The reasons rendered by the Defendant, for the Nicene prohibition of keeping Easter as the Jews, are three: 1. Hatred of the Jews. 2. Because of the Jews insultations. 3. For uniformity. Of the last, it was Replied, that uniformity might have been, if all could have been drawn to the same time with the Jews. Which the Rejoinder confesseth to be true, if they could have been drawn thereto as well. Where 1. He taketh it for granted, that all were well drawn to the time determined; the contrary whereof appeareth, as in others, so in our ancient Britons. 2. Well or ill, that is, easily or hardly, these make no difference in uniformity, but only in the means of accomplishing the same. The other two reasons are said by the Replier, to agree unto our Ceremonies; because we are to hate the Idolatrous superstitions of the Papists, with a perfect hatred; and the Papists insult over us, for borrowing our Ceremonies from them. About this (because it could not be denied) the Rejoinder spendeth many words and phrazes, partly Rhetorically good, and partly Morally not good; which I leave as I found: because there is no doing with them, but in great leisure, or in idle time.

In the conclusion, it was asked by the Replier, for what causes many other Ceremonies of the Papists were abolished, if not for these two last named? or if the same causes that abolished them, would not sweep away these, if it pleased them who have the bezoms in their hand? About this the Rejoinder first, referreth the Reader to a preface set before the Service-book, and I am contented he should seek if he can find any such reasons there. Secondly, he addeth, that we which have not the bezome in our hands, should not shuffle abroad the dust with our feet. No more do we (say I) but only keep it out of our eyes, and throats, so well as we can, giving reasons, why the Sweepers should not thrust it upon us, nor us for it out of the doors

11. About the Gangrene forbidding fasting upon the Lord's-Day, many words are spent by the Rejoinder. The sum is, that such fasting is there spoken of, as was performed out of an H•reticall opinion, either of necessity so to do, or of contempt of the Lord's-Day. But this cannot be proved. For there being divers different editions of that Council, none of them mention opinion of necessity: and in the ordinary greek copy, there is neither contempt, nor contumacy, named, as Binius noteth. Beside, opinions and contempts, as they are inward, cannot be noted by the Church. If they were outward, in word; then not so much the fasting upon opinion, as the opinion it self, was to be condemned. If the act it self was taken for a manifestation of such an opinion, that is it which we urge As for that accusation which is laid upon the Replier, for relating the Defendant his answer, so as if he had referred the matter unto contempt of Christian profession, that is removed by the Defendant his own words, related by the Rejoinder, pag. 521. Contempt, to wit, of the Christian profession. See before, in Melchiades his decree.

12. The Council of Bracara, forbad abstinence from flesh, for avoiding of all suspicion in consenting to the Priscillian Heretics. This (saith the Rejoinder) was in respect of inexpediency only. Let it be so: yet 1. They that forbad it, held it not lawful to be commanded, as our Ceremonies are. 2. Inexpediencie, or inconveniency of Ceremonies notoriously known to be Idolatrously abused, maketh them unlawful, by the Defendant and Rejoinder their own confessions, in the first section of this chapter: where convenient necessity is required, to make them lawful.

13. Thrice dipping in Baptism, was condemned, by a Council of Toledo. It was added in the Abridgement, that Gregory alleged and approved this decree: and the Replier, named Leo instead of Gregory. Here the Rejoinder catcheth hold of the names of Gregory, and Leo, and findeth matter for many words, in the account of their lives, not agreeing to the fourth Council of Toledo, where this was decreed. Now the Replier was (through haste) mistaken, as understanding the first Council of that place, for the fourth: and the Authors of the Abridgement, or their Scribes pen, misplaced the word alledged: because the Council doeth allege Gregory, and not Gregory the Council: Let that manner be held, which Gregory the first defined. These are not stragglng Soldiers, such as formerly were taken from the Defendant as the Rejoinder spake, but Soldiers boys, or Bedees, upon whom little or nothing dependeth in the bartell. Let them therefore go; or by exchange be dismissed. Gregory hath the same sentence, lib. 1. Epist. 41. and therefore approved the decree of Toledo, before it was there decreed. For real answer, it is rejoined, 1. That all things forbidden, are not condemned at unlawful. But yet (by his leave) whatsoever is forbidden lawfully, and reasonably, is held unlawful upon some reason; and therefore so far condemned for unlawful, as it is lawfully forbidden. Certainly, in Laws, forbidding doeth as well imply some unlawful evil, as commanding doeth necessary good. 2. The Rejoinder denieth the Papist to make any superstitious construction of our use of the Cross. But this is plain enough: and it cometh after to be handled, yet in this place it is enough, if they make a superstitious construction of the Cross, which we make use of, though not of our use, which the Rejoinder addeth, that he might with some color accuse the assertion of falsehood. More was not, nor needed be affirmed by the Replier, in this point. 3. He pronounceth it a malevolent calumnation, that our own Canons, and Canonical Imposters make a superstitious construction of it. But this hath been proved before, especially in the second Argument, where it hath been convinced of will-worship. 4. He formeth a new proposition; and thereupon girdeth at sitting in the Lord's-Supper: which is not worth the answering. All the rest of his words turn upon the loose hingel of inconveniency without any unlawfulness, now often confuted. This therefore shall suffice for this testimony; and so I end, the head of Fathers, and Councils. For Leo's words, make not directly to the purpose.

Concerning Protestant Divines.

This head was passed over by the Defendant, but the Rejoinder undertaketh to clear it: wherein, either his skill, or his confidence, must needs occasion wondering.

1. The general Assembly of Scotland (anno. 1566.) writ thus to the Bishops of England. If Surplice, Corner-Cap, and Tippet, have been badges of Idolaters, in the very act of Idolatry, what have the Preachers of Christian liberty, and the open Rebukers of superstition, to do with the dregs of the Romish Beast? And in their Confession: We detest all the Ceremonies and false doctrine of the Romish Antichrist, added to the ministration of the true Sacraments: we detest all his vain Allegories, Rites, Signs, and Traditions, brought into the Church without, or against the Word of God. To the former testimony, the Rejoinder answereth 1. That these words are not the definitive judgment of the Assembly, but only spoken as the Plea of some tender-hearted men, which suffered for refusal of those things. Now if this were so as the Rejoinder maketh it, yet this we may gather from thence; that the Plea of many godly ministers of England, in those days, was, that our Ceremonies are unlawful. For so it is there said: many thousands, both godly, and learned, have their consciences continually stricken, with these sentences: what hath Christ to do with Belial? what fellowship is there betwixt darkness and light? &c. in the words formerly cited. What meant the Rejoinder then, to persuade his Readers, in his Preface, and upon all occasions, that our Ceremonies were not by Non-Conformists held unlawful, but only inconvenient, until of late? If nothing else can, yet this his own (not confession, but) peremptory answer, may so convince him, that he must acknowledge his accusing of us, as dissenting therein from the first seekers of reformation, in the Ceremonies, and so the occasion of his bitter writing, is a mere conceit, built up by desire of putting some color upon that, which, nakedly beheld, would be offensive. Observe further, that a definitive judgment, is vainly here denied, where it was never sought for. The Ministers of England did not send into Scotland, for a definitive sentence, concerning the use or abuse of things in England. Neither were they of Scotland so simple, as to take that authority of defining upon them. But for their advizing judgment, is plain enough to all that read their words with any indifferency. They were not ignorant of our English question: there were among them, that had been at Frankford, as M^r. Knoxe, M^r. Good-man, &c. They did not so far forget themselves, as to send allegations in other men's names, into England, to be admitted there, which themselves did not allow of. Beside, they directly call them unprofitable vain trifles. Yea (saith the Rejoinder) but they disclaim the very question; they supposed the refusers of the Ceremonies, not to damn the consciences of the users: and call them vain trifles in comparison of preaching the Gospel. They disclaim indeed professed entering into the ground of that question, as mediators use to do, but yet insinuate their judgment of it. Ceremonies may be damned, though the consciences of all that use them, be not condemned. Vnprofitable vain trifles, found not of comparison. Neither is there anything in the letter, that gives any inkling of such a limitation.

To the second testimony, taken out of the Scottish Confession, the Rejoinder answereth 1. that it respecteth all Ceremonies, as they were Antichrists, formally, and not all materialy. After which manner, it is easy to answer any testimonie that ever was alleged. For in the Confession, there is no difference made betwixt all, and some; neither can the Rejoinder give any apparent reason of his formal interpretation; and it is well known, that the very material Popish Ceremonies were then detested by M^r. Knoxe, with those that agreed unto his direction, as they also have been, ever since the Reformation, abhorred generally in Scotland, until of late, when that which one of them calleth an Altar of Damascus, came into that Country.

The Rejoinder his 2. answer is, that they of the Assembly professed, what liked them best in Scotland; not what they thought others bound to do; as appeareth by our late King James, the chief of them. But before this can stand, it must be shown, in what Synod, we detest, is taken, for we like not so well in our Country; and then, how the after-interpretation of one, who was then but fifteen years old, can over-sway the common interpretation of the whole Church?

2. Oecolampadius requireth a Minister of Scaphusium (Epist. 1. lib. 1. pag. 129.) utterly to cast off all the Ceremonies of the Papists, in celebration of the Lord's Supper, as those which cannot be continued, without nourishing of the superstition and impiety, whereunto they served of old. The Rejoinder answereth 1. That this was not Oecolampadius his own advise, but that which some others would have had him given. But he propounding it, and only excusing himself modestly that he was slow in put on others so far (insinuating that though he himself was so resolved, yet he durst not urge others thereto, and therefore only requireth conveniency without offense, sufficiently testifieth his allowance of that advise. And who (think you) were the Authors of that advise, but Zwingli &c. He 2. addeth, out of divers Epistles, that Oecolampadius would not have all that country tie themselves in Ceremonies, to Basil, Tigure, or Bern that he hold gold, silver, glass, or wooden vessels in administration of the Sacrament, indifferent. As if any of us were of another mind this is a mere color of something, where nothing is to be found.

In the third place, he showeth, how Oecolampadius, allowed of the terms of Sacrifice, Altar, and omitted no wonted Ceremonies, but only the latin tongue, in reading the Epistle, and Gospel. But if the Rejoinder had considered, that terms are no Ceremonies; and that Oecolampadius allowed and Practised this last mentioned imperfect reformation, when he was (in comparison) but a Novice in religion, before he came to Basil, he would not have so exulted in this quotation, as he doeth: The Abridgers (saith he) never (I think) read Oecolampadius his Epistles. But he hath no just reason to think, but some of them had read those Epistles; unless he can show from whence else they had this testimony. I have read them long since, and remember well, that to be true which now I said. How it stood at Basil, with Popish Ceremonies, when Oecolampadius was Minister there, it appeareth out of Zwingli, his Fellow-Minister (de Baptismo) in these words, worthy to be recited, though somewhat too large for this place: I will easily grant the Catabaptists, and confess, that the strife which they made about Baptism, hath not been altogether without benefit: For hence it comes to pass, that those things which the foolish superstition of human reason had added thereunto (as Exorcismes, Spittings, Salt, and such like more) being brought into question, are now become vain & unprofitable in every man's judgment. We deny not but we received those things from our Fathers. — Howsoever it is evident they were not of God, but set up of man; which also it may be, (consideration had to that time) might have been borne; because that as the Israelites heretofore affected with a desire of Egypt, looked back to the delicacies thereof, so they which lately are come over to Christ, were a little propence and prone to Heathenish religion, which continued many such rites. And these, Christian men were wont to turn into other use, that they might in time the better be freed from that superstition. But how much better had it been, if all and every of those things had been abolished at the first.

3. Concerning Calvin, I say, as the Rejoinder saith, that which is alleged out of him, hath sufficiently been handled before. As for the new addition, which the Rejoinder here bringeth, as making against us (that gold and silver, come and wine, and useful meeting places, may be retained, after Idolatrous abuse of them) he knoweth, and all the world knoweth, it maketh nothing for such Ceremonies as ours are; nor anything against us, who continually profess the same truth. Except he meant to abuse the Reader, I know not wherefore he should bring in such impertinent allegations.

4. M^r. Bucer was alleged (in the Abridgement) as scarce esteeming them sincere Christians, who can abide the Ceremonies of Antichrist, or such as have affinity with his. The Rejoinder opposeth other places, where he speaketh for a toleration of some such Ceremonies. Neither of these allegations can be denied. What then shall we say? surely 1. That Bucer though he was a reverend zealous man, yet he was a man; and so shown himself sometime about Ceremonies. So Calvin observed, Epist. 13. Bucer was so zealous for the propagation of the Gospel, that contented with the main, he was sometime more remiss then was meet, in allowing petty matters as he took them, but yet for all that, they had their weight. To the same purpose he gently admonisheth Bucer himself, even concerning the matters of England, Epist. 39. This by name I commend to thee, by all means to free thyself from envy, under which thou sufferest (though unjustly) among many, as thou thyself knowest. For they still tax you by middle dealing, to be either Author or Abettour. And according to this observation, we find, that Cassander, and Baldwine, writing against Calvin himself, about Ceremonies, oppose unto him everywhere the name of Bucer. 2 It is to be noted, that when Bucer looked simply to his Rule, he condemned all ceremonious relics of Idolatry as much as any: but in some particular perplexity, other impressions did sometime draw him to an unwilling toleration of some such relics. But then he doeth it so fearfully, and with so many cautions, that any may see, it was but a suspensive sentence of toleration, extorted by a kind of necessity, not any allowance, out of constant judgment. Thus Beza in his Answer to Baldwine, who alleged Bucer's allowance of our English Ceremonies, answereth: As for that English reformation, which you ascribe to Bucer you do the good man not a little wrong. To manifest this, he allegeth these words of Bucer: There be who with the leaven of Antichrist, would join together God and Belial.

All these things considered, that which Bucer spake against such Ceremonies, is to be taken for his judgment: and when he occasionally varied therfrom, that is to be imputed unto his good, but excessive affection.

5. The words cited out of Musculus (loc. come. de Trad. pag. 421.422.) are: It is not fit, that those things which are rather superstitious, then religious, or have so much as a show of superstition, should be retained in the Church. God forbid, that I should maintain any traditions, Rites, or worships, which are Popish. And I call them Popish, which either of their own nature or by abuse, do serve unto Popish impiety, superstition, and blindness: all which I am persuaded ought to be detested, as much as is possible. Now mark the Rejoinder his answer: 1. He saith, Musculus showeth only what is meet, not what is unlawful. This he gathereth out of the first words: it is not fit. But first, may things not meet, be appointed, and urged, as our Ceremonies are? Secondly, Musculus speaketh of such things as he holdeth unlawful to maintaine: God forbid that I should maintain them. 1. Would he then have maintained our Ceremonies (as the Def. and Rej. do) sometime as lawful though unmet, and sometime as meet, and of convenient necessity? Thirdly, he speaketh of such things as are to be detested as much as is possible: are they lawful? 2. The Rejoinder addeth, that Musculus speaketh of such human traditions, as had been formerly under abuse, but were now reduced to another use. In which words, (if they be right printed) he maketh Musculus to speak as directly against our Ceremonies, according to his own interpretation, as the Abridgement doeth. If not be left out by the Printer, then he may be convinced by those words of Musculus: so much as a show of superstition.

But (saith he) our Ceremonies considered as Ceremonies, (otherwise then in their materials) have no outward show of Popish superstition, which consisteth only in the reason and intention of their use. As if either outward show, or outward superstition, consisted only in inward intention! Such miserable answers have at the least, an outward show of no sincere intention. His 3. answer is, that Musculus speaketh of such traditions as in their present, and public professed use were Popish. He doeth not indeed exclude such out of his censure: but if he spake only of such, what need was there, that he should so carefully interpret what he called Popish traditions? or what meant he in his description of them, to leave out present public professed use, and use such words, as every ordinary impartial Reader must needs take to be more general?

6. P. Martyr giveth for a Rule, to the Ministers of Poland, that such order in the administration of Sacraments, is to be kept, as differeth most from the toys and Ceremonies of Papists. It is an excellent Rule (saith the Rejoinder) but he said not, that human Ceremonies abused unto superstition, in Popery, are now unlawful for us to use. As if he that saith, we ought to keep that order which differeth most from Popish toys and Ceremonies, did not say, we ought not to use Popish Ceremonies! He speaketh (without question) of an internal ought, or sic oportet, which the Rejoinder (pag. 492.) confesseth to bind the conscience.

The same P. Martyr saith: Certainly, if we did from the heart hate superstition, we would do our endeavor, clean to put out and deface all the footsteps, and monuments thereof. He spake this (answereth the Rejoinder) when Missalattire, Altars, and Crucifixes, were as yet remaining. Now for Missal attire, I know none then remaining, which remaineth not now. Altars also have ever since remained in diverse Churches, and are now (for countenance of other Ceremonies) coming up again where they were abolished, with an Idolatrous addition of bowing unto them. Crucifixes will soon follow, and that by good right, if the Defender and Rejo. their grounds be good. For the doctrine being changed, and the materials only of Popish Crucifixes remaining, what can be said, to make them simply unlawful? And for their conveniency, who may judge of that, but those that have authority of praescribing and imposing matters of order and decency? But to let that pass, P. Martyr spoke of that time, when he supposed the doctrine reformed; and manifestly riseth in his discourse, from those specials, to the general to all footsteps of superstition, and not those only. But (saith the Rejoinder) the same P. Martyr professeth, no separation would be made for such matters. He saith so in deed of the Surplice, pag. 1127. and so say we; especially upon the same condition, that we may be suffered to abrogate them for our own practice: Ferremus, nobis gratulando quod ease abrogaverimus. To this the Rejoinder addeth diverse sentences of P. Martyrs, somewhat favoring a toleration (for a time) of our Ceremonies, especially in M. Hoopers case. To which I answer 1. that this was in perplexity, caused by the mischief of our Ceremonies, which are therefore so much the more to be hated, even that they have always bred such trouble unto good men, who should have troubles enough, though they were abolished. Quaestions of this kind, are to us somewhat difficult. There is somewhat more hard I confess, of those garments they call holy, & which somewhat troubleth me, that I woe'd•r they are so strictly retained. He himself refused to wear the Surplice, and that upon such ground as may move us to refuse it, as he professeth: When I was at Oxford, I would never use those white •arments in the Choir, though I were at that time a Canon. •had a reason for it. But that which moved me then and •ill doeth move, and perhaps may justly move you, is name•y; that, that is not to be d•n, which sh•ll confirm, what my •onscience cannot allow of. 3. He telleth us plainly, •hat these Ceremonies are merae Papatus reliquiae, mere Popish relics condemned by Bullinger, and that he was, upon hope of their abolishing, only tardior ad suadendum, loath to persuade unto suffering of deprivation for h•m. All these things are found in the places quoted by the Rejoinder. Let any indifferent reader guess by •hem, what was P. Martyrs judgment, in his free, and •nperplexed thoughts? Certainly it was not that which •he Defender and Rejoinder have rep•aesented unto us •or theirs; who accuse all those (beside o•her faults, many, and great) of •uperstition that refuse them as unlawful; they being Rites both orderly and also decent.

7. Beza's words are: that the footsteps of Idolatry ought not to appear in the Church, but to be utterly banish•d. The Rejoinder answereth 1. that this toucheth not our Ceremonies, in Beza's judgment, Epist. 12. It touched our Ceremonies in the eyght Epistle of Beza; but not in his twelf: what difference was there betwixt these two Epistles? Only this: in the former, he writ to a Bishop, and so showeth him the foulness of our Ceremonies plainly; but in the later, he speaketh to poor Ministers, persecuted for those Ceremonies, whose great affliction, with the Churches detriment, made him to conceal some part of his judgment.

Yet in that twelfth Ep. he insinuateth the same judgment of our Ceremonies: They which began to hate superstitions so far as to curse their footsteps; how greatly are they offended?

There is yet fresh superstition of the sign of the Cross, most detestable. They therefore have done wonderful well, who have once banished that rite out of the Church, whereof for our parts we see no good. Because by kneeling at receiving, it sprung that most abominable Bread-worship, and still cleaving to the minds of many, is worthily abolished.

The Rejoinder noteth 2. that in Beza's judgment, many things may and must be tolerated, which are not rightly imposed. Which is true: but 1. let it be then openly confessed by the Rejoinder, that our Ceremonies are not rightly imposed, before he abuse this rule. 2. Let him tell us, if approving by subscription, and use, be a mere toleration? 3. The same Beza telleth us: Tolerant quaedam putamus quae omnino ferri non debent. con. Westph. We think somethings may be tolerated, which altogether may not be born.

In the 3. place, it is added by the Rejoinder that Beza saith of some, that retain the Cross, they may use their own liberty. But in the next words he addeth: If they have any just Causes of retaining this sign in their Churches. So that he limiteth that liberty unto such causes as he was not privy to; nay to such as they at Geneva, found to be clean contrary: As for us, we have many necessary reasons why we do no way tolerat that sign. & their causes, alleged in the 8. Epistle, were not peculiar to any time or place, but pertain as well to England, as to Geneva. So that this was but to stop a Papists mouth, with using of gentle words, and suppositions concerning our unwarrantable course. Of the surplice he speaketh sometime more indifferently: but in the same places, he will have it not subscribed to, not defended, or rejoined for, but by all means hastened out of the Church, as a ridiculous stage-play garment, or a Foolescoat.

8. Many other Divines were named, as Zanchius, Pezelius, Mollerus, Zegedinus, Daneus, Machabeus, Zepperus, Wigandus, and Sadeel; but their words not cited, except only Sadeels, for avoiding of unnecessary tediousness, they all speaking to the same purpose with the former. The Rejoinder hath one general answer for diverse of these; that they allowed some human Feasts, which have been abused to Superstition. Now though this be no direct answer, and the Authors may in part forget their own general rule, in some particular; yet this may be further said; that they accounted not these Feast-days such kind of Ceremonies, as we speak of. This appeareth in Zepper, who put them under the head of Order, cap. 13. whereas he handleth the Cross under the head of Sacramental Ceremonies, cap. 10. In particular, 1. Daneus and Zegedinus (saith the Rejoinder) speak not to our purpose. Daneus I have not at hand: but Zegedine in his tables of Baptism, calleth them Popish additions, by which Baptism is profaned. 2. Zanchius judgment hath been shown. Namely that it was contrary to all such Ceremonies.

And this doeth abundantly appear out of his Epist. to Q. Elizabeth, printed before, in English. 3. Zepper alloweth the ancient use of the Surplice. If he did, therein he should not have crossed his rule given, cap. 10. reg. 4. out of the Scriptures, at least in his opinion, except he judged the Surplice before that ancient use to have been notoriously abused unto Idolatry. But the truth is, Zepper doeth but comparatively excuse a supposed ancient use of that garment, which in ancient times was not known, but as a civil habit, usual in hot countries. 4. Wigandus (saith the Rejoinder) was Illyricus his associat in the furious opposition of the Surplice. Whereas the truth is, Illyricus himself did not furiously oppose, but use the Surplice, as Calvin testifieth, Epist. 117.

5. Sadeels words are: We reject whatsoever remaineth in the Church of Rome, which came either from Jews, or Pagans. The Rejoinder answereth, that Sadeel showeth what Ceremonies the Refor. Churches of France did reject; but not what were necessarily to be rejected of all Churches: He useth also the limitation of Jewish and Paganish Ceremonies. But he clean mistaketh Sadeels meaning: Jewish and Paganish, are no words of limitation, but of explication by way of reason. Our use of his testimony is 1. thus: Whatsoever Ceremonies they of France have rejected, are in Sadeels judgment Jewish or Heathenish, which can have no lawful use in God's worship. But the Churches of France have rejected our Ceremonies in controversy. Ergo. 2. Thus: If Jewish and Heathenish Ceremonies are to be rejected; then Popish also, they being in their nature, or kind, Jewish, and having evermore been notoriously abused unto Popish Idolatry.

9. M. Rogers, Martyr, in King Edwards days, would not consent to conformity in Cap, and Tippet, unless the Papists might be constrained to wear upon their sleeves a Chalice and Hoast. True (answereth the Rejoinder 1.) but other good Martyrs did. Therfor (say I) not they, but M. Rogers was alleged. Yet beside zealous Hooper, with whom after Ridly and others agreed, Heavenly M. Bradford might have been added, who in his letters to Erkinald Rawlins, calleth forked caps, and tippers, Antichristian pelse and baggage. He 2. answereth, that the question was for inconveniency, not unlawfulness. But he knoweth well, that M. Hooper, and so (in all likelihood) M. Rogers stood upon such inconveniency, as in their learning was unlawfulness.

His 3. and 4. answer is of different intentions, in the same materials. But this was in King Edwards days, by all professed: and yet M. Rogers and such could not see it sufficient. 5. M. Rogers would (saith the Rejoinder) allow the same things with some mark of difference. Not allow, but tolerate; not upon every mark of difference, but such as he knew would never be consented unto; that is, not at all.

10. Public injunctions were wont to forbid all Monuments of Superstition; and the Canons 1571. did forbid the gray Amice, and all other garments defiled with like superstition. Therfor (saith the Rejoinder 1.) they did not take our Ceremonies for such Monuments. But that is nothing to the Proposition: Neither yet maketh it much to the Assumption of this Argument, what these or those did then take our Ceremonies to be. What they are in deed, we shall see in the Assumption. He 2. allegeth, that the Surplice was none of the Missal garments, as the Amice. But first Bellarmino, whom the Rejoinder made (of late) the Canon of Missal garments, maketh no more mention of the Amice, then of the Surplice. Durand, or G. Minatensis, Rational. lib. 3. cap. 1. saith, In some things about the Altar they must use the Surplice. Steven Mephem. cap Linteam. No clarck may be suffered about the Service of the Altar, unless he have the Surplice on at Mass. 3. The Rejoinder addeth, that it is a strong imagination, to think that the very Injunctions, and Canons of this Church, could prove her to judge her own impositions unlawful. Which if he meant of formal particular judgment, it is his own weak imagination; if of general and virtual judging, there is neither strongnesse, nor strangeness in it: because this Church hath no privilege that way above other Churches, of which none were ever found nor can be, imposing anything unlawful, which did not profess that truth, whoe contents did prove that unlawful imposition to be unlawful. D. Morton hath plentifully shown so much of the Popish Church, as the Rejoinder will not deny.

11. B. Jewel was cited, as approving Tertullian's judgment concerning the unlawfulness of Garlands, though not evil of themselves, because they had appearance of evil. Well (saith the Rejoinder) then they were not evil in themselves, by abuse. That is, abuse did not make them evil, before they were abused. which is true. But if B. Jewel allowed Tertullian's judgment (as the Rej. granteth) by the abuse they became evil, and unlawful. Appearance of that which is evil in it self, is evil in it self: but the abuse was evil in it self, and the after use was an appearance of that abuse, in Jewel's judgment. Ergo. It was also alleged out of Jewel's Ap. c. 2. div. 9. that the Papists had so misused sundry Ceremonies, that we may not longer continue them without great conscience. The Rejoinder answereth, 1. That this was spoken of other Ceremonies, not of those in question. 2. That Jewel was a Bishop, and used Episcopal garments. 3. That upon his death-bed, he professed, that he would not grieve any of his brethren, who were of contrary opinion, concerning the Ceremonies. Now 1. If other Ceremonies (among which yet holy Garments were objected by Harding, in that place) may by abuse, become unlawful, what privilege hath the Cross, as much abused as any? 2. As Jewel was a Bishop of England, so Cajetan was a Cardinal of Rome; and therefore as Cajetan condemned many Romish superstitions, in so much as when he died, he refused to be buried in a Church, as the story of his life, prefixed to his Commentaries on Job testifieth, so might B. Jewel condemn some superstitious Ceremonies in England. As for his wearing of Episcopal Garments, let D. Fulke answer in his Repeale of Heskins Parliament, pag. 412. M^r. Heskins girdeth at the proclaimer (B. Jewel) as wearing Aaron's garments for a Bishopric. But if the Popish Priests had no more pleasure to say Mass in their vestiments, then the Proclaimer to minister in Coapes, I think the common sort of Papists would have less devotion to the Masses, the God's people have to the Communion, when it is ministered without any ceremonial attire. 3. Those words which the Rejoinder allegeth out of his Godly speech, a little before his departure, make much against the Rejoinder, because they show 1. That many then opposed our Ceremonies as unlawful, which the Rejoinder denieth. For how else could they more dislike them then Bishop Jewel himself, who held them (by the Rejoinder his confession) very inconvenient? 2. That B. Jewel would not grieve or prejudice those that were so minded, which our Defendant and Rejoinder labor to do with all the strength they have, and all the advantage they can catch hold on. Jewel durst not have called them Superstition brethren, factious and exorbitant men, &c. Moreover, two faults are committed by the Rejoinder, in reciting those words of Jewel: one, that he leaveth out the word padagogia, wherein he accused our Ceremonies as belonging to the infancy of the Jewish Church: and the other, that he took no knowledge of the following words, wherein he accuseth the Pope as the fountain of those evils, which gave cause and occasion of strife, and as it were three bones to the dogs. Where he maketh our Ceremonies relics of Popery, and cause of dissention. Add unto this, that in his Epistle to Q. Elizabeth, before the Defense of his Apologie, he prayeth to God, that she might live to abolish all groves and high places, in England and it will appear how lawful our Ceremonies were in the judgment of that good learned man, as well in his life time, as at the hour of his death.

12. B. Pilkinton said, that it is our fault generally, •hat we differ no more from the Papists, in all our ministry. True (answereth the Rejoinder) but he thought not •hese things to be simply unlawful. As if B. Pilkington had •earned, and taught a distribution of faults in religion, some unlawful, and some lawful faults! It is a new distinction coined since his time.

13. B. Westphaling (with Augustine) peremptorily •ffirmeth, that Jewish Ceremonies cannot be used, no not with an intent differing from that of the Jews, without danger of damnation. We allow this (answereth the Rejoinder) because God hath repealed them; and to use them •ere to call the coming of Christ into question. And is it so great a sin, to use Jewish Ceremonies, without a •ewish intent? How then durst the Defendant and Rej. pag. 285. affirm, that to use some Jewish rite (even Circum•ision it self) without a Jewish opinion, is not damnable? In one, or both of these places, they much forgot themselves. And they that disallow of a Jewish Ceremony, used without a Jewish opinion, how can they allow of a Popish Ceremony, in any use?

14. D. Bilson, alloweth in reformed Churches, that they can by no means digest one dram of Popish Ceremonies. It was well spoken (answereth the Rejoinder) in defense of those Churches which had cast off all the Ceremonies of the Papists, for the consequence sake; but proveth not, that all Churches are bound to do so; or that this Bishop thought so, who used and urged these Ceremontes. Where he would persuade us 1. That our Church can (lawfully) do that, which Reformed Churches cannot by any means do. 2. That whereas Reformed Churches regard the evil consequence of such Ceremonies, ours need not. 3. That Doctor Bilson Warden of Winchester, either did write otherwise then he thought, or else changed his thoughts, when he was risen to be Bishop of Winchester. The judgment of these conjectures I leave to the understanding Reader. We urge only his plain words: V•leant quantum valere-pessint.

15. To Doctor Humphrey, the Rejoinder had nothing to oppose, but that afterwards he did wear the Surplice. Now the truth of this dependeth on the Rej. his hear-say, so far as I know. Yet be it so: doeth not affliction, and poverty, make many a wise man, turn a little aside out of his way? The histories of all ages testify such infirmities to have been found in many Godly and learned. And after-yielding to the Surplice without giving any public reason for it, doeth not argue that he did not formerly hold that (and constantly the other) unlawful, upon those grounds which he hath left in print, unrecalled. I do not believe that there can be so much shown under D. Humphres hand for ou• Ceremonies, as his Epistle, represented in the form Chapter, hath against them.

16. Concerning Doctor Fulke, one sentence of his was alleged, that he which disliketh our form of service, as not differing sufficiently from the Papists, showeth his zeal in detestation of Idolatry. This (saith the Rejoinder) was a charitable excuse of them. The urging then, defending and rejoyning, for our Ceremonies in that manner as now is used, is an uncharitable accusation not agreeable to the mind of Doctor Fulke. A second sentence of the same D.

Fulke, is: We abhor whatsoever hath but a show of Popery. Therefore (concludeth the Rejoinder) he did not judge our Ceremonies to have any show of Popery: Nay rather, therefore he abhorred our Ceremonies. For that of their Popish show, he doubted not, •it appeareth out of divers passages, in his writings: as in his Rejonder to Martial, art. 4. M^r. Calphill answereth well, that the Ceremony of the Cross, once taken up of good intent, being grown into so horrible abuse, is justly refused of us. And art. 5. Although the elder and better age used and received the sign of the Cross tolerably, yet considering the shameful abuse of it, it ought now, of right and conscience, to be condemned. Martial will none of that: for (saith he) things good in their own nature, must not be taken away, or condemned, for the abuse. Very true; but who will grant him, that the sign of the Cross is good of it self? It is as much as may be borne, to grant it a thing indifferent. But (saith the Rejoinder) our Ceremonies Doctor Fulke hath (of my knowledge) used and defended as lawful. Of this knowledge, for his using and defending all our Ceremonies, his writings do constrain me (at the least) to doubt. He was once so far of from using all, that rather than he would use the Surplice, he went out of S^t. John's College, in Cambridge, with his pupils, and hired chambers for himself, and them, in the town: M^r. Travers is my author for this. If afterward he was bowed something by the times, unto a little use of one Ceremony, that he might in some manner, and measure, excuse: but if he had purposed to defend that, and the other Ceremonies, some foot-steps of that defense would be found in his writings, as there are divers of his opposing them. The known truth is, that many good men through the iniquity of the times, have been brought to be distressed, betwixt desire of liberty in the Ministry, and hatred of superstition; so that they have said with the Apostle, I know not which to choose; and so afterward, have given some place unto the later. To judge their persons, it is far from us. We only make use of their free and undistressed judgment.

17. Of D. Andrues, and M^r. Merbury, I have not to say: because their Catechisms I never saw. D. Sutcliffe, though he were a Dean (as the Rejoinder noteth) yet he writ in his latter time, as a Divine, not as a Cathedral man: and so he was cited. His proposition is this: All Ceremonies taken from Jews and Pagans are unlawful. We only add, that Ceremonies taken from Papists, are subject to the like censure; because Popish superstition, or Idolatry, is no more lawful then the other. Of M^r. Greenham, (beside that which hath been often confuted) the Rejoinder saith only, that he did not persuade men against the use of our Ceremonies; and that he was loath to be put unto the solution of that objection: wear the Surplice or preach not. In which there is nothing pertinent. For to give proportionable answers, I myself was present, when an honest Conformist persuaded another not to conform: For (said he) though I have not strength enough to stand out, yet I would not have you that have strength, for to yield. If all should yield, the truth concerning these matters would be buried, and more superstition is to be expected. This was more then not to persuade unto Conformity. And as for the second, I think the Defendant and Rej. would be loath to be put to the solution of this objection: Confess the Ceremonies to be unlawful, or loose your livings, and liberties, with disgrace. Thus (saith the Rej.) I have broken thorough the army of Protestants. That is, just so, as a naked body breaketh thorough a thicket of thorns, getting more gashes, then he made steps for his passage.

SECT. 21. Concerning the Assumption of this fourth Argument: namely, that our Ceremonies are human devises, notoriously known to have been, and still to be abused unto Idolatry and Superstition, by the Papists, and are of no necessary use in the Church.

1. THAT this was the Assumption, or second part of this Argument, no man can doubt, that readeth the Proposition, or former part, set down in the first section of this Chapter, and understandeth the process of reason. The Defendant therefore was blamed, for setting down the Assumption thus: Our Ceremonies have been Idolatrously abused by Papists. The Rejoinder not willing to forsake him in any failing, allegeth 1. That the Defendant took the substance of the Assumption from the Abridgement, and others. Which might indeed have occasioned him to add something unto the Abridgers assumption; but in no wise to detract anything from it: at least, not out of them and others, to patch up a false sylogisme (the whole medium, or third argument, which was used in the proposition, not being repeated in the Assumption) which every pun•e in Logic can put off with a wet finger. He addeth 2. That the clause (of no necessary use) is no part of the Argument, but an exception, answered before. sect. 1. And yet see how he contradicteth himselfe! The Defendant answered it: but it was no part of their Argument. He answered it was a part of the Assumption: If in their exception of things necessary, they mean a convenient necessity, he denies their Assumption. pag. 406. Yet now he denieth that to be any part of the Assumption. The truth is, both the Defendant and Rejoinder, were loath to meddle, (more then of necessity they must) with the convenient necessity of our Ceremonies, least they should evidently either wrong their consciences, or betray their cause. In the 3. place, he denieth him to have omitted these words (human inventions, or devises) saying, that the Replier hath untruly added them: because neither they, nor any like them, are in the Abridgement, pag. 26. or 27. But let him, or any other, look once again upon the Abridgement, in those pages, and he shall see upon the margent, these words: All the Ceremonies in question, are human inventions, &c. After this, he accuseth the Repl. for not observing every word of the Abridgement, in repeating the Assumption: but he could show no sense• changed: let that therefore pass.

2. The Defender his answer to the foresaid Assumption, was by the Replier thus collected: These Ceremonies are either generally, or individually, and numerally the same, that have been abused to Idolatry. If generally, then it hindereth not, but they may still be lawfully used, though they have been so abused: If individually, then it is not true, which is affirmed (in the Assumption) neither doeth it follow from thence, that they must be abolished, because they have been so abused, except they be the same formally, that is, in intention and opinion of those that impose & practice them. For this he is accused by the Rejoinder of doing no justice, but playing a theefes part, who changeth coats with an honest passenger. Now for this, to spare the labor of writing out again many lines, I desire the Reader to look upon the Defender his words as they are reprinted by the Rejoinder himself, pag. 561. & compare them with the Replier his sum. If he can discern any difference, let the Defender be the honest man, and the Replier, what it pleaseth the Rejoinder to make him. No material difference is noted by the Rejoinder but only that the Defender hath not those words (if generally, then it hindereth not, but they may still be lawfully used, though they have been so abused) nor anything which will bear such a collection. To which I oppose those words of the Def. If you take it in the generality, then cannot you justify any one of your Ceremonies, belonging to Order and Decency. For they have been some way abused. Was it not his meaning, to say, that as other Ceremonies of Order, so these in question, if they be only generally the same with those that have been abused, may be justified, that is, lawfully used? Let the Defender hold his own coat: then he cannot so easily escape, without being discerned, as the Rejoinder by changing, would have him. Certainly the Replier did not the evishly take his coat from him nor had he any cause to wish either it to himself, or his to the Defender for any advantage that he might get by that change.

3. Against the foresaid answer, it was opposed, that by this means, any kind of Popish, Jewish, or Heathenish Ceremony, may come in, so there be new particulars, and a new intention used. To which it is rejoined, that though they be not excluded, upon that sole point, of having been abused, yet they may, upon other just exceptions, be shut out. But the Rejoinder should have shown those just exceptions, which remain, after the particular matter, and the evil intention be removed. For according to the Defender and Rejoinder their grounds, I cannot guess, what they should be. The Rejoinder mentioneth dumb, dark, numerous, burthensome, incorrigible, foolish, ridiculous Ceremonies. But all these exceptions have been discussed before: where we have shown that all these virtues are found in our Ceremonies, as well as in Popish, beside numerousnesse, which in this place cannot be applied to the purpose: because the inference was of any kind, not of any number. Dumbnesse in deed is denied to be in significant Ceremonies: but what is there among the Popish Ceremonies, which is not made by Durand of Mystical signification? It is not dark, what men say our Cross doeth signify: but how it can lawfully signify any such thing, is very dark, &c.

4. While the Replier was going on in confutation of the Defender his answer, namely, that in Ceremonies abused to Idolatry, those are not forbidden, which are generally the same, but only the same individuals; the Rejoined. inding that undefensible, out of courtesy, as he saith, seteth up another answer, which he calleth a Faire Mark; amely, that sometime, when the particulars or individuals, hich have been prostituted to Idolatry, may not lawfully be used; yet others of the like kind, may be lawfully used with awful intentions. But this is little courtesy, or fair dealing, when the Repliers arrow was shot, and stuck in he Defender his White, cliving the very Peg of it; to set up another Mark, and then accuse the shooter, that his arrow doeth not stick in this Mark, set up after the shot was made. Beside, this concerneth not our Assumption, which should be the Rejoinder his Mark: because there is nothing in it of human Ceremonies, not necessary.

5. It was replied also, that by the Defender his rule by parity of reason) it might be gathered, that of Ceremonies instituted by Christ, those only are commanded, which he did sanctify in particular. No: (saith he Rejoinder) because in institution of the Sacraments, her was ordained a continuance in the like kind. Do this. And was there not also, in the prohibition of Ceremonies human, Idolatrously abused, ordained a continuance in the like kind, in those words, Deut. 12. thou shalt not do so to the Lord thy God?

6. From the same rule, the Replier said, it may be concluded, that no Popish Ceremonies are Jewish, or Heathenish: because they are not the same individually, or in particular. Not so neither (saith the Rejoinder) because they use Jewish Typical; and others, as still in force by the Jews laws; and Pagan Rites, with the like intention. But 1. The Papists do not use Jewish Typical, as types of Christ yet to come; and therefore according to the Def. and Rej. their sentence, must be excused: because they hold Circumcision it self lawful to Christians, pag. 285. 2. They do not hold any Ceremonial Jewish laws to bind Christians. See Bellarmine, de justification, lib. 4. cap. 6. It is neither good, nor safe, to accuse any beyond their deserts. 3. Likeness of intention, betwixt Pagans and Papists, is such as admitteth much dislikenesse. And such likeness there is betwixt our Ceremonies, and Popish.

7. It was inquired, whether the Scripture, forbidding conformity with Heathen Idolaters, in shaving of heads, and cutting of beards, did mean the same heads and beards only? No: (answereth the Rejoinder) because the like in kind was forbidden. And this is that which the Replier sought. For then by proportionable equity, Ceremonies like in kind to Idolaters, are forbidden to Christians, at this day, and not the same particulars only.

8. Because the Defendant objected, that all circumstances of Order and Decency have been abused to Idolatry; the Rejoinder noted, that this is one advantage he maketh of leaving out of our Assumption, those limitations: Ceremonies devised by man, of no necessary use: because Circumstances of Order, and Decency, are necessary in their kind, and not mere devises of men; Bellarmine himself being Judge, de effect. Sacram. lib. 2. cap. 29. Upon this the Rejoinder having little reason to oppose thereto, after some repetition of confuted shifts, cometh on with a current of words, like a flood from the hills, after a great rain, which carrieth much mud with it. For after some rolling of Circumstances in their particulars, with adding of divers, neither mere circumstances, nor allowed by us, as he supposeth (which make nothing to the purpose) this muddy stuff is found in the valley: The matter comes to this issue: you are the godly men; other reformed Churches are the Churches of Christ, All other men are Carnal, Time-servers, Formalists, that have no conscience, no sincerity, no godly wisdom, no zeal; you are the only men. I cannot devise, what occasion he had of this extraordinary passion, but that he was angry, to see he could not confront reason with reason. In his could blood, I dare say, he will recall these words of distemper, which cannot be fastened upon us, and therefore rebound upon him from whose violence they proceeded.

With more show of reason, he addeth, that for necessity in the kind, a Surplice in the kind of a garment; the Cross, in the kind of admonition to profess the faith; and kneeling, in the kind of a reverent gesture, are as necessary, as any circumstance of Order, and Decency. But this comparison hath been largely confuted in the first part of this Writing, in the head of Ceremonies, &c. Here, it shall suffice to note, that time, place, and such like circumstances, are so manifestly necessary in their kind, that the particulars may be deduced from them, by particular considerations, without any institution: but no man can deduce our Ceremonies from those kinds named. Mans will is the only reason, of them; as God's will is the only reason of Ceremonies truly divine by institution. No man can conclude thus: we must everywhere have some garment, and therefore in England, a Surplice. We must always in Baptism, have some admonition to profess the faith; and therefore in England a Cross. We must use reverent gestures in receiving the holy Communion; and therefore in England we must kneel in the act of receiving. But we may conclude thus: We must have a fit place to meet in; and this place is generally fittest for our Congregation: therefore we must have this. We must have a convenient time to meet in; and this hour is generally most convenient for our Congregation: therefore this. The Monks may as well conclude: We must have some garments: therefore we must in one order have black; in another, white; in a third, black over white, or white over black; in a fourth, gray; a fifth, party coloured; in some, all woollen; in some, all linen; &c. ad infinitum; as well (I say) every whit, as the Rejoinder can conclude from a garment to a Surplice; from admonition, to the sign of a Cross; or from reverence in a table-gesture, to kneeling.

To Bellarmine, the Rejoinder answereth, that he speaketh of natural Ceremonies. Which is true: but are not these contained under the generality of the Defendant his words: there is no gesture, or circumstance of worship, which hath not been abused? And as for other circumstances, which are called civil, many of them admit only of such variety, as nature doth lead unto, by occasion of this or that determination, common to religion with other affairs.

9. That our Ceremonies are not individually, or singularly the same which Papists have solemnly abused, the Replier said, it is no marvel: because it is impossible to carry the same particular sign of the Cross, from the Fonte, to the Church door; or to keep it being so long as it is in making. That is therefore no great mystery. The Rejoinder answereth nothing to this, save only that he descanteth upon the term mystery.

10. It was added (as an overplus, not for necessity of the Argument) that as it seemeth, Papists do give divine honor unto the sign of the Cross, as it is us'd among us: because they ascribe divine operation unto it, as it was used by Jews, Heathens, and Julian the Apostate. Bell, de effect. Sacram. lib. 2. cap. 31. and they do not account us worse then them. The Rejoinder opposeth 1. That the Papists honor not the Lord's Supper in our hands. The difference is, that unto that Sacrament, they require a right-ordained Priest; but not so to the Cross. 2. He answereth, that they ascribe this divine operation unto it, only when there is an intention of such an operation, in him that maketh the Cross. Be it so: the Patrones of our crossing, defend that use which the Cross had among the Fathers, who allowed that intention, as Bellarmine (in the place now cited) showeth. And how shall the inward intention of them be discerned?

This at the least seemeth to follow, that as for uncertainty of the Priests intention, divers Papists worship the Hoaste, only upon condition, if it be changed into the body, by the Priests intention; so they must ascribe divine honor unto our Crosses, upon the like condition of such an intention, as was in the Fathers.

11. About material formal sameness, the Replier refused to dispute: that was (saith the Rejoinder) because if he had, he must either have opposed all learning and common sense, or else have yielded to the Defendant, that change of essential form maketh the same material to become another thing; as in the changing of water into wine. But 1. with consent of all common sense, we may say, that our Cross differeth not so from the Popish Cross as the wine did from water, John. 2. 2. It were no opposition to all learning (whatsoever Aristole teacheth) if one should say, that not the form only, but also the matter was in a great part changed, when water was turned into wine. 3. Opinion, and intention, is not the essential form of a ceremonial Cross. For one and the same ceremonial Cross, is used by Papists, to divers intentions, as to represent a Mystery, to cure diseases, to drive away devils, &c. Bellarmine in the fore-cited place. And opinion belongeth to the efficient or making cause, not to the form. 4. The very making of a Cross▪ in such a manner, or with such circumstances, as put upon it a relation to religion, maketh both matter and form of that Ceremony: and so after idolatrously abused, carrieth with it at least a show of an Idolatrous Ceremony. But this show the Rej. referreth unto the fifth chapter: and here opposeth only, that likeness and sameness are not one. Which is true of individual or singular sameness, not otherwise: for those things are like which have one and the same quality. But he himself will not say, that only the same individual or particular Ceremonies, which Idolaters abuse, are forbidden to us. He hath hitherto in all this section declined the defense of that absurdity. This quidity therefore is not to the purpose.

12. It was added by the Replier, that we have no intention, or opinion, in the use of the Cross, but the Papists have the same (though they have others more) and therefore there is some formal sameness in their Cross and ours. To this the Rejoined. in many words, answereth nothing, but that this reply stifles it self: because, if we have not all the same opinions, which they have, then they have not the same with us. But it doeth not follow of positive opinions, concerning the Cross it self. For we may want some of their opinions, and yet they have all that we have, the same. Doeth not he that knoweth most, of this or that, know the same thing with him that knoweth little, though he knoweth more?

13. Another odd reason was framed by the Repl. thus: If this doeth make a Ceremony not the same, that men have not altogether the same opinion of it; then among the Papists, there are as many kind of Ceremonies, Crosses, Surplices, as there are diversities of opinions, about their nature and use; which no man will say. Yes (saith the the Rejoinder) I will say it of Ceremonies: and he that shall deny this, must lay aside both learning, and conscience, not knowing what to say. But he is too too confident, upon the ground which he is driven to by force of a contrary wind. For without laying aside of learning, and conscience, we may thus argue: If this be so, then all human Ceremonies used among the Papists, and brought in (as hitherto all have used to speak) by Popes, are not Popish. For they may be this or that Hedge-Priests Ceremonies, who hath added his opinion and institution unto them. 2. The Pope) by the same reason) cannot know, when his Ceremonies ar▪ observed, or omitted▪ because he cannot know all opinions and intentions of men. And the like reason holding with us, our Church must inquire into the opinions and intentions of men, before she can know, whether her Ceremonies be observed, yea, or no. I leave it then to a Convocation-consultation, if it be not necessary, that in the Bishops Articles, the Church-Wardens should be asked, upon that oath, which they usually take, and break, With what opinion, and intention, their Minister doeth wear the Surplice, and use the Cross? For otherwise, it cannot be known, whether he useth the Ceremonies of the Church of England, or others of his own making? 3. When men have no opinion or intention of such Ceremonies, but only that they are necessary to stand betwixt them and deprivation, or excommunication, or other vexation (which is the case of our best Conformers) then, though they use Cross, Surplice, &c. they do not conform to the Ceremonies of our Church, but in hypocrisy, and so with great sin.

Three wordy exceptions (he useth to call such things quarrels) the Rejoinder here maketh: one that the Replier put in not altogether the same opinion, for not the same: another, that he mentioned only opinion, whereas the Defender joined to it, intention: the third, that Crosses and Surplices, are wrought upon, as they are material. But the two later of these are now voided, by my repetition of the reason: and the former is the Rejoinder his own interpretation, pag. 575.576. namely, if our opinion be not altogether the same, then it is not simply the same.

14. Instance was made (by the Replier) in the Altar erected by Uriah, 2. King. 16. which was idolatrous, like that of Damascus, though for another intention.

The Rejoinder answereth 1. that this Altar was not formally the same with that of Damascus. But the formality of that Altar, containing all the idolatrousnesse that was in it, or belonged unto it, and that Idolatry being in part common to Vrias Altar, with that of Damaskus, it must needs be in that part the same, though not altogether. Idolatry against the second Commandment, hath some formal community with that which is against the first. He addeth 2. that if Achaz had intention of offering to false God's, then his intention was the same with theirs at Damascus. But yet there would be found a difference of intention in Achaz, in that he intended worship both to the true God, and to those false; whereas they at Damascus were only for the false. And Vrias intention might be (as it seemeth to have been) only to satisfy the Kings mind, that he might keep his favor, upon which intentions, Courting Prelates use to go very far.

15. In the last place, it was observed by the Replier, that this answer of the Defender is the very same with that which Papists give unto our Divines, when they are accused for using of Heathenish and Jewish Ceremonies. Although in the outward sign there be some likeness, yet absolutely there is great difference: for outward actions take their kind from the end and intention of them. Bellarm. de effectu Sacr. l. 2. cap. 32.

The Rejoinder being angry, useth divers sharp words, and after answereth, that this plea is unsufficie•• for the Papists: because they retain Jewish Ceremonies to the like Jewish ends; and Pagan Ceremonies to like superstitious ends: but our intentions are no way like the Papists. Bellarmine saith as much for their Ceremonies in the place noted: The rites of the Gentiles were done for the worship of Devils: but ours are for the worship of the true God: therefore there is as much difference between ours and theirs, as between Sacred, and Sacrilege; as b•twe•ne piety and impiety, as between God and Satan. Jewish rites signified Christ to come ours are partly in memory of things past, and partly to signif• the glory to come. And yet our Divines cease not to accuse them of Jewish and Pagan Ceremonies. In their judgment therefore, such differences cannot excuse ou• Ceremonies from being Popish.

SECT. 22. Concerning the Cross Popish and English.

IN this Section, there is nothing material, save only, that the Rejoinder undertaketh to prove, that the Church of England hath utterly and clean taken away the Ceremony of the Cross, which was among the Papists abused: or, that wheresoever, and howsoever the sign of the Cross was a Ceremony abused in Popery, it is taken away in the Church of England.

But because in common understanding, this is to prove day, night, and night, day, he requireth two positions to be granted him (which before have been confuted) 1. that nothing is a Ceremony properly so called, but in respect of, and in the use of it, as a Ceremony. 2. That the sign of the Cross, though it be but one kind of thing, yet is made so many several Ceremonies, as there be several uses thereof. And these things being taken for granted, he gathereth a Catalogue of many Popish abuses, which (thorough God's mercy) we are freed from. Yet in his very first instance, he betrayeth his cause. For he maketh it a Popish Ceremony, to sign the breast with the forehead (and so the forehead) in signification, that the mystery of the Cross is to be believed in the heart, and confessed with the mouth. This Ceremony (saith he) we have not. Yes surely we have the very same formal opinion and intention, so far as signification cometh to. For not to be ashamed of confessing faith in Christ crucified, &c. is nothing else but to believe with the heart, and confess with the mouth, hand, and feet, the mystery of the Cross.

But it is not worth the while, for to consider the severals of this Catalogue. This only I would know; if we have not taken the Ceremony of the Cross from Papists, from whom we took it? The beginning of it was (so far as appeareth by books) from the Valentinian haeretickes. The first honorable mention of using it among Christians, is in Tertullian, when (by the Rejoinder his sentence) he was infected with heresy: & his use our Defender and Rejoinder (I dare say) will not allow: at bordes, and beds, putting on apparel, and shoes, &c. Tell us (I pray you) from what Author, or Age, this Ceremony of the Cross was taken, which now is urged upon us? I have more then a doubt, that such exception may be taken against that propagation, and such proofs for the taking away utterly of the Cross, as you have brought for the abolishing of the Papists Cross. If it be a new Ceremony, invented in England, just at the time of Reformation, the Author of that invention should be made known: and if he can approve his Ceremony, to be grounded rightly, his name may be added in Polidor Virgil, de Inventoribus rerum.

SECT. 23. Concerning Scripture-proofs, for human Ceremonies Idolatrously abused, and yet lawful to be used in God's worship.

1. THE Replier his words are these: No example can the Defender find in all the book of God, for lawful reserving of Idolatrous Ceremonies, but only two; one of Gideon, Iud. 6.26. and another of Joshua, Josh. 6.19. These words the Rejoinder accuseth of dishonesty, not to be used against a Pagan. And why so? 1. Because the Defender undertook only to prove, that some Ceremonies, which have been formerly abused, are not therefore necessarily to be abolished, if they may be reduced to their indifferent use. Now by abused he meant Idolatrously abused, or else he touched not this fourth Argument, whose assumption himself repeated thus: Our Ceremonies have been Idolatrously abused. The Replier instead of Idolatrously abused, put Idolatrous: because (as such) they are Idolatrous. And that, which is not necessarily to be abolished, may be retained: therefore the Replier (seeking brevity of speech) used the word retained. So doeth Beza adv. Harchium, de Coena, speak: Non desunt, qui Pastores vellent in illis, si non origin, at certe usu Baaliticis vstibus apparere. So that in this, there was no unchristian dealing.

The Rejoinder his second reason for so deep a censure, is, that the Defendant grounded not his proposition upon these two examples, but from the equity of the precept of God, unto these two men.

The Defendant indeed said, that his proof was by the general equity of God's Law; and then bringeth these two examples. Wherein he was spared, that nothing was opposed to his gathering of generally equity of the Law, from two examples, which (according to his interpretation) are manifestly beside, and in some sort, against the Law. But if his proof was from the equity of two special precepts, those specials are examples: and the Defendant his words are of one of Gideon's acts: Which example we have propounded, to prove, &c. And the Rejoinder himself, in this same page, calleth the other act of Gideon, an Instance, in the same sense: I believe the Jews gathered their rule from this instance: and pag. 591. he calleth that which is alleged of Gideon, and the other of Ishua, two instances. In all this charge therefore of unchristian dealing, there is not found any fault at all. But it is too commō with the Rej. when he cannot reasonably rejoyne, to break out into angry words.

2. Of Gideon's example, the Defendant himself (said the Replier) confesseth, that it was by special command from God: and that it is not every way imitable. The Rejoinder 1. affirmeth this to have been the Def. his objection, rather than his confession. Be it so: His objection therefore answereth it self; and toucheth not our Argument, which did not conclude anything unlawful that is by God specially commanded, but only showeth what is ordinary unlawful by the general rule of his Word. He 2. telleth us, that the Jews hold it lawful to make use of the wood of a tree, under which an Idol hath been placed. And so do we hold it lawful to make use (for a fire in cold weather) of the wood of an Idol; which is more, I believe (addeth the Rej.) they gathered the rule from this instance. If they did gather any special rule of ordinary use from hence, it was when the Vail was over their eyes. For there is a general rule, in the light of nature, to the contrary: Quod ex concessione specially factum est, non debet trahi in consequentiam. The Def. therefore did not well to imitate them in his blind gathering. 3. He citeth out of P. Martyr, that God herein shows, that the usurpation of an Idol, doeth not dispossesse him of his Lordship over all things, but that they may be turned to his service. But P. Martyr doeth manifest his meaning to be, that such things may not so be turned to God's service, without God's special appointment.

For (answering the general Law which maketh to the contrary) he saith: God made such Laws as these for us, and not for himself. Wherefore he could use things dedicate to Idols, unto his own burnt offerings. So Pelicanus: It was in no wise lawfull, unless God had enjoined it. 4. For that which was mentioned of a not imitable example, that spake the Defendant (saith the Rejoinder) only of Gideon's sacrificing under an Oak. Which is true: but the reason of this imitableness, is the same in both of Gideon's acts: justly therefore, both were taken as confessed not imitable.

3. Of Joshua 6.19. it was added by the Replier, that there is no mention made of things, (much less Ceremonies) appropriated unto Idolatry; and that in probability, the vessels there spoken of, were melted, and only the metal brought into the Lord's treasury. The Rej. opposeth 1. That some of this treasury (in all likelihood) was appropriated to Idols. Be it so: for that some there was a double answer given, God special command; and that it was melted, or passed thorough the fire. But here the Rej. answereth 1. That it doeth not appear, they were to be melted. As if the Defendant his Argument did prove well his p^oosition (as he saith it doeth) if confutation of it doeth not appear in the text he allegeth! surely proofs should be fetched from that which at least appeareth, and not from that whose contrary doeth not appear. But it doeth appear, that this was the order appointed for such things, Numb. 31.22.23. and from thence Interpreters gather so much of these things, Joshua, 6. So Tostatus, They did melt all metals that could be melted, they were melted by fire, and turned into the mass. 2. If this be granted (saith the Rejoinder) melting did not make them other things. Yes surely by the Defend. his Learning brought to illuminate our judgments (as he speaketh pag. 562. in this Rej.) be sound, namely, only form giveth the being to everything, as natural; to natural; artificial, unto artificial; ceremonial, unto Ceremonial. For by this reason, melting of the vessels, made them cease to be the same things either artificial, or ceremonial. And hereby the Def. his instance falleth to the ground: as not proving any Ceremonies abused unto Idolatry, to have been by Joshua retained.

4. Out of the former premises, the Replier concluded that the Defendant had wreched penury of Scripture proof•s, for retaining of human unnec•ssary Ceremonies, notoriously known to have been, and be abused unto Idolatry. This was his meaning, according to the state of the question. Here the Rejoinder first opposeth, that two instances from the holy Scripture, rightly taken, are proof enough. Which is very true: but that same rightly take•n, was here wanting, as hath been sufficiently declared.

In the second place, to supply the Defendant his penury, the Rejoinder bringeth abundance of instances, out of his old store. 1. Kneeling, bowing, prostrating, lifting up of the eyes, and of the hands, shouting, and dancing for joy. But these we absolutely deny to be human inventions. The Rej. knew this: and therefore by prevention, replieth: *to say these are not human inventions, because they partly spring out of natural light, is as much as to say, they are not, because they are human inventions: for what are human inventions, but such as spring out of natural light? What? the Cross, and Surplice; the Cornerd-Cap, and tippet; the B•shops Rochet, and Coap; with a thousand such like; which whosoever will aequal, or (in regard of naturalness and willful invention) liken unto lfting up of eyes and hands, &c. in prayer, must for that time, lay aside right natural invention, and judgment. I think it would trouble all the Graduates in England to find out that natural light, from whence Bachelors of Art, Masters of Art, Bachelors and Doctors of Divinity received their several kinds of Hoodes; even as much as to find out light of nature, for all the several habits of Monks. But (saith the Rejoinder) all came from natural light, better or worse, more or less agitated. Just as men's long hair, and women's short, which nature it self teacheth to be uncomely (according to the Apostles light) came from the light of nature. It is natural to a child, for to suck the dugge; and after to put the hand to the mouth; and after to creep or go: Is it like natural to sound a certain distinct sound upon a Trumpet? to dance a certain Round, or Galliard, after every Fidle? It is natural for a child to signify his discerning of those that it is used to, by some such sound as Dad and Mam: but not to make Verses in a certain number.*

After these, the Rej. instanceth in sitting, or lying along, leaning on the left side; covering of the head and face, in worship; dividing of a beast in covenant-making; erecting of Altars upon hills; erecting of religious monuments; Trophies of victory, in Temples; set days for solemn worship; wine and victuals for mourners; Marriage feasts, &c. But in all these, he was so set upon number, that he clean forgot weight, and pertinency to the question in hand. For the question is of Scripture-proofs, for such Ceremonies, as man hath devised, without necessary use, in the worship of God, notoriously known to have been, and be abused unto Idolatry. For there is not one of these instances, which doeth agree to this question. 1. It cannot be proved out of Scripture, that sitting, or lying, was a lawful religious Ceremony, appropriated unto God's worship. The Rej. his proofs are only from superstitious Rabbin's; who are no more witnesses of true lawful Ceremonies, for the old Testament, then Papists are for the new. 2. As for vayling and covering the head and face, in worship, I know not out of what place of Scripture it can be proved a religious Ceremony, except (perhaps) from 1. Corinth. 11.4. Every man praying or prophesying, having his head covered dishonoreth his head. He quoteth Jerome on Eze. 44. Where these words are found: We must not have our heads shaved as the Priests and worshippers of Isis and Serapis had. According to the seveny Interpreters, we learn that our hair is to be suffered to grow out so long, that the skin be covered, and appear not naked. Or verily that the Priests must always cover their heads, according to that of Virgil, Purpureo velare comas, &c.

But this is a violent interpretation. Will this help the Rejoinder? He quoteth also P. Martyr, on 1. King. 19.13. where he saith, that Moses and Elias, not being able to endure the glory of Extraordinary apparitions, covered their faces; adding, that some think they did it of modesty; which he doeth not reject, will this help?

3. For dividing of beasts, in covenant-making, he bringeth Gen. 15. and Ier. 34. But in the first place, it is manifest, that God did immediately, and extraordinarily appoint it; and that in such a manner, as can never be shown in any idolatrous use among Heathens, much less before Abraham's time. In the second, there seemeth only to be an allusion of phrase: because in all the solemn Covenants which we read of in the History of the Jews, made, or renewed, we never find any mention of this manner; though circumstances of far less moment are recorded distinctly. But if it was a real act, it is most likely, that the question then in hand, being about the freedom of Abraham's Children, which belonged to that Covenant confirmed unto Abraham, Gen. 15. they were by the Prophet directed, to use the same kind of sacrifice. Howsoever, it cannot be proved a mere human Ceremony: nor yet a mere Ceremony: because it was a sacrifice, as all grant. Beside, to ground so large a conclusion upon one dark phrase, is fitter for the Patrons of Purgatory (who allege therefore, trial by fire, and baptizing for the dead) then for the Rejoinder.

6. Erecting of Altars, was not in use after the Law, by the Rej. his own confession. Before, it was no more a human Ceremony, then sacrificing was.

7. Of Monuments and s^t days of solemnity, enough hath been said in the third Argument. For Trophies, brought into God's house, Colias sword is produced: which was no Ceremony of worship. For then David would not have taken it away, for civil use; as he did, 1. Sam. 21.

8. Mourning and Marriage feasts, have no show of religious Ceremonies. Junius in deed (in his notes on Deut. 26.14.) calleth some cost about the dead, religious but in his Analysis of the same place, he expoundeth himself, to mean religiosum, humanum, aut superstitiosum. And religious is often used for all offices of strict obligation.

Notwithstanding all this weakness, and wrinesse of these instances, the Rej. doth so triumph in them, that he doubteth not to pronounce them enough to confute four Arguments of the Abridgement. But such confutations are like his, who said he would confute a great part of Bellarmine, with one word: Bellarmino thou liest.

SECT. 24. Concerning ancient Fathers.

1. THE Replier beginneth thus: I had thought verily, that the Def. would have brought some pregnant testimonies out of the Fathers, though he could find none in the holy Scriptures. Then belike (saith the Rej.) you knew that there might pregnant testimonies be brought out of them. And so it is: though their doctrine, in general, were against such Ceremonies, yet from their practice, so pregnant testimony may be brought for divers superstitious Ceremonies, that the Church rueth the pregnancy of them unto this day. Baronius, ad an. 44. in the end, bringeth many examples; and from them concludeth: It was lawful to apply those things which the Gentiles had abused in superstitious worship, and purged from uncleanness by holy worship unto pious uses, that Christ to the greater dishonor of Satan, might be honored with those things wherewith Satan himself sought to be worshipped. By the same reason whereby the Temples of the Heathenish gods were laudably turned into the Churches of Christians, other rites also of the Gentiles cleansed by our prayers, are rightly turned to holy use. And ad an. 58. about the middle, he hath, upon the same examples, these words: What wonder is it, if holy Bishops did consent, that those wonted customs of the Gentiles, from which it was impossible to draw them utterly, even after they were professed Christians, should be changed into the worship of God? Venerable antiquity changed superstition into religion, and brought to pass that what was spent upon Idols, should be carefully converted into the worship of God. From hence it came, as Polidore de Invent. in the preface, saith, that A vast forest of Jewish Ceremonies, did by little and little, invade and possess the Lord's field.

A true reason, and censure also of these practices, is given by Doctor Jackson (Original of unbelief, Section, 4. chapter, 23.) in these words: To outstrip our adversaries in their own policies, or to use means abused by others, to a better end, is a resolution so plausible to worldly wisdom (which of all other fruits of the flesh, is for the most part, the hardest, and last renounced) that almost no sect or profession in any age, but in the issue mightily over-reached or entangled themselves, by too much seeking to circumvent or go beyond others.

A notable example we have of this policy, in Gregory's direction unto Augustine the Monk, then in England, lib. 9. ep. 71. which was, that sacrificing of Oxen with feasting, in the Idol Temples, should be turned into slaying of Oxen for fasting about those Temples, made Christian by holy-water.

2. In that which the Replier collected out of the Defender his allegations, it is confessed, there is little or nothing to the purpose. The Rejoinder therefore, accusing the Replier, for picking the Defender his purse, undertaketh to restore it unto him again, by making this new collection: 1. If the celebritie of the Feast of Easter was held by many to be lawfully kept on the same day which the Jews superstitiously (as then) observed. 2. If they, avoiding Pagan Fasts, and Feasts, did freely institute other. 3. If superstitious habits were lawfully retained. 4. If Circumcision, after it became a mere human Ceremony, was lawfully used: Then the ancient Fathers and Churches were of opinion, that godly men may lawfully use some Human Ceremonies, abused by others. But this is a mere empty purse (not worth the picking) which the Rejoinder sticketh into the Defender his pocket; as his own. For 1. It hath not in it our question, of Ceremonies devised by man, not necessary, notoriously known to have been abused unto Idolatry, or superstition. 2. In the first instance there is only many noted, from whence cannot be concluded, in a kind of generality, the Fathers and Churches opinion. 3. Easter was by them that kept it, not held as a mere human invention, but as Apostolical tradition, as all know. 4. Easter was not invented by men, but only by men superstitiously continued. 5. The second Argument stifles itself. For if they so carefully avoided Pagan Fasts, and Feasts, though they might have pleased many professed Christians, and drawn on other by retaining of them, it seemeth, they held them unlawful, because of the Idolatry wherewith they had been defiled. 6. We absolutely deny, with all Divines, that Circumcision, after the Date of it, was fully expired, which was in the Apostles time, was ever lawfully used as a religious Ceremony. 7. Concerning Ceremonious habits, the Defender bringeth no proof at all. The Rejoinder 1. allegeth Tertullian, de Corona mil. as allowing the use of a white linen garment, he meaneth for a Ceremony: whereas Tertullian only showeth, that our Savior did lawfully use a linen towell, in washing his Disciples feet, John. 13. notwithstanding linen garments had been abused to Idolatry.

In the 2. place, he referreth us to B. Jewel his Defense, for our belly-full of instances. And it is true, that godly learned man (par. 3. cap. 5. div. 1.) allegeth divers instances, and Authorities: neither would he have omitted that of Tertullian, if he had esteemed it. But (because it is necessary) I will set down the examination of them, which I find in certain papers of M^r. Brightman (one Author of the Abridgement) neither ungodly, nor unlearned; whereby it shall appear, that they do not so fill our Bellies, but that we can well digest them.

The learning of it, will answer for the length, to every studious Reader.

M. BRIGHTMANS ANSWER TO B. IEWELS ALLEGATIONS, FOR THE ANTIQVITIE OF DISTinct Ceremonious apparel used by Ministers in their Ministration.

IVSTINE MARTYR preached the word of God in a Philosophers habit, which was his ordinary garment, such as our students at University and Inns of Court wear, no Surplice nor any such ministringe attire. But concerning the Bishops brouch, which M. Jewel saith John the Evangelist did wear, as if he had been a Bishop of the Jews, I take it, it was no material brouch, but a figurative speech only. For Polycrates describenge John first by the singular love our Lord bore him, in whose bosom he leaned at his last supper, then of the great holiness wherein this noble disciple excelled, he contented not himself to declare the same properlye, but allegorically said of him, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 [which was the Pr^{ist} that carried the brouch,] not that he ever used any such thing, but that he expressed by his holy conversation the force of that [Sanctitas Iehovae] written in that golden plate, which the high Priest carried in his bonnet. For shall we think John was a Priest, neither of Aaron's family, nor of the tribe of Levi? or were the holy things of the Temple not so much as to be seen by the people of the Jews at Jerusalem, now exposed to the veiwe of the Gentiles at Ephesus? Would the Jews have borne this prophaninge of their holiest mystery, by a man of another tribe, among the heathen, and by a Christian? Besides, the Apostles by common consent had decreed the legal cerem. should not be used by the Christians. Act. 15. And Paul taught Circumcising to be fallinge from the grace of Christ. Gal. 5.2, Would John then bring a Ceremony of the Levitical Preisthoode into the Church? D. Fulke was not of that judgment that the words in Eusebius are to be taken literally, but by that figurative allusion allreadie remembered; Rhem. test. Apoc. 1. sect. 7. This figurative speech therefore should not have been turned into a material brouch, much less into a longe Priests garment, as the Rhemists do, who have battered out this 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , and shaped it into 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Apoc. 1.13. These words then make nothing for any garment at all.

Augustine's indifferency what apparel be worn, is only of that in common life, not in Ecclesiastical and administringe function. Truly it nothing perteines to that city, what habit or fashion any one followeth, so it be not against the word, and that faith whereby we come to God. Whence it never Compelled the very Philosophers when they became Christians to change their garments or manner of diet, but only to lay aside their false opinions. De civit. lib. 19. c. 19. As for proper administering apparel he speaketh not one word of it, neither do I find there was any in his time.

I had not Hilary to consider his words, but the spoils of the Gentiles in persons, places, learning and such other things, may be many ways divided to the ornament of the Church, without borrowing any Ceremony from them, to be used in the service of God. For this is not to spoil them as the Israelites did the Egyptians, who had the word of God for their warrant, but as Achan did Jericho, full dearly to his cost, and of the whole host of Israel. Josh. 7.

Jerome hath the words you cite, lib. 1. adv. Pelag. pag. 416. much urged by Bellarmine and the Papists for their apparel, and no less vehemently pressed by our men, for ours, but duly considered, without cause. The Candida vestis Jerome speaks of, was no peculiar garment of the Ministers, but the ordinary clothing of the common people, in former time generally used by all, and daily, but afterwards only by those of the better sort, and upon Festivall days. So Aulus Gellius writeth of Africanus: That when he was guilty, neither was his beard shaven, nor his white garment off, nor was he of the common attire of the guilty. The Ambassadors of Rhodes coming to Rome, were first seen in white, but finding things contrary to their expectation, they were forced presently with a viler garment to compass the houses of Princes. Liv. decad. . lib. 5. pag. 254. Yea, the very mariners and passengers in a ship of Egypt, seeing Augustus to pass by, shown themselves in white, and crowned. The same Augustus was angry when he saw a company in mourning, and thereupon made a law, That none should sit among the mourners. From thence grew a difference among the Citizens, not heard of in former ages, whereby some were called Candidate, some Pullati: Candidati, not such as sued for offices, as in times past, but the Citizers of better rank: Pullati, the lowest of the people, and the vulgar multitude: both, from the color of their garments which they used. Tertullian saith of the manumitted servants (who upon their first infranchising appeared in their gownes, that is, the common vesture of the Citizens) If thy servant be free and honored with the brightness of the white garment, & the grace of the gold ring, and the name of a Patron, & with the tribe and table. Yea the Papists themselves (as Baronius) allege to this purpose [Simeon Metaphrastes] in the acts of [Indes and Domna,] where it is said of the multitude, Some wicked ones were present in white and magnificent garments, celebrating the feast of their own ruin, but Indes only was in black. And of Honofrius [qui alba induit vestimenta] least he should be discovered to be a Christian put on white. For the devotees Christians began to take themselves to darker colors, as more modest and decent, especially after the Monks once began to grow in credit. 2. It is plain out of Jerome himself, that [Candida vestis] was no garment belonging to the Minister a one in divine service, but an honest, decent and cleanly vesture, opposed to a foul, sluttish, and ragged habit. For the Pelagians condemned glorious garments, as he there saith, Whence you add, the show of garments, and ornaments is contrary to God. In confutation whereof he demandeth, But wherein is that against God, if I have a cleaner garment? And then presently after the words you cite • Look to it O Clerks, take heed O Monks, Widows, and Virgines: you are in danger, unless the people see you in foul apparel. I say nothing of Secular, against whom war is proclaimed, and enmity against God, if they use fine apparel. By which it is evident, he defended comely, honest attire, such as was common to Monks, Widows, Virgins, [& homines saeculi] not proper to any office of the Minister. So in Eccl. 9.8. expounding what [Candida vestimenta] be, he saith, Beware thou put not on at any time polluted garments, because sinners have mourned in obscure garments, but put thou on the light, and not cursing. If [Candida vestimenta] should be only Ministers apparel, then Solomon's exhortation is only to Ministers, and they are the men he willeth to be merry, and always to have on their Surplices, not only in their Ministerial duty. In his precepts to Nepotian he adviseth, Avoid sad garments as well as white, Ornaments, as well as Spots, one savoreth of delights, the other of too much glory. Would he have willed him to avoid white garments in common life, (for make it a Ministerial garment, and then you have Jerome's counsel against it) had they not been usual? In divine service therefore, the Ministers used the white garment of the people, but in ordinary life, Jerome thought a meaner clothing fitting, and so some devotee, as Nepotian, and such like practiced, though others differed nothing in their attire from the Laity. 3. There was no set Ministerial garment in Jerome's time, and therefore [Candida vestis] was no such. For Coelestinus, who was not Bishop till after Jerome's death, writeth thus to the French Bishops concerning apparel in divine service, among whom this superstition began to spring, We are to be distinguished from the common sort by doctrine and not by garment, by conversation, and not habit; by the purity of mind, not by apparel. For if we study innovation, we tread that which our Fathers delivered us underfoot, to make way for idle superstitions. Wherefore, the weak minds of the Faithful must not be led to such things, they must rather be instructed than played withal. We must not blind their eyes, but help their minds with wholesome precepts.

I know Marianus Victorius, in that Nepotian when he died, bequeathed his garment to Jerome, which he had used in the ministry of Christ, Jerome, ad Heliod. de morte Nepotian. As also out of that forementioned place against the Pelagians, thinks he hath found their Albe, Plinet, Camissa, Casula, and I know not what. But Nepotian's garment was no other then what hath been shown, only as he was a man humble and of modest, and meanest attire in ordinary life, so in matters of his Ministry, he was fine, neat, and magnificent; [Solicitus si niteret Altare, si parietes absque inligine, si pavimenta tersa, &c.] and therefore no doubt in that action arraying himself without any note of pride after the best manner of the people, he might well bequeathe that garment to Jerome, who had indeed been never so mean would have esteemed it for the donours sake. But observe, Nepotians ministering garment was none of the Church goods, but provided at his own cost. It is objected also that Stephanus Bishop of Rome in Cyprians time, ordained peculiar ministering garments, as it is recorded by Polyd. de Invent. lib. 6. c. 12. and by Issidor. writing de Stephano. Unto which you may add Gratian if you will, de consecrate. dist. 1. Vestimenta Ecclesiae. But though Stephanus flourished before Antichrist was hatched, yet he is too young to be a lawful Author of any such garments.

Besides who seeth not, by that alleged out of Caelestine 160. years at least after Stephen, that decree of Stephen to be a mere forgery? was it a Novelty to bring in any such apparel in Caelestines time, and yet had prescription of such antiquity? But the [Century writers] have discovered the forgery by many arguments, that I marvel any man of learning should seek any strength from such a rotten foundation.

Jerome is also alleged in Ezech. 44. By which we learn to enter the holy of holies, not with commune and defiled garments, but to hold the Sacraments in a clean Conscience and garments unpolluted.

Where first he interpreteth the garments to be a clean conscience. And secondly that he requireth for the outward garments, is only they be clean without any note of difference between the Ministers garment and the people's.

So a little after, Divine Religion hath one habit in the Ministry, and another for ordinary use.

To admit these words spoken not of the Priests in the Temple, but of Christian Ministers, this [alter habitus] was a better garment for the time of public duty, as Nepotian had, not any differing attire from that of the assembly. Thus much for Hierome.

Chrysostom when he saith, [This is your dignity, stability crown, not that you walk through the Church in a white coat. Hom. 83. in Mat. necessarily requireth the same interpretation. For this most white coat was no other then the better sort of people did usually wear, as well in other Countries, as at Rome, as hath been shown by the Ambassadors of Rhodes, and the shipmen of Egypt. Only the Bishops in humility thought it too sumptuous for daily use, and reserved it for the time of their public function.

And therefore Sisninius a Novatian Bishop; livinge in Constantinople at the same time with Chrysostom, and clothinge himself not only in his Ministry, but for his ordinary raiment, in white, was demanded by one, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 &c. where it is to be observed, It was an unwonted garment in ordinary use for a Bishop, none for other men: and unwonted in ordinary use, not in divine use, in which the Bishop was allowed without any grudge, such dignity of apparall as was then received by men of best place.

That of Chrysostom hom. 6. ad popul. Antioch. is [palea.] I have troubled you with many words, but the truth is so overswayed with prejudice, that to my poor power I would disburden it a little if I can.

SECT. 25.26.27.28. Concerning the Defender his Reasons.

1. The Def. his first reason (by the Rejoinder his interpretation) is, that by our assertion, the Church shall loose a part of her Christian liberty: because if she may not use human Ceremonies abused unto Idolatry and superstition, she may use none at all. Now 1. The Replier granted the conclusion, being understood of human significant Ceremonies. And thereto the Rej. opposeth nothing, but that there is the same reason of all other Ceremonies; and that one Didoclave doeth not grant this of sitting at the Lord's Supper, though he confess it to be a human significant Ceremony. But both these answers are void of truth. For Circumstances of Order and Decency which are sometime called Ceremonies, and here understood, are neither mere human institutions, nor unnecessary (which is part of the question) but commanded of God, as often hath been shown. Neither doeth Didoclave anywhere confess Sitting at the Lord's Supper, to be a human Ceremony. 2. It seemeth very strange to me, that appointing & using of human significant unnecessary Ceremonies, notoriously known to have been, and be abused unto Idolatry, should be fetched from Christian Liberty.

I have considered what is spoken of Christian liberty, in the Scripture, and what I could find written of it by Divines: and therout observed much against these Ceremonies (as is alleged in the sixth general Argument, which the Rejoinder was not hasty to come unto, in eight or nine years) but nothing either for their imposing, or their using.

The Rejoinder meaneth by the Church (in England) the Convocation house; and by Christian liberty, their licentiousness, in Abridging God's people of that liberty which Christ hath left unto them. So that, as in some parts of Germany, and Polonia, the Noble men stand mightily for the Liberty of their Countrie; And yet when the course of things is well weighed, that liberty is only license for them to oppress the common people, or Boores; whom they keep under as slaves, or little better; whose goods they take from them upon every slight praetence; whose lives (in some places) can scarce satisfy them for the life of a stagge, if they shoot one, spoiling their corn, even so, this Christian liberty is only for our Convocation-house to oppress the Congregations of Christ, as they do.

2. The Defender his second reason, was such, as the Repl. could find no conclusion in, but that some things abused, may afterward be rightly used: which he granted. The Rejoinder addeth, that his reason did conclude this of some human Ceremonies, from the Law of shadows. He said in deed, among other instances, that a Man or Woman, legally unclean, might he legally cleansed or purged. And can he conclude from Men and Women, to human unnecessary Ceremonies? He may as well conclude, that because in a fretting leprosy, the leprous man's head may not be cut off, nor his body burned; therefore his infected garments were not to be burnt, nor the hair of his head and beard cut off.

The Replier also granted that Surplices might be turned into under garments for poor people; and wooden Crosses given them for firing.

The Rejoinder answereth 1. that this is no use of Ceremonies, as Ceremonies. As if he himself did allway speak formally!

The sentence immediately going before, was of things abused: And so this addition was of those things which are made Ceremonies. Yet if that be true, which the Rejoinder affirmed

pag. 570. that a Surplice, as a Ceremony, is in the kind of a Garment, then it must needs follow, that this Ceremony may be given to the poor for a garment.

And if he fly to Use as necessary to make a Ceremony, as he doeth in his Definition of a Ceremony, it may be as well questioned, whether a Shirt be a garment out of use when it is off a man's body? For a garment is a Ceremony, by the Rejoinder his Definition. And so it may be questioned, whether any Shirt, or other Garment was made, or washed, when no man had it on? His 2. answer, that M. Parker calleth them Devills, and jarring on the same stringe, would fright men from burning of Idols, as he did in Germany, who when men were burning of wooden Idols, bored a hole in one, into which he stopped some gunpowder; so that the Idol being in the stove to burn, the gun-powder brake the stove together with the windows of the room, in pieces; and that was imputed by some to the Idol, or Saint, and by others, to the Devil. But (saith the Rejoinder) from hence it followeth, that there is a change of Law: because the Jews might not convert the matter of Idols to their private use. And so much we grant; urging only the aequitie of those Laws. Then (addeth he) the Abridgement hath abused the World, in alleging those Laws, as binding Christians now, as much as they did the Jews. But with this out-cry no man will be troubled, that noteth how they are to be understood only according to their question, of human unnecessary Ceremonies, as they are such. For the Second Commandment doeth bind us as much as it did the Jews; and so the aequitie of particular Laws, as they illustrate the contents of that Commandment, bind us as much, though not in every other particular to so much, as they did the Jews. The sum is; those laws bind us as much from all religious use of human unnecessary Ceremonies, used or abused in Idolatry, as they did the Jews.

3. In the 27. Sect. the Replier could find no show of reason, beside mere affirmations. The Rejoinder findeth this Argument: If two other ways of reforming Ceremonies, beside Abolition, may be used; then abolition is not the only way. But two other ways, (namely changing or correcting) may be used. Ergo.

To this show of reason, the answer is easy: 1. If those two other ways be understood as partial and insufficient, then the Proposition is false: if as sufficient by themselves, without abolition, then I deny absolutely the Assumption, as being a mere affirmation of that which is in question, according to the Repliers observation.

2. Either this is understood of all Ceremonies abused, or only of some? If of all, our Reformation is to be blamed, which hath used abolition without any necessity. If of some only, the Defender ought to have told us, which they are, or by what mark we may know them? And omitting this, he saith neither Argumentation, nor certain affirmation in this Section.

4. The last Reason is, because Popery and Popish Rites are not to be esteemed of aequal abomination with Paganism, and Paganish Rites. The Rejoinder bringeth it to this: that the Idolatry of Papists, and Pagans, considered in themselves are not like. The Replier answered, that though this were true every way (as it is not) yet in this they may agree, that both alike are to be detested and abandoned. You speak monsters (answereth the Rejoinder) because, if they be not alike detestable, they are not alike to be detested: and Abandoning hath no degrees. But 1. The substance of this assertion was wont to be accounted no Monster. For D. Fulke (Rejoinder to Bristow, pag. 288.) maketh open profession of it, not only in his own name, but of other Divines: This we say; that Popish Images, although they be not the same that were the Images of the Heathen, yet they are as abominable Idols, as theirs; and the worshiping of them, as much to be abhorred of all true Christians, as the worshiping of the Images of the Gentiles.

2. When the Replier spake of like detestation, he did not mean to aequal the balance unto a hair, or halfe an Ace; but according to usual speech. Hearbs hot in the fourth degree, are said to be alike hot, though there may be found some difference. Willfull disobedience is said to be as the sin of Witchcraft; and stubbornness as Idolatry, 1. Sam. 15.

Yet there may some difference of degree be found betwixt these sins. Monsters therefore here was too excessive a word.

3. Abandoning I take to be all one with putting or casting away: and one thing may be cast into the bottom of a ponde, when another is cast into the bottom of the Sea. It hath therefore degrees.

To the Repliers assertion, that we are by the Scriptures warned to fly as well, and as far, from Popish, as from Paganish Idolatry, the Rejoinder (with some litigation about Rev. 18.) consenteth: but addeth that it is not necessary to fly from every human (he should have added unnecessary) Ceremony, which either Papists or Pagans have Idolatrously abused. Now this is the main question of this whole chapter: and therefore not here to be discussed. Only this: the Defender in this Section, founding himself upon a disparity betwixt Popish and Paganish Idolatry, seemeth to grant, that if they were aequal, then we were to fly from the Ceremonies abused in Popish Idolatry: and this grant the Rejoinder doeth not well to recall.

The Replier not being willing to spend time about the comparison betwixt Popish, and Paganish Idolatry, referred the Defendant to the Abridgement, and M^r. Parker. Hereupon the Rejoinder taketh upon him to answer what is found in them, about this comparison. In which discourse, because many things before answered are repeated, to ease myself, and the Reader, of tedious labor, I will only note the main grounds of his answers, pertaining directly to that comparison, and then set down some plain testimonies of our divines about it; because he partly denieth, and partly shifteth off M^r. Parkers quotations. His principal ground of answer is, that the Papists do not sin against the first Commandment, in worshipping a false God; but against the second only, in worshipping the true God, in a false manner. This he produceth (pag. 618,) as Doctor Ames his judgment: this he repeateth, pag. 624. and 630. But this is not so. For the wiser of the Heathen, knew well, that there was but one true God, Creator of all things, and the ruder of the Papists, worship Creatures, more devoutly as divine objects, then those Heathen were wont to do.

The case is plain, and plentifully confirmed by our Divines, in every dispute against Popish Idolatry. Doctor Ames hath not one word to the contrary: but this he hath for it, Bellar. Encrv. om. 2.238. The Gentiles worshipped the creatures in Idols, after the same manner almost that the Papists do. For so they answer upon August. in Psalms. 96. We do not worship a stone nor devils: whom ye call Angels do we worship, the V•rtues of the great God, and his Ministries. And Maximus Madaurensis, in the same Aug. 43. ep. Certainly, who is mad, or void of sense, that •e wi•l once doubt, whether there be more God's then one. Now we invoke the virtues of this one God, under many names, diffused thorough the frame of the whole world.

Another ground of the Rejoynders is, that the Popish Idolatry may be, in some respect as great a sin, but not simply so great Idolatry. pag. 622. &c. To which I answer briefly, that there are such sins accompanying Popish Idolatry, as make it as detestable, as if it were one simply. As for example; the worst of the Heathens Idolatry was, that they sacrificed men unto their Idols: and the Papists burning of so many godly Martyrs, for the maintenance and promoting of their Idolatry, may be equalled thereto, in horror of sin.

The third ground which the Rejoinder buildeth on, is, that Ahab's Baal was worse then Aaron's or Jereboam's calves, &c. pag. 629. About this, Calvin shall answer, Hom. 1. de Fug. Idol. Although I yield, that the Idolatry of the Gentiles of old, and of the Papists now, do differ, yet they cannot deny, that God did as severely forbid that wicked worship of Bethel, as all other superstitions which were set up in other places. But I say, that all they who truly fear and worship God, ought with so much the more detestation, and bitter hatred be against the Mass (by how much the more grossly it violates, and profaneth the holy institution of Christ) then if it had not been so Diademiterly contrary to it. Calvin seemeth here to utter greater Monsters, then those were which the Replier even now was accused for.

Unto Calvin I will add the sentences of some others, about the question: because M^r. Parkers marginal quotations are not so easily found. Beza, Epist. 1. The Papists have turned one Sacrament into that horrible Idolatry which is not heard of among the Gentiles, and of •he ta•le of the Lo•d have made it the Table of Devils. When I leave Bread-worship, there is no such kind of Magicall Idolatry under the Sun as that of the Cr•sse. Again, there is no greater Idolatry in the world, then that which was, and is commit•d in the woe•ship of the Cross. The Lord's Supper is changed of the Papists into that ab•mination, the like whereto there never was, nor can ever be devised for execrablenesse.

Blessed Bradford, in his ep. to the Lady Vane, hath these words sealed with his blood: There was never thing upon the •arth, so great, and so much an adversary to God's true service, to Christ's Death, Passion, Priest-hood, Sacrifice, and Kingdom; to the Ministry of God's Word and Sacraments; to the Church of God; to Repentance, Faith, and all true godliness of life, as the Mass. Doctor Whitaker's, de Sacram. pag. 582. Popish adoration built on the fiction of transubstantiation, is the foulest of all Idolatry. These testimonies concern the Mass, and the Cross. It were easy to add others, conc•rning divers particulars: as Sadeel, ad. Mon. Bur^a. Ar. 58. Pray for us most holy table-cloth or handkercheife of God What Idolatry is this? was there ev•r the like among the Gentiles? But for particulars, I refer the studious Reader, unto our Divines: and among them, in this pointe, I rekon Doctor Jackson, in his Original of Unbelief, Sect. 4. Cap. 22. &c. where the title is, Of the Identity, or Equivalency of Superstition, in Rome Heathen, and Rome Christian, and cap. 38. he bringeth pregnant Instances, as among other, of Vrbanus, the Patron of pleasant Companions; Gutmanus, the Warden of pudding-makers; and of S. Christopher, and S. George, men of the Painters or Heralds making; and yet adored as God's. Nay alloweth of S^r. David Linsey, denying any difference to be betwixt Heathenish and Romish Idolatry. I will only add the words of Hospinian, de Orig.

Templ. pag. 84. That some go about to lessen the Idols of Papists in comparison of that which was among the Heathens, is (that I say no more) most childishly done. Is not their Idolatry plainly recalled, the names only changed?

Yet it shall not be a miss, to give some reason of that which our Divines say. And this (for the present) is at hand: The Heathen gods (take them at the worst) were works of cunning Artificers, made of silver, gold, or some precious thing curiously wrought, sumptuously adorned, representing a Majesty. But the Papists Massegod is made by every sacrificing Ideot, of a bread substance, by uttering of a word, without form or beauty. The Heathen knew, their Idols were not God's: and the greatest estimation they had of them, was, a certain Divinity might lodge in them. The Papists believe their bread (or Hoste of starch) is very God, not by accidental residence of some Divinity in it, but as Christ himself is God. The Heathen seat their Idols in Temples, and consecrated places, to be adored. The Papists having lifted up their god, and adored him, devour him. Will any man spoil (much less eat, hearke said one, how his bones cracked, when he swallowed him down) his god? saith the Prophet, Mal. 3.8. Upon such considerations Coster, a Jesuit, (Enchirid. cap. 8.) confesseth, that if the substance of bread remain in the Sacrament, then the Idolatry of Papists is more intolerable, then the Egyptians was in worshipping of an Ox, or a Crocodile.

This may suffice for the 28. Section: but that the Rej. will needs have us take notice of some sharp phrazes, and sentences he passeth upon us. To pass by therefore his prescribing of Hellebore, for M^r. Parker (which in us he would call skurrility, if it were spoken of a Prelate, though in all intellectuals, and morals, much inferior to M. Parker) to omit (I say) this, and such like single reproaches, he gathereth a bundle together, pag. 628.

The first is, that we have wrought the faithful Servants of Christ, out of the love and estimation of many. By Faithful servants of Christ, he must needs mean Conformists, as they are Conformists; and that Generally: for if he except any kind of them, they will cast upon him that imputation, which he layeth upon us: you say unto other men; stand a loofe off; we are more holy, or more faithful then you, &c. Now 1. let any man consider, if it be any faithfulness to Christ, to observe and urge those religious Ceremonies, which he never commanded, but rather forbidden, as hath been proved? 2. Those which are in other things faithful, we go not about to work out of the love and estimation of others, but them out of the love and estimation of unfaithful conformity. May not a man speak against Non residency, if some honest man be come to it? But it becometh not the Rej. to speak of bringing Christ's servants out of love and estimation with many; while he writeth in defense of those courses, which have brought thousands of them out of house and home, into so extreme misery, as our Prelates could possibly bring any, and more then they bring the servants of Antichrist into.

The second is, that we have brought the public prayers into contempt. Because (forsooth) we would have public prayers free from those contemptible fashions which are taken out of the Mass book.

Thirdly, we have brought the preaching of the Gospel, by any conformed Ministers into disgrace. As if we did not rejoice in the preaching of the Gospel, even by Frier Paul, or Fulgentius &c. at Venice!

Fourthly, we have brought the Sacrament to be of less esteem then the gesture. Which is the proper fault of our Prelates, and those who deny the Sacrament to all that cannot bring their consciences to kneeling, though Christ hath invited them to his Table.

Fifthly, we question, whether it be lawful for one to marry with one that conformeth to the Laws. Now of this question I never heard any news, before the Rej. proclaimed it. It may be, that some, observing how divers godly women, having given themselves in marriage to some Ministers, upon a great estimation of that calling, without making just difference of the persons, have warned others to use more discretion. But this I am sure of, that all Subscribers, do testify under their hands; that all who refuse to conform, may lawfully have their Baines and Mariages forbidden: because it is provided in the Service-book, that none shall marry, except they communicate, whereto is annexed kneeling, and that none shall either communicate, or marry, except first they be Bishoped, or Confirmed.

Sixthly, we question whether it be lawful to hear a conformable Minister, if another may be heard; or safe to rely upon their Ministry? which quaestions he seemeth to invent, and teach, rather then receive from us; except, he meaneth by relying, taking all for good that they say, or do.

Seventhly, we have appropriated the surnames of Christians, the title of Syncere, the very name of the Church, the Brethren, the Godly, unto ourselves.

From all which slanders we are so free, that I doubt not to say (according to my conscience) that among those which live under the tyranny of the Pope, and do not utterly separate from him, through ignorance, there be many Christians, Syncere according to their knowledge, belonging to the true Catholic Church, and so to be accounted our Godly Brethren. But on the contrary part, Our Prelates, appropriating unto themselves the name of the Church of England, really proclaim us (by their extreme hostile courses) to be far from the account of their Christian Brethren. If some time some of us, call those among the godly that consent with us, the Brethren, the Godly, &c. the Rejoinder should not have excepted against it, at least in this roll of accusations, in the first front whereof, he styleth and surnameth Conformists, the Faithful Servants of Christ.

SECT. 29.30. Concerning our Confessions, and Practises.

IN the 29. Section, only Calvin, Martyr, and Zepperus, are brought in as witnessing something against us. But their judgments have been so declared before, that it would be a tedious repetition, to insist on them again.

In the 30. or last Section, a contradiction being soughtfor in vain, betwixt our conclusions, and our confessions and practises, the Replier thought it sufficient to dispatch all briefly, in a few questions, to which the Rejoinder answers; but so, as he bringeth little or nothing that requireth a new confutation.

The first question was about Temples, Bells, Tablecloths (objected by the Defendant) whether they have such Idolatry put upon them by Papists, as the Cross hath? The Rejoinder answereth 1. that if they have as much as the Surplice, that will serve the turn. It would indeed, in part; though nor in whole. But that cannot be proved. His second answer is, that such a Cross as ours is, was never abused at all in Popery. Which is a Metaphisicall conceit, sufficiently before confuted. His third is, that Temples and Bells, were as well abused. But the question was of such Idolatry. His fourth is, that the white linen Altar cloth was as much abused as the Surplice.

But the question was of the Cross. And 2. The Papists Altar-clothe, differeth much from the Table-clothe which we allow of.

2. The second was, if the Defender his own heart did not tell him, that there is a civil use of the things fore-named; which cannot be imagined of the Cross? The Rejoinder granteth a civil use of Bells; though not of Churches, or Communion table-clothes: Adding, that there may be a civil use of some Crosses, though not of Transient Grosses (such as ours) and also of Wafers. But he attended neither to those words of the Replier: If his own heart do not tell him; nor to those: such things. For his bringing-in first of terms, which involve the use together with the things, and that use also immedia^a, which is but mediat, in Churches, and Communion table clothes; with his contrary changing of such Crosses as ours, into some Crosses, and Wafer-God's into Waf^r-seals for letters, declare both. Concerning the difference, enough hath been said in the first part of this Fresh-suit, in the head of Ceremonies.

3. The third was, what Superstition was in the mere signification, given by Durand unto Bells, and Bell-ropes, which is not to be found in our Cross and Surplice? The Rejoinder here answereth nothing; but only noteth many more superstitious significations to have been then conceited, of diverse things, and also of Bells, then we have in our Ceremonies. But the question was only of the weight, not the number of superstitious significations.

4. The 4. was, whether the Pagans use of Bay-leaves (objected by the Defender) about 1000. years past, doeth cast such a reflection upon our civil use of Bayleaves, as Popish Superstition doeth upon our Ceremonies? The Rejoinder his answer consisteth only in words; save that he aequalleth the Countries (of Papists) to those of ancient unknowen Heathens; the time (before or after Baptism) unto a 1000. years distance; the place (crown of the head and fore-head) unto far-removed and unknowen Lands. Heer again he neglected that item of the Repliers: If his own heart doeth not tell him?

5. The fifth was, what sense the Defender had, to find fault with us, for not altering the situation of Churches? Nay (saith the Rejoinder) what face have you, to say, that he did find fault with you, for not doing it? Surely the plain country face, of taking the Defend. his words, as they stand in your Rejoinder, pag. 645. Nor do you alter the Situation of your Churches, and Chauncels toward the East.

6. The 6. was, if it be all one, to call a Ship, by the name of Castor and Pollux (Act. 28.11.) and to use a religious Ceremony, in God's worship, taken from those Idols? No, saith the Rejoinder. Which is enough to show the vanity of the Defender in comparing the names of Wensday, Thursday, Friday, unto Ceremonies taken from Popery.

7. The 7. was, whether it be one thing, to change Coapes into Cushions, and to use a Mass-vestment, in God's worship? The Rejoinder saith nothing worth the repeating.

8. The last question was, if it be not a kind of slander, to say, that the Church of Geneva imposeth a round Wafer-cake, like the Papists, to be used in the Lord's Supper. And if it be not a wide leap, to bring in the practice of Geneva, for an instance of the Nonconformists practice, in England? The Rejoinder answereth 1. Yes, it is a slander to impute unto Geneva a round Wafer-cake, like the Papists: but addeth, that the Defender did not so. If he doeth not, what mean those words of his: allbeit the Church of Geneva is not ignorant, what the round Wafer among the Papists did signify? Or what consequence made the Defender from Genevas Wafer-cake, to Ceremonies abused unto Idolatry, if the Geneva Wafer-cake be not like unto the Papists?

In the second place, the Rejoinder confesseth, that the bread used at Geneva, is a large square Cake, which is broken in sundry parcels, unto the Communicants: and yet he addeth, that it is a Wafer-Cake, as thin, as thin may be. Where it is something, that he confesseth their bread not to be like the Papists, neither in extensive quantity, nor yet in Form and Figure. But yet I am persuaded, he wrongeth that Church, in making their Cakes as thin as the Papists Host. For the Papists Host is a starchie or scummie crust, distinct from cibarius panis, bread fitting for food, by our Divines censure of it: And it is not credible, that the Church of Geneva should retain such a gross corruption. But (saith the Rejoinder) you allow their Ceremony of Wafer-bread. Nothing less. We never read, nor heard from them, that they made any Wafer fashion a Religious significant Ceremony. This Wafer was first baked in England. And if they did, they are old enough, let them answer for themselves.

But (addeth he) even unleavened bread hath been abused. Neither allow we of any Ceremonious leaving out of leaven: nor can it be proved of the Geneva Church. As for that which was added by the Replier, of custom herein praevayling against Farells, Calvin's, and Virets advise; it is confessed by the Rejoinder that these Divines had brought-in a custom of using common bread; but after some knaves working upon the relics of the former custom, brought in unleavened bread: which is enough for to confirm that which the Replier spake (as the Rejoinder saith) at random.

To the second part of the question: whether it be nor a wide leap, to bring in the Practice of Geneva, for an Instance of the Non-Conformists practice in England? The Rejoinder answereth, that it is an abuse, unruly lightness, eagerness after squibs, and scorns, which wrought the Replier out of his geares: All this it pleaseth him to lay upon this one phrase (a wide leap) a little after he had commended Hellebore unto M. Parker, with many such Drugges unto others. And what is the cause? Forsooth, because this Geneva Wafer-cake was given as an instance of our Confessions, and not of our Practice. But this is as wide, as if it had been confessed to belong to our Practice. For no such Confession of ours can be shown. It had been fitting to object nothing unto us as Confessed, but that which we have either in practice, or in writing allowed. Neither in deed was it the Defender his meaning to make all the rest of his instances our Practises, and this only our Confession: but he stumbled upon this in the ende, as a thing that must have some place among his objections; because it had been objected by others: and the Rejoinder having begun his book with the accusation of Scurrilitie, finding him to be taken, had no other way, but with this show of a distinction, to vent some salt phrases, like unto that, Vt ultima primis consentirent. 1. e. That both ends might agree.

A POSTSCRIPT.

SOME Reader may inquire whence came this new writing about Ceremonies? And he may please to be informed, that after the Abridgement was printed, a great silence followed in England, about these matters (as if enough had been said on both sides) until D. Morton, then B. of Chester, not thinking it honest, to silence Ministers, for Ceremonies, before some answer was given unto their reasons they stood upon) undertook with great confidence to give a full Answer to all which was objected.

This answer being printed, was divers years neglected, as containing little or nothing that had not formerly been confuted.

But afterward (when silence was interpreted in such sense, as if it had been a yielding consent) it was by some thought fitting, that a brief Reply should be opposed.

This the Bishop thought not worthy of his own Rejoinder; but was contented to put it off unto D. Burgess, as a friend to him, engaged in the cause, and wanting neither will, nor wit, nor words, nor credit.

And he went about it, with all his might. But finding more rubs in the way, then he had thought of, after he had spent about nine years, in Rejoyning to that which was written in some four weekes, by Special Command (procured he knoweth by whom) was compelled to thrust forth his imperfect week, full of such passionate stuff, as (it may be) upon more deliberation, he himself would have recalled.

Upon these out-cries, it was necessary to speak againe for a good cause, lest diffamation should praevayl against it.

But what good (will some say) can be expected from this writing, when the cause appeareth disperat? Surely little or none for the public: Because in our Bishops courses, Will, and Power, have justified out Reason.

But yet God's word is not bound. And if we must needs be oppressed by them, is it not worth a little ink and paper, to demonstrate, that it is in a good cause?

By this means, our consciences are justified; our afflictions made more tolerable; our oppressors though more angered, yet must of necessity be less insulting; and our names shall suffer less, though our bodies and outward estate endure more: and Posterity shall not say, that (for our own ease) we betrayed the cause, by leaving it more praepjudiced to them, then we received it from our Fore-fathers.

FINIS.

AN ADDITION Of the two last reasons of the former reply, unto which, no answer hath, as yet, been rejoined.

THE REPLYER Being not only willing, but desirous, (for the manifestation of the truth) that the Reioyner, should try his strength to the utmost.

CHAP. V.

Sect. I. ad X.

THE Authors of the Abridgment framed a strong Argument against our Ceremonies from the rules of Ceremonies prescribed in the Word, P. 43. &c. with this Argument when the Defendant was not able to grappell, as it stood in the parts combined, he thought good to sever some parcels of it, and try what he could say to them apart. Thus out of this one Argument he hath taken that which he calleth our first: and out of the same he hath made up this fifth: and yet he hath quite leſt out a great part of the sinews wherewith that one reason is knit together in the Abridgement.

The argument is taken from the scandal or offense which the imposing and using of these ceremonies do bring unto divers sorts of men.

The Defendant here maketh great flourishing in nine whole Sections, defining, deviding, and subdividing a scandal, as if he would make all clear before him: but at the end of all this preparation, he maketh no application of these Rules unto the matter in hand at all: but only, telleth his Reader, Pag. 154. That these divisions and subdivisions will expedite all difficulties, so that out of them he may collect the true and false sense of Scriptures alleged. It were sufficient therefore either to deny this power to be in his divisions: or else to set down as many other subdivisions of scandal (which were easy to do) and then tell him that these will expedite the controversy, and that from them he may collect the errors of his answer. But I will notwithstanding briefly show my opinion concerning some of these d•ctates.

The definition which he only alloweth of as accurate is▪ that a scandal is a willful offense against Christians, in provoking of them unto any damnable error or sin, by any sensible external means: Sect. 1. Wherein notwithstanding many faults may be found. For 1. every scandal is not willful, except the word be taken more largely then use of speech will allow. 2. Every scandal is not against Christians. 3. A scandal is not only by provoking to sin, but also in hindering from good. 4. What doth he mean to put in the word dānable? the occasioning of any sin, sufficeth to make up a scandal.

Among his subdivisions, the first thing I except against is, Section 5. where he distinguisheth so betwixt persons and causes, either determined or undetermined, that in matters determined by the Church (as he teacheth) obedience is to be given without respect of scandal: and only in matters undetermined there is a charitable consideration to be had of other men's consciences. This is a new and a tickle point of Divinity, touching the tenderest part of our spirits, even our consciences, and other men's also. It ought therefore either not to have been propounded, or else to be well confirmed either with testimonies, or with reasons drawn out of Scripture.

But alas the Def. thrusteth it upon us without any such warrant. The peace of the Church (saith he) is to be preferred before the grievance, i. e. scandal of any sort of men. As if the peace of the Church did not more consist in avoiding of scandals, then in observing of human Ceremonies: it is not the peace of God which is broken by a charitable care of avoiding offenses, but by rushing into them.

A scandal in the nature of it is spiritual murder. Now suppose a Superior should command a thing in it self indifferent, whereupon murder were like to follow, as to run a horse, or a cart, in a certain way, at a certain time, when it may be unwitting to the commander, little children were playing in the way, would any man's conscience serve him to do it?

Avoiding of scandal is a main duty of charity. May Superiors at their pleasure appoint how far I shall show my charity towards my brothers soul? Then surely an inferiour earthly court may cross the determinations of the high Court of Heaven.

The superiors have no power given them for destruction, but only for edification. If therefore they command scandals, they go beyond their commission: neither are we tied therein to do as they bid, but as they should bid.

If determination by superiors were sufficient to take away the sin of a scandal. Then they do very ill that they do not (so far as is possible) determine all things indifferent, that so no danger may be left in giving of offense by the use of them. Then the Church of Rome is to be praised in that she hath determined of so many indifferents; then Paul with the other Apostles might have spared a great deal of labor in admonishing the Churches how they should avoid offenses about some indifferent things. A far shorter way had been either to determine the matter finally, or else to have given order that the Churches should among themselves determine it at home.

But say that the Archbishop of Corinth (for now I suppose such a one) had called his Convocation, and with consent of his Clergy had determined that men might, and for testifying of liberty should, at a certain time eat of such and such meats which men formerly doubted of: would not yet the Apostle have given the same directiō he did? would not good Christians still have had care of their brothers consciences? Can the determination of a superior be a sufficient plea at the bar of God's judgment seat, for a man that by virtue or force thereof alone, hath done any action that his conscience telleth him will scandalize his brother?

Lastly, I would fain know whether those superiors do not give a great scandal, which take upon them determinately to impose unnecessary rites which they know many good men will be scandalized by?

The second notorious flaw which I find in the Defendant his subdivisions, is sect. 9. where he granteth that much indulgence indeed is to be used in things indifferent towards weak persons, whose infirmity proceedeth only from simple ignorance: but that only till such time as the doctrine concerning such things have been sufficiently declared: because a scandal doth always presuppose a mere weakness for want of due means of knowledge. For 1. Paul had sufficiently declared that it was lawful for him to take wages, yet he would not, 1. Cor. 9. he had given sufficient reasons for the lawfulness of eating all kind of meats, yet he abstained, and so counseled others, for fear of scandal, Rom. 14. 1. Cor. 9.2. There can be no certain set time for all sorts of men when they are sufficiently taught. 3. Who is this Def. that he dare judge so many of his fellow servants, that in such indifferencies as our ceremonies are held to be, they take offense not upon weakness, but upon presumption? 4. What authority have our Prelates to obtrude unnecessary Ceremonies upon the Church, which must be declared before they can be used? Is it fit that the people should be troubled with the declaration of men's inventions, when they are hardly brought to hear willingly the main things of the Gospel? 5. Is it not more agreeable to the wisdom of God, Exo. 21.33. to fill up the pit, then to set one by for to warn the passengers they fall not into it? 6. There was never yet sufficient declaration of this doctrine of Ceremonies throughout England. In many places there is no preaching at all. Many preach so, that they declare nothing almost to the people but their own folly. Many are ashamed, or at least unwilling to declare unto the people men's devices. Many declare them so corruptly that the scandal thereby is not removed but increased. And among those that go about with some good mind to declare this kind of doctrine, there is almost as great variety of declarations as there is of declarers: while some will have them significant some not: some say they are good and profitable to edification, and others condemning them as altogether unfit, declare them to be tolerable for avoiding of a greater mischief: Some will have them only civil, and others Ecclesiastical: some excuse all but the cross, and some extol the cross above all. Are not such declarations (think you) likely to inform well the consciences of poor men who doubt more whom they should take for a good Declarer, then they did at the first of the things themselves?

SECT. X.

AMong the instances of scandal arising from the Ceremonies, that which in the Abridgement hath the third place is set first by the Def. viz. that the superstitious Papist will be hardened in the liking of his abominable Religion, from which he seeth we borrow our ceremonies, and increase in his hope of the full restoring of it again. To this the Def. answereth, that our rites are not the ceremonies of Papists, because they are purged from superstition. But 1. that they are not purged from all superstitiō hath sufficiently been declared before. 2. This plea of transubstantiating of Ceremonies by the breath of our Convocation, is a mere shift, contrary not only to the language of all our Divines, and to that which every man's senses do tell him, but also to the public profession of the Church of England, in the preface to our service-book, as it is cited by him, pag. 127. For there we are told, 1. that an abatement is made of the exc•sse of Popish Ceremonies: All therefore are not abolished, but some remain. And which be they, if these in question be not? 2. That some of the old Ceremonies do remain. What sense can be given of these words, if our Ceremonies be not the same with those which were of old among the Papists? if it were meant of old ceremonies not used among the Papists, then they do not remain, nor are retained, but restored. 3. That none are devised anew: therefore they must needs be taken from the Papists, or from the Fathers: but of the Fathers surplice or kneeling at the communion, no instance can be given: and as for the cross, the Def. himself will not defend, I think, all that use which the Fathers putt it to. 3. The Papists own words do sufficiently manifest how they are hardened by the imposition and use of our ceremonies. For as it is shown in the Abridgement p. 25. they seek to justifye their superstition by this, that we have borrowed our ceremonies from them. And some of them thence conclude (as there is shown) that our Governors like well of their superstition Beside Gretser, a principal Jesuit saith, that in these ceremonies our Ministers are as Apes of Popish Priests, Apol. pro Gregor. 7. pag. 8. and in his defense, tom. 2. lib. 4. cap. 16. saith, that our Convocation house in imposing these Ceremonies, do cross the judgment of our best Divines. Lastly, the respect of that Popish superstition wherewith our people were then generally infected, was the chief, if not the only cause why these ceremonies were retained by our first Reformers. See more of this in M. Parker, p. 2. c. 6. sect. 10.

SECT. XI.

THE second instance is, that the profane will draw many argument he•ce to b•sse himself in his contempt of all Rel•g•on. The Defen. asketh, from whence? I answer, from hence: 1. that Religious rites are invented by men, and appointed to be used in God's worship, even after the same manner that God's Ordinances are, or at least were of old: 2. That trifles are urged, to the increasing of contention: 3. that many place such holiness in these things which they know to be men's devises: 4. that other ceremonies are cried down, as if they were against Religion, which yet are every way as good as these: 5. that religious men are more molested for these toys, then they are for their profaneness.

SECT. XII.

THE third instance of scandal is in weak brethren, who will be drawn to yield unto the ceremonies against their consciences, or else doubtingly: and some also will grow to dislike some Ministers for these things, and so be hindered from profiting by their ministry. To this the Def. answereth in many words: but the sum of all he saith is, that these are not weak brethren, because they have been diligently catechised by Non-conformists. But 1. the Corinthians no doubt were diligently catechised: & yet there were many weak among them. 2. The Def. I hope taketh order (or else he may be ashamed) that all his Diocese be diligently catechised; yet I think he will not say but there are many weak souls in that circuit: 3. The Catechisers he speaketh of have had enough to do, to teach the people the main points of Religion, as for instructing them concerning the lawfulness of human ceremonies, they left that to those that impose them, or to their servants: 4. After long teaching & sufficient knowledge, there may be still a weakness in regard of some things, through many circumstances required unto strength, beside bare knowledge. Lastly, we confess, that (upon supposition that the Def. his doctrine be found in these points) we are yet weak in these points, as we are also in some other, wherein our adversaries are so strong, that they can bear many Churches and such like things, upon their shoulders, without feeling any burden of them, which we cannot. See M. Park. cap. 6. sect. 18.

SECT. XIII.

THE fourth instance is thus set down in the Abridgement, pag. 50. As there is danger in the use of these ceremonies in all Congregations, so especially if they shall be brought back again unto those, where they have been long out of use, In this case Calvin, Brenz, Bucer, Hemingius, Beza, Grinaeus and other great Divines esteem them wicked and unlawful.

To all this the Def. giveth no answer: but only taketh occasion to make a frothy comparison betwixt the laws and power of particular Congregations, and the whole Convocation house. Which because it neither pertaineth to the present purpose, nor containeth anything of moment, I leave as I found: though it may be easily proved, that many particular Congregations can tell better what is fitting for their edification in some things, then all our National Convocation. Nay, I dare boldly say, there is no Town of note in all England, but twelve men may be chosen out of, which would find out Canons more to the edification of all the Congregations in England, then those are, which B. Bancroft with his Clergy, concluded.

SECT. XIII.

A Fift instance, or rather an enlargement of the former is, in respect of the Ministers who have formerly refused the ceremonies, for whereas the Minister is bound to lead his people forward unto perfection, and to provide by all good means, that his ministry be not despised: by this means he shall draw them back again unto the liking of superstition: or at least not to dislike it so much as they have done, and give them evident occasion to b^lame his Ministry, and to call in question the truth of all his doctrine.

Here the Defen. cometh upon them with open mouth, avouching peremptorily, that this is a false, presumptuous, irreligious, partial, and pernicious pretense: and all this he will prove. If he can, we shall the easilier bear these great words. But why is it false? forsooth, because most of the Non-conformists have once subscribed: the contradicting of which subscription is no less a matter of discredit then returning unto conformity. What kind of proof is this? because they were subject to another discredit, therefore this is no discredit. Beside it doth not appear, nor is likely that most of these Ministers did ever absolutely subscribe: neither is it likely; because it is well known how easy and how ordinary it was in Queen Elizabeth's days, to enter into the Ministry without passing under that gallows. If the most had, yet how would this prove it a false pretence in the rest? If all had done so, yet this was no act of their Ministry, nor known it may be to their people, and therefore the crossing of it did not so directly tend to the discrediting of their Ministry, as the crossing of their public doctrine. Lastly, that which is done before a man be settled in the Ministry at one time, without any great deliberation, is not of such note as that which a man hath long professed and persuaded by reasons taken from the word of God. By all this it appeareth, that this first accusation of Ialshood was rather an adventure as the Def. himself calleth it, then a grounded assertion.

He did but adventure neither to call the same plea pr^osumptuous. For he can find no other reason to bear up this charge withal then, that they seem to arrogate to themselves a pre^ogative proper to the Apostles. How can this be I wonder, seeing they follow herein the direction of the Apostle himself, Tit. 2.15. Let no man despise thee. What this prerogative is, he doth not plainly tell us: but compriseth it in two places of Scripture, 1. Cor. 15. Gal. 2.18. the first whereof is nothing at all to the purpose. For the Apostle doth not say as the Def. maketh him, If we be found false witnesses, then is your faith in vain: but if Christ be not risen; then are we false witnesses, and your faith is vain: Which also any preacher of the Gospel may say without falsehood or presumption to his people. The second place, If I build again that which I have destroyed, I make myself a prevaricator, is applicable to any Minister that hath taught the truth against Popish superstition. This very doctrine M. Perkins gathereth out of the words. Proculcavimus superstitionem Papisticam &c. I hope the Def. doth not think he may build up any superstition, and not be accounted therefore a prevaricator: if he do; or though he do not, let him consider where the presumption lieth.

But why irreligious? because it is persisting in an error, for the preservation of their own credit. But 1. who taught the Def. to make that which is in question the ground of an accusation in dispute. First, let him prove that it is an error, before he take it so for granted, that upon that ground he will challenge men's reasons as irreligious. 2. It is not their credit, but the credit of their Ministry which they speak of. 3. Is it such an irreligious thing, to desire that certain ceremonies may not be imposed upon them, lest their Ministry be by that means prejudiced?

Why partial? because men should rather yield to conformitie for the credit of the Church: i. e. for the credit of the Convocation house. Alas, the credit which a great part of that generation doth seek for, is that they may rejoice in our flesh. But suppose they meant sincerely: would the Def, have men discredit and prejudice their Ministry, to bring some credit unto other men's decrees? Or doth the forbearing of some ceremonies bring such discredit to the Authorizers of them? surely then they are more for the honor of mortal men, then for the honor of God. For God's honor and worship is no ways prejudiced by their absence.

The last charge is pernicious. And here many words are used to give countenance unto that one. The main ground is, Woe to me if I preach not the Gospel; and Simon lovest thou me? then feed my sheep. Whereupon he gathereth, that it is a pernicious thing for a Minister to putt himself unto silence. But 1. what is this to the question of discrediting ones Ministry? 2. Although we were most worthy to have these remembrances out of Scripture rubbed upon us yet the Prelates are altogether unworthy and unfit to do it. Let any man conceive with himself B. Bancroft, or any other in the end of the Convocation, after all the Canons were concluded, coming forth as Prolocutor, and speaking thus to the Ministers assembled together before him. Men and brethren, the reverend fathers of this Convocation, as they always meditate on the law of God, and every part of it, both day and night: so especially do they lay to heart those passages of holy Writ which properly concern their office: as woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel: and Simon lovest thou me? feed my sheep. Out of these considerations, being carried with a fervent zeal both of preaching themselves in their several places, & also of procuring more faithful Preachers, & more fruitful preaching throughout the land, they have ever and above the institutions of Christ, appointed certain ceremonies strictly to be observed of every Minister: so that whosoever shall hereafter upon any pretense refuse to observe the same, they shall be esteemed factious, schismaticall, disorderly, exorbitant men, and for that cause by their ordinary suspended and deprived. Now for the preventing of such a mischief your tender mother would have you to understand by my mouth, that if any man be thrust out of the Ministry for not yielding to these constitutions, howsoever they may seem unto him such as the Church cannot lawfully appoint, nor he observe, yet is he author of his own silencing: and therefore you must all be exhorted to consider well of those parcels of Scripture which have so much prevailed with your careful mother. Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel: Simon lovest thou me? feed my sheep.

Would not he that heard such a speech as this from a Prelate be forced to call for a bason? and after he had recovered himself he might well give answer in these words. I hear the word of a deceitful tongue. Behold thou art called a Bishop and gl•riest in that title: thou persuadest t•y self, thou art a chief guide and father of the Church, thou therefore that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that sayest it is a woeful thing not to preach the Gospel, doest thou neither preach Christ faithfully, nor suffer those that would? Darest thou by thine own authori•y, and for t•ine own pleasure, hinder so many able men from preaching? thou that professest the flock must be fed, doest thou thrust o•t feeders, and keep in starvers? Therefore thou art inexcusable, O Prelat, whosoever thou art, that condemnest another for that whereof thou art both beginning and ending.

Thirdly, the Apostles woe, 1. Cor. 9. belongeth to negligent, slothful, and careless ministers properly, such as our Prelates know where to find enough, who y•t neither feel nor fear that woe from the Bishops which m•ny faithful preachers are wrapped-in from time to time.

Fourthly, the Apostle doth not pronounce any woe for not preaching, where imprisonment do•h hinder. Now he whose conscience is against the ceremonies, or doubteth of them, is spiritually imprisoned, so that he cannot by using of them, make his way to the pulpit.

Fifthly, it is a mere jest, though a bitter one, to say, that we leave our ministries: when we do all that our consciences will suffer us to do, for the holding of our places: and when we have done all that, depart against our wills with sorrow. Non discedit a station, qui cedit invitus. See M. Parker, p. 1. c. 4. s. 14.

But the Defendant undertaketh to prove, that the cause of silencing is not in the Bishops that suspend and deprive us, but in ourselves. He is as it seemeth, a great adventurer: For he cometh forth upon this piece of service with flying colors: Know you well what you s•y (saith he) when you lay the cause of your silencing upon the Bishops? Yes surely, very well. For a cause is that which bringeth force or virtue to the being of another thing.

Now the first virtue (or rather vice) which tendeth to silencing of Ministers in this case, is in the Bishops canons: they therefore are the first cause. The second virtue is in the Bishops and their officers, which are executioners of those unconscionable canons: they therefore are the secondary cause. Non-conformity hath no virtue in it of it own nature, nor by God's ordinance, to bring forth such an effect as the silencing of God's Ministers is: though it be made an occasion by the perverseness of our Prelates. I know well what I say: and will make it good against the Defendants vain pretences. The case standeth thus (saith he) Titus (it had been more proper to say Diotrephes) the Bishop doth deprive Titius a factious and schismatical minister, that he may place Sempronius a peaceable and discreet man, in his stead. In this proceeding, the intendement of Titus is not absolutely to deprive Titius, as he is a Minister, but as he was factious: yet so only respectively, that Titius being deprived, he may constitute Sempronius: for the charge of a Bishop is not determinate to appoint precisely this min•ster: but indefinite, to ordain a minister, so that the course of God's plow is still preserved and continued. But as for Titius, who will rather be silenced then conform, it is evident, that the cause of his silencing being his own refractarinesse, which is only personal & proper to himself, and yet hath no faculty in himself to appoint or admit of a successor: he may be said to have properly caused his own suspension and deprivation.

This case needeth no long demurring on: for there is not one sentence in all the length of it, which doth not smell, without any uncasing, 1. are all those factious and schismatical men, that refuse to conform? was Hooper such a kind of man? was Peter Martyr, and M. Perkins such, when one at Oxford, and the other at Cambridge, refused to wear the Surplice? was M^r. Goodman, M^r. Deering, M^r. More, M^r. Rogers, and such like heavenly men, the lights & glory of our churches, were all these factious and schismatical? In the presence of God it is well known they were not. But our Prelates have this prerogative, they may dubb whom they please factious and schismatical, & after that, there is no redemption, they must be such, be they otherwise never so full of all grace.

2. Are all peaceable discreet men, which are placed in the deprived ministers stead? For the best of them, they are still as great eye-sores to our Bishops almost as the other: because they reprove a great deal of Episcopal darkness, by their practices. For the rest, the congregations over whom they are set, cannot find it, the voice of all the country is otherwise for many of them; yet according to the Prelates measure, who meat (as it seemeth) the virtues and vices of a minister by certain ceremonies of their own imposing, it cannot be denied, but the most of them are very peaceable and discreet: Even so as many of the Bishops themselves were known to be afore they were Bishops, and show themselves to be still: for, Episcopatus plures accepit, quam fecit bonos.

3. What sense can this have, The Bishop depriveth Titius respectively, that he may constitute Sempronius? Doth he know beforehand whom he shall constitute? then there is gross legerdemaine, betwixt him, and that Sempronius. For with what conscience can one seek and the other assign the place of him that is in possession? This is but some time in those benefices which are fatter, and whose patrons are more foolish. Ordinarily. the vilest minister that is to be found, may succeed in the place of him that is deprived, for ought the Bishop knoweth, or for ought he can do, except he will endure a quare impedit, which in case of moral unworthiness, hath scarce been ever heard of.

4. The charge which he saith our Bishops have of appointing Ministers, I wonder from whence they have it, or by what conveyance. They say that they themselves are the proper pastors of all the parishes in their Diocese. It is well, if they have an ubiquitary faculty, and will, to perform the office of pastors to so great a people: but who made them such? Christ & his Apostles never knew of ordinary pastors, having charge of so many Churches. But suppose they did, by whom doth Christ call one of our Bishops? By the Kings congedelie, the Chapters nominal election, or by the Archbishops consecration? There is none of these that can bear the trial of Scripture, nor of the Primitive Churches example?

5. Is the Bishops power of appointing a minister no ways determinate to this or that minister? then it seemeth his mere will determineth of the particular person, without any just reason. For if there be certain causes or reasons which the Bishop is bound to follow in designing of this or that minister, rather than another, then is the Bishop determinate. The Council of Nice it self determined the authority even of Patriarchs in this case: viz. that the Elders should first nominate fit men 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : secondly, that the people should elect or choose out of that number, per 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : & thirdly, that the Bishop should confirm the elected 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Socrat. l. x. p. 177. What exorbitant power is this then which our Bishops do now-a-days challenge unto themselves? All Classical Divines do consent to that which Junius setteth down, Conc. 5. l. 2. c. 6. n. 73. that no Bishop can send or appoint a Minister, sine certa ac justa ecclesiae postulatione, without the certain forechoyce of the Church: Id enim esset obtrudere, non mittere, for that were to obtrude him, not to send him.

6. How is the course of God's plow preserved, when for the most part the succeeding Minister is thrust upon the people against their wills, and so pernicious contentions arise, of which the Bishop is cause procreant and conservant, by depriving the people of their minister, and obtruding his own minister upon them, and upholding him in all those courses whereby he grieveth the poor people.

7. As the Minister hath no faculty in himself to appoint a successor, so hath not the Bishop neither of himself, and by himself.

Thus much for the Defendant his case. Whereas he addeth, that Beza and M^r. Cartwright determined with him in case of the Surplice. I answer 1. they did not so for the cross. 2. they did not so for subscription to either. 3. they did not so but by way of toleration, requiring also that men did speak against the imposing of the Surplice. 4. Beza was not thoroughly acquainted with the state of our Church. M^r. Cartwright (as I have been certainly informed by his own son) recalled that passage of his book, and desired that his revoking of it might be made known.

I thought good, overseeing the Press, to confirm the Authors report, by a more particular relation which I have received from a person of good credit, set down in writ as followeth.

MR. Cartwright being beyond the seas, in printing the rest of his 2. Reply, wherein that indulgence is, sent to the Ministers of England who sought reformation with him, for their opinion of the use of the Surplice in case of deprivation: 22. of whom met thereabout: of whom 19 jointly agreed that it was simply unlawful in any case, but the other three said otherwise; wherefore it was agreed by all, that each part should write their opinion, and their reasons to him, which they did: but the letter of the nineteen miscarried, and that of the other three was delivered, which he taking as the letter of the whole, supposed their joint consent had been, that the loss of the ministry altered the case of the unlawfulness, & so that they were all against him; whereupon he mistrusting his own judgment, and being much perplexed thereabout, suffered himself to be swayed unto what is there written: but afterward understanding the right, he was much more perplexed; yea (as he said) more then ever he was, in that to the great prejudice of the truth, he had suffered his conscience to be so defiled▪ which was forbidden, 1. Cor. 8.7. which he bartily sorrowed to many, professing that if he again put pen to paper about that subject, he would clear the cause, and blame himself, praying them to signify the same freely in the mean time, the which they did, so that it ever since hath been currant among all his friends, and constantly affirmed by them to all on due occasions, and particularly affirmed to M. Sprint by a Gentleman in the presence of one Nobleman, two Gentlemen, 27. Ministers, and many professors, in his course, in the scanning his book then about to be printed divers years before it was printed, sundry also of those ministers avouched the same, some on their own knowledge, others upon undoubted testimony, which yet is ready to be avouched in due case of need, and should now be expressed, were not the naming of the avouchers dangerous unto them, and so not to be done without their knowledge, which now cannot be.

For the point it self, when a man doth but stand in doubt betwixt using the ceremonies, and suffering of deprivation, it must needs be more safe, patiently to suffer himself to be thrust from his ministry, then to retain it and offend his conscience by using the Ceremonies. For to be restrained by authority from his lawful function, because he will not yield to the doing of that which to him is sin, is no more sin in the sufferer, then to surcease his public preaching whilst he is held in prison, where he wanteth occasion. Thus the use of that is avoided, which he disalloweth, and the blame of leaving his standing, is theirs who cast him from thence, and not his. So no sin is committed either in the use of that he disalloweth, or in sustaining deprivation. But to hold his place, and to practice against conscience, is to commit one great sin at the least.

Thus having examined the Defend. his adventurous charges of false, presumptuous, irreligious, partial, and pernicious, I find them all to be but rash words of distemper.

SECT. XV.

IN the last place, the Defendant bringeth forth to answer the words of the Apostle, 1. Thess. 5.22. Abstain from all appearance of evil. But as this argument is not found at all in that page of the Abridgment which he citeth, so in the words or sense which he setteth down, I dare say it is not used either of them, or any other against the ceremonies. Yet let us hear his answer. The Apostle speaketh (saith he) of the opinions of private men. But 1. what warrant hath he to restrain a general precept, when the universalitie of it agreeth with the law? Abstain from all appearance, saith the Apostle: i. e. saith the Def. from some private opinions. 2. Why must appearance of evil be needs understood of opinions only? two or three interpreters indeed do understand it of doctrine most properly: but the most otherwise; and the word translated appearance, signifying rather an object of seeing then of hearing, leads us rather to the eye, as in actions, gesturs, garments, then to the ear in doctrines. 3. For that which he addeth of private men's opinions, there is no circumstance of the text, nor any reason or authority that doth warrant such a gloss.

SECT. XVII.

AMong his accusations wherein he chargeth us with manifold scandals, the first is, that some weak ones by occasion of these differences, stand amazed, and so become more remiss in profession or religion. Where 1. it is to be observed, that when we spake of weak-ones sect. 12. it was putt off with this pretence, that they were such as we had catechised. Now then, who are these weak-ones? I hope the Bishops provide that people of their Dioceses are well catechised:

whence then is this weakness. 2. Differences in matters of circumstance are not wont to breed scandal, until some authority enjoin uniformity, as we may see in the primitive Churches. 3. If differences be the occasion of this scandal, surely those that differ from us, may as well be accused therefore, as we that differ from them, especially when we urge nothing of ours upon them, but they impose their own devices upon us, and so are causes of the differences. 4. The amazement which some have, wondering what will be the event of differences, is no damnable error, which by the Def. is required to a scandal, sect. 1. And if they grow remiss in religion upon it, that is their sin. I am sure zeal against superstition, and for pure and undefiled worship, hath no fitness in it to work remissness in religion: but urging of human devices in God's worship, tendeth directly thither.

SECT. XVIII.

The second charge of scandal, is in respect of the Separatists. Where 1. I ask, if Gaius had made a separation from the Church wherein Diotrephes lived, whether the Apostle John had been cause of that scandal, because he condemned his abuse of excommunication, John. 3.9.10. 2. If any separate from churches where Images are retained, who is the cause, they that dislike of Images, or they that retain them? 3. The dislike of Ceremonies is not the chief cause for which separation is made: but the intolerable abuses which are in Ecclesiastical Courts, by which it cometh to pass, that many poor men being troubled at the first for a small thing, afterward are driven to fly the country: and flying with a hatred of such courses, are ready to receive that impression which is most opposit unto them. The thing it self is plain enough to all indifferent men, that Ecclesiastical corruptions urged and obtruded, are the proper occasion of separation.

SECT. XIX. XX.

IN the next place the Papists are alleged as persons offended by Non-conformity, because they are utterly unperswadeable to enter into a Church where all ancient rites are professedly rejected. But 1. the refusing of conformity by the Ministers, do not, I hope, make these ancient rites (much less all) to be professedly rejected by our Church, For then we may plead the profession of our mother as well as the Defendant: which he I am sure will not grant. 2. This assertion which is given as a reason, is evidently false. For in Scotland, France, the Low countries, and such like Churches, where none of these ceremonies are retained, the power of God's word (which doth not depend on human Ceremonies (is as effectual to the conversion of Papists, as in England. 3. How doth this agree with that which the Defendant hath so often told us, that our ceremonies are not the same with the Papists Ceremonies: and that the Papists have no great conceit of our ceremonies, cap. 2. sect. 11. 4. If our contentions about these things be a scandal to the Papist, let them look to it that cast these apples of contention into the Church, under the pretense of peace and uniformity. 5. One minister without conformity, as old M. Midsy of Ratsdell, who was after silenced for his labor, hath converted more Papists then any (I might say then all) of the Bishops in England, with all his Ceremonial observations. 6. It is well known that there are far more Papists and Popishly affected in those places where ceremonies are most observed, then where they have been difused. 7. It is answered in the Abridgement, pag. 47.48. that ceremonies are not for the edification of the Papists, but for the hardening of them. And that Papists are not so much to be respected as brethrē. To the latter of which words, the Defendant replieth with a descant upon the term brethren, sect. 20. but saith nothing at all to the purpose. 8. What manner of converts they are usually who are addicted to human ceremonies, we may see in the Archbishop of Spalato, and such others.

SECT. XXI.

THE greatest scandal of all (saith the Defend.) is against the Church. Now this Non-conformists are made guilty of two ways: 1. comparatively in this section, & then absolutely in the next. The comparative accusation is, that we for avoiding of offense towards our brethren, grievously offend our mother, in that wherein we owe obedience unto her. Where 1. the question is taken for granted, for we deny that we owe obedience in the ceremonies to any man or society of men. 2. If our mother be somewhat angry, that is not presently a scandal by his definition, sect. 1. but when she is provoked to a mortal error. Now what mortal error do we provoke the Church to? Our desire and scope is, that the Ceremonies should be either wholly removed, or else left free to use or disuse: this is no mortal error, I hope. The event by accident is the silencing, depriving excluding, and molesting of us for Nonconformity: This indeed is a great error and sin of the Prelates: but as was formerly shown, the beginning of it is in their irregular Canons, and the ending of it, in the cruel executions. 3. By applying ourselves to the will of the Prelates in these Ceremonies, we should, though not anger, yet greatly scandalize them, by confirming them in a sin of making their own will a rule to the Churches, even in mystical ceremonies of superstitious worship, contrary to their and our daily prayer, Thy will be done. 4. The convocation doth not carry herself like a mother toward us: neither do we acknowledge any such honor to belong unto it. As for the faithful congregations of England, the greatest part of them would willingly be rid of these burdens.

The rest of this Section is nothing pertinent: yet two things may be noted in it. 1. An error that the number of Jewish Proselytes was great, and the converted Gentiles few, Act. 15. 2. A gross assertion, that after the doctrine of Indifferency in eating of meats, was made public by the Church, then to have sought by abstaining to avoid the offense of some, had been to the prejudice of Christian liberty, and to the scandal of the Church.

The other accusation of contempt, is only objected Sect. 2. and varnished over with a few glosing words Sect. 23. and therefore may well be answered with contempt. But he that will see a full refutation of this, let him read M^r. Parker chap. 5. sect. 11.12. I am weary of wrestling with the wind: yet one unworthy and unchristian taunt I cannot pass by, that he upbraideth the Ministers with, living upon voluntary contribution, and fear of offending their maintainers. For 1. when as he confesseth, he hath no windows to look into men's consciences by, what rule of religion will permit him to cast upon his brethren such a suspicion contrary to their profession, of practicing and speaking against their consciences for gaining of a poor contribution? Is there not far more cause to think, that great livings, and worldly honors (one of the choicest darts that Satan hath in his quiver, and therefore tried against our Savior himself when all other failed, Mat. 4.8, 9.) is it not more likely I say that these promotions bear more sway in the minds of our great Prelates, then a poor supply of necessaries with others? 2. Neither all, nor the most part of them against whom he writeth did live upon contributions. Though they need not have been ashamed thereof if they had: seeing not only the primitive Pastors did so, but even in our time, M^r. Perkins and other such lights of our Church, have with that kind of life done more good then all our Cathedral men with their great revenues. 3. Who are the cause that many are forced to live upon contribution? have not the Loiterers of Cathedral Churches engrossed a great part of that maintenance whereby laboring Preachers should be maintained? Do not our Pluralists and Non-residents carry away the fa• of the greatest livings, & leave scarce a Serving-man's wages to their Curats; so that either they must be supplied by contributiō, or else by begging? Nay, do not the people in divers places take it for a great courtesy at the Non-residents hands, if he will take his Tithes and suffer them to procure and maintain to themselves an honest minister in his place? have not our honorable Parliament offered to provide some competent maintenance for the Ministers, if the Clergy would forbear their sinful excesses? 4. Why should the Ministers depend so much upon contribution, if they had such accommodative consciences, as this Def. surmiseth of them? Some of them with serving the time, and the addition of Simony, might come to be Bishops: and the rest might be preferred by their means to some certain incomings.

CHAP. VI.

Sect. III.

NOW we are come to the sixth and last general Argument, viz. that the imposition of these ceremonies is opposite unto Christian liberty. Here the Def. observeth first, that the state of this question is about liberty from the necessary observation of such things as are in their own nature indifferent. This (saith he) the Objector implieth. But I answer, the Objector doth not imply it: he speaketh of ceremonies lawfully appointed by man, that these are to be used as things indifferent. Neither if one private Obj. had granted it, ought it therefore to be set, down as the received state of the question, seeing the Abridgment, which in the defense is chiefly opposed, doth everywhere deny the cerem. to be in their own nature indifferent. But let that pass and examine his resolution. There be two kinds of necessities incident unto human precepts and ordinances, in the case of indifferency: one is necessity of obedience to the commandment, which cannot properly prejudice Christian liberty: the other is doctrinal necessity: when any of those properties which are essential unto divine ordinances are attributed unto a human constitution: as 1. immediately to bind the conscience: 2. to be a necessary means to salvation: 3. to hold it altogether unalterable by the authority of man: this is a presumption and prevarication, not only against Christian liberty, but also against the sovereignty of God himself. But 1. what meaneth this new distinction betwixt necessity doctrinal and obediential? doct•inall before pag. 3. was opposed unto ceremonial: now unto obediential: both without logic, or sound reason. 2. He should have told us what kind of necessity obediential he meaneth: for Bellar. de pont. rom. l. 4. c. 17. useth the same pretence of obedience, and alledgeth the same places of Scripture for it: and yet is confuted by Junius, Whitaker's, and our Divines. 3. If there be doctrinal necessity, in all those human constitutions, which have properties attributed unto them essential unto divine ordinances, then our ceremonies in controversy not only have such a mystical signification attributed unto them as is proper unto Divine Ordinances; but also that they are imposed as parts of God's worship. 4. For the three properties, which the Def. mentioneth, they are such as Papists in imposing of their ceremonies (which yet by the judgment of all our Divines deprive men of Christian liberty) do disclaim. As for immediate binding of men's consciences; no learned Papist useth such a phrase. Azorius a Jesuit instit. mor. parte 1. lib. 5. cap. 6. saith expressly, that human laws do not bind, direct, proxime, & perse: directly, immediately, & of themselves. Bellarmine also, de Rom. pont. l. 4. cap. 20. ad arg. 9. saith as much: Leges humanae non obligant sub poena mortis, nisi quatenus violatione legis humanae offenditur Deus, i. e. they do not immediately bind men's consciences. For necessity to salvation, the same Bellarmine de verb. non script. c. 11. saith plainly, That those things which are simply necessary unto salvation are set down in Scripture; and that the rest are not simply necessary. And it is plain enough that they do not hold them altogether unalterable by that authority which brought them in: for beside, that no reasonable man can deny so manifest a truth, they have altered many ancient Rites, as all the learned know. So that the Defendant his distinction is proved nothing else but a confusion, common to him with the Papists, to our ceremonies and theirs.

SECT. IV. V.

IN the 4. Section, the Def. objecteth to himself under the name of the Abridgement, the words of the Apostle, 1. Cor. 7.35. This I speak to your profit, not that I might cast a snare upon you, showing that the imposition of necessity upon things indifferent, is a very snare of men's consciences. Now though these words are not in the Abridgement, yet because as D. Whitaker's saith, de pont. cap. 4. qu. 7. aureus hic locus est, nostrae libertatis vindex: This is a golden charter of liberty: therefore it is worthy of due consideration. The sum of the Def. his answer is, that to impose a necessity where God hath left a liberty, is indeed a snare: but this necessity is not taught in our Church. I answer it is taught in our church (now a days) that ecclesiastical canons do bind men's consciences. It is taught in our church that man's will is a sufficient reason for these Canons about Cer. It is taught in our church, that Sacraments may not be administered, or God publicly served without these cerem: that Ministers called and allowed of God, for these ceremonies must be silenced; that they are to be excommunicated ipso facto, and accursed which oppose themselves unto them. It is taught also, that though a man doubteth in his conscience of the lawfulness of them, though evident scandal will follow upon the using of them, yet they may not be omitted. If this be not necessity enough to ensnare a man's conscience, I know not what then is.

In the fifth Section two places are objected out of the Abridgement, viz. Gal. 5.1. Col. 2.20. and one of them after a fashion answered. The first answer is, that the Apostle there speaketh only of Jewish rites, which is Bellarmine's answer just, de eff. sacr. c. 32. loquitur Paulus de servitute Iudaica, qua servierant illi sub antiqua lege. The second answer is, that the Apostles meaning was of such an observation of these ceremonies as had an opinion of necessity, overthrowing the New Testament, and establishing the old. So Bellarmine. ibid. Illi cum circumcidi vellent, excidebant à gratia Christi, & simul obligabant se ad omnem legem servandam: quod prorsus erat redire ad statum veteris testam•nti. We on the other side with Danaus against tha• place of Bell. say, generale est

Pauli dictum & praeceptum: the words are general, belonging to all parts of Christiā liberty, though principally there applied to one.

Now the servitude from which Christ hath made us free is not only in those things which the Def. speaketh of, but also as Iun. cont. 3. l. 4. c. 17. n. 19 & 21. showeth in subjection of our consciences unto elements of man's appointing, Gal 4.10. and unto the will of men, 1. Cor. 7.23. which place Beza well noteth, is to be understood of superstitions which some do foolishly call indifferent things. It is not only therefore a freedom from Jewish Ceremonies, but also and even therefore as D. Whitaker's gathereth from all human ceremonies that bind or press our consciences, Whit. de rom. pont. q. 7. c. 3. ad 5. But it is in vain for me to allege our Divines in this question: the Abridgement alledgeth diverse, whom the Def. would not vouchsafe an answer.

One thing here the Def. noteth, that in the Abridgment mystical and carnal are unsoundly confounded. But I say, this is unsoundly collected: for these two are joined together there only in respect of Jewish worship, and that which imitateth it: And therefore it is to no end to instance in the Sacraments instituted by Christ, of clear signification, and accompanied with the promise and lively working of the Spirit. The same poor instance hath Bellarmino de cult. l. 3. c. 7. for significant ceremonies.

But it savoreth of the flesh (saith the Def.) to call our ceremonies carnal. Why so I pray? the Jewish ceremonies deserved that name, you yourself say, even when they were in force: and surely ours devised by man, abused by idolaters, without necessary use, destitute of all promise and spirit, are far more worthy to be called carnal, then God's own Ordinances. Those were only carnal because in comparison they were external, heavy, dull things: but ours are more heavy and dull, and beside they are sinfully carnal, as hath been proved.

But what soundnesse doth this savor of, that the Def. saith generally of the Jewish Ceremonies, they signified first and primarily outward and carnal promises, shadowing heavenly things only under a second veil? I will not exagitat this assertion, because it is in the by.

SECT. VI.

HERE an objection is feigned out of the Abridgment pag. 34. I say feigned, because there is none such found in the place quoted. That which is there spoken concerning other Popish ceremonies, is a sixth proof of the second Argument, distinct from the fifth, whereto that of Christian liberty doth belong. That also is handled by the Def. c. 3. l. 7. and there maintained against him. So that this might well be omitted. Yet because there is some force in the consequence, let us hear his Defense. The objection which he frameth is this: If these Ceremonies do not take away our Christian liberty, and in snare the consciences of men, by their imposition: how shall not the Popish Ceremonies be excusable, and free from accusation in this behalf? His answer is, that Popish Ceremonies do infringe Christian liberty, both in regard of their nature, and also in regard of their number. And of both these M. Calvin giveth witness. I answer 1. for the nature, it hath been shown before, that a multitude of Popish Ceremonies have no other nature & necessity allowed unto them by the learned Papists, then ours have by the Defendant himself. See for this Bellarmino de effect. sacr. c. 30. That which M^r. Calvin saith of this point is true, notwithstanding in regard of the conceit which is commonly among the simple Papists, fostered by unlearned Monks, Friars, and other Priests, for filthy lucre sake. 2. The comparisons which M^r. Calvin use, viz. That it is held among the Papists a greater wickedness to omit auricular Confession, then to live impiously: eat flesh on fasting days, then to live in fornication; to work on Saints holy days, then to act mischief, &c. These he gathereth principally frō that practice of the Papists, whereby they punish more severely the breach of their Ceremonies then of God's Law. Now this is not only practiced by our Prelates, but also maintained by this Defendant, chap. 2. sect. 12. with such fair pretence, as the Papists may well use for the Defense of their practice. 3. As for the multitude of Ceremonies among the Papists, that maketh their bondage greater then ours; but doth it make ours none at all? Besides, when a few mystical human Ceremonies are admitted, the gate is set open for a multitude: even until the Convocation will say there be too many. For Bellarmine himself will grant that Ceremonies are not to be multiplied over much. Fatemur Ceremonias non esse nimis multiplicandas. de effsacr. c. 30. but what is too much, that must be left to the judgment of the Church or Convocation, saith he, and the Defendant both.

SECT. VII. VIII. IX. X.

IN all these Sections, the Def. goeth about to teach us the doctrine which concerneth binding of men's consciences. In the first his conclusion is good and sound, God therefore and not man doth properly and directly bind the conscience of man. It is sufficient therefore to note that it is an improper phrase to say that men's laws do bind men's consciences, in respect that God commandeth to obey the just laws of men: for so, as Gerson observeth, the Physicians praescripts should also bind a sick man's conscience, in respect of God's will, whereby a sick man is tied to follow the good and wholesome counsel of his Physician.

In the 8. Section two of our Divines are brought-in to prove that men are bound in conscience to observe the just laws of Magistrates, which none of us ever doubted of.

The 9. Section is spent in proving, that Ecclesiastical laws have as great force in respect of conscience as political. Which if it be granted, yet nothing can from thence be concluded for the advantage of ceremonies unlawfully imposed. But 1. it is diligently to be observed, that the Church hath no commission for to make any laws properly so called: as I have formerly shown in cap. 1. sect. 16.2. The common received opinion of all our Divines is contrary to that which the Defendant here saith: as may be seen in Bellarmino de Pont. Rom. l. 4. c. 15. and Junius, Whitaker's, with the rest, who writing against Bellarmino do not deny but defend that which he saith, Lutherani & Calvinistae omnes docent. 3. The interrogatories which the Defendant ministereth unto us in this case doth not prove his Assertion. For the Church is a Society, but not complete, if it be considered as not comprehending Christ the Head and only Law maker of it. Breach of peace is not a sin against an Ecclesiastical, but a divine law. Obedience is to be yielded unto lawful Ecclesiastical Governors, when they bring the charge of Christ whose Ministers they are. See D^r. Whitaker's de Pont. Rom. cont. 4. q. 7. c. 2. ad 12. The Kings stamp, but with an act of Parliament maketh a law in England. As for Apostolical constitution (to which our canons are as like as Apples are to Oysters) the same answer which Doctor Whithakers, cont. 4. q. 7. c. 2. ad 5. with other of our Divines giveth to Bellarmino, may serve for our Defendant.

In the 10. Sect. he setteth down nothing but that which he knoweth we all grant.

SECT. XI.

AGAINST the Accusation of contempt, there was (as it seemeth) alleged by M. Nic. that by the same reason that Non-conformity is contempt; bowling, disusing of capps, & such habits prescribed should be contempt. Here the Defendant first bringeth divers interpretation out of the Casualists: and then taketh one for granted without rendering of any reason, that he may by it excuse bowling and disuse of cappes. But what if we take hold of another interpretation, esteeming the obligation by the intent of the Law-makers, which was against Popish Recusancie of our Communion-book, and not against refusal of some few ceremonies contained therein? I speak now of the Statute Law, not of lawless canōs. Or what if we should stand upon that interpretation, which fetcheth the obligation from the weight of the matter imposed, which in our ceremonies is very little? Some of these I am sure the Bishops must fly, if they will defend their disuse of the Crosiers slaffe, which they are bound by our laws as well to use, as the Ministers are surplusses.

But all this is needless, because there can be no contempt in a conscionable forbearance of unlawful impositions; such as the ceremonies are sufficiently proved to be.

SECT. XII.

HERE certain Divines are brought in witnessing, 1. that superstitions do depive men of Christian liberty: which we deny not, but take their testimonies as making against our ceremonies: because as I have formerly shown some of these superstitious opinions are inseparable from the imposing and using of them. 2. That Christian liberty doth not consist in the use or disuse of things indifferent: which we also willingly grant. But I would have the Defendant remember, that all freedom is not in the mind & conscience. For where the mind is free, the body may be bound; else Christians should not taste so much of this worlds misery as they do. Now Christ hath left unto us not only an inward liberty of mind and conscience, but also an outward freedom of our bodies and outward man, from such bodily rites in his worship as have not his stamp upon them, and his Spirit and blessing promised unto them. Of this the Defendant saith nothing at all.

Sect. XIII. XIII.

Concerning the profession of our Church so often brought in, enough hath been said before, now it sufficeth to answer, that no profession whatsoever can make human significant Ceremonies in God's worship agree with Christian liberty.

As for superstition, which the Defendant doth now the second time most ridiculously object, I have answered in the beginning of this Confutation. Now only I note: 1. how loosely he describeth that superstition which he calleth affirmative: as if no man could use anything superstitiously, except he did hold, that without it the faith of Christianity, or the true worship of God could not possible consist. Never was there such a description given by any man that considered what he said.

2. How manfully he concludeth our negative superstition, upon this ground, that Christ hath left these ceremonies free, which is the main question betwixt him and us.

3. How he mis-reporteth our opinion, in saying absolutely that we hold a Surplice to have unholiness and pollu•ion in it: whereas we hold that it is only made more unfit for God's service then it was before through idolatrous abuse: but yet unto other uses it may be applied.

4. That instead of Scripture, he bringeth forth the universal practice of men in the Church: which yet hath been formerly also refuted.

5. That he can find no Divine that calleth opposing of Ceremonies superstition, but only M. Calvin in one place speaking rhetorically, as he useth to do, and not intending any definition or distributiō of that vice.

6. How he corrupteth P. Martyrs words, to have some color for a new accusation. P. Martyr taking there upon him the person of an adversary unto Hoopers opinion (with whom notwithstanding afterward he consented, and recalled the counsel which then he gave, as appeareth pag. 1125.) saith that if we should refuse all things that the Papists used, we should bring the church into servitude: which assertion is most true, because the Papists abused many necessary things, even Christ's own Ordinances, the observing of which is liberty. Now the Def. would have that precisely understood, and that in the rigor of every word concerning the Surplice.

I have here subjoined apart an Epistle of Zanchius, who otherways was somewhat favorable to Bishops: wherein the Reader may see his judgment concerning superstitious garments.

To the most renowned Queen ELYZABETH, Defendresse of the Christian Religion, and most mighty Queen of England, France and Ireland, H. Zanchius sendeth greeting.

MOST gracious & most Christian Queen, we have not without great grief understood, that the fire of contention about certain garments, which we thought had been quenched long ago, is now again to the incredible offense of the godly, as it were raised from hell, and kindled a fresh in your Majesty's Kingdom, and that the occasion of this fire is, because your most gracious Majesty being persuaded by some, otherwise great men, and carried with a zeal (but certainly not according to knowledge) to retain unity in religion, hath now more then ever before resolved and decreed, yea doth will and command that all Bishops and Ministers of the Churches shall in divine service putt on the white and linen garments which the Popish Priests use now in Popery; yea that it is to be feared, least this fire be so kindled, and cast its flame so far and wide, that all the Churches of that most large and mighty kingdom, to the perpetual disgrace of your most renowned Majesty, be set on a flaming fire: seeing the most part of the Bishops, men greatly renowned for all kind of learning and godliness, had rather leave their office and place in the Church, then against their own conscience, admit of such garments, or at the least signs of Idolatry and Popish superstition, and so defile themselves with them, and give offense to the weak by their example. Now what other thing will this be, then by retaining of these garments, to destroy the whole body of the Church? For without doubt that is Satan's intent, by casting a seed of dissensions amongst the Bishops. And that he aimed at the infancy of the Church, by stirring up discord between the East and West Churches, about the Passover and other Ceremonies of that kind. Therefore Irenaeus Bishop of Lions, had just cause in his Epistle sent out of France to Rome, sharply to reprove Victor the Pope of Rome, because he out of a kind of zeal, but not according to knowledge, was minded to excommunicate all the Churches of Asia, because they celebrated not the Passover just at the same time, as they at Rome did. For this was nothing but by an unseasonable desire to retain the same Ceremonies in all Churches to rent and tear a pieces the unity of the Churches. I therefore so soon as I heard that so great a ruin hanged over the Church of Christ in that kingdom, presently, in respect of that duty which I owe to the Church of Christ, to your gracious Majesty, and to that whole kingdom, intended to write thither, and to try by my uttermost endeavor whether so great a mischief might possibly be withstood: some that fear Christ, and wish well to your Majesty, exhorting me to the performance of this duty. But when I had scarcely begun to think of this course, behold our most illustrious Prince commanded me to do it, which command of his did not only spurr me on, who of mine own accord was already running, but laid a necessity of writing upon me. Wherefore this my boldness will seem the less strange unto your gracious Majesty, seeing my writing proceedeth not so much from mine own will and counsel of friends, as from the commandment of my most Noble Prince, who is one of your gracious Majesty's special friends. Now I thought I should do a matter very worth the pains taking, if first I should humbly admonish your most famous Majesty what your duty is in this cause: and secondly, if as your humble suppliant I should beseech you for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake, to perform the same. I beseech your gracious Majesty to take this my writing in good part, for it proceedeth from a Christian love toward the Church, and from an especial reverend respect that I bear to your most gracious Majesty. The Lord knoweth all things. Now to the matter in hand.

Whereas the Apostle writing to Timothy, commandeth that prayers be made for Kings, and all other that be in authority, and saith, that the end wherefore they be ordained, is, that we may lead a peaceable and quiet life in all (that is, perfect) godliness and honesty, he teacheth plainly enough what is the duty of Godly Kings and Princes, namely, that they take care, and bring to pass, that first & above all things, true religion, and the true worship of God, where it is banished, be restored, and being restored, be kept pure: all things which smell of impiety being far removed. Secondly, that men may live honestly and holily, all kinds of uncleannesses being abandoned. Lastly, that public peace & holy friendship be maintained among the subjects, all occasions of contentions being, as much as possible may be, taken out of the way.

As the Apostle teacheth manifestly, as we have seen, so all learned men who be of sound judgment concerning the Magistrates office, do with one consent affirm, that these be the three chief parts of the office of the Prince, and of every godly Magistrate. Which thing being so, I see not how your gracious Majesty can with good conscience, propound again the garments in question, and other things of that kind, smelling as yet of Popish superstition, and once banished out of the Churches, to the consciences of the Bishops to be taken on again, and so propound them that you should compel them by your commandment to receive them again. For first, this is quite contrary to the first and chief part of the Princes office. For if the Magistrate ought to have a chief care, that the worship of God be kept pure and without mixture; and if for this cause all things are to be abandoned which may any way either by themselves, or by accident defile this worship: and therefore all things are to be called back as much as may be, to the rule of God, and to the former and Apostolical, and so the more pure and simple form of religion: Finally, if as the Apostle commandeth, we be to abstain, not only from all evil, but also from all appearance of evil; to what end, I beseech you most renowned and most godly Queen, should those things be brought again into the Church of God, by the Princes commandment, which be contrary to the purity of the Apostolical worship, which smell of Popish superstition, which be neither available to the edification of the godly, nor to order, nor for ornament, except that which is whoorish: which lastly, can bring no profit, but on the contrary, many evils to the Church? It is out of all doubt, that by this law concerning apparel, all godly men will be offended, but the wicked will laugh in their sleeve, and hereby be putt in hope to get many moe things: as for those of the middle sort, that is, such as be newly converted and turned from ungodliness to godliness, and be not as yet well grounded, they will be in great danger, and if we speak according to man's judgment, they will rather look back to the old superstition, to which by nature we are inclined, then fixe and fasten their eyes upon true religion. And therefore this is a decree which will bring no advancement at all to godliness, but may much further ungodliness. For though these garments be not evil and unclean of and by themselves, that is, of their own nature, yet because of the former and late abuse, they are not altogether free from uncleanness. Certainly it cannot be denied, but that they will at the least, give occasions of many evils and very grievous superstitions. Now the very occasions also of evils are to be shunned. To what end then should these be thrust upon the Church, from whom no profit can be hoped, very much evil may come? for this is to tempt God. Your famous Majesty may well remember, that not without cause it was written; He that toucheth pitch, shall be defiled with it: that the Apostle had reason to command, that we should purge out the old leaven, that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. And that Hosea did not foolishly reprove the Jews, because they translated and brought a young graff (of superstitions) out of Israel into their own garden, that is, the true Church. We ought, most religious Queen, to have nothing at all to do with the Papists in matter of religion, save in those things which they have common with the Apostles. Why, I beseech you, were some kings, otherwise godly, reprov'd and blamed in the Scriptures, that they had not taken away Churches or Temples for divine service in the mountains, which were built by holy Fathers ere the building of the Temple, in which the Lord was wont to be worshipp'd? Surely, because the Temple being now built and ordained for divine service, God would not have any footsteps of any other chapel at all to be extant. Therefore also when once the kingdom of Christ was manifested, the Ceremonies and garments of Aaron ought not anymore to take place. For this cause the Apostles were upon good ground careful▪ that after Christ's ascension, they should so be taken away, that no relics of them remained. And if they took them away holily, unholyly have the Papists called them back again. Now whether is the better to follow the godly simplicity of the Apostles, or the ungodly pomp of the Papists, who is ignorant? This recalling of such Popish garments, your gracious Majesty may believe me, will be a greater evil, then peradventure it may be seen, even to very wise men at the first blush: For me thinks I see and hear the Monks crying out with very loud voices in the Pulpits, both confirming their followers in their ungodly religion, by the example of your gracious Majesty, and also saying, What? doth not even the Queen of England also, a most learned and a most prudent Princesse, begin by little and little to come back to the religion of the holy church of Rome, the most holy and sacred vestments of the Clergy men being taken on again? we are to be in good hope that the day will come, wherein she will at length, though now they be thought to be dead, recall also all the other Rites and Sacraments of the holy Church of Rome. These and such like words, no doubt, most prudent Queen, the Monks and Jesuits will use in the Pulpits. For they take all occasions to confirm their superstitions. Therefore to recall these stinking garments, and other rubbish of the Popish Church into the Church of Christ at this time, what is it but to give the Papists an occasion, and the best that may be, to confirm and harden themselves and theirs in their superstitions, and also to help them in this business? But let us hear what the Prophet said to Jehoshaphat King of Judah, when he helped Ahab; Darest thou help the wicked, and love those who hate the Lord? For this thing the wrath of the Lord is upon thee. And what other thing will this be, then even to call back the weak from the study of pure Religion, and to give them a privy warning to look back, and return into Egypt? It is an easy matter for us weak men, who of our own nature are prone to superstition, to slide back to impiety. Therefore occasions of sliding back to ungodliness, ought to be taken away, and at no hand to be given. And what else, I pray you, meant God in forbidding to plow with an Ox, and an Ass, to sow the same field with diverse kinds of seeds, and to wear a garment woven of linen and woolen together? It is an odious & detestable thing with God, that the same field of the Lord should be tilled by ungodly & godly Bishops together; If in the same Church Popish Doctrine be taught with the Doctrine of the Gospel: Finally, if Sacraments, Ceremonies, and Rites, partly Apostolic, and partly Popish, be used, and the Church be clothed with them as with a garment of linsey-wolsey. For what agreement hath light with darkness? And therefore those things which be not of God, but from them who have defiled God's worship, are utterly to be cast away, which the Lord himself commanded to be done, when he charged utterly to destroy all things which appertained to those who should give us counsel to follow strange God's, and to burn their garments, and all their stuff with fire in the midst of the street, to show our detestation of such Seducers, & that they might be an execrable thing to the Lord. And who knoweth not that these garments are a part of the household stuff of that Romish Seducer? There shall cleave nothing of the execrable thing, saith he, to thy hand, that the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his wrath, and multiply thee, as he hath sworn to thy Fathers, &c. Wherefore to bring these garments, seeing they be household stuff of Antichrist, into the Church of Christ, what is it else then to provoke God to anger, and to kindle his fury against us? Certain it is, that he who is a true friend of Christ, will never seek to have the ornaments of Antichrist in his own house, and much less will he suffer them in the Temple of Christ. For who can endure the arms of his enemy in his own house, and specially in the chiefest room of the same? And if God will have a thing destroyed and abolished, who are we that we dare build it up again. But it is God's will that after the death of Christ all garments of Aaron and Levi should be abolished: and he hath plainly enough manifested everywhere, that in these our days he would have all ungodly and vain cerem., pomps, deceits, and paintings of the Papists driven away by the shining brightness of the Gospel: because these things have no power in them to kindle and increase godliness, but greatly avail to the quenching of the same. Neither verily can I see to what other end these garments tend, then in very deed (that I may now come unto the second head) to defile and disgrace the fair face; nay, the whole body of the Church of England reformed according to the Gospel; as if the chaste and honest daughter of a King should be attired with those very garments wherewith some famous and notable whore used to be adorned, and when she were so clothed, were commanded to go abroad in the streets. Now who can allow or judge this to be tolerable. Wherefore though for no other, yet for this very cause, such garments ought not to be thrust upon the Church of Christ, because that harlot of Rome hath abused, and doth still at this day abuse them (though in their own nature they be not evil) to evil, and to cover her fornications, or rather to entice men to commit fornication. For all these pomps, and Popish ceremonies are nothing else but whoorish paintings invented and devised for this end, that men might thereby be allured to spiritual fornication. Is it not therefore a filthy and dishonest thing, to have these in the Church of Christ? If the brazen serpent, which had been ordained of God, and that for the wholesome use of the Israelites, was taken away by godly King Hezekiah, because the Israelites had abused it contrary to the word of God: and if Hezekiah be highly commended for this so doing, because he had turned that Serpent into ashes, and commanded them to be cast into the running water, that there might never be any print or sign of it extant anymore; how much more then are these unclean garments to be banished out of the Church of God, seeing the Apostles never used them, but the whore of Rome hath used them in her Idolatrous worship, and to seduce men? For it is a very dishonest thing, that such things as are of themselves indifferent, and have been long used to the dispight and dishonor of God, should be retained in the Church of God, to the hazard of the salvation of godly men. And much less that kind of garments, which is nothing but an invention of men, or rather of the Devil himself, devised to seduce the simple ones: We all know what praise those common-wealths deserve, which make good laws that the subjects shall not wear out-landish and strange apparel, nor bring it into the Common-wealths, because it is a corruption of good and honest manners, and of the Common-wealths themselves.

How then can that counsel which is given to your Majesty, be commended, to wit, that garments unknown to the Christian world in that time of the Apostles, and Apostolical men, should be brought into the Church of Christ. And if an out-landish kind of attire be not tolerated in well-governed Common-wealths, how much less are Idolatrous, and heathenish garments to be borne with in the Church, where God is to be worshipped in spirit and truth, and where he would have few and very simple Ceremonies? Also if God established by his Law, that a woman may not putt on a man's apparel, nor a man a woman's, the one being so well of it self dishonest, and contrary to nature as the other: Why then should godly Bishops, and the servants of Christ be clothed, or rather shamed and deformed with the garments of godless Priests, and slaves of Antichrist? Why should we not rather, as we be of a divers religion from them, so also be discerned from them, at least in the performance of such duties as belong unto God's worship, by outward signs, such as garments be? Verily this was God's will, and he required of his people, that it should be discerned from the profane Gentiles, as by other things, so also by a divers sort of apparel, and so should profess by this public sign, that it would have nothing to do with the Gentiles.

And why should not we do the same? Are we not the people of God? abides not the equity of the same commandment? And if the word honest be derived of honor, what honor will it be for the church of Christ to have Bishops attired and disguised with Popish visors in the administration of the Gospel and Sacraments, so as they shall rather be derided then be revered any whit by the people? And what commendation shall it be for your gracious Majesty in true Churches, and among true believers, that you permit such trifles to be called back into your Church? Therefore it standeth not with honesty, that holy Bishops be compelled to receive such visors, neither is it indeed a matter worthy of honor and praise, neither deserveth it the name of virtue. For if your Majesty should command that all English men▪ leaving that ancient and very grave and comely attire, should wear Turkey coats, or a soldiers weed, as it is called: who would ever approve this decree as honest? And it is much less praise-worthy, if godly Bishops be enjoined, laying aside, or at least changing the honest and ancient apparel, which the Apostles wore, to wit, that common and grave habit, to put on the ridiculous & execrable or accursed garment of godless Mass-priests.

Now concerning the third part of the Princes duty, there is nothing fitter to trouble the public peace of the Church then this counsel. For every novelty, especially in religion, either by it self, if it be evil, disturbs and troubles a good peace, or if it be good, gives occasion of trouble by accident, by causing contention between evil and good men. But as in things which be good of themselves, of which nature the reformation of the Churches according to the will of God is, we are not to care for the troubling of that ungodly peace, that is of the world (for Christ came not by his Gospel to keep such a peace, but rather to take it away, & to send a sword) so assuredly, by the urging of things indifferent, to trouble the peace of Churches, and to cause strife between good men and bad, yea between godly men themselves, is so wicked, that it can by no means be defended, so that Irenaeus had just cause to reprove Victor Bishop of Rome, for this cause, as hath been said afore. For it must needs be, that at such times the Churches be rent in pieces, then which thing, what is more hurtful? Many exemples in the histories of the Church prove this which I say. How many and how great troubles arose in the Primitive Church, between those who beside the Gospel urged also circumcision and the law, and between those who upon good ground rejected them? And how great evils would this dissention have brought to the Church of Christ, had not the Apostles betime withstood them by that council gathered together at Jerusalem, by a lawful examination and discussing of the cause by manifest testimonies of the Scriptures, and by sound reasons? If your gracious Majesty (as you ought) desire both to be and to seem Apostolic, then imitate the Apostles in this matter. Neither lay and impose this yoke upon the necks of Christ's Disciples yourself, nor suffer it to be imposed by others. But if you see that the Bishops disagree about this matter among themselves, assemble a Synod, and cause this controversy to be examined by the Scriptures. And then look what shall be proved by plain testimonies, and strong reasons, propound that to be observed by all., and command by your decree, that that be observed, and so take disagreement out of the Church. For your gracious Majesty ought to be very careful, that there be no innovation in religion, but according to the word of God. By this means shall a true peace, concord & unity of the Churches be preserved. But if the proceeding be otherwise, what other thing will it be, then to take away unity, and to trouble the Christian peace? And this I may not pass over with silence, that by this novelty of the business, not only the public peace shall be troubled in that kingdom, but also many else-where out of that kingdom will have occasion given them to raise new contentions in Churches, and that to the great hindrance of godliness, and the more slow proceeding of the Gospel. For all men know, that the most part of all the Churches, who have fallen from the Bishop of Rome, for the Gospels sake, do not only want, but also abhor those garmets, and that there be some Churches, though few in comparison of the former, which do as yet retain those garments invented in Popery, as they very stiffly retain some other things also, because the reformers of those Churches, otherwise worthy men, and very faithful servants of Christ, durst not at the first (neither judged they it expedient) utterly abolish all Popish things. But as the common manner is, every man likes his own best. Now I call those things a man's own, not so much which every man hath invented, as those beside, which every man chooseth to himself, receiveth, retaineth, and pursueth, though they be invented to his hand by others. But if there be also annexed the examples of other men, they be more and more hardened in them, and are not only hardened, but also do their uttermost endeavor by word and writing, to draw all the rest to be of their mind? Therefore we easily see what the issue will be, if your gracious Majesty admit of that counsel which some do give you, to take on apparel, and other more Popish things besides. For some men, who be not well occupied, being stirred up by the example of your Majesty, will write books and disperse them throughout all Germany, of these things which they call indifferent, to wit, that it is lawful to admit of them, nay that they be altogether to be retained, that Papists may be the less estranged and alienated from us, and so we may come the nearer to concord and agreement. As if forsooth the Papists, though we for peace sake admitted of all those things, would ever amend their Doctrine, and banish out of their churches, or at any hand lay down their false and godless decrees, manifest and abominable superstitions and idolatries: and there will be some who will answer such books once dispersed. So of this English fire there will rise a new burning flame in Germany and France, on which hot coles the Papists as so many Smiths a forging, will sprinkle cold water to make the flame the more vehement. And is not this a goodly benefit? Who therefore doth not see that this counsel tends to the troubling of all Churches.

To conclude, that golden saying of a certain learned man is very true and certain, and approved by long experience, that indifferent things, that is, the question about indifferent things, is that golden apple of contention. So much shall suffice to have spokē of the troubling of public peace; what should I say of the consciences of private believers? It is manifest, that they are greatly troubled with this commandment, to put on these linen garments. For they do so greatly complain, that their lamenting voices and groans do reach unto, and are heard in Germany. Now how grievous and distasteful an offense it is to trouble the consciences of the godly, the holy Scripture showeth: partly when it commandeth that we make not the holy Spirit sad, neither offend the weak ones; partly when it threateneth griveous punishments against those who fear not to do these things: partly also when it propoundeth the examples of the Saints, and specially of Paul, who speaks thus: If meat offend my brother, Ile eat no flesh while the world standeth, that I may not offend my brother. For in those words he giveth a general rule, by his example, taken out of the doctrine of Christ, to wit, that no indifferent thing is to be admitted and yielded unto, much less to be urged upon others, and least of all to be commended by decree: if in the admitting, urging, and commanding of it, the minds of good men, and consciences of the faithful be offended; for a tender conscience, which feareth God, is a thing most precious and acceptable to God. How therefore can that counsel be approved, which would have a law established and proclaimed by the Princes command for the use of garments to be used by Ministers in the ministry. For (to speak many things in few words) if such garments be to be propounded to the faithful, they are to be propounded either as indifferent, or as necessary: if the later, we do ungodlily, because we make those things necessary, which Christ would have to be free: If the former, then are they to be left free to the Churches. But by commanding and compelling, we make things that be free and indifferent, to be necessary, and so fall into the same trespass. Moreover, either they be ordained of God by Moses, or they be delivered by Christ God manifested in the flesh, or they be ordained by the holy Ghost working and speaking in the Apostles, or they are of men, either godly or wicked. Those Ceremonies & Levitical garments, which were ordained of God by Moses, ought all of them to have an end after the death of Christ, as the Scriptures show plainly, especially the Epistles of Paul to the Coloss. and Hebr. therefore they cannot be revoked and called back without the transgression of God's will. It cannot be said that Christ taught them, because there is no word extant to that end, but rather he taught plainly oftentimes, that all Moses his Ceremonies were ended. And the same I affirm concerning the Apostles. It remains therefore that they be said to be of men. If they be from godly men, then were they ordained of them, either to edification, or for order and comeliness. But they avail not to edification, that is, to further comeliness, but rather tend to the overthrow of it, as we saw before; neither for any good order, but rather they tend to disorder, for there is a confusion of godly & wicked Bishops, whereas it is meet and equal, that one of them be discerned from another, even by their garments also. Neither do they make Christ's spouse comely, as we shown a little before. Therefore we ought not to yield unto them. And such things as have been invented by men, void of God's Spirit, do nothing appertain to us. Lastly, the Apostles used not these garments. For we have no authentic testimony. Now the church is to be fashioned after the rule of that Apostolical Church in Ceremonies and garments, as well as in Doctrine. What do we then with these garments in the Church? By whose authority can they be approved? What profit or wholesome use can the Christian people have by them? But on the contrary we have shown that godliness is weakened by them, the pure worship of God is violated, Popish superstition is by little and little called back, the godly be offended, the wicked be confirmed and hardened in their ungodlinesses; the weak in faith are brought into hazard of their salvation; there are occasions of many evils given; Monks and other Popish preachers are hereby helped to confirm their followers in their superstition; the wrath of God is provoked against us; those things which God would have to be destroyed, are hereby built again by us; the whole face of the Church is defiled and disgraced: there is a foul sin committed against honest and good laws forbidding the putting on of strange & outlandish garments: and so the whole Church is dishonored, Besides the public peace of the Church, yea of many churches is troubled: one Bishop is set against another, the consciences of the godly are troubled, and the minds of good men are offended, God's spirit is made sad in them, and this apple of contention is cast, as it were, upon the table of the God's.

Now seeing the matter stands thus, most gracious Queen, not only I, but all my fellow-ministers, and all the godly prostrate before you, entreat your Majesty, and for Jesus Christ's sake, whom we are persuaded you love from your heart, we humbly beseech your Majesty not to embrace that counsel aforesaid, neither to give ear to such counsellors. For these counsels (most godly Queen) are not for the good of that your church and kingdom, nor for the honor of your Majesty, seeing they neither serve to the increase of godliness, nor to the retaining of the honesty of the Church, neither to the preservation of public peace, but rather very greatly weaken all these good things, which your Princely Majesty ought chiefly to stand for. Let your Majesty rather bend all your thoughts, authority and power hereunto, that first and above all you may have Bishops, who be truly godly, and well exercised in the holy Scriptures, as by the blessing of God you have very many, and that you make much of, and give ear to them. Secondly, that you be careful that with all diligence they may discharge their office, watching over the flock, teach sound doctrine, confute heresies, drive away Wolves, keep every man in his own calling, and exhort and stir up every man to lead a life beseeeming a Christian. The Elders also and Deacons, are to be admonished, that everyone be diligent in his own office, and if need be, they are to be compelled by your gracious Majesty's authority, that neither the former by their sleeping and winking at the misdemeanors of the flock, suffer the reins to be loosed to all licentiousness, and to the lusts of the flesh; neither that the later, by reason of their immoderate care for their own private businesses, neglect the poor people of the Church, and omit such other things as belong to their office. For these three sorts of men be the very sinews of the Church, upon whom the salvation or destruction of the Church doth chiefly depend. Furthermore, your gracious Majesty ought to use great care and diligence, that the Universities, and in them good and godly teachers, be well looked to, cherished, liberally maintained and preserved, for these are as the mothers, and nurses of the Churches, in which and by which those are to be fashioned, borne, brought up and adorned, who being fit, may be called from time to time to rule and govern the Churches. Last of all, such things as cannot be corrected and amended by the word and discipline of the Church, as it is necessary, that according to God's word they be cut off and taken away by the sword of the Magistrate, so your gracious Majesty is to take care of them: as adulteries, blasphemies, and other capital crimes of that sort. For God hath given the Magistrate the sword for this end, that ungodly seducers, filthy knaves, and unquiet men being restrained, the rest may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. This is the matter (most gracious Queen) whereon you are to spend your thoughts, hereabout are your counsels to be occupied, here is all your strength to be shown, namely, that (to end in a word) we all denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, may live soberly, justly, and godlily in this present world. For this is the true and fairest garment of all other. For which every man ought to take care, to wit, that having put off the old man with his works, we put on the new man, that is, our Lord Jesus Christ, neither are there any other true ornaments which become Christian Bishops, besides those which the Apostle hath laid down in his writings to Tim. and Tit. A Bishop must be unreprouable, the husband of one wife, watching, sober, modest, harborous, apt to teach, not given to wine, no stryker, nor given to filthy lucre, but gentle, no fighter, not covetous, one that can rule his house honestly, having children under obedience in all honesty, not foward, not angry, righteous, holy, &c. For garments and ornaments of Aaron's high Priest, were types of these true ornaments; those were the shadows, these be the body. Wherefore let those be gone, and let these abide still. And then at lenght shall we have the whole Church, and so the Bishops rightly and truly apparrelled.

Once again I humbly beseech your gracious Majesty, that thinking no more of those outward garments, you will mind and consider how these true and spiritual ornaments may be retained, put upon, and kept in the Churches. And as I said in the beginning, that according to your gracious Majesty's clemency, you will be pleased to pardon my boldness in writing. Our Lord Jesus Christ long preserve your gracious Majesty safe and sound to us, and to the whole Church. From Heydelberg. 10. September. 1571.

P-WA1-2. A reply to Dr. Mortons general Defense of three nocent [sic] ceremonies viz. the surplice, cross in baptism, and kneeling at the receiving of the sacramental elements of bread and wine. - Ames, William, 1576-1633., Calderwood, David, 1575-1650, attributed name.

A REPLY TO D^R. MORTONS GENERALL DEFENCE OF THREE NOCENT CEREMONIES. viz.

The Surplice, Cross in Baptism, and kneeling at the receiving of the sacramental elements of Bread and Wine.

Printed in year 1622.

THE PREFACE.

SIR,

HOWsoever there be many unknown motives which lead men in these days unto conformity, yet those which are openly professed, may be referred either unto M. Sprints way, who confesseth the ceremonies to be imposed contrary unto the rules of God's word, and yet contendeth that they are to be used in case of deprivation: Or else to D. Mortons way, who avoucheth the said ceremonies to be agreeable unto the rules of God's word, and therefore such as ought to be observed simply. Now he that considereth well of the matter, shall find that there is no ground for the conscience to rest on in either of these ways. As for M. Sprint, (to speak nothing of his mis-alleging very many authors) he hath but three main arguments: and to all three he hath given sufficient answer himself. His first argument is taken from the doctrine and practice of the Apostles about the Jewish ceremonies. Now all the force of this reason doth depend upon that parity or equality which is supposed to be betwixt our ceremonies and the Jewish, our ministers warrant and the Apostles: so that if this parity faileth, the whole argument falleth. Yet M. Sprint himself confesseth, pag. 250. 256. that those Jewish ceremonies were not every way so evil as ours are: neither doth or dare he say, that ministers now have such particular warrant for conformity, as the Apostles had for applying themselves a little while unto some of the Jewish ceremonies.

His second reason is, that a lesser duty must yield unto a greater. Now this case by his own confession p. 30. doth not hold so, as that a man should do a thing formally, simply, and in nature evil, for any good. Now he knoweth, as appeareth p. 45. that the ceremonies in controversy are esteemed such by most of these that now oppose them. So that this reason can be of no force with them.

His third reason is, because refusal of conformity in case of deprivation, tendeth to condemn in a manner all true Churches which have taught and practiced otherwise. He meaneth by condemning, accusing of error. Now M. Sprint himself doth thus condemn all or the most of the Churches which he alledgeth to have practiced such ceremonies. For in confessing our ceremonies to be inconvenient, scandalous, evil, such as the urging of them cannot be justified, and yet affirming that almost all Churches have appointed and used such, even out of the case of deprivation or such like necessity, doth he not plainly accuse all those Churches of error? These things considered, I thought it needless to spend much time in examining Mr. Sprints book any further. But according to your desire, I will show you mine opinion in brief concerning the chief passages which are in Thomas Chesters, or as he was wont to be called, Doctor Mortons Defense of three ceremonies, commonly used in our Churches, which I do the more willingly undertake, because divers things are therein handled of singular use in divinity, whereof I profess myself a Student, though in the ministry I cannot find a settled station. But before I come to the Defense it self, first, I would fain understand the reason why three Ceremonies are only defended, seeing there be many threes of those things which stay many godly men from subscription and conformity, as is to be seen even in that abridgement which this Defender doth chiefly oppose? Is it because our best Prelates have only a care to persuade if it may be, those that are in the ministry, to that conformity which is most of all noted, not regarding in the mean time, what becometh of so many godly learned young men, who not only for these, but for divers other corruptions also, are forced to turn away from the ministry, whereunto their education, gifts and hearts did carry them, while many lewd fellows, the chief spots and blots of our congregations, do possess their places.

I would know also what the reason should be, that the innocence only of these ceremonies is defended? Is this all that is required in ceremonies forcibly obtruded upon ministers and people, even to the silencing, excommunicating, and utter undoing of many hundreds? Is this all, I say, that is required, that such ceremonies be in some sense innocent, or not hurtful? surely not scripture only, and sound reason, but common sense will look for some good necessary use in such ceremonies, and not innocence alone.

And then what is the sense (trow you) in which these ceremonies may be called Innocent? when Calvin (whom the Defender calleth an honorable witness) would devise a charitable title for them, he stiles them tolerabiles incptiae, viz. tolerable fooleries, or fopperies, Epist. 200. & 206. When he speaketh more out of judgment, he not only calleth them frivolous and unprofitable, but saith plainly that their proper name is hurtful, noxious, or nocent, clean contrary to this Defendants language. Surely one of these writers, not differing only, but flatly opposing and contradicting the other, must needs be far wide.

Innocent indeed these ceremonies may be called in regard of their materials, and the fashions also which they have in their natural being: for the cloth of a Surpless and the fashion of it is innocent, and so are all the idols of Papists and Heathens very innocent: so that this is no praise. But if we look at the use whereunto they have been applied, and wherein they have been a long time employed, I may truly say by the devil, not only among the Papists, but even in our Churches, to the breeding of dissention and distraction among brethren, to quenching of many, and many a burning shining light, to the grieving and unsettling of so many good souls, and to the advancing of the Kingdom of darkness: If these things I say be considered, then it is more then manifest, that this licking them over with a fair word will make them no more innocent indeed then Pilats hands were when they were washed. The fashion of a Surplice natural or artificial in another use, as if a Porter or Baker wear such a garment is indifferent.

If it shall be said, that notwithstanding these accidental abuses, yet the ceremonies are innocent in their own nature and use: I answer, first, they having no necessary use otherways, and these being the ordinary effects which have followed on them, there is no rule of Logic much less of zeal that will allow the Defendant simply to call them innocent. 2 It is a shame for our Prelates to talk of the ceremonies innocence, when they cannot defend their own innocence in obtruding and urging of them. They are wont to say, the practice and manner of urging we will not defend, but the lawfulness or innocence of the things themselves. Indeed for a private man to stand upon such terms is tolerable: but for the Prelates, whose hands are chief in this trespass, to cover their own guiltiness under figleaved innocence of three ceremonies, is too too gross. If Thomas or D. Morton in times past had pleaded for the ceremonies innocence, it might have been well interpreted: but for Thomas Chester, Thomas Lichfield, or any that bear th a Cathedral name, to write of the innocence of three ceremonies, passing by three hundred foul nocencies which are plainly to be seen in the Prelates urging and managing of these ceremonies, this is somewhat like as if Samson when he had sent Foxes with fire-brands in their tails among the corn, should then have written unto the owners of that corn a long letter concerning the innocence of Foxes and Fire-brands.

Thirdly and lastly, it is sufficiently proved, and shall (by God's grace) be further maintained against this Defendant, that these three ceremonies are not innocent or lawful in their •se.

This I had to say concerning the Title. Now before I come to the book it self, some few things are to be questioned in the Epistles, which are three, according to the number of the ceremonies defended. In the first Epistle to the Marquis, • I would willingly learn, what that Church is, which is the mother of the Non-conformists? it must of necessity be either the faithful Congregations which are in England, collectiuey considered: or else the Hierarchy, consisting of Archbishops, Bishops and their Officers. If the •ormer ••here understood, then this Defense is begun with a Slander. For neither is the Non-conformist an adversary impugning those Congregations, nor do they defame their religious worship, nor infringe their wholesome liberty, nor contemn their just authority: but of all these things are the Prelates manifestly guilty. For they in their Lordly humors, do scorn and defame the most religious people as Puritans: they hinder the people from hearing of Sermons in another parish, though they have none, or worse then none at home: they are enemies to that preaching whereby the godly people find themselves most edified: they inslaue both Minister and people, not only to themselves, but even to their Chancellors, Commissaries, officials, and such like officers of their own making, to whom not Christ only, but all the Primitive Church saith plainly, Depart from me I know you not: they deny any authority at all to be either in the Congregations, or in their Ministers, except it be a little of courtesy from the Ordinary. These things are so well known, that they need no proof.

If by the Church here be meant the Hierarchie, then we profess plainly we acknowledge no such mother. She is a Step-dams, usurping this title and authority, without all warrant from God our Father. She is a creature of man's making, and may more lawfullie be removed when it pleaseth man, then ever she was by him crected.

Secondly, I marvel with what conscience this man can spend a great part of his Epistle in stirring up a Courtier unto the opposing of. Non-conformists? As if this were a great point of admirable wisdom and zeal, as he calleth it: and the Courtiers such, as stood in most need of instigations to the zeal of Formalitie, being otherwise for substance such as they should be.

Thirdly, what agreement is there in this Argument, to conjure a man by the obligation of his Baptism, to stand for the defense of certain ceremonies? was he baptized into the faith of the ceremonies? or is he bound to maintain every ceremony which men have brought into that Church where he was baptized? If he were conjured by his Bishoping to such things as these, there would be more reason in the consequence.

Fourthly, what need is there that great men should be called to aide and assist the Prelates against Non-conformists? have they not power enough in their own hands? can they not at their own pleasure suspend, deprive, excommunicate, & what almost they please? Do they not tread these poor men under their feet? Is it because that the Prelates cannot yet sufficiently prevail against thē in the consciences of men, and therefore call for further help in vain? Or is the meaning, that such men should be helped unto great Bishoprics, as are most Zealous against Non-conformists? If this be the matter, I dare say the Petition shall be granted, and yet the Petitioner, except he make great progress in this eagerness, will hardly get beyond Lichfield, at least not to Canterbury.

In the second Epistle to the Non-conformists, many things are jumbled together, which afterward must be examined, but here cannot. For this Epistle taketh the whole book for unanswerable, and therefore should rather have been set at the end then at the beginning: one•ie one ridiculous piece of Rhetoric is to be touched, wherein (forsooth) the Non-conformists above all their other faults wherewith they are usuallie charged and loaded, are now as it were lovinglie entreated to acknowledge themselves guilty of superstition. The reason is rendered, because there is a negative superstition, the formal cause whereof is the forbearing and forbidding of things lawful as unholy and profane: and the Non-conformists have such negative opinions, as kneel not, cross not, wear not, &c.

All this is nothing else but a trick of prevention usual with crafty men, who choose to lay that upon their adversaries which they know more properly to belong unto themselves. But I would that this Defendant, or rather Accusant, had given us some plain reason of his new opinion, there is no definition of superstition, properly so called, that will father this conclusion. The Schoolmen do with one consent place superstition in a kind of excess of Religions worship, Thom. 2. 2. q. 92. art. 1, from whom in this point our Divines do not dissent. Now though this excess do seem sometimes to consist in a negation, yet $\langle \diamond \rangle$ excess or error in negation, is never called by any author that ever writ (I dare say) superstition, when he meaneth to speak properly, except that very negation, abstinence or forbearing be held as a special worship. Now in the Non-conformists there is no such thing to be found: they do not abstain from these Ceremonies, but as they do from other unlawful corruptions. Suppose they err, yet every erroneous denial of things lawful is not superstition.

The Defendant therefore here being overhastie to charge his adversaries, considered not well what weapon he choose. But if he had well remembered what is said of superstition, not only by our Divines, but even by some of the Papists themselves, he would have forborne to make mention of this word. For our Divines, let honorable Calvin speak, Just. l. 1 c. 12. s. 1 Inde mihi videtur dicta superstitio, quod modo & praescripta ration non contenta supervacuam rerum congeriem accumulēt. Papists thus. Superstition est (saith Azorius Inst. mor. l. 9 c. 11) cum quis Deo cultu• tribuit inanem & vanum, scil. commentitia & futili aliqua caeremonia eum venerando, vel cum quis Deum honorat falsis vanis, & frivolis ceremoniis, id est, As Swarez doth in a manner interpret it, quando honor Dei in iis rebus ponitur, quibus revera non colitur, ut in caeremoniis superfluis, & ad salutem animae nihil conferentibus. If this touch not the Defendant, I would desire him to peruse what Mr. Parker hath written concerning the superstition of the Cross, and give some answer to the same, before he threaten anymore such kindness as this is upon the Nonconformists.

Another thing also is by a figure of praetermission insinuated in this Epistle, not unworthy consideration, viz. that many Parliaments and Convocations have established these rites. To this I answer, 1 the Prelates in such matters as these, have no respect unto the authority of Parliaments. For they frame Canons, urge and excute them without the consent of any Parliament, nay flatly against them. For so we read in the Records of that worthy Parliament which was ann: 1610. Among the Canons late made by the Clergy of England in their Convocation, it was thought that some of their Canons did extend to charge the bodies, lands, and goods of the subjects of the Realm, further then was lawful and meet. We therefore made a good law to make void such Canons as do charge the bodies, lands, and goods of the subjects, unless that the same canons were confirmed by Parliament. 2 The Defendant cannot bring forth one Act of Parliament now in force, that doth allow of Subscriptions and Conformitie to be urged as now it is by the Prelates. This appeareth by the judgment of the foresaid Parliament in those words of their petition, where they complain, That diverse painful and learned Pastors that have long travelled in the work of the Ministry, with good fruit and blessing of their labors, who were ever ready to perform the legal Subscription, appointed by the Statute of 13 Eliz. which only concerneth the Confession of the true Christian Faith, and doctrine of the Sacraments, yet for not conforming in some points of Ceremonies, and refusing the Subscription directed by the late Canons, have been removed from their Ecclesiastical livings, being their freehold, and debarred from all means of maintenance, to the great grief of sundry well-affected Subjects. 3 It is well known that the Prelates themselves in their proceedings about these matters, do so far violate the Statutes of Parliament, that they are by law subject unto a Praemunire.

Now as for Convocations, not to dispute here what manner of Synods they be, 1 It is well known that they consist now of a Faction, and that in memory of man, they never concluded anything for the common good of the Church more then by others was better done to their hands: but much evil hath come from among them, and more would but that many times their commission serveth not but only to give Subsidies, and then to tell the clock. 2 They are servile to those on whom they depend, and tirannicall over the poor that are subject unto them: 3 there are very few that have place in them which are not gross offenders against the most ancient Canons. As for example, it was observed that in that Convocation which established and revived these corruptions, of 300 or 400, there were not above twice three, which were not, or had not been gross Non-residents or Pluralists. D. Morton himself, in a Latin Sermon had before a Convocation some 8 years since, described well the most part of them (though he did not speak distinctly of the number) to be unsavory salt. For he gave us three notes whereby corrupt Ministers in England might be discerned. 1 That they studied chiefly and stuffed their Sermons with Friars and Jesuits: 2 that they sought occasions to disgrace Calvin: and 3 that if any neighbor Minister be more diligent and conscionable than they, they brand him straight with the name of Puritan. These notes are well known to agree unto most of our convoked Prelates. 4 The authority of this Convocation either against or without consent of Parliament, is not to be regarded, much less against the Scriptures.

In the Epistle to the Reader, this only I would inquire of, what is the reason, that seeing he choose to himself for Cheife Opposites, the Lincolneshire Ministers, he doth not deal with all their Arguments, nor the twentieth part of their Allegations, but only with such as he thought fittest for his purpose? Of this I will not say all. But this I may not omit, that considering he knew how much hath been said against the Ceremonies by them and others, especially by M. Parker, which he never attempted to answer, neither he, nor others for him, had any cause to triumph in this book, as in a complete Defense.

A Reply to Doctor MORTONS GENERAL DEFENCE OF THREE Nocent Ceremonies.

CAP. I.

SECT. II.

WHATSOEVER is objected in this Section for the All-sufficiency or perfect fullness of the Scripture, I will take for granted, because nothing is denied by the Defendant. It is granted therefore at the first entrance, that the Scripture condemneth whatsoever is done, not only against the warrant and direction of the Word, but also that which is done beside it.

SECT. III.

BVT that which before the Defendant durst not deny, now he cometh to oppose in the proofs of it: Which is a strange course, in him especially that professeth a distinct logical proceeding.

In the propounding of our confirmation, I note two things once here in the beginning for all following occasions to be marked, 1 this Defendant doth us wrong in distributing our confirmations into those which are taken from Scriptures, and those that are from the Fathers, and those that are from Protestant Divines: as if these were in our estimation of the same kind. Whereas we profess that we ascribe no force unto any testimony of man, as if it were a proof, but only bring such allegations in as illustrations in regard of our adversaries perverse prejudice. 2 He wrongeth us likewise in that difference which he insinuateth betwixt the Fathers and our Divines, calling their testimonies Judgments, and the other only Confessions: we acknowledge no such imparity. If this were nothing but idle rhetoric in the Defendant, it may be passed by.

In the answer brought to Heb. 3 2, we have this distinction given us: some points concerning religion are doctrinal, and some merely ceremonial. The former are sufficiently revealed in Scripture: but the latter are left to the liberty of the Church. But 1 why is that denied here by a distinction, which passed without denial or distinction in the former section? 2 what kind of distinction is this, which doth not distinguish of any term which is in the objection? 3 the Defendant should have done well to have explained and confirmed his distinction. For doctrinal opposed to ceremonial in the formal signification of these words, I never heard of before that I remember: and sure I am no sound reason will allow. Ceremonial is opposed to Moral, and sometime to substantial; but to doctrinal it cannot properly, because there is ceremonial doctrine as well as moral or substantial. 4 To which of these points will the Def refer the Hierarchy of Bishops? or are they no points of Religion? For the negative part of this answer, that ceremonial points of Religion are not revealed in the Scripture, but left to the liberty of the Church: it is too too nakedly set down for to bear any color of truth with it. For 1 was this true before the coming of Christ? then all the ceremonial law is Apocriphall. 2 is this true universally (as it is here set down) in the New Testament? then water in baptism, and bread and wine in the Lord's Supper, are no ceremonial points of Religion. 3 the caution that is given Deut. 4. 2 and such like, did they not contain in them ceremonial points of Religion? then it was lawful for the Jews, to add, detract, and alter the ceremonies according to their pleasure; and doth not that law bind us as well as the Jews? then we do the Papists wrong, in putting them to so much trouble as we do in finding out shifts to avoid the dint which such places give them.

But to leave this misshapen distinction: An answer is given at length to the place alleged out of Heb. 3. 2 concerning the comparison betwixt Christ and Moses: sect. 4 5.

SECT. IIII.

IN this Section comparison is made betwixt Christ and Moses in real faithfulness, as he calleth it. But this sufficeth not to loose the knot. For Moses was faithful in all the house of God, and Christ was not inferior, but in all parts of his office Prophetical concerning all points of Religion, was no doubt as faithful as Moses.

SECT. V.

HERE the Defendant can find nothing to bring out of Scripture for Christ's faithfulness in ritual ordinances, but as Moses appointed ceremonies, so Christ removed them. Is not this a proper explication of Scripture, to interpret a similitude by a dissimilitude? The Scripture maketh Christ like unto Moses: this Defendant expoundeth the likeness to be in this, that Christ pulled down that which Moses had set up.

Out of M. Calvin, Instit. lib. 4. c. 10. S. 30. he taketh upon him to decide this question. But he should have dealt more plainly, and according to the scope of his author, if he had cited Bellarmino de pont. l. 4. c. 17. where the same words are according to his meaning. For in that place of Calvin there is nothing at all which without gross equivocation will serve the Defendants purpose: For Calvin's meaning was nothing less then to teach that Christ had given liberty unto men for to prescribe at their discretion mystical signs in the Church: but only to dispose of such circumstances as in their kind are necessary, but in particular determination do vary. He instanceth in the next section in the circumstance of time, what hour the congregation should meet: in the place, how large, or in what fashion the Church should be built: in mere order, what Psalms should be sung at one time, and what another time. These and such like circumstances of order and comeliness, equally necessary in civil and religious actions are understood by Calvin: not significant ceremonies, proper unto religious worship, such as ours are now in controversy. This allegation therefore borroweth all the show it hath from the ambiguous meaning of the word ceremonies.

The same deceit is in the known case which the Defendant adjoyneth to Calvin's words. For if by Rites he meaneth such circumstances of order and decency, as were before mentioned, then I grant all he saith: but if by Rites he meaneth ceremonies properly of religious nature, use, and signification, such as the cross in baptism, and surplice are known to be, then there is no reason in his speech. For 1. there is no necessity that in any nation the Churches should have any religious ceremony of spiritual signification, beside those which Christ hath appointed to all: and if the Defendant can show any such necessity, then I would desire him also to show by what rules, and for what cause these religious ceremonies imposed upon us in England, are fitter for us, or tend more to our edification, then other ceremonies would, or then they would in any other nation under heaven. Except both these positions be proved, the words of this section are all but wind: and proved I am sure they never were nor will be.

SECT. VI. VII.

THE second place of Scripture handled by the defendant, is 2. Sam. 7. 7. Where I cannot but marvel why so resolute a disputer would pass by in silence, Deu. 4. 2. & 12. 32. Prov. 30. 6. Lev. 10. 12. all which places are alleged by the Lincolnshire ministers (against whom he professeth principally to write) & choose this place which they bring in after the former. Was there not a cause? But to take him as we find him, he professeth plainly, that it was lawful for David without special warrant to build a house unto God: and in this he is so peremptory, that he condemneth the contrary opinion of notable precipitancie, and presumeth to make this example a ground of confutation against his adversaries, disputing as he pedantically speaketh first by extortion, and then by retortion out of this place. But if his extortion be mere torting and torturing of the text, we need not fear his retortion.

Now that the purpose of David was partly condemned, appeareth plainly, 1. because it was prohibited, as here the Defendant in his answer expressly granteth. 2. Because as honorable M. Calvi well observeth on Act. 7. 46. It was not lawful for man to choose a place for God's Name & Ark, but it was to be placed in that place which God himself should show, as Moses doth often admonish. Neither durst David himself bring the Ark into the threshing floor of Arauna, until the Lord by an Angel from heaven had witnessed unto him that that was the place chosen by himself, 2. Sam. 24. 11. 3. Because it cannot be absolutely excused from some mixture of rashness with zeal, that he should resolve absolutely to build an house unto God, before he knew either what manner of house God would have built, or when, or by whom: seeing without the especial direction and assistance of God's spirit, nothing of this kind could be well done. How could David have built a house, except the Lord had filled with the spirit of wisdom Bezaliel and Aboliab, or some such?

The Arguments brought by the Defendant for the contrary opinion are nothing worth. 1. Nathan (saith he) had allowed the purpose of David, v. 3. But judicious Junius answereth (in his notes upon that place) that so Samuel out of human infirmity, said that Eliab was the man whom God would have king, 1. Sam. 16. 7. 2. God calleth David his servant, which he never doth in reproof. Which is not true, though the reproof be for a thing simply evil: as is plainly to be seen Isa. 1. 3, •er. 2. 13. and in many such places, where my people is as much as my servant. But the very word Servant also is twice thus used in one verse, Isa. 42. 19. much less when the affection is good in the general, and blemished only by some circumstance. For then why may not a good title be given as an allowance of that which is good, and yet the evil be at the same time reproved? so many learned divines do interpret that of the Midwiues, Exod. 1. 19. 20. 21. Moses was reproved and brought to his grave for a sin, and yet when his death is recorded, it is said that Moses the servant of the Lord died, Deut. vlt. The Churches are sharply reproved Rev. 2. & 3. and yet are styled by the name of Churches, and golden Candlesticks: and their ministers who are chiefly reproved are called Stars. 3. there is another reason rendered by Solomon of this restraint. 1. Reg. 5. 3. 4. But the Defendant should mark that one reason doth not exclude another. In this place of Samuel two reasons are rendered, as Tremellius and Junius note, the second of which is taken (as he saith) from the example of David's ancestors, who never vndertook any such thing, because they knew the calling of God was to be expected. 4. God himself commended this purpose of David. 1. King. 8. 17. As if the same affection may not in divers respects be both commended and condemned. But this evasion of Mr. Hy. 1 pass over, saith the Defender, as childish and absurd. And why so I pray? 1. Because God himself did interpret this affection for a deed. 2. He did note this deed as special, saying in both respects, thou didst well, that it was in thy heart. In which words if there be any consequence, or good sense, then not only Mr. Hy. his evasion, but logic it self is childish and absurd.

SECT. VIII. IX. X. XI.

IN these passages two places of Scripture are objected, under the name of Mr. Hy: but I verily think Mr. Hy hath some wrong done him in the matter. Howsoever, I will not undertake to maintain that these places are fitly alleged and urged: though by proportion the force of the argument used in those places (who required these things at your hands) is strong against our ceremonies. We will not imitate D. Cary now Bishop of Exeter, that proved the Surplice by the armor of light, Rom. 13. 12. nor them that prove kneeling at the communion, and at the word Jesus, out of the bowing of the knee of all creatures, Phil. 2. 10. nor those that fetch the cross out of the letter Tau. Eze. 9. 4. Neither need the Defender please himself in this, that by some places of Scripture the ceremonies are not condemned: it is enough if they were condemned but by one only testimony of Scripture, or by one sound argument drawn out of Scripture, though no more could be brought. But what kind of dealing is this, for him that professeth a confutation principally of the Lincoln shire Ministers, to pass by divers texts of Scripture alleged by them, and to bring forth other of an uncertain author, never publicly propounded in any of our writings?

SECT. XII.

THE last place of Scripture handled in this Argument, is Yer. 7. 31. the force of which, as it pertaineth to the purpose in hand, is in the last words, which I commanded them not, neither came it into my heart. The reason lieth thus (to take honorable Calvin's interpretation upon the place) seeing God under this title only condemneth that which the Jews did, because he had not commanded it them: therefore no other reason need be sought for the confutation of superstition, then that they are not by commandment from God. Now the Defendant answereth, that this was a thing forbidden, and in that sense was said not to be commanded. What is this to the purpose? therein lieth the strength of our argument: that not to command in things that pertain to worship, is all one with forbidding. But you collect (saith he) that this was not against, but only besides the word. It is not our collection but his own vain conceit. Our argument is drawn from the form of speech here used. See Mr. Cartwright in his Reply p. 48. fully clearing this point. When I read this objection first (saith he) I wondered that in disting•ishing besides the word and against it, you simbolized so well with Bell•rmine, in his distinction of mortal and venial sin. He was as it seemeth, in a wondering humor. But 1. why doth he not wonder not only at our late Divines, but at Chrysostom also, as symbolizing with Bellarmino, when he in Gal. 1. 8. doth so distinguish betwixt teaching contrary to the Gospel, and beside the Gospel? Why doth he not wondrously also accuse Junius for symbolizing with Bellarmino, while he refuteth Bellarmino by this distinction, contr. 3. l. 4. c. 17. an. 10? it were easy, if needful, to produce other honorable partners in this fault: but we need no other then perswaders to subscription, who have drawn divers into this net, by telling them, that though the things they stand upon be beside the word, yet they are not contrary thereunto, and that only is affirmed by subscribers. 2. We are not the authors of this distinction, but they which thereby excuse human inventions in God's worship. We are constrained to follow and ferret them in their own holes. See Mr Cartwr. Repl. p 36. 3 yet if need were, there might be shown though not a real, yet a rational distinction betwixt these two. 4. The Defendants answer doth expressly herein symbolize with Bellarmino de Pout. l 4. c. 19.

For the other allegations of Scripture quoted in the Abridgement for confirmation of the same truth with the former, the Defendant referreth us to Chap. 2. Sect. 2. 3. 4. 5. where only one of them is touched.

SECT. XIII.

TO many testimonies alleged out of the Fathers, answer is given, 1. That they speak not of things only beside the Scripture, but of things contrary: which answer is again repeated under the form of a distinction betwixt Scriptura negans, and negata. 2. They speak not of ceremonies, but of doctrines.

To which the reply is easy: 1. our meaning is mistaken, I fear, willfully, when we are made authors of an opposite distinction betwixt beside and against in this case. It sufficeth us that beside in points of religion, be all one with against. 2 Though those general sayings be applied to doctrines in most of the places alleged, yet that hindereth not, but▪ the truth of them may be taken so generally, as to include also religious ceremonies. A particular or proper conclusion may be drawn from a general proposition, and yet the proposition remain general still in the largest extent that it is capable of.

SECT. XIII.

TO the testimony of Tertullian de Cor. c. 2. That is prohibited which is not permitted, two things are likewise answered, 1. that it maketh not against our ceremonies, for they are permitted: which is nothing else but a mere shift. For Tertullian's meaning must needs be of other permission then the Defendant can challenge to our ceremonies, though he beg the question: otherwise there should be no sense in his words. 2. he saith, We may blush to speak of Tertullian in this case: because he professeth traditions in the same book. To which I answer: that then all our writers may blush who allege many things out of the fathers which they in other places gainsay. 2. We blush not to make use of truth where we find it, though error follow it at the heels; rather let our Idolizers of the Fathers blush, when they see their shame. Yet of this answer we shall have occasion to make use hereafter.

SECT. XV.

IN this Section answer is made to some allegations brought out of Protestant Writers (not unto all which the Abridgement citeth for the perfection of the Scriptures) where 1. the Defendant answereth for himself, that his meaning was not of matters merely ceremonial. And so, say I, the meaning of our argument was not of such mere ceremonies as the Defendant here describeth in the end of this Section, if he mean by mere ceremonies mere order and decency: but our ceremonies are of another nature, because they have doctrine or teaching in them, and therefore are doctrinal, as he pleaseth to speak, or mixed, 2. confessing that in one place he speaketh of ceremonies, he limiteth his speech to such ceremonies as are made essential parts of a sacrament, as Milk instead of Wine: sopping in of bread into the cup, and wringing in of the grape; these ceremonies he accounteth doctrinal. But here I would fain hear a good reason, why sopping of the bread into the cup is more doctrinal, or more against the word, then the cross in baptism. Bread and Wine were ordained by Christ to a holy use in the Church: so is not the cross: sopping hath some agreement with reason: crossing hath none; sopping was used by Christ himself the same night, and at the same table where the sacrament was appointed: crossing was never used by Christ or his Apostles. In sopping there is no new material sign appointed, but a new fashion only of using the old: in crossing a new sign is obruded. So that sopping seemeth to be better then crossing. If opinion of necessary use doth put a difference: our men can easily conclude in the Convocation house, that it is not the opinion of the Church of England, and then all will be well. If sopping seem to be a part of the sacrament: crossing when it is done in the very act of sprinkling, (as many times it is) maketh as much show of bearing a part in baptism. But what if out of the Lord's Supper, a little before, or a little after, while the prayers are making which belong to the Supper, there should be appointed such a sopping to be used of all that communicate for mystical signification, I would know of the Defendant whether this were allowable or no by his doctrinal distinction? If not, why should he show more favor to the cross?

In excusing of B. Jewel, and D. Whitaker's, nothing is said by the Defendant, which hath not formerly been confuted.

Now it might be here expected, that the Defendant should have said something concerning those general rules which God hath set down in his word for the direction of the Church in rites and orders Ecclesiastical, mentioned by the Lincoln-shire Ministers in this argument, p. 44. But neither here, nor in any other place of this book, doth the Defendant so much as endeavor to show that our ceremonies are needful and profitable for the edification of the people, by the more comely and orderly performance of that service which he hath expressly prescribed in his word. This is a main matter urged in the Abridgement, without which the ceremonies cannot be innocent in their use: and all that the Defendant hath hitherto endeavored to answer is in the Abridgement brought in to other end then to prove that no ceremonies are to be brought into the Church without those conditions: and yet for all this, our ceremonies in this chief point are left destitute of all defense. If therefore all were granted which the Defendants arguments or answers in this book maintain, yet the ceremonies will be found nocent, and to be rejected, if it be but for their unprofitableness, according to that of Basil,

SECT. XVI.

THE Defendant here undertaketh to prove, that God in the scriptures hath granted a general license or authority to all Churches, to ordain any ceremonies that may be fit for the better serving of God. But what if this were granted? what is it to the purpose? what maketh it for our ceremonies in controversy, except he can show that they are fit for the better serving of God? Now this he nowhere undertaketh to prove, nor dare, I think, profess so much in writing, without many unwarrantable limitations.

The only scripture he bringeth is, 1. Cor. 14. 26. 40. concerning order and decency, a place much profaned by the patrons of our ceremonies, as shall be shown. This place is used (saith he) by Fathers and all Divines, for one and the same conclusion. It is much used, I grant, and as much abused. But 1. it is not used by all Divines, to prove the institution of such ceremonies as ours lawful. For they are much mistaken which think our ceremonies to be mere matters of order: and as for decency, they have been often proved to be far from it: which of it self to every indifferent eye is more then apparent. 2. it is not used to this purpose by any that have authority sufficient to persuade us that it will bear such a conclusion, except they will show us by what Logic they form their consequence, which the Defendant is not able to do for them. 3. This scripture being rightly understood, doth not only not justify such ceremonies as ours, but plainly condemneth them. For the manifesting of which assertion, because it may seem strange to those ears that are accustomed to other sounds, I will here distinctly set down an argument drawn out of these words, against such ceremonies as ours are.

All that is left unto the Churches liberty in things pertaining unto God's worship, is to order them in comely manner. This is manifestly collected out of the place in question: so the Defendant seemeth to grant, so P. Martyr understandeth it, as is to be seen in his commentary upon 1 Sam. 14. which judgment of his is cited and approved by D. Whitaker de Pont p. 841. & 844.

confirmed also by Junius against Bell. cont. 3. l. 4. c. 16. n. 86. 87. &c. 17. n. 9. 10. 12. 13. where he showeth that Christ is the only law-giver that appointeth things in his Church: and that he hath appointed all that are requisite: and that the Church maketh no laws (properly so called) to appoint any new things to be used, but only canons, orders, directions, ordering in seemly manner those things which Christ hath appointed: and that if she addeth anything of her own, she doth decline. The reason is, because unto her is committed no authority of appointing new things, but a ministry to observe and do such things which Christ hath appointed. vide etiam Iun. de transl. imper. l. 1. c. 2. n. 26. 27. 31. This is also confirmed by sound reason, both in respect of the wisdom required in all law-makers, & perfectly found in Christ, and also in regard of the nature of such institutions. For the former reason teacheth, (as Aristotle showeth Rhet. 1. 3.) that all which possibly may, should be appointed in the law by the giver of it, and nothing left unto the ministerial judges, but that which must needs be left, as matters of fact, &c. Now in the worship of God, all but particular circumstances of order, may easily be appointed (as in very deed they were) by our law-giver Christ. As for the nature of such institutions, that doth also require so much: for whatsoever is above civilitie therein, if it be not a circumstance of order, it is worship, and therefore invented by man, unlawful will-worship. For whatsoever is used or acted by him that worshippeth God, in that act, it must needs be either grounded on civil human considerations, and therefore civilitie: or an act and means of worship, and therefore worship: or the ordering and manner of disposing those acts & means, and therefore lawful, if lawfully and fitly applied: or else, at the least, idle and vain, and therefore to be avoided, according to that of Basil, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : A fifth cannot be given. By all this it may appear, that the authority of the Church is not to appoint what she will, no not of things in their own nature indifferent, and say they be in order, or for order: but only to order those things which God hath appointed.

Thus far the proposition, or first part of my syllogism: the assumption followeth.

But to appoint & use the ceremonies as we do, is not to order in comely manner anything pertaining to God's worship. The reason is, because order requireth not the institution or usage of any new thing, but only the right placing and disposing of things which are formerly instituted. This appeareth 1. by the notation which is given of the word it self, which both in greek & latin is taken from the ranking of soldiers in certain bounds & limits of time & place. Dicebāt enim militibus tribuni, hactenus tibi licet, hic consists, eō progrediēre, huc revertere, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , inde ordo Scalig. and 2 by the definitions which are given thereof, by Philosophers and Divines. Tull. off. lib. 1 eadem vis videtur ordinis & collocationis. Ordinem definiunt compositionem rerum aptis & accommodatis locis. Locum autem actionis, opportunitatem dicunt esse temporis. Aug. de civit. lib. 15 cap. 13 order is the disposition which fit places to things equal and unequal, id est, when things are handsomely ranked, some to go before, and some to follow, as P. Martyr expoundeth it, loc. come. cl. 4 c. 5.

3 The same also is confirmed by our Divines, who usually giving instances of order, do infist in time, place, and such like circumstances, making a difference betwixt mystical ceremonies and order, many times condemning the one, and allowing the other: as the divines of France and the low Countries, in their observations on the Harmonie of Confessions Sect. 17 Beza Ep. 8. Iun. in Bell. append. tract. de cultu imaginum c. 7 n. 12 13 14.

4 By the context of the Chapter, viz. 1 Cor. 14. it plainly appeareth, that order is opposed to that confusion spoken of v. 33, and therefore importeth nothing but that peaceable proceeding whereby they that should speak, speak one by one, and the rest attend, &c. v. 30 31. So Basil expoundeth it, showing order to consist in sorting of persons, some to this, and some to that according to their office, and in determining of time and place, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : p. 459. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . and p. 530. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

Lastly, neither Luk. 1 8, neither in any place of Scripture doth the word order import anymore then hath been said.

As for comeliness, that is nothing but the seemliness of order. For as P. Martyr saith in 1 Cor. 11: it is such a tempering of actions as whereby they may more fitly attaine their end. Otherwhere it may contain that natural or civil handsomenesse, which is spoken of ch. 11 13, as it doth ch. 12 23, and so includeth all that which is grounded on civility, as a fair cloth and cup for the communion, a fair and firm vessel for baptism: but not the appointing of new mystical ceremonies, for then such ceremonies were here commanded to all Churches, which the Def. I think will not say: and then the Apostolic Assemblies should have worshipped God uncomelily.

Thus we have both proposition and assumption of our Argument against the ceremonies confirmed out of this place, which the Defendant choose as the only place that could be brought for them. Now I hope we may add the Conclusion.

Therefore to appoint and use the ceremonies as we do, is not left to the liberty of the Church, i. e. it is unlawful.

SECT. XVII.

Concerning the Fathers we are told out of Zanchius, that they had always some universal ceremonies, as certain feast days, not appointed by God. To this we answer, 1 If this always be taken in the largest extent, to signify from the beginning, we cannot believe the truth of this Assertion: neither can the Defend. prove it. Who can think, that presently upon the Apostles departure, their disciples should presume to be wiser then their Masters? 2 the first beginning of these feasts, was not by canonical imposition to bind men unto new ceremonies, but a voluntary accommodation in respect of the infirmity of some in the Church, or coming towards it. This appeareth by the variety which was betwixt one Church and another in observing of them; and by the testimony of Socrates, alleged and allowed by this Defend. himself, Apol. p. 2 lib. 2 c. 9. 3 The mischief that came in by these observations, in that they so soon overshadowed, obscured, and justled out of doors the simplicity of the Gospel, and many ordinances of Christ, do sufficiently show, that the fathers in these things had neither direction nor blessing from God.

But that which the ancient Churches of Christ did always maintain may not be deemed to derogate from the authority of holy Writ. If always include the Apostolical times, I grant. If otherwise, then let the Def. take to himself that which he unreasonably cast upon us before, of symbolizing with Bellarmino con. l. 4. c. 9. The same answer which our Divines give there, will serve here. Wherunto may be added that which M. Parker hath in his book of the Cross, p. 2 ch. 9 s. 6 and de Polit. Eccles. l. 2.

SECT. XVIII.

FOR Protestant Divines, Bellarmino's confession is alleged, who saith, That Protestants grant that the Apostles did ordain certain Rites and Orders, belonging to the Church, which are not set down in Scripture, cont. 1. lib. 4. cap. 3. To which I answer, 1 Rites and Orders may be ordained, though such ceremonies as ours be unlawful. And Bellarmino's meaning could not be of such Rites as our Ceremonies are, except he spake against his conscience, for he confesseth, de cult: sanct. l. 3 cap. 7, that some of our Divines, as Brenz by name condemn such as unlawful. 2 Bellarmino craftily bringeth in this confession of our divines, that he may make them contradict themselves, as appeareth in the same place. His Confession therefore in this place is not so indifferent, as the Def. would have it: 3 our Argument is not from the Scriptures negatively against the authority of the Apostles, which was all one with that of the Scriptures, and therefore understood in our Proposition, but against the ordinary authority of the Church. Except therefore the Def. can prove either that our ceremonies were the rites brought in by the Apostles, or that our Convocation house hath the same authority which the Apostles had, this confession of Bellarmino is nothing to the purpose.

SECT. XIX.

HERE the Protestants themselves are brought in confessing as much as Bellarmino said of them. But the first witness Chemnitz saith nothing, but that some Ecclesiastical rites, though they have no commandment or testimony in Scripture are not to be rejected: which in the sense now often expounded, I willingly grant. Yet the Def. should not instead of Testimony of Scripture, have put warrant of Scripture: For testimony neither in usual acception, nor yet in Chemnitz his own meaning, is so large as warrant.

The place of Calvin hath been answered before. Junius is plainly of the same mind, and so to be interpreted, so also Zanchius, Daneus and Whitaker: But because Junius is styled here by the Def. with his deserved title of Judicious, it will not be amiss to show his judgment fully about such additions as our ceremonies are. To name therefore one place for all at this time, because there he speaketh professedly his judgment, and bindeth it with a solemn oath, for the sincerity and impartialnesse of his conscience in that behalf: The place I mean is in his Eccleasticus, lib. 3 cap. 5. towards the end. Where first he distinguisheth betwixt things necessary, and others not necessary in the administration of the Church: and concerning even the latter sort, he modestly, but thoroughly showeth how little liberty is left unto men. If any man (saith he) either by Civil or Ecclesiastical authority will add things not necessary nor agreeable to order, we would not pertinaciously contend with him, but desire only that he would seriously consider of three things. 1 By what authority or example he is led to think that the holy Church of God, and the simplicity of the mysteries of Christ (whose voice only is heard by his sheep, according to the commandment of the Father, John. 10 27) must be clad with human traditions, which Christ doth reject

• 2 To what end he judgeth that his things should be added unto those that are divine? For if the end be conformity with others, it were more equity, that other Churches should conform to those which come nearest to the word of God, as Cyprians counsel is, then that these should conform to the other. If the end be comeliness, what is more comely then the simplicity of Christ? what is more simple then that comeliness? If there be no other reason beside will, then that of Tertullian is to be thought of, the will of God is the chief necessity, and that the Church of God is not tied unto man's wills in things divine. The 3 thing to be thought on it, what event always hath followed upon human Traditions, as daily experience doth show.

This was the judgment of Judicious Junius, whereby it is manifest that he favored not our ceremonies, nor would have pleaded for them as the Def. under color of his name.

Because Zanchius also is brought in with his deserved Title of a profound Divine, speaking nothing to the purpose in hand, I will set down his judgment concerning this point, out of that Epistle to famous Qu. Elizabeth, where he treateth expressly of ceremonies, and of our ceremonies. Est autem Ecclesia sicut in doctrina, sic etiam in ceremoniis ad Ecclesiae Apostolicae regulam informanda. The Church must be ordered by the rule of the Apostolical Church, as well in ceremonies as in doctrine. What can be said more contrary to the Def. his distinction?

SECT. XX.

AT length we are come to Reason. But if this reason were sound and certain, I see no cause why it should not have had the upper hand of human testimonies.

1 The first reason is grounded on the Defendants fantasy merely. For it supposeth that we hold some points of Religion to be only besides the Word, and no way against it: which not only I have confuted before as a cavil, but M. Cartwright long since in his Reply, p. 56: the very words also of this argument which the Def. here opposeth do show that we hold such things condemned by the Scriptures, and therefore against the general rule of them, though only beside their particular prescription.

2 The second reason concludeth nothing which we will not grant, in the sense formerly expressed, viz. that by those some ceremonies be meant circumstances of mere order, and by man's invention, be understood man's particular determination. Otherwise the assumption is palpably false. Beside the proposition also is untrue, if < in non-Latin alphabet > a thing indifferent, be taken in such a general sense as some time it is found used in by Divines. Vide Sopingii Apologet. respons. ad lib. anonym. p. 166.

3 The third and last reason is taken from the difference of ceremonies which may and must be in the Churches of Christ. The answer is, that this difference ought to be only in determination of particular circumstances of order, for time, place, &c.

SECT. XXI.

THIS sect. is of all other most ridiculous. For, first it supposeth every circumstance to be of the like nature with the ceremonies in controversy. Secondly, it supposeth all circumstances to be of institution. Thirdly, it supposeth contrary circumstances ceremoniously to be practiced, by the same men as of institution: for otherwise the cavillation hath no show. Now all these are conceited dreams. But what if we should argue thus? You say these ceremonies are divine: and yet dare not deny but the rejecting of them in other Churches is divine. You retain these ceremonies as divine, and yet have rejected other ceremonies of like nature as divine as these. What divinity is in such courses?

SECT. XXII.

AFTER all this ado about the proposition of the first argument, now we are told of an assumption out of the Abridgment, and M. Hy. viz. that these Ceremonies have no warrant from the word of God. For M. Hy. I cannot say much: But I am sure the Authors of the Abridgement have great wrong done them. Whosoever will turn to the place quoted by the Def. in the Abridgement, shall presently see that the words which our Def. hath turned into a Proposition, are there but part of an illustration belonging to this Proposition, All ceremonies that swerve from the rules given in the word for the Churches direction in matters of ceremony, are unlawful. The assumption of which is, but the ceremonies in question swerve from those Rules. Now all the chief pith both of proposition and assumption is by the Def. omitted: a by thing is put in place of the proposition, a new assumption is formed: and yet, all fatherd upon the Abridgment. But to pass by that, the assumption here set down is defensible enough.

He telleth us that in general and in permissiue appointment, these ceremonies are from God, and divine. A permissive appointment, I never heard of before, nor can understand how it will be excused from an implicit contradiction. But for the explaining of himself, he bringeth Calvin affirming that some constitutions of the Church founded in Scripture, may be called divine, because they are parts of that decency which God hath commanded. All which being granted, and the like saying of Vrsin, maketh nothing at all for such ceremoniess as ours are, except the Def. can prove, that they are constitutions of mere order and decency, agreeable also to the other rules prescribed: the contrary whereof hath been formerly declared. One rule of direction which he calleth equity, is here only touched, and cometh after to be handled, to which place I reserve it.

Thus much for the maintenance of that Argument which the Def. maketh the first.

CHAP. II.

SECT. I.

THIS second Argument is taken from the kind, unto which such ceremonies as ours are, do in their nature belong, viz. that they are parts of divine worship, and therefore (being man's inventions) unlawful. Here the Def. comes out with a wedge as he calleth it, distinguishing betwixt proper or essential parts of God's worship, and improper or accidental. But first he should have done well to have considered the nature and measure of the thing which he would cleave, by the light of a definition. For otherwise he may spend his wedge, his beetle, and all his labor in vain.

And so indeed he hath, as may appear by his explication of this distinction. By proper and essential parts (saith he) we understand such ceremonies, which are so necessarily required to God's service, as that the contrary thereof must needs displease him. By accidental parts (or appurtenances) such as serve only as accessory complements, ordained for the more convenient discharge of the necessary worship of God, i. e. for decorum and edification. For 1 if all those ceremonies be essential parts of God's worship, which are such as the contrariety of them must needs displease God, then certainly all ceremonies which serve for decorum and edification must needs be essential parts of God's worship: because the contrary of decorum and edification must needs displease God in his worship. 2 What kind of wedging is this, so to distinguish the parts of God's worship, as that the accidental only, and not the essential shall serve for edification? 3 What cleaving or dissolving is this of the parts of worship, where the accidental parts are rather said to be appurtenances then parts, and yet granted to be parts? 4 What worship of God is there that is not essential? If it hath no essence of worship in it, surely it is no worship. 5 The accidental parts of worship have not so much communion with the essential, as the hair of the body (which is but an excrement) hath with the body: this the Def. expressly granteth in this Sect. and shall that which is not so much as an excrement unto the chief worship, be accounted or called a part of worship.

SECT. III.

FOR the proof of this, that no human inventions are lawful parts of God's worship, the Abridgement alledgeth Exod. 20 4. Deut. 12 32 Es. 1 12 Mat. 15 9 Col. 2 23, three of which are only mentioned by the Def. and two of the three only answered, or rather put of with miserable shifts? By the precepts of men Es. 29 9 are signified (saith he) such human ordinances as were expressly contrary to the commandments of God. But 1 if here he taketh the word expressly as opposite unto pregnant consequence, as he doth p. 2 then I hope he will grant that there is the same reason of those human inventions which are not expressly contrary. If he taketh it largely, as containing such consequence, then he saith nothing to the purpose, because in that sense all Religious worship invented by man is expressly contrary to the commandments of God. 2 Christ himself Mat. 15 9, doth interpret this very place of will-worship in general, where for brevity sake, I refer the Def. unto M. Calvin whom he calleth an honorable Witness in this controversy. He after long discourse concludeth thus, fixum ergo illud maneat, fictitios omnes cultus coram deo vanos esse: imo, teste propheta maledictos & detestabiles, i. e. This must be held for certain, that all worships invented by man are before God, vain, accursed and detestable. By adding and diminishing Deut. 12 32 is not meant (saith the Def.) addition of preservation, but addition of corruption. Where 1 the phrase is strange, by adding and diminishing is meant addition. 2 This gloss is clean contrary to the text, for the Lord chargeth that we do not add to the word, that so we may keep or preserve it Deu. 4 2 even as we keep or preserve carefully that which is committed to our trust 1 Tim. 6 20: now the Def. relleth us that some addition is the means of keeping or preservation. Card. Cajetan himself interpreteth the place far more judiciously and religiously, inhibetur additio etiam pretextu custodiendi mandata Dei, even of additions that are pretended for preservation of God's law, come. in Deu. 10. 3 He should have done well to have manifested unto us the addition of preservation by some example: for that which he talketh of the coyner pertaineth only to corruption, of which no man doubteth. 4 I would know if there be not also a diminution of preservation, as well as an addition? in the text they are joined together. 5 This pretence was the old shoeing-horn to draw on superstition into the Church, as Calvin noteth on Mat. 15 2, Legislatores ipsi non jactant se novum quicquā tradere, sed tantum addere cavendi formulas, quae media essent adminicula ad servandam Dei legem, i. e. the old Masters of ceremonies pretended that they meant only to bring in additions of preservation. 6 This is Bell. answer to Calvin concerning this very point and place, de effect. sacr. l. 2 c. 32 prohibet dominus additionem corruptentem, i. e. as the Def. translateth, an addition of corruption is forbidden. This I hope is another manner of symbolizing with Bellar. then that which the Def. formerly objected to Non-conformists.

SECT. III.

HERE are two testimonies brought to confute the Non-conf. his interpretation of Scripture, whereby he would infer that all kind of will-worship is unlawful. For that is here the question and nothing else. The first Witness is Danaus, where the consequence lieth thus, if Danaus in one place doth apply these Scriptures to grosser will-worship then our is, then he doth not allow that they condemn all kind of will-worship; but the first is true: ergo. is not this a fair kind of reasoning: just as the Papist Gregorius de Valentia reasoneth, abominable idolatry is condemned, 1 Pet. 4. 3, therefore not all idolatry.

The other Witness is Zanchius in Col. 2 23, where beside that the like consequence is made as before, I would desire any indifferent man to consider these words of Zanchi found in that very place. One kind of will-worship is if any new worship, whereby God is worshipped be invented and brought into the Church. For God will only be worshipped, and only with that worship which he himself hath appointed, Deut. 6 Mat. 15, also those in 1 Thes. 1 9. By an idol in general is meant whatsoever in Religion is brought in without the word of God. He that looketh upon these words of Zanchi, will scarce tell what to think of this Def. his audacious alleging of this Author, and the vain triūph which he groundeth upon him. He thought it seemeth that few or none would ever take the pains to examine what he said.

In the fifth Section, there is nothing on either side but a dumb show. It shall pass for me therefore in silence.

SECT. VI.

HERE come the judgment of Protestants to be examined concerning this question, Whether all parts of Divine worship invented by man be not to be condemned? Where first the Defendant bringeth forth his wedge again, distinguishing betwixt essential, and accidental worship as before: but in other phrases; for now he telleth us, that essential worship is that wherein is placed (ϕ) opinion of Justice, sanctity, efficacy, or divine necessity and accidental is any rite, which serveth for the more consonant and convenient discharge of that essential worship. But these are but words. For 1. worship doth not vary according to men's opinion: but consisteth in the nature of the action it self. Otherwise a man may go to Mass, conceiving a private opinion to himself, that he doth it not for justice, sanctity, efficacy, or divine necessity, but for some other cause. Or at the least a convocation house may appoint us the grossest of all the ceremonies in Popery, and set another opinion upon it▪ 2. Sanctitie cannot be separated wholly from such ceremonies which are proper unto religion. i. appropriated unto religious persons, actions, and purposes only, in the solemn worship of God. For they must either be holy, or civil, or profane. But civil they are not; for then the bare omission of them would argue rudeness and incivilitie: nor profane, I hope, in the Def. opinion: therefore they must needs be holy. 3. There is no judicious Divine that useth to call circumstances of mere order and decency, worship. Where did the Def. ever read that a pulpit, or a table, or a fair clothe, &c. was pronounced or styled worship?

Come we therefore to the examination of witnesses in particular. Calvin's words are, Instit. l. c. 10. sect 8. all human constitutions, in which the worship of God is placed, are ungodly. The Def. saith, that 1. Calvin meaneth not by worship circumstances of order. Which is most true, neither was any reader so sottish, as ever took that to be his meaning. For what sense could there be in these words, all human constitutions, in which the circumstances of order are placed? 2. He telleth us that he meaneth the inward virtue of worship, which consisteth in an opinion of holiness and justice. Where first I will not urge or grate upon the ill sound which these words have, the inward virtue of worship consisteth in an opinion. 2. How can an inward virtue be placed in an outward ceremony? 3. The proper nature of worship is not in holiness and justice, but in the honoring of God: and all external ceremonies whose proper use is the honoring of God, are external worship, as all divinity showeth. This is therefore but an idle unlearned evasion, to talk of holiness, and justice, in opinion, when the question is of worship. Calvin never thought of such toys. He amplifieth indeed his accusation against the Papists by such circumstances as those are, according as the Def. showeth: but what Logic can thence conclude, that nothing else is contained in the general rule? Calvin himself professeth the contrary, as directly as if he had undertaken to confute this defender of ceremonies. For these are his words, Epist. 259. Si probe & penitus inspicitur, quid homines tantopere sollicitur ad fabricandas ceremonias, reperiemus ex hoc fonte omnes fluxisse, quia quis{que} novum Dei cultum fingere ausus fuerit▪ atqui fictitios omnes cultus non modo repudiat Deus, sed etiam severe abominatur. i. The original of all ceremonies was, that men would needs forge new worships of God: whereas God doth not only refuse such worships, but also abhorreth them.

For Chemnitz, the Defendant telleth us that he condemneth only a ceremony which is among the Papists made necessary. But he should show two things if he would answer soundly: 1 that Chemnitz doth distinguish, as he doth, of will worship, as some were lawful, and some only unlawful. 2. he should show us at the least, that there is some worship which is not necessary: for otherwise Chemnitius in condemning will-worship that is imposed as necessary, doth condemn all will-worship. Now we in our simple divinity (for so it will be accounted) conceive thus: All worship of God is that honor, duty, and reverence which the reasonable creature doth owe to the creator: and therefore cannot understand, how such a duty is not necessary to be performed: or how there can be a worship, which being part of this tribute, may rest in man's choice whether it shall be paid or no. Perhaps this necessity pertaineth only to the worship commanded by God: but in that which man divideth of himself, there is more liberty, there being no reason, that voluntary service should be constrained. If this be the cause, then the worship appointed by man, is no part of his love towards God, nor any testification of it. For if it were, surely it should be necessary, seeing it is necessary to love God with all our hearts, with all our souls, and with all our strength.

The third witness is P. Martyr, loc. come. 770. where he saith, concerning things in their own nature indifferent, that special care must be had, lest any such thing be thought to make towards the worship of God, because divine worship dependeth not on man's will, but on God's counsel. A man would think that these words are plain enough for the condemning of all will-worship. True (saith the Def.) he verieth your phrase of speech, but not your sense. And why so? because (forsooth) he saith in the same place, that the Church may appoint circumstances of order: as if there were any among us that ever denied this: therefore he condemneth not the institution of accidental parts of God's worship. Let any man of sense give judgment here: P. Martyr saith, it is lawful to appoint circumstances of order, but unlawful to appoint any worship. The Def. thus: P. Martyr alloweth men to appoint circumstances of order, therefore he alloweth them to appoint some worship. If this be not as plain a contradiction as any can be framed, then (according to the proverb) let him that taught me logic, give me my money again, Reddat minam Diogenes.

In the last place (as those which make a feast use to do) D. Morton setteth down himself. But he may be accused though for sitting down too soon: for in the Abridgm. I find Melancthon, Bullinger, Bucanus, Perkins and others invited to this meeting, who now by this hastiness of the Def. can find no place. Yet let us hear what he saith for himself. I do not (saith he) condemn all the ceremonies of Rome, but the multitude and burden of them. To which I answer, 1. the question is not here how many or how few you condemned of the Romish ceremonies: but by what reason you condemned them. He that condemneth one ceremony because it is a worship of man's devising, condemneth all worship that man deviseth: and he that condemneth a multitude in that name, condemneth one that is such, though it be alone. 2. Because I have heard men often speak in this manner of the fault that is in a multitude, I would willingly know, what certain limits and bounds are set by God's law, for the number of human ceremonies, such as now are in controversy. If there may be three, why not four, five, six, and so forth, as many as it shall please the convocation house, or him that can when he will turn the convocation upside down? surely, if once we depart from God's institution, there will be no place to rest our foot in, but we must ever follow wind and tide, which in religion is baseness it self.

SECT. VII.

HERE is promised a confutation of the proposition, viz. of this assertion, all will-worship whatsoever is to be condemned, and to that purpose he bringeth forth again his Magna Charta, Let all things be done in order. But I think that plea is sufficiently confuted. In the next place he produceth or rather as the fellow said once, seduceth 2 witnesses, Vrsine and Zanchi. But believe me, when I looked upon the places which he alledgeth out of them, I could not but lift up my heart unto God, and say, O Lord, how can such conceited confidence fasten on a man that regardeth either conscience or credit? How dare mortal men upon such grounds as these, obtrude the conception of their brains upon thy Churches? Vrsine (saith the Def.) hath catechised them well. True: but our proud Prelates for the most part, do scorn not only that, but all other catechisms, except for fashion sake, that which beginneth with What is your name? and though I do not account this Def. in that number, yet I may safely say, that he never well considered whom or what he cited out of Vrsine. All that he bringeth, is out of the commentary on q. 96. ob. 3. & 5. as it is set down by Pareus. Now before objections be brought, it is fit and usual that the Thesis or sentence be set down against which those objections fight; and no wise man will take up an answer made to an objection, before he considereth the assertion against which that objection is made. See then what the assertion of Vrsine is: Ipsae ceremoniae (Ecclesiasticae sc. quae ab hominibus praecipiantur) non modo cultus Dei non sunt: sed etiam conscientias non obligant, &c. the very same thing which we here maintain, viz. that no lawful ceremonies appointed by man, are the worship of God. Except therefore Ecclesiastical ceremonies be therefore the worship of God, because they be not the worship of God, the Def. had no reason to allege this place of Vrsin in this question: and so just it is in the words here alleged out of the answer to the third objection, those things which serve accidentally to the glory of God, are not the worship of God. And to the 4. obj. By these examples will-worship is not established. And to the 5. obj. Indifferent things (being done of faith) please God otherwise then the worship of God properly so called. Is it possible that anything should be concluded from hence for will-worship? Surely no: and therefore the Def. himself maketh his conclusion out of these premises, that Divine worship properly so called is that which is ordained of God. Was there any of us that ever doubted of this? is it not the proposition which this Def. undertook to confute. But in a large sense (saith he) human ceremonies may be held to be a part of divine worship. This is that which we have heard averred before in this section. I had thought we should have seen it proved. But alas it could be no more then affirmed, and that under the shadow of a sentence whereby it is flatly condemned. Zanchi (saith he) distinguisheth the substance of worship from those things which are annexed to worship. Why so do all the Non-conformists. What then? are ceremonies worship in a large sense, because they are annexed to worship? then the sign of the cross is a sacrament because it is annexed to a sacrament.

I wonder (saith the Def.) how such points should seem to be so raw to some of the Non-conformists. What points? those assertions which Vrsine and Zanchi express? they seem to all of us well digested axioms of Divinity: but the consequence which the Def. would draw from hence, is evidently so raw, that none but a very Ostridge can concoct it.

SECT. IX.

To prove that our ceremonies are imposed and used as worship, this argument is brought: Those ceremonies which have the kind, nature, and definition of worship belonging to them, so that they want nothing but a right author to make them true worship, those are in their imposition and use worship, and for want of a right author, are false worship: but our ceremonies are such. Ergo.

The Def. his answer is, that this learning never saw print, as he thinketh, that the institution of God doth not alter the common nature of worship. 1. It may be that he never saw it in print: but I can witness, that Mr. William Bradshaw, a man that knew how to frame an argument in logical manner, as well as any Bishop in England, set this reason down in Print some 14 years since, in one edition (as I remember) of his treatise concerning indifferent things. But an answer to that treatise, or to this argument, was never yet seen in print, though that begging of the question be the chief ground of those invectives which are ordinarily used in Sermons and writings about these questions, viz. that they are things indifferent. This argument is also found in a treatise of the same authors, concerning Divine worship, printed 1604. 2. Though it had never seen the print before now, yet that doth not hinder, but it may be sound. For all sound reasons are not found in print. 3. There is none of our Divines that treateth of worship in general and particular, but hath for substance this learning, viz. that religious worship is that which is done to the honor of God: and if it be according to God's commandment, then it is true; if not, then it is false. The Def. cannot name one of all that ever handled the common place of worship, that hath not so taught, which if it be true, then the institution of God doth not alter the common nature of worship: 1. it doth not make that worship which otherwise being used to some end, and in the same manner, without God's institution, were no worship at all.

But God's institution (saith the Def.) doth distinguish necessary worship from indifferent, and essential from accidental. Grant all this: what can be made of it? Doth it therefore alter the common nature of worship, making that worship, which without it being used in the same manner, and to the same end, is no worship? here is no consequence at all. Beside, neither scripture, nor interpreters of Scripture, nor any good reason will allow, that there is any indifferent worship of God. Neither is it the institution of God (common to all worship) which maketh one more, and another less principal: but the nature of the thing instituted by him.

But the offering of any coloured sheep was indifferent before the Levitical law: afterward, the offering of an unspotted lamb, was necessary and essential in the worship of God. To which objection I answer, 1. This his opposition of offering any coloured sheep before the Levitical law, to the offering of an unspotted lamb afterward, is vain and without ground from the law of God; seeing it doth nowhere appear in the Scriptures, but that it was as lawful to offer any coloured sheep after the law given as well as before. God requires by Moses, that the offerings of his people should be perfect, Levite. 1. 3. 10 &c. And this might well be notwithstanding diversity of color. The party-coloured sheep of Jacob were not imperfect, but of the perfectest sort, and that by the special direction and blessing of God, Gen. 30. 41. 42. with 31. 11. 12. God complaineth of those that offered corrupt sacrifices, torn, lame, and sick, Mal. 1. 13. 14. But for difference of color, there is little color or show of reason, that God gave any such charge in his law. And it is the Doctors ignorance of the story, or want of due consideration that moved him thus to write. Secondly, suppose a lamb without spot to be forbidden, then I answer, That if any man before the commandment had offered an unspotted Lamb with the same mind that after it was to be offered with, as thinking that his sacrifice should in that respect have been the more acceptable unto God, because it was of a lamb unspotted, then the offering of such a lamb had been as essential worship before, as it was after, though it could not be so true and lawful.

Did the Def. never read nor hear, that matter and form do usually make up the essence of things? and that in institutions which are means to an end, the respect of that end is also required to the being, but a right efficient not so? let him consider a little of the grounds of logic, or read our most logical Divines, such as Sadeel is, and he shall soon perceive the truth. or else without that labor, let him or any other of common sense tell me, if the Temple of Jerusalem should have been built with all the appurtenances, and sacrifices with other observances there used, without any commandment of God, according as they were by his appointment, had there not been essential false worship erected unto God? have the Papists and Heathens no essential false worship, but only accidental? It is a shame to confute such unlearned conceits.

SECT. X.

Here are many proofs conjoined under the name of M. Hy. and others: the answers to which are just such as the ceremonies be, merely formal, without essence or substance of truth.

The first is, ceremonies are imposed to breed an opinion of holiness, as M. Hooker affirmeth, p. 61. and therefore are parts of God's worship. The consequence is not denied by the Def. not yet the antecedent directly: so that the whole argument seemeth to be granted, only the Def. saith, that Mr. Hooker did not ascribe operative holiness either by infusion or inhesion (which two terms are vnreasonably by him dis-joined) but only significatiue, as his words import. To which I answer, 1. that as the nice distinctions which are now used in the schools of Jesuits, do not help, but that Popish superstition is as gross as ever it was in practice: so this distinction of operative, infusion, inhesion, significatiue, doth nothing help, but the common people in many places inclined to superstition, do attribute as much holiness to some of these ceremonies, as they do to some holy ordinances of God. 2. The Patrones of our ceremonies, such as Mr. Hooker was, do attribute that holiness to the ceremonies which the Fathers did. Now that they ascribed operative holiness unto some of them, Mr. Parker hath made, plain in his book of the Cross, Part. 1. p. 77. 90 92. &c. 3. Mr. Hooker doth not here speak of reverence signified by the ceremonies, but of reverence to be signified towards them, as being things holy and worthy reverence. 4 What Mr. Hooker ascribed unto the cross, is to be seen in M. Parker, p. 91.

The second reason is, because the ceremonies are the constitutions of a sacred Synod. The force of which argument lieth in this, that a holy Assembly of spiritual Lord's and their assistants, if they be truly holy and spiritual in their authority, and in the exercise of it, will appoint no ceremonies but holy: and by the observance of the said ceremonies, have some spiritual honor redounding unto themselves, because the virtue which is found in any effect, doth redound always unto the praise of the cause. To this the Defendant giveth no real answer: only he doth affirm (contrary to the truth) that our Convocations may be called sacred, as well as the Churches of Christ Saints by calling. Whereas beside other differences, Churches are of God:

our convocations are of man. Churches are gathered for the holy Worship of God: convocations (as experience showeth) for nothing less.

The third reason is, because the ceremonies are appropriated to the acts of Religion in God's service. To this the Defendant answereth by denying the consequence, because the Pulpit cloth, the communion cup, and the place of meeting are so appropriated, and yet not essentially holy. But herein he showeth, that he doth not understand well what it is that he opposeth. For these things whereof he speaketh, are only civil, being drawn from the ordinary civil customs of men, and are of the same use out of the service of God, that they are in it: and therefore howsoever some special individuals of this kind may be appropriated unto religious acts, yet the kind is not: neither have those specialls any other signification in the service of God, then they have in the service of men. These therefore are not such ceremonies as now are in question, nor so appropriated to religion.

The fourth confirmation is from Math. 15. where such ceremonies are blamed of Christ by this reason. To this the Defendant answereth, that the act of washing is not there reprov'd, but the invention and opinion of an operative sanctity and holiness attributed unto it. But first, to what purpose doth he deny, that the act of washing simply considered in it self, was unlawful? was there ever any so durtye, that he would affirm such a foul fancy? Secondly, the intention and opinion of holiness is that which now our ceremonies are charged with. Therefore in that there is no difference. Thirdly, that the Pharisees attributed anymore operative holiness unto their washing then many amongst us do to the cross, cannot be shown out of the Text. There is not one circumstance there which may not fitly be applied to our ceremonies. Fourthly, not only Calvin upon the place, saith that the inventing of such ceremonies was an idle vanity, even before the high opinion of religion was added unto it: but Bellarmino himself De effect sacr. lib. 2. cap. 32. confesseth that Christ reprov'd this ceremony in the Pharisees, because it was vain and unprofitable.

SECT. XI.

HERE is set down a reason of Mr. Hy. to prove that our Ceremonies in their use and practice are preferred and honored above principal parts of God's worship: because the ablest ministers that are, may not be suffered to exercise any ministry in England, except they will apply themselves to these Ceremonies. To this the Defendant answereth, that it is dull Sophistry: because by this means only an orderly and discreet Preacher is preferred before one that is factious and exorbitant.

Now, if ever, he speaketh like an Ordinary, like a Bishop, when he sitteth in his Pontificalibus, to judge the poor according to the Laws of iniquity. It seemeth some galled place of his conscience was touched, when mention was made of silencing able and godly ministers for trifling ceremonies of man's invention. How much better were it for such men to enter into their hearts betimes, and think what answer they can give unto God for such palpable treachery? But to examine a little the reason that is in this answer; under the term of Dull Sophistri: he more then denieth the consequence of the reason: yet if it be rightly understood, all his wit will not avoid the dint of it. For 1. thus I take the meaning, which is the practice: he that is an able godly minister, if he will not use these ceremonies, may not be suffered to have place in the Ministry: but he that will use these ceremonies, though he may neither comparatively to the other, nor anything competently by himself, be either able or godly, shall hold his place in the Ministry. Therefore these ceremonies are preferred before the main things of the Law and Gospel. 2 I take it thus: though there cannot be found able & discreet conformable Ministers enough to supply all the Parishes of England, yet many able and godly men are shut out of the Ministry because they will not conform to these ceremonies: therefore conformity to these ceremonies is preferred before the main duties of God's worship. If all the Defendants sharpness of wit can answer the bluntnesse of this Argument, which every Plowman that is a good Christian doth usually make against the Prelates proceedings, then I for my part will be contented to be called dull, for from my childhood hitherto I ever took it to be unanswerable.

The comparison of the Lord Chancellor will do him no help in this case. For that Chancellor were unworthy of his own place, who would for his own pleasure, or for the circumstance of a place, which may easily be changed, put out of commission a grave wise man, when another like unto him could not be found. Beside the case is nothing like: for in the circumstance of a place for commissioners to meet in, there can be no conscience pretended. But here offer hath been made by the Ministers thus wronged, solemnly to confirm by oath, that nothing but conscience doth keep them from conforming.

Now for the sweet terms which it pleaseth the Def. here to use, I will desire no more, then that he would bring them back again to his own conscience, and ask that before God, 1 whether old M. Midsly of Ratsdel, who after he had labored near 50 year in the Ministry to the conversion of thousands, was inhumanely silenced by the Bishop of Chester, were a factious and exorbitant man? and that which I say of him because he belonged to Chester, I understand of many hundreds which have in like manner been oppressed. No doubt the evil servant which is spoken of, Mat. 24 49, when he began to beat his fellow servants better then himself, called them factious and exorbitant fellows: but he with all that are like him, know better, and one day shall be constrained to give other witness. 2 I would know of the Def. also whether all or the most of them which are in the Ministry be orderly and discreet men in that religious meaning which belongeth to Ministers? This I am sure of, the voice of all the Country goeth clean otherwise. When M. Midsly, and his son after him were silenced at Ratsdel, all that country knoweth what an orderly discreet Preacher came into the place. When worthy M. Baines was silenced at Cambridge, as a factious exorbitant man, there was, beside many other unworthy Ministers, one commonly called the Vicar of hell, who was kept in, as an orderly discreet Preacher. 3 If faction and exorbitancie may be charged on them that neglect a ceremonious canon upon conscience, what name shall be found fit for the Prelates, who willfully, without and against conscience continually live in and by the breach of many substantial, ancient and wholesome Canons? for this see M. Parker of the cross, part. 2 c. 9 s 4.

SECT. XII.

HERE is alleged the opinion which many people in all parts of the land have concerning our ceremonies, viz. that the Sacraments are not rightly & sufficiently administered without them. To this the Def. answereth three things, 1 That most people hold the contrary: 2 That the opinion of people in observing doth not prove the judgment of governors in imposing: 3 that it is most likely that those people which think so are brought into that conceit by the opposition which it made against the ceremonies. But first, I would fain know of the Defendant why he passeth by in silence, not only the testimony of Chemnitz cited by the Abridgement for confirmation of this part of the assumption, but also the passages of God's word, and many of the best Divines, which are also alleged there in the proposition, and applied unto this part of the assumption by the Authors of the Abridgement? surely this is not plain dealing. Secondly, I answer that the opinion of a few may make that an action unlawful, which the opinion of many other cannot make lawful, as is to be seen 1 Cor. 10 28, if any man say unto thee. Thirdly, it doth not appear the most are otherwise minded. For the most being used unto the ceremonies, and not unto good teaching, may well be thought to have the same opinion of human ceremonies which they have of divine. Fourthly, the Def. forgetteth what was to be proved in this place: for the question is not only whether our ceremonies be so imposed, but also whether they be so esteemed and observed, as appeareth in the Abridgement. Now the opinion of the people proveth I hope in what manner they are esteemed and observed. And while they are so observed, they that still impose them in those places where they are so observed, may truly be interpreted so to impose them. In actions of this kind (saith Hooker l. 5 p. 165) we are more to respect what the greatest part of men is commonly prone to conceive, then what some few men's wits may devize in construction of their particular meaning. Fifthly, the last conceit is ridiculous, that the opposing and condemning of ceremonies should make men think that the Sacraments are not sufficiently administered without them. The popish people (saith he) have no great conceit of our ceremonies. Why is it then that Gretser, and some other Jesuits call our Prelates Calvino-papistae, Popish Calvinists? How is it that by these ceremonies we are borne in hand that the Papists are likely to be drawn unto communion with our Church? Whence is it that all our Church-papists are great maintainers of the ceremonies? The rest (saith he) which are not of your disciplining are not so many. O miserable out-facing of God and man! Who hath disciplined for this threescore years almost all the people of Wales? Who but the Prelates and their creatures have had the disciplining of all the Cathedral Churches in England, and all the poor Parishes that depend upon them? Who are the Discipliners of all the Non-residents and Pluralists forlorn charges? and who of the many ten pound cures? Do these seem a few in the Def. eyes?

SECT. XIII.

THE omission of ceremonies is here alleged to be more sharply punished, then many great sins against the law of God, though it be without so and all and contempt. To this the Def. answereth, first by denying the consequence, viz. that if this be so, then these ceremonies are preferred before the precepts of God, and unlawful. But 1 why saith he nothing to the Churches of Germany, to Melancthon, Martyr, Chemnitz, Bez, Junius, Lubbertus, Polanus, Bucanus, Pilkinton, Perkins, and the whole Clergy of England, brought in as allowing of this consequence, in the Abridgement? Are not all these worth one answer of the Defendants? 2 The reason that he giveth for punishing more severely the omission of a ceremony, then heinous sins, is frivolous. For the true peace of the Church doth more depend on the keeping of God's laws, then of observing man's inventions: especially of such things which never brought peace with them to any Church, but as fire from hell have always bred a combustion. Neither yet can the Defendant justify that which he saith of civil governments, that they lawfully at any time more severely punish that offense which is every way less, then another which is greater. Howsoever, he that hath but half an eye may see that it is but a sophistical evasion, common to our Prelates with the Papists. I will not therefore insist in this: if you please, you may see more of this matter in M. Parker of the Cross, part. 2 c. 1 s. 16 17. He answereth in the second place, That it is not omission, but contempt that is punished, •s if ¶ Counselor should refuse to wear ¶ L•yers gown. But • mere omission hath been often punished with suspension. 2 The Convocation house by their Canons have provided and appointed punishments for mere omissions. If those canons be not in all such points rigorously executed, it is either some personal good which is found in some Officers, or else mere shame. For though canons do not blush, yet the executioners have some forehead left. 3 There may be continued omission, upon other causes beside contempt, as ignorance, conscience &c. so that while the Def. so peremptorily chargeth others for slandering the Church of God, he manifestly slandereth them, which for anything I know are as much the Church of God as the Prelates. Concerning this contempt see more in M. Parker p. 2c. 1 s. 14. As for the Lawyers gown, it is not long enough to cover the nakedness of this answer; no though it be stretched to the length of one of our great Prelates long trains which are carried up after them. For except the Counselor would swear that he refused on conscience, and that he could show the judgment of the best Lawyers for his opinion, condemning such a robe as unlawful, the case is not like: and if the case be so put, I account that Lawyer worthy to be turned over the bar, that could not defend himself from contempt.

SECT. XIII.

IN the next place, the same thing is confirmed by the particular indignities, which peaceable, learned, godly minded men do suffer, for but declaring of their contrary judgment: as that they are accounted Puritans, Schismatics, and by canon excommunicated ipso facto, so as no Council ever censured any heresy, without liberty of appeal, which is not denied to great malefactors. Conf. at Hampton. p. 26 ¶ . 6 & 98. In the repeating of this Argument, I add that out of the Abridgement, which the Def. for I know not what reason, omitted. Now in his answer he neither denieth antecedent, nor consequence, so that the judicious Reader may safely take all to be granted. Yet that he might seem to say somewhat, 1 he granteth that we have reason perhaps to wish, that some penalties were released. And have we not reason then to think the Convocation which set these penalties was nothing less then led by the spirit of God? And if the Def. can thus show his differing judgment from that Convocation in the penalties, what disorder or exorbitancy is it for another to show his differing judgment from them and him in ceremonies.

Secondly, closely sliding by the chiefest accusation of Puritanism, which yet is most ordinary, and most impure, he saith for schism, that those which will not conform unto our ceremonies do teach the principles of Separation. To which I answer 1 That there was never yet any Prelate that confuted the opinion of Separatists any otherwise then by ralling words: whereas on the side, diverse most averse from conformity have foundly confuted them. 2 Our principles do no more tend to Separation, then Saint John's rule doth, who when Diotrephes played the Dioecesan in the Church, did write unto the faithful people that they should not follow the evil which was among them, but the good, 3 loh. 11.

Thirdly, he talketh of diverse distractions in the Church, while some will hear only a conformable Minister, and some only an unconformable. But what is this to the purpose? For by this reason Conformers may as well be accused of schism as Notconformers. Again, if all did conform, there would be still the like distractions for some would only hear preaching Ministers, and some would never be present but at reading. Some would only hear godly Preachers: and some would only taste Lettuce fit for their lips. Who should then be the authors of schism?

Fourthly, he telleth us that all Churches challenge a subscription to their orders. But 1 all Churches cannot possibly do this lawfully: because some Churches do directly contradict other in their decrees. 2 Few Churches require such a form of Subscription as ours is, though they have not the tenth part of doubts and difficulties in their forms, which we have in ours. 3 I ask again that which M Parker hath asked without an answer, that a Minister of the Gospel should be deprived for disusing Popish ceremonies, when was it ever the judgment of any man which was of note for learning, unless he were interested in the quarrel? Calvin, Bucer, B•za, Martyr, Zanchi, and many other have given their judgment concerning those controversies: but show either any of them, or among Jewel, Fulke, R•ynold, Whitaker's, Perkins, or any such, that ever allowed of such tyranny. If there were any one among them of that opinion, we should have heard of him. For our Defendant dares bring in the name here of B•za himself as making for him: Notwithstanding B•za doth not only condemn our Ceremonies in plain terms, Epist▪ 8, but also in this very place which is quoted out of Ep. 24 doth cashier our ceremonies in the first words quoted by the Defendant himself, Constitutions being thu• made &c. What understandeth the Defendant by thus, or ha• ration? Surely those conditions going before, which do as absolutely condemn our ceremonies as any argument in all the Abridgement.

SECT. XV.

AFTER full satisfaction given to our Arguments about the point of the worship (as the Def. would have the Reader believe) he cometh to confute our Assumption. viz. the ceremonies are not esteemed, imposed, and observed as parts of God's worship. But first I would know of him, why he that talketh so much everywhere of their own Witnesses their own Witnesses, doth here first of all give no answer to our Witnesses, as hath been formerly shown: and then passeth by that which is alleged in the Abridg. p. 40 out of his own Witnesses, D. Covel, and D. Walkes? If they be not his Witnesses, they are at least the ceremonies Witnesses: he should therefore have given some respect. But we shall have another Champion come after this Def. as it is likely, who will as little regard him. For justum est quod Spartaē prodest, all is good that makes for the times.

Secondly, whereas he hath nothing to bring for confutation of our argmeant, but only the judgment of the greater part of the imposers, I say, this is no way sufficient: For the question here is not only of imposing, but also of esteeming and observing.

Thirdly, I answer to the places alleged, that it cannot be Logically concluded either from any one, or from all of them, that they are not imposed as parts of God's worship. We do not attribute any holiness or special worthiness (saith the canon) unto the garments. No more (say I) is any special holiness or worthiness to be attributed unto water: yet in baptism it hath a holy relation to holiness. The cross is not of the substance of the Sacrament. What then? it may notwithstanding be worship: except the Def. will acknowledge no worship but in the Sacrament. These ceremonies may be altered and changed: by whom? By those that appointed them. Shew me any Papist that dares affirm that the Church of Rome hath not authority to alter & change the ceremonies which her self hath appointed. But the opposites do acknowledge this. Abridg. p. 53. 55. just as much as this Def. doth in this place acknowledge the same of the Church of Rome, when he saith in this very page, that Bellarmino with some other Papists seem to disclaim the necessity of ceremonies, and the placing of holiness in them. So that in all this Section there is nothing to be found but vain conceited confidence.

CHAP. III.

SECT. I. II.

THE third Argument is, because all human ceremonies, appropriated to God service, if they be ordained to teach any spiritual duty by their mystical signification, are unlawful. Concerning this, we have in the first Section a flourish of words.

In the second Section, something is said of Math. 7 8 10 11. But • what was the reason that this Confuter of the Abridgement, should pass by or put off the first and second reason or confirmation there alleged, and snatch at one place of Scripture, whi• his but a parcel of those confirmations wherewith the second reason is backed? The first confirmation in the Abridgement is, that the second commandment forbids us to make to our selves the likeness of anything whatsoever for religious use: as it is understood by Bucer, Virel, Fulk, Andrew's and others. The second confirmation is, that Christ is the only Teacher of his Church, and appointer of all means whereby we should be taught and admonished of any tholy duties. For illustration of this second reason, among twenty other allegations, something is brought out of Math. 7. Now the Def. passeth by the main reasons, and all other allegations that belongeth to them, and maketh a stand at this place of Mat. 7, which yet for substance hath once been handled before in the former Chapter. Is not this proper confuting?

Secondly, in this very text, he toucheth not that wherein only the Abridgment groundeth their reason. For in the Abridgement, p. 32. there is nothing cited out of Mark. 7, but the 4 and 7 verses; he answereth to the 8 10 and 11 verse. What should a man say to such dealing?

Thirdly, they say that our Savior by this Argument (among others) condemns the Jewish purifyings and •ustifieth himself and his disciples in refusing that ceremony, because being (the precept of men) it was taught and used as a doctrine by way of signification, to teach what inward purity should be in them, and how they ought to be cleansed from the pollutions of the Heathen. For which interpretation of the place, they allege Chrysostom, Whitaker's, the Church of Wittenburg. Calvin, Virel, Zepperus, Fulk, Rainoldus and others. To all this the Def. answereth nothing, but that with a simple denial, he showeth that there were other causes why our Savior condemned those washings: which is the very same thing which the Abridgement affirmeth, when they say, by this Argument among others, our Savior condemned them. So that in all this Section nothing at all is said to the purpose: save that in the winding up, the Defendant accuseth those of Sadduceisme which depart so far from the Pharisees: Which accusation, if it doth not touch our blessed Savior himself, I leave to be considered by the Defendant himself. Howsoever, the mentioning of Phariseisme in this matter is idle, for the Scripture saith expressly that this ceremony was common to all the Jews, Mar. 7. 3.

SECT. III.

THE same kind of dealing which was noted in the former Section, we meet with also in this. For, whereas in the third confirmation of this argument, the Abridgement bringeth in Augustine, the Churches of France and Flanders, Calvin, Martyr, Beza, Sadeel, Danus, Zepperus, Polanus, Jewel, Humfry, &c. the Defendant calleth out Augustine alone by himself, and that with a double trick. For first, he citeth but one place of Augustine which was miscited or misprinted in the Abridgement, and leaveth out the other out of Epist. 5 rightly quoted in the Abridgement: Secondly, he maketh this place to conclude the main argument, whereas in the Abridgement it illustrateth only the third confirmation of that Argument. Concerning Augustine he answereth, 1 that in the first place cited there is no such thing, which I grant to be true, but if instead of lib. 3. cap. 35 be set lib. 2 cap. 1 then something will be found. 2 That elsewhere (not mentioning the fifth Epist. which the Abridgement quoted) Augustine saith, that all holy signs are called Sacraments: but yet it doth not follow from hence that in his opinion all such signs are Sacraments, but only in word or phrase of speech. Neither was it brought in (as he might have marked) to prove any such thing, but only to show that such signs participate part of the nature of Sacraments: and this as that use of the word Sacrament doth confirm, so that which was derived from thence, and hath been in perpetual use, viz. that such ceremonies are called Sacramentalia, Sacramentals. But neither Augustine, nor other fathers do disallow such ceremonies (saith the Defendant) and this we do not deny: if by disallowing be meant constant rejecting of such things. Yet something is to be found in their general doctrine, from which we may soundly conclude against these inventions of man.

SECT. IIII.

BVT in this fourth Section, more legerdemaine is used then in many other. For when the Def. professeth to answer the testimonies of Protestant Divines found in the Abridgement, he produceth only four, as if there were no more to be found: whereas in the same place of the Abridgement, viz. p. 33. there be many more joined to these, as before I shown by name: and to them divers others are added p. 35. But let us hear what he can say to these four which himself hath chosen to answer. To Calvin he saith, that he speaketh only of those mystical ceremonies which are properly sacramental. And this, say I, was the very point for which this place was alleged, viz. that such significant signs are properly sacramental. Is not this then good answering? Concerning Mystical-moral, I will speak something in the next section. Zepperus saith he) hath not a word of mystical signification. The place is lib. 1. cap. 10. where among divers rules, he giveth this for one, that sacramental signs must signify holy things to be sealed up in the heart: from whence he concludeth as against Humane traditions, because God will not by them stir up any grace in the heart of man: so in special by this with some other rules, he concludeth against the sign of the Cross, and other such ceremonies in Baptism. Is this nothing? Jewel insisteth only in sacramental signs; and such saith the Abridgement, are all that signify spiritual graces. As for Beza, he granteth him in a manner to condemn all symbolical signs. But to extenuate his credit herein, he would have the reader believe, that no other Divine doth consent with him herein. But if any man look upon the places quoted in the Abridgement, p 35. viz, Harm. Confess. part. 2 p. 229. 230. Eiusd. Sect. 17. ad Saxon. Confess. obs. 1. Calv. in Es 20. & in Math. 21. 25. Perkins in Gal. 3. p. 231. he shall find that Beza is not alone in this point. Beside, Bellarmino confesseth that Brenz is of this mind, De cult. sanct: lib. 3. cap. 7. and in his 2 book De effect sacr. he joineth herein with Brenz, Calvin and Chemnitz. I will add one whom this Def. calleth worthily a judicious refuter of Bellarmino: i. Junius. His words (in his animadversions upon Bell. de cultu sanct. lib. 3. c. 7. an. 12) are these; Quod si ad usum non potest quisquam instituere, profecto neque ad significationem homo legitime potest adhibere, &c. 1. Humane ceremonies cannot be lawfully used for signification without incroching, no not in private, much less in the Church of God & public administration. There can be no blessing or consecration Ecclesiastical, without the word and prayer. Here is no word of institution: and prayer of faith there can be none, where there is no commandment nor promise of God instituting.

To Junius add Danaus, cont. Bell. de Cult. sanct. l. 3. c. 7. It is blasphemy \diamond think, that any outward thing may be made a sign in the Church, unless it be expressly ordained in the word, and commanded by God himself to be used unto that end.

SECT. V.

HERE that which in the Abridgement is the third proof of a proposition, and backed with many allegations, is nakedly brought in that it may be the better maistered. Symbolyca• signification giveth unto ceremonies a chief part of sacraments. For the clearing of this point, the Defendant distinguisheth betwixt moral signs and sacramental. Of sacramental he maketh two parts, one after the manner of a sign, and the other of a seal: then he maketh a differenc• betwixt moral and sacramental signs, not only that sacraments do seal, which moral signs do not, but also that sacramental signs do represent a collation of grace given by God unto man; whereas moral do only notify a duty of man which in some moral virtue he oweth unto God. Then after he findeth fault with this, that signification should be called the chief point of a sacrament. Now for the first, I do not marvel that he calleth his distinctions wedges: for this is a most unhappy wedge indeed, which riveth in sunder the holy sacraments of God, and maketh way for human inventions to creep into their place. The sacraments (saith he) do signify grace conferred: and moral signs do signify a duty of man in some moral virtue. But the Scripture teacheth us that the Sacraments do also signify the duty of man towards God. For by the sacraments the whole covenant is signed and sealed betwixt God and man: so that not only God's conferring of grace, but man's duty through grace is there professed and represented. This the name Sacrament, as it signifieth an oath or obligation, doth import, by Bellarmino's own confession: de sacram. l. 1. c. 8. This the name ucharist doth also show, in the Lord's Supper, notifying that thankfulness we owe unto God. This the words of institution do plainly testify in the Lord's Supper, Do this in remembrance of me. And I think the Def. when he considereth the matter well, will not dare to deny, but that sanctity (which he saith is signified by the Surplice) is signified in Baptism: and constancy also which he ascribeth to the cross. If he do, he may be easily confuted, by those places where the scripture speaketh of it, especially Rom. 6. throughout the chapter.

2 Against that moral signification attributed unto human inventions, I propound this argument, in the words of a •overend man (whom for some reason I will not name.) To be a teacher of my understanding, and an exciter of my devotion, are such effects at require virtue inherent or assistent to those things which should be causes of them• but no sign of man's devising hath any such virtue in it, or with it: for then it must come from that word put forth in the creation, and s• things natural should have a force communicated to them of teaching supernatural: or else by God's after-institution: such we read not any but of Baptism and the Lord's supper only: or by the Churches impetration. But this cannot be: for prayer obtaineth those effects of things, to which they serve by God's creation and institution: but not any creating or new conception of things to supernatural uses. For then the Church might ask that this or that creature might be made a sacrament unto her: in which case she should pray without all warrant from God's will.

3 If human inventions be such moral admonishers in spiritual duties, the consciences of men without doubt are bound to subject themselves unto their admonitions; and then unto them from whom they do admonish, or by whom they are made admonishers: i. to mortal men, such as our convocation consists on. Is not this good divinity?

4 Whatsoever is ordained in the Church as a teaching sign, that ought often to be interpreted unto the people in Sermons: for that is the teaching which must clear and perfect all teaching of signs: and should not they preach fairly in the name and words of Christ, that should expound unto the people the signification of a surplice and a cross? Would not this also be much for the edification of the people, that sometime they must hear of the moral good which the ceremonies teach: and sometime be admonished of the right meaning of our convocation house in the appointing of these ceremonies, lest they turn them to moral evil in superstition: and at other times they must be instructed, how to defend these ceremonies against the opposers of them, lest otherwise they use them without faith? Surely all the Sermons which many Parishes hear, would •caree be sufficient for this doctrine of Ceremonies.

5 I dare appeal to the eonficiences of the best conforming Christians, whether ever they found themselves truly stirred up to holiness, by the Surplice, or to constancy by the Cross? one thing I am sure of, that in someone congregation where these ceremonies have not appeared for 20 or 30 years together, there hath been more holiness and constancy of faith, then in many Cathedral Churches where they were never omitted.

This point being cleared, there need no great answer be given to the cavil, of making signification the chief point of a sacrament.

For if the Def. meant to deal plainly, why doth he change the words, that he may find some color for his accusation? The Abridgement saith only, that it is a chief part: he accuseth them for saying it is the chief part: betwixt which two phrases, he knoweth how great room there is for a wedge. 2. To prove that signification is one chief part, the Abridgement allegeth Gen. 17. 11. Exod. 12. 13. Luk. 22. 19. why is no answer given to these places, if the assertion be false? 3. The Def. himself in his distinction which he bringeth here concerning a sacrament, doth allow one chief part of a sacraments nature to be signification ad modum signi. Be••armine therefore hath as good a friend of him as of the Abridgement.

But (saith he arguing herein against himself) if signification be a principal part of a sacrament, then all the moral signs used in the Leviticall worship, should be properly deemed sacraments. Why so? because things take their denomination from the principal parts. True: but 1. as hath been observed, there is difference betwixt a principal and the principal. 2. Every thing that hath denomination from a principal part, hath not properly the same name with it. A man may in some sense be called spiritual, because his principal part is a spirit: yet he may not be properly deemed a spirit. 3. all those ceremonies which had signification in the Levitical law, have this denomination from sacraments, that they are properly called Sacramental: 1. participating something of the nature of sacraments, though they be not sacraments properly so called.

SECT. VI.

A Second objection from reason is here brought in• viz. that if ceremonies which God himself hath ordained to teach his Church by then moral signification, may not now be used: much less may any of those which man hath devised. But why doth the Def. pass by all the allegations which belong to this reason in the Abridgement, p. 33. 34. they cite to this purpose first the Council of Nice, Augustine, Martyr, Bullinger, Lavater, Hospinian, Piscator, Cooper, Westphal's, &c. And then after, Calvin, Bullinger, Hospinian, Arcularius, Virel, Bison, Reynolds, Willet, &c. And again, Calvin, Bullinger, Chemnitz, Danaus, Hospinian, Arcularius, our book of Homilies, Humphrey, Reynolds, Willet, &c. Are all these worth no answer? at least they show, that this is no new reason devised by the Nonconformists: but the common tenent of Protestants, and the ground whereby they confute the superstition of Papists.

Yet let us hear his answer to the reason as it is nakedly in it self considered: remembering always, that he can say nothing, but that which the Papists may as well say for many, of their ceremonies against this argument pressed upon them by our Divines.

His first answer is, that the use of some Jewish rite, without any Jewish opinion, is not damnable; instancing in circumcision and Easter. Where 1. he should have told us, how a Jewish rite can be used, without some part of a Jewish opinion? For he himself after contendeth, that our ceremonies are not the same with the Papists, because we have not the same opinion of them which the Papists have. 2. What doth he mean by this new term domnable? I hope he doth not symbolize with the Papists in their difference of mortal sin and venial? of which fault he so vainly accused us before. If he mean by not damnable, not unlawful: then he holdeth circumcision, as it is used under Prester John, to be lawful. If he meaneth anything else, as, that it doth not utterly destroy the being of a Church, then he speaketh some truth, but nothing at all to the purpose.

His second answer is, that it is far more safe to invent new ceremonies, then to use those which God once appointed, and now hath abolished: because they might ingender an opinion of necessity: and so might bring in all the Levitical law. Where 1. it is well he confesseth plainly, that all the Jewish ceremonies are abolished: for therein he contradicteth that which he said in his former answer. 2. from hence our divines use thus to argue, Num vero veteres figurae sublatæ sunt, ut locus esset novis? num divinæ sublatae sunt, ut humanæ succederent: i. Are divine ceremonies abolished, that human may be erected in their place? They are the words of Doctor Whitaker, de Pontif. cont. 4. • 7. c. 3. and the reason is strong. For if it had been the will of God that we should have been taught by other signs than those that are appointed in the New Testament, he could easily, and would surely either have chosen some of the old, or appointed some new in their places. 3. Though there may be more danger in some respect, on the one side, yet there may be more absolutely on the other. 4. The inventing of new human ceremonies have engendered an opinion of necessity in them: and have brought in all the Popish law of rites: so that even in these respects, it may be questioned in whether side is greater danger.

SECT. VII.

THE third and last reason which the Def. could find brought against significant ceremonies, is, that this will open a gappe to images, oil, spittle, and all Popish, ceremonies: all which Bellarmin commendeth, as fit to put men in remembrance of good things, &c. To this he answereth divers things. 1. This consequence (saith he) from some to all is too lavish. But this consequence is of his own framing: for the consequent which the Abridgement maketh, is from the common nature of significant ceremonies, to every special, being equally considered in regard of other circumstances. Neither is there any occasion at all in the Abridgement for that ridiculous consequence which the Def. maketh from may to must in his example of the Kings Council.

Secondly, It is as unreasonable (saith he) as if a Patient that hath some drugs prescribed him, should thence conclude he may taste of all. But it is as reasonable, say I, as if a Patient having some druggs prescribed unto him, should thence conclude, he may taste of any which are of the same nature, especially if the same Physician should prescribe them unto him.

Thirdly, It is unconscionable (saith he) because there are many abuses mixed with Popish ceremonies. Which answer seemeth merely unconscionable; because it is plainly expressed in the Abridgement, that this inference doth consider the Popish ceremonies only, in regard of that signification which they have of good things.

Fourthly, he disproveth the use of oil and spittle, because they were once used miraculously. As if the miraculous using of anything did forbid, that it should at any time after be used for signification. Surely then the many miracles which histories do record to have been done by the Cross, must needs banish that also out of the Church.

Fifthly, for Images, he saith, They are not to be called Popish, but only in regard of superstitious adoration. As if Cassanders image were not Popish: which is an assertion, 1. directly against all our Divines, who not only confute the Papists for adoration of their images, but also for having them in any religious use, especially in Churches; for this is the controversy betwixt Calvin and Bellarmino, de Imag. lib. 2. c. 9. wherein this Defendant taketh Bellarmino's part. Secondly, it is directly against the Homily concerning images: unto which we are bound to subscribe. Thirdly, it confirmeth the soul words of Bellarmino, who saith that the Apology of the Church of England lieth, in saying that the Council of Frankford decreed that Images should be abolished, De Council. Auth. lib. 2. c. 8. for the only answer is that which lunius giveth in his notes upon that chapter, an. 56. He that forbiddeth Images to be worshipped, doth forbid the having of Images worshipable, especially in Churches: Which answer this Defendant doth flatly deny.

Sixthly, for holy water, he saith, that may be accounted Christian, were it not for the operative power which is ascribed unto it in Poperi. But good Protestants, I think, will rather believe Calvin, who calleth it a kind of repetition of baptism. Instit. l. 4. c. 10. sect. 20. and Junius, who peremptorily affirmeth, that no human ordination, opinion, or superstition, can make it good and profitable. in Bel. de Cul. sanct. l. 3. c. 7. At the least let it be called Jewish, not Christian: for Christ will not have his name called upon such superstitious devices: neither can it, without taking in vain.

7 Lastly, he saith, there is no reason to deprive the Church of power of ordaining significant ceremonies, because she may abuse it: wherein he saith true. But to argue from manifest abuses, against that which is called use, and yet is as like those abuses as one egg is like another, this I hope is reason.

That which by the way is brought out of Peter Martyr, is not of any great force. For he there persuadeth that unto Hooper out of a good affection, which out of conscience he durst not do himself, though his place at Oxford did tie him unto it, as he professeth in an Epistle, p. 1127. Where also he showeth, that the chief end that moved him so to persuade Hooper, was because he hoped, that by his and such men's yielding, the ceremonies might in time be abolished: which we find to be an erroneous conjecture. But that hath much less reason in it which he addeth, viz. that the open gap of many ceremonies is now quite shut up, because our church is contented to admit of so few, and no more. For 1. we have not so much as the word of our Prelates for this nil-ultra. 2. The gap is every day made wider and wider by such defenses as this is, which allow of Images themselves for some religious use. For by this means any crucifix may come in, that is not greater then the Church door. 3 They that shut up a gap upon their pleasure only, can when they please open it again.

Now I have maintained the testimonies and reasons which this Def. could find in the Abridg, against significant ceremonies, I will add one, lest it should be forgotten, or lost: which I know not how the Def. leaped over, seeing in the Abridg, it hath deservedly the first place among all the proofs, which are brought in to this purpose. The argument stands thus in the Abridg. p. 31. The second commandment forbids us to make to ourselves the likeness of anything whatsoever, for religious use: and so is this commandment understood by Bucer, Virel, Fulk, and D. Andrew's now Bishop of Winchester. And p. 32. 33. D. Andrew's is brought in alleging this for the root of all superstition and idolatry, that men thought they could never have admonitions and helps enough to stir them up to woe•ship God. Yet God (saith he) had given four means, viz. the word written, the word preached, the sacraments, and the book of the creatures.

Now lest the Def. may seem to have passed over this proof as unworthy any answer, I will briefly add the grounds of it.

1. The word 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 likeness used in the second commandment is general, and comprehendeth under it all religious similitudes, because they are homogeneal to Images there expressly forbidden.

2. Significant ceremonies are external acts of religious worship, even as they are used to further devotion. Suarez in Thom. p. 3. • 65. a. 4. Bell. de effect. sacr. l. 2. c. 29. &c. 31. and therefore being invented of man, of the same nature of Images, by which and at which God is worshipped. The Def. distinction of essential & accidental worship, will help no more here, then the Papists 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . God's law is not mocked with vain distinctions.

3. The affirmative part enjoineth obedience to all the worship appointed by God: all which was significative, Heb. 8. 5. & 10. 1. from whence it followeth, that no significant ceremonies must by man be brought into religious actions. The nature of the affirmative showeth the quality of the negative: by the circuit of the one, we may learn the compass of the other.

4• Significant ceremonies which are by institution, must of necessity belong unto the second commandment. An accurate distinction of the commandment will easily show this. But nothing contained in the second commandment is permitted to man. For to him this commandment in regard of making, is wholly negative. Thou shalt not make to thyself, &c. Which words, as Calvin saith, Nos à carnalibus observatiunculis, quas stolidi men's nostra comminisci solet, in t•tum revocant & abstrabunt.

SECT. VIII.

IN this passage there is nothing to be found but a noise of words crackling like thorns under a pot: Let it therefore vanish of it self.

SECT. IX.

HEre the Defendant undertaketh and beginneth a confutation from Scriptures of that assertion, which denieth significant ceremonies of man's institution to be lawful in God's worship. Now a man would have expected by the title, some rule of Scripture: but seeing none can be found, we must be content with examples: which notwithstanding are nothing so firm and certain as rules. Yet let us hear what examples he can bring.

The first example is Abraham's directing of his servant to put his hand under his thigh when he did swear. It is marvel he did not begin before. Abraham. For Suarez the Jesuit to prove the same point for substance, bringeth Abel's sacrifice, Noah's Altar &c. in Thom. 3. qu. 65 a 4, which serve also as much to the purpose as this example. But to the point in hand. 1 It is in all probability false, that Abraham appointed this ceremony. So Calvin, Junius and others upon the same place, do judge, because it was a sign of subjection usual in those eastern parts.

2 It is false also (which he faith in the second place) that swearing is the most divine service of God of all other. For the proper end of swearing is not to worship God, but to confirm a truth: though in the appealing unto a supreme Witness and Judge worship is implied, and so an oath appropriated unto God as a part of his worship, not in the principal end of it, but in manner of seeking that end. This is plain by the nature of an oath.

3 It cannot be proved, that this ceremony did teach any spiritual duty. It is most probable, that it was a common sign of subjection used in solemnities of that kind, as well out of an oath as in it, without any respect unto Christ, as with it. If the Def. never read any such thing (as he saith he did not) I cannot help that. I assent unto Calvin herein the rather, because that as imposition of hands in those parts did always signify some superiority, so this under position of hands was by proportion fit to signify subjection of inferiors.

4 Lastly, if all this were granted, that this sign was appointed, that it was appointed in solemn worship, and that it did signify a holy thing: yet though Defendant should remember that Abraham was a Prophet, and of more authority by far in the Church of God, then our Convocation-house. So that this instance is nothing to the purpose, as, I am persuaded, Abraham's servant would swear, if he were here present, and it were needful, even in the same manner that then he did to his Master.

SECT. X.

HEere comes in a straggling objection, as it is here alleged without any dependence, omitted in the place whereto it belongeth. I will not therefore press it in this place. Only it would be marked how little the Defendant careth what he saith, so that he say something to everything: 1 he answereth that Papist do commonly teach by their ceremonies some new doctrine, not warranted by Scriptures. For confutation of which, the Papists may well appeal to Durand his Rationale, where he showeth the signification of almost all the Popish rites. Now if the Defendant can there find one signification of a hundred, which teacheth any strange doctrine not warranted by the Scriptures, I have taken my numbers amiss. 2 He saith the Papists ceremonies differ from ours in application, by their opinion of necessity and holiness. But 1 the question here is only of signification: and therefore it is out of time to talk of application: 2 the Papists do not hold their ceremonies absolutely necessary to salvation. For this Bellarmino de verbo non scripto l 4 c. 11 denieth of all unwritten traditions, as also Aquinas 12. qu. 147 a 4 ad 1. Neither do they hold them essentially necessary to the being of a Sacrament: This Aquinas with all his followers deny, p 4 qu. 66 a 10. where he saith expressly, that all signs invented lie man are only for stirring up of devotion, and procuring of reverence to the Sacraments: which is, word for word, our English plea. 3 It doth not appear that the learned Papists have any opinion of all their significant ceremonies, which this Def. doth not maintain. For Suarez a principal Jesuit in Thom. p. 3 q. 65 a 4 propoundeth only three errors as he calleth them, wherein Protestants differ from Papists concerning ceremonies in general: whereof the first is, that only those things which are written ought to be retained and used in the Church: The second is, that no outward worship of God is lawful, but only that which is appointed by God. The third and last is, that the Church hath not power of commanding and ordaining those things (he meaneth mystical ceremonies) which are necessary for the convenient celebration of the Sacraments. Now there is none of these three points wherein Swarz and the Def. doth not jumpe.

SECT. XI.

THE next example is the day which Mordeca and Ester appointed, Est. 9 concerning which I answer 1 it was no mystical ceremony: but a circumstance of order. When Bellarmino objecteth the same example to like purpose against the Protestants, de cult. sanct. lib. 3. c. 10. Junius answereth, praeceptum fuit politicum: it was a precept of order. And some of our own Writers at home that it was appointed for a civil use, a day of rejoicing.

SECT. XII.

THE Feast of Dedication, ordained by Iulus Maccabeus is also alleged by Bellarmino de cult. sanct. li. 3 c. 5. & de Rom. pont. li. 4 c. 17 but we need not be so careful of excusing Machabeus and those times from all fault. Christ seemeth, saith he, to approve that feast, John. 10 22, but seemeth, only, say I. It is said that Christ who had been before that time resident in Jerusalem, was walking in Solomon's porch at the Feast of Dedication, when some Jews came to ask him whether he was the Christ or no; doth it follow that he observed the Feast? As for Danaus h•re cited, it hath been shown before how well he liked of significant ceremonies ordained by man.

SECT. XIII. XIII.

HEere M. Cartwright is brought in as answering the former objections out of the Maccabees and Ester. But M. Cartwright p. 197, doth profess that there is as great difference betwixt these two, as is betwixt heaven and earth. And in his Confutation of the Rhemists, who urge the feast of Dedication as this Def. doth in John. 10 22, he answereth plainly, that this Feast was unduly instituted and ungroundedly by the Maccabees. Which also he proveth by such reasons as neither the Rhemists, nor this D•f. will ever answer. Yet let us hear, what he hath chosen out of M. Cartwright to answer. The Church may appoint holy days in certain cases: but it is one thing to restrain part of the day, and another to restrain the whole day. Where 1 M. Cartwright is wronged by the Def. for he confesseth (in the places quoted) expressly, that upon some extraordinary cases the Church may restrain a whole day, as at a solemn fast. 2 He should let us see what mystical signification is in the times appointed, as he striveth to do in other significant ceremonies: if he would have a more particular answer, otherwise they are alleged here to no purpose to prove significant ceremonies.

The other words quoted out of M. Cartwright are, that the ex•mple out of Ester is no sufficient warrant for our Holy days: 1 because our estate ought not to be so ceremonious as theirs, 2

That was done by a special direction of the spirit of God. To this the Def. answereth first, that if then when the ceremonies were so many one might be added, much more now. Which consequence were good, cae•eris par•bus, if all other things did agree: but this is that very thing which M. Cartwright denied. He answereth in the second place, that it is presumption to imagine a special direction where none can be proved. But how shall we trust this man in relating the Arguments and Answers of the Ministers in private conference, when now the second time, as it were in one breath, he so unjustly accuseth M. Cartwright as giving no reason for that he saith, whose printed book doth confute him? for so it followeth in M. Cartwright, immediately upon the words by him quoted, p. 194. This may appear by another place, where the Jews changed their fasts into feasts, only by the mouth of the Lord, through the ministry of the Prophet. For further proof whereof I take the 28 ver. where it appeareth that this was an order to endure always, even as long as other feast days, which were instituted by the Lord himself: so that what abuses soever were of that feast, yet as a perpetual decree of God it ought to have remained: whereas our Churches can make no such decree, which may not upon change of time and other circumstances be altered. For the other proof hereof I take the last verse. For the Prophet contenteth not himself with that, that he had r•hearsed the decree, as he doth sometime the decree of profane Kings, but addeth precisely, that as soon as ever the decree was made, it was registered in this book of Ester, which is one of the books of Canonical Scripture: declaring thereby in what esteem they had it. If it had been of no further authority then our decrees, or then a canon of one of the Councils, it had been presumption to have brought it into the Library of the Holy Ghost.

SECT. XV. XVI.

IN the title of these two Sections, the Defendant promiseth an instance of a ceremonious instrument belonging unto the worship of God. But he bringeth none save the Altar of the two tribes mentioned, Josh. 22 which he cannot show to have been any instrument of God's worship: so that he seemeth merely to have forgotten his title. But for the thing it self M. Parker long since p. 1 c. 2 s. 33 hath given this answer. 1 that we may better argue from the Altar of Damascus 2 King. 16 against the cross, then they can from this Altar for it. 2 that this Altar of the two Tribes, was not in state or use religious as the Cross is, which he confirmeth by the confession of B. Babington on the second Com. and by the testimony of Lavater on Ios. hom. 61, 3 that in this our men say nothing which the Papists allege not for their superstitions, and the Lutherans for their images, as probably as they, Masi•• and Chitreus upon this place. To the same purpose tendeth the answer which the Def. hath set down in the name of certain Ministers. Let us here therefore his Reply. 1 He proveth the setting up of this Altar to have been human, which no man that I know ever doubted of.

2 He would prove that it was appointed to God's service. But alas he can bring no color for that. It was a pattern (saith he) of the Lord's altar, which was a chief• instrument of God's worship: as our cross is a resemblance of the cross of Christ. Where 1 why doth he compare the cross whereon Christ did suffer with the Lord's Altar? that cross was no more holy, then the soldiers that nailed Christ to it, or then Judas, that betrayed him into their hands: and therefore the sign of that cross in respect of the resemblance which it hath to that, is no more holy than the picture of Judas. 2 Is every resemblance of a holy thing holy? then every Altar picture, which resembleth anything belonging to the Scripture & holy uses, is also holy. 3 If any of the Tyrians which wrought under Solomon about the work of the Temple, should have procured a model of the Temple to be drawn, and carried it with him into his Country for to have shown it them for news, had that model been religious or holy? the Def. thought he had to do with such as would believe whatsoever he said.

3 He goeth about to prove, that it was mystical signification teaching a spiritual duty: because that one end of it was, in respect of the present Gileadites, to teach that the Lord was God: and another in respect of their posterity, to testify their consent in the true Religion. But in all this fair show, there is scarce one word true. For 1 it doth not appear out of the text, that there was intended any use of it for the present age that then lived. The contrary appeareth plainly, verse. 27, 28 &c. The last verse cited to this purpose by the Defendant, must be interpreted as lunus noteth out of the 30 verse. So that even by this it is manifest that a direct help unto devotion was not sought for in the erecting of this altar. For then not only the two Tribes then living should have had use of it, but most of the other Tribes should have had reason to have imitated their example, in setting up Altars of devotion even at every three-way-leet, as crosses are wont to stand. 2 in regard of posterity, the immediate end was to testify, that though they were separated from the other Tribes by the river Jordan, yet they belonged to the same people, and had right to come unto the same place of worship. Now what is this to a ceremony which hath state and immediate use in the special solemn worship of God? the use of this testifying was to procure a consent and approbation in future times among the other Tribes, that these two Tribes might be suffered to come to the Temple for to worship God there. So that neither the two Tribes, nor the other ten were stirred up by this Altar as by an instituted mystical ceremony unto worship or devotion: for as for the two Tribes, they were only to show this monument unto those which called their right into question. And the other were to consent and grant them their right. What is this to a garment of religion, or solemn religious worship?

SECT. XVII. XVIII. XIX. XX. XXI.

THE second instance is Solomon's altar, 1 King. 8 64, wherein 1 I cannot but marvel at the addition which the Def. maketh unto the Text, when he telleth us out of the Scripture of an altar, and of a brazen Altar, built by Solomon, without special warrant: whereas in the text there is neither mention made of brass, nor of Altar, but only of sanctifying the inner part of the Court: he did not surely attend much unto that which he wisheth to another, sect. 20 in these words, I would you had leisure to look more directly upon the text alleged. But for the matter it self, it is worth the marking, to observe by this example what authority is given unto men in the worship of God by our Masters of ceremonies, not only to appoint accidental worship, but even that which is principal and most essential: that which maketh other essential worship to be holy: For what is this else, when they say man may of his own head appoint an Altar? If they say man may appoint an Altar, but not the offering upon the Altar, let them hear our Savior's answer, Math. 23 19 Ye fools and blind, whether is greater, the offering, or the Altar that sanctifieth the offering?

As for our answer it is the same which all our divines give unto Bellarmino: as the objection is the very same with that which Bellarmino opposeh to Calvin, de pont. lib. 4 c. 19. 1. this act of Solomon's was by special direction of God's Spirit. So D. Whitaker's answereth, de pont. c. 4 qu. 7. ad arg. 7 quicquid Solomon fecit, id Dei autoritate & spiritus sancti nutu fecit. So D. Sucleife de pont. l. 4. c. 6. But from M. Nic. this answer will not be received. The Def. saith it can never be proved. But suppose an altar to have been built as the Def. will have it, and then I hope the nature of the thing doth sufficiently prove it, as before I shown: Beside Solomon had not yet declined from the right ways of his father David, who did attempt nothing about the Temple but according to the writing which he received from God, as he told Solomon 1 Chron. 28 19, Neither is it to be omitted, that Solomon at that very time when he did this thing in question, was acted and lifted up extraordinarily in communion with God: as appeareth by that divine prayer which he then made for the Dedication of the Temple, which cannot be judged but to proceed from the extraordinary direction of God's holy Spirit. Lastly, if that had not been so, yet the high Priest was at hand with Vrim and Thummim, by which when it was so easy to have special direction, who can think that Solomon would venture on such a matter as this upon his own head? But the contrary is proved (saith the Def.) because a reason is rendered in the Text which moved Solomon to do that he did. As if these two could not stand together, to do a thing upon some reason: and yet to do it upon special direction from God! see Num. 36.

A second answer is given by some of our Divines, that Solomon did this out of the equity of Moses law: so Junius cont. 3. l. 4. c. 19. To this the Def. replies, that this answer overthwarts the former. Which is nothing so. For Solomon might be, and no doubt was in special manner directed to see the equity of the Law, and specially directed and authorised also to follow it. The Def. therefore is deceived in that advantage which he maketh of this answer.

A third answer is brought in by the Def. under the name of M. Nic. viz. that God by his visible descending approved of the work of the Temple, and did authorize Solomon to do that he did. To whom the Def. wisheth more leisure, that he may look better upon the Text, where he should not find that God approved the Temple of Solomon by any visible appearance, until the sacrifice was ended. But if the Def. had had both leisure and pleasure to look better upon the text, before he had censured another, then 1 he would have seen that God appeared in the Temple before the sacrifice was either ended or begun: 1 King. 8 10 11 2 Chron. 5 13 14. 2 He should have seen also that Solomon built the brazen Altar, not of his own head, nor upon a sudden which was impossible, but by the same direction that he did all the other holy things, 2 Chron. 4. 1. 3. He would not have talked so loosely as he doth here s. 20, where no man can gather by his words, that he knoweth of any Altar appointed particularly of God, beside the Altar of incense.

A fourth answer is, that which Daneus giveth unto Bellarmino, on. 3 lib. 4 c. 19, viz. that this was not a new additament for kind, but for some circumstance only; because this Court was sanctified by God, Exod. 27 & 40, and Solomon is said to sanctify because he put it to that use which was not ordinary. To this the Def. replieth nothing worth the answering: but only that he accuseth M. Nic. and so in deed the Divines formerly alleged, of unconstancie & unconsonancie: whereas the answers that have been given may very well concur all of them in one action, and one answer. The rest of his talk doth hang upon the horns of his new found brazen Altar: and there I leave it.

SECT. XXII.

Concerning synagogues, I answer, 1. they were no significant ceremonies about which the question now is, 2. it is most likely though that the same Prophets which erected schools, called schools of the Prophets, were the first founders of those synagogues. 3. seeing in the synagogues there was no significant ceremony of action or apparel, appointed by men, to be used in them: therefore in the Christian congregations, which in form of worship, (saving the addition of sacraments appointed by God) is altogether the same with the synagogues, there ought much less to be any.

SECT. XXIII. XXIII. XXV. XXVI.

THE first example brought out of the New Testament, are the the feasts of charity, ordained (as the Def. saith) by the Apostles. To which our answer is ready, that if they were ordained by the Apostles, then they were not human, but divine, and therefore nothing pertaining to our question. To this the Defendants reply is, that if divine be opposed unto constitutions not commanded of God, then we could not have uttered a more unlearned position: because all Divines distinguish betwixt divine, Apostolical, and Ecclesiastical traditions. All Popish Divines indeed do allow of this distinction, because it maketh for their purpose: and some of our English when they write in defense of the Hierarchy, or of the ceremonies: but so deeply to accuse those that refuse it, for want of learning, this is too magisteriall For 1. that which came from the Apostles as they were Apostles, that came from the spirit of God, Act. 15. 28. 1. Cor. 7. 40. and to call that divine which hath the divine spirit of God: 1. God himself for author, what want of learning is in this? 2 Junius was a Divine, and learned, yet he saith, that this distinction betwixt Divine and Apostolical traditions, is almost imaginary and superfluous in Bellcont. 1. lib. 4. c. 2. an. 6. Danaus calleth it a childish distribution, in eund. loc. more learned divines, might easily be named, that do so allow of this distinction. And indeed, to examine it by that learning, by which distinctions are chiefly to be tried, it hath no Logic at all in it. For 1. the distinction pretended betwixt things appointed for perpetual use, and those that may be altered upon occasion: This distinction or difference (I say) is no way contained, in the terms Divine, Apostolical 2. Some things were immediately by Christ appointed, which were not perpetual: as many things proper to the Apostles and their times. And some things appointed by the Apostles which were to be perpetual, as the essentials of Ecclesiastical government.

A second answer is brought in, that these feasts were abrogated by the Apostles. Then (saith the Def.) 1. they were not of divine institution. Not in that sense indeed, which meaneth by divine perpetual: but yet they might be divine, as gifts of tongues, healing, prophesying, &c. were. Then 2. (saith he) the Church may institute and abrogate as the Apostles did. The consequence is but faint: yet the consequent or thing inferred, may be granted, so that the Church keep within her bounds. Our final answer is, That these feasts of charity were not of mystical signification, nor yet merely Ecclesiastical. And indeed it is plain, that these feasts did carry no ordained signification, but that which nature her self had imprinted in their foreheads. For who knoweth not that familiar feasting of poor and rich together, is a demonstration and preservation of love, without institution? and yet this is all that the Def. can say for their signification. Neither were these feasts merely Ecclesiastical or religious, because they were used in the assemblies: for they were also used in the same manner, and to the same end, out of the assemblies. Their proper end was relief of the poor, and maintenance of brotherly love.

Last of all, for the ordination of these feasts, it cannot be shown to have been Apostolical. Peter Martyr in 1. Cor. 11. 22. judgeth otherwise. So that in this example, the Def. can neither show mystical signification, religious ceremony, nor Ecclesiastical ordination: and yet except all these be proved, the instance maketh nothing at all unto his purpose. But that which he lacketh in weight of arguments, he strives to make up in number.

SECT. XXVII.

THE next instance (like the former) is the kiss of peace. To which our answer is, that it was a natural indicant sign of peace and reconciliation. But the Def. borrowing light from some oratoriall phrases of the Fathers, will prove the contrary: though it be as manifest as anything can be, both by Scripture, and also by other histories, that it was a civil natural fashion used in those parts upon civil occasions as well as holy. Now what doth he prove? First the institution, so far as it was not commanded by Christ, was human. This he affirmeth, but proveth not: and in his affirmation wavereth like a reed shaken with some wind. So far it was from Christ; and so far it was from man: and yet we hear not how far from either. The plain truth is, it was of no institution at all: but of natural inclination and civil custom, used long before the coming of Christ, as is to be seen everywhere in the Old Testament, Gen. 29. 13. 1. Sam. 20. 41. &c. yet by direction or custom it received constant application unto some special acts. Secondly, he saith, it was significant, that is, it had a natural fitness to declare the inward affection of love. What is this to a signification imposed by man? it was so significant as shaking of hands: which gesture also used to be joined with it: Tunc ambo nexi ad invicem dextras damus in osculo pacis sacrae, &c. It did so signify love as the turning away of the face doth signify alienation of mind. But (saith he) it signified Christian love. As if Christian love had not in it the common nature of love, and therefore cannot be signified partly by natural signs common to love. Cleanliness in the celebration of the sacraments, is the same that it is at another feast; though in regard of that application, it may be called Christian or holy cleanliness or decency. Thirdly, he saith, it was used in time of holy worship. So no doubt was giving of the upper place unto the Elders, &c. in token of reverence: and yet it was no religious instituted sign of mystical signification: such reasons as these bewray more confidence than good consideration.

SECT. XXVIII.

THE third and last example which is brought out of Scripture, is, the covering and uncovering of the head at divine service, 1. Cor. 11. to which I answer as before, that it was a civil order of decency, used as well out of God's worship, as in it. But here the Def. taketh pains to make many collections, and confirm the same by divers witnesses. Because (as he saith) this point is of some moment; though the other were of none: let us therefore briefly consider what they be.

1. I would first learn (saith he) whether this ceremony of covering and vncovering were not significant of some good thing? I answer, that this fashion which he abusively calleth a ceremony, was significant in a general sense: that is, it did declare or argue a good thing.

2 I would ask what thing it is that is hereby signified? I answer, subjection and superior power. But there is a relation also to God, saith the Def. I answer, there is in man's superiority, a kind of resemblance of God's soveraigntie: and so there is also, as Calvin observeth, in omni principatu in all superior power: so that this maketh covering and uncovering, no more a religious significant ceremony, then the upper seat of a heathen Magistrate sitting in judgment: for by that seat is signified a superiority, in which there is some image of God's soveraigntie. There is nothing alleged out of our Divines by the Defendant, which may not as well be applied to the Judges bench, as to this covering and uncovering. And the Apostle doth show plainly, that the veil he speaketh of, was of the same nature with long hair. So that, by the Def. reason, men's short, and women's long hair, must be accounted religious mystical ceremonies.

3 Our third demand (saith he) is, whether these ceremonies of covering and uncovering, were not instituted to be observed in God's public worship? I answer, it was required that they should be observed in holy Assemblies. But 1. it was not only required in God's public worship, but also as Calvin upon the place granteth, In quovis graviore coetu aut matronarum aut virorum, in any grave meeting of men and women. And instit. lib. 4. cap. 10. sect. 29. ne mulieres in publicum nisi velatae procedant: •. Whensoever they go into public places. 2. It was not instituted primarily and principally for God's worship. If it were, I ask, when and by whom? Paul surely did not institute a new ceremony in this place: for v. 14. he groundeth his admonition upon nature, i. as Calvin well expoundeth it, upon a received use and ancient custom in those parts: which some through lightness began unseemly to transgress. There is nothing alleged out of Martyr or Chrysostom against this answer.

4. Fourthly (saith he) we desire to know, whether this matter were not a thing indifferent? I answer, it is indifferent in the general nature of it; yet at that time, and in that place, they sinned that did otherwise, even before Paul, or any of their overseers, gave them charge about it.

Lastly, (saith he) it is worthy our inquiry to learn how far other Churches may be directed by this example? I answer, so far just as the Apostles rule stretcheth, 1. Cor. 14. 40. Let all things be done comely.

Now the Defendant hath a direct answer to all and everyone of his demands, let him cast up his sum, and he shall find, that he hath proved just nothing. He could find but three examples in all the New Testament, which had any color, so as they might be alleged for mystical ceremonies, appropriated to God's worship, by man's institution. The Love-feasts, the kiss of peace, and the veil of women. And yet there is not one of these three, (as any indifferent man, if he hath common sense may see by that which hath been said) that can be shown either to be of mystical signification, other then nature giveth it, nor appropriated unto God's worship more then to civil occasions, nor yet ever instituted by any man in the Church of God. Is it not a marvelous thing that men should presume so as they do to domineer in words and deeds over poor men, in such things as they can show neither precept nor pattern for in all the Scriptures.

We will descend lower, saith the Def. And that, I assure him, is his best course: for so long as he wadeth in the pure waters of holy Scripture, he doth but strive against the stream: descending lower to human writings, he may find the waters troubled, and so bring some fish to his net. Yet having the Scriptures on our side, we need not fear to follow him whether soever he pleaseth to lead us.

SECT. XXIX.

HEere is alleged the universal custom of the ancient Church, even from the Apostles times for confirmation of human mystical ceremonies in God's worship. To which I answer, 1 of the first and purest times, next after the Apostles, this cannot be proved: nor is likely, because it is not to be thought that all Churches would immediately admit of anything which they had not received from the Apostles. 2 For the next ages it may easily be shown, that the best Writers taught many general rules concerning the perfection of Scripture, and the purity of God's worship, which cannot stand with these human inventions: howsoever in their practice they were carried away unto other customs. 3 The infinite troubles of those times against Infidels and Heretics, about the chief grounds and main foundations of faith, would not suffer them to examine these points of less moment as they should. And in deed, they were so taken up with those conflicts, that they neglected many usual truths. So that if all should be received which the Fathers practiced, neither anything understood but by their interpretations, we should be destitute of much truth, and overcharged with the burden of human presumptions, as Augustine complained in his time, ep. 119, 4 the Lord in justice would have Antichrist to prevail: which mystery could never have grown to any ripeness, had the worship of God been preserved sincere. That corruption begot him, and the reformation thereof must be his utter ruin. It is sufficient that the lamentable experience of fifteen hundred years hath declared unto us, what fruit of significant ceremonies brought by man into God's worship are wont to afford unto those that affect them. To fetch authority in this case, from their practice, by which hath ensued such inestimable hurt to the Church of God, is not the wisdom of the burnt child, who dreadeth the fire.

SECT. XXX.

OF our own Writers the Def. here opposeth unto us, Calvin Junius, Chemnitz and Zepperus. Now for these, it hath been plainly manifested before, that they all with one consent condemn human symbolical ceremonies in God's worship: and that upon good grounds out of God's word. Now therefore if anything elsewhere hath fallen from any of them by occasion, sounding to the contrary, then we may well think that either their meaning is mistaken therein, or else they shown themselves to be men: and indeed (to say the truth) there is a little variety to be found in some of our divines concerning the point of ceremonies. But the cause thereof being marked, will make it less offensive. All our Divines, when they look into the clear crystal of the scripture, condemn plainly all devices of man in God's worship, whatsoever: but again, some of them when they fixe their eyes on the false gloss of ancient times, and consider withal how hardly men are drawn from their accustomed vanities, and what good some men may do by applying themselves somewhat to the times, then receiving another kind of impression, they seem sometime to waver in their words. This observation I thought fit to set down in general, because it may have good use in some particular places which this Def. threat•eth hereafter to object. But as for the places here quoted, the answer is easy.

Calvin in the first place, disputing against the gross corruptions of the Papists, saith, he doth not contend therein about ceremonies, which he might truly say not only comparatively, but even absolutely in regard of contention with others, who did not obtrude them upon him. And so I am assured few or none would contend much about ceremonies, if they would not force them upon others.

In the other place, he understandeth by ceremonies, such as are given us of God: as the following words show: Paucae igitur nobis divinitus datae sunt ceremoniae. What indeed he thought was to be given to the rude people in this kind, he shown sufficiently, not only by his words formerly cited, but also by his practice, in that he banished such ceremonies utterly not only out of Geneva, but also out of all Churches, which hearkened unto his counsel.

Chemnitz in regard that some ceremonies were in use where he lived, handleth them so gently as he can: and speaketh too favourably of Images: yet in other places, the truth wresteth from him and Brenz also, a right confession, as hath been alleged before.

Zepperus meaneth only that the simple having of Images in Churches is not such impiety as doth unchurch a people.

Junius and Chemnitz in the last place, do but give a difference betwixt the Fathers and Papists use of some things. Here is nothing directly against our assertion. But if all these witnesses did speak as the Defendant would have them in these places mentioned, what were that to the cloud of testimonies which are brought forth in the Abridgment, and unanswered as yet by the Defender. His own mouth will testify that our Divines are generally on outside. For in that regard (if he speaketh with good reason) he calleth them still our own witnesses. Our own they are not, because we allege them only: for so both Fathers, and Papists, and Conformists also are alleged by us: but because they speak plainly for us. Which appeareth also the more by his silence at the most part of their speeches.

SECT. XXXI.

After much sailing in the main sea, the Defendant directeth his course (as he saith) homeward to the narrow seas, by instancing, in the practice of Non-conformists themselves. His comparison is good: for as the scriptures were too deep for him to fasten any anchor of a conforming argument in: so the practices of weak men are so full of sands and shelves, that here he can have no sure riding. The sea of Rome turned, by one of our Prelates, mare Romanum, is the best harbor of all the world for the ceremonies to arrive and rest in.

The first example brought is the form of an oath, which is taken on a book. To which I answer, 1. That if this form of swearing can be proved to be of the same nature with the cross in baptism, &c. we will rather abandon this form to avoid the Cross, then admit of the cross for love of this. 2 I affirm, that it were much better that this form (invented by Papists, and abused not only by them, but also by many among our selves) were abolished, as it is in other Countries not Popish, then retained. Mr. W. Thorpe a Martyr, or Confessor, in King Henry the fourth his days, refused to swear upon a book, alleging Chrysostom for the same opinion. 3. This form if it be worship, seemeth to be essential and necessary worship, not accidental: for no man is esteemed to have taken his corporal oath (as Lindwood affirmeth) but he that sweareth upon a book. 4. It is not our practice to make anymore of touching the book, then of lifting up, of the hand, which is used in other Countries: i. to make it a sign of assent unto that which is required of us. So that I for my part would not find fault with those which sometime hold out a service-book, or any other to touch and kiss: for it is all one whether we show our assent one way or another, so it be shown in a decent manner. 5. This form is not used in the special solemn worship of God: but in a civil assembly, where occasionally God is called upon for confirmation of the truth. And indeed, as the Def. speaketh well, an oath is rather a cognifance or note of supreme worship, then proper and direct worship.

SECT. XXXII.

THE next instance is, The observation of the Lord's day: which the Defendant would never have brought in as an example of a human ceremony, if he had not either been sea-sick or else sleepy with his long sailing which he spake of in the former section. For he taketh it for granted, that we hold the Lord's day to be an institution of man, which we utterly deny: We hold, as Junius answereth Bell. about this matter de cult. sanct. l. 3. c. 10. an. 33. c. 11. an. 3. it is the divine institution of Christ himself.

By the way here he bringeth in a testimony of Zanchius, calling our Temples types and shadows of the celestial Temple. But Zanchier meaning was not to make them destinated instituted types: but only such things as by accommodation may serve fitly to put us in mind of such a matter: even as any arbitrary similitude that is fit, may be called a tide and shadow. I would the Defendant would read the very next Thesis of Zanchi to that he quoteth: there he should see, that Images, though they be not for the present worshipped, yet ought to be removed out of Churches, because they help not but hinder the worship of God. If Images, then by the Def. own former grant, mystical ceremonies of man's invention: and so mystical Churches too.

SECT. XXXIII.

IN this last section, some reason is promised for a final confutation of the Non-conformists in this point; but I for my part can see none. Nothing (saith he) is properly called a ceremony, if it be altogether destitute of signification. Then (say I) away, and out of the Church with all ceremonies properly so called, of man's invention. But why hath he gone about to deceive us so often before, by confounding circumstances of order and decency with other ceremonies, & now in the winding up of all, confesseth that they cannot be properly called ceremonies? surely there is no reason in this kind of dealing, but only that which they call Sophistry.

Calvin (saith the Def.) and some other, do accuse the Popish ceremonies because they are dumb. I answer, they accuse them also for speaking, as the scripture doth condemn Images both for being dumb, and also for teaching lies. So that lay all together which those Divines say, and you shall find that in their judgment, human ceremonies in God's worship, are like a fool in a place of honor, who whether he speaketh, or holdeth his peace, still showeth himself unworthy of that place.

CHAP. III.

SECT. I.

This argument in the Abridgement, p. 17. standeth thus: It is contrary to God's word to use (much more to command the use of) such ceremonies in the worship of God, as man hath devised, if they be notoriously known to have been of old, and still to be abused unto idolatry or superstition by the Papists, specially if the same be now of no necessary use in the Church. But our ceremonies are such: Ergo.

The Defendants answer is very brief: he dares not absolutely deny either part of the argument. He could not find a fit distinction whereupon to ground a conditional denial with reason: he contents himself therefore to make a show of distinguishing after an unreasonable manner. For he doth not distinguish of any one term found in the argument: nor maketh the parts of his supposed distinction such as will bear any Logical sense. If (saith he) you require such ceremonies to be abolished, then we deny your Major: but if you understand indifferent things, or mean an absolute, not a convenient necessity, we deny your Assumption. If this and but if that, this form of speech, as indeed, every distinction, implieth some dissention and segregation in the parts distinguished. But here is no show of any such thing, betwixt abolishing and indifferency, or absolute necessity. I know not what to make of such a confused distinction. It is as if one should say, If you require an establishing of the ceremonies, I deny one thing; but if you understand convenient ceremonies, I deny another thing. Such kind of speaking is nothing else but non sense, or as some use to call it, a very bull. Let this general answer therefore pass: though he saith, that in it we may see our marks, and take our aim.

SECT. II.

THE Abridgement beginneth the proof of the proposition thus. This may appear 1 by the second Com: which forbids all provocation unto spiritual fornication, as the seventh doth unto that which is carnal. 2 By the commandment and direction God hath given as in his word, 3 By the equity and reason of these commandments. Now the Def. though he professeth a full answer to all that is objected, yet he silently passeth over the first proof out of the second Command. wholly: and in the 2 and 3 proof, where about forty places of Scripture are cited for confirmation of them, he doth not attempt to answer above 8 or 9. But let us examine his answer to these.

Lev. 18 &c. three kind of things are forbidden, 1 incest, 2 rounding their heads and cutting their flesh for the dead, 3 sowing with diverse seeds, and letting diverse beasts to ingender together. The first was a sin against nature: the second was a wicked custom of infidelity; the third did signify adultery: in all which our ceremonies are innocent. He answereth here only unto the places taken out of the 18 and 19 of Lev. concerning which I reply 1 that in the first place the words are general, v. 3 4: howsoever therefore in the following verses they be applied unto foul sins, yet seeing in other places of Scripture the like application is made unto ceremonies, they were therefore mentioned as the general ground, comprehending both kinds in it, and joined unto other places condemning conformity with idolaters even in matters of ceremony. 2 The second and third were no more wicked, nor yet so much in any respect among the Heathen, as our ceremonies have been among the Papists: And therefore in these, M. Calvin's collection in Lev. 19 27, is sound, God would have his people to know, that they could not have his favor, except they would in all points be unlike to such, and go as far as they could from their fashions and examples, especially in those rites wherein there was any show of Religion. 3 I would demand whether, if the high Priest, with the whole Synedrion of the Jews lawfully assembled, had with one consent decreed, that whereas the Lord enjoineth, Lev. 19 Ye shall not sow with diverse seeds, nor cut round your heads, nor mar the tusts of your beards: this was only in regard of infidelity, and in respect of an evil signification: but seeing the things are in their nature indifferent, and that it might be convenient for them to use them, they would therefore all from thenceforth use the same, provided that none should use them upon infidelity as the heathen did, not make any evil interpretation of them: I would demand (I say) whether such a decree should ever have been lawfully made, or warrantably obeyed? I think the Def. will say no. But why? Perhaps because of the express commandment to the contrary; but doth not this commandment then respect some other reason, beside those which by this decree should be now taken away? and may we not collect a further matter from them?

SECT. III.

BEcause one usual evasion, much esteemed by the patrons of our ceremonies, is, that they had a good beginning: therefore the Authors of the Abridgement to stop that muse, add that even such things are to be cast away, which had a good original and use (if they be not still necessary and commanded of God) when once they are known to have been defiled by idolatry, or abused unto it. For proof whereof they allege Lev. 26 1, and other places more. But the Def. here singleth out this one, and denieth that the titular pillars of the heathen (which were set up at limits of their grounds) had a good beginning. Suppose that this be true, and that the Authors of the Abridgement were mistaken in this place: is not the same thing sufficiently proved our of 2 King. 18 4, Dan. 1 8, Hos. 2 16 17. But yet it is more then probable, that those titular pillars, were at the first only set up for civil use: because many statues which afterward served only for worship, were at the first only for civil respects, and these had still a civil use for distinction of bounds. But Calvin collecteth, that no statue was here condemned, but that which was erected to represent God. Calvin indeed hath those words: but what kind of representation he meaneth, he showeth sufficiently before, omnes picturas quibus corrumpitur spiritualis Dei cultus: all pictures that corrupteth God's spiritual worship. And after, quaecunque nos a spiritualibus cultu abducunt: whatsoever lead us from the spiritual worship of God.

Jacob erected a pillar for a religious monument (saith the Def.) Gen. 28, true: but not after the Law was given against it: so also he offered sacrifices, and many other things, in such sort as after the Law was not lawful.

SECT. III.

THE third proof in the Abridgement standeth thus: the equity of these commandments is thus set down in Scripture: 1 the detestation which the Lord our God being a jealous God beareth unto idolatry, and all the instruments and tokens thereof, as unto spiritual whoredom, Exod. 20 5 6, Deut. 7 25 26. 2 that we cannot be said sincerely to have repented of the idolatry or superstition whereby we or our forefathers have provoked the Lord unless we be ashamed of and cast away with detestation all the instruments and monuments of it, 2 Chron. 33 15, Es. 1 29 & 2 20 & 30 22 2 Cor. 7 11, Cal. in Deut. serm. 52 ep. 86 p. 166 167. 3 that we shall be in danger to be corrupted. Ex. 34 12 15, Deut. 7 4. 25. 26, Iud. 2 13, Gal. 2 5. 4. We shall harden Idolaters, Ezech. 16 54 1 Cor. 6 10. 5. There is more danger in Popish ceremonies, because the Pope is Antichrist, and we converse more with Papists than with other Idolaters.

Now of all these reasons and allegations the Def. answereth directly to nothing, but only to those words see Calvin: and yet not to them neither as they are cited in the Abridgement. For there it is, see Calvin in his 52 serm. on Deut. and ep. 87. Now on these places the Defendants eyes would not serve to look: or at least, his heart would not suffer him to give answer, they are so pregnant. If we have any drop of good zeal in us, it must needs vex and grieve us to see the marks and signs of idolatry: and that we must to the uttermost of our power deface them, &c. nothing upon pretence must be tolerated in the Church, which came either from Satan or from Antichrist. Yet the Def. saith, he hath seen Calvin upon Exod. 23 & 24, and Numb. 23 and Deut. 7 12, and findeth that Calvin holdeth these precepts of destroying Altars and Groues, to bind the Jews only, not Christians: and he biddeth us see Calvin on these places. Surely I have looked and could find no such thing. If there had been anything worth the knowing, for maintenance of the ceremonies, we should have heard of the words of Calvin; whereas now Calvin is brought in expressly affirming that we may use temples which have been defiled with idoles: which is nothing at all to the question of unnecessary ceremon. But if the Def. would discuss this point out of Authors, whether the laws alleged out of the old. Testament against the monuments of Idolatry, do not bind Christians, why doth he not answer to the testimonies of Calvin, Martyr, Grineus, Wolphius, Visinus, Machabeus, Zanchius, Simlerus, Zepperus, Fulk, & our book of homilies alleged to this purpose in the Abridg. p. 24.

SECT. V.

IN one place of Scripture yet, viz. Dan. 1 8, the Def. thinketh he hath some advantage; because Calvin interpreteth it otherwise then of ceremonial pollution. But therein the Abridgement followed that interpretation which is most generally, received: for which see Junius in his Commentary upon the place. And suppose that pollution was not ceremonial or idolatrous, yet I hope the Def. will not say but if the meat had been so polluted Daniel would have abstained from it.

Take therefore some other testimonies to prove your assertion, saith the Def. So confidently as if he knew of no testimonies which he had not answered. What can one say to him that will not take that which is thrust into his hands, and yet calleth for more, as if he could find none?

SECT. VI.

THE last thing which the Def. will take knowledge of, as alleged out of the Scriptures, in this point, is the example of Hezekiah 2 King. 1^o in breaking down the brazen Serpent. This example is so famous, that he could not omit it: yet he knoweth not well what to say unto it.

First, he giveth five reasons for the abolishing of the brazen serpent. As if any of us doubted, but that Hezekiah had reason enough for that he did: Or, as if there could not be reasons enough alleged, and those almost the very same, for abolishing of our ceremonies. Let them be abolished by public authority, and I will undertake reasons to justify, the action done, will easily be acknowledged even of those that now can see none to persuade unto the doing of it.

Secondly, he propoundeth, as very observable, that Hezekiah did not abolish the idols which Solomon suffered to be set up, because they were neglected. But 1 it may well be thought that those idols were destroyed by Hezekiah, and set up again before the time of Josiah, as many other superstitions were. 2 It cannot be doubted but they should have been destroyed, even though they were for the time neglected: because either Hezekiah had as good cause to destroy them as Josiah: or else he might have prevented that cause which Josiah had: and to prevent evil, we are as well bound, as to correct it.

Thirdly, he citeth Zanchius to prove, that this is not an universal remedy for all abuses of ceremonies. The place in Zanchi I cannot find: neither skilleth it much. I grant the conclusion, it is not a remedy for all abuses of ceremonies, viz. for such as God's appointment hath made necessary to be retained. Besides the words of Zanchi here cited by the Def. do only therefore seem to make for him, because they are not full enough against him. But in other places of the same book Zanchius judgment is plain enough, as p. 649 where from this example he reproveth those that keep the relics of superstition in some holy places; though they have removed them out of Churches. And if about this matter the Def. doth ascribe anything to the judgment of our divines, why doth he not answer the testimonies of Augustine, Calvin, Martyr, Wolphius, Lavater, Zanchius, Sadeel, Jewel, Bilson, Fulk, Rainolds, Andrew's, Perkins, alleged to this purpose in the Abridgement, p. 24?

Fourthly and lastly (which only in deed is to the purpose) the Def. would show us a disparity betwixt the idolatry of the Jews, and that of the Papists. The first is, that that idolatry of the Jews was done publicly, and generally, and in the bowels of the same Church: but the Papists is not so. To which I answer 1 these circumstances are not rendered as reasons of the abolishing in the text, but invented by the Def. 2 private particular idolatry is to be removed as well as public and general: 3 all these circumstances did more then agree to our ceremonies in the beginning of our reformation. And sure they are not grown better since, by any good that they have done.

The second difference which the Def. imagineth, is that there was no other means to cure the idolatry of those times: but now there is. I answ. 1 this is the very question whether there be any other sufficient means to cure the disease of human ceremonies idolatrously abused beside abolishing. 2 It is a vain imagination whereby this difference is confirmed, and no reason at all. In the Dominions of our Hezekiah (saith the Def.) this disease would be found curable without any such extremity. But the experience of 50 or 60 years show, that hitherto it is not cured neither in Ireland, nor Wales, to say nothing of England. Surely our Prelates are miserable Physicians, that in a disease so easy to be cured, suffer the patients to languish under their hands, unto death. Especially (saith he) in this our most truly reformed Church, which doth most lively express the face and full body of her primitive mother Church. This he hath now 3 or 4 times repeated: as if he did desire to make a question of it: and here propounds it with a doubt, if you will allow. It is not sit here to make a long digression about this matter. In short therefore thus, we allow with all thankfulness, that our Church is to be called a reformed Church in regard of the main points of faith, which are purely and freely taught among us with public approbation: and also in regard that the grossest superstitions are by public authority cast out of our Assembles. But if our Ecclesiastical government be considered, and some ceremonious superstitions, we deny utterly, that we have such a reformation therein, as may represent the face of the primitive Church. Let the Defendant tell us, if ever the primitive Church had such chanting idol service as is every day to be seen in our Cathedral Churches? If there were in the primitive Church Chancellors, Commissaries, Officials under the Bishops, which executed the censures of that Church? If he can show any primitive pompous Bishops that had sole authority of ordination & excommunication? If any Minister was called in the primitive Ch. without express consent of the congreg. over which he was set? if Ministers were then went to go to law for their places? if the Primitive Church ever heard of Pluralists, Non-residents or dumb ministers? If either in primitue or else in Popish Church almost simony was ever so ordinary as it is with us? If ever so many profane men, openly known to be contemners of Religion, were members of any primitive Church, as are of ours? If ever he read of such carnal proceedings about Ecclesiastical affairs in primitive times, as are every day practiced in our spiritual-courts? who took money for ordination, citation, absolution, or change of penance?

I will not insist on these things, because they are beside our present question; but only desire the Def. to behold this face which I have described in a right glass, and see if it be the face of the pure primitive Church.

SECT. 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20.

THE testimonies of Councils and Fathers, alleged in the Abridgement about this point, are largely ranked by the Def. into 14 Sections, as if the main burden of this Controversy did lie upon their authority: whereas in the Abridgement they are briefly mentioned as illustrations. I will therefore according to the intent of those which alleged them, consider all together.

7. In the fifth Council of Carhage it is true, that he saith, those Altars were only expressly appointed to be abolished, which were set up without relics of Martyrs. But let the Def. show any reason, why those also were not to have the same measure which had relics of martyrs in them? Surely the Council▪ seemeth to aim at a perfect reformation: but stayed at this, because of the superstition which then prevailed among the people's as they show in that parenthesis (si fieri potest) if it may be: and in the next Canon.

8 In the next canon (saith the Def.) they would only have immediate instruments of Idolatry then brought into public use abolished. But how doth he gather this gloss out of the Text? Or wherein doth this gloss excuse our ceremonies, especially as they were in the beginning of our reformation? and since they have mended as sour Al• doth in summer.

9 To the decree of the Council of Bracara, forbidding men to decke their houses &c. in such manner and at such time as idolaters did, the Def. answereth nothing that hath any show of reason in it. For our ceremonies differ nothing from the Papists in place, persons, time, but only in some opinion: Now the Council there doth not forbid the opinion, but the ceremony, even to them which were of a better opinion.

10 The Council of Affrick doth give a reason why they condemned certain feasts, because, they were drawn from the errors of the Gentiles. Herein I am sure it maketh against our ceremonies.

11 To Tertullian de Coron. the Def. saith less then nothing. For he doth not speak of the same individual habit which was used to idolatry, as the Def. vainly pretendeth: nor of that kind which was only used in idolatrous worship. For in the same book c. 13, he saith this habit of a garland was used in most base places, as plays, stews, jakes &c.

12 The like answer is given unto Tertullian de Orat. 1 in general it is said, that Tertullian doth not condemn these ceremonies merely for resemblance with idolaters: but for opinion of efficacy and necessity: whereas the contrary is plain in Tertullian, for he saith expressly, Propterea in nobis reprehendi meretur, quod apud idola celebratur. Therefore it is to be blamed in us, because it is used before Idols: And B. Jewel Def. Apol. with many other of our best Writers against the Papists do urge these testimonies of Tertullian merely in regard of resemblance. 2 In washing (saith the Def.) some did then hold an opinion of efficacy and necessity. If they did, that is nothing to the purpose; for they might be condemned in that behalf, and yet merely also for resemblance with idolaters. But no such thing appeareth in Tertullian, he telleth us plainly, that the washing before prayer was a significant sign in remembrance of Christ's delivering unto the Jews by Pilate, when he had washed. Cum scrupulose percontarer, & rationem requirerem, compēi commemorationem esse in domini deditioem, c. 11, so that I do not see but that this washing was every way like unto our sign of the cross in regard of the original signification and use of it. 3 In the ceremony of dassing cloaks before prayer, there was an opinion of necessity, because Tertullian saith, si sic oportet, if this ought to be done. As if sic oportet, ought to be done, ought always to be expounded of an absolute necessity. Do not our Prelates now say, sic oportet, we ought to use the ceremonies, and yet disclaim this opinion of necessity? Tertullian only condemneth, Vacua observatio, vanitas, quae sine ullius dominici out apostolici praecepti autoritate fit, atque adeo superstitioni deputanda. All these agree to our ceremonies as well as to that. 4 For sitting upon beds after prayer, the opinion of necessity is only condemned by Tertullian (saith the Def.) because he inferreth, otherways we ought not to pray but sitting. But that inference is only upon an allegation out of Hermas which Tertullian opposeth to himself about the matter. Concerning the ceremony it self, the grounds of his condemnation are, perinde faciunt nationes: apud idola celebratur. So that the Defendant hath given no colorable answer unto Tertullian. Yet one thing he cannot conceal, though it be nothing to the purpose, viz. that Tertullian in that place condemneth sitting at prayer, which we bring up our Scholars unto. He might surely have concealed this, as being a shameless slander in regard of us, as all that know us can witness: and a shameful practice of our Prelates, generally in all prayers before and after Sermons, except it be when the Lord's prayer is repeated: for it is well known how little respect they give unto any prayers, but only to the Lord's prayer, and those that are in the Service-book.

13 Melchiodes forbad fasting at the same time with Pagans. That was (saith the Def.) because they lived in the same Conutrey, at the same time and place Nothing else he hath to answer. And doth Country, time and place, make such a difference, that the same ceremonies in one Country, time and place, shall be Christian, and in another Paganish? What if the Countries be within half a days sails, as France is to England, and the time be the same, as it is in our case? confess the truth, and shame the devil.

14 Ambrose dissuaded Monica from bringing of wine and cakes to the Church. There is no proportion (saith the Def.) for that was an act of sacrificing performed by women, who are forbidden to sacrifice, as well as to preach: devised by private persons: of an idolatrous invention. The first of which answers is Bellarmine's de sanct. beat. l. 1. c. 14, but evidently false. For the Papists themselves are not so gross as to confess that they offer any proper sacrifice unto any creature whatsoever, Bellat. de sanct. beat. lib. 1 cap. 12: and shall I we think the mother of Augustine, with other religious women in those purer times to have been guilty of so great impiety? Epiphanius may call it a sacrifice in a rhetorical phrase, because it was an offering: but in disputations we must speak properly, yet Epiphanius doth call it only an offering. 2 the person or sex of a woman, maketh no difference. For Monica was not the inventer and appointer, but only the actor: and a woman may bring her offering and lay it upon the Communion table as well as a man. 3. It doth not appear that this was the invention of private persons: there have been Bishops which have fathered as good children as this was: and I do not know why such a thing, or any significant ceremony may not be lawfully used upon private devotion, if it be lawful for men to impose it. 4. If that which Monica did was Idolatrous, it is the very thing for which our ceremonies are accused. 5. Lastly, neither Ambrose, Augustine, or Monica regarded these things in condemning of that act: for the reasons are only two Ne ulla occasio ingurgitandi se daretur ebriosis: & quia illa quasi parentalia superstitioni gentilium essent simillima. The latter of which, viz. resemblance of •igans, is that which we urge.

15 To a grave sentence of Augustine, counseling to forsake all the toys of Pagans, if we would win them, nothing is answered but that those toys are not to be used together with Pagans, as if apart some of those toys at the least may be profitably used. Surely to return his own phrase upon him, de bove & efus caud, if others will eat up the ox, this Def. will make no bones of the tail, so it be apart.

16 The Council of Nice decreed that Christians might not keep the feast of Easter at the time, or in the manner as the Jews did. Not (saith the Def.) that it was always unlawful so to do, which question I will leave to them that are skilful in human traotions, but 1. for hatred of the Jews. 2. because of the Jews insultation. 3. for uniformity. The last of these causes doth not agree: for uniformity might as well have followed, if all Christians could have been drawn to the same time with the Jews. The other two agree well to our ceremonies. For we are to hate the idolatrous superstitions of the Papists with a perfect hatred. And the Papists do insult over us for this, that we have borrowed our ceremonies from them; as is to be seen in the Abridg. p. 25. where much is said to this purpose, & by the D. unanswered. And I would fain know for what causes other ceremonies of the Papists are abolished, if not these, or for such at the least as would sweep away our ceremonies in controversy, as well as them, if it pleased them that have such bezomes in their hands?

17 The Council of Gangrene forbad fasting on the Lord's day only (saith the Def.) if it were in contempt of Christian profession. But Augustine Ep. 86. telleth us the true reason was because the heretics did reach men to do so, sacra solemnitate statuta; with religious solemnity, as the Papists now do in the Cross. And whereas the Defen^e asketh, if there be any contempt of any Christian article in our ceremonies: I answer, the cross cannot be otherwise used, then with proiudice, disgrace, and so some kind of contempt cast upon baptism.

18 The 1 council of Bracar forbad abstinence frō flesh, that Christians might show themselves to differ from Priscillianists, the Def. answer is, that the Papists do not consort with us in the same ceremonial acts as the Priscillianists did with the Catholics, at the same ordinaries & banquets. But there is no such reason rendered, or limitation set in the council, of the same ordinaries and banquets: the same ceremony only is condemned.

19 Thrice-dipping in Baptism was condemned by a Council of Toledo, approved by Leo, because it was the custom of Heretics. This was (saith the Def.) because an heretical construction was made of it. Even so (say we) a superstitious construction is made of our cross, not only by the Papists, but by our own canons and Canonical imposers of it.

20 Leo forbidding men to have anything to do with heretics, meaneth it only of doctrinal conference, saith the Def. But conformity with them in their ceremonies is a greater fault (for the nature of it) then doctrinal disputing with them. Therefore the testimony holdeth, from the less to the greater.

Thus in brief I have examined his particular answers unto our testimonies out of Councils and Fathers. B^t one answer might have served for all, viz. that they were not brought in by the Authors of the Abridgement for to make an immediate conclusion by against our ceremonies, as the Def. in his answers evermore taketh them: but to illustrate the proposition which condemneth conformity with Idolaters in their ceremonies. And herein we have not only the Fathers, but even the Papists themselves in words many times consenting with us. Suarez. in Thom. p. 3. q. 65. maketh it one rule which the Church is to follow in appointing of ceremonies.

Now the Def. passeth from the proposition of this argument, unto the assumption. But he should have done well to have made a little stand at the army of Protestants which are brought in as giving witness to this truth. Abridg. p. 20. 21. 22. 23. 24. & 25. why had we not hear one head of Protestant Divines, as well as in the former arguments, seeing more are cited here then in them? Surely the Def. could not tell how to give a colorable answer to so many pregnant testimonies, and therefore thought good to pass them over in silence, and make his reader believe, that none were objected, because none are answered.

SECT. XXI.

THE Def. here meaning to say something against the assumption, setteth it down by halves, or rather by quarters. For the assumption is, Abridg. 26. 27. our ceremonies in question are human inventions, of no necessary use, and abused to idolatry. He setteth it thus down, our ceremonies have been idolatrously abused by Papists. There is great difference, as by and by we shall see. His answer is by a distinction: These ceremonies are either generally or individually and numerally the same that have been abused to idolatry: If generally, then it hindereth not, but they may still lawfully be used, though they have been so abused. If individually, then it is not true, which is affirmed: neither doth it follow from thence, that they must be abolished, because they have been so abused, except they be the same formally: i. in intention and opinion of those that impose and practice them: What miserable shifts is the Def. put to? he told us before, his distinctions were wedges: but this is a very pick-lock, made for to open the doors of God's Church into those ceremonies against which by the keys of God's kingdom they are straitly shut up. For by this means any kind of Popish, Jewish, Heathenish ceremony may come in, so there be new particulars of the same kind, and a new intention used. The first assertion is most gross, viz. that in ceremonies abused to Idolatry, those are not forbidden which are generally the same, but only the same individualls. For by the like reason, of ceremonies instituted by Christ, those only are commanded which Christ individually and numerally did sanctify: not all of the same kind. So also Papists are justified against all the charges of our divines, who accuse them for using of Jewish and Heathenish ceremonies: for they are not the same individually and numerally, but only in kind with those which Jews and heathens used. So the meaning of the scripture, forbidding conformity with the heathen Idolaters, should only be of using the same particular rites and ceremonies with them: as if when the cutting of their heads, & rounding of their hair like the heathen, was forbidden to the Israelites; Lev. 18. & 19. there had been danger lest the people of Israel should either get heathen men's heads, and set them upon their shoulders, or heathen men's beards, and set them upon their faces, and then put them into the forbidden fashion. It is but folly to confute largely such a beggarly assertion.

But if (saith the Def.) the same generally be forbidden, then you cannot justify any one of your own ceremonies of order and decency. Why so? because there is no gesture or circumstance of worship which hath not been abused to Idolatry. Now he showeth plainly wherefore he set down only a piece of the assumption: for if the reader mark, that our assumption is only of ceremonies devised by man, and of no necessary use, then he shall see that this poor objection concerning circumstances of order and decency, can have no place here: for they are of necessary use in their kind, neither are they mere inventions of man, as the ceremonies are, by Bellarmino's own confession, de effect. sacr. lib. 2. c. 29. For the second, that our ceremonies are not (◊) the same which the Papists have solemnly abused to Idolatry, if this be granted, it is no marvel: for it is altogether impossible to carry the same particular sign of the cross so far as, from the font to the Church door: or to keep it in being, so long as it is in making. Hath not the Def. then found out a great subtle mystery in this distinction? yet it seemeth more true, that the Papists do give divine honor unto the same individual ceremonies which are used in England: especially to the sign of the cross as it is used among us. For Bellarmino ascribeth divine honor and operation unto the sign of the cross as it was used by heathens, by Jews, by Julian the Apostate, Bell. de eff. sacr. l. 2. c. 31. Though the Papists count us heretics, and I know not what, yet they esteem us not worse then Pagans, unbelieving Jews, & cursed Apostates. Seeing therefore they yield such honor to this sign as it was used by them, they cannot deny it unto our individual crosses.

The last conceit, that our ceremonies are not formally the same with the Papists, because we have another intention and opinion of them then they, and therefore need not be abolished, is as vain as the former. For (not to dispute here of material and formal identitie) 1. a very show of Idolatry must be abstained from and abolished. 2. It cannot be said simply and truly, that our intention and opinion concerning the ceremonies, is not the same with the Papists. For we have no intention or opinion in the use of the cross, or other ceremonies, but the Papists have the same; only they have some other opinions about these things which we have not. And if this doth make a ceremony not the same, that men have not altogether the same opinion of it, then among the Papists there are also as many kind of ceremonies, crosses, Surplices, &c. as there is diversity of opinion about their nature and use, which no man will say. 3. the Altar erected by Vria, 2. King. 16. was an idolatrous Altar, like that of Damascus, though it was for another intention. 4. the Papists do ascribe divine honor to the ceremonies used with our intention, as formerly was shown out of Bellarmino. 5. This is the Papists answer when they are accused for symbolizing with Pagans and Jews in their ceremonies: Licet in externo symbolo sit aliqua similitudo, absolute tamen maximum est discrimen: nam à sine & intentione sumunt externa actiones speciem suam. Bell. de effect. sacr. lib. 2. c. 32.

SECT. XXII.

HEre, as a ground of confutation, the Def. setteth down the profession of the Church of England: which because he draws no conclusion from, it is not needful to examine, though it cannot be defended, that the most abused ceremonies are taken away (as this profession telleth us) because no one ceremony among the Papists hath been so much abused as the cross. That therefore only I would have here marked, how this profession doth confute this Defender. For he would make us believe, that none of the old ceremonies used in Popery, are retained, because they are not formally the same in respect of intention and opinion. But this profession telleth us plainly, that some of the old ceremonies do remain.

SECT. XXIII.

NO example can the Defendant find in all the book of God, for lawful reserving of Idolatrous ceremonies, but only two; one of Gideon, Judge. 6. 26. and another of Joshua, los. 6. 19. and yet of Gedeons example, the Def. himself confesseth, that it was by special commandment from God: and that it is not every way imitable. And of Joshua's, beside that it was also the express commandment of God; and that there is no mention made of things appropriated unto Idolatry, but only of goods which had been the possession of Idolaters: so that he may fetch as good an argument and better, from the Spanish Crusadoes, for the cross in baptism, then from the riches of Jericho. It doth no way appear in the text, but that the vessels were first molten, and then the gold only, and the silver, brass or iron of them, brought into the tabernacle. So that by this wretched penury of Scripture proofs, it is manifest, that the warrant for reteining of human Idolatrous ceremonies, must be fetched out of another court, then that which God holds in his holy word.

SECT. XXIII.

I Had thought verily that the Def. would have brought some pregnant testimonies out of the Fathers, though he could find none in the holy Scriptures. But he is here also as far to seek as before: for he bringeth nothing at all worth the answering. The feast of Easter (which now the fourth time is brought upon the stage by the Def. in vain) was never generally observed at the same time with the Jews, nor ever so appointed by any decree or canon of Council: if it had, yet that had been but an agreement in a circumstance of time, and the translation of it to another time, did show, they liked of no conformity of Jews. There were feasts also appointed at times differing from heretics. What Cart-rope will draw a conclusion from hence for conformity with idolaters in their ceremonies? Besides, feasts & fasts, he nameth habits, but giveth no instance or proof at all of any such thing. Circumcision, he saith, was continued under many Christian Bishops of Jerusalem. But let him show that those Christian Bish. allowed of any such thing. I never heard nor read of more confident conclusions out of such beggarly premisses.

SECT. XXV.

THE reasons had need be strong, when they come without any testimony of Scripture, and antiquity. But here the Defendant is as much forsaken of all help, as he was in the other. His first reason is, because heretics have perverted the sacraments Now he knew that the question is of human ceremonies, not of God's holy institutions: therefore he fetcheth about, and draweth this to his purpose, by gathering from thence, that it is almost impossible to find any ceremony without exception. All which we grant, of human significant ceremonies, as he knoweth well: except therefore he be resolved to make a trade of begging the question, I know not what he should mean by this unreasonable reason.

SECT. XXVI. XXVII.

THE very same disease is found in his second reason: wherout he can conclude nothing, but that some things abused may afterward be rightly used; which we willingly grant: nay, it may be granted of some human ceremonies also▪ as if the Surplices of England were turned into under garments for poor people: and wooden crosses were given them for firing. But if any conclude from hence, that therefore they may have lawful state in God's worship, and there have a good use, surely his wit & words might be better used.

In the 27 section there is no show of any reason at all, except affirmations be reasons.

SECT. XXVIII.

THE last reason is, because Popery and Popish rites are not to be esteemed of equal abomination with Paganism and Paganish rites. Suppose this were true every way (as it is not) yet in this they may agree, that both alike are to be detested and abandoned. Nay, a lesser superstition the authors and countenances whereof are near at hand, doth call for more hasty removal, then a greater, whose authors and users are unknown. Howsoever, when the scriptures bid us fly from Idolatry, and that also particularly, from Popish Idolatries without any distinction, as from Devils, Ap. 18. a few smoothing words cannot satisfy our consciences in this, but, that we are as well and as far to fly from Popish Idolatry, as from Paganish. But if the Defendant would have thoroughly discussed this question, why did he not answer that which Mr. Parker hath to this purpose? p. 1. c. 1. S. 25. or that which is alleged in the Abridgement, p. 24.

SECT. XXIX.

OUR Witnesses can give the Defendant but small aid, being separated from scripture and reason; yet he catcheth at three, Calvin, Martyr, and Zepperus. Calvin (saith he) teacheth that there is great difference betwixt Turks and Papists, lib. de vitand superst. True, but in the same place he answereth the consequence which you would make from hence, viz. that therefore we need not fly so far from Popish superstition, as from heathen: and in the same place also he argueth from Turks to Papists. Calvin's purpose was not to condeme anything but that which is evil in it self. True, in that discourse wherein he dealeth against those which could swallow down the mass it self: it had been no wisdom to dispute with them about Cross and Surplice. He alloweth of Temples which have been abused to Idolatry. So do we, because they are not religious ceremonies, of mystical signification, without necessary use. And is this all that can be brought out of Calvin? Then surely he doth not contradict the many sentences of condemnation which as other where, so also in that very Tractate, he passeth against Idolatrous relics.

Zepperus is alleged as allowing of Temples, which have been abused, because they were not immediate instruments of Idolatry. So do we also, as before I said, for that and other causes. But altars in the same place he condemneth: which yet are retained in our Cathedral Churches, and I hope the cross being an Idol it self, had as immediate communion with Idolatry, as Zepper or any reasonable Judge would require for the cashiering of it.

As for Peter Martyr, howsoever in one epistle to Hooper, he setteth as good a color upon the relics of Idolatry as he could, because he thought by a little yielding of Hooper and such men, the superstitions themselves might quickly be removed: yet in another Epistle, p. 1125. he giveth this peremptory sentence, Profecto si ex animo superstitiones edissemus, vel ipsa eorum vestigia omnibus modis curaremus extirpanda: 1. If we hated superstition from the heart, we would abolish all the relics of it. To the same purpose he speaketh p. 1127. where he showeth that his conscience would never suffer him to wear the Surplice, when he was Canon of Christ church in Oxford. If this were not his reason, he had some other very much a kin to this. Neither will the Defendant say hastily, I hope, that either Peter Martyr, or Hooper, were disorderderly exorbitant men in those times, fit to be displaced, that more discreet conformists might come in their places: as now he pronounceth of those that refuse to conform.

SECT. XXX.

WHen all fail, a contradiction must be found betwixt our conclusions, and our confessions and practices, but I assure myself, there is not any reader so simple, but if he look over this section, will presently see, that he hath not brought one example of any human ceremony, not necessary, notoriously known▪ to have been abused unto Idolatry, that is allowed by us. Why then should I spend ink and paper in laboring to un•wine such ropes of sand? Only I would ask the Defendant certain questions.

1. If a Temple, a Bell, or a Table-cloth have such idolatry put upon them by the Papists, as the cross hath?

2 If his own heart do not tell him, that there is a civil use of such things, which cannot be imagined of the cross?

3 What superstition there was in the mere significations given by Durand unto Bells, and Bell-ropes, which is not to be found in the Cross and Surplice?

4 Whether the Pagan use of Bay-leaves which was above a thousand years past, doth cast such a reflection upon our civil use of bay-leaves, as the Popish superstition doth upon our ceremonies?

5 What sense he had to find fault with us for not altering the situation of Churches?

6 If it be all one to call a ship by the name of Castor and Pollux, as Paul doth, Act. 28. 11. and to use a religious ceremony in God's worship, which is taken from these Idols?

7 If it be one thing to change copes into cushions, and to use a Mass vestiment in God's worship?

8 If it be not a kind of slander to say, that the Church of Geneva imposeth a round wafer cake, like the Papists, to be used in the Lord's Supper, when as only unleavened bread is used, because custom in that part more prevailed, then the grave advice of Calvin, Farel, Viret, and the other excellent pastors? And if it be not a wide leap, to bring in the practice of Geneva, for an instance of the Non-conformists practice in England?

By that time these questions be truly answered, the Defendant will have but a small harvest out of our confessions and practices.

CHAP. V.

SECT. I. ad X.

THE Authors of the Abridgement framed a strong Argument against our ceremonies from the rules of ceremonies prescribed in the Word, p. 43 &c. with this Argument when the Defendant was not able to grappell, as it stood in the parts combined, he thought good to sever some parcels of it, and try what he could say to them apart. Thus out of this one Argument he hath taken that which he calleth our first: and out of the same he hath made up this fifth: and yet he hath quite left out a great part of the sinews wherewith that one reason is knit together in the Abridgement.

The argument is taken from the scandal or offense which the imposing and using of these ceremonies do bring unto divers sort• of men.

The Defendant here maketh great flourishing in nine whole Sections, defining, dividing, and subdividing a scandal, as if he would make all clear before him: but at the end of all this preparation, he maketh no application of these Rules unto the matter in hand at all: but only, telleth his Reader, p. 154, That these divisions and subdivisions will expedite all difficulties, so that out of them he may collect the true and false sense of Scriptures alleged. It were sufficient therefore either to deny this power to be in his divisions: or else to set down as many other subdivisions of scandal (which were easy to do) and then tell him that these will expedite the controversy, and that from them he may collect the errors of his answer. But I will notwithstanding briefly show my opinion concerning some of these dictates.

The definition which he only alloweth of as accurate is, that a scandal is a willful offense against Christians, in provoking of them unto any damnable error or sin, by any sensible external means: Sect. 1. Wherein notwithstanding many faults may be found. For 1 every scandal is not willful, except the word be taken more largely then use of speech will allow. 2 Every scandal is not against Christians. 3 A scandal is not only by provoking to sin, but also in hindering from good. 4 what doth he mean to put in the word damnable? the occasioning of any sin, sufficeth to make up a scandal.

Among his subdivisions, the first thing I except against is, section 5, where he distinguisheth so betwixt persons and causes, either determined or undetermined, that in matters determined by the Church (as he teacheth) obedience is to be given without respect of scandal: and only in matters undetermined there is a charitable consideration to be had of other men's consciences. This is a new and a tickle point of Divinity touching the tenderest part of our spirits, even our consciences, and other men's also. It ought therefore either not to have been propounded, or else to be well confirmed either with testimonies, or with reasons drawn out of Scripture. But alas the Def. thrusteth it upon us without any such warrant. The peace of the Church (saith he) is to be preferred before the grievance i. e. scandal of any sort of men. As if the peace of the Church did not more consist in avoiding of scandals, then in observing of human ceremonies! it is not the peace of God which is broken by a charitable care of avoiding offenses, but by rushing into them.

A scandal in the nature of it is spiritual murder. Now suppose a Superior should command a thing in it self indifferent, whereupon murder were like to follow, as to run a horse, or a cart, in a certain way, at a certain time, when it may be unwitting to the commander, little children were playing in the way, would any man's conscience serve him to do it?

Avoyding of scandal is a main duty of charity. May Superiors at their pleasure appoint how far I shall show my charity towards my brothers soul? Then surely an inferior earthly court may cross the determinations of the high Court of heaven.

The superiors have no power given them for destruction, but only for edification. If therefore they command scandals, they go beyond their commission: neither are we tied therein to do as they bid, but as they should bid.

If determination by superiors were sufficient to take away the sin of a scandal. Then they do very ill that they do not (so far as is possible) determine all things indifferent, that so no danger may be left in giving of offense by the use of them. Then the Church of Rome is to be praised in that she hath determined of so many indifferents; then Paul with the other Apostles might have spared a great deal of labor in admonishing the Churches how they should avoid offenses about some indifferent things. A far shorter way had been either to determine the matter finally, or else to have given order that the Churches should among themselves determine it at home.

But say that the Archbishop of Corinth (for now I suppose such a one) had called his Convocation, and with consent of his Clergy had determined that men might, and for testifying of liberty should at a certain time eat of such and such meats which men formerly doubted of: would not yet the Apostle have given the same direction he did? would not good Christians still have had care of their brothers consciences? Can the determination of a superior be a sufficient plea at the bar of God's judgment seat, for a man that by virtue or force thereof alone, hath done any action that his conscience telleth him will scandalize his brother?

Lastly, I would fain know whether those superiors do not give a great scandal, which take upon them determinately to impose unnecessary rites which they know many good men will be scandalized by?

The second notorious flaw which I find in the Defendant his subdivisions is sect 9, where he granteth that much indulgence indeed is to be used in things indifferent towards weak persons, whose infirmity proceedeth only from simple ignorance: but that only till such time as the doctrine concerning such things have been sufficiently declared: because a scandal doth always presuppose a mere weakness for want of due means of knowledge. For 1 Paul had sufficiently declared that it was lawful for him to take wages, yet he would not, 1 Cor. 9, he had given sufficient reasons for the lawfulness of eating all kind of meats, yet he abstained, and so counseled others, for fear of scandal, Rom. 14 1 Cor 9. 2 There can be no certain set time for all sorts of men when they are sufficiently taught. 3 Who is this Def. that he dare judge so many of his fellow servants, that in such indifferencies as our ceremonies are held to be, they take offense not upon weakness, but upon presumption? 4 What authority have our Prelates to obtrude unnecessary ceremonies upon the Church, which must be declared before they can be used? Is it fit that the people should be troubled with the declararion of men's inventions, when they are hardly brought to hear willingly the main things of the Gospel? 5 Is it not more agreeable to the wisdom of God, Ex. 21. 33, to fill up the pit, then to set one by for to warn the passengers they fall not into it? 6 There was never yet sufficient declaration of this doctrine of ceremonies throughout England. In many places there is no preaching at all. Many preach so, that they declare nothing almost to the people but their own folly. Many are ashamed, or at least unwilling to declare unto the people men's devices. Many declare them so corruptly that the scandal thereby is not removed but increased. And among those that go about with some good mind to declare this kind of doctrine, there is almost as great variety of declarations as there is of declarers: while some will have them significant some not: some say they are good and profitable to edification, and others condemning them as altogether unfit, declare them to be tolerable for avoiding of a greater mischief: Some will have them only civil, and others Ecclesiastical: some excuse all but the cross, and some extol the cross above all. Are not such declarations (think you) likely to inform well the consciences of poor men who doubt more whom they should take for a good Declarer, then they did at the first of the things themselves?

SECT. X.

AMong the instances of scandal arising from the ceremonies, that which in the Abridgement hath the third place is set first by the Def. viz, that the superstitions Papist will be hardened in the liking of his abominable Religion, from which he seeth we borrow our ceremonies, and increase in his hope of the full restoring of it again. To this the Def. answereth, that our rites are not the ceremonies of Papists, because they are purged from superstition. But 1 that they are not purged from all superstition hath sufficiently been declared before. 2 This plea of transubstantiating of ceremonies by the breath of our Convocation is a mere shift, contrary not only to the language of all our Divines, and to that which every man's senses do tell him, but also to the public profession of the Church of England, in the preface to our service-book, as it is cited by him p. 127. For there we are told 1 that an abatement is made of the excess of Popish ceremonies: All therefore are not abolished, but some remain. And which be they, if these in question be not? 2 That some of the old ceremonies do remain. What sense can be given of these words, if our ceremonies be not the same with those which were of old among the Papists? if it were meant of old ceremonies not used among the Papists, then they do not remain, nor are retained, but restored. 3 That none are devised anew therefore they must needs be taken from the Papists, or from the Fathers: but of the Fathers surplice or kneeling at the communion, no instance can be given: and as for the cross, the Def. himself will not defend, I think, all that use which the Fathers put it to. 3. The Papists own words do sufficiently manifest how they are hardened by the imposition and use of our ceremonies. For as it is shown in the Abridgement p. 25, they seek to justify their superstition by this, that we have borrowed our ceremonies from them. And some of them thence conclude (as there is shown) that our Governors like well of their superstition. Beside Gretser, a principal Jesuit saith, that in these ceremonies our Ministers are as Apes of Popish Priests, Apol. pr. Gregor. 7 pag. 8, and in his defense, t. m. 2 lib. 4 cap. 16 saith, that our Convocation house in imposing these Ceremonies, do cross the judgment of our best Divines. Lastly, the respect of that Popish superstition wherewith our people were then generally infected, was the chief, if not the only cause why these ceremonies were retained by our first Reformers. See more of this in M. Parker, p. 2 c. 6 sect. 10.

SECT. XI.

THE second instance is, that that the profane will draw many arguments hence to bless himself in his contempt of all Religion. The Def. asketh, from whence? I answer, from hence: 1 that Religious rites are invented by men, and appointed to be used in God's worship, even after the same manner that God's Ordinances are, or at least were of old: 2 That trifles are urged, to the increasing of contention: 3 that many place such holiness in these things which they know to be men's devises: 4 that other ceremonies are cried down, as if they were against Religion, which yet are every way as good as these: 4 that religious men are more molested for these toys, then they are for their profaneness.

SECT. XII.

THE third instance of scandal is in weak brethren, who will be drawn to yield unto the ceremonies against their consciences, or else doubtingly: and some also will grow to dislike some Ministers for these things, and so be hindered from profiting by their ministry. To this the Def. answereth in many words: but the sum of all he saith is, that these are not weak brethren, because they have been diligently catechised by Non-conformists. But 1 the Corinthians no doubt were diligently catechised: and yet there were many weak among them. 2 The Def. I hope taketh order (or else he may be ashamed) that all his Dioc•ffe be diligently catechised; yet I think he will not say but there are many weak souls in that circuit: 3 The Catechisers he speaketh of have had enough to do, to teach the people the main points of Religion: as for instructing them concerning the lawfulness of human ceremonies, they left that to those that impose th•m, or to their servants: 4 After long teaching and sufficient knowledge, there may be still a weakness in regard of some things, through many circumstances required unto strength, beside bare knowledge. Lastly, we confess, that (upon supposition that the Def. his doctrine be sound in these points) we are yet weak in these points, as we are also in some other, wherein our adversaries are so strong, that they can bear many Churches and such like things, upon their shoulders, without feeling any burden of them, which we cannot. See M. Park. ca. 6 sect. 18.

SECT. XIII.

THE fourth instance is thus set down in the Abridgement, pa. 50, As there is danger in the use of these ceremonies in all Congreg•tions, so especially if they sh•ll be brought back again unto those, where they have been long out of use. In this case Calvin, Brenz, B•cer, Hemingius, Beza, Grinaeus & other great Divines esteem• them wicked and unlawful.

To all this the Def. giveth no answer: but only taketh occasion to make a frothy comparison betwixt the laws and power of particular Congregations, and the whole Convocation house. Which because it neither pertaineth to the present purpose, nor containeth anything of moment, I leave as I found: though it may be easily proved, that many particular Congregations can tell better what is fitting for their edification in some things, then all our National Convocation. Nay, I dare boldly say, there is no Town of note in all England, but twelve men may be chosen out of, which would find out Canons more to the edification of all the Congregations in England, then those are, which B. Bancroft with his Clergy, concluded.

SECT. XIII.

A Fift instance, or rather an enlargement of the former is, in respect of the Ministers who have formerly refused the ceremonies, for whereas the Minister is bound to lead his people forward unto perfection; and to provide by all good means, that his ministry be not despised: by this means he shall draw them back again unto the liking of superstition; or at least not to dislike it so much as they have done: and give them evident occasion to blame his Ministry, and to call in question the truth of all his doctrine.

Here the Def. cometh upon them with open mouth, avouching peremptorily, that this is a false, presumptuous, irreligious, partial, and pernicious pretense: and all this he will prove. If he can, we shall the easilier bear these great words. But why is it False? forsooth, because most of the Non-conformists have once subscribed: the contradicting of which subscription is no less a matter of discredit then returning unto conformity. What kind of proof is this? because they were subject to another discredit, therefore this is no discredit. Beside it doth not appear, nor is likely that most of these Ministers did ever absolutely subscribe: neither is it likely: because it is well known how easy and how ordinary it was in Qu Elizabeth's days, to enter into the Ministry without passing under that gallows. If the most had, yet how would this prove it a fall pretence in the rest? If all had done so, yet this was no act of their Ministry, nor known it may be to their people, and therefore the crossing of it did not so directly tend to the discrediting of their Ministry, as the crossing of their public doctrine. Lastly, that which is done before a man be settled in the Ministry at one time, without any great deliberation, is not of such note as that which a man hath long professed & persuaded by reasons taken from the word of God. By all this it appeareth, that this first accusation of falsehood was rather an adventure as the Def. himself calleth it, the a grounded assertion.

He did but adventure neither to call the same plea presumptuous. For he can find no other reason to bear up this charge withal then, that they seem to arrogate to themselves a prerogative proper to the Apostles. How can this be I wonder, seeing they follow herein the direction of the Apostle himself, Tit. 2 15. Let no man despise thee. What this prerogative is, he doth not plainly tells us: but compriseth it in two places of Scripture, 1 Cor 15, Gal. 2 18, the first whereof is nothing at all to the purpose. For the Apostle doth not say as the Def. maketh him, If we be found false witnesses, then is your faith in vain: but if Christ be not risen; then are we false Witnesses, and your faith is vain: Which also any preacher of the Gospel may say without falsehood or presumption to his people. The second place, If I build again that which I have destroyed, I make myself a prevaricator, is applicable to any Minister that hath taught the truth against Popish superstition. This very doctrine M. Perkins gathereth out of the words. Proculcavimus superstitionem Papisticam &c. I hope the Def. doth not think he may build up any superstition, and not be accounted therefore a prevaricator: if he do; or though he do not, let him consider where the presumption lieth.

But why irreligious? because it is persisting in an error, for the preservation of their own credit. But 1 who taught the Def. to make that which is in question the ground of an accusation in dispute. First, let him prove that it is an error, before he take it so for granted, that upon that ground he will challenge men's reasons as irreligious. 2 It is not their credit, but the credit of their Ministry which they speak of. 3 Is it such an irreligious thing, to desire that certain ceremonies may not be imposed upon them, lest their Ministry be by that means prejudiced?

Why partial? because men should rather yield to Conformitie for the credit of the Church: i. e. for the credit of the Convocation house. Alas, the credit which a great part of that generation doth seek for, is that they may rejoice in our flesh. But suppose they meant sincerely: would the Def. have men discredit and prejudice their Ministry, to bring some credit unto other men's decrees? Or doth the forbearing of some ceremonies bring such discredit to the Authorizers of them? surely then they are more for the honor of mortal men, then for the honor of God. For God's honor and worship is no ways prejudiced by their absence.

The last charge is pernicious. And here many words are used to give countenance unto that one. The main ground is, Woe to me if I preach not the Gospel; and Simon lovest thou me? then feed my sheep. Wherupon he gathereth, that it is a pernicious thing for a Minister to put himself unto silence. But 1 what is this to the question of discrediting ones Ministry? 2 Although we were most worthy to have these remembrances out of Scripture rubbed upon us yet the Prelates are altogether unworthy and unfit to do it. Let any man conceive with himself B. B•ncroft, or any other in the end of the Convocation, after all the Canons were concluded, coming forth as Prolocutor, and speaking thus to the Ministers assembled together before him. Men and brethren, the reverend fathers of this Convocation, as they always meditate on the law of God, and every part of it, both day and night; so especially do they lay to heart those passages of holy Writ which properly concern their office: as woe unto me if I preach not the Gospel: and Simon lovest thou me? feed my sheep. Out of these considerations, being carried with a fervent zeal both of preaching themselves in their several pl•ces, and also of procuring more faithful Preachers, and more fruitful preaching throughout the land, they have over and above the institutions of Christ, appointed certain ceremonies strictly to be observed of every Minister: so that whosoever shall hereafter upon any pretense refuse to observe the same, they shall be esteemed factious, schismatical, disorderly, exorbitant men, and for that cause by their Ordinary suspended and deprived. oNw for the preventing of such a mischief your tender mother would have you to understand by my mouth, that if any man be thrust out of the Ministry for not yielding to these constitutions, howsoever they may seem unto him such as the Church cannot lawfully appoint, nor he observe, yet he is author of his own silencing: and therefore you must all be exhorted to consider well of those parcels of Scripture which have so much prevailed with your careful mother. Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel; Simon lovest thou me? feed my sheep.

Would not he that heard such a speech as this from a Prelate b• forced to call for for a bason? and after he had recovered himself he might well give answer in these words, I hear the words of a deceitful tongue. Behold thou art called a Bishop, and gloriest in that title: thou persuadest thyself, thou art a chief guide and father of the Church, thou therefore that teachest another, teachest thou not thyself? Thou that sayest it is a woeful thing not to preach the Gospel, doest thou neither preach Christ faithfully, nor suffer those that would? Darest thou by thine own authority, and for thine own pleasure, hinder so many able men from preaching? thou that professest the flock must be fed, doest thou thrust out feeders, and keep in starvers? Therefore thou art inexcusable, ô Prelat, whosoever thou art, that condemnest another for that whereof thou art both beginning and ending.

Thirdly, the Apostles woe, 1. Cor. 9. belongeth to negligent, slothful, and careless ministers properly, such as our Prelates know where to find enough, who yet neither feel nor fear that woe from the Bishops which many faithful preachers are wrapped in from time to time.

Fourthly, the Apostle doth not pronounce any woe for not preaching, where imprisonment doth hinder. Now he whose conscience is against the ceremonies, or doubteth of them, is spiritually imprisoned, so that he cannot by using of them, make his way to the pulpit.

Fifthly, it is a mere jest, though a bitter one, to say, that we leave our ministries: when we do all that our consciences will suffer us to do, for the holding of our places: and when we have done all that, depart against our wills with sorrow. Non discedit a statine, qui cedit invitus. See Mr. Parker, p. 1. c. 4. s. 14.

But the Defendant undertaketh to prove, that the cause of silencing is not in the Bishops that suspend and deprive us: but in ourselves. He is as it seemeth, a great adventurer: For he cometh forth upon this piece of service with flying colors: Know you well what you say (saith he) when you lay the cause of your silencing upon the Bishops? Yes surely, very well. For a cause is that which bringeth force or virtue to the being of another thing.

Now the first virtue (or rather vice) which tendeth to silencing. of Ministers in this case, is in the Bishops canons: they therefore are the first cause. The second virtue is in the Bishops and their officers, which are executioners of those unconscionable canons: they therefore are the secondary cause. Non-conformity hath no virtue in it of it own nature, nor by God's ordinance, to bring forth such an effect as the silencing of God's Ministers is though it bemade an occasion by the perverseness of our Prelates. I know well what I say: and will make it good against the Defendants vain pretences. The case standeth thus (saith he) Titus (It had been more proper to say Diotrephes) the Bishop doth deprive Titius a factious & schismatical minister, that he may place Sempronius, a peaceable and discreet man, in his stead. In this proceeding, the intendment of Titus is not absolutely to deprive Titius, as he is a Minister, but as he was factious: yet so only respectively, that Titius being deprived, he may constitute Sempronius: for the charge of a Bishop is not determinate to appoint precisely this minister: but indefinite, to ordain a minister: so that the course of God's plow is still preserved and continued. But as for Titius, who will rather be silenced then conform, it is evident, that the cause of his silencing being his own refractarinesse, which is only personal and proper to himself, and yet hath no faculty in himself to appoint or admit of a successor: he may be said to have properly caused his own suspension and deprivation.

This case needeth no long demurring on: for there is not one sentence in all the length of it, which doth not smell, without any uncasing. 1. are all those factious and schismatical men, that refuse to conform? was Hooper such a kind of man? was Peter Martyr and Mr. Perkins such, when one at Oxford, and the other at Cambridge, refused to wear the Surplice? was Mr. Goodman, Mr. Deering, Mr. More, Mr. Rogers, and such like heavenly men, the lights and glory of our Churches, were all these factious and schismatical? In the presence of God it is well known they were were not. But our prelates have this prerogative, they may dubbe whom they please factious and schismatical, and after that, there is no redemption, they must be such, be they otherwise never so full of all grace.

2 Are all peaceable discreet men, which are placed in the deprived ministers stead? For the best of them, they are still as great eye• sores to our Bishops almost as the other: because they reprove a great deal of Episcopal darkness, by their practices. For the rest, the congregations over whom they are set, cannot find it, the voice of all the country is otherwise for many of them; yet according to the Prelates measure, who meat (as it seemeth) the virtues and vices of a minister by certain ceremonies of their own imposing, it cannot be denied, but the most of them are very peaceable & discreet: Even so as many of the Bishops themselves were known to be afore they were Bishops, and show themselves to be still: for Episcopatus plures accepit quam fecit bonos.

3 What sense can this have, The Bishop depriveth Titius respectively, that he may constitute Sempronius? Doth he know beforehand whom he shall constitute? then there is gross legerdemaine, betwixt him and that Sem•ronius. For with what conscience can one seek and the other assign the place of him that is in possession? This is but some time in those benefices which are fatter, and whose patrons are more foolish. Ordinarily, the vilest minister that is to be found, may succeed in the place of him that is deprived, for ought the Bishop knoweth, or for ought he can do, except he will endure a quare impedit, which in case of moral unworthiness, hath scarce been ever heard of.

4 The charge which he saith our Bishops have of appointing Ministers, I wonder from whence they have it, or by what conveyance. They say that they themselves are the proper pastors of all the parishes in their Diocese. It is well, if they have an ubiquitary faculty, and will, to perform the office of pastors to so great a people: but who made them such? Christ and his Apostles never knew of ordinary pastors, having charge of so many Churches. But suppose they did, by whom doth Christ call one of our Bishops? by the Kings congedelie, the Chapters nominal election, or by the Arch-bishops consecration? There is none of these that can bear the trial of scripture, nor of the Primitive Churches example?

6 Is the Bishops power of appointing a minister no ways determinate to this or that minister? then it seemeth his mere will determineth of the particular person, without any just reason. For if there be certain causes or reasons which the Bishop is bound to follow in designing of this or that minister, rather than another, then is the Bishop determinate. The Council of Nice it self determined the authority even of Patriarchs in this case: viz. that the Elders should first nominate fit men 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 secondly that the people should elect or choose out of that number, per 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 : and thirdly, that the Bishop should confirm the elected 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Socrat. l. •. p. 177. What exorbitant power is this then which our Bishops do now-a-days challenge unto themselves? All Classical Divines do consent to that which Junius setteth down, Conc. 5. l. 2. c. 6. n. 73. that no Bishop can send or appoint a minister sine certa ac justa ecclesiae postulatione, without the certain fore-choice of the Church: Id enim esset obtrudere non mittere. For that were to obtrude him, not to send him.

6 How is the course of God's plow preserved, when for the most part the succeeding minister is thrust upon the people against their wills, and so pernicious contentions arise, of which the Bishop is cause procreant and conservant, by depriving the people of their minister, and obtruding his own minister upon them, and upholding him in all those courses whereby he grieveth the poor people.

7 As the Minister hath no faculty in himself to appoint a successor, so hath not the Bishop neither of himself, and by himself.

Thus much for the defendant his case. Whereas he addeth, that Beza and Mr. Cartwright determined with him in case of the Surplice. I answer, 1. they did not so for the cross. 2. they did not so for subscription to either. 3. they did not so but by way of toleration, requiring also that men did speak against the imposing of the Surplice. 4. Beza was not thoroughly acquainted with the state of our Church. Mr. Cartwright (as I have been certainly informed by his own son) recalled that passage of his book, and desired that his revoking of it might be made known.

I thought good, overseeing the Press, to confirm the Authors report, by a more particular relation which I have received from a person of good credit, set down in writ as followeth.

MR. Cartwright being beyond the seas, in printing the rest of his 2. Reply, wherein that indulgence is, sent to the Ministers of England who sought reformation with him, for their opinion of the use of the Surplice in case of deprivation: 22 of whom met thereabout; of whom 19 jointly agreed that it was simply unlawful in any case, but the other three said otherwise; wherefore it was agreed by all, that each part should write their opinion and their reasons to him, which they did: but the letter of the nineteen miscarried, and that of the other three was delivered, which he taking as the letter of the whole, supposed their joint consent had been, that the loss of the ministry altered the case of the unlawfulness, and so that they were all against him; whereupon he mistrusting his own judgment, and being much perplexed thereabout, suffered himself to be swated unto what is there written: but afterward understanding the right, he was much more perplexed; yea (as he said) more then ever he was, in that to the great prejudice of the truth, he had suffered his conscience to be so defiled, which was forbidden, 1. Cor. 8. 7. which he heartily sorrowed to many, professing that if he again put pen to paper about that subject, he would clear the cause, and blame himself, praying them to signify the same freely in the mean time, the which they did, so that it ever since hath been currant among all his friends, and constantly, affirmed by them to all on due occasions, and particularly affirmed to M. Sprint by a Gentleman in the presence of one Nobleman, two Gentlemen, 27. ministers, and many professors, in his course, in the scanning his book then about to be printed divers years before it was printed; sundry also of those ministers avouched the same, some on their own knowledge, others upon undoubted testimony, which yet is ready to be avouched in due case of need, and should now be expressed, were not the naming of the avouchers dangerous unto them, and so not to be done without their knowledge, which now cannot be.

For the point it self, when a man doth but stand in doubt betwixt using the ceremonies, and suffering of deprivation, it must needs be more safe, patiently to suffer himself to be thrust from his ministry, then to retain it and offend his conscience by using the ceremonies. For to be restrained by authority from his lawful function, because he will not yield to the doing of that which to him is sin, is no more sin in the sufferer, then to surcease his public preaching whilst he is held in prison, where he wanteth occasion. Thus the use of that is avoided, which he disalloweth, and the blame of leaving his standing, is theirs who cast him from thence, and not his. So no sin is committed either in the use of that he disalloweth, or in sustaining deprivation. But to hold his place, and to practice against conscience, is to commit one great sin at the least.

Thus having examined the Defend, his adventurous charges of false, presumptuous, irreligious, partial, and pernicious, I find them all to be but rash words of distemper.

SECT. XV.

IN the last place, the Defendant bringeth forth to answer the words of the Apostle, 1. Thess. 5. 22. Abstain from all appearance of evil. But as this argument is not found at all in that page of the Abridgement which he citeth, so in the words or sense which he setteth down, I dare say it is not used either of them, or any other against the ceremonies. Yet let us hear his answer. The Apostle speaketh (saith he) of the opinions of private men. But 1. what warrant hath he to restrain a general precept, when the vniversalitie of it agreeth with the law? Abstain from all appearance, saith the Apostle: 1. saith the Def. from some private opinions. 2. Why must appearance of evil be needs understood of opinions only? two or three interpreters indeed do understand it of doctrine most properly: but the most otherwise; & the word translated appearance, signifying rather an object of seeing then of hearing, leads us rather to the eye, as in actions, gesturs, garments, then to the ear in doctrines. 3. For that which he addeth of private men's opinions, there is no circumstance of the text, nor any reason or authority that doth warrant such a gloss.

SECT. XVII.

AMONG his accusations wherein he chargeth us with manifold scandals, the first is, that some weak ones by occasion of these differences, stand amazed, and so become more remiss in profession of religion. Where 1. it is to be observed, that when we spake of weak-ones sect. 12. it was put off with this pretence, that they were such as we had catechised. Now then, who are these weak ones? I hope the Bishops provide that people of their Dioceses are well catechised: whence then is this weakness. 2. Differences in matters of circumstance are not wont to breed scandal, until some authority enjoin uniformitie, as we may see in the primitive churches. 3. If differences be the occasion of this scandal, surely those that differ from us, may as well be accused therefore, as we that differ from them, especially when we urge nothing of ours upon them, but they impose their own devices upon us, and so are causes of the differences. 4. the amazement which some have, wondering what will be the event of differences, is no damnable error, which by the Def. is required to a scandal, sect. 1. And if they grow remiss in religion upon it, that is their sin. I am sure zeal against superstition, and for pure and undefiled worship, hath no fitness in it to work remissness in religion: but urging of human devices in God's worship, tendeth directly thither.

SECT. XVIII.

THE second charge of scandal, is in respect of the Separatists. Where 1. I ask, if Gaius had made a separation from the Church wherein Diotrephes lived, whether the Apostle John had been cause of that scandal, because he condemned his abuse of excommunication. 3. John. 9. 10. 2. If any separate from Churches where Images are retained, who is the cause, they that dislike of Images, or they that retain them? 3. The dislike of ceremonies is not the chief cause for which separation is made: but the intolerable abuses which are in Ecclesiastical Courts: by which it cometh to pass, that many poor men being troubled at the first for a small thing, afterward are driven to fly the country: and flying with a hatred of such courses, are ready to receive that impression which is most opposite unto them. The thing it self is plain enough to all indifferent men, that Ecclesiastical corruptions urged and obtruded, are the proper occasion of separation.

SECT. XIX. XX.

IN the next place the Papists are alleged as persons offended by Non-conformity, because they are utterly unperswadeable to enter into a Church where all ancient rites are professedly rejected. But 1. the refusing of conformity by the Ministers, do not, I hope, make these ancient rites (much less all) to be professedly rejected by our Church. For then we may plead the profession of our mother as well as the Defendant: which he I am sure will not grant. 2. This assertion which is given as a reason, is evidently false. For in Scotland, France, the Low-countries, and such like Churches, where none of these ceremonies are retained, the power of God's word (which doth not depend on human ceremonies) is as effectually to the conversion of Papists, as in England. 3. How doth this agree with that which the Defendant hath so often told us, that our ceremonies are not the same with the Papists ceremonies: and that the Papists have no great conceit of our ceremonies, cap. 2. sect. 1. 4. If our contentions about these things be a scandal to the Papist, let them look to it that cast these apples of contention into the Church, under the pretense of peace and uniformitie. 5. One minister without conformity, as old Mr. Midsly of Ratsdell, who was after silenced for his labor, hath converted more Papists then any (I might say then all) of the Bishops in England, with all his ceremonial observations. 6. It is well known that there are far more Papists and Popishly affected in those places where ceremonies are most observed, then where they have been disused. 7. It is answered in the Abridgement, pag. 47. 48. that ceremonies are not for the edification of the Papists, but for the hardening of them. And that Papists are not so much to be respected as brethren. To the latter of which words, the Defendant replieth with a descant upon the term Brethren, sect. 20. but saith nothing at all to the purpose. 8. What manner of converts they are usually who are addicted to human ceremonies, we may see in the Archbishop of Spalato, and such others.

SECT. XXI.

THE greatest scandal of all (saith the Defend.) is against the Church. Now this Non-conformists are made guilty of two ways: 1. comparatively in this section, and then absolutely in the next. The comparative accusation is, that we for avoiding of offense towards our brethren, grievously offend our mother, in that wherein we owe obedience unto her. Where 1. the question is taken for granted, for we deny that we owe obedience in the ceremonies to any man or society of men. 2. If our mother be somewhat angry, that is not presently a scandal by his definition, sect. 1. but when she is provoked to a mortal error. Now what mortal error do we provoke the Church to? Our desire and scope is, that the ceremonies should be either wholly removed, or else left free to use or disuse: this is no mortal error, I hope. The event by accident is the silencing, depriving, excluding, and molesting of us for Non-conformity: This indeed is a great error and sin of the Prelates; but as was formerly shown, the beginning of it is in their irregular Canons, and the ending of it, in their cruel executions. 3. by applying our selves to the will of the Prelates in these ceremonies, we should, though not anger, yet greatly scandalize them, by confirming them in a sin of making their own will a rule to the Churches, even in mystical ceremonies of superstitious worship, contrary to their and our daily prayer, Thy will be done. 4. The convocation doth not carry herself like a mother toward us: neither do we acknowledge any such honor to belong unto it. As for the faithful congregations of England, the greatest part of them would willingly be rid of these burdens.

The rest of this Section is nothing pertinent: yet two things may be noted in it. 1. An error that the number of the lewish Proselytes was great, and the converted Gentiles few, Acts 15. 2 A gross assertion, that after the doctrine of Indifferency in eating of meats, was made public by the Church, then to have sought by abstaining to avoid the offense of some, had been to the prejudice of Christian liberty, and to the scandal of the Church.

The other accusation of contempt is only objected sect. 22. and varnished over with a few glosing words sect. 23. and therefore may well be answered with contempt. But he that will see a full refutation of this, let him read Mr. Parker chap. 5. sect. 11. 12. I am weary of wrestling with the wind: yet one unworthy and unchristian taunt I cannot pass by, that he upbraideth the Ministers with, living upon voluntary contribution, and fear of offending their maintainers. For 1. when as he confesseth, he hath no windows to look into men's consciences by, what rule of religion will permit him to cast upon his brethren such a suspicion contrary to their profession, of practicing and speaking against their consciences for gaining of a poor contribution? Is there not far more cause to think, that great livings, and worldly honors (one of the choicest darts that Satan hath in his quiver, & therefore tried against our Savior himself when all other faild, Mat 4. 8 9) is it not more likely I say that these promotions bear more sway in the minds of our great Prelates, then a poor supply of necessaries with others? 2 Neither all, nor the most part of them against whom he writeth did live upon contributions. Though they need not have been ashamed thereof if they had:

seeing not only the primitive Pastors did so, but even in our time, M. Perkins and other such lights of our Church, have with that kind of life done more good then all our Cathedral men with their great revenues. 3 Who are the cause that many are forced to live upon contribution? have not the Literers of Cathedral Churches engrossed a great part of that maintenance whereby labouring Preachers should be maintained? Do not our Pluralists and Non-residents carry away the fat of the greatest livings, and leave scarce a Serving-man's wages to their Curats; so that either they must be supplied by contribution, or else by begging? Nay, do not the people in divers places take it for a great courtesy at the Non-residents hands, if he will take his Tithes, and suffer them to procure and maintain to themselves an honest Minister in his place? have not our Honorable Parliament offered to provide some competent maintenance for the Ministers, if the Clergy would forbear their sinful excesses? 4. Why should the Ministers depend so much upon contribution, if they had such accommodatiue consciences, as this Def. surmiseth of them? Some of them with serving the time, and the addition of Simony, might come to be Bishops: & the rest might be preferred by their means to some certain in-comings.

CHAP. VI.

SECT. III.

NOW we are come to the sixth and last general Argument, viz. that the imposition of these ceremonies is opposite unto Christian liberty. Here the Def. observeth first that the state of this question is about liberty from the necessary observation of such things as are in their own nature indifferent. This (saith he) the Objector implieth. But I answer, the Objector doth not imply it: he speaketh of ceremonies lawfully appointed by man, that these are to be used as things indifferent. Neither if one private Obj. had granted it, ought it therefore to be set down as the received state of the question, seeing the Abridgment, which in this defense is chiefly opposed, doth everywhere deny the cerem. to be in their own nature indifferent. But let that pass & examine his resolution. There be two kinds of necessities incident unto human precepts and ordinances, in the case of indifferency: one is necessity of obedience to the command (ϕ) which cannot properly prejudice Christiin (ϕ) : the other is doctrinall necessity: when any of those properties which are essential unto divine Ordinances are attributed unto a human constitution: as I immediately to

- 1 inde the conscience: 2 to be a necessary means to salvation: 3 to hold it altogether unalterable by the authority of man: this is a presumption and prevarication, not only against Christian liberty, but also against the sovereignty of God himself.

But I what meaneth this new distinction betwixt necessite doctrinal and obediencial? doctrinal before p. 3 was opposed unto ceremoni now unto obediencial; both without a logic, or sound reason. 2 He should have told us what kind of necessite obediencial he meaneth: for B. ll. de. pont. rom. l. 4 c. 17, useth the same pretence of obedience, and alledgeth the same places of Scripture for it: and yet is confuted by Junius, Whitaker's and our Divines. 3 If there be doctrinal necessity, in all those human constitutions, which have properties attributed unto them essential unto divine ordinances, then our ceremonies in controversy not only have such a mystical signification attributed unto them as is proper unto divine Ordinances; but also that they are imposed as parts of God's worship. 4 For the three properties, which the Def. mentioneth, they are such as Papists in imposing of their ceremonies (which yet by the judgment of all our Divines deprive men of Christian liberty) do disclaim. As for immediate binding of men's consciences, no learned Papish useth such a phrase. Azorius a Jesuit ϕ. m.r. parte 1, lib. 5 cap. 6, saith expressly that human laws do not bind, direct, proxime, & per se; directly, immediately, and of themselves. Bellarmine also, de Rom. pont. l. 4, cap. 20 ad arg. 9, saith as much; leges humanae non obligant sub poena mortis, nisi quatenus violatione legis human offend•• Deus. i. e. they do not immediately bind men's consciences. For necessity to salvation, the same, Bellarmine de verb. non script c. 11 saith plainly▪ That those things which are simply necessary unto salvation are set down in Scripture; and that the rest are not simply necessary. And it is plain enough that they do not hold them altogether unalterable by that authority which brought them in: for beside, that no reasonable man can deny so manifest a truth, they have altered many ancient Rites, as all the learned know. So that the Defendant his distinction is proved nothing else but a confusion, common to him with the Papists, to our ceremonies and theirs.

SECT. III. V.

IN the 4 Section, the Def. objecteth to himself under the name of the Abridgement, the words of the Apostle, 1 Cor. 7. 35, This I speak to your profi•e, not that I might cast a snare upon you, showing that the imposition of necessity upon things indifferent, is a very snare of men's consciences. Now though these words are not in the Abridgement, yet because as D. Whitaker's saith, de pont. de pont. c. 4 qu. 7•aureus bic locus est, nostrae libertatis vindex; this is a golden charter of liberty; therefore it is worthy of due consideration. The sum of the Def. his answer is, that to impose a necessity where God hath left a liberty, is indeed a snare: but this necessity is not taught in our Church. I answer, it is taught in our Church (now a days) that Ecclesiastical canons do bind men's consciences. It is taught in our Church that man's will is a sufficient reason for these canons about ceremonies. It is taught in our Church, that Sacraments may not be administered, or God publicly served without these ceremonies: that Ministers called and allowed of God for these ceremonies must be silenced; that they are to be excommunicated ips• facto, and accursed which oppose themselves unto them. It is taught also, that though a man doubt•• in his conscience of the lawfulness of them, though evident scandal will follow upon the using of them, yet they may not be omitted. If this be not necessity enough to ensnare a man's conscience, I know not what then is.

In the fifth Section two places are objected out of the Abridgement, viz. Gal. 1, Col. 2. 20, and one of them after a fashion answered. The first answer is, that the Apostle there speaketh only of Jewish rites, which is Bellarmine's answer just, de e••. sacr. c. 32 loquitur Paulus de servitute judaica, qua serpiant illi sub antiqu• lege. The second answer is, that the Apostles meaning was of such an observation of these ceremonies as had an opinion of necessity, overthrowing the New Testament, and establishing the old. So Bellarmine. ϕ illi cum circumcidi vellent, excidebant a gratia Christi, & simul obligabant se ad omnem legem servandam, quod erat prorsus re••e ad s•atum veteris testamen•. We on the other side with Daneus against that place of Bell. say generate est Pau•• dictum & prece••um; the words are general, belonging to all parts of Christian liberty, though principally there applied to one.

Now the servitude from which Christ hath made us free is not only in those things which the Def. speaketh of, but also as Iun. con. 3 l. 4 c. 17 n. 19 & 21, showeth in subjection of our consciences unto elements of man's appointing, Gal. 4 10, and unto the will of men, 1 Cor. 7 23, which place Beza well noteth, is to be understood of superstitions which some do foolishly call indifferent things. It is not only therefore a freedom from Jewish ceremonies, but also and even therefore as D. Whitaker's gathereth from all human ceremonies that bind or press our consciences, Whit. de rom. pont. q. 7 c. 3 ad 5. But it is in vain for me to allege our Divines in this question: the Abridgement alledgeth diverse, whom the Def. would not vouchsafe an answer.

One thing here the Def. noteth, that in the Abridgement mystical and carnal are unsoundly confounded. But I say this is unsoundly collected: for these two are joined together there only in respect of Jewish worship, and that which imitateth it: And therefore it is to no end to instance in the Sacraments instituted by Christ, of clear signification, and accompanied with the promise and lively working of the Spirit. The same poor instance hath Bellarmino de cult. l. 3 c. 7 for significant ceremonies.

But it savoreth of the flesh (saith the Def.) to call our ceremonies carnal. Why so I pray? the Jewish ceremonies deserved that name, you yourself say, even when they were in force: and surely ours devised by man, abused by idolaters, without necessary use, destitute of all promise and spirit, are far more worthy to be called carnal, then God's own Ordinances. Those were only carnal because in comparison they were external, heavy, dull things: but ours are more heavy and dull, and beside they are sinfully carnal, as hath been proved.

But what soundness doth this savor of, that the Def. saith generally of the Jewish ceremonies, they signified first and primarily outward and carnal promises, shadowing heavenly things only under $\langle \phi \rangle$ second veil? I will not exagitat this assertion, because it is in the by.

SECT. VI.

HEere an objection is feigned out of the Abridgement p. 34, I say feigned, because there is none such found in the place quoted. That which is there spoken concerning other Popish ceremonies, is a sixth proof of the second Argument, distinct from the fifth, whereto that of Christian liberty doth belong. That also is handled by the Def. c. 3 l. 7, and there maintained against him. So that this might well be omitted. Yet because there is some force in the consequence, let us hear his Defense. The objection which he frameth is this: If these ceremonies do not take away our Christian liberty, and ensnare the consciences of men, by their imposition; how shall not the Popish ceremonies be excusable, and free from accusation in this behalf? His answer is, that Popish ceremonies do infringe Christian liberty both in regard of their nature, and also in regard of their number. And of both these M. Calvin giveth witness. I answer 1 for the nature, it hath been shown before, that a multitude of Popish ceremonies have no other nature and necessity allowed unto them by the learned Papists, then ours have by the Defendant himself. See for this Bellarmino de effect. sacr. c. 30. That which M. Calvin saith of this point is true notwithstanding in regard of the conceit which is commonly among the simple Papists, fostered by unlearned Monks, Friers, and other Priests, for filthy lucre sake. 2

The comparisons which M. Calvin use, viz. That it is held among the Papists a greater wickedness to omit auricular Confession, then to live impiously; eat flesh on fasting days, then to live in fornication; to work on Saints holy-days, then to act mischief, &c. These he gathereth principally from that practice of the Papists, whereby they punish more severely the breach of their ceremonies than of God's law. Now this is not only practiced by our Prelates, but also maintained by this Defendant, chap. 2 sect. 12, with such fair pretence, as the Papists may well use for the defense of their practice. 3 As for the multitude of ceremonies among the Papists, that maketh their bondage greater thē ours; but doth it make ours none at all? Besides, when a few mystical human ceremonies are admitted, the gate is let open for a multitude: even until the Convocation will say there be too many. For Bellarmino himself will grant that ceremonies are not to be multiplied over much. Fatemur ceremonias non esse nimis multiplicandas de eff. sacr. c. 30, but what is too much, that must be left to the judgment of the Church or Convocation, saith he, and the Defendant both.

SECT. VII. VIII. IX. X.

IN all these Sections, the Def. goeth about to teach us the doctrine which concerneth binding of men's consciences. In the first his conclusion is good and sound, God therefore and not man doth properly and directly bind the conscience of man. It is sufficient therefore to note that it is an improper phrase to say that men's laws do bind men's consciences, in respect that God commandeth to obey the just laws of men: for so, as Gerson observeth, the Physicians praescripts should also bind a sick man's conscience, in respect of God's will, whereby a sick man is tied to follow the good and wholesome counsel of his Physician.

In the 8 Section two of our Divines are brought in to prove that men are bound in conscience to observe the just laws of Magistrates, which none of us ever doubted of.

The 9 Section is spent in proving, that Ecclesiastical laws have as great force in respect of conscience as political. Which if it be granted, yet nothing can from thence be concluded for the advantage of ceremonies unlawfully imposed. But 1 it is diligently to be observed, that the Church hath no commission for to make any laws properly so called: as I have formerly shown in cap. 1 sect. 16. 2 the common received opinion of all our Divines is contrary to that which the Defendant here saith: as may be seen in Bellarmino de Pont. Rom. l. 4 c. 15, and Junius, Whitakers, with the rest, who writing against Bellarmino do not deny but defend that which he saith, Lutherani & Calvinistae omnes docent. 3 The interrogatories which the Defendant ministereth unto us in this case doth not prove his Assertion. For the Church is a Society, but not complete, if it be considered as not comprehending Christ the Head and only Law maker of it. Breach of peace is not a sin against an Ecclesiastical, but a divine law. Obedience is to be yielded unto lawful Ecclesiastical Governors, when they bring the charge of Christ whose Ministers they are. See D. Whitaker's de pont. Rom. cont. 4 q. 7 c. 2 ad 12. The Kings stamp, but with an act of Parliament maketh a law in England. As for Apostolical constitutions (to which our canons are as like as Apples are to Oysters) the same answer which Doctor Whitaker's, contra 4 q. 7 c. 2 ad 5. with other of our Divines giveth to Bellarmino, may serve for our Defendant.

In the 10 sect. he setteth down nothing but that which he knoweth we all grant.

SECT. XI.

AGAINST the Accusation of contempt, there was (as it seemeth) alleged by M. Nic. that by the same reason that Non-conformity is contempt; bowling, disusing of capps, and such habits prescribed should be contempt. Here the Defendant first bringeth divers interpretations out of the Casualists: and then taketh one for granted without rendering of any reason, that he may by it excuse bowling and disuse of capps. But what if we take hold of another interpretation, esteeming the obligation by the intent of the Law-makers, which was against Popish Recusancie of our Communion-book, and not against refusal of some few ceremonies contained therein? I speak now of the Statute Law, not of lawless canons. Or what if we should stand upon that interpretation, which fetcheth the obligation from the weight of the matter imposed, which in our ceremonies is very little? Some of these I am sure the Bishops must fly, if they will defend their disuse of the Crosier staff, which they are bound by our Laws as well to use, as the Ministers are surplusses.

But all this is needless, because there can be no contempt in a conscionable forbearance of unlawful impositions; such as the ceremonies are sufficienaly proved to be.

SECT. XII.

HEere certain Divines are brought in witnessing, 1 that superstitious opinions do deprive men of Christian liberty: which we deny not, but take their testimonies as making against our ceremonies: because as I have formerly shown some of these superstitious opinions are inseparable from the imposing and using of them. 2 That Christian liberty doth not consist in the use or disuse of things indifferent: which we also willingly grant. But I would have the Defendant remember, that all freedom is not in the mind and conscience. For where the mind is free, the body may be bound; else Christians should not taste so much of this worlds misery as they do. Now Christ hath left unto us not only an inward liberty of mind and conscience, but also an outward freedom of our bodies and outward man, from such bodily rites in his worship as have not his stamp upon them, and his Spirit and blessing promised unto them. Of this the Defendant saith nothing at all.

SECT. XIII. XIII.

Concerning the profession of our Church so often brought in, enough hath been said before, now it sufficeth to answer, that no profession whatsoever can make human significant ceremonies in God's worship agree with Christian liberty.

As for superstition, which the Defendant doth now the second time most ridiculously object, I have answered in the beginning of this Confutation. Now only I note: 1 how loosely he describeth that superstition which he calleth affirmative: as if no man could use anything superstitiously, except he did hold that without it the faith of Christianity, or the true worship of God could not possible consist. Never was there such a description given by any man that considered what he said.

2 How manfully he concludeth our negative superstition, upon this ground, that Christ hath left these ceremonies free, which is the main question betwixt him and us.

3 How he mis-reporteth our opinion, in saving absolutely that we hold a Surplice to have unholiness and pollution in it: whereas we hold that it is only made more unfit for God's service then it was before through idolatrous abuse: but yet unto other us's it may be applied.

4 That instead of Scripture, he bringeth forth the universal practice of men in the Church: which yet hath been formerly also refuted.

5 That he can find no Divine that calleth opposing of ceremonies superstition, but only M. Calvin in one place speaking rhetorically, as he useth to do, and not intending any definition or distribution of that vice.

6 How he corrupteth P. Martyrs words, to have some color for a new accusation. P. Martyr taking there upon him the person of an adversary unto Hoopers opinion (with whom notwithstanding afterward he consented, and recalled the counsel which then he gave, as appeareth p. 1125) saith that if we should refuse all things that the Papists used, we should bring the Church into servitude: which assertion is most true, because the Papists abused many necessary things, even Christ's own Ordinances, the observing of which is liberty. Now the Def. would have that precisely understood, and that in the rigor of every word concerning the Surplice.

I have here subioyned apart an Epistle of Zanchius who otherways was somewhat favorable to Bishops: wherein the Reader may see his judgment concerning superstitious garments.

To the most renowned Queen Elizabeth, Defendresse of the Christian Religion, and most mighty Queen of England, France and Ireland H. Zanchius sendeth greeting.

MOST gracious and most Christian Queen, we have not without great grief understood, that the fire of contention about certain garments, which we thought had been quenched long ago, is new again to the incredible offense of the godly, as it were raised from hell, and kindled a fresh in your Majesty's Kingdom: and that the occasion of this fire is, because your most gracious majesty being persuaded by some, otherwise great men, and carried with a zeal (but certainly not according to knowledge) to retain unity in religion, hath now more then ever before resolved and decreed, yea doth will and command that all Bishops and Ministers of the Churches shall in divine service put on the white and linen garments which the Popish Priests use now in Popery; yea that it is to be feared, least this fire be so kindled, and cast its flame so far and wide, that all the Churches of that most large and mighty kingdom, to the perpetual disgrace of your most renowned Majesty, be set on a flaming fire: seeing the most part of the Bishops, men greatly renowned for all kind of learning and godliness, had rather leave their office and place in the Church, then against their own conscience, admit of such garments, or at the least signs of Idolatrie and Popish superstition, and so defile themselves with them, and give of fence to the weak by their example. Now what other thing will this be, then by retaining of these garments, to destroy the whole body of the Church. For without doubt that is Satan's intent, by casting a seed of dissensions amongst the Bishops. And that he aimed at in the infancy of the Church by stirring up discord between the East and West Churches, about the Passover and other ceremonies of that kind. Therefore Irenaeus Bishop of Lyons, had just cause in his Epistle sent out of France to Rome, sharply to reprove Victor the Pope of Rome, because he out of a kind of zeal, but not according to knowledge, was minded to excommunicate all the churches of Asia, because they celebrated not the Passover just at the same time, as they at Rome did. For this was nothing but by an unseasonable desire to retain the same ceremonies in all churches to rent and tear a pieces the unity of the Churches. I therefore so soon as I heard that so great a ruin hanged over the Church of Christ in that kingdom, presently, in respect of that duty which I owe to the Church of Christ, to your gracious Majesty, and to that whole kingdom, intended to write thither, and to try by my uttermost endeavor whether so great a mischief might possibly be withstood: some that fear Christ, and wish well to your Majesty, exhorting me to the performance of this duty. But when I had scarcely begun to think of this course, behold our most illustrious Prince commanded $\langle \diamond \rangle$ to do it, which command of his did not only spurr me one, who of mine owe accord was already running, but laid a necessity of writing upon me. Wherefore this my boldness will seem the less strange unto your gracious Majesty, seeing my writing proceedeth not so much from mine own will and counsel of friends, as from the commandment of my most Noble Prince, who is one of your gracious Majesty's special friends. Now I thought I should do a matter very worth the pains taking, if first I should humbly admonish your most famous Majesty what your duty is in this cause: and secondlie, if as your humble suppliant I should beseech you for our Lord Jesus Christ's sake, to perform the same. I beseech your gracious Majesty to take this my writing in good part, for it proceedeth from a Christian love toward the Church, and from an especial reverend respect that I bear to your most gracious Majesty. The Lord knoweth all things. Now to the matter in hand.

Whereas the Apostle writing to Timothy, commandeth that prayers be made for Kings, and all other that be in authority, and saith, that the end wherefore they be ordained, is, that we may lead a peaceable and quiet life in all (that is, perfect) godliness and honesty, he teacheth plainly enough what is the duty of godly Kings and Princes, namely, that they take care, and bring to pass, that first and above all things, true religion, and the true worship of God, where it is banished, be restored, and being restored, be kept pure: all things which smell of impiety being far removed. Secondly, that men may live honestlie and holilie, all kinds of uncleannesses being abandoned. Lastly, that public peace and holy friendship be maintained among the subjects, all occasions of contentious being, as much as possibly may be, taken out of the way.

As the Apostle teacheth manifestly, as we have seen, so all learned men who be of sound judgment concerning the Magistrates office, do with one consent affirm, that these be the three chief parts of the office of the Prince, and of every godly Magistrate. Which thing being so, I see not how your gracious Majesty can, with good conscience, propound again the garments in question, and other things of that kind, smelling as yet of Popish superstition, and once banished out of the Churches, to the consciences of the Bishops to be taken on again, and so propound them that you should compel them by your commandment to receive them again. For first, this is quite contrary to the first and chief part of the Princes office. For if the Magistrate ought to have a chief care, that the worship of God be kept pure and without mixture; and if for this cause all things are to be abandoned which may any way either by themselves, or by accident defile this worship: and therefore all things are to be called back as much as may be, to the rule of God, and to the former and Apostolical, and so the more pure and simple form of religion: Finallie, if as the Apostle commandeth, we be to abstain, not only from all evil, but also from all appearance of evil; to what end, I beseech you most renowned and most godly Queen, should those things be brought again into the Church of God, by the Princes commandment, which be contrary to the purity of the Apostolical worship, which smell of Popish superstition, which be neither available to the edification of the godly, nor to order, nor for ornament, except that which is whoorish: which lastly, can bring no profit, but on the contrary, many evils to the Church? It is out of all doubt, that by this law concerning apparel, all godly men will be offended, but the wicked will laugh in their sleeve, and hereby be put in hope to get many moe things: as for those of the middle sort, that is, such as be newlie converted and turned from ungodliness to godliness, and be not as yet well grounded, they will be in great danger, and if we speak according to man's judgment, they will rather look back to the old superstition, to which by nature we are inclined, then fixe and fasten their eyes upon true religion. And therefore this is $\langle \diamond \rangle$ a decree which will bring no advancement at all to godliness, but may much further ungodliness. For though these garments be not evil and unclean of and by themselves, that is, of their own nature, yet because of the former and late abuse, they are not altogether free from uncleanness. Certainly it cannot be denied, but that they will at the least, •give occasions of many evils and very grievous superstitions. Now the very occasions also of evils are to be shunned. To what end then should these be thrust upon the Church, from whom no profit can be hoped, very much evil may come? for this is to tempt God. Your famous Majesty may well remember, that not without cause it was written, He that toucheth pitch, shall be defiled with it: that the Apostle had reason to command, that we should purge out the old leaven, that a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. And that Hosea did not foolishly reprove the Jews, because they translated and brought a young graff (of superstitions) out of Israel into their own garden, that is, the true Church. We ought, most religious Queen, to have nothing at all to do with the Papists in matter of religion, save in those things which they have common with the Apostles. Why, I beseech you, were some kings, otherwise godly, reprov'd and blamed in the Scriptures, that they had not taken away Churches or Temples for divine service in the mountains, which were built by holy Fathers ere the building of the Temple, in which the Lord was wont to be worshipped? Surely, because the Temple being now built and ordained for divine service, God would not have any footsteps of any other chapel at all to be extant. Therefore also when once the kingdom of Christ was manifested, the ceremonies and garments of Aaron ought not anymore to take place. For this cause the Apostles were upon good ground careful, that after Christ's ascension, they should so be taken away, that no relics of them remained. And if they took them away holily, unholily have the Papists called them back again. Now whether it be better to follow the godly simplicity of the Apostles, or the ungodly pomp of the Papists, who is ignorant? This recalling of such Popish garments, your gracious majesty may believe me, will be a greater evil, then peradventure it may be seen, even to very wise men at the first blush: For me thinks I see and hear the Monks crying out with very loud voices in the Pulpits, both confirming their followers in their ungodlie religion, by the example of your gracious Majesty, and also saying, What? doth not even the Queen of England also, a most learned and a most prudent Princess, begin by little and little to come back to the religion of the holy Church of Rome, the most holy and sacred vestments of the Clergy men being taken on again? we are to be in good hope that the day will come, wherein she will a length, though now they be thought to be dead, recall also all the other rites and sacraments of the holy Church of Rome. These and such like words, no doubt, most prudent Queen, the Monks and Jesuits will use in the Pulpits. For they take all occasions to confirm their superstitions. Therefore to recall these stinking garments, and other rubbish of the Popish Church into the Church of Christ at this time, what is it but to give the Papists an occasion, and the best that may be, to confirm and harden themselves and their in their superstitions, and also to help them in this business? But let us hear what the Prophet said to Jehoshaphat King of Judah, when he helped Ahab; Darest thou help the wicked, and love those who hate the Lord? For this thing the wrath of the Lord is upon thee. And what other thing will this be, then even to call back the weak from the study of pure Religion, and to give them a privy warning to look back, and return into Egypt? It is an easy matter for us weak men, who of our own nature are prone to superstition, to slide back to impiety. Therefore occasions of sliding back to ungodliness, ought to be taken away, and at no hand to be given. And what else, I pray you, meant God in forbidding to plow with an Ox and an Ass, to sow the same field with diverse kinds of seeds, and to wear a garment woven of linen and woolen together? It is an odious and detestable thing with God, that the same field of the Lord should be tilled by ungodlie and godly Bishops together; If in the same Church Popish Doctrine be taught with the Doctrine of the Gospel; Finallie, if sacraments, ceremonies, and rites, partly Apostolic, and partly Popish, be used, and the Church be clothed with them as with a garment of linsey-wossey. For what agreement hath light with darkness? And therefore those things which be not of God, but from them who have defiled God's worship, are utterlie to be cast away, which the Lord himself commanded to be done, when he charged utterlie to destroy all things which appertained to those who should give us counsel to follow strange God's, and to burn their garments, and all their stuff with fire in the midst of the street, to show our detestation of such Seducers, and that they might be an execrable thing to the Lord. And who knoweth not that these garments are a part of the household stuff of that Romish Seducer? There shall cleave nothing of the execrable thing, saith he, to thy hand, that the Lord may turn from the fierceness of his wrath, and multiply thee, as he hath sworn to thy Fathers, &c. Wherefore to bring these garments, seeing they be the household stuff of Antichrist, into the Church of Christ, what is it else then to provoke God to anger, and to kindle his fury against us? Certain it is, that he who is a true friend of Christ, will never seek to have the ornaments of Antichrist in his own house, and much less will he suffer them in the Temple of Christ. For who can endure the arms of his enemy in his own house, and specially in the chiefest room of the same? And if God will have a thing destroyed and abolished, who are we that we dare build it up again. But it is God's will that after the death of Christ all garments of Aaron and Levi should be abolished: and he hath plainly enough manifested everywhere, that in these our days he would have all ungodly and vain ceremonies, pomps, deceits, and paintings of the Papists driven away by the shining brightness of the Gospel: because these things have no power in them to kindle and increase godliness, but greatly avail to the quenching of the same. Neither verily can I see to what other end these garments tend, then in very deed (that I may now come unto the second head) to defile and disgrace the fair face; nay, the whole body of the Church of England reformed according to the Gospel; as if the chaste and honest daughter of a King should be attired with those very garments wherewith some famous and notable whore used to be adorned, and when she were so clothed, were commanded to go abroad in the streets. Now who can allow or judge this to be tolerable? Wherefore though for no other, yet for this very cause, such garments ought not to be thrust upon the Church of Christ, because that harlot of Rome hath abused, and doth still at this day abuse them (though in their own nature they be not evil) to evil, and to cover her fornications, or rather to entice men to commit fornication. For all these pomps, and Popish ceremonies are nothing else but whoorish paintings invented and devised for this end, that men might thereby be allured to spiritual fornication. Is it not therefore a filthy and dishonest thing, to have these in the Church of Christ? If the brazen serpent, which had been ordained of God, and that for the wholesome use of the Israelites, was taken away by godly King Hezekiah, because the Israelites had abused it contrary to the word of God: and if Hezekiah be highly commended for this so doing, because he had •ned that Serpent into ashes, and commanded them to be cast into the running water, that there might never be any print or sign of it extant anymore; how much more then are these unclean garments to be banished out of the Church of God, seeing the Apostles never used them, but the whore of Rome hath used them in her Idolatrous worship, and to seduce men? For it is a very dishonest thing, that such things as are of themselves indifferent, and have been long used to the dispight and dishonor of God, should be retained in the Church of God, to the hazard of the salvation of godly men. And much less that kind of garments, which is nothing but an invention of men, or rather of the Devil himself, devised to seduce the simple ones. We all know what praise those common-wealths deserve, which make good laws that the subjects shall not wear outlandish and strange apparel, nor bring it into the Common-wealths, because it is a corruption of good and honest manners, and of the Common-wealths themselves. How then can that counsel which is given to your Majesty, be commended, to wit, that garments unknown to the Christian world in tht time of the Apostles, and Apostolical men, should be brought into the Church of Christ. A•d if an out-landish kind of attire be not tolerated in well-governed Common-wealths▪ how much less are Idolatrous, and heathenish garments to be borne with in the Church, where God is to be worshipped in spirit and truth, and where he would have few and very simple ceremonies? Also if God established by his Law, that a woman may not put on a man's apparel, not a man a woman's, the one being so well of it self dishonest, and contrary to nature as the other: Why then should godly Bishops, and the servants of Christ be clothed, or rather shamed and deformed with the garments of godless Priests, and slaves of Antichrist? Why should we not rather, as we be of a divers religion from them, so also be discerned from them, at least in the performance of such duties as belong unto God's worship, by outward signs, such as garments be? Verilie this was God's will, and he required of his people, that it should be discerned from the profane Gentiles, as by other things, so also by a divers sort of apparel, and so should profess by this public sign, that it would have nothing to do with the Gentiles.

And why should not we do the same? Are we not the people of God? abides not the equity of the same commandemet? And if the word honest be derived of honor, what honor will it be for the Church of Christ to have Bishops attired and disguised with Popish visors in the administration of the Gospel and Sacraments, so as they shall rather be derided then be revered any whit by the people? And what commendation shall it be for your gracious Majesty in true Churches, and among true believers, that you permit such trifles to be called back into your Church? Therefore it standeth not with honesty, that holy Bishops be compelled to receive such visors, neither is it indeed a matter worthy of honor and praise, neither deserveth it the name of virtue. For if your Majesty should command that all English men, leaving that ancient and very grave and comely attire, should wear Turkey coats, or a soldiers weed, as it is called: who would ever approve this decree as honest? And it is much less praise-worthy, if godly Bishops be enjoined, laying aside, or at least changing the honest and ancient apparel, which the Apostles wore, to wit, that common and grave habit, to put on the ridiculous and execrable or accursed garments of godless Mass-priests.

Now concerning the third part of the Princes duties, there is nothing fitter to trouble the public peace of the Church then this counsel. For every noveltie, especially in religion, either by it self, if it be evil, disturbs and troubles a good peace, or if it be good, gives occasion of trouble by accident, by causing contention between evil and good men. But as in things which be good of themselves, of which nature the reformation of the Churches according to the will of God is, we are not to care for the troubling of that ungodly peace, that is of the world (for Christ came not by his Gospel to keep such a peace, but rather to take it away, and to send a sword) so assuredly, by the urging of things indifferent, to trouble the peace of Churches, and to cause strife between good men and bad, yea between godly men themselves, is so wicked, that it can by no means be defended, so that Irenaeus had just cause to reprove Victor Bishop of Rome, for this cause, as hath been said afore. For it must needs be, that at such times the Churches be rent in pieces, then which thing, what is more hurtful? Many examples in the histories of the Church prove this which I say. How many and how great troubles arose in the Primitive Church, between those who beside the Gospel urged also circumcision and the law, and between those who upon good ground rejected them? And how great evils would this dissention have brought to the Church of Christ, had not the Apostles betime withstood them by that council gathered together at Jerusalem, by a lawful examination and discussing of the cause by manifest testimonis of the Scriptures, and by sound reasons? If your gracious Majesty (as you ought) desire both to be and to seem Apostolic, then imitate the Apostles in this matter. Neither lay and impose this yoke upon the necks of Christ's Disciples yourself, nor suffer it to be imposed by others. But if you see that the Bishops disagree about this matter among themselves, assemble a Synod, and cause this controversy to be examined by the Scriptures. And then look what shall be proved by plain testimonies, and strong reasons, propound that to be observed by all, and command by your decree that that be observed, and so take disagreement out of the Church. For your gracious Majesty ought to be very careful, that there be no innovation in religion, but according to the word of God. By this means shall a true peace, concord and unity of the Churches be preserved. But if the proceeding be otherwise, what other thing will it be, then to take away unity, and to trouble the Christian peace? And this I may not pass over with silence, that by this noveltie of the business, not only the public peace shall be troubled in that kingdom, but also many else-where out of that kingdom will have occasion given them to raise new contentions in Churches, and that to the great hindrance of godliness, and the more slow proceeding of the Gospel. For all men know, that the most part of all the Churches, who have fallen from the Bishop of Rome, for the Gospels sake, do not only want, but also abhor those garments, and that there be some Churches, though few in comparison of the former, which do as yet retain those garments invented in Popery, as they very stiffly retain some other things also, because the reformers of those Churches, otherwise worthy men, and very faithful servants of Christ, durst not at the first (neither judged they it expedient) utterly abolish all Popish things. But as the common manner is, every man likes his own best. Now I call those things a man's own, not so much which every man hath invented, as those beside, which every man chooseth to himself, receiveth, retaineth, and pursueth, though they be invented to his hand by others. But if there be also annexed the examples of other men, they be more and more hardened in them, and are not only hardened, but also do their uttermost endeavor by word and writing, to draw all the rest to be of their mind? Therefore we easily see what the issue will be, if your gracious Majesty admit of that counsel which some do give you, to take on apparel, and other more Popish things besides. For some men, who be not well occupied, being stirred up by the example of your Majesty, will write books and disperse them throughout all Germany, of these things which they call indifferent, to wit, that it is lawful to admit of them, nay that they be altogether to be retained, that Papists may be the less estranged and alienated from us, and so we may come the nearer to concord and agreement. As if forsooth the Papists, though we for peace sake admitted of all those things, would ever amend their Doctrine, and banish out of their Churches, or at any hand lay down their false and godless decrees, manifest and abominable superstitions and idolatries: and there will be some who will answer such books once dispersed. So of this English fire there will rise a new burning flame in Germany and France, on which hot coles the Papists as so many Smiths a forging, will sprinkle cold water to make the flame the more vehement. And is not this a goodly benefit? Who therefore doth not see that this counsel tends to the troubling of all Churches.

To conclude, that golden saying of a certain learned man is very true and certain, and approved by long experience, that indifferent things, that is, the question about indifferent things, is that golden apple of contention. So much shall suffice to have spoken of the troubling of public peace; what should I say of the consciences of private believers? It is manifest, that they are greatly troubled with this commandment, to put on these linen garments. For they do so greatly complain, that their lamenting voices & groans do reach unto, and are heard in Germany. Now how grievous and distasteful an offense it is to trouble the consciences of the godly, the holy Scripture showeth: partly when it commandeth that we make not the holy Spirit sad, neither offend the weak ones▪ partly when it threateneth grivous punishments against those who fear not to do these things: partly also when it propoundeth the examples of the Saints, and specially of Paul, who speaks thus; If meat offend my brother, Ile eat no flesh while the world standeth, that I may not offend my brother. For in those words he giveth a general rule, by his example, taken out of the doctrine of Christ, to wit, that no indifferent thing is to be admitted and yielded unto, much less to be urged upon others, and least of all to be commended by decree: if in the admitting, urging & commanding of it, the minds of good men, and consciences of the faithful be offended, for a tender conscience, which feareth God, is a thing most precious and acceptable to God. How therefore can that counsel be approved, which would have a law established and proclaimed by the Princes command for the use of garments to be used by Ministers in the ministry. For (to speak many things in few words) if such garments be to be propounded to the faithful, they are to be propounded either as indifferent, or as necessary: If the later, we do vngodlily, because we make those things necessary, which Christ would have to be free: If the former, then are they to be left free to the Churches. But by commanding and compelling, we make things that be free and indifferent, to be necessary, and so fall into the same trespass. Moreover, either they be ordained of God by Moses, or they be delivered by Christ God manifested in the flesh, or they be ordained by the holy Ghost working and speaking in the Apostles, or they are of men, either godly or wicked. Those ceremonies and Levitical garments, which were ordained of God by Moses, ought all of them to have an end after the death of Christ, as the scriptures show plainly, especially the Epistles of Paul to the Coloss. and Hebr. therefore they cannot be revoked & called back without the transgression of God's will. It cannot be said that Christ taught them, because there is no word extant to that end, but rather he taught plainly oftentimes, that all Moses his ceremonies were ended. And the same I affirm concerning the Apostles. It remains therefore that they be said to be of men. If they be from godly men, then were they ordained of them, either to edification, or for order and comeliness. But they avail not to edification, that is, to further comeliness, but rather tend to the overthrow of it, as we saw before; neither for any good order, but rather they tend to disorder, for there is a confusion of godly and wicked Bishops, whereas it is meet and equal, that one of them be discerned from anothe, even by their garments also. Neither do they make Christ's spouse comelie, as we shown a little before. Therefore we ought not to yield unto them. And such things as have been invented by men, void of God's spirit, do nothing appertain to us. Lastly, the Apostles used not these garments. For we have no authentic testimony. Now the Church is to be fashioned after the rule of that Apostellicall Church in ceremonies and garments, as well as in Doctrine. What do we then with these garments in the Church? By whose authority can they be approved? What profit or wholesome use can the Christian people have by them? But on the contrary we have shown that godliness is weakened by them, the pure worship of God is violated, Popish superstition is by little and little called back, the godly be offended, the wicked be confirmed and hardened in their ungodlinesses; the weak in faith are brought into hazard of their salvation; there are occasions of many evils given; Monks and other Popish preachers are hereby helped to confirm their followers in their superstition; the wrath of God is provoked against us; those things which God would have to be destroyed, are hereby built again by <math>\langle \diamond >>>; the whole face of the Church is defiled and disgraced: there is a foul sin committed against honest and good laws forbidding the putting on of strange and outlandish garments: and so the whole Church is dishonored, Besides, the public peace of the Church, yea of many Churches is troubled: one Bishop is set against another, the consciences of the godly are troubled, and the minds of good men are offended, God's spirit is made sad in them, and this apple of contention is cast, as it were, upon the table of the God's.

Now seeing the matter stands thus, most gracious Queen, not only I▪ but all my fellow-ministers, and all the godly prostrate before you, entreat your Majesty, and for Jesus Christ's sake, whom we are persuaded you love from your heart, we humbly beseech your Majesty not to embrace that counsel aforesaid, neither to give ear to such counsellors. For those counsels (most godly Queen) are not for the good of that your Church and kingdom, nor for the honor of your Majesty, seeing they neither serve to the increase of godliness, nor to the retaining of the honesty of the Church, neither to the preservation of public peace, but rather very greatly weaken all these good things, which your Princely Ma• ought chiefly to stand for. Let your Ma• rather bend all your thoughts, authority and power hereunto, that first and above all you may have Bishops, who be truly godly, and well exercised in the holy scriptures, as by the blessing of God you have very many, and that you make much of, and give ear to them. Secondly, that you be careful that with all diligence they may discharge their office, watching over the flock teach sound doctrine, confute heresies, drive away Wolves, keep every man in his own calling, and exhort and stir up every man to lead a life beseeming a Christian. The Elders also and Deacons are to be admonished, that everyone be diligent in his own office, and if need be, they are to be compelled by your gracious Ma• authohtoritie, that neither the former by their sleeping and winking at the misdemeanors of the flock, suffer the reins to be loosed to all licentiousness, and to the lusts of the flesh; neither that the later, by reason of their immoderate care for their own private businesses, neglect the poor people of the Church, and omit such other things as belong to their office. For these three sorts of men be the very sinews of the Church, upon whom the salvation or destruction of the Church doth chiefly depend. Furthermore, your gracious Ma• ought to use great care and diligence, that the Universities, and in them good and godly teachers, be well looked to, cherished, liberally maintained and preserved, for these are as the mothers, and nurses of the Churches, in which and by which those are to be fashioned, borne, brought up and adorned, who being fit, may be called from time to time to rule and govern the Churches. Last of all such things as cannot be corrected & amended by the word and discipline of the Church, as it is necessary, that according to God's word they be cut off and taken away by the sword of the Magistrate, so your gracious Majesty is to take care of them: as adulteries, blasphemies, and other capital crimes of that sort. For God hath given the Magistrate the sword for this end, that ungodly seducers, filthy knaves, and unquiet men being restrained, the rest may lead a quiet and peaceable life in all godliness and honesty. This is the matter (most gracious Queen) whereon you are to spend your thoughts, hereabout are your counsels to be occupied, here is all your strength to be shown, namely, that (to end in a word) we all denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, may live soberly, justly, and godlily in this present world. For this is the true and fairest garment of all other. For which every man ought to take care, to wit, that having put off the old man with his works, we put on the new man, that is, our Lord Jesus Christ, neither are there any other true ornaments which become Christian Bishops, besides those which the Apostle hath laid down in his writings to Tim. and Tit. A Bishop must be unreprouable, the husband of one wife, watching, sober, modest, harborous, apt to teach, not given to wine, no stryker, nor given to filthy luere, but gentle, no fighter, not covetous, one that can rule his house honestly, having children under obedience in all honesty, not forward, not angry, righteous, holy &c. For garments and ornaments of Aaron's high Priest, were types of these true ornaments; those were the shadows, these be the body. Wherefore let those be gone, and let these abide still. And then at length shall we have the whole Church, and so the Bishops rightly and truly apparrelled.

Once again I humbly beseech your gracious Majesty, that thinking no more of those outward garments, you will mind and consider how these true and spiritual ornaments may be retained, put upon, and kept in the Churches. And as I said in the beginning, that according to your gracious Majesty's clemency you will be pleased to pardon my boldness in writing. Our Lord Jesus Christ long preserve your gracious Majesty safe and sound to us, and to the whole Church. From Heidelberg. 10. September. 1571.

THus (good sir) you see how I have endeavored to satisfy your desire concerning the general part of the Defense. If this do not fully content you, I will (if it please God) add what is wanting another time. For it is fit we should help one another in private, concerning these things, lest the public sway of formality should make us forget or forgo that sincerity which those men of God taught us, in whom when we were yet children, we saw the power of godliness that made us love their footsteps.

Blessed is he that watcheth, and keepeth his garments, lest he walk naked, and they see his shame, Apoc. 16. 15.

I have added to the Authors Reply, but without his knowledge, the advertisement following; to fill up this page, which without some purpose had otherwise been left blank.

WHEN you find, good Reader, any stragling testimonies of some few foreign Divines alleged by the formalists, which seem to savor of toleration, consider first that some did write in the dawning of the day of reformation, and therefore could not so soon see distinctly and clearly every corruption which was in the Church, 2. That notwithstanding of greater light shining in the Church, after the rising of the Sun above our Horizon, the Divines treating upon many points, could not be exact in everyone, or intending principally to beat down such corruptions as did most assault their own Churches, no wonder that there fell from their pens some sentences not ripely digested concerning other points. 3. That howbeit these had purposely set themselves to consider the controversies of our Churches, yet not being thoroughly acquainted with the particular state of the same, might give their judgment in the general case, but could not so well in the particular, as many worthy Divines in England have done. 4. They were but men, and might err in judgment, and so appeareth by the weak reasons subjoined sometimes to their opinions. And living in Churches where some corruptions do remain, they might the more readily stumble at the like in others. 6. It hath been the practice of the English Prelates from time to time, and is at this present hour, not only to offer preferment to Divines at home, but also to send gifts to foreign Divines, to blunt at least the edge of their zeal, if they could not make them altogether their own, as they have done some. For proof of this their old practice I have here subjoined a few lines taken out of the friendly caveat to B. Sands, then Bishop of London, written ann. 1567. extant in the book entitled, The Register.

Although you have, as much as in you lieth, gone about to win credit, and as it were to tie the tongues of Bullinger, Gwalther, Zanchius, and others with your bribes, which you have divers times sent them under the name of friendly tokens and remembrances, yet when they shall be informed better of more then they were the last time, and confirmed in the former satisfaction of these two last set forth books, as well these that I have named, as divers more will not be ashamed, like true and constant professors of the truth, to answer your L. as Aristotle did Plato, when he said, Amicus Plato, sed magis amica veritas, that is to say, openly to confess, not in private meeting only, but in print also, that English ti•ne, English clothes, and English silver and gold are and shall be welcome to them, as long as they are not meant to stop them from the truth against both their conscience, and their printed writings and confessions. Yea if ye will look well on the matter, Gwalther hath condemned you and your splendida Pontificalia already. For in his last Epistle to you Lord's, he denieth not that those informations, these two that he speaketh of delivered him, were intolerable in the Church: but trusting only upon your words, and believing your coloured lying informations too much, would not credit them as t•o too monstrous things to be in such a realm, that hau• always had so good a report for zealousnesse in religion, and to be maintained of such men, that in time of their banishment, both he himself, and a great sort more knew to be godly, learned, and earnest in religion.

MElanchton did write in the dawning of the day. •anchius in •n Epistle to Bullinger, reporteth that he was of a fearful spirit, and did many things which he did not approve. His advices in the time of the Interim proved pernicious to the Germane Churches, and grievous to all the godly. Harder things, if true, are written concerning him. P. Martyr, freer in writing after he had left England then he was before, in a letter to a certain friend there, confesseth his oversight in advisi•g rather to conform to Popish apparel then to leave the Ministry, and that now with •ullinger he was of another mind, seeing the scandals which did arise unavoideably of them, which he did not perceive before. He confesseth in another Epistle to a certain friend there, that he could not give full and particular direction not being acquainted with all the particular circumstances. Tu autem qui••es in ipso certamine consilia hic non expecta. Valde quippe sumus à vobis procul. In ipsa consultetis arena. Which answer holdeth in other foreign Divines. The Author of this sound Reply, craving the removal or at least the free use of the ceremonies, and that none be enthralled; or saying if there Deans, Canons, and Prebendaries will practice them in their Cathedral Churches, they will not contend with them, providing the Prelates impose them not upon others, is to be understood to speak only of the English Church, where they have kept possession ever since the Reformation, and as a man almost despairing of any cure after these fifty years contestation against them, rather then resolving. But all Writers condemn the reducing of corruptions into a Church, specially after exile of many years. Many worthies have suffered much for Reformation, what would they have done to withstand the re-entry of Deformation?

A Second Manuduction For M^r. ROBINSON, Or a confirmation of the former, in an answer to his manumission.

IT is not much to be mervailed at, if one assay praevaileth not with him for public communion, who was so hardly drawn unto private, by many & long strivings. We may rather hope, that in time, he will be brought, to see reasō for that as well as for this. The success being left unto God: I think it a Christian part, to stretch out a little & strengthen that hand which before was lent him for a manuduction. First then must be marked, how far M. R. is come already: and then the points that he stayeth at, with the grounds of that his stay. He granteth;If a man (remaining a member in some parish of England) intending the ministry, & competently qualified thereto, having approbation of godly & learned men, shall, without any further calling, for a time, perform the actions of prayer & prophesying, by leave in a public assembly there, that it is lawful to communicate with him in that work. And moreover, that if the same man shall continue in that course for some years, not having any further warrant, but the seal which God setteth to his labor in the fruition of it, & the consent of those people which repair unto him for instruction; it is lawful, still to have communion with him. All this he acknowledgeth (though not in so plain a manner as ingenuous dealing requireth) in calling of it private.

This grant of M. R. is of no small moment in the consequence of it. For by virtue thereof, those of his mind, may be present at many sermons in England upon occasion, not only to the spiritual comfort & edification of their souls, but also to the avoiding of much danger & damage in their outward estate. For of this kind are a multitude of religious exercises ordinarily performed by students in the colleges of both the universities, who are wont in their college chappels to make trial of their gifts though they be not ordained ministers; & not only there, but in such assemblies of the country as they have opportunity. Some also have been known to continue long, even for 20 years together, in preaching by no other warrant then this: as by name, M. Flood of Northampton, & M. Marburie. By the same reason it will follow also (as by & by we shall see) that communion may be had in the like actions of those which have further authority: for this communion is of public nature & a church action, & so for substance, of one reason with the other.

That this doeth follow upon the former grant, if so be that such exercises of religion be public actions, M. R. doeth well understand: & therefore to avoid that which he is loath to acknowledge, he denieth such actions to be of public nature. To this purpose he insinuateth 2 reasons. 1. Beccaus a private action may be performed in a public place, as a public may in a private: and 2 because no action is public, that is not performed by public calling or authority. The former of which I willingly grant: and therefore made no such mention of the place, as if it were of itself sufficient to make these exercises public. The second I do flatly deny until I see that reason which (as he saith without any further proof) doeth of itself teach it. For this purpose he willeth the reader to see Mr. Perkins in treatise of Christian equity; where nothing is to be found that pertaineth unto this purpose. For there Mr. P. speaketh only of such public actions, as are usually called actions of law, wherein public justice is questioned, the mitigation whereof pertaineth unto that Christian equity which there is handled: such as execution of penal statutes, suing of bonds, taking forfeitures & fines are. If he would know Mr. Perkins his judgment about this point, let him see to the purpose his treatise of divine or religious worship (the thing that now is in hand) where he shall find this description, church service is that which is performed publicly in the congregation of the people of God. But leaving his testimony, let us search a little after that reason which Master Robinson telleth us will teach us what actions are public. Public is as much as peoplelick because that which is not restrained unto one or a few, but extended as commune to a people either civil or ecclesiastical, that is peoplelick or public. Thus some actions done first in private, and after extending to the knowledge of the people, become thereby public scandals, though the actors of them have no public calling or authority for doing of them. Much more, are those actions to be esteemed public, which are performed in a public place, extending to the present knowledge or use of the people, & so intēded, whether they be good or evil in which respect no mā cā deny the prophecies of Zedekiach & other his fellows 2 Crō. 18. to have bē as public as that of Michaia, though he only & not they had lawful calling or authority for that action. Those exercises of religion which are ordinarily used in the seperat assemblies, called prophecijngs, wherein prayers are offered up in the name of all the people, & the word interpreted unto all, they are I think esteemed public by them selves: sure I am they are so, however they be esteemed: yet the actors in those businesses have no special set calling or authority for that they do. In the time of Wycliffe, when many that received light of truth from him did upon all occasions publish the same unto others either in churches or churchyards, or else in markets, faires, & such like open assemblies, though they did it without license of the ordinaries, or other sufficient authority of that kind, yet they are said to preach publicly. It is the phrase of king Richards letters against them, as is to be seen in M. fox, p. 406. Like phrase is used in like case, by all that write or speak thereof. So that both by reason & custom, & all good rule of speech, it is manifest, that these exercises of religion which M. R. granteth lawful are public actions: and so, that not only private, but also public communion is by his own confession, lawful in the parish assemblies of England.

THus far then we have Mr. R. consenting. Now at the third demād, he maketh a stand: but with such oppositiō as will not stand. The demand was of the same mā, who formerly did lawfully preach in a public assembly, if he should obtain a license from the L. Bishop of the diocese, without any unlawful condition for to continue in that his course, whether that leave or license given doeth pollute the actions, seeing a man may ask leave of the great Turk, to preach the gospel within his dominions? His answer is, that the very obtaining & receyving of such a license is unlawful: because it is a real acknowledgement, that such a Bishop hath a lawful power to grant it. Which is neither so nor so: for. 1. The asking & receyving of leave or license (which are both one) doeth not always imply an acknowledgement of his lawful authority from whom it is sought. If any man of violence shall usurp a power to himself, of permitting or hindering the lawful & good offices that pertain unto honest men, so that without his license a man could not buy or sell, or teach any science or trade of life; if an honest man whom these duties concern, should in that case take a license from that usurper (though he were no better then a strong thief) no reasonable man will say, that in so doing he did acknowledge such usurped power lawful. The rulers of Jewish synagoges had no lawful power over the Apostles of Christ in any part of their ministry, neither would Paul ever acknowledge so much: yet he & Barnabas accepted of such license or leave from them sometime as they did usually grant unto those that acknowledged them selves lawfully subject to their authority. See an example act. 13.15. Mr. R. himself hath granted in the first demand that a man may preach by leave in a parochial assembly: which leave must be given by the parochial minister & churchwardens, whose authority he holdeth one with the Bishops. If therefore leave or license (whether in word or writing, that is all one) may be lawfully taken from them, without acknowledging any authority lawful which is unlawful, why not from the Bishop? 2. There is some authority in the Bishops derived from the king which may be acknowledged lawful. Such is this of giving license, liberty & civil authority for men to do good. The civil magistrate may do it himself; or appoint others to do it 2 chro. 17.7. The abuse of this authority doeth not make it unlawful.

But John Claydon (saith Mr. R.) a martyr of Christ was otherwise minded, when he witnessed, that the Bishops license to preach the word of God was the true character of the beast. Which testimony is found in deed in the book of martyrs, p. 588. But 1. It is not John Cleydons, but found in a book whereof he was the owner but not the author: for he could neither write nor read. 2. Whosoever was the author, the meaning was, that in regard of the conditions required by those Bishops, & the persons that usually obtained their approbation, licences might be held as a note of one that followed the beast of Rome: though those conditions being removed, there was no such wickedness in the bare license. This meaning may be gathered out of the answer of William Thorp, who may probablie be judged the author of that treatise wherein this testimony was found. For concerning the Bishops license, he rendereth a just reason why the godly preachers in those days did not seek them p. 492. In this his speech to the archbishop. Sir, as touching your letters of license, or other Bishops, which ye say we should have to witness that we were able to be sent for to preach: we know well, that neither yow sir, nor any other Bishop of this land, will grant to us any such letters of license, but if we should oblige us to yow, & to other Bishops by unlawful oaths, not to pass the bounds & terms which ye sir with other Bishops will limit to us. And since in this matter your terms be some too large & some too strait: we dare not oblige us thus to be bound to you for to keep the terms which yow will limit, as yow do to friers & such other preachers.

3. If one good martyr out of zeal had given that testimony in such a sense as Mr. R. will have it understood in, yet the general consent of almost (if not absolutely) all the other martyrs being otherwise, as is well known to such as have read their stories, this one of itself could work no great prejudice.

This for the answer directly applied unto the demand. Unto the comparative reason annexed, that a man may ask leave of the great Turk to preach the gospel within his dominions, he opposeth 2 things. 1. A difference betwixt leave & license, that to ask leave is to desire one not to hinder him: but to obtain a license of the Bishop, is to obtain public authority of the public officer, & according to the public laws of the church, to exercise a public ministry. 2. That the great Turk is a lawful civil magistrate with whose civil authority it is lawful to partake: But so is not the Bishop a lawful ecclesiastical officer, with whose spiritual jurisdiction gods servants may communicate. In all which there is not one sound sentence. For 1. What difference soever he may imagine betwixt leave & license, my meaning was, that it was lawful to obtain a license of the Turk for to preach the gospel in his Dominions.

2. Leave from one that is in authority, so as he that hath it shall be hindered of none subject unto that authority, is a licēce with authority. So that the difference betwixt leave & license, insinuated by him must consist only in the great sound of the word public so oftē repeated in vain, public authority, public officer, public laws, public ministry: Which how idle it is, hath formerly been shown. 3. He that hath a Bishops license & orders too, hath no such authority actual conferred upon him thereby, but that he may be hindered many ways, even by those that are subject unto the Bishop, from ever exercising that whereto he hath license so that in this respect, there seemeth not so much as full & perfect leave to be contained in a Bishops license. 4. That the Turk is a lawful magistrate, it would trouble Mr. R. to prove. 5. The Bishop hath some jurisdiction exercised about spiritual causes, which may lawfully be communicated with. 6. And lastly, though all this were so as Mr. R. saith, that it were unlawful for to seek or take such a license of a Bishop, yet it doeth not follow, but it might be lawful to communicate with him that hath taken it: especially seeing it was lawful before, and the man doeth & hath all good that he did or had before, only with this difference, that he doeth that with license of the Bishop which he did before with his connivence. So that this demand remaineth unanswered: which was not made of the getting of license, but of communicating with him that had gotten one.

Which communion can be no more unlawful, then that which scholars have with a schoolmaister, who hath takē a Bishops licēce (according as many are urged to do) from the same Bishop: or that which subjects have had with their lawful king sometime when he was crowned or set up by the Pope.

The 4. Demand was concerning a man that hath taken that form of admission which is called orders of the diocessan, not knowing any evil in it, whether such a fault, if it be a fault, doeth pollute that communion with him which otherwise is lawful? that it doeth not Mr. R. seemeth to witness in his former treatise p. 15. For this he referreth the reader unto that answer which he gave to the former demand: and so do I to the refutatiō of it. Whereas he addeth, that his testimony is misapplied, because his meaning was, that a human infirmity about an external ordinance doeth not hinder from communion in actions performed merely by personal grace; I answer, that it is possible for a man which hath such orders, to perform the actions of prayer & preaching even in a public place, merely by virtue of the personal grace & gifts which God hath endued him with all. Especially this man of whom here we speak, who yet hath no special state or reference by office unto those that communicate with him in the word & prayer. The reason therefore is one and the same, in this case, & that which Mr. R. speaketh of.

THE fifth question was of a man that being desired, & so chosen by some assembly wherein there are many fearing God apparently, he taketh a pastoral charge of them, having the Bishops & patrons admission, but chiefly grounding his calling upon the people's choice, and that he do nothing but the same he did before, besides the administration of the sacraments to such as are in charity & discretion to be esteemed worthy, what hindereth from communion here? To this a four fould answer is given in show, though none in deed. 1. He denieth an assembly gathered & consisting of many fearing God, & many without the fear of God, to be a lawful church assembly, having right in communion to call & enjoy a Pastor. But the question was made of an assembly wherein are many fearing God apparently, without his supply of many not fearing God, though with them there may be mingled some which give not such apparent evidence of God's grace to be in them, but rather praesumptions of the contrary. Will Mr. R, deny the title of a true church unto all assemblies that have some such amongst them? then must he condemn most rashly not only a multitude of present churches (Dutch & Frēch) but those of Corinth, Galatia, Pergamos, Thyatira, Sardis, & Laodicea also, of which the Apostles & Christ himself gave other judgment. 2. He telleth us, that none can truly take a pastoral charge in the Parish assemblies: because he cannot govern or rule the flock. But first, a man may truly take upon him that which he cannot fully & in every part perform or fulfill, desiring & endeavoring so far as his knowledge & ability extendeth. Otherwise, no high Priest in Israel from the time of Solomon unto the time of Hezekia did truly take upon them the charge of a high priest: because none did celebrat the passouer which was a principal sacrament, in such sort as was wriē. 2. Chron. 30.5.26. Nor keep the feast of tabernacles in a far lōger time. Nehem. 8.17. Nor did any king all that time truly take upon him the charge or office of a king: because none did reform things as he ought. If any difference be, their sin was greater, that might have dō their duty & would not, then theirs that would & cannot. Secondly, the mere want of performing one part of the charge, doeth not hinder but that a man may well communicate in the other parts, which are well undertaken & discharged also. 3. He addeth, that the church of England acknowledgeth no such calling as is chiefly grounded on the people's choice. Such private intendimēts & underhand professions of particular persons in secret, are cloaks of shame & craftiness, like unto disguised familism. And if any ministry be so grovnded, it is not the ministry of the church of England. But what that church of England alloweth which he understandeth by this title, it maketh nothing to the question. It is enough if such a calling be in some assemblies of England. Yet for a minister to lay the chief ground of his calling upon the people's choice, so that he have withal those formallities required, I know no law in England that doeth forbid or disallow it. Ther is therefore no necessity for him that doeth so, to speak of it in secret only: he may profess it in the pulpit, as many have been known to do, & yet be a minister of a church established by the law of England. Neither is that after consent by acceptance & submission which Mr. R. speaketh of so slight a matter for this purpose as he would make it. For as in wedlock, the after consent of parents or parties doeth often make that a lawful state of marriage which before & without that was none: & in government, acceptance & submission doeth make him a king which before was a tyrant, though in their nature these actions be rather consequences then causes of that calling, so is it betwixt minister & people. All the wind that he spendeth therefore in this answer, is but a venting of his praejudiciall passions. The question itself he secretly granteth, in making a ministry grounded on the people's choice to be no ministry of the church of England: insinuating thereby, that with such a ministry he cannot say but communion is lawful. Now that there is such a ministry to be found in England, as it is manifest in diverse places, so he himself doeth as much as witness it in the next page, where he affirmeth that in sundry places the people are ready to suffer persecution with their ministers. For if the lifting up of a hand in tokē of consent be a choosing, a consent declared by such fruights must needs imply no less.

4. He excepteth against baptizing of all infants borne in the Parish. But (to abstain from by controversies) it shall suffice for that, that other churches do extend the use of that sacrament to as great largeness as England doeth, with whom notwithstanding Mr. R. will not deny all communion public.

The 6 question was of a deprived & silenced minister, why a man should not hear him when he preacheth? Mr. R. after a censorious note or two passed upon such ministers, giveth for answer, that such a man remaining still a minister of the church of England, & preaching by that calling, cannot be communicated with, without submission unto and upholding of the prelates antichristian authority, which in that work he exerciseth. Which is a conceit past commune apprehension. That he which by the prelat, the prelates cannons, & all that his authority can make, is forbidden to preach, often times excommunicated also by him, and all this for witnessing against his usurped authority, should in performing that duty, which also he did law fully before he received any commission from any prelat, not only exercise the prelates authority, but so exercise it, that no Christian man may be present therat, without actual submission to antichristian power. I can say no more, but let him that readeth give judgment.

To the 7 & last demand, which was of one that thorough infirmity admitteth of some corruptions in the exercise of his ministry, he answereth nothing of momēt, but what was examined before, & therefore need not a several trial.

THus much for maintenance of the arguments implied in the foresaid quaeres. Wherein also those bars are now removed which were by Mr. R. opposed before in general, & now as we have seen, particularly applied. Yet further some what to pursue the matter, it may be a defense of that which is said already. The principal & in deed the only ground of opposition was laid by him in this, that such a Parishonal minister is a branch of the prelacy, as receyving power from it, by which it doeth administer. My answer was by denial, with this distinction, that a parishionall minister as I formerly described had power of right unto his ministry before ever he had to do with the prelat, though a power of external legal ability, he may be said to receyve from the prelat in part. When I said he had nothing to do with the prelat before he had gotten right, my meaning was, that he had not to do about that pastoral charge.

Yet we may suppose him also not to have proceeded by such degrees as were formerly for argument sake set in rank, but first to have dealt with the people or been dealt with by them, having never seen any prelat in all his life, or as good as not seen him. To come then to the point, his answer is, that no parish assemblies have power of right to choose their ministers. Whereas on the contrary it is most evident that every congregatiō of Christians hath right unto this thing from Christ himself so inseparablie annexed unto it, that no external oppression by others, or abuse of their own cā possibly deprive them of this right, so long as they remain a Christian assembly or congregation. Suppose they be in external bondage, & that in some sense spiritual, yet no matter of fact can take away right, while they abide such as Christ hath given that right unto.

The whole case may be cleared in this example, two single persons agree on marriage betwixt themselves, with allowance of parents, & have by virtue of that cōtract, mutual right one in other, yet the laws of the place where they live having ordered that none shall be held for married persons without certain forms which they appoint, they have not external legal power or liberty one in the other, before such rites be performed. Even so stands the matter betwixt minister & people in England, they agreeing or cōtracting betwixt them selves have right one in other: but external legal power or liberty they must receyve from others. Another example also I would have considered, the emperor sometime was so subject unto the pope that he had not liberty of emperiall rule until he received his crown from Rome: yet was the emperor then no proper part of the papacy, nor did he take his right from the pope, neither did those that submitted unto him, therein communicate with the popes authority. So is this in hand. If Mr. R. will shut his eyes against the light I cannot make him see the difference that is betwixt these two powers.

OVt of Mr. R. his own grounds there were certain assertions observed, which show that the power of preaching which ministers in England do exercise professing that to be their main office, is not properly a part of the prelates power. The first was, that the office of the prelates is founded on their usurpation of the churches rights in calling of officers & censuring of offenders: power therefore of preaching can be no part of it. To which first he answereth, that that which I admit in his affirmation hath enough in it to overthrow my consequence: for if it belong to the prelates to cal ministers & that in calling them they give thē power & authority to preach, then it followeth undeniablie, that those ministers thus preaching, do therein exercise the prelates power. And if unto this be added such an estimation of all the ecclesiastical state in England as he cōceyteth, & would have others to take for granted, then he saith all will follow that he desires. Only he disliketh, that diligent preaching should be accounted the ministers main office: because that in abstracted notions, it is rather a work than an office, & such a work as may be performed by Apostles, or others that are no pastors, & therefore as he full wisely concludeth, it cannot be the pastors office main or mean. Secondly he descants upon the word founded, affirming that men may have power to do more then they very things upon which their office is founded &c. But 1. A man may take an argument from that which he doeth not with consent admit. And so did I in using his assertion concerning the Bishops authority in calling of ministers: never granting (as former passages do sufficiently witness) that all authority of calling them resteth in the prelat. 2. A man may be in some sort called by another to exercise some power which is not his that so called him. As when a physician is called by the civil magistrate or by a Bishop to exercise such art as he hath, among the people that are ruled by him. For no man I think will say that such a physician in giving of a potion doeth exercise a kingly or an episcopall power. So likewise is the case of a schoolmaister set in place by a Bishops license & authority: in teaching of grammar, he doeth not exercise the power of a Bishop. 3. Though in strictness of distinction, an office dissereth, from the work of it, yet Mr. R. I hope will give us leave to follow in phrase of speech the custom of speakers & writers, who do usually call that work men's office whereto by office they are separated, Especially seeing the Apostle Paul himself doeth call the office of a Bishop a work. 1. tim. 3.1. And the work of ministry, a ministry. Rom. 12.7. But it seemeth he doeth not esteem preaching any proper work of a pastors office, because Apostles & others may do it. As if the apostles & ordinary pastors had not one general office, because they have not the same in special; or that one man may not be tied by office unto a work which another also hath liberty by occasion to do without such a special office. As if it were not a deacons office to distribute unto the poor, because others may do so.

4. His strict acception of the work founded cā neither stand with his other interpretation of the word office nor with that sentence whereto it belongeth. For a prelates office or state is in nature before that usurpation he speaketh of, & not founded upon it. Neither is the question, whether prelates have power to preach or no, nor yet whether that be in the strictest sense a foundation of their office, but whether their office, doeth so contain that as a part of it, as that, whosoever preacheth with in their diocese, must needs execute a part of their office or power?

A Second assertion whereof use was made in the manuduction was, preaching is no natural or necessary part of the parochial ministers office. Concerning this sentence, Mr. R. complaineth first that it was by me unjustly reproached, & secondly, that my inference upon it is of no force. Reproach it I did not, but so reprove it as it was worthy: wondering much at the shamelesnesse of it. Now I do much less mervel at it then I did before: seeing that which he here affirmeth of the parochial minister, he doeth as boldly affirm of all ministers & true pastors, viz: preaching is not the pastors office, either main or mean. I do rather mervel, that he should cast that upon parochial ministers for a crime, which he maketh to be the case of all true pastors. Yet for the reproof I used, it was deserved. I say, it was an intemperat speech, proceeding from an impotent sickness of mind: that is, an unreasodable assertion arising out of passion or perturbation. My reason annexed was, because he can find marijng, churching, burijng among the natural or necessary parts of this ministry, things not mentioned in the ordination: but cannot find preaching any part, though it be expressly mentioned, & that as a main part. Whoe doeth not see, that such partial dealing doeth proceed from passion? the force of this argument thus couched in that comparison, Mr. R. observing will take no knowledge of, but frameth another, which he thought he could answer: and simply propoundeth my reason to be, that preaching the word is expressly mentioned in the ordination: & therefore a natural & necessary part of the parochial ministers office. Though this I neither said nor meant, yet if it be rightly understood, viz: that preaching of the word is mentioned as the principal work to which he is ordained, the argument is good & sound: & the objections which Mr. R. hath brought against it, are but as the raising of a little dust unto the clearenes of a shining light. It is mentioned also in the ordination of a maspreist: But is not mentioned as the chief work whereunto he is concecrated: sacrificing for quick & dead is the main. Yet according to the intention of those which first framed that form of ordination, it is manifestly the office of him that is so ordained, to preach the word of God. So also is ministering the discipline of Christ as the Lord hath commanded, expressly mentioned. So is it also a part of his office, though he be not now permitted to perform it, according as he should. The Bishop also expressly bids his ordained one, receive the H. Ghost: doeth he therefore so receyve it? most trifling. Is this the question now, whether the ordained one receyveth everything that he is bidden receyve? or do those words any ways import an office of such receyving? The greatest part of the ministers want ability of preaching, therefore it cannot be a natural or necessary part of their office. So did the greatest part of the priests & levites in the days of Jeremiah, & the other prophets: was it therefore no natural or necessary part of their office? But the public laws do approve of their inability to preach, by appointing homilies to be read by them. It is a public slander to say so, when as in the very preface to those homilies, the appointers of them do declare, that their intent was not to approve such unsufficiencie, but to make some kind of supply for that which was wanting in such men toward the performance of their office, and that for a time only, while better provision might be made. Whereby also it is manifest, that it is not law, but pretense & abuse of law that continueth such blots in so many assemblies.

This of the speech reproved: now for the inference deduced out of it. Which was, that if preaching be no natural part of such a ministers office, then he in preaching doeth not exercise any power received from the prelat: neither doeth he that cōmunicates with him in that action of preaching, thereby communicate with him in any corrupt office of prelacy, or priesthood received from it. Wherunto Mr. R. answereth, that though it be not a natural & necessary part or work of his office, yet is it a casual & arbitrary part or work, which when it is done, proceedeth from the same power with those that are natural, that is, from the authority of the prelate. But who doeth not see how casual & arbitrary the answers of this man are? Sometime preaching is no office of the ministers, neither main nor mean, as we heard before: sometime it is a part, but not natural or necessary. And where did he learn (I wonder) to distinguish the parts of anything into natural & preternaturall, necessary & casual? that which is preter-natural to a wholl is no part of it, neither is there any part which is not in some degree necessary. The duty of preaching may be a natural & necessary part of the ministers office: though the work of it be not so necessarily urged, as the office doeth require. That the work also is made no more necessary, it ariseth not from the nature of the office, but from the corruption of the officers.

A Third assertion of Mr. R. applied unto the former purpose, was that the root being plucked up, the branch cannot survive: for the prelacy being plucked up, the parochial ministry might stand still, in all the substantial parts of it: as reason will teach any man that considereth without passion, and experience also showeth in many parts of Germany. Therfor the parochial ministry can be no proper branch of the prelacy. For answer heerunto, first, he denieth & merveyleth that I would affirm, the same parochial office & power of ministry to remain in any churches of Germany that was in use when prelates were there in time of popery, which was mass-priesthood. But 1. It was not affirmed, that the ministry there doeth remain the same with that which was there before: but the same for substance with that which is England though we have prelates & they have none. The truth of which is evident unto all that have any knowledge of the state of those churches.

2. If the removing of the mass & the reference of priesthood unto it, doeth necessarily infer a change of the ministerial function, (as this answer importeth) why then doth Mr. R. so much forget himself, in affirming that the office of a mass priest & of a parochial minister is one & the same?

And for the point: the reasons by Mr. R. alleged (to prove that the parochial ministry cannot stand in all the substantial parts of it if the prelacy be taken away) are so frivolous & void of substance, that if passion & prejudice be taken away, they cannot possibly stand. 1. All the ministers are made & appointed by the Bishops: if therefore the Bishops be taken away, how can the ministers remain the same? take away the correlative & relation ceaseth.

Trew, the relation ceaseth, But is that external relation unto an efficient cause any part of the substance or essence of the ministry? I had thought that the substance & essence of a thing had consisted in matter & form, & not in such external relations. Mariages are also made (as Mr. R. affirmeth) by Bishops authority: take away Bishops therefore & by this reason the marriages shall not remain the same for substance which they are now. Licences for teaching school & in many places for practicing of physic are given by the Bishops & their officers: take away the Bishops, & may not the same schoolmasters & physitians yet still remain (for substance) that were before? Fie upon sophistry.

2. Take away the prelacy (saith Mr. R.) and how can such a ministry continue, whereof one part (viz: ruling) shall be usurped by the prelat? As if when once that power is taken from the minister, it now apperteyned to the substance of his ministry, by whom it were usurped, whether he that possessed it were a Bishop, or a high commissioner, or of some other place! that which is without a thing may be changed without any substantial change of the thing itself: else how can Mr. R. say that either the function of masspreists, or of Popish Bishops do remain still in England as of old for substance, when there is so great an alteration in that supreme power from whence of old they were derived? The office of a king also, it remaineth the same for substance now, that it was in time of popery, for the substantial parts of it: yet one part thereof was in those times usurped & possessed by the pope, & is now restored to the crown, viz: power over ecclesiastical persons, & in ecclesiastical causes. It cannot therefore be denied, but by the same reasō, the parochial ministry should abide the same for substance that now it is, though that part which is now usurped by Bishops should be restored again. So that Bishops being removed, whether that power of ruling should be translated unto some other officers, or settled in the ministers as it ought, Mr. R. argument hath by neither way any weight or force at all.

3. Take away (saith he) the provinc: & diocesan churches & prelates, the parochial churches & ministers, as partes of them, must fall also. As partes of them in deed they must of necessity fall:

that is, they must cease to be partes of them: but it doeth not therefore follow, that anything of their internal substance should fall. The national church of England, & so the provincial & diocesan did once stand members, or partes of the oecumenicall papal church of Rome: now that is removed out of England, so far at least, that this national church is not subject unto Rome, nor dependant on it, or contained in it as a part in a wholl: yet Mr. R. will say that the same diocesan provincial & national church remaineth (for substance) that was before. Why doeth he not then see that parochial churches may remain the same for substance, though diocesses and provinces did follow the other?

4. He reckoneth up sundry corruptions, idol priests, cross & surplice with such vanities, mixture of profane with the godly, and asketh, if it be possible that the prelacy being abolished such things should remain as now? I answer 1. It is possible. Ther are more means of disorder & corruption then one. Neither can any such necessary cōjunction be shown betwixt the prelacy & these abuses, but that it is possible to seperat one from the other. Yet 2. If they should all be abolished with the prelacy, no reasonable man will therefore say that the substance of parochial churches should be therein changed. If prejudice could be set apart, the shallownesse of this & the former reasons could not be hid from the eyes of him that framed them.

TO a main objection by Mr. R. urged, viz:that all parochial ministers are subject unto the spiritual jurisdiction of prelates, answer was given, first, that so are private Christians subject unto the same jurisdic^{ti}oⁿ, not only in their church actions which they perform with others in public, but also for personal & private opinions & behaviours: this subjection therefore doeth no more hinder communion with the one then with the other, in things that are good. To which answer Mr. R. replieth nothing: but referreth unto his former book: where as good as nothing is to be found. If there had been a fit answer to be given, we should certainly either have had it repeated here (for of repetition Mr. R. is not so nice) or at least the page quoted where we might have found it. But in deed it is not possible, but if mere subjection to Bishops be in itself a sufficient bar against public communion, it must also be held sufficient against such private in & for which a man is also subject.

The second answer unto the forenamed objection was that the greatest part of the prelates jurisdiction is from the king derived unto those that do exercise the same, and therefore must of necessity be a civil power, such as the king might as well perform by other civil officers, as it is in the high commission. The laws of the land do so esteem it, &c. In this Mr. R. insisteth much, as thinking no small advantage to be given him, & therefore requireth of the reader well to observe what here is said on both sides. In which request I ioigne with him: so that it be marked withal, that I do not undertake to justify the Bishops wholl state, much less their proceedings, but only so far, that some subjection unto some of their authority is not simply unlawful.

Mr. R. plea (after his praeamble) ariseth unto these 3 defenses. 1. The laws do nowhere derive from the kings civil authority, the power of the Bishops spiritual administratiōs, but do only make the king an establisher & up holder civilly of this power. 2. Though the laws of the lād did esteem this jurisdiction civil, yet it doeth not follow that therefore it is such in deed: because they misesteeme diverse things. 3. That the prelates jurisdiction is not civile, as appeareth plainly by 5 reasons of him alleged. For the first of these, I appeal 1. To the oth of the clergy to the king, established by a statut law in the reign of king Henry 8. exstāt in Mr. Fox p. 961. Where the Bishop sweareth, that he knowledgeth himself to hold his Bishopric of the king only.

2. To the act that was then made for the supremacy, wherein all iurisdictions belonging to the title of head of the church in England are givē to the king, as it is in the same book p. 963.3. I appeal to the 5. Book of Sr Edward Cooks reports, where he showeth out of the law that Bishops are the kings spiritual judges, their laws his ecclesiastical laws, their jurisdiction so dependāt on him, that he may exempt any man from it, & grant the same also to whom he will. For the which purpose, he that desireth may find plētiful proofs in a book intituled, an assertion for church policy. Now whereas M. R. alledged, that the same jurisdiction ecclesiastical which had been in use in popery, & a great part of the popish hierarchy was confirmed primo Elizabethae, he hath put another weapon in our hands for to wound his cause withal. For the very title of that statute is, an act restoring to the crown the ancient jurisdiction over the state ecclesiastical. And the whole house of commons have so interpreted the meaning of that restauration which is therein made, that by virtue thereof the king is enabled to give power & jurisdiction ecclesiastical to any subject borne, so if it please him all causes may be taken from Bishops & their officers, & given unto other men in every parish of England. This interpretation is found in the bill of greivances presented to the king by those of the lower house an. 1610. Printed in a book called a record of some worthy proceedings &c.

That this or any other judgemēt of the law is not infallible, I easily admit, especially touching the question of lawful or unlawful, good or evil, of which kind those instances are which Mr. R. chooseth in this place to appose. But 1. Seeing that when we allege the parishes to be several churches, & to be considered as they subsist in their several conditions, and the calling of ministers in many assemblies to be grounded on the people's choice &c. we hear it still opposed with loud voice, the laws of the land allow no such things, they acknowledge no such matter &c. Was it not both fit & necessary then to declare the judgment of law? or can he with honesty reject the sentence of law so lightly now, who a little before built all upon it. 2. The question is here of a matter of fact, and the positive not moral nature of it, whether this authority cometh from the king or no, not whether it be every way good & laudable (as is the controversy about cross, syrplie & such like abuses which he mentioneth) and in such a case if the the laws say yea, and those that submit to them say also yea, Mr. R. must pardon us, if his no be rejected, except his reasons be passing strong.

His first reason why this power is not civil is because it is not coactive or bodily enforcing, but the Bishop after excommunication can go no further except he procure a civil coactive process by writ out of another court. I answer 1. Though it had no bodily enforcing at all annexed unto it yet it might be a civil power. Bodily enforcing is but a penal sanction which cometh after the authority or power civil, & may be separated from it 2. It is therefore coactive or bodily enforcing, because it may directly require as due & by law belonging unto it such coactive assistance by other officers as Mr. R. himself speaketh of. So many civil commissions & letters patent are granted to men which have no authority seated in themselves for forcing of mē unto obedience, but have authority to charge the constable or justice that next is to aid them in their affairs, which authority of theirs notwithstanding is civil, & in that respect coactive.

A second reason is taken from the works of prelates jurisdiction, which are for substance (saith he) the making of ministers, & excommunicating of offenders, with their contraries & appurtenances: which are not civil works, neither can be performed by any civil magistrate. Where, if by can or may he understandeth such right as men have for their deeds by the law or word of God, then I willingly grant that no civil magistrate may by his civil office perform those works of ordination excommunication &c. Neither can the Bishop so perform them: herein consisteth that presumptuous usurpatiō whereof they are guilty before God & man. But if he understandeth such right or power as men have for their deeds by man's law, then I avouch out of the former grounds & testimonies of law, that any other civil magistrate may receive authority of jurisdiction in those causes as well as prelates. Which experience confirmeth de facto in the high commissiō, & some other courts. Whereby it is manifest, that though these works in their nature be spiritual, yet (thorough great abuse) they are performed by civil authority. Secondly I answer, that these works of ordination & excommunication with their contraries & appurtenances are not the substance or in effect the wholl jurisdiction which Bishops do exercise in their provinces & diocese, though Mr. R. affirm it again & again. For 1. The principal jurisdiction which prelates have is under the king to make certain rules canons or laws for ordering of certain causes committed unto them 2. Those causes are for a great part of them merely civil, such as by God's law the civil magistrate hath power to order. Of which kind are the causes of matrimony, of wills or testaments & many circumstances pertaining to the several churches within their precincts. 3. In the very business of ordination & excommunication, it is of substance to see that worthy men be admitted & unworthy excluded. The forms of ordination & excommunication usurped by them, are corrupt appurtenances to those lawful actions, & not the substance whereto all the rest apperteyne.

Neither doeth Mr. R. agree with himself in making all the substance of spiritual government to consist in calling of ministers and exercising of censures, or ordination & excommunication: seeing his opinion is that all this may be done by the people, & yet in his former book (p. 26.) affirmeth government not to belong to them, wherein (saith he) doeth the people govern as many please to reproach us?

The third argument is taken from the form used in consecration of Bishops, wherein no mention is made of civil authority, but only of spiritual. Wherunto I answer. 1. That their episcopall jurisdiction over a special diocese or province is not expressed in that consecration: nor anything of substance which is not contained in a parochial ministers ordination. Which is an argument that the Bishop receyveth not that jurisdiction from him by whose hands he is consecrated, but from some other power, & that is from the king. 2. It is not necessary that words & forms of consecration should agree in all pointes with the state of a Bishop. For a Bishop in that state & proceeding which now is in use, is partly fish & partly flesh, or such a compound as were the feet of Nebuchadnetsars image, that were part of iron & part of clay, which did not cleave one to the other: for so is he, part of civil power which is of sound metal or iron, & part of spiritual usurpation, like myrie clay.

The. 4. Argument is vainly built upon a supposition which formerly was proved false, viz: that all the civil jurisdiction which prelates have, consisteth in their being privy counsellors, high commissioners, or iustices of the peace. This therefore needeth no further answer. Only let it be observed that Mr. R. in defending of the separation, as well as I in opposing it, doeth justify some part of the authority which Bishops exercise in England, professing communion with it and submission unto it. The only question is, how much of their authority is such. Let prejudicial insinuations & groundless imputations therefore be laid aside, and that question only discussed.

The last argument is raised from a form of words used by the-Bishops, in that they proceed in the name of God, & not in the kings name as all civile proceedings do. Wherunto I answer. 1. That a sound & convincing argument cannot be brought from words of form & office. If they should change their style, & begin their actions in the king name, I doubt whether Mr. R. would allow of that as any strong reason for their civil authority. 2. Many actions are performed with the same words of form, as all wills or testaments &c: which yet are no spiritual but civil deeds. So Henry the fourth king of England began his claim to the crown. In the name of God, amen. I Henry of Lanc. &c: as it is in Mr. Fox p. 474. Yet was not any other then a civil claim. 3 I affirm that it is an abuse against law, that Bishops in their acts of jurisdiction do not use the kings name: and therefore howsoever that the formal words be wanting, yet the thing itself is to be understood, viz: as Sr Ed. Cook hath written, that howsoever the form runneth in the Bishops name, yet the authority is no other but the kings.

This I will show by an instance most pregnant. Bishop Farrar in king Edwards days, being troubled & vexed by evil Willershad (amongst other) these 2 articles objected against him as deserving deprivation 1. that he appointed his Chancellor by his letters of commission, omitting the kings majesties style & authority &c. 5. Item he hath commonly made his collations & iustitutions, as he did his first commission, in his own name & authority without expressing the kings supremacy. To the first, the Bishops answer was, that what formalities soever be wanting in his commission, yet the kings majesties style & authority was fully set forth in the same commission. Neither did the said chancelour offer to visit but in the kings name & authority, to the said Bishop committed. To the fifth he saith, that the said defendāt made his collations & institutions in his own name, not by his own anuthoritie, nor by any others▪ fave only the kings authority, according as he hath declared in his first article, expressing in them the kings supremacy with the Bishops own name & seal of office, as he ought to do according to the provision of the kings statute in such a case. See Mr. Fox p. 1405.1406. In which one plea, we have the authority of statute, the sentence of lawyers & judges, with the confession & practice of prelates themselves, for the kings name & authority to give life unto their proceedings.

Here it must be observed, that this accusation & answer of B. Farrar was grounded immediatly on a statute made the first of Edward 6. wherein it was enacted, that the Bishop, should make their proces & writings in the kings name, and that their seals should be the kings arms. Which act was but an appendix declaring & adding form to that statute of supremacy made in Henry 8 his days, whereby ecclesiastical jurisdiction was annexed to the crown so as all Bishops were to fech it from thence. Now though that act of king Edward was repealed in Queere Mary's time, and not since revived, yet that doeth declare the meaning of the former statute of Henry 8. to be such as hath been said: which statute is now in force. Howsoever, the Bishops have (undoubtedly) the same kind of state which they had in the days of king Edw. If therefore they were thē civil officers, proceeding by the kings authority, they are also now such, viz: of civil nature for their state, deriving their jurisdiction frō the king, though they proceed not in his name so formaly as in king Edwards days they did, & now in reason they should.

THus much for that objection touching spiritual subjection. Concerning which, I found nothing further directly pertaining unto the purpose, except one passage which I found p. 30. Where these words are, they who thus disclaym in word the Bishops government, confess themselves therein to be under no spiritual external government at all, & so be lawles persons & inordinate walkers &c. This because it sounded as a dangerous & deep charge, ensuing upon that former defense which was made, that good ministers are no branches of the prelacy nor necessarily dependent on them as spiritual officers, I thought it needful to give answer unto it.

My answer therefore did consist in these 3 branches, 1. That there was no such want of spiritual government in the ministers which govern themselves well, as could be a just barrt against all communion with them: seeing private men living in the same want, may well be communicated with. 2 That they are subject unto some spiritual government. And 3. That for that want of government which they are in, they are no more lawless walkers or inordinate walkers then Mr. R. himself is, who is not subject to any other spiritual government then they are except he will say that the people govern him, which he counteth to be a reproach. Now let us hear what reply he maketh.

1. He pleadeth, that he did not infer this exception upon the former ground. But let that passage of his book be wayed p. 29.30. And it will be found that against his allegation of the parochial ministers being a branch of the prelacy, this was one defense, that they are not subject to their government, whereupon this inference followeth, that then they are inordinate walkers & lawles persons. Which is the very same order of inference that I observed. 2. He saith it was not alleged to prove communion unlawful with them, but as a reproof &c. But seeing the main reason was for unlawfulness of communion because of their branching out of prelacy, and the allegation nothing but an establishing of that reason by removal of one principal defense supposed to be brought for it, it must of necessity tend unto the same ende, of barring from all communion. And in deed, if it were not a slander, it were none of the weakest arguments which he hath alleged.

3. He affirmeth the 1. and 2. Answer to be beside the purpose because they speak only of personal, or civil, or else a more general kind of government then he intended, who spake only of outward guidance and ordering of the church in her public affairs, in which respect he affirmeth all in the parrish assemblies to be lawless persons, if they be not under the prelates jurisdiction spiritual. Wherto I answer 1. That such good governmēt as he granteth these mē personally, civilly, & generally to be ruled lawfully & religiously by (for all this he denieth not) is more then sufficient to remove from them that imputation of lawless & inordinate walkers, which he without law or limit had cast upon them. And for this purpose were those 1 & 2 answers opposed. Neither yet can it be with any truth affirmed, that in that strict acception of government the former imputation doeth cleave unto all in all assemblies. Are there none in any assemblies that are any way in any measure guided & ordered by their ministers in public affairs? what not in those prayers wherein they go before the people and direct them in their supplications by a special gift of prayer? is there no guidance & ordering by the preaching of the word? surely this accusatiō may in no sense be excused frō overlashing. Lastly it is alleged that this, not being subject to government is misapplied by me unto ministers, whē he spake it of the people, as is evidēt by his reply. Whereas indeed the contrary may better be gathered out of the reply. For therein (p. 30.) he speaketh first in general terms excluding none: & after doeth take in the ministers in special, expressly naming them no less thē 6 times in that one side of a leaf. The truth is, he findeth himself touched, not with a touch of wit (as he termeth it) but with a glance of his own tongue: and therefore hath now to help that, changed the term of spiritual government into another of the power of Christ for the censures, and because he doeth not acknowledge himself to be under any external spiritual government, yet under the power of censures he is, therefore the want of this in ministers & people he choseth now to impute for a lawless & inordinate state p. 19 As if this power of censuring were such a thing as every want thereof were a sufficient cause of so deep a censure: and this were not rather an audacious & abusive straying of the apostles phrase, applying that unto most godly men which he spake of the scandalous. Or as if all power of censuring in any degree, were wanting because the liberty of proceeding is in a great part restrained. But thus much for this objection: and so for the justification of some public communion to be lawful in England.

These things hitherto discussed were all that I could or can yet find in M. R. book, directly concluding against all public communion. Yet because there be 2 other objections, which by some might be thought to pertain unto the same purpose, viz: that all are urged to communion by penal statutes, and that a set form of prayer is appointed, I added therefore concerning them, this answer following. What fault soever may be found with them, they lie not so in the way, as that they should hinder from all communiō public, seeing there are many exercises of religion, wherein none are present by constraint, & where the service book doeth not so much as appear. As by name Mr. Perkins his exercise was, where Mr. R. hath often been, and at whose successors he hath once been since he professed separation, whereof I am persuaded also he doeth not yet repent. Further to reason about them is beside the purpose of my writing: and in deed needless, seeing the accuser hath answered himself in the one, p. 9. Whē he grāteth that the reformed churches generally use a stint form of prayer, with whō yet he will not refuse all public communion, & make like answer to the other, out of the laws of Geneva, where he shall find like strictness to be used toward all the inhabitants of that city, though he hath unadvisedly denied it in his so large assertion of our assemblies difference therein from all true churches in the world. This answer of mine I was forced to repeat, that the reader may see how Mr. R. (being putt as it seemeth to hard shifts) hath miserablie mangled the same without giving any answer directly to the purpose.

1. He bringeth in my first answer thus, he neither purposeth nor thinks it needful to deal about these things, seeing there are many exercises of religion where none are present by, constraunt &c. Was this my answer why doeth he leave out that wherein the main question consisteth, & whereupon all that followeth dependeth? viz: that those things do not hinder from all communion public. For this that reason was brought which he mentioneth: and not for that whereunto he pleaseth to apply it. Great distance there was in my writing betwixt those words which he patcheth together.

Neither was it my saying, that I had no purpose to deal about those things at all, but not further then I had answered before. this mangling & patching confoundeth all.

2. He chargeth me with changing the state of the question after my evil custom, which is not (saith he) about men's being present by constraint at the exercises of religion, but of churches gathered by constraint of all the profane parishioners with the other handful. But what goodness is in this custom, to pass by the wholl question in hand, and then to move controversy about other matters? the state of our question thorougout this dispute, is, whether all public communiō in the parish assemblies of England be unlawful or no? the objection in this place was that all are urged to communion by penal statutes. For answer of which I said that there be many exercises of religion public, where none are present by virtue of such constraint, & therefore such constraint could not hinder from all communion, though it might from some. Could anything be more direct & press to the matter in hand? Take we in also that which he saith our question is about; that churches are gathered by constraint of all the profane parshioners with the other handful, what advantage hath he by it? nothing at all, but only that his charirie & moderation is thereby made known. For 1. There be many parrishes in England which are but a handful in all, & diverse of them consisting only of a family two or three, having none in them that are profane. Diverse also there are more populous which have more then a handful of such in them as no holy man having bridle of his tongue can cal profane.

2. Though laws do urge unto such communion, yet it cannot be reasonably gathered that all which practice accordingly are cōstrained unto it: except Mr. R. will say that all men which live orderly with their wives & children & abstain from murder, treason, & such like offenses, do it by constraint, because laws do require & urge the same under great pains. 3 . Though all were gathered into churches by constraint, yet that constraint apperteyneth not unto those exercises of religion, where none are present but of their voluntary mind. He should have given a mad answer, that being desired to hear Mr. Perkins, should have denied upon this ground, because that parish church where he only taught (for a member of it a long time he was not) was gathered by constraint, when none came to hear him by any constraint, & of that parrish few or none to speak of were present. By all which we see, that this argument though framed thus as Mr. R. would have it, concludeth nothing against all public communion in England.

3. For that which I by the way only remembered, that he himself was once at a sermon in that assembly since he professed separation, as he had been at many of Mr. Perkins before, he answereth▪ it was neither pertinently nor truly objected: because at that time he disputed only for separation, but had not professed it.

Practised it in deed he had not in that settled manner which since he hath: but by report of some that had speech with him, he declared then to one of his acquaintāce, that he had been amongst some company of the separation before his coming to Camb: & exercising amongst them had renounced his former ministry. That is enough for the truth of what was affirmed. The pertinencie of it consisteth in this, that he having so often & so lately been at that exercise of Mr. Perkins & his successors cannot but know that there was no cōstreint nor service-book that had any place or part in it. It is pertinent also by the way to know whether Mr. R. doeth repent him for hearing Mr. Perkins? or whether he doeth reckon it among his offenses against God? The historical narration which upon this occasion he interposeth, I pass over as remote from the argument in hand.

4. He acknowledgeth that for the very use of a set form of prayer he will not separate from a true church in things lawful▪ But many differences he findeth betwixt the set forms of other churches & that which is used in England, even so many as make the service-book a hateful Idol advanced above all that is called God. The temper of which speech I leave to be considered of himself & others. My argument is granted; viz: that a set form of prayer in itself is not a sufficient cause of denijng all public communion. Let the manner of imposing be as hateful as Mr. R. would make it: yet in those actions where it is not used, nor yet imposed, as in that exercise of Mr. Perkins with other like, that infection is conveyed by it I cannot possibly conceyve. I desire a friend to hear with me a sermon preached by a godly man, where he shall neither see nor hear anything else beside the sermon, & such prayers as belong unto it; will any sense allow him to answer, no I dare not, there is an idol imposed under the name of service? Surely I should think he wanted sleep that would speak so idly.

5. For the state of Geneva, whose laws do require church communion of all the inhabitants of that city, he seeketh as before to find some differences betwixt that & England: but granteth in the mean time, that if a state for politick respects expel out of their territories such as will not ioign in church communion, that kind of compulsion doeth not make their communion unlawful. Meer injunction of law therefore though it be general for all doeth not make all public communiō unlawful. Especially in such actions where it is manifest that none do communicate but voluntarily. This is all that I maintained. Which being granted by Mr. R. with some other of my demands, and the rest opposed with so slender defences as we have now shown; I do not find fault with the title of his writing as he doeth with mine, but acknowledge it to be a true manumission that is a setting free or a free grant of what was by me propounded: for other usual meaning of that title I do not understand.

NOw though I have not undertaken to give answer unto everything that Mr. R. may object against the state of our assemblies, and therefore might without praeiudice neglect that addition which he hath annexed unto his answer, yet least any should think some unanswerable reasons to be contained in the same maintenance of his separation, I will briefly & plainly declare what I think in all the particulars of it. He undertakes to set down, what things are of absolute necessity for a true ordinary church-officer & minister of Christ, reducing the same unto 4 heads, a true visible church, a fit person, a lawful office, and a right calling.

About the foremost of these, he moveth 4 quaestions, 1. How the ministers of England can be true ministers, not being made & ordained such in & to any particular church? I ans: making & ordaining are two things, he may be a minister that is not formally ordained in the church. There is a making of ministers in & to particular churches in England, when they are called in & to such churches.

2. How many & which of the parrish churches consist of a people separated out from the world? How many such there are in England, I cannot tell, because I have no sufficient intelligence, whereby to inform myself therein. But divers assemblies there are, well known to such as are not willfully ignorant, which are so far at the least separated from the world as is of absolute necessity to the being of a true church. Perfect separation is not of that nature. As for the mixture in diocese &c. It is (as formerly hath been shown) a civil combination.

3. How the true form of a church can be found in any parrish church of the land, which is not any particular act, disposition or relation, but (as he conceaveth) a public orderly covenant & union of a particular assembly, by which it hath in itself entire right to Christ & to all the means of enjoying him?

Wherein. 1. It is to be observed, that it is not a very easy thing to discern of this form of a church: for this man that hath labored so long about the search of it, & that with more abilities & helps then ordinary Christians can attayne unto, yet speaketh something doubtfully or fearfully concerning the matter, as I conceive it can be no other then this. Me think then that charity should teach him & others more sparingly to censure & condemn those assemblies which do not practice this form so orderly as they should: seeing difficulty of discerning a duty doeth always lessen the fault of him that omitteth it.

2. That which now he giveth for his opinion concerning this form hath a manifest contradiction in it, & therefore cannot be right. He saith that this form is no particular act, disposition, or relation: & yet it is a public orderly covenant & union. A covenant & union must be taken either for the act of covenanting & uniting, & then it is an act; or for the state arising from that act of obligation, which is nothing else but the relation those persons obliged have one to another & so it is a relation, or else for the thing to which they are obliged, or the sign thereof, & so it may be either an act, or a disposition, or some other good. All these significations of the word covenant I find in scripture & use of speech: any other beside these, I do not understand. If Mr. R. had another meaning, he should have done well to have expressed it better: the point especially being of such momēt. The things covenanted or the sign he cannot mean: for these are not constantly resydeing in the whole & all the parts thereof, which is a condition of this form by him required: some act or relation therefore he must needs understand, gainsaying one part of the sentence by the other. 3. The truth is, this form in strict & accurate meaning must needs be some relation by Mr. R. his own reason. For nothing beside a relation can possibly resyde actually one & the same and at all times in a whole company of men, and in all the parts of that company.

4. Whereas he calleth this form an orderly covenant, his words are doubtful at the least. For there be many degrees of orderly proceeding in businesses public as well as private: and every circumstance of order doeth not apperteyne (as absolutely necessary) to the constituting form of a true church.

Now for the declaring of the truth concerning this matter, I propound to be considered this brief demonstration. A visible church must not be considered as a simple effect, arising of mere matter & form, as Mr. R doeth speak of it: But as a whole or compound consisting of partes or members: so that the members must contain in themselves all the essential both matter & form also, which make the whole by compacting or uniting themselves in one. Christian men being the called of God, have in them both matter & form essential for making of a visible church, else could they not give essence or being to the church, for nothing can give that which it hath not. Now these members combining themselves into one body as they are such, do make or rather are actually a true visible church, one integral body not continued, but by aggregation: which integral church as it is such, hath for the constituting form that relation which ariseth out of the combination of all the members: and so differeth not essentially from all the members compacted, but only in reasō. Further, this integral body for the well being of it in exercising those operations which belong unto it & whereunto it serveth, must become as we say organical, having members of diverse ranks, some as head, mouth & eyes, the pastor, teachers, & elders, some as hands, the deacons & helpers: whereupon ariseth another relation & form of accidental perfection, in state of government: which is cōplete or incomplete, freely exercising the power granted by Christ to his church, or else restrained or defective therein. Out of all this my answer is, that the essential form of a visible church is the covenant of God, or true faith made visible by profession; the notes & marks whereof are the word & sacraments rightly administered & received, with fruights of obedience. The integral constituting form is that state, relation or reference which a congregation of such professors have one to another by virtue of their settled combination, the note or mark whereof is their usual assembling into one place & watching one over another.

The organical active form is that state of order wherein officers & people stand one to the other, the note of which is direction & submission. Now to the point, so many parrish assemblies of England as have any competent number of good Christians in them, united together for to worship God ordinarily in one society, so many have essential & integral form of a visible church: and all they have entyre right to Christ & to all the means of enjoying him: howsoever they are defective in the purity of their combinatiō, & in the complete free exercising of their power.

The 4 and last question propounded by Mr. R. concerning the church is, how parrish assemblies being partes of diocesan false churches, can anymore be reputed true churches, then could a particular Jewish synagogue be so reputed, which should have made itself an entyre & independēt body in respect of the national church & temple? To which I answer, that there is not the like reason. For parrish assemblies are not spiritual parts of a diocesan spiritual church: but entyre spiritual bodies though civilly combined into a diocesan government. Neither is the principal worship performed at the cathedral church as it was in the temple, but in the parrish assemblies themselves.

In the second head, there is but one quaestiō moved; that is, whether a mā fitted & inwardly called to the ministry being persuaded in his heart that a lawfvll outward calling, & without sin in the entrance & continuāce cannot be had in the church of England, whether such a man be not bound in conscience to seek out & procure another church &c. I ans. 1. That inward calling is not ordinarily to be built upon, without some outward approbation doeth confirm it. 2. A lawful outward calling is had & enjoyed in many churches of England. 3. He that cannot enter in one place without sin, & yet hath his heart so fully set unto the ministry that he cannot have peace without that function ought as I think to take any good occasion of removing into some other place of more freedom.

To the demands in the 3 & 4 head, I have answered before, that preaching is necessarily required by the natur of a ministers office in England; some ruling is exercised by those that make conscience of their duty; and unto this function men are not called merely by the prelat.

These 4 conditions therefore so far as they are of absolute necessity for a true ordinary minister of Christ, are manifestly to be found in many assemblies of England. Which also Mr. R. in a manner granteth, in confessing that there are to be found in the parochial ministry men apt to teach, unreprouable in conversation, having an inward calling from God, that is, a holy disposition & desire to administer the gospel of Christ to the glory of God & furtherance of man's salvation. For this is the 2. condition which he acknowledgeth to be found in the parochial ministry. And can any charitable & aequall mind receyve into itself this thought, that so many mē of so good knowledge, & sincere conscience should be so far forsaken of God, all the time of their life, and that one generatiō after another, as not only to continue in Babylon as members of Antichrist but to bow down ordinarily & give spiritual honor to so many hateful idols exalted above all that is called God, as these men do telus of in the English assemblies? or if Mr. R. did inwardly believe that they lived in such continual practice of idolatry as he doeth in words accuse them of, would he account them unreprouable men in their conversation, without any exception annexed? I say no more, but God grant me that comfort which many of them have had in their unreproveableness, and more to Mr. R. then he can possibly find in such kind of reprovng or rather slandering of them. Amen.

1 Peter 1, 2, &c.

Verse 1. Peter an Apostle of Jesus Christ, to the strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Galatia, Cappadocia, Asia, and Bithynia;

Verse 2. Elect, according to the foreknowledge of God the Father, through sanctification of the Spirit unto obedience, and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: Grace unto you, and peace be multiplied.

The Analysis.

THE Scope of this Epistle is to exhort the faithful to continue steadfast in that grace of God wherein they stood, as it is expressly set down, chap. 5. verse. 12. But because that grace of God is considered in a twofold respect; either as it doth put a man into the state of grace, and so it equally belongs unto all the faithful; or as it doth direct the faithful in the performing of their duties towards others, according to that special condition wherein they are placed: therefore in the first place the Apostle exhorts them to hold fast that grace, because it belongs to the state of the regenerate man: from the beginning of the Epistle to the 13 verse of the 2 chap. and then he commends and persuades them unto that special grace, which doth in the first place direct subjects in their obedience towards the Magistrates, to the 18 verse. Servants in obedience towards their Masters, to the end of the chapter. Wives in their subjection to their husbands, from the beginning of the third chapter to the seventh verse. Husbands in their duty towards their wives, verse. 7. Brethren in their duty towards their brethren, verse. 8. The afflicted towards their persecutors, from the 9 verse. to the beginning of the 5 chap. The Elders towards their Churches, from the beginning of the 5 chap. to the 5. verse. The younger towards their elders, at the beginning of the 5. verse. and finally, all both towards others and towards themselves, to the 10 verse. where the whole foregoing exhortation is turned into a short prayer which serves for a forcible conclusion of the whole Epistle.

To the Epistle it self there belong two common adjuncts. An Inscription, verse. 1, 2. A Subscription, in the three last. In the Inscription there is contained, according to the usual manner of Epistles, a holy salutation, showing first, by whom this Epistle was written, secondly, to whom, thirdly, with what mind or affection it was written unto them; which is set forth by that pious wish, wherein he wisheth unto them the greatest good, Grace and Peace. In the person writing, and the good wished there are all things the same with those that are spoken of in the second Epistle. But the description of the persons to whom it was written, is something fuller here then there; now they are described, first by their outward condition, strangers scattered throughout Pontus, Asia, Galatia, Cappadocia. Secondly, by their inward spiritual condition, which is set forth, 1. by the fundamental cause of it, Election, to wit, of God, 2. by the final cause, Sanctification. 3. by the subservient cause, Reconciliation, to wit, conferred in obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Jesus Christ: which three causes of our sanctification are set forth by the three persons of the Deity, to whom as to the authors thereof they are distinctly ascribed, Election to God the Father, Sanctification to the holy Spirit, Reconciliation to Jesus Christ. By the strangers scattered, to whom this Epistle is chiefly directed, we are to understand the Jews, together with the other Israelites, who did embrace the faith. For James, John and Peter, discharged their Apostleship amongst the circumcised Israelites, Gal. 2 8, 9. Therefore as James doth expressly direct his Epistle to the twelve Tribes scattered, so here also by the same reason, by the strangers scattered we are to understand the twelve Tribes scattered.

By the foreknowledge of God, according to which the faithful are here said to be elect, we are to understand election it self, as it is in God, Rom. 8. 29. and by election the same act of God, as it is terminated in the faithful, and put in execution by effectual vocation.

By sanctification of the Spirit, we are to understand the whole spiritual change of our condition, even unto perfect holiness and glory, because sanctification is the means of salvation unto which we are chosen, 2 Thess. 2. 13.

By obedience and sprinkling of the blood of Christ we are to understand the whole work of Redemption, together with the application thereof unto justification and reconciliation with God, Ephes. 1. 6. 7.

The Doctrines that we may draw from this are these.

Doct. 1. The beginning and fountain of all our happiness and consolation consists in this, that we are the elect of God.

This is gathered from hence, that the Apostle purposing in this description to make mention of those things that did most of all pertain to the consolation of the faithful, puts election in the first place, 1 Thess. 1. 4.

Reason 1. Because all our happiness comes wholly from God, who is the author and fountain of all good: now it comes from him not by the way of nature, but of counsel and free election, and so it proceeds from election it self.

2. Because all his special blessings which belong unto our salvation, depend upon election, Ephes. 1. 3▪ 4.

Use. This may serve to exhort us to use all diligence to make our election certain and sure. 2 Peter 1. 10.

Doct. 2. There is no other cause or reason to be given of our election unto salvation, but only the good pleasure of God.

This is drawn from those words: Elect according to the foreknowledge of God: for if there were any cause extra Deum, out of God, that could possibly be discerned by the eye or sense of men, it is most likely that the Apostle would have named that, as being more known and discernible, and so more properly belonging to that consolation and congratulation which he proposed to himself.

Reason 1. Because the counsels and decrees of God do not depend upon those things that are extra Deum, without God, but they depend upon God's decrees: for the decrees are first, and they last.

2. Because otherwise all the glory of our election and salvation should not wholly be ascribed unto God, and consequently all praise and thanksgiving should not be due unto him alone.

3. Because if our election did depend upon ourselves, who are weak and changeable every hour, our election also it self would be changeable and uncertain, and so would afford us no sound consolation.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that make God's election to depend upon our faith and perseverance, as a cause or condition requisite.

2. To exhort us to acknowledge this wonderful grace of God towards us, and to give him all the praise and glory of it, both in the inward desires of our hearts, and the joyful profession of our tongues, and our lives answerable thereunto.

Doct. 3. True sanctification is a certain fruit of election.

Reason 1. Because sanctification is a certain effect and sign of the singular love of Christ, Ephes. 5. 25, 26. Now this singular love, which hath respect to spiritual blessings, doth nothing differ from election, as touching the thing it self.

2. Because sanctification is, as it were, actual election: for as by the election of God, the heirs of salvation are distinguished from others in God himself, or in his intention and counsel; so also by regeneration and sanctification are they distinguished from others in themselves. For to sanctify, according to the general signification of the word, is to set apart to some use.

3. Because sanctification, although it be imperfect, yet it is that salvation and life begun unto which we are elected.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those men that make sanctification the common possession of those that are not elect.

2. To comfort all those that are partakers of true sanctification: because thereby they may the more assured of their election.

3. To exhort us to be very careful to increase our sanctification.

Doct. 4. The mediation of Christ, and reconciliation made for us in him, is the only means whereby the force of our election is derived unto us, and our sanctification and salvation is propagated.

This is gathered from those words: by obedience and sprinkling.

Reason 1. Because God made Christ our Mediator, neither is there any other name under heaven whereby we may be saved.

2. Because God made him the Mediator of our redemption by virtue of his election: for those whom God elected, he gave unto Christ to be redeemed and saved, John 17. 6. John 6. 37.

3. Because Christ is the second Adam, the Father, the head of all those that are elected and to be saved: therefore as life natural was derived unto all men first from Adam, so also from Christ, and in him is all life spiritual communicated unto us.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Papists and others which have chosen to themselves other means and mediators extra Christum, besides Christ, and have departed from that way of salvation which the eternal election of God hath prescribed.

2. To exhort us to put our whole trust and confidence in Christ alone, and daily to seek after a nearer and nearer union with him.

Doct. 5. In that chain of our salvation, the beginning is from God the Father, the dispensation of it is through his Son Jesus Christ, the application of it is through the Holy Ghost.

This is intimated in that solemn benediction which the Church received from the Apostle.

Reason. Because this order of operation doth best agree with the order of subsisting, which the Scripture attributes to the Divine persons.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, by no means to put a sunder those operations which God hath joined together: Now this they do, which do either divide Christ from election, or election from Christ, or the election of the Father and Christ from the sanctification of the holy Ghost, promising to themselves salvation, either by virtue of election, or of Christ, when they have not the least part of the sanctification of the holy Ghost.

2. To comfort all the true faithful, which do join these things together: because they can want nothing to salvation, which is not abundantly provided for them in that co-operation of God the Father, Son, and holy Ghost.

Verse 3. Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, which according to his abundant mercy, hath begotten us again unto a lively hope, by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

Verse 4. To an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you.

Verse 5. Who are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation, ready to be revealed in the last time.

The Analysis.

BEcause the Apostles scope in the general and former part of this Epistle, was to commend unto the faithful that true grace of God wherein they stood, therefore he doth first describe that grace, verse. 3, 4, 5.

2. By the effect of it, to wit, joy, and rejoicing, which redounds unto all the faithful from the partaking of this grace, from the 6 verse. to the 10.

3. He doth illustrate it and confirm it by that testimony, which the Prophets gave unto this grace, verse. 10, 11, 12.

4. From thence he draws and exhortation to holiness answerable to this grace, from the 13 verse. to the end of the first chap. The means of which holiness he shows to be the religious receiving of the word of God, verse. 1, 2, 3. of the second chapter. The chief object of which word he shows to be Christ, from the 4 verse. to the 13. where is the general end of this institution.

The description, verse. 3, 4 5. of the state of this grace is placed in regeneration or effectual calling in these words: hath begotten us again: which regeneration is described, •. by the principal efficient cause thereof, which is set down to be, God the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, 2. By the impulsive cause thereof, the mercy of God, which is described by the quantity of it, abundant. 3. By the immediate effect thereof, a lively hope: the singular cause whereof is shown to be the resurrection of Christ from the dead. 4. By the remote and last effect thereof, which is laid hold on also, and in some sort possessed by that hope, that is, salvation and life everlasting, verse. 4. Betwixt which effect and its cause he affirms that there is a very certain connection, when he saith, that that inheritance is reserved in heaven for all the regenerate; and he gives a most certain reason of his connection, verse. 5. which he shows to consists in three things. 1. In the power of God, whereby the regenerate are kept unto salvation. 2. In their faith, whereby they adhere to this power of God. 3. in the eternal degree of God, whereby he hath both provided this salvation for all the regenerate, and appointed a certain time, wherein to bestow it upon them.

But this description of God's grace is not simply and barely proposed by the Apostle, but after such a manner as is agreeable to the nature of the thing, that is, with thanksgiving and glorifying of the name of God, in that he hath vouchsafed to bestow so great a grace upon miserable sinners, in that first word, Blessed be God.

The Doctrines drawn from this.

Doct. 1. The state of grace depends upon and flows from effectual calling.

This is gathered from hence, that the Apostle speaking of the grace wherein the faithful stood, begins with regeneration, by which is understood effectual calling.

Reason 1. Because by our true calling we have union with Christ the fountain of all grace.

2. Because in this regeneration there is begotten in us a principle of spiritual life, which is nothing else but the grace of God, or the power and gift of grace quickening our souls.

3. Because from this union which we have by being made partakers of spiritual life, there doth certainly and immediately follow a communion with the Father in all spiritual blessings, and consequently a change of our condition from that which before it was, to wit, sin and death, to that whereunto we are called, grace and life.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us to use all diligence to make our calling sure, because without it we have no entrance to the state of grace.

2. To comfort all those that endeavor to obey God's call; for all of them have (as it were) the door of God's grace opened unto them.

Doctr. 2. God regenerates us, as the Father of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Reason 1. Because in Christ our Redeemer, and in our redemption performed by him, he laid the foundation of all our restoring to salvation.

2. Because he made Christ that great Shepherd, that should gather his sheep, that is, the elect into his fold, by effectual calling and regeneration. Heb. 13. 20. John 10. 16.

3. Because through Christ and his name men are called and regenerated by God, 2 Cor. 5. 18, 19, 20.

Use. This may serve to inform us, that in all those things that belong unto our salvation, we ought always to look upon God in Christ, and consequently always to call upon and praise God in Christ. The solemn title, and as it were style of God, that was used in the celebrating of his name, was not always one and the same from the beginning of the world, but diverse: first, he was called by Melchizedek, the most high God, possessor of heaven and earth, Gen. 14. 19. Afterwards by reason of that singular covenant which he made with Abraham and his posterity, he began to be called the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob: then again, after that wonderful deliverance of his people out of Egypt, for the memory of that thing there was added to his title, The God which brought the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage: so also in the Prophet, after his deliverance of them from the Babylonish captivity, he was called The Lord which brought up his people out of the North country, Ier. 23. 7, 8. But now under the New Testament, and the Sun being risen, all his other works and benefits being obscured by the coming of Christ, this title is most congruous and solemn, God the Father of our Lord Iesies Christ, 2 Cor. 1. 3. Ephes. 1, 3:

Doct. 3. A wonderful great mercy of God appears in our regeneration.

Reason 1. Because he frees us from the greatest misery, and makes us partakers of the greatest good.

2. Because he doth this of his mere goodness, not only without our deserts, but even contrary to our deserts: when we did not so much as seek or wish for any such benefits to ourselves, but were altogether aliens from God, and enemies to him.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us to attribute all to the mercy of God alone, and to raise up our minds to the admiration of it.

2. To be heartily affected with these mercies of God, and to be stirred up to glorify him, Rom. 12. 1.

Doct. 4. Regeneration brings men a lively hope of eternal life.

Reason 1. Because we are called and regenerated to salvation and eternal glory, 1 Pet. 5. 10.

2 Because we have the covenant and promise of this thing confirmed to us in our very calling.

Because the Spirit wherewith we are quickened, lifts up our minds, and makes that hope to be lively.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us, highly to prize our calling and regeneration.

3 2. to endeavor by all means to cherish and increase this hope in ourselves, and to take heed that it be not dead or languishing, but lively, quick, and operative.

Doct. 5. The liveliness of our hope depends upon the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead.

Reason 1. Because by the resurrection of Christ, it appears that death was subdued & overcome by him, and God was appeased in him; for otherwise, had he been overcome by death, he would have been perpetually kept under it.

2. Because Christ rose, as the first fruits of all the regenerate, 1 Cor. 15. 20. and the first borne from the dead, Col. 1. 8. Apoc. 1. 5.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, for the confirmation and quickening of our hope, to put before our eyes the resurrection of Christ.

Doct. 6. That salvation which we hope for, is a celestial and incorruptible inheritance, Vers. 4.

Reason 1. It comes from God our Father to us his regenerate and adopted sons, as worldly inheritances use to come from fathers to their children.

2. Because it is not obtained by buying or any other such like means of our own, but it comes by the will and testament of our heavenly Father. Now as for these reasons, it is rightly called an inheritance; so also in the nature of it it hath this excellency above all other inheritances, that it is celestial and immortal: in which respect it doth not only excel worldly possessions, but also even that very condition of life which Adam had before the fall.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to suffer our hearts at any time to cleave to the things of this world, or to depend upon them, because our inheritance is not terrestrial, or of this world, but celestial and incorruptible.

2. To exhort us to walk as it becometh those that are called to so great an inheritance. For this is it which the Apostle means, when he usually admonisheth us to walk according to our calling, and when he prays, that God would enlighten the eyes of our minds, and grant us to know what is the hope of his calling, & what the riches, Ephes. 1. 18. as if that they that did clearly see this and meditate upon it, could not falter or fail in any duty.

Doct. 7. The exceeding great power of God, his fidelity and constancy, doth make this inheritance firm and sure unto us.

This is gathered out of the 5. verse, and you may see it proved, Eph. 1. 19.

Reason 1. Because God doth powerfully perform all things, whatsoever he hath decreed and promised. 2. Because all the whole business of our salvation depends upon the omnipotency of God: for the enemies of our salvation, and the difficulties of it are so great, that no other power is able to subdue them.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that will have our salvation to depend upon the frailty of our will: they deny that God doth powerfully work in us to salvation, when notwithstanding the Scripture doth expressly affirm it. Eph. 1. 19. & 3. 16. 20. 2. For comfort; for when we have such a Keeper as is omnipotent, we have no cause to fear that anything present or to come should ever frustrate our hope, or deprive us of our expected salvation. 3. To exhort us, to depend upon that power of God by true faith, as it is in the text.

Doct. 8. These spiritual blessings of God, should never be mentioned or thought upon by us, without a pious desire to bless God for them.

Use. This may serve to reprove that sluggishness and Luke-warmness of ours, which is oftentimes so great, that we are no otherwise affected when we speak, hear, or think of these things, then when we are talking of common things: yea, we are scarce so much moved, as we use to be then, when we speak of any worldly profit, which doth delight us.

Verse 6. Wherein ye greatly rejoice: though now for a season (if need be) ye are in heaviness through manifold temptations.

7. That the trial of your faith, being much more precious then of Gold that perisheth, though it be tried with fire, might be found unto praise, and honor, and glory, at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

8. Whom having not seen, ye love; in whom, though now ye see him not, yet believing ye rejoice with joy unspeakable and full of glory.

9. Receiving the end of your faith, even the salvation of your Souls.

GRace is here set forth by the effect and adjunct thereof, which he makes to consist in the greatest joy, in those words, wherein ye rejoice. Now this joy is amplified by those manifold afflictions and temptations, which usually mak men sad rather than joyful, in the other part of the 6. verse, where the amplification per discretum axioma, by a discret axiom, is to be conceived after this manner. Although by reason of manifold afflictions and temptations ye are exceeding heavy, yet so great is the excellency of this grace wherein ye stand, that these afflictions are no hindrance to you, because ye rejoice in that grace with great joy.

Now that afflictions should not take away spiritual joy from the faithful, he shows, first, from the nature of those afflictions, wherewith the faithful are wont to be vexed. 2. From the nature of that grace, which produceth spiritual joy. The heaviness of afflictions is diminished. 1. By the adjunct of duration, that they are but for a season. 2. By the adjunct of profit, that they bring fruit & utility; and for no other cause do they befall them, in these words: if need be. 3. By the singular end and use of afflictions, by which also their profit is shown, to wit, that they serve for the trial of their faith; which trial of faith is set forth by a simile, and that of a lesser, the trial of Gold. 4. By the effect of it, which is praise, honor and glory at the appearing of Jesus Christ.

The nature of grace he shows to be such, as that it can overcome all afflictions: the reason whereof he makes to be this, because it joins us with Christ, without the help of the outward senses, and so both against and above sense, it lifts up the mind to the greatest joy verse 8. of which joy he declareth first the adjuncts of it, unspeakable and full of glory, and afterwards the cause or argument that moves or stirs up such joy in the faithful, to wit, that by their faith they are made surer of the salvation of their Souls; which is the end and scope of the 9 verse.

The Doctrines drawn hence.

Doct. 1. Joy and spiritual rejoicing ariseth from the sense and participation of spiritual grace.

This is gathered from those words: Wherein ye rejoice. For exultatio, rejoicing is a vehement act of joy, as tis intimated in the end of the 8. verse.

Reason. 1. Because it is the nature of joy, for the mind to delight it self with the possession of some solid good: now there is no good that can be Compared cum Summo bono. with that chief good and eternal happiness; & this we begin to have possession of in having possession of saving grace; and the complete and full possession of it is laid hold on and made sure by faith and hope; and hence it is that spiritual joy is properly the fruit of hope. Heb. 3. 6. Rom. 5. 2. Yet notwithstanding this is so to be understood, as that we must not exclude all those from the state of grace, which have not this joy sometimes; because this joy d•pends upon the sense of grace; now sometimes they have not the sense of grace, that are either hindered by ignorance, or some grievous temptation, that they cannot be sensible of that which they have.

Use. 1. This may serve to refute those carnal men, who suppose the practice of religion to be full of sadness and heaviness, without any joy or delight; when indeed the joy of these men is nothing else but madness, Eccles. 2. 2. and is changed at length into the greatest sorrow: but true and solid joy is the privilege of all the godly, because they alone have true cause of joy, and that joy shall never be taken from them.

2. To exhort us to raise up our minds to the exercise of this joy, for thereunto we are called, that we should always rejoice in the Lord, Phil. 4. 4. An example hereof we have in the Eunuch, who went forward in his way with joy, after that by baptism he was made sure of the grace of God, Acts 8. 39.

Doct. 2. Manifold afflictions may well stand with this joy.

Reason 1. Because although afflictions may makes us somewhat heavy, yet that heaviness is not in the highest degree, that it should wholly possess and overwhelm our minds, but it is mitigated and overcome by spiritual joy.

2. Because the afflictions themselves are turned into matter of joy and rejoicing, James 1. 2. Rom. 5. 3.

Use. This may serve to admonish us not so much to fear the afflictions of this world, or at any time so to lie down them, as to cast off all our joy.

Doct. 3. Afflictions are turned into matter of rejoicing, when there is such use made of them, as that our faith and every grace is stirred up and increased by them.

This is gathered from the seventh Verse.

Reason 1. Because we make great gain by the trial of our faith, much more then can be gotten by the trial of gold, as it is in the Text.

2. Because faith by this trial becomes the stronger by reason of afflictions, and doth more firmly expect praise, honor and glory in Christ, as it is in the Text.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to make it our primary and chiefest care not to faint in our faith and other graces, when we are in the midst of afflictions, as those that have but a temporary faith are wont to do, but to labor to profit by them.

Doct. 4. This joy doth not depend upon the sight or visible presence of Christ.

This is gathered from the eighth Verse.

Reason 1. Because faith and hope is properly of those things that are not seen, Rom. 8. 24. Heb. 11. 1. Now this joy ariseth from faith and hope, as it is in the Text.

2. Because we rejoice either in the actual possession, or in the certainty of the possession of the things we love. Now Christ having not yet seen we love, as it is in the Text.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, while we live here by faith, so to walk, rejoice, and live, as if we did behold Christ with our eyes: For blessed are all they which have not seen and yet have believed, John 20. 29.

Doct. 5. This joy is unspeakable and full of glory.

Reason. Because both the thing it self wherein we rejoice, and the operation of the Spirit in raising our minds unto it, is more divine, then can possibly be conceived, much less expressed by us.

Use. 1. This may serve to admonish us not to be too curious in the searching after and declaring of those things that are unutterable.

2. To exhort us to apply our souls to the sense and exercise of this grace, because they have a divine and glorious nature.

Doct. 6. By this joy we begin to look for the end of our faith, even the salvation of our souls.

Reason. Because this spiritual joy is a glorious beginning of our glory, and so of our salvation through Christ.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, highly to prize this spiritual joy, and by all means to be careful to stir up and cherish it in ourselves.

Verse 10. Of which salvation the Prophets have inquired and searched diligently, who prophesied of the grace that should come unto you, Verse 11. Searching what, or what manner of time the Spirit of Christ which was in them did signify, when it testified beforehand the sufferings of Christ, and the glory that should follow.

Verse 12. Unto whom it was revealed, that not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister the things which are now reported unto you by them that have preached the Gospel unto you, with the Holy Ghost sent down from Heaven, which things the Angels desire to look into.

TO confirm and illustrate the grace and salvation, that hath hitherto been spoken of, the Apostle in these verses brings the testimony of the Prophets; which is set forth, 1. By the principal object thereof, which is nothing else but this selfsame salvation and grace, wherein the faithful Christians now stand, in these words: of which salvation that should come unto us they prophesied. 2. By the manner how they were employed about this object; They did it with great care and diligent heed, in these words, they inquired and searched diligently. 3. By the singular description of that object whereabout they were employed, verse. 11. and the manner how. The object, to wit, salvation and grace before spoken of, is described by the efficient cause thereof, namely, the mediation of Christ, consisting of two parts, his humiliation and exaltation at the end of the verse. And the manner how the Prophets are said to have been employed about this cause of our salvation, consisted in two things: 1. That they did not only desire to know the very thing it self, but also the very moment of time wherein it should be revealed, in these words, what, or what manner of time. 2. That it did not depend upon various and uncertain conjectures, but they did religiously ask counsel of the Spirit of Christ, that was present with them, as of one that did foreknow and could foretell of all things that should happen, in these words, the Spirit of Christ which was in them, that testified beforehand, did signify.

The testimony it self of the Prophets is proposed in the 12 verse, to wit, that this grace and salvation was to be revealed at that very time wherein it appeared, and no other: which testimony of the Prophets is also set forth by the like testimonies of the Apostles and Angels. The similitude that is betwixt the Apostles and the Prophets is shown herein; that as the Prophets prophesied of these things by the Spirit of Christ, that was in them, that foretold it; so the Apostles declared the same things by the holy Ghost sent down from Heaven. The similitude that is betwixt the Angels and the Prophets is shown herein; that as the Prophets inquired and searched diligently concerning this salvation; so also the Angels did desire to look into it, all and each of which make very much for the setting forth of this grace.

The Doctrines drawn from hence are these.

Doct. 1. The chief part of the prophesies of all the true Prophets that have been from the beginning of the world, was concerning the grace and salvation that should come by Jesus Christ our Lord and Savior.

This is gathered from the tenth Verse. The like you may see, Acts 3. 18, 20. and 7. 52.

Reason 1. Because the salvation of the Church in all ages depended upon Christ: Now it was the office of the Prophets to direct the Church in the seeking of their salvation.

2. All the Prophets were Ministers of Christ, and were led by his Spirit, Verse 11. and therefore ought to seek his honor.

3. Because after this manner were men's minds to be prepared by degrees for the receiving of Christ that was to come: for what is said of John the Baptist, doth in some sort belong unto all the Prophets, that they did prepare the ways of the Lord.

Use 1. This may serve for Information, to confirm and establish the true faith, not only against the Heathens and Jews, but also against the Papists themselves, who say that this true doctrine of the grace revealed in Jesus Christ, is a new doctrine, and never heard of before these times; for we acknowledge no other grace, but that which those Prophets always prophesied of from the beginning of the world.

2. To exhort us, continually to meditate upon this grace ourselves, and as occasion shall serve, to show it forth unto others, with all freeness and readiness of mind. for this doth become us much rather than those, that lived so long before the coming of Christ, and beheld him only afar off.

Doct. 2. Those ancient Prophets did not only prophesy of this grace, but they did also enquire and search diligently into it.

This is gathered from the same words.

Reason 1. Because it seemed unto them, as indeed it is, a very great mystery of godliness, 1 Tim. 3. 16. therefore they saw that they must use the very utmost of their endeavors, to come to some measure of the knowledge of that which did lie hid therein, both for their own comfort and the edification of the Church.

2 Because this truth was proposed unto them in a more obscure manner under types and shadows so that they could not look into the thing it self without great care and labor.

Use 1. This may serve for information, hereby we may understand what manner of men the true Prophets of God were heretofore: they did not utter words without sense, or understanding, or care-taking of those things that did lie before them, as the diabolical Prophets of the Heathens were wont to do in their fury: but they did wholly apply their minds to what they did.

2. To exhort us therefore to lay aside all sloth and sluggishness, and to use all care and diligence in the enquiring and searching after these divine things: for this industry is much more requisite for us, then it was for them, to whom the holy Ghost did immediately dictate all things.

Doct 3. The foundation of all this gr•c• and salvation, lies in the humiliation and exaltation of our Lord Ie•us Christ.

This is gathered from the eleventh Verse.

Reason. Because the whole mediation of Christ, whereby our salvation is procured, is contained in those two parts.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us, always to join those two things together, in the seeking of our salvation: for they are in their own nature so conjoined, that if they should be separated, our faith and hope would be made altogether void. This is the rock of offense at which the Jews did, and to this day do stumble, in that they look for outward glory and majesty in their Messias, even without any suffering or humiliation going before.

2. To exhort us always in all things to build upon this foundation.

Doct. 4. Not only the essence it self of this mystery is usually inquired after by the godly, but even all the circumstances thereof, as far forth as they may be comprehended.

This is gathered from those words: searching what or what manner of time.

Reason 1. Because in this mystery there is nothing of so small consequence, as that it may be neglected without loss to ourselves.

2. Because love is careful to enquire into all things that pertain to the thing beloved, though otherwise they may seem to be very small.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to think it enough to have some confused knowledge of the common principles of the Gospel, but to exercise ourselves to come to a more full and distinct knowledge of every grace of God.

Doct. 5. All these things were always declared only by the Spirit of Christ that was in the Prophets.

This is gathered from the eleventh Verse.

Reason. Because as no man knows the things of man, but the Spirit of man, so no man knows the things of Christ, but the Spirit of Christ, 1 Cor. 2. 11.

Use 1. This may serve for information, hereby we may confirm ourselves in the truth of Christ's divine nature, because the Spirit of God which spake in the Prophets from the beginning, is here expressly called the Spirit of Christ.

2. To exhort us, to depend upon Christ, and from his Spirit to seek for all light in searching the Scriptures, and inquiring after divine things.

Doct. 6. Although saving grace was the same, that was in the Church from the beginning of the world, yet notwithstanding great is our prerogative in this grace above the Prophets, and those to whom they prophesied before the coming of Christ.

This is gathered from the twelfth Verse, Not unto themselves, but unto us they did minister.

Reason 1. It is by reason of that clearer light which accompanied the coming of the Sun, and continues from that time.

2. By reason of the greater efficacy of the holy Ghost, as it is in the text.

3. By reason of the larger communication of this grace, which is now extended unto all Nations.

Use 1. This may serve for to comfort us, because we do abound in this grace, our hearts ought to be strengthened against all terrors.

2. To exhort us, that as this grace doth abound, so should our thankfulness also abound in all practice of piety; for he that hath received much, of him is much required.

Doct. 7. So great is the excellency of the grace and salvation offered unto us by Christ, that even the Angels themselves desire to look into it.

This is gathered out of those words, which things the Angels desire to look into. So 1 Tim. 3. 16. you may see it proved.

Reason. Because there are some things in this mystery, which the Angels themselves are yet ignorant of, Matth. 24. 36. into those things they desire to look, that they may know them: into other things that they do know they desire also to look that they may delight themselves in beholding the glory of God, as it were in a glass.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, never to be weary of searching into these holy mysteries, whether it be in hearing the Word of God in public, or in reading and meditating upon it in private.

Verse 13. Wherefore gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, and hope to the end, for the grace that is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ:

Verse 14. As obedient children, not fashioning yourselves according to the former lusts in your ignorance:

Verse 15. But as he which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation;

Verse 16. Because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy.

Verse 17. And if ye call on the Father, who without respect of persons judgeth according to every man's work, pass the time of your sojourning here in fear.

Verse 18. For as much as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things, as silver and gold, from your vain conversation received by tradition from your fathers.

Verse 19. But with the precious blood of Christ, as of a Lamb without blemish, and without spot, Verse 20. Who verily was fore-ordained before the foundation of the world, but was manifest in these last times for you.

Verse 21. Who by him do believe in God that raised him up from the dead and gave him glory, that your faith and hope might be in God.

Verse 22. Seeing ye have purified your souls in obeying the truth through the Spirit, unto unfeigned love of the brethren; see that ye love one another with a pure heart, fervently, Verse 23. Being borne again, not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible, by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever.

Verse 24. For all flesh is as grass, and all the glory of man as the flower of grass: the grass withereth, and the flower thereof falleth away;

Verse 25. But the word of the Lord endureth forever: and this is the word which by the Gospel is preached unto you.

IN this part of the chapter, there is contain'd an exhortation to persist and go forward in the grace of God; which is the Scope of the whole Epistle, as was shown before: Now this duty is described in general in the 13. verse, and afterwards is set forth, and pressed by divers arguments in the verses following. From the description of the grace before proposed, there is as it were a conclusion drawn, which is inferred by a necessary connection and consequence from the nature of that grace, as it was before described; which evidently appears by the conjunction Wherefore; and that is the reason why in all the parts of this exhortation, as they are distinctly propounded, there is a singular respect had to some part of the description that went before, wherein the nature of that grace was explained. The duty therefore to which the Apostle doth exhort, is described. First by the cause and principal part thereof; which is a lively hope, of which there was mention made before in the third verse. Secondly, By the singular object of this hope, in beholding whereof it should be confirmed and strengthened; which is that grace? that is now in some measure brought unto the faithful, but shall hereafter be communicated more fully and perfectly; in these words: Hope for that Grace, which is to be brought unto you at the revelation of Jesus Christ; which part of the description, is taken from the end of the 7. verse. 3. By the adjunct of constancy and perseverance, which is especially aimed at in the whole Epistle, as the chief scope thereof; in these words: hope to the end. 4. There is added also the manner and means of performing this duty, when he tells us, that it should be done courageously and readily, with sobriety and watchfulness, in these words: Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober. This exhortation is set forth and pressed by divers arguments; the first of which is taken from regeneration or effectual calling, whereby all the faithful are made the Sons of God, which reason is taken from the 5. verse, where mention is made of the regeneration of the faithful, by the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ: because by this regeneration or calling, the faithful are translated from the state of sin, into the state of grace: therefore this reason is given in both respects; both that they should renounce their former sins, verse 14. and that they should conform themselves to the holiness of that calling, wherewith they are called, verse 15. Which is urged and enforced by a double argument: the first is taken from the likeness, that ought to be betwixt the person calling and the persons called, as the Scripture it self in the old Test. witnesseth, verse 15. 16. The second is taken from the severity of God's judgment, which they can by no means escape, that call God their Father, and yet dishonor his name, verse 17. The second argument of the exhortation, is taken from redemption, and the means and end thereof, verse 18. 19. Of which there was mention made before at the end of verse 3. and verse 11. Because the consideration of this redemption obtained by Jesus Christ, and of Christ himself, is very necessary and effectual to admonish, and stir up the faithful, to take care of their duty: therefore the Apostle stays a while upon the description of Christ, as he was from all eternity fore-ordained to perform the office of a mediator, at the beginning of the 20. verse, and as he was manifest in time, verse 20. 21. which is taken from verse 11. 12.

The third argument is taken from sanctification, as it flows from the regeneration of the spirit, and from the word of God, which are the proper causes thereof, verse 22. 3. 4. 5. whereby the way that part of Christian duty is commended, that hath respect to the mutual love of the faithful amongst themselves, verse 22. because all the faithful by regeneration, are made partakers of the same spiritual life; but yet the chiefest argument, whereby we are exhorted to constancy in that and every other grace, is taken from the incorruptible nature of the word, whereby we are regenerated, and consequently of regeneration it self; which is set forth by a comparison of things that are unlike it. Verse 23, 24, 25.

The DOCTRINES arising herence are these.

Doct. 1. The Consideration of the grace of God, that is brought unto us in Christ, should stir us up to the practice of Piety.

This is gathered from the connection, which is intimated in that particle, Wherefore, verse 13.

Reas. 1. Because the end of Grace is to free us from sin, and to make us conformable to the image of God, Luc. 1. 74. 75. 2. Because by that means it is very fitting for us, to teach and further us in that practice. Tit. 2. 11. 12. 3. Because it cannot be truly learned by us, unless it work this in us, Eph. 4, 20. 1, 2, 3, 4.

Use 1. This may serve to condemne those that turn the grace of God into wantonness Gal. 5. 13. 2. To exhort us to use all care to make this grace effectual in our hearts, that it may bring forth great fruits of Piety.

Doct. 2. The foundation of sound holiness is firmly to hope for that grace that shall be revealed at the coming of Jesus Christ our Lord.

This is gathered from the 13. verse. So Phil. 3. 20. Tit. 2. 13.

Reas. 1. Because this hope is the perfection of that wherein our spiritual life doth consist. 2. Because this expectation represents the reward unto us, by contemplating, whereupon we are made immovable and abounding in the work of the Lord. 1. Cor. 15. 58. Heb. 6. 11. 3. Because this hope begets patience, whereby with strong consolation it doth overcome all the difficulties, that are wont to befall men in the course of Godliness. Heb. 6. 12. 18. 19.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to have a care to lay this foundation very sure in our hearts, and daily to confirm it more and more.

Doct. 3. To keep this hope firm and lively, we should courageously gird up ourselves that we might be prepared, and ready to perform all those things that tend thereunto.

This is gathered from those words: gird up the loins of your mind; for this is it, that is signified by the habit of a man, that hath his loins girt in Scripture, that he is prepared and ready to perform his duty. Luc. 12. 35.

Reas. 1. Because the difficulty to retain this hope is very great, in so much, that it cannot be kept without earnest endeavor. 2. Because in spiritual duties our loins are too slack, that is, the sloth of sin, and infirmity hath taken hold of all our faculties. Heb. 12. 12.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, by no means to yield to the sloth and sluggishness of our corrupt nature, but to strive against it as much as we can, and laying aside every weight, and the sloth that doth beset us, to run the race that is set before us, Heb. 12. 1.

Doct. 4. Sobriety in the use of the things of this life, doth very much conduce to the furtherance of this endeavor.

This is gathered from this word Be sober and hope.

Reas. Because the love and immoderate use of the things of this world, doth so burden the soul, and glue it to the earth, that it cannot lift up it self to seek after heavenly things.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to addict our minds to any worldly thing, but here to use this world, and not abuse it. 1 Cor. 7. 31.

Doct. V. The state of adoption, whereby we are made the sons of God, should stir us up to the practice of holiness.

This is gathered from these words: As obedient Children.

Reas. 1. Because Children should bear the image of their Father: Now the image of God consists in holiness and righteousness. 3. Because it is the duty of Children, readily and of their own accord to apply themselves to the will of their Father. Now the will of God is our sanctification. 1 Thes. 4. 3. this is it that is intimated in that title, where the faithful are called obedient Children.

Use. 1. This may serve to condemn those, that with the wicked Jews say, they are the Children of Abraham and of God, when notwithstanding, they do the works of the Devil, John 8. 41. 2. 4. 1 John 3. 8. 10. 2. To exhort us, in all things to make it appear, that we are the true sons of God, by obedience unto his will, and our practice of holiness: for unless we bear the chastisements of the Lord, that by them we may be made partakers of his holiness, hereby we show that we are bastards, and not true sons. Heb. 12. 8. 10.

Doct. 6. This filial obedience, and the fashioning of ourselves a cording to the former lusts of our sins, cannot stand together.

This is gathered from the opposition, that is made betwixt these two, verse 14. where the one being affirmed, that we are obedient Children, the other is denied, that we should not fashion ourselves according to our lusts.

Reas. 1. Because they, which by regeneration are made the Children of God, are new creatures, have a new nature and new affections, so that they have wholly renounced their former nature and affections: and for this very cause they are called in the Text, Former lusts, or, which were before.

2. Because the former lusts of sin do wholly withdraw us from the will of God, which we ought to obey.

3. Because the former lusts of sin are such, that all that are come to the knowledge of the truth, may be ashamed of them; this is intimated in the Text, where they are called lusts which were in our ignorance: because they cannot endure the light.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that profess themselves the children of God, and call upon God as their Father, & yet follow the same course of life that the children of this world do.

2. To exhort us, not to conform ourselves to this world, Rom. 12. 2. where there is a reason also given of this exhortation, in the 1 Verse, because if we do this we cannot present ourselves to God as a living sacrifice, acceptable unto him. So 2 Tim. 2. 19.

Doct. 7. The calling of the faithful doth necessarily require holiness in them.

This is gathered from Verse 15, 16.

Reason 1. Because holiness is one of the chief ends of this calling, therefore it is usually called in the Scriptures a holy calling, 2 Tim. 1. 9.

2. Because God which calleth us is most holy, and he calls us to have communion with him in holiness, as it is in the Text.

3. Because the calling it self is in its own nature a setting of a man apart from the common and corrupt use of the world to a sacred use; and therefore it is a consecration or dedication of men unto holiness.

Use 1. This may serve to rebuke and condemn those, that seek for nothing by their Christian calling, but justification and bliss, and in the mean time altogether neglect the care to live holily.

2. To exhort us, in all our conversation to endeavor to be holy, as it is in the Text; Be ye holy in all manner of conversation; that is, so walk, as it becometh the calling, wherewith ye are called.

Doct. 8. The severity of God's judgment should stir us up to the practice of piety.

This is gathered from Verse 17.

Reason 1. Because God in executing his judgments is no respecter of persons, as it is in the Text. Now the name and profession of the faith, is nothing else, but the person of the Christian; as circumcision and the profession of the law was the person of the Jew: Such a profession therefore without sound holiness cannot stand before God's Tribunal.

2. Because God doth in some sort more severely require holiness of those that by their calling draw near unto God, & call him Father, as it is in the Text, then he doth of others, Levite. 10. 3. I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me.

Use. This may serve to admonish us not to cosen ourselves in relying wholly upon the outward profession of faith, but to appear before God always with fear and reverence, as it is in the Text: because our God is a consuming fire, Heb. 12. 29.

Doct. 9. The consideration of our redemption should be a strong argument to stir up in our hearts a desire of holiness.

Reason 1. Because we are redeemed from all our vain conversation, although it be commended unto us by the use and tradition of our Fathers, Vers. 18. Therefore for a man to follow such fashions, after that he is come to the knowledge of redemption, is nothing else, but to oppose himself against his own redemption, and as much as in him lies, to make it void and of none effect.

2. Because by this redemption we are bought to be the servants of God, 1 Cor. 6. 20. & 7. 23. So that we ought no longer to serve ⟨◇⟩, nor the world, nor to live according to our own will and pleasure, but according to the will of God and our Redeemer.

3. Because the price wherewith we are redeemed, is of so great worth, that it doth far surpass all the most precious things of this world: therefore there ought to be made an excellent use thereof; and yet notwithstanding only those that endeavor to be holy, make any esteem of it. Vers. 18, 19.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those that by their life dishonor Christ, and put their Redeemer to an open shame, Heb. 6. 6. they do as it were tread underfoot his blood, that was the price of our redemption, and count it an unholy thing Heb. 10. 29.

2. To exhort us, as often as we think of our redemption, (which we ought to do very oft,) so often should we think that there are as it were coals of fire heaped upon our heads, wherewith we should be inflamed to this holiness.

Doct. 10. That we may gain profit and benefit by the consideration of our redemption, we should diligently meditate upon Christ's predestination, his incarnation, humiliation, and glorification.

This is gathered from Verse 20, 21.

Reason 1. Because by this means alone is the breadth, and length, and depth, and height of God's love in Christ made manifest, Ephes. 3. 18.

2. Because by this means alone do we come to know, what a great work, and of how great difficulty it was, to deliver men from their sins.

3. Because by this also we may easily gather, how fit and just it is, that we should live unto God and Christ in all holiness, which is the scope of this Text.

Use. This may serve to admonish us not to pass over this mystery slightly in our thoughts and meditations, but to continue in contemplation thereupon, that so we may, as it were, suck therehence the juice of true godliness.

Doct. 11. The proper and immediate use of all our contemplation upon Christ, and our redemption obtained by him, is, to confirm our faith and hope in God.

This is gathered from Verse 21, at the end.

Reason 1. Because the end of Christ's mediation is, that through him we should believe in God, as it is here affirmed.

2. Because Christ left us an example of putting our faith and hope in God; for he in his way perfectly performed it, and by that means attained the highest glory.

3. Because for our sakes and for our good was that glory given unto Christ, which our faith and hope look and seek after.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, always to look unto Jesus Christ the author and finisher of our faith, Heb. 12. 2. and by looking unto him to quicken our faith and hope.

Doct. 12. The calling of the faithful hath the purification of the soul joined with it.

This is gathered from the beginning of the •2 Verse. So 2 Pet. 2. 20. Hence it is that the washing of baptism represents that grace which is given in their calling: Now this purification and washing, which is communicated in their calling, and signified by baptism, is not by justification only, which consists in the imputing thereof unto remission of sins, but also by sanctification and the real cleansing of the soul, 1 Cor. 6. 11. Tit. 35. And this sanctification is chiefly referred to the soul as to its proper object.

Reason 1. Because outward purification and sanctification is nothing worth at all, if it be divided from the inward: for this was the hypocrisy of the Scribes and Pharisees, that are said to have made clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, when within they were full of extortion and excess, Matth. 23. 15.

2. Because the operation of the Spirit begins at the soul, and from the soul is derived to the outward man: for as all pollution proceeds first out of the heart, Matth. 15. 19. so also purification.

3. Because if the soul be once purified within, outward purity will follow of its own accord, Matth. 23. 26.

4. Because this purity doth more properly consist in the affection & intention of the soul, then in the outward practice; for the same outward works may be done by impure men; but the faithful differ from all impure hypocrites by their inward dispositions and affections.

5. Because the faithful themselves are oftentimes sustained and receive comfort by the purity which they have within in their will and purpose, though they cannot produce it into act according to their desire, Rom. 7. 21, 25.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those that are whited over with the name of Christians, but never look after the purity of their souls: and therefore they may be rightly called whited walls, Acts, 23. 7. and whited Sepulchers, Mat. 23. •7.

2. To exhort us to use the utmost of our endeavors to purify our souls, that they may be made the temples of the holy Ghost.

Doct. 13. This purification is wrought by the hearing of the word, & the effectual operation of the holy Ghost by the word.

This is gathered from these words: in obeying the truth through the Spirit. Where the word of God, especially of the Gospel, is called the truth, partly for that excellency of truth that it hath above all other sayings or writings, and partly because by virtue of the truth or faithfulness of those promises which are contained in the word, this purification is wrought, together with all those spiritual blessings that pertain to the consolation and salvation of the faithful.

Reason 1. Because the word together with the Spirit doth reveal unto us that true purity which is pleasing and acceptable to God, whereof we are ignorant.

2. Because the word together with the Spirit is the oracle or power of God unto salvation, and consequently is able to beget every grace in us.

3. Because faith purifies the hearts of the faithful, Acts 15. 9. and faith comes by hearing of the word, Rom. 10. 17.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the heresies of those, which either hold that there is such power in the strength of nature, that men may sanctify themselves at their own free will and pleasure, or, which comes all to one maintain that the outward preaching of the word is sufficient without the powerful operation of the Spirit.

2. To exhort us, first, to hearken diligently unto the word of God; secondly, not to rest ourselves satisfied in the bare letter of the word, but always to crave the grace of God and the operation of his Spirit: thirdly, in the use of the word through the Spirit to seek the purification of our souls.

Doct. 14. The effect and sign of a purified soul, is a pure, sincere, and fervent love of the faithful, as of brethren.

This is gathered from these words: unto love of the brethren.

Reason 1. Because hatred, envy, wrath, strife, enmities, and such like affections, especially, when they reflect upon the good, are some of those filthy pollutions of the flesh, from which the soul of the faithful is purified, Gal. 5. 19. 20.

2. Because the purification of our souls makes us to love purity in others, and no man can take delight in the purity of others unless he be in some measure purified himself.

3. Because in the mutual love of the faithful divers operations are exercised, to the performing whereof, their souls are in a special manner purified and sanctified, as doing good, bearing with infirmities, edification of the Church, and glorifying the name of the Lord.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that show themselves great enemies to godly men: they may rightly be called Cainites, for they have gone in the way of Cain, with those to whom the woe is denounced by Jude, Verse 12.

2. To exhort us by all means to endeavor to gain this brotherly love of the godly: wherein there is required, First, sincerity, that it should be without hypocrisy or simulation, so that it should not be in words or in show, as the Apostle speaks, but in heart. Secondly, that it should be not only from the heart, but from a pure heart; because there is a kind of love that is in some sort sincere, but yet it is impure, whiles that it doth either neglect the chiefest good or else useth such means to procure some good as are contrary thereunto: as if a man to deliver his brother from danger, should persuade him to deny the truth, or to dissemble. Thirdly, That it should be fervent, because the affection ought to be set in the highest degree upon those objects, where there is found to be the chiefest reason to stir it up.

Doct. 15. Regeneration, that is common to all the faithful, is a strong argument to provoke them to love one another.

This is gathered from the end of verse 22. and the beginning of the 23. where this reason is given, why they should love one another, because they are borne again.

Reas. Because by this regeneration all the faithful are brethren, begotten by the same Father, of the same blood, and partakers of the same spirit.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to be mindful all this argument, and to give it room and power in our hearts, so that we may upon occasion say as Abraham did, Gen. 13. 8. Let there be no strife between me and thee; for we are brethren: and to admonish others also in those words of Moses Act. 7. 26. Sirs, Ye are brethren: Why do ye wrong one another?

Doct. 16. The word of God is the incorruptible seed or principle of this regeneration.

This is gathered from the 23. verse,

Reas. 1. Because it is the word of God, (as it is in the Text;) which liveth and abideth forever; whose nature it resembleth in this, that the operation thereof is not momentary or temporary, but it abideth forever. 2. Because to speak properly, it is the word of eternal life, John 6. 68. for the end and use thereof is, to bring men to eternal life. 3. Because where it is once truly received, it never faileth. John 4. 14.

Use. 1. This may serve to refute the error of those, which hold that they that are truly regenerated, usually fall away from the grace of God, and so are borne again and again, after they have been regenerate: This is contrary, not only to the promise and covenant of God, that he will keep the faithful, that they shall not depart from him Ier. 32. 40. and to that comfort which Christ gives his members, that no man shall pluck them out of his hand, John 10. 28. But also to the operation of the spirit in the hearts of the faithful, and to the nature of the life it self, that is communicated unto them, which is incorruptible and eternal, as it is in the Text.

2. To comfort us against all those fears and terrors, that may arise from the consideration of our own infirmities; for although of ourselves we are continually falling to corruption, yet there is something borne in us, if we be truly faithful, which is incorruptible and shall abide unto eternal life.

3. To exhort us to carry ourselves answerable in all Christian duties, that is, to be constant and incorruptible in performing them: and this is it at which the Apostle doth especially aim at in this place, when he stirs up the faithful to a fervent and constant love one of another, by this argument, because they are borne again by the incorruptible word.

Doct. 17. The condition wherein the faithful are put by this incorruptible regeneration of the word, is far more excellent then all the glory of this world.

This is gathered from verse 24, 25. where there is a comparison made betwixt flesh, grass, the flower of grass, and the glory of man, on the one side, and the word of God on the other; not as the word is considered in it self, but as it is received by the faithful, and translates them into the kingdom of God.

Reason. Because as it is in the text, there is nothing in all the world but vanity, that quickly falleth away: whereas the word of God endureth forever.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us to make more precious account of the word of God and of his kingdom, then of all the world, and that not only in respect of ourselves, but of others also; as the Apostle doth in this place extol the word of God and the condition of the regenerate above all the things of the world, that by this confideration among others he might move the faithful to esteem of others, that are regenerate more highly, and to love them more fervently, then all the things of the world.

2. To comfort us, in that God of his bounty and grace hath advanced us to such a dignity.

Doct. 18. We ought to have a singular respect unto this dignity and excellency in the word of God, as it is preached unto us by the Gospel.

This is gathered from the 22 verse at the end.

Reason 1. Because the same word of God is preached unto us, that is so much commended by the Prophets, Apostles, and by Christ himself, as it is in the Text, this is that word.

2. Because it makes much unto our salvation, as it is preached unto us.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to satisfy ourselves with some general esteem of the word, as many are wont to do, that are weary of the word that is preached unto them, and loathing it do reject it; but religiously and reverently to receive the word that is preached unto us, as the eternal word of God.

Chapter II.

Verse 1. Wherefore laying aside all malice, and all guile, and hypocrisies, and envies, and evil speakings, Verse 2. As new borne babes, desire the sincere milk of the word, that ye may grow thereby.

Verse 3. If so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious.

Verse 4. To whom coming as unto a living stone, disallowed indeed of men, but chosen of God, and precious, Verse 5. Ye also as lively stones are built up a spiritual house, an holy Priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifice, acceptable to God by Jesus Christ.

Verse 6. Wherefore it is contained in the Scripture, Behold, I lay in Zion a chief corner stone, elect, precious, and he that believeth on him shall not be confounded.

Verse 7. Unto you therefore which believe he is precious, but unto them which be disobedient, the stone which the builders disallowed, the same is made the head of the corner,

Verse 8. And a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offense, even to them which stumble at the word, being disobedient, whereunto also they are appointed.

Verse 9. But ye are a chosen generation, a royal Priesthood, an holy nation, a peculiar people, that ye should show forth the praises of him, who hath called you out of darkness into his marvelous light.

Verse 10. Which in time past were not a people, but are now the people of God; which had not obtained mercy, but now have obtained mercy.

The same exhortation that the Apostle had before proposed, he doth here again repeat and press, and that not simply and barely, but by that principle and means, whereof there may and ought to be very good use made. For by occasion of those things, which he had lately spoken of the word of God, he stirs up all the faithful to the right use of this word, by whose help they might persist and grow in that grace, wherein they stood. The occasion and connection of this exhortation with the words going before is intimated in that phrase or particle, Wherefore. The exhortation it self is to a desire or love of the word of God, which he had before commended, verse 2. Which exhortation he doth so lay down, that in the first place he shows, that the vices which are contrary to this duty, must be laid aside, and taken heed of which are five: malice, guile, hypocrisies, envies, evil-speakings, verse 1. And in the second place he gives reasons agreeable thereunto, to stir us up unto this duty, (to wit, a desire of the word.) The first reason is taken, from the use or effect of this word in respect of them, that it makes much for the edification of the faithful: and this Use is allegorically set forth, verse 2 where the regenerate faithful are compared to infants newly borne, and the word to sincere milk; and the edification which is made by the word, is compared to that action, which infants obtain by the use of wholesome milk. The second reason is taken, by a continuation of the same allegory, from the object of the word, which he proposed to be tasted, and that is God himself and our Savior Jesus Christ: whose perfection and fitness for edification is declared. Verse 3 where he is said to be gracious: and is confirmed also by the experience and testimony of all the faithful, who are said to have tasted this graciousness, ibid. if so be ye have tasted that the Lord is gracious.

In the explication of this affection that ought to be set upon our Lord Jesus Christ, as the primary object of this word, the Apostle continues from Verse 4 to the 11. Where in the first place the affection and duty it self of coming unto Christ, and adhering unto him by faith, is proposed, verse 4. To whom coming. And then the reason of this duty is allegorically declared to wit, that Christ is the foundation of the spiritual building that liveth forever. Ibid. as unto a living stone; and the faithful are the parts of the building, or of the spiritual house that is to be built upon this foundation, at the beginning of verse 5. And he doth further illustrate both parts of this reason. The first, concerning the foundation or subject, he doth declare by divers arguments; when he saith that it was disallowed of men, but yet chosen of God, and precious, verse 4. The second, concerning the parts of the building that are joined to it, he doth illustrate & urge from the effects, which are allegorically also set forth, to wit, that by this coming unto Christ, as unto the foundation, the faithful are not only made a spiritual house, as the temple wherein sacrifices acceptable to God are offered up, but they shall also be the Priests that shall offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ, verse 5. This that hath been spoken of the saving effect of Christ, as our Savior; which redounds unto all the faithful, the Apostle doth confirm by the testimony of Scripture, verse 6. Which testimony he doth explain and apply by the contrary affections and manners, how contrary sorts of men carry themselves towards Christ, that is, the believers, and the unbelievers: To the believers Christ is said to be precious, verse 7. at the beginning, because they put their whole trust and confidence in Christ, and consequently give him the honor of the true Messias and Savior: but to the unbelievers he is a stone of stumbling, and a rock of offense, verse 7, 8. Because being offended at his humility they do not receive him as their Savior: whose infidelity he doth illustrate by the antecedent decree of God, whereby it was ordained, verse 8. at the end. Whereunto also they are appointed. As on the contrary the condition of the faithful is illustrated. First, by the secret election of God, that was the cause thereof, verse 9. at the beginning. Secondly, by the dignity which they obtain by faith by virtue of this election, to wit, that they are a royal Priesthood, an holy nation, God's peculiar people. Thirdly, by the end and use of this dignity to which they are called, which is, to show forth the praise of God, verse 9. at the end. Fourthly, by comparing the state that is unlike it, wherein they were before their calling, to this state of excellency and dignity whereinto they are now put by their calling unto faith in Christ, verse 10.

The Doctrines arising from hence are these.

Doct. 1. The right use of the word of God is the proper means to increase grace.

This is gathered from the connection of this exhortation with that which went before. For when the Apostle had before exhorted to constancy in grace, and to obedience, in holiness, and to brotherly love; by a reason also taken in the last place from the word of God, whereby as of incorruptible seed all the faithful are regenerated, here in the beginning of this Chapter. he commends unto us the right use of that word, as the proper and only means to perfect all those things.

Reas. 1. Because the word is the instrument chosen by God and sanctified to that use. 1 Cor. 1. 21. 2. Because the word, especially of the Gospel, is the ministration of the Spirit, who is the author and sinisher of every grace. 2 Cor. 3. 6. 8. 3. Because the word shows us the good and perfect will of God. Rom. 12. 2.

4. Because it furnisheth a man unto every good work. 2. Tim. 3. 17.

Use. 1. This may serve to refute some fanatic heretics, that neglect the word of God and look for immediate revelations, and dream of a greater perfection then is contained in the word.

2. To exhort us, to give diligent heed unto the word of God in all things, until we come to the end of perfection in heaven. 2. Pet. 1. 19.

Doct. 2. If we mean to use the word of God aright, we must have our minds ready and willing to lay aside all those vices that are contrary to the power of the word.

This is gathered from the 1. verse. Where five remarkable vices are propounded, to be laid aside, denied, and mortified, before the word can have its due effect in our hearts.

Reas. 1. Because as the matter, if it be not fitly prepared, cannot receive the form; neither can the field, if it be not manured, cherish the seed to bring forth fruit: So neither can the heart of man, if it be not subdued by repentance, receive the word of God with profit. 2. Because such a purpose to forsake all that is contrary to the word of God, is the first beginning of that saving operation, which the word of God doth make, wheresoever it begins to be received, and whereby it makes way for it self, to perfect all operations.

Use. 1. This may serve to condemn those, that will be hearers of the word of God, but so, that they will not forsake their accustomed sins. 2. To admonish us, not to take this thought and purpose into our minds in the general, and once only at our first conversion; but upon all occasions, seriously to renew this purpose, especially when we prepare ourselves to hear the word of God.

Doct. 3. We must lay aside these vices not in part only, but wholly.

This is gathered from the word, all.

Reas. 1. Because repentance is not true and unfeigned, unless it abhor the very nature of sin; it must with one and the same kind of hatred hate all kind of sin. 2. Because a man may easily deceive himself, whiles he thinks that he hath said aside some vice, if he doth not detest all appearance of it, what Specious show soever it may seem to have.

Use. This may serve to instruct us, seriously to examine our hearts, least through some deceitfulness thereof, there should lurk some vice, whereof we think ourselves to be free.

Doct. 4. We should have a singular care to lay aside those vices, that are contrary to those duties, to which we are in a special manner called; and to that disposition, which is especially required in Christians, that they may profit by the word of God.

This is gathered herence, that the Apostle, when in the last place, he had exhorted unto unfeigned love of the brethren at the 21. verse of the former Chapter, doth here mark out those vices, that are most of all contrary to this love; & when he would commend the simplicity of infants, as a disposition requisite to receive the word of God with profit, he casts aside those vices which are directly opposed to that simplicity.

Doct. 5. To make a good use of the word, besides the laying aside of those evil affections, that we speak of before, it is required that we should stir up that good affection in our hearts, which is called appetite or desire.

This is gathered from the 2. verse. Now this desire is expressed in other places of the Scripture, by a spiritual hunger and thirst. Isai. 55. 1. Apoc. 21. 6. And the degree thereof is set down, that it should be the highest. Psal. 119. 20. 81. 82. Which contains in it, 1. a high esteem of God's word. Psal. 119 2. 2. An earnest endeavor, answerable thereunto, to use it and enjoy it. John 6. 27. 3. A delight, whereby we are well pleased in the sweetness thereof, Psal. 119. 103.

Reas. 1. Because the word is absolutely necessary for us; without it we cannot live; for it is our milk or spiritual food, as it is in the text, 2. Because we always want something that may be gotten: this is also signified in the text, when we are called new borne babes; whereby it is intimated that our imperfection is so great, that by reason of it, we should earnestly desire the help of the word. 3. Because the excellency and perfection of the word is so great, that it should of it self delight us, though we stood in no need of it ourselves; this is also intimated in the text when there is mention made of the sincerity of the word, and of the goodness of God that appears therein.

Use. 1. This may serve to condemn that satiety and loathing of the word, that appears too evidently in too too many.

2. To admonish us, not to suffer our affections to be taken up with the things of this world, thereby to lessen that desire, which we should have to the word of God. 3. To exhort us, to use the utmost of our endeavors to stir up and increase these pious affections in our selve.

Doct. 6. This affection and desire that we ought to have to God's word, should have respect to the sincerity thereof.

This is gathered from that, desire the sincere milk of the word: that is, the nature it self of the word and of the things proposed therein, as they are pure, and afford nourishment fit for our Souls.

Reas. 1. Because otherwise we do not desire the word, as it is the word of life, or the bread of life, or the milk of life, as it is in the text, but as we do apprehend it under some carnal show. 2. Because this desire alone proceeds from spiritual life, which seeks after that in the word that tends unto life, which is intimated also in the text by the similitude of infants, that naturally desire their mothers milk.

Use. 1. This may serve to reprove those ministers that falsify the word of God by their own mixtures and devices, and obtrude upon him an adulterate word, instead of the simple and sincere word. 2. To admonish the hearers not to suffer their affections to be carried either towards the person of the speaker, or towards the manner of his speaking, much less towards those strange forgings which many use in their speaking, but sincerely to seek for the sincerity of the word.

3. To exhort us, highly to prize this sincerity of the word, and to endeavor all that we can to preserve it as well in ourselves as in the Church.

Doct. 7. Then and not before, do we use the sincere word of God aright, when we grow thereby.

This is gathered from these words: that ye may grow thereby.

This is signified in all those places of Scripture, where the end of the word is made to be the edification of the faithful: for to edify is to promote the structure of the edifice, to a greater perfection, after that the foundation is already laid. This is expressed also Eph. 4. 16.

Reas. 1. Because we are imperfect, like as infants that are newly borne: now we are perfected when the word of God dwells richly in us, Col'ss. 3. 16. 2. Because the word it self in its own nature always tends and leads to perfection: for it is the perfect will of God, Rom. 12. 2.

Use. 1. This may serve to reprove those, who, when for the time they ought to be teachers do yet remain unskillfull and infants, Hcb. 5. 12. 13. 2. To admonish us, never so to rest satisfied with that which we have attained, as if there were nothing more to be gotten; for although we have all other things, yet it is required, that we should increase more and more in it, 1. Th's. 4. 1. 10. 3. To inform us, hereby we may understand, that the word of God is necessarily to be used, not only by the ignorant and unskillful, but also by all those that do yet want something, and do desire to increase that which they have. 4. To instruct us, to examine ourselves by this mark whether we use the word of God aright or no?

Doct. 8. In the Gospel there appears such graciousness and goodness of God, that it stirs up all the faithful, to an earnest desire thereof.

This is gathered from the 3. verse▪ that the Lord is gracious: Where by God we are to understand Christ, as it appears by the following words: by graciousnesse we are to understand that grace which is revealed in the Gospel, as it evidently appears by the connection of this verse, with that which went before. So Tit. 3. 4.

Reas. 1. Because this glorious grace of God, whch brings salvation unto men by Christ, is the subject matter and argument of the Gospel.

2. Because God bestows this grace upon us, being altogether unworthy of it, enemies to him, and seeking no such thing of him: for after such a manner is this grace bestowed upon us, as that from the beginning to the end, the whole business depends upon the mere goodness of God.

Use. 1. This may serve to inform us, to judge of the quality and quantity of the goodness and graciousness of Christ, no other way but by the word of the Gospel; for we must not imagine, as many use to do, that through the graciousness of God, it shall be well with us, though we continue in our sins without repentance and turning to God: no such graciousness is revealed in the Gospel. 2. To instruct us, always to admire the riches and bounty of Christ's grace, that is revealed in the Gospel. 3. To exhort us, earnestly to desire, to take delight, and to rejoice in hearing and meditating upon God's word. Psal. 27. 4. & 65 4. & 119. 103. in this respect is the use of the word of the Gospel compared to the banquet of a King, wherein all things are full of Sweetness and delight. Luke 14. 16. 17.

Doct. 9. This goodness of Christ in the Gospel is proposed to us to be tasted.

This is gathered from these words: If so be ye have tasted. So Psal. 34. 8. Taste and see. That is, we should so lay hold upon it by faith, that we may have an inward sense, and experience of the virtue and power thereof.

Reas. 1. Because in the Gospel, we are called to such a near union and communion with Christ, that he is made unto us our spiritual bread and food, So to be tasted and eaten by faith, that he turns to our spiritual nourishment. 2. Because our comfort depends upon this, if we perceive in ourselves the savor of Christ, as it were the savor of life unto life. 2 Cor. 2. 15. 16. 3. Because the power of Christ in drawing our souls unto himself, for the most part consists in this, that we have his goodness and love, to be tasted, as it were, Gal. 2. 20. 2 Cor. 5. 14.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that do not use the word of God, as food to be tasted and eaten, but for custom and pro forma fashion-sake only, or at least account it a thing to be understood and disputed of only; but not to be tasted.

2. To exhort us, to use all care and diligence to preserve this taste of the goodness of Christ in the Gospel; for this is proper to the regenerate, as it appears in the text: and consequently it is a sign of salvation. Some indeed that are not regenerate are said to taste of the heavenly gift, of the good word of God, and the powers of the world to come, Heb. 6. 4, 5. but this comes to pass, first, by some special operation of God's Spirit, whereby such men are enlightened above the common sort of unregenerate men. Secondly, this is but for a little while, it is not constantly. Thirdly, in the unregenerate it is but a sudden motion of the mind, it is not a rooted affection. Fourthly, it is either of grace only to come, which is apprehended also, but by a human and uncertain hope; or else it is a presumption without ground: but the taste of the faithful is of grace, not only to come, but also present, with a divine assurance wrought by the operation of the holy Ghost, and sound faith and repentance.

Doct. 10. The regenerate in the beginning; although they be truly faithful, yet they have but a little taste of God's goodness, they do not fully comprehend it.

This is gathered from the same words.

Reason. 1. Because they are new borne babes, and therefore weak.

2. Because God useth to bring his children by degrees unto perfection; so that at first they do perceive but a part or the first fruits of his goodness, and afterwards they have the whole, as it were shed abroad in their hearts.

3. Because in the beginning they want that experience, whereby the goodness of God afterwards is made more perfectly known unto them.

4. Because oftentimes they are also somewhat negligent; whereby it comes to pass, that they do not use the means of grace with that affection as they ought, as it is intimated in the text, when they are stirred up to a more fervent desire of the word of God.

Use 1. This may serve for consolation against those fears that arise sometimes in the souls of the godly, for that they have but a little measure of peace joy, and the like fruits of the Spirit, whereby men perceive the goodness of God towards them: for they must understand that the faithful do usually perceive but a little measure of this grace at the beginning.

2. For exhortation, so much the more to long for the state of perfection, and not to rest in these small beginnings.

Doct. 11. That taste of the grace of God which we either now have, or formerly had, should stir us up to desire and seek after the same more and more.

This is gathered from the connection of these words with those that went before.

Reason 1. Because to that end is there a taste of this grace given, to stir up the appetite.

2. Because the goodness of God it self is in a manner contemned and vilified, if it be neglected, after it hath been once tasted: & therefore in this respect they sin more grievously, who when they have tasted this grace of God, do little esteem of it, then they, who out of ignorance make no reckoning of it at all.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those that have left their first love, Apoc. 2. 4.

2. To exhort us, in meditating upon the goodness of God in Christ, and from the sense and experience that God hath given us of it heretofore, to inflame our minds with an earnest desire to have a fuller measure of this grace, and to that purpose religiously to use all means, whereby it is usually communicated unto men.

Doct. 12. The primary duty of Christians, whereby it is also that they are made Christians, is to come unto Christ.

This is gathered out of the fourth verse. Now to come unto Christ, is nothing else but to believe in him. So John 6. 35. He that comes unto me, and he that believes in me, are made all one. So John 5. 40. To come unto Christ, to receive Christ, and to believe in him, are one and the same. And Heb. 10. 22. We are said to draw near by an assurance of faith.

Reason 1. Because our salvation depends upon that union which we have with Christ: whence it is also, that we are said to come unto Christ, that we may have life, John 5. 40.

2. Because by nature we are strangers and far remote from Christ, and salvation obtained by him, yea and after that we are called unto Christ, we are not so perfectly conjoined.

3. Because all Christian piety is nothing else, but a continuation and renovation of this access unto Christ, and by Christ unto God. In the hearing of the word we come unto Christ, as our Teacher; in our prayers we come unto him as our advocate; in the administration of the Lord Supper we come unto him as the Author of a Kingly marriage feast, Mat. 22. And all other duties do so depend upon these, that look how we approve ourselves in these, such must we needs be in the others also.

4. Because Christ calls and invites us especially unto this, to come unto him, Matth. 11. 28. John 7. 37.

Use 1. This may serve to convince all those of death and of sin, that have either no knowledge of Christ at all, or do not endeavor according to that knowledge which they have, to come unto him, and partake of his grace.

2. To refute the Papists and such like, that draw men away from Christ to the holy Angels, to the Pope, and to themselves.

3. To exhort us, always to set Christ before us, as our mark and scope, Phil. 3. 8. &c.

Doct. 13. We must come unto Christ as unto a living stone▪

This is gathered from Verse 4. Now Christ is called a stone for that firm power, whereby he doth sustain and bear up the edifice of the whole Church Zach. 4. 7. And he is called, a living stone, because that power whereby he doth bear up the Church is quickening, and communicates spiritual and eternal life to the whole edifice, John 5. 26.

Reason 1. Because by sin we were bereft of all life both the principle and foundation of life, nor can it be restored unto us any other way but in Christ.

2. Because unless we come unto Christ under this relation, we do not embrace him as he was ordained by God, and is proposed unto us; and consequently we do not hold the true Christ, but a feined and imaginary one.

3. Because our faith cannot rest satisfied but in him that hath this strong power to quicken, for faith seeks life from a firm and undeceiving principle.

Use 1. This may serve to refute that blasphemy of the Papists, who will have the Pope, a dead stone, to be that rock or stone, whereupon the Church is built. For Peter, under the pretence of whose name the Pope challengeth this to himself never exhorted the faithful to come to him as unto a living stone, but unto Christ only. And therefore Peter himself in these words explains unto us, what was the mind of Christ, Mat. 16. 18. when he said: Thou art Peter, and upon this rock I will build my Church, that is, upon this living stone whom Peter at that time confessed to be the Son of the living God, that is, the living stone. Now Peter and the Apostles together with the Prophets may be called the foundation of the Church by a Metonymy of the adjunct for the subject; because they laid and preached Christ as the true foundation, Ephs. 2. 20, 21. but the Popes can in no other respect challenge this unto themselves, but as they are stones of offense and ruin.

2. To instruct us, wholly to depend upon Christ, and to put all our confidence in him.

3. To exhort us, with all joy and rejoicing to help forward the building of the Church upon Christ, shouting and crying out, as it is in the Prophet Zacharias, Grace, grace unto him.

Doct. 14. Christ is refused by men, when they will not come unto him as unto a living stone.

This is gathered from the fourth Verse. So Psalms 118. 22. and Luke 2. 34.

Reason 1. Because he hath not that outward Majesty and pomp wherewith natural men are taken, Isaiah 53. 3. 1 Cor. 1. 22, 23.

2. Because men by nature are blind, so that they cannot perceive their own misery extra Christum, out of Christ, nor that salvation which is offered in Christ, 1 Cor. 2. 14.

3. Because they too much love themselves, and put trust in themselves, so that they cannot endure that doctrine of Christ, whereby they are called to deny and forsake themselves, and to put their confidence in Christ alone.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, that we should attribute nothing to the world in those things which belong unto Christ.

2. To admonish us, not to trouble our minds, for that the world is averse from Christ and true faith.

3. To exhort us, patiently to bear it, if we be refused and scorned by men; for the servant is not greater than his Master.

4. To instruct us to beware that we do not communicate in the least respect with the world in refusing of Christ.

Doct. 15. Christ was chosen and ordained by God, that he should be exceeding precious unto us.

This is gathered from the fourth verse. Now we must understand this so, as that we comprehend both the predestination of Christ, and the sending of him into the world, and his unction, together with all those testimonies, which were given by God unto this mystery.

Reason 1. Because the love and mercy of God is so great towards us: for so God loved the world, that he gave his Son, &c. John 3. 16.

2. Because in the obedience of Christ God is well pleased, Matth. 3. 17.

3. Because Christ hath perfected and finished all those things, which belong to our salvation and the glory of God.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, that we ought to be assured of this, that howsoever the world opposeth it self against Christ, yet Christ shall prevail and reign forever, because he is chosen of God.

2. To comfort all the faithful, that believe and put their confidence in Christ, because they believe in him that was chosen of God, to save them.

3. To exhort us, in all our practice throughout the whole course of our lives, to make it appear, that Christ is more precious to us, than all the things in the world, Phil. 3. 8. Prov. 8. 10, 11.

Doct. 16. The faithful are living members of the same building, whereof Christ is the foundation.

This is gathered from the beginning of the 5. verse.

Reason 1. Because Christ together with all the faithful makes one mystical body, 1 Cor. 12. 12.

2. Because being compacted in this body, they partake of the very life of Christ, Ephes. 4. 16.

3. Because they show forth this life or power in bringing forth fruits answerable thereunto, John 15. 5, 16.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort us, when we rightly esteem of the dignity of this condition, it will strengthen our minds against all the troubles that can befall us therein.

2. To exhort us, so to carry ourselves as it becometh those▪ that are called to partake of the life of Christ.

Doct. 17. By that union which all the faithful have with Christ, they are made spiritual temples, Priests, and sacrifices acceptable to God.

This is gathered from the 5 verse.

Reason 1. Because God is in an especial manner present with them, and dwells in them by his Spirit and grace, as in his Temple, 2 Cor. 6. 16.

2. Because By the same spirit he makes them fit and ready to perform those duties, that are more acceptable unto him, then were ever any external sacrifices, Psalm 51. 18, 19. Heb. 13. 16.

3. Because in performing these duties before God they do offer and dedicate themselves wholly unto God.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to have a care accordingly not to defile the Temple of God, 1 Cor. 3. 16, 17. that our Priesthood doth not dishonor God, and that our Sacrifices be not lame, and maimed, and such as are not acceptable unto God.

2. To exhort us, to addict ourselves wholly to God's glory and his worship; for God will be sanctified in those that draw near him, Levite. 10. 3.

3. To refute the Papists, that rob Christians of this honor, and obtrude carnal Temples, priesthoods, and sacrifices upon God and men instead of spiritual.

Doct. 18. Those duties which we perform in Christ are acceptable unto God by Christ.

This is gathered from the 5 verse, at the end. But they are acceptable not as merits, but as sacrifices of praise and thanksgiving, as it is intimated in the Text.

Reason 1. Because by Christ our persons are reconciled unto God, and received into the number of those whom God approves, and by whom he delights to be worshipped.

2. Because Christ covers our infirmities.

3. Because by his intercession our duties are commended unto God.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort us, even when we look upon our own infirmities, and the unworthiness of all our performances.

2. To exhort us, to go cheerfully about the duties of piety, because our work shall not be in vain in the Lord, 1 Cor. 15. 58.

Doct. 19. The same Christ was after the same manner a Savior in the Old Testament, as he is in the New.

This is gathered from the sixth Verse.

Reason 1. Because he was a Lamb slain from the foundation of the world; according to the decree, promise, and acceptance of God, and according to the faith and hope of the godly, Apoc. 13. 8.

2. Because the Catholic Church is but one, consisting of all the faithful from the beginning of the world, Heb. 12. 23.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that make the people of Israel either to have been altogether carnal, or to have been saved by the observation of the Law.

2. To exhort us to fly unto Christ, and to put our confidence in him, in whom all the faithful from the creation of the world did put their trust, and by whom they were saved.

Doct. 20. Christ is as it were the corner stone in the building of the Church.

That is, he doth conjoyne, uphold and direct all the parts of the building, or members of the Church.

Reason 1. Because he is the beginning or foundation of the Church.

2. Because he unites those people that were before far divided▪ the Jews and Gentiles.

3. Because he is the rule or line of direction in all the building that tends to salvation.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the blasphemy of the Papists, whereby they make the Pope the head of the Church, and to that purpose wrest this very title and words thereunto.

2. To instruct us, wholly to depend upon Christ for the direction of our souls to everlasting life.

Doct. 21. There is nothing at all that can be compared with Christ our Savior for dignity, use, and excellency.

This is gathered from these titles, elect and precious.

Reason 1. For the dignity of his person.

2. For the effectualness of his operation, in satisfaction, merit, and application of those things which belong unto our salvation.

3. For the excellency of those benefits which redound unto the Church by him.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to have no common conceit of Christ, or to rest in a vulgar esteem of him, but earnestly to endeavor to conceive of him so, as his dignity and excellency doth deserve.

Doct. 22. No man that truly believeth in Christ, shall ever be confounded, his expectation shall not be frustrated, his desire and confidence shall not be in vain.

Reason 1. Because Christ was appointed by God by a certain and immutable decree to be the Savior of all those that believe in him.

2. Because all power is given unto him both in heaven and earth.

Use. This may serve to comfort us against those fears and doubts that might weaken our faith.

Doct. 23. The faithful are not only delivered from misery, but are also highly honored by Christ.

This is gathered from the seventh verse at the beginning.

Reason. Because they are made partakers of Christ's honor, for in him they are made sons of God, heirs of the everlasting kingdom, spiritual Priests and Kings.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove our blindness and dullness, that cannot discern and esteem of this honor as we ought, but are set upon the honors of this world more then is fitting.

2. To exhort us, piously and seriously to glory in Christ and the honor which we have in him, though for his sake the wicked world reproach us.

Doct. 24. As Christ is unto the unbelievers honor and salvation, so he is unto the unbelievers confusion and perdition.

This is gathered out of the seventh Verse, Psal. 118. 22. Isaiah 8. 14. Matth. 21. 42.

But this similitude doth not hold in all things. For first, the proper end of Christ our Savior was to save man, not to destroy him. Secondly, Christ is the cause of faith in the believers, but he is not the cause of unbelief in the unbelievers, though something of Christ may be the occasion of their unbelief; like as his humiliation was both unto the Jews and many of the Gentiles. Thirdly, Christ merited salvation for the believers, and not they themselves; but the unbelievers merit their own perdition, and not Christ: but yet Christ is truly said to be confusion and perdition to the unbelievers, 1 As they take offense at him, and so run headlong into their own destruction. 2. As he doth justly punish their infidelity and impiety, as he is the just Judge of all the world.

Reason 1. Because those unbelievers to whom Christ is offered, in contemning his goodness, do directly as it were provoke him to use the greatest severity upon them.

2. Because by this means alone is the glory of God and of Christ preserved, when his enemies are put under his feet.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us to beware of all infidelity.

2. To exhort us, when we compare our belief with the misery of unbelievers, to learn to be thankful unto God and to give him the glory of it in Jesus Christ: for these ends is this amplification made in the text.

Doct. 25. Men come unto this confusion and perdition by stumbling at the Doctrine of the Gospel.

This is gathered from the 8 Verse. Now men stumble at the word of the Gospel, when they apprehend the Gospel to be such, that they owe no assent and subject on thereunto: so the Jews were offended at the infirmity of Christ crucified, 1 Cor. 1. 23. and the Greeks at the foolishness of that word which bringeth salvation, Ibid. For the Jews, like as the Papists, with many others, are offended, for that the Gospel requires them to deny their own righteousness and works, and to seek to be justified by Christ, Rom. 9. 32.

Reason 1. Because this offense is the cause of their infidelity.

2. Because it doth not produce a bare unbelief only, but unbelief with contempt, so that they do infinitely wrong Christ.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to beware that we do not in anything stumble at the word of God, or conceive anything in our minds, whereby we may be in the least respect alienated from it.

Doct. 26. The infidelity and confusion of the wicked doth not fall out by chance, but according as God had most certainly fore-ordained it.

This is gathered from these words: whereunto also they are appointed.

Reason 1. Because God is both the King and Lord of all living creatures, so that nothing can happen unto them contrary to his will.

2. Because there can be no cause of their infidelity imagined, which God did not foresee, or which he could not have hindered.

3. Because we also which do believe, were aliens from the faith as well as they; neither did we make that difference betwixt ourselves and them, but God:

Use. This may serve to direct us, that the infidelity of any others whatsoever, may not deface our faith, we must give God the glory in the dispensation of his grace, and appointing of things according to his counsel, whose ways are past finding out.

Doct. 27. We should often call to mind that dignity, whereunto we are called in Christ, and that, by comparing of it to that misery wherein all unbelievers are plunged.

This is gathered from that repetition, Verse 9. which is used comparatively by the dissimilitude that is betwixt it and the condition of unbelievers, before described, as it is intimated in that word But.

Reason 1. Because we are called to spiritual joy, which is chiefly increased by this means.

2. Because it belongs to the thanks which we ought to give unto God.

3. Because it makes us cheerful in the performing of all duties, that we may be worthy of so excellent a calling.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to make this contemplation familiar unto us.

Doct. 28. The end of our calling, is to show forth the praises of God, that hath called us.

This is gathered from the ninth verse, that is, that we should render unto God the glory which he hath shown unto us. 1. In the inward thoughts and affections of our heart. 2. In the outward profession of words. 3. In our actions throughout the whole conversation of our lives. This is to sanctify God, Isaiah 8. 13.

Reason 1. Because this is that glory which may redound unto God from us, or from our calling.

2. Because our calling it self tends thereunto, that we should turn unto God, seek God, glorify God.

3. Because this is very profitable for us.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that take care of nothing less: they show that they are not yet partakers of effectual calling.

2. To stir us up more and more to fulfill this duty.

Doct. 29. That state into which we are translated by our calling, is a state of marvelous light.

This is gathered from the 9 Verse at the end, John 1. 8. Now it is called light, both for the illumination of the mind, which it brings; and for the comfort of heart, which we receive thereby: and it is called marvelous, because it far surpasseth all worldly knowledge, and whatsoever the natural man can conceive.

Use. This may serve to us, to carry ourselves answerable to this light, and to walk in it, not according to the common fashion, but marvelously.

Doct. 30. It is very profitable for us always to compare our present happy condition, with the misery that is past.

This is gathered from the tenth verse.

Reason 1. Because contraria juxta se positamagis elucescunt, contraries being put one by another, make each other to appear more clearly.

2. Because it tends to our humiliation.

3. Because it makes us to commiserate others, and to show meekness towards them. Tit. 3. 2. 3. 4.

4. Because it makes us to be the more thankful unto God. 1. Tim. 1. 12. 13.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, never to forget that misery which did hang over our heads.

Verse. 11. Dearely beloved, I beseech you, as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the Soul, Having your conversation honest among the Gentiles.

Verse. 12. That whereas they speak against you, as evil doers, they may by your good works which they shall behold, glorify God in the day of visitation.

The Analysis.

Here the Apostle doth in general exhort to lead such a life as is answerable to that happy condition, which was spoken of before: Now this life consists of two parts: The one is abstinence from evil, abstain from fleshly lusts; the other is, to follow that which is good, having your conversation honest. The first of which he doth persuade them unto by an argument taken 1. From the disagreement that is betwixt the Godly, and the fleshly lusts of this world in respect of their state and condition, because in this world, they are strangers and Pilgrims, and therefore they ought not to set their hearts and desires upon this world, but upon another. 2. From the danger that hangs over them, from the desires of this world, because they tend to the destruction of their souls, in these words, which war against the Soul. The second part together with the former, he doth persuade them unto, by an argument taken from those witnesses which they ought to have regard of in their conversation; among the Gentiles, by whose testimony he shows there will a twofold benefit arise from their honest conversation.

1. That they will cease to speak against them as evil doers.

2. That in beholding their good works, they will not only give them an honest testimony, but they will also glorify God for them; which benefit is shown by the adjunct of time, wherein it should be expected, to wit, in the day of visitation: Now this whole exhortation, that it might be the more effectual, and the more acceptable unto them, is set forth with a double affection, in the manner of proposing it; of love or charity, in that title which is given unto them, Dearely beloved; and of humility, in that he doth not so much command these things, as entreat them, I beseech you.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. All the faithful are strangers and pilgrims in this world.

Reas. 1. Because their father, and their country is not here, but in heaven.

2. Because they do not desire to stay long here.

3. Because their wealth and their friends are not in this world.

4. Because the world accounts them strangers, and that because their conversation is not according to the fashion of the world.

Use. 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to place our inheritance or our treasure in the things of this World.

2. To exhort us, to lift up our hearts always towards our heavenly country; and to gain all those things, that may help us forward and further us in our journey thereunto, Doct. 2. All the faithful ought to abstain from the lusts of of the flesh.

But by this phrase are signified not only the inclinations of the body, but all those that belong to the old man: for there is something to be sanctified even in the very spirit of our minds, 1 Thes. 5. 23. and therefore some lust of the flesh is seated in the spirit; but these lusts are in general said to be of the flesh because they are most of all manifested in those things which belong to the body and the flesh: for most men care for and look after nothing else almost but those things that belong to this present life.

Reas. 1. Because the flesh together with the lusts thereof was crucified with Christ.

2. Because all the faithful in their baptism and by their profession have denied the flesh.

3. Because our lusts are deceitful. Eph. 4. 22.

Because they lead unto death. Galat. 6. 8. Rom. 8. 6. 13.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, above all things to apply ourselves unto this study.

Doct. 3. The lusts of the flesh war against the soul.

Reas. 1. Because they spoil the perfection of the soul, which consists in the image of God.

2. Because they do either quench or grieve the holy Spirit, upon whom the comfort of the soul doth depend. Eph. 4. 30. 1. Thess. 5. 19.

3. Because they cause the Death of the soul, and lead thereunto.

Use. 1. This may serve to direct us, always to think upon our spiritual warfare, and accordingly in all things to carry ourselves, as it becometh the good Soldiers of Christ.

2. To admonish us, to take special heed of those enemies which we have within ourselves; those enemies that are without can do us no hurt, if those that are within have not power over us, and so do as it were give us up into their hands.

Doct. 4. To abstain from fleshly lusts, is the way to make our conversation honest.

Reas. 1. Because all filthynesse proceeds from the lusts of the flesh.

2. Because the true honor and honesty of a man consists in that spiritual victory which he hath over himself.

3. Because by overcoming the lusts of the flesh, the way is made easy to all virtues and good duties.

Use 1. This may serve to refute and reprove those men, that seek for honor and dignity by pampering the flesh, & obeying the lusts thereof.

2. To exhort us, cheerfully to oppose ourselves against the lusts of the flesh, for this very cause, because it is a most honest thing.

Doct. 5. The faithful should have a care to live honestly, not only amongst the faithful, but also amongst the unbelieving Gentiles.

This is gathered from these words, among the Gentiles; Which notwithstanding we must so understand, that we do not follow all those things that seem honest unto them, nor omit those things that do displease them; but only that we show forth a true evidence of our piety, love and righteousness in our conversation.

Then again, that thereby their consciences may be convinced, that the way, which we go, is in that respect at least praise-worthy, and to be approved.

Reas. This we ought to do. 1. For God's sake and his glory.

2. For our own sakes and our own comfort.

3. For the unbelievers sake, to draw them unto true piety.

Use. This may serve to refute and reprove those, that under color of contemning fame, contemn virtue.

Doct. 6. It is the property of unbelievers, to seek occasion to speak against the faithful, as if they were wicked.

This is gathered from the 12. verse, at the beginning. Now there are two kinds of such obloquies. 1. When they speak all manner of evil for Christ's sake, for faith and righteousness sake, cap. 4. v. 14. Math. 5. 11. 2. When they find some occasion in the defects of the faithful, and observe something in their lives, which they may justly tax. This also admits of a twofold difference; for sometimes such is the impiety of those that profess the true faith, that it gives scandal to the unbelievers, Rom. 2. 24. and sometimes they take occasion from the infirmities that are incident to the faithful, to condemn their profession.

Reas. 1. Because there is an inveterate enmity betwixt the children of the light, and the children of darkness.

2. Because in this respect men flatter themselves, and in some sort seem better and happier, when they make others, that would seem better, either to be like themselves, or worse than themselves.

3. Because by this means they seem to bring some prejudice against the very doctrine of piety, which the wicked hate.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, 1. To take special heed, that we have no communion with unbelievers, in this maliciousness, that is, that we do not willingly seek or take occasion to speak against the Godly; for this is a certain mark of impiety.

2. To beware also, that we give no occasion to the wicked, either to speak against our persons or our professions.

Doct. 7: Good works alone do stop the mouths of the wicked.

This is gathered from the 12. v: at the middle.

Reas. 1. Because men, especially unbelievers, cannot judge of us, but by the works which they see.

2. Because the sincerity of our religion properly appears in our works.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, always to endeavor to bring forth good works.

Doct. 8. The good works of the faithful make others also to glorify God.

This is gathered from the 12. v. at the end. So M. 5. 16.

Reas. 1. Because by this means they are convinced of the truth of our religion, whose author is God.

2. Because thereby they are drawn also to embrace the same religion, and to cleave unto God.

3. Because they are moved and stirred up to give God thanks, for those things that were the means of their conversion.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to use this argument to stir up ourselves to the practice of good works, because they make not only for our own salvation, but for the glory of God also.

Doct. 9. We must look for a day of visitation, that men may glorify God therein.

This is gathered from the 12. v. at the end. But the day of visitation may be understood either in judgment, or in grace and mercy. Here it is to be understood of the grace of God. So Luke 1. 68.

Reas. Because without grace there is no inclination in the heart of man to glorify God. The tree must be good, that shall bring forth good fruit, Men do not gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles, Matth. 7. 16. 17.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to use all patience and meekness towards the wicked, always provided, that we do not fail in our duty to seek their conversion. 2. Tim. 2. 25.

Verse. 13. Submit yourselves therefore to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake; whether it be to the King, as supreme;

Verse. 14. Or unto Governors, as unto them that are sent by him; for the punishment of evil doers, and for the praise of them that do well.

Verse. 15. For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men.

Verse. 16. As free, and not using your liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God.

Verse. 17. Honor all men. Love the brotherhood. Fear God. Honor the King.

The Analysis.

IN these words the Apostle showeth that particular part of obedience, which did in a special manner pertain to the honesty of the faithful among the Gentiles, that is, subjection to the Magistrates, which some at that time did begin to cast off, as not agreeing with Christian liberty. Now this subjection he doth. 1. Generally command and direct us unto, to perform it for religion sake towards God, v. 13. 2. By a distribution of the object, to wit, that we ought to perform it, not only to the King and the supreme Magistrate, but also to the governors that are sent by him. v. 13. 14. 3. He doth persuade us thereunto, 1. From the end of this ordinance, to wit, that it is to repress and punish the evil doers, and to preserve and cherish the good v. 14. at the end. 2. From the efficient cause, or command of God, v. 15. 3. From the end and benefit of performing this subjection, to wit, to stop the mouths of the enemies, who are described by their ignorance and their foolishness, v. 15. 4. He removes an objection that might be made against it, about Christian liberty. v. 16. Where he distinguisheth betwixt feigned liberty, which is joined with maliciousness; and true liberty, that makes men to be addicted unto the service of God: Now that this subjection to superiors belongs to the service of God, he shows v. 17. by a short repetition of those precepts, that belong to this and the like duties.

Here a Question may be made.

Quest. Why is the Magistracy called an ordinance of man v. 13. seeing all powers are ordained of God, and every power is the ordinance of God, Rom. 13. 1. 2.

Answ. The superiority of power, or government it self is simply and absolutely commanded by God, and in that respect is called the ordinance of God; but this or that special manner of power or government is not determined by God, but by men; and is therefore called an ordinance of men, which as touching the nature of it, may also be called an ordinance of God: And this is the difference betwixt an Ecclesiastical and a civil office. An Ecclesiastical office is not legitimate, if it be not directly determined by God himself, and consequently cannot be changed by men: but this or that civil office may be made & changed by men. And the reason of the difference is this, because God and Christ alone hath dominion and power in spiritual matters; but in civil matters men are also God's, though not absolute.

The Doctrines arising from this.

Doct. 1. The duties of righteousness towards men, do much commend our religion towards God.

This is gathered from the connection of these words with the foregoing words, in that particle therefore. So James 1. 27.

Reas. 1. Because they are the effects of religion; Now the virtue of the cause doth always appear in the effect.

2. Because they are more obvious to the sight of man, then religion it self, which is the cause thereof.

3. Because they draw men's minds to approve of that religion whence they proceed.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, for religion sake to apply ourselves to these duties.

Doct. 2. We must perform civil subjection to our civil Magistrates for the Lord's sake.

This is gathered from the 13. v.

Reas. 1. Because by these means the Lord preserveth the societies of men.

2. Because these Governments are the means to advance God's glory, at least so far forth as they tend to perform some part of the will of God.

3. Because in their own nature and of themselves they make for the good and against the bad. v. 14.

Use. 1. This may serve to refute the Anabaptists and others, who for conscience sake will not be subject to the Magistrate.

2. To admonish us, never so to subject ourselves unto men, as that for their sakes we should neglect our duty towards God, because we ought to be subject unto them for the Lord's sake, and therefore a far greater subjection is due unto the Lord, then unto them.

Doct. 3. By these duties the good will of God is observed, and the foolishness of wicked men is put to silence.

This is gathered from v. 15.

Reas. 1. Because we serve God, when for conscience sake towards God, we are subject unto men; therefore we fulfill the will of God.

2. Because we do that before men, which they do usually praise most, and so we remove all occasion of offense.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, so much the more carefully to apply ourselves to such duties.

Doct. 4. Christian liberty is not contrary to that subjection, which we owe either unto God or man.

This is gathered from v. 16.

Reas. 1. Because by it we are freed from sin, but not from that duty, which is contrary unto sin.

2. Because Christian liberty consists properly in spiritual things, and not in corporal; for although we are subject unto God alone in spiritual things, yet in corporal things we owe subjection unto men also.

3. Because for that end did we receive this liberty, that we might more freely and readily perform those things, which we owe unto God and men.

Use. This may serve to condemn those, that use Christian liberty for a cloak of maliciousness, as it is in the text.

Doct. 5. We are to take exact notice of the difference of our duty towards men, towards our brethren, towards God, and towards the Magistrates.

This is gathered from v. 17.

Reas. Because great is the difference of the grounds or reasons, whereupon these duties depend, as it is intimated in the text; but we must make conscience of our duty in all.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, that do any way sever or disjoyne these duties, to wit, such as seem to fear God, but do not love or honor men; or such as seem to honor men, but do not fear God at all.

Vers. 18. Servants, be subject to your masters with all fear, not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward.

Verse 19. For this is thank-worthy, if a man for conscience toward God endure grief, suffering wrong fully.

Verse 20. For what glory is it, if when ye be buffeted for your faults ye shall take it patiently? but if when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God.

Verse. 21. For even hereunto were you called: because Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps.

V. 22. Who did not sin, neither was guile found in his mouth?

V. 23. Who when he was reviled, reviled not again; when he suffered, he threatened not, but committed himself to him, that judgeth righteously.

V. 24. Who his own self bare our sins in his own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness, by whose stripes ye were healed.

V. 25. For ye were as sheep going astray, but are now returned unto the shepherd and Bishop of your souls.

The Analysis.

Here the Apostle makes a special exhortation about the duty of servants to their masters: and this duty he doth 1. As it were define by a special kind of subjection wherein it consists. Be subject with all fear. 2. He doth illustrate it by a distribution of the object, or the masters, to whom this subjection is due; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward. 3. He proves that this subjection is to be made to both sorts, by an argument taken from the adjuncts thereof, grace and glory, that is, God's praising and approving of it, which accompanies the subjection that is made unto wicked masters verse 19. For this is thank-worthy. The reason of which consequence is set forth. 1. By a description of that subjection which is due unto wicked Masters, to wit, that it is a patient suffering of wrong for conscience towards God v. 19. 2. By a comparison that is made betwixt those that suffer justly, and those that suffer unjustly, which he shows to be unlike, in that the former can look for no glory from their sufferings, but the latter may expect great glory, verse 20. In the second place, he proves the same duty from that relation which ariseth from our general calling, because we are thereunto called, that we should patiently suffer the injuries of the world: and this he confirms by the example of Christ; to whose imitation we are called: for he shows two ends of the suffering of Christ; one was to die for us, that is, to expiate our sins, which is the primary end. The other was, to leave us an example to imitate. verse 21. which is the secondary end. Now a special part of this secondary end was, that when he was without sin v. 22. Yet he patiently suffered all kinds of reproach's and afflictions, v. 23. And the primary end of Christ's sufferings, which was to redeem us from sin, is upon this occasion also declared v. 24. 25. Because therehence also may be drawn a powerful argument, to persuade us to imitate Christ in doing righteously, and suffering unjustly: And this is declared, 1. From the nature of Christ's death, that it was a sacrifice for our sins to take away the guilt of them; 2. From the end of this propitiation, which is the death of sin, and the life of righteousness. And hereof there is an illustration made by comparing that condition, which went before our conversion, with that condition which follows it, verse the last.

The Doctrines drawn here-hence.

Doct. 1. They that are in the lowest condition, should by their good works glorify God in that condition.

This is gathered from the connection of the 18 Verse with the 11 and 12.

Reason 1. Because servants also are called to liberty and glory in Christ, neither is there any difference, as touching life spiritual, betwixt the freeman and the servant, 1 Cor. 7. 22.

2. Because there is the same reward for servants and freemen.

3. Because the servile condition hath a proper occasion and means to glorify God, which other conditions have not, like as other conditions have their occasions & means, which the servile hath not.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort us, in regard that no man is excluded from having a part in this honor, that hath a part in advancing the glory of God.

2. To exhort all, both servants and all other sorts of men, to endeavor to promote God's glory: for if servants ought to do this; much more ought free masters, and those that are in any place of dignity.

Doct. 2. Servants, to the end that they may glorify God in their servile condition, must be subject to their Masters with all fear.

Reason 1. Because subjection to another man's will is properly that wherein service consists; and therefore all they that are bound as servants, are bound to subjection.

2. Because the subjection of a servant is such, that it doth necessarily command a fear to displease, not only in that respect, because in every duty, both towards God and man, we should fear to offend by doing amiss, but also in respect of that singular power, which masters have to punish their servants. This is that fear, which we usually call servile, which is not to be disliked in servants, though in the children of God there be another fear required over and above, which ariseth from love.

Use. This may serve to admonish, first, Servants and subjects, not to separate fear from subjection. Secondly, all men to subject themselves to God with all fear, as it becometh servants.

Doct. 3. We ought to perform our duty, even unto wick•d men and froward.

This is gathered from the 18 Verse.

Reason 1. Because the ground of our duty doth not consist in the goodness or naughtiness of men, but in that obligation which the law of God imposeth upon us, which may consist with the naughtiness of men.

2. Because in performing this duty, we serve God and Christ, and shall receive a reward from him, Ephes. 6. 5. 6, 7. 8.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, that direct their duties according to the persons of the men with whom they have to do.

Doct. 4. We ought to do our duty for conscience toward God, though we are wrongfully afflicted by men.

This is gathered from Verse 19.

Reason 1. Because conscience always looks to the judgment of God and not to the qualities and judgments of men.

2. Because the conscience is by this means constant, immutable, and always like it self, howsoever men's judgments may alter.

Use. This may serve to direct us in all our actions to have a special respect to the conscience.

Doct. 5. It is thank-worthy, and we shall receive glory from God, if we suffer wrongfully, and not justly.

This is gathered from the 19 and 20 verses.

Reason. 1. Because this is proper and peculiar to Christians, as is the love of our enemies, Matth. 5. 44, 45.

2. Because by this means we give great glory unto God, when we suffer the bitterest things out of conscience toward him.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, cheerfully to set ourselves to the performing of these duties.

Doct. 6. The calling of Christians doth in a special manner lead to the patient suffering of afflictions.

This is gathered from the 21 verse, at the beginning.

Reason 1. Because they are called unto glory by the enduring of all kinds of afflictions, as by the way that leadeth thereunto, cap. 5. verse 10.

2. Because they are called to overcome their enemies and evil doers by well-doing, and if it be possible to win them thereby, Matth. 5. 44. Rom. 12. 21.

3. Because they are called to imitate Christ, as it is in the text.

Use. 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to imitate or follow the men of the world in these things, because we have another manner of calling.

2. To exhort us to have a great care that we make conscience of this duty, because it doth most nearly belong to our calling.

Doct. 7. Christ's actions are a most perfect example for our duty and calling.

This is gathered from Verse 21.

Reason 1. Because Christ is unto us an example given by God, as it were the praxis of Divinity and rule of living well.

2. Because he hath no imperfection at all, such as may be found in all men's examples.

3. Because the Spirit of Christ makes us to be conformable unto his image.

Use. This may serve to direct us, that beholding Christ as it were in a glass, we may be as it were changed into the same image from glory to glory, 2 Cor. 3. 18.

Doct. 8. The Chiefest manner of imitating Christ in enduring afflictions, consists in this, that we commit our cause unto God.

This is gathered from verse 23, at the end.

Reason. Because this is the rule of patience in such cases, not to revenge ourselves, but to commit the whole business unto the Lord, and to rest well contented and pleased in his will.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, never to please our own carnal will, but to subject ourselves wholly to the good will of God.

Doct. 9. Christ by his death did not only leave us an example of our lives, but also expiated our sins, and procured for us such power, whereby we may imitate him in living well.

This is gathered from verse 24.

Reason 1. Because after the same manner are we restored in Christ, as we were lost in Adam, which was not by imitation and example only, Rom. 5.

2. Because Christ ought to be a sacrifice to pacify God towards us, which is not done by example.

3. Because an example would have nothing at all profited those that were dead in sin and hated of God.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Socinians and others, which feine that the redemption of Christ consists in doctrine and example only.

2. To direct us, always to join these two together, redemption, and the example of Christ.

Doct. 10. Without Christ we are nothing else but sheep going astray and lost.

This is gathered from the last verse.

Reason. Because upon him alone depends our salvation and the direction of our lives.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to leave Christ so much as in the least thing, but to cleave faster and faster unto him.

Chapter III.

Verse 1. Likewise ye wives be in subjection to your own husbands, that if any obey not the word, they also may without the word be wenne by the conversation of the wives.

Verse 2. While they behold your chaste conversation coupled with fear:

Verse 3. Whose adorning, let it not be that outward adorning of plaiting the hair, and of wearing of gold, or of putting on of apparel.

Verse 4. But let it be the hidden man of the heart, in that which is not corruptible, even the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price.

Verse 5. For after this manner in the old time, the holy women also who trusted in God, adorned themselves, being in subjection unto their own husbands.

Verse 6. Even as Sara obeyed Abraham, calling him Lord, whose daughters ye are as long as ye do well, and are not afraid with any amazement.

Verse 7. Likewise ye husbands dwell with them according to the knowledge of God, giving honor unto the wife, as unto the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life, that your prayers be not hindered.

The Analysis.

HERE the Apostle instructs Wives and Husbands in those particular duties which belong unto their conjugal society. And he sets down the duty of wives in the first place, because that comes nearest unto those duties which he had lately spoken of, namely, the duty of subjects towards the•r Magistrates, and of servants towards their Master. For that which is here in general prescribed unto wives, is their subjection to their husbands, Verse 1. Be in subjection to your own husbands. Which subjection he doth afterwards explain by certain adjuncts or properties, which do in a peculiar manner belong to the subjection of wives, and not to the subjection of servants and subjects. The first of these properties is, conjugal fear, verse. 2. The second is chastity of conversation, in the same verse. The third is, meek•nesse and mildness, verse 4. And he doth persuade them unto this subjection together with the properties thereof. 1. By an argument taken from the effects and fruit, which by the grace of God might follow thereupon; for it is a means tending to the conversion of their husbands, if they obey not the Gospel, verse 1. 2. He commends and illustrates it by a comparison which he makes betwixt that pious subjection, & that adorning which women use to make great account of, verse 3, 4. where he shows that outward adorning to be nothing worth in God's sight. 3. He doth persuade them unto it by the example of those holy women, which God did approve of in old time, verse 5. And in particular by the example of Sara, and her obedience unto Abraha•, verse 6. Of whose example he gives a special reason; because as Abraham was the father of all the faithful, so Sara in some sort might be called the mother of all holy women. The duty of husbands he sets down 1, in general, in their husbandlike government, which he calls a dwelling with their wives according to knowledge, which knowledge and understanding is the ground of direction, and therefore is more required in a man, then in a woman. 2. In the special manner of this government, to wit, that it should be joined with the honor of the wife, in bearing with her infirmities, which he doth persuade them unto by an argument taken, 1. from that society and equality which is betwixt the husband and the wife, in respect of the grace of life, as it is here called. 2. From the great discommodity, which will follow upon the neglect of this duty, for by their domestical differences and dissensions their domestical prayers also are hindered, Verse 7.

The Doctrines arising here-hence.

Doct. 1. There is the like duty of subjects, servants, wives, and husbands.

This is gathered from that particle, Likewise ye wives, verse 1. and Likewise ye husbands, verse 7. Not, that there is the same kind of duty in all these in all respects, but that there is the same kind of obligation, whereby everyone is bound to do his own duty.

Reason 1. Because it is the same Law-giver and the same law that commands every man his duty.

2. Because the disparity of the condition makes no disparity in the obligation, which is the formality of the duty; but only in those things, to which the obligation binds us, which is the materiality of the duty.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to cast off from ourselves those things which we either read or hear to be commanded men of another condition, but always to consider, that quamvis non ad similia, tamen similiter, though we are not tied to the like duties, yet we are in the like manner tied to our own duties: when servants are commanded anything, then masters should think, that they likewise are commanded something; when wives are commanded anything, then husbands should think that they likewise; and when husbands are commanded anything, then wives should think, that they likewise.

Doct. 2. It is the duty of wives to be subject to their husbands.

This is gathered from verse 1. See Colos. 3. 18. Ephes. 5. 22, 23, 24.

Reason 1. Because the husband is the head of the wife, Ephes. 5. 23. 1 Cor. 11. 3.

2. Because there can be no order kept in a family, except all therest be subject to the father of the family.

Use. This may serve to reprove those wives that are undutifull and will not be subject; and those husbands also, who by their own fault lose this authority and dignity, and are themselves the causes that their own power is lessened and diminished.

Doct. 3. The conversation of wives should be such, that it should win their husbands to approve of the true religion.

This is gathered from verse 1.

Reason 1. Because all should, as much as they can, co-operate with God for the conversion of men.

2. Because this general Christian duty is in a special manner determined and intended in respect of those, with whom we have a nearer communion.

3. Because love, which doth in a singular manner belong to man and wife, requires that they should desire and seek for one another's greatest good.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, which in wedlock so live, that they have no care at all, either to advance God's glory, or to further their own salvation, in that state: and they are to be condemned much more, which so carry themselves in that state, that they do more and more alienate their husbands from true religion and piety either touching the doctrine, or touching the practice of it. And if this belongs to wives toward their husbands, much more will it belong to husbands toward their wives.

Doct. 4. Conjugall chastity should be joined with fear.

This is gathered from verse 2.

Reason. Because not only is impurity to be shunned, but also all suspicion of impurity, or of a mind inclining thereunto.

Use. 1. This may serve to admonish man and wife, to shun all those courses, that may any way be any blemish to their chastity, though it be but in show or appearance.

2. To admonish all Christians, to preserve their spiritual chastity with Christ and God, with all fear.

Doct. 5. It is not the outward adorning, but the inward, thae we should make account of.

This is gathered from verse 3, 4.

Reason 1. Because the outward adorning belongs to the vanity of this world, but the inward is spiritual life it self. For Christ and grace is called the inward adorning of the heart or mind, because it makes a man amiable and commends him in the sight of those which esteem and prize it.

2. Because only men look after the outward adorning, and and those none of the graver sort neither; but God himself looks after the inward, as it is in verse 4.

3. Because the outward adorning is not durable, but the inward is incorruptible, as it is in verse 4. which is not corruptible, and 2 Cor. 4. 18.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, every day more and more to renounce this outward and worldly adorning, and to look to the inward and true adorning of the mind and soul.

Doct. 6. Meekness and mildness of spirit in women, as in all others also, is an adorning that is precious in the sight of God.

This is gathered from verse 4.

Reason 1. Because many filthy unbeseeming things, which arise from anger and perturbation of the mind, are removed by such a disposition.

2. Because such a disposition is very apt to please, and all men desire that others should be well pleased with their behavior.

Use. 1. This may serve to refute those, which affect a kind of glory and honor by their fierceness and impatency.

2. To exhort us, not only for civility sake, but also for conscience toward God to endeavor to get such a disposition.

Doct. 7. Every man should seek for examples of such virtues out of Scripture, and apply them unto himself according to his own proper condition.

For women have holy women proposed unto them for examples verse 5. So have men holy men.

Doct. 8. In weighing of examples we should have the chiefest regard to those that are most commended in Scripture.

This is gathered from those words, Abraham, Sara, and the like, verse 6.

Doct. 9. Then and not before are we the children of such holy ones, by a true imitation of them, when we do so persist in well doing, that no terror or any other temptation is able to remove us from this our purpose and resolution.

This is gathered from the 6. verse at the end. For this is proposed in Sara to be chiefly imitated by women, that out of her duty, she followed Abraham in all his journey, nor could any terror keep her back.

Doct. 10. Husbands should likewise do their duty, as well as the wives do theirs.

This is gathered from verse 7.

Reas. 1. Because there is the same obligation of God's law on both sides.

2. Because there is a mutual relation betwixt these duties, that one doth necessarily require the other.

3. Because the duty of husbands to their wives, and of wives to their husbands is almost the same, but that the wife is to do her part with subjection, and it is the husbands part to rule.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not rigidly to exact the duty of others, and in the mean time to neglect our own.

Doct. 11. It belongs unto men to excel in knowledge and understanding.

This is gathered from those words: according to knowledge.

Reas. 1. Because by nature they have a kind of perfection above women in those things which belong unto knowledge, whereupon the woman is in this place called the weaker vessel.

2. Because by their duty they should be the heads of their wives, to direct and govern them.

3. Because they have greater means to gain knowledge; for as it is not lawful for women to speak in the Church; so neither have they anything to do in other exercises, whereby men's wits are ripened.

Use. This may serve to reprove those men, that either through drunkenness, or sloth, or the neglect of divine things, or through too much care of earthly things, do not only come behind women, but children also in sound knowledge and understanding.

Doct. 12. It is the husbands part to be meek unto their wives, and not to put them in fear.

Reas. 1. Because they are not servants, but companions.

2. Because their conjugal love should show it self in all such duties.

Use. This may serve to admonish as well husbands as wives to beware of harshness and bitterness.

Doct. 13. That duty which we owe unto all the coheirs of grace and life eternal, should direct and govern our particular duties towards our superiors, inferiors and equals.

Reas. 1. Because that is the principal duty; to which all the rest are subordinate.

2. Because that love doth virtually at least contain in it all virtues.

3. Because the dignity which redounds from the relation to grace and eternal life, makes all those that are partakers of that grace, in some sort equal, and therefore restrains contempt, opposition, and all kinds of injuries.

Use. This may serve to direct us, in all parts of our conversation with Christian men, to have chief regard to this duty.

Doct. 14. All our conversation, as well in public as in private, should be so ordered, that it should not hinder, but rather further our Prayers.

This is gathered from the last words.

Reas. 1. Because otherwise we should wrong God himself, in violating his honor.

2. Because we should diminish at least our greatest comfort, which depends upon our prayers.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to take heed therefore, not only of the grosser sort of sins, but also of contentions, injuries, perturbations, and all those vanities, by which we are made unfit to call upon the name of God aright.

Verse 8. Finally, be ye all of one mind, having compassion one of another, love as brethren, be pitiful, be courteous.

V. 9. Not rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing: but contrariwise blessing, knowing that ye are thereunto called, that ye should inherit a blessing.

The Analysis.

THE Apostle doth in these two verses briefly comprehend those duties, which belong unto all sorts of men. For because it would be too long particularly to describe all the particular virtues, nor can there be such a doctrine delivered, that should direct * every particular man in his duty, * singules quà singulos, as such a particular man, as before it was delivered touching masters and servants, wives and husbands, therefore he doth here commend some general duties unto all, from which all particular ones will easily follow. And the first of these is Concord. 2. Mutuall sympathy. 3. Brotherly love. 4. Pitty. 5. Courteousnesse. 6. Christian Patience, whereby we do not only forbear to curse those that curse us, but also bless them; of which last duty, as being the difficultest of all, he gives a special reason, which is taken from the end of our calling, whereby we come to the possession of all blessings, and as much as in us lies, ought we to communicate it unto others.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Concord is a virtue, which all Christians should mightily labor for.

Reas. 1. Because God hath endued all those, that are truly faithful, with one and the same Spirit, and therefore with one heart as it were. For they have received a new heart of one and the same making and nature.

2. Because they propose unto themselves one and the same end, and they should go one and the same way unto that end.

3. Because if there be any difference in other things, which do not belong unto that way, they are not so great, as that they should cause any discord: For there may be some difference of opinions in many things without any discord or alienation of men's minds. And if there be some difference about those things, which do belong unto that way, a bearing one with another, when they do both earnestly desire the truth, will preserve concord safe and sound betwixt those which are true Christians, according to that of the Apostle Philip. 3. 15. 16.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, which for light causes are estranged from their brethren, and turn the smallest difference, even the least controversy into discord. And how many are guilty of this fault, and how closely it sticks unto them, may evidently appear by this, that they cannot lay aside their anger and hatred, no not for God's sake, for Christ sake, and their own salvation sake. And this we may see in too too many, when they forbear to come to the Lord's Supper by reason of those contentions, which they maintain betwixt themselves and their neighbors; for they do thereby show that they cannot pray unto God to forgive them their trespasses, as they forgive others that trespass against them, and therefore they seem to love discord more then God himself, and their own salvation.

Doct. 2. There should be a sympathy betwixt Christians.

By which word is signified not only a fellow-feeling of one another's troubles, but also of one another's good, 1 Cor. 11. 26.

Reas. 1. Because they are members of one body, and all the members look unto the good of the whole.

2. Because the evil or good of one member, doth in some sort redound unto the rest of the members, by that near union and communion, which is betwixt them.

3. Because the consent and concord of their wills commands this, that whereof one doth rejoice or grieve, the other also should rejoice and grieve.

Use. This may serve to reprove that Stoicall hardness, which hath taken hold of men's minds, whereby it comes to pass that they are no way sensible of the condition of others.

Doct. 3. Brotherly love is moreover greatly to be embraced, which unto concord and Sympathy adds a will also and endeavor to do good unto others as unto our brethren.

Reas. 1. Because we are brethren.

2. Because love is the character of Christian brotherhood.

3. Because love is the bond of perfection and the means of Christian edification.

Use. This may serve to exhort us to the exercise of this grace.

Doct. 4. To our love we should joy no mercy, which looks only unto the good that is to be done.

Reas. 1. Because true love is by this means made most manifest, when it is shown unto those which cannot give us thanks.

2. Because in this we do imitate our heavenly Father, who is the Father of mercies.

3. Because the same benefit is greater, when it is bestowed upon one that is in misery, then when it is bestowed upon another.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, which seem to love such men only, from whom they may expect something.

Doct. 5. Together with our love and mercy we should join courteousnesse.

Reas. 1. Because true love and mercy proceeding from the enlargement of the heart, fits and disposeth the whole man for the doing of good.

2. Because a benefit bestowed in a rough and harsh manner, doth in some sort cease to be a benefit.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, more and more to lay aside all severity, and to have a care to beautify that good which we do, in the manner of doing it.

Doct. 6. Christians should not render evil for evil, or railing for railing.

This is gathered out of the 9. verse. So Rom. 12. 17. and Matth. 5. 39.

Reas. 1. Because the railing or ill-doing of another, doth not loose the bond, or take away the duty of our love.

2. Because this is to be overcome of evil. Rom. 12. 21.

3. Because this derogates from God's fidelity, and takes that, which belongs unto him, out of his hands, Rom. 12. 19. Prov. 22. 23.

Use. This may serve to reprove those men, that are easily provoked, and when they are provoked by any injury, think that they may do anything, and so give themselves liberty to exercise all kind of revenge: and that they do not this from the hatred of sin, but from too much love of themselves, it doth sufficiently appear by this, that when more heinous and grievous offenses are committed against God, and the same wrongs done unto others; they can hear it and behold it, and never be troubled at it.

Doct. 7. It is the duty of Christians to bless those that curse and wrong them.

This is gathered from the 9. v. at the middle. So Matth. 5. 44. and Rom. 12. 14.

Reas. 1. Because love and mercy doth in a special manner require this duty of those, which by such like sins make themselves obnoxious unto cursing.

2. Because we should overcome evil with good. Rom. 12. 21.

3. Because we should imitate our heavenly Father. Matth. 5. 45.

Use. This may serve to exhort us to use ourselves unto this perfection.

Doct. 8. The remembrance of our calling, that it tends unto blessing, should stir us up to bless others.

This is gathered from v. 9. at the latter end.

Reas. 1. Because that which we have freely received from the blessing of God, we should, as much as in us lies, freely and liberally give. Matth. 10. 8.

2. Because by this means we exercise and perfect our own calling.

3. Because by this means we show forth and advance the glory of God, that bestowed this benefit upon us.

Use. This may serve for direction, very often to meditate upon our calling, and that to this end, that we may be made the more ready and fit for Christian duties.

Verse. 10. For he that will love life, and see good days, let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile:

Verse. 11, Let him eschew evil, and do good, let him seek peace and ensue it.

Verse. For the eyes of the Lord are set over the righteous, and his ears are open unto their prayers: but the face of the Lord is against them that do evil.

The Analysis.

IN these three verses, the Apostle proves by the testimony of Scripture, that which he had spoken in the last place, to wit, that Godly men shall inherit a blessing. In which testimony there is in the first place the blessing set down, which all desire, He that will love life, and see good days. 2. The piety of those, to whom this blessing is promised, is synecdochically declared by a distribution of the subjects, as it is in the speech, v. 10. or in the deeds and conversation of life v. 11.

3. The connection of the blessing, with this piety is confirmed by the most powerful cause thereof, namely, the providence of God, watching over the Godly for their good, verse 12. at the beginning. Which is illustrated by a contrary effect of the same providence toward those that do evil, namely, that he watcheth over those always for evils, v. 12. at the end.

The Doctrines arising hereence.

Doct. 1. It is common unto all men, in some sort to desire blessing and happiness.

For therefore doth he in this place, use a common argument to stir up all to the practice of piety.

Reas. 1. Because * omnia appetunt bonum, all things desire their own good, & in some sort too that which they apprehend as summum bonum, the chiefest good.

2. Because all nature tends unto its own perfection, and this perfection is happiness.

3. Because the nature of happiness is such, that if the understanding doth in any manner comprehend it, the will cannot but in some measure desire it, because it is in all respects desirable.

Use. 1. Let us not therefore rest contented with a confused desire of happiness, but endeavor and labor to stir up and to increase in ourselves the true, genuine and effectual desire thereof.

2. For direction, not to corrupt this desire that is approved of God, or to choke it with worldly desires, but to go forward and increase it daily according to that rule, which it given unto us from God.

Doct. 2. True and solid piety is the only way to attain unto these blessings.

Reas. 1. Because God hath promised it to the Godly alone.

2. Because piety in its own nature leadeth to God, and joins us with God, who is the fountain of all good.

3. Because piety it self hath that perfection joined with it, namely, peace of conscience and sound consolation, which is a great part of happiness.

Use. 1. This may serve to convince those of folly and madness, that would be happy, but will not be Godly.

2. To direct us, to kindle in our hearts an earnest endeavor to be godly by the expectation of this happiness, and to gain unto ourselves an assurance of it.

Doct. 3. The providence of God alone, makes for the furtherance of this piety, and the confirmation of this happiness.

This is gathered from v. 12.

Reas. 1. Because God by his providence doth fulfill and perfect all his promises.

2. Because the same providence looks over and takes care for the particular necessities of the Godly.

3. Because he takes special notice of all their desires and prayers, as it is in the text.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to build up ourselves in a true and lively faith of this providence.

Verse. 13. And who is he that will harm you, if ye be followers of that which is Good?

Verse. 14. But and if ye suffer anything for righteousness sake, happy are ye, and be not afraid of their terror, neither be troubled.

Verse. 15. But sanctify the Lord God in your hearts, and be ready always to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you, with meekness and fear, having a good conscience:

Verse. 16. That whereas they speak evil of you, as of evil doers, they may be ashamed that falsely accuse your good conversation in Christ.

The Analysis.

THat which the Apostle had before proposed concerning the practice of piety, he doth there persuade them unto by an argument taken, 1. from the effect thereof, that by this means men are freed and delivered from those harms, which the wicked seek occasion to bring upon them, v. 13. 2. From the happiness adjoined, because no afflictions that are suffered for righteousness and godliness sake, are able to exclude that, verse 14. at the beginning. 3. He shows the right manner of undergoing afflictions, so that happiness may follow thereupon, which consists 1. in the laying aside of that fear and perturbation, which usually men's minds are troubled with in their afflictions, in these words, be not afraid of their terror. 2. In that confidence and reliance of our hearts upon God, whereby his name is sanctified, and by virtue whereof that immoderate fear may be laid aside. And this confidence is set forth by its proper effect, which consists in courageous and ready confession of the faith; of which confession he sets down two properties, namely, meekness and fear or reverence, and moreover he shows the helping and preserving cause thereof, namely, a good conscience, and the effect also which it will work in others, verse 16. to wit, that it will make their enemies with shame to leave off their speaking evil of them.

But here-hence ariseth a question.

Quest. How can this be made good, which the Apostle saith, that no man shall harm the godly? Verse 13.

Answer 1. Because the nature of godliness and goodness tends thereunto, to win the minds of all men, and to take off all ill-will.

2. Because often times also it hath this effect, that taking away all pretence and occasion of unrighteousness, it doth in some measure mollify the enemies minds, except they be quite and clean savage and furiously mad.

3. Because nemo propri• laeditur nisi à scipso, nobody is properly hurt but by himself and his own fault; he therefore that escheweth evil and doeth good, cannot properly be said to be hurt by others, though they do earnestly desire and endeavor to do it.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Christians should be emulators and followers of that which is good.

This is gathered from verse 13.

Reason 1. Because they are called to the imitation of God's goodness: Be ye holy as I am holy: be ye perfect as your Father is perfect.

2. Because there are begotten again unto the image of God, and should daily more and more be fashioned thereunto.

3. Because there is nothing besides that is worthy of our serious imitation.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to lift up our minds, and betake ourselves to this holy and divine emulation.

Doct. 2. They that are followers of that which is good are freed from harm.

This is gathered from verse 13.

Reason 1. Because if God be for us, who can be against us?

2. Because wicked men's minds also are oftentimes overcome by the goodness of the good: Esau was moved by the obsequiousnesse of Jacob.

3. Because the greatest good cannot be taken away from those that labor for true godliness.

Use. This may serve to comfort us against all dangers which may befall us by following that which is good.

Doct. 3. To suffer afflictions for righteousness sake doth not hinder, but further our happiness.

This is gathered from Verse 14. So Matth. 5. 10.

Reason 1. Because such afflictions make us conformable unto Christ in the fellowship of his sufferings, Phil. 3. 10.

2. Because it is a singular part of that obedience and holiness, which tends unto happiness.

3. Because God hath promised bountifully to reward it.

Use. This may serve to comfort us, against all the evils which may befall us for righteousness sake and a good conscience.

Doct. 4. We must lay aside the fear of all dangers wherewith our mind may be troubled.

This is gathered from the same verse at the end.

Reason 1. Because such fear is contrary unto faith and a sure confidence.

2. Because it hath no other use, but to hinder us in doing of our duty.

3. Because it is contrary to the honor of God and the worthiness of a good cause.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to give place to such pusillanimity and faint-heartedness.

Doct. 5. We should strengthen our hearts against all fear, by putting our trust in God.

Reason 1. Because there is nothing else whereby we can overcome all fears and terrors.

2. Because God hath taken this upon himself, and commanded us to commit our cause unto him.

3. Because by this trust and confidence God is made the strength of our souls.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, truly to put our trust in God.

Doct. 6. By this trust and confidence we sanctify God in our hearts.

This is gathered from verse 15.

Reason 1. Because thereby we acknowledge him to be a holy God, that is, a God of perfect power, mercy, truth and fidelity.

2. Because by the effectual acknowledgement of this holiness we give unto him that glory, which is due unto his name from our hearts.

3. Because thereby we advance his glory amongst others, as well in our actions as in our professions.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, wholly to rely upon him.

Doct. 7. We should sanctify God not only in our hearts, but with our mouths also, and in our profession.

This is gathered from these words: Be ready always to give an answer. So Rom. 10. 10.

Reason 1. Because we should glorify God not only in our spirit, but in our body also, 1 Cor. 6. 20.

2. Because we should advance God's glory, not only in ourselves, but amongst others also.

3. Because out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh: we cannot therefore sanctify God with all our heart, unless we are ready to do the same likewise with our mouth.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, which boast of the sincerity of their heart, and in the mean time take no care for the holiness of their heart and words.

2. To exhort us to prepare ourselves for this duty, Eph's. 4. 29.

Doct. 8. All Christians should be ready not only to profess the truth, but also to give a good reason of their profession.

This is gathered from these words: to give an answer to every man that asketh you a reason of the hope that is in you. And this is not to be understood of all truth, but of the truth of religion; nor of all these things neither, which do any way pertain unto religion, but of the very substance of faith, hope, and religion, as it is in the text: a reason of the hope that is in you: nor is it either a natural reason that is required, or such a kind of reason that may stop the mouths of every gainsayer; for this all are not able to do, nor doth it belong unto all; but some sure ground out of God's word, whereupon our faith and hope should be built and strengthened against all kind of temptations. Now here ariseth a question.

Quest. Whether such a reason is to be given to everyone that asketh, or no?

Answ. No not absolutely to everyone, because we are not to give it to Dogs and Swine, (that is, to unclean persons) without a necessary cause, but to everyone that asketh us, so that our profession or answer may probably at least turn to the glory of God, as it is in the text, to sanctify God.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, 1 seriously to study our religion, to understand the grounds thereof. 2 Freely and ingeniously to declare and defend it upon a good occasion.

Doct. 9. Our profession of religion should be with meekness in respect of men, and with fear in respect of God.

Reason. Because by meekness we do good amongst men, and the fear of God will stir us up to do our duty, and keep us within the bounds and limits thereof.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, which keep no measure in their words and actions.

Doct. 10. A good conscience is very necessary as well in the sanctification of God's name, as in the profession of his religion.

That is, a conscience bearing us witness, both of the grace of God towards us in Christ, and of the sincere desire and endeavor of our hearts to please God in all things.

Reason 1. Because without such a conscience, our faith, confidence, fortitude, and liberty, doth languish and decay.

2. Because such a conscience freeth us from all that burden, wherewith otherwise we should be oppressed, and terrified, and affrighted from doing our duty.

3. Because it stirreth us up to all the duties of piety; for without the care of performing them, a good conscience can afford us no comfort.

Use. This may serve to exhort us to have a care of our conscience, to keep it pure before God and men.

The 17 verse is all one with the 20 verse of the 2 chapter.

Verse 17. For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well-doing, then for evil-doing.

Verse 18. For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that he might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit.

Verse 19. By which also he went, and preached unto the Spirits in prison.

Verse 20. Which sometimes were disobedient, when once the longsuffering of God waited in the days of Noah, while the Ark was a preparing; wherein few (that is, eight) souls were saved by water.

Verse 21. The like figure whereunto, even baptism, doth also now save us, (not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience toward God) by the resurrection of Jesus Christ.

Verse 22. Who is gone into heaven, and is on the right hand of God, Angels, and authorities, and powers, being made subject unto him.

The Analysis.

IN this part of the chapter, the Apostle urgeth that exhortation which he had before proposed concerning an endeavor to do well, even unto those that wrong us. And this he doth persuade them unto, 1, by a comparison which he makes betwixt those which suffer for evil doing: which comparison although it may seem to be of a greater or lesser good, when it is said, It is better to suffer for well doing, yet it is indeed a dissimilitude, which is intimated by this 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 extenuation, as appears by the 19 and 20 verse of the second chapter. For it is thank-worthy and it will turn to our glory, if we suffer for well-doing; not so, if it be for evil doing. 2. He confirms this by the example of Christ, verse 18. who though he did most justly, yet suffered unjustly; which example he shows to be of great force, by the end of his suffering; because therefore he suffered, that he might bring us the same way unto God: which that he doth now effectually do, he shows by the cause thereof, to wit, life and glory, which he assumed unto himself by his divine Spirit after his suffering. And to show that that effect, namely, the bringing of men unto God, doth proceed from this cause, to wit, the Spirit of Christ, the Apostle makes a comparison of the like, betwixt those things which the Spirit of Christ did heretofore in the days of Noah, and those things which he doth now since the coming of Christ in the flesh. Heretofore he preached the way of salvation, and patiently waited for the performance of obedience, upon the disobedient he inflicted condign punishment, and a few that were obedient he saved in the Ark: so now also he preacheth the way of salvation, he waits for obedience, and by Baptism, as it were a figure like unto the old Ark, he saves those that are obedient and have a good conscience before God, and that by the glorious life and power which he hath in heaven since the time of his resurrection, verse 21, 22. All which things rend hereunto, that we should hold fast a good conscience, even when we are evil entreated; because it is better as he said before, verse 17. and hath now shown as well by the example of Christ, as by his effectual dispensation throughout all ages, as it is, verse. 18, 19. of which we may sue more, if we look back to chap. 2. ver. 21. to the end. All the other things almost are explained in the answer to Bellarmino, about Christ's descending into hell.

The Doctrines arising here-hence.

Doct. 1. It was the Spirit of Christ, which preached heretofore from the beginning of the world by the Prophets and men of God, before that he appeared in the flesh.

This is gathered from verse 19.

Reason 1. Because the person of Christ was the same from everlasting in the unity of the Divine Essence, so that whatsoever the Spirit of God did, that also may the Spirit of Christ be truly said to have done.

2. Because Christ was the Mediator of mankind from the beginning of the world, in virtue and force: therefore whatsoever the Spirit did, which belonged to the furtherance of the Churches safety, all that he did by virtue of Christ's mediation, and that no less then since his coming in the flesh.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us in the truth of Christ's divine nature.

2. To comfort us and strengthen our faith, in that we have the same Teacher, which instructed the Church from the beginning of the world, and brought it to salvation; and consequently we embrace the same religion, as touching the substance of it, that all the faithful embraced from the beginning of the world.

3. To admonish us, never to reject or make light account of those things which are preached unto us out of God's word, because it is the Spirit of Christ, which preacheth unto us those things, like as he preached unto others from the beginning of the world.

Doct. 2. They which do not obey the preaching of Christ's Spirit, willfully bring upon themselves everlasting damnation.

This is gathered from verse 19. 20.

Reason 1. Because in neglecting the preaching of the Gospel, they neglect and refuse the only means that can keep them from damnation, and bring them unto salvation.

2. Because they do greatly dishonor Christ and his Spirit.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, always, when we come to the hearing of God's word, to endeavor to have circumcised ears and hearts, ready and willing to yield all obedience thereunto.

Doct. 3. God useth much patience and longsuffering towards the disobedient.

This is gathered from verse 20.

Reason 1. Because by this means God's clemency and mercy is manifested.

2. Because by this patience of God all are invited, and many are drawn unto the obedience of faith.

3. Because this patience makes those that are stubbornly disobedient altogether inexcusable, and so justifies God in his just judgments.

Use 1. This may serve to direct us, to give the glory of this patience unto God, when we see sinners to go unpunished for a time.

2. To admonish us not to abuse this patience of God, but to make it a means for the amendment of our lives, and our own salvation, Rom. 2. 4.

Doct. 4. In the destruction of the disobedient, God hath a special eye over the faithful; to save them from the destruction.

This is gathered from verse 20.

Reason 1. Because he disposeth his judgments according to his certain and perfect counsel, not rashly or confusedly, therefore he passeth over whom he pleaseth.

2. Because the punishments of sin should not fall alike upon the godly and wicked, for then he would not be a just disposer of them.

3. Because it stands upon God's glory to save those that fly unto him, as he promised them in his covenant.

Use. This may serve to comfort us, in the time of public calamities, wherein God revengeth the wickedness of men.

Doct. 5. God doth often times preserve those that are his, partly by the same means whereby he destroyeth others.

For it is said that the Ark saved Noah and those seven souls in the waters and by the waters. The same water that drowned others, by lifting up the Ark on high, was the means of their preservation. So Jeremiah was delivered by the Babylonians, by whom the Jews were oppressed.

Reason. Because God can use the same instrument to produce divers and contrary effects, and when he doth this, his glory is the more manifested; because thereby it appears that the effect doth not depend upon the instrument, but upon God: nor doth this come to pass rashly, or by chance, but is ordered and directed by God's certain counsel.

Use. This may serve to direct us, in the time of danger not to look so much upon the means which God useth, as to depend upon God himself, who can turn any means unto the good of those that are his.

Doct. 6. Baptism is such a means of our spiritual salvation, as the water of the flood together with the Ark, was heretofore of the corporal safety of Noah and his family.

This is gathered from verse 21. It is called the Antitype of that water, not because the water was the type of Baptism, and Baptism the exemplar of it, but because there is a typical representative similitude betwixt these two waters. And the similitude consists herein, that as the water of the flood lifted up the Ark and saved Noah and his family in the destruction of the rest, so baptism strengthening our faith, and lifting up our souls unto God reconciled in Christ, saves us in the mortification of our sins.

Reason. Because it is God's institution.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, which make little esteem of baptism.

2. To direct us, to seek this right and proper use of Baptism together with it and by it, and to apply it unto ourselves to our comfort.

Doct. 7. The outward baptism doth not save us of it self, but the inward.

This is gathered from verse 21. Not the putting away of the filth of the flesh, but the answer of a good conscience.

Reason 1. Because outward baptism is common to the hypocrites as well as to the faithful.

2. Because it comes not unto the soul.

3. Because it hath no saving power in it self.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to put too much trust and confidence in the outward Sacraments, or to rely thereupon, that we are baptized and partake of the Lord's Supper, but always to seek the spiritual grace of the Sacraments.

Doct. 8. A singular effect and sign of the inward baptism and effectual grace, is the answer of a good conscience toward God.

For when the Apostle meant to oppose inward Baptism unto outward, in steed of the inward he puts the answer of a good conscience, as the proper effect thereof, by which it may be perceived and known. Now by the answer of a good conscience is meant all that confidence which we have before God of his reconciliation, which chiefly appears in our prayers, and in a pious confession of the faith, and a holy care of obedience.

Reas. 1. Because then are we properly said to be saved, at least according to our apprehension, when our consciences are freed from the guilt and bondage of sin.

2. Because the peace of a good conscience is part of our glorification.

3. Because such a conscience makes us to go on constantly in the way of salvation.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to make it our chiefest care to keep a good conscience toward God.

Doct. 9. Such a conscience and our salvation doth in a special manner depend upon Christ's resurrection.

Reas. 1. Because in the resurrection of Christ, God's sentence was declared, absolving us in him from all sin and death. Rom. 4. 25.

2. Because Christ being raised from the dead, did powerfully accomplish that, which he merited by his death. Rom. 8. 34.

3. Because our consciences are lifted upwards unto Christ sitting in heaven.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to fix the eyes of our faith upon Christ, as he was raised from the dead.

Doct. 10. Since the time of Christ's resurrection, great is his glory and power in heaven.

This is gathered from the last verse.

Reason. 1. Because the time of his humiliation and emptying of himself was finished before.

2. Because it was fit, that he which in singular obedience was mightily humbled, should afterwards be exalted unto great glory.

3. Because this glory and power is necessarily required, that Christ might finish all things, which belong to the salvation of the Church.

Use. This may serve to comfort us, against all dangers and fears, seeing we have such a Savior in heaven.

CHAP. IV.

Vers. 1. For as much then as Christ hath suffered for us in the flesh, arm yourselves likewise with the same mind: for that he that hath suffered in the flesh, hath ceased from sin:

Verse. 2. That he no longer should live the rest of his time in the flesh, to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

Verse 3. For the time past of our life, may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles, when we walked in lasciviousness, lusts, excess of wine, revellings, banquettings, and abominable idolatries.

Verse 4. Wherein they think it strange, that you run not with them to the same excess of riot, speaking evil of you:

Verse 5. Who shall give account to him, that is ready to judge the quick and the dead.

Verse 6. For, for this cause was the Gospel preached also to them that are dead, that they might be judged according to men in the flesh, but live according to God in the Spirit.

The Analysis.

THE Apostle having set before us the example of Christ, in this place he concludes the•hence that which he proposed to be concluded chap. 3. v. 17. and before that v. 11. that is, that all Christians should eschew evil, & follow that which is good. And this conclusion he lays down in such manner, that if a due proportion be observed betwixt Christ as our example, and Christians that are regenerated, and renewed according to his image, he shows it doth necessarily depend upon & flow from the example of Christ. He concludes with such a Syllogism as this:

- All Christians should be armed with the same mind, concerning sin and righteousness, as Christ himself was:

- But Christ having suffered in the flesh ceased from sin, and lived in the spirit unto God:
- Therefore all Christians should be wholly bent, and endeavor all that they can to cease from sin or the lusts of men, and live unto God, or the will of God.

Both the proposition & Assumption are in v. 1. The conclusion in v. 2. The conclusion is illustrated by a comparison made betwixt the time past, and that which is to come; or betwixt that kind of life, which men are wont to lead before their calling, and that, which they should lead after they are called.

For the time past he affirms, that we lived according to the manner of the Gentiles in all the lusts of the flesh, v. 3. And for the time to come, he denies that we should follow those lusts, but that we should live unto the will of God. v. 2. and the beginning of the 3. It may suffice us &c. where he intimates a reason also, why we should now leave off such courses, namely; Because we have too much offended God already in the time past, and if we should abuse his mercy and patience any longer, we could expect nothing else but the revelation of his just anger and indignation, to our eternal confusion. The same conclusion and Comparison is farther illustrated by anticipation of an objection and difficulty, which might take off our desires and endeavors to change our lives, and live contrary to the fashion of others. And the objection is this; that it will seem strange unto many; and for this very cause will they revile us, and speak evil of religion it self, verse 4. The answer is, that this is not our fault, but theirs; and they shall give an account for it unto God at the day of judgment, verse 5. Which judgment is set forth by a distribution of the object, and upon occasion of that distribution he makes a new argument to remove the fore-named difficulty out of our minds; namely, because the Gospel had the same end, and the same effect amongst the faithful that are now dead; to wit, that they being condemned by men, did patiently bear that condemnation, and lived according to God in the spirit, verse 6.

The Doctrines arising hereence.

Doct. 1. We should all arm ourselves with such meditations, as the contemplation of Christ's death affords as.

This is gathered from v. 1.

Reas. 1. Because we are thereunto called, that we should be made conformable unto Christ.

2. Because Christ's death, or Christ crucified is a brief Epitome of all saving knowledge, 1 Cor. 2. 2.

3. Because by such meditations we do more and more put on Christ, and by his power are our minds strengthened and fore-armed, as with a complete armor, against all kind of temptations, and in this respect is this phrase, arm your selves, used in the text.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to arm our minds daily with godly and Christian meditations, that so we may not be exposed to the danger of temptations unarmed and naked; in the bearing of a blow, or suffering any violence, there is great difference betwixt a man that is armed, and one that is not armed.

2. To direct us, in our meditations chiefly to contemplate upon Christ, and those things which pertain unto his death and resurrection.

Doct. 2. He that hath true communion with Christ, hath ceased from sin, and by meditation thereupon doth daily more and more cease from it.

This is gathered from verse 1, at the end.

Reason 1. Because our communion with Christ is by the Spirit of Christ, which makes us conformable to his death and resurrection, Rom. 6. throughout the whole Chapter.

2. Because in our conversion unto Christ, there is always included an aversion from sin by serious repentance.

3. Because such meditations are the ordinary means whereby the work of the Spirit is perfected, and our repentance renewed and furthered.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that profess Christ in word, but in their deeds do not cease from sin.

2. To direct us, to press such syllogismes and reasonings upon our consciences, Rom. 6.

Doct. 3. He that ceaseth from sin, doth not live to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.

This is gathered from verse 2.

Reason 1. Because the lusts of sinful men are in themselves sins, and lead unto sin.

2. Because these lusts fight against the soul, and we in our conversion have bound ourselves to fight against them.

3. Because the will of God is the only rule of our life, which is altogether contrary to the lusts of the flesh.

Use. This may serve to direct us in the trial of our state and condition. For look how our life is sincerely directed in respect of the lusts of men, and the will of God, so may we certainly judge ourselves to be either in the state of sin, or in the state of grace.

Doct. 4. It seems more then enough to the faithful, that before their conversion they so long followed the lusts of the flesh, and fashions of the world.

This is gathered from verse 3.

Reason 1. Because they are ashamed with a holy shame of those courses, Rom. 6. 21.

2. Because they receive no benefit by them, but repentance.

3. Because they see that it was God's great mercy, that they were at length delivered from them, and from the death which they bring, in the same Chapter.

4. Because the rest of their time seems but a little unto them, in respect of the duty which they have to do, in seeking and glorifying God.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, which defer and put off the time of amending their lives, as if they had not yet sinned enough.

2. To admonish us, to redeem the time, and spend it in advancing of God's glory, and our own salvation.

Doct. 5. Amongst all the vicious lusts and courses of the world, luxury is one of the chiefest, whereby men walk in lasciviousness, excess of wine and banquetings.

Reason 1. Because in these men do most of all pamper the flesh, and have no regard at all unto the soul.

2. Because by these the soul is drowned, as it were in the pleasures of the flesh, so that it cannot lift up itself unto God, and to divine things.

3. Because these make way for the devil, and all devilish sins; and thereupon abominable idolatry seems to be joined with them in the text because by them many were brought to be present at idolatrous feasts, and so to honor the idols themselves, though in their consciences they made no reckoning of them.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to beware of these wicked courses.

Doct. 6. It seems very strange to the men of the world, that the godly should refuse to live after that manner, as they live.

Reason 1. Because they think there is a kind of happiness in that kind of life, which for any man to dislike, they cannot but wonder at it.

2. Because as long as they are carnal, they cannot rightly discern those spiritual reasons, which make the faithful to abhor such conversation.

3. Because they measuring others by themselves, think that all men do greedily desire such kind of pleasures.

Use. This may serve to admonish the faithful, 1. Not to think that they do live so, as their calling or profession doth require, unless they do so far estrange themselves from the common courses of worldly men, that they make them to wonder at them. 2. Not to be troubled at such opinions of men, but to take their dislike, as a token of God's good liking and approbation.

Doct. 7. By this alienation of minds, which ariseth from the difference of the conversation, betwixt the believers and the unbelievers, the regenerate and the unregenerate, it oftentimes comes to pass, that the unregenerate speak evil of the truth of God.

This is gathered from verse 5 at the end. For although some are so taken with the splendor of piety which shines forth in the godly that they glorify God, as it is chap. 2. ver. 12. and it becomes a means of winning them, as it is chap. 3. verse 1. or at least that they are ashamed, as it is chap. 3. v. 16. Yet there are others which take occasion thereby to blaspheme, chiefly, because the godly by abstaining from those lusts and courses, which they highly esteem, seem seriously to reprove them, as well in their deeds as their words.

Reason 1. Because all they that do evil hate the light.

2. Because such a separation in conversation of life is as it were a condemning of those from whom separation is made out of conscience and religion.

3. Because wicked men being blinded with anger and hatred, andudging of others by themselves, doe imagine that this separation is usually made in hypocrisy, & simulation, not out of conscience and religion.

Use. This may serve to comfort and strengthen our souls against the temptations and troubles which may arise unto us from such men's blasphemies.

Doct. 8. God will require an account from men for all such blasphemies, either in this life, or at the last judgment.

This is gathered from verse 5.

Reason 1. Because his Majesty is wronged more in these blasphemies, then in most of the other sins.

2. Because those sins are most heinous, and come nearest to the sin against the Holy Ghost.

3. Because they directly tend to the hindrance of the kingdom of God, and the righteousness thereof.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to take heed of all those, that do any way partake in such a sin.

2. To comfort us: because God revengeth such injuries, we should commit them unto him.

Doct. 9. God keeps a just account of those things that are done to the faithful, not only while they live, but also after their death.

For in that sense is he said to be ready to judge the quick and the dead, where by the quick and the dead the faithful are most properly understood, as appears by verse 6.

Reason 1. Because God always lives, and his word and covenant lives.

2. Because it stands upon God's glory, to defend the cause also of his servants that are dead, and to revenge their injuries.

3. Because oftentimes the iniquity of the wicked is not come to its full measure, before the death of God's children whom they have vexed.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort us, as well in life as in death.

2. To admonish us not to judge rashly of God's ways in his patience and longsuffering; but to compose our minds to a patient waiting for the wished event.

Doct. 10. The condition of the faithful now living, and of those that lived heretofore in all ages, is wholly alike, as touching the substance of it.

This is gathered from verse 6. compared with the verse fore-going.

Rea. Because God is the same, & faith is the same; & on the contrary side also, the devil and the world are like themselves.

Use. This may serve to direct us, not to give way to too much complaining of the present age, as if there had never been the like before; but courageously to go forward in doing our duty, that we may do that in our times according to our ability, which other faithful men did in their time; who as it is said of David, Acts 13. 36. after they had in their age served the will of God, fell on sleep in the Lord.

Doct. 11. The short compendium of our whole Christian life, is, so to receive the Gospel, that renouncing the flesh we should in that respect be judged according to men, and live according to God in the Spirit.

This is gathered from verse 6.

Reason. Because therein consists all divinity.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to make trial of our condition by this rule.

Verse 7. But the end of all things is at hand: be ye therefore sober, and watch unto prayer.

Verse 8. And above all things have fervent charity among yourselves: for charity shall cover the multitude of sins.

Verse 9. Use hospitality one to another, without grudging.

Verse 10. As every man hath received the gift, even so minister the same one to another, as good stewards of the manifold grace of God.

Verse 11. If any man speak, let him speak as the Oracles of God, if any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth, that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ, to whom be praise and dominion forever, and ever, Amen.

The Analysis.

FROM the last discourse about the judgment of God, the Apostle takes occasion to press his exhortation to the duties of piety, by that very argument. First therefore he lays down that third argument for a ground, that the last judgment, the end of all things, is at hand; and thereupon concludes that we must seriously and diligently apply ourselves to the duties of piety. And these duties he sets down by an induction of the principal parts, 1 Prayer, with the adjuncts and helping causes thereof, to wit, temperance and sobriety, verse 7. 2. Mutual charity, verse 8. which he sets forth, 1. By the singular care, wherewith we should labor for it above other virtues, in these words: above all things, and then by the degree, wherein we should have it, and exercise it in this word, fervent: of which exhortation he gives a reason also from the effect, for charity covers a multitude of sins. 3. To charity he joins hospitality, verse 9. as it were a special act of charity, whereof he shows the due manner how it should be used, that it should be without grudging, that is, voluntary, not by constraint. 4. A mutual communication of all the gifts of God, verse 10. And the reason of this duty is taken partly from the nature of the gift in respect of the author thereof, that it is the grace of God, and partly from that relation, which they that have received the gift, have unto such a grace, to wit, that they are not masters, but stewards of it. And of this communication he propounds two chief kinds, which he describes and persuades them unto, verse 11. The first is communication in speech, or in the word of God, the description and rule whereof is, that it should be conformable to the nature of God's word. The second is communication in our abilities and wealth, the description and rule whereof is common to both, together with all the foregoing exhortations, taken from the end and benefit of them, that God in all things may be glorified; which glorification of God is set forth by a present declaration of it; to whom be praise forever and ever, Amen.

The Doctrines drawn here-hence.

Doct. 1. The end of all things is at hand.

This is gathered from verse 7. Now this may be understood, 1. of the end of all men, that live together, because a generation of men soon passeth away, and so the end of all those is properly said to be at hand. 2. It may also by the same reason be understood of the final condition of all those: because look how everyone dyes, so shall he continue forever, either happy or wretched. 3. It may also in some sort be understood of the end of the world.

Reason 1. Because these are the last ages, after which there is no coming of Christ to be expected; but unto judgment, nor any change of worship, but upon the consummation of all things.

2. Because the Lord doth not delay the promise of his coming, but prepares all things for himself, and in their order shows forth the judgments of that day which is approaching.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to think with the evil servant that the coming of the Lord is far off, but certainly to look for it, and accordingly to prepare ourselves for that day, Matth. 24. 44. 46.

Doct. 2. For the preparing of ourselves aright against the coming of the Lord, it is chiefly required, that we should pray continually.

This is gathered from verse 7.

Reason 1. Because in our prayers we do stir up our faith, hope, and desire touching those good things, which the Lord will impart unto us at his coming.

2. Because by our prayers we do turn aside and remove those evils from ourselves, which make his coming dreadful unto sinners: for by flying unto God's mercy, we do fly both from our sins, and from his wrath.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to be diligent in prayer.

Doct. 3. Temperance and sobriety should be joined with our prayers.

This is also gathered from verse 7. It is the same which is said everywhere, Watch and pray.

Reason 1. Because the effectual consideration thereof, that the end of all things is at hand, makes us to love this world the less, and so to use it, as not to abuse it, that is, soberly and temperately, 1 Cor. 7. 31.

2. Because these are the means whereby our prayers are helped and furthered; therefore it is said in the text, Be sober and watch unto prayer.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to make conscience of doing our duty in prayer.

Doct. 4. Above all things we should labor for brotherly love, that it may be sincere and fervent.

This is gathered from verse 8. Not that charity towards men is more excellent then faith hope and love towards God, but because it is the chiefest of those things which belong unto men, and should be preferred before all those things, which might any way hinder it.

Reason 1. Because love is the sum of the whole law, and so contains in it all other duties.

2. Because charity covers a multitude of sins, as it is in the text: amongst men themselves, that they stir not up anger, hatred, and contention, Prov. 10. 12.

2. Because charity also doth in some sort cover a multitude of our sins before God, to wit, that they procure not the revenge of his anger. For this it doth, as a sign and argument, whereby we are the more assured of the forgiveness of our sins, because we forgive others their offenses, Mat. 6. 15.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to labor for charity.

Doct. 5. Hospitality is one of the principal acts of charity.

This is gathered from verse 9. So Rom. 12. 13. Heb. 13. 2.

Reason 1. Because in hospitality we do not only communicate our goods unto our brethren, but ourselves also by a familiar conversation.

2. Because it is more acceptable unto others to receive a little upon such an occasion, then in any other respect to receive much, because the seasonableness and courtesnesse makes that which is given to be the better accepted.

3. Because by this means friendship is more increased then by other bountiful expenses.

Use. This may serve to reprove the merciless minds and conditions of men, for luxury and coverousnesse hath quite taken away all hospitality.

Doct. 6. The duties of this kind should be performed without grudging.

This is gathered from verse 9.

Reason 1. Because God loveth a ready and cheerful giver, 2 Cor. 9. 7.

2. Because grudging makes the benefit unacceptable to him that receives it.

3. Because grudging is as it were a repenting for doing the duty, and so makes it void and of no effect.

Use. The use hereof is, that in doing good we should watch over our minds, that they be rightly and fitly disposed.

Doct. 7. It is an office of charity to minister unto others the gifts which we have received, of what kind soever they be.

This is gathered from verse 10.

Reason 1. Because the gifts of God do in their nature tend unto the glory of God in promoting the good of men.

2. Because to this end are all the gifts of God committed unto us, as stewards of the grace of God, as it is in the text.

3. Because this very thing doth the communion of Saints require, to the believing and exercising whereof are all Christians called.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort us, in that there is no faithful Christian, but hath some gift, whereby he may minister something unto others.

2. To exhort us, everyone to use that gift which he hath, to the good of others.

Doct. 8. In exercising those gifts, which belong to the preaching or declaration of God's word, our chief care should be, so to carry ourselves as becomes the word of God.

This is gathered from verse 11 at the beginning.

Reason 1. Because every action rightly ordered should have a just proportion to its object.

2. Because so great is the dignity of God's word, that without such a care it cannot be kept safe, without wronging of it.

3. Because all the power of our speech concerning God's word is lost, if it take not its whole strength from the word it self.

Use. This may serve to admonish, not only the Preachers, that they handle the word of God holily, faithfully, and gravely, but also all hearers, that they judge aright of the Sermon, and make distinction betwixt those Preachers, which speak as the Oracles of God, and others, which speak as a human speech or oration; and that they themselves also, if upon occasion they should treat of the word of God in private, should do it holily, gravely, and reverently, as it becomes the word of God to be handled.

Doct. 9. He that with his wealth ministereth to the necessities of others, should do it according to the ability which he hath received of god.

This is gathered from verse 11, that is, he must do it not by constraint, sparingly, and slowly, but with a ready and cheerful affection, to his power, and beyond his power voluntarily, 2 Cor. 8. 3.

Reason 1. Because this communicating is as it were a sacrifice, wherewith God is well pleased, Heb. 3. 16.

2. Because from this sowing we may expect a great harvest, of God's blessing, 2 Cor. 9. 6.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to perform such duties according to the fashion and custom of the world, as if their example were our rule, but according to the ability which God hath afforded us.

Doct. 10. God is to be glorified in all things.

As the Apostle, 1 Cor. 10. 31.

Reas. 1. Because the glory of God is the end of all things.

2. Because our actions are not religious, but so far forth as they are directed to that end.

3 Because God will glorify those which glorify him.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to imagine that our duty in glorifying God is restrained to the public worship, as many use to do, but to have a care of this duty in all things.

Doct. 11. God is to be glorified by Jesus Christ.

Reason 1. Because in the name and by the power of Christ we do all the good that we do, Col. 3. 17.

2. Because we should represent that which we do, before God by Christ.

3. Because we cannot glorify God by any other means, but by following the example of Christ, and observing his doctrine.

Use. This may serve to direct us, that Christ should be all in all unto us.

Doct. 12. We should be so disposed towards God in Christ, that we should never think of his glory without an elevation of the heart to confess God, which we should cherish and increase.

This is gathered from that doxologie, to whom be praise and dominion forever and ever, Amen. For the Apostle breaks forth into this declaration of God's glory, being as it were forced thereunto by the meditation of that duty, which he had now propounded, to glorify God.

Reason 1. Because thereby appears our inward disposition to the performing of that duty.

2. Because it is the beginning of the deed.

3. Because God should reign in our hearts, that we might not so much upon deliberation, as naturally, be stirred up, and moved towards him to the declaration of all those things which may make for his glory.

Use. This may serve to reprove the common stupidity of men, who are nothing at all moved with those things, which do most nearly belong to the glory of God's name.

Verse 12. Beloved, think is not strange concerning the fiery trial. which is to try you, as though some strange thing happened unto you.

Verse 13. But rejoice, in as much as ye are partakers of Christ's sufferings, that when his glory shall be revealed, ye may be glad also with exceeding joy.

Verse 14. If ye be reproached for the name of Christ, happy are ye, for the Spirit of glory, and of God, resteth upon you: on their part he is evil $\langle \diamond \rangle$ of but on your part he is glorified.

Verse 15. But let none of you $\langle \diamond \rangle$ as a murderer, or as a thief, or as an evil doer, or as a busy-body, in other men's matters.

Verse 16. Yet if any man suffer as a Christian, let him not be ashamed, but let him glorify God on this behalf.

Verse 17. For the time is come that judgment must begin at the house of God: and if it first begin at us, what shall the end be of them that obey not the Gospel of God?

Verse 18. And if the righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear?

Verse 19. Wherefore, let them that suffer according to the will of God, commit the keeping of their souls to him in well doing, as unto a faithful Creator.

The Analysis.

THE Apostle doth here repeat that exhortation, to suffer persecution aright, which he had heretofore used again and again; because this exhortation was very necessary, and contains in it the primary scope of the Epistle. But in this place he repeats it as a pre-occupation or anticipation of an objection or difficulty, which might be made against the foregoing exhortation, wherein he persuaded them to a constant care of all the duties of piety. For they to whom this Epistle was to come, might thus think with themselves, that by this profession and practice of piety most grievous persecutions are like to befall them, and that contrary to their expectation, and therefore they are not to be requested by walking in the same way to heap so great evils upon themselves. Of these persecutions therefore the Apostle warns them. 1. In general, that it should not seem any new or strange thing to any Christian, thereby to be troubled at it, which he shows, 1. From their proper end, that they are as it were fire to try the faith, sincerity and constancy of the faithful, verse 12. 2. From the similitude that is betwixt the faithful and Christ in suffering afflictions, in which respect they should be so far from being troubled at it, that they should rejoice, which is contrary to perturbation. The reason of which consequence is taken from the effect, to wit, because by suffering afflictions after this manner the faithful come to partake of glory and eternal joy with Christ. 3. From the blessedness which is adjoined unto it, in respect of the communion of the holy Spirit, who when he is blasphemed by the persecutors, is present with those that suffer, and is glorified by them, verse 14. But that this which the Apostle hath spoken, may be rightly understood, he tells them, that this cannot be meant of every affliction, but of that alone which a man suffers for the name of Christ, verse 24. as it is explained, verse 15, 16. when a man suffers not for his own deserts, but merely as, or because he is a Christian: from which consideration the conclusion which he laid down before is effectually deduced, verse 16. to wit, that in that respect he should not be ashamed, or so troubled, as if he were ashamed of the name of Christ, but therefore to glorify God. 4. From the ruling cause which orders and governs such events, namely, the will of God, whereby he hath appointed a certain time to exercise judgment in his house or Church, verse 17. at the beginning. For that which is there spoken of the time of judgment, is afterwards referred to the will of God, verse 19. 5. To the same purpose is the condition of the faithful set forth by comparing the condition of the unbelievers, verse 17, 18. which is declared by such a connection: If the condition of the faithful be so hard, the condition of the unbelievers must be altogether intolerable; whence he doth closely intimate, that we must neither envy the unbelieving persecutors, or revolt from the faith by reason of persecutions. From all these things the primary conclusion is specially inferred, verse 19. that the faithful in suffering afflictions should arm themselves with true confidence, against all the perturbations and temptations which may arise unto them from afflictions.

The Doctrines drawn herehence.

Doct. 1. Afflictions and persecutions should not seem a new or strange thing unto Christians.

This is gathered from verse 12.

Reason 1. Because they were foretold by Christ and his Apostles.

2. Because Christ himself and his chief Disciples were used after the same manner.

3. Because such is the disposition of the world, that we must always expect such things from it.

Use. This may serve to admonish us not to be troubled at these things, as it is in the text.

Doct. 2. The end and use of afflictions is for the trial of Christians.

This is gathered from the same verse. See the same doctrine Chap. 1. verse 7.

Doct. 3. The faithful in suffering afflictions and persecutions are partakers of Christ's sufferings.

This is gathered from verse 13.

Reason 1. Because when they suffer for the name of Christ, Christ suffers in them, according to that of the Lord, Saul, Saul, why persecutest thou me?

2. Because they are made conformable unto Christ's death, Phil. 3. 10.

Use. This may serve to comfort us, because therein we have matter of rejoicing, as it is in the text.

Doct. 4. From these afflictions, if we suffer them joyfully, we have a sure argument of our eternal joy and glory to come hereafter.

This is gathered from verse 13.

Reason 1. Because they that are partakers of Christ's death, are partakers also of his resurrection and everlasting life, Rom. 8. 17. 2 Cor. 4. 11.

2. Because that joy which we have in afflictions, is the first fruits of our eternal joy and glory.

Use. This may serve to admonish us to learn to suffer joyfully for the name of Christ, James 1. 2. Acts 5. 41.

Doct. 5. The reproaches which the faithful suffer for godliness sake, are to be reckoned amongst those persecutions, which they suffer for the name of Christ.

This is gathered from verse 14.

Reason 1. Because they tend to the dishonoring and disgracing of us.

2. Because they show that the minds of the authors of them are as ready to bring greater evils upon us, i^o occasion should serve.

3. Because reproaches do work more upon some men's minds than real injuries.

Use. This may serve to admonish, 1 all men, to take heed that they have no communion with the wicked world in scoffing at any part of true piety. 2. The godly, to have a special care, that they be not moved at such reproaches, but to bear them with the same patience, that they ought to bear other persecutions.

Doct. 6. In these reproaches which the godly suffer for the name of Christ, the Spirit of God is in a special manner blasphemed on the one side, and glorified on the other.

This is gathered from verse 14.

Reason. Because look how far forth the faithful make profession of true piety, so far forth are they the temples of the holy Ghost: therefore when in that respect they are reproached, the holy Ghost is evil spoken of: and when they hold fast and adorn their profession notwithstanding these reproaches, the same Spirit which is evil spoken of by the reproaches, is glorified by them.

Use 1. This may serve for terror to those that do reproach others.

And 2. For comfort to those that are reproached.

Those things which are in the 13 verse, were handled before cap. 2. & 3.

Doct. 7. God hath certain and appointed times to execute his judgments.

This is gathered from verse 17 at the beginning.

Reason 1. Because the patience and longsuffering of God must have their time.

2. Because there is a time also required, that men may fill up the measure of their sins.

3. Because there are certain opportunities of time, wherein God's judgments are executed with greater benefit, then they could be at other times.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to condemn God any way either of slowness or rashness in respect of his judgments, but to rest well satisfied in his most wise ordering of all things.

Doct. 8. Judgment doth often begin at the house of God, that is, at the Church.

This is gathered from the same place.

Reason 1. Because the sins of those, which profess God's name, do in a special manner wrong God's name and his honor, and therefore the more they offend God, the more ought they to be punished.

2. Because God's chief care is, to purify his Church by such chastisements.

3. Because God oftentimes useth the unbelievers as his instruments to correct his Church; they must therefore be first tolerated, that they may accomplish God's counsel, and afterwards punished, because they have done so wickedly.

Use. This may serve to direct us, not to be troubled in mind, when we see the Church afflicted before and above other people, but to acknowledge God's divine ordering of it.

Doct. 9. The judgment which God exerciseth upon his Church, is a most certain argument of the most sever• and heavy judgment that shall in its due time come upon wicked men and unbelievers.

This is gathered from verse 17, 18. So Ier. 25. 29.

Reason 1. Because God deals with his Church as a Father, but he will deal with others as a Judge.

2. Towards the Church in the midst of judgment he remembers mercy, but towards the wicked and unbelievers he exerciseth revenge.

3. Because to the believers judgment worketh together for good, but in the unbelievers it hath no such mitigation.

Use 1. This may be for comfort to the faithful in their afflictions.

2. For terror to the unbelievers in their persecutions and carnal security.

Doct. 10. They that suffer for the name of Christ, do properly suffer according to the will of God.

This is gathered from verse 19. compared with ver. 14. 16.

Reason 1. Because their sins oftentimes are not the causes of these afflictions, but the will of God to make trial of them.

2. Because it is the revealed will of God, that such afflictions are the lot of the faithful, and the way by which they usually come to the kingdom of God.

3. Because this suffering of such afflictions is part of our obedience to the revealed will of God.

Use. This may serve to comfort us against the trouble of these afflictions.

Doct. 11. They which suffer in this manner, may commend their souls unto God.

This is gathered from the same verse.

Reason 1. Because when they suffer for the name of God, God doth in some sort suffer with them, and therefore their cause is God's cause.

2. Because in that duty which we perform unto God, as his servants, we may expect protection from him, as our Master.

3. Because while we are exposed unto danger for God's sake, God cannot but take care of us.

Use. This is a use of consolation, and it is explained and set forth by the Apostle Paul, 2 Tim. 1. 12.

Doct. 12. They should do this by well doing.

This is gathered from the same verse. So Rom. 1.

Reason 1. Because they cannot suffer for the name of Christ but as they suffer for well doing.

2. Because they cannot preserve the liberty of their confidence, but by a good conscience, that is, by well doing.

3. Because to commend an evil cause unto God, is, to make God as it were the Patron of evil.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to take heed, that we do not deprive ourselves of this great privilege by evil doing.

Doct. 13. God is a faithful protector and defender of those that commend their souls unto him.

Reason 1. Because it is easy for him to preserve our souls, as it was heretofore to make them: and in this respect he is called in the text, God the Creator not the Preserver.

2. Because it stands upon his glory to do this.

3. Because the fidelity and truth of his promises requires as much.

This may serve to comfort us in all straits and adversities: Let them commend their souls under a faithful Creator, saith the Apostle.

Chapter V.

Verse 1. The Elders which are among you I exhort, who am also an Elder, and a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and also a partaker of the glory that shall be revealed.

Verse 2. Feed the flock of God which is among you, taking the oversight thereof, not by constraint, but willingly: not for filthy lucre, but of a ready mind.

Verse 3. Neither as being Lord's over God's heritage: but being ensamples to the flock.

Verse 4. And when the chief Shepherd shall appear, ye shall receive a crown of glory that fadeth not away.

The Analysis.

Here is a special exhortation propounded towards the Elders, that they should perform their duty and office in a holy manner. The duty in general is set down to be, to feed the flock, whereof they were made overseers, by a diligent oversight and care of them, verse 2. at the beginning. And withal it is described by 3 conditions that are in a special manner required therein, which are set forth by a dehortation from the three contrary vices, that are opposed to those three conditions. 1. The first condition is, willingly to feed the flock; the contrary vice whereunto is, to do it by constraint. 2. To do it readily and freely the contrary vice unto this, is, to seek after filthy lucre thereby. 3. Not only in doctrine, but in example of life to go before the Church; the contrary vice whereunto is, to Lord it over the Church. This duty being thus declared and described, they are persuaded unto it by the reward that is adjoined, which for that cause all faithful shepherds do receive, verse 4. at the end. Which reward is set forth both by the internal nature of it, that it is a crown of glory that fadeth not away; and by the author and giver of it, to wit, that the chief Shepherd our Lord Jesus Christ, will give it; and also by the time of this giving of it, when the chief Shepherd shall appear, that is, at the last day of judgment. Now this exhortation, that it might be the more effectual, and might work the more upon them, is urged and set forth by the person of Peter, who was the ministering cause thereof, 1. From the parity and fellowship of the same duty, as Peter an Elder prayed the other Elders to do their duty. 2. From the knowledge which he had▪ and the testimony which he could give of the afflictions of Christ, which he suffered for the Church, the remembrance whereof should stir up all shepherds to a diligent care of the Church. 3. From that certain expectation which he had of the glory to come, which glory he promiseth to all shepherds in the name of the chief shepherd.

The Doctrines drawn herehence.

Doct. 1. Those exhortations are most effectual which are propounded in an humble manner.

This is gathered from verse 1. where the Apostle prays, not commands, in humility and charity. So Phil. 1. 9. 1 Tim. 5. 1. He prays the Elders also as a fellow Elder, although he was placed in a higher degree, as Apostle.

Reason 1. Because by this manner of doing it appears, that he which exhorts doth not aim at his own good, but the good of another.

2. Because by this manner of doing his zeal shows it self to be the purer.

3. Because he, to whom such an exhortation is made, is honored thereby, and to takes it the easier and better.

Use. This may serve to direct us, in all our exhortations and admonitions to have respect unto this.

Doct. 2. It makes the exhortation the more effectual, when a man speaks out of certain judgment and communion of affection.

This is gathered herehence, that Peter makes way for his exhortation in that he was a witness of the sufferings of Christ, and so had a certain knowledge of those things which belong unto Christ, and that he was partaker of the same glory; and therefore he was affected after the same manner himself, as he desired they should be.

Reason 1. Because knowledge gives ability and authority, and communion of affection adds zeal and charity to the exhortation.

2. Because these two will take away those objections, which usually hinder the efficacy of the exhortation; namely, either that he gives his judgment of things that he doth not know, or else at least he is an inexperienced man, of whom it may rightly be said, If thou wert here, thou wouldest think otherwise.

Use. This may serve to direct us to get knowledge of those things which we exhort others unto, and affections also answerable thereunto.

Doct. 3. Men should be exhorted in a special manner unto these duties, which belong unto their proper or particular functions or calling.

This is gathered from verse 2. where the shepherds are exhorted to feed the flock.

Reason 1. Because every man's particular function is that condition wherein God▪ hath placed him to advance his glory.

2. Because a man's faithfulness is most of all made trial of in that condition.

3. Because the duties of our general calling should be exer••ed in every Christians particular condition.

Use. This may serve to admonish everyone to take greatest care of those duties which are proper to his calling or condition.

Doct. 4. It is the proper duty of a Shepherd, to feed the flock that is committed to his charge.

This is gathered from verse 2.

Reason 1. Because the shepherds are appointed for the edification of the Church: now to feed is nothing else, but to use all means that are appointed by God to procure the edification of the Church.

2. Because Pastors are properly given to the faithful that are converted, who as new borne babes should be nourished and brought up with milk and food, until they come to perfection.

3. Because the overseers of the Church should take most care of those things, that are most necessary for the Church; but it is most necessary for the faithful being imperfect, to have their spiritual life preserved and increased by feeding.

Use. This may serve to admonish, 1 The Ministers not to think that it is a light or common duty that lies upon them, but that the very life of the Church doth in some sort depend upon their labor and Ministry, and therefore so to carry themselves, as befits and becomes so great a duty.

2. The people, not to expect from their Ministers vain and light things which might tickle their ears, but to come to a Sermon as to the Lord's Table, and seek for spiritual food to feed their souls unto everlasting life.

Doct. 5. Pastors should perform their duties willingly, not by constraint.

This is gathered from the same verse. Now by constraint is meant that forcing which proceeds from outward things, whereby a man performs the part of a Minister in some sort, either to avoid poverty, or disgrace and infamy, or the censure of others.

Reason 1. Because that which is done by constraint, comes not from the heart as from an inward principle, nor from the Spirit sanctifying; and therefore it is not a duty pleasing and acceptable unto God.

2. Because that which comes not from the heart, and is not done willingly is done only perfunctorily and for fashion sake, not with that diligence and care which God requires.

3. Because that which proceeds not from the heart and the dearest affection of the soul, doth not usually work upon other men's minds, and therefore is not effectual to the edification of the Church, which is the end of the Ministry.

Use. This should admonish us, to look not only to the understanding, but also to the disposition of the will and heart in the Ministers of the Church.

Doct. 6. They should do the same of a ready mind, not for lucre.

Now by lucre is meant all kind of worldly profit, which men acquire unto themselves, either in doing the thing, or in getting fame, or in gaining friends, and the like.

Reason 1. Because that which depends upon lucre or some such like end, must necessarily be applied thereunto, and this is to corrupt the word of God, 2 Cor. 2. 17.

2. Because that which depends upon mutable things, that also it self is mutable and inconstant.

3. Because he which seeketh after lucre, is not a Minister of God, but of Mammon.

Use. This may serve to admonish, 1 The Ministers not to follow after lucre. 2. The people not to suffer their Ministers to be tempted by poverty, and so to be the less cheerful and ready in performing their duty, Heb. 13. 17.

Doct. 7. The affectation of Lordliness should be far from Christ's Ministers.

This is gathered from verse 3.

Reason 1. Because they are called to mere service, not to Lordliness.

2. Because Christ himself, whose Ministers they are, did purposely live amongst men as one that serveth, that he might leave an example unto those that should minister unto others in his name, Luke 22. 27.

3. Because the work wherein they are employed, is not subject to the command and authority of men. For men cannot command religion, but only persuade unto it.

4. Because the Lordliness of Ministers alienates men's minds from their testimony, because they neither willingly subject themselves to such as affect Lordliness, and they suppose too that those men, whom they see to study their own glory and power, do neither look after the glory of God, nor the good or the Church.

Use. This may serve to admonish all Ministers, to take heed not only of all affectation but also all show of Lordliness. Now these men have a show of Lordliness, 1 That would have others in some sort to depend upon their authority.

2. Those that prescribe something as necessary to be believed or done, which is not taken out of God's word. 3. Those that expound the will of God it self too imperiously, having no regard to the infirmity of those with whom they have to do.

Doct. 8. Ministers should go before the people not only in doctrine, but in example also.

This is gathered from verse 3.

Reason 1. Because they are called to feed the flock with all their strength; and therefore they should edify the Church not only by their words, but by their deeds also.

2. Because a wicked life doth either utterly destroy their preaching, or at least much weaken it.

3. Because a good example is of a singular force, in that it showeth that that very thing may be done, which he preacheth should be done.

4. Because it takes away all prejudice out of men's minds, and all suspicion of affecting Lordliness and vain glory, when they see Ministers seriously to do that, which they propound and persuade others to do.

Use. This may serve to exhort, first, the Ministers, to labor to lead an exemplary life. Secondly, the people, to imitate the good life of their Ministers, for therefore are they proposed as examples. The common vices contrary to this duty, are: 1. That many observe those things only in their Ministers, which they may carpe at or calumniate, and not those things which they should take notice of, with intention to imitate them. 2. That many imagine that there is a special kind of holiness belonging to Ministers, which others are not bound to labor for. 3. That many excuse their wicked courses by this pretence, that they are Lay-men, not Ecclesiastical or Clergy-men.

Doct. 9. Ministers should expect the just reward of their labor and care, not from men, but from Christ.

This is gathered from verse 4.

Reason 1. Because Christ is the chief shepherd, and Lord of the flock, as it is in the text.

2. Because they must expect many injuries from men, and those good things which do happen, are not such, or so highly to be esteemed of, as that they should depend upon them.

3. Because they will labor to please him most from whom they expect their reward. Now they should please Christ, not men.

Use. This may serve to comfort godly Ministers against those troubles, which they find men to make against them.

Doct. 10. Their reward is a crown of eternal glory.

Reason 1. Because glory is the reward of the faithful for all kind of obedience towards God. Now in the Ministry there is a special kind of obedience.

2. Because those that did strive or run lawfully in a race, there was wont to be a Crown set before them; so for those that carry themselves well in the exercise of the Ministry, besides the glory common to all the Saints, there is a special kind of addition prepared, which is like as it were a crown.

Use. This may serve to exhort Ministers, courageously to contemn all temporary ignominy and disgrace for this Crown of eternal glory.

Doct. 11. This Crown of glory shall be fully given at Christ's second coming to judgment.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, patiently to persevere unto the end.

Verse 5. Likewise ye younger, submit yourselves unto the elder: yea, all of you be subject one to another, and be clothed with humility: for God resisteth the proud, and giveth grace to the humble.

Verse 6. Humble yourselves therefore under the mighty hand of God, that he may exalt you in due time.

Verse 7. Casting all your care upon him, for he careth for you.

The Analysis.

THE Apostle having in the former verses described the duty of the Elders towards the Church or the younger sort, and persuaded them unto it, he doth there-hence conclude the duty of the younger towards the elders by a comparing of things that are alike unto it, as the first word of the 5 verse shows unto us, Likewise. This duty is in general pointed out by subjection, which is set forth by the other duty, that is due not only to the Elders, but also to all the members of the Church, by reason of that nature which it hath common with the former; and it is also called subjection in those words, yea, all of you be subject one to another. Now this subjection as well unto the Elders as unto all, is first described what kind of subjection it ought to be, to wit, not only outward, but proceeding from the inward subjection of the soul unto God, be clothed with humility. And that it is meant of humility towards God may be gathered from verse 6. Secondly, He doth persuade them also unto this humility: 1. Because it is an ornament of the mind; that by the way. 2. From God's blessing adjoined, which follows thereupon, God gives grace unto the humble, which is illustrated by God's curse contrary thereunto, that falls upon the proud, God resisteth the proud. Thirdly, he doth urge and press them unto this subjection towards God, verse 6. Humble yourselves therefore; and he shows the proper reason of this subjection, which is the mighty hand or omnipotency of God: and withal he explains that reason, which he had before propounded concerning the blessing and grace of God towards the humble, to wit, that by that grace they shall be exalted: the time of which exaltation is marked out, that it shall be in due time, that he may exalt you in due time. In the last place by anticipation of a close, but weighty objection, whereby this subjection is usually made very difficult, he shows the true manner thereof, to wit, that it should be joined with that confidence, which casts all care upon God, so that no fear or worldly care can hinder this subjection, which confidence he doth persuade them unto by that effectual providence which God hath over the faithful for their good, verse 7, at the end, For he careth for you.

The doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. There is the like duty of the people towards their Pastors, as there is of the Pastors towards the people.

This is gathered from verse 5 at the beginning. Likewise ye younger. Now by the younger in this place is chiefly meant the flock, which depends upon the Pastors, because the Pastors and Presbyters were for the most part chosen of those that were elder in age, and therefore the greatest part of the flock consisted of younger. Now their duty is said to be like, not for that it is in the same kind, that the people should guide their Pastors, as the Pastors do guide the people, but because there is the like reason of both their duties.

Reason 1. Because the same God and Lord both of Pastors & people, hath imposed and prescribed to both their duties.

2. Because that relation which is betwixt the Pastor and people, requires a mutual intercourse of duty.

3. Because the Pastors labor and care is made void, if the people do not in some sort answer the same.

4. Because the Pastors care and labor, tending to the salvation of the people, deserves it.

Vs. This may serve to reprove those that are very curious and rigid in exacting their Pastors duty, when in the mean time they are nothing careful of their own duty.

Doct. 2. The duty of people towards their Pastors consists chiefly in subjection.

Reason 1. Because their Pastors are set over them in God's name.

2. Because faithful Pastors propound nothing else to themselves to observe, but the will of God, whereunto subjection and obedience must necessarily be yielded.

3. Because in the calling of their Pastors, they did either expressly or covertly at least promise this very thing.

Use. This may serve to reprove those that come unto Sermons, as Judges, to play the Critics, not to subject themselves to the will of God, and such as cast off all discipline as an intolerable yoke.

Doct. 3. There is a kind of subjection also due unto all Christians.

This is gathered from these words, Be ye all subject one to another.

Reason 1. Because as occasion shall serve, we should humble ourselves to perform the meanest offices unto our brethren.

2. Because we should submit ourselves unto the private admonitions of our brethren.

3. Because we should with all patience bear all the infirmities of our brethren.

Use. This may serve to reprove the arrogancy and pride of men, which cannot endure any such subjection.

Doct. 4. Humility is a great ornament.

Reason 1. Because humility is a singular virtue, and in some sort the foundation of all the rest.

2. Because it makes us acceptable unto godly men, to whom in this regard we are made more profitable.

3. Because it doth greatly commend us in the sight of God, when for his sake we are subject not only to our superiors and equals, but also to those of the lowest degree.

Use. This may serve to refute all those, that seek for honor and reputation by arrogancy; and shun humility as it were a vile debasing of a man's self.

Doct. 5. God resisteth the proud.

Reason 1. Because the proud resist the will of God.

2. Because they seek unfitting things, or at least not after a due manner.

3. Because whatsoever proceeds from pride, turns to the dishonor of God, to whom all subjection is due.

Use. This may serve to condemn proud men.

Doct. 6. God giveth grace to the humble.

Reason 1. Because the promise of grace was made to humility.

2. Because humility is the disposing and fitting of a man for to receive grace.

3. Because only the humble men have a worthy esteem of God's grace.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, greatly to labor for humility.

Doct. 7. The strength and power of God should stir us up to subjection towards him.

This is gathered from verse 6 at the beginning.

Reason 1. Because it were madness to resist the Almighty.

2. Because God's omnipotency is the protection of those that humble themselves before him.

Use. This may serve to admonish us▪ not to suffer ourselves so much as in thought to be led away from our obedience towards God, but from the meditation of God's omnipotency and our own infirmity to increase daily more and more in humility.

Doct. 8. God will exalt the humble in due time.

This is gathered from verse 6 at the end.

Reason 1. Because glory is the reward of obedience.

2. Because they glorify God, and therefore God will exalt them according to his promise, Those that honor me, I will honor.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to seek for true exaltation by humility and submission.

Doct. 9. They that humble themselves before God, may safely, and also should cast all their care upon God.

This is gathered from verse 7.

Reason 1. Because this is God's covenant, that he will be always all-sufficient unto them that walk before him.

2. Because God by a singular care and providence watcheth over those that have a care of his glory, & seek his kingdom, as it is in the text, He careth for you.

Use. This may serve to comfort all the godly, because God hath freed them from all care; and they should embrace this liberty by true faith, and putting their trust in him, and apply it to themselves.

Verse 8. Be sober, be vigilant: because your adversary the Devil, as a roaring Lion walketh about, seeking whom he may devour:

Verse 9. Whom resist steadfast in the faith, knowing that the same afflictions are accomplished in your brethren that are in the world.

Verse 10. But the God of all grace, who hath called us into his eternal glory by Christ Jesus, after that ye have suffered a while, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you.

Verse 11. To him be glory and dominion forever and ever. Amen.

The Analysis.

FOR conclusion of the whole Epistle, to the foregoing exhortations there is added one general one, which doth most nearly belong to the scope of the Apostle, to wit, that notwithstanding all opposition, difficulty, and temptation, they should constantly persist and go forward in that grace, which they had received. Now this care is described, 1 by two duties, which belong to the due manner thereof, soberness, and vigilancy. 2. The necessity of these duties is shown by the grievous danger, to which otherwise they should be exposed. And this danger is set forth by the efficient cause thereof, the Devil, of whom the Apostle makes a description to that purpose: 1 By the opposition and enmity which he hath against us; in respect whereof he is called, our adversary or enemy. 2. By the manner and degree of that enmity, that it is joined with cruelty, as of a roaring Lion. 3. That besides this cruelty there is over and above in him very great diligence and greediness to do us hurt, in these words: seeking whom he may devour. Now the Apostle gives us warning, that we must not yield to this enemy and danger which he threatens us, but resist it, verse 9 at the beginning, which is nothing else, but not to suffer ourselves to be removed by his temptations from the grace of God: and the chief means of this resistance he shows to consist in the steadfastness of our faith: which faith may in this respect be wonderfully confirmed by the example of our brethren in the world, who have experience of the like afflictions and temptations of Satan. Agreeable to this exhortation he adds a prayer verse 10. Because the success of all our endeavors depends upon the grace and blessing of God: And in this prayer he beseecheth God to strengthen the faithful, and make them perfect in all grace, at the end of the verse, make you perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle you. The arguments whereby he confirms their faith that they shall obtain this petition, are two: 1. The all-sufficiency of the grace of God in it self, in which respect this title is given unto God, that he is the God of all grace. 2. The communicating of this grace in the calling of the faithful, in these words: who hath called you: the grace of which calling is shown, first, by the end and scope, that it is, to partake of the eternal glory of God. Secondly, by the principal cause, in Christ Jesus. Thirdly, by the condition that goes before the accomplishment of this calling, and properly belongs to this exhortation of the Apostle unto constancy in afflictions, to wit, because we are so called unto eternal glory, that in the mean time we must suffer afflictions, after that ye have suffered a while. In the last place upon occasion of this prayer he adds a religious doxologie, glorifying God, verse 11. wherein is contained both the last end of that petition, and a confirmation of the same that it shall be heard; as also an indirect exhortation to the faithful, to bend all their care thereunto, to glorify God's name really and effectually, by persisting in the grace of God.

The Doctrines arising here-hence.

Doct. 1. We had need to watch continually. Be vigilant.

Reason 1. Because sin and danger doth naturally steal upon us, if we do not resist it.

2. Because we cannot do our duty without diligent care and labor, and therein consists the manner of watching.

3. Because if we could avoid danger, & obtain our desires, if we did not seek it with care and diligence, it would be no praise to us, nor peace of conscience.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to imitate watchmen, which watch and ward to keep the City; the like diligence should we use in keeping our souls, to examine all that goes in and out, our thoughts, affections, words, and actions, together with the occasions of them, what they are, whence they came; and whither they tend.

Doct. 2. That we may watch as we ought to do, it is required that we should be sober.

Now by soberness is meant the moderation of our affections touching all worldly things.

Reason 1. Because the cares of this world do so burden the soul, that they leave no place for spiritual cares.

2. Because the care of the world doth draw and distract the mind, so that although it doth not altogether exclude religion, yet it doth diminish and weaken it.

3. Because under the show of some worldly profit, pleasure, or honor, we do oftentimes admit of those things, which betray and destroy our souls.

Use. This may serve to admonish us not to drown ourselves in the things of this world, but so to use the world, as if we used it not, 1 Cor. 7. 31.

Doct. 3. We have such a spiritual enemy, that we had need to watch and ward continually against him.

Reason 1. Because he is full of spiritual malice and craft.

2. Because his diligence is answerable to his malice.

3. Because he is most cruel, seeking not to bring some small inconvenience upon us, but our utter destruction.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, never to be secure, but day and night to be mindful of that danger wherein we are.

Doct. 4. We must courageously resist the Devil.

This is gathered from verse 9.

Reason 1. Because he is such an enemy, that we can make no peace or league with him.

2. Because they which yield unto the devil give themselves up into his hands, as being overcome.

3. Because the courage of our mind to resist is a great part of spiritual victory.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to strengthen our minds in all things to make this resistance.

Doct. 5. The chief power of resisting, consists in a steadfast faith.

This is gathered from these words, Whom resist steadfast in the faith.

Reason 1. Because faith lays hold upon Christ who overcame the devil, and in him they lay hold of victory it self.

2. Because saith lays hold of the truth of all the promises, whereby the soul is invincibly fortified.

3. Because faith, seeing it is the foundation of all grace, if it be stirred up and strengthened, it confirms and strengthens also all the other virtues.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to have a special care to raise and build up our faith.

Doct. 6. The examples of other believers do make much for the confirmation of our faith in afflictions & other temptations.

Reason 1. Because thereby it appears that such conflicts are not contrary to faith and piety.

2. Because therehence we have a cloud of witnesses, to show, that at length we shall obtain the victory by faith.

Use. This may serve to direct us, to stablish our minds more and more by such meditations.

Doct. 7. All those things which we desire, either for ourselves or for others unto salvation, we must ask of God.

This is gathered from verse 10, compared with the foregoing verse. For all those things which the Apostle had before required of the faithful, he doth now at the end of the Epistle in their name crave of God, and he asks it with discretion, as appears by that particle, But as if he should have said, Although all these things which I have proposed unto you by way of admonition, exhortation, and consolation, are duties which you ought necessarily to do, yet it is not to be expected, that you should accomplish it by your own strength: I do therefore call upon God, (which you likewise should always do) that he would increase his grace more and more in you, whereby you may receive both to will and to do all these things.

Reason 1. Because of ourselves we can do nothing that is good.

2. Because in such like purposes and endeavors we are letted and hindered by divers temptations, and such as are most strong through our infirmity.

3. Because all our spiritual life proceeds from God, and of him should we ask it.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to rest in good purposes and intentions, but always to seek for grace from God, to accomplish the same happily.

2. To direct us, when we read, hear, and meditate upon God's word, to water it, as it were, with our prayers, that it may be fruitful.

Note. By such conclusions of the Apostles, wherein they do close up their Doctrine with prayer, the Ministers especially are warned and admonished, after their Sermons to desire God to give both themselves and the people grace to observe those things, which they have learned in the Sermon: and others also are admonished diligently and earnestly to seek the same, both in public with the Minister, and in private by themselves.

Doct. 8. We stand in need of manifold grace.

As it is set forth by divers words in the text: Make perfect, stablish, strengthen, settle, which may be thus distinguished, that to make perfect is to add those degrees of grace, which are yet wanting: to stablish, is to protect and defend from temptations and dangers: to strengthen is to give inward power and strength: and to settle, is to fasten the root it self of grace more and more.

Reason 1. Because all those good things which we have, we have but in part.

2. Because we are assaulted by continual temptations, and are over and above prone to revolt.

3. Because great and manifold is that perfection, whereunto we are called.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to rest in the beginning, but by much prayer to ask much grace of God.

Doct. 9. God is the fountain and author of all grace.

For this title is given unto God in this place, because it is most agreeable to the petition for manifold grace. For Holy Men in their prayers day hold of that in God, and propose those titles of God unto themselves, which make most for the furtherance of those prayers which they make.

Reason 1. Because God hath in himself infinite riches of grace.

2 Because grace is not given but by grace, and not for any merit of our own.

3. Because every degree and all kind of grace is revealed and exhibited unto us by God in the Gospel.

Use 1. This may serve to direct us to build up ourselves in this belief of God's grace.

2. To admonish us, not so to rest in that grace which we have received, as if there were nothing farther to be looked after, because God is God not of this or that particular grace, but of all grace.

Doct. 10. The chief effect of this grace, which is in us, is our calling.

Reason 1. Because before our calling we lie in sin and spiritual death.

2. Because by our calling we come to the hope of eternal glory; who hath called you into his eternal glory, as it is in the text.

3. Because in our calling we are engrafted into Jesus Christ, that by him we are brought unto this glory, who hath called you unto eternal glory in Jesus Christ, as it is in the text.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to labor to make our effectual calling more and more sure.

2. To exhort us, to give God all the thanks for this calling, and to lead a life answerable thereunto, which seems to be aimed at in the text, viz. that for this eternal glory whereunto we are called, we should contemn all worldly things, whether good or evil.

Doct. 11. The sufferings of this life are not repugnant to the comfort of this glory.

Reason 1. Because we suffer but a while▪ for although the time of affliction may seem long, yet it is but short, if it be compared either with eternal death, which the wicked shall suffer, and we have deserved; or with eternal glory whereunto we are called.

2. Because these afflictions are the way, whereby according to God's will we come unto glory.

3. Because glory it self appears the more glorious for the afflictions going before.

Use. This may serve to comfort us against all the sufferings of this life.

Doct. 12. For this grace of God we should give all glory unto God.

This is gathered from verse 11.

Reason 1. Because therein consists our thankfulness.

2. Because therein also consists the perfection of the work of grace.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to give place to luke-warmnesse, but to make such high reckoning of the saving grace of God, that upon every mentioning thereof our minds should be stirred up sincerely to glorify the name of God, and always endeavor so to do.

The end of the first Epistle.

A BRIEF ANALYSIS of the Second Epistle General of Saint PETER.

CHAP. I.

Verse 1. Simon Peter, a Servant, and an Apostle of Jesus Christ, to them that have obtained like precious faith with us, through the righteousness of God, and of our Savior Jesus Christ.

Verse 2. Grace and peace be multiplied unto you, through the knowledge of God, and of Jesus our Lord.

The Analysis.

SUCH kind of writings, as well Ethnick or profane, as sacred, are usually divided into three parts, whereof the first is, the Superscription, Salutation, and Preface. 2. The Epistle it self. 3. The Subscription or Conclusion. But more accurately me thinks, we may say, that the preface and conclusion are only adjuncts of the Epistle, which depend upon the Epistle it self, and are also useful thereunto. But in this Epistle only one of these adjuncts is used, namely, the Preface. For there is no subscription made, or any such conclusion, as is used in the Epistles of Paul, and in the first of Peter. The Preface is contained in four verses, and it consists of two parts, a salutation, and a confirmation of the salutation: that in the two first, this in the third and fourth verse. In the salutation there are those three things expressed, which are in every action; namely, the agent, the action it self, and the object of it. For so is there the person saluting, the persons saluted, and the salutation it self. The person saluting is described, first, by his name adjoined. Secondly, by his office adjoined, and that both general, that he is a servant of Jesus Christ, and special, that he is an Apostle of his. The persons saluted are described by a special adjunct, which is instead of the form, namely, by faith: which faith is set forth, first, by a comparison of the like, that it is like precious with the faith of the Apostles. 2. By the principal efficient cause, God and Jesus Christ. 3. By the means thereof, viz. righteousness. The confirmation of the salutation contains, 1. the good that is wished, which consists of two parts, Grace, and peace. 2. The degree and quality of this good, be multiplied. 3. The helping cause of this multiplication of good, which is the knowledge of God and Jesus Christ.

This is the Analysis.

As for the person, he hath a double respect. For he is here considered as the Author of the Epistle, and also as the Author of the Salutation: in the former respect we have these Doctrines.

Doct. 1. The very names of Christ's famous Disciples, were heretofore of great force for the confirmation and advancement of the truth in the Church.

For to that end did the Apostles usually set down their names in the Epistles, which they wrote unto the Churches.

Use. This may be for exhortation, that we also according to our abilities should labor so far with those amongst whom we live, that our names may be like precious ointment, and may make something for the edification of others.

2. It may serve to reprove those which so carry themselves, that they are a disgrace to godliness, and to the Church.

In the latter respect the person yields us this observation.

Doct. 2. The salutation of the Apostles and Ministers of God is more highly to be prized.

Reason. Because it is not only a good and godly prayer, as are the salutations of all the faithful, but it is also a ministerial application of the good things which God communicates unto us by them. For it proceeds not only from a pious affection, but from their singular office and duty.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to neglect or contemn such blessings, whether they be public or private.

Doct. 3. It is an honorable title, if a man be rightly and deservedly called a servant of God or Christ.

Reason. Because the chiefest men in the Church of God always gloried in this title; not only the Apostles and Prophets, but also Kings and Princes, as we see in David.

Use. This may serve to comfort poor Christians that have no titles whereof to boast. For if they be the servants of God and Christ, they have no cause to envy others, or to complain of their own condition. Now that it may be known who are the servants of God, we must know that there are two things, as it were essential to a servant, 1. To depend upon his Masters will and pleasure, for direction in his work. 2. To refer all that he hath to the use and profit of his Master, not to his own. So also every faithful servant of God, 1 depends wholly upon God for the direction of his life, not upon himself and his own counsel, nor upon the examples and customs of the world, much less upon the suggestions of the flesh and the devil. 2. He refers himself and all that he hath to advance and set forth the glory of God.

Doct. 4. Those servants of Christ which are called Apostles, have the chiefest authority in the Church of God.

For that is the reason why Peter saith that he is an Apostle of Jesus Christ. All the faithful are Christ's servants, but they are not Apostles: even the ordinary Ministers themselves, although in a large sense they may be called Apostles and Ambassadors of Christ, yet not in that sense as Peter, Paul, and the like are called. For the word Apostle, in this and the like places, signifies not only an Embassy, but a singular privilege or prerogative in that embassy. Now the privilege of the Apostles above other Ministers consists in these four things: First, In the manner of the embassy, viz. that they were called neither of men, nor by men but immediately of Christ. Secondly, in the office imposed upon them by virtue of this embassy, viz. that they were chiefly sent to plant Churches, to feed and build them up. Thirdly, in the object whereabout their labor should be employed, viz. that they were sent not to any one Church, but to divers, and for the conversion of the whole world. Fourthly, in their gifts and assistance of the Spirit, which always accompanied this their embassy, viz. because in executing this their office, as well in preaching as in writing, they were freed from all error. As in the Creation of the world God first made light, and afterwards set some lights in the Firmament of Heaven to give light upon the Earth: So also in the re-creation and restitution of the world, God first gave light in Christ himself, who was the Son of Righteousness, as he is called in Scripture, and afterwards ordained the Apostles, as great lights, to bring this light upon the Earth. And this is it which our Savior saith unto them: Ye are the light of the world.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us, to give God thanks, that he hath not left us in darkness, to wander at uncertainties, but hath set up these shining lights for us, by whose means we might be directed unto heaven.

2. To admonish us, to observe also and believe those things which they have prescribed us. For we must receive the writings of the Apostles after the same manner, as we should receive Christ himself, if he were with us on earth.

3. To refute the Pope, who brags that he is an Apostle, and hath Apostolical authority, (whereupon also he calls his seat at Rome, Apostolical,) when as he hath not so much as one of those conditions, which are necessarily required to make an Apostle.

Hitherto of the person saluting. It follows now to speak of the persons saluted, where we have these Doctrines.

Doct. 1. The Apostles wrote not properly to the unbelievers, but to the Church.

For so here and elsewhere are they described to whom the Epistles are sent.

Reason. Because the preaching of the Gospel, not the writing, is the effectual means of conversion. The writing and reading do more properly serve for the confirmation and edification of those that are converted, then for the first conversion.

Use. This may serve to exhort, first of all, that they will principally apply themselves unto Sermons. Secondly, those that have received some benefit by Sermons, that they would also diligently apply themselves to the reading of the Scripture, that they might more and more confirm and edify themselves.

Doct. 2. Faith is the proper mark of difference, whereby the Church is distinguished from all other societies.

For therefore are the Christians here described by faith, that they may be distinguished from all other men: and the same which in other Epistles are wont to be called the elect, the called, the Churches of God, those which are in God the Father, and in Jesus Christ, are in this place barely called the faithful.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, if we will make our calling and the condition of our salvation sure, then to labor especially to obtain faith, and also to increase it more and more.

Doct. 3. The faith of Christians is a most precious profession.

Therefore it is here called precious faith; and in the former Epistle, Chap. 1. v. 7. faith is said to be more precious then gold that perisheth.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us, to make more account of faith then of all worldly things, according to that of Ch•ist: What shall it profit a man to gain the whole world, and lose his own soul, or faith?

2. To comfort poor Christians which have no possessions in this world. For if they have true faith, they have that which is more excellent then silver and gold.

Doct. 4. The faith of common Christians is as precious as was the faith of the Apostles.

Which is not to be understood of the degree or quantity, but of the nature or quality.

Reason. Because the faith of all Christians lays hold of the same good, viz. Christ and his benefits. Hereupon Paul calls it common faith: for as one that is sick of the Palsy, that taketh some precious thing with a shaking hand, doth possess it as well as the other, that is strong; so the faithful, though they be weak, if they do truly lay hold of Christ, have him to be their Savior as well as they that are most strong.

Use. This may serve to comfort weak Christians; for if they have true faith, though it be but like a grain of Mustard seed, they have the same comfort that the Apostles themselves had. If they be truly knit unto Christ, though it be but with a slender thread as it were, yet they hold Christ as well as they that are tied unto him with the strongest cords: which yet is not so to be taken, as if we were not to seek for a stronger and surer faith; for although the weak possess the same good that the strong do, yet they have not the same fruit and benefit of this possession.

Doct. 5. The cause of this precious faith is not in any man, but in the righteousness of God and Christ.

Now by righteousness is not meant any recompense of desert; but the faithfulness and truth of the promises, which depend upon the mere goodness of God. And these promises made unto Abraham himself, that his seed should be as the stars of heaven, and the sand of the Sea, out of all nations; and they were afterwards often repeated by the Prophets.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that ascribe it unto man's free will; so that first they make the calling of the faithful to be uncertain, as if the promises of God could be made void; and then they take away the glory it self of man's conversion from God, and give it unto man.

2. To exhort us, to give God thanks, for this so incomparable a good.

The Doctrines that arise from v. 2.

Doct. 1. All spiritual good things, are contained in these two words, Grace and peace.

For by Grace is meant both the free favor of God, and also the application and manifestation thereof in the hearts of the faithful, by the operation of the holy Ghost; in the word and Sacraments. And by peace is meant quietness of mind, which is the fruit of grace. So that Grace is the first benefit, and Peace the last. And therefore all benefits that pass between are included therein, as in two extremes. Hereupon in all the Epistles almost the Apostles prayer and salutation is contained in these two: To Timothy and Titus, he adds mercy also, Grace, mercy and peace. But that is only an application of the same thing, which is signified by grace, and for a peculiar reason is added in those Epistles, because Timothy and Titus wanted a special kind of grace, in respect of the service, which they did undergo in the Churches, in regard of their age, and those divers temptations, whereunto they were obnoxious in that Service. In the Old Testament peace only was usually wished in their salutations, without any mention of Grace; but yet grace also at that time was understood: But in the time of the New Testament, which is the time of grace, and wherein all things are more fully delivered, it was most fitting, that grace should be named in such like salutations.

Use. This may serve to exhort and direct us, above all things to wish grace and Christian peace unto all those, to whom we are well-wishers.

Doct. 11. The desires of the faithful are chiefly for those spiritual good things, Grace and peace.

Reason. The Reason of the Collection is this, because the Apostle in this beginning of the Epistle, labors to get the good will of those to whom he writes, by showing the prayer that he had made for them: Now he could not effect this, if his prayer were not according to their desire; for if he should have wished any of those things, that they cared not for, such a wish would have done no good with them.

Use. This may serve to exhort us all, to examine ourselves according to this rule. For if we make no reckoning at all, of the means and instruments of grace, but do reject or despise those, that labor most to procure this grace and peace for us, we have cause to fear, that we are yet far from the nature, and disposition of true believers.

Doct. 3. They which have gone farthest in faith and grace, have yet need of grace.

This is gathered therehence, that the Apostle wisheth grace unto those, that have obtained like precious faith, with the Apostles themselves.

Use. 1. This may serve to refute the Papists of their merits.

2. To exhort us to humility, and continual prayer for the grace of God.

Doct. 4. Without Grace, there is no true peace.

Grace is the cause and foundation of peace, peace the effect and fruit of grace; it is the inheritance, which Christ left unto his disciples alone, John 14. 27. Isaiah 48. last. For this peace is not an external and worldly peace, but spiritual and internal. Before we are partakers of grace, we are called in Scripture, God's enemies, so that we do wage a kind of war against God himself, and therefore also against the Angels of God, and other of his creatures. Now by grace, and by it alone is peace made.

Use. This may serve to refute and reprove the folly of those men, which so please themselves, in that outward quietness which they enjoy, when in the mean time, they are utterly void and ignorant of the grace of God.

Doct. 5. We must seek not only for grace and peace, but also for great abundance of it.

This is gathered from that word, Grace and peace be multiplied. For the good things of that grace are such, that they cannot be too much: in this there is no sinning in excess. Hence it is that the Apostle Paul always exhorts the faithful, and prays also that the faithful may abound more and more in all grace. And to the Ephesians he proposeth the breadth, and length, and depth, and height of this grace, that they may be rooted and grounded in it, Chap. 3. verse 18.

Use 1. This may serve to refute and condemn those, that so rest in the present grace which they have, or seem to have, that they look for no more. Such do those men seem to be, that think they know enough, believe enough, love enough, &c. And therefore they neglect both the public and the private means, whereby they might be farther edified. The state of a Christian in this life is a state of building, not perfection: therefore as he would show himself to be a foolish builder, that should rest in the middle of his work, and not make up the perfect structure, so also in a Christian life.

2. To exhort us to stir up ourselves, and labor for more abundant grace and peace.

Argument 1. The first argument may be taken from the nature of grace and peace, which is such, that he that hath once tasted the sweetness thereof, cannot but desire a fuller draught of it, 1 Pet. 2. 2. 3. Desire the sincere milk, &c.

Argument 2. From the imperfect degree, that we have yet attained: We are for the most part, as new borne babes, as the Apostle speaks in the same place.

Argument 3. From the will of God, to whom nothing is more acceptable, then that we should seek for plenty of his grace, Isaiah 55. 2. Prov. 9.

Argument 4. From the sin or guilt, which follows the neglect of that duty. For as amongst men, if one should set before us most precious wares, and should commend them, and also offer them freely unto us, he could not but take it ill, if we should refuse them: so much more may we think that God's anger is incensed towards those, that neglect and despise the riches of this grace, that he hath set before them and commended unto them.

Doct. 6. God is the only author of grace and peace.

This is gathered from 1 Peter 5. 10.

God is called the author of all grace. Hence by a kind of appropriation he is called the God of grace, as in another place he is called the Father of mercies, and God of all consolations; and grace also in this signification is called the grace of God; so also of peace we find in Scriptures, that God is called the God of peace, and true peace is everywhere called the peace of God.

Use 1. This may serve to refute all the Papists, that manifest the contrary both in their words and practice. For they are wont to call the blessed Virgin the Mother of grace: so also they run unto her and to other Saints, as if they were the authors of grace and peace.

2. To instruct and confirm us in this truth, that the bestowing of grace and peace depends upon the mere good will and pleasure of God. For when God is called the God of grace, it is meant also that he is the Lord of grace, who can according to his good pleasure give it to whom he will, and deny it to whom he will. This is gathered from 1 Thess. 5. 23. and 2 Thess. 3. 16. for he that in the former place is called the God of peace, in the latter is called the Lord of peace. Therefore when we see that grace & peace is granted unto some, & denied unto others, we should rest satisfied in the good will of God, according to the example of Christ, Matth. 10. For by so doing we give glory to God, as is evident.

3. To exhort us, to pray unto this great God to give us grace and peace.

Doct. 7. Jesus Christ is the beginning of all grace and peace.

God is the first and principal author, and so also Christ, as he is God: but as he is God and man, our Mediator, so he is the beginning ordained by God, as the head, from whom all grace is to be derived unto his members, as into the vessels of grace; so that God is as it were the first and principal fountain, Christ as the secondary fountain, in whom is hid all grace that is to be given unto the faithful, and the faithful themselves are the vessels that draw and receive this grace, which runs into them from these fountains, and the word and Sacraments are as the channels.

Use. This may serve to inform us of the manner, how we should seek for grace, viz. that we should always go unto God in Christ, because extra Christum, out of Christ, he is unto sinners not a God of grace and peace, but of vengeance, and a consuming fire.

Doct. 8. True faith is the instrumental cause of grace and peace, and of the multiplying of both, whereby it is derived unto us.

Reason. Because by knowledge in this place is meant faith. For it is not meant a bare knowledge, but something more, which follows this knowledge, therefore it is not called, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, but 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, that is, an acknowledging. 2.

Thereby is meant an effectual knowledge, such as there is no other taught us in the Scriptures, but faith. Now faith is signified by the name of knowledge, because by the hearing and knowledge of the word it is usually begotten in us. And faith is called the instrument of grace, not as it is in God himself, willing, intending, and ordaining spiritual good things unto us, for so grace is the cause of faith; but as the sense, fruit and knowledge of this grace is communicated unto us. For faith is so the fruit and effect of grace, that it hath the first place, and is the instrumental cause of all following grace. And this efficacy it hath in respect of the object, which it lays hold of, Jesus Christ, because as we said before, he is the beginning of all grace, so that as Adam was the beginning of nature and the corruption thereof, and that relation which we have unto Adam by natural generation, makes us partakers both of his nature and corruption: so Christ was made the beginning of life spiritual, and grace, and that relation of faith which we have unto Christ in our regeneration, makes us partakers both of the life and grace which is in Christ.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, 1. To have a special care of our faith, if we would not be destitute of all the grace and peace of God. This is it which the Apostle saith elsewhere, above all, take the shield of faith, that is, above all things get faith, Ephes. 6. 16. This is it which is often pressed, By faith we are saved, by faith we stand, by faith we obtain the victory, &c. 2. To labor also for the increase of faith, if $\langle \diamond \rangle$ desire the increase of grace and peace. For grace is multiplied by the multiplying of faith, and the knowledge of God. As in a house, which is enlightened by the Sun, the more the windows stand open, the more it is filled with light: so also in us, the more our faith is increased, the more is grace and peace increased in us. Let that therefore be our daily prayer, which was Christ's Disciples, Lord increase our faith.

Verse 3. According as his Divine power hath given unto us all things that pertain unto life and godliness, through the knowledge of him that hath called us to glory and virtue.

The Analysis.

The scope of the Apostle in this verse is to confirm the faith of Christians touching the multiplying of grace and peace through the knowledge of God, which he had wished unto them in the former verse. And the argument is taken from the comparing of things alike, as that particle, According as, intimates unto us. The things compared are. 1. The giving of peace and grace; and 2. The consequent multiplying of them. And of these he shows that there is the same reason, both in respect of the principal cause, and the less principal or instrumental cause; so that the whole argument runs after this manner; If God and our Lord Jesus Christ will give unto us grace and peace through the knowledge of him, then will he also multiply unto us the same gifts by the same: But the former is true: Therefore the latter. The Assumption is contained in verse 3. And it is not barely set down, but with an illustration, although he adds some things to confirm the reason it self and our faith. For instead of grace and peace the Apostle here puts things necessary unto life and godliness; and in the second place glory and virtue: like as by life and glory he means the same thing, that he did before by peace, though in a different respect: so also by godliness and virtue he means the same thing that he did before by grace. The principal cause of this gifting he explains by the power which he hath, which he calls divine; the instrumental he explains by the object thereof, namely, Christ. For he argues from a singular effect, which doth most of all pertain to the thing it self, namely to our calling, glory and virtue.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Life and glory are contained in Christian peace.

For the condition, that Christians are made partakers of by peace, is called life in respect of that inward and permanent principle of the most perfect operations, wherein consists man's felicity, which is given unto all the faithful. And it is called glory in respect of the complete happiness, which flows from that principle, and shall in its due time also appear with outward splendor.

Use 1. This may serve to inform and instruct us, not to think meanly or contemptibly of the condition of faithful Christians, but to judge aright according to the nature of the thing, viz. that the only life and chiefest glory is proper to them.

2. To exhort us, to preserve faith, grace, and Christian peace before all worldly things, yea, before this present life it self, and the glory thereof, because by our faith we shall obtain a far more perfect life and glory, according to that of Christ, He that loseth his life, shall find and obtain a far better life.

Doct. 2. Christian grace brings with it godliness and virtue.

For the same thing is called grace, which is the effect of God's favor; it is called godliness, as it hath God for its object: and it is called virtue, as it perfects a man in operation.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, not to boast of the grace of God, unless we show it by our godliness and virtue.

2. To reprove and condemn those, that either out of presumption or feined simulation, do either separate grace from godliness, or grace from virtue, or virtue from either.

Doct. 3. All things necessary unto life and godliness are given by God unto the faithful.

Now to make a gift perfect 3 things are required. 1. That the gift which is given be made the receivers, or his to whom it is said to be given; for otherwise it is not a gift, or a thing actually given, but potentially only. 2. That it be made his absolutely or irrevocably, not conditionally, that the gift it self should depend upon a condition. 3. That the giver be moved for no other cause to give, but to show and exercise his bounty and liberality. the more perfectly and purely these conditions are found in any gift, the more perfect and pure is the gift. Now all these do most exactly agree to those gifts of God, which pertain unto life and godliness. As for example, Christ is said to be given for us, and also given unto us: the holy Ghost hath that name as it were appropriated unto him, that he is the gift of God: faith and repentance are expressly called the gift of God.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, against the error of those, that will not take such like good things as a gift, but teach us that we must seek for them by our own merits; for as the Apostle saith If of grace, then not by works, for otherwise grace were not grace: so may we also say; if of gift, then not by works, for otherwise the gift would be no gift.

2. To admonish us, throughout our whole life to seek for such good things after that manner as is agreeable to their nature, that is, to ask, pray, and supplicate for them, &c. And in the second place to use all our endeavor to show ourselves thankful unto God for such divine gifts.

4. He gives these spiritual gifts unto us by his Divine Power.

His Divine Power haeth given unto us all things, as it is in the text: the like hereunto is that in the first Epistle, c. 1. v. 5. Ye are kept by the power of God through faith unto salvation. And Christ tells us, Matth. 19. 26. With men this is impossible, but with God all things are possible: where we are expressly taught, that salvation and spiritual good things are given unto us by the power of God, to whom all things are possible, that is, his omnipotency, Ier. 31. 35. Thus saith the Lord, which giveth the Sun, &c.

Reason. Because such a power is necessarily required to bring this to pass, by reason of those strong impediments, which withstand and cross this work. For so Christ tells us, that the Devil as a strong man holds his palace, till a stronger then he comes upon him and overcomes him, and takes from him all his armor wherein he trusted, Luke. 11. 21, 22. This is also fully explained by the Apostle, Ephes. 4. 8. When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive, and gave gifts unto men. Where he shows that gifts are given unto us by that very power, whereby captivity is led captive. It is expressly said Ephes. 1. 19. that it is the exceeding greatness of God's power, which worketh in us by the might of his power, and Verse 20. the same power whereby Christ was raised from the dead.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Remonstrants and such like men, that deny faith to be begotten in us, and our conversion to be wrought by God's almighty power. For they make grace only morally persuading, that may be resisted, impotent, and consequently ineffectual.

2. To comfort the weak and all the faithful, in that they have no reason too much to fear the gates of hell, because they have the gates of heaven making with them: although they must wrestle not only against flesh and blood, but against principalities and the powers of the world, &c. Ephes. 6. 12. Yet they have a divine power, far beyond all those enemies, to uphold them in this wrestling.

3. To exhort us, 1. To behave ourselves stoutly, and show ourselves men in the cause of God, answerable to so Divine a Power, as he is ready to afford unto us. 2. To give God thanks, that hath not left us in our own infirmities to be exposed as a prey unto our enemies, but by his divine power helps our infirmities.

Doct. 5. This Divine Power is the power of Christ himself.

Use 1. This may serve to confirm our faith, touching Christ's divine nature. For the divine power is not separated from the divine nature.

2. To comfort us, that he who so loved us, that he gave himself for us, hath such sufficient strength to perfect our salvation. He useth this argument to comfort his Disciples. John 10. 28, 29, 30.

Doct. 6. Christ gives us these things by his divine power, when he doth effectually call us, through the knowledge of him that calleth us.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to apply ourselves with fear and reverence unto the means of our calling, because Christ's divine power is shown therein.

Doct. 7. The consideration of the end whereunto we are called in Christ, should build us up in faith, hope, and all those things which pertain unto life and godliness.

Therefore the Apostle here puts us in mind, that he hath called us to glory and virtue; so in the former Epistle, c. 5. v. 10. who hath called us unto his eternal glory, &c. To that purpose the Apostle Ephes. 1. 18. earnestly prays for the Ephesians, that the eyes of their understanding may be enlightened, to know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches, &c. Now this consideration is of great force for these reasons.

Reason 1. Because it is an argument confirming our faith, whilst we thus think with ourselves: If God hath called us unto glory, then there is no doubt, but that he will in due time bring us unto glory, and in the mean time keep us in the way that leadeth thereunto.

2. Because it is an argument whereby we are stirred up to labor for virtue, whilst we thus think with ourselves: if we are called unto glory and virtue, we must not carry ourselves sordidly and basely, defiling ourselves with the pollutions of the flesh, like Swine wallowing in the mire, but as it becomes such a calling.

Doct. 8. There is the same reason of this calling and the first gift of grace, that there is of the multiplying of all grace and peace.

For they are alike free, they do depend alike upon the divine power, they are always knit and linked together: this follows from the connection of verse 3. with the second.

Use. This may serve to comfort us, as it is set forth, Phil. 1. 6. That he which hath begun a good works in us, will perform it until the day of Christ.

Verse 4. Whereby are given unto us exceeding great and precious promises, that by these you might be partakers of the divine nature, having escaped the corruption that is in the world through lust.

The Analysis.

THE Apostle had before confirmed his prayer and the hope of the faithful, touching the multiplying of grace and peace, by the comparing of things alike, that is, from the giving of all things which are necessary unto life & godliness. Now he confirms and proves the assumption also, touching the giving of things necessary to life and godliness. And the argument is taken from the testimony of God, that is, from God's promises: for his promise is a testimony of the good that he will bestow. Now while the Apostle disputes from the promises to the gifts promised, he disputes from the testimony to the things testified, which kind of argumentation he doth sufficiently intimate, when he puts the things promised instead of the promise. And the things promised are thus explained; 1. In general, by two adjuncts, that they are exceeding great and precious, that is neither concerning small things, or things of little moment, nor concerning things, that we have nothing to do with, or are little to be esteemed by us, but things of exceeding great weight, and of exceeding great price. 2. In special, by those effects, which are contained in these things promised, and they are two. First, A lifting up of the faithful to perfection, which is explained by a likeness unto the divine nature. Secondly, A freeing of them from corruption, which is set forth by the subject and the cause thereof. The subject is the world, the cause is lust or concupiscence.

The Doctrine arising herehence.

Doct. 1. God's promises carry in them the virtue of a gift.

Reason. Because they make the thing promised certainly to belong unto those, to whom it is promised. For although it be not yet actually in their possession, yet it is that power that is certainly produced into act. The cause is, 1. The truth of God that promiseth. 2. The Divine Power which accompanieth God's promises, whereof mention was made in the former verse.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those that make God's promises wholly to depend upon man's will.

2. To comfort all the faithful, that they may be of good courage, and have a firm hope in the good things that are promised by God.

Doct. 2 God's promises are of things exceeding great.

Hence it is that the Scripture often speaks of the wondrous things of God's word, Psal. 119. 18. And it evidently appears by the things themselves, if they are well weighed and considered; whether we look unto the divine properties which break forth in the things promised, or their divine effects. For wonderful is the mercy, and power, and providence whereupon they depend; and the effects also are wonderful, for many of them are such, that they do so transcend man's capacity, that they seem unto many utterly impossible and incredible: as the resurrection, immortality, and life everlasting.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn the stupidity of those, that are nothing moved or taken with these things that are so great and wonderful.

2. To exhort us, to labor and strive in our prayers with David, that our eyes may be more and more opened, to be able to see the wonderful nature of them.

Doct. 3. God's promises are as precious unto us, as they are great in themselves.

So they are distinguished: for if God had promised that he would make another World, yet so, as that it should nothing pertain unto us, this indeed had been an exceeding great promise, but nothing precious unto us; but when he so promised a world to come, wherein immortality and great glory shall dwell, as that we should possess it, this promise is as precious as it is great. Hence it is, that in the Scriptures the testimonies of God are extolled, whose promises are exceeding great above all riches, Psal. 119. 14. Above gold and silver, and all precious things, as we often read in the Psalms and Proverbs.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us, both in judgment, affection and all our endeavor, to carry ourselves answerable to these divine promises, as to the most precious thing that is, as we are admonished, Prov. 2. 4. To seek them as silver, and search for them as for hid treasures. And Prov. 8. 10. to receive them, and not silver, &c. And to be more delighted with these than with the sweetest gifts, to get these promises at any price, how great soever, though we sell all that we have, as it is in the parable of the Merchant, who found a precious Jewell.

2. To comfort those Christians that are poor in spirit, even in this present world; for though they have nothing excellent in these outward things, yet they have those exceeding great & precious things provided by God for them. They are in this like unto that heir, of whom Paul makes mention, Gal. 4. 1.

Doct. 4. By virtue of these promises we are made partakers of the divine nature.

Now by nature is not meant the essence of God, but those perfections, whereof we have a representation made by the Spirit Epist. 1. c. 2. v. 9. They are called the virtues of God, and in other places, it is called the life of God, the Image of God, and the Spirit of God. And this nature is communicated by virtue of the promises, because the promise of the Gospel in this differs from the Law, for the Law considered in it self is a killing Letter, and the ministration of death in respect of sinners, but the Gospel is the ministration of the quickening Spirit 2 Cor. 3 6, 7, 8.

Reason. Because the Spirit of God together with the Gospel worketh our salvation.

Use 1. This may serve to direct us, to examine ourselves whether the promises of God have been effectual in us yet or no? for if we have nothing in us above natural men, or our corrupt nature, we are yet strangers to the promises of God.

2. To reprove those, that are wont to say, when they are stirred up to Christian duties, that they are not Saints or Angels, but flesh and blood, and therefore cannot either abstain from common vices, or come near unto a heavenly life. For Christians besides and above that nature, which they have from Adam, are made partakers also of a divine nature, whereby they are able to do all things through him that strengtheneth them, namely Christ, Phil. 4. 13.

3. To exhort us, to labor with all diligence, that the grace of God may be unto us like a second nature, as some say of Custom. And so it will be, when we perform the works of grace and new obedience, not by constraint or unwillingly, as many use to do, but with delight and cheerfulness, as if we were carried hereunto by the inclination of nature, as the fire is upward.

Doct. 5. The corruption of sin is contrary both to this nature, and God's promises.

Reason. Because the presence of the divine nature and the virtue of the promises drives out this corruption, as heat doth cold, & as light dispells darkness, 1 Pet. 1. 14, 15, 2 Pet. 2. 20. Tit. 2. 11. 12.

Use. 1. This may serve to condemn those, that will join together these things that are so inconsistent and repugnant and contrary to God himself, that is, those that join the profession of Religion with most corrupt practice.

2. To exhort us, if we believe the promises of God, and love the divine nature to our own salvation, then to eschew all these corruptions. Thus much the Apostle intimates, when he saith: Having escaped the corruption, as if a flying away were required, and that quickly, as it were from a fire, wherein we are almost burned, or from a plague that rageth in our houses, 1 Pet. 2. 11. 2 Cor. 4. 1. Having received mercy, let us not faint, &c. and Chap. 7. v. 1.

Doct. 6. This corruption of sin bears rule in the world.

This is gathered herehence, because this is the true description of corruption made by the Apostle.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, 1 not to love the world too much. This use the Apostle makes of it, 1 John 2. 5. • Not to fashion ourselves according to this world, Rom. 12. 2.

Doct. 7. Lust is the essential cause of this corruption, which is in the world.

For it is not from the fabric of heaven and earth, nor in any created substance, but in the naughty affections and dispositions, together with the actions flowing therehence, so that every man carries this world in his own bowels. And the reason why this wickedness is signified by concupiscence or lust, is:

Reason 1. Because in man's conversion to worldly and unlawful things, sin is more manifest then in a simple aversion from God.

2. Because this desire of unlawful things is most contrary to that affection, which we should have towards God, and divine and heavenly things.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to use great diligence to subdue and root out our own lusts and concupiscence.

Verse 5. And besides this, giving all diligence, add to your faith, virtue; and to virtue knowledge;

Verse 6. And to knowledge continence; and to continence, patience; and to patience, godliness;

Verse 7. And to godliness, brotherly kindness; and to brotherly kindness, charity.

The Analysis.

Now the Apostle comes unto that which he chiefly aimed at in this Epistle: and the scope of the Epistle is shown expressly, Chap. 3. verse 1. namely, to stir up the pure minds of the faithful, by way of remembrance; and verse the last, more distinctly, that they should grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ. This same thing he proposeth in these verses, 5. 6, 7. and confirms it in the rest of the Chapter, and in the two following Chapters, he vindicates it from those things which cross this purpose, namely, the seducings of false teachers, chap. 2. and the derisions of profane scoffers, chap. 3. Now his scope and purpose, as it is explained in these three verses, is, to exhort the faithful, to apply themselves wholly to those duties that are answerable to the faith, which they have obtained and do profess. And those duties are set forth; 1. By the common conditions and all the properties of the virtue and duty; and 2. By the species or kinds of virtues and duties. The common conditions and properties of virtue are four, which are usually called cardinal virtues, Justice, Prudence, Temperance, and Fortitude. Justice is here signified by the name of virtue, because it doth most nearly belong to the efficacy of virtue, to be according to the rule, which is general justice. Prudence is signified by knowledge, because prudence and Christian wisdom consists in the practical knowledge of God's will. Temperance is called continence, because this is general temperance, if a man contains himself or abstains from those intisements, whereby he may be withdrawn from his duty. Fortitude is meant here by patience, because this is true Christian fortitude, patiently to suffer all afflictions, and to persist in his duty notwithstanding all afflictions. These are such conditions, that they should be in every duty, which if they be, they make every duty complete; nor can any of them be away, without hurting of the virtue and duty. The kinds of duties are two: godliness, which contains the duties of the first table; and charity, which belongs unto the second table: which charity is determined by a special manner, whilst it is called also brotherly love, whereby we love those, that are joined in the same faith with us. Concerning these duties the Apostle proposeth first the common act, that we should use in them, namely adding, as he saith, add; Secondly, The manner how we should use this act, namely, giving all diligence: where both the manner and the degree is shown; the manner, is diligence, the degree, is all diligence. Thirdly, the end and scope of the act and duty in these words, besides this, or hereunto, that is, to that end of which he had spoken before, viz. that we might be made partakers of the Divine Nature, and have grace and peace multiplied.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Our endeavors must be joined to our prayers, and to the operation of God's grace.

This is gathered herehence, that the Apostle saith; we must labor for that very thing which he wished unto us, and so proposed unto us to be prayed for, and which he said the grace of God did work in us.

Our endeavors must be joined unto our prayers.

Reason 1. Because otherwise we cannot have a sincere desire in our prayers, without which our prayers are in vain; for what we sincerely desire, that also we do always labor to attain.

2. Because our prayers themselves do bind us to such an endeavor. For in every prayer there is a promise and vow, wherein we promise unto God that we will seek that which we ask of him: so that to ask anything of God without such an endeavor, is not only to take God's name in vain, but also plainly to mock his Majesty.

Our endeavors also must be joined with the grace of God, because grace tends thereunto, both to afford us strength to endeavor, and also to stir us up to exercise that strength.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those slothful men, which wish for many things, and after their manner also ask them of God, but yet will not move so much as their finger to obtain them: these men are like that slothful man, that the wise man describes, Prov. 22▪ 13. and elsewhere, where the slothful man carries his hand in his bosom, &c.

2. To exhort us, daily to be mindful of this obligation, when we pray unto God for the forgiveness of our sins, for deliverance from temptations, for newness of life, or any other thing, let us constantly also use our endeavors to attain these ends.

Doct. 2. Our endeavors must always tend to the increase of the grace which we have received.

This is gathered therehence, that the sum of our duty consists in adding: the reasons are divers;

Reason 1. Because that is imperfect which we have: while we remain in this life, we are in a state of progress and edifying; not of rest or perfection, Ephes. 4. 12, 13.

2. Because that which we have received, is given unto us to be an earnest, a pledge, and the first fruits of that which we yet look and seek for.

3. Because it cannot be, that we should rightly esteem the grace that we have received, if we do not labor to attain the highest degree thereof, but rest contented with the benefit that we have received, and never look for anymore of that kind.

4. Because we cannot keep that which we have received, if we do not labor to increase it; for as the vital heat doth always either increase or decrease, and he that goes up a sandy-hill, must still labor to get up, or else he will slide down; so it is in a Christian life.

5. Because we should do that unto God, which we would have God do unto us; for we would have God always add unto those benefits and blessings which he bestoweth upon us; we therefore should likewise add unto those duties which we perform unto him.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that rest satisfied with that which they have, and never seek farther, and much more those, that by diminishing and losing, waste and consume that which they had, Apoc. 2. 4. This may be explained by the parable of the talents.

2. To exhort us, to exercise a holy kind of covetousness in these spiritual things; for as covetous men join house to house, field to field, Isaiah 5. 8. so should we also join faith to faith, obedience to obedience, charity to charity.

Doct. 3. We must use our endeavors about these spiritual things with all diligence.

Now by all diligence is meant, 1. The greatest heedfulness of the mind. 2. The greatest earnestness of the will. 3. The greatest care, that is intimated by that phrase, whereby we are commanded, to seek the kingdom of God and the righteousness thereof. For when Christ had told them, Matth. 6. 31. that they should not be careful what they should eat, or what they should drink, he explains this care, verse 32, 33. by the phrase of seeking. 4. A diligence in the use of the means, whereby we may come to attain that which we desire. And the reasons why we should use this diligence about spiritual things, are,

Reason 1. The dignity and excellency of these things above all earthly things, which worldly men are so busy about.

2. The difficulty, for in their nature they are above our strength, and there are many impediments also, as well inward as outward, which we cannot overcome, but by using all diligence.

3. The necessity of these things, without which we are miserable wretches.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove the slothful and sluggish Christians, that are so remiss, so cold and luke-warm at least in these things, which require so great diligence. Here appears the crossness of man's disposition: for when God hath forbidden us, to be over-careful about worldly things, because all these things should be added unto us without such care; and hath commanded us, to be diligent and careful about spiritual things, because we shall never be partakers of them without diligence; we on the contrary are careful and diligent about the world, and neglect Heaven.

2. To exhort us, by all means daily to stir up ourselves, and to provoke one another to this so necessary diligence.

Doct. 4. Faith is the fountain and beginning of all Christian virtue.

This is gathered from the text. Because faith is here laid as the foundation upon which all virtues are to be built.

Reason 1. Because without faith no man can please God unto everlasting life, and therefore the very virtues of unbelievers, although they be pleasing unto God in themselves, especially if a comparison be made betwixt them and vices, yet they are not pleasing unto God unto salvation, or such as that they may expect a spiritual reward from God; and therefore if a comparison be made betwixt them and the virtues of the faithful, they may not unfitly be called, splendid peccata, glorious sins.

2. Because to the making up of virtue there is required not only good matter and form, but also the beginning and end. Now in a heart destitute of faith there is not the beginning of Christian virtue, and from the defect of this beginning there follows also a defect, both in the end, and in the form. The manner how faith produceth virtue, is, 1. In regard of the object which it lays hold of, because all grace and virtue is derived from Christ. 2. In regard of the effect, because faith purifies the heart of man, and so makes it fit for such operations and dispositions. 3. Because faith it self is an impulsive argument, moving us to labor for virtue.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those imprudent builders, that neglect faith and seek for virtue, as if they would build the roof of the house, and not lay the foundation.

2. To exhort us, to have great care of faith, because all virtues depend upon it.

Doct. 5. Virtue is the glory of faith.

This is gathered therehence, that it is said, it must be added to faith as something belonging to the perfection thereof. Now it is not an essential perfection, but complementary; not internal properly, but external.

Reason 1. Because faith without virtue is not a living, but a dead faith.

2. Because virtue is the end of faith.

3. Because it is the adorning thereof.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that boast of faith and neglect virtue, such were many even in the Apostles time, as appears by the Epistle of James.

2. To exhort us, to give all diligence, to add virtue to faith.

Doct. 6. The perfection of virtue depends upon knowledge.

This is gathered from that; To virtue add knowledge. By knowledge we mean, not so much that intellectual virtue, which is properly called scientia, knowledge, as understanding, wisdom, and prudence, all which are signified in the Scriptures by the right knowledge of God's will. Now this knowledge is necessary unto virtue both in general and particular.

Reason 1. Because virtus est habitus electivus, virtue is an habit pertaining to election, or hath good election joined with it. Now to this election it is required, that a man should rightly know the end, and also the means that lead unto the end, and the manner also how he may come to the end by those means.

2. Because actiones virtutum versantur in particularibus, the actions of virtues are in particulars, and therefore it is not sufficient to judge aright of good and evil in general, unless that judgment be also applied to particular actions, according to their circumstances.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that please themselves in their ignorance, as if ignorance were the mother of devotion, or of any virtue, whereas it is the greatest enemy to virtue, and the mother of all profaneness, especially if it be voluntary, as Peter shows, Epist.

2. Chap 3. verse 5. Where he gives a reason of their great wickedness, because those scoffers of whom he speaks, were willingly ignorant of those things which pertain unto true godliness.

2. To exhort us, to seek for knowledge, and when we have gotten it to apply it also to the increase of virtue. For virtue without knowledge is blind, and knowledge without virtue is vain.

Doct. 7. Continnence or temperance is the perfection of knowledge.

Now by continnence and temperance we mean a moderation, whereby all lusts are suppressed that might allure or withdraw us to anything that is contrary to virtue and knowledge.

Reason 1. Because knowledge tends to such a moderation and government of the affections.

2. Because knowledge it self cannot subsist without this moderation. For unless the affections are directed by knowledge, knowledge it self is corrupted by the affections: hence it is, that many errors and heresies oftentimes take their rise and beginning from evil manners and affections, Ephes. 4. 18.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that are puffed up with knowledge, when in the mean time they show by their intemperance that they know nothing yet, as they ought to know, 1 Co. 8. 12.

2. To exhort us, to use all our knowledge to the government of our affections and manners.

Doct. 8. Patience must be joined with continnence to the perfection of virtue.

By patience we mean that grace whereby we continue and persist in well-doing, although we are crossed by many grievous things. Therefore it includes in it patience, constancy, and stableness of mind, or Christian fortitude. Continnence strengthens virtue against alluring intisements, and patience against all adversity, so that virtue is quite perfected, if it be grounded on faith, directed by knowledge, and strengthened on the one side by continnence, and on the other side by patience.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove the lightness and inconstancy of men, who indeed profess themselves to be studious of virtue, and yet can bear nothing, to keep virtue whole and entire.

2. To exhort all good men, to prepare themselves to bear all afflictions for virtue sake and a good conscience.

Doct. 9. Godliness is the chief and most necessary of all virtues.

By godliness we mean true religion towards God, and a mind wholly given to the true worship of God.

Reason 1. Because it hath the noblest object, that is, God himself.

2. Because it doth most of all perfect all other virtues, whiles it refers them and all their acts to a divine beginning, and a divine end. For godliness subjects the mind to God in all things, so that it acknowledgeth God to be the author of all good, from whom every good and perfect gift cometh, and makes him the chiefest good and the last end to whom all our actions are to be directed.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that attribute so much to some moral and human virtues, that they prefer them before godliness.

2. To exhort us, continually to exercise ourselves both in public and in private, to increase this godliness in our minds.

Doct. 10. With Godliness towards God we should join love towards our neighbor.

Reason. Because godliness it self commands and begets this love. For we love our neighbor with Christian love, when we love him for God's sake, not for our own, or any worldly respect. Now godliness produceth this love towards our neighbor, 1 Because it teacheth us to obey God's Commandment, who hath commanded us to love our neighbor. 2 Because it teacheth us to love the image of God, and every gift of God in our neighbor. 3 Because it brings us to imitate God himself in the communicating of good. Therefore godliness, which is separated from charity, is not true godliness; and that charity which is separated from godliness, is not true charity, but either hypocrisy, or some human civility.

Use 1. This may serve to exhort us, to show and adorn our godliness towards God, by our love towards our neighbor.

2. To reprove those, that make show of much godliness towards God, when in the mean time they take all occasions to wrong their neighbors, if so be they might by any means advantage themselves thereby.

Doct. 11. This love should be extended unto all men, but chiefly to be used towards the brethren.

For so they are distinctly set down, verse 7. Brotherly kindness and charity: Both of these is proper and peculiar to Christians. For the Christian alone loves all, even his enemies, and he alone also loves the brethren, that is, the household of faith. We should love all, 1. As they are partakers of the same natural good with us. 2. As they are capable also of the same spiritual good. And we should love the faithful also, as they are partakers of the same spiritual good with us.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to edify ourselves in this charity, which is the character of Christianity.

Verse 8. For if these things be in you, and abound, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

The Analysis.

Here the Apostle begins to confirm the exhortation, which he had before made, to add virtue to faith, and knowledge, &c. And he confirms it by a twofold argument; 1. The first is taken from the benefit which is joined to these virtues, whereunto he exhort them. 2. The second from the disprofit, which follows the privation or absence of them. The first is laid down, verse 8. the second verse 9. The benefit proposed is contained in these words, they make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful: where by a negation is meant the contrary affirmation, namely, that by these virtues they shall be quick and active, and also fruitful; which benefits are explained by the primary efficient cause, which is the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ; and the secondary cause, which are the virtues themselves whereunto he exhorts them. And these virtues he explains according to that way which he had intimated before in the exhortation, touching the manner, and touching the degree: touching the manner, that they be in you; touching the degree, that they abound.

The Doctrines arising hereence.

Doct. 1. There are spiritual benefits arising from virtues, whereby the faithful are stirred up to labor for virtue.

This is gathered from the scope of this verse, and from the connection which it hath with the former exhortation. These benefits are such, that they cannot be understood by carnal and worldly men; but the faithful do not only understand them, but also seek for them with great and continual diligence. Otherwise this argument which the Apostle useth to the faithful, would have been altogether ineffectual. But these benefits are such, that they make men rich, not in this world, but in the Lord, 1 Tim 6. 18. Luke 12. 21.

Use. This may serve to reprove those earthly men, which are not moved with such arguments, but covet the gain, profits, and pleasures of this life, and savor not those things that belong to the kingdom of God.

Doct. 2▪ It is a great benefit to the faithful, and so they esteem it, if they can be ready to do good works.

This is gathered from that, they make you that ye shall not be barren, that is, not idle or slothful in the profession of religion.

Reason 1. Because it is the greatest misery for men to be reprobate unto good works.

2. Because by this readiness to do good, the faithful come to obtain their desires.

3. Because by this means the life spiritual is exercised and increased. For as all life is the beginning of operation, and tends unto operation, so also is it increased by operations.

4. Because the glory of God, wherein consists the chiefest good, and man's happiness, is by this means advanced.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those foolish and slothful Christians, that neglect their own proper good, or rather do not understand what that is wherein it consists.

2. To exhort us, by all means to make ourselves ready to do good, and therefore according to the mind of the Apostle in this place, to get all virtue, that we may not be barren in the knowledge of Christ.

Doct. 3. Good works are fruits that the faithful should continually bring forth.

This is gathered therehence, that fruitfulness is both required and promised in this place. It is required therein, that the Apostle intimates, that this is necessary for the faithful, to be fruitful. It is promised thereby, that it is made as a benefit arising from virtues. Good works are called fruits by a metaphor, for the likeness that they have unto the fruits of trees and plants. Now in natural fruit many things are considered, which according to the Scripture must be applied unto good works. 1. That it be something agreeable to the nature of the seed from which it ariseth. 2. That it hath no only some good in it, but also perfections; hence flowers and leaves are not wont to be called fruits, although they come from the same seed that the fruits do, and be the last two that comes forth, and hath in it that perfection, that it is the end both of the seed, and all other things that arise from the seed before the fruit. 3. It is required also, especially in those that arise from good husbandry, that there be something that is desired and expected and will be acceptable to the husbandman and master, or owner. All these things in the Scriptures are to be applied unto good works, 1. That they be agreeable to the word of God, which is the seed, as it is in the Parables Matth. 13. Mark 4. of the good seed: and good works differ from others, as grapes differ from wildegrapes, Isaiah 5. 2. That they have goodness in them. For bad works neither are properly fruits according to Scripture, unless it be with an addition, evil fruits. Nor do they bring any fruit to their 〈◇〉 Rom. 6. 21. They must also have perfection in their kind: for as the seeds which are said in the parable to arise, perhaps unto the ear, yet because they did not come to just perfection, are said to have brought forth no fruits: so also Christians, which have only the flowers and leaves of profession, and not the solid works of godliness, are accounted by God unfruitful and barren plants. 3. Our works also must answer the expectation of God, and that care which he hath taken in manuring our souls, Isaiah 5. 2. Luke 13. 6, 7. & 20. 10. Although in all these things our good works and fruits are alike, yet one thing may be observed, wherein they are unlike; namely, that whereas the profit of natural fruits is wont to return to the husbandman and master, the profit of these fruits redounds properly to those that bear them, Rom. 6. 2. Although hence also something redounds unto God our master, John 15. 8.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that bring forth no fruit, Matthew 3. 10. John 15. 2. Luke 13. 7. Much more are they to be condemned, that are like unto the cursed ground, and in stead of fruits bring forth thorns and briers, Hebr. 6. 8. Deut. 32. 32.

2. To exhort us, by all means to labor to bring forth good fruits, and so also that they may be answerable unto those means which God used towards us, to make us fruitful, according to God's expectation, and in that season wherein God expects them, and in that measure also which he expects, of some thirty, of some sixty, and of some an hundred fold.

Doct. 4. Without these fruits the knowledge of God is unprofitable.

For it is as it were choked with thorns, or withered away.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to be so much the more careful to bring forth fruit, that we may not heap up this sin of barrenness unto the other, by making the word of God void and of no effect.

Doct. 5. That we may be fruitful, virtues must not only be in us, but also abound in us.

They are in us when we have gotten a habit of them; they abound, when we do seriously and diligently endeavor to make that habit more perfect.

Verse 9. But he that lacketh these things, is blind, and cannot see far off, and hath forgotten that he was purged from his old sins.

The Analysis.

THIS is the second argument whereby the exhortation of the Apostle is confirmed; and it is taken from the disprofits that befall all those that are strangers to these virtues. And these disprofits are contrary to those profits whereof mention was made in the former verse. For the Apostle would say that they which have not these virtues, are quite barren and unfruitful. But he doth not barely express this, but sets it forth by the causes thereof. And the causes are two, blindness and forgetfulness. For he that is blind, must needs be barren and unfruitful, and unfit to do those businesses especially, which require the eye sight: and he that forgets the benefit which he hath received, it is no wonder, if he bring forth no fruit worthy of that benefit. Their forgetfulness is set forth by the object or benefit which they should remember, that is, their purification from their old sins. By blindness in this place is meant, not the privation of their corporal sight, or of their natural understanding, but of that spiritual perfection, whereby we come to the saving knowledge of those things that pertain to the kingdom of God, and our eternal life. By those things that are far off, are meant things truly spiritual which as touching their nature and condition, are as far off from carnal men as heaven is from earth.

The Doctrines arising here-hence.

Doct. 1. All that are destitute of virtue are spiritually blind.

They are blind in a twofold respect. 1. In respect of that natural blindness, wherein all the sons of Adam are born, like that man that was blind from his birth, John 9. 1 And secondly, in respect of another adventitious blindness, which they have brought upon themselves by their sins▪ through the just judgment of God blinding those that will not see, like that sorcerer, Acts 13. 11. upon whom the hand of the Lord seems to have been, to blind him. The former blindness goes before as the cause, viz. the neglect of virtue; the other follows as the effect. And both of them appears by those signs that corporal blindness doth.

Reason 1. Because those men know not the special way wherein they should go.

2. They cannot see those stumbling-blocks that lie in the way, but continually stumble and fall.

3. They cannot so much as discern the colors of those things which they handle, and therefore as it is, Isaiah 5. 20. They call evil good, and good evil, &c. And one thing there is that adds to their misery more then is in those that are corporally blind; namely, that they seek not fit guides to lead them, as it is said of the sorcerer, that he did, Acts 13. 11. for either they trust wholly to themselves, because they do not know that they are blind, Apoc. 3. 17. or else they follow some blind guide, so that both fall into the ditch.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to acknowledge our spiritual blindness, and to labor to get out of it. For it is in everyone of us either in whole or in part. We should therefore think with ourselves how great a misery it is to continue in perpetual darkness and in a most thick myst. Christ wept over Jerusalem for this their blindness.

2. To exhort us earnestly to pray unto God, who can open the eyes of our mind. The blind man, Luke 18. 38. never ceased to cry out, saying, Jesus thou Son of David have mercy on me, and when Christ asked him, what he would that he should do unto him, he desired nothing else, but that he might receive his sight, verse 41. So also in spiritual blindness although a great part of it was cured in David, yet we see that he constantly prays unto God, to open his eyes, Psal. 119. 18 So also the Apostle saith, that he ceased not to pray for the faithful, that the eyes of their understanding might be enlightened Ephes. 1. 18 This is the counsel of the holy Ghost, and of Christ, 1 Cor. 13. 18.

3. To instruct us, never to think that we have received sight, until we find in ourselves the study and labor to abound in virtue.

Doct. 2. The forgetting of God's benefits is a great evil and sin and brings misery along with it.

For it is here attributed unto those, that are strangers unto virtue, not only as a sin, but also as a great disprofit, and is opposed to that fruitfulness wherein the happiness of the faithful doth consist. It is a sin, because it contains ingratitude in it, and that not the least degree of ingratitude; for though a man be mindful of the benefit which he hath received, purposing to be thankful for it, yet if he doth not render thanks, he is said to be ungrateful; yea, and though he doth render thanks, if he doth it coldly, and doth not endeavor to answer the merits of him that bestowed this benefit upon him, and the dignity of the benefit, he is not yet free from this vice; but if he doth quite forget the benefit which he hath received, then he is rightly said to be as it were twice ungrateful.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to beware of this kind of ingratitude, and not to think ourselves ungrateful then only, when we do repay evil for good, but also when we do any way forget the benefit which we have received.

Doct. 3. God accounts him forgetful of the benefits which he hath received, that is not effectually mindful of them, that is, that doth not so remember them, as to live answerably.

This is gathered therehence, that fruitfulness and forgetfulness are opposed. For they are made immediately contraries, so that there is no medium between them. Deut. 32. 18. The Israelites are said to have forgotten God for that reason only, because they had forsaken the true worship of God, and his due obedience, as it is explained, verse 15. So Psal. 106. 13. where they are said to have forgotten God and his works as, often as they murmured against him, although there is no doubt but if they had been asked, they could have easily related the whole history of those things that God hath done for them in Egypt. After the like manner are the words of Christ to be understood, when he asked his Disciples, whether they had forgotten the miracle of the five loaves and two fishes, intimating that it was a manifest token of their forgetfulness, that they were at that time so troubled about bread.

Use. 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to rest satisfied with such a memory as consists in bare contemplation, which God accounts forgetfulness.

2. To exhort us, by all means to study this art of memory:

Which that we may the better do, let us observe these Rules.

Rule 1. That we do not slightly pass over the thought of these things, but look narrowly into the natures and circumstances of them. For the more plainly we come to understand them, the more firmly do we retain them.

Rule 2. That having come to such a clear knowledge of them, we should also call them to mind, so as to consider the efficacy of them; for the more they work upon the affections, the stronger is the impression upon the memory: thence is it, that children are wont to remember many things, which others forget, because they use to admire all things as new and strange; and we also do not easily forget those things which we admire, as being things wherewith we are much taken, Psal. 119. 16. I will delight myself in thy statutes, there is the affection; and I will not forget thy word, there is the memory flowing from the affection.

Rule 3. That we should always carry a memorial with us, whereby the memory of these things may be kept, Numb. 16. 40. This is a memorial. Now our memorial is the word of God chiefly, which in that respect we should daily read and meditate upon.

Doct. 4. Our purification from sin is a benefit never to be forgotten.

Reason▪ 1. Because it is very great in it self and its own nature, seeing by it we are freed from the guilt and dominion of sin, from the the curse of the law, from the anger of God and eternal death.

2. Because it is of great force and efficacy to stir us up to labor to be thankful, and to abound in virtue, as here it appears by the manner of arguing, which the Apostle useth. For that cause also Paul, Rom. 12. 1. and in other places exhorteth the faithful by the mercies of God.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that do either not think at all upon the mercy of God, and redemption through Christ; or else turn it into an occasion of sin.

2. To exhort us, daily to meditate upon this benefit, and not to satisfy ourselves, unless we are daily stirred up by this argument to the practice of piety.

Doct. 5. All the sins from which we are purged in Christ, must be accounted old, that is, out of use, forsaken, dead, never to be taken up again.

Verse 10. Wherefore, the rather brethren, give diligence to make your calling and election sure: for if ye do these things, ye shall never fall.

Verse 11. For so an entrance shall be ministered unto you abundantly, into the everlasting kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ:

The Analysis.

IN these word is contained the conclusion of the Apostles exhortation, as it is intimated in the first word, Wherefore. Now because the conclusion and the question must always be the same, as touching the thing it self, although they differ in some respects, there is no doubt but the Apostle here concludes the same thing, which he had before, verse 5. propounded to himself to be concluded, viz. That they should give all diligence to add to their faith virtue, &c. And as repetitions in the Scripture are not wont to be vain, nor bare, but for the most part with some usury or increase; so also in this place he doth not barely repeat the exhortation to labor for virtue, but he doth illustrate this endeavor and labor by the proper office thereof, that is, by the confirmation of our calling and election; so that he doth both repeat the exhortation, and also add a new argument, and that a most weighty one, to press it the more, after this manner: If by the exercise of good works ye make your election and calling sure, then should ye most of all apply yourselves thereunto: but the former is true, Therefore. The assumption is laid down in the text, and proved by a double argument. 1. By removing the contrary or Apostasy, which is most opposite to the assurance of our election and calling; and is alike opposite also to the exercise of virtue and good works, which is shown in these words: If ye do these things, ye shall never fall: wherein is such a reason contained, if ye shall never fall, then ye will have your calling sure. The second argument is taken from the felicity adjoined, which is set forth by the proper cause thereof, that is, by the abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Christ. And this argument strengthens both the conclusion and also the foregoing argument, after this manner: If ye have abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Christ, then ye shall never fall, but hold your calling sure; But if ye labor to be virtuous and to do good works, ye shall have abundant entrance into the everlasting kingdom of Christ: therefore if ye labor to be virtuous and to do good works, ye shall never fall, but have your calling sure. But before we consider the conclusion it self which the Apostle lays down, there comes the manner to be observed, how he doth propound it, that so it may work the deeper. Now the manner is shown in that title which he gives unto the faithful, when he calls them brethren, which is not only a title of good will, but of some special and singular love, such as useth to be betwixt these men that are most nearly joined together.

Obser. Here we may observe in general, That our exhortations must be seasoned with love and good will; but more especially it affords us this Observation, That there is not a more brotherly office, then to stir up and bring those that we love, to labor and endeavor to lead a Christian life.

Reason 1. Because by this means they are delivered from the greatest evils, James 5. 20.

2. Because they are made partakers of the greatest good, as it appears in the text.

Use. 1. This may serve to admonish us, to take in good part such exhortations and admonitions that are given us, whether they be in public or in private.

2. To exhort us, to season our exhortations and admonitions after this manner, and so to be more frequent in these duties. For oftentimes he that neglects these duties, shows that he doth hate his brother and is his enemy; they being proper to brethren, and the nearest and dearest friends, Levite. 19. 17.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. The assurance of our calling and election is a thing greatly to be desired.

This is gathered from the text: because Peter in this exhortation presupposeth some such desire in the faithful, and then stirs them up to a more fervent and earnest desire of it.

Reason. Because our happiness and all spiritual good things are greatly to be desired, and they depend upon this assurance of our calling and election. For election is the free love of God, whereby he intends saving grace, or supernatural blessings unto us. Our calling is the manifestation of that love by the application of this saving grace. The assurance of both consists, 1. in God's unchangeable purpose, 2 Tim. 2. 19. The foundation of God standeth sure. 2. In the effectual operation, which those blessings of God have in us, as in that place of Timothy, that foundation hath this seal, that whosoever calls on the name of Christ, should depart from iniquity. 3. In assurance of faith, confidence, and experimental knowledge, which we come to have both of God's purpose towards us, and the effectual and saving operation thereof in our hearts.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those that have no affection at all unto these spiritual good things, but rest well pleased in the things of this world. They are like unto the rebellious Israelites, who more desired the Onions and Garlic of Egypt, then the Milk and Honey of the promised Land, or the celestial Manna, Numb. 11. 5, 6. They are far worse then the Prodigal Son, if they always rest satisfied with the Swines husks, and never desire the bread that is in their fathers house, Luke 15. 16. 17.

2. To exhort us, to labor for a spiritual hunger and thirst after these spiritual good things: God himself shows us the best means, when he would stir up the people of Israel to desire the promised land, forthwith commended unto them the riches of the land wherewith it did abound: so also should we always set before our eyes those innumerable blessings, which depend upon our calling and election.

Doct. 2. It belongs to our duty to make this our calling and election sure.

Give diligence. Not as they are in the purpose of God, but as they have an effectual operation in us, whereby they are certainly manifested and sealed unto us; and this is the reason why our calling is set before election: for although election be eternal in God, and our calling be in time; yet we come to know our calling before our election, and the knowledge of our election depends upon the effectualness of our calling.

Reason 1. Because although God himself causeth this, yet he doth it partly by moral persuasions and by those means wherein our endeavor is required.

2. Because there are no effects of our calling and election, which are not also our effects, because God makes us to do them.

3. Because that very thing which God doth in this kind, we are in some sort said to do, if we beg it of him by continual prayer.

4. Because God's confirmation of it is such, that it requires also the like confirmation of us. God confirms our calling and election by his promise, his covenant, Sacraments, oath, and spiritual pledge: And these things do in like manner require of us our promise, and vow, to cleave unto God, our covenant, faith, and endeavor, and all those things whereby we may be confirmed in that communion which we have with God.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort us, because the certainty and assurance of our calling and election is not only possible for us to attain unto, but also commanded us; so that nothing is more pleasing unto God, then that we should labor to be more and more assured of these things: for this is the end both of the promise and the precept.

2. To reprove those, that either altogether neglect this primary duty of the faithful, or take such slight care of it, that they must needs always waver in their minds touching those things whereof they should be most assured. Dangerous is that doctrine of the Papists, that holds men's minds always in suspense, both in life and death. For in life they accuse this firm confidence of presumption, and in death they leave wretched men in doubt, how long they shall be tormented in Purgatory.

3. To exhort us to this labor and diligence; and indeed this endeavor is inseparable from a true and lively faith: for look how it is amongst men; if one did believe that he had an inheritance left him by his Father, or any other, he would never be at quiet, till he had gotten it assured unto him, according to the laws and customs of the country wherein he lives, so is it with the faithful also touching these spiritual good things.

Doct. 3. All those, and those alone, make their election sure, that make their calling sure.

These two God hath joined together, as the Apostle doth in this place, so that no man ought or may dis-join them. Hence election and calling are taken sometimes in the Scriptures for one and the same, as 1 Cor. 1. 26, 27. that which is called calling, verse 26. is called election, verse 27. There is indeed an outward and ineffectual calling, which is many times separated from election, as when it is said, Many are called, but few are chosen. But effectual and saving calling hath always a sure connection with election, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Rom. 8. 3. and 11. 28. 29.

Reason. Because this calling is nothing else but the operation of God, whereby in time he begins to execute that purpose of election, which he had decreed from everlasting.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove ⟨◇⟩ that are wont to boast of their election and predestination, ⟨◇⟩ in the mean time they never look after their calling ⟨◇⟩ ▪ to demonstrate it either to themselves or others ⟨...⟩ , whatsoever men say of their election, if they ⟨...⟩ assured of their calling.

2. To comfort all the faithful that are penitent, con•e•ed, and called, because all those may and ought to be sure of th•• election.

Doct. 4. An endeavor to abound in virtue, and to do good works is the only means to make our calling and election sure.

This is gathered from these words, If ye do these things▪

Reason 1. Because these are the proper effects of calling and election.

2. They are the causes of that knowledge which we have of our calling and election. For the knowledge and assurance of these things depends upon the reflex act of our understanding, whereby we see in ourselves the marks and signs of effectual calling, and consequently of eternal election. Hence this assurance increaseth and decreaseth in us, according as our endeavor to abound in virtues, and to do good works is greater or lesser.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that teach that the assurance of election crosset• the practice of piety, whereas there is as great an agreement betwixt these, as is betwixt the effect and the cause, which absolutely agree.

2. To condemn those, that from this doctrine of the assurance of election, take occasion to cast off all care of piety: these are they that the Apostle speaks of, c. 3▪ v. 16. who being unlearned and unstable, wrest the Scriptures unto their own destruction. Although the election of God be sure in it self, yet no man is sure of it without the practice of piety. Then again the certainty of election that is in God, makes this certain, that no man shall ever be saved by virtue of election, unless there be in him the practice of piety: such words or thoughts are certain tokens of a profane soul, which neither cares for election nor salvation, nor hath any fear of God. For whereas it is alike certain with God, how long everyone of us shall live in this world, yet there is non•••t cares not for his life, or useth not the means to live, unless he be quite mad: so from the certainty of election none concludes after such a manner, unless he be altogether profane.

3. To exhort us, to stir up ourselves more and more to do these things, whereby we shall receive so great fruit and benefit.

Doct. 5. By laboring to do these things we are fore-armed against the dangers of all temptations.

If ye do these things, ye shall never fall.

Reason 1. Because we are never led into temptation without our own fault, and consequently without the neglect of this duty.

2. We are never led into temptation, unless we have first tempted God, by forsaking those means, whereby we might be upheld and preserved.

3. God can and will defend those that fly unto him, and that seek him in his ways. Hither tend those frequent promises, such as are Psal. 15. the last words, and Psal. 16. 8.

Doct. 6. The more we are freed from the falls of sin, the more are we assured of our calling and election.

This is gathered from the opposition, which is made betwixt the assurance of our calling and our falls.

Reason. The reason is taken from the contrariety; for like as the more the darkness is dispelled, the more the light increaseth, and on the contrary; so is it in these things.

Doct. 7. Look what progress we make in grace and virtue, so much progress do we make in glory and happiness.

This is gathered from the connection of the eleventh verse with the former, the force whereof consists in this, that by adding virtue unto faith, and knowledge unto virtue, we shall add also something unto that participation, which we have in the kingdom of God: where it is to be observed that the same word is used in this eleventh verse, where he speaks of glory, that was used, verse 5. where he spake of virtue; there it was 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, here 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉.

Reason. The reason is, because as in evil the sin is never separated from the punishment, but in the sin it self there is the spot or blemish, which is like unto misery; so also in good the obedience and virtue is never separated from the reward. For it hath always joined with it that consolation which pertains to the reward of happiness.

Use. 1. This may serve to comfort us against the afflictions of this life; for although the faithful receive no reward from this world, by reason of the iniquity of men, but hatred, disgrace, contempt, and persecutions: yet they may rest well contented in this, that they shall not only receive an ample reward in the life to come, but also they shall receive it in some sort in this life present▪ Matth. 5. 10. 12. & 19. 29.

2. To exhort us to labor to increase in piety, for as much as this labor is not in vain, but hath its reward even in this present world, 1 Cor. 15 last.

Doct 8. This happiness consists in being made partakers of the everlasting kingdom of God.

By the kingdom of God is meant properly that condition into which the faithful are translated by their effectual calling: now seeing there are no degrees of this condition, this kingdom is distinguished into the kingdom of grace, and the kingdom of glory. Into the kingdom of grace, because the preaching and ministry of the Gospel is the efficient cause thereof, therefore the Gospel it self is called in Scripture the kingdom of God, and because the Church is the proper subject of this state and condition, therefore the Church is also called the kingdom of God; and because spiritual grace hath the chief part in this condition, therefore that also is called the kingdom of God, Rom. 14 17. but most properly the condition it self is the kingdom of God. And it is compared to a kingdom rather than to a Democracy or Aristocracy, or any other society.

Reason 1. Because of the dignity and splendor which it hath.

2. Because the rule or government is in the power of one. For although it is called sometimes the kingdom of God, sometimes the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ, as in this place; yet they are not made two Kings as touching the essence, but thereby it is shown that he hath a singular charge in this kingdom.

3. Because the laws and edicts of this society are altogether Kingly and Monarchical; the seals also, and all things that pertain to this government, bear the effigies as it were, or image of one King.

Use 1. This may serve to comfort the faithful, who should think with them selves, and often call to mind, unto what a great happiness they are called. For that which David said heretofore, 1 Sam. 18. 23. Seemeth it to you a light thing to be a kings son in law? that may all the faithful say of themselves in respect of this kingdom, that it is not a light thing to be made Citizens of this kingdom, and especially seeing we are poor and vile creatures, the greater will our comfort be, when we consider the glory and eternity of this kingdom. The glory is such that the kingdoms of David and Solomon, even in the greatest glory that ever they had, were but imperfect representations and shadows as it were of this kingdom. For they were but types of it. So great is the glory of this kingdom, that all the Citizens and Subjects thereof are in some sort Kings, Apoc. 1. 6. The eternity is such, that neither in whole nor in part is it liable unto an end, or any essential change. Compare all the kingdoms of the Persians, Medes, and Grecians, all which are abolished; this kingdom of God alone continues forever.

2. To reprove those, that profess themselves Christians, and yet live so as if they were under no laws, & did acknowledge no King. For as this is reckoned as the cause that the Israelites did run into all kind of wickedness, because there was no king in Israel, but everyone did that which was right in his own eyes, Judges 17. 6. & 18. 1. So also do these men as it were proclaim, that they neither acknowledge Christ nor God for their King, while they do that which seems right in their own eyes, not caring whether it do please God, or displease him. Such men must expect that sentence of Christ, which is laid down, Luke 19. 27. Those mine enemies which would not that I should reign over them, bring hither and slay them before me.

3. To exhort all to seek this kingdom of God above all other things, according as Christ bids us; first seek the kingdom of God. And not only the happiness of those that are admitted to be partakers of this kingdom, but also the misery of all those that are excluded from it, should be an argument to persuade hereunto: for there are two spiritual kingdoms, and every man must needs be a subject of one of them: the kingdom of light and the kingdom of darkness; the kingdom of righteousness and grace, and the kingdom of sin; the kingdom of God, and the kingdom of the Devil, who is called the Prince of this world. All those that are excluded out of the kingdom of God, of grace and salvation, are necessarily included in the kingdom of the Devil, sin and darkness; and deservedly doth this befall all unbelievers and impenitent men, according to that commination, Deut. 28. 45.

Doct. 9. The faithful must seek not only to have an entrance into the kingdom of God, but also an entrance in a plentiful and abundant manner.

Men may be considered to be in a fourfold condition in respect of the kingdom of God. For some are very far off from it: namely, such as the Apostle speaks of, Ephes. 2. 12. That are without Christ, and without God, aliens from the Common-wealth of Israel, strangers from the covenants of promise: such are all those that either understand nothing at all of those things which pertain unto this kingdom, or else nothing care for them, having their consciences feared as it were with a hot iron, as the Apostle speaks, 1 Tim. 4. 2. Others there are which come near unto the kingdom of God, although they are not partakers of it, such as that Scribe was of whom Christ saith, Mark 12. 34. that he was not far from the kingdom of God; and King Agrippa, Acts 26. 28. Others there are that enter into the kingdom of God by faith and repentance, John 3. 3. He that is borne again seeth the kingdom of God, that is, he enters into it, as it is, verse 5. But then again others there are, (with whom also in that respect God is very well pleased,) that do not only enter into it, but enter in a plentiful and abundant manner, as in this place. The difference betwixt these two last sorts is such, as is betwixt those that make entrance only into the borders of a country, and those that go even into the most inward parts of it: or as is betwixt those that make entrance only into a discipline, and those that have thoroughly learned, and do exercise the very mysteries thereof. This Doctrine is confirmed, Colos. 3. 15▪ 16. And to that purpose is that in Col's. 1. 9.

Reason 1. Because these spiritual things are such, that they can never exceed measure: there is nothing in them too much.

2. They are of such a nature, that they do whet and stir up the desire, so that whosoever hath tasted the sweetness of them, doth still desire to be more and more filled with them, until he shall come to the highest perfection, as we may see in their examples, who in this respect are most commended in Scripture.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove and condemn those, to whom the bare profession of piety seems to be enough and too much, that fear lest they should be too godly, that is, lest they should be too happy: this is a certain token of a carnal mind.

2. To exhort us, 1. To give God thanks, that he hath not only admitted us into the suburbs, as it were, and gates of this kingdom, but hath also revealed unto us those things which are more inward and secret. 2. To be diligent and careful, that we do not neglect or despise so great grace, but day by day earnestly to strive to make a greater progress in this kingdom, which we shall do, if we be more diligent and religious in those exercises, whereby this kingdom is advanced.

Verse 12. Wherefore I will not be negligent to put you always in remembrance of these things, though ye know them, and be stablished in the present truth.

Verse 13. Yea, I think it meet as long as I am in this tabernacle, to stir you up, by putting you in remembrance:

Verse 14. Knowing that shortly, I must put off this my tabernacle, even as our Lord Jesus Christ hath shown me.

Verse 15. Moreover, I will endeavor, that you may be able after my decease, to have these things always in remembrance.

The Analysis.

IN the former words the Apostle had given a reason of his exhortation, why all the faithful should embrace it: and in these words he gives a reason of the same, why he should use it unto them; which reason he delivers by way of anticipation, whereby he meets with a close objection by a kind of modest excuse, or by removing the cause which they might suspect, why he should put them in remembrance of these things, namely, because he did think they were ignorant and unstable. Now he shows that this was not the cause, in these words, though ye know them, and be stablished in the present truth. And then he brings divers true causes that moved him to make this exhortation unto them. 1. The great profit that would redound unto them by the performance of these duties whereunto he exhorts them. This reason is intimated in that causal particle, whereby he joins these words with the former, wherefore, that is, for those benefits sake which you shall receive by this means, I thought it my part to put you in remembrance of these things after this manner. 2. The second reason, which depends upon the former, is the desire and care that he had to further their good; this is intimated in these words, I will not be negligent. 3. The third reason is taken from the duty of the Apostle, because justice and equity required this of him, in these words, I think it meet. 4. The fourth reason is taken from the opportunity of time, which he had now, and was not long to continue; that he had it now, he shows in these words, as long as I am in this tabernacle; that it was not long to continue, in these words, Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle, which he confirms by the testimony of Jesus Christ. 5. The fifth reason is taken from the fruit which this exhortation might bring forth; which is set forth by the adjunct of time, that it would be profitable unto them, not only while Peter lived, but also after his death, after my decease to have these things always in remembrance, verse 15.

The Doctrines arising hereence.

Doct. 1. In our exhortations and admonitions, we must not only look unto it, that that which we say be just and right, but also that we speak it with a right mind and good intention, and that it may so appear also unto those with whom we have to do.

This is gathered from the scope of this text.

Reason 1. The first reason is taken from our duty; for that which is good in it self, becomes evil unto us, and our duty is turned into sin, unless quod bonum est been agamus, we do that which is good after a good and right manner: as if a man out of anger, hatred, envy, or a desire to disgrace him, or pride, should tell his neighbor of any vice, or stir him up to do his duty.

2. From the profit of our neighbor, or the benefit of our admonition and exhortation. For it depends oftentimes upon the mind or manner of doing it, which is chiefly looked unto in such like duties; so that they do either make way for our neighbors receiving it, or cast an obstacle in the way to hinder him from receiving it.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, that never exhort others but for revenge sake, when there is some contention and strife betwixt them; and then they please themselves most in reproving other men's vices, when they should not, and when they should, they are altogether silent.

Doct. 2. We must put our neighbors in remembrance of those things which make most for their good.

This is gathered from that particle, Wherefore.

Reason. Because admonition and exhortation are according to their nature, works of charity, and tend unto the good of our neighbor: therefore we should use it most unto those from whom we may expect most good.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, who, if their neighbors do anything unseemly or uncivilly, or to the loss of their honor, or some outward profit, do presently take notice of it in them; but never look after those things that do most pertain to the kingdom of God: those things indeed should not be neglected, but these things should chiefly be looked after.

2. To exhort us, in those things which pertain to the kingdom of God, and the salvation of souls, to have an especial care of our duty towards our neighbor. Hitherto belongs that which Peter saith, that he would not be negligent, that is, that he would never lay aside the care of these things: which although it did in a special manner pertain to the duty of Peter, an Apostle, and other Ministers of the word, yet it is proportionably to be extended to the common duty of all Christians, because the reasons which strengthen it, are for the most part common.

Doct. 3. In justice and equity we are bound to put one another in remembrance.

This is gathered from these words, I think it meet: for although it doth not pertain unto that particular justice, which consists in the equality of the thing received and repaid, yet it is called justice, because it hath as strong an obligation, as anything that is due by justice, Rom. 1. 14.

Use. This may serve to reprove those that account it a sin to be negligent in paying debts, but make no account of the neglect of this duty.

Doct. 4. They that are learned and also stablished in the truth, do yet stand in need of admonitions and exhortations.

This is gathered from these words, though ye know them and be stablished in the present truth.

Reason 1. Because they are not so learned and stablished, but that they may be yet farther instructed and stablished.

2. Because if they had all knowledge and also faith, yet their will and affections must be by these means stirred up unto their duty. For our will is like unto a slow and dull servant, to whom it is not enough once to hear the commands of his master, but they must be often told him. Then again, if they had not only all knowledge and saith, but also a most ready will and affections, yet because they are continually assaulted by temptations, they have need on the other side of continual remembrances and puttings in mind, to strengthen them. The speech of the Captain and the sound of the Trumpet, and such like excitements, do put some courage even into the most valiant soldiers.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove the pride of those men, that put such confidence in themselves in their own knowledge and faith, that they do utterly contemn such kind of helps.

2. To exhort all to be constant and diligent in the hearing of Sermons. For if there be any that abound in knowledge, and perhaps exceed the Preacher himself, so that they cannot be taught anymore by him, yet they may be stirred up by admonitions and exhortations, and in that respect they should always be present there; but much more should they, that are not yet learned and stablished in the truth.

3. To direct, as well the Preachers as the hearers, not only to teach the truth, but also to bring a word of exhortation always, that is, to apply it to the use of the truth which they deliver, and then the hearers, to come unto Sermons, not as being greedy of novelty or speculation, but being prepared before hand and ready to receive exhortations and admonitions, and to turn them into practice.

Doct. 5. We must take hold of the opportunity of time, which we have, diligently to exercise such Christian duties.

This is gathered from these words, As long as I am in this tabernacle. So Gal. 6. 10. John 9. 4. & 12. 35.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to defer or put off the time of our repentance and obedience, 2 Cor. 6. 2. Psal. 95. 7, 8.

Doct. 6. The nearer we come to the end of our life, the more diligent should we be in Christian duties.

This is gathered from the words following, Knowing that shortly I must put off this my tabernacle.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, always to be diligent, for as much as we are never far from putting off this our tabernacle; for although we are not expressly told, as Peter was, how soon this shall be, yet we are told that it shall not be long; and it may happen sooner unto us, then it did unto Peter, who wrote this Epistle.

Doct. 7. We should labor in our life, that some fruit of our life may remain in the Church after our death.

This is gathered from verse 15. We cannot all profit the Church by our writings, as Peter did, but yet through God's grace we may either by some other works, or at least by our good example leave some sweet smelling favor behind us, that may be pleasing and acceptable unto those that remain.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that live so corruptly and wickedly, that even after their death they are a scandal and offense unto those that knew them.

2. To exhort us, (and to comfort ourselves in it,) to carry and behave ourselves piously and holily while we live, because God's glory is thereby advanced, not only while we live, but also after our decease.

Verse 16. For we have not followed cunningly devised fables, when we made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, but were eye-witnesses of his Majesty.

Verse 17. For he received from God the Father, honor, and glory, when there came such a voice to him from the excellent glory, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.

Verse 18. And this voice which came from heaven, we heard, when we were with him in the holy mount.

The Analysis.

IN these verses is contained the reason and cause of those things, which he had spoken of before, as it is manifest by the causal particle For. Now he had said before, 1. That all the faithful must add virtue unto faith. 2. That he had a just reason why he should so seriously stir them up unto this duty; and in these words he shows the reason and cause of both, which is taken from the certainty that is in the things themselves, and the assurance that all the faithful may have of those things that were proposed unto them to believe. The certainty is set forth first by something unlike it, that is, by cunningly devised fables. Secondly, by the testimonies of the Apostles, who were both eye-witnesses, and care-witnesses of these things. Eye-witnesses, in these words, we were eye-witnesses of his Majesty. Care-witnesses in these words, and this voice we have heard. The sight and hearing of the Apostles, wherein lies the foundation of the testimony, are set forth first by their objects: The object of their sight was the majesty of Christ, the object of their hearing was a voice which came from Heaven concerning Christ. Secondly by the cause, which was God the Father, communicating glory unto Christ both by word and deed, Verse 17. Thirdly, by the circumstances of time and place, When we were with him, &c.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Cunningly devised fables are sometimes proposed in the Church in stead of the truth of God.

For this is the reason why the Apostle clears himself from all suspicion of such like fables, because there were many at that time, and many would come afterwards, that would deceive the Church with such like fables, 1 Cor. 2. 1. Where Paul saith that he came not with excellency of speech, thereby closely rebuking some false Apostles and Preachers, who did affect nothing else but a show of eloquence. So in this place Peter makes mention of fables, by reason of such impostors, 1 Tim. 1. 4. & 4. Tit. 1. 14. Such were the fables in the Church of Rome▪ that are contained in their golden Legends of S. Francis, Dominick, and innumerable Saints and Virgins, with the miracles that were done by them. For such like fables were wont to be heretofore, and yet to this day also in many places are proposed unto the people instead of the word of God.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to receive all things that are proposed, without trial and examination: for so we may embrace fables in steed of the Gospel.

2. To exhort us, to give God thanks, that we live in those Churches, out of which all such old wives fables are wholly removed, and wherein nothing is proposed but the sincere word of God.

Doct. 2. All those professors of the faith that do not add virtue unto faith; and all those Preachers that do not with zeal and constancy stir up the faithful to labor for virtue, do greatly dishonor the Gospel, as if it were of the same nature with cunningly devised fables.

This is gathered from the connection of these words with the words foregoing, which were explained in the Analysis. For this is the force of the Apostles reason; If I did account the truth of the Gospel like unto a cunningly devised fable, I could not so earnestly, and with such constancy stir you up to embrace and adorn it; nor could ye receive those things that we have spoken of, without an endeavor to abound in virtue, if ye did not account them like unto cunningly devised fables.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish, 1. All Preachers to beware of carelessness and negligence in stirring up the people unto piety. And 2, All the faithful also to beware of lukewarm and unfruitful profession of the faith. For neither of them can be without an implicit and virtual blasphemy, And they that so carry themselves, although they do not in words▪ yet they do in their deeds confess, and make it to appear, that they make no more account of the Gospel, then of an old wives fable.

2. To exhort us, to give all diligence to sanctify, as it were, the Gospel of Christ which we profess, and to show it in our lives, that we think far otherwise of the nature of it, then the profane multitude doth.

Doct. 3. The sum of the Gospel consists in declaring the power and coming of Christ.

This is gathered from these words, We made known unto you the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ. For his power hath respect unto his divine nature, together with the effects thereof, Rom. 1. 4. And his coming hath respect unto his human nature, together with the end and benefit of his incarnation. Now if these two be joined together, namely, that Christ came to save us, and that he came with power, so that he had all sufficiency & efficacy at his coming, nothing more can be desired to comfort the faithful.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish, 1 Preachers, to make the power and coming of Christ the center as it were of all their Sermons. The Apostle, 1 Cor. 2. 2. Determined to know nothing save Jesus Christ and him crucified, & then also, 2. the hearers, to have a special eye unto that in the hearing of Sermons, how they may profit in the understanding of this mystery.

2. To exhort us, to fetch all the obedience which we perform unto God, from him as from the fountain. For whatsoever duties flow not from the power and coming of Christ, are not Evangelical, but are infected with hypocrisy, or consist in civility.

Doct. 4. The certainty of this Gospel, even as it may be had after the manner of men, is as great as any we can have of any things that are done and past.

This is gathered from these words; We have seen, we have heard. For it is confirmed by the testimony of those, that sensibly perceived it; who by the confession of all were men at least worthy to be believed, having no reason to witness any otherwise then the thing it self was; in regard that they could not expect to receive any profit thereby from men; and being such as confirmed it unto us, not by the bare testimony of their words, but also with their life and blood: so that even after the manner of men we may be as certain of the Gospel as we are, that there was sometimes a Monarchy of the Assyrians, Grecians, Romans: that there were Captains, and Knights, of such and such a country, or the like.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove and condemn the perverseness of men, who easily believe all other things, though there be but weak arguments to confirm it; but they can scarce be brought to receive the Gospel of salvation.

2. To exhort us to strengthen our faith with such like reasons, even to the full assurance thereof, 1 John 1. 3, 4. For although we ourselves have not seen these things, yet we must as strongly and firmly believe them, as if we ourselves had seen them with our eyes, John 20. 29. This pertains unto the thankfulness which we owe unto God, that he would not barely declare unto us his will, but also confirm it by testimonies, Luke 1. 2. For this was one of the special offices of the Apostles, to witness those things which they had seen of Christ, Acts 1. 22. & 2 32.

Doct. 5. A great Majesty was sensibly perceived by the Apostles.

This is gathered from these words, We have seen his Majesty. So great was this Majesty, that the Disciples could not bear it, Matth. 17. 6. It astonished and amazed Peter, Mark 9. 6.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, to conceive by this proof, how great the glory and Majesty of Christ is now in Heaven, how great it shall be at the last day, and how great we also shall be made in the life to come.

2. To exhort us, to have Christ in high estimation: We have no cause to be ashamed of so great a Majesty; according to that of our Savior; If any one be ashamed of me in this adulterous generation, him will I be ashamed of before God and his Angels.

Doct. 6. This majesty was expressed in those words of God, This is my beloved Son in whom I am well pleased.

In these words is contained both the power and coming of Christ, whereof the Apostles witnessed, and wherein is contained the sum of the Gospel, as we said before. This is gathered from the connection of the words, which these have with the former, We made known, &c. For in the title of Son is declared the honor and glory of Christ, where he is called this my Son: in the title of beloved is shown the coming of Christ, and the end thereof, namely, to reconcile us unto God, and make us beloved of him: whence he is called, My beloved in whom I am well pleased. By the title of Son is chiefly signified the kingdom of Christ, by the title of beloved in whom I am well pleased, is signified the Priesthood of Christ; and by the third thing which is added, Mat. 17. 5. is signified his Prophetical office: hear ye him. And that which is there expressed, is here understood; so that there is nothing in Christ and the Gospel which may not fitly be reduced to these few words.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, for the building up of our faith, to have always in our minds that divine voice; for therefore came it twice from Heaven, once in the Baptism of Christ, and once in this transfiguration which Peter hath reference unto in this place: All the word of God indeed comes from him, but there are some parts of it which come from him unto men in a more special manner, that is, immediately. Such was the Decalogue in the Old Testament: such was the voice, John 12. 28. and such was this voice that was twice repeated: Now as we should magnify every word of God, so in a special manner should we observe and take notice of such words as these.

2. To admonish us, to depend upon Christ alone, and to have recourse unto him only, in those things which pertain unto our salvation. 1. Because such a testimony was never given of any one besides Christ. 2. In this testimony, power, honor, and glory is so given unto Christ, that it is denied unto all others: for the demonstrative particle that, as it is in the original, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, hath an exclusive virtue, as touching all others, excluding all others from being partakers of it.

Doct. 7. This voice of God did effectually bring honor and glory unto Christ.

This is gathered from these words, He received from God the Father honor and glory, when there came such a voice unto him.

Reason 1. Because the testimony of God is infallibly true.

• 2. There is joined with it omnipotent power, when it is said to come from the excellent glory.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, by faith to rely upon every testimony of God. For that which God promiseth or any way witnesseth, is as sure as that which we have already received or do see brought to pass. We may oftentimes doubt of men's words, because they have neither perfect truth, nor perfect power: but the excellent glory of God, whereof mention is here made, requires far otherwise of us.

2. To exhort us, for the confirmation of our faith, to have always in our eyes the excellent glory of God, whereby he can and also will do whatsoever he hath said.

Doct. 8. Those things which pertain unto the kingdom of Christ, are so holy, that they make the place it self, wherein they are declared, in some sort holy.

This is gathered from these words: in the holy Mount. For this Mount was not holy, but by this transfiguration, and this voice that came from heaven, Exod. 3. 5. John 6. 3.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove the stupidity of those, that are nothing taken with such things as these that are so holy.

2. To exhort us, reverently and religiously to prepare ourselves, and apply our minds unto holy exercises, Eccles. 5. 1.

Verse 19. We have also a more sure word of prophesy; whereunto ye do well that ye take heed, as unto a light that shineth in a dark place, until the day dawn, and the day-star arise in your hearts.

Verse 20. Knowing this first, that no prophesy of the Scripture is of any private interpretation:

Verse 21. For the prophesy came not in old time by the will of man: but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the holy Ghost.

The Analysis.

PEter had before proved the certainty of the Gospel by the testimony of the Apostles, who were eye-witnesses and ear-witnesses of it; now he proves the same certainty by the testimony of the word of prophesy; which he sets forth, 1. By the adjunct of stability, and that in comparison to the testimony of the Apostles, in respect whereof this word of prophesy is said to be more sure. 2. By the duty adjoined which is due unto this word of prophesy, namely, a religious heed and attention which should be given unto this word. W^{ch} attention is declared, 1. By the end and use of this word of prophesy, which is by way of comparison set forth by the use of a light, 2. by the helping cause, 3. By the esteem which we should have of the Prophecy of Scripture, verse 20, 21. namely, that it is by the instinct of the Holy Ghost▪ which is set forth by those Prophecies that are contrary thereunto, namely, such, as are of private interpretation, or by the will of man. By prophesy is meant, not the foretelling of those things, that depend upon any natural causes, (for so the Astrologers and Physicians can foretell many things, being skillful in the natural causes,) nor of those things that depend upon the will of any creature (for so those that know other men's counsel, may foretell many things, probably at least) but prophesy is a fore-telling of those things, that depend only upon the will of God, and can be known by God alone, and those to whom he hath revealed it. By the word of Prophecy is meant the Prophecy of holy Scripture, as it is expressly set down, verse 20. which is distinguished in this respect not only from false propheties, but also from other true ones, which were never in the Canon of the Scripture.

The Doctrines rising herehence.

Doct. 1. The word of Prophecy is a more sure testimony then the testimony of any men, or of those things that our senses themselves can give us.

This is gathered from the comparison which is here made betwixt this testimony and that which went before. But it is said to be more sure, not more true: because that which the Apostles witnessed, was as true; but their testimony did not carry with it so great a confirmation of the truth.

Reason 1. Because it appeared not so much to be a divine testimony, being not as yet expressed in the Scriptures.

2. Because it could not prevail so much upon the minds of the Jews, as the word of prophecy, which had now for many ages been as it were habitually confirmed in their minds.

3. Because the testimony of one that foresaw the truth, hath more divine operation in it, then the testimony of him that witnesseth what he hath seen or heard being present, John. 5. 36, 39. There are three degrees of testimonies, 1. Of John. 2. Of the works of Christ. 3. Of the Scripture or word of prophecy. The testimony of works is said to be greater then the testimony of John, and the testimony of the Scripture by way of gradation is intimated to be greater then both.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, in all those things that pertain unto faith and our salvation to depend only upon the Scriptures, because nothing can be more sure.

2. To exhort us, to give God thanks, that he hath not only made known unto us his truth, but hath also confirmed it by strong and sure reasons, and in all respects hath had regard to and provided for the weakness of our faith.

3. To reprove many Christians, which do too much stagger and doubt of these truths. For there appears such a wavering and doubting of the mind, where the life is doubtful and uncertain, and is not surely grounded and ordered according to the rules of Christ. Now we should be as sure of these matters of faith by the Scriptures, as we are of those things that we ourselves see now present before our eyes; and go on as firmly and constantly in the way of Christ, as if we did now with our eyes see Christ himself, and all those things that he hath promised us; or as if we did now hear that voice, Arise ye dead and come to judgment.

Doct. 2. The prophecy of the Old Testament gives a most sure testimony of the power and coming of Christ.

This is gathered from the reference which this 19 verse hath to verse 16. So Luke 1. 20. Acts 3. 18, 24. & 10. 43.

Reason. 1. The greatness of this mystery, which was such, that it must not be shown on a sudden to the world, but, for dignity sake, as it were, by such like messengers going before.

2. That it might the more appear that these things come from God, who was the only author of such like prophetesies.

3. Because the salvation of the people of God from the beginning of the world depended upon the believing of this mystery.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, to confirm our faith more and more by such like arguments.

2. To exhort us, highly to esteem of this mystery, because God himself always made such reckoning of it, that he would have his Prophets from the beginning of the world to be exercised in the declaration of it.

3. To admonish us, that it should never seem tedious unto us, to hear and meditate upon those things, which pertain unto this mystery, seeing God would have this always pressed by all his Prophets.

Doct. 3. It is most praise-worthy in Christians always to give diligent heed unto the Prophetesies and the rest of the Scripture.

This is gathered from these words: Ye do well that ye take heed. By taking heed is meant, 1. A search and inquiry after the sense of the Scriptures, or the truths that are contained in them. 2. An applying of those truths unto the ends and uses whereunto they serve. 3. A religious affection of the mind, whereby the conscience is subdued unto those truths as unto the rules of faith and manners: now they do well, that do thus give heed unto the Scriptures.

Reason 1. Because this obedience pleaseth God.

2. Because they provide well for themselves, to be directed unto eternal happiness.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Papists, and some other foolish men, who deny that they do well, which give heed unto the Scriptures.

2. To reprove all profane and worldly men, who take great care about their worldly profits, or their carnal pleasures, but give little or no heed at all unto the Scriptures.

3. To exhort us, to stir up in ourselves daily this care of attention.

Doct. 4. The Scripture is a light shining unto those that religiously give heed unto it.

This is gathered from these words; Take heed as unto a light that shineth. Now it is called a light, Reason 1. Because it is clear and manifest in it self.

2. Because it makes all other things clear and manifest.

3. Because it enlightens also the eyes of our mind, so that we are able to behold the heavenly mysteries of the kingdom of God.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Papists, who tax the Scriptures of obscurity.

2. To reprove and condemn those, that walk in the midst of this light, and yet perceive no more of the things of God, then as if they were in darkness.

3. To exhort us, 1. To give God thanks for so great a benefit. For God now deals with us, as he did heretofore with the Israelites, in whose dwellings there was light, when in all the land of the Egyptians there was thick darkness, Exod. 10. 22. 23. 2. To walk in this light, not to sleep or have fellowship with the works of darkness, as it is Ephesians 5. 8. 11. 14.

Doct. 5. The whole condition of this our life hath much darkness in it.

This is gathered from these words; A light shining in a dark place. We may see the explication of these words in Calvin.

Reason. Because without the light of the Scriptures and faith we are nothing but darkness; seeing therefore this light is communicated unto us but imperfectly in this life, there must needs be as yet much darkness.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to puff up ourselves with the opinion of knowledge, but humbly to acknowledge our imperfections.

2. To exhort us, so much the more diligently to give heed unto the light.

Doct. 6. We must give heed unto the Scriptures, until a greater light be communicated unto us, then we can have out of the Scriptures, that is, until the last end of this life.

This is gathered from these words, until the day dawn. Although they were very strongly confirmed, verse 12. Yet they must still give heed unto the Scriptures. Daniel himself, though a Prophet, gave heed unto the Prophecies of Jeremiah, Daniel, 9. 2. Peter himself gave heed unto the Epistles of Paul, c. 3. v. 15. Paul himself had great care of the Parchments, that is, of the volumes and books of Scripture, 2 Tim 4. 13.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Anabaptists, who say that the Scriptures are only profitable for novices and young beginners, and not for the stronger.

2. To reprove those, that rest in that knowledge of the Scriptures, which they have, and seek no farther.

Doct. 7. Very great knowledge, light and cleerenesse shall be communicated unto us in the life to come.

This is gathered from the comparison that is made betwixt the life present and the life to come: In the present we have a light as it were in a dark place, but in that to come we shall have full noon as it were, 1 Cor. 13. 12.

Use. This may serve to exhort us earnestly to desire to come unto that perfection, and in the mean time to exercise ourselves in those things that lead thereunto.

Doct. 8. The light of the Scripture profiteth none but the faithful.

This is gathered from these words: Knowing this first, that is, believing, Hebr. 4. 2. No great or noble effect is produced, unless the matter, or the object wherein it should be produced, be prepared before: the seed it self that is cast into the ground, doth not grow, unless the ground be plowed and harrowed. Besides, whereas the Scripture is a testimony, and the strength of the testimony depends upon the authority of him that witnesseth, the Scripture can be of no force, if the authority of God be not acknowledged in it.

Use. This may serve to direct us, when we come to the reading or hearing of the Scriptures, always to lift up our minds unto God, and stir up true faith in our hearts.

Doct. 9. The first thing to be believed is, that the Scriptures are not of any inhumane interpretation, but of divine revelation.

This is gathered from these words: Knowing this first, &c.

The Papists and some others gather from this place, that the interpretation of Scripture doth not belong unto private men, but unto the Church, that is, the Pope and the Councils whom he approves of: but in this sense this place makes most against them: for first it is not here said that a private man may not interpret the Scriptures, but that he may not make an interpretation of his own; now by a man's own interpretation is meant a human interpretation, that is made by the will of man; as it evidently appears by the opposition, verse 21. So that the Prophets themselves, although they were public Doctors of the Church, yet if they should have said anything of themselves without the revelation of God, that would have been their own, that is, a human interpretation: whence also it follows that every interpretation of the Pope, which he takes not from clear Scripture, or hath it not by some extraordinary revelation, is his own in that sense as this word is taken in this place. Secondly, By interpretation in this place is not meant the interpretation of Scripture, that was before revealed, but the revelation itself, as it appears by the 21 verse where this interpretation is made to consist therein, that the Prophets spake their prophesies as they were moved by the holy Ghost. 3 Peter himself, who in the opinion of the Papists was at that time head of the Church, bids the faithful here, search the Scriptures, he doth not bid them depend upon him, and always look for interpretation. 4 He attributes more and greater strength unto the Scripture, then to his own testimony. 5 He calls the Scripture a light, and the condition of the Church a dark place▪ the Papists on the contrary attribute darkness unto the Scripture, and light and clearness unto the Church. 6 He commends the vulgar sort of the faithful, that they did take heed unto the Scriptures, in these words, Ye do well. But the Papists by this interpretaion debar the faithful from the reading of the Scripture.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Papists, that put the Church before the Scripture, and say that the first thing to be believed is, that the Church cannot err.

2. To exhort us, to lay this foundation firm and sure in our hearts.

Doct. 10. The holy Ghost moved those men that were authors of the Scriptures.

This is gathered from these words: As they were moved by the holy Ghost.

Use. This may serve to instruct us, by continual prayer to seek for the aid of the Spirit, for the understanding of the Scriptures. The Scripture must be understood by the help of the same Spirit, by whom it was dictated, as Hier. Eodem spiritu debet intelligi Scriptura, quo fuit dictata.

Doct. 11. The men which the holy Ghost made use of, to deliver the Scriptures, were holy men of God.

Holy, because they were sanctified inwardly, & also set apart to this most holy work. Men of God they were, because they were called by God to this office, and they did declare the will of God, and they did labor also to bring men unto God.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to labor to be like unto them, according to our ability, both in holiness, and in zeal of the Lord.

Chapter II.

Verse 1. But there were false Prophets also among the people, even as there shall be false teachers among you, who privily shall bring in damnable heresies, even denying the Lord that bought them, and bring upon themselves swift destruction.

Verse 2. And many shall follow their pernicious ways, by reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of.

Verse 3. And through covetousness shall they with feined words make merchandize of you.

The Analysis.

Hitherto the Apostle propounded an exhortation, and confirmed it also in the foregoing Chapter. In the two following Chapters he strengthens it, by removing the impediments, that might make this exhortation of no effect. And the chief impediments are false teachers and profane scoffers: of these former he speaks Ch. 2. Of the latter chap. 3. The false teachers he doth first, describe: secondly, reprove: he describes them from the beginning to those words in verse. 3. whose judgment, &c. Then he reproves them, 1 in general in these words, that they are damned men; which he doth afterwards prove, 1 by the usual course of God's justice, from verse 4. to the 10. 2. By their deserts, whereby they bring upon themselves the revenging justice of God, from verse 10. to the end of the Chapter. In the description of the false teachers he makes, 1 A comparison of the like betwixt the false teachers and those that were false prophets among the people of Israel, partly that he might join together this discourse with the former, where he spake of true Prophets; and partly that he might meet with the scandal which might arise by such seducers; and partly that he might stir up the faithful so much the more, to beware of their seducing. In the first respect, the last words of the former

Chapter, and the first of this Chapter, make such a discreet axiom as this; although there were many Prophets among the People of Israel, that were holy men of God, and were moved by the Spirit of God in those things that they spake; yet among the same people also there were many false Prophets. This discretion is shown in these words: But there were. In the second respect these words make a copulate axiom thus: Like as there were false Prophets among the People of Israel, so also shall there be false teachers among you. In the third respect there is intimated and implicitly contained such a connex axiom as this: If there shall be false teachers among you, like as there were false Prophets among the people of Israel, then must you be alike careful to beware of these, as the Israelites were warned heretofore to beware of them. After that description which is made by way of comparison, follows an absolute description; wherein the false teachers are described by their effects. Which effects have either an immediate reference unto the false teachers themselves, or unto others by them. Those that have reference unto the false teachers themselves, are 1 The bringing in of heresies, which are set forth by their adjunct, that they are damnable, whereof he gives a reason also, taken from the nature of heresies, which is said to be such, that it brings in a denying of the Lord. 2. The second effect is, that they bring upon themselves swift destruction. In respect of others the first effect is, that they shall have many followers, who are pointed out by another effect accompanying this seducing, namely, a speaking evil of the truth, or of the Gospel, which shall come to pass by their means. The other effect is the abuse of those whom they do seduce for gain; which abuse is set forth by the helping cause, namely by feigned words.

The Doctrines arising hereence.

Doct. 1. There are always false prophets and false teachers in the Church.

This is gathered from these words: there were, there shall be.

Reason. This comes to pass in a threefold respect, 1 in respect of God. 2. In respect of the Devil. 3. In respect of men. First, in respect of God, and that 1 that they which are approved in the Church may be made manifest, 1 Cor. 11. 19. Deut. 13. 3. 2. That the obstinate wicked may perish in their ungodliness and cruelty, 2^a Thess. 2. 10, 11, 12. 1 Kings 22. 20, 21, 22. Secondly, in respect of the Devil, because he is always the father of lies, and a murderer, and that envious one, which soweth tares among the good seed. Thirdly, In respect of men, because the wisdom of the flesh is enmity against God and his truth.

The use hereof according to the Apostles intention is twofold:

Use 1. To admonish us, not to be offended, nor to be too much troubled in mind, when we see heresies to arise in the Church, but to say as the Apostle did, There were, there shall be.

2. To instruct us, not to believe every spirit, but to try whether they are of God, 1 John 4. 1.

Doct. 2. Every heresy hath damnation joined with it.

This is gathered from these words: damnable heresies. Some are more damnable then others, yet all do in their nature tend to damnation. For all are contrary unto the way of truth, whereof mention is made, verse 2. which way alone leads unto life. But there are some heresies which can by no means consist with salvation or eternal life. Hereupon such opinions are by a kind of appropriation called heresies in the Church, that is, opinions altogether damnable. For there is a difference to be observed betwixt things rashly spoken, bare errors in faith, and heresies properly so called. In the heresies themselves also we must distinguish betwixt the materiality, and the formality of it. For to make a formal heresy, for which a man is properly called an heretic, there is required besides an error in those things that pertain unto the fundamentals of religion, a reluctance against the clear light, and obstinacy in that reluctance.

Use. This may serve to condemn those that under the name of peace and charity, make so little reckoning of the bringing in of heresies into the Church. They would have all things received in and tolerated; which is all one, as if they would for peace and charity admit of damnation it self. For heresies have damnation joined with it.

2. To admonish us, 1. to take diligent heed that we do not by any means further such heresies. 2. Not rashly or for a light cause to pronounce any man an heretic. 3. As carefully to beware of heresies, as we should of damnation.

Quest. In the reason which is here given of this property of heresies, that they are damnable, a question is moved, What is meant by denying the Lord? denying the Lord that bought them. For many gather from this place, that all and every particular man were redeemed by Christ, because it is here said that he bought even those wicked heretics: but it may be answered divers ways.

Ans. 1. That these false teachers were members of the visible Church, and therefore, 1. they accounted themselves such as were redeemed by Christ, and made show of that profession. 2. Men were to account them such, as long as they continued in the Church; and in this respect they may be said to be such as were redeemed by Christ; like as the Apostles are wont to call whole Churches justified, sanctified, and elect. There is not the same reason therefore of all and every particular man, as there was of these.

Ans. 2. He doth not here speak of Christ properly, as he is Redeemer, nor of the redemption of his blood, but of that right, whereby masters challenge their servants, as having bought them; which may be thus shown: 1. Here is no mention of Christ as being Lord properly, but Master. For in the Greek it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, which is properly, a Master in respect of a servant, not 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Lord. And these two names are clearly distinguished, Jude v. 4. where the same thing is spoken of the same false teachers: there they are said to deny their Dominum & herum Lord and master; although he may be called their Herus, Master, he is not properly called their Dominus, Lord. Then again, the Lord is not said to have redeemed all men, but only to have bought them: now although the word 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, to buy, be sometimes used in the same sense that the other is, yet it is not always so.

Ans. 3. The comparison here is plainly made betwixt the false teachers and the false Prophets, bewixt the visible Church and the people of Israel; for the Lord is said to have bought those men in the same sense, that he is said to have redeemed and delivered all the people of Israel; that is, as he delivered them out of Egypt, and challenged them to himself in a peculiar manner, that by a solemn covenant they should be his servants; so also all those that give their names unto the Church, he may in this respect be said to have bought▪ as a Master, that they should serve him forever. To deny the Lord is, not to acknowledge God or Christ for the Lord, Matth. 10. 32, 33. to confess and to deny are made contrary one to another, Luke 12. 8, 9. The reason is, because it hath once professed the name of the Lord, and afterwards departs from that profession▪ it is all one as if he did plainly say, that he would no longer be a servant of that Lord. For this denying is twofold, either▪ verbal or real. A verbal denying was in Peter, a real denying is in all those that after they have made profession of the faith▪ return unto a profane life, 1 Tim. 5. 8. 2 Tim. 3. 5. The denying in this place is properly meant of a real denying. For the description of these men doth rather express their profane courses, then their open renouncing of Christ.

Doct. 3. It is a damnable impiety to deny Christ either in word or deed.

Reason 1. Because by this means Christ is greatly dishonored; for men, our lusts, and Satan himself are preferred before him, Mark 8. 38. where the indignity of this sin is shown, that an adulterous and sinful generation is preferred before Christ. Christ also by this means is accused of iniquity: for no servant usually goeth away from his master, if he confesseth him to be a just master; therefore this going away is as it were a professing that he doth accuse that master from whom he goes of some iniquity. Hereupon was that contesting of the Lord against his rebellious people▪ that he was a just and right master, neither did he give them any cause to depart from him, Ier. 2 5. Mich. 6. 3. Deut. 32. 4.

2. Because Christ threatened a most heavy judgment against this sin, when he saith that he will deny those men; that he will be ashamed of them before God and his Angels, Mark 8. 38.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn, not only the manifest Apostates, but also all those, that with the profession of godliness join a profane life, or turn aside from that profession. The sin of these men is more grievous, then of Turks and Infidels, that never gave their names unto Christ; for the nearer any man cometh unto God, the more doth he dishonor his name, if he doth fall back again. He that hath in some sort forsaken Satan, and given himself up unto God, and afterward forsakes God again, and gives himself up unto Satan, seems to have known both masters, and advisedly to pronounce that he is the better, whose servant he would rather be, that is, Satan.

2. To admonish us, 1. Carefully to beware, not only of the damnable sin it self, but also of all appearance, and every degree of it, and every occasion that might lead us thereunto. 2. If in any respect we have turned towards such like abomination, to recall ourselves betimes, and seriously to bewail our offense, like as Peter did after his denying of Christ, Matth. 26. 75.

Doct. 4. It is the nature of such sins to bring destruction upon men.

This is gathered from these words; bring upon themselves destruction.

Reason. Because sin in respect of the guilt that is joined with it, hath a kind of power whereby it draws all evil; like as faith and prayers obtain every good gift from God. Hence is it, that our sins are said to cry for vengeance; and also to draw punishment unto it as it were with strong cords, Isaiah 5. 18. For while men draw sin with such-like cords, they do also draw the punishment of sin, which is joined unto it.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, in this respect to beware of sin.

2. To exhort us, by faith, repentance, and prayers, to turn away that destruction from us, which our sins would bring upon us.

Doct. 5. The destruction which hangs over the heads of grievous offenders will come swiftly.

This is gathered from these words; swift destruction.

Doct. 6. Men are wonderfully prone to embrace errors.

This is gathered from these words; And many shall follow.

Reason 1. By reason of that darkness, which hath taken hold of men's minds; thereupon they may be easily drawn under any show or glimpse of light.

2. By reason of that disposition which they have, alien from the truth; thereupon they easily embrace those things that are contrary to this truth.

3. By reason of that disposition which they have, agreeing with the nature of errors. For sinners have in themselves the seeds, of all sins, errors and heresies; so that the nature of corrupt man doth as easily receive errors, as the tinder fire.

4. By reason of the just judgment of God, whereby for the punishment of other sins they are given over to the power of errors, 2 Thess. 2. 10.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, to show the corruption and wretchedness of our nature, how hardly are we brought to embrace the heavenly and saving truth, when we are carried headlong unto damnable errors.

2. To admonish us, that it should not be an offense unto us, if we see many given unto errors; because this was foretold us by the Apostle, and it hath a manifest reason; so that it is not to be wondered at, that many are given unto errors, but that rather, that any one doth believe the truth.

3. To exhort us, 1 Unto humiliation, in respect of this proneness unto error, 2 To care and circumspection that we be not overpowered by it. And an Argument whereby we may and should be stirred up unto this care, we have in the text, whiles they which follow heresies and heretics, are said to follow their destruction. For not only the authors of heresies run unto destruction, but also their followers, as in the place of the Thess. before cited. In those which perish, so that it is a sign of destruction, to be seduced by heretics.

Doct. 7. The fruit of errors and heresies is speaking evil of the way of truth.

This is gathered from these words, By reason of whom the way of truth shall be evil spoken of. By the way of truth is meant the Gospel, or the will of God revealed in the Scripture, which shows the true way of salvation. It is said to be evil spoken of, when the dignity thereof is violated, most properly by reproachful words. It is said to be evil spoken of by them, namely, by the authors of the heresies and their followers, in a twofold respect, 1. When they themselves speak reproachfully of it, as the Scribes and Pharisees did of Christ. 2. While they give others occasion to speak reproachfully of it, as the Jews did unto the Gentiles, Rom. 2. 24. both respects seem to be meant here by these, for the Greek word 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 signifies per & propter, by, and by reason of.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, to judge aright of the nature of sin, that never stays till it hath brought men to blasphemy against God, and to speak evil of the way of God.

2. To admonish us, 1. For this cause to withstand the beginnings of sin, lest at length we be brought also to blasphemy against the holy Ghost, which Christ saith is a sin that shall never be forgiven. 2. To beware also of those men, that durst openly speak evil of the truth; amongst the number of whom they are to be put, that dare mock and scoff at the name of predestination and the predestinate.

Doct. 8. They which propagate errors under fair pretence, do often times seek their own gain.

This is gathered from these words; through covetousness with feigned words: Covetousness is commonly the companion of heresies, oftentimes the mother, very often the Nurse of them, as we may see in the Papists.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, 1. Not to believe men's feigned words. 2. To beware of covetousness, which is the root, as of all evils, so also of heresies.

Doct. 9. Miserable is the condition of those men that are seduced by heretics; for they are sold like beasts and cattle.

This is gathered from these words, they shall make merchandize of you.

Verse 3. at the end. Whose judgment now of a long time lingreth not, and their damnation slumbereth not.

The Analysis.

Hitherto we have seen the description of false teachers, and their sins; now follows their reproof, or the punishment for their sins, that shall certainly befall them. •his punishment is set forth, 1. Metonymically, by the cause, in that it is called judgment. 2. By the effect, in that it is called damnation. 3. By the adjunct of swiftness and speed, which is shown by the negation of those things that are opposed unto swiftness. Now in general, lingering or slowness is opposed thereunto; in special, slumbering, which is put as a species of idleness or slackness. This swiftness of the punishment that shall befall them, is set forth by the adjunct of time, that it did not now first of all begin to make hast, but now of a long time.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. The punishment of sin follows after sin.

This is gathered from the connection of these words with the words foregoing: there was the description of sin; and here presently follows the threatening of punishment.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, never to think of sin, but to adjoin also the consideration of the punishment, which is joined unto sin.

Doct. 2. This punishment proceeds from the just judgment of God, for that it is here called judgment.

For God as judge of all the earth, pronounceth sentence upon men for their sins, and the execution of that sentence is called punishment. Now he pronounceth sentence according to right and a most holy law, and therefore the punishment which God inflicteth is in a proper sense called judgment.

Use 1. This may serve to refute, 1 profane men, which think that those evils that men suffer, both public and private, come by chance. 2. Those that are wont to complain of the evils which they suffer, as if God did deal unjustly with them, Gen. 18. 25. Deut. 32. 4.

2. To admonish us, continually to walk in the fear of the Lord, because we live in his fight, that exerciseth judgment.

Doct. 3. This judgment of God brings damnation upon sinners, that is, a privation of all good, which pertains unto the happiness or well-being of man, and the sense of all misery; which makes that very being bitter and unpleasant.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, with fear to fly away from sin, and to seek the face of God.

Doct. 4. This damnation comes swiftly upon sinners.

Reason 1. Because it comes long before their expectation of it.

2. Because it is not deferred beyond the time which is most fit, and appointed by God, and in that respect it is said not to linger.

3. Because no impediment can hinder it, but it is deferred through God's mercy and longsuffering; in that respect it is said not to slumber, because slumbring and sleep binds the mind, and hinders the actions.

4. Because now of a long time before, way is made and prepared for this damnation.

5. Because the damnation it self, although the wicked oftentimes are not sensible of it, yet it takes hold of them, and spiritually worketh in their minds and consciences.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that give themselves wholly unto sin, either because they think that punishment cometh flowly, or else because they hope to escape unpunished, Eccl's. 8. 10, 11, 12.

2. To admonish us, to make haste to repent of our sins, not to linger nor slumber.

Doct. 5. In all those things which pertain unto judgment against sinners, like as in all other things, God doth nothing rashly, but foreseeth, premeditateth, and prepareth all things.

This is gathered from the adjunct of time, Now of a long time. So Jude v. 4.

Verse 4. For if God spared not the Angels that sinned, but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into chains of darkness to be reserved unto judgment.

The Analysis.

Now the Apostle proves that which he had before laid down concerning the punishment that should befall false teachers. The conclusion of this arguing is, 1 In general propounded of all the wicked, v. 9. For there is the consequent part of that connex axiom, the antecedent whereof begins v. 4. and is shown by the connection If, as, If God spared not the Angels, &c. Then afterwards in special, of these false teachers themselves and their followers, v. 10. In the general conclusion, v. 9. he doth not barely set down the condemnation of the wicked, but also by a copulate axiom joins together with it, the deliverance of the godly from that temptation, which ariseth unto them by means of the wicked. And the reason is, because the Apostles purpose was, so to reprove the wicked, that he might in the mean time comfort the godly, and strengthen them against all the temptations, whereunto they were obnoxious by means of the wicked. In the antecedent part of this arguing he sets down three arguments, which are as so many examples & judgments of God against the wicked; & they may make three syllogismes to prove one and the same conclusion. The first example is of the Angels that fell, v. 4. The second is of the old world, v. 5. The third is of Sodom and Gomorrhah. The syllogismes are knit together, after this manner: If God spared not the Angels, nor the old world, nor Sodom and Gomorrhah; then he will not spare these false teachers; nor the like wicked men; But the former is true, by the testimony of Scripture, Therefore, &c. These examples in respect of the general conclusion, which is set down, v. 9. are as species unto their genus. But in respect of the special conclusion w^{ch} is set down, v. 10. they are as comparata, partly alike, partly greater. That wherein they are alike, consists therein, as God condemned those sinners so also will he condemn these. Their inequality therein; if God spared not his most excellent creatures, the Angels, nor the old world, nor those cities; then much less will he spare these false teachers.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. The judgments of God which he hath executed from the beginning of the world were ordained to be examples for us.

This is evidently gathered from all this arguing of the Apostle, and it is plainly taught us, verse 6. So 1 Cor. 10. 6. they are called types, that is, ensamples; which appears also by verse. 11. which sense of the words Beza and others have missed.

Reason. The reason of this truth is God's unchangeable nature and constant justice, whereby he is always like himself, not only inwardly and in himself, but also outwardly towards us in the dispensation of his punishments and rewards, if we look to the substance of God. Hence is it, that by this argument the godly are both confirmed in their hope, Isaiah 59. 1. & 9. 9. 10. and assured of the destruction of all their enemies, and of all those that give themselves over unto impiety.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, so to read the sacred History, not as we read profane histories and fables, either for delight, or to be informed only in the knowledge of the times, or in things that have been done; but always to observe God's warnings and apply them unto our own use.

2. To admonish us, not to deceive ourselves, as if we had a privilege to sin above other men, or as if God would not deal so severely with us, if we should continue in our sins, as he did heretofore with those whom he destroyed: * Other men's harms should teach us to beware of the like sins. In the first example we have, first, The object of God's judgment, The Angels that sinned. Secondly, the manner how he dealt with them, If he spared them not. Thirdly, the degree of this judgment, present, and to come: present, that they were adjudged unto damnation; and to come, that they were to be reserved unto judgment. The fin of the Angels is not particularly set down in the Scriptures, because it doth not so much pertain to our edification and salvation, to know their sin, as it doth to know our own sins. But in general we are taught, that they kept not their first estate. Jude v. 6. that is, they left that estate wherein God had placed them, and afterwards exercised envy, lying, murder towards men. We are taught also that the number of those that fell was great; thence it is that the Apostle here speaks in the plural number. They are said to have been cast down to hell, 1. By reason of the change of their estate, because from that wonderful high condition, which they had received by creation, they were cast down to the lowest of all. 2. By reason of the change of their place, because from the place of bliss, where they were round about the throne of God with the other Angels, they were thrust down into a lower place fit for sin and misery: But that this place is in the lowest parts of the earth, as the Papists would have it, it cannot be shown out of the Scriptures, but rather the contrary: for they are said to be in the air, and to rule there, and to go about the earth seeking to devour men. This at least is plain out of the Scripture, and it should suffice such as are not over-curious: 1. That they suffer a great change of estate. 2. That they are excluded from their first habitation. 3. That they are in that place, where they receive poenam damni & sensus, the punishment of loss, and the punishment also of sense. They are said to be delivered into darkness, partly in respect of sin, partly in respect of misery: for both are signified by darkness in the Scriptures. They are said to be delivered into chains, by a metaphor taken from malefactors that are condemned, who are kept in prison bound with chains. Now these chains are, 1 A hardening in their sins. 2 A despair of all deliverance. 3 A fearful looking for that misery whereof mention is made, Heb. 10. 27. 4. The providence of God which always watcheth over them, to keep and punish them. They are said to be reserved unto judgment, because they are bound so fast with these evils, that they can never escape; and yet these are but the beginnings of the evils, which they must farther undergo.

Doct. 2. There is no dignity that can exempt a sinner from the judgment of God.

This is gathered from the nature of the Angels.

Reason. Because dignity doth not lessen the sin, but aggravate it. For he that hath received much, owes much, and of him much is required.

Use. This may serve for admonition, that men should not trust to such staffes of reed.

Doct. 3. That severity is due unto sin, that sinners should not be spared.

This is gathered from these words, He spared not.

Reason 1. Because sinners always abuse the goodness of God.

2. They spare not the glory of God, but themselves.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, to ascribe it unto the grace and mercy of God, that he hath hitherto spared us.

2. To exhort us, not to contemn this longsuffering of God, but thereby to be led unto repentance, Rom. 2. 4.

Doct. 4. By sin a sinner is cast down from the place and condition which he had before.

This is gathered from these words; cast down to hell.

Reason. Because sin is an aversion from God. Now as the communion which we have with God, makes us to ascend into a high condition, even into Heaven it self, so that our conversation is in heaven, as it is Phil. 3. 20. So also aversion from him makes us to descend, even until we come unto hell it self.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to trust the devil, nor our own imaginations, as if we could ever attain any good by sinning. For so our first parents were deceived, when they thought to make themselves like unto God by sin, they were made like unto the devil.

Doct. 5. The darkness of misery follows the darkness of sin.

This gathered from these words; delivered them into chains of darkness.

Reason. Because the light is the same, whereby we are directed, and whereby we are perfected; therefore the privation of perfection and happiness follows the privation of direction.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, always to walk in the light, as children of the light, if we desire to avoid utter darkness.

Doct. 6. Sinners are held in sin and in their misery, as it were with bonds.

This is gathered from that: Chaines.

Reason. Because the sins themselves are the snares of the devil, 2 Tim. 2. last. Lam. 1. 14. There are other reasons given of this thing in the Analysis.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, betimes to pray for deliverance from our sins, which then we shall obtain, when we do fly unto Christ, who gives deliverance unto the Captives, Luke 4. 18.

Doct. 7. The extremist punishment of sinners is deferred unto the last judgment of God.

Use. This may serve for instruction, that no man should please himself therein, that he suffers afflictions in this world, as if therefore he should escape free in the world to come, which is the miserable comfort of some men.

Verse 5. And spared not the old world, but saved Noah, the eighth person, a Preacher of righteousness, bringing in the flood upon the world of the ungodly.

The Analysis.

The second and third example of God's justice towards sinners are not barely propounded, as the first was, but are illustrated by different examples, or by examples of God's mercy, which he shown towards the godly, while he destroyed the wicked. The reason is, that both parts of the conclusion, which is set down, verse 9. might be fitly inferred; where the deliverance of the godly is joined together with the destruction of the wicked. In the former of these examples is set down, 1 The object of God's justice, materially, the old world, which is more formally explained by the adjunct of impiety, whence it is called the world of the ungodly. 2. This justice is also illustrated by the instrument thereof, namely, the bringing in of the flood upon the world of the ungodly. The object of God's mercy is made to be Noah with his family: who are described, 1 By their small number, wherein his family was contained, which is said to be eight. This Peter shows, 1 Epist. c. 3. v. 20. 2 By the effect, that he was a Preacher of righteousness. For the office or duty is not here commended, but the act or exercise of this duty. For the duty was common to him with many mor•, but the exercise of it was proper unto himself.

The Doctrines arising here-hence.

Doct. 1. The multitude of those that sin doth not hinder God's justice from executing his judgments upon them for their sins.

This is gathered from this; He spared not the whole world. For as it was with dignity in the Angels, so it is also with the multitude now in the world.

Reason 1. Because the multitude doth not lessen, but rather increase the guilt of sin, and more fill up the measure thereof, as it is in the Proverb, Qui peccat exemplo, bis peccat, he that sins with example, sins twice: So he that sins with many examples, sins often times, if the thing be rightly considered. As if a man should see another fall in a slippery way, and not take the more heed unto himself therein, but fall into the same place and after the same manner, he is much more taxed by men, then if he had fallen alone, or first of all: so is it also in these.

2. Because the multitude which seemeth unto us a great thing, as if it could withstand God's anger, is before God like unto water, that falls from a bucket.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to follow a multitude to do evil. And so much the more necessary is this admonition, because we are all too prone to go in the way of the multitude; which fault also we seem to commit with some reason.

1. Because that we presume that many eyes see more then one, whence it is that the voice of the people is often taken for the voice of God.

2. Because the labor of examination seems too difficult, and almost impossible.

3. Because that which all men do, usually goes unpunished among men, and we conceive the like thing of God.

4. Because he that doth not follow the multitude, shall gain a multitude of enemies, and such as hate him.

But the contrary reason, which is of greater value then all those is that of Christ, Matth. 7. 13. Broad is the way that leadeth to destruction, and many there be which go in thereat. To the first reason or object on we answer; that one eye of a man that seeth, perceives more then a thousand blind eyes. The world or the multitude of the world is blinded; therefore one Christian which hath the eye of his mind enlightened by the Spirit, and follows the light of God's word, can see more then a great multitude of others. To the second we answer, that the duty of examination lies upon all and everyone. And they had need to do it, not only as they are Christians, and as Christ commands them, to prove all things, and hold fast that which is good, but also as they are men: for it is not a human, but a brutish thing to follow the multitude of those that go before, without judgment. To the third we answer, that the ways of God are not as the ways of men: Men wink at many, either out of ignorance, or impotency, or for fear, and the like imperfections which are not incident to God. To the fourth we answer, If God be with us, who can be against us?

Doct. 2. The creatures which are most necessary and profitable unto us, by sin are made our enemies and hurtful unto us.

This is gathered from the flood of waters, that destroyed the old world. Now nothing is more necessary and profitable unto us then water.

Reason. Because the creatures are the servants and host of God, and therefore they depend upon his will, and pleasure, and command both for war and peace, Hos. 2. 18.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, so much the more to beware of sin.

2. To instruct us, if we would have any true comfort from the creatures, to lay the foundation thereof in our reconciliation with God.

Doct. 3. God in the midst of judgment towards the ungodly, is merciful towards the godly.

This is gathered therehence, that when he destroyed the world, he saved Noah.

Reason. Because God doth not execute judgment according to the fierceness of his anger or fury, as men oftentimes use to do, but according to the counsel of his most perfect wisdom.

Use. 1. This may serve to instruct us, not to ascribe those things unto fortune or chance, which happen unto us or others in this kind.

2. To comfort us, because in a world of all dangers and judgments, we may fly unto the mercy of God.

Doct. 4. There are wont to be but a few godly men in the world.

This is gathered therehence, that Noah is called the eighth of the godly, or rather he may be called the seventh, because Cham was cursed.

Reason 1. In respect of God, because he gives this grace but unto a few, that his goodness and mercy towards them may appear the more abundant.

2. In respect of the second causes, and of the nature of the thing it self, because that which is most difficult, and of the greatest care and perfection, is not wont to be found but in few. The gifts of nature are common unto all; of art and industry to fewer, but the gifts of grace to fewest of all. There are more good Tailors then good Physicians, and more good Physicians then good Kings. So that that hath the greatest perfection, which is given but to a few.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to be so much the more diligent to make our election and calling sure.

2. To exhort us, to give God thanks, that he hath made us partakers of that happiness, which he grants but to a few.

Doct. 5. All the godly, that will be made partakers of God's mercy, must be preachers of righteousness, as Noah was.

Now righteousness is preached not only in words, but also in deeds. For so it is wont to be said, The thing it self speaketh, • or the tongue only, Phil. 2. 15, 16.

Reason. Because no man can escape the revenging justice of God, unless he labor to follow and advance the righteousness that is prescribed by him.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn and reprove those, that are rather Preachers of unrighteousness, then of righteousness.

2. To exhort us, more and more to stir up ourselves to have a care of this duty.

Verse 6. And turning the Cities of Sodom and Gomorrhah into ashes, condemned them with an overthrow, making them an ensample unto those that after should live ungodly.

Verse 7. And delivered just Lot, vexed with the filthy conversation of the wicked:

Verse 8. (For that righteous man dwelling among them, in seeing and hearing, vexed his righteous soul from day today, with their unlawful deeds.)

The Analysis.

IN these verses is contained the third example, which is divided after the same manner, as the second was. For here he speaks of the judgment of God upon the wicked, and his mercy towards the godly. The object of his judgment are the Cities of Sodom and Gomorrhah; the manner is, by fire, which is intimated in these words, turned into ashes. The degree is, in their utter overthrow; the end and use is, to warn those that should after live ungodly. For such judgments are ensamples not of a wicked life, but of the condemnation that hangs over the heads of those that live ungodly; and so they are ensamples to move men, not to do the like; but to take heed lest if they do after the like manner, they suffer also after the like manner.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. No society of men or policy can hinder the judgment of God, which he will bring upon them for their sins.

For as in the first example there was the dignity of the Angels, in the second the multitude of men, so also in this place society and policy; and Cities that were so noble, Sodom and Gomorrhah. For they were Cities that were brought into government, they had Kings, Gen. 14 2. This Doctrine is propounded, and proved, Prov. 11 21. & in 16. 5. it is repeated.

Reason. Because the guilt of sin is not lessened, but increased by means of societies, if they favor sins: for they pervert the end whereunto they were ordained. For whereas the end of all societies is to restrain sin, and to advance righteousness, 1 Tim. 2. 2. and they on the contrary cherish sin and impugn righteousness, they do provoke the anger of God more, then if they were not such societies. The sin of these Cities is said to be grievous, and crying, Gen. 18. 20.

This may serve for admonition, that Citizens or Magistrates should not trust too much to their wealth, so that thereby they should be made the more bold to sin.

Doct. 2. The same judgments of God are executed by contrary causes.

This is gathered therehence, that whereas the old world was destroyed by water, those Cities were overthrown by fire.

Use. This may serve for admonition, that sinners should not therefore think themselves safe, because they have escaped one judgment; for when they are farthest off from one evil, another is ready to fall upon them, Amos 5. 19.

Doct. 3. Extreame judgments follow extreme sins.

This is gathered therehence, that this was an utter overthrow, because that these Cities had filled up the measure of their sins.

Reason. The reason is taken from the proportion, that is betwixt sin and the punishment of sin.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, if we cannot altogether avoid sin, yet with fear and trembling to shun the progress and continuance in sin.

Doct. 4. They that are unto others examples of sin, shall be also unto them examples of punishment.

This is gathered from these words: Making them an ensample.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, so much the more to take heed, that we give no scandal unto others, or to be an example in sin.

2. To exhort us to increase in godliness by the examples of God's judgments upon sinners. For that is the use and end of them, Amos 4 12.

The other part of the Analysis.

The object of mercy is Lot, who is described, 1 By the adjunct, that he was righteous. 2 By the effect, that his soul was vexed with the wickedness of the ungodly, which is more largely set forth, v. 8. 1 By the internal cause, which was his righteousness. 2 By the external cause, which was their ungodliness. 3 By the means, whereby the external cause or the object did work that effect. And they were the senses of hearing and seeing. 4 By the occasion, which was his dwelling amongst them. 5 By the adjunct of time, which was continually. 6 By the degree, which was the highest, as if he had been put upon the rack; he vexed, in Greek it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , tormented.

Besides those that are common unto Lot with the example of Noah, there are these Doctrines to be observed.

Doct. 1. Men are accounted righteous or unrighteous in the sight of God, not so much for someone deed, as for the whole course of their life.

This is gathered therehence, that Lot is here called righteous, who notwithstanding is spoken of in the Scripture to have committed a most heinous sin. For those that are said to be righteous in the Scriptures, are so called, either in respect of the imputation of Christ's righteousness, or in respect of some particular cause wherein they show themselves righteous, or in respect of that inherent righteousness, which, though it be imperfect, yet is it sincere and pleasing unto God.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Papists and others, who as soon as they read that any one is called righteous in the Scriptures, presently conclude that a man may fulfill the whole law, and stand upon his own merits before God.

2. To comfort the godly, who sometimes fall through infirmity. For if they continually labor to please God, God in mercy accounts them righteous.

Doct. 2. There are sometimes righteous men found in the midst of the ungodly.

This is gathered therehence, that righteous Lot dwelt amongst the Sodomites.

Use 1. This may serve to refute those, that when they sin put the fault upon others with whom they live, as if they could not be godly because others are wicked.

2. To exhort us, to strengthen our minds against the wickedness of the age, and places, or men, amongst whom we live. For like as that servant deserves well of his Master, that sticks close unto him, when all others forsake him; so also are they most acceptable unto God, that adhere unto him, when all others not only forsake him, but also are against him; so did Noah, Gen. 6. 8, 9.

Doct. 3. Those that are righteous, even whiles they live amongst the ungodly, are grieved for their impiety.

This is gathered therehence, that Lot vexed, &c. So Psal. 119. 158 Acts 17. 16.

Reason. Because when godly men do most of all desire, and take care for to advance the glory of God and the salvation of others, they cannot but be grieved, when they see no reckoning made of either.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that take delight in no company so much as in the company of the ungodly. 2. Those that are not sorry for their own sins, much less for others.

2. To instruct us, to judge of ourselves hereby, in that conversation which we have with wicked men. For if we are thus wrought upon, when we see it, then it is a sign of a good conscience.

Verse 9. The Lord knoweth how to deliver the godly out of temptations, and to reserve the unjust unto the day of judgment to be punished, or suffering punishment.

The Analysis.

THIS is the general conclusion, the premisses whereof the former examples make up, and it is disposed in a copulate axiom, the former part whereof is of the mercy of God, and the latter of his justice. Where we may take notice of the reason of this order, which may be twofold. 1 Because in the premisses he had spoken of mercy in the last place; therefore that the connection might be evident, he puts it first in the Conclusion; and because he intends to speak more at large of the wicked afterwards, therefore he mentions God's justice towards them in the last place. 2. The Apostle doth first of all conclude the mercy of God towards the godly, because it was his primary intent and purpose to comfort and strengthen the godly. The object of God's mercy is the godly. The act and effect thereof is, to deliver them from temptation. The object of his justice is the wicked. The act and effect thereof is, to reserve them unto the day of judgment. Where he adds the manner how they shall be reserved, namely so, that they shall in the mean time suffer punishment. The cause and reason of these acts and effects, as well of his mercy as his justice, is the wisdom of God, or his knowledge joined together with his will; as that first word intimates unto us, The Lord knoweth.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. We have need of divers arguments to confirm our faith touching the mercy and justice of God.

This is gathered therehence, that the Apostle was so careful to conclude this, and by so many arguments.

Reason 1. Because faith is not, as knowledge and sense is, to have such a full and evident assurance, as excludes all manner of doubting, but it hath some obscurity in the object, and so admits of divers doubtings, which must be removed by such-like arguments.

2. The imperfection of our faith, which must be helped by these means.

3. The multitude of objections and temptations, which fight against this faith.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove the security and presumption of those, that feel no want in this kind.

2. To admonish us, to use all diligence, and to search out all the arguments that may be, to edify ourselves in this faith.

Doct. 2. They that are truly righteous, so that they are vessels of the mercy of God, are also godly.

This is gathered therehence, that here they are called godly, who before in the example of Noah and Lot, were called righteous.

Reason. Because no righteousness can be pleasing unto God, which is not referred unto him and his honor; now this is done no other way, but by piety.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to rest or please ourselves in any righteousness, that is separated from true piety towards God.

Doct. 3. The sting of every evil of punishment, whereunto men are obnoxious in this life, is temptation.

This is gathered therehence, that deliverance from temptation is here put for deliverance from all evil.

Reason. Because the afflictions or miseries of this life become hurtful unto us only by that means, and as they are in us occasions or motives unto sin. For that is the nature of temptation, whereof mention is here made, to induce men unto sin.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to beware of the temptation that is in the evil, more then of the evils themselves.

2. To instruct us, to judge aright of the mercy of God towards the godly; for although they are not presently delivered from the afflictions themselves, yet if they be delivered from the temptation of them, they have great experience of God's mercy towards them.

Doct. 4. God doth very well know how to perform all those things that he hath either promised to the godly, or threatened to the wicked.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to judge of the event of these things, or of the success of the godly or the wicked, according to those things that we see, but to refer all these things unto the knowledge and wisdom of God, resting upon the belief of those things which he hath promised.

Verse 10. But chiefly them that walk after the flesh in the lust of uncleanneſſe, and deſpiſe government: preſumptuous are they, ſelf-willed: they are not afraid to ſpeak evil of dignities.

The Analysis.

IN this verſe is contained the particular concluſion of the former arguing: becauſe he doth particularly apply unto the falſe teachers of that age, that which he had affirmed in general of the unjuſt, verſe 9. Therefore this particular concluſion is joined with the general, not by a bare copula, but by a gradation from the leſſe to the greater, as it is intimated in that firſt word, But chiefly: as if he had ſaid, that all the unjuſt ſhould indeed ſuffer puniſhment, but thoſe moſt certainly, and moſt heavily, that are ſuch as the falſe teachers are here deſcribed to be. Now they are deſcribed both in general, and in particular. In general the effect of their wicked walking, in thoſe words, them that walk. Of which effect, 1 he ſhows the principal cauſe, which is, the fleſh. 2 The adminiſtering, or next cauſe, which is the luſt of the fleſh, that is, the vicious motions and inclinations of corrupt nature: which is illuſtrated by the proper effect thereof, uncleanneſſe, becauſe the motions of the fleſh do ſpiritually defile the ſouls of men, ſo that it makes them polluted in the ſight of God. The particular deſcription is by a particular ſin, which is, a contempt of lawful authority: which ſin is illuſtrated by its effect, that is, that they do contemptuouſly reproach dignities; where he ſhows the manner of this effect which is adjoined, that they do it boldly and ſelf-willed.

The Doctrines ariſing here-hence.

Doct. 1. Although all ſinners may deſervedly fear the judgment of God, yet there are ſome that may more certainly expect the ſeverity of that judgment.

This is gathered from theſe words; But chiefly them.

Reason. By reaſon of that proportion which is kept betwixt the ſins and their puniſhments. Now they that may moſt certainly expect this ſeverity of judgment, are ſuch eſpecially, as are very much given unto thoſe ſins, whereby we read in the Scriptures that men have brought upon themſelves ſwift deſtruction.

Use. This may ſerve to admoniſh us, moſt of all to beware of thoſe ſins that do moſt haſten our damnation.

Doct. 2. There is no one ſin ſo heinous, as to walk in the ways of a ſinner.

This is gathered from theſe words; But chiefly them that walk.

Reason 1. Because the act of sin doth not so much condemn as the habit of sin; like as on the contrary, the habit of any virtue doth much more commend a man, then any particular act, though it be of great note.

2. Because he that walks in the way of sin, adds impenitency unto his sins; now impenitency doth condemn men more then any sin, because there is no way to escape the anger of God, but by repentance.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that please themselves therein, that they are not murderers, nor adulterers, nor robbers, &c. when in the mean time they walk in the way of other sins, who do either contemn the worship of God, or neglect faith, hope, and charity, and are altogether ignorant of the like virtues.

2. To admonish us, to take heed unto ourselves, by a timely and daily repentance, that we walk not in sins, though we cannot abstain from all sin. Sinners are not so much hateful unto God, as the workers of sin, and such as walk in it.

Doct. 3. There is in all men while they are in this world, some cause pricking and stirring them up unto so.

This is gathered therehence, that the flesh is here put as the beginning of all those sins, whereunto these wicked men were given. Now it is called the flesh, because it doth extend it self as largely as the flesh or body of man, being carnal: and so is in all and every particular man in common and without any exception. This is proved first Gol 5. 17. James 1. 14. Mat. 15. 19. Secondly, it is confirmed also by reason and experience, because when there is no outward object or persuasion that can induce us unto sin, yet we feel such little sparks arising in ourselves, that will set the whole man on fire, if they be not quenched betimes.

Use 1. This may serve for instruction, 1 To refute their dream, which imagine a perfection in this present life. 2 To refute the Papists, who say that concupiscence after Baptism is not formally a sin. For that which of its own nature produceth sin, must needs have the nature of sin. For quale effectum, talis causa, such as the effect is, such is the cause.

2. To admonish us, diligently to beware not only of outward provocations, that might lead us into temptation, but also of ourselves and our own hearts; for there lies our greatest danger.

Doct. 4. Sin doth not consist only in outward words and deeds, but also in the inward lusts and affections, which are contrary unto the law of God.

Reason 1. The first reason is taken out of the places of Scripture, wherein God is called a Spirit, and is said to look most unto the Spirit and heart of man.

2. The second is taken out of those places, where sins are said to come from the heart, For sin can come frō the heart no other way, but by the means of such vicious lusts of the flesh.

3. From the express words of God, Ger. 6. 5. & 8. 21.

4. The same is shown unto us by the contraries, because the inward affections of men, that are good, are very pleasing unto God: Therefore after the like manner evil affections and desires must needs displease him. The amplification of this truth may be taken therehence, that there is no sin properly in the outward words, and deeds, but as they depend upon the inward affection of the heart. For if it were otherwise, then a man might be compelled unto sin, which is altogether untrue, and contrary to common sense.

Use. This may serve to refute and condemn those, that take little or no care at all, about their thoughts or inward affections, so that they can any way excuse their outward words and deeds. 2. To admonish us, therefore to watch over our inward affections and thoughts. For this is the property of a true Christian. Those that are outside Christians, look only unto outward things; they that do inwardly and in heart fear God, are no less careful of their inward thoughts then they are of their outward words.

Doct. 5. Sins of this kind, like as all others also, do defile a man.

Some sins are said in a special manner to defile a man, namely such, as pertain unto the unlawful copulation of the flesh, and transgress the tenth Commandment.

Reas. Because they do in their nature also defile the body and person of a man. But all sins do also defile the soul of man, because they leave a blemish behind them, which makes the soul of the sinner deformed, and less pleasing unto God, Mat. 15. 20. This is it which was heretofore signified in the Ceremonial Law by all those uncleannesses separations, washings, and purgings, which are so frequently spoken of by Moses, This also is that, which is intimated unto us in Baptism.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that do not only take delight in their sins▪ but also seem to boast of them, as if they should glory in their own dung.

2. To admonish us, to learn hence more and more to abhor all sin, as a most filthy and detestable thing. Besides that general defiling which is common to all sin, the Apostle seems here to intimate that special defiling, which is in wantonness, as it appears by v. 14. & 18. But of this we shall have a fitter opportunity to speak afterwards.

Doct. 6. It is a most heinous sin to despise government, or the superior law full power.

This is confirmed, Rom. 13. 1, 2.

Reason 1. Because they which despise lawful power, despise the ordinance of God. It is the Apostles reason in the same place. For although God hath prescribed unto men no special form of government, yet he hath appointed, that there should be some certain kind of governing, and so approves of all power, which is not contrary unto nature, or unto his revealed will.

2. Because such a contempt is against the common good, and tends to the disturbance of human society.

3. Because it gives occasion to the overflowing of all other sins. For this is the reason why the authority of superiors is established in the first Commandment of the second Table, because if that be despised or neglected, all the other Commandments, not only of the second, but also of the first table, are quite destitute of those things that should strengthen them, as touching those means which men can use.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Anabaptists and those that tread in the steps of such heretics, whiles they maintain that the civil Magistrate is clean contrary to Christian religion.

2. To reprove those, that although they confess the power in words, yet in their deeds resist it, nor do they respect it farther then it makes for their lusts.

Doct. 7. The effect of contempt is, to reproach a man, and speak evil of him.

Reason. Because reproaches and contumelies come properly from pride, whereby a man thinks himself better then another. For otherwise he could not reproach another man, but the same reproach would fall upon himself also. Contempt is the daughter of pride, and the mother of such nephewes.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish all Christians, to abstain from reproachings and evil speakings. For there is none that dares affirm that it is lawful for him to despise his brother.

2. To admonish us, to beware of pride and the contempt of others, if we would not break forth into such sins, that are so unworthy of a Christian man.

Quest. Here ariseth a question, Whether we may not sometimes reprove the sins of men somewhat sharply?

Answ. That this is lawful is proved by the approved practice of the Prophets, Apostles, and of Christ himself also; but with these cautions. 1 That the sin which we reprove be manifest. 2 That the check be so directed, that it be done to the sin rather then to the man. 3. That there be together with it a manifestation of our charity. 4 That we be not moved unto this vehemency chiefly by our own private injuries, but by the zeal that we bear unto the glory of God and the salvation of others.

Doct. 8. Amongst those circumstances of sin, mentioned in the text, there is none whereby it is more aggravated, then stubborn boldness, and self-willednesse.

This is gathered from these words: Presumptuous, self-willed, &c.

Reason 1. Because they are tokens of a will sinning with full consent.

2. They are tokens of a seared conscience.

3. They are most contrary unto repentance.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that account it a great praise unto themselves, that they are bold to commit all kind of villanous acts: they neither fear men, nor God himself; as it is said of the unjust Judge in the Gospel.

2. To admonish us, although we cannot wholly abstain from all sin, yet to take heed that we do not please ourselves in any sin, nor to go on and persist stubbornly, and presumptuously in it.

Verse 11. Whereas Angels which are greater in power and might, bring not railing accusation against them before the Lord.

The Analysis.

THat the Apostle may aggravate that sin, which he had laid to charge of the false teachers in the former words he makes a comparison betwixt them and the Angels, such as is made, verse 9. and the 10. But in this comparison there is contained a twofold dis-similitude, namely, of their condition, and their actions. Their condition, because the Angels are high and mighty, but these men were of a low mean condition. Their actions, because the Angels abstained from speaking evil of dignities, but these men gave their minds unto it. The former dis-similitude is set forth by a kind of Inequality, of greater and lesser, because there is indeed a very great inequality, but this dis-similitude ariseth from the inequality. Both parts of the comparison are disposed in a discreet axiom as it were to this sense. Although the Angels do far exceed these dignities in power, yet they do not speak evil of them; but these men, although they be far inferior unto them in power, yet they fear not to speak evil of them.

Touching the former part of the comparison two questions may be made.

Quest. 1. In what sense the Angels are said to be greater in power and might?

Answer. The Angels are said to be greater in power and might, not so much in respect of the false teachers, as in respect of the dignities themselves, whereof the Apostle here speaks. And the reason is, not only because they are of a more excellent nature then men; but also because God hath set them over men, and commanded them to watch over Governments, Common-wealths, and consequently over dignities. Whence they are often called in Scripture Dominions, as Ephesians 1. 21.

Quest. 2. How this is true, that they do not bring railing accusation against dignities, when God himself sometimes speaks evil of them, and makes the Angels to execute his malediction?

Answer: They are said to abstain from speaking evil, 1 Because they do not speak evil, but when God commands them, and therefore it is not their malediction so much as God's. 2 Though they do speak evil of the men that are set in authority, and do evil also unto them sometimes, as we see in the example of Herod, and in the Host of Sennacherib, yet they do not speak evil of the dignities themselves, which was the sin of these impostors, of whom the Apostle speaks.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Their sin is the greater, who are of a lower condition, if they wax proud and despise dignities, then if they were set in a higher degree.

This is the ground of the Apostles comparison. For otherwise it would make nothing to the aggravation of the sin of these men.

Reason 1. Because his sin is the greater, that is drawn unto sin upon the lighter occasion or smaller temptation.

2. Because such men are not moved by those reasons, that might and should with-hold them from committing such a sin, which other men have not after the same manner.

Use. This may serve for condemnation, to condemn the fashion of some men of the lowest rank, who even in that condition of life are as proud, and more also sometimes, then they that are in the highest degree of dignity and honor.

Doct. 2. The Angels are greater in power then all men.

Use. This may serve for the comfort of the faithful, because God hath given the Angels a special charge over them, so that they are said to pitch their tents about them.

Doct. 3. These powerful Angels do most religiously abstain from all sin.

For what is here said in special, is to be understood also in general.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, therefore the more carefully to beware of sin; both because we are bound by the Law at least as well as they, and also because other wise we cannot have those good and powerful ministering Spirits to take care of us.

Verse 11. But these as natural brute beasts, made to be taken and destroyed, speak evil of the things that they understand not, and shall utterly perish in their own corruption.

The Analysis.

THE other part of the comparison is contained in this verse, wherein the sin of the false teachers despising and speaking evil of dignities, is aggravated by a new comparison of the like, so that in this verse there is both a showing of the dissimilitude, and also a whole similitude explained by its parts. The proposition of this similitude contains a description of natural brute beasts: the Apodosis contains a description of false teachers, according to those qualities which they have proportionably with those brute beasts. The description of the brute beasts contains three things: 1 Their inward nature, which is expressed by a negation, that they are void of reason, bruits. 2. Their acts or operations, which are said to proceed, not from counsel, but from nature, natural. 3 Their end and destruction, that they are taken and destroyed. To these there are three also answerable in false teachers: 1 That they are void of judgment, they understand not. 2 That they are carried with a naughty passion to speak evil, speak evil of the things that they understand not. 3 That they bring upon themselves destruction; they shall perish in their own corruption.

The Doctrine arising herehence.

Doct. 1. Sin, where it reigns, turns a man into a brute beast as it were.

This is shown in all those places of Scripture, where wicked men are compared unto brute beasts, either in general, or in special, to Horses, Mules, Dogs, Swine, Foxes, Wolves, Beates, Lions, &c. Yea, they that are in greatest honor and esteem in this world, are accounted no otherwise of by God, then as brute beasts. The Monarchs, in Daniel, are always compared unto wild beasts; and the Roman Emperors that persecuted the Church, are pointed out in the Apocalypse by the name of the Dragon. And the Pope is not only called a beast, but is described as a very great monster among the beasts, with seven heads, and ten horns.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that please themselves in their sins.

2. To admonish us, so much the more to beware of sin, lest at length with Nebuchadnezzar we be cast down from the greatest glory to the lowest condition of all.

Doct. 2. The fountain of all this sin and misery is the want of a right and spiritual judgment.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, diligently therefore to betake ourselves unto prayer, and other means, that are sanctified by God, for the enlightening of our mind, and keeping it sound.

Doct. 3. A sign of such a condition, that is, of a man turning to a brute beast, is, to follow the passions of corrupted nature, without reason.

Use. This may serve to convict and condemn many, that seem unto themselves to be excellent men.

Doct. 4. Such men do corrupt also whatsoever natural goodness they have in them.

This is gathered from this word, corruption, as it is explained, Jude v. 10.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, therefore to hate and detest such courses.

Doct. 5. Such sinners are entangled in their sins, and kept unto destruction, like as brute beasts in their snares, wherewith they are taken.

So 2 Tim. 2. 26. Lament. 1. 14.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to fly from all corruption, as we would from the snares of eternal death.

Verse 13. And shall receive the reward of unrighteousness, as they that count it pleasure to riot in the day time: spots they are and blemishes, sporting themselves with their own deceivings while they feast with you:

Verse 14. Having eyes full of adultery, and that cannot cease from sin, beguiling unstable souls; an heart they have exercised with covetous practices, cursed children.

The Analysis.

AFTER that description of these men, which was set down in the three fore-going verses, here in the beginning of this 13 verse, is again repeated that just punishment which they must expect. they shall receive the reward of unrighteousness. Then he makes a new description of the same men, that they might wax the more fierce if it were possible. And he describes them by three chief vices, 1 By the luxury, whereunto they gave their minds. 2 By then uncleanness, 3 By their covetousness. Their luxury is set forth and aggravated, 1 By the adjunct of pleasure. 2 By the adjunct of time, that it was in the day time. 3 By the effect, that they did by this means, as spots and blemishes, defile not only themselves, but also those with whom they were conversant. Of which effect also he shows the cause in another effect, that deceiving was joined with this luxury. Their uncleanness is described, 1 By the helping causes or instruments, in these words: Having eyes full of adultery. 2 By the adjunct of constancy, because they cannot cease from sin. 3 By the effect, beguiling unstable souls. Their covetousness is explained, 1 By the primary subject of it, in these words, the heart, there it was seated. 2 By the adjunct of custom, in these words, A heart ex-excised. Last of all, the end and sum of this description is expressed, that they are accursed children.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. When we think of the sins of wicked men, we should likewise think of their punishments.

This is gathered therehence, that the Apostle doth ever now and then put in this, while he speaks of these men's sins.

Reason. 1. Because these two are in God's purpose and their own nature knit together.

2. Because the consideration of sin doth oftentimes more hurt then good, if the consideration of the punishment be not joined unto it.

Use. This may serve to condemn those, that take delight only in the commemoration either of their own, or other men's sins.

Doct. 2. Profuse luxury is a sign of a man sinning securely.

This is gathered out of the text, and it is expressly set down, Jude v. 11.

Reason. Because such men do either not think at all of the judgments of God, or do labor at least to remove such thoughts out of their minds.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, not to account such men happy, as the multitude useth to do.

2. To admonish us, to beware of such excess.

Doct. 3. Luxury, the more it is shown openly, the more it is to be condemned.

This is gathered from that Epithet, in the day time.

Reason. Because it is so much the farther off from shame, and consequently from repentance.

Use. This may serve to condemn that impudence, which many men have gotten.

Doct. 4. There is the greatest danger in those sins, from which the greatest pleasure and delight ariseth.

Reason. Because pleasure is a sign of a perfect habit.

2. Because pleasure is very hardly left.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to beware of those delights which arise from sin.

Doct. 5. They that please themselves most in their sins, do most defile and contaminate both themselves and others.

This is gathered from these words, spots and blemishes, as it is also Jude v. 12.

Reas. Because the more any sin appears in the Church, the greater dishonor doth it bring, not only to the sinner himself, but also to the whole Church, whereof he is a member.

Doct. 6. The outward members also of wick•d men are full of wickedness•.

This is gathered therehence, Having eyes full, &c.

Reason 1. Because out of the abundance of the heart all our faculties, and all the instruments of operations receive impressions answerable unto the heart.

2. Because sin, or temptation unto sin is admitted into the heart it self by the outward senses, as by channels or gates; so that the eyes and such like corporeal instruments are filled two ways, both in the ingresse and the egress of sin: Whence it comes to pass, that as the gates of a great City use to be fuller then the other parts of the City, by reason of the frequent ingresse and egress of people, so also are the eyes of such like men.

Use 1. This may serve to instruct us, to see and bewail the miserable condition, whereunto men are obnoxious by reason of sin; because they have no part clean or void of sin.

2. To admonish us, to use all care to cleanse ourselves, and all our faculties and parts both of body and mind from such uncleanness.

Doct. 7. The uncleanness of the body is oftentimes joined with impurity of religion.

This is gathered from these words; adultery.

Reason 1. Because the hindering cause or that which keeps it off is removed, namely, pure religion.

2. Because this is the just judgment of God, Rom. 1. 26.

3. Because by reason of these carnal affections men do withdraw themselves from piety, or impugn it.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, so much the more religiously to embrace purity in religion.

Doct. 8. In such men covetousness is oftentimes joined with their impiety.

This is gathered from these words, covetous practices.

Reason. Because that doth chiefly pertain to the rule and sway which the devil exerciseth over his servants, 1 John 2. 16

2. Because by covetousness they seek those things that serve to nourish their impurity of life.

Use. This may serve for a general admonition, to abstain even from the least sins, if we would not admit of others also.

Doct. 9. The exercising of the heart unto such sins, doth very much strengthen and increase them.

This is gathered from that word: A heart they have exercised.

Reason 1. Because exercising a man's self unto sin brings in and increaseth the habit.

2. It is a token that a man takes pleasure in such sins. For no man doth willingly exercise himself in those things wherein he takes no delight.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, according to the counsel of the Apostle, 1 Tim. 4. 7. to exercise ourselves unto godliness, not unto wickedness. For as the Apostle there saith, verse 8. that bodily exercise profiteth little; so in this comparison may it be said, that the exercise of sin is not only unprofitable, but very hurtful.

Doct. 10. They that are after this manner accustomed unto their sins, are hardened in them.

This is gathered from these words; They cannot cease from sin.

Reason. Because by this means sin gets great strength and dominion.

2. Because every way unto repentance is stopped up.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to leave off our wicked purposes in time.

Doct. 11. Such men are most to be detested.

This is gathered from these words: cursed children.

Reason. Because they are most opposite and contrary unto that which is most to be loved.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to show our zeal in flying from sin and sinners.

Verse 15. Which have forsaken the right way, and are gone astray following the way of Balaam the son of Bosor, who loved the wages of unrighteousness, Verse 16. But was rebuked for his iniquity: the dumb Ass speaking with man's voice, forbad the madness of the Prophet.

The Analysis.

The Apostle here still continues in explaining and illustrating the covetousness of these men by way of a similitude, which he makes between them and Balaam the son of Bosor. Now the quality wherein they are compared is first propounded in general, that they followed his way, that is, they imitated him in the like manner of doing, and then set forth in particular, 1 By the effect, that they forsook the right way, and went astray into by ways, that is, into naughty and wicked ways. 2 By the proper cause of this effect, that they loved the wages of unrighteousness, like as he loved it, that is, for the desire of filthy lucre they gave themselves over unto impiety and unrighteousness. 3 By the adjunct that follows upon this effect namely, God's rebuking of him, v. 16. which is set forth by the instrument, that he made use of to do it, namely, a dumb Ass. The fitness also of this instrument as he was made use of at that time, is declared by their inequality, because he shows that this Ass was in some sort wiser then his Master. For when the Master, though he was a Prophet, was mad, this Ass by his wisdom as it were, rebuked and corrected that madness.

Quest. But here a question may be made concerning this Balaam the son of Bosor, who is here called a Prophet, and yet is said to have sinned most wickedly, Whether he were a true Prophet of God, or no?

Answ. He was sometime endued with the gift of Prophecy that God had communicated unto him, as it appears, Num. 22. so 23, 24. But in a special manner in 23. 26. the Lord is said to have put words into his mouth, so also verse 20. & cap. 24. 2. the Spirit of the Lord is said to have come upon him, and verse 4. he is said to have heard the words of God. Yet he was not a holy Prophet of God, but as he was given to other vices, and especially to covetousness, so also he was skillful in the Magic arts, by whose help, as it is said Numb 24. 1. he used to seek for enchantments. Such an one therefore he was amongst the Prophets, as Judas was amongst the Apostles: of which sort also the old Prophet that dwelt at Bethel, seems to have been in some respect.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. The wicked of every latter age do in their courses imitate those wicked men, that lived before them.

This is gathered from these words: Following the way of Balaam.

For these men did not propose Balaam unto themselves for an example to imitate, but because they went in the same ways, therefore they are said to have followed him.

Reason 1. Because that in-bred corruption, from which such wicked courses are derived, as from their original fountain, is one and the same. For although it doth not work always and in all altogether after the same manner, yet when it meets with natures alike, and the like occasions also happen, then it is no less like it self, then an egg is like an egg.

2. Because the same teacher of wickedness, the tempter and old Serpent works effectually in his bond slaves throughout all ages.

3. Because oftentimes also the courses fore-going do not only by tradition, but by transmission as it were also beget courses like themselves.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, not to be too much troubled at the wickedness of men, that live with us, because there is nothing new under the Sun in that kind.

2. To admonish us, not to expect any singular thing from wicked men, while they remain such, above that which we read of other wicked men before them in ancient time.

3. To exhort us therefro, to labor to be like the ancient godly men, that are commended in Scripture.

Doct. 2. This is common to all the wicked, to forsake the right way, and go astray in that which is not good.

This is gathered from these words, Which having forsaken the right way are gone astray:

Reason 1. Because the right way is in observing the will of God, or in doing the good works which God hath before ordained that we should walk in them, Ephes. 2. 10. Psal. 119. 1, 2, &c. But wickedness is another crooked way, which men have found out themselves, clean contrary to the will of God.

2. Because that is the right way which certainly leadeth unto life, and eternal happiness, Matth. 7. 14. but wickedness tendeth unto death, Prov. 7. 27. & 8. 36.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, diligently to beware of this going astray, always looking unto the right way.

Doct. 3. Covetousness, where is prevaieth, doth most certainly produce this going astray from the right way.

This is gathered from these words: who loved the wages of unrighteousness: so 1 Tim. 6. 17. He that trusts in uncertain riches, doth not trust in the living God; and therefore he doth necessarily follow a new way clean contrary unto that which the true and living God hath shown us.

Reason. Because a covetous man is obnoxious unto all the temptations of the devil, which have any show of gain; so that he accounts gain godliness, 1 Tim. 6. 5. 9. and this is it which is meant in the text, they love the wages of unrighteousness, that is, they seek lucre, though it be joined with the greatest iniquity.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to take heed therefore and fly from covetousness, as from the greatest plague and enemy of godliness, Coloss. 3. 50.

2. To exhort us to labor $\langle\phi\rangle$ contentment, 1 Tim. 6. 6. 8, Doct. 4. All such wickedness is rebuked by God.

This is gathered from the beginning of v. 16. But was rebuked, &c.

Reason 1. Because the Scripture and law it self which is transgressed by sin, doth therefore rebuke that sin, Rom. 7. 7.

2. The consciences of sinners do usually also check them, Rom. 2. 15.

3. The very creatures do it also after their manner, Deut. 31. 28. and if they should not in their appointed order sufficiently rebuke sinners, there should some extraordinary miracle be shown rather then they should not be convicted, as we see here in the example of Balaam.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, to apply our minds unto these rebukings of God, and not to be careless of them, as desperate men use to be; but to yield unto them, and shun all those things that are rebuked by God, either in the Scriptures, or in our consciences, or in the creatures.

2. To exhort us, to use all diligence to seek and preserve in ourselves that testimony of God and our conscience, which may be for our comfort, and not for our rebuke.

Doct. 5. Those men are extremely and brutishly mad, that will not be rebuked or stopped in their impiety, unless it be by some miraculous work.

This is gathered from the end of verse 16. the dumb Ass speaking with 〈ϕ〉 voice, forbad the madness of the Prophet.

Reason. Because such men are deprived of common sense touching spiritual things, and are given over unto a reprobate sense.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to beware of that hardness of heart, which cannot believe God speaking in his word; and not to give way to that vain imagination, which Dives with his brethren is said to have maintained, Luke 16. 30. and Abraham refutes. verse 31.

Verse 17. These are welles without water, clouds that are carried with a tempest, to whom the mist of darkness is reserved forever.

Verse 18. For when they speak great swelling words of vanity, they allure through the lusts of the flesh, through much wantonness, those that were clean escaped from them who live in error.

Verse 19. While they promise them liberty, they themselves are the servants of corruption: for of whom a man is overcome, of the same is he brought in bondage.

Verse 20. For, if, after they have escaped the pollutions of the world, through the knowledge of the Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, they are again entangled therein, and overcome, the latter end is worse with them then the beginning.

Verse 21. For it had been better for them not to have known the way of righteousness, then after they have known it, to turn from the holy commandment delivered unto them.

Verse 22. But it is happened unto them according to the true Proverb; The Dog is turned to his own vomit again, and the Sow that was washed to her wallowing in the mire.

The Analysis.

IN these verses is contained a refutation of the false teachers, of whom a description was made before. Now the sum of this refutation consists herein, that all those things were vain, which they promised to their disciples or followers. And this is in general shown by those comparisons which are made verse 17. Where these teachers are said to be wells as it were, without water, and clouds without rain, because they make show of many things worthy to be desired, but they perform nothing at all. Upon occasion of these similitudes, by the way he repeats the punishment which God had prepared for them, by a continuation of the same Allegory, namely, that whereas they are wells as it were, or clouds making show of some mist, they shall at length certainly find the mist of eternal darkness. 2. The same vanity is illustrated by the impulsive cause that moved them to spread abroad their new opinions, which was their swelling vanity, verse 18. in the beginning, and by the effect thereof, which was their crafty seducing of Christians to give themselves over to the lusts of the flesh, at the end of the same verse. 3 The same vanity of their promises is set forth, verse 19. at the beginning, by the great dissimilitude and opposition that is betwixt them and their promises. For they promised liberty unto others, when they themselves were servants of corruption. Thence the vanity of their promises is made manifest and palpable as it were; because they promised that, whereunto they themselves were strangers, and far remote from it. 4. That which is put in the dissimilitude, namely, that they were servants of corruption, because some might make a doubt of it, the Apostle confirms it at the end of verse 19. by the general definition or description of a servant, or that bondage which he meant, namely, that he is another man's servant, that is overcome by him. For he that is taken by the enemy in war, is brought in bondage to him, at least until he hath paid the just price of his ransom. 5. The misery of this bondage is amplified in respect of those, that have made profession of faith and holiness, by comparing things unequal, betwixt that condition, whereunto they were obnoxious before their calling, and this which they have brought upon themselves by their Apostasy, where the misery of the latter condition is made greater then the former, verse. 20. and the reason of it is given, verse. 21. Because the sin is greater, which is committed after and against the knowledge of the right way, then that which is done through ignorance; which inequality is also illustrated by a comparison of the like things, that is explained in proverbial sentences, of the Dog and the Sow, verse 22.

Quest. Here ariseth a Question, Whether those that were seduced by the false teachers, were before true believers?

Answ. They had that faith which we use to call temporary faith, but they were never soundly rooted in faith. This is proved out of the 14 verse, where all those that were seduced by these deceivers are called unstable souls. For if they had been by sound faith grafted into Christ, then they should have been stable and corroborated in him also. And whereas they are said verse 18. to have clean escaped from the wicked, this was, 1 In respect of the profession which they had made of their true conversion. 2. In respect of the assent, which we must think that they did give inwardly also unto the word, by which they were called to this conversion. 3. In respect of the change which they had made in their outward carriage. 4. In respect of some small beginning also, whereby they tended towards holiness it self.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. They that go astray themselves from the right way, and cause others to go astray, whatsoever they make show of, they have nothing else in themselves or in their errors but vanity.

This is gathered out of verse 17. and the beginning of 18. For they are said in the text to be as it were vanity it self, as Solomon faith of all things that are under the Sun, in respect of happiness they are vanity of vanities. Now they are said to be vain, 1. Because they have only a show of some truth or good, not the thing it self. 2. Because they make a show of communicating some good unto others, but they do not perform it, nor can they. For that is properly called vain, which is void of that thing which it should have, or which is unfit for that use and end whereunto it should serve.

Reason 1. Because they have forsaken God, who is the fountain of all true and solid good.

2. Because they are led by Satan, who is the father of lies and of all vanity.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to beware therefore of such men, that we be not in any wise deceived by them. For this were to embrace vanity instead of eternal happiness.

Doct. 2. Yet such men in their vanity are usually most puffed up.

This is gathered from verse 18. in the beginning. So 1 Cor. 8. 1. Knowledge puffeth up. Which if it be true of the knowledge of things that are true in themselves, if they be not known as they ought to be known, as it is explained, verse 2. Then much more must we think so of that knowledge which hath a show of some singular excellency, when there is no solid good in it at all.

Reason. Because such men seem to themselves to be wise, not only above the ordinary sort, but also above those that excel in the Church of God, yea sometimes above the Apostles themselves and Prophets, and therefore are wont to boast of some depths which they have; which the holy Ghost therefore calls the depths of Satan, Apoc. 2. 24.

Use. This may serve to inform us, always to suspect those men, that are in a wonderful manner puffed up with their own private conceits of some part of religion.

Doct. 3. That such men do oftentimes seduce many, and have divers followers, it comes to pass chiefly thereby, that their doctrine, either for the matter of it, or the manner of their teaching, is very agreeable to the carnal lusts of men.

This is gathered from these words: they allure through the lusts of the flesh.

Reason. Because as the flesh doth easily apply it self at all times unto carnal doctrine, by reason of that communion that is betwixt them; so especially and most easily doth it, when the doctrine is covered with a show of religion or truth.

Use. This may serve for admonition, that if we would be safe from infection and seducing, we should diligently labor for mortification of the flesh. For neither are they only in danger of seducing that have not yet known the truth, but they also that have in some fort clean escaped from those that live in error, as it is in the text.

Doct. 4. The chief lust of the flesh, whereby men are wont to be seduced, is the love of carnal liberty.

This is gathered from the beginning of verse 19. So Psalm 2. 3.

Reason 1. Because the flesh always seeketh its peace and quietness, which it cannot enjoy, but by giving it self over unto the lusts thereof; and hence it is that carnal men account the command of God and his Word, a yoke, and strong cords, and bands, &c.

2. Because in liberty there is some kind of show of that dignity and excellency, whereof all the sons of Adam are most desirous ever since they drank in that poison of the Serpent, Ye shall be like God's.

3. Because it hath a false shadow of that Christian liberty, whereunto we are called, John 8. 32. 33, 34. Hence it is, that the cursed sect of Libertines, which under a show of liberty overthrows all religion, findeth many well-wishers thereunto, even amongst those that are Christians in name.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that always follow after liberty of what kind soever it be. For Christians are the servants of righteousness, although they be free from sin, Rom. 6. 18.

2. To admonish us, to repress and restrain in ourselves this carnal desire of liberty, 1 Cor. 9. 27.

Doct. 5. They that most labor for this carnal liberty, are the most wretched servants of sin.

This is gathered from these words; they are the servants of corruption. So Rom. 6. 20.

Reason 1. Because they are overcome and led captive by sin.

2. Because they give up themselves wholly to obey sin, Rom. 6. 16. 19.

3. Because they remain in this bondage, although it be the worst of all, with a kind of pleasure; so that they are the servants of sin more, then those are the servants of men, that are gally-slaves: for these men's minds always wish for liberty, but the others are very well pleased in their most servile condition.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, how we should stand affected towards such men. For although they seem to themselves to be the only happy men almost, yet they are in truth objects most worthy of pity, and not of envy.

2. To admonish us, more and more to get out of this bondage, by yielding ourselves wholly unto God and his righteousness, Rom. 6. 18, 19, 22.

Doct. 6. They that are brought into this bondage, after that they have made profession and confession of the truth, their condition is more deplorable, then the condition of other sinners.

This is gathered from, verse 20, 21.

Reason 1. Because their sin is greater then other men's. For where no law is, there is no sin; where the law or the knowledge of the law is less, there the sin is less: but where the knowledge of God's law and his will is greater, there the sin is made greater and heavier.

2. Because they do wonderfully dishonor God, while they profess themselves to have known his discipline, and to have had experience of it in some measure, and do afterwards reject it, and prefer sin before it.

3. Because the devil the Prince of sin doth more severely beset those, that he hath withdrawn unto himself from the flight as it were, Matth. 12. 45.

4. Because the anger of God is incensed against such men, Heb. 10. 26, 27.

5. Because there is scarce any place left for them to repent, Heb. 6. 6.

Use. This may serve to admonish all those, that know the way of God, to labor also to continue constantly in the same, in all parts of their life and conversation.

Doct. 7. The filthiness of sin should make men to abhor a returning to the bondage thereof.

Reason 1. Because we are called unto purity.

2. Because we have professed an abomination of that impurity which is in fin.

3. Because it is abominable unto God, and makes men abominable in his sight.

Use 1. This may serve to condemn those, that take delight in this filthiness, and think they gain credit unto themselves thereby, by gracing and setting out their speech with oaths, and labor to make their conversation pleasing, by applying themselves unto the customs and vicious and filthy courses of men.

2. To admonish us, to put before our eyes this filthiness of sin. So shall we renew our repentance, and be confirmed in the grace of perseverance.

Chapter III.

Verse 1. This second Epistle (beloved) I now write unto you, in both which I stir up your pure minds by way of remembrance:

Verse 2. That ye may be mindful of the words which were spoken before by the holy Prophets, and of the commandment of us the Apostles of the Lord and Savior.

The Analysis.

The Apostle now making haste to the end of the Epistle, 1 Repeats the scope and aim that he had in writing, in the 1 & 2 verse. 2 He doth again describe those men, of whom he writes this Epistle, that they should beware, verse 3, 4. 3 He refutes their blasphemies, from verse 5. to verse 11. 4 He shows the use and fruit of his doctrine, which all the faithful should make of it, from verse 11 to the end. In repeating the end and scope of the Epistle he sets it forth and describes it, 1 By the genus, that it is a putting in remembrance. 2 By the effect, that it stirs up. 3. By the object, that it was directed unto them, that had a pure mind. 4 By the means how to obtain this effect, namely, those things which were spoken before by the Prophets, and commanded by the Apostles, verse 2. 5 By the manner how all these things might be made the more effectual: to which purpose he useth a kind of illustration, namely, that this putting in remembrance was iterated and repeated with an earnest vehemency. This second Epistle I write, and that with a fatherly kind of love, which is intimated in the title which he gives them, when he calls them beloved. Of the putting in remembrance we spake before, c. 1. v. 12 13. and also of stirring up: Therefore passing over them, we come to the next.

Doctrines arising hereence.

Doct. 1. The minds of the faithful should be endued with purity, and sincerity, that they may receive the divine admonitions as they ought to be received.

This is gathered from these words: I stir up your pure minds. Now he doth not so much commend them by this his testimony, as show them, what thing they ought chiefly to labor for, that they may receive benefit by this writing. So James 1. 21. and this first Epist. cap. 2. verse 2.

Reason 1. Because, as in all things that are of any moment, there is always required some preparing of the subject, for example, as in husbandry, plowing and harrowing of the ground: so and much more also is it required that we should prepare our hearts to receive the word of God with benefit, Ierem. 4. 3, 4. Now there can be no fitter preparation, then by sincerity to lay aside all those things, that are contrary to the word, and hinder the efficacy thereof.

2. Because the word of God is sincere, and therefore it requires sincerity in those that receive it, 1 Epist. c. 2. v. 2.

3. Because without sincerity nothing at all is done aright. For sincerity is the common affection of obedience.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those, that have no care at all, rightly to dispose themselves for to receive the word of God aright.

2. To exhort us, to labor chiefly for this purity of mind, and sincerity of heart.

Doct. 2. They that have a pure mind, do willingly receive and retain those things that are proposed unto them out of the Prophets and Apostles.

This is gathered from verse 2.

Reason 1. Because Christ's sheep know his voice and follow him, John 10. 27. Now his voice sounds in the Prophets and Apostles.

2. Because in the Prophets and Apostles all things agree with sincerity, 1 Pet. 2. 2. Psal. 19. 8, 9.

Use. This may serve to inform us, to examine our minds according to this rule: for they that care not for the words of the Prophets and Apostles, have not purity of mind; but they that cleave fast unto them, although it be accompanied with divers infirmities, have always in readiness a sure argument of their sincerity.

Doct. 3. Yet the very best have need to be often stirred up unto these duties.

This is gathered from these words; This second Epistle I now write.

So Phil. 3. 1, and this Epistle, c. 1. v. 10, 13.

Doct. 4. Such admonitions are works of Christian charity.

This is gathered from this title, beloved.

Reason 1. Because they tend to deliver men from the greatest evil, and to communicate unto them the greatest good.

2. Because they pertain unto the communication which is exercised by charity.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove those that cannot endure admonitions, and take them for their enemies that use them. Gal. 4. 16. 2 Tim. 4. 3.

2. To exhort us, to exercise ourselves unto this duty with all charity.

Verse 3. Knowing this first, that there shall come in the last days, scoffers, walking after their own lusts, Verse 4. And saying, Where is the promise of his coming? For since the Fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation.

The Analysis.

Vpon occasion of the Apostles testimony before cited, there is in these words a new description made of some wicked men of whom we must greatly beware. For in that he saith, that this is first to be known, what these wicked men are, of whom he doth admonish us, he doth thereby mean not only to show that this is necessary to be known for the understanding and applying of the Apostles words with benefit, but also that this may and ought to be chiefly observed out of the Apostles words, namely, that there shall come such men in the last days. For so is this phrase explained, Jude, v. 18. These wicked men are described in general, 1 By their impiety towards God, that they are scoffers. 2. By their impurity of life and deeds, that they walk after their own lusts. Then in special by their arguing, that the wicked scoffers used, to defend their impiety, and to remove the contrary doctrine from themselves, verse 4 For in those words is expressed, 1 their scoffing, which was before noted in general, and 2 their argument is set forth, whereby they would persuade themselves and others, that they might walk after their own lusts, without fear or danger: namely, because the coming of God, the expectation whereof did deter men from such a life, is not to be feared, in these words: Where is the promise of his coming? Now this they confirmed to themselves and others by a vain comparing the times that went before with those that were to come; that whereas there was no coming of the Lord to judge the world since the times of the Fathers, and from the creation of the world, there was no cause to fear that any such thing would happen at the end of the world, in these words, For since the Fathers fell asleep, all things continue as they were from the beginning of the creation. Now this whole description, or rather the thing described, that is, this impiety, is illustrated by the adjunct of time, wherein chiefly and by a special kind of eminency or abundance it is found, namely, in the last days.

The Doctrines arising here-hence.

Doct. 1. In the reading of the Scriptures we must give special heed unto those things whereof we have greatest use.

This is gathered from these words: Knowing this first. For the Apostle would, that for the present they should first and chiefly think of those things, that the Apostles had spoken for their present use, touching those wicked men.

Doct. 2. The Scripture foretells most grievous things of the last days.

So 1 Tim. 4. 1. 2 Tim. 3. 1.

Reason 1. For that iniquity doth abound more in the last days, it is because knowledge doth abound, which is held under righteousness: that makes the sin the more sinful, Rom. 7. 13. and doth more incense the wrath of God, Romans 1. 18.

2. Because the last ages, by reason of that depravedness and corruption which hath overspread mankind, are as it were an the sink of all the ages that went before, to receive their d•egs.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, not to be too much troubled in mind, when we see as it were inundation of iniquity and impiety, flowing everywhere; because such things were foretold us before, John 16. 4.

2. Not to fashion ourselves to those courses, that are common in this age, but to prepare and arm ourselves rather against their contagion.

Doct. 3. Amongst wicked men they are the worst of all, that scoff at godliness.

This is gathered from this word, scoffers.

Reason 1. Because they are not only unbelievers, but despisers of the faith also. For scoffing is from contempt.

2. Because their consciences are feared as it were with a hot iron, that can be wrought upon by no instruction, and therefore they are quite desperate. For they have quenched and choked even those natural sparks, which are wont to break out in all men's hearts.

3. Because they are the chosen instruments of the devil to turn aside others from godliness, and to make the faithful servants of God ashamed of it, if it were possible. For the proper effect of scoffing is shame.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to shun such scoffers as the monsters and pests of mankind.

Doct. 4. They that maintain wicked opinions in their mind, are given to impurity in their life.

This is gathered therehence, that the same men are called scoffers, and such as walk after their own lusts.

Reason 1. Because the proper cause, why such men do labor so much to cast off all sense of religion, is no other, then that they may with all licentiousness, give themselves wholly over to their most filthy lusts.

2. Because such wicked opinions or imaginations do let loose the reins to all concupiscence, and therefore are the cause of increasing that wickedness, whereof at the first they were the effect.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, not to think that wicked and profane and Atheistical men do speak from any reason or judgment, when they scoff at religion. For they are beasts in their life, and therefore they have also beastly imaginations, which they are wont to bring forth under a show of reason.

2. To admonish us, in shunning profane and blasphemous opinions and imaginations, to beware especially of a wicked life, because it makes way for all wicked opinions.

Doct. V. That is proper to wicked and profane men, in some sort to deny the coming of the Lord, and his judgment.

This is gathered from verse 4 at the beginning.

Reason. Because the expectation of judgment is a strong bridle to restrain and keep in the wickedness of men, which ungodly and profane men do most of all desire to shake off.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, by all means to take heed, that we be not any way partakers of that impiety: which comes to pass not only then when we do utterly deny his coming, but also when we do either make any doubt of it, or apprehend it as a thing far off from us, or do ineffectually think of it, not edifying ourselves in faith and obedience.

Doct. 6. The fallacy wherewith wicked and profane men do deceive themselves, consists therein, that they will believe nothing above their senses, and do oppose their sense against the testimony of God.

Reason. Because they are sensual men, Jude, v. 19. and are led by sense and sensible things, like as brute beasts.

Use 1. This may serve for information: hence we may understand that the contradictions of profane men are void of all reason, and therefore are to be contemned with detestation. Nothing can be more contrary or mad, then to consult with nature about supernatural things, and to fetch the judgment of spiritual things from sense.

2. To admonish us, not to attribute anything to our senses in matters of faith. For it is all one, as if we should seek the judgment of reason amongst brute beasts.

Verse 5. For this they willingly are ignorant of, that by the word of God the heavens were of old, and the earth standing out of the water, and in the water, Verse 6. Whereby the world, that then was, being overflowed with water, perished.

Verse 7. But the heavens and the earth which are now, by the same word are kept in store, reserved unto fire against the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men.

The Analysis.

IN the refutation of this profane opinion, the Apostle doth first reprove the ignorance of these profane men, verse 5. 6 7. Secondly, he doth instruct the faithful touching the coming of the Lord in those things, that did most pertain to the confirmation of them in the truth against such temptations that might arise from such human cavillings, verse 8. 9, 10. The Apostle reproves their ignorance, 1 From the cause, that it was voluntary or affected ignorance. 2 From the object, namely that truth, which they willingly were ignorant of, and did oppugn. Now that truth which is affirmed contradicts that assertion, whereby these men would confirm their opinion. For when they had said it, and had brought it for an argument, that all things did continue in the same estate from the beginning of the creation, the Apostle denies this, and shows the contrary by the history of the flood, v. 6. then by comparing things alike, he gathers that the same also is to be expected concerning the destruction of the world by fire at the coming of the Lord, that was before in some sort performed by the destruction of it in water, v. 7. 3 The reason of this consequence is taken from the common cause of creation, preservation, and both destructions of the world, namely, the word & will of God, v. 5. 7. 4 He doth illustrate the conclusion it self concerning the destruction of the world by the end thereof, that it may withal be applied unto those wicked ones, with whom he now dealt, v. 7 at the end, while he calls the day of the Lord the day of judgment, and perdition of ungodly men. For in these words he threatens eternal damnation unto those profane men, that denied his coming, w^{ch} must certainly be expected at the coming of the Lord.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. It is the property of wicked men to be willingly ignorant of all things, that cross their lusts.

This is gathered from these words: They willingly are ignorant of. All men are ignorant of many things, but the faithful are not ignorant of those things that are necessary for them unto salvation, nor do they please themselves in the ignorance of any truth, much less in the ignorance of those things that pertain unto the practice of religion: nay they do very much labor for this knowledge, whereby they may be brought unto eternal life: but the wicked, although they do very much desire to know other things, yea and are too curious in it, yet they love to be ignorant of those things that pertain to the bridling of their lusts and reproving of their sins. This is that ignorance which is called voluntary and affected.

Reason 1. Because they affect those vices whereunto this knowledge is repugnant. Therefore they eschew knowledge as a thing that is evil unto them, and makes against them; and affect ignorance as a thing that is good for them and very well agreeing with them. For he that hath resolved with himself to give his mind unto sin, and to continue therein, seeks to have peace and quietness in that condition, and therefore abhors that truth which convinceth his conscience of sin, and suffers him not to sleep in it.

2. Because he is given unto those lusts that stop up the way unto saving knowledge, and hold him ensnared and entangled so that he cannot freely endeavor and labor for true knowledge: therefore he affects ignorance in this respect, not so much in it self, as in the cause of it.

Use 1. This may serve to convince those, that please themselves in the ignorance of holy things, because this is the property of a wicked man.

2. To admonish us, never to shut our eyes against the light of the truth.

3. To exhort us, on the contrary to use all our endeavor and give all diligence to gain knowledge, especially in those things that pertain to our own practice and life.

Doct. 2. It makes very much for the taking away or lessening of our ignorance, to look upon the works of God that are past, that from them we may gather the works that are to come.

This is gathered from the comparison that is here made, v. 5. 6, 7.

Reason. Because the works of God are as looking-glasses, wherein God's sufficiency and efficiency are proposed unto us to behold.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to look slightly upon the works of God, nor to read the histories of them as we read human histories, but so, that we may always behold God in them.

Doct. 3. Those public works of God, the creation, preservation, and destruction of the world, first by water, secondly by fire, are often to be meditated upon, and compared one with the other.

This is gathered from the same comparison.

Reason. Because God hath proposed those, as very remarkable arguments, to work some sense at least of religion in men's minds.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to exercise ourselves in these meditations, which God hath commended unto all sorts of men.

Doct. 4. In all such works of God, that is especially to be considered that they are by the word of God, and do depend thereupon.

This is gathered from verse 5, 7.

Reason. Because we can receive no benefit by meditating upon God's works, unless we do behold the perfection of God in them. Now the perfection of God in his works doth very much appear therein, that all things are done by his word and according to his will.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to turn our eyes from all second causes, and to acknowledge God and his word in all things. For thence it comes to pass, that men often times attribute those things unto fortune, which are done by God, because they are ignorant of the power of God's word. And such an opposition there seems to be in the text, betwixt the words of the wicked, (when they say that all things continue, making no mention in the mean time of God, by whose power they continue; but rather closely attributing this continuance to fortune or second causes,) and that assertion of the Apostle, whereby he affirms that the world was at first by God's word, and is kept by the same word:

Doct. 5. Every consideration of the works of God should be applied to the comfort of the faithful, and terror of the wicked.

This is gathered from v. 7. at the end.

Verse 8. But (beloved) be not ignorant of this one thing, that one day is with the Lord as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day.

Verse 9. The Lord is not slack concerning his promise, (as some men count slackness) but is longsuffering to us ward, not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance.

Verse 10. But the day of the Lord will come as a thief in the night, in the which the heavens shall pass away with a great noise, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat, the earth also, and the works that are therein shall be burnt up.

The Analysis.

IN this other part of the refutation the Apostle propoundeth unto the godly and faithful those things that might establish and confirm their hearts in the truth, touching the coming of the Lord. 1 Therefore he persuades them to understanding and knowledge, contrary to the ignorance of the wicked. For whereas he had spoken before of the wicked, this they are willingly ignorant of, now turning to the faithful he exhorts them unto the contrary. But be not you ignorant of this one thing. 2. He propounds the thing it self, which he would have them in a special manner to understand and observe, which contains two things. 1 That the prolonging of the Lord's coming is not with that slackness, which should be a stumbling-block to any man, both because it is not to be judged of according to our sense, but by the eternity of God, in respect whereof that space of time, which seem•s very long unto us, is but as one day, v. 8. and also because the end of this prolonging is the conversion and salvation of sinners: and therefore this prolonging proceeds not so much from slackness, as from patience, verse 9. 2 That the manner of his coming, (both because it shall be sudden, and also because it shall be with majesty and great terror,) is such, that it should rather make men careful to prepare themselves for it, then to be curious in inquiring about the time it self, or to complain of slackness.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. When wicked and profane men are reprov'd, refuted and condemned in Scripture, this is done for the faithful and elects sake, whose edification and salvation God hath respect unto, even when he seems to speak unto others.

This is gathered from the beginning of verse 8. where the Apostle turning himself directly unto the faithful, shows that these wicked men were refuted for their good. So 2 Thess. 2. 13. Jude, v. 20. 1 Tim. 6. 11. 2 Tim. 3. 14.

Reason 1. Because the whole Scripture and all the means of salvation do by a special kind of propriety belong unto the faithful.

2. Because God will not have his word to pass without some fruit: Now wicked men are oftentimes so fore-lorne, that no congruous fruit can be expected in them, but only in the faithful.

Use 1. This may serve to inform us, to judge aright of God's intention in those things that he doth about men that are past all hope and incorrigible. For as the Apostle saith of Oxen, that God taketh not care for Oxen, but for men; so should we think that God taketh not care so much for these bestial men, as for the faithful and elect whom he doth chiefly speak unto, even when he seems to speak unto others.

2. To admonish us, not to neglect or despise such rebukings of the wicked, as if they did nothing belong unto us, but wisely to turn it to our own use.

Doct. 2. The faithful do then profit by the word of God, which is against the wicked, when they are become much unlike the wicked.

This is gathered therehence, that whereas the Apostle did reprove the wicked of ignorance, he doth now exhort the faithful to knowledge, Prov. 1. 15.

Reason. Because the courses and fashions of the wicked are therefore set forth unto us, that we might avoid them.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, not to suffer ourselves to be led away by the example of the wicked multitude. For God doth not propose it as a thing to be followed, but to be shunned and avoided.

Doct. 3. We should in a singular manner differ from the wicked therein, that we judge of the ways of God not according to the sense of the flesh, but according to the nature of God.

This is gathered from these words: One day with the Lord. With men it is otherwise.

Reason. Because spiritual things are to be judged of spiritually. Now all the ways of God are in some sort spiritual and divine.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, that in such examinations are wont to consult with flesh and blood, and not with the word of God.

Doct. 4. The end of all God's ways, as they have respect unto men, is the repentance and salvation of the godly.

This is gathered from v. 9. Now here ariseth a question.

Quest. Whether all and every particular man be meant thereby, when it is said, that God is not willing that any should perish, but that all should come to repentance?

Answ. The patience of God according to its nature hath that use and end, to lead all sinners unto repentance, Rom. 2. 4. and in that sense might their interpretation be admitted, who understand these words and the like of all and every particular man: But that the Apostle in this place hath special reference to the elect, it appears thereby, that he speaking of the beloved of God, verse 8. and reckoning himself amongst the number of us, saith, that God is longsuffering to us-ward, that is, towards those beloved, and is not willing that any should perish that is, any of them: because God's principal work towards men is the salvation of the faithful, and therefore all his ways tend thereunto, as unto the scope and mark whereunto they are directed.

Use 1. This may serve to reprove the madness of those men that blame those things in God, which make most for their use and good, as these men do in the slackness of the Lord's coming.

2. To admonish us, not to pervert these right ways of God, but always to apply them unto that use whereunto they tend, that is, to the furtherance of our own repentance and salvation.

Doct. 5. The way of the Lord, when he cometh to judgment, shall be with swiftness, majesty and terror.

This is gathered from verse 10.

First, it shall be sudden, because the hour and day thereof is not revealed, and because the most part of men expect no such thing. And it shall be full of majesty and terror, because it is the coming of the Lord not in humility, as his first coming was, but in glory.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, to prepare our selves accordingly against this coming of the Lord. For this use the Apostle presseth and exhorteth us unto in the rest of the chap.

Verse 11. Seeing then that all these things shall be dissolved, what manner of persons ought ye to be in all holy conversation and godliness, Verse 12. Looking for, and hasting unto the coming of the day of God, wherein the heavens being on fire, shall be dissolved, and the elements shall melt with fervent heat?

Verse 13. Nevertheless, we according to his promise, look for new heavens, and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness.

Verse 14. Wherefore (beloved) seeing that ye look for such things, be diligent, that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blameless.

Verse 15. And account, that the long suffering of the Lord is salvation, even as our beloved brother Paul also, according to the wisdom given unto him, hath written unto you.

Verse 16. As also in all his Epistles, speaking in them of these things, in which are some things hard to be understood, which they that are unlearned, and unstable, wrest, as they do also the other Scriptures, unto their own destruction.

Verse 17. Ye therefore beloved, seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness.

Verse 18. But grow in grace, and in the knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ: to him be glory, both now and forever, Amen.

The Analysis.

IN these verses is contained an application of the doctrine, that was before propounded concerning the Lord's coming, to the use and edification of the faithful. Now this application is made by an exhortation to piety and holiness, which is first of all propounded, v. 11. Secondly, confirmed by the doctrine that was before proposed concerning the manner of the Lord's coming, v. 12, 13. Thirdly, it is again repeated and pressed, v. 14. Fourthly it is again confirmed by the doctrine that was before proposed concerning the patience and longsuffering of God, v. 15. begin•which is in this place confirmed by the testimony of the Apostle Paul: whose testimony is illustrated, 1 Thereby, that he was frequent in such testimonies, v. 16. begin. 2 By a preoccupation, whereby the faithful are admonished not rashly to wrest anything that Paul spake concerning such things, to a contrary sense, because although he spake some things that are hard to be understood, yet they are such that they are not wont to be wrested, but by some perverse men, who wrest the other Scriptures also unto their own destruction. From all these he infers in the last place a conclusion both of the fore-going exhortation, and also of the whole Epistle, which is, to have a care to be steadfast, v. 17. and to labor for growth, v. 18. The end whereof is shown to be the glory of Christ in that doxology, wherewith the whole Epistle is closed up.

The Doctrines arising herehence.

Doct. 1. All Scripture must be applied unto a practical use, that it may advance holiness and piety.

This is gathered from v. 11. Now not only in this place is this order of instruction observed, but in all the Epistles and Sermons that are propounded in Scripture.

Reason 1. Because the end of all Theological doctrine is to live well.

2. Because a bare apprehension and speculation of the truth, and a mere assent thereunto, is nothing worth, if it be separated from the practice. For this is found in some sort in the devils themselves.

3. Because the temptations of the Devil tend chiefly thereunto, that if he cannot hide the truth, yet so to choke it, that it can bring forth no fruit in the life; and thereupon he takes occasion to mock and deride men.

Use. This may serve to admonish us all, to labor for this both in private and in public, in preaching, hearing, reading, and meditating upon God's word; and never think that we know anything as we ought to know, unless we know it unto piety and holiness.

Doct. 2. In piety and holiness we must always aim at and labor for the highest perfection.

This is gathered 1 From the question, What manner of persons ought ye to be? 2 From the plural number, which is used in the original, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, in your conversations, that is, in all piety and holiness.

Reason 1. Because every degree of piety and holiness is as desirable in it self as the first is.

2. Our desire and affection towards the highest degree of holiness and piety is a part of the very first degree. For there is no true holiness without a desire of perfect holiness.

3. Because we are called unto perfect holiness, neither can we see God without it.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, that rest in a kind of luke-warm profession, or in a partial practice of piety and holiness.

Doct. 3. It makes much for the advancing of piety; to look for and hasten unto the comming of the day of the Lord.

This is gathered from v. 12, 14. So Phil. 3. 20.

Reason 1. Because it takes off our minds from all those things, that belong unto this present world.

2. Because it makes us to prepare ourselves for the world to come, 1 John 3. 3.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to raise up our minds, as much as may be unto this spiritual looking for the Lord.

Doct. 4. Our chiefest care touching the coming of the Lord, should be, to be found of him in peace.

This is gathered from v. 14. Now by peace is meant that condition which is pleasing unto God and approved of him; whereupon not the anger, but the goodness and grace of the Lord is shown in communicating all happiness.

Reason 1. Because the Lord is looked for, as the supreme Judge, whose anger is to be fled from and avoided, and his approbation and good liking greatly to be sought for.

2. Because unless peace be then had, afterwards it cannot be had forever.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, while we live here, continually to seek to confirm our peace with God, and in our own consciences. Now this is done by raising up in ourselves a lively faith and confidence, establishing our hearts with all assurance of salvation, and following all those means whereby our calling and election is made sure.

Doct. 5. From the longsuffering of God we must gather those things which make for the promoting of our peace and salvation.

This is gathered from v. 15. For when the Apostle tells us, that we should account, that the long suffering of the Lord is salvation, he means that we should so think with ourselves and dispute of these things, that we should gather nothing else from thence, but that God aims at our salvation, and therefore we also should take great care of it.

Reason. Because by these meditations we should confirm and increase both our faith and our sanctification. For our reasonings and disputes, when they are rightly directed either by the word, or by the works of God, as by a third argument, to the strengthening of our faith and increase of holiness, a^r unto a conclusion drawn from thence; they are those moral means whereby we work out our salvation with fear and trembling.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to exercise ourselves more and more in such meditations: for being accustomed thereunto, from them we shall gather honey and medicine, whence others suck poison; as we may see in this example, where from the Lord's prolonging of his coming the wicked men did conclude those things whereby they might confirm their profane opinions; but the faithful are taught on the contrary, by the same argument to conclude those things, which make much for their salvation. Such is the Apostles admonition, Rom. 6. 12.

Doct. 6. In the writings of the Apostles and Prophets, Christians must have a special heed to those things, which do most direct them to such connexions or conclusions.

This is gathered from verse 15. Where Paul's testimony is cited to confirm & illustrate this connection, & not to prove other things, which might easily be proved out of his writings.

Reason 1. Because these are most necessary for us to know, and of perpetual use.

2. Because that was the wisdom of God communicated to the Apostles and Prophets, that they might explain these truths unto us most frequently, and clearly, which is the reason of that elogy which is given unto Paul in the text, according to the wisdom given unto him he hath written unto us.

Use. This may serve to reprove those, that do more willingly by far give heed unto those things, which do little or nothing at all touch the conscience of a man, or the practice of his life. The inward inclination and disposition of a man appears manifestly by those things which he doth chiefly heed in his reading and hearing: As if a man be given only to the tongues, he will observe nothing but the words and phrases: If he be a lover of Chronology, he will take notice of nothing but the things that have been done, and the moments of time wherein they were done: If he be a Disputer, one that seeketh praise by arguing, he will mark nothing, but those things which make for controversies: so a godly man, although he will not neglect other things, which serve for his use, yet he doth chiefly fix his mind upon those things, which do most directly tend unto godliness.

Doct. 7. We must understand all these things so, as if they were directly written unto us.

This is gathered from these words, Hath written unto us. So Hebr. 12. 5.

Reason 1. Because such was the wisdom of God, which spake in these holy men, that they wrote those things which do belong unto us, as well as unto those that lived at that time.

2. Because God would have the Scripture to be the public instrument of the Church, not of one age only, but of all ages. Therefore every part of it is the rule of life both to me and thee, as well as unto those to whom it was first given.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, not so much to meddle in the Scriptures, as if we were in another man's ground, or in those things which belong unto others, and not unto ourselves.

2. To exhort us, to raise up our minds to receive the word of God with a congruous affection. We may easily think with ourselves how our minds would be affected, if we should receive a letter that was written by the hand of God in heaven; and directed unto us by name, and sent unto us by one of his Angels: after the same manner should we be affected in reading and hearing the written word of God.

Doct. 8. In other truths that are less necessary for us to know, there are some things hard to be understood.

This is gathered from v. 16. He doth not say this of all Paul's Epistles, nor of any one whole Epistle, much less of the whole Scripture, (as the Patrons of traditions, and Enemies of Scripture would have it,) but of some few things: And he seems to point chiefly at some of those things, which Paul wrote concerning the coming of the Lord, because he speaks of that in this place, & therefore it is very likely that he hath reference unto those things which are spoken of, 2 Thess. 2. 2.

Reason 1. Because there are some divine mysteries so far remote from us, that in what words soever they be expressed, they will always be hard to be understood.

2. Because God would have some things, that are not of so general and necessary a use, out of his singular wisdom to be more obscurely propounded: which seems to be the proper reason, why those things of Antichrist, 2 Thess. 2. were in the Primitive Church hard to be understood. For God would for just causes, that Antichrist should come, and that most men should be ignorant who he was, until he did come.

3. God would exercise the industry and diligence of the faithful in searching the Scriptures, and finding out the sense and meaning of them, not to deter men from reading them as the Papists use to do, by wresting this argument amiss. For Peter in this place doth not discourage so much as the common sort of the faithful from reading the Scriptures, but rather stirs them up to read all the Epistles of Paul, although he tells them that there are some things in them that must be read warily.

Use 1. This may serve to admonish us, not to think it sufficient that we know the words of the Scripture, but to give all diligence and labor to find out the true sense and meaning of them.

2. To comfort us, that we should not be too much cast down, if we do not fully understand some things in the Scripture, because we are told that there are some things hard to be understood.

Doct. 9. They are unlearned and unstable men, that wrest the Scripture to maintain their impiety.

For that the Apostle means, when he saith that they wrest the Scriptures to their own destruction; not that it is such an exceeding dangerous thing to interpret some place of Scripture otherwise then it should be, but that it is the property of a very wicked man to argue out of the word of God against God, or against his will. Now they are called unlearned, not because they have no skill in the tongues or arts, wherein such pestiferous men may sometimes excel; but because they never effectually learned or were taught those things which pertain unto religion: And in the like manner are they called unstable, because in that knowledge of the truth which they had and professed, they were not grounded and rooted, but as men not grounded nor settled they are easily turned from their profession.

Use. This may serve for admonition, that the people should not therefore be deterred from reading the Scriptures, as the Papists would have it, (who in this very thing show themselves to be unlearned and unstable, because they do mischievously wrest this place, where they are expressly told, with how great danger it is wont to be done:) but that we should labor to cast off all ignorance and unsteadfastnesse, that so we may be made fit to read the Scriptures with profit. For this is the scope of the admonition, as the Apostle useth it in this place.

Doct. 10. The end and scope of all divine information and instruction in respect of the faithful is, that they may be stablished and grow in that grace which they have received.

This is gathered therehence, that this is the conclusion of this general Epistle, as it was of the former; which holds good also in all other Epistles and Sermons, in respect of those that are now faithful:

Reas. Because by their effectual calling they have faith, hope, and charity begotten in them, so that they have the principle of all grace in them, nor can anything be wanting •elies the continuation, confirmation, and increase of the same grace.

Doct. 11. To obtain steadfastness in grace there is required a fore-knowledge of those things that tend to the confirming and strengthening of our minds.

This is gathered from these words: Seeing ye know these things before.

Reas. Because although our steadfastness depends upon God▪ and the effectual operation of his Spirit, as it is in the conclusion of the 1 Pet. 5. 10. Yet God worketh in us not only by a real efficacy, but also agreeable to an intelligent nature by teaching and persuading. Now nothing can be wrought• by this moral way, unless knowledge go before, and so i• must be wrought by knowledge, as it is in the text.

Use 1. This may serve to refute the Papists, who maintain• ignorance and commend it in the common people: they are sufficiently refuted by him, from whom they boast that they have received the Chair, free from all error. For Peter in thi• place, 1 Requires knowledge of all the faithful, yea, an• fore-knowledge too of those things whereby they might b• confirmed against profane men and false teachers. 2 He pre•supposeth that all that were truly faithful to whom this Epi•stle came, were already endued with this knowledge. 3 H• presupposeth that his Epistles were so clear and so ea•ie to b• understood that all the faithful which should read them wit• godly minds, might understand out of them, and consequent•lie out of the Scriptures, those things, whereby they bein• forewarned, might be fore-armed against those false deceiver• whereof he spake.

2. To admonish us, not so to look for our confirmation and strengthening from God, as that we should in the mean time neglect the knowledge of those things that tend there•unto, but to use all our endeavor both in general to know those things that are absolutely necessary unto salvation, an• in particular, those things that are necessary for us in our pra•ctise upon occasion of any temptation.

Doct. 12. Besides knowledge there is required also unto th• steadfastness of grace a continual and vigilant heed.

This is gathered from this word, Beware.

Reason 1. Because knowledge is unprofitable, if it be not reduced to practice. Now practice in difficult things cannot be had without care and heed.

2. Because many are the fallacies wherewith we are assaulted, both in the Devil and his instruments that are without us, and in ourselves also, by reason of that marvelous deceitfulness of our hearts, such as cannot be expressed.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, above all to take notice of ourselves, and those things that tend to the strengthening and stablishing of us in grace.

Doct. 13. It should be an argument to the faithful to beware of the errors of some men, because they are wicked men, ungodly, and profane.

This is gathered from that title, the error of the wicked.

Reason. Because all those things that have any agreement with ungodliness are to be shunned and avoided. Now those things that are in a special manner approved of by profane men, must necessarily have an agreement with profane ungodliness.

Use. This may serve to admonish us, by this means amongst others to strengthen ourselves against divers errors, that are most pleasing to profane men.

Doct. 14. Sedfastnesse and increase of grace are joined together.

This is gathered from the connection of v. 17. with the 18.

Reason 1. Because like as trees and all plants, and also living creatures, from which this metaphor is taken, are corroborated by growth, while they acquire greater and perfecter strength, so also do the faithful.

2. Because the steadfastness of grace consists not therein, that it continues in the same degree, but that it is formed in its nature, one property whereof of is, to grow until it come to perfection.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to labor therefore to be so stablished, that we may also grow and increase in all grace.

Doct. 15. They grow in grace, that grow in the effectual knowledge of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ.

See Chapter 1. Verse 2.

Doct. 16. Our 〈◇〉 and desire in all things, even in those th•• that pertain to our own salvation, should be the eternal glo•• God in Christ.

This is gathered from the last words.

Reason 1. Because we are the servants of Christ bo•• with his own blood. Now whatsoever the servants get 〈◇〉 turns to the proper good and benefit of their Masters.

2. Because God is absolutely the chiefest good.

3. Unless we do this, whatsoever we do, it is not 〈◇〉 out of religion. For it is the nature of religion to give the 〈◇〉 unto God.

Use. This may serve to exhort us, to lift up our minds 〈◇〉 and more to maintain the glory of God in all things, 〈◇〉 Apostle doth by that closing particle, Amen.

Jmprinted, Anno MDCXXXIX.

TO THE ILLVSTRIOVS AND MIGHTIE LORD'S, THE STAES of Zealand.

I Purpose not (Honorable LORD'S) to insinuate myself, or my endeavors into your Favor, by fine words, and feined commendations of your Virtues. For I do not think it will be acceptable unto wise mē, who both suspect that Art, and account it base; Though of myself I am not apt to flatter, yet the very name of Conscience that is set before this Treatise, chargeth me to avoid it. Many indifferent good Books are in the very beginning disgraced by it. I will only show the true cause, by which I was persuaded (though my name perhaps be more obscure, then to be known unto you) to set down your Name in the forefront of this Treatise.

It is reported over all places near hand, that the Doctrine according to Godliness, is both more Practically Preached by the Pastors, and more put in practice by the Hearers in your Churches, then yet hath been marked in many others, though they hold the same Doctrine.

That worthy Servant of the Lord, Master WILLIAM TEELING, who was by this means in great admiration, and famous throughout all the Low-Country Churches, (to say nothing of others, that both have, and do take the same course) took such painful pains this way, both publicly and privately, by word and writing, that it may be truly said, The zeal of God's house hath eaten him up: whereby also (Envy the follower of such a Virtue, being now overcome) he hath obtained that Crown, which God hath prepared for those that have instructed many unto righteousness.

Because I hope this Treatise will more excite to this kind of study, it being also desired by many, who were not to be neglected. Its fittest it should be sent, where it may find those running this race, who will be easily put on, and where others also may take example of that course that is taught here.

This being the true cause of the Dedication, gives me cause to hope, that this intention and service will not be unacceptable unto you. This only remaineth (Noble Lord's) The good and great God in Christ, vouchsafe to bless you more and more, and your Churches, with a true faith, a good Conscience, and perfect Happiness.

Your Honors most addicted W. Ames.

TO THE READER.

I Gladly call to mind the time, when being young, I heard, worthy Master PERKINS, so Preach in a great Assembly of Students, that he instructed them soundly in the Truth, stirred them up effectually to seek after Godliness, made them fit for the kingdom of God; and by his own example shown them, what things they should chiefly intend, that they might promote true Religion, in the power of it, unto God's glory, and others salvation:

And amongst other things which he Preached profitably, he began at length to Teach, How with the tongue of the Learned one might speak a word in due season to him that is weary, out of Isaiah. 50. 4. by untying and explaining diligently, CASES OF CONSCIENCE (as they are called.) And the LORD found him so doing like a faithful Servant. Yet left he many behind him affected with that study; who by their godly Sermons (through God's assistance) made it to run, increase, and be glorified throughout England.

My heart hath ever since been so set upon that Study, that I have thought it worthy to be followed with all care, by all men. Since also (God's good providence so disposing it) that I lived out of mine own Country, I did observe that in divers Churches, pure both for Doctrine and Order, this Practical teaching was much wanting, and that this want was one of the chief causes of the great neglect, or carelessness in some duties which nearly concern Godliness, and a Christian life. My mind was set on, as it were by violence, to try at least in private, whether I were able to prevail with some young men that purpose the Ministry, more to apply their minds to this kind of handling of Divinity; whence no small fruit was to be hoped for. Being afterwards called to a public charge of Teaching in the University, I esteemed nothing better, or more excellent, then to go before those that were Students for the Ministry, in this manner of teaching.

This part of Prophecy hath hitherto been less practiced in the Schools of the Prophets, because our Captains were necessarily enforced to fight always in the front against the enemies to defend the Faith, and to purge the floor of the Church; So that they could not plant and water the Fields and Vineyards as they desired; as it useth to fall out in time of hot wars. They thought with themselves in the mean while (as one of some note writes) If we have that single and clear eye of the Gospel if in the house of our Heart the candle of pure Faith be set upon a Candlestick, these small matters might easily be discussed. But experience hath taught at length, that through neglect of this husbandry, a famine of Godliness hath followed in many places, and out of that famine a grievous spiritual plague; insomuch that the counsel of Nehemiah had need be practiced; namely, that every man should labor in this work with one hand, holding in the other a Spear or a Dart, whereby he may repel the violence of the enemies. The same Experience hath likewise taught, that these small matters (if so be that so necessary things may be so called) are despised with no less madness, then if one would suffer the fingers and toes of his hands and feet to be cut off, as some small things, without which he hoped to walk and use his hands well enough. All things therefore being rightly weighed, I have taken in hand (God also liking it, as I am persuaded) these instructions touching the power of Conscience. Not that I hope that any perfect thing, in this kind, can come from me: (for there are more kinds of things this way, then that certain answers can be given (by me at least) to everyone) but that I might do something, whereby the unlearned, and such as are destitute of better help, might somewhat be helped; and that the more learned might be excited to set forth some more perfect and exact thing. Of which duty the godly, learned, grave ancient Preachers are properly the Debtors, whose daily labor it is to deal with the Consciences of men; who through their experience have learned much better, what those questions are, in which the Conscience useth most to doubt, and out of what grounds they may be best unfolded; then can easily be understood by one that lives privately in an Academical profession. And indeed, if such things were handled in the meetings of Preachers, according to the variety of Cases that fall out; and the more remarkable decisions set down in writing; the children of Israel should not need to go down to the Philistines (that is, our Suttents to Popish Authors) to sharpen every man his Share, his Mattocke, or his Axe, or his weeding Hooke, as it fell out in the extreme necessity of God's people, 1 Sam. 13. 20.

Furthermore if such as are addicted to the Ministry, were first instructed in these things, and were seriously tried in them at the Examination, before they were ordained, one might well hope, to have as well Preachers as Churches, more according to God's heart and Christ's, then now we have.

The Papists have labored much this way, to instruct their Confessors: and in a great deal of earth and dirt of Superstitions, they have some veins of Silver: out of which, I suppose, I have drawn some things that are not to be despised. But they are without the life of this Doctrine: and death is in their pot. The thing it self requires, that by others, other things be taught, and the same things, after another manner. I have gone about to perform this in part: and others I make no question, will endeavor it.

I follow here the same method, that I did in my Marrow of Divinity. Of the second part whereof, the three last of these Books are a full Exposition: which perhaps, those did expect that desired importunately, as it were by daily reproaches, that the publishing of this Treatise might be hastened. But (to make an end at length of my Preface) I will conclude many things in few words, and that in the words of G. Parisiensis, Concerning these things, many things we have not written for unskillfulness, many for other necessary business, many for dullness, many through fear of being tedious, many more because of our sins, which most of all hinder both us and others in such things. We doubt not, but we are subject to the danger of slanderous Backbiters; But by doing what we may, we have given some fit occasion unto wise men; and we have set forth, not a dry sandy ground of fruitless Disputations, but a most profitable and healthful place for Wits to exercise themselves in.

W. AMES.

OF CONSCIENCE, AND THE CASES THEREOF. The First Book.

CHAP. I. The definition of Conscience.

THE Conscience of man (for I do not intend to treat of the Conscience of Angels) Is a man's judgment of himself, according to the judgment of God of him. Isaiah, 5. 3. Judge I pray you between me and my vineyard: 1 Cor. 11. 31. If we would judge our selves, we should not be judged, &c.

1 I call Conscience Judgment, First, to show that it belongs to the Understanding, not to the Will. The very name of Conscience showeth it to be so. But this proveth it, because all those actions, which in the Scriptures are attributed to man's Conscience, do properly belong to the reasonable power, or faculty; though the Will by some act or inclination can both command the Understanding to judge, and also follow that judgment. This inclination, by some, is called Conscience; by others, a part of Conscience; but not rightly.

2 Conscience being referred to judgment, it is distinguished from the bare apprehension of truth. For Conscience doth always suppose an assent that is firm and settled.

3 By the definition of Conscience, it appeareth that Conscience is not a contemplative judgment, whereby truth is simply discerned from falsehood: but a practical judgment, by which, that which a man knoweth is particularly applied to that which is either good or evil to him, to the end that it may be a rule within him to direct his will.

Seeing that this name of judgment, is sometimes taken for a power and faculty, sometimes for an habit, sometimes for an act; this question ariseth, to which of all these Conscience is properly.

4 The most grave Divine, William Perkins, who only of our Countrymen hath set forth a peculiar Treatise of Conscience, doth place it among Faculties; and he doth so define it, as he putteth for the general nature of it a part of the Understanding, that is to say, as he explains himself, A natural power or faculty. He gives this reason of his opinion, namely, because the act of Accusing, Comforting, Terrifying, &c. cannot be ascribed to the Conscience, if it self were an act. Put this reason is weak: because in the Scriptures such kinds of effects are attributed to the thoughts themselves, which undoubtedly are acts. Rom. 2. 15. Their thoughts Accusing one another, or Excusing. The reason is, because things done, are the effects not only of the Mover, but also of the motiō it self. Besides, Master Perkins maketh Conscience, Understanding, Opinion, Knowledge, Faith, and Prudence, to be of one kind or sort; but none would define these so, as that they should be taken for distinct faculties of the soul.

5 Some of the Schoolmen will have Conscience to be an habit: as Scotus, Bonaventure, Durand. Which though it might be granted of some part; or of the principles of Conscience: yet it cannot be granted simply of all that which is signified by the name of Conscience; for the only office of an Habite, as it is an Habit, is, Inclinare ad prompte agendum, to make one do a thing readily: but Conscience hath other operations, which belong properly to it, as to Accuse, Comfort, &c.

6 By Judgment therefore, in the definition of Conscience, (I understand most properly with the best Schoolmen) an act of practical judgment, proceeding from the Understanding by the power or means of a habit.

7 The acts of judgment are, either a simple apprehension, or a discourse. Whence it may be asked, to which of these belongs Conscience.

It belongs to judgment discoursing, because it cannot do its act of Accusing, Excusing, Comforting, unless it be through the means of some third argument, whose force appeareth only in a Syllogism, by that which is deduced and concluded out of it.

8 The force and nature of Conscience therefore is contained in such a Syllogism.

He that lives in sin, shall die:

I live in sin; Therefore, I shall die.

Or thus.

Whosoever believes in Christ, shall not die but live.

I believe in Christ: Therefore, I shall not die but live.

9 Conscience in regard of the Proposition is called a Light, and a Law; in regard of the Assumption and conclusion a Witness; but in regard of the assumption it is most fitly termed an Index, or a Book, and in regard of the conclusion, most properly a Judge.

10 That which doth dictate or give the proposition is called Synteresis, by the Schoolmen Synderesis. The assumption especially and peculiarly is called Syneidësis, the conclusion is the Krisis, or Judgment.

11 There be many other Syllogisms which belong to Conscience, as either they do prove the proposition of such a principal Syllogism, or illustrate the conclusion it self: but in that Syllogism alone is contained the whole nature of Conscience. The Proposition treateth of the Law; the Assumption of the fact or state, and the Conclusion of the relation arising from the fact or state, in regard of that Law; The Conclusion either pronounceth one guilty, or giveth spiritual peace and security.

CHAP. II. Of the Synteresis, or storehouse of Principles.

THat Synteresis out of which the proposition of this syllogisine or the Law of Conscience is taken, is most properly a habit of the understanding, by which we do assent unto the principles of moral actions, that is, such actions as are our duty, because God hath willed, or commanded them; whence it hath the name in Greek from conserving; for through the goodness of God, the knowledge of many things which we ought to do or shun, are still conserved in man's mind, even after his fall.

That exposition of Durand who dreams that the Greek word Synteresis signifies a Co•...lection, is too harsh and absurd.

2 Because this Synteresis is an habit, therefore many do call Conscience, an habit: but it is only the principle of conscience, neither doth it make up any part of conscience, but only as conscience is in its exercse.

3 This Synteresis is termed a natural habit in respect of the light, whereby the understanding of man is fitted to give assent unto Natural principles; it is likewise called an acquired habit, in regard of the Species, or of the fuller understanding of that whereunto the understanding is naturally enabled, and can (as it were) understand presently.

4 This Synteresis differs only in respect or apprehension from the Law of Nature, or from that Law of God, which is naturally written in the hearts of all men; for the law is the object, and Synteresis is the object apprehended, or the apprehension of the object.

5 This Synteresis may for a time be hindered from acting, but cannot be utterly extinguished or lost. Hence it is that no man is so desperately wicked as to be void of all Conscience.

6 To Synteresis being taken after a large sense, ought to be referred, not only general conclusions touching right or Law, which are deduced by good consequence out of natural principles, but likewise all practical truths, whereunto we give a firm assent, through the revelation we have by faith.

7 From hence ariseth the distinction of Conscience into that which is Natural, and that which is Inlightened. Natural Conscience is that which acknowledgeth for law the principles of nature, and the conclusions arising from them. Inlightened is that which doth beside those, acknowledge whatsoever is prescribed in the Scriptures. The Scripture sometimes speaketh of this last: as Rom. 6. 3. and sometimes of the other as 1 Cor: 6: 8.

8 From hence it appeareth that the perfect and only rule of Conscience is the revealed will of God, whereby a man's duty is both shown and commanded. For Synteresis in a more large sense consisteth, partly of moral principles that are naturally in us, together with their conclusions; and partly, of those which God besides them hath enjoined. But the revealed will of God whereby man knows his duty, containeth both these.

9 Hence it is that the Law of God only doth bind the Conscience of man. By the Law of God we understand that revealed will of God, whereof we have made mention: viz. as it doth also contain those things which are commanded in the Gospel.

10 To bind (in this moral sense) is to have such an authority, as the Conscience ought to submit it self unto: And it were a sin to do anything contrary to it.

11 Hence it is, that though men be bound in Conscience by God to observe in due and just circumstances the laws of men, yet the same laws of men so far as they are man's laws, do not bind the Conscience.

12 The Conscience is immediately subject to God, and his will, and therefore it cannot submit it self unto any creature without Idolatry.

13 God only knows the inward workings of the Conscience; he therefore only can prescribe a law unto it, or bind it by one.

14 God only can punish the Conscience when it sinneth; he therefore only can forbid anything to it.

15 Even a promise (which in it self is sacred) though it be confirmed by an oath: as it is an act of man doth not properly bind the Conscience, for the former reasons; though men are bound in conscience by God to a strict and faithful keeping of them. For as it hath been said before of the laws of men, it may also in some sort be affirmed of all covenants and other conditions, which being made, a man is bound to keep out of Conscience to God; as for example, the sick person is bound in Conscience to obey the counsel of Physicians for his health: But the receipts prescribed by Physicians, do not bind the Conscience. So again, Parents and Children are bound to mutual duties; he that hath received a benefit is bound to show himself thankful, (and the like may be said of many other things) yet none of these, either Parent, Benefactor, relation, or benefit, do of themselves bind the Conscience, but the will of God in them.

CHAP. III. Of the Office of Conscience.

THE office of Conscience, (if we speak with respect to the Synteresis or Laws of it,) is one in Necessary things; Another in things of middle and indifferent nature. In necessary things Conscience hath two acts. 1 To bind, 2 To enforce to practice.

2 Conscience bindeth according as it is informed of the will of God: for in it self it hath the power of a will of God, and so stands in the place of God himself.

3 God's will as it is understood, or may be understood, binds the Conscience to assent; As it is acknowledged and received by Conscience, it binds the whole man to obey and do it presently.

4 Conscience bindeth a man so straitly that the command of no creature can free a man from it.

5 Hence man, as he maketh Conscience of the will of God commanding him some duty, is in that regard called a Debtor, Rom: 1 14. a servant, Rom 6. 16. is said to be bound, Acts 20. 22. constrained, 2. Cor. 5. 14. to have a necessity laid upon him. 1 Cor. 9. 16. so that he cannot do otherwise. Acts 4. 20.

6 Conscience enforceth to obedience by virtue of this its act of Binding. For that is to the will an impulsive cause to make it carry it self conscientiously.

7 This inforcement is signified in the fore-named places and phrases: the strength and power thereof is declared, Ier. 20. 9. Wherefore I thought from henceforth not to speak of him, nor to preach anymore in his name, but the word of the Lord, was a very Burning fire in my heart, and in my bones: Amos. 3. 8. The Lion hath roared, who will not be afraid? the Lord hath spoken who can but Prophecy? Acts. 17. 16. his spirit was stirred in him.

8 If there be a constant disposition of will in a man consenting to this instigation of Conscience, they do together make up a Conscience morally good.

9 In Indifferent things the Actions and Duties of Conscience are likewise two. 1. To discern. 2. To Direct.

10 To Discerne is to show and declare the differences of things what is necessary, what is free, what is lawful, and what is unlawful.

11 To Direct is with regard had to circumstances, to order lawful actions unto a good end.

12 The ends which are always to be aimed at, even in indifferent things also, are the Glory of God, the Edifying of our Neighbor, and the Help of our necessary Actions.

13 The power of this direction is so great, that it makes an action to be good, which in its own nature is but indifferent; as on the other side, not only an evil direction, but the want of a good direction, makes the same action to be bad.

CHAP. IV. Of an erroneous Conscience.

TOuching this doctrine, of the first acts and offices of Conscience, divers questions are moved, which being of great weight and moment, for the directing of our Actions aright throughout our whole life, ought of necessity to be here expedited, though briefly.

Quest. The first question is, Whether an erroneous Conscience doth bind?

Answ. To unfold this question rightly, these five things are briefly to be opened: 1. What an erroneous Conscience is. 2. About what things it is conversant. 3. Whence the error of Conscience cometh. 4. The general differences of these errors. 5. The several ways of binding.

1 An erroneous Conscience is either opposed privatiuely to a good Conscience, so it comprehendeth every Conscience that judgeth not rightly when it ought, even the doubtful and scrupulous Conscience also: or positively, so it signifieth only that Conscience, that judgeth otherwise then the thing is. This kind of erroneous Conscience, is distinguished from a doubting and scrupulous Conscience, by the sin assent it giveth, though it erreth in giving it. In this question we speak of a Conscience positively erring.

2 There are some principles so clear, and written in the hearts of all men, that they cannot err to obey and practice them: such as this is, That God ought to be loved▪ Perjurie ought to be eschewed: no man's Conscience can err in such like things as these, or do them against Conscience. A man cannot love God against his Conscience, &c. Conscience therefore doth err properly about conclusions that are gathered from such principles.

3 The error of Conscience comes, either because that the particular conclusions are not rightly drawn out of the general principles: Or because those things which God in the Scripture hath commanded us to believe, are not sufficiently understood: Or finally, because the assent of Faith is not given to those things which ought to be believed, though they be understood. The cause of this (besides God's secret judgments) is either the not considering of those things which ought to be considered, or some evil disposition, which either keeps the mind from due inquiry, or averts it from judging rightly.

4 The error of Conscience is either about the Act, or the rule of it. The error which is about the rule, is either after the action done, or before it. The error about the rule before the action be done, consists, Either in that it judgeth that to be lawful, which is unlawful; Or in that it judgeth that to be unlawful, which is lawful; Or in that it judgeth that to be bounden duty, which either is unlawful, or but lawful.

5 To bind to a thing, and to bind, are distinguished by some; Conscience is said to bind to a thing (Obligare) when its not only a sin to do anything against it, but also not to do according to it. Conscience is said to bind (Ligare) when one cannot lawfully do a thing, whilst he maketh such a Conscience of it. One shall sin in doing against it, and sin though he do according to it. The sense and meaning of this distinction is to be approved; as for the terms of it, let the Authors thereof answer.

To bind to a thing, (Obligare) is by some in regard of the object, or thing bound to, distinguished thus. One is either bound to do according to Conscience erring, or to lay aside that Conscience. But this distinction is not exact, because Conscience bindeth not, but so far as it doth dictate, or declare a thing: now no Conscience while it erreth doth declare, that the error thereof is to be left, Or that it self is not to be regarded, because it is erroneous.

Others put a difference between that Obligation, whereby one is tied to do what Conscience commandeth, and that whereby one is tied not to do the contrary. But neither is this distinction always good. For if a man's Conscience told him he might lie to save his life, he must either lie, or of necessity go against his Conscience.

6 Out of these grounds the question may be thus answered: First, conscience, though erroneous, binds always so, that he that doth against it, sinneth. The reason is, because he that doth against conscience, doth against God's will: though not materially, and truly; yet formally, and by interpretation: because what the conscience doth declare, it declareth as God's will. As for example.

He that useth a private man contumeliously, taking him for the King, & not to be a private man, he is interpreted and judged to have done it to the King himself; so likewise, he that contemneth Conscience, contemneth God himself; because that which Conscience doth dictate, is supposed to be the will of God. Hence it is that he always sinneth who doth anything against Conscience: but if the conscience doth not err, but the thing is as erroneous conscience supposeth, then he sinneth doubly. First, in doing that which is ill in it self▪ and secondly, in doing it after an evil manner: evil it is in its own nature, and evil because of the despising of conscience: but if the conscience doth err, that which it doth is not evil, but it doth it after an evil manner; so that the evil is only this, namely, the contempt of Conscience.

7 The error of conscience which is about an action (that is, the error which is about the object or matter, about which an action ought to be exercised) is either unvoluntary and blameless, or voluntary and worthy of blame. If it be unvoluntary and blameless, then conscience binds to do a thing as much, as if it did not err. For example, If a man should verily believe something to be his own, which is another man's, he may, and ought in conscience to make use of it as his own. If one do verily believe he is his Prince, that is in truth a Tyrant; or that he is a lawful Magistrate, who indeed usurps the title; •...e is bound to yield due obedience unto him. We have an example hereof in Iaa...ob that went in to Leah that was none of his wise, whom he verily thought was his wife Rachel.

8 If the error be voluntary, then it is to be judged of, as an error is which is of the law or rule.

9 Conscience erring touching the Law after the fact, (in believing that which it hath done well, to be sin; or contrariwise;) hath no power to bind in regard of that action which is past: because binding and obliging have ever a regard to future actions: and a moral action (as the will it self) is always guided and informed by a foregoing apprehension, and not by that which follows after. Hence no action is made better or worse, for that conscience which is after it. Yet doth this conscience so far bind (through occasion of that which is done) that one cannot lawfully go on to do the like again, so long as he hath such a conscience: viz. That he hath sinned (though he hath not) in doing so before.

10 Conscience through error, judging that to be lawful which is unlawful; as that it is lawful for one to lie, to save his own, or his neighbors life; binds indeed, but doth not bind to do so. It binds; because he that hath such a conscience, can neither lie, nor abstain from lying, without sin. He cannot lie, because this is simply unlawful. He cannot abstain from lying, with such a conscience, because such manner of forbearance is forbidden by God, though forbearing it self be commanded: for God requires not only that we do good, and abstain from doing evil; but likewise that we perform both these with a good conscience, and not with a bad one. Such a conscience doth not bind to do what it saith. First, because there is no obligation to unlawful things. Secondly, because Conscience bindeth not to do, but by virtue of some command of God; but such a conscience is not grounded upon any command: for the Law of God can neither incline nor bind any man to sin. Thirdly, because this error is always a sin, but a sin doth not bind to practice it. Fourthly, because such a Conscience hath never so sure a ground, as that there needeth not further examination and inquiry into things. Fifthly, because man is bound to lay down such a conscience; for although that be not exactly enough spoken which some do affirm, namely, That such a Conscience bindeth a man to lay down it self; yet it is most certain, that a man is tied to lay down such an erroneous Conscience, for it is a part of that old man, whom we are commanded to put off, Ephes. 4. 22.

11 Conscience judging that which is lawful to be unlawful, bindeth to abstain from the practice and use of it. Rom. 14. 23. The reason is, because one may abstain from lawful things without sin.

12 conscience judging that to be bounden duty which is unlawful, binds, but not to the practice of it, for the reasons set down in the ninth Thesis.

13 conscience judging that to be bounden duty which is only lawful, bindeth to the practice of it; as for example, If any man's conscience tell him that it is necessary to uncover his hands always when he prays publicly; He must pray so, because lawful things may be observed constantly without sin.

Object. If an erroneous conscience doth so bind that we may neither follow, nor not follow it without sin, then there lies a kind of necessity of sinning on those that do thus err, which cannot stand with the equity of God's Law.

Answ. This necessity of firming when one is entangled by his own erroneous conscience, is not the same both ways: viz. whether one do, or do not, according to conscience; for if one do according to his erring conscience, the sin is in the action done; If he do what is not according to it, the sin is in the manner of doing.

2 It is not an absolute necessity, but upon supposition; namely, if he keep still such a conscience, which he both may, and ought to lay down.

3 This necessity doth not flow from the nature of God's law, but is contracted and continued through man's sin, for no man is thus entangled without his own fault.

Quest. Whether is it a greater sin to do against such an erroneous conscience, or to do according to it.

Answ. We ought to judge of the greatness of sin according to the quality of the thing which is to be done or omitted, as it is in its own nature, and as it is apprehended by us. If any man through error of conscience should hold it to be an unlawful thing to go to the Church, and serve God there (which otherwise he is tied to do) because he knows the Preacher to be a lewd and naughty man, and thinks that he shall be partaker with him in his wickedness; his sin is greater in staying away, then if he were present there: because it is a greater sin, to neglect God's service, then to communicate with an others personal wickedness in that service. But if he should think it unlawful to be present at holy duties for Idolatry, which he judgeth will be committed there, he should sin more heinously if he should be present there: because the sin of Idolatry, is greater then a neglect of true worship. In the first instance; he sins more that follows his conscience, then he that doth against it; but in this, his sin is greater that doth contrary to it: No certain and general rule therefore can be set down in this matter.

CHAP. V. Of a surmising and doubting Conscience.

Quest. 1. Whether a man may content himself with a doubting Conscience?

Answ. For the unfolding of this question, it is to be noted, that Opinion sometimes signifies a certain and settled judgment without all doubting. A certain judgment nor arising from Sense, Knowledge, or true Faith, but Reason. Sometimes it is taken more strictly; For that judgment whereby indeed we assent to the truth of a thing, but not without suspicion, fear, or doubting of its being otherwise.

Upon this distinction, I answer: First, in such things as are necessary to salvation, and God's worship, no opinion can be sufficient, though it have never so great certainty of reason; because Faith is required to these, and Faith takes only the infallible word of God.

2 In such things which are more remote from their principles, diligent care is to be had, that we also get a certain persuasion, or belief of them, out of the Scriptures; but if that cannot be obtained, it is lawful in our actions to follow some such opinion, as is certain and tried by the rule of Scripture.

3 Using also all diligence to be certain (though we be not) it is lawful in many things to follow that opinion, which is most probable.

4 It is never lawful to do against our own opinion, whether it be certain, or probable, for respect to other men's authority.

5 No man can at the same time have two contrary probable opinions, concerning the same thing; so as he may lawfully leave the one, and follow the other.

Quest. 2 What shall one do when his Conscience is doubtful?

Answ. For the declaration of this question, we must observe: First, Conscience is said to be doubtful in a large sense, as when the assent even of Faith, or Opinion prevaileth; yet there is some doubting joined. But strictly, and properly, that Conscience is named doubting, which yieldeth to neither part of the question in hand, but sticks and staggers between assent and dissent, not knowing which to do.

Touching the first sort of doubting, it hath partly been spoken in the former question, and shall partly be spoken of in the question following. Here we treat of that Conscience, which in a proper and strict sense, is called doubting.

Secondly, doubting is either Speculative, or Practical. Speculative is that, which is not immediately conversant about a practice or action: as when one doubteth, whether this or that thing be his or not. Practical, is that, which immediately is conversant about some particular action.

Answ. These things being laid down, it is answered;

First, in all those doubts which do any way belong to our practice, diligent enquiry is to be made, that we may clearly perceive the truth and not doubt; because while the mind remains in doubt, the action must of necessity want that perfection which it would have, if it were done with Knowledge, and certainty of judgment. For the more certain our knowledge is, touching those things which we do, the more confident we are in doing, and more joyful when we have done them.

2 Oft times it is lawful to do a thing, though a speculative doubt remain, because he that doth so, doth not necessarily do either against a doubting Conscience, nor without a persuaded Conscience; for notwithstanding that speculative doubt, he may assuredly conclude with himself; that, that which he doth, ought to be done. As for example, A man possesseth a piece of ground lawfully, and begins to doubt whether it be his own or not; yet if he know not, that it belongs to any other body, he may lawfully keep the same still, because other things being considered, possession is a better ground to keep it, then doubting is to leave it.

3 It is not lawful to do anything against a Practical doubt; that is, a doubt whether the thing to be done be lawful: The reason is, 1. Because a man cannot do it of faith, Rom. 14. 23. 2 Because, he that doth so, doth not sufficiently abhor sin: for willingly and wittingly he exposeth himself to the danger of sinning. 3. Because he is not fully enough addicted to God's will; for as he that doth that willingly, whereof he doubts, whether it be acceptable to his friend or no, doth against the law of friendship: so he that doth that, whereof he doubts, whether it be acceptable to God or not; doth against the law of love to God. 4. In things doubtful, the safest way is to be chosen; but that is the safest part, which if we follow, it is certain we shall not sin. As for example, A man doubteth whether Usury be lawful or nor? the safest way is to abstain; for herein is no danger of sinning.

Some of the Philosophers had some knowledge of the equity of this rule, whose Judgment thereof Tully relates, and approves: Office: Lib. 1. Those give good counsel (saith he) who forbid to do anything whereof one doubts, whether it be just or unjust: the equity thereof is apparent in it self, because Doubting imports, thought, or fear of being hurt.

CHAP VI. Of a Scrupulous Conscience.

Quest. What is to be done when the conscience is scrupulous?

Answ. For the understanding of this question, we must consider;

1 That a Scruple is a fear of the mind concerning its practice, which vexeth the conscience, as a little stone that cannot be discerned in a man's shoe, paineth his foot.

2 Every fear is not properly a Scruple, but that which ariseth from slight, or no arguments.

3 One is scrupulous either in examining what he hath done, or in ordering what he is to do.

4 Scruples do arise, (God so ordaining) to the end he may either punish, or try men: sometimes out of the suggestion of the Devil, sometimes from want of knowledge, sometimes from Melancholy, or some such like constitution of body; sometimes from the society of scrupulous men.

5 A Scrupulous conscience differs from a Doubtfull one, in this, that a Doubtfull conscience doth assent to neither part of the question; but the scrupulous conscience doth assent to one, but is solicited to the other part, by a kind of fear.

These things being set down, it is answered to the question. 1. (God being instantly called unto for grace,) one must labor dilligently to remove these scruples, which reason can take away by due trial of the grounds of them. For then is the conscience most quiet, when it hath most certain knowledge. 2 It helpeth much (if it may be conveniently) that the thinking upon those things be shunned, from which scruples may rise; for the fancy being once stirred, many thoughts arise, which cannot be suppressed again, without great difficulty. As we see in Tyles, that are linked together in order, if one happen to fall down, the rest will follow: and from hence are scruples multiplied in timorous consciences.

3 Many scruples when they cannot well be taken away by some contrary reason, ought to be laid down as it were by violence, refusing to think or consider of them. For so long as scruples are not actually applied, they are not troublesome: And some be so troublesome that the weaker and more unskillful sort, can by no other means be ridd of them. The bending of the mind attentively to remove a scruple by reason, doth often either ingender or increase a scruple: as for example, All people know that the name of God ought to be called upon daily: yet one may be so vexed with impious thoughts, that this scruple may arise in a man, whether he ought to pray or not? Here it is not always a safe way to examine th...se thoughts, no... yet to dispute about this question long, but to throw away this fear, as it were with violence, and to fall upon the duty of prayer so well as one can. 4 If they cannot be so removed, but that they do still molest, it is lawful, and the best course, to do a thing against such scruples. As for example, If there be any man that is so molested through the consideration of his unworthiness, that he dare scarce be so bold as to come to the Lord's Table, though he find in himself true Faith and Repentance; he may and ought notwithstanding this scruple come to the Lord's Supper. Neither is this to do against Conscience, but according to Conscience. For a scruple is a rash fear and without any ground, and so cannot bind to do according to it; yea through custom of doing against such like scruples, Conscience it self is made more strong and settled.

CHAP. VII. Of the attention of Conscience to its Facts.

Hitherto we have spoken of that Synteresis, or Proposition, whence Conscience telleth what is Law. Now follows the second part of the judgment, whereby a man's conscience bears witness of his fact according to that Law. By reason of this act Conscience is named a witness, and in the common Proverb, a thousand witnesses. It is likewise called a Book, Revel. 20. 12. because it is left written in man's mind, at it were in a register, what he hath done, and with what intent, and at length is read and spoken of by Conscience.

The Assumption of that practical Syllogism wherein Conscience consists, is nothing else, but the recognizing, or considering of our action, or estate, as it hath respect to that Law which Conscience giveth. For the better understanding of the nature hereof, some things must be made clear concerning the action which is recognized; and some things concerning the recognizing itself.

The action is either agreeable to that which Conscience teacheth, or is contrary to it.

The dictate of Conscience, whereunto an action is to be conformed, doth sometime go before and accompany the action, and sometimes follow it. Against the dictate of Conscience that goeth before, or accompanieth the action, we have an example in those, of whom the Apostle speaks, Rom. 1. 32. Who knowing the Judgment of God, that they which commit such things are worthy of death, not only do the same, but have pleasure in them that do them. We have an example of an action committed against the judgment of Conscience, following the fact, in those Jews which put Christ to death through ignorance, Acts 3. 17. 1 Cor. 2. 8. yet being afterwards better taught, they judged far otherways of their fact, then when they did commit it, Acts 3. 37.

Quest. From hence ariseth a hard question, how a man can do anything against the dictate of Conscience which goeth before, or accompanieth his action? the Question ariseth thus.

The Will, as it seems to many, cannot will or nill anything, unless Reason have first judged it to be willed or nilled; neither can it choose but follow the last practical judgment, and do that which Reason doth dictate to be done: and by consequent, the Will cannot move against the determination of Conscience.

Answ. For the unfolding of this matter, these conclusions are to be laid down. It is so clear that no man can question it,

1. That many both may do, and do against Conscience, as it is an habit, or Summary of Principles: and in so doing, they do in some sense, go against Conscience.
2. Against Conscience as it is an act, all those do, who do anything against that Judgment which they had actually, and yet have virtually or in the principle, though actually they judge not as they have done formerly.
3. The Will cannot will, desire, choose, or follow after anything, without a speculative apprehension of it, because the object of the will is known Good. No man was ever known to desire what he no ways knew.
4. A bare and simple apprehension of the object, without any practical judgment, that forthwith it must be prosecuted, or avoided, may be sufficient to draw forth the Act of the Will. This appeareth sufficiently in Mad men, Infants, and in every undeliberate motion of the Will. The reason of this is, because a Good, apprehended or known, hath all those Conditions, which are required to the Object of the Will. The Will is as able about its Object, as the sensitive appetite is about its: But Sense is stirred up at the apprehension of its object, as the Eye at sight of Colours, the Eare at Sounds, &c.
- 5 The Will can at pleasure suspend its act about that which is apprehended and judged to be good, without any foregoing act of judgment, that it should do so; for if to suspend an act, and to leave of acting, an act of judgment, be necessarily required; then to suspend that judgment, another judgment is requisite; and to suspend that, another; and so in infinitum.
- 6 The Will can turn away the understanding frō the consideration of any object, which at present it apprehendeth and judgeth to be good, to the consideration that it hath formerly apprehended and judged to be so. By reason of this commanding power, the Will is the first cause of unadvisedness, and blame-worthy error in the Understanding. When the Will doth first begin, to draw away the understanding from that, which it hath judged to be good, it doth it, by its own inclination without any judgment that it should do so; otherwise these two judgments should be together; namely, this ought to be followed, and this ought not, which were absurd.

7 The Will can move it self, towards an object that is apprehended and judged good for profit or pleasure in some respect, though reason judge that it is not lawful but sinful. The reason is: 1. Because whatsoever good the understanding propoundeth to the will, in this life, it propoundeth it with a kind of indifferency of Judgment, as not having any necessary connection, with the universal good. Upon which the will is naturally set and determined. Hence it is that freedom or liberty in an action, is said to be radically in the judgment and reason. 2 Though the will be determined by the understanding in regard of the specification or kind of thing to be willed, because it willesh nothing but that which the understanding hath first apprehended; yet in regard of exercise or act of willing, it mooveth both it self, and the understanding with the rest of the faculties. And hence it is that liberty is in the will formally, which should not be true, if it were necessarily determined by the understanding. 3 If the judgment being right, the will could not but will aright; then before the first sin of Angels and men, (which was in the Will) there must necessarily be an error in the Understanding; and if so, then the punishment of sin should be before the first sin; for all Practical error in the Understanding, is either sin, or the punishment of it. 4. If the Will do necessarily follow the judgment of the understanding; then there should (in proper speaking) be no sin of malice, distinct from those sins, which are committed through ignorance, or passion. But it is manifest, that this kind of sin is found in Devils, & likewise in some men. 5. If the Will do necessarily follow the Understanding, then in Regeneration the will it self need not be internally renewed grace: for the enlightening of the Understanding would be sufficient. But this is repugnant to Faith and godliness.

8 Though the Will doth not always follow the Judgment, yet doth it ever follow that command whereto it is subject; and that agreeth oftentimes with Judgment. But this command though as touching the direction, it doth belong to the understanding; yet as touching the power and efficacy, it belongeth to the Will. From hence we speak truly, and by the consent of all Nations, say, I will Will.

CHAP. VIII. Of Conscience examining and reviewing actions.

WE are to treat next of that reviewing, which is conversant about our actions and state.

1 I call this a Reviewing, rather than a knowledge, First, because a bare and naked knowledge is not sufficient for this act of Conscience, but things must be weighed over and over. Secondly, because there is a knowledge which goeth before, and accompanieth the action, but this Reviewing followeth it.

2 This Reviewing is a reflect act of the Understanding, whereby a man understandeth, and with judgment, weigheth his own actions with their circumstances. It is commonly called, Cōsideration, or meditatiō on our ways. It is called in the Scripture, A respect or beholding by the mind, Psal. 119. 15. Considering, Psal. 50. 22. Thinking, or thinking again, Psal. 119. 59. Laying of the heart. Hag. 1. 5. a Saying in the heart, Ierem. 5. 24. Saying to the heart, Hos. 7. 2. Returning to the heart, 1 Kings 6. 47. a Laying to heart, Ier. 12. 11. Mal. 2. 2. and lastly, a Proving or examining of our selves, 2 Cor. 13. 5.

3 The cause of the Reviewing of our actions ought to be, First, a care to please God in all things. Secondly, a fear of sinning: For if we review our actions upon other grounds, it is not an act of Conscience: because it respecteth not the judgment of God; which without doubt, it is necessary an act of Conscience should do.

4 The manner of this Reviewing doth consist in these two things: First, that we consider our own actions, not materially only, but formally also, that is, that we consider not only, what we have done, as it is an action, but likewise what, and after what manner it is done, as it is good or evil. As for example, It is not an Act of Conscience, for a man to think, whether he hath overcome his adversary, or not; but whether in so doing, he hath committed murder or not? whether it be just, or unjust, that he hath done? 2. The actions and the rule must be compared together. For as he that speaketh the truth, knoweth not that he speaketh truth; unless he compares his speech with the thing it self: So he that doth well or ill, cannot know the same, unless he compare the fact with its proper rule. The rule of this trial or judgment, must not be our natural reason, the custom of others, or the like; but the Law, or revealed will of God; For otherwise God's judgment is not respected (to which Conscience looketh) but men's.

5 The time which is to be allotted to this Reviewing; In regard of evil deeds, is in Scripture noted, sometimes to be before some threatening of God, 2 Sā. 24. 13. sometimes after a threatening, but before the Judgment be executed. Mal. 2. 2. and sometime after that God hath inflicted his Judgments, Hag. 1. 5. but the sooner we go in hand with it, the more acceptable it is unto God, and more profitable it is unto us. Hence it is, that this Meditation of what we do daily, is reckoned amongst the daily exercises of the godly, Job 1. 5.

6 Through want of this Reviewing, comes 1. Impenitency in the greatest sins, Isai 44. 18. Eccles. 4. 8. Presumption in greatest misery, Reu. 3. 17. and so great a Stupiditie, that those which know many other things, are altogether ignorant of themselves, and what they do. Hence it is, that some after they have sworn rashly, and are admonished of their sin, almost with the same breath affirm with an oath, that they did not swear.

7 The peculiar effects of this Reviewing of our ways, are 1. in regard of God, A right judgment of our ways. Ezek. 19. 25. and thankfulness. 2. In respect of ourselves, Humility: and 3. In respect of others, Equity and Gentlenesse, Tit. 3. 3. 4.

CHAP. IX. Of the application of the Law by Conscience to the person, upon the Reviewing of the Action.

1 THE third act of Conscience followeth, whereby the conclusion is gathered from the premises. This conclusion is an act of Conscience, whereby a man applieth unto himself the Law of God, which concerneth either his Action or Condition.

2 This conclusion therefore dependeth partly on that general Law, which is pronounced by the Synteresis, in the major Proposition; and partly, on that Reviewing of the action or condition which is contained in the minor Proposition. So that it gathereth together the strength of the former acts of Conscience, and maketh the Judgment thereof perfect.

3 Like as therefore Conscience is a Law in the major Proposition, Rom. 2. 14. and in the minor a Witness, Rom. 2. 15 So in this conclusion, Conscience is most properly a Judge, 1 John. 3. 20. For as in the Proposition God's Law is declared, and in the Assumption, the fact or condition of man is examined, according to that Law; So in the conclusion, the sentence concerning man is pronounced according to his fact, or condition, by virtue of the Law that hath been declared.

4 It is well defined therefore by Application, because in such a conclusion, God's Commandment and man's fact are mutually joined together, and as it were linked with man, whilst both pass sentence on him.

5 This Application, though in its own nature it follow the former acts of Conscience, like as the conclusion of a syllogism is said to follow necessarily from the premisses yet through man's fault it falleth out often, That Conscience doth not do it for a time. Both propositions are granted, yet the conclusion is not made: as for example; A man may in general know and grant that every man that worshippeth not God, is cursed: and may also be conscious to himself, that he is no true worshipper of God: and yet not Judge himself accursed. One may also understand sufficiently, that God is ready to pardon him who repenteth of his sins; He may likewise have witness in himself of his own repentance: yet cannot presently apply to himself pardon, and the mercy of God.

6 This Staying, or Hindering the Conclusion, is more usual in passing Judgment upon evil actions, but happeneth sometimes also in such, as are good.

7 We have an example of the first sort in those Jews of whom the Apostle speaketh. Rom. 2. 18. 20. 21. And in David himself. 2. Sam. 12. 5. 6. who knew well enough, what his most evil fact deserved by law, and likewise could not be ignorant of that which he had committed: but halted in the application of the conclusion.

8 An example of the latter kind, we have in all those Believers who repent truly, yet for a long time cannot apply God's mercy to themselves. The causes why Sinners do it not, are; 1 Because they do not consider seriously enough, God's law, and their own facts; for the conclusion proceedeth from the power & efficacy of the premisses. 2. Because they have flat contrary conclusions in their Judgments to the Law of God. Deut. 29. 19. 3. Because they are afraid of, and avoid these conclusions of Conscience, as most opposite to themselves and their purposes, John 3. 20. 4. Because they are careless and forgetful of such things, I am. 1. 23. 25. From such like causes wicked men use to gather false conclusions, and deceive themselves, I am. 1. 22.

9 The causes why believers, and godly men, oftentimes do not conclude for their own consolation, are 1. Some prevailing temptation. 2. The remnants of unbelief, which remain even in those that are regenerate. 3. The greatness of that mercy which they ought to apply unto themselves. And 4. the Conscience of their own unworthiness, especially after they have committed some grievous sin.

10 Because of this slowness in men to conclude, and apply, there is a necessity laid on all Ministers, not only to declare God's will generally; but likewise so far as they are able, to help, and further, both publicly and in private, the application of it, so far as men's condition and consciences require.

CHAP. X. Of the effects of this Application, in the Conscience it self.

1 FROM the conclusion of Conscience, some effects follow, according as the judgment thereof is.

2 These effects are either Acts of Conscience, which are virtually contained in the conclusion, or Affections and Acts of the Will, which arise from those acts of Conscience.

3 Amongst the acts of Conscience, some there be that respect that which is well done: some respect sin.

4 Those that respect what is well done, are Excusing, Absolving, and Aprooving, Rom. 2. 15.

5 Excusing is an act of Conscience, whereby a man is freed from the guilt of sin in what he hath done: For Excusing here is not taken in that stricter sense, whereby it signifieth a ...essening or extenuating of the fault, but in that sense which importeth, a perfect taking away of the fault, and guilt.

6 Absolution is an act of Conscience, whereby it pronounceth a man need not fear punishment for what he hath done.

7 These two acts are tied so closely and fast together with a bond that cannot be loosed, that they differ only in our apprehension not really. For Excusing doth most properly respect guilt, and Absolution the punishment; but neither is the guilt taken away so long as the punishment remaineth; neither doth the guilt remain, the punishment being once taken away.

8 Approving is an act of Conscience, pronouncing that a man in his action hath pleased God.

9 Absolution and approbation differ from Excusing in this, that in Excusing, Conscience doth the part of the Law, and hath respect unto God, as he is a Judge, before whose judgment seat it excuseth a man as a witness; but in Absolving and Approving, Conscience properly doth God's part, and hath respect unto man, whom like a Judge it absolveth, and approveth.

10 The acts of Conscience, which respect sin, are Accusation, and Condemnation.

11 Accusation is an act of Conscience, convincing and proving a man to be near unto punishment, because of his sin.

12 Condemnation is an act of Conscience, judging a man that is guilty, to the punishment of eternal death

13 Accusation and Condemnation differ in the same degree and manner, that Excusing differeth from Absolution and Approoving.

14 Accusation and Condemnation sometimes follow presently upon the fact, as in David, 2 Sam. 24. 10 Sometimes a little while after it, as in Judas, Matt. 21. 3. Sometimes a long time after, as in Joseph's brethren, Gen. 42. 21. 22. For a man is not free from them by length of time, but by repentance only.

CHAP XI. Of the affections which arise from the judgment of Conscience.

1 THE first affection that riseth in the heart, from Excusing, Absolving, and Approoving of Conscience, is Joy, whereby a man taketh delight in that he hath done well, as in a true good that is come to him, Prov. 15. 15. 2 Cor. 1. 12. Now this Joy differeth much from laughter, and vain joy: 1. Because it maketh the heart glad. 2 Because it is a serious disposition of the heart, not a light stirring of it. 3. Because it hath a good ground, and therefore grows stronger by right meditation. 4. Because it bringeth forth found and good fruit. None of which things are to be found in common and ordinary laughter and joy, Eccles. 2. 2.

2 The second affection is Confidence, whereby the heart is settled and strengthened against the fear of evil, and the weak hope of good, Prov. 10. 9. & 28. For all misery springeth from sin; and to those that do well, all good things are promised, 1 Tim. 4. 8.

3 The first affection rising from the accusation and condemnation of Conscience, is Shame, whereby a sinner is displeased with himself, in and for that sin he hath done. For sin always changeth a man from better to worse, Gen. 5. 7. This shame if it be because of sin, and if it make a man forsake it, it is one of the signs of repentance, Rom. 6. 21. as impudency in sin, is always a token of an impenitent and lost man.

4 The second affection is Sadness, or Sorrow, whereby the heart is troubled, because of the evil that is come upon it, 1 Sam. 25. 31. Acts. 2. 37. For the accusing and condemning of Conscience, doth not only make the sin, and the guilt thereof to be in a manner present, but likewise the punishment.

5 The third affection is Fear, whereby the heart flieth from the evil that hangeth over it, and from God himself, as from a severe Judge, Gen. 3. 10. Prov. 28. 1. Revel. 6. 16. because the fullness of misery is expected. The great degrees of this fear, are called Trembling and Horror.

6 The fourth affection is Dispaire, whereby the Soul casts away all hope of escaping, Heb. 10. 27.

7 The fifth and last, is Anguish and vexation of spirit, because of the misery, which lieth on it. This is that spiritual worm, that perpetually tormenteth the damned souls in hell. Mark. 9. 44. Isai. 66. 24.

CHAP. XII. Of a good Conscience.

Hitherto we have spoken of the nature of Conscience, according as it was laid down in the definition: Now followeth the distribution of Conscience, according to its adjuncts.

1 Conscience is either good or evil:

2 Conscience may be called good, either for its honesty and integrity, or for its quietness and peace.

3 That Conscience is honestly good, whose judgment is Right and Powerful.

4 That the Conscience therefore be honestly good, it is required: 1. That it uprightly and sincerely judge that thing to be good, which God judgeth so; and that to be evil, which God judgeth evil. This uprightness must first be in the judgment, of what is to be done, which belongeth to the major Proposition; and 2. in the judgment of what hath been done, which belongs to the minor.

5 To a Conscience honestly good, its 3. required that it excuse, absolve, and approve a man in what is well done; and accuse and condemn him, for what is evil.

6 Concerning the first office, which consisteth in Excusing, Absolving, and Approving, there is no controversy amongst Divines: But of the second, which consisteth in Accusing and Condemning, some doubt, and think that the goodness of Conscience doth no ways consist therein, but in Excusing only.

7 They bring two reasons: 1. Because Adams conscience by creation, did only Excuse, and not accuse. 2. Because a good Conscience is troubled and wounded when sin is committed, and occasion is ministered to accuse. But the first reason is not good; because though Conscience in state of Innocency, did not accuse actually, yet had it a power to accuse, if there had been occasion. Neither could the Conscience be more blamed for accusing and condemning justly,
 ⟨◇⟩ the Law self, and the chief Judge, who did so after sin had once entered, and not before.

8 So far is the just Accusation of Conscience from being to be blamed, that Sinners have most need of it, as the only way to make them repent them of the sins which they have committed. For to the end a Sinner may escape God's judgment, he must judge himself: that is, do justice and judgment upon himself, as in God's room, whom he hath offended, 1 Cor. 11. 31. He doth this, by pleading God's cause against himself, that is, by accusing himself, witnessing, alleging, and confessing, or by acknowledging God's Law against himself, by revealing the secrets of his heart, and his hidden filthiness, to his own ignominy and shame. Then by condemning himself, that is, by declaring what torment and punishment God may justly inflict upon him; or by Proclaiming of himself guilty of everlasting death. Unto this judgment of Conscience, stirring up suitable affections; if God of his great mercy add a change of mind, with an appealing by Faith to the Judgment Seat of God's mercy in Christ; then is that true (which some use to say) that the Judgement of repentance maketh void the judgment of punishment; that the accusation, witnessing, and condemnation to wrath to come, are prevented by these Actions which supply there rooms; Yea, that God himself, in Christ shall be an Advocate, a Witness, and Judge; for those that have pleaded against themselves, in the court of Conscience by repentance.

9 Neither are we bound only to this Accusation and condemnation of our selves, as to a means of Salvation, but by natural justice also. For if we sin against a man, we ought to do him justice on our selves, by Accusing, Condemning, and Acknowledging our offense; much more then are we bound to do this to God. Besides, we are related to God as his servants, by which we are bound to take his part in all controversies, debates, or quarrels, that he hath against sin, and chiefly against our own sin, which doth us most hurt, and against which we are able to do much more, then against other men's. Add to these, the consideration of the equity of it, if we be bound (when it will be no hurt to us) to assist a brother, in any of his lawful and just suits, or judgments, either in appearing as a Witness, or as an Accuser, in his behalf: how much more are we bound to do the same for God? for without comparison, each person is more bound to stick close to God, then to himself: and to assist God by accusing, testifying, judging, though it be in the controversy which he hath against himself.

These particular illustrations (which upon another occasion are propounded and urged by G. P.) I have thought good to relate, both for the light w^{ch} they give to this present question, and for the excellent use, that they have in exhortations to the practice of repentance.

10 The second reason (wherein the trouble of conscience upon accusation, was brought to prove that an accusing Conscience, could not be good) is also of no strength: Because that trouble and wounding, is either the accusation it self, or an affection following it. The same Judge that condemneth rightly and justly, may, and useth to be sorrowful, that he hath occasion to do so: for he absolveth more willingly those that are good, then he condemneth malefactors.

11 To speak home to the Matter; The act of Accusation followeth indeed from sin, not as a sin, but a punishment; Conscience therefore accusing, so far as it accuseth rightly, is honestly good, though in respect of the trouble it bringeth, it useth to be called evil, as all other punishments are. It may also be called evil, because the ground of it is always some sin committed.

12 Thirdly, that the Conscience be honestly good, it is requisite that by this upright judgment, it stir up strongly to do good, and draw back strongly from that which is evil, Heb. 13. 18. but this cannot be done by Conscience alone, there must be also an honest disposition, and bent of the Will, answerable to the judgment of Conscience.

13 A Conscience peaceably good, is that, which Excusetb, Absolveth, Comforteth, Acts 24. 6. Hence also unto a good Conscience, in this respect, do belong the affection of Joy, Confidence, Security, and Freedom.

14 A Conscience that is both honestly and peaceably good, is that, which by the Apostle is called pure and clean, 2 Tim. 1. 3. Beautiful, Heb. 13. 18. Without offense, or not offended, which is the consolation and rejoicing of the faithful, 2 Cor. 1. 12. To keep which they are content to suffer all sorts of trouble unjustly, 1 Pet. 2. 19.

15 Conscience since the fall, or after sin, is made good again: 1. By the blood of Christ applied through Faith, whereby the guilt, accusation, and condemnation of it, are taken away, Heb. 9.

13. 14. and 10. 22. 2. By the virtue of the same blood, in repentance and sanctification of the spirit, 1 Tim. 1. 5. Acts 15. 8. 9. whereby believers have a settled and constant purpose to serve God. 3. By the witness of the Spirit, whereby we are assured of the grace of God, not only for the present, but also for the continuance of it, to the doing of every good work, Ephes. 1. 18. 14. Rom. 9. 5. & 1 Pet. 1. 5. 6.

16 A good Conscience is maintained by that exercise, whereof the Apostle speaketh, Acts 24. 16. Now this exercise doth chiefly consist in these things: 1. That the fear of God be always lively and fresh in our hearts, Psal. 36. 2. For this maketh us look what God's judgment is, in all things, Psal. 119. 6. 2. That we meditate on God's Law both day, and night, Psal. 1. 2. For by this the Major Proposition or Rule whereby Conscience judgeth, is established. 3. That we examine our own ways with quick and sharp judgment, Psal. 4. 5. For this inferreth the application in the Minor Proposition. 4. That by daily repentance and renewing of Faith, we wash off the filth that we contract, 1 John 3. 3. For therein lies the strength of the conclusion or judgment of Conscience.

CHAP. XIII. Of a weak, and of a strong Conscience.

1 A Good Conscience admits of degrees, for which cause it is by the Apostle distinguished, into a weak and a strong Conscience, Rom. 15. 1.

2 A weak Conscience is that which is purged by unfeigned Faith, but is troubled with these imperfections, which all believers, for the most part, do outgrow by time.

3 True Faith is supposed to be in a weak Conscience, for he that is weak, is a Brother, Rom. 14. 15. 21. not to be condemned or set at naught, verse. 10. One for whom Christ hath died, 1 Cor. 8. 11. This Conscience therefore being good, differeth in kind from that which is weak through malice, Presumption, or Superstition.

4 The imperfections wherewith this weak Conscience is diseased, are, 1. Lacke of knowledge, because as yet it understandeth not well what is lawful and pure, 1 Cor. 8. 7. Rom. 14. 14. This weakness of Conscience, is called the weakness of Faith, Rom. 14. 1.

5 The second imperfection which dependeth on the first, is in Affection, because it easily is made sorrowful, and disquieted, when it seeth others do that which it self approoveth not, Rom. 14. 15. Because of meat thy brother is grieved.

6 The third imperfection is in Judgment, because it quickly Iudgeth and condemneth the liberty of others, 1. Cor. 10 29. Rom. 14. 3. 15. Why is my liberty judged by another man's Conscience? Let not him that eateth despise him that eateth not.

7 The fourth imperfection, is in the purpose and settlednes of heart, being easily drawn to what is evil. 1. Cor. 8. 10. For if any man see thee which hast knowledge, sit at meat in the Idols temple: shall not the Conscience of him which is weak, be Emboldned to eat those things, which are offered to Idols? From this, a man is most properly said to be Offended, Scandalized, wounded, destroyed. Rom. 14. 21. 1 Cor. 8, 9. 12. Rom. 14. 15.

8 A strong Conscience, is that which is established in the truth. Rom. 14. 5. Perswaded in his own mind. 2. Pet. 1. 12. Ye know and are established in the present truth.

9 This stability consisteth in knowledge, yet not so much in the clearness thereof, as in the certainty. 1. Cor. 8. 4. 7. We know that an Idol is nothing in the world, but there is not in every man that knowledge, and their Conscience being weak, is defiled. For certainty belongeth more to Faith, which we are here to understand by Conscience, then Evidence or Clearnesse, which belongs to knowledge, taken in the proper sense. 2 In such an affection, whereby it is always willing to bear with, and bear the infirmities of others. Rom. 15. 1. We which are strong ought to bear the infirmities of the weak. 3. In Judging so, as that nothing be set before a brother, at which he may stumble or fall, Rom. 14. 13. but Judge this rather, that no man put a stumbling block, or an occasion to fall in his brothers way. 4. In such a resolution and settledness of heart, whereby it is so strengthened in truth and godliness, that it cannot easily be removed, Heb. 13. 9. It is a good thing, that the heart be established with grace.

CHAP. XIV. Of an evil Conscience.

1 Conscience is said to be Evil, either because its Acts are sins, or because it brings trouble and sorrow.

2 A Conscience Evil because of sin in its Acts, is that which giveth not a right and powerful judgment▪ such is the Conscience of all men that are unregenerate, for it is in men according as Original corruption is. Of this a polluted Conscience is not the smallest part. Tit. 1. 15.

3 The first fault of an evil Conscience is Blindnes, whence it judgeth of Good and Evil no otherwise: then one that is bodily blind useth to judge of colors: He calleth good evil, and evil good, Isaiah. 5. 10.

4 The second fault, is a kind of spiritual dullness, whence it neither stirreth up powerfully to that, which it seeth is good, nor draweth back from that which it acknowledgeth evil, Rom. 1. 18 Which withhold the truth in unrighteousness.

5 The third fault, is false-witness-bearing, which principally appeareth in Excusing, and Accusing falsely.

6 An Evil Conscience doth Excuse falsely, either when it doth not accuse where it ought, or absolveth and approoveth where it ought to accuse and condemn.

7 The former fault is esteemed as a piece of Religion, by the dangerous Sect of Libertines, who place their chief happiness and perfection to have the sense of sin extinguished.

8 It prevaieth also in all those, who being free from great and gross sins, do seem unto themselves to be as it were perfect, and not to be blamed for any sin, Luke 18. 20. Mark 10. 20. All these things have I observed from my youth.

9 The second sort of Excusing falsely, when an evil Conscience approoveth, where it ought to condemn; is chiefly to be found in those that are superstitious. They think to be heard through their much babbling. John. 16. 2. The time cometh that whosoever killeth you, will think that he doth

God service, Rom. 10. 2. I bear them record that they have a zeal of God, but not according to knowledge.

10 A false Accusation of an evil conscience is, when it accuseth and condemneth, where it ought to excuse: viz. For well doing: Rom. 14. 22. Happy is he that condemneth not himself in that thing which he alloweth.

Conscience Evil, through trouble and sorrow is that, which accuseth and condemneth: 1 John 3. 20. If our heart condemn us.

12 When Conscience is evil in this kind, these affections follow. Sadness, Fear, Anguish.

13 This Conscience is honestly good, if it accuse justly: it is sinnefully evil, if it do it unjustly.

14 A Conscience evil through trouble, and honestly good, is to be found both in believers and unbelievers. In such as believe not, it is a preparation unto true repentance and Faith. Acts 2, 37.

15 A Conscience Evil, both through trouble and sin, is common also both to believers, and those who believe not. But in those that believe, there is a principle of grace, by strength whereof they are upholden, they wrestle and withstand, and by little and little are healed of it.

CHAP. XV. Of divers degrees and sorts of an Evil Conscience.

1 AN Evil Conscience may be distinguished into divers degrees: 1. In respect of defect, into a benumbed▪ stupid, and seared. 2. In respect of excess, into a troubled and desperate one.

2 A benumbed Conscience is that, which is so dull and heavy in its Acts, that there follows no strong stirrings of heart after it; nothing to purpose comes of it. Those that have such a conscience, are oppressed with a kind of spiritual sleep, wherein the sense of conscience, is so bound, that it is no more moved, then a man that sleepeth is by his own dreams.

3 This dullness appeareth, 1. In a dull or faint pricking on to good: We have an example in Agrippa, Acts 26. 28. thou almost persuadest me.

4 It appeareth secondly in a dull accusation for the evil that is committed, we have an example in Saul, 1 Sam. 24. 18.

5 The cause of this benumbedness in many that are not apparently wicked, is a certain carnal security, which creepeth secretly upon them, from long peace and prosperity, Ier. 48. 11.

6 A stupid Conscience is that, which doth not its office in accusing and condemning, unless it be for the greatest sins, and when it is forced by most grievous Judgments. For like as men sick of a Lethargy or Drowsinesse, are not wakened commonly, unless it be through some great noise: so likewise this Conscience is not moved, unless it be by the thunder of God's Judgments. We have an example in Pharaoh. Exod. 8. 9.

7 The cause of this stupidity is unbelief, and custom in sinning, which taketh away the sense of it.

8 A seared or cauterized Conscience, is that which no ways can be moved, no not by greatest sins, 1. Tim. 4. 2. Which have their Consciences seared with an hot Iron: This sort of Conscience is found chiefly in those, who after they have been enlightened, against their Consciences, do give up themselves to a wicked life.

9 In these the Synteresis it self, or Law of Conscience, hath its course stopped, & for time is in a manner extinguished, Jude. 10. Whatsoever they know naturally, as beasts which are without reason, in those things they corrupt themselves. This suppressing of the natural practical knowledge, which is engrafted in all men, is by the Philosophers called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 because such kind of men are changed as it were into stones, as in the Scripture they are said to have a hard and stony heart, by other Philosophers it is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, because such men become altogether brutish. 2. Pet. 2. 12. Or rather put on the nature of the Devil. John.•... 44.

10 The signs of such a kind of Conscience are, 1. If one rejoice in sin. Prov. 2. 14. 2 If after he hath sinned he will not be reformed, Prov. 27. 22. 3 If he give up himself to commit known sin, with all his might striving to sin more then others. Ephe. 4. 19.

11 Contrary to this evil Conscience, or hard heart, is a tender Conscience which is easily moved by the word of God, whereof we have an example in Josiah. 2. Kings. 22. 19. Because thine heart did melt and thou hast humbled thyself before the Lord, when thou heardest what I spake.

12 A troubled Conscience, is that which accuseth in such a manner, that it suffereth not the Conscience to be at rest.

13 It bringeth with it an astonishing fear, and oppressing grief.

14 It is called in the Scripture, sadness, a casting down, affliction, or disquieting of the mind, a broken spirit, Prov. 18. 14.

15 A troubled Conscience is sometimes honestly good: and sometime sinnefully evil.

16 Honestly good it is, when it accuseth justly. This is properly in those which yet believe not in Christ: but happens sometimes to be in those, who have true Faith.

17 In those which yet believe not, the Conscience evil indeed through trouble, but honestly good, doth make this kind of Syllogism.

He that believeth not in Christ, is subject to the wrath of God:

But I believe not in Christ: Therefore, I am subject to the wrath of God.

This whole argument is to be granted; The only way to pacify such a Conscience is, to bring him that is so troubled, into another state, by true conversion and Faith. For then the Minor of that Syllogism, which before was true, will be false, and may lawfully be denied.

18 In such as have true Faith, After grievous sins, which waste the Conscience, the Conscience Evil through Trouble, but honestly good, maketh this kind of Syllogisme.

He that hath sinned grivously, and hath not duly repented of his sin, cannot by true Faith find comfort in God.

I am such a one. Therefore, I cannot by true Faith comfort myself in God.

Here likewise must Conscience accusing be believed, and true Repentance be gotten, that he who is so troubled, may at length rightly deny that Assumption.

19 A troubled Conscience, Evil through fault, or faulty in being troubled, is most properly in those that are true believers. For although unbelievers do sin most highly, in not seeking after the true remedy in Christ, when Conscience accuseth justly, (but either fall down under the burden, or through hardness of heart keep out trouble, or seek ease from things that are most vain, as it were from the leaves of the Fig tree) yet the sin properly is not in the judgment of conscience, or in conscience so judging them, but in the Conclusions, which are deduced and drawn from it.

20 The Conscience of Believers is sinful, in being troubled, many ways. In such a case the reasoning of Conscience is diligently to be examined. For the major or minor may, and ought always to be denied and confuted, that Conscience may be healed. As it is in those Accusations which come from want of sense of God's favor, from the sense of God's wrath, from outward afflictions, from horrid temptations to sin, and from divers kinds of sins.

21 A Desperate Conscience is that which so accuseth and condemneth, that it taketh away not only quietness and peace, but hope also of any quietness, or remedy.

22 That manner of Despair, that taketh away all such Hope as may come from our merits, or strength, is honestly good.

23 But that kind of Despair, which in this life taketh away all such hope as cometh from the free mercy of God, is not only Evil in respect of trouble and vexation, but of sin.

24 The Despair of the damned, which utterly rooteth out all hope of remedy, is the bottomless pit of misery.

25 Hence it is, that a Desperate Conscience (fully representing all sins, together with their exceeding great and unpardonable guilt, and God's fearful wrath abiding upon Sinners, with the endless misery that follows thereon) is God's most powerful means to torment the Reprobate; like unto a worm, that most sharply biteth and gnaweth their hearts forever: Mar. 9. 46. their Worm dieth not.

26 To Trouble and Despair; Full Peace, Tranquillity, and the joy of a good Conscience are contrary: which properly riseth from perfect hope in God, whereby the unchangeable enjoyment of happiness, is apprehended.

27 Hence it is, that a good Conscience, that is perfectly peaceable, and joyful (as it representeth to the soul, a full deliverance from the Evil, both of sin and punishment: Such a life to be led with God, as is without all trouble or end; consisting in union and communion with him in peace, and greatest joy) is the formal and essential happiness of the Saints in the life to come: Matt. 25. 21. 23. Enter into thy Masters Joy: John. 15. 11. That my Joy might remain in you, and that your Joy might be full; 1 Pet. 1. 8. Rejoice with Joy unspeakable, and glorious.

A SVMMARY COLLECTION OF THE FORMER Treatise, according as it was set forth in a public Disputation, to encourage and stir up to the study of Practical Divinity.

DIVINE POSITIONS concerning Conscience.

1 Knowledge puffeth up; Love edifieth: But greatest conscience ought to be made of edifying the Conscience, 1 Cor. 8. 1. 10.

2 Conscience is a man's judgment of himself, according to God's judgment of him, Isai. 5. 3.

3 There is a certain inclination of the will, whereby it can naturally both stir up the understanding to this kind of judgment, and also follow it: This inclination by some is named Conscience, by others a part of Conscience, but not truly; For neither the name of Conscience, nor the acts thereof, which are mentioned in the Scriptures, import any other power or faculty, then the understanding, Rom. 2. 15.

4 Yet every of understanding is not Conscience, but only those which make up such a Practical judgment, as was before handled in the second Position.

5 By Judgment, is most properly meant the act of judging, and not the habit or faculty only, Rom. 2. 15.

6 The whole nature of Conscience is contained in no other judgment, but what is Dianoëticall, or Discursiue; because Accusing, Excusing, Comforting, and such like acts of Conscience, cannot be, but by some middle or third argument, whose strength appears in a Syllogism, only by the consequence, Rom. 6. 11. The word translated, Reckon yourself, signifies Reason out.

7 The Major of that Syllogism, wherein the whole judgment of Conscience is laid open, treateth always of the Law, the Minor of the fact and state; and the Conclusion of the relation that ariseth from our fact or state, by reason of that Law; which is either guilt, or spiritual Joy. For example,

He that liveth in sin, shall die,

I live in sin: Therefore I shall die.

Or thus, Whosoever believeth in Christ, shall not die, But I believe in Christ:

Therefore I shall not die, but live, Rom. 8. 13. 33. 34. 1 John. 3. 19. 20.

8 Conscience in regard of the Major, is called a Law: in regard of the Minor and Conclusion, a Witness; but in regard of the Minor most properly, an Iudex, or Book: and in regard of the Conclusion, most properly a Judge, Rom. 2. 14. 15. Reu. 20. 12. 1 John. 5. 10.

9 The Major is given by the Synteresis, which the Schoolmen call Synderesis: the Minor is peculiarly called Syneidesis, or Conscience, the Conclusion is the Krisis it self, or Judgment.

10 Synteresis is properly an intellectual habit, whereby we give our consent to the principles of moral actions. It differeth not therefore from the Law of nature which is naturally written in the hearts of all men: but in respect only.

11 Though therefore Conscience may be hindered from working for a while, yet can it not be fully extinguished or lost. No man is so desperately wicked, as to be without a Conscience altogether: No not the Libertines, who place their deadly perfection, in putting out the Conscience of sin:

12 To this part of Conscience Synteresis being largely taken, belong all Practical truths whereof we are persuaded; whether they be drawn out of natural principles, by consequence, or communicated by Divine revelation.

13 Hence ariseth the distinction of a natural and an enlightened Conscience. The Scripture sometimes doth appeal to this, as Rom. 6. 3. sometimes to that, as 1 Cor. 6. 9. and 11. 14.

14 Hence the adequate or full rule of Conscience is the revealed will of God, which both declares and prescribes man's duty.

15 Conscience therefore is properly subject to God's will and authority alone, I am. 4. 12. Neither can it be subject to any creature, without Idolatry.

16 Hence also it is, that though men be bound in Conscience before God, to obey and keep the just Laws of men after a just manner, Rom. 13. 5. Yet those Laws of men, as they are men's Laws, do not bind the Conscience.

17 Conscience so bindeth man, in all those things which it judgeth are his duty, by the will of God; that he cannot be free from it, by the authority of any creature, Act. 4. 19. In this respect it is, that he that knoweth God's will, is said to be debtor, Rom. 1. 14. a servant, Rō. 6. 16. bound, Act. 20. 22. constrained, 2 Cor. 5. 14. to have necessity laid upon him, 1 cor. 9. 16. so that he cannot do otherways, Act. 3. 20

18 The power of Conscience is so great, that it maketh an action, which in its own nature is indifferent, to be either good or bad: and that which in its own nature is good, to be evil: although it cannot make that become good, which is evil in its own nature.

19 Yet no action is better or worse, for that Conscience that one hath after he hath done it.

20 An erroneous Conscience bindeth always so far, that he that doth against the judgment thereof, sinneth. For formally, and by interpretation he doth it against God's will.

21 If the error of Conscience about the action (that is, the object or matter about which the action is) be not sinful, the Conscience erring, binds as much as if it did not err.

22 Conscience, through error, judging that to be lawful, or necessary, which is unlawful, doth so far bind, as that a man sins, who doth contrary to it; and sins also, if he do according to the direction of it.

23 Yet this necessity of sinning, wherein some are entangled, is not contrary to the equity of God's Law: 1. Because the sin is not the same on both hands: on the one hand a man's sins in doing what is unlawful; and on the other, in doing it unlawfully: viz. without or against Conscience. 2. Because it is not an absolute necessity, but upon supposition only, viz. if they keep still such a Conscience, which they ought to lay down, Ephes. 4. 22. 3. Because it doth not flow from the nature of the Law of God, but both is contracted and continued by man's sin. For no man is thus entangled but by his own fault.

24 Conscience judging that to be unlawful, which is lawful, bindeth to refrain from that lawful thing, Rom. 14. 14. 15. He likewise that judgeth that to be necessary, which is but lawful, is bound to the doing of it: because a man may abstain from lawful things: and may also constantly practice them without sinning.

25 Nothing may be done whereof the Conscience doubts, Rom. 14. 23.

26 In doubtful cases, the surest part is to be chosen; now that is the surest part, in doing which, its sure there is no sin.

27 It is lawful, and the best sometimes, to do against some scruple of Conscience.

28 The reviewing of our actions, or estate, as it respects the Law, which Conscience dictates, maketh up the minor of that practical Syllogism, which the Conscience maketh. It is called in Scripture, a beholding of the mind, Psal. 119. 15. Understanding, Psal. 50. 22. A casting up ones ways, Psal. 119. 59. A laying of the heart, Hag. 1. 5. A saying to the heart, or in the heart of them, Hose. 7. 2. A turning again unto the heart, Ier. 12. 11. Mal. 2. 2. And lastly, a proving and examining of our selves, 2 Cor. 13. 5.

29 In the conclusion of that Syllogism, a man applieth to himself the Law of God, which concerneth his Action or condition, and passeth sentence on himself: whence there followeth necessarily, either an Excusing, Absolving and Approbation; or an Accusation and Condemnation, with affections answerable to them, Rom. 2. 15.

30 Though this application in its own nature follow the former acts of Conscience, as a conclusion doth the premisses: yet through man's wickedness, it falleth out oftentimes, that though the Major be fully and firmly acknowledged, and the Minor also in a sort; yet the Conclusion and Application is not made, Rom. 2. 18. 20. 21. 2 Sam. 12. 5. 6.

31 Hence it is, that a necessity lies upon all faithful Pastors, not only to propound God's will in general, but according to their abilities, to help men, both in public and private to apply it, according as their understandings, and consciences shall require, Rom. 12. 7. Matt. 14. 4.

32 A Conscience honestly good is, that which judgeeth rightly and powerfully, Heb. 13. 18. that which doth otherwise, is sinnefully Evil, Isai. 5. 20. Rom. 1. 18.

33 A Conscience peaceably good, is that, which excuseth, absolveth, comforteth, Acts 24. 16.

34 Conscience since the fall, is not both honestly and peaceably good, but by the sprinkling of the blood of Christ Heb. 9. 13. 14. and 10. 22. and the virtue of him in the sanctification of the Spirit, 1 Tim. 1. 5. Act. 15. 8. 9.

35 A Conscience peaceably good may be sinnefully evil, and that which is evil through trouble and accuseth, may be honestly good.

36 A weak Conscience differeth in kind from that which is acted, either by malice, or arrogance, or Superstition.

37 There is but this one way, to pacify a Conscience troubled upon good grounds: to bring him that is troubled into such a state by true Faith and repentance, that the Minor of that Syllogism which troubleth him, may upon good grounds become false, and prove such as may be lawfully denied.

38 When the Consciences of $\langle \diamond \rangle$ believers are sin full in being troubled, the Major or Minor of that reasoning which caused the trouble, must always be denied and confuted. This also is the only way to heal such a Conscience.

Corollaries.

1 The greatest violation of Conscience is the greatest sin.

2 The greatest anguish of Conscience is the greatest punishment.

3 That uncertainty of God's favor, which the Papists hold, and that uncertainty of Persevering in grace, which others teach, is clean contrary to that solid joy, and strong confidence, which proceedeth from a Conscience truly good.

4 The interpretation of the Scriptures, or a judgment to discern God's will for a man's self, in his own Conscience, belongs to every man.

The End of the First Book.

OF CONSCIENCE AND THE CASES THEREOF The Second BOOKE.

In which those Cases are handled, which concern the state of man.

CHAP. 1. Of a case of Conscience, and the state of man in general.

Hitherto we have spoken of the Nature, now we are to entreat of the Cases of Conscience.

_1. A Case of Conscience is a practical question, concerning which, the Conscience may make a doubt.

2. It is said to be a question, because it is not an axiom or proposition that is manifest of it self, but hath need of illustration and proof, by some third argument.
3. It is a practical question, because of the doubts which do not immediately belong to practice, do not immediatly 〈ϕ〉 ▪ to the judgment and act of Conscience, which thing is not well observed by them who under the name of cases of Conscience do handle many things, which do •...o more belong to Gonscience then any other head of Divinity, purposely omi•...d by them.
4. It is called 〈ϕ〉 〈ϕ〉 , because it is wont to fall out, or to happen in the course of man's life, and a case of Conscience, because when it falls out, the Conscience ought, with all possible care, to give judgment about it.
5. Of this sort are all those questions wherein (supposing the general doctrine of Faith and Obedience) we enquire what our duty is, upon any particular occasion.
6. Of these questions one saith well. Because that Law which is written and engraven in nature, containing the rules of honesty and natural justice, is in a manner wholly buried by original corruption, and almost totally over whelmed by custom in sinning, as it were with some heap of evil lusts laid upon it; and because also the light of the understanding is invlved, and obscured with manifold darkness, so that neither those rules of honesty, which are within the book of the mind, are fully and perfectly legible, nor can our understanding read anything therein, distinctly and plainly: Hence it is, that God, in his merciful providence hath given us three helps, viz. The light of Scripture, the assistance of his Grace, and the help of teaching. About this last, we are now to entreat.
7. Now every question, or case of Conscience (as the nature of the thing it self, and experience showeth) is either about the state of man before God, or about those actions which in that state he doth put forth, and exercise.
8. The state of man belongs to the first part of Divinity, which is about Faith, and the actions to the second part which is about obedience.
9. The state of man before God, is that relation which man hath to God, as he is the original of spiritual life, and happiness.
10. Concerning this state, the Consciente ought 1. to declare and determine what it is. 2. to judge, that it is to be eschewed if it be evil, and to be preserved, and increased if it be good.
11. Concerning the state of man in general there be three questions: The first is whether a man can certainly know in what state he is?
Ans. He may, 1. Because without this knowledge he cannot have anaccusing, or excusing Conscience in respect of his estate, But such a Conscience men both may and are wont to have, Rom. 2. 15. 2 Because no man can either eschew or desire an unknown state: But one of these states a man ought to eschew, and to labor for the other, Mat. 7. 8.
12. Quest. 2. Whether men ought to make inquiry into their estates.

Ans. Yes, and that with all diligence possible, for 1. This is a thing that God requireth, 2 Cor. 13. 5. 2. without this knowledge a man cannot have peace, or tranquility in his Conscience, Rom. 5. 1. & 8. 1. 3. Otherwise a man cannot perform worship to God, with that preparation which is requisite, 1 Cor. 11. 28., 1 Cor. 11. 28.

13. Quest. 3. By what means comes a man to the knowledge of his estate?

Ans. 1. By consideration of those actions external, and internal, which proceed from him, Mat. 7. 17. 2. By the inclinations, and dispositions, from whence those actions flow, Rom. 7. 15, 16, 17. 3. By that reflex act, which is proper to man, whereby he hath a power, as it were to enter into, and perceive what is in himself, 1 Cor. 2. 11. 4. By a kind of spiritual sense, Luke 24. 32. Rom. 7. 21. 28.

14. Quest. 4. what is it that hinders this knowledge?

Ans. 1. Wicked and profane thoughts in many, Psal. 14. 1. 2. 2. Presumption, Apoc. 3. 17. Mat. 7. 21. 23. 3. The overcharging of the heart by the lusts of the flesh, and care about the things of this life, Luke 21. 34. 4. An evil Conscience, John 3. 20. 5. Spiritual sloth, and idleness, Isaiah...4. 11▪ 6. Ignorance, Rom. 6. 11.

CHAP. 2. Of the state of sin.

1. The state of man since the fall of Adam is twofold. A state of sin, and a state of grace Acts...6. 18. •...John 3. 10. 14.

2. The state of sin consists in the privation of spiritual life, and happiness. From this estate therefore we are to fly, as from death and the greatest evil: Concerning this state of sin the first question is, how a man may discern, whither he do still continue in it?

3. Ans. The signs, o... arguments, whereby this state may certainly be discerned, are in general, all those which are opposite to a state of grace, and spiritual life. For if a man be not in the one state, he must necessarily be in the other.

4. The first sign is a gross ignorance of those things, which belong to spiritual life, Ep. 4. 18. for hereby▪ men are strangers to the life of God. The reason is because it is impossible that any man should please God without faith, Heb. 11. 6. And for Faith it is impossible to be had without the knowledge of the will of God, which comes by the preaching and hearing of the Word, Rom. 10. 14.

5. The second sign, is a perverse disposition of will whereby it is in subjection to the rule, and dominion of sin, Rom. 6. 12. The reason is because those who do yield themselves servants to obey sin, are in a state of slavery to sin, unto death Rom. 6▪ 16.

6 Now the signs of raising sin, are first if a man do not seriously, and in good earnest, make opposition against the lusts of sin, but rather yield up himself unto them. Rom. 6. 13. Secondly, I... in deliber...ate counsel either profit, or pleasure be preferred by him, and prevail more with ⟨◇⟩ ▪ then either honesty and piety, Phil. 3. 19. Thirdly, if the committing of sin stir him up rather to pleasure, then grief, Pro. 2. 14. Fourthly, if he take delight in the company of the wicked, Ps. 50. 18. 2 Cor. 6. 14.

7. The third sign, whereby it may be discerned whether a man be in the state of sin, is the disposition of will, whereby a man opposeth himself, to the will of God, Rom. 8. 7.

8. The signs of this perverse disposition are, 1. To reject the knowledge of God's ways, Job. 21. 14▪ 15. 16. 2. To hate correction, and instruction, Psal. 50▪ 17. 3. To contemn the threatenings, and judgments of God, Psalm 36. 1. 2. Dent. 29. 19.

9. The fourth sign, is perverseness of the affections whereby men, turn away from God, and wholly cleave, and adhere, to worldly things, 1 John. 2. 15.

10. The averseness of a man from God, is wont to be seen, 1. By his alination from the Word of God, especially when it is preached to him powerfully 2 Tim. 4▪ 3. 4. 2. By a neglect of prayer, and other parts of God's worship, Psal. 14. 3. 4. Psa. 79. 6. Ier. 10. 25. 3. By an alienation from the servants of God, Pro. 29. 27. 1. John 3. 10.

11. The signs of a man cleaving to, and as it were drownd in the things of this world are, 1. If he employ his chiefest care, and diligence about these things Mat. 6. 25. 31. 32. The reason is given Verse 21. & 24. for where your treasure is, there will your heart be also. 2. If he be ready rather to forsake God and his righteousness then these worldly things▪ Mat. 37. 38. 3. If he do in his heart judge those men to be happy which have an abundance of these worldly goods. Pro. 11 28. & 18. 11.

12. The fifth sign is the corruption of a man's life; or of the works of life Rom. 8. 13. This corruption of life doth not consist in those sins which even the godly sometimes through infirmity fall into, but in a continued course, and tenor of sinning. It is called in Scriptures the way of sin, Psal. 1. 1. A working of iniquity, Mat. 7. 23. A walking in sin, Psal. 1. 1. Pro. 1. 15. A walking after sin, Jer. 9. 14. And a custom in sin, Jer. 13. 23. These works of the flesh are manifest by themselves, Gal. 5. 19.

13. The sixth and the most desperate sign is, obstinancy in evil, whereby a man shuts and stops up the way to all amendment, Isaiah. 6. 9. 10. Ier. 6. 10.

CHAP. 3. Of deferring or putting off ones Conversion.

*Q*uest. The second question is, whether a man may safely, rest for any time, in a state of sin, especially if he purpose with himself to reform and amend his life afterward.

1. Answer, it is not lawful to make the least delay at all in our conversion unto God. The reasons are, 1. Because God requires this for the present, Psal. 95. 7. Heb. 4. 7. And seeing sin is a debt, and an injury done to God, it is manifest, that repentance for the same ought not, unless God consent and like of it, to be deferred for one moment. As soon therefore as God shall require us to correct our lives, and to be converted; so soon ought this duty to be performed, besides this, no subject can keep and receive atheise, and murderer, or a public enemy, against the will of the magistrate, but he shall be guilty of a heinous crime. Now sin is a thief, a murderer, and an enemy to God's glory. Whosoever therefore shall keep and nourish sin against God's Will, although he determine to do it but for a certain time, he thereupon doth bring upon himself a very grievous guilt.

2. Because all delay of Repentance increaseth hardness of heart, Heb. 4. 7. It doth produce a custom of sinning, and makes the work of repentance to be harder and harder Ie. 13. 23. The reason is, because thereby evil habits are more strengthened and confirmed, the understanding becomes darker, Ep. 4. 18. The will grows more obdurate, and addicted to sin, Heb. 4. 7. All the faculties are more bound, and tied, as it were with chains, and knots, Acts 8. 23. A young plant is more easily plucked up then that which hath taken deep root. A nail the more it is beaten with a hammer the more firmly it is fastened, and the more hardly drawn out.

3. Because continuance in sin doth increase the number of sins, our guilt, and the wrath of God, Psal. 95. 10. 11. For that sin which by repentance is not taken away, hath through its own natural inclination, the course of God something in it like to the which in God's things proceed from God's blessing, that is, it increaseth and multiplies, and it doth, with its own weight draw unto other sins, even as the deep is said to call unto the deep.

4. Because the duration of our life is altogether uncertain, I am. 4. 13, 14. Delay breeds danger. Thou fool this night shall thy soul be required of thee and then where will that conversion be, which thou hast deferred? when therefore we have opportunity, let us set upon this business.

5. Because repentance is the gift of God, which he bestows at his own appointed times, not at our pleasure, 1 Tim. 2. 25. 2 Cor. 6. 2. Luke 13. 9. We must therefore let slip no occasion, but convert today; And it is just with God that (if we neglect our duty, in this point, and refuse to fall to it, while we may) through his judgment and leaving▪ and forsaking of us, we should not be able to do it, when we would.

6. Because the purpose of deferring repentance cannot stand with a sincere purpose to repent, 1 Peter 4. 3. It is a point of dishonesty, and fraud, and a sign of a debtor that never means to pay what he owes, when a man because he is not minded to pay, defers, and puts it off, from one day unto another.

7. Because late repentance is very seldom true, and almost always suspicious. The example of the thief which we read, of in the Scriptures is only one, neither yet do we read of him, or of any other that was afterward converted that did defer and put off his repentance. Yea the clean contrary is threatened to such a man, Mat. 24. 48.

8. Because though we could be certain that we might afterwards repent truly, yet it were a base and unworthy part to deal so with God, as it is not fit we should deal with men, Lev. 19. 13 Ro. 3. 28. And as we would be loath God should deal with us, Ps. 13. 2. 8. & Cor. 3.

9. Such kind of delays may be convinced of folly, and of madness, even by common sense, and experience, for all men would account him for a bedlam, that should when his house were on fire, defer the quenching of it, though but fo... one hour. Or that having received some poison into his body, should not endeavor instantly to expel it; or the having received some grievous wound, should not with all possible speed seek for remedy. But in neglecting the burning, the poison, and death of sin, as there is more danger so the folly is much more pernicious.

CHAP. 4. How the sinner ought to prepare himself to conversion.

*Q*uest. 3. What ought a man to do, that he may be translated out of a state of sin, into the state of grace?

*A*ns. Of those things which are necessarily required to this purpose, some pertain to the pulling a man out of the state of sin, and some to the setting him in the state of grace, Those things which pertain to the pulling a man out of the state of sin, are such as serve to shake a man out of that carnal security, in which he slept before, and to work in him a carefulness of his salvation above all things else Act. 2. 37. & 16. 33. That this may be done, many things are necessa•...y.

1. For it is first of all required, that a man seriously look into the Law of God, and make an examination of his life, and state according to 1. I am. 1. 23. 24 25.
2. It is required, secondly that upon that comparing of our state with God's Law, there do follow a conviction of Conscience which in Scripture is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 a being without excuse, Rom. 1. 20. And a concluding one under sin, Rom. 11. 32. Rom. 2. 20 & 7. 7.
3. Thirdly, after this conviction of Conscience, there must follow, a despere of salvation, both in respect, of all strength of our own, and of any help which is to be had from the Creatures, Rom. 7. 9. 11. 13.
4. Fourthly, after all these; there must follow, a true humiliation of heart, which consists in grief and fear because of sin, and doth bring forth confession, Mat. 9▪ 12.
5. For the procuting of this humiliation, it is always necessary that there be a distinct consideration of some particular sins: for a general apprehension of sin, causeth a confused astonishment, but no right and true humiliation, Rom. 7. 7.
6. This humiliation is oftentimes occasioned by the sight of someone sin, Act. 2. 23. 37.
7. It is helped forward oft times by some heavy affliction, as in Manasseh. 2 Chro. 33. 12. The degrees of this humiliation are not the same, in all that be converted: for some feel greater trouble, and some less. But all those that are truly converted are also truly humbled. So put a man in the state of grace, it is required, that there be 1. Such an apprehension, upon the Gospel, as whereby a man judgeth it possible that his sins should be forgiven, Rom. 12. 23. Psa. 130. 4. 2 An earnest desire to obtain that mercy, which in Scripture is called a spiritual hunger, or thirst, Esa. 55. 1. John. 7. 37. Luke 1. 53. 3 An actu•...ll union with Christ, which consists in Faith, that is wrought in us by effectual vocation, John 15. 1. 4. True repentance, whereby forsaking all sin, we give up and consecrate ourselves wholly to God in Christ, Acts 2. 38. & 3. 19.

CHAP. 5. Of the effectual Vocation.

BY effectual vocation, we have the first entrance into the state of saving grace; But here (in general) arise four questions, which do nearly belong to Conscience, The first question is, whether he that hath Faith, may by ordinary means certainly know, that he is effectually called of God and in the state of grace?

Ans. He that hath Faith, may, and is wont to know certainly that he is in the state of grace. Divers reasons of this assertion, (besides those which before were, delivered in the questions of the state of man in general) may be produced.

1. It is the office and the work of the spirit of God which the faithful have received, to certify and assure them of those things which God of his free grace hath conferred upon them, 1 Cor. 2. 12. Ro. 8. 15.

2. The faithful are commanded to make their calling and election sure, neither is this a legal precept but an evangelical, 2 Pet. 1. 10.

3. That grace which we have received hath the nature and force of an earnest, in respect of that inheritance which is promised to us, Es. 1. 1, 4. & 4. •...0. 1 Cor. 13. 14. 2 Cor. 1 21. 22. For as much therefore as it serves for the assuring us of the certain of something which is to come, it ought not it self to be uncertain: for no certainty can be grounded upon an uncertainty.

4. A certain knowledge of the grace of God is required, as a necessary foundation for that joy and thankfulness which God requires of us, in regard of that grace, 1 Peter 1. 6. 8.

5. A Conscience purged from dead works doth necessarily bring with it a certain knowledge of grace, Heb. 10. 20. Rom. 8. 16. & 9. 2.

6. The faithful are expressly said to have had this assurance, and that by such arguments as are common to all believers, 2 Cor. 13. 5. 1 John 3. 14. & 4. 16. & 5. 20.

The second question is by what signs the certainty of this effectual vocation, and grace may be confirmed.

7. Ans The first sign is, a constant inclination of the will towards God, as towards the chief good, Psal. 119. 57. For there is no man that can indeed place his chiefest good in the enjoying God, but such a one as is called by God out of the world, and converted from his idols, which before he had set up to himself in his heart.

8. The second sign is a purpose, and readiness of mind to hearken unto God in everything, 1 Sam. 3. 10. Acts 9. 6. Psal. 40. 8 9. For in so doing a man answers to the call of God, and becomes called▪ Ps. 27. 8.

9. The third sign is, a vehement longing after the word of God, 1 Pet. 2. 2. For by this word the faithful are called, and regenerated▪ 1 Pet. 1. 23.

10. The fourth sign is a singular love towards them which are borne of the same seed, and blood, 1 John 3. 14.

The third Quest. is, what a man ought to do that he may be partaker of this grace?

11. Ans. Although God of his unspeakable Grace be often times found of them that seek not after him, yet there be diverse duties, which lie upon a man about his vocation, and which both ought, and are wont ordinarily to be performed before the certainty of this grace can be gotten.

12. He therefore that desires to apply himself to God's Call ought to settle in his mind an estimation of the Word of God, above all riches, Psal. 119. 14. The reason is, because a man will never seek the Kingdom of God to purpose, unless he esteem it so highly that he judge all other things to be set after it, Mat. 10. 37. Luke 14. 26.

13. Secondly, he ought to employ his greatest care labor and industry, about this business, John 6. 27. Pro. 2. 4. & 8. ver. The reason is because there can be no serious, and solid estimation of a thing, where there is not an answerable endeavor to obtain it.

14. Thirdly, he ought with all diligence, care, and constancy, to apply himself to the use of all those means which God hath sanctified for the communicating of his grace. Pro. 8. 34. The reason is, because God only who is the author of grace, can appoint means, and make them effectual. He ought therefore to imitate those sick persons which lay at the pool of Bethesda, waiting for the moving of the water, John 5. 3 4 7.

15. Fourthly, he ought to bring himself to that pass that he may sell all that he hath to buy this pearl, Pr. 23. 23. Mat. 13. 45, 46. For although God doth freely bestow life upon us, and receive nothing at our hands in lieu of it, Esa. 55. 1. 2. Yet we ought to forsake all unlawful things actually, and all external and natural goods also, in the purpose, and disposition of our minds, else we cannot obtain the grace of God.

The fourth Question is by what motives a man may be stirred up to embrace the call of God.

16. Answer, first if he do seriously, and much consider with himself, who it is that calls him: for it is an omnipotent God to whom we ought to hearken and give ear; although we should not know what the event would be, Heb. 11. 8.

17. Secondly, if he do consider attentively often what it is to which God calls him: For it is no small matter, or light thing, but even eternal happiness, and glory, 1 Pet. 5. 10. Ep. 1. 18.

18. Thirdly, if he do also weigh what that is out of which he is called: For he is persuaded to forsake nothing, besides sin, and death, Acts 26. 18▪ Luke 3. 7.

19. Fourthly, if he do also consider what the cause is that moves God to call him, which he shall find to be nothing else but God's incomprehensible mercy towards his enemy▪ Rom. 8.

10. 2 Cor. 5. 10. He must have a heart of Iron, that is not moved with such goodness as this, as we may see by Saul, 1 Sam. 24. 17. 19.

20. Fifthly, if he do humbly compare himself with others, to whom this grace of vocation is denied. 1 Cor. 1. 26.

21. Sixthly, if he do call to mind how heinous an offense it is to neglect this call of God, much more to despise it, Mat. 22. 7. 8. L.... 4 24.

22. Seventhly, if he do also consider of that misery, which he doth by the Law of equity bring upon himself by this sin, Pr.... 1. 24—32.

CHAP. 6. Of Faith.

The work of effectual vocation, is to work in man a true Faith in Christ, and repentance towards God.

Concerning Faith, the first question is what a man is to do that he may obtain true Faith in Christ.

1. Ans. Besides those things which were propounded before, it is further required, 1. that a man do go altogether out of himself, renouncing his own righteousness▪ Rom. 10. 3. Phil. 3. 9. The reason is because no man will seek righteousness out of himself by Faith, unless he do first acknowledge himself to be destitute of all righteousness in himself.

2. Secondly, he ought to propou...d unto himself the righteousness of Christ, as his chiefest aim, and scope, so that he doth contemn all things in respect of that, Phil. 3. 9. 12. The reason is, because Christ is never sought as he ought to be, unless he be prefer'd before all things else, as the only means of eternal salvation.

3. Thirdly, he ought to fasten the eyes of his mind, upon the promises of the Gospel; For the Gospel is the Ministry of the spirit of righteousness and of life, 2 Cor. 3. 6. 8. the reason is, because Christ is neither offered of God, nor can be apprehended by man, but only in the promises of the Gospel.

4. Now in fastening our eyes upon the promises of the GossPELL, we must consider first, that Christ only is propounded in them, and that crucified, 1 Cor. 1 23 34. & •... 2. 2. Secondly, that in Christ there is a perfect sufficiency of redemption, and salvation, provided for them that be in him, John 3. 16. Whence also in Scripture it is called a rich, and plenteous, abundant, and plentiful grace, Ep. 1. 6. 7. & 2. 4. Rom. 5. 10. 1. Tim. 1. 14. Thirdly, that this grace is particularly offered to all those to whom it is preached, Mark... 16. 13.

The second question is by what motives a man may be stir'd up to believe in Christ.

5. Ans. First, if he consider that this is the Commandment of God, that he do believe in Christ, 1 John 3 23. Secondly, if he meditate of that misery, to which all those are subject which believe not, John 13. 18.

6. Thirdly, if he do meditate of the happiness of those which do truly believe, 1 John 3. 16.

7. Fourthly, if he consider that there is no other way whereby he can escape that misery, or obtain that happiness but only by Faith in Christ, Acts 4. 12. Heb. 11. 6.

8. Fifthly▪ if he do consider the injury which is offered to God by the man that believes not, 1 John 5. 10.

9. Sixthly, if he weigh with himself how much they do honor God, which believe in him, Rom. 4. 20. John 3. 33.

10. Seventhly, if he look upon the cloud of examples, which he hath of those which have believed and have been saved by Faith, Heb. 12. 1. For they were for patterns to them which should afterward believe, 1 Tim. 1. 16.

The third Question is by what signs true Faith may be discerned?

Ans. Faith in respect of the adjuncts, may be distinguished into a sick Faith and a lively.

11. A sickly Faith is that which is oppressed and hindered so by temptations, and corruptions, that it cannot put forth it self in those Fruits, which bring to the Conscience the sense of peace, delight and joy, Ep. 4. 30. an example hereof we have in David, Ps. 51. 14.

12. A lively Faith is that which doth freely exercise its acts▪ so that it is felt of the believer himself with a great deal of comfort, 1 Pet. 1. 8.

13. Faith also in regard of the degrees is distinguished into a weak and strong Faith.

14. A weak Faith is that which is easily hindered in its course, Ro. 14. 1. Ga. 6. 1. It is called in Scripture 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 little Faith, Mat. 16. 8.

15. A strong Faith is that which overcomes all difficulties, & proceeds freely in its course, it is called in Scripture 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 a full persuasion, Rom. 4. 24. Luke 1. 1. 1 Thess. 1. 5. Col. 2. 2.

16. A lively and strong Faith is easily manifest and known to them in whom it is, first because they have the testimony thereof in themselves, 1 John 5. 10. viz. the Spirit of God bearing witness with their spirit that they are the children of God, Rom. 8. 16. Which spirit they have as the earnest of their inheritance, 1 Ep. 13. 14. and by it they are sealed till the day of redemption, Ep. 4. 30. 2 They have the Love of God shed abroad in their hearts by the same spirit, Rom. 5. 5. Whereupon it is that they have peace, and joy unspeakable, and full of glory, 1 Pet. 1. 6. 8. Rom. 5. 1. 2. 3▪ They have and bring forth those Fruits, whereby true Faith is wont to be manifested, and perfected, Gal. 2. 18. Gal. 5. 6.

17. A languishing, and weak Faith may be discerned to be true, and sincere, principally by these notes.

First, if there be a sincere desire of Union, and Communion with Christ, 2 Cor. 8▪ 12. This desire is distingu...sht from that which may be found in the unregenerate, 1. because it is not a conditional desire, or a kind of wishing, which even many wicked men have after these spiritual good things, if they might also enjoy and still keep their sins, but it is an absolute choice, Heb. 11. 25. 2 Because it is not carried after these spiritual things, only as beneficial unto a man's self, but as simply, and in themselves good, and things for their own sake to be desired of all, Psal. 73. 25. & 43. 3. 3 Because it is carried after all choice that is as well after the sanctification, as after the justification and redemption which are in him▪ 1 Cor. 1. 30. 4 Because such a man more esteems of Christ then of all things else, 1 Pet. 2. 6. 5 There is always joynd with this desire, a sense of sin, and a serious sorrow for it, Mat. 11. 28. 6 This desire is not vanishing, and fickle, but constant, Luk. 18. 1. 7 It is not slothful but industrious, Pro. 21. & 26. 15.

18. The sincerity of Faith appears also, if it hath been begotten, and is preserved and stirred up by the powerful Ministry of the Word, Rom. 10. 14. Whereupon it comes to pass, that a man is affected towards the Word, as towards spiritual Food, 1 Pet. 2. 2. The reason is because such a kind of desire being a motion of spiritual Life, must needs presuppose life it self which consisteth in Faith; for carnal presumption both consisteth without the Ministry of the Word, and can by no means endure the effectual application, and setting home of those things which belong to the power of godliness, 2 Tim. 4. 3. But Faith cleaves unto the word as its principal and foundation.

19. The sincerity of Faith appears in the third place from hence, that although it seek justification in Christ, yet it embraceth, with a sincere assent, and subjection of heart, the whole Word of God, that is every precept, prohibition and threatening, which comes from God, Psal. 119. 6. I am. 2. 10. 14. Herod did assent unto many things, Mark 6. 20. The reason is because Faith doth unite a man's heart to God, and deliver it, up unto him, simply without any exception.

20. Fourthly, it appears by this, because as touching the purpose of the mind, and his uttermost endeavor, it purifye... a man's heart from all sin▪ Acts 15. 9. Mat. 5. 7. The reason is because Faith doth principally, and singularly seek in God the utter abolition or sin.

21. Fifthly, it appears by this, that it stirs up in the heart a sincere affection of love towards God, whereby it comes to pass, that we prefer the glory of God's Name above all things else, 1 John 4. 19. Hence it is that the faithful in the Scriptures are wont to be described by this property of their love towards God, Rom. 8. 28. 1 Co. 16. 22. Ep. 6. 23, 24. The reason is, because they place and apprehend their chief good in God.

22. Sixthly, it appears by that sincere love which it works in a man's heart towards his fellow Brethren, 1 John 3. 14. & 5. 1. The reason is because the Image of God appears in them.

CHAP. 7. Of those temptations which fight against FAITH.

BEcause the whole spiritual life of a man doth depend upon his Faith, Heb. 10. 38. And by Faith as by a shield, a man is preserved safe against all the temptations of the Devil, the World and the Flesh, Ep. 6. 16. 1 Pet. 5. 9. Heb. 11. 25. Therefore it is that these three enemies do bend their forces principally against Faith. It will be profitable therefore to be acquainted with the principle assaults in this kind, as also with those means whereby through the grace of God, we may repel them, that they do not overmuch weaken our Faith.

The first Question then is, how the believer may support himself against those temptations, which are drawn from hence, that there are no notable Fruits of his Faith to be seen and discerned.

1. Ans. first he ought to consider that Faith in its own nature is of those things which are not seen or felt, Heb. 11. 1. And in this it differs from vision, Rom. 8. 24. 1 Cor. 13. 12. And therefore there is no more required to the being of Faith but that man do with his whole heart make choice of Christ for his Savior, and with his whole heart adhere unto him. Other things belong to the well being of Faith, not absolutely to the being of it, Col. 2. 7.

2. Secondly, he ought to consider, that the want of many fruits may argue Faith to be languishing, or weak, but it cannot argue that there is no Faith, 2 Pet. 1. 8.

3. Thirdly, he ought to consider that the Conscience is often supported much by the remembrance of what is past, though for the present grace appear not, Psal. 77. 6. 7. 12. And by the judgments of others that are godly, and wise concerning us, when our own judgment is troubled, Heb. 6. 9. 2 Cor. 2. 7. 8.

The second Question is, how a man may support himself against those temptations which are drawn from hence, that he feels upon him the signs of the Wrath of God?

4. Ans. First, he ought to consider, that many signs of God's wrath may stand with his love and favor. Psal. 99. 8.

5. Secondly, he ought to remember that Christ himself who was the Son of God's love, did taste the wrath of God in this sort, Mat. 27. 46.

6. Thirdly, he ought to consider that it is required of the Faithful that they believe against hope under hope, Rom. 4. 11. And that they do, and they wrestle as it were with God, by Faith, Gen. 32. 24. Hos. 12. 4. 5.

The third Question is how he may hold up his head against those temptations, which arise from hence, that his Faith increaseth not, Rom. 1. 17.

7. Ans. He ought to consider first that it is with Faith, as it is with plants and living Creatures, which we may more easily perceive to have grown, then to grow. Secondly, that the increase of Faith is not to be expected at every moment, and at all seasons of our life, Heb. 5. 12. But then especially when the Sun of righteousness approacheth nearer to our Horizon, by a more merciful communication of his grace, Acts 9. 31. 2 Pet. 1. 2. 3. Thirdly, that those temptations which do hinder the increase of Faith for the present do advantage it for the future, like the winter to the Plants, and like diverse sicknesses to the bodies of young Folke.

Fourth Question is how a man may comfort himself against those terrors which arise from the guilt of his sins, especially if they be grievous?

8. Ans. He ought to remember, 1. That such temptations as these, do proceed from a defect in Faith, Rom. 6. 11. Ep. 6. 16. 1 Pet. 5. 9. And therefore that we are not to cast away our Faith because of such sins, but rather so much the more to strengthen it, Lu. 22. 32.

9. He ought secondly to consider that it is the duty of the faithful not for sin to fly away from God, but rather for God to fly away from sin, and to adhere to God in Christ, that sin may be remitted, and abolished, John 3. 14. With Num. 21. 19.

The fifth Quest. is how a Christian may sustain himself in time of affliction?

10. Ans. He ought to consider, 1. That such kind of trials are fruits of God's love, Heb. 12. 6. 2 They shall work for his good, Rom. 8. 28. 3 The grace of God in all these ought to be sufficient to him▪ 2 Cor. 12. 9. But of afflictions more hereafter.

CHAP. 8. Of Repentance.

Concerning Repentance the first Question is, what a man is to do that he may repent?

1. Ans. He ought, 1. attentively and seriously to consider his sins, according to that nature which is most detestible, Esa. 1. 4. Apoc. 3. 17. For as the consideration of sin under some false shape as a thing lovely, and desirable, doth draw a man to sin: so the true consideration of sin▪ as a thing abominable, and by all means to be eschew'd, doth withdraw the mind from sin by true Repentance. To set on this consideration it will be profitable, 1. To meditate upon the Majesty of God, which is by our sins most grievously offended. 2. Weigh well the infinite and manifold obligations whereby we are bound to please God, which yet we have not ceased wickedly to violate. 3. To think upon the terrible wrath of God, which like a consuming fire, remains upon impenitent sinners. 4. To set before our eyes, those supernatural good things of which our sins deprive us. 5. To call to mind those great evils which by our sins we bring upon ourselves, and others, and the dishonor which we do to God. And to this purpose it will be exceeding profitable religiously to meditate upon the unsufferable torments, death, and curse which befell Christ for our sins.

2. He ought, 2. to set before his eyes, Obedience towards God, as a thing absolutely to be sought, necessarily to be followed after, Luke 13. 3 & 10. 42. They which are carried after any other thing, as absolutely necessary, are by that very affection by which they are so carried, drowned in perdition. 1 Tim. 6. 9.

3. He ought, 3. to confess his sins before God, 1 John 1. 9. Psal. 32. 5. & 51. 5. For confession of sin makes a man take all the guilt, and shame unto himself, and ascribe all the glory to God, Daniel 9.

4. He ought, 4. by Faith in Christ to expect, and pray for the change of his heart according to that promise which we have, Ez. 36. 26. 32. For those which go about the work of conversion leaning upon their own strength, do nothing to the purpose in this business, 2 Cor. 3. 5,

5. He ought, 5. in the power of God, to turn himself with all his heart from that which is evil, and to convert himself to that which is good in the sight of God, Psalms 34. 15. Now turning from evil, consists primarily in the hatred of evil, Psal. 45. 8. Which hatred in respect of those sins which are past, doth necessarily bring forth an unfeigned sorrow, Zach. 12. 10. Together with a shame, and dislike, Rom. 6. 21. And conversion to good, doth primarily consist, in a desire, and purpose to do well, Psalm 119. 33. 106.

The second Question is, by what motives a man may be stirred up to true repentance?

6. Ans. Let him consider, 1. That this repentance is a thing very pleasing to God, Psal. 51. 19. The force of the argument lies here, because he which hath given himself up to God by Faith, cannot but endeavor after all those things, by which God is well pleased. 2. That it is absolutely necessary to salvation, Luke 13. 3. The reason of the consequence lies here, because he which desires the end, desires also those means, which he sees to have a necessary connection with that end, 3. That sin is the cause of our separation from God, Esa. 59. 2. This reason holds because the believer by his Faith doth adhere to God, and therefore turns away from all those things which work a separation twixt God, and him, 4. That there is an utter opposition betwixt sin, and our vocation and Faith and Life, 2 Cor. 6. 15, 16. 1 Thess. 4. 7. 1. The argument is strong because he which affirms one of the contraries denies the other, 5. That the mercies of God towards him, (by all which he is lead unto repentance) are exceeding great, Rom. 2. 4. 5. Ier. 84. 5. 12. 6. That Christ suffered most grievous anguish for our sins. Zac. 12. 12. By which we may learn how horrible they be, and how much to be detested, 7. That impenitency in it self is the most grievous sin, and that it is the continuation, the sealing up, and the amplification of all sins besides, 8. That there are great promises made, and that the Kingdom of Heaven stands open to all such as repent, Esa. 1. 18. 1 Kings 8. 48 49, 50.

The third Question is, what be the signs of true Repentance?

7. Answer, First a grief for sin in respect of the offense done to God by them, and not only in respect of punishment; the reason is because repentance doth turue a man from sin as it is sin, now it is sin as it doth transgress the revealed will of God, and so offendeth him, and provokes him to anger. This grief ought to be the greatest of all grief, Zach. 12. 10, 11. At the least intellectually, in regard of the displeasnesse of the will, although in respect of the sense other griefs may sometimes appear more vehement. Griefe, or sorrow is an offense of the soul, arising from hence that it suffereth something which it abhors as being a thing whereby it feels it self to be hurt. Griefe therefore for sin doth necessarily accompany true conversion, for the mind while it converts it self from sin, beginneth to nill sin, or to abhor it, It perceiving therefore that somewhat sticks to it which it doth abhor, cannot choose but be troubled. And because the chief reason why the converted soul doth abhor sin, is that repugnancy which sin hath to the will of that God, to which the soul being converted is now joined, hence it is, that grief for sin if it be right ariseth rather from this ground, because God is thereby offended, then because any misery is brought upon ourselves.

8. Secondly, a hatred of sin, as a thing above all others most detestable, Apocal. 2. 6. This hatred if it be sincere, 1. Is carried against all known sins without any exception, 2. It is constant without intermission, 3. It is implacable without reconciliation, 4. It is vehement without toleration.

9. A third sign is an earnest desire, and settled purpose to avoid all sin, and to live after God's Law for the future; The reason is because he which doth detest, and hate sin, for this reason because it is sin, and offends God's Majesty, will as well abhor future sins, as those which are past, for these do every whit as much offend God as the other: and no man can avoid future sins unless he do purpose and determine with himself, as strongly as he can that he will never, upon any condition commit sin again. This purpose if it be sincere, 1. Doth cause a separation as far as possible may be from present sins, and from occasions of future sins, 2. It intendeth everything that it is good, 3. It seeks for it effectually in a diligent endeavor and use of the means, 4. It carefully labors to remove all impediments as well internal, as external.

The fourth Question is how a man can repent of such sins as he cannot come to the knowledge of?

10. Answer, He which formally and distinctly repents of all his known sins, hath a virtual, and con•...used repentance even for those sins which he knoweth not, Psalm 19. 13.

The fifth Question is, whither it be sufficient for a man to repent once?

11. Ans. First, past sins are not to be forgotten, Deut. 9. 7. No not those which were committed in youth, Psalm 25. 7. 2▪ This remembrance of former sins is profitable, 1. to humble us, Deut. 9. 6. 7. 2. To stir up thankfulness towards God, 1 Tim. 1. 12. & 3. 10. 3 To make us pitiful and gentle to other sinners, Titus 3. 2. 3. But as oft as our sins come to mind we ought to be affected with shame, and sorrow for them, Gen. 41 9. Ez. 16. 61. 63. 1 Cor. 15. 9. It is true that horror which is wont at ones first conversion to ceize upon the soul, returns not to the faithful by the remembrance of their old sins, because of the Mercy of God, which thorough Christ they have obtained, but yet shame, and blushing is a thing that doth become Saints very well, Rom. 6. 21. So that it is made a note of a wicked man that hath not yet repented of his sins if he can think on them, and call them to mind with pleasure, Job. 20. 12. Pro. 2. 14.

12. Secondly, Repentance is to be renewed daily, as sins are renewed, 2 Tim. 1. 6. Ier. 8. 6. For as a Candle newly put out, and yet smoking, is kindled again and reviveth by a small blast, so the soul is freed from ordinary straights and dangers by a seasonable, that is by a daily renewing of Repentance. A member out of joint is to be set as soon as may be. 3. After extraordinary sins extraordinary repentance also is necessary, Psal. 51. 1. 1 Corin. 5. 2. 2 Cor. 7. 9. & 12. 21.

CHAP. 9. Of Adoption.

Vpon Faith in Christ follows justification and adoptition, but because justification doth properly consist in relation therefore there is no peculiar thing about it that belongs to Conscience, besides those which either were spoken of before, in the Questions about Faith, or are hereafter to be spoken of, amongst those things which belong to Sanctification, Glorification, and Obedience.

If any one be certain of his Faith in Christ, and yet do doubt in Conscience whether he be justified before God, this happens through want of wisdom to infer the conclusion out of the promises. This defect therefore is remedied by a right information about the nature of justification. For all the promises of the Gospel concerning remission of sins, justification, and life eternal, do as well belong to every particular believer, and may and ought as well to be apprehended, and applied by him unto himself, as if his own name were written in the Scriptures. The reason is, because whatsoever is promised to Faith, or to the faithful in general, is promised expressly to all and every true believer in particular.

There is the same reason for adoption also, save only that to this benefit, there is attributed as an adjunct a certain operation of the spirit in respect whereof he is called the spirit of adoption. For although it be the same spirit, which doth, 1. convince men of sin, and of righteousness, and judgment, John 16. 8. 2. Illuminate them with the saving knowledge of Christ, 1 Corinthians 1. 10. 13. Ep. 1. 17. 18. 3. Ingraft them into Christ, Ep. 3. 6. & 4. 4. 4. Quicken them being engrafted, 2 Cor. 3. 6. 5. Lead them into all truth which is necessary to salvation, John 14. 17. & 16. 13. John 4. 16. Yet because adoption hath a primary place among those benefits which are sealed to us by the holy spirit, hence it is that he receiveth a singular denomination there from, and is called the spirit of adoption, Romans 8. 15. Concerning this spirit the first Question is, what a man ought to do that he may obtain the lively act, and sense of it?

1. Ans. He ought, 1. to give diligent attention to the preaching of the Gospel, 2 Cor. 3. 6. 8. The Ministers of the new testament are called the Ministers of the spirit, and the Ministry thereof the Ministry of the spirit, because by that means God doth offer, and communicate his spirit, Gal. 3. 2. Ye have received the spirit by the hearing of Faith, Ep. 1. 13.

In whom ye also trusted after that ye heard the word of truth, the Gospel of your salvation, in whom also after that ye believed, ye were sealed with the holy spirit of promise.

2. He ought, 2. to beg this spirit of God, Luke 11▪ 13. Your Heavenly Father will give the holy spirit to them that ask him.

3. He ought▪ 3. To open the doors of his heart that the spirit may enter in, Psal. 24. 7. Apoc. 3. 20. That is to call off his mind from earthly things and to raise it upwards and to prepare himself, by all means to entertain the motions of the spirit.

The proper Question is, what be the signs of the spirit of Adoption.

4. Ans. The first sign is a spirit of Prayer, whereby we call upon God as a Father. Zach. 12. 10. Rom. 8. 15. 26. Gal. 4. 6. For no man can have a true filial affection toward, and confidence in God, but by communion of the spirit.

Now this is in that regard proper in a sort to the time of the Gospel, or New Testament, because God hath declared himself principally, •...tly, and in a more excellent manner then formerly to be our Father.

5. The second sign is an high estimation of the dignity of Adoption, John. 1. 12. 1 John. 3. 1. For the spirit doth not only seal unto us our Adoption, but doth also show us how great a blessing it is, and how much to be prized.

6. The third sign is the fear and honor of God, 1 Pet. 1. 17. Mat. 1. 6. For true reverence follows upon an apprehension of great love and kindness mixed with great power.

7. The fourth sign is filial obedience, 1 Pet. 1. 14. Which proceeds not so much from hope and reward, as from love and desire to please God, Rom. 8. 14. For obedience springeth from a religious reverence.

8. The fifth sign is conformity to the Image of God our Father, and Christ our elder brother, Mat. 5. 48. Ro. 8. 29. 1 John. 3. 9. For the Son is begotten after the similitude and likeness of his Father.

9. The sixth sign is a firm hope of the eternal inheritance Ro. 8. 17. For the inheritance and the expectation thereof is proper to some, not to peccants or strangers.

The third Question is how the testimony of the spirit may be preserved?

8. Ans. 1. If we extinguish and quench it not by contempt or neglect of the means of grace, 1 Thess. 5. 19. 20. The reason is, because the word with the like means of grace are the force of the spiritual life, by the use of which the spirit is strengthened within us, and in the want of which the spirit in regard of its inhabitation fails in us, and is said to be quenched.

11. 2. If we grieve it not by the filthiness of sin, Eph. 4. 30. The reason is because as natural grief ariseth from the presence, or representation of some repugnant, and unwelcome object, which is incumbent and prevails against us, so that spirit is in a sort grieved by the prevailing of sin, a thing to him most odious and repugnant.

12. 3. If we stir it up by holy exercises. 2. Tim. 1. 6. The reason is because as fire in green wood burns not but by the help of bellows and blowing, so neither doth any spiritual heat continue in the hearts of sinners, unless due means be used for the stirring it up.

CHAP. 10. Of Sanctification.

Concerning Sanctification the first question is, what a man ought to do that he may be sanctified?

1. Ans. He ought▪ 1. wholly to submit himself to the word of God. For the word of God is that truth which sanctifies u•... John 17. 17. Ier. 31. 33. And it is effectual to work sanctification, 1. Because of that utter opposition which it hath against sin, by reason whereof it repels sin out of the heart, where it is seated, 2. Because it is the powerful instrument of God to regenerate men, 1. Pet. 1 23.

2. He ought 2. By Faith to apply Christ unto himself, as in Sanctification, 1 Cor. 1. 30. He ought therefore, 1. To suck as it were holiness out of Christ, that is, Considering that Christ is the Fountain of all spiritual life and Sanctifying grace, John. 1. 16. Col. 1. 19. & 2. 9. He ought to rely & put his confidence in Christ for the obtaining of Sanctification, and to draw it ought of that Fountain, Esa. 12. 3. He ought, 2. To provoke himself unto it by the meditation of Christ, that is, seriously weighing and considering the blessings of God in Christ, he ought to stir up himself to such an endeavor after Sanctification as becometh such benefits.

3. Now because there are two parts of our Sanctification, namely mortification, whereby sin or the old man is put off, and vivification, whereby grace or the new man is put on, Eph. 4. 22. 24. Col. 3▪ 8▪ 10. Therefore there are two parts of the application of it for Sanctification, the first is the application of his death, the second of his Resurrection and life, Rom. 6.

4. The application of the death of Christ to the mortifying of sin, is when Faith doth effectually collect this mortification of sin, from the death of Christ, Rom. 6. 11.

5. By this application sin is said to be crucified▪ Romans 6. 6. Gal. 5. 24. To be killed, Romans 6. 2. And to be buried, Rom. 6. 4.

6. The Nailes whereby in this application sin is fastened to the Cross, are the very same with those, whereby Christ was fastened to the Cross. For there is nothing more effectual, then if one would consider seriously, 1. The nature and desert of his sins. For he which seriously considers that his sins do deserve, and will procure his death, and destruction, he cannot but seek by all means to prevent it, by the mortification of sin; for either sin, or the sinner must needs die, Rom. 8. 13. 2 The love and mercy of God the Father toward him a sinner, in sending Christ to take away his sin. For the love of God will contstrain us to seek that for ourselves, which God so earnestly sought for us, 1 John 4. 11. 3 The love of Jesus Christ in undergoing, and fulfilling all things that were required for the taking away of our sins. For this grace and love of Christ, if it work but upon us as it ought, will contstrain us to set about this work, 2 Cor. 5. 14, 15. Those were the very Nailes whereby Christ was fastened to the Cross, and not those material ones, which his murderers did use for this purpose.

7. The application of the resurrection and life of Christ unto vivification, is when Faith doth effectually collect this life of grace, from the resurrection and life of Christ. Rom. 6. 11. Now it is effectually collected, by a meditation of the efficient cause, and end, and fruits of the resurrection of Christ, Col. 3. 1. The meditation of the efficient cause affordeth this argument; If the said spirit which raised up Christ from the dead, dwellin me, it will also raise up my soul from the death of sin, to the life of grace, Rom. 8. 11. The meditation of the end, this; As Christ was raised up, that sin might have no more dominion over him, but that he might forever live to God, so also must we, Rom. 6. 9. 10. The meditation of the fruits yields this argument: As Christ being raised up sitteth at the right Hand of his Father in Heaven, so ought we also to live as Citizens of Heaven, Phil. 3. 20.

8. He ought, 3. by a lively Faith, not only to apprehend the general promises of salvation, but those particular ones also, which do in a singular manner pertain to sanctification Ex. 30. 24.

9. He ought, 4. To yield up himself wholly to the holy Ghost, to be acted and led by him in all things. Ro. 8. 13. 14.

The second Question, by what motives may a man be stirred up to labor for Sanctification?

10. Ans. If he consider, 1. That without holiness no man shall see God. Heb. 12. 14. Mat. 5. 20. 2 That holiness is the Image of God, and that perfection, wherein we were created at the beginning. Eph. 4. 24. 3 That holiness is the end of our election, redemption and vocation, Eph. 1. 4. 1 Tim. 4. 7. Tit. 2. 14. 1 Cor. 1. 2. 4 That it is not the least part of glory and eternal bliss. Eph. 5. 27. 5 That there can be no true Faith or justification, or adoption without sanctification, Iac. 2. 26. 2 Pet. 1. 10. 1 Cor. 6. 11.

The third Question, what are the signs of true sanctification.

Ans. 1. A reformation of all the powers, and faculties of the whole man, 1 Thess. 5. 23. 2 A respect to all the Commandments of God, Psal. 119. 6. James 2. 10. 3 A constant care to avoid all sin, Pro. 28. 14. 4 A walking before God, Gen. 17. 1. Acts 24. 16. 1 Cor. 10. 31. Col. 3. 23. 5 A combat betwixt the flesh and the spirit.

CHAP. 11. Of the combat of the Spirit against the Flesh.

*Q*uestion, how may the combat of the spirit against the flesh which is in the regenerate, be distinguished from that fight which is oft found in the unregenerate when they sin?

First, Ans. 1. They differ in the causes. For, 1. the reluctance which is in the wicked proceeds either from horror, and a servile fear of punishment, or from some evil disposition, which is easily overcome, but the spiritual combat ariseth from a certain new nature, which of its own accord, is carried after those things which are pleasing to God, and doth firmly, and constantly shun, and make opposition against whatsoever is contrary, 2. That fight and reluctance, which is found in wicked men, takes place only, in such gross sins, as either are condemned by the Law of nature, or are wont to be abhorred by all such as are in any small measure illuminated: but the spiritual combat of the regenerate is exercised against all sin, though it never come to be perfected in any gross crime.

Secondly, 2. They differ in the objects: For that fight which is found in the wicked, is either between the dictate of their Conscience and the inclination of the will, or between some light inclination of the will to some moral good things, and heady affections which rule, and bear sway: but that combat which is in the regenerate, consisteth in the opposition and strife of a certain new and supernatural quality of spiritual life, which hath its seat principally in the will, against corrupt inclinations, which dwell indeed within them, but bear no sway over them.

Thirdly, 3. They differ in the effects. For 1. that fight which is in natural men, may and is wont to consist with a daily and ordinary course of sinning: But the combat of the spirit, doth always cause that (although there may be many slips, and infirmities) the course, and tenor of a man's life be squared, and ordered according to the will of God, 1 John 3. 9. 10. 2 That opposition in natural men, although it may sometime be a cause, why some good is done by them, yet it cannot make a good principle, a good end, and a good manner of working ▪ all which the combat of the spirit against the flesh doth bring along with it, 3. The fight of natural men, doth ordinarily admit such actions as are for the substance of them evil: but the spirit doth so prevail for the most part that it admits not a sin in the fact it self although there may be a failing in the degree, and manner of doing, 4. For those evils which the unregenerate man doth commit, this fight that is within him hinders not, but that the sin may be, in all respects consummated, in regard of the precedent consultation, and purpose, the concomitant pleasure, and delight, and the following obstinacy and impenitency: but the spirit by its combat with the flesh doth abate the power of sin, partly before the commission, partly in the commission, and doth afterward utterly break it, 5. That reluctance which is in natural men seeks only to repress, and keep sin under, but the spirit in its combat contends always for the very mortification of sin, and the highest perfection of grace, although before death it be not attainable.

CHAP. 12. Of growth in Sanctification.

The fifth Question is whether we ought to content ourselves with this, that we have some beginnings of sanctification?

1. Answ. No, there are two duties to be performed yet by us, in either of which if we be negligent all our labor is lost.
2. The 1. Is a care to keep that holiness we have, 1 Tim. 1. 19. The reason is because that many have escapt in some degree the pollutions of the world, and yet have been entangled therein and overcome, and so the latter end hath been worse with them then their beginning, 2 Pet. 21. 22.
3. Now we shall hold fast our holiness, 1. If we be mindful of the Covenant which we made with God, Job. 31. 1. And of our redemption, 1 Cor. 6. 19. 20. 2 If we take diligent heed, that we never repent of any repentance, Ier. 34. 11. That is if we be careful that we never fall in love with that sin which we have hated, or slight any duty which our Consciences have approved, no not in those things, which the world counts small and as nothing.
4. The 2. duty is a study, and care to increase in holiness, with the increase of God, Col. 2. 19. 2. Peter 1. 5. Phil. 1. 9. 1 Tim. 4. 15.
5. The reason is, 1. Because such is the nature of grace that it always stirs up them in whom it is to an earnest desire of a larger fruition of it, 1 Pet. 2. 2. 3. So that although that thirst which is a thirst of total indigence or want be excluded by grace, John 4. 14. Yet that which is for a more plentiful fruition is no taken away but increased, 2. Because as the vital heat of our bodies doth never continue in one state, but is either increasing, or decreasing always, so in this life of grace, unless we do give all diligence that we may be on the growing hand, it cannot be avoided but there will be a consumption through that opposition which the spirit meets with from the flesh.

6. Now we shall make a progress in Sanctification, 1. If we exercise ourselves daily to a more perfect denying of sin, and of the world, and of ourselves, and to a more earnest and serious seeking of God and his Kingdom, 2. If we have our end always in our eyes, Pro. 4. 23. 3 If we keep our hearts with all diligence, Pro. 4. 23. 4 If we watch to •...e holy use of all those means which make to sanctification, and join earnest prayer with them.

CHAP. 13. Of the first fruits of Glorification consisting in the sense of God's Love.

ull in this life, the apprehension and sense of God's Love is the chiefest, for as the procurement of our salvation, had its beginning, and first foundation, in the election, and love of God, so the beginning of the perceiving thereof is in the perceiving of the same love, now concerning this love, the first Question is how a man may obtain the apprehension and sense of the love of God?

1. Ans. The proper cause of this apprehension is the holy Ghost, who sheds this love of God in the hearts of believers, Rom. 5. 5. That is, certifies them particularly that this love of God is extended abundantly to them. But yet there are many means whereby this work is promoted, and whereby also believers come to be rooted, and grounded in this love, Ephesians 3. 18. The principle of them are these that follow.

2. First, if the believer do apprehend that (God in regard of that relation wherein he stands to him and the rest of the faithful is merely love) 1 John 4. 8. For so that phrase is to be understood, not of God considered absolutely, but in relation unto the faithful, because all things which God doth, to and about believers, proceeds in some sort from his love, for the love of God is to be sought for, and to be considered in the effects thereof.

3. Secondly, if he consider how admirable all the circumstances be in the love of God, John 3. 16. 1 In respect of the person loving. For God who hath in himself all good, all sufficiency, and perfection, that could receive no profit, either by man, or by man's love and besides that was grievously offended with man, this God notwithstanding loveth man 1 John 4. 10. 11.

4. Secondly, in respect of the person beloved. For God hath loved man, that deserved no such thing from him, man his enemy, man unthankfull, Ro. 5. 8.

5. Thirdly, in respect of the gifts which are the fruits of this love. For God out of love hath given man his own Son, and in his son himself, 1 John 2. 24. And with him all good things, Rom. 8. 32.

6. Fourthly, in respect of the manner of the giving, which was out of mere and abundant grace, without man's request, and beyond his expectation, Rom. 10. 20.

7. Fifthly, in respect of the continuance, for this love of God was from eternity, and shall remain immutably unto all eternity, Ep. 1. 4. Ier. 31. 3. John 13. 1.

8. The third means to promote the sense of God's love in the heart of a believer is for him to labor with all his might in the use of those means which tend to this purpose to get a more plentiful taste of this love, Psalms 34. 9. 1. Pet. 2. 3.

The second Question is how a man may know that God loves him?

9. Ans. 1. If he be certain that Christ is his, Gal. 2. 20. that is, if he be certain that he hath a true Faith in Christ. For Christ is the Son of God's love, by whom his love is derived unto others.

10. 2. If he be certain of his love to God, 1 John 4. 10. Pro. 8. 17.

11. 3. If he follow after righteousness, Pro. 15. 9. For God cannot but love his own Image.

12. 4. If the love of God do constrain, and effectually stir him up, to all duties of piety towards God, and of love, and Justice towards men, •...Cor. 5. 14. 1 John 4. 12.

A third Question is, whether a man may not collect the Love of God, from the common good things which he bestows?

13. Ans. All the benefits of God, of what sort soever they be, do bring with them an obligation, to love and obey that God which is the donor, but it is proper to some of them to bring besides that, solid and spiritual comfort to the receiver, by a demonstration of the singular love of God, which is made by them. For nothing that is common, can demonstrate any special love. Creation therefore, and preservation, and earthly and natural good things cannot by themselves be any signs of a supernatural love, Eccles. 9. 2. But yet these common good things, when they are received by Faith, as given in Christ, are (in respect of the manner wherewith they are then clothed) proper to the faithful, and are secondary signs of God's love to them, Psal. 22. 10, 11, 12. For Faith maketh such a kind of arguing as there the Psalmist useth, to be of force, whereas without Faith there could no such consequence be drawn from them.

CHAP. 14. Of the hope of eternal life.

FROM the apprehension, and sense of God's love, follows a confirmed hope, or confidence, and undoubted expectation of eternal life. Now concerning this hope, and certainty, the first Question is whether a believer may be infallibly be assured of his salvation?

1. Ans. There is not only a possibility for the believer to come to this certainty, but it is his duty also, never to rest contented till he have obtained it, Heb. 6. 11. & 10. 22. Rom. 4. 21 & 8. 35.-39. For

2. First, God hath confirmed this to every believer by promise, by oath, by earnest, by seals, John 3. 16. Ier. 31. 40, 41. Heb. 6. 17. Eph. 1. 14. Mark. 16. 16.

3. Secondly, Faith ought to receive all that which God hath thus confirmed, Heb. 4. 2.

4. This certainty is perfected in us by three Acts, 1. by an act of Faith properly so called whereby we rest upon God by Christ, for the certain obtaining of salvation: 2 By an act 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 of knowledge, whereby we believing do understand that God hath certainly adjudged this salvation unto us. 3. By an act of confidence or of hope, whereby we certainly look for this salvation, which is thus adjudg'd to us and made ours. But yet for all that the whole application is attributed to Faith, because it dependeth first, and chiefly on faith.

5. Thirdly, salvation, and life eternal is contained in the object of Faith. For we believe life everlasting, 1 Peter 1. 3, 4, 5.

6. Fourthly, true grace (of the certainty of which we spake before) is never separated from life eternal, Heb. 6. 9. For the grace of justification is a more certain cause of life, and the grace of sanctification is a part of eternal life, John. 17. 3. Gal. 2. 20.

7. Fifthly, God the Father hath decreed to bring to eternal life all those that believe, for Faith is a fruit of election, Acts 2. 47. & 13 48.

8. Sixthly, Christ our Savior doth perpetually intercede for the faithful, that they may be preserved from evil, John 17. 15.

9. Seventhly, the holy Ghost doth direct, and keep the faithful to life eternal, John 16. 16. Ez 36. 27.

10. Eighthly, by the power of God, and Christ, the faithful are preserved, John 10. 28, 29. 1 Pet. 1. 5. And strengthened, Eph. 3. 16. Col. 1. 10. Pil. 4. 1.

The second Question by what motives a believer may be stirred up to seek for this certainty of hope with all diligence?

11. Ans. 1. God requires this, Rom. 15 13. Col. 1▪ 23. Heb. 6. 11. & 10. 22. 1 Pet. 5 9.

12. Secondly, this hope is as necessary for a believer in time of temptation, as a helmet is for a Soldier, and an anchor for a Ship, Ep. 6. 17. 1 Thess. 5. 8. Heb. 6. 19.

13. Thirdly, it brings with it freedom, and strength and courage, and constancy, in every work of the Lord, Heb. 3. 6. 1 Cor. 15. 58. The reason is because the end, and fruit of a man's work doth allure, and wh•...t him on to industry, and constancy in working. For although our salvation be not the chief, and last end of our obedience, yet it is the fruit of it, and in that respect, partaketh of the nature of an end, Rom. 6. 22. So that it is not only lawful but very expedient also, for the help of our infirmity to set about the work of piety, with an eye upon the recompense of reward, James 5. 7. Gal. 6, 7, 8▪ Heb. 12. 2. Ps. 19. 12.

14. Fourthly, it is the end of the calling of the Faithful, whence also it is stilled the hope of their calling, Eph. 1. 18.

15. Fifthly, this hope maketh not ashamed, because it is never vain, neither doth it deceive, Rom. 5. 4, 5. Rom. 8. 24.

16. Sixthly, it is hope by which a believer is saved, Romans 8. 24.

The third Question is what a believer ought to do for the obtaining and preserving of a lively hope.

17. Ans. He ought, 1. to preserve his Faith firm, and lively. For hope flows from▪ and depends upon Faith, and that not only, the being of Faith, but the degree, the measure, and the sense of it. Heb. 11. 1.

18. Secondly, he ought with all care to keep a good conscience: for such a Conscience doth make much for the confirming of Faith and hope, 1 Tim. 1. 19. 2 Tim. 4. 7, 8.

19. Thirdly, he ought diligently to observe the experiment which he hath had of God's love towards him. For experience causeth hope, Rom. 5. 4.

20 Fourthly, he ought oftentimes to set before his eyes the examples of those, who have with happy success placed their hope in God, James 5. 10, 11.

21. Fifthly, he ought to be frequent in the exercises of piety, Rom. 1•... 4.

The fourth Question is what are the signs of a true and lively hope?

22. Ans. 1. True hope is carried upon God only, who is therefore called the God of hope, Rom. 15. 1•... And the hope of Israel, Ier. 14. 8.

23. Secondly, it rests upon that free mercy of God which is manifested in justification, and not upon any human merits, or strength, nor upon any external and common blessings of God, Rom. 5. 1.

24. Thirdly, it doth expect not only happiness, but sanctification also, Gal. 5. 5.

25. Fourthly, it is begotten, and preserved by holy exercises, Rom. 15. 4.

26. Fifthly, it brings forth patience, 1 Thess. 1. 3.

27. Sixthly, it causeth spiritual joy, Heb. 3. 6.

28. Seventhly, it begetteth a constant care of holiness, 1 John 3. 3.

CHAP. 15. Of Consolation.

FRom Christian hope or confidence, ariseth consolation, which is, a confirmation of the soul, against the grief and fear that doth oppress it, for it is not properly a rejoicing of the soul (as some think) but rather a repression, or a mitigation, o•... an allaying of grief, fear, or sadness. For that man is said to receive comfort and consolation, when he hath in some sort put away grief, although joy be not yet come in the place, or if his sadness, and sorrow, be at least in some sort mitigated, and lessend. For sometimes there may be a mixture of sorrow and consolation together. Neither are men either perfectly well or perfectly ill, when they begin to receive consolation, Esa. 40. 1, 2. Now concerning this consolation

The first Question is, whether a believer may attain unto solid comfort against all kinds of evil?

1. Ans. He may. For▪ 1. God the Father in respect of the faithful is the God of all consolation, comforting them in all afflictions. 2 Cor. 1. 3, 4.

2. Secondly, Christ is the principle, or fountain by which the comfort of the faithful doth flow. 2 Cor. 1. 5.
3. Thirdly, the holy Ghost is the comforter of all believers imparting unto them all consolation, John 14. 16. 26 & 15. 26. & 16. 7. 13.
4. Fourthly, the whole Scripture maketh for the consolation of the faithful, Rom. 15. 4.
5. Fifthly, this consolation is made strong by the immutable counsel of God, and by his strengthening of believers, Heb. 6. 17, 18.
6. Together with this consolation God doth join the confirmation of his grace, which consists in a repairing of their strength, and in a fortifying of them against troubles. For whereas the faithful oft times like weak women, through the apprehension of some terrible evil, do fall as it were into a swoond, and all their strength is dissolved, God on the other side in this defect makes a supply by his grace of confirmation: we have a notable example of this, Dan. 10. & 8. There remained no strength in me, & 10. And behold a hand touched me which set me upon my knees, and upon the palms of my hands, and he said unto me, stand upright, and 18. Then there came again and touched me one like the appearance of a man, and he strengthened me and said, O man greatly beloved fear no..., peace be unto thee, be strong, yea be strong, and when he had spoken unto me I was strengthened, and said let my Lord speak... for thou hast strengthened me. And this is a grace which we are commanded to seek for, Heb. 12. 12.

CHAP. 16. Of Afflictions.

The second Question is, what those evils be against which the faithful ought to seek consolation?

Ans. They are either corporal as the afflictions of this life and death, or spiritual, as spiritual temptations and sins.

The third Question is, by what arguments, a believer may be confirmed, and comforted against the afflictions of this life?

1. Ans. First, such kind of afflictions are common to man, 1 Cor. 10. 13. And are wont to be accomplisht in believers while they live here, 1 Pet. 5. 9. Act. 14. 22.
2. Secondly, without God's Providence not so much as a hair of our head shall perish, Mat. 10 30. Luk. 21. 18.
3. Thirdly, the fatherly love of God is wont to be manifest in the afflictions of the faithful, Heb. 12. 6.
4. Fourthly, Christ himself hath suffered and overcome all the afflictions of the World, to the intent he might succor us, Heb. 4. 15.
5. Fifthly, God together with the temptation, will strengthen by the spirit, and make a way to escape, 1 Cor. 10. 13.

6. Sixthly, the time of affliction is but short, 2 Cor. 4. 17. 1 Pet. 5. 10.

7. Seventhly, the fruit of afflictions is saving. For every chastening yieldeth the peaceable fruit of righteousness, unto them that are exercised therewith, Heb. 12. 11.

The fourth Question is whether we are to comfort ourselves after one sort in all afflictions?

8. Ans. There be diverse kinds of afflictions, so there be several ways of consolation. For some afflictions are brought upon us by men for righteousness sake, for the cause of Christ and his Gospel and Kingdom, Mat. 5. 10. & 11. Mark 10. 29. Luke 18. 29. These afflictions are commonly styled by the name of persecution, or the Cross, because of the resemblance which they have to, and participation with the Cross of Christ, Phil. 3. 10. In these kinds of afflictions, consolation is easy and at hand, for we ought even to account the afflictions of this nature, and for such a cause to be themselves an argument of great comfort, Mat. 5. 12. Acts 5. 14. James 1. 2. 1 Pet. 4. 14. 16. The reason is because in those persecutions which we suffer for righteousness sake there is the nature of a testimony, m...tyrdome, and example whereby we glorify God before men. And so out of the eater comes forth meat according to Samson's riddle, Iud. 14.

9. Some afflictions are laid upon us by God to prove us, and to try us, Exo. 15. 25. & 16. 5. Deut. 8. 2. 1.... These are properly called trials and temptations. In these kinds of afflictions our consolation is not to be fetched from the temptation it self, but from our manner of bearing is, when we through the grace of God in such a condition, do sanctify and glorify his Name, Job. 1. 24. Our principal care therefore ought to be to frame and compose ourselves to a right bearing of these afflictions, and the comfort will follow of its own accord.

10. Some afflictions are laid upon us, as punishments and corrections, Job. 36. 9, 10. H.... 12 6. For these although there be some comfort contained in God's Fatherly manner of chastening, Heb. 1.... 7, 8. Yet this comfort cannot $\langle \diamond \rangle$ solidly apprehended, but only in making right use of the afflictions themselves, Ibid. 6. 11. Here therefore our first care must be to make right use of these visitations before we seek after comfort.

11. These kind of afflictions are not so different but that they may meet together, in one, and the same trouble. For in persecution the faithful are always tried, sometimes corrected, but yet there may be trials and corrections often times without persecution, and when they do meet together some of these kinds may more appear in some then others.

The first Question is what a man in afflictions ought to do to the end that he may obtain true and solid comfort?

12. Ans. First, he ought to acknowledge the hand of God afflicting him, Esa. 26. 11. Job. 5. 6. 8. Amos 3. 6. For this consideration is the foundation of patience, 1 Sam. 3. 18. Ps. 39. 10. And of all those saving truths, which are received by afflictions, Esa. 9. 13.

13. Secondly, he ought to search his ways and acknowledge his sins, Lam. 3. 39, 40. Job. 36 9, 10. For although all afflictions are not always sent directly and principally for sin, yet sin is the fountain, and foundation of all afflictions, Rom. 5. 1.... It is therefore a course most equal, most safe, and most pleasing to God, that in our afflictions, we behold our sins, which either have directly procured them, or at least deserved them.

14. Thirdly, he ought to submit himself in the presence of God, and under his mighty hand, James 4. 10. 1 Pet. 5. 6. 2 Sam. 15. 20. Levite. 26. 41. Otherwise the chastening of God is contemned, and men show their security and vain confidence, Pro. 3. 11. Heb. 12. 5.

15. Fourthly, he ought by humble repentance to seek the face, and favor and mercy of God. Psa. 57. 2. Lam. 3. 41. Amos 4. 12. Hos. 5. 15. & 6. 1 & 14. 2. There are three seasons wherein we ought to seek God by repentance, 1. presently after sin committed, 1 Cor. 5. 1. 2. 2. after some fear of punishment, or some threatening of God, Eph. 2. 1. 2. 3 After that the wrath of God hath in some sort broke in upon us Dan. 9. 13. Those Christians are the best which lay hold upon the first opportunity, for they declare that they do hate sin simply for it self, those that make use of the second season come next to them. For such believe although they see not, but those that repent not in the third season are altogether desperate.

16. Fifthly, he ought to see that he profit by his affliction in all the parts of new obedience. 2 Chron. 28. 22. Esa. 26. 9. Job. 36. 10. Hebrews 12. 10. Isaiah 27. 11. Leviticus 26. 18. 21.—28.

17. Sixthly, he ought patiently to expect what end the Lord will make, 1 Cor. 10. 13. I am. 5. 7. 8. 11. 2 Sam. 15. 25. Mica. 7. 9. He that seeks freedom by unlawful means doth offend God more, 2 Kings 1. 3. Neither yet is he free but by an exchange of a less evil for a greater, Esa. 24. 18. Amos 5. 19.

CHAP. 17. Of Death.

Concerning Death the first Question is whether it be a thing to be contemned?

1. Ans. Death is not simply to be contemned, 1. because it is in its own nature a grievous judgment of God against the sins of men, and so doth represent, both our desert and God's wrath, 2. because it is in its own nature, a passage to an eternal separation from God, so that it is a point either of desperate security, or affected wisdom, and valor, to contemn death after that manner that some of the heathen have done, who have been praised for so doing. But yet comparison being made betwixt death and those things which after death are prepared for the faithful, death may, and ought in some sort to be contemned by all believers, Heb. 12. 2.

The second Question is whether a believer ought to desire and pray for death?

Answ. Death is not simply and absolutely to be desired, 1. Because it is in it self a evil, 2. Because God as a General hath placed us in our station of this life, and without his Commandment we ought not to forsake, nor simply to desire to be dismissed before the time that he hath appointed, 2 Cor. 5. 4. 9. But yet the faithful may and ought so to expect the life which is to come after death that they do account it much more pleasing to them then this present life, 2 Cor. 5. 8. And to tend thither, with the des•...e that is moderate, ⟨◇⟩ subject to the will of God, as being a condition much better, Phil. 1. 13. Ro. 8. 23. 2 Tim. 4 8.

The third Question is, by what arguments the mind of a believer may be strengthened against the fear of death?

2. Ans. First, if he seriously consider, and by faith apprehend that Christ hath by his Death destroyed the power of Death, H...b. 2. 14. and taken away its sting, 1 Cor. 15. 56. So that death hath been swallowed in victory by Christ, and that victory is imparted to believers, Ibidem & 54. 57.

3. Secondly, if he consider also that this was one end of Christ's death, to free us from the fear of death, as being a great bondage, Heb. 2. 15.

4. Thirdly, if he consider also with faith, that the love of Christ and of God in Christ is so firm and constant that no death can separate us from it, Ro. 8. 35.

5. Fourthly, if he consider with himself that for Christ the death of the faithful is precious in God's eyes, Psal. 72. 14. And be also fully persuaded that the good hand, and fatherly providence of God, is present with, and watcheth over the faithful for good both in life and death, Mat. 10. 28, 29, 30, 31.

6. Fifthly if he well consider from how many, and from how great evils he shall be freed by death, as, 1. From sin, 2. From those miseries that follow sin, Isaiah 57. 1. 2. 5. Which cause others often times to seek for death, Apoc. 9. 6. 3 From the temptations of the Devil Apoc. 12. 8. 4 From the opposition and vexation of the World and the flesh, Apoc. 14 13. Eccles. 4. 1. 2. Hence it is that death is ca... 'd a rest and a sleep, Esa. 57. 2. 6. 1 Thess. 4. 13▪ 14. Thus much the Devil himself in the shape of Samuel did acknowledge 1. Sam. 28. 15.

7. Sixthly, if he cast his eyes always upon that happiness to which we shall come by death, For after death. 1. The grace of God shall be perfected in us, 1 Cor. 13. 10. 2 We shall be with God, 2 Cor. 5. 8. With Christ and the blessed spirits, Phil. 1. 23. 3. We shall enjoy a firm and immutable estate of heavenly life, 2 Corinth. 5. 1. Heb. 11. 10. 16. Luke 16. 9.

8. Seventhly, if he seriously set his mind to consider the vanity of all those things which depend upon this present life, and which we forsake at our death, Eccl. 2. 18▪

9. Eighthly, if he persuade himself that God's providence without him is sufficient to provide for all those things concerning which he can be careful, and do know withal that without it, no good can be done, though he should continue in life.

The fourth Question is what a believer ought to do that he may enjoy this consolation?

10. Ans. First, he ought to labor that he may have a special faith in God through Christ, and that this faith be lively, and strong, Luke 2. 28. 2 Tim. 1. 12. 1 John 5. 4.

11. Secondly, he ought with all care to preserve his Conscience pure and without offense, Acts 24. 15, 16. Heb. 10. 22.

12. Thirdly, he ought with this faith and Conscience to live in a continual expectation of the coming of the Lord, so carrying himself here as becomes a Citizen of heaven, Phil. 3. 20. 2 Pet. 3. 12.

13. Fourthly, he ought always to think the hour of his death to be near and at hand, Psalm 19. 20. Esa•.... 28. 15. 2 Tim. 4 6.

14. Fifthly, he ought always to exercise himself to a denial and forsaking of the world, 1 Cor. 7▪ 29, 30, 31. Gal. 6•...4.

15. Sixthly, he ought to make death familiar in a sort to himself both by a frequent meditation of it, and by those exercises to which God calls him, 1 Cor. 15. 31. 2 Cor. 1. 9. & 4. 10, 11.

16. Seventhly, he ought to labor that as the outward man draws to corruption, so the inward man may be renewed more and more, 2 Cor. 4. 16.

17. Eighthly, he ought not to think so much upon death it self, as upon God's grace both in death, and in those things which follow after, 2 Tim. 4. 8.

18. Ninthly, he ought in all humility to commend his soul unto God as unto a faithful Creator, 1 Pet. 4. 16.

CHAP. 18. Of Temptations.

Concerning temptations the first Question is by what arguments a believer may strengthen himself against their assaults?

1. Ans. First, if he consider seriously that these temptations are part of that warfare to which the faithful are called, Eph. 6. 12. and unto which they have given up their names in baptiime, and have bound themselves by oath.

2. Secondly, if he consider that Christ is our Captain and General in this war, Apoc. 12. 7. That he is everywhere present and beholds the combat with his eye. This must needs be a strong incitement to provoke us to do valiantly. For he doth exhort us to fight, helps us to overcome, aids us when we faint, and crowns those that conquer.

3. Thirdly, if he consider that the direction of the temptations themselves doth depend wholly upon the providence and disposing of God, Mat. 6. 13. 2 Thess. 2. 11. 2 Chron. 18. 21. R•.... 4. 1.

4. Fourthly, if he meditate upon the fruit and the use of temptations, Lu. 21. 31. 2 Cor. 12. 8, 9.

5. Fifthly, if he propound unto himself Christ who was tempted, overcame temptations, and succors them that are tempted, Heb. 2. 18 & 4. 15. Col. 2. 15.

6. Sixthly, if he distinguish betwixt the evil of temptation, and temptations themselves.

The second Question is, what a believer ought to do that he may apprehend this comfort in the hour of temptation?

7. First, he ought to account all those temptations which entice him unto sin as his utter enemies, 1 Pet. 2. 11.
8. Secondly, he ought to abhor and detest those very suggestions themselves which lead unto sin, Rom. 7. 15.
9. Thirdly, he ought to arm himself diligently against his spiritual enemies, Eph. 6. 13.
10. Fourthly, he ought to resist them with all his might, James 4. 7. 1 Pet. 5. 9.
11. Fifthly, he ought in this combat not to trust unto his own strength, but to implore the help of God, and to rest upon him, Mat. 6. 13.
12. Sixthly, he ought in foul temptations to abstain from all disputation, and special deliberation about the thing suggested, resting himself satisfied in that he doth detest them, Mat 4 10. For such temptations are vile and do easily cleave to us.
13. Seventhly, he ought to avoid all those occasions which may further the temptation, Pre. 4 14, 15.
14. Eighthly, he ought to repel and extinguish with all possible strength troublesome suggestions, Eph. 6 16. Yea, and sometimes to contemne them also, when after all means used they cease not to be troublesome.
15. Ninthly, he ought (if they repene again and again with new assaults after that they have been oft repelled) to remember that it is the part of a valiant Soldier not only to suffer, and come clear off from assaults and skirmishes of his enemy, but also to endure the tediousness of a long sledge when there is occasion.

The third Question is, how a man may discern whether a temptation have prevailed against him yea or no?

16. Answer. First, this is not to be judged from hence that a man is either troubled in his mind, or doth retain his calmness. For a vexation of mind for the most part, which follows upon foul temptations, is not only no sign of their prevailing, but is also a demonstration of a sanctified heart, and a quiet security doth often times show that the temptation hath prevailed. The reason is because the opposition which is apparent in this perturbation is a sign that there is something in the soul contrary to the temptation, and a quietness doth betray some consent. For water is not troubled by the pouring in of water but by the casting in of fire. He which finds least trouble is in most danger, Luke 11: 21. So Ananias and Sapphira were quiet, Act. 5. 3. 8. But Paul found a great deal of inward trouble, Ro. 7. 24. 2 Cor. 12. 7, 8. But if this trouble be such that it drives away a man from God, and doth not rather stir up to seek him, it is not to be allowed or cherished, for then the temptation is, (although not directly and of its own nature) yet indirectly and through the perverseness of our nature; effectual, and the tempter hath obtained his desire.

18. Secondly, a manifest sign of a prevailing temptation is the commission of that sin to which the temptation did provoke, Mat. 6. 13. But here it is to be observed that this falls out not only when the sin is fully acted and committed, but also when there is even the very first degree of it, in the consent of the will, or in the least delight in the evil thought of, although there be no purpose to commi•... i•... I am. 1. 14, 15. And this is so much the worse if the delight be as they say Morosa, that is, if it continue for any while, and be not presently repeld.

19. Thirdly, although we give no consent unto the temptation, yet if the temptation arise from ourselves, there is a sin of ours in it, even in its first conception, because it flows out of our flesh and from our corruption, although it may be kindled and blown up to a flame by the Devil, Mat. 15. 18▪ 19. Gen. 6. 5. & 8. 21. James 1. 14. But this degree of sin is such that though it requires perpetual •...umiliation, yet it ought not to deprive us of comfort, because it is the common condition of all the faithful, who this notwithstanding are in Christ beloved, and accepted of God. But if the temptation proceed merely from the Devil we ought to detest it, as much as possible we can, but are not to acknowledge it for our own sin, Mat. 4▪ 36. 9.

20▪ Now a temptation is then to be judged to proceed from the devil alone and not from ourselves, 1. when it is repugnant to the light of nature, or to reason it self, and to our natural inclination, 2. when is ariseth not as other ordinary thoughts, but ceaseth upon, and invades the mind suddenly, and with a kind of vehemency, after the manner of flashes of lightning.

21. Fourthly, so long as by fervent prayers and such like spiritual weapons we do resist and wrestle with any temptation. we may be sure that it hath not yet prevailed over us, and that it hath not ⟨◇⟩ yet gotten us within its power, 2 Cor. 12. 7, 8, 9. James 4. 7.

The fourth Question is how the Conscience of a believer may be supported in a temptation of God, that is, in some spiritual desertion upon which there follows much anxiety?

22. Ans. First, we must remember that even the best of God's servants have had experience of these desertions, as Job. 6. 4. 9. 13. 26. & 16. 9. David Psalm. 6. & 77. And even Christ himself the beloved Son of God, Mat. 27. 46.

23. Secondly, we must know that these desertions are not so much real and in very deed, as in our sense, and apprehension, Heb. 13. 5.

24. Thirdly, we must know that God doth not forget his people, no not then when he seems to have forsaken them, Esa. 49. 15, 16. But doth for his own glory and their good only seem to do so.

25. Fourthly, we may be sure by God's Word and Covenant that this desertion shall be but short, especially if i•... be compared with the time and continuance of his mercies, Esa. 54. 7, 8. & 57. 20.

26. Fifthly, we must make inquiry in our Consciences with all diligent examination whether our own sins have not been the cause of God's so dealing, Esa. 57. 21. Which if we shall find to be so, we must confess them humbly, entreat for mercy, and seriously forsake them, Psal. 51.

27. Sixthly, we ought to live by Faith, Heb. 2. 4. waiting for the Lord which hideth his face from us, Esa. 8. 17.

28. Seventhly, we ought to stir up ourselves to lay hold upon God, Esa. 64. 7.

29. Eighthly, we ought always to remember that although God do seem to be absent from us a long while, yet he doth only wait for a fit time to show mercy, Es. 30. 18.

CHAP. 19. Of the Conscience of sin.

Concerning sins the first Question is, how a Christian may be comforted when his Conscience doth reprove him for, and accuse him of diverse sins?

1. Ans. Sins are of two sorts. For some be properly called infirmities, or faults, which do commonly cleave to the best and most vigilant of the faithful, 1 Cor. 6. 7. Others are more heinous wickedness which neither are to be found in all the faithful nor in any of them at all unless very seldom; and by reason of some violent temptation, Romans 6. 13. Gal. 6. 1.

2. An infirmity is when a purpose to do well is present, but power of performing it is absent, Rom. 7. 18. A wickedness is when the purpose it self at least in some particular fact is impious, 2 Sam. 12. 10. Now in case of infirmities these following arguments may serve for consolation.

3. First, even the best and most perfect of God's Children while they live here are subject unto these failings, James 3. 2. 1 John 1. 8.

4. Secondly, God doth pity his servants in their infirmities as a loving Father pities his little children, Ps. 103. 13. Mat. 3. 27.

5. Thirdly, Christ himself is touched with the sense of our infirmities, Heb. 4. 15.

6. Fourthly, Christ himself is such a propitiation for such kind of sins, that he offers us consolation for them before they be committed, 1 John 2. 1, 2. Ro. 6. 14.

7. Fifthly, by Christ we have access with boldness to the Throne of grace, that we may obtain mercy, Heb. 6. 14.

8. Sixthly, God at our prayer will cure our infirmity, Esa. 40. 29. Ps. 103. 3.

9. Seventhly, the spirit helpeth our infirmities, Rom. 8. 26.

10. Eighthly, these infirmities shall not be imputed to us for sins, Rom. 7. 17. 10.

11. In more heinous sins, there can be no solid comfort had, till they be taken away, 1 Cor. 5. 2. 6. The reason is because such kind of sins make even believers themselves subject to the threatenings of the Law, and do in a great degree, exclude them from the promises of the Gospel, wast the Conscience, Heb. 10. 22. And expose them to the wrath of God, as being partakers with the wicked and unbelievers. Eph. 5. 6, 7. Gal. 6. 17. And therefore have in them a cause of terror not of consolation. Heb. 10. 31. Yet a believer may in some sort sufreine himself even in the greatest sins with the possibility and hope of mercy, Romans 11. 23. Luke 22. 23.

The second Question, what a believer is to do that he may have consolation, in case his Conscience accuse him for his sins?

12. First, he ought to be affected with sin, and to groan under it as a burden, Mat. 11. 28, 29.

13. Secondly, he ought continually to detest all sin, Ro. 7. 15.

14. Thirdly, he ought evermore to have a care that he fulfill not the lusts of sin, Gal. 5. 16.

15. Fourthly, he ought to endeavor the mortification of them. Ro. 8. 13.

26. Fifthly, he ought looking upon the promises to fly unto Christ and to cleave unto him more and more, Rom. 7. 25. Phil. 3 9.

27. But gross sins must first be removed and taken away before a man can be fit to receive solid consolation, Esa. 1. 16. 27, 18.

Certain collections out of the Book of William Paris concerning temptations, and the resisting of them, which I thought good here to set down for the further illustration of the Doctrine of temptations, because they are not read in the Author, except by a very few.

First, Temptation in one sense is nothing else but a trial, and to tempt is nothing else but to make a trial or experiment of anything, that we may know it, that is, that it may be discovered, and become manifest, and this is all that the Devil can do, he cannot with strength conquer us, or cast us down. For unless we of our own accord trust him, and deliver ourselves into his hand, he can have no power over us. He can prevail no farther against us, then we give him leave or permit him. All that he can do therefore is to tempt us, that is to make an experiment what we are, whether weak or strong, whether we be such as will yield to him, or whether such as will resist him valiantly. And if in the beginning of the temptation, he find that we make valiant resistance, he despairing of the victory, and being overcome and confounded, for the most part departeth presently. And this is the property of a tempter when he hath made his argument, and found what he sought for, to surcease the work of temptation.

II. In another sense temptation signifies, a fighting against one, or a war, or a battle, and it is very likely that whatsoever the Devil attempts against us is by way of such a fight, if we consider the matter but diligently. For he doth all that he doth with a purpose and desire to conquer, whether he lay snares for us, or whether he make trial of us, or whether he pretend some good things to deceive us, or whether he smite us with the staff, or sword, whether he undermine the wall of our defense, or whether he take from us our spiritual food, or procure it to be taken away, for he doth do all these things with a desire to do us a mischief. And in very deed, all these are parts of that war, or combat, wherewith he fights against us.

III. Every sin hath its temptations, and against the mind of man doth the devil fight, besieging it, in a circumventing way, and ordering his armies, and forces, against the armies of virtues, and against the Castle of man's soul.

IV. The fightings which arise from the faculty of reason within ourselves are these, 1. Curiosity, that is a lust to know things not necessary, and things the knowledge of which tend nothing to, nor help forward at all salvation, 2. Slownesse to believe, 3. Levity in believing everything 4. Doubtfulnesse, 5. Suspiciousnesse, 6. A spirit of blasphemy which is a spring and fountain of abominable thoughts, and of thoughts so horrible and troublesome, that such a kind of temptation is like a martirdome, and there have been some that have rather desired to suffer Martyrdom then to endure such thoughts.

V. Any one may resist any temptation of the Devil, if he do simply and purely will it, without any mixture of unwillingness. For no man is overcome, or yields to the temptation utterly against his will, for so his will remains unconquered, and victorious and uninclined to consent unto the temptation, and so a man should both yield, and not yield. But that a man •...ay, simply, and purely be willing to make resistance it is not from man himself, or from any natural power in him but from the gift of God, and the help and assistance of his grace.

VI. Now we must observe that when the question is, whether a man may have a will to resist temptation? this word may doth admit two significations; For it signifies sometimes a possibility which is passive, in respect of capacity, and sometimes in regard of virtue or power, or efficiency, now it is manifest, that no man can resist any temptation by way of efficiency, but by way of possibility, or passibility.

VII. Besides the gifts of graces and of virtues the providence and protection of God is necessary for believers, that they may resist temptations, and so are those manifold helps wherewith God succors his elect in the combat.

VIII. The first of these helps is a driving away of the enemies whereby they are sometimes not suffered to tempt the Elect, Job. 1.

IX. The second help is a bridling of the enemies that they cannot tempt so much as they would, Job. 2.

X. The third help is from the tempter himself, when even that very shape under which he tempts affords us some help and instruction, so the form of the Serpent might have caused Eve to have suspected his temptation.

XI. The fourth help is from the temptation it self, when it either stirs up fear in us, which is the best keeper▪ or stirs us up to fight, and encourageth us against the enemy.

XII. The fifth is, a new grace, or an increase of the former. For to those that employ their talents well God gives an increase either in the greatness, or number, Mat. 25. Luke. 19.

XIII. The sixth is a cessation, or peace, or rather a truce from the temptation.

XIV. The seventh is a refreshment in the heat of temptation, which is a mitigation of it, as when the tribulation is turned into a sollace.

XV. The eighth is a comforting, that is a stengthning, and lifting up of the heart by a promise of strength and victory, and by a demonstration of the weakness of the enemies, and the lightness of the fight.

XVI. The ninth is consolation, that is a cheering of the heart, in troubles, in sorrow and grief.

XVII. The tenth is a bestowing of Faith and Hope, and a confirmation of the same, against the shaking of fear, which ariseth from our own defect and infirmity.

XVIII. The eleventh is an upholding of them that are set upon that they fail not, that is, that they receive no hurt. Now they are oft times so assaulted that they are ready to fall, and that for this end that they may acknowledge their own infirmities, and may ascribe it to God's mercy and not their own power, that they are kept from falling.

XIX. The twelfth is, God's receiving of them that fly unto him, in respect of which he is called, the hiding place of the Elect.

XX. The thirteenth is God's fighting against and overthrowing the enemies.

XXI. The fourteenth is outward tribulation of which there are many profits helping this way.

where the ⟨ in non-Latin alphabet ⟩ children as I may say insuasibili..., that are not to be ⟨ϕ⟩ . ⟨ϕ⟩ they are opposed to those which 1 Pet. 14. are called ⟨ in non-Latin alphabet ⟩ obedient children. Opposite to this disposition is a hard, and stony heart.

3. Thirdly, if we do prepare ourselves to follow the will of God in all things, Deut. 5. 33. Even in those which seem to be opposite to, and to cross our profits, so that the flesh apprehends them to be evil, Ier. 42. 2. Heb. 11. 8. Phil. 2. 8.

4. Fourthly, if we do apply ourselves to the obedience of God's will, even then when we see no reason for it, John 13. 7, 8. 1 Sam. 5. 9. 15. Otherwise we follow not simply God's will, but the reason of it.

5. Fifthly, if we be ready in regard of the disposition and bent of the heart, to obey God's will not only in those things wherein we know his pleasure, but even in those wherein for the present we are ignorant of his will, Ex. 10. 27.

6. Sixthly, if we desire most of all, to know that part of God's will that concerns ourselves, and our own duty, Psa. 119. 33, 34. Acts 9. 7. Job. 21. 13, 14.

7. Seventhly, if the fear of God be continually before our eyes, so that we take heed of diligently, and shun carefully the offending of him, Heb. 12. 28. 29. 1 Pet. 1. 17.

8. Eighthly, if we depend not upon that success, and event of our obedience which we find in this world, but resolve to hold on, though our obedience procure us never so many afflictions, 1 Pet. 2. 19, 20, 21. & Dan. 3. 17.

9. Ninthly, if we exercise ourselves in the use of those mercies whereby our hearts may be framed to obedience, 1. Cor. 29.

The second Question is, by what motives a man may be stirred up, to yield obedience unto God?

10. Ans. First, If he apply his mind to consider of God's Authority, Matthew 1. 6. Jeremiah 35. Romans. 6, 18. 20. 1 Co.... 6. 19.

11. Secondly, if he consider also God's power, Ier. 18. 6.

12. Thirdly, if he consider that the obedience that God requires of us, tends not at all to his advantage but to ours, Job. <math>\langle \diamond \rangle \bullet \dots & 35. 6 7.

13. Fourthly, if he consider, the benefits of God bestowed upon him, what and how great they be, Rom. 12. 1. Ex. 20. 2. And upon this point our soul should settle as upon a consideration most effectual; for it is manifest, that the obligation of debt, towards a benefactor is augmented and increased, according to the greatness of the benefit. For there is no Question, but that every benefit doth bind him that receives it to the benefactor, and the greater the benefit is the greater the bond.

Well therefore doth William Par. urge this consideration after this manner: if any man should give to another a 1000 marks; questionless he which receives such a kindness should be much bound to the giver, and if he should give him 2000 marks, the bond would be doubly greater, and so on infinitely. If therefore he should give him anything which were infinitely better, or more precious, the receiver would be infinitely more bound. Now a man's eye, or his tongue alone, (much more his whole body) is incomparably better, then a 1000 marks, therefore every one is infinitely more bound to God, for his tongue, or eye alone, then he should be for the gift of a 1000 marks. Again let us suppose that God should give to one man, a 1000 marks only, and to another a 1000000 it is manifest that the obligation and debt of thankfulness, and service, from him that received the greatest benefit infinitely, is infinitely greater then the bond, and obligation of him that received the less; seeing therefore the obligation whereby a man is tied to God for his tongue, or eye alone is infinitely greater then the other, it is manifest that this obligation is infinite. Now then that obligation, wherein a man is tied to God, for his whole body is after a sort more infinite, and that for his soul is yet greater, and that again for eternal & everlasting life, must needs be much greater, and so in the rest, it is manifest therefore that our obligation and debt to God, of thankfulness and service is in many respects infinite.

13. Fifthly, if he consider that the end of God's greatest mercy is obedience, Luke 1. 74 1 Pet. 1. 18.

15. Sixthly, if he do attend how he is called upon by God continually to obedience, Titu...•.... 12. 1 Thessa. 4. 7. 1 Pet. 1 15.

16. Seventhly, if he remember how we are bound by a most firm covenant to serve God, Job. 31. 1. Heb. 8, 10.

17. Eighthly, if he consider the misery of those, that obey not God, for he is the servant of sin, to death, Rom. 6. 16. 21.

18. Ninthly, if he meditate of the promises that are made to obedience, 1 Tim. 4. 8. 2 Cor. 7. 1. Heb. 5. 9.

19. Tenthly, if he always set before his eyes the threatenings against, and the vengeance which is prepared for the disobedient, 2 Thess. 1. 8.

The third Question is by what means a man may be made fit, to yield obedience unto God?

20. Ans. 1. He ought to have a special care that his Faith be solid and lively. For all the obedience which is acceptable unto God, is obedience of Faith, Rom. 1. 5. & 16. 26.

21. Now faith brings forth obedience four ways, 1. because while it cleaves unto the Word of God, as the Word of eternal truth, it makes all those motives to obedience, which are found in the Scriptures to be forcible, and effectual, 2. Because it doth obtain all grace from God, 3. Because it doth join us to Christ, as to our head, without whom we can do nothing, and in whom we can do all things, John 15. Phil. 4. 13. 4 Because it doth as it were drive such a spirit of life out of Christ.

22. Secondly, he ought to yield himself up to the spirit 1 Pet. 1. 22. that he may be in the spirit, Rom. 8 9. And that the spirit may dwell in him, Ver. 2. that he may be moved by the spirit, Ver. 14. walk in the spirit, Gal. 5. 16. be led by the spirit, Ver. 18. Live and go in the spirit, Ver. 25.

23 Thirdly, he ought to apply his mind to receive the word of God in the power of it 1. Thess. 1. 5. 2 Cor. 10. 4. 5. Rom. 6. 17.

24. Fourthly, he ought to use all his endeavor to present himself obedient unto God, according to his Word Rem. 6. 13. 19.

CHAP. 2. Of Knowledge.

BEcause to the performing of Christian obedience there is necessarily required some knowledge. Concerning knowledge therefore.

The first Question is, what a kind of study of knowledge ought to be in us?

1. Ans. First, we ought in this study to take heed of all affected ignorance, 2 Pet. 3. 5. Pro. 2▪ 22. 29. 7.

2. Secondly we ought all to avoid all curiosity, Deut. 29 29. Pre. 20. 1. 1 Tim. 6 20. 2 Tim. 2. 23. Titus 3. 9. John 21. 22 Acts 1. 6 7.

3. I here is a fivefold curiosity of knowledge, 1. when we would know those things that God hath not revealed, 2. when we seek to know those things which belong not to ourselves, but to others 3. when we spend most study about things least necessary, 4. When we desire to know the hardest things, and neglect the principles, and fundamentals, 5. When we rest not simply in the Will of God, but would see a reason of it.

4. Thirdly, we ought to study for the knowledge of those things especially which are most necessary for us in our life, Pro. 9. 12. 1 Tim. 6. 8.

5. Fourthly, we ought to labor for a growth in knowledge, not contenting ourselves to be children in understanding 1 Cor. 14. 20. Heb. 5. 12. Cor. 3 16.

6. Fifthly, we ought to take heed of all pride, which is wont to spring from knowledge, 1 Cor. 8. 1.

The second Question is what a man ought to do that he may obtain solid knowledge?

7. Ans. First the mind is wholly to be devoted unto piety, Pro. 1. 7. 9 10. Psal. 25. 14 John 7. 17. For as knowledge is easy to the godly, Pro. 8, 9. & 14. 6. so to the wicked it is impossible, Pro. 24. 7.

8. Secondly, we must deny our carnal wisdom, 1 Cor. 3. 18. Pro. 26. 12.

9. Thirdly, the lusts of the flesh are to be avoided, because they blind the mind, Eph 4. 18. By abusing, disturbing, allureing and pressing it down.

10. Fourthly, Heavenly wisdom is to be highly prized and to be sought with proportionable care, Pro. 2. 4. & 3. 14. & 47.

11. Fifthly, it is to be desired of God by earnest prayer, Ia. 1. 5.

12 Sixthly, humility and modesty and sobriety must be observed, Pro. 11. 3. Rom. 12. 3.

13 Seventhly, we must confer and consult with those that God hath endowed with a larger measure of this knowledge, Pro. 15. 12.

14 Eighthly, we ought to glory in a holy manner in the possession of Heavenly knowledge, Ier. 9. 24.

15. Ninthly, this wisdom is to be sought, in a daily and religious heeding and hearing of the Word of God, 2 Tim. 3 16.

16. Tenthly, that knowledge which we have obtained must be turned into use and practice, Muthew. 25. 29. Ioha 13. 17.

The third Question is by what arguments a man may be stirred up to seek this Divine knowledge?

A...s. 1. Because knowledge pertains to the natural perfection of a man, as appears by the temptation of our first parents, Gen. 3. 5. 2. It is that which makes a difference betwixt man and the brute beasts, Psal. 32. 9. 3 They which are destitute of this knowledge are in some sort more stupid then the brute beasts, Isaiah. 1. 3. 4 Knowledge brings along with it a certain singular, and honest delight, Pro. 14. 13. 14. 5 $\langle \diamond \rangle$ knowledge the heart of man cannot be good, $\langle \diamond \rangle$. 1... 2. 6 Knowledge is the key of the Kingdom of Heaven $\langle \diamond \rangle$ 1... $\langle \diamond \rangle$. Knowledge is the spiritual food of the $\langle \diamond \rangle$. $\langle \diamond \rangle$. 3. 10. 8 his knowledge is necessary to make us $\langle \diamond \diamond \rangle$ of God, Heb. 8. 11. 9 The faithful $\langle \diamond \diamond \diamond \rangle$ of ligh... not of darkness, Ephes. 5. 8. $\langle \diamond \diamond \diamond \rangle$, and averiness... to it is foo... $\langle \diamond \rangle$. •... •... $\langle \diamond \rangle$. 11 $\langle \diamond \rangle$ is the cause of all wicked...sse, 1 Cor. 2. 8. 12 It doth so corrupt good affections that it makes them become evil, Rom. 10. 2. 13 It is a cause, and note of perdition, Hos. 4. 6. 2 Cor. 4. 3.

CHAP. 3. Of the Fear of God.

The fear of God, hath very near affinity with the knowledge of God, Psal. 119. 79. Concerning this fear therefore:

The first Question is whether all kind of fear of God be good?

Ans. There is both a good and evil fear of God, Ex. 20. 20. And hence it is that fear is sometimes generally commended, Pro. 28. 14. Sometimes again it is generally found fault with, Apoc. 21. 8.

The second Question is what is that fear of God that is to be found fault with?

2 Ans. 1. That fear which scars men away from God, or which drives them to fly away from him, Ex. 20. 18. Gen. 3. 8. Apoc. 6. 16. 2 The fear of them also which are only afraid of God's anger. Ia. 2. 19. Ro. 8. 15.

The third Question is what is that fear of God which is commendable?

Ans. 1. When we reverence the Majesty and Power of God, so that the principal cause of our fear is not any evil which we are in danger of, but the excellent perfection of God, Gen. 28. 17. & 31. 42. 53. Eccles 5. 2. 2 When we are most afraid of offending God, Eccles 9. 4. Pro. 13. 13. 3 When we are affected with trembling upon the sight of God's wrath, Psal. 90. 10.

The fourth Question is whether the fear of punishment be not a servile fear?

4 Ans. If it be only in respect of punishment it is merely servile, and vi...ious, 2. I... in punishment we have a chief respect unto our own misery. so far it is servile 3. But if punishment be respected only secondarily, and be feared especially for this cause that it separate's from God, and tend's to this end to make us more wary in waiting before God, such a fear is laudable. 4. If the Minister of God, and the revenger be to be feared for wrath, Ro. 13. 4. much more is God himself, Heb. 12. 29. Amos. 3 & 8.

The fifth Question is what be the signs of the true fear of God?

5. Ans. 1. If we seriously and carefully avoid those things that are displeasing in God's sight, Pro. 37. & 14. 16. & 16. 6. 2. If out of Conscience to God, we abstain •...rom those sins that are most secret, and those which in respect of men, we might with safety enough commit, Lev. 19. 14. Gen. 42. 18. Job. 31. 21. 22, 23. 3 If we not only abstain •...rom sins but even hate them and that for this cause especially because God doth detest them, Pro. 8. 13. 4 If we be most careful to take heed that we depart not away from God. Ier. 52. 40. 5 If we not only abstain from evil but study to do that which is good Ecclesiastes 12. 13. Deut. 5. 20. 6 If we labor after perfection in every part of Sanctification, 2 Cor. 7 1. Phil. 2. 12. 7 If we neither fear men nor any creature so that they can scar us from doing our duty, Mat 10 28. •...la 8. 12. 13. 1 Pet. 3. 14, 15. 8 If we employ ourselves in the Word of God, and other holy things with fear, 1 Cor. 7. 25. 9 If we use the very name and attributes of God with reverence, Deut. 28. 58.

The sixth Question, by what motives a man may be stirred up to fear God?

6. A•...s. 1. By a consideration of God's Omnipotency, Ier. 5. 22. Job 37. 23. 24. Psal. 76. 4^a 7. 2 By a consideration of the Kingdom of God Psal. 99. 1. Ier. 10. 7. Dan. 6. 26. 3 His powerful government of all things, Es•... 25. 1, 23. 4. 4 His particular judgments against sin. Psal. 119. 118^a 119^a 120. 17, ⟨ϕ⟩ •... 16. Ep•... 3. 5. •... 5. The punishments that lie ⟨ϕϕ⟩ ▪ ⟨ϕ⟩ 2. •... 8 ⟨ϕ⟩ er•... of God, P•...all. 13•... 4. 9 His ⟨ϕ⟩ ⟨ϕ⟩ . 5. 24. ⟨ϕ⟩ . 7•... 5. 10 The promises that are made to them that fear God, Psalm•... 25. 12, 13, 14, & 34. 9. & Proverbs 10. 27. & 13. 13. & 19. 23. & 22. 4. Eccles 8. 12.

CHAP. 4. Of humility towards God.

BEcause the nature of obedience stands in subjection, therefore in the next place we must treat of humility towards God in which there is a submission, In. 4. 6, 7. which is joined with the fear of God, Pro. 2•... 4.

The first Question is what are the signs of true humility towards God?

1. Ans. First, A serious acknowledgement of our own imperfection before him, Psal. 30. 2. 3. Esa. 40. 6. 1 Pet. 1. 24. For pride stands in an imagination and affectation of excellency;

2. Secondly, an acknowledgement of that same great guilt which lies on us by reason of our •...ins committed against, him Rom. 3. 19. For pride doth exclude the serious confession hereof, Luke 18. 11.

3. Thirdly, a submission with silence to the judgments of God, Psal. 39 5. 1 Rom. 3. 18. Job. 1. 21. & 39. 37. For a proud man answer•... again, Rom. 9. 20.

4. Fourthly, an amplification of the grace and mercy of God in all his benefits, 1 Chron. 29. 14 For a proud man doth in some sort think himself worthy of all good things, and that they are no more then his due, Deutri. 8. 14. 17. & 9. 4.

5. Fifthly, an holy admiration of those ways of God which are past finding out, Job. 42. 3. Rom. 11. 33, 34. Psal. 13. 1. For a proud man thinks himself able to comprehend all things, and that all things ought to be communicated to him.

6. Sixthly, a laying aside all our dignity and excellency above others, in the presence of God and duties of his worship, Apoc. 4. 10. For a proud man hath his thoughts upon his own excellency, and doth contemn others even in the presence of God. Luke 18. 11.

7. Seventhly, an apprehension of our own meanesse and baseness in the presence of God, and a trembling because of of his Majesty, Ge.... 18. 27.

8. Eighthly, an holy modesty in the worship of God, Eccles 5. 1, 2, 3.

9. Ninthly, a voluntary undertaking of those tasks which God puts upon us although they may •...eeme to be but men and ba•...e, P•...l. 2. 8. John 13. 14.

The second Question is by what arguments a man may be stirred up to the study of humility towards God?

10. Ans. First, if he se•... before his eyes the majesty and power of God, 1 Pet. 5. 6.

11. Secondly, if he consider of the nature of this humility to wit that it makes the soul of man fit, that it may become an house or temple of God, Isaiah. 66. 3. That it may be a sacrifice for God▪ Psal. 51. 19. that it may be a receptacle for the grace of God, pro. 3. 3. 5▪ that it may be capable of wisdom, pro. 11. 2. For this is the mother of all other virtues, and is also it self a singular ornament of the soul, 1 pet. 5. 5.

12. Thirdly, if he consider of the promises which are made to the humble. God will respect them, Isaiah 66. 2. He will give them his grace I am. 4. 6. 1 pet. 5. 5. He will exalt them, I am. 4. 10. 1 pet. 5▪ 6. Luke 18. 14. He will reward them with all kind of good things, pro. 22. 4.

13. Fourthly, if he consider that humility is necessary to the end that we may seek God and turn away his anger, (ϕ) . 2. 3. 2 Chron. 12. 7.

14. Fifthly, if he consider that humility is required in every duty that we perform to God, M•...ca. 6▪ 8.

CHAP. 5. Of Sincerity.

BEcause sincerity is a proper quality of obedience▪ concerning it therefore.

The first Question is, wherein consists the sincerity of obedience?

1 Ans. First, that it be not only external, but chiefly, and principally, internal, Psal. 51. 8. Mat. 23. 25.

2. Secondly, that it respect God especially, and not men. Col. 3. 23. Mat. 6. 1.

3. Thirdly, that there be a shunning of all mixture of corruption, and by-respects, 1 Cor. 5. 8.

4. Fourthly, that nothing be omitted, or neglected, which belongs unto perfection.

5. Fifthly, that it expect its fruit from, God, and not from man, Rom. 2. 29.

The second Question is, what are the signs of sincerity?

6. Ans. First, if a man love the light of the Word, and come to it that his deeds may be made manifest, John 3. 21.

7. Secondly, if he be obedient in the absence, as well as in the presence of lookers on, in secret as well, yea and more, then in public, phil. 2. 12. Mat. 6. 6. Not only when God makes his presence manifest by his judgments, but even when he seems to be absent, psal. 78. 34.

8. Thirdly, if he cleave fast unto God in adversity, as well, as in prosperity, Job. 1. 8, 9, 10, 11.

9. Fourthly, if he have a care of all God's Commandments, even of those which seem to be least, Mat. 5. 19.

10. Fifthly, if he abstain from all appearance of evil, Thess. 5. 22.

11. Sixthly, if he neither cover, nor excuse his sins, but confess them, and forsake them, Pro. 28. 13. 2. Cor. 7. 11.

The third Question is, by what Motives a man may be stirred up, to endeavor after sincerity?

12. •...s. First, because God is the searcher of the heart and reins, Pro. 16. 2. & 21. 2 Psal. 7. 10. & 26. 2. Apoc. 2. 23. Job. 31. 4.

13▪ Secondly, because it is the means to procure true peace, joy, and security, Pro. 10 9.

14. Thirdly, God is delighted in sincerity. psal. 51. 8. pro. 10. 20. And will bless those that be upright with all sorts of blessings, pro. 28. 10. 18.

15. Fourthly, a double heart is a base, monstrous, and abhominable thing.

CHAP. 6. Of Zeales

BEcause the highest degree of our obedience towards God, consisteth in zeal. Therefore concerning this zeal.

The first Question is wherein the nature of zeal doth consist.

1. Ans. It consists in that, that the affection of pleasing God, and promoveing his glory be, in the highest degree, Apo. 3. 15. 19. Now because such a kind of vehem•...ney doth principally show it self in the resisting of those things which oppose the will and glory of God; Therefore for the most part it is referred to that opposition, which is made against evil.

The second Question is, what be the sign•... of true zeal?

2. Ans. First, if it be according to Knowledge, Rom. 10. 2.

3. Secondly, if a man be ready to perform whatsoever duty may be enjoined, according to his strength, yea and above his strength, 2 Cor. 8. 3.

4. Thirdly, if he be diligent in the execution of his duty, Act. 18. 25.

5. Fourthly, if he put no other limits and bounds to his obedience, then those which God himself shall set, Exod. 36. 6.

6. Fifthly, if a man be mild in his own cause, and in those things which concern himself, and servant in those which concern God, Numb. 12. 3. with Exod. 32. 19. Galati. 4. 12. with Acts 13. 9. 12. For true zeal is therefore called the zeal of God, because it is principally carried toward God; Whereupon one saith, it is an affection to revenge the injuries of God, or to root out the enemies of God, or a jealousy persecuting the adulteries of Christ's Spouse, together with the occasions and signs of Adulteries; or a vehement love which doth by a close and strait guard seclude the Spouse of Christ from the World.

7. Sixthly, if that fervor and heat of it lie not principally in contentions about questions and controversies, but in the study of good works. Tit. 2. 14.

8. Seventhly, if a man be affected in greater matters more, and in smaler, less. Mat. 23. 23.

9. Eighthly, if he be no more indulgent unto himself then he is to others, Math. 7. 4. An example of the contrary whereof we have, Gen. 38. 24. 2 Sam. 12. 5.

10. Ninthly, if he cannot bear with such as are evil, Apoc. 2. 2. though they be such as in other respects are near unto him, 1 Reg. 15. 13.

11. Tenthly, if his indignation against sin be joined with grief and pity in respect of the sinners, 2 Cor. 12. 21. For so, as well that dull remissenes which is opposite to zeal, as that fury which looks like the heat of zeal, will be with equal care avoided.

12. Eleventhly, if it be constant and the same in every condition, Gal. 4. 15. 18.

The third Question is by what motives a man may be stirred up to a zeal of God?

13. Ans. First, because zeal is the property of the people of Christ, and one of the things which Christ intended to our redemption, Tit. 2. 4.

14. Secondly, because those things which belong to God, to our duty toward him, are (above all things) most worthy to be gone about, and done with zeal, Gal. 4. 18. Although we should be even as it were eaten up with it, psal. 69. 10. John. 2. 17.

15. Thirdly, because there can be no true religion without zeal, Ap. 3. 15. 16. 19.

16. Fourthly, because if zeal be wanting, sins and scandals are not taken away, but nourished in ourselves, and others, with the offense of God, and dishonor of his name. 1 Sam. 2. 29. Apoc. 3. 19.

17. Fifthly, because the want of zeal provoketh God to inflict heavy judgments, Apoc. 2. 5. & 3. 16. 2 Thess. 2. 10.

18. Sixthly, because there is a singular promise of God's presence and communion with Christ, made to such as are zealous, Apo. 3. 20.

19. Seventhly, because zeal perfecteth, and maketh more acceptable all the duties which we perform unto God. I am. 5, 16. Rom. 12▪ 11.

20. Eighthly, because that is the way and fittest manner of seeking the Kingdom of God, Mat. 11. 12.

21. Ninthly, because that many that make only a show of Religion, are zealous persecutors of Religion. Matthew 23. 15.

The fourth Question is, what is to be done of us, that we may get, confirm, and excite the true zeal of God in ourselves?

22. Answer, We ought, 1. to take heed of all those things which are enemies to zeal. Such are, 1. Sundry speculations, and questions, which tend not to the edification of men in Faith, and obedience. 1 Tim. 14. & 4. 7. 2 Tim. 2. 14. 23. Tit. 3. 9. For the intention of the mind about those things which are merely speculative, although it may be a means to find out the truth, yet it hindereth the intention of the affections about things practical. And this is the reason why there is more true zeal often found in poor simple Christians, then in our Doctors and Masters, 2. Intention of the affections about worldly things, Luke 8. 14. 3 A spiritual satiety or fullness, that is, a presumption of our own sufficiency, and a resting in that degree and measure to which we have attained, Phil. 3. 13 14. 4 Sloth, Fear, and carnal wisdom. Iud. 1 19. 21. 27▪ 28. 29, 30. 31, 32. 33. 5 Familiarity with the world, or the commonesse of sin abounding in others. Mat. 24.

22. 6 The practice of such things as our conscience alloweth not, Rom. 14. 20. 21. 7 Indulgence to ourselves in our own corruptions, 1 Cor. 5. 6. 2 Corinthians 7. 11. Ephes. 4. 29. 30.

23. Secondly, we ought often and seriously to meditate upon the love and mercy of God toward us, Pro. 25. 21. 22.

24. Thirdly, we ought to meditate daily of our imperfections, Phil. 3. 13, 14.

25. Fourthly, we ought to be diligent in the use of all those means, which God hath appointed for the begetting of grace in us, 1 Thess. 5. 16. 20.

26. Fifthly, we ought to associat with them, that have the zeal of God, Pro. 22. 24, 25. & 27. 17. Among such we must especially desire those Ministers whose tongues have been touched with a coal from the Altar, Isaiah 6. For by notorious and lamentable experience (even in reformed Churches) that is found to be true, which the author (heretofore praised) writ long since. The words of life in the lips of many Doctors & preachers are dead, in regard of the virtue, and efficacy; For they do so coldly and dully preach the words of God, that they seem even to be dead in their lips: Whence it comes to pass, that as they themselves are cold and dead, even so do they leave their hearers cold and dead, and I would to God they did not make them so. I knew a man that for this cause left the City Paris; For he said that he was made colder, and colder daily, with the Lectures and Sermons in Paris: And that he was afraid if he should stay longer there, he should be quite frozen to death spiritually. Wherefore he got him to certain zealous persons, as unto hot coals, that conversing among them he might nourish and increase his heat.

The fifth Question is whether zeal is to be judged according to the sense thereof, and the manner of exercising?

27. Ans. Not always; For zeal is greater essentially, in regard of the things about which it is conversant, or accidentally, in regard of some circumstances which happen, and do not always remain the same. For example, married folks loving one another dearly▪ are sometimes more affected upon the very marriage▪ than in that constant society of life, which afterward follows. But this is by accident, because of the novelty of the thing; But in very deed they may afterward rejoice as much, or more.

28. So also the faithful in the first conversion may find often greater motions of their affections, then afterward; because of the novelty of the thing, though there be afterward an increase in the true zeal of God. Some such thing is affirmed even of the Angels, Lu. 15. 7.

29. In old age, or in some such like decay of strength, although there may be the same zeal, or more then was before, yet it is not put forth in some, in the same manner, that it was in, in their younger days.

30. Variety of education may bring a great diversity in the manner of exercising ones zeal, when yet there may be an equal zeal in respect of the essence of it.

The sixth Question is whether one and the same thing may be lawfully a matter of zeal and laughter?

31. Ans. That this may be, appeareth in the example of Elijah, 1 Kings 18. 27. with 19. 10. 14. But yet not in the same respect. For zeal hath for its object something either honest, or filthy, but laughter is caused by the apprehension of an unexpected thing that lightly pleaseth, without the consideration of honesty or filthiness.

CHAP. 7. Of peace and tranquility of Conscience.

BEcause the concomitant object of obedience is a quiet Conscience. Concerning peace of Conscience.

The first Question is how peace of Conscience doth depend upon our obedience?

1. Ans. It depends not upon our obedience as upon the principal cause, but rather upon that justification which we have by Christ Jesus, Romans 5. 1. Heb. 10. 22. 1 pet. 3. 21. 1 Cor. 4. 4.

2. They which go about to rest in themselves, or in their own works, can never find any solid tranquility in their Consciences, both because of the diverse falls, and because of the manifold imperfections, which adhere to the endeavors of the best men, while they live in this World. And hence it is that those that are popish must needs be vexed with perpetual doubts, both in life, and death, because of the opinion which they have of the Righteousness, and Merits of their works, which are yet by their own confession uncertain.

3. Secondly, it depends upon our obedience, 1. as upon that whereby the contrary is removed, or as upon that which removes the impediment, 1 Sam. 25. 31. 1 John. 3. 18. 21. 2 As upon the proc...eant cause, or secondary reason thereof, 2 Cor. 1. 12.

4▪ Now this is so to be understood, as that the tranquility of Conscience in regard of those actions which are agreeable to the Law of God, is to be conceived to depend upon obedience in regard of the thing it self: But that tranquility which respects our state before God, it to be •...scribed •...o otherwise to our obedience, as to the cause, but only in respect of the certainty of our perceiving of it, and that our obedience respecteth the thing it self, as the sign and effect thereof: hence that phrase so of•... used by John, By this we know, and such like, John 2. 3. 5. 29. & 3. 10▪ 14. 19. & 4. 13.

5. Peace of Conscience also depends upon obedience, as upon the conservant cause. For righteousness (not impu...ed, nor inherent) but of the life and conversation, is the breastplate of a believer, whereby he is guarded, and defended and is perfectly safe, and quiet. Eph. 6. 14. 1 John. 3. 7. 1 Cor. 4. 3. Hence it is that that righteousness which consists in obedience, is called the righteousness of a good Conscience, Acts 24. 10.

6. Now obedience doth, preserve and maintain peace of Conscience, not only as a sign of our reconciliation with God, but also as a continuation and an exercise of that life which is acceptable, and pleasing unto God, Col. 1. 10. Thess. 4. 1. Heb. 12. 28. Not that there is any such perfection in our obedience, as can satisfy the Law of God, but because that after our persons by faith in Christ, become acceptable to God, then by virtue of the same faith, for Christ's sake, our obedience though weak, and polluted, is accepted before God, 1 Pet. 2. 5.

The second Question is, what is that obedience, by the presence whereof the Conscience may enjoy peace?

7. Ans. First, an absolute perfection is not required to this tranquility, for then it were a vain•... thing to seek for it in this life. I am. 3. 2. 1 John. 1. 10.

8. Yet such a porportion is necessary, as by God's own testimony in his holy word is acceptable to him, Heb. 11. 2.

9. Thirdly, this perfection consisteth properly in this, that all our studies, and endeavors be good: and the imperfection be only in the manner of performing, Ro. 8. 4.

10. Fourthly, all those imperfections which adhere to our obedience, are with all humiliation of soul to be acknowledged, and pardon for them is to be begged in Faith, Pet. 5.

The third Question is, what kind of tranquility it is which doth arise from such obedience?

11. Ans. First, Such as the obedience it self is, that is, various, and imperfect. 2 Cor. 1. 24.

12. Secondly, it doth not therefore exclude motion from evil, unto good, but only that perturbation which ariseth from the apprehension of God's Anger.

13. Thirdly, Yet notwithstanding it doth as with a guard keep the souls of the faithful, Phil. 4. 7. And govern them. Col. 3. 15.

The fourth Question, how may the peace of a good conscience be distinguished from that peace, which is in wicked men?

14. Ans. First, the peace of the wicked is not founded upon the Word of God, but upon vain words, and imaginations, Ier. 23. 17, 18. 1 Thess. 5. 3.

15. Secondly, the peace of the wicked is not wont to be constant, but is interrupted with many grrpes, and pangs, that come between; and is wont to vanish, when the judgments of God begin to light upon them.

16. Thirdly, the peace of the wicked continues, whether duties of piety, and righteousness be done or omitted, so that only those crimes be abstained from, which their natures, abhor.

CHAP. 8. Of Virtue.

QUestion. 1. Whether it be not enouh sor a man to do that which is good, unless we labor also for an habit of virtue, whereby our hearts may be inclined to that which is good?

Ans. We ought to give all diligence to add to our Faith, Virtue, 2 Pet. 1. 5.

1. Because the Word of God, whereby we are in special manner called upon for the performance of our duty, ought to be engrafted within us, I am. 1. 25.

2. We ought to deliver up ourselves unto the same Doctrine, as to a pattern, or mould, the likeness of which is to be expressed in our heart 8, Rom. 6. 17. Now this inward image and likeness, is virtue.

3. As we ought to put off the old man together with his members, which properly are internal vices, Col. 3. 5. So we ought to put on the new man with his members, which properly are virtues.

4. We ought to be framed and fashioned after the Image of Christ, Col. 3. 10. In whom did dwell all the fullness of virtues. Isaiah 11. 2. Col. 1. 19. And that for this end, that of his fullness we may receive grace for grace, John. 1. 16.

5. If the habit of virtue be absent, although we should do some good works, yet we are not rooted and grounded in good, but are rashly carried away with evil, and that goodness soon vanisheth. Mat. 13. 21. Col. 1. 23.

6. That good which we do without virtue, we do it not with an honest and good heart, which yet is required to make it pleasing unto God. Lu. 8. 15.

7. Such kind of works, are not the obedience that is acceptable to God. Mat. 7. 18. & 15. 8.

Question, •... Wh•... ⟨◇⟩ •... ⟨◇⟩ to do•..., that he may grow and increas•... in any vertu•...?

8. Ans. First, he ought seriously and in a special manner to acknowledge his failings, and weakness, •...Cor. 3. 5. 1 Cor. 3. 18.

9. Secondly, he ought in Christ to apprehend that grace especially, which he wanteth, that in time he may be strong, and complete, Phil. 4▪ 13. Col. 2▪ 10.

10. Thirdly, he ought diligently to take heed of all such things, as are contrary to that virtue, which he labors for, Pro. 4. 14, 15. Eph. 4. 29. 31.

11. Fourthly, he ought to employ himself in those things, whereby that virtue may be promoted, 2 Pet. 1. 12. 15.

12. Fifthly, he ought to seek the same virtue at God's Hand, by daily and earnest prayer, I•... 1. 5. Act. 4. 29.

13. Sixthly, he ought frequently and diligently to exercise himself in those things, which are proper to his virtue, 1 Tim. 4. 7.

Question, 3. What be the signs whereby a man may know that he hath gotten, any virtue?

14. Ans. First, a propension and readiness in a manner natural to the exercise of that virtue, 2 Pet. 14. 1. Thess. 4. 9.

15. Secondly, firmness and constancy in that exercise, E•...b. 4. 1•..., 15.

16. Thirdly, a joy and delight arising from that exercise. Pro. 21. 15. 2 Cor. 8. 2. & 9. 7. 13.

17. Fourthly, an abomination of the contrary vice, 119. 163.

18. Fifthly, an alienation from those which are given to that vice, Pro. 29. 27.

19. Sixthly, universality, whereby it comes to pass, that, a man doth not only in part, and in some respect follow that which is good, and oppose that which is evil (admitting a limitation, and measure according to carnal wisdom) but simply, and absolutely. 1 Cor. 13. 7. Col. 1. 10.

CHAP. 9. Of Prudence.

AMong those conditions which are necessarily required to virtue, after that general justic•..., which notes out its essential rectitude, follows in the next place, Prudence, or spiritual wisdom. Concerning it therefore.

Question, 1. In what thing doth true prudence consist?

1. Ans. First, spiritual wisdom doth generally consist in such a discerning, circumspect looking to, considering, and ordering those things which belong to God's Glory, and our duty, and salvation, that as much as may be, they may be brought unto perfection. Pro▪ 14. 8. 15. & 15. 24. & 22. 3. But in a more special manner it belongs to wisdom, 1. To propound a right end evermore unto ourselves, and to be endeavoring after it: Jeremiah 4. 22. 2 Tim. 3. 15. 32. 29. For, that man's wisdom is in vain, who is not wise for himself, and for his own good.

2. Secondly, to make choice of such means as do tend certainly to that scope, Pro. 2. 9.

3. To walk accurately, and precisely in the use of those means, Eph. 5. 15.

4. To take hold of, and to redeem every opportunity, for the advanceing, and helping forward of this study, Col. 4. 5.

5. Carefully to take heed of, and avoid all such things, as do hinder this study, Job. 28. 28.

6. To forsake all things else, for the attaining of this chief good, Mat. 13. 44. 45.

7. Not to trust to a vain hope, but to lay a solid foundation in all things, Mat. 7. 24.

Question, 2. By what means may this wisdom be gotten?

8. Ans. First, it comes from none other then God alone, by the Holy Ghost, Job. 28. 12, 13, 14. 20. 21. 23. Isaiah 11. 2. 3. Eph. 1. 8. 17 I am. 3. 15.

9. Secondly, that we may obtain it from God, we must seriously acknowledge and confess our own foolishness. 1 Cor. 3. 18.

10. Thirdly, we ought to seek it in the Word of God. Psal. 19. 7. & 119. 98. 99 104. Ier. 8. 〈◇〉 .

11. Fourthly, we must seek it of God in a due manner. I am. 1. 5. 2. Cor. 1. 10. 11.

12. Fifthly, we ought to direct all our observation and experience to the getting of wisdom, Ps. 90. 12.

Question, 3. By what arguments, we may be stirred up, to labor after this spiritual wisdom?

13. Ans. First, because therein lies the perfection of man above other Creatures, Ps. 32. 8. 9.

14. Secondly, because it is a main part of God's Image, Col. 3. 10.

15. Thirdly, because it delivers from all evil, Proverbs 2. 11. 12.

16. Fourthly, because it conduceth to all good, Proverbs 3. 13. 14. 19.

Now because in Scripture there is mention made of an human wisdom, or prudence, opposed to this spiritual wisdom▪ therefore the Question is Question, 1. Whether all human wisdom is to be condemned?

17. Ans. Humane wisdom is considered, 2. ways; either as it is simply an human perfection, or (as they call it) an intellectual virtue, whereby the businesses that a man hath to do, though they be many and great, are easily conceived, judged, and directed; or as it is a corruption and abuse of that faculty, and hath some sin adhering to it, or mingled with it. In the former sense it is a thing good in regard of nature: and so to be commended and labor'd for: although in respect of any moral goodness, it is a thing of an indifferent nature, neither good nor evil, as all other natural perfections also are. Civil wisdom therefore considered in it self, is not opposed to spiritual wisdom, but only as a disparate. But in the latter sense, it is a thing evil in regard of the morality of it, and to be condemned, and avoided. For it is opposed to spiritual wisdom as a thing adverse: For which cause also it is called fleshly wisdom, earthly, sensual, devilish, Jam. 3. 15.

Question, 2. When is human wisdom carnal, and in that respect to be condemned?

18. Ans. First, when it opposeth it self directly to the wisdom of God, in devising any evil, Exod. 1. 10. Pro. 21. 30. Pro. 6. 13▪ That is, when it becomes an instrument of any impiety, or injustice. For wisdom when it is joined with ungodliness, is nothing but wickedness armed. And to be wise to do evil, is not to be wise, but to be unwise.

19. Secondly, when it contemneth the wisdom of God, and accounteth it foolishness, 1 Cor. 1. 23.

20. Thirdly, when it will by no means be subject to the wisdom of God. Ro. 8. 7.

21. Fourthly, when in some sort it yieldeth to the wisdom of God, in regard of the thing it self, which it seeketh; but in regard of the means and manner of seeking, trusts to it self, Reg. 5. 11. 1 Cor. 2. 14.

22. Fifthly, when it makes a man more incapable of those things which are of the spirit of God, 1 Cor. 2. 14.

23. Sixthly, when it is made a matter of boasting, Ier. 9. 23. Ez 28. 17.

24. Seventhly, when trust and confidence is placed in it, Pro. 3. 6. & 26. 12.

25. Eighthly, when it is separated from innocence, and sincerity, Rom. 16. 19. Mat. 10. 16. 2 Cor. 1. 12.

Question, 3. By what means may a man be brought to contemn this carnal wisdom?

26. Ans. 1. Because it sets men further off from the Kingdom of God, then simple foolishness. 1 Cor. 1. 26, 27. Mat. 11. 26. 2 Because God doth use to infatuate, and bring to naught such wisdom. 1 Cor. 1. 19. 20. 3 Because it is serpentine, and diabolical, Gen. 3. 1. I am. 3. 15. 4 Because it destroyeth those in whom it is. Pro. 11. 3. 5. It overthroweth all human society, and takes away the comfort of life, 2 Sam. 16. 22. 23.

CHAP. 10. Of Watchfulness.

BEcause the exercised force, and (as I may say) activity of patience is usually in Scripture set forth by the name of watchfulness. Concerning it therefore.

Question, wherein doth it properly consist?

1. Ans. Watchfulness is nothing else but an heedful attention, whereby a thing is gone about with diligence, Luke 2. 8. Heb. 13. 16. But this spiritual act of vigilancy, which is required of all men, is in Scripture referred to three objects. 1. To the watches themselves, that they keep a watch over themselves, Pro. 4. 23. & 2 To their duty, that they watch unto that, Eph. 6. 18. 3 To the future, for which they by this duty prepare themselves, Mat. 24. 43. 44. 45. The first may be called the object over which, the second the object for which, The third the object to which. But although for teaching sake we do distinguish these three, in practice they ought always to be conjoined, so that we always observe ourselves, watch to those duties whichly upon us, and prepare ourselves for the future. Eccles. 5. 1. 2, 3, 4, 5.

2. Watchfulness over ourselves in general is nothing else, but a vigilant observation of the Will of God, Psal. 119. 4, 5, 6.

3. Particularly, there is required in it, as in the watching of a City that is besieged, or any other way in danger, that we observe, and inquire, 1. Into all comers in, whence they come, and whither they tend; and to all those things which come in by our senses, as by the City Gates, that if they be hurtful, they may be excluded, Psal. 119. 37. Job. 31. 1. •... Into all that go out, as into all our thoughts, words, and actions, which proceed from us. Pro. 4. 23, 24. Ps. 39. 2. Eccles 5. 1. I am. 3. 2.

4. Vigilancy as it respecteth our duty, is nothing but a carefulness about th•...se things, which God hath commanded, how we may please him in them, 1 Cor. 7. 32.

5. Vigilancy is particularly required, 1. Before the duty is performed, that the matter be duly weighed, Pro. 14. 15. That all impediments, (whether they be things in themselves lawful, or unlawful) may be removed, 1 Pet. 2. 11. 2 Tim. 2. 4. That we may be fit and prepared for the doing of our duty. Lu. 21. 34. 36. And that we may lay hold on the occasions of doing it, that are offered, Gal. 6. 20. And the contrary be avoided. Pro. 4. 15. & 5. 8. 2 In the very duty, that it be done in an exact, and accurate manner. Luke 8. 18. 3 After the duty, that it be not marred by any following corruption. 2. Io•... 8. Because it is easily wont, either to be corrupted by pride, 1 Cor. 4. 7. O•... by inconstancy, and levity to be overthrown, Ier. 34. 11.

6. Watchfulness as it respects the future, which we are to have before our eyes, is a due preparation, such as that, which we expect, doth require, whether it be good, that it may be received, or evil, that it may be avoided. Mat. 2•..., 42. 44. Particular here is required, 1. That this preparation be made in time, Mat. 25. 3. with 11. 2. That it be used constantly, and without ceasing, Lu. 21. 36.

Question 2. What is principally required for the observing of this watch?

7. Ans. First, sobriety in the use of worldly things, 1 Thess. 5. 6. 1 Pet. 47. & 5. 8. For the heart is overcharged, not only with sur•...etting and drunkenness, but also with the cares of this life, Lu. 21. 34. 36.

8. Secondly, a frequent consideration of God's own presence, and beholding of our ways, Pro. 1. 20. 21. Psal. 119. 168.

9. Thirdly, a frequent examination of our ways, with a just censure, and judgment passed upon them, Ps. 4. 4. Ps. 119. 59. 1 Cor. 11. 31.

10. Fourthly, the fellowship, and society of them, which will be to us in this care, Phil. 2. 4. Heb. 10. 24. 5. frequent prayer. Mat. 26. 41.

Question, 3. By what arguments may we be stirred up to this watchfulness?

11. Ans. There is one essential reason, which is taken from that danger, in which both we ourselves are, and the Name of God by reason of us, 1 Tim. 6. 1.

12. Now we are subject to that danger. 1. Through the infirmity of our flesh, Mat. 26. 41. 2. Through the deceits of the devil, and the world. 1 Pet. 5. 8. 3. Through the uncertainty of the time of Christ's coming to judgment, either general, or particular. Mat. 24. 42. & 25. 13. Mar. 13. 33. 35. Lu. 21. 35. 36.

CHAP. 11. Of Fortitude.

BEcause next after prudence, fortitude is requisite to the perfection of virtue: concerning it therefore.

Question, 1. Wherein doth Christian fortitude consist?

1. Ans. It is not to be confounded with animosity, or stoutness, which is to be found not only in men void of all virtue, but also in the brute Creatures, the Lion, the Horse, the Bull, the Dog. Pr..... 31. 29. 30. 31.

2. Secondly, yet courage or greatness of mind, hath the nature of a Genus, or General, in respect of true fortitude: which therefore consists not so much in the moderation of boldness, or hope, as in the moderation of fear, and desperation, Job. 6. 11. 19.

3. Thirdly, it doth not only consist in adventuring upon dangers, or undertaking hard things, but also in suffering, and bearing evils, and adversity, Hebrews 11. 34, 35. 36. 2 Tim. 2. 1. 3.

4. Fourthly, but true fortitude adventures upon dangers, and suffers adversity, for virtues sake, and for the performing of his duty, 1 Pet. 3. 14. & 4. 14, 15.

5. Fifthly, fortitude therefore is that courage, whereby we are ready to perform our duty, even because it is our duty, what difficulties soever happen. 1 Cor. 15. 58. & 16. 13.

6. Sixthly, he cannot be said to be truly courageous, which offers himself to dangers, not one... considering what they are, or why to be attempted, or entangled in them by $\langle \diamond \rangle$, or compel'd by necessity, and not led there...to by virtue. It was not from fortitude, and courage, that the Demoniac, Mark. 9. Often leapt into the water, often into the fire, but through the violence of the evil spirit; so it is not from the virtue of fortitude, that many are strong to pour down drink, Esa. 5. 22. Yea, many attempts, by which men are judged valiant and courageous, by foolish Acts, are nothing but made furies.

7. Seventhly, neither hath he this virtue, who is scarred, or doth desist from doing his duty, through any fear, or danger, Pro. 24. 10.

8. Eighthly, yet it is here to be remembered, that the courage of the faithful in this life, is joined with infirmity, and so some momentary shaking, wherewith the godly sometimes are made to stagger, may consist with the fortitude of virtue. Ier. 20. 9. 2 Cor. 4. 8.

9. Ninthly, and although in regard of purpose of mind, and preparation of heart, the faithful do arm and fortify themselves against all such things, as may hinder them in their duties. 2 Cor. 6. 4. Yet notwithstanding they are not always equally prepared to the suffering and undergoing of all kinds of molestations, as Satan observed, Job. 1. & 2. And the event in Job in some sort proved. For that which experience teacheth in corporal fortitude in a due proportion, holds also in spiritual; Some are strong to suffer labors; others to exercise warfare; others to carry burdens; others to repel things that are hurtful; and many which are strong in one or other of those things, are found infirm, and weak in the rest.

Qu. 2. By what means may this Christian fortitude be stirred up in a man?

10. Ans. First, if he acknowledge his own weakness, Rom. 5. 6. 2 Cor. 3. 5.

11. Secondly, if he consider that he is chosen and called of God to perform that duty, which he goes about. 1 Chron. 28.

12. Thirdly, if he persuade himself that God will be present with him in that which he hath commanded him, Deut. 20. 3. 4. Ps. 27. 1•.... 2 Reg. 6. 16.

13. Fourthly, if he expect and looks for all sufficiency of strength from God. Eph. 6. 10. Phil. 4. 14. Ps. 73. 26.

14. Fifthly, if he call to mind, how the victory hath been long since gotten for $\langle\phi\rangle$ by Christ; and that nothing is required of him, save only, that he adhering unto Christ, become a conqueror with him, and in him. John 16. 33. Rom. 37.

15. Sixthly, if he stick close to that promise, which testifies, that all things shall work together for good to them that love God, Rom. 8. 28.

16. Seventhly, if he have the recompense of reward, which is laid up for him, always before his eyes. 1 Cor. 15. 58.

CHAP. 12. Of Boldness which is contained under fortitude

BEcause under fortitude is contained boldness, or confidence, perseverance, and pa•...ence; of these therefore briefly.

Qu. 1. What is this boldness of fortitude?

1. Ans. First, by it we understand not here properly that confidence of Faith, whereby we rest upon God by Christ, unto salvation; Nor simply that confidence of hope, whereby we expect the things, which God hath promised: but that confidence, whereby we being full of Faith, and hope, do•... cheerfully and boldly set upon the duty laid upon $\langle\phi\rangle$ by God. Ier. 1. 7. 8. Act. 4. 13. 29. & 9. 29. Ephes. 6. 19. 20. Phil. 1. 14. 20.

Qu. 2. What are those adverse evils which are properly overcome by this confidence?

2. Ans. Two especially, 1. The difficulties which hinder us in the performing of our duties Pro. 22. 13. & ...6. 13. Eccles. 11. 4. Cor. 16. 9. (2) The uncertainty of the success or event, which will follow upon the performance of the duty, Daniel. 3. 17. 18.

Qu. 3. By what means is the mind confirmed against those vexations?

3. Ans. First, by the fervor, and heat of the spirit, or zeal Act. 18. 25. 26. Act. 4. 8. with 13. Amos 5. 24.

4. Secondly, by a true trust placed in God, Pro. 16. 3. Ps. 37. 5. & 55. 22 1 Pet. 4. 19. & 5. 7. Esa. 58. 11.

5. Thirdly, by faithful prayers, commending ourselves to God. Phil. 4. 6. Esth. 4. 16.

6. Fourthly, by a right judgment concerning the terrors, whereby we are astonished. For sometimes the things which terrify us, are utterly to be contemned, as the speeches of vain men, &c. Sometimes they are mere figments, which if we pass an exact judgment of them, vanish presently, and they are such always, that if they be compared with the dignity, fruit, and necessity of our duty, they are of no force at all.

CHAP. 13. Of Constancy.

Question, 4. Wherein doth perservance, or constancy of virtue consist?

1. Ans. First, In a perpetual continuation of the same purpose, and disposition of well-doing. Gal. 4. 18. Psal. 106. 3. Rom. 2. 7.

2. Secondly, in a frequent •...teration of the same kind of actions, with fervor, and zeal. 1 Thess. 5. 17.

3. Thirdly, in a care to proceed and go on in a way of virtue. Phil. 3. 13, 14.

Qu. 5. Which are the evils which are opposed to this Constancy?

4. Ans. First, declining out of the right way. Job. 23. 11. 12.

5. Secondly, wearisomeness, and fainting, Gal. 6. 9.

6. Thirdly, a desultory lightnsse whereby men are changed every hour, and become unlike themselves. It is called childishness, Eph. 4. 14. And madness, and bewitching, Gal. 3. 1.

Qu. 6. How are men stirred up to constancy?

7. Ans. Because the reward is not promised, save only to them that persevere, Apoc. 2. 10. 26. And therefore it is vain for a man to begin, unless he hold on, and go through with it. Gal. 3. 4.

CHAP. 14. Of Patience.

Question, 7. What is the nature of patience?

1 Ans. Christian patience hath reference to a threefold object. 1. To God, according to whose pleasure all adverse things, are ordered. Job. 1. 20. & 2. 9. 10. In which respect, murmuring against God is opposed to patience, 1 Cor. 10. 10. 2 To men, or those means which do directly afflict us. 2 Thess. 1. 4. with 6. 1 Pet. 2. 2•.... & 3. 9. In which respect desire of revenge is opposed to patience. Rom. 12. 17. 19. 3 To that office, or duty, which by the molestations of ad▪ adversities, we are tempted to forsake. Heb. 10. 36. Lu. 12. 19.

In which respect, faintness of mind is opposed to patience, Heb. 12. 5. And drawing back, and departing out of the right way, which follows there, Heb. 10. 36. with 38. 39. & 12. 7. with 13.

2. In the first consideration, patience pertains to Religion towards God; In the second to charity toward our Neighbor. In the third, it is a part of fortitude, and a general affection of virtue. Yet to the third consideration, may the other two be referred, so far as our duty, either towards God, or man, is considered in them: Although, besides this general nature, they have special difference, by which they may be profitably distinguished from this, and between themselves.

Qu. 8. How is this patience, and sufferance, to be distinguished that, fortitude, which consists in confidence, and Constancy?

3. Ans. Those three are always joined together in true fortitude; but confidence or boldness doth properly respect the setting upon a duty, constancy the continuation of it▪ patience, the defense of it.

Qu. What be the signs of this patience?

4. Ans. First, if we neither utterly condemn the difficulties, that we meet with, nor •...aint under them. Heb. 12. 5. But do overcome all oppositions duly weighed in a right judgment.

5. Secondly, if we be prepared in mind for righteousness sake, not only to suffer those troubles, which are less, but even those which are most fearful. Acts 21. 13.

6. Thirdly, if we do not only, not quite forsake our duty, because of difficulties, we meet with, but not so much as remit, or lessen anything of our zeal, Hebrews, 10. 35. & 12. 13.

7. Fourthly, if we undergo these troubles not as by constraint and unwillingly, but with spiritual joy and exultation, Mat. 5. 12. Col. 1. 11. Heb. 10. 34.

Qu. 10. By what motives may we be confirmed in this patience?

8. Ans. First, because without this patience no good thing can be perfectly accomplished▪ I am. 1. 4.

9. Secondly, because without patience we want the possession of our own souls, Luke 21. 19. Neither can we attain to have our hearts established in anything that is good, I am. 5. 5. 10. Pro. 24. 10.

10. Thirdly, because by these troubles we are brought into trial by God who takes a proof of us by the Devils temptations, Heb. 10. 32. Wherein unless by patience we get the better we must needs to the dishonor of God, and our own hurt be overcome by the Devil, Rom. 12. 21.

11. Fourthly, because in this trial God himself will give both a supply of strength and a happy issue, 1 Cor. 10. 13.

CHAP. 15. Of Temperance.

BEcause to the constitution of virtue there is required (besides the uprightness of justice the direction of prudence and the firmness of fortitude) the custody also or the guard of Temperance, therefore something must be said of Temperance.

Qu. 1. Wherein lieth the nature of Temperance.

1. Ans. First, As fortitude doth arm virtue against those things, whereby men are wont to be deterred and made afraid of doing their duty: so Temperance doth defend it against those things which are wont to allure, and entice men away from the same.

2. Secondly, although in that victory which Temperance obtains over flattering Temptations (in the resistance of which there is oft times much molestation) and in that constancy also which is properly a fruit of Temperance, there be to be found a magnanimity and height of mind near of kin to fortitude: yet there is a difference betwixt it and fortitude because of the difference of the objects.

3. Thirdly, because every object, that doth allure and entice, hath some show of good; and the appearāce of an honest good, as such, doth not allure to sin, but to honesty: therefore the object of Temperance are things that have a show of profit and delight; or profits and pleasures.

4. Fourthly, also love, desire, and delight are conversant about such kind of good things; therefore temperance properly is occupied about the moderating of these affections, about such objects.

5. Fifthly, Temperance doth not utterly take away these affections, as being natural, but doth govern them, that is, takes away their inordinatnesse, in regard of their degree, eextent, and manner.

6. Sixthly, this inordinatnesse, because in believers, it is taken away only in part, therefore these affections are in some sort, but not perfectly mortified. Hence it is, that Temperance is said to restrain, and keep under the remainders of them, and to abstain from them.

Qu. 2. What are the signs of Temperance?

7. Ans. First, if a man be not led with carnal and worldly affections, but keep them tamed under the yoke of reason and Religion, and do, as it were, deny them. Tit. 2. 12.

8. Secondly, if he abstain especially from those lusts, to which (either by reason of the condition of •...isoife, or by evil custom, or by the example of those amongst whom he lives) he is most inclined. 2 Timothy 2. 22. 1 Peter 4. 2, 3, 4.

9. Thirdly, if he abstain, not only from the outward works, whereby such lusts are wont to be fulfilled, but also study to root out and mortify the very inward inordinate affections, Col. 3. 5. 8. Rom. 8. 13.

10. Fourthly, if he be neither lifted up inordinately in the fruition of the commodities, and pleasures of this World, nor troubled in the want of them, but when he hath them, be as if he had them not, 1 Cor. 7. 29 30. 31. And when he hath them not, be as if he had them. 2 Cor. 6. 10.

Qu. 3. What is to be done by us, that we may attain Christian Temperance.

11. Ans. First, we ought to endeavor by all means to diminish and resist the love, desire, and delight of the World and of worldly things, 1 Io•... 2. 15. 16.

12. Secondly, to this purpose it will be profitable to turn away our thoughts, and senses from things perversely beloved: lest the appearance of good which seems to be in them prove to be an incentive, and nourisher of perverse love, Job. 31. 1. For it is remarkable that the two first perverse loves w^{ch} we read of in the Scripture, are said to come by the sight, Gen. 3. The Woman saw that the Tree was good and pleasant to the Eyes, and Gen. 6. & 2. The Sons of God saw the daughters of men that they were fair.

13. Thirdly, it is profitable also seriously to ponder of the fading vanity of all worldly things, 1 John. 2. 17. Eccl. 1.

14. Fourthly, to the end that we be not taken and carried away with the sh•...w of pleasures, it is good to behold them not as they come flatteringly, but as they go away, that is full of shame and sorrow, R•... 6. 21.

15. Fifthly, we must be watchful that the motions of concupiscence get not strength by long delay, but we must do our endeavor that they be presently and in the beginning repressed, Ro. 7.

16. Sixthly, we must often and seriously revolve in our minds how all those that ever were wise and godly here, not without just cause despised these pleasures, and judged them fit to be despised and eschewed by others.

17. Seventhly, the mind is to be occupied in other things; and our love, desire, and delight, are to be turned to those things which are Spiritual, and Divine, that so evil love may be driven out of the mind by good love, as one nail is driven out by another.

CHAP. 16. Of Drunkenness.

1. AMong the sins which are opposite to Temperance, those are most remarkable which are conversant about the delights of touching, as Gluttony, Drunkenesse, and such like, because such kind of abuses have most manifestly in themselves, and of themselves a moral badness as appears by the Law of nature, of God, and of man, all which do condemn them.

2. In all those kinds of excess, the inordinatenesse is commonly found to be either in regard of the substance when more precious things are desired, then do agree to a man's state; For in regard of the quantity when more is consumed then reason requires, or in regard of the quality when too much curiosity is used for the satisfying of ones lust, or in regard of the manner when a just decorum is omitted, or lastly in regard of the •...ime when men give themselves unto such things oftener then they should or when they ought not.

3. Now of drunkenness there is something in special to be considered before other sins of the like nature, because of that singular opposition which is betwixt it and the offices and works of virtue.

Qu. 1. What is drunkenness?

4. Ans. First, drunkenness is oftentimes taken for the privation of reason which follows upon immoderate Drinking. And so it is not properly a sin by it self, but rather an effect and punishment of sin.

5. Secondly, as it doth note either a desire of immoderate drinking, or the voluntary drinking it self so far immoderate, that a man by it is violently deprived of the use of reason, so it is a grievous sin. Pro. 23. 30. 39. Esa. 5. 11. Hos. 4. 11. Luk•... 21. 34. 1 Cor. 6. 10. Ephes. 5. 18.

6. The deformity and filthiness of this sin doth appear from these grounds, 1. Because the Drunkard doth for a contemptible pleasure sell that which is the excellentest thing in the nature of man whilst he deprives himself of the use of reason, 2. Because by this means he makes himself unfit not only for the duties of piety. Luke 21, 34. But also for all honest actions, Hos. 4. 11. 3 Because he exposeth himself to the danger of almost all kinds of sins, whilst he deprives himself of the power to avoid those things which otherwise he knows to be gross sins. For which reason and that which went before it is apparent that Drunkenness is not so much a special sin, against any one Commandment of God, as a general breach of the whole Law, 4 Because he doth so deforme the Image of God in himself, that he doth in a sort cast himself below the Beasts. 5 Because he doth bring hereby many mischiefs to his body, name, and outward condition, 6. Because he which is accustomed to this sin proveth in a sort incurable. For a Drunkard is seldom or never reclaimed either from Drunkenness, or any other sin because his heart is taken away. Hos. 4. 11.

7. Drunkenness is voluntary not only when it follow's from a direct intention, but also when it cometh of a notable negligence in preventing it.

The outrage•... which a man committeth in Drunkenness are so far to be imputed to him for faults, as the Drunkenness was voluntary; Now then especially, they are both voluntary, and accounted faulty, when (all circumstances being considered) a man might, and so ought to have foreseen, that he would commit such things in his Drunkenness, either because he had tried it by experience before, or because in the like case of Drunkenness, or upon the like opportunity, drunken men are wont to commit such things, or at least do expose themselves to the danger of committing them.

9. Now, although complete Drunkenness do consist in the loss of the use of reason by Drinking, whereby a man is made altogether unfit for the duties he hath to do; Yet all perturbation of the fantasy by Drink whereby a man is notably made less fit, for the ordinary exercise of piety (as prayer and reading) is a degree of the same sin, Lu. 28. 34.

10. Those also which are strong to drink, so that though they drink above measure, they find no perturbation of their forces, yet if they like to sit at their cups, to stay at the Wine, and to extend and prolong their drinkings, they are not free from this sin. Esa. 5. 11.

11. He is a partaker in this sin, who doth wittingly and willingly give wine or drink to another, to make him drunk. For he doth cooperate to his sin.

12. But much more are they guilty, who induce others to make themselves drunk, whether they intend it directly, or indirectly, by inviting them to drink, by calling for greater pots, by striving, by urging them without all reason, to drink as much, and take their turn, as they call it.

13. We ought to abstain, not only from the imitation, but also from the fellowship of such kind of sins, according to that of the Apostle: if any that is called a brother, be a Drunkard, with such an one no not to eat, 1 Cor. 5. 11.

14. We are to abstain therefore (even from this ground▪ if there were no other) from those rites, whereby drunkenness is artificially wont to be brought about: of which sort are the adjuring of others to drink by the names of some that are great, or dear to them; the sending of cups about, that all and everyone in his order may drink them off; that abuse of lots (as it is in some places used) to impose a feigned and (unwritten) Law and necessity of drinking upon the guests, and such like mysteries of Bacchus, and introductions to the excess of drinking.

CHAP. 17. Of Good Works.

BEcause from virtue proceed good Works; concerning them therefore.

Qu. 1. What is here to be understood by a Work?

1. Ans. A work in this place ought not to be distinguished from an action, as it is distinguished by them, who do account those only for good works, which produce something, that is good and profitable unto men; such as are alms, the building and endowing of Temples, Colleges, Hospitalls, &c. For although among men, which are affected with their own commodities, such works are in a singular manner above others extolled. Yet such works may be so done, that that action from whence they come, may be in many respects evil; although the things done may be useful and good unto other men.

2. Again▪ even when in such works, not the works only, but the actions be truly good: yet they cannot be equalled to some other actions, which carry not so great a pomp 1 Tim. 3. 1. I am. 5. 20.

3. This thing ought so much the more diligently to be observed, because it pertains much to the comfort of the poorer sort of believers, who have hardly any power to do anything, that may tend to the external good of others. It serves also to abate the insolency of certain rich Men, who think that they only do good works, and none but they.

Q. 2. Concerning the efficient cause of good works, it may be demanded, whether the works of ⟨◇⟩ unregenerate, (whereby they do in some sort the same thing which the regenerate do in their good works) be good works, or no:

4. Ans. In such kind of works, we are to distinguish between the substance (as I may say) of the work, and the fault of the person, wherewith it is defiled: the substance of such works is good, because they are the things of the Law. Rom. 2. 14. Now, every work so far as it agreeth with God's Law, is good. But for all that, there be some vices cleaving to them, which come, partly, from the person that doth them, partly, from the manner of doing, whereby such works are so defiled, that though in their own nature, and in respect of others they be good, yet in respect of any spiritual obedience yielded by them unto God, they are not good, Esa. 1. 13. Esa, 66▪ 3.

Qu. 3. How then can the works of the regenerate be good, seeing they are many ways defiled?

5. Ans. Although evil doth always cleave both to the persons and the actions of the godly, Rom. 7. 21. Yet this evil in their holy duties takes not away the essence of a spiritual duty, but hinders and diminisheth the degree and perfection thereof; because all the causes of such works are good, and only the adjuncts evil: and so the imperfection being covered in Christ, the works are for Christ's sake acceptable, and pleasing unto God 1 Pet. 2. 5.

Qu. 4. Concerning the matter of good works, it may be demanded, whether it is not lawful for us at our own pl▪...assure to make choice of something, in which to yield honor and obedience unto G•...d?

6. This is expressly forbidden, Deut. 12. 8. 32. Num. 5. 39. Mat. 15. 9. Mark. 7. 7.

7. Secondly it doth imply a contradiction that we should yield obedience to God in those things, whereof he hath given us no Commandment: Neither without obedience can we give any honor to God, that may be pleasing to him. All works therefore of our own choosing are only good before men through a feigned and vain persuasion, but not before God.

8. Thirdly, yet there is some difference to be observed in good works, in regard of the matter; for some are expressly and immediately enjoined to all, as the duties of the moral Law; others are not commanded to all, but to some only, and that is not expressly and immediately, but consequently, and upon the supposition of certain circumstances, by which it comes to pass that (bic & nunc) in some particular case, they partake of the nature of precept•....

9. In such things, the will of God is to be gathered and collected by a fillogisme, whose general proposition is contained in the Scripture; the assumption dependeth upon gift, call, or such like special circumstances; and the conclusion is out of the proposition so derived by the assumption, that in respect of this or that man, such or such a time, it hath the same force of binding, with a general Commandment. For example, all ought to cut off occasion of calumny and scandal, and to take that course which make▪ most for the furtherance of the Gospel, and the edification of the Church. This is the proposition. 1 Cor. 10. 31. 32. 33. Now Paul, considering all circumstances, did thus assume, I Paul, if I shall freely preach the Gospel, shall cut off occasion of calumny. 2 Cor. 11. 12. I shall further the Gospel, 1 Cor. 9. 23. And edify the Church, 1 Cor. 9. 19. Hence this conclusion follows, therefore I Paul ought to preach the Gospel freely, 1 Cor. 9. 15. Again, all ought according to the gifts which they have, and their vocation, to promote the Gospel, 1 Cor. 7. 17. I have the gift of continency, and the present necessity makes the single life more fit to further the Gospel, then marriage, 1 Cor. 26. Therefore I ought to continue in that single estate.

10. If this explication be duly observed, it will easily without any longer dispute, overthrow the Doctrine of the Papists, who make distinction between Evangelical counsels, and the Laws of God.

Qu. 5. Concerning the end of good work▪ it is demanded, what force intention hath to make an action either good, or bad?

11. Ans. A good intention by it self cannot make a good action, because goodness is a perfection, and doth arise from the perfection and integrity of all the causes. Neither is there any action so wicked, but may be committed out of some good end: the incest of Lots Daughter was upon a good end. Gen. 19. 32. And many do kill Christians, thinking thereby to do God service. Io.... 16. 2.

12. Yet an evil intention doth make an action evil, because evil, is a defect, and doth arise out of any defect, Mat. 6. 1. Take heed ye do not your alms before men to be seen of them, &c.

Qu. 6. What kind of intention is necessarily required to make an action good?

13. Ans. First, it is absolutely necessary that it be done with a respect to honesty, and in reference to the pleasing of God, and obeying his Will. Acts 24. 16. For an action cannot be good, unless it be don under the notion of goodness; Now to do a good thing under the notion of goodness, is to have a respect to honesty and goodness in the doing of it. For he that doth a thing that is honest, because it is delightful, or profitable, may be said to do rather a thing profitable, or delightful, then honest. 1 Tim. 6. 5.

14. Secondly, a secondary intention of profit, or pleasure doth in no sort take away the honesty of an action, but adorn it rather. Rom. 1. 12. & 15.

15. Thirdly, it is also absolutely necessary, that there be a reference of the action to the glory of God, 1 Cor. 10. 37. This is done virtually in the intention of our doing our duty: but the more distinct and direct respect is unto God in action, the more perfect it is, Ps. 16. 8.

16. Fourthly, it is meet also there be a secondary intention of setting our own salvation. 1 Cor. 9. 24.

17. Fifthly, in such works as come to the notice of others, it is requisite also that we think of stopping the mouths of the wicked, 1 Pet. 3. 16. And of furthering others in the way of salvation. Mat. 5. 16.

18. Sixthly, the cause is otherwise in evil actions; for to make an action evil, it is not required, that there be any respect to evil, or express intention of dishonoring God's Name, or of bringing death, or giving offense unto others: because as the nature of sin consists in privation, so the want of good intention is •...n evil intention, and (as it is chosen by the will) interpretatively is reckoned for the intention of all those evils, which are opposed to good intentions: and hence it is that the sinner is said to love death, Pro. 8. 36.

Qu. 7. Of the form of a good action wherein it doth consist?

19. It consists properly in the manner of doing, when the agent is not only well disposed, and that thing which he doth is approved of God, but also the action is so ordered in respect of all the circumstances, as God prescribeth, what and of what nature this is, appeareth by the defect. 1 Cor. 11. 27. 28. 29. Comande. 3.

Qu. 8. Because the information and force of Conscience d•...th nearly pertain to the form of doing concerning it may be demanded, whether the Conscience of man be a sufficient and absolute rule to work by?

20. Ans. The Conscience of a man since the fall is defiled, Tir. 1. 15. And so by it self cannot be a perfect, and pure rule, yea: if we simply follow it as a leader, we shall be brought oftentimes into vil•... wickedness. Io•... 16. 2. Acts 26. 9. Phil. 3. 6. It is therefore only a subordinate rule, so far of force, as it is directed by the Word of God. Hence an erring Conscience hath not that power to bind, that we are simply bound to follow the judgment of such a Conscience. For we ought never to content ourselves, till our Conscience be certainly informed in those things which concern our duty; although in this sense it may be said to bind, because against such a Conscience, while such, we are to do nothing.

Qu. 9. What is to be done when the Conscience is in doubt?

21. Ans. If the Conscience do doubt whether the action be lawful we ought to abstain from that action, till we be certain concerning it. Ro. 14. 23.

Qu. 10. What if the Conscience be in a perplexity, so that it thinks it a sin as well to abstain•... from the action as to do it?

22. Ans. Out of the nature of the thing it self, and of the Conscience considered by it self, such a case cannot fall out: for it cannot be that the judgment of the Conscience should at the same time assent to both parts of the contradiction.

Qu. 11. What is to be done when the Conscience is troubled with scruples?

23. The conscience is then said to be troubled with scruples when it doth give assent to one part of the question being hereunto induced by sufficient arguments, but yet in some sort troubled with the objections of the other side, which it cannot easily answer. Such kind of doubts (if it may be) ought by a certain judgment to be laid down; but if this cannot be such an imperfection of judgment (in as much as it doth not hinder assent by a doubtfull wavering, but only make that assent to be more weak) is no just cause to make us forbear that, which such an assent leads us unto. Deut. 13. 1. 2. 3. 1 Kings. 13. 21▪

Q•... 12. How ought a man to carry himself between contrary opinions, when he is uncertain of the truth?

24. Ans. First, it is not enough for a good conscience to adhere to the authority of men, though they be learned and godly; because the conscience is not by it self to be subjected to the judgment of man: Neither hath any human testimony, sufficient strength to argue God's approbation of a thing▪ or to excuse in God's presence. Rom. 14. 12. 1 Cor. 8. 10.

25. Secondly, everyone ought to follow that opinion, which (after due diligence to search the truth) he judgeth to be improbable out of the nature of the thing and the Law of God compared together, whether that probability appear to him by his own search, or by the help of others. 1 Cor. 8. 4. with 7.

26. Thirdly, if after due inquisition made the mind be wholly in suspense, whether the action be lawful or unlawful, then that doubtfullnesse remaining, the safer part is to be chosen. Now that is the safer part in which there is no danger of sinning, and in this case he sinneth not, who simply abstains from such an action, so that he condemns not another which doth it. Rom. 14. 5. with 4. 23. We are therefore to abstain from all such things, about which (after due diligence used) the conscience is in doubt, whether they be lawful or no. They which do otherwise, do not only expose themselves to the danger of sinning in the very action it self, but without doubt do •...in in the very manner of doing.

Qu. 13. When a man doth apprehend, that, of two sins he must needs commit one, which is he to choose?

27. Ans. The precepts of God do never so jarre of their own nature, that it is necessary to break one of them by sin: For when a less Commandment is neglected, that a greater may be observed, that less Commandment doth cease for the while to bind; so that they who upon such an occasion neglect it, are altogether blameless, that is, sin not. Math. 12. 5. 7.

28. For that usual saying, that of two evils we must choose the least, it is meant of evils of punishment, not of sin.

29. A man ought therefore always to have a fixed resolution to eschew and avoid all sin.

30. There is no necessity of fear, danger, or outward constraint whereby a man can be excused, if he do upon that pretence commit the least sin.

31. Neither indeed is there properly any constraint, when anything is done with certain counsel, and the will (which cannot be compelled) induced by fear, consenteth to the actinn.

32. Thirdly, if any through weakness be brought to those straits, that he thinks he must needs of two sins commit one, the conscience cannot give judgment in such a case, because that deliberation is made against the conscience. Yet it cannot be doubted, but he sins less, which commits the lesser sin.

CHAP. 18. Of things indifferent.

QVestion, 1. Wherein consists the nature of a thing indifferent?

1. Ans. First, adiaphorum (for so it is called) according to the interpretation of the word, is that which hath such a respect to two extremes, that it is inclined no more to the one, then the other, and in the same sense is called an indifferent thing, or a thing of a middle nature.

2. Secondly, now although according to this large acceptation of the word, any middle thing may be called indifferent or adiaphorum, yet the word doth commonly signify only such a thing as is in the middle between moral good and evil.

3. Thirdly, the middle between good and evil is either, 1. of mere denial (as they term it...) in which there is neither good nor evil to be found; and so all substances, whether they be things natural or artificial, are middle things or indifferent: or it is, 2. a middle of participation, which doth so far agree with both extremes, as the extremes agree between themselves; and thus no substances are properly things middle and indifferent by themselves, because none of them are either good or evil, but only actions, and dispositions to actions.

4. Fourthly, such actions therefore as are neither commanded nor forbidden, and that be in their own nature neither points of obedience, or disobedience, are indifferent or middle.

Qu. 2. Whether there be any actions indifferent in regard of their kind?

5. Ans. First, this may be understood two ways: either that indifferency be of the specifical nature of any action, which is false: or that the common nature of an action should have an indifferent respect to good or evil, which is true.

6. Secondly, there is therefore no action of its own nature so indifferent, but by circumstances it may be made good, or evil; but there be divers actions which in their common and bare nature, before they be as it were clothed with circumstances, do include in themselves no goodness or badness; as, to eat, to drink, to take a journey, to walk, &c.

Qu. 3. Whether indifferent actions differ nothing among themselves, but are all equally distant from good and evil?

7. Ans. In their own intrinsical nature they differ nothing at all; but yet there are some▪ which for the most part have evil circumstances annexed to them, and so bend more toward evil, and have an evil name, as to do the work of an accuser, the office of an hangman, &c.

Some there be also which for the most part have good circumstances, and so bend toward good, and have a good name, as, to till the ground▪ to follow our study diligently▪ &c.

Qu. 4. Whether do things indifferent make anything for order and comliness?

8. Ans. Whatsoever it is that of its own nature serves for order or comliness, or edification, is not indifferent: for when they do participate the nature of goodness, they are not in the middle betwixt good and bad. And when they produce good, they must needs have some good force and efficacy in them: everything brings forth its like.

Qu. 5 Whether do indifferent things cease to be indifferent when any certain thing is set down concerning them, by such as are in authority?

9. Ans. Nothing ought to be commanded, but that which is good, nor to be forbidden, but what is evil; That which is indifferent cannot simply, absolutely, and forever be either enjoined or forbidden; but commanded, as it draws near to good, forbidden, as it approacheth to evil.

Qu. 6. Whether any singular and individual action be indifferent?

10. Ans. First, there be some actions which though they be actions of a man, yet they are not human actions; such are those which proceed from imagination only, and not from deliberate reason, as the rubbings of men's hands, •...o scratch the head or beard, to take up a straw, &c. while we are thinking of something else: these actions are not morally good or evil, they want that which is required to make them so, namely counsel and deliberation. For although a man may sin by those actions, as if in time of Prayer he suffer his imagination to wander; and do give way to such toyings as those. Yet these actions considered in themselves are neither good nor evil. It is true these motions are subject to the command of man's will, but yet they are so subject, that they may be exercised without any precedent act of reason: Neither are we bound any further by reason to prevent them; but only so far that they hinder not the duties we are about. So for moving of the eye lids, reason and the will have power to moderate them, but it is not worth the while to take notice how often we wink, if so be we take heed that in such things nothing be done which is undecent, •...r against our duty.

11. Secondly, every action which proceeds from deliberate reason, and is properly called human, considered singularly and in the individual, as it is an exercised action, is either good or evil. For such a kind of action is either ordered to a good end, or it is not; If it be, •...hen it hath the nature of a good action, if other circumstance•... be correspondent; if it be not ordered to a good end, it is an evil action because it wants the perfection, which ought to be in it, and is not according to its rule.

12. Yet is not required to the goodness of natural action, that it be always actually and explicitly referred to the due •...nd, so that this be done implicity and virtually; because reason in that exercise of such kind of actions, may often with more profit be conversant about those objects.

13. Thirdly, someone or two circumstances of an human action may be indifferent, as if one scholar be speaking with another, it is sometimes indifferent whether they use the Latin tongue, or any other. But their talk taken with all these circumstances is necessarily either good or bad: the reason is, because the determination of an action doth not depend upon one circumstance apart, but upon all jointly together.

14. Fourthly, there may be some singular action in which there is no goodness special to be found, which may not be found in another, and so, that at this time we do this or that, rather than another thing, therein is oftentimes neither good nor evil. Opportunity, or the suggestion of our minds without any respect of moral goodness, may be of weight sufficient to make the determination▪

15. Fifthly, although therefore there be... no singular actions human, that is neither good, nor evil; yet there are divers, which singularly and in comparison of others are neither necessary nor unlawful. For as the Creator hath oftentimes no certain reason, why he rather makes this image, than that: yet if he make any, it is necessary that he either follow the rules of his Art, and make a good one, or fail and so make a bad one. So it is in many singular actions of men, which in respect of the exercise, have no proper reason beside the inclination of the mind, but in the doing they are either good or bad.

CHAP. 19. Of a voluntary Act.

*Q*uest. 1. Whether in a good or evil act there be necessarily required an inclination of the will?

1. Ans. First, the will is the principle and the first cause of all human operation in regard of the exercise of the act. For we therefore do this or that rather than another thing, because we will; As God himself is said to do all things of his own Will. Eph. 1. 11. So also doth man who is made after the Image of God. The first cause therefore of the goodness or sinfulness of any Act of man, is in the Will.

2. Secondly, liberty also of election is formally in the will: that therefore any one doth yield obedience to God, or refuseth to do so, proceeds from the will.

3. Lastly, our obedience stands in our conformity to the Will of God▪ and the disobedience, in our unconformity thereunto. Now our conformity with the Will of God is first and principally in our will, Apoc. 2. 6.

Qu. 2. What are those things which make an action to become not voluntary.

4. Ans. Nothing at all but either absolute violence of constraint, or chance which could not be foreseen, or prevented. And for such things as are done through absolute violence or mere chance, they have neither the nature of Obedience or sin. As if one should be forced to offer incense or bow the knee before an Idol, or should merely by chance kill another, D...ut. 19. 56▪ 10.

Q. 3. What are we to think of those actions which are done through ignorance?

5. Ans. First, that ignorance which is in some sort a cause of the action (so that if a man knew what he did he would not Do it) if it be involuntary both in it self and in its cause, that is, not affected, nor procured, nor tolerated, doth make the action merely casual and involuntary and so excuseth from sin.

6. Secondly, ignorance of the Law doth never wholly excuse, because all men are bound to know the Will of God: but yet it doth somewhat lessen the fault if it be not affected, 1 Tim. 1. 13. John 4. 41. Acts 3. 17. But if it be affected it is of it self a sin and so doth not diminish but rather increase the guilt of other sins, 2 Pet. 3. 5.

7. Thirdly, an Ignorance of the fact if a man •...ath used such diligence as he ought, doth excuse him▪ because by such an ignorance the fact is made casual. So Jacob being deceived lay with Leah whom he took to be Rachel, Gen. 29. But if due diligence have not been used, ignorance of the fact, doth not altogether excuse although it do somewhat lessen the fault. And this seems to have been the case of Abimil...ch Gen. 20. 5.

Qu. 4. What are we to judge of those actions which are done through fear.

8. Ans. First, fear doth not simply make an action involuntary: but doth considering the circumstances of time and place, &c. impell a man to will this or that. As appears in that known instance of the merchant, who is induced through fear of death to throw away his merchandize into the Sea. Fear therefore doth never wholly excuse from sin: yea more, fear itself is oft a sin forbidden, and a cause too of most grievous sins▪ Mat. 10. 26. Phil. 1. 28. 1 Pet. 3. 14. Apoc. 21. 8. Although therefore a great fear or terror such as is wont sometimes to trouble even a man of good courage before men, be accounted for a good excuse, and is of force to make contracts done through fear void, yet before God such an excuse will not be taken.

9. Secondly, yet that sin which is committed through some strong terror, is not so grievous (if other things be alike) as that which is committed of the voluntary inclination of the will without any such fear of danger, because in fear the temptation is stronger: and such a fall, if repentance follow, doth proceed not so much from malice, as from infirmity and perturbation. And this was Peters case when he denied Christ.

Qu. 5. What are we to judge of those actions which are done through concupiscense.

10. Ans. Concupiscense doth not make an act cease to be voluntary, neither doth it indeed diminish the voluntariness of it in respect of the act, but increaseth it rather. For he that doth a thing out of concupiscense, hath a will strongly inclined to that which it doth, as it appears either delightful or profitable to him, if therefore the concupiscense be fixed the sin's the greater. as it was in •...das, who betrayed Christ out of coverousnesse of ⟨◇⟩ .

Qu. 6. What are we to judge of those actions which are done through inadvertency▪ or •...hrough not minding of what we do?

11. Ans. Inadvertency or mindlesnesse is of the same nature with ignorance: because it di•...ers not from it, but only as the privation of an act doth differ from the privation of a disposition. Inadvertency therefore is it self often a fin and is opposed to watchfulness. At such a time therefore as we are bound to watch and attend, if we watch not and attend, not we may be rightly said to will this watchfulness, not to will it, yea to will our inadvertency, Esa. 1. 3.

12. Again this inadvertency is sometimes voluntarily chosen in it self. Amos 6. 10. Sometimes it is voluntarily chosen in its cause. Mat. 13. 〈◇〉 .

Qu. 7. How are we said to will a thing in its cause?

13. Ans. When we do will something upon which another thing follows. He which will be present at immoderatdrinkings may be said to will drunkenness. He which willingly gives himself to sleep, and idleness, may be accounted guilty of a willing neglect of the duties of his calling-He which will please men, may be said with his will to dis•... please God. Gal. 1. 10.

CHAP. 20. Of the sins of the Heart.

*Q*uestion, 1. What are the sins of the Heart?

1. Ans. The sins of the heart are partly thoughts, partly delights, and partly desires.

Qu. 2. What thoughts are to be accounted as sins?

2. Ans. Ther's a threefold thought of the heart about that which is evil. 1. In the bare and simple apprehending of evil. 2. When with that apprehension there's joined some motion of the heart to consent to the evil. 3. When there is a full approbation of and consent unto the evil. In the first of these there is of it self no sin. For it was in Christ. Mat. 4. 1. Hence it is rightly said to know evil is not evil. But the other two kinds of thoughts are not without sin. For the third none makes question, and for the second the Scripture is plain. James 1. 14. Where we are also taught how to distinguish those thoughts which are evil from others, namely when some thought about an evil thing begins in the least manner to draw us towards it, when we begin to nibble upon it and are tickled with it. The reason is because then it bgins in some sort to be received by us, and stick in all, so that the evil of which we think becomes in a sort ours whilst we begin to be moved towards it as towards an object betwixt which and us there's some agreement. For although we stop here and proceed not, to a full consent: yet even this fasten's some blot and defilement upon us (now we ought to have such a care of our souls which were made after God's Image, that we keep them pure from all even from the least pollution and defilement. For it is well observed by a great author that every man is appointed by God to keep, and defend his own heart as Soldiers are sometimes appointed to defend a Castle, or Town against the enemies. If therefore without seeking of any aid, and without expecting succor from GOD he should upon the first attempt of the enemy yield up this Castle, he commits manifest treason. What then shall we say, if he should give up the Keys of this Castle before there be any assault made? now the Keys of the Castle are the thoughts. For these open the heart, and let in the devil. Certainly, he which voluntarily gives this Key to the Devil shall never be able to clear himself from guilt of treason. Now a man delivers this Key to the Devil, as oft as he gives up his thoughts into the Devils hands, or frames his thoughts to the Devils will. The rolling of the thoughts in the mind is like the turning of the Key in the Lock to open it.

Qu. 3. What delight about evil is to be accounted as sinful?

3. Ans. Not that only which comes from evil in the commission of it, or after the Commission or while we have a purpose to commit it, Pro..... 14. 10. 23. But even the simple, bare, and ineffectual complacency in an unlawful thing, although there be no purpose ever to commit it. This delight is usually called delectatio morosa not from the length of time, but from the stay of the understanding which stays, and prolongs the time in the contemplation of an unlawful thing with some pleasure. Now the reason why this delight is a sin, is because that delight is a conformity of the affection with the thing thought upon, and doth contain some approbation of it. Ro. 7. 22.

Qu. 4. Is all delight in an unlawful thing sinful?

4. Ans. Yes, if 1. It be in an unlawful thing or an evil action as its unlawful and evil, 2. If it proceed from an affection tending and inclining towards such things, or from any unlawful provocation, 3. If it be such a delight as in its own nature may have the force of a cause, or an occasion to stir up evil affections. In these three cases it cannot be doubted but such a delight is a sin▪ But if one be delighted in the thought of an evil thing not as it is evil, but as there is some natural perfection exercised, and put forth in it, without any danger of consenting to the evil, such a delight is not simply, and of its self a sin. As when one takes delight in that cunning dexterity, constancy, and courage, which appears in another, in an unjust duel: the reason is because this delight is not properly, and formally conversant about an evil thing but about a good thing.

Concerning absolute desires there's no doubt but if they be carried to things that are evil they are sinful; but concerning such desires, as are only with a condition there may be some question made.

Qu. 1. Whether is it lawful for a man to wish any evil of punishment, or misery to himself upon any condition?

5. Ans. That this is in some sort lawful appears, 1. By the example of Paul Rom. 9. 3. Who wished himself accursed for the Jews sake, 2. By the thing it self, because actually to undergo and suffer such a kind of evil is not only lawful, but expedient often upon some condition, Gen. 44. 33. 3 By reason, because to suffer evil is not of it self an evil, or a sin: if therefore the condition under which it is desired be good, the desire is good also.

Qu. 2. Whether can the desire of an unlawful thing upon a condition become lawful?

6. Ans. First, in those things which are only unlawful by man's Law such kind of desires may be lawful, because such things have no intrinsical evillnesse in them; As if I would go out of the City over the Walls when the Gates are shut, unless it were forbidden.

7. Secondly, in some things also that are forbidden, even by God's Law which have no such intrinsic evil annexed to them, but that it may in thought be abstracted & separated; such desires may be lawful by themselves, if there be no danger of an absolute consent. As if a man should say I would take such a Woman to be my Wife, if she were not too near of kin to me.

8. Thirdly, The desire to do that which is plainly, and intrinsically evil upon condition, if it were lawful and not forbidden, cannot be excused from sin. As if a man should say I would commit fornication if it were not forbidden. For our desires ought to stand at as far a distance from sin as from anything in the World, and to abhor it utterly: but in such kind of desires there doth appear some inclination, and propension to sin.

9. Fourthly, the desire to do anything which is in it self evil, unless the singular condition and state of ones life hindered it, is a sin. As if a man should think I would be revenged upon such a one if I were not a minister. Or I would keep company with such and such boon fellows, if I were not towards the Ministry. For such men do not abstain from evil simply because it is evil, but because it becomes not men of their callings or may tend more to their prejudice then to the prejudice of others.

10. Fifthly, when the condition is such an one as doth not except the evil in the action, but the danger of punishment only, then the desire is a grievous sin, and a sign of much inward wickedness. As if a man should say I would kill such an one if I might do it, and it never be known. I would play the Fornicator, or adulterer if there were no Hell: for although such a condition, or wish puts nothing in esse, (as they say) that is, in being, in respect of the thing it self, yet in the will it doth suppose an affection towards such a sin, and shows also that he which is so affected would commit those sins, if he might escape punishment.

11. Sixthly, all such conditional desires in a manner are temptations of the devil which we cannot admit without a great deal of danger.

CHAP. 21. Of the sins of the Mouth.

Question. 1. Whether if a man have conceived a sin in his Heart, is there no evil added to it by the $\langle \diamond \rangle$ of it?

1. Ans. If one do refrain from uttering with his mouth that evil which he hath in his heart, that he may the easier commit it without being hindered, then the silence it self is a sin, and tends to the aggravation of the evil which he hath conceived in his thoughts: and a much greater sin is it if he should in his words make a show of the clean contrary. Pro. 26. 24. 25. & 10 18. But if one do therefore abstain from uttering the evil which he hath thought, because it is evil and shameful, such an one stops the course of sin and doth well. Proverbs 30. 32. And if he should when he hath thought evil, proceed to utter it with his tongue, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ increaseth his sin by making it more complete then it was before the speaking.

Qu. 2. Whether is an idle word a sin?

2. Ans. 1. An idle word properly and strictly is an unfruitful word, or a word of no use, fruit, or profit. Now such a word can hardly ever proceed from deliberate reason: because reason and the will of man doth always propound unto it self some end, and some good either moral or natural: so that of necessity every word proceeding from deliberation must be either good or evil, and so no word properly and rigidly can be said to be idle.

3. Ans. 2. This notwithstanding, those speeches in Scripture are called idle Mat. 12. 36. Which are little or nothing regarded by the most, and of which they think they shall never give account. Now of these words our Savior saith there's such an account to be given before God, as that even in them there will be found matter enough, and desert enough for the inflicting of eternal Condemnation.

Qu. 3. Whether are all words uttered in jest or sport, or by way of merriment, idle and sinful?

3. Ans. They are not always idle because they have sometimes their use, at least for recreation and to make mirth. Neither are they always sinful: because they may have a lawful and honest use, Pro. 29. 9. 1 Kings 18. 27. Such kinds of jests therefore may be both good and evil as they may be used.

Qu. 4. Whether are those words sinful wherein men do make profession of some good, without any intention of performing it, James 2. 16.

5. Ans. They are sinful, and that not only in regard of the defect, because a due intention is wanting, but also in regard of the deceit and fraud which doth accompany such words and hath in some sort the nature of a lie.

Quest. 5. Whether is multiplicity of words a sin:

6. Ans. It is not of itself a sin for a man to use many words: but it is often an occasion of sin, Poverbs 10. 19.

CHAP. 22. Of sins of Works.

Quest. 1. Whether the external Work of sin joined with the internal do increase the evil of it?

1. Ans. 1. If one have an effectual will of sinning, viz. be so affected in regard of his will towards sin, that nothing hinders him from the eternal Work, but only that the occasion is wanting, such a man before God is accounted as great a sinner, as if he had performed the outward action; this appears by the contrary acts of obedience. 2 Cor. 8. 12. Heb. 11. 17.

2. Ans. 2. And yet such a sin in regard of the extension of it is made great by the external work. For as sanctification is great when it hath renewed the spirit, soul and body, then if it should reform any one part alone, 1 Thess. 5. 23. 1 Corinthians 6. 20. 2 Corinthians 7. 1. So also sin in the like manner is greater when it hath as it were invaded the body, then if it should keep possession only of the soul.

3. Ans. 3. In regard of that hurt and mischief which is done to others, either by reason of scandal, or by reason of some real discommodity, sin is made greater by the external work. 1 Sam. 25. 32. 33.

4. Ans. 4. Hence it is that some punishments are justly inflicted for the external act of some sins which are not inflicted for the internal. As a divorce is made for the act of adultery but not for the intention.

Qu. 2. Whether do those discommodities which fall out in the event of an evil work increase the sin.

5. Ans. These kinds of events may have a fourfold respect unto the will of the sinner. 1 Sometimes they are directly intended, and then they do increase the sin, in the internal nature of it whether they follow or follow not, 2. Sometimes they are foreseen, although not directly intended, as, when one seeth an innocent person like to be much indammaged by the theft which he intendeth, and then interpretatively, and indirectly they are said to be increased, and likewise aggravate the sin, 3. Sometimes they are neither intended nor foreseen, but yet they ought by some means to be foreseen and prevented: and then also they aggravate the sin, because they are in some sort presumed to be foreseen, 4. Sometimes the ignorance of them is void of sin, and then they are not imputed as sins.

Qu. 3. How is the act of sin broken off?

6. A. 1. No... by every physical interruption of the act: for if it be in a moral sense continued, the sin it self remaineth.

7. 2. Not by a simple cessation of the act of the intention or will: for that may come to pass through inadvertence, and distraction about other things.

8. The morality therefore of it is only broken off by a contrary will and resolution: and yet that breaking off is imperfect; unless there be withal such a change of the will, as is required to true Repentance.

P-WA1-6. The marrow of sacred divinity drawn out of the Holy Scriptures, and the interpreters thereof, and brought into method - Ames, William, 1576-1633.

THE MARROW OF SACRED DIVINITY, DRAWNE OUT OF THE holy Scriptures, and the Interpreters thereof, and brought into Method.

BY WILLIAM AMES, sometime Doctor and Professor of Divinity in the famous University at Francken in Friesland.

Translated out of the Latin, for the benefit of such who are not acquainted with strange Tongues. Whereunto are annexed certain Tables representing the substance and heads of all in a short view, directing to the Chapters where they are handled. As also a table opening the hard words therein contained.

A Work useful for this Season.

1. COR. 14. 26.

When ye come together, everyone hath a Psalm, hath a Doctrine, hath a Tongue, hath a Revelation, hath an Interpretation. Let all things be done unto edifying.

Published by order from the Honorable the House of Commons.

LONDON, Printed by Edward Griffin for Henry Overton in Popes-Head-ally next Lombard street. 1642.

A Brief Premonition, or forewarning of the Author, touching the reason of his purpose.

ALTHOUGH I do not assume this to myself, to comprehend in my mind all the thoughts of evil speakers, yet I foresee divers exceptions which this my endeavor (proceeding certainly from a very good intent) Proseculi genio according to the disposition of the world, will fall into; the chief of which I purpose briefly to meet withal.

Some, and those indeed not unlearned, dislike this whole manner of writing, that the sum of Divinity should be brought into a short compend. They desire great Volumes, wherein they may loosely either dwell, or wander. Whom I desire to consider, that all have not so great leisure, or so vast a wit, as to hunt the Partrich in the Mountains, and Woods: but that the condition of many doth rather require, that the nest it self, or the seat of the matter which they pursue, be shown without anymore ado.

Some do not dislike this way, if the chief heads be handled in a Rhetorical way, but they think that every particle is not so punctually to be insisted on. But indeed, when the speech is carried on like a swift stream, although it catch many things of all sorts, yet you can hold fast but a little, you can catch but a little, you cannot find where you may constantly rest: but when certain rules are delivered, the Reader hath always, as it were at every pace, the place marked where he may set this foot.

Some also there will be, who will condemn the care of Method, and Logical form as curious and troublesome. But to them a sounder judgment is to be wished, because they remove the art of understanding, judgment, and memory from those things, which do almost only deserve to be understood, known, and committed to memory.

On the other side there will not be wanting some who will require more exactness of the art of Logic, whom I could not fully satisfy if I would, through my own imperfection, neither indeed would I so much as I could, because of the weakness of others. I imagine there will not be few who will think that to set forth such institutions as these, after so many labors of learned men in the same kind, is superfluous, and but to do that which hath been done before. Of whose opinion I should readily be, if anything of this kind were extant, which did please all in every respect.

Which notwithstanding, I would not have so taken, as if it ever came into my mind to hope any such thing of this writing; but because I am not out of hope, that it may come to pass that two, or three or so, may fall upon this of ours, who may here find something more fit to instruct, and stir them up to piety, then they have observed in the more learned writings of others; which conjecture if it do not fail me, I shall think I have done a work worth the labor.

I cannot but expect to be blamed of obscurity of those that are not so skillful, whom I desire that they would learn of Cyrus,

Radiatorum 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , latis luminibus non tam esse suaves, that is, The diffused brightness of the beams of the Sun is not so pleasant in large windows; certainly a contracted light, although it may seem small, yet it doth more enlighten (if a man come near and observe) then that which is, as it were dispersed, by too much enlargement.

The dryness of the style, and harshness of some words will be much blamed by the same persons. But I do profer to exercise myself •...n that heresy, that when it is my purpose to Teach, I think I should not say that in two words which may be said in one; and that that key is to be chosen which doth open best, although it be of wood, if there be not a golden key of the same efficacy.

Lastly, if there be any who desire to have some practical things, especially here following, more largely explained, we shall endeavor to satisfy them hereafter (if God give leave) in a particular Treatise, which at this time we have an affection to, touching questions which are usually called cases of conscience.

If there be any who do yet find fault with, or desire other things, I would entreat them, that they would vouchsafe candidly to impart to me their thoughts, which may afford desired matter for a just apology, or due amendment.

To the Reader.

These words explained are not intended for the learned, but for the unlearned, whereby they may come to the understanding of this book and others of the same nature, and the rather because many sentences may depend on the opening of a word.

THE FIRST BOOK OF DIVINITY.

The first Chapter.

Of the Definition, or Nature of Divinity.

Divinity is the doctrine of living to God, John 6. 68. The words of eternal life, Acts 5. 20. The words of this life, Rom. 6. 11. Reckon yourselves to be alive unto God.

2. It is called a doctrine, not as if the name of Intelligence, Science, Sapience, Art, or Prudence were not hereto belonging; for all these are in every accurate Discipline, and especially in Divinity: but because this discipline is not from Nature and human invention, (as others are) but from divine revelation and institution. Isaiah 51. 4. Doctrine shall proceed from me, Matth. 21. 25. From Heaven: why did you not then believe him? John 9. 29. we know that God spake to Moses, Gal. 1. 11. 12. The Gospel is not according to man: for neither did I receive it from man, neither was I taught it, but by Revelation, John 6. 45.

3. The principles of other Arts being inbred in us may be polished and brought to perfection, by sense, observation, experience, and induction: but the solid principles of Divinity how ever they may be brought to perfection by study and industry, yet they are not in us from Nature. Matth. 16. 17. flesh and blood hath not revealed this unto thee.

4. But seeing every Art consists of rules, whereby some Act of the Creature is directed, and seeing life is the most noble of all acts, it (that is Divinity) cannot properly be conversant about any other thing then about life.

5. And seeing, that, that life of the Creature is most perfect, which comes nearest to the living, and life-giving God, therefore the nature of Divinity life is to live to God.

6. Men live to God when they live, according to the will of God, to the glory of God, God inwardly working in them, 1. Pet. 4. 2. 6. that he might live after the will of God; according to God. Gal. 2. 19. 20. That I may live to God: Christ lives in me. 2. Cor. 4. 10. that that life of Jesus might be manifest in our bodies. Phil. 1. 20. Christ shall be magnified in my body, whether by life or death.

7. This life, as touching its essence remains one and the same, from its beginning unto eternity. John 3. 36. & 5. 24. He that believeth in the Son hath eternal life, 1. John 〈◇〉 . 15. Life eternal remaining in him.

8. But although in this life there is contained as well to live happily as to live well, yet 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , to live well, is more excellent then 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , to live happily; and that which ought chiefly and finally to be respected is not blessedness, which respects our profit, but goodness, which is referred to God's glory. Therefore Divinity is better defined by that good life whereby we live to God, then by a blessed life whereby we live to ourselves; as it is called of the Apostle by a Synecdoche. The doctrine according to God lives, 1. Tim. 6. 3.

9. Moreover seeing this life is a spiritual act of the whole man, whereby he is carried on to enjoy God, and to do according to his will, and it is manifest that those things are proper to the will, it follows that the prime and proper subject of Divinity is the will. Pro. 4. 23. From the heart cometh actions of life. And 23. 26. Give me thy heart.

10. But seeing this life and will is truly and properly our most perfect practice, It is of it self manifest, that Divinity is practical, and not a speculative discipline, not only in that common respect, whereby other disciplines have their 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, well doing for their end, but it is practical in a peculiar and special manner and above all other.

11. Neither indeed is there anything in Divinity which is not referred to the last end, or to the means pertaining to that end: all of which kind do directly tend to Practice.

12. This practice of life is so perfectly contained in Divinity, that there is no precept universally true pertaining to living well, contained in the disciplines of household government, morality, political government or making Laws, which doth not properly pertain to Divinity.

13. Divinity therefore is of all Arts, the supreme, most noble, and the master-piece, proceeding in a special manner from God, treating of God, and divine matters, and tending and leading man to God, in which respect it may be not unfitly called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, or 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, as well as 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, that is a living to God, or a working to God, as well as a speaking of God.

CHAPTER II.

Of the Distribution or parts of Divinity.

1. There are two parts of Divinity, Faith and observance. 2. Tim. 1. 13. Hold the express form of wholesome words, which thou hast heard of me with faith and love. 1. Tim. 1. 19. Having faith and a good conscience. Psal. 37. 3. Trust in the Lord and do good. Of those parts did the Divinity of Paul consist, Acts 24. 14, 15, 16. I believe all things that are written, and have hope in God: I exercise myself to have a conscience void of offense: the same were the parts of Abraham's divinity, Gen. 15. 6. & 17. 1. Abraham believed Jehovah: walk before me continually and be perfect. The same doth Christ require of his Disciples, when besides faith he requires that they observe all things that he hath commanded, Mat. 28. 20. The same doth Paul handle, in the Epist. to the Rom. wherein tis manifest that the sum of Divinity is contained. Finally, he would that the same should be taught in the Churches, Tit. 3. 8. these things I will that thou affirm, that they that have believed God, might be careful to go before in well doing.

2. A property of this distribution (which is required in a genuine distribution of every art) is, that it flows from the nature of the object. For seeing the beginning and first act of spiritual life, (which is the proper object of Divinity) is faith, and the second act or operation flowing from that principle is observance, it necessarily follows that those two are the genuine parts of Divinity, neither is there any other to be sought for.

3. In the Old Testament (fitly for that legal and servile estate) Divinity seems sometime to be divided into the fear of God and observing of his Commandments, according to that Eccles. 12. 15. The sum of all is, fear God, and keep his Commandments, for this is the whole duty of man. But by a metonymy faith is included on the former part, as appears out of Pro. 3. 5. 7. Trust in the Lord with all thine heart: fear the Lord, and depart from evil.

4. These two parts in use indeed and exercise are always joined together, yet in nature and precepts then are distinguished.

5. They are also so distinguished in order of nature, that faith holds the first place, and spiritual obedience the latter: for there can be no vital actions brought forth, unless a principle of life be first begotten within.

CHAPTER III.

Of Faith.

1. FAith is a resting of the heart on God; as on the author of life and eternal salvation: that is to say, that by him we may be freed from all evil, and obtain all good, Esa. 10. 20. Let him lean upon Jehovah the holy one of Israel in Faith. Psal. 37. 5. Rolle thy way upon Jehovah, and trust in him, Ierem. 17. 7. Blessed is the man who trusteth in Jehovah, and whose confidence Jehovah is.

2. To believe commonly signifies an act of the understanding yielding assent to testimony: but because the will is wont to be moved thereupon, and to stretch forth it self to embrace the good. so allowed, therefore Faith doth aptly enough set forth this act of the will also, in which manner it is necessarily understood in this place. For it is a receiving, John 1. 12. As many as received him—who believe.

3. Hence Faith is carried unto that good which by it is made ours, is an act of election, an act of the whole man, which things do in no wise agree to an act of the understanding. John 6. 35. He that cometh to me, he that believeth in me.

4. Therefore although Faith always presuppose a knowledge of the Gospel, yet there is no saving knowledge in any, (and which differs from that which is found in some that shall not be saved) but what follows this act of the will, and depends upon it. John 7. 17. & 8. 31. 32. 1. John 2. 3.

5. That truly Christian Faith which hath place in the understanding doth always lean upon a Divine testimony, as it in Divine: yet this testimony cannot be received without a pious affection of the will towards God. John 3. 33. He that receiveth his testimony, hath sealed that God is true, Rom. 4. 20. He was strengthened in Faith, giving glory to God.

6. Neither yet because it is grounded only upon a testimony, is it the more uncertain and doubtful: but more certain in its own nature than any human science, because it is carried to its object under a formal respect of infallibility: although by reason of the imperfection of the habit whence Faith flows, the assent of Faith in this or that subject oftentimes appears, weaker than the assent of science.

7. Now God is the object of Faith, not as he is considered in himself, but as we by him do live well. 1. Tim 4. 10. We hope in the living God, who is the preserver of all men, especially of those that believe.

8. Christ as Redeemer is the mediate object of Faith, but not the highest, for we believe in God through Christ. Rom. 6. 11: to live to God by Christ. 2. Cor. 3. 4. we have trust through Christ to Godward, 1. Pet. 1. 21. Through him believing in God.

9. The sentences in the Scriptures or promises, do contain and present an object of Faith, and they are called the object of Faith by a Metonymy of the adjunct... The good which is propounded to be obtained, as it is such, is the end and effect of Faith, not properly the object it self.

But that, upon whose power we rest, in the obtaining of that good, is the proper object of Faith. 1. Cor. 1. 23. We preach Christ, and 2. 2. I determined to know nothing among you but Jesus Christ, 2. Cor. 5. 19. God in Christ.

10. With this Divine Faith, which looketh to the will of God and our own salvation, we must not simply believe any man, but God above, Rom. 3. 4. Every man is a liar, 1. Cor. 2, 5. that your faith consist not in the wisdom of men.

11. Therefore the Authority of God is the proper and immediate ground of all truth in this manner to be believed: whence is that solemn speech of the Prophets everywhere, the Word of the Lord. Thus saith the Lord.

12. Hence, the last resolution of Faith as it sets forth a thing to be believed, is into the authority of God, or Divine revelation. 2. Pet. 1. 20, 21. If ye first know this, that no prophecy of Scripture is of private interpretation, &c. John 2. 29. We know that God spake to Moses; As the last resolution of it as it notes the act of believing, is into the operation, and inward persuasion of the Holy Spirit, 1. Cor. 12. 3. 11. That none can call Jesus Lord, but by the Holy Spirit.

13. This Faith whereby we believe not only a God, or give credit to God, but believe in God, is true and proper confidence: not as by this word is set forth a certain and absolute persuasion of good to come, but as it signifies choosing and apprehending of a sufficient, and fit means, and such wherein such a persuasion, and expectation is founded. In which sense men are said to put confidence in their wisdom, power, friends and riches. Psa. 78. 2. They believed not in God nor trusted in his salvation.

14. This is everywhere declared in those phrases of Scripture, wherein the true nature of solid Faith is unfolded, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 To lean upon, as Isaiah 10. 20. and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Pro. 3. 5. & 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Isa. 50. 10. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Pro. 3. 5. Isa. 50. 10. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Psal. 71. 6. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Rom. 10. 11.

15. Therefore to believe in God, is in believing to cleave to God, to lean on God, to rest in God as in our all-sufficient life and salvation. Deut. 30, 20. by cleaving to him, for he is thy life.

16. Hence that general assent, which the Papists make to be Faith, is not Faith, because by their own concession, it may be without any life, James 2, 17.

17. But that special assent whereby we resolve that God is our God in Christ, is not the first act of Faith, but an act flowing from Faith: for there is no greater certainty of this truth in thee then in another, nor a truer apprehension of it in thee then another, before thou hast specially applied thyself to God by Faith, Rom. 5. 1, 2. Being justified by Faith, we have peace toward God, we glory in God.

18. Seeing also that Faith is the first act of life, whereby we live to God, in Christ it must needs consist in union with God, which an assent given to the truth concerning God can in no wise do.

19. Further also, seeing he that is about to believe out of a sense of his misery, and defect of any deliverance, either in himself, or in others, must needs cast himself upon God in Christ, as a sufficient, and faithful Savior, he cannot in any measure so cast himself by an assent of the understanding, but by a consent of the will.

20. Although in Scriptures sometimes an assent to the truth which is touching God and Christ, John 1. 50. is accounted for true Faith, yet there is a special confidence always included: and so in all places where there is speech of saving faith, either a confidence in the Messiah is presupposed, and there is only declared a determination, or application of it to the person of Christ: or by that assent confidence is set forth as an effect by its cause, John 11. 25, 26. He that believes in me shall live: believest thou this? He saith, yea Lord, I believe that thou art that Christ, that Son of God who should come into the world.

21. But whereas confidence is said to be a fruit of Faith, it is true of confidence, as it respecteth God, for that that is to come, and it is a firm hope: but as it respects God in Christ, offering himself in present, it is Faith it self; Hence arise those titles which the Scripture gives to saving Faith, that it is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Perswasion, boldness. 2. Cor. 3, 4. & 5, 6, 7, 8. Eph. 3, 12. 1. Pct. 1. 13. 1. John 5. 13, 14. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 a full persuasion. Romans 4. 21. Col. 2. 2. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 the substance, Heb. 11. 1.

22. Now whereas true Faith is of some placed partly in the understanding, and partly in the will, that is not so accurately spoken, because it is one single virtue, and doth bring forth acts of the same kind, not partly of Science, and partly of affections. 1. Cor. 13, 13. But that solid assent yielded to the promises of the Gospel is called Faith; and confidence, partly because it begetteth Faith as it is a general assent: partly because it flows from that confidence as it is a special and solid assent apprehending the actual possession of grace already obtained. For so it rests upon confidence of the heart, as a... mean, or third argument, by force whereof such a conclusion only can be inferred. E. G. He that believeth, I am sure he shall be saved. Experience also teacheth that that particular assurance of the understanding is wanting in some, for a time, who notwithstanding have true Faith lying hid in their hearts.

CHAPTER III.

Of God, and his Essence.

1. IN the former dispute, we have treated of Faith: now order requires, that we treat of God, who is the object of Faith: which that it may be somewhat more exactly done, we will first speak of the knowledge of God.
2. God as he is in himself cannot be apprehended of any, but himself 1. Tim. 6. 16. Dwelling in that inaccessible light, whom never man saw, nor can see.
3. As he hath revealed himself unto us, he is conceived as it were, by the back parts, not by the Face. Exod. 33. 23. Thou shalt see my back-parts, but my Face cannot be seen, and darkly, not clearly, that is, after an human manner, and measure, 1. Cor. 13. 12. Through a glass: darkly, after a sort.
4. Because those things that pertain to God are necessarily explained after an human manner: hence is th...t manner of speaking frequent in these matters which is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . I. E.... figure that attributes those things to God which be proper to men, as in human affections senses or members.
5. Because also they are explained after our measure, to man's capacity, hence many things are spoken of God according to the way of our conceiving, rather than from his Nature.
6. We cannot know him otherwise, so as yet to live: neither have we need to know him otherwise that we may live well, Exod. 33, 19, 20.
7. That which is revealed of God is sufficient for us, that we may live well, Deut. 29, 29. Those things which are revealed to us, and our children, forever that we may do all the words of this Law.
8. Now that which may be known of God his Sufficiency and his Efficiency Rom. 4. 21. Being fully persuaded, that he who had promised, was able to perform.
9. These two, are the Pillars of Faith, the props of comfort, the incitements of piety, and the surest marks of true Religion: proved by the place before Viz. Rom. 4. 11.
10. The sufficiency of God, is that whereby he himself hath sufficient in himself for himself, and for us: hence also is he called, Al-sufficient, Gen. 17, 1.
11. This sufficiency of God is the first ground or reason of our Faith, why we believe in him, viz. because he is able to give us life, Rom. 4. 20.

12 The sufficiency of God is in his Essence, and Subsistence.

13. The Essence of God is, that, whereby he is a being, absolutely first. Isa. 44, 6. I am the first and the last, besides me there is no God. Rev. 1. 8. & 21. 6. & 22, 13. I am Alpha, and Omega, the beginning and end, the first and the last.

14. This Essence of God is declared in his Name. Jehovah.

Now because the Essence of God is such, hence it. follows.

15. Frst, that God is one, and only one, Deut. 6. 4. 1. Tim. 2, 5. Ephes. 4, 6. 1. Cor. 8, 5, 6. Mark 12. 32. Rom. 3. 29, 30.

16. Secondly, that ⟨◊⟩ ⟨◊⟩ ⟨◊⟩ ⟨◊⟩ that is, neither from another, nor of another, nor by another, nor for another.

17. Thirdly, finally hence it is that he is void of that power which is called passive, hence he is unchangeable, Psal. 102. 27, 28. thou remainest: thou art the same. Rom. 1. 23. the glory of the Incorruptible God, James 1. 17. With whom there is no variableness, nor shadow of turning, or changing.

18. Now because this Essence cannot be sufficiently comprehended of us by one Act, it is explicated of us as if it were manifold, namely by many attributes.

19. They are called attributes, because they are rather said to be attributed to God, then properly to be in him, if they be taken as the words sound.

20. These attributes in God, are one most pure, and simple act. Hence the nature of the Divine attributes, may be rightly explained by these propositions as so many Consectaries, consequences, or conclusions.

21. First all the attributes of God are truly spoken of God, as well in the abstract as in the concrete.

22. Secondly, those attributes which are in a sort common to God with the Creatures, do in their substance belong to God in the first place, to the Creatures secondarily: although the names are transferd from the Creatures to God, and so do first agree to the Creatures.

23. Thirdly, the Divine attributes do admit no inward intention, extension, remission or imparity.

24. Fourthly, the Divine attributes are not contrary one to another, but do very well agree together.

25. Fifthly, all Divine attributes are as it were Divine perfections: yet so as that all imperfection, which accompanies such a property in the Creature, is to be removed in this application of it to God, and the perfection thereof is to be conceived with greatest eminency.

26. Sixthly, Divine attributes are in God, not only virtually, and by way of eminency, but also formally, although not in that manner, that qualities, are in the Creatures.

27. Seventhly, they are in God as in a second Essence, because they are not of the formal reason of the Divine Essence, for we conceive God to be, before we can conceive him to be just, and good.

28. Eighthly, they are distinguished, from the Essence, and among themselves, not only in reason (as they say) reasoning, but also reason reasoned, so that the foundation of the distinction is in God himself.

29. Ninthly, those attributes, which in their formal respect, include something proper to the Divine Essence, are altogether incommunicable: as Omnipotency, Immensity, Eternity, and such like.

30. Tenthly, those that are said to be communicated to the Creatures, do agree to them by likeness, not altogether in the same manner as they are in God: neither yet altogether aequivocally.

31. The attributes of God set forth, What God is, and Who he is.

32. What God is, none can perfectly define, but that hath the Logic of God himself. But an imperfect description which cometh nearest to unfold God's nature, and may be conceived of us, is such as this.

33. God is a Spirit having life in himself. John 4. 24. God is a spirit, and Chap. 5. 26. The Father hath life in himself.

34. He is called a Spirit. 1. Negatively, because he is not a body. 2. Analogically, or by a certain likeness, because there are many perfections in spiritual substances which do more shadow forth the Divine nature, then any bodily thing can.

35. He is said to be Living. 1. Because God doth most especially work of himself, not being moved by another. 2. Because the vital action of God is his very Essence. 3. Because he is the Fountain of all being; and vital operation to other living things. Acts 17. 25. 28. He giveth to all life, and breath, and all things: in him we live, move, and be.

36. He is said to live in himself, because he receiveth neither being nor life, from any, in any part.

37. Hence, the chief title of God whereby he is distinguished from all Idols, is, that he is the living God. Deut. 32. 40. Psal. 84. 23. Ierem. 5. 2.

38. Hence our Faith seeking eternal life, doth rest in God alone, because God is the Fountain of all life. John 5. 26.

39. Who God is, those properties do set forth to us whereby he is distinguished from all other things.

40. Now those Divine properties do show, How great God is, and what an one he is.
41. Under the motion of Quantity he is said to be. 1. One. 2. Infinite. First inwardly, because he is unmeasurable. Secondly, outwardly as he is incomprehensible. 3. He is said to be eternal.
42. He is said to be One, not in kind, but in that most perfect unity, which in the Creatures, is wont to be called numerical, and individual.
43. God is infinite, as he is void of all bounds of his Essence, Psal. 139, 8. If I clime up to Heaven, thou art there: or make my bed in the Grave, be hold thou art there.
44. God is unmeasurable, as he is void of all matter of dimension or measure. 1. King 8. 27. The Heavens, and Heavens of heavens do not contain thee. Isa. 66. 1. Heaven is my throne, Earth my foot-stool.
45. Hence Faith doth look for no certain measure of blessedness, to be communicated from God, but unmeasurable glory.
46. God is incomprehensible, because he is void of any bounds to compass him.
47. Hence he is present everywhere; because there is no place whence he is excluded anywhere.
48. God is also eternal, because without beginning and end. Psal. 102. 25. 26. Isaiah 44. 1. 1. Tim. 1, 17.
49. Hence it is, that our Faith doth apprehend eternal life in God.
50. What an one God is those properties do set forth by which he is said to work: unto these now ought to be attributed all the properties of Essence, and quantity, simplicity, immutability, eternity, and immensity.
51. These qualities are conceived either under the reason of faculties or else of virtues, by which those faculties are adorned.
52. The faculties are understanding & will, whence Faith doth lean upon him, who knows what is needful for us, and is willing also to supply it.
53. The understanding of God is simple without any composition, discourse or representation of shapes. Heb. 4. 13. All things are naked and open to his eyes.
54. The understanding of God is unchangeable: he knows not otherwise, nor more one thing then another, nor more before then now, or now then before. Acts 15. 18. known to the Lord are all his works, from before all ages.
55. The understanding of God is eternal: it neither beginneth nor endeth. Ibid.
56. The understanding of God is Infinite, because he perceiveth all truths, and reasons of all things. Job 11. 8. 9. The Wisdom of God is heigher then the Heavens, longer then the Earth:

deeper then the Sea. Psal. 139. 6. thy knowledge is more wonderful then that I can conceive it.

57. The same way also the nature of the Divine will ought to be conceived of us.

58. The will of God is single and only one in God.

59. The will of God is unchangeable: because he always willethe the same, and in the same manner. Psal. 33. 1. The counsel of the Lord remaineth forever.

60. The will of God is eternal; because he doth not begin to will what before he would not, nor ceaseth to will that which before he willed. Mala. 3. 6. I Jehovah change not.

61. The will of God may be said to be infinite: because it hath no outward limitation.

62. The affections which are given to God in Scripture, as love, hatred, and the like, do either set forth acts of the will, or do agree to God only figuratively.

63. A virtue is the perfection of the understanding and will, such as is wisdom, holiness, and the like in God.

64. Virtue is attributed to God, as it notes a readiness of doing: not under the respect of an habit distinct from faculty and act.

65. But the virtues which in man arise from occasion of sin and imperfection, do not agree to God, as humility, chastity, shamefastnes, and the like.

66. Out of all these attributes, that perfection of God doth result, whereby he is called blessed, 1. Tim. 1. 11. and 6. 15.

67. Hence our Faith hath a firm foundation, because it leaneth on God the possessor and author of all perfection, blessedness and glory.

CHAPTER V.

Of the Subsistence of God.

1. The Subsistence of God is that one Essence, as it is with its personal properties.

2. The same essence is common to three subsistences, and as touching the Deity, every subsistence is of it self.

3. Nothing moreover is attributed to the Essence, which may not be attributed to every subsistence in regard of the Essence of it.

4. But those things that are attributed properly to every subsistence in regard of its subsistence, cannot be attributed to the Essence.

5. The subsistences are distinguished from the Essence, as the manners of subsisting growing together with the same Essence are distinguished from the same absolutely considered.

6. They are distinguished among themselves, as Relatives by certain relative properties; so as one cannot be another; yet they are together in nature, neither can they be said to be former, or latter; but in order of beginning, and manner of subsisting.

7. But seeing those relative properties are, as it were individuating in an Essence that lives spiritually and most perfectly: therefore those subsistences are rightly called persons.

8. Now these properties are not inherent qualities, but relative affections, unto which agrees all that perfection, which is found in the like affections of the Creature, but no imperfection agreeth to them.

9. Hence tis that a relative property in God doth make or infer a person, which in the Creatures hath not the same reason.

10. Those subsistences are either breathing, as Father, and Son; or breathed, as the Holy Spirit.

11. To breath, or send forth is a relation, not such as by it self can make a person, but common to two persons.

12. The relative property of the Father is to beget, Psal. 2. 7. Thou art my Son, this day I begot thee. John 3. 16. the only begotten Son. Heb. 1. 6. The first begotten. Hence he is the first in Order.

13. The relative property of the Son is to be begotten, that is, so to proceed from the Father, that he is partaker of the same Essence, and doth perfectly resemble his nature: and hence, he is the second in order, Heb. 1. 3. The brightness of his glory, and the Character of his Person.

14. The property of the holy Ghost, is to be breathed, or sent forth, and proceed both from the Father, and the Son. John 15. 26. Whom I will send to you from the Father, that spirit of truth who proceeds from the Father, Romans 8. 9. The spirit of Christ. Gal. 4. 6. The spirit of the Son.

15. The difference between (these two) to be begotten, which agrees to the Son, and to proceed, which is proper to the holy Ghost, cannot be explained by us in proper words, but that the Son proceeds from the Father alone, and the holy Ghost from the Father and the Son, making one relative together, Or making together one relation.

16. Yet it may, in part, be shadowed out in a similitude; namely the father is as it were, Deus intelligens, God understanding: the Son the express Image of the Father, is as it were Deus intellectus, God understood; the holy Spirit flowing and breathed from the Father by the Son, is as it were Deus dilectus, God beloved.

The Son is produced as it were by an act of understanding or speaking, from the understanding, or fruitful memory of the Father: the holy Spirit is produced by an act of loving or breathing from the fruitful will of the Father and the Son. Hence the Son is called the word, Wisdom, Image, which are not affirmed of the holy Ghost. But because in the Creatures there is found the generation of a son, but there is not anything found which doth so immediately proceed from two equally perfect (as the holy Spirit proceedeth from the Father, and the Son) therefore the procession of the Son is properly designed, noted, or set down in Scripture: but neither is a special manner of proceeding, nor special name absolutely proper given to the third person. For it is truly said of the Father and the Son, that they are spirits, and holy, and the Son also proceedeth from the Father by spiritual generation.

17. The proper name of God, with his proper titles, is given in Scripture, not only to the Father, but also to the Son. Ier. 23. 6. Jehovah our righteousness, John 1, 1. The word was God, Rom. 9. 5. God blessed forever, 1. Tim. 3, 16. God manifest in the flesh, Rev. 17. 14. Lord of Lord's, and King of Kings. It is also given to the holy Spirit. Acts 5. 3, 4. that thou shouldest lie to the holy Spirit, thou hast lien unto God, Acts 28. 25. with Isaiah 6. 9. Jehovah said, the holy Ghost spake, 1. Cor. 3. 16. & 6. 19. 2. Cor. 6. 16. the Temple of God, the Temple of the spirit.

18. Divine attributes are affirmed not only of the Father, but also of the Son, Isaiah 9. 6. The most mighty God. Father of eternity, John 2. 25. He knew what was in man, and 3. 13. The son of man is in Heaven, and 8. 38. Before Abraham was I am. In like manner also of the holy Spirit, Psal. 139. 7. Whither shall I fly from thy spirit. 1. Cor. 2. 10. The spirit searcheth all things, even the deep things of God. Heb. 9. 14. the eternal spirit.

19. The proper operations of God, are attributed not only to the Father, but also to the Son, and the holy spirit. Election is attributed to the Son, Mat. 24. 31. His elect, and the eternal counsel of God is attributed to the holy Ghost. Isaiah 40. 13. Who hath weighed the spirit of the Lord as the man of his counsel, Creation, is attributed to the Son, John 1. 3. All things were made by him, and without him was made nothing that was made: Also it is attributed to the holy Spirit, Psal. 33. 6. By the Word of the Lord were the Heavens made, and all the strength of them by the breath of his mouth. Upholding, & governing of things created is attributed to the Son, Heb. 1. 3. Who upholdeth all things by that his mighty Word. Also they are attributed to the holy Spirit. Gen. 1. 2. The spirit did move upon the face of the waters. Zech. 4. 6. By my Spirit saith the Lord of Hosts; Proper Power of doing miracles is given to the Son. Act. 4. 10. Through the name of Jesus Christ, he standeth before you whole, & 9, 34. Jesus Christ he aleth thee. Its also given to the holy Spirit, Acts 2. 4. They began to speak with tongues, as the spirit gave them utterance. The communicating of spiritual life, and of all grace, in vocation, justification, adoption, sanctiand glorification, fication, is everywhere given as well to the Son & holy Spirit as to the Father, the ordaining, sending & blessing of Ecclesiastical Ministry is given to the Sonn, Eph. 4. 8. 11. He gave gifts, he gave some Apostles, &c. And to the holy Ghost, 1. Cor. 12. 11. All these worketh one & the same spirit, Act. 20. 28. The holy Spirit hath made you overseers. The very Resurrection of the flesh is ascribed to the Son, as the author, John 6. 54. I will raise him up. Also to the holy Spirit, Rom. 8. 11. He shall raise up your bodies, by his spirit dwelling in you.

20. Divine honor also, and worship is given, not only to the Father, but also to the Son, Heb. 1. 6. Let all the Angels of God worship him. And also to the holy Spirit: when his Name together with the Father and the Son, is appointed to be called upon over the Baptized. Mat.

28. 19. In the name of the Father, and Son, and holy Spirit. In like manner the Son, and Spirit is called upon, in that solemn form of salutation. The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ, and the love of God the Father, and the communication of the holy Spirit be with you all, 2. Cor. 13.

13. And whatsoever pertaineth to worship is referred as well to Christ as to the holy Spirit, in that the true worshippers of God, as they are such, are called Temples not only of God the Father, but also of Christ, Rev. 21. 22. The Lord God Almighty is her Temple, and the Lamb. 1. Cor. 3. 16. Know ye not, that ye are the Temple of God, and the Spirit of God dwelleth in you? and 6. 19. Know ye not that your body is the Temple of the holy Spirit, who is in you.

21. Finally, that authority, and majesty, which is proper to God, is given to the Son and the spirit. 1. Cor. 2. 8. The Lord of glory, 1. Pet. 4. 14. that spirit of glory. All holy prophecy is attributed to Christ and the holy Spirit. 1. Pet. 3. 19. Christ by his spirit went and preached to the spirits that are in prison. 2. Pet. 1. 21. Holy men spake being moved by the holy Spirit. Acts 28. 25. The holy Spirit spake by Isaiah the Prophet.

22. Now that the holy Spirit is propounded to us in all these as a person subsisting, it doth manifestly appear by this, that life, understanding, will and power is given to him everywhere, together with all acts proper to a person.

23, Also his distinction from the Father and the Son is clearly taught when he is called, another, sent, coming, from the Father and the Son. John 14.

24. Hence, God is the object of our Faith, is every way sufficient to impart salvation to us. For all love, grace, and the communication of those things which pertain to living well, do flow from the Father, Son, and holy Spirit, 2. Cor. 13. 13.

CHAPTER VI.

Of the Efficiency of God.

1. THE Efficiency of God is that, whereby he worketh all in all things. Eph. 1. 11. Who worketh all things. Rom. 11. 36. Of him, by him, and for him are all things.

3. That Effecting, working, or acting of God, being actively taken as they are in God acting, not really diverse from God himself. For no composition, or mutation of power and act can have place in the most simple, and immutable nature of God. Yet it addeth a certain relation of God to a real effect.

4. He worketh all in all things, because the Efficiency of all and everything, depends upon the first cause, not only as touching its substance, but also, as touching all real circumstances. Isaiah 45. 7. That I Jehovah do all these things, Lam. 3. 37. 38. Who is he that saith, and it cometh to pass, when the Lord commandeth it not? Out of the mouth of the most high proceedeth not evil and good?

Also whatsoever hath any perfection in genere moris in matter of manners, is accounted among the works of God: but not imperfection or defects, which are opposed to the subjection that is due to God.

4. In the efficiency of God shines forth both his Essence and his subsistence.
 5. That Efficiency which pertains to the Essence of God, is his omnipotency.
 6. The power of God being considered as simply powerful, is altogether the same with his sufficiency, and pertains properly to the nature of God, as it is considered under the respect of a being, and so is before the knowledge and will of God. Rom. 11. 23. for God is able to graft them in again.
 7. But power in as much as it is in execution, is in some sort after sufficiency, and pertains to the Efficiency of God, and so doth follow the knowledge and will of God. Psal. 115. 3 and 135, 6. Whatsoever he pleased he did.
 8. In these therefore this order is to be conceived, That first we conceive in God Posse, to be able, secondly Scire to know, thirdly Velle to will; Lastly, Efficere potenter, powerfully to effect, which differs from the effectual will of God, but only ration, in reason, whence is that Syllogism of Faith, which in Matth. 8. 2, 3. is distinctly explained: Lord of thou wilt, thou canst: I will. Therefore it is done. Where the argument is from the will coming to the power.
 9. Hence the very Will of God, as it is an effecting principle, hath a kind of power, Rom. 9. 19. Who hath resisted his will; neither is executive Omnipotency anything else, then the effecting will of God. Psalms 33. 9. He commanded and it was done. Revel. 4. 11. By thy will they are and were created.
 10. Therefore it is an error against the nature of God, to say, that God properly willeth to do many things, which yet by his Omnipotency he doth not. Eph. 1. 19, 20. The exceeding greatness of his power in us that believe, according to the working of his mighty power.
 11. The Omnipotency of God is that whereby, he his able to effect all things that he willeth or can will. 2. Cor. 20. 6. In thy hand is power and strength, and none can resist thee, Luke 1. 37. With God there is no word which cannot be done. Phil. 3. 21. He is also able to subject all things unto himself.
 12. Hence also God is everywhere called in the Old Testament 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 mighty God, Isaiah 9. 6. Jeremiah 32. 18. Also 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 God all-sufficient. Gen. 17, 1. & 35. 11. Ruth 1. 20. 21. And in the New Testament he is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 the Lord Almighty, 2. Cor. 6. 18. Rev. 1. 8. & 48. And the only 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Potentate, 1. Tim. 6. 15.
- Power is attributed to God actively, because he hath power to communicate something to others, such as is the power of the cause.
13. Potentia, vel potestas causae, A causing power yet properly active power doth not agree to God, as if in respect of himself, he were first idle, and after did put himself forth into act: for God is a most pure Act. James 1. 17.

14. Therefore we must not imagine such an active power in God, which is a different thing from his Essence, for the very Essence of God is this power whereby he is powerful: As the same Essence is mercy it self, whereby he is merciful.
15. But an active power agrees to God, in respect of the Creature, which is properly said to be able to receive, and prove that act of God, which before it did not feel and prove. Matthew 19.
26. All things are possible with God.
16. The Omnipotency of God is conversant about things absolutely possible, whatsoever God willeth, or can will. Ibidem.
17. It is not therefore exercised about things which are altogether 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 impossible, and do imply a certain contradiction, either in God, or in the things created, 2. Tim. 2. 13. He cannot deny himself.
18. Hence a certain distinction ariseth of Divine Omnipotency, whereby it is distinguished into absolute power, and ordinate, or actual power.
19. Absolute power is that whereby God is able to do all things possible, although they never shall be. Matth. 3. 9. God can of these stones raise up children unto Abraham, and 26. 53. Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray my Father, and he shall presently give me more then twelve legions of Angels? Mark. 10. 27. Eph. 3. 20.
20. The ordinate power of God is that whereby he not only can do that which he will, but also in very deed doth actually do, whatsoever he will. Psal. 115. 3. & 135. 6. Eph. 3. 11.
21. The manner of God's subsistence which shines forth in his Efficiency is first, the co-working of all persons; secondly, the distinct manner of the persons in working.
22. Their co-working is, that whereby they do inseparably work the same thing: for all external actions are common to all the persons, John 5. 17, 19. My Father worketh, and I work. Whatsoever he doth, the same likewise doth the Son. and 16. 13, 14. That spirit shall not speak of himself; but whatsoever he shall hear, he shall speak. He shall take of mine, and give it to you.
23. Hence every person worketh of himself, as touching the causal power which he exerciseth.
24. Hence, there is no praeeminence of dignity, in that co-working, but great unity, and identity of one, and the same cause.
25. Hence equal honor is equally due from us to all the Divine Persons.
26. The Distinct manner of working is that whereby every person doth work according to the distinct manner of his subsistence.
27. That distinct manner is partly in the order of working, partly in the bounding of the action.

28. As touching the order, the manner of working of the Father is of himself, by the Son and Holy Spirit. Hence the beginning of things, namely Creation is properly attributed to the Father, who in order of beginning is the first Person.

29. The manner of operation of the Son is from the Father by the spirit. Hence the dispensation of things is properly attributed to him, namely Redemption, & the constitution of all the offices in the Church. Ephes. 4. 11. He therefore gave some to be Apostles, some Prophets, &c.

30. The manner of working of the spirit is from the Father and the Son by himself. Hence the communication of things is attributed to the Holy Spirit, as Regeneration, Tit. 3. 5. The communication of all spiritual gifts, 1. Cor. 12. 4. And the perfection of natural things themselves, Gen. 1. 2.

31. As touching the termination of the action that works, in which the working, or manner of working of one person, doth chiefly shine forth is chiefly attributed to that person. So Creation is by a special application appropriated to the Father, Redemption to the Son, and Sanctification to the holy Ghost.

CHAPTER VII.

Of the Decree, and Counsel of God.

1. IN the powerful Efficiency of God, the Decree of God obtaineth the first place: because this manner of working, being of all most perfect, doth chiefly agree to the Divine Nature.

2. The Decree of God is his determinate purpose of effecting all things by his almighty Power, and according to his counsel, Eph. 1. 11. He doth all things according to the counsel of his own will.

3. In the Decree of God there appeareth his constancy, truth, and faithfulness.

4. Constancy is that whereby the Decree of God remains always immutable, Num. 23. 23. The strong God is not a man that he should lie, or the Son of man that he should repent, Prov. 19. 21. The Counsel of the Lord it shall stand.

5. Truth is that whereby he declares that alone which he hath decreed, Ierem. 13. 10. Jehovah is a God of truth. Rom. 3. 4. Let God be true and every man a liar.... For although his words may seem sometime to sound another thing, yet the sense of them doth always agree with the Decree.

6. Faithfulness is that whereby he effects that which he hath decreed, and as he hath decreed. Isaiah 46. 10. My Counsel shall stand, and I will do all my pleasure.

7. Every Decree of God is eternal. 1 Cor. 2. 7. Acts 15. 18.

8. To this Decree of God pertaineth Counsel. Eph. 1. 11. Acts 4. 28.

9. The Counsel of God is as it were his deliberation concerning the doing of everything in the best manner, after that it is of the understanding and will approved.

10. Counsel is given to God in respect of perfect judgment, whereby he doth all things advisedly I. E. willingly and of set purpose: not in respect of any inquisition upon which such a judgment doth depend us men. For God seeth, and willeth all and everything together. Therefore it is called, as it were deliberation, not deliberation properly so called.

11. Three things concur to the perfection of this Counsel. 1. A scope or end propounded. 2. A conceit of the mind tending towards that scope. 3. An intention, and well pleasingness of the will.

12. The scope or end of this Counsel is the glory of God himself, that is, that goodness, or perfection of God which is made manifest by his Efficiency, and shines forth in his works, Eph. 1. 6. To the praise of his glorious grace.

13. In every artificer, or one that works by counsel ad extra, outwardly, there is a platform afore hand in the mind which when he is about to work he looks into, that he may fit his work to it: so also in God seeing he worketh not naturally nor rashly, nor by constraint, but with greatest perfection of reason, such a platform is to be conceived to praeexist before in his mind, as the exemplary cause of all things to be done. Heb. 11. 3. Those things we see were made of things that do not appear.

14. The platform of all things is the Divine Essence, as it is understood of God himself as imitable by the Creatures, or so as in some sort the Image of that perfection or some footstep thereof may be expressed in the Creatures: that is, the Creatures themselves, as they are conceived in the Mind of God, are the platform or image of that nature which they have in themselves.

15. A platform in the mind of man, who attains to knowledge by Analysis or resolution is collected of things themselves: and so things are first in themselves, then they come unto the senses of men, and then to the understanding, where they can make some Idea to direct the following, operation. But because God understandeth all things by Genesis, or composition, and doth not require knowledge by Analysis, or resolution of things, therefore all things are first in his mind before they are in themselves.

16. In us the things themselves are the example, platform or copy, and our knowledge is the Image: but in God the Divine knowledge is the cobby-platform, and the things themselves the Image, or express likeness of it.

17. An Idea in man is first imprinted and afterwards expressed in the things: but in God it is only expressing properly, not impressed, because it doth not come from any other thing.

18. From this one foundation may all errors of merits and foreseen faith be sufficiently refuted. For if any Decree of God should depend properly upon such foresight, then the Idea of God should come to him from something else, which doth in no wise agree with his nature.

19. The Idea or platform, as it is absolutely considered in God, is only one, but as it includes divers respects to the Creatures, it becomes manifold; so that it is true, that the Idea of one Creature is not the Idea of another.
20. There are in God platforms of all perfections which are in the Creatures, because they proceed from the active power of God: but not of imperfections, if they be formally considered as imperfections.
21. Therefore the knowledge of evil depends upon the denying of good, as the being of evil consists in privation of good, for everything as it hath its being, so it is known.
22. Ideas as they are many, so some of them are Connexa knit together among themselves, and depend one upon another: whence also a certain order ariseth of former and latter.
23. Idea's as they are considered going before the Decree of God's Will, do represent a quiddity of things, and only a possible existence: as they are considered after the determination of God's Will, they represent the same thing, as actually to come, according to their actual existence.
24. From that divers consideration there ariseth distinction of Divine knowledge into that which is called, Knowledge of simple understanding, and knowledge of vision.
25. Knowledge of simple intelligence, is of all possible things, that is, of all and everything, which may be done by most perfect knowledge in God.
26. Knowledge of vision, is the knowledge of all future things, whether they be in their own nature, necessary, or free, or contingent.
27. These things that God knows by the knowledge of simple intelligence or mere understanding, he knows by his all sufficiency: but those things that he knows by knowledge of vision, he knows by his Efficiency, or by the Decree of his own will, Psal. 33. 15. He that frames their hearts, observeth all their works. Isa. 44. 2. Who as I, foretellet and declareth it, or ordereth it to me, from the time that I disposed the people forever: that the things to come, and which shall come to pass may be declared to them?
28. A middle knowledge by which God is feigned of some to have known before the Decree of his will by supposition, such events to come to pass, if such causes were put: seeing that it doth both determine events to come certainly to pass independantly from God's Will, and doth make some knowledge of God to depend chiefly on the object: I say such a knowledge cannot stand with the great perfection of God.
29. The Divine Idea, according to the variety of Notions, which are in the things, doth put on divers respects. In respect of the Principles, it is called intelligence whereby God perceiveth every several thing in everything: in respect of truth belonging to every several thing it is called Science, which as to the extent of it, is Omniscience: & as to that being which things have in their proper measure, is called Praescience. In respect of the dependence of truths which they have among themselves, it is called Sapience, whereby he knoweth what is convenient for everything, and what is disagreeable from it: In respect of the whole order to be appointed in practice, it is called Prudence, whereby he knows, to apply the fittest occasions to everything: Lastly, in respect of putting in practice, it is called Art. Whereby he knows to effect all things most skillfully. Heb. 11. 10.

30. Those words are often used promiscuously in the Scriptures, to explain the perfection of Divine understanding to the capacity of those, who have an understanding very imperfect; yet of their own nature they admit this distinction, and not another.

31. That conjectural knowledge which only some do give to God, about contingent things to come, doth plainly repugn the nature, and perfection of God.

Of those three things which were propounded as concurring to the perfection of God's Counsel, namely, A scope, conceived of the mind, and intention of will; The Third remains to be considered, which is called, Good pleasure.

32. The Good pleasure of God is an act of Divine will, most freely and effectually determining of all things.

33. Good pleasure indeed in Scripture doth most usually set forth the good will of God, whereby he willeth, and determineth a saving good unto his: yet because all the Counsel of God is well pleasing to him, it is rightly used by Divines to explain every Counsel of God, even according to the Scriptures.

34. This will is truly free: because whatsoever it willeth, it willeth it not by necessity of nature, but by Counsel.

35. It is most free, or chiefly and absolutely free, depending upon no other, but the freedom of the will of men and Angels by reason of that dependence which it hath on God, is less free partaking of another.

36. Freedom in those operations which are outward is not only concomitant, as it is in inward operations; but also it is antecedent by way of a principle: because that which God willeth to work outwardly, he willeth not out of necessity of nature, but of precedent choice: for there is not a necessary connection between the Divine Nature, and those Acts.

37. This will is Effectual: because whatsoever it willeth, he effecteth it in its time, neither is there anything that is not done, if he willeth it to be done. Psal. 115. 3. & 135. 6. Jehovah doth whatsoever he pleaseth.

38. Hence the Will of God is the first cause of things. Rev. 4. 11. By thy will they are, and were created. But the Will of God, as it willeth to work outwardly, doth not presuppose the goodness of the object, but by willing doth make the object. James 1. 18. Because he would, he begat us, Rom. 9. 18. He hath mercy on whom he will.

39. Therefore there is no cause properly so called, to be given of God's Will.

40. Hence it is rightly said, that God doth will one thing to exist for another: but not that that one thing is a proper cause whereby the Will of God is inwardly moved to appoint that other thing. So God would that the Sun and stars should exist, for the generation, conservation, and corruption of things below: yet the Sun and Stars, are not a cause why God would that those things should be generated, conserved, and corrupted. And so it is in all things out of God, which indeed among themselves are causes and effects, even as they depend upon the Divine will, but there is no cause of God's Will out of it self.

41. Also the willing of one thing in God, is not properly a cause effecting that he will another thing in himself, because the Efficiency of a cause upon an effect, and dependence of the effect upon a cause, cannot be in the Will of God, which is God himself, truly and simply willing all things together and at once, with one only act; yet it is true that the Schoolmen say, that a passive attingency of the Divine will in respect of one thing, is a cause of a passive attingency in respect of another: and so in this sense it is truly and piously said, that God willeth someone thing, because he willeth another.

42. Therefore although he willeth many things which will not follow but upon some antecedent act of the Creature, yet the very act of willing in God doth not properly depend as a consequent thing upon the act of the Creature. Neither is it lawful under the appellation of an Antecedent will, to give unto God that imperfect will which is called Velleitas, a woulding in the Schools. For it doth not agree to an Omniscient, Omnipotent, and infinitely, blessed Nature.

43. Wherefore that opinion which determines that God doth will something antecedently to the act of the Creature, which same thing afterwards he willeth not towards them, but wills another thing, is not to be admitted: because it makes the Will of God mutable and depending upon the act of the Creature, so that as often as the act of the Creature is changed, so often also it is changed.

44. By that opinion also, that form of speech prescribed in the Word of God wherein we commit ourselves and all ours to God, as I will do this, or that, if God will, should not be used in all things, but turned contrarily, God will do this or that, if man will.

45. This will determines of all things, greatest, least, contingent, necessary, free, without exception: This the Scripture shows of all kind of things: as of Christ Jesus to be glorified, and the Church to be saved by him. Psal. 2. & 110. 1. & 40. 7, 8, 9. Heb. 7. 16. 21. Eph. 5. 25. 2 Tim. 1. 9. Of Pharaoh. Exod. 1. 3. Where God did so dispose all things, that he might move Pharaoh to persecute and overthrow the people of Israel; nay he hardened him, that he might persecute them: yet Pharaoh, and Israel did work freely. In like manner of the selling of Joseph, wherein all things happened freely, and contingently, God determining of it according to his Will. Of the very heart of man. Psal. 33. 15. 1 Sam. 10. 9. 26. Prov. 21. 1. Of a man killing another by chance. Exod. 21. 13. Of the Lot cast into the Lap. Prov. 16. 33. Of little Sparrowes falling to the ground: Of all the hairs of a man's head. Matthew 10. 29. 30. Of the Lilies, Flowers, and Grass of the Earth, Matthew. 6. 28. 30. Finally, of all created things. Job 38. Psal. 104. Isaiah. 45. 7. Ierem. 14. 22.

46. If God should not determine of all things, his Will should not be simply & universally the first cause: and therefore they that think the contrary, must of necessity either make two first beginnings, or more then two, which is very far from all truth.

47. But there is not the same reason of will as there is of Divine knowledge and power, for knowledge knows all things that may be known, and power can do all possible things, and they are stretched forth together beyond those things which actually have been, are, and shall be: but by his Will he willeth not all things he can will, but all things which he judgeth to be willed, and therefore actually to be hereafter: whence it is that although God may be called, Omniscient, and Omnipotent, yet he cannot be called Omnivulent.

48. Whatsoever God willeth in all these things, he is universally effectual: so as he can in no wise be hindered, or frustrated, whereby he cannot obtain what he wills. For if he should properly will anything, and could not obtain it, he should not be most perfect and blessed.

49. Yet the Will of God doth not infer a necessity upon all future things, but a certainty only as touching the event. So it could not be as to the certainty of the event, that the bones of Christ should be broken, because God would that they should not be broken: yet there was no necessity imposed upon the Soldiers Speares, and other second causes which were present.

50. Nay it is so far off, that the will of God, which doth most certainly attain to whatsoever it willeth, doth urge all things with hard necessity, that it is the prime root, and efficient cause of all that contingency, and freedom, which is in things: because it doth effectually foreordaine such effects to follow of such causes.

51. In those things which God Willeth there is a certain order conceived, namely that first he Willeth the end, before the means to the end, because he worketh by most perfect reason: and among means, he first Willeth those things which come nearest to the end: for that which is first in order of execution, that is last in order of intention, and so contrarily.

52. This Will of God, is, partly hidden, and partly revealed. Deut. 29. 29.

53. Those means by which this Will is revealed, are rightly called the Will of the sign, not only metaphorically, because they declare among men what they would have, but also metonymically, because they are either effects, or adjuncts, partly declaring the proper Will of God.

54. There are five signs put in that old verse. Praecipit, & Prohibet, Permittit, Consulit, Implet: He commandeth, and forbiddeth, Permitteth, Counselleth, fulfilleth: but because counsel is all one with a command; instead of it, it should be better to put in Promittit, He promiseth.

Thus far in general of God's Efficiency, which together with his Sufficiency, doth make a fit, and adequate object of Faith. The kinds of it do follow.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of Creation.

1. The Efficiency of God, is either Creation or Providence.
2. Creation is the Efficiency of God whereby he made the World of nothing, in the beginning very good.
3. Active Creation is conceived, by the manner of a transient action, in which there is always an Object presupposed about which the agent is exercised, yet it is not formally, transient but only virtually; because it doth not presuppose, but make an Object.
4. Passive Creation is conceived by the manner of mutation, which is improperly called mutation.
5. Creation respects the whole world, that is, whatsoever doth exist besides God.
6. Hence, both all things which exist besides God are created, and they are altogether created, that is, as well according to matter, as according to form. Rev. 4. 11. Because thou hast made all things. Col. 1. 16. For by him were made all things which are in Heaven, and which are in Earth, visible and invisible.
7. Creation doth produce Originally, because it produceth a being, not only as it is a being, but also absolutely in every part.
8. Therefore before the Creation, the Creatures had no real being either of existence, or Essence, although they had a known being from eternity in the knowledge of God.
9. Creation then produceth out of nothing, that is, out of matter that doth not praeexist, that hath a being before, but co-exist, that hath a being together with the thing created: For there was nothing from eternity besides God, neither is God the matter or part of any Creature, but only the efficient cause.
10. Indeed some things are said to be created, whose matter did pre-exist: but then Creation respects not only that immediate action, whereby it comes to pass that such things are; but also a mediate action, whereby it comes to pass that the matter it self should exist of which they are formed: so it was in the Creation of plants and living Creatures, Genes. 1. 20.
11. That nothing, or not being of things, did go before their being: not only in order of nature, for so they might co-exist with God from externity: but also in order of duration, continuance, according to our manner of conceiving.
12. Hence that beginning in which God is said to create the world, was the end of that duration which nothing had, and the beginning of that which a the world had.
13. Therefore God would by the Creation, both show forth his perfection, that he did not need any Creature or outward thing; for then he had created the world as soon as he could. And also his freedom whereby he brought forth all things without natural necessity, for if he had created necessarily, he had done it from eternity. Rev. 4. 11. Psal. 115. 3.
14. The world neither was made from eternity, neither could be created from eternity, in that disposition, and order of things, which now it hath.

15. That day had not been, if infinite days ought to have gone before, for those days going before had never been ended, that that might succeed them.
16. Hence also it followeth that no Creature was, or could be a cause either instrumental, or principal in the act of Creation.
17. Every thing created was very good, because it was made neither rashly, nor in vain, but unto the end which the Maker did attain unto. Gen. 1. 31. Whatsoever he made was very good. 1 Tim. 4. 4. Whatsoever God made is good.
18. Goodness of a thing created is that perfection whereby it is fit to the use it serves for: Now that use is particular, or universal.
19. The Particular is that proper operation to which anything serves in its proper nature.
20. Universal use, is the ordaining of one thing with others, for the perfection of the Universe or whole. Psal. 104. & 148. Isaiah. 40. 13.
21. By this goodness all created things in their natural manner tend to God from whom they came. For the second being is from the first, and for the first. Hence those phrases. From him, through him, and for him are all things. Rom. 11. 36.
22. Now natural things tend unto God. 1. In that they declare God's Glory. Psal. 19. 1. 2. That they give occasion to us to know, and seek God, Rom. 1. 20. Acts 17. 26. 3. In that they sustain our life, that we may live well unto God. 1 Cor. 10. 31. 1 Tim. 4. 3. 4.
23. Time doth co-exist or hath a being together with all natural things, as appears in that phrase in the beginning: for then was the beginning of time.
24. Place also doth co-exist, that is, a certain space, wherein the extension of the Creature is bounded. Genes. 1. 22.
25. But these are not properly created, but concreated, or annexed, knit to the things created: because they have not an absolute, but only a relative entitie or being.
26. Because God created all things of nothing, therefore our faith rests in him against hope, under hope, for those things which are not, as if they were. Rom. 4. 17. 18.
27. The Creation of the world is distributed according to the parts of the world: for although the world be one, by unity of aggregation, order, and end; yet it consists of parts, distinguished not only according to the situation, but also according to the Essence, and Existence.
28. But the Creation of these parts of the world, was not altogether and in one moment, but it was finished by parts succeeding one another, in the space of six days.
29. Creation then is of the parts of the world, that are either immediately perfect, or mediately, Psal. 33. 6. Heb. 11. 3. Gen. 2. 7. 19. 22.

30. Creation of things immediately perfect is, that whereby things were made having their principles, both material and formal, at the first ingenerated in them, and that in a complete existence.

31. Hence those Creatures of themselves are subject to no essential change; as generation, or corruption.

32. The parts immediately perfect are the highest Heaven, and the Inhabitants of it the Angels.

33. The highest Heaven, is the dwelling-place of God's holiness, full of all things which pertain to eternal blessedness: where the Majesty of God doth present it self to be seen as it were Face to Face. 1 Cor. 2. 8. Marc. 12. 23. 1 Cor. 13. 12.

34. It is called the third Heaven, Empyreum fiery, The Heaven of Heavens, and Paradise. 1 Kings 8. 27. Mat. 18. 10. Marc. 12. 25. 2 Cor. 12. 2. 4.

35. This Heaven is meant. Gen. 1. 1. Heb. 11. 10. 16.

36. Angels are Spirits of primary perfection, created to minister unto God.

37. That Angels were created appeareth, Col. 1. 16. Psal. 14. 8. 5. That they were created the first day with the highest Heaven, appeareth. 1. From the likeness of nature, that they have. 2. In that they are said to have as it were applauded God in the Creation of other things. Job 38. 7. 3. In that they are Spirits. Heb. 1. 14. Luc. 24. 39. Ministers of God. Heb. 1. 7. 14. Of chief perfection, and of an immortal nature. Luke 20. 36.

38. Hence the Angels do so excel in clear seeing reason, that they are said to be as it were, full of eyes, presently discerning what God would have done by them, and how it is to be done: And in liberty of will, that they perform their offices with diligence, Psalms 103. 20. And in perfection of strength, that they are able to do great things. 2 Peter. 2. 11. And in greatest agility, that as if they had wings, they do swiftly dispatch that which they have in Commission. Ezech. 1. 6.

39. Their Ministry is to celebrate the Glory of God; and to execute his commands. Psal. 103. 20. Especially about those who shall be heirs of eternal life. Hebr. 1. 14. Psalm 91. 11. & 34. 8.

40. They were created sound in holiness, and righteousness, Lu. 9. 26. John 8. 44. Jude 6. 2. Pet. 2. 4.

41. In number they are very many, unto ten thousand times ten thousand. Dan. 7. 10. Hebr. 12. 22. Mat. 26. 53. They are distinguished among themselves, in respect of their Offices, & Objects, about which they are exercised. Ephe. 1. 21. And they are under the command of God and Christ only.

42. By the Creation God is known, but not God the Father, Son and Holy Spirit, because that effecting power whereby the world was created, pertains to the essence of God, and not to his personal subsistence.

43. Creation of the parts of the World mediately perfect, is whereby things were made of principles, that did exist before.

44. Hence those Creatures are subject to change and corruption.

45. Those things that were mediately perfect have a double existence; first a rude and incomplete, then afterwards a complete, distinct, and beautified existence.

46. The rude and incomplete existence of things was in that mass which in the beginning was created, without form, void, and involved in darkness, which is called Earth, Waters, the Deepe.

47. It is said to be without form; not because it had no form, but because it neither had beauty, and ornament, nor a complete act of those forms which were afterwards to proceed out of it.

48. In the constitution of the complete existence of things, two things are chiefly to be respected; Namely, the manner, and order.

49. The manner of constitution contains four things. 1. The command of God producing everything: Let be, or let this or that be done: wherein the power of God shines forth, that by his only word or will he did all things. Psal. 33. 9. Psal. 115. 3. 2. His approbation acknowledging the same thing brought forth as good, God saw that it was good. Hence the goodness of God shines forth, that he produced all things to a good end and use. Psal. 19. 2. 3. His ordination assigning to everything his use; Let it be to this or that end. Hence the wisdom of God shines forth whereby he hath assigned several uses to everything, in a most fit way. Ier. 10. 12. & 51. 15. He made the Earth by his power, he stablished the habitable World by his wisdom, and stretched out the Heavens by his prudence. 4. The establishing of a Law, and order, perpetually to be observed in that thing, which is also joined with ordination. Hence the constancy of God shineth forth, that he would have all Creatures to observe their order, not for some days, or years, but to the end of the world.

50. These former are not severally expressed in some kind of things; because their imperfection depends upon the perfection of other things: yet in common reason they do equally agree to all.

51. The order of constitution was thus: In the first day after the bringing forth of the highest Heavens, the Angels, and the unshapen Mass, the subtilest part of that Mass being called forth upward, there was made light, that is, shining fire.

52. On the second day, Of that part which in subtlety came nearest to the former there was made Air.

53. On the third day, the parts of the Mass were so distributed, that the Waters being gathered, in their channels, of that part which was for the greatest, the Sea was by it self, and the Earth appeared adorned with Herbs and Trees.

54. On the fourth day, The Luminaries of Heaven were made, to give light upon the Earth.

55. On the fifth day, Fishes, and Birds, that dwell in the air and water were brought forth.

56. On the sixth day, were brought forth all Terrestriall living Creatures, first the brutish Creatures, and then afterward man: and so the Heavens and Earth were perfected, and all the Hosts of them.

57. In this order the wisdom, power and goodness of God doth greatly shine forth.

58. His wisdom. 1. In that the simple elements were first created before things elementary or concrete, and compounded. 2. In that among simple things the more perfect were made first, which come nearest to the nature of God. 3. In that those things were first created which only have being: then those which beside being have also life: then those that beside being and life, have also sense: then last of all, those things which beside being, life and fence, have also reason. 4. In that in simple things, there was a progress from things more perfect to things less perfect, but incompound things from things less perfect to things more perfect, from plants to men.

59. The power of God shined forth in that he first created the Plants, Herbs and Trees, before the Sun, and Stars, which are wont to be causes in their producing.

60. The goodness of God shined forth in that he created dwellings, before inhabitants, food before living Creatures, those things which should be useful for man, before man himself.

61. Man as he was the last of the Creatures, so was he the Compendium, abridgement of all Creatures, both immediatly and mediately perfect, partaking the nature of the one, in his soul, and of the other in his body.

62. He was the end of the Creatures mediately perfect, and so in God's-intention respected in them, and above them.

63. Hence he is said to be created in another manner then the other Creatures: for they were brought forth by a word only: let there be light, let there be a firmament. But man was brought forth as it were with greater counsel, and deliberation: Let us make man. Gen. 1. 26.

64. For the body was first prepared, and afterward the soul was inspired. Gen. 2. 7. The body of Elementary matter, but the soul was produced of no matter being before, but immediately by the power of God.

65. The Excellency of man was placed chiefly in this, that he bore the Image of God.

66. Three things are required to make an Image. 1. That it be like. 2. That it be express, and framed to imitate another thing as an exemplar, or copy. 3. That that likeness be either in its specifiall nature, or most noble perfection.

67. Hence it is, that in the inferior Creatures the Image of God is not properly found; but only a shadow, and footstep of it.

68. But in man the proper reason of an Image is found, yet not perfect, which is only in the Son of God. Col. 1. 15. Hebr. 1. 3. But imperfect, not with a privative we, but negative imperfection.

69. This Image then is a conformity of man, according to his measure, to the highest perfection of God.

70. All this Image was natural to man, but in a different respect, for it was partly the very nature of man, partly it flowed from the principles and perfection of nature, and partly it was due to nature in a certain manner.

71. The Image of God in man was partly inward, partly outward. The inward, was the perfection of body and soul.

72. The perfection of the body is that whereby it was absolutely fitted for comeliness and use agreeable to God's Will. Gen. 2. 25. Rom. 6. 13.

73. The perfection of the soul was that whereby it was of an immortal nature, not only in those faculties by which it was a free principle of its own actions, in understanding and will, but also being adorned with gifts whereby man was made able, and fit to live well, namely with wisdom, holiness, and righteousness. Eph. 4. 24. Col. 3. 10.

74. The External perfection of man was his Dominion over other Creatures, whereby he might use them freely to God's Glory, and his own necessity, Genes. 1. 26. and 2. 19. 20.

75. Hence the tilling of the Earth, and getting of food out of the Plants of the Earth, was committed to him. Gen. 2. 25.

76. Hence was the coming of the Creatures to him as to their Lord, and names by him put on them, as by their Lord. Gen 2. 19.

77. Hence he was placed in the Garden of Eden as in his Palace. Gen. 2. 19.

78. In all those things joined together the perfection of man was complete: and from that perfection, a certain Image of God, or of Divine perfection did arise.

79. This Creation of man, was, of the Male, and Female, both of them of nothing, as touching the soul. The body of the Male, of the Earth, mingled with other Elements. The body of the Woman, of the Male, and for the Male, that nothing might be wanting to his well being. 1 Cor. 11. 8. 9.

80. From the consideration of the Creation our Faith ascendeth above all the order of nature, and apprehends the light of the Glory of God, to be shown forth in the Face of Jesus Christ, because it is God, who commanded the light to shine out of darkness. 2 Cor. 4. 6.

CHAPTER IX.

Of Providence.

1. The Providence of God is that Efficiency whereby he provides for his Creatures now made, in all things, according to the counsel of his own Will.
2. This Providence is extended to all things, not only common, but proper. Psal. 145. 15. 16. Prov. 16. 9. 33. Exod. 21. 13. Being properly determined of no cause, but determining all causes: and hence in their manner it is the universal and particular cause of all things.
3. The Providence of God is either immediate, whereby God by himself, as the absolute sole cause provides for things, or mediate, whereby he provides by the use of means.
4. God doth all things that come to pass immediately, both by reason of his power, in respect of all being, which is found in the effect, (for the power of God attains to every effect. Deut. 8. 3. Isaiah 28. 26.) and also by reason of the subject in respect of that being it hath as it is a being: for God himself who is always and everywhere present immediately and inwardly, doth work that in all things also.
5. Yet in respect of those things upon which second causes have their influence by force of their own proper form, God is not said to work, immediately, but mediately, because he worketh by the means of subjects and virtues of second causes:
6. God therefore useth means, not for want of power, but through the abundance of his goodness: that namely he might communicate a certain dignity of working to his Creatures also, & in them might make his efficiency more perceivable. 1 Sam. 14. 7. Tis all one to Jehovah to save with many, or with few. Hence God doth often use those means, to produce the most noble effects, which of themselves, have no aptness to bring forth such effects. 1 Cor. 1. 27. 28. Amos 5. 9. 2. Chr. 24. 24. Also he doth often make the most fit means, ineffectual. Psal. 33. 16. & 127. 1. 2. Hos. 4. 10.
7. Hence our Faith doth not properly respect those means which God useth, neither depends on them, but on God only, who can relieve all our necessities either with means, or without means, as it seems good to him. Dan. 3. 17. Our God whom we worship is able to deliver us out of the hot fiery Fornace, and out of thy hand, O King.
8. The Providence of God is either Ordinary and usual, or Extraordinary and unusual.
9. The ordinary providence is whereby God observeth that order in things which was appointed from the beginning. The reason of which order requires, that some certain thing go before, and from that being put, some certain thing follow after. Hos. 2. 22. I will hear the Heavens, and they shall hear the Earth, and the Earth shall hear the Corn, and the Wine, and the Oil, and they shall hear Israel.
10. That order in natural things is the Law of nature, common to all things or the very nature of things, as it is stablished in a certain order, arising from the force and efficacy of that never to be revoked Word of God given in the beginning: Let it be made, let it be, be it so, which expressing the respect of a thing to come doth signify perpetuity and constancy, and by its virtue doth effect all things which do usually come to pass of the samthings. Ier. 31.

35. 36. The statutes of the Moon, and of the Stars, &c. and 33. 20. My Covenant of the day and my Covenant of the night.

11. Extraordinary providence is that whereby God provideth for things beyond the usual, and appointed order of them, in which manner whatsoever is effected, is by a metonymy of the effect called a Miracle.

12. A Miracle is an operation above the order appointed whence true Miracles do always give evidence of the omnipotency of the doer. Hence God only is the Author of true Miracles.

13. Men may-be moral causes of Miracles, as they obtain this of God that he would do them, or as God useth their help as a sign, or token of a Miracle to be done by him, yet they cannot be causes really efficient, nor indeed, instrumental, much less principal.

14. The Providence of God is either conservation or gubernation.

15. Conservation is that whereby God maketh all things, both universal, and singular, both in their Essence and existence, and in their strength, to persist, and continue. Psal. 104. 19. 20. Acts 17. 28. Heb. 1. 3. Which is of Schoolmen, not unfitly called Manutenentia Dei, God's holding in his hand, because by it God doth sustain all things as with his Hand.

16. This conservation doth necessarily come between Creation, and government of things created: because whatsoever is created, is created to some end, and use, to which also it ought to be directed and governed: but it cannot attain that end, nor be directed to it, unless it be continued and conserved in its being.

17. God's conservation is necessary for the Creature because the Creature doth every way depend upon the Creator, not only as touching its Fieri. i. being to be made, but also touching its Esse, existere, permanere, & operari. i. Being, Existence, Continuance, and operation: so that every Creature should return into that nothing whereof it was made, if God should not uphold it, and the very cessation of Divine conservation, would without any other operation presently reduce every Creature into nothing. Psalm 104. 29. If thou hidest thy Face, they are troubled, if thou takest away their breath they die, and return to their dust.

18. Some things are conserved immediately, namely such as are subjected unto God only. This conservation is in very deed the same with Creation, differing only in reason, in that Creation includes a certain newness which conservation excludes, & Creation excludes a precedent existence which conservation includes, so that that conservation is nothing else then as it were a continued Creation, and therefore it is joined with Creation. Neh. 9: 6. Thou hast made, and thou preservest all these things.

19. Gubernation is that whereby God directeth and leadeth all his Creatures to their proper ends. Psal. 29. 10. Jehovah sits King forever.

20. The government of all things ought to be of God. For they would never certainly attain the end to which they were created, unless they were governed by the same power, by which they were created: and it proceeds from imperfection, when he leaves the work that he hath made, to be directed by another afterward.

21. This Gubernation includes intrinsically, not only means convenient and fitting to the end, but also their certain efficacy, or the attainment it self. The order therefore of this government is certain, immovable, and indissoluble, so that the Creature cannot wholly withdraw it self from all order of government, although it may decline from its particular order. Gen. 50. 20.

22. This government is common or special.

23. Common is that whereby God doth govern all things in a like manner, unto this government belongeth, First, The Law of nature common to all things, which is a certain participation of the Law, and Will of God, put into all things from the beginning. Job 38. 12. Hast thou commanded the morning, and made known to the day-spring his place, &c. Secondly, a natural inclination, which is a principle of working according to that law, Job 5. 7. The sparks fly upward. Thirdly, a natural instinct: which is a peculiar stirring up of the living Creatures, to some more noble acts, with a certain show and print of reason. Pro. 6. 6. Go to the Pismire, O sluggard, behold her ways and be wise. And 30. 24. These four are small upon the Earth, but they are exceeding wise, the Ants, the Mise, the Locusts, the Spiders, Ierem. 8. 7. The storke, the Turtle, the Crane, and Swallow observe the times of their coming. Fourthly, A certain obediencial power, whereby all Creatures are apt to obey the command of God. Psa. 103. 21. & 148. 8. Doing his pleasure, fulfilling his Word.

24. This government shines forth in the operation of all things, first in that they always look to some certain end, and so it is necessary that they be acted and governed by an intelligence everywhere present, and omnipotent, that is, of God himself. Job 38. 27. In sending down rain to satisfy the wast place, and bringing forth the bud of the tender Herb, Isaiah 55. 10. The rain causeth that the Earth bring forth feed to the sower, and bread for him that eateth. Secondly, In that the works of nature are ordained so accurately, and agreeable to reason, that they cannot but proceed from highest reason. Prov. 30. 25, 26, 27. 28. Thirdly, in that besides a proper ordination whereby everything seeks his own perfection, they do keep as it were a common society and all do more desire the conservation of the whole then of themselves, as it is to be seen in heavy things which are carried upward to avoid an emptiness.

25. By force of this Gubernation all second causes, are in a certain manner determined afore, that is, First, they are stirred up, to work, by an influence, or previous motion, in regard that (beside the communicating of strength, and sustentation of the same) there is some such thing required necessarily to bring forth that into act which before was in the power of the Creature. Secondly, they are applied to a certain object, about which they are exercised in working. Ezech. 21, 21, 22: &c. 2. Sam. 16. 10. Also by force of the same government they are ordered, that is, 1. Limits, and bounds are set to their actions: Job 1. 12. & 2, 6. & 38, 10, 2. Some good is drawn out of their action, Gen. 50. 20.

26. Because the exercise of that strength which is in the Creatures depends upon the Will of God; hence it is that we trust in God alone, & not in those Creatures, by which the kindness of God is derived to us.

CHAPTER X.

Of special Gubernation about intelligent Creatures.

In the former disputation common Gubernation was handled: now follows special Gubernation.

1. SPeciall Gubernation is that whereby God doth govern reasonable Creatures in a special manner.
2. The special condition of those Creatures doth cause the difference. For seeing they are in some sort immortal, and created after the Image of God, and have an inward principle of their own actions proceeding from counsel, therefore they are to be governed to an eternal state of happiness or unhappiness, and that agreeably to counsel, and freedom.
3. Yet this special Gubernation doth not conclude that real Gubernation of the reasonable Creature, which is common to all Creatures, but is added to it.
4. This moral government consists in teaching, and fulfilling according to that that before he hath taught Micah. 6. 8. He hath shown thee O man what is good Deus. 30, 15. Life and good: Death and Evil. Hither to properly pertaineth that revealed Will of God which is the rule of doing as touching manners, to the reasonable Creature. God governs by teaching, partly in making a Law, partly in establishing it.
6. A Law is made by commanding, and forbidding.
7. A Law is established by promising, and threatening.
8. God governs by fulfilling, when he performs those things he hath taught. Ierem. 32. 19. Thine eyes being open do look unto all the ways of men, that thou mayest give to everyone according to his ways, and according to the fruit of his doings.
9. From this special and proper way of governing reasonable Creatures, there ariseth that covenant, which is between God and them. For this covenant is as it were a certain transaction of God with the Creature, whereby God commandeth, promiseth, threateneth, fulfilleth, and the Creature doth tie it self in obedience to God thus covenanting. Deut. 26. 16, 17, 18, 19. This day Jehovah thy God commandeth thee. &c. Thou hast avouched this day the Lord to be thy God, &c. Jehovah hath avouched thee this day, &c. To make thee high, &c. And that thou mayest be an holy people, &c.
10. Now because this way of entering into covenant is not between those that are equal, but between Lord and servant. Therefore it portaines to government, whence also it is most properly called not the covenant of man, but of God, who is the author, and chief Executor of it. Deut. 8. 17. 18. That he may perform his covenant.

11. By virtue of this covenant the moral works of the intelligent Creature, whilst he is in the way, have always a respect, either to happiness as a reward, of to unhappiness as a punishment: but in the last there is meriting, but in the other not.
12. Hence the proper and highest difference of a good work and sin doth flow, namely in that a good work is an operation expecting happiness of another by way of reward: as by the opposite privation of it, evil works are made in their kind extremely evil.
13. Hence ariseth the force & reason of conscience, which is the judgment of an intelligent Creature of it self, as he is subjected to God.
14. Special government of the reasonable Creature is of Angels and men.
15. Special government of Angels, is either a special prescription, or ordering the event that follows upon it.
16. This was the same Law as touching the substance, with the moral Law which is contained in the Decalogue.
17. Yet those in the Decalogue are to be excepted which either pertain to the nature of man's body, or the condition of this mortal life, which take no place in them, as many things of propagation pertaining to the seventh precept. Matth. 22. 30. Also many things pertaining to the fifth precept, of subjection of inferiors of their superiors, in like sort some things belonging to the eighth precept of every ones getting of food in his vocation: finally many duties of the second and fourth Commandment to be performed to men.
18. The ordering of the event, was in some, a preservation to persist in obedience. Hence it is that they were confirmed in good, and endowed with full happiness, so that they do immutably cleave to God, with perfect obedience, and fullness of glory. Whence those Angels are called elected. 1. Tim. 5. 21. Good and holy, Luc. 9. 26. Blessed also, and Angels of light. 2. Cor. 11. 14.
19. In others, the ordering of the event was a permission, whence it is that they abusing their liberty did fall into Apostasy.
20. Hence it is that from that time they were obstinate, in evil, and condemned to extreme misery. Iud. 6. 2. Pet. 2. 4. Whence the evil Angels, are called impure spirits, and angels of darkness. Luke 8. 2. & 9. 42:
21. In that different ordering, there doth manifestly appear the election of some Angels, and reprobation of others, by God's free counsel, and good pleasure.
22. Touching the time of the fall of Angels, it doth only appear, that it was before Adams fall.
23. Touching the kind of their sin which was first committed by them, it is most like that it was pride.
24. Touching their punishment the Scripture witnesseth that it is not yet inflicted in the highest degree, but to be inflicted in the end of the world. Matth. 25; 41. 1. Cor. 6. 3.

Thus much of the government of Angels.

The government of Man follows.

25. In the special government of men, Two things are to be observed, as in the government of Angels, namely prescribing a Law, and ordering the event that would thence follow. Yet there is not the same reason of all on either side.

26. In prescribing a Law there is like reason. 1. In that the Law prescribed to Men and Angels, was the same as touching the Essence of it: namely moral, the sum whereof is in the Decalogue. 2. In that that it was written in the heart by way of habit, wherein the first reason of conscience is placed, which is called Syn...ercsis. Rom. 2, 15.

27. But the similitude, and difference is divers. For, First, The principles indeed of this Law are common to Angels and Men, but many secondary conclusions are only proper to men: as of Parents, marriage, meats, and the like.

28. Secondly, seeing man is of a more imperfect nature than Angels, and so needs more instruction and exercise: therefore there was added to the Law of nature a certain positive thing, otherwise of the same reason with it: as the sanctifying of the seventh day.

29. Thirdly, because Man in this animal life doth understand by senses, and so is as it were led by the hand from sensible things to intelligible and spiritual, therefore unto that spiritual Law there were added unto Man outward Symboles; and Sacraments, to illustrate, and confirm it. And in these Symboles, there was contained, both a certain special, and positive Law, & a prosession of general obedience to the Law of nature before put into him and also a confirmation of that solemn sanction of the Law, which did consist of promises, and threatenings.

30. Fourthly, because Adam was the beginning of mankind, out of whom all Men were to be derived, therefore a Law is given to him not only as one private person, as was done in the Angels, but also as a public person, or the head of man's nature, from whom all good and evil was to be derived to his posterity. Acts 17. •...6. Rom. 5, 18, 19. 1. Cor. 15. 21. 22.

31. Fifthly, in the sanction of this Law, there was contained a promise, of continuing animal life, and of exalting it afterward to spiritual, as also a threatening of bodily death which had no place in the Angels.

32. This interpretation being had, the Law and covenant of God with man in the Creation was, Do this, and thou shalt live: If thou do it not, thou shalt die the death. In which words there is first contained a precept, Do this. 2. a promise joined to it. If thou do it, thou shalt live, 3. A like threatening. If thou do it not, thou shalt die the death.

33. Unto this covenant there were two Symboles, or Sacraments adjoined, In one of which the reward due to Obedience was sealed by a Tree, namely of life, and in the other the punishment of disobedience was sealed by a Tree, namely of knowledge of good and evil: that was a Sacrament of life, this a Sacrament of death.

CHAPTER XI.

Of Mans Apostasy, or Fall.

In the former dispute, we have treated of the first part of the special government of Men, which consists in prescribing a Law: the other part follows, in ordering the Event.

1. IN ordering the Event, as to Man, there are two... things to be considered 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Mans fall, and his restoring. Rom. 5. 19. 1. Cor. 15. 21.

2. In the Angels there was preservation of some, and Apostasy of others, but no 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 restoring of those that did Apostate. But in Man there could not be both preservation and apostasy, together: because all men were created in one Adam as in the beginning, root, and head: but in one and the same Adam, some men could not be preserved from the Fall and others Fall.

3. In the Angels there was no 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 or Restoring. First, Because they Fell from the highest top of excellency: Secondly, because in the Fall of Angels, all the Angelical nature did not perish, but by the sin of the first Man all mankind did perish.

4. The Apostasy of Man is his Fall from obedience due to God, or transgression of the Law prescribed by God.

5. In this Fall two things are to be considered. 1. The committing of the transgression. 2. The propagation of it.

6. The committing of the transgression was accomplished in the eating of the forbidden Fruit, which was called the Tree of the knowledge of Good and Evil: but the first motion or degree of this disobedience, did necessarily go before that outward act of eating, so that it may be truly said that Man was a sinner, before he had finished that outward act of eating. Wence it is that the very desire which Eve was carried toward the forbidden Fruit, doth seem to be noted, as some degree of her sin. Gen. 3. 6. When the Woman saw, that the Fruit of the Tree was good for Meat, and most delightful to the Eyes, and the Fruit of the Tree to be desired to get knowledge, she took and eat.

7. Therefore the first degree and motion of this disobedience, was an inordinate desire of some excellency, by the lifting up of the mind: which that she might attain, the forbidding of God being laid aside, through unbelief, she would make trial, whether the forbidden Fruit had some power to confer such an excellency.

8. Hence was the grievousness of this sin, which did not only contain pride, ingratitude, and unbelief: but also by violating of that most solemn Sacrament, did make show of, as it were a general profession of disobedience, and contempt of the whole covenant. All which also were so much the more foul by how much the condition of the sinner was more perfect.

9. In the committing of this transgression two things are to be considered, the causes; and consequents of it.

10. Causes were one principal. And others adjuvant.

11. The principal cause was man himself, by the abuse of his free will. Eccles. 7. 29. For he had received that righteousness, and grace by which he might have persisted in obedience if he would. That righteousness and grace was not taken from him before he had sinned, although that strengthening and confirming grace by which the act of sinning should have been actually hindered, and the contrary act of obedience brought forth was not granted unto him, and that by the certain, wise, and just counsel of God. God therefore was in no wise the cause of his Fall: neither did he lay upon man a necessity of falling, but man of his own accord, did freely Fall from God.

12. The adjuvant causes were the Devil, and the Woman.

13. The first sin of the Devil was pride: From pride did presently follow envy towards God, and God's Image in Man; For because he had lost an orderly Excellency by affecting one out of order, therefore the Excellency of others grieved him, and he was maliciously bent to oppose it. But the Devil was not the compelling cause, neither the cause of sufficient direct necessary or certain efficacy in procuring that sin: but only the counseling and persuading cause, by tempting, whence also it is that he hath the name of the tempter. Mat. 4. 3.

14. The tempting of the Devil is a fallacy, or sophistical argumentation: whereby under a show of that which is true, and good, he labors to seduce to that which is false: and induce to that which is evil.

15. In this temptation, the good which he propounded, and as it were promised, was shown to be as it were the greatest: the way to be used to attain that good, was propounded to be as it were easy, and light: that greatest evil which did hang over his head, was hidden from him.

16. The Devil is wont to go the like way in all his temptations, which he doth ensnare mankind with; yet in this temptation a certain special cunning is to be observed which contains many crafts and those very subtle.

17. The first of them was in that he chose a Serpent for his instrument which had a certain natural aptness, which the Devil knew how to abuse.

18. The second slight was in that he dealt with the Woman 1. Tim. 1. 13. Whether in the presence, or absence of her husband the Scripture is silent.

19. The third slight was in that he determined nothing at the first speech: but only propounded a certain question to the Woman, as if he were ignorant of those matters? Hath God indeed said?

20 The fourth was that his question had much ambiguity in it, for so might be understood that he should not ask of God's command, but of the sense or meaning of that command, peradventure not sufficiently understood by man, If the question be understood of the command it self, then he might seem to have asked whether God had forbidden them, that they should not at all eat of the fruit of any Tree, or as the Woman her self answered whether he had forbidden them the use of that one Tree, and so had not simply given them leave for all.

21. The fifth was that having first called the command of God into doubt by that question, he did so artificially extenuat the sanction of it, or communication adjoined in the conceit of the Woman now wavering, that she should deny either the truth, or at least the necessity of it.

22. The sixth was that after he had weakened the Commandment, and the sanction of it, it doth oppose a prediction quite contrary.

23. The seventh was that to confirm that prediction, he doth both abuse the Name of God, and the Name which God had imposed on the Tree. Gen. 3. 5. God knoweth that what day ye shall eat there of your Eyes shall be opened, and you shall be as God's knowing Good and Evil.

24. Hence it is that the Devil is called a Serpent, a Liar, a Seducer, a Man-slayer. Revelations 12. 9. John 8. 44. Rev. 20. 10.

25. With this tempting of the Devil there was joined the tempting of God, whereby he did so order that business, that it might thence be manifest what was in Man. But this tempting of God was neither Evil, nor tending to Evil.

26. A third tempting did follow these: namely of Man towards God, wherein he did in a certain manner make trial of the truth and Grace of God: namely making trial, whether God would preserve him, although he did not cleave to him, or whether he would certainly do what he had threatened.

27. A fourth temptation of Eve did accompany that namely towards her self, whereby she received the temptation or suggestion of the Devil, into her self, and applied to her self to her own ruin.

28. From that arose a fifth, whereby the Woman serving the Devil, as his instrument did tempt Adam: and from that proceeded a sixth, whereby Adam tempted himself, whilst he consented with a certain purpose to the Woman, and the Devil.

29. Either all or most of these temptations are found also in every Mans sins.

30. And so that sin was consummated, as touching the Fall of Man-kind in Adam, for Adam was properly the beginning of Man-kind, not Eve: Unless as she was made for him, and with him, did make one and the same beginning. Hence it is that we read in Scripture of a second Adam, but not of a second Eve.

CHAPTER XII.

Of the consequents of Sin.

In the Former disputation we treated of the Fall, and the causes of it: now follow the consequents of the Fall.

1. THE consequents of Sin are. 1. Guiltinesse and Filthiness, 2. Punishment, properly and distinctly so called.

2. Guiltinesse is the binding of the Sinner to undergo just punishment for his fault. Levite. 5. 2, 3, 4, 5. He is guilty. Rom. 3. 9. We have proved that all are under Sin. And Vers. 19. All the world is guilty before God. 1. Cor. 15. 17. Ye are in your Sins.

3. Hence that distinction, of Guiltinesse of the fault, & guiltiness of punishment, as also that distinction of the Papists of remission of the punishment, and of the fault is a distinction without a difference.

4. That guiltiness is not the form of Sin, but an affection, or a consequent adjunct, partly separable, partly inseparable.

5. Now it follows Sin, partly by virtue of the Law of God adjudging punishment to Sins, in which respect it hath some good in it, and is of God: and in this respect, God cannot separate that guiltiness from Sins. Yet as it flows from Sin, and is a worthiness and deserving of punishment, it doth also partake of the nature of it, and it is a vicious thing: and in this respect it cannot be separated from Sin. This double consideration of guiltiness is intimated, Romans 1. 32. Knowing the Law of God, that they that do such things are worthy of death.

6. From this guiltiness there followeth a conscience altogether evil: namely accusing & condemning justly. And hence follows horror, and flying from the presence of God, Gen. 3. 8. Heb. 2. 15. Rom. 8. 15.

7. Filthiness is that spiritual pollution, whereby a sinner is made destitute of all comeliness, and honor, and becomes vile. Matth. 15. 11. Rev. 22. 11.

8. This filthiness doth immediately follow the offense of the Sin, and remaineth in the Sinner, after the act of Sin is past and ceaseth to be: it is wont to be called the spot of Sin, Corruption, Defilement, Deformity, Dishonesty, Nakednesse, Uncleanness, a blot, and sometimes Culpa, a fault.

9. From this filthiness there follows; First, A turning away from God, Isaiah 1. 15. Which is also called abomination, and detestation, Prov. 1. 32. Especially in respect of greater Sins. Prov. 3. 16. Ierem. 16. 18. Secondly, the shame of a man to his confusion, Gen. 3. 7. For such a shame, is a fear arising from the conscience of some filthiness. Rom. 6. 21. What fruit had you of those things whereof you are now ashamed?

10. Punishment is an evil inflicted upon the Sinner for his Sin.

11. It is called an evil because it is a privation of good. But it is not a privation of an honest good, as it is honest, as sin is: but its a privation of the good of happiness, in respect of the Sinner, who is punished.

12. It is said to be an evil inflicted, not simply contracted, because it pertains to rewarding and revenging Justice.

13. It is said to be inflicted for Sin, because it hath always respect and order to the desert of Sin, unto which punishment follows from the offense, by reason of the prohibition, and from the guiltiness, by reason of the commination.

14. Therefore punishment properly so called, hath no place but in Intelligent Creatures, in whom also Sin is found.

15. Because Sin is reduced into order by punishment, and Sin in it self is in some measure against the goodness of God, but punishment only against the good of the Creature: therefore Sin hath more evil in it self then punishment.

16. Hence it is that the least Sin is not to be admitted, although the greatest punishment might by that means be avoided, or the greatest good obtained. Rom. 3. 8.

17. In the ordaining of punishment divers attributes of God do shine forth, chiefly Holiness, Righteousness, and Mercy.

18. The holiness of God in the largest signification is that whereby he is free and as it were separated from all imperfection. Isa. 6. 3. Rev. 4. 8. But that holiness of God which doth there properly shine forth is that whereby he being pure from any spot of Sin, cannot communicate with any Sin. Psal. 5. 5. Thou art not a strong God that delighteth in iniquity: evil shall not dwell with thee. Hab. 1. 13. Thou art of purer Eyes then that thou mayest behold Evil.

19. The revenging justice of God which here shines forth is that whereby he inflicteth evil upon them that do evil. 2. Thes. 1. 6. It is just with God to render affliction to them that afflict you.

20. This Justice as it doth burn simply-against Sin is called wrath Rom. 1. 18. Eph. 5. 6. As it doth more fiercely wax hot it is called fury. Deut. 29. 20. As it doth give sentence to be executed against a Sinner it is called judgment. Rom. 2. 5. As it doth execute the sentence given, it is properly called revenge. Heb. 10. 30.

21. Mercy here shining forth is that whereby he punisheth Sin, less then the condign desert of it.

22. This mercy is clemency or beneficence.

23. Clemency is that whereby he doth moderate the punishments that are due, Lam. 3. 22. It is the Lord's great kindness that we are not consumed.

24. Clemency appears in patience, and long sufferance.

25. Patience is that whereby he doth forbearingly suffer Sin, and spares the Sinners. 2. Pet. 3. 9.

26. Long sufferance is that whereby he doth long suspend revenge. Exo. 34. 6.

27. Beneficence is that whereby, being rich in goodness, he poureth forth many good things, even upon Sinners. Matth. 5. 45.

So much of the Guiltinesse, Filthiness, and punishment of sin in general, now follows the punishment in special.

28. The punishment inflicted on man for Sin is death. Gen. 2. 17. Rom. 5. 12.

29 This Death is a miserable privation of life.

30. By the life of man is understood, both the conjunction of the soul with the body, and all that perfection, which was agreeable to man in that state, whether it was actually communicated, or to be communicated upon condition. Psalms 36. 10. With thee is the Fountain of life, in thy light we shall enjoy light.

31. Therefore Death is not from God, as he did ordain nature, but it is from God, as taking vengeance on Sin; and so properly from Sin, as the meritorious and procuring cause.

32. But that Death is not a simple, and bare privation of life, but joined with subjection to misery: and therefore is not the annihilating of the Sinner, whereby the subject of misery being taken away, the misery it self should be taken away.

33. A certain Image and representation of this Death was the casting out of Paradise, in which there was contained a Symbol or Sacrament of life. Genes. 3. 22. 23. 24.

Thus much of Death in general: It followeth to speak of it in special.

34. In Death, or the curse of God that doth lie upon Sinners, there are two degrees; the beginning of it, and the perfection of it: and two members; The punishment of loss, or privative; & the punishment of sense, or positive: and there are two kinds; Death spiritual, and corporal.

35. The beginning of spiritual Death, in matter of loss, in the defacing of the Image of God, that is, the loss of grace, and original Justice. Rom. 3. 23. They are deprived of the glory of God. Eph. 4. 18. Being strangers from the Life of God.

36. By this loss of grace, man is robbed of all saving gifts: and so nature is weakened, put out of order, and as it were wounded.

37. The beginning of spiritual death in matter of sense, is spiritual bondage.

38. Spiritual bondage is a subjection to the power of darkness, or of spiritually deadly enemies. Coloss 1. 13. Hath taken us out of the power of darkness. 2. Pet. 2. 19. Of whom a man is overcome, of the same he is brought in bondage.

39. This bondage, is bondage of the Devil, and those that serve the Devil.

40. Bondage of the Devil, is a subjection to that power of the Devil, whereby he effectually worketh in men, & in respect of them he hath command of Death Act. 26. 18. 2. Cor. 4. 4. John 12. 31. & 16. 11. 2. Tim 2. 26. Eph. 22.

41. Bondage of the servants of the Devil, is of the world and Sin.

42. Bondage of the world is a subjection to the enticements which are found in the world. Phil. 3. 19. 1 John 4. 5. & 2. 15. 16.

43. Service or bondage of Sin, is that whereby a man is so captivated under Sin, that he hath no power to rise out of it. Rom. 6. 16. 17. 19. 20.

44. By this bondage it comes to pass, that although freedom of will remain; which is essential to man's nature, yet that freedom which pertains to the perfection of human nature, (the property whereof was that power to exercise acts spiritually good, and by that means acceptable) is not found in his sinful state unless, Remote, and Dead.

45. From this beginning of spiritual Death, there follows the multiplying of Sin in this life present.

46. Those Sins that follow, have some respect of punishment, in respect of the first sin. Rom. 1. 26.

47. But this respect of punishment is attributed to those Sins, first by reason of the effects or consequents of them, because they further the Death of man, and increase his misery: Secondly, they are said to be punishments in respect of that inward suffering to which man is subjected to in sinning; whereby also his nature is pressed down, and made more base. Thirdly, they are said to be punishments of the former sin: because that former sin was a cause for which man is deprived; of that righteousness, and grace, or Divine help, by the absence whereof it comes to pass, that man runs into those sins. Fourthly, they may be said also in a certain manner punishments of the former sin, because that former sin was a cause disposing and preparing man to commit the following sins, and in that respect it hath brought upon man all those Sins, and whatsoever evils, do either accompany or follow them.

CHAPTER XIII.

Of Original Sin.

In the former dispute (Thesi 45.) the multiplication of sin was given as a consequent from the beginning of spiritual Death, which we will thus show forth in the following Theses.

1. The Sin that followed upon the first Fall is either Original, or Actual.

2. Original Sin, is an habitual exorbitancy, of the whole nature of man, or it is a deviation from the Law of God.

3. Because it is the corruption of the whole man: hence it is called in the holy Scriptures. The old man. Rom. 6. 6. Eph. 4. 22. Col. 3. 9. The body of Sin. Rom. 6. 7. 24. A Law of the members. Rom. 7. 23. And the members themselves. Col. 3. 5. Flesh. John 3. 6. Rom. 7. 5. 18. 25.

4. Hence also it is that in Scripture, a homogeneall corruption is attributed not only generally to the whole man, but also to every part of it: as to the understanding, Gen. 6. 5. The imagination and thoughts only evil. Rom. 8. 5. 6. 7. They savor the things of the flesh. To the conscience. Tit. 1. 15. Their mind and conscience is defiled. To the will, Gen. 8. 21. The imagination of the heart of man is evil from his childhood. To the affections of every kind. Rom. 1. 24. To uncleanness in the lusts of their hearts. Lastly, to the body and all the members of it. Rom. 6. 19. Your members servants to uncleanness, and iniquity to commit iniquity.

5. This Sin is said to be an exorbitancy, or deviation of man, because it is in man an habitual privation of that due conformity to the Law imposed on man by God, wherein he ought to walk as in his way.

6. Hence it is that that original depravation is called in the Scriptures Sin or that Sin, by a certain special appropriation. Rom. 6. 12. 7. 1. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Rom. 7. 8. 20. The Law of Sin. 7. 23. Sin dwelling in us, inhering, adhering and compassing us about. Rom. 7. 17. 20. 7. 21. Heb. 12. 1.

7. This disorder in man, hath as it were two parts. One formal, and the other as it were material, Ier. 2. 13. My people have done two evils: they have forsaken me, &c. That they might dig to themselves Cisterns. The description of actual Sin doth contain the picture of original, as the daughter doth contain the picture of the mother.

8. The formal part is an aversion from good. Rom. 3. 12. There is none that doth good, no not one.

9. The material part is a turning and inclining to evil. Rom. 7. 23. The Law of Sin.

10. By reason of this original depravation, it cometh to pass, that although the will of man be free in the state of Sin, as touching all acts which it doth exercise, yet it is captive and servile, as touching the manner of doing, because it is deprived of that power whereby it should will well, and that inclination is as it were a form whereby it cometh to pass that it willeth amiss, even when that thing is good about which it is exercised unwilling. Rom. 3. 12. 7. 14. 2 Cor. 3. 5. John 8. 34. 2 Pet. 2. 19. Rom. 6. 16.

CHAPTER XIV.

Of Actual Sin.

1. Thus much of Original: Now followeth Actual Sin.

2. ACTuall Sin is an exorbitancy of man's action: or a deviation of it from the Law of God. 1 John 3. 4. It flows from original Sin, as an act from an habit: or as the fault of the person flows from the fault of nature. In which respect also original Sin is rightly called the fall of Sin.

Fomes peccati.

3. Therefore actual Sins although they are often opposite one to another in respect of their objects, and their special ways whereby they are carried towards their objects: yet in respect of that beginning or foundation whence they proceed, they are indeed tied & knit together,
Ia. 2. 10. 1 Tim. 6. 9.

4. Actual Sins are diversely distinguished among themselves, First, in respect of degree. One Sin is greater or lesser than another. Ezech. 5. 6. & 8. She hath changed my judgments more than the Gentiles themselves. & 8. 15. Thou shalt see yet greater abominations than these. John 19. 11. He hath the greater Sin: whence also punishment is greater, or lesser. Luke 12. 47. He that knoweth and doth not, shall be beaten with many stripes, and he that knoweth not and doth, shall be beaten with few stripes, Mat. 11. 22. 24.

5. But this difference of degrees depends. First, upon respect of the person by whom it is committed. Numb. 12. 14. Whence it is, there is a difference between Fornication, Adultery, & Incest. 2. Upon the kind and nature of the thing, Mat. 5. 21. 22. He that is angry unadvisedly: he that calleth Raca: he that saith, thou fool. 3. Upon the intending, and remitting the Act. Phil. 3. 6. As concerning, ...eale persecuting the Church, 1 Tim. 1. 13. A blasphemer, a Persecutor, and Injurious. 4. Upon the way, and manner of committing: for it is done either out of ignorance, infirmity, or with an high hand. Num. 15. 27. 30. If a soul shall Sin through error, he shall offer as he Goat, but the soul which shall commit with an high hand, shall be cut off. Psalms 19. 13. 14. 1 Cor. 6. 7. There is utterly a fault in you. 5. Upon the circumstances of place, time, and the like. Isa. 26. 10. When favor is shown to a wicked man, he will not learn righteousness: in the land of uprightness, he doth wickedly.

6. Secondly, the special difference of actual Sins is properly privative, and doth formally depend upon the difference of rectitudes, from which these acts do decline.

7. Therefore that distribution of Sins as they are contrary to the Commandment of God, is most proper.

8. Thirdly, actual Sin is distinguished in respect of parts: into Sin of Omission, and Sin of Commission. For seeing there are as it were two part of original Sin, turning from good, and a turning to evil: actual Sin that flows from thence hath a double respect, for where turning from good doth most appear, that is said to be a Sin of Omission: and where a turning to evil doth most appear, that is called a Sin of Commission.

9. Therefore a Sin of Omission is not to do that that ought to be done. James 4. 17. He that knoweth to do well and doth it not, to him it is Sin. Mat. 25. 42. I was an hungry and ye gave me no meat, &c.

10. Sin of Commission, is to do that which ought not to be done.

11. Sin of Omission is most directly contrary to the command of God, and Sin of Commission to the forbidding: in a Sin of Commission there is a certain addition to the Law of God, and in Omission there is a certain detractation from the Law: both which are forbidden. Deut. 4. 2. 12. 32. Rev. 22. 18. 19.

12. This distribution of Sin is not into the kinds of Sin. 1. Because, Commission and Omission being about the same object, and under the same formal respect, do not differ in kind, as in covetousness. 2. Because to speak morally there is no Omission without an act going before, or accompanying it. 3. Because Omission cannot be voluntary and free without an act, unto which act there doth always cleave a Sin of Commission.

13. Fourthly, Sin is distributed in respect of the subject, into Sin of the heart, of the mouth, and of the work. So that it is. A word, a deed, or a thought against the Law. Isa. 18. 13. Mat. 5. 28. 15. 19.

14. Fifthly, Sin is distributed in respect of the object. Into that Sin which is against God, and into that which is against men. Luke 15. 18. 1 Sam. 2. 25. Yet it doth not altogether in the same reason respect God and man. For Sin as it is a transgression of the Law of God, is an offense against God only: but yet in a material respect, as to the wrong and loss that is often done to men by Sin, it hath respect also to men.

14. Sixthly, Sin is distributed in respect of the effect. Into Sin destroying the conscience, and not destroying. Into Sin reigning, and mortified: into Sin pardonable, and unpardonable, which yet are not properly belonging to this place.

16. From this multiplication of Sin there follows an increase of spiritual death both in matter of loss, and in matter of sense.

17. In matter of loss, there is security of conscience, and stupidity; that is a deprivation of the sense of Sin and misery.

18. This security comes from custom of sinning, and obstinacy of mind in Sins: for Sins whether they be of Commission or Omission, being brought into custom, and made old, through daily multiplication do beget an evil habit, and do as it were bring an hard skin over the will and mind. Ierem. 13. 23. Can a Blackamore change his skin, or a Leopard his spots? them may ye do good that are accustomed to do evil. Eph. 4. 19. Being past feeling, they gave themselves to lasciviousness, to commit all uncleanness with greediness.

19. In matter of sense, there is greatest terror of conscience joined with desperation. Hebr. 10. 26. 27. Gen. 4. 13.

20. This terror ariseth from the greatness and multiplicity of guilt, together with an inavoydableness of imminent punishment.

21. But in this beginning of spiritual death, there is a certain moderation used by God. This moderation is internal or external.

22. The internal appeareth in the remainders of God's Image, James 3. 9. Now these remainders appear both in the understanding, and also in the will.

23. In the understanding, by those principles of truth, which direct both the theoreticall, and practical judgment.

24. The theorical principles, are both of true, and false, of which all men that have any use of reason have some knowledge, Rom. 1. 20. Psal. 19. 2. 3.

25. Practical principles, are of that which is honest, and dishonest, just, and unjust, that God is to be worshipped, that that is not to be done to another, which one would not have done to himself.

26. This is the Law written in the hearts of all men. Rom. 2. 15. They show the effect of the Law written in their hearts.

27. From these principles there ariseth a certain force of natural conscience. Rom. 2. 15. Their consciences together bearing witness, and their thoughts accusing one another, or excusing: which conscience notwithstanding together with those principles, is corrupt, and so dead. Tit. 1. 15. Their mind, and conscience is defiled.

28. In the will those remainders appear by a certain inclination unto good known in that manner: which although it be vanishing, and dead, yet it is found in all in some measure: whence also it is that at least the shadows of virtues, are allowed and embraced of all. 2 Tim. 3. 5. Having a show of goodness.

29. Also that restraining power pertaineth to the will together with the understanding whereby excess of Sin is restrained in most, so that then Sinners do abhor the committing of many grosser Sins. 1 Cor. 5. 1. Such fornication which is not named among the Gentiles.

30. The outward moderation of this misery is by those external means both political and oeconomick, whereby the course of Sin and misery is wont partly to be hindered.

CHAPTER. XV.

Of Corporal Death.

Thus far of the beginning of the spiritual Death; now it follows to speak of the beginning of bodily Death, with the consummation of both.

1. The beginning of bodily death in matter of loss, is either inward or outward.

2. Inward is the loss of the internal good things of the body, as of health and long life, Deut. 28. 21. 27. 35. 1 Cor. 11. 30. Mat. 9. 2.

3. Hence is mortality, as touching the state, and nearest power to Death.

4. For this mortality is a dissolving or loosing of that band wherewith the soul was joined with the body.

5. The outward beginning of this Death in matter of loss is the loss of outward good things, whereby this life was either beautified or sustained.

6. Of the first kind is. 1. Loss of dominion over the Creatures. •...he which after the Fall did put off for the greatest part that subjection towards man, to which they were made, and became his deadly enemies unless they be brought into order by the special providence of God, Job 5. 22. 23. Be not afraid of the beasts of the Earth, For thou shalt be in covenant with the stones of the Field, and the beasts of the Field shall be at peace with thee. Hos. 2. 18. I will make a covenant for them with the beasts of the Field. 2. That ignominy which he is subject to, both living and dead. Deut. 28. 20. 37.

7. Of the latter kind is poverty, or the loss of those things which pertain to food, raiment, and possessions. Deut. 28. 17. 18.

8. The beginning of this Death in matter of sense is also inward or outward.

9. Inward is in weariness, Gen. 3. 19. Paine, and diseases. Deut. 28. 35.

10. Outward, is in all those calamities to which the life of man it outwardly subject. Deut. 28. 25. 48.

11. The moderation, that appeared in this corporal punishment is touching inward, and outward things.

12. Touching inward things. In that man hath yet space, and commodity of life, granted to him by the goodness of God. Gen. 3. 6.

13. Touching outward things: in that he hath certain remainders of dominion over the Creatures. Gen. 9. 2. Let the fear of you and the dread of you be upon all the beasts of the Earth, &c. So that although man by his sin fell from all right which he had before, of using the Creatures to his benefit... ye... by grant and divine indulgence, he may use them, and in that he... sins not, that lie doth simply use them, although he sin in the manner of using: because so long as life is granted, and prolonged to him, with the same, there is together granted the use of those things, which are necessarily required unto life, and in a sort they are due to him.

Hence it is that although the Creatures were subject to vanity and a curse, for the sin of man. Gen. 3. 17. 18. Rom. 8. 20. 22. yet they are preserved in that estate, that they may supply the necessities of man's life.

CHAPTER XVI.

Of the Consummation of Death.

1. THE Consummation of Death is the highest degree of the punishment appointed, and to endure forever. As touching the degree, it is said to be infinite.

2. But it is infinite only in respect of the loss and privation: because it is the losing of an infinite good, not in respect of sense or positive affliction; yet it may be said to be positively infinite, in respect of the thing afflicting, but not in respect of the manner of afflicting.

3. Hence it is that there are certain degrees in this punishment, according to the variety of degrees, which are found in sins, Luke 12, 47, 48. He shall be beaten with many stripes: he shall be beaten with few stripes.
4. As touching the continuance, this punishment is said to be eternal or never to be ended. Marc. 9. 44. 46. 48. Where their Worm dieth not, and their fire never goeth out.
5. Now it is eternal. 1. Because of the eternal abiding of the offense. 2. Because of the unchangeableness of the condition which that degree of punishment doth follow. 3. Because of the want of satisfaction.
6. Hence it is that the incorruptibility of the damned is their immortality in death, and to death.
7. The consummation of spiritual death in matter of loss, is a total and final forsaking, whereby a man is separated wholly from the face, presence, and favor of God. Matth. 7. 23. Depart from me. And 25. 41. G... ye cursed. 2. Thess. 1. 9. Who shall be punished with everlasting destruction, being driven from the Face of the Lord, and the glory of his Power.
8. Hence follows the greatest, and eternal hardening in evil, and despair of good Luc. 16, 26.
9. The consummation of spiritual Death in matter of sense, is fullness of bondage, whereby he is altogether delivered into the power of the Devil, Matth. 25. 41.
10. Hence is fullness of terrors of conscience, and fullness of sin, for the damned do sin, and will sin forever, although neither the same sins which were in this life, as Theft, Murder, Adultery; nor altogether of the same condition, with them which they committed alive. For they offend chiefly in hatred, envy indignation, and such like affections, which the sharpness of punishment gives occasion to. Also these sins after death, have not the same respect of desert which they have in this life, because then there is neither any possibility to avoid sin, neither is there place for threatening and increase of punishment by them.
11. Hence it is that sins themselves, in the damned, have more respect of punishment: but in those that live, they have more respect of offense.
12. Terror of conscience is as it were a worm, perpetually gnawing. Mar. 9. 44. Isaiah 66. 24.
13. The Consummation of corporal Death together with spiritual, is first by separation of the soul from the body. 1. Cor. 15. 42. 43. To which that change of some is answerable, which is like death. 1. Cor. 15. 51. 52. 1. Thess. 4. 15. 16. Secondly, by casting the soul and body into Hell, or that place which God hath prepared, for the extreme torments of sins. Rev. 21. 8.
14. Hence are pains, and greatest vexations both of soul and body. Luc. 16. 23.
15. Hence are Lamentation, Howlings, G...ashing of Teeth, and such like effects, of greatest vexation. Luc. 13. 28.

16. But of the place of Hell, and manner of torture, & nature of outward things which pertain thereunto, because they are not necessary for us to know, the Scripture hath not pronounced anything distinctly of them.

CHAPTER XVII.

Of the Propagation of Sin.

Thus much of the transgression. Now it follows to treat of the propagation of it.

1. This propagation, is that whereby the whole posterity of man, decending from Adam, in a natural manner, is made partaker of the same condition with him. Job 14. 5. Psal. 51. 7 Rom. 5. 44. Eph. 2. 3. This is come to pass by God's just ordination. The equity whereof appeareth in some measure among men. 1. In natural right, whereby inbred qualities are derived from that which begetteth, to that which is begotten. 2. In hereditary right, whereby the burdens of parents are transferd upon their children. 3. In the right of like for like whereby the rejection of good, and suffering of evil are equally extended.

2. This propagation of Sin consists of two parts. Namely, Imputation and real communication.

3. By imputation, the same singular act of disobedience, which was Adams, is also become ours.

4. By real communication the same singular sin is not derived to us, but the same in kind, or of the same reason and nature.

5. Original sin, seeing it is formally a privation of original righteousness, and this privation doth follow the first sin as a punishment, hence it hath the respect of a punishment in order of nature, before it hath the respect of a sin. As by the Justice of God that original righteousness is denied, so far forth it is a punishment: As it ought to be in us, and yet through man's fault in wanting, so far forth it is a sin.

6. Therefore this privation is derived from Adam by way of desert, as it is a punishment; and by way of a real efficient, as it hath the respect of a sin joined to it, for in that that any is borne a son of Adam, he is made worthy to be endowed with righteousness: when therefore he ought to have it, and hath it not, that want to him is sin.

7. Together with this privation, there is also derived, an unaptnes, and a certain perverseness of all the bodily faculties, which in their manner are opposite to that rectitude, that is approved of God.

8. For upon the deprivation of righteousness whereby all the faculties were to be directed, there follows in them all, such a defect, whereby it comes to pass, that when they are carried to any moral thing; that very inclination is morally evil.

9. Of these ariseth every actual Sin: for the mind being blind by the privation of light dotheasily admit any errors: And the will being now turned from God, doth burn with love of it self, and evil desires without God.

10. From Sin thus propagated, there follows also, a propagation of death, both begun & consummate: as well touching sense as touching loss, as well corporal as spiritual, to all the posterity of Adam.

11. Through this apostasy of mankind, it comes to pass, that our Faith, whereby now we believe in God, is not simply for life, but for salvation. For it is not sufficient for man being fallen, that God do simply give him life, but it is also required, that he would give it man being dead in Sin, Eph. 2. 1. And this was one difference between the question of the rich young man. Matth. 19. 16. What good shall I do that I may have eternal life? and that of the Jailor, Acts 16. 30. What must I do to be saved?

CHAPTER XVIII.

Of the Person of Christ, the Mediator.

After the Fall of Man: it follows that we see his restoring.

1. The restoring of man is the lifting him up from an estate of sin and death, unto an estate of grace, and life.
2. The cause of this restoring was the merciful purpose of God. Eph. 1. 9. According to his free good will which he had purposed in himself. For there was nothing in man, which could confer any force to procure this restoring: but rather much which made to the contrary, as sin, in which there was an enmity against God: which in that respect doth commend this love of God towards us. Rom. 5. 8. But God commends his love towards us, in that when we were yet sinners, Christ died for us.
3. There are two parts of this restoring: Redemption, and the application thereof. That is as it were the first act of this restoring: this as it were the second act. That is as it were the matter, this as it were the form of our salvation. That is as it were the Sufficiency, this the very Efficiency.
4. These parts are altogether of one and the same latitude. For the end of redemption is the application of it: and the prime reason, rule, and measure of application is that same gracious Will of God which was the cause of Redemption it self. Eph. 1. 9. 10. He hath made known to us, the mystery of his will, according to his free good will, which he had foreordained in himself, that in the full dispensation of those times before ordained, he might summarily gather together all things in Christ.
5. Therefore Redemption is appointed to all and everyone, for whom it was in God's intendment obtained: according to that of Christ. John 6. 37. Whatsoever the Father giveth me shall come unto me.

6. Redemption is the bringing of man into freedom, from the bondage of sin, and the devil, by the payment of an equal price. 1. Pet. 1. 18. Ye know that ye were not redeemed by corruptible things, as silver and gold, but with precious blood. 1. Cor. 6. 20. Ye are bought with a price, and 7. 23. Ye are bought with a price.

7. For this freedom was not primarily effected by power, nor by prayers, (although these also had their force in perfecting this business,) but by the payment of a just price.

8. This price seeing it could not be paid by man, the help of a Mediator was necessary, who should come between God and man, making a perfect reconciliation between them. 1. Tim. 2. 5. Acts 20. 28. The Church of God which he hath purchased by his own blood. 1. Tim. 2. 6. The man Christ Jesus, who gave himself a price of our redemption.

9. Now such a Mediator is not given, for one age only but for yesterday, today and forever. Hebr. 13. 8. Jesus Christ yesterday, today and is the same forever: Revel. 13. 8. The Lamb slain from the foundation of the World. Although he was only manifest in the fullness of time. Col. 1. 27. Tit. 1. 2. 1. Pet. 1. 20. For this Mediation was equally necessary in all ages: Also it was sufficient, and effectual from the beginning, by virtue of God's decree, promise, and acceptance.

10. This Mediator is only Jesus Christ. Acts 4. 12. Neither is there salvation in any other, for among men there is given no other name under Heaven, by which we must be saved.

11. In Christ two things are to be considered. 1. The fitness which he had to perform the work of redemption. 2. The parts of the redemption it self.

12. His fitness consists of two parts. The first is his person: the second is the office, imposed upon his person.

13. In the person of Christ the Mediator two things are to be observed: the distinction; of the two natures, and the personal union of them.

14. The distinct natures are: the Divine nature, as it is the second person of the Deity, and the human, in all things like to our natures (excepting sin, and the manner of subsisting) Matt. 1. 23. Immanuel, God with us, John 1. 14. That word was made flesh, &c. The distinction it self between those two natures remains: because they remain absolutely the same which they were before, as well touching their essence as all their essential properties: Hence neither the Deity in Christ with the humanity, nor the humanity with the deity is either changed, or mingled, or any way confounded.

15. The personal union, is that whereby the second person of the deity did take the human nature, that it might inseparably subsist in the same person John 1. 14.

16. For the second person of the deity although it have but one subsistence, yet it hath a twofold way of subsisting: one in the Divine nature from eternity; another in the human nature after the incarnation. Rom. 9. 5. Of whom is Christ, as touching the flesh, who is above all, God blessed f...r ever, Amen. Which latter way of subsisting doth agree to the Son of God. In respect of the union which he hath with the human nature.

17. This union to the divine person and nature, doth ad nothing, but a certain relation: but in the human nature it maketh a change, whilst by this means it is elevated to highest perfection: for it is made as it we a proper adjunct of the Divine person by which it is assumed: as it were a member of the same whole God man. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , whereof the divine nature is as it were another part: as touching the subsistence, it is made as it were an effect singularly upheld by the Divine nature: and also it is made as it were a subject wherein the Divine nature doth especially dwell. Coloss. 2. 9.

18. We endeavor to describe this union; by many logical ways: because it cannot sufficiently be explained by any one.

19. We use all those terms wherein the fountains, of consent, and unity are contained, that we may show the union to be most near.

20. Yet we temper these terms with that limitation, as it were, because this union is mystical, and secret, so it may not be plainly expressed, but only shadowed forth by human words, and notions.

21. From this union there followeth a personal communication of properties which is not a real transfusion. For then the Divine nature should take the properties of the human, and the human should take the properties of the Divine, and so the human should be the Divine, and the Divine, the human, or as well the Divine, as human should cease to be. Neither it is a real donation from which should follow, that the human nature might use the Divine properties as its own restruments. But it is a Communion, or co...curing unto the same operations; so that they are performed together by each nature, but according to their own distinct properties.

22. Hence it comes to pass that all the doings a... sufferings of Christ are referred properly to his p...rson as the proper Terminus bound of them: althou... some are properly to be referred to the one, s...me to the other nature, as to their beginning, and proper respects.

23. And hence followeth the Communication of these properties, as touching predi...ation, or attribution, whereby the properties of the one nature are attributed either to the whole person, as when Christ is said to be dead which is proper to the human nature, and to have been in the beginning which is proper to the Divine nature: Or to the other nature, because of the person, as when ...od is said to be taken up into glory: 1. Tim. 2. 16. ...o be crueified, 1. Cor. 2. 8. Which do not properly agree to the Divine nature, but to the huma...e. And those things which are proper to the whole person, are properly attributed to either nature: as when the man Christ is said to be the Mediator betwixt God and man. 1. Tim. 2. 5. Which doth not agree to Christ as he is man, but as he is God and man.

24. But as that Communion doth properly respect the person of Christ, not the natures considered in themselves, so that communication which consists in predication doth respect God, or man in the concrete, not the Deity, or humanity in the abstract.

25. Therefore the communication of properties is not merely verbal, neither yet is it so real that the property of one nature doth pass in the other as touching the intrinsic possession and union.

26. Those examples which are wont to be brought of those that think the contrary of that communication which is between the matter and the form, between the soul and the body, and between Iron and the fire, do neither agree to this mystery, nor prove the position itself

27. There were in Christ two understandings▪ one Divine, whereby he knew all things, John 21. 17. And the other human, whereby he knew not some things as yet. Mark 13. 32. Also there were two wills, one divine Luke 5. 13. And the other human, together also with a natural appetite, Mat. 26. 39. So there is a double presence of Christ▪ but yet the human presence, can neither be everywhere, nor in many places at once.

28. Because God in Christ, God-man, hath restored life to us, therefore our Faith is carried towards Christ, and by Christ, toward God.

CHAPTER XIX.

Of the office of Christ.

Thus far of the Person of Christ, his office follows.

1. THE Office of Christ, is that which he undertook that he might obtain salvation for men: 1. Tim. 1. 15. This is a sure saying, and worthy of all acceptation: That Jesus Christ came into the World to save Sinners.

2. For those that deny that the proper end propounded by God and Christ in this mystery, was the salvation of men, they deprive God and Christ of their honor, and men of their comfort.

3. In it two things are to be considered. The calling to this office, and the office itself. Heb. 5. 4, 6. None takes this honor to himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron: So also Christ, &c.

4. The calling is in action of God, especially of the Father, whereby, a special covenant being made, he ordained his Son to this office.

5. This covenant is expressed, Isaiah. 53. 10. That if Christ would make himself a sacrifice for sin, then he should see his seed, he should prolong his days, and the delight of the Lord should prosper by him.

6. This calling therefore contains in it self. Choosing, fore-ordaining, and sending. Isaiah 42. 1. Mine elect 1 Pet. 1. 20. Which was sore-known before the foundation, of the World, John 3.

17. God hath sent his Son into the World. It is called in Scriptures sealing. John 6. 27. Sanctification, John 10. 36. Anointing. Isaiah 61. 1. Psal. 45. 8. Heb. 1. 9. And a giving, John 3. 16.
7. Choosing, respects the end; fore-ordaining the means; sending, the execution it self; of mere grace, without any condition foreseen, either in men, or in Christ himself.
8. All things which Christ either did or suffered, even as touching all circumstances were foredetermined. Luke 22. 22. The Son of man goeth as it is appointed. Acts 4. 28. That they might do all things whatsoever thy hand, and thy counsel had before determined to be done.
9. But this calling was not instituted in an ordinary manner, but confirmed with a solemn oath, to confirm the excellency and eternity of it. Psalms 110. 4. Hebr. 5. 6. & 7. 24.
10. The office it self to which Christ was called is threefold: Of a Prophet, of a Priest, of a King.
11. This number, and order of offices, is shown: First by men's necessity, grievously laboring under ignorance, alienation from God, and disability to return to him: the first of which is healed by the Prophecy of Christ, the second by his Priest-hood, the third by his Kingdom.
12. Secondly, the order of conferring salvation doth show his number also which ought first to be unfolded then obtained, and then afterward applied; the first of which is the part of a Prophet, the second of a Priest and the third of a King.
13. Thirdly, the same order also appeareth by the solemn manner of executing it, whereby Christ did first teach others, declaring the Will of God unto them: then he did offer himself; and afterward he did enter into his Kingdom.
14. The prophecy of Christ is that whereby he hath perfectly revealed the whole Will of God that bringeth salvation: whence he is in Scripture called not only a Prophet. Deut. 18. 15. Acts 3. 22. And a Doctor, Mat. 23. 7. The Apostle of our profession. Hebr. 3. 1. And the Angel of the covenant. Malachi. 3. 1. But also the very wisdom of God. 1 Cor. 1. 24. And the treasure of wisdom and understanding, Col 2. 3.
15. This prophecy was in Christ as in the principal cause: in others whether angels, or men as in his instruments, 1 Pet. 1. 11. The Prophets did search what or what manner of time the foretelling spirit of Christ which was in them, should decline, &c. And 3. 19. By which going to the spirits which are in prison, he preached▪ It was in Christ by way of habit so that he might when he pleased, reveal all the secrets of God. But in others by way of act, and flashing or coruscation so that they could not exercise prophesy but at certain times when he pleased, Ierem. 42. 7. After ten days came the Lord to Jeremiah.
16. That he might be such a prophet, it was necessary that he should be God, John 1. 18. & 3. 13. And withal also that he should be man, Acts 3. 22. Compared with Deut. 18. 15. For unless he had been God, he should neither have perfectly understood the Will of God. 1 Cor. 2. 11.

16. Neither had he been able to reveal it throughout all ages: unless he had been man, he could not fittly have unfolded it in his own person unto men, Hebr. 1. 1.
17. The priesthood of Christ is that whereby he hath purged by sacrifice the sins of men, and obtained the favor of God for them. Col. 1. 20. & 22. 2 Cor. 5. 15. Rom. 5. 10.
18. This priesthood was not legal, or temporary, but according to the order of Melchizedek. Hebr. 7. 17. Not by a carnal Commandment but by the power of an endless life. Ibid. Ver. 16. Not by an order that it weak and lame, but stable, and perfect. Ibid. Ve. 18. & 19. Not for a time, but forever. Ibid. Verse 24. Finally admitting no successor or Vicar, but perpetual, and proper to Christ, and of him that ever liveth. Ibid. Vers. 24. and 25.
19. In this office Christ himself was the Priest, Sacrifice, and Altar, he was Priest according to both natures. Hebr. 5. 6. He was a Sacrifice, most properly according to his human nature: whence in the Scriptures this is wont to be attributed not only to the person of Christ, but to his body. Heb. 12. 13. 1 Pet. 2. 13 Col. 1. 22. To his blood, Col. 1. 20. And to his Soul. Isaiah 53. 10. Mat. 20. 28. Yet the chief force whereby this sacrifice was made effectual did depend upon the nature of God, namely that the Son of God did offer himself for us. Acts 20. 28. Rom. 8. 3. He was the Altar properly according to his Divine nature. Hebr. 9. 14. & 13. 10. 12. 15. For it is belonging to the Altar to sanctify that which is offered upon it, and so it ought to be of greater dignity then the sacrifice it self. Mat. 23. 17. But Christ by his divine nature did in a certain manner sanctify himself according to his human nature, John 17. 19.
20. Therefore it doth hence also appear, how necessary it was that Christ the Mediator, should be both God and man: for unless he had been man, he had not been a fit sacrifice: and unless he had been God, that sacrifice had not been of sufficient virtue.
21. The Kingdom, of Christ is that whereby he doth dispence and administer all things with power and authority, which pertain to the salvation of man, Psal. 2. 6. Dan. 2. 44. Luc. 1. 36.
22. The properties of this Kingdom are. First. That it is universal. 1. In respect of all ages, Mat. 22. 43. 44. 45. 2. In respect of all kind of men. Dan. 7. 14. Rev. 17. 14. 3. In respect also of all Creatures, as they do in any sort pertain to the furthering, or beautifying of men's salvation. Eph. 1, 21. 22.
23. Secondly, that it is over the very souls, and consciences of men, Rom. 14. 17.
24. Thirdly, that it dispenseth life and death eternal, Rev. 1. 18.
25. Fourthly, that it is eternal. Dan. 2. 44. & 7. 14.
26. Fifthly, that it brings greatest peace, and perfect felicity to those, that are heirs of it Isaiah 9. 6. Eph. 2. 16. Hebr. 7. 2.
27. Hence this Kingdom in the Scriptures is everywhere called the Kingdom of God, the kingdom of peace, and glory, in the places above cited: and the Kingdom of light and glory, the Kingdom of Heaven, and the world to come, Hebr. 2. 5.

28. And hence also it appeareth how necessary it was that Christ the Mediator should be God, and man: for unless he had been God, he could not be the spiritual King of our souls, dispensing life and death eternal: and unless he had been man he could not have been an head of the same kind with his body.

29. Christ in all his offices had types: In the propheticall office he had men also so subordinate to himselfe that they also were called prophets: but his Priesthood and kingdom do not admit such a subordination: neither was there ever any by office a spiritual Priest or King beside Christ alone.

30. The reason of the difference is, because that the declaration of the will of God unto men, which is the office of a Prophet may in some manner be performed by a mere man: but purging of sins by sacrifice before God which is the duty of a priest, and government over the souls and consciences of men, which is the part of a King, cannot at all be done by a mere man.

31. The Kings of the nations, are not properly subordinate to Christ in their authority, but unto God.

CHAPTER XX.

Of Satisfaction.

1. There be two parts of redemption: the humiliation of Christ as our Mediator, and his exaltation.

2. Humiliation is that whereby he is subject to the justice of God, to perform all those things which were required to the redemption of man. Phil. 2. 8. Being found in shape as a man, he humbled himself and became obedient unto death.

3. This humiliation was not properly of the Divine nature or person, considered in it self, but of the Mediator God-man.

4. Therefore the taking of the human nature, considered simply & in it self is not a part of this humiliation: because it was the action of God only: but that condition of a servant, which did accompany the taking of the Divine nature, was the prime and proper reason of the humiliation. Yet in respect of this condition, by a relation redounding from thence, the Divine person is rightly said to be of no reputation. Phil. 2. 7. Because it did exist in that form, which for a time was void of all glory and Divine Majesty: for the Divine Majesty did suppress and hide it self throughout all that space of humiliation; that it did not constantly exercise that dignity which did afterward appear in the exaltation.

5. The end of this humiliation is satisfaction and merit.

6. It is called satisfaction, as it is ordered to the honor of God by a certain recompense for the injury done to him by our sins, Rom. 3. 25. Whom God hath set forth to be a reconciliation by his blood to show this righteousness. This is shown in all those places of Scripture wherein Christ is said to be dead for us, for that efficiency is set forth in this phrase, which cannot be attributed to Paul, or Peter in their death, 1 Cor. 1. 13. Which takes away condemnation, Rom. 8. 34. Which finally brings with it reconciliation to salvation, Rom. 5. 10.

7. It is the same also which is signified where it is said, he was made sin for us. 2 Cor. 5. 21. For he could no other way be made sin then either by inward pollution, or outward reputation: but he was most of all free from pollution: neither did the imputation of sin any other way agree to him then that he might for us undergo the punishment due to sin.

8. In the same respect it is said that he bore our iniquities, Isaiah 53. 4. Neither doth that phrase signify a bearing of patience: for by bearing he took away the sins of the world, John 1. 29. Neither doth it only declare a power of taking away sins: for he bore our sins in his body upon the Cross. 1 Pet. 2. 24.

9. The like source is of that for which he paid the price of redemption for us. Mat. 20. 28. For neither is there a mere delivering set forth by that phrase, nor every means of it; because the price it self is nominated, and it is intimated to be of the like common respect with the payment of silver or gold for vendible merchandize. 1 Pet. 1. 18. And the application of this price it also added. Hebr. 9. 13. 14. 15. Blood sprinkling those that are unclean. And 10. 22. Our hearts purged by sprinkling from an evil conscience. So that Christ himself is therefore a Mediator because he hath given himself a price of redemption. 1 Tim. 2. 5. 6. And we are therefore made partaker of that redemption, because Christ hath given himself for us, Gal. 2. 20. And we believe in him. John 1. 12. And by him in God. 1 Pet. 1. 21.

10. In the same sense also he is called an offering and sacrifice for our sins, Eph. 5. 2. He gave himself for us an offering and sacrifice of a sweet smelling favor to God. For he was so true and proper a sacrifice for sin, that all other sacrifices which went before, were but shadows of this: and after this is finished, it is neither needful, nor lawful to offer any other, Hebr. 16. 12. 14.

11. But this whole mystery depends upon this, that Christ is made such a Mediator, as that he is also a surety. Hebr. 7. 22. And the common root of those that are to be redeemed, as Adam was of those that are created, and lost. Rom. 5. 16. 17. 18. 19. 1 Cor. 15. 22.

12. In the same humiliation of Christ there was also, merit, as it is ordered to our benefit, or to obtain some good for us in the way of reward. This is shown in all those places of Scripture wherein he is said by his obedience to have procured righteousness for us. Rom. 5. 19. Many are made righteous: to procure the favor of God for us, Rom. 5. 10. We have been reconciled to God by the death of his Son: and to procure life eternal for us, Rom. 6. 23. Life eternal by Jesus Christ.

13. The merit and satisfaction of Christ differ not in the thing it self, so as they should be sought for in sundry and different operations: but they ought in a diverse way to be acknowledged in one and the same obedience.

14. Neither ought any part of that obedience which is found in the humiliation of Christ, to be excluded from that dignity and use.

15. But the exaltation of Christ, although it be an essential part of his mediation, yet it doth not pertain to his merit, or satisfaction.

16. This satisfaction as touching the substance of the thing was perfect, in rigor of justice: yet it presupposeth grace, whereby Christ was called to perform this work, and whereby it being performed, it was accepted in our name and for our good: Lastly, whereby that is performed by covenant rewarding which was required in this Satisfaction, John 3. 16. So God loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, Rom. 3. 24. We are justified freely by his grace, through the redemption made in Jesus Christ, and 5. 15. The grace of God, and gift by grace, which is of that one man Jesus Christ.

17. Hence greatest justice, and greatest grace, are together manifested, and work in man's redemption. Rom. 5. 17. They receive abundance of grace, and the gift of righteousness, so that all the fruit of this Satisfaction are rightly together called the fruits and effects of the grace and mercy of God.

18. This Satisfaction had worth sufficient, and in some respect infinite: First, from the person of him that did offer, who was God: Secondly, from the dignity and excellency of the thing offered, for he offered himself God and man. Thirdly, from the manner of offering, in which there was a certain divine perfection, by reason of the personal Union.

19. For as the greatness of the injury grows from the dignity of the person offended, because there the worth of the offended person is hurt: so the worth of him that makes satisfaction doth grow from the dignity of him that makes Satisfaction, because here the yielding of honor is looked unto, which depends upon the dignity of him that yields the honor.

20. Also in satisfaction, not the act only or suffering, but also the person it self which doth or suffereth is voluntarily subjected to the obedience of him to whom that honor is yielded, also the manner of working doth always flow from him that worketh with proportion:

21. Where this also is to be observed, that a substantial dignity such as was in Christ, doth more properly confer to the dignity of the work, then an accidentary dignity, such as is in some men.

22. From this dignity of the person it comes to pass, that the satisfaction of Christ, was sufficient as touching the substance: and superabundant as touching certain circumstances which did not at all agree to Christ.

CHAPTER XXI.

Of the Life of Christ being humbled.

1. The parts of Christ's humiliation are two: his Life, and Death.

2. Of his Life there are two parts: the first in his Conception and Birth: the second after he was Borne.

3. Unto his conception there were two principles that did work together one active, and another passive.

4. The Passive was the blessed Virgin Mary: which ⟨◇⟩ called a passive principle, not because she did nothing unto the bringing forth of Christ, but because she did nothing of herself, but that she did administer that matter of which the flesh of Christ was formed. Neither yet could she administer it immediately fit, (for she had no pure matter) but it was made fit by a certain supernatural preparation, and sanctification, Luc. 1. 35. Because that which shall be borne of thee is holy, yet Christ was truly and really the Son of Mary, and the seed of the Woman promised from the beginning. Neither are there therefore two Son-ships in Christ really distinct, or two sons joined together; for that temporal Son-ship, whereby he is referred to his Mother, was a respect of reason only. Indeed the human nature of Christ had a real relation to Mary, as to a cause, but the Son-ship doth no way agree to the nature, but to the person only: yet there is that relation of the human nature to the person, and of Mary to that nature, that it may be truly and rightly said, Mary was the Mother of God.

5. The active principle of this conception was not a man (whence, blessed Mary was a Mother and Virgin together. Mat. 1. 23. Isaiah 7. 14.) But the holy Spirit. Neither yet can Christ be called the Son of the holy Spirit, no not in as much as he is man; for as he is man, neither is he of the same nature with the holy Spirit, neither doth it agree to a nature, but to a person to undergo the respect of a Son.

6. In the first instant of this conception, Christ received according to his human nature, fullness of all grace, as touching the first act. John 1. 14. Full of grace, and truth. Luc. 2. 40. He was filled with wisdom, yet so as that it might be increased as touching the second acts, and by spreading forth to new objects, Luke 2. 25. He grew in Wisdom.

7. Hence Christ was indeed enriched with blessedness, from the very instant of his conception, but so as that, as travellers do, he proceeded in it, until he came to highest exaltation.

8. In the birth of Christ there was humility of greatest poverty with an attestation of gratest glory: that both natures, and both parts of mediation, might be declared from the beginning.

9. All the earthly things which did belong to the birth of Christ were most humble: But the Angels and Stars of Heaven did declare that glory wherewith all kinds of men, Shepherds, wisemen, Herod, and the Priests with all the people were moved, Luc. 1. 18. Mat. 2. 2. 3.

10. By reason of this birth he was according to the flesh the Son of the Patriarchs of all the world, yet specially he was that seed of Abraham, in whom all Nations should be blessed; and that Son of David who was to possess a Kingdom, not of this, but of another forever. John 18. 36. My Kingdom is not of this world. Luc. 1. 33. And he shall reign in the house of Jacob forever, and of his kingdom there shall be no end.

11. The time, place, and the like circumstances, accompanying his Birth did make the same truth manifest.

12. After the birth of Christ was his life. Private and public.
13. He lived a private life before public, because the condition of man did so require, to which he had subjected himself, because the Law of God had so determined, and so also the infirmity of man did require that by degrees the Sun of righteousness should appear unto them, and that they should be lead as it were by the hand from every imperfect thing to that which is perfect.
14. In his private life, there was his infancy and subjection to his parents.
15. In his infancy there was his. 1. Circumcision... and offering. 2. His flight unto Egypt, and returning thence.
16. Christ was circumcised and offered, because he did subject himself not only to the eternal and moral Law, but also to the Ceremonial, and every Law of God.
17. Those ceremonial observations, were so many confessions of sin. Therefore Christ who was made sin for us, was fitly made conformable to them.
18. Also they were certain outward means belonging to Divine worship: therefore Christ observed them, that he might fulfill all righteousness.
19. Lastly, they were certain types shadowing forth Christ: now that he might fulfill those, and by this means sanctify the same, he would apply them to himself.
20. Circumcision was the Seal of the Covenant of God.
21. Offering was a presenting and dedicating the first born unto God: therefore Christ was fitly both circumcised and offered, because he was to confirm that saving Covenant by his blood, and among the first borne, he was only perfectly holy to God, of whom all others were only types.
22. His flight into Egypt, and his return thence, was, 1. That he might show from the beginning of his age, that he was borne to undergo misery. 2. That according to the condition to which he had submitted himself, he might provide for his life after the manner of men. 3. That he might withal show, that he was the man, that should bring us out of spiritual Egypt into the promised Land.
23. In his subjection to his parents which pertaineth to the fifth precept of the Decalogue, he did show that he was subject to the whole moral Law. 1. Because there is the same reason of one precept as of all. 2. Because there is no part of moral obedience from which Christ the Lord of Heaven and Earth might seem to be more free, then from subjection to men.
24. Although that this legal obedience was required of Christ now made man by right of Creation, yet because he was made man, not for himself, but for us, it was a part of that humiliation, satisfaction and merit, which God required, and accept of him for us.
25. In this subjection these two things are to be observed. The exception which he did suffer, and the effect which it did bring forth.

26. The exception was the disputation which he had with the Scribes, when he was but twelve years old.
27. This disputation was a foregoing testimony, of that public calling whereby he was ordained and sent to be a master and teacher of Israel.
28. It was also to teach, that that knowledge and wisdom wherewith Christ was endued, was not gotten, by progress of time, but conferred or infused of God from the beginning.
29. The effect of this subjection was his laboring with his hands, that is, an enduring of that curse of ours, whereby it comes to pass that we eat our bread with that labor in the sweat of the face.
30. His public life is that whereby he openly manifested himself to be the Messias. In this life, there was. 1. The entrance. 2. The progress. 3. The conclusion.
31. Unto the entrance pertains his Baptism and Tentation.
32. The Baptism of Christ was his public inauguration to the public performance of his office: therefore in it, the three offices of Christ are affirmed, and confirmed.
33. They are affirmed by the testimony of the father publicly pronouncing that Jesus Christ is his Son, and so that he appointed a king by him, even that King in whom he is well pleased, that is, a chief Priest, who by his intetcession should take away the sins of the World, and a chief Prophet, Mat. 3. 17. & 17. 3. This is my Son in whom I am well pleased, hear him.
34. The same offices are confirmed by signs: namely, by opening of Heaven, descending of the holy Spirit under the bodily shape of a Dove, resting upon Christ, and an audible voice sent down from Heaven, whereby the testimony of the Father was signified.
35. They were also confirmed by the testimony of John, who was appointed, for a witness, preacher and forerunner of Christ, and being certified of Christ partly by the revelation of the Spirit, & partly by those signs before mentioned, he did testify of him before others.
36. Moreover by the Baptism of Christ, our Baptism was confirmed, and sanctified: and withal the person is declared to whom Baptism doth so adhere, that all the force of it is to be sought for in him.
37. Christ was tempted, that he might show that he was much stronger then the first Adam, and that he could also overcome temptations, and also help us with a fellow-feeling.
38. The progress of his public life was in poverty and labor.
39. The poverty of Christ was without a singular vow, and without beggary.
40. The labor of Christ was in travailing through divers Countries, in watchings, and in greatest intention of all his strength to do good.

41. 2. This public life of Christ was performed in preaching, and working miracles, unto the preaching of Christ was always joined, in respect of himself, grace and authority. In respect of others either opening, or hardening of heart.

42. The object of h...s preaching was properly the Gospel, or Kingdom of Heaven. Marc. 1. 14. Preaching the Gospel of the Kingdom of God.

43. The end of his miracles was. 1. To demonstrate the person of Christ. 2. To confirm his doctrine. 3. To signify his spiritual operations.

44. Christ wrought miracles, in the Angels, in men, in brute Creatures, in things without life: In Heaven, in Earth, in the Air, and in the Sea: in things corporeal, and spiritual: that he might show, his universal and Divine power to be of equal force in every kind of thing.

45. The conclusion of the life of Christ was in the very preparation to death.

46. His preparation to death was in his instructing his Disciples, and comforting them.

47. This instruction and consolation was partly exercised in his transfiguration, Luc. 9. 31. Moses and $\langle \phi \rangle$ appearing in glory did tell of his departure. And by those Sacraments which look to the death of Christ by a certain special respect, namely the passover, and supper of the Lord: partly in example, John 13. 15. I have given you example, that as I have done to, you, so also should ye do, partly in his last Sermon, John 14. & 15. & 16. and partly in his prayer, John 17.

CHAPTER XXII.

Of the Death of Christ.

1. The Death of Christ is the last act of his humiliation, whereby he did undergo, extreme, horrible, and greatest pains for the sins of men.

2. It was an act of Christ, and not a mere suffering, because he did of purpose dispose himself to undergo and sustain it. John 10. 11. I am that good shepherd: the good shepherd lays down his life for his sheep, Verse 11. No man taketh it from me, but I lay it down by myself: by the same reason also it was voluntary, not compelled. And out of power, not out of infirmity only: out of obedience to his Father, and love to us, not out of his own guilt or desert: unto satisfaction by overcoming, not to perdition by yielding.

3. It did contain greatest punishments: because it did equal all that misery which the sins of men did deserve. Hence is that plenty of words & phrases, by which this death is set forth in Scriptures. For it is not simply called a death, but also a cutting off, a casting away, a treading under feet, a curse, an heaping up of sorrows, and such like. Isaiah. 53. Psal. 22.

4. But it did so conraine these punishments, that the continuance of them, and holding under, and such like circumstances, which accompany the punishments of the sins of all the damned, were removed from this death. Acts 2. 24. It could not be that he could be held under by death. The reason is first because such circumstances as these are not of the essence of the punishment it self: but adjuncts following and accompanying that punishment in those who cannot so suffer punishment, that by suffering they should satisfy. Secondly, because there was in Christ, both worthiness, and power to overcome as it were by this means, the punishment imposed. 1 Cor. 15. 54. 57. Death is swallowed up in victory. Thanks be given to God who hath given us victory by our Lord Jesus Christ.

5. But because there was in this death the consummation of all humiliation, whereof that also was the far greatest part: hence often in Scriptures by a Synecdoche of the member, the death itself of Christ is put for all that satisfaction which is contained in his whole humiliation.

6. These limitations being had, this death of Christ was the same in kind and proportion with that death which in justice was due to the sins of men representing the very same degrees, members, and kinds.

7. The beginning of the spiritual death of Christ in matter of loss, was the loosing of that joy and delight, which the enjoyment of God, and fullness of grace was wont to bring. But he did loose this spiritual joy, not as touching the principle and habit of it, but as to the act and sense of it.

8. The beginning of spiritual death in matter of sense, was the tasting of the wrath of God, and a certain subjection to the power of darkness. But that wrath of God was most properly that Cup which was given to Christ to be Drunke. Mat. 26. 39. My Father, if it be possible, let this Cup pass from me.

9. But the object of this anger was Christ, not absolutely, but only as touching the punishment which is brought by this anger, which he as our surety did undergo.

10. That subjection to the power of darkness was not to bondage, but to vexation, which Christ did feel in his mind.

11. From these the soul of Christ was affected with sorrow, grief, fear, and horror, in an agony. Mat. 26. 39. John 11. 27. Hebr. 5. 7. Luc. 22. 24.

12. In this manner was the soul of Christ affected not only in that part which some call the inferior, but also in the superior part: not only nor chiefly out of a fellow-feeling which it had with the body, put properly and immediately: not chiefly out of compassion which it had in respect of others, but out of a proper suffering, which it did undergo in our name. Lastly, not out of an horror of temporal death, which many of Christ's servants also have by his power overcome, but out of a certain sense of a supernatural and spiritual death.

13. There were two effects of this agony. First, a vehement deprecation showing a mind astonished and a nature flying from the bitterness of death, yet under condition, and with subjection to his Fathers will. Mar. 14. 35. He prayed that if it might be that hour might pass from him. John 12. 27. My soul is troubled, and what shall I say? Father keep me from this hour: but therefore came I unto this hour. Secondly, a watery sweat having clotters of blood mixed with it dropping down to the ground, Luc. 22. 44. Being in an agony he prayed more earnestly. And his sweat was like drops of blood falling down to the ground.

14. In this beginning of spiritual death there was a certain moderation, and mitigation, that in the mean while there might be place for those duties which were to be finished before his death, namely prayers, conferences, admonitions, answers.

15. This moderation was inward or outward.

16. The inward was by spaces of time upon the flacking of the pressure and vexation which he did feel in his soul. Hence in his understanding he did attend unto the course of his office undertaken, to the glory that would thence arise to his Father, and to himself, and to the salvation of those whom his Father had given to him. In his will also he did choose and embrace all the miseries of death to obtain those ends.

17. The outward mitigation of this death was by an Angel who did strengthen him in talking with him. Luc. 22. 43. And appeared to him an Angel from Heaven comforting him.

18. There was no inward beginning of the bodily death of Christ besides that natural mortality and weakening which the outward force did bring.

19. The external beginning was manifold, both in matter of loss, and matter of sense.

20. In matter of loss, he was rejected of his own people, counted worse then a murderer, forsaken of his most inward Disciples, denied, and betrayed of all kind of men, especially of the chief ones, and those who were counted the more wise, he was called a mad man, a deceiver, a blasphemer, one having a devil, a great man and invader of another man's kingdom, he was stripped of his garments, and destitute of necessary food.

21. In matter of sense there was. First, shameful apprehending. Secondly, a violent taking away: in just judgments, both Ecclesiastical, and civil. Fourthly, in working, whipping, and crucifying, with reproaches, and injuries of all kinds joined with them. Yet there was some mitigation of this death. First, by manifestation of the Divine Majesty, to the working of certain miracles: as in casting the Soldiers down to the ground with his sight and voice, and in healing the ear of Malchus. Secondly, by operation of the Divine providence, whereby it came to pass, that he was justified by the Judge, before he was condemned. Mat. 29. 24. I am innocent of the blood of this just man.

22. The consummation of the Death of Christ was in the highest degree of the punishment appointed: where is to be considered. The death it self, and the continuance of it.

23. The consummation of spiritual death in matter of loss, was, that forsaking of the Father whereby he was deprived of all sense of consolation. Mat. 27. 46. My God, my God why hast thou forsaken me?

24. The consummation of the death of Christ in matter of sense was the curse, whereby he did endure the full sense of God's judgment upon man's sin. Gal. 3. 13. He was made a curse for us. The hanging on the Cross was not a cause and reason of this curse, but a sign and symbol of it. Ibid.

25. The consummation of bodily death was in the breathing out of his soul with greatest torment, and pain of the body.

26. In this death there was a separation made of the soul from the body, but the union of both did remain with the Divine nature, so that a dissolution of the person did not follow.

27. This death of Christ was true, not feigned: it was natural, or from causes naturally working to bring it, not supernatural; it was voluntary, not altogether compelled; yet it was violent, not of inward principles: It was also in a certain manner supernatural, and miraculous, because Christ did keep his life, and strength so long as he would, and when he would, he laid it down, John 10. 18.

28. The continuance of this death was, in respect of the state of lowest humiliation, not in respect of the punishment of affliction, for that which Christ said, it is finished, is understood of those punishments.

29. The continuance was the remaining under the dominion of death by the space of three days, Acts 2. 24. This state is wont properly to be set forth by descending into Hell.

30. Christ being buried three days, was a witness and certain representation of this state.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Of the Exaltation of Christ.

1. The Exaltation of Christ is that whereby he did gloriously triumph over his and our enemies. Luc. 24. 26. Ought not Christ to have suffered these things, and so to enter into glory? Eph. 4. 8. When he ascended up on high, he led captivity captive. Col. 2. 15. He hath spoiled principalities and powers, and hath made a show of them openly, and hath triumphed over them in it.

2. He overcame death by enduring it, sin by satisfying, the Devil by spoiling him, or taking the prey out of his hands.

3. The perfection and manifestation of this victory is in his Exaltation. Therefore although there was a virtual triumph, and triumph of merit in his death, and in the Cross, in which Christ is said to be exalted, or extolled. John 3. 14. Not in situation and place only, but also in virtue and merit: yet the actual triumph as touching the state of it, was not in his humiliation, but his Exaltation.

4. Christ did triumph in the Cross, as in a Field of victory; but in his Exaltation, as in the kingly seat, and Chariot of triumph.

5. The glory of this triumph was, a changing of the humble form of a servant, and that most abject condition which in it he did undergo, into blessedness altogether Heavenly. Phil. 2. 9. Wherefore also God did highly exalt him, and gave him a name above every name.

6. In respect of the Divine nature, it was only an active manifestation: in respect of the human nature, it was a real receiving with suitable actions flowing from it.

7. The human nature received all those perfections, which a created nature could take. For in the soul there flourished all kind of fullness of wisdom and grace, not only in respect of the principle and habit, but also in respect of the act and exercise: his body also was adorned with greatest purity, agility, splendor, and strength. Hebr. 12. 2. For the joy that was set before him, he endured the Cross, Phil. 3. 21. Who shall transform our vile body, that it may be like to his glorious body.

8. But as the soul of Christ being now exalted, did still retain the nature of a soul, so also the body glorified did in no wise lay down the essence, and essential properties of a body: therefore it can neither be everywhere, nor together in many places, nor in the same place with another body Penetrative. Which indeed all that have eyes to see may clearly perceive in those phrases of Scripture. Being taken from them he was carried up into Heaven. Luke 24. 51. He is not here, he is risen, Mat. 28. 6. And many such like.

9. There were three degrees of Exaltation opposite to as many degrees of his extreme humiliation: namely his Resurrection from the dead being opposed to his death; his ascending into Heaven opposed to his descending into the Grave, and to the Lowest place of the Earth, and his sitting at the right Hand of God opposed to his remaining in the Grave, and in the state of death or in Hell.

10. Christ's Resurrection was of his whole human nature which before had fallen by death. In respect of the soul it was from Hell, or from the state, and dominion of death, to which the soul as it was a part of the human nature, was subject. In respect of the body, it was from the dead, and from the Grave.

11. The soul is said improperly to have risen again: but the body and human nature properly. For the body, and the man, did properly recover his perfection: but the soul did recover the act and motion of its perfection in the body.

12. There are two parts of his Resurrection; the first is an internal act, namely a reviving restored, by the uniting of soul and body: the second is an external act, namely his going out of the Grave to the manifestation of life restored.

13. Unto this Resurrection there did give testimony. 1. The Angels. 2. Christ himself by divers apparitions (ten whereof at least are reckoned up in the Scriptures) and also by divers proofs taken out of the Scriptures. 3. Men, who were certified of it by seeing hearing, and handling him.

14. But Christ did rise not by the power or leave of another, although this operation be attributed to God the Father, Acts 2. 24. But by his own power. John 2. 19. Destroy this Temple, and within three days I will raise it up. And 10. 18. I have power of taking up my life again.

15. The time of Resurrection was the third Day after his Death and Burial, Mat. 16. 2. Luke 24. 7 Acts 10. 40. 1 Cor. 15. 4.

16. The end of this Resurrection was. 1. That he might be declared to be the Son of God, Rom. 1. 4. Declared mightily to be the Son of God by the Resurrection from the dead. 2. That he might seal a full victory of death, 1 Cor. 15. 57. Thanks be to God who hath given us victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. 3. That he might fulfill those parts of his office which did follow his death, Rom. 4. 25. He was raised again for our justification. 4. That he might show himself both justified, and justifying others, 1 Cor. 15. 17. If Christ be not risen, your faith is vain: ye are yet in your sins. 5. That he might be the substance, example, and entrance of our spiritual, and corporal Resurrection. Vers 20. 21. 23. of the same Chapter. He is made the first fruits of them that sleep. In Christ shall all be made alive.

17. For Christ as God is the cause absolutely principal of our Resurrection: as satisfying by his humiliation, and death, he is the meritorious cause: but as rising from the dead he is the exemplary cause, and withal a demonstration and an initiation.

18. The ascending of Christ into Heaven, is a middle degree, or certain progress of exaltation, whereby leaving the Earth he ascends up into the highest Heaven as into his throne of glory. Acts 1. 11. He is taken up from you into Heaven, Ephes. 4. 10. He ascended far above all Heavens.

19. This ascension was of the whole person; yet it doth not agree to the Divine nature, but figuratively, namely as it was the cause of ascending, and was joined with the human nature, in excellency: manifesting also his glory in it, whereof he had as it were emptied himself, when he descended into it by the incarnation: but it doth most properly agree to the human nature, because it suffered change from a lower place to an higher.

20. The time of his ascension was 40 days after his Resurrection, Acts 1. 3. not sooner: because the infirmity of the Disciples did require the delay of this space of time, that their faith might be confirmed by divers appearings, and they might also be more fully instructed in those things, which pertain to the Kingdom of God. Acts 1. 3. Not later, least he should seem to think upon an earthly life.

21. The place from which he did ascend was mount Olivet, Acts 1. 12. Where also he entered into deepest humiliation, Luc. 22. 39. That he might teach that his suffering, and ascension did pertain to the same thing.

22. The place into which he ascended, was the Heaven of the blessed, and which is not an ubiquitary Heaven, as some do imagine, so as that ascension should only be a change of condition, and not of place, but it is the highest above all the other Heavens, Eph. 4. 10. The seat, house or mansion of God. John 14. 2. So that in respect of local presence, Christ's human nature is rightly and truly said to be with us in Earth, Mat. 26. 11. Although he himself in respect of his person, and that spiritual efficacy which doth depend upon the human nature, is everywhere with his unto the end of the world, Mat. 28. 20.

23. The witnesses of this ascension, were both many men, and Angels. Acts 1.

24. In respect of order, he was the first of all those who ascended into Heaven, in priority of nature: because his ascension was a cause by virtue whereof others do ascend. Heb. 9. 8. But others had ascended in their souls before in time, Col. 1. 20. And some also (as it is most like) in their bodies. Gen. 5. 24. Hebr. 11. 5. 2 King... 2. 11.

25. The cause of this ascension was the same which before was of the Resurrection: namely the power of God, which is the same both of the Father and the Son: hence in respect of the Father it is called an assumption which in respect of the Son is called an ascension. Act, 1. 11. But there was added moreover the condition of a glorified body; which is carried as well upward as downward.

26. The ends of his ascension were. 1. That he might place his human nature now glorified in the mansion of glory. 2. That he might show himself to be him who could pierce into the Heavenly and deepest counsels of God. John 3. 13. How shall ye believe, if I tell you heavenly things? For there is none that ascendeth into Heaven, but he who descendeth from Heaven; namely, the son of man who is in Heaven. 3. That he might prepare mansions for all his in the house of his Father. John 14. 3. 4. That he might in the name of his own take possession of the heavenly Kingdom. Eph. 2. 6. Hath raised us up together, and hath made us sit together in Heaven, in Christ Jesus. 5. That by his intercession & power he might take care for those things which were to be performed for their salvation. John... 16. 7. If I go from you, I will send the Comforter unto you. 6. That we may have a most certain argument of our ascension into Heaven, 1 Cor. 15. 20. He is made the first fruits of them that sleep. 7. That we also might in thought, affection and conversation follow after Heavenly things. Col. 3. 1. Phil. 3. 20. Seek those things that are above where Christ is. We carry ourselves a Citizens of Heaven: from whence also we look for a Savior, the Lord Jesus Christ.

27. Sitting at the right Hand of God is the highest degree of his Exaltation, whereby he enjoyeth the highest glory of his mediation. Hence Resurrection, and Ascension are motions tending to this sitting: hence also Resurrection and Ascension in a certain manner common to us with Christ; but sitting at the right hand of the Father agrees to none, but to Christ only.

28. That highest glory wherewith Christ is endowed by this sitting, is properly and formally a kingly glory. Acts 2. 36. Let therefore all the house of Israel know for certain, that God hath made this man a Lord.

29. This Kingly glory is a fullness of power and majesty whereby he governeth all things for the good of his, Psal. 110. 1. 1 Cor. 15. 25. For he must reign until he have put down all his enemies, under his feet.

30. This majesty and power doth properly agree to the person of Christ the Mediator: in respect of which it is also truly said that the human nature of Christ hath now so much eminency of dignity and ruledome, that with power he is above, and set over all created things, Eph. 1. 20. But from this eminency of dignity, to conclude that the human nature of Christ (which was created end remains finite) being absolutely and abstractedly considered, hath the same omnipotency, and omnipresency with God himself it is no other thing then a certain stupid madness, and it is not far from blasphemy.

31. Unto this kingly dignity pertains that power whereby Christ was made the judge of all men, and Angels.

32. This kingly glory of Christ doth also redound unto other of his offices, so that he exerciseth a kingly Priest-hood, and a kingly prophecy.

33. The kingly priest-hood is, that whereby he doth plead our cause, not by suffering, and humbly supplicating as it were with bended knees, but by representing gloriously those things which he did and suffered. Hebr. 9. 24. Christ is entered into Heaven it self, to appear before the Face of God for us.

34. Christ doth exercise a kingly prophecy: whilst he pours out his spirit upon all flesh: whilst he sends his Ambassadors, works together with them, and confirms their word by signs that follow: lastly whilst he gather his own out of the world, protects, builds up, and preserves them forever. Mat. 28. 18, 19, 20. Marc. 16. 20.

CHAPTER XXIV.

Of the application of Christ.

So much of Redemption: The application of the same Redemption follows.

1. This application is that whereby all those things which Christ hath done, and doth as Mediator, are made actually effectual in some certain Men.

2. This application by a special appropriation is attributed to the holy Spirit, 1 Cor. 12. 13. By one spirit we are all baptized into $\langle \diamond \rangle$ $\langle \diamond \rangle$: yet it doth depend. 1. Upon the decree, and donation of the Father▪ whereby he hath given some certain men to Christ to be redeemed, and saved. John 6. 36. This is the will of my Father, that of that he hath given me, I should lose nothing, for all those, and only those whom the Father hath given to Christ, do come to him. Ibid. verse 37. 2. Upon the intention of Christ whereby he hath determined his satisfaction for the good of those, whom he hath appointed to him by his Father. John 17. 9. 11. 12. 19. I pray for them whom thou hast given me, because they are thine. 3. Upon the acceptation of the Father, whereby he doth accept and ratify that satisfaction for the reconciliation, & salvation of the same persons. 2 Cor. 5. 19. Namely, that God was in Christ, reconciling the world to himself, not imputing their sins unto them.

3. This transaction between God and Christ was a certain fore-going application of our redemption, and deliverance to our surety, and to us in him: which unto the finishing of that secondary application in us, hath the respect of an effectual example, so as, that is a representation of this, and this is brought forth by virtue of that.

4. Hence our deliverance from sin and death, was not only determined in the decree of God, but also granted, and communicated to Christ, and to us in him, before it be perceived by us.

Rom. 5. 10. 11. We were reconciled to God, by the death of his Son. By whom we have now received a reconciliation.

5. Hence both the Father and the Son are said to send the Spirit to perform this application, John 14. 16. & 16. 7. The Father shall give you an advocate, I will send him unto you.

6. Hence every good giving, and every perfect good is said to descend from above from the Father. James 1. 17. And all saving things are said to be communicated to us, in Christ, as in the head. For Christ as obtaining it by his merit and through Christ, as effectually applying it. Eph. 1. 3. 5. 11.

7. Hence also application is the end & effect of impetration. But seeing the end is intended by God the Father and Christ, it hath a certain connection with impetration as with its means. For if the redemption of Christ were of incertaine event, then the Father should appoint the S...nne to death, and the Son also should undergo it, being yet uncertain, whether any would be saved by it or no; then also all the fruit of this mystery should depend upon the free will of men.

8. Hence application is altogether of the same latitude with redemption it self, that is, the redemption of Christ is applied to all and only those, for whom it was obtained by the intention of Christ and the Father, yet for their sakes the same temporal benefits of Christ do redound unto thers also.

9. And in this sense, namely in respect of the intention of application it is rightly said: Christ did only satisfy for those that are saved by him: although in respect of that sufficiency which is in the mediation of Christ, it may be rightly said also, Christ satisfied for all, or everyone: and because those counsels of God are hidden to us, it is agreeable to charity, to judge very well of everyone, although we may not pronounce of all together collectively, that Christ did equally plead their cause before God.

10. The way of application whereby God doth with greatest firmness perform that, which was contained in a covenant formerly made, and broken, is called in the Scriptures a new covenant, Hebr. 8. 8. 10. A covenant of life, salvation, and grace, Rom. 4. 16. Gal. 3. 18. Which in the same sense also is called the Gospel. Rom. 1. 16. The good Word of God. Hebr. 6. 5. A faithful saying and worthy of all acceptation. 1 Tim. 1. 15. A good doctrine. 1 Tim. 4. 6. The Word of life. Phil. 2. 16. The Word of reconciliation, 2 Cor. 5. 19. The Gospel of peace. Eph. 2. 17. & 6. 15. The Gospel of salvation, and the Word of truth, Eph. 1. 13. The arm of God, Isaiah 53. 1. The savor of life to life, 2 Cor. 2. 16.

11. It is called a covenant because it is a firm promise, for in the Scriptures every firm purpose, although it be of things without life, is called a covenant, Ierem. 33. 20. 25. My covenant of the day, and my covenant of the night: if my covenant be not with day and night, if I appoint not the statutes of Heaven and Earth.

12. Yet because it consists of a free donation, and is confirmed by the death of the giver, it is not so properly called a covenant as a testament, Hebr. 9. 16. Which seeing it is not found in the former, that is not so properly called a testament as a covenant.

13. But this new covenant differs from the old many ways. 1. In the kind, for that was as it were a covenant of friendship between the Creator and the creature: but this is a covenant of reconciliation between enemies.

14. 2. In the efficient: for in that there was an agreement of two parties, namely God and man: but in this God only doth covenant. For man being now dead in sin, had no ability to contract a spiritual covenant with God. But if two parties after the manner of a covenant are to be appointed, yet then God only is the party assuming, and constituting, but man is the party assumed.

15. 3. It differs in the object: for that is extended to all men, but this belongs to some certain ones in a special manner. For although the promulgation of it be oftentimes propounded promiscuously, after the manner of men, yet by a special propriety it belongs, and is directed to those to whom it was intended by God, who are therefore called sons and heirs, of this promise and of salvation, Gen. 15. Act. 1. 39. & 3. 25. Rom. 4. 16. 13. & 9. 7. 8. Gal. 3. 21. 29.

16. 4. In the beginning or moving cause: for there God according to his soveraignty did work out of his wise and just counsel: but here mercy only hath place. There indeed there did some respect of grace shine forth, in appointing a reward due to obedience: yet it was not properly directed by grace: and so not this covenant of grace, but that was accomplished, that is, it did actually lead man to happiness.

17. 5. In the foundation, which in the former was the ability of man himself; but in this, Christ Jesus.

18. 6. In the matter or good things promised: for in that God promised life only; but in this he promiseth righteousness also, and all the means of life: because to man being dead, not the continuance or perfection of life, but restoring was necessary.

19. 7. In the conditions: for that required perfect obedience of works, which was also to be performed by man of his own strength before any effect of the promise, that it might have respect of merit unto it: but this requires not any condition properly so called, or going before, but only following after or coming between, and that to be communicated by grace, that it might be a means to perfect the same grace: which is the proper nature of Faith.

20. 8. In the effects: for that taught and showeth what is righteous, but this bestows righteousness it self, in that there was a dead letter, and deadly to a sinner: but in this a quickening spirit.

21. Hence that never brought salvation to any man, neither could bring anything to a sinner, but only death but this doth not properly and of it self bring death or condemnation to any, but it brings assured salvation to all those of whom it is received.

22. 9. In the adjunct of continuance: for that is antiquated in respect of those who are partakers of this new: but this is everlasting, both in respect of the countenance it hath in it self, because it admitts no end, or change, touching the substance, and also in respect of those to whom it is communicated, because the grace of this covenant doth continue forever with them, who are once truly in covenant.

CHAPTER XXV.

Of Predestination.

1. BEcause this application of redemption is made to some certain men, and not to all, so that it showeth a manifest difference between men, in respect of the dispensation of grace; hence it doth make the predestination of God concerning men appear to us in the first place.

2. Predestination indeed was from eternity, Eph. 1. 4. He hath chosen us before the foundations of the World were laid. 2 Tim. 1. 9. Which grace was given us before all ages. And it did also work from the beginning of the works of God: but it makes no inward difference in the Predestinate themselves before the actual dispensation of this application. Eph. 2. 3. And we were by nature the children of wrath as well as others. 1 Cor. 6. 11. Thus ye were indeed. For Predestination before the application of grace doth put nothing in the persons Predestinated, but it doth lie hid only in him that doth predestinate.

3. This Predestination is the decree of God of manifesting his special glory in the eternal condition of men. Rom. 9. 22. 23. Willing to show his wrath and to make his power known, he suffered with much long suffering the vessels of wrath, prepared to destruction. And to make known the riches of his glory towards the vessels of mercy which he hath prepared unto glory 1. Thess. 5. 9. God hath not appointed us to wrath, but to obtain mercy.

4. It is called destination: because it is a certain determination of the order of means unto the end. But because God had determined this order with himself, before any actual existence of things, therefore it is not simply called destination, but predestination.

5. It is called a decree: because it contains a definite sentence to be executed by certain counsel. In the same sense also it is called a purpose, and counsel, because it propounds an end to be attained unto, as it were with an advised deliberation.

6. Hence predestination hath greatest wisdom, freedom, firmness, and immutability joined with it: because these are found in all the decrees of God.

7. Therefore the reason of Predestination is immovable, and indissoluble, 2 Tim. 2. 19. The foundation of God standeth sure having this seal. The Lord knoweth who are his. And under that respect the number of the predestinated, (not only the formal number, or number numbering (as they speak) that is, how many men at length shall be saved, and how many not: but also the material number or number numbered, that is, who those several men are) is certain with God, not only by certainty of foreknowledge, but also by certainty of order of means. Luc. 10. 20. Rejoice that your names are written in the Heavens.

8. For Predestination doth not necessarily presuppose either its limit, or object as existing, but it maketh it to exist: so that by force of predestination it is ordered, that it should be. 1 Pet. 1. 20. Of Christ foreknowne before the foundations of the world were laid.

9. Hence also it depends upon no cause, reason or outward condition, but it doth purely proceed from the will of him that predestinateth. Mat. 11. 26. Even so Father, because it pleased thee. Rom. 9. 16. 18. It is not of him that willeth, nor of him that runneth, but of God that showeth mercy: he hath mercy on whom he will, and whom he will he hardeneth.

10. Hence it is neither necessary nor agreeable to the Scriptures either to appoint any fore required quality in man, as it were the formal object of Predestination: or so to assign any certain condition of man, that the rest should be excluded: for it is sufficient to understand that men are the object of this decree, so that the difference of the decree doth not depend upon man, but that difference, which is found in men, doth follow upon the decree

11. In order of intention there is no fore-knowledge, fore-required, or ought to be presupposed unto the decree of Predestination, besides that simple intelligence which is of all possible things: because it depends not upon any reason, or eternal condition, but doth purely proceed from the will of him that doth predestinate. Eph. 1. 5. 9. He hath predestinated us according to the good pleasure of his own will. According to his free good will which he had purposed in himself.

12. It is properly an act of God's Will, whereby it is exercised about a certain object which it determines to bring to a certain end by certain means. Eph. 1. 11. We were chosen, when we were predestinated, according to the purpose of him that worketh all things according to the pleasure of his own will.

13. This decree as it doth exist in the mind of God presupposing an act of the will is called fore knowledge: whence it comes to pass that fore-knowledge signifies as much sometime as Predestination, but less properly, Romans 11. 2. He hath not cast away his people whom he fore-knew.

14. There is only one act of will in God properly, because all things in him are together, and nothing before or after, and so there is only one decree about the end and means: but after our manner of conceiving, God in order of intention doth will the end before the means. Rom. 8. 30. Whom he hath predestinated, those he called: although in order of execution, he willeth the means first before their direction to the end. 2 Thess. 2. 13. He hath chosen us to salvation through sanctification, and faith.

15. Some things are the means, and the end, and the causes also of other means. John. 6. 37. Whatsoever the Father giveth me shall come to me, and him that cometh to me, I will in no wise cast away, yet they are not causes of the act it self of Predestination, nor of all the effects of it.

16. There are some means which of their own nature are ordered to the end of Predestination: of which sort are all those things which pertain to the grace revealed in the Gospel; but other things in a certain outward respect are subjected to this order: such as are natural good or evil things which above or beyond their nature through the over-ruling direction of grace do work together to our salvation.

17. Of Predestination there are two kinds, Election and Reprobation.

18. Election is the predestination of some certain men, that the glorious grace of God may be manifested in them. Eph. 1. 4. 5. 6. He hath chosen us, he hath predestinated us to the praise of his glorious grace.

19. Election is an act of the will, which in God is only one and simple: yet after our manner of conceiving it sets forth (by Synecdoche) by divers acts.

20. The first act of election then is to will the glory of his grace in the salvation of some men. 2 Thessa. 2. 13. God hath chosed us from the beginning unto salvation.

21. The second act is to appoint some certain men who shall be made partakers of this salvation. 2. Tim. 2. 19. The Lord knoweth who are his.

22. But the proper reason of election is in this second act, which act contains these three things in the conceaving of it, 1. Love. Rom. 9. 13. 2. Love with respect to a supernatural and chief good. Ier. 31. 3. Eph. 5. 25. 3. Love with a separating from others: in which comparative manner, there is contained a certain virtual intention of love. Rom. 9. 13. John. 17. 6. 1. Cor. 1. 27. 28.

23. The third act of election is a purpose or intention of preparing and directing those means by which men elected, are certainly lead through to salvation as to an end. But these means are properly redemption, and application of redemption, Ionh 6. 37. 2 Thess. 2. 13.

24. This third act in a special respect is called predestination: which is sometime in the Scriptures distinguished from election, even as it respects the elect above, Rom. 8. 29. Eph. 1. 4. & 5. Whom he did foreknow, those he also predestinated. As he hath chosen us. Who hath predestinated us. Although otherwise by a synecdoche it is used in the same sense with election.

25. Hence Predestination is sometime said to be according to his purpose. Eph. 1. 11. And his purpose according to election, Rom. 9. 11. And election also according to purpose, the counsel, and good pleasure of the Will of God, Eph. 1. 5.

26. There doth a certain knowledge particularly accompany these acts of will in election in the mind of God, whereby God doth most certainly know the heirs of eternal life: whence also election it self is called, knowledge or fore-knowledge. Rom. 8. 29. But this knowledge of God because with greatest firmness it retains the distinct names of those that are to be saved, and the good things appointed for them, as if all were written in God's Book, therefore it is called the book of Life. Psalms 69. 29. Revelations 3. 5. and 13. 8.

27 This election was only one in God in respect of whole Christ mystically considered, that is, of Christ, and of those who are Christ, as there was one Creation of all mankind; yet as a certain distinction may be conceived according to reason, Christ was first elected as the Head, and then some men as members in him. Eph. 1. 4.

28. Yet Christ is not the meritorious, or impulsive cause in respect of the election of men it self, although it hath the reason of a cause in respect of all the effects of election, which follow the sending of Christ himself.

29. Christ himself in the first act of election as touching the work of redemption is rightly said to be an effect, and means ordained to the salvation of man, as the end; as this salvation is the action of God, John 17. 6. Thine they were, and thou gavest them me. Yet as this salvation is our good, Christ is not the effect, but the cause of it. So it may be rightly said in respect of the first act of election, that Christ the redeemer was the effect and subordinate means, but in the third act of election he is to be considered as a cause, Eph. 1. 3. He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings, in the Heavens, in Christ.

30. Reprobation is the predestinating of some certain men, that the glory of God's Justice might be manifested in them. Rom. 9. 22. 2 Thess. 2. 12. Iud. 4.

31. Three acts are to be conceived in reprobation, as before in election.

32. The first act is to will the setting forth of Justice. Therefore the end of God in reprobation, is not properly the destruction of the Creature, but the Justice of God, which shines forth in deformed destruction.

33. Hence is the first difference in reason between election and reprobation, for in election not only the glorious grace of God hath the respect of an end: but also the salvation of men themselves: but in reprobation damnation in it self hath not the respect of an end, or of good.

34. The second act is to appoint those certain men in whom this Justice of God should be made manifest. Jude 4.

35. That act cannot properly be called election: because it is not out of love, neither doth it bring the bestowing of any good, but the privation of it: Therefore it is properly called reprobation, because it doth reject or remove those about whom it is exercised, from that love wherewith the elect are appointed to salvation. As therefore in election, there is love with discerning so in reprobation, there is seen the denial of love with putting a difference.

36. But because this negative setting apart which is found in reprobation, doth depend upon that setting apart which is in election: hence the remote end of reprobation is the glory of that grace which is manifested in election. Rom. 9. 22. 23. He suffered the vessels of wrath, that he might make known the riches of his glory toward the vessels of mercy.

37. Because of this setting apart, whereby God will not communicate blessedness upon some persons, he is therefore said to hate them. Rom. 9. 13. This hatred is called negative, or privative, because it denies election: but it includes a positive act whereby God would that some should be deprived of life eternal.

38. Nevertheless in this is the second difference of reason, between election and reprobation, that th... love of election, doth bestow the good on the Creatu... immediately, but the hatred of reprobation, doth only deny good, doth not bring or inflict evil, but the desert of the Creature coming between.

39. The third act of reprobation is an intention to direct those means whereby Justice may be manifested in the reprobate.

40. The most proper means of this kind are permission of sin, and living in sin, Rom. 9. 18.
•...2 Thess. 2. 11. 12.

41. In this act there is the third difference of reason between election and reprobation, that election is the cause, not only of salvation, but also of all those things which have the consideration of a cause unto salvation: but reprobation is not properly a cause, either of damnation, or of sin which deserves damnation, ⟨◇⟩ an an...ecedent only.

42. Hence also follows a fourth disparity, that the very means have not always among themselves the respect of a cause and effect: for the permission of sin is not the cause of forsaking, hardening, punishing, but sin it self.

CHAPTER XXVI.

Of •...lling.

Hitherto of Application: The parts of it follow.

1. THE parts of Application are two. Union with Christ, and communion of the benefits that flow from that Union, Phil. 3. 9. That I may be found in him, having the righteousness that is by the Faith of Christ.

2. This Union•... that spiritual relation of men to Christ whereby they obtain right to all those blessings which are prepared in him. 1 John 5. 12. He that hath the S•...e hath life ⟨◇⟩
And. 3. 24. He dwelleth ⟨◇⟩ him, and he in him.

3. This Union is wrought by calling.

4. For Calling is a gathering of men together to Christ, that they may be united with him. 1 Pet. 2. 4. 5. To whom coming, Eph. 4. 12. For the gathering together of the Saints, for the edifying of the Body of Christ. From which Union with Christ there follows Union with GOD the Father. 1 Thess. 1. 1. & 2. 1. 1. To the Church which is in GOD the Father, and in our Lord Jesus Christ.

5. This therefore is that first thing which pertains to the application of redemption. Eph. 1. 7. 8. 9. In whom we have redemption, &c. After he made known unto us the mystery of his will: and it is that first thing which doth make a man actually elected himself, that is the first act of election which is shown forth and exercised in man himself: whence also it is that Calling and election are sometime taken in the Scriptures in the same sense. 1 Cor. 1. 26. 27. 28. Ye see your Calling: God hath chosen foolish things and weak things.

6. Hence the Calling of men doth not in any sort depend upon the dignity, honesty, industry, or any endeavor of the called, but upon election and predestination of God only. Acts 2. 47.

The Lord did ad to the Church such as should be saved. And 13. 48. As many as were ordained to life believed. Rom. 8. 30. Whom he predestinated, them also he called. Tit. 3. 5. Not by works of righteousness, but of his own mercy, Jane... 1. 18. Of his own will begat he us by the word of truth.

7. The parts of Calling are two. The offer of Christ, and the receiving of him. John 1. 11. He came to his own, and his own received him not. But to as many as receive him, he gave to them, &c.

8. The offer, is an objective propounding of Christ as of a means sufficient and necessary to salvation. 1. Cor. 1. 23. 24. We preach Christ, the Power of God and the wisdom of God. Heb. 7. 25. He is able perfectly to save those that come to God by him. Acts 4. 12. Neither is there any other name under Heaven, which is given among men, by which we must be saved.

9. But there is nothing propounded, nor ought to be propounded of Christ, in the Calling of men, to be believed as true, which is not simply and absolutely true. For this is both against the nature of a testimony, as it is an object of that Faith which is in the understanding, the formal reason whereof is truth: and also is against the nature of the Gospel it self, which by an excellency, is called the word of truth. Eph. 1. 13.

10. The offer of Christ is outward, or inward.

11. The outward is a propounding, or preaching of the Gospel or of the promises of Christ. Acts. 9. 15. That he may bear my name in the sight of the Gentiles.

12. Yet that man be prepared to receive the promises, the application of the Law doth ordinarily go before to the discovery of sin, and inexcusableness and humiliation of the sinner: Rom. 7. 7. I knew not sin, but by the Law.

13. Those promises as touching the outward promulgation, are propounded to all without difference, together with a command to believe them, but as touching the propriety of the things promised, which depends upon the intention of him that promiseth, they belong only to the elect, who are therefore called the sons and heirs of the promise. Rom. 9. 8.

14. The inward offer is a spiritual enlightening, whereby those promises are propounded to the hearts of men, as it were by an inward word. John 6. 45. Whosoever hath heard of the Father and hath learned, cometh to me. Eph. 1. 17. That he might give unto you the spirit of wisdom and revelation, the eyes of your mind being enlightened, that ye may know what is that hope of your calling.

15. This also is sometime, and in a certain manner granted to those that are not elected. Hebrews 6. 4. & 10. 29. Mat. 13. 20.

16. If any one oppose himself out of malice to this illumination, he commits a sin against the Holy Ghost, which is called unpardonable, or unto death. Hebr. 6. 6. & 10. 29. 1 John 5. 16. Mat. 12. 32.

17. The receiving of Christ is that whereby Christ being offered is joined to man, and man unto Christ. John 6. 56. He abides in me, and I him.

18. In respect of this conjunction we say that we are in Christ, 2 Cor. 5. 17. And to put on Christ. Gal. 3. 27. To be dwelled in by Christ. Eph. 3. 17. The house of Christ. Hebr. 3. 6. the Temple of Christ, 2 Cor. 6. 16. To be espoused to Christ. Eph. 5. 23. Branches of Christ, John 15. 5. Members of Christ, 1 Cor. 12. 12. And the Name of Christ is a certain manner communicated to us. 1 Cor. 12. 12. So also is Christ.

19. By reason of this receiving, Calling is called conversion. Acts 26. 20. Because all they who obey the call of God, are wholly converted from sin to grace, from the world to follow God in Christ: It is also called regeneration as by that word, the very beginning of a new life, of a new Creation, of a new Creature, is often set forth in the Scriptures. John 1. 13. & 3. 6. 1 John 3. 9. 1 Pet. 1. 23. & 22. As in respect of the offer it is properly called, Calling, as God doth effectually invite and draw men to Christ. John 6. 44.

20. Receiving in respect of man is either passive, or active. Philippians 3. 12. That I may apprehend: I was apprehended.

21. Passive receiving of Christ is that whereby a spiritual principle of grace is begotten in the will of man. Eph. 2. 5. He hath quickened.

22. For this grace is the foundation of that revelation whereby a man is united with Christ, John 3. 3. Except a man be borne again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God.

23. But the will is the most proper and prime subject of this grace, because the conversion of the will is an effectual principle of the conversion of the whole man. Phil. 2. 17. It is God that worketh in you both to will and to do, of his own good pleasure.

24. The enlightening of the mind is not sufficient to produce this effect, because it doth not take away that corruption which is in the will, neither doth it communicate unto it any new supernatural principle, by virtue whereof it may convert it self.

25. Yet the will in respect of this first receiving, hath not the consideration either of a free agent, or a natural patient, but only of obediential subjection. 2 Cor. 4. 6. Because God who hath said that light should shine out of darkness, he it is who hath shined in our hearts.

26. Active receiving is Actus olicitus, an act of Faith drawn forth, whereby he that is called doth now wholly lean upon Christ as his Savior, and by Christ upon God, John 3. 15. 16. Whosoever believes in him, 1 Pet. 1. 21. Through him believing in God.

27. This act of Faith doth depend partly upon a principle or habit of grace ingenerated, and partly upon the operation of God moving before and stirring up, John 6. 44. None can come to me, unless the Father draw him.

28. It is indeed drawn out and exercised by man freely, but certainly unavoydably, and unchangeably. John 6. 37. Whatsoever my Father giveth me shall come unto me.

29. With this Faith wherewith the will is turned to the having of the true good, there is always joined repentance, by which the same will is turned also to the doing of the true good, with an averseness, and hatred of the contrary evil, or sin. Acts 19. 4. Marc. 1. 15. Repent, and believe the Gospel.

30. Repentance hath the same causes and principles with Faith, for they are both the free gifts of God. Eph. 2. 8. Faith is the gift of God. 2 Tim. 2. 25. Whether God will at any time give them repentance. They have the same subject, because both have their seat in the heart or will of man. Rom. 10. 9. 1 Kings 8. 48. With the heart man believeth. They shall return with all their heart. They are also begotten at the same time. But, first, they have divers objects, for Faith is properly carried unto Christ, and by Christ unto God: but repentance is carried to God himself who was before offended by sin, Acts 20. 21. Repentance toward God, and Faith toward our Lord Jesus Christ. Secondly, they have divers ends, for Faith doth properly seek reconciliation with God, but repentance a suitableness to the will of God. Rom. 3. 25. A reconciliation through Faith in his blood. Acts 26. 20. That they should turn unto God doing works meet to repentance.

31. Repentance in respect of that carefulness, and anxiety, & terror arising from the Law which it hath joined with it, doth go before Faith, by order of nature, as a preparing and disposing cause: but in respect of that effectual and kindly turning away from sin, as God is offended by it, so it follows Faith, and depends upon it as the effect upon his cause, and herein is proper to the faithful.

32. Although this repentance doth always bring grief with it for sins past and present, yet it doth not so properly or essentially consist in grief, as in turning from, and hatred of sin, and in a firm purpose to follow after good, Amos 5. 14. 15. Hate the evil, Love the good.

33. That repentance is not true and sound, which doth not turn a man from all known sin, to every known good: neither that which doth not virtually continue, and is actually, renewed as often as need is, from the time of conversion to the end of life.

34. Repentance is wont to be perceived before Faith: because a sinner cannot easily persuade himself that he is reconciled to God in Christ, before he feel himself to have forsaken those sins which did separate him from God.

CHAPTER XXVII.

Of Justification.

1. COmmunion of the blessings flowing from Union with Christ, is that whereby the faithful are made partakers of all those things they have need of, to live well, and blessedly with God. Eph. 1. 3. He hath blessed us with all spiritual blessings. Rom. 8. 32. He who spared not his own Son, &c. How shall he not freely with him give us all things also?

2. This communion therefore doth bring a translation and change of condition to believers, from the state of sin and death, to the state of righteousness and life eternal. 1 John 3. 14. We know that we are translated from death to life.

3. This change of state is twofold; relative, and absolute or real.

4. A relative change of state is that which consists in God's reputation. Rom. 4. 5. And he that worketh not, but believeth in him that justifieth the ungodly, his faith is imputed to him for righteousness, 1 Cor. 5. 19. God was in Christ reconciling the World to himself: not imputing to them their offenses.

5. Hence it admits no degrees properly so called, but it is together and at once perfect in one only act, although in respect of the manifestation, sense, and effects, it hath divers degrees. Hitherto pertains justification and adoption.

6. Justification is a gracious sentence of God, whereby for Christ's sake apprehended by Faith he doth absolve the believer from sin and death, and accounts him righteous unto life. Rom. 3. 22, 24. The righteousness of God by Faith of Jesus Christ in all, and upon all that believe: as they who are freely justified by his grace through the redemption made by Jesus Christ.

7. It is the pronouncing of a sentence, as the use of the word declares, which doth not set forth a physical, or real change in the holy Scriptures: but that judicial, or moral change which consists in pronouncing of a sentence and in reputation. Prov. 17. 15. He that justifies the wicked. Rom. 8. 33. Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's Elect? It is God that Justifies.

8. Therefore Thomas with his followers doth foully err, who would have justification as it were a physical motion, by a real transmutation from a state of unrighteousness to a state of righteousness; so as that the term from which is sin, the term to which, is inherent righteousness, and the motion is partly remission of sin, partly infusion of righteousness.

9. This sentence was. 1. As it were conceived in the mind of God by a decree of justifying. Gal. 3. 8. The Scripture foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles by Faith. 2. It was pronounced in Christ our head, now rising from the dead. 2 Cor. 5. 19. God was in Christ reconciling the world to himself not imputing their sins to them. 3. It is virtually pronounced upon that first relation which ariseth upon Faith begotten, Rom. 8. 1. There is therefore no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. 4. It is expressly pronounced by the Spirit of God witnessing unto our spirits our reconciliation with God. Rom. 5. 5. The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts by the holy Spirit that is given to us. In this testimony of the spirit justification itself doth not so properly consist, as an actual perceiving of that before granted as it were by a reflected act of Faith.

10. It is a gracious sentence, because it is not properly given by the Justice of God, but by his grace, Rom. 3. 24. Freely by his grace. For by the same grace whereby he called Christ to the office of Mediator, and did draw the elect to Union with Christ, he doth account them being already drawn and believing, to be just by that Union.

11. It is for Christ's sake, 2 Cor. 5. 21. That we may be made the righteousness of God in him, for the obedience of Christ is that righteousness in respect whereof the grace of God doth justify us, no otherwise, then the disobedience of Adam was that offense in respect whereof the justice of God did condemn us. Rom. 5. 18.

12. Therefore the righteousness of Christ, is imputed to believers in justification. Phil. 3. 9. That I may be found in him not having mine own righteousness which is of the Law, but that which is by Faith of Christ, the righteousness of God through Faith.

13. But because this righteousness is ordained of God to that end, and by his grace is approved and confirmed: so that sinners can stand before him through this righteousness, therefore it is called the righteousness of God. Rom. 10. 3.

14. But this justification is for Christ, not absolutely considered, in which sense Christ is also the cause of vocation, but for Christ apprehended by Faith, which Faith doth follow Calling as an effect, and followeth righteousness, by which being apprehended justification follows: whence also righteousness is said to be of Faith. Romans 9. verse. 30. & 10. 16. And Justification through Faith, Chap. 3. 28.

15. This justifying Faith is not that general Faith whereby in the understanding we yield assent to the truth revealed in the holy Scriptures: for that doth neither properly belong to those that are justified, neither of it own nature hath it any force in it self to justify, neither doth it produce those effects which are everywhere in the Scripture given to justifying Faith.

16. Neither is it (to speak properly) that special confidence, whereby we do apprehend remission of sins, and justification it self: for justifying Faith goeth before justification it self, as the cause goeth before the effect: but Faith apprehending justification doth necessarily presuppose, and follow justification, as an act follows the object about which it is exercised.

17. That Faith therefore is properly called justifying, whereby we rely upon Christ for remission of sins and for salvation. For Christ is the adequate object of Faith as Faith. Iustifyeth. Faith also doth no otherwise justify, then as it apprehends that righteousness by which we are justified: but that righteousness is not in the truth of some sentence to which we yield assent, but in Christ alone, who is made sin for us, that we might be righteousness in him, 2 Cor. 5. 21.

18. Hence are those Sermons so often repeated in the New Testament, which do show that justification is to be fought for in Christ alone. John 1. 12. & 3. 15. 16. & 6. 40. 47. 14. 1. 54. Romans 4. 5. & 3. 26. Acts 10. 43. & 26. 18. Gal. 3. 26.

19. This justifying Faith of it own nature doth produce, and so hath joined with it a speci...ll and certain persuasion of the grace and mercy of God in Christ: whence also justifying Faith is oftentimes not amiss described by the orthodox by this persuasion, especially when they do oppose that general Faith to which the Papists ascribe all things: but 1. This persuasion as touching the sense of it, is not always present. For it may and often doth come to pass, either through weakness of judgment, or through divers temptations and troubles of mind, that he, who truly believeth, and is by Faith justified before God, yet for a time may think according to that which he feels, that he neither believeth, nor is reconciled to God. 2. There be divers degrees, of his persuasion, so that neither all believers have altogether the same assurance of the grace and favor of God, nor the same believers at all times: which yet they cannot properly affirm of justifying Faith without a great deal of detriment of that consolation and peace which Christ hath left to believers.

20. Justification absolves from sin and death not immediately by taking away the blame, or stain, or all the effects of sin: but that oblation and guilt to undergo eternal death. Rom. 8. 1. 33. 34. There is no condemnation, who shall lay anything to their charge? who shall condemn?

21. Neither yet doth it so take away the guilt, as that it takes away the desert of punishment from the sin, which (the sin it self remaining,) can in no sort be taken away; but it so takes away the guilt, that it takes away the revenging pursuit of the desert of it, or the deadly effects of it.

22. This absolution from sins is called in a divers respect, but in the same sense in holy Scriptures Remission, Redemption, and Reconciliation, Eph. 1. 6. 7. For as the state of sin is considered as a bondage, or certain spiritual captivity in respect of the guilt, so his justification is called Redemption, but as the same state is considered as a subjection to do punishment, so it is called remission, as also a passing by, a blotting out, a disburdening, a taking away, a casting away, a removing, a casting behind the back, Rom. 4. 7. Col. 2. 13. Mich. 7. 18. Isaiah 43. 12. 38. 17. Psal. 32. 1, 2. And as the same state is considered as a certain enmity against God, so justification is called a reconciliation. Romans 5. 10. As also a certain winking at sin, Numb. 23. 25. A covering of sin. Ps. 32. 1, 2.

23. But not only the sins of justified persons that are past are remitted, but also in some sort those to come. Numb. 23. 25. He seeth no iniquity in Jacob, nor perverseness in Israel, because justification hath left no place to condemnation, John 5. 24. He that believeth hath eternal life, and shall not come into condemnation: and it doth certainly and immediately adjudge one to eternal life. It also maketh all that remission, which was in Christ obtained for us, to be actually ours: neither can sins past and present be altogether and fully remitted, unless sins to come be in some sort remitted also.

24. But there is this difference, that sins past are remitted by a formal application, by sins to come only virtually: sins past are remitted in themselves, sins to come in the subject or person sinning.

25. Yet those that are justified do daily desire the forgiveness of sins. 1. Because the continuance of this grace is necessary to them. 2. That the sense and manifestation of it may be more and more perceived, as several sins required. 3. That the execution of that sentence which in justification is pronounced, might be matured and furthered.

26. Besides the forgiveness of sins there is required also imputation of righteousness, Rom. 5. 18. Rev. 19. 8. Rom. 8. 3. Because there may be a total absence of sin, where notwithstanding there is not that righteousness which must come in place of justification.

27. But this righteousness is not severally to be sought in the purity of the nature, birth, and life of Christ: but it ariseth out of all the obedience of Christ together with remission of sins, as the same disobedience of Adam, hath both robbed us of original righteousness, & made us subject to the guilt of condemnation.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

Of Adoption.

1. ADoption is the gracious sentence of God whereby he accepts the faithful for Christ's sake, unto the dignity of Sons. John 1. 12. As many as receive him, to them he gave power to be made the Sons of God, to those that believe in his Name.

2. It is called a gracious sentence of God: because it doth manifest the gracious will of God toward men: 1 John 3. 1. See what love the Father hath shown to us, that we should be called the Sons of God.

3. This sentence is pronounced with the same diversity of degrees as justification: for it was first in God's predestination. Eph. 1. 5. He hath predestinated us that he might adopt us to be Sons. Afterward it was in Christ. Gal. 4. 4, 5. God hath sent forth his Son, that we might receive adoption. Afterward it was in believers themselves, The same Chapter Verse 6. And because ye are Sons, GOD hath sent forth the Spirit of his Son into your hearts, crying, Abba Father.

4. It is properly conversant about the faithful that are called and justified, John 1. 12. For by adoption we are not made just: which would necessarily follow, if adoption were part of justification it self, as some would have it: neither is it a calling unto Christ, but a certain excellent dignity flowing from the application of him, Romans 8. 17. Heirs together with Christ:

5. Yet calling and justification have the respect of a foundation to this relation of Adoption: for the right of Adoption is obtained by Faith, and the righteousness of Faith. John 1. 12.

6. But although Adoption follow upon Faith: yet it doth not so immediately follow, but justification comes between: for Adoption of its own nature doth forerrequire, and presuppose that reconciliation which is found in Justification.

7. Hence all the faithful do expect Heaven as it were by a double title, namely by the title of redemption which they have by justification, and by the title as it were of Son-ship, which they have by Adoption.

8. Which yet ought so to be understood that the title of redemption is a foundation of this right, and Adoption doth ad a certain manner of excellency and dignity.

9. Hence ariseth the first difference between Divine Adoption and human: for human Adoption is of a person that is a stranger, which hath no right to the inheritance, but by force of Adoption: but the faithful although by natural generation they have no right to the inheritance of life, yet by virtue of regeneration, Faith and justification, they have it adjudged to them.

10. Hence also the second difference followeth, that human adoption is only an extrinſical denomination, and a communication of thoſe things which are external: but Divine adoption is a relation ſo real, that it is alſo founded in an intrinſical action, and in the communicating of a new inward life.

11. This Adoption is made for Chriſt's ſake: becauſe Chriſt did not only deſerve it as Redeemer, Gal. 4. 5.

That he might redeem them, to receive the adoption of Sons. But alſo as being already applied by Faith, he is the bond of this Union. Rom. 8. 17. 29. Heirs of God, coheirs with Chriſt. To be conformed to the Image of his Son.

12. For as Chriſt in juſtification is applied as a garment to cover our ſins: ſo in Adoption he is applied as a brother and Prince of our ſalvation. Hebr. 2. 10, 11, 12, 13. Many Sons. The Prince of ſalvation. He that ſanctifieth, and they that are ſanctified are all of one. He is not aſhamed to call them Brethren. Behold I and the children which God hath given me.

13. This application and conjunction is ſo near, that although Chriſt is properly the only natural So... of God, and much more the firſt begotten of God: yet by this grace of Adoption, and communion with Chriſt, all the faithful alſo are ſaid to be the firſt begotten of God. Heb. 12. 23. Ye are come to the univerſal aſſembly and meeting of the firſt borne who are written in Heaven.

14. Whence alſo it appears that believers are in a far different manner the Sons of God then Adam was in the firſt Creation: for although Adam by reaſon of that dependence which he had of God together with that ſimilitude and Image to which he was created, might be called metaphorically the Son of God; yet he was not the Son of God by this myſtical conjunction and communion with Chriſt who is the natural Son of God.

15. Hence ariſeth the third difference between human adoption and divine, for human adoption was brought in upon want of a natural Son: but the divine Adoption is not from any want, but out of abundant goodneſs, whereby a likenneſs of a natural Son, and a myſtical conjunction with him is communicated to the adopted Sons.

16. That dignity which this Adoption brings with it, doth not only far exceed that common relation whereby God is ſaid to be the Father of every Creature: but that alſo which we had before the fall: becauſe that was weak, but this by reaſon of the band doth remain forever, John 8. 32. The ſervant abideth not in the houſe forever: but the Son abideth forever.

17. Hence the Name of God and of Chriſt is named upon the faithful, by a ſpecial right and reaſon. 1 John 3. 1. As Jacob taking the ſons of Joſeph into adoption would have them called by his name. Gen. 48. 5.

18. Hence alſo the faithful are taken as it were into God's Family, and are of his houſehold. Gal. 6. 10. That is, that they may be always under the fatherly tuition of God, depending upon him, for nourishment, education, and perpetual conſervation: as in old time among the Hebrews adoption of tentimes was no otherwise testified then by the nurturing and education, of their next kindred in blood. Hest. 2. 7.

19. Together with the dignity of sons there is joined also the condition of heirs, Rom. 8. 17. If sons, then also heirs: But this inheritance to which the faithful are adopted, is blessedness eternal: whence adoption doth sometimes in Scripture comprehend all that glory which is prepared for the faithful, and is expected by them in Heaven, Rom. 8. 23. Looking for our adoption, the redemption of our bodies.

20. Therefore eternal blessedness pertains to the faithful, and is communicated to them, not of justice for their deserts, but from that grace whereby they are taken into the number of sons. Gal. 3. 29. If ye are Christ's, then are ye Abraham's seed, and heirs by promise.

21. Hence ariseth a certain fourth difference between human adoption and divine: for human adoption is ordained for that that the Son might succeed the Father in the inheritance: but divine adoption is not ordained for succession, but for participation of the inheritance assigned: because both the Father and his first begotten Son liveth forever, and so admitteth no succession.

22. A proper adjunct of this adoption is the testimony of the spirit which is given to the faithful whereby this dignity is sealed together with the inheritance which is to be expected from it, and it is called the spirit of Adoption, Rom. 8. 15, 16, 23. Gal. 4. 5, 6, 7.

23. But the Spirit is said to be communicated to the faithful, not because Faith goeth before all operation of the Spirit, as some unskilfully gather: for the very first regeneration and conversion is plainly attributed to the holy Spirit by Christ. John 7. 5. 6, 8. Borne of the spirit: but because believers only after they have already believed, do receive this operation of the holy Spirit whereby they are sealed, as with an earnest of their inheritance. Eph. 1. 13, 14. & 4. 30. Gal. 3. 14.

24. And hence also it doth sufficiently appear that assurance of salvation is not properly justifying Faith, but a fruit of that Faith: because the Apostle expressly faith. After ye believed, ye were sealed. Eph. 1. 13.

25. The first fruit of adoption is that Christian liberty. Whereby all believers are as set at liberty by a manumission as it were from the bondage of the Law, sin and the world. John 8. 32, 36. If the Son shall set you free, ye shall be free indeed. Rom. 8. 22. Being freed from sin we are made servants unto God. Gal. 4. Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all. Hebr. 2. 15. That he might set at liberty those who for fear of death were all their life time subject to bondage.

26. The second fruit is that the faithful partaking of the dignity of Christ, are also by him, as it were, Prophets, Priests, and Kings. Rev. 1. 6.

The third fruit is, that all the Creatures and those things which are done by them, are either subject unto the dominion and pure use of the faithful. Tit. 1. 15. 1 Cor. 3. 21. 22. Or do perform the office of Ministry for them, as it is affirmed of the Angels. Heb. 1. 14. Or at least do turn to their good. Rom. 8. 28.

CHAPTER XXIX.

Of Sanctification.

So much of the relative change of the condition of the faithful in Justification and adoption: the real change follows whereby that former is manifested, and as touching the effects, as it were committed to execution.

1. THE real change of state is an alteration of qualities made in man himself. 2 Cor. 5. 17. Old things are past away, all things are become new.

2. But because it doth not consist in relation and respect, but in real effecting; therefore it admits divers degrees, of beginning, progress, and perfection. 2. Cor. 4. 16. The inward man is renewed day by day.

3. This alteration of qualities doth either respect that good which is just, and honest, and it is called Sanctification: or that good which is profitable and honorable, and it is called glorification. Rom. 6. 22. Ye have your fruit in holiness, and the end everlasting life.

4. Sanctification is a real change of a man from the filthiness of sin, to the purity of God's Image. Eph. 4. 22. 23. 34. To put off as touching the old conversation, that old man, which doth corrupt it self in the deceivable lusts: and to be renewed in the spirit of your mind; and to put on that new man, who according to God is created to righteousness and true holiness.

5. For as by justification a believer is properly freed from the guilt of sin, and hath life adjudged to him, the title of which life is as it were, determined in adoption; so by sanctification the same believer is freed from the filthiness and stain of sin, and the purity of God's Image is restored to him.

6. For hereby Sanctification is not understood the separation from a common use and consecration to some special use, in which sense the word is often taken in Scripture, sometime setting forth only the outward, sometime also that inward and effectual separation; for so it may be extended to calling or that first regeneration whereby Faith is communicated as a principle of new life: in which sense regeneration and Sanctification is wont to be confounded by most: but by it is understood that change of a man, whereby a believer hath righteousness and inherent holiness communicated to them. 2 Thess. 2. 13. Through Sanctification of the Spirit.

7. For God himself doth manifestly witness that holiness is a gift of grace inherent, Ier. 31. 33. I will put my Laws into their mind, and in their heart will I write them, Ezech. 36. 26. 27. I will give you a new heart, and a new spirit will I put into the midst of you.

8. But this sanctification is distinguished, from that change of a man which is proper to the calling of a man in Faith and repentance. In that that Faith there is not considered properly as a quality, but in relation to Christ: neither is repentance there considered as a change of disposition; for so it is all one with sanctification: but as a change of purpose and intent of the mind. But here a real change of qualities and dispositions is looked unto.

9. It is called a real change, that it may be distinguished not only from justification, but also from that sanctification which is by Justification, as is the Sanctification of the seventh day: or also that which is by relation of a sign, as is the Sanctification of the elements in the Sacraments, or lastly, that which is by manifestation, in which manner God himself is said to be sanctified by men. 1 Peter 3. 14.

10. It is of the whole man, not of someone part. 1. Thess. 5. 23. Now the God of peace himself sanctify you wholly, and your whole spirit, soul and body be preserved blameless unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ, Although so much of man, Tantum & totum or that whole that is in man is not presently changed.

11. But although the whole man be partaker of this grace, yet it first and chiefly, agrees to the soul, and afterward from the soul is derived to the body, as the body of it is capable by that obediencial power wherewith together with the soul it is subject to the will of God. So also in the soul first and properly it agrees to the will, from which it is derived into other faculties according to the order of nature. Deut. 30. 6. The Lord thy God shall circumcise thy heart, and the heart of thy seed, to love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, that thou mayest live. Rom. 2. 29. The circumcision of the heart.

12. It is a change of a man from sin, to distinguish it from that sanctification which is, A ‹ › ‹ › mere negative from the mere negative contrary, such as that was which is attributed to the human nature of Christ, which is said to be sanctified, or made holy, although the nature of Christ was never defiled with sin.

13. The term from which this is, is filthiness, corruption, or the blot of fin, 2 Cor. 7. 1. Let us purge ourselves from all filthiness of flesh and spirit, perfecting holiness in the fear of God.

14. The term to which, is the purity of God's Image, which is said to be framed or created again in knowledge, righteousness and holiness. Eph. 4. 24. Or a conformity to the Law of God. I am. 1. 25. Newnes of life. Rom. 6. 4. The new creature. 2. Cor. 5. 16. Gal. 6. 15. & the Divine nature. 2 Pet. 1. 4.

15. But it is called the new and Divine creature. 1. Because it is not produced of those principles which are in us by nature, as the habit of all arts are brought forth which are gotten by industry learning, but out of a new principle of life, communicated by God unto us, in our calling. 2. Because our natural disposition is altogether of another kind then it was before. 3. Because in its measure it resembles that highest perfection which is found in God.

16. There be two degrees of this sanctification, one in this life, which is called in general an infancy. 1. ‹ › . 13. 11. 12. Eph. 4. 14. 2 Pet. 2. 2. Because although that variety be found in this life, that if some of those that are sanctified be compared with others and with themselves at divers times, then some may be rightly called infants, and others men grown, whilst they live here. Heb. 5. 13. 14. Yet the highest degree which we attain to in this life is only a beginning of holiness promised and to be expected. The other degree is called man's age and perfect age. Eph. 4. 14. 1 Cor. 13. •...1. Phil. 3. 12. Because in the life to come the motion and progress of sanctification ceaseth, there is only found rest, and perfection, so that in this life we are more properly said to have sanctification then holiness, and in the life to come: holiness only, and not sanctification.

17. Sanctification therefore hath two parts: one in respect of the term from which, is called mortification, and the other in respect of the term to which, is called vivification and resurrection. Rom. 8. 5. 6.

18. Mortification is the first part of sanctification whereby sin is wasted, Col. 3. 3. 5. Ye are dead, mortify therefore your earthly members.

19. The meritorious, and exemplary cause of it is the Death of Christ. Rom. 6. 5. 6. Being grafted into the likeness of his death: knowing this that our old manis crucified with him.

20. The cause principally working is that spirit of God who communicates to the faithful the efficacy of his death. Rom. 8. 13. If by the spirit ye mortify the deeds of the body, ye shall live.

21. The administering cause is Faith it self, Rom. 6. 17. From the heart ye have obeyed that form of doctrine unto which ye were delivered.

22. From this mortification there follows in all that are sanctified a denial of themselves, and the World. Luc. 9. 23. Gal. 6. 14.

23. Hence ariseth that inward difference which is between sin, which remains in the faithful from that which remains in others: In others sin is reigning, prevailing, and predominating: in the faithful it is broken, subdued and mortified.

24. Vivification is the second part of sanctification whereby the Image or life of God is restored in man. Col. 3. 10. Eph. 4. 24. Rev. 12. 2. Having put on the new man: be ye transformed by the renewing of your mind.

25. The exemplary cause of it is the Resursection of Christ. Col. 3. 1. 2. Ye are risen with Christ.

26. The cause principally working is the Spirit of God, which raised Christ from the dead, Rom. 8. 11. If the Spirit of him that raised Jesus from the dead dwelleth in you.

27. The administering cause is Faith, Gal. 2. 20. The life which I now live in the flesh, I live by the Faith of the Son of GOD.

28. From this vivification there ariseth a strong tie in those who are sanctified, of themselves to be addicted wholly to God and to Christ. 2. Cor. 8. 5. They give themselves to the Lord.

29. Because this sanctification is imperfect whilst we live here as infants, therefore all the faithful lare informed as it were with a double form; sin and grace: for the perfection of sanctification not found in this life, unless in the dreams of some fantastick persons. 1 John 1.

8. If we say we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and there is no truth in us. Yet all that are truly sanctified do tend unto perfection, Mat. 5. 48. 1. Cor. 13. 11. 2 Pet. 3. 18.

30. Sin or the corrupted part which remains in those that are sanctified, is called in Scriptures, The old man, the outward man, the members, and the body of sin. Grace or the renewed part is called the new man, the spirit, the mind, &c.

31. Hereupon there follows two things. 1. A spiritual war which is made continually between these parties. Gal. 5. 17. For the flesh lusts against the spirit, and the spirit against the flesh: and these are contrary one to the other. 2. A daily renewing of repentance.

32. That flesh which remains in the regenerate; is not only in the vegetative, and sensitive appetite, but also in the will, and reason it self. 1 Thess. 5. 23.

33. The flesh or this concupiscence hath the true and proper reason of sin in the regenerate themselves. Rom. 7.

34. With this corruption even the best works of the Saints are infected, so as they have need of some remission.

35. Yet the good works of the regenerate are not to be called sins, but defiled with sin.

36. That defilement of good works, (by reason of Justification) doth not hinder but they may be accepted of God to be rewarded.

37. That fight which is found in wicked men between conscience and the will, is not the striving of the spirit against the flesh, but of the flesh fearing against the flesh desiring.

CHAPTER XXX.

Of Glorification.

In the former disputation we spake of sanctification which is one part of the alteration of qualities, which did respect that good that is just and honest: the other part follows, namely Glorification which respects that good, that is profitable and honorable.

1. GLorification is a real transmutation of a man, from misery or the punishment of sin, unto happiness eternal. Rom. 8. 30. And whom he justified, those he glorified.

2. It is called a real transmutation, that it may be distinguished from that blessedness which is either virtual only, in Election, Calling, Justification, and Adoption, or declarative in holy works. Rom. 4. 6. David declares that man to be blessed to whom God imputeth righteousness, &c. Psal. 65. 5. Blessed is he whom thou choosest, and bringest to dwell in thy Courts. Matthew. 5. Blessed are the poor in spirit, &c.

3. In respect of the term from which, viz. misery or the punishment of sin, it is called a redemption. 1 Cor. 1. 30. Eph. 1. 14. Gal. 3. 13. Heb. 2. 14, 15.

4. This redemption is a real delivering from the evils of punishment: which is nothing else in very deed, but the execution of the sentence of Justification: for in Justification, as we are judged to be just, so we are judged to have life. Now Glorification makes that life that was judged, and pronounced ours by real communication, to be ours actually and by possession.

5. It is said to be real, that it may be distinguished from that redemption which is in the payment of the price of redemption, and in application of the same to justification, whereof mention is made Eph. 1. 7. Col. 1. 14.

6. In the Scriptures also it is wont to be called deliverance, and preservation from the wrath of God, from death and from the kingdom of darkness.

7. In respect of the term to which, it is called, beatification, blessing, life eternal, glory, Glorification, the kingdom of our Lord and Savior Jesus Christ, and an immortal inheritance. Eph. 1. 3. John 3. 36. & 6. 47. 2 Pet. 1. 3, 11. 1 Pet. 1. 4. & 5. 10.

8. The first degree of this Glorification begun, is the apprehension and sense of the love of God shining forth in Christ, upon the communion which the faithful have with him. Rom. 5. 5.

5. The love of God is shed abroad in our hearts, by the holy spirit which is given to us.

9. Hence there ariseth a certain friendship between God, Christ, and the faithful, John 15. 15. I have called you friends, because all that I have heard of my Father have I made known unto you. James 2. 23. Abraham was called the friend of God.

10. The second degree is undoubted hope and expectation, of the enjoyment of all those good things which God hath prepared for his. Rom. 5. 2. We rejoice under the hope of the glory of God.

11. Hence is freedom to come to God with boldness. Eph. 2. 18. & 3. 12. Heb. 10. 22.

12. Hitherto pertains the assurance of perseverance and salvation also, Rom. 8. 38.

13. For this assurance as touching the thing it self which is called a certainty of the object, is sealed to all true believers: but as touching the perceiving of it, which is called a certainty of the subject, it is not always present to all; yet it may be gotten by any without special revelation, & it ought also to be sought for by all: so as this certain confidence rightly grounded hath nothing common with presumption.

14. This certainty is grounded upon, and confirmed to the faithful by the word, the seals, by oath, and by the earnest of God himself. He. 6. 17. God willing abundantly to show to the heirs of the promise the immutability of his counsel, he bound it by an oath: that by two immutable things we may have strong consolation. Eph. 1. 13. Ye are sealed with that holy Spirit of promise which is the earnest of our inheritance.

15. This truth is perceived, and made certain to us. 1. By a certain spiritual sense whereby the grace of God now being present, doth make its presence manifest, and evident to the believer. 2. By the gift of discerning whereby believers do distinguish true grace from the show of it. 3. By discourse and testimony of conscience whereby grace and salvation is no less seal to the faithful, then sin and death to unbelievers. 4. The Spirit of God himself doth so confirm all these ways of perceiving, that they have the same certainty that Faith hath.

Rom. 8. 16. The spirit it self witnesseth with our spirit, that we are the Sons of God. 1 Cor. 2. 12. We have received the spirit which is of God, that we may know the things which God hath freely given us. 2 Cor. 13. 5. Try yourselves whether ye be in the Faith, examine yourselves. 1 John 4. 16. We know, and believe, the love which God had towards us.

16. This certainty doth follow upon the perceiving of Faith and Repentance, where the free covenant of God is rightly understood. 2 Cor. 13. 5.

17. If either of these be wanting, this certainty is taken away as touching the perceiving of it; so that he that doth rightly understand the promise of the covenant, cannot be sure of his salvation, unless he perceive in himself true Faith and repentance: neither can he that feels himself truly to believe, and repent, be sure of his perseverance and salvation, unless he also understand by the covenant that God will mightily preserve those that believe and repent, even to the end.

18. Therefore certainty of salvation is not of any, nor otherwise perceived, but those who together with Faith keep a good conscience, and that whilst they keep it from any grievous wound, which by those sins is brought which are wont to wast conscience.

19. Hence as Faith, and a good conscience do flourish or languish in men, so also this certainty is either confirmed, or diminished. Ps. 51.

20. They therefore that without any sense or care of Faith, and repentance do certainly hope for salvation, in presuming they hope, and hoping they perish.

21. From this certainty ariseth consolation, peace, and joy unspeakable. Rom. 5. 2. 3. 1 Pet. 1. 8. Rom. 14. 17. 2 Cor. 1. 5. Which are the first fruits of glory, Rom. 8. 23.

22. Consolation is an easing of fear and oppressing grief. 2 Cor. 1. 4. Yet it contains sometimes by a Synecdoche all salvation begun. Col. 2. 2.

23. Peace is a quieting of the mind, which ariseth partly from deliverance from evils, and partly from the presence or hope of contrary good things. Phil. 4. 7.

24. When it is joined with grace in the Apostles salutations, then it sets forth all that felicity which is communicated to the faithful by the favor of God.

25. Joy is that delight which is perceived from the conjunction, and communion of the chief good.

26. Hence eternal life it self is called joy. Mat. 25. 21. John 15. 11.

27. The third degree is in partaking of the spiritual gifts of grace with abundance, or overflowing. Col. 2. 2. 7. 10. With all riches of the full assurance of understanding. Abounding in Faith: complete.

28. Hence the abundance of grace is said to minister a large entrance into the Kingdom of God. 2 Peter 1. 8. 11.

29. The fourth degree is in experience of the good will or kindness of God. Psalm. 31. 20. How great is thy goodness which thou dost lay up for them that fear thee? Psal. 65. 5. We are satisfied with the goodness of thy House, with the things of thy holy Temple.

30. Hither to pertaineth that fatherly providence of God whereby he watcheth always over the faithful for good, as he watcheth over the wicked for evil: in which respect, in Scripture the good Hand of God is said to be with his, Nehem. 2. 8.

31. Hence all things work together for good to them that love God, Rom. 8. 28.

32. From the sense of all these, the faithful are rooted, and grounded in the love of God. Eph. 3. 17.

33. Perfect Glorification is in the taking away of all imperfection from soul and body, and communication of all perfection.

34. This is granted to the soul immediately after the separation of it from the body. 2 Cor. 5. Verse 2. Phil. 1. 23. Hebr. 2. 12. 23. But it is not ordinarily granted to the soul and body jointly before that last Day, wherein all the faithful shall be perfected together in Christ. Ephes. 4. 13. Philippians 3. 20. 21.

CHAPTER XXXI.

Of the Church mystically considered.

Thus much of the application of Redemption considered in it self: The subject to which, and the manner by which this application is made, doth follow.

1. THE Subject is the Church. Eph. 5. 25. 26. 27. Christ loved the Church, and gave himself for it: that he might sanctify it being purified by him with the washing of water through the Word: that he might make it to himself glorious, that is, a Church not having spot or wrinkle or any such thing, but that it might be holy and unblameable: whence Election, Redemption, Vocation, Justification, Adoption, Sanctification, and Glorification do in their propriety belong to the same subject, that is, to the same singular men, which make the Church. John 17. 9. 10. & 11. I pray for them; I pray not for the World, but for them whom thou hast given me, because they are thine, Rom. 8. 29. 30. For whom he hath fore-known, them he did predestinate, &c.

2. Yet the Church hath so the consideration of a subject in respect of his application, that it is also an effect of the same application: for it is not first actually a Church, and afterward made partaker of Union and communion with Christ; but because it is united to Christ, therefore it is the Church of Christ.

3. And this is the reason why we can neither explain nor understand the nature of the Church, unless those things which pertain to the application of Christ, be first explained and perceived.

4. The elect before they be grafted into Christ are in themselves no otherwise of the Church, then that power which in its own time shall certainly come into act, by reason of God's intention and his transaction with Christ: because that remote power which is common to all men, in respect of the elect, is certainly determined in God.

5. Therefore those orthodox Divines, which define the Church a company of elect ones, do either by elect ones understand, those that are called according to election; or, they define the Church not only as it doth actually exist, but also as it is to be hereafter.

6. That first thing which doth make actually a Church is calling: whence also it hath taken both its name and definition.

7. For the Church is a company of men that are called. 1 Cor. 1. 24. With 10. 32. Called both Jews and Greeks. To the Jews, to the Greeks, and to the Church of God. But because the end of calling is Faith, and the work of Faith is ingrafting into Christ, and this Union with Christ, doth bring with it communion with Christ, hence it is defined, in the very same sense, a company of believers, a company of those who are in Christ; and a company of those that have communion with Christ.

8. But as Faith doth so respect Christ, as that by Christ also it respects God; so this Church, which doth exist by Faith is both referred to Christ as to the head, and by Christ unto God: whence the Church is called the body of Christ. Col. 1. 24. And also the Church of God. 1 Cor. 10. 32. The Kingdom of Christ. Colos. 1. 13. And the Kingdom of God, Rom. 14. 17.

9. It is called a company: because it doth consist properly in a multitude joined in fellowship together, or a community of many, not in some certain one that is called: whence Eph. 4. 16. It is called a body fitly joined and compacted together, of divers members, and by the same reason it is often called in Scripture an House, a Family, a City, a Kingdom, a Flock, &c.

10. This company is restrained to men: because the good Angels, although in some respect they pertain to the Church, by reason of that Union they have with Christ, and the grace of conversation communicated by him, yet they are not homogeneall members of the Church redeemed.

11. The form or constituting cause of this Church must needs be such a thing which is found alike in all the called: but this can be nothing else then a relation neither hath any relation that force besides that that consists in a chief and intimate affection to Christ: but there is no such in man besides Faith: Faith therefore is the form of the Church.

12. For Faith as it is in every believer, distributively, is the form of those that are called: but as it is considered in all collectively, it is the form of the company of those that are called, that is the Church.

13. For the same, believing men, who being in several distributively, considered are the called of God, are also the Church of God, as they are jointly or collectively considered in a company.

14. Hence all those promises of God which are made to the Church in the Scriptures, and do contain in themselves essential blessings, do also pertain to every believer.

15. This relation is so near, that in respect of it, not only Christ is the Churches, and the Church Christ's, Cant. 2. Verse 26. But also Christ is in the Church, and the Church in him. John 15. Verse 4. 1 John 3. Verse 24. So that the Church is mystically called Christ. 1 Cor. 12. 12. And the fullness of Christ. Eph. 23.

16. Hence the Church by a metaphor is called the bride, and Christ the Bride-groome: the Church a City, and Christ the King; the Church an House, and Christ the House-holder; the Church the branches, and Christ the Vine: finally the Church a body, and Christ the head.

17. But by these comparisons, there is signified not only the Union and Communion which is between Christ and the Church, but also the way of order whereby Christ is the beginning of all dignity, life, power, and perfection, to the Church.

18. This Church is mystically one, not generally, but as it were the Species Specialissima, or Individu...n: because it hath no kind properly so called.

19. It is therefore called catholic, not as catholic signifies a Genus or some general thing, but as it sets forth something integrally universal, (as when we say the universal world) because it contains the faithful of all Nations, of all places, and of all times.

20. Therefore no part of the Church can truly be called catholic, but as it doth profess that Faith which is the Faith of the catholic Church, in which sense the Ancients, did not only call that part of the Church which was at Rome, but other Churches also. As our Church at Francken, may be rightly called catholic, as it doth profess that Faith which belongs to the catholic Church.

21. The Church is divided into members according to the degrees of communion which it hath with Christ, in which respect it is called either Militant, or Triumphant.

22. The Church militant is that which is partaker only of communion begun: and so doth wrestle as yet with enemies in the field of this World. 1 Cor. 13. 9. 12. We know in part, and prophesy in part: for we see now through a Glass and darkly. 2 Cor. 10. 3. The weapons of our warfare. Eph. 6. 12. 13. We wrestle, therefore take to you the whole Armor of God.

23. The Church triumphant is that which is already perfitted. Eph. 4. 13. Untill we all come to a perfect man, to the measure of the full stature of Christ. 1 Cor. 15. After cometh that which is perfect.

24. The militant Church is both invisible and visible, namely with outward sight or sense.

25. But this distinction is not a distribution of the Genus into the Species, as if so be there were one Church visible, and another invisible; nor of the whole into the members, as if one part of the Church were visible, and another invisible: but a distinction of the adjuncts of the same subject, because invisibility is an affection or manner of the Church, in respect of the essential, and internal form: visibility is an affection or manner of the Church in respect of the accidental, and outward form.

26. The essential form is invisible: because it is both a relation, which doth not come into the sense, and also spiritual, and so removed more from sense then in many other relations.

27. The accidental form is visible, because it is nothing else then an outward profession of inward Faith, which may be easily perceived by sense.

28. This visible profession is that visible communion of the Saints which they have with Christ, and among themselves.

29. The acts of communion with Christ are those visible acts, by which they present themselves to God in Christ to receive his blessings, and to give the glory of them to him.

30. The acts of communion among themselves are all those acts, by which they study to do good each to other: but especially those which directly make to further their communion with God in Christ.

31. Many acts of this latter kind are to be exercised also toward those who as yet are not members of the Church: because by a certain power they are to be judged to belong to it.

32. This Church as it is visible in it self, is in respect of others and comparatively also distinguished into the Church lying hid, and manifest.

33. That which is manifest is when the number is greater, and the profession more free and more public.

34. That which is hidden is when the number is less, and profession less open: which is wont to come to pass by reason of heresies, persecutions, or profane manners abounding abroad.

35. In the same respect also the Church is purer and impurer, as the profession is more or less perfect.

36. But this profession doth not depend upon confession only and preaching of the Word, but also upon the receiving of it and religious obedience to it.

37. But although the Church be subject to such changes, and may leave any part of the World, yet it hath never totally failed, or shall fail from the beginning of the gathering it to the end of the World.

38. For Christ must always have his Kingdom in the mids of his enemies, until he shall make his enemies his foot-stool.

39. Yea the Church doth never wholly cease to be visible, for although sometime there scarce appear a Church anywhere so pure, that one may fly unto it in communion of the same worship in all things: yet the Church doth in some sort abide visible in that very impurity of worship and profession.

CHAPTER XXXII.

Of the Church Instituted.

1. THE Church as it lives upon Earth, although it be not wholly visible together, yet it is visible in its parts, both dividedly in the several members, and jointly in companies or Congregations.
2. The former visibility is by men's personal profession which doth not make a Church simply visible, but in certain members, or visible members of the Church, although the Church in it self or in its integral state is not visible in the same place. Acts 19. 1. Paul came to Ephesus where he found certain Disciples.
3. That visibility, which is in distinct companies or congregations, doth not only make a visible Church, but touching the outward form doth make so many visible Churches as there are distinct congregations. Revel. 1. 4. The seven Churches. 2 Cor. 8. 1. 19. The Churches of Macedonia, all the Churches.
4. For those congregations are as it were similiary parts of the catholic Church, and so do partake both of the name and nature of it.
5. Therefore a particular Church in respect of that common nature which is found in all particular Churches▪ is a Species of the Church in general, but in respect of the catholic Church which hath the respect of an whole, it is a member compounded of divers several members gathered together, and so in respect of those members it is also an whole.
6. Such a congregation or particular Church is a society of believeres joined together by a special band among themselves▪ for the constant exercise of the communion of Saints among themselves.
7. It is a society of believers: because that same thing in profession doth make a Church visible, which by its inward and real nature doth make a mystical Church, that is, Faith.
8. But because true Faith hath holiness joined with it, which it doth effectually work. Acts 15.
9. And so the profession of true faith cannot be disjoined from the profession of holiness, therefore the Church is promiscuously and in the same sense called, a society of believers, and of Saints. Eph. 1. 1. To the Saints which are at Ephesus and faithful in Christ Jesus. 1 Cor. 1. 2. compared with, 2 Cor. 1. 1. Rom. 1. 7. Colos. 1. 2.
9. Hence visible and particular Churches also, by reason of this Faith which they profess, are rightly said to be in God the Father, and in the Lord Jesus Christ. 1 Thess. 1. 1. 2 Thess. 1. 1.
10. It is also very probable that there is no such particular Church in which the profession of the true Faith flourisheth, but in the same also there are found some true believers.
11. But those who are only believers by profession, so long as they remain in that society are members of that Church, as also of the catholic Church as touching the outward state, not touching the inward or essential state. 1 John 2. 19. They went out from us, but they were not of us.

12. Among believers there are to be accounted as members of the Church the children of those believers who are in the Church. 1 Cor. 7. 14. Your children are holy. For they are partakers of the same covenant, and the same profession with their parents.

13. Yet infants are not so perfect members of the Church, as that they can exercise acts of communion, or be admitted to partake of all the privileges thereof, unless there do first appear an increase of Faith: but they are not to be excluded from those privileges which pertain to the beginning of Faith and entrance into the Church.

14. Believers do not make a particular Church, although peradventure many may meet and live together in the same place, unless they be joined together by a special bond among themselves: for so someone Church should often be dissolved into many and manyal...o should be confounded into one.

15. This bond is a covenant, either express or implicit whereby believers do particularly bind themselves, to perform all those duties, both toward God and one toward another, which pertain to the respect and edification of the Church.

16. Hence it is that in the Old Testament we do for the most part so often read of the renewing of their covenant, as there is related any solemn reformation of the Church.

17. Hence none is rightly admitted into the Church, but by confession of Faith and promise of obedience.

18. This joining together by covenant doth only so far forth make a Church as it respects the exercising the communion of Saints: for the same believing men may join themselves in covenant to make a City or some civil society, as they do immediately respect a common civil good, but they do not make a Church but as in their constitution they respect holy communion with God among themselves.

19. Hence the same men, may make a City or political society and not a Church; or a Church, and not a City; or both a Church and a City.

20. Hence it is that those meetings that are formally Ecclesiastical, are said to be had in the Name of the Lord. Math. 18. 20. 1 Cor. 5. 4.

21. Neither yet doth some sudden joining together, and exercise of holy communion suffice to make a Church: unless there be also that constancy, at least in intention, which brings the state of a body, and members in a certain spiritual polity.

22. This Cureh is instituted by God and by Christ, Heb. 3. 3. 4. He that built the House, for every House is built by some, and in this respect it differs from the mystical Church, the gathering of which together into one is not prescribed unto men, but performed immediately b... divine operation, but the gathering together into an instituted Church is so performed by God, that his command and man's duty and labor do come between. Hebr. 10.

25. Not forsaking the assembling ourselves together.

23. But it is ordained by God and Christ only, because men have neither power of themselves to institute, or frame a Church unto Christ, neither have they by the revealed will of God any such power committed to them: their greatest honor is, that they are servants in the House of God. Heb. 3. 5.

24. It is not therefore in the power of man either to take away any of those things which Christ hath granted to his Church, or to ad other to them of the like kind: although he may and ought by all lawful means to provide, that those things which Christ hath ordained may be farthered, and confirmed.

25. But Christ hath so instituted the Church, that it always depends upon himself as upon the head, so that if it be distinctly considered without Christ, it is not a complete body.

26. Hence the Church itself may not properly make new Laws to her self of new things to be ordained, but thee ought only to care for this, that she do well find out the will of Christ, and observe his ordinances in order and decently, with greatest fruit of edification.

27. But because the ordinances of Christ have always a blessing of God joined with them, therefore here are divers promises of God made to the Church of the presence of Christ. Mat. 18. 20. 1 Cor. 5. 4. So as in a special manner he is said to be conversant and to walk in the Churches. Revel. 2. 1. Isaiah 31. 9. And of the presence of the Holy Spirit, Isaiah 59. 21. So that a more ample and certain blessing of God may be expected in the Church of God instituted, then in any solitary life whatsoever.

28. They therefore that have opportunity to join themselves to the Church, and neglect it, do more grievously sin, not only against God in respect of ordinance, but also against their own soul in respect of the blessing adjoined. And if they do obstinately persist in their carelessness, whatsoever they do otherwise profess, they can scarce be accounted for believers truly seeking the Kingdom of GOD.

29. The profession of the true Faith is the most essential note of the Church.

30. This profession may in some company go before the solemn preaching of the Word, and administration of the Sacraments.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Of the extraordinary Ministers of the Church.

1. THus far of the subject of application. The manner of it follows.

2. The manner of applying consists in those things which are means of the spirit applying Christ with all his benefits to us for our salvation.

3. The which spirit it self doth apply all saving things unto us, internally and most nearly, and so in his manner immediately, neither is any external means capable properly of that virtue whereby grace may be really communicated to us: Therefore though those do morally concur and operate in the preparation of man to receive thie grace, yet they do not properly confer the grace by themselves, but the spirit which worketh together with them. 1 Cor. 3. 7. Neither is he that planteth anything, nor he that watereth: but God who giveth power to increase.

4. The two principal means of this sort are the Ministry and the holy Signs: unto which notwithstanding there is necessarily too be joined some Ecclesiastical Discipline.

5. The Ministry is an Ecclesiastical function whereby a man being chosen out doth dispense holy things of special right. 2 Cor. 4. 1. We have this Ministry, as we have obtained mercy, 1 Cor 1. 2. Let a man so account of us as of the Ministers of Christ, and dispensers of the Mysteries of God.

6. It is called a Ministry, because that power which is committed to Ecclesiastical men, is a power of doing only by the command of Christ, and mere obedience toward him. 1 Cor. 4. 1. 2.

7. A spiritual or regal power of government whereby one worketh of his own liberty and will, is not belonging to men, but to Christ alone.

8. Hence a Minister of the Church is bound to execute his office by himself, as one that hath not power to appoint any vicar in his place, for this should not be an action of obedience, but of command.

9. Therefore one that is a constant Minister of divers Churches which are necessarily to be provided for by Vicars, is not of God's Ordaining, but of man's ambition and presumption.

10. The power is not absolute, but relative, that is, it doth not consist in an absolute power to do any thing, but in a right, whereby one hath power to do that rightly and lawfully which he might not before so do, and therefore it is Potestas juris, a power of right.

11. But it is of special right: because it respects some... special duties unlawful to others, and it doth undertake some common duties in a certain special manner.

12. The right of the Ministry depends upon calling, Heb. 5. 4. Neither doth any take this honor to himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aron.

13. A calling is an action whereby an office is committed to any with authority to Minister.

14. Therefore they are very ridiculous who do so ordain the calling of Ministers, that they give them not power to preach the word, unless they have some new grant.

15. A necessary adjunct of a calling is fitness to the Ministry.

16. Hence those who are altogether unfit to fulfill the Ministry, if they be called to it by men, are the Ministers of men, not of God. Hos. 4. 6. Because thou hast despised knowledge, I will also despise thee, that thou shalt not be a Priest unto me.

17. This fitness ariseth from a fit measure of gifts, and a ready will to undertake and execute the office.

18. From the Ministry there ariseth a third, staet of the Church: for as by Faith it had its essential state, and by a combination its integral state: so also by the Ministry it hath a certain organical state: because it is now made fit to exercise all those operations which pertain to the good of the whole.
19. The course and direction of these operations, is Ecclesiastical polity.
20. The form of this polity is altogether monarchical in respect of Christ, the head and King; but as toching the visible and vicarious administration, it is of a mixed nature; partly as it were aristocraticall, and partly as it were democraticall.
21. Hence in the lawful Ministry of the Church, Hierarchy holy principality hath no place, but rather Hieroduly, or holy Service.
22. Therefore one Minister is not subjected unto the power of another in his dispensation, but all do immediately depend on Christ: as those Angels which are inferiors in office to others, are immediately subject unto God, not to other Angels.
23. This Ministry is either extraordinary or ordinary.
24. Extraordinary Ministry is that which hath a certain higher, and more perfect direction then can be attained to by ordinary means.
25. Hence such Ministers have always gifts and assistance extraordinary, so that they do Minister without error.
26. The right of an extraordinary Minister is bestowed properly neither from man, nor by man, but from God alone by Jesus Christ and the holy Spirit. Gal. 1. 1.
27. Hence the calling to such a Ministry is immediate.
28. Yet every extraordinary calling, is not so immediate that it excludes all Ministry of men; as appears in the calling of Eliseus, and Matthias; but it excludes only that Ministry which is destitute of an infallible direction.
29. This extraordinary Ministry was very necessary for the Church, because that will of God which pertains unto living well to God, could not be found out by human industry and ordinary means, as all other Arts and Sciences, but it did require men stirred up and sent by God, to whom he hath manifested his will, that they might be to us instead of God hemselfe. Exod. 4. 15, 16. And be thou to him instead of GOD.
30. God hath revealed his will to these extraordinary Ministers. 1. By lively voice. Reg. 1. 10. Unto which was often added an apparition and speaking to of an Angel or Christ himself, as of the Angel of his covenant. 2. By vision, whereby together with the word the Species of the things to be declared were represented to their eyes waking. 3. By dreams whereby such like things propounded to the minds of them being a sleep. 4. Sometime also by a certain special familiarity as it were mouth to mouth, without parable, Numb. 12. 6, 7, 8. If there be a Prophet among you, I will make myself Jehovah known to him in a vision, and will speak to him in a dream. My servant Mosi... is not so: with him I speak mouth to mouth even apparently, and not in dark speeches, and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold.

31. The manner of this revelation was so powerful, that it dis draw men oftentimes into an ecstasy or trance, whereby they were so caught above themselves, that they perceived nothing beside that that was propounded, neither all that thing it self according to all its circumstances, 2 Cor. 13. 3. 4.

32. Yet it is so certain, that the divine truth of it is often confirmed, and in a certain special manner sealed to them to whom it is revealed: so as it need not another confirmation. Gal. 1. 17. & 2. 6. Neither did I return to those who were Apostles before me. They who were in estimation added nothing to me: Although sometimes also for the more abundant confirmation miracles are added. Judge 6. 36. 37. 38.

33. This extraordinary Ministry is either for the first instituting of a Church, or, for the special and extraordinary conservation of a Church, or finally for the extraordinary restoring of a Church being fallen.

34. The Ministry of instituting a Church hath always a testimony of miracles joined with it: Heb. 2, 3, 4. Which at first began to be spoken, &c. God also bearing them witness, with signs and wonders, and with divers miracles, & gifts of the holy Ghost according to his will.

35. Yet miracles do not so give testimony to the doctrine of any, as that it may be presently believed. For that doctrine which doth not consent with the known will of God ought not to be admitted, although it seem to be confirmed with miracles. Deut. 13. 1, 2, 3. Although that sign or wonder come to pass which he soretold thee, saying, Let us go follow other God's. Hearken not to the word of that Prophet. Gal. 1. 8. Though we or an Angel from Heaven, preach another Gospel beside that we have preached, let him be accursed.

36. The Ministry of conserving, & restoring a Church, although it be extraordinary, and is always confirmed by miracles, yet it doth not always or necessarily require a testimony of miracles: as appears in many in the Old Testament, and in John the Baptist.

37. Extraordinary Ministers were Prophets, Apostles, and Evangelists.

38. Wicliffe, Luther, Zwinglius, and such like, that were the first restorers of the Gospel, were not to speak properly, extraordinary Ministers.

39. Yet they are not amiss called extraordinary by some. 1. Because they did perform something like those things which were done by extraordinary Ministers of old. 2. Because in respect of degree they received some singular gifts from God, as occasion did require: which also may be affirmed of many among the more famous Martyrs. 3. Because order at that time being disturbed and decayed, they were of necessity to attempt some things out of the common course.

40. It is therefore ridiculous, to require miracles of those men, to confirm that doctrine which they propounded; seeing such an attestation is not necessary, no notin all extraordinary Ministers.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

Of the holy Scripture.

1. EXtraordinary Ministers were raised up by God, to instruct the Church not only by lively voice, but also by Divine writings, that there might be a perpetual use, and fruit of this Ministry in the Church, even when such Ministers were taken away.

2. For they only could commit the rule of Faith and manners to writing, who by reason of the immediate and infallible direction which they had from God, were in that business free from all error.

3. They received a command of writing from God, partly externally, both generally when they were commanded to teach, and specially sometimes, when they were commanded to write. Deut. 3. 19. Revel. 1. 19. Write ye the Song, write those things which thou hast seen, and partly by the inward instinct of the spirit. 2 Pet. 1. 21. For prophecy came not in old time by the will of man, but holy men spake as they were moved by the holy Spirit. 2 Tim. 2. 16. All Scripture is inspired by God.

4. They wrote also by the inspiration and guidance of the holy Spirit, so that the men themselves were as it were instruments of the spirit. In the place before. Ierem. 1. 9. Behold I put my words in thy mouth. Acts 28. 25. Well indeed spake the holy Spirit by Isaiah the Prophet.

5. But Divine inspiration was present with those writers with some variety, for some things to be written were before altogether unknown to the writer, as doth sufficiently appear in the History of the Creation past, and in foretellings of things to come: but some things were before known unto the writer, as appears in the History of Christ, written by the Apostles: and some of these they knew by a natural knowledge, and some by a supernatural: In those things that were hidden and unknown, Divine inspiration did perform all by it self: in those things which were known, or the knowledge where of might be obtained by ordinary means, there was also added a religious study (God so assisting them) that in writing they might not err.

6. In all those things which were made known by supernatural inspiration, (whether they were matters of right, or fact) he did inspire not only the things themselves, but did dictate and suggest all the words in which they should be written: which notwithstanding was done with that sweet attempering, that every writer, might use those manners of speaking which did most agree to his person and condition.

7. Hence the Scripture is often attributed to the holy Spirit as to the author, making no mention of the Scribes. Hebrews 10. 15. Whereof the Holy Ghost also is a witness to us.

8. Hence also, although in the inscriptions of the holy Books it is for the most part declared by whose labor they were written, yet there is sometimes deep silence of this matter, and that without any detriment of such books, or lessening their authority.

9. Neither yet doth it suffice to make a part of holy writ, if a book be written by some extraordinary servant of God, and upon certain direction of the spirit: unless it be also publicly given to the Church by divine authority, and sanctified to be a Canon or rule of the same.

10. The thing it self which they committed to writing, as touching the sum and chief end of the matter, is nothing else, then that reveal will of God, which is the rule of Faith and manners.

11. Hence all those things which in the first disputation were spoken of the doctrine of life revealed from God, do properly agree to the holy Scripture. For the Scripture is nothing else then that doctrine, with the manner of writing joined to it, which manner was not to be handled there, but in this place.

12. Hence the Scripture in respect of the thing and subject meaning, that is, as it was the doctrine revealed from God, it was before the Church: but in respect of the manner in which it is properly called Scripture, it is after the first Church.

13. It is called the holy Scripture, and by 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 the Scripture, and the writers themselves are called holy, partly in respect of the subject, and object matter, which is so called, the true and saving will of God, and partly in respect of that direction whereby it was committed to writing. Romans 1. 2. Eph. 5. 5. 2 Pet. 1. 21. & 2. 22. & 3. 2. Rev. 18. 20.

14. But although divers parts of the Scripture were written, upon some special occasion, and were directed to some certain men, or assemblies: yet in God's intention, they do as well pertain to the instructing of all the faithful thorough all ages, as if they had been specially directed to them, whence, Heb. 12. The exhortation of Solomon, which is used in the Proverbs, is said to be spoken to the Hebrews (who lived in the Apostles time,) as to children, and 2 Pet. 3. 15. Paul is said to have wrote to all the faithful in that he wrote to the Romans. Hebr. 13. 5. That which was said to Joshua is said to be spoken to all the faithful.

16. All things which are necessary to salvation are contained in the Scriptures, and also all those things which are necessarily required to the instruction and edification of the Church. 2 Tim. 3. 15. 16. 17. The holy Scriptures can make thee wise unto salvation, that the man of God might be perfect, perfectly furnished to every good work.

16. Hence the Scripture is not a partial, but a perfect rule of Faith, and manners: neither is here anything that is constantly and everywhere necessary to be observed in the Church of God, which depends either upon any tradition, or upon any authority whatsoever and is not contained in the Scriptures.

17. Yet all things were not together and at once committed to writing, because the state of the Church & the wisdom of God did otherwise require: but from the first writing, those things were successively committed to writing which were necessarily in those ages.

18. Neither did the Articles of Faith therefore increase according to succession of times, in respect of the essence, but only in respect of the explication.

19. As touching the manner of delivery, the Scripture doth not explain the will of God by universal, and scientificall rules, but by narrations, examples, precepts, exhortations, admonitions, and promises: because that manner doth make most for the common use of all kind of men, and also most to affect the will, & stir up godly motions, which is the chief scope of Divinity.

20. Also the will of God is revealed in that manner in the Scriptures, that although, the things themselves are for the most part hard to be conceived, yet the manner of delivering and explaining them, especially in those things which are necessary, is clear and perspicuous.

21. Hence the Scriptures need not especially in necessities, any such explication whereby light may be brought to it from something else: but they give light to themselves, which is diligently to be drawn out by men, and to be communicated to others according to their calling.

22. Hence also there is only one sense of one place of Scripture: because otherwise the sense of the Scripture should be not only not clear and certain, but none at all: for that which doth not signify one thing, signifieth certainly nothing.

23. For the determining of controversies in Divinity, there is no visible power as it were kingly or pretorian, appointed in the Church: but there is laid a duty on men to enquire: there is bestowed a gift of discerning, both publicly and privately: and there is commanded a desire to further the knowledge and practice of the known truth according to their calling, unto which also is joined a promise of direction, and blessing from God.

24. But because the Scriptures were given for the use and edification of the Church, therefore they were written in those tongues, which were most commonly vulgar in the Church at that time when they were written.

25. Hence all those books which were written before the coming of Christ were written in Hebrew, for to the Jews were committed the Oracles of God. Rom. 3. 2. & 9. 4. And upon like reason they that were written afterward were delivered in the Greek tongue, because that tongue was most common in those parts where the Church did first flourish.

26. Hence there is some knowledge at least of these tongues necessary to the exact understanding of the Scriptures: for the Scriptures are understood by the same means that other human writings are, many by the skill, and use of Logic, Rhetoric, Grammar, and those tongues in which they are expressed except in this, that there is a singular light of the spirit always to be fought for by the godly in the Scriptures.

27. Yet the Scripture is not so tied to those first tongues, but that it may and ought also to be translated into other tongues, for the common use of the Church.

28. But among interpreters, neither, those seventy, who turned it into Greek, nor Jerome, nor any such like did perform the office of a Prophet, so that he should be free from errors interpreting.

29. Hence no persons absolutely authentical, but so far forth only as they do express the fountains, by which also they are to be tried.

30. Neither is there any authority in Earth whereby any version may be made simply authentical.

31. Hence the providence of GOD in preserving the Fountaines, hath been always famous, and to be adored, not only that they did not wholly perish, but also that they stould not be maimed by the loss of any book, or deformed by any grievous fault, when in the mean while there is no one of the ancient versions that remains whole.

32. Nevertheless, from those human versions there may be all those things perceived which are absolutely necessary, if so be they agree with the fountains in the essential parts, as all those versions that are received in the Churches are wont to do, although they differ, and are defective in the smaller things not a few.

33. Neither therefore must we always rest in any version that is received: but we must most religiously provide, that the most pure and faultless interpretation be put upon the Church.

34. Of all those books, being delivered from God, and placed, as it were in the Chest of the Church, there is made up a perfect Canon of Faith and manners, whence also they have the name of Canonical Scripture.

35. The Prophets made the Canon of the Old Testament, and Christ himself approved it by his Testimony. The Canon of the New Testament together with the old, the Apostle John approved and sealed up being furnished with Divine authority. Rev. 22. 18, 19. For I do witness together to everyone that hears the words of the prophesy of this book: if any shall ad to these, God shall lay upon him the plagues written in this book: and if any shall take away anything from the books of his prophesy, God shall take away this part out of the book of life.

36. Those books which commonly we call apocryphall, do not pertain to the divine Canon, neither were they rightly enough joined by men of old to the canonical books, as a certain secondary Canon: for first in some of them there are manifest fables told and affirmed for true Histories as of Tobith, Judith, Susanna, Bel, the Dragon, and such like. Secondly, because they contradict both the sacred Scripture and themselves. Oftentimes Thirdly, they were not written in Hebrew, nor delivered to the Jewish Church or received by it, to which notwithstanding God committed all his Oracles before the coming of Christ. Rom. 9. 4. Fourthly they were not approved by Christ, because they were not among those books which he set forth when he commanded his to search the Scriptures. Fifthly, they were never received either by the Apostles or the first Christian Church as a part of the Divine Canon.

CHAPTER XXXV.

Of ordinary Ministers, and their Office in Preaching.

1. ORdinary Ministry is that which hath all its direction from the will of God revealed in the Scriptures, and from those means which God hath appointed in the Church, for the perpetual edification of the same.
2. And hence they are called ordinary: because they may and are wont to be called to Minister by order appointed by God.
3. But because in their administration they have that Will of God which was before revealed by extraordinary Ministers for a fixed rule unto them, therefore they ought not to propound or do anything in the Church which they have not prescribed to them in the Scriptures.
4. Therefore also they depend upon extraordinary Ministers, and are as it were their successors: for although in respect of manner and degree extraordinary Ministers have no successors; yet in respect of the essence of administration, ordinary Ministers perform the same office toward the Church as extraordinary did of old.
5. The right of his Ministry is wont to be communicated by men, and in that respect the calling of an ordinary Minister is mediate.
6. But this is so to be understood, that the authority of administering Divine things is immediately communicated from God to all lawful Ministers, and the appointing of persons upon which it is bestowed is done by the Church.
7. But because the Church can neither confer gifts necessary for this Ministry nor prescribe unto God upon whom he should bestow them, therefore she can only choose those whom before she sees fitted, for not as extraordinary Ministers, so also ordinary are made fit by their very calling, when they were unfit before.
8. Hence in an ordinary calling it is necessarily required that a lawful trial go before the calling it self. 1 Tim. 3. 10. Let them be first tried, then let them Minister if they be blameless.
9. Ordinary Ministry is for the preserving, propagating, and restoring the Church by ordinary means.
10. There are two parts of this Ministry. 1. That in the Name of God he do those things which are to be done with the people. 2. That in the name of the people he do those things with God which are to be done with him.
11. But in these the preaching of the Word doth most excel, and so it hath been always of perpetual use in the Church.

12. The duty of an ordinary preacher is to propound the Will of God out of the Word, unto the edification of the hearers. 1 Tim. 1. 5. The end of preaching is love out of a pure heart, and a good conscience, and faith unfeigned.

13. But because there is chiefly required a serious desire to edify the Church, therefore he cannot be a fit preacher, who hath not prepared his heart to seek the Law of the Lord, and to keep it, and to teach Israel the statutes and judgments. For he that teacheth another ought before and when he teacheth, to teach himself. Rom. 2. 21. Otherwise he is not fitted to edify the Church.

14. This duty is to be performed not only universally in respect of all the hearers in common, but also specially in respect of order and age whatsoever, as of old men, young men, servants. Tit. 2. & 3. Of teachers, 2 Pet. 1. 12. &c. Yea of everyone. 1 Thess. 1. 11. We exhorted, and comforted, and charged everyone of you, not publicly only, but privately also. Acts 20. 20. Publicly, and from house to house.

15. He ought to have this scope of edifying so always before his eyes, that he diligently take heed to turn not aside from it, to vain laughing. 1 Tim. 1. 6. To striving about words. 2 Tim. 2. 14. To unprofitable controversies, or speculations of science falsely so called. 1 Kin. 6. 20. But show himself to be an holder fast of the faithful word which tends unto doctrine. Tit. 1. 9. And which cannot be condemned, Tit. 2. 8.

16. But because the Will of God is to be propounded out of his Word, to this end therefore he is not fit for his Ministry, who hath not his senses exercised in the holy Scriptures, even beyond the common sort of believers, so that he might be said to be with Apollos mighty in the Scriptures. Acts 18. 24. He must not trust to Postils and Commentaries.

17. That the Will of God may be propounded with fruit of edification these two things, are necessary to be done. 1. That a declaration be made of those things that are contained in the Text. 2. That application of the same be addressed to the consciences of the hearers as their condition doth seem to require. 1 Tim. 6. 17. Charge those that are rich in this World that they be not high minded, nor rust in uncertain riches &c.

18. They deceive their hearers, and altogether forget themselves, who propound a certain text in the beginning, as the beginning of the Sermon to be had, and afterward do speak many things about the text or by occasion of the text, but for the most part draw nothing out of the text it self.

19. In declaring what truth there is in the text, first it ought to be explained, and then afterward what good doth follow from thence. That part is spent in doctrines, or documents, this in use or derivation of profit from those doctrines. 2 Tim. 3. 16. All the Scripture is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, and instruction in righteousness.

20. They who invert and confound those parts, do not provide for the memory of their hearers, and do not a little hinder their edification: because they cannot commit the chief head of the Sermon to memory, that they may afterward repeat it privately in their families without which exercise the greatest part of that fruit doth perish which would by Sermons redound unto the Church of God.

21. Doctrine is a Theological Axiom, either consisting in the express word of Scripture, or flowing from them by immediate consequence.
22. A doctrine must first be rightly found out, and then afterward handed.
23. The finding it out is by Logic Analysis, unto which Reticke also and Grammar serveth.
24. Analysis depends chiefly upon the observation of the scope, or purpose and the means by which it is attained, according to the act of Logic.
25. Unto this must be subjoined for confirmation the interpretation of those things which are doubtful in the Analysis: but manifest things, and such as are perspicuous of themselves do neither require, nor admit a needless interpretation.
26. Handling (of a doctrine) doth partly consist in proving, if it may be questioned by the hearers, (for it is unfit carefully to confirm that which all acknowledge) and partly in illustration of the thing sufficiently proved.
27. Proving ought to be taken out of the more clear testimonies of Scripture, reasons also being added where the nature of the thing will suffer. But here that measure is to be kept, which the commodity of the hearers, will dictate.
28. Illustration may be drawn almost from all places of invention, b... dissentaneous, and comparate arguments have here the chief place.
29. Every doctrine being now sufficiently explained must presently be brought to use, in which pa...t also, unless some special reason do otherwise require, we must most insist: because it contains the end and good of the other, and is more joined with the chief scope of the Sermon, namely the edification of the hearers.
30. They fail therefore who stick to a naked finding out and explication of the truth and neglecting use and practice, in which Religion and so blessedness doth consist, do little or nothing edify the conscience.
31. Neither yet are all the doctrines which may be drawn out of the text, to be propounded, nor all the uses to be inculcated, but those are to be chosen out which the circumstances of place, time and persons, shall teach to be most necessary, and of those such especially are to be chosen which make most to stir up or confirm the life of Religion.
32. They fail therefore, who care not much what they say: so they may seem to have observed, and spoken many things: nay they do this not seldom, that they may extort many things out of the text which are not in it, and oftentimes draw from other places unto it, bringing everything out of many things whereby indeed the subversion rather than the edification of the hearers, especially those that are more unskillful, doth follow.

33. Both doctrine and use as much as may be ought so to be framed, that they may have some connection among themselves, and do also show it. For the mind is not drawn from one thing to another without disprofit: neither is there anything doth more help memory then order of deduction.
34. An use is a Theological Axiom, drawn from the doctrine, showing the profit goodness or end of it.
35. The reason of the deduction is to be opened, if it be not very plain: unto which also must be subjoined probation, or illustration, as the necessity of the hearers, and prudence of the speaker shall advise.
36. This use either pertains to the judgment, or to practice. 2 Tim. 3. 16.
37. In the judgment there is Information, and Reformation of the mind.
38. Information is the proving of some truth.
39. Reformation is the confutation of some error.
40. But although every truth may be taught upon occasion, yet every error is not everywhere to be refuted. For old heresies which are already buried, are not to be digged up again that they may be refuted▪ neither are wicked blasphemies easily to be repeated: this doth trouble and offend, especially when they are solemnly nominated, explained, and refuted:
41. In practice of life there is direction, which consists of instruction and correction.
42. Iustruction is a demonstration of that life that is to be followed.
43. Correction is a condemning of that life that is to be shunned.
44. After declaration, application ought to follow, which hath so great agreement with derivation of uses, that it may often be mingled with it.
45. To apply a doctrine to his use, is so to whet and put on some general truth with special accommodation; as it may pierce into the minds of such as are present, with a moving of godly affections.
46. Men are to be pricked to the quick, that they may feel in everyone of them that of the Apostle, namely that the Word of the Lord is a two edged sword, that pierceth into the inward thoughts and affections, and goeth through unto the joining together of the bones and the marrow. Preaching therefore ought not to be dead, but lively and effectual, so that an unbeliever coming into the Congregation of the faithful he ought to be affected, and as it were digged through with the very hearing of the Word, that he may give glory to God. 1 Cor. 14. 25. And so the hidden things of his heart are made manifest: and so falling down on his face, he will worship God, and say that God is in you indeed.
47. But this application doth either respect a mind oppressed, as consolation, or fainting in the prosecution of good, as exhortation; or in avoiding of evil, as admonition.

48. Consolation is the application of some argument, either to take away, or to mitigate grief and oppressing fear.

49. In consolation, marks are profitably joined, by which the conscience of a man may be assured that such a benefit portains to him, with the consideration of which the Minister doth comfort the consciences of believers, adding occupations, and refutations of such things as a pions and troubled mind may bring and think of to the contrary.

50. Exhortation is the application of an argument, either to beget, cherish, and excite some inward virtue, or to further the exercise of it.

51. In exhortation to virtue it is very profitable to show the means which do tend to the begetting that virtue in us, but let all be proved by places of Scripture and examples, or by reasons which have a firm foundation in the Scriptures.

52. Admonition is the application of an argument to correct some viciousness.

53. In admonition, or dehortation from vice, there may be remedies adjoined out of those places which are most like to prevail against those vices.

54. The manner of working in all these must be such that it have no ostentation of human wisdom, or an entermingling of carnal affections, but the demonstration of the spirit everywhere manifested. 1 Cor. 1. 17. &c. 2. 1. 4. 13. Not with skill of speaking, least the Cross of Christ should be made of none effect. Not with excellency of speech or wisdom: not in parswading words of men's wisdom, but in spiritual and powerful demonstration. Not in words which man's wisdom teacheth, but which the holy Spirit teacheth, for it is the word of the spirit, the word of life which is preached to edification of God which is by Faith: unto which if anything be not fitly spoken or done, it is as vain as hay and stuble. 1 Cor. 3. 12.

55. Therefore neither ought human testimonies whatsoever they be, nor Histories known only to the learned to be intermingled, unless very seldom (the cause also being signified which constraineth so to do) when urgent necessity, or certain hope of fruit doth seem to require such a thing, much less words or sentences of Latin, Greek, or Hebrew, which the people do not understand.

56. The purity, perfection, and majesty of the word of God is violated, whilst it seems to want the mixture of human words, and withal there is a scandal given to the hearers, who being accustomed to such human flourishes, oftentimes, contracting it ching ears, do begin to loath, the simplicity of the Gospel, and will not suffer wholesome doctrine. 2 Tim. 4. 3.

57. The example of Paul (who cites a very few, and brief sayings of heathen Poets, not naming the Authors, to convince the Gentiles to whom they were known and approved, and that very seldom, and but by the way) this example I say doth nothingh enforce that necessity or profit, which they urge, who do obtrude human testimonies frequently, and of purpose, common ding the authors with the same solemnity almost wherewith they use to cite the names of the prophets, and that among Christians, who do only desire to hear Christ, to the end to show forth some learning.

58. Neither also are unnecessary, and far fetched Proems, or persuasive words of Orators to be followed: neither must they love digressions, or excusions. They do savor an human spirit, spend time, and shut out other things which would more edify.

59. But if there be used any Exordium, pertaining to the present matter, that hath his proper place, either in the declaration of the text or applying it to use.

60. The speech and action ought to be wholly spiritual flowing from the very heart, showing a man much conversant in exercises of piety who also hath before persuaded himself, and troughly settled in his conscience, those things which he endeavors to persuade others to: into which finally there is Zeal, Charity, Mildness, Freedom, Humility, whit grove authority.

61. The pronouncing of the speech must be both natural, familiar, clear, and distinct, that it may be fitly understood: as also agreeable unto the matter that it may also move the affections. Gal. 4. 20. I would now be present with you, and change my voice: because I am in doubt of you.

62. Among others here are two voices most to be blamed: the one which is heavy, slow, singing, drowsy, in which not only the words in the same distinction, of a comma, are separated with a pause, but even the syllables in the same word, to the great hindrance of the understanding of things.

63. The other voice which doth here most offend is that which is hasty and swift, which overturnes the ears with too much celerity so, that there is no distinct perceiving of things.

64. That speech pronountiation and action which would be ridiculous in the senate in places of judgment, in the Court, that is more to be avoided in a Sermon.

65. The efficacy of the holy Spirit doth more clearly appear in a naked simplicity of words, then in elegancy and neatness: hence Paul saith that he was 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 rude in speech. 2 Cor. 11. 6. Yet if any have a certain outward force of speaking, he ought to use it with Genuine simplicity.

66. So much affectation as appears, so much efficacy and authority is lost.

67. The sum is, that nothing is to be admitted which doth not make for the spiritual edification of the people, neither anything to be omitted whereby we may in a sure way attain to that end.

68. An appendix of the Sermon is Prayer, both before and after.

69. In Prayer going before, those general things ought to be propounded, whereby the end and use of the word and preaching, and our wants, unworthiness, and duty, together with the gracious promises of GOD may be so brought to remembrance, that the minds of all may be stirred up humbly to seek, and faithfully to observe the Will of God.

70. In Prayer following after, giving of thanks is always to be used, and the chief heads of the Sermon should be turned into petitions.

CHAPTER XXXVI.

Of the Sacraments.

Thus much of the manner of application, in the first part of it, namely in the Ministry.

1. The manner of application in the other part of it is in the signs.
2. A sign is a sensible thing which besides that show it carrieth immediately to the senses, makes another thing withal come into the mind: and in this sense the consideration of a sign is as large as of a Logical argument.
3. Signs are some natural, some by institution.
4. Yet between these two there is so great difference, that they cannot be confounded without foul error.
5. There is also a sign ordinary and perpetual, and another extraordinary and temporary.
6. In respect of the thing signified, it is either of things past, and it is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Rememorativa, A sign of remembrance: or of things present, and its called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Demonstrativum, a demonstrative sign: of things to come, and it is called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Praenunciativum, a foretelling sign; or finally consisting of all these, so as it sets forth things present, past, and to come.
7. In respect of the end and use, it either serveth for the understanding, and is called Notificans a notifying sign; or the memory, and is called Commonefaciens, a... admonishing sign; or for Faith also, and is called Obsignans, a Sealing sign, or lastly for all these together.
8. Hence an holy Sign is either a bare sign, or a seal also.
9. A bare sign is that which only representeth: a seal is that which not only representeth, but also exhibiteth by sealing.
10. A seal sealing the Covenant of God is called a Sacrament, Rom. 4. 11.
11. For it is a sign, of remembrance, demonstrating, foretelling, notifying, admonishing, and sealing.
12. A Sacrament therefore of the new Covenant is a Divine institution, whereby by sensible signs, the blessings of the new Covenant are represented, exhibited and applied.
13. Hence such a Sacrament hath the respect of a secondary Divine testimony, whereby that primary testimony which is contained in the Covenant it self, is specially confirmed in respect of us.
14. Hence that special application of the favor and grace of God, which ariseth from true Faith, is very much confirmed and furthered by the Sacraments.
15. In a Sacrament therefore there is a sensible thing, and a spiritual.

16. The sensible thing is a sign either representing, or applying: the spiritual thing is that which is represented and applied.
17. Yet by the name of a Sacrament, usually and most properly the outward and sensible thing it self is wont to be set forth.
18. The Sacramental sign hath not that spiritual thing to which it is referred either physically inhering or adhering; for so the sign and thing signified should be together.
19. Neither yet are they bare declaring and representing signs, but communicating the thing it self, testifying, and exhibiting the thing to be more communicated.
20. Hence none can institute such an holy sign, but God only: because no Creature can bestow the thing signified, or make the communication of it certain to us, or finally ad that virtue to such signs, whereby they may be made fit to confirm Faith, and Confidence, or to stir up any spiritual grace in us, more then any other thing.
21. The thing it self which is set apart and separated to such an holy use, is properly called a representing sign, as Bread and Wine in the supper, but the use of these things is called an applying sign; as distributing, receiving, eating, drinking.
22. Hence Sacraments do not properly exist out of their use, that is neither before, nor after they are applied to their use, are they indeed Sacraments.
23. The spiritual thing which is signified by the Sacraments of the new covenant is the new covenant it self, that is, Christ with all those blessings which in him are prepared for the faithful.
24. Yet some Sacraments do more expressly represent a manner or some respect of his Covenant, then others, which do also more set forth some other manner
25. But all have this common, that they seal the whole Covenant of grace, to the faithful; neither have they this use at that only time whilst they are administered, but to the end of life.
26. The form of a Sacrament is that union which is between the sign, and things signified.
27. This union is not corporal, neither yet is it imaginary, but it is a spiritual relation by virtue whereof the things signified are really communicated to these, who do rightly use the signs.
28. For neither do all those partake the spiritual thing it self, who are made partakers of the signs, neither is there the same manner and means of partaking both.
29. From this Union followeth a communication of Praedication, whereby First, the sign is predicated of the thing signified, as when Sanctification of the heart is calling circumcision. 2. The thing signified of the sign, as when circumcision is called the Covenant, and bread the body. 3. The effect of the thing signified is predicated of the sign, as when Baptism is said to regenerate. 4. A property of the sign is predicated of the thing signified, as when breaking which agreeth to the Bread is attributed to Christ. 5. A property of the thing signified is attributed to the sign, as when sacramental eating and drinking is called spiritual.

30. The foundation of this relation arifeth, First, from the similitude or proportion of the sign to the thing signified: for such a likeness although it do not make a Sacrament, yet it is required afore to those things which do make a Sacrament, and is laid as a foundation to them. Secondly, from the word of institution, which consists of a command and a promise. The command doth impose a duty of using the Creatures to that holy end. The promise doth give us to believe that we shall not so use them in vain. But this word of institution distinctly applied with fit prayers, is called the word of consecration, of blessing, the word of sanctification, and separation. 3. It is perfected with observation, and the use it self prescribed, of which here is so great force, that for default of it that is not a Sacrament to this or that person, being present in body or receiving, which to others is most effectual.

31. The primary end of a Sacrament is to seal the covenant, and that not on God's part only, but consequently also on ours, that is, not only the grace of God, and promises are sealed to us, but also our thankfulness and obedience towards God.

32 Therefore mystical signs of holy things cannot be instituted by man, without prejudice and violation of the Sacraments, although they do set forth man's duty only.

33. For although such signs are not properly Sacraments, yet they are signs Sacramental, that is, they partake the nature of Sacraments and so cannot be instituted by man.

34. A secondary end is profession of Faith and love: for there are represented in the use of the Saraments, both that union which we have with God in Christ, and that communion which we hold with all those who are partakers of the same union, especially with those who are members of the same Church.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

Of Ecclesiastical Discipline.

An adjunct of the Word and Sacraments is Discipline: which in respect of the sum of the matter hath been always one, and so may fitly be handled in this one place.

1. Holy Discipline is a personal application of the Will of God by censures, either for the preventing, or taking away of scandals out of the Church of God.

2. For in the preaching of the Word, the Will of God is propounded and really applied to beget and increase Faith and obdience. In the administration of the Sacraments, the Will of God is also personally applied by the seals, to confirm Faith and obdience. In the exercise of Discipline, the Will of God is personally also applied in the censures for the removing of those vices, which are contrary to Faith and Obedience.

3. Hence it is that Discipline is wont to be joined with the Word and Sacraments by the best Divines, in the notes of the Church, for though it be not a note simply essential and reciprocal (as neither the other two) yet it ought necessarily to be present to the complete estate of a Church.

4. This Discipline is ordained and prescribed by Christ himself. Mat. 16. 19. & 18. 15, 16, 17. And so is plainly of Divine right: neither may it be taken away, diminished, or changed by men at their pleasure.

5. Nay the sins against Christ's, the author, and ordainer, whosoever doth not so much as in him is to establish and promote this Discipline in the Churches of God.

6. The persons about whom it ought to be exercised, are the members of visible instituted Churches, without any exception. Mat. 18. 15. 1 Cor. 11. And not others: There Vers. 12. For it pertains to them, and only them that have right to partake of the Sacrament.

7. Unto those persons it applies the Will of God, that is, those means of spiritual reformation, such as Christ only hath given to his Churches. 2 Cor. 10, 4. Therefore punishments and vexations to be endured by the body or purse, have no place at all in Ecclesiastical Discipline.

8. It respects sins and scandals in those persons: for it is an wholesome healing plaster of those wounds and diseases to which the sheep of Christ are subject. 1 Cor. 5. 5.

9. It forbids and takes away those offenses: because it doth effectually and personally apply the Will of Christ, the impugning and abolishing of them.

10. But because it doth so effectually urge obedience toward Christ, therefore not without singular reason a great part of the Kingdom of Christ, as he doth visibly govern the Church, is placed by the best Divines in this Disciplines.

11. And this is the true reason why the Discipline of Christ is solidly constituted and exercised together with doctrine in so few Churches, because most even of those who would seem to knew Christ, and to hope in him, do refuse to receive the whole Kingdom of Christ, and to yield themselves wholly to him.

12. But as it is a part of the Kingdom of Christ, so also it is by the same reason a part of the Gospel: for it is an holy manner of promoting the Gospel ordained in the Gospel: They therefore who reject Discipline, do neither receive the whole Kingdom of Christ, nor the whole Gospel.

13. But because both every part of the Kingdom of Christ is necessary in its measure, and that chiefly which doth repress sin, effectually, therefore men do not safely enough content themselves, in Churches wanting Discipline, unless that public defect be made up by a private care, and watching one over another.

14. The parts of this Discipline are brotherly correction, and excommunication.

15. For it doth not either only or chiefly consist in the thunderclaps of Excommunications and Anathem...is, but chiefly in Christian correction.

16. Neither is the proper end of reproof that there might be then an entrance made to Excommunication (although by accident that sometimes do follow) but that the necessity of Excommunicating if it can be, might be prevented, and the sinner may be by timely repentance retained in the Church.

17. Correction, increpation or admonition, ought to be used in every sin unto which the medicine of Discipline agreeth, yet in a divers manner according to the difference of the sin secret, and known. For in hidden sins, those three degrees are to be observed which Christ hath in order prescribed. Mat. 18. 15. 16. 17. But in public sins such a gradation is not necessary, 1 Tim. 5. 20.

18. These admonitions ought always to be taken out of the word of God, not out of men's decrees: otherwise they will not pierce to the conscience.

19. A plenary excommunication is not to be used, unless contumacy be added to the sin. Mat. 18. 17. For the sinner rightly admonished, of necessity must appear penitent, or obstinate, but the penitent is not to be excommunicated, therefore only he that is obstinate.

20. Yet in the more heinous offenses so much patience and delay is neither necessary nor profitable, to expect repentance, and to the discerning of contumacy, as in more usual faults.

21. When the thing it self may suffer delay, it is agreeable to Scripture and reason, that excommunication be first begun by suspension or abstension from the Supper, and such like privileges of the Church, which is wont to be called the lesser excommunication.

22. Yet we must not stay in this degree, but by this means and in this space repentance is to be urged, and there being no hope of it, we must proceed at length to a complete severing from the Communion of the faithful, which is wont to be called the greater Excommunication.

23. But because an obstinate sinner cannot be separated from the faithful, unless the faithful be separated from him, and this also maketh for their wholesome shame. 2. Thess. 3. 14. Therefore they who are lawfully excommunicated are to be avoided of all Communicants, not in respect of duties simply moral, or otherwise necessary, but in respect of those parts of conversation which are wont to accompany approbation and inward familiarity.

Os, orare, vale, conviva, mensa, negat...*

With the secluded, neither confer, nor pray,

Salute, nor feast, nor eath with day by day.

24. From the bond Excommunication none that is not penitent ought to be loosed, neither ought it to be denied to any that is penitent. But it is not a sufficient repentance, if one say it repent me, I will do so no more, and do not otherwise show true Repentance: but such judgments, of serious repentance ought to appear as the Church is bound to be, satisfied in them: otherwise hyprocrisie is nourished, and the Church is mocked, and Christ himself.

25. Yet in some sins a weak repentance (so it appear true) may be admitted them in other sins.

26. The power of this Discipline in respect of the right it self pertains to that Church in common, whereof the offender is a member, for it pertains to her to cast out to whom it belongs to admit at first: and the conservation or cutting off of members concerns the whole body equally: it is therefore to be committed to execution with the consent of the Church (and that not only the Church permitting, but also approving and appointing.)

27. Yet the Elders have the chief parts, in the acting and exercise of it. And that not only in directing the public action, and pronouncing sentence, but also in admonitions foregoing, in which they must make up that which they see was neglected by private persons.

28. The usual censures of the Popes, of pontifical Bishops and their officers, do themselves deserve a grievous censure: for they are profanations of the Name of God, props of an unjust government, and snares to catch other men's money, not spiritual remedies of such sins.

29. Indulgences, Commutations, and human transactions, in those things unto which Christ hath ordained the Discipline of the Church, are wages of the great Whore.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

Of the administration of the Covenant of grace before the coming of Christ.

1. Although the free, and saving Covenant of God hath been only one from the beginning, yet the manner of the application of Christ or of administering this new Covenant, hath not always been one and the same, but divers, according to the ages in which the Church hath been gathered.

2. In this variety here hath been always a progress from the more imperfect, to the more perfect.

3. First therefore the mystery of the Gospel was manifested generally and more darkly, and then more specially and more clearly.

4. This manner of administering is double: one of Christ to be exhibited, and the other of Christ exhibited.

5. For the old and New Testament are reduced to these two primary heads: the old •...miseth Christ to come, the New testifieth that he is come.

6. Whilest Christ was to be exhibited, all things were more outward and carnal, afterward more inward and spiritual John 1. 17. The Law was delivered by Moses, grace and truth came by Christ.

7. Yet at that time there was a double consideration of the Church. 1. As an heir, and 2. as it was an infant. Galatians 4. 1. and following: So long as the heir is an infant, he nothing differs from a servant, though he be Lord of all.

8. As an heir it was free: as an infant it was in a certain manner servile. Ther•...
9. As an heir it was spiritual: as an infant carnal, and earthly. Heb. 9. 10. Rom. 9. 7.
10. As an heir it had the spirit of adoption, as an infant the spirit of fear, and bondage. Rom. 8. 15. Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, but ye have received the spirit of Adoption.
11. The manner of administration which respects Christ to be exhibited was one before Moses, and another from Moses to Christ.
12. Before Moses the polity of the Church was rude and loose, as being in infancy: there were so many visible Churches as there were Families of godly persons: the Ministry was almost always extraordinary by Prophets: the masters of Families, and first borne had right to administer some holy things, as ordinary Ministers, according to that direction which they received from the Prophets.
13. Yet there were some difference of the dispensation from Adam to Abraham, and from that which was after Abraham, until Moses.
14. From Adam to Abraham, First, Redemption by Christ, and the application of him was promised in general, to be performed by a seed of the Woman, to loose the works of the Devil, that is, sin and death. Gen. 3. 15. Rom. 1•...•0. 1 John 3. 8. The seed of the Woman shall break the Serpents head. The God of peace shall tread Satan under your feet shortly. The Son of God was manifested to dissolve the works of the Devil.
15. 2. Calling was exercised in that distinction which was between the seed of the Woman and the seed of the Devil, between the sons of God and the sons of men. Gen. 6. 2. 3. The way of justification was set forth by expiatory sacrifices offered and accepted for sins. Eph. 5. 2. Christ hath loved us and given himself for us, an offering and sacrifice to God for a swee•... smelling savor.
16. 4. Adoption was declared both by the title of sons at that time common to all the faithful, and by the translation of Enoch into the Heavenly inheritance. Gen. 5. 24. Hebr. 11. 5.
17. 5. Sanctification was both expressly inculcated by the Prophets and typically shadowed out by oblations and rites of sacrifices. Iud. 14. Rom. 12. 1.
18. 6. Glorification, was publicly sealed both by the example of Enoch, and conversation of Noach with his family from the flood. 1 Pet. 3. 20. 21.
19. In this period of time the building and conserving of the Ark in the flood, was an extraordinary Sacrament. Heb. 11. Vers. 7. 1 Pet. 3. 20. & 21. There was no ordinary Sacrament: but that in many sacrifices here was something that had the respect of a Sacrament: for in that those that did sacrifice for the most part were made partakers of their sacrifices in an holy banquet, in an holy place with joy before God. Exod. 18. 12. This did seal to them in some sort that grace of the Covenant which is exhibited in the Sacraments.

20. From the time of Abraham the Church did chiefly consist in his family and posterity.
21. In that period of time all the benefits of the new Covenant were more clearly and distinctly set forth then before.
 22. 1. Election was represented in the persons of Isaac and Jacob, beloved before Ishmael and Esau. Romans 9. 11. 12. 13.
 23. 2. Redemption together with the application of it was most excellently exhibited in the person and blessing of Melchizedek, also in the promise and covenant of blessing to come to all Nations by the seed of Abraham.
 24. 3. Calling was exercised by leading forth Abraham out of Vr of the Caldees to a certain new and heavenly Country, Heb. 11. 8. 9. 10.
 25. 4. Justification was illustrated by the express testimony of God, that Fa...th was imputed to Abraham for righteousness, as the Father and pattern of all that should believe, and by the Sacrament of circumcision, which was a seal of the same righteousness.
 26. 5. Adoption was set forth by calling of the Name of God upon Abraham and all the sons of the promise, and by assigning of the inheritance to the sons of the promises begotten of the free Woman, through grace. Galatians 4. 26. 28. 31.
 27. 6. Sanctification was figured by circumcision which did set forth the taking away and abolishing of the corruption of sin & of the old man, that a new Creature might be settled in its place. Col. 2. 11. Deut. 30. 6.
 28. 7. Glorification was shown in the blessing promised, and in the Land of Canaan, which was a type of the Heavenly Country.
29. From the time of Moses unto Christ, all these same were further shadowed, by means both extraordinary, and also ordinary.
30. Redemption and the application hereof was extraordinarily signified. 1. By the deliverance out of Egypt by the Ministry of Moses as a type of Christ. Mat. 2. 15. And by the bringing into the Land of Canaan by the Ministry of Joshua, as of another type of Christ. 2. By the brazen Serpent, by the beholding whereof, men that were like to die were restored to health. John 3. 14. 12. 32. 3. By the cloud, whereby the Israelites were covered from all the injuries both of their enemies, and of the Heaven. And moreover they had light, together with refreshing of their strength administered by day and by night. 1 Cor. 10. 2. Isaiah 4. 4. 4. By passing thorough the red Sea, whereby they had a way cast up to the Land of promise, their enemies being overwhelmed and destroyed. 1. Cor. 10. 2. 5. By Manna from Heaven, and Water out of the Rock, whence they received continual nourishment, as it were out of God's Hand. 1 Cor. 10. 3. & 4. John 6. 32. 33.
31. Ordinarily Christ and Redemption by him was shaddowed out by the high priest, the authors, and sacrifices for sins.

32. Justification was shown in many sacrifices, washings, and the Sacrament of the Passover.
33. Adoption was shown in the first borne, who were dedicated to God.
34. Sanctification, in all the offerings and gifts, and in those observations which had any show of cleanliness.
35. Glorification, by the inheritance of the promised Land, and by that communion which they had with God in the most holy place.
36. The Church of Jews instituted by Moses, in respect of the outward gathering together was only one, because all that solemn Communion, which was at that time prescribed, did depend upon one Temple, and there it was to be exercised by public profession and with certain rites.
37. The Synagogues were not complete Churches, because the whole worship of God and the whole holy Communion at that time prescribed could not be exercised in them.
- 38 Therefore the Church of the Jews was a national Church, and in some respect catholic, or universal, as the believing Proselytes of every Nation under Heaven, were bound to join themselves to that one Church. Acts 2. 5. 6. 8. 9. 10. 11. & 8. 27.
39. The primary Ministers were the Priests, of the family of Aaron, in a continued line of succession, to whom were joined the other Levites. Num. 3. 6. 7. 8. 9. 10.
40. Yet neither Priests nor Levites were admitted to Minister, unless they were first tried, and that as they were able in body, age, and the gifts of the mind.
41. The Discipline of that time that was merely Ecclesiastical, was for a great part ceremonial, yet so as all kind of holy things were to be preserved pure.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

Of the administration of the Covenant from Christ exhibited to the end of the World.

1. THE manner of administration now Christ is exhibited is double, one until the end of the world, and the other in the end it self.
2. From Christ to the end of the world, there is an administration of one manner, and that altogether new: whence also it is called the New Testament.
3. It is of one manner without end or alteration, because it is perfect, so that there is not another to be expected, to which it should give place as to the more perfect.
4. It is the New Testament, in respect of that which was from the time of Moses, and in respect of the promise made to the Fathers: not in respect of the essence, but in respect of the manner, because in them in respect of the manner of administering, there was some representation of the Covenant of works, from which this Testament doth essentially differ; and so seeing there did not appear an integral difference, of the New Covenant from the Old, but in that administration which is most properly called the New Covenant & Testament.

5. But it differs from the former administration, in quality and quantity.
6. That wherein it differs in quality is either clearness, or freedom.
7. Cleerness consists in this, first that the doctrine of grace and salvation by Christ and Faith in him, together with those things annexed to it, is more distinct and express, then before it was: Secondly, that it is not declared in types and shadows, but in a most manifest manner.
8. In both these respects, Christ before is said to be propounded before under a valid, but now to be offered with open and unveiled face. 2 Cor. 3. 12. We use great evidence in speaking; neither are we as Moses who put a veil over his face, that the children of Israel could not see to the end of that which now as unprofitable is taken away.
9. Freedom doth consist in this. First, that the government of the Law, or mixing of the covenant of works, which did hold the ancient people—in a certain bondage, is now taken away: whence also the spirit of adoption, although it was never wholly denied to the faithful, yet most properly it is said to be communicated under this New Testament, in which the most perfect state of believers doth most clearly appear, Gal. 4. 5. After the fullness of time came, God sent forth his Son—that we might receive the adoptions of sons, &c. Secondly, it consists in this, that the yoke of the ceremonial Law, as it was an handwriting against s...ers, as it did forbid the use of things in their nature indifferent, as it did command many burdensome observations of them, and as it did veil the truth it self with manifold and carnal ceremonies, is now wholly taken away, Col. 2. 14. 17. Which are a shadow of things to come, but the body is of Christ.
10. They therefore offend against that liberty which Christ hath obtained for us, who obtrude upon the Christian Churches either Jewish ceremonies, or other of the like nature with them, religious, and mystical. For divine ceremonies are not taken away, that human should succeed in their room; neither is it likely, that Christ would leave such mysteries to the will of men, after his coming, when he permitted no such thing to his people of old, especially seeing he might so easily. in this kind provide for us, if he had judged any religious and mystical ceremonies necessary or profitable for his, besides those very few which he did by name prescribe, or at least show in certain Tables, to whom he did grant such an authority, which he nowhere did. Gal. 5. 1. Stand fast therefore in the liberty wherewith Christ hath made you free, and going back again be not entangled with a yoke of bondage.
11. In quantity this administration differs from the former, both intensively and extensively.
12. Intensively, first, in that the application by the spirit is more effectual, and the gifts of the spirit are more perfect, then ordinarily they were under the Old Testament, whence the old administration is comparatively called the Letter, and the new the spirit. 2 Cor. 3. 6. Secondly, in that it begetteth a more spiritual life. 2 Cor. 3. 18.
13. Extensively, first in respect of place, because it is not contracted to someone people, as before, but is diffused through the whole world. Secondly, in respect of time, in that it hath no term of duration before the consummation of the whole mystical Church. 2 Corinthians 3. 11. Eph. 4. 13. That which remaineth, until we all meet unto a perfect man, unto the measure of the full stature of Christ.

14. But because this new administration is so perfect, therefore it is meet also, that the communion of Saint•... in the Church under the New Testament be ordained most perfect.

15. Therefore in every Church of the New Testament the whole solemn and ordinary worship of God and all his holy ordinances may and ought to be observed, so that all the members of that Church may ordinarily exercise communion together in them.

16. For it is not now as it was ordained of God in the Church of the Jews that some more solemn parts of Divine worship may be exercised in one place, and other in other places, but one particular Church is ordained, in which all holy offices are to be performed.

17. Hence all Christian Churches, have altogether one and the same right, tha•...ne doth no more depend upon another, then another upon it.

18. Hence also it is most convenient that one particular Church do not consist of more members then may meet together into one place to hear the Word of God, celebrate the Sacraments, offer prayers, and exercise Discipline, and perform other duties of Divine polity, as one body.

19. For it is an Aberration not void of all confusion, that in some greater Cities, although there be more believers then that can exercise that Communion together, yet they are not distributed into divers Churches, but do make one so to abound, that the edification of everyone cannot be rightly taken care for and furthered.

20. Therefore the Church instituted since Christ exhibited, is not one catholic Church, so as all the faithful throughout the world should be joined together in one and the same outward band among themselves, and should depend upon one and the same visible pastor, o•... company of pastors, but there are so many Churches as there are companies, or particular Congregations, of those that prosesse the Faith, who are joined together by a special band for the constant exercise of the communion of Saints.

21. For although the mystical Church, as it is in its members, is no other way distributed then into the adjuncts, and subjects, in which respect we call the Church of Belgium, of Britany, of France, as we call the Sea according to the shores which it was heth to, the Belgic, British, French Sea, although it be one and the same Sea: yet the instituted Churches, are divers most special Species, or Individualls, partaking of the same common nature, as divers fountains, divers Schools, divers Families: although many or all peradventure might be called one Church in respect of someone affection which they have in common, as many Families of some noble stock, are often set forth by the name of one Family, as the Family of the House of Nassou, &c.

22. Neither is this Church that is instituted by God properly national, provincial, or Dioecesan, which f•...rmes were brought in by men from the pattern of civil government, especially the Roman: but it is Parochial, or of one congregation, the members where of are combined among themselves, and do ordinarily meet into one place to the public exercise of religion.

23. For such a company, and not larger, is properly signified by the word 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Church, neither hath it a larger signification in the New Testament when it is referred to any visible and designed company, neither also among profane authors who are the more ancient.

24. Hence divers fixed Congregations, of the same Country, and Province are always called Churches in the plural number not one Church, even in Judea, which was all before one national Church. 1 Thess. 2. 14. Acts 14. 23. & 15. 41. Romans 16. 4. 5. 16. 1 Cor. 16. 1. 19. 2 Cor. 8. 1. 18. 19. Gal. 1. 2. 12.

25. Also those particular Churches which are reckoned up i... the New Testament were wont to mere together E 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 into one Acts 2. 46. & 5. 12. & 14. 27. & 15. 25. & 21. 22. 1 Cor. 5. 4. & 14 23. 26. & 11. 17. 23.

26. Neither is there anything read in all the New Testament of the institution of any larger Church upon which lesser congregations should depend, neither is there any worship or holy ordinance prescribed which is not to be observed in every Congregation, neither is there any ordinary Minister made, who is not given to someone such company.

27. Yet particular Churches, as their Communion doth require, the light of nature and equity of rules and examples of Scripture do teach, may and of tentimes also ought to enter into a mutual confederacy and fellowship among themselves in Classes, and Synods, that they may use their common consent & mutual help as much as fitly may be, in those things especially, which are of greater moment; but that combination doth neither constitute a new form of a Church, neither ought it to take away, or diminish any way, that liberty and power which Christ hath left to his Churches, for the directing and farthering whereof it only serves.

28. The ordinary Ministers do follow the form of the Church instituted; and are not Occumenicall, National, Provincial, or Dioecesan Bishops, but Elders of one Congregation, who in the same sense are also called Bishops in the Scriptures.

29. Those transcendent members of the Hierarchy were merely human Creatures brought into the Church without any Divine precept or example: They cannot fulfill the office of a Pastor in so many Congregations. They rob the Churches of their liberty, whilst they exercise as it were, a regal, or rather tyrannical dominion over the Churches themselves, and their Pastors, they have brought in with them the Roman Antichrist 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 himself, as the head, and Chancellors, Suffraganes, Arch-deacons, Officials and the like props of the Hierarchy, as the tail of the same sort, (whose very names are Apocryphal, and altogether unknowen to the first Churches) to the utter oppressing of the Churches of GOD.

30. The right of calling an ordinary Minister is in the Church it self to whom he must serve. Acts 14. 23.

31. Yet here they need the direction and help of the Elders, both of the same Church, and very often also of the neighbor Churches.

32. The essence of the calling is in election of the Church, and acceptance of the elected.

33. An antecedent adjunct of it is, examination, or trial.

34. A consequent, and consummating adjunct is ordination, which is nothing else then a certain solemn entrance of the Minister already elected, into the free execution of his function: whence it comes to pass that 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , ordaining by election, and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Imposition of hands do often signify the same thing among the ancients.

35. The Episcopal ordination of a Minister without title, that is, without a Church to which and in which he should be ordained, is as ridiculous as if any should be feigned to be a husband without a wife.

36. A Minister so called to someone Church, can neither forsake it at his own will, or be cast out from it without just cause: neither can another undertake the like care of the Church, or neglect that which he hath undertaken, by voluntary non-residency, without sacrilegious breaking of his covenant.

37. Ordinary Ministers are either Pastors and Teachers, or ruling Elders, to whom are joined those that take care of the poor, that is Deacons, Diaconesses or Widows.

38. By these offices Christ hath sufficiently provided for all the necessities of the members of the Church, namely that they may be chiefly instructed in the knowledge of the truth by Teachers, stirred up chiefly to the practice of piety by Pastors, preserved in that course of life, and called back to repentance for sins, by them and the Rulers, and be helped against poverty by Deacons.

CHAPTER LX.

Of Baptism and the Supper of the Lord.

1. AFTER the nature of the New Testament, the Sacraments of the same do follow, for they are for number few, to be obtained, and observed easy, and in their signification must perspicuous.

2. They were sanctified and instituted by Christ himself: for although the one Sacrament was first used by John the Baptist, yet in that very thing he was the forerunner of Christ, that he might show, what Christ himself afterward would allow and institute, neither had it the respect of an ordinary institution by the Ministry of John, but by the institution of Christ himself.

3. These Sacraments are Baptism, and the Supper of the Lord, for neither were there either other Sacraments or Sacramental signs delivered to the Church by Christ or his Apostles: neither can there other be appointed by men in the Church.

4. In respect of God's Institution, there lieth greatest necessity upon the faithful to use these Sacraments, diligently, and religiously, yet they are not so absolutely necessary to salvation, that the absence, or mere privation of them doth bring a privation of this institution: neither ought they in that respect, to be celebrated either of those that are not lawful Ministers, or out of a Church assembly.

5. Baptism is the Sacrament of Initiation or Regeneration.

6. For although it doth seal the whole covenant of grace together to the faithful, yet by a special approbation it doth represent, and confirm our very ingrafting into Christ. Rom. 6. 3. We are baptized into Christ Jesus, and Verse 5. Being planted together with him. And 1 Cor. 12. 13. We are baptized into one body.

7. But because upon our first ingrafting into Christ by Faith, there doth immediately follow a relation of our Justification and Adoption: therefore Baptism as the Sacrament of the ingrafting itself, is unto remission of sins. Marc. 1. 3. And it is also a representation of adoption, whilst that by it we are confecrated to the Father Son, and holy Spirit, and their names are called upon the baptized.

8. Because also holiness is always derived from Christ into whom we are ingrafred, unto all the faithful, therefore Baptism also is the seal of our sanctification. Tit. 3. 5. He hath saved us by the laver of regeneration, and the renewing of the holy Spirit. Rom. 6. 4. 5, 6.

9. And because Glorification cannot be separated from true holiness, therefore it is withal the seal also of eternal glory. Tit. 3. 7. That we might be made heirs, according to the hope of eternal life. Romans 6. 8. If we be dead with Christ, we believe that we shall also live together with him.

10. But because those benefits are sealed according to the measure of initiation in Baptism, hence, First, Baptism is but once to be administered, because there is but one beginning of spiritual life by regeneration, as there is but one beginning of natural life by generation.

11. Hence also, Secondly, Baptism ought to be administered to all those to whom the covenant of grace pertains, because it is the first sealing of the covenant it self now first begun.

12. But that the infants of the faithful are not to be forbidden this Sacrament, it appeareth. 1. Because if they be partakers of any grace, it is by virtue of the covenant of grace, and so both the covenant, and the first seal of the covenant also doth pertain to them. 2. In that the covenant in which the faithful are now contained, is the same with that covenant which was made with Abraham. Rom. 4. 11. Gal. 3. 7, 8, 9. But that did expressly extend unto Infants. 3. This covenant which is now administered to the faithful, doth bring more large and full consolation to them, then of old it could before the coming of Christ. But if it should pertain only to them, and not to their Infants, then the grace of God and their consolation should be more narrow, and contracted after Christ is exhibited then before it was. 4. Because baptism succeeded in the place of circumcision. Col. 2. 11. 12. And so doth pertain as well to the children of believers as circumcision itself. 5. Because in the very beginning of regeneration, whereof baptism is a seal, man is merely passive; whence also there is no outward action required of a man either to be circumcised or baptized, as in other Sacraments, but only a passive receiving: therefore Infants, are as capable of this Sacrament in respect of the chief use of it, as these of age are.

13. Faith and repentance do no more make the covenant of God now then in the time of Abraham (who was the Father of the faithful) therefore the want of those acts ought no more to hinder baptism from Infants now, then it did forbid circumcision then.

14. The sign in this Sacrament is water, not simply, but as it purgeth the unclean, either by dipping or sprinkling.

15. But therefore water was chosen, because there is nothing in use that doth more fitly represent that spiritual washing, which is performed by the blood or dead of Christ, neither is the sprinkling or application of the blood of Christ, so fitly expressed by anything, seeing that now since the death of Christ, there ought to be no use of natural blood in holy things.

16. The supper of the Lord is the Sacrament of the nourishing and growth of the faithful in Christ.

17. Hence it ought oftentimes to be administered to the same person.

18. Hence also the supper is only to be administered to those, who are visibly capable of nourishment and growth in the Church: and so not to Infants, but only to those of age.

19. But because most full and perfect nourishment is sealed in Christ, therefore here is used not someone and simple sign of nourishing, but of a double kind, as the nourishment of the body doth require, namely Bread and Wine.

20. They therefore who take away one of these signs from the faithful in the administration of the supper, do detract from the wisdom of God, make lame the institution of Christ, and grievously lessen or take away the consolation of the faithful.

21. But bread and wine are therefore used, because except the eating of flesh (which hath no place in holy things now the sacrifice of Christ is finished) and the drinking of blood, from which not only religion, but man's nature adhors: there is nothing doth more conveniently express that nearest union which by degrees we enjoy with Christ, which is founded in the sacrificing of his body and shedding of his blood.

22. To fain any transubstantiation, or consubstantiation in this Sacrament more, then in baptism, is a certain blind and stupid superstition.

23. For it is not required to spiritual nourishment in this Sacrament, that the bread and wine be changed into the body and blood of Christ, nor that Christ be corporally present with them, but only that they be changed relatively in respect of application and use, and that Christ be spiritually present with them who receive in Faith.

24. This transubstantiation, and consubstantiation is against the nature of a Sacrament in general, against the analogy of our other Sacrament, or baptism, against the most usual phrases in the Old Testament against the human nature of Christ against his state of Glorification, and against the revealed will of God, which saith that Christ shall remain in Heaven until the day of judgment.

25. As touching the words of Institution, This is my body, they are necessarily to be understood, as other sacramental phrases, which everywhere we meet with in the holy Scriptures, of which we have God himself a clear interpreter, Gen. 17. 10, 11. This is ⟨◇⟩ Covenant. That it may be a sign of the Covenant between me and you.

26. As touching the manner of opening the words of this phrase according to art, learned men do differ among themselves. Most of our interpreters would have a trope in the words, that is, a metaphor or a metonymy.

27. The Lutherans contend that here is no trope to be found, but only an unusual predication.

28. There are not a few, and those new Interpreters, who deny, that there is either any proper trope, or unusual predication, but they make it an improper and mystical predication.

29. But no sufficient reason is brought why we may deny that there is a trope in the words: which may be thus demonstrated. If it be an improper or unusual predication as they would have it, this unusual or improper way ought to be shown in some word: which if it be done, then of necessity it is that that word be some way translated from his natural signification and use: if that be so, the word takes the nature and definition of a trope.

30. But the trope is neither in the Article going before, nor in the proper Copula, as in the word is; but in that which follows, that is, in the word body, for body is put for a sign of the body, not that a true and proper body is excluded out of that sentence, but rather included, by a relation, which the sign hath to the thing signified.

31. But there is not only one trope, but threefold in this word, the first is a metaphor, whereby one thing like is put for another unto which a metonymy of the adjunct adheres and is mingled. For the bread is not only like the body of Christ, but also by God's institution it is made an adjunct of it: the second is a Synecdoche of the part for the whole, whereby the body of Christ is put for whole Christ; the third is a metonymy of the subject for the adjuncts, in that Christ is put for all those benefits also which are derived from Christ to us. In the other part of the Wine, there are other tropes sufficiently manifested.

CHAPTER XLI.

To the end of the World.

1. THus far of the administration which is before the end of the World: in the end itself that application shall be perfected, which is only begun in this life.
2. Then the end of calling shall be present to all the called: for we are called to the eternal glory of God. 1 Pet. 5. 10. Wherein also the end of Faith is said to be contained, that is, the salvation of souls. 1 Pet. 1. 9.
3. Then that declaration of Justification and Redemption, which is by the effects, shall be complete, in respect whereof the faithful are said in this life, to expect Redemption. Luc. 21. 18. Rom. 8. 23. Eph. 1. 14.
4. Then all the adopted shall enter into the possession itself of the inheritance, in which sense the faithful are said in this life to expect their adoption. Rom. 8. 23.
5. Then the Image of God shall be perfected in all the Saints. Eph. 5. 27. That he might present it to himself glorious, not having spot, or wrinkle, or any such thing, but that it might be holy and unblameable.
6. Finally then the glory and blessedness hoped for, shall shine in all kind of fullness, not only in the soul, but also in the very body. Philippians 3. 21. He shall transfigure out mean body, that it may be made conformable to his glorious body.
7. But because the state of the Church at that time shall be a state of perfection, and not of edification, therefore the Ministry, Sacraments, and Discipline, together with the instituted Churches themselves shall cease, and the mystical Church shall remain in immediate communion with God.
8. Hence also this end of the World ought with desire to be expected of all the faithful. Phil. 3. 20. Tit. 2. 13. We expect a Savior, Jesus Christ. Expecting that blessed hope, and that glorious coming of the glory of the great God and our Savior.
9. The perfection of this final administration doth require the coming and personal presence of Christ himself. Acts 10. 42.
10. The second coming of Christ in this shall be like the first, that it shall be real, visible and apparent. Acts 1. 11. But in this unlike, that it shall be. 1. With greatest glory and power. Mat. 24. 30. Tit. 2. 13. 2. It shall be with greatest terror in respect of the ungodly, and with greatest joy of all the godly. 2 Thess. 1. 7, 8, 9, 10.
11. Hence there are two Acts, that serve for the last discerning between the godly and ungodly; Resurrection and the last judgment, 2 Cor. 5. 10.
12. Resurrection is of that which fell: but because man fell from life, by the separation of the soul from the body, therefore that he may rise again, it is necessary that the same soul be again reunited to the same body, that by the restored union of both, the same man may exist.

13. That such a Resurrection is possible to God it appears: because such a reparation of man doth not exceed that power which was manifested in his first Creation. Phil. 3. 21. According to that effectual power whereby he is able to subdue all things to himself.

14. But that this Resurrection shall actually be, it cannot be certainly demonstrated by any natural reason, neither, A priori, nor A posteriori, but it is properly of faith.

15. Neither the nature of the soul, nor of the body, can be the cause of Resurrection: for the forming again and raising up of the body, out of the dust, is against the wonted course of nature, which when it is perfectly destroyed, is not wont to be repaired by nature: and the inseparable union of the soul with the body by which man is made immortal, is above the strength of nature.

16. Therefore the raising up of the dead doth properly agree to Christ God-man: the principle of it is the Divine omnipotency of Christ, whereby it may easily be accomplished, even in an Instant.

17. The Ministry of the Angels, shall not be properly to raise the dead, but together the parts to be raised, and to gather them together being raised.

18. But although all shall be raised by Christ, yet not in one and the same way: for the Resurrection of the faithful is unto Life, and it is accomplished by virtue of that union, which they have with Christ, as with their Life. Col. 3. 4. 1. Thess. 4. 14. And by the operation of his quickning spirit which dwells in them. Rom. 8. 11. He shall also quicken your mortal bodies, by his spirit dwelling in you: but the Resurrection of others, is by that power of Christ, whereby he executeth his revenging Justice.

19 Therefore the Resurrection of the faithful is from the Life of Christ, as from a beginning, unto their life, as the fruit and effect: and therefore it is called the Resurrection of life: and the raising up of others is from the sentence of death and condemnation, to death and condemnation it self, and therefore it is called, the resurrection of condemnation. John 5. 28, 29.

20. The last judgment is exercised by Christ as by a King: for the power of Iudging is part of the office of a King.

21. In respect of the faithful it comes from grace, and is an office of the Kingdom of grace, essential to Christ the Mediator: but in respect of unbelievers, it is an office of power only and dominion, granted of the Father, belonging to some perfection of mediation, but not essential to it.

22. Hence the sins of the faithful shall not come into judgment: for seeing that in this life they are covered and taken away by the sentence of Justification, and that last judgment shall be a confirmation and manifestation of that sentence, it would not be mere, that at that time they should again be brought to light.

23. The place of this judgment shall be in the Air. 1 Thess. 4. 17.

24. The day and year of it is not revealed in Scripture, and so may not be set down by men.
25. The sentence presently to be fulfilled, shall be given, of eternal life or death, according to works foregoing.
26. But the sentence of life, in respect of the elect, shall be given, according to their works, not as meritorious causes, but as effects testifying of true causes.
27. But the sentence of death in respect of the reprobate, shall be given according to their works, as the true causes.
28. Christ God-man is the Judge, as it were delegated: yet in respect of that Divine authority and power which he hath, and upon which depends the strength of the sentence, here is the principal Judge.
29. The faithful also shall judge with Christ, assisting; not consulting, but approving, as well in their judgment and will, as by comparison of their life and works.
30. Judgment shall be given not only of wicked men, but also of evil Angels. Therefore the raising up, and judging of wicked men to be done by Christ, doth no more argue the universal redemption of such men, then of the Devils.
31. The fire that is appointed to purge and renew the World, shall not go before the judgment, but shall follow.
32. Purgatori is no more necessary before the day of judgment then after: seeing there shall be none afterward, by the confession of the Papists themselves, neither is there any now before.
33. The elements shall not be taken away, but changed.
34. Christ also after the day of judgment shall remain King and Mediator forever.

THE SECOND BOOKE OF SACRED THEOLOGY.

CHAPTER 1.

Of Observance in general.

Thus much of the first part of Theology, or of Faith in God: the other part follows, which is Observance toward God.

1. OBServance is that whereby the Will of God is performed with subjection to his glory.
2. It respects the Will of God as a pattern, and a rule, as appears by the those words of Christ, wherein also he describes our obdience; let thy Will be done as in Heaven, so also in Earth; and did also explain his own obedience, Mat. 26. 29. Not as I will, but as thou wilt, and Verse 42. Let thy will be done, so Psalms. 40, 9. I delight to do thy will, O my God: and thy Law is written in my bowels.

3. But it respects the Will of God not as it is secret, and powerfully effectual, or ordaining: for so even all other Creatures and ungodly men, and the very Devills also themselves do perform the Will of God, with that obediential virtue which is common to all Creatures: but it respects that Will of God which prescribes our duty to us. Deut. 29. 29. Things that are revealed, are revealed, that we may do them.

4. It respects that will with subjection. Rom. 8. 7. Because it applies our will to fulfill the Will of God, as it commands us anything according to his authority. Rom. 8. 7. It is not subject to the Law of God.

5. Hence it is called obedience: because it makes the will ready to commit the command of God to execution, being heard, and in some measure perceived.

6. Hence also it hath in it self some respect of Service toward God; whence it comes to pass, that to obey God, and to serve him, sound one and the something. Luc. 1. 74. Rom. 6. 16. And to serve God is altogether the same with serving of obedience and righteousness. There Verse 16. 18. 22. Because that to do the Will of God with subjection, is to serve God. Eph. 6. 6. 7. As servants of Christ, doing the Will of the Lord from the heart, with good will doing service, as to the Lord.

7. For our obedience toward God, although in respect of readiness of mind it ought to be the obedience of sons: yet in respect of that strict obligation to subjection, it is the obedience of servants.

8. From this subjection to the Will of God, there doth necessarily follow a conformity betwixt the Will of God and ours. Rev. 2. 6. This thou hast, that thou hatest the deeds of the Nicolaitans, which I also hate. And a certain express resemblance of that Divine perfection which God hath revealed and propounded to be imitated by us. 2 Pet. 1. 4. That we might be made partakers of the Divine nature, for he that doth truth, his works are said to be done according to God. John. 3. 2.

9. Hence the same obdience which is called obedience, because it respects the Will of God with subjection; and righteousness, because it performs that subjection which is due; is also called holiness because it respects the same will with conformity and pure likeness. 1 Pet. 1. 14. 15. As obedient children—as he that hath called you is holy, be ye also holy in all manner conversation.

10. Obedience looks to the glory of God. 1 Cor. 10. 31. Do all to the glory of God: as it doth acknowledge his chief authority and power in commanding. 1 Cor. 6. 20. Ye are bought with a price: therefore glorify God, &c. And also as it hath in part relation to, and doth represent the perfection of God. 1. Pet. 2. 9. That ye may set forth his virtues, in the manifestation of which things consists that glory which may be given to him of us.

11. Also in this subjection there is a respect of fear, as the Authority and Power of God is acknowledged: whence also the fear of the Lord is in Scripture often •...at for whole obedience. Psalms 34. 12. I will teach you the fear of the Lord.

12. It is therefore said to be toward God, both as God is the Rule of it, and as he is the Object of it, and also as he is the End.

13. The principal efficient cause of it by way of an inward and inherent principle, is mediately Faith, and immediately sanctifying Grace.

14. For Faith doth both prepare a way for us to God. Heb. 10. 22. Let us draw nigh by assurance of Faith, and Power to go to him. 2 Cor. 1. 24. By Faith ye stand, whence obedience is called the obedience of faith. Rom. 1. 5. And the faithful are called the children of obedience, 1 Pet. 1. 14.

15. Now Faith doth bring forth obedience in a threefold respect. 1. As it doth apprehend Christ who is the Fountain of Life, and the Spring of all power to do well, and 2. As it receives and rests in those arguments, which God hath propounded to us in Scripture to persuade obedience, namely by promises and threatenings. 3. As it hath power to obtain all grace, and so that grace whereby obedience is performed.

16. But sanctifying grace is that very power whereby we are lifted up, to apply our will to the will of God. Whence also new obedience is always included and understood, in Scripture, when there is mention made of the new man, and the new creature. Eph. 4. 24. Gal. 6. 15.

17. For nothing can be performed by man, since sin is entered, acceptable to God, as it comes from him, or as a work of spiritual life: unless, it be performed in Christ by Faith and the grace of sanctification. John 15. 4, 5. Without me ye can do nothing.

18. Yet these duties are not therefore to be omitted by a man that doth not yet believe; because they are in themselves good, they hinder the increase of sin and punishments of sinners, nay they are often recompensed with divers benefits from God, although $\langle \diamond \rangle$ by force of any determined Law, but by a certain abundant and secret kindness of him.

19. The adjuvant cause by moving is. 1. The dignity and majesty of God in it self to be observed. Deut. 31. 3. Ascribe ye greatness to our God. Psal. 29. 2. Give unto the Lord the glory of his name. 2. The kindness of God toward us, in which respect we owe to him whatsoever is in us. 1 Cor. 6. 20. Know ye not that ye are not your own—which are God's. Rom. 12. By the mercy of God, whence also it is, that our obedience is nothing else then thankfulness due to God, and it is rightly explained by Divines under that name. 3. The authority of God commanding, which hath universal and full dominion over us, James 4. 22. There is one Law-giver who can save and destroy. 4. The equity and profit of the things commanded, which do both agree with greatest reason, Rom. 2. 15. Their conscience together bearing witness, and also pertain to our perfection and blessedness. Deut. 32. 47. It is your Life. 5. The reward and promises by which obedience is persuaded. 2 Cor. 7. 1. Seeing we have these promises, let us purge ourselves, &c. 6. The misery which they that do otherwise do incur, Deut. 28. 16. Heb. 12. 26. Cursed shalt thou be. For our God is a consuming fire.

20. The matter of obedience is that very thing which is commanded by God, and so is summarily contained in the Decalogue: for otherwise the Law of God should not be perfect.

21. Therefore the Law of God although in respect of the faithful it were as if it were abrogated, both in respect of the power of justifying which it had in the state of integrity, and in respect of the condemning power which it had in the state of sin: yet it hath force and vigor, in respect of power to direct, and some power also it doth retain of condemning, because it reprove, and condemns sin in the faithful themselves, although it cannot wholly condemn the faithful themselves, who are not under the Law, but under Grace.

22. The form of obedience is our conformity to the Will of God, therefore revealed, that it may be fulfilled by us Mich. 6. 8. He hath $\langle \diamond \rangle$ •...ee O man, what is good.

23. For neither is the secret Will of God, the rule of our obedience, nor all his revealed will, for Jeroboam sinned in taking the Kingdom of Israel, although the Prophet told him that God did in some sort will it. 1 Kings 11. 31. with 2 Chron. 13. 5, 6, 7. But that revealed will, which prescribeth our duty is therefore revealed that it may be fulfilled by us.

24. But this Will of God in this very respect, is said to be good, perfect and acceptable to God. Rom. 12. 2. Good, because it contains in it self all respect of that which is honest: perfect, because there is nothing to be sought further for the instruction of life: acceptable to God, because obedience performed to this will, is approved and crowned of GOD.

25. The knowledge of this will is necessary to true obedience. Prov. 4. 13. Take hold of instruction, and let her not go: keep her, for she is thy life, and Verse 19. The way of the wicked is darkness, they know not at what they stumble.

Therefore the desire of knowing this will of God is commanded to us, together with obedience it self. Prov. 5. 1. 2. Attend to wisdom, incline thine ear to understanding: whereof a great part also is, when it respects practice, as on the contrary, all ignorance of those things which we are bound to know and do, is sin. 2 Thess. 1. 8. Rendering vengeance to those that know not God, and obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ.

26. With knowledge of the will of God in this life, there ought to be joined a trembling and fear to transgress it. Pro. 8. 12. 13. & 14. 16. I wisdom, have with me the fear of the Lord. The wise man feareth and departeth for evil. Chiefly indeed in respect of offense: but also in respect of the anger and punishment most of all as it separates from God. Neither ought such fear to be called servile, when it respects not punishment only.

27. The chief end is God's glory; for we tend unto him by obedience, upon whom we lean by Faith: otherwise obedience should not flow from Faith. Seeing also that Faith is our life, as it doth join us to God in Christ, it is necessary that the actions of the same Faith, which are contained in the obedience, should be carried also to God, that is, to his Glory.

28. The less principal end is our own salvation and blessedness. Rom. 6. 22. Being made servants to God, ye have your fruit in holiness, and the end eternal life. Heb. 1. 2. 2. For the joy that was set before him he endured the Cross.

29. For although that obedience which performed only for fear of punishment or expectation of reward, is rightly called mercenary: yet that any should be secondarily stirred up to do his duty, by looking on the reward, or for fear of punishment also, this is not strange from the Sons of God, neither doth it in any part weaken their solid obedience.

30. But our obedience is not the principal or meritorious cause of life eternal. For we do both receive the privilege of this life, and also the life it self, by grace, and the gift of God for Christ's sake apprehended by Faith. Rom. 6. 23. The gift of God is eternal Life in Jesus Christ our Lord. But our obedience is in a certain manner, the Ministering, helping and furthering cause toward the possession of this life, the right where of we had before; in which respect it is called the waywherein we walk to Heaven. Eph. 2. 10.

31. But it furthers our life, both in its own nature; because it is some degree of the life, it self always es tending to perfection: and also by virtue of the promise of God who hath promised life eternal to those that walk in his precepts. Galatians 6. 8. He that sows to the spirit, of the spirit shall reap life eternal.

32. For although all our obedience whilst we live here is imperfect and defiled with some mixture of sin. Gala. 5. 17. the flesh lusteth against the spirit; yet in Christ it is so acceptable to God, that it is crowned with the greatest reward.

33. Therefore the promises made to the obedience of the faithful, are not legal, but evangelical, although by some they are called mixed. Mat. 5. 3.

34. The manner of obedience is in subjection or humility largely taken, whereby the creature doth submit himself to God, to receive and execute his commands: unto which there ought always to be joined. 1. Sincerity, whereby all mixture of a strange intention and affection is removed, so that the whole man is applied to this duty. 1 Thess. 5. 23. 1 Cor. 6. 20. And 2. Zeal, that is, the highest degree of a pure affection. Gal 4. 18. It is a good thing to love servently, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 in a good thing always.

35. The chief subject of obedience as also of lively Faith is the will. Phil. 2. 13. It is God that worketh in you both to will, and to do.

36. But because the s•...rity of the will approving doth most appear in readiness, alacrity or cheerfulness of mind, therefore that cheerfulness doth most of all pertain to the very essence of obedience. 2 Cor. 9. 7. Deut. 28. 47. God loves a cheerful giver: because thou didst not serve thy God in joy and cheerfulness of heart. So as often it is pleasing and acceptable to God, although the work it self that is propounded, be not performed. 2 Cor. 8. 12. For if there be first a ready mind, one is accepted according to that he hath.

37. And because the zeal of the will doth chiefly consist in love and hatred, therefore also there is necessarily required to obedience acceptable to God, a love of the good, and hatred of evil. Ps. 45. 8. Thou hast loved righteousness, and hated iniquity.

38. The effect and fruit is not only a declaration, but also a confirmation of Faith and Hope. 2 Tim. 1. 19. Keeping Faith and a good conscience, which being put away, some have made Shipwreck of Faith.

39. An adjunct that accompanies it is a conscience quiet, joyful and glorying. Heb. 13. 18. 2 Cor. 1. 12. 1 John 3. 19. 21. For we trust that we have a good conscience, desiring to behave ourselves well in all things. 1. Our glorying is this, the testimony of our conscience, by this we shall assure our hearts.

CHAPTER II.

Of Virtue.

1. There be two parts of obedience. Virtue, and the action of Virtue. 2. Pet. 1. 5. Ad to your Faith Virtue, &c. For if these things be with you and abound, they will make you that ye shall neither be barren nor unfruitful in the knowledge of our Lord Jesus Christ.

2. This distribution is of the whole into members▪ for these two are in their own nature joined together, and do make one and the same obedience.

3. Hence both virtues and their actions are set forth by the same name, and are explained also by the same definition, because they are altogether of the same nature: even as arguments of Logic, are of the same name and nature, whether they be considered alone and by themselves, or in Axioms, and Syllogisms.

4. Virtue is an habit whereby the will is inclined to do well.

5. It is called an habit, not as it is distinguished from disposition, and signifieth a confirmed and perfect constitution of mind: for such a degree of virtue is scarce granted to men, while they live here: but generally, as it contains both a perfect and also imperfect degree of Virtue, and state of the mind.

6. But it is called an habit, not only because it is had, but also because it maketh the subject which it is in to have it self in a certain manner, that is, it determines the faculty to good, which otherwise is not determined, in which sense this word is found, Hebr. 5. 14. Who by reason of habit, have their senses exercised to discern good and evil.

7. It is in the will. First, because the will is the proper subject of the Theology as it is the proper principle of life, and of moral and spiritual actions. 2. Because the will is that faculty which is properly carried unto good that is honest, Rom. 7. 19. 21. 3. Because virtue is an habit that is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 or elective, the proper, and immediate operation whereof is voluntary election. 4. Because the will doth commend the other faculties, and so Virtue doth most agree to it, that all may be directed aright. 5. Because the will is neither by it self, nor by reason sufficiently determined to good actions, and so it hath need of its own and internal disposition to work aright. 6. Because the other faculties may be compelled, and by consequence one may whether he will or no lose virtue, if it should have the proper and fixed seat, in them. 7. Because that praise is most properly due to the actions of the will, and to the operations of the other faculties, so far forth as they flow from and depend upon the will; but that it is proper to virtue to be praise-worthy, not only the Philosophers teach, but also the Apostle, Philippians 4. 8. If there be any virtue, if any praise. 8. Because neither the understanding can be the subject of virtue, because intellectual habits, although they be most perfect, yet they do not make a man good, nor any sensitive appetite, because true virtue is found in Angels, and the souls being separated from bodies, which are void of this appetite: yet there are often in the sensitive faculties some dispositions, which cause that the will commanding aright is more easily obeyed, and in that respect they have a certain resemblance of Virtue.

8. Virtue is said to incline to God. First, that it may be distinguished from a vicious habit whereby men are inclined to evil. Rev. 7. 17. 20. 23. 2. That it may be distinguished also from those perfections of the mind, which indeed do bring light, whereby the will may direct it self as well doing, but not incline it to do right.

9. Hence, First, true and solid virtues, do always make him good in whom they are: not that the very dispositions that do inhere in us, are the grace making us first accepted with God, as the Schoolmen speak, for that pertains to Faith; but because they are reciprocated with a good man, and goodness is derived from them into our actions.

10. Hence also none can use virtue amiss, as being the principle of action; when notwithstanding men may, and are wont to abuse any habit of the mind.

11. Therefore those virtues which are wont to be called intellectual, have not an exact respect of virtue.

12. Moreover virtue is said to incline not only to good, but also to well doing: because the manner of action doth chiefly flow from virtue.

13. But as the rule of well-doing, so also the rule of virtue is the revealed will of God, which only hath the force of a certain rule in those things which pertain to the direction of life.

14. That is a Lesbian rule of virtue which Aristotle, puts to be the judgment of prudent men: for there are never such wise men, to whose judgment we may <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> always stand: neither if there were, they could not be always known or consulted with by those who exercise themselves in Virtue.

15. That which is said to be right reason, if absolute rectitude be looked after, it is not elsewhere to be sought for then where it is, that is, in the Scriptures: neither doth it differ from the will of God revealed for the direction of our life. Psal. 119. 66. Teach me the excellency of reason and knowledge: for I believe thy precepts. But if those imperfect notions concerning that which is honest, and dishonest, be understood, which are found in the mind of man after the fall: seeing they are imperfect and very obscure, they cannot exactly inform virtue; neither indeed do they differ anything from the written Law of God, but in imperfection and obscurity only.

16. Therefore there can be no other discipline of virtue then Divinity, which delivers the whole Will of God revealed, for the directing of our reason, will, and life.

17. They that think otherwise, do bring no reasons, which may move an understanding and sound man. They say the end of Divinity is the good of grace: but the end of Ethics is a moral or civil good. As if no moral or civil good were in any respect, a good of grace and spiritual. As if the proper good, blessedness, or end of man, were manifold, or as if that should be a virtue of a man, which doth not lead a man to his end, and chief good. They say that Divinity is exercised about the inward affections of men; but Ethics about the outward manners. As if either Ethics (which they define a prudence to govern the will and appetite) did not respect the inward affection: or that Divinity did not teach as well outward, as inward obedience.

They would have it that Ethickes are concluded in the bounds of this life, but that Divinity extends to a future. As if a blessed life were not one; or that of one and the same life, there were one rule, as it is present, and another as it is to come. They say the subject of Ethickes is a man, approved, good and honest: but the subject of Divinity is a godly and religious man; when notwithstanding the Apostle doth expressly teach that Divinity instructs us to live not only piously and religiously, but also temperately, and justly, that is, approvedly and honestly, Tit. 2. 12. Ad to these, that the most eager defenders of the contrary opinion, do acknowledge and contend, that moral virtues are the image of God in man, and so a degree of Theological virtue; and that moral virtue compared to spiritual is as warmth to heat, and the morning-light to the noon-light. As therefore warmth and heat, morning, and noon-light are taught in the same act: so also virtue moral and spiritual.

18. Therefore that judgment, and wish of that greatest master of arts, Peter Ramus, was no less pious then prudent:

If I should wish for that which I would obtain, I had rather that this learning of philosophy were delivered to children out of the Gospel, by some Divine that is learned, and of approved manners, then out of Aristotle by a Philosopher. A child will learn many impieties out of Aristotle, which it is to be feared, that he will forget too late. That the beginning of blessedness, doth arise out of men; that the end of blessedness is bounded in man: that all virtues are wholly contained in man's power, that they are obtained by man's nature, art, and industry. That though these works, are great and Divine, yet that God is never used to them, either as an aider, or workman: that Divine providence is removed from this theater of human life: of Divine Justice, that there is not a word spoken: that man's blessedness is placed in this frail Life, &c.

19. But the same habit which is called virtue, as it doth incline in his manner unto God, is also called a gift, as it is given of God, and inspired by the holy Spirit: and it is called grace, as it is freely bestowed, by the special favor of God upon us; also in respect of the perfection which it hath, together with the profit and sweetness, which is perceived from it, is it called fruit: and in respect of the hope it brings of life eternal, it is called blessedness by some.

20. They therefore do weary themselves in vain, who make seven gifts of the spirit out of Isaiah 11. 2. Upon whom the spirit of Jehovah shall rest. The Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and of might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of Jehovah: and do carefully distinguish them from virtues, and have enough to do to demonstrate the proportion of every of them to some virtue. For neither are there only seven gifts of the spirit, although there are no more (nay but six) reckoned up there: because there only the chief and most kingly gifts in respect of the subject are remembered (for it is there spoken of Christ) other gifts by a Synecdoche being understood: neither those gifts themselves whereof there is mention made there, are in very deed distinguished from virtues, but they do by a metonymy, set forth all virtues by their causes.

21. For although those 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Graces, whereof there is mention, 1 Corinthians 12. 4. are in very deed distinguished from virtues: yet Grace when it notes an inherent perfection in us, doth either set forth someone virtue, or all jointly as it were in his root.

22. In vain also are there twelve fruits of the spirit gathered out of Gal. 5. 22. The fruit of the spirit is Love, Joy, Peace, Long-suffering, Kindnesse, Goodness, Faith, Meekness, Temperance, together with the addition which is found in the common translation: and they are compared to virtues, as is aforesaid of gifts; for neither are they only the fruits of the spirit, which are there expressed upon the present occasion, and are explained in that place with the names of the virtues themselves: because virtues are fruits, such as are required and expected by the husband-man, and do agree to the nature of the seed which he did sow, and also bring profit and sweetness, with them, when they are perceived: all which do agree to virtues, and their actions in a certain manner in respect of God; but the profit chiefly in respect of us: whence also it is that holiness with all virtues is not only called a fruit of the holy Spirit, but also our fruit, Rom. 6. 22. But this profit together with the sweetness is shown in that place to the Galatians, in as much as joy, and peace are reckoned up, as fruits of the fruits.

23. They also use the same judgment, who think they have found eight beatitudes in the Sermon of Christ. Matth. 5. For there is but one beatitude, but seeing it hath divers signs, namely all solid virtues, together with the operations of them, the Lord doth propound certain singular virtues, or operations of virtues, which do most agree to his Kingdom, and are very remote from human sense, and doth partly persuade them by the promise of blessedness, and doth partly also describe blessedness, or blessed men, by the study and profession of them.

24. The common affections of virtue, are those four which are wont to be called Cardinal virtues.

25. For they do not make four kinds of virtues, as the most have hitherto thought, who do manifest violence both to virtue and reason it self, whilst they will constrainedly refer all singular virtues to those heads: but they are four conditions, which are necessarily required in that disposition which deserves the name of virtue.

26. The first of these is called Justice in that general sense, whereby it sets forth an inclination to do rightly, giving every man his own, and it may be called the rectitude of virtue: for in that description of virtue which the Apostle doth propound in a certain heap of words, Phil. 4. 8. Whatsoever things are true, whatsoever things are honest, whatsoever things are just, whatsoever things are pure, whatsoever things are lovely, whatsoever things are of good report, if there be any virtue, and if any praise, although truth, Justice, purity do set forth one and the same nature of virtue, yet Justice doth most intimately set forth the essence of it.

27. The second is Prudence; whereby all the strength of reason is used to find out that which is right, and to direct a right all the means of it: it is therefore the alone discerning of those things which pertain to right doing: and it contains in it self the force of understanding, knowledge and wisdom: so that all those perfections of the mind which are wont to be called intellectual virtues, in this respect alone do pertain to virtue, so far forth as by the power of them the will is directed in doing well.

28. It is called in the Scripture Spiritual understanding and wisdom, Col. 1. 9. Where understanding doth seem to set forth a general perceiving of good, and evil; and wisdom notes out the same perceiving as it is applied to several things considered with their circumstances, wherewith they are clothed: so that understanding considering doth as it were say, It is lawful: wisdom saith, It is expedient; according to that distinction which is, 1 Corinthians 6. 12 & 10. 23. To this is opposed, Foolishness. Ephesians 5. 17. Be not therefore unwife, but understanding what the Will of the Lord is.

And Ignorance, Eph. 4. 18. Being strangers from the Life of God, by reason of the ignorance that is in them. It is also called Judgment. 1 Cor. 2. 15. And Discerning, Phil. 1. 10. To which is opposed vanity of mind, Eph. 4. 17. And a mind void of all Judgment, Rom. 1. 28.

29. This Prudence ought to be exercised, 1. With circumspection, taking heed and due diligence, which are often in the Scripture commended under the name of watchfulness. Marc. 13. 33. Take heed, watch and pray: unto which is opposed that drowsy sleepiness which is said to have seised upon the foolish Virgins. Mat. 25. 5, 13. Secondly, with election upon a due proportion; so as the greater duties be preferred before the lesser, and in everyone a convenient measure be kept according to the intending of affections and strength. Mat. 6. 33. 1 Cor. 12. 31. & 14. 1. Seek first the Kingdom of God and the righteousness of it. Affect the greater gifts: but rather that ye may prophesy.

30. The third general affection of virtue is fortitude, which is a firm persisting in doing rightly, enduring and overcoming all those difficulties which may arise either from the continuance of the act which is required, or from other impediments whatsoever. Hence it is that virtue in the Hebrew is set forth by the name Christ, even when it is ascribed to Women. Prov. 31. 10. And a mighty strengthening is required in every virtue. Eph. 3. 16. It contains therefore. 1. That confidence which is commended. Acts 4. 29. To which fear is opposed, Phil. 1. 14. That they are bold to speak the word without fear. Secondly, perseverance and constancy, Revel. 2. 26. Whosoever shall overcome; and keep my works unto the end. To which is opposed a fainting of mind and weariness of well-doing. 2. Thess. 3. 13. Gal. 6. 9. Hebr. 12. 3, 12. Let us not be weary. Be not weary. Least ye faint in your minds. Raise up the weak hands, and feeble knees. Thirdly, It contains sufferance or patience. James 5. 7, 8. Heb. 10. 36. Be of patient mind, and stablish your hearts. For ye have need of patience.

31. The fourth is Temperance, whereby all those desires which divert men from well-doing are asswaged and restrained: and so it makes virtue undefiled. 2 Tim. 2. 4. None that goeth a warfare entangleth himself. 1 Pet. 1. 13. Gird up the loins of your mind, be sober, &c. It is often called in Scripture Sobriety when that word is used in a more general sense, as 1 Pet. 1. 13. & 5. 8. And purity or cleanness of heart. 1 Tim. 1. 5. 1 Peter 2. 22. And also sincerity, as it doth exclude pollution of any mixture. This force of the word is shown 2 Cor. 1. 12. With simplicity and sincerity of God, not with fleshly wisdom.

32. Of these four conditions of virtue, the first doth order and as it were constitute virtue: the second doth direct and free it from error: the third doth strengthen it against inconveniences: the fourth makes it pure, and defends it against all allurements which do seduce it.

33. All these virtues do seem to be prescribed, and explained together and almost by name. 2 Pet. 1. 4. & 6. Ad to Faith Virtue: that is Justice or an universal rectitude: to virtue knowledge, that is, Prudence directing aright all your ways: to Prudence continence, that is, that temperance whereby ye may contain yourselves from all allurements of pleasures, wherewith men use to be fleshed, and drawn away from the right way: to continence patience, that is fortitude, whereby ye may endure any hardship for righteousness sake. But that which follows there of piety & charity doth contain a distribution of virtue, to be propounded in his proper place.

34. Yet because every of those affections do more appear in some virtues than in other, therefore some special virtues do take both their name and definition from them: for because an accurate rectitude doth most appear in the number, measure, weight, and value of those things which are mutually received and given by man, therefore Justice, in a certain special manner is wont to be placed in things of such sort. And because those inconveniences are held most terrible, which are wont to happen in war and such like dangers, therefore the name of fortitude is wont to be restrained to such things. Because the pleasures of the senses are wont most to tickle, therefore temperance is for the most part placed in them only; although those three together with Prudence taken in a general sense, are tied and folded together among themselves, as that Philosopher did observe, who did first almost propound those four heads of virtues.

35. Whereas the form of virtue is placed by many in a certain mediocrity between two vices in the extreme, that can be defended by reason. 1. Because privation is not the form of an habit; but mediocrity, is nothing else then a privation of a defect and an excess. 2. Because the form of virtue is to be sought in that conformity which it hath to his rule: But this conformity doth neither only, nor chiefly, nor sometime at all consist in mediocrity. 3. Because virtue in its formal respect cannot be too much intended, & so doth not admit excess, but either in that material thing which it hath common with vices, or in the circumstances of operations, as when some of them are exercised when they ought not, or are not exercised when they ought.

36. That mean which is found in all virtues, is no other thing then a conformity to their rule, or measure: for by this they have certain measures and bounds in which their nature is as it were contained, so that they 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 may not decline to the right hand or to the left, but by this reason mediocrity is no more the form of virtues, then of all other things which are distinguished from other things by certain forms and differences.

37. But those virtues which consist in the middle between two vicious habits, are not therefore virtues because they consist in the middle, but because they do in that manner consist in the middle as their rule prescribes; in which manner, mediocrity whether of participation or negation, Rei vel rationis, of the thing, or of a respect, is to be considered rather as a subject matter, then as a perfecting form.

38. But it is manifest that such mediocrity hath no place in some virtues: for the love of God is not in that respect praised that it is not too much, but that it is most ardent, here the measure is without measure.

39. There is the like reason of all virtues in respect of their proper and specific nature. He that giveth when he ought not, is not too liberal: but he is too much in giving, so that in that respect he ceaseth to be liberal, and in the same act he may be as much defective in not doing that which he ought.

40. The wiseman indeed admonisheth, Eccles. 7. 16. That we be not just overmuch, but this is not at all to be understood of Justice in its nature (for it follows Verse 20. that there is none just upon Earth who doth good and sinned not) but as it is in opinion, whereby many do challenge too much to themselves, and would have it attributed to Justice: but in true virtues we ought always to endeavor to this, that we may more and more abound, as in the holy Scriptures we are often admonished.

41. There be no degrees in virtue of one and the same kind, if it be considered in it self in the extent. For there is no virtue which at least in disposition doth not extend it self to all those things which are contained in the compass of its object. He is not temperate which doth moderate himself in one •...st, and favors himself in others; but in respect of the subject some virtue is more strong in one then it is in another, either by reason of a more apt disposition by nature, or because of greater accustoming, or because of a more perfect judgment of reason, or finally because of a greater Gift of GOD.

42. That which is wont to be said, that virtues are increased by daily use and exercise, that must be so understood in solid virtues proceeding from sanctifying grace, that daily exercise is the disposing cause, and by virtue of the promise of God in some sort the procuring cause, not principally or properly effecting such an increase of virtue.

43. But virtues are lessened by the opposite vicious acts, and in respect of the disposition which they bring, and by reason of the merit that is in them.

44. By how much the acts of virtues, or contrary vices are more intent, more frequent and more continual, so much the more they prevail, either to the increasing or diminution of virtues.

45. Hence is that distinction of virtues into human and heroical; into virtues purging, purged and exemplary: and of those that are endued with virtue, into Infants, and men of ripe age. Heb. 5. 13, 14.

46. The communion of virtues is both in the connection and subordination of them among themselves.

47. For connection is that whereby all virtues which are simply necessary, do cleave together among themselves. 1. In respect of the beginning from whence they flow: For every good giving, and every perfect gift descends from the Father of lights; By the spirit of grace. James 1. 17. 1 Cor. 12. 2. In respect of the end and intention, which is to the same thing in general; for all virtues do so respect God, that if his authority be violated in one, it is withal virtually violated in all. James 2. 10. 3. In respect of that helping endeavor which they perform mutually one to another. For one virtue doth dispose to the act of another, and also doth defend and confirm the same with the act.

48. Yet virtues are not so essentially and intrinsically knit together, that everyone is of the essence of the other, or doth necessarily depend upon it as upon a procreating cause.

49. Subordination of virtues is that whereby the act of one virtue is ordered to the act and object of another, either as a means to an end which is the command of a superior upon an inferior virtue as Religion commands Justice temperance, and the like, when it refers their acts to the furthering the worship and glory of God; or as a cause to its effect, which belongs to every virtue in respect to everyone: for so Religion it self is ordained to bring forth and conserve Justice.

50. Whensoever the act of one virtue is ordered to the end of another virtue, this ordination although in respect of the direction it depends upon Prudence, yet in respect of the effectual force and authority, it depends upon a superior virtue.

CHAPTER III.

Of good Works.

1. AN action of virtue is an operation flowing from a disposition of virtue. Mat. 12. 35. A good man out of the good treasure of his heart bringeth forth good things.

2. In the same sense it is called an action or work that is good, right, laudable, and pleasing to God.

3. Unto such an action there is required first a good efficient or beginning, that is, a will well disposed, and working from true virtue; for good fruits do not grow but out of a good Tree. Mat. 12. 33. Secondly, a good matter or object, that is something commended by God. Mat. 15. 9. In vain they worship me, teaching doctrines which are the Commandments of men. Thirdly, a good end, that is the glory of God, and those things which tend unto his glory. 1 Cor. 10. 31. Do all to the glory of God.

4. But the end and the object are oftentimes all one, both in good and evil actions, especially in the intention and election of the will, where they end it self is the proper object. For those acts are either conversant in the end it self, as in the matter or object, as the acts of desiring, willing, wishing, loving, enjoying; or in those things which tend to the end as they are such, so as the goodness or deformity is properly derived from the end.

5. For although that good intention or intention of well-doing which is general and confused doth not make a particular action good, if other conditions be wanting: neither doth a special intention of good suffice for it, if the means be evil: as if any intending to bestow anything on the poor or upon pious uses should to that end take to himself other men's goods: yet an evil intention doth always make an action evil, and a good intention with other conditions doth make very much to the constitution of a good action.

6. But there is required to an action truly good, that at least virtually it be referred to God, as to the chief end.

7. In the fourth place also, there is required a form or a good manner, which is placed in the agreeing of the action to the revealed Will of God.

8. Moreover this will of God doth inform an action of man, as far forth as it is apprehended by reason. Hence the very conscience of man is the subordinate rule of moral actions: so as every action must agree with a right conscience, and an erring or doubtful conscience is first to be laid down before a man may do against it; although a lighter scruple or sticking of conscience must not any way put off any action otherwise approved.

9. But that this form or manner be good it requires all the circumstances to be good, for a singular action is always clothed with its circumstances, upon which the goodness or evilness of it doth not a little depend.

10. But those circumstances being referred to the act of the will, do pass into the nature of an object. For the will whiles it willeth some work, willeth all that which is in it, and so all the known circumstances either expressly or implicitly; and a known circumstance being changed, oftentimes the act of the will is changed.

11. But the same circumstances being referred to the act of any other faculty besides the will, are only adjuncts.

12. So the end it self is rightly reckoned among the circumstances, although not in respect of the will, yet in respect of the faculties and other Acts.

13. By reason of these circumstances it comes to pass, that although many Acts in the general or in their own nature are indifferent, yet there is no singular Act that is moral, and deliberate, but it is either good or evil.

14. An Act in its kind indifferent is, when the object of it includes nothing which pertains to the will of God, either commanding or forbidding, yet such acts being in exercise, severally considered, if they be properly human proceeding of deliberate reason, are either directed to a due end, and have conformity to the will of God, and so are good: or they are not rightly directed, but dissent from the will of God, and in that respect are evil.

15. Besides actions good, evil, and indifferent, some do observe that there are some acts that do Sonare in malum, have an evil sound, that is being absolutely considered they do impart a certain inordinatenesse, but by some circumstances coming to them they are sometimes made good, as to kill a man, & the like: but even those acts ought to be referred to indifferents; for they o•...lie seem to have some evil in themselves: as also to free a man from danger of death seemeth to have some good in it self, with which show also many that are not evil are deceived: but the true goodness, or pravity of these actions depends upon the object, and other circumstances: to slay the innocent or set at liberty the guilty is evil; to slay the guilty justly, or deliver the innocent upon just reason is good.

16. The goodness of all these causes and conditions is collectively required for an action absolutely good, but the defect of someone makes the action so far forth evil.

17. Hence our good works, whilst we live here, are imperfect and impure in themselves.

18. Hence they are not accepted before GOD, but in Christ.

19. Hence in the works of the regenerate there is not that respect of merit whereby any reward is obtained by Justice.

20. Yet that reward which is imputed not of debt, but of grace, Rom. 4. 4. is sometime assigned to those imperfect endeavors, Mat. 5. 12. Because although all our blessedness is the mere gift of God, Rom. 6. 23. Yet the fruits of grace abounding in us, are put upon those accounts whereby we do get the certainty of that gift. Phil. 4. 17. I require that fruit abounding which may be put on your accounts.

21. The action of virtue is either inward, or outward. 2 Cor. 10. 11. To will, to do, to perform.

22. The internal action is properly of the will it self.

23. The external action is of another faculty distinct from the will; whether it be of the understanding, or of the sensitive appetite which is commonly called internal, or of the executive power which is usually called external.

24. The internal action of the will hath goodness or evillnesse so intrinsical, that an act cannot remain the same in the nature of it, but it must be the same in manners; but an outward act may remain the same in nature, and yet become another in manners: namely of good may become evil, and of evil good: As if any one beginning to walk out of an honest purpose, do persist in his journey for an evil end.

25. There is one and the same goodness or evillnesse of an internal act, and an external commanded by it: for it is the same act in kind of manners; For to will to worship God, and from that will towards God, are not two acts of obedience, but two degrees of one and the same act, so that the goodness of the one is perfected in the other, 2 Cor. 8. 11. Performe to do that very thing: that as there was a readiness to will, so there may be a performance.

26. The outward act without the inward is not properly, good or evil: but the inward is good or evil, without the external; because the goodness of an action depends first and chiefly upon the will, which is often accepted with God, although the outward work it self be absent. 2 Cor. 8. 13. If there be first a ready mind, one is accepted according to that he hath.

27. But as virtue in its own nature tends to an act (for it is a disposition to do well, neither is it idle) so the internal act of it tends to an external, and produceth it, and in it is lead to its end. James 2. 22. Thou seest that Faith was the helper of his works, and by works Faith was brought to its end.

28. Yet the external act joined with the internal doth not properly and by it self increase the goodness, or evillnesse of it in respect of the intention only; but by accident it doth increase it, as it doth continue or increase the act of the will it self.

29. The goodness and evillnesse of any act, which depends upon the object and the circumstances of the act, is in respect of its nature in the external act, before it be in the internal, although in order of existence it is first in the internal. For to will to give everyone his own is therefore good, because this thing, to give everyone his own is good: yet the goodness doth exist in the act of willing before in the act of giving. So to will to steal is evil, because to steal is evil. The reason is, because the exterior act is the cause of the inward, in order of intention, and the inward act is the cause of the outward in order of execution.

30. But that goodness or evillnesse which depends upon the end, is first in the inward act, and after in the outward; because the very intention of the end is the inward act of the will; so-to-forsake the World for righteousness sake is good, because to will righteousness is good, and to give alms for vain glory is evil, because it is evil to will vain Glory.

31. Obedience that appears in outward actions, without the inward is hypocrisy, and so is not indeed obedience, but a certain shadow of it.

32. Yet inward obedience without outward, although it be incomplete; yet it is true: and if there be an effectual will present, so that opportunity, or ability of executing is only wanting, it is no less acceptable to God, then if it had an external act joined with it. 2 Cor. 8. 12.

33. Therefore we must not judge of actions good or evil by the event. For although it is equal, and God himself willeth, that he that is judge of offenses among men, do incline to the more favourable side, if the event it self do favor. Exod. 21. 21. and so forward: yet before the tribunal of God, the inward sin is as great caeteris paribus other things answerable, when neither event nor outward act follows, as if both should follow. Mat. 5. 28. Whosoever looks on a woman to lust after her, hath committed adultery already with her in his heart.

34. Yet inward obedience is not of itself sufficient because the whole man ought to subject himself to God: our bodies are to be offered to God, Rom. 12. 1. He is to be glorified in our bodies. 1 Cor. 6. 20. Neither is that true inward obedience which doth not incline to external.

35. The works which are called works of supererogation, whereby the Papists do boast that some of theirs do perform more excellent works than are commanded in the Law of God, by the observation of certain counsels which they feign do not command, but counsel only a singular perfection, are the dotings of idle men which know neither the Law nor the Gospel.

36. Unto the best works of the faithful there adhereth that imperfection which hath need of remission: yet the works themselves are not sins.

CHAPTER III.

Of Religion.

1. Observance is either Religion, or Justice.

2. This distribution as touching the thing itself is made by God in the division of the decalogue, as it is enfolded by Christ. Mat. 22. 37. Also the sense of the same distribution is expressed in other words, Rom. 1. 18. Where all disobedience of man is distributed into impiety and injustice, which could not stand unless all obedience also were conversant in Piety and Justice: which is also more plainly opened. Tit. 2. 12. Where of those three things propounded. Righteousness and Piety, do make the parts of new Obedience, and Temperance notes the manner or means of performing the same, namely denying worldly lusts.

3. Unto the same also that distribution of a Christian life tends, which is more frequently used, into holiness and righteousness. Luc. 1. 75. Eph. 2. 24. And the same is the meaning of that distribution which is of love towards God, and love towards our neighbor.

4. Yet we use the names of Religion & Justice, because Religion is a word most general, containing all those duties which are owing to God, and it is most emphatical, because it expresseth that proper and distinct way whereby they are due to God. Acts 26. 5. James 1. 26, 27. And often in the Epistle to the Hebrews.

5. Religion is Observance, whereby we perform those things which do directly pertain to the bringing of honor to God. Romans 1. 21. When they knew God, yet they glorified him not as God, neither were they thankful.

6. Therefore this name is not amiss by some said to be derived à Religando from binding again, because in this part of obedience we do directly and immediately tend unto God, that we may cleave, and as it were, be tied to him.

7. It hath the first place in observance, 1. Because obedience towards God must necessarily begin, from God himself, and from those affections, and acts whereby we are carried towards him. 2 Cor. 8. 5. They gave themselves first to the Lord, and then to us by the Will of God. 2. Because Righteousness towards men, must be performed by force and virtue of Religion, that it may be true obedience towards God, for it would not be obedience towards God, unless it did bring honor to God: neither could it bring honor to God, unless it should proceed from a religious affection. 1 Cor. 10. 31. Do all to the glory of God: whereunto that phrase also belongeth. In the Lord, in the Name of the Lord. Col. 3. 17. And as to the Lord, and not to men. There Verse 23. 3. Because Religion hath command over the acts of Justice, and is the cause of them not only virtually effecting, but also directing and ordering. James 1. 26. If any seem to be religious among you, not refraining his tongue, but deceiving his own heart, this man's religion is vain. 4. Because religion is in a certain manner the end of all the acts of Justice, as far forth as they dispose to the act of religion, as a certain greater thing.

8. Hence Justice it self is sometime called religion in the Scriptures. There Verse 27. But religious worship, pure, and without spot before God, and the Father is to visit the fatherless, &c. Not only because it is a sign which is not separated from true religion, but also because it ought to be exercised by the command of religion, and have its beginning from it.

9. Hence the offices of religion are the first and chiefest. Mat. 6. 33. & 22. 37. First seek the kingdom of God. The first and great Commandment.

10. They are the first in order, so that they ought to be taken care for in the first place, There.

11. Hitherto pertains that phrase, which everywhere we meet with in the Psalms, of seeking God early in the morning.

12. Also they are chief in dignity, and so chiefly to be cared for. Mat. 10. 37. He that loveth father or mother above me, is not worthy of me.

13. Hence the duties of religion ought to be performed with more intent and stirred up forces than the duties of Justice, for that rule pertains properly to them, not to these, to love with all the heart, all the soul, and all the thought. Mat. 22. 37.

14. Which yet must not be so understood, as if all the strength were not also required in performing and fulfilling the duties of the second table, but. 1. Because this is principally required in the duty of Religion. 2. Because it is not required in the other duty in respect of our neighbor, whom they do immediately respect; but... in respect of God, and by virtue of religion. 3. Because one may love his neighbor with too much intention as touching the very material act of loving, although this cannot be done under the respect of virtue and love, but we can no way love God with too much intention.

15. Hence, if some duties of piety and justice cannot be performed together, an equal and prudent comparison being used, the duties of piety are to be preferred. Mat. 12, 46, 47, 48.

Luke 2. 49. Behold my mother and my brethren, why did ye seek me? knew ye not that I must go about my fathers business?

16. But an equal comparison is, when a just proportion is observed of the greatest to the greatest, and of the lesser to the less.

17. But because God is more worshipped with the inward affection then with the outward work, but men do more need the outward work: therefore the outward work of religion may sometime be omitted, that a necessary work of Justice, and mercy may be fulfilled. Matthew 12. Verse. 1. 3, 4. 7. 10. 12. I will have mercy and not sacrifice, &c.

18. Neither yet is religion in the mean while by this means violated, because religion it self doth command to omit an external work, that a necessary may be performed.

19. The immediate object of religion unto which it is carried, is God: and that so adequate, that no duty of religion may be referred to any other object without greatest injury to God; hitherto pertains that title of God whereby he is said to be Zealots, Zelotypus, zealous or Jealous.

20. But that respect, under which religion doth consider God, is that Divine excellency, which shines forth in his sufficiency and efficiency; it is not someone attribute, but a perfection arising of all his attributes. Ex. 34. 6, 7, 8. Jehovah Jehovah the strong God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, & full of loving kindness and truth, &c. Therefore all the attributes of God have some power to beget religion in us, & so, in the Scriptures, the special respect of it is referred, sometime to mercy, Psal. 130. 4. with thee is pardoning, that thou mayest be reverently worshipped: sometime to Justice. Deut. 4. 24. Heb. 12. 29. Let us have grace, by which we may so serve God, that we may be accepted of him with reverence and fear. For our God is a consuming fire. And so also to all the other attributes.

21. Hence religion doth immediately flow from that Faith wherewith we believe in God, as in the sufficient, and efficient cause of life.

22. So is that to be understood which is wont to be said, that religion respects God as the first beginning and supreme Lord of life. And so that distinction of the Papists is too empty whereby they confess, that those acts of religion which respect God as the first beginning of life, are to be performed only to God, but they contend that other acts of religion may be communicated to the Creatures also, when there is no act of religion which doth not belong to God, as the first beginning of life.

23. The proper act of religions to bring honor to God, and it is called worship. Exod. 12. 25, 26. and adoration, John 22. 23. For it must contain in a certain manner good unto God, otherwise it should not be obedience towards him, but there can be no intrinsical good added to God, but an outward good, which is honor, that is, a testification of the virtue of another to further his glory or estimation, and this is all that which the Creature can perform unto God.

24. Therefore an agreeable or worthy estimation of God, and other acts whereby an estimation is manifested, do make as it were, the next matter of religion. And every human honest act, as far forth as it may be referred to the honor and glory of God, may be the matter, or matteriall object of religion. Also one and the same act which in respect of subjection to the precept is called obedience, in respect of the honor which it brings to God, is called religion and worship.

25. The proper manner of honor, or religious worship is to subject the soul it self, and the inward affections and acts of the will to another.

26. For in respect of the soul and inward acts of it, man is not subject directly and Per se to any Creature, although as the soul is knit to the body, and the inward acts to the outward, his, as it were necessary, condition doth command that subjection which is due to the Creature as a superior.

27. This honor is due to God, not only according to the agreement of the thing, in which sense we say, those things are due which we give of liberality; but also according to the right of the person to whom it is given, and that by so strict a right, that in respect of the debt it exceeds all Justice, although in respect of equality it is much exceeded by Justice.

28. Therefore all worship which either by its nature or condition, or by Law, and common custom, or by the mind and institution of him that gives it doth give religions honor to another beside the true God, it doth so far forth at least fain to it self a new and a false GOD.

29. He that doth not give this religious worship to God is profane, he that gives it to another besides to the true God is an idolater, Acts 10. Revel. 19. 10. & 22. 8.

30. But because greatest care ought to be had in Divine worship therefore among the Latins the word religion is sometime metaphorically used to set forth any anxious care, even in things that were not sacred. By which appears that the Heathens themselves by the light of nature did see, that the care of Religion is to be preferred before all other things.

31. Also because the fear of conscience pertains to the worship of religion, therefore also every scruple of conscience is wont to be called religion, whence also we may gather, that nature it self doth dictate that the conscience of a man doth first and most properly respect religion.

32. The general state of the Church, as it doth pefesse a right manner of worshipping God, is rightly wont to be called the Christian Religion, because such a relation of a state or profession, ariseih from virtue and the act of Religion.

33. Those things which by a special institution are destined to religious uses as the instruments of religion, are also by reason of their state or fixed relation which they have, called religious.

34. That peculiar manner of living which the Monks have chosen to themselves to exercise a certain feigned perfection, without any reason, and not without wrong to other Christians, is wont to be called religion by the Papists, and such Monks religious persons.

35. He that is not religious, is not a Christian.

36. The true religion is only one.

CHAPTER V.

Of Faith.

1. THE parts of religion are two; natural worship, and voluntary or instituted worship.
2. This distinction is grounded on Exod. 20. 6. Those words of the second Commandment: who love me, and keep my Commandments.
3. Natural worship is that which depends upon the nature of God: so that although we had no Law revealed, and prescribed by God, yet if we did rightly perceive and know the Nature of God, by a meet contemplation of it, we might, the grace of God helping us, perceive all those things which in this behalf pertains unto our duty.
4. For there is nobody who understands the Nature of God rightly, but withal he doth also necessarily acknowledge, That GOD is to be believed and hoped in, that God is to be loved, called upon, and to be heard in all things.
5. Hence this natural worship is simply necessary to salvation. Psal. 79. 6. Ierem. 10. 52. 2 Thess. 1. 8. Pour out thy wrath upon those Nations that know thee not, and upon the Kingdoms that call not upon thy name. For although we obtain eternal life neither by merit, nor by any virtue of our obedience; yet this part of obedience hath such an essential connexion with that Faith whereby we rest upon Christ to life eternal, that in exercise it cannot be separated from it.
6. Hence also this worship hath been, is, and shall be one and the same, or immutable. 1 John 2. Verse 7. The old Commandment which ye had from the beginning.
7. Natural worship is commanded in the first precept, not only as it is internal, but also as it is external.
8. For. 1. All obedience is the same inwardly and outwardly: therefore the same inward and outward worship is contained in the same precept. 2. In those precepts which pertain to the second table, inward and outward obedience is together commanded in everyone, Christ himself being interpreter. Mat. 5. Much more therefore in the precepts of the first table, and in the first and chief of them. 3. If that distinction were lawful, that the first precept would command only inward worship, and the second only outward, then the first Commandment should bind the inward man, and the second only the outward man and the body, which is contrary to all reason.
9. Natural worship tends unto God, either as our good, or as good in himself.
10. The worship which tends unto God, as unto our good, doth either respect him as he is in present ours, as Faith: or as hereafter he is to be ours, as hope.

11. Faith is a virtue whereby we cleaving to the faithfulness of God, do lean upon him, that we may obtain that which he propounds to us. He that receiveth his testimony hath sealed that God is true. John 1. 12. As many as received him, who believe in his Name.

12. These five things concur to make a Divine Faith. 1. A knowledge of the thing testified by God. 2. A pious affection towards God, which causeth that his testimony doth most prevail with us. 3. An assent which is given to the thing testified, because of this affection towards God who is the witness of it. 4. A resting upon God for the obtaining that which is propounded. 5. An election or apprehension of the thing it self, which is exhibited to us in the testimony.

13. The first of these is in the understanding: but it doth not make Faith, because it is common to us with unbelievers, heretics, apostates, and the devils themselves.

14. The second, fourth and fifth are in the will, and do make Faith as it is a virtue, and act of religion.

15. The third as in the understanding, but as it is moved by the will; neither is it properly the virtue of Faith, but an effect.

16. But the perfection of Faith is not but in election or apprehension, and so is to be defined by it.

17. Hence the nature of Faith is excellently opened in Scripture, when the faithful are said to cleave to God. Joshua 23. 6. Acts 11. 23. 1 Corinthians 6. 17. And to choose the way of truth, and to cleave to the testimony of God, Psal. 1•...9. 30, 31.

18. For by Faith we first cleave to God, and then afterward consequently we cleave to those things which are propounded to us by God: so that God himself is the first Object of Faith, and that which is propounded by God the secondary Object.

19. But because Faith as it joins us to God is our life; but as it is a virtue and our duty towards God; it is a act of life, therefore in the former part... we have defined it only by that respect which it hath to obtain life and salvation; but here we have defined it by that... general respect which it hath to all that which God propounds to us to believe. Hence Faith cannot exercise all its act about the threatenings of God considered in themselves, because they do not propound the good to be received by us: nor about the precepts of God simply considered, because they declare the good to be done, not to be received; nor about mere predications, because under that respect they propound no good to us. But it is perfect in the promises, because in them there is propounded good to be embraced: whence also it is, that our Divines are wont to place the object of Faith chiefly in the promises.

20. They who place Faith in the understanding: do confess that there is some necessary motion of the will to the yielding of that assent: even as in human Faith it is said to be a voluntary thing to give credit to one. But if Faith depend upon the will, it must needs be that the first beginning of Faith is in the will.

21. The Objectum quod, or material object of this Faith is whatsoever is revealed and propounded by God to be believed, whether it be done by spirit or by word; publicly or privately, Acts 24. 14. I believe all things that are written in the Law and the Prophets. John 3. 33. He that receiveth his testimony.

22. Hence the propounding of the Church is not absolutely necessary; no not in respect of us, to make an object of Faith, for then Abraham, and other Prophets had not given assent to those things which were revealed to them from God, without any help of the Church coming between, which is both against the Scriptures and all sound reason, and yet is necessarily admitted and defended by the most learned of the Papists, that they may defend the feigned authority of their false Church from such arguments.

23. This object is always immediately some axiom or sentence under the respect of truth: but that in which Faith is principally bounded, of which, and for which assent is yielded to that axiom by Faith is, Ens incomplexum under the respect of some good. Rom. 4. 21. Being fully persuaded, that he who had promised was able also to do it. Heb. 11. 13. Not having received the promises, but seeing them a far off, after they had been persuaded of them, and had embraced them.

24. For the act of the believer is not bounded in the Axiom, or sentence, but in the thing, as the most famous School-men confess. The reason is; because we do not frame axioms, but that by them we may have knowledge of things. Therefore the principal bound unto which the act of the believer tends, is the thing it self, which is chiefly respected in the Axiom.

25. The Objectum Quo, or formal object of Faith is the Truenes or faithfulness of God. Heb. 11. 11. Because he judged him faithful who had promised. For the formal, and as they say, the specificative reason of Faith is truth in speaking, that is, the Truenes, or faithfulness of God revealing something certainly, because it is a common respect of Faith that it leaves upon the authority of him that witnesseth, (in which thing Faith is distinguished from opinion, science, experience, and sight or sense) but the authority of God is his Truenes or faithfulness. Tit. 1. 2. God that cannot lie had promised. Hence that proposition is most true, whatsoever we are bound to believe (with a Divine Faith) is true. For because nothing ought so to be believed, unless God do witness the truth there of: but God testifieth as he is true, but Truenes in a witness that knoweth all things, cannot be separated from the truth of the testimony; therefore it must needs be, that all that which we are bound to believe with a Divine Faith is true. This whole demonstration is manifestly confirmed and used by the Apostle Paul. 1 Cor. 15. 14, 15. If Christ be not raised, our preaching is vain: your Faith also is vain; we are also found false witnesses of God: because we have witnessed of God, that he raised up Christ. That is, If the testimony be not true, the witness is false. Unless this be admitted, that whatsoever God witnesseth is true, that consequence which is most firm, should avail nothing at all, God doth witness this or that, therefore it is true. Hence Divine Faith cannot be a principle or cause; either directly or indirectly, either by it self or by accident, of assenting to that which is false, or of a false assent.

26. Hence also the certainty of Faith in respect of the object is most firm, and by how much more it is confirmed in the heart of him that believeth, so much the more glory it giveth to God. Rom. 4. 20. But he doubted not at this promise of God through unbelief: but he was strengthened in Faith, giving glory to God, and being fully persuaded that he that had promised, was able also to do it. But in that sometime our Faith doth waver in us, that is not from the nature of Faith, but from •...ur imperfe•...ion.

27. A sufficient and certain representation of both objects, that is, both of those things which are to be believed, and of that respect under which they are to be bel•...eved, is propounded to us in the Scripture. Rom. 16. 26. It is made manifest, a•...d by the Scriptures of the Prophets according to the Commandment of the everlasting God, m•...de known to all Nations for the obedience of Faith: 2 Tim. 5. 15. The holy Scripture can make thee wise to salvation; by Faith which is in Christ Jesus.

28. For all•...hough in the subject, that is in our hearts, the ligh•... and testimony of the holy Spirit stirring up Faith in us is necessary; yet in the object, which is to be r•...ceived by F•...h there is nothing at all required, either in respect of the things to be believed, or in respect of the cause and way of believing, which is not found in the Scripture.

29. Therefore Divine Faith cannot be reduced or resolved into the authority of the Church, or into other simple external arguments which are wont to be called Motives by persuading and inducing things preparing to Faith; but it is to be resolved into the Scripture it self, and that authority which it hath imprinted upon it from the author God, as into the first and proper cause which causeth the thing to be believed; and into the operation of the holy Spirit, as into the proper cause of the act it self believing.

30. Hence, that principle from which Faith doth first begin, and into which it is last, resolved, is, that the Scripture is revealed from God for our salvation, as a sufficient rule of Faith and manners. 2 Pet. 1. 19. 20. If you first know this, that no prophecy of the Scripture is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, of a private interpretation.

31. Faith is partly Implicite, and partly Explicite.

32. Implicite Faith is that whereby the truths of Faith are believed, not distinctly in themselves, but in their common principle.

33. That common principle wherein all things to be in this manner believed are contained, is not the Chu•...ch, but the Scripture. Act. 24. 14. Who do believe all things which are written in the Law and in the Prophets.

34. He that believeth that the Scripture is every way true, he doth implicitly believe all things which are contained in the Scriptures, Psal. 129. 86. compared with Verse. 28. 33. All thy precepts are truth it self; open mine eyes, that I may see the wonders of thy Law. •...each me the way of thy statuts, which I will keep unto the end. David did believe that those were wonderful, and to be holily kept, which he did not yet sufficiently understand.

35. This implicit Faith is good and necessary, but it is not of it self sufficient to salvation; neither indeed hath it in it self, the true reason of faith, if it subsist by it self: for it cannot be that the will be effectually affected, and embrace that as good, which it doth not at all distinctly know. Rom. 20. 14. How shall they believe him of whom they have not heard?

36. Explicite Faith is that whereby the truths of Faith are believed in particular, and not in common only.

37. Explicite Faith must necessarily be had of those things which are propounded to our Faith as necessary means of salvation. Heb. 6. 1. 2. Cor. 4. 3. The foundation of repentance from dead works and of Faith in God. If our Gospel be hid, it is bid to them that perish.

38. There is required a more explicit Faith now after the coming of Christ, then before, 2 Cor. 3. 18. Of those who are set over others in the Church then of the common people, Heb. 9. 12. Lastly, of those who have occasion to be more perfectly instructed, then of others: Luc. 12.

48. To whom much is given, of him much shall be required.

39. The outward act of Faith is confession, profession, or manifestation of it, which in its order, and in its place is necessary to salvation, Rom. 10. 9. 10. Namely in respect of the preparation and disposition of mind always necessary. 2 Peter 3. 15. And in respect of the act it self, when the glory of God and edification of our neighbors shall require it.

40. Persisting in confession of the Faith with loss of temporal life, doth give testimony to the truth and doth bring most honor to God, and so by excellency is called Martyrdom, and they who do so are called witnesses, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 Martyrs. Revel. 2. 13. But this is as necessary in its place as confession of Faith, so that it cannot be refused without denying of Christ. Mat. 10. 33. 39. & 16. 25.

41. There are opposed to Faith. Infidelity, Doubting, Error, Heresy, Apostasy.

42. Infidelity is a dissenting of a man from the Faith, who never professed the true Faith. 1 Cor. 14. 22. 23.

43. Doubting in him who made profession, doth either diminish or take away assent.

44. Doubting that doth diminish only assent may stand with a weak Faith. 1 Cor. 8. 10. 11. But not that doubting which takes away assent. James 1. 6, 7, 8.

45. An error in Faith doth put some opinion contrary to Faith. 1 Cor. 15.

46. Heresy addeth stubbornness to error. Ti... 3. 10, 11.

47. Apostasy adds unto heresy universality of errors contrary to Faith, 1 Tim. 1. 19. 20. 2 Tim. 1. 15.

48. These are opposed to Faith not only as they take away that assent of the understanding which is necessary to Faith, but also as they bring and include a privation of that election and apprehension of Faith, which is in the will.

CHAPTER VI.

Of Hope.

1. HOPE is a virtue, whereby we are inclined to expect those things which God hath promised us. Rom. 8. 25.
2. This Hope respecteth God. 1. As the object which it doth expect, for the principal object of Hope is God himself, and those acts whereby he is joined to us, 1 Peter 1. 13. Hope in the grace which is brought to you. Hence God himself is called the Hope of Israel. Ier. 1. 4. 8. And Rom. 15. 13. The God of Hope: not so much because he is the Author and Giver of hope, as because it is he, upon whom we hope. 2. It respects God as the Author and Giver of all the good it doth expect. Psal. 37. 5. 6. Roll thy way upon the Lord, and trust in him, for he shall bring it to pass: For as, it tends unto God to attain good, so also it respects him as to be obtained by his own Grace. Jeremiah 17. 7. Blessed is the man who trusts in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is.
3. But the proper reason why we may not trust upon the Creatures, in that manner as we trust in God, is because the formal object of Hope is not found in the Creatures. Psal. 146. 3. Trust not in Princes, nor in any son of man, in whom there is no salvation. For although some power of doing us good and helping us, is placed by God in the Creatures, yet the exercise of this virtue doth always depend upon God. Psal. 107. Sending his word he healed them. And Psal. 137. 1. Unless the Lord build the house, in vain they labor that build it, unless the Lord keep the City, the watchmen watcheth in vain.
4. Therefore when one saith, I hope this or that of such a man, doth either signify that he hopes for that from God by that Creature, or it sets forth a human hope, not Divine, or finally it is not Christian.
5. But as Faith, so also Hope in God doth respect the grace of God, and Christ only as causes of good to be communed. 1 Pet. 1. 13. Col. 1. 27. Hope in the grace. Christ the hope of glory.
6. Yet Divine Hope doth not only respect God and eternal blessedness, but in God, and from God it respects all those things which faith apprehends in the promises of God, although in their own nature they be temporal things. Heb. 11. 1. 2 Cor. 1. 10. Although it doth chiefly respect eternal life: whence also it is, that Hope in Scripture is often by a metonymy of the adjunct, put for salvation it self or life eternal hoped for. Gal. 5. 5. Rom. 8. 24. Tit. 2. 13. And salvation also is sometime put for Hope of salvation, by a metonymy of the subject. Epb. 6. 17. Compared with 1. Thess. 5. 8. The helmet of Salvation, for the helmer of the Hope of salvation. Also usually this object is put as proper to Hope. 1 Thess. 5. 8. Tit. 3. 7. The hope of eternal life. Rom. 5. 2. The hope of glory.
7. Those conditions which are wont to be required to the object of Hope, as that it be good, to come, difficult, probable, •...re all sound in the promises of GOD, who promiseth always the greatest good things which cannot be had without his help, but by virtue of the promise will come to pass, not only probably, but certainly.

8. The act wherewith it is conversant about its object is called expectation, because it is not of uncertain or probable conjecture only, as human Hope, but of most certain expectation. Rom. 3. 25. Phil. 1. 20. If we hope for what we see not, we do with patience expect it. According to my earnest expectation and hope, and everywhere in the Old Testament, where the word Mikueh which is wont to be turned, Hope, doth properly signify expectation.

9. This certainty is derived to Hope from Faith: for Faith is the foundation of Hope; neither is anything hoped for, which is not before believed by Faith. Galatians 5. 5. For, we through the spirit, wait for the Hope of righteousness by Faith.

10. For seeing Faith apprehends that which is promised, and Hope expects that which is promised; the whole difference between Faith and Hope, is the respect of that which is present, and that which is to come.

11. Therefore that distinction of the Papists is empty and vain, who granting that the faithful may be certain of their salvation with certainty of hope, yet do deny, that they can ever by ordinary means be made certain of it with certainty of Faith, when there is one and the same certainty altogether of Faith and Hope: for which reason also it is, that Hope in Scripture, especially in the Old Testament, is often put for Faith.

12. Therefore that expectation of good things to come which is in the Angels, and the spirits of just men in Heaven, doth not in that differ from our hope, because one is certain, and the other incertain: but in these. 1. That our hope is grounded upon Faith, which beholds God in the promises, as through a glass, and darkly, 1 Cor. 13. 12. But their expectation is grounded upon open sight. 2. In that our hope is with labor and contention, but their expectation is without all difficulty. 3. In that our hope is an imperfect expectation, and their expectation is perfect.

13. Therefore although Hope together with Faith is wont to be said to be abolished in the life to come: yet this is not so to be understood, as if they ceased to be in respect of their essence, but only in respect of the measure and degree of imperfection. 1 Cor. 13. 10. So that the imperfection only is properly to be abolished: but Faith and hope it self are to be perfected in respect of their essence.

14. Hence Christian confidence as it respects good to come, is nothing else then Hope confirmed. For it must necessarily be referred to someone of those theological virtues which are reckoned up by the Apostle. 1 Cor. 13. 13. That is, either to Faith, or to Charity, or to Hope. But it can neither be referred to Faith, because Faith apprehends a thing as now present, which it maketh also to subsist. Heb. 11. 1. Nor to Charity, because Charity doth not respect good that is ours. 1 Cor. 13. 5. Therefore to Hope.

15. Hence the natural fruit of Hope is Joy, and delight in God, Heb. 3. 6. The hope whereof we rejoice. 1 Pet. 1. 3. 6. A lively hope, wherein ye rejoice. Because it doth respect the greatest good things not only as possible and probable; but also as certainly to come, and so doth make the possession of them in a certain manner to subsist, whilst it doth assure us of that which at length shall in very deed subsist. Ro. 8. 24. We are saveth by Hope.

16. The manner of this act depends upon that respect of the object, whereby it is said to be, to come, and promised. So that in its formal reason, it is not of those things which are seen. Romans 8. 24. Hope if it be seen, is not Hope; for why doth a man hope for that which he seeth?

17. Hence the fruit and companion of Hope is patience towards God, whereby we do constantly cleave to him in seeking and expecting blessedness, although we do in this present life conflict with divers evils, even without that consolation we do desire, Isaiah. 8. 17. Waiting upon the Lord who hath hid his Face and looking for him. Rom. 8. 25. But if we hope for that we do not see, we do with patience expect it. 2 Thess. 3. 5. That patient expectation.

18. A fruit of this patience is silence, whereby we rest in the will of God, and do repress all those carnal things whereby we are stirred up to make hast, or to resist him. Psal. 37. 7. Be silent to Jehovah, and without ceasing wait on him.

19. Hope is strengthened and increased, by all those arguments, whereby we are assured that the good hoped for pertains to us. Rom. 5. 4. Experience causeth Hope.

20. Among these arguments the inward signs of Divine grace have the first place. 1 John 3. 14. 19. We know that we are translated from death to life, because we love the brethren.

21. Therefore although it is most false which the Papists say, that our hope is grounded partly upon the grace of God, & partly our own merits, it may be more truly affirmed, that hope is strengthened, increased and stirred up, by Faith, repentance, works and a good conscience. So that true and lively hope doth exist by those as it were antecedent arguments. Heb. 10. 22. 23. 1 Pet. 3. 23.

22. The effect of hope is the confirmation of the soul as an anchor, safe, and firm. Heb. 6. 19. Whereby we possess our very souls. Luc. 21. 19.

23. There follows always from this confirmation of mind a study of holiness. 1 John. 3. 3. Whosoever hath this hope in him, keepeth himself pure, even as he is pure.

24. There is opposed to hope by way of defect. 1. A fear of the evil of punishment, Psal. 27. 3. For as Hope is the expectation of good, so this fear is an expectation of evil.

25. But this fear, if it be moderate and tempered by Faith, although it be always materially opposed to Hope yet in man that is a sinner, it is not so formally opposed to Hope and virtue, that it is simply a vice, but rather puts on the consideration and nature of a virtue, 2 Chron. 34. 27. Because thy heart was tender, and thou didst cast down thyself before the Face of God, when thou heardest his words against this place, &c. The reason is because the opposition is not, Secundum idem, & ad idem, according to the same, and unto the same; for hope respects the grace of God, and fear respects the deserts of our sins.

26. Also desperation is more directly opposed to hope, in the defect, which is a mere privation of hope joined with a sense of that privation, and apprehension of the thing hoped for, as of a thing impossible, or at least as to come, such as was in •...ne. Gen. 5. 13, 14. And in Iud•... Mat. 27. 4. 5.

27. This desperation is always a grievous sin: because it is not a privation of that hope which men are wont to have in themselves or other Creatures, which is wont to be a laudable introduction to Divine hope, but it is a privation of Divine hope, having its beginning always from unbelief, as hope hath its beginning from Faith.

28. Yet desperation in the Devills and damned, hath not the consideration of a sin, but of a punishment. For desperation may either be taken privatively when one doth not hope that which he ought to hope, and when he ought, or negatively for a mere cessation of hope. In the former sense it is always a fin because it is contrary to the Law, but in the latter sense not so.

29. The reason of despairing may be divers, either because the grace of God is not accounted sufficient to communicate that good to us, or because God will not communicate it. As desperation is grounded on the former reason, it is always a sin, but in the latter sense it is not a sin, if so be any be certain of that will of God.

30. But because it is seldom or never manifest to any one by ordinary means before the end of this life, that God will not make him partaker of grace and glory: Therefore there is no desperation of men in this life which is not a sin.

31. By way of excess presumption is opposed to hope, whereby we do expect some good rashly. Deut. 29. 19. Jer. 7. 4. 8, 9, 10. Let there not be any man, when he hath heard, &c.

32. This rash presumption doth in expectation of good sometime lean upon the Creatures. Ierem. 17. 5. 1: Tim. 6. 17. Sometime also it doth lean on God in some sort, but perversely without a promise, and Faith, as when any looks for pardon and salvation, although he remain impenitent, or retain a purpose of living in his sins, or expect some other thing of God which doth noth agree to his nature or revealed will.

33. But one doth not therefore sin in this presumption, because he hopes too much upon God, namely with a true and religious hope, for this can in no wise be done but because he hopes too lightly and rashly without any ground, or hopes those things also which are not to be hoped.

34. Also shame of face, or confusion is opposed to hope, in respect of the event. Ps. 25. 2, 3.

CHAPTER VII.

Of Charity.

1. CHarity is a virtue whereby we love God as the chief good. Psal. 106. 1. And 118. 1. & 136. 1. Praise the Lord, because he is good, for his mercy endures forever. The joy of praising which is an effect of Charity hath the same primary object with Charity its proper cause. Therefore the goodness of God which doth specially shine forth in the effects of kindness, is the proper object of Charity (as it is of praising.)

2. It follows Faith and Hope in order of nature, as the effect follows its causes: for we therefore love God out of Charity, because by Faith and hope we taste in some measure how good God is, and his love shed abroad in our hearts. 1 John 4. 16. 19. We have known and believed the love which God hath towards us, we love him because he loved us first.

3. Therefore not love, but Faith is the first foundation of the spiritual building in man: not only because then the building begins, but also because it sustains, and contains all the parts of it as also it hath the nature of a root, as it doth confer power to fructify.

4. A confuse and remote inclination towards God goeth before Faith (a certain shadow▪ whereof is found in a certain manner in all Creatures) Acts 17. 27- That they might seek the Lord, if happily they might find him by seeking him, but it is rather an ineffectual Velleitas wounding (as they call it) to love God, then a true love.

5. That distinction of the Scholemen, between the natural and supernatural love of God, that is, whereby they make one love of God, as it is the beginning and end of nature, and another as it is the beginning and end of grace, is an idle figment. Neither indeed can a man since the fall, by the strength of nature without Faith, love GOD above all, no not with that love which they call natural.

6. The love of Charity is of Union, well-pleasednesse, and good will: for those are as it were the parts of Charity, and they are always contained in it, if it be true, namely desire of Union, well-pleasednesse of enjoying, and affection of good will.

7. Love of Union is that affection, whereby we would be joined together with GOD. 2 Corinthians 5-8. It is our desire to be absent from the body, and to be present with the Lord.

8. There is also love of Union, in GOD towards us. Eph. 2. 4. 13. He loved us with much love. You who were far off, are made near. But his love is out of the abundance of goodness, because he expects no profit out of us: for we are unprofitable servants to GOD. Luc. 17. 10. John. 22. 2. 23. But our love towards him is out of the want of goodness, because we stand in need of God. 2. Cor. 5. 4. We groan being burdened—that mortality may be swallowed up of life.

9. Therefore our love as it is love of Union with God, is in part, that love which is called love of concupiscence or desire: because we do properly desire God to ourselves, because we hope to have profit from him and our eternal blessedness.

10. Yet the highest end of this love ought to be God himself.

11. Love of well-pleasednesse is that affection, whereby we do approve of all that that is in God, and rest in his most excellent goodness. Rev. 7: 12. Blessing and glory, and wisdom, and thanksgiving, and honor and power, and strength unto our God forever, and ever, Amen.

12. God also hath love of well-pleasednesse towards us, Heb. 13. 16. But his well-pleasednesse is in those good things which are communicated by him to us: but our well-pleasednesse is in that goodness, and Divine perfection which in no sort depends upon us.

13. Love of good will, is that affection whereby we yield ourselves wholly to God, and we will, and endeavor that all things be given to him which pertain to his glory. Revel. 4. 10, 11. They fell down and cast their crowns before the throne, saying, Thou art worthy, O Lord, to receive glory, and honor, and power. 1 Cor. 10. 31. Do all to the glory of God.

14. God in bearing us good will, doth make us good, by conferring that good which he willeth: but we cannot properly bestow any good upon him, but only acknowledge with the heart, publish by words, and declare in some measure by deeds that goodness which he hath.

15. That mutual Charity which is between God▪ and the faithful, hath in it self some respect of friendship. John 15. 15. I have called you friends, because I have made known all things which I have heard from my Father.

16. In this friendship although there is not found that equality which is among men that are friends, yet that equality which is possible doth appear in a certain inward communion which is exercised between God, and the faithful: in which respect God is said to reveal his secrets to the faithful. Psalms 25, 14. John 15.

15. And to be as it were familiarly conversant with them. Revel. 3. 26. If any shall hear my voice and shall open the door, I will go in to him, and sup with him, and he with me. John 14. 23. If any love me, he will keep my Word; And my Father will love him; and we will come to him, and dwell with him.

17. Charity doth implicitly contain in it the keeping and fulfilling of all the Commandments of God▪ Rom. 13. 10. 1 John 2▪ 5. and 3. 18. For he cannot truly love God who doth not study to please him in all things, and to be like him. 1 John 4. 17. Herein is our Charity made perfect—that as he is, such also are we.

18. The manner of our Charity towards God is that it be carried to him, as to that which is simply the highest good and end; so that neither God, nor the love of God is principally and lastly to be referred to anything else: because such love should be mercenary. John 6. 26. Ye seek me, because ye ate of the loaves and were filled.

19. Yet we may love God as our reward. Genesis▪ 15. 2. And with respect, of other good things, as of a reward. Gen. 17. 2.

20. The degree of Charity towards God ought to be the highest, first in respect of the object, or as they say objectively, that is, willing a greater good to him than to any. 2. In regard of esteem, or as some speak, appretiatively, that is, preferring him and his will before all other things, even our own life. Matt. 10. 37. Luc. 14. 26. So that we rather choose to die than to transgress even the least of his Commandments. 3. Intensively, that is, in respect of the vehement endeavor, in the application of all the faculties to the loving of God. Deut. 6. 5. Thou shalt love the Lord thy God, with all thy heart, and with all thy mind, and with all thy strength.

21. According to this description of Charity it is rightly said of some Divines, that God is only to be loved: that is, simply, by it self and according to all the parts of Charity (namely with affection of good will, desire of Union, and well-pleasnesse of enjoying in the highest degree) although our neighbor also is to be beloved in a certain respect, for another thing, in part and in a lower degree.

22. To this Charity is opposed that fear which hath torment, by the presence of God and fear of punishment to be inflicted by him, 1 John 4. 18. Perfect love casteth out fear: because fear hath torment.

23. Hence Charity being perfected casteth out fear. Ibid. Because that fear is an horror arising from the apprehension of evil, by reason of the presence of God: and so is opposed to Charity, which is carried unto God, as unto that which is absolutely good.

24. Secondly, there is opposed to it an enstranging from God, which is called by some hatred of abomination. Psalms 14. 3. John 3. 20. They are all gone out of the way. He hates the light, for as Charity consists in affection of union, so this enstranging is in disjunction. But that hatred of God is most contrary to the love of God, which is called hatred of enmity. John 13. 23, 24, 25. They have hated both me and my Father. For as the love of Charity is in good will: so this enmity against God, is in that that ungodly men do desire and will ill to him if it might be, that he were not, or at least that he were not such an one as he is.

25. For although if God be apprehended so as he is in himself, he cannot be the object of hatred; yet as he is apprehended as one that taketh vengeance on sinners, so far forth he is often hated of the same sinners: because in that respect he is most contrary to them, John. 3. 20. Whosoever evil doth, hateth the light, neither cometh to the light, least his deeds be reprov'd. For as the love of God is in the godly the cause that they hate impiety contrary to God; so the love of iniquity in the ungodly causeth that they hate God as contrary to their iniquity.

26. But the degrees by which men ascend to this height of ungodliness are these. 1. Sinners love themselves inordinately. 2. They will that which pleaseth themselves, although it be contrary to the Law of God. 3. They hate the Law: because it is contrary to this desire. 4. They hate God himself who is the giver and author of such a Law.

27. The love of this world also is opposed to the Charity towards God. 1 John 2. 15. Because this world agreeth not with God & his will. There Verse 16. If any love the world, the love of the Father is not in him. Because whatsoever is in the world is not of the Father.

28. For as the perfection of Charity is in this that the mind doth rest in God, so it must needs be against Charity that the mind doth rest in that which is contrary to God.

29. Charity is no more the form of other virtues, then any virtue commanding or ordering the acts of another is the form of it: but because those acts which in their nature do not respect God are referred to him by Charity, and in him such acts are perfected, therefore by a metaphor it is not amiss called the form of those acts, and of the virtues also from which they come.

30. But Charity cannot be the intrinsic call form of Faith: because in its nature it follows Faith as an effect follows the cause, it doth not go before as a cause doth the effect.

31. Neither is faith extrinsically directed toward God by love; but in its proper and internal nature it respects God as its object.

32. Justification of Faith doth in no sort depend upon Charity (as the Papists will have it) but upon the proper object of Faith.

33. Where Faith is said to work by love. Gal. 5. 6. It is not because all efficacy of Faith depends upon charity as upon a cause: but because Faith doth show forth and exercise its efficacy in the stirring up of Charity.

34. The particle, by, doth not there show a formal cause: but as it were an instrumental: as when God is said to regenerate us by the word.

35. That Faith which is without works is said to be Dead. James 2. 26. Not because the life of Faith doth flow from works: but because works are second Acts, 〈◇〉 flowing from the life of Faith.

36. Faith is said to be perfected by works. James 2. 22. Not with an essential perfection, as the effect is perfected by the cause: but by a complemental perfection, as the cause is perfected, or made actually complete, in the producing of the effect.

37. Because the object of Charity is the very goodness of God, as it is in it self, but Faith and Hope do respect God as he is propounded to us to be apprehended: therefore that inclination of the mind toward God which belongs to Charity, doth more evidently and constantly appear in weak believers, then the special acts of Faith or Hope: because the goodness of God is more manifest in it self, then the way of apprehending it; which is represented to us in this life, as it were darkly.

CHAPTER VIII.

Of hearing of the Word.

1. From these virtues of Religiō towards God, Faith, Hope, and Charity, there ariseth a double act of Religion which respects that spiritual communion which is exercised between God and us: Hearing of the word, and Prayer.

2. The reason or foundation of this distribution is in this, that we do affect God with religious worship, when we yield him due honor, whether this be by receiving that which he him self propounds to us, or by offering that which may be received by him according to his perfection; for in both respects we do that which is immediately, and directly honorable to God.

3. The first act of Religion therefore is about those things which are communicated to us from God: and the other is about those things which are yielded to God from us.

4. Hearing the word is a religious receiving of the will of God.

5. Therefore hearing is here taken for any receiving of the words of God, whether they be communicated to us by preaching, or by reading, or any other way, because God is wont to work in a singular manner, and by his own institution in the preaching and hearing of the Word.

6. Therefore this word ought not to be taken so strictly, that it should either chiefly, or necessarily include always the outward sense of hearing: but that it may note any perceiving of the will of God, and chiefly set forth an inward receiving and subjection.

7. The receiving of the Word consists of two parts, Attention of mind, and intention of will.

8. Attention is an applying of the understanding to perceive the revealed will of God. Acts 16. 14. The Lord opened the heart of Lydia, that she might attend to the things which were spoken by Paul. It is often called in the Scripture especially in the Old Testament, A seeking of the will of God, or of God himself, to set forth that great desire wherewith we should be carried to know God's Will, as to the finding out of something which we can by no means want. Isaiah 58. 2. Yet they seek me daily, and delight to know my ways; as a Nation which doth righteousness and doth not forsake the judgment of their God, they inquire of me the ordinances of Justice, they delight in approaching to God.

9. In this attention there needeth that providence whereby we may discern, what that is that God willeth. Rom. 12. 2. That ye may prove what is that good, pleasing, and perfect Will of God: which when it is perceived, we must not deliberate further, whether it be good, or to be observed or no: for the will of God itself is the last bound of all religious inquiry. Gal. 1. 15. 16. When it pleased GOD to reveal his Son in me, I did not consult with flesh and blood.

10. Intention is an applying of our will to a religious observance of the will of God already perceived. Psal. 119. 106. I have sworn and will perform it, that I will keep thy righteous judgment.

11. The purpose of the intention ought to be so strong and firm, that without all exception we be ready to observe whatsoever God will command. Ier. 42. 5, 6. The Lord be a true and faithful witness between us, if we do not even according to all things for the which the Lord thy God shall send thee to us: whether it be good, or whether it be evil, we will obey the voice of the Lord our God.

12. In respect of this intention the Law of God it self is said to be in the heart of a believer. Psal. 40. 9. & 119. 11. Ier. 31. 33. Heb. 8. 10.

13. This hearing that it may be right, ought to be from religious observance, bringing subjection of the inward acts, and inclinations of the mind. Romans 6. 17. From the heart ye obeyed that form of doctrine to which ye were delivered.

14. But that it may be truly religious, It is requisite, first that it arise from Faith, whereby we believe that to be the word of truth which God reveals unto us, and also are accordingly affected toward it. Hebr. 4. 2. The word being heard did not profit them, not being mingled with Faith in them that heard it. Luc. 24. 32. Did not our hearts burn in us whilst he spake to us?

15. By this Faith we cleave to the word. Psa. 119. 31. And the word it self cleaves unto, and is engrafted in us, unto salvation, James 1. 21. That engrafted word.

16. Secondly the same hearing must flow from that hope, whereby we do embrace that which God hath promised as the word of life, also expecting life by it▪ Deut. 32. 47. John 5. 39. It is your life, ye look in them to find eternal life.

17. By this hope it comes to pass that the faithful bring forth fruit with patience. Luc. 8. 15.

18. In like manner it must have love joined with it, whereby we cleave to the same word, or to God revealing himself to us in that word as simply good. Psa. 119. 97. How do I love thy Law. 1 Thess. 2. 10. They received not the love of the truth, that they might be saved.

19. In respect of this love the Word of God doth dwell plentifully in the faithful, Colossians 3. 16. So as they are also transformed into the form and fashion of it, Romans 6. 17.

20. Such an Hearing of the Word of God is the true, and proper worship of God. 1. Because it doth immediately and directly bring spiritual honor to God, for although the act of hearing is most properly directed to our receiving of the Will of God, yet because in the manner of receiving we do subject our consciences to God, therefore we give him that honor of power, and Divine truth in the acknowledgement whereof his religious worship is exercised. 2. Because it containeth a direct, and immediate, exercise of Faith, Hope, and Love, in which the worship of God doth most essentially consist.

21. Hence no word or sentence of men, ought to be mingled with the word of God, and propounded in the same manner with it, least by this means we do in some sort worship men instead of God.

22. Unto this hearing that pride is most formally opposed whereby one doth so affect his own excellency, that he will not be subject to the Will of God. For although this pride is contrary to humility of religion, and obedience, or obedience in general, yet it seemeth to be most properly opposite to them in this act of religion: because a proud man, as he is such, is so far from subjecting himself to the will of another; as to a Law, that he would have his own will instead of a Law. Ierem. 13. 15. Hear and give ear: be not proud; for the Lord hath spoken. Ier. 5. 5. They have broken the yoke, they have burst the bonds.

23. The proper act as it were of this pride is that contempt whereby one doth set at naught either God or the Will of God and observance of it, 2. Sam. 12. 9. Why hast thou despised the Word of the Lord, in doing that which is evil in his Eyes.

24. Hence pride is said to be the cause of all other sins, for a double reason. 1. Because all other sins are referred in a certain manner to that excellency which is seen in pride as to an end. 2. Because pride casteth away from it self in contempt the government of the word, by the power whereof alone sin is avoided.

25. Hence there is in every sin found some respect of pride, but especially in those which are committed upon deliberate counsel.

26. Hence also all consultation with the world; flesh or wisdom of the flesh in those things which pertain to religion, is opposed to the hearing of the Word. Romans 8. 7. Gal. 1. 16.

27. For as by pride men do altogether refuse to subject themselves to the will of God: So by these consultations of those things which are not after God, they do seek to themselves as it were other God's, to whom they may be subject.

28. The most accursed opposition to hearing of the word of God is in consulting with the Devils. Isaiah 8. 19. Deut. 18. 11, 12, 13, 14, 15. Where a certain religious Faith, and Hope due to God only is transferred either explicitly or implicitly to the enemies of God.

29. Hence it is that Faith is wont chiefly to be required in such consultations by those who are the masters of such Arts.

30. By virtue of this Faith there is a certain covenant entered into with the Devil, with some religion; if not openly and expressly, at least secretly and impliedly.

31. But although one have not a direct intention to ask counsel of the Devil, yet if he do that which either of its own nature, or by use and application which it hath doth infer a compellation of the Devil to receive his help or counsel, he is made partaker of the same sin.

32. Therefore all arts brought in by instinct of the Devil, for the knowing of secrets are in this respect to be condemned.

33. All divination therefore which is neither grounded upon certain revelation of God, nor the course of nature ordained by God in things created, is to be condemned.

34. All applying of things or words either to predictions, or those operations to which they have no disposition, either by their nature, or God's Ordinance, is to be condemned.

35. As the help of the Devil is sought by such like courses, they do contain in themselves a certain invocation of him, and so are opposed to calling upon God: but as certain revelation is expected, or a submission of mind used to the receiving and executing his commands, so they are opposed to the hearing of the word of God.

36. This communion therefore with the Devil is not only in this respect unlawful, because it is joined with fraud and seducing, but also because of its own nature it is contrary to true religion.

37. For we have not civil communion or fellowship with the Devil: religious communion we cannot have, nor not as some of old had with the good Angels, who are ministering spirits, for our good sent of God for that purpose.

38. Whatsoever therefore we do with the Devil besides those things which pertain to the resisting of him as the enemy of our souls, it makes to the violating of true religion, and is a certain perverse religion.

39. If he seem sometime to be subject to the command of men, by virtue of certain enchantments, it is only a show of subjection, that by that means he may more easily rule over men: therefore he doth not hinder, but only color that religious subjection which men perform to him in that communion.

40. All those do in part communicate with such sins, who by words, figures, & such like things of no sufficient virtue, do desire to cure diseases in others, or suffer such things in themselves or others for that end.

41. Sympathies, and Antipathies, and specifical virtues which are found in some things are hereby differenced from such enchantments, in that the common experience of all men, doth acknowledge these: there is some Faith required in those; but in these none.

42. A strong imagination doth peradventure concur in many to make these means effectual; but that also doth often arise from a certain religious Faith: neither can it effect anything in parents for children, or in men for Cattle, without a certain diabolical operation accompanying it.

43. They that are most given to the hearing of the word, as they do least of all care for such acts, so they do receive the least fruit by them.

CHAPTER IX.

Of Prayer.

1. Prayer is a religious representing of our will before God, that God may be as it were affected with it.

2. It is an act of religion, because of its own nature it yieldeth to him that is prayed unto that sufficiency and efficiency of knowledge, power, and goodness which is proper to God.

3. Hence it cannot be directed to any other beside God only, without manifest idolatry.

4. It ariseth first from Faith. Rom. 10. 14. How shall they call on him in whom they have not believed? Namely from that Faith whereby we do believe that God is first omniscient, who knoweth all things, and so the inward affections and motions of our hearts, for in them chiefly the essence of Prayer doth consist: secondly, that he is omnipotent, who can do what he will in fulfilling our desires; thirdly, that he is the author and giver of every good thing: Fourthly, that he doth allow and accept our Prayer through Christ.

5. Hence all our Prayers are to be offered to God in the name and mediation of Christ, by the power of a justifying, Faith. John 14. 13. 14. & 16. 23. Whatsoever ye shall ask of the Father in my name.

6. It ariseth also from that hope whereby we expect the fruit desired from our prayers from God. Rom. 8. 23. 26. We groan expecting the adoption: The spirit maketh request for us with groans that cannot be expressed.

7. Lastly, it ariseth from Charity, whereby we desire both to partake of and celebrate the goodness of God. Psalm 34 4. 9. Magnifie the Lord with me, and let us extol his name together. Taste and see that the Lord is good, blessed is the man that trusts in him.
8. Hence Charity to our neighbor also is necessarily required that Prayer be accepted of God. The fifth petition of the Lord's Prayer.
9. Prayer differs from hearing the word, in that hearing is conversant about the will of God, but Prayer about our will: in hearing the word we receive the Will of God, but in Prayer we offer our will to God, that it may be received by him.
10. But it is not a simple will or desire, but a representation of the will or the will exhibited and represented before God. For it is not sufficient to prayer, that we desire to have something, for so profane men, because they do most desire to have, should pray most; but there is required also a desire to obtain that of God, and a will to seek the same of him, and then a representing or insinuating of this desire before God.
11. But this representation is done first and essentially in the will it self, as it being converted to God, doth as it were by an act stretched forth, represent unto him its inclination and desire.
12. Hence the Prayers of the godly are called in the Scriptures desires, Psal. 10. 17. And unspeakable groans Rom. 8. 26.
13. In the second place and by way of sign; this representation is made in the understanding, as it conceiving an inward word, doth express the affections of the will before God.
14. Hence the prayers of the faithful are also called words, and speeches whereby they speak to God, not first and chiefly outwardly, but inwardly. Hos. 14. 2. Take unto you words, and turn unto the Lord. Say unto him, pardon, &c.
15. Prayer therefore is formally an act of the will: yet withal there is required to it both an antecedent act of the mind whereby we understand, what, of whom, for what, and how we must pray; and a consequent act whereby we conceive and express with a certain word of the mind, prayer it self.
16. Hence together with intention or the act of the will, there is also required attention in Prayer, both to God to whom we pray, and to the thing whereof we pray, and also to the Prayer it self; for we must not only pray with the Spirit, but with understanding also. 1 Corinthians 14. 15. I will pray with the spirit, I but will pray with understanding also.
17. This representation must be submisse and humble, for otherwise it would not be a religious praying directed from a subject Creature to the highest God and Creator, but either a command of a superior to an inferior, or a familiar conference as it were, such as is among equals. Gen. 18. 27. Behold now I would speak unto the Lord, although I am dust and ashes. Psalm 95. 6. Come let us bow, and fall down, and bend the knees before the Lord that made us.

18. The general end of Prayer is, that we may as it were affect or move GOD; whence it is that the faithful are said by their prayers as it were mightily to prevail with God, Genesis 32. 28. Hos. 12. 4, 5. And as it were to strike, Rom. 15. 30.

19. For although that difference is true which some put between those prayers which are directed to men, and those which are made to God: that they that pray to men do affect those to whom they pray, and in some measure dispose them to that which they desire: but those who pray to God, do not so much affect God as themselves, and dispose themselves to those things they desire: yet God is pleased so to commend the force and efficacy of Prayer to us, that he declares himself to be affected, and as it were moved with it. And that because our prayer is the means, by the interceding of which, and no otherwise, God will Communicate many things unto us, whence also they who ask something of GOD, are said to afford help to effect it, 2. Cor. 2. 11.

20. For we do not therefore pray to God that we may make known our desires to him not knowing them, who understands always a far off. Psal. 139. 2. That is, when as yet they are not in our minds: neither that we may move him to our mind who was unwilling, with whom there is no change or shadow of turning. James 1. 17. But that we may by our prayer obtain that of him which we believe he is willing to. 1. John 5. 14. This is our confidence which we have towards God, that if we ask him anything according to his will, he heareth us.

21. Hence the firmness and unchangeableness of God's providence doth not take away, but establish the prayers of the faithful, and the most sure apprehension of it by Faith doth not make the true believers slothful, but doth more stir them up to pray. 1. Chr. 17. 25, 26, 27. Thou O my God, hast revealed to the ear of thy servant, that thou wilt build him an house. Therefore hath thy servant been bold to pray before thee, &c.

22. Hence also we must pray instantly and continually; instantly, because our prayer is a necessary means for God's glory, and our good. Continually, because such a disposition of will is never to be cast off, and the act of it also is daily to be exercised, as occasion is offered to us.

23. The adjuncts of Prayer are confession, and a promise made to God: for these two are always either expressly or implicitly used in every acceptable Prayer to God, and in every part of it.

24. For because we do by Prayer fly unto the mercy of God, as to the fountain of all good, either communicated, or to be communicated to us, in so doing we confess that we are miserable in ourselves and destitute of all good, because also we endeavor as it were, to affect and move God by our desires; therefore also we profess that our minds are suitably affected about the same things, and do promise them to be so affected for time to come; neither can such like affections be absent from our prayers, without a certain mocking of GOD.

25. Confession is an humble and penitential acknowledgement of our offense, guiltiness and misery. Ps. 32. 5.

26. The end and use of this confession is. First, that God may be justified and may have glory in his judgments. Psa. 51. 6. Secondly, that we may be disposed to obtain the glory of God. Psal. 3. 25. Thirdly, that the grace that is granted, may more clearly appear.

27. The manner is divers, according to the diversity of sinners. For sins not known, are to be confessed generally. Psa. 19. 13. But known sins specially, even according to the nature and grievousness of everyone, Ezra. 9. 14.

28. A promise required in Prayer is a testifying of a purpose agreeable to Prayer.

29. This purpose is a determination of the will to prosecute that with an earnest endeavor, which we pray to God that it may be, Psal. 119. 106. 112. Compared with the following verses.

30. But we prosecute that we pray for, both by those means which of their own nature are necessary to that end, and also by other means, the determination whereof depends upon contingent circumstances, and upon our election.

31. A promise of the latter kind made to God distinctly, and upon deliberate counsel, is by a certain appropriation called a vow.

32. Hence every vow must be, First, of a thing neither impossible, nor simply necessary, but which may be freely performed according to our pleasure by the ordinary favor of God. Secondly, of a thing neither evil nor vain, but lawful and good in respect of all circumstances. Thirdly, it must be referred only to God as the object to whom we vow, and to his honor as the prime end, although it may be ordered to ours, and others edification and use.

33. Prayer in respect of the manner is either ejaculatory, or a short lifting up of the desire, where the mind doth either not wholly, or not long attend Prayer. Psal. 129. 8. Nehem. 2. 4. Or a continued order of Praying.

34. That ought to be more frequent, as that which cannot be hindered by ordinary businesses; but this must be at set times, as being more solemn, and not admitting the distraction of other thoughts.

35. But both of them is either mental, or vocal.

36. Mental is that which is performed in the will, mind, and affection, without any sign purposely adjoined. Nehem. 2. 4. 1. Sam. 1. 13.

37. Vocall is that which draweth forth the inward desire of the mind even in words. Hos. 14. 2.

38. The voice is oft times necessary in prayer to express, stir up, continue, and increase the inward affection of the mind: for although the affection ought to go before the voice, and the voice to be conformable to the affection; yet whilst that it is religiously expressed by the voice, it hath a certain reflection upon the mind it self, whereby it is more enkindled, and getteth greater strength. The voice also is necessary in its measure, that the body may together with the soul be exercised in this part of religion.

39. Hence therefore neither is that speech to be used which he that prayeth understandeth not, and whereby he cannot express his conceivings; for such a repeating of unknown words is not properly the speech of a man, because it is no more formed of the inward conceivings then those words which are sometime uttered by a Parrot, and so it cannot distinctly express the inward conceivings of the mind, in which prayer doth primarily consist.

40. Neither also must the speech be long, or repeating the same thing often. Mat. 6. 7. Unless it be out of the abundance of the heart; for then neither long prayers, nor divers repeatings are vain or to no purpose; but most acceptable to God: as doth sufficiently appear by approved examples of such prayers which are mentioned in the Scriptures.

41. Neither finally ought there to be such care of words which may any way diminish due attention, either to God, or to the subject matter, or to the inward affection of the mind.

42. In vocal prayer if it be solemn, there are also those gestures required which become the majesty of God, our baseness, and the nature of the matter it self.

43. Vocall prayer is either in prose, or in Meter.

44. In meter singing is joined, and therefore there must be more care of the speech and tone, then in prose.

45. But the melody of singing is ordained for a certain spiritual delight, whereby the mind is detained in the meditation of the thing that is sung.

46. For there is a more distinct meditation comes between the word, and the lifting up of the heart, then in other prayers: so that the next and immediate fruit of a Psalm, is our edification in Faith and obedience.

47. Yet because the lifting up of the heart to God is together required, Simul & consequenter, and going along with the thing that is sung, and it is also the end of that meditation; therefore we are said to sing in our heart to the Lord, Col. 3. 16. And Psalms that are sung have the consideration of Prayers.

48. But because this religious melody hath the respect of prayers: therefore it is not so fit, that the decalogue, and other such like which do not partake the nature of prayer be turned into Meter, and be sung instead of Psalms.

49. But because singing doth immediately respect our edification, and also doth set forth in its own nature, a certain gladness of the mind, James 5. 13. therefore the very same gestures which are meet in other prayers, are not required in such like exercises.

50. Secondly, prayer is either solitary, or with others.

51. In that which is had with others if it be prose, one goeth before in voice, and the rest follow in affection, and Faith, which they ought to declare, in the end, by saying, Amen. Nehem. 8. 7. 1. Cor. 14. 16.

52. Hence, Alternatio precum enterchanging of prayers by Anthems: distribution of parts between the Minister and People; and repeating of words propounded by the Minister, by the subsequent voice of the people, is not to be approved.

53. But in the melody of singing, because it tendeth to our mutual edification, attention, and stirring up of pious affections among us one toward another, Col. 3. 16. Therefore all do join their voices together. 1. Chronicles 16. 35. Marc. 14. 26.

54. In those prayers which are had with others, such speech must be used which is understood of others. 1. Co. 14.

55. Hence that broken music which excludes understanding, must be absent from those sacred exercises of piety at least which we have with others.

56. The kinds of prayer are two, Petition, and thanksgiving. Phil. 4. 6. In everything let your requests be made known to God in prayers, and deprecation, with giving of thanks.

57. Petition is a prayer of that which is wanting, that we may obtain it Matthew 7. 7. Ask, and it shall be given you: Seek, and ye shall find; Knock, and it shall be opened to you.

58. Always that which we ask is wanting, either wholly, or in part, or in our feeling, or finally in respect of the act, or in respect of the continuance of it.

59. Hence, a sense of our emptiness and want, together with an apprehension of sufficiency, whereby our insufficiency may be supplied, is necessarily required to make a petition aright.

60. The virtue and efficacy of petition is not in deferring, or in satisfying, as the Papists would have it, but in impetration only.

61. To impetrate is properly to have the force of a means to obtain some good freely from another.

62. Therefore all good works, or all observance, although as it flows from Faith, hath some power to obtain blessings from God by virtue of that promise, whereby he appointeth a free reward to them; whence also Real Prayer distinguished from vocal & mental, is called by some a good work, although very improperly: yet petition, doth obtain in a special manner, not only as it is a chief part of obedience, but also because it hath in its proper nature this end and use, as it is a formal act of Faith and hope, by which we receive all good things from God.

63. But this impetration doth not properly respect the justice of God, but his mercy and kindness.

64. Hence we receive every good thing we ask, not from the hand of justice, but grace.

65. Petition, because it doth most formally flow from Faith and Hope, therefore it is in the same manner conversant about good things to be asked as those virtues are conversant about their secondary objects, that is, those things which they apprehend, are to be communicated to us from God.
66. Hence those things only are to be asked absolutely which are necessary for God's glory and our salvation: but other things with a secret subjection to the most wise disposing of God.
67. Hence both the manner, and particular time to communicate this or that upon us, ought not to be prescribed to God in our prayers; yet it is lawful to pray God to hear us speedily, Psalm 102. 3. Hear me speedily. Because he hath promised to do this, Luke 18. 8. He will avenge them quickly. Yet we may not define the fit time of this hastening.
68. But because petition flows also from Charity, hence those things also are to be desired, and asked in prayers, which do most make to the celebration of the glory and goodness of God.
69. Hence also we ask not only for ourselves, but for all other also, who either or may be partakers with us of the same goodness of God. 1. Tim. 2. 1, 2, 3.
70. The Patriarchs and Prophets did not only in their blessings pray well when they uttered their desires, but also did promise well in the name of the Lord; the Hebrew words are wont to contain both, Let God give, or God shall give. Gen. 27. 30.
71. Therefore although we may not peculiarly pray for the dead, because such prayer hath neither precept nor commendable example in Scriptures, nor finally any use or end: neither may we pray for all and everyone living collectively that they may be saved; because we know the contrary is determined by God; yet we ought not wholly to reject any man living in particular from the communion of our prayers, neither for any enmity, nor for conjectures, or probable signs of reprobation.
72. Petition is twofold according to the respect of the object or thing which is asked for it is either Apprecation, or Deprecation.
73. Apprecation is petitioning for good things to be communicated.
74. Deprecation is petition for evil things to be removed. Intercession which is joined to these two, 1. Tim. 2. 1. is a peculiar manner of deprecation, namely, when that evil which we desire to be removed is placed in some injury, done by men.
75. Unto deprecation there belongs, Complaints and lamentations, as adjuncts of it.
76. Complaint is a signification of our grief, of miseries as they are injuriously inflicted by men.
77. Unto these complaints imprecation is sometime joined, whereby we wish some evil to those who are authors of evil. But this is ordinarily no further lawful, then as it hath the force of deprecation, for the removing some greater evil by that evil which we wish to them, but the prophetic imprecations were also predictions.

78. Lamentation is a signification of our grief, of those miseries as they are sent by God.

79. Sometime fasting is added to deprecation as an outward adjunct.

80. Fasting is an abstinence from the helps and comforts of this life, whereby humility is shown as it were in a real confession, and we are made the more fit to make more effectual prayers. 1. Cor. 7. 5. Joel 1. 14, 15, 16. Dan. 9. 2. 3.

81. Hence fasting considered by it self is not a good work, and part of our obedience toward God, but as it disposeth us to make more free, ardent, and more continued Prayers.

82. Hence also the same measure and time of fasting is not equally profitable, and necessary to all and everyone.

83. Finally hence that way of fasting is most religious, when the whole mind is so attent to seek God, that thereby it is called a way from the thought and care of those things, which pertain to the life present.

84. Thanksgiving is prayer, of those things which we have received, that the honor may be given to God. Ps. 50. 15. 23. I will deliver thee, that thou mayst glorify me. He that offereth praise doth glorify me.

85. It is Prayer no less then petition, because whilst we give thanks to God, we do represent our will with a religious submission before God, that he may be as it were affected or moved, although not properly, to that end that we may receive something from God, but rather that we may refer something we have received unto him.

86. It is most properly of those things which we have received: because we must first be affected with the sense of a benefit, before we can give thanks to GOD in respect of it.

87. Yet thanks must be given, not only for those things which we have actually and really received, but also for those things we apprehend by Faith and Hope; partly because the promise it self of these things is a benefit, which in some sort is already said to be bestowed; and partly because the things promised are apprehended with that certainty, that they do affect the mind as things present.

88. Also that celebration of the praises of God belongs to thancksgiving, which is exercised about those perfections which are in God himself, and do shine forth in his works; but with a certain respect to those things we have received, namely as those perfections are arguments that do either illustrate that good which we have received, or confirm the bestowing of it, Rev. 4. 8, 9. Holy, holy, holy, Lord God Almighty—the living Creatures gave glory, and honor, and thanksgiving to him who sate upon the Throne.

89. Hence for the right performance of thanksgiving there is required. 1. A knowledge of the blessings of God. 2. An applying of them to ourselves by Faith and Hope. 3. A due estimation of them, together with an affection beseeming.

90. The proper end of thanksgiving is to give the honor to God, for all those things which we have received. Psal. 50. 15. For if we so think of the good things we have received, that we either rest in them, or glory in ourselves, or ascribe them only to second causes, then thanksgiving is corrupted.

91. Hence thanksgiving is a secondary end of every religious petition: for he that doth rightly ask anything of God, doth not only ask therefore that he may receive, much less that he may spend it upon his lusts, James 4. 3. But that that which is received may be again referred to the glory of God who gave it. 2. Cor. 1. 11. You helping together by prayer for us, that for the gift bestowed upon us by the means of many persons, thanks may be given by many on our behalf.

92. Hence in every petition, thanksgiving for that benefit which is asked, is expressly or implicitly promised.

93. Hence thanksgiving in it self is more perfect and more noble then petition: because in petition oftentimes our good is respected, but in giving of thanks God's honor only.

94. Hence thanksgiving is more attributed to the Angels, and to the blessed Spirits in the Scriptures, then petition.

95. By this act we are said not only to praise, and celebrate God, but also to extol, bless, magnify, and glorify him, and the like: all which are so to to be understood, that they seth forth only a declaration, not a real effecting of those things they make show of.

96. If thanksgiving be more solemn, there must be sometimes a cheerful solemnity joined with it. Esth. 9. 19. For as a fasting when we deprecate a greater evil doth both cause, and testify our humiliation to be the greater; so in solemn joy for some special good communicated to us, outward mirth if it be moderate, and within the bounds of Temperance, doth make and testify the same to be the greater.

97. Evils as evils can neither be the object of petition nor thanksgiving: yet afflictions as they are so directed by God, that they do work together for our good, may have the respect of both.

CHAPTER X.

Of an Oath.

1. There be two manners of petition to be used upon occasion, which were brought in by reason of man's infirmity: an Oath, and a Lot.

2. But because these two manners are brought in upon such occasion, therefore they must not be usually frequented, but then only to be used where human necessity requireth, and a weighty and just cause is in hand.
3. An Oath is a requesting of God's Testimony to confirm the truth of our testimony. Heb. 6. 13. 16. Men swear by him who is the greater: and an Oath for confirmation is to them an end of all strife.
4. An Oath became necessary after the fall of man, because man by $\langle\phi\rangle$ had lost both that credit which ought to be given to his simple testimony, and that also which he ought to have given to the testimony of others.
5. That infirmity of man in giving credit to the testimony of others, is so great that it was in a manner necessary for God himself also to demean himself to confirm his testimonies by the form of an Oath. He. 6. 13. 17. Which was more then needed in respect of God's faithfulness, but not in respect of human infirmity.
6. Yet God seeing he hath not any greater or superior Judge, Heb. 6. 13. He cannot properly swear, but this is prescribed to him metaphorically: because all that perfection of confirmation which is found in the Oaths of men, doth most perfectly agree to those testimonies of God.
7. But God's Testimony is worthily called upon to confirm truth: because he is the highest truth who can neither deceive nor be deceived, Heb. 6. 18. It cannot be that God should lie.
8. Hence in an Oath the worship of religion is given to God, as he is both acknowledged the Author of truth, and to be conscious of all our roughts, as to whose eyes those things are naked and open which are most secret to all Creatures, & the rewarder of truth & falsehood, and who provides for all things by an admirable providence, as being the living God. Deut. 6. 13 Fear the Lord thy God, and worship him, and swear by his name.
9. Hence we may not swear by any Creature, but by God alone, who only is omniscient, the only law giver, and rewarder of those things which pertain to conscience, and finally to be only religiously worshipped. Mat. 5. 34. 35. & 23. 21. 22. James 5. 12.
10. Yet everything considered in an Oath is not properly the worship of God, because it doth not directly tend to give honor to God: but to confirm the truth; but that request which is made in an Oath is worship, and in that respect to swear by the true God, doth sometime in Scripture set forth true worship. Deut. 6. 13. Isaiah 48. 1. And an Oath it self is wont to be called worship.
11. In this requesting of the testimony of God, he who swears doth make himself subject to God's vengeance and curse, if he give false testimony, that is, if wittingly he deceive. Hence in every Oath there is implicitly or expressly an imprecation or cursing contained, Nehem. 10. 30. 2. Cor. 1. 23. Entred into a curse and an Oath. I call God to witness against my soul.

12. Hence is that form of swearing, which is very frequent in the Old Testament. So do God to me, and more also in which words there is a general or indefinite curse contained, that the way of inflicting the evil may be committed to God.

13. Therefore there is so great religion of an Oath that it may admit no equivocation or mental reservation; which things may have their place in play or lighter jesting, but cannot be used in the worship of God without great impiety. For this is nothing else but to mock at GOD'S Judgment.

14. Hence also there can no release, properly so called, commuting, or dispensation, and absolution from an Oath, come from man: although some oaths which were either unlawful from the beginning, or afterward become so, may be by men pronounced to be void.

15. Because it is a testimony of a thing done, or to be done, therefore an Oath that confirms a testimony is distinguished into an assertory, and promissory Oath.

16. An assertory Oath is of a thing past, or present. 2. Cor. 1. 23. A promissory Oath under which a comminatory is contained, is of a thing to come. 1. Samuel 20. 12, 13, 14.

17. An assertory Oath, because it is of a thing already done, doth not bind to do anything, but doth only confirm the truth of the thing done.

18. But this assertion doth immediately respect the judgment of him that sweareth, being grounded on those arguments which are wont to be called infallible, so as an Oath that agrees with such a judgment, is to be accounted for true, although it should differ from the thing it self: because it doth not respect the thing it self, but by means of such a judgment: whence also the Romans did use that most considerate word I think, even then when being sworn they spake those things which they were sure of.

19. A promissory Oath hath in it the force of an assertory Oath, as it testifieth a present firm intention of the mind, but it doth moreover bind to do that which is declared to be intended.

20. But it binds so far only as one can bind himself, that is, to that which both Defacto & dejure in deed and in right, he may perform, and so must be always of a thing lawful and possible.

21. Such an Oath bindeth to the fulfilling of it, although the Oath was unlawful in respect of the manner, or the thing promised bring damage with it to him that promised. Ios. 9. 19. Ps. 15. 4.

22. But if the Oath be against the Commandments of God, it doth not bind: because an Oath ought not to be a bond of iniquity.

23. Yet an Oath made in some manner against the command of God doth sometime bind, as when the Jews to whom freedom was promised, did swear to be subject to strangers into whose power they came.

24. A promissory Oath whereby something is promised to man only for his sake, doth cease to bind, if he to whom the promise is made, doth either remit or take away that foundation whereupon it was grounded.
25. An Oath is lawful and honest for Christians. 1. Because it is of the Law of nature, or moral Law which is not abrogated. 2. Because it pertains to God's honor, and Charity to our neighbor. 3. Because there are commendable examples of Oaths used even in the new Testament. 2. Cor. 1. 23. Rev. 6. 10.
26. Christ in the fifth of Matthew doth not condemn every Oath, but such as are rash, indirect, and made by the Creatures.
27. James Chap. 5. Ver. 12. Doth condemn the same abuse of an Oath, and not all swearing, whereby his repeating the words of Christ he doth manifestly show, that those words of Christ swear not at all, do make one sentence with those that follow; neither by Heaven, &c. And so are to be understood as joined together, not divided asunder.
28. Amen, Amen is not a form of swearing, but only of a grave asseveration. Those words, Hebr. 6. 14. Surely blessing I will bless thee, do not contain the form, but the matter only of that Oath which is, Gen. 22. 16. 17. neither doth the word, Amen, appear there, either in the Greek or Hebrew, as some have rashly imagined.
29. The words of an Oath are to be interpreted in the Court of conscience, according to the meaning of him that swore, if he dealt simply and candidly: if not, then according to his meaning, whom he would deceive, or to whom he sware. But in the outward Court the words of them that swear, are to be taken as they are commonly understood.
30. A perjured man is not to speak properly, but such an one, that either swears against his conscience or willingly and willingly departs from that which he did lawfully swear.
31. Faith that is confirmed by a lawful Oath, is to be kept, the same circumstances remaining, even to enemies, thieves, and Pirates: for if the respect of the persons doth not make the Oath unlawful: it cannot make it of no force.
32. An Oath that is extorted by fear, doth not cease to bind in that respect: because those acts which are said to be extorted from a man by fear, if they proceed from counsel, they are simply voluntary, although not absolutely Spontaneous, or of good will.
33. They that do not use reason so as they cannot understand the nature of an Oath, are not capable of an Oath.
34. To require an Oath of him who will swear by false God's, is not of it self a sin. Gen. 31. 53.
35. An Oath of a Christian made given concerning his innocence, which cannot be reprehended by any certain arguments, ought to put an end to controversies pertaining thereto. Exod. 22. 11. Heb. 6. 16.
36. A simple Oath made only in words binds as the most solemn Oath.

37. That solemnity which is used in some places in touching and kissing a book, is altogether of the same sort with the lifting up or stretching forth of the hand, that is, it signifies a consent to swear, and to the Oath it self.

38. The putting of the hand under the thigh of him that required an Oath, Gen. 24. 2. was not for any mystical significatiō of Christ, but for a sign of subjectiō.

39. Adjuring is (to speak properly) that whereby one doth draw another either to swear, Gen. 24. 8. Or to that religion which is in an Oath. Numb. 5. 21. Matthew. 26. 63. 1. Thess. 5. 27.

40. Therefore it doth most properly pertain to those who have power to require an Oath of others, although in a certain proportion it is also extended to that religious obtestation, which inferiors sometime use towards their superiors, and equals among themselves.

41. To adjure the Devills, is to exercise command over them, and so it is not lawful for any to exercise adjuration toward them, unless he have received special power from God to that purpose.

42. Those exorcismes which were used before Baptism even in the time of the Fathers, were superstitious.

43. The adjurings, or exorcisings of things without life, and consecrations of them to supernatural operations and uses, such as the Papists use in their holy Water, Temples, Bells and the like, are superstitious enchantments.

44. The adjuring of a man to accuse himself for any crime objected (which is used in that Oath which is called the Oath of Inquisition or Ex •...fficio) hath neither ground in the Scriptures, and is against the law of nature.

45. Neither is an indefinite adjuring to answer to all such things, as shall be demanded simply to be admitted.

CHAPTER XI.

Of a Lot.

1. A Lot is a requesting of a Divine testimony to decide some controversy, by the determining of an event to be manifested in a mere contingency. Pro. 16. 33. The Lot is cast into the lap: but the whole disposition of it is of the Lord. And 11, 18. A Lot maketh contentions to cease, and decideth among the mighty.

2. We call it a request: because it hath that nature, that it expects that use to which it serves from God alone; and in that respect it hath an immediate respect to his providence.

3. We define it by contingency, that we may avoid the error of those, who place the common consideration of a Lot in that manner of the efficient cause, whereby it is said to work by fortune.

4. For there are many fortuitous causes which do altogether differ from the consideration of a Lot: as when he finds gold, who digging sought for coles: also there are many Lots wherein fortune is no acting cause, as when the Lot depends upon the flying of birds, or some such like effects, which is produced by a cause that works of its own power.

5. Neither can it be Logically defended, that the very cast of a Die, or some such like effect upon which depends the consideration of a Lot, is always beside the intention or scope of the agent, which yet is necessarily required, to fortuitous chance.

6. But we do not place a Lot simply in contingency, but in mere contingency: because there are three degrees of things contingent: some often happening, some seldom, and some so far as we can understand, equally having themselves on either part: for in other Contingents there is some place left to conjecture by art: but in mere contingency there is none.

7. It is not therefore a fortuitous manner of the efficient cause which is said to rule in Lots, but either that blind fortune which was made a goddess by prosane men, and placed in Heaven, or the special providence of God, working that way that is hidden to us.

8. But seeing that in every Lot there is sought the determination of some question or controversy, and it is sought by mere contingency, in it self and in respect of us, altogether undetermined; it must needs be, that the very determination it self (whatsoever the actual intention of men shall be) be from the nature of the thing always sought from an higher power, having power to direct such contingencies, by certain counsel: and so in very deed the use of a Lot is an appealing always either to the true God, or to some feigned power, which is wont to be set forth by many by the name of fortune.

9. When therefore our Divines do teach that there is a certain extraordinary providence of God set over all Lots, they are not so to be taken, as if either those that used Lots did always directly, and distinctly respect such a providence, or as if God did always exercise such a providence: but that the Lot it self, of its own nature hath a certain respect to the singular, and extraordinary providence of God in directing of an event merely contingent, and in this sense their sentence is most true.

10. For seeing that in a Lot some judgment is expected by the common consent of all, and there is no power of giving judgment in contingent events, neither is there any other fortune judging then the certain providence of God, it must needs be that this judgment be in a singular manner expected, from God's providence.

11. Neither can mere contingency it self have the respect of a principal cause in deciding any question: neither can man to whom the event it self is merely contingent, direct it to attain such an end. It must needs be therefore that such direction be expected of some superior director.

12. Ad hereunto, that such is the order of proceeding in man's inquiry, that when men desire some question to be determined, & they have not certain means in their power for this determination, they seek it from some superior power: unto which manner of proceeding the consideration of a Lot doth altogether agree.

13. Neither can it stand, that he that worketh by counsel, intending a certain end and scope, by certain reason, can subject his action, either to fortune or mere contingency as it is such: for so counsel should be without knowledge, and indifferency undetermined should be a means of a cause determined.

14. Such an expectation and respect to the singular providence of God is manifestly taught. Prov. 16. verse 33. Whilst the action of every man about a Lot, is affirmed to be bounded in mere contingency. The Lot is cast into the lap, and in accurate discerning the whole judgment is referred to GOD. But all the disposition of it is from the Lord.

15. For although all things are otherwise referred unto God's providence in the Scriptures: yet nothing is wont to be referred unto it with such discerning, unless it have a certain singular respect unto it.

16. Neither doth it anything hinder, that the Hebrew word Mischphath is sometime wont to signify another thing beside Judgment: because it must always be taken according to the subject matter; and there is a certain judgment given to Lots by all who describe the nature of them.

17. Hence therefore a Lot ought neither to be used rashly, nor in sporting or lighter matters, nor in those controversies which are either vainer, or can be decided fitly by other ordinary means.

18. Neither therefore it is to be used ordinarily or without special revelation, to divining, nor to consult of alright, nor ordinarily of a deed that is past, but of a division to be made, or of an election lawful on both sides, which cannot otherwise be so fitly determined, that they whom it concerns would be pleased.

19. The opinion of them who defend playing Lots is sufficiently refuted by this one reason, that (by the consent of all) a Lot hath a natural fitness to ask counsel of God's providence in a special manner. For it cannot be that one and the same action of its own nature should be specially apt to so sacred an use, and yet withal should be applied to jests, and plays.

20. That reason whereby it is contended, that the use of a Lot is lawful in light and playing matters, because it is lawfully used in those civil controversies which are of lesser moment, hath no consequence: for although those civil controversies in which a Lot hath place, of themselves are not great, yet are made very great by the consequences joined with them or adhering to them: which cannot be affirmed of those spurring contentions.

21. The tithes of the living Creatures. Lev. 27. 32. The orders of priestly and Levitical administrations, 1. Chron. 26. 13, 14, &c. Luc. 1. 9. Might bring with them great inconveniences, unless they had been determined by some Divine sentence: and in that respect they were appointed by Lot by God's institution.

22. It doth not appear from the nature of Lots, that they do most agree to the lightest things: for although we may not expect God's special determination unless we have before done so much as in us is to decide the question, propounded by ordinary means, yet by that our endeavor weightiness is either not removed from the controversy it self, or not to be committed to a Lot.

23. The very nature of a Lot is holy, as of an Oath: therefore there is no need that it should receive special sanctification from any special institution. For although that contingency which is as it were the matter of a Lot, is not of its own nature holy, as neither Bread nor Wine ought to be so esteemed; yet in application to its use, it putteth on a certain sanctity, as the words of an Oath, and the elements in the Sacraments.

24. It is indeed free for Christians to use the Creatures to those ends to which they are naturally apt, or made apt: But mere contingency hath no aptitude of it self to determine any question, neither doth it take any aptitude by the consent of them who use it to that end. For in those Lots which are called extraordinary, and are acknowledged to depend upon God, & not upon men; the same consent is had in the same manner, and yet it adds nothing to a Lot.

25. None can show that a Lot is indifferent, unless he shall first demonstrate that there is in it no special appealing to God's providence.

26. Although also the matter of sporting things, is not tied to this or that kind of indifferent actions, yet it hath those bounds set to it self, that it can have no place in those things which do singularly pertain to communion with God.

27. It is altogether vain which is objected, that a Lot often repeated will have a divers event: for neither is this likely, if a Lot can be rightly iterated, neither doth every appealing to God's providence necessarily bring with it his special operation: and yet God even out of order is read to have sometimes answered diversely to those, by whom he was unseasonably tempted, Numb. 22. 12. 20. Go not with them: Arise, go with them.

28. But much vainer it is to object instead of an argument, that God cannot be drawn by us at our pleasure to exercise an extraordinary providence. For notwithstanding this, we may appeal to his extraordinary providence, when it pleaseth us.

29. Therefore playing at Dice is repugnant to religion, not only by the circumstances and by accident, but of its inward nature and in it self.

30. But under the name of the Dye are those plays also comprehended, which are grounded on mere contingency, although they be afterward governed by wit, industry or some art, as in Table, and Cards.

31. But those human exercises which are grounded upon art, but are in part subject to casualty in the progress, do greatly differ from Dice.

32. Whereas men are wont, by playing at Dice to be stirred up to swearings, cursings, and blasphemies, more then in other exercises, this cometh partly from the nature of the play it self: because the Lo... being often reiterated and often failing expectation, they think that that power which they imagine doth govern the Lot, is against them.

33. By the same reason also it comes to pass, that they that use those plays can scarce put an end or measure to them: because they who are inferior in the contention, have no reason to despair of their Lot, and sodo persist in a pertinacious expectation of their wished success.

34. Hence also those losses and inconveniences, by which other plays are wont to be made extrinsically vicious, in di... do depend partly upon the veruy nature of the play.

CHAPTER. XII.

Oftempting of God.

1. TEMpting of God is in a singular manner opposed to hearing the word and Prayer. Psal. 95. 7, 8, 9. To day if ye will hear his voice, harden not your heart, as in the provocation, as in the day of Tentation in the Wilderness: where your fathers tempted me, proved me, and saw my works. For seeing that in hearing the word and godly Prayer, we have communion with God, according to this will, if we seek such like communion beyond his will, then we are properly said to tempt him.

2. To tempt God is to make trial of foam Divine perfection in an unlawful manner. Psal. 95. 9.

3. This trial is sometime of the power of God, Psal. 78. 18. 19. They tempted God in their heart—and speaking against God, they said, Can God prepare a Table in the Wilderness? namely, when it is circumscribed by men, and bounds are set to it at their pleasure: at if he shall do this or that, which they would have him, then let him be accounted omnipotent, otherwise not. Ps. 78. 41. Who tempted God, and limited the holy one of Israel.

4. Sometime trial is made of the Knowledge of God, as when men privily do something doubting whether God know it or no, Ps. 94. 7. saying, the Lord seeth not, neither doth the God of Jacob regard.

5. Sometime it is of the presence of GOD. Exodus 17. 7. They tempted God, saying, Is the Lord among us or no?

6. Sometime it is of the providence of God, when men leaving ordinary means appointed by God, do yet expect that God should provide for them, at their desire, although he promised no such thing. Mat. 4. 7.

7. Sometime it is of the anger, justice and vengeance of God. 1. Cor. 10. 22. Do we provoke the Lord to anger? which kind of tempting is in all murmuring, and strife against God o... those sent by God. 1. Cor. 10. 9. 10. Neither let us tempt Christ. Neither murmur ye; whence Massah and Meribah were the names of the same place. Exodus 17. 7.

8. But tempting of God is sometime with an express intention to try God, as in unlawful casting of Lots, and whensoever we presume that of God which he hath not promised.

9. Sometime it is with a secret and implied consent, namely when that is done which of it self and in its own nature tends to this, that God may be tried, although he that doth it think no such thing.

10. And this is done two ways, First, when one willeth and expected anything to be done, and in the mean while refuseth the means that are necessary for it: as they do in natural things who would have health or continuance of life, and reject medicines, or food: as they also in supernatural things which would have grace and life, but neglect the Word of God, and Sacraments, with the like means of grace and salvation. Secondly, when one exposeth himself to danger without urgent necessity, from which he can in no wise or scarsly be delivered, except by a miracle from God: as they do in natural things often who seek vain glory in contemning death, and those in spiritual things who seem as it were to love the occasions, and enticements to sin.

11. This sin doth oft times flow from doubting or unbelief: because he who seeks such trial of God, doth not sufficiently trust the revealed word of God: but will undertake a new way to know the will of God; and so it is opposed to hearing the word, so far forth as it is to be received of us by Faith.

12. Sometime it flows from despair, when men not expecting the promises of God, by a disorderly hastening, will prescribe God, when and how he may satisfy their expectation: and so it is opposed to the hearing of the word, as it cherisheth divine hope in us.

13. Sometime also it flows from a base esteem and contempt of God: as when one playing and jesting will try whether God will manifest himself according to his desire: and so it is opposed to hearing of the word, as it hath in it a love, and fit esteem of God.

14. It flows also from a certain arrogancy and pride, whereby we refusing to subject our wills to the Will of God, do seek to make his will subject to our lust.

15. But it comes most often from presumption, whereby one is confident that God will do this, or that which he nowhere promised, or at least did not promise that he would do in that manner and with those means that they expect; whence also it is that every tempting of God is by some referred to presumption: and in respect of arrogancy it is opposed to prayer, wherein we do humbly represent our will to God, that it may be performed by him as he pleaseth.

16. But it is always opposed to some act of religion, whereby we depend upon the will of God: because when we tempt God, we do it that God may as it were depend upon our will.

17. To desire some special sign of God, with some special reason, inspiration, or instinct, is to tempt God, Matth: 16. 1. The Pharisees and Sadduc...s tempting him, required him to show them a sign from Heaven.

18. Yet to refuse a sign offered by God, is to tempt or weary him. Is. 7. 11, 12, 13. Ask a sign. I will not ask, neither will I tempt God. Ye weary my God. Humbly to seek a sign of God about some particular necessary thing, which otherwise is not sufficiently manifested, a believer may sometime do without sin. Gen. 15. 8. How shall I know that I shall inherit the Land?

19. Proving or purging of a suspected offense by trial of hot Iron, scalding water and the like, are temptings of God: for there is a certain miraculous showing of the power of God expected or required in them to prove an hidden truth, without just cause: because there are other means appointed to find out men's faults, which also if they fail, such things may be unknown without any fault.

20. Of the same kind are single Duells, or monomachies, which of old were permitted by public authority, and are yet too much frequented: for in them the righteousness of the cause is committed to be decided by the singular providence of God from that success which he is thought to give according to his Justice, without any certain and just reason.

21. Beside these temptings which do properly pertain to trial, there is also a tempting as it were of inducement, towards God, when there is required, or expected help from him to commit some heinous wickedness.

20. Yet those inducements may fithly enough be referred to temptation of trial: because the Will of God is tried in them. They differ from others in this only, that that object about which the Will of God is tried, is an action in it self unlawful, in which respect, the honor of God is specially hurt and violated: because together with the temptation there is joined a certain most foul mocking of God.

23. Tempting or proving of God is sometime taken in good part, and is commanded, Mat. 3. 10. Try me now in this, saith the Lord of Hosts.

24. But this tempting is an act of Faith, leading us to obey and practice those things which God hath commanded; with expectation of that fruit and blessing which God hath promised.

25. This lawful tempting of God doth put back all the temptations of the Devil.

26. That unlawful tempting of God doth lay us open to the temptations of the Devil, neither are we ever overcome by any temptation of the Devil, unless we do in a sort tempt God.

CHAPTER XIII.

Of instituted worship.

1. INstituted worship is the means ordained by the Will of God, to exercise and further natural worship.

2. All such like means ordained of God are declared in the second Commandment, by forbidding all contrary means of worship devised by men, under the title of Graven and Image: which seeing they were of old the chief inventions of men corrupting the worship of God, they are most fitly (by a Synecdoche frequent in the Decalogue) put instead of all devises of man's wit pertaining to worship.

3. This worship doth not depend In specie, and immediately upon the nature of God, or upon that honor w•...ch by virtue of our Creation we owe to God, but upon the most free institution of God.

4. Hence this worship was divers according to the divers constitution of the Church; one befo•... Christ exhibited, and another after.

5. It is a means having relation to the natural worship, otherwise it were not worship, because one cannot give that honor to God which is due to him, as touching the essence of the act any other way then by Faith, hope, and Love, whereby we do receive from God with due subjection, those things he propounds to us to be received, & with the same subjection we offer to him those things which may be offered by us to his honor. But because the acts themselves are in a special manner exercised in those things, which God hath instituted for his honor, therefore there is in them a certain secondary worship, and a certain partaking of the former.

6. But it hath in respect to that natural worship the affection of an effect, which existeth by virtue of the former: and of a means and instrument, whereby Faith, Hope, and Love, (in which that worship is contained) do exercise their acts; and of an adjuvant cause whereby they are furthered, and also of an adjunct to which they are subjected.

7. But it is properly called worship, as it is a means and helping cause of that primary worship.

8. But because, the command of God being put, it depends and flows from the primary worship of God, therefore it is oft persuaded, and urged by those arguments which are taken from the inward and essential manner of worshipping God, as in the second precept. They that love me, and keep by Commandments. Deut. 10. 12, 13. What doth the Lord thy God require of thee, but that thou fear the Lord thy God, walk in all his ways, & that thou love him, & worship the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and all thy soul: observing the precepts of the Lord, and his Statutes.

9. That rule therefore of interpreting the Scriptures which is wont to be delivered by some is not universally true; that all those duties moral and immutable, which have moral and immutable reasons joined to them; except it be thus understood, that those duties do follow upon those reasons, no special command coming between. Lev. 11. 44. I am the Lord your God, that sanctify you, that ye may be holy, as I am holy •...t defile not therefore yourselves with any creeping thing.

10. No worship of this kind is lawful, unless it hath God for the Author, and ordainer of it. Deut. 4. 2. & 12. 32. Keep you all things which I shall command you, Ad not to the word which command you, neither take from it, everything which I command you observe to do: ad not to it, nor take from it everything which I command you observe to do: ad not to it, nor take from. 1. Chron. 16. 13. Our Lord broke in upon us, because we did not seek him aright.

11. That is declared in those words of the Commandment. Thou shalt not make to thyself: that is of thine own brain or judgment, for although that particle to thyselfe, doth sometimes either abound, or hath another force: yet here the most accurate brevity of these Commandments doth exclude redundancy, and it is manifest that the vanity of man's cogitations is excluded by other places of Scripture pertaining to the same thing. As Amos 5. 26. Which ye made to yourselves. Numb. 15. 39. That ye follow not after your own heart and your own eyes, which when ye follow; ye go a whoring.

12. The same is also declared by that universality of the prohibition, which is explained in the Commandment by a distribution of the things which are in Heaven above, or in the Earth beneath, or in the Waters under the Earth.

13. For none beside God himself can either understand what will be acceptable to him: or can add that virtue to any worship whereby, it may be made effectual and profitable for us; neither can there be anything honorable to God, which comes not from him as the author of it, neither finally do we read that such a power was at any time given to any man by God, to ordain any worship at his own pleasure. Matthew 15. 9. In vain do thy worship me, •...eaching for doctrines the precepts of men.

14. Hence implicitly and by interpretation of God himself, we make him our God, and give the honor due to God to him, whose authority or ordinances we subject ourselves unto in religious worship.

15. In this respect also men are sometime said to worship the Devil, when they observe those worships which the Devil brought in. 1. Cor. 10. 20. Levite. 17. 7. Deut. 32. 17.

16. But we must observe that worship which God hath appointed with the same religion, as we receive his word or will, or call upon his name Deut. 6. 17, 18. & 12. 25. 28. & 13. 18. & 28. 14.

17. The means which God hath ordained in this kind, some of them do properly, and immediately make to the exercising and furthering of Faith, Hope and Charity; as public and solemn preaching of the word, celebration of Baptism, and the Lord's Supper, and prayer.

And some of them are means for the right performance of those former, as the combination of the faithful into certain Congregations or Churches, Election, Ordination, and Ministration of Ministers ordained by God, together with the care of Ecclesiastical Discipline.

18. Those former are most properly the instituted worship of God; yet the rest are also worship, not only in that general respect, as all things are said to be acts of worship and religion, which do any way flow from, or are guided by religion; but also in their special nature, because the adequate end and use of them is, that God may be rightly worshipped.

19. All these therefore both in general, and in special ought to be observed of us as they are appointed by God; for God must be worshipped by us with his own worship, totally and solely, nothing must here be added, taken away or changed. Deut. 12. 32.

20. That is a very empty distinction, whereby some go about to excuse their additions. That only addition corrupting, and not addition conserving is forbidden; because every addition as well as detraction is expressly opposed to observation, or conservation of the commands of God, as being a corruption. Deut. 12. 32.

21. Of like stamp also is that evasion whereby they say there is forbidden only addition of essentials, and not of accidentals: for first although there be accidents or certain adjuncts of worship, yet there is no worship to be simply called accidental, because it hath in it the very essence of worship. Secondly, as the least commands of God even to Iotaes and Titles are religiously to be observed, Mat. 5. 18. 19. So additions which seem very small, are by the same reason to be rejected. Thirdly, Moses doth seal up even those laws of the place of Divine worship, of the manner, of abstinence from blood, and the like which must needs be referred to accidental worship if any such be, with this very caution of not adding, or taking away. Deut. 12. 32.

22. This observation is in a special manner called obedience, because by it we do that which seems right in the eyes of the Lord, although some other may seem righter in our eyes. Deut. 12. 25. 28.

23. There is opposed unto this instituted worship, as unlawful, that will-worship which is devised by men. Mat. 15. 9. Col. 2. 23.

24. The sin which is committed in will-worship, is by a general name called superstition.

25. Superstition is that whereby undue worship is yielded to God.

26. For in superstition God is always the object, and the end in some measure, but the worship it self i... unlawful.

27. It is called undue worship, either in respect of the manner or measure, or in respect of the matter and substance of the worship. In the former manner the Pharisees offended about the Sabbath, when they urged the observation of it as touching the outward rest, above the manner and measure appointed by God. And they also offended in the latter manner, in observing and urging their own traditions, Marc. 7. 8.

28. Hence superstition is called an excess of religion, not in respect of the formal power of religion, because so none can be too religious; but in respect unto the acts and means of religion.

29. This excess is not only in those positive exercises, which consists in the use of things, but also in abstinence from the use of some things, as from meats, which are accounted unclean and unlawful, and the like.

30. Yet every abstinence, even from things lawful, although they be counted unlawful, is not superstition, to speak properly, unless there be some special worship and honor intended to God by that abstinence.

31. This undue worship is either properly opposed to that worship, wherein instituted worship is directly put forth and exercised, that is, in hearing the word celebration of the Sacraments, and prayer; or to that which respects the means of it.

32. Unto the hearing of the word is opposed, first, A teaching by images devised by men. Deut. 4. 15. 16. Is. 40. 18. & 41. 29. Ierem. 10. 8. 15. Heb. 2. 18. Secondly, a vinting of traditions as they are propounded as rules of religion, Mat. 7. 8.

33. Religious teaching by Images is condemned, first, because they are not sanctified by God to that end: secondly, because they can neither represent to us God himself, nor the perfections of God; thirdly, because they debase the soul, and turn away the attention from spiritual contemplation of the Will of God; fourthly, because if they be once admitted into the exercises of worship, the worship it self by the perverseness of man's wit, at least, in part, will be transferred to them: as it is declared in those words of the Commandment. Thou shalt not bow down to them, nor worship them.

34. Of like kind with Images, are all those ceremonies, which are ordained by men for mystical or religious signification.

35. For such ceremonies have no determinate power to teach, either by any power put into them by nature, or by divine institution: but they can receive none by human institution, because man can effect this neither by commanding, seeing it is beyond his authority, nor by obtaining, seeing GOD hath promised no such thing to him that asketh.

36. Neither can men take to themselves any authority in ordaining such ceremonies, from that, that it is commanded to all Churches, that all things be done decently, and in order. 1. Cor. 14. 40. For neither the respect of order nor decency requires, that some holy things should be newly ordained, but that those which are ordained by God, be used in that manner, which is agreeable to their dignity; neither do order and decency pertain to holy things only, but also to civil duties; for confusion and indecency in both are vices opposite to that due manner which is required to the attaining the just end and use of them.

37. To the Sacraments are opposed. 1. Sacrifices properly so called, whether they be bloody or unbloody, as the Papists fain of their Mass: for after Christ exhibited, all old sacrifices are abrogated: neither is there any new ordinance, because the sacrifice of Christ being once offered we have no need of other types, then those which pertain to the exhibition and sealing of Christ bestowed on us, which is sufficiently by God's ordinance performed in the Sacraments, (without Sacrifices.)

38. Also the ordination and use of new seals, o... ceremonies sealing some grace of God is opposed to the Sacraments: for it belongs to him to seal grace, to whom it belongs to give it.

39. Unto prayer is opposed that relative use of Images, whereby God is worshipped at them, or before them, although the worship is not referred to the Images themselves, as some say, subjectively, but objectively by them to GOD alone.

40. Superstition of this kind is called idolatry. Exod. 32. 5. Psal. 106. 20. Acts 7. 41.

41. If they be idols, which are in themselves worshipped instead of God, it is that idolatry which is against the first Commandment; but when the true... God is worshipped at an Image, or in an Image, this i... idolatry, which is against the second Commandment.

42. For although in respect of the intention of hi... that worshippeth, he doth not offend in the primary or highest object, yet from the nature of the thing i... self he always offends against the formal worship o... God, and interpretatively also a new God is fain... for the object, who is delighted with such worship, an... religious worship is given also to the Image it self, although it be not done with that purpose that that worship be lastly bounded in the Image, but that it be by that directed also to God himself.

43. Hence we must not only shun this idolatry' as well as that absolute idolatry▪ which is against the first Commandment: but also the very idols, and idolothites, or the things that are dedicated to Idols, and all the monuments properly so called of Idols, 1. John 5. 21. 1. Corinthians 8. 10. & 10. 18. 19. 21. 2. Cor. 12. 6. 26. Numbers 33. 52. Deut. 12. 2. 3. Exod. 23, 13.

44. Superstition of the second kind is in human forms of the Church, such as are Churches that are visibly integrally, and Organically, Ecumenical, Provincial, and Diocesan, brought in by men; as also in the Hierarchy agreeable to them, and orders of religious persons, who are found among the Papists, and in functions, and censures which are exercised by them.

45. The audaciousnesse of those men is intolerable who either omit the second Commandment, or teach it ought to be so maimed, that it should be read now under the New Testament. Thou shalt not adore nor worship any likeness, or Image.

CHAPTER XIII.

Of the manner of Divine worship.

THE adjuncts of worship especially to be observed are two: The manner which is contained in the third Commandment, and the time which is commanded in the fourth Commandment.

4. But these two are so adjuncts of religious worship, as that in a certain secondary respect they partake the definition and nature of it, because by the observation of them not only that honor of God, which consists in the natural and instituted worship of God is furthered; but also a certain special honor is yielded to him as far forth as they are joined to the other, both by his command, and by a direct and immediate respect.

3. The manner of worship in general is the lawful use of all those things which pertain to GOD.

4. But the lawful use consists in this, that all thing•... which pertain to worship be so handled, as is agreeable to the Majesty of God.

5. For whereas it is forbidden in the third Commandment, Thou shalt not take the name of God i•... vain; by the Name of God all those things are under stood, whereby God is made known to us, or re veales himself, as men are wont to be known one t•... another by their names: so that the Name of God co•... taines all those things which pertain to the worship <◇
> God, whether natural, or instituted. Act. 9. 15. That h•... may bear my name among the Gentiles. Deut. 12. 5•... The place which the Lord shall choose to place his na•... there. Mich. 4. 5. We will walk in the Name of t•... Lord our God. Mal. 1. 11. 12. My name shall be gr•... among the Gentiles.

6. But seeing to take this Name in vain is either t•... take it rashly, that is either without any end propou•... ded, or without a just and fit end: or to take it in vain that is, not in that manner which is required to the judgment, namely, the honor of God; there is withal commanded that we sanctify the Name of God, that we use all holy things in that manner which is suitable to their holiness and dignity. Isaiah 1. 13.

7. That suitable manner is, when those circumstances are used which the nature of religious things requires.

8. We define this manner by circumstances; because the essential manner of virtues, and of the acts of religion is contained in the virtues and acts themselves and is directly commanded in the same precepts with them; but that accidental manner which is in circumstances, seeing it is in some sort separable from the acts of Religion, and yet is necessarily required to them, that they may be acceptable to God, is in a special manner commanded in this third Commandment.

9. These circumstances are either inward or outward.

10. The inward are either antecedent, or going before; concomitant or accompanying with; consequent, or following after.

11. The circumstances going before are a desire, and stirring up of the mind, or preparation in a due meditation of these things which pertain to that holy thing, which is to be handled. Eccles. 5. 1. 2. Take heed to thy feet when thou enterest into the House of God: Bee not swift with thy mouth, and let not thy mind hasten to utter a thing before God.

12. But this preparation doth most properly pertain to those acts of religion, which are more solemn: for meditation it self whereby the mind is stirred up, is an act of Religion, but it doth not require another preparation also before it, for so we should proceed without end: but those acts which are of their nature less perfect, ought to make way for the more perfect and more solemn acts.

13. Hence before public and solemn hearing the word and prayer, private prayer is required, and also before private prayer, if it be solemn, there is required some meditation also of those things which pertain to our prayers, whether in respect of God whom we pray unto, or in respect of ourselves who are about to pray, or in respect of the things themselves which are to be asked.

14. The circumstances that are concomitant or that accompany with, are Reverence, and Devotion.

15. A certain general reverence of God is necessary to all obedience, which respects the authority of God that doth command; but this reverence is proper to the acts of Religion, which hath respect to the holiness of those things about which we are exercised.

16. This Reverence contains two things. 1. A due estimation of the excellency of such things. 2. A fear of too much familiarity, namely, whereby such things might be unworthily handled by us.

17. Devotion also contains two things. 1. A certain singular readiness to perform all those things which pertain to the worship of God. Psal. 108. 23. O God, I will sing with a fixed heart. I will awake right early. 2. A suitable delight in performing those things. If. 58. 13. If thou shalt call the Sabbath a delight.

18. Hence also a greater care and of another kind must be had in hearing the Word of God, then in receiving the Edicts of Princes; And in calling upon the Name of God then in supplications, which we make to men whomsoever.

19. The circumstances that follow after are two. 1. To retain the force and taste as it were, of that worship in our minds. 2. To obtain with all our endeavor, the end, and use of it.

20. The outward circumstances are those which pertain to order and decency. 1. Cor. 14. 40. Let all things be done decently and in order.

21. But the general rule of these is, that they be ordered in that manner which maketh most for edification. 1. Cor. 14. 26.

22. Of this nature are the circumstances of place, time, and the like, which are common adjuncts of religious and civil acts.

23. Therefore although such like circumstances are wont to be called of some rites, and religious or Ecclesiastical ceremonies: Yet they have nothing in their nature, which is proper to religion, and therefore religious worship doth not so properly consist in them, however the holiness of religious worship is in some sort violated by the neglect, and contempt of them: because that common respect of order and decency which doth equally agree to religious, and civil actions cannot be severed from religious worship, but the dignity and majesty thereof is in some sort diminished.

24. Such like circumstances therefore which of their own nature are civil or common, are not particularly commanded in the Scriptures, partly because they come into men's common sense, and partly because it would not stand with the dignity and majesty of the Law of God, that such things should be severally prescribed in it. For by this means many ridiculous things should have been provided for by a special Law, as for example, that in the Church assembly one should not place himself in another's bosom, spit in another's face, or should not make mouths in holy actions. Yet they are to be accounted as commanded from God. 1. Because they are commanded in general under the Law of order, decency and edification. 2. Because most of them do necessarily follow from those things which are expressly appointed by God. For when God appointed that the faithful of all sorts, should meet together to celebrate his name and worship, he did consequently ordain that they should have a fit, and convenient place wherein they may meet together, and an hour also assigned at which they may be present together; when also there is a Minister appointed by God, to teach others publicly, it is withal appointed that he have a seat, and that situation of his body, which is meet for such an action.

25. Those things therefore which pertain to order and decency, are not so left to men's will, that they may under the name of that, obtrude what they please upon the Churches: but they are partly determined by the general precepts of God, partly by the nature of the things themselves, and partly by those circumstances which do offer themselves upon occasion.

26. For divers circumstances of order and decency are such, as though there be no public institution of them, yet they ought to be observed of everyone, neither can men forbid them without sin.

27. But those constitutions by which many circumstances of this kind are wont to be determined, about, place, time and the like, are rightly said to be by the best Divines partly Divine, and partly human: because they are partly grounded upon the Will of God, in respect of the chief and primary reason of them, and they depend partly upon the prudence of men, in respect of particular observation of those things which are agreeable to the Will of God: yet so that if there be no error of man in making that determination, that constitution is to be held as simply Divine. For it is the Will of God, that the Church meet at that hour of the day, which (all circumstances considered) is most convenient. If therefore there be no error in observation of the circumstances, that hour which by their due consideration is assigned for meeting, must be acknowledged as if it were appointed by God.

28. The special manner of the worship of God must be specially determined, as the special nature of every religious action doth require.

29. Hitherto pertaineth the right manner of hearing the Word of God, calling upon his name, receiving the Sacraments, exercising Ecclesiastical Discipline, and of performing all those several things, which pertain either to the natural or instituted worship of God. Ezech. 33. 31. Mat. 13. 19. 1. Cor. 11. 27. 29. Isaiah 66. 5.

30. But because in Oaths the manner of swearing is wont to be chiefly respected, therefore (not without all reason) it is wont to be by many referred to this place in the third Commandment, although of its own nature it pertain to the first. Leviticus 19. 12. Mat. 5. 34. 2. Chron. 36. 13.

31. Contrary to this due manner in the general is. 1. That vice which is called of some Acedia loathing, whereby one loatheth Divine or spiritual things. 2. Tim. 4. 3. Which is opposed to that desire, whereby we ought to have an appetite to spiritual things. 1. Pet. 2. 2.

32. 2. That slothfulness whereby one shuns that cheerfulness and labor that is required to Divine things. Rom. 12. 11. Which is opposed to that stirring up and heat of mind, whereby Divine things are to be prosecuted. Rom. 12. 11. & Psal. 57, 8, 9.

33. 3. Neglect and contempt of holy things, and the abuse of the same to filthy sporting, and light matters, all which are opposed to that reverence due to holy things, Luc. 19. 46.

34. 4. Dulness and wandering of mind in exercises of worship. Heb. 5. 11. Ezech. 33. 31. And it is opposed to devotion, such as was in Cornelius, Act. 10. 2.

35. 5. Rashness or lightness in using, either the name, or titles of God, or those things which have some special respect to God. Ier. 23. 34. Luc. 13. 1. And it is opposed to that prosecuting of a just end, which ought to be present with reverence in the use, of such thi...gs. 1. Cor. 11. 17.

36. 6. Forgetfulness. James 1. 24, 25. Which is opposed to the receiving of fruit, and abiding of the virtue which ought to follow the acts of religion.

37. 7. Confusion, which is opposed to order and decency. 1. Cor. 14. 33.

CHAPTER XV.

Of the time of worship.

1. THE most solemn time of worship is now the first day of every week which is called the Lord's day, Rev. 1. 10. 1. Cor. 16. 2.

2. And it is called the Lord's Day, by the same reason that the holy Supper of the Eucharist is called the Lord's Supper. 1. Cor. 11. 20. Namely because it was instituted by our Lord Jesus Christ, and it must be referted to the same Lord in the end and use of it.

3. It is necessary that some time be given for the worship of God, by the dictate of natural reason: for man must needs have time for all, especially his outward actions; neither can he conveniently attend Divine worship, unless for that time he cease from other works.

4. Thus far therefore the time of worship falls upon the same precept with the worship it self; for as when God created the whole world, he is said also to have created time together with it; so also when he commanded, and ordained religious actions, he did also withal command and ordain some time or necessary circumstance.

5. That some certain day is to be ordained for the more solemn worship of God, this is also of moral natural right, not unknown to the very heathen, who had always through all ages their set and solemn feast days.

6. That this solemn day ought to be one at least in a week or in the compass of seven; this belongs to positive Law, but yet it is altogether of unchangeable institution: so that in respect of our duty and obligation, it hath the very same force and reason with those that are of moral and natural right, and so it is rightly said of the Schoolmen, to belong to moral right; not of nature, but of Discipline.

7. That this institution was not ceremonial, and temporal; it appears sufficiently by this, that it hath nothing proper to the Jews, or to the time of the ceremonial Law; for none can, or dare deny, but that such determination might be made, at least for a moral reason and benefit, because although natural reason doth not dictate the very same determination as necessary, yet it dictates it as convenient, as it doth apprehend it to be fit that the worship of God be frequently exercised, and it cannot but acknowledge this determination in respect of the frequency of the days to be in this respect convenient.

8. The same also is manifest by this that from the beginning of the Creation, when there was no place for ceremonies that had respect to Christ the Redeemer the seventh day, or one of seven was set apart for the worship of God, Gen. 2. 3.

9. For whereas some do contend, that this was spoken by a prolepsis or anticipation; or that the seventh day was at that time sanctified in the mind and purpose of God, not in execution: or that then there was a foundation laid of that sanctification to come; and not the obligation or Law it self. This may be refuted by divers arguments. For 1. This anticipation never came into any man's mind, who was not before anticipated with prejudice about the observation of the Lord's Day. The Jews of old did never dream of it; whose received opinion was, that this feast was 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 among all Nations from the beginning of the World. Philo 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . 14. In the New Testament there is no such thing taught or declared. The authors themselves of this opinion do grant it to be probable, that some observation of the seventh day, did begin from the beginning of the Creation. Suarez de diebus Fest. The best interpreters (Luther, Calvin, &c.) Whom none will affirm to have offended on that side in giving too much to the Lord's Day, do simply, and candidly acknowledge, that the seventh day was sanctified from the beginning of the World. 2. There can be no example given of such like anticipation in all the Scripture: for although the name of certain places are sometime used, proleptically, especially in the book of Genesis, yet there is no mention at all of such a proleptical Institution, either in that book, or in any other of the whole sacred Scripture. 3. The words and phrases of the very place evince the contrary. Gen. 2. 2, 3. For the perfection of the Creation is twice joined together with the sanctification of the seventh day in the very same manner and phrase, as the Creation both of other Creatures and of man himself, is joined with their blessing. Genesis 1. 21. 22. 27. 28. 4. Neither the purpose of God, nor a naked foundation of the thing it self sufficeth, to ground and uphold such a phrase of Sanctification and Benediction. For by this reason it might be said, that God sanctified Water, Bread and Wine for the Sacraments of the New Covenant, from the time that he gave the promise of breaking the Serpents head by the seed of the woman. Genesis 3. 15. For then God did purpose to seal that covenant of grace by such seals, some foundation of which seals also was laid partly in the promise it self, and partly in the creation of those thi•...gs which might actually be used to such sealing. 5. From such a foundation laid in the first Crea•...ion, the Prophet gathers a perpetual rule and Law. Malac. 2. 15. Did he not make one? and why one? To seek a godly seed. So in like manner may we: did not God rest the seventh day? and why the seventh day? to sanctify the seventh day to God. 6. Upon this very thing the arguing of the Apostle seems to be grounded, Hebrews 4. 3, 4, 5, 7, 8, 9. Which is thus. There was a double rest mentioned in the Old Testament, whereof the godly were made partakers in this life. One was of the Sabbath, and the other was of the Land of Canaan: but David Psalm 95. promissing rest, speaketh not of the rest of the Sabbath, because that was from the beginning of the World: nor of the rest in the Land of Canaan, because that was past, not to be expected. To day therefore he understands a certain third rest, that is, eternal in Heaven.

10. Neither doth it anything hinder this truth, that it is not recorded in the History of Genesis, that the observation of the seventh day was solemnly kept by the first Patriarchs. For

1. All and everything which was observed by them for a thousand and five hundred years, neither could nor ought to be particularly declared in so short a History as is that of Gensis. Also after the Law of the Sabbath delivered by Moses, there is no mention in the book of Judges and some other Histories, of the observation of it. 2. If this very thing be granted that the observation of this day was for the most part neglected, yet this ought no more to make the first institution doubtful, then Polygamy of the same times can show that the sacred Laws of Wedlock were not equal in time with the very first marriage. 3. Before the promulgation of the Law in Mount Sinas, the observation of the Law is propounded and urged, not as a new thing, but ordained of old. Exodus 16. 24. 30. Which although it may be affirmed of sacrifices and some other ceremonial observations, yet in the Sabbath, there seems to be for the reasons before put, a certain respect had unto the first institution, which was equal in time with man's Creation, which is also declared in the 30. Verse in that word of the time past, hath given you, &c. 4. Among the very Heathens, there were always those foot-steps of the observation of the seventh day, that it is more then probable, that the observation of the seventh day was delivered them from those Patriarchs whose posterity they were.

Josephus in his last book against Appion, denies, That there can be found a nicity either of the Greeks or Barbarians, which had not taken the resting from labor on the seventh Day, into their own manners. Clemens Alexandrinus Lib. 5. Stromat. doth demonstrate the same thing also: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . That not only the Hebrews, but the Greeks also observe the seventh Day. Euseb. de praeparatione Euangelica lib. 13. affirmeth, that not only the Hebrews, but almost all as well Philosophers as Poëts, did know that the seventh day was more holy. Lampridius in Alexandro Severo, tells that on the seventh day, when he was in the City, he went up to the Capitol and frequented the Temples. Neither is it far from this purpose that holy days were wont to be granted to children in Schools on the seventh day. Lucianus in Pseudologista, Aulus Gellius. li. 13. cap. 2. And some heathen Doctors, were wont to dispute only upon the Sabbaths, as Suetonius relates of one Diogenes, lib. 3. Hesiod. lib. 2. Dierum. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . Li...s 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

5. The former forgetfulness or carelessness, and neglect of this day, is easily seen to be reproved by that same horratory word, which is used in the beginning of the fourth Commandment. Remember.

11. But the right, and moral perpetual authority of this institution is most of all declared from this, that it is expressly commanded in the Decalogue; for this is a most certain rule, and received among all the best Divines; That moral precepts were thus differenced from ceremonials and Iudicalls, that all and only moralls were publicly proclaimed before all the people of Israel from Mount Sinai, by the voice of God himself, and afterward also written, and written again as it were by the finger of God himself, and that in Tables of stone, to declare their perpetual and unchangeable continuance; Christ also doth expressly testify that not one Iot, or tittle of this Law should perish. Matthew 5. 18.

12. That which is commanded in the fourth Commandment, is not indeed of a moral nature in the same degree and manner altogether with those things that are commanded, for the most part in all the other Commandments; because it belongs to positive right, whence also it is, that whereas the three former Commandments were propounded negatively, by forbidding those vices unto which we are prone by the pravity of our nature, this fourth Commandment is first propounded affirmatively in declaring and commanding that which in this part pertains unto our duty, and afterward negatively, by forbidding those things which are repugnant to this duty; which also is in part the reason of that admonition which is specially prefixed before this precept, Remember the Sabbath day, that is, Remember to keep this day, as it is explained, Deut. 5. 18. Because it may more easily be forgotten, seeing it belongs to positive right, then many other things which are more natural. Yet this positive right upon which this ordinance is grounded, is Divine right, and in respect of man altogether unchangeable.

13. Those who turn this fourth Commandment into allegories of a cessation from sins, and from the troubles of this life, and such like, and thence do fain a fourfold, or a fivefold Sabbath, according to their manner, who play with Allegories, they attribute nothing at all to this member of the decalogue, which doth not as well, and much more properly agree to many Jewish ceremonies, which are now wholly abrogated.

14. But those that would have this precept ceremonial (as they would have the second to be also) besides that they are sufficiently refuted, by those things which have been spoken before, they contradict the express testimony of Scripture, which affirms that ten words, or moral precepts are contained in the decalogue, Exod. 34. 18. Deut. 4. 13. & 10. 4. Where they leave only nine, or rather eight.

15. They who would have that only to be moral in this precept, that some time, or some certain days, should be assigned to Divine worship, do no more make this ordinance to be moral, then was the building of the Tabernacle and Temple among the Jews. For by that very thing this was declared to all to be the perpetual Will of God, that some fit place is always to be appointed for Church meetings, and public exercises of Divine worship: so that by this reason, there is no more a moral precept given touching some time of worship, then there is given touching the place, and so neither that indeed (which only they leave in the fourth precept.) Thou shalt observe Feast-days, ought anymore to be put in the Decalogue then this, Thou shalt frequent the Temples.

16. Moreover, the yearly Feasts, new Moons, and the like ordinances, which were merely ceremonial, do contain that general equity also in them, and do still teach us that some certain and fit days ought to be appointed for public worship: finally, by this reason God should by this Commandment command several men, nothing at all: for seeing the institution of days by this opinion is only commanded immediately, and it is not in the power of private men to ordain these or those days for public worship, by this, means nothing at all should be commanded but at their will who are in public office: neither should anything be commanded them in special, but only in general, that they do according to their wisdom in setting apart days to public worship, so that if it seem good to them to appoint one day of twenty or thirty to this use, they cannot be reproved of any sin in this respect, as if they broke this Commandment.

17. If there were ever anything ceremonial in the Sabbath in respect of the very observation of the day, that is to be accounted for a thing added to it, or a constitution coming extrinsically, beyond the nature of the Sabbath, and the first institution of it; and so it nothing hinders but the institution of the seventh day was simply moral: for so there was a ceremonial respect of some type added to some other Commandments, as in the authority of Fathers, and the first borne of Families, which pertain to the first Commandment, there was a certain adumbration of Christ, who is the first begotten among the Sons of God.

18. Neither yet doth it certainly appear in the Scriptures, that there was any ceremony properly so called, or type, in the observation of the seventh day: for whereas Heb. 4. 9. there is mention made of a spiritual Sabbatism, prefigured before by a type, it is under the respect of a type referred only to the rest promised in the Land of Canaan, and by comparison of things like to the rest of God; but in no sort, or in the least signification is it referred to the rest commanded in the fourth Commandment, as unto a type or shadow.

19. But whereas in Exod. 31. 13. 17. And Ezech. 20. 20. The Sabbath is called a sign between God and his people, it cannot thence be made a type or representation of any future grace: Because 1. A sign doth often note the same that an argument, or instruction, as also the most learned interpreters do note upon. Exodus 31. It is a sign between me, &c. that is, an instruction. So our mutual love is a sign that we are the Disciples of Christ. John 13. 35. But it is not a type. 2. The Sabbath in those places is not said to be a sign of something to come, but present, as every visible concomitant adjunct is a sign of the subject being present. For in the observation of the Sabbath there is a common, and public profession of that communion which is between God and us: as therefore all solemn profession is a sign of that thing whereof it is a profession, so also the Sabbath is in that common respect called a sign.

20. And this is the most proper reason, why the observation of the Sabbath is so much urged, and the breaking of it so severely punished in the Old Testament: namely because there was in the Sabbath a common and public profession of all Religion; for this Commandment as it is a close of the first Table of the Law, doth thus summarily contain the whole worship of God, whilst it commands a certain day for all the exercises thereof. Isaiah 56. 2.
