the glass of life run out, whilst they are at their looking-glasses? How many bodies are maimed and wounded in the time they are trimming and decking theirs? And who made them differ from others, 1 Cor. 4. 7? Or what tenure have they in the safety of one moment, save what they owe to God's Providence? And what rational expectation can they have of that, when they do not invoke it?

40. Nor are the spiritual dangers less, but rather much more; & they must be very slight observers of themselves, if they do not discern that snares may be laid for them in their recesses in their chambers, as well as in places of the most public resort. Indeed, were there no other than what relates to their dress, and curiosity thereof, it were enough to evidence their danger; scarce any part of that but carrying a temptation in it: to Pride, if it hit right, and please their fancy, to Anger and Vexation, if it do not. They had need therefore to put on their armor before their ornaments, by a prepossession of Prayer and Meditation to secure their vitals, lest by an internal death of Grace, their bodies (in their utmost luster) prove but the painted Sepulchers of their Souls.

41. In the second place, this appears requisite in opposition to the indecency and incongruity of the contrary. How inverted an estimate do they make of things that postpone the interests of their souls, to the meanest member of their bodies, pay... supererrogating attendance to the one, before the other comes at all into their care. But what is yet worse, how vile a contumely is offered to the Majesty of God, who is used as they do their dunning Creditors, posted off with an excuse of no leisure yet to speak with him; whilst in the mean time all the factors for their vanity can have ready access, and full audience. God must attend till their Tailor, their Shoemaker please to dismiss them, and at the best, can be allowed only to bring up the rear of a whole shole of Artificers.

42. But thirdly, 'tis very doubtful whether he shall obtain so much from them; for it may often happen that he shall be quite precluded: so numerous are the parts of a modish equipage, and so exact a symmetry is required in the whole, that 'tis the business of many hours to complete it; when as 'twas said of the Roman Ladies, a counsel must be called about the placing of an hair that sits irregularly, when one thing after another shall be tried, and again rejected, as not exact, or not becoming; time all the while insensibly steals away, and though that will not stay for them, yet dinner doth, and then their bellies begin to murmur to pay any longer attendance on their backs, and claim the next turn; and between these two competitors, 'tis odds devotion will be quite excluded, or reduced only to a grace before meat: (and well if that, considering how unfashionable even that is grown) in the mean time what a wretched improvidence is it, to reduce the one necessary business of the day to such uncertainties, nay almost to a certain disappointment.

43. Yet suppose this hazard were only imaginary, and a Lady were infallibly sure not to lose the time for her Prayers; yet in the fourth place, she will be likely by such preceding diversions to lose much of her zeal in them, so that if they be said at all, they will scarce be said in a due manner. There •...s alas such a repugnancy in our nature to anything spiritual, that we cannot close in an instant; but as a benumbed, frozen body will need some rubbing and chafing before it can be fit for motion; so our more frozen souls require some previons incitations before they can with any vigor exert themselves in Devotion. Now sure the dressing time (I mean such a dressing as we now suppose) is not very proper for such preparations. 'Tis; on the contrary, extreme apt to indispose and unfit them; for when the fancy is possessed with so many little images of vanity, they will not easily be ejected. That ranging faculty is, God knows, too apt to bring in even the remotest diversions; but when it has such a stock ready at hand, how will it pour them in upon the mind, to the great allaying, if not utter extinguishing of Devotion.

44. When all these considerations are put together, 'twill sure appear wholesome counsel, that such persons should not trust so important a duty to so many casualties, but in the first place secure a time for that, repair to their Oratory before their dressing room, and by an early consecration of themselmes to God, defeat Satan's claim, and discourage his attempts for the rest of the day. We know there is a natural efficacy in a good beginning, towards the producing a good ending: but in spiritual things the influence is yet greater, because it draws in Auxiliaries from above, and engages the yet farther assistances of Grace. Upon which account I am apt to believe, that where this Duty is sincerely and fervently performed in the morning, it will not totolly be neglected in the succeeding parts of the day. 'Twill be easy to discern the same obligation, the same advantage of closing the day with God, that there was to begin it; and when those two boundaries are secured, when those are looked upon as strict duty, and constantly observed, 'tis not unlikely but their Piety may grow generous, and with David, Ps. 55. 17. add to the evening and morning a noon-day office; for where Devotion is real, 'tis apt to be progressive; and the more we converse with God, the more we shall desire to do so. Thus we see how this little cloud like that of Elijah, 1 King. 18. 44. may over-spread the Heavens, and this handful of first-fruits may hallow the whole day.

45. Nay indeed, when it has advanced thus far, 'twill probably go farther, 'twill not keep itself only on the defensive part, but invade its opposites, get daily ground of those vanities by which it was before oppressed. For when a Lady has in her Closet washed her cheeks▪ with penitential tears, she cannot sure when she comes out think them prepared for the varnish of the paint and fucus. When she has attentively examined her Conscience, that impartial mirror, and there discerned all the blemishes of her nobler part, she will sure with somewhat a more cold concern consult her looking-glass. And when she has been pious vows and resolutions put on the Lord Jesus Christ, Rom. 13. 14. 'twill be impossible for her to be very anxiously careful about her garments. This devout temper of her mind will by a holy leger-demain shu•...flee the Romances out of her hand and substitute the Oracles of Truth; will not let her dream away her time in phantastic scenes, and elaborate nothing, but prompt her to give all diligence to make her Calling and Election sure. In a word, when she once understands what it is to spend one hour devoutly, she will endeavor to rescue all the rest from trifles, and impertinent entertainments; and employ them to purposes more worthy the great end of her being. Thus may she almost insensibly wind herself out of the snare, disentangle herself from those temptations wherewith she was enwrap; and by having her heart so set at liberty, may run the ways of God's Commandments, Ps. 119.

46. But Privat Devotion, though of excellent effect, cannot commute for the omission of public, nor indeed can it long maintain its vigor, unless sometimes cherished by the warmth of Christian Assemblies; and if God please to visit them in their Closets, they are (even by their own Laws of Civility) obliged to return his Visits, and attend him in his house, I fear too many adapt the instance in the formality too, and come as unconcernedly to him as they do to one another. 'Tis true, those that pay him a cordial reverence at Home, will certainly do it at the Church; and therefore by the little we see performed by some there, we may doubt God sees as little in their Retirements. But what speak I of an hearty Reverence, when 'tis visible that there are those who pay none at all? How rare a sight is it for some Ladies to appear at Church? How many times (I had almost said hundreds) do we see their Coaches stand at the Play-house, for once at God's? They seem to own no distinction of days, unless it be, that Sunday is their most vacant season to take Physic, or to lie a-bed; and if such do ever come to Church; Devotion is like to be the least part of their errand; some new garment perhaps or dress is to be showed, and that thought the place where the most critical Judges of those things will be most at lesure to observe them; or if they come not to teach new fashions, it may be they come to learn; and such documents will be surer to be put in practice then any in the Sermon. Possibly they expect to see some friend or acquaintance there, and as if Christ were to be served (as he was born) in an Inn, make his house the common rendezvous in which to meet their Associates. If they have anymore ingenious attractives, 'tis commonly that of curiosity, to hear some new celebrated Preacher, and that rather for his Rhetoric then his Divinity; and this Motive (though the best of the set) is but like that which prevailed with those Jews St. John mentions, who came to Jesus that they might see Lazarus, Jo. 12.

47. I shall not rank among these Motives, that of Hipocrisie and seeming Holiness; for from that all the rest do acquit them. Indeed 'tis the only sin which this Age has seemed to reform, and that too only by way of Antiperistasis, not by the Vertu but the Iniquity of the Times. Religion is grown so unfashionable, so contemptible; that none can now be tempted to put on so ridiculous a disguise. And altho as to single persons I confess Hypocrisy one of the deepest Guilts, such as has a peculiar portion assigned it by Christ in the place of torment, Mat. 24. 51. yet as to Communities, I cannot but think it better to have a face of Religion then profaneness. The example of the former may work beyond itself, and the form of Godliness in some may produce the power of it in others; but a pattern of Profaneness, the farther it operates the worse, and all the progress it can make, is from one wickedness to another, so that I fear as St. Bernard wisht for his Feaver again, so the Church may ere long for her Hypocrites.

48. But to recall myself from this digression, let us a little enquire how those whom the foremention'd Motives bring to Church behave themselves there, and that is indeed with great conformity to the ends of their coming, their errand is not to be Suppliants, neither do they put themselves in the posture, kneeling is impertinent for them who mean not to pray, but as the Apostle describes the Idolatrous service of the Israelites, They sate down to eat and drink and rose up to play; so these sit down to talk and laugh with their Pew-fellows, and rise up to gape and look about them. When they should be confessing their sins to Almighty God, they are apologizing (perhaps) to one another for the omission of a ceremonious visit, or some other breach of civility; when they should be observing the goings of God in the Sanctuary, Psa. 68. they are inquiring when this Lady came to Town, or when that goes out; nay perhaps the Theater is brought into the Temple, the last Play they saw is recollected, and Quotations enough brought thence to vie with the Preacher. 'Tis impossible to reckon up all their Topics of discourse, nay it were indeed scandalous for one that reproves them to pretend to know, by how many impertinencies (to say no worse) they profane that holy Place and Time.

49. But that all seeing eye in whose presence they are, keeps an exact account, and will charge them not only with the principal but the product; not only with their own irreverences, but with those which by their example or encouragement they have occasioned in others, nay farther even with that scandal which redounds to Christianity by it. For when one that is to choose a Religion, shall read the Precepts of Pythagoras enjoining that the God's must not be worshipped in passing by, as it were accidentally, but with the greatest solemnity and intention, when they shall consider the care of Numa in instituting Officers, who at Sacrifices, and all divine Services, should call upon the people to keep silence and advert to Devotion, or but the practice of the present Mohammedans, who permit none to sit in their Moschos, nor to pray without prostration. When I say this is considered, and compared with the scandalous indecency observable in our churches, he will certainly exclude Christianity from all competition in his choice; not allow that the name of a Religion, whose very Worship appears so profane, and whose Votaries mock the God they pretend to serve.

50. Yet how severe soever the charge may lie against some, I am far from including all under it. I know there are many Ladies whose examples are reproaches to the other Sex, that help to fill our congregations when Gentlemen desert them, & to who sometimes we alone own that our Churches are not furnished like the Feast in the Parable, Luke 14. 21. merely out of the high ways and hedges, with the poor and the maimed, the halt and the blind; yet some even of these may be liable to some irregularity, which may be the effects of inadvertence or mispersuasion, though not of contempt or profaneness.

51. And first 'tis observable in some who come constantly, that yet they come not early, so that a considerable part of Prayers is past ere they enter the Church. This first causes some disturbance to others, the successive entry of new comers keeping the Congregation in a continual motion and agitation, which how unagreeable it is to Devotion, Numa a Heathen Prince may teach us, who Plutarch tells us took a particular care, that in the time of divine Worship, no knocking, clapping, or other noise should be heard; as well knowing how much the operations of the intellect are obstructed by anything that importunes the Senses. What would he have said, should he come into one of our City Congregations, where often during the whole time of Prayer, the clapping of Pew-doors does out-noise the Reader.

52. But besides the indecency of the thing, and the interruption it gives to others, 'tis very injurious to themselves; a kind of partial excommunication of their own inflicting; which excludes them from part of the divine Offices, and from that part too, which is of the most universal concern, I mean the confession of sins, which the wisdom of our Church has fitly placed in the beginning of her Service, as the necessary introduction to all the rest. For considering how obnoxious we all are to the wrath and vengeance of God, our first business is to deprecate that by an humble confession of our guilt. Would any Malefactor that had forfeited his life to Justice, come boldly to his Prince, and without taking notice of his crimes, importune him to bestow the greatest favors & dignities upon him? Yet 'tis the very same abrupt impudence in us, to supplicate the divine Majesty before we attempt to atone him, to ask good things from him before we have acknowledged the ill we have do against him. And to such God may justly make such a return as Augustus did to one that entertained him much below his greatness, I knew not before that we were such familiars.

53. It will much better become them to anticipate the time, to wait at the posts of his doors, Pro. 8. and contrive to be there before the Service begins, that so by previous recollection they may put their minds in a fit posture of address at the public Audience: which (by the way) speaks it to be no very laudable custom which almost universally prevails, that those few who do come early, spend the interval before service, in talking with one another, by which they do not only lose the advantage of that time for preparation, but convert it into the direct contrary, do thereby actually unfit and indispose themselves. Godknows our hearts even in their most composed temper, are too apt to create diversions; we need not start game for them to chase, and by prefacing our Prayer with secular discourse, make a gap for the same thoughts to return upon us in them. Besides in relation to the place, it has a spice of profaneness, 'tis the bringing the Moabite and Ammonite into the Temple, Deut. 23. 3. a kind of invasion on God's propriety, by introducing our worldly concerns or divertisments into the house which is called by his name, solemnly dedicated to him, and therefore dedicated that it might be his peculiar. So that with a little variation, we may to such apply the expostulatory reproof of the Apostle to the Corinthians, 1 Cor. 11. 22. what, have ye not houses to talk and converse... in, or despise ye the Church of God? But this is  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  confess a reproof that will not reach to many, there being so few of the better sort that come early enough to talk before Service, and as for those who talk at it, we have already rankt them under another Classis. Yet give me leave to add that those fall not much short of that degree of profaneness, who come late only because they are loath to rise, or to abate anything of the curiosity of their dress. For she that prefers her sloth or her vanity before God's Service, is like (how decently soever she behave herself) to give but an insignificant attendance at it.

54. But I guess this may in many proceed from another cause, which though less ill in their intention, is not so in respect either of its unreasonableness or its effects, and that is an unequal estimate they make of the parts of God's Service. This last Age has brought in such a partiality for Preaching, that Prayer seems comparatively (like Sarah to Hagar) despicable in their eyes: so that if they can but come time enough to the Sermon, they think they have discharged the weightier part of the Law, and of their own duty. This mispersuasion, though it have too generally diffused itself through both Sexes, yet seems to have been very especially imbibed by the female. And besides the evidence that Sunday gives; the week-days afford no less. Let there be a Lecture though at the remotest part of the Town, what hurrying is there to it, but let the Bell tole never so loud for the Canonical hours of Common Prayer, 'twill not call the nearest of the Neighbor-hood. I speak not of those who are at defiance with our Service, •...nd have listed themselves in separate Congregations (for I intend not to trace them through their wild mazes) but of those who yet own our Church, and object not to its Offices, but only have suffered their valu for them to be insensibly undermined by their greater zeal for Preaching. God sure intends a Harmony in all sacred Ordinances, and would not have set up a party against another, but mutually assist each others operation upon us: thus Prayer disposes us to receive benefit by preaching, and preaching teaches us how to pray aright, and God grant we may long enjoy the public opportunities of both. Yet since this Age has brought them to a competition, I must take leave to say, that if we come impartially to weigh Prayer and Preaching, the Ballance will incline another way then it seems with many to do, and we shall find Prayer the more essential part of Religion.

55. The end of Preaching is twofold, either to teach us what we know not, or to excite us to practice what we already know: now in relation to the first of these ends, I suppose there is a wide difference between Preaching at the first promulgation of the Gospel, and now: 'twas then the only way of revealing to the World the whole mystery of our Salvation, so that the Apostles inference was then irrefragable, How shall they believe on him of whom they have not heard, and how shall they hear without a Preacher? Ro. 10. 14. But where Christianity is planted, and the New Testament received, we have therein the whole doctrine of Christ; nay we have not only the matter but the very form of many of those Sermons which Christ and his Apostles preached; so that unless we think them not sufficiently gifted, we cannot but acknowledge, we have in them ampl•... instruction both for Faith and Manners; enough, as the Apostle speaks, to make us wise unto Salvation, 2 Tim. 3. 15. And the reading of those being a considerable part of our Churches Service, we have the most genuine Preaching even before the Minister ascends the Pulpit. Besides, for the help of those whose youth or incapacity disables them from making collections thence for themselves, our Church has epitomiz'd the most necessary Points of Belief and Practice in the Catechism, not (as the Roman) to preclude their farther search, but to supply them in the interim till they are qualified for it; and by that early infusion of Christian Principles, to secure them of that knowledge which is simply necessary to their Salvation.

56. Now sure, to people in this state, Preaching is not of so absolute necessity in respect of instruction, as it was to those who from Heathenism and Idolatry were to be brought first to the Knowledge, and then to the Faith of Christ. We seem therefore now more generally concerned in the other end of Preaching, the exciting us to Practice; for alas, there are few of us who stumble on sin for want of light, but either through heedlessness, and want of looking before us, or else by a willful prostration of ourselves to it; so that we often need to be roused out of our negligence, to be frightened out of our stubbornness, and by a close application of those truths we either forget or suppress, be animated to our Duty. And for this purpose Preaching is doubtless of excellent use, and the nauseating of it shows a very sick constitution of mind; yet sure the over-greedy desire may be a Disease also. He that eats more than he can concoct, does not so much assist as oppress nature, & those that run from sermon to sermon, that allow themselves no time to chew, much less to digest what they hear, will sooner confound their brains than better their lives. Nay, it oft betrays them to a very pernicious delusion, it diverts them from many of the practical parts of Piety, and yet gives them a confidence that they are extraordinarily Pious; and by their belief that Religion consists principally in hearing, makes them forget to try themselves by that more infallible test of doing God's will. So that whereas God never designed Preaching for more than a guide in their way, they make it their way, and their end too; and Hearing must, like a circle, begin and terminate in itself.

57. I am sure in secular concerns, we should think him a very unprofitable servant, that after his Lord had given him directions what to do, should be so transported with hearing his instructions, that he should desire to have it infinitely repeated, and so spend the time wherein he should do the work. And we have reason to think God will make the same judgment of those who do the like in his service.

58. One would now think that this ravenous appetite of hearing should supersede all niceness in it, yet we find it does not, but that some make a shift to be at once voracious and squemish. If this spiritual food be not artificially dressed, 'tis too gross for their palats; the Phrase must be elegant, the words well accented, and the enticing words of man's wisdom which St. Paul disclaims in his Preaching, 1 Cor. 2. 4. is that which they principally regard. Nay the memory of the Preacher becomes the most material Point of his Sermon, and the first glance on his Book prejudices him. I need not add the extravagances of an uncouth tone, a furious vehemence, or phantastic gesture, wherein the soul and vital efficacy of Preaching has been solemnly placed. Now 'tis evident all these are but trivial Accomplishments; so that those who insist so much on them, do make Preaching much less Sacred and Divine than indeed it is; and therefore cannot without absurdity lay the main stress of Religion upon it, or make that the highest of God's Ordinances, which owes all its gratefulness with them to the Endowments of men. Some may think I pursue this subject too far, but I am sure I do it not with design to derogate from the just respect due to Preaching; only I would not have it monopolize our esteem, or justle out another Duty, which is of more constant use, and indispensable necessity.

59. And such certainly is Prayer, that respiration of the soul, which is so necessary, that it admits not of long intermission, and therefore seems to carry the same proportion to hearing, which breathing does to eating: we may make long intervals of feeding, and yet subsist; but if we should do so in breathing, we cannot recover it. Prayer is the morning and evening Sacrifice under the Law, which God ordained should be perpetual; whereas Preaching is but like the Readings in the Synagogues on Sabbaths and Festivals. Indeed, however we have confounded the terms, 'tis Prayer only that can properly be called the worship of God; 'tis that by which we pay him his solemn homage, acknowledge his sovereignty, and our own dependence. When we hear, we do no more than what every Disciple does to his Master; but when we pray, we own him as the spring and source of all the good we expect, as the Author of our Being, and the Object of our Adoration, in a word, we do by it profess him our God; it being an impress of mere natural Religion to supplicate the Deity we acknowledge.

60. And as by Prayer we render the greatest Honor to God, so likewise do we procure the greatest advantages to ourselves. Prayer is the powerful Engin, by which we draw down Blessings; 'tis the key which lets us into the immense Storehouse of the Almighty; nay 'tis that upon which the Efficacy of Preaching depends. The Word is but a dead letter without the Spirit; and God has promised the Spirit to none but those that ask it, Luk. 11. 13, So that Prayer is that which enlivens and inspirits our most sacred actions; and accordingly in Scripture she find it still a concomitant in all Ecclesiastical concerns. When an Apostle was to be substituted in the room of Judas, we find, they referred it not to the decision of lots, till God, who had the sole disposing of them, Prov. 16. 33. had been invoked by solemn Prayer, Act. 1. 24. So when Barnabas and Saul were to be separated to the Ministry, though the appointment were by the Holy Ghost, yet that superseded not the necessity of Prayer; the Apostles prayed, (yea, and fasted too) before they laid their hand on them, Act. 13. 3. Nay, our Blessed Savior Himself, though He knew what was in man, and needed no guidance but his own Omniscience in this choice: yet we find that before his Election of the twelve Apostles, he continued a whole night in Prayer to God, Luk. 6. 22. doubtless, to teach us how requisite Prayer is in all our important interests, which like the Pillar of Cloud and Fire to the Israelites, is our best Convoy through the Wilderness, through all the snares and temptations, through all the calamities and distresses of this World, and our most infallible Guide to the Land of Promise.

61. And sure when all these are the properties of Prayer, though private, they will not less belong to the public; such a conspiracy and union of importunate Devotion, must have a proportionable increase in its effect; and if Heaven can suffer violence by the fervor of one single Votary, with what storm, what batteries will it be scaled by a numerous Congregation? We find the Church is, by Christ, compared to an Army with banners, Cant. 6. 3. but sure never is this Army in so good array, in so invincible a posture as upon its knees. The Ecclesiastical story tells us of a Legion of Christians in Aurelius's Camp, who in that posture discomfited two assailants at once, the enemy and the drought; that breath which they sent up in Prayers, like a kindly exhalation returned in rain, and relieved the perishing Army: and had we but the same fervor, and the same innocence, could we lift up but as pure hands as they did, there would be no Blessing beyond our reach. But the less any of us find ourselves so qualified, the more need we have to put ourselves among those that are.

62. There is an happy contagion in goodness; like green wood, we may perhaps be kindled by the neighboring flame; the example of another's zeal may awake mine. However, there is some advantage in being in the company: those showers of benediction which their Prayers bring down, are so plentiful, that some drops at least may scatter upon those about them. We find Elisha for Jehoshaphat's sake, endured the presence of Jehoram, whom otherwise he professes he would not have looked towards, 2 King. 3. 14. and God may perhaps do the like in this case; and as he prospered Potiphar for Joseph's sake, Gen. 39. 23. so the Piety of a few may redound to the benefit of all. From all these considerations I suppose may sufficiently be evinced the necessity and benefit, of public Prayer, and consequently the unreasonableness of those, who upon any pretence neglect it. I shall now only beseech those to whom I speak to make the application to themselves, and to show they do so by their more early and more assiduous attendance on it.

63. There is also another Duty to which many of these to whom I write seem to need some incitation, and that is Communicating, a part of Devotion which the looser sort scarce ever think in season till their death beds, as if that Sacrament like the Romanists Extreme Unction, were only fit for expiring souls, but to such we may apply the words of the Angel to the woman, Lu. 24. 5. Why sleekest thou the living among the dead? Why think ye that the Sun of Righteousness is only to shine in the shades of death, or that Christ is never to give us his flesh, till we are putting off our own; 'Tis one principal end of that Sacrament to engage and enable us to a new life; how preposterous then is it, how utterly inconsistent with that end to defer it to the hour of death 'Tis true 'tis a good Viaticum for such as are in their way towards bliss, but it is too bold a hope, to fancy that it shall in an instant bring them into that way, who have their whole life posted on in the contrary: the roads to Heaven and Hell lie sure too far asunder to be within distance of one step, nor can it with any safety be presumed that once receiving at their death, shall expiate so many willful neglects of it in their life.

64. But I shall suppose these total Omissions are not a common guilt: yet with many others the fault differs only in degree, they do not wholly omit, but yet come so infrequently as if they thought it a very arbitrary matter whether they come or no. And this truly is observable in many who seem to give good attendance on other parts of divine Worship, for indeed 'tis a sad spectacle to see, that let a Church be never so much crowded at Sermon, 'tis emptied in an instant when the Communion begins, people run as it were frighted from it, as if they thought with those in Malachi, that the table of our Lord is polluted, Mal. 1. 12. that some pest or infection would thence break forth upon them. A strange indignity to the Majesty, and ingratitude to the love of our Redeemer. Let a King, or but some great man make a public entertainment, how hard is it to keep back the pressing multitude: many Officers are necessary to repel the uninvited guests, and yet here there needs more to drive us to it, though the Invitation be more general, and the Treat infinitely more magnificent.

65. I know this fault (like many other) shrouds itself under a fair disguise, and this barbarous neglect pretends to the humblest veneration. People say 'tis their great reverence they have for the Sacrament that keeps them at so great a distance; but sure that is but a fictitious reverence which discards obedience; and when Christ commands ou•... coming, our drawing back looks more like stubbornness and rebellion, then awe and respect. I suppose we pretend not to exceed the Primitive Christians in humility and godly fear, and yet they communicated daily, and therefore sure our reverence is of a much differing make from theirs, if it produce such contrary effects. Indeed 'tis to be feared that many put a great cheat upon themselves in this matter. The Eucharist is justly accounted the highest of divine Ordinances, and those who think of no preparation in other, yet have some general impressions of the necessity of it in this; but the uneasiness of the task discourages them, they dare not come without a wedding garment, and yet are loath to be at the pains to put it on, so that all this goodly pretext of reverence, is but the Devil in Samuel's Mantle, is but sloth clad in the habit of humility.

66. And to this temptation of sloth, there is another thing very subservient, and that is the easy and slight opinion which is commonly taken of sins of Omission, many are startled at great Commissions think them to carry a face of deformity and horror, who in the mean time look on Omission only as privations and mere nothings, as if all the affirmative Precepts were only things of form, put in by God rather to try our inclinations, then to oblige our performance; and so were rather overtures and proposals which we may assent to or not, then injunctions which at our peril we must obey. A fancy no less absurd then impious. That God should be content so to compound with his creatures (and like a Prince overpower'd by his vassals) consent to remit all their homage, absolve them from all positive Duty, so they would be but so civil as not to fly in his face, or to commit outrage on his Person. But this wild imagination needs no other confutation, then that form of inditement our Savior gives us as the Model of that which shall be used at the last day, Mat. 25. where the whole Process lies against sins of Omission, and yet the sentence is as dismal and irreversible, as if all the Commissions in the World had been put into the Bill.

67. And certainly of all Omissions none is like to be more severely charged then this of communicating, which is not only a disobedience, but an unkindness, which strikes not only at the Authority but the Love of our Lord, when he so affects a union with us that he creates Mysteries only to effect it, when he descends even to our sensuality, and because we want spiritual appetites, puts himself within reach of our natural; and as he once veiled his Divinity in flesh, so now veils even that flesh under the form of our corporal nourishment, only that he may the more indissolvably unite, yea incorporat himself with us. When I say he does all this, we are not only impious but inhuman if it will not attract us. Nay farther, when he does all this upon the most endearing memory of what he has before don for us, when he presents himself to our embraces in the same form wherein he presented himself to God for our expiation, when he shows us those wounds which our iniquities made, those stripes by which we were healed, that death by which we are revived, shall we to complete the Scene of his Passion, force him also to that pathetic complaint, Lam. 1. 12. Have ye no regard all ye that pass by? Shall we instead of smiting our breasts (as did other witnesses of his sufferings) turn our backs? If we can habitually do this, 'tis to be feared the next degree will be to wag our heads too, and we shall have the profaneness to deride, what we have not the Piety to commemorate.

68. And this seems to be no improbable fear, for in Religion there are gradual declinations as well as advances, coldness and tepidity will (if not stopped in its progress) quickly grow to loathing and contempt. And indeed to what can we more reasonably impute the great overflowings of profaneness among us, then to our ill-husbanding the means of Grace? Now certainly of all those means there is none of greater energy and power then the blessed Sacrament,

69. Were there no other benefit derived from it save that which the preparation implies, 'twere very considerable. It brings us to a recollection, fixes our indefinite purposes of searching and trying our ways, which else perhaps we should infinitely defer, stops our career in sin, and by acquainting us with ourselves, shows us where our danger lies, and how we are to avert it, what breaches are made in upon our souls, and how we must repair them, all which are with many seldom thought of, but when the time of communicating approaches. We live so far off from ourselves, know so little what is done in us that we answer the description the Prophet makes of the surprise of Babylon, of which the King knew nothing till post after post run to inform him that his City was taken at one end, Jer. 51. 31. we often lie secure while the enemy is within our walls, and therefore they are friendly alarms which the Sacrament gives us to look to our defense. But if when the Trumpet sounds none will prepare himself to the Battle, if when the Minister give▪ warning of a Sacrament, and the preparation it requires, we go our ways, and with Gallio care for none of th...se things, or with Felix, Acts 24. 26. put it off to a convenient time, we willfully expose ourselves, and 'tis but just Christ's dreadful menace should be executed upon us, that we die in our sins, who will frustrate such an opportunity of a rescue from them.

70. But 'tis not only this remoter and accidental advantage (this preventing Grace) which the Holy Eucharist affords, it contains yet greater and more intrinsic benefits, is a Spring of assisting Grace also, 'tis a Magazine of Spiritual Artillery to fortify us against all assaults of the Devil, the great Catholicon for all the Maladies of our Souls, that which if duly received, will qualify us to make St. Paul's boast, Phil. 4. 13. I can do all things through Christ which strengthens me. In a word 'tis to us whatever we need, Wisdom, Righteousness, Sanctification, and Redemption, because it possesses us of him who is so, 1 Cor. 1. 31. so that whenever we neglect it, we manifestly betray our own interest, and do implicitly chose death whilst we thus run from life.

71. Thus we see there is a concurrence of all forts of Arguments for this Duty, oh that some (at least) of them may prevail! If we are not tractable enough to do it in obedience▪ yet let us be so ingenious as to do it for Love, for Gratitude, or if for neither of those, let us be at least so wise as to do it for interest, and advantage. I know people are apt to pretend business, the Farm and the Oxen must excuse their coming to the Feast, but alas what business can there be of equal necessity or advantage with this? Yet even that Apology is superseded to those I now speak to, who as I observed before have lesure more then enough, so that it would be one part of the benefit, its taking up some of their time: let me therefore earnestly beseech them, not to grudge a few of their vacant hours to this so happy an employment.

72. Did any of their near Friends and Relations invite them to an interview, they would not think him too importune, though he repeated the summons weekly, nay, daily, but would punctually observe the meeting: And when their Savior much seldomer entertains their company, shall he not obtain it? must he never see them but at two or three solemn times of the year? and shall they wonder at any intervening invitation (as the Shunamites husband did at her going to the Prophet when it was neither new Moon nor Sabbath, 2 Ki. 4. 23.) and tell him 'tis not yet Easter or Christmas, this were not only to be irreligious but rude; and methinks those who stand so much upon the particulars of Civility to one another, should not then only lay aside their good manners when they are to treat with their Redeemer. Certainly he is not so unpleasant company that they need shun his converse: if he do appear so to any, 'tis that shunning that is the cause of it. He does not open his treasures to strangers: they that come now and then for form sake, no wonder if their entertainment, be as cold as their address. They that would indeed taste how sweet the Lord is, Psa. 34. 8. must by the frequency of their coming show the heartiness of it, and then they would indeed find it a feast of fat things, as the Prophet speaks.

73. In a word, let them but make experiment, resolve for a certain time (be it a year or thereabouts) to omit no opportunity, (and withal no due preparation) of communicating, I am a little confident they will afterwards need no other importunity but that of their own longings: the expiration of that definite time will prove the beginning of an indefinite, and their resolutions will have no other limit but their lives. For certainly there is not in all the whole mystery of Godliness, in all the Oeconomy of the Gospel, so expedite, so infallible a means of growth in Grace, as a frequent and worthy participation of this blessed Sacrament; I cannot therefore more pertinently close this Section, then with this exhortation to it, by which they will not only complete all their Devotions, crown and hallow the rest of their Oblations to God, but they will be advanced also in all parts of practical Piety▪ for though this and other sacred Offices be performed in the Church, the efficacy of them is not circumscribed within those walls, but follows the devout soul through all the occurrences of human life.

74. She that has intently considered the preference of God in the Sanctuary, has learned so much of his ubiquity, that she will not easily forget it in other places, and she that remembers that will need no other guard to secure her innocence, no other incentive to animate her endeavors, since she is viewed by him who is equally powerful to punish or reward, who regards not the persons of the mighty, nor can be awed into the connivance of a crime. Indeed a serious advertence to the divine Presence, is the most certain curb to all disorderly appetites, as on the contrary the not having God before their eyes, is in Scripture the comprehensive description of the most wretchless profligated state of sin. It concerns therefore all those who aspire to true Piety to nourish that awful sense in their hearts, as that which will best enable them to practice the Apostles advice, 2 Cor. 7▪ 1. To cleanse themselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, and to perfect holiness in the fear of God.

75. I am sensible that this Section is spun out to a length very unproportionable to the former; but as the principal wheel in an artificial movement may be allowed a bulk somewhat answerable to its use, so upon the same account, the size of this is not unjustifiable; the Piety which this designs to recommend being the one necessary thing, which must influence all other endowments. We know the course resemblance Solomon makes of a fair woman without discretion, that she is like a jewel of gold in a swin...s sn...ut, Prov. 11. 12. but even that discretion (if any such could be) without Piety were but the adding one jewel more, exposing another valuable thing to the same despicable ridiculous use. But to speak truly there is no real discretion, where there is no Religion: & therefore Solomon seems in this place to understand by it that practical Wisdom, which in the sacred Dialect (his writings especially) is equivalent to the fear of the Lord. 'Tis true, there may be a rallying wit to scoff and abuse, a serpentine Wiliness to undermine and deceive, but that sort of Wisdom (like that of Achitophel) finally converts into foolishness, does very often appear to do so in this life, but most certainly in the next, because it builds upon a falsebottom, prefers temporal things before eternal. And as neither beauty or wit (the two celebrated accomplishments of women) so will neither Greatness and Honor give any advantage without Piety, 'twill only (as hath been already observed) make them more exemplary sinners, inflame the account, and so expose them to a greater degree of condemnation, for sure 'tis not their Sex that will rescu them from the dismal denunciation of the Wise man. Wisd. 6. 6. Mighty men shall be mightily tormented, I conclude all with another irrefragable maxim of the same Author, Whether one be Rich, Noble, or Poor, their Glory is the Fear of the Lord.

THE LADIES CALLING.

Part II.

Sect. I. Of Uirgins.

1. WE have taken a view of those general qualifications, which are at once the duty and the ornament of the Female sex, considered at large. These like the common Genius involve all; but there are also specific differences, arising from the several circumstances and states of life, some whereof may exact greater degrees even of the former virtues, & all may have some distinct & peculiar requisits adapted to that particular state and condition: and of these our proposed method engages us now to consider. Human life is full of vicissitudes and changes, so that 'tis impossible to enumerate all the lesser accidental alterations to which it is liable. But the principal & most distinct scenes, in which a woman can be supposed regularly to be an actor, are these three, Virginity, Marriage and Widowhood; which as they differ widely from each other, so for the discharging their respective duties, there are peculiar cautions worthy to be adverted to.

2. Virginity is first in order of time, and if we will take S. Paul's judgment in respect of excellence also, 1 Cor. 7. And indeed she that preserves herself in that state upon the account he mentions v. 33. that she may care for the things that are of the Lord, that she may be holy both in body and in Spirit, deserves a great deal of veneration, as making one of the nearest approaches to the Angelical State, And accordingly in the primitive time, such a Virginity was had in a singular estimation, and by the assignment of the Schoolmen, hath a particular coronet of glory belonging to it. Nay even among the heathens, a consecrated Virgin was looked on as a thing most sacred. The Roman Vestals had extraordinary priviledges allowed them by the state; and they were generally held in such reverence, that Testaments and other depositums of the greatest trust were usually committed to their custody, as to the surest and most inviolable Sanctuary. Nay their presence was so to convicted malefactors; the Magistrates veiling their fascēs when they appeared, and giving up the criminal to the commanding intercession of Virgin innocence.

3. As for the religious orders of Virgins in the present Roman Church, though some and those very great abuses have crept in; yet I think twere to be wishd, that those who suppressed them in this nation, had confind themselves within the bounds of a reformation, by choosing rather to rectify and regulate, then abolish them.

4. But though there be not among us such societies, yet there may be Nuns who are not Profest. She who has devoted her heart to God, and the better to secure his interest against the most insinuating rival of Human Love, intends to admit none, and prays that she may not; does by those humble purposes consecrate herself to God, and perhaps more acceptably, then if her presumption should make her more positive, and engage her in a vow she is not sure to perform.

5. But this is a case does not much need stating in our Clime, wherein women are so little transported with this zeal of voluntary Virginitie, that there are but few can find patience for it when necessary. An old maid is now thought such a curse, as no Poetic fury can exceed; looked on as the most calamitous creature in nature. And I so far yield to the opinion, as to confess it so to those who are kept in that state against their wills: but sure the original of that misery is from the desire, not the restraint of Marriage: let them but suppress that o•...ce, and the other will never be their infelicity. But I must not be so unkind to the sex, as to think 'tis always such desire that gives them aversion to Celibacy; I doubt not many are frighted only with the vulgar contempt under which that state lies: for which if there be no cure, yet there is the same armor against this which is against all other causeless reproaches, viz. to contemn it. Yet I am a little apt to believe there may be a prevention in the case. If the superannuated virgins would behave themselves with gravity and reservedness, addict themselves to the strictest vertu and piety, they would give the world some cause to believe, 'twas not their necessity but their choice which kept them unmarried; that they were preengag'd to a better Amour; espoused to the spiritual Bridegroom: & this would give them among the soberer sort at least the reverence and esteem of Matrons. Or if after all caution and endeavor, they chance to fall under the tongues of malicious slanderers; this is no more then happens in all other instances of duty: and if contempt be to be avoided, Christianity itself must be quitted, as well as virgin Chastity. But if on the other side they endeavor to disguise their age, by all the impostures and gaities of a youthful dress and behavior, if they still herd them selves among the youngest and vainest company, betray a young mind in an aged body; this must certainly expose them to scorn and censure. If no play no ball, or dancing meeting can escape them, people will undoubtedly conclude that they desire, to put off themselves, to meet with chapmen, who so constantly keep the fairs. I wish therefore they would more universally try the former expedient, which I am confident is the best amulet against the reproach they so much dread, and may also deliver them from the danger of a more costly remedy, I mean that of an unequal and imprudent match, which many have rush'd upon as they have ran frighted from the other, and so by an unhappy contradiction, do both stay long and marry hastily, gall their neck to spare their ears, and run into the yok rather than hear so slight and unreasonable a reproach. They need not, I think, be upbraided with the folly of such an election, since their own experience •...s (to many of them) but too severe a monitor. I shall not insi•...t farther on this, but having given the elder virgins that ensign of their seniority as to stand first in my discourse, I shall now address more generally to the rest.

6. And here the two grand elements essential to the Virgin state are Modesty and Obedience, which, though necessary to all, yet are in a more eminent degree required here; and therefore, though I have spoken largely of the virtue of Modesty in the first part of this tract, yet it will not be impertinent to make some farther reflections on it, by way of application to Virgins, in whom modesty should appear in its highest elevation, and should come up to Shamefacedness. Her look, her speech, her whole behavior should own an humbl distrust of herself; she is to look on herself, but as a novice, a probationer in the world, and must take this time, rather to learn and observe, then to dictate & prescribe. Indeed there is scarce anything looks more indecent, then to see a young maid too forward and confident in her talk. 'Tis the opinion of the wiseman, Ecclus. 32. 8. that a young man should scarce speak though twice asked: in proportion to which, 'twill sure not become a young woman, whose sex puts her under greater restraints, to be either importunate or magisterial in her discourse. And though that which former ages called Boldness, is now only Assurance and good breeding, yet we have seen such bad superstructures upon that foundation, as sure will not much recommend it to any considering person.

7. But there is another breach of Modesty as it relates to Chastity, in which they are yet more especially concerned. The very name of virgin imports a most critical niceness in that point. Every indecent curiosity, or impure fancy, is a deflowering of the mind, & every the least corruption of them gives some degrees of defilement to the body too: for between the state of pure immaculat Virginitie & arrant Prostitution there are many intermedial steps, and she that makes any of them, is so far departed from her first integrity. She that listens to any wanton discourse, has violated her ears; she that speaks any, her tongue; every immodest glance vitiates her eye, and every the lightest act of dalliance leaves something of stain and sullage behind it. There is therefore a most rigorous caution requisite herein: for as nothing is more clean and white then a perfect Virginitie, so every the least spot or soil is the more discernible. Besides, youth is for the most part flexible, & easily warps into a crookedness, and therefore can never set itself too far from a temptation. Our tender blossoms we are fain to skreen and shelter, because every unkindly air nips and destroys them; and nothing can be more nice and delicate then a maiden vertu, which ought not to be exposed to any of those malignant airs which may blast and corrupt it, of which God knows there are too many, some that blow from within, and others from without.

8. Of the first sort there is none more mischievous than Curiosity, a temptation which foiled human Nature even in Paradise: and therefore sure a feeble girl ought not to trust herself with that which subdued her better fortified parent. The truth is, an affected ignorance cannot be so blamable in other cases as it is commendable in this. Indeed it is the surest & most invincible guard, for she who is curious to know indecent things, 'tis odds but she will too soon and too dearly buy the learning. The suppressing and detesting all such curiosities is therefore that eminent fundamental piece of continence I would recommend to them, as that which will protect and secure all the rest.

9. But when they have set this guard upon themselves, they must provide against foreign assaults too; the most dangerous whereof I take to be ill Company, and Id'eness. Against the first they must provide by a prudent choice of conversation, which should generally be of their own sex; yet not all of that neither, but such who will at least entertain them innocently, if not profitably. Against the second they may secure themselves by a constant series of employments: I mean not such frivolous ones as are more idle than doing nothing; but such as are ingenuous, and some way worth their time, wherein as the first place is to be given to the offices of piety, so in the intervalls of those, there are divers others, by which they may not unusefully fill up the vacancies of their time: such are the acquiring of any of those ornamental improvements which become their quality, as Writing, Needle works, Languages, Music, or the like. If I should here insert the art of Economy and Household Managery, I should not think I affronted them in it; that being the most proper feminine business, from which neither wealth nor greatness can totally absolve them; and a little of the theory in their parents house, would much assist them towards the practic when they come to their own. In a word there are many parts of knowledge useful for civil as well as divine life; and the improving themselves in any of those is a rational employment.

10. But I confess I know not how to reduce to that head many of those things which from diversions are now stepped up to be the solemn business of many young Ladies, (& I doubt of some old;) such is in the first place gaming, a recreation whose lawfulness I question not, whilst it keeps with the bounds of a recreation: but when it sets up for a calling, I know not whence it derives its license. And a calling sure it seems to be with some, a laborious one too, such as they toil night and day at, nay do not allow themselves that remission which the laws both of God and man have provided for the meanest mechanic: the Sabbath is to them no day of rest, but this trade goes on when all shops are shut. I know not how they satisfy themselves in such an habitual wast of their time, (besides all the incidental faults of avarice and anger) but I much doubt that plea, whatsoever it is, which passes with them, will scarce hold weight at his Tribunal, who has commanded us to redeem, not fling away our time.

11. There is another thing to which some devote a very considerable part of their time, and that is the reading Romances, which seems now to be thought the peculiar and only becoming study of young Ladies. I confess their youth may a little adapt it to them when they were children, and I wish they were always in their event as harmless; but I fear they often leave ill impressions behind them. Those amorous passions, which 'tis their design to paint to the utmost life, are apt to insinuate themselves into their unwary readers, and by an unhappy inversion, a copy shall produce an original. When a poor young creature shall read there of some triumphant Beauty, that has I know not how many captiv'd Knights prostrate at her feet, she will probably be tempted to think it a fine thing; and may reflect how much she loses time, that has not yet subdu'd one heart: and then her business will be to spread her nets; lay her toils to catch somebody, who will more fatally ensnare her. And when she has once wound herself into an amour, those Authors are subtle casuists for all difficult cases that may occur in it, will instruct in the necessary Artifices of deluding Parents and Friends, and put her ruin perfectly in her own power. And truly this seems to be so natural a consequent of this sort of study, that of all the divertisements that look so innocently, they can scarce fall upon anymore hazardous. Indeed it is very difficult to imagine what vast mischief is done to the World, by the false notions and images of things; particularly of Love and Honor, those noblest concerns of human life, represented in these Mirrors: but when we consider upon what principles the Duellists and Hectors of the Age defend their outrages; and how great a devotion is paid to lust, instead of virtuous Love; we cannot be to seek for the Gospel which makes these doctrines appear orthodox.

12. As for the entertainments which they find abroad, they may be innocent, or otherwise according as they are managed. The common intercourse of Civility is a debt to Humanity, and therefore mutual visits may often be necessary, and so (in some degree) may be several harmless and healthful recreations which may call them abroad; for I write not now to Nuns, and have no purpose to confine them to a Cloister. Yet on the other side to be always wandering, is the condition of a vagabond, and of the two 'tis better to be a Prisoner to ones home, than a Stranger. Solomon links it with some very unlaudable qualities of a Woman Pro. 7. 11. that her feet abide not in her house, and 'tis an unhappy impotence not to be able to stay at home, when there is anything to be seen abroad; that any mask, or revel, any jollity of others must be their rack and torment, if they cannot get to it. Alas such meetings are not so sure to be safe, that they had need be frequent, and they are of all others least like to be safe to those, who much dote on them: and therefore those that find they do so, had need to counterbias their minds, and set them to something better, and by more serious entertainments supplant those vanities, which at the best are childish...; and may often prove worse; it being too probable that those Dinah's which are still gadding, though on pretence to see only the daughters of the land Gen. 34. may at last meet with a son of Hamor.

13. There is also another great devourer of time subservient to the former, I mean dressing: for they that Love to be seen much abroad, will be sure to be seen in the most exact form. And this is an employment that does not steal but challenge their time; what they waste here is cum Privilegio, it being by the verdict of this age the proper business, the one science wherein a young Lady is to be perfectly versed; so that now all virtuous emulation is converted into this single ambition, who shall excel in this faculty. A vanity which I confess is more excusable in the younger than the elder sort; they being supposable not yet to have outworn the relics of their childhood, to which toys and gaiety were proportionable. Besides 'tis sure allowable upon a soberer account, that they who design Marriage should give themselves the advantage of decent ornaments, and not by the negligent rudeness of their dress bely

Nature, and render themselves less amiable than she has made them. But all this being granted, 'twill by no means justify that excessive curiosity and solicitude, that expense of time and money too which is now used; a very moderate degree of all those will serve for that ordinary decency which they need provide for, will keep them from the reproach of an affected singularity, which is as much as a sober person need take care for. And I must take leave to say, that in order to marriage, such a moderation is much likelier to succeed than the contrary extravagance. Among the pruder sort of men I am sure it is, if it be not among the loose and vain, against which 'twill be their guard, and so do them the greater service: for certainly he that chooses a wife for those qualities for which a wise man would refuse her, understands so little what marriage is, as portends no great felicity to her that shall have him. But if they desire to marry men of sobriety and discretion, they are obliged in justice to bring the same qualities they expect, which will be very ill evidenced by that excess and vanity we now speak of.

14. For to speak a plain (though perhaps ungrateful truth, this (together with some of the modish liberties now in use) is it, which keeps so many young Ladies about the Town unmarried 'till they lose the epithet of young. Sober men are afraid to venture upon a humor so disagreeing to their own lest whilst (according to the primitive reason of marriage) they seek a help, they espouse a ruin. But this is especially dreadful to a plain Country Gentleman, who looks upon one of these fine women as a Gaudy Idol, to whom if he once become a votary, he must sacrifice a great part of his fortune, and all his content. How reasonable that apprehension is, the many wracks of considerable families do too evidently attest. But I presume some of the nicer Ladies have such a contempt of anything that they please to call rustic, that they will not much regret the averting of those whom they so despise. They will not perhaps while they are in pursuit or hopes of others; but when those fail, these will be looked on as a welcome reserve, and therefore 'twill be no prudence to cut themselves off from that last resort, lest they (as many have done) betake themselves to much worse. For as in many instances 'tis the Country which feeds and maintains the grandeur of the Town, so of all commerces there, marriage would soonest fail, if all Rural supplies were cut off.

15. But I have pursued this speculation farther than perhaps my virgin readers will thank me for, I shall return to that which it was brought to enforce, and beseech them that if not to Men, yet to approve themselves to God, they will confine themselves in the matter of their dress within the due limits of decency and sobriety. I shall not direct them to those strict rules which Tertullian and some other of the ancient Fathers have prescribed in this matter; my petition is only that our virgins would at least so take care of their bodies, as Persons that also have a soul; which if they can be persuaded to, they may reserve much of their time for more worthy •...ses than those of the Comb, the Tuillets, and the Glass. And truly 'tis not a little their concern to do so, for this spring of their age is that critical instant that must either confirm or blast the hopes of all the succeeding seasons. The minds of young people are usually compared to a blank sheet of paper, equally capable of the best or the worst impressions; 'tis pity they should be filled with childish scrawls, and little insignificant figures, but 'tis shame and horror they should be stained with any vicious characters, any blots of impurity or dishonor. To prevent which let the •...everest notions of modesty and honor be early and deeply impest upon their souls, graven as with the point of a Diamond, that they may be as indelible as they are indispensibly necessary to the virgin state.

16. There is also another very requisite quality, and that is Obedience. The younger sort of virgins are supposed to have parents, or if any has binso unhappy as to lose them early, they commonly are left in the charge of some friend or guardian, that is to supply the place; so that they cannot be to seek to whom this obedience is to be paid. And it is not more their duty then their interest to pay it. Youth is apt to be foolish in it its designs, & heady in the pursuit of them; and there can be nothing more deplorable then to have it left to its self. And therefore God, who permits not even the brutes to destitute their young ones till they attain to the perfection of their kind, has put children under the guidance and protection of their parents, 'till by the maturing of their judgments they are qualified to be their own conductors. Now this Obedience (as that which is due to all other superiors) is to extend itself to all things that are either good or indifferent, and has no clause of exception, but only where the command is unlawful. And in so wide a scene of action there will occur so many particular occasions of submission, that they had need have a great reverence of their parents judgments, and distrust of their own. And if it should happen that some parents are not qualified to give them the former, yet the general imbecility of their age, will remain a constant ground of the later: so that they may safelier venture themselves to their parents misguidance, then their own; by how much the errors of humility and obedience, are less malignant then those of presumption and arrogance.

16. But this is a doctrine which will scarce pass for orthodox with many of the young women of our days, withwhom 'tis prejudice enough against the prudentest advice that it comes from their parents. 'Tis the grand ingenuity of these times to turn everything into Ridicule; and if a girl can but rally smartly upon the sober admonition of a parent, she concludes she is the abler person; takes herself for a wit, and the other for a fop; (a bugbear word devised to fright all seriousness and sobriety out of the World;) and learns not only to disobey but to contemn. Indeed the great confidence that youth now seems to have of its self, as it is very indecent, so is it extremely pernicious. Children that will attempt to go alone before their time, oft get dangerous falls; and when those who are but little removed from children, shall cast off the wiser conduct of others, they oft sadly miscarry by their own,

18. I know this age has so great a contempt of the former, that 'tis but matter of scorn to allege any of their customs, else I should say that the liberties that are taken now, would then have been startled at. They that should then have seen young maid rambling abroad without her mother or some other prudent person, would have looked on her as a stray, and thought it but a neighborly office to have brought her home; whereas now 'tis a rarity to see them in any company graver then themselves, and she that goes with her parent (unless it be such a parent as is as wild as herself) thinks she does but walk abroad with her jailor. But sure there are no small mischiefs that attend this liberty, for it leaves them perfectly to the choice of their company, a thing of too weighty an importance for giddy heads to determine; who will besure to elect such as are of their own humor, with whom they may keep up a traffic of little impertinencies and trifling entertainments; and so by consequence condemn themselves never to grow wiser which they might do by an ingenuous conversation. Nay 'tis well if that negative ill be the worst, for it gives opportunity to any that have ill designs upon them. It will be easy getting into their company, who have no guard to keep anybody out, and as easy by little compliances & flatteries to insinuate into their good graces, who have not the sagacity to discern to what insidious purposes those blandishments are directed; and when they once begin to nibble at the bait, to be pleased with the Courtship, 'tis great odds they do not escape the hook.

19. Alas how many poor innocent creatures have been thus indiscernibly ensnared; have at first perhaps only liked the wit and raillery, perhaps the language and address, then the freedom and good humor; 'till at last they come to like the person. It is therefore a most necessary caution for young women, not to trust too much to their own conduct, but to own their dependence on those, to whom God and nature has subjected them, and to look on it not as their restraint and burden, but as their shelter and Protection. For where once the authority of a parent comes to be despised, though in the lightest instance, it lays the foundation of utmost disobedience. She that will not be prescribed to in the choice of her ordinary diverting company, will less be so in choosing the fixed companion of her life; and we find it often eventually true, that those who govern themselves in the former, will not be governed by their friends in the latter, but by pre-engagements of their own prevent their elections for them.

20. And this is one of the highest injuries they can do their parents, who have such a native right in them, that 'tis no less an injustice then disobedience to dispose of themselves without them. This right of the parent is so undoubted, that we find God himself gives way to it, and will not suffer the most holy pretence▪ no not that of a Vow, to invade it as we may see his own stating of the case Numb 30. How will he then rese•...t it, to have his so indispensable a•...awe violated upon the impulse of an impotent passion, an amorous inclination? Nor is the folly less then the sin: they injure and afflict their parents, but they generally ruin and undo themselves. And that upon a double account, first as to the secular part. Those that are so rash as to make such matches, cannot be imagined so provident as to examine how agreeable 'tis to their interest; or to contrive for anything beyond the marriage. The thoughts of their future temporal conditions (like those of the eternal) can find no room amidst their foolish raptures; but as if love were indeed that Deity which the Poets feigned, they depend on it for all, and take no farther care. And event does commonly too soon instruct them in the deceitfulness of that trust; love being so unable to support them, that it cannot maintain its self; but quickly expires when it has brought the lovers into those straits, from whence it cannot rescu them. So that indeed it does but play the decoy with them, brings them into the noose and then retires. For when secular wants begin to pinch them, all the transports of their kindness do usually convert into mutual accusations, for having made each other miserable.

21. And indeed there is no reason to expect any better event, because in the second place they forfeit their title to the divine blessing; nay they put themselves out of the capacity to ask it, it being a ridiculous impudence to beg God to prosper the transgressions of his law. Such weddings seem to invoke only some of the Poetic Romantic Deities, Venus & Hymen, from whence they derive a happiness as fictitious as are the God's that are to send it. Let all Virgins therefore religiously observe this part of Obedience to their parents, that they may not only have their benediction but God's. And to that purpose let this be laid as a fundamental rule, that they never hearken to any proposal of marriage made them from any other hand; but when any such overture is made, divert the address from herself and direct it to her parents, which will be the best test imaginable for any pretender: for if he know himself worthy of her, he will not fear to avow his design to them; and therefore if he decline that, 'tis a certain symptom, he is conscious of something that he knows will not give a valuable consideration; so that this course will repel no suitor but such as it is their interest not to admit. Besides 'tis most agreeable to the virgin modesty, which should make marriage an act rather of their obedience than their choice; and they that think their friends too flow paced in the matter, and seek to outrun them, give cause to suspect they are spur'd on by somewhat too warm desires.

22. But as a Daughter is neither to anticipate, nor contradict the will of her Parent, so (to hang the balance even) I must say she is not obliged to force her own, by marrying where she cannot love; for a negative voice in the case is sure as much the child's right as the Parent's...s. It is true she ought well to examine the grounds of her aversion, and if they prove only childish and fanciful, should endeavor to correct them by reason and sober consideration; but if after all she cannot leave to hate, I think she should not proceed to marry. I confess I see not how she can without a sacrilegious hypocrisy, vow so solemnly to love where she at the instant actually abhors: and where the married state is begun with such a perjury, 'tis no wonder to find it continued on at the same rate, that other parts of the vow be also violated; and that she observe the negative part no more than the positive, and as little forsake others, as she does heartily cleave to her husband. I fear this is a consequence whereof there are too many sad instances now extant; for though doubtless, there are some Virtues which will hold out against all the temptations their a versions can give, nay which do at last even conquer those a versions, and render their duty as easy as they have kept it safe; yet we find there are but some that do so: that it is no inseparable property of the sex, and therefore it is sure too hazardous an experiment for any of them to venture on.

23. And if they may not upon the more generous motive of Obedience, much less may they upon the worse inducements of Avarice and Ambition; for a woman to make a vow to the man, and yet intend only to marry his fortune, or his title, is the basest insincerity and such as in any other kind of civil contracts, would not only have the infamy but the punishment of a cheat. Nor will it at all secure them, that this is only liable to God's tribunal, for that is not like to make the doom less but more heavy, it being as the Apostle witnesses, a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. Heb. 20. 31. In a word, marriage is God's ordinance, & should be considered as such; not made a stale to any unworthy design. And it may well be presumed one cause why so few matches are happy, that they are not built upon a right foundation. Some are grounded upon wealth, some on beauty, too sandy bottoms God knows to raise any lasting felicity on: whilst in the interim, vertu & piety, the only solid Basis for that superstructure, are scarce ever considered. Thus God is commonly left out of the consultation. The Lawyers are resorted to, to secure the settlements all sorts of Artificers to make up the equipage, but he is neither advised with as to the motives, nor scarce supplicated as to the event of wedding. Indeed tis a deplorable sight to see with what lightness & unconcernedness young people go to that weightiest action of their livs, that a marriage day is but a kind of Bacchanal, a more licensed a vowed revel, when if they duly considered it, 'tis the hinge upon which their future life moves, which turns them over to a happy or miserable being; & therefore ought to be entered upon with the greatest seriousness and devotion. Our Church advises excellently in the preface to matrimony, & I wish they would not only give it the hearing at the time, but make it their study a good while before: yea and the marriage-vow too, which is so strict and awful a bond, that methinks they had need well weigh every branch of it, ere they enter it; and by the ferventest prayers implore that God, who is the witness, to be their assistant too in its performance.

SECT. II. Of Wives.

1. AND now having conducted the virgin to the entrance of another state, I must shift the Scene and attend her thither also. And here she is lanced into a wide sea, that one relation of a wife drawing after it many others: for as she espouses the man s...she does his obligations also; and wherever he by ties of nature or alliance owes a reverence or kindness, she is no less a debtor. Her marriage is an adoption into his family, and therefore she is to every branch of it to pay what their stations there do respectively require: to define which more particularly, would be a work of more length then profit. I shall therefore confine the present consideration to the relation she stands in to her husband, & (what is usually concomitant with that) her children, and her servants, and so shall consider her in the three capacities of a Wife, a Mother, and a Mistress.

2. In that of a Wife her duty has several aspects, •...s it relates, first to his Person, secondly to his Reputation, thirdly to his Fortune. The first debt •...o his person is Love, which we find set as the •...rime Article in the marriage vow; & indeed that •...s the most essential requisite; without this 'tis •...nly a Bargain and Compact, a Tyranny perhaps on the man's part, and a Slavery on the woman's. 'Tis Love only that cements the hearts, and where that union is wanting, 'tis but a shadow, a carcass of marriage. Therefore as it is very necessary to bring some degree of this, to this State; so 'tis no less to maintain and improve it in it. This is it which facilitats all other duties of marriag; makes the yoke sit so lightly, that it rather pleases then galls. It should therefore be the study of Wives to preserve this flame; that like the vestal fire it may never go out: and to that end carefully to guard it from all those things which are naturally apt to extinguish it; of which kind are all frowardness and little perverseness of humor; all sullen and morose behavior, which by taking off from the delight and complacency of conversation, will by degrees wear off the kindness.

3. But of all I know nothing more dangerous then that unhappy passion of Jealousy, which th•... 'tis said to be the child of love, yet like the viper, its birth is the certain destruction of the parent As therefore they must be nicely careful to give their husbands no color, no least unbrage for it▪ so should they be as resolute to resist all that occurs to themselves, be so far from that busy curiosity that industry to find causes of suspicion; that even... where they presented themselves, they should avert the consideration; put the most candid construction upon any doubtful action. And indeed... charity in this instance, has not more of the Dove... than of the Serpent. It is infinitely the wiser... course, both in relation to her present quiet, and her future innocence. The entertaining a jealous fancy, is the admitting the most treacherous the most disturbing inmate in the World, & she opens her breast to a fury that lets it in. 'Tis certainly one of the most enchanting & imaginable, keeps her always in a most restless importunate search after that which she dreads and abhors to find, and makes her equally miserable when she is injured, and when she is not.

4. And as she totally loses her ease, so 'tis odds but she will part also with some degrees of her innocence. Jealousy is commonly attended with a black train; it musters all the forces of our irascible part, to abet its quarrel; Wrath and Anger, Malice and Revenge: and by how much the female impotence to govern those passions is the greater; so much the more dangerous is it to admit that which will so surely set them in an uproar. For if Jealousy be as the wise man says the rage of a man Prov. 6. 32. we may well think it may be the fury the madness of a woman; and indeed all ages have given tragical instances of it, not only in the most indecent fierceness and clamor but in the solemn mischiefs of actual revenges. Nay 'tis to be doubted there have been some whose malice has rebounded, and have ruined themselves in spite; have been adulterous by way of retaliation: and taken more scandalous liberties than those they complained of in their husbands. And when such enormous effects as these are the issues of jealousy; it ought to keep women on the strictest guard against it.

5. But perhaps it may be said that some are not left to their Jealousy and conjectures; but have more demonstrative proofs. In this age 'tis indeed no strange thing for men to publish their sin as Sodom, and the offender does sometimes not discover but boast his crime. In this case I confess 'twill be scarce possible to disbelieve him; but even here a wife has this advantage, that she is out of the pain of Suspence; she knows the utmost, and therefore is now at leisure to convert all that industry which she would have used for the discovery, to fortify herself against a known calamity; which sure she may as well do in this as in any other; a patient Submission being the one Catholicon in all distresses; and as the slightest can overwhelm us if we add our own impatience towards our sinking; so the greatest cannot, if we deny it that aid. They are therefore far in the wrong, who in case of this injury pursue their husbands with virulencies and reproaches. This is as Solomon says Pro. 25. 20. The pouring vinegar upon niter, applying corrosives when balsoms are most needed; whereby they not only increase their own smart, but render the wound incurable. They are not thunders and earthquakes, but soft gentle rains that close the scissures of the ground; and the breaches of Wedlock will never be cemented by storms and loud outcries. Many men have been made worse, but scarce ever any better by it; for guilt covets nothing more than an opportunity of recriminating; and where the husband can accuse the wives bitterness, he thinks he needs no other apology for his own lust.

6. A Wise Dissimulation, or very calm notice is sure the likeliest means of reclaiming, for where men have not wholly put off humanity, there is a native compassion to a meek sufferer. We have naturally some regret to see a Lamb under the knife; whereas the impatient roaring of a swine diverts our pity; so that Patience in this case is as much the interest as duty of a Wife.

7. But there is another instance wherein that vertu has yet a severer trial, and that is when a Wife lies under the causeless jealousies of the husband, (I say causeless, for if they be just 'tis not so much a season for patience, as for repentance and reformation.) This is sure one of the greatest calamities that can befall a virtuous woman, who as she accounts nothing so dear as her loialty and honor; so thinks no infelicity can equal the aspersion of those; especially when 'tis from him, towhom she has been the most solicitous to approve herself. Yet God who permits nothing but what he directs to some wise and gracious end, has an overruling hand in this as well as in all other events of life; and therefore it becomes every woman in that condition, to examine strictly what she has don to provoke so severe a scourge; for though her heart condemn her not of any falseness to her husband, yet probably it may of many disloialties to her God, and then she is humbly to accept even of this traducing of her innocence, as the punishment of her iniquity, and bear it with the same temper wherewith David did the unjust revilings of Shimei 2 Kings 16. 10. Let him curse, for the Lord hath bidden him.

8. And when she hath made this penitent reflection on her real guilts, she may then with more courage encounter those imaginary ones which are charged on her; wherein she is to use all prudent and regular means for her justification, that being a debt she owes to truth, and her own fame; but if after all, the suspicion remains still fixed (as commonly those which are the most unreasonable are the most obstinate) she may still solace herself in her integrity, and God's approbation of it. Nor ought she to think herself desolate, that has her appeal open to heaven. Therefore whilst she can look both inward and upward with comfort, why should she choose to fix her eyes only on the object of her grief; and whilst her own complaint is of defamation, why should she so dishonor God and a good conscience, as to show anything can be more forcible to oppress, then they are to relieve and support? And if she may not indulge to grief, much less may she to anger, and bitterness.

9. Indeed if she consider how painful a passion jealousy is, her husband will more need her pity, who though he be unjust to her, is yet cruel to himself; and as we do not use to hate and malign those Lunatics who in their fits beat their friends, and cut and gash themselves, but rather make it our care to put all harmful engines out of their way; so should the wife not despitefully ruminate upon the injury, but wisely to contrive to avert his temptations to more; by denying herself even the most innocent liberties, if she see they dissatisfy him. I know there have been some of another opinion, and as if they thought jealousy were to be cured by majoration, have in an angry contempt don things to inflame it; put on an unwonted freedom and jollity, to show their husbands how little they had secured themselves by their distrust. But this as it is no Christian, so I conceive it is no prudent expedient; it serves to stengthen not only the husbands suspicion, but his party too, and make many others of his mind; and 'tis a little to be feared, that by using so to brave the Jealousy, they may at last come to verify it. I have been the longer on this theme, because as Jealousy is the most fatal pest of a married life, so I think it more ordinarily occurs among people of quality, and with the worst and most durable effects; yet what ever pretences people may take hence, the marriage vow is too fast a knot to be loosened by fancies and chimeras; let a woman therefore be the person suspecting or suspected, neither will absolve her from that love to her husband she has sworn to pay.

10. But alas what hope is there that these greater temptations shall be resisted, when we see every the slightest disgust is nowadays too strong for the matrimonial love, nay indeed it does of course fall off of itself, which is an event so much expected, that 'tis no wonder to see it expire with the first circuit of the moon; but it is everybody's admiration to see it last one of the sun; and sometimes it vanishes so clearly, as not to leave so much as a shadow behind it, not so much as the formalities of marriage; one bed, one house cannot hold them, as if they had been put together like case-shot in a gun, only that they might the more forcibly scatter several ways. Nay as if this were designed and intended in the first addresses unto marriage; a separate maintenance is of course beforehand contracted for, and becomes as solemn a part of the settlement, as a Jointure is. Plutarch observes of the ancient Romans, that for 230. years after founding of their state, there never was one example of any married couple that separated▪ it is not likely they could have a more binding form of marriage then ours is, the difference must lie between their v•...racity and our falseness.

11. But even amongst those who desert not each other, too many do mutually fall from that entireness and affection which is the soul of marriage; and to help on the declination, there are fashionable Maxims taken up, to make men and their wives the greatest strangers to each other: Thus 'tis pronounced a piece of ill Breeding, a sign of a country Gentleman, to see a man go abroad with his own wife (I suppose those who brought up these rules are not to seek what use to make of them) and were the time of most of the modish couples computed, it would be found they are but few of their waking hours (I might say minutes) together; so, that if nothing else, mere desuetude and intermission of conversation must needs allay, if not quite extinguish their kindness. But I hope there are yet many who do not think the authority of a fashion greater than that of a vow; & such will still think it▪ their duty both to own and cherish that kindness and affection they have so solemnly promise'd.

12. Another debt to the person of a husband is Fidelity: so as she has espoused all his interests, so she is obliged to be true to them, to keep all his secrets, to inform him of his dangers, yea and in a mild and gentle manner to admonish him of his faults. This is the most genuine act of friendship; therefore she who is placed in the nearest and most intimate degree of that relation, must not be wanting in it. She that lies in his bosom should be a kind of second conscience to him, by putting him in mind both of his duty and his aberrations, and as long as she can be but patiently heard 'tis her sin to omit it; 'tis the greatest treachery to his noblest, to his immortal part, and such as the most officious cares of his other interests can never expiate. Nay indeed she is unfaithful to herself in it, there being nothing that does so much secure the happiness of a Wife as the vertu and piety of the husband. Yet, though this is to have her chiefest care, as being his principal interest, she is to neglect none of the inferior, but contribute her utmost to his advantage in all his concerns.

13. Beyond all these the matrimonial fidelity has a special notion as it relates to the Bed; & in that the wise is to be most severely scrupulous, & never to admit so much as a thought or imagination, much less any parly or treaty contrary to her loialty. Tis true wantonness is one of the foulest blots that can stain any of the sex; but 'tis infinitely more odious in the married, it being in them an accumulation of crimes; perjury added to uncleanness; the infamy of their family superstructed upon their own; and accordingly all laws have made a difference in their punishments. Adultery was by God's own award punished with death among the Jews, Levite. 20. 10. And it seems it was so agreeable to natural justice, that divers other nations did the like; and I know no reason, but the difficulty of detection, that should anywhere give it a milder sentence. The son of Sirach has excellently described the several gradations of the guilt Ecclus. 23. 1. which I shall desire the Reader to consult: which who so does must certainly wonder at the Alchimy of this age, that from such a mass of shame and infamy can extract matter of confidence, that those who lie under so many brands and stigmas, are so far from hiding their faces, that none show them with so much boldness; and the assurance of the guilty far exceeds that of the innocent. But impudence is a slender shelter for guilt; and serves rather to betray then hide; so that theyare not able to outface the opinions of men; much less can they the judgments of God; who as He was solemnly invok'd as witness to their vow, so by his omnipresence is against their wills a witness too of its violations.

14. Another duty to the person of the husband is obedience, a word of a very harsh sound in the ears of some wives, but is certainly the duty of all: and that not only by their promise of it, though that were sufficient; but from an original of much older date, it being the mulct that was laid upon the first woman's disobedience to God, that she (and all derived from her) should be subject to the husband; so that the contending for superiority, is anattempt to reverse thatfundamentallaw, which is almost as ancient as the World. But surely God with whom there is no shadow of change, will not make acts of repeal to satisfy the petulancy of a few masterless women. That statute will stillstand in force, and if it cannot awe them into an observance, will not fail to consign them topunishment. And indeed this fault is commonly its own lictor, and does anticipate (though not avert) its final doom. Theimperiousness ofawomandos oftenraise those storms, wherein herself isshipwrack'd. How pleasantly might many women have lived if they had not affected dominion. Nay how much of their will might they have had, if they had not struggled for it. For let a man be of never so gentle a temper (unless his head be softer then his heart) such a usurpation will awake him to assert his right. But if he be of a sour severe nature; if he have as great a desire of rule as she, backed with a much better title, what tempests what Hurricanes must two such opposite winds produce? And at last 'tis commonly the wives lot, after an uncreditable unjust war, to make as disadvantageous a peace; this (like all other ineffective rebellions) serving to straiten her yoke, to turn an ingenuous subjection into a slavish servitude: so that certainly it is not only the virtue, but the wisdom of wives to do that upon duty, which at last they must (with more unsupportable circumstances.) do upon necessity.

15. And as they owe these severals to the person of the husband, so there is also a debt to his reputation. This they are to be extremely tender of, to advance it, by making all that is good in him as conspicuous, as public as they can; setting his worth in the clearest light, but putting his infirmities in the shade; casting a veil upon those to screen them from the eyes of others, nay (as far as is possible) from their own too; there being nothing acquired to the wife by contemplating the husband's weakness, but a temptation of despising him; which though bad enough in itself, is yet rendered worse by that train of mischievous consequences which usually attend it. In case therefore of any notable imperfections in him, her safest way will be to consider them no farther than she can be instrumental to the curing them; but to divert from those, and reflect upon her own▪ which perhaps if impartially weighed, may balance▪ if not overpoise... his. And indeed those wives who are apt to blaze their husband's faults, do show that they have either little adverted to their own, or else find them so great, that they are forced to that art of diversion, and seek in his infamy to drown theirs. But that project is a little unlucky, for nothing does in sober judges create greater prejudice to a woman, than to see her forward in impeaching her husband

16. But besides this immediate tenderness of his reputation, there is another by way of reflection, which consists in a care that she herself do nothing which may redound to his dishonor: there is so strict union between a man and his wife, that the law counts them one person, and consequently they can have no divided interest, so that the misbehavior of the woman reflects ignominiously on the man; it therefore concerns them as well upon their husband's as their own account, to abstain even from all appearance of evil, and provide that themselves be (what Caesar is said to have required of his wife) not only without guilt but without scandal also.

17 Another part of the wife's duty relates to her husband's fortune, the management whereof is not ordinarily the wife's province, but where the husband thinks fit to make it so, she is obliged to administer it with her best care and industry; not by any neglect of hers to give others opportunity of defrauding him, yet on the other side not by an immoderate tenacity or griping, to bring upon him and herself the reproach, and which is worse the curse that attends exaction and oppression. But this is not usually the wife's field of action, though he that shall consider the description which Solomon gives of a virtuous wife Prov. 31. will be apt to think her Province is not so narrow and confined, as the humor of the age would represent it. He tells us that she seeks wool and flax, and works diligently with her hands, that she is like the merchant's ships, and brings her food from far. That she considers a field and buys it, and with the fruit of her hands plants a vineyard, &c. And least this should be imagined to be the character of a mean country Dame, he adds that her household is clothed in scarlet, and that her husband sits among the Elders of the land. It were easy to give instances from history of the advantageous manage and active industry of wives, not only in single persons, but whole Nations. But nothing can be more pregnant, than that among the Romans: in the very height and flourish of the Empire Austus himself scarce wore anything but of the Manufacture of his Wife, his Sister, daughters, and nieces, as Suetonius assures us. Should the gay lilies of our fields, which neither sow nor spin, nor gather into barns be exempted from furnishing others, and left to cloth themselves, tis to be doubted they would reverse our Saviors Parallel of Solomon's glories, and no beggar in all his rags would be arrayed like one of these. Luc. 12. 27.

18. But we will be yet more kind, and impose only negative thrift on the wife, not to wast and embezle her husbands estate, but to confine her expenses within such limits as that can easily admit; a caution which if all women had observed; many noble families had been preserved, of which there now remains no other memorial but that they sell a sacrifice to the profuse vanity of a woman; and I fear this age is like to provide many more such monuments for the next. Our Ladies, as if they emulated she Roman Luxury (which Seneca and Pliny describe with so much indignation) do sometimes wear about them the revenues of a rich family; and those that cannot reach to that, show how much 'tis against their wills they fall lower, by the vast variety and excess of such things as they can possibly compass; so much extravagance not only in their own dress, but that of their houses and apartments, as if their vanity like the Leprosy we read of Lev. 24. had infected the very walls. And indeed 'tis a very spreading fretting one, for the furniture oft consumes the house, and the house consumes the land: so that if some Gentlemen were to calculate their estates, they might reduce all to the inventory of Scopias the Thessalian, who professed his all lay only in such Toies as did him no good. Women are now skillful Chymists, and can quickly turn their husbands earth into Gold: but they pursue the experiment too far, make that Gold too volatile, and let it all vapor away in insignificant (though gaudy) trifles.

19. Nor is it ever like to be otherwise with those that immoderately affect the town, that forge of vanity, which supplies a perpetual spring of new temptations. 'Tis true there are some Ladies who are necessarily engaged to be there: their husbands employments or fortunes have marked that out as their proper station, and where the ground of their stay is their duty, there is more reason to hope it will not betray them to ill, for temptations are most apt to assault stragglers, those that put themselves out of their proper road. And truly I see not who can more properly be said to be so, than those women whose means of subsistence lies in the Country, and yet will spend it no where but at London, which seems to carry something of opposition to God's providence, who surely never caused their lot to fall, as the Psalmist speaks, in a fair ground, in goodly heritages Psalm. 16. with an intent they should never inhabit them. The 12 tribes of Israel had their peculiar Portions in Canaan assigned them by lot Jos. 14. 2. and everyone acquiesced in his part, dwelt in his own inheritance: had they been impatient of living anywhere but in the Metropolis, had they all crowded to Jerusalem, all the rest of the land would have been as desolate before the captivity as it was after; none would have been left but such as Nabuzaradan permitted to stay Jer. 52. 16. some of the poor to dress the vines, and to till the ground. And truly the same is like to be the fate of this nation, if this humor goes on as it has begun; which may in time prove as mischievous to the public as it daily is to private families.

20. But besides this 'tis yet farther to be considered, that where God gives an estate, he as the supreme landlord affixes something of duty, lays a kind of a rent charge upon it, expects it should maintain both hospitality and charity; and sure both these are fittest to be don upon the place whence the ability of them rises. All public taxes use to be levied where the estate lies, and I know not why these which are God's assessments upon it, should not be paid there too. When a Gentleman's land becomes profitable unto him by the sweat and labor of his poor neighbors and tenants, twill be a kind of muzzling of the ox 1. Cor. 9. 9. if they never taste of the fruit of their pains, if they shall never have the refreshment of a good meal, or an alms; which they are not very like to meet with, if all the profits be sent up to maintain an equipage, and keep up a parade in town. But alas 'tis often not only the annual profits that go that way, not only the crop, but the soil too; those luxuries usually pray upon the vitals, eat out the very heart of an estate, and many have stay'd in the Town 'till they have nothing left in the country to retire to.

21. Now where this proceeds from the wife, what account can she give to her husband, whose easiness and indulgence (for that must be supposed in the case) she has so abused? as also to her posterity and family who for her pride must be brought low, reduced to a condition beneath their quality, because she affected to live above it? But she will yet worse answer it to herself, on whom she has brought not only the inconvenience but the guilt. 'Tis sure a lofty mind will feel smart enough of a fall, a diminution, much more an indigence will be sufficiently grievous to a vain and lavish humor; yet here it will farther have an additional sting, from the conscience that she owes it only to her own pride and folly; a most imbittering consideration, and such as advances the affliction beyond that of a more innocent poverty, as much as the pain of an envenom'd arrow exceeds that of another.

22. But the saddest reckoning of all is that which she is to make to God, who has declared he hates robbery though for a burnt offering to himself. How will he then detest this robbery this impoverishing of the husband, when 'tis only to make an oblation to vanity and excess? It should therefore be the care of all wives to keep themselves from a guilt for which God and man, yea & themselves also shall equally accuse them, and to keep their expenses within such limits, that as bees suck but do not violate or deface the flowers, so they as joint proprietaries with the husbands, may enjoy but not devour and destroy his fortune.

23. I have now run through the duties to be perform'd unto the Husband, wherein I have not used the exactness of a casuist in curiously anatomizing every part, and showing all the most minute particulars reducible to each head. I have only drawn out the greater lines, and insisted on those wherein Wives-are most frequently deficient. I shall only add this caution, that whatever is duty to the husband is equally so, be he good or ill, the Apostle commands the subjection & fidelity, even to heathen Husbands, 1 Pet. 3. 12. and 'tis not now their defect, either in Piety or Morality, that can absolve the Wife. For, besides the inconvenience of making her duty precarious & liable to be substracted upon every pretence of demerit, she has by solemn Contract renounced that liberty, & in her Marriage-vow taken him for better for worse; & it is too late after Vows to make enquiry, Prov. 20. 25. to seek to break loose from that bond of her Soul; and how uneasy soever the perverseness of the husband may render it, he cannot thereby mak it less, but more rewardable by God: for what the Apostle speaks in the case of Servants, is no less applicable to this, 1 Pet. 2. 19. for this is than worthy. if for conscience towards God ye endure grief, suffering wrongfully. Whatever duty is performed to Man with aspect on God, he owns as to himself; so that how unworthy soever the husband may be the Wife cannot misplace her observance, whilst she finally terminates it on that infinite Goodness and Majesty to whom no love or obedience can be enough.

24. From this relation of a Wife, there ordinarily springs another, that of a Mother, to which there belongs a distinct duty, which may be branched into many severals: but I shall at present only reduce them to two Heads Love and Care. A Mother is a title of so much tenderness, that we find it borrowed by our common Dialect to express the most exuberant kindness; nay, even in Sacred Style it has the same use, and is often set as the highest example our weakness can comprehend of the Divine Compassions. So that Nature seems sufficiently to have secured the love of Mothers to their Children, without the aid of any positive Law; yet we find this (as other Instincts of Nature) is sometimes violated, and oftener perverted and applied to mistaken purposes: the first is by a defect of Love; the other, by an imprudent excess of it: the defect does, I presume, more rarely occur than the other; yet it doth sometimes happen, and that either from a morose sourness of humor, or else from too vehement an intention on something else.

25. Some Women have such a ruggedness of nature, that they can love nothing; the ugly Passions of Anger and Envy, have, like Pharaoh's lean Kine, eat up the more amiable, of Love and Joy. Plato was wont to advise crabbed austere tempers, to Sacrifice to the Graces; and such as these had need have a great deal of Christian Philosophy, to allay and sweeten their native Bitterness. But there are others that are not void of the affection of Love, but 'tis forestall'd by some other Object, and so diverted from their Children; and 'tis a little to be doubted, those Objects which so divert are none of the best, for the Wisdom of God has disposed all duty into such a Harmony and Consent of Parts, that one interferes not with another. If we love no prohibited thing, all the regular Objects of our kindness will agree well enough, and one need never supplant another. And indeed 'tis oft observable, that those Women who immoderately love their own Pleasures, do least regard their Children; they look on them as Clogs to keep them within doors, and think their adverting to them, will hinder their free range abroad; those are turned off to the care of a Nurse or Maid, whilst perhaps a Dog or a Monkey is thought worthy their own attendance.

26. Plutarch relates it as a Sarcasm of Caesar's to some Foreigners whom he saw (at Rome) strangely fond of such little Animals, that he asked them whether the women in their Country had no children; thereby intimating, how unreasonable it was for those that had, to bestow their Caresses on such Creatures. And surely he would not have given a milder reprimand to some of our Ladies, who not only please, but pride themselves in those little Brutes, show them to all comers, when perhaps you may converse with them divers days, before you shall, by any mention of theirs, know that they have a Child.

27. To this defect of Love, many are apt to impute the Mothers transferring the Nursing her Child to another. I am not forward to pronounce it, being loath to involve so many as I then must in the imputation of unnaturalness; I rather think it is taken up as a piece of State and Greatness; for no other motive, but what is sounded in their Quality, could so universally prevail with all that are of it. But sure this is one of the vain Punctillio's wherewith this Age abounds; for whatever rank the Mother is of, the Child carries proportion to it, and there is the same equality between the greatest Lady and her own Child, as is between the meanest Beggar and hers: though indeed if there were any condescension in it, the aversions of that ought not to outweigh the impulses of Nature, and the many advantages the Child may receive by taking its nourishment whence it derived its substance. And therefore, though I will not be too positive in asserting the necessity, yet I confess, I cannot but look with reverence upon those few Persons of Honor, who have broke through an unreasonable Custom, and preferred the good of their Children before that fantastic privilege of Greatness. And such must in all Justice be acknowledged to have given a much better evidence of their love to their Children, than the others.

28. There is in A. Gellius, in his fourteenth book so fine a Discourse on this subject, where Favori...us the Philosopher is introduced, persuading a Noble Lady, notwithstanding the usual Excuses, to Nurse her Child; that nothing besides the length, could tempt me to omit the transcribing it: unless happily the little success, which a Noble Person of the same Sex here concerned I mean the Countess of Lincoln, in the Ingenious book wrote by her, and called her Nursery, be a sufficient ground of despairing to convince by anything that can be said. However let these delicate ones consider the severe words of the Prophet, Lament. 4. 3. The sea monsters draw out the breast, they give suck to their young ones, the daughter of my people is become cruel like the ostrich in the Wilderness, who is hardened against her young ones, as though they were not hers: her labor is in vain without fear, because God hath deprived her of wisdom, neither hath he imparted to her understanding, Job. 39. 16.

29. But as there may be a fault in the defect, so there may be also in the excess of love. God is the only unlimited object of our love, towards all others 'tis easy to become inordinate, and in no instance more than in this of children. The love of a parent is descending, and all things move most violently downwards, so that whereas that of children to their parents commonly needs a spur, this of the parent often needs a bridle, especially that of the Mother, which (by strength of feminine passion) does usually exceed the love of the Father. Now to regulate this affection, she is to advert to these two rules, first that she hurt not herself by it, and secondly that she hurt not her children: of the first she is in danger if she suffer that human affection to swell beyond its banks, so as to come in any competition with the Divine, this is to make an Idol of her child; for everything is so to us, which rivals the love of God in our hearts, and he who owns the title of a jealous God, may be provoked as well by the bowing our souls to a living image, as the prostration of our bodies to a dead. Accordingly we oft see the effects of his jealousy in this particular, the doting affection of the mother is frequently punish with the untimely death of the Children, or if not with that 'tis many times with a severer scourge: they live (but as it was foretold to Eli▪ 1 Sam. 2. 33.) to grieve her eyes and to consume her heart, to be ruinous to themselves, and afflictions to their friends, and to force their unhappy mothers to that sad acclamation Lu. 23. 29. Blessed are the wombs which bare not

30. And as this proves often true, when the dotage is general upon all the children, so does oftener when 'tis more partial and fixed upon any one; that darling which she makes the only object of her joy usually becomes that of her sorrow. It is an ordinary infirmity in

Parents to heap all their kindness upon one, to the defrauding of the rest, and too many times upon very undue motives: a little excelling in point of beauty turns the scales, when perhaps many more solid excellencies are the counterpoise. And surely this is not only unjust but irrational in the parent: for all peculiarity of favor in a superior, should be dispenc'd either by way of reward or encouragement; and neither of those ends can take place where 'tis only the outward form that is considered, for that cannot be rewardable, to which the party has contributed nothing, and the Psalmist will tell us that tis God▪ that hath made us and not we ourselves Psalm. 100. 2. and as little room is there for the other end, that of encouragement. For as our Savior tells us Ma. 6. none can add a cubit to his statute, nor make one hair white or black: 'tis certain themselves cannot really do either, though by the aid of artificial hypocrisy they frequently appear to do both; but those are arts which neither deserve nor want encouragement, the natural beauty must have its increase from the same source whence it derived its being: there is therefore no reasonable account to be given why a child should be prefer'd for any such exterior excellency.

31. The only justifiable ground of partiality to children is their virtue, for to that their own choice concurs, and so may entitle them to reward, and 'tis also in their power to advance, and so encouragements are not cast away upon them: nay the influences of those may extend farther, and provoke a virtuous emulation in the rest; but then the Mother must so manage it, as to evidence that 'tis no inequallity in her own inclination, but merely the force of the others desert, not the person but the goodness, that biasses her, and when virtue is known to be the only ingratiating quality, they will at once learn the way to become hers & God's favorites. And unless it be upon this one design, 'tis a very unsafe thing for a parent to make any partial discrimination among children, which is sure to tempt the more neglected both to repine at her, and envy her darlings; and oftentimes such seeds of rancor have been by that means sowed in children, as have been hard to eradicate in their riper years. Nor is the mischief less which she does to her fondlings, who besides that they are exposed to the malice of the rest, are usually spoild by it, made insolent & intractable perhaps their whole lives after, for where the mothers affection is unbridled, commonly the child's will is so too, her fondness superseding that discipline and correction, which should, as the wise man speaks; bow down its neck from its youth.

32. And the like may be said where the indulgence is more universal to all the Children, which is in one respect worse then the partial, because it spoils more, not one or two but all the brood. The doting love of a mother blinds her eyes, that she cannot see their faults, manacles her hands that she cannot chastise them, and so their vices are permitted to grow up with themselves: as their joints knit and gather strength, so do their ill habits, 'till at last they are confirmed into an obstinacy; so setting them in a perfect opposition to to that pattern they should imitate, for as Christ's childhood increased in wisdom, and the divine favor, Lu. 2. so do theirs in all those provoking follies, which may avert both the love of God and man. And alas what recompense can the little blandishments and caresses of a mother make her children, for such important such inestimable mischiefs? So that she that will be really kind must temper her indulgence with a prudent severity, or else she eminently violates the second rule, by which she should regulate her love, and does that to her children which Jacob feared from his father Gen. 27. brings a curse upon them and not a blessing.

33. Indeed the best way of approving their love, is by well discharging the other branch of their duty, that of care; without this all the most passionate raptures of kindness, are but an airy apparition, a fantastic scene, and will no more advantage a child, than the whole shambles in picture can feed and nourish it. Now this care is not a temporary, momentary duty, for someone critical instant, but is to attend the child through the several stages of its minority, viz. Infancy, childhood, and youth. The very first part of their infancy is a season only for those cares which concern their bodies, providing for their careful attendance, and all other things conducing to the strengthening their constitutions, and laying a foundation for future health and vigor; which is their interest not only upon a bodily, but upon an intellectual account, the good temperature of the body being a great aid towards the free operations of the mind. And therefore Socrates and other Philosophers much recommend to their disciples the care of health, as that which freed the soul from many incumbrances in its pursuit of knowledge: and it was the comprehensive prayer of the Poet, that the God's would grant a sound mind in a healthful Body.

34. But this health is not always the consequent of a very nice and tender breeding but is very oft overthrown by it; and if Ladies could but find in their hearts to try it, they would, I doubt not, find, that the inuring them to moderate hardships, would much more conduce to the establishing and fortifying their constitutions.

35. Beyond all this, the care for their exterior is soon overtaken by a more important one, that of their interior, in the timing of which there seems to be a very common mistake in the World. We look upon the seven Years or infancy, as the life merely of an Animal, to be spent only in the Entertainments of sense; and as we use not to yoke Calves, or back young Colts, so we think our children are for a while to be left at the same liberty; to have no restraint put on any of their Passions. Nay many times we excite & foment them, teach Children to be angry and envious, proud and sullen, as if we feared their Natural Propensions to all these were too faint, and wanted the help of Institutions. But surely this is a great and pernicious error, and this supposing Children to be so long Brutes, is the way to make them so longer. The Patrons of Atheism make it a most constant Topic in the disparagement of Religion, that 'tis owed to the prejudices infused in the first infancy: 'twere to be wisht, that this Objection might so far be complied with, that the fear of God, the love of Virtue, and hatred of Vice, might have the first possession of the Soul; and they be made to moderate their Passions, as soon as they are in a capacity to have them excited and engaged.

36. And truly, if we will observe it, we may see very early dawnings of reason in Infants, which would sooner come to a brightness, if we would betimes set to the scattering of those Passions which eclipse and darken it. A Child will quickly be taught to know what pleases or displeases a Parent, and by a very little taste of reward or punishment, will learn to do the one, and avoid the other: and when this is done, the Parent has gained the fundamental Point, That of obedience; and may superstruct on it what she pleases, & then 'tis her fault if the Child be not by easy and insensible degrees molded into a right form. 'Tis at first all one to the Child, whether he name God in an Oath or in his Prayers; but a Mother by punishing the one, and rewarding the other, will quickly bring him to know there is a difference, and so proportionably in other instances. As to the way of discipline, it may not be amiss to observe, that when there is occasion for severity, 'tis better to awe by actual punishment than terror, and never to make use of infinite and invisible affrightments, the beloved methods of Nurses and Servants, such as are the menacing of Sprights and Momo's, and leaving in the dark; that frequently make dastardly & timorous impressions, which a long Age scarcely wears off.

37. A sober sense of things, is to be impressed by treatable means, and this will be done with most ease, both to the Parent and Child, the sooner it is set upon. The will of a tender Infant, is like its Limbs, supple and pliant, but time confirms it, and custom hardens it; so 'tis a cruel Indulgence to the poor Creature, to let it contract such habits, which must cost him so dear the breaking; or dearer, if never broken. And if this early care be taken of the Infancy, 'twill much ease the next part, that of the Childhood; for where the Iron sinew in the neck is broken, where the native stubbornness is subdued so early, the yoke will sit easy, all succeeding parts of discipline will come with more facility and profit. The care proper to this Age, is, the instructing in all parts of useful Knowledge, of which, as the Divine for the excellency both of its nature and its end, must be first ranked, so should it be first and most industriously cultivated, and by all endearing methods impressed, not only on the understanding, but the heart. Piety and Virtue should be proposed the most amiable, as well as necessary things, and they would be invited not only to know, but love them.

38. This part of Learning is equally competent to both Sexes, and therefore, when the Sons are removed from under the Mothers tuition, and sent to more public places of erudition, her Province is still the same as to her Daughter▪ to whom she should not only Preach, but exemplify in her own practice, no Precepts penetrating so much into Youth, as those that are so enforced. And in order to this, I should commend to Mothers, the being as much with them as they can, and taking the personal inspection of them; not to turn them off wholly to Servants, nor yet Governesses, but frequently themselves to examine how they proceed in the speculative part of Knowledge, and no less frequently exhort them to the practice.

39. Marcus Cato would not let his Son learn of his Slave, as disdainful a Child should owe so considerable a benefit to so servile a person; and if he thought the mere teaching of Grammar, too great a charge for such a one, surely the whole Institution of Youth is a much greater, it being that on which, not only a few outward Accomplishments, but even their Eternity depends. The great Cornelia, Mother of the Gracchi, and Aurelia the Mother of Augustus, thought it worth their pains to be Governesses. And the truth is, the Soul of a Child is a little too precious a Trust to commit wholly to the diligence & care of a mercenary servant; or if they happen not to want those Qualifications, yet 'tis very possible they may Prudence, of which there is no small degree requisite to the instructing of Youth, too great a remissness or severity being equally destructive in that affair. And indeed, besides this immediate, there are some other collateral Benefits consequent to the Mothers performing that Office, 'twill bring her and her Children into an intimacy and conversation, give her an acquaintance with their several Capacities and Humors; for want of which, many Parents have erred in their Conduct, one sort of Treatment being not fit for all Children; and the distinguishing that depending wholly on their discerning their particular Tempers, which cannot well be don without-some converse with them.

40. Besides by this they will be witnesses how they dispose their time, that they neither lose it by doing nothing, nor yet mis-employ it by doing ill. And indeed there is scarce any part of the parents care more important then this, idleness being no farther removed from vice, then a cause is from its immediate effect. Therefore if children be permitted to trifle away their time, they will soon learn to trifle away their innocence also: so that 'tis highly necessary that they be provided of a succession of employments, that by the variety they may be insensibly drawn on: nay methinks, it might verywell be contrived that their recreations might sometimes consist of such ingenious exercises, that they may at once both play and learn.

41. There is yet another good effect of the mothers presence with the children (which is perhaps no less material then any of the former) 'tis, that by this associating them with herself, she prevents the danger of worse society. Children if the parents allow them not their company, are necessarily cast upon that of servants, than which there is scarce a greater danger that attends youth; for besides that that low sort of converse debases their minds, makes them mean and sordid, it often corrupts their manners too; children usually not receiving more pestilent infusions from any then such. Servants that desire to ingratiate themselves, and having no laudable quality whereby to do it, must first endeavor to ingratiate vice to them, and then by their officious ministries in that, have a ready way of introducing themselves into favor. Perhaps this will be thought to concern only the masculin part of children, and that the female who are commonly in a distinct apartment, and converse only with their own sex, are more secure. But I would not advise mothers to depend too much on that, for they are no surer that their daughters shall not converse with men, nay men of the meaner sort too, then that their maids and attendants shall not do so; and when 'tis considered, how apt those are to entertain, if not to invite amours, 'tis not very probable the rooms where they quarter shall be inaccessible to those they affect. And it were much safer for children to be in the most public concourse of m...n, then to be witnesses and observers of the private intrigues of such lovers; the memories of youth are very tenacious, & if they once be tainted with any indecent thing will be apt to recollect it, 'till at last perhaps they come to transcribe it. 'Tis therefore in this respect a very useful part of the Mothers care, to make herself company to her daughters, to prevent the dangers of a more unequal and infectious converse.

42. But if this be useful in childhood, 'tis no less then necessary in the next period of their time, when they arrive near the growth and age of women: then indeed the mother should not only make them her companions, but her friends, allow them such a kind, yet modest, freedom, that they may have a complacence in her company, and not be tempted to seek it among their inferiors; that the belief of her kindness may supplant the pretensions of those mean... sycophants, who by little flatteries endeavor to seru themselves into their good opinion, & become their confidants; then which there is nothing more mischievous, those private caballs that are held with such, serving only to render them mutinous against their parents: these family incendiaries like those in the state and church, still inculcating the one grand principle of Liberty, a word so charming to our depraved nature, and especially to youth, that they should not be trusted with such Lectures. Besides those intimacies are often introductions to worse; many scandalous amours and unequal matches having had their rise from them. It should therefore be the business of Mothers to prevent all such pernicious leagues, by preingaging them in more safe familiarities, either with herself, or some other, of whose virtue she has reason to be confident.

43. But the most infallible security against this & all other mischiefs is the bringing them into an intimacy and conversation with their maker, by fixing a true sense of Religion in their hearts, if that can be effectually done, it will supersede all other expedients. She that duly considers she is always in God's presence, will want no other inspector; nor will she much need monitors, who attend to the advices of her own conscience. Neither will it only tend to the securing her innocence but her reputation too; it being one part of the Christian law to abstain from all appearance of evil 1. Thess. 22. to do things that are of good report Phil. 4. 8. so that piety is the  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  complete armor to defend both their virtue and fame. And 'tis extremely necessary they should be furnished with it, at this Age especially, when they do at first enter into the World, which we may well look on as a taking the Field, considering how many assaults they are there like to meet with; and if they go without this Armature, they may, none knows how soon, be incurably wounded, of which there want not many sad instances, some whereof might probably have been prevented, had the Parent taken care to have better fortified them.

44. And indeed 'tis not a little sad to see how much this their most important concern is neglected. Many mothers who are nicely curious in other parts of their daughters breeding, are utterly inconsiderate of this; they must have all civil Accomplishments, but no Christian. Those are excluded out of the scheme of Education, & by that means lie under the prejudice of being not only unnecessary, but ungentile, below the regard of Persons of Quality. 'Tis much to be feared, that this neglect toward their children, is founded in a previous contempt of Piety in themselves, yet I suppose 'tis often increased by a little Vanity they have of seeing them excel in some of those exterior qualities, which may recommend them to the humor of the World upon the improving whereof they are so intent, that more material things are overlookt; and when those are acquired, the pride of showing them betrays them to other inconveniences. The mother oft not only permits, but incites the daughter to the opportunities of boasting her excellencies sends her so oft abroad on that design, that at last perhaps she cannot when she would keep her at home, as I believe too many have found experimentally true. In a word, this Interval between Childhood & Majority, is the most Critical point of a Woman's Life, and therefore should be the most nicely and warily attended; and a mother had need summon not only all her care and diligence, but her prudence too, well to discharge this part of her Obligation.

45. I shall not insist more minutely upon Particulars: I have in the former Section spoken somewhat of what 'tis fit these young Virgins should do and avoid, and whatever by that, or by anymore exact rule appears their interest or duty; 'tis the Mothers to see it be not neglected by them: but where Kindness alone will not prevail to employ their authority too, and by a discreet mixture of each, secure their observance by both the tenures of Love and Reverence. Yet I shall a little reflect upon one particular I mentioned before I mean that of Marrying where they have aversion, which though I there charged as the crime of the Daughter▪ yet I must here say the Original, and more inexcusable guilt is usually in the Parents, who are sometimes such Idolaters to Wealth and Honor, that they Sacrifice their Children to them; a more barbarous Immolation then that to Moloch; for though that were very inhumane, yet it had this alleviation, that the pain was short: but a loathed Bed is at once an acute and a lingering Torment, nay, not only so, but a temptation too; so that 'tis a Tyranny of a most unlimited kind, extends its Effects even to Eternity; and sure that Mother must have very petrified Bowels, have lost all Natural Compassion, that can so impose on her Child.

46. I shall add no more concerning this relation of a Mother, but only one short advice, That those who groan under the frustration of their hopes, whose Children by any scandalous misbehavior become Objects of their shame and grief, would soberly consider, whether it have not been some way owing to themselves, either by neglect in their Education, or by their own ill Example: 'Tis usually one, and sometimes both. They that upon recollection can assure themselves 'tis neither, may bear the Affliction with much the greater cheerfulness; but they that cannot, I am sure ought to bear it with much the more patience & submission, take it as God's Lecture of Repentance, and look on their Children's faults as the product of their own. And because Satisfaction is an indispensable part of Repentance, they are with their utmost industry to endeavor the repairing those ruins they have made, by recalling those to Virtue, who by their means have strayed from it. 'Tis true, the errors of Education, like a subtle Poison, do so mix with the Blood, so incorporate into the Humors and Manners, that twill be very difficult to allay their Effects; and therefore the less they are themselves able to do towards it, the more earnestly they must importune a Higher Power. He who divided the Light from the Darkness, can separate the Effects from the Causes; and as he restrained the natural property of Fire, in the case of the three Children, Dan. 3. so He only can rescu their children from that destruction to which their negligence has exposed them. But as to the influence their example has had, they may do something towards the redress of that, by setting them a new Copy, making their own change so visible, so remarkable, that they may have the very same means of reclaiming, which there was of seducing them. And this is a piece of Justice, which seems to call aloud upon many Mothers. The irregularities of Youth could hardly have grown to the present height, had they not received warmth and shelter from the practice of their Elders, which does at once give encouragement & take of restraints, the Mother loses not only her Authority, but her confidence to admonish or reprove. With what face can she require that strict and severe modesty of a young Girl, which she who should be a Matron will not practice? or tie up the giddy wandering humor of Youth, within those bounds she thinks too strait for her own? and how ready a retortion will even Scripture itself afford for such an Imposer? Thou that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Rom. 2. 21. Let it therefore be the care of all Mothers to live a perpetual Lecture to their Children, so to exemplify to them all Virtu and Piety, that they may contribute something to their Spiritual, as well as their natural life, that however they may at least deliver their own souls, and not have their children's guilt recoil upon them as the unhappy originals of it.

47. The last relation of a married woman is that of a Mistress, the inspection of the family being usually her Province; and though she be not supreme •...here, yet she is to improve her delegated authority to the advantage of all under it; and her •...nore constant residence gives her more opportunities of it, then the frequent avocations of the husband will perhaps allow him. St. Paul sets it as the calling, and the indispensable duty of the Married women, that they guide the house, 1 Tim. 5. 18. not thinking it a point of greatness to remit the manage of all domestic concerns to a mercenary house-keeper. And indeed since it has been a fashionable thing for the Master to resign up his concerns to the steward, and the Lady hers to the Governant, it has gone ill with most great Families, whilst these Officers serve themselves instead of those who employ them, raise fortunes on their Patrons ruins, and divide the spoil of the family, the house-keeper pilfering within doors, and the Bailiff plundering without.

48. Now to the well guiding of the house by the mistress of it, I know no better or more comprehensive rule, then for her to endeavor to make all that are hers to be God's servants also; this will secure her of all those intermedial qualifications in them in which her secular interest is concerned, their own consciences being the best spy she can set upon them, as to their truth and fidelity, and the best spur also to diligence and industry. But to the making them such, there will need first instruction, and secondly discipline. It is a necessary part of the rulers care to provide that none in their family should want means of necessary instruction. I do not say that the Mistress should set up for a catechist, or preacher; but that they take order they should be taught by those who are qualified for the employment. And that their furnishing them with knowledge, may not serve only to help them to a greater number of stripes, Luk. 12. 47. they are to give them the opportunities of consecrating it to prayer & devotion, to that end to have public divine offices in the family; and that not by starts or accidents (when a devouter guest is to be entertained, and laid by when a profane) but daily and regularly, that the hours of prayers may be fixed and constant as those of meals, and (if it may possibly be) as much frequented; however that toward it she give both precept and example.

49. A Christian family should be the Epitome of a Church; but alas how many among us lie under a perpetual Interdict, & yet not from the usurpation of any foreign power, but from the irreligion of the domestic. One may go into divers great families, and after some stay there, not be able to say that the name of God was mentioned to any other purpose than that of blasphemy and execration, nor a text of scripture unless in burlesque & profane Drolery. And sure we need not wonder at the universal complaint that is now made of ill servants, when we reflect upon this ill government of families. They that are suffered wholly to forget their duties toward God, will not always remember it towards man. Servants are not such Philosophers that upon the bare strength of a few moral instincts they will be virtuous, & if by a customary neglect of all things sacred, they are once taught to look at nothing beyond this world, they will often find temptation enough here to discard their honesty, as the most unthriving trade. And indeed when the awe of religion is quite taken off from the vulgar, there will scarce anything else be found to keep them within any tolerable bounds; so that 'tis no less impolitic then profane to slacken that reins.

50. But it is not only the interest, but the duty of all that have families, to keep up the esteem and practice of Religion in them. 'Twas one of the greatest endearments of Abraham to God, that he would command his household to keep the way of the Lord Gen. 18. 19. And Joshua undertakes no less for the piety of his household then himself, as for me and my house we will serve the Lord Jos. 24 <◇> And sure 'tis but reasonable, that where we ourselves owe an homage, we should make all our dependents acknowledge the same. Besides, it is a justice in respect of them; for where we entertain a servant, we take the whole person into our care and protection, and are salse to that undertaking if we suffer his soul the most precious part of him to perish; and God who keeps account even of his meanest creatures, will not patiently resent such a neglect of those who bear his own Image, and were ransomed with as great a price as their Masters were, for there is no respect of persons with God Eph. 6. 6.

51. But when Piety is planted in a family, 'twill soon wither, if it be not kept in vigor by Discipline: nay indeed, to have servants seemingly devout in the oratory, and yet really licentious out of it, is but to convert ones house into a Theater, have a play of religion, and keep a set of actors only to personate and represent it. 'Tis therefore necessary to inquire how they behave themselves when they are off the stage, whether those hands which they elevate in prayer, are at other times industriously appli'd to work; or those mouths wherewith they there bless God, are not else where filled with oaths and curses, scurrilities and revilings; in a word, whether that form of Godliness be not designed in commutation for sobriety and honesty. Indeed the governors of families ought to make a strict inspection into the manners, of their servants, & where they find them good to affix some special mark of favor, by which they may both be encouraged to persevere and others to begin; but wher they discern them vicious there as eminently to discountenance, severely to admonish them, and use all fit means for their reclaiming, and when that seems hopeless, to dismiss them that they may not infect the rest. A little leaven saith the Apostle leaveneth the whole lump, Gal. 5. 9. and one ill servant (like a perished tooth) will be apt to corrupt his fellows. 'Tis therefore the same in families that it is in more public communities, where severity to the ill is mercy and protection to the rest; and were houses thus early weeded of all idle and vicious persons, they would not be so overgrown, nor degenerate into such rude wildernesses, as many (nay I fear most) great families now are.

52. But as servants are not to be tolerated in the neglect of their duty, so neither are they to be defeated of any of their dues. Masters are to give to their servants that which is just and equal, Col. 4. 1. And sure, 'tis but just and equal that they who are rational creatures should not be treated with the rigor or contempt of brutes: a sufficient & decent provision, both in sickness and in health, is a just debt to them, besides an exact performance of those particular contracts upon which they were entertained. Laban had so much of natural justice, that he would not take the advantage of Jacob's relation to him, to make him serve him gratis, Because thou art my brother shouldst thou therefore serve me for naught? tell me therefore what shall thy wages be? Gen. 29, 15. But alas now a days where servants have been told, nay expressly artiled for their wages, 'tis with many no easy thing to get it: nay 'tis thought by some Masters an insolence, a piece of ill manners to demand it; and when they have worn out a servant, they either pay him not at all, or with the same protraction and regret, which they do their Tailors for the old clothes they have cast off. I fear there are many instances of this, especially among great persons, it being a received mode with too many of them to pay no debts to those who are too mean to contest with them. But however they may ruffle it out with men, it will one day arraign them before God as most injurious oppressors; there being no crime of that kind more frequently or severely branded in Scripture, then this of detention of the wages of the servant and hireling. Besides, this examples of injustice, wherein the servant is passive, is often transcribed by him in acts of fraud and deceit, and he is apt to think it but an equal retaliation, to break his trust where the Master breaks his covenant, and when he once attempts to be his own pay-master, 'tis not to be doubted but he will allow himself large use▪ for the forbearance of his wages; so that the course is no less unprofitable to the Master then unjust and dishonorable.

53. I am not sure 'tis alwaie's in the wives power to prevent this or any of the former faults
 ⟨◇⟩ the menage of the family. For her authority being but subordinate, if the husband who is supreme suspend her power, he does by that vacating her rule take off the duty consequent to it; so that what I have said can be obligatory to none that are so impeded: but to those who either can do it themselves, or persuade their husbands to it, the omission will be their sin, all the profaneness and disorder of the family will be charged upon their account, if it came by their default.

54. And this methinks is a consideration that may much mortify one usual piece of vanity, I mean that of a multitude of servants. We shall all of us find burden enough of our own personal miscarriages, and need not contrive to fetch in more weight from others. And in families 'tis generally observable, that the bigger they are the worse; vice gains boldness by numbers, is hatched up by the warmth of a full society; and we daily see people venture upon those enormities in consort and in a crowd. which they would not dare did they think they stood single. Besides the wider the province is, the more difficult it is well to administer it; and in a heap of servants many faults will scape undiscern'd, especially, considering the common confederacy there is usually amongst them, for the eluding of discipline: so that what the wiseman speaks of not desiring a multitude of unprofitable children, I think may very well be appli'd to servants, whose unprofitableness usually increases together with their number. I have now run through these several obligations consequent to the married state, wherein even upon this very cursory view, there appears so many particulars, that if they were all duly attended, Ladies need not be much at a loss how to entertain themselves; nor run abroad in a Romantic quest after foreign divertisements, when they, have such variety of engagements at home.

SECT. III. Of Widows.

1. THE next state which can succeed to that of Marriage is Widowhood, which though it supersedes those duties which were terminated merely in the person of the husband, yet it endears those which may be paid to his ashes. Love is strong as death, Cant. 8. 6. and therefore when it is pure and genuine cannot be extinguished by it, but burns like the funeral lamps of old, even in vaults and charnel houses, the conjugal love transplanted into the grave (as into a finer mould) improves into piety, and lays a kind of sacred obligation upon the widow to perform all offices of respect and kindness which his Remains are capable of.

2. Now those Remains are of three sorts, his body his memory, and his children. The most proper expression of her love to the first, is in giving it an honorable Enterrment; I mean not such as may vye with the Poland extravagance (of which 'tis observed that two or three near succeeding funeralls ruin the family) but prudently proportioned to his quality & fortune, so that her zeal to his Corps may not injure a nobler relique of him, his Children. And this decency is a much better instance of her kindness, then all those Tragical Furies wherewith some. Women seem transported towards their dead Husbands, those frantic Embraces and caresses of a Carcass, which betray a little too much the sensuality of their Love. And it is something observable, that those vehement Passions quickly exhaust themselves, and by a kind of Sympathetic Efficacy as the Body (on which their asseccion was fixed) moulders, so does that also, nay often it attends not those lesurely degrees of dissolution, but by a more precipitate motion seems rather to vanish then consume.

3. The more valuable Kindness therefore, is that to his Memory, endeavoring to embalm that, keep it from perishing; and by this innocent Magic (as the Egyptians were wont by a more guilty) she may converse with the dead, represent him so to her own thoughts, that his life may still be repeated to her: and as in a broken Mirror the refraction multiplies the Images, so by his dissolution every hour presents distinct Ideas of him; so that she sees him the oftener, for his being hid from her eyes But as they use not to Embalm without Odors, so she is not only to preserve, but perfume his Memory, render it as fragrant as she can; not only to herself but others; by reviving the remembrance of whatever was praise-worthy in him, vindicating him from all calumnies and false accusations, and stifling (or allaying) even true ones as much as she can. And indeed, a widow can no way better provide for her own honor, then by this tenderness of her Husbands.

4. Yet there is another expression of it, inferior to none of the former, and that is, the setting such a valu upon her relation to him, as to do nothing unworthy of it. 'Twas the dying charge of Augustus to his Wife Livia, Behave thysself well, and remember our Marriage. And she who has been Wife to a Person of Honor, must so remember it as not to do anything below herself, or which he (could he have foreseen it) should justly have been ashamed of.

5. The last Tribute she can pay him is in his children. These he leaves as his Proxies to receive the kindness of which himself is uncapable; so that the Children of a Widow may claim a double portion of the Mothers love, one upon their Native right, as hers; the other, as a bequest in right of their dead Father. And indeed, since she is to supply the place of both Parents, 'tis but necessary she should put on the affections of both, and to the tenderness of a Mother, add the care and conduct of a Father. First, in a sedulous care of their Education: and next, in the prudent management of their Fortune...e; an order that is sometimes unhappily inverted, and Mothers are so concerned to have the Estate prosper in their tuition, that the Children cannot; whilst (by an unseasonable frugality) to save a little expense, they deny them the advantages of an Ingenious and Gentile Breeding, swell their Estates perhaps to a vast bulk, but so contract and narrow their minds, that they know not how to dispose them to any real benefit of themselves or others. And this is one of the most pernicious Parsimonies imaginable, a Mother by this seems to adopt the Fortune, and abdicate the Child, who is only made the Beast to bear those loads of Wealth she will lay on, and which she evidently owns as the greatest Treasure, since in tenderness to that she neglects him.

6. Yet sometimes the same Effect springs from another Cause, and Children are ill bred, not because the Mother grudges the charge, but out of a Feminine fondness, which permits her not to part with them to the proper places for their education; like Jacob to Benjamin, her Soul is so bound up in them, that she cannot lend them a while even to their own most necessary concerns; and this, though not so ignoble a motive as the other, is of no less mischief, at least to her Sons, who being by it confined to home, are consequently condemned to be poison'd (if with nothing else, yet) with the flatteries of Servants and Tenants, who think those the best expedient to secure their own station. And with these the young Master or Landlord is so blown up, that as if his Manors were the confines of the World, he can look at nothing beyond them; so that when at last he breaks loose from his Mothers arms, and comes abroad, he expects scarce to find his Equals, much less his Betters; thinks he is still to receive the same fawning Adorations which he was used to at home: and being possessed with this insolent expectation, he will scarce be undeceived, but at the price of many Affronts, nay, perhaps he may buy his experience with the loss of his life; by his ill manners draw on a Quarrel, wherein he finally perishes. That this is no impossible Supposition, some unhappy Mothers have found to their unspeakable affliction.

7. 'Tis not to be denied, but there are also dangers consequent to the breeding Children abroad, Vice having insinuated itself even into the places of Erudition, and having not only as many, but the very same Academies with Vertu & Learning; so that the extreme depravation of the times new states the Question, and we are not to consider which is best, but which is the least ill disposure of Children. And in that competition sure the home Education will be cast; for there they may suck in all the Venom, and nothing of the Antidote; they will not only be taught base things, but (as I before observed) by the basest Tutors, such as will add all the most sordid circumstances to the improving of a Crime. Whereas abroad they are first not like to meet with any whose interest is so much to make them Vicious: And secondly, they may (as ill as the world is) meet with many who may give them both Precepts & Examples of a better kind. Besides, the Discipline used in those Communities makes them know themselves; and the various sorts of Learning they may acquire, will not only prove useful diversion (the want of which is the great spring of mischief) but will, if rightly applied, furnish them with Ingenious & Virtuous principles, such as may set them above all vile & ignoble practices. So that there seems a conspiracy of motives to wrest the child from the reluctant mother, & to persuade her for a while to deny herself that desire of her eyes, that so he may at last answer the more rational desire of her heart.

8. As to the other part of her obligation, the managing of their fortune, there is the same rule for her as for all other persons that have a Trust, viz. to do as for themselves; that is, with the same care and diligence (if not a greater) as in her own peculiar concern. I do not say that she shall confound the property, and make it indeed her own by applying it to her particular use. A thing I fear which is too often don, especially by the gayer sort of widows, who to keep up their own equipage, do sometimes encroach upon their sons peculiar, & I wish even that (though bad enough) were the only case wherein it were don. But 'tis sometimes to make her a better prize to a second husband: she goes into another family, and as if she were a Colony sent out by her son, he must pay for the planting her there; indeed the oft repeating this injury, has advancit it now into a custom, and the management of the minors estate is reckoned on as part of the widows fortune. But I confess I see not what there is in the title of a mother, that can legitimate her defrauding her child; it rather envenoms the crime and adds unnaturalness to deceit. Besides 'tis a preposterous sort of guilt. Orphans and Widows are in Scripture linkit together as objects of God's and good men's pity, and of ill men's oppression, and how ill alas does civil war look among fellow sufferers; the Widow to injure the orphan is like that uncouth oppression Solomon speaks of Prov. 28. 3. A poor man that oppresseth the poor, is like a sweeping rain which leaveth no food. Such kind of rapins are as excessive in their degree as prodigious in their kind, and I believe there are many instances of sons, who have suffered more by the guardianship of their Mothers, then they could probably have don by the outrage of Strangers.

9. How well such Mothers answer their obligations to their dead Husbands, I must leave it to their own consciences to discuss: I shall only offer them these steps of gradation by which to proceed. First, that injustice of any sort is a great sin; secondly that when 'tis in a matter of trust tis complicated with treachery also, thirdly that of all trusts those to the dead have always been esteemed the most sacred: if they can find any allay to these by the two remaining circumstances, that tis the trust of a husband, and the interest of a child, I shall confess them very subtle casuists.

10. I have hitherto spoke of what the widow owes to her dead husband; but there is also somewhat of peculiar obligation in relation to herself. God who has pla•...d us in this World to pursue the interests of a better, directs all the signal acts of his providence to that end, and intends we should so interpret them. So that every great change that occurs, is design•...d either to recall us from a wrong way, or to quicken our pace in the right, and a widow may more then conjecture, that when God takes away the mate of her bosom, reduces her to a solitude, he does by it sound a retreat from the lighter jollities and gaities of the world. And as in compliance with civil custom she immures herself, sits in darkness for a while; so she should put on a more retired temper of mind, a more strict and severe behavior, and that not to be cast off with her veil, but to be the constant dress of her widowhood. Indeed that state as it requires a great sobriety and piety, so it affords many advantages towards it: the Apostle tells us, that she who is married careth for the things of the World how she may please her husband 1 Cor 7. 34. There are many things which are but the due compliances of a wife, which yet are great avocations, & interrupters of a strict devotion; when she is manumitted, from that subjection, when she has less of Martha's care of serving, she is then at liberty to chose Mary's part, Luk. 10. 42. She has her time and her fortune at her own command, and consequently may much more abound in the works both of piety and charity. We find God himself retrench the wive's power of binding her own soul Num. 30. Her vows were totally insignificant without her husbands confirmation; but the widow might devote herself to what degree she pleased, her piety has no restraint from any other inconsistent obligation, but may swell as high as it can. Those hours which were before her husbands right seem now to devolve on God the grand proprietor of our time: that discourse and free converse wherewith she entertained him, she may now convert into colloquies and spiritual intercourse with her maker; and that love which was only human before, by the change of its object acquires a sublimity, is exalted into divine; from loial duty and conjugal affection becomes the eternal work and happiness of Angels, the ardor of a Cherubim. Thus may she in a •...gher sense verify Samson's riddle, Judge. 14. fetch honey out of a carcass, make her husbands Ashes (like those of the heifer under the law, Heb. 9. 13.) her Purification; his corruption may help to put on incorruption, and her loss of a temporary comfort may instate her in an eternal.

11. And as herself so her fortune may also be consecrated; and indeed if she be, that will also If she have made an escape out of Egypt, there shall not a hoof be left behind her, Exod. 10. 26. No part of her possessions will be assigned to vanity and exccss. She who hath really devoted herself to Piety, fasted and prayed with Anna Luk. 2. 37. will also be full of good works & alms-deeds with Tabitha, Act. 9. 36. Thus she may be a mother when she ceases to bear; and though she no more increase one family, she may support many; and certainly the fertility of the womb, is not so valuable as this of the bowels. Fruitfulness can be but a happiness, Compassion is a virtue. Nay indeed 'tis a greater and more certain happiness; a child is not brought forth but with pangs & anguish, but a work of mercy is produced not only with ease, but delight. Besides, she that bears a Child, knows not whether it may prove a Blessing or a curse; but Charity gives certain title to a Blessing, and engages the most solvent Paymaster, even God himself, who owns all such disbursments as a loan to him. He that hath pity upon the poor, lendeth unto the Lord: and that which he hath given will he pay him again, Prov. 19. 17.

12. There was in the Primitive Times an Ecclesiastical Order of Widows, which St. Paul mentions 1 Tim. 5. whose whole Ministry was devoted to Charity. They were indeed of the poorer sort, fit rather to receive then give Alms; yet the less they could do with their Purses, the more was required of their Persons, the humbler offices of washing the Saints feet, the careful task of bringing up children, and a diligent attendance on every good work. And sure there is parity of Reason, that those who upon the score of their Wealth, exemt themselves from those Laborious Services, should commute for it by more Liberal Alms. In the warmth and zeal of Christianity, Women of the highest Quality performed both sorts of Charity, forgot their Greatness in their condescensions, yet assumed it again in their bounty; founded Hospitals, and yet with a labor of love, as the Apostle stiles it, Heb. 6. 10. disdain'd not sometimes to serve in them. But these are Examples not like to be transcribed in our days, Greatness is now grown to such an unweildiness, that it cannot stoop though to the most Christian Offices, and yet can as little soar up in any Munificent Charities: it stands like Nebuchadnezzar's Golden Image, a vast Bulk only to be adored.

13. Now certainly, if any Women be qualified to avert this reproach, it must be the Dowagers of great Families and Fortunes, they have none to control their Visits to the sick and afflicted, or to resent a disparagement from their humility, neither have they an account to give of their Possessions to any but God and themselves; to him sure they can bring none so like to procure them the Eulogy of well don thou good and faithful servant, Matth. 25. 21. as a Catalogue of their Alms. Nor indeed can they any other way dispose their Fortune so much to their own contentment; they may indeed cloy and satiate their senses, make provision for the flesh; but that no way satisfies their reason, much less their Conscience. The Soul, which is the superior part; is quite left out in that distribution, nothing is communicated to it but the guilt of those dear bought Excesses. The only way it has to be a sharer in their Wealth, is by a charitable dispensing. The Poor are its Proxies as well as God's, and though in all other respects we may say to the Soul, as the Psalmist does to God, Ps. 16. 2. my goods extend not to thee: yet by this way, it becomes not only a partaker, but the chief proprietor, and all is laid out for its use. The harboring an outcast, builds it an everlasting habitation, Lu. 16. 9. The clothing the naked, arrays it in purewhite linen, Rev. 19. 8. and the feeding the hungry, makes it a guest at the supper of the Lamb. v. 8. nay, it gains not only an indefeisible title to these happy Reversions, but it has a great deal in present possession, a huge rational Complacency in the right applying of Wealth, & doing that with it for which 'twas designed; yet more, it gives a sensitive delight, nothing being more agreeable to human nature, then the doing good to its own kind. A seasonable Alms leaves a greater exultation & transport in the Giver, then it can ordinarily raise in the Receiver; so exemplifying the Maxim of our Blessed Lord, that it is a more blessed thing to give then to receive, Act. 20. 35. This indeed is a way to elude the severe denuntiation of the Apostle, 1 Tim. 5. 6. A widow that liveth in this pleasure, is not dead whilst she liveth; but on the contrary, shall live when she dies; when she resigns her Breath, shall improve her being; the Prayers of the Poor, like a benign gale, shall assist her flight to the Region of Bliss; and she who has here cherished the afflicted Members, shall there be indissolubly united to their Glorious Head.

14. And now methinks Widow-hood, under this aspect, is quite transformed, is not so forlorn; so desolate an estate as 'tis usually esteemed. And would all Widows use but this expedient, thus devote themselves to Piety and Charity, it would▪ like the healing Tree, Exod. 15. 25. sweeten the Waters of Marah, render the condition not only supportable; but pleasant; and they would not need to make: such affrighted; such disadvantageous escapes, as many do, from it. 'Tis true, the Apostle's affirmation is unquestionable, that the wife, when her husband is dead, is at liberty to be married to whom she will, 1 Cor. 7. 39. But the advice he subjoins is authentic too, she is happier if she so-abide. She that may solace herself in the Society, in the Love of her God, makes an ignoble descent to Human Embraces; she that may purchase Heaven with her Wealth, buys a very dear Bargain of the best Husband on Earth;

nay indeed, upon a mere secular account, it seems not very prudent to relinquish both Liberty and Property, to Espouse at the best a Subjection, but perhaps a Slavery; it a little resembles the mad Frolicks of freed Gallyslaves, who play away their Liberty as soon as they regain it.

15. Marriage is so great an Adventure, that once seems enough for the whole life; for whether they have been prosperous or adverse in the first, it does almost discourage a second attempt. She that has had a good Husband, may be supposed to have his Idea so fixed in her Heart, that it will be hard to introduce any new Form: nay farther, she may very reasonably doubt, that in this common earth of Virtu, two good Husbands will scarce fall to one Woman's share, and an ill one will become more intolerable to her, by the reflections she will be apt to make on the better. On the other side, if she have had a bad, the smart sure cannot but remain after the rod is taken off; the memory of what she has suffered should, me thinks, be a competent caution against new adventures. Yet experience shows us that women (though the weaker sex) have commonly fortitude enough to encounter and baffle all these considerations. It is not therefore to be expected that many will by anything that hath or can be said be diverted from remarrying: and indeed she that does not preserve her widowhood upon the accounts fore-mentioned, may perhaps better relinquish it. St Paul we see advises that those Widows who found no better employment then going from house to house, that grew by their vacancy to be tattlers and busy bodies 1 Tim. 5. 13. should marry again; it being the best way to fix these wandering planets, to find them business of their own at home, that so they may not ramble abroad to intermeddle with that of others. And the truth is they that cannot brook the retiredness and gravity which becomes a widow, had better put themselves in a state that less requires it; and, if they resolve not to conform their minds to their condition, to bring their condition to their minds; but in the doing that there will be some cautions very necessary to be observed. I shall reduce them to two, the one relating to the times, the other to the equality of the match.

16. First in respect of time, common decency requires that there be a considerable interval between the parting with one husband & the choosing another, This has been so much observed by nations that were at all civiliz'd, that find Numa made it a law, that no widow should marry under 10. months, and if any did she was to sacrifice as for the expiation of a crime; and this continued in force many ages after, in so much that when upon reasons of State Augustus found it useful to marry his sister Octavia to Antonius, nothing less then a decree of the Senate could license the anticipating the time; so zealous observers were they of this point of Civility, that they thought the whole state was concerned in the violation. 'Tis true we have no law in the case, but we have somewhat of custom, I know not how long we shall have, since the frequent breaches of it threaten quite to cancel it: yet a woman that is ten er of her honor will scarce give her example towards the rescinding it. The wounds of grief are seldom healed by any hand but that of time, and therefore too sudden a cure shows the hurt pierced not deep; and she that can make her mourning veil an optic to draw a new lover nearer to her sight, gives cause to suspect the sables were all without.

17. The next thing considerable is the equality of the match. Marriage is so close a link, that to have it easy 'tis good to have the parties as even proportioned as may be. And first in respect of quality and fortune, 'tis to be wisht there should be no eminent disproportion. Those that meet most upon a level, are least subject to those upbraidings that often attend a great descent of either party; it is therefore no prudent motive, by which some Widows are swai'd, who marry only for a great title; who often do not meet with so much of obeisance from strangers, as they do with contempt from their husbands and his relations. There have been many examples of Lord's, who have used rich, but inferior, widows like sponges, squeez'd them to fill themselves again only with the air of a big name. On the other side for a woman to marry very meanly and too much below herself is rather worse; those kind of matches are ordinarily made in a transport of passion, and when that abates and leaves her to sober reflections, she will probably be so angry with herself, that she will scarce be well pleased with her husband. A state of subjection is a little sweetened by the worth and dignity of the ruler: for as it is more honorable, so 'tis also more easy; the serviler spirits being of all others the most imperious in command. And sure 'twill not a little grate a woman of honor, to think she has made such a one her Master, who perhaps would before have thought it a preferment to have been her servant. Nay farther, such marriages have commonly an ill reflection on the modesty of the Woman, it being usually presumed that where the distance was so great, as to discourage such an attempt on his part, there was some invitation on hers. So that upon all accounts she is very forlorn who thus disposes of herself: yet 'tis too well known such matches have oft been made, and the same levity and inconsideration may betray others to it; and therefore 'tis their concern well to ballast their minds and to provide that their passion, never get the ascendant over their reason.

18. Another very necessary equality is that of their judgment as to Religion. I do not mean that they are to catechize each other as to every minute speculative point; but that they be of the same profession, so as to join together in the worship of God. It is sure very uncomfortable that those who have so closely combined all their other interests, should be disunited in the greatest; that one Church cannot hold them, whom one house, one bed does; and that religion which is in itself the most uniting thing, should be the only disagreement between them. I know 'tis oft made a compact in such matches, that neither shall impose their opinion upon the other: yet I doubt 'tis seldom kept, unless it be by those whose carelessness of all religion abates their zeal to any one. But where they have any earnestness in their way, especially where one party thinks the other in a damnable error, 'twill scarce be possible to refrain endeavoring to reduce them; and that endeavor begets disputes, those disputes heats, those heats disgusts, and those disgusts perhaps end in aversion; so that at last their affections grow as irreconcilable as their opinions, and their religious jars draw on domestic. Besides if none of these personal debates happen, yet the education of the children will be matter of dispute; the one parent will still be countermining the other, each seeking to recover the others proselytes. Nay it introduces faction into the inferior parts of the family too: the servants, according to their different persuasions bandy into leagues and parties; so that it endangers, if not utterly destroys all concord in families: and all this train of mischiefs, should methinks be a competent prejudice against such matches.

19. There is yet a third particular wherein any great disproportion is much to be avoided, and that is in Years. The humors of youth and age differ so widely, that there had need be a great deal of skil to compose the discord into a harmony. When a young woman marries an old man, there are commonly jealousies on the one part and loathings on the other; and if there be not an eminent degree of discretion in one or both, there will be perpetual disagreements. But this is a case that does not often happen among those I now speak to: for though the avarice of Parents sometimes forces maids upon such matches, yet widows who are their own choosers seldom make such elections. The inequality among them commonly falls on the other side, and old women marry young men. Indeed any marriage is in such a folly and dotage, they who must suddenly make their beds in the dust, what should they think of a nuptial couch? And to such the answer of the Philosopher is apposite, who being demanded what was the fittest time for marrying, replied, For the young not yet, for the old not at all.

20. But this dotage becomes perfect frenzy and madness when they choose young husbands: this is an accumulation of absurdities and contradictions. The husband and the Wife are but one person; and yet at once young and old, fresh and wither'd. 'Tis a reversing the decrees of nature, and therefore 'twas no ill answer which Dionysius the Tyrant gave his mother, who in her age designed such a match, that though by his regal power he could dispense with positive laws, yet he could not abrogate those of nature; or make it fit for her an old woman to marry a young man. 'Tis indeed an inversion of seasons, a confounding the Calendar, making a mungrel month of May and December: and the conjunction proves as fatal as it is prodigious; it being scarce ever seen that such a match proves tolerably happy. And indeed 'tis not imaginable how it should, for first 'tis to be presumed she that marries so must marry meanly, no young man who does not need her fortune will take her person. For though some have the humor to give great rates for inanimate antiquities, yet none will take the living gratis. Next she never misses to be hated by him she marries: he looks on her as his rack and torment, thinks himself under the lingering torture devis d by Mezentius, a living body tied to a dead. Nor must she think to cure this by any the little adulteries of art: she may buy beauty, and yet can never make it her own; may paint, yet never be fair. 'Tis like enameling a mud-wall, the coursness of the ground will spoil the varnish; and the greatest exquisitness of dress serves but to illustrate her native blemishes. So that all she gains by this is to make him scorn as well as abhor her.

21. Indeed there is nothing can be more ridiculous, then an old Woman gaily set out; and it was not unaptly said of Diogenes to such a one, If this decking be for the living, you are deceived; if for the dead, make hast to them: and I doubt many young husbands will be ready to say as much. Naybecause death comes not quick enough to part them, there is few have patience to attend its loitering pace: the man bids adieu to the Wife though not to her fortune, takes that to maintain his luxuries else where, allows her some little annuity, and makes her a pensioner to her own estate. So that he has his design, but she none of hers: he married for her fortune, and he has it; she for his person, and has it not: and which is worse buys her defeat with the loss of all; he commonly leaving her as empty of money as he found her of wit.

22. And truly this is a condition deplorable enough, and yet usually fails even of that comfort which is the last reserve of the miserable, I mean Pity. 'Tis the Wise man's question, Eccles. 12. 13. Who will pity a charmer that is bitten with a Serpent? he might have presumed less on his skill, and kept himself at a safer distance; and s•...re the like may be said of her. Alas, what are her feeble charms, that she should expect by them to fix the giddy appetites of youth? And since she could so presume without sense, none will regret that she could be convinced by smart. Besides, this is a case wherein there have been a multitude of unhappy Presidents which might have caution'd her. He that accidentally falls down an undiscover'd precipice is compassionated for his disaster; but he that stands a great while on the brink of it, looks down and sees the bottom strewed with the mangled carcasses of many that have thence fallen; if he shall deliberately cast himself into their company, the blame quite extinguishes the pity; he may astonish, but not melt the beholders. And truly she who casts herself away in such a match, betrays not less but more wilfulness. How many ruins of unhappy women present themselves to her, like the wracks of old vessels, all split upon this rock? And if she will needs steer her course purposely to do the same, none ought to grudge her the shipwreck she so courts.

23 Nor has she only this negative discomfor to be deprived of pity, but she is loaded with censures and reproach. The World is apt enough to malicious errors, to fix blame where there is none, but 'tis seldom guilty of the charitable, does not overlook the smallest appearance of evil, but generally puts the worst construction on any act, that it will with any probability bear; and according to that measure women in this condition can expect no very mild descant on them. Indeed such matches are so destitute of any rational Plea, that 'tis hard to derive them from any other motive then the sensitive. What the common conjectures are in that case, is as needless as it is unhansom to declare: I will not say how true they are, but if they be, it adds another reason to the former, why such marriages are so improsperous. All distortions in Nature are usually ominous; and sure such preternatural heats in Age, may very well be reckon'd as dismal Presages, & very certain ones too, since they create the ruin they foretell. And truly 'tis not only just, but convenient, that such motives should be attended with such Consequences; that the Bitterness of the one may occasion some reflection on the Sordidness of the other. 'Tis but kindly, that such an Alhallontide Spring should meet with Frosts, and the unplesantness of the event chastise the ugliness of the Design; and therefore I think those that are conscious of the one, should be so far from murmuring, that they should be very thankful for the other; think •...t God's discipline to bring them again to their Wits, and not repine at that smart which themselves have made necessary.

24. And now I wish all the Ancienter Widows, would seriously weigh how much 'tis their Interest not to sever those two Epithets; that of Ancient they cannot put off, it daily grows upon them; and that of Widow is sure a more propotionable adjunct to it, then that of Wife; especially when it is to one to whom her Age might have made her Mother. There is a Veneration due to Age, if it be such as disowns not itself: The hoary head, says Solomon, is a crown of glory if it be found in the way of righteousness, Prov. 16. 32. but when it will mix itself with Youth, it is disclaim'd by both, becomes the shame of the Old, and the scorn of the Young. What a strange fury is it then which possesses such Women, that when they may dispose their Fortunes to those advantageous Designs before mentioned, they should only buy with them, so undecent, so ridiculous a slavery? that when they may keep up the reputation of Modesty and Prudence, they should expose themselves to an Universal Contempt for the want of both; and that they who might have had a reverence, put themselves even out of the capacity of bare compassion.

25. This is so high a Frenzy, as sure cannot happen in an instant; it must have some preparatory degrees, some rooting in the constitution and habit of the mind: Such Widows have sure some lightness of humor, before they can be so giddy in their Brains, and therefore those that will secure themselves from the Effect, must subtract the Cause; if they will still be wishing themselves young, 'tis odds but within a while they will persuade themselves they are so. Let them therefore content them selves to be old, and as Fashions are varied with Times, so let them put on the Ornaments proper to their Season; which are Piety, Gravity, and Prudence. These will be not only their ornament, but their Armor too; this will gain them such a Reverence, that will make it as improbable they should be assaulted, as impossible they should assault. For I think one may safely say, It is the want of one or all of these, which betrays Women to such Marriages.

26. And indeed it may be a matter of Caution, even to the younger Widows, not to let themselves too much loose to a light frolic humor, which perhaps they will not be able to put off, when it is most necessary they should. It will not much invite a sober Man to marry them while they are young; and if it continue with them till they are old, it may (as natural Motions use) grow more violent towards its end: precipitate them into that ruinous Folly we have before considered. Yet, should they happen to scape that, should it not force them from their Widow-hood, it will sure very ill agree with it: for how preposterous is it for an Old Woman to delight in Gauds & Trifles such as were fitter to entertain her gran-children? to read Romances with spectacles, & be at Masks and Dancings, when she is fit only to act the Antics? These are contradictions to Nature: the tearing off her Marks, and where she has writ fifty or sixty, to lessen (beyond the proportion of the unjust Steward) and write sixteen. And those who thus manage their widow-hood, have more reason to bewail it at last than at first, as having more experimentally found the mischief of being left to their own guidance. It will therefore concern them all to put themselves under a safer Conduct, by an... assiduous Devotion to render themselves up to the leading of the One infallible Guide, who, if he be not a covering of the eyes, Gen. 20. 16. to preclude all second Choices, may yet be a light to them for discerning who are fit to be chosen; that if they see fit to use their liberty and Marry, they may yet take the Apostles restriction with it, 1 Cor. 7. 40. that it be only in the Lord. Upon such sober Motives, and with such due Circumstances as may approve it to Him, and render it capable of his Benediction.

The Close.

1. I HAVE now gone through both Parts of the proposed Method. The former has presented those Qualifications which are equally necessary to every Woman: These, as a Root, send sap and vigor to the distinct Branches, animate & impregnate the several successive States through which she is to pass. He that hath pure Ore or Bullion, maycast it into what Form best fits his use, nay may translate it from one to another; and she who has that Mine of Virtues, may furnish out any Condition; her being good in an absolute consideration, will certainly make her so in a relative. On the other side, she who has not such a Stock, cannot keep up the Honor of any State; like corrupted Liquor, empty it from one Vessel to another, it still infects and contaminates all. And this is the cause that Women are alike complained of under all Forms, because so many want this Fundamental Vertu: were there more good Women, there would be more modest Virgins, loyal and obedient Wives, and sober Widows.

2. I must therefore entreat those who will look on this Tract, not only to single out that part which bears their own Inscription, but that they think themselves no less concerned in that which relates indefinitely to their Sex; endeavor to possess themselves of those excellencies which should be as universal as their kind: and when they are so stored with Matter, they may leave Providence to diversify the Shape, and to assign them their Scene of Action.

3. And now would God it were as easy to persuade, as it is to propose; and that this Discourse may not be taken only as a Gazette for its newness, & discarded as soon as read; but that it may at least advance to the honor of an Almanac, be allowed one Year ere it be out of date: and in that time, if frequently & seriously consulted, it may perhaps awaken some Ladies from their stupid Dreams, convince them that they were sent into the World for nobler purposes, then only to make a little Glittering in it; like a Comet, to give a blaze, and then disappear. And truly, if it may Operate but so far as to give them an effective sense of that, I shall think it has done them a considerable Service: They may, I am sure, from that Principle, deduce all necessary Consequences, and I wish they would but take the pains to draw the Corollaries; for those Inductions they make to themselves, would be much more efficacious than those which are drawn to their hands. Propriety is a great endearment, we love to be Proselytes to ourselves; and People oft resist others Reasons, who would upon mere partiality pay reverence to their own.

4. But besides this, there would be another Advantage, if they could be but got to a custom of considering, by it they might insensibly undermine the grand Instrument of their ruin. That careless incogitancy, so remarkably frequent among all, and not least among Persons of Quality, is the source of innumerable Mischiefs; 'tis the Delilah, that at once lulls and betrays them; it keeps them in a perpetual Sleep, binds up their Faculties, so that, though they are not extinct, yet they become useless. Plato used to say, That a man asleep was good for nothing: and 'tis certainly no less true of this Moral drowsiness than the Natural. And as in Sleep the fancy only is in motion, so these inconsiderate Persons, they rather dream than discourse entertain little trifling Images of things, which are presented by their Senses, but know not how to converse with their Reason. So that in this drowsy state, all temptations come on them with the same advantage, with that of a thief in the night; a Phrase by which the Scripture expresses the most inevitable unforeseen danger, 1 Thess. 5, 2. We read in Judges, how easily Laish became a prey to a handful of men, merely because of the supine negligent humor of the Inhabitants, which had cut them off from all intercourse with any who might have succor'd them, Jud. 18. 27, 28. and certainly it gives no less opportunity to our Spiritual Assailants, leaves us naked and unguarded to receive all their Impressions. How prodigious a thing is it then, that this state of dullness and danger should be affectedly chosen? yet we see it too often is, even by those whose qualities & Education fit them for more Ingenious Elections; nay, which is yet more riddle, that very aptness disenables, sets them above what it prepares them for. Labor is looked on as utterly incompatible with Greatness, and Consideration is looked on as a labor of the mind; and there are some Ladies, who seem to reckon it as their Prerogative, to be exempted from both; will no more apply their Understandings to any serious Discuffion, then their Hands to the Spindle and Distaff; the one they think pedantic, as the other is mean. In the mean time, by what strange measures do they proceed? they look on Idiots as the most deplorable of Creatures, because they want reason, and yet make it their own excellence and preeminence, to want the use of it; which is indeed so much worse then to want the thing, as sloth is worse then poverty, a moral defect then a natural. But we may see by this, how much civil & sacred estimates differ: for we find the Bereans commended, not only as more diligent, but as more noble too, Act. 17. 11. because they attentively considered, and strictly examined the Doctrine preach' a to them. By which they may discern, that in God's Court of Honor, a stupid Oscitancy is no ennobling Quality, however it comes to be thought so in theirs.

5. And if this one point might be gained, if they would but so far actuate their Reason, as deliberately and duly to weigh their Interest, they would find that so strictly engaging them to all that is virtuous; that they must have a very invincible resolution for ruin, if that cannot persuade them: and I hope all women are not Medea's, whom the Poet brings in avowing the horridness of that fact, which yet the resolved to execute. They are generally rather timorous, and apt to start at the apprehension of danger; let them but see a serpent though at a great distance; they will need no homilies or lectures to be persuaded to fly it. And sure did they but clearly discern what a sting there is in those vicious follies they embrace, their fear would make them quit their hold; put them in such a trembling, as would, like that of Belshazzars, slacken their joints, and make those things drop from them, which before they most tenaciously grasped. For indeed in sin there is a conspiracy of all that can be dreadful to a rational being, so that one may give its compendium by the very reverse of that which the Apostle gives of Godliness, 1 Tim. 4. 8. for as the one has the promises, so the other has the curse of this life, and of that to come.

6. In this life every depraved act (much more habit) has a black shadow attending it; it casts one inward upon the conscience in uncomfortable upbraidings and regrets. 'Tis true indeed, some have the art to disguise that to themselves by casting a yet darker over it; suppressing all those reluctings by an industrious stupefaction; making their souls so perfect-night, that they cannot see those black images their consciences represent. But as this renders their condition but the more wretched; so neither can they blind others though they do themselves. Vice casts a dark shadow outwards too, not such as may conceal but betray its self: and as the evening shadows increase in dimension, grow to a monstrosity and disproportion; so the longer any ill habit is continued, the more visible, the more deformed it appears, draws more observation and more censure.

7. 'Twere indeed endless to reckon up the temporal evils to which it exposes its votaries; immodesty destroys their fame, a vain prodigality their fortune, anger makes them mad, pride hateful, levity renders them despised, obstinacy desperate, and irreligion is a complication of all these, fills up their measure both of guilt and wretchedness, so that had virtue no other advocate, her very Antagonist would plead for her: the miserable consequences of vice, would like the flames of Sodom send all considering persons to that little Zoar, which how despicable soever it may have appeared before, cannot but look invitingly when safety is inscribed on its gates.

8. But it must infinitely more do so, if they please to open a Visto into the other World, make use of divine perspectives to discern those distant objects which their grosser senses do here intercept. There they may see the dismal Catastrophe of their Comedies, the miserable inversion of all unlawful or unbounded pleasures: there that Prophetic menace concerning Babylon which we find, Rev. 18. 7. will be literally verified upon every unhappy soul, According as she exalted herself and lived delicately, so much the more tribulation give her; the torment of that life will bear proportion to the pride and luxuries of this. It will therefore be necessary for those who here wallow in pleasures, to confront to them the remembrance of those rivers of Brimstone, and ask themselves the Prophets question, Who can dwell with everlasting burnings? We find Isaiah, when he denounces but temporal judgments against the daughters of Zion, he exactly pursues the Antithesis, and to every part of their effeminate delicacy he opposes the direct contrary hardship; instead of sweet smells there shall be a stink, instead of a girdle a rent, instead of well-set hair baldness, instead of a stomacher a girding with sackcloth, and burning instead of beauty, Isaiah. 3. 24.

9. It were well the daughters of our Zion would copy out this lecture, and prudently foresee how every particular sin or vanity of theirs will have its adapted punishment in another World. And sure this consideration well digested, must needs be a forcible expedient to cleanse them from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, as the Apostle speaks 2 Cor. 7. 1. For is it possible for her to cherish and blow up her libidinous flames here, who considers them but as the first kindlings of those inextinguishable ones hereafter? Can she make it her study to please her appetite, that remembers that Dives's unintermitted feast ends in as unallayed a thirst? Or can she deny the crumbs of her table to that Lazarus, to whom she foresees she shall then supplicate for a drop of water? In fine can she lay out her whole industry, her fortune, nay her ingenuity too, in making provision for the flesh, who considers that that flesh will more corrupt by pampering, and breed the worm that never dies? Certainly no woman can be so desperately daring, as thus to attack damnation, resist her reason and her sense, only that she may ruin her soul; and unless she can do all this, her foresight will prove her escape, and her viewing the bottomless pit in Landskip and picture will secure her from a real descent into it.

10. But now that this Tract may not make its exit in the shape of a fury, bring their meditations to hell and there leave them, it must now at last shift the Scene, and as it has showed the blackness of vice by that outer darkness to which it leads, we also will let in a beam of the Celestial light to discover the beauty of Virtue; remind the Reader that there is a region of joy as well as a place of torment, and piety and virtue is that milky way that leads to it; a state, compared to which the Elyzium of the heathen is as inconsiderable as it is fictitious, the Mahometan Paradise as flat and insipid as it is gross and brutish; where the undertaking of the Psalmist shall be completely answered, those that fear the Lord shall want no manner of thing that is good, Ps. 34. 10. And this happy state is as accessible as excellent, God is not unsincere in his proposals, offers not these glories only to Tantalize and abuse us, but to animate and encourage mankind. He sets up an inviting prize, and he not only marks out, but levels the way to it; makes that our duty which is also our pleasure, yea and our honor too: So has he contrived for our ease, that knowing how hardly we can divest our voluptuousness and ambition, he puts us not to it; all he demands is but that he may choose the objects, and in that he is yet more obliging, for by that at once he refines and satisfies the desires. He takes us us off indeed from the fulsome pleasures of sense, which by their grossness may cloy, yet by reason of their emtiness can never fill us; and brings us to taste the more pure spiritual delights which are the true elixir of Plesures; in comparison whereof all the sensual are but as the dregs or feces in an extraction, after the spirits are drawn off. In like manner he calls us from our aspiring to those pinnacles of honor, where we always sit totter •...gly and often full down, but yet invites us to soar higher, where we shall have the moon with all her vicissitudes and changes under our feet Rev. 12. 1. and enjoy a grandeur as irreversible as splendid.

11. Thus does he show us a way to hallow our most unsanctified affections; thus, according to the Prophecy of Zeehariah, may holiness be writ even upon the bells of the horses, Zec. 14. 20. upon our most brutal inclinations; and thus may all those feminine Passions which now seduce women from Vertu, advance them in it. Let her that is amorous, place her love upon him who is (as the Spouse tells us, Cant. 5. 10.) the chiefest among ten thousand; she that is angry, turn her edge against her sins; she that is haughty, disdain the Devils drudgery; she that is fearful, dread him who can destroy both Body and Soul in Hell, Matt. 5. 28. and she that is sad, reserve her tears for her penitential offices. Thus may they consecrate even their infirmities; and though they cannot Deifie, or erect Temples to them, as the Romans did to their Passions, nay their Diseases; yet after they are thus cleansed, they may sacrifice them as the Jews did the clean Beasts in the Tabernacle. Only irreligion and profaneness is exemt from this Priviledg, no water of Purification can cleanse it, or make it serviceable in the Temple; that, like the spoils of Jericho, is so execrable, that it must be devoted to destruction, as an accursed thing, Jos. 6. 17. For though God do not despise the work of his own hands, have so much kindness to his Creatures, that he endeavors to reduce all our native inclinations to their primitive rectitude, and therefore does not abolish, but purify them; yet Atheism is none of those, 'tis a counterblast from hell, in opposition to that mighty wind in which the holy Spirit descended. Tho the subject in which it subsists may be reformed, the person may turn Christian, and the wit that maintained its blasphemousparadoxes may be converted to holier uses: yet the quality itself is capable of no such happy Metamorphosis; that must be extirpated, for it cannot be made tributary; which shows how transcendent an ill that is which cannot be converted to good: even that Omnipotence which can out of the very stones raise children to Abraham, attempts not any transmutation of this; which ought therefore to possess all hearts with a detestation of it, and to advance them in an earnest pursuit of all the parts of Piety.

12. And that is it which I would now once more (as a farwel exhortation) commend to my female Readers, as that which virtually contains all other accomplishments; 'tis that pearl in the Gospel for which they may 'part with all and make a good bargain too. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom says the wisest of men Prov. 1. 7. and by his experience he shows that it is the completing end of it too; for he no sooner declined from that, but he grew to dotage and dishonor. Let all those therefore to whom God has dispent an outward affluence, given them a visible splendor in the eyes of the World, be careful to secure to themselves that honor which comes from God only, Joh. 5. 44. unite their souls to that supreme Majesty who is the fountain of true honor who in his bestowing the Crown of righteousness proceeds by the same measures by which he disposed the Crown of Israel, when he avow'd to Samuel that he looked not on the outward appearance but beheld the heart, Sam. 16. 7. If God see not his own Image there, all the beauty and gaiety of the outward form is despicable in His eyes, like the apples of Sodom only a Kind of painted dust. But if Piety be firmly rooted there, they then become like the Kings daughter all glorious within too; a much more vanluable bravery then the garment of needle-work and vesture of Gold, Psalms. 45. 13. And this is it that must enter them into the Kings Palace, into that new Jerusalem, where they shall not wear, but inhabit pearls and Gems Rev. 21. 19. be beautiful without the help of art or nature, by the mere reflection of the Divine brightness; be all that their then enlarged comprehensions can wish, and infinitely more then they can here imagine.

FINIS.

THE CONTENTS.

Part. I.

- Sect. 1. Of Modesty. p. 1.
- Sect. 2. Of Meekness. p. 29.
- Sect. 3. Of Compassion. p. 48.
- Sect. 4. Of Afsability. p. 65.
- Sect. 5. Of Piety. p. 79.

Part II.

- Sect. 1. Of Virgins. p. 143.
- Sect. 2. Of Wives. p. 165.
- Sect. 3. Of Widows. p. 210.
- The Close. p. 234.

P-RA-21. The lively oracles given to us. Or the Christians birth-right and duty, in the custody and use of the Holy Scripture. By the author of the Whole duty of man, &c. - Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681., Pakington, Dorothy Coventry, Lady, d. 1679, attributed name., Sterne, Richard, 1596?-1683, attributed name., Fell, John, 1625-1686, attributed name., Henschman, Humphrey, 1592-1675, attributed name., Burghers, M., engraver.

[illustration]

The lively Oracles given to us, or The Christians birthright & duty. in the custody. & use of the holy Scripture.

burg. sculp.

THE Lively Oracles given to us. OR The Christians Birth-right and Duty, in the custody and use of the HOLY SCRIPTURE.

By the Author of the WHOLE DUTY OF MAN, &c.

Search the Scriptures,

Jo. 5.39.

[illustration] [depiction of the Sheldonian Theatre]

At the THEATER in OXFORD, 1678. And are to be Sold by William Leak at the Crown in Fleet-street, Lond.

[illustration] [bookplate]

Beilby Thompson of Escrick

Imprimatur.

JO. NICHOLAS. Vice Cancell. Oxford. Junii 10. 1678.

〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉

THE PREFACE.

IN the Treatise of the Government of the Tongue published by me heretofore, I had occasion to take notice among the exorbitances of that unruly part, which sets on fire the whole course of nature, and its self is set on fire from hell, Jam. 3.6. of the impious vanity prevailing in this Age, whereby men play with sacred things, and exercise their wit upon those Scriptures by which they shall be judged at the last day, Joh. 12.48.

But that holy Book not only suffering by the petulancy of the Tongue, but the malice of the heart, out of the abundance whereof the mouth speaks, Mat. 12.34. and also from that irreligion, prepossession, and supineness, which the pursuit of sensual pleasures certainly produces; the mischief is too much diffus'd, and deeply rooted, to be control'd by a few casual reflections. I have therefore thought it necessary, both in regard of the dignity and importance of the subject, as also the prevalence of the opposition, to attempt a professed and particular vindication of the holy Scriptures, by displaying their native excellence and beauty; and enforcing the veneration and obedience that is to be paid unto them.

This I designed to do in my usual method, by an address to the affections of the Reader; soliciting the several passions of love, hope, fear, shame and sorrow, which either the majesty of God in his sublime being, his goodness derived to us, or our ingratitude returned to him, could actuate in persons not utterly obdurate.

But whereas men, when they have learnt to do amiss, quickly dispute and dictate; I found myself concerned to pass sometimes within the verge of controversy, and to discourse upon the principles of reason, and deductions from Testimony, which in the most important transactions of human life are justly taken for evidence. In which whole performance I have studied to avoid the entanglements of Sophistry, and the ambition of unintelligible quotations; and kept myself within the reach of the unlearned Christian Reader; to whose uses, my labors have been ever dedicated.

All that I require, is that men would bring as much readiness to entertain the holy Scriptures, as they do to the reading profane Authors; I am ashamed to say, as they do to the incentives of vice and folly; nay, to the libels and invectives that are level'd against the Scriptures.

If I obtain this, I will make no doubt that I shall gain a farther point; that from the perusal of my imperfect conceptions, the Reader will proceed to the study of the Scriptures themselves: there taste and see how gracious the Lord is, Ps. 34.8. and as the Angel commanded Saint John, Rev. 10.9. eat the Book; where he will experimentally find the words of David verified, Ps. 19.7. The Law of the Lord is an undefiled Law, converting the soul: the testimony of the Lord is sure, and giveth wisdom to the simple. The Statutes of the Lord are right, and rejoice the heart; the commandment of the Lord is pure, and giveth light to the eyes. The fear of the Lord is clean and endureth forever, the judgments of the Lord are true and righteous altogether. More to be desired are they then gold, yea, then much fine gold, sweeter also then honey and the honey-comb. Moreover by them is thy servant taught, and in keeping of them there is great reward.

It is said of Moses, Ex. 34.29. that having received the Law from God, and conversed with him in Mount Sina forty days together, his face shone, and had a brightness fixed upon it that dazzled the beholders; a pledge and short essay not only of the appearance at Mount Tabor, Mat. 17.1. where at the Transfiguration he again was seen in glory: but of that greater, and yet future change when he shall see indeed his God face to face, and share his glory unto all eternity. The same divine Goodness gives still his Law to everyone of us. Let us receive it with due regard and veneration; converse with him therein, instead of forty days, during our whole lives; and so anticipate and certainly assure our interest in that great Transfiguration, when all the faithful shall put off their mortal flesh, be translated from glory to glory, eternally behold their God, see him as he is, and so enjoy him.

Conversation has everywhere an assimilating power, we are generally such as are the men and Books, and business that we deal with: but surely no familiarity has so great an influence on Life and Manners, as when men hear God speaking to them in his Word. That Word which the Apostle, Heb. 4.12. declares to be quick and powerful, sharper than any two-edge'd sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart.

The time will come when all our Books however recommended, for subtlety of discourse, exactness of method, variety of matter, or eloquence of Language; when all our curious Acts, like those mentioned Act. 19.19. shall be brought forth, and burnt before all men: When the great Book of nature, and heaven itself shall depart as a scroul roll'd together, Rev. 6.14. At which important season 'twill be more to purpose, to have studied well, that is, transcribed in practice this one Book, then to have run thro all besides, for then the dead small and great shall stand before God, and the Books shall be opened, and another Book shall be opened which is the Book of Life, and the dead shall be judged out of those things which were written in the Books, according to their works, Rev. 20.12.

In vain shall men allege the want of due conviction, that they did not know how penal it would be, to disregard the Sanctions of God's Law, which they would have had enforced by immediate miracle; the apparition of one sent from the other world, who might testify of the place of torment. This expectation the Scripture charges everywhere with the guilt of tempting God, and indeed it really involves this insolent proposal, that the Almighty should be obliged to break his own Laws, that men might be prevailed with to keep his. But should he think fit to comply herein, the condescension would be as successful in the event, as 'tis unreasonable in the offer. Our Savior assures, that they who hear not Moses and the Prophets, the instructions and commands laid down in holy Scripture, would not be wrought upon by any other method, would not be persuaded, by that which they allow for irresistible conviction, though one rose again from the dead, Luke 16.31.

THE LIVELY ORACLES GIVEN TO US, Or the Christians Birth-right and Duty in the custody and use of the HOLY SCRIPTURE.

SECT. I. The several Methods of God's communicating the knowledge of himself.

GOD, as he is invisible to human eyes, so is he unfathomable by human understandings; the perfection of his nature, and the impotency of ours, setting us at too great a distance to have any clear perception of him. Nay, so far are we from a full comprehension, that we can discern nothing at all of him, but by his own light; those discoveries he hath been pleased to make of himself.

2. THOSE have been of several sorts; The first was by infusion in man's creation, when God interwove into Mans very constitution and being the notions and apprehensions of a Deity: and at the same instant when he breathed into him a living soul, imprest on it that native religion, which taught him to know and reverence his Creator, which we may call the instinct of humanity. Nor were those principles dark and confused, but clear and evident, proportionable to the ends they were designed to, which were not only to contemplate the nature, but to do the will of God; practice being even in the state of innocence preferable before an unactive speculation.

3. BUT this Light being soon eclipsed by Adams disobedience, there remained to his benighted posterity, only some faint glimmerings, which were utterly insufficient to guide them to their end, without fresh aids, and renewed manifestations of God to them. It pleased God therefore to repair this ruin, and by frequent revelations to communicate himself to the Patriarchs in the first Ages of the World; afterwards to Prophets, and other holy men; till at last he revealed himself yet more illustriously in the face of Jesus Christ, 2 Cor. 4.6.

4. THIS is the one great comprehensive Revelation wherein all the former were involved, and to which they pointed; the whole mystery of Godliness being compris'd in this of God's being manifested in the flesh, and the consequents thereof. 1 Tim. 3.16. whereby our Savior as he effected our reconciliation with God by the sacrifice of his death; so he declared both that, and all things else that it concerned man to know in order to bliss, in his doctrine and holy life. And this Teacher being not only sent from God, Jo. 3. but being himself God blessed forever; it cannot be that his instructions can want any supplement. Yet that they might not want attestation neither, to the incredulous world; he confirmed them by the repeated miracles of his life, and by the testimony of those who saw the more irrefragable conviction of his Resurrection and Ascension. And that they also might not want credit and enticement, the Holy Spirit set to his seal, and by his miraculous descent upon the Apostles, both asserted their commission, and enabled them for the discharge of it; by all gifts necessary for the propagating the Faith of Christ over the whole World.

5. THESE were the ways by which God was pleased to revele himself to the Forefathers of our Faith, and that not only for their sakes, but ours also, to whom they were to derive those divine dictates they had received. Saint Stephen tells us, those under the Law received the lively Oracles to deliver down to their posterity, Acts 7.38. And those under the Gospel, who received yet more lively Oracles, from him who was both the Word and the Life, did it for the like purpose; to transmit it to us upon whom the ends of the world are come. By this all need of repeated Revelations is superseded, the faithful deriving of the former, being sufficient to us for all things that pertain to life and godliness, 2 Pet. 1.3.

6. AND for this, God (whose care is equal for all successions of men) hath graciously provided, by causing Holy Scriptures to be writ; by which he hath derived on every succeeding Age the illuminations of the former. And for that purpose endowed the Writers not only with that moral fidelity requisite to the truth of History, but with a divine Spirit, proportionable to the great design of fixing an immutable rule for faith and manners. And to give us the fuller security herein, he has chosen no other penmen of the New Testament, then those who were the first oral promulgers of our Christian Religion; so that they have left to us the very same doctrine they taught the Primitive Christians; and he that acknowledges them divinely inspired in what they preached, cannot doubt them to be so in what they writ. So that we all may enjoy virtually and effectively that wish of the devout Father, who desired to be Saint Paul's Auditor: for he that hears any of his Epistles read, is as really spoke to by Saint Paul, as those who were within the sound of his voice. Thus God who in times past spake at sundry times, and in diverse manners to our Fathers by the Prophets, and in the latter days by his son, Heb. 1.1, 2. continues still to speak to us by these inspired Writers, and what Christ once said to his Disciples in relation to their preaching, is no less true of their writings: He that despiseth you, despiseth me, Luke 10.16. All the contempt that is at any time flung on these sacred Writings, rebounds higher, and finally devolves on the first Author of those doctrines, whereof these are the registers and transcripts.

7. BUT this is a guilt which one would think peculiar to Infidels and Pagans, and not incident to any who had in their Baptism listed themselves under Christ's banner: yet I fear I may say, of the two parties, the Scripture has met with the worst treatment from the later. For if we measure by the frequency and variety of injuries, I fear Christians will appear to have outvied Heathens: These bluntly disbelieve them, neglect, nay perhaps scornfully deride them. Alas Christians do this and more; they not only put contemts, but tricks upon the Scripture, wrest and distort it to justify all their wild fancies, or secular designs; and suborn its Patronage to those things it forbids, and tells us that God abhors.

8. INDEED so many are the abuses we offer it, that he that considers them would scarce think we owned it for the words of a sensible man, much less of the great omniscient God. And I believe 'twere hard to assign any one so comprehensive and efficacious cause of the universal depravation of manners, as the disvaluing of this divine Book, which was designed to regulate them. It were therefore a work worthy another inspired writing, to attempt the rescue of this, and recover it to its just estimate. Yet alas, could we hope for that, we have scoffers who would as well despise the New as the Old; and like the Husbandmen in the Gospel, Mat. 21.36. would answer such a succession of messages by repeting the same injuries.

9. TO such as these 'tis I confess vain for man to address; nay 'twere insolence to expect that human Oratory should succeed where the divine fails; yet the spreading infection of these renders it necessary to administer antidotes to others; And besides, though (God be blest) all are not of this form, yet there are many who, though not arrived to this contempt, yet want some degrees of that just reverence they owe the sacred Scripture, who give a confused general assent to them as the word of God, but afford them not a consideration and respect answerable to such an acknowledgment. To such as these, I shall hope it may not be utterly vain to attempt the exciting of those drowsy notions that lie unactive in them, by presenting to them some considerations concerning the excellence and use of the Scripture: which being all but necessary consequences of that principle they are supposed to own, viz. that they are God's word, I cannot much question their assent to the speculative part: I wish I could as probably assure myself of the practic.

10. INDEED were there nothing else to be said in behalf of holy Writ, but that it is God's word, that were enough to command the most awful regard to it. And therefore it is but just we make that the first and principal consideration in our present discourse. But then 'tis impossible that that can want others to attend it; since whatsoever God says is in all respects completely good. I shall therefore to that of its divine original add secondly the consideration of its subject matter; thirdly, of its excellent and no less diffusive end and design; and fourthly, of its exact propriety and fitness to that design, which are all such qualifications, that where they concur, nothing more can be required to commend a writing to the esteem of rational men. And upon all these tests, notwithstanding the cavil of the Romanists and others, whose force we shall examine with the unhappy issue of contrary counsels, this law of God will be found to answer the Psalmists character of it, Ps. 19.7. The Law of God is perfect: and will appear that the custody and use thereof, is the birth-right and duty of every Christian. All which severals being faithfully deduced; it will only remain that I add such cautions as will be necessary to the due performance of the aforesaid duty; and our being in some degree rendered perfect, as this Law of God, and the Author thereof himself is perfect, Mat. 5.48.

SECT. II. The divine Original, Endearments, and Authority of the Holy Scripture.

MENS judgments are so apt to be biast by their affections, that we often find them readier to consider who speaks, then what is spoken: a temper very unsafe, and the principle of great injustice in our inferior transactions with men; yet here there are very few of us that can wholly divest ourselves of it, whereas, when we deal with God (in whom alone an implicit faith may securely be reposed) we are nice and wary, bring our scales and measures; will take nothing upon his word which holds not weight in our own balance. 'Tis true, he needs not our partiality to be justified in his sayings, Psal. 51.4. His words are pure, even as the silver tried seven times in the fire, Psal. 12.6. able to pass the strictest test that right reason (truly so called) can put them to. Yet it shows a great perverseness in our nature, that we who so easily resign our understandings to fallible men, stand thus upon our guard against God; make him dispute for every inch he gains on us; nor will afford him what we daily grant to any credible man; to receive an affirmation upon trust of his veracity.

2. I am far from contradicting our Saviors Precept, of Search the Scriptures, Jo. 7. or Saint Paul's, of proving all things, 1 Thes. 5.21. we cannot be too industrious in our inquest after truth, provided we still reserve to God the decisive vote, and humbly acquiesce in his sense, how distant soever from our own; so that when we consult Scripture (I may add reason either) 'tis not to resolve us whether God be to be believed or no in what he has said, but whether he hath said such and such things; for if we are convinced he have; reason as well as religion commands our assent.

3. WHATEVER therefore God has said, we are to pay it a reverence merely upon the account of its Author; over and above what the excellence of the matter exacts: and to this we have all inducements as well as obligation: there being no motives to render the words of men estimable to us, which are not eminently and transcendently applicable to those of God.

4. THOSE motives we may reduce to four: first, the Authority of the Speaker; secondly, his kindness; thirdly, his wisdom; and fourthly, his truth. First, for that of Authority; that may be either native, or acquired; the native is that of a parent, which is such a charm of observance, that we see Solomon, when he would impress his counsels, assumes the person of a Father; Hear O my children the instructions of a Father, Prov. 4.1. And generally through that whole Book he uses the compellation of my Son, as the greatest endearment to engage attention and reverence. Nay so indispensable was the obligation of children in this respect, that we see the contumacious child that would not hearken to the advice of his Parents, was by God himself adjudged to death. Deut. 21.20.

5. NOR have only God's, but men's Laws exacted that filial reverence to the dictates of Parents. But certainly no Parent can pretend such a title to it as God, who is not only the immediate Father of our persons, but the original Father of our very nature; not only of our flesh, but of our spirits also, Heb. 12.9. So that the Apostles Antithesis in that place is as properly applied to counsels as corrections; and we may as rightly infer, that if we give reverence to the advices of our earthly Parents, much more ought we subject ourselves to this Father of our spirits. And we have the very same reason wherewith to enforce it: for the Fathers of our flesh do as often dictate, as correct according to their own pleasures; prescribe to their children not according to the exact measures of right and wrong, but after that humor which most predominates in themselves. But God always directs his admonitions to our profit, that we may be partakers of his holiness, Heb. 12.11. So that we are as unkind to ourselves, as irreverent towards him, whenever we let any of his words fall to the ground; whose claim to this part of our reverence is much more irrefragable than that of our natural Parents.

6. BUT besides this native Authority there is also an acquired; and that we may distinguish into two sorts; the one of dominion, the other of reputation; To the first kind belongs that of Princes, Magistrates, Masters, or any that have coercive power over us. And our own interest teaches us not to slight the words of any of these, who can so much to our cost second them with deeds. Now God has all these titles of jurisdiction; He is the great King, Ps. 48.2. Nor was it only a complement of the Psalmists; for himself owns the style, I am a great King, Mal. 1. He is the Judge of all the World; Gen. 18. yea, that Ancient of days, before whom the Books were opened, Dan. 7.10. He is our Lord and Master by right, both of creation and redemption; and this Christ owns even in his state of inanity; yea, when he was about the most servile employment; the washing his Disciples feet: when he was most literally in the form of a servant; yet he scruples not to assert his right to that opposite title; You call me Master, and Lord; and ye say well, for so I am; Jo. 13. Nor are these empty names, but effectively attended with all the power they denote. Yet so stupid are we, that whilst we awfully receive the dictates of our earthly Superiors, we slight and neglect the Oracles of that God who is King of Kings, and Lord of Lord's. When a Prince speaks, we are apt to cry out with Herod's Flatterers, the voice of a God, and not of a man, Act. 12. Yet when it is indeed the voice of God, we choose to listen to anything else rather than it. But let us sadly remember, that notwithstanding our contents, this word shall (as our Savior tells us) judge us at the last day, Jo. 12.48.

7. A second sort of acquired Authority is that of reputation. When a man is famed for some extraordinary excellencies, whether moral or intellectual, men come with appetite to his discourses, greedily suck them in, nor need such a one bespeak attention; his very name has done it for him, and prepossessed him of his Auditors regard. Thus the Rabbies among the Jews, the Philosophers among the Greeks, were listened to as Oracles, and to cite them was (by their admiring Disciples) thought a concluding argument. Nay, under Christianity this admiration of men's persons has been so inordinate, that it has crumbled Religion away in little insignificant parties; whilst not only Paul, Apollo, or Cephas, but names infinitely inferior, have become the distinctive characters of Sects and separate Communion. So easily alas are we charm'd by our prepossessions, and with itching ears run in quest of those doctrines which the fame of their Authors, rather than the evidence of truth commend to us.

8. AND hath God don nothing to get him a repute among us? has he no excellencies to deserve our esteem? Is he not worthy to prescribe to his own creatures? if we think yes, why is he the only person to be disregarded? or why do we so unseasonably depart from our own humor, as not to give his Word a reverence proportionable to that we pretend for him; nay, which we actually pay to men of like passions with ourselves? A contempt so absurd as well as impious, that we have not the example of any the most barbarous people to countenance us. For though some of them have made very wild mistakes in the choice of their Deities, yet they have all agreed in this common principle, that whatever those Deities said, was to be received with all possible veneration; yea, such a deference gave they to all significations of the divine will, that as they would undertake no great enterprize without consulting their Auguries; so upon any inauspicious signs they relinquish their attempts. And certainly if we had the same reverence for the true God which they had for the false, we should as frequently consult him. We may do it with much more ease and certainty: we need not trust to the entrails of Beasts, or motion of Birds: we need not go to Delphos, or the Lybian Hammon for the resolving our doubts; but what Moses said to Israel is very applicable to us, the Word is nigh thee, Deut. 30.14. That Word which David made his Counselor, Psal. 119.24. his Comforter, ver. 50. his Treasure, ver. 72. his Study, ver. 99. And had we those awful apprehensions of God which he had, we should pay the like reverence to his Word. Did we well ponder how many titles of Authority he has over us, we should surely be ashamed to deny that respect to him in whom they all conspire; which we dare not deny to them separately in human Superiors.

9. A second motive to esteem men's words, is the kindness of the speaker. This has such a fascinating power, as nothing but extreme ill nature can resist. When a man is assured of the kindness of him that speaks, whatever is spoken is taken in good part. This is it that distinguishes the admonitions of a friend from the reproaches of an enemy; and we daily in common conversation receive those things with contentment and applause from an intimate and familiar, which if spoken by a stranger or enemy would be despised or stomach'd. So insinuating a thing is kindness, that where it has once got itself believed, nothing it says after is disputed; it supple the mind, and makes it ductile and pliant to any impressions.

10. BUT what human kindness is there that can come in any competition with the Divine? it surpasses that of the nearest and dearest relations; Mothers may forget, yet will not I forget thee, Isa. 49.15. And the Psalmist found it experimentally true, When my Father and my Mother forsake me, the Lord taketh me up, Ps. 27.10. the tenderest bowels compared to his are adamant and flint: so that 'tis a most proper epithet the Wise man gives him; O Lord, thou lover of souls; Wis. 11.26. Nor is this affection merely mental, but it attests itself by innumerable effects. The effects of love are all reducible to two heads, doing and suffering; and by both these God has most eminently attested his love to us.

11. FOR the first, we cannot look either on our bodies or our souls, on the whole Universe about us, or that better World above us; but we shall in each see the Lord hath don great things for us, Psal. 114. Nay, not only our enjoyments, but even the capacity to enjoy, is his bounty. Had not he drawn mankind out of his original clay, what had we been concerned in all the other works of his Creation. So that if we put any value either upon what we have or what we are, we cannot but account ourselves so much indebted to this his active love. And though the passive was not practicable by the divine Nature simply and apart, yet that we might not want all imaginable evidences of his love, he who was God blessed forever, linked his impassible to our passable nature; assumed our humanity, that he might espouse our sorrows, and was born on purpose that he might die for us. So that sure we may say in his own words, greater love then this hath no man; Io. 15.13.

12. AND now tis very hard, if such an unparalleled love in God, may not as much affect us, as the slight benefactions of every ordinary friend: if it cannot so much recommend him to our regard, as to rescue his word from contempt, and dispose us to receive impressions from it; (especially when his very speaking is a new act of his kindness, and designed to our greatest advantage.)

13. BUT if all he has don and suffered for us cannot obtain him so much from us, we must surely confess, our disingenuity is as superlative as his love. For in this instance we have no plea for ourselves. The discourses of men 'tis true may sometime be so weak and irrational, that though kindness may suggest pity, it cannot reverence; But this can never happen in God, whose wisdom is as infinite as his love. He talks not at our vain rate who often talk only for talkings sake; but his words are directed to the most important ends and address in such a manner as befits him in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, Col. 2. And this is our third consideration, the wisdom of the Speaker.

14. HOW attractive a thing Wisdom is, we may observe in the instance of the Queen of Sheba, who came from the utmost parts of the earth, as Christ says Mat. 12.42. to hear the Wisdom of Solomon. And the like is noted of the Greek Sages, that they were address to from all parts, by persons of all ranks and qualities, to hear their Lectures. And indeed the rational nature of man do's by a kind of sympathetic motion close with what ever hath the stamp of reason upon it. But alas, what is the profoundest wisdom of men, compared with that of God? He is the essential reason; and all that man can pretend to is but an emanation from him; a ray of his Sun, a drop of his Ocean: which as he gives, so he can also take away. He can infatuate the most subtle designers; And (as he says of himself) makes the diviners mad; turns the wise men back, and makes their wisdom foolishness, Isaiah 44.25.

15. HOW impious a folly is it then in us, to Idolize human Wisdom with all its imperfections, and despise the divine? yet this every man is guilty of, who is not attracted to the study of sacred Writ by the supereminent wisdom of its Author. For such men must either affirm that God has not such a supereminency, or that, though he have in himself, he hath not exerted it in this writing: The former is down-right blasphemy; and truly the later is the same, a little varied. For that anything, but what is exactly wise can proceed from infinite wisdom, is too absurd for any man to imagine. And therefore he that charges God's Word with defect of wisdom, must interpretively charge God so too, For though 'tis true, a wise man may sometimes speak foolishly; yet that happens through that mixture of ignorance, or passion which is in the most knowing of mortals: but in God, who is a pure act, and essential wisdom, that is an impossible supposition.

16. NAY, indeed it were to tax him of folly beyond what is incident to any sensible man; who will still proportion his instruments to the work he designs. Should we not conclude him mad, that should attempt to fell a mighty Oak with a Pen-knife, or stop a Torrent with a wisp of Straw? And sure their conceptions are not much more reverend of God, who can suppose that a writing designed by him for such important ends, as the making men wise unto salvation, 2 Tim. 3.15. the castdown all that exalts itself against the obedience of Christ, 2 Cor. 10.5. should itself be foolish and weak: or that he should give it those great attributes of being sharper than a two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing a sunder of soul and spirit, of the joints and marrow, Heb. 4.14. if its discourses were so flat and insipid as some in this profane Age would represent them.

17. 'TIS true indeed, 'tis not, as the Apostle speaks the wisdom of this world, 1 Cor. 2.6. The Scripture teaches us not the arts of undermining governments, defrauding and circumventing our brethren; but it teaches us that which would tend much more even to our temporal felicity; and as reason prompts us to aspire to happiness, so it must acknowledge that is the highest wisdom which teaches us to attain it.

18. AND as the Holy Scripture is thus recommended to us by the wisdom of its Author; so in the last place is it by his truth, without which the other might rather raise our jealousy than our reverence. For wisdom without sincerity degenerates into serpentine guile; and we rather fear to be ensnar'd than hope to be advantag'd by it. The most subtle addresses, and most cogent arguments prevail not upon us, where we suspect some insidious design. But where wisdom and fidelity meet in the same person, we do not only attend, but confide in his counsels. And this qualification is most eminently in God. The children of men are deceitful upon the weights, Psal. 62.9. Much guile often lurks indiscernibly under the fairest appearances: but God's veracity is as essentially himself, as his wisdom, and he can no more deceive us, than he can be deceived himself. He is not man that he should lie, Num. 23.19. He designs not (as men often do) to sport himself with our credulity; and raise hopes which he never means to satisfy: he says not to the seed of Jacob, seek ye me in vain, Ex. 45.19. but all his promises are yea and Amen, 2 Cor. 1.20. He is perfectly sincere in all the proposals he makes in his Word: which is a most rational motive for us to advert to it, not only with reverence but love.

19. AND now when all these motives are thus combined; the authority, the kindness, the wisdom, the veracity of the speaker, what can be required more to render his words of weight with us? If this four-fold cord will not draw us, we have sure the strength, not of men, but of that Legion we read of in the Gospel, Mat. 5.1. For these are so much the cords of a man, so adapted to our natures, nay to our constant usage in other things, that we must put off much of our humanity, disclaim the common measures of mankind, if we be not attracted by them. For I dare appeal to the breast of any sober, industrious man, whether in case a person, who he were sure had all the fore-mentioned qualifications, should recommend to him some rules as infallible for the certain doubling, or trebling his estate, he would not think them worth the pursuing, nay, whether he would not plod and study on them, till he comprehended the whole Art. And shall we then when God in whom all those qualifications are united, and that in their utmost transcendencies, shall we, I say, think him below our regard, when he proposes the improving our interests, not by the scanty proportions of two or three, but in such as he intimated to Abraham, when he shown him the Stars, as the representative of his numerous offspring, Gen. 15.5. when he teaches us that highest, and yet most certain Alchimy, of refining and multiplying our enjoyments, and then perpetuating them?

20. ALL this God do's in Scripture; and we must be stupidly improvident, if we will take no advantage by it. It was once the complaint of Christ to the Jews, I am come in my Fathers name and ye receive me not, if another shall come in his own name, him ye will receive. Jo. 5.43. And what was said by him the eternal essential Word, is no less applicable to the written; which coming in the name, and upon the message of God, is despised and slighted, and every the lightest composure of men prefer'd before it. As if that signature of Divinity it carries, served rather as a Brand to stigmatize and defame, then adorn and recommend it. A contempt which strikes immediately at God himself, whose resentments of it, though for the present suppressed by his longsuffering, will at last break out upon all who persevere so to affront him, in a judgment worthy of God. Wis. 12.26.

21. BUT after all that has been said, I foresee some may say, that I have all this while but beaten the air, have built upon a principle which some flatly deny, others doubt of, and have run away with a supposition that the Bible is of divine Original, without any attempt of proof. To such as these I might justly enough object the extreme hard measure they offer to Divinity above all other Sciences. For in those, they still allow some fundamental maxims, which are presupposed without proof; but in this they admit of no Postulata, no granted principle on which to superstruct. If the same rigor should be extended to secular cases, what a damp would it strike upon commerce! For example, a man expects fair dealing from his neighbor, upon the strength of those common notions of Justice he presumes writ in all men's hearts: but according to this measure, he must first prove to every man he deals with, that such notions there are, and that they are obligatory: that the wares exposed to sale are his own; that dominion is not founded in grace, or that he is in that state, and so has a property to confer upon another; that the person dealt with, paies a just price; do's it in good money; and that it is his own; or that he is in the state of grace; or needs not be so, to justify his purchase, and at this rate the Market will be as full of nice questions as the Schools. But because complaints and retortions are the common refuge of causes that want better Arguments, I shall not insist here; but proceed to a defense of the questioned Assertion, that the Bible is the Word of God.

22. IN which I shall proceed by these degrees. First, I shall lay down the plain grounds upon which Christians believe it. Secondly, I shall compare those with those of less credibility which have generally satisfied mankind in other things of the like nature. And thirdly, I shall consider whether those who are dissatisfied with those grounds would not be equally so with any other way of attestation.

23. BEFORE I enter upon the first of these, I desire it may be considered, that matters of fact are not capable of such rigorous demonstrative evidences as mathematical propositions are. To render a thing fit for rational belief, there is no more required, but that the motives for it do over poise those against it; and in that degree they do so, so is the belief stronger or weaker.

24. NOW the motives of our belief in the present case, are such as are extrinsic, or intrinsic to the Scriptures; of which the extrinsic are first, and preparative to the other; and indeed all that can reasonably be insisted on to a gainsaier, who must be supposed no competent judge of the later. But as to the former I shall adventure to say, that the divine Original of the Scripture hath as great grounds of credibility as can be expected in anything of this kind. For whether God inspired the pen-men of Holy Writ, is matter of fact, and being so is capable of no other external evidence but that of testimony: and that matter of fact being also in point of time so remote from us, can be judged of only by a series of testimonies derived from that Age wherein the Scriptures were written, to this: and the more credible the testifiers, and the more universal the testimony; so much the more convincing are they to all considering men.

25. AND this attestation the Scripture hath in the highest circumstances, it having been witness'd to in all Ages, and in those Ages by all persons that could be presumed to know anything of it. Thus the Old Testament was owned by the whole nation of the Jews, as the writings of men inspired by God; & that with such evidence of their mission, as abundantly satisfied those of that Age, of their being so inspired; and they derived those Writings with that attestation to their posterity. Now that those of the first Ages were not deceived, is as morally certain as anything can be supposed. For in the first part of the Bible is contained the history of those miracles wherewith God rescued that people out of Egypt, and instated them in Canaan. Now if they who lived at that time knew that such miracles were never don, 'tis impossible they could receive an evident Fable as an inspired truth. No single person, much less a whole Nation can be supposed so stupid. But if indeed they were eye-witnesses of those miracles, they might with very good reason conclude, that the same Moses who was by God empower'd to work them, was so also for the relating them; as also all those precedent events from the Creation down to that time, which are recorded by him.

26. SO also for the preceptive parts of those Books, those that saw those formidable solemnities, with which they were first published, had sure little temptation to doubt that they were the dictates of God, when written. Now if they could not be deceived themselves, 'tis yet less imaginable that they should conspire to impose a cheat upon their posterities; nor indeed were the Jews of so easy a credulity, that 'tis at all probable the succeeding Generations would have been so imposed on: their humor was stubborn enough, and the precepts of their Law severe and burdensome enough to have tempted them to have cast off the yoke, had it not been bound upon them by irresistible convictions of its coming from God. But besides this Tradition of their Elders, they had the advantage of living under a Theocracy, the immediate guidance of God; Prophets daily raised up among them, to foretell events, to admonish them of their duty, and reprove their backslidings: yet even these gave the deference to the written Word; nay, made it the test by which to try true inspirations from false: To the Law and to the Testimony; if they speak not according to it, there is no light in them, Isaiah 8.20. So that the veneration which they had before acquired, was still anew excited by fresh inspirations, which both attested the old, and became new parts of their Canon.

27. NOR could it be esteemed a small confirmation to the Scriptures, to find in succeeding Ages the signal accomplishments of those prophecies which were long before registered in those Books; for nothing less than divine power and wisdom could foretell, and also verify them. Upon these grounds the Jews universally through all successions received the Books of the Old Testament as divine Oracles, and looked upon them as the greatest trust that could be committed to them: and accordingly were so scrupulously vigilant in conserving them, that their Masorits numbered not only the sections, but the very words, nay letters, that no fraud or inadvertency might corrupt or defalk the least iota of what they esteemed so sacred. A farther testimony and sepiment to which, were the Samaritan, Chaldee, and Greek versions: which being made use of in the Synagogs of Jews, in their dispersions, and the Samaritans at Shechem could not at those distances receive a uniform alteration, and any other would be of no effect. Add to this, that the Original exemplar of the Law, was laid up in the Sanctuary, that the Prince was to have a Copy of it always by him, and transcribe it with his own hand; that every Jew was to make it his constant discourse and meditation, teach it his children, and wear part of it upon his hands and forehead. And now sure 'tis impossible to imagine any matter of fact to be more carefully deduced, or irrefragably testified, nor anything believed upon stronger evidence.

28. THAT all this is true in reference to the Jews, that they did thus own these Writings as divine, appears not only by the Records of past Ages, but by the Jews of the present, who still own them, and cannot be suspected of combination with the Christians. And if these were reasonable grounds of conviction to the Jews, (as he must be most absurdly skeptical that shall deny) they must be so to us Christians also; who derive them from them: and that with this farther advantage to our Faith, that we see the clear completion of those Evangelical prophecies which remained dark to them, and consequently have a farther Argument to confirm us, that the Scriptures of the Old Testament are certainly divine.

29. THE New has also the like means of probation: which as it is a collection of the doctrine taught by Christ and his Apostles, must if truly related be acknowledged no less divine than what they orally delivered. So that they who doubt its being divine, must either deny what Christ and his Apostles preached to be so; or else distrust the fidelity of the relation: The former strikes at the whole Christian Faith; which if only of men, must not only be fallible, but is actually a deceit, whilst it pretends to be of God, and is not. To such Objectors we have to oppose those stupendous miracles with which the Gospel was attested; such as demonstrated a more than human efficacy. And that God should lend his omnipotence to abet the false pretensions of men, is a conceit too unworthy even for the worst of men to entertain.

30. 'TIS true, there have been by God permitted lying miracles; as well as true ones have been don by him: Such as were those of the Magicians in Egypt, in opposition to the other of Moses; but then the difference between both was so conspicuous, that he must be more partial and disingenuous, then even those Magicians were, who would not acknowledge the disparity, and confess in those which were truly supernatural, the finger of God, Exod. 8.19. Therefore both in the Old and New Testament it is predicted, that false Prophets should arise, and do signs and wonders, Deut. 13.1. Mat. 24.11.24. as a trial of their fidelity who made profession of Religion; whether they would prefer the few and trivial sleights which recommended a deceiver, before those great and numberless miracles which attested the sacred Oracles delivered to the sons of men by the God of truth. Whether the trick of a Barchochebas to hold fire in his mouth; that of Marcus the heretic, to make the Wine of the Holy Sacrament appear blood; or that of Mahomet, to bring a Pidgeon to his ear, ought to be put in balance against all the miracles wrought by Moses, our Savior, or his Apostles. And in a word, whether the silly stories which Iamblichus solemnly relates of Pythagoras, or those Philostratus tells of Apollonius Tyaneus, deserve to rival those of the Evangelists. It is a most just judgment, and accordingly threatened by Almighty God, that they who would not obey the truth, should believe a lie, 2 Thes. 2.11. But still the Almighty, where any man or devil do's proudly, is evidently above him, Exod. 18.11. will be justified in his sayings, and be clear when he is judged, Rom. 3.4.

31. BUT if men will be Sceptics, and doubt everything, they are to know that the matter called into question, is of a nature that admits but two ways of solution; probability, and testimony. First for probability, let it be considered, who were the first promulgers of Christ's miracles. In his life time they were either the patients on whom his miracles were wrought, or the common people, that were spectators: the former, as they could not be deceived themselves, but must needs know whether they were cured or no; so what imaginable design could they have to deceive others? Many indeed have pretended impotency as a motive of compassion; but what could they gain by owning a cure they had not? As for the Spectators, as their multitude adds to their credibility; (it being morally impossible that so many should at once be deluded in a matter obvious to their senses) so do's it also acquit them from fraud and combination. Cheats and forgeries are always hatched in the dark, in close Cabals, and private Juncto's. That five thousand men at one time, and four thousand at another, should conspire to say, that they were miraculously fed, when they were not; and all prove true to the fiction, and not betray it: is a thing as irrational to be supposed, as impossible to be paralleled.

32. BESIDES, admit it possible that so many could have joined in the deceit, yet what imaginable end could they have in it? Had their lie been subservient to the designs of some potent Prince that might have rewarded it, there had been some temptation: but what could they expect from the reputed son of a Carpenter, who had not himself where to lay his head? Nay, who disclaim'd all secular power; convey'd himself away from their importunities, when they would have forced him to be a King: And consequently, could not be looked on as one that would head a Sedition, or attempt to raise himself to a capacity of rewarding his Abettors. Upon all these considerations, there appears not the least shadow of probability; that either those particular persons who published the cures they had received, or those multitudes who were witnesses and divulgers of those, or his other miracles; could do it upon any sinister design, or indeed upon any other motive but gratitude and admiration.

33. In the next place, if we come to those miracles which succeeded Christ's death, those most important, and convincing, of his Resurrection and Ascension, and observe who were the divulgers of those, we shall find them very unlikely to be men of design; a set of illiterate men, taken from the Fisher-boats, and other mean occupations: and such as needed a miracle as great as any of those they were to assert (the descent of the Holy Ghost) to fit them for their office. What alas could they drive at, or how could they hope that their testimony could be received, so much against the humor and interest of the present rulers; unless they were assured not only of the truth of the things, but also of some supernatural aids to back and fortify them? Accordingly we find, that till they had received those; till by the descent of the Holy Ghost they were endued with power from on high, Luk. 24.49. they never attempted the discovery of what they had seen: but rather hid themselves, kept all their assemblies in privacy and concealment for fear of the Jews, Jo. 20.19. and so were far enough from projecting anything besides their own safety. Afterwards, when they began to preach, they had early essays, what their secular advantages would be by it; threatenings and revilings, scourgings and imprisonments, Act. 4.20.5.18.40. And can it be imagined, that men who a little before had shown themselves so little in love with suffering, that none of them durst stick to their Master at his apprehension, but one forswore, and all forsook him; can it, I say, be imagined that these men should be so much in love with their own Fable, as to venture all sorts of persecution for the propagating it? Or if they could, let us in the next place consider what probability there could be of success.

34. THEIR preaching amounted to no less then the Deifying of one, whom both their Roman and Jewish Rulers, nay, the generality of the people had executed as a malefactor: so that they were all engaged, in defense of their own Act, to sift their testimony with all the rigor that conscious jealousy could suggest. And where were so many concerned inquisitors, there was very little hope for a forgery to pass. Besides the avow'd displeasure of their Governors made it a hazardous thing to own a belief of what they asserted. Those that adher'd to them could not but know, that at the same time they must espouse their dangers and sufferings. And men use not to incur certain mischiefs, upon doubtful and suspicious grounds.

35. YET farther, their doctrine was designed to an end to which their Auditors could not but have the greatest reluctancy: they were to struggle with that rooted prepossession which the Jews had for the Mosaical Law, which their Gospel out-dated; and the Gentiles for the Rites and Religion of their Ancestors; and, which was harder then either, with the corruptions and vices of both: to plant humility and internal sanctity, so contrary to that ceremonial holiness, upon which the Jews so valued themselves, and despised others: and Temperance, Justice, and Purity, so contrary to the practice, nay, even the religion of the Heathen: and to attempt all this with no other allurements, no other promise of recompense but what they must attend in another world, and pass too through reproaches and afflictions, torments and death. These were all such invincible prejudices, as they could never hope to break thorough with a lie, nay, which they could not have encounter'd even with every common truth, but only with that, which being divine, brought its aids with it; without which 'twas utterly impossible for all the skill or oratory of men to overcome such disadvantages.

36. AND yet with all these did these rude inartificial men contest, and that with signal success: no less than three thousand Proselytes made by Saint Peters first Sermon; and that in Jerusalem, the Scene where all was acted, and consequently where 'twas the most impossible to impose a forgery. And at the like miraculous rate they went on, till as the Pharisees themselves complain, they had filled Jerusalem with their doctrine, Acts 5.28. nor did Judea set bounds to them; their sound went out into all Nations, Rom. 10.18. and their doctrine spread itself through all the Gentile world.

37. AND sure so wonderful an event, so contrary to all human measures, do's sufficiently evince there was more than man in it. Nothing but the same creative Power that produced light out of darkness, could bring forth effects so much above the proportion of the cause. Had these weak instruments acted only by their natural powers, nothing of this had been achiev'd. Alas, could these poor rude men learn all Languages within the space of fifty days, which would take up almost as many years of the most industrious Student, and yet had they not been able to speak them, they could never have divulg'd the Gospel to the several Nations, nor so effectually have convinced the by-standers, Act. 2. that they acted by a higher impulse. And to convince the world they did so, they repeated their Masters miracles as well as his doctrine; healed the sick, cast out devils, raised the dead; And where God communicated so much of his power, we may reasonably conclude he did it to promote his own work, not the work of the devil, as it must have been if this whole Scene were a lie.

38. WHEN all this is weigh'd, I presume there will remain little ground to suspect, that the first planters of Christian Faith had any other design than what they avow'd, viz. the bringing men to holiness here, and salvation hereafter. The suspicion therefore, if any, must rest upon later times; and accordingly some are willing to persuade themselves and others, that the whole Scheme of our Religion, is but a lately devis'd Fable to keep the world in awe; whereof Princes have made some use, but Clergy-men more; and that Christ and his Apostles are only actors whom themselves have conjured up upon the stage to pursue their plot.

39. IN answer to this bold, this blasphemous suggestion, I should first desire these surmisers to point out the time when, and the persons who began this design; to tell us exactly whence they date this politic Religion, as they are pleas'd to suppose it. If they cannot, they are manifestly unjust to reject our account of it when they can give none themselves; and fail very much of that rigid demonstration they require from others. That there is such a profession as Christianity in the world, is yet (God be blest) undeniable; (though at the rate it has of late declined, God knows how long it will be so:) we say it came by Christ, and his Apostles, and that it is attested by an uninterrupted testimony of all the intervening Ages, the suffrage of all Christian Churches from that day to this. And sure they who embraced the doctrine, are the most competent witnesses from whence they received it.

40. YET lest they should be all thought parties to the design, and their witness excepted against, it has pleased God to give us collateral assurances, and made both Jewish and Gentile Writers give testimony to the Antiquity of Christianity. Josephus do's this, lib. 20. chap. 8. and lib. 18. chap. 4. where, after he has given an account of the crucifixion of Christ exactly agreeing with the Evangelists; he concludes, And to this day the Christian people, who of him borrow their name cease not to increase. I add not the personal elogium which he gives of our Savior; because some are so hardy to control it: also I pass what Philo mentions of the religious in Egypt, because several Learned men refer it to the Essens, a Sect among the Jews, or some other. There is no doubt of what Tacitus and other Roman Historians speak of Christ as the Author of the Christian doctrine; which it had been impossible for him to have don, if there had then been no such doctrine, or if Christ had not been known as the Founder of it. So afterward Pliny gives the Emperor Trajan an account both of the manners, and multitude of the Christians; and makes the innocence of the one, and the greatness of the other, an Argument to slacken the persecution against them. Nay, the very bloody Edicts of the persecuting Emperors, & the scoffs and reproaches of Celsus, Porphyri, Lucian, and other profane opposers of this Doctrine, do undeniably assert its being. By all which it appears, that Christianity had in those Ages not only a being, but had also obtained mightily in the world, and drawn in vast numbers to its profession; and vast indeed they must needs be, to furnish out that whole Army of Martyrs, of which profane, as well as Ecclesiastic writers speak. And if all this be not sufficient to evince that Christianity stole not clancularly into the world, but took its rise from those times and persons it pretends, we must renounce all faith of testimony, and not believe an inch farther then we see.

41. I suppose▪ I need say no more to show that the Gospel, and all those portentous miracles which attested it, were no forgeries, or stratagems of men. I come now to that doubt which more immediately concerns the Holy Scripture, viz. whether all those transactions be so faithfully related there, that we may believe them to have been dictated by the spirit of God. Now for this, the process need be but short, if we consider who were the penmen of the New Testament; even for the most part the Apostles themselves: Matthew, and John who wrote two of the Gospels were certainly so: and Mark, as all the Ancients aver, was but the Amanuensis to Saint Peter, who dictated that Gospel. Saint Luke indeed comes not under this first rank of Apostles; yet is by some affirmed to be one of the seventy Disciples: however an Apostolical person 'tis certain he was, and it was no wonder for such to be inspired. For in those first Ages of the Church men acted more by immediate inflation of the Spirit then since. And accordingly we find Stephen, though but a Deacon, had the power of miracles; and preached as divinely as the prime Apostles, Act. 7. And the gift of the Holy Ghost was then a usual concomitant of conversion, as appears in the Story of Cornelius, Acts 10.45, 46. Besides, Saint Luke was a constant attendant on Saint Paul (who derived the Faith not from man, but by the immediate revelation of Jesus Christ, as himself professes, Gal. 1.12.) and is by some said to have wrote by dictat from him, as Mark did from Saint Peter. Then as to the Epistles they all bear the names of Apostles, except that to the Hebrews, which yet is upon very good grounds, presumed to be Saint Paul's. Now these were the persons commissioned by Christ to preach the Christian doctrine, and were signally assisted in the discharge of that office; so that as he tells them, it was not they, who spake, but the spirit of the Father that spake in them, Mat. 13.11. And if they spake by divine inspiration, there can be no question that they wrote so also. Nay, indeed of the two, it seems more necessary they should do the later. For had they err'd in anything they orally delivered, they might have retracted and cured the mischief: but these Books being designed as a standing immutable rule of Faith and manners to all successions, any error in them would have been irreparable, and have entailed itself upon posterity: which agreed neither with the truth, nor goodness of God to permit.

42. NOW that these Books were indeed writ by them whose names they bear, we have as much assurance as 'tis possible to have of anything of that nature, and that distance of time from us. For however some of them may have been controverted; yet the greatest part have admitted no dispute, whose doctrines agreeing exactly with the others, give testimony to them. And to the bulk of those writings, it is notorious that the first Christians received them from the Apostles, and so transmitted them to the ensuing Ages, which received them with the like esteem and veneration. They cannot be corrupted, says Saint Austin in the thirty second Book against Faustus the Manich. c. 16. because they are and have been in the hands of all Christians. And whosoever should first attempt an alteration, he would be confuted by the inspection of other ancients Copies. Besides, the Scriptures are not in someone Language, but translated into many: so that the faults of one Book would be corrected by others more ancient, or in a different Tongue.

43. And how much the body of Christians were in earnest concerned to take care in this matter, appears by very costly evidences; multitudes of them choosing rather to part with their lives than their Bibles. And indeed 'tis a sufficient proof, that their reverence of that Book was very avowed and manifest; when their heathen Persecutors made that one part of their persecution. So that as wherever the Christian Faith was received, this Book was also, under the notion we now plead for, viz. as the writings of men inspired by God: so it was also contended for even unto death; and to part with the Bible was to renounce the Faith. And now, after such a cloud of testimonies, we may sure take up that (ill-applied) saying of the high Priest, Mat. 26.65. what farther need have we of witnesses.

44. YET besides these, another sort of witnesses there are, I mean those intrinsic evidences which arise out of the Scripture itself; but of these I think not proper here to insist, partly because the subject will be in a great degree coincident with that of the second general consideration; and partly because these can be argumentative to none who are not qualified to discern them. Let those who doubt the divine Original of Scripture, well digest the former grounds which are within the verge of reason; and when by those they are brought to read it with due reverence, they will not want Arguments from the Scripture itself to confirm their veneration of it.

45. IN the mean time, to evince how proper the former discourse is to found a rational belief that the Scripture is the word of God; I shall compare it with those measures of credibilty upon which all human transactions move, and upon which men trust their greatest concerns without diffidence or dispute.

46. THAT we must in many things trust the report of others is so necessary, that without it human society cannot subsist. What a multitude of subjects are there in the world, who never saw their Prince, nor were at the making of any Law? if all these should deny their obedience, because they have it only by hear-say, there is such a man, and such Laws, what would become of government? So also for property, if nothing of testimony may be admitted, how shall any man prove his right to anything? All pleas must be decided by the sword, and we shall fall into that state (which some have fancied the primitive) of universal hostility. In like manner for traffic and commerce; how should any Merchant first attempt a trade to any foreign part of the world, if he did not believe that such a place there was? and how could he believe that, but upon the credit of those who have been there? Nay indeed how could any man first attempt to go but to the next Market Town, if he did not from the report of others, conclude that such a one there was? so that if this universal diffidence should prevail, every man should be a kind of Plantagnus, fixed to the soil he first sprung up in. The absurdities are indeed so infinite, and so obvious, that I need not dilate upon them.

47. BUT it will perhaps be said, that in things that are told us by our contemporaries, and that relate to our own time, men will be less apt to deceive us, because they know 'tis in our power to examine and discover the truth. To this I might say, that in many instances it would scarce quit cost to do so; and the inconveniences of trial would exceed those of belief. But I shall willingly admit this probable Argument, and only desire it may be applied to our main question, by considering whether the primitive Christians who received the Scripture as divine, had not the same security of not being deceived, who had as great opportunities of examining, and the greatest concern of doing it throly, since they were to engage not only their future hopes in another world, but (that which to nature is much more sensible) all their present enjoyments, and even life itself upon the truth of it.

48. BUT because it must be confessed that we who are so many Ages removed from them, have not their means of assurance, let us in the next place consider, whether an assent to those testimonies they have left behind them, be not warranted by the common practice of mankind in other cases. Who is there that questions there was such a man as William the Conqueror in this Island? or, to lay the Scene farther; who doubts there was an Alexander, a Julius Caesar, an Augustus? Now what have we to found this confidence on besides the faith of History? And I presume even those who exact the severest demonstrations for Ecclesiastic Story, would think him a very impertinent Sceptic that should do the like in these. So also, as to the Authors of Books; who disputes whether Homer writ the Iliads, or Virgil the Aeneids, or Caesar the Commentaries, that pass under their names? yet none of these have been attested in any degree like the Scripture. 'Tis said indeed, that Caesar ventured his own life to save his Commentaries, employing one hand to hold that above the water, when it should have assisted him in swimming. But whoever laid down their lives in attestation of that, or any human composure, as multitudes of men have don for the Bible?

49. BUT perhaps 'twill be said, that the small concern men have, who wrote these, or other the like Books, inclines them to acquiesce in the common opinion. To this I must say, that many things inconsiderable to mankind have oft been very laboriously discust, as appears by many unedifying Volumes, both of Philosophers and Schole-men. But whatever may be said in this instance, 'tis manifest there are others, wherein men's real and greatest interests are entrusted to the testimonies of former Ages. For example, a man possesses an estate which was bought by his great Grand-father, or perhaps elder Progenitor: he charily preserves that deed of purchase, and never looks for farther security of his title: yet alas, at the rate that men object against the Bible, what numberless Cavils might be raised against such a deed? How shall it be known that there was such a man as either Seller or Purchaser? if by the witnesses; they are as liable to doubt as the other; it being as easy to forge the Attestation as the main writing: and yet notwithstanding all these possible deceits, nothing but a positive proof of forgery can invalidate this deed. Let but the Scripture have the same measure, be allowed to stand in force, to be what it pretends to be, till the contrary be (not by surmises and possible conjectures) but by evident proof evinced; and its greatest Advocates will ask no more.

50. A like instance may be given in public concerns: the immunities and rights of any Nation, particularly here, of our Magna Charta, granted many Ages since, and deposited among the public Records: to make this signify anything, it must be taken for granted, that this was without falsification preserved to our times; yet how easy were it to suggest that in so long a succession of its keepers, some may have been prevailed on by the influence of Princes to abridg and curtail its concessions, others by a prevailing faction of the people to amplify and extend it? Nay, if men were as great Sceptics in Law, as they are in Divinity, they might exact demonstrations that the whole thing were not a forgery. Yet, for all these possible surmises, we still build upon it, and should think he argued very fallaciously, that should go to evacuate it, upon the force of such remote suppositions.

51. NOW I desire it may be considered whether our security concerning the holy Scripture be not as great, nay, greater then it can be of this. For first, this is a concern only of a particular Nation, and so can expect no foreign attestation; and secondly, it has all along rested on the fidelity of its keepers; which has either been a single person, or at best some small number at a time; whereas the Scriptures have been witness'd to by persons of all Nations, and those not single, but collective Bodies and Societies, even as many as there have been Christian Churches throout the world. And the same that are its Attestors have been its Guardians also, and by their multitudes made it a very difficult, if not an impossible thing to falsify it in any considerable degree; it being not imaginable, as I showed before from St. Austin, all Churches should combine to do it: and if they did not, the fraud could not pass undetected: and if no eminent change could happen, much less could any new, any counterfeit Gospel be obtruded, after innumerable Copies of the first had been translated into almost all Languages, and dispersed throughout the world.

52. THE Imperial Law compil'd by Justinian, was soon after his death, by reason of the inroads of the Goths, and other barbarous Nations, utterly lost in the Western world; and scarce once heard of for the space of five hundred years, and then came casually to be retri'd upon the taking of Amalsis by the Pisans; one single Copy being found there at the plundering of the City. And the whole credit of those Pandects, which have ever since governed the Western world, depends in a manner on that single Book, formerly called the Pisan; and now, after that Pisa was taken by the Florentines, the Florentine Copy. But notwithstanding this; the body of the Civil Law obtains; and no man thinks it reasonable to question its being really what it pretends to be, notwithstanding its single, and so long interrupted derivation. I might draw this parallel thro many other instances, but these may suffice to show, that if the Scriptures might find but so much equity, as to be tried by the common measures of other things, it it would very well pass the test.

53. BUT men seem in this case (like our late Legislators) to set up new extraregular Courts of Justice, to try those whom no ordinary rules will cast, yet their designs rerequire should be condemned: And we may conclude, 'tis not the force of reason, but of prejudice; that makes them so unequal to themselves as to reject the Scriptures, when they receive everything else upon far weaker grounds. The bottom of it is, they are resolved not to obey its precepts; and therefore think it the shortest cut to disavow its authority: for should they once own that, they would find themselves entangled in the most inextricable dilemma; that of the Pharisees about John the Baptist: If we say from heaven, he will say, why then did you not believe him? Mat. 21.25. If they confess the Scriptures divine, they must be self-condemned in not obeying them. And truly men that have such preingagements to their lusts, that they must admit nothing that will disturb them; do but prevaricate when they call for greater evidences and demonstrations: for those bosom Sophisters will elude the most manifest convictions; and like Jugglers, make men disbelieve even their own senses. So that any other ways of evidence will be as disputable with them, as those already offered: which is the third thing I proposed to consider.

54. IT has been sometimes seen in popular mutinies, that when blanks have been sent them, they could not agree what to ask: and were it imaginable that God should so far court the infidelity of men, as to allow them to make their own demands, to set down what ways of proof would persuade them; I doubt not there are many have obstinacy enough, to defeat their own methods, as well as they now do God's. 'Tis sure there is no ordinary way of conviction left for them to ask, God having already (as hath also been showed) afforded that. They must therefore resort to immediate revelation, expect instant assurances from heaven, that this book we call the Bible is the word of God.

55. MY first question then is, in what manner this revelation must be made to appear credible to them. The best account we have of the several ways of revelation is from the Jews, to whom God was pleased upon new emergencies signally to revele himself. These were first dreams; secondly, visions; by both which the Prophets received their inspirations. Thirdly, Vrim and Thummim. Fourthly, the Bath-col (as they term it) Thunder and voice from Heaven. Let us consider them distinctly, and see whether our Sceptical men may not probably find somewhat to dispute in everyone of these. And first for dreams; it is among us so hard to distinguish between those that arise from constitution, prepossession of fancy, diabolical or divine infusion, that those that have the most critically considered them, do rather difference them by their matter, than any certain discriminating circumstances: and unless we had some infallible way of discerning, our dependence on them may more probably betray than direct us. 'Tis unquestionable that usually fancy has the greatest stroke in them. And if he that should commit himself to the guidance of his waking fancy, is not like to be over-wisely governed, what can we expect from his sleeping? All this and more may doubtless be soberly enough objected against the validity of our common dreams.

56. BUT admit there were now such divine dreams as brought their evidence along with them; yet sure 'tis possible for prejudic'd men, to resist even the clearest convictions. For do we not see some that have made a shift to extinguish that natural light, those notions which are interwoven into the very frame and constitution of their minds, that so they may sin more at ease, and without reluctancy? and sure 'tis as possible for them to close their eyes against all rays from without too, to resist revelation as well as instinct; and more likely, by how much a transient cause is naturally less operative than a permanent. An instance of this we have in Balaam; who being in these nightly visitations prohibited by God to go to Balak; and though he knew then, what he afterwards says, Num. 23.19. that God was not a man that he should lie, nor the son of man that he should repent: yet he would not take God at his first word, but upon a fresh bait to his covetousness, tries again for an answer more indulgent to his interest. Besides, if God should thus revele himself to some particular persons, yet 'tis beyond all president or imagination, that he should do it to every man; and then how shall those who have these dreams, be able to convince others that they are divine?

57. 'TIS easy to guess what reception a man that produces no other authority, would have in this ludicrous Age: he would certainly be thought rather to want sleep, than to have had revelations in it. And if Jacob and the Patriarchs, who were themselves acquainted with divine dreams, yet did not believe Josephs; any man that should now pretend in that kind, would be sure to fall under the same irony that he did, to be entertained with a behold this dreamer cometh, Gen. 37.19.

58. THE second way of revelation by vision was, where the man was wrapped into an ecstasy, his spirit for a while suspended from all sensible communication with the body, and entertained with supernatural light. In these the Prophets saw emblematical representations of future events, received knowledge of divine Mysteries, and commission and ability to discharge the whole prophetic office. Now suppose God should now raise us Prophets, and inspire them after this manner; what would the merry men of this time say to it? Can we think that they who rally upon all that the former Prophets have writ, would look with much reverence on what the new ones should say? Som perhaps would construe their raptures to be but like Muhammad's Epilepsy; others a fit of frenzy, others perhaps a being drunk with new wine; Act. 2.13. but those that did the most soberly consider it, would still need a new revelation to attest the truth of this: there being far more convincing arguments to prove the Scriptures divine, than any man can allege to prove his inspiration to be so. And 'tis sure a very irrational method, to attempt the clearing of a doubt, by somewhat which is itself more doubtful.

59. A third way, was by Vrim and Thummim, which Writers tell us was an Oracle resulting from the Letters which were graven 〈1 page missing〉 the High Priests Pectoral, to which in all important doubts the Jews of those Ages resorted, and received responses; but whether it were by the sudden prominency, or resplendency of the letters, or by any other way, is not material in this place to enquire: one thing is certain, that the Ephod, and consequently the Pectoral was in the Priests custody, and that he had the administration of the whole affair. Now I refer it to consideration, whether this one circumstance would not (to those prejudic'd men I speak of) utterly evacuate the credit of the Oracle. They have taught themselves to look on Priest-hood, whether Legal or Evangelical, only as a better name for imposture and cozenage: and they that can accuse the Priests for having kept up a cheat for so many Ages; must needs think them such omnipotent Jugglers, that nothing can be fence against their Legerdemain: and by consequence, this way of revelation would rather foment their displeasure at the Ecclesiastics, then satisfy their doubts of the Scripture.

60. LASTLY, for the fourth way, that of thunder and voice from Heaven, though that would be a signal way of conviction to unprejudiced men, yet it would probably have as little effect as the rest upon the others: men that pretend to such deep reasoning would think it childish to be frighted out of their opinion by a clap of Thunder; some philosophical reason shall be found out, to satisfy them that 'tis the effect only of some natural cause, and any the most improbable shall serve turn to supplant the fear of its being a divine testimony to that, which they are so unwilling should be true. As for the voice from Heaven, it must either be heard by others, and related to them; or else immediately by themselves: if the former, 'twill lie under the same prejudice which the Bible already do's; that they have it but by hear-say, and reporters would fall under the reproach either of design or frenzy; that they meant to deceive, or were themselves deceived by their own distempered fancy. But if themselves should be Auditors of it; 'tis odds but their bottomless jealousies in divine Matters would suggest a possibility of fraud, though they knew not how to trace it: nay 'tis more then possible that they will rather disbelieve their own senses, then in this instance take their testimony with all its consequences.

61. NOR is this a wild supposition: for we see it possible not only for single men, but multitudes to disbelieve their senses, thro an excess of credulity; witness the doctrine of Transubstantiation. Why may it not then be as possible for others to do the like thro a greater excess of incredulity? Besides, men's prepossessions and affections have a strange influence on their Faith: men many times will not suffer themselves to believe the most credible things, if they cross their inclination. How often do we see irregular patients that will not believe anything that their appetite craves will do them hurt, though their Physicians, nay, their own even sensitive experience attest it to them? And can we think that a diseas'd mind, gasping with an Hydropic thirst after the pleasures of sin, will ever assent to those premises, whose conclusion will engage to the renouncing them? Will not a luxurious voluptuous person be willing rather to give his ears the lie, to disbelieve what he hears, then permit them more deeply to disoblige his other senses, by bringing in those restraints and mortifications which the Scripture would impose upon them?

62. THUS we see how little probability there is, that any of these ways of revelation would convince these incredulous men. And indeed, those that will not believe upon such inducements as may satisfy men of sober reason, will hardly submit to any other method, according to that Assertion of Father Abraham; If they hear not Moses and the Prophets, neither will they be persuaded, though one rose from the dead, Luk. 16.31. Now at this rate of infidelity, what way will they leave God to manifest anything convincingly to the world? which is to put him under an impotency greater then adheres to humanity: for we men have power to communicate our minds to others, to tell whether we own such or such a thing, to which we are intitled; and we can satisfy our Auditors that it is indeed we that speak to them: but if every method God uses, do's rather increase then satisfy men's doubts, all intercourse between God and man is intercepted; and he must do that of necessity, which Epicurus phancied he did of choice; viz. keep himself unconcerned in the affairs of mortals, as having no way of communicating with them. Nay (what is yet, if possible, more absurd) he must be supposed to have put the works of his Creation out of his own reach, to have given men discursive faculties, and left himself no way of address to them.

63. THESE inferences how horridly soever they sound, yet I see not how they can be disclaim'd by those, who are unsatisfied with all those ways by which God hath hitherto revel'd himself to the world. For can it be imagined, that God who created man a reasonable creature, that himself might be glorified in his free and rational obedience; (when all other creatures obey upon impulse and instinct) can it, I say, be imagined, that he should so remissly pursue his own design, as to let so many Ages pass since the Creation, and never to acquaint mankind with the particulars wherein that obedience was to be exercised. This sure were so disagreeable to his wisdom and goodness, that it cannot be charged upon his will: and consequently they who own not that he has made any such revelation, must tacitly tax him of impotence, that he could not do it. But if any man will say he has, and yet reject all this which both Jews and Christians receive as such, let him produce his testimonies for the others, or rather (to retort his own measure) his demonstrations. And then let it appear whether his Scheme of doctrine, or ours, will need the greater aid of that easy credulity he reproaches us with.

64. I have now gone thro the method I proposed for evincing the Divine Original of the Scriptures, and shall not descend to examine those more minute and particular Cavils which profane men make against them; the proof of this, virtually superseding all those. For if it be reasonable to believe it the Word of God, it must be reasonable also to believe it of perfection proportionable to the Author; and then certainly it must be advanced beyond all our objections. For to those who except to the style, the incoherence, the contradictions, or whatever else in Scripture; I shall only ask this one question, whether it be not much more possible that they (who can pretend to be nothing above fallible men) may misjudg, then that the infallible God should dictate anything justly liable to those charges; I am sure they must depart as much from Reason as Religion, to affirm the contrary. But alas, instead of this implicit submission to God's Word, men take up explicit prejudices against it; condemn it without ever examining the truth of the Allegation. 'Tis certain, that in a writing of such Antiquity, whose original Language has Idioms and Phrases so peculiar, whose Country had customs so differing from the rest of the world; 'tis impossible to judge of it without reference to all those circumstances. Add to this, that the Hebrew has been a dead Language for well nigh two thousand years, nowhere in common use: nor is there any other ancient Book now extant in it, besides those, yet not all neither, of the Old Testament.

65. Now of those many who defame Holy Writ, how few are there that have the industry to inquire into those particulars? And when for want of knowledge, some passages seem improper, or perhaps contradictory; the Scripture must bear the blame of their ignorance, and be accused as absurd and unintelligible, because themselves are stupid and negligent. It were therefore methinks but a reasonable proposal, that no man should arraign it, till they have used all honest diligence, taken in all probable helps for the understanding it: and if this might be obtained, I believe most of its Accusers would like those of the woman in the Gospel, Jo. 8.9. drop away, as conscious of their own incompetency: the loudest out-cries that are made against it, being commonly of those who fall upon it only as a fashionable theme of discourse, and hope to acquire themselves the reputation of wits by thus charging God foolishly. But he that would candidly and uprightly endeavor to comprehend before he judges, and to that end industriously use those means which the providence of God by the labors of pious men hath afforded him, will certainly find cause to acquit the Scripture of those imputations which our bold Critics have cast upon it. I do not say that he shall have all the obscurities of it perfectly cleared to him; but he shall have so many of them as is for his real advantage, and shall discern such reasons why the rest remain unfathomable, as may make him not only justify, but celebrate the wisdom of the Author.

66. YET this is to be expected only upon the fore-mentioned condition, viz. that he come with sincere and honest intentions; for as for him that comes to the Scripture with design, and wishes to find matter of cavil, and accusations; there is little doubt but that spirit of impiety and profaneness which sent him thither, will meet him there as a spirit of delusion and occecation. That Prince of the Air will cast such mists, raise such black vapors; that as the Apostle speaks, the light of the glorious Gospel of Christ shall not shine unto him, 2 Cor. 4.5. Indeed were such a man left only to the natural efficacy of prejudice, that is of itself so blinding, so infatuating a thing, as commonly fortifies against all conviction. We see it in all the common instances of life; men's very senses are often enslav'd by it: the prepossession of a strong fancy will make the objects of sight or hearing appear quite different from what they are. But in the present case, when this shall be added to Satanical illusions, and both left to their operations by God's with-drawing his illuminating grace, the case of such a man answers that description of the Scripture. They have eyes and see not, ears have they and hear not, Rom. 11.8. And that God will so withdraw his grace, we have all reason to believe; he having promise'd it only to the meek; to those who come with malleable ductile spirits, to learn, not to deride or cavil. Saint Peter tells us, that the unlearned and unstable wrest the Scripture to their own destruction, 2 Pet. 3.15. And if God permit such to do so, much more will he the proud and malicious.

67. I say not this, to deter any from the study of Holy Scripture, but only to caution them to bring a due preparation of mind along with them; God's Word being like a generous sovereign medicament; which if simply and regularly taken, is of the greatest benefit; but if mixed with poison, serves only to make that more fatally operative. To conclude, he that would have his doubts solv'd concerning Scripture, let him follow the method our blessed Lord has prescribed: Let him do the will of God, and then he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, Jo. 7.17 Let him bring with him a probity of mind, a willingness to assent to all convictions he shall there meet with: and then he will find grounds sufficient to assure him that it is God's Word and consequently to be received with all the the submission and reverence, that its being so exacts.

SECT. III. The subject matter treated of in the Holy Scripture is excellent, as is also its end and design.

WE have hitherto considered the holy Scripture only under one notion, as it is the Word of God; we come now to view it in the subject matter of it, the several parts whereof it consists; which are so various and comprehensive, as shows the whole is derived from him who is all in all, 1 Cor. 19.28. But that we may not speak only loosely, and at rovers, we will take this excellent frame in pieces, and consider its most eminent parts distinctly. Now the parts of Holy Writ seem to branch themselves into these severals. First, the Historical; secondly, the Prophetic; thirdly, the Doctrinal; fourthly, the Preceptive; fifthly, the Minatory, sixthly, the Promissory. These are the several veins in this rich Mine, in which he who industriously labors, will find the Psalmist was not out in his estimate, when he pronounces them more to be desired than gold, yea, then much fine gold, Psal. 19.10.

2. TO speak first of the Historical part; the things which chiefly recommend a History are the dignity of the subject, the truth of the relation, and those pleasant or profitable observations which are interwoven with it. And first, for the dignity of the subject, the History of the Bible must be acknowledged to excel all others: those show the rise and progress of someone people or Empire; this shows us the original of the whole Universe; and particularly of man, for whose use and benefit the whole Creation was designed. By this mankind is brought into acquaintance with itself; made to know the elements of its constitution, and taught to put a differing value upon that Spirit which was breathed into it by God, Gen. 2.7. and the flesh whose foundation is in the dust, Job 4.19. And when this Historical part of Scripture contracts and draws into a narrow channel, when it records the concerns but of one Nation, yet it was that which God had dignified above all the rest of the world, marked it out for his own peculiar; made it the repository of his truth, and the visible stock from whence the Messiah should come, in whom all the Nations of the earth were to be blessed, Gen. 18.18. so that in this one people of the Jews, was virtually infolded the highest and most important interests of the whole world; and it must be acknowledged, no Story could have a nobler subject to treat of.

3. SECONDLY, as to the truth of the relation, though to those who own it God's Word there needs no other proof; yet it wants not human Arguments to confirm it. The most undoubted sytome of sincerity in an Historian is impartiality. Now this is very eminent in Scripture writers: they do not record others faults, and baulk their own; but indifferently accuse themselves as well as others. Moses mentions his own diffidence and unwillingness to go on God's message, Ex. 4.13. his provocation of God at the waters of Meribah, Num. 20. Jonah records his own sullen behavior towards God, with as great aggravations as any of his enemies could have don. Peter in his dictating Saint Marks Gospel, neither omits nor extenuates his sin; all he seems to speak short in, is his repentance. Saint Paul registers himself as the greatest of sinners.

4. AND as they were not indulgent to their own personal faults, so neither did any nearness of relation, any respect of quality bribe them to a concelement: Moses relates the offense of his sister Miriam in mutining. Num. 12.1. of his brother Aaron in the matter of the Calf, Ex. 32.4. with as little disguise as that of Korah and his company. David though a King, hath his adultery and murder displayed in the blackest characters; and King Hezekiah's little vanity of showing his treasures, do's not escape a remark. Nay, even the reputation of their Nation could not biass the sacred Writers; but they freely tax their crimes: the Israelites murmurings in the wilderness; their Idolatries in Canaan, are set down without any palliation or excuse. And they are as frequently branded for their stubbornness and ingratitude, as the Canaanites are for their abominations. So that certainly no History in the world do's better attest its truth by this evidence of impartiality.

5. IN the last place it commends itself both by the pleasure and profit it yields. The rarity of those events it records surprizes the mind with a delightful admiration; and that mixture of sage Discourses, and well-coucht Parables wherewith it abounds, do's at once please and instruct. How ingenuously apt was Nathan's Apologue to David, whereby with holy artifice he ensnar'd him into repentance? And it remains still matter of instruction to us, to show us with what unequal scales we are apt to weigh the same crime in others and ourselves. So also that long train of smart calamities which succeeded his sin, is set out with such particularity, that it seems to be exactly the crime reversed. His own lust with Bathsheba, was answered with Ammons towards Tamar; his murder of Uriah with that of Amnon; his treacherous contrivance of that murder, with Absolom's traitorous conspiracy against him. So that every circumstance of his punishment, was the very echo and reverberation of his guilt. A multitude of the like instances might be produced out of holy Writ; all concurring to admonish us, that God exactly marks, and will repay our crimes; and that commonly with such propriety, that we need no other clue to guide us to the cause of our sufferings, then the very sufferings themselves. Indeed innumerable are the profitable observations arising from the historical part of Scripture, that flow so easily and unconstrain'd; that nothing but a stupid inadvertence in the reader can make him baulk them: therefore 'twould be impertinent here to multiply instances.

6. LET us next consider the prophetic part of Scripture, and we shall find it no less excellent in its kind. The prophetic Books are for the most part made up (as the prophetic Office was) of two parts; prediction and instruction. When God raised up Prophets, 'twas not only to acquaint men with future events, but to reform their present manners: and therefore as they are called Seers in one respect, so they are Watch-men and Shepherds in another. Nay, indeed the former was often subservient to the other as to the nobler end: their gift of foretelling was to gain them authority; to be as it were the seal of their commission; to convince men that they were sent from God: and so to render them the more pliant to their reproofs and admonitions. And the very matter of their prophecies was usually adapted to this end: the denouncing of judgments being the most frequent theme, and that designed to bring men to repentances; as appears experimentally in the case of Nineveh. And in this latter part of their office, the Prophets acted with the greatest incitation and vehemence.

7. WITH what liberty and zeal do's Elijah arraign Ahab of Naboth's murder, and foretell the fatal event of it, without any fear of his power, or reverence of his greatness? And Samuel when he delivers Saul the fatal message of his rejection, do's passionately and convincingly expostulate with him concerning his sin, 1 Sam. 15.17. Now the very same Spirit still breaths in all the prophetic Writings: the same truth of prediction, and the same zeal against vice.

8. FIRST, for the predictions what signal completions do we find? How exactly are all the denunciations of judgments fulfil'd, where repentance has not interven'd? He that reads the 28. chap. of Deut. and compares it with the Jews calamities, both under the Assyrians and Babylonians, and especially under the Romans, would think their oppressors had consulted it, and transcribed their severities thence. And even these Nations, who were the instruments of accomplishing those dismal presages, had their own ruins foretold, and as punctually executed. And as in Kingdoms and Nations, so to private persons none of the prophetic threatenings ever returned empty. The sentence pronounced against Ahab, Jezebel, and their posterity, was fulfilled even to the most minute circumstances of place and manner; as is evident by comparing the denunciation of Elijah, 1 Kings. 21.19.23. with their tragical ends recorded in the following chapters. And as for Jehu, whose service God was pleased to use in that execution, though he rewarded it with entailing the crown of Israel on him for four descents; yet he foretold those should be the limits; and accordingly we find Zachariah, the fourth descendent of his line, was the last of it that sat on that throne, 2 Kings 15.10. So also the destruction of Achitophel and Judas, the one immediate, the other many hundred years remote, are fore-told by David, Psal. 109. and we find exactly answered in the event.

9. NOR was this exactness confined only to the severe predictions, but as eminent in the more gracious. All the blessings which God by himself, or the Ministry of his Prophets promise'd, were still infallibly made good. At the time of life God returned and visited Sarah with conception; notwithstanding those natural improbabilities which made her not only distrust, but even deride and laugh at the promise, Gen. 18. The posterity of that Son of Promise; the whole race of Abraham was deliverd from the Egyptian bondage, and possessed of Canaan, at the precise time which God had long before signified to Abraham, Gen. 15. So likewise the return of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity, was fore-told many years before their deportation, and Cyrus named for their restorer, before he had either name or being save only in God's prescience, Is. 44.28. But I need not multiply instances of national or personal promises. The earliest, and most comprehensive promise of all was that of the Messiah, in whom all persons and Nations of the world were to be blest, Gen. 22.11. that seed of the woman that should bruise the Serpents head, Gen. 3.15. To him give all the Prophets witness, as Saint Peter observes, Acts 10. And he who was the subject, made himself also the expounder of those prophecies in his walk to Emmaus with the two Disciples, Lu. 24.13. beginning at Moses, and all the Prophets, he expounded to them in all the Scriptures, the things concerning himself.

10. THIS as it was infinitely the greatest blessing afforded mankind, so was it the most frequently and eminently predicted; and that with the most exact particularity as to all the circumstances. His immaculate conception, the union of his two natures implied in his name Immanuel; Behold a virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and shall call his name Immanuel; is most plainly foretold by Is. Chap. 7.14. Nay the very place of his birth so punctually foretold; that the Priests and Scribes could readily resolve Herod's question upon the strength of the prophecy, and assure him Christ must be born in Bethlehem, Mat. 2.5. As for the whole business and design of his life, we find it so described by Isaiah chap. 61. as Christ himself owns it, Luk. 4.18. The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath anointed me to preach good tidings to the meek; he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives, and recovering of sight to the blind, to set at liberty them that are bruised, to preach the acceptable year of the Lord.

11. IF we look farther to his death, the greatest part of the Old Testament has a direct aspect on it. All the Levitical economy of Sacrifices and Ablutions were but prophetic Rites, and ocular Predictions of that one expiatory Oblation. Nay, most of God's providential dispensations to the Jews, carried in them types and prefigurations of this. Their rescue from Egypt, the sprinkling of blood to secure from the destroying Angel; the Manna with which they were fed, the Rock which supplied them water: these and many more refer'd to Christ, as their final and highest signification.

12. BUT besides these darker adumbrations, we have (as the Apostle speaks) a more sure word of prophecy. Saint Peter in his calculation begins with Moses, takes in Samuel and the whole succession of Prophets after him, as bearing witness to this great event of Christ's passion, Acts 4.22.24. And indeed he that reads the Prophets consideringly, shall find it so punctually described, that the Evangelists do not much more fully instruct him in the circumstances of it. Daniel tells us, his death, as to the kind of it, was to be violent: The Messiah shall be cut off; and as to the design of it, 'twas not for himself, Dan. 9.26. But the Prophet Isaiah gives us more than a bare negative account of it; and expressly says, he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities; the chastisement of our peace was on him, and by his stripes we were healed, chap. 53.5. And again, ver. 10. Thou shalt make his soul an offering for sin; and ver. 11. my righteous Servant shall justify many, for he shall bear their iniquities. Nor is Job an Idumean much short of even this Evangelical Prophet, in that short Creed of his, wherein he owns him as his Redeemer, I know that my Redeemer liveth, &c. Job. 19.25.

13. AND as the end, so the circumstances of his sufferings are most of them under prediction: His extension upon the Cross is mentioned by the Psalmist: They pierced my hands, and my feet; I may tell all my bones, Psal. 22.16.17. As for his inward dolours, they are in that Psalm so pathetically described, that Christ chose that very form to breath them out in: My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? ver. 1. So his revilers did also transcribe part of their reproaches from ver. 8. He trusted in God; let him deliver him now if he will have him, Mat. 27.43.

That vinegar which was offered him on the cross, was a completion of a prophecy; In my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink, Ps 69.21. the piercing of his side was expressly fore-told by Zacharias; they shall look on him whom they have pierced, Zach. 10.12. The company in which he suffered, and the interment he had, are also intimated by Isaiah, he made his grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death, Isai. 53.9. Nay even the disposal of his garments was not without a prophecy: they parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots, Ps. 22.18. Here are a cloud of witnesses, which as they serve eminently to attest the truth of Christian Religion; so do they to evince the excellency of sacred Scripture; as to the verity of the prophetic part.

14. AS to the admonitory part of the prophetic Writings, they are in their kind no way inferior to the other. The reproofs are autoritative and convincing. What piercing exprobrations do we find of Israel's ingratitude? How often are they upbraided with the better examples of the brute creatures? with the Ox and the Ass by Isaiah, chap. 1.3. with the Stork, and the Crane, and the Swallow, by Jeremiah, chap. 8.7. Nay the constancy of the Heathen to their false gods is instanc'd to reproach their revolt from the true. Hath a Nation changed their gods which yet are no gods? but my people have changed their glory for that which doth not profit, Jer. 2.11. What awful, what majestic representations do we find of God's power, to awake their dread! Fear ye not me saith the Lord? will ye not tremble at my presence; who have placed the sand for the bounds of the sea by a perpetual decree, that it cannot pass over; and though the waves thereof toss themselves, yet can they not prevail; though they roar, yet can they not pass over it, Jer. 22. And again, Thus saith the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, Is. 57.15. So we find him described as a God glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wonders, Ex. 15.11. These and many other the like heights of divine eloquence we meet with in the prophetic Writings: which cannot but strike us with an awful reverence of the divine Power.

15. NOR are they less pathetic in the gentler strains. What instance is there of the greatest tenderness and love which God has not adopted to express his by? He personates all the nearest and most endearing relations; that of a Husband; I will marry thee to myself, Hos. 2.19. of a Father; I am a Father to Israel, and Ephraim is my first born: nay, he vies bowels with the tender sex; and makes it more possible for a mother to renounce her compassions towards the son of her womb, then for him to withdraw his, Isa. 49.15. By all these endearments, these cords of a man, these bands of love, as himself stiles them, Hos. 11.4. endeavoring to draw his people to their duty, and their happiness. And when their perverseness frustrates all this his holy Artifice; how passionately do's he expostulate with them? how solemnly protest his averseness to their ruin? Why will ye die O house of Israel? for I have no pleasure in the death of him that dieth, saith the Lord God, Ezek. 18.31, 32. with what regrets and relentings do's he think of abandoning them? How shall I give thee up Ephraim? how shall I deliver thee Israel? how shall I make thee as Admah! how shall I set thee as Zeboim? my heart is turned within me, my repentings are kindled together; Hos. 11.8. In short, 'twere endless to cite the places in these prophetic Books, wherein God do's thus condescend to solicit even the sensitive part of man; and that with such moving Rhetoric, that I cannot but wonder at the exception some of our late Critics make against the Bible, for its defect in that particular: for Oratory is nothing but a dextrous application to the affections and passions of men. And certainly we find not that don with greater advantage anywhere then in sacred Writ.

16. YET it was not the design of the Prophets (no more then of the Apostle) to take men with guile; 2 Cor. 12.16. to inveigle their affections unawares to their understandings; but they address as well to their reasons, make solemn appeals to their judicative faculties. And now judge I pray between me and my vineyard, says Isa. 5.3. Nay, God by the Prophet Ezekiel solemnly pleads his own cause before them, vindicates the equity of his proceedings from the aspersions they had cast on them; and by most irrefragable Arguments refutes that injurious proverb which went currant among them; and in the close appeals to themselves, O house of Israel are not my ways equal, are not your ways unequal? Ezek. 18. the evidences were so clear that he remits the matter to their own determination. And generally we shall find that among all the Topics of disuasion from sin, there is none more closely pressed, then that of the folly of it. Idolatry was a sin to which Israel had a great propension, and against which most of the Prophets admonitions were directed. And certainly it can never be more exposed, and the sottish unreasonableness of it better displayed, then we find it in the 44. chap. of Isaiah. In like manner we may read the Prophet Jeremy dissuading from the same sin by Arguments of the most irrefragable conviction, Jer. 10.

17. AND as the Prophets omitted nothing as to the manner of their address, to render their exhortations effectual, the matter of them was likewise so considerable as to command attention; It was commonly either the recalling them from their revolts and Apostacies from God by Idolatry, or else to convince them of the insignificancy of all those legal ceremonial performances they so much confided in; when taken up as a supersedeas to moral duties. Upon this account it is, that they often depreciate, and in a manner prohibit the solemnest of their worships. To what purpose are the multitude of your sacrifices unto me? bring no more vain oblations; incense is an abomination to me; the new moons and sabbaths, the calling of assemblies I cannot away with: it is iniquity even your solemn meetings, &c. Is. 1.11.13. Not that these things were in themselves reprobable; for they were all commanded by God; but because the Jews depended so much on these external observances, that they thought by them to commute for the weightier matters of the Law (as our Savior after stiles them) judgment, mercy and faith, Mat. 23.23. looked on these rites which discriminated them from other Nations, as dispensations from the universal obligations of nature and common justice.

18. THIS deceit of theirs is sharply upbraided to them by the Prophet Jeremy; where he calls their boasts of the Temple of the Lord, the Temple of the Lord, lying words; and on the contrary, lays the whole stress of their obedience, and expectation of their happiness on the justice and innocence of their conversation, ch. 7.4. And after do's smartly reproach their insolence in boldly resorting to that house, which by bringing their sins along with them, they made but an Asylum, and Sanctuary for those crimes. Will ye steal, murder and commit adultery, and swear falsely, and burn incense to Baal, and walk after other gods whom ye know not, and come and stand before me in this house? Is this house which is called by my name become a den of robbers in your eyes? chap. 7.9, 10, 11. Indeed all the Prophets seem to conspire in this one design, of making them look thro shadows and ceremonies, to that inward purity, Justice and Honesty, which they were designed to inculcate, not to supplant. And this design as it is in itself most excellent, most worthy the command of God, and the nature of man; so we have seen that it has been pursued by all the most apt, and most powerful mediums, that the thing or persons address to were capable of; and so that the Prophets are no less eminent for the discharge of this exhortatory part of their office, then they were in the former, of the predicting.

19. THE next part of Scripture we are to consider, is the Doctrinal; by which I shall not in this place understand the whole complex of Faith and Manners together; but restrain it only to those Revelations which are the object of our Belief: and these are so sublime, as shows flesh and blood never reveal'd them. Those great mysteries of our Faith, the Trinity, the Incarnation, the Hypostatical union, the Redemption of the world by making the offended party the sacrifice for the offense; are things of so high and abstruse speculation, as no finite understanding can fully fathom. I know their being so, is by some made an Argument for disbelief; but doubtless, very unjustly: for (not to insist upon the different natures of Faith and Science, by which that becomes a proper object of the one which is not of the other) our non-comprehension is rather an indication that they have a higher rise; and renders it infinitely improbable that they could spring from man's invention. For 'twere to suppose too great a disproportion between human faculties to think men could invent what themselves could not understand. Indeed these things lie so much out of the road of human imagination, that I dare appeal to the breasts of the most perverse gain-saiers, whether ever they could have fallen into their thoughts without suggestion from without. And therefore 'tis a malicious contradiction to reject these truths because of their dissonancy from human reason, and yet at the same time to ascribe their original to man. But certainly there can be nothing more inconsistent with mere natural reason, then to think God can be or do no more than man can comprehend. Never any Nation or person that owned a Deity, did ever attempt so to circumscribe him: and it is proportionable only to the licentious profaneness of these later days, thus to measure immensity and omnipotence by our narrow scantling.

20. THE more genuine and proper effect of these supernatural truths is, to raise our admiration of that divine Wisdom, whose ways are so past finding out; and to give us a just sense of that infinite distance which is between it, and the highest of that reason wherein we so pride ourselves. And the great propriety these doctrines have to that end, may well be reckoned as one part of their excellency.

21. INDEED there is no part of our holy Faith, but is naturally productive of some peculiar virtue; as the whole Scheme together engages us to be universally holy in all manner of conversation, 1 Pet. 1.15. And it is the supereminent advantage true Religion hath over all false ones; that it tends to so laudable an end.

22. THE Theology of the Heathens was in many instances an extract and quintessence of vice. Their most solemn Rites, and sacredest Mysteries were of such a nature, that instead of refining and elevating, they corrupted and debased their Votaries; immersed them in all those abominable pollutions which sober nature abhorred. Whereas the principles of our Faith serve to spiritualize and rectify us, to raise us as much above mere manhood as theirs cast them below it.

23. AND as they are of this vast advantage to us, so also are they just to God, in giving us right notions of him. What vile unworthy apprehensions had the Heathen of their Deities; in titling them not only to the passions, but even to the crimes of men: making Jupiter an adulterer, Mercury a thief, Bacchus a drunkard, &c. proportionably of the rest? Whereas our God is represented to us as an essence, so spiritual, and incorporeal, that we must be unbodied ourselves before we can perfectly conceive what he is: so far from the impotent affections and inclinations of men, that he has neither parts, nor passions; and is fain to veil himself under that disguise, to speak sometimes as if he had, merely in condescension to our grosser faculties. And again, so far from being an example, a patron of vice, that his eyes are too pure to behold iniquity, Hab. 1.13. Holiness is an essential part of his nature, and he must deny himself to put it off.

24. THE greatest descent that ever he made to humanity, was in the incarnation of the second person: yet even in that though he linked with a sinful nature, yet he preserved the person immaculate; and while he had all the sins of the world upon him by imputation, suffered not any one to be inherent in him.

25. TO conclude, the Scripture describes our God to us by all those glorious Attributes of infinity, Power and Justice, which may render him the proper object of our Adorations and Reverence: and it describes him also in those gentler Attributes of Goodness, Mercy and Truth, which may excite our love of, and dependence on him. These are representations something worthy of God, and such as impress upon our mind great thoughts of him.

26. BUT never did the divine Attributes so concur to exert themselves as in the mystery of our Redemption: where his Justice was satisfied without diminution to his Mercy; and his Mercy without entrenching on his Justice: his Holiness most eminent in his indignation against sin, and yet his love no less so in sparing sinners: these contradictions being reconciled, this discord composed into harmony by his infinite Wisdom. This is that stupendous Mystery into which the Angels desired to look, 1 Pet. 1.12. And this is it which by the Gospel is preached unto us; as it follows, ver. 25.

27. AND as the Scripture gives us this knowledge of God, so it do's also of ourselves; in which two all profitable knowledge is comprised. It teaches us how vile we were in our original dust; and how much viler yet in our fall: which would have sunk us below our first principles; sent us not only to earth, but hell. It shows the impotence of our lapsed estate; that we are not able of ourselves so much as to think a good thought: and it shows us also the dignity of our renovated estate, that we are heirs of God, and fellow-heirs with Christ, Ro. 8.17. yet lest this might puff us up with mistaken hopes; it plainly acquaints us with the condition on which this depends; that it must be our obedience both active and passive, which is to entitle us to it: that we must be faithful to death if we mean to inherit a crown of life, Rev. 2.10. and that we must suffer with Christ, if we will be glorified with him, Ro. 8.17. And upon supposition that we perform our parts of the condition, it gives us the most certain assurance, engages God's veracity that he will not fail on his. By this it gives us support against all the adversities of life; assuring us the sufferings of it are not worthy to be compared with the glory we expect, Rom. 8.18. yea, and against the terrors of death too; by assuring us that what we look on as a dissolution, is but a temporary parting; and we only put off our bodies, that they may put off corruption, and he clothed with immortality.

28. THESE and the like are the doctrines the holy Scripture offers to us: and, we may certainly say, they are faithful sayings, and worthy of all acceptation, 1 Tim. 4.15. The notions it gives us of God are so sublime and great, that they cannot but affect us with reverence, and admiration: and yet withal, so amiable and endearing that they cannot but raise love and gratitude, affiance and delight.

29. AND, which is yet more, these milder Attributes are apt to inspirit us with a generous ambition of assimilation; excite us to transcribe all his imitable excellencies: in which the very Heathens could discern consisted the accomplishment of human felicity.

30. AND then the knowledge it gives us of ourselves, do's us the kindest office imaginable: keeps us from those swelling thoughts we are too apt to entertain, and shows us the necessity of bottoming our hopes upon a firmer foundation: and then again keeps us from being lazy or secure, by showing us the necessity of our own endeavors. In a word, it teaches us to be humble and industrious; and whoever is so ballasted can hardly be shipwrecked.

31. THESE are the excellencies of the doctrinal part of Scripture, which also renders them most aptly preparative for the preceptive. And indeed, so they were designed: the Credenda, and the Agenda being such inseparable relations, that whoever parts them, forfeits the advantage of both. The most solemn profession of Christ, the most importunate invocations, Lord, Lord, will signify nothing to them which do not the things which he says, Mat. 7. And how excellent, how rational those precepts are which the Scripture proposes to us from him, is our next point of consideration.

32. THE first Law which God gave to mankind was that of nature. And though the impressions of it upon the mind be by Adams fall exceedingly dim'd and defac'd; yet that derogates nothing from the dignity and worth of that Law; which God has been so far from cancelling, that he seems to have made it the rule and square of his subsequent Laws: so that nothing is injoin'd in those, but what is consonant and agreeable to that. The Moral Law given in the Decalogue to the Jews, the Evangelical Law given in the Gospel to Christians, have this natural Law for their basis and foundation. They license nothing which that prohibits, and very rarely prohibit anything which it licences.

33. 'TIS true, Christ in his Sermon on the Mount, raises Christians to a greater strictness than the Jews thought themselves obliged to; but that was not by contradicting either the natural, or moral Law, but by rescuing the later from those corruptions which the false glosses of the Scribes and Pharisees had mixed with it; and reducing it to its primitive integrity, and extent. In a word, as the Decalogue was given to repair the defacings, and renew the impressions of the natural Law; so the precepts of the Gospel were designed to revive and illustrate both. And accordingly we find Christ in the matter of divorce calls them back to this natural Law; In the beginning it was not so, Mat. 19.8. I say not but that even these natural notions are in some instances refined and elevated by Christ; the second Adam being to repair the fall of the first with advantage: but yet he still builds upon that ground-work, introduces nothing that is inconsistent with it.

34. AND this accordance between these several Laws is a circumstance that highly recommends Scripture precepts to us. We cannot imagine but that God who made man for no other end but to be an instrument of his glory, and a recipient of all communicable parts of his happiness, would assign him such rules and measures as were most conducive to those ends. And therefore since the Scripture injunctions are of the same mould, we must conclude them to be such as tend to the perfection of our being; the making us what God originally intended us: and he that would not be that, will certainly choose much worse for himself.

35. I know there have been prejudices taken up against the precepts of Christ, as if they imposed unreasonable, unsupportable stricknesses upon men, and some have assumed liberty to argue mutinously against them; nay, against God too for putting such natural appetites into men, and then forbidding them to satisfy them.

36. BUT the ground of this cavil is the not rightly distinguishing of natural appetites, which are to be differenc'd according to the two states of rectitude and depravation: those of the first rank are the appetites God put into man; and those were all regular and innocent; such as tended to the preservation of his being: nature in its first integrity mesuring its desires by its needs. Now Christ's prohibitions are not directed against these: he forbids no one kind of these desires. And though the precept of self-denial may sometimes restrain us in some particular acts; yet that is but proportionable to that restraint Adam was under in relation to the forbidden tree, a particular instance of his obedience and fence of his safety. So that if men would consider nature under this its first and best notion; they cannot accuse Christ of being severe to it.

37. BUT 'tis manifest they take it in another acception, and mean that corruption of nature which inordinately inclines to sensitive things; and on this account they call their riots, their luxuries, appetites put into them by God: whereas 'tis manifest this was super-induced from another coast: The wise man gives us its true pedigree in what he says of death, which is its twin-sister: By the envy of the devil came death into the world, Wis. 2.24. And can they expect that Christ who came to destroy the works of the devil 1 Joh. 3.8. should frame Laws in their favor, make Acts of toleration and indulgence for them? This were to annul the whole design of his coming into the world, which was to restore us from our lapst estate, and elevate us to those higher degrees of purity which he came not only to prescribe but to exemplify to us.

38. BUT in this affair men often take nature in a yet wider and worse notion; and under natural desires comprehend whatever upon any sort of motive they have a mind to do. The awe of a superior, the importunity of a companion, custom, and example make men do many ill things, to which their nature would never prompt them; nay, many times such as their nature relucts to, and abhors. 'Tis certainly thus in all debauchery and excess. 'Tis evident, it gratifies no man's nature to be drunk, or to lie under undigested loads of meats: these are out-rages and violences upon nature; take it only in the most sensitive notion; such as she struggles to avert: and yet men make her bear not only the oppression, but the blame too.

39. BUT besides 'tis to be considered, that the nature of a man includes reason as well as sense, and to this all sorts of luxury are yet more repugnant: as that which clouds the mind, and degrades the man (who in his constitution is a rational being) and sets him in the rank of mere animals: and certainly these can be no appetites of nature, which thus subvert it.

40. THE like may be said concerning revenge, particularly that absurdest sort of it duels; which certainly are as great contradictions to nature as can be imagined, the unravelling and cancelling its very first principle of self-preservation, (which in other instances men bring in bar against duty.) And yet men will say the generosity of their natures compels them to it; so making their natures a kind of felo de se; to prompt the destroying itself: when alas 'tis only the false notion they have got of honor that so engages them. And if men would but soberly consider, they must be convinced that there is nothing more agreeable to reason than that precept of Christ of not retaliating injuries; which is in effect but to bid us to choose a single inconvenience before a long train of mischiefs. And certainly if nature even in its depraved estate were left to determine, it would resolve it a better bargain to go off with a reprochful word, than to loose a limb, perhaps a life in the revenge of it. There being no maxim more indisputable, than that of evils the least is to be chosen. And the innate principle of self-love do's more strongly bias nature to preserve itself, than any external thing can to destroy it.

41. I know 'twill be said to this, that revenge is a natural appetite: but I say still, self-preservation is more so; and would prevail against as much of revenge as is natural, were it not heightened and fortified by fancy, and that Chimera of point of honor, which, as it is now stated, is certainly one of the most empty nothings that ever was brought in balance with solid interests. And indeed 'tis to belie nature, and suppose it to have forfeited all degrees of reason, as well as virtue, to fasten so absurd a choice upon her. But admit revenge to be never so much the dictate of corrupt nature; 'tis certain 'tis not of primitive regular nature. Revenge is but a relative to injury: and he that will say God put the appetite of revenge into man, must say he put the appetite of injury into him also: which is such an account of the sixth days creation, as is hardly consistent with God's own testimony of its being very good, Gen. 1.

42. BESIDES 'tis certain all the desires God infus'd into human nature, were such as tended to its preservation; but this of revenge is of all other the most destructive, as is too sadly attested by the daily tragical effects of it. In short, the wiseman gives a good summary of the whole matter: God made man upright, but he sought out many inventions. Eccl. 7.29.

43. NOW if man have by his own voluntary act depraved himself, it would be neither just nor kind in God to warp his Laws to man's now distorted frame; but it is both, to keep up the perfect rectitude of those, and call upon man to reduce himself to a conformity with them: and when to this is added such a supply of grace as may silence the plea of disability, there can nothing be imagined more worthy of God, or more indulgent to man.

44. AND all this Christ do's in the Gospel, in those precepts which the blind world makes the subject of their cavil or scorn. It were an easy task to evince this in every particular precept of the Gospel; but I shall content myself with the instances already given, and not swell this Tract by insisting upon what has already been the subject of so many pious and excellent discourses, as must already have convinced all but the obstinate.

45. WE proceed therefore to a view of the promissory parts of Scripture; in which we are first in general to observe the great goodness of God, in making any promises at all to us; and next to examine of what nature and excellence these promises are. And first if we consider how many titles God has to our obedience, we must acknowledge he may challenge it as his undoubted right. We are the work of his hands; and if the Potter have power over the clay (the materials whereof are not of his making) much more has God over his creatures, whose matter as well as form is wholly owing to him. We are the price of his blood. And if men account purchase an indefeasible title, God must have absolute dominion over what he has bought, and at so dear a price too as his own blood. Lastly we depend upon him for the support of that being he has given us: we live merely upon his bounty, spend upon his stock. And what Patron will not expect observance from one who thus subsists by him?

46. YET as if God had none of these claims, these preengagements upon us, he descends to treat with us as free-men; by way of Article and compact; buys his own of us, and engages to reward that obedience, which he might upon the utmost penalties exact: which is such an astonishing indulgence as our highest gratitude cannot reach: and of this the sacred Scriptures are the evidences and records; and therefore upon that account deserve at once our reverence, and our joy.

47. BUT this will yet farther appear, if we look in the second place into the promises themselves; which are so extensive as to take in both our present and future state: according to that of the Apostle; Godliness hath the promise of this life, and of that which is to come, Tim. 4.8. For the present they are proportioned to the several parts of our composition; the body, and the mind: the outward and the inward man, so stretching themselves to all we can really be concerned for in this world.

48. AND first for the body, the Old Testament abounds in promises of this sort. The first part of the 28 of Deut. contains a full catalogue of all temporal blessings; and those irreversibly entailed upon the Israelites obedience, ver. 1. The Psalmist tells us, they that fear the Lord shall lack nothing, Ps. 34.9. that they shall not be confounded in the perilous time, and in the days of dearth they shall have enough, Psa. 37.19. And Solomon, that the Lord will not suffer the righteous to famish, Pro. 10.3. And though under the Gospel, the promises of temporal affluence seem not so large; (its design being to spiritualize us, and raise our minds to higher enjoiments;) yet it gives us ample security of so much as is really good for us. It supersedes our care for ourselves by assuring us all these things shall be added to us; Mat. 6.33. that is, all those things which our heavenly Father knows we have need of, ver. 32. which is all the limitation the context gives. And certainly we have little temptation to fear want, who have him for our provider; whose are all the beasts of the Forest, and the cattle upon a thousand hills, Psal. 50.10.

49. AND when we are thus secured of all things necessary, it may perhaps be an equal mercy to secure us from great abundance; which at the best, is but a lading ones self with thick clay, in the Prophets phrase, Hab. 2.6. but is often a snare as well as a burden.

50. BESIDES, the Gospel by its precepts of temperance and self-denial, do's so contract our appetites, that a competence is a more adequate promise to them than that of superfluity would have been: and 'tis also the measure wherein all the true satisfaction of the senses consist; which are gratify'd with moderate pleasures, but suffocated and overwhelmed with excessive. The temperat man tastes and relishes his portion; whilst the voluptuous may rather be said to wallow in his plenty than enjoy it.

51. AND as the necessaries of life, so life itself, and the continuance of that, is a Scripture promise. The fifth Commandment affixes it to one particular duty: but it is in a multitude of places in the Old Testament annexed to general obedience. Thus it is, Deut. 11.9. and again, ver. 21. And Solomon proposes this practical wisdom as the multiplier of days: By me thy days shall be multipli'd, and the years of thy life shall be increased, Pro. 9.11. and chap. 3. Length of days is in her right hand, ver. 16. And though we find not this promise repeated in the New Testament, yet neither is it retracted: 'tis true, the Gospel bids us be ready to lay down our lives for Christ's sake; but it tells us withal, that he that will lose his life, shall save it: which though it be universally true only in the spiritual sense, yet it often proves so in a literal. It did so eminently in the destruction of Jerusalem, where the most resolute Christians escaped, while the base compliers perished together with those they sought to endear. This is certain, that if the New Testament do not expressly promise long life, yet it do's by its rules of temperance and sobriety, contentedness and cheerfulness, very much promote it: and so do's virtually and efficaciously ratify those the Old Testament made.

52. THE next outward blessing is reputation: and this also is a Scripture promise. The wise shall inherit glory, Prov. 3.38. And the virtuous woman Solomon describes is not only blessed by her children and husband, but, she is praised in the gate, Pro. 31. ult. Nay, this blessing is extended even beyond life: The memory of the just shall be blessed, Pro. 10.7. Nor do's the Gospel evacuate this promise; but rather prompts us to the ways of having it made good to us: by advising us to abstain from all appearance of evil, 1 Thes. 5.22. to provide for honest things, not only in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men, 2 Cor. 8.21.

53. 'TIS true indeed, Christ fore-warns his Disciples that they shall be revil'd, and have all manner of evil spoken against them falsely, for his names sake: but then the cause transformed the sufferings, and made it so honorable, that they were to count it matter of joy, Mat. 5.11.12. Neither was this any paradox even in relation to their reputation; which though sullied by a few ill men of that Age, yet has been most illustrious among all Ages since. Their sufferings and indignities gave them a new title of honor, and added the Martyr to the Apostle. And the event has been proportionable in all successions since. Those holy men that filled up the Pagan prisons, filled up the Churches Diptics also, and have been had as the Psalmist speaks, in everlasting remembrance, Ps. 112.6.

54. AND as Scripture promises thus take in all the concerns of the outward man, so do they also of the inward. The fundamental promise of this kind, is that of sending Christ into the world, and in him establishing the new Covenant; which we find, Jer. 31.31. and is refer'd to by the Author to the Hebrews, I will put my Laws in their hearts, and write them in their minds; and their sins and iniquities will I remember no more, Heb. 10.16.

55. AND this is so comprehensive a promise as includes all the concerns of the inward man. The evils incident to the mind of man may be reduced to two; impurity, and inquietude: and here is a cure to both. The divine Law written in the heart, drives thence all those swarms of noisome lusts, which like the Egyptian Frogs over-run and putrefy the soul. Where that is seated and enshrin'd, those can no more stand before it, then Dagon before the Ark. This repairs the divine Image in us (in which consists the perfection of our nature) renews us in the spirits of our minds, Eph. 4.22. and purges our consciences from dead works, Heb. 9.4. which all the Cathartics and Lustrations among the Heathen, all the sacrifices and ceremonies of the Law were not able to do.

56. SECONDLY, this promise secures the mind from that restlessness and unquietness, which attends both the dominion and guilt of sin. To be subject to a man's lusts and corrupt appetites is of all others the vilest vassallage: they are the cruellest task-masters, and allow their slaves no rest, no intermission of their drudgery. And then again, the guilt that tortures and racks the mind with dreadful expectations, keeps it in perpetual agitation and tumult; which is excellently described by the Prophet Isaiah, The wicked is like the troubled sea, when it cannot rest; whose waters cast out mire and dirt: there is no peace saith my God to the wicked, Is. 48.22. How prosperous soever vice may seem to be in the world, yet there are such secret pangs and horrors that dog it, that as Solomon says, even in laughter the heart is sorrowful, Prov. 14.13.

57. BUT this Evangelical promise of being merciful to our iniquities, and remembering our sins no more, calms this tempest, introduces peace and serenity into the mind, and reconciles us at once to God and ourselves. And sure we may well say with the Apostle, these are great and precious promises, 2. Pet. 1.4.

58. THERE are besides many other which spring from these principal, as suckers from the root: such are the promises of fresh supplies of grace upon a good employment of the former. To him that hath shall be given, Mat. 25.29. Nay, even of the source and fountain of all grace. He shall give the holy spirit to them that ask him, Mat. 7.11. Such is that of supporting us in all difficulties and assaults: the not suffering us to be tempted above that we are able, 1 Cor. 10.13. which like God's bow set in the clouds, Gen. 9. is our security, that we shall not be overwhelm'd by any deluge of temptation: and (to instance no more) such is that comprehensive promise of hearing our prayers, Ask and it shall be given you, Mat. 7.7. This puts all good things within our reach, gives us the key of God's Store-house, from whence we may furnish ourselves with all that is really good for us. And if a few full Barns could tempt the rich man in the Gospel, to pronounce a Requiem to his soul; what notes of acquiescence may they sing, who have the command of an inexhaustible store; that are suppli'd by him whose is the earth, and the fullness thereof.

59. AND certainly, all these promises together must be (to use the Apostles phrase) strong consolation; such as may quiet and calm all the fears and griefs, all the tumults and perturbations of the mind, in relation to its present state. But then there are others relating to the future of a much higher elevation: those glories and felicities of another world, which are so far beyond our narrow conceptions, that the comprehension and enjoinder must begin together. The Scripture shadows it out to us by all the notions we have of happiness: by glory, Rom. 8.18. by a kingdom, Mat. 25.14. by joy, Mat. 25.21. and which comprehends all, by being with the Lord, 1 Thes. 4.17. seeing him face to face, 1 Cor. 13.12. being like to him, 1 Jo. 3.2. In a word 'tis bliss in the utmost extent: immense for quantity, and eternal for duration.

60. AND surely this promise is so excellent for kind, so liberal in its degree, so transcendently great in all respects, that did it stand single, stripped of all those that relate to this life, it alone would justify the name of Gospel, and be the best tidings that ever came to mankind. For alas, if we compare the hopes that other Religions propose to their Votaries with these, how base, how ignoble are they! The Heathens Elysium, the Mahumetan Paradise, were but higher gratifications of the sensual part, and consequently were depressions and debasements of the rational. So that in effect they provided a heaven for the beast, and a hell for the man. We may therefore confidently resume our conclusion; and pronounce the Scripture promises to be so divine and excellent, that they could as little have been made, as they can be performed by any but an holy and almighty Author.

61. NOR is their being conditional any impeachment to their worth, but an enhancement. Should God have made them (as some fancy he has his decrees) absolute and irrespective; he had set his promises at war with his precepts, and these should have superseded what those injoin. We are all very niggardly towards God, and should have been apt to have asked Judas's question; to what purpose is this wast? Mat. 26.8. What needs the labor of the course if the prize be certain? And it must have been infinitely below the wisdom and majesty of the supreme Legislator, to make Laws, and then evacuate them by dispensing rewards without any aspect on their observance. 'Tis the Sanction which inspirits the Law, without which the divine as well as the human, would to most men be a dead letter.

62. BUT against this God has abundantly provided, not only by the conditionality of the promises, but by the terror of his threats too; which is the last part of Scripture which falls under consideration. And these are of the most direful kinds; and cannot better be illustrated than by the opposition they stand in to the promises: for as those included all things that might make men happy either as to this life or the next; so these do all that may make them miserable. If we make our reflection on all the particulars of the promises, we shall find the threats answering them as their reverse or dark shadow.

63. AND first as concerning the outward state, if we look but into the 28 of Deut. we shall find, that after all the gracious promises which begun the chapter, it finally ends in thunder, in the most dreadful denunciations imaginable; and those adapted by a most peculiar opposition to the former promises: as the Reader may see at large in that Chapter. And the whole tenor of the Scripture goes in the like style. Thus, Psal. 140.11. A wicked person shall not prosper in the earth, evil shall hunt the wicked man to overthrow him. The Lord will not suffer the righteous to famish, but he casteth out the substance of the wicked; Pro. 10.3. And again, the righteous eateth to the satisfying of his soul, but the belly of the wicked shall want, Pro. 13.25. Multitudes of like general threatenings of temporal improsperity there are everywhere scattered throout the Scripture; and many more appli'd to particular vices, as sloth, unmercifulness, luxury, and the like; which would be here too long to enumerate.

64. AND altho these threatenings may seem sometimes to be literally confuted by the wealth and opulency of wicked men, yet they never miss of being really and virtually verified. For either their prosperities are very short, and only preparative to a more eminent ruin, which was the Psalmists resolution of this doubt, Psal. 72. or else if God leave them the matter of temporal happiness, yet he substracts the virtue and spirit of them, renders them empty and unsatisfying. This is well expressed by the Psalmist in the case of the Israelites: He gave them their desire, and sent leanness withal into their soul, Psa. 106.15. and by Zophar, Job 20.22. where speaking of the wicked, he saith; In the fullness of his sufficiency shall he be in straits. And to this Solomon seems to refer, when he saith, the blessing of the Lord maketh rich, and be addeth no sorrow with it, Pro. 10.22.

65. NEITHER is it only the comforts of life, but life itself that is threatened to be taken from wicked men: untimely death is throout the Old Testament frequently mentioned as the guerdon of impiety: 'tis often assigned judicially in particular cases: He shall be cut off from his people, being the usual sentence upon most offenders under the Levitical Law. But 'tis also menaced more generally as an immediate judgment from God: The blood-thirsty and deceitful men shall not live out half their days, Psal. 55.23. Farther yet, their names shall putrefy as soon as their Carkasses: the name of the wicked shall rot; Pro. 10.7. Nay both their infamy and their ruin are intail'd upon their posterity. The seed of evil doers shall never be renown'd. Prepare slaughter for his children, for the iniquity of their fathers; Isa. 14.20.21.

66. IF now we look on Scripture threatenings in relation to the mind of man, we shall find them yet more severe: willful impenitent sinners being cut off from the benefits of the new covenant; nor barely so, but looked upon as despisers of it, and that blood of Christ in which it was sealed; Heb. 10.29. nay as those murderous Wretches that shed it: They crucify to themselves the Son of God afresh; Heb. 6.6. And this is the fatallest sentence that can fall on any man in this life; to be thus disfranchised of all the privileges of the Gospel, and rankt as well in punishment as guilt, with the most criminous of mankind.

67. FROM hence 'tis consequent, that the mind remains not only in its native impurity, but in a greater and more incurable one: whilst that blood which alone could cleanse it, serves but to embrue and pollute it; and as it were flush, and excite it to all immanities and vilenesses: and he that is thus filthy, 'tis the doom pronounced against him, that he shall be filthy still, Rev. 22.11.

68. AND then in the second place, what calm can there be to such a mind? what remains to such a person, but that fearful expectation of wrath and fiery indignation, which the Apostle mentions, Heb. 10.27. Indeed, were there none but temporal mischiefs to fear; yet it were very unplesant to think ones self, like Cain, out-law'd from the presence and protection of God; to be afraid that every man that meets us should slay us, Gen. 4.14. Nay, those confused indistinct fears of indefinite evils which attend guilt, are very unquiet uneasy inmates in the mind. This is excellently described by Moses; The Lord shall give thee a trembling heart, and failing of eyes, and sorrow of mind, and thy life shall hang in doubt before thee, and thou shalt fear day and night; in the morning thou shalt say, would God it were evening, and in the evening, would God it were morning, Deut. 28.65, 66, 67.

69. AND what can be more wretched then to have a mind thus agitated and tost, racked and tortured; especially when thro all these clouds it sees a glimpse of the eternal Tophet; and knows, that from the billows of this uneasy state, it must be tost into that Lake of fire. And this is indeed the dregs of the cup of God's wrath, the dread fullest and most astonishing of all Scripture denunciations. This comprehends all that the nature of man is capable of suffering. Divines distinguish it into the pain of sense, and of loss: that of sense is represented to us in Scripture by fire; and that accended, and rendered noisesome as well as painful by brimstone, that afflicts the smell as well as the touch: sometimes by outer darkness, wailing and gnashing of teeth, to grate the ears, and consume the eyes; by intolerable thirst, to torment the palate. Not that we are to think the sensitive pains of Hell do not infinitely exceed all these; but because these are the highest measures our present capacities can make, and are adequate to those senses for whose carnal satisfactions we incur them.

70. THE pain of loss is yet more dismal; as being seated in the soul; whose spiritual nature will then serve it only to render its torments more refined, and acute. With what anguish will it then see itself banished from the presence of God; and consequently from all that may give satisfaction and bliss to the creature? But yet with how much deeper anguish will it reflect on itself as the Author of that deprivation? How will it recollect the many despised tenders of grace, the easy terms on which salvation might have been had? And how sadly will conscience then revenge 〈1 page missing〉 all its stifled admonitions by an unsilenceable clamor, that worm which never dies, Mar. 9.48. How wounding will it then be to see Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and all the Saints in the kingdom of God, Luk. 13.28. (nay, that poor Lazarus, whom here men turned over to the charity of their dogs;) and itself in the company of the devil and his angels; who will then upbraid what they once enticed to.

71. NATURE abhors nothing more then to have our misery insulted over by those who drew us into it: yet that no circumstance may be lacking to their torment, this must be the perpetual entertainment of damned souls. And to all this Eternity is the dismal adjunct; which is of all other circumstances the most disconsolate; as leaving not so much as a glimpse of hopes; which here uses still to be the reserve, and last resort of the miserable.

72. THIS Eternity is that which gives an edge, infuses a new acrimony into the torments: and is the highest strain, the vertical point of misery. These are those terrors of the Lord, with which the Scripture acquaints us: and sure we cannot say that these are flat contemptible menaces; but such as suit the dreadful Majesty of that God who is a consuming fire, Heb. 12.29. So that these are as aptly accommodated for the exciting our dread, as the promises were of our love: both jointly concur to awake our industry.

73. FOR God has been so good to mankind, as to make the threats conditional as well as the promises: so that we as well know the way to avoid the one, as we do to attain the other. Nor has he any other intendment or end in proposing them, but that we may do so. See to this purpose, with what solemnity he protests it by Moses; I call heaven and earth to record against you this day, that I have set before you life and death, blessing and cursing; therefore choose life, that both thou and thy seed may live, Deut. 30.19.

74. I have now run thro the several parts of Scripture I proposed to speak of. And though I have in each given rather short instances and essaies then an exact description, yet even in these contracted lineaments the exquisite proportions may be discerned. And if the Reader shall hence be encourag'd to extend his contemplations, and as he reads holy Scripture, observe it in all its graces, and full dimensions; I doubt not he will pronounce from his experience, that the matter of the divine Book is very correspondent to the Author: which is the highest Eulogy imaginable.

75. IN the next place we are to consider the holy Scripture in relation to its end and design; in proportion to which everything is more or less valuable. The most exquisite frame, and curious contrivance, that has no determinat end or use, is but a piece of industrious folly, a Spiders web, as the Prophet speaks, Isa, 59.5. Now those designs have always been esteemed the most excellent that have had the most worthy subjects, and been of the greatest extent. Accordingly those who have projected the obliging and benefiting of other men (though but within a private Sphere) have always been looked on as men of generous and noble designs. Those who have taken their level higher, and directed their aim to a more public good, though but of a City or Nation, have proportionably acquired a greater esteem. But those who have aspir'd to be universal benefactors, to do something for the common benefit of the world, their fame has commonly reached as far as their influence; men have reverenc'd, nay sometimes (according to the common excesses of man's nature) adored them. Many of the heathen deities (especially their demigods) having been only those persons, who by introducing some useful Art, or other part of knowledge, had obliged mankind. So we see what a natural gratitude men are apt to pay to worthy and generous designs. And if we will be content but to stand to this common award of our nature, the Scripture will have the fairest claim imaginable to our reverence and thankfulness, upon this very account, of the excellency of its designs.

76. NOR need we borrow the balance of the Sanctuary to weigh them in; we may do it in our own scales; for they exactly answer the two properties above mentioned, of profit and diffusiveness: which in secular concerns are the standard rules of good designs. For first, it is the sole scope and aim of Scripture, the very end for which 'twas writ, to benefit and advantage men; and that secondly, not only some small select number, some little angle or corner of the world, but the whole race of mankind; the entire Universe; and he that can imagine a more diffusive design, must imagine more worlds also.

77. NOW for the first of these, that it is the design of the Scripture to benefit men; we need appeal but to Scripture itself; which surely can give the best account to what ends 'tis directed; and that tells us, it is to make us wise unto salvation, 2 Tim. 3.15. In which is comprehended the greatest benefit that man's nature is capable of: the making us wise while we live here, and the saving us eternally. And this sure is the most generous, the most obliging design, that 'tis possible even for the Creator to have upon the creature: and this is it which the holy Scripture negotiates with us.

78. AND first, the making us wise, is so inviting a proposal to humanity, that we see when that was much wiser then now it is, it caught at a fallacious tender of it; the very sound of it, though out of the devils mouth, fascinated our first Parents, and hurried them to the highest disobedience, and certainest ruin. And therefore now God by the holy Scriptures makes us an offer as much more safe, as it is more sincere; when he sends his Word thus to be a lamp to our feet, and a light to our paths, Ps. 119.105. to teach us all that is good for us to know, our affectation of ignorance will be more culpable then theirs of knowledge, if we do not admire the kindness, & embrace the bounty of such a tender.

79. NOW the making us wise must be understood according to the Scripture notion of wisdom, which is not the wisdom of this world, nor of the Princes of this world, which come to naught, as the Apostle speaks, 1 Cor. 2.5. but that wisdom which descends from above, Ja. 3.17. which he there describes to be first pure, then peaceable, gentle and easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, and without hypocrisy. Indeed the Scripture usually comprehends these and all other graces under Wisdom; for it makes it synonymous to that which includes them all, viz. the fear of the Lord. Thus we find throout the whole Book of Proverbs these used as terms convertible. In short, Wisdom is that practical knowledge of God and ourselves which engages us to obedience and duty; and this is agreeable to that definition the Wise man gives of it; The wisdom of the prudent is to understand his way, Pro. 14.8. Without this, all the most refined and aerial speculations, are but like Thales's star-gazing; which secured him not from falling in the water; nay, betrai'd him to it. In this is all solid wisdom compris'd.

80. THE utmost all the wise men in the world have pretended to, is but to know what true happiness is, and what is the means of attaining it: and what they sought with so much study, and so little success, the Scripture presents us with in the greatest certainty, and plainest characters, such as he that runs may read, Hab. 2.2. It acquaints us with that supreme felicity, that chief good whereof Philosophy could only give us a name; and it shows us the means, marks us out a path which will infallibly lead us to it. Accordingly we find that Solomon after all the accurate search he had made to find what was that good for the sons of men; he shuts up his inquest in this plain conclusion: Fear God and keep his commandments; for God shall bring every work unto judgment, Eccles. 12.13, 14. The regulating our lives so by the rules of Piety, as may acquit us at our final account, is the most eligible thing that falls within human cognizance; and that not only in relation to the superlative happiness of the next world, but even to the quiet and tranquility of this. For alas, we are impotent giddy creatures, swai'd sometimes by one passion, sometimes by another; nay often the interfering of our appetites makes us irresolute which we are to gratify; whilst in the interim their struggling agitates and turmoils the mind. And what can be more desirable in such a case, then to put ourselves under a wiser conduct then our own; and as oppressed States use to defeat all lesser pretenders by becoming homagers to some more potent: so for us to deliver ourselves from the tyranny of our lusts, by giving up our obedience to him whose service is perfect freedom.

81. WERE there no other advantage of the exchange, but the bringing us under fixed and determinat Laws, 'twere very considerable. Every man would gladly know the terms of his subjection, and have some standing rule to guide himself by; and God's Laws are so; we may certainly know what he requires of us: but the mandats of our passions are arbitrary and extemporary: what pleases them today disgusts them tomorrow; and we must always be in readiness to do we know not what, and of all the Arbitrary governments that men either feel or fear, this is doubtless the most miserable. I wish our apprehensions of it were but as sensible: and then we should think the holy Scripture did us the office of a Patriot, in offering us a rescue from so vile a slavery.

82. AND that it do's make us this offer, is manifest by the whole tenor of the Bible. For first it rowzes and awakes us to a sense of our condition, shows us that what we call liberty, is indeed the saddest servitude; that he that committeth sin is the servant of sin; Jo. 8.34. that those vices which pretend to serve and gratify us, do really subdue and enslave us, and fetter when they seem to embrace: and whereas the will in all other oppressions retains its liberty, this tyranny brings that also into vassallage: renders our spirits so mean and servile, that we choose bondage; are apt to say with the Israelites, Let us alone that we may serve the Egyptians, Ex. 14.12.

83. AND what greater kindness can be don for people in this forlorn abject condition, then to animate them to cast off this yoke, and recover their freedom. And to this are most of the Scripture exhortations adrest; as may be seen in a multitude of places, particularly in the sixth chapter to the Romans, the whole scope whereof is directly to this purpose.

84. NOR do's it only sound the alarm, put us upon the contest with our enemies, but it assists us in it, furnishes us with that whole armor of God which we find described, Eph. 6.13. Nay further it excites our courage, by assuring us that if we will not basely surrender ourselves, we can never be overpower'd if we do but stand our ground; resist our enemy, he will fly from us; Ja. 4.7. And to that purpose it directs us under what banner we are to list ourselves; even his who hath spoiled principalities and powers, Col. 2.15. to whose conduct and discipline if we constantly adhere, we cannot miss of victory.

85. AND then lastly it sets before us the prize of this conquest; that we shall not only recover our liberty, manumit ourselves from the vilest bondage to the vilest and cruellest oppressors; but we shall be crowned for it too, be rewarded for being kind to ourselves, and be made happy eternally hereafter for being willing to be happy here.

85. AND sure these are terms so apparently advantageous, that he must be infinitely stupid (foolish to destruction) that will not be thus made wise unto salvation, that despises or cavils at this divine Book, which means him so much good, which designs to make him live here generously and according to the dignity of his nature, and in the next world to have that nature sublimated, and exalted, made more capacious of those refined and immense felicities, which there await all who will qualify themselves for them; who (as the Apostle speaks) by patient continuance in well doing seek for glory, and honor, and immortality, eternal life, Rom. 2.7.

87. BUT besides the greatest and principal advantages which concern our spiritual interest, it takes in also the care of our secular, directs us to such a managery of ourselves, as is naturally apt to promote a quiet and happy life. Its injunction to live peaceable with all men, keeps us out of the way of many misadventures, which turbulent unruly spirits meet with, and so secures our peace. So also as to wealth, it puts us into the fairest road to riches by prescribing diligence in our callings: what is thus got being like sound flesh, which will stick by us; whereas the hasty growth of ill-gotten wealth is but a tumor and impostume, which the bigger it swells, the sooner it bursts and leaves us lanker then before. In like manner it shows us also how to guard our reputation, by providing honest things not only in the sight of God, but also in the sight of men, Cor. 8.28. by abstaining even from all appearance of evil, 1 Thes. 5.22. and making our light shine before men, Mat. 5.16. It provides too for our ease and tranquility, supersedes our anxious cares and sollicitud's, by directing us to cast our burden upon the Lord, Psal. 55.22. and by a reliance on his providence how to secure to ourselves all we really want. Finally it fixes us in all the changes; supports us under all the pressures, comforts us amidst all the calamities of this life, by assuring us they shall all work together for good to those that love God; Ro. 8.28.

88. NOR do's the Scripture design to promote our interests considered only singly and personally, but also in relation to Societies and Communities; it gives us the best rules of distributive and commutative Justice; teaches us to render to all their dues, Ro. 13.7. to keep our words, to observe inviolably all our pacts and contracts; nay though they prove to our damage, Psa. 15.4. and to preserve exact fidelity and truth; which are the sinews of human commerce. It infuses into us noble and generous principles, to prefer a common good before our private: and that highest flight of Ethnic virtue, that of dying for ones Country, is no more then the Scripture prescribes even for our common brethren, 1 Jo. 3.16.

89. BUT besides these generals, it descends to more minute directions accommodated to our several circumstances; it gives us appropriate rules in reference to our distinct relations, whether natural, civil, ecclesiastical or economical. And if men would but universally conform to them, to what a blessed harmony would it tune the world? what order and peace would it introduce? There would then be no oppressive Governors, nor mutinous Subjects; no unnatural Parents, nor contumacious Children: no idle Shepherds, or straying Flocks: none of those domestic jars which oft disquiet, and sometimes subvert families: all would be calm and serene; and give us in reality that golden Age, whereof the Poets did but dream.

90. THIS tendency of the Scripture is remarkably acknowledged in all our public Judicatories, where before any testimony is admitted, we cause the person that is to give his testimony, first to lay hold of with his hands, then with his mouth to kiss the holy Scriptures: as if it were impossible for those hands, which held the mysteries of Truth, to be immediately employ'd in working falsehood; or that those lips which had adored those holy Oracles, should be polluted with perjuries and lies. And I fear, the civil Government is exceedingly shaken at this day in its firmest foundation, by the little regard is generally had of the holy Scriptures, and what is consequent thereto, the oaths that are taken upon them.

91. TIS true, we are far removed from that state which Isaiah prophesied of under the Gospel, though we have the Bible among us; that when the Law should go forth of Zion, and the Word of the Lord from Jerusalem; they should beat their swords into plow-shares, and their spears into pruning hooks, Es. 2.4. but that is not from any defect in it, but from our own perverseness: we have it, but (as the Apostle speaks in another sense) as if we had it not, 1 Cor. 7.29. We have it (that is, use it) to purposes widely different from what it means. Some have it as a Supersedeas to all the duty it enjoins; and so they can but cap texts, talk glibly of Scripture, are not all concerned to practice it: some have it as their Arsenal, to furnish them with weapons, not against their spiritual enemies, but their secular: applying all the damnatory sentences they there find, to all those to whose persons or opinions they have prejudice. And some have it as a Scene of their mirth, a topic of raillery, dress their profane and scurrilous jests in its language; and study it for no other end but to abuse it. And whilst we treat it at this vile rate, no wonder we are never the better for it. For alas, what will it avail us to have the most sovereign Balsom in our possession, if instead of applying it to our wounds, we trample it under our feet?

92. BUT though we may frustrate the use, we cannot alter the nature of things. God's design in giving us the Scripture was to make us as happy as our nature is capable of being; and the Scripture is excellently adapted to this end: for as to our eternal felicity, all that believe there is any such state, must acknowledge the Scripture chalks us out the ready way to it: not only because 'tis dictated by God who infallibly knows it, but also by its prescribing those things which are in themselves best; and which a sober Heathen would adjudg fittest to be rewarded. And as to our temporal happiness, I dare appeal to any unprejudic'd man, whether anything can contribute more to the peace and real happiness of mankind, then the universal practice of the Scripture rules would do. Would God we would all conspire to make the experiment; and then doubtless, not only our reason, but our sense too would be convinced of it.

93. AND as the design is thus beneficial, so in the second place is it as extensive also. Time was when the Jews had the inclosure of divine Revelation; when the Oracles of God were their peculiar depositum, and the Heathen had not the knowledge of his Laws, Ps. 147. ult. but since that by the goodness of God the Gentiles are become fellow-heirs, Eph. 3.6. he hath also delivered into their hands the deeds and evidences of their future state, given them the holy Scriptures as the exact and authentic registers of the covenant between God and man, and these not to be like the heathen Oracles appropriated to someone or two particular places; so that they cannot be consulted but at the expense of a pilgrimage; but laid open to the view of all that will believe themselves concerned.

94. IT was a large commission our Savior gave his Disciples: go preach the Gospel to every creature, Mar. 16.15. (which in the narrowest acception must be the Gentile world) and yet their oral Gospel did not reach farther then the written: for wherever the Christian Faith was planted, the holy Scriptures were left as the records of it; nay as the conservers of it too; the standing rule by which all corruptions were to be detected. 'Tis true, the entire Canon of the New Testament, as we now have it, was not all at once delivered to the Church; the Gospels and Epistles being successively writ, as the needs of Christians, and the encroachments of Heretics gave occasion; but at last they became all together the common magazine of the Church, to furnish arms both defensive and offensive. For as the Gospel puts in our hands the shield of Faith, so the Epistles help us to hold it, that it may not be wrested out of our hands again, either by the force of persecution, or the sly insinuations of vice or heresy.

95. THUS the Apostles like prudent leaders have beat up the Ambushes; discovered the snares that were laid for us; and by discomfiting Satan's forlorn hope, that earliest Set of false teachers and corrupt practices which then invaded the Church; have laid a foundation of victory to the succeeding Ages, if they will but keep close to their conduct, adhere to those sacred Writings they have left behind them in every Church for that purpose.

96. NOW what was there deposited, was designed for the benefit of every particular member of that Church. The Bible was not committed (like the Regalia, or rarities of a Nation) to be kept under lock and key (and consequently to constitute a profitable office for the keepers) but exposed like the Brazen Serpent for universal view and benefit: that sacred Book (like the common air) being every man's propriety, yet no man's inclosure: yet there are a generation of men whose eyes have been evil, because God's have been good: who have sealed up this spring, monopoliz'd the word of Life; and will allow none to partake of it but such persons, and in such proportions as they please to retail it: an attempt very insolent in respect of God, whose purpose they contradict; and very injurious in respect of man, whose advantage they obstruct. The iniquity of it will be very apparent if we consider what is offered in the following Section.

SECT. IV. The Custody of the holy Scripture is a privilege and right of the Christian Church, and every member of it; which cannot without impiety to God, and injustice unto it and them, be taken away or empeacht.

BESIDES the keeping of the divine Law, which is obsequious, and imports a due regard to all its Precepts, commonly expressed in Scripture by keeping the commandments, hearkening to, and obeying the voice of the Lord; walking in his ways, and observing and doing his statutes and his judgments: there is a possessory keeping it, in reference to ourselves and others; in respect whereof, Almighty God, Deut. 6. and elsewhere frequently, having enjoined the people of Israel, to love the Lord their God with all their heart, and with all their soul, and with all their might, and that the words which he commanded them should be in their heart, he adds, that they shall teach them diligently to their children, and shall talk of them when they sit down in their houses, and when they walk by the way, and when they lie down, and when they rise up: and that they bind them for a sign upon their hand, and that they shall be as frontlets between their eyes, and that they shall write them upon the posts of their house, and on their gates. So justly was the Law called the Scripture, being written by them, and worn upon the several parts of the body, inscrib'd upon the walls of their houses, the entrance of their doors, and gates of their Cities; and in a word, placed before their eyes wherever they convers'd.

2. AND this was granted to the Jews, as matter of privilege and favor. To them, says Saint Paul, Rom. 9.4. pertaineth the adoption, and the glory, and the covenants, and the giving of the Law. And the same Saint Paul, at the 3. chap. 2. v. of that Epistle, unto the question, what advantage hath the Jew, or what profit is there of circumcision, answers that it is much every way, chiefly because unto them were committed the Oracles of God. This depositum or trust was granted to the Fathers, that it should be continued down unto their children. He made a covenant, says David, Ps. 78. v. 5. with Jacob, and gave Israel a Law, which he commanded our Fore-fathers to teach their children, that their posterity might know it, and the children which were yet unborn: to the intent that when they came up, they might show their children the same. Which Scripture by a perpetual succession was to be handed down unto the Christian Church; the Apostles on all occasions appealing unto them, as being read in the Synagogues every Sabbath day, Act. 13.27. and also privately, in their hands; so that they might at pleasure search into them, Jo. 5.39. Act. 17.11. Hereupon the Jews are by Saint Austin called the Capsarii, or servants that carried the Christians books. And Athanasius in his Tract of the Incarnation, says, The Law was not for the Jews only, nor were the Prophets sent for them alone; but that Nation was the Divinity-Schole of the whole world; from whence they were to fetch the knowledge of God, and the way of spiritual living: which amounts to what the Apostle says, Galat. 3.24. That the Law was a Schole-master to bring us unto Christ.

3. AND 'tis observable that the very same word, Rom. 3.2. in the Text even now recited, which expresses the committing of the Oracles of God to the Jews, is made use of constantly by Saint Paul, when he declares the trust and duty incumbent on him in the preaching of the Gospel: of which, see 1 Cor. 9.17. Gal. 2.7. 1 Thes. 2.4. 1 Tim. 1.11. Tit. 1.3. And therefore, as he says, 1 Cor. 9. Tho I preach the Gospel, I have nothing to glory of; for necessity is laid upon me, yea, woe is unto me if I preach not the Gospel, for if I do this thing willingly, I have a reward; but if against my will, a dispensation of the Gospel is committed unto me: So may all Christians say; if we ourselves keep and transmit to our posterities the holy Scriptures, we have nothing to glory of, for a necessity is laid upon us, and woe be unto us if we do not ourselves keep, and transmit to our posterity the holy Scriptures. If we do this thing willingly, we have a reward; but if against our will, the custody of the Gospel, and at least that dispensation of it, is committed to us. But if we are Traditors, and give up our Bibles, or take them away from others; let us consider how black an apostasy and sacrilege we shall incur.

4. THE Mosaic Law was a temporary constitution, and only a shadow of good things to come, Heb. 10.1. but the Gospel being in its duration as well as its intendment, everlasting, Rev. 14.6. and to remain when time shall be no more, Rev. 10.6. it is an infinitely more precious depositum, and so with greater care and solemner attestation to be preserved. Not only the Clergy, or the people of one particular Church, nor the Clergy of the universal are entrusted with this care, but 'tis the charge, the privilege and duty of every Christian man, that either is, or was, or shall be in the world; even that collective Church which above all competition, is the pillar and ground of truth, 1 Tim. 3.15. against which the assaults of men and devils, and even the gates of hell shall not prevail, Mat. 16.18.

5. THE Gospels were not written by their holy Pen-men to instruct the Apostles, but to the Christian Church, that they might believe Jesus was the Christ, the son of God, and that believing they might have life thro his name, Jo. 20.31. The Epistles were not address peculiarly to the Bishops and Deacons, but all the holy brethren, to the Churches of God that are sanctified in Jesus Christ, and to all those that call upon the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, Rom. 1.7. 1 Cor. 1.2. 2 Cor. 1.1. Galat. 1.2. Eph. 1.1. Col. 4.16. 1 Thes. 5.27. Phil. 1.1. Jam. 1.1. 1 Pet. 1.1. 2 Pet. 1.1. Revel. 1.4. Or if by chance someone or two of the Epistles were address to an Ecclesiastic person, as those to Timothy and Titus, their purport plainly refers to the community of Christians, and the depositum committed to their trust; Tim. 6.20. And Saint John on the other side directs his Epistles to those who were plainly secular; to fathers, young men, and little children; and a Lady and her children, Epist. 1. chap. 2.12, 13, 14. and Epist. 2.1.1.

6. BUT besides the interest which every Christian has in the custody of the Scripture upon the account of its being a depositum entrusted to him; he has also another no less forcible; that tis the Testament of his Savior, by which he becomes a Son of God, no more a Servant but a Son; and if he be a Son; it is the Apostles inference, that he is then an heir, an heir of God thro Christ, Gal. 4.7. Now as he who is heir to an estate, is also to the deeds and conveyances thereof; which without injury cannot be detained, or if they be, there is a remedy at Law for the recovery of them: So it fares in our Christian inheritance; every believer by the privilege of faith, is made a son of Abraham, and an heir of the promises made unto the fathers, whereby he has an hereditary interest in the Old Testament; and also by the privilege of the same Faith he has a firm right to the purchased possession, Eph. 1.14. and the charter thereof, the New. Therefore the detention of the Scriptures, which are made up of these two parts, is a manifest injustice and sacrilegious invasion of right, which the person wronged is empower'd, nay is strictly obliged by all lawful means to vindicate.

7. WHICH invasion of right; will appear more flagrant when the nature and importance of it is considered; which relating to men's spiritual interest, renders the violation infinitely more injurious then it could be in any secular. I might mention several detriments consequent to this detention of Scripture, even as many as there are benefits appendant to the free use of it; but there is one of so fundamental and comprehensive a nature, that I need name no more; and that is, that it delivers men up to any delusion their teachers shall impose upon them, by depriving them of means of detecting them. Where there is no standard or measures, 'tis easy for men to falsify both; and no less easy is it to adulterate doctrines, where no recourse can be had to the primary rule. Now that there is a possibility that false teachers may arise, we have all assurance; nay we have the word of Christ, and his Apostles that it should be so: and all Ecclesiastic story to attest it has been so. And if in the first and purest times (those Ages of more immediate illumination) the God of this world found instruments whereby to blind men's minds, 2 Cor. 4.4. it cannot be supposed impossible or improbable he should do so now.

8. BUT to leave generals, and to speak to the case of that Church which magisterially prohibits Scripture to the vulgar she manifestly stands liable to that charge of our Savior, Luk. 11 52. Ye have taken away the key of knowledge: and by allowing the common people no more Scripture than what she affords them in their Sermons and private Manuals, keeps it in her power to impose on them what she pleases. For 'tis sure those portions she selects for them, shall be none of those which clash with the doctrines she recommends: and when ever she will use this power to the corrupting their faith, or worship (yea, or their manners either) they must brutishly submit to it, because they cannot bring her dictates to the test.

9. BUT 'twill be said, this danger she wards by her doctrine of infallibility: that is, she enervates a probable supposition attested by event, by an impossible one confuted by event. For 'tis certain, that all particular Churches may err; and though the consciousness of that, forces the Roman Church upon the absurd pretence of universality, to assert her infallibility; yet alas, Tyber may as well call itself the Ocean, or Italy the world, as the Roman Church may name itself the universal; whilst 'tis so apparent that far the the less part of Christians are under her communion. And if she be but a particular Church, she has no immunity from errors, nor those under her from having those errors (how pernicious soever) imposed upon them. As to her having actually err'd, and in diverse particulars, the proof of that has been the work of so many Volumes, that 'twould be impertinent here to undertake it: I shall only instance in that of Image-worship; a practice perfectly irreconcilable with the second Commandment; and doubtless, clearly discerned by her to be so: upon which account it is, that though by Translations and Paraphrases she wrests and moulds other Texts to comply with her doctrines, yet she dares not trust to those arts for this: but takes a more compendious course, and expunges the Commandment; as is evident in her Catechisms and other Manuals. Now a Church that can thus sacrilegiously purloin one Commandment (and such a one as God has owned himself the most jealously concerned in) and to delude her children split another to make up the number, may as her needs require, subtract and divide what others she please: and then whilst all resort to Scripture is obstructed; how fatal a hazard must those poor souls run, who are obliged to follow these blind, or rather these winking guides into the ditch?

10. BUT all these criminations she retorts, by objecting the dangers of allowing the Scriptures to the vulgar; which she accuses as the spring of all Sects, Schisms, and Heresies. To which I answer first, that supposing this were true, 'twas certainly foreseen by God, who notwithstanding laid no restraint; probably as fore-seeing, that the dangers of implicit faith (to which such a restraint must subject men) would be far greater: and if God saw fit to indulge the liberty, those that shall oppose it, must certainly think they do not only partake, but have transplanted infallibility from God to themselves.

11. BUT secondly, 'tis not generally true, that Sects, Schisms, and Heresies are owing to this liberty: All Ecclesiastical Story shows us that they were not the illiterat Lay-men, but the learned Clerks who were usually the broachers of Heresies. And indeed many of them were so subtle and aerial, as could never have been forged in grosser brains; but were founded not on Scripture merely mistaken, but racked and distorted with nice criticisms, and quirks of Logic, as several of the Ancients complain: some again sprang from that ambition of attaining, or impatience of missing Ecclesiastical dignities: which appropriates them to the Clergy. So that if the abuse infer a forfeiture of the use, the Learned have of all others the least title to the Scriptures; and perhaps those who now ingross them, the least title of all the Learned.

12. ON the other side, Church-story indeed mentions some lay-propugners of Heresies; but those for the most part were either so gross and bestial, as disparag'd and confuted themselves and Authors, and rose rather from the brutish inclination of the men, than from their mistakes of Scripture: or else they were by the immediate infusion of the devil, who backed his heretical suggestions with sorceries and lying wonders, as in Simon Magus, Menander, &c. And for later times, though sometimes there happens among the vulgar a few pragmatic spirits, that love to tamper with the obscurest Texts, and will undertake to expound before they understand; yet that is not their common temper: the generality are rather in the other extreme, stupid and unobservant even of the plainest doctrines. And if to this be objected the multitude of Quakers and Fanatics, who generally are of the ignorant sort; I answer, that 'tis manifest the first propugners of those tenets in Germany were not seduced into them by mistakes of Scripture, but industriously formed them, at once to disguise and promote their villainous designs of sedition and rapine: and as for those amongst us, it is not at all certain that their first errors were their own productions: there are vehement presumptions that the seeds were sown by greater Artificers; whose first business was to unhinge them from the Church, and then to fill their heads with strange Chimera's of their privileges and perfections; and by that intoxication of spiritual pride, dispose them for all delusions: and thereby render them, like Samsons Foxes, fit instruments to set all in combustion.

13. BUT admit this were but a conjecture, and that they were the sole Authors of their own frenzy; how appears it that the liberty of reading the Scripture was the cause of it? Had these men been of the, Romish communion, and so been interdicted private reading, yet some broken parts of Scripture would have been in Sermons and Books of devotion communicated to them; had it not been as possible for them to have wrested what they heard as what they read? In one respect it seems rather more likely: for in those loose and incidental quotations the connection is sometimes not so discernible: and many Texts there are whose sense is so interwoven with the context, that without consulting that, there may be very pernicious mistakes: on which account it is probably more safe that the Auditors should have Bibles to consult. So that this restraint of Scripture is a very fallible expedient of the infallible Church. And indeed themselves have in event found it so; for if it were so sovereign a prophylactic against error, how comes it to pass that so many of their members who were under that discipline have revolted from them into that which they call heresy? If they say, the defection was made by some of the Learned to whom the Scripture was allowed, why do they not (according to their way of arguing) take it from them also upon that experiment of its mischief, and confine it only to the infallible chair? but if they own them to have been unlearn'd (as probably the Albigenses and Waldenses, &c. were) they may see how insignificant a guard this restraint is against error: and learn how little is got by that policy which controles the divine Wisdom.

14. NOR can they take shelter in the example of the primitive Christians, for they in the constant use of the holy Scriptures yielded not unto the Jews. Whereas the Jews had the Scriptures read publicly to them every Sabbath day; which Josephus against Appion thus expresses: Moses propounded to the Jews the most excellent and necessary learning of the Law; not by hearing it once or twice, but every seventh day laying aside their works, he commanded them to assemble for the hearing of the Law, and thoroughly and exactly to learn it. Parallel to this was the practice of the primitive Church, performed by the Lector, or Reader, of which Justin Martyr in his 2. Apol. gives this account. On the day called Sunday, all that abide in towns, or the countries about, meet in one place, and the writings of the Apostles and Prophets are read, so far as there is place. So Tertullian in his Apol. describing the offices in the public Assemblies: We feed our faith with the sacred Words, we raise our hopes, and establish our reliance.

15. AND as the Jews thought it indecent for persons professing piety, to let three days pass without the offices thereof in the congregation; and therefore met in their Synagogues upon every Tuesday and Thursday in the week, and there performed the duties of fasting, prayer, and hearing the holy Scriptures; concerning which is the boast of the Pharisee, Luk. 18.12. in conformity hereto the Christians also, their Sabbath being brought forward from the Saturday to the day following; that the like number of days might not pass them without performing the aforesaid duties in the congregation; met together on the Wednesdays and Fridays, which were the days of Station, so frequently mentioned in Tertullian, and others, the first writers of the Church. Tertullian expressly says, that the Christians dedicated to the offices of Piety, the fourth and sixth day of the week: and Clemens Alex. says of the Christians, that they understood the secret reasons of their weekly fasts, to wit, those of the fourth day of the week, and that of preparation before the Sabbath; commonly called Wednesday and Friday. Where, by the way, we may take notice what ground there is for the observation of the Wednesday and Friday in our Church, and the Litanies then appointed, so much neglected in this profligate Age.

16. BUT secondly, as the Jews were diligent in the private reading of the Scripture; being taught it from their infancy: which custom Saint Paul refers to 1 Tim. 3.15. whereof Josephus against Appion says, That if a man ask any Jew concerning the Laws, he will tell everything readier than his name: for learning them from the first time they have sense of anything, they retain them imprinted in their minds. So were the first Christians equally industrious in improving their knowledge of divine Truth. The whole life of a Christian, says Clem. Alex. Strom. l. 7. is a holy solemnity: there his sacrifices are prayers and praises; before every meal he has the readings of the holy Scriptures; and Psalms, and Hymns at the time of his meals. Which Tertullian also describes in his Apol. and Saint Cyprian in the end of the Epist. to Donatus.

17. AND this is farther evidenc'd by the early and numerous versions of the Scriptures into all vulgar Languages; concerning which Theodoret speaks in his Book of the Cure of the Affections of the Greeks, Serm. 5. We Christians (says he) are enabled to show the power of Apostolic and prophetic doctrines, which have filled all Countries under Heaven. For that which was formerly uttered in Hebrew, is not only translated into the Language of the Grecians, but also the Romans, Egyptians, Persians, Indians, Armenians, Scythians, Samaritans; and in a word to all the Languages that are used by any Nation. The same is said by Saint Chrysostom in his first Homily upon Saint John.

18. NOR was this don by the blind zeal of inconsiderable men, but the most eminent Doctors of the Church were concerned herein: such as Origen who with infinite labor contrived the Hexapla. Saint Chrysostom, who translated the New Testament, Psalms, and some part of the Old Testament into the Armenian Tongue, as witnesses Geor. Alex. in the life of Chrysost. So Vlphilas the first Bishop of the Goths translated the holy Scripture into the Gothic; as Socrat. Eccl. Hist. l. 4. cap. 33. and others testify. Saint Jerome, who translated them not only into Latin from the Hebrew, the Old Italic version having been from the Greek; but also into his native vulgar Dalmatic: which he says himself in his Epistle to Sophronius.

19. BUT the people's having them for their private and constant use appears farther, by the Heathens making the extorting of them a part of their persecution: and when diverse did faint in that trial, and basely surrender'd them, we find the Church leveled her severity only against the offending persons, did not (according to the Romish equity) punish the innocent, by depriving them of that sacred Book, because the others had so unworthily prostituted it (though the prevention of such a profanation for the future had been as fair a plea for it as the Romanists do now make:) but on the contrary the primitive Fathers are frequent, nay indeed importunat in their exhortations to the private study of holy Scripture, which they recommend to Christians of all Ranks, Ages, and Sexes.

20. AS an instance hereof, let us hear Clemens of Alex. in his Exhort. The Word, says he, is not hid from any; it is a common light that shineth to all men; there is no obscurity in it; hear it you that be far off, and hear it you that are nigh.

21. TO this purpose St. Jerome speaks in his Epistle to Leta, whom he directs in the education of her young daughter, and advises, that instead of gems and silk, she be enamour'd with the holy Scripture; wherein not gold, or skins, or Babylonian embroideries, but a correct and beautiful variety producing faith, will recommend its self. Let her first learn the Psalter, and be entertained with those songs; then be instructed unto life by the Proverbs of Solomon: let her learn from Ecclesiastes to despise worldly things; transcribe from Job the practice of patience and virtue: let her pass then to the Gospels, and never let them be out of her hands: and then imbibe with all the faculties of the mind, the Acts of the Apostles, and Epistles. When she has enriched the storehouse of her breast with these treasures, let her learn the Prophets, the Heptateuch, or books of Moses, Joshua and Judges, the books of Kings and Chronicles, the volumes of Ezra and Esther; and lastly the Canticles. And indeed, this Father is so concerned to have the unletter'd female sex skilful in the Scriptures, that though he sharply rebukes their pride and over-wening; he not only frequently resolves their doubts concerning difficult places in the said Scriptures, but dedicates several of his Commentaries to them.

22. THE same is to be said of Saint Austin, who in his Epistles to unletter'd Laics, encourages their enquiries concerning the Scripture, assuring Volusianus Ep. 3. that it speaks those things that are plain to the heart of the learned and unlearned, as a familiar friend; in the mysterious, mounts not up into high phrases which might deter a slow and unlearned mind, (as the poor are in their addresses to the rich;) but invites all with lowly speech, feeding with manifest truth, and exercising with secret. And Ep. 1.21. tells the devout Proba, that in this world where we are absent from the Lord, and walk by faith and not by sight, the soul is to think itself desolate, and never cease from prayer, and the words of divine and holy Scripture, &c.

23. SAINT Chrysostom in his third Homily of Lazarus thus addresses himself to married persons, house-holders, and people engaged in trades and secular professions; telling them, that the reading of the Scripture is a great defensative against sin; and on the other side, the ignorance thereof is a deep and head-long precipice; that not to know the Law of God, is the utter loss of salvation; that this has caused heresies, and corruption of life, and has confounded the order of things: for it cannot be by any means, that his labor should be fruitless, who employes himself in a daily and attentive reading of the Scripture.

24. I am not, says the same St. Chry. Hom. 9. on Colos. 3. a Monk, I have wife and children, and the cares of a family. But 'tis a destructive opinion, that the reading of the Scripture pertains only to those who have addicted themselves to a monastic life; when the reading of Scripture is much more necessary for secular persons: for they who converse abroad, and receive frequent wounds, are in greatest need of remedies and preservatives, so Hom. 2. on Mat. Hearken all you that are secular, how you ought to order your wives and children; and how you are particularly enjoined to read the Scriptures, and that not perfunctorily, or by chance, but very diligently.

25. LIKEWISE Hom. 3. on Laz. What sayest thou, O man? it is not thy business to turn over the Scripture, being distracted by innumerable cares; no, thou hast therefore the greater obligation: others do not so much stand in need of the aids of the Scripture, as they who are conversant in much business. Farther, Hom. 8. on Heb. 5. I beseech you neglect not the reading of the Scriptures; but whether we comprehend the meaning of what is spoken or not, let us always be conversant in them: for daily meditation strengthens the memory; and it frequently happens, that what you now cannot find out, if you attempt it again, you will the next day discover: for God of his goodness will enlighten the mind. It were endless to transcribe all the Exhortations of the ancient Doctors and Fathers of the Church; they not only permitted, but earnestly pressed upon all Christians, whatever their estate or condition were, the constant reading of the holy Scripture. Nor indeed was their restraint ever heard of till the Church of Rome had espous'd such doctrines as would not bear the test of Scripture: and then as those who deal in false wares are used to do, they found it necessary to proportion their lights accordingly.

26. THIS Peter Sutor in his second Book cap. 22. of the Translation of the Scripture honestly confesses, saying, that whereas many things are enjoined which are not expressly in Scripture, the unlearned observing this, will be apt to murmur and complain that so heavy burdens are laid upon them, and their Christian liberty infring'd. They will easily be with-drawn from observing the Constitutions of the Church, when they find that they are not contained in the Law of Christ. And that this was not a frivolous suggestion, the desperate attempt of the Romanists above mentioned, in leaving out the second Commandment in their Primers and Catechisms which they communicate to the people, may pass for an irrefragable evidence; For what Lay-man would not be shockt, to find Almighty God command, not to make any graven image, nor the likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the water under the earth;

that no one should bow down to them, nor worship them: when he sees the contrary is practic'd and commanded by the Church.

27. BUT would God none but the Romamanist were impeachable of this detention of Scripture: there are too many among us that are thus false and envious to themselves: and what the former do upon policy and pretence of reverence, those do upon mere oscitancy and avow'd profaneness; which are much worse inducements. And for such as these to declaim against detention of the Scripture, is like the Law-suits of those who contend only about such little punctilio's as themselves design no advantage from, but only the worsting their Adversaries: and it would be much safer for them to lie under the interdict of others, then thus to restrain themselves: even as much as the errors of obedience are more excusable, then those of contempt and profaneness.

28. AND here I would have it seriously considered that the Edict of Diocletian for the demolishing the Christian Churches, and the burning their Bibles; became the character and particular aggravation of his most bloody persecution. Now should Almighty God call us to the like trial, should Antichristian violence, whether heathen or other, take from us our Churches and our Bibles, what comfort could we have in that calamity, if our contempt of those blessings drove them from us; nay, prevented persecution, and bereft us of them even whilst we had them in our power? He who neglects to make his constant resort unto the Church, which by God's mercy now stands open; or to read diligently the holy Scriptures, which by the same divine Goodness are free for him to use, is his own Diocletian; and without the terrors of death, or torments, has renounced, if not the Faith, the great instruments of its conveyance, and pledge of God Almighty's presence among the sons of men.

29. BUT what if men either upon the one motive or the other, will not read; yet the Scriptures continue still most worthy to be read: they retain still their propriety for all those excellent ends to which God designed them: and as the Prophet tells the Jews, Ez. 2.5. whether they will hear, or whether they will forbear, they shall know there has been a Prophet among them; so whether we will take the benefit or no, we shall one day find that the holy Scriptures would have made us wise unto salvation. If thro our fault alone they fail to do so, they will one day assume a less grateful office; and from guides and assistants, become accusers and witnesses against us.

SECT. V. The Scripture has great propriety and fitness toward the attainment of its excellent end.

WE are now in the next place to consider how exactly the holy Scriptures are adapted to those great ends to which they are directed: how sufficient they are for that important negotiation on which they are sent: and that we shall certainly find them, if we look on them either intrinsically, or circumstantially. For the first of these notions we need only to reflect on the third part of this discourse, where the Scripture in respect of the subject Matter is evinced to be a system of the most excellent Laws, backed with the most transcendent rewards and punishments; and the certainty of those confirmed by such pregnant instances of God's mercies and vengeance in this world, as are the surest gages and earnest of what we are bid to expect in another.

2. NOW what method imaginable can there be used to rational creatures of more force and energy? Nay it seems to descend even to our passions and accommodates itself to our several inclinations. And seeing how few Proselytes there are to bare and naked virtue, and how many to interest and advantage; God closes with them upon their own terms, and do's not so much injoin as buy those little services he asks from us.

3. BUT because some men's natures are so disingenuous as to hate to be obliged no less then to be reformed, the Scripture has goads and scourges to drive such beasts as will not be led; terrors and threatenings, and those of most formidable sorts, to affright those who will not be allured. Nay lest incredulous men should question the reality of future rewards or punishments, the Scripture gives as sensible evidence of them as we are capable of receiving in this world; by registering such signal protections and judgments proportioned to virtue and vice, as sufficiently attests the Psalmists Axiom: Doubtless there is a God that judgeth the earth, Psal. 58.11. and leaves nothing to the impenitent sinner, but a fearful expectation of that fiery indignation threatened hereafter; Heb. 10.27.

4. AND now methinks the Scripture seems to be that net our Savior speaks of, that caught of every sort, Mat. 13.47. it is of so vast a compass, that it must, one would think, fetch in all kind of tempers: and sure had we not mixed natures with fiends, contracted some of their malice and obstinacy, mere human pravity could not hold out.

5. AND as the holy Scripture is thus fitly proportioned to its end in respect of the subject matter, so is it also in reference to its circumstances, which all conspire to render it, the power of God unto salvation, Ro. 1.16. In the first rank of those we must place its divine original, which stamps it with an uncontrollable authority, and is an infallible security that the matter of it is perfectly true: since it proceeds from that essential verity which cannot abuse us with fraudulent promises or threatenings: and from that infinite power that cannot be impeded in the execution of what he purposes.

6. YET to render this circumstance efficacious, there needs another; to wit, that its being the word of God be sufficiently testifi'd to us: and we have in the fore-going discourse evinced it to be so; and that in the utmost degree that a matter of that kind is capable of; beyond which no sober man will require evidence in anything. And certainly these two circumstances thus united, have a mighty force to impress the dictates of Scripture on us. And we must rebel against God and our own convictions too, to hold out against it.

7. A third circumstance relates to the frame and composure of this divine Book, both as to method, and style: concerning which I have already made some reflections. But now that I may speak more distinctly, I observe it takes its rise from the first point of time wherein 'twas possible for mankind to be concerned; and so gradually proceeds to its fall and renovation: shows us first our need of a Redeemer, and then points us out who it is, by types and promises in the Old Testament, and by way of history and completion in the New. In the former it acquaints us with that pedagogy of the Law which God designed as our Schole- master to bring us to Christ, Gal. 3.25. and in the Gospel shows us yet a more excellent way; presents us with those more sublime elevated doctrines, which Christ came down from heaven to revele.

8. AS for the style, that is full of grateful variety, sometimes high and majestic, as becomes that high and holy one that inhabiteth eternity: Isaiah. 57.15. and sometimes so humble and after the manner of men, as agrees to the other part of his Character, his dwelling is with him that is of an humble spirit, Isaiah 57.15. I know profane wits are apt to brand this as an unevenness of style: but they may as well accuse the various notes of Music as destructive to harmony, or blame an Orator for being able to tune his tongue to the most different strains.

9. ANOTHER excellency of the style, is its propriety to the several subjects it treats of. When it speaks of such things as God would not have men pry into; it wraps them up in clouds and thick darkness; by that means to deter inquisitive man (as he did at Sinai) from breaking into the mount, Ex. 20. And that he gives any intimation at all of such, seems designed only to give us a just estimate how shallow our comprehensions are; and excite us to adore and admire that Abyss of divine Wisdom which we can never fathom.

10. THINGS of a middle nature, which may be useful to some, but are indispensibly necessary to all, the Scripture leaves more accessible; yet not so obvious as to be within every man's reach: but makes them only the prize of industry, prayer, and humble endeavors. And it is no small benefit, that those who covet the knowledge of divine Truth, are by it engaged to take these virtues in the way. Besides there is so much time required to that study, as renders it inconsistent with those secular businesses wherein the generality of men are immersed: and consequently 'tis necessary that those who addict themselves to the one, have competent vacancy from the other: And in this it hath a visible use by being very contributive to the maintaining that spiritual subordination of the people of the Pastors; which God has established. Miriam and Corahs Partisans are a pregnant instance how much the opinion of equal knowledge unfits for subjection: and we see by sad experience how much the bare pretence of it has disturbed the Church, and made those turn preachers who never were understanding hearers.

11. BUT besides these more abstruse, there are easier truths in which every man is concerned; the explicit knowledge whereof is necessary to all: I mean the divine Rules for saving Faith and Manners. And in those the Scripture style is as plain as is possible: condescends to the apprehensions of the rudest capacities: so that none that can read the Scripture but will there find the way to bliss evidently chalk'd out to him. That I may use the words of Saint Gregory, the Lamb may wade in those waters of life, as well as the Elephant may swim. The Holy Ghost, as St. Austin tells us, lib. 2. of Christian doctrine, cap. 6. has made in the plainer places of Scripture magnificent and healthful provision for our hunger; and in the obscure, against satiety. For there are scarce any things drawn from obscure places, which in others are not spoken most plainly. And he farther adds, that if anything happen to be nowhere explained, every man may there abound in his own sense.

12. SO again, in the same Book, cap. 9. he says, that all those things which concern Faith and Manners, are plainly to be met with in the Scripture: and Saint Jerome in his Comment on Es. 19. tells us, that 'tis the custom of the Scripture to close obscure sayings with those that are easy; and what was first expressed darkly, to propose in evident words: which very thing is said likewise▪ by Saint Chrysostom, Hom. 9. 2 Cor. 4.11. who in his first homily on Saint Mat. farther declares, that the Scriptures are easy to be understood, and exposed to vulgar capacities.

13. He says again, Hom, upon Isaiah, that th Scriptures are not metals that require the help of Miners, but afford a treasure easily to be had to them that seek the riches contained in them. It is enough only to stoop down, and look upon them, and depart replenish'd with wealth; it is enough only to open them, and behold the splendor of those Gems. Again, Hom. 3. on the second Ep. to the Thess. 2. All things are evident and strait, which are in the holy Scripture; whatever is necessary is manifest. So also Hom. 3. on Gen. 14. It cannot be that he who is studious in the holy Scripture should be rejected: for though the instruction of men be wanting, the Lord from above will enlighten our minds, shine in upon our reason, revele what is secret, and teach what we do not know. So Hom. 1. on Jo. 11. Almighty God involves his doctrine with no mists, and darkness, as did the Philosophers: his doctrine is brighter then the Sun-beams, and more illustrious; and therefore everywhere diffus'd: and Hom. 6. on Jo. 11. His doctrine is so facile, that not only the wise, but even women, and youths must comprehend it. Hom. 13. on Gen. 2. Let us go to the Scripture as our Mark, which is its own interpreter. And soon after says, that the Scripture interprets itself, and suffers not its Auditor to err. To the same purpose says Cyril in his third Book against Julian. In the Scripture nothing is difficult to them, who are conversant in them as they ought to be.

14. It is therefore a groundless cavil which men make at the obscurity of the Scripture; since it is not obscure in those things wherein 'tis our common interest it should be plain: which sufficiently justifies its propriety to that great end of making us wise unto salvation. And for those things which seem less intelligible to us, many of them become so, not by the innate obscurity of the Text, but by extrinsic circumstances (of which perhaps the over-busy tampering of Paraphrasts, pleased with new notions of their own, may be reckoned for one.) But this subject the Reader may find so well pursued in Mr. Boyls Tract concerning the style of Scripture, that I shall be kindest both to him and it, to refer him thither; as also for answer to those other querulous objections which men galled with the sense of the Scripture, have made to its style.

15. A third circumstance in which the Scripture is fitted to attain its end, is its being committed to writing, as that is distinguished from oral delivery. It is most true, the word of God is of equal authority and efficacy which way soever it be delivered: The Sermons of the Apostles were every jot as divine and powerful out of their mouths, as they are now in their story. All the advantage therefore that the written Word can pretend to, is in order to its perpetuity; as it is a securer way of derivation to posterity, then that of oral Tradition. To evince that it is so, I shall first weigh the rational probabilities on either side. Secondly, I shall consider to which God himself appears in Scripture to give the deference.

16. FOR the first of these, I shall propose this consideration; which I had occasion to intimate before; that the Bible being writ for the universal use of the faithful, 'twas as universally dispersed amongst them: The Jews had the Law not only in their Synagogues, but in their private houses, and as soon as the Evangelical Books were writ, they were scattered into all places where the Christian Faith had obtained. Now when there was such a vast multitude of copies, and those so revered by the possessors, that they thought it the highest pitch of sacrilege to expose them, it must surely be next to impossible entirely to suppress that Book. Besides it could never be attempted but by some eminent violence, as it was by the heathen Persecutors; which (according to the common effect of opposition) served to enhance the Christians value of the Bible; and consequently when the storm was past, to excite their diligence for recruiting the number. So that, unless in after Ages, all the Christians in the world should at once make a voluntary defection, and conspire to eradicate their Religion, the Scriptures could not be utterly extinguished.

17. AND that which secures it from total suppression, do's in a great degree do so from corruption and falsification. For whilst so many genuine copies are extant in all parts of the world, to be appeal'd to, it would be a very difficult matter to impose a spurious one; especially if the change were so material as to awaken men's jealousies. And it must be only in a place and age of gross ignorance, that any can be daring enough to attempt it. And if it should happen to succeed in such a particular Church, yet what is that to the universal? And to think to have the forgery admitted there, is (as a learned man says) like attempting to poison the sea.

18. ON the other side, oral Tradition seems much more liable to hazards, error may there insinuate itself much more insensibly. And though there be no universal conspiracy to admit it at first; yet like a small eruption of waters, it widens its own passage, till it cause an inundation. There is no impression so deep, but time and intervening accidents may wear out of men's minds; especially where the notions are many, and are founded not in nature, but positive institution, as a great part of Christian Religion is. And when we consider the various tempers of men, 'twill not be strange that succeeding Ages will not always be determined by the Traditions of the former. Som are pragmatic, and think themselves fitter to prescribe to the belief of their posterity, then to follow that of their Ancestors: some have interests and designs which will be better served by new Tenets: and some are ignorant and mistaking, and may unawares corrupt the doctrine they should barely deliver: and of this last sort we may guess there may be many, since it falls commonly to the mothers lot to imbue children with the first rudiments.

19. NOW in all these cases how possible is it that primitive Tradition may be either lost or adulterated; and consequently, and in proportion to that possibility, our confidence of it must be stagger'd. I am sure according to the common estimate in seculars it must be so. For I appeal to any man whether he be not apter to credit a relation which comes from an eye-witness then at the third or fourth, much more at the hundredth rebound: (as in this case.) And daily experience tells us; that a true and probable story by passing thro many hands, often grows to an improbable lie. This man thinks he could add one becoming circumstance; that man another: and whilst most men take the liberty to do so, the relation grows as monstrous as such a heap of incoherent fancies can make it.

20. IF to this it be said, that this happens only in trivial secular matters, but that in the weighty concern of Religion mankind is certainly more serious and sincere: I answer that 'tis very improbable that they are; since 'tis obvious in the common practice of the world, that the interests of Religion are postpon'd to every little worldly concern. And therefore when a temporal advantage requires the bending and warping of Religion, there will never be wanting some that will attempt it.

21. BESIDES there is still left in human nature so much of the venom of the Serpents first temptation, that though men cannot be as God, yet they love to be prescribing to him, and to be their own Assessors as to that worship and homage they are to pay him.

22. BUT above all 'tis considerable that in this case Satan has a more peculiar concern, and can serve himself more by a falsification here than in temporal affairs. For if he can but corrupt Religion, it ceases to be his enemy, and becomes one of his most useful engins, as sufficiently appeared in the rites of the heathen worship. We have therefore no cause to think this an exempt case, but to presume it may be influenc'd by the same pravity of human nature, which prevails in others; and consequently are obliged to bless God that he has not left our spiritual concerns to such hazards, but has lodged them in a more secure repository, the written Word.

23. BUT I fore-see 'twill be objected, that whilst I thus disparage Tradition, I do virtually invalidate the Scripture itself, which comes to us upon its credit. To this I answer first that since God has with-drawn immediate revelation from the world, Tradition is the only means to convey to us the first notice that this Book is the word of God: and it being the only means he affords, we have all reason to depend on his goodness, that he will not suffer that to be evacuated to us: and that how liable soever Tradition may be to err, yet that it shall not actually err in this particular.

24. BUT in the second place; This Tradition seems not so liable to falsification as others: It is so very short and simple a proposition; such and such writings are the word of God, that there is no great room for Sophistry or mistake to pervert the sense; the only possible deception must be to change the subject, and obtrude supposititious writings in room of the true, under the title of the word of God. But this has already appeared to be unpracticable, because of the multitude of copies which were dispersed in the world; by which such an attempt would soon have been detected. There appears more reason as well as more necessity, to rely upon Tradition in this, than in most other particulars.

25. NEITHER yet do I so far decry oral Tradition in any, as to conclude it impossible it should derive any truth to posterity: I only look on it as more casual, and consequently a less fit conveyance of the most important and necessary verities than the written Word: In which I conceive myself justifi'd by the common sense of mankind; who use to commit those things to writing, which they are most solicitous to derive to posterity. Do's any Nation trust their fundamental Laws only to the memory of the present Age, and take no other course to transmit them to the future? do's any man purchase an estate, and leave no way for his children to lay claim to it, but the Tradition the present witnesses shall leave of it? Nay do's any considering man ordinarily make any important pact or bargain (though without relation to posterity) without putting the Articles in writing? And whence is all this caution but from a universal consent that writing is the surest way of transmitting?

26. BUT we have yet a higher appeal in this matter than to the suffrage of men: God himself seems to have determined it; And what his decision is, 'tis our next business to inquire.

27. AND first he has given the most real and comprehensive attestation to this way of writing, by having himself chose it. For he is too wise to be mistaken in his estimate of better and worse, and too kind to choose the worst for us: and yet he has chosen to communicate himself to the latter Ages of the world by writing; and has sum'd up all the Eternal concerns of mankind in the sacred Scriptures, and left those sacred Records by which we are to be both informed and governed; which if oral Tradition would infallibly have don, had been utterly needless: and God sure is not so prodigal of his spirit, as to inspire the Autors of Scripture to write that, whose use was superseded by a former more certain expedient.

28. NAY, under the Mosaic economy, when he made use of other ways of reveling himself, yet to perpetuate the memory even of those Revelations; he chose to have them written. At the delivery of the Law, God spake then viva voice, and with that pomp of dreadful solemnity, as certainly was apt to make the deepest impressions; yet God fore-saw that thro every succeeding Age that stamp would grow more dim, and in a long revolution might at last be extinct. And therefore how warm soever the Israelites apprehensions then were, he would not trust to them for the perpetuating his Law, but committed it to writing; Ex. 31.18. nay wrote it twice himself.

29. YET farther even the ceremonial Law though not intended to be of perpetual obligation; was not yet refer'd to the traditionary way, but was wrote by Moses, and deposited with the Priests, Deut. 31.9. And after-event showed this was no needless caution. For when under Manasseh, Idolatry had prevailed in Jerusalem, it was not by any dormant Tradition, but by the Book of the Law found in the Temple, that Josiah was both excited to reform Religion, and instructed how to do it; 2. Kings 22.10. And had not that or some other copy been produced, they had been much in the dark as to the particulars of their reformation; which that they had not been convey'd by Tradition, appears by the sudden startling of the King upon the reading of the Law; which could not have been, had he been before possessed with the contents of it. In like manner we find in Nehemiah, that the observation of the Feast of Tabernacles was recovered by consulting the Law; the Tradition whereof was wholly worn out; or else it had sure been impossible that it could for so long a time have been intermitted, Neh. 8.18. And yet men's memories are commonly more retentive of an external visible rite, than they are of speculative Propositions, or moral Precepts.

30. THESE instances show how fallible an expedient mere oral Tradition is for transmission to posterity. But admit no such instance could be given, 'tis argument enough that God has by his own choice of writing, given the preference to it. Nor has he barely chosen it, but has made it the standard by which to measure all succeeding pretences. 'Tis the means he prescribes for distinguishing divine from diabolical Inspirations: To the Law and to the Testimony: if they speak not according to this Word, there is no light in them, Isai. 8.20. And when the Lawier interrogated our Savior what he should do to inherit eternal life, he sends him not to ransac Tradition, or the cabalistical divinity of the Rabbins, but refers him to the Law: What is written in the Law? how readest thou? Luk. 10.26. And indeed, throout the Gospel, we still find him in his discourse appealing to Scripture, and asserting its authority: as on the other side inveighing against those Traditions of the Elders which had evacuated the written Word: Ye make the Word of God of none effect by your Tradition, Mat. 15.6. Which as it abundantly shows Christ's adherence to the written Word, so 'tis a pregnant instance how possible it is for Tradition to be corrupted, and made the instrument of imposing men's fancies even in contradiction to God's commands.

31. AND since our blessed Lord has made Scripture the test whereby to try Traditions, we may surely acquiesce in his decision, and either Embrace or reject Traditions, according as they correspond to the supreme rule, the written Word. It must therefore be a very unwarrantable attempt to set up Tradition in competition with (much more in contradiction to) that to which Christ himself hath subjected it.

32. Saint Paul reckons it as the principal privilege of the Jewish Church, that it had the Oracles of God committed to it; i.e. that the holy Scriptures were deposited, and put in its custody: and in this the Christian Church succeeds it, and is the guardian and conservator of holy Writ. I ask then, had the Jewish Church by virtue of its being keeper, a power to supersede any part of those Oracles entrusted to them? if so, Saint Paul was much out in his estimate, and ought to have reckoned that as their highest privilege. But indeed, the very nature of the trust implies the contrary; and besides, 'tis evident, that is the very crime Christ charges upon the Jews in the place above cited. And if the Jewish Church had no such right, upon what account can the Christian claim any? Has Christ enlarged its Charter? has he left the sacred Scriptures with her, not to preserve and practice, but to regulate and reform? to fill up its vacancies, and supply its defects by her own Traditions? if so, let the commission be produced; but if her office be only that of guardianship and trust, she must neither subtract from, nor by any superadditions of her own evacuate its meaning and efficacy: and to do so, would be the same guilt that it would be in a person entrusted with the fundamental Records of a Nation, to foist in such clauses as himself pleases.

33. IN short, God has in the Scriptures laid down exact rules for our belief and practice, and has entrusted the Church to convey them to us: if she vary, or any way enervate them, she is false to that trust, but cannot by it oblige us to recede from that rule she should deliver, to comply with that she obtrudes upon us. The case may be illustrated by an easy resemblance. Suppose a King have a foreign principality for which he composes a body of Laws; annexes to them rewards and penalties, and requires an exact and indispensable conformity to them. These being put in writing, he sends by a select messenger: now suppose this messenger deliver them, yet says withal, that himself has authority from the King to supersede these Laws at his pleasure; so that their last resort must be to his dictates, yet produces no other testimony but his own bare affirmation. Is it possible that any men in their wits should be so stupidly credulous, as to incur the penalty of those Laws upon so improbable an indemnity?

And sure it would be no whit less madness in Christians, to violate any precept of God, on an ungrounded supposal of the Churches power to dispense with them.

34. AND if the Church universal have not this power, nor indeed ever claim'd it, it must be a strange insolence for any particular Church to pretend to it, as the Church of Rome do's; as if we should owe to her Tradition all our Scripture, and all our Faith; insomuch that without the supplies which she affords from the Oracle of her Chair, our Religion were imperfect, and our salvation insecure. Upon which wild dictates I shall take liberty in a distinct Section, farther to animadvert.

SECT. VI. The suffrage of the primitive Christian Church, concerning the propriety and fitness which the Scripture hat towards the attainment of its excellent end.

AGAINST what has been hitherto said to the advantage of the holy Scripture, there opposes itself (as we have already intimated) the authority of the Church of Rome; which allows it to be only an imperfect rule of Faith, saying in the fourth Session of the Council of Trent, that Christian faith and discipline, are contained in the Books written, and unwritten Tradition. And in the fourth rule of the Index put forth by command of the said Council, the Scripture is declared to be so far from useful, that its reading is pernicious if permitted promiscuously in the vulgar Tongue, and therefore to be withheld: insomuch that the study of the holy Bible is commonly by persons of the Roman Communion, imputed to Protestants as part of their heresy; they being called by them in contempt the Evangelical men, and Scripturarians. And the Bible in the vulgar Tongue of any Nation, is commonly reckoned among prohibited Books, and as such, publicly burnt when met with by the Inquisitors: and the person who is found with it, or to read therein, is subjected to severe penalties.

2. FOR the vindication of the truth of God, and to put to shame those unhappy Innovators, who amidst great pretences to antiquity, and veneration to the Scriptures prevaricat from both: I think it may not be amiss, to show plainly the mind of the primitive Church herein; and that in as few words as the matter will admit.

3. FIRST I premise that Irenaeus and Tertullian having to do with Heretics, who boasted themselves to be emendators of the Apostles, and wiser then they; despising their authority, rejecting several parts of the Scripture, and obtruding other writings in their stead, have had recourse unto Tradition, with a seeming preference of it unto Scripture. Their adversaries having no common principle besides the owning the name of Christians; it was impossible to convince them, but by a recourse to such a medium which they would allow. But these Fathers being to set down and establish their Faith, are most express in resolving it into Scripture: and when they recommend Tradition, ever mean such as is also Apostolical.

4. IRENEUS in the second Book, 47. c. tells us, that the Scriptures are perfect, as dictated by the word of God and his spirit. And the same Father begins his third Book in this manner, The disposition of our salvation is no otherwise known by us, then by those by whom the Gospel was brought to us; which indeed they first preached, but afterward delivered it to us in the Scripture, to be the foundation and pillar of our Faith. Nor may we imagine, that they began to preach to others, before they themselves had perfect knowledge, as some are bold to say; boasting themselves to be emendators of the Apostles. For after our Lord's Resurrection, they were endued with the power of the holy Spirit from on high, and having perfect knowledge, went forth to the ends of the earth, preaching the glad tidings of salvation, and celestial praise unto men. Each and all of whom had the Gospel of God. So Saint Matthew wrote the Gospel to the Hebrews, in their tongue. Saint Peter and Saint Paul preached at Rome, and there founded a Church: Mark the Disciple and interpreter of Peter, delivered in writing what he had preached, and Luke the follower of Paul set down in his Book the Gospel he had delivered. Afterward Saint John at Ephesus in Asia published his Gospel, &c. In his fourth Book, c. 66. he directs all the Heretics with whom he deals, to read diligently the Gospel delivered by the Apostles, and also read diligently the Prophets, assuring they shall there find every action, every doctrine, and every suffering of our Lord declared by them.

5. THUS Tertullian in his Book of Prescriptions, c. 6. It is not lawful for us to introduce anything of our own will, nor make any choice upon our arbitrement. We have the Apostles of our Lord for our Authors, who themselves took up nothing on their own will or choice; but faithfully imparted to the Nations the discipline which they had received from Christ. So that if an Angel from heaven should teach another doctrine, he were to be accurst. And c. 25. 'Tis madness, says he of the Heretics, when they confess that the Apostles were ignorant of nothing, nor taught things different; to think that they did not revele all things to all: which he enforces in the following chapter. In his Book against Hermogenes, c. 23. he discourses thus; I adore the plenitude of the Scripture, which discovers to me the Creator, and what was created. Also in the Gospel I find the Word was the Arbiter and Agent in the Creation. That all things were made of preexistent matter I never read. Let Hermogenes, and his journey-men show that it is written. If it be not written, let him fear the woe, which belongs to them that add or detract. And in the 39. ch. of his Prescript. We feed our faith, raise our hope, and establish our reliance with the sacred Words.

6. IN like manner Hippolytus in the Homily against Noetus declares, that we acknowledge only from Scripture that there is one God. And whereas secular Philosophy is not to be had, but from the reading of the doctrine of the Philosophers; so whosoever of us will preserve piety towards God, he cannot otherwise learn it then from the holy Scripture. Accordingly Origen in the fifth Homily on Leviticus, says, that in the Scripture every word appertaining to God, is to be sought and discust; and the knowledge of all things is to be received.

7. WHAT Saint Cyprians opinion was in this point, we learn at large from his Epistle to Pompey. For when Tradition was objected to him, he answers; Whence is this Tradition? is it from the authority of our Lord and his Gospel; or comes it from the commands of the Apostles in their Epistles? Almighty God declares that what is written should be obei'd and practic'd. The Book of the Law, says he in Joshua, shall not depart from thy mouth, but thou shalt meditate in it day and night, that you may observe and keep all that is written therein. So our Lord sending his Apostles, commands them to baptize all Nations, and teach them to observe all things that he had commanded. Again, what obstinacy and presumption is it to prefer human Tradition to divine Command: not considering that God's wrath is kindled as often as his Precepts are dissolved and neglected by reason of human Traditions. Thus God warns and speaks by Isaiah: This people honors me with their lips, but their heart is far from me; but in vain do they worship me, teaching for doctrines the commandments of men. Also the Lord in the Gospel checks and reproveth, saying; you reject the Law of God, that you may establish your Tradition. Of which Precept the Apostle Saint Paul being mindful, admonishes and instructs, saying; If any man teaches otherwise, and hearkens not to sound doctrine, and the words of our Lord Jesus Christ, he is proud, knowing nothing: From such we must depart. And again he adds, There is a compendious way for religious and sincere minds, both to deposit their errors, and find out the truth. For if we return to the source and original of divine Tradition, human error will cease, and the ground of heavenly Mysteries being seen, whatsoever was hid with clouds and darkness, will be manifest by the light of truth. If a pipe that brought plentiful supplies of water fail on the sudden, do not men look to the fountain, and thence learn the cause of the defect, whether the spring itself be dry; or if running freely, the water is stopped in its passage; that if by interrupted or broken conveyances, it was hindered to pass, they being repair'd, it may again be brought to the City, with the same plenty as it flows from the spring? And this God's Priests ought to do at this time, obeying the commands of God, that if truth have swerv'd or failed in any particular, we go backward to the source of the Evangelical and Apostolical Tradition, and there found our actings; from whence their order and origination began.

8. IT is true Bellarmine reproaches this discourse as erroneous; but whatever it might be in the inference which Saint Cyprian drew from it, in itself it was not so. For Saint Austin, though sufficiently engaged against Saint Cyprian's conclusion allows the position as most Orthodox; saying, in the fourth Book of Baptism, c. 35. Whereas he admonishes to go back to the fountain, that is, the Tradition of the Apostles, and thence bring the stream down to our times; 'tis most excellent, and without doubt to be don.

9. THUS Eusebius expresses himself in his second Book against Sabellius. As it is a point of sloth, not to seek into those things, whereof one may enquire; so 'tis insolence to be inquisitive in others. But what are those things which we ought to enquire into? Even those which are to be found in the Scriptures: those things which are not there to be found, let us not seek after. For if they ought to be known, the holy Ghost had not omitted them in the Scripture.

10. ATHANASIUS in his Tract of the Incarnation, says, It is fit for us to adhere to the word of God, and not relinquish it, thinking by syllogisms to evade, what is there clearly delivered. Again in his Tract to Serap. of the holy Ghost: Ask not, says he, concerning the Trinity, but learn only from the Scriptures. For the instructions which you will find there, are sufficient. And in his Oration against the Gentiles, declares, That the Scriptures are sufficient to the manifestation of the truth.

11. AGREEABLE to these is Optatus in his 5. Book against Parmen. who reasons thus, You say 'tis lawful to rebaptize, we say 'tis not lawful: betwixt your saying and our gain-saying the people's minds are amus'd. Let no man believe either you or us. All men are apt to be contentious. Therefore Judges are to be called in. Christians they cannot be; for they will be parties; and thereby partial. Therefore a Judge is to be looked out from abroad. If a Pagan, he knows not the mysteries of our Religion. If a Jew, he is an enemy to our baptism. There is therefore no earthly Judge; but one is to be sought from heaven. Yet there is no need of a resort to heaven, when we have in the Gospel a Testament: and in this case, celestial things may be compared to earthly. So it is as with a Father who has many children; while he is present he orders them all, and there is no need of a written Will: Accordingly Christ when he was present upon earth, from time to time commanded the Apostles whatsoever was necessary. But as the earthly father finding himself to be at the point of death, and fearing that after his departure his children should quarrel among themselves, he calls witnesses, and puts his mind in writing; and if any difference arise among the brethren, they go not to their Fathers Sepulcher, but repair to his Will and Testament; and he who rests in his grave, speaks still in his writing, as if he were alive. Our Lord who left his Will among us, is now in heaven; therefore let us seek his commands in the Gospel, as in his Will.

12. THUS Cyril of Ierus. Cat. 4. Nothing, no not the least concernment of the divine and holy Sacraments of our Faith, is to be delivered without the holy Scripture: believe not me unless I give you a demonstration of what I say from the Scripture.

13. SAINT Basil in his Book of the true Faith says, If God be faithful in all his sayings, his words, and works, they remaining forever, and being don in truth and equity; it must be an evident sign of infidelity and pride, if any one shall reject what is written, and introduce what is not written. In which Books he generally declares that he will write nothing but what he receives from the holy Scripture: and that he abhors from taking it elsewhere. In his 29. Homily against the Antitrinit. Believe, says he, those which are written; seek not those which are not written. And in his Eth. req. 26. Every word and action ought to be confirmed by the testimony of the divinely inspired Scriptures to the establishment of the Faith of the good, and reproof of the wicked.

14. SAINT Ambrose in the first Book of his Offic. says: How can we make use of anything which is not to be found in Scripture? And in his Instit. of Virgins. I read he is the first, but read not he is the second; let them who say he is second, show it from the reading.

15. GREG. Nyssen in his Dial. of the soul and resurrect. says, 'Tis undeniable, that truth is there only to be placed, where there is the seal of Scripture Testimony.

16. SAINT Jerome against Helvidius declares. As we deny not that which is written, so we refuse those which are not written. And in his Comment on the 98. Ps. Every thing that we assert, we must show from the holy Scripture. The word of him that speaks has not that authority as God's precept. And on the 87. Ps. Whatever is said after the Apostles, let it be cut off, nor have afterwards authority. Tho one be holy after the Apostles, though one be eloquent; yet has he not authority.

17. SAINT Austin in his Tract of the unity of the Church, c. 12. acknowledges that he could not be convinced but by the Scriptures of what he was to believe; and adds they are read with such manifestation, that he who believes them must confess the doctrine to be most true. In the second Book of Christian doctrine, c. 9. he says, that in the plain places of Scripture are found all those things that concern Faith and Manners. And in Epist. 42. All things which have been exhibited heretofore as don to mankind, and what we now see and deliver to our posterity, the Scripture has not past them in silence, so far forth as they concern the search or defense of our Religion. In his Tract of the good of Widowhood, he says to Julian, the person to whom he addresses. What shall I teach you more than that we read in the Apostle: for the holy Scripture settles the rule of our doctrine; that we think not anything more than we ought to think; but to think soberly, as God has dealt to every man the measure of Faith. Therefore my teaching is only to expound the words of this Doctor, Ep. 157. Where any subject is obscure, and passes our comprehension, and the Scripture do's not plainly afford its help, there human conjecture is presumptuous in defining.

18. THEOPHILUS of Alex. in his second Paschal homily, tells us, that 'tis the suggestion of a diabolical spirit to think that anything besides the Scripture has divine authority. And in his third he adds, that the Doctors of the Church having the Testimony of the Scripture, lay firm foundation of their doctrine.

19. CHRYSOSTOM in his third Homily on the first of the Thessal. asserts, that from the alone reading or hearing of the Scripture one may learn all things necessary. So Hom. 34. on Act. 15. he declares. A heathen comes and says: I would willingly be a Christian, but I know not who to join myself to; for there are many contentions among you, many seditions and tumults; so that I am in doubt what opinion I should abuse, Each man says, what I say is true, and I know not whom to believe; each pretends to Scripture which I am ignorant of, 'Tis very well the issue is put here: for if the appeal were to reason, in this case there would be just occasion of being troubled: but when we appeal to Scripture, and they are simple and certain, you may easily yourself judge. He that agrees with the Scripture is a Christian, he that resists them, is far out of the way. And on Ps. 95. If anything be said without the Scripture, the mind halts between different opinions; sometimes inclining as to what is probable, anon rejecting as what is frivolous: but when the testimony of holy Scripture is produced, the mind both of speaker and hearer is confirmed. And Hom. 4. on Lazar. Tho one should rise from the dead, or an Angel come down from heaven, we must believe the Scripture; they being framed by the Lord of Angels, and the quick and dead. And Hom. 13. 2 Cor. 7. Is it not an absurd thing that when we deal with men about money, we will trust nobody, but cast up the sum, and make use of our counters; but in religious affairs, suffer ourselves to be led aside by other men's opinions, even then when we have by an exact scale and touchstone, the dictat of the divine Law. Therefore I pray and exhort you, that giving no heed to what this or that man says, you would consult the holy Scripture, and thence learn the divine riches, and pursue what you have learnt. And Hom. 58. on Jo. 10.1. 'Tis the mark of a thief, that he comes not in by the door, but another way: now by the door the testimony of the Scripture is signified. And Hom. on Gal. 1.8. The Apostle says not, if any man teach a contrary doctrine let him be accurs'd, or if he subvert the whole Gospel; but if he teach anything beside the Gospel which you have received, or vary any little thing, let him be accurs'd.

20. CYRIL of Alex. against Jul. l. 7. says, The holy Scripture is sufficient to make them who are instructed in it, wise unto salvation, and endued with most ample knowledge.

21. THEODORET Dial. 1. I am persuaded only by the holy Scripture. And Dial. 2. I am not so bold to affirm anything, not spoken of in the Scripture. And again, qu. 45. upon Genes. We ought not to enquire after what is past over in silence, but acquiesce in what is written.

22. IT were easy to enlarge this discourse into a Volume; but having taken, as they offered themselves, the suffrages of the writers of the four first Centuries, I shall not proceed to those that follow. If the holy Scripture were a perfect rule of Faith and Manners to all Christians heretofore, we may reasonably assure ourselves it is so still; and will now guide us into all necessary truth, and consequently make us wise unto salvation, without the aid of oral Tradition, or the new mintage of a living infallible Judge of controversy. And the impartial Reader will be enabled to judge whether our appeal to the holy Scripture, in all occasions of controversy, and recommendation of it to the study of every Christian, be that heresy and innovation which it is said to be.

23. IT is, we know, severely imputed to the Scribes and Pharisees by our Savior, that they took from the people the key of knowledge, Luk. 11.52. and had made the word of God of none effect by their Traditions, Mat. 15.6. but they never attempted what has been since practiced by their Successors in the Western Church, to take away the Ark of the Testament itself, and cut off not only the efficacy, but very possession of the word of God by their Traditions. Surely this had been exceeding criminal from any hand: but that the Bishops and Governors of the Church, and the universal and infallible Pastor of it, who claim the office to interpret the Scriptures, exhort unto, and assist in the knowledge of them, should be the men who thus rob the people of them; carries with it the highest aggravations both of cruelty and breach of trust. If any man shall take away from the words of the Book of this prophecy, says Saint John, Revel. 22.19. God shall take away his part out of the Book of Life, and out of the holy City, and from the things which are written in this Book. What vengeance therefore awaits those, who have taken away not only from one Book, but at once the Books themselves, even all the Scriptures, the whole word of God?

SECT. VII. Historical reflections upon the events which have happened in the Church since the with-drawing of the holy Scripture.

TWILL in this place be no useless contemplation to observe, after the Scriptures had been ravished from the people in the Church of Rome; what pitiful pretenders were admitted to succeed. And first because Lay-men were presumed to be illiterate, and easily seducible by those writings which were in themselves difficult, and would be wrested by the unlearned to their own destruction; pictures were recommended in their stead, and complemented as the Books of the Laity, which soon improv'd into a necessity of their worship, and that gross superstition which renders Christianity abominated by Turks, and Jews, and Heathens unto this day.

2. I would not be hasty in charging Idolatry upon the Church of Rome, or all in her communion; but that their Image-worship is a most fatal snare, in which vast numbers of unhappy souls are taken, no man can doubt who hath with any regard travail'd in Popish Countries. I myself, and thousands of others, whom the late troubles, or other occasions sent abroad, are and have been witnesses thereof. Charity, 'tis true, believes all things, but it do's not oblige men to disbelieve their eyes. 'Twas the out-cry of Micah against the Danites,

Jud. 18.24. ye have taken away my God's which I have made, and the Priest, and are gone away, and what have I more? but the Laity of the Roman communion may enlarge the complaint, and say; you have taken away the oracles of our God, and set up everywhere among us graven and molten Images, and Teraphims, and what have we more? and 'twas lately the loud, and I doubt me is still, the unanswerable complaint of the poor Americans, that they were denied to worship their Pagod once in the year, when they who forbad them, worshipped theirs every day.

3. THE Jews before the captivity, notwithstanding the recent memory of the Miracles in Egypt and the Wilderness, and the first conquest of the Land of Canaan with those that succeeded under the Judges and kings of Israel and Judah; as also the express command of God, and the menaces of Prophets, ever and anon fell to downright Idolatry: but after their return unto this day, have kept themselves from falling into that sin; though they had no Prophets to instruct them, no miracles or government to encourage or constrain them. The reason of which a very learned man in his discourse of religious Assemblies takes to be, the reading and teaching of the Law in their Synagogues; which was performed with great exactness after the return from the captivity, but was not so performed before. And may we not invert the observation, and impute the Image-worship now set up in the Christian Church, to the forbidding the reading of the Scriptures in the Churches, and interdicting the private use, and institution in them?

4. FOR a farther supplement in place of the Scriptures, whose History was thought not edifying enough, the Legends of the Saints were introduced; stories so stupid, that one would imagine them designed as an experiment how far credulity could be imposed upon; or else framed to a worse intent, that Christianity by them might be made ridiculous. Yet these are recommended to use and veneration, while in the mean time the word of God is utterly forbidden, whereby the parties to this unhappy practice (that I may speak in the words of the Prophet Jerem. 2.13.) have committed two evils, they have forsaken the fountain of living waters, and hewed them out cisterns, broken cisterns that can hold no water.

5. FARTHER yet, the same unreasonable tyranny which permitted not the Laity to understand Almighty God speaking to them in the Scripture; hinder'd them from being suffered to understand the Church or themselves speaking to him in their prayers; whilst the whole Roman office is so disposed, that in defiance of the Apostles discourse, 1 Cor. 14. he that occupies the room of the unlearned must say amen, to those prayers and praises which he has no comprehension of: and by his endless repetitions of Paters, Ave's and Credo's, falls into that battology reprov'd by our Savior, Mat, 6.7. and as 'twas said to the woman of Samaria, Jo. 4.22. knows not what he worships. Yet this unaccountable practice is so much the darling of that Church, that when in France about eighteen years since, the Roman Missal was translated into the vulgar Tongue, and published by the direction of several of their Bishops; the Clergy of France rose up in great fury against the attempt, anathematizing in their circular Epistles, all that sold, read, or used the said Book: and upon complaint unto Pope Alex. the 7. he resented the matter so deeply, as to issue out his Bull against it in the following words.

6. WHEREAS sons of perdition, endeavoring the destruction of souls, have translated the Roman Missal into the French Tongue, and so attempted to throw down and trample upon the majesty of the holy Rites comprehended in Latin words: As we abominate and detest the novelty, which will deform the beauty of the Church, and produce disobedience, temerity, boldness, sedition and schism; so we condemn, reprobate and forbid, the said and all other such Translations, and interdict the reading, and keeping, to all and singular the faithful, of whatever sex, degree, order, condition, dignity, honor, or preeminence, &c. under pain of excommunication. And we command the copies to be immediately burnt, &c. So mortal a sin it seems 'twas thought for the Laity to understand the prayers in which they must communicate.

7. NOR is this all; agreeable to the other attempts upon the holy Scripture, was the bold insolence of making a new authentic Text, in that unknown Tongue in which the offices of prayer had been, and were to be kept disguis'd; which was don by the decree of the Council of Trent in the fourth Session. But when the Council had given this Prerogative to the Version which it called vulgar, the succeeding Popes began to consider what that Version was; and this work Pius the fourth and fifth set upon; but prevented by death failed to complete it, so that the honor of the performance fell to Sixtus the fifth, who in the plenitude of his Apostolic power, the Translation being reformed to his mind, Commanded it to be that genuine ancient Edition, which the Trent Fathers had before made authentic, and under the pain of excommunication required it to be so received: which he do's in this form. Of our certain knowledge, and the plenitude of Apostolic power, we order and declare that vulgar Edition which has been received for authentic by the Council of Trent, is without doubt or controversy to be esteemed this very one, which being amended as well as it is possible, and printed at the Vatican Press, we publish to be read in the whole Christian Republic, and in all Churches of the Christian world. Decreeing that it having been approved by the consent of the holy universal Church, and the holy Fathers, and then by the Decree of the general Council of Trent, and now by the Apostolic authority delivered to us by the Lord; is the true, legitimate, authentic, and undoubted, which is to be received and held in all public and private Disputations, Lectures, Preachings, and Expositions, &c. But notwithstanding this certain knowledge, and plenitude of Apostolic power, soon after came Clement the eighth, and again resumes the work of his Predecessor Sixtus, discovers great and many errors in it, and puts out one more reformed, yet confessed by himself to be imperfect; which now stands for the authentic Text, and carries the title of the Bible put forth by Sixtus, notwithstanding all it's alterations. So well do's the Roman Church deserve the honor which she pretends to, of being the mistress of all Churches; and so infallible is the holy Chair in its determinations: and lastly, so authentic a Transcript of the word of God (concerning which 'tis said, Mat. 5.18. one jot or one tittle shall not fail) is that which she established, and that has received so many, and yet according to the confession of the infallible Corrector, wants still more alterations.

8. DEPENDENT upon this, and as great a mischief as any of the former, consequent to the with-drawing of the Scripture, I take to be the step it made to the overthrow of the ancient and most useful discipline of the Church in point of Penance, whose rigors always heretofore preceded the possibility of having absolution. Now of this we know a solemn part was the state of Audience, when the lapst person was received after long attendance without doors, prostrations, and lamentations there, within the entrance of the Church; and was permitted with the Catechumens or Candidats of Baptism, to hear the readings of the Scripture, and stay till prayer began, but then depart. He was obliged to hear the terrors of the Lord, the threats of the divine Law against sin and sinners, to stand among the unbaptiz'd and heathen multitude, and learn again the elements of that holy Faith from which he had prevaricated; and so in time be rendered capable of the devotions of the faithful▪ and afterward the reception of the Eucharist. But when the Scriptures were thought useless or dangerous to be understood and heard, it was consequent that the state of Audience should be cut off from Penance, and that the next to it, upon the self-same principle should be dismissed: and so the long probation formerly required should be supplanted; and the compendious way of pardoning first, and repenting afterwards, the endless circle of sinning and being absolved, and then sinning and being absolved again, should prevail upon the Church. Which still obtains, notwithstanding the complaints, and irrefragable demonstrations of learned men even of the Romish Communion, who plainly show this now received method, to be an innovation groundless and unreasonable, and most pernicious in its consequences.

9. AND, by the way, we may take notice that there cannot be a plainer evidence of the judgment of the Church, concerning the necessity of the Scriptures being known, not only by the learned but mean Christian, and the interest they have therein; then is the ancient course of Penance, established by the the practice of all the first Ages, and almost as many Councils, whether general or local, as have decreed anything concerning discipline; with the penitentiary Books and Canons which were written for the first eleven hundred years in the whole Christian world. For if even the unbaptiz'd Catechumen, and the lapst sinner, notwithstanding their slender knowledge in the mysteries of Faith, or frail pretence to the privilege thereof, had a right to the state of Audience, and was obliged to hear the Scripture read; surely the meanest unobnoxious Laic, was in as advantageous circumstances, and might not only be trusted with the reading of those sacred Books, but might claim them as his birth-right.

10. I may justly, over and above what has been hitherto alleg'd, impute to the Governors of the same Church, and their withholding from the Laity the holy Scripture; the many dangerous errors, gross ignorances, and scandalous immoralities which have prevailed among them both. It is no new method of divine vengeance, that there should be like people like Priest, Hos. 4.9. and that the Idol shepherd who led his flock into the ditch, should fall therein himself, Mat. 15.14. And as the Prophet Zacharias describes it, c. 11.17. The sword shall be upon his arm, and upon his right eye: his arm shall be clean dried up, and his right eye shall be utterly darkened.

11. BUT no consequence can be more obviously deducible from that practice, then that men should justify the with-holding of the Scripture, by lessening its credit, and depreciating its worth: which has occasioned those reproaches which by the writers of the Church of Rome, of best note, have been cast upon it. As that it was a Nose of wax, a leaden rule, a deaf and useless deputy to God in the office of a Judge; of less authority then the Roman Church, and of no more credit then Esops Fables, but for the testimony of the said Church, that they contain things apt to raise laughter or indignation, that the Latin Translation in the Complutensian Bible is placed between the Hebrew Text, and the Septuagint Version, as our Savior was at his Crucifixion between two thieves, and that the vulgar Edition is of such authority that the Originals ought to be mended by it, rather than it should be mended from them: which are the complements of Cardinal Bellarmine, Hosius, Eckius, Perron, Ximenes, Coqueus, and others of that Communion: words to be answered by a Thunderbolt, and fitter for the mouth of a Celsus or a Porphyry, than of the pious sons, and zealous Champions of the Church of Christ.

12. TIS to be expected that the Romanists should now wipe their mouths, and plead not guilty; telling us that they permit the Scripture to the Laity in their mother Tongue: And to that purpose the Fathers of Reims and Doway have published an English Bible for those of their communion. I shall therefore give a short and plain account of the whole affair as really it stands, and then on God's name let the Romanists make the best of their Apology.

13. THE fourth rule of the Index of prohibited Books composed upon the command and auspice of the Council of Trent, and published by the authority of Pius the fourth, Sixtus the fifth, and Clement the eighth, runs thus; Since 'tis manifest by experience, that if the holy Bible be suffered promiscuously in the vulgar Tongue, such is the temerity of men, that greater detriment than advantage will thence arise; in this matter let the judgment of the Bishop or Inquisitor be stood to: that with the advice of the Curat or Confessor, they may give leave for the reading of the Bible in the vulgar Tongue, translated by Catholics, to such as they know will not receive damage, but increase of Faith and Piety thereby. Which faculty they shall have in writing; and whosoever without such faculty shall presume to have or to read the Bible, he shall not till he have delivered it up, receive absolution of his sins. Now (to pass over the iniquity of obliging men to ask leave to do that which God Almighty commands) when 'tis considered how few of the Laity can make means to the Bishop or Inquisitor, or convince them, or the Curat or Confessor, that they are such who will not receive damage, but increase of Faith and Piety by the reading of the Scripture; and also have interest to prevail with them for their favor herein: and after all can and will be at the charge of taking out the faculty, which is so penally required: 'tis easy to guess what thin numbers of the Laity are likely, or indeed capable of reaping benefit by this Indulgence pretended to be allowed them.

14. BUT, besides all this, what shall we say, if the power itself of giving Licences be a mere show, and really signifies just nothing? In the observation subjoin'd to this fourth rule it is declared, that the Impression and Edition thereof gives no new faculty to Bishops, or Inquisitors, or Superiors of regulars to grant Licences of buying, reading, or retaining Bibles published in a vulgar Tongue; since hitherto by the command and practice of the holy Roman and universal Inquisition, the power of giving such faculties, to read or retain vulgar Bibles, or any parts of Scripture of the Old or New Testament, in any vulgar Tongue; or also summaries, or historical compendiums of the said Bibles or Books of Scripture, in whatsoever Tongue they are written, has been taken away. And sure if a Lay-man cannot read the Bible without a faculty, and it is not in any ones power to grant it; 'twill evidently follow that he cannot read it: And so the pretence of giving liberty, owns the shame of openly refusing it, but has no other effect or consequence. And if any Romanist among us, or in any other Protestant Country enjoys any liberty herein, 'tis merely by connivance, and owed to a fear lest the Votary would be lost, and take the Bible where it was without difficulty to be had, if strictness should be used. And should Popery, which God forbid, become paramount; the Translations of the Scripture into our Mother Tongues, would be no more endured here, then they are in Spain: and they who have formerly been wary in communicating the Scriptures; remembering how thereby their errors have been detected, would upon a revolution effectually provide for the future, and be sure to keep their people in an Egyptian darkness, that might itself be felt, but that allowed the notices of no other object. They would not be content with that composition of the Ammonite, to thrust out all the right eyes of those that submitted to them, 1 Sam. 11.2. but would put out both; as the Philistines did to Samson, that they might make their miserable captives forever grind in their Mill, Jud. 16.21.

15. BUT this heaviest of judgments will never fall upon the reformed Churches, till by their vicious practice and contempt of the divine Law, they have deserted their profession; and made themselves utterly unworthy of the blessings they enjoy, and the light of that Gospel which with noon-day brightness has shined among them. Upon which account, I suppose it may not be impertinent in the next place to subjoin some plain directions, and cautionary advices, concerning the use of these sacred Books.

SECT. VIII. Necessary cautions to be used in the reading of the holy Scriptures.

IT is a common observation, that the most generous and sprightly Medicins; are the most unsafe, if not appli'd with due care and regimen: And the remark holds as well in spiritual as corporal remedies. The Apostle asserts it upon his own experience, that the doctrine of the Gospel, which was to some the savor of life unto life, was to others the savor of death, 2 Cor. 2.15. And the same effect that the oral Word had then, the written Word may have now; not that either the one or the other have anything in them that is of itself mortiferous, but becomes so by the ill disposition of the persons who so pervert it. It is therefore well worth our inquiry, what qualifications on our part are necessary to make the Word be to us what it is in itself, the power of God unto salvation, Rom. 1.16. Of these some are previous before our reading, some are concomitant with it, and some are subsequent and follow after it.

2. OF those that go before, sincerity is a most essential requisite: by sincerity, I mean an upright intention, by which we direct our reading to that proper end for which the holy Scriptures were designed; viz. the knowing God's will in order to the practicing it. This honest simplicity of heart is that which Christ represents by the good ground, where alone it was that the seed could fructify, Mat. 13.8. And he that brings not this with him, brings only the shadow of a Disciple. The word of God, is indeed, sharper then a two-edged sword, Heb. 4.12. but what impression can a sword make on a body of air; which still slips from, and eludes its thrusts? And as little can all the practical discourses of holy Writ make on him, who brings only his speculative faculties with him, and leaves his will and affections behind him; which are the only proper subjects for it to work on.

3. TO this we may probably impute that strange inefficaciousness we see of the Word. Alas, men rarely apply it to the right place: our most inveterat diseases lie in our morals; and we suffer the Medicin to reach no farther then our intellects. As if he that had an ulcer in his bowels should apply all his balsoms and sanatives only to his head. 'Tis true, the holy Scriptures are the tresuries of divine Wisdom; the Oracles to which we should resort for saving knowledge: but they are also the rule and guide of holy Life: and he that covets to know God's will for any purpose but to practice it, is only studious to entitle himself to the greater number of stripes, Luk. 12.47.

4. NAY farther, he that affects only the bare knowledge, is oft disappointed even of that. The Scripture, like the Pillar of fire and cloud, enlightens the Israelites, those who sincerely resign themselves to its guidance; but it darkens and confounds the Egyptians, Ex. 14.20. And 'tis frequently seen, that those who read only to become knowing, are tolled on by their curiosity into the more abstruse and mysterious parts of Scripture, where they entangle themselves in inextricable mazes and confusions; and instead of acquiring a more superlative knowledge, loose those easy and common notions which lie obvious to every plain well meaning Reader. I fear this Age affords too many, and too frequent instances of this; in men who have lost God in the midst of his Word, and studied Scripture till they have renounced its Author.

5. AND sure this infatuation is very just, and no more then God himself has warned us of, who takes the wise in their own craftiness, Job. 5.12. but appropriates his secrets only to them that fear him, and has promise'd to teach the meek his way, Psal. 25.9.14. And this was the method Christ observed in his preaching; unveiling those truths to his Disciples, which to the Scribes and Pharisees, his inquisitive, yet refractory hearers, he wrapped up in parables: not that he dislik'd their desire of knowledge, but their want of sincerity: which is so fatal a defect as blasts our pursuits, though of things in themselves never so excellent. This we find exemplifi'd in Simon Magus, Acts 8. who though he coveted a thing in itself very desirable, the power of conferring the holy Ghost, yet desiring it not only upon undue conditions, but for sinister ends, he not only mist of that, but was (after all his convincement by the Apostles miracles, and the engagement of his Baptism) immersed in the gall of bitterness; and at last advanced to that height of blasphemy, as to set up himself for a God; so becoming a lasting memento, how unsafe it is to prevaricate in holy things.

6. BUT as there is a sincerity of the Will in order to practice, so there is also a sincerity of the understanding in order to belief; and this is also no less requisite to the profitable reading of Scripture. I mean by this, that we come with a preparation of mind, to embrace indifferently, whatever God there reveles as the object of our Faith: that we bring our own opinions, not as the clue by which to unfold Scripture, but to be tried and regulated by it. The want of this has been of very pernicious consequence in matters both of Faith and speculation. Men are commonly prepossessed strongly with their own notions, and their errand to Scripture is not to lend them light to judge of them, but aids to back and defend them.

7. OF this there is no Book of controversy that do's not give notorious proof. The Socinian can easily overlook the beginning of Saint John, that says, The Word was God, Jo. 1.1. and all those other places which plainly assert the Deity of our Savior; if he can but divert to that other more agreeable Text, that the Father is greater then I. Among the Romanists, Peters being said to be first among the Apostles, Mat. 10.2, and that on that Rock Christ would build his Church, Mat. 16.18. carries away all attention from those other places where Saint Paul says he was not behind the very chiefest of the Apostles, 2 Cor. 11.5. that upon him lay the care of all the Churches, 2 Cor. 11.28. and that the Church was not built upon the foundation of someone, but all the twelve Apostles, Revel. 21.14. So it fares in the business of the Eucharist: This is my body, Mat. 26.26. carries it away clear for Transubstantiation, when our Saviors calling that which he drunk the fruit of the vine, Mat. 26.29. and then Saint Paul's naming the Elements in the Lord's Supper several times over Bread and Wine; The Bread that we break, is it not the Communion of the Body of Christ: the Cup that we bless, is it not the Communion, &c. 1 Cor. 10.16. And again, He that eats this Bread, and drinks this Cup unworthily, &c. 1 Cor. 11.29. can make no appearance of an Argument.

8. THUS men once engaged ransac for Texts that carry some correspondency to the opinions they have imbibed; and those how do they rack and scrue to bring to a perfect conformity; and improve every little probability into a demonstration? On the other side, the contrary Texts they look on as enemies, and consider them no farther then to provide fences and guards against them: So they bring Texts not into the scales to weigh, but into the field to skirmish, as Partizans and Auxiliaries of such or such opinions.

9. BY this force of prepossession it is, that that sacred Rule, which is the measure and standard of all rectitude, is itself bow'd and distorted to countenance and abet the most contrary tenets: and like a variable picture, represents differing shapes according to the light in which you view it. And sure we cannot do it a worse office then to represent it thus dissonant to itself. Yet thus it must still be till men come unbiast to the reading of it. And certainly there is all the reason in the world they should do so: the ultimate end of our faith is but the salvation of our souls, 1 Pet. 1.9. and we may be sure the Scripture can best direct us what Faith it is which will lead us to that end.

10. WHY should we not then have the same indifference which a traveler hath, whether his way lie on this hand or that; so as it be the direct road to his journeys end? For altho it be infinitely material that I embrace right principles, yet 'tis not so that this should be right rather then the other: and our wishes that it should be so, proceed only from our prepossessions and fondness of our own conceptions, then which nothing is more apt to intercept the clear view of truth. It therefore nearly concerns us to deposit them, and to give up ourselves without reserve to the guidance of God's Word, and give it equal credit when it thwarts, as when it complies with our own notions.

11. WITHOUT this, though we may call Scripture the rule of Faith, and judge of controversies; yet 'tis manifest we make it not so, but reserve still the last appeal to our own prejudicat fancies: and then no wonder, though we fall under the same occoecation which our Savior upbraids to the Jews, that seeing we see not, neither do we understand, Mat. 13.14. For he that will not be saved God's way, will hardly be so by his own. He that resolves not impartially to embrace all the Scriptures dictates, comes to them as unsincerely, as the remnant of the Jews did to Jeremiah to inquire of the Lord for them, which he no sooner had don, but they protest against his message, Jer. 42.20. and may expect as fatal an event.

12. BUT there are a set of men who deal yet more insincerely with the Word; that read it insiduously, on purpose to collect matter of objection and cavil: that with a malicious diligence compare Texts in hope to find contradictions; and read attentively, but to no other end then to remark incoherences and defects in the style: which when they think they have started, they have their design; and never will use a quarter of the same diligence in considering how they may be solv'd, or consulting with those who may assist them in it. For I think I may appeal to the generality of those who have raised the loudest clamors against the Scripture, whether they have endeavored to render themselves competent judges of it by inquiring into the Originals; or informing themselves of those local Customs, peculiar Idioms, and many other circumstances, by which obscure Texts are to be cleared. And though I do not affirm it necessary to salvation that every man should do this; yet I may affirm it necessary to him that will pretend to judge of the Bible: and he that without this condemns it, do's it as manifest injury, as a Judge that should pass sentence only upon the Indictment, without hearing the defense.

13. AND certainly there cannot be any thing more unmanly and disingenuous, then for men to inveigh and condemn before they inquire and examine. Yet this is the thing upon which so many value themselves, assuming to be men of reason, for that for which the Scripture pronounces them brute beasts, viz. the speaking evil of those things they understand not, 2 Pet. 2.12. Would men use due diligence, no doubt many of those seeming contradictions would be reconciled, and the obscurities cleared: and if any should after all remain, he might find twenty things fitter to charge it on, then want of verity or discourse in the inspired writers.

14. ALAS what human writing is there of near that Antiquity, wherein there are not many passages unintelligible? And indeed, unless modern times knew all those national customs, obsolete Laws, particular Rites and Ceremonies, Phrases and proverbial Sayings, to which such ancient Books refer, 'tis impossible but some passages must still remain obscure. Yet in these we ordinarily have so much candor, as to impute their unintelligibleness to our own ignorance of those things which should clear them, the improprieties of style, to the variation that times make in dialects, or to the errors of Scribes, and do not presently exclaim against the Authors as false or impertinent, or discard the whole Book for some such passages.

15. AND sure what allowances we make to other Books, may with more reason be made to the Bible; which having been writ so many Ages since, past thro infinite variety of hands, and (which is above all) having been the object of the Devils, and wicked men's malice, lies under greater disadvantages then any human composure: And doubtless men would be as equitable to that as they are to others, were it not that they more wish to have that false or irrational then any other Book. The plain parts of it, the precepts and threatenings speak clearer then they desire, gall and fret them; and therefore they will revenge themselves upon the obscurer: and seem angry that there are some things they understand not, when indeed their real displeasure is at those they do.

16. A second qualification preparatory to reading the Scripture is reverence. When we take the Bible in our hands, we should do it with other sentiments and apprehensions than when we take a common Book; considering that it is the word of God, the instrument of our salvation; or upon our abuse of it, a promoter of our ruin.

17. AND sure this if duly apprehended, cannot but strike us with a reverential awe, make us to say with Jacob, Gen. 28.17. surely God is in this place; control all trifling fancies, and make us read, not for custom or divertisement, but with those solemn and holy intentions which become the dignity of its Author. Accordingly we find holy men have in all Ages been affected with it; and some to the inward reverence of the mind, have joined the outward of the body also, and never read it but upon their knees: an example that may both instruct and reproach our profaneness; who commonly read by chance, and at a venture: If a Bible happen in our way, we take it up as we would do a Romance, or Play-book; only herein we differ, that we dismiss it much sooner, and retain less of its impressions.

18. IT was a Law of Numa, that no man should meddle with divine things, or worship the God's, in passing, or by accident, but make it a set and solemn business. And everyone knows with how great ceremony and solemnity the heathen Oracles were consulted. How great a shame is it then for Christians to defalk that reverence from the true God, which heathens allowed their false ones?

19. NOW this proceeds sometimes from the want of that habitual reverence we should always have to it as God's word, and sometimes from want of actual exciting it, when we go to read: for if the habit lie only dormant in us, and be not awak'd by actual consideration, it avails us as little in our reading, as the habitual strength of a man do's towards labor, when he will not exert it for that end.

20. WE ought therefore, as to make it our deliberate choice to read God's word; so when we do it, to stir up ourselves to those solemn apprehensions of its dignity and authority, as may render us malleable, and apt to receive its impressions: for where there is no reverence, 'tis not to be expected there should be any genuine or lasting obedience.

21. SAINT Austin in his Tract to Honoratus, of the advantage of believing, makes the first requisite to the knowledge of the Scriptures to be the love of them. Believe me, says he, everything in the Scripture is sublime and divine, its truth and doctrine are most accommodate to the refreshment, and building up of our minds: and in all respects so ordered, that everyone may draw thence what is sufficient for him; provided he approach it with devotion, piety, and religion. The proof of this may require much reasoning and discourse. But this I am first to persuade, that you do not hate the Authors, and then that you love them. Had we an ill opinion of Virgil, nay, if upon the account of the reputation he has gained with our Predecessors, we did not greatly love before we understood him; we should never patiently go thro all the difficult questions Grammarians raise about him. Many employ themselves in commenting upon him; we esteem him most, whose exposition most commends the Book, and shows that the Author, not only was free from error, but did excellently well where he is not understood. And if such an account happen not to be given, we impute it rather to the Interpreter than the Poet.

22. THUS the good Father; whose words I have transcribed at large, as being remarkable to the present purpose; he also shows that the mind of no Author is to be learnt from one averse to his doctrine: as that 'tis vain to enquire of Aristotle's Books from one of a different Sect: Or of Archimedes from Epicurus: the discourse will be as displeasing as the speaker; and that shall be esteemed absurd, which comes from one that is envi'd or despised.

23. A third preparative to our reading should be prayer. The Scripture as it was dictated at first by the holy Spirit, so must still owe its effects and influence to its cooperation. The things of God, the Apostle tells us, are spiritually discerned, 1 Cor. 2.14. And though the natural man may well enough apprehend the letter, and grammatical sense of the Word; yet its power and energy, that insinuating persuasive force whereby it works on hearts, is peculiar to the spirit; and therefore without his aids, the Scripture whilst it lies open before our eyes, may still be as a Book that is sealed, Isaiah. 29.11. be as ineffective as if the characters were illegible.

24. BESIDES our Savior tells us the devil is still busy to steal away the seed as soon as it is sown, Mat. 13.17. And unless we have some better guard than our own vigilance, he is sure enough to prosper in his attempt. Let it therefore be our care to invoke the divine Aid; and when ever we take the Bible into our hands, to dart up at least a hearty ejaculation, that we may find its effects in our hearts. Let us say with holy David, open thou mine eyes O Lord, that I may see the wondrous things of thy Law. Blessed art thou O Lord, O teach me thy statutes, Ps. 119. Nay indeed 'twil be fit matter of a daily solemn devotion, as our Church has made it an annual in the Collect on the second Sunday in Advent: a prayer so apt and fully expressive of what we should desire in this particular, that if we transcribe not only the example, but the very words, I know not how we can form that part of our devotion more advantageously.

25. IN the second place we are to consider what is required of us at the time of reading the Scripture; which consists principally in two things. The first of these is attention, which is so indispensably requisite, that without it all Books are alike, and all equally insignificant: for he that adverts not to the sense of what he reads, the wisest discourses signify no more to him, than the most exquisite music do's to a man perfectly deaf. The letters and syllables of the Bible are no more sacred than those of another Book; 'tis the sense and meaning only that is divinely inspired: and he that considers only the former, may as well entertain himself with a spelling-book.

26. WE must therefore keep our minds fixed and attent to what we read: 'tis a folly and lightness not to do so in human Authors; but 'tis a sin and danger not to do so in this divine Book. We know there can scarce be a greater instance of contempt and disvalue, than to hear a man speak, and not at all mind what he says: yet this vilest affront do all those put upon God, who hear or read his Word, and give it no attention. Yet I fear the practice is not more impious than it is frequent: for there are many that read the Bible, who if at the end of each Chapter they should be called to account, I doubt they could produce very slender collections: and truly 'tis a sad consideration, that that sacred Book is read most attentively by those, who read it as some preach the Gospel, Phil. 1.15. out of envy and strife. How curiously do men inspect, nay ransack and embowel a Text to find a pretence for cavil and objection, whilst men who profess to look there for life and salvation, read with such a retchless heedlessness, as if it could tell them nothing they were concerned in: and to such 'tis no wonder if their reading bring no advantage, God is not in this sense found of those that seek him not, Isaiah. 65.1. 'tis Satan's part to serve himself of the bare words and characters of holy Writ, for charms and amulets: the virtue God has put there consists in the sense and meaning, and can never be drawn out by drousy inadverting Readers.

27. THIS unattentiveness fore-stalls all possibility of good. How shall that convince the understanding, or persuade the affections, which do's not so much as enter the imagination. So that in this case the seed seems more cast away then in any of those instances the parable gives, Mat. 13. In those it still fell upon the soil, but in this it never reaches that; but is scattered and dissipated, as with a mighty wind, by those thoughts which have prepossess'd the mind. Let no man therefore take this sacred Book into his hand, till he have turned out all distracting fancies, and have his faculties free and vacant for those better objects which will there present themselves. And when he has so disposed himself for attention, then let him contrive to improve that attention to the best advantage.

28. TO which purpose it may be very conducive to put it into some order and method. As for instance, when he reads the doctrinal part of Scripture, let him first and principally advert to those plain Texts which contain the necessary points of Faith: that he may not owe his Creed only to his education, the institution of his Parents or Tutors; but may know the true foundation on which it is bottomed, viz. the word of God, and may thence be able to justify his Faith: and as Saint Peter exhorts, be ready to give an answer to every man that asks him a reason of the hope that is in him, 1 Pet. 3.15. For want of this it is, that Religion sits so loose upon men, that every wind of doctrine blows them into distinct and various forms; till at last their Christianity itself vapors away and disappears.

29. BUT let men be careful thus to secure the foundation, and then 'twill be commendable in them (who are capable of it) to aspire to higher degrees of speculation: yet even in these it will be their safest course chiefly to pursue such as have the most immediate influence on practice, and be more industrious to make observations of that sort, then curious and critical remarks, or bold conjectures upon those mysteries on which God has spread a veil.

30. BUT besides a man's own particular collections, it will be prudence in him to advantage himself of those of others, and to consult the learned'st and best expositors; and that not only upon a present emergency, when he is to dispute a point, (as most do) but in the constant course of his reading, wherein he will most sedatly, and dispassionately judge of the notions they offer.

31. AS to the choice of the portions of Scripture to be read in course, though I shall not condemn that of reading the whole Bible in order, yet 'tis apparent that some parts of it (as that of the Levitical Law) are not so aptly accommodated to our present state, as others are; and consequently not so edificatory to us: and therefore I cannot see why any man should oblige himself to an equal frequency in reading them. And to this our Church seems to give her suffrage; by excluding such out of her public Lessons. And if we govern our private reading by her measures, it will well express our deference to her judgment; who has selected some parts of Scripture, not that she would keep her children in ignorance of any, but because they tend most immediately to practice.

32. NEITHER will the daily reading the Scripture in the rubricks order, hinder any man from acquainting himself with the rest. For he may take in the other parts as supernumeraries to his constant task, and read them as his leisure and inclination shall prompt. So that all the hurt that can accrue to him by this method, is the being invited to read sometimes extraordinary proportions.

33. IF it be objected, that to those who daily hear the Church Service, 'twill be a kind of tautology, first to read those Lessons in private, which soon after they shall hear read publicly, I answer that whatever men may please to call it, 'twill really be an advantage: For he that shall read a chapter by himself with due consideration, and consulting of good Paraphrasts, will have div'd so far into the sense of it, that he will much better comprehend it when he hears it read: as on the other side, the hearing it read so immediately after will serve to confirm and rivet the sense in his mind. The one is as the conning, the other the repeating the Lesson; which every Schole-boy can tell us is best don at the nearest distance to each other. But I shall not contend for this, or any particular method; let the Scriptures be read in proportion to every man's leisure and capacity, and read with attention; and we need not be scrupulous about circumstances, when the main duty is secured.

34. BUT as in the doctrinal, so in the preceptive part, there is a caution to be used in our attention. For we are to distinguish between those temporary precepts that were adapted to particular times and occasions, and such as are of perpetual obligation. He that do's not this may bring himself under the Jewish Law, or believe a necessity of selling all and giving it to the poor because 'twas Christ's command to the rich man; Mat. 19. or incur other considerable mischiefs.

35. THUS frequently commands are put in comprehensive indefinite words, but concern only the Generality to whom the Law is written; and not those who are entrusted with the vindication of their contempt. Accordingly 'tis said, thou shalt not kill, Mark. 10.19. which concerns the private person; but extends not to the Magistrate in the execution of his office, who is a revenger appointed by God, and bears not the sword in vain, Rom. 13.4. So the injunction not to swear at all, Mat. 5.34 refers to the common transactions of life; but not those solemn occasions where an oath is to give glory to God, and is the end of all strife, Heb. 6.16. Yet these mistakes at this day prevail with Anabaptists and Quakers, and bottom their denial of the Magistrates power to protect his Subjects by war; and to determine differences in Peace, by the oath of witnesses in judicial proceedings.

36. THERE is another distinction we are to attend to; and that is between absolute and primary commands, and secondary ones: the former we are to set a special remark upon, as those upon whose observance or violation our eternal life or death inseparably depends. And therefore our first and most solicitous care must be concerning them. I mention this, not to divert any from aspiring to the highest degrees of perfection: but to reprove that preposterous course many take, who lay the greatest weight upon those things on which God lays the least; and have more zeal for oblique intimations, than for express downright commands; nay think by the one to commute for the contempt of the other. For example, fasting is recommended to us in Scripture, but in a far lower key than moral duties: rather as an expedient and help to virtue, than as properly a virtue itself. And yet we may see men scrupulous in that, who startle not at injustice, and oppression (that clamorous sin that cries to heaven) who pretend to mortify their appetites by denying it its proper food, or being luxurious in one sort of it; and yet glut their avarice, eat up the poor, and devour widows houses, Mat. 23.

37. TO such as these 'twould be good advice to fix their attention on the absolute commands, to study moral honesty, and the essentials of Christianity; to make a good progress there, and do what God indispensably requires: and then it may be seasonable to think of voluntary oblations: but till then they are so far from homage, that they are the most reproachful flattery; an attempt to bribe God against himself; and a sacrilege, like that of Dionysius; who took away Apollo's golden robe, and gave him a stuff one.

38. THE second thing requisite in our reading is application: this is the proper end of our attention: and without this we may be very busy to very little purpose. The most laborious attention without it, puts us but in the condition of those poor slaves that labor in the mines: who with infinite toil dig that ore of which they shall never partake. If therefore we will appropriate that rich treasure, we must apply, and so make it our own.

39. LET us then at every period of holy Writ, reflect and look on ourselves as the persons spoke to. When we find Philip giving baptism to the Eunuch upon this condition that he believe with all his heart, Act. 8. let us consider that unless we do so; our baptism (like a thing surreptitiously obtained) conveys no title to us; will avail us nothing.

40. WHEN we read our Savior's denunciation to the Jews, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish; Lu. 13.5. we are to look on it as if address immediately to ourselves; and conclude as great a necessity of our repentance. In those black catalogues of crimes which the Apostle mentions, 1 Cor. 6.10. and Gal. 5.19, 20, 21. as excluding from the Kingdom of heaven, we are to behold our own guilts arraign'd, and to resolve that the same crimes will as certainly shut heaven gates against us, as those to whom those Epistles were immediately directed. In all the precepts of good life, and Christian virtue, we are to think ourselves as nearly and particularly concerned, as if we had been Christ's Auditors on the Mount. So proportionably in all the threats and promises we are either to tremble or hope, according as we find ourselves adhere to those sins or virtues to which they are affixt.

41. THIS close application would render what we read operative and effective, which without it will be useless and insignificant. We may see an instance of it in David; who was not at all convinced of his own guilt by Nathan's parable (though the most apposite that was imaginable) till he roundly appli'd it, saying, thou art the man: 2 Sam. 12. And unless we treat ourselves at the same rate, the Scripture may fill our heads with high notions, nay with many speculative truths, which yet amounts to no more then the Devils theology, Ja. 2.19. and will as litte advantage us.

42. IT now remains that we speak of what we are to do after our reading; which may be sum'd up in two words: Recollect and practice. Our memories are very frail as to things of this nature. And therefore we ought to impress them as deep as we can, by reflecting on what we have read. It is an observation out of the Levitical Law, that those beasts only were clean, and fit for sacrifice, that chew'd the cud, Lev. 11.4. And though the ceremony were Jewish, the moral is Christian, and admonishes us how we should revolve and ruminate on spiritual instructions. Without this what we hear or read slips insensibly from us, and like letters writ in chalk, is wipit out by the next succeeding thought: but recollection engraves and indents the characters in the mind. And he that would duly use it, would find other manner of impressions; more affective and more lasting, then bare reading will leave.

43. WE find it thus in all Sciences: he that only reads over the rules, and lays aside the thoughts of them together with his Book, will make but a slow advance; whilst he that plods and studies upon them, repetes and reinforces them upon his mind, soon arrives to an eminency. By this it was that David attaind to that perfection in God's Law as to out-strip his teachers, and understand more then the Ancients, Psal. 119.99, 100. because it was his meditation as himself tell us, ver. 97.99.

44. LET us therefore pursue the same method; and when we have read a portion of Scripture, let us recollect what observable things we have there met with: what exhortations to virtue, or determents from vice; what promises to obedience, or menaces for the contrary: what examples of God's vengeance against such or such sins, or what instances of his blessing upon duties. If we do this daily, we cannot but amass together a great stock of Scripture documents, which will be ready for us to produce upon every occasion. Satan can assault us nowhere, but we shall be provided of a guard, a Scriptum est; which we see was the sole armor the captain of our salvation used in his encounter with him, Mat. 4. ver. 4.7. and 10. and will be as successful to us, if we will duly manage it.

45. THE last thing required as consequent to our reading, is practice. This is the ultimate end, to which all the fore-going qualifications are directed. And if we fail here, the most assiduous diligence in all the former will be but lost labor. Let us mean never so well, attend never so close, recollect never so exactly; if after all we do not practice, all the rest will serve but to enhance our guilt. Christianity is an active Science, and the Bible was given us not merely for a theme of speculation, but for a rule of life.

46. And alas, what will it avail us that our opinions are right, if our manners be crooked? When the Scripture has showed us what God requires of us, nay, has evinced to us the reasonableness of the injunctions, the great agreeableness which they have to the excellency of our nature: and has backed this with the assurance that in keeping of them there shall be a great reward, Ps. 19.11. if in the midst of such importunate invitations to life we will choose death; we are indeed worthy, as the wise man speaks, to take part with it, Wis. 1.16. our crimes are hereby increased to a monstrous bulk, and also deprived of that veil and shelter which darkness and ignorance would have given them. And a vicious Christian may have cause at the last day to wish that he had studied the Alcoran rather than the Bible. His sensualities might then have pleaded, that they were but the anticipating his Paradise, taking up that before hand, which his Religion proposed to him as his summum bonum, his final and highest aim. But with what confusion must a Christian then appear, whose institution obliges him to mortify the flesh: and yet has made it the business of his life, not only to satisfy, but even to enrage, and enflame its appetites? that has set up a counter-discipline to that of the Gospel he professes; and when that requires austerities and self-denials, to reduce corrupt nature to a tameness and subjection; has not only pulled off the bridle, but used the spur; contrived Arts to debauch even corruption itself; and has forced his reluctant nature upon studied and artificial leudness? Such men may be thought to have read the Scripture with no other design but to be sure to run counter to it; that by informing themselves of God's will, they may know the more exactly how to affront and contradict it.

47. NAY, so it is, too many unto malice add contempt; are not content only sullenly to resist its Precepts, but despise and revile them also; arraign the wisdom of God, and pronounce the divine Laws to be weak and impertinent; lay their Scenes of ridiculous mirth in the Bible; rally in the sacred Dialect, and play the Buffoons with the most serious thing in the world. An impious licentiousness which is now grown to that height, that it is one of the wonders of God's longsuffering, that there are not as many eminent instances of the vengeance, as there are of the guilt. I have formerly complained of it, and must still crave leave to do so. It is indeed so spreading an infection, that we can never be sufficiently armed against it. Some degrees of it have tainted many who have not utterly renounced their reverence for the Bible: there being those who in their solemn moods own it as God's word, and profess they must finally stand or fall by its verdict; who yet in their jocular humors make light and irreverent applications of its phrases and sentences, furnish out their little jests in its attire, and use it as if they thought it good for nothing else.

48. AND certainly this abuse in men that own the Bible, is infinitely more monstrous than in those who defy it: the later look on it as a common thing, and use it as such: but for those who confess it sacred, thus to prostitute it, is a flat contradiction as much against the rules of Discourse as Religion: 'tis to offer the same abuse to Christ in his Word, which the rude soldiers did to his person; to bow the knee before it, and yet expose it as an object of scorn and laughter. But sure there cannot be two things more inconsistent, than the avowing it to be dictated by God in order to the most important concern of man, and yet debase it to the vilest purposes; make it the drudg and hackney to our sportful humors, and bring it out as the Philistines did Samson, only to make us merry, Jud. 16.25.

49. INDEED one would wonder how that should become a proper instrument for that purpose, that those doctrines of righteousness, temperance and judgment to come (everywhere scattered thro that Book) which set heathen Felix a trembling, should set Christians a laughing; and yet should men cite the same things and phrases out of another Author, there would be no jest in it. It seems therefore that the spirit and essence of this sort of wit lies in the profaneness. How absurd is it then for men that do not utterly abjure

Religion, to affect this impious sort of raillery, which has nothing but daring wickedness to recommend it? For certainly, of all the ways of discourse that ever pretended to wit, this has the least claim to it.

50. WHAT strength of reason, or height of fancy is there, in repeating of phrases and fragments of Books, when what they would say, they might much more properly express in their own words? In any other instance but this of the Bible, it would pass rather for a defect than an excess of wit. But that which I suppose renders it so taking, is, that it is the cheapest expedient for men to arrive to that reputation. Men that cannot go to the cost of anything that is truly ingenious, can by this means immediately commence wits; if they can but charge their memories with half a dozen Texts, they need no other furniture for the trade: these mangled and transposed, will be ready at all turns, and render them applauded by those who have no other measure of wit, but its opposition to Piety. But would God, men would look a little before them, and consider what the final reckoning will be for such divertisements; and if the whole world be an unequal exchange for a soul, what a miserable Merchant is he that barter his for a bald insipid jest? such as a sober man would avoid were there no sin in it.

51. I know men are apt to flatter themselves, that these lighter frolics will pass for nothing, so long as they do not seriously and maliciously oppose God's word: but I fear they will find God in earnest, though they be in jest. He that has magnified his Word above all things, Psal. 138.2. cannot brook that we should make it vile and cheap, play and dally with it. And if it were a capital crime to convert any of the perfume of the Sanctuary to common use, Ex. 30.32. can we think God can be pleased to see his more sacred Word, the theme of our giddy mirth, and have his own words echoed to him in profane drollery?

52. BUT besides 'tis to be considered that this wanton liberty is a step to the more solemn and deliberate contempt of God's word: custom do's strangely prescribe to us; and he that a while has used anything irreverently, will at last bring his practice into argument, and conclude that there is no reverence due to it. God knows we are naturally too apt to slight and easy apprehensions of sacred things; and had need to use all Arts and Instruments to impress an awe upon our minds.

53. IT will sure then be very unsafe for us to trifle with them, and by so undue a familiarity draw on that contempt which we should make it our care to avoid. The wise man says, he that contemns small things, shall fall by little and little, Eccl. 19.1. And though no degree of irreverence towards God or his Word, can be called a small thing absolutely considered, yet comparatively with the more exorbitant degrees it may: and yet that smaller is the seed and parent of the greatest. It is so in all sins; the kingdom of Satan, like that of God, may be compared to a grain of mustard seed, Mat. 13.31. which though little in itself, is mighty in its increase.

54. NO man ever yet began at the top of villainy, but the advance is still gradual from one degree to another; each commission smoothing and glibbing the way to the next. He that accustoms in his ordinary discourse, to use the sacred Name of God with as little sentiment and reverence, as he do's that of his neighbor or servant; that makes it his common by-word, and cries Lord and God upon every the lightest occasion of exclamation or wonder, this man has a very short step to the using it in oaths, and upon all frivolous occasions; and he that swears vainly, is at no great distance from swearing falsely. It is the same in this instance of the Scriptures: He that indulges his wit to rally with them, will soon come to think them such tame things that he may down-right scorn them: And when he is arrived to that, then he must pick quarrels to justify it, till at last he arrive even to the height of enmity.

55. LET every man therefore take heed of setting so much as one step in this fatal circle; guard himself against the first insinuation of this guilt: and when a jest offers itself as a temptation, let him balance that with a sober thought, and consider whether the jest can quit the cost of the profanation. Let him possess his mind with an habitual awe, take up the Bible with solemn thoughts, and other kind of apprehensions than any human Author: and if he habituate himself to this reverence, every clause and phrase of it that occurs to his mind, will be apter to excite him to devout ejaculations than vain laughter.

56. IT is reported of our excellent Prince, King Edward the sixth; that when in his Council Chamber, a Paper that was called for happened to lie out of reach, and the Person concerned to produce it, took a Bible that lay by, and standing upon it reached down the Paper: the King observing what was don, ran himself to the place, and taking the Bible in his hands, kissed it, and laid it up again. Of this it were a very desirable moral, that Princes, and all persons in authority, would take care not to permit any to raise themselves by either a hypocritical or profane trampling upon holy things. But besides that, a more general application offers its self; that all men of what condition soever, should both themselves abstain from every action that has the appearance of a contempt of the holy Scripture; and also when they observe it in others, discountenance the insolence: and by their words and actions give Testimony of the veneration which they have for that holy Book, they see others so wretchedly despise.

57. BUT above all let him who reads the Scripture seriously, set himself to the practice of it, and daily examine how he proceeds in it: he that diligently do's this, will not be much at leisure to sport with it: he will scarce meet with a Text which will not give him cause of reflection, and provide him work within his own breast: every duty injoin'd will prompt him to examine how he has performed; every sin forbid, will call him to recollect how guilty he has been, every pathetic strain of devotion will kindle his zeal, or at least upbraid his coldness: every heroic example will excite his emulation. In a word, every part of Scripture will, if duly appli'd, contribute to some good and excellent end. And when a thing is proper for such noble purposes, can it be the part of a wise man to apply it only to mean and trivial? Would any but an Idiot wast that Sovereign Liquor in the washing of his feet, which was given him to expel poison from his heart? And are not we guilty of the like folly when we apply God's word to serve only a ludicrous humor: and make ourselves merry with that which was designed for the most serious and most important purpose; the salvation of our souls. And indeed whoever takes any lower aim than that, and the virtues preparatory to it in his study of Scripture, extremely debases it.

58. LET us therefore keep a steady eye upon that mark, and press towards it as the Apostle did; Phil. 3.14. walk by that rule the holy Scripture proposes; faithfully and diligently observe its precepts, that we may finally partake its promises. To this end continually pray we in the words of our holy mother the Church unto Almighty God, who has caused all holy Scripture to be written for our learning; that we may in such wise hear them, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest them, that by patience and comfort of his holy Word, we may embrace and ever hold fast the blessed hope of everlasting Life, which he has given in our Savior Jesus Christ.

THE CONTENTS.

SECTION.

- Sect. 1.

The several methods of God's communicating the knowledge of himself. Pag. 1.

- Sect. 2.

The divine Original, Endearments, and Authority of the Holy Scripture. p. 9.

- Sect. 3.

The Subject Matter treated of in the holy Scripture is excellent, as is also its end and design. p. 63.

- Sect. 4.

The Custody of the holy Scripture is a privilege and right of the Christian Church, and every member of it, which cannot without impiety to God, and injustice unto it and them, be taken away or empeacht. p. 123.

- Sect. 5.

The Scripture has great propriety and fitness toward the attainment of its excellent end. p. 145.

- Sect. 6.

The suffrage of the primitive Christian Church, concerning the propriety and fitness which the Scripture has, toward the attainment of its excellent end. p. 165.

- Sect. 7.

Historical reflections upon the events which have happened in the Church, since the withdrawing of the holy Scripture. p. 180.

- Sect. 8.

Necessary Cautions to be used in the reading of the holy Scripture. p. 193.

FINIS.

P-RA-22. The practice of Christian graces, or, The whole duty of man laid down in a plain and familiar way for the use of all, but especially the meanest reader : divided into XVII chapters, one whereof being read every Lord's Day, the whole may be read over thrice in the year : with Private devotions for several occasions...- Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681., Fell, John, 1625-1686.

[illustration]

ECCLESIA ANGLICANA.

Read. Pray.

The WHOLE DUTY of MAN Plainly laid down for the use of the meanest Reader, with PRAYERS

⟨...⟩

Take heed and beware of false Prophets.

Matt. 7.

The Practice of Christian Graces. OR The WHOLE Duty OF Man LAID DOWN In a Plain and Familiar WAY for the Use of All, but especially the MEANEST READER. Divided into XVII. CHAPTERS. ONE whereof being read every LORD'S DAY the Whole may be read over THRICE in the YEAR. WITH PRIVATE DEVOTIONS For Several OCCASIONS; Viz. For

- MORNING
- EVENING.
- SACRAMENT.
- The SICK, &c.
- Times of PUB. CALAMITIES.

London, Printed by • Maxwell for T. Garthwait at the little North door of S. Paul's. 1658.

M<sup>r</sup> GARTHWAIT.

YOU needed not any Intercession to recommend this task to me, which brought its Invitations and Reward with it. I very willingly Read over all the sheets, both of the Discourse, and the Devotions annexed, and find great cause to bless God for both, not discerning what is wanting in any part of either, to render it with God's blessing, most sufficient, and proper to the great End designed, the Spiritual supplies and advantages of all those that shall be exercised therein. The subject matter of it, is indeed, what the Title undertakes, The whole Duty of Man, Set down in all the Branches, with those advantages of brevity and Partitions, to invite, and support, and engage the Reader, That Condescension to the meanest capacities, but with all, That weight of Spiritual Arguments, wherein the best proficiencie will be glad to be assisted, that it seems to me equally fitted for both sorts of Readers, which shall bring with them a sincere desire of their own, either present or future advantages. The Devotion part in the conclusion is no way inferior, being a most seasonable aid to every man's infirmities, and hath extended itself very particularly to all our principal concernments; The Introduction hath supplied the place of a Preface, which you seem to desire from me, and leaves me no more to add, but my Prayers to God, That the Author which hath taken care to convey so liberal an Alms to the Corban so secretly, may not miss to be rewarded openly, in the visible power and benefit of this work, on the hearts of the whole Nation, which was never in more need of such supplies, as are here afforded. That His All Sufficient Grace will bless the seed sown, and give an abundant increase, is the humblest request of

March 7. 1657.

Your assured Friend. H. HAMMOND.

A TABLE Of the CONTENTS of the several CHAPTERS or PARTITIO•S in this Book. Which according to this Division, by Reading one of these Chapters every Lord's Day, the whole may be Read over Thrice in the year.

- PARTITION 1. OF the Duty of Man, by the light of Nature, by the light of Scripture: Of Faith, the Promises, of Hope, of Love, &c. page 1.
- PARTITION 2. Of Humility, of Submission to God's Will, in respect of Obedience, of Patience, in all sorts of Sufferings; and of Honor due to God in several ways, in his House, Possessions, His Day, Word, Sacraments, &c. page 34.
- PARTITION 3. Of the Lord's Supper, Of Preparation before Receiving, of Duties to be done at the Receiving, and afterwards, &c. page 67.
- PARTITION 4. Honor due to God's Name; Of Sinning against it; Blasphemy, Swearing, Assertory Oaths, Promissory Oaths, Vnlawful Oaths Of Perjury, Of Vain Oaths, and the Sin of them, &c. page 98.
- PARTITION 5. Of Worship due to God's Name. Of Prayer and its several parts. Of Public Prayers i• the Church, in the Family: Of Private Prayer. Of Repentance, &c. Of Fasting, page 109•
- PARTITION 6. Of Duties to our Selves. Of Sobriety Humility; The great Sin of Pride, the Danger, the Folly of this Sin. Of Vain-Glory the Danger, Folly, Means to prevent it. O•Meekness, the Means to obtain it, &c. page 136•
- PARTITION 7. Of Contentedness, and the Contraries t• it, Murmuring, Ambition, Covetousness Envy; Helps to Contentedness. Of Duty which concern our Bodies. Of Chastity, Help• to it. Temperance, Rules of Temperance i• Eating, &c. page 158.
- PARTITION 8. Of Temperance in Drinking, False Ends o• Drinking, viz. Good fellowship. Putting away Cares, &c. page 177.

- PARTITION 9. Temperance in Sleep; The Rule of it, &c. Of Recreation, of Apparel. page 197•
- PARTITION 10. Of Duties to our Neighbors. Of Justice, Negative, and Positive. Of the Sin of Mur•her. Of the Hainousness of it, The Punishments of it, And the Strange Discoveries thereof; Of Maiming, Wounds and stripes, page 206.
- PARTITION 11. Of Justice, about the Possessions of our Neighbor; Against Injuring him as Concerning his Wife, His Goods. Of Malice, Covetousness, Oppression, Theft: Of Paying Debts, &c. page 226.
- PARTITION 12. Of Theft; Stealing the Goods of our Neighbor. Of Deceit in Trust; in Traffick. Of Restitution, &c. page 238.
- PARTITION 13. Of False Reports, False Witness, Slanders, Whisperings. Of Despising and Scoffing for Infirmities, Calamities, Sins, &c. Of Positive Justice, Speaking the Truth. Of Lying. Of Humility and Pride. Of Envy, Detraction. Of Gratitude. &c. page 251.
- PARTITION 14. Of Duty to Parents. Magistrates, Pastors, &c. Of the Duty of Parents to Children, &c. page 278.
- PARTITION 15. Of Duty to our Brethren and Relations; Husband, Wife, Friends, Masters, Servants. page 305.
- PARTITION 16. Other Branches of our Duty to our Neighbor. Of Charity to Men's Souls, Bodies• Goods, &c. page 329.
- PARTITION: 17. Of Charity, Alms-giving, &c. Of Charity in respect of our Neighbors Credit, Of Peace-making. Of going to Law: Of Charity to our Enemies, &c. Christian Duties both Possible and pleasant. page 358.

A TABLE of the PRAYERS.

- Prayers for Morning 562
- Prayers for Night 570
- Collects for several Graces 577
- A Paraphrase on the Lord's Prayer 591
- Pious Ejaculations out of the Book of Psalms 594
- Brief heads of Examination before the Sacrament 598
- Prayers before the Sacrament 613
- Ejaculations at the Lord's Table, &c 619

- Prayers after the Sacrament 621
- Prayers for the Sick 631
- Ejaculations for the Sick 63•
- Prayers for Public Calamities 644

A PREFACE To the ensuing TREATISE, Showing the Necessity of Caring for the Soul.

§ 1. THE only intent of this ensuing Treatise, is to be a short & plain direction to the very meanest Readers, to behave themselves so in this world, that they may be happy forever in the next. But because 'tis in vain to tell men their duties, till they be persuaded of the necessity of performing it; I shall, before I proceed to the particulars required of every Christian, endeavor to win them to the practice of one general duty preparatory to all the rest, and that is the consideration and care of their own Souls, without which they will never think themselves much concerned in the other.

2. Man, We know is made up of two parts, a body and a soul: The body only the husk or shell of the soul, a lump of flesh, subject to many diseases and pains while it lives, and at last to death itself, and then 'tis so far from being valued, that 'tis not to be endured above ground, but laid to rott in the Earth. Yet to this viler part of us we perform a great deal of care, all the labor and toil we are at, is to maintain that. But the more precious part, the Soul is little thought of, no care taken, how it fares, but as if it were a thing that nothing concerned us, is left quite neglected, never considered by us.

3. This carelessness of the Soul is the root of all the sin we commit, and therefore whosoever intends to set upon a Christian course, must in the first place amend that. To the doing whereof, there needs no deep learning, or extraordinary parts, the simplest man living (that is not a natural fool) hath understanding enough for it, if he will but act in this by the same rules of common reason, whereby he proceeds in his worldly business. I will therefore now briefly set down some of those motives, which use to stir up our care of any outward thing, and then apply them to the Soul.

4. There be four things especially, which use to awake our care, the first is the worth of the thing, the second the usefulness of it to us, when we cannot part with it without great damage and mischief, the third the great danger of it, & the fourth the likelihood that our care will not be in vain but that it will preserve the thing cared for.

5. For the first, we know our care of any worldly thing is answerable to the worth of it; What is of greatest price, we are most watchful to preserve, and most fearful to lose; no man locks up dung in his chest, but his money▪ or what he counts precious, he doth. Now in this respect the Soul deserves more care, then all the things in the world besides, for 'tis infinitely more worth. First in that is made after the image of God; it was God that breathed into man this breath of life; Gen 27. Now God being of the greatest excellency, and worth, the more anything is like him, the more it is to be valued. But 'tis sure that no creature upon the earth is at all like God, but the Soul of man, and therefore nothing ought to have so much of our care. Secondly, the Soul never dies. We use to prize things according to their durableness: what is most lasting, is most worth. Now the Soul is a thing that will last for ever, when Wealth, Beauty▪ Strength, nay our very bodies themselves fade away, the Soul still continues. Therefore in that respect also, the Soul is of the greatest worth; and then what strange madness is it for us to neglect them as we do? We can spend Days, and Weekes, and Moneths and Years, nay our whole lives in hunting after a little wealth of this world, which is of no durance or continuance, and in the mean time let this great durable treasure, our Souls, be stoln from us by the Devil.

6. A second motive to our care of anything is the usefulness of it to us, or the great mischiefe we shall have by the loss of it. Common reason teaches us this in all things of this life: If our members fall, we do not much regard them, because we can be well enough without them: But if we are in danger to lose our eyes or limbs, we think all the care we can take little enough to prevent it, because we know it will be a great misery. But certainly there is no misery to be compared to that misery, that follows the loss of the Soul. 'Tis true we cannot lose our Souls, in one sense, that is so lose them, that they shall cease to be; but we may so lose them in another, that we shall wish to lose them even in that. That is we may lose that happy estate, to which they were created, and plunge them into the extremest misery. In a word we may lose them in Hell, whence there is no fetching them back, and so they are lost forever. Nay in this consideration our very bodies are concerned, those darlings of ours, for which all our care is laid out: for they must certainly after death be raised again, and be joined again to the soul, and take part with it in whatever state; if then our care for the body take up all our time and thoughts, and leave us none to bestow on the poor Soul, it is sure the Soul will for want of that care, be made forever miserable. But it is as sure, that that very body must be so too. And therefore if you have any true kindness to your body, show it by taking care of your Souls. Think with yourselves, how you will be able to endure everlasting burnings, if a small spark of fire, lighting on the least part of the body, be so intolerable, what will it be to have the whole cast into the hottest flames? and that not for some few hours or days, but forever; so that when you have spent many thousand of years in that unspeakable torment, you shall be no nearer coming out of it, then you were the first day you went in: think of this, I say, and think this withal, that this will certainly be the end of neglecting the Soul, and therefore afford it some care, if it be but in pity to the body, that must bear a part in its miseries.

7. The third Motive to the care of anything, is its being in danger; now a thing may be in danger two ways, first by enemies from without: This is the case of the sheep, which is still in danger of being devoured by wolves, and we know that makes the Shepherd so much the more watchful over it. Thus is it with the soul, which is in a great deal of danger, in respect of its enemies: Those we know are the World, the Flesh, and the Devil, which are all such noted enemies to it, that the very first act we do in behalf of our Souls, is to vow a continual war against them. This we all do in our Baptism; and whoever makes any truce with any of them, is false not only to his Soul, but to his vow also, becomes a forsworn creature: A consideration well worthy our laying to heart, But that we may the better understand, what danger the Soul is in, let us a little consider the quality of these enemies.

8. In a war you know there are divers things that make an enemy terrible. The first is subtlety, and cunning, by which alone many victories have been won, and in this respect the Devil is a dangerous adversary, he long since gave sufficient proof of his subtlety, in beguiling our first parents, who yet were much wiser then we are, and therefore no wonder if he deceive and cheat us. Secondly, the watchfulness and diligence of an enemy, makes him the more to be feared, and here the Devil exceeds, it is his trade, business to destroy us, and he is no loiterer at it, he goes up and down seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet 5. 8. He watches all opportunities of advantage against us, with such diligence, that he will be sure never to let any slip him. Thirdly, an enemy near us is more to be feared then one at a distance; for if he be far off, we may have time to arm, and prepare ourselves against him, but if he be near he may steal on us unawars. And of this sort is the flesh, it is an enemy, at our doors, shall I say? nay in our bosoms, it is always near us, to take occasion of doing us mischiefs. Fourthly, the baser and false an enemy is, the more dangerous; he that hides his malice under the show of friendship will be able to do a great deal the more hurt. And this again is the flesh, which like Job to Abner, 2 Sam. 3. 27: Pretends to speak peaceably, to us, but wounds us to death; 'tis forward to purvey for pleasures and delights for us, and so see•s very kind, but it has a hook under that bait, and if we ⟨♦⟩ at it, we are lost. Fifthly, the number of enemies make them more terrible; and the world is a vast army against us: There is no state or condition in it, nay scarce a creature which d•th not at sometime or other fight against the Soul: The honors of the world seek to wound us by pride, the wealth by covetousness; the prosperity of it tempt us to forget God, the adversities to murmur at him. Our very Table becomes a snare to us, our meat draws us to Gluttony, our drink to Drunkenness, our company, nay our nearest friends often bear a part in this war against us, whilst either by their example, or persuasions they entice us to sin

9. Consider all this, and then tell me, whether a Soul thus beset hath leisure to sleep; even Delilah could tell Samson, it was time to awake when the Philistines were upon him. And Christ tells us, if the good man of the house had known in what hour the thief would come, he would have watched and not have suffered his house to be broken up, Mat. 24 43. But we live in the midst of thieves, and therefore must look for them every hour, and yet who is there among us, that hath that common providence for this precious part of him, his Soul, which he hath for his house, or indeed the meanest thing that belongs to him? I fear our Souls may say to us, as Christ to his disciples. Mat 26. 40. What could ye not watch with me one hour? for I doubt it would pose many of us to tell when we bestowed one hour on them, though• we know them to be continually beset with most dangerous enemies. And then alas! what is like to be the case of these poor Souls, when their adversaries bestow so much care, and diligence to destroy them, and we will afford none to preserve them, surely the same as of a besieged town, where no watch or guard is kept, which is ce•tain to fall a prey to the enemy. Consider this ye that forget God, nay, ye that forget yourselves, lest he pluck you away and there be none to deliver you, Psal. 50. 22.

10. But I told you, there was a second way, whereby a thing may be in danger, and that is from some disorder, or distemper within itself. This is often the case of our bodies, they are not only liable to outward violence, but they are within themselves sick and diseased. And then we can be sensible enough that they are in danger, and need not to be taught to seek out for means to recover them. But this is also the case of the Soul; we reckon those parts of the body diseased, that do not rightly perform their office, we account it a sick palate that tastes not aright, a sick stomach that digests not. And thus it is with the Soul, its parts do not rightly perform their offices.

11. The parts of the Soul are especially these three: The Understanding, the Will, and the Affections. And that these are disordered, there needs little proof; Let any man look seriously into his own heart, and consider, how little it is he knows of spiritual things, and then tell me whether his understanding be not dark: How much apter is he to will evil than good, and then tell me whether his will be not Crooked: And how strong desires he hath after the pleasures of sin, and what cold and faint ones towards God, and goodness, and then tell me whether his affections be not disordered, and rebellious even against the vice of his own reason within him. Now as in bodily diseases, the first step to the cure is to know the cause of the sickness, so likewise here it is very necessary for us to know how the Soul first fell into this diseased condition, and that I shall now briefly tell you.

12. God created the first man Adam without sin, and endued his Soul with the full knowledge of his duty, and with such a strength, that he might if he would perform all that was required of him. Having thus created him, he makes a covenant or agreement with him, to this purpose, that if he continued in obedience to God, without committing sin; then first that strength of Soul, which he then had should still be continued to him; and first, that he should never die, but be taken up into heaven, there to be happy forever. But on the other side, if he committed sin, and disobeyed God, then both he and all his children after him, should lose that knowledge and that perfect strength, which enabled him to do all that God required of him; and secondly, should be subject to death, and not only so, but to eternal damnation in Hell.

13. This was the agreement made with Adam and all mankind in him (which we usually call the first covenant) upon which God gave Adam a particular commandment, which was no more but this, that he should not eat of one only tree of that garden wherein he had placed him. But he by the persuasion of the Devil ate of that tree, disobeys God, and so brings that curse upon himself, and all his posterity. And so by that one sin of his he lost both the full knowledge of his duty, and the power of performing it. And we being born after his image, did so likewise and so are become both ignorant in discerning what we ought to do, and weak and unable to the doing of it, having a backwardness to all good, and an aptness, and readiness to all evil, like a sick stomach, which loathes all wholesome food, and longs after such trash, as may nourish the disease.

14. And now you see where we got this sickness of soul, and likewise that it is like to prove a deadly one, and therefore I presume I need say no more, to assure you our souls are in danger. It is more likely you will from this description think them hopeless. But that you may not from that conceit, excuse your neglect of them, I shall hasten to show you the contrary, by proceeding to the fourth motive of care,

15. That fourth motive is the likelihood that our care will not be in vain, but that it will be a means to preserve the thing cared for; where this is wanting, it disheartens our care. A

Physician leaves his patient when he sees him past hope, as knowing it is then in vain to give him anything, but on the contrary when he sees hopes of recovery, he plies him with medicines. N•• in this very respect we have a great deal of reason to take care of our souls, for they are not so far gone, but they may be recovered, nay it is certain they will if we do our parts towards it.

16. For though by that sin of Adam all• mankind were under the sentence of eternal condemnation, yet it 〈◇〉 God so far to pity o•r misery, as to give us his son, and in him to make a new Covenant with us after we had broken the first.

17. This SECOND COVENANT was made with Adam, & us in him, presently after his fall, & is briefly contained in those words, Gen. 3. 15. Where God declares that the SEED OF THE WOMAN SHALL BREAK THE SERPENTS HEAD; and this was made up, as the first was, of some mercies to be afforded by God and some duties to be performed by us.

18. God therein promises to send his only Son, who is God equal with himself, to earth, to become man, like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, and he to do for us these several things.

19. First to make known to us the whole will of his Father, in the performance whereof we shall be sure to be accepted and rewarded by him. And this was one great part of his business, which he performed in those many Sermons and precepts, we find set down in the Gospel. And herein he is our prophet, it being the work of a prophet of old not only to foretell, but to teach. Our duty in this particular is to hearken diligently to him, to be most ready, and desirous to learn that will of God, which he came from heaven to reveal to us. This 2d. thing he was to do for us, was to satisfy God for our sins, not only that one of Adam; but all the sins of all mankind, that truly repent and amend, & by this means to obtain for us forgiveness of sins, the favor of God, and so to redeem us from hell, and eternal damnation which was the punishment due to our sin. All this he did for us by his death, he offered up himself a sacrifice for the sins of all those who heartily bewail, and forsake them. And in this he is our Priest, it being the Priests office to offer sacrifice for the sins of the people. Our duty in this particular is first truly, and heartily to repent us of, and forsake our sins, without which they will never be forgiven us, though Christ have died. Secondly, Stedfastly to believe, that if we do that, we shall have the benefits of that sacrifice of his, all our sins, how many and great soever, shall be forgiven us, and we saved from those eternal punishments, which were due unto us for them: Another part of the Priests office was blessing and praying for the people, and this also Christ performs to us. It was his especial commission from his Father to bless us, as St. Peter tells us Acts 3. 26. God sent his Son Jesus to bless you, and the following words show wherein that blessing consists, in turning away everyone of you from his iniquity, those means which he has used for the turning us from our sins, are to be reckoned of all other the greatest blessings, and for the other part, shat of praying, that he not only performed on earth, but continues still to do it in Heaven, He sits on the right hand of God and makes Request for us, Rom. 8, 34. Our duty herein is not to resist this unspeakable blessing of his, but to be willing to be thus blest in the being turned from our sins, and not to make void, and fruitless all his prayers, and intercessions for us, which will never prevail for us, whilst we continue in them.

21. The third thing, that Christ was to do for us, was to enable us, or give us strength to do what God requires of us. This he doth first by taking off from the hardness of the Law, given to Adam, which was never to commit the least sin, upon pain of damnation, and requiring of us only an honest and heartly endeavor to do what we are able, and where we fail, accepting of sincere repentance. Secondly, By sending his Holy Spirit into our hearts, to govern, and rule us, to give us strength to overcome temptations to sin and to do all that he now under the Gospel requires of us. And in this he is our King, it being the office of a King to govern, and rule, & to subdue enemies. Our duty in this particular is to give up ourselves obedient subjects of his, to be governed, and ruled by him, to obey all his Laws, not to take part with any Rebel, that is, not to cherish any one sin. But diligently to pray for his grace to enable us to subdue all, and then carefully to make use of it to that purpose.

22. Lastly, He has purchased for all that faithfully obey him an eternal glorious inheritance, the Kingdom of Heaven, whether he is gone before, to take possession for us. Our duty herein is to be exceeding careful, that we forfeit not our parts in it, which we shall certainly do, if we continue impenitent in any sin; Secondly, Not to fasten our affections on this world, but to raise them up, according to the precept of the Apostle, Col. 2. 2. Set your affections on things above & not on things on the earth, continually longing to come to the possession of that blessed inheritance of ours, in comparison whereof all things here below should seem vile and mean to us.

23. This is the sum of that second Covenant we are now under, wherein you see what Christ has done, how he executes those three great offices of King, Priest and Prophet, as also what is required of us, without our Faithful performance whereof, all that he hath done, shall never stand us in any stead; For he will never be a Priest to save any, who take him not as well for their Prophet, to teach, and their King to rule them; nay, if we neglect our part of this Covenant, our condition will be yet worse, then if it had never been made; for we shall then be to answer not for the breach of Law only, as in the first, but for the abuse of mercy, which is of all sins the most provoking. On the other side, if we faithfully perform it; That is, set ourselves heartily to the obeying of every precept of Christ, not going on willfully in any one sin, but bewailing and forsaking whatever we have formerly been guilty of, it is then most certain, that all the afore-mentioned benefits of Christ belongs to us.

24. And now you see how little reason you have to cast off the care of your Souls, upon a conceit they are past cure, for that it is plain they are not; Nay, certainly they are in that very condition, which of all others make them fittest for our care. If they had not been thus REDEEMED by CHRIST, they had been then so hopeless, that care would have been in vain; On the other side, if his Redemption had been such, that all men should be saved by it, though they live as they list, we should have thought it needless to take care for them, because they were safe without it. But it hath pleased God so to order it, that our care must be the means, by which they must receive the good even of all that Christ hath done for them.

25. And now, if after all that God hath done to save these souls of ours, we will not bestow a little care on them ourselves, we very well deserve to perish. If a Physician should undertake a patient that were in some desperate disease, and by his skill bring him so far out of it, that he were sure to recover, if he would but take care of himself, and observe those rules the Physician set him, would you not think that man weary of his life, that would refuse to do that? So certainly that man is weary of his soul, willfully casts it away, that will not consent to those easy conditions, by which he may save it.

26. You see how great kindness God hath to these souls of ours, the whole Trinity, Father, Son, and Holy-Ghost have all done their parts for them. The Father gave his only Son, The Son gave himself, left his glory, and endured the bitter death of the cross, merely to keep our souls from perishing. The Holy-Ghost is become as it were our attendant, waits upon us with continual offers of his grace, to enable us to do that which may preserve them; Nay he is so desirous we should accept these offers of his, that he is said to be grieved, when we refuse them, Eph. 4. 30. Now what greater disgrace; and affront can we put upon God then to despise what he thus values, that those souls of ours, which Christ thought worth every drop of his blood, we should not think worth any part of our care? We use in things of the world, to rate them according to the opinion of those who are best skilled in them, now certainly God, who made our souls, knows the worth of them, and since he prizes them  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  high, let us (if it be but in reverence to him) be assured to neglect them. Especially now, that they are  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  so hopeful a condition, that nothing but our own carelessness can possibly destroy them.

27. I have now briefly gone over those four motives of care I at first proposed, which are each of them such, as never misses to stir it up towards the things of this world and I have also shown you, how much more reasonable may necessary it is, they should do the like for the Soul. And now what can I say more, but conclude in the words of Isaiah 46. 8. Remember this and show yourselves men. That is, deal with your Soul as your reason teaches you to do with all other things that concern you. And sure this common Justice binds you to, for the Soul is that which furnishes you with that reason, which you exercise in all your worldly business, and shall the Soul itself receive benefit from that reason, which it affords you? This is as if the Master of a family, who provides food for his servants, should by them be kept from eating any himself and so remain the only starved creature in his house.

28. And as Justice ties you to this, so Mercy doth likewise, you know the poor Soul will fall into endless and unspeakable miseries, if you continue to neglect it, and then it will be too late to consider it. The last refuge you can hope for is God's mercy, but that you have despised, and abused. And with what face can you in your greatest need beg for his mercy to your Souls, when you would not as for them your own? No not that common Charity  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  considering them, of bestowing a few of those idle hours you know not (scarce) how to pass away, upon them.

29. Lay this to your hearts, and as ever you hope so God's pity, when you most want it, be sure in time to pity yourselves, by taking that due care of your precious Souls, which belongs to them.

30. If what hath been said, have persuaded you to  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  so necessary a duty, my next work will be to tell you  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  this care must be employed, and that in a word, is in the doing of all these things, which tend to the making ‹◊› Soul happy, which is the end of our care, and what these are I come now to show you.

PARTITION I.

Of the DUTY of MAN by the Light of Nature, by the Light of Scripture; of FAITH, the Promises, of Hope, of Love, &c.

The benefits purchased for us by Christ, are such as will undoubtedly make the soul happy, for eternal happiness itself is one of them; but because these benefits belong not to us, till we perform the Condition required of us, whoever desires the happiness of his soul, must set himself to the performing of that condition; what that is, I have already mentioned in General, That it is the hearty honest endeavor of obeying the whole Will of God. But then that Will of God containing under it many particulars, It is necessary we should also know, what those are; That is what are the several things, that God now requires of us, our performance whereof will bring us to everlasting happiness; and the neglect to endless misery.

2. Of these things there are some, which God hath so stampit upon our souls, that we Naturally knew them; that is, we should have known them to be our duty, though we had never been told so by the Scripture. That this is so, we may see by those heathens, who having never heard of either Old or New Testament, do yet acknowledge themselves bound to some General duties, as to worship God; to be just, to honor their Parents, and the like. And as S. Paul saith, Rom 2. 15. Their consciences do in those things accuse or excuse them, That is, tell them, whether they have done what they should, in those particulars, or no.

3. Now though Christ have brought greater light into the world, yet he never meant by it to put out any of that Natural light, which God had set up in our souls: Therefore let me here by the way, advise you not to walk contrary even to this lesser light, I mean not to venture on any of those Acts, which mere natural conscience will tell you are sins.

4. It is just matter of sadness to any Christian heart, to see some in these days, who profess much of Religion, and yet live in such sins, as a mere heathen would abhor; men that pretending to higher degrees of light, and holiness, then their brethren do, yet practice contrary to all Rules of common honesty, and make it part of their Christian liberty so to do, of whose seducement, it concerns all that love their souls to beware; and for that purpose let this be laid as a foundation, That that Religion, or opinion cannot be of God, which allows men in any wickedness.

5. But though we must not put out this light, which God hath thus put into our souls, yet this is not the only way, whereby God hath revealed his will, and therefore we are not to rest here, but proceed to the knowledge of those other things, which God hath by other means revealed.

6. The way for us to come to know them, is by the Scriptures, wherein are set down those several commands of God, which he hath given to be the Rule of our duty.

7. Of those some were given, before Christ came into the world, such are those precepts we find scattered throughout the Old Testament, but especially contained in the Ten Commandments, and that excellent book of Deuteronomy; others were given by Christ, who added much both to the Law implanted in us by Nature, and that of the Old Testament, and those you shall find in the New Testament,•n the several precepts given by him and his Apostles: But especially in that divine Sermon•n the Mount, set down in the fifth, sixth, •eventh Chapters of S. Matthews Gos•el.

8. All these should be severally spoke to, but because that would make the discourse very long, and so less fit for the meaner sort of men, for whose use alone it is intended, I choose to proceed in another manner: By summing all these together, and so as plainly as I can, to lay down, what is now the duty of every Christan

9. This I find briefly contained in the words of the Apostle, Tit. 2. 12. That we should live soberly, righteously, and Godly in this present world; where the word soberly contains our duty to our selves, righteously, our duty to our neighbor, and Godly, our d•ty to God. These therefore shall be the heads of my discourse, our duty to God, our selves, and our neighbor. I begin w•th that to God, that being the best ground-work whereon to build b•th the other.

10. There are many parts of our duty to God, The two chief are these: First to acknowledge him to be God, Secondly, to have no other; under these are contained all those particulars, which make up our whole duty to God, which shall be shown in their order.

11. To a•knowledge him to be God, is •o believe him to be an infinite glorious Spirit, that was from everlasting, without beginning and sh•ll be to everlasting, without end. That he is our Creator, Redeemer, Sanctifier, Fat•er, Son, and Holy-Ghost, one God, blessed for eve. That he is subject to no alterations, but is unchangeable; that he is no bodil• substance, such as our eyes may behold, but Spiritual, and invisible, whom no man hath seen, nor can see, as the Apostle tell us, 1 Tim. 6. 16. That he is infinitely great, and excellent, beyond all that our wit or conceit can imagine, that he hath received his being from none, and gives being to all things.

12. All this we are to believe of him, in regard of his essence, and being; But besides this, he is set forth to us in the Scripture, by several excellencies, as that he is of infinite goodness, and Mercy, Truth, Justice, Wisdom, Power, All-sufficiency, Majesty: That he disposes, and governs all things by his providence; that he knows all things, and is present in all places; these are by Divines called the Attributes of God, and all these we must undoubtingly acknowledge, that is, we must firmly believe all these Divine excellencies to be in God, and that in the greatest degree, and so that they can never cease to be in him, he can never be other, then infinitely Good, Merciful, True, &c.

13. But the acknowledging him for our God, signifies yet more then this, it means that we should perform to him all those several parts of duty, which belong from a Creature to his God; what those are, I am now to tell you.

14. The first is Faith, or belief, not only that forementioned of his essence, and Attributes, but of his word, the believing most firmly, that all that he saith, is perfectly true. This necessarily arises from that Attribute, his truth, it being natural for us to believe whatsoever is said by one of whose truth we are confident. Now the holy Scriptures being the word of God, we are therefore to conclude, that all that is contained in them, is most true.

15. The things contained in them are of these four sorts: First, affirmations, such are all the stories of the Bible, when it is said, such and such things came so and so to pass; Christ was born of a virgin, was laid in a manger, &c. And such also are many points of Doctrine, as that there are three Persons in the God-head, that Christ is the Son of God, and the like. All things of this sort thus delivered in Scripture, we are to believe most true. And not only so, but because they are all written for our instruction; we are to consider them for that purpose, that is, by them to lay that foundation of Christian-knowledge, on which we may build a Christian life.

16. The Second sort of things contained in the Scripture are the Commands, that is, the several things enjoined us by God to perform; these we are to believe to come from him, and to be most just, and fit for him to Command. But then this belief must bring forth obedience, that what we believe thus fit to be done▪ be indeed done by us; otherwise our belief that they come from him, serves but to make us more inexcusable.

17. Thirdly, the Scripture contains threatenings; many texts there are which threaten to them that go on in their sins, the wrath of God; and under that are contained all the punishments, and miseries of this life, both spiritual and temporal, and everlasting destruction in the life to come. Now we are most steadfastly to believe, that these are God's threats, and that they will certainly be performed to every impenitent sinner. But then the use we are to make of this belief is to keep from those sins, to which this destruction is threatened, otherwise our belief adds to our guilt; that will willfully go on in spite of those threatenings.

18. Fourthly, the Scripture contains Promises, and those both to our bodies, and our souls; for our bodies there are many promises, that God will provide for them what he sees necessary; I will name only one, Mat. 6. 33. Seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things, that is, all outward necessities shall be added unto you: But here tis to be observed, that we must first seek the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, that is, make it our first and greatest care, to serve and obey him, before this promise even of temporal good things belongs to us. To the soul there are many and high promises, as first, that of present ease, and refreshment which we find, Mat. 11. 29. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, and ye shall find rest to your souls: But here it is apparent, that before this rest belongs to us, we must have taken on us Christ's yoke, become his servants, and disciples. Finally there are promises to the soul, even of all the benefits of Christ; but yet those only to such, as perform the condition required; that is, pardon of sins to those that repent of them, increase of grace to those that diligently make use of, what they have already, and humbly pray for more, and eternal salvation to those that continue to their lives end, in hearty obedience to his Commands.

19. This belief of the promises must therefore stir us up to perform the condition, and till it do so, we can in no reason expect any good by them; and for us to look for the benefit of them on other terms, is the same mad presumption, that it would be in a Servant to challenge his Master, to give him a reward for having done nothing of his work, to which alone the reward was promised; you can easily resolve, what answer were to be given to such a servant, and the same are we to expect from God in this case; nay further, it is sure God hath given these promises to no other end, but to invite us to holiness of life, yea he gave his Son in whom all his promise are as it were summed up for this end. We usually look so much at Christ's coming to satisfy for us, that we forget this other part of his errand. But there is nothing surer, than that the main purpose of his coming into the world, was to plant good life among men.

20. This is so often repeated in Scripture, that no man that considers, and believes what he reads, can doubt of it. Christ himself tells us, Mat 9. 13. He came to call sinners to repentance; and S. Peter, Acts. 3. 26. Tell us, that God sent his Son Jesus to bless us, in turning everyone of us from his iniquities; for it seems the ••rning us from our iniquities was the greatest special blessing, which God intended us in Christ.

21. Nay we are taught by S. Paul, that this was the end of his very death also, Tit. 2. 14. Who gave himself for our sins, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works; and again, Gal. 1. 4. Who gave himself for us, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, that is from the sins, and ill customs of the world. Divers other texts there are to this purpose, but these I suppose sufficient to assure any man of this one great truth, that all that Christ hath done for us, was directed to this end, the bringing us to live Christianly; or in the words of S. Paul, to teach us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously, and Godly in this present world.

22. Now we know Chrst is the foundation of all the promises, in him all the promises of God are yea, and Amen, 2 Cor. 1. 20. And therefore if God gave Christ to this end, certainly the promises are to the same also. And then how great an abuse of them is it, to make them serve for purposes quite contrary to what they were intended, viz. to the encouraging us in sins, which they will certainly do, if we persuade ourselves, they belong to us, how wickedly soever we live. The Apostle teaches us another use of them, 2 Cor. 7. 1. Having therefore these promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. When we do thus, we may justly apply the promises to ourselves, and with comfort expect our parts in them. But till then, though these promises be of certain truth, yet we can reap no benefit from them, because we are not the persons, to whom they are made, that is, we perform not the condition required, to give us right to them.

23. This is the Faith, or belief required of us towards the things God hath revealed to us in the Scripture; to wit, such as may answer the end, for which they were so revealed, that is, the bringing us to good lives; the bare believing, the truth of them, without this, is no more then the Devils do, as S. James tells us, Chap. 2. 19. Only they are not so unreasonable, as some of us are, for they will tremble, as knowing well this Faith will never do them any good But many of us go on confidently, and doubt not the sufficiency of our Faith, though we have not the least fruit of obedience to approve it by; let such hear S. James judgment in the point, Chap. 2. 26. As the body without the spirit is dead, so Faith, if it have not works, is dead also.

24. A Second duty to God is Hope, that is, a comfortable expectation of these good things he hath promised. But this, I told you before of Faith, must be such, as agrees to the nature of the promises, which being such as requires a condition on our part, we can hope no further, then we make that good; or if we do, we are so far from performing by it this duty of hope, that we commit the great sin of presumption, which is nothing else, but hoping where God hath given us no ground to hope. This every man doth, that hopes for pardon of sins, and eternal life, without that repentance and obedience, to which alone they are promised, the true hope is that which purifies us; S. John saith, 1. Ep. 3 5. Every man that hath this hope, purifieth himself, even as he is pure, that is, it makes him leave his sins, and earnestly endeavor to be holy, as Christ is, and that which doth not so, how confident soever it be, may well be concluded to be but that hope of the Hypocrite, which Job assures us shall perish.

25. But there is another way of transgressing, this duty, besides that of presu•p•t•i•o•n and that is by Desperation, by which ⟨◇⟩ not that, which is ordinarily so calle• ⟨◇⟩ the despairing of mercy, so long as ⟨◇⟩ in our sins▪ for that is but just for ⟨◇⟩ : But I mean such a desperation, as makes us •e over endeavor, that is, when a man that sees he is not at the present such a one, as the promises belong to, concludes, he can never become such, and therefore neglects all duty, and goes on in his sins. This is indeed the sinful desperation, and that which if it be continued in, must end in destruction.

26. Now the work of hope is to prevent this, by setting before us the generality of the promises, that they belong to all that will but perform the condition. And therefore though a man have not hitherto performed it, and so hath yet no right to them, yet hope will tell him, that that right may yet be gained, if he will now set heartily about it. It is therefore strange folly for any man, be he never so sinful, to give up himself for lost, when if he will but change his course, he shall be as certain to partake of the promises of mercy as if he had never gone on in those former sins.

27. This Christ shows us in the parable of the Prodigal, Luke 15. where we see that Son, which had run away from his father, and had consumed the portion given him, in riotous living, was yet upon his return and repentance used with as much kindness by the Father, as he that had never offended, nay with higher and more passionate expressions of love. The intent of which parable was only to show us how graciously our heavenly Father will receive us, how great soever our former sins have been, if we shall return to him with true sorrow for what is past, and sincere obedience for the time to come; nay so acceptable a thing is it to God, to have any sinner return from the error of his ways, that there is a kind of triumph in heaven for it, there is joy in the presence of the Angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth: Lu. 15. 10. And now who would not rather choose by a timely repentance, to bring joy to heaven, to God, and his holy Angels; then by a sullen desperation to please Satan and his accursed Spirits; especially when by the former we shall gain endless happiness to ourselves, and by the latter as endless torments.

28. A third duty to God is love; There are two common Motives of love amongst men, the one the goodness and excellency of the person; the other his particular kindness, and love to us, and both these are in the highest degree in God.

29. First he is of infinite goodness, and excellency in himself; This you were before taught to believe of him, and no man can doubt it, that considers but this one thing, that there is nothing good in the world, but what hath received all its goodness from God: His goodness is as the Sea, or Ocean; and the goodness of all creatures, but as some small streams, flowing from that Sea; now you would certainly think him a mad man, that should say the Sea were not greater than some little brook, and certainly it is no less folly to suppose, that the goodness of God doth not as much (nay infinitely more) exceed that of all creatures. Besides the goodness of the creature is imperfect and mixed with much evil; but his is sure, and entire, without any such mixture. He is perfectly holy, and cannot be tainted with the least impurity, neither can he be the Author of any to us, for though he be the cause of all the goodness in us, he is the cause of none of our sins. This S. James expressly tells us, Chap. 1. 13. Let no man say when he is tempted, he is tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil; neither tempteth he any man.

30 But secondly, God is not only thus good in himself, but he is also wonderful good; that is, kind, and merciful to us, we are made up of two parts, a soul and a body, and to each of these God has expressed infinite mercy, and tenderness. Do but consider what was before told you of the second Covenant, and the mercies therein offered, even Christ himself, and all his benefits, and also that he offers them so sincerely and heartily, that no man can miss of enjoying them, but by his own default. For he doth most really and affectionately desire we should embrace them, and live: As appears by that solemn oath of his, Eze. 33 11. As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live; whereto he adds this passionate expression; turn ye, turn ye from our evil ways, for why will ye die: To the same purpose, you may read, Ezek. 18. Consider this, I say, and then surely you cannot but say, he hath great kindness to our souls. Nay let every man but remember with himself, the many calls he had to repentance and amendment, sometimes outward by the word, sometimes inward by the secret whispers of God's Spirit in his heart, which were only to woo and entreat him to avoid eternal misery, and to accept of eternal happiness; let him, I say, remember these, together with those many other means, God hath used towards him for the same end, and he will have reason to confess God's kindness, not only to men's souls in general; but to his own in particular.

31. Neither hath he been wanting to our bodies, all the good things they enjoy, as Health, Strength, Food, Rayment, and whatever else concerns them, are merely his gifts; so that indeed it is impossible, we should be ignorant of his mercies to them, all those outward comforts and refreshments we daily enjoy, being continual effects, and witnesses of it, and though some enjoy more of these, than others, yet there is no person, but enjoys so much in one kind or other, as abundantly shows God's mercy, and kindness to him, in respect of his body.

32. And now surely you will think it but reasonable we should love him, who is in all respects thus lovely: Indeed this is a duty so generally acknowledged, that if you should ask any man the question, whether he loved God or no, he would think you did him great wrong to doubt of it; yet for all this, it is too plain, that there are very few, that do indeed love him, and this will soon be proved to you by examining a little, what are the common effects of love, which we bear to men▪ like ourselves, and then trying, whether we can show any such fruits of our love to God.

33. Of that sort there are divers, but for shortness I will name but two. The first is a desire of pleasing, the second a desire of enjoying. These are constantly the fruits of love. For the first 'tis known by all, that he that loves any person, is very desirous to approve himself to him▪ to do whatsoever he thinks will be pleasing to him; and according to the degree of love, so is this desire more▪ or less; where we love earnestly, we are very earnest, and careful to please. Now if we have indeed that love to God we pretend to, it will bring forth this fruit, we shall be careful to please him in all things. Therefore as you judge of the tree by its fruits, so may you judge of your love of God, by this fruit of it, nay indeed this is th▪ way of trial, which Christ himself hath give▪ us, Jo. 14. 15. If ye love me keep my comandments; and S. John tell us, 1 Ep. 5. 3. That this is the love of God, that we walk after his commandments, and where this one proof is wanting, it will be impossible to testify▪ our love to God.

34. But it must yet be farther considered that this love of God must not be in a low or weak degree, for besides that the Motives to it, his excellency, and his kindness are in the highest; the same Commandment which bids us love God, bids us love him with all our heart, and with all our strength; that is, as much as is possible for us, and above any t▪ing else▪ And therefore to the fulfilling of this Commandment, it is necessary, we love him in that degree; and if we do so, then certainly we shall have not only some slight, and faint endeavors of pleasing, but such as are most diligent, and earnest, such as will put us upon the most painful and costly duties, make us willing to forsake our own ease, goods, friends, yea life itself, when we cannot keep them without disobeying God.

35. Now examine thyself by this: hast thou this fruit of love to show? dost thou make it thy constant and greatest care to keep God's Commandments? to obey him in all things? earnestly laboring to please him to the utmost of thy power, even to the forsaking of what is dearest to thee in this world? if thou dost, thou mayest then truly say thou lovest God. But on the contrary, if thou willfully continuest in the breach of many, nay but of any one Command of his, never deceive thyself, for the love of God abides not in thee. This will be made plain to you, if you consider what the Scripture saith of such, as, that they are enemies to God by their wicked works, Col. 1. 21. That the carnal mind (and such is every one that continues willfully in sin) is enmity to God, Rom. 8. 7. That he that sins willfully, tramples underfoot the Son of God, and doth despite unto the Spirit of grace, Heb. 10 29. and many the like. And therefore unless you can think enmity, and trampling, and despite to be fruits of love, you must not believe you love God, whilst you go on in any willful disobedience to him.

36. A Second fruit of love, I told you, was desire of enjoying. This is constantly to be seen in our love to another. If you have a friend, whom you entirely love, you desire his conversation, wish to be always in his company; and thus will it also be in our love to God, if that was as great, and hearty, as this.

37. There is a twofold enjoying of God, the one imperfect in this life, the other more perfect, and complete, in the life to come; that in this life is that conversation, as I may call it, which we have with God in his ordinances, in praying, and meditating, in hearing his word, in receiving the Sacrament, which are all intended for this purpose, to bring us into an intimacy, and familiarity with God, by speaking to him, and hearing him speak to us.

38. Now if we do indeed love God, we shall certainly hugely value, and desire these ways of conversing with him, it being all that we can have in this life; it will make us with David, esteem one day in God's courts better than a thousand, Psal. 84. 10. We shall be glad to have these opportunities of approaching to him, as often as is possible, and be careful to use them diligently; to that end of uniting us still more to him, yea we shall come to these spiritual exercises with the same cheerfulness, we would go to our dearest friend. And if indeed we do thus, it is a good proof of our love.

39. But I fear there are not many have this to show for it, as appears by the common backwardness; and unwillingness of men to come to these; and their negligence, and heartlessness, when they are at them; and can we think that God will ever own us for lovers of him, whilst we have such dislikes to his company, that we will never come into it, but when we are dragged by fear, or shame of men or some such worldly Motive; It is sure you would not think that man loved you, whom you perceived to shun your company, and to be loath to come in your sight. And therefore be not so unreasonable as to say you love God, when yet you desire to keep as far from him as you can.

40. But besides this, there is another enjoyment of God, which is more perfect, and complete, and that is our perpetual enjoying of him in heaven, where we shall be forever united to him; and enjoy him not now and then only, for short spaces of time, as we do here, but continually without interruption, or breaking off. And certainly if we have that degree of love to God we ought, this cannot but be most earnestly desired by us so much, that we shall think no labor too great to compass it. The seven years that Jacob served for Rachel, Gen. 29. 20. Seemed to him but a few days for the love that he had to her: and surely if we have love to God, we shall not think the service of our whole lives too dear a price for this full enjoyment of him, nor esteem all the enjoyments of the world, worth the looking on, in comparison thereof.

41. If we can truly tell ourselves we do thus long for this enjoyment of God we may believe we love him. But I fear again, there are but few that can thus approve their love. For if we look into men's lives, we shall see they are not generally so fond of this enjoyment, as to be at any pains to purchase it. And not only so, but it is to be doubted, there are many, who if it were put to their choice, whether they would live here always, to enjoy the profit and pleasure of the world, or go to heaven to enjoy God, would, like the Children of God and Reuben, set up their rest on this side Jordan, Num. 32. and never desire that heavenly Canaan, so close do their affections cleave to things below, which shows clearly they have not made God their treasure, for then according to our Savior's Rule, Mat. 6. 21. Their heart would be with him. Nay, further yet; it is too plain, that many of us set so little value on this enjoying of God, that we prefer the vilest and basest sins before him, and choose to enjoy them, though by it we utterly lose our parts in him, which is the case of every man that continues willfully in those sins.

42. And now I fear, according to these rules of trial, many that profess to love God will be found not to do so. I conclude all with the words of S. John, 1 Ep. 3. 18. Which though spoken of the love of our brethren, is very fitly applicable to this love of God, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.

43. A Fourth duty to God is Fear; this arises from the consideration both of his Justice and his Power; his Justice is such that he will not clear the wicked, & his Power, such that he is able to inflict the sorest punishments upon them; & that this is a reasonable cause of fear, Christ himself tells us, Mat. 10. 18. Fear him which is able to destroy both body and soul in hell. Many other places of Scripture there are, which commend to us this duty, as Psal. 2. 11. Serve the Lord with fear: Psal. 34. 9. Fear the Lord yea that be his Saints: Pro. 9. 10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and divers the like; and indeed all the threatenings of wrath against sinners, which we meet with in the Scripture, are only to this end, to work this fear in our hearts.

44. Now this fear is nothing else, but such an awful regard of God, as may keep us from offending him. This the wise man tells us, Prov. 16. 17. The fear of the Lord is to depart from evil: so that none can be said truly to fear God, that is not thereby withheld from sin; & this is but answerable to that common fear we have towards man, whoever we know may hurt us, we will beware of provoking, & therefore if we be not as wary of displeasing God, it is plain we fear men, more then we do him.

45. How great a madness this is, thus to fear men above God, will soon appear, if we compare what man can do to us, with that which God can. And first, it is sure, it is not in the power of man (I might say Devils, too) to do us any hurt, unless God permit and suffer them to do it: so that if we do but keep him our friend, we may say with the Psalmist, The Lord is on my side, I fear not what man can do unto me. For let their malice be never so great, he can restrain, and keep them from hurting us, nay, he can change their minds towards us, according to that of the wise man, Pro. 16. 7. When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him. A notable example of this we have in Jacob, Gen. 32. who when his brother Esau was coming against him as an enemy, God wonderfully turned his heart, so that he met him with all the expressions, of brotherly kindness, as you may read in the next Chapter.

46. But Secondly, suppose men were left at liberty to do thee what mischief they could; Alas, their power goes but a little way, they may perhaps rob thee of thy goods, it may be they may take away thy liberty, or thy credit, or perchance thy life too; but that thou knowest is the utmost they can do. But now God can do all this when he pleases, and that which is infinitely more, his vengeance reaches even beyond death itself, to this eternal Misery both of body and soul in hell; in comparison of which death is so considerable, that we are not to look upon it with any dread. Fear not them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do, saith Christ, Luk. 12. 4. And then immediately adds, But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear, fear him which after he hath killed, hath power to cast into hell, yea, I say unto you fear him. In which words the comparison is set between that greatest ill we can suffer from man, the loss of life, and those sadder evils God can inflict on us; and the latter are found to be the only dreadful things, and therefore God only to be feared.

47. But there is yet one thing farther considerable in this matter, which is this, it is possible we may transgress against men, and they not know it, I may perhaps steal my neighbors goods, or defile his wife, and keep it so close that he shall not suspect me, and so never bring me to punishment for it; but this we cannot do with God, he knows all things even the most secret thoughts of our hearts, and therefore though we commit a sin never so closely, he is sure to fit us, and will as surely if we do not timely repent, punish us eternally for it.

48. And now surely it cannot but be confessed, that it is much safer displeasing men, then God; yet alas our practice is as if we believed the direct contrary, there being nothing more ordinary with us, then for the avoiding of some present danger we fear from men, to rush ourselves upon the indignation of God. And thus it is with us, when either to save our estates, or credits, or our very lives, we commit any sin, for that is plainly the choosing to provoke God, rather than man.

49. But God knows this case of the fear of men is not the only one wherein we venture to displease him, for we commit many sins, to which we have none of this temptation, nor indeed any other; as for instance, that of common swearing, to which there is nothing either of pleasure, or profit to invite us. Nay, many times, we, who so fear the mischiefs that other men may do to us, that we are ready to buy them off with the greatest sins, do ourselves bring all those very mischiefs upon us, by sins of our own choosing. Thus the careless prodigal robs himself of his estate, the deceitful & dishonest man, or any that lives in open notorious sin, deprives himself of his credit, and the drunkard, & glutton brings diseases on himself, to the shortening his life: And can we think we do at all fear God when that fear hath so little power over us, that though it be backed with the many present mischiefs, that attend one sin, it is not able to keep us from them? surely such men are so far from fearing God, that they rather seem to defy him, resolve to provoke him, whatsoever it cost them, either in this world or the next. Yet so unreasonably partial are we to ourselves that even such as these will pretend to this fear: you may examine multitudes of the most gross scandalous sinners, before you shall meet with one that will acknowledge he fears not God. It is strange it should be possible for men thus to cheat themselves, but however it is certain, we cannot deceive God, he will not be mocked; and therefore if we will not now so fear as to avoid sin, we shall one day fear, when it will be too late to avoid punishment.

50. A Fifth duty to God is, that of trusting in him, that is, depending and resting on him: and that is first in all dangers, Secondly in all wants. We are to rest on him in all our dangers both spiritual and temporal. Of the first sort are all those temptations, by which we are in danger to be drawn to sin. And in this respect he hath promised that if we resist the Devil he shall fly from us, I am. 47. Therefore our duty is first to pray earnestly for God's grace to enable us to overcome the temptation, and Secondly, to set ourselves manfully to combat with it, not yielding or giving consent to it in the least degree; and whilst we do thus, we are confidently to rest upon God, that his grace will be sufficient for us, that he will either remove the temptation, or strengthen us to withstand it.

51. Secondly, in all outward and temporal dangers, we are to rest upon him, as knowing that he is able to deliver us, and that he will do so, if he see it best for us, & if we be such to whom he hath promised his protection, that is, such as truly fear him. To this purpose we have many promises in Scripture, Ps. 34. 7. The Angel of the Lord tarrieth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them; & Ps. 34. 20. The Lord delivereth the souls of his Saints, and all that put their trust in him shall not be destitute; and divers the like. And also we have many examples, as that of the three children in the furnace, Dan. 3. That of Daniel in the Lions Den, Dan. 6. And many others, all which serve to teach us this one lesson, that if we go on conscionably in performing our duty, we need not be dismayd for anything that can befall us, for the God whom we serve, is able to deliver us.

52. Therefore in all dangers, we are first humbly to pray for his aid, and then to rest ourselves cheerfully on him; assuring ourselves that he will give such an issue as shall be most for our good. But above all things, we must be sure to fix our dependence wholly on him, and not to rely on the creatures for help, much less must we seek to deliver ourselves by any unlawful means; that is by the committing of any sin, for that is like Saul, 1 Sam. 28. 7. To go to the witch, that is, to the Devil for help; such courses do commonly deceive our hopes at the present, and instead of delivering us out of our straits, plunge us in greater, and those much more uncomfortable ones, because then we want that which is the only support, God's favor and aid which we certainly forfeit when we thus seek to rescue ourselves by any sinful means. But supposing we could by such a way certainly free ourselves from the present danger, yet alas we are far from having gain'd safety by it, we have only removed the danger from that which was less considerable, and brought it upon the most precious part of us, our souls; like an unskillful Physician, that to remove a pain from the finger, strikes it to the heart; we are therefore grossly mistaken, when we think we have played the good husbands, in saving our Liberties, or Estates, or Lives themselves by a sin; we have not saved them but madly overbought them, laid out our very souls on them; And Christ tells us how little we shall gain by such bargains, Mat. 17. 26. What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul. Let us therefore resolve never to value anything we can possess in this world at so high a rate, as to keep it at the price of the least sin, but when ever things are driven to such an issue, that we must either part with some, perhaps all our worldly possessions, nay life itself or else commit a sin, let us then remember that this is the season for us to perform that great and excellent duty, of taking up the Cross which we can never so properly do, as in this case; for our bearing of that which we have no possible way of avoiding, can at most be said to be but the carrying of the Cross, but then only can we be said to take it up, when having a means of escaping it by a sin, we rather choose to endure the Cross then commit the Sin, for then it is not laid on us by any unavoidable necessity, but we willingly choose it; and this is highly acceptable with God, yet withal so strictly required by him, that if we fail of performing it▪ when we are put to the trial, we are not to be accounted followers of Christ, for so himself hath expressly told us, Mat. 16. 24. If any man come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his Cross and follow me; and so again, Mar. 8. 34. It were therefore a good point of Spiritual Wisdom for us▪ sometimes by some lower degrees of self-denial, to fit ourselves for this greater, when we shall be called to it; we know he that expects to run a race will beforehand be often breathing himself, that he may not be foiled when he comes to run for the prize; in like manner 'twil be fit for us, sometimes to abridg ourselves somewhat of our lawful pleasure, or ease, or profit, sothat we may get such a mastery over our selves, as to be able to renounce all, when our •bedience to God requires it.

53. And as we are thus to trust on God for d•liverance from danger, so are we likewise for supply of our wants; and those again are either spiritual or temporal: our spiritual want is that of his grace to enable us to serve him without which we can do nothing; and for this we are to depend on him, provided, we neglect not the means, which are prayer, and a careful using of what he hath already bestowed on us: For then we have his promise for it, he will give the holy spirit to them that ask it, Luke 11. 15. And unto him that hath shall be given, Mat. 25, 29. that is, To him that hath made a good use of that grace he hath already, God will give more. We are not therefore to affright ourselves with the difficulty of those things God requires of us, but remember he commands nothing, which he will not enable us to perform, if we be not wanting to ourselves. And therefore let us sincerely do our parts, and confidently assure ourselves, God will not fail of his.

54. But we have likewise temporal and bodily wants, and for the supply of them we are likewise to rely on him. And for this also we want not promises, supposing us to be of the number of them to whom they are made, that is, God's faithful Servants. They that fear the Lord lack nothing, Psal. 34. 9, & v. 10. They that seek the Lord shall want no manner of thing that is good: Again, Psa. 33. 18, 19. Behold the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy, to deliver their souls from death, and to feed them in time of famine. Examples also we have of this, as we may see in the case of Elijah, and the poor widow, 1 Kings 17. And many others.

55. We are therefore to look up to him for the provision of all things necessary for us, according to that of the Psalmist, The eyes of all wait upon thee, O Lord, and thou givest them meat in due season. And our Savior hath taught us to pray for our daily-bread; thereby teaching us, that we are to live in continual dependence upon God for it. Yet I mean not by this, that we should so expect it from God, as to give up ourselves to idleness and expect to •e fed by miracle. No, our honest industry, and labor is the means by which God ordinarily gives us the necessaries of this life, and therefore we must by no means neglect that. He that will not labor, let him not eat, says the Apostle, 2 Thes. 3. 10. And we may believe God will pronounce the same sentence, and suffer the slothful person to want even necessary food. But when we have faithfully used our own endeavor, then we must also look up to God for his blessing on it, without which it can never prosper to us. And having done thus, we may comfortably rest ourselves on his providence for such a measure of these outward things, as he sees fittest for us.

56. But if our condition be such, that we are not able to labor, and have no other means of bringing in the necessaries of life to ourselves, yet even then we are cherfully to rest upon God, believing that he who feeds the Ravens, will by some means or other, though we know not what, provide for us, so long as he pleases we shall continue in this world, and never in any case torment ourselves with Carking, and distrustful thoughts, but as the Ap•stle, 1 Pet. 5. 7. Cast all our care on him who careth for us.

57. This is earnestly pressed by our Savior, Mat. 6. Where he abundantly shows the folly of this sin of distrust. The place is a most excellent one, and therefore I shall set it down at large, Ver 25 Therefore I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what you shall eat, or what you shall drink; neither for your body, what you shall put on, is not the life more then meat, and the body then raiment? Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not neither do they reap nor gather into barns, yet our heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not, much better then they? which of you by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature? and why take ye thought for raiment? consider the lilies, of the field how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little Faith? Therefore take no thought, saying, what shall we eat, or what shall we drink, or where with all shall we be clothed. (for after all these things do the Gentiles seck) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things? But seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then all these things shall be added unto you: Take therefore no thought for the morrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof: I might add many other texts to this purpose but this is so full, and convincing, that I suppose it needless.

58. All therefore that I shall say more concerning this duty is to put you in mind of the great benefits of it; as first, that by this trusting upon God, you engage and hind him to provide for you. Men, you know, think themselves highly concerned not to fail those that depend and trust upon them: and certainly God doth so much more. But then Secondly, there is a great deal of ease, and quiet in the practice of this duty; it delivers us from all those carkings, and immoderate cares which disquiet our minds, break our sleep, and grieves even our very heart. I doubt not but those that have felt them, need not be told they are uneasy. But then methinks that uneasiness should make us forward to embrace the means for the removing of them, and so we see it too often doth, in unlawful ones; men will cheat, and steal, and lie and do anything to deliver themselves from the fear of want. But alas, they commonly prove but deceitful remedies: They bring God's curse on us, and so are more likely to betray us to want, then to keep us from it. But if you desire a certain and unfailing cure for cares, take this of relying upon God.

59. For what should cause that man to fear want, that knows he hath one that cares for him, who is all-sufficient, and will not suffer him to want what is fit for him. If a poor man had but a faithful promise from a wealthy person, that he would never suffer him to want, it is sure he would be highly cheered with it, and would not then think fit to be as carking as he was before, and yet a man's promise may fail us, he may either grow poor, and not be able, or he may prove false, and not be willing to make good his word. But we know God is subject neither to impoverishing nor deceit. And therefore how vile an injury do we offer to him, if we dare not trust as much upon his promise, as we would on that of a man, yea and how great a mischief do we do ourselves by loading our minds with a multitude of vexatious, and tormenting cares, when we may so securely cast our burden upon God. I conclude this in the words of the Apostle,

Phil. 4. 6. Be careful for nothing, but in everything by Prayer, and supplication, with thanksgiving; let your requests be made known unto God.

PARTITION II.

Of HUMILITY Of Submission to God's Will, in respect of Obedience of Patience in all sorts of sufferings; and of HONOUR due to God in several ways in his House, Possessions, His Day, Word, Sacraments, &c.

§ 1. A Sixth duty to God is humility, that is, such a sense of our own meanness, and his excellency, as may work in us a lowly and unfeigned submission to him; This submission is twofold, First to his will, Secondly to his Wisdom.

2. The submission to his will is also of two sorts, the submission either of obedience, or patience. That of obedience, is our ready yielding ourselves up to do his will, so that when God hath by his command made known to us what his pleasure is, cheerfully, and readily to set about it. To enable us to this, humility is exceeding necessary, for a proud person is of all others the unaptest to obey, and we see men never pay an obedience but where they acknowledge the person commanding to be some way above them. And so it is here, if we be not thoroughly persuaded, that God is infinitely above us, that we are vileness, and nothing in comparison of him, we shall never pay our due obedience.

3. Therefore if ever you mean to obey entirely (as you must if ever you mean to be saved) get your hearts possessed with the sense of that great unspeakable distance that is between God and you. Consider him as he is a God of infinite Majesty, and glory, and we poor worms of the earth; he infinite in power, able to do all things; and we able to do nothing, not so much as to make one hair white or black, as our Savior speaks, Mat. 5. 36. He of infinite purity and holiness, and we polluted and defiled, wallowing in all kind of sins, and uncleanness; he unchangeable and constant, and we subject to change and alteration every minute of our lives. He eternal and immortal, and we frail mortals, that when ever he taketh away our breath we die; and are turned again to our dust, Psal. 104. 29. Consider all this, I say, and you cannot but acknowledge a wide difference betwixt God and man, and therefore may well cry out with Job, after he had approacht so near to God, as to discern somewhat of his excellency, Job 42. 56. Now mine eyes seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes.

4. And even when this humility hath brought us to obedience, it is not then to be cast off, as if we had no farther use of it; for there is still great use, nay necessity of it, to keep us from any high conceits of our performances, which if we once entertain, it will blast the best of them, and make them utterly unacceptable to God; like the strictness of the Pharisee, which when once he came to boast of, the Publican was preferred before him, Luke 18. The best of our works are so full of infirmity and pollution; that if we compare them with that perfection, and purity, which is in God, we may truly say with the Prophet, All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags, Isaiah 64. 6. And therefore to pride ourselves in them, is the same madness, that it would be in a beggar, to brag of his apparel when it is nothing but vile rags, and tatters. Our Savior's precept in this matter must always be remembered, Luke 17. 10. When you have done all those things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants; if when we have done all, we must give ourselves no better a title, what are we then to esteem ourselves, that are so far from doing any considerable part, of what we are commanded? Surely that worsen name of slothful and wicked servant, Mat. 25. 26. We have no reason to think too bad for us.

5. A Second sort of submission to his will, is that of patience, this stands in suffering his will, as that of obedience did in acting it, and is nothing else, but a willing and quiet yielding to whatever afflictions it pleases God to lay upon us. This the forementioned humility will make easy to us; for when our hearts are thoroughly possessed with that reverence and esteem of God, it will be impossible for us to grudge or murmur at what ever he does. We see an instance of it in Old Eli. 1 Sam. 3. Who after he had heard the sad threatenings of God against him, of the destruction of his family, the loss of the Priesthood, the cutting off both his sons in one day, which were all of them afflictions of the heaviest kind, yet this one consideration, that it was the Lord enabled him calmly and quietly to yield to them; saying, Let him do what seemeth him good, ver. 18. The same effect it had on David, in his sufferings, Psal. 39. 9. I was dumb, I opened not my mouth, because thou didst it: God doing it silenced all murmurings and grumbings in him. And so must it do in us, in all our afflictions, if we will indeed approve our humility to God.

6. For surely you will not think that child hath due humility to his parent or that servant to his Master, that when they are corrected, shall fly in the Father or Masters face. But thus do we when ever we grudge and repine at that which God lays upon us. But besides the want of humility in our so doing, there is also a great want of justice in it; for God hath as we are his creatures, a right to do with us what he will, and therefore for us to resist that right of his, is the highest injustice, that can be; nay farther, it is also the greatest folly in the world, for it is only our good that God aims at in afflicting us; that heavenly Father is not like our earthly ones, who sometime correct their children, only to satisfy their own angry humor, not to do them good. But this is subject to no such frailties, he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of men, Lam. 3. 33. They are our sins, which do not only give him just cause, but even force, and necessitate him to punish us. He carries to us the bowels and affections of the tenderest Father; now when a Father sees, his child stubborn, and rebellious, and running on in a course that will certainly undo him, what greater act of Fatherly kindness can he do then chasten and correct him, to see if by that means he may amend him; nay indeed he could not be said to have true kindness to him, if he should not. And thus it is with God when he sees us run on in sin, either he must leave off to love us, and so leave us to ourselves, to take our own course; and that is the heaviest curse that can befall any man; or else if he continue to love us, he must correct and punish us, to bring us to amendment. Therefore when ever he strikes, we are in all reason, not only patiently to lie under his rod, but (as I may say) kiss it also; that is, be very thankful to him, that he is pleased, not to give us over to our own hearts lusts, Psal. 81. 12. But still continue his care of us, sends afflictions, as so many messengers to call us home to himself. You see then how gross a folly it is to murmur at those stripes, which are meant so graciously; it is like that of a froward patient, which reproaches and reviles the Physician that comes to cure him, and if such a one be left to die of his disease, everyone knows whom he is to thank for it.

7. But it is not only quietness, no nor thankfulness neither under afflictions, that is the full of our duty in this matter; we must have fruitfulness also, or all the rest will stand us in no stead. By fruitfulness I mean the bringing forth that, which the afflictions were sent to work in us, viz. the amendment of our lives. To which purpose in time of affliction it is very necessary for us to call ourselves to an account, to examine our hearts and lives, and search diligently, what sins lie upon us, which have provoked God thus to smite us, and whatsoever we find ourselves guilty of, humbly to confess to God, and immediately to forsake for the rest of our time.

8. All I shall add concerning this duty of patience, is, that we are as much bound to it in one sort of sufferings, as another, whether our suffering be so immediately from God's hand, that no creature hath anything to do in it, as sickness, or the like; or whether it be such, wherein men are the instruments of afflicting us. For it is most sure, when any man doth us hurt, he could not do it, without God's permission, and sufferance, and God, may as well make them the instruments of punishing us, as do it more directly by himself; and it is but a counterfeit patience, that pretends to submit to God, and yet can bear nothing from men; we see holy Job, who is set forth to us as a pattern of true patience, made no such difference in his afflictions, he took the loss of his Cattel, which the Chaldeans and Sabaeans robbed him of, with the very same meekness, with which he did that, which was consumed by fire from heaven. When therefore we suffer anything from men, be it never so unjustly in respect of them, we are yet to confess it most just in respect of God, and therefore instead of looking upon them with rage, and revenge, as the common custom of the world is, we are to look up to God, acknowledge his justice in the affliction, begging his pardon most earnestly for those sins, which have provoked him to send it, and patiently and thankfully bear it, till he shall see fit to remove it; still saying with Job, Blessed be the name of the Lord

9. But I told you, humility contained in it a submission not only to his Will, but also to his Wisdom; That is, to acknowledge him infinitely wise, and therefore that whatever he doth, is best and fittest to be done. And this we are to confess both in his commands, and in his disposing, and ordering of things: First, whatsoever he commands us, either to believe or do, we are to submit to his wisdom in both, to believe whatever he bids us believe, how impossible soever it seem to our shallow understandings, and to do whatever he commands us to do, how contrary soever it be to our fleshly reason, or humor; and in both to conclude that his commands are most fit and reasonable however they appear to us.

10. Secondly, We are to submit to his wisdom in respect of his disposal and ordering of things, to acknowledge he disposes all things most wisely, and that not only in what concerns the world in general, but also in what concerns every one of us in particular, so that what condition soever he puts us in, we are to assure ourselves, it is that, which is best for us, since he chooses it for us, who cannot err. And therefore never to have impatient desires of anything in this world; but to leave it to God to fit us with such an estate and condition, as he sees best for us, and there let us quietly and contentedly rest, yea though it be such, as of all others we should least have wisht for ourselves. And this surely cannot but appear very reasonable to any, that hath humility; for that having taught him, that God is infinitely wise, and he very foolish, he can never doubt, but that it is much more for his good that God should choose for him, then he for himself, even as it is much more for the child's good, to have the parent choose for it, then to be left to those silly choices it would make for its self. For how many times would it cut and burn, and mischief itself, if it might have everything it desires? And such children are we, we many times eagerly desire those things, which would undo us, if we had them. Thus many times we wish for wealth and honor and beauty, and the like, when if we had them, they would only prove snares to us, we should be drawn into sin by them. And this God who knows all things sees, though we do not, and therefore often denies us those things, which he sees will tend to our mischief, and it is his abundant mercy, that he doth so. Let us therefore when ever we be disappointed of any of our aims and wishes, not only patiently but joyfully submit to it, as knowing that it is certainly best for us, it being chosen by the unerring wisdom of our heavenly Father.

11. A Seventh duty to God is Honor; that is, the paying him such a reverence and respect as belong to so great a Majesty. And this is either inward or outward. The inward is the exalting him in our hearts, having always the highest and most excellent esteem of him. The outward is the manifesting and showing forth that inward, and that is the first general in the whole course of our lives, the living like men that do indeed carry that high esteem of God. Now you know if we bear any special reverence but to a man, we will be careful not to do any foul or base thing in his presence, and so if we do indeed honor God, we shall abhor to do any unworthy thing in his sight. But God sees all things, and therefore there is no way to shun the doing it in his sight, if we do it at all; therefore if we do thus reverence him, we must never at any time do any sinful thing.

12. But besides this general way of honoring God, there are many particular acts, by which we may honor him, and those acts are divers according to the several particulars, about which they are exercised. For we are to pay this honor not only immediately to himself, but also by a due estimation, and account of all those things, that nearly relate or belong to him. Those are especially Six, First his House. Secondly his Revenue or incom, (as I may say) Thirdly his Day, Fourthly his Word, Fifthly his Sacraments, and Sixthly his Name; and everyone of these is to have some degree of our reverence and esteem.

13. First his House, that is, the Church, which being the place set apart for his public worship, we are to look on it, though not as holy in respect of its self, yet in respect of its use, and therefore must not profane it by employing it to uses of our own. This Christ hath taught us by that act of his, Mat. 21. 12. In driving the buyers and sellers out of the Temple, saying, my house shall be called the house of prayer: And again, Jo. 2. 16. Make not my Fathers house of a house merchandice: by which it is clear, Churches are to be used only for the services of God, and we are to make that the only end of our coming thither, and not to come to Church, as to a market, to make bargains, or dispatch businesses with our neighbors, as is too common among many. But when ever thou enterest the Church, remember that it is the house of God, a place where he is in an especial manner present, and therefore take the counsel of the wise man, Eccles. 5. 1. And keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God; that is, behave thyself with that godly awe and reverence, which belongs to that great Majesty, thou art before. Remember that thy business there is to converse with God, and therefore shut out all thoughts of the world, even of thy most lawful business, which though they be allowable, at another time, are here sinful. How fearful a guilt is it then to entertain any such thoughts, as are in themselves wicked? It is like the treason of Judas, who pretended indeed to come to kiss his Master, but brought with him a band of soldiers to apprehend him. Mat. 26. We make show in our coming to Church, of serving and worshipping God, but we bring with us a train of his enemies, to provoke and despite him. This is a wickedness that may outvie the profaneness of these days, in turning Churches into stables; for sinful and polluted thoughts are much the worst sort of beasts.

14. The Second thing to which respect belongs, is his revenue or income; that is, whatsoever is his peculiar possessions, set apart for the maintenance of those that attend his service; those were the Priests in time of the Law, and Ministers of the Gospel now with us. And what ever is thus set apart we must look on with such respect as not to dare to turn it to any other use. Of this sort some are the freewill-offerings of men, who have sometimes of their own accord given some of their goods or lands to this holy use; and whatsoever is so given, can neither by the person that gave it, nor any other be taken away without great that sin of sacriledg.

15. But besides these, there was among the Jews, and hath always been in all Christian Nations, something allotted by the Law of the Nation, for the support and maintenance of those that attend the service of God. And it is but just and necessary it should be so, that those who by undertaking that Calling are taken off from the ways of gaining a livelihood in the world, should be provided for by them, whose souls they watch over. And therefore it is most reasonable, which the Apostle urges in this matter, 1 Cor. 9. 11. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things? That is, the most unreasonable for men to grudge the bestowing a few carnal things, the outward necessities of this temporal life on them, from whom they receive spiritual things, even instruction and assistance towards the obtaining an eternal life.

16. Now whatsoever is thus appointed for this use, may by no means be employed to any other. And therefore those tithes which are here by Law allotted for the maintenance of the Ministry, must by no means be kept back, nor any tricks or shifts used to avoid the payment either in whole or in part. For first it is certain, that it is as truly theft as any other robbery can be, Ministers having right to their tithes by the same Law, which gives any other man right to his estate. But then Secondly, it is another manner of robbery, then we think of, it is a robbing of God, whose service they were given to maintain, and that you may not doubt the truth of this, it is no more then God himself hath said of it, Mal. 3. 8. Will a man rob God? yet ye have robbed me; yet ye say, wherein have we robbed thee? in tithes and offerings Here it is most plain, that in God's account the withholding tithes is a robbing of him. And if you please, you may in the next verse see, what the gains of this robbery amounts to, Yea are cursed with a curse. A curse is all is gotten by it, and common experience shows us, that God's vengeance doth in a remarkable manner pursue this sin of Sacrilege, whether it be that of withholding tithes, or the other of seizing on those possessions, which have been voluntarily consecrated to God. Men think to enrich themselves by it; but it usually proves directly contrary; this unlawful gain becomes such a Canker in the estate, as often eats out even that we had a just title too.

And therefore if you love (I will not say your souls, but) your estates, preserve them from that danger by a strict care never to meddle with anything set a part for God.

17. A Third thing, wherein we are to express our reverence to God, is the hallowing of the times, set apart for his service. He who hath given all our time, requires some part of it to be paid back again, as a rent or tribute of the whole. Thus the Jews kept holy the seventh day: and we Christians the Sunday, or Lord's day, the Jews were in their Sabbath especially to remember the Creation of the world, and we in ours, the resurrection of Christ by which a way is made for us into that better world we expect hereafter. Now this day thus set a part, is to be employed in the worship and service of God, and that first more solemnly and publicly in the Congregation, from which no man must then absent himself without a just cause: and Secondly, privately at home; in praying with, and instructing our families, or else in the yet more private duties of the closet, a man's own private prayers, reading meditating, and the like.

And that we may be at leisure for these a rest from all our worldly business is commanded; therefore let no man think that a bare rest from labor is all that is required of him on the Lord's day, but the time which he saves from the works of his calling, he is to lay out on those spiritual duties. For the Lord's Day was never ordained to give us a pretence for idleness, but only to change our employment from worldly, to heavenly; much less was it meant, that by our rest from our callings, we should have more time free to bestow upon our sins, as too many do, who are more constant on that day at the Alehouse, then the Church. But this rest was commanded, first to shadow out to us that rest from sin which we are bound to all the days of our lives. And secondly to take us off from our worldly business, and to give us time to attend the service of God, and the need of our souls.

18. And surely if we rightly consider it, it is a very great benefit to us that there is such a set time, thus weekly returning for that purpose. We are very intent, and busy upon the world, and if there were not some such time appointed to our hands, it is to be doubted, we should hardly allot any ourselves: And then what a starved condition must these poor souls of ours be in, that shall never be afforded a meal, whereas now there is a constant diet provided for them, every Sunday, if we will conscionably employ it, may be a festival day to them; may bring them in such spiritual food, as may nourish them to eternal life. We are not to look on this day with grudging, like those in Amos 8. 5. Who ask, When will the Sabbath be gone, that we may set forth wheat? As if that time were utterly lost, which were taken from our worldly business. But we are to consider it, as the gainfullest, as the joyfullest day of the week, a day of harvest, wherein we are to lay up in store for the whole week, nay for our whole lives.

19. But besides this of the weekly Lord's day, there are other times, which the Church hath set apart for the remembrance of some special mercies of God, such as the Birth, and Resurrectoon of Christ, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the like; and these days we are to keep in that manner which the Church hath ordered, to wit in the solemn worship of God, and in particular thanksgiving for that special blessing we then remember. And surely whoever is truly thankful for those rich mercies, cannot think it too much to set apart some few days in a year for that purpose.

But then we are to look that our Feasts be truly spiritual, by employing the day thus holily, and not make it an occasion of intemperance and discords as too many do, who consider nothing in Christmas and other good times, but the good cheers and jollity of them. For that is doing despite, instead of honor to Christ, who came to bring all purity and soberness in the world, and therefore must not have that coming of his remembered in any other manner.

20. Other days there are also set a part in memory of the Apostles, and other Saints, wherein we are to give heartly thanks to God, for his graces in them, particularly that they were made instruments of revealing to us Christ Jesus, and the way of salvation, as you know the Apostles were by their Preaching throughout the world. And then farther, we are to meditate on those Examples of holy life, they have given us, and stir up ourselves to the imitation thereof. And whoever does uprightly set himself to make these uses of these several holy days, will have cause, by the benefit he shall find from them, to thank and not to blame the Church for ordering them.

21. Another sort of days there are, which we are likewise to observe, and those are days of fasting and humiliation; and whatever of this kind the Church enjoynes, whether constantly at set times of the year, or upon any special and more sudden occasion, we are to observe in such a manner as she directs; that is, not only in a bare abstaining from meat, which is only the bodies punishment, but in afflicting our souls, humbling them deeply before God, in a heartly confessing, and bewailing of our own, and the nations sins, in earnest Prayers for God's pardon, and forgiveness, and for the turning away of those judgments, which those sins have called for, But above all, in turning ourselves from our sins, loosing the bands of wickedness; as Isaiah speaks, Chap. 58. 6. And exercising ourselves in works of mercy, dealing our bread to the hungry, and the like, as it there follows.

22. Fourthly, we are to express our reverence to God, by honoring his Word; and this we must certainly do, if we do indeed honor him; there being no surer sign of our despising any person, than the setting light, by what he says to us; as on the contrary, if we value one every word he speaks will be of weight with us. Now this word of God is expressly contained in the holy Scriptures, the Old and New Testament, where he speaks to us, to show us his Will, and our duty. And therefore to this Word of his we are to bear a wonderful respect, to look upon it, as the rules, by which we must frame all the actions of our life; and to that end to study it much, to read in it as often as we can, if it may be never to let a day pass us, without reading, or hearing some part of it read.

23. But then that is not all: We must not only read, but we must mark what we read, we must diligently observe, what duties there are which God commands us to perform, what faults they are, which God there charges us not to commit, together with the rewards promised to the one, and the punishments threatened to the other. When we have thus marked, we must lay them up in our memory, not so loosely, and carelessly, that they shall presently drop out again; but we must so fasten them there by often thinking, and meditating on them, that we may have them ready for our use. Now that use is the directing of our lives; and therefore whenever we are tempted to the committing of any evil, we are then to call to mind, this is the thing, which in such a Scripture is forbidden by God, and all his vengeances threatened against it; and so in like manner when any opportunity is offered us of doing good to remember, this is the duty, which I was exhorted to in such a Scripture, and such glorious rewards promised to the doing of it: and by these considerations strengthen ourselves for resisting of the evil and performance of the good.

24. But besides this of the written Word, it hath pleased God to provide yet further for our instruction, by his Ministers, whose office it is to teach us God's Will, not by saying anything contrary to the written word; (for whatsoever is so, can never be God's Will) but by explaining it, and making it easier to our understandings, and then applying it to our particular occasions, and exhorting, and stirring us up to the practice of it; all which is the end, at which first their Catechizing and then their preaching aimeth. And to this we are to bear also a due respect, by giving diligent heed thereto, not only being present at Catechizings and Sermons, and either sleep out the time, or think of somewhat else, but carefully marking what is said to us. And surely if we did but rightly consider, how much it concern us, we should conclude it very reasonable for us to do so.

25. For First as to that of Catechizing, it is the laying the foundation upon which all Christian Practice must be built, for that is the teaching us our duty, without which it is impossible for us to perform it. And though it is true, that the Scriptures are the Fountains, from whence this knowledge of duty must be fetched, yet there are many who are not able to draw it from this fountain themselves, and therefore it is absolutely necessary it should be thus brought to them by others.

26 This Catechizing is generally looked on as a thing belonging only to the youth, and so indeed it ought, not because the oldest are not to learn, if they be ignorant, but because all children should be so instructed, that it should be impossible for them, to be ignorant when they come to years. And it nearly concerns every Parent, as they will free themselves; from the guilt of their children's eternal undoing, that they be careful to see them instructed in all necessary things; to which purpose it will be fit early to teach then some short Catechism, of which sort none so fit as the Church-Catechism; yet are they not to rest on these endeavors of their own; but also to call in the Ministers help, that he may build them up farther in Christian Knowledge.

27. But alas! it is too sure, that parents, have very much neglected this duty, and by that means it is that such multitudes of men and women, that are called Christians, know no more of Christ, or anything, that concerns their own souls, then the mearest heathen.

28. But although it were their Parents fault, that they were not instructed, when they were young, yet it is now their own if they remain still ignorant; and it is sure, it will be their own ruin and misery, if they willfully continue so. Therefore whoever it be, of what age or condition soever, that is in this ignorant estate, or in any such degree of it, that he wants any part of necessary saving knowledge; let him as he loves his soul, as ever he would escape eternal damnation, seek out for instruction, & let no fear of shame keep any from it; for first it is certain the shame belongs only to the willful continuing in ignorance, to which the desire of learning is directly contrary, and is so far from a shameful, that it is a most commendable thing, and will be sure to be so accounted by all wise and good men. But Secondly, suppose some profane, senseless people should deride it, yet sure that shame were in all reason to be undergone joyfully, rather than venture on that confusion of face, which will at the day of judgment befall those, who to avoid a little false shame amongst men, have gone on in a willful ignorance of their duty, which ignorance will be so far from excusing any sins they shall commit, that it adds one great & heavy sin to all the rest, even the despising that knowledge, which is offered to them. How heinous a sin that is, you may learn in the First Chapter of the Proverbs, where hating knowledge, ver. 29. is said to be the thing that draws down those sad vengeances forementioned, even God's forsaking men, laughing at their calamity, instead of helping them: W<sup>ch</sup> is of all other conditions in the world, the most miserable, & surely they are madly desperate, that will run themselves into it.

29. As for those who have already this foundation laid, by the knowledge of the grounds of Christian Religion, there is yet for them a farther help provided, by Preaching. And it is no more than needs, for God knows, those that understand their duty well enough, are too apt to forget it; nay, sometimes by the violence of their own lusts to transgress it, even when they do remember it, and therefore it is very useful, we should often be put in mind of it, to prevent our forgetting, and also often exhorted and assisted, to withstand those lusts which draw us to those transgressions. And to these purposes preaching is intended; First, to warn us, to be upon our guard against our spiritual enemy, and then to furnish us with weapons for the fight; that is, such means and helps, as may best enable us to beat off temptations, and get the victory over them.

30. Since therefore this is the end of preaching, we must not think we have done our duty, when we have heard a Sermon, though never so attentively, but we must lay up in our hearts those instructions, and advices we there meet with & use them faithfully to that end of overcoming our sins. Therefore when ever thou comest to the Physician of thy soul, do as thou wouldst with the Physician of thy body; thou comest to him not only to hear him talk, and tell thee what will cure thee, but also to do according to his directions; and if thou dost not so here, thou art as vain, as he that expects a bare receipt from his Doctor shall cure him, though he never make use of it. Nay, thou art much more vain and ridiculous, for that though it do him no good, will do him no harm• he shall be never the worse for having been taught a medicine, though he use it not: but in these spiritual receipts, it is otherwise, if we use them not to our good, they will do us a great deal of harm, they will rise up in judgment against us, and make our condemnation so much the heavier. Beware therefore not to bring that danger upon thyself, but when thou hast heard a Sermon, consider with thyself what directions there were in it, for enabling thee to eschew evil, or to do good. And if there were anything especially concerned thine own bo•ome sin, lay that close to thy heart, and all the week after make it matter of medita•tion, think of it even whilst thou art at thy work, if thou wantest other time; and not only think of it, but •et to the practice of it, do what thou wert advised to, for the subduing sins and quickening grace in thee. Finally look carefully to practice the counsel of the Apostle, Ia. 1. 22. Be ye doers of the word not hearers only deceiving your own souls: to hope for good from the word, without doing of it, is, it seems, nothing but a deceiving ourselves; Let us never therefore measure our godliness by the number of Sermons which we hear, as if the hearing many were a certain mark of a good Christian, but by the store of fruit we bring forth by them, without which all our hearing will serve but to bring us in that heavier portion of stripes, which belongs to him that knows his Masters will and does it not, Lu. 12. 47. But this reverence which is due to preaching we must not pay to all that is now a days called so, for God knows there are many false Prophets gone out into the world, as the Apostle speaks, 1 Jo. 4 1. And now, if ever, is that advice of his necessary, to try the Spirits whether they be of God: But what I have said, I mean only of the preaching of those, who first have a lawful calling to the Office, and secondly frame their doctrine according to the right rule, the written word of God. But if any man say he is not able to judge whether the doctrine be according to the Word or no, let him at least try it by the common known rules of duty, which he doth understand, and if he find it a doctrine, giving men liberty to commit those things, which are by all acknowledged sins; such as rebellion, injustice, unmercifulness, uncleanness, or the like he may conclude it is utterly contrary to God, and his Word, and then abhorrence, and not reverence belongs to it.

31. Fifthly, we are to express our honoring of God, by receiving his Sacraments, those are two, Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord. And this we are to do; First, by our high esteem of them; Secondly, by our reverent usage of them; we are first to prize them at a high rate, looking on them, as the instruments of bringing to us the greatest blessings we can receive. The first of them, Baptism that enters us into covenant with God, makes us members of Christ, & so gives us right to all those precious benefits, that flow from him, to wit pardon of sins, sanctifying grace, and heaven itself, on condition we perform our parts of the covenant. And as for the Lord's Supper, that is not only a sign and remembrance of Christ, and his death; but it is actually the giving Christ, and all the fruits of his death to every worthy receiver, and therefore there is a most highest estimation, and value due to each of them.

32. And not only so; but in the second place we must show our reverence in our usage of them, and that First before, Secondly at, and Thirdly after the time of receiving them. It is true that the Sacrament of Baptism being now administered to us, when we are infants, it is not to be expected of us, that we should in our own persons do anything, either before or at the time of receiving it, those performances were strictly required of all persons, who were baptized, when they were of years. But for us, it suffices to give us right to Baptism, that we are born within the pale of the Church, that is, of Christian parents; and all that is required at that time, is, what we can only perform by others, they in our stead promising that when we come to years, we will perform our parts of the Covenant. But by how much the less we are then able to do, so much the greater bond lies on us, to perform those after-duties required of us, by which we are to supply the want of the former.

33. Now if you would know what those duties are, look over those promises which your Godfathers and Godmothers then made in your name, and you may then learn them. I cannot give you them in a better form, then that of our Churches Catechism which tells: That our Godfathers and Godmothers did promise, and vow three things in our names; First, that we should forsake the Devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh: where by the Devil is meant. First, the worshipping of all false gods, which is indeed but worshipping the Devil: A sin which at the time of Christ's coming into the world, was very common; most part of mankind then living in that vile Idolatry. And therefore when Baptism was first ordained, it was but needful to make the forsaking of those false gods, a principal part of the vow. And though those false worships are now much rarer, yet there was one special part of them, which may be feared to be yet too common among us, and that is all sorts of unleanness, which though we do not make ceremonies of our religion as the heathens did of theirs, yet the committing thereof is a most high provocation in God's eyes, such as drew him to destroy whole Cities with fire and brimstone, as you may read, Gen. 19. Nay, the whole world with water, Gen. 6. and will not fail to bring down judgments, and strange ones on any that continue therein; and therefore the forsaking them well deserves to be looked on, as an especial part of this promise. Besides this all dealing with the Devil is here vowed against, whether it be by practicing witchcraft ourselves, or consulting with those that do upon any occasion whatever, as the recovery of our health, our goods or what ever else. For this is a degree of the former sin, it is the forsaking of the Lord, and setting up the Devil for our God, whilst we go to him in our needs for help

34. But we also renounce all the works of the Devil, and those are either in general all those which the Devil tempts us to, or else those particular kinds of sin, which have most of his image on them; that is, those which he himself most practices, such are pride (which brought him from being an Angel of light to the accursed condition he is now in) and lying; he is, as our Savior saith, Jo 8. 44. A liar, and the Father of it; and such also are malice and envy, especially killing, and destroying of others, for he was a murderer from the beginning. Io 8. 44. But above all, there is nothing wherein we become so like him, as in tempting & drawing others to sin; which is his whole trade, and business, and if we make it any part of ours, we become like that roaring Lyon, that goes about seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet. 5. 8.

35. The second thing we vow to forsake, is the pomps and vanities of this wicked world. By the pomps and vanities there are several things meant, some of them, such as were used by the heathens, in some unlawful sports of theirs, wherein we are not now so much concerned, there being none of them remaining among us but besides that, there is meant all excess either in diet or sports, or apparel, when we keep not those due measures, which either by the general rules of sobriety, or the particular circumstances of our qualities and callings we are bound to. Next, by the wicked world we may understand, first the wealth and greatness of the world, which though we do not so totally renounce, that it is unlawful for a Christian to be either rich, or great, yet we thus far promise to forsake them, that we will not set our hearts upon them, nor ever either get, or keep them by the least unlawful means. Secondly by the wicked world, we may understand the companies and customs of the world; which so far as they are wicked, we here renounce; that is, we promise never to be drawn by company to the commission of a sin, but rather to forsake the most delightful company, then be ensnared by it; nor yet by custom, but rather venture the shame of being thought singular, ridiculous persons, walk as it were in a path by ourselves, then put ourselves into that broad way, that leads to destruction, by giving ourselves over to any sinful custom, how common soever it be grown. If this part of our vow were but thoroughly considered, it would arm us against most of the temptations the world offers us, company and custom being the two special instruments by which it works on us.

36. A third thing we renounce is all the sinful lusts of the flesh: where the flesh is to be understood in that sense, wherein the Scripture often uses it, for the fountain of all disordered affections. For though those unclean desires, which we ordinarily call the lusts of the flesh, are meant here, yet they are not the only things here contained, there being divers other things, which the Scripture calls the works of the flesh; I cannot better inform you of them, then by setting down that list S. Paul gives of them, Gal. 5. 19, 20, 21. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, Envyings, murders, drunkenness, revilings, and such like. This with those other descriptions, you will find scattered in several places of Scripture will show you, there are many things contained under this part of your vow, the forsaking all the sinful lusts of the flesh.

37. The second thing our Godfathers and Godmothers promised for us, was that we should believe all the Articles of the Christian faith. These we have summed up together, in that which we call the Apostles Creed, which since we promise to believe, we are supposed also to promise to learn them, and that not only the words, but likewise the plain sense of them, for who can believe what he either never heard of, or knows not anything of the means of it? Now by this believing is meant not only the consenting to the truth of them, but also the living like them that do believe; As for Example, our believing that God created us, should make us live in that subjection and obedience to him, which becomes creatures to their Creator; the believing that Christ redeemed us, should make us yield up ourselves to him as his purchase, to be disposed wholly by him, and employed only in his service. The believing a judgment to come, should give us care so to walk, that we may not be condemned in it. And our believing the life everlasting should make us diligent so to employ our short moment of time here, that our everlasting life may be a life of joy, not of misery to us. In this manner from all the Articles of the Creed, we are to draw Motives to confirm us in all Christian Practice; to which end it is that our learning, and believing of them tends and therefore without it we are very far from making good this part of our vow, the believing all the Articles of the Christian faith.

38. The last part of our vow is, that we should keep God's holy will and commandments, and walk in the same all the days of our lives. Where by of God's holy will and commandments, is meant our doing of all those things, which he hath made known to us to be his will we should perform; wherein he hath given us his holy Word to instruct us, and teach us, what it is that he requires of us, and now he expects that we should faithfully do it without favoring ourselves in the breach of any one of his commands. And then in this entire obedience, we must walk all the days of our lives: That is, we must go on in a constant course of obeying God, not only fetch some few steps in his ways, but walk in them, and that not for some part of our time but all the days of our lives, never turn out of them, but go on constantly in them, as long as we live in this world.

39. Having now thus briefly explained to you this vow made at your Baptism, all I shall add concerning it, is not only to remember you how nearly you are concerned in the keeping it: and that first in respect of justice, secondly, in respect of advantage and benefit. That you are in justice bound to it, I need say no more, but that it is a promise, and you know justice requires of every man the keeping of his promise. But then this is of all other promises the most solemn and binding, for it is a vow; that is, a promise made to God; and therefore we are not only unjust, but forsworn, when ever we break any part of it.

40. But secondly we are also highly concerned to keep it, in respect of our own benefit. I told you before, that Baptism entered us into Covenant with God, now a Covenant is made up of two parts; that is, something promise by the one party, and something by the other of the parties that make the Covenant. And if one of them break his part of the Covenant; that is, perform not what he hath agreed to, he can in no reason look that the other should make good his. And so it is here, God doth indeed promise those benefits before mentioned, and that is his part of the Covenant. But then we also undertake to perform the several things contained in this vow of Baptism, and that is our part of it, and unless we do indeed perform them, God is not tied to make good his, and so we forfeit all those precious benefits and advantages, we are left in that natural and miserable estate of ours, Children of wrath, enemies of God, and heirs of eternal damnation. And now what can be the pleasure, that any or all sins can offord us, that can make us the least degree of recompense for such a loss, the loss of God's favor and grace here, and the loss of our own souls hereafter: for as our Savior saith, Mar. 8. 36. What shall it profit a man; if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul: yet this mad bargain we make, whenever we break any part of this our vow of Baptism. It therefore most nearly concerns us to consider sadly of it; to remember, that every sin we commit, is a direct breach of this vow, and therefore when thou art tempted to any sin, seem it never so light, say not of it, as Lot did of Zoar, Gen. 6. 20. Is it not a little one? but consider, that whatever it is, thou hast in thy Baptism vowed against it, and then be it never so little, it draws a great one at the heels of it, no less then that of being forsworn, which whoever commits, God hath in the third Commandment pronounced, he will not hold him guiltless. And that we may the better keep this vow, it will be very useful often to repeat to ourselves the several breaches of it, that so we may still have it ready in our minds, to set against all temptations; and surely it is so excellent a weapon, that if we do not either cast it aside, or use it very negligently, it will enable us by God's help to put to flight our spiritual adversary. And this is that reverence we are to pay to this first Sacrament, that of Baptism.

PARTITION III.

Of the LORD'S SUPPER, of Preparation before, of Duties to be done at the Receiving, and afterwards, &c.

§ 1. NOW follows the reverence due to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and in this I must follow my first division, and set down first what is to be done before, secondly, at, and thirdly, after the time of receiving, for in this Sacrament we cannot be excused from any one of these, though in the former we are.

2. And first for that which is to be done before, S. Paul tells us it is examination, 1 Cor. 11 28. But let a man examine himself and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup. But before I proceed to the particulars of this examination, I must in the general tell you that the special business we have to do in this Sacrament, is to repeat, and renew that covenant we made with God in our Baptism, which we having many ways grievously broken, it pleases God in this great mercy to suffer us to come to the renewing of it in this Sacrament, which if we do in sincerity of heart, he hath promised to accept as, and to give us all those benefits in this, which he was ready to bestow in the other Sacrament, if we had not by our own fault forfeited them. Since then the renewing of our Covenant is our business of this time, it follows that these three things are necessary towards it; First, that we understand what that covenant is; Secondly, that we consider, what our breaches of it have been; and Thirdly, that we resolve upon a strict observance of it, for the rest of our life. And the trying ourselves in every one of these particulars, is that examination which is required of us, before we come to this Sacrament.

3. And first we are to examine, whether we understand what this Covenant is; this is, exceeding necessary, as being the foundation of both the other, for it is neither possible to discover our past sins, nor to settle purpose against them for the future without it. Let this therefore be your first business. Try whether you rightly understand what that Covenant is, which you entered into at your Baptism, what be the mercies promised on God's part, and the duties on yours. And because the Covenant made with each of us in Baptism, is only the applying to our particulars; the Covenant made by God, in Christ, with all mankind in general, you are to consider, whether you understand that; if you do not, you must immediately seek for instruction in it. And till you have means of gaining better, look over what is briefly said in the entrance to this treatise, concerning the second Covenant, which is the foundation of that Covenant, which God makes with us in our Baptism. And because you will there find, that obedience to all God's Commands is the condition required of us; and is also that, which we expressly vow in our Baptism, it is necessary you should likewise know, what those Commands of God are. Therefore if you find you are ignorant of them, never be at rest, till you have got yourself instructed in them, and have gained such a measure of knowledge, as may direct you to do that Whole Duty of Man, which God requires. And the giving thee this instruction is the only aim of this Book; which the more ignorant thou art, the more earnestly I shall entreat thee, diligently to read. And if thou hast heretofore approacht to this holy Sacrament in utter ignorance of these necessary things, bewail thy sin in soe doing, but presume not to come again, till thou have by gaining this necessary knowledge fitted thyself for it, which thou must hasten to do. For though no man must come to the Sacrament in such ignorance, yet if he willfully continue in it, that will be no excuse to him for keeping from this holy Table.

4. The second part of our examination is concerning our breaches of this Covenant, and here thou wilt find the use of that knowledge I spake of. For there is no way of discovering what our sins have been, but by trying our actions by that which should be the rule of them, the Law of God. When therefore thou settest to this part of examination, remember what are the several branches of thy duty, and then ask thy own heart in every particular, how thou hast performed it. And content not thyself with knowing in general, that thou hast broken God's Law, but do thy utmost to discover in what particulars thou hast done so. Recal as well as thou canst, all the passages of thy life, and in each of them consider, what part of that duty hath been transgressed by it. And that not only in the grosser act, but in word also, nay even in thy most secret thoughts. For though man's Law reaches not to them, yet God's doth; so that whatever he forbids in the act, he forbids likewise in the thoughts and desires, and sees them as clearly as our most public acts. This particular search is exceeding necessary; For there is no promise of forgiveness of any sin, but only to him that confesseth and forsaketh it. Now to both these it is necessary, that we have a distinct and particular knowledge of our sins. For how can he either confess his sin, that knows not his guilt of it? or how can he resolve to forsake it, that discerns not himself to have formerly cleaved to it? Therefore we may surely conclude, that this examination is not only useful, but necessary towards a full, and complete repentance; for he that does not take this particular view of his sins; will be likely to repent but by halves, which will never avail him towards his pardon; nothing but an entire forsaking of every evil way, being sufficient for that. But surely of all other times it concerns us, that when we come to the Sacrament, our repentance be full and complete, and therefore this strict search of our own hearts is then especially necessary. For although it be true, that it is not possible by all our diligence to discover, or remember every sin of our whole lives: And though it be also true, that what is so unavoidably hid from us, may be forgiven without anymore particular confession, then that of David's, Psalm 19. 12. Cleanse thou me from my secret faults, yet this will be no plea for us, if they come to be secret, only because we are negligent in searching. Therefore take heed of deceiving thyself in this weighty business, but search thy soul to the bottom, without which it is impossible that the wounds thereof should ever be thoroughly cured.

5. And as you are to inquire thus narrowly concerning the several sorts of sins, so also must you concerning the degrees of them; for there are divers circumstances, which increase, and heighten the sin. Of this sort there are many. As first, when we sin against knowledge, that is, when we certainly know such a thing to be a sin, yet for the present pleasure or profit (or whatever other motive) adventure of it. This is by Christ himself adjudged to be a great heightening of the sin. He that knows his Masters will, and doth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes, Luke 12. 47. Secondly, when we sin with deliberation; that is, when we do not fall into it of a sudden, ere we are aware, but have time to consider of it, this is another degree of the sin. But thirdly a yet higher is, when we do it against the resistances and checks of our own conscience, when that at the time tells us, this thing thou oughtest not to do; Nay, lays before us the danger, as well as the sin of it, yet in spite of these admonitions of conscience, we go on and commit the sin; this is a huge increase of it, such as will raise the lest sin into a most high provocation. For it is plain, a sin thus committed must be a willful one, and then be the matter of it never so light, it is most heinous in God's eyes. Nay, this is a circumstance of such force, that it may make an indifferent action, that is in itself no sin, become one. For though my conscience should err in telling me such a thing were unlawful, yet so long as I were so persuaded, it were sin for me to do that thing; for in that case my will consents to the doing a thing, which I believe to be displeasing to God, & God (who judges us by our will, not our understandings.) imputes it to me as a sin, as well as if the thing were in itself unlawful, & therefore surely we may conclude that anything which is in itself sinful, is made much more so by being committed against the checks of conscience. A fourth aggravation of a sin is, when it hath been often repeated, for then there is not only the guilt of so many more Acts, but every Act grows also so much worse, and more inexcusable. We always judge thus in faults committed against ourselves, we can forgive a single injury, more easily then the same, when it hath been repeated, and the oftener it hath been so repeated, the more heinous we account it. And so surely it is in faults against God also. Fifthly, the sins which have been committed after vows, and resolutions of amendment are yet more grievous: for that contains also the breaking of those promises. Somewhat of this, there is in every willful sin, because every such is a breach of that vow we make at Baptism; But besides that, we have since bound ourselves by new vows, if at no other time, yet surely at our coming to the Lord's Supper, that being (as was formerly said) purposely to repeat our vow of Baptism. And the more of these vows we have made, so much the greater is our guilt; if we fall back to any sin, we then renounced. This is a thing very well worth weighing, & therefore examine thyself particularly, at thy approach to the Sacrament, concerning thy breaches of former vows made at the holy Table. And if upon any other occasion, as sickness, trouble of mind, or the like, thou hast at any time made any other, call thyself to a strict account how thou hast performed them also, and remember that every sin committed against such vows is besides its own natural guilt, a perjury likewise. Sixthly, a yet higher step is, when a sin hath been so often committed, that we are come to a custom and habit of it: and that is indeed a high degree.

6. Yet even of habits some are worse then others; as first, if it be so confirmed, that we are come to a hardness of heart, have no sense at all of the sin; or secondly, if we go on in it against any extraordinary means used by God to reform us, such as sickness, or any other affliction, which seems to be sent on purpose for our reclaiming. Or thirdly, if all reproofs and exhortations either of Ministers or private friends work not on us, but either make us angry at our reprovers, or set us on defending the sin. Or Lastly, if this sinful habit be so strong in us, as to give us a love to the sin, not only in ourselves, but in others; if as the Apostle saith, Rom. 1. 31. We do not only do the things, but take pleasure in them that do them, and therefore entice and draw as many as we can into the same sins with us: Then it is risen to the highest step of wickedness, and is to be looked on as the utmost degree both of sin and danger. Thus you see how you are to examine yourselves concerning your sins, in each of which you are to consider how many of these heightening circumstances there have been, that so you may aright measure the heinousness of them.

7. Now the end of this examination is to bring you to such a sight of your sins, as may truly humble you, make you sensible of your own danger, that have provoked so great a Majesty, who is able so sadly to revenge himself upon you. And that will surely even to the most carnal heart appear a reasonable ground of sorrow. But that is not all, it must likewise bring you to a sense and abhorrence of your baseness, and ingratitude, that have thus offended so good and gracious a God, that have made such unworthy and unkind returns to those tender and rich mercies of his. And this consideration especially must melt your hearts into a deep sorrow and contrition, the degree whereof must be in some measure answerable to the degree of your sins. And the greater it is, provided it be not such as shuts up the hope of God's Mercy, the more acceptable it is to God, who hath promised not to despise a broken and contrite heart, Psal. 51. 17. And the more likely it will be also to bring us to amendment: For if we have once felt what the smart of a wounded Spirit is, we shall have the less mind to venture upon sin again.

8. For when we are tempted with any of the short pleasures of sin, we may then out of our own experience set against them the sharp pains and terrors of an accusing conscience, which will

to any that hath felt them; be able infinitely to outweigh them. Endeavour therefore to bring your soul to this melting temper, to this deep unfeigned sorrow, and that not only for the danger you have brought upon yourself, for though that be a consideration that may and ought to work sadness in us, yet where that alone is the motive of our sorrow, it is not that sorrow which will avail us for pardon; and the reason of it is clear, for that sorrow proceeds only from the love of ourselves, we are sorry, because we are like to smart. But the sorrow of a true penitent must be enjoined also with the love of God, and that will make us grieve for having offended him, though there were no punishment to fall upon ourselves. The way then to stir up this sorrow in us, is first to stir up our love of God, by repeating to ourselves the many gracious Acts of his mercy towards us, particularly that of his sparing us, and not cutting us off in our sins. Consider with thyself how many and how great provocations thou hast offered him, perhaps in a continued course of many years willful disobedience, for which thou mightest with perfect justice have been ere this sent quick into Hell; Nay, possibly thou hast before thee many examples of less *sinner*s, then thou art, who have been suddenly snatched away in the midst of their sins. And what cause canst thou give, why thou hast thus long escaped, but only because his eye hath spared thee. And what cause of that sparing, but his tender compassions towards thee, his unwillingness that thou shouldst perish? This consideration if it be pressed home upon thy soul, cannot choose (if thy heart be not as hard as the nether Milstone) but awake somewhat of love in thee towards this gracious, this longsuffering God, and that love will certainly make it appear to thee, that it is an evil thing, and a bitter, that thou hast forsaken the Lord, Ier. 2. 19. That thou hast made such wretched requitals of so great mercy; it will make thee both ashamed and angry at thyself, that thou hast been such an unthankful creature. But if the consideration of this one sort of mercy, God's forbearance only, be such an engagement, and help to this Godly sorrow, what will then be the multitude of those other mercies, which every man is able to reckon up to himself? and therefore let every man be as particular in it as he can call to mind as many of them as he is able that so he may attain to the greater degree of true contrition.

9. And to all these endeavors most be added earnest prayers to God, that he by his holy spirit would show you your sins, and soften your hearts, that you may thoroughly bewail, and lament them.

10. To this must be joined an humble confession of sins to God, and that not only in general, but also in particular, as far as your memory of them will reach, and that with all those heightening circumstances of them, which you have by the forementioned examination discovered. Yea even secret, and forgotten sins must in general be acknowledged; for it is certain there are multitudes of such, so that it is necessary for everyone of us to say with David, Psal. 19. 12. Who can understand his errors, cleanse thou me from my secret faults. When you have thus confessed your sins, with this hearty sorrow, and sincere hatred of them, you may then (and not before) be concluded to feel so much of your disease, that it will be seasonable to apply the remedy.

11. In the next place therefore you are to look on him, whom God hath set forth to be the propitiation of our sins, Rom. 3. 25. Even Jesus Christ that Lamb of God, who taketh away the sins of the world Io. 1. 29. And earnestly beg of God, that by his most precious blood, your sins may be washed away, and that God would for his sake be reconciled to you. And this you are to believe will surely be done, if you do for the rest of your time forsake your sins, and give yourselves up sincerely to obey God in all his commands. But without that, it is vain to hope any benefit from Christ, or his sufferings. And therefore the next part of your preparation must be the setting those resolutions of obedience which I told you was the third thing you were to examine yourselves of before your approach to the holy Sacrament.

12. Concerning the particulars of this resolution, I need say no more, but that it must answer every part, and branch of our duty; that is, we must not only in general resolve, that we will observe God's Commandments, but we must resolve it for every Commandment by itself; and especially where we have found ourselves most to have failed heretofore, there especially to renew our resolutions. And herein it nearly concerns us to look, that these resolutions be sincere, and unfeigned, and not only such slight ones as people use out of custom to put on at their coming to the Sacrament, which they never think of keeping afterwards. For this is a certain truth, that whosoever comes to this holy Table without an entire hatred of every sin, comes unworthily; and it is as sure, that he that doth entirely hate all sin, will resolve to forsake it; for you know forsaking naturally follows hatred, no man willingly abides with a thing, or person he hates. And therefore he that doth not so resolve, as that God the searcher of hearts may approve it as sincere, cannot be supposed to hate sin, and so cannot be a worthy receiver of that holy Sacrament. Therefore try your resolutions thoroughly, that you deceive not yourselves in them, it is your own great danger, if you do, for it is certain you cannot deceive God, nor gain acceptation from him by anything, which is not perfectly heartly and unfeigned.

13. Now as you are to resolve on this new obedience, so you are likewise to resolve on the means, which may assist you in the performance of it. And therefore consider in every duty, what are the means that may help you in it, and resolve to make use of them, how uneasy soever they be to your flesh; so on the other side consider what things they are, that are likely to lead you to sin, and resolve to shun and avoid them: this you are to do in respect of all sins whatever, but especially in those, whereof you have formerly been guilty. For there it will not be hard for you to find, by what steps and degrees you were drawn into it, what company, what occasion it was that ensnared you, as also to what sort of temptations you are aptest to yield. And therefore you must particularly fence you self against the sin, by avoiding those occasions of it.

14. But it is not enough that you resolve you will do all this hereafter, but you must instantly set to it, and begin the course by doing at the present whatsoever you have opportunity of doing: And there are several things, which you may; nay, must do at the present, before you come to the Sacrament.

15. As first you must cast off every sin, not bring any one unmortified lust with you to that Table; for it is not enough to purpose to cast them off afterwards, but you must then actually do it by with-drawing all degrees of love and affection from them; you must then give a bill of divorce to all your old beloved sins, or else you are no way fit to be married to Christ. The reason of this is clear; For this Sacrament is our spiritual nourishment; now before we can receive spiritual nourishment we must have spiritual life (for no man gives food to a dead person) But whosoever continues not only in the act, but in the love of any one known sin hath no spiritual life, but is in God's account no better then a dead carcass, and therefore cannot receive that spiritual food. It is true, he may eat the bread, and drink the wine, but he receives not Christ, but instead of him, that which is most dreadful; the Apostle will tell you what, 1 Cor. 11. 29. He eats and drinks his own damnation. Therefore you see how great a necessity lies on you thus actually to put off every sin, before you come to this Table.

16. And the same necessity lies on you for a second thing to be done at this time, and that is the putting your soul into a heavenly and Christian temper; by possessing it with all those graces which may render it acceptable in the eyes of God. For when you have turned out Satan and his accursed train, you must not let your soul lie empty; if you do, Christ tells you, Luke 11. 26. He will quickly return again, and your last estate shall be worse then your first. But you must by earnest Prayer invite into it the holy Spirit, with his graces, or if they be in some degree there already, you must pray that he will yet more fully possess it, and you must quicken and stir them up.

17. As for example, you must quicken your humility, by considering your many and great sins; your Faith, by mediating on God's promises to all penitent sinners; your love to God, by considering his mercies, especially those remembered in this Sacrament, his giving Christ to die for us: and your love to your neighbor, nay to your enemies, by considering that great example of his suffering for us, that were enemies to him. And it is most particularly required of us when we come to this Table, that we copy out this pattern of his in a perfect forgiveness of all that have offended us, and not only forgiveness, but such a kindness also, as will express itself in all offices of love and friendship to them.

18. And if you have formerly so quite forgot that blessed example of his, as to do the direct contrary, if you have done any unkindness or injury to any person, then you are to seek forgiveness from him; and to that end first acknowledge your fault, and secondly restore to him to the utmost of your power, whatsoever you have deprived him of, either in goods or credit. This reconciliation with our brethren is absolutely necessary towards the making any of our services acceptable with God, as appears by that precept of Christ, Mat. 5. 23, 24. If thou bring thy gift to the Altar and there rememberest that thy brother hath ought against thee, leave there thy gift before the Altar; and go thy way, first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come, and offer thy gift. Where you see, that though the gift be already at the Altar, it must rather be left there unoffered, then be offered by a man that is not at perfect peace with his neighbor. And if this charity be so necessary in all our services, much more in this, where by a joint partaking in the same holy mysteries, we signify our being united and knit, not only to Christ our head, but also to each other, as fellow-members. And therefore if we come with any malice in our hearts we commit an act of the highest Hypocrisy, by making a solemn profession in the Sacrament of that charity and brotherly love, whereof our hearts are quite void.

19. Another most necessary grace at this time is that of devotion, for the raising whereof we must allow ourselves some time to withdraw from our worldly affairs, and wholly to set ourselves to this business of preparation, one very especial part of which preparation lies in raising up our souls to a devout and heavenly temper. And to that it is most necessary, that we cast off all thoughts of the world, for they will be sure as so many clogs, to hinder our souls in their mounting towards heaven. A special exercise of this devotion is prayer, wherein we must be very frequent, and earnest at our coming to the Sacrament, this being one great instrument, whereby we must obtain all those other graces required in our preparation. Therefore be sure this be not omitted, for if you use never so much endeavor besides, and leave out this, it is the going to work in your own strength, without looking to God for his help, and then it is impossible you should prosper in it; For we are not able of ourselves to think anything, as of ourselves, but our sufficiency is of God, 2 Cor. 3. 5. Therefore be instant with him so to assist you with his grace, that you may come so fitted to this Holy Table, that you may be partakers of the benefits there reached out to all worthy receivers.

20. These and all other spiritual graces our Souls must be clothed with when we come to this Feast, for this is that wedding garment, without which whosoever comes, is like to have the entertainment, mentioned in the parable, of him who came to the marriage without a wedding garment, Mat. 22. 13. who was cast into utter darkness, where is weeping and gnashing of teeth; for though it is possible he may sit it out at the present, and not be snatched from the Table, yet St. Paul assures him, he drinks damnation to himself, and howsoever it may fall on him, is uncertain; But it is sure, it will, if repentance prevent it not, and as sure that when ever it does come, it will be intolerable, for who among us can dwell with everlasting burnings, Isa. 33. 14.

21. I shall add but one thing more concerning the things which are to be done before the Sacrament, and that is an advice. That if any person upon a serious view of himself cannot satisfy his own Soul of his sincerity, and so doubts, whether he may come to the Sacrament, He do not rest wholly on his own Judgment in the case; For if he be a truly humbled Soul, it is likely he may judge too hardly of himself, if he be not, it is odds, but if he be left to the satisfying of his own doubts, he will quickly bring himself to pass too favorable a sentence. Or whether he be the one or the other, if he come to the Sacrament in that doubt, he certainly plunges himself into further doubts and scruples, if not into sin; On the other side, if he forbear, because of it, if that fear be a causeless one, then he groundlessly absents himself from that Holy Ordinance, and so deprives his Soul of the benefits of it. Therefore in the midst of so many dangers, which attend the mistake of himself, I would, as I said before, exhort him not to trust to his own judgment, but to make known his case to some discreet and Godly Minister, and rather be guided by his, who will probably (if the case be duly and without any disguise discovered to him) be better able to judge of him, than he of himself. This is the council the Church gives in the exhortation before the Communion, where it is advised, that if any by other means therefore mentioned, cannot quiet his own conscience, but require farther counsel, and comfort, than let him go to some discreet and learned Minister of God's Word, and open his grief, that he may receive such Ghostly counsel, advice, and comfort that his conscience may be relieved, &c. This is surely such advice, as should not be neglected neither at the time of coming to the Sacrament, nor any other, when we are under any fear or reasons of doubt concerning the state of our Souls. And for want of this, many have run into very great mischiefs, having let the doubt fester so long, that it hath either plunged them into deep distresses of conscience; or which is worse, they have to still that disquiet within them, betaken themselves to all sinful pleasures, and so quite cast off all care of their Souls.

22. But to all this it will perhaps be said, that this cannot be done without discovering the nakedness, and blemishes of the Soul, and there is shame in that, and therefore men are unwilling to do it. But to that I answer, that it is very unreasonable, that should be a hindrance. For first, I suppose you are to choose only such a person as will faithfully keep any secret, you shall commit to him, and so it can be no public shame you can fear. And if it be in respect of that single person, you need not fear that neither; for, supposing him a godly man, he will not think the worse of you, but the better, that you are so desirous to set all right between God, and your Soul. But if indeed there were shame in it, yet as long as it may be a means to cure both your trouble and your sin too (as certainly Godly and faithful counsel may tend much to both) that shame ought to be despised, and it is sure it would, if we loved our Souls, as well as our body, for in bodily diseases, be they never so foul or shameful, we count him a fool, who will rather miss the cure, then discover it, and then it must here be so much a greater folly, by how much the Soul is more precious than the body.

23. But God knows, it is not only doubting persons, to whom this advice might be useful, there are others of another sort, whose confidence is their disease, who presume very groundless of the goodness of their estates; And for those it were most happy, if they could be brought to hear some more equal judgments, then their own in this so weighty a business. The truth is, we are generally so apt to savor ourselves, that it might be very useful for the most, especially the more ignorant sort, sometimes to advise with a spiritual guide, to enable them to pass right judgments on themselves, and not only so, but to receive directions, how to subdue and mortify those sins they are most inclined to, which is a matter of so much difficulty, that we have no reason to despise any means that may help us in it.

24. I have now gone through those several parts of duty we are to perform before our receiving. In the next place, I am to tell you, what is to be done at the time of receiving. When thou art at the Holy Table, first humble thyself in an unfeigned acknowledgement of thy great unworthiness to be admitted there; and to that purpose remember again between God and thine own Soul, some of thy greatest, and foulest sins, thy breaches of former vows made at that Table, especially since thy last receiving. Then meditate on those bitter sufferings of Christ, which are set out to us in the Sacrament, when thou seest the bread broken, remember how his blessed body was torn with nails upon the Cross, when thou seest the wine poured out, remember how his precious blood was spilled there. And then consider, it was thy sins that caused both. And here think, how unworthy a wretch thou art to have done that, which occasioned such torments to him? How much worse then his very crucifiers? They crucified him once, but thou hast, as much as in thee lay, crucified him daily. They crucified him, because they knew him not, but thou hast known both what he is in himself, The Lord of Glory, and what he is to thee a most tender and merciful Savior, and yet thou hast still continued thus to crucify him afresh. Consider this, and let it work in thee, first a great sorrow for thy sins past, and then a great hatred, and a firm resolution against them for the time to come.

25. When thou hast a while thus thought on these sufferings of Christ for the increasing thy humility and contrition; Then in the second place think of them again, to stir up thy Faith; look on him as the sacrifice offered up for thy sins, for the appeasing of God's wrath, and procuring his favor, and mercies toward thee. And therefore believingly, yet humbly, beg of God to accept of that satisfaction made by his innocent and beloved Son, and for the merits thereof to pardon thee; whatever is past, and to be fully reconciled to thee.

26. In the third place consider them again to raise thy thankfulness. Think how much both of shame and pain he there endured, but especially those great agonies of his Soul, which drew from him that bitter cry, My God, my God why hast thou forsaken me. Mat. 27. 45. Now all this he suffered only to keep thee from perishing. And therefore consider what unexpressable thanks thou owest him, and endeavor to raise thy Soul to the most zealous and hearty thanksgiving; For this is a principal part of duty at this time, the praising, and magnifying that mercy, which hath redeemed us by so dear a price. Therefore it will here well become thee to say with David, I will take the Cup of Salvation and will call upon the Name of the Lord.

27. Fourthly, look on these sufferings of Christ, to stir up this love, and surely there cannot be a more effect•all means of doing it, for here the love of Christ to thee is most manifest, according to that of the Apostle, 1 Jo. 3. 16. Hereby perceive we the love of God towards us, because he laid down his life for us. And that even the highest degree of love, for as himself tells us, Jo 15. 13. Greater love then this hath no m•n, then that a man lay down his life for his friend. Yet even greater love then this had he, for he not only died, but died the most painful and most reproachful death, and that not for his friends, but his utter enemies. And therefore if after all this love on his part, there be no return of love on ours, we are worst then the vilest sort of men, for even the Publicans, Matth. 5. 46. Love those that love them. Here therefore chide, and reproach thyself, that thy love to him is so faint and cool, when his to thee was so zealous and affectionate. And endeavor to enkindle this holy flame in thy Soul, to love him in such a degree, that thou mayest be ready to copy out his example, to part with all things yea even life itself, whenever he calls for it, that is whensoever thy obedience to any command of his shall lay thee open to those sufferings. But in the mean time, to resolve never again to make any league with his enemies, to entertain, or harbor any sin in thy breast. But if there have any such hitherto remained with thee, make this the season to kill, and crucify it, offer it up at this instant a sacrifice to him, who was sacrificed for thee, and particularly for that very end, that he might redeem thee from all iniquity. Therefore here make thy solemn resolutions to forsake every sin, particularly those, into which thou hast most frequently fallen. And that thou mayest indeed perform those resolutions, earnestly beg of this crucified Savior, that he will by the power of his death mortify and kill all thy corruptions.

28. When thou art about to receive the consecrated bread and wine, remember that God now offers to seal to thee that New Covenant made with mankind in his Son. For since he gives that his Son in the Sacrament, he gives with him all the benefits of that Covenant, to wit, pardon of sins, sanctifying grace and a title to an eternal inheritance. And here be astonished at the infinite goodness of God who reaches out to thee so precious a treasure. But then remember, that this is all but on condition, that thou perform thy part of the Covenant. And therefore settle in thy Soul the most serious purpose of obedience, and then with all possible devotion join with the Minister in that short, but excellent prayer used at the instant of giving the Sacrament, The body of our Lord, &c.

29. So soon as thou hast received, offer up thy devoutest praises for that great mercy, together with thy most earnest prayers for such assistance of God's Spirit, as may enable thee to perform the vow thou hast now made. Then remembering that Christ is a propitiation not for our sins only, but also for the sins of the whole world, let thy charity reach as far as his hath done, and pray for all mankind, that everyone may receive the benefit of that sacrifice of his; commend also to God the estate of the Church, that particularly, whereof thou art a member. And forget not to pray for all to whom thou owest obedience, both in Church and State, and so go on to pray for such particular persons as either thy relations, or their wants shall present to thee. If there be any collection for the poor (as there always ought to be at this time) give freely according to thy ability; or if by the default of others there be no such collection, yet do thou privately design something towards the relief of thy poor brethren, and be sure to give it the next fitting opportunity that offers itself. All this thou must contrive to do in the time that others are receiving, that so when the public prayers, after the administration begin, thou mayst be ready to join in them, which thou must likewise take care to do with all divotion: thus much for thy behavior at the time of receiving.

30. Now follows the third and last thing; That is▪ what thou art to do after thy receiving. That which is immediately to be done, is as soon as thou art retired from the Congregation, to offer up again to God thy Sacrifice of praise for all those precious mercies conveyed to thee, in that holy Sacrament, as also humbly to entreat the continued assistance of his grace to enable thee to make good all those purposes of obedience thou hast now made. And in whatsoever thou knowest thyself most in danger, either in respect of any former habit, or natural inclination, there especially desire and earnestly beg his aid.

31. When thou hast done thus, do not presently let thyself lose to thy worldly cares and business. But spend all that day, either in mediating, praying, reading, good conferences, or the like; so as may best keep up that holy flame that is enkindled in thy heart. Afterwards, when thy calling requires thee to fall to thy usual affaires, do it, but yet still remember that thou hast a greater business then that upon thy hands; that is, the performing of all those promises, thou so lately madest to God, and therefore whatever thy outward employments are, let thy heart be set on that, keep all the particulars of thy resolution in memory, and whenever thou art tempted to any of thy old sins, then consider, this is the thing thou so solemnly vowedst against, and withal remember what a horrible guilt it will be, if thou shouldst now willfully do anything contrary to that vow; Yea, and what a horrible mischief also it will be to thyself. For at thy receiving, God and thou enteredst into Covenant, into a league of friendship and kindness. And as long as thou keepest in that friendship with God, thou art false, all the malice of men or devils can do thee no harm: For as the Apostle saith, Rom. 8. 31. If God be for us who can be against us. But if thou breakest this league (as thou certainly dost, if thou yield to any willful sin) then God and thou are enemies, and if all the world then were for thee, it could not avail thee.

32. Nay thou wilt get an enemy within thine own bosom, thy conscience accusing and upbraiding thee, and when God and thine own conscience are thus against thee, thou canst not but be extremely miserable, even in this life, besides that fearful expectation of wrath, which awaits thee in the next. Remember all this, when thou art set upon by any temptation, and then sure thou canst not but look upon that temptation, as a cheat, that comes to rob thee of thy peace, thy God, thy very soul. And then surely it will appear as unfit to entertain it, as thou wouldst think it to harbor one in thy house, who thou knowest came to rob thee of what is dearest to thee.

33. And let not any experience of God's mercy in pardonning thee heretofore encourage thee again to provoke him; for besides, that it is thy highest degree of wickedness and unthankfulness to make that goodness of his, which should lead thee to repentance an encouragement in thy sin; besides this, I say, the oftener thou hast been pardoned, the less reason thou hast to expect it again, because thy sin is so much the greater, for having been committed after so much mercy. If a King have several times pardoned an offender, yet if he still return to the commission of the same fault, the King will at last be forced, if he have any love to Justice, to give him up to it. Now so it is here, God is as well just as merciful, and his justice will at last surely and heavily avenge the abuse of his mercy; and there cannot be a greater abuse of his mercy, then to sin in hope of it, so that it will prove a miserable deceiving of thyself then to presume upon it.

34. Now this care of making good thy vow must not abide with thee some few days only, and then be cast aside, but it must continue with thee all thy days. For if thou break thy vow, it matters not, whether sooner or latter. Nay perhaps the guilt may in some respects be more, if it be late, for if thou have for a good while gone on in the observance of it, that shows the thing is possible to thee; and so thy after breaches are not of infirmity, because thou canst not avoid them, but of perverseness, because thou wilt not: Besides the use of Christian-walking must needs make it more easy to thee. For indeed all the difficulty of it, is but from the custom of the contrary. And therefore if after some acquaintance with it, when thou hast overcome somewhat of the hardness, thou shalt then give it over, it will be most inexcusable. Therefore be careful all the days of thy life, to keep such a watch over thy life, and so to avoid all occasions of temptations, as may preserve thee from all willful breaches of this vow.

35. But though the obligation of every such single vow reach to the utmost day of our lives, yet are we often to renew it; that is, we are often to receive the holy Sacrament, for that being the means of conveying to us so great and invaluable benefits; and it being also a Command of Christ, that we should do this in remembrance of him, we are in respect both of reason and duty to omit no fit opportunity of partaking of that holy Table. I have now shown you what that reverence is, which we are to pay to God in his Sacrament.

PARTITION. IV.

HONOUR due to God's name; Of Sinning against it; Blasphemy; Swearing; Assertory Oaths; Promissory Oaths; Unlawful Oaths; Of Perjury; Of vain Oaths, and the Sin of them, &c.

§. 1. THE last thing wherein we are to express our reverence to him, is the honoring his name. Now what this honoring of his name is, we shall best understand by considering what are the things by which it is honoured, the avoiding of which will be our way of honoring it.

The first is all blasphemies, or speaking any evil thing of God, the highest degree whereof is cursing him, or if we do not speak it with our mouths, yet if we do it in our hearts, by thinking any unworthy thing of them, it is looked on by God, who sees the heart, as the vilest dishonor. But there is also a blasphemy of the actions, that is, when men who profess to be the servants of God, live so wickedly, that they bring up an evil report on him, whom they own as their Master and Lord. This blasphemy the Apostle takes notice of, R•m. 2. 24. Where he tells those who protest to be observers of the Law, That by their wicked actions the name of God was blasphemed among the Gentiles. Those Gentiles were moved to think ill of God, as the favor of sin, when they saw those, who called themselves his servants, commit it.

A second way of dishonoring God's name, is by swearing, and that is of two sorts, either by false oaths or else by rash, and light ones. A false oath may also be of two kinds, as first that by which I affirm somewhat, or secondly that by which I promise. The first is when I say such or such a thing was done so or so; and confirm this saying of mine with an oath, if then I know there be not perfect truth in what I say, this is a flat perjury, a down right being forsworn; Nay if I swear to the truth of that, whereof I am only doubtful, though the thing should happen to be true, yet it brings upon me the guilt of perjury. For I swear at a venture, and the thing might for ought I knew be as well false as true, whereas I ought never to swear to anything, the truth of which I do not certainly know.

2. But besides this sort of oaths, by which I affirm anything, there is the other sort, that by which I promise somewhat. And that promise may be either to God or Man, when it is to God, we call it a vow, of which I have already spoken, under the head of the Sacraments, I shall now only speak of that to man; & this may become a false oath, either at, or after the time of taking it. At the time of taking, it is false if either I have then no real purpose of making it good or else take it in a sense different from that which I know, he to whom I make the promise understands it; for the use of oaths, being to assure the persons, to whom they are made they must be taken in their sense. But if I were never so sincere at the taking the oath, if afterwards I do not perform it, I am certainly perjured.

3. The nature of an oath being then thus binding, it nearly concerns us to look that the matter of our oaths be lawful, for else we run ourselves into a woeful snare. For Example, suppose I swear to kill a man, if I perform my oath, I am guilty of murder, if I break it, of perjury. And so I am under a necessity of sinning one way or other. But there is nothing puts us under a greater degree of this unhappy necessity, then when we swear two oaths, whereof the one is directly cross and contradictory to the other. For if I swear to give a man my whole estate, and afterwards swear to give all or part of that estate to another, it is certain I must break my oath to one of them, because it is impossible to perform it to both, and so I must be under a necessity of being forsworn. And into this unhappy straight every man brings himself that takes any oath which crosses some other, which he hath formerly taken; which should make all that love either God, or their own souls, resolve never thus miserably to entangle themselves, by taking one oath cross and thwarting to another. But it may perhaps here be asked, what a person that hath already brought himself into such a condition shall do? I answer, he must first heartily repent the great sin of taking the unlawful oath, and then stick only to the lawful, which is all that is in his power towards the repairing his fault, and qualifying him for God's pardon for it.

4. Having said this concerning the kinds of this sin of perjury, I shall only add a few words to show you, how greatly God's name is dishonored by it. In all oaths you know, God is solemnly called to witness the truth of which is spoken; now if the thing be false, it is the basest affront, and dishonor that can possibly be done to God. For it is in reason to signify one of these two things, either that we believe he knows not whether we say true or no. (And that is to make him no God, to suppose him to be as deceiveable, and easy to be deluded as one of our ignorant neighbors) or else that he is willing to countenance our lies; the former robs him of that great attribute of his, his knowing all things, and is surely a great dishonoring of him, it being even amongst men accounted, one of the greatest disgraces to account a man fit to have cheats put upon him; yet even so we deal with God, if we venture to for swear, upon a hope that God discerns it not, But the other is yet worse, for the supposing him willing to countenance our lies, is the making him a party in them; and is not only the making him no God (it being impossible that God should either lie himself or approve it in another) but it is the making him like the very Devil. For he it is that is a liar, and the Father of it, Jo. 8 44. And sure I need not say more to prove that this is the highest degree of dishonoring God's name.

5. But if any yet doubt the heinousness of this sin; let him but consider what God himself says of it in the Third Commandment, where he solemnly professes, he will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain, and sure the adding that to this commandment, and none of the rest, is the marking this out for a most heinous guilt: and if you look into Zac. 5. You will there find the punishment is answerable, even the utter destruction, not only of the man; but his house also. Therefore it concerns all men as they love either their temporal or eternal well-fare, to keep them most strictly from this sin.

But besides this of for swearing, I told you there was another sort of oaths, by which God's name is dishonored, those are the vain and light oaths, such as are so usual in our common discourse; and are expressly forbidden by Christ, Mat. 5. 34. But I say unto you swear not at all; neither by heaven, for it is God's throne, nor by the earth, for it is his footstool; where you see we are not allowed to swear even by mere creatures, because of the relation they have to God. How great a wickedness is it then to profane his holy name by rash and vain oaths, this is a sin that is (by I know not what charm of Satan's) grown into fashion among us, and now its being so, draws daily more men into it. But it is to be remembered that when we shall appear before God's Judgment seat, to answer for those profanations of his name; it will be no excuse to say, it was the fashion to do so, it will rather be an increase of our guilt, that we have by our own practice, helped to confirm that wicked custom, which we ought to have beat down, and discountenanced.

6. And sure what ever this profane age thinks of it, this is a sin of a very high nature. For besides that it is a direct breach of the precept of Christ's, it shows first a very mean, and low esteem of God; Every oath we swear is the appealing to God, to judge the truth of what we speak, and therefore being of such greatness, and majesty, it requires that the matter concerning which we thus appeal to him, should be of great weight, and moment, somewhat wherein either his own glory, or some considerable good of man is concerned. But when we swear in common discourse, it is far otherwise, any the tristingest, or lightest thing serves for the matter of an oath, nay often men swear to such vain and foolish things, as a considering person would be ashamed barely to speak. And is it not a great despising of God, to call him solemnly to judge in such childish, such wretched matters, God is the great King of the world, now though a King be to be resorted unto in weighty cases, yet sure he would think himself much despised, if he should be called to judge between boys at their childish games: And God knows many things whereto we frequently swear, are not of greater weight, and therefore are a sign, that we do not rightly esteem of God.

7. Secondly, This common swearing is a sin which leads directly to the former of forswearing; for he that by the use of swearing hath made oaths so familiar to him, will be likely to take the dreadfullest oath without much consideration? For how shall he that swears hourly, look upon an oath with any reverence and he that doth not? it is his chance, not his care, that is to be thanked, if he keep from perjury. Nay further, he that swears commonly, is not only prepared to forswear, when a solemn oath is tendered him, but in all probability does actually forswear himself often in these suddener oaths: for supposing them to come from a man, ere he is aware (which is the best can be said of them) what assurance can any man have, who swears, ere he is aware, that he shall not lie so too? And if he doth both together, he must necessarily be forsworn. But he that observes your comm•n swearers, will be put past doubt, that they are often forsworn. For they usually swear indifferently to things true or false, doubtful or certain. And I doubt not, but if men who are guilty of this sin, would but impartially examine their own practice, their hearts would second me in this observation.

8. Thirdly, This is a sin, to which there is no temptation, there is nothing either of pleasure, or profit, got by it. Most other sins offer us somewhat either of the •re, or the other, but this is utterly empty of both. So that in this sin the Devil does not play the M•rchant for our Souls, as in others he does, he doth not so much as cheapen them, but we give them freely into his hands without anything in exchange. There seems to be but one thing possible for men to hope to gain by it, and that is to be believed in what they say when they thus bind it by an oath. But this also they constantly fail of, for there are none so little believed, as the common swearers. And good reason, For he that makes no conscience thus to profane God's name; Why shall any man believe, he makes any of lying? Nay, their forwardness to confirm every the slightest thing by an oath, rather gives jealousy, that they have some inward guilt of falseness, for which that oath must be the clo•k. And thus you see in how little stead it stands them, even to this only purpose, for which they can pretend it useful; and to any other advantage it makes not the least claim, and therefore is a sin without temptation, and consequently without excuse: for it shows the greatest contempt, nay unkindness to God, when we will provoke him thus, without anything to tempt us to it. And therefore though the commonness of this sin have made it pass but for a small one, yet it is very far from being so, either in itself, or in God's account.

9. Let all therefore, who are not yet fallen into the custom of this sin, be most careful never to yield to the least beginnings of it, and for those who are so miserable, as to be already •s•ared in it, let them immediately, as they tender their Souls, get out of it. And let no man plead the hardness of leaving an old custom, as an excuse for his continuing in it, but rather the longer he hath been in it, so much the more haste let him make out of it, as thinking it too too much, that he hath so long gone on in so great a sin. And if the length of the cust•me have increased the difficulty of leaving it, that is in all reason to make him set immediately to the casting it off, lest that difficulty at last grow to an impossibility, and the harder he finds it at the present, so much the more diligent and watchful he must be in the use of all those means, which may tend to the overcoming that sinful habit, some few of those means it will not be amiss here to mention.

10. First let him possess his mind fully of the heinousness of the sin, and not to measure it only according to the common rate of the world. And when he is fully persuaded of the guilt, then let him add to that, the consideration of the danger, as that it puts him out of God's favor at the present, and will, if he continue in it, cast him into Hell forever. And sure if this were but thoroughly laid to heart, it would restrain this sin; For I would ask a man, that pretends impossibility of leaving the custom, whether if he were sure he should be hanged the next oath he swore, the fear of it would not keep him from swearing? I can scarce believe any man in his wits so little Master of himself, but it would. And then surely damning is so much worse then hanging, that in all reason the fear of that ought to be a much greater restraint. The doubt is, men do either not heartily believe that this sin will damn them, or if they do, they look on it, as a thing a great way off and so are not much moved with it; but both these are very unreasonable. For the first, it is certain, that everyone that continues willfully in any sin, is so long in a state of damnation, and therefore this being so continued in, must certainly put a man in that condition. For the second, It is very possible, he may be deceived in thinking it so far off, for how knows any man that he shall not be struck dead with an oath in his mouth, or if he were sure not to be so, yet eternal damnation is surely to be dreaded above all things, be it at what distance soever.

11. A second means is to be exactly true in all thou speakest, that all men may believe thee on thy bare word, and then thou wilt never have occasion to confirm it by an oath, to make it more credible, which is the only color, or reason can at any time be pretended for swearing.

12. Thirdly, Observe what it is that most betrays thee to this sin, whether drink, or anger, or the company and example of others, or what ever else, and then if ever thou mean to forsake the sin, forsake those occasions of it.

13. Fourthly, Endeavour to possess thy heart with a continual remembrance of God, and if that once grow into a custom with thee, it will quickly turn out that contrary one of profaning. Use and accustom thyself therefore to this reverence of God; and particularly to such a respect to his name, as if it be possible, never to mention It without some lifting up of thy heart to him; Even in thy ordinary discourse, when ever thou takest his Name in to thy mouth, let it be an occasion of raising up thy thoughts to him. But by no means permit thyself to use it in idle bywords, or the like. If thou doest accustom thyself to pay this reverence to the bare mention of his name, it will be an excellent fence against the profaning it in oaths.

14. A fifth means is a diligent and constant watch over thyself, that thou thus offend not with thy tongue, without which all the former will come to nothing. And the last means is prayer, which must be added to all thy endeavors, therefore pray earnestly, that God will enable thee, to overcome this wicked custom; say with the Psalmist, Set a watch O Lord over my mouth and keep the door of my lips; and if thou doest sincerely set thyself to the use of means for it, thou mayest be assured, God will not be wanting in his assistance. I have been the longer on this, because it is so reigning a sin: God in his mercy give all that are guilty of it a true sight of the heinousness of it.

15. By these several ways of dishonoring God's Name you may understand, what is the duty of honoring it, viz. A strict abstaining from everyone of these, and that abstinence founded on an awful respect, and reverence to that sacred Name, which is Great, Wonderful, and Holy, Psal. 99. 3. I have now past through the several branches of that great duty of honoring of God.

PARTITION V.

OF WORSHIP due to God's Name. Of Prayer and its several parts. Of Public prayers in the CHURCH, in the FAMILY; Of PRIVATE PRAYER: Of REPENTANCE, &c. Of FASTING.

§. 1. THE eight duty we owe to God is worship; This is that great duty by which especially we acknowledge his Godhead, worship being proper only to God, and therefore it is to be looked on as a most weighty duty. This is to be performed first by our Souls, secondly by our bodies: The Souls part is praying. Now prayer is a speaking to God, and there are divers parts of it, according to the different things about which we speak.

2. As first, There is Confession, that is, the acknowledging our sins to God. And this may be either general, or particular; The general is, when we only confess in gross, that we are sinful, the particular, when we mention the several sorts, and acts of our sins. The former is necessary to be always a part of our solemn prayers, whether public, or private. The latter is proper for private prayer, and there the oftener it is used, the better, yea, even in our daily private prayer it will be fit constantly to remember some of our greatest and foulest sins, though never so long since past. For such we should never think sufficiently confessed, and bewailed. And this bewailing, must always go along with confession, we must be heartily sorry for the sins we confess, and from our Souls acknowledge our own great unworthiness, in having committed them, for our confession is not intended to instruct God, who knows our sins much better then ourselves do, but it is to humble ourselves, and therefore we must not think we have confessed aright, till that be done.

3. The second part of prayer, is petition. That is the begging of God whatsoever we want either for our Souls, or bodies. For our Souls we must first beg pardon of sins, and that for the sake of Jesus Christ, who shed his blood to obtain it. Then we must also beg the grace and assistance of God's Spirit, to enable us to forsake our sins, and to walk in obedience to him. And herein it will be needful particularly to beg all the several virtues, as faith, love, zeal, purity, repentance, and the like, but especially those which thou most wantest; And therefore observe what thy wants are, and if thou beest proud; be most instant in praying for humility, if lustful, for chastity, and so for all other graces, according as thou findest thy needs. And in all these things that concern thy Soul, be very earnest and importunate, take no denial from God, nor give over, though thou do not presently obtain what thou suest for. But if thou hast never so long prayed for a grace, and yet findest it not, do not grow weary of praying, but rather search what the cause may be, which makes thy prayer so ineffectual; see if thou do not thyself hinder them, perhaps thou prayest to God, to enable thee to conquer some sin, and yet never goest about to fight against it, never makest any resistance, but ye•ldest to it, as oft as it comes, nay putteth thyself in its way, in the road of all temptations. If it be thus, no wonder though thy prayers avail not, for thou wilt not let them. Therefore amend this, and set to the doing of thy part sincerely, and then thou needest not fear, but God will do his.

4. Secondly, We are to petition also for our bodies; That is, we are to ask of God such necessaries of life, as are needful to us, while we live here. But these only in such a degree, and measure, as his wisdom sees best for us, we must not presume to be our own c•rvers, and pray for all that wealth, or greatness, which our own vain hearts may perhaps desire, but only •or such a condition, in respect of outward things, as he sees may most tend to those great ends of our living here, the glorifying him, and the saving of our own Souls.

5. A third part of prayer is Deprecation, that is when we pray to God to turn away some evil from us. Now this evil may be either the evil of sin, or the evil of punishment. The evil of sin is that we are especially to pray against, most earnestly begging of God, that he will by the power of his grace preserve us from falling into sin. And whatever sins they are, to which thou knowest thyself most inclined, there be particularly earnest with God, to preserve thee from them. This is to be done daily, but then more especially, when we are under any present temptation, & in danger of falling into any sin; In which case we have reason to cry out, as St. Peter did, when he found himself sinking, save Lord, or I perish; humbly beseeching him either to withdraw the temptation, or strengthen us to withstand it, neither of which we can do for ourselves.

6. Secondly, We are likewise to pray against the evil of punishment, but principally against spiritual punishments, as the anger of God, the withdrawing of his grace, and eternal damnation. Against these we can never pray with too much earnestness; but we may also pray against temporal punishments, that is any outward affliction, but this with submission to God's will, according to the example of Christ, Mat. 26. 39. Not as I will, but as thou wilt.

7. A fourth part of prayer is intercession; that is, praying for others: This in general we are to do for all mankind, as well strangers, as acquaintance, but more particularly those, to whom we have any especial relation, either public, as our Governors, both in Church and State, or private, as Parents, Husband, Wife, Children, Friends, &c. We are also to pray for all that are in affliction, and such particular persons, as we discern especially to be so; Yea we are to pray for those that have done injury, those that despitefully use us and persecute us, for it is expressly the command of Christ, Mat. 5. 44. and that whereof he hath likewise given us the highest example, in praying even for his very crucifiers, Luc. 23. 34. Father forgive them. For all these sorts of persons we are to pray, and that for the very same good things we beg of God for our selves, that God would give them in their several places and callings, all spiritual and temporal blessings, which he sees wanting to them, and turn away from them all evil whether of sin, or punishment.

8. The fifth part of prayer is thanksgiving; That is, the praising, and blessing God for all his mercies, whether to our own persons, and those that immediately relate to us, or to the Church and Nation whereof we are members, or yet more general to all mankind. And this for all his mercies both spiritual and temporal: In the spiritual, first for those wherein we are all in common concerned, as the giving of his Son, the sending of his Spirit, and all those means he hath used to bring sinful men unto himself. Then secondly for those mercies we have in our own particulars received, such are the having been born within the pale of the Church, and so brought up in Christian Religion, by which we have been partakers of those precious advantages of the word, and Sacraments, and so have had, without any care, or pains of ours, the means of eternal life put into our hands. But besides these, there is none of us but have received other spiritual means from God.

9. As first God's patience, and longsuffering, waiting for our repentance, and not cutting us off in our sins. Secondly, his calls and invitations of us to that repentance, not only outward in the ministry of the word, but also inward, by the motions of his Spirit. But then if thou be one that hath by the help of God's grace been wrought upon by these calls, and brought from a profane, or worldly, to a Christian course of life, thou art surely in the highest degree tied to magnify and praise his goodness, as having received from him the greatest of mercies.

10. We are likewise to give thanks for temporal blessings, whether such as concern the public, as the prosperity of the Church or Nation, and all remarkable deliverances offered to either; or else such as concern our particulars, such are all the good things of this life which we enjoy, as health, friends, food, raiment, and the like; also for those minutely preservations, whereby we are by God's gracious providence kept from danger, and the especial deliverances which God hath given us in time of greatest perils. It will be impossible to set down the several mercies which everyman receives from God, because they differ in kind and degree between one man and another. But it is sure that he which receives least, hath yet enough to employ his whole life in praises to God. And it will be very fit for every man to consider the several passages of this life, and the mercies he hath in each received, and so to gather a kind of list, or Catalogue of them, at least the principal of them, which he may always have in his memory, and after with a thankful heart repeat before God.

11. These are the several parts of prayer and all of them to be used both publicly and privately. The public use of them is, first that in the Church where all meet to join in those prayers, wherein they are in common concerned. And this (where the prayers are such as they ought to be) we should be very constant at, there being an especial blessing promised to the joint requests of the faithful, and he that without a necessary cause absents himself from such public prayers, cuts himself off from the Church, which hath always been thought so unhappy a thing, that it is the greatest punishment, the Governors of the Church can lay upon the worst offender; and therefore it is a strange madness for men to inflict it upon themselves.

12. A second sort of public prayer, is that in a family, where all that are members of it, join in their common supplications, and this also ought to be very careful attended to; first by the Master of the Family, who is to look that there be such prayers, it being as much his part thus to provide for the souls of his children and servants, as to provide food for their bodies. Therefore there is none, even the meanest householder, but ought to take this care: If either himself, or any of his Family can read, he may use some prayers out of some good book, if it be the service book of the Church, he makes a good choice; if they cannot read, it will then be necessary they should be taught without book some form of prayer, which they may use in the Family, for which purpose again some of the prayers of the Church will be very fit, as being most easy for their memories by reason of their shortness, and yet containing a great deal of matter. But what choice soever they make of Prayers, let them be sure to have some, and let no man that professes himself a Christian, keep so heathenish a Family, as not to see God be daily worshipped in it. But when the Master of a Family hath done his duty in this providing, it is the duty of every member of it to make use of that provision, by being constant, and diligent at those Family-Prayers.

13. Private or secret Prayer is that which is used by a man alone, a part from all others, wherein we are to be more particular, according to our peculiar needs, then in public it is fit to be. And this of private prayer, is a duty, which will not be excused by the performance of the other of public. They are both required, and one must not be taken in exchange for the other. And whoever is diligent in public prayers, and yet negligent in private, it is much to be feared, he rather seeks to approve himself to men, then to God, contrary to the command of our Savior, Mat. 6. Who enjoins this private prayer, this praying to our Father in secret, from whom alone we are to expect our reward, and not from the vain praises of men.

14. Now this duty of Prayer is to be often performed, by none seldomer then evening and morning, it being most necessary that we should thus begin, and end all our works with God, and that not only in respect of the duty we owe him, but also in respect of ourselves, who can never be either prosperous, or safe, but by committing ourselves to him; and therefore should tremble to venture on the perils either of day or night, without his safeguard. How much oftener this duty is to be performed, must be judged according to the business, or leisure men have, where by business, I mean not such business as men unprofitably make to themselves, but the necessary business of a man's calling, which with some will not afford them much time for set, and solemn Prayer. But even these men may often in a day lift up their hearts to God in some short Prayers, even whilst they are at their work. As for those that have more leisure, they are in all reason to bestow more time upon this duty. And let no man that can find time to bestow upon his vanities, nay perhaps his sins, say he wants leisure for prayer, but let him now endeavor to redeem, what he hath so misspent, by employing more of that leisure in this duty for the future. And surely if we did but rightly weigh, how much it is our own advantage, to perform this duty, we should think it wisdom to be as frequent as we are ordinarily solemn in it.

15. For first it is a great honor for us poor woe•mes of the earth to be allowed to speak so freely to the great Majesty of heaven; if a King should but vouchsafe to let one of his meanest subjects talk familiarly, and freely with him, it would be looked on as a huge honor, that man how despisable soever he were before, would then be the envy of all his neighbors; and there is little question, he would be willing to take all opportunities of receiving so great a grace. But alas! this is nothing to the honor is offered us, who are allowed nay, invited to speak to, and converse with the King of Kings, and therefore how forward should we in all reason be to it.

16. Secondly, it is a great benefit, even the greatest that can be imagined, for prayer is the instrument of fetching down all good things to us, whether spiritual, or temporal, no prayer, that is qualified as it ought to be, but is sure to bring down a blessing according to that of the wise man, Eccl. 35. 17. The Prayer of the humble pierceth the clouds, and will not turn away, till the highest regard it. You would think him a happy man, that had one certain means of helping him to what ever he wanted, though it were to cost him much pains, and labor, now this happy man thou mayst be if thou wilt. Prayer is the never-failing means of bringing thee, if not all that thou thinkest thou wantest, yet all that indeed thou dost, that is, all that God sees fit for thee. And therefore be there never so much weariness to thy flesh in the duty, yet considering in what continual want thou standest for something or other from God, it is madness to let that uneasiness dishearten thee, and keep thee from this so sure means of supplying thy wants.

17. But in the third place this duty is in itself so far from being uneasy, that it is very pleasant. God is the fountain of happiness, and at his right hand there are pleasures for evermore. Psal. 16. 11. And therefore the nearer we draw to him▪ the happier we must needs be, the very joys of heaven arising from our nearness to God. Now in this life we have no way of drawing so near to him, as by this of Prayer, and therefore surely it is that, which in itself is apt to afford abundance of delight and pleasure, if it seem otherwise to us, it is from some distemper of our own hearts, which like a sick palate cannot relish the most pleasant meat. Prayer is a pleasant duty, but it is withal a spiritual one; and therefore if thy heart be carnal, if that be set either on the contrary pleasures of the flesh, or dross of the world, no marvel then, if thou taste no pleasantness in it; if like the Israelites thou despise Manna, whilst thou longest after the flesh pots of Egypt. Therefore if thou find a weariness in this duty, suspect thyself, purge, and refine thy heart from the love of all sin, and endeavor to put it into a heavenly and spiritual trance, and then thou wilt find this no unpleasant exercise, but full of delight and satisfaction. In the mean time complain not of the hardness of the duty, but of the untowardness of thy own heart.

18. But there may also be another reason of its seeming unpleasant to us, and that is want of use. You know there are many things, which seem uneasy at the first trial, which yet after we are accustomed to them, seem very delightful, and if this by thy case, then thou knowest a ready cure, viz: to use it oftener, and so this consideration naturally inforces the exhortation of being frequent in this duty.

19. But we are not only to consider how often, but how well we perform it. Now to do it well, we are to respect, first the matter of our Prayers, to look that we ask nothing that is unlawful, as revenge upon our enemies, or the like; secondly the manner; and that must be first in faith, we must believe, that if we ask as we ought, God will either give us the thing we ask for, or else something which he sees better for us. And then secondly in humility we must acknowledge ourselves utterly unworthy of any of those good things we beg for, and therefore sue for them only for Christ's sake; thirdly with attention, we must mind what we are about, and not suffer ourselves to be carried away to the thought of other things. I told you at the first, that Prayer was the business of the soul, but if our minds be wandering, it is the work only of the tongue and lips, which makes it in God's account no better then vain babbling, and so will never bring a blessing on us. Nay, as Jacob said to his mother, Gen. 27. 12. It will be more likely to bring a curse on us then a blessing, for it is a profaning one of the most solemn parts of God's service, it is a piece of Hypocrisy, the drawing near to him with our lip, when our hearts are far from him, and a great slighting and despising that dreadful Majesty we come before: And as to ourselves it is a most ridiculous folly, that we who come to God upon such weighty errands, as are all the concernments of our souls and bodies, should in the midst forget our business, and pursue every the lightest thing that either our own vain fancies, or the Devil, whose business it is here to hinder us, can offer to us. It is just as if a malefactor, that comes to sue for his life to the King, should in the midst of his supplication happen to espy a butterfly, and then should leave his suit, & run a chace after that butterfly: Would you not think it pity, a pardon should be cast away upon so wretchless a creature. And sure it will be as unreasonable to expect that God should attend & grant those suits of ours, which we do not at all consider ourselves.

20. This wandering in Prayer is a thing we are much concerned to arm ourselves against, it being that to which we are naturally wonderful prone. To that end it will be necessary first to possess our hearts at our coming to Prayers with the greatness of that Majesty we are to approach, that so we may dread to be vain and trifling in his presence. Secondly, We are to consider the great concernment of the things we are to ask, some whereof are such, that if we should not be heard, we were of all creatures the most miserable, & yet this wandering is the way to keep us from being heard. Thirdly, We are to beg God's aid in this particular: And therefore when thou settest to Prayer, let thy first petition be for this grace of attention.

21. Lastly, Be as watchful as is possible over thy heart, in time of prayer, to keep out all wandering thoughts, or if any have gotten in, let them not find entertainment, but as soon as ever thou discernest them, suffer them not to abide one moment, but cast them out with indignation, and beg God's pardon for them. And if thou dost thus sincerely, and diligently strive against them, either God will enable thee in some measure to overcome them, or he will in his mercy pardon thee what thou canst not prevent. But if it be through thy own negligence, thou art to expect neither, so long as that negligence continues.

22. In the fourth place we must look our Prayers be with zeal and earnestness, it is not enough that we so far attend them, as barely to know what it is we say, but we must put forth all the affection and devotion of our souls, and that according to the several parts of Prayer before mentioned. It is not the cold faint request, that will ever obtain from God. We see it will not from ourselves; for if a beggar should ask relief from us, and do it in such a scornful manner, that he seemed indifferent; whether he had it or no, we should think he had either little want or great pride, and so have no heart to give him. Now surely the things we ask from God, are so much above the rule of an ordinary alms, that we can never expect they should be given to slight and heartless petitions. No more in like manner will our Sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving ever be accepted by him, if it be not offered from a heart truly affected with the sense of his mercies; it's but a kind of formal complementing, which will never be approved by him who requires the heart, and not the lips only. And the like may be said of all the other parts of Prayer. Therefore be careful when thou drawest nigh to God in Prayer, to raise up thy soul to the highest pitch of zeal and earnestness thou art able. And because of thyself alone thou art not able to do anything, beseech God that he will inflame thy heart with this heavenly fire of devotion, and when thou hast obtained it, beware that thou neither quench it by any willful sin, nor let it go out again for want of stirring it up, and employing it.

23. Fifthly, we must Pray with purity, I mean we must purge our hearts from all affections to sin. This is surely the meaning of the Apostle, 1 Tim. 2. 8. When he commands men to lift up holy hands in Prayer, and he there instances in one special sort of sin, wrath and doubting, whereby doubting is meant those unkind disputes, and contentions which are so common amongst men. And surely he that cherishes that, or any other sin in his heart, can never lift up those holy hands, which are required in this duty. And then sure his prayers, be they never so many, or earnest, will little avail him. The Psalmist will tell him, he shall not be heard, Psal. 66. 18. If I regard iniquity in my heart, the Lord will not hear me. Nay Solomon will tell him yet worse, that his prayers are not only vain, but abominable, Pro. 15. 8. The sacrifice of the wicked is an abomination to the Lord. And thus to have our prayers turned into sin, is one of the heaviest things can befall any man; we see it is set down in that sad Catalogue of curses, Psal. 109. 7. Therefore let us not be so cruel to ourselves, as to pull it upon our own heads, which we certainly do, if we offer up prayers from an impure heart.

24. In the last place we must direct our prayers to right ends, And that either in the respect of the prayer itself, or the things we pray for; First, we must pray, not to gain the praise of devotion amongst men like those hypocrites Mat. 6. 5. Nor yet only for company, or fashion sake, to do as other do; But we must do it first as an act of worship to God; Secondly, as an acknowledgment, that he is that great spring, from whence alone we expect all good things; And thirdly, to gain a supply of our own, or others needs. Then in respect of the things prayed for, we must be sure to have no ill aims upon them, we must not ask, that we may consume it upon our lusts, Ia. 4. 3. as those do, who pray for wealth, that they may live in riot, and excess; and for power, that they may be able to mischief their enemies, and the like But our end in all must be God's glory first, and next that our own, and others Salvation, and all other things must be taken in, only as they tend to those, which they can never do, if we abuse them to sin. I have now done with that first part of worship, that of the Soul.

25. The other is that of the body, and that is nothing else, but such humble, and reverent gestures in our approaches to God, as may both express the inward reverence of our Souls, and may also pay him some tribute from our very bodies, with which the Apostle commands us to glorify God, as well as with our Souls; and good reason, since he hath created, and redeemed the one, as well as the other, whensoever therefore thou offerest thy prayers unto God, let it be with all lowliness as well of body, as of mind, according to that of the Psalmist, Psal. 95. 6. O come let us worship, let us fall down and kneel before the Lord our maker.

26. The ninth duty to God, is REPENTANCE. That this is a duty to God we are taught by the Apostle, Acts 20. 21. where speaking of repentance, he stiles it repentance towards God. And there is good reason this should be a duty to him, since there is no sin we commit, but is either mediately, or immediately, against him. For though there be sins both against ourselves, and our neighbors, yet they being forbidden by God, they are also breaches of his Commandments, and so sins against him.

This repentance is, in short, nothing but a turning fr•m sin to God, the casting off all our former evils, and instead thereof, constantly practicing all those Christian duties, which God requireth of us. And this is so necessary a duty, that without it we certainly perish, we have Christ's word for it, Luke 13. 5. Except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish.

27. The directions for performing the several parts of this duty have been already given in the preparation to the Lord's Supper, and thither I refer the reader. Only I shall here mind him, that it is to be looked upon as a duty to be practiced only at the time of receiving the Sacrament. For this being the only remedy against the poison of sin, we must renew it as often as we repeat our sins, that is daily. I mean we must every day repent of the sins of that day, for what Christ saith of other evils, is true also of this, sufficient to the day is the evil thereof; we have sins enough of each day to exercise a daily repentance, and therefore every man must thus daily call himself to account.

28. But as it is in accounts, they who constantly set down their daily expenses, have yet some set time of casting up the whole sum; as at the end of the week or month; so should it also be here, we should set aside some time to humble ourselves solemnly before God for the sins, not of that day only, but of our whole lives. And the frequenter these times are, the better. For the oftener we thus cast up our accounts with God, and see vast debts we are run in to him, the more humbly shall we think of ourselves, and the more shall thirst after his mercy, which two are the special things that must qualify us for his pardon. He therefore that can assign himself one day in the week for this purpose, will take a thriving course for his Soul. Or if any man's state of life be so busy, as not to afford him to do it so often, let him yet come as near to that frequency, as is possible for him, remembering always, that none of his worldly employments can bring him in near so gainful a return as this spiritual one will do, and therefore it is very ill husbandry to pursue them, to the neglect of this.

29. Besides these constant times, there are likewise occasion all times for the performance of this duty, such especially are the times of calamity, and affliction, for when any such befalls us, we are to look on it as a message sent from Heaven, to call us to this duty, and therefore must never neglect it, when we are thus summoned to it, lest we be of the number of them, who despise the chastisements of the Lord, Heb. 12. 5.

30. There is yet another time of repentance, which in the practice of men hath gotten away the custom from all those, and that is the time of death, which, it is true, is a time very fit to renew our repentance, but sure not proper to begin it, and it is a most desperate madness for men to defer it till then. For to say the midst of it, it is the venturing our Souls upon such miserable uncertainties, as no wise man would trust with anything of the least value.

For first, I would ask any man, that means to repent at his death, how he knows he shall have an hours time for it? do we not daily see men snatched away in a moment? and who can tell that it shall not be his own case? But secondly, suppose he have a more leisurely death, that some disease give him warning of its approach, yet perhaps he will not understand that warning, but will still flatter himself, as very often sick people do, with hopes of life to the last: and so his death may be sudden to him, though it come by never so slow degrees. But again thirdly, if he do discern his danger, yet how is he sure he shall then be able to repent? Repentance is a grace of God, not at our own command, and it is just and usual with God, when men have a long time refused, and rejected that grace, resisted all his calls, and invitations to conversion and amendment, to give them over at last to the hardness of their own hearts, and not to afford them anymore of that grace they have so despised. Yet suppose in the fourth place, That God in his infinite patience should still continue the offer of that grace to thee, yet thou that hast resisted, it may be thirty, or forty or fifty years together, how knowest thou, that thou shalt put off that habit of resistance upon a sudden, and make use of the grace afforded? It is sure, thou hast many more advantages towards the doing it now than thou wilt have then.

31. For the first, The longer sin hath kept possession of the heart, the harder it will be to drive it out. It is true, if repentance were nothing, but a present ceasing from the acts of sin, the death-bed were fittest for it, for then we are disabled from committing most sins, but I have formerly shown you, repentance contains much more than so, there must be in it a sincere hatred of sin and love of God. Now how unlikely is it, that he which hath all his life loved sin, cherished it in his bosom, & on the contrary abhorred God and goodness, should in an instant quite change his affections, hate that sin he loved, and love God, and goodness, which before he utterly hated?

32. And secondly, The bodily pains, that attend a death-bed, will distract thee, and make thee unable to attend the work of repentance, which is a business of such weight, and difficulty, as will employ all our powers, even when they are at the freshet.

33. Consider those disadvantages thou must then struggle with, and then tell me what hope there is, thou shalt then do that, which now upon much easier terms thou wilt not. But in the fifth place, there is a danger behind, beyond all these, and that is, that th•repentance which death drives a man to, will not be a true repentance, for in such a case it is plain, it is only the fear of hell puts him on it, which though it may be a good beginning, where there is time after to perfect it, yet where it goes alone, it can never avail for Salvation. Now that death-bed repentances are often only of this sort, is too likely, when it is observed, that many men who have seemed to repent, when they have thought death approaching, have yet, after it hath pleased God to restore them to health, been as wicked (perhaps worse) as ever they were before; Which shows plainly, that there was no real change in them, and then surely had such a man died, in that seeming repentance, God, who tries the heart, would not have accepted it, which he saw was unsincere. When all these dangers are laid together, it will surely appear a most disperate adventure for any man to trust to a death-bed repentance. Nor is it ever the less for that example of the penitent thief, Luc. 23. 43. which is by many so much depended on.

For it is sure, his case and ours differ widely, he had never heard of Christ before, and so more could not be expected of him then to embrace him as soon as he was tendered to him; But we have had him offered, nay pressed upon us from our cradles and yet have rejected. But if there were not this difference, it is but a faint hope can be raised only from a single example, and another we find not in the whole Bible. The Israelites we read were fed with Manna from Heaven, but would you not think him stark mad, that should out of expectation of the like, neglect to provide himself any food; Yet it is full as reasonable to depend upon this example as the other. I conclude all in the words of the wiseman, Eccl. 12. 1. Remember thy Creator in the days of thy youth before the evil days come, &c.

34. To this duty of repentance, fasting is very proper to be annexed. The Scripture usually joins them together, among the Jews the great day of atonement was to be kept with fasting, as you may see by comparing Levite. 16. 31. with Isa. 58. 5. and this by God's especial appointment. And in the Prophets, when the people are called on to repent, and humble themselves, they are also called on to fast. Thus it is Joel 2. 12. Therefore now thus saith the Lord, turn ye unto me with all your hearts, with fasting, and with weeping, &c. Yea, so proper hath fasting been accounted to humiliation, that we see even wicked Ahab would not omit it in his, 2 Kings 21. 27. Nor the Heathen Ninevites in theirs, Jonah 3. 5. Nor is it less fit, or less acceptable since Christ, then it was before him. For we see he supposes it as a duty sometimes to be performed, when he gives directions to avoid vain-glory in it. Mat. 6. 6. and also assures us, that if it be performed, as it ought, not to please men, but God, it will surely be rewarded by him. And accordingly we find it practiced by the Saints: Anna Luk. 2. 37. Served God with fastings and prayers; where it is observable, that it is reckoned as a service of God, fit to be joined with prayers. And the Christians of the first times were generally very frequent in the practice of it. Now though fasting be especially proper to a time of humiliation, yet is it not so restrained to it, but it may be seasonable, whensoever we have any extraordinary thing to request from God. Thus when Esther was to endeavor the deliverance of her people from destruction, she & all the Jews kept a solemn fast, Esther 4. 16. and thus when Paul and Barnabas were to be ordained Apostles, there was fasting joined to prayer, Acts 13. 3. And so it will be very fit for us, whensoever we have need of any extraordinary directions, or assistance from God whether concerning our temporal or spiritual concerns, thus to quicken our prayers by fasting. But above all occasions, this of humiliation seems most to require it, for besides the advantage of kindling our zeal, which is never more necessary, then when we beg for pardon of sins, fasting carries in it somewhat of revenge, which is reckoned as a special part of repentance, 2 Cor. 7. 11. For by denying our bodies the refreshment of our ordinary food, we do inflict somewhat of punishment upon ourselves, for our former excesses, or whatever other sins we at that time accuse ourselves of; which is a proper effect of that indignation which every sinner ought to have against himself. And truly he that is so tender of himself, that he can never find in his heart so much as to miss a meal, by way of punishment for his faults, shows he is not much fallen out with himself, for committing them, and so wants that indignation, which the Apostle in the forenamed text mentions, as a part of true repentance.

35. There is no doubt, but such Holy revenges upon ourselves for sins are very acceptable to God, yet we must not think that either those, or anything else we can do, can make satisfaction for our offenses, for that nothing but the blood of Christ can do. And therefore on that, and not on any of our performances we must depend for pardon. Yet since that blood shall never be applied to any but penitent sinners, we are as much concerned to bring forth all the fruits of repentance, as if our hopes depended on them only.

36. How often this duty of fasting is to be performed, we have no direction in Scripture. That must be allotted by men's own piety, according as their health, or other considerations will allow. But as it is in humiliation, the frequenter returns we have of set times for it, the better; so is it likewise in fasting, the ofner, the better, so it be not hurtful either to our healths, or to some other duty required of us. Nay perhaps fasting may help some men to more of those times for humiliation, then they would otherwise gain. For perhaps there are some, who cannot, without a manifest hindrance to their calling, allow a whole day to that work, yet such a one may at least afford that time, he would otherwise spend in eating; And so fasting will be doubly useful towards such a man's humiliation, both by helping him in the duty, and gaining him time for it.

37. I have now gone through the first branch of our duty to God, to wit the acknowledging him for our God. The second is the having no other. Of which I need say little, as it is a forbidding of that grosser sort of heathiness Idolatry, the worshipping of Idols, which though it were once common in the world, yet is now so rare, that it is not likely any that shall read this, will be concerned in it. Only I must say, that to pay divine worship to any creature, be it Saint or Angel, yea or the Image of Christ himself, is a transgression against this second branch of our duty to God, it being the imparting that to a creature which is due only to God, and therefore is strictly to be abstained from.

38. But there is another sort of Idolatry, of which we are generally guilty, and that is when we pay those affections of love, fear, trust, and the like, to any creature in a higher degree than we do to God. For that is the setting up that thing, whatsoever it is, for our God. And this inward kind of Idolatry is that, which provokes God to jealousy, as well as the outward of worshipping an Idol. I might enlarge much upon this, but because some severals of it have been touched on in the former discourse, I suppose it needless. And therefore shall now proceed to the second head of duty, that to ourselves.

PARTITION. VI.

Of DUTIES to our SELVES, Of Sobriety other Humility; the great Sin of PRIDE, the Danger, the Folly of this Sin. Of VAIN GLORY, the Danger, Folly, The Means to Prevent it. Of MEEKNES, the Means to obtain it, &c.

§. 1. THis duty to ourselves, is by St. Paul in the forementioned text, Tit. 2• 12. summed up in this one word, soberly. Now by soberly is meant our keeping within those due bounds which God hath set us. My business will therefore be to tell you, what are the particulars of this sobriety. And that first in respect of the soul, secondly in respect of the body: the sobriety of the soul stands in a right governing its passions, and affections; and to that there are many virtues required. I shall give you the particulars of them.

2 The first of them is humility, which may well have the prime place, not only in respect of the excellency of the virtue, but also of its usefulness towards the obtaining of all the rest. This being the founda<sup>o</sup>ion, on which all others must be built. And he that hopes to gain them without this, will prove but like that foolish builder Christ speaks of, Luke 6. 49. Who built his house on the sand. Of the humility towards God I have already spoken, and shown the necessity of it, I am now to speak of humility, as it concerns ourselves, which will be found no less necessary, then the former.

3. This humility is of two sorts, the first is the having a mean and low opinion of ourselves, the second is the being content that others should have so of us. The first of these is contrary to pride, the other to vain glory. And that both these are absolutely necessary to Christians, I am now to show you which will, I conceive, best be done by laying before you first the sin, secondly the danger, and thirdly the folly of the contrary vices.

4. And first for pride; the sin of it is so great, that it cast the Angels out of heaven, and therefore if we may judge of sin by the punishment, it was not only the first, but the greatest sin that ever the Devil himself hath been guilty of: But we need no better proof of the heinousness of it, then the extreme hatefulness of it to God, which besides that instance of his punishing the Devil, we may frequently find in the Scriptures, Prov. 16. 5. Everyone that is proud in heart, is an abomination to the Lord. And again, Chap. 6. 16. Where there is mention of several things the Lord hates, a proud look is set as the first of them: So Jam. 4. 7. God resisteth the proud; and divers other texts there are to the same purpose, which show the great hatred God bears to this sin of pride Now since it is certain, God who is all goodness hates nothing, but as it is evil, it must needs follow, that where God hates in so great a degree, there must be a great degree of evil.

5. But secondly, pride is not only very sinful, but very dangerous, and that first in respect of drawing us to our sins, secondly of betraying us to punishments. First, pride draws us to other sins, wherein it shows itself indeed to be the direct contrary to humility, for as that is the root of all vertu, so is this of all vice. For he that is proud, sets himself up as his own God, and so can never submit himself to any other rules or Laws, then what he makes to himself. The ungodly, says the Psalmist, is so proud that he careth not for God, Psal. 10. 4. Where you see it is his pride, that makes him despise God. And when a man is once come to that, he is prepared for the commission of all sins. I might instance in a multitude of particular sins, that naturally flow from this of pride, as first anger, which the wise man sets, as the effect of pride, Pro. 21. 24. calling it proud wrath; secondly, strife and contention, which he again notes to be the offspring of pride, Pro. 13. 10. Only by pride cometh contention. And both these are indeed most natural effects of pride. For he that thinks very highly of himself, expects much submission, and observance from others, and therefore cannot but rage and quarrel, whenever he thinks it not sufficiently paid. It would be infinite to mention all the fruits of this bitter root, I shall name but one more, and that is, that pride not only betrays us to many sins, but also makes them incurable in us, for it hinders the working of all remedies.

6. Those remedies must either come from God or man; if from God, they must be either in the way of meekness and greatness, or else of sharpness and punishment. Now if God by his goodness essay to lead a proud man to repentance, he quite mistakes God's meaning, and thinks all the mercies he receives, are but the reward of his own desert, and so long 'tis sure he will never think he needs repentance. But if on the other side, God's use him more sharply, and lay afflictions, and punishments upon him, those in a proud heart work nothing but murmurings and hatings of God, as if he did him injury in those punishments. As for the remedies that can be used by man, they again must be either by way of correcttion, or exhortation; correcttion from man will sure never work more on a proud heart, then those from God; for he that can think God unjust in them, will much rather believe it of man. And exhortations will do as little. For let a proud man be admonished though never so mildly and lovingly, he looks on it as a disgrace. And therefore instead of confessing, or amending the fault, he falls to reproaching his reprover, as an over-busy, or censorious person, and for that greatest and most precious act of kindness, looks on him as his enemy. And now one that thus stubbornly resists all means of cure, must be included in a most dangerous estate.

7. But besides this danger of sin, I told you there was another, that of punishment; and of this there will need little proof, when it is considered, that God is the proud man's professed enemy; that he hates and resists him, as appeared in the texts forecited: And then there can be little doubt, that he which hath so mighty an adversary shall be sure to smart for it; Yet besides this general ground of conclusion, it may not be a miss to mention some of those texts, which particularly threaten this sin, as Pro. 16. 18. Pride goeth before destruction, and an haughty spirit before a fall: Again, Pro. 16. 5. Everyone that is proud in heart is an abomination to the Lord, though hand join in hand, yet they shall not be unpunished. The decree it seems is unalterable, and whatever endeavors are used to preserve the proud man, they are but vain, for he shall not go unpunished. And this is very remarkable in the story of Nebuchadnezzar, Dan. 4. Who though a King, the greatest in the world, yet for his pride, was driven from among men, to dwell and feed with beasts. And it is most frequently seen, that this sin meets with very extraordinary judgments even in this life. But if it should not, let not the proud man think that he hath escaped God's vengeance, for it is sure, there will be a most sad reckoning in the next; for if God spared not the Angels for this sin, but cast them into hell, let no man hope to speed better.

8. In the third place, I am to show you the great folly of this sin, and to do that, it will be necessary to consider the several things, whereof men use to be proud; they are of three sorts, either those which we call the goods of nature, or the goods of fortune, or the goods of grace.

9. By the goods of nature, I mean beauty, strength, wit, and the like, and the being proud of any of these is a huge folly. For first we are very apt to mistake, and think ourselves hand some or witty, when we are not, and then there cannot be a more ridiculous folly, then to be proud of what we have not, and such everyone esteems it in another man, though he never supposes it his own case, and so never discerns it in himself. And therefore there is nothing more despiseable amongst all men, then a proud fool, yet no man that entertains high opinions of his own wit, but is in danger to be thus deceived, a man's own judgment of himself being of all others the least to be trusted. But Secondly, suppose we be not out in judging, yet what is there in any of these natural endowments, which is worth the being proud. There being scarce any of them, which some creature or other hath not in a greater degree than man. How much does the whiteness of the Lily, and the redness of the Rose exceed the white, and red of the fairest face? what a multitude of creatures is there, that far surpass man in strength and sweetness? And divers others there are which as far as concerns any useful end of theirs, act much more wisely than most of us; and are therefore oftentimes in Scripture proposed to us by way of Example. It is therefore surely great unreasonableness for us to think highly of ourselves, for such things as are common to us with beasts and plants. But thirdly, if they were as excellent as we fancy them, yet they are not at all durable, they are impaired and lost by sundry means; a phrensy will destroy the rarest wit, a sickness decay the freshest beauty, the greatest strength, or however old age will be sure to do all. And therefore to be proud of them is again a folly in this respect. But lastly, whatever they are, we gave them not to ourselves. No man can think he did anything towards the procuring his natural beauty or wit, and so can with no reason value himself for them.

10 In the second place, the folly is as great to be proud of the goods of fortune; by them I mean wealth and honor, and the like; for it is sure, they add nothing of true worth to the man, somewhat of outward pomp, and bravery they may help him to, but that makes no change in the person. You may load an Ass with money, or deck him with rich trappings, yet still you will not make him a whit the nobler kind of beast by either of them. Then secondly, these are things we have no hold of, they vanish many times, ere we are aware, he that is rich today, may be poor tomorrow, and then will be the less pitied by all in his poverty, the prouder he was when he was rich. Thirdly, We have them all, but as Stewards, to lay out for our Masters use, and therefore should rather think how to make our accounts, than pride ourselves in our receipts. Lastly, Whatever of these we have, they, as well as the former, are not owing to ourselves. But if they be lawfully gotten, we owe them only to God, whose blessing it is, that maketh rich, Pro. 10. 22. If unlawfully, we have them upon such terms, that we have very little reason to brag of them. And thus you see in these several respects, the folly of this second sort of pride.

11. The third is that of the goods of grace; that is any virtue a man hath. And here I cannot say, but the things are very valuable, they being infinitely more precious, than all the world, yet nevertheless this is of all the rest the highest folly. And that not only in the foregoing respect, that we help not ourselves to it, grace being above all things most immediately God's Work in us, but especially in this, that the being proud of grace, is the sure way to loose it. God, who gives grace to the humble, will take it from the proud. For if, as we see in the parable, Mat. 25. 28. the talent was taken from him who had only put it to no use at all, how shall he hope to have it continued to him, that hath put it to so ill, that instead of trading with it for God, hath trafficked with it for Satan? And as he will loose the grace for the future, so he will loose all reward of it for the time past. For let a man have done never so many good acts, yet if he be proud of them, that pride shall be charged on him to his destruction, but the good shall never be remembered to his reward. And this proves it to be a most wretched folly to be proud of grace. It is like that of children, that pull those things in pieces, they are most fond of, but yet much worse than that of theirs, for we not only loose the thing (and that the most precious that can be imagined) but we must also be eternally punished for doing so, there being nothing that shall be so sadly reckoned for in the next world, as the abuse of grace, and certainly there can be no greater abuse of it, then to make it serve for an end so directly contrary to that for which it was given, it being given to make us humble, not proud, to magnify God, not ourselves.

12. Having shown you thus much of this sin, I suppose it will appear very necessary to be eschewed, to which purpose it will first be useful to consider, what hath been already said concerning it, and that so seriously, as may work in thee▪ not some slight dislike, but a deep, and irreconcilable hatred of the sin; secondly to be very watchful over thine own heart, that it cherish not any beginnings of it; never suffer it to feed on the fancy of thy own worth, but when ever any such thought arises, beat it down immediately with the remembrance of some of thy follies or sins, and so make this very motion of pride an occasion of humility. Thirdly, Never to compare thyself with those thou thinkest more foolish or wicked then thyself, that so thou mayest like the Pharisee Luk. 16. 11. extol thyself, for being better, but if thou wilt compare, do it with the Wise, and Godly, and then thou wilt find thou comest so far short, as may help to pull down thy high esteem of thyself. Lastly, To be very earnest in Prayer, that God would root out all degrees of this sin in thee, and make thee one of those poor in Spirit, Mat. 5. 3. to whom the blessing, even of Heaven itself, is promised.

13. The second contrary to humility I told you was vain glory. That is a great thirst after the praise of men. And first, that this is a sin, I need prove no otherwise, then by the words of our Savior, Jo. 5. 44. How can ye believe, that receive honor one of another? Where it appears, that it is not only a sin, but such a one, as hinders the receiving of Christ into the heart, for so believing there signifies. This then in the second place shows you likewise the great dangerousness of this sin, for if it be that, which keeps Christ out of the heart, it is sure it brings infinite danger, since all our safety, all our hope of escaping the wrath to come, stands in receiving him? But besides the authority of this text, common experience shows, that where ever this sin hath possession, it endangers men to fall into any other. For he that so considers the praise of men, that he must at no hand part with it, when ever the greatest sins come to be in fashion, and credit (as God knows many are now a days) he will be sure to commit them, rather then run the disgrace of being too singular, and precise; I doubt there are many consciences can witness the truth of this, so that I need say no more to prove the danger of this sin.

14. The third thing I am to show, is the folly of it, And that will appear first by considering, what it is we thus hunt after, nothing but a little air, a blast, the breath of men, it brings us in nothing of real advantage: for I am made never the wiser, nor the better, for a man's saying I am wise, and good. Besides if I am commended, it must be either before my face, or behind my back, if the former, it is very often flattery, and so the greatest abuse that can be offered, and then I must be very much a fool, to be pleased with it. But if it be behind my back, I have not then so much as the pleasure of knowing it, and therefore it is a strange folly thus to pursue, what is so utterly gainless. But secondly, It is not only gainless, but painful, and uneasy also. He that eagerly seeks Prayer, is not at all Master of himself, but must suit all his actions to that end, and instead of doing what his own reason and conscience (nay perhaps his worldly conveniency) directs him to, he must take care to do what will bring him in commendations, and so enslaves himself to everyone that hath but a tongue to commend him. Nay there is yet a further uneasiness in it, and that is, when such a man fails of his aim, when he misses the praise, and perhaps meets with the contrary reproach, (which is no man's lot more often than the vain glorious, nothing making a man more despised) then what disturbances and disquiets, and even tortures of mind is he under? A lively instance of this you have in Achitophel, 2 Sam. 17. 23. who had so much of this upon Absolom's despising his counsel, that he chose to rid himself of it, by hanging himself. And sure this painfulness that thus attends this sin, is sufficient proof of the folly of it. Yet this is not all, it is yet further very hurtful: For if this vain glory be concerning any good, or Christian action, it destroys all the fruit of it; he that prays or gives alms to be seen of men, Mat. 6. 2. must take that as his reward, Verily I say unto you they have their reward, they must expect none from God, but the portion of those hypocrites that love the the praise of men more than the praise of God. And this is a miserable folly to make such an exchange. It is like the dog in the fable, who seeing in the water the shadow of that meat he held in his mouth, caught at the shadow, & so let go meat. Such dogs, such unreasonable creatures are we, when we thus let go the eternal rewards of Heaven, to catch at a few good words of men. And yet we do not only loose those eternal joys, but procure to ourselves the contrary eternal mercies, which is sure the highest pitch of folly and madness. But if the vain glory be not concerning any virtuous action, but only some indifferent thing, yet even there also it is very hurtful; for vain glory is a sin, that wheresoever it is placed, endangers our eternal estate, which is the greatest of all mischiefs. And even for the present it is observable, that of all other sins, it stands the most in its own light, hinders itself of that very thing it pursues. For there are very few that thus hunt after praise, but they are discerned to do so, and that is sure to eclipse whatever praise worthy thing they do, and brings scorn upon them instead of reputation. And then certainly we may justly condemn this sin of folly, which is so ill a manager even of its own dedesigns.

15. You have seen how wretched a thing this vain glory is, in these several respects, the serious consideration whereof, may be one good means to subdue it, to which it will be necessary to add; first, a great watchfulness over thyself; Observe narrowly, whether in any Christian duty thou at all considerest the praise of men, or even in the most indifferent action, look whether thou have not too eager a desire of it; And if thou findest thyself inclined that way, have a very strict eye upon it, and where ever thou findest it stirring, check, and resist it; suffer it not to be the end of thy actions; But in all matters of Religion, let the duty be thy motive; In all indifferent things of common life, let reason direct thee; and though thou mayest so far consider in those things the opinion of men, as to observe the rules of common decency, yet never think any praise, that come in to thee from anything of that kind worth the contriving for; Secondly, Set up to thyself another aim, viz that of pleasing God; let that be thy inquiry when thou goest about anything, whether it be approved by him, and then thou wilt not be at leisure to consider what praise it will bring thee from men. And surely he that weighs of how much more moment it is to please God, who is able eternally to reward us, then men, whose applause can never do us any good, will surely think it reasonable, to make the former his only care. Thirdly, If at any time thou art praised, do not be much overjoyed with it, nor think a jot the better of thyself, but if it be virtue thou art praised for, remember it was God, that wrought it in thee, and give him the glory, never thinking any part of it belongs to thee; If it be some indifferent action, then remember that it cannot deserve praise, as having no goodness in it; But if it be a bad one (as amongst men such are sometimes likeliest to be commended) then it ought to set thee a trembling, instead of rejoicing, for then that woe of our Savior's belongs to thee, Luk. 6, 26. Woe unto you when men speak well of you, for so did their Fathers to the false Prophets, and there is not a greater sign of a hardened heart, then when men can make their sins the matter of their glory. In the last place let thy prayers assist in the fight with this corruption.

16. A second virtue is meekness, That is a calmness and quietness of spirit, contrary to the rages, and impatiences of anger. This virtue may be exercised either in respect of God, or our neighbor. That towards God I have already spoken of, under the head of humility, and that towards our neighbor I shall hereafter; All I have here to say of it, is, how it becomes a duty to ourselves; that it does, in respect of the great advantage we reap by it, which, in mere kindness to ourselves, we are to look after. And to prove that it brings us this great advantage, I need say no more, but that this meekness is that to which Christ hath pronounced a blessing, Mat. 5. 5. Blessed are the meek, and not only in the next world, but even in this too, they shall inherit the earth; Indeed none but th•meek person hath the true enjoyment of anything in the world, for the angry, and impatient are like such people, who we use to say, cannot enjoy the greatest prosperities; For let things be never so fair without, they will raise storms within their own breasts. And surely whoever •ath either in himself, or others observed the greatest uneasiness of this passion of anger, cannot choose but think meekness a a most pleasant thing.

17. Besides it is also a most honorable thing, for it is that whereby we resemble Christ, learn of me, saith he, for I am meek and lowly in heart, Mat. 11. 28. It is also that whereby we conquer ourselves, overcome our own unruly passions, which of all victories is the greatest, and most noble. Lastly, it is that which makes us behave ourselves like men, whereas anger gives us the fierceness and wildness of savage beasts. And accordingly the one is by all esteemed, and loved, whereas the other is hated and abhorred, every man shunning a man in rage as they would a furious beast.

18. Farther, yet meekness is the sobriety of the mind, whereas anger is the direct madness, it puts a man wholly out of his own power, and makes him do such things, as himself in his sober temper abhors; how many men have done those things in their rage, which they have repented all their lives after? and therefore surely as much as a man is more honorable then a beast, a sober man then a mad man, so much hath this virtue of meekness the advantage of honor above the contrary vice of anger.

19. Again, meekness makes any condition tolerable, and easy to be endured. He that meekly bears any suffering, takes off the edge of it, that it cannot wound him, whereas he that frets and rages at it; whets it, and makes it much sharper then it would be; Nay in some cases makes that so, which would not else be so at all; as particularly in the case of reproachful words, which in themselves can do us no harm, they neither hurt our bodies nor lessen our estate, the only mischief they can do us is to make us angry, and then our anger may do us many more; whereas he that meekly passes them by, is never the worse for them; nay the better, for he shall be rewarded by God for that patience. Much more might be said to recommend this virtue to us, in respect of our own present advantage, but I suppose this may suffice to persuade men to esteem of it. The harder matter will be to gain them to the practice of it, wherein men pretend I know not what difficulties of natural constitutions and the like; Yet sure there is no man of so Cholerick a temper; but if he did heartily set about it, would find it were not impossible in some good measure to subdue it: But then he must be diligent in using means to that end. Divers of these means there are I shall mention some few.

20 As first. The imprinting deep in our mind the loveliness, and benefits of meekness, together with the ugliness and mischiefs of anger. Secondly, To set before us the examples of Christ, who endured all reproaches, yea torments with perfect, patience that was lead as a sheep to the slaughter, Isaiah 33. 7. That when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, threatened not, 1 Pet. 2. 23. And if he the Lord of glory suffered thus meekly and unjustly from his own creatures, with what force can we ever complain of any injury done to us? Thirdly, To be very watchful to prevent the very first beginnings of anger, and to that purpose to mortify all inward peevishness, and frowardness of mind, which is a sin in itself, though it proceed no farther, but will also be sure, if it be cherished to break out into open effects of anger. Therefore whenever thou findest the least rising of it within thee, make as much haste to check it as thou wouldst to quench a fire in thy house, but be sure thou bring no fuel to it, by entertaining any thoughts, that may increase it. And at such a time especially, keep a most strick watch over thy tongue, that it break not out into any angry speeches, for that breath will fan the fire; not only in thine adversary, but thyself too; therefore though thy heart be hot within stifle the flame, and let it not break out, and the greater the temptation is▪ the more earnestly lift up thy heart to God, to assist thee to overcome it. Fourthly, Often remember, how great punishments sins have deserved, and then whether thy sufferings be from God or man, thou wilt acknowledge them to be far short of what is due to thee, and therefore wilt be ashamed to be impatient at them.

21. The third virtue is consideration, and this in a most special manner we own to our souls. For without it, we shall, as rash, unadvised people use to do; rush them into infinite perils. Now this consideration is either of our state, or of our actions. By our state I mean what our condition is to Godward, whether it be such that we may reasonably conclude ourselves in his favor. This it much concerns us to consider and examine, and that not by those easy rules men are apt to frame to themselves, as whether they believe that Christ died for their sins; that they are of the number of the elect; and shall certainly be saved, if these and the like were all that were required to put us into God's favor, none but some very melancholy person could ever be out of it, for we are apt enough generally to believe comfortably of ourselves. But the rules God hath given us in his word, are those by which we must be tried at the last day, and therefore are certainly the only safe ones, by which to try ourselves now.

And the sum of those are, that whosoever continues in any one willful sin is not in his favor, nor can if he so die, hope for any mercy at his hand.

22. Now it is highly necessary, we should consider what our condition is in this respect For since our life is nothing but a puff of breath in our nostrils, which may for ought we know be taken from us the next minuite, it nearly concerns us, to know how we are provided for another world, that so in case we want at present that oil in our lamps, wherewith we are to meet the Bride-groom, Mat. 25. 8. We may timely get it, and not for want of it be ever shut out like the foolish virgins, from his presence. The neglect of this consideration hath undon many souls, some by too easy a belief that they were in a good condition, without considering and trying themselves by the foregoing rule, but presuming either upon some slight outward performances, or upon such a false faith, as I even now described others by the wretched careless going on, without so much as asking themselves, what their condition is, but hope they shall do as well as their neighbors, and so never inquiring farther; which wretched carelessness will as certainly undo the spiritual, as the like would do the temporal estate; yet in that every man is wise enough to foresee, that a man that never takes any accounts of his estate to see whether he be worth something or nothing, will be sure to be a beggar in the end. But in this far weightier matter we can generally be thus improvident.

23. The second thing we are to consider, is our actions, and those either before, or after the doing of them. In the first place we are to consider before we act, and not to do any rashly or headily. But first to advise with our consciences, whether this be lawful to be done, for he that follows his own inclination, and does everything which that moves him to, shall be sure to fall into a multitude of sins. Therefore consider soberly and be assured of the lawfulness of the thing, before thou venture to do it. This advisedness is in all worldly things accounted so necessary a part of wisdom, that no man is accounted wise without it; A rash man we look upon as the next degree to a fool: And yet it is sure there is not so much need of looking about us in anything, as in what concerns our souls, and that not only in respect of the great value of them above all things else, but also in regard of the great danger they are in, as hath been shown more at large in the beginning of the treatise.

24 Secondly, We are to consider our actions, when they are past also, that is, we are to examine whether they have been such, as are allowable by the Laws of Christ, This is very necessary, whether they be good or bad; if they be good, the recalling them helpeth us to the comfort of a good conscience, and that comfort again encourageth us to go on in the like; and besides it stirs us up to thankfulness to God, by whose grace alone we were enabled to do them. But if they be bad, then it is especially necessary, that we thus examine them, for without this it is impossible we should ever come to amendment; for unless we observe them to have been amiss, we can never think it needful to amend: But shall still run on from one wickedness to another, which is the greatest curse any man can lie upon.

25. The oftener therefore we use this consideration, the better; for the less likely it is, that any of our sins shall escape our knowledge. It is much to be wisht, that every man should thus every night try the actions of the day, that so if he have done any things amiss, he may soon check himself for it, and settle his resolutions against it, and not let it grow on to a habit and course. And that he may also early beg God's pardon, which will the easier be had, the sooner it is asked, every delay of that being a great increase of the sin. And surely whoever means to take account of himself at all, will find this the easiest course, it being much easier to do it so, a little at a time, and while passages are fresh in his memory, than to take the account of a long time together. Now if it be considered, that every willful sin must have a particular repentance before it can be pardoned, we think men should tremble to sleep without that repentance, for what assurance hath any man that lies down in his bed, that he shall ever rise again; and then how dangerous is the condition of that man, that sleeps in an unrepented sin? The weighing of these several motives may be a means by God's blessing, to bring us to the practice of this duty of consideration in all the parts of it.

PARTITION. VII.

Of CONTENTEDNESS and the Contraries to it; Murmuring, Ambition, Covetousness, Envy, Helps to Contentedness, Of DUTIES which concern our BODIES Of CHASTITY, &c. Helps to it. Of TEMPERANCE▪ Rule of Temperance in EATING.

§. 1. THE fourth virtue is contentedness, and this surely is a duty we much owe to ourselves, it being that without which it is impossible to be happy. This contentedness is a well-pleas'dness with that condition, whatever it is that God hath placed us, not murmuring, and repining of our lot, but cheerfully well-coming whatsoever God sends. How great, and withal how pleasant a virtue this is, may appear by the contrariety it hath to several great and painful vices, so that where this is rooted in the heart▪ it subdues not only some such single sin, but ▪ cluster of them together.

2. And first it is contrary to all murmuring in▪ general, which is a sin most hateful to God, as may appear by his sharp punishments of it on the Israelites in the wilderness, as you may read in several places of the book of Exodus, and Numbers. And sure it is also very painful, and uneasy to a man's self, for if, as the Psalmist saith, it be a joyful and pleasant thing to be thankful, we may by the rule of contraries conclude, it is a sad and unpleasant thing to be murmuring; and I doubt not every man's own experience will confirm the truth of it.

3. Secondly, It is contrary to ambition, the ambitions man is always disliking his present condition, and that makes him so greedily to seek a higher, whereas he that is content with his own, lies quiet out of the road of his temptation. Now ambition is not only a great sin in itself, but it puts men upon many other; There is nothing so horrid, which a man that eagerly seeks greatness will stick at; lying, perjury, murder, or anything will do with him; if they seem to tend to his advancement. And the uneasiness of it is answerable to the sin. This none can doubt of, that considers what a multitude of fears and jealousies, cares and distractions there are that attend ambition in its progress, besides the great and public ruins that usually befall it in the end. And therefore sure contentedness is in this respect as well a happiness, as a virtue.

4. Thirdly, it is contrary to covetousness; this the Apostle witnesseth. Heb. 13. 5. Let your conversation be without covetousness, and be content with such things as ye have, where you see contentedness is set as the direct contrary to covetousness. But of this there needs no other proof, then common experience, for we see the covetous man never thinks he hath enough, and therefore can never be content, for no man can be said to be so, that thirsts after anything he hath not. Now that you may see how excellent, and necessary a virtue this is, that secures us against covetousness, it will not be amiss a little to consider the nature of that sin.

5. That it is a very great crime, is most certain, for it is contrary to the very foundation of all good life, I mean those three great duties to God, to ourselves, to our neighbor. First, It is so contrary to our duty to God, that Christ himself tells us Luk. 16 13. We cannot serve God and Mammon; he that sets his heart upon wealth, must necessarily take it off from God. And this we daily see in the covetous man's practice, he is so eager in the gaining of riches, that he hath no time or care to perform duty to God, let but a good bargain, or opportunity of gain come in his way, prayer and all duties of Religion must be neglected to attend it. Nay, when the committing the greatest sin against God may be likely either to get, or save him ought, his love of wealth quickly persuades him to commit it.

6. Secondly, It is contrary to the duty we owe ourselves, and that both in respect of our Souls, and bodies▪ The covetous man despises his Soul, sels that to eternal destruction for a little pelf; For so every man does, that by any unlawful means seeks to enrich himself; Nay though he do it not by unlawful means, yet if he have once set his heart upon wealth, he is that covetous person, of whom the Apostle hath pronounced, that he shall not enter into the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6. 10. Nor doth he only offend against his Soul, but against his body too. For he often denies that those necessary refreshments it wants, and for which his wealth (as far as it concerns himself) was given him. This is so constantly the custom of rich Misers, that I need not prove it to you.

7. In the third place. Covetousness is contrary to the duty we owe to our neighbors. And that in both the parts of it, Justice and Charity: he that loves money immoderately, will not care whom he cheats, and defrauds, so he may bring in gain to himself, and from hence spring those many tricks of deceit and cozenage, so common in the world. As for Charity, that is never to be hoped for from a covetous man, who dreads the lessening of his own heaps more than the starving of his poor Brother. You see how great a sin this is that contains under it so many others; so that we may well say of it, as the Apostle doth 1 Tim. 6. 10. The love of money is the root of all evil. And it is not much less uneasy, then wicked, for between the care of getting, and the fear of loosing, the covetous man enjoys no quiet hour. Therefore every man is deeply concerned, as the tenders his happiness, either in this world, or the next, to guard himself against this sin, which he can no way do▪ but by possessing his heart with this virtue of contentedness.

8. In the fourth place, it is contrary to envy, for he that is content with his own condition, hath no temptation to envy another's; How unchristian a sin this of envy is, shall hereafter be shown; At the present, I need say no more, but that it is also a very uneasy one, it frets and knawes the very heart of him that harbours it. But the worse this sin is, the more excellent still is this grace of contentedness, which frees us from it. I suppose I have said enough to make you think this a very lovely, and desirable Virtue. And sure it were not impossible to be gained by any, that would but observe these few directions.

9. First, To consider, that whatever our estate and condition in any respect be, it is that which is allotted us by God, and therefore is certainly the best for us, he being much better able to judge for us, than we for ourselves; and therefore to be displeas'd at it, is in effect to say, we are wiser than he. Secondly, Consider thoroughly the vanity of all worldly things, how very little there is in them, while we have them, and how uncertain we are to keep them, but above all, in how little stead they will stand us at the day of death or judgment, and then thou canst not think any of them much worth the desiring, and so wilt not be discontented for want of them. Thirdly, Suffer not thy fancy to run on things thou hast not: many have put themselves out of love with what they have, only by thinking what they want. He that sees his neighbor possess somewhat, which himself hath not, is apt to think how happy he should be, if he were in that man's condition, and in the mean time never thinks of enjoying his own, which yet perhaps in many respects may be much happier, than that of his neighbors which he so much admires. For we look but upon the outside of other men's conditions, and many a man that is envied by his neighbors, as a wonderful happy person, hath yet some secret trouble, which makes him think much otherwise of himself. Therefore never compare thy condition in anything with those thou countest more prosperous than thyself, but rather do it with those, thou knowest more unhappy, and then thou wilt find cause to rejoice in thine own portion. Fourthly, Consider how far thou art from deserving any good thing from God, and then thou canst not but with Jacob Gen. 32. 10. confess, that thou art not worthy of the least of those mercies thou enjoyest, and instead of murmuring that they are no more, wilt see reason to admire, and praise the bounty of God, that they are so many. Fifthly, Be often thinking of the joys laid up for thee in Heaven; look upon that as thy home, on this world, only as an Inn, where thou art fain to take up in thy passage; and then as a traveler expects not the same conveniences at an Inn, that he hath at home, so thou hast reason to be content with whatever entertainment thou findest here, knowing thou art upon thy journey to a place of infinite happiness, which will make an abundant amends for all the uneasiness, and hardship thou canst suffer in the way. Lastly, Pray to God, from whom all good things do come, that he will to all his other blessings, add this of a contented mind, without which thou canst have no taste or relish of any other.

10. A fifth duty is diligence: This is made up of two parts, watchfulness, and industry, and both these we owe to our Souls

11. First, Watchfulness, in observing all the dangers that threaten them. Now since nothing can endanger our Souls, but sin, this watchfulness is principally to be employ'd against that: And as in a besieged City, where there is any weak part, there it is necessary to keep the strongest guard; so it is here, wherever thou findest thy inclinations such, as are most likely to betray thee to sin, there it concerns thee to be especially watchful; Observe therefore carefully to what sins either thy natural temper, thy company, or thy course of life do particularly incline thee, and watch thyself very narrowly in those; Yet do not so lay out all thy care on those, as to leave thyself open to any other▪ for that may give Satan as much advantage on the other side; but let thy watch be general, against all sin, though in a special manner against those, which are like oftneft to assault thee.

12. The second part of diligence, is industry, or labor, and this also we owe to our Souls, for without it they will as little prosper as that vineyard of the sluggard, which Solomon describes, Prov. 24. 30. For there is a husbandry of the Soul, as well as of the estate, and the end of the one, as of the other, is the creasing, and improving of its riches. Now the riches of the Soul are either natural, or Divine. By the natural I mean its faculties of reason, wit, memory, and the like; by the Divine I mean the graces of God, which are not the Souls natural portion, but are given immediately by God, and both these we are to take care to improve, they being both talents entrusted to us for that purpose.

13. The way of improving the natural is by employing them so, as may bring in most honor to God: we must not let them lie idle by us, through sloth, neither must we overwhelm them with intemperance, and brutish pleasures, which is the case of too many, but we must employ them, and set them on work. But then we must be sure it be not in the Devils service, like many, who set their wit only to the profaning of God, or cheating their neighbors, and stuff their memories with such filthiness, as should never once enter their thoughts; our use of them must be such, as may bring in most glory to God, most benefit to our neighbors, and may best fit us to make our accounts, when God shall come to reckon with us for them.

14. But the other part of the Souls riches, is yet more precious, that is grace, and of this we must be especially careful, to husband, and improve it. This is a duty expressly commanded us by the Apostle, 2 Pet. 3. 18. Grow in grace. And again, in the first chapter of that Epistle, verse 5. Give all diligence to add to your Faith virtue, and to virtue knowledge, &c. Now the especial means of improving grace is by employing it, that is, by doing those things for the enabling of us whereunto it was given us; This is a sure means, not only in respect of that easiness, which a custom of anything brings in the doing of it, but principally, as it hath the promise of God, who hath promised, Mat. 25. 29. That to him that hath (that is hath made use of what he hath) shall be given, and he shall have abundance. He that diligently, and faithfully employs the first beginnings of grace, shall yet have more, and he that in like manner husbands that more, shall yet have a greater degree; so that what Solomon saith of temporal riches, is also true of spiritual, The hand of the diligent maketh rich.

15. Therefore whenever thou findest any good motion in thy heart, remember that is a season for this spiritual husbandry, If thou have but a check of conscience against any sin, thou livest in, drive that on till it come to a hatred, and then that hatred, till it come to resolution, then from that resolution, proceed to some endeavors against it. Do this faithfully, and sincerely, and thou shalt certainly find the grace of God assisting thee, not only in every of these steps, but also enabling thee to advance still higher, till thou come to some victory over it. Yet to this industry thou must not fail to add thy prayers also, there being a promise, that God will give the holy Spirit to them that ask it, Mat. 7. 11. And therefore they that ask it not, have no reason to expect it. But it must be asked with such an earnestness, as is some way answerable to the value of the thing, which being infinitely more precious then all the world, both in respect of his own worth, and its usefulness to us, we must beg it with much more zeal and earnestness than all temporal blessings, or else we show ourselves despisers of it.

16. Having directed you to the means of improving grace, I shall, to quicken you to it, mention the great danger of the contrary; And that is not as in other things, the loosing only those further degrees, which our industry might have helped us to, but it is the loosing even of what we already have, For from him that hath not (that is again hath not made use of what he hath) shall be taken away even that which he hath, Mat. 25. 29. God will withdraw the grace, which he sees so neglected, as we see in that parable, the talent was taken from him that had only hid it in a Napkin, and had brought in no gain to his lord. And this is a most sad punishment, the greatest that can befall any man, before he comes to hell, indeed it is some kind of foretaste of it, it is the delivering him up to the power of the Devil, and it is the banishing him from the face of God, which are not the least parts of the misery of the damned. And it is also the binding a man over to that fuller portion of wretchedness in another world; For that is the last doom of the unprofitable servant, Mat. 25. 30. Cast ye the unprofitable servant into outer darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. You see they are no light dangers that attend this neglect of grace, and therefore if we have any love, nay any common pity to our Souls, we must set ourselves to this industry. I have now done with those virtues, which respect our Souls. I come now to those which concern our bodies.

17. The first of which is chastity, or purity, which may well be set in the front of the duties we owe to our bodies, since the Apostle 1 Cor. 6. 18. sets the contrary as the especial sin against them, He that committeth fornication sinneth against his own body.

18 Now this virtue of chastity consists in a perfect abstaining from all kinds of uncleanness, not only that of adultery, and fornication, but all other more unnatural sorts of it, committed either upon ourselves, or with any other. In a word, all acts of that kind are utterly against chastity, save only in lawful marriage. And even there men are not to think themselves let loose to please their brutish appetites, but are to keep themselves within such rules of moderation, as agree to the end of marriage, which being these two, the begetting of children, and the avoiding of fornication, nothing must be done, which may hinder the first of these ends; and the second aiming only at the subduing of lust, the keeping men from any sinful effects of it, it is very contrary to that end, to make marriage an occasion of heightening, and enflaming it.

19. But this virtue of chastity reacheth not only to the restraining of the grosser act, but to all lower degrees; it sets a guard upon our eyes, according to that of our Savior, Mat. 5. 28. He that looketh on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery with her already in his heart; and upon our hand as appears by what Christ adds in that place, If thy hand offend thee, cut it off; so also upon our tongues, that they speak no immodest or filthy words, Let no corrupt communication proceed out of your mouth. Eph. 4. 29 Nay upon our very thoughts, and fancies, we must not entertain any foul or filthy desires, nor so much as the imagination of any such thing. Therefore he that forbears the grosser act, and yet allows himself in any of these, it is to be suspected that it is rather some outward restraint, that keeps him from it than the conscience of the sin. For if it were that, it would keep him from these too, these being sins also, and very great ones in God's sight. Besides, he that lets himself loose to these puts himself in very great danger of the other, it being much more easy to abstain from all, then to secure against the one, when the other is allowed. But above all, it is to be considered, that even these lower degrees are such, as make men very odious in God's eyes who seeth the heart, and loves none that are not pure there.

20. The loveliness of this virtue of chastity needs no other way of describing, then by considering the loathsomeness, and mischiefs of the contrary sin; which is first very brutish; those desires are but the same, that the beasts have, and then how far are they sunk below the nature of man, that can boast of their sins of that kind, as of their special excellency? When if that be the measure, a goat is the more excellent creature. But indeed they that eagerly pursue this part of bestiality do often leave themselves little, besides their human shape, to difference them from beasts; this sin so clouds the understanding, and defaceth the reasonable Soul. Therefore Solomon very well describes the young man, that was going to the harlots house, Pro. 7. 22. He goeth after her, as an Ox goeth to the slaughter.

21 Nor secondly are the effects of it better to the body then to the mind. The many foul and filthy, besides painful diseases, which often follow this sin, are sufficient witnesses, how mischievous it is to the body. And alas, how many are there that have thus made themselves the Devils martyrs? Suffered such torments in the pursuit of this sin, as would exceed the invention of the greatest tyrant? Surely they that pay thus dear for damnation, very well deserve to enjoy the purchase.

22. But thirdly, Besides the natural fruits of this sin, it is attended with very great and heavy Judgments from God; the most extra ordinary and miraculous Judgment that ever befell any place, Fire and Brimstone from Heaven upon Sodom and Gomorrah, was for this sin of uncleanness. And many examples likewise of God's vengeance may be observed on particular persons, for this sin. The incest of Amnon cost him his life, as you may read, 2 Sam. 13. Zimrie and Cozbi were slain in the very act, Num. 25. 8. And no person that commits the like, hath any assurance it shall not be his own case. For how secretly soever it be committed, it cannot be hid from God, who is the sure avenger of all such wickedness. Nay, God hath very particularly threatened this sin, 1 Cor. 3. 17. If any man defile the Temple of God, him shall God destroy. This sin of uncleanness is a kind of sacrilege, a polluting those bodies, which God hath chosen for his Temples, and therefore no wonder, if it be thus heavily punished.

23. Lastly, This sin shuts us out from the Kingdom of Heaven, wherein no impure thing can enter. And we never find any list of those sins, which bar men thence, but this of uncleanness hath a special place in it. Thus it is Gal. 5. 19. and so again 1 Cor. 6. 9. If we will thus pollute ourselves, we are fit company only for those black spirits, the Devil and his Angels, and therefore with them we must expect our portion, where our flames of lust shall end in flames of fire.

24. All this laid together, may surely recommend the virtue of chastity to us, for the preserving of which, we must be very careful; first, to check the beginnings of the temptation, to cast away the very first fancy of lust, with indignation, for if you once fall to parley, & talk with it, it gains still more upon you, and then it will be harder to resist, therefore your way in this temptation is, to fly rather than fight with it. This is very necessary, not only that we may avoid the danger of proceeding to act the sin, but also in respect of the present fault of entertaining such fancies, which of itself, though it should never proceed further is, as hath been shown, a great abomination before God; Secondly, have a special care to fly idleness, which is the proper soil for these filthy weeds to grow in; And keep thyself always busied in some innocent, or virtuous employment, for then these fancies will be less apt to offer themselves. Thirdly, never suffer thyself to recall any unclean passages of thy former life with delight, for that is to act over the sin again; and will be so reckoned by God, nay perhaps thus deliberately to think of it, may be a greater guilt, than a rash acting of it. For this both shows thy heart to be set upon filthiness, and is also a preparation to more acts of it. Fourthly, forbear the company of such light, and wanton persons, as either by the filthiness of their discourse, or any other means, may be a snare to thee. Fifthly, pray earnestly that God would give thee the spirit of purity, especially at the time of any present temptation. Bring the unclean Devil to Christ, to be cast out as did the man in the Gospel; And if it will not be cast out with prayer alone, add fasting to it, but be sure thou do not keep up the flame by any high or immoderate feeding. The last remedy, when the former prove vain, is marriage, which becomes a duty to him, that cannot live innocently without it. But even here there must be care taken, lest this which should be for his good, become not to him an occasion of falling, for want of sobriety in the use of marriage. But this I have touched on already, and therefore need add no more, but an earnest entreaty, that men would consider seriously of the foulness, and danger of this sin of uncleanness, and not let the commonness of it lessen their hatred of it, but rather make them abhor that shameless impudence of the world, that can make light of this sin, against which God hath pronounced such heavy curses, Whoremongers and adulterers God will Judge, Heb. 13. 4. and so he will certainly do all sorts of unclean persons whatsoever.

25. The second virtue, that concerns our bodies is temperance: And the exercises of that are divers; As first temperance in eating, secondly in drinking, thirdly in sleep, fourthly in recreation, fifthly in apparel. I shall speak of them severally; and first of temperance in eating. This temperance is observed, when our eating is agreeable to those ends, to which eating are by God and nature designed; those are first the being, secondly the well being of our bodies

26. Man is of such a frame, that eating becomes necessary to him for the preserving his life, hunger being a natural disease which will prove deadly, if not prevented, and the only Physic for it is eating which is therefore become a necessary means of keeping us alive. And that is the first end of eating; and as men use not to take Physic for pleasure, but remedy, so neither should they eat.

27. But secondly, God hath been so bountiful, as to provide not only for the being, but the well being of our bodies, and therefore we are not tied to such strictness, that we may eat no more than will just keep us from starving, but we may also eat whatsoever either for kind or quantity most tends to the health, and welfare of them; Now that eating which is agreeable to these ends, is within the bounds of temperance, as on the contrary whatsoever is contrary to them, is a transgression against it; He therefore that sets up to himself other ends of eating, as either the pleasing of his taste, or (what is yet worse) the pampering of his body, that he may the better serve his lust, he directly thwarts and crosses these ends of God's; for he that hath those aims, doth that which is very contrary to health, yea and to life itself; as appears by the many diseases, and untimely deaths, which surfeiting and uncleanness daily bring on men.

28. He therefore that will practice this virtue of temperance, must neither eat so much, nor of any such sorts of meat (provided he can have other) as may be hurtful to his health: what the sorts or quantities shall be, is impossible to set down, for that differs according to the several constitutions of men; some men may with temperance eat a great deal, because their stomachs require it, when another may be guilty of intemperance in eating but half so much, because it is more then is useful to him. And so also for the sort of meat, it may be niceness and luxury for some to be curious in them, when yet some degree of it may be necessary to the infirmities of a weak stomach, which not out of wantonness, but disease cannot eat the courser meats But I think it may in general be said, that to healthful bodies the plainest meats are generally the most wholesome, but every man must in this be left to judge for himself; and that he may do it aright, he must be careful, that he never suffer himself to be enslaved to his palate, for that will be sure to satisfy its self, whatever becomes of health or life.

29. To secure him the better, let him consider, First, How unreasonable a thing it is, that the whole body should be subjected to this one sense of tasting, that it must run all hazards only to please that. But it is yet much more so that the diviner part, the soul should also be thus enslaved; and yet thus it is in an intemperate person, his very soul must be sacrificed to this brutish appetite, for the sin of intemperance, though it be acted by the body, yet the soul must share in the eternal punishment of it, Secondly, Consider how extreme short and vanishing this pleasure is, it is gone in a moment, but the pains that attend the excess of it, are much more durable, and then surely it agrees not with that common reason, wherewith as men we are endued, to set our hearts upon it. But then in the third place it agrees yet worse with the temper of a Christian, who should have his heart so purified, and refined with the expectation of those higher and spiritual joys he looks for in another world, that he should very much despise these gross and brutish pleasures, which beasts are as capable of, as we, and to them we may well be content to leave them, it being the highest their natures can reach to; but for us, who have so much more excellent hopes, it is an intolerable shame, that we should account them as any part of our happiness. Lastly, the sin of Gluttony is so great and dangerous, that Christ thought fit to give an especial warning against it; take heed to yourselves, that your hearts be not overcharged with surfeiting, &c. Luke 21. 34. And you know what was the end of the rich glutton, Luke 16. He that had fared deliciously every day, at last wants a drop of water to cool his tongue. So much for that first sort of temperance, that of eating.

PARTITION VIII.

Of Temperance in DRINKING, False Ends of Drinking, viz. Good Fellow-ship. Putting away cares, &c.

§. 1. The second is temperance in drinking, and the ends of eating and drinking being much the same, I can give no other direct rules in this, then what were given in the former, to wit, that we drink neither of such sorts of liquor, nor in such quantities as may not agree with the right ends of drinking, the preserving of our lives and healths: Only in this there will be need of putting in one caution, for our understandings being in more danger to be hurt by drink then meat, we must take care to keep that safe, and rather not drink what we might safely in respect of our healths, if it be in danger to distemper our reason. This I say because it is possible some men's brains may be so weak, that their heads cannot bear that ordinary quantity of drink which would do the•r bodies no harm. And whoever is of this temper must strictly absta•n from that degree of drink or that sort of it, which he finds hath that effect, yea though it do in other respects appear not only safe, but useful to his health. For though we are to preserve our healths, yet we are not to do it by a sin, as drunkenness most certainly is.

2. But alas, of those multitudes of drunkards we have in the world, this is the case but of very few, most of them going far beyond what their health requires, yea or can bear even to the utter destruction thereof. And therefore it is plain men have set up to themselves some other ends of drinking, then those allowable ones forementioned, it may not be amiss a little to examine what they are, and withal to show the unreasonableness of them.

3. The first, and most owned is that, which they call good fellowship: One man drinks to keep another company at it. But I would ask such a one whether if that man were drinking rank poison, he would pledge him for company? If he say he would not, I must tell him▪ that by the very same, nay, far greater reason, he is not to do this. For immoderate drinking is that very poison, perhaps it doth not always work death immediately (yet there want not many instances of its having done even that, very many having died in their drunken fit) but that the custom of it does usually bring men to their ends, is past doubt, and therefore though the poison work slowly, yet it is still poison. But however it doth at the present work that which a wise man would more abhor then death; it works madness, and frenzy turns the man into a beast, by drowning that reason which should difference him from one. Certainly the effects of drink are such, that had being drunk been first enjoined, as a punishment, we should have thought him a more then ordinary Tyrant, that had invented it.

4. A second end of drinking is said to be the maintaining of friendship and kindness amongst men. But this is strangely unreasonable, that men should do that towards the maintaining of friendship, which is really the greatest mischief that can be done to any man. Did ever any think to befriend a man by helping to destroy his estate, his credit, his life? Yet he that thus drinks with a man does this, and much more, he ruins his reason, yea his soul; and yet this must be called the way of preserving of friendship; this is so ridiculous that one would think none could own it, but when he were actually drunk. But besides, Alas, experience shows us, that this is fitter to beget quarrels then preserve kindness, as the many drunken brawls we every day see, with the wounds, and sometimes murders, that accompany them, do witness.

5. A third end is said to be the cheering of their spirits, making them merry and jolly. But sure if the mirth be such that reason must be turned out of doors before it begin, it will be very little worth; one may say with Solomon, Ecc. 2. 2. The laughter of such fools is madness. And sure they that will be drunk to put themselves in this temper, must by the same reason be glad of a frenzy, if they could but be sure it would be of the merry sort. But little do these merry folks think what sadness they are all this while heaping up to them selves, often in this world, when by some mad pranks, they play in their jollity, they bring mischief upon themselves, but however certainly in another, where this mirth will be most sadly reckoned for.

6. A fourth end is said to be the putting away of cares; but I shall ask what those cares are? be they such as should be put away? perhaps they are some checks and remorse of conscience, which must be thus charmed. And I doubt this hath proved too effectual with many to the laying them asleep: But this is the wickedst folly in the world; for if thou thinkest not these checks to have something considerable in them, why do they trouble thee? But if thou do, it is impossible thou canst hope this can long secure thee from them. Thou mayest thus stop their mouths for a while, but they will one day cry the louder for it. Suppose a thief or a murderer knew he were pursued to be brought to justice, would he think you to put away the fear of being hanged, fall to drinking, and in the mean time take no care for his escape, or would you not think him desperately mad if he did? Yet this is the very case here, thy conscience tells thee of thy danger, that thou must ere long be brought before God's judgment-seat; and is it not madness for thee, instead of endeavoring to get thy pardon, to drink away the thought of thy danger. But in the second place, suppose these cares be some worldly ones, and such as are fit to be put away; then for shame do not so disgrace thy reason, thy Christianity, as not to let them be as forcible to that end, as a little drink. Thy reason will tell thee it is in vain to care, where care will bring no advantage; and thy Christianity will direct thee to one, on whom thou must safely cast all thy cares, for he careth for thee, 1 Pet. 5. 7. And therefore unless thou meanest to renounce being both a man and a Christian, never betake thee to this pitiful shift, to rid thee of thy cares. But besides, this will not do the deed neither; for though it may at present, whilst thou art in the height of the drunken fit, keep thee from the sense of thy cares, yet when that is over, they will return again with greater violence, and if thou have any conscience, bring a new care with them, even that which ariseth from the guilt of so foul a sin.

7. A fifth end is said to be the passing away of time. This though it be as unreasonable as any of the former, yet by the way it serves to reproach idleness, which is, it seems, so burdensome a thing, that even this vilest i'ployment is preferred before it. But this is in many a very false plea. For they often spend time at the pot, not only when they have nothing else to do, but even to the neglect of their most necessary business. However it is in all a most unreasonable one, for there is no man, but he may find somewhat, or other to employ himself in. If he have little worldly business of his own, he may yet do somewhat to the benefit of others; but however there is no man but hath a soul, and if he will look carefully to that, he need not complain for want of business; where there are so many corruptions to mortify so many inclinations to watch over, so many temptations (whereof this of drunkenness is not the least) to resist the graces of God, to improve and stir up, and former neglects of all these to lament, sure there can never want sufficient employment; for all these require time, and so men at their deaths find; for then those that have all their lives made it their business to drive away their time, would then give all the world to redeem it. And sure where there is much leisure from worldly affairs, God expects to have the more time thus employed in spiritual exercises. But it is not likely those meaner sort of persons, to whom this book is intended, will be of the number of those that have much leisure; and therefore I shall no farther insist on it; only I shall say this, that what degree of leisure they at any time have, it concerns them to employ to the benefit of their souls, and not to bestow it to the ruin of them, as they do, who spend it in drinking.

8. A sixth end is said to be the preventing of that reproach, which is by the world cast on those that will in this be stricter then their neighbors; but in answer to this, I shall first ask, what is the harm of such reproach? sure it cannot equal the least of those mischiefs, drunkenness betrays us to. Nay, if we will take our Savior's word, it is a happiness, Blessed, saith he, are ye when men shall revile you, & say all manner of evil against you for my sake, Mat. 5. 11. And St. Peter tells us, 1 Pet. 4 14. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye, and sure to be reproached for obedience to any command of Christ's, is to be reproached for his name. Secondly, Let it be remembered, that at our Baptism we solemnly renounced the world; and shall we now so far consider it, as for a few scoffs of it to run ourselves on all the temporal evils before mentioned, and which is much worse, the wrath of God and eternal destruction? But Thirdly, if you fear reproach, why do you do that, which will bring reproach upon you from all wise and good men; whose opinion alone is to be regarded? And it is certain, drinking is the way to bring it on you from all such. And to comfort thyself against that, by thinking thou art still applauded by the foolish and worst sort of men, is as if all the mad men in the world should agree to count themselves the only sober persons, and all others mad, which yet sure will never make them the less mad, nor others the less sober. Lastly, consider the heavy doom Christ hath pronounced on those that are ashamed of him, and so are all those that for fear of reproach shall shrink from their obedience to him, Mat. 8▪ 38. Whosoever shall be ashamed of me and of my words in this adulterous and sinful generation, of him shall the Son of man be ashamed when he cometh in the glory of the father with the holy Angels. There is none but will at that day desire to be owned by Christ: But whoever, will not here own him; that is, cleave fast to his commands, notwithstanding all the scorns, nay, persecutions of the world, shall then certainly be cast off by him. And he that will adventure thus to maintain his credit among a company of fools and madmen, deserves well to have it befall him: But after all this is it not sure that even these will despise thee for thy sobriety, it is possible they may seem to do so, to fright thee out of it; but if their hearts were searched, it would be found, they do even against their wills, bear a secret reverence to sober persons, and none fall more often under their scorn, and despising then those that run with them to the same excess of riot, for even he that sticks not to be drunk himself, will yet laugh at another that he sees so.

9 There is a seventh end, which though every man think too base to own, yet it is too plain, it prevails with many. And that is the bare pleasure of the drink; but to these I confess it will not be fit to say much, for he that is come to this lamentable degree of sottishness, is not like to receive benefit by anything can be said. Yet let me tell even this man, that he of all others hath the most means of discerning his fault, for this being such a ground of drinking as nobody will own, he is condemned of himself, yea, and all his fellow drunkards too, for their denying it is a plain sign, they acknowledge it a most abominable thing. And if Esau were called a profane person, Heb. 12. 6. For selling but his birth-right for a morsel of pottage▪ and that too, when he had the necessity of hunger upon him, what name of reproach can be bad enough for him, who sells his health, his reason, his God, his soul for a cup of drink, & that when he is so far from needing it, that perhaps he hath already more than he can keep? I shall say no more to this sort of persons, but let me warn all those that go on in the sin, on any of the former grounds, that a little time will bring them even to this, which they profess to loath, it being daily seen, that those which first were drawn into the sin for the love of the company, at last continue in it for love of the drink.

10 I can think but of one end more: That is, that of bargaining. Men say it is necessary for them to drink, in this one respect, of trading with their neighbors, bargains being most conveniently to be struck up at such meetings. But this is yet a worse end, than all the rest, for the bottom of it is an aim of cheating & defrauding others▪ We think when men are in drink, we shall the better be able to over-reach them: And so this adds the sin of cozenage and defrauding to that of drunkenness. Now that this is indeed the intent, is manifest, for if it were only the dispatch of bargains were aimed at, we should choose to take men with their wits about them, therefore the taking them, when drink hath distempered them, can be for nothing, but to make advantage of them. Yet this often proves a great folly, as well as a sin; for he that drinks with another in hope to overreach him, doth many times prove the weaker brained, & becomes drunk first, & then he gives the other that opportunity of cheating him, which he designed for the cheating of the other. Now this end of drinking is so far from becoming an excuse, that it is a huge heightening of the sin; For if we may not drink intemperately upon any occasion, much less upon so wicked a one, as is the cozening and defrauding of our brethren.

11. I suppose I have now shown you the unreasonableness of those motives, which are ordinarily brought in excuse of this sin. I am yet further to tell you, that it is not only that huge degree of drunkenness, which makes men able neither to go nor speak, which is to be looked on as a sin, but all lower degrees, which do at all work upon the understanding, whether by dulling it, and making it less fit for any employment, or by making it too light and airy, apt to apish, and ridiculous mirth, or, what is worse, by inflaming men into rage and fury. These, or whatever else make any change in the man, are to be reckoned into this sin of drunkenness; Nay further, the drinking beyond the natural ends of drinking; that is, beyond moderate refreshment, is a sin, though by the strength of a man's brain it makes not least change in him, and therefore those that are not actually drunk, yet can spend whole days, or any considerable part of them, in drinking, are so far from being innocent, that that greater woe belongs to them, which is pronounced Isa. 5. 22. against those that are mighty to drink. For though such a man may make a shift to preserve his wits, yet that wit serves him to very little purpose, when his employment is still but the same with him, that is the most sottishly drunk; that is, to pour down drink.

12. Nay, this man is guilty of the greater waste; First, of the good creatures of God; That drink, which is by God's providence intended for the refreshing and relieving of us, is abused and misspent, when it is drunk beyond that measure, which those ends require, and sure there is not the meanest of these creatures we enjoy, but the abuse of them shall one day be accounted for, and he that drinks longest, hath the most of that gnilt. But in the second place, this is a waste of that which is much more precious, our time, which is allowed us by God to work out our Salvation in, and must be strictly reckoned for, and therefore ought every minute of it to be most thriftily husbanded to that end in actions of good life, but when it is thus laid out, it tends to the direct contrary, even the working out our damnation. Besides, he that thus drinks, though he escape being drunk himself, he is yet guilty of all the drunkenness, that any of his company fall under, for he gives them encouragement to drink on by his example, especially if he be one of any authority, but if he be one whose company the rest are fond of, his drinking is then a certain ensnaring of them, for then they will drink too, rather than lose him. There is yet a greater fault, that many of these stronger brained drinkers are guilty of; That is, the setting themselves purposely to make others drunk, playing, as it were, a prize at it, and counting it matter of triumph, and victory to see others fall before them; This is a most horrible wickedness, it is the making ourselves the Devils factors, endeavoring all we can to draw our poor brethren into eternal misery, by betraying them to so grievous a sin; and therefore it may well be reckoned as the highest step of this vice of drinking, as having in it the sin of mischieving others, added to the excess in ourselves. And though it be looked upon in the world as a matter only of jest and merriment to make others drunk, that we may sport ourselves with their ridiculous behavior, yet that mirth will have a sad conclusion, there being a woe expressly threatened by God to this very sin. Hab. 2 15. Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth thy bottle to him and maketh him drunk, that thou mayest look on their nakedness: And sure he buys his idle pastime very dear, that takes it with such a woe attending it.

13. I have now gone through the several motives to, and degrees of this sin of drunkenness, wherein I have been the more particular, because it is a sin so strangely reigning amongst us, no Condition, no Age, or scarce Sex free from it, to the great dishonor of God, reproach of Christianity, and ruin not only of our own Souls hereafter, but even of all our present advantages and happiness in this life; the•• being no sin which betrays each single committer to more mischiefs in his understanding, his health his credit, his estate, than this one doth. And we have reason to believe this sin is one of those common crying guilts, which have long lain heavy upon this Nation, and pulled down those many sad judgments we have groaned under.

14. Therefore, Christian Reader, let me now entreat, nay conjure thee, by all that tenderness and love thou oughtest to have to the honor of God, the credit of thy Christian profession, eternal welfare of thine own Soul, the prosperity of the Church and Nation, whereof thou art a member; Nay, by that love which certainly thou hast to thy own Soul, to think sadly of what hath been spoken; And then judge, whether there be any pleasure in this sin, which can be any tolerable recompense for all those mischiefs, it brings with it; I am confident no man in his w•s can think there is & if there be not, then be ashamed to be any longer that fool, which shall make so wretched a bargain, but begin at this instant a firm and a faithful resolution, never once more to be guilty of this swinish sin, how often soever thou hast heretofore fallen into it, and in the fear of God betake thee to a strict temperance, which when thou hast done, thou wilt find, thou hast made not only a gainful, but a pleasant exchange; For there is no man that hath tried both courses, but his own heart will tell him, there is infinitely more present comfort, and pleasure in sobriety and temperance, then ever all his drunken revellings afforded him.

15. The main difficulty is the first breaking off the custom, and that arises partly from ourselves, partly from others. That from ourselves may be of two sorts, the first is, when by the habit of drinking, we have brought such false thirsts upon ourselves, that our bodies seems to require it, and this wants nothing but a little patience to overcome. Do but refrain some few days, and it will afterwards grow easy; for the hardness arising only from custom, the breaking of that does the business. If thou say, it is very uneasy to do so, consider whether thou hadst  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  me disease, which would certainly kill thee, if thou didst not for some little time refrain immoderate drinking, thou wouldst not rather forbear, then die; If thou wouldst not, thou art so brutish a sot, that it is in vain to persuade thee; but if thou hadst, then consider how unreasonable it is for thee not to do it in this case also; the habit of drinking may well pass for a mortal disease, it proves so very often to the body, but will most certainly to the Soul, and therefore it is madness to stick at that uneasiness in the cure of this, which thou wouldst submit to in a less danger. Set therefore but a resolute purpose to endure that little trouble for a small time, and this first difficulty is conquered, for after thou hast a while refrained, it will be perfectly easy to do so still.

16 The second difficulty is that of spending the time, which those that have made drinking their trade and business, know scarce how to dispose of. But the very naming of this difficulty directs to the cure, get thee some business, somewhat to employ thyself in, which, as I have already shown, will be easily found by all sorts of persons, but those meaner to whom I now write, can sure never want it ready at hand; they being generally such as are to be maintained by their labor, and therefore to them I need only give this advice, to be diligent in that business they have, to follow that close as they ought; and they will have little occasion to seek out this way of spending their time.

17. There is another sort of difficulty, which I told you arises from others, and that is either from their persuasions, or reproaches. It is very likely if thy old companions see thee begin to fall off, they will set hard to thee, to bring thee back to thy old course, they will urge to thee the unkindness of forsaking the company of thy friends, the sadness of renouncing all that mirth and jollity, which good fellows (as they call them) enjoy, and if thou canst not thus be won, they will affright thee with the reproach of the world, and so try if they can mock thee out of thy sobriety.

18 The way to overcome this difficulty is to foresee it, therefore when thou first enterest on thy course of temperance, thou art to make account thou shalt meet with these (perhaps many other) temptations, and that thou mayest make a right judgment, whether they be worthy to prevail with thee, take them before hand, and weigh them, consider whether that false kindness, that is maintained among men by drinking, be worthy to be compared with that real and everlasting kindness of God, which is lost by it; Whether that foolish, vain mirth bear any weight with the present joys of a good conscience here, or with those greater of Heaven hereafter. Lastly, whether the unjust reproach of wicked men▪ the shame of the world be so terrible, as the just reproof of thine own conscience at the present, and that eternal confusion of face that shall befall all those, that go on in this sin, at the last day; Weigh all these, I say, I need not say, in the balance of the Sanctuary, but even in the scales of common reason, and sure thou wilt be forced to pronounce, that the motives to temperance infinitely out-weigh those against it; When thou hast thus advisedly judged, then fix thy resolution accordingly, and when ever any of these temptations come to stagger thee, remember thou hast formerly weighed them, knowest the just value of them, and that they are a most unworthy price for those precious advantages thou must give in exchange for them. And therefore hold fast thy resolution, and with indignation reject all motions to the contrary.

19. But be sure thou thus reject them at their very first tender, and do not yield in the least degree; For if once thou givest ground, thou art lost, the sin will by little and little prevail upon thee. Thus we see many, who have professed to be resolved upon great temperance, yet for want of this care, have adventured into the company of good fellows, when they have been there, they have at the first been over entreated to take a cup, after that another, till at last they have taken their rounds as freely as any of them, and in that flood of drink drowned all their sober resolutions▪ Therefore whoever thou art, that dost really desire to forsake the sin, take care to avoid the occasions, and beginnings of it; To w<sup>h</sup>ich end it w<sup>ill</sup> be good openly to declare, and own thy purpose of sobriety, that so thou mayest discourage men from assaulting thee. But if either thou art ashamed to own it, or seemest to be so, they will quickly make use of that shame to bring thee to break it.

20. If thou be thus wary to keep thee from the first beginnings, thou art then sure never to be overtaken with this sin; For it is like the keeping the out-works of a besieged City, which so long as they are stoutly defended, there is no danger, but if they be either surprised or yielded, the City cannot long hold out: The advice therefore of the wise man is very agreeable to this matter, Eccles. 19. 1. He that despiseth small things shall perish by little and little. But because as the Psalmist saith, Psa. 127. 1. Except the Lord keep the City the watch-man waketh but in vain; therefore to this guard of thyself add thy most earnest prayers to God, that he will also watch over thee, and by the strength of his grace enable thee to resist all temptations to this sin.

21. If thou do in the sincerity of thy h<sup>e</sup>art use these means, there is no doubt, but thou wilt be able to overcome this vice, how long soever thou hast been accustomed to it therefore if thou do still remain under the power of it, never excuse thyself by the impossibility of the task▪ but rather accuse the falseness of thy own heart, that hath still such a love to this sin, that thou wilt not set roundly to the means of subduing it.

22. Perhaps the great commonness of the sin and thy particular custom of it may have made it so much thy familiar thy bosom acquaintance, that thou art loath to enterta<sup>n</sup> hard thoughts of it, very unwilling thou art to think that it means thee any hurt, and therefore art apt to speak peace to thyself, to hope that either this is no sin, or at most but a frailty, such as will not bar thee out of Heaven; But deceive not thyself, for thou mayest as well say there is no Heaven, as that drunkenness shall not keep thee thence; I am sure the same word of God which tells us there is such a place of happiness, tells us also that drunkards are of the number of those, that shall not inherit it. 1 Cor. 6. 10. and again, Gal. 5. 21. Drunkenness is reckoned among those works of the flesh, which they that do, shall not inherit the Kingdom of God. And indeed had not these plain texts, yet mere reason would tell us the same; That is, a place of infinite purity, such that flesh and blood, till it be refined, and purified, is not capable of, as the Apostle tells us, 1 Cor. 15. 53. and if as we are mere men, we are too gross, and impure for it, we must sure be more so, when we are changed ourselves into swine, the foulest of beasts, we are then prepared for the devils to enter into, as they did into the herd, Mark 5. 13. and that not only someone or two, but a Legion, a troop and multitude of them. And of this we daily see examples, for where this sin of drunkenness hath taken possession, it usually comes as an harbinger to abundance of others; each act of drunkenness prepares a man not only for another of the same sin, but of others; lust and rage, and all brutish appetites are then let loose, and so a man brings himself under that curse, which was the saddest David knew how to foretell to any, Psa. 69. 28. The falling from one wickedness to another. If all this be not enough to affright thee out of this drunken fit, thou must still wallow in thy vomit, continue in this sottish, senseless condition, till the flames of Hell rouse thee, & then thou wilt by sad experience find, what now thou wilt not believe, that the end of these things, as the Apostle saith, Rom. 6. 21. is Death. God in his infinite mercy timely awake the hearts of all that are in this sin, that by a timely forsaking it, they may fly from that wrath to come. I have now done with this second part of temperance, concerning drinking.

PARTITION. IX.

Temperance in SLEEP; The rule of it, &c. Of RECREATION; Of APPAREL.

§. 1: THE third part of Temperance concerns sleep; And temperance in that also must be measured by the end for which sleep was ordained by God, which was only the refreshing and supporting of our frail bodies, which being of such a temper, that continual labor and toil tires, and wearies them out, sleep comes as a Medicine to that weariness, as a repairer of that decay, that so we may be enabled to such labors, as the duties of Religion or works of our calling require of us. Sleep was intended to make us more profitable, not more idle; as we give rest to our beasts, not that we are pleased with their doing nothing▪ but that they may do us the better service.

2. By this therefore you may judge what is temperate sleeping, to wit, that which tends to the refreshing, and making us more lively, and fit for action. And to that end a moderate degree serves best; It will be impossible to set down just how many hours is that moderate degree, because as in eating so in sleep, some constitutions require more then others. Every man's own experience must in this judge for him, but then let him judge uprightly, and not consult with his sloth in the case▪ for that will still with Solomons slugard, cry, a little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hand to sleep, Prov. 24. 33. But take only so much, as he really finds to tend to the end forementioned.

3. He that doth not thus limit himself, falls into several sins under this general one of sloth; As first, he wastes his time, that precious talent which was committed to him by God to improve, which he that sleeps away, doth like him in the Gospel. Mat. 25. 18. Hides it in the earth, when he should be trading with it; and you know what was the doom of that unprofitable servant, verse. 30 Cast ye him into outer darkness; he that gives himself up to the darkness of sleep here, shall there have darkness without sleep, but with weeping, and gnashing of teeth. Secondly, he injures his body, immoderate sleep fills that full of diseases▪ makes it a very sink of humors, as daily experiences show us. Thirdly, he injures his Soul also▪ and that not only in robbing it of the service of the body, but in dulling its proper faculties▪ making them useless, and unfit for those employments, to which God hath designed them, of all which ill husbandry the poor Soul must one day give account. Nay lastly, he affronts and despises God himself in it, by crossing the very end of his creation, which was to serve God in an active obedience, but he that sleeps away his life, directly thwarts▪ & contradicts that, and when God saith, Man is born to labor, his practice saith the direct contrary that man was born to rest. Take heed therefore of giving thyself to immoderate sleep, which is the committing of so many sins in one.

4. But besides the sin of it, it is also very hurtful in other respects, it is the sure base of thy outward estate, wherein the sluggish person shall never thrive, according to that observation of the wise man, Proverb. 23. 21. Drowsiness shall cover a man with rags; that is, the slothful man shall want convenient clothing; nay, indeed it can scarce be said, that the sluggard lives; sleep, you know, is a kind of death, and he that gives himself up to it, what doth he but die before his time. Therefore if untimely death be to be looked upon, as a curse, it must needs be a strange folly to choose that from our own sloth, which we dread so much from God's hand.

5. The fourth part of temperance concerns recreations, which are sometimes necessary both to the body and the mind of a man, neither of them being able to endure a constant toil without somewhat of refreshment between; and therefore there is a very lawful use of them, but to make it so, it will be necessary to observe these cautions;

6. First, We must take care, that the kind of them be lawful, that they be such as have nothing of sin in them; we must not, to recreate ourselves, do anything which is dishonorable to God, or injurious to our neighbor, as they do, who make profane or filthy backbiting discourse their recreation; Secondly, we must take care that we use it with moderation; And to do so we must first be sure not to spend too much time upon it, but remember that the end of recreation is to fit us for business, not to be itself a business to us; Secondly, we must not be too vehement, and earnest in it, nor set our hearts too much upon it, for that will both ensnare us to the using too much of it, and it will divert, and take off our minds from our more necessary employments, like school-boys, who after a play-time know not how to set themselves to their books again. Lastly, we must not set up to ourselves any other end of recreations, but that one lawful, of giving us moderate refreshment.

7. As first, we are not to use sports only to pass away our time, which we ought to study how to redeem, not fling away; and when it is remembered how great a work we have here to do, the making our calling and election sure, the securing our title to Heaven hereafter, and how uncertain we are what time shall be allowed us for that purpose, it will appear our time is that, which of all other things we ought most industriously to improve. And therefore sure we have little need to contrive ways of driving that away, which flies so fast of itself, and is so impossible to recover. Let them that can spend whole days and nights at cards, and dice, and idle pastimes, consider this, and withal, whether they ever bestowed a quarter of that time towards that great business of their lives, for which all their time was given them, and there think what a woeful reckoning they are like to make, when they come at last to account for that precious treasure of their time. Secondly, we must not let our covetousness have anything to do in our recreations, if we play at any game, let the end of our doing it be merely to recreate ourselves, not to win money; and to that purpose be sure never to play for any considerable matter, for if thou do, thou wilt bring thyself into two dangers, the one of covetousness, and a greedy desire of winning, the other of rage and anger at thy ill fortune, if thou happen to loose; both which will be apt to draw thee into other sins besides themselves; Covetousness will tempt thee to cheat, and cozen in gaming, and anger to swearing and cursing, as common experience shows us too often. If thou find thyself apt to fall into either of these in thy gaming, thou must either take some course to secure thyself against them, or thou must not permit thyself to play at all; for though moderate play be in itself not unlawful, yet if be the occasion of sin, it is so to thee, and therefore must not be ventured on. For if Christ commands us so strictly to avoid temptations, that if our very eyes or hands offend us (that is, prove snares to us) we must rather part with them, than be drawn to sin by them: How much rather must we part with any of these unnecessary sports, then run the hazard of offending God by them? He that so plays lays his Soul to stake, which is too great a prize to be played away. Besides, he loses all the recreation, and sport he pretends to aim at; and instead of that sets himself to a greater toil, than any of those labors are he was to ease by it. For sure the desires and fears of the covetous, the impatience and rage of the angry man, are more real pains, than any the most laborious work can be.

8. The last part of Temperance is that of apparel, which we are again to measure by the agreeableness to the ends for which clothing should be used. Those are especially these three; First, the hiding of nakedness. This was the first occasion of apparel, as you may read, Gen. 3 21. and was the effect of the first sin, and therefore when we remember this original clothes, we have so little reason to be proud of them, that on the contrary we have cause to be humbled and ashamed, as having lost that innocence which was a much greater ornament, than any the most glorious apparel can be. From this end of clothing we are likewise engaged to have our apparel modest, such as may answer this end of covering our shame; And therefore all immodest fashions of apparel, which may either argue the wantonness of the wearer or provoke that of the beholder, are to be avoided.

9 A second end of apparel, is the fencing the body from cold, thereby to preserve the health thereof, and this end we must likewise observe in our clothing; we must wear such kind of habits, as may keep us in that convenient warmth, which is necessary to our healths. And this is transgressed▪ when out of the vanity of being in every fantastic fashion, we put ourselves in such clothing, as either will not defend us from cold, or is some other way so uneasy, that it is rather a hurt than a benefit to our bodies to be so clad. This is a most ridiculous folly, and yet that which people that take a pride in their clothes are usually guilty of.

10. A third end of apparel is the distinguishing or differencing of persons, and that first in respect of Sex; Secondly, in respect of qualities. First, clothes are to make difference of Sex; this hath been observed by all Nations, the habits of men and women have always been divers. And God himself expressly provided for it among the I•ws, by commanding, that the man should not wear the apparel of the woman, nor the woman of the man. But then secondly, there is also a distinction of qualities to be observed in apparel; God hath placed some in a higher condition than others, and in proportion to their condition, it befits their clothing to be; Gorgeous apparel, our Savior tells us, is for Kings Co••ts, Luk. 7. 25. Now this end of apparel should also be observed. Men and women should content themselves with that sort of clothing, which agrees to their Sex and condition, not striving to exceed, and equal that of a higher rank, nor yet making it matter of envy among those of their own estate, vying who shall be finest, but let every man cloth himself in such sober attire, as befits his place and calling, and not think himself disparaged, if another of his neighbors have better than he.

11. And let all remember that cloths are things, which add no true worth to any, and therefore it is an intolerable vanity to spend any considerable part either of their thoughts, time or wealth upon them, or to value themselves ever the more for them, or despise their poor brethren that want them. But if they desire to adorn themselves, let it be as St. Peter advises the women of his time, 1 Pet. 3. 4. In the hidden man of the heart, even the ornament of a meek, and quiet spirit, Let them cloth themselves as richly as is possible with all Christian virtues, and that is the raiment that will set them out lovely in God's eyes, yea, and in men's too, who, unless they be fools and Idiots, will more value thee for being good, than fine, and sure one plain Coat thou putttest upon a poor man's back will better become thee, than twenty rich ones thou shalt put upon thine own.

12. I have now gone through the several parts of temperance; I shall now in conclusion, add this general caution, that though in all these particulars I have taken notice only of the one fault of excess, yet it is possible there may be one on the other hand; men may deny their bodies that which they necessarily require to their support, and well being. This is, I believe, a fault not so common, as the other, yet we sometimes see some very niggardly persons, that are guilty of it, that cannot find in their hearts to borrow so much from their chests, as may feed their bellies, or cloth their backs, and that are so intent upon the world, so moiling, and drudging in it, that they cannot afford themselves that competent time of sleep, or recreation, that is necessary. If any that hath read the former part of this discourse be of this temper, let him not comfort himself, that he is not guilty of those excesses there complained of, and therefore conclude himself a good Christian, because he is not intemperate, for whoever is this covetous creature, his abstaining shall not be counted to him as the virtue of temperance, for it is not the love of temperance, but wealth, that makes him refrain; And that is so far from being praise worthy, that it is that great sin which the Apostle tells us, 1 Tim. 6. 10. is the root of all evil; such a man's body will one day rise in judgment against him, for defrauding it of its due portion, those moderate refreshments and comforts which God hath allowed it. This is an Idolatry beyond that of offering the children to Moloch, Lev. 20. 3. they offered but their children, but this covetous wretch sacrifices himself to his god Mammmon, whilst he often destroys his health, his life, yea, finally his soul too, to save his purse. I have now done with the second head of duty, that to ourselves, contained by the Apostle under the word soberly.

PARTITION X.

Of DUTIES to our NEIGHBOURS. Of JUSTICE, Negative, Positive. Of the sin of MURDER, Of the Heinousness of it, the Punishments of it, and the strange Discoveries thereof. Of Maiming, wounds and stripes.

§ 1. I come now to the third part of duties, those to our Neighbor, which is by the Apostle summed up in gross in the word [righteousness,] by which is meant not only bare justice, but all kind of charity also, for that is now by the law of Christ become a debt to our neighbor, & it is a piece of unrighteousness to defraud him of it. I shall therefore build all the particular duties we owe to our neighbor, on those two general ones, Justice and Charity.

2. I begin with Justice, whereof there are two parts, the one negative, the other positive, the negative justice is to do no wrong, or injury to any. The positive justice is to do right to all; that is, to yield them what soever appertains or is due unto them. I shall first speak of the negative justice the not injuring or wronging any. Now because a man is capable of receiving wrong in several respects; this first part of justice extends its self into several branches, answerable to those capacities of injury. A man may be injured either in his Soul, his body, his possessions, or credit; and therefore this duty of negative justice lays a restraint on us in every of these. That we do no wrong to any man in respect either of his Soul, his body, his possessions, or credit.

3. First, This justice ties us to do no hurt to his Soul; and here my first work must be to examine what harm it is that the soul can receive; it is, we know an invisible substance which we cannot reach with our eye, much less with our swords and weapons, yet for all that it is capable of being hurt and wounded; and that even to death.

4. Now the soul may be considered either in a natural or spiritual sense; in the natural it signifies that which we usually call the mind of a man, and this we all know may be wounded with grief or sadness as Solomon saith Pro. 15. 13. By sorrow of heart the spirit is broken. Therefore whoever does causelessly afflict or grieve his neighbor; he transgresses this part of justice, & hurts, & wrongs his soul. This sort of injury malicious and spiteful men are very often guilty of, they will do things, by which themselves reap no good, nay, often much harm, only that they may vex and grieve another; This is a most savage, inhumane humor, thus to take pleasure in the sadness, and afflictions of others; and whoever harbours it in his heart, may truly be said to be possessed with a Devil, for it is the nature only of those accursed spirits to delight in the miseries of men; and till that be cast out, they are fit only to dwell as the possessed person did, Mar. 5. 2. Among graves and tombs, where there are none capable of receiving affliction by them.

5. But the Soul may be considered also in the spiritual sense, and so it signifies that immortal part of us, which must live eternally, either in bliss, or woe in another world. And the Soul thus understood is capable of two sorts of harm; first, that of sin; secondly, that of punishment, the latter whereof is certainly the consequent of the former; and therefore though God be the inflicter of punishment, yet since it is but the effect of sin, we may justly reckon, that he that draws a man to sin, is likewise the betrayer of him to punishment, as he that gives a man a mortal wound, is the cause of his death; therefore under the evil of sin both are contained, so that I need speak only of that

6. And sure there cannot be a higher sort of wrong, then the bringing this great evil upon the Soul; sin is the disease and wound of the Soul, as being the direct contrary to grace, which is the health, and soundness of it; Now this wound we give to every Soul, whom we do by any means whatsoever draw into sin.

7. The ways of doing that are divers, I shall mention some of them, whereof though some are more direct then others, yet all tend to the same end. Of the more direct ones there is first, the commanding of sin; that is when a person that hath power over another, shall require him to do something which is unlawful; An example of this we have in Nebuchadnezzar's commanding the worship of the golden Image, Dan. 3. 4 and his copy is imitated by any parent or master, who shall require of his child or servant to do any unlawful act. Secondly, there is counseling of sin, when men advise and persuade others to any wickedness: Thus Jobs wife counseled her husband to curse God, Job 2. 7. And Achitophel advised Absalom to go into his Fathers concubines, 2 Sam. 16. 21. Thirdly, there is enticing and alluring to sin, by setting before men the pleasures or profits they shall reap by it. Of this sort of enticement Solomon gives warning, Prov. 1. 10. My son, if sinners entice thee, consent thou not, if they say come with us, let us lay wait for blood, let us lurke privily for the innocent without cause, &c. and verse the 13. you may see what is the bait, by which they seek to allure them; we shall find all precious substance, we shall fill our souls with spoil, cast in thy lot among us, let us all have one purse. Fourthly, there is assistance in sin; that is, when men aid and help others either in contriving or acting a sin. Thus Jonadab helped Amnon in plotting the ravishing of his sister, 2 Sam. 13. all these are direct means of bringing this great evil of sin upon our brethren

8. There are also others, which though they seem more indirect, may yet be as effectual towards that ill end: As first, example in sin; he that sets others an ill pattern does his part to make them imitate it, and too often it hath that effect; there being generally nothing more forcible to bring men into any sinful practice, then the seeing it used by others, as might be instanced in many sins, to which there is no other temptation, but their being in fashion. Secondly, there is encouragement in sin, when either by approving, or else at least by not showing a dislike, we give others confidence to go on in their wickedness. A third means is by justifying and defending any sinful act of another's, for by that we do not only confirm him in his evil, but endanger the drawing others to the like, who may be the more inclinable to it, when they shall hear it so pleaded for. Lastly, the bringing up any reproach upon strict and Christian living, as those do who have the ways of God in derision; this is a means to affright men from the practice of duty, when they see it will bring them to be scorned and despised, this is worse then all the former, not only in respect of the man who is guilty of it (as it is an evidence of the great profaneness of his own heart) but also in regard of others; it having a more general ill effect then any of the former can have, it being the betraying men not only to some single acts of disobedience to Christ, but even to the casting off all subjection to him: By all these means we may draw on ourselves this great guilt of injuring and wounding the souls of our brethren.

9. It would be too long for me to instance in all the several sins, in which it is usual for men to ensnare others, as drunkenness, uncleanness, rebellion, and a multitude more. But it will concern every man for his own particular, to consider sadly what mischiefs of this kind he hath done to any, by all, or any of these means, and to weigh well the greatness of the injury: Men are apt to boast of their innocence towards their neighbors, that they have done wrong to no man, but God knows many that thus brag, are of all others the most injurious persons: perhaps they have not maimed his body, nor stolen his goods; but alas! the body is but the case and cover of the man, and the goods some appurtenances to that, 'tis the soul is the man, and that they can wound and pierce without all remorse, and yet with the adulteress, Prov. 30. 20. say, they have done no wickedness; but glory of their friendly behavior to those whom they thus betray to eternal ruin, for whomsoever thou hast drawn to any sin, thou hast done thy part to ascertain to those endless flames. And then think with thyself how base a treachery this is, thou wouldst call him a treacherous villain, that should while he pretends to embrace a man, secretly stab him; but this of thine is as far beyond that, as the soul is of more value then the body, and hell worse then death. And remember yet farther, that besides the cruelty of it to thy poor brother, it is also most dangerous to thyself, it being that against which Christ hath pronounced a woe, Mat. 18. 7. & ver. 6. he tells us that whoever shall offend (that is, draw into sin) any of those little ones, it were better for him that a millstone were hanged about his neck, and that he were drowned in the depth of the Sea. Thou mayest plunge thy poor brother into perdition, but as it is with wrestlers, he that gives another a fall, commonly falls with him, so thou art like to bear him company to that place of torment.

10. Let therefore thy own and his danger beget in thee a sense of the greatness of this  $\langle \diamond \rangle$ , this horrid piece of injustice to the precious soul of thy neighbor. Bethink thyself seriously to whom thou hast been thus cruel, whom thou hast enticed to drinking, advised to rebellion, alured to lust, stirred up to rage whom thou hast assisted or encouraged in any ill course, or discouraged, and disheartened by thy profane scoffings at piety in general, or at any conscionable strict walking of his in particular; and then draw up a bill of indictment, accuse and condemn thyself, as a Cain, a murderer of thy brother, heartily and deeply bewail all thy guilts of this kind, and resolve never once more to be a stumbling block, as St. Paul calls it, Rom. 14. in thy brothers way.

11. But this is not all, there must be some fruits of this repentance brought forth; now in all sins of injustice, restitution is a necessary fruit of repentance, and so it is here thou hast committed an act (perhaps many) of high injustice to the soul of thy brother, thou hast robbed it of its innocence, of its title to heaven, thou must now endeavor to restore all this to it again, by being more earnest and industrious to win him to repentance, then ever thou wert to draw him to sin, use now as much art to convince him of the danger, as ever thou didst to flatter him with the pleasures of his vice; in a word, countermince thyself by using all those methods, and means to recover him, that thou didst to destroy him, and be more diligent and zealous in it, for 'tis necessary thou shouldst both in regard of h•m and thyself: First, in respect of him, because there is in man's nature so much a greater promptness and readiness to evil, then to good, that there will need much more pains and diligence to instill the one into him, then the other: besides, the man it supposed to be already accustomed to the contrary, which will add much to the difficulty of the work, then in respect of thyself; if thou be a true penitent, thou wilt think thyself obliged, as St. Paul did, to labor more abundantly, and wilt be ashamed, that when thou art trading for God, bringing back a soul to him, thou shouldst not pursue it with more earnestness, then while thou wert an agent of Satan's; besides the remembrance, that thou wert a means of bringing this poor soul into this snare, must necessarily quicken thy diligence to get him out of it: So much for the first part of negative justice, in respect of the souls of our brethren.

12. The second concerns the bodies, and to those also this justice binds thee to do no wrong nor violence. Now of wrongs to the body there may be several degrees, the highest of them is killing, taking away the life, this is forbid in the very letter of the sixth Commandment. Thou shalt do no murder.

13. Murder may be committed either by open violence, when a man either by sword, or any other instrument takes away another's life, immediately, and directly, or it may be done secretly and tracherously, as David murdered Uriah, not with his own sword, but with the sword of the Children of Ammon, 2 Sam. 11. 17. And Jezebel N•both by a false accusation, 1 Kin 21. 13. And so divers have committed this sin of murder by poison, false witness, or some such concealed ways. The former is commonly the effect of a sudden rage, the latter hath several originals, sometimes it proceeds from some old malice fixed in the heart towards the person, sometimes from some covetous or ambitious desires; such a one stands in a man's way to his profit or preferment, and therefore he must be removed; and sometimes again it is to cover shame, as in the case of strumpets, that murder their infants, that they may not betray their filthiness. But besides these more direct ways of killing, there is another, and that is, when by our persuasions and enticements, we draw a man to do that which tends to the shortening of his life, and is apparent to do so; he that makes his neighbor drunk, if by that drunkenness the ma••ome by any mortal hurt, which he would have escaped if he had been sober, he that made him drunk, is not clear of his death, or if he die not by any such sudden accident, yet if drinking cast him into a disease, and that disease kill him, I know not how he that drew him to that excess, can acquit himself of his murder in the eyes of God, though human Laws touch him not. I wish those who make it their business, to draw in customers to that trade of debauchery, would consider it: There is yet another way of bringing this guilt upon ourselves, and that is by inciting, and stirring up others to it, or to that degree of anger, and revenge which produces it: As that sets two persons at variance, or seeing them already so, blows the coals, if murder ensue, he certainly hath his share in the guilt, which is a consideration that ought to affright all from having anything to do in the kindling, or increasing of contention.

14. Now for the heinousness of this sin of murder, I suppose none can be ignorant, that it is of the deepest die, a most loud crying sin; This we may see in the first act of this kind, that ever was committed, Abel's blood cried from the earth, as God tells Cain, Gen. 4. 10. Yea, the guilt of this sin is such, that it leaves a stain even upon the land, where it is committed, such as is not to be washed out, but by the blood of the murderer, as appears, Deut. 19. 12, 13. The land cannot be purged of blood, but by the blood of him that shed it, and therefore though in other cases the flying to the Altar secured a man, yet in this of willful murder no such refuge was allowed, but such a one was to be taken even thence, and delivered up to justice, Exod. 21. 14. Thou shalt take him from my Altar, that he may die. And it is yet farther observable, that the only two precepts which the Scripture mentions, as given to Noah after the flood, were both in relation to this sin, that of not eating blood, Gen. 9. 4. being a ceremony to beget in men a greater horror of this sin of murder, and so intended for the preventing of it. The other was for the punishment of it, Gen. 9. 6. He that sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed, and the reason of this strickness is added in the next words, For in the Image of God made be man; where you see that this sin is not only an injury to our brother, but even the highest contempt, and despite towards God himself, for it is the defacing of his Image, which he hath stamped upon man. Nay yet further, it is the usurping of God's proper right, and authority. For it is God alone, that hath right to dispose of the life of man; 'twas he alone that gave it, and it is he alone that hath power to take it away, but he that murders a man, does, as it were, wrest this power out of God's hand, which is the highest pitch of rebellious presumption.

15. And as the sin is great, so likewise is the punishment; we see it frequently very great, and remarkable, even in this world, (besides those most fearful effects of it in the next) blood not only cries, but it cries for vengeance, and the great God recompenses, as he stiles himself, will not fail to hear it: very many examples the Scripture gives us of this: Ahab and Jezabeel, that murdered innocent Naboth, for greediness of his vineyard, were themselves slain, and the dogs licked their blood in the place, where they had shed his, as you may read in that Story; so Absalom, that slew his brother Amnon, after he had committed that sin, fell into another, that of rebellion against his King and Father, and in it miserably perished. Rechab, and Baanah, that slew Ishbosheth, were themselves put to death, and that by the very person they thought to endear by it; many more instances might be given of this out of the Sacred Story, and many also out of Humane, there having been no age, but hath yielded multitudes of example of this kind, so that every man may furnish himself out of the observations of his own time.

16. And it is worth our notice, what strange and even miraculous means it hath often pleased God to use for the discovery of this sin; the very brute creatures have often been made instruments of it, nay, often the extreme horror of a man's own conscience has made him betray himself, so that it is not any closeness a man uses in the acting of this sin, that can secure him from the vengeance of it, for he can never shut out his own conscience, that will in spite of him be privy to the fact, and that very often proves the means of discovering it to the world, or if it should not do that, yet it will sure act revenge on him, it will be such a hell within him, as will be worse then death: this we have seen in many, who after the commission of this sin have never been able to enjoy a minutes rest, but have had that intolerable anguish of mind, that they have chosen to be their own murderers, rather than live in it. These are the usual effects of this sin even in this world, but those in another are yet more dreadful, where surely the highest degrees of torment belong to this high pitch of wickedness, for if as our Savior tells us, Mat. 5. 22. Hell fire be the portion of him that shall but call his brother fool, what degree of those burnings can we think proportionable, to this so much greater an injury?

17. The consideration of all this ought to possess us with the greatest horror, and abomination of this sin, and to make us extremely watchful of ourselves, that we never fall into it, and to that end to prevent all those occasions which may insensibly draw us into this pit. I mentioned at first several things, which are wont to be originals of it, and at those we must begin, if we will surely guard ourselves. If therefore thou wilt be sure never to kill a man in thy rage, be sure never to be in that rage, for if thou permittest thyself to that, thou canst have no security against the other, anger being a madness that suffers us not to consider, or know what we do, when it has once possessed us. Therefore when thou findest thyself begin to be inflamed, think betimes, whether this may lead thee, if thou lettest loose to it, and immediately put the bridle upon this head-strong passion; so again, if thou wilt be sure thy malice shall not draw thee to it, be sure never to harbor one malicious thought in thy heart, for if it once settle there, it will gather such strength, that within a while thou wilt be perfectly under the power of it, so that it may lead thee even to this horrible sin at its pleasure; be therefore careful at the very first approach of this treacherous gift, to shut the doors against it, never to let it enter thy mind; so also if thou wilt be sure thy covetousness, thy ambition, thy lust, or any other sinful desire shall not betray thee to it, be sure thou never permit any of them to bear any sway with thee, for if they get the dominion, as they will soon do, if they be once entertained in the heart, they will be past thy control, and hurry thee to this or any other sin, that may serve their ends. In like manner if thou wouldst not be guilty of any of the mortal effects of thy neighbors drunkenness, be sure not to entice him to it, nor accompany him at it, and to that purpose do not allow thyself in the same practice, for if thou do, thou wilt be laboring to get company at it. Lastly, if thou wilt not be guilty of the murder committed by another, take heed thou never give any encouragement to it, or contribute anything to that hatred, or contention, that may be the cause of it. For when thou hast either kindled or blowed the fire, what knowest thou whom it may consume; bring always as much water, as thou canst, to quench, but never bring one drop of oil, to increase the flame. The like may be said of all other occasions of this sin, not here mentioned; and this careful preserving ourselves from these, is the only sure way to keep us, from this sin;

therefore as ever thou wouldst keep thyself innocent from the great offense, guard thee warily from all such inlets, those steps and approaches towards it.

18. But although murder be the greatest, yet it is not the only injury that may be done to the body of our neighbor; there are others which are also of a very high nature, the next in degree to this is maiming him, depriving him of any member, or at least of the use of it, and this is a very great wrong and mischief to him, as we may discern by the Judgment of God himself, in the case of the bond-servant, who should by his Masters means lose a member, Ex. 21. 26. the freedom of his whole life was thought but a reasonable recompense for it, He shall let him go free, saith the text, for his eye; Nay, though it were a less considerable part, if it were but a tooth, which of all other may be lost with the least damage, yet the same amends was to be made him, ver. 27.

19. But we need no other way of measuring this injury, then the judgment of every man in his own case; how much does every man dread the loss of a limb, so that if he be by any accident or disease, in danger of it, he thinks no pains or cost too much to preserve it. And then how great an injustice, how contrary to that great rule of doing as we would be done to, is it, for a man to do that to another, which he so unwillingly suffers himself.

But if the person be poor, one that must labor for his living, the injury is yet greater, it is such as may in effect amount to the former sin of murder, for as the wise man says, Ecclesiasticus 24. 21. The poor man's bread is his life, and he that deprives them thereof is a blood-shedder. And therefore he that deprives him of the means of getting his bread by disabling him from labor, is surely no less guilty. In the law it was permitted that to every man that had sustained such a damage by his neighbor to require the Majistrate to inflict the like on him, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, as it is Exod. 21. 24.

20. And though unprofitable revenge be not now allowed to us Christians, yet sure it is the part of everyone, who hath done this injury, to make what satisfaction lies in his power, 'tis true he cannot restore a limb again (which by the way should make men wary, how they do those mischiefs, which it is so impossible for them to repair) but yet he may satisfy for some of the ill effects of that loss; if that have brought the man to want and penury, he may, nay, he must, if he have but the least ability, relieve and support him, yea, though it be by his own extraordinary labor: for if it be a duty of us all to be eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame, as Job speaks, much more must we be so to them, whom ourselves have made blind and lame. Therefore whoever has done this injury to any of his poor brethren, let him know, he is bound to do all that is possible towards the repairing of it, if he do not, every new suffering that the poor man's wants bring upon him, becomes a new charge and accusation against him, at the tribunal of the just Judge.

21. There are yet other degrees of injury to the body of our neighbor, I shall mention only two more, wounds, and stripes; A man may wound another, which though it finally cause loss neither of life nor limb, is yet an endangering of both; and the like may be said of stripes; both of which however are very painful at the present, nay, perhaps very long after, and pain, of all temporal evils, is to be accounted the greatest, for it is not only an evil in itself, but it is such a one, that permits us not, whilst we are under it, to enjoy any other good; A man in pain having no taste of any the greatest delights: If any man despise these, as light injuries, let him again ask himself, how he would like it, to have his own body slasht or bruised, and put to pass under those painful means of cure, which are many times necessary in such cases? I presume there is no man would willingly undergo this from another, and why then should thou offer it to him?

22. The truth is, this strange cruelty to others is the effect of a great pride, and haughtiness of heart, we look upon others with such contempt, that we think it no matter how they are used; we think they must bear blows from us, when in the mean time we are so tender of ourselves, that we cannot hear the least word of disparagement, but we are all on a flame. The provocations to these injuries are commonly so slight, that did not this inward pride dispose us to such an angriness of humor, that we take fire of everything, it were impossible we should be moved by them. Nay some are advanced to such a wantonness of cruelty, that without any provocation at all in cool blood, as they say, they can thus wrong their poor brethren, and make it part of their pastime, and recreation to cause pain to others. Thus some tyrannous humors take such a pleasure in tormenting those under their power, that they are glad, when they can but find a pretence to punish them, and then do it without all moderation, and others will set men together by the ears, only that they may have the sport of seeing the scuffle, like the old Romans, that made it one of their public sports to see men kill one another, and sure we have as little Christianity as they, if we can take delight in such spectacles.

23. This savageness and cruelty of mind is so unbecoming the nature of a man, that he is not allowed to use it even to his beast; how intolerable is it then towards those, that are of the same nature, and which is more, are heirs of the same eternal hopes with us? They that shall thus transgress against their neighbors in any of the foregoing particulars, or what ever else is hurtful to the body, are unjust persons, want even this lowest sort of justice, the negative, to their neighbors, in respect of their bodies.

24. Neither can any man excuse himself by saying what he has done was only in return of some injury offered him by the other, for suppose it be so, that he have indeed received some considerable wrong, yet cannot he be his own revenger without injury to that man, who is not, by being thine enemy, become thy vassal, or slave, to do with what thou list; thou hast never the more right of dominion over him, because he hath done thee wrong, and therefore if thou hadst no power over his body before, 'tis certain thou hast none now, and therefore thou art not only uncharitable (which yet were sin enough to damn thee) but unjust in every act of violence thou doest to him. Nay, this injustice ascends higher, even to God himself, who hath reserved vengeance as his own peculiar right, Vengeance is mine, I will repay, saith the Lord, Rom. 12 19. and then he that will act revenge for himself, what does he, but encroach upon this special right and prerogative of God, snatch the sword, as it were out of his hand, as if he knew better how to weild it? which is at once a robbery, and contempt of the Divine Majesty.

PARTITION XI.

Of JUSTICE, about the Possessions of our Neighbor, against •njuring him as concerning his WIFE, His Goods. Of Malice, Covetousness, Oppression, Theft, Of Paying of Debts, &c.

§. 1. THE third part of negative justice concerns the possessions of our neighbors; what I mean by possessions, I cannot better explain, then by referring you to the tenth Commandment, the end of which is to bridle all covetous appetites and desires towards the possessions of our Neighbor. There we find reckoned up not only his house, servants, and cattle, which may all pass under the one general name of his goods or riches, but particularly his wife, as a principal part of his possessions, and therefore when we consider this duty of negative justice, in respect of the possessions of our Neighbor, we must apply it to both, his wife, as well as his goods.

2. The especial and peculiar right, that every man hath in his wife, is so well known that it were vain to say anything in proof of it; the great impatience that every husband hath to have this right of his invaded, shows that it is sufficiently understood in the world, and therefore none that does this injury to another, can be ignorant of the greatness of it. The corrupting of a man's wife, enticing her to a strange bed, is by all acknowledged to be the worst sort of theft, infinitely beyond that of the goods.

3. Indeed there is in this one a heap of the greatest injustices together; some towards the woman, and some towards the man: Towards the woman, there are the greatest imaginable; it is that injustice to her soul, which was before mentioned as the highest of all others, 'tis the robbing her of her innocence, and setting her in a course of the horredst wickedness (no less then lust and perjury together) from which it is probable she may never return, and then it proves the damning of her eternally. Next it is in respect of this world, the robbing her of her credit, making her abhorred and despised, and her very name a reproach among all men; and besides it is the depriving her of all that happiness of life, which arises from the mutual kindness and affection that is between man and wife, instead whereof this brings in a loathing, and abhorring of each other; from whence flow multitudes of mischiefs, too many to rehearse, in all which man hath his share also.

4. But besides those, there are to him many, and high injustice; for it is first the robbing him of that, which of all other things he accounts most precious, the love and faithfulness of his wife, and that also wherein he hath such an incommunicable right, that himself cannot, if he would, make it over to any other; and therefore sure it cannot without the utmost in justice be torn from him by any: Nor is this all, but it is farther the ingulfing him (if ever he come to discern it) in that most tormenting passion of jealousy, which is of all others the most painful, and which oft puts men upon the most desperate attempts, it being as Soloman says, Prov. 6. 34. The rage of a man. It is yet farther, the bringing upon him all that scorn, and contempt, which by the unjust measures of the world falls on them, which are so abused, and which is by many esteemed the most unsufferable part of the wrong; and though it be true that it is very unjust, he should fall under reproach, only because he is injured, yet unless the world could be new molded, it will certainly be his lot, and therefore it adds much to the injury: Again, this may indeed be a robbery in the usual sense of the word, for perhaps it may be the thrusting in the child of the adulterer into his family, to share both in the maintenance and portions of his own children; and this is an arrand theft; first, in respect of the man, who surely intends not the providing for another man's child; and then in respect of the children, who are by that means defrauded by so much as that goes away with. And therefore whoever hath this circumstance of the sin to repent of, cannot do it effectually, without restoring to the family, as much as he hath by this means robbed it of.

5. All this put together will sure make this the greatest and most provoking injury that can be done to a man, and (which heightens it yet more) it is that, for which a man can never make reparations; for unless it be in the circumstance before mentioned, there is no part of this sin, wherein that can be done; to this purpose it is observable in the Jewish Law, that the thief was appointed to restore fourfold, and that freed him; but the adulterer having no possibility of making any restitution, any satisfaction, he must pay his life for his offense. Lev. 20. 10. And though now a days adulterers speed better, live many days to renew their guilt, and perhaps to laugh at those, whom they have thus injured, yet let them be assured, there must one day be a sad reckoning, and that whether they repent or not: If by God's grace they do come to repentance, they will then find this to be no cheap sin, many anguishes of soul, terrors, and perplexities of conscience, groans, and tears it must cost them, and indeed were a man's whole life spent in these penitential exercises, 'twere little enough to wipe off the guilt of any one single act of this kind; what overwhelming sorrows then are requisite for such a trade of this sin, as too many drive? Certainly it is so great a task, that it is highly necessary for all that are so concerned, to set to it immediately, lest they want time to go through with it; for let no man flatter himself, that the guilt of a course and habit of such a sin can be washed away with a single act of repentance; no he must proportion the repentance to the fault, and as one hath been a habit and course, so must the other also. And then how strange a madness is it for men to run into this sin (and that with such painful pursuits, as many do) which he knows must at the best hand, that is, supposing he do repent of it, cost him thus dear; but then, if he do not repent, infinitely dearer; it looses him all his title to heaven, that place of purity, and gives him his portion in the lake of fire, where the burnings of his lust shall end in those everlasting burnings: For how closely soever he have acted this sin, be it so that he may have said with the adulterer in Job 25. 15. No eye seeth me, yet 'tis sure he could not in the greatest obscurity shelter himself from God's sight, with whom the darkness is no darkness, Psal. 139. 12. And he it is, who hath expressly threatned to judge this sort of offender, Heb. 13 4. Adulterers God will judge. God grant that all that live in this foul guilt may so seasonably, and so thoroughly judge themselves, that they may prevent that severe and dreadful judgment of his.

6. The second thing, to which this negative justice to our neighbors possessions reacheth, is his Goods, under which general word is contained all those several sorts of things, as House, Land, Cattel, Money, and the like, in which he hath a right and property; these we are by the rule of this justice to suffer him to enjoy, without seeking either to work him damage in any of them, or to get any of them to ourselves: I make a difference between these two, because there may be two several grounds, or motives of this injustice; the one malice, the other covetousness.

7. The malicious man desires to work his neighbor mischief, though he get nothing by it himself; 'tis frequently seen, that men will make havoc, and spoil of the goods of one, to whom they bear a grudge, though they never design to get anything to themselves by it, but only the pleasure of doing a spite to the other: This is a most hellish humor, directly answerable to that of the Devil, who bestows all his pains and industry, not to bring in any good to himself but only to ruin and undo others: and how contrary it is to all rules of justice, you may see by the Precept given by God to the Jews concerning the goods of an enemy, where they were so far from being allowed a liberty of spoil and destruction, that they are expressly bound to prevent it, Exod. 23. 45. If thou meet thine enemies ox, or his asse going a stray, thou shalt surely bring it back to him again: If thou see the asse of him that hateth thee lying under his burden, and wouldst forbear to help him, thou shalt surely help with him: Where you see it is a debt we owe to our very enemies, to prevent that loss and damage, which by any accident he is in danger of: and that even with some labor, and pains to ourselves. How horrible an injustice is it then, purposely to bring that loss, and damage on him? Whoever is guilty of this let him never excuse himself by saying, he hath not inriched himself by the spoil of his neighbor, that he hath nothing of it cleave to his finger; for sure this malicious injustice is no less a fault then the covetous one; nay I suppose in respect of the principle & cause, from which it flows, it may be greater, this hatred of another being worse then the immoderate love of ourselves; whoever hath thus mischieft his neighbor, he is as much bound to repair the injury, to make satisfaction for the loss, as if he had enriched himself by it.

8 But on the other side, let not the covetous defrauder therefore judge his sin light because there is another, that in someone respect outweighs it, for perhaps in others his may cast the scales; certainly it does in this one, that he that is unjust for greediness of gain is like to multiply more acts of this sin, then he that is so out of malice; for tis impossible any man should have so many objects of his malice, as he may have of his covetousness; there is no man at so general a defiance with all mankind that he hates everybody; but the covetous man hath as many objects of his vice, as there be things in the world he counts valuable: But I shall not longer stand about this comparison, 'tis sure they are both great and crying sins, and that is ground enough of abhorring each; let us descend now to the several branches of this sort of covetous injustice; 'tis true they may all bear the name of robbery, or theft for in effect they are all so, yet for methods sake it will not be amiss to distinguish them into these three Oppression, Theft, and Deceit.

9. By oppression I mean that open and barefaced robbery, of seizing upon the possessions of others, and owning, and avowing the doing so. For the doing of this there are several instruments: as first that of power, by which many Nations and Princes have been turned out of their rights, and many private men out of their estates; sometimes again. Law is made the instrument of it; he that covets his neighbors lands or goods, pretends a claim to them, and then by corrupting of justice by bribes and gifts, or else over-ruling it by greatness and authority gets judgment on his side: This is a high oppression, and of the worst sort, thus to make the Law, which was intended for the protection, and defense of men's rights, to be the means of overthrowing them; and it is a very heavy guilt, that lies both on him that procures, and on him that pronounces such a sentence, yea and on the lawyer too, that pleads such a cause, for by so doing he assists in the oppression; sometimes again, the very necessities of the oppressed are the means of his oppression; thus it is in the case of extortion, and griping usury; a man is in extreme want of money, and this gives opportunity to the extortioner to rest unconscionably from him, to which the poor man is forced to yield, to supply his present wants. And thus also it is often with exacting Landlords, who when their poor tenants know not how to provide themselves elsewhere, rack and skrew them beyond the worth of the thing. All these and many the like are but several ways of acting this one sin of oppression which becomes yet the more heinous, by how much the more helpless the person is, that is thus oppressed, therefore the oppression of the widow, and fatherless, is in Scripture mentioned, as the height of this sin.

10. It is indeed a most crying guilt, and that against which God hath threatened his heavy vengeance, as we read in divers texts of Scriptures: Thus it is, Ezek. 18. 12. He that hath oppressed the poor, and hath spoiled by violence, he shall surely die, his blood shall be upon him: and the same sentence is repeated against him. ver. 18. Indeed God hath so peculiarly taken upon him the protection of the poor, & oppressed, that he is engaged as it were in honor to be their avenger, and accordingly, Psal 12. We see God solemnly declare his resolution of appearing for them, ver. 5. For the oppression of the poor for the sighing of the needy, now will I arise, saith the Lord, I will set him in safety from him; the advice therefore of Solomon is excellent, Prov. 22. 22. Rob not the poor, because he is poor, neither oppress the afflicted in the gate, for the Lord will plead their cause, and will spoil the soul of those that spoiled them; they are like in the end to have little joy of the booty it brings them in, when it thus engages God against them.

11. The second sort of this injustice is theft, and of that also there are two kinds, the one the withholding what we should pay, and the other taking from our neighbor what is already in his possession.

12. Of the first sort is the not paying of debts, whether such as we have borrowed, or such as by our own voluntary promise are become our debts, for there are equally due to him, that can lay either of these claims to them; and therefore the withholding of either of them is a theft, a keeping from my neighbor that which is his; yet the former of them is rather the more injurious, for by that I take from him that which he once actually had (be it money, or whatsoever else) and so make him worse then I found him: This is a very great, and very common injustice; men can now a days with as great confidence deny him that asks a debt, as they do him, that asks an alms, nay many times 'tis made matter of quarrel for a man to demand his own, besides the many attendances the creditor is put to in pursuit of it, are a yet farther injury to him, by wasting his time, and taking him off from other business, and so he is made a looser that way too. This is so great injustice, that I see not how a man can look upon anything he possesses as his own right, whilst he thus denies another his. It is the duty of every man in debt, rather to strip himself of all, & cast himself again naked upon God's providence, then thus to feather his nest with the spoils of his neighbors. And surely it would prove the more thriving course, not only in respect of the blessing, which may be expected upon justice, compared with the curse, that attends the contrary, but even in worldly prudence also; for he that defers paying of debts, will at last be forst to it by Law, and that upon much worse terms, then he might have done it voluntarily, with a greater charge, & with such a loss of his credit, that afterwards in his greatest necessities he will not know where to borrow. But the sure way for a man to secure himself from the guilt of this injustice, is never to borrow more then he knows he hath means to repay, unless it be one, who knowing his disability, is willing to run the hazard. Otherwise he commits this sin at the very time of borrowing for he takes that from his neighbor upon promise of paying, which he knows he is never likely to restore to him, which is a flat robbery.

The same justice which tyes men to pay their own debts tyes also every surety to pay those debts of others, for which he stands bound, i<sup>n</sup> case the principal either cannot or will not: for by being bound, he hath made it his own debt, and must in all justice answer it to the creditor, who, its presumed was drawn to lend, on confidence of his security, and therefore is directly cheated and betrayed by him, if he see him not satisfied. If it be thought hard, that a man should pay for that, which he never received benefit by, I shall yield it, so far as to be just matter of wariness to every man how he enter into such engagements, but it can never be made an excuse for the breaking them.

As for the other sort of debt, that which is brought upon a man by his own voluntary promise, that also cannot without great injustice be withholden; for it is now the man's right, and then 'tis no matter, by what means it came to be so. Therefore we see David makes it part of the description of a just man, Psal. 15. 4. that he keeps his promise, yea, though they were made to his own disadvantage; and surely he is utterly unfit to ascend to that Holy Hill, there spoken of, either as that signifies the Church here, or Heaven hereafter, that does not punctually observe this part of justice. To this sort of debt may be reduced the wages of the servant, the hire of the laborer, and the withholding of these is a great sin, and the complaints of those that are thus injured, ascend up to God. Behold (saith St. James) the hire of the laborers which have reaped down your fields, which is of you kept back by fraud, cryeth, and the cries of them that have reaped, are entered into the ears of the Lord of Sabbaths: and Deut. 24. 14, 15. we find a strict command in this matter. Thou shalt not oppress an hired servant that is poor and needy, at his day thou shalt give him his hire, neither shall the Sun go down upon it, for he is poor, and setteth his heart upon it, lest he cry against thee to the Lord, and it be sin unto thee. This is one of those loud clamourous sins, which will not cease crying, till it bring down God's vengeance, and therefore though thou have no justice to thy poor brother, yet have at least so much mercy to thyself, as not to pull down judgements on thee by thus wronging him.

PARTITION XII.

Of THEFT; Stealing the Goods of our Neighbor. Of DECEIT in Trust, in Traffick. Of RESTITUTION, &c.

§. 1. THE second part of theft is the taking from our neighbor that which is already in his possession; and this may be done either more violently, and openly, or else more closely, and slyly; The first is the manner of those that rob on the way, or plunder houses, where by force they take the goods of their neighbor; The other is the way of the pilfering thief, that takes away a man's goods unknown to him; I shall not dispute, which of these is the worst, 'tis enough that they are both such acts of injustice, as make men odious to God, unfit for human society, and betray the actors to the greatest mischiefs even in this world, death itself being by Law appointed the reward of it; and there are few that follow this Trade long, but at last meet with that fruit of it. I am sure 'tis madness for any to believe he shall always steal securely, for he is to contend with the industry of all those, whom he shall thus injure, whose losses will quicken their wits for the finding him out, and which is infinitely more, he is to struggle with the justice of God, which doth usually pursue such men to destruction, even in this world; witness the many strange discoveries, that have been made of the craftiest thieves. But however, if he were secure from the vengeance here, I am sure nothing but repentance and reformation can secure him from the vengeance of it hereafter. And now when these dangers are weighed, 'twill surely appear, that the thief makes a pitiful bargain, he steals his neighbors money, or cattle, and in exchange for it he must pay his life, or his Soul, perhaps both, and if the whole world be too mean a price for a Soul, as he tells us, Mar. 18. 36. who best knew the value of them, having himself bought them, what a strange madness is it, to barter them away for every petty trifle▪ as many do, who have got such a habit of stealing, that not the meanest worthless thing can escape their fingers? Under this head of theft may be ranked the receivers of stolen goods, whether those that take them, as partners in the theft, or those that buy them, when they know or believe they are stolen. This many (that pretend much to abhor theft,) are guilty of, when they can by it, buy the thing a little cheaper than the common rate. And here also comes in the concealing of any goods a man finds of his neighbors, which whosoever restores not, if he know, or can learn out the owner, is no better than a thief, for he withholds from his neighbor that which properly belongs to him: and sure 'twill not be uncharitable to say, that he that will do this, would likewise commit the grosser theft, were he by that no more in danger of Law than in this he is.

The third part of injustice is deceit, and in that there may be as many acts as there are occasions of intercourse and dealing between man and man.

2. It will be impossible to name them all, but I think they will be contained under these two general deceits in matters of Trust, and in matters of Traffick, or bargaining; unless it be that of Gaming, which therefore here by the way, I must tell you, is as much a fraud and deceit as any of the rest.

3. He that deceives a man in any trust, that is committed to him, is guilty of a great injustice, and that the most treacherous sort of one, it is the joining of two great sins in one, defrauding, and promise-breaking; for in all trusts there is a promise implied, if not expressed, for the very accepting of the trust contains under it a promise of fidelity; these trusts are broken sometimes to the living, sometimes to the dead; to the living there are many ways of doing it, according to the several kinds of the trust; sometimes a trust is more general, like that of Potiphar to Joseph, Gen. 39. 4. a man commits to another all that he hath, and thus guardians of children, and sometimes stewards are entrusted; sometimes again it is more limited, and restrained to someone special thing: A man intrusts another to bargain, or deal for him in such a particular, or he puts someone thing into his hands, to manage, and dispose: Thus among servants it is usual for one to be entrusted with one part of the Masters goods, and another with another part of them. Now in all these, and the like cases, whosoever acts not for him that intrusts him, with the same faithfulness, that he would for himself but shall either carelessly loose, or prodigally imbezel the things committed to him, or else convert them to his own use, he is guilty of this great sin of betraying a trust to the living. In like manner he that being entrusted with the execution of a dead man's Testament, acts not according to the known intention of the dead man, but enriches himself by what is assigned to others, he is guilty of this sin, in respect of the dead; which is so much the greater, by how much the dead hath no means of remedy, and redress, as the living may have. It is a kind of robbing of graves, which is a theft of which men naturally have such a horror, that he must be a very hardened thief, that can attempt it. But either of these frauds are made yet more heinous, when either God, or the poor are immediately concerned in it; that is, when anything is committed to a man, for the uses either of piety, or charity: this adds sacrilege to both the fraud, and the treachery, and so gives him title to all those curses, that attend those several sins, which are so heavy, that he that for the present gain will adventure on them, makes as ill, nay, a much worse bargain, then Geh•zi, 1 Kings 5. 27. who by getting the raiment of Naam in got his leprosy too.

4. The second sort of fraud is in matters of traffick and bargain, wherein there may be deceit both in the seller, and buyer; That of the seller is commonly either in concealing the faults of the commodity, or else in over-rateing it.

5. The ways of concealing its faults are ordinarily these, either first by denying that it hath any such fault, nay, perhaps commending it for the direct contrary quality, and this is downright lying, and so adds that sin to the other, and if that lie be confirmed by an oath, as it is too usually, then the yet greater guilt of perjury comes in also; and then what a heap of sins is here gathered together? abundantly enough to sink any poor Soul to destruction, and all this only to skrew a little more money out of his neighbors pocket, and that sometimes so very little, that 'tis a miracle that any man that thinks he has a Soul, can set it at so miserable a contemptible price. A second means of concealing is by using some Art to the thing, to make it look fair, and to hide the faults of it, and this is acting a lie, though it be not speaking one, which amounts to the same thing, and has surely in this case as much of the intention of cheating, and defrauding as the most impudent forswearing can have. A third means, is the picking out ignorant chapmen; This is, I believe, an Art too well known among tradesmen, who will not bring out their faulty wares to men of skill, but keep them to put off to such, whose unskillfulness may make them passable with them; and this is still the same deceit with the former, for it all tends to the same end, the cozening and defrauding of the chapman, and then it is not much odds, whether I make use of my own Art, or his weakness for the purpose. This is certain, he that will do justly, must let his chapman know what he buys, and if his own skill enable him not to judge (nay, if he do not actually find out the fault) thou art bound to tell it him, otherwise thou makest him pay for somewhat, which is not there, he presum•ng there is that good quality in it, which thou knowest is not, & therefore thou mayest as honestly take his money for some goods of another man's, which thou knowest thou canst never put into his possession, which I suppose no man will deny to be an arrant cheat. To this head of concealment may be referred, that deceit of false weights and measures, for that is the concealing from the buyer a defect in the quantity, as the other was in the quality of the commodity, and is again the making him pay for what he hath not. This sort of fraud is pointed at particularly by Solomon, Prov. 11. 1. with this note upon it, that it is an abomination to the Lord.

6. The second part of fraud in the seller, lies in over-rating the commodity; though he have not disguised, or concealed the faults of it, and so have dealt fairly in that respect, yet if he set an unreasonable price upon it, he defrauds the buyer: I call that an unreasonable price, which exceeds the true worth of the thing, considered with those moderate gains, which all tradesmen are presumed to be allowed in the Sale; Whatever is beyond this must in all likelihood be fetched in by some of these ways: As first, by taking advantage of the buyers ignorance in the value of the thing, which is the same with doing it in the goodness, which hath already been shown to be a deceit: or secondly, by taking advantage of his necessity; thou findest a man hath present and urgent need of such a thing, and therefore takest this opportunity to set the dice upon him, but this is that very sin of extortion, and oppression spoken of before; for it is sure, nothing can justly raise the price of anything, but either its becoming dearer to thee, or its being some way better in its self, but the necessity of thy brother causes neither of these; his nakedness doth not make the clothes thou sellest him stand thee in ever the more, neither doth it make them any way better, and therefore to rate them ever the higher, is to change thy way of trading, and sell even the wants and necessities of thy neighbor, which sure is a very unlawful vocation. Or thirdly, it may be by taking advantage of the indiscretion of the chapman; A man perhaps earnestly fancies such a thing, and then suffers that fancy so to over-rule his reason, that he resolves to have it upon any terms; If thou findest this in him, and thereupon raisest thy rate, this is to make him buy his folly, which is of all others the dearest purchase, 'tis sure his fancy adds nothing to the real value, no more then his necessity did in the former case, and therefore should not add to the price. He therefore that will deal justly in the business of selling, must not catch at all advantages, which the temper of his chapman may give, but consider soberly, what the things is worth, and what he would afford it for to another, of whom he had no such advantage, and accordingly rate it to him at no higher a price.

7. On the buyers part there are not ordinarily so many opportunities of fraud, yet it is possible a man may sometimes happen to sell somewhat, the worth whereof he is not acquainted with, and then it will be as unjust for the buyer to make gain by his ignorance, as in the other case it was for the seller; but that which oftener falls out, is the case of necessity, which may as probably fall on the sellers side, as the buyers; A man's wants compel him to sell, and permit him not to stay to make the best bargain, but forces him to take the first offer; and here for the buyer to grate upon him, because he sees him in that strait, is the same fault, which I before shown it to be in the seller.

8. In this whole business of traffick there are so many opportunities of deceit that a man had need fence himself with a very firm resolution, nay, love of justice, or he will be in danger to fall under temptation, for as the wise man speaks Eccles. 27. 2. As a nail sticks fast between the joinings of the stones, so doth sin stick close between buying and selling; it is so interwoven with all trades, so mixed with the very first principles, and grounds of them, that it is taught together with them, and so becomes part of the Art, so that he is now a days scarce thought fit to manage a Trade, that wants it, while he that has most of this black Art of defrauding, applauds and hugs himself, nay, perhaps boasts to others, how he hath over-reached his neighbor.

What an intolerable shame is this, that we Christians, who are by the precepts of our Master set to those higher duties of Charity, should instead of practicing them, quite unlearn those common rules of justice, which mere nature teaches? For, I think, I may say, there are none of those several branches of injustice towards the possessions of our neighbor, which would not be adjudged to be so by any sober Heathen, so that, as Saint Paul tells those of the Circumcision, that the name of God was Blasphemed among the Gentiles, by that unagreeableness that was betwixt their practice, and their Law, Rom. 2. 24. So may it now be said of us, that the Name of Christ is Blasphemed among the Turks and Heathens, by the vile and scandalous lives of us, who call ourselves Christians, and particularly in this sin of injustice; For shame let us at last endeavor to wipe off this reproach from our profession, by leaving these practices, to which me thinks this one single consideration should be enough to persuade us.

9. Yet besides this, there want not other; Among which, one there is of such a nature, as may prevail with the arrantest worldling, and that is, that this course doth not really tend to the enriching of him; there is a secret curse goes along with it, which like a canker eats out all the benefit was expected from it. This no man can doubt that believes the Scripture, where there are multitudes of Texts to this purpose: thus Prov. 22. 16. He that oppresseth the poor to increase his riches, shall surely come to want. So Hab. 2. 6. Woe to him that increaseth that which is not his, how long? And he that ladeth himself with thick clay: shall they not rise up suddenly that shall bite thee, and awake that shall vex thee? and thou shalt be for booties to them. This is commonly the fortune of those that spoil and deceive others, they at last meet with some that do the like to them. But the place in Zacharias is most full to this purpose, Chap. 5. where under the sign of a flying roll is signified the curse, that goes forth against this sin, ver. 4. I will bring it forth, saith the Lord of Hosti, and it shall enter into the house of the thief, and into the house of him that sweareth falsely by my Name, and it shall consume it with the timber thereof, and with the stones thereof. Where you see theft, and perjury are the two sins, against which this curse is aimed (and they too often go together in the matter of defrauding) and the nature of this curse is, to consume the house, to make an utter destruction of all that belongs to him that is guilty of either of these sins. Thus whilst thou art ravening after thy neighbors goods, or house, thou are but gathering fuel to burn thine own. And the effect of these threatenings of God we daily see in the strange improsperousness of ill gotten estates, which every man is apt enough to observe in other men's cases; he that sees his neighbor decline in his estate, can presently call to mind, this was gotten by oppression or deceit, yet so sottish are we, so bewitched with the love of gain, that he that makes this observation, can seldom turn it to his own use, is never the less greedy, or unjust himself for that vengeance he discerns upon others.

10. But alas, if thou couldst be sure that thy unjust possession, should not be torn from thee, yet when thou rememberest, how dear thou must pay for them in another world, thou hast little reason to brag of thy prize. Thou thinkest thou hast been very cunning, when thou hast over-reached thy brother, but God knows all the while, there is another over-reaching thee, and cheating thee of what is infinitely more precious, even thy Soul; the Devil herein deals with thee as fishers use to do; those that will catch a great fish, will bait the hook with a less, and so the great one coming with greediness to devour that, is himself taken; So thou that art gaping to swallow up thy poor brother, art thyself made a prey to that great devourer. And alas! what will it ease thee in Hell, that thou hast left wealth behind thee upon earth, when thou shalt there want that, which the meanest beggar here enjoys, even a drop of water to cool thy tongue. Consider this, and from henceforth resolve to employ all that pains and diligence thou hast used to deceive others, in rescuing thyself from the frauds of the grand deceiver.

11. To this purpose it is absolutely necessary, that thou make Restitution to all whom thou hast wronged; For as long as thou keepest anything of the unjust gain, 'tis as it were an earnest penny from the Devil, which gives him full right to thy Soul. But perhaps it may be said, it will not in all cases be possible to make Restitution to the wronged party, peradventure he may be dead; in that case then make it to his heirs, to whom his right descends. But it may further be objected, that he that hath long gone on in a course of fraud, may have injured many, that he cannot now remember, and many that he has no means of finding out; In this case all I can advise is this: First, to be as diligent as is possible, both in recalling to mind who they were, and endeavoring to find them out; and when, after all thy care, that proves impossible, let thy Restitutions be made to the poor, and that they may not be made by halves, be as careful as thou canst to reckon every the least mite of unjust gain, but when that cannot exactly be done, as 'tis sure it cannot by those who have multiplied the acts of fraud, yet even there let them make some general measures, whereby to proportion their restitution: as for example, a tradesman that cannot remember how much he has cheated in every single parcel, yet may possibly guess in the gross whether he have usually over-reached to the value of a third, or a fourth part of the wares, and then what proportion soever he think he has so defrauded, the same proportion let him now give out of that estate he hath raised by his Trade; but herein it concerns every man to deal uprightly, as in the presence of God, and not to make advantage of his own forgetfulness, to the cutting short to the Restitution, but rather go on the other hand, and be sure rather to give too much, then too little. If he do happen to give somewhat over, he need not grudge the charge of such a sin offering, and 'tis sure he will not, if he do heartily desire an atonement. Many other difficulties there may be in this business of restitution, which will not be foreseen, and so cannot now be particularly spoke to; but the more of those there are, the greater horror ought men to have of running into the sin of injustice, which it will be so difficult, if not impossible for them to repair, and the more careful ought they to be to mortify that, which is the root of all injustice, to wit Covetousness.

PARTITION. XIII.

Of FALSE REPORTS, False Witness. Slanders Whisperings. Of Despising and Scoffing for infirmities; Calamities; Si•s. &c. Of POSITIVE JUSTICE, Speaking the TRUTH, Of LYING. Of Humility and Pride. Of Envy and Detraction. Of Gratitude, &c.

§ 1: THE Fourth Branch of Negative Justice concerns the credit o• our neighbors, which we are not to lessen, or impair by any means, particularly not by false reports: Of false reports there may be two sorts, the one is when a man says something of his neighbor, which he directly knows to be false, the other when possibly he has some slight surmize, or jealousy of the thing; but that upon such weak grounds, that 'tis as likely to be false as true. In either of these cases, there is a great guilt lies upon the reporter; that there doth so in the first of them, nobody will doubt, everyone acknowledging that it is the greatest baseness to invent a lie of another; but there is as little reason to question the other, for he that reports a thing as a truth, which is but uncertain, is a liar also, or if he do not report it as a certainty, but only as a probability, yet then though he be not guilty of the lie, yet he is of the injustice, of robbing his neighbor of his credit; for there is such an aptness in men to believe ill of others, that any the lightest jealousy will, if once it be spread abroad, serve for that purpose; and sure it is a most horrible injustice upon every slight surmize, and fancy, to hazard the bringing so great an evil upon another; especially when it is considered, that those surmizes commonly spring rather from some censoriousness, peevishness, or malice in the surmizer, then from any real fault in the person so suspected.

2. The manner of spreading these false r•ports of both kinds, is not always the same; sometimes it is more open and avowed, sometimes more close and private: the open is many times by false witness before the Court of Justice; and this not only hurts a man in his credit, but in other respects also; 'tis the delivering him up to the punishment of the Law, and according to the nature of the crime pretended, does him more or less mischief; but if it be of the highest kind, it may concern his life, as we see it did in Naboth's case, 1 Kin. 21. How great and crying a sin it is in this respect, as also in that of the perjury, you may learn from what hath been said of both those sins. I am now to consider it only, as it touches the credit; and to that it is a most grievous wound, thus to have a crime publicly witnessed against one, and such as is scarce curable by anything that can afterwards be done to clear him, and therefore whoever is guilty of this, doth a most outrageous injustice to his neighbor; this is that which is expressly forbidden in the ninth Commandment, and was by God appointed to be punished by the inflicting of the very same suffering upon him, which his false testimony aimed to bring upon the other. Deut. 19. 16.

3. The second open way of spreading these reports, is by a public and common declaring of them; though not before the Magistrate, as in the other case, yet in all companies, and before such as are likely to carry it farther, and this is usually done with bitter railings, and reproaches, it being an ordinary act of slanderers, to revile those whom they slander, that so by the sharpness of the accusation they may have the greater impression in the minds of the hearers; this both in respect of the slander, and the railing, is a high injury, and both of them such, as debar the committers from heaven; thus Psal. 15. where the upright man is described, that shall have his part there, this is one special thing, verse. 3. That he slendereth not his neighbor; And for railing, the Apostle in several places reckons it amongst those works of the flesh, which are to shut men out both from the Church here by excommunication, as you may see 1 Cor. 5. 11. and from the Kingdom of God hereafter, as it is, 1 Cor. 6. 10.

4. The other more close and private way of spreading such reports, is that of the Whisperer, he that goes about from one to another, and privately vents his slanders, not out of an intent by that means to make them less public, but rather more; this trick of delivering them by way of secret, being the way to make them both more believed, and more spoken of too; for he that receives such a tale▪ as a secret from one, thinks to please somebody else, by delivering it as a secret to him also; and so it passes from one hand to another, till at last it spread over a whole Town: This sort of slanderer is of all other; the most dangerous, for he works in the dark, tyes all he speaks to, not to own him as the author, so that whereas in the more public accusations, the party may have some means of clearing himself, and detecting his accuser, here he shall have no possibility of that, the slander, like a secret poison, works incurable effects, before ever the man discern it. This sin of whispering is by St. Paul mentioned among those great crimes, which are the effects of a reprobate mind, Rom. 1. 29. It is indeed one of the most injurable wounds of this sword of the tongue; the very bane and pest of human society; and that which not only robs single persons of their good names, but oftentimes whole families, nay, public societies of men of their peace, what ruins, what confusions has this one sin wrought in the world? 'Tis Solomon's observation, Prov. 18 28. That a whisperer separateth chief friends, and sure one may truly say of tongues thus employed, that they are set on fire of Hell, as St. James saith, Chap. 3. 6.

5. This is such a guilt that we are to beware of all degrees of approach to it, of which there are several steps; the first is the giving ear to, and cherishing of those that come with slanders, for they that entertain and receive them, encourage them in the practice; for as our common proverb says, if there were no receivers, there would be no thief; so if there were none, that would give an ear to tales, there would be no tale bearers. A second step is, the giving too easy credit to them, for this helps them to attain part of their end, they desire to beget a general ill opinion of such a man, but the way of doing it must be by causing it, first, in particular men: and if thou suffer them to do it in thee, they have so far prospered in their aim. And for thy own part thou dost a great injustice to thy neighbor, to believe ill of him without a just ground, which the accusation of such a person certainly is not. A third step, is the reporting to others, what is thus told thee; by which thou makest thyself directly a party in the slander, and after thou hast unjustly withdrawn from thy neighbor, thy own good opinion, endeavourest to rob him also of that of others. This is very little below the guilt of the first whisperer, and tends as much to the ruin of our neighbors credit. And these several degrees have so close a dependence one upon another, that it will be very hard for him that allows himself the first, to escape the other; and indeed he that can take delight to hear his neighbor defamed, may well be presumed of so malicious a humor, that 'tis not likely he should stick at spreading the slander. He therefore that will preserve his innocence in this matter, must never in the least degree cherish or countenance any that brings these false reports. And it is not less necessary to his peace, then to his innocence; for he that once entertains them, must never expect quiet, but shall be continually incited and stirred up even against his nearest, and dearest relations; so that this whisperer, and slanderer is to be looked on by all, as a common enemy, he being so as well to those to whom, as of whom he speaks.

6. But besides this grosser way of slandering, there is another, whereby we may impair, and lessen the credit of our neighbor, and that is by contempt, and despising; one common effect whereof is scoffing, and deriding him. This is very injurious to a man's reputation, for the generality of men do rather take up opinions upon trust, than judgment; and therefore if they see a man despised, and scorned, they will be apt to do the like. But besides this effect of it, there is a present injustice in the very act of despising, and scorning others. There are ordinarily but three things, which are made the occasions of it (unless it be with such, with whom virtue and godliness are made the most reproachful things, and such despising is not only an injury to our neighbor, but even to God himself, for whose sake it is, that he is so despised) those three are first the infirmities, secondly the calamities, thirdly the sins of a man, and each of these are very far from being ground of our triumphing over him.

7. First, for infirmities, be they either of body or mind, the deformity and unhandsomeness of the one, or the weakness, and folly of the other, they are things out of his power to help, they are not his faults, but the wise dispensations of the great Creator, who bestows the excellencies of body and mind, as he pleases, and therefore to scorn a man because he hath them not, is in effect to reproach God who gave them not to him.

8. So also for the calamities, and miseries, that befall a man, be it want, or sickness, or what ever else, these also come by the providence of God, who raiseth up, and pulleth down, as seems good to him, and it belongs not to us to judge, what are the motives to him to do so, as many do, who upon any affliction that befalls another, are presently concluding, that sure it is some extraordinary guilt, which pulls this upon him, though they have no particular to lay to his charge. This rash judgment our Savior reproves in the Jews, Lu. 13. where on occasion of the extraordinary sufferings of the Galileans, he asks them, ver. 2. suppose ye that these Galileans were sinners above all the Galileans, because they suffered such things? I tell you nay, but except you repent, ye shall all likewise perish: when we see God's hand heavy upon others, it is no part of our business to judge them, but ourselves, and by repentance to prevent, what our own sins have deserved. But to reproach, and revile any, that are in affliction, is that barbarous cruelty, taken notice of by the Psalmist, as the heighth of wickedness, Psal. 69. 26. They persecute him whom thou hast smitten, and they talk to the grief of them whom thou hast wounded: In all the miseries of others, compassion becomes a debt to them; how unjust are they then, that instead of paying them that debt, afflict them with scorn and reproach?

9. Nay the very sins of men, though as they have more of their wills in them, they may seem more to deserve reproach, yet certainly they also oblige us to the former duty of compassion, and that in the highest degree, as being the things, which of all others make a man the most miserable; in all these cases, if we consider how subject we are to the like ourselves; and that is not only God's mercy to us, by which we are preserved from the worst that any man else is under, it will surely better become us to look up to him with thankfulness, then down on them with contempt, and despising. Thus you see the direct injustice of scorning and contemning our brethren, to which when that other is added, which naturally follows, as a consequent of this, to wit, the begetting the like contempt in others, there can sure be no doubt of its being a great, and horrible injustice to our neighbor, in respect of his credit.

10. Now how great the injury of destroying a man's credit is, may be measured by these two things, first the value of the thing he is robbed of, and secondly the difficulty of making reparations. For the first, 'tis commonly known, that a man's good name is a thing he holds most precious, oftentimes dearer then his life, as we see by the hazards men sometimes run to preserve even a mistaken reputation; but 'tis sure it is that, which hath even by sober men been esteemed one of the greatest happiness of life: And to some sorts of men, such especially as subsist by dealings in the world, tis so necessary, that it may well be reckoned as the means of their livelihood, and then sure 'tis no slight matter to rob a man of what is thus valuable to him.

11. Secondly, the difficulty of making reparations increaseth the injury, and that is such in this case of defamation, that I may rather cal it an impossibility, then a difficulty: For when men are possessed with an ill opinion of a person, 'tis no easy matter to work it out; so that the slanderer is herein like a young Conjuror, that raises a Devil he knows not how to lay again. Nay suppose men were generally as willing to lay down ill conceits of their neighbors, as they are to take them up, yet how is it possible for him that makes even the most public recantation of his slander, to be sure that every man that hath come to the hearing of the one, shall do so of the other also? And if there be but one person, that doth not (as probably there will be many) then is the reparation still short of the injury.

12. This consideration is very fit to make men afraid of doing this wrong to their neighbor; but let it not be made use of to excuse those, that have already done the wrong, from endeavoring to make the best reparations they can; for though 'tis odd, it will not equal the injury, yet let them however do what they are able towards it: And this is so necessary towards the obtaining pardon of the sin that none must expect the one, that do not perform the other. Whosoever therefore sets himself to repent of his faults of this kind, must by all prudent means endeavor to restore his neighbor to that degree of credit he hath deprived him of; and if that be not to be done without bringing the shame upon himself, of confessing publicly the slander, he must rather submit to that, then be wanting to this necessary part of justice, which he owes to the wronged party.

13. Thus have I gone through these four branches of Negative Justice to our neighbor, wherein we must yet farther observe, that this justice binds us not only in respect of our words, and actions, but of our very thoughts, and affections also; we are not only forbid to hurt, but to hate, not only restrained from bringing any of these evils forementioned upon him, but we must not so much as wish them before, nor delight in them after they are befallen him: We must take no pleasure either in the sin of his Soul, or hurt of his body; we must not envy him any good thing he enjoys, nor so much as wish to possess ourselves of it: Neither will it suffice us, that we so bridle our tongue, that we neither slander, or revile, if we have that malice in our hearts, which makes us wish his discredit or rejoice, when we find it procured, though we have no hand in the procuring it. This is the peculiar property of God's Laws, that they reach to the heart, whereas men's can extend only to the words, and actions; and the reason is clear, because he is the only Law-giver, that can see what is in the heart, therefore if there were the perfectest innocence in our tongue, and hands, yet if there be not this purity of heart, it will never serve to acquit us before him. The counsel therefore of Solomon is excellent, Prov. 4. 23. Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life. Let us strictly guard that, so that no malicious unjust thought enter there, and that not only, as it may be the means of betraying us to the grosser act, but also as it is in itself such a pollution in God's sight, as will unfit us for the blessed vision of God, whom none but the pure in heart have promise of seeing, Mat. 5. 8. Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

14. I come now to speak of the Positive part of Justice, which is the yielding to every man that which by any kind of right he may challenge from us. Of these dues there are some, that are general to all mankind, others that are restrained within some certain conditions, and qualities of men, and become due only by virtue of those qualifications.

15. Of the first sort, that is those, that are due to all men, we may reckon first the speaking truth, which is a common debt we owe to all mankind; speech is given us as the instrument of intercourse and society, one with another, the means of discovering the mind, which otherwise lies hid, and concealed, so that were it not for this, our conversations would be but the same as of beasts; Now this being intended for the good and advantage of mankind, 'tis a due to it, that it be used to that purpose. But he that lies, is so far from paying that debt, that on the contrary he makes his speech the means of injury and deceiving him he speaks to.

16. There might much be said to show the several sorts of Obligations we lie under, to speak truth to all men; but supposing I write to Christians, I need not insist on any other, then the Commands we have of it in Scripture, thus Eph. 4. 25. the Apostle commands, that putting away lying, they speak every man truth with his neighbor: and again, Col. 3. 9. Lye not one to another: and Pro. 6 17. a lying tongue is mentioned as one of those things that are abominations to the Lord. Yea, so much doth he hate a lie, that it is not the most pious and Religious end, that can reconcile him to it, the man that lies, though in a zeal to God's glory, shall yet be judged as a sinner, Rom. 3. 7. what shall then become of those multitudes of men that lie on quite other ends? some out of malice, to mischief others, out of covetousness to defraud their neighbors, some out of pride, to set themselves out, and some out of fear, to avoid a danger, or hide a fault. But of a yet stranger sort, then all these, are those, that do it without any discernible temptation, that will tell lies by way of story, take pleasure in telling incredible things, from which themselves reap nothing, but the reputation of impertinent liars.

17. Among these divers kinds of falsehoods, Truth is become such a rarity among us, that it is a most difficult matter, to find such a man as David describes Psal. 15. 2. That speaketh the truth from his heart. Men have so glibbed their tongues to lying, that they do it familiarly upon any or no occasion, never thinking that they are observed either by God or man. But they are extremely deceived in both, for there is scarce any sin (that is at all endeavored to be hid) which is more discernible even to men: they that have a custom of lying, seldom fail (be their memory never so good) at some time or other to betray themselves; and when they do, there is no sort of sin, meets with greater scorn, and reproach; a liar being by all accounted a title of the greatest infamy, and shame. But as for God, 'tis madness to hope that all their Arts can disguise them from him, who needs none of those casual ways of discovery, which men do, but sees the heart, and so knows at the very instant of speaking, the falsehood of what is said; and then by his title of the God of Truth, is tied not only to hate, but punish it, and accordingly you see Rev. 20. that the liars are in the number of those that are shut out of the New Jerusalem, and not only so, but also have their part in the lake that burneth with Fire and Brimstone. If therefore thou be not of the humor of that unjust Judge Christ speaks of, Luk. 18 2 Who neither feared God, nor regarded man, thou must resolve on this part of Justice the putting away lying, which is abhorred by both.

18. A second thing we owe to all is humanity and courtesy of behavior, contrary to that churlishness we find spoken of in Nabal, who was of such a temper, that a man could not speak to him. 1 Sam. 25. 17. There is sure so much of respect due to the very nature of mankind, that no accidental advantage of wealth or honor, which one man hath above another, can acquit him from that debt to it, even in the person of the meanest; and therefore that crabbed and harsh behavior to any that bears but the form of a man, is an injustice to that nature he partakes of. And when we consider how much that nature is dignified by the Son of God his taking it upon him, the obligation to reverence it is yet greater, and consequently the sin of thus contemning it.

19 This is the common guilt of all proud and haughty persons, who are so busy in admiring themselves, that they over look all that is valuable in others, and so think they owe not so much as common civility to other men, whilst they set up themselves as Nebuchadnezzar did his Image to be worshipped of all. This is sure very contrary to what the Apostle exhorts, Rom. 12. 10. In honor prefer one another: and again Phil 2. 4. Lo•k, not every man on his own things, but every man also on the things of others; and let such remember the sentence of our blessed Savior. Luk. 14. 11. He that exalteth himself shall be abased, and he that humbleth himself shall be exalted, which we often find made good to us, in the strange down-falls of proud men. And it is no wonder, for this sin makes both God and men our enemies, God, as the Scripture everywhere testifies, abhors it, and all that are guilty of it, and men are by means of it used so contemptuously & unkindly by us, that they are by nothing more provoked against us, and then whom God and man thus resist, who shall secure and uphold?

20. A third thing we owe to all is Meekness; that is, such a patience, and gentleness towards all, as may bridle that mad passion of anger, which is not only very uneasy to ourselves, as hath already been shown, but also very mischievous to our neighbors, as the many outrages, that are oft committed in it, do abundantly testify. That this duty of meekness is to be extended to all men, there is no doubt, for the Apostle in express words commands it, 1 Thes. 5. 14. Be patient towards all men, and that it should seem in spite of all provocation to the contrary, for the very next words are, See that none render evil for evil, or railing for railing; and Timothy is commanded to exercise this meekness even towards them who oppose themselves against the Doctrine of the Gospel, 2 Tim. 2. 25. which was a case, wherein some heat would probably have been allowed, if it might have been in any.

21. This virtue of meekness is so necessary to the preserving the peace of the world, that it is no wonder, that Christ, who came to plant peace among men, should injoin meekness to all. I am sure the contrary effects of rage and anger are everywhere discernible, it breeds disquiets in Kingdoms, in Neighbourhoods, in Families, and even between the nearest relations; 'tis such a humor, that Solomon warns us never to enter a friendship with a man that is of it, Prov. 22. 24. Make no friendship with an angry man, and with a furious man thou shalt not go. It makes a man unfit to be either friend or companion, and indeed makes one insufferable to all that have to do with one, as we are again taught by Solomon, Prov. 21. 19. where he prefers the dwelling in a wilderness, rather than with a contentious and angry woman, and yet a woman has ordinarily only that one weapon of the tongue to offend with. Indeed to any that have not the same unquietness of humor, there can scarce be a greater uneasiness, then to converse with those, that have it, though it never proceed farther, then words. How great this sin is, we may judge by what our Savior says of it, Mat. 5. where there are several degrees of punishment allotted to several degrees of it; but alas! we daily out go that, which he there sets as the highest step of this sin; the calling thou fool, is a modest sort of reviling, compared with those multitudes of bitter reproaches we use in our rages.

22. Nay, we often go yet higher; reproaches serve not our turn, but we must curse too; How common is it to hear men use the horridest execrations, and cursings upon every the slightest cause of displeasure? nay, perhaps without any cause at all; so utterly have we forgot the rule of the Apostle, Rom. 12. 14. Bless and curse not; Yea, the precept of our blessed Savior himself, Mat. 5. 44. Pray for those that despitefully use you. Christ bids us pray for those, who do us all injury, and we are often cursing those, who do us none. This is a kind of saying our prayers backward indeed, which is said to be part of the ceremony the Devil uses, at the making of a witch, and we have in this case also reason to look on it, as a means of bringing us into acquaintance, and league with that accursed spirit here, and to a perpetual abiding with him hereafter. 'Tis the language of Hell▪ which can never •it us to be Citizens of the New Jerusalem, but marks us out for inhabitants of that land of darkness. I conclude this with the advice of the Apostle, Eph. 4. 31. Let all bitterness, and wrath, and anger, and clamour, and evil speaking be put away from you with all malice.

23. Having spoken thus far of those common dues, wherein all men are concerned, and have a right, I am now to proceed to those other sorts of dues, which belong to particular persons, by virtue of some especial qualification. These qualifications may be of three kinds, that of excellency, that of want, and that of relation.

24. By that of excellency I mean any extraordinary gifts, or endowments of a person; such as wisdom, learning, and the like, but especially grace: these being the singular gifts of God, have a great value and respect due to them, wheresoever they are to be found; and this we must readily pay by a willing, and glad acknowledgment of those his gifts in any he has bestowed them on, and bearing them a reverence, and respect, answerable thereunto, and not out of an overweening of our own excellencies, despise and undervalue those of others, as they do, who will yield nothing to be reason, but what themselves speak, nor anything piety, but what agrees with their own practice.

25. Also we must not envy, or grudge that they have those gifts, for that is not only an injustice to them, but injurious also to God, who gave them, as it is as large set forth in the parable of the laborers, Mat. 20. where he asks them, who grumbled at the Masters bounty to others, Is it not lawful for me to do what I will with my own, is thine eye evil because mine is good? This envying at God's goodness to others, is in effect a murmuring against God, who thus disposes it, neither can there be a greater, and more direct opposition against him, then for me to hate and wish ill to a man, for no other reason, but because God has loved and done well to him and then in respect of the man, 'tis the most unreasonable thing in the world, to love him the less, merely because he has those good qualities, for which I ought to love him more.

26. Neither must we detract from the excellencies of others, we must not see to eclipse or darken them by denying either the kinds, or degrees of them; by that means to take off that esteem, which is due to them. This sin of detraction is generally the effect of the former of envy, he that envies a man's worth, will be apt to do all he can to lessen it in the opinions of others, and to that purpose will either speak slightly of his excellencies; or if they be so apparent, that he knows not how to cloud them, he will try if he can by reporting some either real, or feigned infirmity of his, take off from the value of the other, and so by casting in some dead flies, as the wise man speaks, Eccles. 10. 1. Strive to corrupt the savor of the ointment; this is a great injustice, and directly contrary to that duty we owe, of acknowledging, and reverencing the gifts of God in our brethren.

27. And both these sins of envy, and detraction do usually prove as great follies, as wickedness; the envy constantly brings pain, and torment to a man's self, whereas if he could but cheerfully, and gladly look on those good things of another's, he could never fail to be the better for them himself; the very pleasure of seeing them would be some advantage to him; but besides that, those gifts of his brother may be many ways helpful to him, his wisdom and learning may give him instruction; his piety, and virtue, example, &c. but all this the envious man loseth, and hath nothing in exchange for it, but a continual fretting, and gnawing of heart.

28. And then for detraction, that can hardly be so managed, but it will be found out; he that is still putting in Caveats against men's good thoughts of others, will quickly discover himself to do it out of envy, and then that will be sure to lessen their esteem of himself, but not of those he envies, it being a sort of bearing testimony to those excellencies, that he thinks them worth the envying.

29 What hath been said of the value, and respect due to those excellencies of the mind, may in a lower degree be applied to the outward advantages of honor, greatness, and the like. These though they are not of equal value with the former (and such for which no man is to prize himself) yet in regard, that these degrees, and distinctions of men are by God's wise providence disposed, for the better ordering of the world, there is such a civil respect due to those, to whom God hath dispenc'd them, as may best preserve that order, for which they were intended. Therefore all inferiors are to behave themselves to their superious with modesty, and respect, and not by a rude boldness confound that order, which it hath pleased God to set in the world, but according as our Church-Catechism teaches, order themselves lowly and reverently to all their betters. And here the former caution against envy comes in most seasonably; these outward advantages being things, of which generally men have more taste, than of the other, and therefore will be more apt to envy, and repine to see others exceed them therein, to this therefore all the former considerations against envy will be very proper, and the more necessary to be made use of, by how much the tempt•tion is in this case to most minds t•e greater.

30. The second qualication is that of want; whoever is in distress for anything, wherewith I can supply him, that distress of his makes it a duty in me so to supply him, and this in all kinds of wants. Now the ground of its being a duty is, that God hath given men abilities not only for their own use, but for the advantage and benefit of others, and therefore what is thus given for their use becomes a debt to them, whenever their need requires it. Thus he that is ignorant and wants knowledge is to be instructed by him, that hath it, and this is one special end, why that knowledge is given him: The tongue of the learned is given to speak a word in season, Isaiah. 50. 4. He that is in sadness▪ and affliction, is to be comforted by him that is himself in cheerfulness. This we see St. Paul makes it the end of God's comforting him, that he might be able to comfort them that are in any trouble, 2 Cor. 1. 4. He that is in any course of sin, and wants reprehension and counsel, must have that want supplied to him by those, who have such abilities, and opportunities, as may make it likely to do good. That this is a justice we owe to our neighbor, appears plainly by that text, Levite. 19. 17. Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart, thou shalt in any wise reprove him, and not suffer sin upon him; where we are under the same obligation to reprove him, that we are not to hate him. He that lies under any slander, or unjust defamation, is to be defended, and cleared by him, that knows his innocence, or else he makes himself guilty of the slander, because he neglects to do that which may remove it; and how great an injustice, that of slandering our neighbor is, I have already shown.

31. Lastly, he that is in poverty and need, must be relieved by him that is in plenty; and he is bound to it, not only in charity, but even in justice. Solomon calls it a due, Pro. 3. 27. Withhold not good from him to whom it is due, when it is in the power of thine hand to do it: and what that good is, he explains in the very next verse: Say not to thy neighbor, go and come again, and tomorrow I will give, when thou hast it by thee: It seems, 'tis the withholding a due, so much as to defer giving to our poor neighbor. And we find God did among the Jews separate a certain portion of every man's increase for the use of the poor, a tenth every third year (which is all one with a thirtieth part ever year, Deut. 14. 28, 29). And this was to be paid not as a charity, or liberality, but as a debt, they were unjust, if they withheld it. And surely we have no reason to think, that Christian justice is sunk so much below the Jewish, that either nothing at all, or a less proportion is now required of us. I wish our practice were but at all answerable to our obligation in this point, and then surely we should not see so many Lazaruses lie unrelieved at our doors, they having a better right to our superfluities, than we ourselves have, and then what is it, but arrant robbery to bestow that upon our vanities, nay our sins, which should be their portion?

32. In all the foregoing cases, he that hath ability is to look upon himself, as God's steward, who hath put it into his hands to distribute to them, that want, and therefore not to do it, is the same injustice and fraud, that it would be in any steward to purse up that money for his private benefit, which was entrusted to him, for the maintenance of the family, and he that shall do thus, hath just reason to expect the doom of the unjust steward, Luke 16. to be put out of the stewardship, to have those ability, taken from him, which he hath so unfaithfully employed. And as for all the rest, so particularly for that of wealth, 'tis very commonly to be observed, that it is withdrawn from those that thus defraud the poor of their parts, the griping miser coming often by strange undiscernable ways to poverty; and no wonder, he having no title to God's blessing on his heap, who does not consecrate a part to him in his poor members. And therefore we see the Israelites before they could make that challenge of God's promise to bless them, Deut. 26. 15. Look down from thy holy habitation and bless thy people Israel, &c. they were first to pay the poor man's tithes, ver. 12. without which they could lay no claim to it. This withholding more then is meet, as Solomon says, Pro. 11. 24. tends to poverty; and therefore as thou wouldst play the good husband for thyself, be careful to perform this justice according to thy ability to all that are in want.

33. The third qualification is that of relation, and of that there may be divers sorts, arising from divers grounds, and duties, answerable to each of them. There is first a relation of a debtor to a creditor, and he that stands in that relation to any whether by virtue of bargain, loan, or promise, 'tis his duty to pay justly what he owes, if he be able (as on the other side if he be not, 'tis the creditors, to deal charitably and Christianly with him, and not to exact of him beyond his ability.) But I need not insist on this, having already by showing you the sin of with holding debts, informed you of this duty.

34. There is also a relation of an obliged person to his benefactor, that is one that hath done him good, of what kind soever, whether spiritual, or corporal; and the duty of that person is, first thankfulness, that is a ready and hearty acknowledgment of the courtesy received: secondly, prayer for God's blessings and rewards upon him; and thirdly an endeavor, as opportunity and ability serves, to make returns of kindness, by doing good turns back again. This duty of gratitude to benefactors is so generally acknowledged by all, even the most barbarous, and savagest of men, that he must have put off much of his human nature, that refuses to perform it. The very Publicans and *sinner*s, as our Savior says, do good to those that do good to them.

35. Yet how many of us fail even in this, how frequent is it to see men, not only neglect to repay courtesies, but return injuries instead of them? It is too observable in many particulars, but in none more, then in the case of advice, and admonition, which is of all others, the most precious part of kindness, the realest good turn that can be done from one man to another. And therefore those that do this to us, should be looked on, as our prime and greatest benefactors. But alas! how few are there that can find gratitude, shall I say? nay patience for such a courtesy? Go about to admonish a man of a fault, or tell him of an error, he presently looks on you, as his enemy, you are, as St. Paul tells the Galatians, Chap. 4. 16. become his enemy because you tell him the truth; such a pride there is in men's hearts, that they must not be told of anything amiss, though it be with no other intent, but that they may amend it. A strange madness this is, the same that it would be in a sick man, to fly in the face of him that comes to cure him, on a fancy that he disparaged him in supposing him sick; so that we may well say with the wise man, Pro. 12. 1. He that hateth reproof is brutish. There cannot be in the world a more happy temper, for it fortifies a man in his sins, raises such mounts, and bulwarks about them, that no man can come to assault them, and if we may believe Solomon, destruction will not fail to attend it, Pro. 29. 1. He that being of ten reprov'd hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed, and that without remedy. But then again in respect of the admonisher, 'tis the greatest injustice, I may say, cruelty that can be, he comes in tenderness, and compassion to rescue thee from a danger, and to that purpose puts himself upon a very uneasy task; for such the general impatience men have to admonition, hath now made it; and what a defeat, what a grief is it to him, to find that instead of reforming the first fault, thou art run into a second, to wit that of causeless displeasure against him? This is one of the worst, and yet I doubt, the commonest sort of unthankfulness to benefactors, and so a great failing in that duty we owe to that sort of relation. But perhaps these will be looked on as remote relations (yet 'tis sure they are such as challenge all that duty I have assigned to them) I shall in the next place proceed to those relations, which are by all acknowledged to be of the greatest nearness.

PARTITION XIV.

Of DUTY to PARENTS. Magistrates, Pastors, &c. Of the DUTY of PARENTS to Children, &c.

§. 1. THE first of those nearer sorts of relations, is that of a Parent; And here it will be necessary to consider the several sorts of Parents, according to which the duty to them is to be measured. Those are these three, the Civil, the Spiritual, the Natural.

2. The Civil Parent is he, whom God hath established the Supreme Magistrate, who by a just right possesses the throne in a Nation. This is the common Father of all those that are under his authority. The duty we owe to this Parent is, first, Honor and Reverence, looking on him, as upon one, on whom God hath stamped much of his own power and authority, and therefore paying him all honor and esteem, never daring, upon any pretence whatsoever, to speak evil of the ruler of our people, Acts 23. 5.

3. Secondly, Paying Tribute; This is expressly commanded by the Apostle, Rom. 13. 6. Pay ye tribute also, for they are God's Ministers attending continually upon this very thing. God has set them apart as Ministers for the common good of the people, and therefore 'tis all justice, they should be maintained, and supported by them. And indeed when it is considered, what are the cares, and troubles of that high calling, how many thorns are plated in every Crown, we have very little reason to envy them these dues, and it may truly be said, there is none of their poor laboring subjects, that earns their living so hardly.

4. Thirdly, We are to pray for them: this is also expressly commanded by the Apostle, 1 Tim. 2. 2. to be done for Kings, and for all that are in authority. The businesses of that calling are so weighty, the dangers and hazards of it so great, that they of all others need prayers for God's direction, assistance, and blessing, and the prayers that are thus poured out for them, will return into our own bosoms, for the blessings they receive from God tend to the good of the people, to their living a quiet and peaceable life, as it is in the close of the verse forementioned.

5. Fourthly, We are to pay them Obedience. This is likewise strictly charged by the Apostle, 1 Pet. 2. 13. Submit yourselves to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, whether it be to the King as Supreme, or unto Governors as those that are sent by him; We owe such an obedience to the Supreme power, that whoever is authorised by him, we are to submit to, and St. Paul likewise is most full to this purpose, Rom. 13. 1. Let every Soul be subject to the higher powers; and again, ver. 2. Whosoever resisteth the powers, resisteth the Ordinance of God. And 'tis observable that these precepts were given at a time, when those powers were Heathens, and cruel persecutors of Christianity, to show us, that no pretence of the wickedness of our rulers can free us of this duty. An obedience we must pay either active, or passive: the active in the case of all lawful commands; That is, whenever the Magistrate commands something, which is not contrary to some Command of God, we are then bound to act according to that command of the Magistrate, to do the thing he requires. But when he enjoins anything contrary to what God hath Commanded, we are not then to pay him this active obedience, we may, nay we must refuse thus to act, (yet here we must be very well assured that the thing is so contrary, and not pretend conscience for a cloak of stubbornness) we are in that case to obey God rather than man. But even this is a season for the passive obedience, we must patiently suffer, what he inflicts on us, for such refusal, and not, to secure ourselves, rise up against him. For who can stretch his hand against the Lord's anointed, and be guilt less? says David to Abishai, 1 Sam. 26 9. and that at a time when David was under a great persecution from Saul, nay, had also the assurance of the Kingdom after him; and St. Paul's sentence in this case is most heavy, Rom. 13. 2. They that resist shall receive to themselves damnation. Here is very small encouragement to any to rise up against the lawful Magistrate, for though they should so far prosper here, as to secure themselves from him by this means, yet there is a King of kings, from whom no power can shelter them, and this damnation in the close will prove a sad prize of their victories. What is on the other side the duty of the Magistrate to the people will be vain to mention here, none of that rank being like to read this treatise, and it being very useless for the people to inquire, what is the duty of their Supreme, wherein the most are already much better read, than in their own, it may suffice them to know that whatsoever his duty is, or however performed, he is accountable to none but God and no failing of his part, can warrant them to fail of theirs.

6 The second sort of Parents are the spiritual; That is, the Ministers of the Word, whether such, as be Governors in the Church, or others under them, who are to perform the same Offices to our Souls, that our natural Parents do to our bodies. Thus St. Paul tells the Corinthians, that in Christ Jesus he had begotten them through the Gospel, 1 Cor 4. 15. and the Galatians, chap. 4. 19. that he travels in birth of them, till Christ he formed in them; and again, 1 Cor. 3. 2. He had fed them with milk; that is, such Doctrines as were agreeable to that infant state of Christianity they were then in, but he had stronger meat for them of full age, Heb. 5.

14. All these are the Offices of a Parent, and therefore they that perform them to us, may well be accounted as such.

7. Our duty to these is first to love them, to bear them that kindness, which belongs to those who do us the greatest benefits. This is required by St. Paul, 1 Thes 5. 13. I beseech you, brethren, mark them which labor among you and are over you in the Lord, and admonish you, and esteem them very highly in love for their works sake. The work is such as ought in all reason to procure them love, it being of the highest advantage to us.

8. Secondly, 'Tis our duty to value and esteem them, as we see in the text now mentioned; and surely this is most reasonable, if we consider either the nature of their work, or who it is that employs them. The nature of their work is of all others the most excellent; we use to value other professions proportionably to the dignity and worth of the things they deal in. Now surely there is no Merchandize of equal worth with a Soul, and this is their Traffick, rescuing precious Souls from perdition. And if we consider further, who it is that employs them, it yet adds to the reverence due to them. They are Ambassadors for Christ, 2 Cor. 5. 20. and Ambassadors are by the Laws of all Nations to be used with a respect, answerable to the quality of those that send them. Therefore Christ tells his disciples, when he sends them out to preach, He that despiseth you despiseth me, and he that despiseth me despiseth him that sent me. Luk. 10. 16. It seems there is more depends on the despising of Ministers, then men ordinarily consider, 'tis the despising of God and Christ both. Let those think of this, who make it their pastime, and sport to affront, and deride this calling. And let those also, who dare presume to exercise the Offices of it, without being lawfully called to it, which is a most high presumption; 'Tis as if a man on his own head should go, as an Ambassador from his Prince; the Apostle says of the Priests of the Law, which yet are inferior to those of the Gospel, That no man taketh this honor to himself, but he which was called of God, Heb. 5 4. How shall then any man dare to assume this greater honor to himself, that is not called to it; Neither will it suffice to say, they have the inward call of the spirit; for since God hath established an order in the Church, for the admitting men to this Office, they that shall take it upon them without that authority, resist that ordinance, and are but of the number of those thieves and robbers, as our Savior speaks, Jo. 10. which come not in by the door. Besides the sad experience of these times show, that many who pretend most to this inward call of the Spirit, are called by some other spirit, then that of God, the doctrines they vnt being usually directly contrary to that word of his, on which all true Doctrines must be founded. Such are to be looked on as those seducers, those false prophets, whereof we are so often warned in the Epistles of the Apostles. And whosoever countenances them, or follows them, partakes with them in their guilt. It is recorded of Jereboam, as a crying sin, that he made of the meanest of the people Priests; that is, such as had by God's institution no right to it, and whoever hearkens to these uncalled preachers, run into that very sin, for without the encouragement of being followed, they would not long continue in the course, and therefore they that give them that encouragement, have much to answer for, and are certainly guilty of the sin of despising their true Pastors, when they shall thus set up these false apostles against them. This is a guilt this age is too much concerned in, God in his mercy so timely convince us of it, as may put a stop to that confusion and impiety, which breaks in so fast upon us by it.

9 Thirdly, We owe to them maintenance: but of this I have spoken already in the first part of this Book, and shall not here repeat. Fourthly, We owe them obedience, Obey them, saith the Apostle, that have the rule over you and submit yourselves, for they watch for your Souls, Heb. 13. 17. This obedience is to be paid them in spiritual things; that is, whatsoever they out of God's word shall declare to us, to be God's Commands, these we are diligently to obey, remembering that it is not they, but God requires it, according to that of Christ, he that heareth you heareth me, Luk. 10. 16. And this whether it be delivered by the way of public preaching, or private exhortation, for in both, so long as they keep them to the rule, which is God's Word, they are the Messengers of the Lord of Hosts, Mal. 2. 7. This obedience the Apostle enforceth from a double motive, one taken from their Ministry, another from themselves. They watch, says he, for your Souls, as they that must give account that they may do it with joy, and not with grief; The people are by their obedience to enable their Pastors to give a comfortable account of their Souls, and it is a most unkind return of all their care and labors; to be put to grieve for the ill success of them. But then in the second place, 'tis their own concernment also; they may put their Ministers to the discomfort of seeing all their pains cast away, but themselves are like to get little by it, that (says the Apostle, Heb. 13. 17.) will be unprofitable for you; 'tis yourselves, that will finally prove the losers by it, you loose all those glorious rewards, which are offered, as the crown of this obedience, you get nothing but an addition to your sin, & punishment, for as our Savior tells the Pharisees, If he had not come and spoken to them they had not had sin, Jo. 15. 24 that is in comparison with what they then had; so certainly they that never had the Gospel preached to them, are much more innocent than they that have heard and resisted it. And for the punishment, what Christ told those to whom he had preached, That it should be more tolerable for Tyre and Sydon, which were Heathen Cities, then for them, the same undoubtedly we may conclude of ourselves.

10. Lastly, We are to pray for them; This St. Paul everywhere requires of his Spiritual children; thus Eph. 6. 7, 8. having commanded prayer for all Saints, he adds, And for me, that utterance may be given unto me, that I may open my mouth boldly, to make known the mystery of the Gospel; and so again, Col 4. 3. And this remains still a duty to these Spiritual Fathers, to pray for such assistances of God's Spirit to them, as may enable them rightly to discharge that Holy Calling. I shall omit to set down here, what is the duty of Ministers to the people, upon the same consideration, on which I forbare to mention the duty of Magistrates.

11. The third sort of parent is the natural, the fathers of our flesh, as the Apostle calls them, Heb. 12. 9. And to these we owe several duties, as first we owe them reverence, and respect; we must behave ourselves towards them with all humility, and observance, and must not upon any pretence of infirmity in them, despise or contemn them, either in outward behavior, or so much as inwardly in our hearts. If indeed they have infirmities, it must be our business to cover, and conceal them; like Shem, and Japheth, who while cursed Cham published and disclosed the nakedness of their father, covered it, Gen. 9. 23. and that in such a manner too, as even themselves might not behold it. We are as much as may be to keep ourselves from looking on those nakedness of our parents, which may tempt us to think irreverently of them. This is very contrary to the practice of too many children, who do not only publish and deride the infirmities of their parents, but pretend they have those infirmities they have not; there is ordinarily such a pride, and headiness in youth, that they cannot abide to submit to the counsels, and directions of their Elders, and therefore to shake them off, are willing to have them pass for the effects of dotage, when they are indeed the fruits of sobriety, and experience. To such the exhortation of Solomon is very necessary, Pro. 23. 22. Hearken to thy father that begat thee, and despise not thy mother when she is old. A multitude of texts more there are in that book, to this purpose, which shows that the wisest of men thought it necessary for children to attend to the counsel of their parents. But the youth of our age set up for wisdom, the quite contrary way, and think they then become wits, when they are advanced to the despising the counsel, yea mocking the persons of their parents. Let such if they will not practice the exhortations, yet remember the threatening of the wise man, Pro. 30. 17. The eye that mocketh his father and despiseth to obey his mother, the ravens of the valley shall pick it out, and the young Eagles shall eat it.

A second duty to them is love; we are to bear them a real kindness, such as may make us heartily desirous of all manner of good to them, and abhor to do anything that may grieve or disquiet them. This will appear but common gratitude; when 'tis remembered, what our parents have done for us, how they were not only the instruments of first bringing us into the world, but also of sustaining and supporting us after; and certainly they that rightly weigh the cares and fears, that go to the bringing up of a child, will judge the love of that child to be but a moderate return for them. This love is to be expressed several ways, first, in all kindness of behavior, carrying ourselves not only with an awe, and respect, but with kindness and affection, and therefore most gladly and readily doing those things, which may bring joy and comfort to them, and carefully avoiding whatever may grieve, and afflict them. Secondly, this love is to be expressed in praying for them. The debt a child owe to a parent is so great, that he can never hope himself to discharge it; he is therefore to call in God's aid, to beg of him, that he will reward all the good his parents have done for him, by multiplying his blessings upon them; what shall we then say to those children, that instead of calling to heaven for blessings on their parents, ransack hell for curses on them, and pour out the blackest execrations against them? This is a thing so horrid, that one would think there needed no persuasion against it, because none could be so vile, as to fall into it, but we see God himself, who best knows men's hearts, saw it possible; and therefore laid the heaviest punishment upon it: He that curseth father or mother, let him die the death, Exod. 21. 17. And alas! our daily experience tells us, 'tis not only possible, but common even this of uttering curses. But 'tis to be feared, there is another, yet more common, that is the wishing curses, though fear or shame keep them from speaking out. How many children are there, that either through impatience of the Government, or greediness of the possessions of the Parents, have wisht their deaths? But whoever doth so, let him remember, that how stylie and fairly soever he carry it before men, there is one that sees those secretest wishes of his heart, and in his sight he assuredly passes for this heinous offender, a curser of his Parents. And then let it be considered, that God hath as well the power of punishing, as of seeing, and therefore since he hath pronounced death to be the reward of that sin, 'tis not unreasonable to expect he may himself inflict it; that they who watch for the death of their Parents, may untimely meet with their own. The fifth Commandment promiseth long life as the reward of honoring the Parent, to which 'tis very agreeable that untimely death be the punishment of the contrary, and sure there is nothing more highly contrary to that duty, then this we are now speaking of, the cursing our Parents.

14. The third duty we owe to them is obedience; This is not only contained in the fifth Commandment, but expressly enjoined in other places of Scripture. Eph. 6. 1. Children obey your Parents in the Lord, for this is right; and again, Col. 3. 20. Children obey your Parents in all things, for this is well pleasing to the Lord. We owe them an obedience in all things, unless where their commands are contrary to the commands of God, for in that case our duty to God must be preferred, and therefore if any Parent shall be so wicked, as to require his child to steal, to lie, or to do any unlawful thing, the child then offends not against his duty, though he disobey that command, nay, he must disobey, or else he offend against a higher duty, even that he owes to God, his Heavenly Father. Yet when 'tis thus necessary to refuse obedience, he should take care to do it in such a modest, and respectful manner, that it may appear 'tis conscience only, and not stubbornness moves him to it. But in case of all lawful commands; that is, when the thing commanded is either good, or not evil, when it hath nothing in it contrary to our duty to God, there the child is bound to obey, be the command in a weightier or lighter matter; How little this duty is regarded is too manifest everywhere in the world, where Parents generally have their children no longer under command, then they are under the rod; when they are once grown up, they think themselves free from all obedience to them, or if some do continue to pay it, yet let the motive of it be examined, and 'twill in too many be found only worldly prudence; They fear to displease their Parents, lest they should shorten their hand toward them, and so they shall loose somewhat by it; but how few are there that obey purely upon conscience of duty? This sin of disobedience to Parents was by the Law of Moses punishable with death, as you may read Deut 21. 18. but if Parents now a days should proceed so with their children, many might soon make themselves chidless.

15. But of all acts of disobedience, that of marrying against the consent of the Parent, is one of the highest. Children are so much the goods, the possessions of the Parent, that they cannot without a kind of theft, give away themselves without the allowance of those, that have the right in them, and therefore we see under the Law, the Maid that had made any vow, was not suffered to perform it, without the consent of the Parent. Num. 30. 5. the right of the Parent was thought of force enough to cancel, and make void the Obligation, even of a vow, and therefore surely it ought to be so much considered by us as to keep us from making any such, whereby that right is infringed.

16. A fourth duty to the Parent is to assist, and minister to them in all their wants of what kind soever, whether weakness, and sickness of body, decayedness of understanding, or poverty, and lowness of estate, in all these the child is bound according to his ability, to relieve and assist them: for the two former, weakness of body, and infirmity of mind, none can doubt of the duty, when they remember how every child did in his infancy receive the very same benefit from the Parent, the child had then no strength to support, no understanding to guide itself; the care of the Parents was fain to supply both these to it, and therefore in common gratitude, whenever either of these becomes the Parents case, as sometimes by great age, or some accident both do, the child is to perform the same offices back again to them. As for that of relieving their poverty, there is the very same Obligation to that with the former, it being but just to sustain thy Parent who has formerly sustained thee; but besides this Christ himself teaches us, that this is contained within their precept of honoring the Parents, for when Mar. 7. 13. he accuses the Pharisees of rejecting the Commandment of God, to cleave to their own traditions, he instances in this particular, concerning the relieving of Parents, whereby 'tis manifest that this is a part of that duty which is enjoined in the fifth Commandment, as you may see at large in the Text, and such a duty it is that no pretence can absolve, or acquit us of it. How then shall those answer it, that deny relief to their poor Parents, that cannot part with their own excesses, and superfluities, which are indeed their sins, to satisfy the necessities of those to whom they owe their being? Nay, some there are, yet worse, who out of pride scorn to own their Parents in there poverty; Thus it often happens, when the child is advanced to dignity or wealth, they think it a disparagement to them to look on their Parents that remain in a low condition, it being the betraying, as they think, to the world the meanness of their birth, and so the poor Parent fares the worse for the prosperity of his child. This is such a pride and unnaturalness together, as will surely find a sharp vengeance from God, for if Solomon observe of pride alone, that it is the fore-runner of destruction, Prov. 16. 18. we may much rather conclude so of it, when it is thus accompanied.

17. To this that hath been said of the duty of children to their Parents, I shall add only this: That no unkindness, no fault of the Parent can acquit the child of this duty, but as St. Peter tells servants, 1 Pet. 2. 18. that they must be subject not only to the good and gentle masters, but also to the froward, so certainly it belongs to children to perform duty not only to the kind and virtuous, but even to the harshest, and wicked'st Parent. For though the gratitude due to a kind Parent, be a very forcible motive to make the child pay his duty, yet that is not the only, nor chiefest ground of it; That is laid in the Command of God, who requires us thus to honor our Parents, and therefore though we should suppose a Parent so unnatural, as never to have done anything to oblige the child, (which can hardly be imagined) yet still the Command of God continues in force, and we are in conscience of that, to perform that duty to our Parents, though none of the other tie of gratitude should lie on us.

But as this is due from the child to the Parents, so on the other side there are other things also due from the Parents to the child, and that throughout the several states, and ages of it.

18. First, There is the care of nourishing and sustaining it, which begins from the very birth, and continues a duty from the Parent, till the child be able to perform it to himself; This is a duty, which nature teaches, even the savages beasts, have a great care and tenderness in nourishing their young, and therefore may serve to reproach and condemn all Parents, who shall be so unnatural as to neglect this. I shall not here enter into the question whether the mother be obliged to give the child its first nourishment, by giving it suck herself, because

'twill not be possible to affirm universally in the case, there being many circumstances, which may alter it, and make it not only lawful, but best not to do it; all I shall say, is, that where no impediment of sickness, weakness, or the like does happen, 'tis surely best for the mother herself to perform this office, there being many advantages to the child by it, which a good Mother ought so far to consider, as not to sell them to her own sloth, or niceness, or any such unworthy motive, for where such only are the grounds of forbearing it, they will never be able to justify the omission, they being themselves unjustifiable.

But besides this first care, which belongs to the body of the child, there is another, which should begin near as early, which belongs to their Souls, and that is the bringing them to the Sacrament of Baptism, thereby to procure them an early right to all those precious advantages, which that Sacrament conveys to them. This is a duty the Parents ought not to delay, it being most reasonable, that they who have been instruments to convey the stain and pollution of sin to the poor Infant, should be very earnest and industrious to have it washed off, as soon as may be: Besides the life of so tender a creature is but a blast, and many times gone in a moment, and though we are not to despair of God's mercy to those poor children, who die without Baptism, yet surely those Parents commit a great fault, by whose neglect it is, that they want it.

19. Secondly, The Parents must provide for the education of the child; they must, as Solomon speaks, Prov. 22. 6. Train up the child in the way he should go. As soon therefore as children come to the use of reason, they are to be instructed, and that first in those things, which concern their eternal well-being, they are by little and little to be taught all those things, which God hath Commanded them, as their duty to perform; as also what glorious rewards he hath provided for them, if they do it, and what grievous and eternal punishments, if they do it not. These things ought as early, as is possible, to be instilled into the minds of children, which (like new vessels) do usually keep the savor of that, which is first put into them, and therefore it nearly concerns all parents to look they be at first thus seasoned with Virtue and Religion. 'Tis sure if this be neglected, there is one ready at hand to fill them with the contrary, the devil will be diligent enough to instill into them all wickedness and vice, even from their cradles, and there being also in all our natures so much the greater aptness to evil, then to good, there is need of great care and watchfulness, to prevent those endeavors of that enemy of Souls, which can no way be, but by possessing them at first with good things, breeding in them a love to virtue, & a hatred of vice, that so when the temptations come, they may be armed against them. This surely is above all things the duty of Parents to look after, and the neglect of it is a horrible cruelty; We justly look upon those Parents, as most unnatural wretches, that take away the life of their child; but alas! that his mercy and tenderness, compared to this of neglecting his education, for by that he ruins his Soul, makes him miserable eternally; and God knows, multitudes of such cruel Parents there are in the world, that thus give up their children to be possessed by the Devil, for want of an early acquainting them with the ways of God; nay, indeed how few there are, that do conscionable perform this duty, is too apparent by the strange rudeness, and ignorance, that is generally among youth: the children of those who call themselves Christians, being frequently as ignorant of God and Christ, as the meerest Heathens. But whoever they are, that thus neglect this great duty, let them know that it is not only a fearful misery they bring upon their poor children, but also a horrible guilt upon themselves. For as God says to the careless watchmen, Ezeck. 3. 18. That if any soul perish by his negligence, that soul shall be required at his hands, so surely will it fare with all parents, who have this office of watch-men entrusted to them by God over their own children: A second part of education is the bringing them up to some employment, busying them in some honest exercise, whereby they may avoid that great snare of the Devil, Idleness, and also be taught some useful art or trade, whereby when they come to age, they may become profitable to the Commonwealth, and able to get an honest living to themselves.

20. To this great duty of educating of children, there is required as means, first encouragement, secondly, correction: encouragement is first to be tried, we should endeavor to make children in love with duty, by offering them rewards and invitations, and whenever they do well take notice of it, and encourage them to go on. It is an ill course some parents hold, who think they must never appear to their children, but with a face of sowreness and austerity; this seems to be that, which St. Paul forwarnes parents of, when he bids fathers not to provoke their children to wrath, Col. 3. 21. To be as harsh and unkind to them, when they do well, as if they do ill, is the way to provoke them; and then the Apostle tells us in the same verse, what will be the issue of it, they will be discouraged, they will have no heart to go on in any good course, when the parent affords them no countenance. The second means is correction, and this becomes seasonable, when the former will do no good, when all fair means, persuasions, and encouragements prevail not, then there is a necessity of using sharper; and let that be first tried in words, I mean not by railing and foul language, but in sober, yet sharp reproof; but if that fail too, then proceed to blows, and in this case as Solomon says, he that spareth his rod, hateth his son, Prov. 13. 24. 'Tis a cruel fondness, that to spare a few stripes at present, will adventure him to those sad mischiefs, which commonly befall the child, that is left to himself. But then this correction must be given in such a manner, as may be likely to do good; to which purpose it must first be given timely; the child must not be suffered to run on in any ill, till it have got a habit, and a stubbornness too. This is a great error in many parents, they will let their children alone for divers years, to do what they list, permit them to lie, to steal, without ever so much as rebuking them, nay, perhaps please themselves to see the witty shifts of the child, and think it matters not what they do while they are little: But alas! all that while the vice gets root, and that many times so deep a one, that all they can do afterwards, whether by words or blows, can never pluck it up. Secondly, correction must be moderate, not exceeding the quality of the fault, nor the tenderness of the child. Thirdly, it must not be given in rage, if it be, it will not only be in danger of being immoderate, but it will lose its effect upon the child, who will think he is corrected, not because he has done a fault, but because his parent is angry, and so will rather blame the parent than himself, whereas on the contrary, care should be taken to make the child as sensible of the fault, as of the smart, without which he will never be thoroughly amended.

21. Thirdly, after children are grown up, & are past the age of education, there are yet other offices for the parent to perform to them: the parent is still to watch over them in respect of their souls, to observe how they practice those precepts, which were given them in their education, and accordingly to exhort, encourage, or reprove, as they find occasion.

22. So also for their outward estate, they are to put them into some course of living in the world; if God have blest the parents with wealth, according to what he hath, he must distribute to his children, remembering that since he was the instrument of bringing them into the world, he is according to his ability to provide for their comfortably living in it, they are therefore to be looked on very unnatural parents, who, so they may have enough to spend in their own riots, and excess, care not what becomes of their children, never think of providing for them. Another fault is usual among parents in this business; they defer all the provisions for them, till themselves be dead, heap up perhaps great matters for them against that time, but in the mean time afford them not such a competency, as may enable them to live in the world. There are several mischiefs come from this: first it lessens the child's action to his parent, nay, sometimes it proceeds so far, as to make him wish his death, which though it be such a fault, as no temptation can excuse in a child, yet 'tis also a great fault in a parent to give that temptation. Secondly, it puts the child upon shifts, and tricks; many times dishonest ones, to supply his necessities; this is, I doubt not, a common effect of it, the hardness of parents has often put men upon very unlawful courses, which when they are once acquainted with, perhaps they never leave, though the first occasion cease; and therefore parents ought to beware, how they run them upon those hazards. Besides the parent loses that contentment, which he might have in seeing his children live prosperously and comfortably, which none but an arrant earth-worm would exchange for the vain imaginary pleasure of having money in his chest. But in this business of providing for children, there is yet another thing to be heeded, and that is, that the parent get that wealth honestly, which he makes their portion; else 'tis very far from being a provision, there is such a curse goes along with an ill-gotten estate, that he that leaves such a one to his child, do but cheat, and deceive him, makes him believe he has left him wealth, but has withal put such a canker in the bowels of it, that is sure to eat it out. This is so common an observation that I need say nothing to confirm the truth of it; would God it were as generally laid to heart, as it seems to be generally taken notice of: Then surely parents would not account it a reasonable motive to unjust dealing, that they may thereby provide for their children, for this is not a way of providing for them; nay, 'tis the way to spoil them of whatever they have lawfully gathered for them, the least mite of unlawful gain being of the nature of leaven, which sours the whole lump, bringing down curses upon all a man possesseth. Let all parents therefore satisfy themselves with such provisions for their children as God shall enable them honestly to make, assuring themselves how little soever it be, 'tis a better portion than the greatest wealth unjustly gotten, according to that of Solomom, Pro. 16. 8. Better is a little with righteousness, then great revenues without right.

23. A fourth thing the parent owes to the child is good example. he is not only to set him rules of virtue, and godliness; but he must himself give him a pattern in his own practice, we see the force of example is infinitely beyond that of precept, especially where the person is one, to whom we bear a reverence, or with whom we have a continual conversation; both which usually meet in a Parent. It is therefore a most necessary care in all Parents to behave themselves so before their children, that their example may be a means of winning them to virtue; But alas! this age affords little of this care, nay, so far 'tis from it, that there are none more frequently the instruments of corrupting children, than their own Parents. And indeed how can it be otherwise, while men give themselves liberty to all wickedness, 'tis not to be hoped, but that the children which observe it, will imitate it; the child that sees his father drunk, will sure think, he may be so too, as well as his father. So he that bears him swear, will do the like, and so for all other vices, and if any Parent that is thus wicked himself, should happen to have so much more care of his child's Soul, than his own; as to forbid him the things which himself practices, or correct him for the doing them; 'tis certain the child will account this a great injustice in his father, to punish him for that, which himself freely does, and so he is never likely to be wrought upon by it. This consideration lays a most strict tie upon all Parents, to live Christianly, for otherwise they do not only hazard their own Souls, but those of their children also, and as it were purchase an estate of inheritance in Hell.

24. A fifth duty of Parents is blessing their children; the way of doing that is double, first, by their prayer; they are by daily and earnest prayers to commend them to God's protection and blessing, both for their spiritual and temporal estate, and secondly by their piety they are to be such persons themselves as that a blessing may descend from them upon their posterity. This is often promised in Scripture to godly men, that their seed shall be blessed. Thus in the second commandment, God promises to show mercy to the thousand generation of them that love him and keep his commandments. And it is very observable in the Jews, that though they were a stiff necked generation, and had very grievously provoked God, yet the godliness of their forefathers, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, did many times move God to save them from destruction: on the other side, we see that even good men have fared the worse for the iniquities of their fathers. Thus when Josiah had destroyed idolatry restored God's service, and done good beyond all the Kings that were before him, yet there was an old arreare of Manasseh his grandfather, which all this piety of his would not blot out, but he resolves to cast Judah also out of his sight, as you may read at large, 2 Kings 23. If therefore parents have any bowels, any kindness towards their children, any real desire of their prosperity, let them take care by their own godly life to entaile a blessing upon them.

25 Sixthly, parents must take heed, that they use their power over their children with equity, and moderation, not to oppress them with unreasonable commands, only to exercise their own authority, but in all things of weight to consider the real good of their children, and to press them to nothing, which may not consist with that. This is a rule whereof parents may often have use, but in none greater, then in the business of marrying their children, wherein many that otherwise are good parents have been to blame, when out of an eagerness of bestowing them wealthily, they force them to marry utterly against their own inclinations, which is a great tyranny, and that which frequently betrays them to a multitude of mischiefs, such as all the wealth in the world cannot repair. There are two things, which parents ought especially to consider in the matching of their children; the first, how they may live Christianly, and to that purpose to choose a virtuous and pious person, to link them with: the second is, how they may live cheerfully and comfortably in this world; and to that end though a competency of estate may be necessary to be regarded, yet surely abundance is no way requisite, and therefore that should not be too vehemently sought after; that which much more tends to the happiness of that state, is the mutual kindness, and liking of the parties, without which marriage is of all other the most uncomfortable condition, and therefore no parent ought to thrust a child into it. I have now done with the first sort of relation, that of a parent.

PARTITION XV.

Of DUTY to our BRETHREN, and Relations; Husband, Wife, Friends, Masters, Servants.

§. 1: THE second sort of relation is that of a brother; now brotherhood may be twofold, either natural, or spiritual, the natural may in the largest extent contain under it all mankind, all that partake of the same nature; but I shall not consider it so in this place, having already mentioned those gegeneral duties, which belong to all as such: I now speak of that natural brother-hood, that is between those that are the children of the same immediate parent; and the duty of these is to have united hearts, and affections: This nature points out to them, they partaking in a more especial manner, of each others substance, and therefore ought to have the greatest tenderness and kindness, each to other; thus we see Abraham make it an argument, why there should be no contention between him and Let, because they were brethren, Gen. 13. 8. And though by brethren there is meant only cousins, yet that helps the more strongly to conclude, that this nearer relation is in reason to be a greater bar to strife, as also that this kindness is in some degree to be extended to all that have any nearness of blood to us.

2. This kindness and love between brethren and sisters ought to be very firmly grounded in their hearts, if it be not, they will be of all others in most danger of disagreeing; for the continual conversation that is among them, whilst they are at home in the fathers house, will be apt to minister some occasion of jar. Besides the equality that is among them in respect of birth, often makes them inclinable to envy each other, when one is in any respect advanced above the other. Thus we see Josephs brethren envied him, because he had most of his fathers love, and Rachel envied her sister Leah, because she was fruitful; therefore for the preventing of such temptations, let all who have brethren and sisters, possess their mind with a great and real kindness to them, look on them as parts of themselves, and then they will never think fit either to quarrel with them, or to envy them any advantage, anymore then one part of the body does another of the same body, but will strive to advance, and help forward the good of each other.

3. The second kind of brotherhood is spiritual; that contains all those who profess the same faith with us: the Church in our baptism becomes a mother to each baptized person, and then surely they that have the relation of children to her, must have also the relation of brethren to each other; and to this sort of brethren also we owe a great deal of tenderness and affection; the spiritual bond of Religion, should of all others the most closely unite our hearts. This is the brotherhood which St. Peter exhorts us to love. 1 Pet. 2. 17. And to it we are in an especial manner bound to do all good offices, Do good, saith the Apostle, to all, but especially to them that are of the household of faith, Gal. 6. 10. Our compassions are to be most melting towards them of all others, in all their needs; Christ tells us, that whosoever gives but a cup of cold water to any in the name of a disciple shall not lose his reward, Mat. 10. 42. From whence we may assure ourselves that this peculiar love to Christians, as Christians, is very acceptable in his sight.

4. Several duties there are required of us to these brethren; one principal, is the holding communion with them, and that first in doctrine; we are constantly to continue in the belief and profession of all those necessary truths, by which we may be marked out as followers, and disciples of Christ; this is that faith, which St. Jude speaks of, which was once delivered to the Saints, Jude 3. by keeping whereof we continue still united to this spiritual brotherhood, in respect of profession, which we must constantly do, what storms and persecutions soever attend it, according to the exhortation of the Apostle, Heb. 10. 22. Let us hold fast the profession of our faith without wavering. Secondly, we are also as opportunity serves, to communicate with them in all holy offices; we must be diligent in frequenting the assemblies of the Saints, which is as it were the badge of our profession; and therefore he that willingly withdraws himself from these, gives ground to suspect, he will be apt to renounce the other also. But these parts of communion we find strictly maintained by the first Christians, Acts 2. 42. They continued steadfastly in the Apostles Doctrine and fellowship, and in breaking of bread, and in prayers: they continued, and that steadfastly, they were not frightened from it by any persecutions, though that were a time wherein they were tried with the sharpest sufferings; which may teach us, that it is not the danger, that attends this duty can acquit us of it.

5. Secondly, we are to bear with the infirmities of our Christian brethren, according to the advice of St. Paul, Rom. 15. 1. We that are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak. If one that holds all necessary Christian truth, happen yet to be in some error, we are not for this either to forsake his communion, or despise his person. This St. Paul teaches us in the case of that weak brother, who by error made a causeless scruple about meats, Rom. 14. where he bids the stronger Christians, that is, those who being better instructed, discerned him to be in an error, yet to receive him nevertheless, and not to despise him, as on the other side, he bids that weak one not to judge the stronger; the lesser differences in opinion must be born with on both sides, and must not in the least abate our brotherly charity towards each other.

6. Thirdly, we are to endeavor the restoring of any fallen brother, that is, to bring him to repentance, after he hath fallen into any sin. Thus St. Paul commands the Galatians, that they should retore him that was overtaken in a fault, considering themselves least they also were tempted. We are not to look on him as a cast-away to give him over as utterly desperate, neither are we to triumph over him, in respect of our own innocence, like the proud Pharisee, over the poor Publican, Luke 18. 11. but we are meekly to endeavor his recovery, remembering that our own frailty is such, that we are not secure from the like falls.

7. Fourthly, We are to have a Sympathy, and fellow feeling-with these brethren, to be nearly touched with whatsoever befalls them, either as they are considered in society, or in single persons. In society first, and so they make up a Church, & that either the universal, which is made up of all Believers throughout the world, or any particular Church, which is made up of all the Believers in that particular Nation, and whatever happens to either of these, either the whole Church in general, or any such single part of it, especially that whereof ourselves are members, we are to be much affected and moved with, to rejoice in all the prosperities, and to mourn and bewail all the breaches, and desolations thereof, and daily and earnestly to pray with David, Psal. 51. 18. O be favorable and gracious unto Zion, build thou the walls of Jerusalem; and that especially when we see her in distress, and persecution. Whosoever is not thus touched with the condition of the Church, is not to be looked on, as a living member of it, for as in the natural body every member is concerned in the prosperity of the whole, so certainly 'tis here: it was the observation of the Psalmist, that God's Servants think upon the stones of Sin, and pity to see her in the dust. Psal. 102. 14. and surely all his servants are still of the same temper, cannot look on the ruins, and desolations of the Church, without the greatest sorrow, and lamentation. Secondly, we are to have this fellow-feeling with our brethren, considered as single persons; We are to account ourselves concerned in very particular Christian, so as to partake with him in all his occasions either of joy or sorrow. Thus the Apostle exhorts, Rom. 12. 14. Rejoice with them that rejoice, weep with them that weep; and again, 1 Cor. 12. under the similitude of the natural body he urges this duty, Whether one member suffer, all the members suffer with it, or one member be honored, all the members rejoice with it. All these several effects of love we owe to these spiritual brethren. And this love is that, which Christ has made the badge of his disciples, Jo. 13. 35. By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another; so that if we mean not to cast off discipleship to Christ, we must not forsake this love of the brethren.

8. The third relation is that between Husband and Wife. This is yet much nearer then either of the former, as appears by that Text Eph. 5. 31. A man shall leave Father and Mother and cleave to his wife, and they two shall be one flesh. Several duties there are owing from one of these persons to the other; and first for the wife, she owes obedience. This is commanded by the Apostle, Col. 3. 18. Wives submit yourselves to your own husbands, as it is fit in the Lord. They are to render obedience to their Husbands in the Lord, that is in all lawful commands, for otherwise 'tis here as in the case of all other superiors, God must be obeyed rather than man, and the wife must not upon her husbands command do anything which is forbidden by God. But in all things, which doth not cross some command of God's, this precept is of force, and will serve to condemn the peevish stubbornness of many wives, who resist the lawful commands of their husbands, only because they are impatient of this duty of subjection, which God himself requires of them. But it may here be asked, what if the husband command something which though it be not unlawful, is yet very inconvenient, and imprudent, must the wife submit to such a command? To this I answer, that it will be no disobedience in her, but duty, calmly and mildly to show him the inconveniences thereof, and to persuade him to retract that command; but in case she cannot win him to it by fair entreaties, she must neither try sharp language, nor yet finally refuse to obey, nothing but the unlawfulness of the command being sufficient warrant for that

9 Secondly, The wife owes Fidelity to the husband, and that of two sorts; first that of the bed, she must keep herself pure and chaste from all strange embraces, and therefore must not so much as give an ear to any that would allure her, but with the greatest abhorrence eject all motions of that sort, & never give any man that has once made such a mot on to her, the least opportunity to make a second. Secondly, She owes him likewise Fidelity, in the managing of those worldly affairs, he commits to her; she must order them so, as may be most to her husbands advantage, and not by deceiving, and cozening of him employ his good to such uses as he allows not of.

10. Thirdly, She owes him Love, and together with that all friendliness and kindness of conversation; she is to endeavor to bring him as much assistance, and comfort of life, as is possible, that so she may answer that special end of the woman's creation, the being a help to her husband, Gen. 2. 13. and this in all conditions, whether health, or sickness, wealth, or poverty, whatsoever estate God by his providence shall cast him into, she must be as much of comfort and support to him, as she can. To this all sullenness, and harshness, all brawling, and unquietness is directly contrary, for that makes the wife the burden, and plague of the man, instead of a help and comfort; And sure if it be a fault to behave ones self so to any person, as hath already been shown, how great must it be to do so to him, to whom the greatest kindness and affection is owing?

11. Nor let such wives think that any faults, or provocations of the husband can justify their frowardness, for they will not, either in respect of Religion or discretion. Not in religion for where God has absolutely Commanded a duty to be paid, 'tis not any unworthiness of the person can excuse from it; Nor in Discretion, for the worse a husband is, the more need there is for the wife to carry herself with that gentleness and sweetness, that may be most likely to win him. This is the advice St. Peter gave the wives of his time, 1 P<sup>t</sup>. 3. 1. Likewise ye wives be in subjection to your own husbands, that if any obey not the word, they may without the word be won by the conversation of the wives. It seems the good behavior of the wives was thought a powerful means even to win men from Heathenism to Christianity, and sure it might now a days have some good effects, if women would have but the patience to try it: At the least, 'twould have this, that it would keep some tolerable quiet in Families, whereas on the other side the ill fruits of the wives unquietness are so notorious, that there are few neighbourhoods, but can give some instance of it. How many men are there, that to avoid the noise of a froward wife, have fallen to company keeping, & by that to drunkenness, poverty, and a multitude of mischiefs? Let all wives therefore beware of administering that temptation. But whenever there happens anything, which in kindness to her husband, she is to admonish him of, let it be with that softness, and mildness, that it may appear 'tis love, and not anger, that makes her speak.

12. There are also on the Husbands part several 〈◇〉. There is first Love, which Saint Paul requires, to be very tender and passionate towards the wife, as appears by the similitudes •e•nieth in that matter, Eph. 5. The one that of the love a man bears to his natural body, No man, says he, ver. 2 7. ever hated his own fl<sup>sh</sup>, but nourisheth, and cherisheth it. The other the love that Christ bears to his Church, which is far greater, ver. 26. both which he sets as patterns for this love of husbands towards their wives. This utterly forbids all harshness, and roughness to them; Men are to use them as parts of themselves, to love them as their own bodies, and therefore to do nothing, that may be hurtful, and grievous to them, no more than they would cut, and gash their own flesh. Let those husbands that tyrannize over their wives, that scarce use them like human creatures consider, whether that be to love them, as their own bodies

13. A second duty of the Husband, is Faithfulness to the Bed. This is by God as well required of the husband, as the wife, and though the world do seem to look on the breach of this duty, with less abhorrence in the husband, yet sure before that Just Judge, the offense will appear no less on the man's side, then the woman's. This is certain, 'tis in both a breach of the vow, made to each other, at their Marriage, and so besides the uncleanness, a down-right perjury, and those differences in the case, which seem to cast the scale, are rather in respect of civil and worldly consideration, then merely of the sin.

14. A third duty of the husband is to maintain, and provide for the wife. He is to let her partake with him in those outward good things, wherewith God hath blest him, and neither by niggardliness debar her of what is fit for her, nor yet by unthriftiness so waste his goods, that he shall become unable to support her. This is certainly the duty of the husband, who being, as hath been said, to account his wife as a part of his own body, must have the very same care to sustain her, that he hath for himself. Yet this is not so to be understood, as to excuse the wife from her part of labor and industry, when that is requisite, it being unreasonable the husband should toil to maintain the wife in idleness.

15. Fourthly, The husband is to instruct the wife in the things which concern her eternal welfare, if she be ignorant of them. Thus St. Paul bids the wives learn of their husbands at home, 1 Cor. 14. 36 which supposes, that the husband is to teach her. Indeed it belongs to every Master of a Family to endeavor, that all under his charge be taught all necessary things of this kind, and then sure more especially his wife, who is so much nearer to him, then all the rest. This should make men careful to get knowledge themselves, that so they may be able to perform this duty they owe to others.

16. Lastly, Husbands and Wives, are mutually to pray for each other, to beg all blessings from God, both temporal and spiritual, & to endeavor all they can to do all good to one another, especially all good to each others Souls, by stirring up to the performance of duty and dissuading, and drawing back from all sin, and by being like true yoke-fellows, helpful and assistant to each other in the doing of all sorts of good, both to their own Family, and all others within their reach. This is of all other the truest, and most valuable love. Nay, indeed how can it be said they do love at all, who can contentedly let each other run on in a course that will bring them to eternal misery? And if the love of husbands and wives were thus grounded in Virtue and Religion, 'twould make their lives a kind of Heaven on earth, 'twould prevent all those contentions, and brawlings, so common among them, which are the great plagues of Families, and a lesser Hell, in passage to the greater, and truly where it is not thus founded, there is little comfort to be expected in marriage.

17. It should therefore be the care of everyone that means to enter upon that state, to consider advisedly before hand, and to choose such a person, with whom they may have this spiritual friendship, that is such a one, as truly fears God. There are many false ends of Marriage looked upon in the world: some Marry for Wealth, others for Beauty, and generally they are only worldly respects, that are at all considered; but certainly he that would Marry as •e ought, should contrive to make his Marriage useful to those better ends, of serving God, and saving his own Soul; at least he must be sure it be no hindrance to them, and to that purpose the virtue of the person chosen in more conducing then all the wealth in the world, though I deny not, but that a competency of that may likewise be considered

18. But above all things, let all take heed, that they make not such marriages, as may not only be ill in their effects, but are actual sins at the time; such are the marriages of those that were formerly promised to some other, in which case 'tis sure they rightly belong to those, to whom they past the first promise, and then for any other to marry them, during the life of that person, is to take the husband or wife of that other, which is direct adultery, as St. Paul tells us, Rom. 7. 3. The like unlawfulness there is also in the marriage of those, who are within those degrees of kindred forbidden by God, the particulars whereof are set down in the 18. and 20 of Lev. and whoever marries any that is within any of those degrees of nearness, either to himself, or to his deceased wife, which is as bad, commits that great sin of incest, and so long as he continues to live with such his unlawful wife, remains in that fearful guilt. This wariness in the choice of the person to be married, would prevent many sad effects, which we daily see follow such rash or unlawful matches; it were well therefore if people would look on marriage, as our Church advises, as a thing not to be undertaken lightly, unadvisedly or wantonly, to satisfy men's carnal lusts and appetites, but reverently, discreetly, advisedly, soberly, and in the fear of God; and in so doing no doubt a blessing would follow, which otherwise there is little ground to expect. I have now done with this relation between husband and wife.

19. The next is that between friends; and this relation if it be rightly founded, it is of great nearness, and usefulness, but there is none more generally mistaken in the world; men usually call them their friends, with whom they have an intimacy, and frequency of conversation, though that intimacy be indeed nothing but an agreement and combination in sin. The drunkard thinks him his friend that will keep him company, the deceitful person, him that will aid him in his cheats, the proud man, him that will flatter him: And so generally in all vices, they are looked on as friends, that advance and farther us in them. But God knows this is far from friendship, such a friend as this the Devil himself is in the highest degree, who is never backward in such offices. The true friendship is that of a direct contrary making, 'tis a concurrence and agreement in virtue, not in vice: in short, a true friend loves h•s friend so, that he is very zealous of his good, and certainly he that is really so, will never be the instrument of b•inging him to the greatest evil. The general duty of a friend then must be resolved to be the industrious pursuit of his friends real advantages, in which there are several particulars contained.

20. As first, faithfulness in all trusts committed to him by his friend, whether that of goods or secrets; he that betrays the trust of a friend in either, is by all men looked upon with abhorrence, it being one of the highest falsnesses and treacheries, and for such treacherous wounds the wise man tells us, every friend will depart, Ecclesiasticus 22. 22.

21. Secondly, 'tis the duty of a friend to be assisting to his friend in all his outward needs; to counsel him, when he wants advice; to cheer him, when he needs comfort; to give him, when he wants relief, and to endeavor his rescue out of any trouble or danger. An admirable example we have of this friendship in Jonathan to David, he loved him as his own soul, and we see he not only contrives for his safety when he was in danger, but runs hazards himself to rescue and deliver his friend, draws his fathers anger upon him, to turn it from David, as you may read at large, 1 Sam. 20.

22. The third and highest duty of a friend is to be aiding and assisting to the soul of his friend, to endeavor to advance that in piety and virtue, by all means within his power, by exhortations and encouragements to all virtue, by earnest and vehement disswasions from all sin, and not only thus in general, but by applying to his particular wants, especially by plain and friendly reproofs, where he knows or reasonably believes there is any fault committed. This is of all others the most peculiar duty of a friend, it being indeed that which none else is qualified for such an unwillingness there is in most men to hear of their faults, that those that undertake that work, had need have a great prepossession of their hearts, to make them patient of it: Nay, it is so generally acknowledged to be the proper work of a friend, that if he omit it, he betrays the offender into security, his not reproving will be apt to make the other think he does nothing worthy of reproof, and so he tacitly acts that basest part of a flatterer, soothes, and cherishes him in his sin; when yet farther it is considered how great need all men have at some time or other, of being admonished, 'twill appear a most unfriendly, yea cruel thing to omit it; we have that natural partialities to ourselves, that we cannot so readily discern our own miscarriages, as we do other men's, and therefore 'tis very necessary they should sometimes be shown us by those, who see them more clearly: and the doing this at the first may prevent the multiplying of more: whereas if we be suffered to go on unreproved, it often comes to such a habit that reproves will do no good And then how shall that person be able to answer it either to God or himself, that has by his silence betrayed his friend to this greatest mischief. 'Tis the expression of God himself speaking of a friend, thy friend which is as thine own soul, Deut. 13. 6. And sure we should in this respect account our friends as our own souls, by having the same jealous tenderness and watchfulness over their souls, which we ought to have of our own. It will therefore be very fit for all that have entered any strict friendship, to make this one special article in the agreement, that they shall mutually admonish and reprove each other; by which means it will become such an avowed part of their friendship, that it can never be mistaken by the reproved party for censoriousness or unkindness.

23. Fourthly, To these several parts of kindness must be added that of Prayer, we must not only assist our friends, ourselves, in what we can, but we must call in the Almighty aid to them, recommending them earnestly to God for all his blessings, both spiritual, & temporal.

24. Lastly, We must be constant in our friendships, and not out of a slightness of humor grow weary of a friend, only because we have had him long. This is great injustice to him, who if he have behaved himself well, ought the more to be valued, by how much the longer he has continued to do so: And it is great folly in ourselves, for it is the casting away the greatest treasure of human life, for such certainly is a tried friend. The wisest of men gives warning of it, Prov. 27. 16. Thine own friend and thy fathers friend forsake not. Nay farther, 'tis not every light offense of a friend, that should make thee renounce his friendship, there must be some allowance made to the infirmities of men, and if thou hast occasion to pardon him somewhat today, perhaps thou mayest give him opportunity to requite thee tomorrow; therefore nothing but unfaithfulness, or incorrigible vice should break this band.

25. The last relation is that between Masters and Servants, both which owe a duty to each other: That of the servant is first obedience to all lawful commands; this is expressly required by the Apostle, Eph. 6. 6. Servants obey in all things your Masters, &c. and this obedience must not be a grumbling and unwilling one, but ready and cheerful as he there proceeds to exhort, ver. 7. with good will doing service, and to help them herein, they are to consider that it is to the Lord, and not unto men; God has commanded servants thus to obey their Masters, and therefore the obedience they pay is to God, which may well make them do it cheerfully, how harsh, or unworthy soever the Master be, especially if what the Apostle farther urgeth, ver. 8. be considered, that there is a reward to be expected from God for it.

26. The second duty of the servant is faithfulness, and that may be of two sorts, one as supposed to eye service, the other to purloining or defrauding. The first part of faithfulness is the doing of all true service to his Master, not only when his eye is over him, and he expect punishment for the omission, but at all times, even when his Master is not likely to discern his failing, and that servant that doth not make conscience of this, is far from being a faithful servant; this eye-service being by the Apostle set opposite to that singleness of heart, which he requires of servants, Eph 6. 5. 6. The second sort of faithfulness consists in the honest managery of all things entrusted to him by his Master, the not wasting his goods (as the unjust steward was accused to have done Lu. 16.) whether by careless embezzling of them, or by converting any of them to his own use without the allowance of his Master. This latter is that purloining of which the Apostle warns servants, Tit. 2. 10. And is indeed no better then arrant theft, of this kind are all those ways, that the servant hath of gaining to himself by the loss and damage of his Master, as the being bribed to make ill bargains for him, and many the like: Nay, indeed this sort of unfaithfulness is worse then common theft, by how much there is a greater trust reposed, the betraying whereof adds to the crime. As for the other sort of unfaithfulness, that of wasting though without gain to themselves, it differs not much in effect from this, the Master may lose as much by the one as by the other, and then what odds is it to him, whether he be robbed by the covetousness or negligence of his servant, and it is still the same breach of trust with the former, for every Master is supposed to intrust his affairs as well to the care as the honesty of his servant for t'would be little advantage to the Master to be secured, that his servant would not himself cheat him, whilst in the mean time he would by his carelessness give opportunity to others to do it; therefore he that does not carefully look to his Masters profit, deceives his trust, as well as he that justly provides for his own.

A third duty of a servant is patience and meekness under the reproofs of his Master; not answering again, as the Apostle exhorts, Tit. 2. 9, That is not making such surely and rude replies, as may increase the Masters displeasure: A thing too frequent among servants, even in the justest reprehensions, whereas St. Peter directs them patiently to suffer, even the most undeserved correction, even when they do well and suffer for it, 1 Pet. 2. 20. But the patient suffering of rebuke is not all that is required of servants in this matter, they must also mend the fault they are rebuked for, and not think they have done enough, when they have (though never so dutifully) given the Master the hearing.

28. A fourth duty of a servant is diligence; he must constantly attend to all those things; which are the duties of his place, and not; give himself to idleness, and sloth, nor yet to company keeping, gameing, or any other disorderly course, which may take him off from his Masters business. All these are necessary duties of a servant, which they are carefully and conscionably to perform, not so much to escape the Masters anger as God's, who will certainly call everyone of them to an account, how they have behaved themselves towards their earthly Masters.

29. Now on the other side, there are some things also owing from the Masters to their servants: As first the Master is bound to be just to them, in performing those conditions, on which they were hired, such are commonly the giving them food and wages, and that Master that withholds these, is an oppressor.

30. Secondly, The Master is to admonish and reprove the servant in case of fault, and that not only in faults against them, wherein few Masters are backward, but also and more especially in faults against God, whereat every Master ought to be more troubled than at those which tend only to his own loss, or inconvenience; the dishonor of God and the hazard of the meanest man's soul, being infinitely more worthy our disquiet, than anything of the other kind can be. And therefore when Masters are presently on fire for any little negligence or fault of a servant towards themselves, and yet can without trouble see them run into the greatest sins against God, 'tis a sign they consider their own concernments too much, and God's glory and their servants souls too little. This is too commonly the temper of Masters, they are generally careless how their servants behave themselves towards God, how disordered and profane their families are, and therefore never bestow any exhortation, or admonition, to persuade them to virtue, or draw them from vice; such Masters forget that they must one day give an account how they have governed their families. It is certainly the duty of every Ruler to endeavor to advance piety and godliness among all those that are under his charge, and that as well in this lesser dominion of a family, as in the greater of a Realm or Nation. Of this David was so careful, that we see he professes, Psal. 101. 7. That no deceitful person should dwell in his house, that he that told lies should not tarry in his sight, so much he thought himself bound to provide that his family might be a kind of Church, an assembly of Godly upright persons: And if all Masters would endeavor to have theirs so, they would besides the eternal reward of it, hereafter find a present benefit by it, there worldly business would thrive much the better; for if their servants were brought to make conscience of their ways, they would then not dare either to be negligent or false.

31. But as it is the duty of Masters to admonish and reprove their servants, so they must also look to do it in a due manner, that is so, as may be most likely to do good, not in passion and rage, which can never work the servant to anything but the despising or hating him, but with such sober and grave speeches, as may convince him of his fault, and may also assure him, that it is a kind desire of his amendment (and not a willingness to wreck his own rage) which makes the Master thus to rebuke him.

32. A third duty of the Master is to set good example of honesty and godliness to his servants, without which 'tis not all the exhortations, or reproofs he can use, will ever do good; for else he pulls down more with his example, then tis possible for him to build with the other, and 'tis madness for a drunken, or profane Master, to expect a sober and godly family.

33. Fourthly. the Master is to provide that his servants may not want means of being instructed in their duty, as also that they may daily have constant times of worshipping God, publicly by having prayers in the family; but of this I have spoken before under the head of Prayer, and therefore shall here say no more of it.

34. Fifthly, The master in all affairs of his own, is to give reasonable and moderate commands, not saying greater burdens on his servants then they are able to bear, particularly not requiring so much work, that they shall have no time to bestow on their souls, as on the other side he is not to permit them to live so idly as may make them either useless to him, or may betray themselves to any ill.

35. Sixthly, The Master is to give his servants encouragement in well doing, by using them with that bounty and kindness which their faithfulness and diligence and piety deserves: And finally in all his dealing with them, he is to remember that himself hath as the Apostle saith, Eph. 6. 9. A Master in heaven, to whom he must give account of the usage of his meanest servant on earth. Thus have I briefly run through those several relations, to which we owe a particular duty, and so have done with that first branch of duty to our neighbors; that of Justice.

PARTITION XVI.

Other Branches of our DUTY to our Neighbor. Of CHARITY to men's Souls, Bodies, Goods, &c.

THE second branch of Duty to our Neighbors is Charity or Love. This is the great Gospel-duty, so often enjoined us by Christ, the New Commandment as himself calls it, Jo. 13 34. That ye love one another, & this is again repeated twice in one Chapter, John 15 12. 17. and the first Epistle of St. John is almost wholly spent in the persuasion to this one duty, by which we may see 'tis no matter of indifference, but most strictly required of all that profess Christ. Indeed himself has given it as the badge and livery of his Disciples, John 13. 35. By this shall all men know that ye are my Disciples if ye have love one to another.

This Charity may be considered two ways; first, in respect of the affections; secondly, of the actions. Charity in the affections is a sincere kindness, which disposes us to wish all good to others, and that in all their capacities, in the same manner that justice obliged us to wish no hurt to any man, in respect either of his Soul, his Body, his Goods, or his Credit, so this first part of Charity binds us to wish all good to them in all these.

And first, for the Soul. If we have any the least spark of Charity, we cannot but wish all good to men's Souls; Those precious things which Christ thought worth the ransoming with his own blood, may surely well challenge our kindness, and good wishes; and therefore if we do not thus love one another, we are far from obeying that Command of loving, as he hath loved, for 'twas the Souls of men which he loved so tenderly, and both did, and suffered so much for. Of this love of his to Souls there are two great and special effects; the first, the purifying them here by his grace, the second, the making them everlastingly happy, in his glory; and both these we are so far to copy out in our kindness, as to be earnestly desirous that all men should arrive to that purity, and holiness here, which may make them capable of eternal happiness hereafter. It were to be hoped, that none that himself carried a Soul about him, could be so cruel to that of another man's, as not sincerely to wish this, did not experience show us there are some persons, whose malice is so devilish, as to reach even to the dire•• contrary, the wishing not only the sin, but the damnation of others. Thus may you have some, who in any injury, or oppression they suffer, make it their only comfort, that their enemies will damn themselves by it; when alas! that should to a Christian be much more terrible, then any suffering they could bring upon him. He that is of this temper, is a disciple of Satan's, not of Christ, it being directly contrary to the whole scope of that grand Christian precept, of loving our neighbors as ourselves. For 'tis sure, no man that believes there is such a thing as damnation, wishes it to himself; Be he never so fond of the ways that lead to it, yet he wishes that may not be his journeys end, and therefore by that rule of Charity should as much dread it for his Neighbor.

Secondly, We are to wish all good to the Bodies of men, all health and welfare, we are generally tender enough of our own bodies, dread the least pain or ill, that can befall them; Now Charity, by virtue of the forementioned precept, extends this tenderness to all others, and whatever we apprehend as grievous to ourselves, we must be unwilling should befall another. The like is to be said of the other two, goods and credit, that as we wish our own thriving and reputation, so we should likewise that of others, or else we can never be said to love our neighbor as ourselves.

This Charity of the affections, if it be sincere, will certainly have these several effects, which are so inseparable from it, that they are often in Scripture accounted as parts of the duty, and so most strictly required of us; First, it will keep the mind in a peaceable and meek temper towards others, so far from seeking occasions of contentions, that no provocation shall draw us to it; for where we have kindness we shall be unapt to quarrel, it being one of the especial properties of Charity, that it is not easily provoked, 1 Cor. 13. 5. and therefore whoever is unpeaceable, shows his heart is destitute of this Charity. Secondly, it will breed compassion towards all the miseries of others every mishap that befalls, where we wish well, is a kind of defeat and disaster to ourselves and therefore if we wish well to all, we shall be thus concerned in the calamities of all, have a real grief, and sorrow, to see any in misery, and that according to the proportion of the suffering. Thirdly, it will give us joy in the prosperities of others; Solomon observes Prov. 13. 19. That the desire accomplished is sweet to the Soul, and then whoever has this real desire of his neighbors welfare, his desire is accomplished in their prosperity, and therefore he cannot but have contentment and satisfaction in it. Both these are together commanded by St. Paul, Rom. 12. 12. Rejoice with them that rejoice, weep with them that weep. Fourthly, it will excite and stir up our prayers for others; We are of ourselves impotent, feeble creatures, unable to bestow blessings, where we most wish them, therefore if we do indeed desire the good of others we must seek it on their behalf, from him, whence every good and perfect gift cometh, Ja. 1. 17. This is so necessary a part of Charity, that without it our kindness is but an insignificant thing, a kind of empty complement. For how can he be believed to wish well in earnest, who will not thus put life and efficacy into his wishes by forming them into prayers which will otherwise be vain and fruitless. The Apostle thought not fit to leave men to their bare wishes, but exhorts that supplications, prayers, and giving of thanks be made for all men, 1 Tim. 2. 1. which precept all that have this true Charity of the heart, will readily conform to. These severals are so naturally the fruits of this Charity that it is a deceit for any man to persuade himself he hath it, who cannot produce these fruits to evidence it by.

But there is yet a farther excellency of this grace, it guards the mind, and secures it from several great and dangerous vices; as first from Envy; This is by the Apostle taught us to be the property of Charity, 1 Cor. 13. 4. Charity envieth not; And indeed common reason may confirm this to us, for envy is a sorrow at the prosperity of another, and therefore must needs be directly contrary to that desire of it, which we shown before was the effect of love; so that if love bear sway in the heart, 'twill certainly chase out Envy. How vainly then do those pretend to this virtue, that are still grudging, and repining at every good hap of others?

Secondly, It keeps down Pride and Haughtiness. This is also taught us by the Apostle in the forementioned place, Charity vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up; and accordingly we find, that where this virtue of love is commanded, their humility is joined with it. Thus it is, Col. 3. 12. Put on therefore bowels of Mercies, Kindness, Humbleness of mind, and Rom. 12. 10. Be kindly affectioned on towards another with brotherly love in honor preferring one another, where you see how close an attendant humility is of love. Indeed it naturally flows from it, for love always sets a price and value upon the thing beloved, makes us esteem and prize it; thus we too constantly find it in self love, it makes us think highly of ourselves, that we are much more excellent than other men. Now if love thus placed on ourselves, beget pride, let us but divert the course, and turn this love on our brethren, and it will as surely beget humility, for then we should see and value those gifts and excellencies of theirs, which now our pride, or our hatreds make us to overlook and neglect, and not think it reasonable either to despise them, or vaunt and magnify ourselves upon such a comparison; we should certainly find cause to put the Apostles exhortation in practice, Phil. 2. 4 That we should esteem others better than ourselves. Whoever therefore is of so haughty a temper, as to vilify and disdain others, may conclude he hath not this charity rooted in his heart.

Thirdly, it casts out ensoriousness and rash judging charity, as the Apostle saith, 1 Cor. 13. 5. Thinketh no evil, is not apt to entertain ill conceits of others, but on the contrary as it follows, ver. 7. believeth all thing, hopeth all things; that is, it is forward to believe and hope the best of all men, and surely our own experience tells us the same, for where we love we are usually unapt to discern faults, be they never so gross (witness the great blindness we generally have towards our own) and therefore shall certainly not be likely to create them, where they are not, or to aggravate them beyond their true size and degree: And then to what shall we impute those unmerciful censures and rash judgments of others, so frequent among men, but to the want of this charity.

Fourthly, It casts out dissembling and feigned kindness; where this true and real love is, that false and counterfeit one flies from before it, and this is the love we are commanded to have, such as is without dissimulation, Rom. 12. 9. Indeed where this is rooted in the heart, there can be no possible use of dissimulation, because this is in truth all that the false one would seem to be, and so is as far beyond it, as nature is beyond art, nay indeed as a divine virtue is beyond a foul sin, for such is that hypocritical kindness, and yet tis to be feared that does too generally usurp the place of this real charity, the effects of it are too visible among us, there being nothing more common then to see men make large professions to those who as soon as their back are turned, they either deride or mischief.

Fifthly, it casts out all mercenariness, and self-seeking, 'tis of so noble and generous a temper, that it dispises all projectings for gain or advantage, love seeketh not her own, 1 Cor. 13. 5. And therefore that huckstering kind of love so much used in the world, which places itself only there, where it may fetch in benefit, is very far from this charity.

Lastly, It turns out of the heart all malice and desire of revenge which is so utterly contrary to it, that it is impossible they should both dwell in the same breast; 'tis the property of love to bear all things, 1 Cor. 13. 7. To endure the greatest injuries, without thought of making any other return to them then prayers and blessings, and therefore the malicious revengeful person, is of all others the greatest stranger to this charity.

'Tis true if this virtue were to be exercised but towards some sort of persons, it might consist with malice to others, it being possible for a man that bitterly hates one to love another; but we are to take notice that this charity must not be so confined, but must extend and stretch itself to all men in the world, particularly to enemies, or else it is not that divine charity commended to us by Christ. The loving of friends, and benefactors is so low a pitch that the very Publicans and sinners, the worst of men were able to attain to it, Mat. 5. 46 And therefore 'tis not counted rewardable in a Disciple of Christ; No, he expects we should soar higher, and therefore hath set us this more spiritual, and excellent precept of loving of enemies, Mat. 5. 44. I say unto you, love your enemies, bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you, and persecute you, and whoever does not thus, will never be owned by him for a disciple. We are therefore to conclude, that all which hath been said concerning this Charity of the affections must be understood to belong as well to our spitefullest enemy, as our most obliging friend. But because this is a duty, to which the froward nature of man is apt to object much, 'twill not be amiss to insist a little on some considerations, which may enforce it on us.

And first consider, what hath been already touched on, that it is the Command of Christ, both in the Text above mentioned, and multitudes of others, there being scarce any precept so often repeated in the New Testament, as this of loving and forgiving of enemies. Thus Eph. 4. 32. Be ye kind one to another, tender hearted, forgiving one another; and again, Col. 3. 13. Forbearing one another and forgiving one another, if any man have a quarrel against any, even as Christ forgave you, so also do ye. So also, 1 Pet. 3. 9. Not rendering evil for evil, nor railing for railing, but contrariwise Blessing. A whole volume of Texts might be brought to this purpose, but these are certainly enough, to convince any man, that this is strictly required of us by Christ, and indeed I think, there are few that ever heard of the Gospel, but know it is so. The more prodigiously strange is it, that men that call themselves Christians, should give no degree of obedience to it, nay, not only so, but even publicly avow, and profess the contrary, as we daily see they do, it being ordinary to have men resolve, and declare, that they will not forgive such, or such a man, and no consideration of Christ's Command can at all move them from their purpose. Certainly these men understand not what is meant by the very word Christian, which signifies a Servant, and Disciple of Christ, and this Charity is the very badge of the one, the lesson of the other; and therefore 'tis the greatest absurdity, and contradiction, to profess themselves Christians, and yet at the same time to resist this so express Command of that Christ, whom they own as their Master. If I be a Master, saith God, where is my fear? Mal. 1. 6. Obedience and reverence are so much the duties of Servants, that no man is thought to look on him as a Master, to whom he pays them not. Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things that I say? saith Christ, Luk. 6. 46. The whole world is divided into two great Families. Christ's, and Satan's, and the obedience each man pays, signifies to which of these Masters he belongs, if he obey Christ, to Christ; if Satan, to Satan. Now this sin of malice, and revenge is so much the dictate of that wicked spirit, that there is nothing can be a more direct obeying of him, 'tis the taking his livery on our backs, the proclaiming whose servants we are; What ridiculous impudence is it then, for men that have thus entered themselves of Satan's Family, to pretend to be the Servants of Christ? Let such know assuredly, they shall not be owned by him, but at the great day of accompt, be turned over to their proper Master, to receive their wages, in fire and brimstone.

A second consideration is the example of God: this is an argument Christ himself thought fit to use, to impress this duty on us, as you may see Luk 6. 35, 36. where after having given the Command of Loving enemies, he encourages to the practice of it, by telling, that it is that which will make us the Children of the Highest (that is, 'twill give us a likeness and resemblance to him, as children have to their Parents) for he is kind to the unthankful and the evil; And to the same purpose, you may read Mat. 5. 45. He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and on the good, and sendeth rain on the just and on the unjust; And sure this is a most forcible consideration to excite us to this duty. God, we know, is the fountain of perfection, and the being like to him, is the sum of all we can wish for; and though it was Lucifers fall, his ambition to be like the most high, yet had the likeness he affected been only that of Holyness and Goodness, he might still have been an Angel of light; This desire of imitating our Heavenly Father is the especial mark of a child of his. Now this kindness and goodness to enemies is most eminently remarkable in God, and that not only in respect of the temporal mercies, which he indifferently bestows on all, his sun and rain on the unjust, as in the Text forementioned, but chiefly in his spiritual mercies; We are all by our wicked works Col. 1. 21. Enemies to him, and the mischief of that enmity would have fallen wholly upon ourselves, God had no motive besides that of his pity to us, to wish a reconciliation, yet so far was he from returning our enmity, when he might have revenged himself to our eternal ruin, that he designs, and contrives how he may bring us to be at peace with him. This is a huge degree of mercy and kindness, but the means he used for effecting this, is yet far beyond it; He sent his own Son from Heaven, to work it, and that not only by persuasions, but sufferings also; So much did he prize us miserable creatures, that he thought us not too dear bought with the blood of his Son. The like example of mercy and patience we have in Christ both laying down his life for us enemies, and also in that meek manner of doing it, which we find excellently set forth by the Apostle, 1 Pet. 2. 22. 23. 24. and commended to our imitation. Now surely when all this is considered, we may well make St. Johns inference, Beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another, 1 John 4. 11. how shameful a thing is it for us to retain displeasures against our brethren, when God thus lays by his towards us, and that when we have so highly provoked him?

This directs to a third consideration, the comparing our sins against God, with the offenses of our brethren against us, which we no sooner shall come to do, but there will appear a vast difference between them, and that in several respects; For first, there is the majesty of the person, against whom we sin, which exceedingly increases the guilt, whereas between man and man, there cannot be so great a distance; for though some men are by God advanced to such eminency of dignity, as may make an injury offered to them the greater yet still they are but men of the same nature with us, whereas he is God blessed forever; Secondly, there is his sovereignty and power, which is original in God, for we are his creatures, we have received our whole being from him, and therefore are in the deepest manner bound to perfect obedience, whereas all the sovereignty that one man can possibly have over another, is but imparted to them by God, and for the most part there is none of this neither in the case, quarrels being most usual among equals. Thirdly, there is his infinite bounty and goodness to us, all that ever we enjoy, whether in relation to this life, or a better being wholly his free gift, and so there is the foulest ingratitude added to our other crimes; in which respect also 'tis impossible for one man to offend against another in such a degree, for though one may be (& too many are) guilty of unthankfulness towards men, yet because the greatest benefits that man can bestow, are infinitely short of those which God doth, the ingratitude cannot be near so great as towards God it is. Lastly, there is the greatness and multitude of our sins against God, which do infinitely exceed all that the most injurious man can do against us, for we all sin much oftener and more heinously against him than any man, be he never so malicious, can find opportunity is of injuring his brethren This inequality and disproportion our Savior intimates in the parable, Mat. 18. where our offenses against God are noted by the ten thousand talents, whereas our brethren's against us are described by the hundred pence, a talent hugely out-weighs a penny, and ten thousand out numbers a hundred, yet so and much more does the weight and number of our sins exceed all the offenses of others against us: Much more might be said to show the vast inequality between the faults which God forgives us, and those we can possibly have to forgive our brethren: But this I suppose may suffice to silence all the objections of cruel and revengeful persons, against this kindness to enemies. They are apt to look upon it as an absur'd and unreasonable thing, but since God himself acts it in so much a higher degree, who can without blasphemy say 'tis unreasonable? If this, or any other spiritual duty appear so to us, we may learn the reason from the Apostle, 1 Cor. 2. 14. The carnal man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, for they are foolishness unto him; 'tis the carnality and fleshliness of our hearts, that makes it seem so, and therefore instead of disputing against the duty, let us purge our hearts of that, and then we shall find that true which the spiritual Wisdom affirms of her Doctrines, Pro. 8. 9. They are all plain to him that understandeth, and right to them that find knowledge.

Nay, this loving of enemies is not only a reasonable, but a pleasant duty, and that I propose as a fourth consideration; there is a great deal of sweetness and delight to be found in it; of this I confess none can so well judge as those that have practiced it, the nature even of earthly pleasures being such, that 'tis the enjoyment only that can make a man truly know them: No man can so describe the taste of any delicious thing to another, as that by it he shall know the relish of it, he must first actually taste of it, and sur' 'tis more so in spiritual pleasures, and therefore he that would fully know the sweetness and pleasantness of this duty, let him set to the practice and then his own experience will be the best informer: But in the mean time, how very unjust, yea, and foolish is it, to pronounce ill of it before trial: for men to say this is irksome, and intolerable, who never so much as once offered to try whether indeed it were so or no? Yet by this very means an ill opinion is brought up of this most delightful duty, and passes currant among men, whereas in all justice the testimony of it should be taken only from those who have tried it, and they would certainly give another account of it.

But though the full knowledge hereof be to be had only by his nearer acquaintance, yet methinks even those who look at it but at a distance, may discern somewhat of amiableness in it, if no other way, yet at least by comparing it with the uneasiness of its contrary, malice and revenge are the most wrestlesse, tormenting passions that can possess the mind of a man, they keep men in perpetual study and care how to effect their mischievous purposes, it disturbs their very sleep, as Solomon observes Pro. 4. 16. They sleep not except they have done mischief, and their sleep is taken away, except they cause some to fall: Yea, it imbitters all the good things they enjoy, so that they have no taste or relish of them; a remarkable example of this we have in Haman, who though he abounded in all the greatness and felicity of the world, yet the malice he had to a poor despicable man Mordecai, kept him from tasting contentment in all this, as you may see, Esther 5. where after he had related to his friends all his prosperities, ver. 11 he concludes thus, ver. 12. Yet all this availeth me nothing, so long as I see Mordecai the Jew sitting in the Kings gate. On the other side, the peaceable spiri<sup>t</sup>, that can quietly pass by all injuries and affronts, enjoys a continual calm, and is above the malice of his enemies, for let them do what they can, they cannot rob him of his quiet, he is firm as a rock, which no storms or winds can move, when the furious and revengeful man is like a wave which the least blast tosses and tumbles from its place. But besides this inward disquiet of revengeful men, they often bring many outward calamities upon themselves, they exasperate their enemies, and provoke them to do them greater mi•chiefs, nay oftentimes they willingly run themselves upon the greatest miseries in pursuit of their revenge, to which 'tis ordinary to see men sacrifice Goods, Ease, Credit, Life, nay soul itself, not caring what they suffer themselves so they may spite their enemy; so strangely does this wretched humor besott and blind men. On the contrary, the meek person he often melts his adversary, pacifies his anger; A soft answer turns away wrath, saith Solomon, Pro. 15. 1. And sure there is nothing can tend more to that end: but if it do happen that his enemy be so inhumane, that he miss of doing that, yet he is still a gainer by all he can suffer. For first, he gains an opportunity of exercising that most Christian grace of charity and forgiveness; and so at once of obeying the command and imitating the example of his Savior, which is to a true Christian spirit a most valuable advantage; and then secondly, he gains an accession and increase to his reward hereafter. And if it be objected, that that is not to be reckoned in to the present pleasure of the duty: I answer, that the expectation and belief of it is, and that alone is a delight infinitely more ravishing then the present enjoyment of all sensual pleasures can be.

The fourth consideration is, the danger of not performing this duty; of which I might reckon up divers, but I shall insist only on that great one, which contains in it all the rest, and that is the forfeiting of our own pardons from God, the having our sins against him kept still on his score, and not forgiven. This is a consideration, that methinks should afright us into good nature; if it do not, our malice is greater to ourselves then to our enemies. For alas! what hurt is it possible for thee to do to another, which can bear any comparison with that thou doest thyself, in loosing the pardon of thy sins? which is so unspeakable a mischief, that the Devil himself with all his malice cannot wish a greater, 'tis all he aims at, first, that we may sin, and then that those sins may never be pardoned, for then he knows he has us sure enough, Hell, and damnation being certainly the portion of every unpardoned sinner, besides all other effects of God's wrath in this life; consider this, and then tell me what thou hast got by the highest revenge, thou ever actedst upon another. 'Tis a devilish phrase in the mouth of men, that revenge is sweet: But is it possible there can be (even to the most distempered palate) any such sweetness in it, as may recompense that everlasting bitterness that attends it? 'Tis certain, no man in his wits can upon sober judging, imagine there is. But alas! we give not ourselves time to weigh things, but suffer ourselves to be hurried away with the heat of an angry humor, never considering how dear we must pay for it; like the silly Bee, that in anger leaves at once her sting and her life behind her, the sting may perhaps give some short pain to the flesh it sticks in, but yet there is none but discerns the Bee has the worst of it, that pays her life for so poor a revenge; so it is in the greatest acts of our malice, we may perhaps leave our stings in others, put them to some present trouble, but that compared with the hurt redounds to ourselves by it, is no more then that inconsiderable pain is to death. Nay not so much, because the mischiefs, that we bring upon ourselves are eternal, to which no finite thing can bear any proportion. Remember then, whensoever thou art contriving, and plotting a revenge, that thou quite mistakest the mark thou thinkest to hit thy enemy, and las! thou woundest thyself to death. And let no man speak peace to himself, or think that these are vain terrors, and that he may obtain pardon from God, though he give none to his brethren. For he that is truth itself has assured us the contrary, Mat. 6. 15. If ye forgive not men their trespasses, neither will your father forgive your trespasses. And least we should forget the necessity of this duty, he has inserted it into our daily Prayers, where we make it the condition, on which we beg pardon from God; Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us. What a heavy curse then does every revengeful person lay upon himself, when he says this Prayer, he does in effect beg God not to forgive him; and 'tis too sure that part of his Prayer will be heard, he shall be forgiven just as he forgives, that is not at all. This is yet farther set out to us in the parable of the Lord, and the servant, Mat. 18. the servant had obtained of his Lord the forgiveness of a vast debt, ten thousand talents, yet was so cruel to his fellow servant, as to exact a poor trifling sum of an hundred pence, upon which his Lord recalls his former forgiveness, and charges him again with the whole debt, and this Christ applies to our present purpose, ver. 35. So likewise shall my heavenly father do unto you, if ye from your hearts forgive not every man his brother their trespasses. One such act of uncharitableness is able to forfeit us the pardon God hath granted us, and then all our sins return again upon us, and sink us to utter ruin. I suppose it needless to heap up more Testimonies of Scripture, for the truth of this, these are so clear, as may surely serve to persuade any man, that acknowledge Scripture, of the great and fearful danger of this sin of uncharitableness. The Lord possess all our hearts with such a just sense of it as may make us avoid it.

The Last consideration I shall mention, is that of gratitude, God has shown wonderful mercies to us, Christ has suffered heavy things to bring us into a capacity of that mercy and pardon from God: And shall we not then think our selves obliged to some returns of thanfulness? If we will take the Apostles judgment he tells us, 2 Cor. 5. 15. That since Christ died for us all, 'tis but reasonable that we should not henceforth live unto ourselves, but unto him that died for us. Indeed were every moment of our life consecrated to his immediate service, 'twere no more then common gratitude requires, and far less, then such inestimable benefits deserve; what a shameful unthankfulness is it then, to deny him so poor a satisfaction as this, the forgiving our brethren? suppose a man that were ransomed either from death or slavery, by the bounty & sufferings of another, should upon his release be charged by him, that so freed him in return of that kindness of his, to forgive some slight debt, which was owing him by some third person, would you not think him the unthankfullest wretch in the world, that should refuse this to so great a benefactor? yet such a wretch, & much worse is every revengeful person: Christ hath bought us out of eternal slavery, and that not with corruptible things, as silver and gold, 1 Pet. 1. 8. But with his own most precious blood, and hath earnestly recommended to us the love of our brethren, and that with the most moving arguments drawn from the greatness of his love to us; and if we shall obstinately refuse him in so just, so moderate a demand, how unspeakable a vileness is it? and yet this we do downright, if we keep any malice or grudge to any person whatsoever. Nay, farther this is not barely an unthankfulness, but there is also joined with it a horrible contempt, and despising of him. This Peace and unity of brethren was a thing so much prized and valued by him, that when he was to leave the world, he thought it the most precious thing he could bequeath, and therefore left it by way of legacy to his Disciples, Jo. 14. 27. Peace I leave with you; we use to set a great value on the slightest bequests of our dead friends, to be exceeding careful not to lose them, and therefore if we willfully bangle away this so precious a Legacy of Christ, 'tis a plain sign we want that love and esteem of him, which we have of our earthly friends, and that we despise him as well as his Legacy. The great prevailing of this sin of uncharitableness has made me stand thus long on these consideration<sup>s</sup>, for the subduing it. God grant they may make such impression on the reader, as may be available to that purpose.

I shall add only this one advice, that these or whatsoever other remedies against this sin must be used timely: 'Tis oftentimes the frustrating of bodily medicines, the applying them too late, and 'tis much oftener so in spiritual, therefore if it be possible, let these and the like considerations be so constantly and habitually fixed in thy heart, that they may frame it to such meekness as may prevent all risings of rancor or revenge in thee, for it is much better they should serve as armor to prevent, than as balsome to cure the wound. But if this passion be not yet so subdued in thee, but that there will be some stirrings of it, yet then be sure to take it at the very first rise, and let not thy fancy chew, as it were, upon the injury by often rolling it in thy mind, but remember betimes the foregoing considerations, and withal, that this is a time, and season of trial to thee, wherein thou mayest show how thou hast profited in Christ's School, there now being an opportunity offered thee either of obeying and pleasing God, by passing by this offense of thy brother, or else of obeying and pleaseing Satan, that lover of discord, by nourishing hatred against him. Remember this, I say, betimes, before thou be inflamed, for if this fire be thoroughly kindled, it will cast such a smoke, as will blind thy reason, and make thee unfit to judge even in this so very plain case, whether it be bettet by obeying God, to purchase to thyself eternally bliss, or by obeying Satan, eternal torments. Whereas as if thou put the question to thyself before this commotion, and disturbance of mind, 'tis impossible but thy understanding must pronounce for God; And then unless thy will be so perverse that thou wilt deliberately choose death, thou wilt surely practice according to that sentence of thy understanding; I shall add no more on this first part of Charity, that of the Affections.

I proceed now to that of the Actions; And this indeed is it, whereby the former must be approved, we may pretend great charity within, but if none break forth in the Actions, we may say of that love, as Saint James does of the Faith he speaks of, that it is dead, Jam. 2. 20. It is the loving indeed, that must approve our hearts before God, 1 Jo. 3. 18. Now this love in the Actions may likewise fitly be distributed, as the former was, in relation to the four distinct capacities of our brethren, their Souls, their Bodies, their Goods, and Credit.

The Soul I formerly told you may be considered either in a natural or spiritual sense, and in both of them Charity binds us to do all the good we can. As the Soul signifies the mind of a man, so we are to endeavor the comfort and refreshment of our brethren, desire to give them all true cause of joy, & cheerfulness, especially when we see any under any sadness or heaviness, then to bring out all the cordials we can procure, that is, to labor by all Christian and fit means to cheer the troubled spirits of our brethren, to comfort them that are in any heaviness, as the Apostle speaks, 2 Cor. 1. 4.

But the Soul in the spiritual sense is y<sup>t</sup> of greater concernment, and the securing of that▪ is a matter of much greater moment, then the refreshing of the mind only, in as much as the eternal sorrows and sadnesses of Hell exceed the deepest sorrows of this life; and therefore though we must not omit the former, yet on this we are to employ our most zealous charities; Wherein we are not to content ourselves with a bare wishing well to the Souls of our brethren, this alone is a sluggish sort of kindness, unworthy of those who are to imitate the great Redeemer of Souls, who did and suffered so much in that purchase: No, we must add also our endeavor to make them what we wish them. To this purpose 'twere very reasonable to propound to ourselves in all our conversings with others, that one great design of doing some good to their Souls. If this purpose were fixed in our minds, we should then discern perhaps many opportunities, which now we overlook, of doing something towards it. The brutish ignorance of one would call upon thee to endeavor his instruction; the open vile of another, to reprehend & admonish him; the faint and weak virtue of another, to confirm and encourage him. Every spiritual want of thy brother may give thee some occasion of exercising some part of this Charity, or if the circumstances be such, that upon sober judging, thou think it vain to attempt anything thyself, as if either thy meanness, or thy unacquaintedness, or any the like impediment, be like to render thy exhortations fruitless, yet if thou art industrious in thy Charity, thou mayest probably find out some other instrument, by whom to do it more successfully. There cannot be a nobler study, then how to benefit men's Souls, and therefore where the direct means are improper, 'tis fit we should whet our wits for attaining of others. Indeed 'tis a shame, we should not as industriously contrive for this great spiritual concernment of others, as we do for every worldly trifling interests of our own; yet in them we are unwearied, and try one means after another, till we compass our end. But if after all our serious endeavors, the obstinacy of men do not suffer us, or themselves rather, to reap any fruit from them, if all our wooings and intreatings of men to have mercy on their own Souls, will not work on them, yet be sure to continue still to exhort by thy example; Let thy great care and tenderness of thy own Soul preach to them the value of theirs, and give not over thy compassions to them, but with the Prophet Jer. 13. 17. Let thy Soul weep in secret for them; and with the Psalmist, Let rivers of waters run down thy eyes, because they keep not God's Law, Psal. 119. 136. Yea, with Christ himself, weep over them, who will not know the things that belong to their peace, Luk. 19. 42. And when no importunities with them will work, yet even then cease not to importune God for them, that he will draw them to himself. Thus we see Samuel, when he could not dissuade the people from that sinful purpose they were upon, yet he professes notwithstanding, that he will not cease praying for them; nay, he looked on it as so much a duty, that it would be sin in him to omit it, God forbid, says he, that I should sin against the Lord in ceasing to pray for you, 1 Sam. 12. 23. Nor shall we need to fear that our prayers shall be quite lost, for if they prevail not for those for whom we pour them out, yet however they will return into our own bosoms, Psal. 35. 13. we shall be sure not to miss of the reward of that Charity.

In the second place, we are to exercise this Active Charity towards the bodies of our Neighbors; we are not only to compassionate their pains, and miseries, but also to do what we can for their ease and relief. The good Samaritan Luke 10. had never been proposed as our pattern, had he not as well helped as pitied the wounded man. 'Tis not good wishes, no nor good words neither that avail in such cases, as St. James tells us, If a brother or sister be naked and destitute of daily food, and one of you say unto them, Depart in peace, be ye warmed and filled, notwithstanding ye give him not those things that are needful for the body, what doth it profit? Jam. 2. 15. 16. No sure, it profits them nothing, in respect of their bodies, and it will profit thee as little in respect of thy Soul, it will never be reckoned to thee as a Charity. This relieving of the bodily wants of our brethren, is a thing so strictly required of us, that we find it set down Mat. 25. as the especial thing we shall be tried by at the Last Day, on the omission whereof is grounded that dreadful sentence, ver. 41. Depart from me ye cursed into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his Angels. And if it shall now be asked, what are the particular acts of this kind which we are to perform? I think we cannot better inform ourselves for the frequent and ordinary ones, then from this Chapter, where are set down these severals, the giving meat to the hungry, and drink to the thirsty, harbouring the stranger, clothing the naked, and visiting the sick, and imprisoned: By which visiting is meant, not a bare coming to see them, but so coming as to comfort and relieve them; for otherwise 'twill be but like the Levite in the Gospel, Lu. 10. who came and looked on the wounded man, but did no more, which will never be accepted by God. These are common and ordinary exercises of this charity, for which we cannot want frequent opportunities. But besides these, there may sometimes by God's especial providence fall into our hands, occasions of doing other good offices to the bodies of our neighbors; we may sometimes find a wounded man, with the Samaritan. and then 'tis our duty to do as he did; we may sometimes find an innocent person condemned to death, as Susanna was, and then are with Daniel to use all possible endeavor for their deliverances: This case Solomon seems to refer to, Prov. 24. 10. If thou forbear to deliver him that is drawn unto death, and them that are ready to be slain, if thou sayst behold we know it not; doth not he that pondereth the heart, consider? and he that keepeth thy soul, doth not he know it? shall not he render to every man according to his deeds; we are not lightly to put off the matter with vain excuses, but to remember that God, who knows our most secret thoughts, will severely examine, whether we have willingly omitted the performance of such a charity: sometimes again (nay God knows, often now a days) we may see a man that by a course of intemperance is in danger to destroy his health, to shorten his days, and then it is a due charity not only to the soul, but to the body also, to endeavor to draw him from it. It is impossible to set down all the possible acts of this corporal charity, because there may sometimes happen such opportunities, as none can foresee; we are therefore always to carry about us a serious resolution of doing whatever good of this kind we shall at any time discern occasion for, and then whenever that occasion is offered, we are to look on it as a call, as it were from heaven, to put that resolution in practice. This part of charity seems to be so much implanted in our natures, as we are men, that we generally account them not only unchristian, but inhumane, that are void of it, and therefore I hope there will not need much persuasion to it, since our very nature inclines us; but certainly that very consideration will serve hugely to increase the guilt of those that are wanting in it. For since this command is so agreeable even to flesh and blood, our disobedience to it can proceed of nothing, but a stubbornness and resistance against God who gives it.

PARTITION XVII.

Of CHARITY, Alms giving, &c. Of Charity in respect of our Neighbors Credit, &c. Of PEACE-MAKING. Of going to Law: Of Charity to our Enemies, &c. CHRISTIAN-DUTIES both I'OSSIBLE and PLEASANT.

§ 1: THE third way of expressing this Charity is towards the goods or estate of our neighbor; we are to endeavor his thriving and prosperity in these outward good things; and to that end, be willing to assist and farther him in all honest ways of improving or preserving them, by any neighborly and friendly office. Opportunities of this do many times fall out: A man may sometimes by his power or persuasion deliver his neighbors goods out of the hands of a thief, or oppressor; sometimes again by his advice and counsel, he may set him in a way of thriving, or turn him from some ruinous course; and many other occasions there may be of doing good turns to another, without any loss or damage to ourselves, and then we are to do them, even to our rich neighbors, those that are as wealthy (perhaps much more so) as ourselves; for though Charity do not bind us to give to those that want it less then ourselves, yet whenever we can further their profit, without lessning our own store, it requires it of us: Nay, if the damage be but light to us, in comparison of the advantage to him, it will become us rather to hazard that light damage, then lose him that greater advantage.

2. But towards our poor brother, Charity tyes us to much more; we are there only to consider the supplying of his wants, and not to stick at parting with what is our own, to relieve him, but as far as we are able give freely what is necessary to him. This duty of Almsgiving is perfectly necessary for the approving our love not only to men, but even to God himself, as St John tells us, 1 Jo. 3. 17. Who so hath this worlds goods, and seeth his brother have need, and shutteth up his bowels of compassion from him, how dwelleth the love of God in him? 'Tis vain for him to pretend to love either God or man, who loves his money so much better, that he will see his poor brother (who is man, and bears the image of God) suffer all extremities, rather then part with anything to relieve him: On the other side, the performance of this duty is highly acceptable with God, as well as with men.

3. 'Tis called, Heb 13. 16. A sacrifice wherewith God is well pleased; and again, Ph. 4. 18. St Paul calls their alms to him, a Sacrifice acceptable, well-pleasing to God, and the Church hath always looked on it as such; and therefore joined it with the solemnest part of worship, the holy Sacrament. But because even sacrifices themselves under the Law, were often made unacceptable by being maimed and blemished, it will here be necessary to enquire, what are the due qualifications of this Sacrifice.

4. Of these there are some that respect the motive, some the manner of our giving. The motive may be threefold, respecting God, our neighbor, and ourselves. That which respects God is obedience, and thankfulness to him: He has commanded we should give alms, and therefore one special end of our doing so, must be the obeying that precept of his. And it is from his bounty alone that we receive all our plenty, and this is the properest way of expressing our thankfulness for it; for as the Psalmist saith. our goods extend not unto God, Psal. 16. 2. That tribute which we desire to pay out of our estates, we cannot pay to his person.

'Tis the poor, that are as it were his Proxey and receivers, and therefore whatever we should by way of thankfulness give back again unto God, our alms is the way of doing it: Secondly, in respect of our neighbor, the motive must be a true love, and compassion to him, a tender fellow-feeling of his wants, and desire of his comfort and relief: Thirdly, in respect of ourselves, the motive is to be the hope of that eternal reward, promised to this performance. This Christ points out to us, when he bid us lay up our treasure in heaven, Mat 6. 20. And to make us friends of the Mammon of unrighteousness, that they may receive us into everlasting habitations, Lu. 16. 9. That is by a charitable dispensing of our temporal goods to the poor, to lay up a stock in heaven, to gain a title to those endless felicities, which God hath promised to the charitable That is the harvest we must expect of what we sow in these works of mercy, which will be so rich as would abundantly recompense us, though we should, as the Apostle speaks, 1 Cor. 13. 3. Bestow all our goods to feed the poor: But then we must be sure that we make this our sole aim, and not instead of this propose to ourselves the praise of men, as the motive of our charity, for that will rob us of the other; this is expressly told us by Christ, Mat. 6. They that set their hearts on the credit, they shall gain with men, must take that as their portion, ver. 3. verily I say unto you, they have their reward; they chose, it seems rather to have men their Pay-masters, then God and to them they are turned off, that little ayery praise they get from them, is all the reward they must expect: Ye have no reward of my father which is in heaven, ver. 1. we have therefore need to watch our hearts narrowly, that this desire of vain-glory steal not in and befool us into that miserable exchange of a vain blast of men's breath for those substantial and eternal joys of heaven.

5. In the second place we must take care of our alms-giving, in respect of the manner; and in that, first, we must give cheerfully; men usually value a small thing, that is given cheerfully and with a good heart, more then a much greater, that is wrung from a man with grudging and unwillingness; and God is of the same mind, he loves a cheerful giver, 2 Cor. 9. 7. Which the Apostle makes the reason of the foregoing exhortation, of not giving grudgingly, or as of necessity, ver. 6. And sure 'tis no unreasonable thing, that is herein required of us, there being no duty that has to human nature, more of pleasure and delight, unless it be where covetousness or cruelty have quite workit out the man, and put a ravenous beast in his stead. Is it not a most ravishing pleasure to him that hath any bowels to see the joy, that a seasonable alms brings to a poor wretch? how it revives and puts new spirits in him, that was even sinking? certainly the most sensual creature alive knows not how to bestow his money on anything, that shall bring him in so great a delight, and therefore me thinks it should be no hard matter to give not only without grudging, but even with a great deal of alacrity and cheerfulness, it being the fetching in of pleasure to ourselves.

6. There is but one objection can be made against this, and that is, that the danger of impoverishing ones self by what one gives, may take off that pleasure, and make men either not give at all, or not so cheerfully. To this I answer: That first were this hazard never so apparent, yet it being the comma'd of God, that we shall thus give, we are yet to obey cheerfully, and be as well content to part with our goods in pursuance of this duty, as we are many times called to do upon some other. In which case Christ tells us, he that forsakes not all that he hath, cannot be his Disciple.

7. But secondly, this is sure a vain supposition: God having particularly promised, the contrary to the charitable, that it shall bring blessings on them, even in these outward things. The liberal soul shall be made fat, and he that watereth shall be watered also himself, Prov. 11. 25. He that giveth to the poor shall not lack, Prov. 28. 27. And many the like texts there are, so that one may truly say, this objection is grounded in direct unbelief. The short of it is, we dare not trust God for this: giving to the poor is directly the putting our wealth into his hands He that giveth to the poor lendeth unto the Lord, Pro. 19. 17. And that too on solemn promise of repayment, as it follows in that verse, that which he hath given will he pay him again. It is amongst men thought a great disparagement, when we refuse to trust them; it shows we either think them not sufficient, or not honest: How vile an affront is it then to God thus to distrust him? nay indeed how horrid blasphemy, to doubt the security of that, for which he has thus expressly past his word, who is Lord of all, and therefore cannot be insufficient, and who is the God of truth, and therefore will not fail to make good his promise? Let not then that infidel fear of future want, contract and shut up thy bowels from thy poor brother; for though he be never likely to pay thee, yet God becomes his surety and enters bond with him, and will most assuredly pay thee with increase. Therefore 'tis so far from being damage to thee, thus to give, that it is thy great advantage: Any man would rather choose to put his money into some sure hand, where he may both improve, and be certain of it at his need, then to let it lie unprofitably by him▪ especially if he be in danger of thieves, or other accident, by which he may probably loose it: Now alas! all that we possess is in minutely danger of loosing; innumerable accidents there are, which may in an instant bring a rich man to beggary; he that doubts this, let him but read the story of Job, and he will there find an example of it: And therefore what so prudent course can we take for our wealth as to put it out of the reach of those accidents, by thus lending it to God, where we may be sure to find it ready at our greatest need, and that too with improvement and increase; in which respect it is that the Apostle compares alms to seed, 2 Cor. 9. 10. We know 'tis the nature of seed that is sown, to multiply and increase and so does all our acts of mercy, they return not single and naked to us, but bring in their sheaves with them, a most plenteous and bountiful harvest. God deals not with our alms, as we too often do with his graces▪ wrap them up in a napkin, so that they shall never bring in any advantage to us, but makes us most rich returns: and therefore we have all reason most cheerfully, yea, joyfully to set to this duty, which we have such invitations to, as well in respect of our own interests, as our neighbors needs.

8. Secondly, We must give seasonably: 'tis true indeed there are some so poor, that an Alms can never come unseasonably, because they always want, yet even to them there may be some special seasons of doing it, to their greater advantage; for sometimes an Alms may not only deliver a poor man from some present extremity, but by the right timing of it, may set him in some way of a more comfortable subsistence afterward. And for the most, I presume 'tis a good Rule, to dispense what we intend to any, as soon as may be, for delays are hurtful oftentimes both to them and ourselves; first, as to them, 'tis sure, the longer we delay, the longer they groan under the present want, and after we have designed them a relief, 'tis in some degree to defer enjoying of it, for so long we prolong their sufferings; you will think him a hard hearted Physician, that having a certain cure for a man in pain, should when he might presently apply it, make unnecessary delays, and so keep the poor man still in torture: and the same it is here; we want of the due compassion, if we can be content our poor brother should have one hour of unnecessary suffering, when we have present opportunity of relieving him, or if he be in such an extremity of want, yet whatever we intend him for his greater comfort, he loses so much of it, as the time of the delay amounts to: Secondly, in respect of ourselves; 'tis ill to defer, for thereby we give advantage to the temptations either of Satan or our own covetous humor, to dissuade us from it. Thus it fares too often with many Christian duties; for want of a speedy execution, our purposes cool, and never come to act; so many resolve they will repent, but because they set not immediately upon it one delay succeeds another, and keeps them from ever doing it at all: and so 'tis very apt to fall out in this case, especially with men, who are of a covetous temper, and therefore they of all others should not trust themselves thus to delay.

9. Thirdly, We should take care to give prudently, that is to give most, where it is most needed, and in such a manner, as may do the receiver most good: Charities do often miscarry for want of this care, for if we give at all adventures to all that seem to want, we may sometimes give more to those, whose sloth and lewdness is the cause of their want than to those who best deserve it, and so both encourage the one in their idleness, and disable ourselves from giving to the other. Yet I doubt not such may be the present wants even of the most unworthy, that we are to relieve them, but where no such pressing need is, we shall do best to choose out the fitter objects of charity, such are those who either are not able to labor, or else have a greater charge than their labor can maintain, and to those our alms should be given also in such a manner as may be most likely to do them good, the manner of which may differ according to the circumstances of their condition; it may to some be best perhaps, to give them by little and little, to others the giving it all at once, may tend more to their benefit; and sometime; a seasonable loan may do as well as a gift, and that may be in the power sometimes of those who are not able to give but little: But when we thus lend on charity, we must lend freely without use, and also with a purpose, that if he should prove unable to pay, we will forgive so much of the principal, as his needs require, and our abilities will permit. They want much of this charity, who clap up poor debtors in prison, when they know they have nothing to answer the debt, which is a great cruelty to make another miserable, when nothing is gained to ourselves by it.

10. Fourthly, We should give liberally, we must not be strait handed in our alms, and give by such pitiful scantlings, as will bring almost no relief to the receiver, for that is a kind of mockery; 'tis as if one should pretend to feed one that is almost famished by giving him a crumb of bread, such doles as that would be most ridiculous, yet I fear 'tis too near the proportion of some men's alms; such men are below those Disciples we read of, who knew only the Baptism of John, for 'tis to be observed, that John the Baptist, who was but the forerunner of Christ, makes it a special part of his Doctrine, that he that hath two coats should impart to him that hath none, Luk. 3. 11. He says not he that hath some great Wardrobe, but even he that hath but two coats must part with one of them; from whence we may gather that whatsoever is above (not our vanity but) our need should thus be disposed of, when our brethren's necessity requires it. But if we look into the first time of the Gospel, we shall find Christianity far exceeded this proportion of Johns, the converts assigned not a part only, but frankly gave all to the use of the brethren, Acts 4. and though that being upon an extraordinary occasion, will be no measure for our constant practice yet it may show us how prime and fundamental part of Christianity, this of charity is, that at the very first founding of the Church, such vast degrees of it were practiced; and if we farther consider what precepts of love are given us in the Gospel, even to the laying down our lives for the brethren, 1 Jo. 3. 16. We cannot imagine our goods are in God's account so much more precious than our lives that he would command us to be prodigal of the one, and yet allow us to be sparing of the other.

11. A multitude of Arguments might be brought to recommend this bounty to all that profess Christ; I shall mention only two, which I find used by St. Paul to the Corinthians on this occasion. The first is the example of Christ, 2 Cor. 7. 9. For ye know the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, who though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, that ye through his poverty might be rich. Christ emptied himself of all that glory and greatness, he injoyed in Heaven with his Father, and submitted himself to a life of much meanness, and poverty, only to enrich us. And therefore for shame, let us not grudge to empty our Coffers, to lessen somewhat of our heaps, to relieve his poor members. The second is, the expectation of reward, which will be more or less, according to the degrees of our Alms, 2 Cor. 9. 6. He that soweth sparingly shall reap sparingly, and he that soweth bountifully shall reap bountifully. We think him a very improvident husband-man, that to save a little seed at present, sows so thin, as to spoil his crop; and the same folly 'twill be in us, if by the sparingness of our Alms, we make ourselves a lank harvest hereafter, lose either all, or a great part of those rewards, which God hath provided for the liberal Alms-Giver. What is the proportion which may be called a liberal giving, I shall not undertake to set down, there being degrees even in liberality, one may give liberally, and yet another give more liberally than he; besides, liberality is to be measured, not so much by what is given, as by the ability of the giver; A man of a mean estate may give less than one of a great, and yet be the more liberal person, because that little may be more out of his, than the greater is out of the others. Thus we see Christ pronounces the poor widow to have given more to the Treasury, than all the rich men, Luk. 21. 3. not that her two mites were more than their rich gifts, but that it was more for her, she having left nothing behind, whereas they gave out of their abundance what they might easily spare. Every man must herein judge for himself; we see the Apostle, though he earnestly press the Corinthians to bounty, yet prescribes not to them how much they shall give, but leaves that to their own breasts, 2 Cor. 9. 7. Every man according as he purposeth in his heart, so let him give. But let us still remember, that the more we give (provided we do not thereby fail in the support of those, that most immediately depend on us) the more acceptable it will be to God, and the more rewardable by him. And to secure the performance of the duty of Alms-giving (whatever the proportion be) we may do very well to follow the advice St. Paul gives the Corinthians in this matter, 1 Cor. 16. 2. Upon the first day of the week let everyone of you lay by him in store as God hath prospered him; If men would do thus, lay by somewhat weekly in store for this works of Charity, it were the surest way not to be unprovided of somewhat to give, when an occasion offered itself, and by giving so by little and little, the expense would become less sensible, and so be a means to prevent those grudgings, and repinings, which are apt to attend men in greater disbursements; And sure this were in other respect also a very proper course, for when a trades-man casts up his weekly account, and sees what his gains have been, 'tis of all others the most seasonable time to offer this tribute to God out of what he hath by his blessing gained; If any will say they cannot so well weekly reckon their gains, as by longer spaces of time, I shall not contend with them for that precise time, let it be done monthly, or quarterly, so it be done; But that somewhat should still be laid by in bank for these uses, rather than left loose to our sudden Charities is sure very expedient, and I doubt not, whoever will make trial of it, will upon experience acknowledge it to be so.

12. The fourth exercise of our Charity is towards the credit of our Neighbor: and of this we may have many occasions; sometimes towards the innocent, and sometimes also towards the guilty. If one whom we know to be an innocent person be slandered, and traduced, Charity binds us to do what we may for the declaring his innocence, and delivering him from that false imputation, and that not only by witnessing when we are called to it, but by a voluntary offering our testimony on his behalf, or if the accusation be not before a Court of Justice, and so there be no place for that our more solemn testimony, but that it be only a slander tost from one to another, yet even there we are to do what we can to clear him, by taking all occasions publicly to declare, what we know of his innocence. But even to the guilty there is some Charity of this kind to be performed, sometimes by concealing the fault, if it be such that no other part of Charity to others make it necessary to discover, or it be not so notorious, as that it will be sure to betray itself; The wounds of reputation are of all others the most incurable, and therefore it may well become Christian Charity to prevent them, even where they have been deserved, and perhaps such a tenderness in hiding the fault may sooner bring the offender to repentance, if it be seconded (as it ought to be) with all earnestness of private admonition; But if the fault be such, that it be not to be concealed, yet still there may be place for this Charity, in extenuating, and lessning it, as far as the circumstances will bear; As if it were done suddenly, and rashly, Charity will allow some abatement of the censure, which would belong to a designed, and deliberate act; and so proportionably in other circumstances. But the most frequent exercises of this Charity happen towards those of whose either innocence or guilt we have no knowledge, but are by some doubtful actions brought under suspicion; And here we must remember, that it is the property of love, not to think evil, to judge the best; and therefore we are both to abstain from uncharitable conclusions of them ourselves, and as much as lies in us, to keep others from them also, and so endeavor to preserve the credit of our neighbor, which is oftentimes as much shaken by unjust suspicions, as it would be by the truest accusation. To these cases I suppose belongs that precept of Christ, Mat. 7. 1. Judge not; and when we consider, how that is backed in the following words, That ye be not Iudged, we shall have cause to believe it no such light matter, as the world seems to account it; Our unmerciful judging of others will be paid home to us in the strict, and severe Judgment of God.

13. I have now gone through this Active Charity, as it relates to the four several capacities of our brethren, many of the particulars whereof were before briefly mentioned, when we spake of Justice. If any think it improper, that the same acts should be made part of Justice, and Charity too, I shall desire them to consider, that Charity being by Christ's Command become a debt to our brethren, all the parts of it may in that respect be ranked under the head of Justice, since 'tis sure paying of debts is a part of that; Yet because in our common use we do distinguish between the Offices of Justice, and Charity, I have chose to enlarge on them in particular reference to Charity. But I desire it may still be remembered, that whatsoever is under precept, is so much a due from us, that we sin not only against Charity, but Justice too, if we neglect it; Which deserves to be considered, the more to stir up our care to the performance, and the rather, because there seems to be a common error in this point; Men look upon their acts of mercy, as things purely voluntary, that they have no obligation to; and the effect of it is this, that they are apt to think very highly of themselves, when they have performed any, though never so mean, but never blame themselves, though they omit all: which is a very dangerous, but withal a very natural fruit of the former persuasion. If there be any Charities, wherein Justice is not concerned, they are those, which for the height, and degrees of them are not made matter of strict duty, that is, are not in those degrees Comanded by God, and even after these 'twill be very reasonable for us to labor; but that cannot be done without taking the lower and necessary degrees in our way; and therefore let our first care be for them.

14. To help us wherein, there will be no better means then to keep before our eyes that grand rule of Loving our Neighbors as ourselves; This the Apostle makes the sum of our Whole duty to our Neighbors, Rom. 13. 9. let this therefore be the standard, whereby to measure all thy actions, which relate to others; Whenever any necessity of thy Neighbors persents itself to thee, ask thyself, whether if thou wert in the like case, thy love to thyself would not make thee industrious for relief, and then resolve thy love to thy Neighbor must have the same effect for him. This is that Royal Law, as St. James calls it, Jam. 2. 8. which all that profess themselves subjects to Christ, must be ruled by; and whoever is so, will not fail of performing all Charities to others, because 'tis sure he would upon the like occasions have all such performed to himself. There is none, but wishes to have his good name defended, his poverty relieved, his bodily suffering succoured; Only it may be said, that in the spiritual wants there are some so careless of themselves, that they wish no supply, they desire no reproofs, no instructions, nay, are angry when they are given them; It may therefore seem, that such men are not by virtue of this rule tied to those sorts of Charities. To this I answer, that the love of ourselves, which is here set as the measure of that to our Neighbor, is to be understood to be that reasonable love, which men ought to have, and therefore though a man fail of that due love he owes himself, yet his Neighbor hath not thereby forfeited his right, he has still a claim to such a degree of our love, as is answerable to that, which in right we should bear to ourselves, and such I am sure is this care of our spiritual estate, and therefore 'tis not our despising our own Souls, that will absolve us from Charity to other men's, yet I shall not much press this duty in such men, it being neither likely that they will be persuaded to it, or do any good by it, their ill example will overwhelm all their good exhortations, and make them unfruitful.

15. There is yet one act of Charity behind, which does not properly fall under any one of the former heads, and yet may relate to them all, and that is the Making Peace, and amity among others; By doing whereof we may much benefit both the Souls, Bodies, Goods, and Credit of our brethren; for all these are in danger to strife and contention. The reconciling of enemies is a most blessed work, and brings a blessing on the actors: We have Christ's word for it, Blessed are the Peace-makers, Mat. 5. 9. and therefore we may be encouraged diligently to lay hold of all opportunities of doing this Office of Charity, to use all our Art, and endeavor to take up all grudges and quarrels we discern among others; Neither must we only labor to restore peace, where it is lost, but to preserve it, where it is: First, generally, by striving to beget in the heart of all we converse with a true value of that most precious Jewel, Peace; Secondly, particularly, by a timely prevention of those jars, and unkindnesses, we see likely to fall out. It may many times be in the power of a discreet friend or neighbor, to cure those mistakes, and misapprehensions, which are the first beginning of quarrels and contentions; and it will be both more easy and more profitable, thus to prevent, then pacify strifes. 'Tis sure 'tis more easy, for when a quarrel is once broken out, 'tis like a violent flame, which cannot so soon be quenched, as it might have been, whilst it was but a smothering fire. And then 'tis also more profitable, for it prevents many sins, which in the progress of an open contention, are almost sure to be committed. Solomon says, In the multitude of words there wanteth not sin, Prov. 10. 19. which cannot more truly be said of any sorts of words, then those that pass in anger, and then though the quarrel be afterwards composed, yet those sins will still remain on their account; and therefore 'tis a great Charity to prevent them.

16. But to fit a man for this so excellent an Office of Peace Making, 'Tis necessary that he be first remarkably peaceable himself; for with what face canst thou persuade others to that, which thou wilt not practice thyself? or how canst thou expect thy persuasions should work? 'twill be a ready reply in every man's mouth, Thou Hypocrite cast out first the beam out of thine own eye, Mat. 7. 5. and therefore be sure thou qualify thyself for thy work. There is one point of Peaceableness which seems to be little regarded among men, and that is in the case of Legal trespasses; Men think it nothin to go to Law about every pity trifle, and as long as they have but Law on their side, never think they are to blame: but sure had we that true Peaceableness of spirit, which we ought, we should be unwilling for such slight matters to trouble, and disquiet our Neighbors. Not that all going to Law is utterly unchristian, but such kind of suits especially, as are upon contentiousness, and stoutness of humor, to defend such an inconsiderable right, as the parting with will do us little or no harm, or which is yet worse, to avenge such a trespass. And even in greater matters, he that shall part with somewhat of his Right, for love of Peace, does surely the most Christianly, and most agreeably to the advice of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 6. 7. rather to take wrong, and suffer ourselves to be defrauded. But if the damage be so unsupportable, that it is necessary for us to go to Law, yet even then we must take care of preserving Peace; first, by carrying still a friendly, and Christian temper towards the party, not suffering our hearts to be at all estranged from him; secondly, by being willing to yield to any reasonable terms of agreement, whenever they shall be offered; and truly if we carry not this temper of mind in our suits, I see not how they can be reconcilable with that peaceableness so strictly required of all Christians. Let those consider those who make it their pleasure themselves to disquiet their Neighbor, or their Trade to stir up others to do it. This tender regard of Peace both in ourselves, and others, is absolutely necessary to be entertained of all those, who own themselves for servants of him, whose title it is to be the Prince of Peace, Isa. 9. 6.

17. All that remains to be touched on concerning this Charity of the Actions is the extent of it, which must be as large as the former of the Affections, even to the taking in not only strangers, and those of no relation to us, but even of our bitterest enemies. I have already spoken so much of the Obligation we are under to forgive them, that I shall not here say anything of that, but that being supposed a duty, 'twill sure then appear no unreasonable thing to proceed one step further, by doing them good turns; for when we have once forgiven them, we can then no longer account them enemies, and so 'twill be no hard matter even to flesh and blood to do all kind things to them. And indeed this is the way, by which we must try the sincerity of our forgiveness: 'Tis easy to say, I forgive such a man, but if when an opportunity of doing him good is offered, thou declinest it, 'tis apparent there yet lurks the old malice in thy heart; Where there is a thorough forgiveness, there will be as great a readiness to benefit an enemy, as a friend: •ay, perhaps in some respects a greater, a true charitable person looking upon it as an especial prize, when he has an opportunity of evidencing the truth of his reconciliation, and obeying the precept of his Savior, by doing good to them that hate him, Mat 5. 44. Let us therefore resolve that all acts of real kindness are to be performed to our enemies, for which we have not only the command, but also the example of Christ, who had not only some inward relentings toward us his obstinate, and most provoking enemies, but shown it in acts, and those no cheap, or easy ones, but such as cost him his dearest blood. And surely we can never pretend to be either obeyers of his Command, or followers of his example, if we grudge to testify our love to our enemies by those so much cheaper ways of feeding them in hunger, and the like, recommended to us by the Apostle, Rom. 12. 20. But if we could perform these acts of kindness to enemies in such a manner, as might draw them from their enmity, and win them to Peace, the Charity would be doubled; And this we should aim at, for that we see the Apostle sets as the end of the forementioned acts of feeding, &c. that we may heap coals of fire on their heads, not coals to burn, but to melt them into all love and tenderness towards us; and this were indeed the most complete way of imitating Christ's example, who in all he did, and suffered for us, designed the reconciling of us to himself.

18. I have now shown you the several parts of our duty to our Neighbor, towards the performance whereof I know nothing more necessary, then the turning out of our hearts that self love, which so often possesses them, and that so wholly, that it leaves no room for Charity, nay, nor justice neither to our Neighbor. By this self-love I mean not that true love of ourselves, which is the love and cure of our Souls (for that would certainly help, not hinder us in this duty) but I mean that immoderate love of our own worldly interests, and advantages, which is apparently the root of all, both injustice and uncharitableness towards others. We find this sin of self-love set by the Apostle in the head of a whole troop of sins, 2 Tim. 3. 2. as if it were some principal officer in Satan's camp, and certainly not without reason, for it never goes without an accursed train of many other sins, which like the Dragons tail Rev. 12. 4. sweeps away all care of duty to others. We are by it made so vehement, and intent upon the pleasing ourselves, that we have no regard to anybody else, contrary to the direction of St. Paul, Rom. 15. 2. Which is not to please ourselves, but every man to please his neighbor for his good to edification; which he backs with the example of Christ, ver. 3. For even Christ pleased not himself: If therefore we have any sincere desire to have this virtue of charity rooted in our hearts, we must be careful to weed out this sin of self-love, for 'tis impossible they can prosper together.

19. But when we have removed this hindrance, we must remember that this, as all other graces proceeds not from ourselves, it is the gift of God, and therefore we must earnestly pray to him to work it in us, to send his holy Spirit, which once appeared in the form of a dove, a meek and a g•ll-less creature to frame our hearts to the same temper, and enable us rightly to perform this duty.

20. I have now past through those several branches I at first proposed, and shown you, what is our duty to God, ourselves, and our neighbor: Of which I may say as it is, Luk. 10 28. This do and thou shalt live. And surely it is no impossible task to perform this, in such a measure, as God will graciously accept, that is in sincerity, though not in perfection, for God is not that austere Master, Lu. 19. 21. That reap• where he has not sowed, he requires nothing of us, which he is not ready by his grace to enable us to perform; if we be not wanting to ourselves, either in asking it by prayer, or in using it by diligence. And as it is not an impossible, so neither is it such a sad melancholy task, as men are apt to think it. 'Tis a special policy of Satan's, to do as the spies did, Num 23. 28. bring up an ill report upon this good land, this state of Christian life, thereby to discourage us from entering into it, to fright us with I know not what •yants, we shall meet with; but let us not thus be cheated, let us but take the courage to try, and we shall indeed find it a Canaan, a land fl•wing with milk and honey: God is not in this respect to his people a wilder•ess, a land of darkness, Ier. 2. 31. His service does not bereave men of any true joy, but helps them to a great deal: Christ's yoke is an easy, nay a pleasant yoke, his burden a light, yea a gracious burde. There is in the practice of Christian duties a great deal of present pleasure, and if we feel it not, it is because of the resistance our vicious and sinful customs make, which by the contention raises an uneasiness. But then first that is to be charged only on ourselves, for having got those ill customs, and thereby made that hard to us, which in itself is most pleasant, the duties are not to be accused for it. And then secondly, even there the pleasure of subduing those ill habits, overcoming those corrupt customs is such, as hugely outweigheth all the trouble of the combat.

21. But it will perhaps be said, that some parts of piety are of such a nature, as will be very apt to expose us to persecutions, and sufferings in the world, and that those are not joyous but grievous; I answer, that even in those there is matter of joy: we see the Apostles thought it so, they rejoiced that they were counted worthy to suffer for Christ's name, Acts 4. 41. and St. Peter tells us, that if any suffer as a Christian, he is to glorify God for it, 1 Pet. 4. 16. There is such a force, and virtue in the testimony of a good conscience, as is able to change the greatest suffering into the joyfullest triumph, and that testimony we can never have more clear, and lively, then when we suffer for righteousness sake; so that you see Christianity is very amiable even in its saddest dress, the inward comforts of it do far surpass all the outward tribulations, that attend it, and that even in the instant, while we are in the state of warfare upon earth. But then if we look forward to the crown of our victories, those eternal rewards in heaven, we can never think those tasks sad, though we had nothing at present to sweeten them, that have such recompenses await them at the end; were our labors never so heavy, we could have no cause to faint under them: Let us therefore whenever we meet with any discouragements in our course, fix our eye on this rich prize, and then run with patience the race which is set before us, Heb. 12. 2 Follow the Captain of our salvation through the greatest sufferings, yea even through the same red Sea of blood which he hath waded, whenever our obedience to him shall require it; for though our fidelity to him should bring us to death itself, we are sure to be no losers by it, for to such he hath promised a Crown of life, the very expectation whereof is able to keep a Christian more cheerful in his fetters and dungeon, than a worldling can be in the midst of his greatest prosperities.

22. All that remains for me farther to add, is earnestly to entreat and beseech the Reader, that without delay, he puts himself into this so pleasant, so gainful a course, by setting sincerely to the practice of all those things, which either by this book, or by any other means he discerns to be his and the further he hath formerly gone out of his way, the more haste it concerns him to make to get into it, and to use the more diligence in walking in it. He that hath a long journey to go, and finds he hath lost a great part of his day in a wrong way, will not need much entreaty either to turn into the right, or to quicken his pace in it. And this is the case of all those that have lived in any course of sin, they are in a wrong road, which will never bring them to the place they aim at; Nay, which will certainly bring them to the place they most fear and abhor; much of their day is spent, how much will be left to finish their journey in, none knows, perhaps the next hour, the next minute the night of death may overtake them; what a madness is it then for them to defer one moment to turn out of that path, which leads to certain destruction, and to put themselves in that, which will bring them to bliss and glory? Yet so are men bewitched, and enchanted with the deceitfulness of sin, that no entreaty, no persuasion can prevail with them, to make this so reasonable, so necessary a change, not but that they acknowledge it needful to be done, but they are unwilling to do it yet, they would enjoy all the pleasures of sin, as long as they live, and then they hope at their death, or some little time before it, to do all the business of their Souls; But, alas! Heaven is too high to be thus jumped into, the way to it is a long and leisurely ascent, which requires time to walk. The hazards of such deferring are more largely spoken of, in the discourse of Repentance, I shall not here repeat them, but desire the Reader seriously to lay them to heart, and then surely he will think it seasonable counsel that is given by the wise man, Ecclus: 5. 7. Make no tarrying to turn to the Lord, and put not off from day today.

PRIVATE DEVOTIONS For Several OCCASIONS.

London, Printed for T. Garthwait, at the little North Door of St. Paul's.

CHRISTIAN READER,

I Have for the help of thy devotions, set down some FORMS of PRIVATE-PRAYER, upon several occasions; If it be thought an omission, that there are none for Families, I must answer for myself, that it was not from any opinion, that God is not as well to be worshipped in the Family, as in the Closet; but because the providence of God and the Church hath already furnished thee for that purpose, infinitely beyond what my utmost care could do. I mean the PUBLICK LITURGY, or COMMON-PRAYER, which for all public addresses to God (and such are family-Prayers) are so excellent and useful, that we may say of it as David did of Goliath's sword, 1 Sam. 21. 9. There is none like it.

DIRECTIONS for the MORNING.

As soon as ever thou awakest in the morning, lift up thy heart to God in this or the like short Prayer.

LORD, As thou hast awaked my body from sleep, so by thy grace awaken my soul from sin; and make me so to walk before thee this day and all the rest of my life, that when the last trumpet shall awake me out of my grave, I may rise to the life immortal, through Jesus Christ.

WHEN thou hast thus begun, suffer not (without some urgent necessity) any worldly thoughts to fill thy mind, till thou have also paid thy more solemn devotions to Almighty God, and therefore during the time thou art dressing thyself (which should be no longer than common decency requires) exercise thy mind in some spiritual thoughts: As for example, Consider to what temptations thy business, or company that day are most like to lay thee open, and arm thyself with resolutions against them; or again consider, what occasions of doing service to God, or good to thy neighbor are that day most likely to present themselves, and resolve to embrace them, and also contrive how thou mayest improve them to the uttermost. But especially it will be fit for thee to examine, whether there have any sin escaped thee since thy last nights examination. If after these considerations any farther leisure remain, thou mayest profitably employ it in meditating on the general resurrection (whereof our rising from our beds is a representation) and of that dreadful judgment, which shall follow it, and then think with thyself in what preparation thou art for it, and resolve to husband carefully every minute of thy time, towards the fitting thee for that great account. As soon as thou art ready, retire to some private place, and there offer up to God thy Morning Sacrifice of Praise and Prayer.

PRAYERS for the MORNING.

At thy first kneeling down say,

O Holy, Blessed and Glorious Trinity, three Persons and one God, have mercy upon me a miserable sinner.

Lord, I know not what to pray for as I ought, O let thy spirit help my infirmities, and enable me to offer up a spiritual sacrifice acceptable to thee by Jesus Christ.

A THANKSGIVING.

O Gracious Lord, whose mercies endure forever, I thy unworthy servant, who have so deeply tasted of them, desire to render thee the tribute of my humblest praises for them; In thee, O Lord, I live and move and have my being, thou first madest me to be, and then that I might not be miserable, but happy, thou sentest thy Son out of thy bosom to redeem me from the power of my sins, by his grace, and from the punishment of them, by his blood, and by both to bring me to his glory. Thou hast by thy mercy caused me to be born within thy peculiar fold, the Christian Church, where I was early consecrated to thee in Baptism, and have been partaker of all those spiritual helps, which might aid me to perform that Vow I there made to thee, and when by my own willfulness or negligence, I have failed to do it, yet thou in thy manifold mercies hast not forsaken me, but hast graciously invited me to repentance, afforded me all means both outward and inward for it, and with much patience hast attended, and not cut me off in the acts of those many damning sins I have committed, as I have most justly deserved. It is O Lord thy restraining grace alone, by which I have been kept back from any the greatest sins, and it is thy inciting and assisting grace alone, by which I have been enabled to do any the least good, therefore not unto me, not unto me, but unto thy name be the praises: For these & all other thy spiritual blessings my Soul doth magnify the Lord, & all that is within me praise his Holy Name. I likewise praise thee for those many outward blessings I enjoy, as Health, Friends, Food, and Raiment, the comforts as well as the necessaries of this life, for those continual protections of thy hand, by which I and mine are kept from dangers, and those gracious deliverances thou hast often afforded out of such as have befallen me, and for that mercy of thine whereby thou hast sweetened and alayed those troubles thou hast not seen fit wholly to remove; For thy particular preservation of me this night, and all other thy goodness towards me, Lord, grant that I may render thee, not only the fruit of my lips, but the obedience of my life, that so these blessings here may be an earnest of those richer blessings thou hast prepared for those that love thee, and that for his sake, whom thou hast made the Author of eternal Salvation to all that obey him, even Jesus Christ.

A CONFESSION.

O Righteous Lord, who hatest iniquity, I thy sinful creature cast myself at thy feet, acknowledging that I most justly deserve to be utterly abhorred and forsaken by thee, for I have drunk iniquity like water, gone on in a continued course of sin and rebellion against thee, daily committing those things thou forbiddest, and leaving undone those things thou commandest, mine heart which should be an habitation for thy Spirit, is become a cage of unclean birds, of foul and disordered affections, and out of this abundance of the heart my mouth speaketh, my hands act, so that in thought, word and deed I continually transgress against thee. [Here mention the greatest of thy sins] Nay, O Lord, I have despised that goodness of thine, which should lead me to Repentance, hardening my heart against all those means thou hast used for my amendment. And now, O Lord, what can I expect from thee but judgment and fiery indignation, that is indeed the due reward of my sins. But, O Lord, there is mercy with thee, that thou mayest be feared, O fit me for that mercy, by giving me a deep and hearty Repentance, and then according to thy goodness let thy anger and thy wrath be turned away from me, look upon me in thy Son, my blessed Savior, and for the merit of his sufferings, pardon all my sins; And, Lord, I beseech thee, by the power of thy grace so to renew, and purify my heart, that I may become a new creature, utterly forsaking every evil way, and living in constant, sincere, universal obedience to thee all the rest of my days, that behaving myself as a good and faithful servant, I may by thy mercy at last be received into the joy of my Lord; grant this for Jesus Christ his sake.

A PRAYER for GRACE.

O Most gracious God, from whom every good and perfect gift cometh, I wretched creature, that am not able of myself so much as to think a good thought, beseech thee to work in me both to will and to do according to thy good pleasure, enlighten my mind, that I may know thee, and let me not be barren, or unfruitful in that knowledge; Lord, work in my heart a true faith, a purifying hope, and an unfeigned love towards thee, give me a full trust on thee, zeal for thee, reverence of all things that relate to thee, make me fearful to offend thee, thankful for thy mercies, humble under thy corrections, devout in thy service, sorrowful for my sins, and grant that in all things I may behave myself so, as befits a creature to his Creator, a servant to his Lord: enable me likewise to perform that duty I owe to myself, give me that meekness, humility, and contentedness, whereby I may always possess my soul in patience, and thankfulness, make me diligent in all my duties, watchful against all temptations, perfectly pure, and temperate, and so moderate in my most lawful in joyments, that they never become a snare to me; make me also, O Lord, to be so affected towards my neighbor, that I never transgress that royal Law of thine, of loving him as myself; grant me exactly to perform all parts of justice, yielding to all whatsoever by any kind of right becomes their due, and give me such bowels of mercy & compassion, that I may never fail to do all acts of charity to all men, whether friends or enemies, according to thy command and example. Finally, I beseech thee, O Lord, to sanctify me throughout, that my whole spirit, and soul and body may be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ; to whom with thee and the Holy Ghost be all honor and glory forever: Amen.

INTERCESSION.

O Blessed Lord, whose mercy is over all thy works, I beseech thee to have mercy upon all men, and grant that the precious ransom which was paid by thy Son for all, may be effectual to the saving of all. Give thy enlightening grace to those that are in darkness, and thy converting grace to those that are in sin; look with thy tenderest compassions upon the Universal Church, O be favorable and gracious unto Zion, build thou the walls of Jerusalem, unite all those that profess thy Name to thee, by Purity, and Holiness, and to each other by Brotherly love. Have mercy on this desolate Church, and sinful Nation▪ thou hast moved the Land and divided it, heal the sores thereof for it shaketh, make us so truly to repent of those sins, which have provoked thy Judgments, that thou also mayest turn, and repent, and leave a blessing behind thee. Bless those whom thou hast appointed our Governors, whether in Church, or State, so rule their hearts, and strengthen their hands, that they may neither want will, nor power to punish wickedness and vice, and to maintain God's true Religion and Virtue. Have pity, O Lord, on all that are in affliction. Be a Father to the fatherless, and plead the cause of the widow, comfort the feeble minded, support the weak, heal the sick, relieve the needy, defend the oppressed, and administer to everyone according to their several necessities; let thy blessings rest upon all that are near and dear to me, and grant them whatsoever thou seest necessary either to their bodies or their Souls, [Here name thy nearest Relations] Reward all those that have done me good, and pardon all those that have done, or wisht me evil, and work in them and me all that good which may make us acceptable in thy sight, through Jesus Christ.

For PRESERVATION.

O Merciful God, by whose bounty alone it is, that I have this Day added to my life, I beseech thee so to guide me in it by thy grace, that I may do nothing which may dishonor thee, or wound my own Soul, but that I may diligently apply myself to do all such good works, as thou hast prepared for me to walk in; and Lord I beseech thee, give thy Angels charge over me, to keep me in all my ways, that no evil happen unto me, nor any plague come nigh my dwelling, but that I and mine may be safe under thy gracious protection, through Jesus Christ.

O Lord, pardon the wanderings and coldness of these petitions, and deal with me, not according either to my prayers, or deserts, but according to my needs, and thine own rich mercies in Jesus Christ, in whose blessed Name, and Words, I conclude these my imperfect prayers, saying

Our Father, &c.

DIRECTIONS for NIGHT.

AT NIGHT, when it draws towards the time of rest, bethink thyself, how thou hast passed the day, examine thine own heart, what sin either of Thought, Word, or Deed thou hast committed, what opportunity of doing good thou hast omitted, and whatsoever thou findest to accuse thyself of, confess humbly and penitently to God, renew thy purposes, and resolutions of amendment, and beg his pardon in Christ, and this not slightly, and only as of course, but with all devout earnestness, and heartiness, as thou wouldst do, if thou wert sure thy death were as near approaching, as thy sleep, which for ought thou knowest may be so indeed, and therefore thou shouldst no more venture to sleep unreconciled to God, the thou wouldest dare to die so. In the next place, consider what special and extraordinary mercies thou hast that day received, as if thou hast had any great deliverance, either in thy inward man, from some dangerous temptations, or in thy outward, from any great and apparent danger, and offer to God thy hearty and devout praise for the same; Or if nothing extraordinary have so happened, and thou hast been kept even from the approach of danger, thou hast not the less but the greater cause to magnify God, who hath by his protection so guarded thee, that not so much as the fear of evil hat• assaulted thee. And therefore omit not to pay him the tribute of humble thankfulness, as well for his usual and daily preservations, as his more extraordinary deliverances. And above all, endeavor still by the considerations of his mercies to have thy heart the more closely knit to him, remembering that every favor received from him is a new engagement upon thee, to love and obey him.

PRAYERS for NIGHT.

O Holy, blessed and glorious Trinity, three persons and one God, have mercy upon me a miserable sinner.

Lord I know not what to pray for as I ought, O let thy Spirit help my infirmities, and enable me to offer up a spiritual Sacrifice acceptable unto thee by Jesus Christ.

A CONFESSION.

O MOST Holy Lord God, who are of purer eyes then to behold iniquity, now shall I abominable wretch dare to appear before thee, who am nothing but pollution; I am defiled in my very nature, having a backwardness to all good, and a readiness to all evil; but I have defiled myself yet much worse by my own actual sins and wicked customs; I have transgressed my duty to thee, my neighbor, and myself, and that both in thought, in word, in deed, by doing those things which thou hast expressly forbidden, and by neglecting to do those things thou hast commanded me. And this not only through ignorance, and frailty, but knowingly, and willfully, against the motions of thy Spirit, and the checks of my own conscience to the contrary. And to make all these out of measure sinful, I have gone on in a daily course of repeating these provocations against thee, notwithstanding all thy calls to, and my own purposes and oaths of amendment; yea, this very day I have not ceased to add new sins to all my former guilts. [Here name the Particulars] And now, O Lord, what shall I say, or how shall I open my mouth, seeing I have done these things, I know that the wages of these sins is death; but O thou who willest not the death of a sinner, have mercy upon me; work in me, I beseech thee, a sincere contrition, and a perfect hatred of my sins, and let me not daily confess, and yet as daily renew them, but grant, O Lord, that from this instant I may give a bill of divorce to all my most beloved lusts, and then be thou pleased to marry me to thyself, in truth, in righteousness and holiness, And for all my past sins, O Lord, receive a reconciliation; accept of that ransom thy blessed Son hath paid for me, and for his sake whom thou hast set forth as a propitiation, pardon all my offenses, and receive me to thy favor. And when thou hast thus spoken peace to my soul, Lord keep me that I turn not anymore to folly, but so establish me with thy grace, that no temptation of the world, the Devil or my own flesh may ever draw me to offend thee, that being made free from sin, and becoming a servant unto God, I may have my fruit unto holiness, and the end everlasting life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

A THANKSGIVING.

O Thou Father of mercies, who art kind even to the unthankful, I acknowledge myself to have abundantly experimented, that gracious property of thine, for notwithstanding my daily provocations against thee, thou still heapest mercies and loving kindness upon me. All my contempts and despisings of thy spiritual favors have not yet made thee withdraw them, but in the riches of thy goodness and longsuffering, thou still continuest to me the offers of grace, and life in thy Son. And all my abuses of thy temporal blessings thou hast not punished with an utter deprivation of them, but art still pleased to afford me a liberal portion of them. The sins of this day thou hast not repaid as justly thou mightest, by sweeping me away with a swift destruction, but hast spared and preserved me according to the greatness of thy mercy; [Here mention the particular mercies of that day.] What shall I render unto the Lord for all these benefits he hath done unto me? Lord, let this goodness of thine lead me to repentance, and grant that I may not only offer thee thanks and praise, but may also order my conversation aright, that so I may at the last see the salvation of God, through Jesus Christ.

Here use the Prayer for Grace and that of Intercession appointed for the Morning.

For PRESERVATION.

O Blessed Lord, the Keeper of Israel, that neither slumbrest nor sleepest, be pleased in thy mercy to watch over me this night, keep me by thy grace from all works of darkness, and defend me by thy power from all dangers, grant me moderate and refreshing sleep, such as may fit me for the duties of the day following. And Lord make me ever mindful of that time, when I shall lie down in the dust, and because I know neither the day, nor the hour of my Masters coming, grant me grace that I may be always ready, that I may never live in such a state, as I shall fear to die in, but that whether I live, I may live unto the Lord, or whether I die, I may die unto the Lord, so that living and dying I may be thine, through Jesus Christ.

Use the same concluding prayer as in the Morning.

As thou art putting off thy clothes, thi•k with thyself that the time approaches, that thou must put off thy body also, and then thy soul must appear naked before God's judgment seat and therefore thou hadst need be careful to make it so clean, and pure by repentance and holiness, that he who will not look on iniquity, may graciously behold and accept it.

Let thy bed put thee in mind of thy grave, and when thou liest down, say,

O Blessed Savior, who by thy precious death and burial didst take away the sting of death and power of the grave, grant me the joyful fruits of that thy victory, and be thou to me in life and death advantage.

I will lay me down in peace, and take my rest, for it is thou Lord only, that makest me dwell in safety.

Into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed it, O Lord, thou God of truth.

IN the ANCIENT CHURCH there were besides morning and night, Four other times every day which were called HOURS OF PRAYER, and the zeal of thos• first Christians was such, as made them constantly observed. It would be thought too great a strictness now in this lukewarm age, to enjoyn the like frequency, yet I cannot but mention the example, and say, that for those who are not by very necessary business prevented, it will be but reasonable to imitate it, and make up in public and private those FOUR TIMES of PRAYER besides the OFFICES, already set down for MORNING and NIGHT: and that none may be to seek how to exercise their devotions at these times, I have added divers COLLECTS for several Graces, whereof every man may use at each such time of Prayer, so many as his zeal and leisure shall point out to him, adding if he please, one of the Confessions appointed for morning or night, and never omitting the LORD'S PRAYER.

But if any man's state of life be really so busy, as will not allow him time for so long, and solemn devotions, yet certainly there is no man so overlaid with business, but that he may find leisure oftentimes in a day to say the LORD'S PRAYER alone▪ and therefore let him use that if he cannot more. But because it is the Charracter of a Christian, Phil. 3. 20. That he hath his conversation in Heaven, it is very fit that besides these set times of Prayer, he should divers times in a day by short and sudden E•C•LATIONS, dart up his soul thither. And for this sort of devotion no man can want leisure, for it may be performed in the midst of business; the Artificer at his work, the husband man at his plough may practice it. Now as he cannot want time, so that he may not want matter for it, I have thought it not unuseful out of that rich store house the BOOK of PSALMS, to furnish him with some texts, which may very fitly be used for this purpose, which being learned by heart will always be ready at hand to employ his devotion; and the matter of them being various, some for pardon of sin some for grace, some for the light of God's countenance, some for the church, some for thanksgiving, &c. every man may fit himself a cord•n• to the tresent need and temper of his soul. I have given these not as a full collection, but only as a taste, by which the Readers appeti•e may be raised to search after more in that Book, and other parts of holy Scripture.

COLLECTS for several GRACES.

For FAITH.

O Blessed Lord, whom without Faith it is impossible to please, let thy Spirit I beseech thee work in me such a Faith as may be acceptable in thy sight, even such as worketh by love, O let me not rest in a dead ineffectual Faith, but grant that it may be such as may show itself by my works, that it may be that victorious Faith which may enable me to overcome the world, and conform me to the Jmage of that Christ, on whom I believe, that so at the last I may receive the end of my Faith, even the salvation of my soul, by the same Jesus Christ.

For HOPE.

O Lord; who art the hope of all the ends of the earth, let me never be destitute of a well grounded hope, nor yet possessed with a vain presumption, suffer me not to think thou wilt either be reconciled to my sins, or reject my repentance, but give me, I beseech thee, such a hope as may be answerable to the only ground of hope, thy promises, and such as may both encourage and enable me to purify myself from all filthiness, both of flesh and Spirit, that so it may indeed become to me an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast entering even within the veil, whither the forerunner is for me entered, even Jesus Christ my high Priest and blessed Redeemer.

For the LOVE of GOD.

O Holy and gracious Lord, who art infinitely excellent in thyself, and infinitely bountiful and compassionate towards me, I beseech thee suffer not my heart to be so hardened through the deceitfulness of sin, as to resist such charms of love, but let them make deep and lasting impressions on my soul. Lord, thou art pleased to require my heart, and thou only hast right to it. O let me not be so sacrilegiously unjust as to alienate any part of it, but enable me to render it up whole and entire to thee. But, O my God, thou seest it is already usurped, the world with its vanities hath seized it, and like a strong man armed keeps possession, O thou who art stronger come upon him, and take this unworthy heart of mine as thine own spoil, refine it with that purifying fire of thy love, that it may be a fit habitation for thy Spirit: Lord, if thou see it fit, be pleased to let me taste of those joys, those ravishments of thy love, wherewith thy Saints have been so transported. But if in this I know not what I ask, if I may not choose my place in thy Kingdom, yet O Lord deny me not to drink of thy cup, let me have such a sincerity and degree of love, as may make me endure anything for thy sake, such a perfect love as may cast out all fear and all sloth too, that nothing may seem to me too grievous to suffer, or too difficult to do in obedience to thee, that so expressing my love by keeping thy Commandments, I may by thy mercy at last obtain that Crown of life, which thou hast promised to those that love thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

For SINCERITY.

O Holy Lord, who requirest truth in the inward parts, I humbly beseech thee to purge me from all hypocrisy and unsincerity. The heart, O Lord, is deceitful above all things, and my heart is deceitful above all hearts, O thou who searchest the heart, and reins, try me, and seek the ground of my heart, and suffer not any accursed thing to lurk within me but purify me even with fire, so thou consume my dross. O Lord, I cannot deceive thee, but I may most easily deceive myself, I beseech thee let me not rest in any such deceit, but bring me to a sight and hatred of my most hidden corruptions, that I may not cherish any one darling lust, but make an utter destruction of every Amalekite; O suffer me not to speak peace to myself, when there is no peace, but grant I may judge of myself, as thou judgest of me, that I may never be at peace with myself, till I am at perfect peace with thee, and by purity of heart be qualified to see thee in thy Kingdom, through Jesus Christ.

For DEVOTION in PRAYER.

O Gracious Lord God, who not only permittest, but invitest us miserable and needy creatures, to present our petition to thee, grant I beseech thee, that the frequency of my prayer may be somewhat proportionable to those continual needs I have of thy mercy: Lord, I confess, it is the greatest honor and the greatest advantage, thus to be allowed access to thee, yet so sottish and stupid is my profane heart, that it shuns or frustrates the opportunities of it. My Soul, O Lord, is possessed with a spirit of infirmity, it is bowed together, and can in no wise lift up itself to thee. O be thou pleased to cure this sad, this miserable disease, to inspirit and inliven this earthy drossy heart, that it may freely mount towards thee, that I may set a true value on this most valuable privilege, and take delight in approaching to thee, and that my approaches may be with a reverence, some way answerable to that awful Majesty I come before, with an importunity and earnestness, answerable to those pressing wants I have to be supplied, and with such a fixedness and attention of mind, as no wandering thoughts may interrupt; that I may no more incur the guilt of drawing near to thee with my lips, when my heart is far from thee, or have my prayers turned into sin, but may so ask that I may receive, seek that I may find, knock that it may be opened unto me; that from praying to thee here, I may be translated to the praising thee eternally in thy glory, through the merits and intercession of Jesus Christ.

For HUMILITY.

O Thou High and Lofty one, that inhabitest Eternity, yet art pleased to dwell with the humble spirit, pour into my heart, I beseech thee, that excellent grace of Humility, which may utterly work out all those vain conceits I have of myself; Lord convince me powerfully of my own wretchedness, make me to see that I am miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked, and not only dust, but sin, that so in all thy dispensations towards me I may lay my hand upon my mouth, and heartily acknowledge that I am less then the least of thy mercies, and greater then the greatest of thy Judgments. And, O Lord, grant me not only to walk humbly with my God, but even with men also, that I may not only submit myself to thy rebukes, but even to those of my fellow Christians, and with meekness receive and obey their admonitions. And make me so to behave myself towards all, that I never do anything through strife or vain-glory; and to that end grant, that in lowliness of mind I may esteem every other man better then myself, and be willing that others should esteem them so also; that I neither nourish any high opinion of myself, nor covet one among others, but that despising the vain praise of men, I may seek that praise which cometh from thee only. That so instead of those mean servile Arts I have used to recommend me to the esteem of men, I may now employ all my industry and care to approve myself to thee, who resistest the proud, and giveth grace to the humble: grant this, O Lord, for his sake, who humbled himself unto the death of the Corss, Jesus Christ.

For the FEAR of GOD.

O Glorious Majesty, who only art high, and to be feared, possess my Soul with a Holy awe and reverence of thee, that I may give thee the honor due unto thy Name, and may bear such a respect to all things which relate to thee, that I may never profane any Holy thing, or sacrilegiously invade what thou hast set apart to thyself. And, O Lord, since thou art a God that wilt not clear the guilty, let the dread of thy justice make me tremble to provoke thee in anything, O let me not so misplace my fear, as to be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the Son of m•n who shall be made as grass, and forget the Lord my Maker; But replenish my Soul with that fear of the Lord, which is the beginning of wisdom, which may be as a bridle to all my brutish appetites, and keep me in a constant conformity to thy Holy will▪ Hear me, O Lord, I beseech thee, and put this fear in my heart, that I may not depart from thee, but may with fear and trembling work out my own Salvation, through Jesus Christ.

For TRUST on GOD.

O Almighty Lord, who never failest them that trust on thee, give me grace, I beseech thee, in all my difficulties and distresses, to have recourse to thee, to rest and depend on thee; thou shalt keep him, O Lord, in perfect peace, whose mind is staid on thee, O let me always rest on this firm Pillar, and never exchange it for the broken reeds of worldly succors, suffer not my heart to be overcharged with cares of this life, taking thought what I shall eat, or drink, or wherewithal I shall be clothed, but grant, that having by honest labor and industry done my part, I may cheerfully commit myself to thy providence, casting all my care upon thee, and being careful for nothing, but to be of the number of those whom thou ownest and carest for, even such as keep thy Testimonies and think upon thy Commandments to do them. That seeking first thy Kingdom and the righteousness thereof, all these outward things may be added unto me, in such a measure as thy wisdom knowest best for me; grant this, O Lord, for Jesus Christ his sake.

For THANKFULNES.

O Most Gracious and Bountiful Lord, who fillest all things living with good, and expectest no other return▪ but praise and thanksgiving, let me O Lord, never defraud thee of that so easy tribute, but let my heart be ever filled with the sense, and my mouth with the acknowledgment of thy mercies. It is a joyful and a pleasant thing to be thankful, O suffer me not, I beseech thee, to loose my part in that Divine pleasure, but grant that as I daily receive blessings from thee, so I may daily from an affectionate and devout heart offer up thanks to thee, and grant that not only my lips, but my life may show forth thy praise, by consecrating myself to thy service, and walking in Holiness and Righteousness before thee all the days of my life, through Jesus Christ my Lord and blessed Savior.

For CONTRITION.

O Holy Lord, who art a merciful embracer of true penitents, but yet a consuming fire towards obstinate sinners, how shall I approach thee, who have so many provoking sins to inflame thy wrath, and •o little sincere repentance to incline thy mercy! O be thou pleased to soften and melt this hard obdurate heart of mine, that I may heartily bewail the iniquities of my life, strike this rock, O Lord, that the waters may flow out, even floods of tears, of wash my polluted conscience; My drowsy Soul hath too long slept securely in sin, Lord, awake it, though it be with thunder, and let me rather feel thy terrors, then not feel my sin. Thou sentest thy blessed Son to heal the broken hearted, but Lord what will that avail me, if my heart be whole. O break it, that it may be capable of his healing virtue; and grant, I beseech thee, that having once tasted the bitterness of sin, I may fly from it, as from the face of a serpent, and bring forth fruits of repentance, in amendment of life, to the praise and glory of thy grace, in Jesus Christ our blessed Redeemer.

For MEEKNES.

O Blessed Jesu, who wert led as a sheep to the slaughter, Let, I beseech thee, that admirable example of Meekness quench in me all sparks of anger, and revenge, and work in me such a gentleness, and calmness of spirit, as no provocations may ever be able to disturb. Lord, grant, I may be so far from offering the least injury, that I may never return the greatest, any otherwise then with prayers and kindness, that I who have so many talents to be forgiven by thee, may never exact pence of my brethren, but that putting on bowels of mercy, meekness, longsuffering, thy peace may rule in my heart, and make it an acceptable habitation to thee, who art the Prince of peace, to whom, with the Father, and Holy Spirit, be all honor and glory forever.

For CHASTITY.

O Holy and immaculate Jesus, whose first descent was into the Virgins womb, and who doest still love to inhabit only in pure & virgin hearts, I beseech thee send thy Spirit of purity to cleanse me from all filthiness, both of flesh and spirit; my body, O Lord, is the Temple of the Holy Ghost, O let me never pollute that Temple with any uncleanness. And because out of the heart proceed the things that defile the man, Lord, grant me to keep my heart with all diligence, that no impure or foul thoughts be harboured there, but enable me, I beseech thee, to keep both body and Soul pure and undefiled, that so I may glorify thee here both in my body and spirit, and be glorified in both with thee hereafter.

For TEMPERANCE.

O Gracious Lord who hast in thy bounty to mankind afforded us the use of thy good creatures, for our corporal refreshment, grant I may always use this liberty with thankfulness, and moderation, O let me never be so enslaved to that brutish pleasure of the taste, that my Table become a snare to me, but give me, I beseech thee, a perfect abhorrence of all degrees of excess, and let me eat and drink only for those ends, and according to those measures, which thou hast assigned me, for health and not for luxury. And Lord, grant that my pursuits may be, not after the meat that perisheth, but after that which endureth to everlasting life, that hungering and thirsting after righteousness, I may be filled with thy grace here, and thy glory hereafter, through Jesus Christ.

For CONTENTEDNES.

O Merciful God, thy wisdom is infinite to choose, and thy love forward to dispence good things to us, O let me always fully and entirely resign myself to thy disposals, have no desires of my own, but a perfect satisfaction in thy choices for me, that so in whatsoever estate I am, I may be therein content. Lord grant I may never look with murmuring on my own condition, nor with envy on other men's. And to that end I beseech thee, purge my heart of all covetous affections, O let me never yield up any corner of my Soul to Mammon, but give me such a contempt of these fading riches, that whether they increase or decrease, I may never set my heart upon them. But that all my care may be to be rich towards God, to lay up my treasure in Heaven, that I may so set my affections on things above, that when Christ who is my life shall appear, I may also appear with him in glory. Grant this, O Lord, for the merits of the same Jesus Christ.

For DILIGENCE.

O Lord, who hast in thy wisdom ordained that man should be born to labor, suffer me not to resist that design of thine, by giving myself up to sloth, and idleness; But grant I may so employ my time, and all other talents thou hast entrusted me with, that I may not fall under the sentence of the slothful and wicked servant; Lord, if it be thy will, make me some way useful to others, that I may not live an unprofitable part of mankind, but however, O Lord, let me not be useless to myself, but grant, I may give all diligence to make my calling and election sure; My Soul is beset with many and vigilant adversaries, O let me not fold my hands to sleep in the midst of so great dangers, but watch and pray, that I enter not into temptation, enduring hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ, till at last from this state of warfare, thou translate me to the state of triumph and bliss, in thy Kingdom, through Jesus Christ.

For JUSTICE.

O Thou King of righteousness, who hast Commanded us to keep judgment and do Justice, be pleased by thy grace to cleanse my heart and hands from all fraud and injustice, and give me a perfect integrity and uprightness in all my dealings. O make me ever abhor to use my power to oppress, or my skill to deceive my brother, and grant I most strictly observe that sacred rule, of doing as I would be done to, that I may not dishonor my Christian profession, by an unjust or fraudulent life, but in simplicity, and godly sincerity, have my conversation in this life, never seeking to heap up treasures of wickedness, but preferring a little with righteousness, before great revenues without right. Lord, make me exactly careful to render to every man what by any sort of obligation becomes his due, that I may never break the bond of any of those relations, thou hast placed me in, but may so behave myself towards all, that none may have any evil thing to say of me: That so if it be possible, I may have peace with all men, or however I may by keeping innocence and taking heed to the thing that is right, have peace at the last, even peace with thee, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

For CHARITY.

O Merciful Lord, who hast made of one blood, and redeemed by one ransom all Nations of men, let me never harden my bowels against any that partake of the same nature and redemption with me, but grant me an Universal Charity towards all men. Give me, O thou Father of compassions, such a tenderness and meltingness of heart, that I may be deeply affected with all the miseries and calamities outward or inward of my brethren, and diligently employ all my abilities for their succor and relief. O let not an unchristian self-love possess my heart, but drive out that accursed spirit, and let thy Spirit of love enter and dwell there, and make me seek not to please myself, but my Neighbor for his good to edification, even as Christ pleased not himself. Lord, make me a faithful steward of all those talents, thou hast committed to me, for the benefit of others, that so when thou shalt call me to give an account of my stewardship, I may do it with joy and not with grief: grant this, merciful Lord, I beseech thee for Jesus Christ his sake.

For PERSEVERANCE.

O Eternal and unchangeable Lord God, who art the same yesterday and today and forever. Be thou pleased to communicate some small ray of that excellence, some degree of that stability to me thy wretched creature, who am light and inconstant, turned about with every blast; my understanding is very deceivable, O establish it in thy truth, keep it from the snares of seducing spirits, that I may not be led away with the error of the wicked▪ and fall from my own stedfastness; my will also, O Lord, is irresolute, and wavering, and doth not cleave steadfastly unto God, my goodness is but as the morning cloud, & as the early dew it passeth away. O strengthen and confirm me, and what ever good work thou hast wrought in me, be pleased to accomplish and perform it, until the day of Christ. Lord thou seest my weakness, and thou knowest the number and strength of those temptations I have to struggle with, O leave me not to myself, but cover thou my head in the day of battle, and in all spiritual combats make me more then conqueror, through him that loved me. O let no terrors or flatteries either of the world, or my own flesh ever draw me from my obedience to thee, but grant that I may continue steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord, and by patient continuance in well-doing, seek, and at last obtain glory, and honor, and immortality, and eternal life, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

A brief Paraphrase of the LORD'S PRAYER To be used as a Prayer.

[Our FATHER which art in Heaven.]

O Lord, who dwellest in the highest heavens, thou art the Author of our being, thou hast also begotten us again unto a lively hope, and carryest towards us the tenderness and bowels of a most compassionate father, O make us to render to thee the love and obedience of children; and that we may resemble thee our father in heaven (that place of true delight and purity) give us a holy disdain of all the deceitful pleasures and foul pollutions of this world, and so raise up our minds that we may always have our conversation in heaven, from whence we look for our Savior the Lord Jesus Christ.

[1. Hallowed be thy Name.]

Strike such an awe into all our hearts, that we may humbly reverence thee in thy Name, which is great, wonderful, and holy, and carry such a sacred respect to all things that relate to thee and thy worship, as may express our reverence of thy great Majesty: Let all the people praise thee, O God, let all the people praise thee.

[2. Thy Kingdom Come.]

Establish thy throne and rule forever in our souls, and by the power of thy grace subdue all those rebellious corruptions that exalt themselves against thee, they are those enemies of thine which would not that thou shouldst reign over them, O let them be brought forth and slain before thee, and make us such faithful subjects of this thy Kingdom of Grace, that we may be capable of thy kingdom of glory, and then Lord Jesus come quickly.

[3. Thy Will be done in earth, &c.]

Enable us by thy grace cheerfully to suffer thy will in all thy afflictions, and readily to perform it in all thy commands, give us of that heavenly zeal to thy service, wherewith the blessed Angels of thy presence are inspired, that we may obey thee with the like fervor and alacrity, and that following them in their obedience, we may be joined with them to sing eternal praises in thy Kingdom to God, and to the Lamb forever.

[4. Give us this day our daily bread.]

Give us that continual supply of thy grace, which may sustain and nourish our souls unto eternal life. And be thou pleased also to provide for our bodies all those things which thou seest fit for their support, through this our earthly pilgrimage, and make us cheerfully to rest on thee for them, first seeking thy Kingdom and the righteousness thereof, and then not doubting but all these things shall be added unto us.

[5. Forgive us our Trespasses as we forgive them, &c.]

Heal our souls, O Lord, for we have sinned against thee, let thy tender mercies abound towards us, in the forgiveness of all our offenses; And grant O Lord, that we may never forfeit this pardon of thine, by denying ours to our brethren, but give us those bowels of compassion to others which we stand in so much greater need of from thee, that we may forgive as fully and finally upon Christ's Command, as we desire to be forgiven, for his merits and intercession.

[6. Lead us not into Temptation but deliver, &c.]

O Lord, we have no strength against those multitudes of temptations that daily assault us, only our eyes are upon thee, O be thou pleased either to restrain them or assist us, and in thy faithfulness suffer us not to be tempted above that we are able, but in all our temptations make us a way to escape that we be not overcome by them, but may when thou shalt call us to it, resist even unto blood▪ striving against sin, that being faithful unto death, thou mayest give us the crown of life.

[For thine is the Kingdom, the Power, &c.]

Hear us and graciously answer our petitions for thou art the great King over all the earth whose Power is infinite and artable to do for us above all that we can ask or think, and to whom belongeth the Glory of all that good thou workest in us or for us. Therefore blessing, honor, glory and power be unto him, that sitteth upon the throne, to our God, forever and ever. Amen.

PIOUS EJACULATIONS Taken out of the Book of PSALMS.

For PARDON of SIN.

HAVE mercy on me, O God, after thy great goodness, according to the multitude of thy mercies do away mine offenses.

Wash me thoroughly from my wickedness and cleanse me from my sin.

Turn thy face from my sins, and put out all my misdeeds.

My misdeeds prevail against me, O be thou merciful unto my sins.

Enter not into judgment with thy servant, for in thy sight shall no man living be justified.

For thy names sake, O Lord, be merciful unto my sin, for it is great.

Turn thee O Lord and deliver my soul, O save me for thy mercies sake.

For GRACE.

TEach me to do the thing that pleaseth thee, for thou art my God.

Teach me thy way O Lord, and I will walk in thy truth, O knit my heart to thee, that I may fear thy name.

Make me a clean heart O God, and renew a right spirit within me.

O let my heart be found in thy statutes, that I be not ashamed.

Incline my heart unto thy Testimonies, and not to covetousness.

Turn away mine eyes, lest they behold vanity, and quicken thou me in thy way.

I am a stranger upon earth, O hide not thy Commandments from me.

Lord teach me to number my days, that I may apply my heart unto Wisdom.

For the LIGHT of God's COUNTENANCE:

LOrd, why abhorrest thou my soul, and hidest thy face from me, O hide not thou thy face from me, nor cast thy servant away in displeasure.

Thy loving kindness is better then life itself.

Lord lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me.

Comfort the Soul of thy servant, for unto thee, O Lord, do I lift up my Soul.

THANKSGIVING.

I Will always give thanks unto the Lord, his praise shall ever be in my mouth.

Thou art my God, and I will thank thee, thou art my God and I will praise thee.

I will sing unto the Lord, as long as I live, I will praise my God whilst I have my being.

Praised be God which hath not cast out my prayer, nor turned his mercy from me.

Blessed be the Lord God, even the God of Israel, which only doth wondrous things.

And blessed be the Name of his Majesty forever, and all the earth shall be filled with his Majesty; Amen, Amen.

For DELIVERANCE from TROUBLE.

BE merciful unto me, O Lord, be merciful unto me, for my Soul trusteth in thee, and under the shadow of thy wings shall be my refuge, until these calamities be overpast.

Deliver me, O Lord, from mine enemies, for I fly unto thee to hide me.

O keep my Soul, and deliver me, let me not be confounded, for I have put my trust in thee.

Mine eyes are ever looking unto the Lord, for he shall pluck my feet out of the net.

Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me, for I am desolate and in misery.

The sorrows of my heart are enlarged, O bring thou me out of my troubles.

For the CHURCH.

O Be favorable and gracious unto Zion, build thou the walls of Jerusalem.

O God, wherefore art thou absent from us so long? Why is thy wrath so hot against the sheep of thy pasture?

O think upon thy Congregation, whom thou hast purchased and Redeemed of old.

Look upon the Tribe of thine Inheritance, and Mount Zion where thou hast dwelt.

It is time for thee, Lord, to lay to thy hand, for they have destroyed thy Law.

Arise, O God, and maintain thine own cause.

Deliver Israel, O God, out of all his troubles.

Brief heads of SELF-EXAMINATION, Especially before the SACRAMENT, Collected out of the foregoing Treatise, concerning the breaches of our DUTY.

To GOD.

- NOT believing there is a God.
- Not believing his Word.
- Not believing it Practically, so as to live according to our belief.
- Despairing of God's mercy, so as to neglect duty.
- Presuming groundlessly on it, whilst we go on in willful sin.
- Not loving God for his own excellencies.
- Not loving him for his goodness to us.
- Not laboring to please him.
- Not desiring to draw near to him in his Ordinances.
- Not longing to enjoy him in Heaven.
- Not fearing God so as to keep from offending him.
- Fearing man above him, by committing sin, to shun some outward suffering.
- Not trusting on God in dangers and distresses.

- Using unlawful means to bring us out of them.
- Not depending on God for supply of our wants.
- Immoderate care for outward things.
- Neglecting to labor, and expecting God should support us in our idleness.
- Not looking up to God for a blessing on our honest endeavors.
- Not having a high esteem of God.
- Not submitting obediently to act his will.
- Not patiently suffering it, but murmuring at his corrections.
- Not amending by them.
- Not being thankful to him.
- Not acknowledging his wisdom in choosing for us, but having eager and impatient desires of our own.
- Not honoring God by a reverend usage of the things that relate to him.
- Behaving our selves irreverently in his House
- Robbing God, by taking things that are consecrated to him.
- Profaning Holy times, the Lord's Day, and the Feasts, and Fasts of the Church.
- Neglecting to read the Holy Scriptures, not marking when we do read.
- Being careless to get knowledge of our duty.
- Choosing rather to continue ignorant, then put ourselves to the pains or shame of learning.
- Placing Religion in hearing of Sermons, without practicing them.
- Breaking our vow made at Baptism.
- By resorting to witches, and conjurers; i. e. to the Devil.
- By loving the pomps and vanities of the world, and following its sinful customs.
- By fulfilling the lusts of the flesh.
- Profaning the Lord's Supper.
- By coming to it ignorantly, without examination, contrition, and purposes of new life.

- By behaving ourselves irreverently at it, without devotion, and spiritual affection.
- By neglecting to keep the promises made at it.
- Profaning God's Name, by blasphemous thoughts, or discourse.
- Giving others occasion to blaspheme him, by our vile and wicked lives.
- Taking unlawful oaths.
- Perjury.
- Swearing in ordinary communication.
- Not worshipping God.
- Omitting prayers, public or private, and being glad of a pretence to do so.
- Asking unlawful things, or to unlawful ends.
- Not purifying our hearts from sin, before we pray.
- Not praying with Faith and Humility.
- Coldness and deadness in prayer.
- Wandering thoughts in it.
- Irreverent gestures of body in prayer.
- Neglecting the duty of Repentance.
- Not calling ourselves to daily account for our sins.
- Not assigning any set or solemn times, for humiliation, and confession, or too seldom.
- Not deeply considering our sins, to beget, contrition for them.
- Not acting revenges on ourselves, by fasting, and other acts of Mortification.
- Outward Idolatry in worshipping of creatures.
- Inward Idolatry, in placing our love, joy, and other affections more on creatures, than the Creator.

To our SELVES.

- Being puffed up with high conceits of ourselves:
- In respect of natural parts as beauty, wit, &c
- Of worldly riches, and honors.

- Of Grace.
- Greedily seeking the praise of men.
- Directing Christian Actions, as prayer, alms, &c. to that end.
- Committing sins, to avoid reproach from wicked men.
- Disturbing our minds with anger, and peevishness.
- Not carefully examining, what our estate towards God is.
- Not trying ourselves by the true rule, i. e. our obedience to God's Commands.
- Not weighing the lawfulness of our actions, before we venture on them.
- Not examining our past actions, to repent of the ill, to give God the glory of the good.
- Uncontentedness in our estates.
- Greedy desires after honor and riches.
- Seeking to gain them by sinful means.
- Envyng the condition of other men.
- Being negligent in observing, and resisting temptations.
- Not improving God's gifts, outward or inward, to his honor.
- Abusing our natural parts, as wit, memory, strength, &c. to sin.
- Neglecting, or resisting the motions of God's Spirit.
- Uncleaness, adultery, fornication, unnatural lusts, &c.
- Uncleaness of the eye, and hand.
- Filthy, and obscene talking.
- Impure fancies, and desires.
- Heightning of lust, by pampering the body.
- Not laboring to subdue it, by fasting or other severities.
- Eating too much.
- Making pleasure, not health, the en• of eating.
- Being too curious, or costly in meats.

- Drunkenness.
- Drinking more than is useful to our bodies, though not to drunkenness.
- Wasting the time, or estate, in good fellowship.
- Abusing our strength of brain, to the making others drunk.
- Immoderate sleeping.
- Idleness, and negligence in our callings.
- Using unlawful recreations.
- Being too vehement upon lawful ones.
- Spending too much time at them.
- Being drawn by them to anger, or covetousness.
- Being proud of apparel.
- Striving to go beyond our rank.
- Bestowing too much time, care, or cost about it.
- Abstaining from such excesses, not out of conscience, but covetousness.
- Pinching our bodies, to fill our purses.

To our NEIGHBOUR.

- Being injurious to our Neighbor.
- Delighting causelessly to grieve his mind.
- Ensnaring his Soul in sin, by command, counsel, enticement, or example.
- Affrighting him from Godliness, by our scoffing at it.
- Not seeking to bring those to Repentance, whom we have led into sin.
- Murder open, or secret.
- Drawing men to intemperance or other vices, which may bring diseases or death.
- Stirring men up to quarrelling, and fighting
- Maiming, or hurting the body of our Neighbor.
- Fierceness, and rage against him.

- Coveting our Neighbors wife.
- Actually defiling her.
- Spoiling the goods of others, upon spite and malice.
- Coveting to gain them to ourselves.
- Oppressing by violence, and force, or color of Law.
- Not paying what we borrow.
- Not paying what we have voluntarily promised.
- Keeping back the wages of the servant, and hireling.
- Unfaithfulness in trusts, whether to the living or dead.
- Using Arts of deceit, in buying and selling.
- Exacting upon the necessities of our Neighbors.
- Blasting the credit of our Neighbor:
  - By False Witness.
  - By Railng.
  - By whispering.
  - Encouraging others in their slanders.
  - Being forward to believe ill reports of our Neighbor.
  - Causeless suspicions.
  - Rash judging of him.
  - Despising him for his infirmities.
  - Inviting others to do so by scoffing and deriding him.
  - Bearing any malice in the heart.
  - Secret wishing of death, or any kind of hurt to our Neighbor.
  - Rejoicing, when any evil befalls him.
  - Neglecting to make what satisfaction we can, for any sort of injury done to our Neighbor.
- Lying.

- Churlish, and proud behavior to others.
- Froward and peevish conversation.
- Bitter and reproachful language.
- Cursing.
- Not paying the respect due to the qualities or gifts of others.
- Proudly overlooking them.
- Seeking to lessen others esteem of them.
- Not employing our abilities whether of mind or estate, in administering to those whose wants require it.
- Unthankfulness to our Benefactours.
- Especially those that admonish us.
- Not amending upon their reproof.
- Being angry at them for it.
- Not reverencing our Civil Parent, the lawful Magistrate.
- Judging and speaking evil of him.
- Grudging his just tributes.
- Sowing sedition among the people.
- Refusing to obey his lawful commands.
- Rising up against him, or taking part with them that do.
- Despising our Spiritual Fathers.
- Not loving them for their works sake.
- Not obeying those Commands of God they deliver to us.
- Seeking to withhold from them their just maintenance.
- Forsaking our lawful Pastors; to follow factious teachers.
- Stubborn and irreverent behavior to our natural Parents.
- Despising and publishing their infirmities.
- Not loving them, nor endeavoring to bring them joy and comfort.

- Contemning their counsels.
- Murmuring at their Government.
- Coveting their estates, though by their death.
- Not ministering to them in their wants of all sorts.
- Neglecting to pray for God's blessing on these several sorts of Parents.
- Want of natural affection to children▪
- Mothers refusing to nurse them without a just impediment,
- Not bringing them timely to Baptism.
- Not early instructing them in the ways of God.
- Suffering them for want of timely correction to get customs of sin.
- Setting them evil examples.
- Discouraging them by harsh & cruel usage.
- Not providing for their subsistence, according to our ability.
- Consuming their portions in our own riot.
- Reserving all till our death, and letting them want in the mean time.
- Not seeking to entail a blessing on them by our Christian lives.
- Nor heartily praying for them.
- Want of affection to our natural brethren.
- Envyings & heart-burnings towards them.
- Not loving our spiritual brethren; i. e. our fellow Christians.
- Having no fellow-feeling of their sufferings.
- Causelesly forsaking their commnion in Holy Duties.
- Not taking deeply to heart the desolations of the Church.
- Marrying within the degrees forbidden.
- Marrying for undue ends, as covetousness, lust, &c.
- Unkind, froward, and unquiet behavior towards the husband, or wife.

- Unfaithfulness to the bed.
- Not bearing with the infirmities of each other.
- Not endeavoring to advance one another's good, spiritual or temporal.
- The wife resisting the lawful command of her husband.
- Her striving for rule and dominion over him.
- Not praying for each other.
- Unfaithfulness to a friend.
- Betraying his secrets.
- Denying him assistance in his needs.
- Neglecting lovingly to admonish him.
- Flattering him in his faults.
- Forsaking his friendship upon flight, or no cause.
- Making leagues in sin, instead of virtuous friendships.
- Servants disobeying the lawful commands of their Masters.
- Purloining their goods.
- Carelessly wasting them.
- Murmuring at their rebukes.
- Idleness.
- Eye service.
- Masters using servants tyrannically and cruelly.
- Being too remiss, and suffering them to neglect their duty.
- Having no care of their Souls.
- Not providing them means of instruction in Religion.
- Not admonishing them, when they commit sins.
- Not allowing them time, and opportunity for prayer, and the worship of God.
- Want of bowels, and Charity to our Neighbors.

- Not heartily desiring their good spiritual, or temporal.
- Not loving, and forgiving enemies.
- Taking actual revenges upon them.
- Falseness, professing kindness, and acting none.
- Not laboring to do all good we can to the Soul of our Neighbor.
- Not assisting him to our power in his bodily distresses.
- Not defending his good name, when we know or believe him slandered.
- Denying him any neighborly office, to preserve or advance his estate.
- Not defending him from oppression, when we have power.
- Not relieving him in his poverty
- Not giving liberally, or cheerfully.
- Not loving peace.
- Going to Law upon slight occasions.
- Bearing inward enmity to those we sue.
- Not laboring to make peace among others.
- The use of this Catalogue of sins is this: Upon days of Humiliation, especially before the Sacrament, read them consideringly over, and at every particular ask thine own heart, Am I guilty of this? And whatsoever by such examination thou findest thyself faulty in, confess particularly, and humbly to God, with all the heightening circumstances, which may any way increase their guilt, and make serious resolutions against every such sin, for the future; After which thou mayest use this form following.

O LORD, I am ashamed, and blush to lift up my face to thee, for my iniquities are increased over my head, and my trespass is grown up even unto Heaven. I have wrought all these great provocations, and that in the most provoking manner, they have not been only single but repeated acts of sin: for, O Lord, of all this black Catalogue which I have now brought forth before thee, how few are there which I have not often committed, nay, which are not become even habitual and customary to me? And to this frequency, I have added both a greediness, and obstinacy in sinning, turning into my course as the horse rusheth into the battle, doing evil with both hands, earnestly, yea hating to be reformed, and casting thy words behind me, quenching thy Spirit within me, which testified against me, to turn me from my evil ways, and frustrating all those outward means, whether of judgment or mercy, which thou hast used to draw me to thyself. Nay, O Lord, even my repentances may be numbered amongst my greatest sins, they have sometimes been feigned and hypocritical, always so slight and ineffectual, that they have brought forth no fruit in amendment of life, but I have still returned with the dog to his vomit, and the sow to the mire again, and have added the breach of resolutions and vows, to all my former guilts. Thus, O Lord. I am become out of measure sinful, and since I have thus chosen death, I am most worthy to take part in it, even in the second death, the lake of fire and brimstone. This this, O Lord, is in justice to be the portion of my cup, to me belongs nothing but shame and confusion of face eternally. But to thee, O Lord God, belongeth mercy and forgiveness, though I have rebelled against thee. O remember not my sins and offenses, but according to thy mercy think thou upon me O Lord for thy goodness. Thou sentest thy Son to seek and to save that which was lost, behold, O Lord, I have gone astray like a sheep that is lost, O seek thy servant, and bring me back to the Shepherd and Bishop of my Soul; let thy Spirit work in me a hearty sense and detestation of all my abominations, that true contrition of heart, which thou hast promised not to despise. And then be thou pleased to look on me, to take away all iniquity, and receive me graciously, and for his sake who hath done nothing amiss, be reconciled to me, who have done nothing well, wash away the guilt of my sins in his blood, and subdue the power of them by his grace, and grant, O Lord, that I may from this hour bid a final adieu to all ungodliness, and worldly lusts, that I may never once more cast a look toward Sodom, or long after the flesh pots of Egypt, but consecrate myself entirely to thee, to serve thee in Righteousness and true Holiness, reckoning myself to be dead indeed unto sin, but alive unto God, through Jesus Christ our Lord and blessed Savior.

This PENITENTIAL PSALM May also fitly be used.

PSAL. 51.

HAVE mercy upon me, O God, after thy great goodness, according to the multitude of thy mercies do away mine offenses.

Wash me thoroughly from my wickedness, and cleanse me from my sin.

For I knowledge my faults, and my sin is ever before me.

Against thee only have I sinned, and done this evil in thy sight, that thou mightest be justisted in thy saying, and clear when thou art judged.

Behold I was shapen in wickedness, and in sin hath my mother conceived me.

But loe thou requirest truth in the inward parts, and shalt make me to understand wisdom secretly.

Thou shalt purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean, thou shalt wash me, and I shall be whiter then snow.

Thou shalt make me hear of joy and gladness, that the bones which thou hast broken may rejoice.

Turn thy face from my sins, and put out all my misdeeds.

Make me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right Spirit within me.

Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not thy Holy Spirit from me.

O give me the comfort of thy help again, and stablish me with thy free Spirit.

Then shall I teach thy ways unto the wicked, and sinners shall be converted unto thee.

Deliver me from blood guiltiness, O God, thou that art the God of my health, and my tongue shall sing of thy righteousness.

Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord, and my mouth shall show thy praise.

For thou desirest no sacrifice, else would I give it thee, but thou delightest not in burnt-offering.

The sacrifice of God is a troubled spirit, a broken and contrite heart, O God, shalt thou not despise.

O be favorable and gracious unto Zion, build thou the walls of Jerusalem.

Then shalt thou be pleased with the Sacrifice of righteousness, with the burnt-offerings and oblations, then shall they offer young bullocks upon thine altar.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son, and to the Holy Ghost.

As it was in the beginning, is now and ever shall be, world without end. Amen.

PRAYERS BEFORE the receiving of the blessed SACRAMENT.

O Most merciful God, who hast in thy great goodness prepared this spiritual feast for sick and famished Souls, make my desires and gaspings after it, answerable to my needs of it. I have with the prodigal wasted that portion of grace thou bestowedst upon me, and therefore do infinitely want a supply out of this treasury: But O Lord, how shall such a wretch as I dare to approach this holy table: I am a dog, how shall I presume to take the children's bread, or how shall this spiritual Manna, this food of Angels be given to one, who hath chosen to feed on husks with swine, nay to one who hath already so often trampled these precious things underfoot, either carelessly neglecting, or unworthily receiving these holy mysteries? O Lord, my horrible guiltiness makes me tremble to come, and yet makes me not dare to keep away, for where, O Lord, shall my polluted Soul be washed, if not in this fountain which thou hast opened for sin and for uncleanness? Hither therefore I come, and thou hast promised that him that cometh to thee thou wilt in no wise cast out: This is, O Lord, the blood of the New Testament, grant me so to receive it, that it may be to me for remission of sins. And though I have so often and so wretchedly broken my part of that Covenant, whereof this Sacrament is a seal, yet be thou graciously pleased to make good thine, to be merciful to my unrighteousness, and to remember my sins and mine iniquities no more, and not only so, but to put thy laws into my heart, and write them in my mind, and by the power of thy grace dispose my soul to such a sincere and constant obedience, that I may never again provoke thee; Lord grant that in these holy mysteries, I may not only commemorate, but effectually receive my blessed Savior, and all the benefits of his passion: And to that end give me such a preparation of soul, as may qualify me for it, give me a deep sense of my sins, and unworthiness, that being weary and heavy laden. I may be capable of his refreshings, and by being supplied in my own tears, I may be the fitter to be washed in his blood, raise up my dull and earthly mind from groveling here below, and inspire it with a holy zeal, that I may with spiritual affection approach this spiritual feast: and let O Lord, that infinite love of Christ, in dying for so wretched a sinner, inflame my frozen benumbed soul, and kindle in me that sacred fire of love to him, and that so vehement that no waters may quench, no floods drown it, such as may burn up all my dross, not leave one unmortified lust in my soul, and such as may also extend itself to all whom thou hast given me command and example to love, even enemies as well as friends. Finally, O Lord, I beseech thee to cloth me in the wedding garment, and make me though of myself a most unworthy, yet by thy mercy an acceptable guest at this holy table, that I may not eat and drink my own condemnation, but may have my pardon sealed, my weaknesses repaired, my corruptions subdued, and my soul so inseparably united to thee, that no temptations may ever be able to dissolve the union, but that being begun here in grace, it may be consummated in glory; Grant this, O Lord, for thy dear Sons sake, Jesus Christ.

ANOTHER.

O BLESSED Jesus, who once offeredst up thyself for me upon the Cross, and now offerest thyself to me in the Sacrament, let not, I beseech thee, my impenitence and unworthiness frustrate these so inestimable mercies to me, but qualify me by thy grace to receive the full benefit of them. O Lord, I have abundant need of thee, but am so clogged with guilt, so holden with the cords of my sins, that I am not able to move towards thee, O lose me from this band, wherewith Satan and my own lusts have bound me, and draw me that I may run after thee. Lord, thou seest daily how eagerly I pursue the paths that lead to death, but when thou invitest me to life and glory, I turn my back and forsake my own mercy. How often hath this feast been prepared, and I have with frivolous excuses absented myself, or if I have come, it hath been rather to defy than to adore thee, I have brought such troops of thy professed enemies, unrepented sins along with me, as if I came not to commemorate, but renew thy passion, crucifying thee afresh, and putting thee to open shame: and now of what punishment shall I be thought worthy, who have thus trampled underfoot the Son of God, and counted the blood of the Covenant an unholy thing! yet O merciful Jesu, this blood is my only refuge, O let this make my atonement or I perish eternally, wherefore didst thou shed it, but to save sinners, neither can the merit of it be overwhelmed either by the greatness or number of sins. I am a sinner, a great one, O let me find its saving efficacy. Be merciful unto me, O God, be merciful to me for my soul trusteth in thee, and in the clefts of thy wound, shall be my refuge until thy fathers indignation be overpast. O thou, who hast as my high Priest sacrificed for me, intercede for me also, and plead thy meritorious sufferings on my behalf, and suffer not, O my Redeemer, the price of thy blood to be utterly lost: And grant, O Lord, that as the sins I have to be forgiven are many, so I may love much: Lord thou seest what faint, what cold affections I have towards thee, O warm and enliven them; and as in this Sacrament, that transcendent love of thine in dying for me is shown forth; so I beseech thee, let it convey such grace into me, as may enable me to make some returns of love: O let this divine fire descend from heaven into my soul, and let my sins be the burnt offering for it to consume, that there may not any corrupt affection, any accursed thing be shelterd in my heart, that I may never again defile that place, which thou hast chosen for thy temple. Thou dyedst, O dear Jesu to redeem me from all iniquity, O let me not again sell myself to work wickedness, but grant that I may approach thee at this time with most sincere and fixed resolutions of an entire reformation, and let me receive such grace, and strength from thee, as may enable me faithfully to perform them: Lord, there are many old habituated diseases, my soul groans under. [Her mention thy most prevailing corruptions.] And though I lie never so long at the pool of Bethesda, come never so often to thy table, yet unless thou be pleased to put forth thy healing virtue, they will still remain uncured. O thou blessed Physician of souls, heal me, and grant I may now so touch thee, that everyone of these loath some issues may immediately stanch▪ that these sicknesses may not be unto death but unto the glory of thy mercy in pardoning, to the glory of thy grace in purifying so polluted a wretch. O Christ, hear me, and grant I may now approach thee with such humility and contrition, love and devotion, that thou mayest vouchsafe to come unto me, and abide with me, communicating to me thyself, and all the merits of thy passion. And then, O Lord, let no accusations of Satan, o• my own conscience amaze or distract me, bu• having peace with thee, let me also have peace in myself, that this wine may make glad, this bread of life may strengthen my heart, and enable me cheerfully to run the way of thy Commandments. Grant this merciful Savior▪ I beseech thee, for thine own bowels and compassions sake.

EjACULATIONS to be used at the LORD'S TABLE.

LOrd I am not worthy that thou shouldst come under my roof.

I have sinned, what shall I do unto thee, O thou preserver of men.

[Here recollect some of thy greatest sins]

If thou Lord shouldst be extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord who may abide it?

But with the Lord there is mercy, and with him is plenteous Redemption.

Behold, O Lord, thy beloved Son, in whom thou art well pleased.

Hearken to the cry of his blood, which speaketh better things then that of Abel.

By his Agony, and bloody Sweat, by his Cross, and Passion good Lord deliver me.

O Lamb of God which takest away the sins of the world, grant me thy Peace.

O Lamb of God which takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon me.

Immediately before Receiving.

THou hast said that he that eateth thy flesh and drinketh thy blood hath eternal life.

Behold the servant of the Lord, be it unto me according to thy word.

At the Receiving of the Bread.

BY thy Crucified Body deliver me from this body of death.

At the Receiving of the Cup.

O let this blood of thine purge my conscience from dead works, to serve the living God.

Lord if thou wilt thou canst make me clean.

O touch me, and say, I will, be thou clean.

After Receiving.

WHat shall I render unto the Lord for all the benefits he hath done unto me?

I will take the Cup of Salvation, and call upon the Name of the Lord.

Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power, and riches, and wisdom, and strength, and honor, and glory, and blessing.

Therefore blessing, honor, glory, and power be to him that sitteth upon the Throne and to the Lamb, forever and ever, Amen.

I have sworn▪ and am steadfastly purposed to keep thy righteous judgments.

O hold thou up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not.

A Thanksgiving after the Receiving of the Sacrament.

O Thou Fountain of all goodness, from whom every good and perfect gift cometh, and to whom all honor and glory should be returned, I desire with all the most fervent and inflamed affections of a grateful heart, to bless and praise thee for those inestimable mercies thou hast vouchsafed me; Lord what is man that thou shouldst so regard him, as to send thy beloved Son to suffer such bitter things for him? But Lord, what am I, the worst of men, that I should have any part in this atonement, who have so oft despised him and his sufferings, O the height, and depth of this mercy of thine, that art pleased to admit me to the renewing of that Covenant with thee, which I have so often & so perversely broken, that I who am not worthy of that daily bread, which sustains the body, should be made partaker of this bread of life, which nourishes the Soul, and that the God of all purity should vouchsafe to unite himself to so polluted a wretch: O my God, suffer me no more, I beseech thee, to turn thy grace into wantonness, to make thy mercy an occasion of security, but let this unspeakable love of thine constrain me to obedience, that since my blessed Lord hath died for me, I may no longer live unto myself but to him; O Lord, I know there is no concord between Christ and Belial, therefore since he hath now been pleased to enter my heart, O let me never permit any lust to chace him thence, but let him that hath so dearly bought me, still keep possession of me, and let nothing ever take me out of his hand. To this end be thou graciously pleased to watch over me, and defend me from all assaults of my spiritual enemies, but especially deliver me from myself, from the treachery of my own heart, which is too willing to yield itself a prey. And where thou seest I am either by nature or custom most weak, there do thou, I beseech thee, magnify thy power in my preservation. [Here name thy most dangerous temptations] And Lord let my Savior's sufferings for my sins, and the vows I have now made against them, never depart from my mind, but let the remembrance of the one enable me to perform the other, that I may never make truce with those lusts, which nailed his hands, pierced his side, and made his Soul heavy to the death. But that having now a new listed myself under his banner, I may fight manfully, and follow the Captain of my Salvation even through a Sea of blood. Lord, lift up my hands that hang down, and my feeble knees, that I faint not in this warfare, O be thou my strength, who am not able of myself to struggle with the slightest temptations. How often have I turned my back in the day of battle? How many of these sacramental vows have I violated? And Lord I have still the same inconstant deceitful heart, to betray me to the breach of this. O thou who art Yea and Amen, in whom there is no shadow of change, communicate to me, I beseech thee, such a stability of mind, that I may no more thus start aside, like a broken bow, but that having my heart whole with thee, I may continue steadfast in thy Covenant; That not one good purpose which thy Spirit hath raised in me this day, may vanish, as so many have formerly done, but that they may bring forth fruit unto life eternal. Grant this, O merciful Father, through the merits, and Mediation of my Crucified Savior.

A Prayer of Intercession to be used either before or after the receiving of the Sacrament.

O MOST Gracious Lord, who so tenderly lovedst mankind, as to give thy dear Son out of thy bosom, to become a propitiation for the sins of the whole world, grant that the effect of this Redemption may be as Universal, as the design of it, that it may be to the Salvation of all. O let no person by impenitence and willful sin forfeit his part in it, but by the power of thy grace bring all, even the most obstinate sinners to Repentance. Inlighten all that sit in darkness, all Jews, Turks, Infidels, and Heretics, take from them all blindness, hardness of heart, and contempt of thy Word, and so fetch them home, blessed Lord, unto thy fold, that they may be saved among the number of the true Israelites. And for all those upon whom the Name of thy Son is called, grant, O Lord, that their conversations may be such as becometh the Gospel of Christ, that his Name be no longer Blasphemed among the Heathen through us. O blessed Lord, how long shall Christendom continue the vilest part of the world, a sink of all those abominable pollutions, which even Barbarians detest. O let not our profession, and our practice be always at so wide a distance. Let not the Disciples of the Holy and Immaculate Jesus, be of all others the most profane and impure. Let not the subjects of the Prince of Peace be of all others the most contentious, and bloody, but make us Christians indeed, as well as in name, that we may walk worthy of that Holy Vocation, wherewith we are called, and may all with one mind and one mouth glorify thee, the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ. Have mercy on this languishing Church, look down from Heaven the Habitation of thy Holiness and of thy glory, where is thy Zeal, and thy strength, the sounding of thy bowels, and of thy mercies towards us? Are they restrained? Be not wroth very sore, O Lord, neither remember iniquity forever, but though our backslidings are many, and we have grievously rebelled, yet according to all thy goodness, let thy anger & thy fury be turned away, & cause thy face to shine upon thy Sanctuary, which is desolate, for the Lord's sake; and so separate between us and our sins, that they may no longer separate between us & our God. Save and defend all Christian Kings, Princes, & Governors, especially those to whom we owe subjection, plead thou their cause, O Lord, against those that strive with them, and fight thou against those that fight against them, and so guide and assist them in the discharge of that office whereunto thou hast appointed them, that under them we may lead a quiet and peaceable life, in all godliness and honesty▪ Bless them that wait at thine Altar, open thou their lips that their mouth may show forth thy praise, O let not the lights of the world be put under bushels, but place them in their candlesticks, that they may give light to all that are in the house. Let not Jeroboams Priests profane thy service, but let the seed of Aaron still minister before thee. And O thou Father of mercies, and God of all comfort, succor and relieve all that are in affliction, deliver the outcast and poor, help them to right that suffer wrong, let the sorrowful sighing of the prisoners come before thee, and according to the greatness of thy power, preserve thou those that are appointed to die; grant ease to those that are in pain, supplies to those that suffer want, give to all presumptuous sinners a sense of their sins, and to all despairing, a sight of thy mercies, and do thou, O Lord, for everyone abundantly above what they can ask or think. Forgive my enemies, persecutors, and slanderers, and turn their hearts. Pour down thy blessings on all my friends, and benefactors, all who have commended themselves to my Prayer. [Here thou mayest name particular persons.] And grant, O merciful father, that through this blood of the cross, we may all be presented pure and unblameable, and unprovable in thy sight; That so we may be admitted into that place of purity, where no unclean thing can enter, there to sing eternal praises to Father, Son, and holy Ghost, forever.

A Prayer in times of common Persecution.

O BLESSED Savior, who hast made the cross the badge of thy Disciples, enable me, I beseech thee, willingly and cheerfully to embrace it; thou seest, O Lord, I am fallen into days, wherein he that departeth from evil maketh himself a Prey, O make me so readily to expose all my outward concernments, when my obedience to thee requireth it, that what falls as a prey to men, may by thee be accepted as a sacrifice to God: Lord preserve me so by thy grace that I never suffer as an evil doer, and then, O Lord, if it be my lot to suffer as a Christian, let me not be ashamed, but rejoice that I am counted worthy to suffer for thy name: O thou who for my sake enduredst the cross, and despisedst the shame, let the example of that love and patience prevail against all the tremblings of my corrupt heart, that no terrors may ever be able to shake my constancy, but that how long soever thou shalt permit the rod of the wicked to lie on my back, I may never put my hand unto wickedness: Lord, thou knowest whereof I am made, thou rememberest that I am but flesh, and flesh, O Lord, shrinks at the approach of anything grievous. It is thy Spirit thy Spirit alone, that can uphold me, O stablish me with thy free Spirit, that I be not weary & faint in my mind. And by how much the greater thou discernest my weakness, so much the more do thou show forth thy power in me, and make me, O Lord, in all temptations steadfastly to look to thee, the author and finisher of my faith, that so I may run the race, which is set before me, and resist even unto blood, striving against sin: O dear Jesus, hear me, and though Satan desire to have me, that he may winnow me as wheat, yet do thou, O blessed Mediator, pray for me that my faith fail not, but that though it be tried with fire, it may be found unto praise and glory and honor at thy appearing. And O Lord, I beseech thee, grant that I may preserve not only constancy towards God, but charity also towards men, even those whom thou shalt permit to be the instruments of my sufferings, Lord, let me not fail to imitate that admirable meekness of thine, in loving and praying for my greatest persecutors, and do thou, O Lord, overcome all their evil with thy infinite goodness, turn their hearts, and draw them powerfully to thyself and at last receive both me and mine enemies into those mansions of peace and rest, where thou reignest with the Father, and the Holy Ghost, one God, forever.

A Prayer in time of Affliction.

O JUST and holy Lord, who with rebukes doest chasten man for sin, I desire unfeignedly to humble myself under thy mighty hand, which now lies heavy upon me, I heartily acknowledge, O Lord, that all I do, all I can suffer, is but the due reward of my deeds, and therefore in thy severest afflictions I must still say, Righteous art thou, O Lord, and upright are thy judgments. But, O Lord, I beseech thee in judgment remember mercy, & though my sins have enforced thee to strike, yet consider my weakness, and let not thy stripes be more heavy, or more lasting than thou seest profitable for my soul; correct me but with the Chastisement of a father, not with the wounds of an enemy, and though thou take not off thy rod, yet take away thine anger: Lord do not abhor my soul, nor cast thy servant away in displeasure, but pardon my sins, I beseech thee, and if yet in thy fatherly wisdom, thou see fit to prolong thy corrections, thy blessed will be done, I cast myself, O Lord, at thy feet, do with me what thou pleasest. Trye me as silver is tried so thou bring me out purified. And Lord make even my flesh also to subscribe to this resignation, that there may be nothing in me, that may rebel against thy hand, but that having perfectly suppressed all repining thoughts, I may cheerfully drink of this cup. And how little soever thou shalt please to make it, Lord, let it prove medicinal, and cure all the diseases of my soul, that it may bring forth in me the peaceable fruit of righteousness. That so these light afflictions which are but for a moment, may work for me a far more exceeding and eternal weight of glory, through Jesus Christ.

A Thanksgiving for Deliverance.

O BLESSED Lord, who art gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great kindness, and repentest thee of the evil, I thankfully acknowledge before thee, that thou hast not dealt with me after my sins, nor rewarded me according to my iniquities. My rebellions O Lord, deserved to be scourged with scorpions, and thou hast corrected them only with a gentle and fatherly rod, neither hast thou suffered me to be long under that, but hast given me a timely and a gracious issue out of my late distress: O Lord, I will be glad and rejoice in thy mercy for thou hast considered my trouble and hast known my soul in adversity. Thou hast smitten and thou hast healed me, O let these various methods of thine have their proper effects upon my soul; That I who have felt the smart of thy chastisements, may stand in awe, and not sin, and that I who have likewise felt the sweet refreshings of thy mercy, may have my heart ravished with it, and knit to thee in the firmest bands of love, and that by both I may be preserved in a constant entire obedience to Thee all my days, through Jesus Christ.

Directions for the time of Sickness.

WHEN thou findest thyself visited with sickness, thou art immediately to remember that it is God, which with rebukes doth chasten man for sin. And therefore let thy first care be to find out what it is that provokes him to smite thee, and to that purpose examine thine own heart, search diligently what guilts lie there, confess them humbly and penitently to God, and for the greater security renew thy repentance for all the old sins of thy former life, beg most earnestly and importunately his mercy, and pardon in Christ Jesus, and put on sincere and zealous resolutions of forsaking every evil way, for the rest of that time which God shall spare thee. And that thy heart deceive thee not in this so weighty a business, it will be wisdom to send for some godly Divine, not only to assist thee with his Prayers, but with his counsel also. And to that purpose open thy heart so freely to him, that he may be able to judge whether thy repentance be such as may give thee confidence to appear before God's dreadful Tribunal, and that if it be not, he may help thee what he can towards the making it so. And when thou hast thus provided for thy better part, thy soul, then consider thy body also, and as the Wise man saith, Eccl. 38. 12. Give praise to the Physician, for the Lord hath created him: Use such means as may be most likely to recover thy health, but always remember that the success of them must come from God, and beware of Asa's sin, who sought to the Physicians, and not to the Lord, 2 Chr. 6. 12. Dispose also betimes of thy temporal affairs, by making thy will, and setting all things in such order as thou meanest finally to leave them in, and defer it not till thy sickness grow more violent, for then perhaps thou shalt not have such use of thy reason as may fit thee for it, or if thou have, it will be then much more seasonable to employ thy thoughts on higher things, on the world thou art going to, rather than that thou art about to leave, we cannot carry the things of this world with us, when we go hence and it is not fit we should carry the thoughts of them. Therefore let those be early dispatched that they may not disturb thee to last.

A Prayer for a sick Person.

O MERCIFUL and Righteous Lord, the God of health and of sickness, of life, and of death, I most unfeignedly acknowledge that my great abuse of those many days of strength and welfare, which thou hast afforded me, hath most justly deserved thy present visitation. I desire, O Lord, humbly to accept of this punishment of mine iniquity, and to bear the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him. And, O thou merciful Father, who designest not the ruin but the amendment of those whom thou scourgest, I beseech thee by thy grace so to sanctify this correction of thine to me, that this sickness of my body may be a means of health to my soul, make me diligent to search my heart, and do thou. O Lord enable me to discover every accursed thing, how closely soever concealed there, that by the removal thereof, I may make way for the removal of this punishment. Heal my soul, O Lord, which hath sinned against thee, and then if it be thy blessed will, heal my body also, restore the voice of joy and health unto my dwelling, that I may live to praise thee, and to bring forth fruits of repentance. But if in thy wisdom thou hast otherwise disposed, if thou have determined that this sickness shall be unto death, I beseech thee to fit and prepare me for it give me that sincere and earnest repentance, to which thou hast promised mercy and pardon; wean my heart from the world, and all its fading vanities, and make me to gasp and pant after those more excellent and durable joys which are at thy right hand forever. Lord, lift thou up the light of thy countenance upon me, and in all the pains of my body, in all the agonies of my spirit, let thy comforts refresh my soul, and enable me patiently to wait, till my change come. And grant, O Lord, that when my earthly house of this Tabernacle is dissolved, I may have a building of God, an house not made with hands, eternal in the heavens. And that for his sake, who by his precious blood hath purchased it for me, even Jesus Christ.

A THANKSGIVING for RECOVERY.

O GRACIOUS Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, in whose hand my time is. I praise and magnify thee, that thou hast in love to my soul, delivered it from the pit of corruption, and restored me to health again, it is thou alone, O Lord, that hast preserved my life from destruction, thou hast chastened and corrected me, but thou hast not given me over unto death, O let this life which thou hast thus graciously spared be wholly consecrated to thee. Behold, O Lord, I am by thy mercy made whole, O make me strictly careful to sin no more, least a worse thing come unto me. Lord, let not this reprieve thou hast now given me, make me secure, as thinking that my Lord delayeth his coming, but grant me, I beseech thee, to make a right use of this long suffering of thine, and so to employ every minute of that time, thou shalt allow me that when thou shalt appear, I may have confidence and not be ashamed before thee at thy coming. Lord, I have found by this approach towards death, how dreadful a thing it is to be taken unprepared. O let it be a perpetual admonition to me, to watch for my Masters coming; And when the pleasures of sin shall present themselves to entice me, O make me to remember how bitter they will be at the last. O Lord, hear me, and as thou hast in much mercy afforded me time, so grant me also grace to work out my own salvation, to provide oil in my lamp, that when the Bridgroom cometh, I may go in with him to the marriage. Grant this, I beseech thee, for thy dear Sons sake.

A Prayer at the approach of death.

O ETERNAL and everliving God, who first breathedst into man the breath of life, and when thou takest away that breath, he dyes and is turned again to his dust, look with compassion on me thy poor creature, who am now drawing near the gates of death, and which is infinitely more terrible, the bar of judgment. Lord my own heart condemns me, and thou art infinitely greater than my heart, and knowest all things. The sins I know and remember, fill me with horror; but there are also multitudes of others, which I either observed not at the time, or have since carelessly forgot, which are all present to thee. Thou settest my misdeeds before thee, and my secret sins in the light of thy countenance, and to what a mountainous heap must the minutely provocations of so many years arise? How shall one so ungodly stand in thy Judgment, or such a sinner in the Congregation of the Righteous? And to add yet more to my terror, my very repentance I fear will not abide the trial, my frequent relapses heretofore have sufficiently witnessed the unsincerity of my past resolutions. And then, O

Lord, what can secure me that my present dislikes of my sins are not rather the effects of my amazing danger, then of any real change; and, O Lord, I know thou art not mocked, nor wilt accept of anything that is not perfectly sincere. O Lord, when I consider this, fearfulness and trembling comes upon me, and an horrible dread overwhelmeth me, my flesh trembleth for fear of thee, and my heart is wounded within me. But, O Lord, one deep calleth upon another, the depth of my misery upon the depth of thy mercy. Lord, save now, or I perish eternally. O thou who willest not that any should perish, but that all should come to Repentance, bring me, I beseech thee, though thus late, to a sincere Repentance, such as thou wilt accept, who tryest the heart. Create in me, O God, a clean heart, and renew a right spirit within me: Lord one day is with thee as a thousand years, O let thy mighty Spirit work in me now in this my last day, whatsoever thou seest wanting to fit me for thy mercy, and acceptance. Give me a perfect and entire hatred of my sins, and enable me to present thee with that sacrifice of a broken and contrite heart, which thou hast promised not to despise; that by this I may be made capable of that atonement, which thy dear Son hath by the more excellent oblation of himself made for all repenting sinners. He is the propitiation for our sins, he was wounded for our transgressions, he was bruised for our iniquities, the chastisement of our peace was on him, O heal me by his stripes, and let the cry of his blood drown the clamour of my sins: I am indeed a child of wrath, but he is the Son of thy love, for his sake spare me. O Lord, spare thy creature, whom he hath redeemed with his most precious blood, and be not angry with me forever. In his wounds, O Lord, I take Sanctuary, O let not thy vengeance pursue me to this city of refuge: my Soul hangeth upon him, O let me not perish with a Jesus, with a Savior in my arms. But by his Agony and bloody Sweat, by his Cross and Passion, by all that he did and suffered for sinners, good Lord deliver me, deliver me, I beseech thee. from the wages of my sins, thy wrath and everlasting damnation, in this time of my tribulation, in the hour of death, and in the day of Judgment. Hear me O Lord, hear me; and do not now repay my former neglects of thy calls, by refusing to answer me in this time of my greatest need. Lord, there is but a step between me and death, O let not my sin go down upon thy wrath, but seek my pardon, before I go hence and be no more seen. Thy loving kindness is better then the life itself, O let me have that in exchange, and I shall most gladly lay down this mortal life; Lord thou knowest all my desire, and my groaning is not hid from thee, Deal thou with me, O Lord, according to thy Name, for sweet is thy mercy take away the sting of death, the guilt of my sins, and then though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death, I will fear no evil, I will lay me down in peace, and Lord when I awake up, let me be satisfied with thy presence in thy glory. Grant this merciful God for his sake, who is both the Redeemer, and Mediator of sinners, even Jesus Christ.

PSALMES.

PVT me not to rebuke O Lord in thine anger, neither chasten me in thy heavy displeasure.

There is no health in my flesh because of thy displeasure, neither is there any rest in my bones by reason of my sins.

For my wickednesses are gone over my head, and are a sore burden too heavy for me to bear.

My wounds stink and are corrupt through my foolishness.

Therefore is my spirit vexed within me, and my heart within me is desolate.

My sins have taken such hold upon me, that I am not able to look up, yea, they are more in number, then the hairs of my head, and my heart hath failed me.

But thou, O Lord God, art full of compassion and mercy, long suffering, plenteous in goodness and truth.

Turn thee unto me, and have mercy upon me for I am desolate, and in misery.

If thou Lord shouldst be extreme to mark what is done amiss, O Lord who may abide it.

O remember not the sins and offenses of my youth, but according to thy mercy think thou upon me, for thy goodness.

Look upon my adversity and misery, and forgive me all my sin.

Hide not thy face from thy servant, for I am in trouble, O haste thee and hear me.

Out of the deep do I call unto thee, Lord hear my voice.

Turn thee O Lord, and deliver my Soul, O save me for thy mercies sake.

O go not from me, for trouble is hard at hand, and there is none to help.

I stretch forth my hands unto thee, my Soul gaspeth unto thee, as a thirsty land.

Draw nigh unto my Soul and save it, O deliver me, because of my enemies.

For my Soul is full of trouble, and my life draweth nigh unto hell.

Save me from the Lions mouth, hear me from among the horns of the Vnicorns.

O set me up upon the rock that is higher then I, for thou art my hope, and a strong Tower for me against the enemy.

Why art thou so heavy, O my Soul, and why art thou so disquieted within me?

Put thy trust in God, for I will yet give him thanks, for the help of his countenance.

The Lord shall make good his loving kindness towards me, yea, thy Mercy O Lord endureth forever, despise not then the work of of thine own hands.

O GOD, thou art my God, early will I seek thee.

My Soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh also longeth after thee, in a barren and dry land where no water is.

Like as the heart desireth the water brooks, so longeth my Soul after thee O God.

My Soul is a thirst for God, even for the living God, when shall I come to appear before the presence of God?

How amiable are thy dwellings, O Lord of Hosts?

My Soul hath a desire and longing to enter into the Courts of the Lord, my flesh and my heart rejoice in the living God.

O that I had wings like a Dove, for then would I fly away and be at rest.

O send out thy light and thy truth, that they may lead me, and bring me unto thy Holy Hill, and to thy dwelling.

For one day in thy Courts is better than a thousand.

I had rather be a door keeper in the house of my God, then to dwell in the tents of wickedness.

I should utterly have fainted, but that I believed verily to see the goodness of the Lord in the land of the living.

Thou art my Helper and my Redeemer, O Lord make no long tarrying.

EjACULATIONS.

O LORD of whom may I seek for succor, but of thee who for my sins art justly displeased, yet O Lord God most Holy, O Lord most mighty, O Holy and most Merciful Savior, deliver me not into the bitter pains of eternal death.

Thou knowest Lord the secrets of my heart, shut not up thy merciful eyes to my prayer, but hear me O Lord most Holy, O God most Mighty, O Holy and Merciful Savior, thou most worthy Judge eternal, suffer me not at my last hour for any pains of death to fall from thee.

Father I have sinned against Heaven and before thee, and am no worthy to be called thy child, yet O Lord do not thou cast off the bowels and compassions of a Father, but even as a Father pitieth his own children, so be thou merciful unto me.

Lord, the prince of this world cometh, O let him have nothing in me, but as he accuseth, do thou absolve, he lays many and grievous things to my charge, which he can too well prove, I have nothing to say for myself, do thou answer for me, O Lord my God.

O Lord I am clothed with filthy garments, and Satan stands at my right hand, to resist me, O be thou pleased to rebuke him, and pluck me as a brand out of the fire, cause mine iniquities to pass from me, and cloth me with the righteousness of thy Son.

Behold, O God, the Devil is coming towards me, having great wrath because he knoweth that he hath but a short time, O save and deliver me, lest he devour my Soul like a Lyon, and tear it in pieces while there is none to help.

O my God, I know that no unclean thing can enter into thy Kingdom, and I am nothing but pollution, my very righteousness are as filthy rags, O wash me and make me white in the blood of the Lamb, that so I may be fit to stand before thy Throne.

Lord the snares of death compass me round about. O let not the pains of Hell also take hold upon me, but though I find trouble and heaviness, yet O Lord I beseech thee deliver my Soul.

O dear Jesus, who hast bought me with the precious price of thine own blood, challenge now thy purchase, and let not all the malice of hell pluck me out of thy hand.

O blessed high Priest, who art able to save them to the utmost, who come unto God by thee, say me I beseech thee, who have no hope, but on thy merits and intercession.

O God I confess I have defaced that Image of thine, thou didst imprint upon my Soul, yet O thou faithful Creator, have pity on thy creature.

O Jesu, I have by my many and grievous sins crucified thee afresh, yet thou who prayedst for thy persecutors, intercede for me also, and suffer not, O my Redeemer, my soul (the price of thy blood) to perish.

O Spirit of grace, I have by my horrid impieties done despite to thee, yet, O blessed comforter though I have often grieved thee, be thou pleased to succor and relieve me, and say unto my soul, I am thy salvation.

Mine eyes look unto thee, O Lord, in thee is my trust, O cast not out my soul.

O Lord in thee have I trusted, let me never be confounded.

O Blessed Lord, who scourgest every Son whom thou receivest let me not be weary of thy correction, but give me such a perfect subjection to thee the Father of Spirits, that this chastisement may be for my profit, that I may thereby be partaker of thy holiness.

O thou Captain of my salvation, who wert made perfect by sufferings, sanctify to me all the pains of body, all the terrors of mind, which thou shalt permit to fall upon me.

Lord, my sins have deserved eternal torments make me cheerfully and thankfully to bear my present pains, chasten me as thou pleasest here, that I may not be condemned with the world.

Lord, the waters are come in even unto my soul, O let thy Spirit move upon these waters, and make them like the pool of Bethesda, that they may cure whatsoever spiritual disease thou discernest in me.

O Christ, who first sufferedst many and grievous things, and then enteredst into thy glory, make me so to suffer with thee, that I may also be glorified with thee.

O dear Jesus, who humblest thyself to the death of the cross for me, let that death of thine sweeten the bitterness of mine.

When thou hadst overcome the sharpness of death, thou didst open the Kingdom of heaven to all believers.

I believe that thou shalt come to be my Judge.

I pray thee therefore help thy servant whom thou hast redeemed with thy most precious blood.

Make me to be numbered with thy Saints in glory everlasting.

Thou art the resurrection and the life, he that believeth in thee, though he were dead, yet shall he live, Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief.

My flesh and my heart faileth, but God is the strength of my heart, and my portion forever.

I desire to be dissolved, and to be with Christ, which is far better: Lord, I groan earnestly desiring to be clothed upon with that house from heaven.

I desire to put off this my tabernacle, O be pleased to receive me into everlasting habitations.

Bring my soul out of prison, that I may give thanks unto thy name.

Lord, I am here to wrestle not only with flesh and blood, but with principalities and powers, and spiritual wickedness, O take me from these tents of Kedar, into the heavenly Jerusalem, where Satan shall be utterly trodden under my feet.

I cannot here attend one minute to thy service, without distraction, O take me up to stand before thy throne, where I shall serve thee day and night.

I am here in heaviness through many tribulations, O receive me into that place of rest, where all tears shall be wiped from my eyes, where there shall be no more death, nor sorrow, nor crying, nor pain.

I am here in a state of banishment, and absence from the Lord, O take me where I shall forever behold thy face, and follow the lamb whither soever he goeth.

I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith, henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness.

O Blessed Jesu, who hath loved me, and washed me from my sins in thine own blood, receive my soul.

Into thy hands I commend my spirit, for thou hast redeemed me, O Lord thou God of truth. Come Lord Jesu, come quickly.

PRAYERS for their use who Mourn in secret for the PUBLICK CALAMITIES, &c.

Psalm 74.

O God, wherefore art thou absent, &c. 79. O God, the Heathen are come, &c. 80. Hear, O thou Shepherd of Israel, &c.

A Prayer to be used in these times of Calamity.

O Lord God, to whom vengeance belongeth, I desire humbly to confess before thee, both on my own behalf, and that of this nation, that these many years of calamity we have groaned under, are but the just (yea mild) returns of those many more years of our provocations against thee, and that thy present wrath is but the due punishment of thy abused mercy. O Lord, thou hast formerly abounded to us in blessings above all people of the earth. Thy candle shined upon our heads, and we delighted ourselves in thy great goodness, peace was within our walls, and plenteousness within our palaces, there was no decay, no leading into captivity, and no complaining in our streets: But we turned this grace into wantonness, we abused our peace to security, our plenty to riot and Luxury, and made those good things, which should have endeared our hearts to thee, the occasions of estranging them from thee; Nay, O Lord, thou gavest us yet more precious mercies, thou wert pleased thyself to pitch thy Tabernacle with us, to establish a pure and glorious Church among us, and give us thy word to be a lamp unto our feet, and a light unto our paths; But O Lord we have made no other use of that light, then to conduct us to the chambers of death, we have dealt proudly, and not hearkened to thy commandments, and by rebelling against the light, have purchased to ourselves so much the heavier portion in the outer darkness. And now, O Lord, had the overflowings of thy vengeance been answerable to that of our sins, we had long since been swept away with a swift destruction, and there had been none of us alive at this day to implore thy mercy. But thou art a gracious God, slow to anger, and hast proceeded with us with much patience and long suffering, thou hast sent thy judgments to awake us to repentance, and hast also allowed us space for it: But alas! we have perverted this mercy of thine beyond all the former, we return not to him that smiteth us, neither do we seek the Lord, we are slidden back by a perpetual backsliding, no man repenteth him of his wickedness, or saith what have I done? 'Tis true indeed we fear the rod (we dread every suffering, so that we are ready to buy it off with the foulest sin) but we fear not him that hath appointed it, but by a wretched obstinacy harden our necks against thee, and refuse to return. And now, O God, what balm is there in Gilead that can cure us; who, when thou wouldst heal us, will not be healed, we know thou hast pronounced that there is no peace to the wicked, and how shall we then pray for peace, that still retain our wickedness? 'This this, O Lord, is our forest disease, O give us medicines to heal this sickness, heal our souls, and then we know thou canst soon heal our land. Lord, thou hast long spoken by thy word to our ears, by thy judgments even to all our senses, but unless thou speak by thy Spirit to our hearts, all other calls will still be ineffectual, O send out this voice, and that a mighty voice, such as may awake us out of this Lethargy: thou that didst call Lazarus out of the grave, O be pleased to call us, who are dead, yea putrefied in trespasses and sins, and make us to awake to righteousness. And though, O Lord, our frequent resistances even of these inward calls have justly provoked thee to give us up to the lusts of our own heart; yet O thou boundless ocean of mercy, who art good not only beyond what we can deserve, but what we can wish, do not withdraw the influence of thy grace, and take not thy holy Spirit from us. Thou wert found of those that sought thee not, O let that act of mercy be repeated to us, who are so desperately, yet so insensibly sick, that we cannot so much as look after the Physician, and by how much our case is the more dangerous, so much the more sovereign remedies do thou apply; Lord help us, and consider not so much our unworthiness of thy aid, as our irremediable ruin, if we want it; save Lord, or we perish eternally. To this end dispense to us in our temporal interest, what thou seest may best secure our spiritual; if a greater degree of outward misery will tend to the cureing our inward, Lord, spare not thy rod, but strike yet more sharply, Cast out this Devil, though with never so much foaming and tearing. But if thou seest that some return of mercy may be most likely to melt us, O be pleased so far to condescend to our wretchedness, as to afford us that, and whether by thy sharper, or thy gentler methods, bring us home to thyself. And then, O Lord, we know thy hand is not shortened, that it cannot save, when thou hast delivered us from our sins, thou canst and wilt deliver us from our troubles, O show us thy mercy, and grant us thy salvation, that being redeemed both in our bodies and spirits, we may glorify thee in both, in a cheerful obedience, and praise the name of our God, that hath dealt wonderfully with us, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

A Prayer for This Church.

O Thou great God of recompenses, who turnest a fruitful, land into barrenness for the wickedness of the• that dwell therein; thou hast most justly executed that fatal sentence on this Church; which having once been the perfection of beauty, the joy of the whole earth is now become a scorn and derision to all that are round about her. O Lord, what could have been done to thy vineyard, that thou 〈◇〉 not done in it, and since it hath brought forth nothing but wild grapes, it is perfectly just with thee to take away the hedge thereof, and let it be eaten up. But O Lord, though our iniquities testify against us, yet do thou it for thy Names sake; for our backslidings are many, we have sinned against thee. O the hope of Israel, the Savior thereof in time of trouble, why shouldst thou• be as a stranger in the land, as a wayfaring man that turneth aside to carry for a night? Why shouldst thou be as a man astonied, as a mighty man that cannot save? Yet thou, O Lord art in the midst of us, and we are called by thy name, leave us not, deprive us of what outward enjoyments thou pleasest, take from us the oppor•unities of our Luxury, and it may be a mercy, but, O take not from us the means of our reformation, for that is the most direful expression of thy wrath. And though we have hated the light, because our deeds were evil, yet. O Lord, do not by withdrawing it condemn •s to walk on still in darkness, but let it continue to shine, till it have guided our feet into the way of peace; O Lord, arise, stir up thy strength and come and help us, and deliver not the soul of thy turtle dove (this disconsolate Church) unto the multitude of the enemy; but help act, O God, and that right early. But if, O Lord, our rebellions have so provoked thee, that the Ark must wander in the wilderness, til all this murmuring generation be consumed, yet let not that perish with us, but bring it at last into a Canaan, and let our more innocent posterity see that, which in thy just judgment thou denyest to us. In the mean time let us not cease to bewail that desolation, our sins have wrought to think upon the stones of Zion, and pity to see her in the dust, nor ever be ashamed or afraid to own her, in her lowest and most persecuted condition, but esteem the reproach of Christ, greater riches then the treasures of Egypt, and so approve our constancy, to this our afflicted mother, that her blessed Lord and head may own us with mercy, when he shall come in the glory of thee his father with the holy Angels. Grant this merciful Lord for the same Jesus Christ •is sake.

A Prayer for the Peace of the Church.

Lord Jesus Christ, which of thine almightiness madest all creatures both visible and invisible, which of thy godly wisdom governest and settest all things in most goodly order, which of thine unspeakable goodness keepest, defendest and furtherest all things, which of thy deep mercy restorest the decayed, renewest the fallen, raisest the dead: vouchsafe we pray thee at last, to cast down thy countenance upon thy well-beloved Spouse the Church; but let it be that amiable and merciful countenance wherewith thou pacifiest all things in heaven, in earth, and whatsoever is above heaven and under the earth: vouchsafe to cast upon us those tender and pitiful eyes, with which thou didst once behold Peter that great Shepherd of thy Church, and forthwith he remembered himself, & repented, with which eyes thou once didst view the scattered multitude, and wert moved with compassion, that for lack of a good Shepherd, they wandered as sheep dispersed and strayed a sunder. Thou seest (O good Shepherd) what sundry sorts of Wolvs have broken into thy sheep cotes, of whom everyone crieth: Here is Christ, here is Christ. So that if it were possible the very perfect persons should be brought into error. Thou seest with what winds, with what waves, with what storms thy silly ship is tossed, thy ship wherein thy little flock is in peril to be drowned. And what is now left, but that it utterly sink, and we all perish? Of this tempest and storm, we may thank our own wickedness and sinful living; we espy it well and confess it, we espy thy righteousness, and we bewail our unrighteousness: but we appeal to thy mercy which (according to the Psalm of thy Prophet) surmounteth all thy works; we have now suffered much punishment, being sousted with so many wars, consumed with such losses of goods, scourged with so many sorts of diseases and pestilences, shaken with so many floods, feared with so many strange sights from heaven, and yet appears there nowhere any Haven or Port unto us being thus-tired & for lorn among so strange evils, but still every day more grievous punishments, and more seem to hang over our heads. We complain not of thy sharpness, most tender Savior, but we espy here also thy mercy, forasmuch, as much grievouse• plagues we have deserved. But O most merciful Jesu, we beseech thee, that thou wilt not consider not weigh what is due for our deservings, but rather what becometh thy mercy, without which neither the Angels in heaven can stand sure before thee, much less we filly vessels of clay. Have mercy on us, O redeemer, which art easy to be entreated, not that we be worthy of thy mercy, but give thou this glory unto thine own Name. Suffer not that the Jews, Turks, and the rest of the Panims, which either have not known thee, or do envy thy glory, should continually triumph over us, and say, Where is their God, where is their Redeemer, where is their Savior, where is their Bridegroom, that they thus boast on? These opprobrious words and upbraidings redound unto thee. O Lord, while by our evils, men weigh and esteem thy goodness: they think we be forsaken, whom they see not amended. Once when thou sleptst in the Ship, and a Tempest suddenly arising threatened death to all in the Ship, thou awakest at the outcry of a few Disciples, and straightway at thine Almighty word the waters couched, the winds fell, the storm was suddenly turned into a great calm; the dumb waters know their makers voice. Now in this far greater tempest, wherein not a few men's bodies be in danger, but innumerable souls: we beseech thee at the cry of thy holy Church, which is in danger of drowning, that thou wilt awake. So many thousands of men do cry, Lord save us, we perish, the tempest is past man's power: yea we see that the endeavors of them that would help it, do turn clean a contrary way. It is thy word that must do the deed, Lord Jesu. Only say thou with a word of thy mouth, Cease O tempest, and forthwith shall he desired calm appear. Thou wouldst have spared so many thousands of most wicked men, if in the City of Sodom had been found but ten good men. Now here be so many thousands ⟨◇⟩ men, which love the glory of thy name, which sigh for the beauty ⟨◇⟩ thy house; and wilt thou not at these men's prayers let go thine anger, and remember thine accustomed and old mercies? Shalt thou not with thy heavenly policy turn our folly into thy glory? Shalt thou not turn the wicked men's evils into thy Churches good? For thy mercy is wont then most of all to succor, when the thing is with us past remedy, and neither the might nor wisdom of men can help it. Thou bringest things that be never so out of order, into order again: which art the only Author and maintainer of peace. Thou framedst that old confusion, which we call Chaos, wherein without order, without fashion confusedly lay the discordant seeds of things, and with a wonderful order the things that of nature fought together, thou didst lie and knit in a perpetual band. But how much greater confusion is this, where is no charity, no fidelity, no bonds of love, no reverence either of laws, nor yet of rulers, no agreement of opinions, but as ⟨◇⟩ were in a misordered quire, every man singeth a contrary note. Among the heavenly Planets is no dissention, all four Elements keep their place, everyone do their office whereunto they be appointed. And wilt thou suffer thy Spouse, for whose sake all things were made thus by continual discords to perish, and go to wrack? Shalt thou offer the wicked spirits, which be authors and workers of discord, ⟨◇⟩ bear such a swing in thy Kingdom unchecked? Shalt thou suffer the strong Captain of mischief, whom thou once overthrewest, again ⟨◇⟩ invade thy tents, and to spoil thy soldiers? When thou wert here man conversant among men, at thy voice fled the Devils. Send forth ⟨◇⟩ beseech thee, O Lord, thy spirit which may drive away out of the nests of all them that profess thy name, the wicked spirits masters of riot, of covetousness, of vain-glory, of carnal lust, of mischief, and of disorder. Create in us, O our God and King, a clean heart, and renew thy holy spirit in our breasts pluck not from us thy holy Ghost. Render unto us the joy of thy saving health, and with thy principal spirit, strengthen thy Spouse and the Herdmen thereof. By this Spirit thou reconciledst the earthly to the heavenly: by this thou didst frame and reduce, so many tongues, so many nations, so many sundry sorts of men into ⟨◇⟩ body of a Church; which body by the same Spirit is knit to thee their Head. This Spirit if thou wilt vouchsafe to renew in all men's hearts, then shall also these foreign miseries cease, or if they cease not, at least they shall turn to the profit and avail of them which love thee. Stay this confusion, set in order this horrible Chaos (O Lord be us;) let thy spirit stretch out itself upon these waters of evil warring opinions. And because thy spirit, which according to thy Prophets saying containeth all things hath also the science of speaking make that like as unto all them which be of thy house, is all one light, one Baptism, one God, one Hope, one Spirit; so they may also have one voice, one note, and song, professing one Catholic truth. When thou didst mount up to heaven triumphantly, thou threwest out from above thy precious things, thou gavest gifts amongst men, thou dealtest sundry rewards of thy Spirit. Renew again from above thy old bountifulness, give that thing to thy Church, now fainting and growing downward, that thou gavest unto her shooting up, at her first beginning. Give unto Princes and Rulers the grace so to stand in awe of thee, that they so may guide the Common-weal, as they should shortly render accompt unto thee that art the King of kings. Give wisdom to be always assistant unto them, that whatsoever is best to be done, they may espy it in their mind, and pursue the same in their doings. Give to the Bishops the gift of prophecy, that they may declare and interpret holy Scripture, not of their own brain, but of thine inspiring. Give them the threefold charity which thou once demandest of Peter, what time thou didst be•ache unto him the charge of thy sheep. Give to the Priests the love of soberness and of chastity. Give to thy people a good will to follow thy Commandments, and a readiness to obey such persons as thou hast appointed over them. So shall it come to pass, if through thy gift thy Princes shall command that thou requirest, if thy Pastors and Her•men shall teach the same, and thy people obey them both: that the old dignity and tranquility of the Church shall return again with a goodly order unto the glory of thy name. Thou sparedst the Ninevites appointed to be destroyed, as soon as they converted to repentance; and wilt thou despise thy house falling down at thy feet, which instead of sackcloth hath sighs, and instead of ashe• tears? Thou promisedst forgiveness to such as turn unto thee, but this self thing is thy gift, a man to turn with his whole heart unto thee, to the intent all our goodness should redound unto thy glory. Thou art the maker, repair the work that thou hast fashioned. Thou art the Redeemer; save that thou hast bought. Thou art the Savi•ur, suff•r not them to perish which do hang on thee. Thou art the Lord and owner; challenge thy possession. Thou art the head, help thy memb•rs. Thou art the King, give us a reverence of thy laws. Thou art the Prince of peace; breathe upon us brotherly love. Thou art the God, have p•ty on thy humble bes•ec•ers; be thou according to Paul's saying, all things in all men, to the intent, the whole quire of thy Church with agre•ing minds and consonant voices for mercy obtained at thy hands, may give thanks to the Father, Son & holy Ghost w<sup>ch</sup> after the most perf•ct example of concord, b• distincted in property of Persons, and one in nature, to whom be praise and glory eternally. Amen.

FINIS.

ERRATA.

The Reader is desired to Correct these Errata's with his pen, •t the sense be not disturbed.

In the Preface.

- •ge. Line.
- •6. 23 for Job, read Joab.
- •8. 32 for vice, r. voice.

In the Treatise

- •4. 6. sure r. pure.
- ⟨◇⟩ . 3. so considerable, r. so inconsiderable.

- ⟨◇⟩ 26. to fit us, r. to find us.
- ⟨◇⟩ 29. Discords r. disorders.
- ⟨◇⟩ 26. revilings, r. revellings
- ⟨◇⟩ 8. means, r. meaning.
- ⟨◇⟩ 21. dele not before only.
- ⟨◇⟩ 12. B•eaches r. Branches.
- ⟨◇⟩ 19. howsoever, r. how soon soever.
- ⟨◇⟩ 16. false, r. safe.
- ⟨◇⟩ 32. protest, r. profess.
- ⟨◇⟩ 3. the favor, r. the favourer.
- ⟨◇⟩ 5. offered, r. afforded.
- ⟨◇⟩ 24. after, r. often.
- ⟨◇⟩ 21, 22. solemn, r. seldom.
- ⟨◇⟩ 12. trance, r. frame.
- ⟨◇⟩ 9. after is r. not.
- ⟨◇⟩ 14. r. occasional.
- ⟨◇⟩ 25. fifth, r. third.
- ⟨◇⟩ 6. our, r. other.
- ⟨◇⟩ 6. greatness, r. gentleness.
- ⟨◇⟩ 31. prayer, r. praise.
- ⟨◇⟩ 6. mercies, r. miseries.
- ⟨◇⟩ 29. such, r. sick.
- 153. 4. force, r. face.
- 26. after punishments, r. thy.
- 155. 27. after any add thing
- 182. 16. r. to resist, the Graces of God to improve

- 210. 2. souls, r. houses.
- 220. 1. gift, r. guest.
- 234. 3. two rest, r. to west.
- 253. 28. act, r. art.
- 259. 7. dele not, r. and that it is only.
- 277. 8. happy, r. unhappy.
- 300. 25. action, r. affection
- 318. 1. in, r. is.
- 321. 1. put a comma at for,
- 323. 22, supposed, r. opposed.
- 324. 33. justly, r. unjustly.
- 325. 4. surely, r. surly.
- 327. 11. put the comma at hereafter,
- 334. 32. put the comma at judging.
- 353. 17. the open vile, r. open vice.
- 365. 27. after degree, read thus, a cruelty to defer enjoying of it.
- 367. 16. dele not.
- 381. 6. cure, r. care.

In the Devotions.

- 628. 26. little, r. bitter.

P-RA-23. The vanity of the creature by the author of The whole duty of man, &c. ; together with a letter prefixed, sent to the bookseller, relating to the author. - Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681.

[illustration]

London Printed for John Kidgell at y<sup>e</sup>. Golden Ball 〈...〉 Gate in ••rn

THE VANITY OF THE CREATURE. By the AUTHOR OF THE Whole Duty of Man, &c. Together with a LETTER Prefix'd, sent to the Bookseller, relating to the AUTHOR.

ECCLES. 1.2.

Vanity of Vanities, all is Vanity.

LONDON: Printed for John Kidgell at the Golden-Ball near Grays-Inn-Gate in Holborn 1684.

TO THE Bookseller.

Mr. Kidgell,

YOU having Printed that most Excellent piece, Entitled, The Whole Duty of Man, Part II. Wherein the Author of that Book hath discovered much Judgment, together with a composure of Elegancy of Style and Expression, I having a good opinion of your Conversation by a little acquaintance with you, at the request of my Kinsman Mr. G. L. I. send you an account of the little Tract you are Printing, called The Vanity of the Creature; which was, (if my word may pass for it) written by the first Author of The Whole Duty of Man. That he was a person of great Learning and Piety, I think no man will gain-say; which if he did, he would be sufficiently confuted by that his most Excellent and Divine Treatise. He was also of that Christian-like temper of meekness and modesty, rarely to be found in the best of men of these flagitious times, that out of a perfect enmity and aversion to vain-glory, he purposely concealed his name; which hath been the occasion of as many conjectures (almost) to know who he was, as there have been scrutinies to find out the head-spring and original source of the River Nile. For my part, I shall not (though I could) break the rules of Decency and good Manners, to satisfy the itching desire of the over-curious, in divulging that which the Author himself was so careful to conceal. —Cum vides velatam, quid inquiris in rem absconditam? This is certain, and I will adventure at the boldness to say, that all those several Discourses which have appeared abroad in the World under our Authors name, were not written by him; but whoever were the Authors, it cannot be denied, but that they have written them with the greatest Judgment, Learning, and Piety imaginable, and that they are only worthy of imitating so great a Divine as our Author.

Yours in all Civil Offices, J. L.

THE Vanity of the Creature.

THE Creatures Vanity and Mutability is so great, that it should be the greatest incentive to us to look to the Supreme good, as the only Center of our Happiness and Felicity. Since the Summum bonum of Man lies in something more sublime and excellent than any Created Being, it's not in vain for him, in order to attaining the true object of his real Happiness, to take a Contemplative view of the Creatures vanity, which is most perspicuously demonstrable even in Monarchies, which Bodin tells us, are more durable than Popular States, because less subject to be divided, (Unity being the great Preserver of all things:) and yet have these had, as the Moon, not only their increase and full light, but also their wain and changes, and this sometimes in a moment. That as in Music you shall hear sometimes a string tun'd up to its ultimum potentiae, as high as it will bear, and presently depressed again to the lowest Key, and another elevated, yet both of them breathing but light Airs, and of short continuance: So may you see a Monarchy now wound up to the highest pitch of Happiness, and by and by let down again into the lowest depths of misery. This is God's doing, and it is marvelous in our eyes.

And here I shall begin with those Empires and Monarchies that were most famous among the rest.

For how soon was the Assyrian or Babylonian Monarchy swallowed up by the Persian, the Persian by the Greek or Macedonian Empire, and the Greek by the Roman? which the Prophet Daniel presents unto us, by the Gold, Silver, Brass, and Iron, whereof Nebuchadnezzar's Image consisted, Dan. 2.32. The dissolution of one, as in natural things, so here, being still the generation of another; and again, the erection of the later being the destruction of the former.

And as for the Roman Monarchy, their own Historian can tell us of that, how it had both its Infancy, Youth, Manhood, and Old age, as it were by turns: As its Infancy under Kings, its Youth under Consuls, its Manhood from the first Punick War unto the time of Augustus Caesar, and from that time its Old age under the succeeding Emperors; until at length that solid Body was torn asunder by the strugglings of her own Children, into the Eastern and Western Empires, whereof the former was soon eaten out by the Turks and Saracens, and the later also fell away much, after a little revolution of time, by the falling off of divers Nations from her, each of which after they had plucked off their own feathers from the Roman Eagle, left her almost naked; As the Franks and Burgundians in France, the Goths in Spain, the Normans and Lombards in Italy, together with the English and Scots in Britain: until at the last cast the Roman Monarchy began a little to recall herself into Germany, where she hath held up since little more than the bare name of the Empire. So that Vicissitude you see is the great Empress of the world, unto whose unstay'd Dominion all earthly Powers and Principalities must be subject, even those that are of the first Magnitude, much more others that move in a lower Orb.

And of these I shall single out only three, which I conceive most eminent, to be instanced in for this point.

The first is Judea, whose Government was Monarchically settled by God himself; yet how oft did she change her Lord's and Masters, yielding herself as it were successively first to the Babylonian, and after that to the Roman, Persian, Saracen, Christian, Egyptian, and now to the Turkish power? That as the Poet spake of Troy, Fuit Ilium; so may we of Jerusalem, her Metropolis, Fuit Hierosolyma, that Jerusalem was; She was great among the Nations, or Domina Gentium, the Lady of the Nations, but now, Non sic ut olim, it hath not been with her for these many Generations past, as in former days, (to use Job's words in his twenty ninth Chapter, second and third verses) when God preserved her, when his Candle shined upon her head, and when by that light she walked through darkness; but Servants have ruled over her, and there was none to deliver her out of their hands. Which is a good Lecture of Mutability to other Kingdoms and their Mother-cities. For Jerusalem was once a holy and happy City, and had been happy still, and she but continued holy; but that failing, How is her Gold become dim, how is her fine Gold changed into Dross! as she complains herself.

The second Example I produce here is Naples, which we many well call the Ball of Providence: And indeed so it was, being bandied from one Lord to another ten several times, before it came to lie (as now it doth) at the foot of Spain. For being a Country at first diversely peopled, it was upon the division allotted to the Eastern Emperors, but from them forced by the Almains, and so to the Greeks and Saracens, and then successively hurried about to the Normans, Germans, French, Hungarians, Arragonoys, and from them to the French again; till in the end the Spaniard seized upon it: and whether it will continue long with him or no, is very uncertain; especially if we remember how of late years a poor Fisherman (Massinello by name) snatched up the Reins of Government from him, and (had not God otherwise determined of that Kingdom, by infatuating that Mushrome-King) for ought we know, he might have run quite away with them; so slippery are all earthly Kingdoms▪

3. But not to look out any longer to other Nations of Christendom, (methinks) we may instance this best by reflecting upon ourselves. For you all know (I suppose) how the Romans, Saxons, Danes, and Normans, had each of them their several and alternate days of Lordship over this Nation; but yet because they did not know in those their days the things that belonged unto their Peace, how do we see the shadows of the night stretched out upon them, their Suns set with us, and their days shut in!

The longest day we read of, was that in Joshua's time, wherein though the Sun stood still in Gibeon for the space of a whole day, yet set it did at last.

The day of the Romans was long upon our Horizon, for the Sun of their prosperity shone here for the space of four hundred years and more; yet did it then go down as to us in this Nation, and Darkness here now doth lie upon

Again, the day of the Saxons continued five hundred years and upwards; That of the Danes two hundred fifty five years, or thereabouts.

And how long the day of the Normans hath lasted, every petty Almanac can tell us. I, and if none of those Suns come to rise again within our Hemisphere, (when the sins of this Nation are ripe, and call for God's sickle to cut them down) it's beside his ordinary rule, which usually runs out all Humane things by a changeable circumference; for so Solomon tells us in his Book of Ecclesiastes, That the Sun rises, and the Sun goes down, and hasteth to the place where he arose.

Neither is this all, that the Powers and Principalities on earth are upon a daily turn, but as the Primum Mobile (you know) carries about the other Spheres; so do these carry about many other changes and alterations with them: As that of Religion, Laws, Liberties, Sciences, Customs, and such like. Nay, even the Houses of God, which before to violate, was held a Crime inexpiable, yet are they now upon such removes broken down without scruple; and the very Urns of the Dead, which have been always looked upon as Sacred Cabinets to preserve the Bodies of God's Saints in for Eternity, yet are they now broken up, and their Ashes thrown about, (such is the unsettledness of all things here below) even as the vilest Dust upon the face of the earth.

Beloved, it hath been ever thus upon the conversion of such great Bodies, and it is so still: for never was there any conversion in this Land like to that our eyes have seen of late; That if any one should have slept but some few years last past (as the Ancients fain of Epimenides) and should have awaked again in these times, how would he wonder at those strange Metamorphoses that are now among us, there being Nova rerum facies, A new face of things both in Church and State! Insomuch, (as Mr. Harding spake sometimes of Rome, That he did quaerere Romam in Roma, That he did seek Rome in Rome, and could not find it,) so may we say now, That we may quaerere Angliam in Anglia, That we may now seek for old England in our new England, and yet go without it, it is so much changed from what it was before.

And as we have seen much of this already, so who knows but we may come to see a great deal more hereafter? Since we know not what a Day may bring forth.

Secondly, Neither is this true only in Empires and Monarchies, but also in Cities and their popular Governments. Etiam summis negatum est urbibus stare din, says the Moralist. And to this purpose tends that of the Author to the Hebrews, Heb. 13.14. We have here no abiding City, but we look for one to come, whose foundation is in the heavens.

There is then no City on earth, nor any kind of Government in it that ever stood up long in one posture, none that ever was, or shall be abiding. Pass ye up to Calneh and see, says the Prophet, Annos 6.2. and from hence go to Hemath the Great, and so to Gath of the Philistines. So, pass ye up to Athens the eye of Greece for Knowledge and human Literature, and see; and from thence go to Rome, the Head of the Western Empire, and so come to Florence, the Beauty of Italy; (for I forbear to name more, Examples in this kind being almost infinite) in all which you may read this truth at large.

And first for Athens: How many changes of Governors and Governments did she endure? putting herself off from Hereditary Kings to Archons, or Aristocratical Lord's, who governed first for term of life, then decennially; and after these, to Democratical Rulers.

Next for Rome; how oft hath that City been altered by Gauls, Hunnes, Goths and Vandals?

Yea, how oft hath the Government of it been passed away from one hand to another?

It is mystically represented to us, Rev. 17.3. by the beast of seven heads, which is there interpreted by the seven Hills it is built upon, to be Rome: And according to the number of those Hills, to so many Masters did it submit itself, who had their several turns of supreme power and regiment over her, as Kings, Consuls, Dictators, Decemviri, Tribunes, Emperors, and Popes: under the last of which, I do not find that it was ever Besieged by any that took it not: such strange ebbings hath that Sea had experience of!

Last of all for Florence. It is strange to tell what various whirlings about that hath had in point of Supreme Rule and power. For at first the Nobility ruled it in an Aristocratical way. But a little after, some Grandees among the people wrested it to themselves; who being tired out with continual quarrellings one with another, (for the people were divided into three ranks) the middle sort of them took upon them the management of the State. And these also falling quickly together by the ears, the third and lowest sort became Masters of it. Which holding not long, by reason of their mutual discords, they yield themselves and the Government of their City unto Charles of France, Brother to Lewis the Ninth; who within a short time being invited to the Kingdom of Naples, and leaving only Deputies at Florence, the Florentines return to their Popular Government, and renew their Civil Wars among themselves For redress whereof, they send for the Duke of Athens, and give up all to him. But shortly they supposing themselves to be brought in bondage, and to be despoiled of their Liberty by the fear of his Guard, banish him the City, and within less than one years space shake off his Government over them. After which they come to an Aristocracy again, devising new Names and Officers for their Magistrates, and changing and rechanging them so oft, that sometimes their State was no better ordered, than if it had been committed to Mad men, or Children without discretion, the City scarce twenty years together keeping the same form of State: but as sick men in Fevers (says Bodinus) desire to be removed now hither, and by and by thither, or from one bed to another, as if the Disease were in the places where they lay, and not in the intrals of their own Bodies; so were the Florentines still turning their State, till they turned it into the hands of the Medices, who now hold it. A thing almost incredible, (says he) did not their own Recorder leave it recorded to posterity.

But in the second place let us descend to Families or Races of men that are lineally successive for Name and Greatness.

And here let me ask, where are those Illustrious Families cried up so much in former times, and famous in their Generations?

As the Couragious Family of the Maccabees in Jewry, and of the Ptolemies in Egypt.

Again, where is the Zelzuccian Family in the less Asia, and the Imperial Family of the Palaeologi in Greece?

That of the Merovignians in France?

Of the Plantagenets in England, with many more of this rank I might name, did not the narrow compass of so small a Treatise bound me?

Tell me, is not the Name and Greatness of these Families long since expired, the Roots and Branches of them quite removed, and others planted in their rooms? Examples of this sort are innumerable, as Elihu says in Job: He breaks in pieces mighty men without number; (so mighty Families without number) and sets up others in their stead.

And as for such Families as are of a lower form, we need not go far, since our own knowledge here will lead us to continual changes and alterations.

For thou hast seen it may be many Families heretofore in this Nation, brim-full of earthly happiness, and running over; and now upon thy second view of them, behold there is no such thing, but they are much altered, and running very low in the world, if not clean run out.

So that prosperity (you see) was never yet so entailed upon any Family, and the Heirs thereof, but within a little time someone or other hath cut it off.

But last of all, if we look upon particular persons, this will appear most evident; but especially if we consider them three ways. In respect of their Bodies, Minds, and Estates.

Gregory Nazianzen hath an excellent saying of the two former jointly considered, which is this; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . i. e. We are not mixed Creatures only, but also contrary both to others and ourselves: not continuing truly the same, no not so much as one day; but both in regard of our Bodies and Minds, perpetually flowing and perpetually changing.

And we can instance this in all the stages of our life, wherein by the ordinary course of Nature, we are first weak, and then strong, and after weak again. As in our Childhood, we are then weak both in Body and Mind: in our Youth, strong in Body and weak in Mind; and in our Manhood, strong in both; but in our Old age, strong in Mind and weak in Body; and in our Decrepit, weak again in both, as we were in our Childhood at the first.

But to leave this general consideration of them, and to look upon them now more distinctly and severally by themselves. And first for the change of particular Persons in regard of their Bodies.

And here it is true of them, what Seneca affirms, viz. That no man is the same today, he was yesterday: Ego ipse (says he) dum haec loquor mutari, mutatus sum. Our Bodies (says he) are like a River, which keeps nothing but the bare name that was first given it; for as touching the present individual matter, which is the watery substance of it, this is always transient, and other comes into its room: And so it is with the Body of Man, which is always receiving in new Air and Life, and venting the former. Which makes David profess of himself, that he was tossed up and down like the Locust; and Job compares Man for his bodily substance to a flower that never continues in one stay, Job 14.2. For now we are strong, and by and by weak; now beautiful, and presently deformed. A little Fit of the Feaver, Small Pox, or the like, alters us so, as if we were not the same men we were before; insomuch that we hear some speaking thus unto us,— Hen quantum mutatus ab illo! Alas, how hath this fit altered you from what you were in your health! for how are your lips grown pallid, your cheeks discolour'd, your eyes sunk into their holes, and your face quite disfigur'd! And others there be of our acquaintance that like Jobs three friends do lift up their eyes afar off, and know us not; so much are we changed in respect of our Bodies!

But Secondly, Let us consider it also in respect of men's Minds.

And here (to say nothing of a moral change, which is obvious everywhere) as on the one side we find nothing more notable Quinquennio Neronis, than the first five years of Nero's, Reign, and more excellent than his Youth: Yet afterwards, having well tasted the sweet morsel of Sovereignty, he became (says one) the most detestable Tyrant that ever was: And so also of Herod the Great, Philo says, that he Reign'd six years as a good and just Prince, presenting the Protasis of his Reign with a large Fringe of Goodness about it; (as Joaz, Amazias, and Ozias did) but as for the Catastrophe of it, that was very sad and fearful. So on the other side, we find Manasseh and Paul soaking the forepart of their Lives in Blood, being no better at first than Nero was at the last, even a piece of clay tempered with blood; yet was their end like the end of David's good man, The end of that man is peace, Psal. 37.37.

But to wave these, (whereof much might be said, did it not quite lie out of my road I am now in) and to insist only upon the changeableness that doth naturally adhere to the mind of man.

Now tell me, if anything in the world may be said to be more moveable than the mind of man.

It is a Spiritual substance, and so is always moving, (though insensibly) from one thing unto another; never resting, until at last like Noah's dove it be taken into the Heavenly Ark. S. Chrysostom therefore compares it to a Bird, which flies in a moment of time over Mountains and Hills, over Seas and Rocks, without any hindrance: for now it is upon the lowest Shrub, and presently upon the highest branch of the tallest Cedar; now upon heavenly, and within the twinkling of an eye upon earthly things; now at Dan, and in a trice at Beersheba; now at one part of the earth, and then at another: for sometimes it is soaring after Principalities and Powers, and spiritual Wickednesses in high places, as the Apostle speaks; then after Riches, and by and by after pleasures; now rejoicing, and then sorrowing; now quieted, and immediately troubled, and as soon pacified again; now hoping, and straightway fearing those hopes; now loving, and then hating what it loved before. Sic omnia mutabilitati subjacent (says St. Augustine) Thus do all things lie down under mutability! And it amazed Saint Bernard much, to consider how in the same moment of time his mind was not only diversely, but likewise contrarily affected, and as it were pulled a pieces betwixt love and hatred, joy and sorrow, fear and hope; having as many varieties of affections within him, as there were diversities of things in the world for them to light upon.

So that you see how the several Passions of our Minds do in a breath, and with the turning of a hand, steer divers ways, first looking one way, and then another, according as they are wheeled about with the motions of outward Contingencies.

But in the last place, we shall add unto the former, the great changes that particular men are subject to in regard of their outward Estates and Fortunes. For the condition of Mortals (says a Heathen man) hath its turns and returns, both of Prosperity and Adversity.

That as in a Military skirmish there be some come up to discharge, while others fall of: So is it in the World's Militia.

One there is that is raised out of the Dust to sit among Princes: whereas there is another that is flung down from the pinnacle of worldly joy and prosperity, and stated, as Job was, upon the Dunghil. And this doth the Preacher tell us, among the rest of those changes that fell under his observation, That one comes out of Prison to Reign, (as Queen Elizabeth did out of the Tower to the Throne) whereas also there is he that is born in his Kingdom, and becomes ver poor; (as our Henry the Third was, while he lived sometimes on the Churches Alms.)

God hath appointed us (saith one well) all our parts to play, and hath not in their distribution been either spare-handed to the meanest, nor yet partial to the greatest.

He gave Gaius Marius at first the part of a Carpenters Son, but afterwards the part of one that was seven times Consul. So also Agathocles the part of a Potters Son at the first, but afterwards of the King of Sicily.

So also on the other side, Darius played the part one while of the greatest Emperor, and another time of the most miserable Beggar, begging but a little water to quench the drought of Death. And Bajazet played the Grand Signior in the morning, but in the evening stood for Tamerlains footstool.

And Jane Shore, Edward the Fourths Minion, acts now as Mistress of a stately Palace, and a little after dies in a Ditch for want of a House; and (as he said of Icarus) so may we of her, That—Nomina fecit aquis, she gave Name to the place where she died, it being called from her Shore-ditch to this day.

But I forbear, since there is enough recorded for our use in the Sacred Scriptures to this purpose; where we find an example of the one in David, who says, that God took him from following the Ewes with young, and set him upon the Throne; there to feed (as he says) Jacob his people, and Israel his Inheritance. And to go lower yet, not only from the sheepfold, so he says, Psal. 113.7. and 8 verses; God takes the poor out of the Dust, and the needy out of the Dunghill, that he may set him among Princes, even with the Princes of his people. Now more vile and contemptible than the Dust we tread upon, which the least breath of wind commands any way; or than the worst of dust, which is that of the Dunghil, we cannot be; yet these are they (says the Psalmist) whom he sets among Princes, even with the Princes of his people.

An example of the other we have in Antiochus, 2 Mac. 9.9. who was so filled with Pride through the rankness of his Prosperity, that he thought he might command the Sea, (so proud was he, says the Text, beyond the condition of man) and further, that he could weigh the Mountains in a balance, and reach up to the Stars of Heaven: yet by and by is his Comb cut, all his Glory worm-eaten, and none able to endure him for the filthiness of his smell.

Add to this the example of Balthazar, Dan. 5.5. who was now carousing in the Consecrated Vessels that Nebuchadnezzar his Grandfather had plundered the Temple of, and House of God at Jerusalem, as you may see, 2 Kings chap. last. But in the same hour (says the Text) came out the hand-writing of the wall against him, and then was the Kings countenance changed, his thoughts troubled, the joints of his Loyns loosed, and his Kingdom given away to the Medes and Persians.

Thus are we for outward things like so many Counters, which stand one while for a pound, and another for a penny.

That was we see commonly in Highways, where one man hath seth his foot, another presently follows him and treads it out again; so is it usually, That if one man beat out an Honor or Estate to himself, another comes after and treads out that impression; and whose it shall be next, there is no man knows. Nay, Lucan, Ipsa vices natura subit— Even the whole course of Nature runs about in a circular motion Our Bodies, Minds, and outward felicities, whatsoever we are, or whatsoever we have, are all subject to change in such wise, that we can have no assurance of them, no not for a day. We know not what a day may bring forth.

And so much for the demonstration of this truth, viz. That there is such a Vicissitude.

The next thing is the Efficient Causes of it. For we never know anything thoroughly, (says the Philosopher) until we know the Causes of it.

Now in speaking to this, I shall proceed, 1. Negatively, 2. Affirmatively.

1. Negatively, in showing what have been thought to be the causes of all Changes and Alterations, yet are not so indeed. And here the Epicures and vulgar Heathen have thought Fortune to be the cause of them: And they define it thus to be, An Event of things without Reason.

But how unreasonable it is to say, That an Event of Things without a Cause, should be the Cause of all Events, judge ye.

For it was only the ignorance of the true Causes, that made the name of Fortune; there being nothing fortuitous in itself, but only to us and our ignorance; since the power and providence of God hath the ordering and disposing of all things here below. And this did the wiser sort among them confess, as the Satirist tells us.

Nullum, numen abest si sit prudentia, sed te

Nos facimus Fortuna Deem—

Others again, as the Stoics, make Fate or Destiny the cause of all Alterations, which they say is an Event that necessarily falls out, from a certain inevitable order and connection of Natural Causes, working without the will of God, as the Supreme Orderer and Disposer of them, he being subjected to them, and not they to him: whereby they take away the very Nature of the Godhead, which is to be a most powerful and free Agent, that works what, and by what means it pleases; all secondary causes depending upon that, and that upon none.

But enough of these: For I must remember myself, that I am now speaking to Christians, who acknowledge the Divine Providence in all things; and therefore shall speak no more of these Negative and supposed Causes, but shall now give you the true Efficient Causes of them, by way of Affirmation.

And here know, that Logicians tell us of two Efficient Causes; Principal, and less Principal: And this is twofold, Impulsive, and Instrumental.

First then, the Principal Cause of all Changes and Alterations is God: for so said the Heathen man,

—Valet ima summit

Mutare, & insignem attenuat Deus,

Obscura promens—

But why borrow I weapons from the Philistines forge, when as there is enough for this, that may be drawn out of God's Armory of the Scriptures? as Psal. 75.6, 7. Promotion, says the Prophet, comes neither from the East, nor from the West, nor from the South; but God is the Judge, he puts down one, and sets up another. So also Job 34.29. When he gives Quietness, who can make Trouble? and when he hides his face, who can behold him; whether it be done (says Elihu) against a Nation, or against a particular man only? Again, Amos 5.8. He makes the Seven Stars and Orion, and turns the shadow of Death into the morning: The Lord is his Name.

The Orator expresseth this well, by comparing God's Omnipotency to the power of the Soul over the Members of the Body, which upon the least intimation of the Mind do turn and move about with all facility. Now God (says he) is the sole Mind of the Universe, and hath all parts and parcels thereof at his beck and pleasure, to be turned into any shape or form at his disposal.

Nay, it is no dishonor for God to cast the eye of his Providence upon the alteration even of the meanest things: for who is like, says the Psalmist, to the Lord our God, who hath his dwelling on high, and yet humbles himself to behold the things in Heaven and Earth? Not only to behold the things in Heaven, which is a great condescension to him, whom the Heaven and the Heaven of Heavens cannot contain; but also the things in Earth. Now how unworthy these are of his taking notice of, you may see by those diminutive expressions of them, compared with God's greatness, Isa. 40.15. where the Prophet says, Behold, the Nations are but as the drop of a Bucket, and are counted as the small dust of the Ballance; Behold, he takes up the Isles as a very little thing. And if this be not low enough for them, he says further, v. 17. That all Nations before him are as nothing, and are counted to him as less than nothing. Now look what a wide difference there is betwixt the Sea and a Bucket of water, yea the drop of a Bucket; or betwixt a heap of dust, and the small dust of the balance; betwixt very great and very little; betwixt all things and nothing at all, yea less then nothing, (if less could be:) so vast is the disproportion betwixt God and all Nations, which are the greatest among all earthly things. And yet for all this, is God pleased so far to extenuate his own greatness, and to take off from it, as to look after them, and run them about in their several stages from one point unto another.

And if you would have this truth to be made out further unto you, our Savior doth it, Mat. 10.29. by two several instances.

The one is of two Sparrows, which are little birds and of small value; but the Greek yet runs it more diminutively, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 two little sparrows; and so they must needs be, for they were sold both even for a farthing, and this is price little enough. Yet the Arabic makes it less, and hath for it Phals, which is the least piece of money that can be; and accordingly expresses the two Mites spoken of, Mark 12.42. (which makes but one Farthing) by Phalsain in the dual number, as a late and learned Expositor notes.

The other is of the Hairs upon our Heads, being a kind of Excrement belonging to our Bodies, and no integral or necessitous part of them, (as the Heart, Hands, and Feet are;) and yet he tells us, that God numbers these, and takes such a particular account of them, that not one of them falls to the ground without his disposal.

In the vision of the Wheels we read of a wheel within a wheel. Now the wheel within is the wheel of God's Providence, that turns about the wheels of all outward things, be they never so low and mean. For as God doth not labor in doing the greatest things, so neither doth he disdain, either to do or undo the least; but as he made the small and great, (says the book of Wisdom) so also doth he care for both alike. The Potter having power over his Clay, either to make of it a vessel of honor or dishonor, and being made, either to preserve it in that form and being he hath bestowed upon it, or else to deform and destroy it, since it is equitable that everyone should do with his own as he pleases. Nay, as he says of the gnat, that Nusquam potentior natura quam in minimis; So may we say, that God doth no ways advance his Power and Wisdom more, than in ordering of the least accidents to be disposed of to his Glory, and the good of his Children. And so much for the Principal Efficient cause.

The less Principal follows; which (as I said) is either Impulsive or Instrumental.

Now the Impulsive cause of all Changes and Alterations is the sin of man. This usher'd them in at the first, and so it doth still. For before Adam sinned, he enjoyed a Paradise of constant and uninterrupted happiness: but so soon as he sins against God, then follows a great change presently: For the Earth all fruitful before, now becomes barren, himself subject to labor, his Wife to Travail and Sorrow, and both to cares and troubles, to weakness and dissolution. And so it is also with Nations and Kingdoms. If they be changed at any time, sin is the cause of it; and the greater their sin is, the greater ususually is their change. Great sinnings are the flood-gates to let in great Alterations upon them. For it is not a bare sinning in a Nation, (from which there is none that could ever plead exemption) but a sinning in some high measure, that is an in-let to Changes in the highest kind. Which made David say, Psal. 107.34. That a fruitful land is turned into barrenness for the wickedness of those that dwell therein; which the vulgar Latin reads, Propter malitiam, i. e. for the malicious wickedness of those that dwell therein; which notes a sin of a high nature, viz. such a one as is persisted in both against Knowledge and Conscience. And therefore it is a good observation which Musculus hath upon the words: These strange Alterations, says he, of Nations and Kingdoms, are not for the sinning of them, (from which no Nation can be free) but for their malicious sinning. And this you may see farther in Jerusalem, Ezek. 21. where we read of a very great Judgment that should befall her from the Babylonian, viz. Utter Destruction, expressed by the threefold Overturn wherewith God threatens her, v. 27. And v. 24. he lays down the Impulsive cause that moved him to it; and this is an impudent and shameless sinning against God: for they did not commit their sin in a corner, as those that were ashamed of it, but (brazenfaced Wretches as they were) they declared their sin as Sodom, and discovered it openly in the face of the Sun: and this they did too, not only in one or two particular acts, but generally, says the Text, in all their doings.

Now there is some hope of a modest and bashful, but none at all of a shameless and obdurate sinner. Thus the Father, when his Son hath done amiss, yet is he well persuaded of his amendment, if he but see him blush upon his reproving of him. But when like Judah, he hath once a Whores forehead, and refuses to be ashamed, then doth he give him over as a lost Child, and not to be recovered.

So that from hence we see, that in what place soever we find such a Turn, such an Eversion as this, where all is turned upside down) there hath been without question some great Aversio a Creatore ad Creaturam, some great sinning against God (as the Schoolmen call it.) Which was the reason that when the English were (now upon their quitting of France, in Henry the Sixth's days) demanded of the French by way of derision, when they would make their return thither; it was feelingly answered by one of our Nation thus, When your sins are greater than ours.

It is sin then that ruins particular persons, that subverts Families, that periods Kingdoms, that wheels about Governments, that overturns States, that disjoyns Common-weals, and says unto them as to the proud waves, Thus far ye shall go, and no farther.

And so I have done with the Impulsive Cause, and come next to the Instrumental causes or means which God uses in effecting his Changes here; and they are two.

The first is the Motion and Influences of the Celestial Bodies.

And this will the better appear, if we consider their forcible workings upon the Mind of man. For though they cannot work immediately upon it, because it is immaterial; yet may they, and do work mediately upon it, as by the Body, which is the Instrument of the Soul to work by, and the Case wherein it is put up here for a time; and so make it either well or ill affected, according to the Bodies present temper. By which means it comes to pass many times, that not only the dispositions of particular men, but also of whole multitudes collected together in a Politick Body, are much altered and changed, either to labor or Sloth, to Peace or Disquiet, to good or evil actings, according as they are inclined by the Motions of the Heavenly Bodies.

And that these Celestial Bodies have their energy upon all Sublunary things, is plain,

First, by Scripture; as Job 38.33. where the Lord speaks thus to Job, Know'st thou the Ordinances of Heaven? and canst thou set the dominion thereof in the Earth? which implies,

1. That the Heavens have power and dominion in the Earth.

2. That this power of theirs is set them from God's ordinance and appointment.

Secondly, by the constant Observation and Experience of all Ages. Bodinus the French Lawyer speaks well to this point; Many err (says he) greatly, who think the influence of the Celestial Spheres to be nothing, when as their strength hath ever been most effectual, as in Sacred Writ is to be seen: and he cites the 38. chap. of Job before-mentioned to prove the same. Adding further, That many ancient Writers have noted the great Changes in Cities and Kingdoms upon the conjunction of the Superior Planets, but to them only where they have been deputed of God to that end and purpose. And that they have been instrumental towards the working of such effects, he shows by an induction of some particular instances: As, that before the translation of the Roman Sovereignty unto Caesar, there was a great Conjunction of the Superior Planets met together in Scorpio: which fell out again seven hundred years after, when the Arabian Legions received the Law of Mahomet, rebel'd against the Greek Emperors, and subdued the Eastern Asia from the Christians.

The same also came about again, Anno Christi 1464. after which Ladamachus, King of the Tartars, was by his Subjects thrust out of the Chair of Sovereignty; and Frederick the Third driven out of Hungary by Matthias Corvinus, who from a Prisoner stepped up to the Royal Throne, &c.

And Alstedius tells us, that the Conjunction of Saturn and Jupiter in February, 1642. did foretell and portend the revolution of some new Empire and Government to fall out after it in Europe. The effect whereof in part (it's like) we have seen in this Nation already, and may live (if God so dispose of us) to see further of it yet in time to come.

But to pass this, and to come to that daily and usual course of God's proceedings with us in the world. Here methinks there should be few, (though of ordinary capacities among us) but (if we be a little observing) may see this truth made good by the eye of our own experience, which tells us, that the Earth is either Fruitful or Barren, and the Air either Wholsome or Infectious, suitably to that measure and manner of influence they receive from them.

And therefore when God will at any time bring about some great change in the world, it is then easy to see how usually he fits his inferior means, according to their several natures, for the orderly transacting of it in those stations wherein he hath set them. As, when he will turn a fruitful Land into barrenness, and again, a barren Land into fruitfulness, (which he promise'd his own people, Hos. 2.21.) there he tells them in what order he will work it: I will hear (says he) the Heavens, and they shall hear the Earth, and they shall hear Jezreel. For this is a sure rule, That the Supreme Cause of all doth not take away the natures and workings of Secondary Causes, but rather establish them: which is the reason of that Speech of God to Job, in the ordinary revolution of the times and seasons of the year, Job 38.31. Canst thou bind the sweet influences of the Pleiades, and loose the bonds of Orion?

Now the Pleiades are those we commonly call the Seven Stars, that have their influence on the earth, by producing sweet showers to the opening and refreshing of it, about the Spring of the year; and Orion is a Constellation most conspicuous in the Winter-season, as having a commissary power to bind up the earth with Frosts. Again, canst thou bring forth Mazzaroth in his season, (i.e. the twelve Signs successively after one another) or guide Arcturus with his Sons? (i. e. the Polar Star, as some will have it, with those ignes minores that wait upon him; or Bootes, as others.) It is not then so much the Earth, as the Heavens that give us either fruit, or withhold it; they being the first ordinary means, whereby God uses to work out alterations in sublunary things.

The second Instrumental cause of these strange Vicissitudes here below, is the Will of Man: for though it have not a liberty to Spiritual, yet all grant it a liberty to external acts, and moral goodness. And this Liberty of Mans Will, doth God use as an under-wheel to turn about most of those Alterations that are in the world.

It is true, that Health and Sickness, Peace and War, Plenty and Scarcity, Riches and Poverty, proceed from God as the principal Efficient cause; but yet for all this we deny not but that God makes use both of ourselves and others, as to the means of bringing them about. The life of Joseph was checquer'd with variety of accidents: for he is now a Slave to the Ishmaelites, and by and by a Prince in Egypt. Now these although they proceeded from God as the Author, yet was the will of his Brethren, as the will of Reuben and Judah, the instruments of preserving his life, and the wills of his other Brethren the means of selling him into Egypt.

Now because it is the Nature of Instruments to be subservient to the principal Agent, and to be determined by it; therefore give me leave here by the way to fasten this exhortation upon you, That in all Changes whatsoever you will look beyond the Instruments of them, unto God the Principal Agent. For so did Job in his losses, beyond the plundering Chaldeans and Sabaeans, unto Dominus abstulit, The Lord hath given, and the Lord hath taken away; looking upon them as we use to do upon an Index, tantum in ordine ad Librum, only in order to the Book itself, Et in transitu ad Deum, in his passage unto God, who sets them a work, as to their natural powers and faculties, though to the evil of them no otherwise, than by ordering and over-ruling it to the good of his Children. And hence it is, that the wicked are called God's Sword, as in the 17 Psalms, v. 13. Deliver my Soul (says David) from the wicked which is thy sword. And so must we in all those Losses that befall us here, have in our eye not so much the Sword, as the Hand that holds it: which will be one means, and a good one too, to bring us to David's calm temper in the 39 Psalms. 19. who says in the like condition, That he was dumb, and did not open his mouth, nor let fall an impatient word in it, because it was God's doing: And therefore when Abishai would have taken away Shimei's life for cursing of David, No, (says he) Let him alone, Iussit enim Dominus, for the Lord hath bidden him curse; who then shall say, Wherefore hast thou done so? q. d. Who then dare expostulate with God, or call him to account about it, as if he were unrighteous in it; since evil men are but Swords in God's hand, who, when he hath once done his work by them, will either put them up again into his Scabbard, and lay them by, or else so blunt the edge of their power, that it shall not cut, or else break them a pieces, and throw them quite away? And so much for the Efficient Causes of Vicissitudes.

Next I shall speak to the Ends, or Final Causes of them.

And these are either Ex parte Dei, or Nostri; in respect of God, or ourselves.

First, in respect of God; and so the Principal End why God rings such Changes upon all earthly things, and will have them disposed of after so various a manner, is to make them by it the more tunable to his own Glory, which by this means is exceedingly magnified and advanced: but especially in the Attributes of his Power, Truth, Wisdom, and Goodness.

1. In his Power and Omnipotency: that so he may let the world know, that the Finger of his Power is in all Transactions; and that he can do whatsoever he will, both in Heaven and Earth, and yet changes not.

For why else did God work so many miraculous Changes in Egypt by the hand of Moses?

Why turned he Moses Rod into a Serpent, and the Egyptian waters into Blood?

Why their Dust into Lice and Flies, and their Light into Darkness for the space of three days together?

Why else Created he a new generation of Frogs and Locusts among them?

Why unheard-of Diseases upon themselves, and upon their Cattel?

Why destroyed he their Herbs and Fruit-trees with Hail, and their first-born with untimely death?

In a word, Why caused he the Redsea to go out of its natural course and channel, whereby it became a wall to the Israelites, and a grave to the Egyptians?

Did not God all this to make known the glory of his power, in the preservation of the one and destruction of the other? Yes; For this cause (says God to Moses) I have raised thee up, to show in thee my power, and that my Name may be declared in all the earth.

2. He advances also his Glory this way, by manifesting his Truth and Faithfulness: in that those things which are accidental in regard of us, and seem as impossible, yet are they exactly brought to pass in their due times and seasons. As in the bringing of the Israelites out of Egypt, wherein God was full as good as his word, and kept touch with them to a day in their Deliverance, as you may see, Exod. 12.41. where we read, That it came to pass in the end of four hundred and thirty years, even the self-same day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out of the land of Egypt. All Pharaoh's oppositions and tergiversations could not prorogue their Bondage so much as one day beyond the time prefixed of God, but served only to fill up that Interim, or void space of time betwixt God's Promise made to Abraham and his performance of it.

And if you ask by what intervals of time the truth of his promise came about so punctually, Divines will tell you, That from Abraham's receiving of the promise, unto the birth of Isaac, were five and twenty years; sixty from thence to Jacob's birth; and to his death (which fell out presently upon their entrance into Egypt) a hundred and thirty years. After which unto the death of Levi, who was Vltimus Patriarcharum, the last of the Patriarchs that survived, and in which space the Israelites were kindly entreated for Joseph's sake, were ninety four years; and a hundred and one and twenty more of cruel Bondage, until Moses came to deliver them from it in the Reign of Pharaoh Cencres.

All which particulars being gathered up together, do make up the complete sum of four hundred and thirty years, and may serve to justify God in all his sayings, and to clear his Truth in the least circumstance and punctilio of time, when it shall come to be judged.

For when once God's appointed time is come to introduce a change, either for better or worse, among any people, then shall every breath of wind, how cross soever it seems to blow at the present, yet be so far from hindering God's work in it, as that one way or other you shall find it in the sequel, to contribute its help and assistance to it.

3. God advances also his Glory this way, in the manifestation of his Wisdom and Goodness; in that he makes a sweet harmony of so many different cords and changes, and frames a most admirable Order out of a seeming Disorder and Confusion.

Many and divers are the qualities of Herbs, yet if a skilful Simpler hath the mixing of them, he knows how to make of them a well-relish'd and wholesome Sallade: So, many were the interchangeable passages that happened to Joseph; and had we the same, it may be we should think them very confused ones; but yet let the Wisdom and Goodness of God but lay them together, and we shall presently find, as Joseph did, the close of them all in a sweet Diapason.

For though all things, as to us, are floating up and down, to and again, by chance as it were and accident; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, says Gregory Nazianzen; yet if we look to the order and appointment of God's Providence, (which doth always most wisely contrive all events for the good of his Children) they are fixed and stable, howbeit they may seem to go contrary at the present.

And of God's dealing in this kind we have Job an eminent example; who is today the greatest man for Wealth and Honor in all the East, (and a Tablet of this is Greatness you may see in his 29 Chapter, which I desire you to read over at your leisure) wherein you shall find a whole series of worldly prosperity to wait upon him;) yet tomorrow he is poor, even to a by-word and proverb, As poor as Job: insomuch as he spends all the next Chapter in bemoaning his sudden change, beginning it with a But; which though a small Monosyllable, yet as the Helm of a Ship turns about the Vessel any way, so doth this But turn about Job, and all his former Honor and Prosperity, into the extremest contempt and adversity. But now, says he, they that are younger than I have me in derision, whose fathers I would have disdained to have set with the dogs of my Flock; and ending it with this doleful accent, verse last, versa est cithara mea in luctum, & organum in vocem flentium; My harp is turned into mourning, and my organ into the voice of those that weep.

Yet all is well (we say) that ends well; and so it was with Job, which makes Saint James say, by way of support unto God's people in their afflictions, Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord; i. e. what good end God gave him in it; for the next day God brings a great deal of Light out of this Darkness, by a wise and gracious disposing of all that evil to him for the best, in giving him twice as much as he had at the first, and blessing his later end more than his beginning.

So that although for a time all those sad Changes that befell Job, seemed even to cross the ordinary course of God's care and Providence to him; yet in the conclusion you see how his Wisdom and Goodness cut them all out, and made them serve to his greater Honor and Abundance.

And so much for the Ends or Final Causes in respect of God.

They follow now in respect of ourselves.

And these are two: first to confirm our Faith; secondly to reform our Lives, and to work out by them good to his servants.

First, to confirm our Faith.

And so God brings many times great Changes into the world, to try, if amidst those shakings of outward things among us, we will be shaken in our Faith, or not. That as the Apostle speaks of Heresies, 1 Cor. 11.19. Oportet esse Heresies, There must be Heresies among you, that they which are approved may be made manifest; so say I, Opertat esse mutationes, There must be Changes: and these not so much in respect of the things themselves, which are in their own natures liable to alteration and dissolution; as in respect of God's end in it, that they which are approved and sincere in the Faith, may be manifested to be so, by their constancy and perseverance in it. That as there is a necessity of Fire to try Gold, whether it be true or else counterfeit; so also is there a necessity of Changes: for by these it will appear, whether we will measure our Religion by outward things, and in the loss or enjoyment of them be lost in our Protestant Faith, yea or no.

There is nothing, Beloved, more discovers the Hypocrite than his Ingenium versatile, (as Livy said of Cato) than his turning humor in Religion: for which I do not say he shall be plagued in Hell, by being wheeled about there continually without any relaxation, (though that may seem a punishment somewhat suitable to his Weathercock-disposition here upon earth;) no, Hoc nimis Ethnicum, This is too heathenish: but rather with the Prophet David, That he shall turn into Hell with all those that forget God, which is that portion of Hypocrites mentioned by our Savior, Matth. 24. last.

For if an Apple be rotten at the coare, it will not hold long upon the Tree, but upon the least Wind will fall from it. And so it is with the rotten-hearted Hypocrite; if a little cross wind do but blow upon him, oh how soon doth he fall off from the Tree of Life, and become a wind-fall in his Religion, for the Devil that old Serpent to prey upon!

Every Cock-boat (you know) will bear up well enough in a calm sea: but that is a stout Vessel that can live in the most troubled water. And too too many there were in the Primitive times, that like Dr. Pendleton in Queen Mary's days, boasted much of their Constancy in the Orthodox Faith during Constantine's days, so long as God hedge'd about his Vineyard with Peace and Prosperity; but so soon as that Hedge was broken down, and erroneous, yea

Heretical Doctrines were let in like so many Beasts of prey to devour, then how quickly did these prove Turncoats, and Apostates from the Faith!

But as for the true Christian, he is like a Rock,—Mediis immotus in undis; That although the waves are always swelling against him, yet is he the same man still in his Reformed Religion, and wavers not: or else like that House built upon the Rock, against which the Floods came, and the Winds blew, but it fell not, because it was built upon a Rock.

And such a well-built house was St. Basil, who being threatened with death by Valens, if he would not advise further and turn Arian, answered with this brave resolution, I need not any further advice than I have taken already about this matter; for tomorrow I shall be the same man that I am today therein, and no other.

And here know that some things are of Necessity, wherein we cannot but change, as in natural, civil, and moral things; and to change in there is only human.

Others again are of Duty: and these either prohibited, or enjoin'd.

1. Prohibited, as in evil and erroneous things: and to change here is pious and divine; and not to change, either Weakness or Obstinacy.

2. Enjoin'd, as in sacred and religious: and to change here is impious and Diabolical; and not to change, true Christian Fortitude and Constancy.

Whatsoever things we see then wheeling about in the world, as Governments, Families and the like; nay, howsoever we may change ourselves or be changed in some things of an indifferent nature, by those that have dominion over our Bodies and Estates; yet is there no man that hath dominion over our Faith: But this is God's peculiar, and therefore in this we must not change.

It is not with saving Truths as it is with Clothes, which alter every year as the fashion doth: for the fashion of the world passes away (says St. John;) but true Religion is ever in fashion with good men, and alters not.

And herein we may justly take occasion to bewail the unsteadiness of some in these times, who are mere Skeptics in Religion, always conceiving some new Opinions in it, and always in pain till they be delivered of their new conceptions, though never so monstrous and deformed.

That which was truth with them yesterday, is no such thing today; and what is so today, is otherwise tomorrow; such Changelings there be in this last Age, who like the Moon do never appear the same two days together! And I would to God, (says St. Ambrose,) that their change were no worse than that of the Moon; for she returns again within a little time to her full light, but these never.

And he is blind that sees not this among us, (namely) how some turn every day to Popish Superstition, but more to Anabaptistical Fancies; some unto Socinian Blasphemies, but most unto Atheistical Notions, and all into Sensuality; this being the common Sewer into which all the former run, and are ultimately resolved.

But as St. Paul said to his Galatians, so do I to such, O foolish Galatians, who hath bewithc'd you that you should not obey the Gospel? And it is a metaphor, says one, from Sorcerers, who use to cast a mist before the people's eyes, that so they may not take a right view of what is presented to them: As if he had said, Who hath cast a mist before the eyes of your understandings, to make that appear unto you for truth which indeed is not? What? Are ye so foolish, that having begun in the Spirit, ye will be perfected in the Flesh? So, Are ye so foolish, that having begun in truth, ye will end in falsehood? or can ye be so simple, as to exchange Gold for Dirt, Wheat for Chaff, and your precious Faith, as St. Peter calls it, which is the substance of things hoped for, for Errors of all sorts, and mere shadows of Truth? I trow not. For if Error (as our Kingly Divine said well) have any advantage, it consists in Novelty: or if Truth any, it consists in Constancy.

Was the Doctrine then of the Reformed Churches, and the Harmony of our Confessions grounded upon evident and pregnant Scriptures, maintained by the Orthodox and Primitive Fathers, and conveyed to us by the constant tradition of the Universal Church, the Faith of Christ once delivered to the Saints, and the Truth of God yesterday? why, so it is today, and will be tomorrow also. And therefore today in our profession of it we must be as yesterday, and tomorrow as this day: because as God is the same yesterday, today, and forever; so also is the Truth of God, That which was once so, will be so always, and cannot be otherwise.

Oh that we would then be exhorted in the Apostles words, To stand fast in the Faith, to quit ourselves like men, and be strong: and not to be as children, tossed to and fro, and carried about with every wind of Doctrine; but to be as men in understanding, steadfast and immovable; that so God may have cause to glory on our behalf, as he did on Jobs, Hast thou considered (says God to Satan) my servant Job? So, hast thou considered such a servant of mine? Seest thou to how many changes I have subjected him? to changes in his Children, to changes in his Estate, to changes in his Liberty, to changes in his Friends and Acquaintance? Nay, seest thou how many of his Brethren are changed of late, from a febrish distemper before, now into a sleepy Lethargy? Seest thou how indifferent they are for their Religion round about him, and how many shaken reeds there are on every side of him? And yet for all this, as my servant Job did, so doth he still hold his integrity. But enough of this.

Secondly, God's end also in it is, To reform our Lives, and do us good by his so various dispensations towards us Hence we read, Isa. 30.28. of a sieve of vanity, wherein God says, he will sift the Nations, and shake them to and fro one after another, that so he may winnow them from that chaff of sin that is within them. For why was Moab at ease from his youth? why settled he upon his lees, and held still his corrupt taste? but because he was never disquieted, nor emptied from vessel to vessel, Ier. 48.11. Thus a sedentary life we find very subject to Diseases; and a long standing Prosperity to a Nation, is like a standing Pool, whose water doth soon puddle and putrefy. And this is the reason of that speech of David, Psal. 55.19. Because they have no Changes therefore they fear not God; making by it the uncheckt prosperity of worldly men, a great occasion of their continuance in sin, and so an Index of God's Wrath upon them, rather than of his special Favor to them.

And therefore now we have seen the Angel of God moving the waters of this Church and State by Intestine War, new Opinions in Religion, by Sects, divisions, and the like; it will be good for us to meditate, how God hereby intends to purge us from that sinful filth that adheres to us, as our disrespect to God's Ministers, and contempt of his Word, our Cruelty and Oppression, our Pride and Security, our Worldly-mindedness, and Hypocrisy.

Indeed men, who are the instruments of them, may have other ends in such Alterations, as to wreak their own spleen upon their Adversaries, to unhorse others, and get themselves into the Saddle either of Profit or Preferment; (That as Demitrius the Silversmith said, We get our gains by this means; so say they, We get our Honors and Estates by these means, for if the waters had not been troubled, we had caught nothing;) or else to satisfy their own corrupt wills and pleasures; as the Author to the Hebrews says of earthly parents, That they chasten their children after their own pleasure, but God who is the Supreme Agent, he doth it for our profit, and not his own; there being no ends of gold and silver, no mere will or revenge in his end, but only our profit, and to take away the dross from the silver, that so he may bring forth (to use Solomon's expression) a Vas electum a chosen Vessel, as St. Paul was, and fit for the Finer.

Thus the Scripture tells us of Joseph, how he was passed over from his brethren to the Ishmaelites, and from them to Potiphar; and his Brethren had one end in it, but God another: for they did it for evil against him, (as he tells them himself) and to get twenty Pieces by the sale of him; but as for God, he meant it to him for good, and to save much people alive.

And so also was Christ the Antitype of Joseph, thrust (as we say) from post to pillar, viz. from Judas to Caiaphas, from him to Pilate, from Pilate to Herod, from Herod back again to Pilate, and then into the hands of the clamorous and unreasonable multitude to be crucified; and Judas had one end in Christ's death, but God another. The end of Judas in it was to silver his bag with thirty pieces, but God's end was to satisfy his own Justice, and to save Mankind by it.

So that let men's sinful ends in these Changes and Alterations be what they will, yet is God's end in it the gaining of glory to himself, by his taking away that sin and corruption which he sees contracted in us by a long standing security. And if these changes of his be not as a gentle fire to purify us, they shall be as a consuming fire to destroy us.

And so much for the Efficient and Final causes of Vicissitudes.

The Uses follow; and they are three.

First, To take us off from our greedy desire of worldly things.

Secondly, To unpride us in a prosperous condition.

Thirdly, To comfort and support us in an afflicted one.

And to this purpose there is a good saying of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus, the best of all the Heathen Emperors, which is this:

Meditate (says he) with thyself how swiftly all things that subsist are carried away: for both the substances themselves are in a continual flux, and all actions in a perpetual change; yea the causes of them also, subject to a thousand alterations, neither is there anything that can be said to be settled or at a stand.

And from hence he draws this inference: Art thou not then unwise, who for these things art either distracted with cares, puffed up too much with pride, or dejected with troubles?

And it may put many of us Christians to the blush, who seldom make so good use of it as this Heathen did, though we have a far clearer light than he had to guide us to it.

First then, the consideration of this point, viz. The great Vicissitude and Inconstancy of all earthly things, may serve to wean our hearts from the pleasing teat of this world, and to raise them up to that place where only fixed good is found.

Here we are all too apt with the rich fool to set down our rests, when (God knows) we have little or no cause so to do. Nescis enim, ah nescis serus quid vesper ferat; Since we do not know what the midwifery of this evening, nay less, of this hour or moment may help to bring forth.

It may be a change of our Estates into Beggary, by Fire, Thieves, and the like; or else of our Liberty into Thralldome, or of our Health into Sickness; all these successively wheeling about, until at last our great change come from Life to Death, and swallow up the rest, as the sea doth the waters that fall into it.

Alas! here we are subject to a thousand casualties; but in Heaven, there, there we shall meet with no such alterations; for that is a Kingdom that cannot be shaken as earthly Kingdoms are, either by War, Factions, all-eating time, or the like. No, but there is Peace without War, Quiet without Trouble, Freedom without Thralldome, Day without Night, Health without Sickness, and Life without Death: whereas here it is far otherwise; for God takes away one it may be, with a Feaver, another with the Sword, as Saint Augustine reckons them up. Nay, he cuts off the spirits of Princes (says the Psalmist;) which Junius and Tremellius Translate by Vindemiat, i.e. he slips them off as a Vintager doth a Bunch of Grapes from a Tree, it is so quickly done. Even the highest enterpizes that the greatest Magnifico's of the earth undertake, God doth but blow upon them a little with the breath of his displeasure, and how soon are they blasted and shrink away to nothing!

An example of this we have in Xerxes, who went against Greece with a Million of men, and as many Ships as covered the Hellespont; as if he would have subdued the Sea, have put a hook into her jaws, and have led her away in triumph: yet how soon was his overbold pride dashed in pieces by a handful of Greeks! One and the same day saw him both happy and miserable; using him as a tender and indulgent Mother in the morning, but in the evening as a cruel and hard Stepdame.

Oh the folly then of those that lie always sucking at these earthly flowers, which are as various in their shapes, as ever Proteus was, and constant in nothing save in their inconstancy!

It was the saying of Maximilian the Second, That every year of our life was a Climacterical year, and brought with it some great change or other.

And if every year be so changeable, what fools then are they that join land to land, and house to house, that they may dwell alone in the earth! yea what mean great men to pride it so much in their Babels here below, and out of a greedy desire of gain to run out of their own Channels, and to call their Lands by their own names? For they that do thus, declare plainly that they think themselves to enjoy a settled estate here on earth, as if they should never see a change, or at least did not for the present look for in Heaven a better and more enduring substance, as the Author to the Hebrews speaks, Heb. 12.34.

And yet as the Prophet Isaiah complains, so may we, Quis credit auditui nostro? who hath believed our report? or to whom is this truth of God revealed? For it is strange to see how few among us do believe this, that both in our persons and estates we are so changeable.

But this is their way, says David, this is their foolishness.

For how soon did Galba start aside from the Empire. Degustans Imperium, tasting it only as Jonathan did the Honey with the end of his Spear! How soon was Haman changed from the Minion of the Court, to be the hang-by of the world!

Again, how soon was Nebuchadnezzar changed, even from a Man to a Beast: and Herod from the highest of Men, to be Meat even for the lowest of Reptiles?

And the prosperity of Richard the Third was so short (says our incomparable Historian) that it took end ere himself could well look over it.

There is not anything then that we can call constant here on earth; which makes the Author to the Hebrews, speaking of Abraham, say, That he looked for a City having foundations: Upon which one gives us this Note; That the Heavenly City can only be said to have properly a Foundation, whereas those Cities that are on earth, do show plainly by their daily ruins, that they have no sure foundation to rest upon.

Oh let this be a means to take off the wheels of our Affections from their eager pursuit after earthly things, and set them upon things above, where the moth cannot come at them, nor thieves break through to steal. And let us look to that charge of the Apostle, 1 Tim. 6.17. Charge those that are rich in the world, that they trust not in uncertain Riches; or rather in Riches which are Uncertainty itself in the abstract; (for so the Greek runs it; 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 i.e. in the uncertainty of Riches.) And that we may in no wise doubt of this their uncertainty, the Wise man prefixes a note of certainty before this uncertainty, Certainly (says he) Riches make themselves wings, and fly away as an Eagle towards Heaven: as if he should have said, Certainly Riches and all worldly things are as uncertain as a Bird that is upon the wing: and therefore we must not set our hearts upon them; but our daily prayer and practice must be, So to pass through things temporal, that so we do not loose those things that are eternal: or else with David, let us beseech God to incline our hearts unto his Testimonies, and not to Covetousness. Now this inclining our hearts unto God's Testimonies, is nothing else but that holy and penitential change of Heart and Life, or else that turning unto God with all our hearts, which God calls for at our hands, and expects from us in all his changes, whether personal or else National; which if he find in us, then let what changes soever fall, they shall all work together for our good: but if not, we must then look to be as a rolling stone, and to have our daily turns and changes in this life from one degree of misery to another, until at last we turn into Hell, as David speaks, with all those that forget God.

Secondly, The consideration of this point may be a good antidote against Pride in a prosperous Condition, since God hath so ordered the Web of our Lives, as that Adversity as well as Prosperity is interwoven in it: For there is nothing that swells us up so much, as prospering here in worldly things; and nothing again that is more effectual to assuage this swelling in us, than to consider the brevity and mutability it is subject to.

Now it swells us up with a high opinion either of our own Goodness above others, or else of our own Greatness.

1. Our prospering in worldly things swells us up with a high opinion of our own Goodness above others; as

1. It makes us think ourselves the only good men in God's eye, because we are prosperous in the worlds; whereas indeed, this can be no certain rule to measure out any such thing by, since the world and the prosperity of it is so variable and uncertain.

And therefore, when at any time God shall water us more than others with the lower springs of his earthly Blessings, we are not therefore to have an overweening conceit of ourselves, and our own causes, above others, (as if God upon this ground had tied his special love either to us or them:) For you know that when God would choose a King for Israel, he chose him not by outward and perishing excellencies, for then he would have chosen in the room of Saul, Eliab, Aminadab, or Shammah, who were the three elder brothers of David, and men of goodly personages to look upon; yet God chose none of these, (says the Text) but David the youngest of them, though not so outwardly, yet inwardly glorious, being a man after his own heart.

It is the chief Argument the Turks use at this day, to prove themselves the only Musselmen, or true believers; We thrive (say they) and prosper in the world: for how hath our Mohammedanism over-run all Asia, Africa, and the greater part of Europe too! And do not they among us then reason more like Turks than Christians, who speak after this manner, Come, see how we bear down all before us, and ride upon the backs of the poor in triumph! Thus and thus do we prosper in the world, and do even what we list; and is not this an evident sign we are God's Children, and that the right end of the staff is ours? Sure, if we were other than God's peculiar people, he would not bless us so much as he doth.

But to these I answer, That these and such like are only Bona Scabelli, (as Divines distinguish well out of that place of Isaiah) and not Bona Throni, the Goods of God's Footstool, (but earthen ware) and not the good things of his Throne, which are Grace and Glory; & therefore can set upon us only an earthly mark for men here to take notice of us, but not any heavenly cognizance for God to look upon us, as upon his dear and elect Children. For else it would easily follow, That the Alchoran were better than the Bible, and the Turks fancy better than our Faith of Christianity.

And were there no other signal place of Scripture for this, than that of the Prophet David in his 73. Psalm, (as indeed there are very many) this alone (methinks) were enough to impress this as a truth upon us, where he speaks of some that are not in trouble like other men, but pride compasseth them about as a chain, violence covers them as a garment, their eyes stand out with fatness, and they have more than their heart can wish; yet these (says he) v. 12. are the ungodly who prosper in the world. And the Prophet Jeremy makes bold to question with God about it, in these words, Jer. 12.1, 2. Wherefore, says he, doth the wicked prosper? and why are all they in wealth that rebelliously transgress? and he rests satisfied with this, verse 3. That God did by that prosperity of theirs fatten them as sheep to the slaughter, and prepare them for the day of destruction. And this is that prosperity of fools that the Wise man speaks of, which will destroy them, Prov. 1.32.

It is not then our thriving in Temporals, but in Spirituall, that speaks us and our Faith to be accepted of God.

For the truth of Grace or Religion, and the goodness of a man's Cause, is not measured by the Soldiers Sword, but by the Word of God, which is the Sword of the Spirit.

God Saints no man for his goodly Personage, for his Riches, for his politick head-piece of contriving, and bringing about his own worldly and sinister ends, or for his Arms and Conquests; for then Saul and Croesus Ahithophel and Alexander the Great had been high in God's book: but he values Men only by their Spirituall, as their graces of Faith, Humility, Patience, Meekness, Obedience, and the like: and where he finds these, (how unfurnished soever they are otherwise) yet these are mine, saith the Lord; and in that day when I shall make up my Jewels, I will spare them, even as a Father doth his Son; and then shall ye discern between the righteous and the wicked, betwixt him that feareth God, and him that feareth him not.

Indeed God may sometimes permit evil to prosper in the world, but never approve of it: for so acknowledges the Jewish Church, Lament. 3.35. To turn aside the right of a man before the face of the most High, or to subvert a man in his cause, the Lord approves it not. And therefore to argue from God's permission to his approbation, is a gross Non sequitur, nay more, a laying our iniquity on God's back, as if he would take it well at our hands to be made a Packhorse at every turn to bear all our execrable burdens, and were (as David speaks) such a one as ourselves, to favor evil courses, or else to own them as his offspring.

Which made Dionysius the elder conclude Sacrilege to be no sin, when he had robbed the Temple at Locri, because the God's seemed (as it were) to smile upon the action, in giving them fair Winds and Weather, both in their voyage thither and return back again.

But, as it was a great Blasphemy (says one) for the Devil to personate God, when he would be similis Altissimo; so is it greater to make God personate the Devil. And yet this he doth, that makes God patronize his evil, because he prospers in it; for this brings in God saying, That he will be like the Prince of Darkness, and makes the Holy Ghost to leave his Dove-like shape, and come only to us in the form of a greedy Raven or Vultur.

2. As our prospering in worldly things swells us up too high with an opinion of our own Goodness, and makes us think better of ourselves than is meet; so also doth it on the other side lift us up too far with thoughts of evil towards our brethren, and make us think worse of them, and the ways of God they walk in, than we should, by charging them as utterly deserted of God, because we see not now the same hedge of God's favor about them as heretofore we did, but the stakes that then prop'd them up, are now thrown away as useless and unserviceable. Whereas Afflictions on this hand are every way as temporary and transient, as Prosperity was on the other; and being so, must needs be as a broken reed, or a reed of Egypt, wherewith we cannot exactly measure God's Temple, nor the Spiritual estate of his Children.

It was a hard stumbling-block to the Prophet David for a time, when he says that his feet were almost gone, and his footsteps had well-nigh slipped, upon his sight of the wicked's prosperity; until he went into the Sanctuary of God's Word, where he learnt to settle his wavering and distrustful thoughts: for there he saw, that notwithstanding his outward afflictions, that God held him up under that sore temptation with his right hand, and would (in opposition to transitory goods, which are the proper blessings of the wicked, because they have no others but these to trust unto) guide him with that which should infinitely exceed them, to wit, his Counsel here, and his Glory hereafter.

And it was the great question so much agitated betwixt Job and his Friends, Whether those doleful changes that befell him were the cognizance of his insincerity to God, and of God's disfavour to him upon it, yea or no. His Friends taking advantage upon his present weakness and distemper, maintain it strongly against him in the affirmative, that they were: until at length God himself steps in to the rescue of the weaker side, and makes the conclusion (as all Logical conclusions do) to follow the weaker part, determining it for Job against his Opponents in the Negative, and telling them, that they spake not of Job, nor of his proceedings towards him that which was right, Job last, verse 7.

Seneca a Stoic Philosopher, hath a set discourse to this purpose, Cur bonis viris mala eveniant, why the evils of this life most commonly fall out to good men: and he concludes it thus, That temporal evils are no sign of God's hatred to them. For, dost thou think (says he) that the Lacedemonians hated their Children, when as they experimented their disposition to virtue by stripes in public? No. So, do we think God's Children in disfavour with him, because he lays here sore blows upon their Bodies and Estates by evil men, as his rods and scourges in it? No; for we see and feel many times (says an experimental patient of our own well) the deep lines and strokes of God's hand upon us, when as we cannot by our skill in Palmestry decipher his meaning in it, no more than the Malteses could by the viper upon Saint Paul's hand judge of his condition to Godward.

For God sometimes (that we may not thus judge) inverts human order, and runs out his dealings towards us in the ordinary channel of his universal Providence, Justice and Equity, by which he waters here all alike.

Indeed they may seem (I grant) to go counter to our apprehended rules of common right: yet are they always agreeing both with God's secret and revealed will, though (like the Sun in its sphere) not perceptible to us, because too mysterious and dazzling: however, many pretend to interpret them by a blaze of fire lighted at the natural pride of their own private spirits, and that dim twilight of knowledge which is in them; when as they are altogether in the dark to the true light of God's word and works herein.

And here take in the opinion also of Epictetus another Stoic and Heathen man, which speaks most Christianly to this point, namely, That all are not hated of God, who do wrestle here with variety of Miseries: but that there are with God good causes of it, though so secret that few can reach them.

And therefore, albeit we cannot see how these actings of God may stand with his tender love to his children, and so may conceive an ill opinion of them; yet when we shall think seriously, that God's thoughts and ways are not as ours, it will teach us to give them a more favorable interpretation.

For how dare human rashness (says Saint Bernard) reprehend that which it cannot comprehend; in giving demonstrative reason why worldly prosperity should be Virtues stepdame, and not her natural mother!

But (to close up this Discourse) you see here by what hath been said, that it is a great error (howbeit now grown more than popular) to judge of persons and causes by the events, whenas all outward things (says Solomon) fall alike to all, neither can any judge of love or hatred by what is before him: Prosperity and Adversity being but separable accidents to them, and no essential properties of them, because they are grounded upon worldly things, that have so loose and mouldring a foundation, as that a man cannot tell concerning them what a day may bring forth. Again,

2. As worldly prosperity swells us up with a high opinion of our own Goodness above others, so likewise of our own Greatness. And this makes us slight those that are under us, and deal hardly with them, (as to temporal things) which we would not do, if we once considered the mutability of it.

And therefore if at any time God shall give up unto us those we conceit our enemies, to be dealt with (if we will) by all harshness and extremity; yet are not we then to trample upon them in the pride of our hearts, nor to add more load to that which God hath already laid upon them; but rather to take off from it what we can, and to use them with all gentleness and compassion, with all mildness and moderation, as considering ourselves, that we are not here to live always as God's upon earth, the same yesterday, today and forever: but what is the bitter cup of their portion today, may be ours tomorrow.

It speaks out but a coarse and ignoble spirit, to crow and insult over those that are down. The very Heathen thought it so, who had only the glimmering of Nature to guide them; much more ought we Christians, whom the Apostle exhorts, that our moderation may be known to all men. That as the Apostle will have his Corinthians to use the world with a tanquam, as if they used it not; so must they among us, that have wealth, power and authority, so use them, as if they used them not: that so when they shall fail us, (as they will ere long, since the wind blows not always out of one and the same favorable quarter) we may then be able to say with comfort, That we never misemployed those talents of God's outward favor to us unto the pressure and destruction of our Brethren, but only to their relief and preservation.

The Prophet David in his Tenth Psalm, speaks of some, who through the pride of their countenance do not seek after God, neither is God in all their thoughts. But their ways are always grievous; they puff at their enemies, and say in their hearts, they shall never be moved, nor be in adversity.

And such were the Babylonians, who (besides their barbarous cruelty to the Israelites under captivity) added this above all, that they scoffed and jeered at them in their miseries, with Sing us now one of the Songs of Zion. So also were the Edomites, v. 7. who cried over Jerusalem in the day of her visitation, Rase it, rase it even to the foundations.

And were we sure that the sun of our earthly Happiness would always stand will in this our Gibeon, it may be we might take liberty to do the like, and think we did well in it too. But when as we come to consider seriously, that there is no Solstice here upon earth, but so soon as the Sun is come to his furthest Summer-point in our Horizon, it is then presently vertical, and turning again to make winter-weather with us, how will this assuage that swelling of pride that is within us, and make us humble?

To this purpose there is a memorable History of Caganus King of the Huns, unto whom Theodorus Medicus being sent in an Embassy from Mauritius the Emperor, to divert those swarms of people wherewith Caganus at that time threatened to storm the Empire, he applied himself to him in these words; Audi Cagane, utilem narrationem Sesostris, &c. Hear, says he to Caganus, a profitable Narrative of Sesostris King of Egypt, who being lifted up too high with his great successes against his enemies, caused four Kings taken prisoners to draw his Triumphal Chariot, wherein one of them looked back with smiles to the wheel of the Chariot, and being demanded his reason for it, answered, That he smiled to see the spoak of the wheel now at the top, to be presently at the bottom; and again, that which is now at the bottom, to be by and by at the top. The very hearing whereof did so mollify, and keep down the haughty Princes spirit, that it drew him a little to forbear his acts of hostility against the Emperor.

And from this Topick also of volubility, did Croesus draw an argument to dissuade Cyrus from his intended inrode into Scythia: for if thou didst lead (says he) an immortal Army, then is there no need for thee to ask my advice in it; but if thou dost acknowledge thyself a man, and a leader of mortals, then think that there is a wheel of human affairs that turns about continually, and suffers nothing here below to stand long upon the same bottom.

But this advice of Croesus took no place with Cyrus; If it had, he would have kept himself (as the Tortoise doth) intra testudinem, within his own shell, within his own dominions, and not have causelessly usurped upon the rightful possessions of others to his own destruction: for see the issue and event of it!

Even that God who is infinite in his Wisdom, and terrible in his Power and Justice, he that resists the proud, and looks upon them afar off, He (I say) made the pride of Cyrus serve as a snare to take himself in, and to work his ruin: for he was no sooner entered Scythia, but he found by sad experience how inconstant the World wa• not looking now upon him with <math>\langle \diamond \rangle</math> smiling aspect it did before; but the wind was now in another quarter, and (as the Wise man says or Riches, that they make themselves wings and fly away) so did his former prosperity betake herself now to her wings, and flew away, his whole Army being quite defeated, and himself slain by Tomyris Queen of Scythia.

A good example to make the secure wretch look about him, and to pull down the high looks of the proud.

And therefore when ever any flushing of pride begins to rise within thee, and to bud forth, as it is in Ezekiel, into violence, and oppression of others, then think thou hearest some Monitor calling unto thee, as King Philip's Page did to him, Memento te esse mortalem, remember that thou art Mortal: so, remember that thou art changeable as well as others, and this will be an excellent means to keep it in.

For tell me, would Cyrus, think you, have invaded Scythia, had he thought so sad a fate would have attended him in it?

Or would Pharaoh have oppress'd the Israelites so much, had he thought that God would have tumbled him up and down so much as he did, from one plague to another, and at last made the sea his champion to revenge their injuries upon him?

Or would Joseph's brethren have persecuted him as they did, if they had thought he should afterwards have been lord over them?

Or the Gileadites have expelled Jephtha, had they known he would have been such a shelter against a storm, and of such use unto them against the Ammonites?

Or (to say no more) would Darius have called Alexander Philip's boy in derision of him, had he known that he should have been conquered by him?

No, little do proud men think that the water which is now in the float, will presently be in the ebb; and that the spcak of the wheel which is now at the top, may quickly be at the bottom: and then he that is the greatest now among us, may come (how soon he knows not) to stand in need of the meanest creature whom he now despises.

It is wisdom then for every Christian, when as he is at the top of the wheel, and may lord it over those that are beneath, yet not to overlook them with a scornful eye, but to let down his spirit, and (as the Apostle exhorts us) to condescend to men of low degree: For one scale is not always in depression. No, This were dura infoelicitas, a very hard and high measure of infelicity. Neither is the other always in elevation: This were foelicitas miseranda, a happiness to be pitied. But the alternate wave of the beam keeps them both in awe, and especially the proud person, who seems unto me as a bird tied to a string, which if it fly too high, the hand draws in the string and pulls it down again. And so if we shall let out our spirits too high with pride, God hath then a line of vicissitude in his hand to pull us in at his pleasure.

The Prophet David said in his prosperity, that he should never be moved, his mountain was made so strong; yet God did but hide his face from him a little, and he was troubled.

Naturally then we are too apt to know no measure in a high fortune; but (as a person of Honor and Piety in this Nation said) although in the heat of summer we easily believe there will come after it a cold season of frost and snow, yet are we so stupid as in Prosperity not to consider of Adversity, though the one be as successive as the other. And this makes us to exalt ourselves so much above all that is called God. That as it is observable touching the Book of Esther (which is nothing else but a Declaration of acts done in reference to the Greatness, Power and Glory of Ahasuerus the Persian Monarch, as to the principal instrument of them) that in that whole Book the Name of God is not so much as mentioned at all: So doth it also commonly fall out, that while we are here in the ruff of our worldly Glory and Prosperity, we seldom or never speak of God, and as seldom think of him, but set ourselves up in his room, as Nebuchadnezzar did, who spake too big, and too much of himself, saying, Is not this great Babel that I have built for the house of my Kingdom, by the might of my power, and for the honor of my majesty? As the fly said in the Apologue when it was got up to the top of the wheel, See what a dust I make! So, see what a dust makes this poor Worm, what a Mying there is with him in the height of his pride! nothing but my Kingdom, my Power, and my Majesty: but as for God, Ne gry quidem, There is not a word of him; He is not in all his thoughts.

And therefore how soon the house of his Kingdom fell upon his head, yea how short-lived the might of his power was, and the honor of his Majesty, you may see by the next verse, where it is said, That while the word was in the Kings mouth, there fell a voice from Heaven, saying, O Nebuchadnezzar, to thee be it spoken, Thy Kingdom is departed from thee.

The world then may well be compared to the Sea of glass which Saint John saw in his vision, Revelat. 4.6. and there be also, that from the resemblance of the one to the other, interpret it thus. For

First, It resembles the Sea either for its ebbing and flowing; or else for the sudden change of it: for how soon is the face of the Sea altered? in one and the same hour (it may be) thou mayst see her smiling upon thy vessel, and frowning too; playing with it, and swallowing it up. Noli igitur (says the Moralist) tranquillitati ejus credere, i.e. Do not therefore trust too much to her smooth and calm looks; in hoc enim momento mare evertitur, for in one moment doth she appear wrinkled with billows, and turns about from a calm unto a storm.

Secondly, It resembles also glass, and that either for its brittleness, because nothing is sooner broken: or else for its slipperiness, because he that walks upon glass can have no sure footing; and therefore for any man to presume upon the steadiness of it, must needs be very dangerous.

That as the ancient Romans used to distinguish their days into Dies albi, and Dies atri, white and black days: so doth God, and there is no man but hath the later of these as well as the former, his black as well as his white days.

Oh the madness then of wicked men, who are always plotting against the righteous, and gnashing upon them with their teeth! At ridebit Deus, says David, But God shall laugh at them for it: and he gives this reason, v. 13. because he sees that their day is coming, i. e. he sees clearly that their black and dismal day is coming upon them, though themselves will not see it through the pride and security of their spirits; yea, and he knows also punctually when it will be, though we know it not: for though today may be fair and shining, yet may tomorrow be dark and tempestuous with them; since we know not what a day may bring forth.

Last of all, (because I am loath that my Sun should set in a cloud) The consideration of this point may serve as a good antidote against despair in an afflicted condition; or as a cordial to stay up our spirits in the saddest and most distressed times, and to teach us patience and contentedness in them: that so as in prosperity we should not say, we shall never be moved, so neither in adversity, that we shall never be delivered; when we shall consider, that what weight of affliction soever we lie under, is not of a continuant, but of a changeable nature. And to this end we have the sure staff of God's promise unto his children to lean upon, as in the tenth Chapter to the Hebrews, where he says thus, Yet a little while, or rather as it runs in the Greek, yet how very very little while, (with a double diminutive) and he that shall come, will come, and will not tarry. And in the precedent verse he tells them, they have need of patience, that they may receive this promise. And in the twelfth Chapter to the Hebrews, the Apostle takes up an exhortation to it from the Wise man, and makes a consolatory use of it to his Hebrews, withal taking them to task for their forgetfulness of it; And ye have forgotten the exhortation which speaks unto you, as unto children: My Son, despise not thou the chastening of the Lord, nor faint, or be not broken in mind (as others translate it) when thou art rebuked of him. For we had (says he) the fathers of the flesh, who verily chastened us a few days after their own pleasure, and we were patient under their rod, and gave them reverence, but God a few days only, for our profit. Shall we not then be much rather in subjection to him who is the father of spirits, and live?

Thus when Boetius, that Christian Consul and Martyr at Rome, was wrongfully deprived by Theodoricus of his Honors, Estate and Liberty, Philosophy brings in what we call God's Providence, comforting him in these words:

I turn about my wheel continually, and delight to tumble things upside down; why then doth thy heart shrink within thee, when as this changeableness of mine is cause enough for thee to hope for better things?

And so also, when many of our Brethren were heretofore in Exile for their Religion in Queen Mary's days, what (I pray) did that Jewel of our Church comfort them with, but only this, Haec non durabunt, aetatem; These will not endure an Age? as indeed you know they did not, her Reign being not full out six years time.

And with the same consideration also should we cheer up ourselves now under that black cloud that hangs over the Church, that it will not endure an Age, but be as Ephraim's righteousness was, even as the morning cloud, or as the early dew that passes away.

To this end, it will not be amiss to note, how the afflictions of God's people in the Scripture, are run out not by any long tract of time, as by an Age, Year, Month, Week, or the like; but by the shortest measures that can be, as by a Day: now a Day (you know) holds not long, but is quickly gone, even as a flying Bird, or a Poast that runneth by. And thus good Hezekiah calls the time of Sennacheribs rage against Judah, a Day of trouble, Isa. 37. v. 3.

Or if this be not enough, you have them then contracted within a lesser room, and measured only by a Night, which is no more but the dark side of a natural Day, and therefore is a great deal shorter. And this made the Prophet David say, Psal. 30. v. 5. That heaviness may endure for a Night, but joy cometh in the Morning. The time then that heaviness shall endure to the Godly can be but a Night at the longest, but whether it shall be so long or no, the Prophet is very uncertain and unsatisfied, for which cause he expresses it here with a May be, Heaviness may endure for a Night.

But if this expression be not full enough to set forth the brevity of them, our Savior doth it then by an Hour, which is shorter yet, and but the four and twentieth part of a natural Day; for so he calls the time of his persecution by the High Priests and Elders of the people, Their hour, and the power of Darkness, Luke 22.53.

Or, if this be yet too long a space to set forth the brevity of their afflictions, and to give a through Comfort to God's people, their little continuance is then expressed by a Moment, which I am sure is short enough; so you have it Isa. 54. v. 7. For a small moment (says God to his Church) have I forsaken thee, but with great mercy will I gather thee: And again, v. 8. In a little wrath I hid my Face from thee for a moment, but with everlasting kindness will I have mercy upon thee.

Or last of all, if any time can be shorter than this, it must then be the present time; yet such are the sufferings of God's children, in St. Paul's account, but the sufferings of the present time, Rom. 8.18. and a shorter time than this there cannot be. For as the French our Neighbors are said to be for their inconsiderateness, Animalia sine praeterito & futuro, Creatures that have respect neither to time past nor time to come: so may we say of the present time, That it is as short a measure as can possibly be imagined, having in it nothing either of time past or future, the first of the two being dead already, and the later of them being not yet born unto us. And yet we see here for all this, that St. Paul, when he had cast up the account of all which he suffered in the cause of Christ, how he reckons and concludes it to be only the suffering of the present time, and not worthy to be compared with the glory that shall be revealed.

A Prayer.

ALmighty God, who rulest the Sea of this World by thy power, and whose paths are in the roughest Waters; We the unworthiest of all thy Servants commit our frail Barks, with all that we have, to the Steerage of thee our great Pilot, and faithful Preserver: beseeching thee so to order by thy good hand of Providence all outward contingencies to us, that we may be able to bear up through them with a steady and even Course, against the several Storms we shall meet with in this passage to our blessed Harbour of Eternity. And however earthly things may like Watery Billows be every day rolling up and down in their vicissitudes about us; yet suffer, oh suffer not the Heavenly truth of our Reformed Religion to flote about any longer so uncertainly among us, nor ourselves to be as Children tossed to and fro with every Wind of Doctrine. But let us be constant and unwavering in the profession of that Holy Faith we have received; and (Thou that art the God of Truth) be graciously pleased to stay us up firmly in it by the sacred Scriptures, which are thy Word of Truth, and the sole Anchor of our Faith to rest upon. Lord, pull in the Sails of our desires towards fleeting and transitory substances: for who will cast his eyes upon that which hath wings to flee away as an Eagle towards Heaven! Ballast our Spirits with Humility in a prosperous condition; and when we have the highest and most pleasing Gale of the worlds favor for us, give us to strike our spreading Sails of Pride, and to make our Lenity and Moderation to be known to all men, for the Lord is nigh at hand. But if thou in thy just judgment against us for our manifold and heinous sins, shalt cause some cross wind or other to blow upon us, and give us over to Shipwrack in our temporals; Supply then, we entreat thee, their want with thy spirituals of Patience, Faith, and other suffering graces; That although the tempest be never so boisterous without, yet we may enjoy within a Christian calmness of Spirit, in a happy quietude and contentedness of mind with all thy dealings towards us, and not set down our rest upon the Creature, which is so restless with us, but amidst the sundry and various changes of the world, may there fix our Hearts, where only true and unchangeable joys are to be found, through Jesus Christ our Lord.

FINIS.

P-RA-24. The whole duty of divine meditation described in all its various parts and branches : with meditations on several places of scripture - Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681.

THE Whole Duty OF DIVINE MEDITATION, Described In all its various Parts and Branches. WITH MEDITATIONS ON Several Places of Scripture.

By the Author of The Whole Duty of Man.

Psal. cxix. 16.

I will meditate on thy precepts, and have respect unto thy ways.

London, Printed for John Back, at the Black-Boy, on the Middle of London-Bridge, 1694.

LICENSED, Decemb. 20. 1693.

THE PREFACE.

THE Whole Duty of Prayer, having met with so good a Reception in the World, I have, at the Request and Importunity of some Friends, recommended to the Press this remaining Tract, bearing the Title of the Whole Duty of Meditation, by that Reverend and Worthy Author of the Whole Duty of Man.

The Subject I need not commend, for it carries its Worth along with it; and to every Christian will appear both pleasant and profitable: For by Meditation, the truly Religious may converse with the Almighty, and from the Throne of Grace find Help and Comfort in time of Need; to those which are Aery, and are the Darlings of the World, this Gift may procure a well-composed Mind. For if he who by often looking on a Ring with a Death's Head, at last grew sober; who knows but by often Meditating, their Hearts may be brought into a more serious and heavenly frame?

The Royal Prophet stiles Meditation the Food of the Soul, Psal. 63. 4. My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, while I meditate on thee. The Heart never willingly fixeth upon Heaven, till the Almighty is the Treasure of it; for where any Man's Treasure is, there will his Heart be also. Now, it cannot easily meditate, but where it doth delight. Psal. 119. 97. Love is the Weight of the Soul; it readily moves to its beloved Object. Mary will not depart from the Sepulcher where Christ had lain, before she had made Enquiry where she might see him whom her Soul loved.

It is the Duty of every good Christian, to observe the Prophet David's Rule, Psal. 16. 8. to set the Lord always before him, that he may be in his fear all the day long. There is nothing more unstedfast than the Mind of Man; and therefore nothing can so well compose it, as True Sanctity; which brings such great Advantages, that with holy Job, it makes the Soul both serious, and willing to acquaint itself with God, that it may be at peace, Job 22. 21. He is the Rest of the Soul; and the more it knows of him, the more desirous it is to reside with him, that it may know more: The more it tasteth of his Favor, the more it longeth after his Glory, as Moses did, Exod. 33. 17, 18.

What the Philosopher said of all Knowledge, is true only of the Knowledge of God; that it is Quies Intellectus. And therefore our Savior calleth it Eternal Life, John 17. 3. in which alone the Soul doth rest. Now, one excellent Means of fixing the Heart on God, is Meditation; whereby the highly Pious summons together all that is within them, to bless his Name, Psal. 103.

Meditation is the Wing of the Soul, which carrieth the Affections thereof to Things Above. By this, with Moses, it goeth up to the top of Mount Pisgah, to take a Prospect of the Promised Land. It is, as Clemens Alexandrinus saith of Prayer, a Conversing with God. And as St. Chrysostom saith of Faith, so may we of Meditation, it makes God, and Christ, and Precepts, and Promises, ours, by giving us a fuller Possession of them.

Hereby we hold fast what we have learned; we awaken our Faith, inflame our Love, strengthen our Hope, revive our Desires, increase our Joys in God; we furnish our Hearts, and fill our Mouths with Materials of Prayer; we slacken our Affections from the World, we pre-acquaint ourselves with those Glories which we yet but hope for, and get some knowledge of that Love of Christ which passeth Knowledge.

The Necessity, Excellency, and Usefulness of this Christian Duty, the Reverend Author of this Tract hath Elegantly described; which is therefore worthy Perusal of such as desire to acquaint and furnish themselves with so excellent a part of Christian Skill, whereby we may be filled with the Fulness of God, and be always able continually to say, My Heart is fixed, O God, my Heart is fixed; I will sing, and give Praise.

G. B.

Advertisement.

There is lately published, The Whole Duty of Prayer: Containing Devotions for Every Day in the Week, and for Several Occasions, Ordinary and Extraordinary. By the Author of The Whole Duty of Man. Necessary for all Families. The Third Edition.

Printed for John Back, at the Black-Boy, on the Middle of London-Bridge.

THE Whole Duty OF DIVINE MEDITATION.

SECT. I. What Meditation is.

FIRST, Divine Meditation differs from Occasional, by these Examples: When you hear the Hour of the Day or Night, think with thyself, What Thoughts, O my God, have I had of thee, this Hour? I am now nearer the silent Grave, and know not how soon I may be arrested by the Hand of Death.

THESE are like Ejaculatory Prayers; which though' they are as Parenthesis in our Worldly Employment, yet they signify more than all the rest of the Business we are employed in; but Meditation is of longer Duration than solemn Prayer upon Ordinary Occasions.

II. SECONDLY, It differs from Study: For Study consists of those things that are most knotty and difficult, and generally such as afford little Spiritual Nourishment; but the Subject of Divine Meditation, concerns our Eternal Happiness: The End of Study is Knowledge, but the End of Meditation is Sanctity.

III. THIRDLY, It differs from Contemplation: For Contemplation is applicable to the Beatifical Vision, where the Angels behold the Face of the Almighty: Now Meditation is like Fire kindling; and Contemplation, the flaming of it when fully kindled: The one is like the Spouses Seeking of Christ; and the other, like her Enjoying of him.

IV. FOURTHLY, To conclude; Meditation is, a serious and solemn considering of Heavenly Things, to the end we may understand how much it concerns us, and that our Hearts thereby may be raised to some holy Affections and Resolutions. Now there are Four kinds of Solemn Meditation, according to their several Subjects.

V. FIRST, Some Solemn Meditations are, upon the hearing of Sermons: which is a very useful and necessary Practice amongst Christians; and it is better to hear one Sermon, and meditate on it, than to hear two, and meditate of neither. Now, to prescribe a Method for Meditating on Sermons, is neither necessary nor possible; since the Methods of Sermons are various, therefore the Mediators are to observe the Method of the Sermon they meditate upon; and the Fruits of such Meditations, is to work those Truths, Advices, and Motives, &c. upon our Affections, that are proposed to us in the Sermon.

VI. THE Second kind of Solemn Meditation, is, when upon some Providential Occasion, spiritual Distemper, or Temptation, we retire, and pour out our Souls in Prayers, Soliloquies, &c. Which cannot but in a very large sense be styled Prayer, being mixed of such variety, as sometimes speaking to the Great Majesty of Heaven, and humbly acknowledging how we stand affected to Him and his Ordinances; sometimes we examine our Soul, chiding, encouraging, or instructing it; sometimes we reason with ourselves, what holy Resolutions we design to put in practice, and what we intend to supplicate the Almighty. Many Instances of this nature you may find in Psal. 42. and other Psalms which cannot properly be called Prayers, but Solemn Meditations.

VII. THE Third kind of Solemn Meditation, are those that are upon Scripture, which is the Word of God, and his words are pure, even as the silver tried seven times in the fire, Psal. 12. 6. Our Savior's Precept, is, That we should search the Scriptures, Joh. 5. 39. And St. Paul bids us prove all things, 1 Thes. 5. 21. And if we meditate on God's Word, which is the Golden Rule of all our Devotions, we shall acquire that Peace to our Souls, which the World cannot give, nor none upon Earth can take from us; for all his Promises are Yea, and Amen, 2 Cor. 1. 20.

VIII. THE Last kind of Meditation, is, upon some Practical Truth of Religion; which is, the planting and nourishing of all true Virtue among Men; to grow in grace, 2 Pet. 3. 18. to cleanse ourselves from all filthiness both of flesh and spirit, 2 Cor. 7. 1. And endeavoring to take hold of St. Paul's pressing Argument to his Corinthians, to be steadfast, immovable, always abounding in the work of the Lord; then this Assurance will infallibly appertain to us, That our labor shall not be in vain in the Lord, 1 Cor. 15. 58.

SECT. II. That Meditation is a Duty.

THAT Isaac did not neglect Solemn Meditation, is evident, by reason he went out into the Fields to perform it; and to show that it was a Set-Duty, 'tis said, that he went ont to meditate. And God commanded Joshua to perform this Duty, as a chief means for the keeping of the Law, Josh. 1. 18. And indeed we ought not to forget so important an Exercise; for the Occasion of Sin, is the want of Consideration, and not want of Knowledge: Isa. 1. 3. For, who is there, almost, in the World, that knows not but that he must die, but how few are they that consider it? Deut. 32. 29.

II. NEXT, The Necessity of Meditation is very material: For none can enter into a State of Conversion, who thinks it insignificant. To confirm which, we have it recorded in Scripture the Story of the Prodigal Son, who listed himself in Harlots company; but upon his submissive return, was received again into his Father's favor. Now, this is the Method of the Converted: First, He hears the sacred Truth of God's Word, and is convinced by it. Secondly, He considers and meditates upon it, and sees how much it concerns himself. Thirdly, He is affected with them; and being thus affected, it raiseth holy Resolutions of better Obedience.

III. BUT some will object and say, I am Illiterate, and cannot attain to it, and therefore I must relinquish it, and leave it to the Learned, who is best able to perform a Duty of so great Importance. To which I answer, as in the Mathematical Science; He that is a rational Man, and does but improve his Reason, though he hath neither Tongues nor Arts to assist him, may understand and grow to an extraordinary Excellency in any Art▪ if he has God's Assistance, and does but exercise and improve it, he may reap the Benefit and Fruit of Meditation.

IV. OTHERS will object, and declare, It is a very hard Duty. To which my Replication is this; That the harder anything seems, it is the more excellent when it is attained; but the Obstacle is apparent, and infers it not to be consonant to our perverse Wills and Affections; and the more dissonant anything is to that which is Evil, the more congruous it is to sublimer Actions: For it cannot reasonably be expected that any Duty should be performed at the first, with much facility. For Example; the Seven Liberal Sciences, which are of great Excellency in Temporal Enjoyments, are not so easily attained without Sollicitation and Sedulity.

V. NOW the reason is evident; for this Duty is powerful in mortifying Corruptions: dulcified things nourish and pamper the Body, and bitter things gives a purgation: Therefore, if you will only perform those Duties that are pleasant and delectable, they will only nourish, not purge out Corruption. Therefore implore the Almighty to inflame your Hearts with his divine Love; and then this Duty will not only be facile and delightful, but will so affect the Undertaker, that it will be very difficult to avoid a Duty of so great importance; for it is as great a difficulty to take our Affections off from what we admire, as it is to place 'em upon what we abhor: For, bid the covetous Person forsake his Gold and Silver, and bid him entertain the Thoughts of Things Celestial, and he will find an equal Difficulty in both.

VI. INDEED, the Love of the Almighty, and Desire of Spiritual Things, are acquired by Meditation; and when once our Hearts are inflamed by that Exercise, then our Meditations are inflamed by Love: For, as Sparks of Fire ‹◊› is first blown up before the Flame increases; so the Difficulty of Meditation appears at the beginning, when there is but, as it were, a Spark of divine Love in the Heart, it will require some Pains, by Meditation, to blow it up to a Flame; but afterwards the Heart will be so fervent with these Conflagrates of Love, that it will so inflame all the Thoughts, and create in us not only Facility, but a Necessity to meditate on Things Spiritual.

VII. Now some will object, If it be a Duty so Necessary, how comes it to pass, that it hath been so geerally Neglected by most Christians? To which I answer; That it hath been practiced by many in ancient Times, and by many modern Christians. The Sacred Scriptures inform us, and it is evident that the Psalms of the Royal Prophet, are frequently digested into Meditations: But this being a Private Closet-Duty, the Omission nor Performance of it could not be taken notice of; and so the Omission of it could not be reprehended, nor Performance observed. Lastly, The Directions and Instructions for Meditation, have been generally very abstruse and intricate.

SECT. III. Rules and Directions for Meditation.

AS to the Place, that must be apart, remote from Society and Disturbance; the Patriarch Isaac went into the Fields, our Blessed Savior into a Garden; and the Prophet David adviseth us to enter into our Chamber, and be still, Psal. 4. 4. And Christ commands us, to enter into our Closet, and shut the door. Now the reason of the Privacy is this, that we might receive no Interruption, or any Distraction, nor be forced to break off abruptly before the Duty be ended; next, that we may be recluse from the Observation of all Mortals that we may neither be heard nor seen; for there are divers Gestures and Expressions, which are not requisite or necessary for any but God and the Soul to be privy to: Now what Place soever you find to be necessary for this important Duty, be solicitous to make choiee of.

II. As for the Time; the best Opportunity is in the Morning: for the First Fruits of the Day being Holy, all the rest are Sanctified. Moreover, our Thoughts being then not polluted with worldly Affairs, they are not so liable to distraction: and the Body itself is more serene than after Meals; and this Duty requires a vacuity in the Stomach; not only because the Head will be more perspicuous and apt for Meditation, but also, because many Passages of Meditation require so much Attention of the Mind, and Fervency of Affection, that they do hinder Digestion: And this Duty being performed in the Morning, it will have an influence upon the whole Day. But this Rule is not universal; for we read, that Isaac went forth in the Evening to meditate, Gen. 24. 63. And if the Subject of your Meditation be a Sermon, then perhaps the properest time is immediately after the hearing of it, before your Affections cool, or your Memory fail you.

III. FOR the Duration; considering the Parts of Meditation are so many, as Preparation, Considerations, Affections, Resolutions, and the like: And not one of these are to be past slightly over; for Affections are not quickly raised: nor are we to cease blowing the fire, if it flame, until it be well kindled; Half an Hour may be reckoned to be the least for Beginners, and an Hour for those that are Proficients in this Duty.

IV. But in this Particular, there is Two Rules especially to be observed: First, That as we ought not to desist from our Prayers before that temper and frame or heart is wrought, which is suitable to the Requests of our Petitions; so we should not desist in our Confession of Sin, till our Hearts are truly sensible, and humbled for Sin; neither should we slacken our Praises, until our Hearts are filled with holy Admirings, and inflamed with the Love of the Almighty. Now, the End of Meditation, are Affections and Resolutions, therefore we should not desist till those are effected.

V. SO in Private Prayer, when we find our Hearts enlarged by the Effusion of the Spirit of Supplication upon us, we are not to desist, unless by our persisting in that Duty, we omit another to which we are more particularly obliged at that juncture; so in Meditation, when we perceive the Heart affected, we are to continue it: But this Caution must be observed, That in our Enlargements, we must not continue them longer than while they flow freely, without much Straining and Compulsion: for Honey which comes freely from the Comb, is pure; but forced by Heat and Pressure, is not so well relish'd. Now, if the Heart is dead, we must use our utmost diligence to awaken it; and when once our Hearts are inflamed, and enlarged by holy Affections in an extraordinary manner, 'tis but an impediment to our Affections to return to the Meditation of those Points that raised them.

SECT. IV. Of the Subject and Method of Meditation.

FIRST, Avoid Controversy, for that will convert Meditation into Study; and nice Speculations, for they are sapless without Nutriment: besides, being so light, they fluctuate in the Brain, and want ponderosity to sink them down into the Heart; and indeed, were they admitted, they are so insignificant, as the Heart, by its reception, could acquire no Affectation. But let the Subject of your Meditation be the plainest, powerfulest, and usefulest Verities of the Almighty, as Death, Judgment, Hell, and Heaven; the Mercies of God, our own Sins, and the Love and Sufferings of a crucified Savior, Contemplate on that which is most suitable to your Spiritual Wants; as in the time of Desertion, meditate most of the Love and Mercies of God, and thy own Unworthiness, &c.

II. NOW the Rules for Meditation are these Three: 1st. Preparatory. 2dly. For the Body of the Duty. And, 3dly. The Conclusion. In our Duty of Preparation, besides the choice of the Subject, we are to be convinced and affected with the Presence of the Deity, and to use fervent Prayer for the Divine Assistance. Secondly, For the Body of Meditation, it consists of Three Parts: The First is, Consideration; which is, the convincing our Hearts of several Verities appertaining to that Subject whereof we meditate.

III. IF the Subject of our Meditation be Death, the Considerations may run thus: Alas, O my Immortal Soul! the Manner, Time and Place where we shall expire, we are ignoraut of; generally Men's Lives come to a period sooner than they expect; and certain it is, whensoever that Hour or Minute approaches, we must bid adieu to Honors, Pleasures, Riches, Friends, and at last, our own frail Bodies, &c.

The Second Part, is, Affections; whether it be Love of God, Christ, or Spiritual Things; despising of the World, admiring of the Omnipotency, or any other Spiritual Affection. The Third Part, are, Resolutions to perform that which is agreeable to God's Command, and to desist from all manner of Evil.

IV. NOW that this is the most proper and genuine way of Meditation, evidently appears: First, Because it is not Artificial, and such as requires Learning, as those Instructions are which advise us to consider the Efficient, Final, Formal, Material Cause of Defunction, with the Adjuncts, Concomitants, and Concatenations, &c. which though they, perhaps, may please the Learned, yet such difficult words astonish the Ignorant. Now, this is the Method by which everyone that is brought home to God, is converted.

V. AND the first thing in Conversion, is, our being convinced of some Truths; which Conviction raiseth Affections: For if the Verities of the Divine Omnipotence end in Conviction, and go no further; nay, if they end in Affections only, and never arrive to Resolutions of shunning Evil, and performing of Good, Conversion can never be perfected. As for Example: One is convinced that he is a miserable, undone Wretch, by reason of Original and Actual Abomination: Upon this Conviction, Fear and Sorrow are excited; yet if these do not operate in us a fixed Resolution of forsaking those Sins, we are yet in our Sins, and unconverted. Thirdly, There are several things for the concluding of Meditation, which I shall treat of in its proper order.

SECT. V. Of being affected with the Divine Presence.

WE are to consider, God is present in all places, as really and Essentially as he is in Heaven: For, Omnipotency did not create Heaven for his Confinement, but to manifest his Glory; for the Heaven of Heavens are not able to contain him; neither is the Almighty included by, nor excluded from any place: And though Jacob said, Surely the Lord was in this place, and I knew it not, Gen. 28. 16. yet we must not imagine that Jacob was ignorant of the Verity of it, but did not actually consider it; but the Psalmist, in the 139th. Psalm, is perspicuous in explaining and clearing up the Omnipresence of the Almighty.

II. NEXT, we must consider, That the Almighty doth more peculiarly observe his Servants, while they are performing of heavenly Duties: Yet this is to be understood, not as if God observed us more at one time than another, in respect of his Omniscieny; but we may infer That God is much more offended with us, if our Deportment and Frame of Heart, be more irreverent and unholy in the Duty of Prayer and Meditation, than in the Duties of our particular Calling.

III. WE may consider with ourselves, That Christ doth actually behold us, especially in these Duties of Sanctity: For it is not the remoteness of Place that doth obstruct Christ's Omniscieny, and exact observing of us. Little did Nathanael think that Christ saw him under the Fig-Tree: Nathanael did not perceive Christ, neither then was he corporally present, yet Christ beheld Nathanael when he prayed. So Christ beheld St. Stephen before the Heavens were opened, and the opening of the Heavens was not; that thereby Christ might be enabled the better to behold St. Stephen, but that this holy Proto-Martyr might thereby be the better enabled to discern that Christ looked on him.

IV. AND without all controversy, the Almighty observes and knows with what Reverence, Faith, and Love, we address ourselves to him; for else our Prayers would be fruitless, and our Faith ineffectual: For, how could he distribute to us according to our Faith, if he knew not the extent of it? If the inferior frame of our Hearts were not observed by Omnipotency, we may then infer, that an Hypocrite which can utter extraordinary Expressions, should acquire more by his Addresses to the Almighty, than a true Nathanael, in whom there is no guile.

V. Suppose that thou hadst lived in that Age when Christ was upon Earth, or that he were corporally present now, near thy Habitation; consider with what Joy, Reverence, Alacrity, and Assurance, thou wouldst address thyself to him for the Pardon of thy Sins, or for any other Mercy thou stoodst in need of: After the same manner thou mayst now address thyself; his remoteness from thee, in respect of a Corporal Presence, doth not diminish his Power to discern thy Wants, or give an Audit to thy Petitions; nor his being now glorified, doth not derogate his Benevolence to grant thy Requests, than if he were corporally present, in the Room with thee in the form of a Servant, as he was once at Jerusalem.

VI. THE Glory of Christ doth not slacken his Love and Goodness; for Christ is the express Image of his Father, and God's Attributes are all consonant: The Majesty of Heaven doth not set Limits unto his Goodness, and make that finite; nor doth his Bounty make his Omnipotency less glorious: His Goodness makes his Deity more amiable, and his Omniscience makes his Mercies more wonderful; so neither doth the Exaltation of Christ, excite him to abate or diminish his Goodness to any that serve him, according to his divine Precepts.

VII. BUT if in any method his Love is mutable, it is by an Augmentation: For when our blessed Lord was in the flesh, you must have approached him by Faith, or expected no Mercy; and by Faith, though he is enthroned in Heaven, you may obtain Mercy in time of need. Thus you may ponder upon any of these Considerations, until your Heart be so convinced of, and affected with the Presence of God, that you thereby may be the better fitted for the carrying on the Duty of Meditation more effectually.

SECT. VI. Of Preparatory Prayer Before Meditation.

THE next Preparatory Consideration is, Prayer; which thou mayst perform to this or the like purpose.

LORD, my design, at this time, is not to be sequestered an Hour from worldly Enjoyments, for that were to be guilty of a Cessation, and to increase the number of my Sins, not my Graces; but my Sollicitation, at this time, is, to be so convinced and affected with those spiritual Verities revealed in thy Sacred Word, that I may fully resolve, by thy Strength and Power, to reform my Life: for I can neither understand the things that belong to my Peace; not understanding them, be convinced of the Certainty and Verity of them.

II. NAY, Lord, though my Understanding is illuminated, yet without thee my Affections cannot be enflamed: I can neither know, resolve, nor perform any Good without thee; for from thee proceeds both the Will and the Benefit of thy good Pleasure. Lord, I humbly implore ‹◊› to replenish me with thy Grace, that I may be conscientious in performing this Duty with my whole Strength, and not negligently, and inconsiderately. And, Lord, do thou illuminate me, and convince me with thy Sacred Truths, and so affect my Heart with the Love of Sanctity, and a Detestation of all Sin and Wickedness, that I may thereby be fully and firmly resolved (notwithstanding all the Oppositions that the Flesh, the World, or the Devil can procure) to run the ways of thy Commandments with joy and celerity.

III. AND, Lord, grant that when thou hast operated in me the Will so to perform, give me also the Benefit, and let me not trust to the Strength of my Resolutions. but to the continual gracious Assistance of thy holy Spirit for the Performance of those Duties that through thee I shall resolve to pursue. Grant this, O holy and blessed Father, even for the Merits of thy dear Son, who hath commanded me to approach to thee in his Name for any Mercies I stand in need of. O let these my Petitions reach thy merciful Ears▪ even for his sake who is my only Lord and Savior, Amen.

IV. THIS or the like Prayer thou art to send up to the Throne of Grace: But this must be done with thy whole Heart; for thou must believe, that it is by the Strength which thou shalt acquire from God, by Prayer, whereby thou shalt be enabled to perform this or any other Duty profitably; for it is he that teaches us to be Proficients. Now, he that begins a holy Duty without God, will end it without him also. It is a pernicious thing to imagine that we can by our Natural Parts, Learning, or by the strength of Grace already received, without the Almighty's further Assistance, perform anything that can please him, or edify our own Souls; for though our Mountain be made strong, yet if he withdraws the Light of his Countenance, we are in Obscurity.

V. WE may with much more reason declare, Now the Sun is in his full Meridian, and the Air is so serene, that now we can transact well enough for a space, though that Solar Luminary be eclipsed; than to testify, though our Hearts be never so much inflamed with the Love of the Almighty, now we are so supplied and inflamed with his divine Love, we can subsist by our own Strength, and for the present we want not God's further Assistance; afford us but Subject Matter to meditate of, and we shall be of Ability to continue and increase our Flames. Do not possess thyself that it is a Burthen, but a Mercy and Privilege, that Omnipotence hath necessitated and commanded thee always to extract Strength from Him.

SECT. VII. Of Consideration.

FIRST, Our Considerations must be plain, not intricate and abstruse; for the main Scope of Meditation being the affecting of our Heart, and reforming of our Lives. Next, they must be certain and evident, not controversial and dubious; for the Effect of Meditation is not peculiarly to increase our Knowledge, but to improve it. Neither let Considerations be curious and nice Speculations: Neither make choice of those Books to assist thee, in this Duty, which are embellish'd with Rhetorical and Eloquent Expressions▪ which appear, in the eye of the World, to be witty, but are indeed very empty: for Verity, indeed, is many times lost in those Allurements; and entangles the Mind, by disingaging of it, from serious Consideration: As many Dishes become unsavory, by having too much Cost bestowed, and so lose their Virtue before they reach the Stomach.

II. THE Bee fixes not upon the freshest coloured Rose, or fragrant's Smell; but on the Herb Thyme, which is of slender beauty. Besides, Eloquence in this Duty, may please some Persons, as Pictures in Books please Children, who while they gaze upon them, neglect their Learning; even so, while we are affected with Elegancy of Speech, we stray from the performance of conveying the Verity of what we ponder of, to our Hearts: As in the Disease of the Bladder, the skilful Physician, to perform a Cure, administers those Remedies which may soonest reach the Part affected; for if they meet with any Obstruction, they lose their virtue, and are insignificant: so if our Understanding should explicate the Eloquence, or search out the Meaning or Certainty of the Verity it considers, any long season, the Heart will prove cool and unaffected; and be under the same Circumstance with those Musicianers that were to play there Consort before a great Emperor, but were so long a Tuning their Instruments, that he would not stay to hear 'em.

III. THE next Rule, is, If any doubt ariseth upon an evident Truth, in which the Devil is apt to cast in Scruples; then act as the Arch-Angel did with him, enter the Lists; and perhaps when you have examined the Matter, the Cloud may vanish, and the Sun shine in its full Meridian; by which resistance Satan will take flight: but if he still persist, and your Blasphemies are not removed, then dispute no more, but use the Arch-Angel's words, The Lord rebuke thee, Satan. To this purpose, 'tis requisite to be well grounded in the Verity of God's Word, which is the Sword of the Spirit, by which our Savior silenced Satan in all his Temptations: We must not dispute with that Enemy by Humane Reason, but we must put on the whole Armor of God, if we will be able to stand in the Day of Temptation, and when all is done to stand.

IV. OUR next Rule, is, Not to over-multiply our Considerations; but when, by considering the Truths of God, we find our Hearts ardently affected, then we are to make a Progression. But this Caution is observable, That when we find our Hearts, never so little affected, we must desist in our Considerations: The Bee will not leave the Flower, while any Honey is to be extracted. And it is a Temptation which Christians ought to take notice of, That Satan is ready to make us hastily pass over Duties, before we have extracted half the strength of 'em: For when we are confessing our Sins, and our Hearts begin in the least measure to be humbled, they are often filled with such Joy, as may be suspected to proceed from him, or our corrupted Hearts.

V. CORN, when it springs too fast, and grows rank, the Husbandman cuts it down. A Corrosive applied to eat dead Flesh, must not be removed when it begins to smart: And Wheat in stony Ground soonest springs up. Our Considerations must take deep root, and not entertain Affections and Resolutions when the Heart has newly received any Impression: But this we must remember, that if our Affections be much inflamed when we begin our Considerations, we are to yield to the Inspirations of God, and be guided by it: for this Method here proposed, is not to limit the extraordinary Operations of God's Spirit; but if our Hearts be only a little excited, we must not leave blowing the fire so soon as it begins to kindle; for green Wood will suddenly extinguish, unless it be thoroughly kindled.

SECT. VIII. Affections and Resolutions.

WITHOUT Knowledge, we cannot consider: and Consideration raises Affections; and Affections produces Resolutions; and the Effect of Resolution is Action, and a through Reformation of our Lives and Manners. Now, our Affections may vary according to the Subject of our Meditation: for sometimes we admire the Goodness, Majesty and Wisdom of the Almighty; another time we are amazed at our own Folly and Madness, in living so contrary to our own Principles; and that those sacred Truths revealed in God's Word, which we might improve to our Eternal Salvation, should be laid by, as useless; as if one should have in his possession an excellent and effectual Receipt for the Stone, and yet lock it up, and make no use of it.

II. SOMETIMES we despise the World, and with Job, abhor ourselves in Dust and Ashes: sometimes we affect Sorrow, Joy, Love, Fear, &c. of which we may be furnished out of the Book of Psalms, which were indeed but David's Meditations, though not in this Method. Now, when our Affections are much excited, we may make a progress to Resolution.

III. NOW your Resolutions must be fixed; not vain and frivolous, but serious and resolved▪ Purposes. Say not with thyself, I am assured the Wrath of God comes upon the Children of Disobedience, and I must embrace Hell, or forsake taking of the Name of God in vain; the Offence is great, which I commit in Swearing, and I could heartily wish I could omit it: but instead of this, argue thus with thyself, I am solemnly resolved, by the Blessing of the Almighty, to forsake all Sin, especially what I am most guilty of; for God will not be mocked, neither must I give a faint denial to Sin.

IV. WHATEVER thy Resolutions are, put them presently in practice, and drive them not off to futurity. Art thou addicted to Drinking? Do not resolve and say, This Sin I intend to forsake, but for the present I am engaged to meet Company where I must appear sociable; but that being finished, I design to prosecute my Resolution. This is one of Satan's Devices, and is cast in thy way as a Stumbling-block, which, if not removed, will prove pernicious.

V. NEXT, Let not thy Resolutions be only against Sin, but against the Temptations and Allurements to it. Solomon doth not say to the Adulterer, Thou mayest discourse a Harlot; but, Be not enticed by her words to uncleanness: He will not permit thee to go into her House, or by her Door; Prov. 5. 8. And when he dissuadeth the Drunkard from that Vice, he advises him not to look upon the Wine; for as the Beauty of a prostitute Harlot, so the Colour of Wine will inflame our Desires after it, Prov. 23. 31. After this method Job resolved, I have made a covenant with mine eyes, why then should I look upon a maid? Job. 31. 1.

VI. NEXT, You must observe this Caution: If you find your Heart never so much resolving against, and detesting of any Sin, yet be very circumspect, that you confide not upon the strength of Resolution, but earnestly deprecate the Almighty, that he would enable you by his Divine Power; and that as he has given you the Will, so he would give you his Grace to perform it.

SECT. IX. Of Vows.

AS your Resolutios are, so let your Vows be; rather against the Occasions of Sin, than against Sin itself. In things Indifferent beware of making any Perpetual Vow, but rather let it be Conditional. As, First, That you will abstain from such a thing, or perform what you designed, unless you shall be otherwise advised by some discreet, sober Person. Secondly, Add this Caution, if thou art guilty of Drinking, viz. If I think of it, I will not drink Wine this Month. Now, if a Breach of this Vow be made, though you did not think of it, you sin if your Vow be absolute.

II. THE next Caution concerning Things Indifferent, is this; Add a Penalty upon the Breach o your Vow; which may be to this purpose: I resolve to set a-part one Hour in the Day, in Prayer for the Church, to the End of this Month; or else give Alms to the Poor. In such a case, if we perform either, we sin not: And the reason of our Penalty, is, because some Inconveniencies may arise which may prove very prejudicial to us; and then we have liberty to take the other part of our Vow, viz. To give so much to the Poor.

III. NOW, this Penalty we inflict upon ourselves, must not be too light and trivial, but of such consequence as may be obligatory; yet not of that ponderosity to be prejudicial. For a rich Man to vow he will bestow a small Matter on the Poor, is inconsiderable; yet, perhaps, by a poor Man, the same Value may be of too large an extent: But let your Penalty be according to the Rules of Scripture and Reason, and opposite to those Sins which are most prevalent in thee. For Example, If Covetousness reigns in thee, exercise thy Penalty in Alms▪ If Voluptuousness, Prayer and Fasting, or abstaining wholly, for a time, from thy greatest Delight and Recreation.

IV. LASTLY, Let your Vows be rather against the External than the Internal Acts of Sin; rather against Speaking angrily, than being Angry: For though External Acts of Sin are worse, yet we have not so much dominion over them. If your Vows extend to the Performance of Holy Duties, let it be as to the Time, not the Quantity. For Example: Should'st thou bind thyself to read such a number of Chapters, perhaps thou art tempted to read them too hastily over; whereas if thou dost allot thyself so much Time, thou art not so liable to this Temptation.

SECT. X. How to Conclude your Meditations.

FIRST, Thou must earnestly beseech the Almighty to give thee Strength to perform whatever thou hast resolved to act in his Service. This must be performed fervently, though briefly and humbly, from an earnest Desire to act what thou hast promised and resolved, and also from an humble sense of thine Inability in the Performance. Next, express thy Thankfulness; and when thou findest any Alteration wrought in thy Hearn to detest Sin, give God the Glory, and rejoice not in thyself, except it be with trembling at thy own Pride and Arrogancy.

II. NEXT, We are to remember what Parts of our Medtation did most affect us, and lay them up so in our Thoughts, that frequently we may ponder on 'em. Lastly, When thy Meditations are ended, depart not hastily to thy Temporal Employments: Go not from the Presence of the Almighty, as a Bird out of the Snare of the Fowler, with alacrity and speed, but go vigilantly and warily from Holy Duties.

The Collects to be said Before or After Meditation.

O LORD, from whom all good Things do come, grant to me thy humble Servant, that by thy holy Inspiration, I may Think those things that be good, and by thy merciful guiding may Perform the same, through our Lord Jesus Christ, Amen.

GRANT to me, Lord, I beseech thee, the Spirit to Think and Do always such things as be rightful; that I who cannot do anything that is good without thee, may by thee be enabled to live according to thy Will, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

I BESEECH Thee, Almighty God, look upon the hearty Desires of me the humblest of thy Servants, and send forth the Right-hand of thy Majesty to be my Defense against all my Enemies, through Jesus Christ our Lord, Amen.

MED. I. Confession of Sin.

1 John i. 9.

If we confess our sins, he is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness.

OMNIPOTENT God, my Sins ever appear in my sight, and are a Torment unto my Mind; every Day I think of thy Judgment, because Death threatens me every Hour. And when I remember, I must appear before the Judgment-seat of Christ, 2 Cor. 5. 10. then I examine my whole Life, and find it is altogether Vanity; my Actions are vain, my Words profane, and my Thoughts unprofitable. If the shadow of some Virtue appears, it is imperfect; because Original Sin, and my vitiated Nature hath polluted it.

II. IF all our righteousness are as filthy rags, Isa. 64. 6. what can we expect our Unrighteousness should be? Our Savior tells us, When ye shall have done all those things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants, Luk. 17. 10. And if we are so unprofitable in our Acts of Obedience, certainly we are abominable in our Transgressions. St. Gregory, in his Morals, tells us, A diminutive Light may shine in Obscurity; but being set in the Sun, is darken'd. Wood not measured, may appear strait; but applied to the Rule, is found oblique. The Impress of a Seal may appear perfect in the Eyes of the Spectators, and yet be very imperfect in the Eye of the Artificer. So that which glitters in the Estimation of the Performer, is often-times sordid in the Discretion of the Judger. For, the Thoughts of God are different from the Thoughts of Men, Isa. 55. 8.

III. THE Memory of many Sins affrights me; and yet there are divers I am ignorant of. Who can tell how oft he offendeth? O cleanse thou me from my secret faults! Psal. 19. 12. I dare not look up to Heaven, because I have offended him which inhabits there. In Earth I enjoy no Refuge, expecting nothing from the Creatures, because I have offended the Lord of the Universe. My Adversary the Devil accuseth me to the Almighty, and desires him the most Just Judge to condemn me to Chains of Darkness, for my Sin, that would not lay hold on the Means of Grace.

IV. NEXT, The Four Elements, in their order, accuse me: And, First, The Heavens acquaint me, they have supplied me with Light, to my Joy and Comfort. The Air whispers me, I have given thee all manner of Fowl my Region affords, to be at thy Command. The Water violently speaks, I have given thee all manner of Fish to eat. And the Earth opens her Mouth, saying, I have given thee Corn, Wine and Oil to nourish thee; but how hast thou abused these Mercies, to the Contempt and Dishonor of our Creation? Therefore let our Benefits redound to thy Punishment; let the Fire consume thee, the Water overwhelm thee, the Air fann and winnow thee, the Earth swallow thee up, and Hell devour thee.

V. THE Holy Angels which were appointed by the Almighty to minister unto me in this Life, and to be my Comforts in the Life to come, they accuse me: for by my Sins I have deprived myself of their Ministry in this Life, and Hope of their Fellowship in the World to come; the Voice of God's Divine Law accuses me; either I must fulfil it, or perish; to perform the one, is impossible; and to undergo the other, is intolerable.

VI. GOD, the most severe Judge, and potentest Executer of his Eternal Law, accuses me: Him I cannot deceive, who is Wisdom itself; from him I cannot fly, who is Power itself, and reigns everywhere. Whither then shall I fly? Psal. 139. 7. Even to thee, O Blessed Jesu, my alone Redeemer and Savior. I hear a Voice which bids me hide myself in the clefts of the rock, Cant. 2. 14. Thou art that Rock, and thy Wounds are the Clefts; in them will I hide myself against the Accusations of all the Creatures.

VII. My Sins cry aloud, even unto Heaven; but thy blood which was poured forth for my sins, cries louder, Heb. 12. 2•. My Sins are potent to Accuse me, but thy Passion is effectual to Defend me; the Unrighteousness of my Life is powerful to Condemn me, but thy most perfect Righteousness is powerfuller to Save me. I appeal therefore from the Throne of thy Justice, to thy Mercy-Seat; but I dare not appear before thy great Tribunal, unless thy holy Merits interpose betwixt me and thy Judgment.

MED. II. That the Cross of the Holy Jesus should excite us to Repentance.

Rom. v. 8.

While we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.

BEHOLD, my Soul, thy Savior's Sufferings; the Wounds of him that was crucified, and the Torments of him that expired on the Cross: That sacred Head at which Angels tremble, is platted with a Crown of Thorns: That Face which in Beauty exceeded all Mankind's, is spit upon by the Ungodly: Those Eyes, brighter than the Sun in his Meridian, are obscured in Death: Those Ears which were accustomed to hear Angelical Anthems, are infested now with arrogant Speeches, and scornful Reproaches: That Mouth from whence proceeded Divine Oracles, and dictated to Angels their Celestial Lessons, receives nothing but Gaul and Vinegar: Those Feet which the devout Magdalene kissed, and wiped with the Hairs of her Head, are fastened with Nails: Those Hands which stretched out the Heavens like a Curtain, are now extended on the Tree of Shame.

II. THAT Body, the Deity's Temple, is scourged and wounded with a Spear: Nothing escaped the malicious Jews but his Tongue, and that was meekly exercised in Praying for his Persecutors. And he who now Reigns in the highest Heavens, underwent all this for lost Mankind: He felt the Pains of Hell, and cried out, My God! My God! Why hast thou forsaken me? Mat. 27. 46. So great was his Agony and Anguish, that he▪ which comforteth Angels, stood now in need of one to comfort him.

III. IF this happens to the Just, what shall become of wretched Sinners? What measure shall the Almighty take with us for our Offences, who is so wrathfully displeased with his well-beloved Son for the Sins of the whole World? O God of infinite Mercy, take from us these stony Hearts of ours, and give us Hearts of Flesh, that we may tremble at thy Word, and melt at thy Judgments. Lord, let us not forget thy Acclamations and Tears: Thou cryedst from the Cross, Behold, O ye Sons and Daughters of Men, what I suffer for you! Was ever Grief so great? or any Sorrow like unto my Sorrow? But O Thou whose Property it is to have Mercy, convert our stubborn Hearts unto Thee.

MED. III. Of the Fruits of Repentance.

Mat. iii. 8.

Bring forth therefore fruits meet for repentance.

THE Foundation of a Holy Life, is True Repentance; and where that is acquired, Remission of Sins, and Eternal Life succeeds. Why then do we defer our Repentance, and procrastinate it from day today? To Morrow is not in our possession; and to Repent sincerely, is not in our power; but when the Judgment-Day is approach'd, we must render an Account not only for one Day, but for our whole Lives.

II. ACKNOWLEDGE and bewail thy Sins, so shalt thou find God in Christ appeased towards thee. I, even I am he that blotteth out thy transgressions, saith the Lord, Isa. 43. 25. inferring our Sins are enrolled in the Court of Heaven. Turn away thy face from my sins, begs the Royal Prophet, Psal. 51. 9. Demonstrating that our Iniquities are in God's sight. Be converted unto us, O God, prayeth Moses: therefore our sins do separate us from God, Isa. 59. 2. Our sins have answered us, complaineth Isaiah, ver. 12. and do accuse us before God's Tribunal. Cleanse me from my sins, is the Psalmist's Petition, Psal. 51. 2. Concluding, our Sins, in appearance, are sordid in the Eye of the Almighty.

III. SIN is the Distemper of the Soul: which moved David to cry out, Heal my soul, for I have sinned against thee, Psal. 41. 4. It is for Sin, that we are blotted out of the Book of Life. So said the Eternal, Whosoever shall sin against me, I will blot him out of my book, Exod. 32. 32. We are cast off by the Almighty for our Sins: which made David deprecate, Cast me not away from thy presence, Psal. 51. 11. Sin torments the Mind, and dries up the Moisture, as the Psalmist experienc'd, Restore me to the joy of thy salvation, Psal. 47. 12.

IV. Sin is infectious, says the Prophet, Isa. 24. 5. The earth is defiled by the inhabitants thereof, which have transgressed the law. Our Sins press us down to Hell, else the Psalmist had not broke out, saying, Out of the deep have I cried to thee, O Lord; Lord, hear my voice. 130. 1. Sin is the spiritual Death of the Soul. So says the Apostle, We were sometimes dead in our sins, Ephes. 2. 1. By mortal Sin, Man loseth his Creator, who is the infinite and Incomprehensible Good: therefore, to be deprived of him, is an infinite and incomprehensible Evil. And as the Almighty is the chiefest Good, so Sin is the chiefest Evil.

V. CALAMITIES and Punishments are not absolutely Evil; for many times from them Good is extracted: Nay, they may properly be called Good; because they are God's Messengers, and proceed from him who is the Fountain of all Goodness. Moreover, they lead us unto the chiefest Good, even Life Everlasting. Christ, by his Passion, entered into his Glory, Luk. 24. 26. And Christians, by Tribulations, enter into Life Eternal, Act. 14. 22. And consequently, Sin is the chiefest Evil, because it draws us from the chiefest Good.

VI. THE Sinner is accused by his Conscience, which he hath defiled; by his Creator, whom he hath offended; by the Sins he hath committed; by the Creatures he hath abused; and by the Devil, who hath seduced him. How saving then is Repentance, which frees us from such Accusations! Let us haste then with speed to such a sovereign Catholicon. If thou defer thy Repentance till Death, thou doest not forsake thy Sins, but they forsake thee; and it is very difficult to trace out an Example of sincere Repentance at the Hour of Death, except that of the Thief upon the Cross.

VII. FOURTEEN years have I served thee, (said Jacob to Laban,) it is time now that I should provide for my own house, Gen. 31. 41. And if thou hast pursued the World, and chased after the Vanities of it so many Years, it is now high time to provide for thy Soul. Every Day, nay, every Hour and Minute, we accumulate Sin; Oh, let the Spirit, every Moment, wash it away with Tears of Repentance. The Almighty infuses not the Oil of Mercy, but into the Vessel of a contrite Heart: He first mortifies us by Contrition, and then quickens us by his Spirit of Consolation: He leads us into a deep abyss of Grief, and brings us back by his Restraining Grace.

VIII. Elias first heard a vehement Wind, overturning Mountains, and cleaving Rocks; and after the Wind, an Earthquake; and after the Earthquake, Fire, 1 King. 19. 11. At length there followed a still, small Voice, ver. 12. From whence we may infer, That Terror is the precursor of the Love of Omnipotency, and Sorrow precedes Comfort. God binds not up any Wounds that are laid open by Confession: He Pardons and Justifies none, except they Acknowledge and Condemn themselves: He Comforts not, unless they first Despond. And this is the sincere Repentance which God, by his Holy Spirit, operates in us.

MED. IV. Of Man's Salvation.

Tit. ii. 11.

For the grace of God that bringeth salvation, hath appeared unto all men.

WHY art thou perplexed, O my Soul? and why art thou dubious of the Mercy of God? Remember thy Creator, who created thee without thy Assistance; who formed thee in secret, in the lower parts of the earth, Psal. 139. 15. He who took care of thee before thou werit born: Will his Providence neglect thee, now thou art fashioned after his own Image? To Thee, the Great Creator, does thy unworthy Creature address himself: Though my Nature is infected by Satan, and wounded by Thieves, which are my sinful Corruptions; yet my Creator liveth.

II. HE which made me, can renew me: He that created me without any Evil, can chase all Evil from me; whatsoever hath gained admittance by the Devil's Suggestions, Adam's Prevarication, or my own Actions; yea, though it hath over-spread my whole Substance. The Almighty never hated his own Workmanship: We are before him, like Clay in the Hands of the Potter. Had he hated me, certainly he would never have created me when I was nothing: He is the Savior of all men, but especially of them that believe, 1 Tim. 3. 10. He created me wonderfully, and redeemed me miraculously; but his Love was never so highly expressed, than in his Wounds and Passion.

III. SURELY we were indulgently beloved, for whose sakes the only begotten Son of God is sent from the Bosom of his Father. Dear was the Price of our Redemption, and great was the Mercy of our Redeemer: To make us Rich, he embraced Poverty; for he had not where to lay his head, Mat. 8. 20. To make us the Sons of the Most High, he condescends to become Man; and doth not, after he had accomplished our Redemption, neglect us, but still intercedeth for us, Rom. 8. 34.

IV. LET my Sins, Satan, and all the Powers of Darkness accuse me, in Jesus my Mediator will I trust, who is Greater than my Accusers. Let my Weakness affright me, yet in his Strength will I glory. For the Sufficiency of my Merit I am familiarly acquainted, my Merits is not sufficient; it suffices me, that he is propitious against whom I have sinned; and whatsoever he hath decreed not to impute, will be performed; and all Guilt, with the Price of his most precious Blood, shall be done away.

V. LET it not then perplex me, that my Sins, though many, and of such a magnitud• discomfort me: For were I not oppress'd, and heavy laden with Sins, what need I earnestly request Christ's Righteousness? Had I no Distemper, I had no necessity to implore the Physician's Help: but I am spiritually sick; and He who is the Lord our Righteousness, is both our Savior and Physician. Lord, I am Sick, a Sinner, and Condemned; and upon the Grand Inquest of my Conscience, pronounce myself Guilty: but have Mercy on me, O my Physician, my Savior, and my Righteousness!

MED. V. The Youth's Memento.

Eccles. xii. 6.

Remember now thy Creator in the days of thy youth.

IT was both seasonable and profitable Advice, and one of the elegantest and choicest Expressions in the Royal Preacher's Sermon. For, who is he which is now Young and Vigorous, that is certain he shall live to be Old? And yet that potent Voice which loudly proclaims to all the World, and whose Sound will remain till Death shall be expired, is scarce audible in the Ears of thousands.

II. 'TIS one of this divine Chanters harmonious Lessons; and yet the World thinks it too harsh a Note, and is very much displeas'd with the Tune. 'Tis strange, and an amazing Wonder, That the Sweetest and Wisest of Preachers should have so slender a Train of Followers, being his Oratory is so Rhetorical and Divine: And yet it is so weighty a Text, which though they shun to hear, understand, or read, they cannot evade the seeing; for the whole Universe is but a Comment on it; every Creature we behold, preaches this useful Doctrine, which we so supinely sleep out with our Eyes open.

III. NATURE herself carries this Memento in her Forehead; and the very Bruit Beasts, in this Philosophy, can reason with us: And it is strange madness, that Man should forget his Maker, did he but remember himself. But alas, blooming Youth affects not to be put in mind of Heaven, which he is not acquainted with; 'twould impair his Memory, and make him think of his Prayers too often: Piety will but chill his Blood; Religion makes him look wither'd; the Thoughts of Heaven, and a Future-State, will make him sager than his years requires: his Blood informs him, he is not yet qualified to turn Divine; he may serve his Creator time enough, when he is more at leisure.

IV. THUS these Temporal Objects of Vanity and Pleasure chase away our Thoughts from Heaven, and its Celestial Raptures: We can spend the Flower and Beauty of our Years in Vice, and think the Almighty will be well enough pleas'd with the Deformity of decrepit Age: We can sport and revel our Piety and Time in vain and frivolous Delights, and conclude ourselves potent enough to compel Heaven, and become Religious, when we are bow'd down with Infirmities, and have nothing left us but Repentance and a Tomb.

V. WE are so highly pleas'd with the Sweetness of Sense, that we are negligent of any greater Felicity; and so extraordinary much delighted with the Happiness of Sinning freely, that we could willingly embrace that Religion which tolerates Vice most: We place all our Devotion, with the luxurious Epicure, in the Riots of Nature: Jolly Meetings are our best Religious Exercises; a Sermon is as troublesome and melancholy to us, as a Funeral; and to hear of our Latter-end in the midst of our Pleasures, sounds like a Lecture of Death, the unwelcome and faint Echo of the Grave.

VI. LET the Preacher instruct us never so earnestly to remember our Creator, we rather choose to follow Satan's Doctrine, to enjoy this World as long as we can, and entertain Thoughts of Heaven at our leisure. And shall the Lusts of this vain World, O Lord, be greater in my Soul than the Love of Thee? Shall the temporary Allurements of Sin eclipse the Memory of thy Glory? My Life, I know, is but a Span; and yet, I beseech thee, abreviate that, rather than it should be spent in a neglect of Thee: better this Earthly Tabernacle of my Body be dissolved, than become a Theatre for Sin to revel in.

VII. LET me pay unto Nature the due Debt I owe her, sooner than perhaps she would summons it, rather than run deeper in score with thy Justice. 'Tis far better I should die, and be lost in the memory of the World, than to forget thee: Thou broughtest me, at first, from nothing, not to sin, but to serve and fear Thee; and has impressed in me a Ray of thy blessed Self, that I might not seek my own perverse Will, nor pursue this vain World, but heavenly Mansions: inure me therefore to Thee, that I may behold those solid and ravishing Joys and Consolations that is in serving of Thee; what Tranquility accompanies thy Grace; that so I may no longer follow my own depraved Sense, but my Savior.

VIII. IT is none of the least Sins of our Youth, that we are negligent and forgetful of Thee our Creator. And no wonder we are ignorant and insensible of the Joys to come, that live in such a constant and continued neglect of Heaven. Make me therefore, O my God, seriously to consider, that had I the perfect Fruition of all I could wish or long for here, I should not only be unsatisfied, but, in the end, find how miserable he is that fixeth his Heart on anything but Thy Self. Teach me therefore so to enjoy the World, that I lose not Thee, nor the Memory of that Blessed and Eternal Reward Thou hast promised to them that Honor and Fear Thee.

MED. VI. General Rules for a Godly Life.

Ephes. xv. 16.

See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise; redeeming the time, because the days are evil.

EVERY Day Death approaches thee, and then follows Judgment and Eternity. Therefore, think often how thou mayest be able to Answer, in that most strict and severe Judgment: Look circumspectly unto thy Thoughts, Words, and Actions; for at that great Tribunal thou must render up an exact Account, Eccles. 12. 14. Every Evening and Morning entertain thy Thoughts of the pale Messenger, and defer not thy Repentance till the next Day; for the Morrow is uncertain; but Death is certain, and waits no Person's leisure.

II. NOTHING is more opposite to Piety than Procrastination. If thou contemnest the inward Voice of the Holy Spirit, thou will never attain to a sincere Repentance. Make it thy business and study to walk in the Law of the Lord. In thy Conversation be Affable and Courteous to all, Perplexing to none, and Familiar with few: To God live Piously, to thyself Continently, and to thy Neighbor Justly: Shew Favor to thy Friend, Patience to thy Enemy, thy Good-Will towards all, and thy Bounty to whom thou art able. Always call to mind Three things past, the Evil committed, the Good omitted, and the Time pretermitted: And ever bear in mind Three things present, the Brevity of this present Life, the Difficulty of being saved, and the Paucity of them that shall be saved.

III. LET thy Evening Prayers ascend, and humbly confess the Sins of the Day past, and think how many are in danger of Hell-fire. Let the last Day of the Seven correct and amend what Enormities thou hast committed the whole Week: Shew Obedience to thy Superiors, give Counsel and Aid to thy Equals, and Defend and Instruct thy Inferiors: Subdue thy Body to thy Mind, and thy Mind to the Will of God: Heartily bewail thy past Evils, and set not thy Affections on Temporal Enjoyments, but fix them on that which is Eternal: Mourn for Sins, upon remembrance of them; and often remember Death, that thou mayest cease from Sin: Let the Justice of the Almighty keep thee in Fear, and his Mercy preserve thee from Despair.

IV. WITHDRAW thyself, as much as thou canst, from the World, and addict thyself wholly to God's Service: In Pleasures and Delights, be vigilant of thy Chastity; in Riches, exercise thy Humility; and in worldly Affairs, neglect not Piety: Be studious in pleasing none but thy Savior, neither fear to displease any but Him: Deprecate Him always, that his Will may be done on Earth, as it is in Heaven; and beseech Him to forgive thee what is past, and to guide and govern what he has wrought in thee, for the future.

V. ABANDON all Hypocrisy; for God judgeth not according to external appearance, but according to the Heart. In thy Words, take heed of vain repetitions, Mat. 6. 7. because for every idle word thou must give an account in the day of judgment, Mat. 12. 36. Let thy Words, Works, and Actions, be good or evil, they pass not away, but remain as Seeds of Eternity. And the Apostle assures us, If thou sowest to thy flesh, of the flesh thou shalt reap corruption; but if thou sowest to the spirit, of the spirit thou shalt reap life everlasting, Gal. 6. 8. Neither Honors, Riches, Pleasures, or Vanities of this Life, can attend thee, after thy Glass is run out. Set a low value upon what thou possesseth, but esteem highly what thou wantest.

VI. LET Holy Meditation produce in thee Knowledge; and Knowledge, Compunction; and Compunction, sincere Devotion. The Silence of the Mouth creates Peace in the Heart; and, and the more thou separates thyself from the World, the more acceptable thou art to the Almighty. Whatsoever thou requestest, ask it of God; and whatsoever thou enjoyest, resign up freely unto him: for he that is unthankful for what he has received, is unworthy of receiving more; and the Gifts of Heaven cease to descend, when the Incense of our Thanks leave off ascending.

VII. WHATEVER happeneth to thee, convert it to a good use; as in Prosperity, bless and praise God, and exercise Charity according to thy Ability. So in Adversity, exercise thy Repentance for what Enormities thou hast committed, which thou canst not but imagine to be the Efficient Cause of what thou sufferest. Let Humility keep thy Heart in Subjection, that Arrogancy may get no possession of thee. Judge God to be a Father, for his Clemency, Power, and Gentleness; a Lord, for his Discipline, Severity, and Justice. Love him piously, as a Father, for his Mercy; and fear him, and trust in him, who abhors Sin in the least degree. Ever humbly acknowledge thy own Misery, but loudly proclaim his Mercy.

MED. VII. The Whole Duty of Man.

Eccles. xii. 13.

Fear God, and keep his commandments, for this is the Whole duty of man.

FEW there are which perform this Lesson; which yet should not so much appear our Duty, as it ought to be our Delectation. He that hath but once acquired the habit of adoring his Maker, will assideously confess Religion the highest of Pleasures; and that Legislative Power which seems so formidable and disgusting to the World, will prove but recreative to his Immortal Soul. But alas, how little is there of the Royal Prophet's Piety now among us, when instead of delighting in God's Law, we obliterate it more; and are so far distant from meditating in it either Day or Night, that we never in the least think or consider of it at all.

II. 'TIS become a Custom, now, to Sin with Audacity; and a Syllogism of much Valour, to exile this timorous Religion, or fearing either the Almighty, or his Law, which he hath given us. The Royal Preachers edifying Doctrine is as obsolete, and worsen than a Paradox; a mere Apocrypha, and a Heresy to revive it. To instruct us in our Duty, is to scurrilize the Times, whilst we officiously unhinge Religion; and it is no amazing wonder there are such swarms of Atheists: but indeed, there never was such a time to generate them, as now; trace Antiquity to its primitive Rise, and this Age cannot be parallel'd.

III. THE World never increased so much in Sin: abominable Sects, and disaffected Parties, like Colonies, new cultivate the Earth; Profaneness is grown Hereditary, and sprouts out by Propagation; so that in process of time, Posterity may perhaps become Ethnics. Were the Divine Wisdom and his Promise mutable, a Deluge would prove but a slender Penalty. We not only sin, but exult in it more; whilst some, not satisfy'd to be occult and silent Atheists, proclaim it aloud, and are fierce of acquiring the Reputation; as if we could not render our Ingenuity enough, without Denying our Maker.

IV. NO marvel Religion is out of Tune, when a Harmony in Ecclesiastics is wanting; or that Christianity bears so faint a Sound, when common Morality is not heard. And yet it is a Lesson which we cannot learn too well, a Tribute we cannot pay too often. We owe our Breath to the Bounty of his Hand; what Homage then can we better pay than that, which by magnifying of him, we purchase an Immortal Crown for ourselves? Tell me, ye stupid Chasers of the World, what ye aim at in all your Pretences? Ye that scoff at Heaven, and make Divinity a Garment for Unrighteousness? That with the Pharisee, embrace Formality for your Religion, and make an external Piety your Duty?

V. ALAS, Heaven is not gained by pious Fraudulency, gilded Crimes, or fortunate Transgressions; nor the Eye of the Almighty to be deluded with a gaudy Zeal. 'Tis not a pretended Sanctity, that can invest us with Immortality; nor a modish Devotion only, that will conduct us to Heaven. How miserable is he who idolizes the World, and embraces that Religion, to neglect his Creator! Therefore let us make that inquest of the Voice within us, and then invoke the Almighty in these or the like Expressions.

VI.

O GREAT Jehovah, what didst thou bestow our Reason on us, but to diligently listen unto the Voice of thy Law, that the Celestial Rhetoric of thy Word, might at least attract from us an ignorant Profaneness? Shall Ethnics, that had no other Scope, no other Recompence for their Sanctity, than some vain Applause, or the internal Triumphs of their Spirits, for their good Performances, outvie us in the Splendours of a Moral Life; and we that have sublimer and purer Hopes, be scarce Obedient for Thy sake? Shall they that are ignorant of Thee, be more passionately Just, than we that have traced out Heaven, and expect Eternity to succeed?

VII.

THOUGH it was not in Man's Power to find Thee, till Thoudid'st reveal Thy Self in a Crucify'd Jesus; yet now having so richly, and in that Plenitude expressed to us the Treasures of Thy Love, shall we not be excited to perform something for Thy Glory? Incite us, we beseech Thee, to consider well the Advantages that are in Thy Service, the Felicity that accompanies Obedience, and thae Crown which is the Recompence of Faith; that so our Affections being mortified unto these fading Objects here Below, they may be enliven'd only with Desires after those Eternal Excellencies that are in Thee, in Thy Heavenly Kingdom.

MED. VIII. The Vanity of the World.

1 Joh. ii. 15.

Love not the world, nor the things that are in the world.

SET not thy Affections upon the World; for it shall pass away; and all the things that are therein, shall be consumed with fire? 1 Cor. 7. 31. 2 Pet. 3. 10. Love that Felicity which is Eternal, that so thou mayest enjoy it, and live forever. Every Creature is subject to Vanity: whosoever therefore idolizes the World, shall also become vain himself. Embrace that Good which is true and stable, that thy Heart may be quiet and fixed. Why doth mundane, ambitious Honor delight thee? He that seeketh Applause of Men, cannot be Honor'd by the Almighty, John. 5. 44. For he that chaseth after this World's Vanity, must be conformable to it: And the Apostle tells ye, He that pleaseth men, cannot please God, Gal. 1. 10.

II. HE that is Extoll'd yesterday, perhaps, to a high degree, by the Applauses of Men, may be level'd tomorrow by Dis•race. What is mortal Man the better, for gaining a Reputation of a greater value than others, if he is disesteem'd in the sight of God? Our blessed Savior being sought for to receive a Kingdom, fled from it; but to be ignominiously Crucified, surrendered himself. He that despises not the World, to follow Christ, how will he be qualify'd to lay down his Life for him? Therefore there is no passage to true Happiness, but by contemning the Poms and Vanities of this wicked and fading World.

III. CHRIST, that blessed Pattern, taught us how we should value the World: For, if He who is Glory itself, rejected Temporal Glory, why should we, to our prejudice, embrace it? What availeth the Praises of Men, if the Voice within accuseth us? Or, what signifies a Bed of Gold, to one in a burning Fever, unless the State or Pomp could abate the Torment? It is only the Testimony of a good Conscience, that admits of any Duration. But why doest thou chase so much after Riches? He is too covetous, unto whom the Almighty is not sufficient. This Life is the Path to our Eternal Country. What doth transitory things profit us: They do but rather overload the Traveler, as too much Burthen doth a Ship.

IV. THE Majesty of Heaven is the Riches of his Servants; then why shouldest thou not seek after that which will complete thy Happiness? Temporal Riches produce Labor and Toil in the getting, Fear in the possessing, and Grief in the losing: and, which is most deplorable, the Labor of the Covetous not only perisheth, but it brings them also to the same Destiny. Lot's Wife, which was turned into a Pillar of Salt, yet preaches unto us this Doctrine, Not to look back on the Splendour of the World, but with speed to hasten to our heavenly Country. And why doest thou so eagerly pursue after Pleasures? They are but Vanity, and in the end, Vexation of Spirit.

V. O THEN, let the remembrance of a Crucified Savior, banish from thee all Pleasures; and let the remembrance of a Fire Unquenchable, extinguish all inordinate Concupiscence. Compare but the short Moments of Pleasure with Eternal Punishments, and thou wilt relinquish one to evade the other. Worldly Pleasures, if really considered, are brutish; and they that are involved in those Allurements, assume the shape of wild Salvages. The Sweetness of Heavens Kingdom pleases not that Appetite which daily feeds upon Husk with Swine. Let us then prepare, with the Patriarch Abraham, and offer up to the Almighty, as an Oblation, this our beloved Son, even our darling Sins which have so long invaded us.

VI. LET us consider, the Way to Eternal Mansions, is not strewed with fragrant Roses, but with Thorns and Thistles. The External Man, indeed, is surrounded with Pleasures; but the Internal must press through many Tribulations. Let the Fear of Omnipotency then, macerate thy Flesh, that the Affections thereof may not delude thee. Retain always in mind the approach of the great Audit, that the perverse Judgment of thy sensual Appetite may no way enslave thee. Be not allured by the flattering Face of the Serpent, but remember the Sting he craftily conceals. Always invoke the Almighty to strengthen thee with his Grace, that at the last thou mayest receive a Crown of Glory.

MED. IX. Jacob's Ladder.

Gen. xxviii. 12.

And he dreamed, and behold a ladder set upon the earth, and the top of it reached unto heaven; and behold, the Angels of God ascending and descending on it.

THE Patriarch Jacob had no sooner fixed upon a Stone for his Pillow, but a splendid Vision accosts his sight: That filial Obedience which attended him from his Father, on a Journey to Syria, became a nobler Conduct, and directed him the Way to Heaven: Those Angelical Travelers ascending and descending before him: Happy Solitariness, and glorious Entertainment with such Celestial Company! The Uneasiness of his Lodging was highly recompenc'd by this Beatifical. Prospect; when the God of Heaven, the Lord and Governor of the World, appeared unto him, refreshing him with the graciousness of his Promises and Providence.

II. WHEN I view the Figure of this humble Sleeper, I cannot forbear wondering at the folly of those, that expect Visions from Above upon their soft Beds, and seek for Revelation in the plenitude of their Pleasures: Their wanton Spirits would wax sick, and be out of humor with Piety, should it molest or oppose their Quiet: How apt would their Devotion be to contract an Ague, should they, with the Psalmist, rise up at Midnight to invoke the Almighty? God distills not his Miracles into the Lap of the Wanton; nor communicates the Excellency of his Glory, but to those who resign themselves to Him.

III. St. JOHN must be exil'd to Patmos, before he can be admitted a Divine; and have converse with none but Angels, if he would be a fit Penman for Heaven. Those devout Men, who were retired from all Company, but Solitude, and their Devotions, could not have merchandized so unspotted with Heaven, had they not renounced all Correspondence with the World; and unvesting themselves of all Temporal Felicities, obtained an higher degree of Grace, and became living Monuments of Celestial Grandeur.

IV. OUR devout Patriarch enjoyed here no-Canopy but the serene Air; no other Tapers to illuminate his Apartment, but the Lamps celestial; and the vigilant Angels move to and fro, as it were, to guard and preserve him. Oh, how securely doth he rest, that lays down his Head in the Bosom of Providence, and makes that his Soul's Receptacle! Repose thus Beatifical, denotes a Sanctuary: Nor need he fear any Disturbance in his Rest, that has the Almighty for his Keeper; or that his pious nocturnal Thoughts shall be molested with frightful Dreams.

V. IACOB had no sooner prepared to sleep, but those holy Messengers unlock the Heavens, and invite him to ascend. But 'tis by a Ladder. Heaven is not to be clim'd up to in a moment: The Path to Happiness is trod by degrees; and, as our Savior informs us, 'tis very narrow. Every Virtue is a step to Eternity; and he is so much onward of his Journey, that daily tramples upon his Vices. We cannot prove too good Proficients in a Life of Sanctity, or imagine that in the least Acts of Piety we have enough to conduct us to Happiness. 'Tis not a few Paces, but a constant Progress, that conveys us thither. Oh, how bad then is he, that thinks himself too good to be made better!

VI.

O LORD, the Promises of Thy Glory are immensable; and yet how negligently do we embracethem! Thou hast directed us the Way unto Thy Self, and yet we are not only reluctant, but even weary of walking to Thee! Alas, Is the Magnificence of Thy Kingdom not worth approaching to? Can we propose to ascend Thy Throne by a feeble and dronish Devotion? How actively do we run after the Vanities of the World, but in Thy Service pretend faintness? We can chase after the fading Pleasures of this Temporal Life, but neglect our progress in the Way Thou prescribest us to walk in.

VII.

QUICKEN us, O Lord, we beseech Thee, and make us more arduous and zealous in Thy Service; and as Thou hast sent Thy dearly beloved Son, and our Redeemer, to summon us to Thy Self, so do Thou likewise send Thy Holy Spirit to sanctify us for Thy Self, that we may, by Thy heavenly Grace, become a peculiar People, zealous of Good Works: And we, who of ourselves are unworthy to approach Thy Altar, will, by Thy Divine Assistance, run the ways of Thy Commandments; so that at last we may attain our End, even the Saivation of our own Souls, and appear with Joy and Gladness in the Day of the Lord Jesus.

MED. X. Of a Good Conscience.

Act. xxiv. 16.

And herein do I exercise myself, to have always a conscience void of offense towards Ged, and towards men.

WHATEVER thou undertakest, consult thy Conscience; and if Satan excites thee to any Evil, stand in awe of the Checks within thee: for the Internal Testimony is of more Efficacy than the External. Thy Conscience, that Angel-Guardian, which Divine Omnipotence hath fixed within thee, shall be register'd in those Books which will be opened at the Great Day, as is testified by St. John, Rev. 20. 22.

II. THE First is, the Book of God's Omniscience; wherein thy Thoughts, Words, and Actions, shall be demonstrated. The Second is, the Book of Life, Rev. 13. 8. wherein those that are found written by Verity and Faith, shall be safely conducted by the Angels into Heaven's Imperial Court. The Third is, the Book of Holy Writ; according to which Golden Rule, our Faith and Good Works shall be measured. The Fourth, contains the Testimony of the Indigent, whom we have defrauded or relieved. The Last Book contains the Internal Testimony of the Voice of Conscience; wherein all Offences are noted: and indeed, the Volume must be large, and exactly written by the Finger of Truth.

III. SINNERS, in that Day, will be fully convinced by the Terror within 'em; and they can no ways shun so just an Accusation. A Mind undefiled, is the Crystal-Glass of the Soul; and is so transparent, that she evidently, by the Opticks of Faith, beholds the Idea of the Almighty: for a sordid Eye cannot view the Splendor of a true Luminary. As a well Complexion'd, and good Featur'd Countenance, is esteemed in the Eye of the World; so an unspotted Conscience is acceptable in the sight of the Almighty. But that Conscience which abounds with Putrefaction, generates that Worm which continually, Vulture like, corrodes, but never dies.

IV. O THEN let us, while it is Day, with a true Remorse, have a sense and feeling of this never-dying Worm, and diligently labor to use all Arts to destroy it; and let us not indulge it by any means, lest it abide with us to all Eternity. What can it advantage thee, if thou werit a Proficient in all the Arts and Sciences in this Microcosm; nay, though thy Skill did extend so far, as to number the Stars, and to trace out the ways of the Planets, and didst enjoy no Peace within to comfort thee. Let it be thy care to square the Actions of thy Life according to that Rule prescribed by the Holy Jesus. Let Purity reign in the Centre of thy Heart, Verity possess thy Tongue, and embrace Justice, that it may attend thee in all thy Proceedings. All which will evidently demonstrate whether thy Life be Good or Evil.

V. ALL the Applause and Breath of the World is insignificant, if thy Bosom Friend, thy Conscience, accuse thee? And what can all their Detraction prejudice thee, if she defend thee? This potent Judge thou carriest about thee, is sufficient to Accuse, Testifie, and to Condemn thee: This Justice holds the Balance even, and will not be bribed with unjust Rewards; never will she be mollified with fruitless Prayers, but she indefatigably follows thee whithersoever thou goest, and will attend thee where-ever thou art, carrying about her that Charge which thou hast committed to her custody, whether it be good, or whether it be evil.

VI. AND as the Testimony of thy Conscience evidences against thee, such Judgment must thou expect from the Judge of all Men. Sinners themselves, at last, shall become their own Accusers, though no other Testimony appeared against them. For Instance, The Drunkard, when he is overwhelmed with Wine, or Strong-drink, hath no sense of the Prejudice he hath received by his Intemperance; but having slept away his Drunkenness, the charm of sensuality is fractur'd, and he feels the smart of his own Imbecillity.

VII. So Sin, that Diabolical Treasure, whilst it is agitating, darkens the Mind, and, like a condense Cloud, obscures the Luster of perspicuous Judgment; but at length the Voice within is roused up like a Lion, and rendeth more vehemently than any other Accuser. Oh, let us all, betimes, mortify this Worm, by the fervor of our Devotion, that it may not gnaw upon us, to our Destruction, and lead us to Eternal Horrour. Extinguish this internal Fire by thy Prayers and Tears, that so thou mayest enjoy Heaven in the Cool of the Day. Which God of his infinite Goodness grant that we may attain, by fighting a good fight, finishing our course, and keeping the faith, 2 Tim 47.

MED. XI. Of a Wounded Spirit.

Prov. xviii. 14.

But a wounded spirit who can bear?

NONE, on this side Eternity! not the vastest Heap, the Universe itself, that Theatre of Humane Frailty, cannot; for it groans and travels in Pains itself, to be delivered. Celestial Mansions was no longer a Residence for those ambitious, rebellious Spirits, who forfeited their Glory for those infernal Flames: which Torment is not equivalent to that infinite Despair which forever secludes and interdicts them from it. It is no surprizing wonder, that many imagine there is no Infernal Place like this; for its Torments are not to be parallel'd.

II. FIERY Furnaces, Stakes, Gridirons, or Phalarus's Bull, are but Trifles, to this greedy Vulture. Tortures of the modernest Invention, are delightful Penalties, compared to this Cruelty: Those inhumane dying Miseries, do but enrage and stupefy Sense; whilst this vital Death, this destroying Life, exercises its Malice on a more Celestial Object; and contending to demolish and ruin an Immortal Part, makes Death itself a Principal, and gentle Murderer to it.

III. CROAKS of Ravens, Shrieks of Owls, and Houls of Wolves, that adds Obscurity to the dismal Night; Groans of departing Souls that invade the Ear, and fill the Apartment with trembling Epitaphs, transcribed in Characters mournful as the Grave and Silence; are well-tuned Harmonies, to the dying Elegiacks of a wounded Spirit, that vents nothing but bloody Satyrs against itself. Behold how, with the disconsolate Psalmist, it goes mourning all the Day and Night, environ'd with Sorrows, and surrounded with dismal and fatal Idea's, and inverts his Bed into a Bath, which those weeping Fountains of Tears, his Eyes, have distilled! and instead of splendid and gentle Airs, evaporates nothing but dark and trembling Accents! which busy Satan labors to retort in doleful and despairing Echo's.

IV. HOW contritely doth it expostulate with Heaven; My dearest Redeemer, is that amiable Attribute of thy Mercy lost? Is the Fountain of it dried up from a poor and wretched Sinner? And wilt thou be a Jesus of Mercy to the whole Universe, and become none to me? Oh, let me descend from the loftiest Precipice, and forever dwell in noisome Dungeons, inhabited by none but loathsome Toads, Snakes and Serpents, beyond the reach and sight of all the World, so I may but enjoy the Light of thy Countenance! Let me live more poor and despicable than patient Job upon his Dunghill, perplexed with Boils, and and in a naked and dejected Deformity, so I may but conceal my Leopard's Spots, and place a Beauty in my Soul, which may invite that Allseeing Eye, whose radiant Beams can comfort all Mankind!

V. TAKE heed, thou Sensualist, that now revellest and riottest in the World's Theatre, and counter-charms Damnation: Wert thou but sensible of the terrible Agonies of Guilt, the Horrors of a murdering Sin, and the cursed Stings thy Pleasures leave behind them, how speedily wouldest thou list thyself in nobler Services, and employ thy Time in better Thoughts? Wert thou now to expire thy Breath, how would the Guilt of an evil Life appale thee, when every Sin would represent itself a Messenger of Horror, and the deluding World prove but an infernal Comforter.

VI. SHEW me in a Glass that Champion Conscience, that will not undertake, at length, to conquer that frozen Soul, whose Flashes will not liquefie and blast again, that Atlas-Sinner, whom gentle Burdens will not, at last, numerously depress. The World is unacquainted with a Misery equivalent; the Terrors of the unwelcom Grave are inconsiderate to it: which, could it but relieve the guilty Soul, and its tenebrous and silent Regions promise an Immunity from future Miseries, how readily would it purchase its Peace with Death, and implore its keenest Dart for a swifter Passage? Loss of Friends, Fortune, or Reputation, nay, Crosses which penetrate the Bone, are but slight Scratches, to these gaping Wounds. Procure me a Schedule of the deepest Afflictions; and there is none, I imagine, except this, which is not tolerable to be dispensed with: But a wounded Spirit, who can bear?

VII.

O LORD, how Ponderous is the Load of a Wounded Spirit! How Formidable are the Stings of a Guilty Conscience! and the Apprehensions of Thy Fiery Wrath! And how Deplorable is he that involves himself in Sin, and becomes insensible of his Guilt, till the Memento of his heinous Crimes display it: And when Mortality remembers him of a Future-State, nothing is his Concomitant but his erroneous Life. Oh, Omnipotency! Thou hast fixed an impartial Register in our Breasts which no fawning Practice can bribe, nor Fountain of vulgar Tears silence from recollecting us of Thy Justice; and yet what numbers are there whose Consciences, like the great Leviathan, snap in sunder the Silver Cords of thy Divine Law, like Threads of Flax? and are so backward from Confessing their Crimes, that they are become obdurate in their Impenitence? But, Lord, do Thou teach me, as I commit Sin, so inspire me with Thy Grace daily, that whenever I shall approach Thy Presence, I may have no other Sins to testify against me, than those which I possess; which if not thoroughly crucified, yet, at least, sincerely repented of with hearty Contrition.

MED. XII. Of Humility.

1 Pet. v. 5.

Be ye clothed with humility; for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

IF thou doest but seriously consider the miserable State of Mankind, thou wilt easily shun the Temptations of an arrogant Spirit. Man, the Lord of all Below,

though he assumes to himself that Pride of Heart, yet he is Vile in his Ingress, Miserable in his Progress, and Lamentable in his Egress: He is often assaulted, and provoked by Satan's Temptations: He is allured by Delights and Pleasures, cast down by Tribulations, entangl'd by Accusations, disrobed of Virtues, and ensnar'd into evil Habits and Customs. Why then art thou proud, O Earth and Ashes? Eccles. 10. 9. What wast thou in thy Conception, but sinful Corruption? What in thy Life, but a Lump of Flesh? And what after Death, but Food for Worms? If there be any spark of Goodness in thee, it is not thy own, but the Almighty's, who is the only Donor of it.

II. THOU canst claim nothing peculiar to thyself, but Sin which accompanied thee into the World; and therefore▪ if Divine Omnipotence hath inspired into thee any measure of His heavenly Grace, give Him the Glory to whom it is most due. If thou wilt be Christ's Disciple, observe His Doctrine: Learn of me, for I am meek and lowly of heart, Mat. 11. 29. And he that observes this Lesson, will at length attain to be a Proficient in the School of Humility. Our Savior, the Pattern of Humility, stiles Himself, the Lily of the Valleys, Cant. 2. 1. Inferring, That He is the most imbellish'd of all Flowers; and springs forth, not in the mountainous and lofty proud Hearts, but in the low Valleys of the contrite and humble Spirits.

III. AND the Royal Psalmist tells ye, God dwelleth on high, and yet he beholdeth the things that are humble, both in heaven and earth, Psal. 113. 5. If we contemplate with ourselves, we may soon come to this result, That we cannot approach unto that Great Being, unless we tread in the Paths of Humility; for he that appears vile in his own Eyes, is valuable in the Eyes of the Almighty. Weakness and Frailty is entailed upon Humanity, and none can pretend to boast of such an Imbecillity. The twenty four Elders, (Rev. 4. 4.) cast down their Crowns before the Throne, (ver. 10.) and render unto God all praise and glory. And the Seraphims cover their faces, before the face of the most Highest, Isa. 6. 2. What then should Man do, who is the vilest of all Creatures, the worst of Sinners, and so unthankful to his Creator.

IV. CHRIST, the Everlasting Son of God the Father, wonderfully descended from Heaven in great Humility, and miraculously condescended to take our frail Nature upon Him, and stooped so low as to be crucified for us: And what should poor Mortality answer for so high an Indulgence, who is gone so far astray from his Maker? Behold, thou aspiring Soul, with what wonderful Humility thy Savior hath allayed thy Pride! And dost thou still swell with Ambition? By the Path of Humility, and his bitter Death and Passion, Christ entered into his Glory, Luk. 24. 26. And dost thou imagine ever to reach Heaven-Gates, by wallowing in the haughty way of Pride: Lucifer, for his Ambition, was expel'd Heaven; and our First Parents, for Diabolical Pride, was cast out of Paradise: And dost thou think to arrive at Eternal Happiness through a Sea of Pride?

V. OH, let us rather demean ourselves, with an humble Jesus, to wash the Feet of others, than to seek ambitiously, with Satan, for the highest Place. Let us humble ourselves under the Mighty Hand of God, in this Life present, that we may be exalted, in due time, in the Life to come. Fix not thy Heart upon what thou hast, but consider seriously what thou wantest. Mourn for those Graces that are absent, rather than extol those Virtues thou hast acquired. Conceal, with all humility, what good Qualifications thou doest enjoy; but confess those Sins thou daily committest.

VI. AS Fire is preserved by covering with Ashes, so Charity is secured under the Guard of Humility. Pride is the Seminary, Parent and Nurse to all Sins: Exercise therefore thy Vigilance and Care against any Elevation, lest by the precipice of thy Folly thou be cast headlong into the deep abyss of Sin and Misery. And now having considered the Detestableness of this Sin of Pride, and the Amiability of this Virtue of Humility, let us earnestly endeavor to abandon the one, and embrace the other; and with all Sanctity, invoke the God of all Spirits to infuse into us his heavenly Grace, that this Tumour of Pride may be asswag'd in us; that his Meekness and Humility may be our perfect Pattern to guide us in this Life, and conduct us to the Life to come.

MED. XIII. The Proud Pharisee.

Luk. xviii. 11.

The Pharisee stood and prayed thus with himself, God, I thank thee, that I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers, or even as this publican.

SEE how Ingratitude is radicated in this proud Pharisee, that he so imperiously thanks Heaven! How prodigiously hath Pride metamorphos'd him! He that accustom'd himself to prolix Prayers, intends now to use brevity: His devoutest Posture is, Standing; and he comes not to Pray, but to Boast; not to Worship his Creator, but to Extoll himself: He is not qualify'd to be highly Pious, being so opinionated and transported with his own Virtues, that he is destitute of either Time or Patience to remember the sole Author, whose Benignity he would pretendedly seem to acknowledge, but 'tis so luke-warmly, 'twere better he were ungrateful still.

II. TRUTH had a lucky chance, to proceed from such graceless Lips. He did, indeed, far excel others, even to the Superlative degree of Audaciousness: But had he been acquainted with himself better, he would have proved more Grateful, and not so Arrogant. How amply doth he disturb the Ear of Heaven with these Ostentations of his singular Value; but for his Pride and Arrogancy, makes not the least Apology. Indeed, he Thanks the Almighty; but 'tis after a modish Carelessness, and rather an airy Complement, than a solid Prayer.

III. HE may plead Ignorance; but be found guilty of the breach of the Second Commandment, in the First Table. For he knows he is forbid to Worship Idols, or Images; yet thinks it no Sin to Idolize himself: and therefore dares presume to offer to the Almighty a Schedule of his own Merits. How many apt Scholars is there in the World, that hath perfectly learned this Lesson, and imprinted it in their Memory? See how the Roman Pharisees charm and puff up themselves with Pride, by their sanctimonious Acts of Supererogation, and think to scale Heaven by a Ladder of their own forming; magnifying a superabundant Piety, and triumphing in a meritotious superfluity of performing more than their appointed Task.

IV. WITH how much Agility do our trembling Enthusiasts follow their Generals Path, in a sanctimonious Pride, by a supercillious Purity of Intention; presuming it their Prerogative to reform the Universe, and create it again a-new? That Canonize themselves according to their mode; and with the proud Pharisee, not only thank the Almighty, but tell him positively they far excel other Men; That outrageously and loudly proclaim themselves the great Luminary of the World, and in a devout lunacy, would crowd in new Notions, extravagantly decrying all Religions but their own? These malecontented Pretenders immure themselves a-part from others; and by a morose Piety, are become so prodigiously Divine, that they have always extinguished their Humanity.

V. NOW, if the Pharisee were not as other Men, yet these resemble him, having been such exact Proficients in his Nature and Religion.

So apt and prone, O Lord, are we to be seduced, even in our best Performances, and (whilst we vainly imagine ourselves not only to excel others, but so meritorious in Thy sight) as to be elevated into Presumption. Tis Humility must Crown all our Graces, and put a Luster on our Requests, whilst the presuming Assurance of our own Merits does not only deface, but seclude us from Thee.

VI.

TEACH us therefore, O Lord, with such Expressions of Gratitude, to use Thy Gifts, that we may not be stupefied, so as to be forgetful of ourselves or Thee▪ Whilst others arrogantly boast themselves in meritorious Acts of Supererogation, let us earnestly endeavor humbly to acknowledge, confess and bewail our many Imperfections. Let not asanctimonious Pride seize upon our Immortal Souls, that may any ways hinder us from being innocent from the great Offence.

MED. XIV. The Soul's Delight.

Psal. xciv. 19.

In the multitude of my thoughts within me, thy comforts delight my soul.

GOD, the bountiful Provider of all the World, hath prepared a great Feast, Mat. 22. 4. And those which hunger and thirst after Righteousness, are freely invited. He that tasteth not, is not sensible of the Sweetness of this Divine Banquet; and he that has lost his Appetite, is not expected a Guest at this Table. If thou believest on the Lord Jesus, obey the first Summons, and approach with cheerfulness to this Royal Repast. None can acquire a Credulity, unless with Contrition he confess his Sins, and repent of the same in Dust and Ashes. And as Contrition is the spiritual Hunger of a Soul surrounded with Sin, so Faith is the spiritual Food that revives and nourishes it to Everlasting Life.

II. GOD gave the Israelites in the Wilderness, Manna, the Food of Angels, Exod. 16. 15. And in this Entertainment of the New-Testament, the Almighty exhibits to us the Celestial Manna; yea, he is there present himself, who is that spiritual bread which came down from heaven to give life unto the world, Joh. 6. 51. He which had a desire to see his Field, refused to come, Luk. 14. 18. From whence we may infer, That they which set their Affections on the Pleasures of this Life, cannot approach to this Holy Table. When the rich Gallant, in the Gospel, heard that he must forsake all his Goods of Fortune, for Eternal Life, he went away sorrowful, Mat. 19. 22.

III. CHRIST, the Celestial Elisha, infuses not the Oil of his Loving-kindness but into Vessels which are empty, 2 King. 4. 4. And his Divine Love never inspires any Soul, except the Love of the World be extracted from it, whereby it may become a fit Receptacle for so Divine a Guest: For, where our treasure is, there will our heart be also, Mat. 6. 21. Temporal Enjoyments hath its attractive Allurements; but Divine Love hath that Energy to unite us to the Deity. Terrestrial Treasures consists in the Goods of Fortune; but in these the Soul can acquire no Satisfaction, for it is beyond what this World can afford, and therefore seeks for far greater Excellencies than transitory things.

IV. DID we but seriously consider the Duration of all Temporalities, we would not fix our Hearts so fervently upon them: For upon our Bed of Mortality no Relief can be expected from 'em; and what an absurdity is it for us to place our Affections on those things which are so frail and inconstant! Our First Parents, when they rebelled against the Most High, would have attempted the Tree of Knowledge of Good and Evil; but before they could accomplish their Designs, were driven out of Paradise, Gen. 3. 6. So may we expect, it that Immortal Part, our Souls, should forsake him who hath so dearly purchased 'em, and cleave unto the World; but that we must undergo the same, if not a worse Punishment.

V. THEY which neglect our Savior's candid Invitation of, Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, shall not avoid hearing of him pronounce that Sentence of, Go ye cursed into everlasting fire, Mat. 25. 41. The Sodomites were consumed with fire, Gen. 19. 24. for refusing to hear Lot's Doctrine. and without a speedy Repentance, the Fire of God's Anger will consume them which have despised his Gospel, and rejected all Reproof. The five Foolish Virgins who neglected trimming their Lamps, were excluded the Bridegrooms Presence; so those whose Hearts are not inspired with Celestial Oil, must expect to be debarr'd the Participation of Eternal Joy and Comfort.

VI. CHRIST internally calls to us, by his Holy Spirit, and secretly affords us Motives to holy Desires, devout Affections, and pious Cogitations; and happy is he whose Soul is invested with these Ornaments. When thou perceivest the least spark of the Divine Goodness in thee, which doth excite thee to the performance of any good Duty, then labor to cherish it, that it may break out into a flame; and take heed that thou quench not the Spirit, and by that means extinguish the Operation: And the Apostle affirms, If any man defile the Temple of God, him shall God destroy, 1 Cor. 3. 17.

VII. THE Heart of a Man, is the living Temple of the Lord; and he is guilty of the Destruction of it, who refuseth to give place to his Holy Spirit. The Prophets, in the Old Testament, diligently hearkened unto the Word of the Lord; and were prophetically inspired, as a Reward for their-Obedience. And in the New-Testament, the Disciples and Apostles were punctual in preaching the Gospel, and they were inspired by the Holy Ghost; and were at last Crown'd by the Merits of Christ, as a Recompence for their Labors; and to those which shall imitate such good Examples, blessed are they which shall hear and persevere in such good Performances.

MED. XV. True Contentment.

Phil. iv. 12.

I know both how to be abased, and I know how to abound: everywhere, and in all things I am instructed, both to be full, and to be hungry; both to abound, and to suffer need.

NONE but this happy Apostle, such a divine Saint as St. Paul was, could become a Proficient in this Lesson. How few is there, that have desired to learn it? 'Tis a Lecture the World hath long ago been weary of: not so much, because 'tis so hard a Task, but because 'tis so unpleasant a Theme. Were the Way to Everlasting Happiness strewed with Roses of Pleasure, for our sensual Appetites to range and revel in, 'twould quickly become a frequented and an easy Walk. Were there no Difficulties, no skilful Trials to be past through, who, of a Mortal, would not become a Saint? The Crown of Eternal Glory would be as common as a Garland of Flowers, did not that of Thorns carry the precedence.

II. THE World values not a Religion which disanuls all Splendour, whose strict Discipline abrogates all Pomp and Pleasure; and instead of all Temporal Delights, which affects the Senses, preaches Temperance, Patience, and the Judgment to come. This Doctrine possesses us with an aguish Fit, and then we, like Felix, fall a trembling, and desire to be excused from so piercing a Duty. He that invites us to see Heaven first, informs us, That to desire Temporal Enjoyments, is the Wish of an Ethnick: For after all these things do the Gentiles seek, Mat. 6. 32. And shall Christians follow the Examples of Heathens? and aim not at sublimer Things than what this sublunary World can afford? Shall they who can, by the Eye of Faith, take a prospect of Eternity, look down upon this Lower World with Affectation?

III. AND was that the Occasion of this Invitation we gave the Most Highest? Did He which made the Heavens bow them, come down, and unthroned himself to convey us thither, and do we lie wallowing in our Sins forever? How Vile, Base, Vain, and Senseless a Creature is that Person, that winds up his Felicity in the fruitless Enjoyments of this Life, and eagerly resigns himself to sordid Sense! But tell me, O Thou that reignest in Plenty, and obscurest Heaven in Oblivion, should the two bright Luminaries be invested in their Purple Robes, and transforming their Lustres, like bleeding Meteors, change their Rays into Crimson Streams; were the Air now crowded with Sounds of the last Trumpets, echoing audibly in our Ears an approaching Judgment; How prodigious would that Mutation appear! What vast and horrid Consternations would the remembrance of thy Profane and Atheistical Plenitude then strike and amaze thee with!

IV. INDEED, these Mundane Enjoyments are so trivially poor & empty, that he which fixes his Hopes in their Fruition, will speedily find himself but an eternal Mendicant, a wretched, miserable, and deplorable Dives. And yet such is the apparent Sanctity of the whole Universe, to scoff at Religious Poverty, and deride the Exigencies of a Devout Life, as an Adversary to Nature: He is ignorant of the Joys of a Future State, and of an Expected Eternity, that thinks there's no Felicity beyond this Hands Breadth, no Happiness beyond this slender Span.

V. WERE we but sensible of the glorious Reward which shall Crown the World, for that which she terms Misery, that Felicity that attends on the most suffering and dejected Devotion, we should glory in our Wants, be affected with Hardship, and inure ourselves to Poverty with Delight; we should be willing, not only to depart, but to live Martyrs; rejoice even in the lowest State, to purchase Heaven; and cheerfully learn that Art, with the holy Apostle, to suffer Want here, and to labor how to abound in that Plenitude which is infinite.

VI.

AND yet how hard a Task is it for us to endure even the pettiest Affliction, for Thy sake, O Lord? So senseless are we of Thine abundant Goodness, so willfully forgetful of Thy Omnipotency, that we not only, in our greatest Necessities, arraign and condemn thy vigilant Providence, but are ready even to turn Pagans in our unhappy Misfortunes. Open Thou our Eyes, O Lord, that we may behold the Vanity of this transitory World, and the Deceitfulness of our own Hearts; that the alluring Pleasures of it may neither swallow us up, nor the Losses of it overthrow our Hope, or discourage our Obedience. Let that illuminated Glory which Thou hast freely promised to those that vanquish the World for Thy sake, be ever in our sight; that in whatsoever State we are in, we may still be found triumphing in Faith, and at last receive, as a Recompence of Reward, a Crown of Righteousness.

MED. XVI. Of Divine Faith.

Heb. xi. i.

Now faith is the substance of things hoped for, the evidence of things not seen.

LET us now consider the Efficacy of Faith, and offer up an Oblation of Praise and Thanksgiving unto him who is the only Giver of it. It is that alone which ingrafts us into the Body of Christ; and as Branches extract their Sap from the Vine, so from him proceeds Life, Righteousness, and Salvation. Adam, in his pristine State, fell, and lost his Divine Image, by his Incredulity; but we are restored again by Grace; and the Image of the Almighty, by Faith, is renewed in us. By this Faith, Christ dwells in our Hearts; and where He inhabits, there His Grace resides, and an Assurance of an Inheritance of Eternal Life.

II. AND as the Effects of Faith are Wonderful in their Operation, so they are Exemplary in their Demonstrations: For, By Faith, Abel offered unto God a greater sacrifice than Cain, Heb. 11. 4. So, by Faith, we are enabled to offer Omnipotency spiritual Sacrifices; that is, the Fruit of our Lips, Heb. 13. 15. And, by Faith, Enoch was translated, Heb. 11. 5. So that Virtue withdraws us from the Society of the World, and invites us to place our Conversation in Heaven, Phil. 3. 20. By Faith, Noah prepared an Ark, Heb. 11. 7. So we, by that Theological Virtue, are received into that Church wherein our Souls are preserved, amidst all the Storms and Tempests which happen in the World.

III. BY Faith, Abraham left an idolatrous Land, and went into a strange Country, in Expectation of the Promised Land, Heb. 11. 8, 9. So by the Energy of that Virtue, we depart this World, forsaking all that is near and dear to us, expecting to arrive at that Celestial Jerusalem which God hath prepared in the Heavens, Rev. 21. 2. We are Strangers and Pilgrims on this side Heaven, and travel, by Faith, unto a heavenly Country. By Faith, Moses chose rather to suffer Affliction with the People of God, than to enjoy the Pleasures of Sin for a season, Heb. 11. 25. So Faith animates us to condemn the World, and to despise the Glory, Honor, Riches and Pleasures of it; and excites our Minds to Eternal Felicities.

VI. BY Faith, Israel kept the Passover, Heb. 11. 28. So we, by the Eye of Faith, celebrate the Lord's Supper; where Christ is the Paschal Lamb, whose Flesh is meat indeed, and whose Blood is drink indeed, Joh. 6. 55. By Faith, Rahab was saved, Heb. 11. 31. So, in the universal Conflagration of this World, we shall be saved from Destruction. By Faith, the Fathers overcame Kingdoms, stopped the Mouths of Lions, and quenched the force of fire, Heb. 11. 33. So we, by Faith, destroy the Kingdom of the Prince of Darkness, escape the Treacheries and Rage of the infernal Lion, and are delivered from Hell's implacable Malice, and everlasting Burnings.

V. NOW, Faith is not a naked Opinion, and slender Profession; but a true and lively Apprehension of Christ propounded to us in the Gospel, a full Assurance of his Grace residing in us, the Tranquillity of our Souls, which relies only upon Christ's Merits. This Faith is fructified of the Seed of the Sacred Word, whereby the Holy Spirit and this Virtue is united. Now, Faith resembles a spiritual Illumination; for our Hearts are illustrated by its Splendor, and the Rays of a Life of Sanctity shines forth: Evil Actions are the Works of Darkness; and, What communion (saith the Apostle) is there between light and darkness? 2 Cor. 6. 14. Deeds of Darkness are the Seeds of Satan, but a lively Faith proceeds from Christ; and, What communion is there between Christ and Satan? 2 Cor. 6. 5.

VI. LASTLY, By Faith, our Hearts are purified; but no Internal Purity can center where the Words and External Actions are defiled. St. John tells ye, That Faith is the victory which overcometh the world, 1 Joh. 5. 4. Now, there cannot be a true Faith fixed, where the Flesh vanquisheth the Spirit, and leadeth it away Captive into the Law of Sin. No impenitent Sinner, that persevereth in his Sins, can be Partaker of Life Eternal; neither can he, without true Repentance, claim any Privilege or Share in the Merits of Christ Jesus.

Kindle in us, O God, the Light of True Faith, that by the Virtue of it, and Thy alone Merits, we may obtain Eternal Salvation, and reign with Thee for evermore, in Thy Kingdom of Glory, World without end, Amen.

MED. XVII. The Canaanitish Woman's Faith.

Mat. xV. 28.

And Jesus answered and said unto her, O woman, great is thy faith: be it unto thee even as thou wilt.

BEHOLD this Canaanitish Woman, how fortunate and happy she was, to be found worthy of so great an Expression! Her Female Weapon compensated for the Guilt of its past Follies; having now, by its seasonable Answers, merited so Divine an Eulogy. Poor Female! how enriched was she, in whose Bosom was concealed a Treasure, which Emperors, Kings and Princes, compared to her, are Indigent: All the Holy Land, with its precious Balm, and odoriferous Spices, could not furnish her with a sufficient Antidote to revive her Darling, and charm away the Infernal Spirit from tormenting her. Behold these Miracles of Faith, that at once could save two Souls, the Mother's, and her Daughter's!

II. SO miraculous and potent is solid Faith, that even the least grain of it can remove lofty Mountains, level steep Hills, and smooth the most aspert and ambitious Soul, into a meek and fructifying Valley. 'Twas this that calmed the Surface of the foaming Ocean, that made the boisterous Waves an easy Path, and turned their furious Rage into a pleasant Walk for St. Peter's Feet. 'Twas the Centurion's Faith, that gave his Servant a Respite from the Hands of Death, which all his Guards could never have prevented: 'Twas by Faith, that the Blind Man was restored to his Sight; which was beyond the Skill of Art and Nature to perform.

III. ALL the Admirations of the Gospel were always concluded with, Thy Faith hath saved thee: And yet that Faith which then operated so many Miracles, is now grown the greatest Miracle itself. Whilst some take the Symbol for the Thing, they fix the Magnitude of their Faith on the Greatness of their Works; and have so candid an Opinion of themselves, that they imagine it Faith enough, only to do well: Others expect to be Canoniz'd for their Doctrines, though not for their irregular Lives, they scoff at all Religious Duties, and imagine to tread the Path to Heaven only by their Faith.

IV. OBEDIENCE, hearty Contrition for Sin, that amiable Robe of a perplexed Soul, and the Royal Ornaments of our Spiritual Warfare, are but vacant Ceremonies, and both these Parties Belief are of their own forming. But Heaven is not purchased only by Speculation: He that fixeth his Faith in his empty Skull, and imagines Religion hath not its Attendant, may, like Moses, view and discourse of the Promised Land at a distance, but never approach to it. Our Obedience must cry out louder than our Pretensions. 'Tis not our Noise and Nonsense, that will create us Saints; 'tis not our external Shew of Profession only, but our daily Practises too, that must proclaim us Heralds of this Faith.

V. ALTHOUGH our Merits can never reach Heaven, yet our pious Endeavors may, if they are sincere; because there is a Mercy hangs over our Heads, that will pardon our Deficiency. All the Blossoms and Buds of our Piety spring forth from this Stem; and he that either believes or loves his Savior that died for him, cannot imagine he is too much industrious to live well. This was the Female Sex's Faith here; and she had scarce effus'd it out with floods of Tears, when the Infernal Fiend, in a Consternation, forsakes his hold, unable to endure the Echo of that Sound which was repeated by the diviner Accent of our Redeemer's Lips; and this Faith must be a Preservative against Sin; and by its diviner Charms, chase Satan to his Chains of Darkness. 'Tis this, that prepares Heaven for us; that makes us survive our Monuments, become Immortal in our Graves, and promises Eternity to our Dust and Ashes: 'Tis this that consummates our Happiness, and will safely arrive us, where the Blessed Jesus shall receive us into His Glory.

VI.

O MOST Divine Omnipotence, Thou sentest Thy Son Christ Jesus to die for us, that by Believing in Him, we might attain to Everlasting Life. He, under whom Thou hast put all things in Subjection, was pleased to condescend to level Himself with them; and dethron'd Himself, to undergo a Crucifixion for our Souls, that we might receive the Benefits of His Death and Passion, and be Partakers of His Glory. Oh, let not those Miseries of our depraved Nature, which petitioned Thy Mercy and Compassion, make us incapable of it: Let not those that plead Ignorance of Thee, but by Thy Miracles, be more ardous in acknowledging Thine abundant Goodness, than we who by the Manifestation of Thy Love claim an Interest in Thy precious Blood.

VII.

BUT grant, O Lord, that we may live in a perpetual Thanksgiving to Thy Merits, who camest down from the Bosom of Thy Father, to purchase and save our Immortal Souls: To this end; do Thou inspire into us that Faith, without which it is impossible we should please Thee, and with which Thou annexes all other Graces. Teach us so to rely on Thy Mercies, that we may not neglect the Means, or imagine that a dead Faith will conduct us to that Life which Thou hast promised to none but them as work out their Salvation with Fear and Trembling.

MED. XVII. Of Love and Charity.

2 Pet. i. 7.

And to brotherly-kindness, charity.

TRUE and Sincere Love is an inseparable Property of a Pious Person. No Christian can subsist without Faith; and where that Virtue is, Charity is not wanting. Where the Luster of Charity is extinguished, the Heat of Faith must consequently be quenched. Thou mayest as well rob the bright Luminary, the Sun, of his Light, as deprive Faith of the Gift of Charity. Charity is the External Act of the Internal Life of a Christian. The Body is dead without the Spirit, and Faith is dead without Charity, Jam. 2. 26. He is not a Member of Christ, that is not inspired with his Spirit; and he is not endued with his Holy Spirit, that is destitute of the Gift of Charity.

II. THIS Theological Virtue, is the fruit of the Spirit, Gal. 5. 22. And by the Goodness of the Fruit, the Tree is demonstrated. Charity is the bond of Christian perfection, (saith the Apostle, Col. 3. 14.) As the Bodily Members are united together by the Spirit, so the true Members of the Mystical Body are united by the Holy Spirit in the Bond of Charity. Solomon's Temple was all covered with Gold, within and without, 1 King. 6. 21. So our Bodies and Souls, which are the Almighty's Spiritual Temples, ought in like manner, both within and without, to be beautified with Love and Charity. Let this regent Virtue exercise its Efficacy in moving thy Heart to Compassion, and thy Hand to Contribution: For one, without the other, is not effectual.

III. FAITH receiveth all from God▪ the Fountain of all Goodness; and from that Stream, Charity, as a Channel, conveys it to her Neighbors. By Faith, we are made Partakers of the Divine Nature, who is Love, 1 Joh. 4. 8. Therefore, where Charity manifesteth not Externally, Faith Internally doth not inhabit. No Man believes in the Lord Jesus, which doth not express Affections of Love to Him; and none can fulfil that New Commandment, except he loves his Neighbor. None can really apprehend the Benefits of Christ, with a Heart unfeigned, which has not Bowels of Compassion to the distressed.

IV. CHARITY is the Seminary of all Virtues; and nothing can be of good growth, which proceeds not from that Root. And this Virtue truly delineated, is the Soul's Spiritual Relish; for unto it alone are all things dulcified, all Adversity, Pain, Anguish, Trouble, nay, even Death itself: And And the Wise Man confirms this, That Love is as strong as Death, Cant. 8. 6. And indeed, I think I may invert the Wise Man's Text, and with Assurance proclaim, That Love is stronger than Death: For Love brought down a Savior to die for us Sinners, that the Sting of Death might be removed from us: He, when he had overcome the sharpness of death, did open the kingdom of heaven to all believers. Oh, let us then embrace this Love, and die unto Sin daily, that we may live unto Righteousness.

V. ALL the Works of the Most High proceeds from this lovely Attribute, even Punishments, Denunciations, and Judgments: The Two great Luminaries, and the Constellations of Heaven, illuminate not themselves, but us wretched Creatures. Fire, Air, Earth, and Water, were created for our Necessity: The Beasts, Herbs, Plants, Trees, Birds, Fish, and Fowls, were all for our Use. And as God has been so gracious to give thee Plenty of these Blessings, so do thou distribute to thy Neighbors according to their Necessities. And this must be done freely, with true Amity, Affection and Compassion, else all our Charity is nothing worth, but will prove like sounding Brass, or a tinkling Symbal.

VI. CHARITY is patient, 1 Cor. 13. 4. For no Man is easily enraged with those whom he truly affects. Charity likewise is bountiful: And he who has been so liberal, as to resign his Heart to his Friend, will, without all question, not withhold from him any temporal Enjoyments for the Relief of his Necessity. Charity envieth not; it thinketh no Evil, is not puffed up, and behaveth not itself undecently: Next, she seeketh not those things which are her own, neither is she provoked to Anger; she imagineth no Mischief, nor rejoiceth not in iniquity; but she beareth all things, believeth, hopeth, and endureth all things: she refuseth not to do unto others, as she desires them to perform unto her. Tongues and Prophecies shall cease, and Arts and Sciences be destroyed, but Charity shall never be extinguished.

VII. LET us then study this Lesson of Love and Charity; and howsoever thy Friend or Neighbor be qualified towards thee, yet remember Christ vouchsafed to lay down his Life for him: Therefore, refuse not to relieve that Soul whom Christ hath so dearly purchased. Let us not, while upon Earth, live in Discord; but observe the Psalmist's extolling of Tranquillity, Behold how good and how pleasant a thing it is, for brethren to dwell together in unity, Psal. 133. 1. We are all the Servants of One Lord, all Members of One Body: we have all One Father that Created us, One Savior that Redeemed us, and One Holy Ghost that Inspires us. Should thy Neighbor prove thine Enemy, yet love him; for in so doing, thou obeyest the Will and Pleasure of the Almighty.

VIII. TAKE no cognizance of what Trespasses Man commits agrinst thee, but consider what thou standest guilty of against Omnipotency: Observe not what Injuries are offered to thee, by thy Enemies; but remember the Benefits confer'd on thee, by thy Redeemer, who commanded thee to love thine Enemies. We are Neighbors, by the State of our Earthly Nativity; and Brothers, by the Hope of our Celestial Inheritance. Let us therefore fervently love one another:

And do Thou inflame in us, O God, the Fire of Love and Charity, by the Inspiration of Thy Blessed Spirit.

MED. XIX. An Act of Divine Lov.

Luk. ix. 57.

Lord, I will follow thee whither soever thou goest.

HE was not ignorant, but knew it was the happiest Resolve he ever entertained: Nor can any check him for his Confidence, when it was his Glory to have been so presumptuous: he might have travel'd longer, and far remoter, and not have happened with such Celestial Company. Now the Query is, Whether his Boldness, or his Love to Christ, prompted him to this Heroic Action? Behold, with how devout an Importunity he salutes Him whom perhaps he had never known, seen, or heard of before, except by his Miracles only! And that Purity of Life which so amazed the Eyes of the Universe, could not but attract his Eyes, and inure his Heart too: And therefore thinking it no great Presumption to use all Arts of improving himself, nor willing to let slip so fair an Opportunity of being Happy; ambitious of an Admission into his Service, he breaks out into Raptures, without any other Oratory than a humble Earnestness, resolutely gives Him this Salutation, Lord, I will follow thee whither soever thou goest.

II. NOR could our Savior's Indigency, obstruct or deliberate his Resolution, or dishearten his Purpose; being not only satisfied, but ambitious to partake of the Afflictions of so good a Master, in whose very Necessities he should find a Felicity beyond all Temporal Enjoyments. And is not this Person a fit Example for the whole World to imitate? He that will not run after Jesus affectionately, yet let him not be so scandalous, as to permit a Jew or Publican to circumvent him in the Journey. Are the Felicities of Eternal Bliss of so small a Value, that they are not worth approaching too? Or shall we imagine every step too tiresome, that conveys us to Everlasting Glory?

III. Were the Path to the New Jerusalem but spread with fragrant Roses, or millions of odoriferous Scents and Pleasures to prevent Carnality, the brutish Sensualist would divert himself constantly, and strive to be a Precursor in those Walks. The Miser cannot follow a Crucified Savior, for his extorted Lumber; and rather than relinquish it, will make no Essay towards it. The riotous Epicure will not embrace that Religion that exhorts him to Temperance; for although, perhaps, sometimes, Prayer may be agreeable to him, in case of Necessity, yet Fasting is a Stranger to his Constitution.

IV. THE Celestial Way is too straight for proud Ambition, whose lofty Edifice affects not to be squeez'd in its full career, but must post it away swiftly in a Road of as vast an extent as the Universe, or the Infernal Pit can provide him, wherein his Troops of sinful Splendours may, as his Concomitants, attend him in a rank. So difficult a Task it is to abandon the World, even for Celestial Mansions; and contend against the Adulation of Sense, for an Inestimable Bliss; as if all our Hopes, all our Felicity, were wound and wrap'd up in Transactions of this Life only, and no future Expectation for us besides the Delectableness on this side Mortality.

V. AND yet how numerous are they that imposterously pretend to follow Christ! but must plead Ignorance to his Divine Steps, that pursue Causeys not of his proposing, but of their own shallow seeking: that beaten Path which so many Persons of Sanctity have walked before us, is too Vulgar, too Atheistical for them to trample in; they have, by their indefatigable and diabolical Industry, found out a nearer Way of their own; and imagine they shall arrive at the Celestial Country sooner, by shunning of that Way they think so difficult: So inauspicious is that eclipsed Zeal which hotly pursues an Ignis Fatuus which misguides 'em; and scorns the legal steps to the Sacred Temple, but shrinks itself in the obtuse and obscure Labyrinths of Enthusiasm.

VI. THE Way to the Heavenly Canaan is not thorough dark Corners; and how straight soever it is, its Passage to all Believers is kept open: 'Tis a serene Path, from whence may be viewed a Prospect of Eternal Happiness; nor need he be timorous of losing his Way, that doth not absurdly forsake it. The poor sinful Mortal here mentioned, in an Ecstasie hastes to Jesus; and joining Humility to Resolution, will admit of no Denial; but in a Mendicant Petitory style, and fortify'd with Confidence, thus proclaims his Mind, Lord, I will follow thee whither soever thou goest.

VII. AND now, who would not run with Alacrity, through Adversity, wild Woods, Desarts, and Wildernesses? nay, even wade thorough Seas of Blood, to arrive safe at the Port of the Heavenly Canaan? He that strives to follow after Jesus, shall never repent his undertaking so happy a Journey: He shall acquire such infinite Treasures in religious Poverty, such multiplicities of Celestial Joys and Satisfaction in the apparent Miseries of a Life of Sanctity, that he will not require any great Perswasions to excite him to this Resolution, cheerfully to forsake all, and follow Jesus whither soever he goeth.

VIII.

BUT 'tis Thou alone, O Lord, that canst raise our Souls from the World, and make them ambitious in searching after Thee and those Things which are Above. Thou art ascended to Thy Throne of Majesty, in glorious Splendour; attract our Souls after Thee in Divine Raptures of Amity, and Spiritual Exaltation, that we may effectually make the Virtues and Perfections of Thy Life, the Golden Rule of ours: And grant that we may not be so allured with transitory things, as to be void of Affection for Thy Glory; but enable us to walk with Alacrity in that Path which Thou hast trod, and fixed before us; that as we continually live by Thy Goodness, we may live to Thy Glory; and as we move in Thee, we may indefatigably be ever moving towards Thee, till we shall enjoy the Happiness of an Eternal Rest in Thy Heavenly Kingdom, Amen.

MED. XX. Of Chastity.

Rom. xii. 1.

I beseech you therefore, brethren, by the mercies of God, that ye present your bodies a living sacrifice, holy, acceptable unto God, which is your reasonable service.

HE that would be entertained a Disciple of Christ, must wear his Livery of Sanctity and Chastity: For, God is a Spirit of that infinite Purity and Chastity, that no unclean thing must presume to approach his Presence. It was the Opinion and Saying of a wise Person, That the Chastity of the Body, and the Sanctity of the Soul, are the two Keys of Religion and Felicity, Now, if the Body be not preserved pure and immaculate from all Sordidness, the Soul cannot be ardent in Supplication: Our Bodies are the Temples of the Holy Ghost, 1 Cor. 6. 19. And therefore we must be very vigilant and solicitous, that we defile not this Body, which is the Habitable of so great a Comforter.

II. OUR Members are the Members of Christ: Let us not then make 'em the Members of an Harlot; but let us cleave unto the Lord with Fidelity and Continency, that we may be one Spirit with him, and be pure as he even is pure. The swinish Sodomites were smitten with Spiritual and Corporal Blindness, and their burning Lust was punished with an Element proper to their crying Sins; and the Almighty will inflict the same Punishment on all obscene and incontinent Persons, with a Fire not to be extinguished: For the smoke of the torments ascendeth up forever, Rev. 14. 11. Nature hath taught us, not to be guilty in the Eye of the World; and shall not the Checks of our own Consciences impede us from committing Enormities in the Eye of Heaven.

III. DENS, Caves, nor Corners, can exclude us from the Divine Omnipotence: All Hearts are open to his Omniscience, all Desires are known, and from him no Secrets can be concealed: His Omnipresence is of that potency, that the Voice within us, upon the Grand Inquest, will bear Testimony against us; and our own Enormities being empannell'd, will condemn us upon the Verity of the Verdict. And who would not relinquish this momentary sensual Pleasure, to evade everlasting Burnings? If the Smoke of that concupiscible Fire ascends up to the Nostrils of the Almighty, nothing can purge the Odiousness of it, but infernal Flames.

IV. OH, let then the Remembrance of a Crucified Savior. crucify in thee all inordinate Affections; and the Thoughts of a tormenting Hell, quench in thee all the fiery Darts of the Wicked: Let Fountains of Tears, spring from a sincere Repentance, extinguish in thee this conflagrating Carnality; and let the fear and dread of the Almighty mortify that concupiscible Enemy, that the Allurements of it may not delude thee. Consider with thyself the ill Consequents which are its Concomitants; it is full of Anxiety and Folly, Abomination and Ignominy; and without Repentance, must partake of everlasting Punishment.

V. LOOK not on the fawning outside of this Temptation; but fly from it, as you would from a Serpent. Check the first Motions of it; for if you once fall to reason and argue with it, it will prove like the Element of Fire, if not quenched in due time, grow too great to be conquered. Next, fly Idleness, which is the native Soil for these abominable Weeds to grow in; and be always employed in whatsoever lawful Vocation or Business God hath been pleased to allot thee; that when the Tempter comes, he may find thee fortify'd against Temptations. 'Twas Idleness allured David to Adultery: Had he been busied as Joseph was, he had withstood the Temptation.

VI. THINK often of Death's Summons, and that his cold Hand will one day chill that Blood which was so apt to be inflamed; and then tell me, whether Mortification is not more suitable to Death-bed Thoughts, than Sordidness and Obscenity. Be frequent in Prayer, and bring the Unclean Spirit to Christ, that he may cast him out. And to your Prayer, add Fasting; for this Kind goeth not forth, but by Prayer and Fasting. And indeed, Temperance is a great Antidote against this Sin of Sodom; for many times our Tables become a Snare to us: for in pleasing our luxurious Palate, we make Provision for the Flesh, to fulfil the Lusts thereof. And by Epicuring of it so here, what can we expect when we depart hence, but the rich Glutton's Fate, even to want a drop of Water to cool our Tongues.

VII. REMEMBER, thou must give an account for every idle and unprofitable word, Mat. 12. 36. And how much more then will thy Account extend to obscene Speeches, and sordid Actions? Of what Continuance thy Life hath been, while brought to a Period, and what multiplicity of Sins soever thou hast committed, thy Accusers and Accusations will be equivalent: Then those secret Thoughts which thou never resented'st, will apparently prove thee obnoxious before the great Tribunal: From thence thou canst not fly, nor deceive the Omnipotence with vain Excuses; neither canst thou appeal from that Sentence which will be pronounced against thee; for there will be Verity in the Inquisition, and Severity in the Execution.

VIII. THEREFORE, whilst thou art on this side the Grave, endeavor to adorn thy Immortal Part with the fragrant Rose of Charity, the dulcified Violet of Humility, and the innocent Lily of Chastity. When thou enter'st the List to conquer this formidable lustful Enemy, if the Fight seem difficult, animate thyself with this Assurance, That the Conquest will be Glorious: Thou must vanquish it as thou wouldest a sturdy Beggar, give it a positive Answer, and it is vanish'd: but show it Encouragement, and it will prove like the Snake in the Fable, when warm by the Fire, to fall a hissing. If thou wouldest not have this Enemy to rule over thee, entertain it not in the least corner of thy Heart, but earnestly beseech God to keep thee in Sanctity of Life, and Chastity of Body.

MED. XXI. Of Purity of Heart.

Mat. v. 8.

Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.

IF Innocency be the Robe of Heaven, who then would not diligently strive to be adorned with Purity? It is no wonder the Kingly Prophet was so importunate for a clean Heart, and a right Spirit. If this be the Recompence of true Sanctity, who would neglect Religious Duties? Beatifical Spirits! What Felicity and Purity do ye enjoy, that behold the glorious Face of your Heavenly Creator! Who would not indefatigably be industrious to imitate your Seraphick Example here, that he might resemble you in your happy Station, and possess Eternal Joys, such as the Heart, in all his Divine Raptures, never knew? Shall the imposturous and perfidious Vanities of this Transitory World allure our Hearts, and divest us of the Hopes of this Celestial Glory, the Fruition of this splendid Vision?

II. A Magnified Vision! in Comparison whereof, the Regalities of this Lower Orb, the Trophies and dazzling Splendors of the Optick Nerves, and the Luster of the whole Universe, is not worth the gazing at! A Vision, which no mortal Eye ever was Spectator of; but shall not be excluded, if it do not obscurely lose itself on Inferior Objects here Below. No Ear did ever audibly hear its true Description; but may be admitted to the divine Harmony, and heavenly Halleluja's of it, if it incline not to the Syrenical Charms of Sin, and the bewitching Music of sordid Carnality.

III. 'Tis a Vision, whose bright Idea cannot be delineated by the most elevating and contemplative Speculations of any Metaphysical Brain, though never so Angelical: 'Tis not a sublime Fancy, but true Sanctity, that can reach it. The Divine Apostolical Geographer, St. Paul, though lately there, could not exactly give us a Description of it; and Sacred Scripture divinely characters it out, but in Parables and Simitudes, to demonstrate how infinitely transcendent is that Glory which is so inexpressible, and beyond all comprehension. Were all the Pearls, Rubies, Sapphires and Diamonds the Earth produces, mustered to a Splendour, they would not equalize the diminitivest Glance of the radiant Beams of Sol's bright Eye; and yet that magnificent Luminary, surrounded with so many attending Constellations that derive their Luster from him, is but a Spark to his shining Countenance.

VI. WHO then would offer up that Part an Oblation to the World, which might be rendered the Instrument of so much Felicity? and suffer the Profuseness of his wanton Blood to revel there, where sublimer Passions and Flames should triumph? He that would be an Inhabitant among the Spirits of the Just, must discipline his own to the same Uniformity, and convert his Body to a Temple, where his Heart must be both Altar and Sacrifice; or rather, an Emblem of the Sanctum Sanctorum, for those excellent Graces of the Spirit to inhabit in.

V. THE stately Mansion-House of Life must be converted into a Mansion of Divine Love; and the magnificent Palace of Heroic Spirits, into a Royal Court of peculiar Graces; and then that Part which (as Natural Philosophers observe) which lives first, and dies last, shall become purely Vital, and not be liable to Mortality. Nothing but a thrice Glorious Trinity can satiate this Triangle, which must be shaped to the purest Figure, and taught in all its Pulses to palpitate nothing but Heaven and Eternity.

VI. OUR Bosoms must be converted to Closets of Devotion; and our Hearts to Cabinets of immaculate Innocency, and fervent Prayer; embellish'd with that sparkling Diamond, a lively Faith, the Lamp at which all our minor Graces, as Tapers, light themselves, and like Stars, borrow their Luster from this Luminary. 'Tis not a Heart that can chime to the airy Sound of any tinkling Religion, and pretends a Sanctity fixed in its Countenance, that makes Affectation his Conscience; and Moroseness of Humour, Tenderness of Spirit.

VII. NO, 'tis a Heart adorned with the White Robe of Humility, crowned with the Diadem of Love, fumigated by Prayers, the odoriferous Scent of Chastity, and the Fragrancies of a Life of Sanctity, that couches itself within the embracing Arms of our Savior's Spouse, and stiles himself a Mourner in her Persecutions; that looks upon the World as the Enemy of its Glory, and had rather embrace Mortality, than prove a Rebel against Heaven. 'Tis such a Celestial Heart that must be a Preparative for this transcendent Vision, and happy is he that arrives to that Purity.

VIII.

Fortifie us therefore, O Lord, against the Poms and Vanities of this wicked World, and elevate our Thoughts to the sublime Contemplations of Thy Glory. Level in us every arrogant Thought that dares exalt itself against the Potency and Purity of Thy Law; and sanctify us for Thy Self and Service, that the Practick Part of a Life of Sanctity may be our chiefest Employment; that when we are summoned to depart hence, we may beaccepted of Thee; and being fled from the Eye of this Lower Orb, we may take a Prospect of Thy Heavenly Palace, of what neither Eye hath seen, Ear heard, nor Heart can conceive, the Glory Thou wilt impart in the Fruition of Thy Self.

MED. XXII. Against Covetousness.

Heb. xiii. 7.

Let your conversation be without covetousness.

COVETOUSNESS is the Root of all Malignity; and he that is a Slave to Riches, his Mind is always indigent; he is tugging continually at the Oar, and accumulates worldly Dross; but (as the Psalmist says) he knoweth not who shall gather it, Psal. 39. 6. And as he is impoverished in his Mind, so he is miserable in his Station; for Bounty and Goodness are Strangers to himself and others; and Charity with him is so frozen, that the Poor, instead of recompencing him with their Prayers, are more ready to attend him with their Imprecations. Fix not thy Trust in uncertain Riches, but place thy Mind on what is certain. 'Tis certain, the Hour of Death will come, and then what will all thy Wealth avail thee? They cannot assist thee in a true Repentance, nor plead thy Cause in the Court of Heaven: They cannot procure thee an easy Passage hence, nor give thee Assurance of Eternal Happiness.

II. THEREFORE, lay aside this bitter Root, and graft new Plants of Liberality and Charity. Make haste, with speed, and undertake this Task, lest thou offend the Almighty, and endanger thy own Soul. The covetous Person must needs allow this Maxim, That he lives without God in the World. And our Savior informs us, we cannot serve God and Mammon, Luk. 16. 13. For he that wholly sets his Heart upon transitory Treasure, must of necessity unfix it from God, and Eternal Glory; and is incapable of performing that Duty which is required by the Almighty.

III. SEE with what eagerness the Covetous pursues Riches; and is greedy as a Lion after his Prey. All Opportunities of Gain are readily embraced: Prayer, and all Religious Duties, are laid aside, to accomplish and attend it. So prone is frail Mortality to this Sin, that he leaves nothing unattempted to answer his sordid Avarice: nay, it is often apparent, that Unlawfulness and Fraudulency is used by the Covetous to that degree, that many Families have suffered Destruction, though it were to the utter Ruin of the Souls and Bodies of the Misers themselves. And now, what can these Men expect for the Cruelties they transact, but to be excluded from Happiness, and to receive that Reward, of not inheriting the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6. 10.

IV. THEY which hoard up Terrestrial Treasures, resemble those that place their Fruits in low and moist places, not considering they are incident to Putrefaction. Oh, how infatuated are they then, which indulge themselves to that which is liable to Corruption? For, how can that which is Temporal, satisfy the Soul which is Eternal? The Animate Part comprehends all Corporal Things, by virtue of its Spiritual Nature, that it cannot be distended and filled by any Quantity. All things, the higher they soar towards Heaven, the less they care and care to hoard up: This may be attested by the Fowls of the Air, which neither sow nor reap, Mat. 6. 26. So it is with that Immortal Part, the Soul, the more it is elevated to its Creator, the more it withdrawn from Temporal Riches.

V. LET Contentment be the Avaritious Man's Catholicon to purge out Covetousness. This will make him a Proficient in the Almighty's Court, and wholly to depend upon His Providence. Then he may contemplate, That God clotheth the lilies of the field: And if so, much more will He clothe them which depend upon Him. Think on the Providence of thy Creator; and if thou reliest upon Him, thou mayest assure thyself, that none ever trusted in him, and was confounded. He is too guilty of Avarice, that chargeth the Almighty with not granting him his Heart's Desire; and he is too ungrateful, that expresses not his Thankfulness for those Mercies he daily, nay, hourly receives from him.

VI. CONSIDER this, now ye that take too much Pains for Riches, what an imprudent Choice ye use to apply your Diligence: Ye that add House to House, and Field to Field, a lesser Compass at last must entomb ye; why then do you perplex yourselves so much, and appear such busy Graspers of the World; early you rise to gripe the World, and late go to rest, but can find no ease; your Mind is so fixed on uncertain Riches, that you are perpetually loaded with Care and Sorrow. And why all this, poor Covetous Wretches! but to undo others, and lose your Souls? Did you but wisely love yourselves, you would pursue alone your own true Happiness: you would not become such willful Fools; and prefer a short vexatious Vanity before an Eternal Joy and Felicity.

MED. XXIII. A Bad Exchange.

Mat. xvi. 26.

For what is a man profited, if he gain the whole world, and lose his own soul? or what shall a man give in exchange for his soul?

THIS Text works no Effects upon the Covetous; for they had rather lose their Souls, than forsake their Riches. He, for whom the whole Creation was made, makes himself wretched and miserable, in chasing after Vanity: disrobing Himself of all his Glory; and by exceeding a brutish Transformation, inhumes the Divinity of his Immortal Part in the Bowels of the Earth. Harken unto this, all you that inhabit in this Lower Region, ye that are Votaries to Sensualities, and ascend no higher than the Elements for Celestial Glory! that can mortgage your Souls for a momentary Pleasure; and entertain a delectable Misery, for Erelasting Happiness!

II. GIVE Ear, thou aspiring Meteor, whose haughty Ambition, with Icarus, soars to that height, that thou consumes the Wings of thy immoderate Desires! Thou that wilt with eagerness adore Satan, for a Kingdom; and greedily render him your Fidelity, for a Crown, and offer him a Revenue worth Ten thousand Worlds, the immortal Tribute of your precious Soul; till thy flourishing Hopes, and Trophies, be turned to endless Torments; thy Masquerading Revelings of elevated Honor, into Repentant Regrets of direful Horror; and thy Imperial Chair of State, into a Bed of Infernal Flames!

III. BE attentive, O thou indefatigable Wanton, whose Soul is as insatiable as brutish Animals; that palpitates after Pleasure, beyond the Chameleon's breathing after Air! Thou that swimst in iniquity, and plungest Morality in Seas of Vice; bathing thyself in those amorous Streams that drown thee in wanton Delights! that imaginest True Religion but a ridiculous Fable; the Lives of Apostles, Saints and Martyrs, but a Traggy-Comical Play, or a melancholy Romance! and scoffest at Heaven, and its Creator, as if Infinite Eternity were but an imaginary Fancy!

IV. STOP not thy Ears, O thou wretched Miser, whom the deluding Rhetoric of Bags cram'd with Silver Coin can invite to Hell! and art ardeously allured to throw thyself into the Arms of Satan, at the Music of tempting Gold! That canst assist thy weak Eyes with Spectacles; and gaze thyself almost blind, at the Splendor and Curiosity of a rich Gemm; and imprecatest Geography, for defining Riches beyond thy Sphere; earnestly wishing thyself an Indian, that thou mightest lead the remnant of thy Life among the choicest Treasures; and converse with the richest Mines, till the Hair on thy Head were all Silver; till thou thyself werit all transmuted to Ore, and every Bone turned into a Wedge of the purest Gold.

V. LISTEN, ye tender Gallants, that are so attracted with the Mode of this World, that ye have have lost all Conceptions of a better! Ye that dwell upon Earth, only to delight your sensitive Appetites; and supply your Luxury with the exquisite martyrdom of thousands of Creatures! As ye are well-complexion'd Dust, and possess purer Veins; so entertain purer Passions too, and acquire generous and nobler Inclinations for Eternal Glory! The sumptuousness of your Attire will not invest you with Immortality. Should you expose your Estates to sale, and receive for it a great Value, '•would not purchase one Inch in Paradise. It was the elegantest Speech the ancient Orator ever delivered, when he uttered, He would not buy Repentance so dear. 'Twas but an Extemporay Oration; and yet all Silver-tongu'd Rhetoric could never parallel it: That one Note exceeded all his Eloquence, and will survive the Dexterity of his Pen.

VI. COULD we out-live the Lives of Patriarchs, even beyond the Age of old Methusalah, or of Time itself; and with the Pleasures of the greatest Epicures: Could we, like Cleopatra the Egyptian Queen, dissolve a Pearl into a Golden Cup, and drink the Riches and Pleasure of a Kingdom at a Draught; or Command all the Creatures of the Universe, as positively as ever the Centurion did his Servants: Had we all the delectable Enjoyments we can either wish, fancy, or chase after, and whatever can satisfy the Ambition of the most profuse and carnal Appetite: Were the whole Universe turned into a Garden of Eden, or a perpetual Spring adorn the Surface of our Mother Earth:

VII. COULD we, like the Eagle, renew our Age, and not grow Old, but still continue in our pristine Health; or if in Years, be insensible of the Miseries that attend the Aged: Could we unravel, untwist, or unwind Time again; reverse and retrograde its Wheels again; stop the swift Celestial Mercuries, the nimble Posts of Heaven, in their full career; and set the great Clock of the World backward to a Minute: Nay, were our Bodies of that durability as our Souls, that we could survive Time itself, and be a Spectator when the World receives its Period: Yet what shall we extract, if after all our vain and imaginary Felicities, and flippery Contentments, we become an Oblation for Hell, enroll'd in the execrable Catalogue of the Infernal Crew, a Victim for sulphurous Eternal Flames, banished to Perpetuity from God and Heaven: Then inform me, whoever thou art, and ask Dives himself that necessary Question, What is? &c.

VIII.

O Lord, what is there in this World, that should attract our Hearts, to tire ourselves in fruitless Desires, and indulge ourselves to the Pleasures of this Life, as our chiefest Felicity? How difficult is it for him that is unacquainted with thy Law, to perceive the Evacuity of those Enjoyments he hath so long rolled himself in, to resist the enticing Advantages of Sin; and disesteem the glittering Flashes of this Life, for that Luster of Glory Thou wilt impart. My God, instruct me so to use the World, that I forget not Thee. Let the Blessings Thou showerest down, quicken and increase, not stupefy my Devotion. Elevate my Obedience, not overwhelm my Thankfulness; that so the Follies of the World may become my Derision; and the Glories of Heaven, my only Ambition; that I may never, for a fading Fruition in this World, hazard both my Soul, and thy Saving-Grace together.

MED. XXIV. In time of Sickness.

Mat. viii. 2.

Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

THIS Prayer was effectual; and all Petitions are answered by the Almighty, if delivered with a sincere Faith, and a good Assurance. Let us now be upon the Grand Inquest; Is not Sin a Leprosy? Then every Sinner ought to make the same Deprecation. He that had been a Spectator of the Leper's Body, would not have been amazed at his Prayer: and yet, could he but have inspected his Soul, might, perhaps, have beheld Objects more prodigious and horrible; the Corruption of his Blood, which had lost its Vigour, and proved but an useless help to Nature, every part without Vitality, by so nauseating a Nutrition, instructed his Tongue this necessary, though doleful kind of Confident Prayer; Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

II. CHRIST, whose Bounty and Compassion never fails to demonstrate that the Fountain of his Love was as large as his Power was potent, would not reject such a Suit wherein his tender Mercy was so much concerned: and those Members which might have been sooner immers'd, than bath'd into a Cure, re-assume new Vitality and Complexion, by the liberal Bounty of a Touch. Thus the Leper receives a new Body; but we read no Lecture of any Operation upon his Immortal Part, which, perhaps, effectually required it: But his Successor, who was Bed-rid, was in a far greater state of Happiness; for his Sin and Disease were both healed together.

III. HOW many be found, that, like the Leper, view no higher than their Corporeal Substance, whole Exterieur Part is all their Principles of Religion; whilst the Immortal Part, that Spring of Life, lies all neglected under Epidemical Infection: Our Blood shall enjoy all the Delights that Art can reach, or the most Chymical Luxury can extract, to supply its Flames; whilst our splendid Part, the Divine and Celestial Fire which inspires us, lies all extinguished, and bereft of his Immortal Aliment, and can reserve nothing but a dull and hectic Luster to its Maker.

IV. THE Anguish of a Limb, can attract us to more Devotion in one Hour, than all the Concernments of our Souls can produce in a Year: and the deformity of the meanest Part, will appear an Object of more Disgrace and Dolour to us, than those pallid and infernal Forms that attend Sin, and disfigure Heaven in us. Of all Pestilences, this is the grandest, and yet least regarded: as if Hell were but a Trifle; Everlasting Damnation, a Pleasure; and the Eternal Misery of our Souls, a Diversion. Shew me that exquisite Beauty that is not Leprous; that Innocence, which is so perspicuous, that it is Immaculate; that Pattern of Sanctity, which may become a Saint; that Infant, Man or Woman, which is a Stranger unto Sin; and then I shall be hold an Amazing Wonder.

V. DID our curious Veins excel the fragrant Violet, whose Odor perfumes the Chymistry of the Air, the Dew of the blushing Morn: Were our Ancestor, Adam's Sin, an Alien to our crimson Blood; and the Day of our Nativity, as perspicuous as the splendidst Morn, immaculate as the new-blown Rose: yet the Pollution of our irregular Lives would soon discipline us in this Prayer; and the blackness of our occultest Thoughts would silently proclaim our own Deformity; and be ready to join with the Leper in this Petition, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

VI. AND yet, was there not to be found, in those Days, a Generation of Vipers, that were righteous and clean in their own Eyes, that justify'd themselves in their own Impurity, and reckoned all the World but Lepers to them? Was not the lofty Pharisee a greater Leper than the poor Publican, though so ambitiously he displayed his proud Plumes? His soaring Pride carry'd more contagious Infection along with it, than the other Persons Sins could e'er pretend too. He that trusts to the Merit of his own Illustration, may infallibly lose Heaven, and those Eternal Joys which an humble Assurance doth procure.

VII.

O LORD, though I am not so vile as some; yet I am so vile in my own Eyes, that the Leper here is a Pattern of Perfection, to my imperfect Soul; Lazarus's Corps a Perfume, to my ulcerated Heart: yet were I far more impotent and fractured than the poor Cripple of Bethesda; more spotted with Leprosy than the Nine Unthankful Lepers which were cleansed, whose Ingratitude was more odious than their Disease; were those Legions of Infernal Spirits, ejected by Thy Sacred Word, infused in me; and were I as execrable as Satan could wish to make me; yet I know Thy Paternal Goodness, and I do not despond of Thy Almighty Power: for, Lord, if thou wilt, thou canst make me clean.

MED. XXV. Upon Death.

Rom. vi. 21.

What fruit had ye then in those things whereof ye are now ashamed? for the end of those things is death.

SINCE Sin must be destroyed, who then would make choice of that for his Felicity, which shall perish with himself; whose End is not only Death, but Hell; and will be his Destruction, not only now, but hereafter? Indeed, were there no hopes that our Relics should resuscitate again, or the Ruines of our Frame resurrect to a politer Shape, we might well plunge ourselves in Enjoyments here, and fix our Felicity in delectable Pleasures: Every Person might then be tolerated, without Sin, to become an Epicure; and he that could project new Modes of Luxry, would not only pass for being Ingenious, but be esteemed Fortunate.

II. GOOD Morality would appear all Vice; and yet Vice itself would be held no more a Crime, but our Happiness: not to be Lavish, then, were a Sin against Nature; and he that excelled in Brutality, would be rendered most Rational: Legal Proceedings would then be a grand Enemy to Humanity; there could be no Sociableness, but in Confusion: and were there no Heaven, nor Hell, we should pleasantly mingle to a Chaos, and obey no other discipline but Riot: every Person might then be Atheistical, without Scandal: To be without the Almighty, and his Grace in the World, would be rendered no Misfortune; for then every Man might depend upon his own Merits, without Blasphemy.

III. Could they which inhabit the Earth, die like Bruits and Animals, and revive no more; the Hopes of not being Damn'd, would be a greater Comfort than the Delights of Sin. But alas, he that enters the Grave now, must live again, that his Life may be remember'd. Nor yet is it so much the Terror of Death, as the Horrors of a Guilty Conscience▪ the formidable Prognostics of a Future Eternity, that affrights the departing Soul: The Pangs and Anguish of expiring Nature are insignificant to those Stings that attend the Memory of our Crimes: The deep Sorrows of the Grave, and our being Extinct here forever, are Joys, to the Miseries which remain behind, but will certainly come.

IV. INFORM me now, thou that art so indulgent to the World, and hunts for Paradise in a Park of Sins; thou that makest Terrestrial things thy Treasure, and foldest up the Riches of thy Hopes in the Bosom of Old Time, or the Compass of a Span; when those lucid and swift Guides of Life, thine Eyes, shall wax dim with Age, or tired with Pain; when every Member shall become Sorrow's Object, and those Parts which were so employed in the Operation of Sin, shall become Instruments of Despair; when that delectable Frame, that magnificent Darling Edifice, thy Body, shall, by its shivering Qualms, and trembling Convulsions, consternate its disconsolate Owner; how will the Fulgurations of a Future Justice, and the Terrors of thy Ultimate End, confound thee!

V. CAN those transitory Enjoyments that allured away thy Immortal Part, restore it in convenient time? Can those Pleasures which bereft thee of Heaven, recover it again before Death puts a period to thy Life? Can thy Poms and Vanities assuage or allay thy deep Sorrows? or the Memento of thy Sins, the Destruction of thy End? Where's that soft Music, whose select Airs, like David's Harp, might charm the Cries of a Guilty Conscience; and by its skilful Strains, drop a pleasant Harmony that might pacify the Trouble of thy anguished Soul?

IV. WHERE are those expanded Trophies of empty Glories, thy Ambition has purchased at the easy Rate of only sinning for greedy Honor, for which thou hast traffiqu'd and sold Heaven? That Sovereignty for which thou enslavest thyself, and lost the perfect Freedom of thy Immortal Soul? Cannot all thy Grandeur excite thee up a little; and by a fummy Power, once so formidable and applauded, reprieve thee from the unsatisfy'd Grave, or a more Eternal Prison.

VII. Where are those Goods of Fortune thou hast forfeited thine Inheritance for, whose transporting Luster deprived thee of thy Eye-sight, and rendered thee dimmer than themselves? Can they, by their utmost Skill, neither bribe nor purchase thy Pardon? Or will the silent Grave require no other Fee than so rich a Miser? Where are all those fine Diversions that divested thee of thy Piety, and the Thoughts of thy Creator? those pleasing deluding Vanities that swept away all sense of Heaven, and fore-sight of thy Future State? Are all shrunk into a Tomb, and an unwelcom Period? Are all thy Jocularities terminated in the Confines of a Sepulchral-Urn; and no other Objects left for thy Concomitants, but thy Crimes, and those Terrors thy Guilt presents?

VIII. BEHOLD now, and stand amazed, ye Adorers of the World more than of the Almighty! and view the Portraiture of your End, those Ruines you have so smoothly built on! Try if your imaginary Felicities are Proof against this Arrow; or can protect you from this Invader, the only Conqueror of the World, whose general Prison is but a Reserve for a worse, and its Execution here, but a Reprieve for a more durable and yet vital Mortality. He that reigned in Pleasures, must expire in Flames; and having long reveled it in Sin, must expect to riot it in Torments; and the misery is, that wishing not to live, he can never die.

IX. AND yet, how foolish and vain are our Desires still after the World? How easy and alluringly, O Lord, are we led by the counterfeit and transitory Pleasures of this Life, from Thee? We cannot plead Ignorance, but fully attest, That the Wages of Sin is Death; and yet how absurdly do we prefer its Service before Thine, whose Recompence of Reward is Life and Immortality? But The Period of Profaneness is Eternal Destruction, and the Delights of Impiety end in Confusion; and yet we eagerly embrace the fawning Proffers of Sin, before the never-failing Promises of Everlasting Glory.

X.

Have Pity, O Holy Jesu, upon the weak Frailties of our Humane and Corrupt Natures: And we humbly implore Thee to pardon and forgive the profuse Irregularities of our whole Lives. Grant unto us, O Lord, a perpetual Supply of noble and ardent Defires to run after Thee, that the Poms, Vanities, and Tinselware of the World, may become Objects of our Scorn and Derision; and that the bright Splendour of Thy Eternal Glory, may create our Ambition to serve Thee all the Days we remain here; that we may not, for a present temporal Enjoyment in this transitory Life, lose the blessed Hopes, and future Inheritance of the Saints in Light, but at last, having finished our Course here, we may arrive with Joy and Gladness at Thy Heavenly Kingdom.

MED. XXVI. Upon Judgment.

2 Cor. v. 10.

For we must all appear before the judgment-seat of Christ, that everyone may receive the things done in his body, according to that he hath done, whether it be good or bad.

IT is an Axiom, confirmed by woeful Experience, That the generality of them which bear the Name of Christians, and pretend to fight under Christ's Banner against the Enemies of the Apostolic Faith, are, by their profligate Impieties, the greatest Scandal to that glorious Profession: They live in such a Universe of Wickedness, as if the Redeemer of the World descended from Glory, not to subvert, but to establish the Empire of Sin; as if the main Design of their State, in this World, were only to fulfil that voluptuous Maxim of the Licentious Epicure, Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we must die.

II. BUT if these Proficients in Atheism had a serious Memento, That there is a Deity inthron'd in Heaven, who is of purer eyes than to behold iniquity; and so jealous of his Honor, that he will not remit the least Guilt with Impunity: could they be persuaded to devote a few Minutes of the Time which they consume away to finish their Debaucheries, to a solemn Reflexion upon that inevitable Account which will be exacted from them at the General Resuscitation; when not only their Words and Actions, but the most occultest of their Cogitations shall be brought to Judgment; it were impossible for them, unless given over to a reprobate Sense, to perpetuate under the Dominion of their Carnal Appetites and Infections.

III. THE very Apprehension of the Vengeance to come, would fright 'em into an immediate Repentance; and produce such an admirable Reformation, that living soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world, they might be found Unblameable in the Great Day of the Lord Jesus. And what a Day will that be! at whose Appearance the Sun shall be turned into Darkness, and the Moon into Blood, Act. 2. 20. When the Heavens shall be rolled together as a Scroll, Isa. 34. 4. the Elements melt with fervent heat, 2 Pet. 3. 10. and this magnificent imbellish'd Structure of the Material Creation must perish in a Conflagration.

IV. When the echoing Sound of the Last Trumpet will be loud enough to astonish drowsy Mankind out of the sleep of Mortality; and all those innumerable Bodies, which for so many past Ages have inhabited the vast Re-Regions of Forgetfulness, shall arise from their Beds of Dust, and appear before the Aweful Tribunal of the Great and Impartial Judge! The Books will then be opened, the Indictments read, and every Man's Works shall be produced at the Barr, and Evidence given, either for or against him. No Title of Honor, or Dignity of Place; no Preeminence of Nativity, or Excellency of Natural or Acquired Endowments, will, in this Court of Equity, be admitted, as a sufficient Demurr, to an immediate and impartial Trial: but the High and the Low, the Rich and the Poor, the Noble and the Mean, the Learned and the Ignorant; he that sits on the Throne, and he that stands behind the Mill; even from the Swayer of the Scepter, to the Drawer of Water, must be equally impleaded; and without respect of Persons, receive a Compensation proportionable to their Merits.

V. IN this Great Day, the Lord of the Harvest will gather his Wheat into Heaven's Granary, but the Chaff shall be thrown into Fire Unquencheable; He shall separate his Fine Gold from the Dross, and distinguish Right Jewels from False and Counterfeit Sparkles: The Sheep will then be separated from the Goats, and True Believers manifestly known from Formal Hypocrites. But what Tongue! not that of Angels, can express the Joy of those vigilant Servants, whom their Lord, at that time, will find diligently employed in the Performance of their Duties! All that formidable Pomp, and dreadful Solemnity, which shall precede and attend the Advent of the Judge, will but contribute to their Comfort, and enhance their Consolation: For they shall know, that He, who appears with such ineffable Majesty, to keep his General Sessions of Righteousness, is the same Jesus which was crucify'd for their Redemption.

VI. THEN that Exalted Savior will accost his Followers in the Regeneration, Mat. 19. 28. with these or the like transporting Expressions:

you my beloved Disciples, who renounced all that the World called Grandeur and Generosity, for the sake of your Crucify'd Lord and Master, and despised the present Enjoyments of Flesh and Blood, in Expectation of a Future and Invisible State of Felicity. You, who retained your Obedience, in the midst of a Rebellious Generation; and embraced Virtue, in an Age of Impiety and Profaneness. You, who subdu'd your sensual Appetites by the Austerities of Self-denial, and conformed them to the sublimer Dictates of Reason and Religion. And You, who rejoyc'd in the Day of Tribulation, and adorned the Doctrine of the Gospel by an exemplary Patience in the Day of Adversity: This is the Day wherein you shall receive a Recompence for all your Sufferings; a Recompence so incomparably Glorious, and of such Sublimity, that it will at once create and accomplish your Beatitude.

VII.

Your Troubles were Finite, and expired in a Moment; but the Duration of your Bliss will be Infinite and Eternal: You shall now enter into that Heavenly Kingdom, where all your Tears shall be wiped from your Eyes; and those Chrystal Drops which you plentiful shed in the Prosecution of your Salvation, shall be congeal'd into Pearls, to enrich your Diadems, and imbellish your Robes of Immortality: There no Deluge of Sorrow shall disturb the Serenity of your Felicity; no Anxiety or Perplexity, no Discontent or Vexation shall intrude within the Limits of your Happiness; but you shall securely bathe in Oceans of unmix'd Pleasures, and feast upon Delights which know no period.

VIII. BUT, while these Fluctuations of the Divine Mercy will consummate a Beatifick Calm in the Breasts of the Righteous, what irresistable Tempests of Consternation shall excruciate those impenitent Wretches, who chose their Portion on this side Heaven; and prefer'd the Dung and Miseries of a transitory World, before the Real Joys of a Solid Eternity? Now, they shall in vain invoke the Mountains to bury them beneath their perpetual Ruines; that by a more tolerable Destruction, they might evade the Fury of that Almighty Indignation ready to overwhelm them. But what will attribute them, in these inextricable Exigencies, that they possessed the Quintessence of the Earth; that they were splendid in Wealth and Honor; that they inhabited Palaces of Cedar, and took their Repose under Canopies embroider'd with Gold; that they were homag'd by Crouds of Parasites, and grew Famous in Popular Applause; that they were the Favorites of Crowned Heads, and the Darling of the Multitude; that all things past currrant according to their Desires, and were not molested by the Misfortunes of other Men: when those illustrated Accommodations did contribute but to render 'em the more magnificently Miserable; when they vanish'd like a visionary Dream of the Night; but the Memento and Guilt of their Absurdity, will, like venomous Snakes and Serpents, cling to their Consciences, and become their remorseless Executioners for infinite Ages.

IX. THEN the Eyes of their Understanding will be opened, which the Fascinations of Sin had kept long clos'd; and they shall perceive the Folly and Frailty of those impertinent Trifles which they courted with so much Passion and Eagerness; and for whose insatiable Fruition they neglected their Immortal Souls, forfeited their Title to a blissful Immortality, and subjugated themselves to those tremendous Extremities which are the inseparable Concomitants of an inevitable Damnation. What heaps of Treasure then would they give, to reenjoy one Minute of that inestimable Time which they profusely expended in the unprofitable Works of Darkness, that for so inconsiderable a space, they might be but within a Possibility of Salvation? What Presidents of Mortification! What Miracles of Piety? What inimitable Examples of Virtue and Goodness would they appear to Mankind, were they to renovate the Lease of their Lives! How would they disesteem all those magnificent Shadows, and glittering Annihilations, which the idolizing Worldling so preposterously admires; and esteem the unmatchable Treasure of a Pacifick Conscience, unspeakably beyond the most transcendent Terrestrial Enjoyments!

X. BUT alas! 'twill be then too late for Repentance; and they who, in the Day of their Visitation, contemned the repeated Proposals of a Redeemers Reconciliation, shall, at this Juncture, with Tears of Blood, supplicate for Mercy, and be refused it: and the Lord Jesus, who would have been their Savior, and so frequently extended his compassionate Arms to receive them into Favor, if they would but Believe and Repent, will, as their inexorable Judge, utter this direful Sentence against them, Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his Angels.

XI. O IRREVERSIBLE Decree! from whence there can be no Appeal! and which no sooner pronoun'd, but those Condem'd Wretches must be forever exil'd from the Ecstatical Presence of the Almighty; and by Legions of apostate Spirits, hailed away to the dismal Place of Horror and Confusion, where they shall languish under the pressure of intolerable Punishments; and, by Wonder of Omnipotency, shall in Torrents of Fire, endure Extremity of Frigidity; and in Rivers of Ice, be tormented with perpetual Burnings: There they shall feed the Worm that never dies, and transude in those Flames which cannot be extinguished. And the Consideration of the Perpetuity of those Supernal Felicities which they rejected for Vanities, and of the infinite Continuation of their infernal Tortures, will shipwreck all their Hopes in the formidable Gulf of Desperation, and plunge them into the bottomless Abysses of the lowest Hell.

The Prayer.

O BLESSED Father! since Thou art Formidabe in Thy Judgments, and Thy Anger is a Consuming Fire; since those incorrigible Sinners who despise the Offers of Thy Mercy, shall become the Victims of Thy implacable Vengeance, and glorify Thee in unimaginable Pains; since Thou hast appointed a Season, when an Eternity of Felicity, or Misery, shall be the Reward of our Actions; and we must either stand or fall, according to our handy Operations: Vouchsafe, that the Contemplation of these weighty Verities may be such a prevalent Inducement to the Amendment of our Lives, that we may work out our salvation with fear and trembling. Let not the pernicious Allurements of this fraudulent World make us negligent of the Wrath to come; but let us walk with that awful Care, and vigilant Circumspection, that we may appear with Joy, in that dreadful Day wherein the greater part of mis-called Christians shall be consign'd to an Immortal Ruin and Destruction.

MED. XXVII. Upon Hell.

Isa. xxxiii. 14.

Who among us shall dwell with the devouring fire? Who among us shall dwell with everlasting burning?

ETERNAL Death is the dreadful State of the Damned; by which they are not only deprived of the Presence of the Almighty, but are also tormented with perpetual Suffering both in Soul and Body. Oh, how horrid is it then, to incur the Displeasure of the Divine Omnipotence! How strangely infatuated are ye, O senseless Sinners! to run on so swiftly in the Ways of Sin! Tell me, Can you freely receive your Wages, which is Death; and take up your Habitation in Everlasting Burnings, there perpetually to abide forever.

II. COULD we but obtain, by Divine Permission, a Visionary Prospect of that incorrigible Miscreant and Traitor, Judas; what a Scene of Horror would that be, to behold him, violently dragged by Infernal Spirits, and loaded with Chains of Fire; his Diabolical Countenance, pale and Wan; the Voice within him, his Conscience, Worm-eaten; his Pestilential Skin, covered with Leprosy, from whence issues out Stinks not to be endured; his Limbs and Body, wounded and tormented; and his Tongue filled with bitter Lamentations and Execrations; What a dreadful Apprehension will the Vision of so deplorable a Spectacle create in thee!

III. SHOULDST thou, in Contemplation, fix that dire Object before thine Eyes; and upon a strict Disquisition, examine him, saying,

Tell me, O thou perfidious Judas! what Grievs, what Pains and Torments are these thou undergoest? What number of Years has thou reigned insulphurous Fire? And how many Centuries of Ages must thou yet remain buried in Flames, and roaring among the Infernal Crew?

His guilty and amazing Conscience would soon reply,

The Pains which which I endure are intolerable; no intermission for Relief is here to be found, but the Torments thus inflicted are perpetual: The least of our Miseries far exceed all Punishments, which either the Justice of God, or the Cruelties of Men upon Earth, did ever execute: Despair is our continual Associate, and there is no vacant Place for Hopes of ever to be freed for these inexpressible Torments: You upon Earth, take your Ease, you Eat and drink in full Bowls; whilst we want Water to cool our Tongues, which are tormented in these Flames.

IV. Let the Thoughts of Hell's Terrors ever put me in a Method to escape their Fury. Consider the Damned in their fatal Circumstances; their Life is, to die without expiring; and their Death is, to live in perpetual Punishment: There the Tormentor is never wearied, the Fire never consumes, and the Torments never decrease. And this Decree is according as the irrevocable Sentence requires; the fulfilling of the Justice of the Almighty, and the Reward due to willful Impenitents, and obdurate Offenders; that they should never want a sufficient measure of Punishment, who were continually glutted, and never cease'd from Sin.

V. There, the least Sin has its peculiar Punishment, wonderfully extracted out of its own Sordidness: The Salacious shall inhabit in unextinguishable sulphurous Fire, continually flaming from their own inordinate Affections: The Epicure and Ebrious shall sigh in vain for a little Water to cool their Tongues: The Outragious and Passionate shall snarl like mad Dogs; and the Malicious and Uncharitable shall corrode their own Entrails: The Wealth of the Misers shall be as Goads in their Sides; and the Arrogant and Ambitious shall be hurried down from the Precipice of Scorn, to the Bottomless-Pit of Contempt: The Infatuated shall miserably deplore their misspent Time; and pine away with Grief, for their not being diligent.

VI. BUT, O what strange Convulsions shall fasten on their Spirits, and vulnerate and search the utmost of their Souls! When they shall with Amazement behold themselves eternally bereft of the illuminating Vision of the Most Highest! When they shall behold themselves eternally exil'd from the joyful and amiable Presence of Jesus; that Omnipotence who created 'em to inherit His Kingdom; that Savior who purchased 'em to reign with Him in Glory: then shall they execrate the Hour of their Nativity, and those sordid Associates that enticed them to Ruin! They shall exclaim against the Folly of the fraudulent Universe; and belch out, with a raving Distraction, Are these the Products of those infatuated Desires, whose empty Enjoyments we esteemed our Happiness! Alas! what will our loose Liberties, and those fond Delights we so eagerly chas'd after, now yield us? What Happiness receive we from those fleeting Honors, and transitory Treasures we so highly valued? They are all fled away as a Vapour, and past away as a Morning-Cloud.

VII. BUT the Sting and Torment perpetually endures, and plagues our Vitals with Everlasting Anguish. Thus shall they roar out; but all is deaf to their Complaint: Thus shall they lament; but no Compassion shall relieve them. O dismal Spectacle of a wicked Life! O terrible Sequel of a destructive Death! perpetually to wish for what they never can obtain! perpetually to undergo that which is inevitable!

O magnify'd be Thy Divine Omnipotence, that with such an indulgent Affection gives us timely Notice of our Ruin! Save us, O blessed Lord! from all Impieties: Oh, save us, for Thy Own dear sake! Quicken our Minds against the Effects of Sin! and with Thy Fatherly Corrections chastise us often, that at last the Terrors of Hell may force us into Thy Heavenly Kingdom!

MED. XXVIII. Upon Heaven.

Psal. lxxxvii. 2

Glorious things are spoken of thee, thou City of God.

BUT all the most exalted Encomiums are infinitely below thy deserved Lauds and Praises: For, What Humane Understanding, What created Tongue, can be able to comprehend or express thy ineffable Excellencies? If this Inferior Orb, the Place of our Exilement, and a Theatre of inevitable Miseries, be so wonderfully delightful, that our Eyes are entranced with the Variety of its Objects, and can never sufficiently admire the Marvels they behold; if the Firmament, which is but a Foot-cloth for the Saints to tread on, be enamell'd with so many Starry Jewels, and imbellish'd with such radiant Planets, and glittering Constellations: How transcendent! how superlatively Magnificent are the Inner Apartments and Chambers of that Emperial Palace where the Adorable Deity does vouchsafe to communicate his Essential and Ecstatick Glories?

II. O DESIRABLE Mansion! One Minute's Residence in thy Celestial Courts, will make us more than Recompence for all the Afflictions we can possibly suffer in this Valley of Tears: And And how conceivably will our Reward be, when, by a Miracle of Divine Mercy, we shall be admitted to an Everlasting Participation of thy Immense and Inexpressible Felicities! It was the certain Hope of thy Enjoyment, which animated the Primitive Martyrs to sustain the most fiercest Tortures with an undaunted Constancy, and to triumph in the midst of their Conflagration.

III. THE comfortable Expectation of thy Fruition, was the Grand Motive which induced the Magnanimous Ignatius, when threatened by his Persecutors with Extremity of Torments, to make this Heroic Replication; Fire, Gallows, Beasts, Breaking of my Bones, Quartering of my Members, Crushing of my Body, all the Torments of the Devil together; let them come upon me, so I may enjoy my Lord Jesus Christ.

IV. IT is an undeniable Axiom, That all Secular Felicities are built upon brittle Foundations. The most sublime Terrestrial Pleasures, even in their greatest Complacencies, are but transient Vanities, and conclude in Vexation; but the Objects of the Celestial Habitations are refined to such an extraordinary degree of Perfection, that they will be able to satiate the most extended Desires of our capacious Souls: There we shall possess, in lieu of a living Mortality, which moves us towards the Grave, a Vitality glorious beyond Imagination, durable as the Ages of Eternity, and whose Enjoyment will entitle us to excessive and inexplicable Satisfaction.

V. IF we admire Beauty: Our ravished Eyes, in lieu of Corporeal Objects, shall behold those Immaterial Glories which flow from the Fountain of Uncreated Light, and shall be permitted to contemplate that wonderful Clearness which proceeds from the Beatifical Visage of the Supreme Creator. If Riches be the Center of our Affections: Gold, Pearls, Diamonds, Rubies, Jewels, and whatever we account most precious and estimable in the Universe, are but faint Metaphors to describe the Inestimable Treasures of the Supernal World.

VI. IF Honor be the Subject of our Ambition: What are Scepters and Crowns, but Illustrious Miseries? What are the Grandeurs upon Earth, but gaudy Shadows, in comparison of those Incorruptible Diadems, those permanent and Substantial Dignities which flourish Above. If we delight in Music: There we shall hear the Panegyric Anthems of the Seraphick Choir; and shall bear a part in the solemn Celebration of that Almighty Being, whose only Presence will be sufficient to replenish us with immeasurable Felicity.

VII. TO Conclude: Nothing can be ded to that Immensity of Beatitude which we shall there enjoy; but we shall be as perfectly Happy, as the immediate Vision of the Incomprehensibly Glorious Trinity, the Society of Angels, the Conversation of Triumphant Spirits, and the inexpressible Accommodations of a blissful Heaven can possibly make us.: And to consummate our Felicity, all our Enjoyments shall be invested with Eternal Glory.

THE CONTENTS.

- SECT. I. What Meditation is Page 1
- SECT. II. That it is a Duty Page 5
- SECT. III. Rules and Directions for Meditation Page 10
- SECT. IV. Of the Subject and Method of Meditation Page 14
- SECT. V. Of being Affected with the Divine Presence Page 17
- SECT. VI. Of Preparatory Prayer Before Meditation Page 21
- SECT. VII. Of Consideration Page 25
- SECT. VIII. Affections and Resolutions Page 29
- SECT. IX. Of Vows Page 33
- SECT. X. How to Conclude your Meditations Page 35
- Collects to be said Before and After Meditations Page 36

Meditations on Several Occasions.

- MED. I. Confession of Sins Page 38
- MED. II. That the Cross of the Holy Jesus should excite us to Repentance Page 42
- MED. III. Of the Fruits of Repentance Page 45
- MED. IV. Of Man's Salvation Page 50

- MED. V. The Youth's Memento Page 53
- MED. VI. General Rules of a Godly Life Page 58
- MED. VII. The Whole Duty of Man Page 63
- MED. VIII. The Vanity of the World Page 67
- MED. IX. Jacob's Ladder. Page 72
- MED. X. Of a Good Conscience. Page 76
- MED. XI. Of a Wounded Spirit. Page 81
- MED. XII. Of Humility Page 86
- MED. XIII. The Proud Pharisee Page 91
- MED. XIV. The Soul's Delight Page 95
- MED. XV. True Contentment Page 10•
- MED. XVI. Of Divine Faith Page 105
- MED. XVII. The Canaanitish Woman's Faith Page 109
- MED. XVIII. Of Love and Charity Page 114
- MED. XIX. An Act of Divine Love Page 120
- MED. XX. Of Chastity Page 126
- MED. XXI. Purity of Heart Page 133
- MED. XXII. Against Covetousness Page 137
- MED. XXIII. A Bad Exchange Page 142
- MED. XXIV. In Time of Sickness Page 148
- MED. XXV. Upon Death Page 153
- MED. XXVI. Upon Judgment Page 160
- MED. XXVII. Upon Hell Page 171
- MED. XXVIII. Upon Heaven. Page 177

FINIS.

P-RA-25. The whole duty of man epitomiz'd: for the benefit of the poor. With select prayers suited to every partition. By Edm. Stacy, a minister of the Church of England. - Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681., Stacy, Edmund, b. 1657 or 8.

THE Whole Duty OF MAN Epitomiz'd FOR THE Benefit of the POOR. With Select Prayers suited to every Partition.

•y Edm. Stacy. a Minister of the Church of England.

•ear God, and keep his Commandments; for this is the Whole Duty of Man,

Eccles. 12. 13.

LONDON:•rinted for John Lawrence at the Angel in the Poultry, 1700.

To the Right Honorable Sir Richard Levite, Lord Mayor Elect; And the Honorable Charles Duncomb, and Jeffery Jefferies Esquires, Sheriffs of the City of London, &c.

IF there be anything that can excuse my Presumption in putting Three such great Names to this little Book, it must be the Sincerity of my Intention for the Interest of Religion.

For the Doctrines it contains, I need say no more, than that they are faithfully Collected from that incomparable Author the Whole Duty of Man, a Book (to speak in Dr. Hammond's Words) that has all the Advantages, which (with God's Blessing) can render it fit for the Salvation of Mankind.

My Design in drawing it into this little Volume, I have already mentioned in the Title, viz. For the Benefit of the Poor, and who so fit to recommend it to them, as those very Persons to whom the Government of this great City is entrusted; your Names, your Characters, and your Authority together, must needs stamp a Repute upon it; and render it acceptable even to this sin full Age.

I am sensible, there's neither of you can be any Friend to the common Vanity of Complement; and therefore to bespeak your Acceptance of these few Sheets; I shall Address my Self to your gracious God, that under the shadow of your Protection, he would bless this Epitomy to the Conversion of many Souls.

Alas! we live in a World wherein Virtue has almost lost her Prerogative, Religion has few true Friends and will have fewer still, •ill Men can be persuaded to consi•er the Necessity and Advantage of •t; and how far this little Book •ay contribute towards that End is •tterly out of my Power to deter•ine.

I know I have put it into good •ands, and so I humbly leave it •ith you, with this Assurance, that •hatever you do in the behalf of •iety and Charity, will be doubly •ac'd to your Account in the Re•ords of Eternity, and entitle you 〈◊〉 Rewards as large as your Merits, •d as lasting as your Souls.

And now there remains no more, •t to beseech you to accept this ••tle Book, and Pardon the unwor•y Author, who amongst many o•ers that Congratulate your Ac•ssion to your respective Stations, 〈◇〉 one of the first that has thus ven•r'd to do it in Public.

Your high Qualifications have •awn after you many Hearts, and •any ardent Wishes, and Mine in a more Particular manner than th• rest, who am with the utmost D 〈...〉 stance and Regard, may it plea 〈...〉 your Honors,

Your most obedient Servant, E. Stac•

THE PREFACE.

OUR Inimitable Author has proposed the Care of our Souls as the grand Preparatory to the Whole Duty of Man, and indeed I cannot better recommend the Epitomy of his Book, then by telling you in his Words, that the carelessness of our Souls is the Root of all the Sin we commit; so that unless we would be persuaded to consider the Condition of our Souls, all Lectures of Religion must be utterly lost upon us.

The Design of this little Book will admit of but a very short Preface, and therefore I shall only tell the Reader, that his Soul being infinitely the most •valuable of anything that he has beside, has the greatest Title to his Care both in Point of Reason and Justice.

This is what we find confirmed in the Accounts of all Wise Men, who still value everything more or less, as it imports to their Interest or Happiness▪ Our Souls therefore being our chiefes• Good, it concerns us very nearly t• consult their Preservation, and how that's to be done, is the Design of the following Sheets.

I hope it will not be expected, 〈◇〉 should say anything in Apology for this undertaking. If the thing be done a• it ought to be, it must needs be of general good; the Reader indeed woul• do well to observe, that though my Brevity, &c. has generally compel'd m• to use my own Words, yet the Meaning and Method of the Author are all along carefully preserved.

For the Whole Duty of Man itself 'tis indeed a most complete System o• Religion, and therefore highly fit to b• often read over at large by all, whos• Time and Circumstances will allow it; This Epitomy is only designed t• supply those Deficiencies, and for th• Assistance of bad Memories; in brief 'tis intended chiefly for the Benefit of the Poor, and to them I refer it &c.

THE Whole Duty OF MAN Epitomiz'd, &c.

PARTITION I.

the Duty of Man by the Light of Nature, and Scripture: His Duty to God, Himself, and his Neighbor. His Duty to God; of Faith, the Promises, of Hope, of Love, of Fear, of Trust.

THE Incarnation of our Blessed Lord, is without doubt a sufficient warrant for the Salva 〈...〉 n of our Souls, if we perform the Conditions annexed to it; which 〈◇〉 in general to use our honest endeavours to obey the whole Will of God, according as we have it conveyed to us, by the Light of Nature, and the Light of the Holy Scriptures.

The Light of Nature in the first place is a Light which God has stamped upon our very Souls, by the guidance of which, without the help of Scripture mere Natural Conscience would direct us in the performance of several Duties. Such as are to Worship a God, to be Just one to another, and to Honor our Parents, and the like.

The Light of Scripture is a far more Divine Light, when in God hath laid before us both his Commands, and Precepts, to be the general Rules and Grounds of our Duty.

The general Rules of the Duty of every Christian are briefly comprehended under these three Heads; our Duty to God, our Selves, and our Neighbors, and those three I intend for the Subject of the following Discourse.

The Foundation of our Duty to God, is grounded chiefly upon our acknowledging him to be God, and then admitting of no other.

And first by acknowledging him to be a God, we are to believe him to be an Infinite Glorious Being, without either beginning or end, both Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, God blessed forever.

We are likewise to believe him in his Attributes; to be a God of Mercy, Justice, and Power, that he sees and knows all things, and disposes every Event, according to his Will, and that he can never cease to be other than perfectly Good, Merciful and Just.

The believing him to be our God signifies yet more, it means by Faith we should believe the Holy Scriptures to be his Word, and that all that he speaks to us by them, are most true; that all that he affirms is Indubitable, that his Commands are Just, and Equal, his Threatenings and Punishments certain and unavoidable, and that all his Promises are Yea and Amen, and will most certainly be made good to all those that faithfully depend upon him.

This is the sum of our Faith, or Belief of those things God has been pleased to reveal to us in the Holy Scriptures.

The next Duty to God is Hope, which is a comfortable Expectation of his Promises, and should be always preserved from the dangerous extreme of Presumption or Despair; We should neither depend too much, nor too little upon his Mercies, but rely upon his Justice, and Integrity for our Rewards and Punishments.

A Third Duty we owe to God is Love, a Duty which without doubt he has the greatest right to, both upon the account of his Goodness and Compassion to us, his Innate Excellence, and his particular Kindness to all Mankind.

God is most Good, Just and Excellent, he is perfectly Holy, Kind, and Compassionate, and cannot be charged with any Impurity, or the least mixture of anything that is evil; his Goodness and Kindness are Immense and Infinite, and have been so abundantly demonstrated both to our Bodies and Souls, that we cannot refuse him our Love without the greatest Injustice.

The Scripture abound with Holy Invitations, endearing Promises and affectionate Offers, by which he endeavors, as it were, to woo us into good Lives, and to entreat us to accept of Happiness here and Eternal Happiness hereafter.

The two great Tokens of our true Love to God are First, An earnest desire to please him ‹◇› and Secondly, To enjoy him. This is the common Indication of true Love in all ordinary Cases; and above all oath• things doth best approve us to thos• we have a real value for.

The reality of ou• Affections to Go• are best declared, b• a steady Conformit• to the Divine Will, a readiness t• obey his Commandments, and a• awful regard to his Precepts; the•are indeed Arguments of our real Love, and Affection, and the only way we can make use of, either to please him, or to show the sincerity of our Hearts.

Next to pleasing God, a desire to enjoy him is consistent with our Love; if we love God in earnest we shall covet to be always in his Company, conversing with him in Prayers and Meditations, hearing his Word and receiving his Sacraments, which is the only means of enjoying God in this World.

Our enjoyment of God in the next is far more permanent and complete; there we shall be continually with him in eternal fruition of Joy and Happiness, in comparison of which all our advantages in •his Life are but empty Baubles and Trifles.

A Fourth Duty to God is Fear, which •rises from the consideration of his Power and Justice; and those in Conjunction, do both enable, and oblige him to punish the Wicked an awful regard and belief of which is the only means that can restr ‹...› us from offending him.

God is the chiefes• Object of Fear, and therefore we ough• not to fear Man mor• than God. I will no• fear, says the Psal•mist, what Man can do unto me. Me• have no Power to do us hurt unless• by God's Permission, and then the• Malice can reach no further neithe• than our Goods, Names, Liberties or our Lives; the Destruction o• Soul and Body together is God's Pre•rogative only.

'Tis God alone that knows a• our secret Thoughts and Transact•ons, all our Sins though committee• with never so much Privacy, lie all•ways open before him, and he will b• sure to find us out, and punish ‹◇› unless we repent, which indeed i• the greatest Argument that can b• to awaken our Fears and engage ou• Apprehensions.

A Fifth Duty to God is Trust, that is, a depending and resting upon him in all our Dangers. Wants and Extremities, whether Spiritual or Temporal.

In our Spiritual Dangers, we are to throw ourselves upon God's Assistance, and to implore him to strengthen us with the Grace of his Holy Spirit, that we may be able to withstand, or at least to remove the Temptation.

In our Temporal Dangers we are to rest and depend upon him, to commit ourselves to the shadow of his Wings, under the Royal Prophets Assurance, Psalm •4. 22. That the Lord delivereth the Souls of the Saints, and all that put their trust in him shall not be destitute.

In all our Dangers and Distresses, with Prayers and Tears we are to implore his aid, and not attempt to deliver ourselves by any wicked Act; we must never use sinful means, not even the Preservation of our Lives and Liberties can make any the least pretence for the doing an unjust thing; Christ himself has told us, that if we gain the whole World and loose our own Souls, we are great losers by the Bargain; if therefore things should ever come to that unhappy Issue, that we must part with our Estates, perhaps our Lives, or else commit Sin, we should then remember that that's the proper season to fight under the Banner of the great Captain of our Salvation, the Crucify'd JESUS.

In our spiritual Necessities we are to fly to God with Tears in our Eyes and invoke his Assistance, we are to pour out our Souls before him, and then we may depend upon it, that as he has commanded us nothing that he has not given us Power to perform, so he will suffer us to want nothing that we ask of him with a holy and devout Integrity of mind.

We are likewise to rely upon him in all our Temporal and Bodily Wants; he has obliged himself to take care of all his faithful Servants, his Eye is upon them that fear him, and them that hope in his Mercy, to deliver their Souls from Death, and to feed them in the time of Famine.

If we do our Duty honestly and religiously in our several Places and Callings, then as the Apostle adviseth we may cast all our Care upon God who careth for us, and he who is subject to no sort of Deceit or Impoverishment, that best knows our wants, and is best able to supply 'em, will be sure in the proper season, to relieve us against all Dangers and Necessities whether Spiritual or Temporal.

I conclude this with the words of the Apostle, Phil. 4. 6. Be careful in nothing, but in everything by Prayer and Supplication, with thanksgiving, let your Request be made known to God.

PARTITION II.

Of Humility, of Submission to God's Will, in respect of Obedience, of Patience in all sorts of Sufferings and of Honor due to God in several ways, in his House, Possessions his Day, Word, Sacraments.

A Sixth Duty to God is Humility, which from an humble sense of our own Meanness and his Excellency should work in us a twofold Submission, the first to his Will, the second to his Wisdom.

A Submission to the Will of God consists chiefly in our Obedience or Patience, in the first by urging us to a ready Complaisance to his Commands, by melting down our stubborn haughty Minds, without which we can never come to know, worship, or obey him, with that profound Distance and Submission which the greatness of his Majesty, and the importance of his Commands require.

To promote our Obedience, we should often reflect upon that vast distance that is between God and our Selves, that we are but polluted Dust and Ashes, wretched Creatures but of a few Hours, and that he's without Beginning or End, Immortal and Eternal.

That our best Works and Performances are utterly unworthy of him, or at least unworthy of our own Commendation, the best we can do when we come to compare it with the Perfection and Purity of Almighty God, as the Prophet expresses it, Is but as filthy Rags, and therefore we ought by no means to boast of our own Works or to attribute any of them to ourselves, but to give God the Glory and preeminence in all our Actions.

The Second kind of Submission to God's Will is Patience, which consists in an humble acquiescence to all the Afflictions which HE is pleased to lay upon us. This will make us easy under all his Dispensations, and entitle us to a kind of Repose even in the midst of our Troubles, and is indeed the pure effect of that Humility that does so highly recommend us to Almighty God.

A patient Submission to the Will of God will give us a right notion of our Afflictions rather than incline us to murmurs and complaints, will convince us, that God chastizes us out of Friendship, and so consequently that we are obliged to thank him for his Correction, as indeed we are upon many extraordinary Accounts, but especially as they are Marks of his Care and Love.

Our quiet, and thankfulness under Afflictions is not all neither, the Fruit of 'em should be Repentance, that's God's chief Design in laying them upon us; that they should force us to call ourselves to an account, and enquire diligently what it is that has engaged him to deal with us in so rough a method.

In all our Sufferings and Afflictions we ought to look upon God's permissive Power as the Principle Agent, and with Holy Job's Patience, let them be derived to us either from God or Man; and in his Words, bless the Name of the Lord for giving us warning.

Secondly, I told you that Humility contained likewise a Submission to God's Wisdom, as well as his Will; God being infinitely Wise and Just, we are to submit to him in all his Commands and Dispensations.

We are to submit to him in his Commands, by making our Understanding conformable to his Will and Word, how opposite soever it may be to our own carnal Reason or Humours, for when we consider that his Wisdom is Infinite and cannot Err, we own an Obligation to believe and obey everything he speaks or commands.

We are likewise to submit to the Wisdom of God in all his Dealings and Dispensations, and though many Events happen contrary to the ordinary Course of things, and are utterly above the reach of our narrow Capacities to comprehend, yet being all chosen and determined by the unerring Wisdom of God, we ought to submit to them, with the greatest Satisfaction and Humility.

The next Duty to God is Honor, which consists in the paying him such a respect and Reverence as belongs to the greatness of his Majesty, and this may be either inwardly in our Hearts, or outwardly in our public Actions, and Behaviour towards him.

Besides, the general, there are particular Ways of honoring God, as First, By approaching his House, the Church with Reverence, and behaving ourselves there with Devotion and Attention; Secondly, In his Possessions by paying our Tithes and Just, Dues which God has appointed for the maintenance of his Ministers.

The Sin of Sacrilege and defrauding the Ministry, is a very great and crying Sin; 'tis the downright robbing of God, and indeed his Vengeance is in nothing more discernible than in his Punishment of it; upon which account we should have a very strict Care never to meddle with any thing set apart for God.

The Third Thing whereby we are to express our reverence to God, is by keeping Holy the particular Times set apart for his Service, such as the Sunday's, or Lord's-days and other solemn Festivals appointed by the Church; this he has strictly required of us, and here we must not disappoint him upon any pretence.

Days of Fasting and Humiliation are like wise to be solemnly observed, that according to the Design of the Church, we may meet together, and humble ourselves deeply before God, and with Prayers and Tears bewail our own and the Sins of the Nation.

Fourthly, We are to express our Honor to God, by paying an awful Reverence and respect to his Word, by frequent reading the Holy Scriptures, and by collecting the measures of a good Life from those lively Oracles; by attending upon the Duties of Religion, and by being present as often as we may at the public Catechizings and Sermons.

Catechizing in the first Place is the Foundation upon which the whole Christian Practice must be built, 'tis therefore the Duty of every Parent to have his Children early instructed in the Church Catechism, and for this end they are to call in the help of their respective Ministers; and for those that have been so unhappy to want these Instructions in their Youth, it concerns them as nearly as their Souls to have their minds Principally with the Conditions of their Salvation as soon as they can, which neither the Consideration of their Age, nor any other pretence should persuade them to defer for one Moment.

After they are instructed in the Principles of their Religion, they ought then to apply themselves to the hearing of Sermons, which they ought to attend too, not out of Custom or Formality, but for the true ends for which they were first intended. The Doctrines are to be locked up our Hearts, that we may have them in a readiness to combat all our Lust and Follies, and to beat off all our Temptations; this is the great end of Preaching, and unless we make this use of it, it signifies little towards the Salvation of our Souls.

Fifthly, We are to Honor God in the strict Reverence the two Sacraments, Baptism, and the Lord's Supper; the first we are to respect a particular Covenant between ourselves and ourselves, the first and the Sign of our Salvation; and the second as a remembrance of Christ's Death, and the Privileges afforded to us upon that account.

The Sacrament of Baptism being administered to us in our Infancy. It is not expected from to perform the Covenants which we engage ourselves to by our Professions, but then this lays the greater Obligation upon us when we come to Years of Discretion, to double our Duty, that we may obtain the best amends we can, for our defects of our Minority.

To come to a true Knowledge of our Duties we Promise at our Baptism; the right way will be to consider what our God fathers and God mothers Vow in our Baptism, and that we all find to be, to renounce the Devil and all his Works, by which is meant the Worshipping all false God's, which is indeed the worshipping the Devil; Secondly, The Poms and Vanities of the World, that is, all inordinate desires of Riches and Greediness, all unlawful Sports and Excesses in Meat or Apparel, and all other sinful things wherein the World is apt to deceive us; a Thirdly, The sinful Lust of the Flesh, by which is understood inordinate Appetites, and all unclean and carnal Desires, and this is the first part of our Covenant.

The second general Thing of God-fathers and God-mothers promised for us in our Baptism; that we should believe all the Articles of the Christian Faith, as these are sum'd up to us in the Apostles Creed, and not barely believe them neither, but to have all these Principles so deeply impress'd and engraven in our Minds, that from thence we may be able to draw sufficient Motives to the Practice Virtue and Piety.

The last part of our Vow is, that we should keep God's Holy Will and Commandments, and walk in the same all the Days of our Lives; that is, that according to the Directions of God's word, we should walk all our Days in the Paths of true Religion, Honesty and Sobriety.

This being in short the Substance of our vow, the next thing of the Obligations we all under to perform it, and herein I need only tell you, that 'tis a Vow of the most solemn and binding Nature, and that you cannot break it without being not only unjust, but forsworn; besides, 'tis our Interest to keep it upon many Accounts, but especially upon the Account of the great Privileges it entitles us to, from the Promises of God conveyed to us in that Sacrament.

PARTITION III.

Of the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper of Preparation before, as Examination, of Repentance, Faith, an Obedience, of Duties to be done at the Receiving, and afterward &c.

THE Reverence due to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is the next thing, which according to my first Division, I shall consider by laying down what is to be done before, at, and after the Receiving.

The first thing to be done before the Sacrament is Examination, which is a strict enquiry into the state of our Souls and the Condition of our Lives, and this in the Judgment of St. Paul is so essentially necessary, that we ought not to presume to make any approaches towards the Holy Table without it.

For the perfecting your Examination, you are to consider the Nature of your Covenant, which is a renewal of your Baptismal Vow, and since that is the chief end, three things follow in Course; First, That we be well Instructed in the Covenant itself. Secondly, What have been our Breaches? And Thirdly, Then that we resolve upon a better Performance for the Future, and these Three are to be the general Grounds of our Examination.

And First, You'll find that, this is a Covenant made by God with his Son Christ Jesus for the Redemption of all Mankind, and that the Conditions on our side, are an entire Obedience to all his Commands, and the state of our Knowledge in this, is the first part of our Examination.

The next is concerning our Breaches of this Covenant, which we can never know with that exactness as we ought, without comparing them with the Law of God, which as it is the truest rule and measure of our Duty; so 'tis the best means to lead us to the Knowledge and Fountain of our Sins.

Our Sins alas! are of many sorts and degrees, and require great deal both of our Judgment and Deliberation to enquire aright into their Causes, and Consequences. It requires a great deal of Skill to heighten and aggravate the Circumstances of our Guilt to that degree, till we come at last to a true Sense of the heinousness of them.

The end of Examination is to bring us to this, and to a right Knowledge of our Sins, to humble us at the sight of God, and to melt our Hearts into a deep Sorrow and Contrition upon the Consideration of our Demerits and Injustice towards him; we are likewise to Pray for the Assistance of God's Spirit in the discovery of all our Sins, and for his Grace that we may thoroughly bewail and lament them.

After we have wrought ourselves, by the assistance of our Examination to a just hatred and aversion against all our Sins, then we are humbly to confess 'em to Almighty God, who by the precious Blood of his Son Jesus Christ, we are faithfully to believe, will be reconciled to us, and upon the account of our entire Obedience will vouchsafe us the Salvation of our Souls.

And then, when we have thus examined and prepared ourselves with respect to our Humiliation and Contrition, our Confession and Faith, the next thing is our Resolution of Obedience, which must not be only in general, but with a particular regard to every individual Commandment of God derived from a fixed and solid hatred against all manner of Sins.

The means of t 〈...〉 new and entire Ob 〈...〉 dience must be o 〈...〉 next Care, which w 〈...〉 be best perfected 〈◇〉 an impartial retr 〈...〉 into our own Minds; there 〈◇〉 may discover the Springs and Fou 〈...〉 tains of our Sins, and what Tem 〈...〉 tations we are exposed to, and 〈◇〉 be in a capacity to shun and avo 〈...〉 them; and this must be done i 〈...〉 mediately too, without any ma 〈...〉 ner of Delay or Pretence; for t 〈...〉 it be done, and a Bill of Divorce g 〈...〉 ven to every Lust, we are in no r 〈...〉 spect fit to meet our Redeemer 〈◇〉 the Holy Table.

Beside this, we a 〈...〉 to put our Souls in 〈...〉 the best posture th 〈...〉 we can, by imbracin• all the Virtues of 〈...〉 good Life, and 〈◇〉 possessing them with all those Gr••es that may render them acceptable in the Eyes of God, and this we may do effectually, by contemplating the Promises and goodness of God, and by meditating upon the exemplary Life and Doctrine of our blessed Lord.

His Life will put us •n mind of that Charity and forgiving temper, which is so often, and solemnly required of us, and so essentially necessary in our Sacramental Preparations; 'tis Death for us to approach God's Feast of Love, with any manner of Ranchor or Malice; we are to bring no other Dispositions thither, but what are dictated to us from a devout Mind. A fixed and settled Devotion, earnest and frequent Prayers, and a Soul disentangled from the World, are our properest Companions for this Sacrament, and for these we are earnestly to implore God's Assistance, without whose help in assisting us with the Graces aforementioned, we can never expect 〈◇〉 complete our Preparations.

And for the better perfecting a• this, we are to apply ourselves 〈◇〉 our spiritual Guide, to the Minister of our own Parish, who is th 〈...〉 properest Person in this Case; 〈◇〉 him without any manner of reserv• we are to declare our Doubts an• Jealousies, and to take his Assistance and Directions; and herein 〈◇〉 sort of shame to discover ourselves ough• to deter or discourage us; we ough• to open our Case fairly and Impartially that he may know perfectly how matter stand between God and our Soul• and then he will be able to give u• Advice how to cure both ou• Doubts and our Sins the doubtful an• the confident are equally obliged to this our own Judgment are not entirely to be relied upon, in a Concern where there is so much weight and difficulty, nor is the Advantage of a spiritual Guide to be rejected, when it can be of use in the Improvement of our Preparation.

These are the Duties before the Sacrament. The next thing is, what is to be done at the Time of Receiving; and here, First, Consider thy own unworthiness, and how unfit thy Sins and Frailties, and the repeated breach of thy Vows, have rendered thee for such a Holy Table; from hence, let thy Meditations lead thee to the Sufferings of Christ. When we see the Bread broken, and the Wine poured out, we should reflect that his blessed Body was torn, and his Blood split, and that it was our Sins that was the Cause of both.

Consider likewise that the Sufferings of Christ were the only means to atone the wrath of God, and then consider what inexpressible thanks are due to him for preserving thy Sou• that must have perished eternally without his help; this great Love of Christ for us, should stir up in us a love for him, and engage us immediately to take up solemn Resolutions to Sin no more, and that we may indeed perform these Resolutions, we ought earnestly to beg of this crucified Savior, that he will by the Power of his Death, mortify and kill all our Corruptions.

Just as we are about to receive the Consecrated Bread and Wine, we should remember that then God is entering into a New Covenant with us, that he's now giving us fresh Assurances of the Pardon of our Sins, if we perform our part of the Condition; as soon as we have received, we ought to offer him our devoutest Praises for that great Mercy, and should be sure never to forget to send up our Prayers to him, not more for ourselves than for the good Estate of the Church, and for the Conversion of all Mankind.

After the Sacrament is over, then we ought as soon as Possible, to retire ourselves, and to repeat again our Prayers and Praises, and to renew our Promises, and to beg the Assistance of God's Grace to enable us to make 'em good, and to pursue our present Purposes to the end of our Lives.

The Day we receive the Sacrament should be kept void of all worldly Cares and Business; we should spend that Day especially in Prayers and Meditations; and indeed no Day should pass, but we should call to mind the Promises we make to God at the Sacrament, and consider seriously the danger we expose ourselves to in breaking them.

In breaking our Vows at the Sacrament, we make God our Enemy, and engage him to withdraw from us all manner of Kindness and Compassion; nay, we raise an Enemy within our own Bosom; our Conscience must needs fly in our Face, and upbraid us with the breach of such solemn Vows and Covenants.

God's Mercies in pardoning us heretofore should not give us the least encouragement to provoke him again; to presume upon this is a very high abuse of his goodness; The obligation of our Sacramental Vows are perpetual, and can never be violated without the breach of our Oaths; 'tis perpetual, 'tis true, and yet 'tis to be renewed often, We are to do it as often as we have opportunity in remembrance that Christ died for us. And thus I have showed you the Reverence we are to pay to God in his Sacrament.

PARTITION IV.

Honor due to God's Name; Sin's against it, Blasphemy, Swearing, of Assertory, Promissory, unlawful Oaths, of Perjury, vain Oaths, and the Sin of them.

THE last thing wherein we are to express a Reverence to God is in honoring his Name, and what this is, will be best understood by considering what are the Things by which it is chiefly dishonored.

The first Sin against the Honor of God's Name is Blasphemy, the highest Degree of which is Cursing him either by our Words or in our Thoughts, and next to that, Swearing either by false Oaths or else by rash and light ones.

A false Oath may be of two kinds; as First, That by which I affirm something; or, Secondly, That by which I Promise; the one we call an Assertory, and the other a Promissory Oath, and are both a very great dishonor to God's Name, when they are not taken with Sincerity and Truth, and performed with reality.

An Oath is the strongest Tie that can be between Man and Man, but yet if it be unlawful in itself and contradictory, and impracticable in the Nature of it, in such a Case, though the breach even of such an Oath be a very great Sin, yet 'tis better to repent heartily of our Folly and Wickedness in making such a sinful and inconsiderate Oath, then to attempt with greater Sin and Danger in the performance of it.

There is nothing by which the Name of God is more dishonored then by Perjury, 'tis the highest affront can be offered to him, and indeed we find him resenting nothing with more just severity, then this kind of Violation of his Honor, He will not hold him guiltless, he has declared that taketh his Name in vain, which is so dreadful a menace, that methinks it should engage everyone that has any value for his Salvation, to keep them most strictly from this Sin.

All vain and light Oaths, such as are so common in our Discourses, are likewise a very high offense against the Majesty of the Name of God. Our Savior has forbid us to swear, even by mere Creatures, to show us, I presume the Reverence we ought to have for the Name of their Creator; and sure whatever this profane Age may think of it, there is nothing does more argue a Contempt of God, then to hear his Name intermix'd in every Period of loose Discourse. and violated every Moment with horrid and impertinent Oaths.

This sort of vain and rash Swearing leads directly to Perjury, we grow at last so Familiar with the Name of God, that at length we can use it upon any occasion, without considering whether we swear true or false to things doubtful or certain beside this too there is no manner of Temptation for this sort of lewd Swearing, there is no kind of Pleasure or Profit in it, nor anything else to recommend it, and so consequently 'tis a base Sin, which we willfully commit without any manner of excuse or Pretence.

'Tis a dangerous Vice, and therefore every Man that values the Salvation of his Soul, ought to renounce it with the greatest Caution and Concern; the means are always ready before him, viz. the Sense of the Guilt and Danger of it, when he considers the great dishonor that his rash Oaths offer to the Name of God, and that Eternal Misery must be his Punishment; unless he repents, he must needs surely be touched with a Sense of his Guilt and Danger, and these must certainly argue very strongly with him to renounce 'em.

Speaking Truth is likewise a very great means to restrain us from rash Oaths when Men once come to be observable for their Truth and Integrity, there is no need of an Oath to confirm the Veracity of what they say; we ought also to avoid all occasions that are most liable to betray us to this Vice, to preserve constantly a deep and profound Veneration for the Name of God, which we should never mention without Respect, and that will be an excellent means to prevent us against the profaning it with our Oaths.

Another great means to restrain us from rash Oaths, is to keep  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  strict and constant Watch over our Words, and then to use the great remedy of all Prayer, that God would enable thee to avoid  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  overcome this wicked Custom. And thus by these several ways of dishonoring God's Name, we may easily perceive what it is to Honor it, which is all founded upon an awful Respect and Reverence, which is due to that sacred Name, that is Great, Wonderful and Holy.

PARTITION V.

Of Worship due to God's Name, of Prayer, and its several Parts, of Public Prayers in the Church, of Private Prayers, of Repentance, &c. of Fasting.

THE next great Duty to God is worship, a Duty only peculiar to himself, and therefore of a very great Importance; and is to be performed, First, By our Souls; and secondly, By our Bodies, the Souls part is Praying, and of that there are divers Parts, according to the different thing for which we ask.

Confession is the first, and may be either general or particular, the former is a necessary part of our solemn Prayers, whether Private or Public; and the latter more proper for the Private and the intent of it is, that  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  should humble ourselves before God, and with a deep and hearty Sorrow bewail the Sins we confess.

The second part  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  Prayer is Petition,  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  which we beg of God whatsoever we want either for our Soul or Bodies. For our Souls, we beg the Pardon of our Sins, and the Assistance of his Grace to enable  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  to obey his Will. For our Bodies we beg the necessaries of Life, such outward things I mean, that he his Wisdom sees most fit and needful for us.

A third part of Prayer is Deprecation, by which we entreat God that he would turn away from us the evil of our Sins, and the Punishments due to them; that he would prevent us from all Sin, and enable us against all Temptations, and that he would forbear to chastise us with Spiritual or Temporal Punishments.

The next part of Prayer is Intercession, which consist in Praying for others, both for Strangers and Acquaintance, but in a particular Manner for the Governors of the Church and State, and for our Relations and Friends.

Another Part of Prayer is Thanksgiving, which is the praising and magnifying God for all his Mercies both Spiritual and Temporal; for the blessings of our Souls and Bodies, but above all for the sending his Son to redeem us, and the Holy Ghost to comfort us, and for all other his Favors vouchsafed to us in his Word and Sacraments.

These are the several sorts of Prayer to be used both Public and Private, The Public use of them is first in the Church, from whence we must not absent ourselves without some necessary Cause; and Secondly, In our own Families, where every Master is strictly bound to call his Children and Servants to their daily exercise of them.

Private Prayer, is called so, because we use it in Secret, where we have an opportunity to be more particular than  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  convenient in Public, and upon no account or pretence whatsoever  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  to be omitted.

Prayer is a Duty, that requires a frequent performance by none seldomer then Evening and Morning; we should always begin and end the Day with our Addresses to Almighty God, oftener if we have any conveniency, and indeed did we consider the advantages of Prayer, we should think it great Wisdom to use it as frequently as possible.

For First, 'Tis a great Honor, that such mean and contemptible Wretches as we are, should be admitted but to speak to the great God of Heaven and Earth; and then 'tis a Benefit, the highest that can be Imagin'd Prayer being that immediate source of all the Advantages we either want or wish, besides 'tis a pleasant Duty in itself, and to a truly Pious and Devout Mind, it affords abundance of substantial Delight and Satisfaction.

The Carnal Minds indeed can discover none of these Advantages, the Pleasures of the the Flesh, and the dress of the World lie in the way, and those have so vitiated their Palates, that they cannot taste none of the pleasantness in it; other think it unpleasant for want of a frequent usage, and beside these two, there is nothing can dissuade us from the real Pleasure and Advantage of it.

The next thing is, how well we perform this Duty, and herein we are chiefly concerned for the Matters of our Prayer we are to ask nothing unjust or unlawful but all with Faith, an Humility, and with the most profound and deliberate Attention.

Opposite to Attention in Prayer is all wandering thoughts; the Consequence of which are very dangerous. To suppress these, we should consider the greatness of that Majesty to whom we are speaking, the worth of those things we ask for, and our own extraordinary Wants together.

We must likewise invoke God's Assistance, and set a careful Watch over our Hearts to keep all straying thoughts out of our Minds, whilst we are conversing with Him; all our Petitions should be put up to Him with the highest Zeal and Ardency of Soul; Our Prayers should be abstracted from all manner of in and Impurity, and be constantly directed to right and proper ends.

This is the first part of Worship, the next is Bodily Worship, and this consists, in humble and reverend Gestures in making our approaches to God, in such a decent lowliness of Body, that may best declare with what a Prostration of Soul, we make our Addresses before the Throne of Grace.

Repentance is the next Duty we owe  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  God, and is in show nothing else but a general Resolution to forsake our Sins, and to implore his Grace the times for the great Duty are as often as we think upon our Sins; every Day at least we ought to call ourselves to account.

At some particular times indeed, we are obliged to redouble our Repentance, at those Times we ought to fix for our selves at least once a Week. We ought  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  have a set time of Evening our Accounts with God and our Conscience, the time of Affliction and Calamity is a very proper season for it, and at our Death we are the most solemnly obliged to renew it.

But 'tis dangerous to defer it till Death, we should not hazard our Souls upon such uncertainties; beside, Death-bed Repentance must consequently want several Qualifications which the Nature of true Repentance requires; the custom of Sin is not to be destroyed in a few days, or hours, or perhaps moments, besides too, our Pains and Agonies most probably disturb our thoughts, and then our Repentance can never be dress'd up with that strict Sincerity, which God requires of us for the Salvation of our Souls.

To Repentance, the Duty of Fasting may with great Reason be annex'd which is a Duty we find so commonly recommended by God himself, the Church and the Practice of good Men; by Fasting, we in some measure revenge the Injury done to God upon ourselves, and such Holy Revenge upon ourselves for our Sins, is doubtless very acceptable to God, and yet we ought not to think them sufficient without the Merits of Christ's Blood to atone for our Offences.

The Scripture has indeed given no particular Direction, however often this great Duty of Fasting is to be performed, but the oftener the better; for being great Instrument of our Humiliation, we ought to take all opportunities to perform it, which our Health and Circumstances will admit.

And thus I have pass'd through the the first Branch of our Duty to God to wit, the acknowledge him to be our God; the second the having no other, and of this I need say no more, then that by it we are forbid all kind of Idolatry and Superstitious Worshipping of Images of Creatures, and all inward Idolatry of the Mind.

PARTITION VI.

Of Sobriety, of Humility, the great Sin of Pride, of vain Glory, the Danger, Folly, the means to prevent it, of Meekness, &c.

Duty to our Selves.

This Duty to our Selves, is by St. Paul sum'd up in one word SOBERLY, by which meaning must be our keeping within those bounds which God has set us, both with respect to our Souls and Bodies; and this sober government of the Soul requires a great many Virtues, of which I place Humility in the first Rank.

Humility gives us low and humble thoughts of ourselves, direct us to behave ourselves easily under the mean Opinion of others, and withal is directly opposite to that kind of Pride, and vain Glory; two of the most dangerous Enemies to Mankind.

Pride in the first Place, is a very great and provoking Sin, it has been often shewn by God's severe Punishments of it, it is in some respects, like there a Parent or Nurse to most other Vices, by betraying us first, and then drawing us in to reject all Remedy and by frustrating all the desires and overtures of God's Mercies; and beside this too, it betrays us to punishments, God having all declared himself the proud Man's particular Enemy.

'Tis likewise a very foolish Vice, a Vice that argues the greatest Folly that can be, because there can be nothing either in the Goods of Nature, Fortune or Grace, that with any reasonable pretence we can be proud of.

That this dangerous and foolish Sin is to be avoided, I suppose we may take for granted, and the chief Means to do it, are by applying ourselves to God for the Grace of Humility; which may be best acquired by a Reflection upon our own Sins, Follies, Meanness and Imperfections; to which we ought to join our hearty Prayers, that God would make us some of those poor in Spirit to whom the Blessings of Heaven are promised.

Secondly, Vain Glory; that is, an empty thirst after the Praise of Men, is likewise opposite to Humility, and a very great Sin; for it betrays Men into several dangers, but more especially errances Christ out of their Heart. 'Tis an Indication of Folly too, which everyone must be satisfied in, that would but consider what 'tis he hunts for, only a little empty Applause, a little popular Air which can never bring him any solid advantage; the Means to help this are to consider ourselves in the first place and then the true state of things in the second, and weigh both in the Ballance of Wisdom and Sobriety.

Meekness; that is a Calm and peaceful Temper is another great Virtue, and may be exercised both with respect to God and ourselves, that towards God falls under the Head of Humility and is already spoken to; as it respects ourselves, 'tis an Advantage in a great many Particulars; more especially as it promotes our Honor and Reputation, enables us to bear the Sufferings of Humane Life with Ease and Moderation, and with Prudence and a good posture of Mind; and the proper Means to obtain this most admirable Virtue, are by comparing the Loveliness and Benefits of it, with the ugliness and mischiefs of Rage and Anger, but above all, by contemplating the Life and Example of that great Pattern of all Meekness Jesus Christ.

Consideration is a third Virtue, that relates to the Soul, and directs us to preponderate both our State and our Actions; to weigh our State first, and to consider both the Grounds of our Faith, and the Case of our Souls; and accordingly to prepare ourselves against the Day of Death and Judgment; and the neglect of this most excellent Virtue has been the ruin of thousands, and is the general Cause of all our Sin and Misfortunes.

It directs us too in our Actions; teaches us to advise with our Consciences, and to debate the probable good or ill of everything we do before we do it, and to examine likewise those things that we have already done, whether they may be warranted by the Law of God, and the Rules of Religion and Sobriety; upon many Accounts therefore we are to employ it often both with respect to our State and Actions, and to make up our Accounts frequently; and the plain Reason for it is this, because our Lives are so wavering and uncertain, that we hazard our Salvation, when ever we lie down to sleep in an unrepented Sin.

PARTITION VII

Of Contentedness, and the contraries to it; Murmurings, Ambition, Covetousness, Envy; Helps to Contentedness; of Duties which concern our Bodies; of Chastity, &c. Helps to it; of Temperance.

THE next Duty to ourselves is contentedness, which consists in an evenness and an humble acquiescence under any State it shall please God to allot for us; and without this, 'tis impossible we should be in any tolerable Condition of Happiness. The Contraries to it, are Murmurings and Impatience under God's Dispensations, all Ambitious Thoughts and Desires, and all sorts of Covetousness, Gripping and Extortions.

Covetousness is a very great and high Offence, and directly opposite to the great Duties we owe to God, our Selves and our Neighbors▪ 'tis opposite to our Duty to God, by taking our Minds off from him, and embarrassing them with the Cares and Troubles of the World; 'tis opposite to our Duties to our Selves, both with regard to our Souls and Bodies by urging us to sacrifice the first to a little Pelf and Dross, and the latter to Pains and Disappointments, and so 'tis opposite to our Duties to our Neighbors, both in our Justice and Charity, by forcing us upon unlawful Means, and by setting us upon false and indirect measures; contentedness is also contrary to all kind of Envy and Malice, and can never inhabit in any Breast, that is the least tinged with Prejudice or Revenge.

Helps for Contentment are the Consideration of God's Goodness, Power, and Justice, and his universal Care of the World, that all our Affairs are in his hand who knows our Wants better than ourselves; Secondly, We should consider the Vanity of all earthly things, by comparing them with the essential Joys of Heaven; that we are here but as Strangers and Pilgrims, and that whatever our outward Condition may be, there's a time coming when we shall be delivered from the burden of all our Sins and Sorrows. and be enstated in a Happiness large as our Wish and lasting as our Souls.

A Fifth Duty is Diligence, which is a Duty which we likewise owe to our Souls by watching carefully over them, and diligently guarding them against all Dangers, and then improving them industriously in every Virtue, and in all the Gift of Nature, and the accomplishments of Grace.

We must likewise improve and cherish all good Motions, and make the most of every Holy Suggestion, lest upon our despising the overtures of Grace, God withdraws from us all manner of kindness, and turns us up to a reprobate Sence; and thus far of the Virtues which belong to our Souls, I come next to those that belong to our Bodies.

In the front of these I place Chastity, a Virtue which strictly forbids all manner of wantonness and uncleanness, not only the grosser Acts of Adultery and Fornication, but likewise all impure Thoughts, and all unchaste Looks and Gestures.

The Beauty of Chastity can be no how better described, then by comparing it with the loathsomeness of Lust, and the many Evils and mischiefs that spring from it. Lust defaces the Dignity of our very Souls, and sinks the rational Creature into a Bruit; it makes our Minds foul and filthy, and loads our Bodies with Diseases and Deformity, and what's worst of all, does generally call down God's great and heavy Judgments upon us, and shuts the Gate of Heaven against us Eternally.

These and many other are the sad effects of Uncleaness, against which we ought to fortify ourselves, by avoiding Idleness, and improving our Mind in all kind of active Virtue; by avoiding all manner of Temptation and all lewd Company, but above all, by praying earnestly, that God would give us a Spirit of Purity.

The second Virtue relating to our Body is Temperance, and the Exercises of it are divers, i. e. in Eating, Drinking, Sleeping, Recreation, and Apparel; I shall speak of them separately, and begin with Eating.

Temperance in Eating, is then observed when we make it agreeable to the end for which God and Nature designed it to wit, the Preservation of Life and Health; those are the sole end of it, and he that proposes it either to gratify his Taste, or Pamper his Body, Crosses God's original Purpose in it, and breaks all the Rule of Temperance by which it should be regulated; nay, he sacrifices all his other Senses to his Taste, exposes himself to the Character of a Glutton, and what's worst of all, to the Fate of that rich Glutton, that after all his Dainties wanted at last a drop of Water to cool his Tongue.

PARTITION VIII.

Of Temperance in Drinking; false ends of Drinking, viz. Good Fellowship, putting away Cares,

THE next thing is Temperance in Drinking; the right Ends whereof are the very same with Eating, viz. the preserving our Lives and supporting our Healths, but this like the former has been sadly subverted and directed to Purposes strangely distant from the Original intent of it.

Men now drink themselves into Beast under the common but false Notion of Good-Fellowship; others drink to excess under the pretence that 'tis a great means to maintain a mutual Friendship and Correspondence amongst Men; some will have it, that 'tis highly useful to cheer the Spirits, and to correct and dispel Melancholy; that it drives away the Cares and Perplexities of Humane Life; that 'tis very fit for the passing away time and filling up empty Intervals, nay some will tell us 'tis Reproach not to do it, and argues a great deal of sowreness and disingenuity, man there are that drink for drinking sake that love the Liquor and so are Sots without any of the former Pretences; but these are all great mistakes, and truly upon a fair State of the Matter, 'tis a subject fit both for our Wonder and Sorrow, how this unaccountable Practice of excessive Drinking should have so unluckily encroach'd upon all Societies; that no Bargain can be made (which is another pretence for it) nor nothing of any Moment transacted, but the Tavern, or the Ale-house must be the Place fixed upon for the doing of it.

The unreasonableness of these Motives is too plain to admit of a Dispute, they are all so ridiculous, absurd and inconsistent, that upon a short Appeal to common Experience we find 'em exploded and condemned; every Degree of this Sin is a high breach of Temperance; every drop we drink beyond what is convenient for moderate Refreshment, is an Offence both against God and Man, and the strong Drink above all the rest both from the evil of his Example, and Practice the most unaccountable.

A Man would think that the many Mischiefs that attend this Sin should be a warning to us to avoid it when we consider 'tis a dishonor to God a reproach to Christianity, and a Destruction both to our Souls and Bodies; sure a few Exhortations may serve to prevail with us to forsake it.

And why should any seeming difficulties dissuade us against parting with so dangerous a Vice; why should we plead Custom or the Necessity of Drink, or why should we betray so much Folly, nay so much Wickedness to make drinking the business of our Lives. Alas! 'tis a mistake, and let the vain deluded Drunkard say what he will, it can be no Reproach to us to reject all Intemperances of this kind, and all the Persuasions of Men upon that Account.

The Means to resist these, and all other Temptations for intemperate Drinking, are to weigh the Good with the Ill, and the pretended Advantages with the real Losses and Dangers, and to reject them at their very beginnings, and to avoid all manner of Occasions and Opportunities, this we may do, if it be not our own fault, and these and such like means will effectually do the Business, if our mistaken Love to Vice does not hinder it, and make us unwilling to believe it, either dangerous or destructive.

PARTITION IX:

Temperance in Sleep; the Rule of its Mischiefs of Sloth, of Recreations Cautions to be observed in them ◊ Apparel.

Sleep is a Thin part of Temperance, which is likewise, if measured by the end for which God ordained it, only for ◊ Refreshment; and ◊ support for our frail Bodies; and in this we are likewise to take Care not to indulge ourselves to far least at length it incline us to Sloth which is ordinarily attended with a whole train of dangerous Sins, and with abundance of other great Inconveniencies.

We should likewise have a very high regard to Temperance in our Recreations, and be perpetually Cautious, that they are lawful in their kind, and no ways dishonorable to God, or Injurious to our Neighbor; we should be very careful too, that they never end to undue Ends, but are all exactly Innocent, harmless and inoffensive.

The last part of Temperance is that of Apparel, and this as well as the rest is to be measured according to the Ends for which Cloathing was ordained; which were first to provide a modest and decent covering to hide our Nakedness, this was the first and great End of it; the second was to fence our Bodies from the Severities of the Cold, and secure to us such a convenient Warmth that is necessary for the Preservation of our Health; and the third for the distinguishing Persons both with respect to their Sex, and Qualities. Now these are the three grand Ends of our Apparel, which we should always be careful to preserve in the middle, between the extremes of gaudiness and contempt.

And thus I have passed through the several Branches of Temperance and herein I would in no respect seem to advance a contrary extreme; i. e. too much sparingness, which is indeed a fault as well as Excess. A Covetous griping Temper is no more to be accounted for, than any of the former; and is in many Particulars a high breach of our Duty both to God, our Selves, and our Neighbors.

PARTITION X.

Of Duty's to our Neighbors. Of Justice, Negative, Positive, of the Sin of Murder, of the Hainousness of it, the Punishment of it, and the strange Discoveries thereof. Of Maiming, &c.

Duties to our Neighbors.

IN the Word Righteousness are contained in gross the Duties to our Neighbor; and in the larger Sence it contains all kind, both of Justice and Charity. I begin with Justice, of which there is two sorts, Negative and Positive.

By Negative Justice, we are forbid to do any wrong to any Man; either in respect to his Soul, Body, his Possessions, or his Credit; and first we must not do any manner of Injury to the Soul, either in a Natural and Spiritual Sence; we must take great Care that we give no occasion of Grief or Sadness to the Mind of any Man, in which Sence the Soul is said to be naturally injured; and we must be diligent not to administer to him the Cause, either of Sin or Punishment, in which Case the Soul may be spiritually wronged.

Sin is the Disease and Wound of the Soul, and the seducing us to it is the greatest Injury that can be done us. There are several Means for this, both direct and indirect; the direct Means are commanding us, counseling, enticing assisting us; the indirect Means by showing us ill Examples, or by encouraging us in any Wickedness; by justifying Vice, and by throwing Reproach upon the Duties, and strictness of Religion, and by these, and such like Means, both direct and indirect, Men bring upon themselves the great guilt of injuring and wounding their Brethren's Souls.

It would be too long to instance, the several Sins by which Men ensnare others: will therefore leave with this Caution, that it concerns them near as their Souls, to consider that Injuries they have done of this kind, and to bewail them with the deepest Concern and Sorrow; and not only that neither, but as a more particular Testimony of their repentance, to do their best by all the means they can to make Reparation.

Negative Justice in the second place binds us against all kind of Injury to the Bodies more especially against the Life of our Brethren. Murder is a Sin of the deepest Dye, and may be committed either openly and directly, or else secretly and treacherously. It may be done, either by open and Public Violence or else effected under the Coverture of concealed Malice and revenge, but which way soever it is the Sin is of that altered heinousness, that it provokes God to higher degree of Anger in the Execution of his Vengeance upon than any other Vice in all the black and dreadful Catalogue.

It is worth our notice by what miraculous Means God been pleased to deliver it; and indeed would we but take  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  to our serious Thoughts, it must needs possess us with the greatest Horror and Abomination of it, and engage us to watch and guard ourselves against the most distant approaches of this Vice.

Next to the Murthuring, the maiming and disabling our Neighbor is a very great Sin, this we must grant, by reflecting how precious our Limbs are, and how miserable a thing the want of any of 'em is; especially, if it be  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  poor Man; in such  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  Case, though we can never make him a full Satisfaction, we are the most solemnly bound to provide for his own, and his Families wants.

Unlawful Wounds and Stripes are likewise highly inconsistent with that golden Rule of Loving our Neighbor as our Selves and indeed our Cruelty to others, argue not only a great deal of Pride and Insolence, but withal  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  savageness and brutishness of mind, much below the common tenderness and compassion that becomes the human Nature.

PARTITION XI.

Of Justice about the Possessions of our Neighbors; against injuring him in his Wife, his Goods; of Oppression; Theft; of paying of Debt &c.

THE next part Negative Justice, relates to the Possessions of our Neighbors,  $\langle \diamond \rangle$  the front of which we may with great Reason place the Wife. O Wives, are the Principle part of our Possessions, and the corrupting Her to defile Her Husbands bed, is the worst and highest part of Injustice both to the Man and the Woman; this is an irreparable sort of Injury. A Vice that God has declared that he himself will Judge, and we may depend upon it, without Repentance that Judgment of his will be the most severe and dreadful.

Next to this, we owe a Negative Justice to our Neighbor with respect to his Goods; such as are his House, Land, Cattel, Money, &c. and the two ordinary Causes that engages Men to break it, are therefore Malice or Covetousness.

That Part of Injustice that is founded upon pure Malice, is commonly acted upon the Devils Principle, like him they seek to destroy others; not so much, as 'tis any good to themselves, but out of a natural desire to do mischief, the other part that is founded upon Covetousness, though indeed it may have something of a base and sordid Design in it; yet when 'tis considered, 'tis always attended by Oppression Theft and Deceit, it wants very little to come up to the wickedness of the former.

Oppression is an insolent bare-fac'd Robbery, and so much the worse still, because the Poor are generally the Persons injured we have many. Lectures against every kind of it, in Holy Scripture but especially against that which affects the Fatherless and Widow 'tis indeed a most crying guilt, and God's heavy Vengeance is no one instance more exemplary, he that has oppressed the Poor; saith the Prophet, shall surely die, and his Blood shall be upon him.

Theft is another kind of this Injustice, which in general is twofold, the first is the withholding what we should pay, and the last the taking from our Neighbor what we have no Right too; the first as well as the last, is a plain Act of Robbery, and let the present Practice of the World argue never so much for it, it can never prove, but that by common Justice and Honesty we are strictly engaged, to the utmost of our Abilities, to discharge all the debts we are obliged to, either by Bond, Promise, or any other lawful Obligation.

PARTITION XII.

Of Theft; Stealing; of Deceit ‹◊› Trust; in Traffick; of Restitution, &c.

THE next Part of Theft is; either by open Violence or private Fraud, the Robbing our Neighbor of that which he is in Possession of. This a Vice that wants no Aggravation it need not be disputed, but the both the Highway Man and House-breaker, as well as the sly, injurious Pilferer are two Ranks of degenerate Creatures so odious to God that they are unfit for human Society. There are a great many Branches of this sort of Robbery as the Concealing of stol'n Goods the buying them at cheap Rate with many others, which I need not mention any further, they being best but a kind of Robbery. God will be sure to deal severely with us upon that account, although perhaps we may escape the Cognizance of the Law.

A third Part of Injustice is Deceit, of which the Acts are so numerous, that 'tis morally impossible to Name 'em all: I shall Rank them therefore under these two general Heads, viz. The Deceits of Trust, and Traffick.

He that deceives a Man in a Matter of Trust that is committed to him, is guilty of the most treacherous and base Injustice; in such a Case we are to behave ourselves with the utmost Fidelity; especially, when anything for the uses of Piety or Charity are committed to our Charge; he that violates his Faith in these particulars, adds Sacrilege to Fraud and Treachery, and entails upon him all the Curses that are due to those Sins.

As to Matters of Traffick, there may be deceit both in the Buyer and Seller; the Seller Sins greatly, when by a Connection of Lies, perhaps Oaths and Execrations, he conceals or excuses the faults in his Commodities, or what's as bad, sells by false weights and measures, or impose an extravagant unreasonable Price upon the Buyer; these are indeed grown very common and practicable faults, but yet never the more excusable, the great Judge of Truth and Equity has often declared his solemn displeasure against 'em, and will be sure, sooner or later, to punish them to the utmost.

The Buyer may be guilty of Fraud too and though indeed he does not fall under so many Temptations as the Seller yet when ever he makes an advantage of his Neighbors Wants, and Purchases his Commodities at under Rates, without doubt he offends the Justice of God, by thus insulting upon, and making his Advantage of his Brothers Necessities.

The Temptations to Deceit in Traffick, are so interwoven with all Trades, that it behooves every dealing Man to have a great Care to guard himself against them, this way of Cheating is become a perfect Trade itself, and Men boast of it, and value themselves upon it, but for all that the Eyes of God are too pure to behold such Iniquity; nay, 'tis even a scandal to our Christian Profession, a very high and solemn breach of those common Rules of Justice and Equity laid down in the Precepts of the Gospel to be the Standard and Guide of our Actions.

Besides all this, 'tis but a mistaken Principle neither, Fraud and Undermining, deceitful measures and false balances are not the right way to make us Rich, there goes a secret Curse along with such kind of Practice which is generally executed in this Life; which though it may by chance fail here, it never fails in the next; there the Deceiver will be fatally deceived in the loss of his Soul, the Consideration of which should methinks put him upon the grand Remedy, Restitution, without which he can never make any tolerable Atonement for the Injury he has done either to God or his Neighbor.

PARTITION XIII.

Of false Reports; false Witness; Public Slanders, Wisperings; of Scoffing, Calamities, Sins, &c. Of Positive Justice, Truth, •ying, of Envy and Detraction, of Gratitude, &c.

THE Credit of His Credit. our Neighbor is another Part of Negative Justice, which should be as dear to us as his Possessions, and should in no respect be impair'd either by false Reports or malicious Surmizes and Conjectures, from both which our Reputation, the dearest thing we have, next our Souls, is liable to great Injury.

False Reports may be spread divers ways, both Public and Private, the Public way is ordinarily, by bearing false Witness either with regard to our Lives or Estates; this is a most grievous Wound indeed to our Credit, a sort of outrageous Injustice to our Neighbor, that we are hardly ever able to make him amends for.

The second open way of spreading these Reports is by Public Slander, and herein our Reputation is also liable to a great deal of Injury. Reproaches, Lying, Scandal and Railing make up the base Composition, which as the Apostle long ago observed were amongst other Works of the Flesh, fit only to shut Men out of the Church here, and the Kingdom of Heaven hereafter.

The Private way of spreading such Reports is Whispering, this is a way as dangerous if not worst then the former, and is by St. Paul mentioned in the Catalogue of great Crimes, which are the effect of a Reprobate Mind; this is a kind of Slander that like secret Poyso• destroys us insensibly; 'tis Solomon•Observation; that the Wisperer separates chief Friends, than which nothing can argue louder for the suppressing of it.

The several Steps of this Vice are to be carefully avoided, as First, We should be so far from encouraging it, that we should rather reject the very first approaches of the Tale-bearer: Secondly, We should be very Cautious how we believe false Reports, or rather we should never give any Credit at all to them: And Thirdly, We should be sure never to report anything we here from such kind of People, but look upon 'em no less Enemies to us, then to those of whom they are speaking.

Besides, this open way of impairing our Neighbors Credit, there is▪ yet another, which though it may seem to be a little more plausible, is yet in all respects as bad as the former; I mean Scoffing and Reviling, which indeed is not only an Injury to our Neighbor, but even to God himself.

The three Things for which Men are commonly revil'd, are either for their Infirmities, their Calamities or their Sins; and why should Men be despised for that which they cannot help, this is calling God's Providence to an Account, especially with respect to the two former; indeed for our Sins they have more of our Wills, 'tis true, but then considering they make us the most miserable of anything else, without doubt they require a great deal of our Pity and Compassion.

We owe likewise a Negative Justice to the Credit and Reputation of our Neighbor; his Credit is the most valuable thing he has, and therefore to Rob him of that, is the highest Injury we can do him 'tis the highest, because his Damage is irreparable; the utmost we can do, can never make him amends, and yet we must do our best, because without it we can never expect God's Pardon for the Sin.

Thus I have past through the four Branches of Negative Justice to our Neighbor, and yet must further observe, that this Justice binds our Thoughts as well as our Words and Actions; nay, it confines even our Wishes and Affections. Our whole Hearts should be intent upon his Good, and our Minds constantly taken up, which way we may best promote the Happiness both of his Soul and Body.

I come now to speak of Positive Justice, by which is intended the giving to every Man his proper dues, whether General, or Particular; as First, The speaking Truth in general of all Mankind; this is a common debt we owe to everyone, and indeed we are bound to the strict performance of it, by many strong and weighty Obligations, but the greatest of all is, because Lying is a Vice so scandalous and odious in itself, and so solemnly condemned in many parts of Holy Scripture; but then what's very strange, notwithstanding 'tis the most foolish and ridiculous, 'tis become so common, that 'tis a great Rarity (to use the Words of the Royal Prophet) to find a Man that speaks the Truth from his Heart.

Next to this we owe to all, Humanity and a courteous and affable Behaviour, a Virtue which a Proud Man can never arrive to; he is so busy in admiring himself, that he overlooks all the Perfections of others.

Meekness is likewise a Debt we owe to every Body, and indeed a very great accomplishment, and highly necessary for the Preservation of the Peace of the World; whilst on the contrary, all sorts of Brawlings and Contentions, tend to Disorder and Confusion, nay, what's worse, they tend to a great many Sins too, but especially to that most provoking Sin, Cursing and Execration.

Having thus far spoken of Dues in General, I come now to the Particular, which Men are ordinarily entitl'd to upon some special Qualification, the three chief are, that of Excellency, that of Want, and that of Relation.

And first a Man is entitl'd to our Respect upon the Account of his Excellency. I mean for his extraordinary Gifts and Endowments, such as are Wisdom, Learning, Grace, and the like; and such a Person we are in no respect either to Envy or Revile, or to grudge at God's Blessings and Kindness to him; we should not attempt to detract from his Worth, or to cloud or darken his Merits, but rather do our best to make 'em as conspicuous as we can, and this we should do not only as it is a Debt which we owe to him, but because the contrary is an Act of extreme folly, as well as ill Nature and Injustice.

Beside the Excellencies of the Mind, we owe a regard to the Quality and outward Advantages. God for the due governing of the World, has decreed several Orders and Classes of Men, to each of which in Proportion to their respective Dignity we are to pay a due Respect.

We are also Debtors to Persons under any kind of Want, whether Spiritual or Temporal, but more especially to the Poor, who by God's particular Appointment, have a solemn Right to our superfluities; and then it can be nothing else but an arrant Robbery to bestow that upon our Lust or Vanity, which is assigned for their Portion. In the Case of the Poor we are God's Stewards, and 'tis the same injustice and fraud for us to embezzle that which he has entrusted with us, as it is for any Steward to misemploy that which was intended for the use of his Masters Family, and commonly too meets with the Doom of the unjust Steward in the Gospel, to cause us to be put out of our Stewardship, and have those Abilities taken away, that have been so unfaithfully employed.

The third Qualification is that of Relation, and of this there are divers sorts, as First, that of a Debtor to a Creditor, and of an obliged Person to his Benefactor, and in both these Particulars we are bound by the strictest ties of Justice and Gratitude Not to pay our just Debts when we are able, is a Vice almost unpardonable, and to be ungrateful to a Benefactor, however common it may be in this unthankful Age, is an Act the most sordidly base and disingenious.

PARTITION XIV.

Of Duty to Magistrates, Pastors. Of the Duty of Parents to Children, &c. Of Children's Duty to Parents.

I Come now to the nearest kind of Relations, and in the first Rank of those I place our Duty to Parents, whether Civil, Spiritual or Natural.

The Civil Parent is he who by a just right possesses the Throne, and to him we owe Honor and Reverence; we are to look upon him, as a Person upon whom God has stamp'd a great deal of his own Power and Authority, and upon no Account to speak evil of him or revile him.

Next we owe him our Tribute, which we are to pay him with the utmost, both of Justice and Freedom; Thirdly, We are to Pray for him, that God would direct and assist him in all his Undertakings. And Fourthly, We owe him a solemn and strict Obedience; which both the Laws of God and Nature have commanded us to observe with the most awful and religious Submission.

The second sorts of Parents are the Spiritual, viz. the Ministers of God's Word, and such are entrusted with the Salvation of Souls; to them we owe the highest Love and Kindness we are obliged to esteem and value them as our best and truest Friends we are likewise to contribute to their Maintenance, and withal to look upon them as God's Messengers, and upon that Account to behave ourselves towards them with a great deal of distance and respect, and to put up our earnest Prayers to God for them, that he would grant them the assistance of his Spirit, to enable them rightly to discharge their Holy Calling.

The third sort of Parent is the Natural, by which is meant the Fathers of our flesh. Towards these we are to demean our lives with Reverence and Humility, and upon no Account to contemn or despise them, either in our outward behaviour or in our Hearts; we owe them our most ardent Love and tenderest Affection, and ought to shun everything that can give them the least Cause of Grief or inquiet.

We owe likewise our Obedience to all the Commands of our Parents, that are not opposite to the Laws of God, and cannot violate them, without exposing ourselves to the Punishments he has so often denounced in Scripture against disobedient Children.

Children are not to Marry without the Consent of their Parents, every Child is so much the Right and Possession of his Parent, that he must be guilty of Theft to dispose of himself without his Consent. We are likewise bound according to our Abilities, to supply their Wants, and to administer to them any kind of Extremity: and all this is to be done, even to the worst of Parents.

But as there are many things due from the Child to the Parent, so there are so many from the Parent to the Child. The Parent is obliged to nourish and sustain the Child till he comes of Age to do it himself, he is likewise to take Care for his Soul, by bringing him early to the Sacrament of Baptism; and by having him timely instructed in the Principles of Religion, and educated in the true Faith, and Fear of God; and as a Means to improve his Education too; he is to encourage and correct him, and to use all wise and gentle Means in order to impress upon him a timely Sense of Virtue, and good Morals.

Thirdly, The Parent is to watch over the Soul of his Child after he comes to years of Maturity, and as often as he finds occasion, to exhort, encourage and reprove him; he is likewise to take Care of his outward State, by providing him with a suitable Condition of Life; but above all, he is to lay before him a good Example, and to make his own Life a fit Pattern for him, from whence he may transcribe the true Rules of Virtue, Honor, Honesty and Godliness; and then he is to Bless him, and Pray for him, and to recommend him often to God's Care and Protection: And besides, all this too, he must be extremely careful, that all the Commands he lays upon him are just and reasonable, and in all respects utterly distant from all sorts of harshness or severity.

PARTITION XV.

Of Duties to our Brethren, and Relations; Husband, Wife, Friends, Masters, Servants.

THE second sort of Relation is that of a Brother, which we may take in a double Sence, either Natural or Spiritual. I begin with the First, the Duties between Natural Brethren, I mean such that are of the same immediate Parents. And the Duty of these is to have united Hearts and Affections, to love one another with great Tenderness and Sincerity, and to do their utmost to promote their mutual Good and Happiness; This is a Duty so necessary in all Points, that without it no Family, where there is any number of Brothers, and Sisters, can propose any tolerable Ease or Satisfaction.

The second sort are Spiritual Brethren, under which Notion are comprehended all those that are baptized in the same Faith, and Church with ourselves, and to all these our Compassion is to be the most melting and affectionate; with these we are to profess and defend the Faith of Christ Crucify'd, and to communicate with 'em in all Holy Offices, we are to bear with their Infirmities, and in a friendly manner to admonish and reprove 'em, and by fair and gentle Methods to endeavor to bring them to Repentance after they are fallen. We are to sympathize with them in all their Agonies and Distresses, whether of Soul, Mind, or Body.

The third Relation is that between Husband and Wife, this is the nearest Relation of all, and yet there are several respective Duties which they owe to each other, for the Wife in the first Place, she owes her Husband Obedience, which God has strictly commanded her to pay him in all things that are Just and Lawful; she owes him Fidelity both to his Bed and his worldly Affairs, she owes him likewise her Love, and is bound to behave herself to him with the greatest friendliness and sweetness. And this she is to do notwithstanding his faults, which will by no means acquit her of any of these Duties.

There are likewise several Duties owing from the Husband to the Wife; the First, Is Love, by which he is enjoined to treat her with the utmost Tenderness and Compassion, not to behave himself to her with any manner of harshness or severity, but to use her in all respects as a part of himself.

Secondly, He owes Fidelity to her Bed, this is as much the Husbands Duty as the Wife's, and the breach of it in either, is an Act of Uncleaness, and Perjury. Thirdly, He is bound to do his endeavor to provide for her, and to suffer her freely to partake of all his outward Blessings; and amongst the rest of his Duties, he is chiefly to take Care of the Salvation of her Soul, and to instruct her as far as her need requires in the Principles of Honesty and Religion.

In brief, Husbands and Wives are mutually bound to Pray for each other, and to their utmost to propagate their Reciprocal Good and Happiness.

The true Ends of Marriage are likewise to be consulted; in which Case the Ornaments of the Mind are sooner to be chosen, then either Wealth, or Beauty, or any other outward Appendage; above all the rest, unlawful Marriages are to be avoided, 'tis a Holy State and should never be entered into, but according to the Direction of the Church, Reverently, Advisedly, Soberly, and in the Fear of God.

The next thing is Friendship, which is of that common good and concern, that human Life would be but a wretched thing without it; the Duties of it are many, but the most material are Faithfulness in our Trusts; Assistance, either with respect to our Souls, or Bodies; to our Souls, especially in admonishing us of our faults; which is the highest and most exalted Act of Friendship that can pass between Man and Man. Prayer is the next Duty, and after that Constancy, and all these together render a Friend an inestimable Jewel.

The Last Relation is that between Masters, and Servants, and these too are mutually engaged to each other. The Servant is bound to obey his Master's just Commands, and to execute them with Freedom and Satisfaction; he owes him likewise an universal Fidelity in all his Concerns; and is obliged by all the Rules of Modesty, and good Manners, to bear his Rebukes, and Reprehensions, with Submission, and to discharge his Trust, in every Particular, with Diligence, and Application.

The Masters on the other side, owe to their Servants Justice, in providing them with convenient Food, and paying them their Wages; as also Admonitions and Reproofs, with regard as well to their Sins and Offences against God, as Faults against themselves. They owe 'em likewise good Example, that is, they are to make their own Lives and Actions a fit President for them to walk by; they are to allow them opportunities for Instruction, and convenient time for the Public Worship of God; moreover they are to command them with Prudence and Moderation; to encourage their well doing, and to treat their Faithfulness, Diligence, and Piety with a great deal of Kindness and Bounty.

PARTITION XVI.

Other Branches of our Duty to our Neighbor. Of Charity to Men's Souls, Bodies, Goods and Credit.

THE next Duty to our Neighbor is Charity, this is a Duty which the Blessed JESUS himself has solemnly enjoyn'd in his Holy Gospel, and may be considered two Ways, either in our Affections, or Actions; and First, The Charity of Affections, is such an universal Kindness, that inclines us to wish well to the Soul, Body, Goods, and Credit, of all Mankind.

To their Souls in the first Place, and to them we cannot sure but wish well, when we consider, that Christ thought their Ransom worth the Price of his own Blood; we owe next all the good we can to the Bodies of Men; this is an high Article of our Charity, and without it, we can never come up to that golden Rule, of loving our Neighbor as ourselves. His Goods, and his Credit, are likewise to be very dear, and precious to us, and we are bound to propagate his Interest, and Reputation, and to esteem them upon all Accounts equal to our own.

This kind of Charity naturally begets in us a quiet and peaceable Mind, and a Compassion and Tenderness towards others; it creates in us a Joy for their Prosperity, and excites us to Pray for 'em, and to importune Almighty God in their behalf; besides all these too, it guards our Minds against all sort of Envy or Revenge, keeps down our Pride, and impresses deep upon us the Grace of Humility; it destroys Censoriousness, and curbs the rashness of our Judgment, suppresses Dissimulation, and banishes, and subverts, all feign'd, and pretended Kindness; it casts away all Self-love, and mercenary Designs, and entirely roots out of our Minds all manner of Ranchor and Malice.

Nay, this Charity goes further, according to the Doctrine and Example of our Blessed Lord, it extends itself even to our Enemies; and what can be a greater Motive to it, then to find it so solemnly commanded and enforced by God's own President.

This is a Subject well becoming our serious Consideration, and should put us in mind methinks, to balance our Sins against God, with the Offences of our Brethren against ourselves, and would we do that, we should find the first so much outweigh the last, that from a fair Comparison, we must needs judge ourselves very unworthy to expect God should Pardon us for so many great offenses, and yet at the same time we refuse to forgive our Brethren for some, perhaps, trivial faults; besides this too, there's a great deal of Pleasure and Satisfaction in the forgiving our Enemies; 'tis true, this may seem a Paradox at first sight, but then, if we examine the Truth of it by Experience, we shall find it really so, and this sort of forgiving Temper, the most delightful as well as the most Christian.

Beyond this likewise, there is another Consideration strong enough to engage us to forgive our Enemies, I mean the danger of it; God has made our Compassion to others, the Standard by which he intends to measure his to us. If ye forgive not Men their Trespases, neither will your Father forgive your Trespases, nay, he has made it a part of our daily Prayers, so that when a revengeful Person says this Prayer, he lays upon himself a Curse, and does in effect beg God not to forgive him.

This is a Duty we are obliged to in Point of Gratitude too; God has showed us wonderful Mercies, and can we be so base to think, we are not obliged to some returns. Peace and Unity was one of the last things our Savior recommended to the World, and indeed he has pressed no single Precept with greater concern than this of universal Charity and forgiving Enemies, a Consideration methinks, that should engage us to suppress all Degrees of Ranchor and Revenge, and to check and curb them in their very first Motions.

I come now to the Charity in the Actions, which is the truest way to prove the former, I mean by a sincere and cordial Love, distributed without Hypocrisy, or Reserve, to the Soul, Body, Goods, and Credit of our Neighbor; to his Soul and Mind, we should acquit ourselves with the utmost tenderness and concern, and omit no means that might any ways promote the Happiness or Advantage of either; to his Body we should exercise all the Offices of true Christian Friendship and Kindness and upon all occasions be constantly ready to promote his Interest, and defend his Reputation.

PARTITION XVII.

Of Charity; Alms-giving, &c. Of Charity in respect of our Neighbors Credit, &c. Of Peace making, of going to Law, of Charity to our Enemies.

THE next thing is our Charity, towards the Goods and Estate of our Neighbor, and herein we are to assist and further him in all honest and friendly Offices, and this we are to do to the Rich as well as the Poor only with this difference, that the Poor are the more immediate Objects of our Alms.

This great Duty of Alms-giving is enforced by many strong and powerful Motives, but the three greatest of all are with respect to God, our Neighbor, and our Selves, God has commanded it, and expects it both as an Argument of our Obedience and Thankfulness. Secondly, True Love and Compassion, and a Fellow-feeling of our Neighbors Wants and Sufferings engage us to it. Thirdly, In respect of our Selves, the Motive is, that there is an Eternal Reward annexed; the manner is likewise to be carefully consulted, which will add much to the Grace itself, and to the Advantage of those we relieve.

And First, We are to do it always with the greatest cheerfulness and satisfaction to exercise a kind of Holy Joy in dealing our Bread to the hungry; we must not entertain any vain Fears, or impious Apprehensions, that our administering to the Wants of the Distrest will be any means to Impoverish us or consume our Estates. We are likewise to observe a due season and order of Time, and a Prudent and Religious Care in the regular Distribution of our Charity, and withal to do it pursuant to the Principles of Liberality and true Christian Generosity.

Our Charity likewise obliges us to preserve and propagate the Credit of our Neighbor, to be ourselves very tender and careful of his Reputation, and to defend and promote it among others, with all the Caution that we are able; to be unwilling to believe his Faults, and to conceal them as far as 'tis lawful from the Public, and to use all friendly means to advise and reclaim him.

This is the sum of that Active Charity we owe to the several Capacities of our Brethren, and this indeed according to the true meaning of it, is a kind of Justice we owe to him. Likewise Justice and Charity are so near ally'd, that they are not to be separated, the one constantly depends upon the other, and they can never be divided without Injury to both.

To improve this excellent Virtue, we can do nothing better, then by laying always before us that great Rule of Loving our Neighbor as our Selves, this the Apostle makes the sum of our Duty; and indeed we can hardly err if we make that the Standard whereby to measure our Actions.

Peace-making is another Act of Charity, and may be of great use both to his Soul, Body, Goods, and Credit. God himself has pronounced the Peace-maker blessed, an encouragements sufficient to engage us to lay hold on all opportunities of setting upon this extraordinary Work of Charity; but first every Man ought to have a special regard to his own Temper; he that will undertake in such an excellent Office, has need to be qualified with all the Graces of Peace, Meekness, and Charity.

Contentions, and Quarrels, and Litigious Suits and Controversies ought to be appeas'd and taken up with all the Caution that can be.

The going to Law if the Cause be Just has commonly so many unhappy Appendages, that according to the Judgment of St. Paul, the tender regard we ought to have for Peace, should rather incline us to take Wrong and suffer ourselves to be defrauded then make use of it.

All that remains now, is the extent of this Charity; which is to reach to all Order and Degrees of Men even to our very Enemies; this was our Blessed Lord's own Example, then which, there can be nothing greater to recommend it to us.

And thus I have run through the several Parts of our Duty to our Neighbor, towards the right Performance of which there is nothing certainly can more conduce then the rooting out of our Hearts all kind of inordinate Love of ourselves; this is an unhappy Principle indeed, and where it once takes root it soon choaks both our Charity and our Justice; if therefore, we ever intend our Charity should grow in our Minds, we must first weed out of 'em this Sin of Self-love, for 'tis impossible they can prosper together, and then, when this and all other hindrances are removed, we are to fly to our grand Remedy, Prayer, that God would frame our Hearts into such a galless Temper, that we may be enabled rightly to perform this great Duty.

And now I have done with those several things I at first proposed, in showing what is our Duty to God, our Selves, and our Neighbor; and surely, through the whole, there seems nothing of Impossibility; the things themselves are all reasonable Just and Practicable, and what's more delightful and pleasant too; even those that may seem to expose us to Persecutions and Suffering from their Ends and Consequences are the Objects of more Joy than Grief. There is such a Power in Virtue, such a Satisfaction in a good Conscience, and such a Secret and constant Pleasure in the Performance of the Christian Duties, that there is no Apology to be made for our Neglect; beside, 'tis a dangerous thing to defer our return to God, the Particulars I have set down in the Discourse of Repentance, and thither I refer you; with the Wise Kings most rational Advice, Eccles. 5. 7. Make no tarrying to turn to the Lord, and put not off from Day to Day.

An Introductory Prayer for Faith.

Blessed Lord, God, strengthen and confirm my Faith I besee thee, that I may truly believe and depend upon thy Holy Name, and Word; improve my Understanding, and direct my Will, that whatsoever I read in this, or any Book tending to the Promotion of Religion, and the Salvation of my Soul, may sink so deep into my Mind, that I may bring forth by it, the Fruit of good Living, to thy Praise and Honor: O Jesus, my only Mediator and Advocate.

A Prayer suited for the First Partition.

INstruct me O my God, in the Whole Duty of Man; enrich me with thy blessed Spirit, that the Lights of Nature and Scripture may shine bright in me, and guide me, through the distinct Branches of my Duty, to Thee, my Self, and my Neighbor. Give me O Jesus, merciful Jesus, such an awful Sence of thy Eternal Essence, that by a steady and unalterable Faith I may lay hold on thy gracious Promises; improve and enliven my hope by a fixed and solid Dependance upon thy Goodness, and yet restrain me too, that I may in no respect be possessed with the Vanity of Presumption. O God of Love, inspire my Soul with such a Holy Ardency, that I may make it the whole business of my Life to Adore and Love Thee. O God of Love! Let the Fear of Thee (O glorious Majesty!) posses me with such a Holy Reverence, and Regard for Thee, that I may be afraid to do anything against the Honor due to thy Name, or to provoke Thee with any kind of Sin, or Folly; and in all my Wants and Extremities, give me Grace to put my whole Trust and Confidence in Thee: O Almighty Lord!

For the Second.

ENdow me, O Lamb of God, with a Spirit of Meekness and Humility, that I may be enabl'd to submit to thy Will, and to undergo all the Sufferings of my Life with Calmness and Moderation. O thou Eternal Fountain of all Honor, Glory, and Power, for thy own sake I beseech Thee impress deeply upon my Soul, a high Reverence and Regard for thy House the Church, and the Possessions thou hast set a part for thy own Use, and let thy Day, thy Word, and thy Sacraments be always precious in my sight; O Lord! my Strength, and my Redeemer.

For the Third.

O Merciful Jesus, who hast prepared a blessed Feast for the Entertainment of my Soul, give me Grace before I presume to approach thy Table to prove my Self by a strict Examination, how fit I am to be a Guest at such an Holy Banquet; and seeing I can never prepare myself as I ought without Repentance, Faith, and Obedience: Direct me I beseech Thee, in the right performance of those great Duties, and in every other Grace and Virtue that is any ways requisite to qualify me aright for that awful Mystery.

For the Fourth.

O Omnipotent and Eternal God, I acknowledged thy Name is Great, Wonderful, and Holy, and most worthy of Honor and Adoration; keep me therefore (dread Lord) from all kind of Blasphemy, and Perjury, and from all vain and unlawful Oaths, and from every other Sin that may any ways tend to debase the Majesty of thy most glorious Name.

For the Fifth.

THY Name O Lord is thy own glorious Self! Hear me therefore O great Jehova! That when I Pray, Repent, or Fast, or do any of the other Duties of Religion, I may do them all with an habitual Reverence, and Purity of Intention, to the Praise and Honor of thy Name.

For the Sixth.

Direct me O my God in the Duties to my Self! Impress upon me O Eternal Goodness, a sober Mind, and an Humble Spirit, that I may acquit myself to Thee and my Fellow-Creature, as becomes a Wise Man and a good Christian; keep I beseech Thee all Pride and Vain-Glory out of my Heart, and from a due Reflection upon the Folly and Danger that attends them, give me Grace to use the means to prevent 'em effectually; endow me O thou Author of all good Gifts, with a meek and quiet Spirit, that I may form my Life after thy Example; O blessed Jesus!

For the Seventh.

BLess me O Father of Mercy with a contented Mind through every State and Turn of my Life, and let neither Murmuring, Ambition, Covetousness, or Envy at any time get the Dominion over my Reason, and disturb the Composure of my Soul. Assist me mercifully O Lord in the performance of those Duties that concern my Body, that by the help of Chastity and Temperance, I may utterly mortify all my Corrupt Lusts and Appetites, and make it a fit Receptacle for a pure Mind, and a quiet Conscience.

For the Eighth.

Give me, O thou Eternal Fountain of all Order and Sobriety, a fixed and setl'd Hatred against all Intemperance, but more especially against that of excessive Drinking; discover to me I beseech Thee, the false Ends of Drinking, and imprint upon me such a deep sense of the Danger, and Folly, and withal of the Loathsomeness of it, that I may reject it, as a Vice much below the Dignity of a Man, much more of a Christian.

For the Ninth.

O Holy, Holy, Holy, Lord, God, direct me I beseech Thee in a right Application of all thy Blessings. Thou hast given me leave to Sleep for the Support and Repose of my Frail Body, teach me likewise, O God of Temperance, to measure it by the Ends for which thou was at first pleased to ordain it. Let all my Recreations be moderate and inoffensive, and used with the strictest Caution with regard to Thee, my Neighbor, and my Self; give me Grace and Prudence to avoid all Gaiety in my Apparel, and to prefer the inward Ornaments of my Soul to all useless Trappins, and all gaudy and insignificant Shows and Formalities.

For the Tenth.

INstruct me, O Eternal Father of all Truth and Equity, in the Duties I owe to my Neighbor; grant I beseech Thee, that I may direct my Life, by the constant Rules of Justice, both Negative and Positive. Prevent me, O Crucify'd Savior from that crying Sin of Murder; let the heinousness, the Punishments, and the strange Discoveries thou hast been pleased to make of it be always in my View, to deter me from it even in the most minute Particulars.

For the Eleventh.

Give me Grace, O Blessed Redeemer that after thy Example I may observe a strict and Positive Justice to my Neighbor in all his Possessions. Stamp deep upon my Mind I entreat Thee (O my God) a tender regard for him in his Wife, and in all his worldly Goods. Lord I beseech Thee, defend me from the Sins of Oppression and Theft, and give me Grace to acquit my Self justly in all my Dealings, and to behave myself as becomes an honest Man in all manner of Bargains and Commerce.

For the Twelfth.

LET thy merciful Ears O Lord be open to my Prayers; for the sake of thy own Eternal Equity, errace utterly out of my Mind all unjust Notions; and let no Temptations to any sort of Robbery at any time get the Dominion over me; improve my Mind I beseech Thee with such a determinate hatred against all kind of Deceit, that I may immediately resolve upon that great Duty of a Christian Restitution. And this I beg of Thee with the highest Ardency, for thy own sake O merciful Jesus!

For the Thirteenth.

O Eternal God of Truth! guide me I beseech Thee by thy blessed Spirit, that I may be exactly careful how I Believe, or Report anything to the Prejudice of my Neighbor; keep me from the dangerous Sins of Perjury. and Slandering, from all base and malicious Whisperings, and from all fly and injurious Insinuations; O God of Righteousness, let the tenderness and regard I owe to my Fellow Christian sink so deep into my Soul, that I may neither Scoff at his Calamities, or Infirmities, nor deride his very Sins. Give me, O King of Justice, such a Positive Uprightness and Integrity, that I may abhor all sorts of Lying, Envy, and Detraction, and that I may preserve an humble and entire Gratitude and Thankfulness towards my Friends and Benefactors, but especially towards Thee O bountiful Jesus!

For the Fourteenth.

O God of all Order and Power, who in thy Wisdom hast appointed several Ranks and Degrees of Men among us, give me an awful Sence of that profound Obedience and Respect I owe to all the Magistrates, Pastors, and Governors in their respective Stations; teach me O my God! as a Child, that Love and Reverence I owe to my Parents, and as a Parent that Care and Duty I owe to my Children, that in both Capacities I may discharge my Trust after the Direction of thy most Holy Precepts, O King of Righteousness!

For the Fifteenth.

TEach me O merciful God and Savior, that I may acquit myself to all my Brethren whether Spiritual or Temporal, and to all my Relations, as becomes a Member of the Christian Profession; in the several Capacities of a Husband, Friend, Master and Servant, teach me O merciful God, to behave myself, as becomes a Member of thy most Holy Religion, O blessed Jesus.

For the Sixteenth.

INstruct me I beseech Thee, O Almighty Lord, in all the Branches of my Duty to my Neighbor. After thy own Example, O unchangeable Goodness! Direct my Charity towards him, with respect to his Soul, his Body, his Goods, and his Credit; give me such a Spirit of Positive Justice, that I may value him upon all Accounts equal to myself, and be always ready to do the very best I can to propagate his Interest in both Worlds. I beg this of Thee with the utmost Ardency of my Soul, O Jesus, merciful Jesus!

For the Seventeenth.

O Merciful God, who hast mark'd out my Compassion to my Fellow Creature, as the Standard by which thou intendest to measure Thine to me! Give me, I beseech Thee an entire and universal Charity. Open my Bowels, that I may be ready to help and further him in all his Extremities. Grant O my God, for the sake of thy own Love, that I may be always prepared to vindicate my Neighbors good Name upon all occasions, that I may judge the best and speak well of him, and conceal or excuse his Infirmities, that I may be impatient to hear, slow to believe and unwilling to propagate evil Reports; lodge him in my Heart in the very next Place to my Self, that I may constantly Study his Peace, and value it equal to my own; keep me from all Litigious Suits and Controversies, let an even and regular Charity run through my whole Life and Actions, and extend itself even to my very Enemies; I beg this and everything else, thou in thy Wisdom knows useful for me, for Jesus Christ his Sake,

Amen, Amen.

FINIS.

Books Printed for John Lawrence at the Angel in the Poultry.

Catholicism without Popery. An Essay to render the Church of England a Means and a Pattern of Union to the Christian World. •ctavo.

The Mourners Companion: Or, Funeral Discourses on several Texts, •n Two Parts. By Mr. John Shower. Octavo.

The Dying Mans Assistant: Or, Short Instructions for those who are concerned in the preparing of Sick Persons for Death. Being no •ess worthy the Consideration of all good Christians in time of Health; •hewing the importance of an Early Preparation for their latter End; with regard as well to their Temporal, as Eternal State. By a Divine of the Church of England Twelves.

The London Dispensatory, reduced to the Practice of the London Physicians, wherein are contained the Medicines that are now in use, and such as are not in the Latin Copy added; with their Virtues and Use. By John Pechy of the College of Physicians in London, Twelves. Price 1 s. 6 d.

Mr. Clark's Concordance to the Bible. Twelves.

P-RA-26. The whole duty of man laid down in a plain way for the use of the meanest reader divided into XVII chapters : one whereof being read every Lord's day, the whole may be read over, thrice in the year, necessary for all families : with private devotions. - Allestree, Richard, 1619-1681., Fell, John, 1625-1686., Sterne, Richard, 1596?-1683., Henchman, Humphrey, 1592-1675., Pakington, Dorothy Coventry, Lady, d. 1679.

[illustration]

The Whole DUTY of MAN laid down IN A PLAIN WAY for the use of the MEANEST READER. *Dwid*ed into XVII CHAPTERS One whereof being read every LORD'S DAY the whole may be Read over, thrice in the Year

Necessary for all Families.

With PRIVATE DEVOTIONS.

London Printed for T. Garthwait, at the little North Door of S. Paul's. 1659

Mr. GARTHWAIT,

YOU needed not any Intercession to recommend this task to me, which brought its Invitations and Reward with it. I very willingly read over all the sheets, both of the Discourse, and the Devotions annexed, and find great cause to bless God for both, not discerning what is wanting in any part of either, to render it with God's blessing, most sufficient, and proper to the great End designed, the Spiritual supplies and advantages of all those that shall be exercised therein. The Subject matter of it, is indeed, what the Title undertakes, The Whole Duty of Man, Set down in all the Branches, with those advantages of brevity and Partitions, to invite, and support, and engage the Reader, That Condescension to the meanest capacities, but with all, That weight of Spiritual Arguments, wherein the best Proficients will be glad to be assisted, that it seems to me equally fitted for both sorts of Readers, which shall bring with them a sincere desire of their own, either present or future advantages. The Devotion part in the Conclusion is no way inferior, being a seasonable aid to every man's Infirmities, and hath extended itself very particularly to all our principal concernments;

The Introduction hath supplied the place of a Preface, which you seem to desire from me, and leaves me no more to add, but my Prayers to God, That the Author which hath taken care to convey so liberal an Alms to the Corban so secretly, may not miss to be rewarded openly, in the visible power, and benefit of this Work, on the hearts of the whole Nation, which was never in more need of such supplies, as are here afforded.

That his All-sufficient Grace will bless the seed sown, and give an abundant increase, is the humblest request of

March 7. 1657

Your assured Friend, H. HAMMOND.

A PREFACE To the ensuing TREATISE, showing the Necessity of Careing for the Soul.

Sect. 1. THE only intent of this ensuing Treatise, is to be a short and Plain Direction to the very meanest Readers, to behave themselves so in this world, that they may be happy forever in the next. But because 'tis in vain to tell men their Duties, till they be persuaded of the necessity of performing it; I shall before I proceed to the Particulars required of every Christian, endeavor to win them to the practice of one general Duty preparatory to all the rest, and that is the Consideration and CARE of their own SOULS, without which they will never think themselves much concerned in the other.

2. MAN, We know is made up of two parts, a BODY and a SOUL: The Body only the husk or shell of the Soul, a lump of flesh, subject to many diseases and pains while it lives, and at last to Death itself, and then 'tis so far from being valued, that 'tis not to be endured above ground, but laid to rot in the Earth. Yet to this viler part of us we perform a great deal of Care, all the labor & toil we are at, is to maintain that. But the more precious part, the Soul is little thought of, no care taken, how it fares, but as if it were a thing that nothing concerned us, is left quite neglected never considered by us.

3. This Carelessness of the Soul is the root of all the sin we commit, & therefore whosoever intends to sit upon a Christian course, must in the first place amend that. To the doing whereof, there needs no deep learning, or extraordinary parts, the simplest man living (that is not a natural fool) hath understanding enough for it, if he will but act in this by the same Rules of common Reason, whereby he proceeds in his worldly business. I will therefore now briefly set down some of those Motives, which use to stir up our care of any outward thing, and then apply them to the Soul.

4. There be FOUR things especially, which use to awake our care, the first is the Worth of the thing, the Second the Usefulness of it to us, when we cannot part with it without great damage and mischief, the Third the great Danger of it, and the Fourth the Likelihood that our care will not be in vain, but that it will preserve the Thing cared for.

5. For the First, we know our care of any worldly thing is answerable to the worth of it; what is of greatest Price, we are most watchful to preserve, & most fearful to lose; no man locks up dung in his chest, but his money or what he counts precious, he doth. Now in this respect the Soul deserves more care, then all the things in the world besides, for tis infinitely more worth. First in that it is made after the Image of God, it was God that breathed into man this breath of life, Gen. 2. 7. Now God being of the greatest Excellency and worth, the more anything is like him, the more it is to be valued. But 'tis sure that no Creature upon the earth is at all like God, but the Soul of man, and therefore nothing ought to have so much of our care. Secondly, the Soul never Dies, We use to prize things according to their Durableness: what is most Lasting, is most Worth. Now the Soul is a thing that will last forever, when Wealth, Beauty, Strength, nay our very bodies themselves fade away, the Soul still Continues. Therefore in that respect also, the Soul is of the greatest worth; and then what strange madness is it for us to neglect them as we do? We can spend Days, and Weeks, and Moneths, and Years, nay our whole lives in hunting after a little wealth of this world, which is of no Durance or continuance, and in the mean time let this great durable treasure, our Souls, be stolen from us by the Devil.

6. A second Motive to our care of any thing is the USEFULNES of it to us, or the great Mischief we shall have by the loss of it. Common Reason teaches us this in all things of this life: If our Hairs fall, we do not much regard it, because we can be well enough without them: But if we are in danger to lose our Eyes or Limbs, we think all the care we can take little enough to prevent it, because we know it will be a great misery. But certainly there is no Misery to be compared to that misery that follows the Loss of the Soul. 'Tis true, we cannot Lose our Souls, in one sense, that is so lose them, that they shall cease to Be; but we may lose them in another, that we shall wish to lose them even in that. That is we may lose that happy estate, to which they were created, and plunge them into the extremest misery. In a word we may Lose them in Hell, whence there is no fetching them back, and so they are lost forever. Nay, in this consideration our very bodies are concerned, those Darlings of ours, for which all our care is laid out: for they must certainly after Death be Raised again, and be joined again to the Soul, and take part with it in whatever state; if then our care for the body take up all our Time and Thoughts, and leave us none to bestow on the poor Soul, it is sure the Soul will for want of that care, be made forever Miserable. But it is as sure, that that very Body must be so too. And therefore if you have any true kindness to your Body, show it by taking Care of your Souls. Think with yourselves, how you will be able to Endure Everlasting Burnings; if a small spark of Fire, lighting on the least part of the body be so intolerable, what will it be to have the Whole cast into the hottest flames? And that not for some few hours or days, but forever; so that when you have spent many Thousands of years in that unspeakable Torment, you shall be no nearer coming out of it, then you were the First Day you went in: think of this I say, and think this withal, that this will certainly be the end of Neglecting the Soul, and therefore afford it some care, if it be but in pity to the Body, that must bear a part in its Miseries.

7. The Third Motive to tke care of anything is its being in DANGER; now a thing may be in danger two ways first, by Enemies from without: This is the Case of the Sheep, which is still in danger of being Devoured by Wolves, and we know that makes the Shepherd so much the more watchful over it. Thus is it with the Soul, which is in a great deal of Danger, in respect of its enemies: those we know are the World, the Flesh, and the Devil, which are all such noted enemies to it, that the very First Act we do in behalf of our Souls, is to Vow a continual War against them. This we all do in our Baptism; and whoever makes any Truce with any of them, is false not only to his Soul, but to his Vow also, becomes a Forsworn creature: A Consideration well worthy our laying to heart. But that we may the better understand, what Danger the Soul is in, let us a little consider the quality of these enemies.

8. In a War you know there are divers things that make an Enemy terrible. The first is Subtilty, and Gunning, by which alone many victories have been won, and in this respect the Devil is a dangerous Adversary, he long since gave sufficient proof of his Subtilty, in beguiling our first Parents, who yet were much wiser then we are, and therefore no wonder if he deceive and cheat us. Secondly, the Watchfulness and Diligence of an Enemy, makes him the more to be Feared; and here the Devil exceeds; it is his trade and business to destroy us, and he is no loiterer at it, he goes up and down seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet. 5. 8. He watches all Opportunities of Advantage against us, with such diligence, that he will be sure never to let any slip him. Thirdly, an Enemy near us is more to be feared than one at a Distance, for if he be far off, we may have time to arm, and prepare ourselves against him, but if he be near he may steal on us unawares. And of this sort is the flesh, it is an Enemy, at our Doors, shall I say? Nay in our Bosoms, it is always near us, to take occasion of doing us mischiefs. Fourthly, the Baser and Falsar an Enemy is, the more dangerous; he that Hides his malice under the show of Friendship will be able to do a great deal the more hurt. And this again is the flesh, which like Joab to Abner, 2 Sam. 3. 27. Pretends to speak peaceably to us, but wounds us to death; tis forward to purvey for Pleasures and Delights for us, and so seems very kind, but it has a hook under that bait, and if we bite at it we are lost. Fifthly, the Number of Enemies make them more Terrible; and the World is a vast Army against us: There is no state or condition in it, nay scarce a creature which doth not at sometime or other fight against the Soul: The Honors of the world seek to wound us by pride, the Wealth by covetousness; the Prosperity of it tempt us to Forget God, the Adversities to murmur at him. Our very Table becomes a snare to us, our me at draws us to Gluttony, our drink to Drunkenness, our Company, nay, our nearest Friends often bear a part in this War against us, whilst either by their example, or persuasions they entice us to sin.

9. Consider all this, and then tell me, whether a Soul thus beset hath leisure to sleep: even Delilah could tell Sampson, it was time to awake when the Philistines were upon him. And CHRIST tells us, if the good man of the house had known in what hour the Thief would come, he would have watched, and not have suffered his house to be broken up, Mat. 24. 43. But we live in the midst of Thieves, and therefore must look for them every hour, and yet who is there among us, that hath that common providence for this precious part of him, his Soul, which he hath for his house, or indeed the meanest thing that belongs to him? I fear our Souls may say to us, as Christ to his Disciples. Mat. 26. 40. What could ye not watch with me one hour? For I doubt it would pose many of us to tell when we bestowed one Houre on them, though we know them to be continually beset with most Dangerous Enemies. And then alas! What is like to be the case of these poor Souls, when their Adversaries bestow so much Care, and Diligence to destroy them, and we will afford none to preserve them? Surely the same as of a Besieged Town, where no Watch or Guard is kept, which is certain to fall a prey to the enemy. Consider this ye that forget God, nay ye that forget yourselves, lest he pluck you away, and there be none to deliver you, Psal. 50. 22.

10. But I told you there was a Second way, whereby a thing may be in Danger, and that is from some Disorder or Distemper within itself. This is often the case of our Bodies, they are not only liable to outward Violence, but they are within themselves Sick and Diseased. And then we can be sensible enough that they are in danger, and need not to be taught to seek out for means to recover them. But this is also the case of the Soul; we reckon those parts of the body diseased, that do not rightly perform their office, we account it a sick palate that tastes not aright, a sick stomach that digests not. And thus it is with the Soul, when its parts do not rightly perform their Offices.

11. The parts of the Soul are especially these three: The UNDERSTANDING, the WILL, and the AFFECTIONS. And that these are disordered, there needs little proof; let any man look seriously into his own Heart, and consider, how little it is he knows of spiritual things, and then tell me whether his Understanding be not dark: How much apter is he to Will evil than good, and then tell me whether his Will be not Crooked? And how strong Desires he hath after the pleasures of sin, and what cold and faint ones towards God, and goodness, and then tell me whether his Affections be not disordered, and rebellious even against the voice of his own Reason within him? Now as in bodily diseases, the first step to the cure is to know the Cause of the sickness, so likewise here it is very necessary for us to know how the Soul first fell into this Diseased condition, and that I shall now briefly tell you.

12. GOD created the first Man Adam without Sin, and endued his Soul with the full knowledge of his Duty, and with such a strength, that he might, if he would, perform all that was required of him. Having thus created him, He makes a COVENANT or agreement with him to this purpose, that if he continued in Obedience to God without committing Sin; then first, that Strength of Soul, which he then had should still be continued to him; and secondly, That he should never Die, but be taken up into Heaven, there to be Happy forever. But on the other side, if he committed Sin and Disobeyed God, then both He and all his Children after him should lose that Knowledge and that perfect strength, which enabled him to do all that God required of him: and Secondly, should be subject to death, and not only so, but to Eternal damnation in Hell.

13. This was the Agreement made with Adam and all mankind in him (which we usually call the FIRST COVENANT) upon which God gave Adam a particular commandment, which was no more but this, That he should not eat of one only tree of that garden wherein he had placed him. But he by the persuasion of the Devil eats of that Tree, disobeys God, and so brings that curse upon himself, and all his posterity. And so by that one Sin of his he lost both the full Knowledge of his Duty, and the Power of performing it. And we being born after his Image, did so likewise, and so are become both Ignorant in Discerning what we ought to Do, and Weak and unable to the Doing of it, having a backwardness to all good, and an aptness, and readiness to all evil; like a sick stomach, which loathes all wholesome food, and longs after such trash, as may nourish the disease.

14. And now you see where we got this Sickness of soul, and likewise that it is like to prove a Deadly one, and therefore I presume I need say no more, to assure you our Souls are in danger. It is more likely you will from this description think them hopeless. But that you may not from that con•eight, excuse your Neglect of them I shall hasten to show y•• the contrary, by proceeding to the fourth Motive of Care.

15. That Fourth Motive is the likelihood, that our CARE will not be in VAIN, but that it will be a means to preserve the thing cared for; where this is wanting, it disheartens our care. A Physician leaves his Patient when he sees him past Hope, as knowing it is then in vain to give him anything, but on the contrary when he sees hopes of recovery, he plies him with Medicines. Now in this very respect we have a great deal of reason to take care of our souls, for they are not so far gone, but they may be recovered, nay it is certain they will, if we do our parts towards it.

16. For though by that Sin of Adam all mankind were under the sentence of eternal condemnation, yet it pleased God so far to pity our misery, as to give us his Son, and in him to make a new Covenant with us after we had broken the first.

17. This SECOND COVENANT was made with Adam, and us in him, presently after his Fall, and is briefly contained in those words, Gen. 3. 15. Where God declares that THE SEED OF THE WOMAN SHALL BREAK THE SERPENTS HEAD; and this was made up, as the first was, of some mercies to be afforded by God, and some duties to be performed by us.

18. God therein promises to send his only Son, who is God equal with himself, to earth, to become man like unto us in all things, sin only excepted, and he to do for us these Several things.

19. First to make Known to us the whole Will of his Father, in the performance whereof we shall be sure to be Accepted and rewarded by him. And this was one great part of his business, which he performed in those many Sermons and Precepts we find set down in the Gospel. And herein he is our PROPHET, it being the work of a Prophet of old not only to foretell, but to Teach. Our Duty in this particular is to hearken diligently to him, to be most ready, and desirous to learn that will of God which he came from heaven to reveal to us.

The Second thing He was to do for us, was to Satisfie God for our Sins, not only that one of Adam, but all the Sins of all Mankind that truly repent and amend, and by this means to obtain for us Forgiveness of sins, the Favor of God, and so to Redeem us from Hell and eternal damnation which was the punishment due to our sin. All this he did for us by his death. He offered up himself a Sacrifice for the Sins of all those who heartily bewail, and forsake them. And in this He is our PRIEST, it being the Priests Office to Offer Sacrifice for the sins of the people. Our Duty in this particular is first, truly, and heartily to Repent us of and forsake our Sins, without which they will never be forgiven us, though Christ have died. Secondly steadfastly to Believe, that if we do that, we shall have the benefits of that Sacrifice of his, all our sins, how many and great soever, shall be forgiven us, and we saved from those eternal punishments which were due unto us for them. Another part of the PRIESTS Office was Blessing and Praying for the people; and this also Christ performs to us: It was his especial Commission from his Father to Bless us, as St. Peter tells us Acts 3. 26. God sent his Son Jesus to Bless you; & the following words show wherein that blessing consists, in turning away everyone of you from his iniquity, those means which he has used for the turning us from our Sins, are to be reckoned of all other the greatest blessings, and for the other part, that of Praying, that he not only performed on earth, but continues still to do it in Heaven, He sits on the right hand of God and makes Request for us, Romans 8. 34. Our Duty herein is not to resist this unspeakable blessing of his, but to be willing to be thus Blest in the being turned from our sins, and not to make void, and fruitless all his Prayers and Intercessions for us, which will never prevail for us, whilst we continue in them.

21. The third thing, that Christ was to do for us, was to Enable us, or give us Strength to do what God requires of us. This he doth, first, by taking off from the hardness of the Law given to

Adam, which was never to commit the least sin, upon pain of damnation, and requiring of us only an honest and hearty endeavor to do what we are able, and where we fail, accepting of Sincere Repentance. Secondly, By sending his Holy Spirit into our hearts, to govern, and Rule us, to give us strength to overcome Temptations to Sin, and to Do all that He now under the Gospel requires of us. And in this He is our KING, it being the Office of a King to govern, and Rule and to subdue enemies. Our Duty in this particular is to give up ourselves obedient subjects of his, to be governed, and Ruled by him, to obey all his Laws, not to take part with any Rebel, that is, not to cherish any one sin, but diligently to Pray for his Grace to enable us to subdue all, and then carefully to make use of it to that purpose.

22. Lastly, He has purchased for all that faithfully obey him an Eternal glorious inheritance, the Kingdom of Heaven, whither he is gone before to take possession for us. Our duty herein is to be exceeding careful, that we forfeit not our parts in it, which we shall certainly do, if we continue impenitent in any sin. Secondly, not to fasten our Affections on this world, but to raise them, according to the precept of the Apostle, Col. 3. 2. Set your affections on things above and not on things on the earth; continually longing to come to the possession of that blessed inheritance of ours, in comparison whereof all things here below should seem vile and mean to us.

23. This is the Sum of that SECOND COVENANT we are now under, wherein you see what Christ has done, how he Executes those Three Great Offices of KING, PRIEST and PROPHET, as also what is Required of us, without our Faithful Performance, all that he hath done, shall never stand us in any stead; for he will never be a Priest to Save any, who take him not as well for their Prophet to Teach, and their King to Rule them; nay, if we neglect our part of this Covenant, our condition will be yet worse, then if it had never been made, for we shall then be to Answer not for the breach of Law only, as in the first, but for the abuse of mercy, which is of all sins the most provoking. On the other side, if we faithfully Perform it, that is, set ourselves heartily to the obeying of every precept of Christ, not going on willfully in any one sin, but bewailing and forsaking whatever we have formerly been guilty of, it is then most certain, that all the fore-mentioned benefits of Christ belongs to us.

24. And now you see how little Reason you have to cast off the CARE of your SOULS upon a conceit they are past cure, for that it is plain they are not; Nay, certainly they are in that very condition, which of all others makes them fittest for our care. If they had not been thus REDEEMED by CHRIST, they had been then so hopeless, that care would have been in vain; on there other side, if his Redemption had been such, that all men should be saved by it, though they Live as they list, We should have thought it needless to take care for them because they were safe without it. But it hath pleased God so to order it, that our care must be the means, by which they must Receive the good even of all that Christ hath done for them.

25. And now, if after all that God hath done to Save these Souls of ours, we will not bestow a little Care on them ourselves, we very well deserve to perish. If a Physician should undertake a patient that were in some desperate disease, and by his skill bring him so far out of it, that he were sure to recover, if he would but take care of himself and observe those rules the Physician set him, would you not think that man weary of his life, that would refuse to do that?

So certainly that man is weary of his soul, willfully casts it away, that will not consent to those easy conditions, by which he may save it.

26. You see how great kindness God hath to these Souls of ours, the whole TRINITY, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost have all done their parts for them. The FATHER gave his only Son, the SON gave Himself, left his glory, and endured the bitter death of the Cross, merely to keep our Souls from perishing. The HOLY GHOST is become as it were our attendant, waits upon us with Continual offers of his grace, to Enable us to do that which may preserve them; Nay he is so desirous we should accept those Offers of his, that he is said to be grieved when we refuse them, Ephes. 4. 30. Now what greater disgrace and affront can we put upon God then to despise what he thus values, that those Souls of ours, which Christ thought worthy every drop of his blood, we should not think worth any part of our Care? We use in things of the world, to rate them according to the opinion of those who are best skilled in them, now certainly God who made our Souls, best knows the worth of them, and since he prizes them so high, let us (if it be but in reverence to him) be ashamed to neglect them. Especially now that they are in so hopeful a condition, that nothing but our own carelessness can possibly destroy them.

27. I have now briefly gone over those Four Motives of care I at first proposed, which are each of them such, as never misses to stir it up towards the things of this World; and I have also shown you how much more Reasonable, nay Necessary it is they should do the like for the Soul. And now what can I say more, but conclude in the words of Isaiah 46. 8. Remember this and show yourselves men. That is, deal with your Soul as your Reason teaches you to do with all other things that concern you. And sure this common Justice binds you to, for the Soul is that which furnishes you with that Reason, which you exercise in all your worldly business; and shall the Soul itself receive no Benefit from that Reason, which it affords you? This is as if the Master of a Family, who provides food for his servants, should by them be kept from Eating any himself, and so remain the only starved creature in his house.

28. And as Justice ties you to this, so Mercy doth likewise; you know the poor Soul will fall into Endless and unspeakable Miseries, if you continue to neglect it, and then it will be too late to consider it. The Last Refuge you can hope for is God's mercy, but that you have despised and abused. And with what face can you in your greatest need beg for his mercy to your Souls, when you would not afford them your own? No not that common Charity of considering them, of bestowing a few of those idle Hours you know not (scarce) how to pass away, upon them.

29. Lay this to your hearts, and as ever you hope for God's pity, when you most want it, be sure in time to Pity yourselves, by taking that due Care of your precious Souls which belongs to them.

30. If what hath been said, have persuaded you to this so necessary a Duty, my next work will be to tell you how this Care must be employed, and that in a word, is in the Doing of all those things which tend to the making the Soul Happy; which is the end of our Care; and what those are I come now to show you.

PARTITION I. Of the DUTY of MAN by the Light of Nature, by the Light of Scripture: Of FAITH, the Promises, of Hope, of Love, &c.

THE Benefits purchased for us by Christ, are such as will undoubtedly make the Soul Happy, for Eternal Happiness itself is one of them; but because these Benefits belong not to us till we perform the Condition required of us; whoever desires the happiness of his Soul, must set himself to the performing of that Condition; what that is, I have already mentioned in the General, That it is the hearty, honest endeavor of obeying the whole Will of God. But then that Will of God containing under it many particulars, it is necessary we should also know what those are; that is, what are the several things, that God now requires of us, our performance whereof will bring us to everlasting happiness, and the neglect to endless misery.

2. Of these things there are some which God hath so stamp'd upon our souls, that we Naturally knew them; that is, we should have known them to be our Duty, though we had never been told so by the Scripture. That this is so, we may see by those Heathens, who having never heard of either Old or New Testament, do yet acknowledge themselves bound to some General Duties, as to Worship God, to be Just, to Honor their Parents, and the like. And as S. Paul saith, Rom. 2. 15. Their consciences do in those things accuse or excuse them; That is, tell them, whether they have done what they should, in those particulars, or no.

3. Now though Christ have brought greater Light into the world, yet he never meant by it to put out any of that Natural light, which God hath set up in our Souls: Therefore let me here by the way, advise you not to walk contrary even to this lesser light, I mean, not to venture on any of those Acts, which mere Natural Conscience will tell you are Sins.

4. It is just matter of sadness to any Christian heart, to see some in these days, who profess much of Religion, and yet live in such sins, as a mere heathen would abhor; men that pretending to higher degrees of Light, and holiness, then their brethren do, yet practice contrary to all Rules of common honesty, and make it part of their Christian liberty so to do; of whose Seducement it concerns all that love their Souls to beware: and for that purpose let this be laid as a Foundation, That that Religion or Opinion cannot be of God, which allows men in any wickedness.

5. But though we must not put out this light which God hath thus put into our Souls, yet this is not the only way whereby God hath revealed his will, and therefore we are not to rest here, but proceed to the knowledge of those other things which God hath by other means revealed.

6. The way for us to come to know them is by the SCRIPTURES, wherein are set down those several commands of God which he hath given to be the Rule of our Duty.

7. Of those, some were given before Christ came into the world, such are those precepts we find scattered throughout the Old Testament, but especially contained in the Ten Commandments, and that excellent book of Deuteronomy; others were given by Christ, who added much, both to the Law implanted in us by Nature, and that of the Old Testament, and those you shall find in the New Testament, in the several precepts given by him and his Apostles, but especially in that Divine Sermon on the Mount, set down in the fifth, sixth and seventh Chapters of S. Matthews Gospel.

8. All these should be severally spoke to, but because that would make the discourse very long, and so less fit for the meaner sort of men, for whose use alone it is intended, I choose to proceed in another manner: By summing all these together, and so as plainly as I can, to lay down, what is now the duty of every Christian.

9. This I find briefly contained in the words of the Apostle, Tit. 2. 12. That we should live soberly, righteously, and godly in this present world; where the word Soberly contains our duty to our selves; Righteously, our duty to our neighbor, and Godly, our duty to God. These therefore shall be the Heads of my discourse, our DUTY to GOD, our SELVES, and our NEIGHBOUR. I begin with that to God, that being the best ground-work whereon to build both the other.

10. There are many parts of our DUTY to GOD, The two chief are these: First to acknowledge him to be God; Secondly, to have no other; under these are contained all those particulars, which make up our whole duty to God, which shall be shown in their order.

11. To acknowledge him to be God, is to believe him to be an infinite glorious Spirit, that was from everlasting, without beginning, and shall be to everlasting, without end. That he is our Creator, Redeemer, Sanctifier, Father, Son, and Holy-Ghost, one God, blessed forever. That he is subject to no alterations, but is Unchangeable; that he is no bodily substance, such as our eyes may behold, but spiritual and invisible, whom no man hath seen, nor can see as the Apostle tells us, 1 Tim. 3. 16. That He is Infinitely Great and Excellent, beyond all that our wit or conceit can imagine, that he hath received his being from none, and gives being to all things.

12. All this we are to believe of him in regard of his Essence and being: But besides this, he is set forth to us in the Scripture by several Excellencies, as that he is of Infinite Goodness, and Mercy, Truth, Justice, Wisdom, Power, All-sufficiency, Majesty; That he disposes and governs all things by his Providence; that he Knowes all things and is Present in all places; these are by Divines called the Attributes of God, and all these we must undoubtingly acknowledge, that is, we must firmly believe all these Divine Excellencies to be in God, and that in the greatest degree, and so that they can never cease to be in him, he can never be other then insinitely Good, Merciful, True, &c.

13. But the acknowledging him for our God signifies yet more then this; it means that we should perform to him all those several parts of Duty which belong from a Creature to his God: What those are I am now to tell you.

14. The first is FAITH, or Belief, not only that forementioned of his Essence and Attributes, but of his word, the believing most firmly, that all that he saith is perfectly true. This necessarily arises from that Attribute, his Truth it being natural for us to believe whatsoever is said by one of whose Truth we are confident. Now the Holy Scriptures being the Word of God we are therefore to conclude, that all that is contained in them is most true.

15. The things contained in them are of these four sorts: First, Affirmations, such are all the stories of the Bible, when it is said, Such and such things came so and so to pass; Christ was born of a Virgin, was laid in a Manger, &c. And such also are many points of Doctrine, as that there are three Persons in the God-head, that Christ is the Son of God, and the like. All things of this sort thus delivered in Scripture we are to believe most true. And not only so, but because they are all written for our instruction; we are to consider them for that purpose, that is, by them to lay that Foundation of Christian knowledge on which we may build a Christian life.

16. The Second sort of things contained in the Scripture, are the Commands, that is, the several things enjoined us by God to perform; these we are to believe to come from him, and to be most just, and fit for him to command: But then this Belief must bring forth Obedience, that what we believe thus fit to be done, be indeed done by us; otherwise our belief that they come from him serves but to make us more inexcusable.

17. Thirdly, The Scripture contains threatenings; many Texts there are which threaten to them that go on in their sins, the wrath of God, and under that are contained all the punishments and miseries of this life, both spiritual and temporal, and everlasting destruction in the life to come. Now we are most steadfastly to Believe, That these are God's threats, and that they will certainly be performed to every impenitent sinner. But then the use we are to make of this belief, is to keep from those sins to which this destruction is threatened, otherwise our belief adds to our guilt, that will willfully go on in spite of those threatenings.

18. Fourthly, The Scripture contains Promises, and those both to our Bodies and our Souls; for our bodies there are many promises that God will provide for them what he sees necessary; I will name only one, Mat. 6. 33. Seek ye first the kingdom of God and his righteousness, and all these things, that is, all outward necessities, shall be added unto you: But here 'tis to be observed, that we must first seek the kingdom of God and his righteousness, that is, make it our first and greatest care to serve and obey him before this promise even of temporal good things belongs to us. To the soul there are many and high promises, as first, that of present ease and refreshment which we find, Matth. 11. 29. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, and ye shall find rest to your souls: But here it is apparent, that before this rest belongs to us, we must have taken on us Christ's yoke, become his servants and Disciples. Finally there are promises to the soul even of all the benefits of Christ; but yet those only to such as perform the Condition required; that is, Pardon of Sins to those that repent of them, Increase of Grace to those that diligently make use of what they have already, and humbly pray for more; and Eternal salvation to those that continue to their lives end in hearty obedience to his Commands.

19. This Belief of the Promises must therefore stir us up to perform the Condition, and till it do so, we can in no reason expect any good by them; and for us to look for the benefit of them on other terms, is the same mad presumption that it would be in a Servant to challenge his Master to give him a reward for having done nothing of his work, to which alone the reward was promised; you can easily resolve what answer were to be given to such a servant, and the same are we to expect from God in this case: nay further, it is sure God hath given these Promises to no other end, but to invite us to holiness of life; yea, he gave his Son, in whom all his Promises are as it were summed up, for this end. We usually look so much at Christ's coming to satisfy for us, that we forget this other part of his errand. But there is nothing surer, then that the main purpose of his coming into the world was to plant good life among men.

20. This is so often repeated in Scripture, that no man that considers and believes what he reads can doubt of it. Christ himself tells us, Mat. 9. 13. He came to call sinners to repentance. And S. Peter, Acts 3. 26. tells us, That God sent his Son Jesus to bless us, in turning everyone of us from his iniquities; for it seems the turning us from our iniquities was the greatest special Blessing which God intended us in Christ.

21. Nay, we are taught by S. Paul, that this was the end of his very death also, Tit. 2. 14. Who gave himself for our sins, that he might redeem us from all iniquity, and purify to himself a peculiar people, zealous of good works. And again, Gal. 1. 4. Who gave himself for us, that he might deliver us from this present evil world, that is, from the sins and ill customs of the world. Divers other Texts there are to this purpose, But these I suppose sufficient to assure any man of this one great truth, That all that Christ hath done for us was directed to this end, the bringing us to live Christianly; or in the words of Saint Paul, To teach us, that denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, we should live soberly, righteously and godly in this present world.

22. Now we know Christ is the foundation of all the Promises; in him all the promises of God are yea, and Amen, 2 Cor. 1. 20. And therefore if God gave Christ to this end, certainly the Promises are to the same also. And then how great an abuse of them is it to make them serve for purposes quite contrary to what they were intended, viz. To the encouraging us in sins, which they will certainly do if we persuade ourselves they belong to us how wickedly soever we live. The Apostle teaches us another use of them, 2 Cor. 7. 1. Having therefore these promises, let us cleanse ourselves from all filthiness of the flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God. When we do thus we may justly apply the promises to ourselves, and with comfort expect our parts in them. But till then though these promises be of certain truth, yet we can reap no benefit from them, because we are not the persons to whom they are made, that is, we perform not the condition required to give us right to them.

23. This is the Faith or Belief required of us towards the things God hath revealed to us in the Scripture, to wit, Such as may answer the End for which they were so revealed, that is, the bringing us to good lives; the bare believing the truth of them, without this, is no more then the Devils do, as S. James tells us, Chap. 2. 19. Only they are not so unreasonable as some of us are, for they will tremble, as knowing well this Faith will never do them any good. But many of us go on confidently, and doubt not the sufficiency of our Faith, though we have not the least fruit of obedience to approve it by; let such hear S. James's judgment in the point, Ch. 2. 26. As the body without the spirit is dead, so Faith if it have not works is dead also.

24. A second Duty to God is HOPE, that is, a comfortable expectation of these good things he hath promised. But this, as I told you before of Faith, must be such as agrees to the nature of the promises, which being such as requires a condition on our part, we can hope no further then we make that good; or if we do, we are so far from performing by it this duty of Hope, that we commit the great sin of Presumption, which is nothing else but hoping where God hath given us no ground to hope: this every man doth that hopes for pardon of sins and eternal life, without that repentance and obedience to which alone they are promised; the true hope is that which purifies us: S. John saith, 1 Epist. 3. 5. Every man that hath this hope purifieth himself, even as he is pure; that is, it makes him leave his sins and earnestly endeavor to be holy as Christ is, and that which doth not so, how confident soever it be, may well be concluded to be but that hope of the Hypocrite which Job assures us shall perish.

25. But there is another way of transgressing this Duty, besides that of Presumption, and that is by Desperation, by which I mean not that which is ordinarily so called, viz. the Despairing of mercy, so long as we continue in our sins, for that is but just for us to do: But I mean such a desperation as makes us give over endeavor, that is, when a man that sees he is not at the present such a one, as the promises belong to, concludes, he can never become such, and therefore neglects all duty, and goes on in his sins. This is indeed the sinful desperation, and that which if it be continued in, must end in destruction.

26. Now the work of hope is to prevent this, by setting before us the generality of the promises, that they belong to all that will but perform the condition. And therefore though a man have not hitherto performed it, and so hath yet no right to them, yet hope will tell him, that that right may yet be gained, if he will now set heartily about it. It is therefore strange folly for any man, be he never so sinful, to give up himself for lost, when if he will but change his course, he shall be as certain to partake of the promises of mercy as if he had never gone on in those former sins.

27. This Christ shows us in the parable of the Prodigal, Luke 15. where we see that Son, which had run away from his Father, and had consumed the portion given him, in riotous living, was yet upon his return and repentance used with as much kindness by the Father, as he that had never offended, nay with higher and more passionate expressions of love. The intent of which Parable was only to show us how graciously our heavenly Father will receive us, how great soever our former sins have been, if we shall return to him with true sorrow for what is past, and sincere obedience for the time to come; nay so acceptable a thing is it to God, to have any sinner return from the error of his ways, that there is a kind of triumph in heaven for it, there is joy in the presence of the Angels of God, over one sinner that repenteth: Luke 15. 10. And now who would not rather choose by a timely repentance, to bring joy to heaven, to God and his holy Angels, then by a sullen desperation to please Satan and his accursed spirits; especially when by the former we shall gain endless happiness to ourselves, and by the latter as endless torments.

28. A Third Duty to God is LOVE; there are two common Motives of love among men. the one the goodness and excellency of the person; the other his particular kindness, and love to us; and both these are in the highest degree in God.

29. First he is of infinite goodness, and excellency in himself; this you were before taught to believe of him, and no man can doubt it, that considers but this one thing, that there is nothing good in the world, but what hath received all its goodness from God: His goodness is as the Sea, or Ocean; and the goodness of all creatures, but as foam small streams, flowing from the Sea; now you would certainly think him a mad man, that should say the Sea were not greater than some little brook; and certainly it is no less folly to suppose that the goodness of God doth not as much (nay infinitely more) exceed that of all creatures. Besides the goodness of the creature is imperfect and mixed with much evil; but his is pure and entire, without any such mixture. He is perfectly Holy, and cannot be tainted with the least impurity, neither can he be the Author of any to us, for though he be the cause of all the goodness in us, he is the cause of none of our sins. This S. James expressly tells us, Chap. 1. 13. Let no man say when he is tempted, He is tempted of God; for God cannot be tempted with evil, neither tempteth he any man.

30. But secondly, God is not only thus good in himself, but he is also wonderful good; that is, kind and merciful to us; we are made up of two parts, a Soul and a Body, and to each of these God hath expressed infinite mercy & tenderness. Do but consider what was before told you of the SECOND COVENANT, & the mercies therein offered, even Christ himself & all his benefits, and also that he offers them so sincerely and heartily that no man can miss of enjoying them but by his own default. For he doth most really and affectionately desire we should embrace them and live; as appears by that solemn Oath of his, Eze. 33. 11. As I live, saith the Lord, I have no pleasure in the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his ways and live: whereto he adds this passionate expression, turn ye, turn ye from your evil ways for why will ye die? To the same purpose you may read Ezek. 18. Consider this, I say, and then surely you cannot but say, He hath great kindness to our souls. Nay, let every man but remember with himself the many calls he hath had to repentance and amendment; sometimes outward, by the Word, sometimes inward, by the secret whispers of God's Spirit in his heart, which were only to woe and entreat him to avoid Eternal misery, and to accept of Eternal happiness; let him, I say, remember these, together with those many other means God hath used towards him for the same end, and he will have reason to confess God's kindness, not only to men's souls in general, but to his own in particular.

31. Neither hath he been wanting to our Bodies, all the good things they enjoy, as health, strength, food, raiment, and what ever else concerns them, are merely his gifts; so that indeed it is impossible we should be ignorant of his mercies to them, all those outward comforts and refreshments we daily enjoy, being continual effects and witnesses of it, and though some enjoy more of these than others, yet there is no person but enjoys so much in one kind or other, as abundantly shows God's mercy and kindness to him in respect of his Body.

32. And now surely you will think it but reasonable we should Love him, who is in all respects thus Lovely: Indeed this is a duty so generally acknowledged, that if you should ask any man the question, whether he loved God or no, he would think you did him great wrong to doubt of it; yet for all this, it is too plain, that there are very few, that do indeed love him, and this will soon be proved to you by examining a little, what are the common effects of love, which we bear to men like ourselves, and then trying, whether we can show any such fruits of our love to God.

33. Of that sort there are divers, but for shortness I will name but two. The first is a Desire of pleasing, the second a Desire of enjoying. These are constantly the Fruits of Love. For the first, 'tis known by all, that he that loves any person, is very desirous to approve himself to him, to do whatsoever he thinks will be pleasing to him; and according to the degree of love, so is this desire more or less, where we love earnestly, we are very earnest, and careful to please. Now if we have indeed that love to God we pretend to, it will bring forth this fruit, we shall be careful to please him in all things. Therefore as you judge of the tree by its fruits, so may you judge of your love of God, by this fruit of it; nay indeed this is the way of trial, which Christ himself hath given us, Jo. 14. 15. If ye love me keep my commandments; and S. John tell us, 1 Ep. 5. 3. That this is the love of God, that we walk after his commandments, and where this one proof is wanting, it will be impossible to testify our love to God.

34. But it must yet be farther considered, that this love of God must not be in a low or weak degree, for besides that the Motives to it, his excellency and his kindness are in the highest; the same Commandment which bids us love God, bids us love him with all our heart, and with all our strength, that is, as much as is possible for us, and above anything else. And therefore to the fulfilling of this Commandment, it is necessary we love him in that degree; and if we do so, then certainly we shall have not only some slight and faint endeavors of pleasing, but such as are most diligent and earnest, such as will put us upon the most painful and costly duties, make us willing to forsake our own ease, goods, friends, yea, life itself, when we cannot keep them without disobeying God.

35. Now examine thyself by this; hast thou this fruit of love to show? doest thou make it thy constant and greatest care to keep God's Commandments? to obey him in all things? earnestly laboring to please him to the utmost of thy power, even to the forsakeing of what is dearest to thee in this world? if thou dost, thou mayest then truly say thou lovest God. But on the contrary, if thou willfully continuest in the breach of many, nay, but of any one command of his, never deceive thyself, for the love of God abides not in thee. This will be made plain to you, if you consider what the Scripture saith of such, as that they are enemies to God by their wicked works, Col. 1. 21. That the carnal mind (and such is every one that continues willfully in sin) is enmity with 'God, Rom. 8. 7. That he that sins wilfully tramples underfoot the Son of God, and doth despite unto the Spirit of Grace, Heb. 10. 29. and many the like. And therefore unless you can think enmity, and trampling, and despite to be fruits of love, you must not believe you love God, whilst you go on in any willful disobedience to him.

36. A Second fruit of Love, I told you, was desire of Enjoying. This is constantly to be seen in our love to one another. If you have a friend whom you entirely love, you desire his conversation, wish to be always in his company: and thus will it also be in our love to God if that be as great and hearty as this.

37. There is a twofold Enjoying of God, the one Imperfect in this life, the other more Perfect and complete in the life to come; that in this life is that conversation, as I may call it, which we have with God in his Ordinances, in Praying, and Meditating, in Hearing his Word, in Receiving the Sacrament, which are all intended for this purpose, to bring us into an intimacy and familiarity with God by speaking to him, and hearing him speak to us.

38. Now if we do indeed love God, we shall certainly hugely value and desire these ways of conversing with him, it being all that we can have in this life; it will make us with David esteem one day in God's Courts better than a thousand, Psal. 84. 10. We shall be glad to have these opportunities of approaching to him as often as it is possible, & be careful to use them diligently, to that end of uniting us still more to him; yea we shall come to these Spiritual exercises with the same cheerfulness we would go to our dearest friend. And if indeed we do thus it is a good proof of our Love.

39. But I fear there are not many have this to show for it, as appears by the common backwardness and unwillingness of men to come to these; and their negligence, and heartlessness when they are at them; and can we think that God will ever own us for lovers of him, whilst we have such dislikes to his company, that we will never come into it but when we are dragged by fear or shame of men or some such worldly Motive? It is sure you would not think that man loved you, whom you perceived to shun your company, and to be loath to come in your sight. And therefore be not so unreasonable as to say, You love God, when yet you desire to keep as far from him as you can.

40. But besides this, there is another Enjoyment of God, which is more perfect and complete, and that is our perpetual enjoying of him in heaven, where we shall be forever united to him, and enjoy him not now and then only for short spaces of time, as we do here, but continually without interruption, or breaking off. And certainly if we have that degree of love to God we ought, this cannot but be most earnestly desired by us so much, that we shall think no labor too great to compass it. The seven years that Jacob served for Rachel. Gen. 29. 20. seemed to him but a few days for the love that he had to her: & surely if we have love to God we shall not think the service of our whole lives too dear a price for this full Enjoyment of him, nor esteem all the Enjoyments of the world worth the looking on in comparison thereof.

41. If we can truly tell ourselves we do thus long for this enjoyment of God, we may believe we love him. But I fear again there are but few that can thus approve their love. For if we look into men's lives, we shall see they are not generally so fond of this Enjoyment, as to be at any pains to purchase it. And not only so, but it is to be doubted, there are many who if it were put to their choice, whether they would live here always to enjoy the profit and pleasure of the world, or go to heaven to enjoy God, would, like the children of Gad and Reuben, set up their rest on this side Jordan, Num. 32. and never desire that heavenly Canaan; so close do their affections cleave to things below, which shows clearly they have not made God their treasure, for then according to our Savior's Rule, Mat. 6. 21. their heart would be with him. Nay, further yet; it is too plain that many of us set so little value on this Enjoying of God, that we preser the vilest and basest sins before him, and choose to Enjoy them, though by it we utterly lose our parts in Him, which is the case of every man that continues willfully in those sins.

42. And now I fear, according to these Rules of Trial, many that prefess to love God, will be found not to do so. I conclude all with the words of S. John 1 Ep. 3. 18. Which though spoken of the love of our brethren, is very fitly applicable to this love of God, let us not love in word, neither in tongue, but in deed and in truth.

43. A Fourth duty to God is FEAR; this arises from the consideration both of his Justice & his Power; his Justice is such that he will not clear the wicked, & his Power such, that he is able to inflict the sorest punishments upon them; and that this is a reasonable cause of fear, Christ himself tells us, Mat. 10. 18. Fear him which is able to destroy both body and soul in hell. Many other places of Scripture there are, which commend to us this duty, as Ps. 2. 11. Serve the Lord with fear: Psal. 34. 9. Fear the Lord ye that be his Saints. Pro. 9. 10. The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and divers the like; and indeed all the threatenings of wrath against sinners, which we meet with in the Scripture, are only to this end, to work this fear in our hearts.

44. Now this fear is nothing else, but such an awful regard of God, as may keep us from offending him. This the wise man tells us, Pro. 16. 17. The fear of the Lord is to depart from evil: so that none can be said truly to fear God, that is not thereby withheld from sin; & this is but answerable to that common fear we have towards man; whoever we know may hurt us, we will beware of provoking, & therefore if we be not as wary of displeasing God, it is plain we fear men more then we do him.

45. How great a madness this is, thus to fear men above God, will soon appear if we compare what man can do to us with that which God can. And first, it is sure, it is not in the power of man (I might say Devils too) to do us any hurt unless God permit and suffer them to do it: so that if we do but keep him our friend, we may say with the Psalmist, The Lord is on my side, I fear not what man can do unto me. For let their malice be never so great, he can restrain and keep them from hurting us, nay, he can change their minds toward us, according to that of the wise man, Prov. 16. 7. When a man's ways please the Lord, he maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him. A notable example of this we have in Jacob, Gen. 32. who when his brother Esau was coming against him as an enemy, God wonderfully turned his heart, so that he met him with all the expressions of brotherly kindness, as you may read in the next Chapter.

46. But secondly, suppose men were left at liberty to do thee what mischief they could; alas, their power goes but a little way, they may perhaps rob thee of thy goods, it may be they may take away thy liberty or thy credit, or perchance thy life too, but that thou knowest is the utmost they can do. But now God can do all this when he pleases, and that which is infinitely more, his vengeance reaches even beyond death itself, to the eternal misery both of Body and Soul in hell; in comparison of which, death is so inconsiderable, that we are not to look upon it with any dread. Fear not them that kill the body, and after that have no more that they can do, saith Christ, Luke 12. 4. And then immediately adds, But I will forewarn you whom ye shall fear, fear him which after he hath killed hath power to cast into hell, yea, I say unto you, Fear him. In which words the comparison is set between that greatest ill we can suffer from man, the loss of life, and those sadder evils God can inflict on us; and the latter are found to be the only dreadful things, and therefore God only to be feared.

47. But there is yet one thing farther considerable in this matter, which is this, It is possible we may transgress against men and they not know it: I may perhaps steal my neighbors goods, or defile his wife, and keep it so close that he shall not suspect me, and so never bring me to punishment for it; but this we cannot do with God, he knows all things, even the most secret thoughts of our hearts; and therefore though we commit a sin never so closely, he is sure to find us, and will as surely, if we do not timely repent, punish us eternally for it.

48. And now surely it cannot but be confessed, that it is much safer displeasing men, then God; yet alas our practice is as if we believed the direct contrary, there being nothing more ordinary with us then for the avoiding of some present danger we fear from men, to rush ourselves upon the indignation of God. And thus it is with us, when either to save our estates, or credits, or our very lives, we commit any sin, for that is plainly the choosing to provoke God, rather then man.

49. But God knows this case of fear of men is not the only one wherein we venture to displease him, for we commit many sins, to w<sup>ch</sup> we have none of this temptation, nor indeed any other, as for instance that of Common Swearing, to which there is nothing either of pleasure, or profit to invite us. Nay, many times, we, who so fear the mischiefs that other men may do to us that we are ready to buy them off with the greatest sins, do ourselves bring all those very mischiefs upon us, by sins of our own choosing. Thus the careless Prodigal robs himself of his estate, the Deceitful & Dishonest man, or any that lives in open notorious sin, deprives himself of his credit, and the Drunkard & Glutton brings diseases on himself, to the shortening his life. And can we think we do at all Fear God, when that fear hath so little power over us, that though it be backed with the many present mischiefs that attend upon sin, it is not able to keep us from them? surely such men are far from fearing God, that they rather seem to defy him, resolve to provoke him, whatsoever it cost them, either in this world or the next. Yet so unreasonably partial are we to our selves, that even such as these will pretend to this fear: you may examine multitudes of the most gross scandalous sinners, before you shall meet with one that will acknowledge he fears not God. It is strange it should be possible for men thus to cheat themselves; but however, it is certain we cannot deceive God, he will not be mocked, and therefore if we will not now so fear as to avoid sin, we shall one day fear when it will be too late to avoid punishment.

50. A Fift Duty to God, that of TRUSTING in him, that is, depending and resting on him: and that is First in all dangers, Secondly in all wants. We are to rest on him in all our dangers both Spiritual and Temporal. Of the first sort, are all those Temptations, by which we are in danger to be drawn to sin. And in this respect he hath promised, that if we resist the Devil he shall fly from us, Jam 4. 7. Therefore our duty is first to pray earnestly for God's grace to enable us to overcome the temptation, and Secondly, to set ourselves manfully to combat with it, not yielding or giving consent to it in the least degree; and whilst we do thus, we are confidently to rest upon God, that his grace will be sufficient for us that he will either remove the temptation, or strengthen us to withstand it.

51. Secondly, in all outward & Temporal Dangers, we are to rest upon him, as knowing that he is able to deliver us, and that he will do so if he see it best for us, & if we be such to whom he hath promised his protection, that is, such as truly fear him. To this purpose we have many promises in Scripture, Ps. 34. 7. The Angel of the Lord tarrieth round about them that fear him, and delivereth them: & Ps. 34. 20. The Lord delivereth the souls of his Saints, and all that put their trust in him shall not be destitute; and divers the like. And also we have many examples, as that of the three children in the Furnace, Daniel 3. That of Daniel in the Lions Den, Daniel 6. And many others; all which serve to teach us this one lesson, that if we go on conscionably in performing our duty, we need not be dismayed for anything that can befall us, for the God whom we serve, is able to deliver us.

52. Therefore in all dangers, we are first humbly to pray for his aid, and then to rest ourselves cheerfully on him; and assuring ourselves that he will give such an issue as shall be most for our good. But above all things, we must be sure to fix our dependence wholly on him, and not to rely on the creatures for help, much less must we seek to deliver ourselves by any unlawful means; that is, by the committing of any sin; for that is like Saul, 1 Samuel 28. 7. to go to the Witch, that is, to the Devil for help; such courses do commonly deceive our hopes at the present, and instead of delivering us out of our straits, plunge us in greater, and those much more uncomfortable ones, because then we want that which is the only support, God's favor and aid which we certainly forfeit when we thus seek to rescue ourselves by any sinful means. But supposing we could by such a way certainly free ourselves from the present danger, yet alas we are far from having gained safety by it, we have only removed the danger from that which was less considerable, and brought it upon the most precious part of us, our Souls; like an unskillful Physician, that to remove a pain from the finger strikes it to the heart; we are therefore grossly mistaken when we think we have played the good Husband in saving our Liberties or Estates, or Lives themselves by a sin; we have not saved them but madly overbought them, laid out our very Souls on them: And Christ tells us how little we shall gain by such bargains, Mat. 17. 26. What is a man profited if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? Let us therefore resolve never to value anything we can possess in this world at so high a rate, as to keep it at the price of the least sin, but when ever things are driven to such an issue, that we must either part with some, perhaps all our worldly possessions, nay life itself or else commit a sin, let us then remember, that this is the season for us to perform that great and excellent duty of taking up the Cross, which we can never so properly do in this case, for our bearing of that which we have no possible way of avoiding, can at most be said to be but the carrying of the Cross, but then only can we be said to take it up, when having a means of escaping it by a sin, we rather choose to endure the Cross than commit the Sin, for then it is not laid on us by any unavoidable necessity, but we willingly choose it; and this is highly acceptable with God, yea, withal so strictly required by him, that if we fail of performing it, when we are put to the trial, we are not to be accounted followers of Christ, for so himself hath expressly told us, Mat. 16. 24. If any man come after me, let him deny himself, and take up his Cross and follow me; and so again, Mark 8. 34. It were therefore a good point of Spiritual Wisdom for us, sometimes by some lower degrees of self-denial, to fit ourselves for this greater, when we shall be called to it; we know he that expects to run a Race will beforehand be often breathing himself, that he may not be foiled when he comes to run for the prize; in like manner 'twil be fit for us, sometimes to abridge ourselves somewhat of our lawful pleasure, or ease, or profit, so that we may get such a mastery over our selves, as to be able to renounce all, when our obedience to God requires it.

53. And as we are thus to Trust on God for deliverance from danger, so are we likewise for supply of our wants; and those again are either Spiritual or Temporal: our Spiritual want is that of his Grace to enable us to serve him, without which we can do nothing; and for this we are to depend on him, provided, we neglect not the means, which are Prayer, and a Careful using of what he hath already bestowed on us: For then we have his promise for it, he will give the holy Spirit to them that ask it, Luke 11. 15. And unto him that hath shall be given, Mat. 25. 29. that is, To him that hath made a good use of that grace, he hath already, God will give more. We are not therefore to affright ourselves with the difficulty of those things God requires of us, but remember he commands nothing which he will not enable us to perform, if we be not wanting to ourselves. And therefore let us sincerely do our parts, and confidently assure ourselves God will not fail of his.

54. But we have likewise Temporal and Bodily wants, and for the supply of them we are likewise to rely on him. And for this also we want no Promises, supposing us to be of the number of them to whom they are made, that is, God's faithful Servants: They that fear the Lord lack nothing, Psal. 34. 9. & v. 10. They that seek the Lord shall want no manner of thing that is good: Again, Psal. 33. 18, 19. Behold the eye of the Lord is upon them that fear him, upon them that hope in his mercy, to deliver their souls from death, and to feed them in time of famine. Examples also we have of this, as we may see in the case of Elijah, and the poor Widow, 1 Kings 17. And many others.

55. We are therefore to look up to him for the provision of all things necessary for us, according to that of the Psalmist, The eyes of all wait upon thee, O Lord, and thou givest them meat in due season. And our Savior hath taught us to pray for our daily bread; thereby teaching us that we are to live in continual dependence upon God for it. Yet I mean not by this, that we should so expect it from God, as to give up ourselves to idleness and expect to be fed by Miracles. No, our honest industry and labor is the means by which God ordinarily gives us the necessaries of this life; and therefore we must by no means neglect that. He that will not labor, let him not eat, says the Apostle, 2 Thess. 3. 10. And we may believe God will pronounce the same sentence, and suffer the slothful person to want even necessary food. But when we have faithfully used our own endeavor, then we must also look up to God for his blessing on it, without which it can never prosper to us. And having done thus, we may comfortably rest ourselves on his Providence for such a measure of these outward things as he fees fittest for us.

56. But if our condition be such that we are not able to labor, and have no other means of bringing in the necessaries of life to ourselves, yet even then we are cheerfully to rest upon God, believing that he who feeds the Ravens, will by some means or other, though we know not what, provide for us so long as he pleases we shall continue in this world, and never in any case torment ourselves with carking and distrustful thoughts; but as the Apostle, 1 Pet. 5. 7. Cast all our care on him who careth for us.

57. This is earnestly pressed by our Savior, Matth. 6. where he abundantly shows the folly of this sin of distrust. The place is a most excellent one, and therefore I shall set it down at large, Verse 25. Therefore, I say unto you, take no thought for your life, what you shall eat, or what you shall drink; neither for your body, what you shall put on; is not the life more then meat, and the body then raiment? Behold the fowls of the air, for they sow not, neither do they reap, nor gather into barns, yet your heavenly Father feedeth them. Are ye not much better then they? Which of you by taking thought can add one cubit to his stature? And why take ye thought for raiment? consider the Lilies of the field how they grow, they toil not, neither do they spin, and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon in all his glory was not arrayed like one of these. Wherefore if God so clothe the grass of the field, which today is, and tomorrow is cast into the Oven, shall he not much more clothe you, O ye of little faith? Therefore take no thought, saying, What shall we eat? or what shall we drink? or wherewithal shall we be clothed? (for after all these things do the Gentiles seek) for your heavenly Father knoweth that ye have need of all these things. But seek ye first the Kingdom of God and his righteousness, and then all these things shall be added unto you. Take therefore no thought for tomorrow, for the morrow shall take thought for the things of itself, sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof. I might add many other texts to this purpose, but this is so full and convincing that I suppose it needless.

58. All therefore that I shall say more concerning this duty, is to put you in mind of the great benefits of it; as first, that by his trusting upon God, you engage and bind him to provide for you. Men, you know, think themselves highly concerned not to fail those that depend and trust upon them; and certainly God doth so much more. But then secondly, there is a great deal of ease and quiet in the practice of this duty; it delivers us from all those carkings and immoderate cares which disquiet our minds, break our sleep, and gnaws even our very heart. I doubt not but those that have felt them, need not be told they are uneasy. But then me thinks that uneasiness should make us forward to embrace the means for the removing of them, and so we see it too often doth in unlawful ones; men will cheat, and steal, and lie, and do anything to deliver themselves from the fear of want. But alas, they commonly prove but deceitful remedies; they bring God's curse on us, and so are more likely to betray us to want, then to keep us from it. But if you desire a certain and unfailing cure for cares, take this of relying upon God.

59. For what should cause that man to fear want that knows he hath one that cares for him, who is All-sufficient, and will not suffer him to want what is fit for him. If a poor man had but a faithful promise from a wealthy person that he would never suffer him to want, it is sure he would be highly cheered with it, and would not then think fit to be as carking as he was before, and yet a man's promise may fail us, he may either grow poor and not be able, or he may prove false and not be willing to make good his word. But we know God is subject neither to impoverishing nor deceit. And therefore how vile an injury do we offer to him if we dare not trust as much upon his promise as we would that of a man? yea, and how great a mischief do we do ourselves by loading our minds with a multitude of vexatious and tormenting cares, when we may so securely cast our burden upon God? I conclude this in the words of the Apostle, Phil. 4. 6. Be careful for nothing, but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God.

PARTITION II. Of HUMILITY, Of Submission to God's Will, in respect of Obedience, Of Patience in all sorts of sufferings, and of HONOUR due to God in several ways, in his House, Possessions, his Day, Word, Sacraments, &c.

§. 1. A SIXTH Duty to God is HUMILITY, that is, such a sense of our own meanness and his excellency, as may work in us lowly and unfeigned submission to him: This Submission is twofold; first, to his Will, secondly, to his Wisdom.

2. The submission to his Will is also of two sorts, the submission either of obedience or patience, That of obedience is our ready yielding ourselves up to do his Will, so that when God hath by his command made known to us what his pleasure is, cheerfully and readily to set about it. To enable us to this, humility is exceeding necessary; for a proud person is of all others the unaptest to obey, and we see men never pay an obedience but where they acknowledge the person commanding to be some way above them. And so it is here, if we be not thoroughly persuaded that God is infinitely above us, that we are vileness and nothing in comparison of him, we shall never pay our due obedience.

3. Therefore if ever you mean to obey entirely (as you must if ever you mean to be saved) get your hearts possessed with the sense of that great unspeakable distance that is between God and you Consider him as he is a God of infinite Majesty and glory, and we poor worms of the earth; he infinite in power, able to do all things, and we able to do nothing, not so much as to make one hair white or black; as our Savior speaks, Mat. 5. 36. He of infinite purity and holiness, and we polluted and defiled, wallowing in all kind of sins and uncleanness; he unchangeable and constant, and we subject to change and alteration every minute of our lives. He Eternal and Immortal, and we frail mortals, that when ever he taketh away our breath we die, and are turned again to our dust, Psal. 104. 29. Consider all this, I say, and you cannot but acknowledge a wide difference between God and man, and therefore may well cry out with Job, after he had approacht so near to Goa, as to discern somewhat of his excellency, Job 42. 56. Now mine eye seeth thee, wherefore I abhor myself and repent in dust and ashes.

4. And even when this Humility hath brought us to obedience it is not then to be cast off, as if we had no further use of it; for there is still great use, nay necessity of it, to keep us from any high conceits of our performances, which if we once entertain, it will blast the best of them, and make them utterly unacceptable to God like the strictness of the Pharisee, which when once he came to boast of, the Publican was preferred before him, Luke 18. The best of our works are so full of infirmity and pollution, that if we compare them with that perfection, and purity, which is in God, we may truly say with the Prophet, All our righteousnesses are as filthy rags, Isaiah 64. 6. And therefore to pride ourselves in them, is the same madness, that it would be in a beggar, to brag of his apparel when it is nothing but vile rags, and tatters. Our Savior's precept in this matter must always be remembered, Luke 17. 10. When you have done all those things which are commanded you, say, we are unprofitable servants; if when we have done all, we must give ourselves no better a title, what are we then to esteem ourselves, that are so far from doing any considerable part, of what we are commanded? Surely that worser name of slothful and wicked servant, Matth. 25. 26. we have no reason to think too bad for us.

5. A Second sort of Submission to his will, is that of Patience; this stands in suffering his will, as that of obedience did in acting it, and is nothing else, but a willing and quiet yielding to whatever afflictions it pleases God to lay upon us. This the forementioned humility will make easy to us; for when our hearts are thoroughly possessed with that reverence and esteem of God, it will be impossible for us to grudge or murmur at whatever he does. We see an instance of it in Old Eli, 1 Sam 3. Who after he had heard the sad threatenings of God against him, of the destruction of his family, the loss of the Priesthood, the cutting off both his sons in one day, which were all of them afflictions of the heaviest kind, yet this one consideration, that it was the Lord, enabled him calmly and quietly to yield to them; saying, Let him do what seemeth him good, Verse 18. The same effect it had on David, in his suffering, Psalms 39. 9. I was dumb, I opened not my mouth because thou didst it: God doing it silenced all murmurings and grumbings in him. And so must it do in us, in all our afflictions, if we will indeed approve our humility to God.

6. For surely you will not think that child hath due humility to his parent, or that servant to his Master, that when they are corrected, shall fly in the Father or Masters face. But thus do we when ever we grudge and repine at that which God lays upon us. But besides the want of Humility in our so doing, there is also a great want of justice in it; for God hath, as we are his creatures, a Right to do with us what he will, and therefore for us to resist that right of his, is the highest injustice that can be; nay farther, it is also the greatest folly in the world, for it is only our good that God aims at in afflicting us; that heavenly Father is not like our earthly ones, who sometime correct their children only to satisfy their own angry humor, not to do them good. But this is subject to no such frailties, he doth not afflict willingly, nor grieve the children of man, Lam. 3. 33. They are our sins, which do not only give him just cause, but even force and necessitate him to punish us He carries to us the bowels and affections of the tenderest Father: now when a Father sees his child stubborn and rebellious, and running on in a course that will certainly undo him, what greater act of Fatherly kindness can he do then chasten and correct him, to see if by that means he may amend him; nay indeed he could not be said to have true kindness to him if he should not. And thus it is with God when he sees us run on in sin, either he must leave off to love us, and so leave us to ourselves to take our own course, and that is the heaviest curse that can be fall any man; or else if he continue to love us, he must correct and punish us to bring us to amendment. Therefore when ever he strikes, we are in all reason, not only patiently to lie under his rod, but (as I may say) kiss it also; that is, be very thankful to him, that he is pleased not to give us over to our own hearts lusts, Psal. 18. 12. but still continue his care of us; sends afflictions, as so many messengers to call us home to himself. You see then how gross a folly it is to murmur at those stripes, which are meant so graciously; it is like that of a froward patient, which reproaches and reviles the Physician that comes to cure him, and if such a one be left to die of his disease, everyone knows whom he is to thank for it.

7. But it is not only quietness, no nor thankfulness neither under afflictions, that is the full of our Duty in this matter; we must have fruitfulness also, or all the rest will stand us in no stead. By fruitfulness I mean the bringing forth that, which the afflictions were sent to work in us; viz. the amendment of our lives. To which purpose in time of affliction it is very necessary for us to call ourselves to an account, to examine our hearts and lives, and search diligently, what sins lie upon us, which provoked God thus to smite us, and whatsoever we find ourselves guilty of, humbly to confess to God and immediately to forsake for the rest of our time.

8. All I shall add concerning this duty of patience, is, that we are as much bound to it in one sort of sufferings, as another, whether our suffering be so immediately from God's hand, that no creature hath anything to do in it, as sickness, or the like; or whether it be such wherein men are the instruments of afflicting us. For it is most sure, when any man doth us hurt, he could not do it, without God's permission, and sufferance, and God may as well make them the instruments of punishing us, as do it more directly by himself; and it is but a counterfeit patience, that pretends to submit to God, and yet can bear nothing from men; we see holy Job, who is set forth to us as a pattern of true patience, made no such difference in his afflictions, he took the loss of his Cattel, which the Chaldeans and Sabaeans robbed him of, with the very same meekness, with which he did that, which was consumed by fire from heaven. When therefore we suffer anything from men, be it never so unjustly in respect of them, we are yet to confess it is most just in respect of God, and therefore instead of looking upon them with rage and revenge, as the common custom of the world is, we are to look up to God, acknowledge his justice in the affliction, begging his pardon most earnestly for those sins, which have provoked him to send it, and patiently and thankfully bear it, till he shall see fit to remove it; still saying with Job, blessed be the name of the Lord.

9. But I told you, Humility contained in it a submission not only to his Will, but also to his Wisdom; that is, to acknowledge him infinitely Wise, and therefore that whatever he doth is best and fittest to be done. And this we are to confess both in his commands, and in his disposing and ordering of things: First, whatsoever he commands us either to believe or do, we are to submit to his Wisdom in both, to believe whatever he bids us believe, how impossible soever it seems to our shallow understandings, and to do whatever he commands us to do, how contrary soever it be to our fleshly Reason or humor, and in both to conclude, that his Commands are most fit and Reasonable however they appear to us.

10. Secondly, We are to submit to his Wisdom in respect of his Disposal and Ordering of things; to acknowledge he disposes all things most Wisely, and that not only in what concerns the world in general, but also in what concerns everyone of us in particular; so that what condition soever he put us in, we are to assure ourselves it is that which is best for us, since he chooses it for us who cannot err. And therefore never to have impatient desires of anything in this world, but to leave it to God to fit us with such an estate and condition as he sees best for us, and there let us quietly and contentedly rest; yea, though it be such as of all others we should least have wisht for ourselves. And this surely cannot but appear very reasonable to any that hath humility; for that having taught him, that God is infinitely wise, and he very foolish, he can never doubt but that it is much more for his good that God should choose for him, than he for himself; even as it is much more for the child's good to have the parent choose for it, than to be left to those silly choices it would make for its self. For how many times would it cut, and burn, and mischief itself if it might have everything it desires? And such children are we, we many times eagerly desire those things which would undo us if we had them. Thus many times we wish for Wealth, and Honor, and Beauty, and the like, when if we had them they would only prove snares to us, we should be drawn into sin by them. And this God, who knows all things, sees, though we do not, and therefore often denies us those things which he sees will tend to our mischief, and it is his abundant mercy that he doth so. Let us therefore when ever we be disappointed of any of our aims and wishes, not only patiently but joyfully submit to it, as knowing that it is certainly best for us, it being chosen by the unerring wisdom of our heavenly Father.

11. A seventh Duty to God is HONOR, that is, the paying him such a reverence and respect as belongs to so great a Majesty. And this is either inward or outward. The inward is the exalting him in our hearts having always the highest and most excellent esteem of him. The outward is the manifesting and showing forth that inward; and that is the first general in the whole course of our lives, the living like men that do indeed carry that high esteem of God. Now you know if we bear any special Reverence but to a Man, we will be careful not to do any foul or base thing in his presence, and so if we do indeed honor God, we shall abhor to do any unworthy thing in his sight. But God sees all things, and therefore there is no way to shun the doing it in his sight if we do it at all; therefore if we do thus reverence him, we must never at any time do any sinful thing.

12. But besides this general way of honoring God, there are many particular acts by which we may honor him, and those acts are divers, according to the several particulars about which they are exercised. For we are to pay his honor not only immediately to himself, but also by a due estimation and account of all those things that nearly relate or belong to him. Those are especially six; first, his House, secondly, his Revenue or income (as I may say) thirdly, his Day, fourthly, his Word, fifthly, his Sacraments, and sixthly, his Name; and everyone of these is to have some degree of our Reverence and Esteem.

13. First, his House, that is, the Church, which being the place set apart for his public worship, we are to look on it, though not as Holy in respect of itself, yet in respect of its use, and therefore must not profane it by employing it to uses of our own. This Christ hath taught us by that act of his, Matth. 21. 12. in driving the buyers and sellers out of the Temple, saying, My house is called the house of prayer: And again, John 2. 16. Make not my Fathers house a house of Merchandize. By which it is clear, Churches are to be used only for the services of God, and we are to make that the only end of our coming thither, and not to come to Church as to a Market, to make bargains or dispatch businesses with our neighbors, as is too common among many. But when ever thou enterest the Church, remember that it is the House of God, a place where he is in an especial manner present, and therefore take the counsel of the Wise man, Eccles. 5. 1. and keep thy foot when thou goest into the house of God; that is, behave thyself with that godly awe and reverence which belongs to that great Majesty thou art before. Remember that thy business there is to converse with God, and therefore shut out all thoughts of the world, even of thy most lawful business, which though they be allowable at another time, are here sinful. How fearful a guilt is it then to entertain any such thoughts as are in themselves wicked? It is like the treason of Judas, who pretended indeed to come to kiss his Master, but brought with him a band of Soldiers to apprehend him, Mat. 26. We make show in our coming to Church, of servicing and worshipping God, but we bring with us a train of his enemies to provoke and despite him. This is a wickedness that may outvie the profaneness of these days, in turning Churches into Stables; for sinful and polluted thoughts are much the worst sort of beasts.

14. The second thing to which respect belongs, is his Revenue or income; that is, whatsoever is his peculiar possessions, set apart for the maintenance of those that attend his service; those were the Priests in time of the Law, and Ministers of the Gospel now with us. And what ever is thus set apart, we must look on with such respect as not to dare to turn it to any other use. Of this sort some are the free-will-offerings of men, who have sometimes of their own accord given some of their Goods or Lands to this Holy use; and whatsoever is so given, can neither by the person that gave, nor any other be taken away without that great sin of Sacrilege.

15. But besides these, there was among the Jews, and hath always been in all Christian Nations, something allotted by the Law of the Nation for the support and maintenance of those that attend the service of God. And it is but just and necessary it should be so, that those who by undertaking that Calling are taken off from the ways of gaining a livelihood in the world, should be provided for by them whose souls they watch over. And therefore it is most reasonable, which the Apostle urges in this matter, 1 Cor. 9. 11. If we have sown unto you spiritual things, is it a great thing if we shall reap your carnal things? That is, it is most unreasonable for men to grudge the bestowing a few carnal things, the outward necessities of this temporal life, on them from whom they receive spiritual things, even instruction and assistance towards the obtaining of an eternal life.

16. Now whatsoever is thus appointed for this use, may by no means be employed to any other. And therefore those Tithes which are here by Law allotted for the maintenance of the Ministry, must by no means be kept back, nor any tricks or shifts used to avoid the payment either in whole or in part. For first, it is certain, that it is as truly theft as any other robbery can be, Ministers having right to their tithes by the same Law which gives any other man right to his estate. But then secondly, it is another manner of robbery then we think of, it is a robbing of God, whose Service they were given to maintain, and that you may not doubt the truth of this, it is no more then God himself hath said of it, Mal. 3. 8. Will a man rob God? yet ye have robbed me; yet ye say, Wherein have we robbed thee? in tithes and offerings. Here it is most plain that in God's account the with holding tithes is a robbing of him. And if you please you may in the next verse see what the gains of this robbery amounts to, Ye are cursed with a curse: A curse is all is gotten by it; and common experience shows us that GOD'S vengeance doth in a remarkable manner pursue this sin of Sacrilege, whether it be that of with holding tithes, or the other of seizing on those possessions, which have been voluntarily consecrated to God. Men think to enrich themselves by it, but it usually proves directly contrary; this unlawful gain becomes such a Canker in the estate, as often eats out even that we had a just title to. And therefore if you love (I will not say your souls, but) your estates, preserve them from that danger by a strict care never to meddle with anything set a part for God.

17. A Third thing, wherein we are to express our Reverence to God; is the hallowing of the times, set apart for his service. He who hath given all our time, requires some part of it to be paid back again, as a rent or tribute of the whole. Thus the Jews kept holy the seventh day: and we Christians the Sunday, or Lord's day; the Jews were in their Sabbath especially to remember the Creation of the World, and we in ours, the Resurrection of Christ by which a way is made for us into that better world we expect hereafter. Now this Day thus set apart, is to be employed in the Worship and Service of God, and that first more solemnly and publicly in the Congregation, from which no man must then absent himself without a just cause: and Secondly, privately at home, in praying with, and instructing our families, or else in the yet more private duties of the closet, a man's own private prayers, Reading, Meditating, and the like.

And that we may be at leisure for these, a Rest from all worldly business is commanded; therefore let no man think that a bare rest from labor is all that is required of him on the Lord's day, but the time which he saves from the works of his calling, he is to lay out on those spiritual duties. For the Lord's Day was never ordained to give us a pretence for idleness, but only to change our unployment from worldly to heavenly, much less was it meant that by our rest from our callings we should have more time-free to bestow upon our sins, as too many do, who are more constant on that day at the Alehouse than the Church. But this Rest was commanded, first, to shadow out to us that Rest from sin which we are bound to all the days of our lives. And secondly, to take us off from our worldly business, and to give us time to attend the service of God and the need of our souls.

18. And surely if we rightly consider it, it is a very great benefit to us that there is such a set time thus weekly returning for that purpose. We are very intent and busy upon the world, and if there were not some such time appointed to our hands, it is to be doubted we should hardly allot any ourselves: And then what a starved condition must these poor souls of ours be in, that shall never be afforded a meal? whereas now there is a constant diet provided for them every Sunday, if we will conscionably employ it, may be a festival day to them, may bring them in such spiritual food, as may nourish them to eternal life. We are not to look on this day with grudging, like those in Amos 8. 5. Who ask, When will the Sabbath be gone, that we may set forth wheat? As if that time were utterly lost, which were taken from our worldly business. But we are to consider it, as the gainfullest, as the joyfullest day of the week, a day of harvest, wherein we are to lay up in store for the whole week, nay for our whole lives.

19. But besides this of the weekly Lord's day, there are other times, which the Church hath set apart for the remembrance of some special mercies of God, such as the Birth and Resurrection of Christ, the Descent of the Holy Ghost, and the like; and these days we are to keep in that manner which the Church hath ordered, to wit in the solemn worship of God, and in particular thanks giving for that special blessing we then remember. And surely whoever is truly thankful for those rich mercies, cannot think it too much to set apart some few days in a year for that purpose.

But then we are to look that our Feasts be truly spiritual, by employing the day thus holily, and not make it an occasion of intemperance and disorder as too many, who consider nothing in Christmass and other good times, but the good cheers and jollity of them. For that is doing despite, instead of honor to Christ, who came to bring all purity and soberness into the world, and therefore must not have that coming of his remembered in any other manner.

20. Other days there are also set a part in memory of the Apostles, and other Saints, wherein we are to give hearty thanks to God, for his graces in them; particularly, that they were made instruments of revealing to us Christ Jesus, and the way of salvation, as you know the Apostles were by their Preaching throughout the World. And then farther, we are to meditate on those Examples of holy life, they have given us, and stir up ourselves to the imitation thereof. And whoever does uprightly set himself to make these uses of these several Holy days, will have cause, by the benefit he shall find from them, to thank and not to blame the Church for ordering them.

21. Another sort of days there are, which we are likewise to observe, and those are days of fasting and humiliation; and whatever of this kind the Church enjoynes, whether constantly at set times of the year, or upon any special and more sudden occasion, we are to observe in such manner as she directs; that is, not only a bare abstaining from meat, which is only the bodies punishment; but in afflicting our souls, humbling them deeply before God, in a heartly confessing, and bewailing of our own, and the nations sins, and earnest prayers for God's pardon, and forgiveness, and for the turning away of those judgments, which those sins have called for: But above all, in turning ourselves from our sins, loosing the bands of wickedness, as Isaiah speaks, Chap. 58. 6. and exercising ourselves in works of mercy, dealing our bread to the hungry, and the like, as it there follows.

22. Fourthly, we are to express our reverence to God, by honoring his Word; and this we must certainly do, if we do indeed honor him; there being no surer sign of our despising any person, then the setting light, by what he says to us; as on the contrary, if we value One, every word he speaks will be of weight with us. Now this Word of God is expressly contained in the holy Scriptures, the Old and New Testament, where he speaks to us, to show us his Will and our duty. And therefore to this Word of his, we are to bear a wonderful respect, to look upon it, as the rules by which we must frame all the actions of our life; and to that end to study it much, to read in it as often as we can, if it may be, never to let a day pass us without reading or hearing some part of it read.

23. But then that is not all: We must not only read, but we must mark what we read, we must diligently observe, what duties there are which God commands us to perform, what faults they are, which God there charges us not to commit, together with the rewards promised to the one, and the punishment threatened to the other. When we have thus marked, we must lay them up in our memory, not so loosely and carelessly that they shall presently drop out again; but we must so fasten them there by often thinking and meditating on them, that we may have them ready for our use. Now that use is the directing of our lives; and therefore when ever we are tempted to the committing of any evil, we are then to call to mind this is the thing which in such a Scripture is forbidden by God, and all his vengeances threatened against it; and so in like manner when any opportunity is offered us of doing good, to remember, this is the duty which I was exhorted to in such a Scripture, and such glorious rewards promised to the doing of it; and by these considerations strengthen ourselves for resisting of the evil and performance of the good.

24. But besides this of the written Word, it hath pleased God to provide yet further for our instruction by his Ministers, whose Office it is to teach us God's Will, not by saying anything contrary to the written Word (for whatsoever is so, can never be God's Will) but by Explaining it, and making it easier to our understandings, and then applying it to our particular occasions, and exhorting and stirring us up to the practice of it; all which is the end at which first their Catechizing and then their Preaching aimeth. And to this we are to bear also a due respect by giving diligent heed thereto, not only being present at Catechizings and Sermons, and either sleep out the time, or think of somewhat else, but carefully marking what is said to us. And surely if we did but rightly consider, how much it concerns us, we should conclude it very reasonable for us to do so.

25. For First as to that of Catechizing, it is the laying the foundation upon which all Christian practice must be built, for that is the teaching us our duty, without which it is impossible for us to perform it. And though it is true, that the Scriptures are the Fountains, from whence this knowledge of duty must be fetched, yet there are many who are not able to draw it from this Fountain themselves, and therefore it is absolutely necessary it should be thus brought to them by others.

26. This Catechizing is generally looked on as a thing belonging only to the youth, and so indeed it ought, not because the oldest are not to learn, if they be ignorant, but because all children should be so instructed, that it should be impossible for them, to be ignorant when they come to years. And it nearly concerns every Parent, as they will free themselves from the guilt of their children's eternal undoing, that they be careful to see them instructed in all necessary things; to which purpose it will be fit early to teach them some short Catechism, of which sort none so fit as the Church Catechism; yet are they not to rest on these endeavors of their own; but also to call in the Ministers help, that he may build them up farther in Christian knowledge.

27. But alas! it is too sure that parents have very much neglected this Duty, and by that means it is that such multitudes of men and women that are called (bristians, know no more of Christ or anything that concerns their own Souls, then the meerest Heathen.

28. But although it were their Parents fault that they were not Instructed when they were young, yet it is now their own if they remain still ignorant; and it is sure it will be their own ruin and misery if they willfully continue so. Therefore whoever it be, of what age or condition soever, that is in this ignorant estate, or in any such degree of it, that he wants any part of necessary saving knowledge, let him as he loves his soul, as ever he would escape eternal damnation, seek out for instruction, and let no fear of shame keep any from it: For first, it is certain the shame belongs only to the willful continuing in ignorance, to which the desire of learning is directly contrary, and is so far from a shameful, that it is a most commendable thing, and will be sure to be so accounted by all wise and good men. But secondly, suppose some profane, senseless people should deride it, yet sure that shame were in all reason to be undergone joyfully rather than venture on that confusion of face which will at the day of judgment befall those, who to avoid a little false shame amongst men, have gone on in a willful ignorance of their duty, which ignorance will be so far from excusing any sins they shall commit, that it adds one great and heavy sin to all the rest, even the despising that knowledge which is offered to them. How harmous a sin that is, you may learn in the first Chapter of the Proverbs, where hating knowledge v. 29. is said to be the thing that draws down those sad vengeances forementioned, even God's forsaking men, laughing at their calamity instead of helping them: Which is of all other conditions in the world the most miserable, and surely they are madly desperate that will run themselves into it.

29. As for those who have already this foundation laid by the knowledge of the grounds of Christian Religion, there is yet for them a farther help provided by Preaching. And it is no more then needs, for God knows those that understand their duty well enough are too apt to forget it; nay, sometimes by the violence of their own lusts to transgress it even when they do remember it, and therefore it is very useful we should be put in mind of it to prevent our forgetting, and also often exhorted and assisted to withstand those lusts which draw us to those transgressions. And to these purposes preaching is intended, first, to warn us to be upon our guard against our spiritual enemy, and then to furnish us with weapons for the fight; that is, such means and helps as may best enable us to beat off temptations and get the victory over them.

30. Since therefore this is the end of Preaching, we must not think we have done our duty when we have heard a Sermon, though never so attentively, but we must lay it up in our hearts those instructions and advices we there meet with, and use them faithfully to that end of overcoming our sins. Therefore when ever thou comest to the Physician of thy Soul, do as thou wouldst with the Physician of thy Body; thou comest to him not only to hear him talk and tell thee what will cure thee, but also to do according to his directions; and if thou dost not so here, thou art as vain as he that expects a bare receipt from his Doctor shall cure him though he never make use of it. Nay, thou art much more vain and ridiculous, for that though it do him no good will do him no harm, he shall never be the worse for having been taught a medicine though he use it not: but in these Spiritual Receipts it is otherwise, if we use them not to our good they will do us a great deal of harm, they will rise up in judgment against us, and make our condemnation so much the heavier. Beware therefore not to bring that danger upon thyself, but when thou hast heard a Sermon, consider with thyself what directions there were in it for enabling thee to eschew evil, or to do good. And if there were anything especially concerned thine own bosom sin, lay that close to thy heart, and all the week after make it matter of meditation, think of it even whilst thou art at thy work, if thou wantest other time; and not only think of it, but set to the practice of it, do what thou wert advised to, for the subduing sins and quickening grace in thee. Finally, look carefully to practice the counsel of the Apostle, Jam. 1. 22. Be ye doers of the Word, not hearers only, deceiving your own souls. To hope for good from the Word without doing of it, is, it seems, nothing but a deceiving ourselves: Let us never therefore measure our godliness by the number of Sermons which we hear, as if the hearing many were the certain mark of a good Christian; but by the store of fruit we bring forth by them, without which all our hearing will serve but to bring us into that heavier portion of stripes, which belongs to him that knows his Masters will and does it not, Luke 12. 47. But this reverence which is due to Preaching we must not pay to all that is now a days called so, for God knows there are many false Prophets gone out into the world, as the Apostle speaks, 1 John 41. And now, if ever, is that advice of his necessary, To try the spirits whether they be of God. But what I have said, I mean only of the Preaching of those who first have a lawful calling to the Office, and secondly frame their doctrine according to the right rule, the written Word of God. But if any man say, He is not able to judge whether the Doctrine be according to the Word or no, let him at least try it by the common known rules of duty which he doth understand, and if he find it a Doctrine giving men liberty to commit those things which are by all acknowledged sins, such as rebellion, injustice, unmercifulness, uncleanness, or the like, he may conclude, it is utterly contrary to God and his Word, and then abhorrence, and not reverence belongs to it.

31. Fifthly, we are to express our honoring of God by Reverencing his Sacraments: those are two; Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord. And this we are to do; First, by our high esteem of them; Secondly, by our reverent usage of them: we are first to prize them at a high rate, looking on them, as the instruments of bringing to us the greatest blessings we can receive. The first of them, Baptism, that enters us into covenant with God, makes us members of Christ, and so gives us right to all those precious benefits, that flow from him, to wit, pardon of sins, sanctifying grace, and heaven itself, on condition we perform our parts of the Covenant. And as for the Lord's Supper, that is not only a sign and remembrance of Christ and his death; but it is actually the giving Christ, and all the fruits of his death to every worthy receiver; and therefore there is a most high estimation, and value due to each of them.

32. And not only so; but in the second place we must show our reverence in our usage of them; and that, First, before, Secondly, at, and Thirdly, after the time of receiving them. It is true that the Sacrament of Baptism being now administered to us, when we are Infants, it is not to be expected of us, that we should in our own persons do anything, either before or at the time of receiving it, those performances were strictly required of all persons, who were baptized when they were of years. But for us, it suffices to give us this right to Baptism, that we are born within the pale of the Church, that is, of Christian parents; and all that is required at that time is what we can only perform by others, they in our stead promising that when we come to years we will perform our parts of the Covenant. But by how much the less we are then able to do so much, the greater bond lies on us to perform those after-duties required of us, by which we are to supply the want of the former.

33. Now if you would know what those duties are, look over those promises which your Godfathers and Godmothers then made in your name, and you may then learn them. I cannot give you them in a better form than that of our Churches Catechism, which tells, That our Godfathers and Godmothers did promise and vow three things in our names; first, that we should forsake the Devil and all his works, the pomps and vanities of this wicked world, and all the sinful lusts of the flesh. Where, by the Devil is meant, first, the worshipping of all false gods, which is indeed but worshipping the Devil: A sin which at the time of Christ's coming into the world was very common, most part of mankind then living in that vile Idolatry. And therefore when Baptism was first ordained, it was but needful to make the forsaking of those false gods a principal part of the vow. And though those false worships are now much rarer, yet there was one special part of them, which may be feared to be yet too common among us, and that is all sorts of uncleanness, which though we do not make Ceremonies of our Religion as the Heathens did of theirs, yet the committing thereof is a most high provocation in God's eyes, such as drew him to destroy whole Cities with fire and brimstone, as you may read, Gen. 19. Nay, the whole World with water, Gen. 6. and will not fail to bring down judgments, and strange ones, on any that continue therein; and therefore the forsaking them well deserves to be looked on as an especial part of this promise. Besides this, all dealing with the Devil is here vowed against, whether it be by practicing witchcraft ourselves, or consulting with those that do upon any occasion whatever, as the recovery of our health, our goods, or whatever else; for this is a degree of the former sin, it is the forsaking of the Lord, and setting up the Devil for our God, whilst we go to him in our needs for help.

34. But we also renounce all the works of the Devil, and those are either in general all those which the Devil tempts us to, or else those particular kinds of sin which have most of his image on them; that is, those which he himself most practices, such are pride (which brought him from being an Angel of light to the accursed condition he is now in) and lying; he is, as our Savior saith, John 8. 44. A liar, and the Father of it; and such also are malice and envy, especially killing and destroying of others, for he was a murderer from the beginning, John 8. 48. But above all there is nothing wherein we become so like him, as in tempting and drawing others to sin, w<sup>ch</sup> is his whole trade and business, and if we make it any part of ours, we become like that roaring Lion, that goes about seeking whom he may devour, 1 Pet. 5. 8.

35. The second thing we vow to forsake, is the pomps and vanities of this wicked world. By the pomps and vanities there are several things meant; some of them such as were used by the Heathens in some Unlawful sports of theirs, wherein we are not now so much concerned, there being none of them remaining among us: but besides that, there is meant all excess, either in diet, or sports, or apparel, when we keep not those due measures, which either by the general rules of sobriety, or the particular circumstances of our qualities and callings we are bound to. Next, by the wicked world, we may understand, first, the wealth and greatness of the world, which though we do not so totally renounce, that it is unlawful for a Christian to be either rich or great, yet we thus far promise to forsake them, that we will not set our hearts upon them, nor either get or keep them by the least unlawful means. Secondly, by the wicked world, we may understand the companies and customs of the world, which so far as they are wicked we here renounce; that is, we promise never to be drawn by company to the commission of a sin, but rather to forsake the most delightful company than be ensnared by it; nor yet by custom, but rather venture the shame of being thought singular, ridiculous persons, walk as it were in a path by ourselves, then put ourselves into that broad way that leads to destruction, by giving ourselves over to any sinful custom how common soever it be grown. If this part of our vo<sup>e</sup> were but thoroughly considered, it would arm us against most of the temptations the world offers us, company and custom being the two special instruments by which it works on us

36. A third thing we renounce, is all the sinful lusts of the flesh; where the flesh is to be understood in that sense wherein the Scripture often uses it, for the fountain of all disordered affections. For though those unclean desires which we ordinarily call the lusts of the flesh are here meant, yet they are not the only things here contained, there being divers other things which the Scripture calls the works of the flesh; I cannot better inform you of them than by setting down that list S. Paul gives of them, Gal. 5. 19, 20, 21. Now the works of the flesh are manifest, which are these, adultery, fornication, uncleanness, lasciviousness, idolatry, witchcraft, hatred, variance, emulations, wrath, strife, seditions, heresies, envyings, murders, drunkenness, revellings, and such like. This, with those other descriptions, you will find scattered in several places of Scripture, will show you there are many things contained under this part of your vow, the forsaking all the sinful lusts of the flesh.

37. The second thing our Godfathers and Godmothers promised for us, was, that we should believe all the Articles of the Christian faith. These we have summed up together in that which we call the Apostles Creed, which since we promise to believe, we are supposed also to promise to learn them, and that not only the words, but likewise the plain sense of them, for who can believe what he either never heard, of, or knows not anything of the meaning of it? Now by this believing is meant not only the consenting to the truth of them, but also the living like them that do believe. As for Example, our believing that God created us, should make us live in that subjection and obedience to him which becomes Creatures to their Creator; the believing that Christ Redeemed us, should make us yield up ourselves to him as his purchase, to be disposed wholly by him, and employed only in his service. The believing a judgment to come, should give us care so to walk that we may not be condemned in it. And our believing the life everlasting, should make us diligent so to employ our short moment of time here, that our everlasting life may be a life of joy, not of misery to us. In this manner from all the Articles of the Creed, we are to draw Motives to confirm us in all Christian Practice, to which end it is that our learning and believing of them tends, and therefore without it we are very far from making good this part of our vow, the believing all the Articles of the Christian faith.

38. The last part of our vow is, that we should keep God's holy will and Commandments, 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 and walk in the same all the days of our lives. Where by our keeping of God's holy will and commandments, is meant our doing of all those things, which he hath made known to us to be his will we should perform; wherein he hath given us his holy Word to instruct us, and teach us, what it is that he requires of us, and now he expects that we should faithfully do it without favoring ourselves in the breach of any one of his commands. And then in this entire obedience, we must walk all the days of our lives: That is, we must go on in a constant course of obeying God; not only fetch some few steps in his ways, but walk in them, and that not for some part of our time, but all the days of our lives, never turn out of them, but go on constantly in them, as long as we live in this world.

39. Having now thus briefly explained to you this vow made at your Baptism, all I shall add concerning it, is only to remember you how nearly you are concerned in the keeping it: and that first in respect of justice, secondly, in respect of advantage and benefit. That you are in justice bound to it, I need say no more but that it is a promise, and you know justice requires of every man the keeping of his promise. But then this is of all other promises the most solemn and binding, for it is a vow; that is, a promise made to God; and therefore we are not only unjust, but forsworn, when ever we break any part of it.

40. But secondly we are also highly concerned to keep it, in respect of our own benefit. I told you before, That Baptism entered us into Covenant with God; now a Covenant is made up of two parts, that is, something promised by the one party, and something by the other of the parties that make the Covenant. And if one of them break his part of the Covenant, that is, perform not what he hath agreed to, he can in no reason look that the other should make good his.

And so it is here, God doth indeed promise those benefits before mentioned, and that is his part of the Covenant. But then we also undertake to perform the several things contained in this vow of Baptism, and that is our part of it, and unless we do indeed perform them, God is not tied to make good his, and so we forfeit all those precious benefits and advantages, we are left in that natural and miserable estate of ours, children of wrath, enemies to God, and heirs of eternal damnation. And now what can be the pleasure that any or all sins can afford us that can make us the least degree of recompense for such a loss, the loss of God's favor and grace here, and the loss of our own souls hereafter? for as our Savior saith, Mark 8. 36. What shall it profit a man if he shall gain the whole world and lose his own soul? yet this mad bargain we make when ever we break any part of this our vow of Baptism. It therefore most nearly concerns us to consider sadly of it, to remember that every sin we commit is a direct breach of this vow, and therefore when thou art tempted to any sin, seem it never so light, say not of it as Lot did of Zoar, Gen. 6. 20. Is it not a little one? but consider that what ever it is, thou hast in thy Baptism vowed against it, and then be it never so little it draws a great one at the heels of it, no less then that of being forsworn, which whoever commits, God hath in the third Commandment pronounced, He will not hold him guiltless. And that we may the better keep this vow, it will be very useful often to repeat to ourselves the several branches of it, that so we may still have it ready in our minds to set against all temptations; and surely it is so excellent a weapon, that if we do not either cast it aside, or use it very negligently, it will enable us, by God's help, to put to flight our spiritual adversary. And this is that reverence we are to pay to this first Sacrament, that of Baptism.

PARTITION III. Of the LORD'S SUPPER, of Preparation before, of Duties to be done at the Receiving and afterwards, &c.

§. 1. NOW follows the Reverence due to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper; and in this I must follow my first division, and set down first, what is to be done before; secondly, at, and thirdly, after the time of receiving; for in this Sacrament we cannot be excused from any one of these, though in the former we are.

2. And first, for that which is to be done before, S. Paul tells us it is examination, 1 Cor. 11. 28. But let a man examine himself, and so let him eat of that bread and drink of that cup. But before I proceed to the particulars of this Examination, I must in the general tell you, that the special business we have to do in this Sacrament, is to repeat and renew that Covenant we make with God in our Baptism, which we having many ways grievously broken, it pleases God in his great mercy to suffer us to come to the renewing of it in this Sacrament, which if we do in sincerity of heart, he hath promised to accept us, and to give us all those benefits in this, which he was ready to bestow in the other Sacrament, if we had not by our own fault forfeited them. Since then the renewing of our Covenant is our business of this time, it follows that these three things are necessary towards it: First, that we understand what that Covenant is; Secondly, that we consider, what our breaches of it have been; and Thirdly, that we resolve upon a strict observance of it, for the rest of our life. And the trying ourselves in everyone of these particulars is that Examination which is required of us before we come to this Sacrament.

3. And first, we are to examine whether we understand what this Covenant is; this is exceeding necessary, as being the foundation of both the other, for it is neither possible to discover our past sins, nor to settle purposes against them for the future without it. Let this therefore be your first business, Try whether you rightly understand what that Covenant is which you entered into at your Baptism, what be the Mercies promised on God's part, and the duties on yours. And because the Covenant made with each of us in Baptism is only the applying to our particulars, the Covenant made by God in Christ with all mankind in general, you are to consider whether you understand that; if you do not, you must immediately seek for instruction in it. And till you have means of gaining better, look over what is briefly said in the entrance to this Treatise, concerning the SECOND COVENANT, which is the foundation of that Covenant which God makes with us in our Baptism. And because you will there find, that obedience to all God's Commands is the condition required of us, and is also that which we expressly Vow in our Baptism, it is necessary you should likewise know what those Commands of God are. Therefore if you find you are ignorant of them, never be at rest till you have got yourself instructed in them, and have gained such a measure of knowledge as may direct you to do that Whole Duty of Man which God requires. And the giving thee this instruction is the only aim of This Book, which the more ignorant thou art, the more earnestly I shall entreat thee diligently to read. And if thou hast heretofore approacht to this Holy Sacrament in utter ignorance of these necessary things, bewail thy sin in so doing, but presume not to come again till thou have by gaining this necessary knowledge fitted thyself for it, which thou must hasten to do. For though no man must come to the Sacrament in such ignorance, yet if he willfully continue in it, that will be no excúse to him for keeping from this holy Table.

4. The second part of our Examination is, concerning our breaches of this Covenant; and here thou wilt find the use of that knowledge I spake of. For there is no way of discovering what our sins have been, but by trying our actions by that which should be the rule of them, the Law of God. When therefore thou settest to this part of Examination, remember what are the several branches of thy duty, and then ask thy own heart in every particular, how thou hast performed it. And content not thyself with knowing in general, that thou hast broken God's Law, but do thy utmost to discover in what particulars thou hast done so. Recall, as well as thou canst, all the passages of thy life, and in each of them consider what part of that duty hath been transgressed by it. And that not only in the grosser act, but in word also, nay, even in thy most secret thoughts: For though man's Law reaches not to them, yet God's doth; so that whatever he forbids in the act he forbids likewise in the thoughts and desires, and sees them as clearly as our most public acts. This particular search is exceeding necessary; for there is no promise of forgiveness of any sin but only to him that confesseth and forsaketh it. Now to both these it is necessary that we have a direct and particular knowledge of our sins. For how can he either confess his Sin, that knows not his guilt of it? or how can he resolve to forsake it, that discerns not himself to have formerly cleaved to it? Therefore we may surely conclude, that this Examination is not only useful but necessary towards a full and complete repentance; for he that does not take this particular view of his sins, will be likely to repent but by  $\langle \phi \rangle$  which will never avail him towards his pardon; nothing but an entire forsaking of every evil way, being sufficient for that. But surely of all other times it concerns us, that when we come to the Sacrament our repentance be full and complete; and therefore this strict search of our own hearts is then especially necessary. For although it be true, that it is not possible by all our diligence to discover or remember every sin of our whole lives: and though it be also true, that what is so unavoidably hid from us, may be forgiven without anymore particular confession then that of David's, Psal. 19. 12. Cleanse thou me from my secret faults; Yet this will be no plea for us if they come to be secret only because we are negligent in searching. Therefore take heed of deceiving thyself in this weighty business, but search thy soul to the bottom, without which it is impossible that the wounds thereof should ever be thoroughly cured.

5. And as you are to enquire thus narrowly concerning the several sorts of sins, so also must you concerning the degrees of them, for there are divers circumstances which increase and heighten the sin. Of this sort there are many, as first, when we sin against knowledge, that is, when we certainly know such a thing to be a sin, yet for the present pleasure or profit (or whatever other motive) adventure of it. This is by Christ himself adjudged to be a great heightening of the sin. He that knows his Masters will and doth it not, shall be beaten with many stripes, Luke 12. 47. Secondly, when we sin with deliberation, that is, when we do not fall into it of a sudden ere we are aware, but have time to consider of it, this is another degree of the sin. But thirdly, a yet higher is, when we do it against the resistances and checks of our own conscience, when that at the time tells us, This thing thou oughtest not to do: Nay, lays before us the danger as well as the sin of it, yet in spite of these admonitions of conscience we go on and commit the sin; this is a huge increase of it, such as will raise the least sin into a most high provocation. For it is plain, a sin thus committed must be a willful one, and then be the matter of it never so light it is most heinous in God's eyes. Nay, this is a circumstance of such force, that it may make an indifferent action, that is in itself no sin, become one. For though my conscience should err in telling me such a thing were unlawful, yet so long as I were so persuaded, it were sin for me to do that thing; for in that case my Will consents to the doing a thing which I believe to be displeasing to God, and God (who judges us by our wills, not understandings) imputes it to me as a sin as well as if the thing were in itself unlawful, and therefore surely we may conclude, that anything which is in itself sinful, is made much more so by being committed against the checks of conscience. A fourth aggravation of a sin, is, when it hath been often repeated, for then there is not only the guilt of so many more acts, but every Act grows also so much worse, and more inexcusable. We always judge thus in faults committed against our selves, we can forgive a single injury more easily then the same when it hath been repeated, and the oftener it hath been so repeated, the more heinous we account it. And so surely it is in faults against God also. Fifthly, the sins which have been committed after vows and Resolutions of amendment are yet more grievous; for that contains also the breaking of those promises. Somewhat of this there is in every wilful sin, because every such is a breach of that vow we make at Baptism. But besides that, we have since bound ourselves by new vows, if at no other time, yet surely at our coming to the Lord's Supper, that being (as was formerly said) purposely to repeat our vow of Baptism. And the more of these vows we have made, so much the greater is our guilt, if we fall back to any sin we then renounced. This is a thing very well worth weighing, and therefore examine thyself particularly at thy approach to the Sacrament concerning thy breaches of former vows made at the Holy Table.

And if upon any other occasion, as sickness, trouble of mind, or the like, thou hast at any time made any other, call thyself to a strict account how thou hast performed them also, and remember that every sin committed against such vows, is besides its own natural guilt a Perjury likewise. Sixthly, a yet higher step is, when a sin hath been so often committed that we are come to a custom and habit of it: and that is indeed a high degree.

6. Yet even of Habits some are worse then others, as first, if it be so confirmed that we are come to a hardness of heart, have no sense at all of the sin: Or, secondly, if we go on in it against any extraordinary means used by God to reform us, such as sickness, or any other affliction which seems to be sent on purpose for our reclaiming. Or thirdly, if all Reproofs and Exhortations either of Ministers or private friends work not on us, but either make us angry at our reprovers, or sets us on defending the sin. Or lastly, if this sinful habit be so strong in us as to give us a love to the sin, not only in ourselves but in others, if, as the Apostle saith, Rom. 1. 31. We do not only do the things, but take pleasure in them that do them, and therefore entice and draw as many as we can into the same sins with us: Then it is risen to the highest step of wickedness, and is to be looked on as the utmost degree both of sin and danger. Thus you see how you are to examine yourselves concerning your sins, in each of which you are to consider how many of these heightening circumstances there have been, that so you may aright measure the heinousness of them.

7. Now the end of this Examination is, to bring you to such a sight of your sins, as may truly humble you, make you sensible of your own danger, that have provoked so great a Majesty, who is able so sadly to revenge himself upon you. And that will surely even to the most carnal heart appear a reasonable ground of sorrow. But that is not all, it must likewise bring you to a sense and abhorrence of your baseness, and ingratitude, that have thus offended so good and gracious a God, that have made such unworthy and unkind returns to those tender and rich mercies of his. And this consideration especially must melt your hearts into a deep sorrow and contrition, the degree whereof must be in some measure answerable to the degree of your sins. And the greater it is, provided it be not such as shuts up the hope of God's Mercy, the more acceptable it is to God, who hath promised not to despise a broken and contrite heart, Psalms 51. 17. And the more likely it will be also to bring us to amendment: For if we have once felt what the smart of a wounded Spirit is, we shall have the less mind to venture upon sin again.

8. For when we are tempted with any of the short pleasures of sin, we may then out of our own experience set against them the sharp pains and terrors of an accusing conscience, which will to any that hath felt them be able infinitely to outweigh them. Endeavour therefore to bring your souls to this melting temper, to this deep unfeigned sorrow, and that not only for the danger you have brought upon yourself; for though that be a consideration which may & ought to work sadness in us, yet where that alone is the motive of our sorrow, it is not that sorrow which will avail us for pardon; and the reason of it is clear, for that sorrow proceeds only from the love of ourselves, we are sorry because we are like to smart. But the sorrow of a true penitent must be joined also with the love of God, and that will make us grieve for having offended him, though there were no punishment to fall upon ourselves. The way then to stir

