Project Note – V2

This Work is Licensed Under 4.0 International (CC BY-NC-SA 4.0)

The initial content of this document was downloaded from the Early English Books Online (EEBO-TCP) website. The books were transcribed in a character for character manner and since there was no standard spelling during that time, it can be a bit cumbersome to read, with variations such as "unlesse", "vnlesse", and "vnles" appearing regularly.

With that in mind, this project is intended to clean up those books as much as possible and make them more accessible to the interested reader. A list of variant spellings and their corrections was utilized to clean up the text, but this is only as comprehensive as the list itself. Because of the nature of the original transcription, some words have missing characters or places where the original language (e.g., Greek) was not transcribed. The original text also contained linked footnotes and these have not been incorporated. Included in these works are some, but very limited text taken from other public domain sources.

Although this is admittedly no substitute for a properly proofread and scholarly edition, we believe that the result is a body of work which is far more accessible, particularly for searching and reading, than its predecessor (though our thankfulness for EEBO-TCP cannot be expressed.) The documents have been cleaned and presented to the best of our present ability, in what we hope is a pleasing and useful format for the vast majority of Christian brothers and sisters who desire to access and read these spiritually nourishing works.

For the sake of this collection, it has attempted to take a traditional theological as well as historical approach to Puritan research, meaning that, while there were some Arminian Puritans, those have been omitted if observed, and also, while there were other Non-Conformists that were Catholic, Quaker, Brownist, Pilgrims, etc., this collection has tried to observe only works from theologically reformed Puritans; Baptist, Presbyterian, and Congregational Non-Conformists; as well as CoE or Anglican clergy that were sympathetic or assistive to the Puritan cause. Furthermore, this collection only contains works from the period between 1500-1700, not just because that is the standard historical period of Puritanism, but because this is also the limit of the works found on EEBO-TCP. This is not an exhaustive collection of Puritan/Non-Conformist works, but a collection of those pertinent works which were located on EEBO-TCP which enables the searching thereof by their conversion from facsimile to text. The reason the alphabetical flow of the authors in these titles are not perfectly in order, is because many names were added well into the compiling of these texts, and we had to choose between prolonging publication to start over, or continue and publish with the names somewhat out of order.

Finally, please forgive our eagerness in the midst of imperfection in offering such an errant publication. Given the sheer number of texts, time constraints, and other duties; this is the best we can offer for now; yet, knowing the spiritual treasures within these pages, we pray that this effort, though feeble, will still result in the edification of His Church, in the name of our Lord Jesus Christ, to the glorification of our Gracious God. All of the text and titles included in these works are in the public domain, and can be used in any way; for profit or otherwise, by anybody or entity. Only this specific derivative and creative work is bound by the creative common license listed above. -- Soli Deo Gloria

PRIMA, THE FIRST THINGS, In reference to The Middle and Last Things: Or, The Doctrine of REGENERATION, THE NEW BIRTH, The very beginning of a godly life. Delivered by ISAAC AMBROSE, Minister of the Gospel at PRESTON in Amounderness in Lancashire.

1 COR. 5.17. If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: Old things are passed away, behold all things are become new.

LONDON: Printed by J.F. for I.A. and are to be sold by Nathanael Webb and William Grantham, at the Greyhound in Paul's Church-yard. MDCL.

To the Worshipful, The MAYOR, ALDERMEN, And other INHABITANTS IN The Town of Preston in Amounderness.

THE Apostle Peter knowing (as he saith) that shortly he was to put off that his tabernacle of the flesh, as our Lord Jesus Christ had shown him; he therefore endeavored that God's people, after his decease, might have those things he taught them always in remembrance: And thus it came to pass, that to this day we have that portion of holy Writ which he then left in writing. If Peters practice be imitable in this kind, I suppose the same duty lies on me. Revelation I have none, but many stitches and infirmities, which I take to be fore-runners of my departure hence. Some things, and amongst the rest, these First Things, I have taught you; what remains now, but that after my decease you might have these things always in remembrance? To that purpose, the same I delivered once to your ears, I now present to your eyes; as you were then pleased to hear them, so I trust you will now peruse them: Only one thing you may please to observe through this Treatise, That whereas in the Name of Christ I often Beseech, Exhort, Command the unregenerate to believe, to be reconciled to God, to pray, to fall on this or that duty, it is not as if they could do anything of their own strength or power; but because Jesus Christ, in Exhorting, Entreating, Commanding, puts forth his own power, and his own strength to enable them. While Paul exhorted the Goaler to believe in the Lord Jesus, that he might be saved, God enabled the Goalor to believe. Life and power is conveyed to the soul, in Gospel-Commands and Exhortations. While Ezekiel prophesied over dead bones, breath came into them, and they lived: so while the Prophets of the Lord do preach over sinful impenitent hearers, who are like to the Prophets dry bones, the breath of Heaven, the Spirit of the Most High in the Ministry of the Gospel, enters into them, and so they are made new creatures, and see the Kingdom of God. I have no more to say, only I beseech God you may receive a Blessing by these poor labors upon your poor souls: it is the hearty Prayer of Yours to be commanded in all Christian Services, Isaac Ambrose.

To his worthily much esteemed Friend, Mr. Isaac Ambrose.

SIR,

I Have perused your hearty Travel in this happy Birth; and therein (I dare say) as your industry and skill, so your interest and birthright, your Labor either way. This subject could not be so well handled, if not felt; he must himself be subject, as well as Author, that doth it so well. No man can be here Eloquent, unless Experient; Propriety of Title, can only here give Propriety of Language: How like the motion, the language of a Puppet in a Play is the best Pulpit-Pageant in this Theame of the uninterested man? My Prayer is that of the Apostle, That all of us Ministers may be (herein) able to comfort others, by the same comfort wherewith we ourselves are comforted of God: And what comfort like this, that makes us, with the woman, forget all our sorrows, for joy that the child is born? What is it (otherwise) to be born to learn, if we learn not thus to be born? Wisdom (saith Solomon) is good with an Inheritance; how good is this wisdom then, that by this New Birth not only preserves, but entitles to that Inheritance of the Saints in light? Wherein, that this your birth of that Birth may be to many Generations fruitful, is the Prayer of

Your true Friend, CHARLES HERLE.

To the Reverend AUTHOR, on his learned TREATISES, Intituled, Prima, Media & Ultima, THE First, Middle and Last Things.

The First, and Last, and Middle Things: What more?

Thus the well-furnished Scribe out of his store

Brings new and old. The First Things lay the Ground,

The Middle Build thereon; By th' Last All's crowned.

By the First Things Christians begin to live;

The Middle Things a further progress give

In Spiritual life; by th' Last they live forever:

Those things that God hath join'd, let no man sever.

The First Things wrought in me (Lord!) let me find,

And to the Middle so direct my mind,

That when the First and Middle Things are past,

I may enjoy my hopes; The Best at Last.

The new Birth.

JOH. 3.3.

Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God.

WE read in the former Chapter, John 2.23. When Jesus was at Jerusalem, at the feast of the Passover, many believed in his name when they saw the miracles which he did: Amongst those many, here is one of them (saith St. Austin;) what one? of all men the most unlikely is a Jew, of all Jews a Ruler, of all Rulers a Pharisee; Have any of the Rulers, or the Pharisees believed on him? But howsoever it seem thus unlikely unto us, the Spirit of God bloweth where it listeth; here is amongst many believers one Nicodemus, and he is a man of the Pharisees, a Ruler of the Jews; [verse. 1] a Jew, a Ruler, a Pharisee, God is able even of these stones to raise up children unto Abraham; yea, we see here (be they never so stony) our Savior melts one of them with a miracle, and by a new birth he will make him a son of Abraham indeed. A miracle brings him to Christ, and Christ brings him to a new birth: The first Nicodemus confesseth, [verse. 2] Rabbi (faith he to our Savior) we know that thou art a Teacher come from God, for no man can do these miracles that thou dost, except God be with him. The second our Savior affirmeth, as if he had answered, to say, I am sent from God, and not to be born again, will never help thee to Heaven; thy confession is right, that I am sent from God, but thy conversation is wrong, that art not born again: thou comest to me with confession of thy faith, but here is a further Catechism, another lesson; and therefore (as thou callest me Rabbi) if thou wilt be a Scholar in my School, thou must learn these principles, these rudiments, these first things, this text, this A, B, C, of Christian an Religion, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God.

In prosecution of which words (all tending to this one point of the new birth) we shall follow the order set down by the Holy Ghost, where is,

1. The necessity of it, no going to heaven without it, Except.
2. The generality of it, every man is bound to it, a man.
3. The manner of it, how a man is wrought in it, he must be born again.
4. The issue of it, what effects are annexed to it, the Kingdom of God, and sight of that Kingdom; a man that is born again shall see the Kingdom of God; and, Except a man be born again, he shall not see the Kingdom of God.

These be the branches, and of every of them (by God's assistance) we shall gather some fruit for the food of your souls. The first branch is the first word, Except.

Except]

THis Except is without exception, for unless we are new born, there is no going to Heaven: before we live here we are born, and before we live there we are new born; as no man comes into this world, but by the first birth, so impossible it is that any should go to Heaven in another world, but by the second birth: And this gives us the necessity of Regeneration.

Except a man be new born, [Doct.] he can never be saved. It is our Saviors speech, and he confirms it with a double asseveration, Verily, verily, I say unto thee. Twice verily, which we find not anywhere but in S. Johns Gospel, and nowhere in the Gospel so oft as on this argument: how then should we disbelieve this truth, where we have such a witness as Christ, such a testimony as his Verily, verily, I say unto thee?

Again, God the Father thus counsels, not only Nicodemus, but all the Jews of the old Church, saying, Make you a new heart, and a new spirit, for why will you die, O house of Israel? Ezek. 18.31. Notwithstanding all their privileges (for they are Israelites, to whom pertains the adoption, and the glory, and the Covenants, and the giving of the Law, and the service of God, and the promises, Rom. 9.4.) Yet here is one thing necessary, that must crown all the rest; they must have a new heart, and a new spirit, that is to say, they must be new born, or there is no way but death; from which death see how the Lord pulls them with his cords of love, alluring, wooing, questioning, Why will ye die, O house of Israel?

And yet again, not only the Son and the Father, but the Holy Ghost too will avouch this truth; He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the Churches; And what's that? To him that overcometh — will I give a white stone, and in the stone a new name written: yea, I will write upon him New Jerusalem, and I will write upon him my new name, Revel. 2.17. and 3.12. The meaning is, he that is new born, and so overcomes sin God's Spirit will give him his grace, the white stone, and his Kingdom, the new Jerusalem, and a new name, the name of filiation (saith a Modern) whereby truly he is called the new born Son of God. See here how old things being done away, all things are become new; by a new birth man hath got a new name, a new inheritance: and therefore as the Spirit, so the new birth is called a fire, that purgeth away dross, and makes souls bright and new, so that we must pass thorough this fire, or no passage into Paradise.

Nor is this Doctrine without reason or ground.

For, Except by the second birth, man is first unholy, and therefore most unfit to enter into Heaven: Without holiness no man shall see God, Heb. 12.14. And what is man before he is new born? if we look upon his soul, we may see it deformed with sin, defiled with lust, outraged with passions, overcarried with affections, pining with envy, burdened with gluttony, boiling with revenge, transported with rage, and thus is that Image of God transformed to the ugly shape of the Devil: Or should we take a more particular view, every faculty of the soul is full of iniquity; the understanding understands nothing of the things of God, 1 Cor. 2.14. the will wills nothing that is good, Rom. 6.20. the affections affect nothing of the Spirit, Gal. 5.17. In a word, the understanding is darkened, the will enthralled, the affections disordered, the memory defiled, the conscience benumbed, all the inner man is full of sin, and there is no part that is good, no not one. But what say we of the body? sure that is nothing better, it is a rotten carrion, altogether unprofitable, and good for nothing; should we view it in every part and member of it? the head contrives mischief, the eyes behold vanity, the ears let in sin, the tongue sends out oaths: Come we lower, the heart lodgeth lusts, the hands commit murder, the feet run to evil, all the senses are but so many matches to give fire to lusts, deceits, envies, and what not? How needful now is a new birth to a man in this case? Can he enter into heaven, that savors all of earth? Will those precious gates of gold and pearls open to a sinner? No, he must first be new molded, and sanctified, or he is excepted; Except a man be new born.

Secondly, Except] This, and man, is God's enemy; no greater opposition than betwixt God and a sinner: Consider we him in his essence, or in his attributes? in his essence he is called Jehovah, both in respect of his being, and of his promises; in respect of his being, and so God is contrary to sin; for sin is ataxy, disorder, confusion, a not-being; and God is order, perfection, holiness, an absolute and a simple being: in respect likewise of his promises, wherein there is a main opposition to sin; for howsoever he promiseth a reward to the regenerate, and so the name Jehovah is a golden pledge unto us, that if we repent, he will forgive us; yet withal he promiseth storms and tempest, fire and perdition to the unregenerate: and thus his name and nature is altogether opposite to sin and sinners. But view we those attributes of God, I mean his Justice, truth, patience, holiness, anger, power: his Justice, in punishing the impenitent according to his deserts, his truth effecting those plagues which he hath spoken in his time, his patience forbearing sins destruction, till they are grown full ripe, his holiness abhorring all impurities, He cannot behold iniquity, his anger stirring up revenge against all offered injuries, his power mustering up his forces, yea all his creatures against his enemies; and what can we say, but if all these attributes are at enmity with sinful man, woe worth to man because of offenses! better he had never been born, then not to be new born; alas! what shall become of him? Can he that is God's enemy see God in his glory? no, there is no way but one, Except he repent, Except] he be born again.

Thirdly, Except] by a new birth, man is without Christ; for If any man be in Christ, he is a new creature: And if he be not in Christ, what hopes of that man? It is only Christ that opens Heaven, it is only Christ that is the Way to Heaven; besides him there is no Way, no Truth, no Life; and if we be in him, as the branch in the vine, it is of necessity that we bring forth good fruit: Upon these terms his death is effectual, if we become new creatures; or otherwise, all his Merits (his blood that was shed, his body that was crucified, his soul that was agonized) they are nothing unto us, we nothing bettered by them: he died for all, but his death is not applied, his Kingdom is not opened, save only unto them that have learned and practiced this rule of Exception: Except] a man be born again.

Fourthly, Except before Excepted, a man is a very limb of Satan, a child of darkness, and one of the Family of Hell. Consider this, ye that are out of the state of Grace, in what miserable thralldom is your souls? Should any call you servants, or slaves of Satan, you would take it highly in disdain; but take it as you please, if you are not regenerate, you are in no better case. Paul appeals to your own knowledge, Know you not that to whomsoever you give yourselves as servants to obey, his servants ye are to whom ye obey? Rom. 6.16, 23. If then ye obey the Devils suggestions (which you do being unborn) what are you but the Devils servants? And if he be your Master, what is your wages? You may see it in the last verse, The wages of sin is death; death of the body, and death of the soul, death here, and death hereafter in Hell fire. Alas, that Satan should have this power on man! that he who is the enemy, and means nothing to a sinner but death and damnation, should be his Lord, and Tyrannize it over him at his own will and pleasure! Would any man be hired to serve Lions and Tigers? And is not the Devil a roaring Lyon, walking about, and seeking whom he may devour? To serve him that would devour his servant, is a most miserable bondage; and what pay can one expect from Devils, but roaring and devouring, and tearing souls? In this plight are the servants of Corruption, slaves of Satan, so I rightly call them; for, Of whomsoever a man is overcome, even unto the same is he in bondage, 2 Peter 2.19. To wind up this point; Lord, who shall dwell in thy Tabernacle? who shall rest in thy Holy Mountain? If we believe David, Not he that slandereth with his tongue, or doth evil to his Neighbor,—Or giveth his money upon Usury, or taketh a reward against the innocent: No, such are servants of Satan, and here is matter of Exception against them; Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

The sum of all: Without Regeneration no Kingdom; for, whether we consider man in regard of himself, or of God, or of Christ, or of Satan, he is (Except he be new born) unholy, God's enemy, out of Christ, in Satan.

And if the New Birth be thus necessary; [Use.] how should we labor to be born again? I mean not as Nicodemus, to enter into our mothers womb again, and be born; It is not the seed of man in the womb of our Mother, but the seed of Grace in the womb of the Church, that makes us blessed: and if we are thus born by Grace, then are we sanctified, made Sons of God, Heirs with Christ, over whom Satan can have no power at all. Now then, as you tender your souls, and desire Heaven at your ends, endeavor to attain this one thing necessary: Lift up your hearts unto God, that you may be washed, justified; sanctified in the Name of the Lord Jesus; and that by the Spirit of God you may walk in new ways, talk with new tongues, as being new creatures, created unto good works. Thus would you wait on God in his way, I trust the Lord in mercy would remember you, and his Spirit would blow upon you. and then you would find and feel such a change within you, as that you would bless God forever, that you were thus born again: Otherwise, how woeful are you, considering this bar in heavens door, to keep out the unregenerate. Except] Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

Thus far of the Exception; we now come to the Person, that is a Nisi prius in the front, Except: This is the party that must prosecute the cause, a man.

A man]

AND this man] is every man, and every part of man: It implies all men, for all are bound to it, and all man; for all the parts of his body, and all the powers of his soul are to be renewed, or he cannot be saved: The word then is general, whether we respect genera singulorum, the kinds, all men; or singula generum, the Individuums, all man, or all the parts of man, body and soul.

We will first begin with the kinds: [Doct. 1] All men (or all mankind) must be regenerated before they be saved; not one of all the sons of Adam that shall ever go to heaven, except he be born again: may your contemplations (guided by God's word) go into that Paradise above, there walk the streets, behold the towers, view the subjects, from the one end of heaven to another, and whom find you there? Not one that lives and dyes in sin; there is not in it, nor shall enter into it anything that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie, Revel. 21.27. yet if such repent them of their sins, the gates shall not be shut against them, all the Saints that now walk in the light of it, were sinners; but first they were purged by the Lamb, and sanctified by the Spirit; first they were regenerated, and so they were saved.

You may object, If all men that go to heaven must be new born, what shall become of infants, that die ere they be born? Can a man enter the second time into his mothers womb, and be born? (said Nicodemus) But can a man enter into the second birth in his mothers womb (say you) and be born again, before he is once born?

I answer [to be born again] supposeth to be once born indeed; therefore according to the letter, our Savior speaketh of a man already born into the world, that he must be born again: But if we seek out the sense [to be born again] (as our Savior interprets) is to be born of water and of the Spirit; and so may Infants not born into the world be born again. Thus we read of Jeremy, The word of the Lord came unto him, saying, Before I formed thee in the belly, I knew thee, and before thou camest forth out of the womb, I sanctified thee, Jer. 1.5. And thus we read of John the Baptist, the Angel of the Lord saying of him, that He should be filled with the Holy Ghost, even from his mothers womb, Luk. 1.15. By these examples we see what the Lord can do; yea, what he doth indeed, although we know not how, nor can it be observed by us.

You may yet object, [to be born again] is (saith our Savior) [to be born of water and of the Spirit]; now water is the outward Baptism, and the Spirit is the inward grace (thus all Ancients have construed this text, saith Hooker) but children not born (howsoever they are sanctified by the Spirit) they cannot be baptized with water, and therefore they cannot see the Kingdom of God.

I answer: In cases of extremity, or impossibility, if actual Baptism be wanting, vocal is enough, and thus far some of our adversaries grant us; Though it be wanting indeed (saith Aquinas) yet Baptism in desire is sufficient to salvation: And to this end he cites Austin, saying, Sanctification may be without Baptism, and Baptism without Sanctification; if Sanctification be, though Baptism be not, it avails to salvation; but if Baptism be, and Sanctification be not, it avails nothing at all. Our conclusion is this, All men (or all mankind) young men and maidens, old men and children, all must be regenerated, or they can never see the Kingdom of God.

Secondly, [Doct. 2] as all men, so all man] all the members of his body, all the faculties of his soul. Sanctification (if saving) must be perfect and entire, though not in respect of degrees, yet in respect of parts; every part and power of body and soul must have its part of sanctification, though no part his full perfection, before the dissolution of our earthly tabernacles: Hence (say Divines) there is a regeneration or sanctification (it is all one) inchoata and consummata; inchoata, begun in this life, consummata, perfected in that other: and of this saith our Savior, Matth. 19.28. Verily I say unto you, that ye which have followed me in the regeneration, when the Son of man shall sit in the throne of his glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel: we speak not of this Regeneration, but of that which brings to this, for we must be regenerated here, or have no part there with God in his glory.

And should we consider man in his parts, every part must bear a part in this birth; his body must be regenerated, his soul must be renewed: we will begin with the body; As you have yielded your members servants to uncleanness, and to iniquity unto iniquity, even so now yield your members servants to righteousness, unto holiness, Rom. 6.19. As every member of the old man is full of sin, so every member of the new born man is to be renewed by grace: To instance in some of them; The heart, that in the old man is full of evil thoughts, murders, adulteries, fornications, thefts, false witness, blasphemies; in the new man it is the member that must first be renewed, here grace first seats itself, and after is dispersed over all; as in natural generation the heart is first framed, so in spiritual regeneration the heart is first reformed. Some call it the first mover of all men's actions, for as the first mover carrieth all the spheres of heaven with it, so doth the heart carry all the members of the body with it; and therefore it is, that the new man begins first with his heart; for if that fountain be right, all the streams of his desires, purposes, affections, speeches, actions, conversations, run sweet, and clear, and pleasant. Again, the eye that in the old man is the Broaker, that goes between the heart and the object, to make up the sinful bargain, that which our Savior calls an evil eye, S. Peter, an adulterous eye; in the new man it must be exercised on other objects, I made a covenant with mine eye (saith Job) why then should I think upon a maid? I will lift up mine eyes unto the hills (saith David) from whence cometh mine help. Again, the ear, that in the old man is stopped against the voice of the Charmer, charm he never so wisely; or if it be open, like Deaths Porter, it lets in sin and Satan at every occasion; in the new man it must be the gate of life, or the door of faith; therefore there is not a member that the devil more envieth than the ear, as we see in the man possessed with a deaf Devil, Mark 9.25. who possessed that sense, as the most excellent, to hinder him from hearing. Again, the tongue, that in the old man is a world of iniquity, that defileth the whole body, that setteth on fire the course of nature, and is set on fire on hell; in the new man it must be the trumpet of divine praise, or (as David calls it) the pen of a ready writer, uttering only those things which the heart enditeth in sincerity and truth. To sum up all in one, the heart is it, where grace begins first, and is felt last; and therefore saith God, Son, give me thy heart, Prov. 23.26. and therefore prays David, Create in me a new heart, Psal. 51.10. and therefore wills Solomon, Keep thy heart with all diligence, for out of it are the issues of life, Prov. 4.23. Would any man that is regenerate encounter sin in his heart, it were impossible to break out into action; would the heart of any man that is born again, but meet sin with this Dilemma, If I commit this sin, I must either repent, or not repent for it; if I do repent, it will cost me more heart-break, and spiritual smart, then the sensual pleasure can be worth; If I never repent, it will be the death and damnation of my soul: sure this thought conceived, and rightly followed in the heart of the regenerate, would be enough to crush sin at the first rising of it; and so it is, for if he be regenerate, he doth not sin, whosoever is born of God doth not commit sin, 1 Joh. 3.9. He is molded anew, and all the members of his body are conformed to the sovereignty and rule of grace, yea his body is preserved blameless, holy, acceptable unto God; it is a member of Christ, the temple of the Holy Ghost: Happy man that is blest with this body! Sure a man thus born again, he shall see the kingdom of God.

Secondly, as the body, so the soul of this man is to be renewed by grace; Therefore glorify God in your body and in your spirit, (saith St. Paul, 1 Cor. 6.20.) the body and the spirit must both glorify God; and as all the parts of the body, so all the powers of the soul.

First, the understanding, that in the old man is blind and ignorant about heavenly things, or howsoever it may know many things, yet never can attain to saving knowledge; in the new man it must be anointed with the eye-salve of the Spirit, inspired with the knowledge of Divine truths, especially with those sacred and saving mysteries which concern the kingdom of God. Again, the will that in the old man affects nothing but vile and vain things, is froward and perverse in the ways of godliness; in the new man it must prove and approve what is the good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God; yea, it must attend and be subordinate to the grace of God, since God indeed, and God only works in us both the will and the deed, Phil. 2.13. Again, the memory that in the old man is slippery in the things of God, or if naturally good, yet not spiritually useful, in the new man it must be sanctified to good performances; and although it cannot increase to a greater natural perfection (for grace doth not this) yet the perfections it hath must be straight, and right, and guided to Godward, Remember the Lord thy God, saith Moses, Deut. 8.18. Again, the conscience that in the old man sleeps and slumbers, or if it be awake, tears and roars, as if a legion of Devils now possessed it; in the new man it must be calm and quiet, and yet not sleep or slumber, but rather in a friendly loving manner check and control wheresoever sin is, yea never be quiet, till with kind and yet earnest expostulations, it draw the sinner before God to confess his fault, and to seek pardon for it. Again, the affections that in the old man are sensual, inordinate, bewitched, and set on wrong objects; in the new man they must be turned another way. Mary Magdalene (you know) was given to unclean lusts, but the Lord diverted this sinful passion, and so she became penitent, and thirsted after grace: To sum up all, all must be renewed, the understanding, will, memory, conscience, affections.

But to feel more of their sweetness, I will pound these spices, and dwell a while on them. Now then for your better acquaintance with the regenerate man, and that you may know his difference from the man unregenerate, observe (I pray) these passages:

First, I say, in the new man the understanding must be renewed; so the Apostle, The new man is renewed in knowledge, Col. 3.10. and this knowledge implies two habits, Wisdom and Prudence, Col. 1.9. First, Wisdom, and that is speculative: Secondly, Prudence, and that is practical: By the one the child of God having the eyes of his mind opened and enlightened, doth see the mysteries of salvation, the secrets of the Kingdom, the whole Council, and the wonders of the Law of God; by the other he is enabled with a judicious sincerity, to deliberate and determine in cases of conscience, in the practice of piety, and the experimental passages of a Christian man: If we consider the first (Wisdom) how is it possible that a man unregenerate should know the mysteries of salvation? It may be he may go as far as the power of natural discourse, and light of Reason can bear sway, he may be furnished with store of rare and excellent learning, and yet for all this want the true knowledge of spiritual wisdom: Why so? Because all his knowledge, like the light of the Moon, is discharged upon others, but never returns and reflects upon his own soul; he should know, but knows not the darkness of his own understanding, the disorder of his own affections, the slumber of his own conscience, the deadness of his own heart; but the man regenerate (know he never so little) he hath the saving-knowledge, and in this he exceeds the greatest Rabbies, the profoundest Clerks; he only knows God with a steadfast apprehension, he only knows himself a most mean, base and contemptible thing; his new birth hath learned him how wicked a creature he naturally is, and therefore in that respect is he odious to himself, and loathsome in his own eyes: Or if we consider the second (Prudence) How is it possible that a man unregenerate, should experimentally know the practice of piety in a Christian course? Should we instance in this mystery of Regeneration; Here is one Nicodemus, a ruler of the Jews, and a teacher of Israel; yet, as learned as he was, if he confer with Christ about the salvation of his soul, he is strangely childish, and a mere infant; tell him of the new birth, and he thinks it as impossible, as for an old man to return into his mothers womb, and be born again: The natural man cannot discern the operations of grace, he knows not that dark and fearful passage, which leads from the state of nature (through strange terrors and torments of soul) into the rich and glorious happiness of the kingdom of Christ; whereas on the contrary, the regenerate man (that hath had the experience of the power of godliness upon his own soul) he can see and judge of the light of grace, he can taste and relish of the fruits of the Spirit; and hence it is, that many a silly one (man and woman) whom the worldly-wise pass by with scorn and contempt, are often in spiritual affairs more wise and learned than the learnedst Doctors.

Secondly, the Will must be renewed; and this will of the regenerate contains two things, Rightness and Readiness: It is first rectified, when it is conformed to the will of God. Secondly, it is so inflamed with the love of goodness, that willingly he pursues it with alacrity of spirit. If we consider the first (the Rectitude of the will) we see by experience the will of the unregenerate is all out of course, he wills nothing but that which is evil: How should he, considering his want of God's image, his blindness of heart, his proneness to evil, together with the vehemency of his affections, which draw the will after them, and trouble the judgment? But in the man that is regenerate, the will being moved, it afterwards moves itself, God's grace that concurs with it, quickens it, and revives it; so that now his will is nothing but God's will: if it may appear that God bids him, or forbids him to do this, or that he chooseth above all to follow his commands, whatsoever becomes of him; why, this is the very heart and marrow of regeneration; you may be sure, the man that chooseth above all to please God, is the only man of God, and shall be rewarded by God. Or if we consider the second (the Readiness of the will to God) alas, the will of the unregenerate hath no pleasure in goodness, he understands not the sweetness of it, and therefore nothing is more irksome to him than the ways of godliness: whereas on the contrary, the will of the regenerate is willing, and this willingness indeed is the perfection of his will; yea (if we can say more) it is the highest degree of his perfection in this life, to be willing to do good.

Thirdly, the memory must be renewed; and this memory reflects occasionally on a double object, on God, and the things of God: First, on God, by remembrance of his presence everywhere: Secondly, on the things of God, by calling them to mind at useful times. If we consider the first object, God, the unregenerate hath no mind on God, God is net in all his thoughts, like the hood-winkt fool, that seeing nobody, thinks nobody sees him; so hath he said in his heart, How doth God know? can he judge thorough the dark cloud? Thick clouds are a covering to him that seeth not, and he walketh in the circuit of heaven. But contrariwise, the regenerate man, he remembers his Creator in the days of his youth. And though God, as being a Spirit, is (in some sort) absent from his senses, yet by virtue of his sanctified memory (that makes things absent as present) his eye is on God, and he considers God as an eye-witness of all his thoughts, and words, and doings, and dealings; he knows nothing can be hid from that all-seeing eye, though sin tempt him with the fairest opportunities of night and darkness, yet still he remembers, if his eye sees nothing, all those eyes of heaven (of God and of his Angels) are ever about him: and therefore he answers the Tempter, How dare I sin to his face, that looks on me what I am doing? if I dare not do this folly before men, how dare I do it before those heaven-spectators, God and his Angels? Or if we consider the second object (the Word of God) the unregenerate never burdens his memory with such blessed thoughts; if sometimes he falls upon it, it is either by constraint, or by accident, never with any settled resolution to dwell on it, or to follow it: but the soul that is regenerate, with Mary, keeps all these things in his heart; or with David, gives it out, Thy word have I hid in my heart, Psal. 119.11. Whatsoever lessons he learns, like so many jewels in a casket, he lays them up safe, and then as need serveth, he remembers his store, and makes all the good use of them he may: I will not deny, but any man (good or evil) may retain good things according to that strength of retainment, which nature affords him, but the regenerate (whose memory only is sanctified) whatsoever he retains, he hath it opportunely at hand; in temptation or affliction he remembers and applies, and so remembering to apply, and applying that he remembers, he is thereby enabled to resist evil, or to follow those good things which the Lord hath commanded.

Fourthly, the conscience must be renewed, and that two ways; either by drawing the soul to good, or from evil: first, to good, by inclining and encouraging; and secondly, from evil, by restraining and bridling. If we consider its first office (in that it draws and leads the soul to good) I confess the unregenerate is not of that conscience, for the most part his conscience lies dead in his bosom, or if it stir sometimes, he labors all he can to smother it in his waking: to such an one should men and Angels preach, yet so far is he bewitched with sin, that he hath no mind of goodness, or if ever he do any good act (which is a rare thing with him) it is not out of conscience to do good, but for some sinister end or respect. It is otherwise with the regenerate, his conscience incites him to good, and he doth good out of conscience; he stands not upon terms of pleasure or profit, but his conscience being guided by the rule and square of God's holy truth, he submits to it merely out of his obedience to God: hence it is, that come what will come, weal or woe, his eye is fixed on God, and if man oppose where God commands, he is quickly resolved out of that in Isaiah 51.12. I, even I am he that comforteth you; who art thou, that thou shouldst be afraid of a man that shall die, and of the son of man that shall be made as grass? and forgettest the Lord thy maker, that hath stretched forth the heavens, and laid the foundations of the earth? Or if we consider the second office of conscience (in drawing the soul from evil) the unregenerate either hears not, or heeds not his reclaiming conscience: if it speak, he first goes about to lull it asleep again, or if it cry out, and will not peace, then (in spite of goodness) he runs out of one sin into another, and usually from presumption to despair. On the other side, the regenerate hath a conscience that draws him from, and keeps him out of evil: 'tis known especially by these two properties, Remorse and Tenderness: remorse hath an eye of all sins past, and tenderness hath an eye on all sins to come; by remorse is bred sorrow for sin, and loathing of sin; no sooner he considers how by his manifold sins he hath offended God, crucified Christ, grieved the holy Spirit, but his heart bleeds and breaks that he hath done so wickedly against so gracious a God: this sorrow for sin brings with it a loathing of sin; he cannot but hate it, that hath caused his heart break, yea he hates it, and hates the very thought of it; every look-back is a new addition of detestation, and every meditation makes the wound of his remorse to bleed again and again: by tenderness of conscience is bred a care and watchfulness to avoid sin to come, for no sooner is sin presented to his conscience, but he startles at its sight, and thinks on its vanity, and meditates on that strict and general account he must one day make for it; which thoughts and sin put together in the balance, he dares not do wickedly for a world of gain: and you may observe it, this tenderness (or easiness to bleed at the apprehension of sin) is proper and peculiar to that conscience alone that is enlightened, and sanctified, and purged by Christ.

Fifthly, the affections must be renewed, and that is done by setting them upon right objects. I shall instance in some of them, as love, hatred, hope, fear, joy, sorrow. Love I place first, which in the unregenerate man is fastened inordinately upon the creature; and as one sin begets another, so on whatsoever object it fall, it begets some sin: thus the love of honor breeds ambition, love of riches breeds covetousness, love of beauty breeds lust, love of pleasure breeds sensuality: whatsoever he loves (the object being earthly) it brings with it some sin, and thereby (the worst of all) he wickedly prefers earth before heaven, a dunghill before paradise, a few bitter-sweet pleasures for an inch of time, before unmixed and immeasurable joys world without end: But the regenerate man settles his love upon other objects; as he that is carnal, minds things carnal, so he that is spiritual, loves things spiritual; no sooner is he turned (by a sound and universal change of the whole man) from darkness to light, and from the power of Satan unto God, but he presently begins to settle with some sweet contentment, upon the flowers of paradise, heavenly glimpses, saving graces, and his infinite love runs higher and higher, till it embrace him that dwells in the highest, God Almighty; and how sweet is that love that casts itself wholly into the bosom of his Maker? how blessed is that man, that yearns, and melts, and cleaves, and sticks unto his gracious God? why, this is right love, and for this is the Church commended, Cant. 1.4. The righteous love thee, or as others translate, amat in rectitudinibus, she loves thee righteously, her love is set upon the right object, God: not that the regenerate loves nothing else, for he loves the Law, the Ministers, and all the ordinances of God appointed for his good, but whatsoever he loves, it reflects upon God, he loves all for God, and God for himself.

The second affection is hatred, which in the unregenerate is so inordinate, that he is an hater of God, Rom. 1.30. not that he hates God in himself (for God is universally good, and cannot be hated) but in some particular respect, because he restrains him from his pleasure, or punisheth him for his sin, or crosseth his lewd appetites by his holy commands: And as he hates God, so likewise his brother, 1 John 2.11. Hence arise those envies, emulations, jars, contentions amongst those that profess themselves Christians; of which St. Paul could say, A brother goeth to law with a brother, 1 Cor. 6.6. But of all brethren he hates them most, of whom our Savior is the first-born: God's faithful ones ever were, and ever will be signs, and wonders, and monsters unto many; a scorn, reproach and derision to them that are round about them: But he that is regenerate hates sin, and in whomsoever sin rules or reigns, he cannot but hate them, Do not I hate them, O Lord, that hate thee? (saith David) and, Am not I grieved with those that rise up against thee? Not that David, or any Saint of God, hates the person of any one, but sin in the person, or he is said to hate them for sins sake that is in them; in this respect he bids them defiance in the verse ensuing, I hate them with a perfect hatred, I count them mine enemies, Psal. 139.22. I know there is a perpetual combat in the regenerate, betwixt the flesh and the Spirit, and therefore we must understand this hatred, which David calls a perfect hatred, according to the perfection in parts, but not in degrees: never any but Christ hated sin to the full, with all his strength, and with all his might, but in some measure his servants hatred is perfect, which makes him always hate sin in others, and often in himself, when after the commission of any evil, he begins to repent him, and to abhor himself (as Job did) in dust and ashes, Job 42.6.

The third affection is Hope (this I rather name then desire, because whatsoever we Hope for, we cannot but desire it, and so it is implied in it) now this Hope in the unregenerate is fastened on this world, and the things of this world, he hopes for preferment, riches, or the like; as for his hope of Heaven, it is but a waking man's dream; a dream, said I? Yes, as dreams in the night fill us with illusions and vain forms (you know a Beggar may dream he is a King) so hope abusing the imagination of the unregenerate, fills their souls many a time with vain or empty contentments; but the hope of the regenerate both enjoys the right object, and right means; his eye is fixed on future good, and he endeavors to pursue it, till he get the possession; if in the pursuit he meet with crosses, losses, griefs, disgraces, sicknesses, or any other calamities, his hope is able to sweeten the bitterest misery that can possibly befall him; the afflictions of this life bid him look for a better, a cross here minds him of the glory above; and howsoever this Hope may have many difficulties and wrestlings in him (therefore it is compared to an anchor, which holds the ship in a storm, Heb. 6.19.) yet it holds and sticks so firm in God and his promises, that he is confident, that after this life an heavenly crown shall be set on his head, by the hands of God and his Angels.

The fourth affection is fear, which in the unregenerate is either worldly or servile: If it fasten on the world, then he *fear*s the loss of his credit, or of his profit, and because he and the world must part at last, he *fear*s this separation above all fears: O death (saith the wiseman) how bitter is the remembrance of thee to a man that liveth at rest in his possessions, unto the man that hath nothing to vex him, and that hath prosperity in all things? Ecclus. 41.1. O these thoughts of the grisly forms, and ugly face of death, of the parting from all worldly pleasures forever, of his rotting in the grave, dragging to the Tribunal and Terror of the last day, they cannot but make his heart to shrug together for horror, and (many time) to quake and tremble like an Aspine-leaf; or if his fear reflect on God, then is it a servile fear; for as the servant or hireling works not for love of his master, but only for fear of punishment; or as the adulterous woman is afraid of her husband, not out of love or affection, but lest he reward her to her foul demerits; so he *fear*s God for fear of punishment due unto him from God: It is otherwise with the man that is born again, his fear is either initial or filial in pangs of the new birth, or in the new born babe it is called initial, because then he casts away sin both out of God's love, to which he hath partly attained, and out of the woeful effects of sin, which he hath thoroughly considered; with the right eye he beholds God, and with the left eye he beholds punishment; so that this fear is a middle (as it were) betwixt servile and filial fear, and as the needle draweth in the thread, so this fear draweth in charity, and makes way for filial fear; to which, if by growth in grace he be fully ripened, then he *fear*s God out of love to God, as the Prophet Isaiah proclaimeth, The fear of the Lord is his treasure, Isa. 33.6. Never was treasure more dear to the worldings, then is God's fear to him, his love of God, his desire to please God, and his fear of being separated from God, keeps him in such awe, that though no punishment, no death, no hell were at all, yet he would not sin wickedly, willfully and maliciously, for a world of treasures.

The fifth affection is joy, which in the unregenerate is merely sensual and brutish; it hath no better objects then gold, or greatness, or offices, or honors, or the like: and what are all these but a shadow, a ship, a bird, an arrow, a post that passeth by? or rather, as crackling of thorns under a pot, as flashes of lightning before everlasting fire? But the joy of the regenerate is a spiritual joy, and the matter of it is the light of God's countenance, or the robe of Christ's righteousness, or the promises of God's word; or above all, God Almighty, blessed evermore: Thus David, Whom have I in heaven but thee? and there is none upon earth that I desire besides thee, Psal. 73.25. Why, this is that joy which no man can conceive, but he that enjoys it; this is that white stone, Rev. 2.17. whose splendor shines only upon heavenly hearts; this is that glimpse of heavens glory, which springing up in a sanctified heart, out of the wells of salvation, and carried along with addition of fresh comforts (from the Word and Sacraments) through a fruitful current and course of man's life, it is at last entertained into the boundless and bottomless Ocean of the joys of Heaven. I will not say, but sometimes it may be assaulted, and stopped with some doubts, or distrusts, or weaknesses of degree, yet in respect of its creation, or essence, or blissful issue, it is (saith one) a very glimpse of heaven, a pure taste of the rivers of life, and first fruits (as he calls it) of everlasting joys.

The sixth affection is sorrow, which in the unregenerate is a worldly sorrow, and the effects of it are death; so the Apostle, The sorrow of the world worketh death, 2 Cor. 7.10. In this kind how endless are the sorrows of men for their losses, or crosses, that sometimes may befall them? And howsoever some may endeavor to comfort them in Christ, they are so dead-hearted that nothing can persuade, nothing relish with them that concerns heaven, or salvation. But in the regenerate, sorrow looks up to Godwards, not that the beholding of God in himself can bring sorrow to a man, for he is a most comfortable object, which made David say, The light of thy countenance — is gladness to my heart: but the beholding of sin, which hindereth from the clear sight of that object, this is it which breeds sorrow, and this the Apostle calls godly sorrow, working repentance to salvation, not to be repented of, 2 Cor. 7.10. It is not every sorrow, but godly sorrow, I rejoice (saith the Apostle) not that ye were made sorry, but that ye sorrowed to repentance: And would you know who sorrows to repentance? it is he, and only he that groans and sighs under the heavy weight and burden of his sins, that is of a broken and contrite heart, that trembles at God's word, that is grieved at his enormities, that forsakes all sins, and that resigns up himself in all holy obedience to God's blessed will; this sorrow is a blessed sorrow that brings forth joy and immortality: Therefore comfort ye, comfort ye all that mourn in Zion, what though for a night (in pangs of the new birth) you lie sorrowing and weeping for your sins? mark a while, and the day will dawn, ride on, because of the word of truth, and a day star will arise in your hearts that will never set; nay weep & weep again, till you can say with David, All the night make I my bed to swim with my tears, & presently the Sun of righteousness will appear, and he will dry away your tears, and shine upon you with everlasting light. Certainly thus is it with every regenerate man, he loves, and hates, and hopes, and fears, and joys, and sorrows, and all these passions are renewed in him: To give instance in one, David for all the regenerate, his love appears Psal. 119.47. My delight shall be in thy commandments which I have loved: his hatred appears Psal. 130.22. I hate thy enemies with a perfect hatred. His hope appears Psal. 62.5. My soul wait thou only upon God, for my expectation is from him. His fear appears Psal. 119.120. His Judgments are terrible, I tremble and quake. His joy appears Psal. 119.16. Thy Testimonies are my delight, I rejoice in them as one that findeth great spoils. His sorrow appears Psal. 119.136. Mine eyes gush out with rivers of water. Here is Love, and Hatred, and Hope, and Fear, and Joy, and Sorrow, and all are set upon their right spiritual objects.

You see now a portraiture of the new man, which should be the case of all men; my text saith indefinitely A man] implying every man, and every part of man; every man should be regenerated, every part of man should be renewed; and whereas man consists on two parts, the body and soul, all the members of his body, the Heart, the Eye, the Ear, the Tongue in especial; all the powers of his soul, the Understanding, the Will, the Memory, the Conscience, the Affections in general, all must be renewed, and the whole man] born again.

And yet (beloved) I mean not so, [Use.] as that a man renewed is never overcome with sin, I know there is in him a continual fight betwixt the flesh and the spirit, each of which striveth to make his part strong against the other, and sometimes Amalek prevails, and sometimes Israel prevails; sometimes his heart falls a lusting, his eyes a wandering, his ears a tickling, his tongue a cursing; sometimes his understanding errs, his will rebels, his memory fails, his conscience sleeps, and his affections turn the stream after sensual objects; but (that which differs him from the unregenerate man) if he sin, it is with a gracious reluctance, he resists it to the uttermost of his abilities, and if at last he commit sin through the violence of temptation, subduing the infirmity of the flesh, he is presently abashed, and then begins he to set repentance a work in all the parts and powers of his body and soul; then begins his conscience to trouble him within, and will never be at quiet until the cistern of his heart (being overcharged) hath caused his eyes, the flood-gates, with moist sinful humors, to overflow the cheeks with tears of contrition, and thus he is washed, justified, sanctified, and restored to his former integrity again. Examine then yourselves, you that desire heaven at your ends, would you inherit the Kingdom? would you live with Angels? would you save your souls? examine and try whether your bodies and souls be sanctified throughout, and if you have no sense or feeling of the new birth (for 'tis a mystery to the unregenerate) then never look to see (in that state) the kingdom of God; but if you perceive the working of saving grace effectually in you, (and you cannot but perceive it if you have it) if you feel the power of godliness first seizing the heart, and after dispersing itself over all the parts and powers of body and soul: (or yet more in particular) if your hearts be softened by the Spirit, if your eyes wait upon God, if your ears listen to his word, if your tongues show forth his praise, if your understanding attain to saving knowledge, if your wills conform to the will of God, if your memories be stored with heavenly doctrine, if your consciences be tender and sensible of the least sin whatsoever, if you love that which is good, if you hate that which is evil, if you hope for the blessings above, if you fear him that can destroy both body and soul; in a word, if you joy in goodness, if you sorrow for sin, then are you born again. Happy man in this case that ever he was born, and thus every man must be, or he cannot be happy: Except a man] (every man, every part of man) be born again, he cannot see the Kingdom of God.

Thus far of the subject, man] we come now to the act, or deed to be done, he must be born again.]

Be born again.]

The children are brought to the birth, and lest the saying be true of us, there is no strength to bring forth: I shall now (by God's assistance) proceed to the birth itself. Here we have the manner of it, and we may observe a double manner,

First, of the words containing the new birth.

Secondly, of the new birth contained in the words.

The manner of the words appears in the original 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉] two words, and either of them hath its diverse reading. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , Valla would rather have to be genitus, begotten; Except a man be begotten.] Others usually say natus, born; Except a man be born.] And as 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , so 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , some would have to be 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , above, or from heaven; Except a man be born from above.] Others usually 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , again; Except a man be born again.] Chrysostom cites both these, and of each reading we shall gather something for our own instruction.

Except a man be regenerated, or begotten (saith Valla) As man that is born of a woman is begotten of a man, so he that is born again, [Doct.] must have a begetting too: and therefore sometimes it is called renascentia, a new birth, and sometimes regeneratio, a new begetting, or regeneration. If you ask of whom is the new man begotten? Saint James tells you, Jam. 1.18. Of his own will begat he us with the word of truth: The former words note the impulsive cause, these latter the instrument, it was God that begat us, and with the seed of the word.

First, God begat us, and so are we called God's sons, born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God, John 1.13. Regeneration is the work of God, and because it is a work external, it is therefore communicable to each Person in the Trinity: Ye are sanctified (saith the Apostle) in the name of the Lord Jesus, and by the spirit of our God, 1 Cor. 6.11. The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, all sanctify, all work the same work: but as in the Godhead there is but one Essence, and yet three manners of being of the same one Essence; so in God's outward operations, all the Persons work rem eandem, one thing, but all work not eodem modo, after one manner: For instance, the works of Creation, Redemption, and Sanctification, are the common works of God the Father, God the Son, and God the Holy Ghost, yet everyone of these works common to all three, are terminated in someone of them: So the Father is said to create, the Son is said to create, the Holy Ghost is said to create; so the Father is said to redeem, the Son is said to redeem, the Holy Ghost is said to redeem; so the Father is said to sanctify, the Son is said to sanctify, the Holy Ghost is said to sanctify: Thus all three concur to everyone of these works, and yet everyone of these works, is terminated, specified, and formed (as it were) in the very last act by one of these three: The work of the Creation is determinated immediately in God the Father, the work of Redemption is determinated immediately in God the Son, the work of Regeneration is determinated immediately in God the Holy Ghost. And it is memorable, that as the community of these works (ad extra) depends on the unity of God's Essence, so the diversity of their determinations depends on the diverse manners of God's existence, or subsisting: the Father is of himself, neither made nor begotten, and therefore it best agrees with him to make all things of nothing, which is the work of Creation; the Son is of the Father alone by reflection of his intellect, and so called the representation of his Fathers Image, and therefore it best agrees with him to represent his Fathers mercies to mankind, by saving them from death and hell, which is the work of Redemption; the Holy Ghost is of the Father and the Son, proceeding (and as it were breathed) from them both by the act of the will, and therefore it best agrees with him (that bloweth where he listeth) to blow on our wills, and by his breath to purge and purify us, which is the work of Regeneration. To sum up all in a word, this work of Regeneration (or Sanctification, or whatever else you will call it) in respect of the work, it is of the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, but in respect of the last act, it is of the Holy Ghost, and not of the Father, nor the Son; and thus our Savior concludes, Joh. 3.8. That which is born of the spirit, is spirit, and so is every man that is born of the spirit.

Secondly, as God's Spirit is the principal, so God's Word is the instrumental cause of our Regeneration. Ye are born again (saith Saint Peter) not of corruptible seed, but of incorruptible by the word of God, which liveth and abideth forever, 1 Pet. 1.23. this word St. John calls the word of life, St. Paul the producer of faith, and the power of God unto salvation; yea this word is quick and powerful, and sharper than any two-edged sword, piercing even to the dividing asunder of soul and spirit, and of the joints and marrow, and is a discerner of the thoughts and intents of the heart, Heb. 4.12. they that are born again, cannot but remember how quick, and powerful, and sharp, God's word was at their Regeneration: first, like an hammer it beat on their hearts till it broke them all to pieces, and then like a sword, by a terrible, cutting, piercing power, it struck a shaking and trembling into the very center of their souls; last of all like oil (when, as the man in the Gospel, they were wounded indeed) it began to supple those wounds, and to heal the bruises, and to refresh the weak and tender heart with all the promises of God revealed in Christ.

And thus a man being begotten of the Spirit with the word of truth, he comes at last to the birth: So we read, Except a man be born.] And this I suppose to be fuller then the other, because a begetting may be, and no birth follow, as many that are stifled in the womb, are begotten, not born; but if the birth be, it doth presuppose a begetting, [Doct.] and so it implies it: Except a man be born, that is, except a man be begotten and born, he cannot see God's kingdom. If you ask of whom born? I answer, as God is Father, so the Church is the Mother of every child of God: to this purpose saith the Apostle, Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all, Gal. 4.26. what is Jerusalem but the Church? for as that City was the seat of David, Psal. 122.5. so is this Church the throne of Christ, figured by the kingdom of David, Revel. 3.7. and therefore of both these God thus proclaims, Here shall be my rest forever, here will I dwell, for I have a delight herein, Psal. 132.14. And rightly is the Church called our mother, first because she is the spouse of our Father, betroathed, Hosea 2.19. coupled and made one, Cant. 6.3. I am my well-beloveds, and my well-beloved is mine; and secondly, because we are children born of her; this teacheth us to honor our mother, and like little children to hang at her breasts for our sustenance; Suck, and be satisfied with the breasts of her consolations, milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory. It is the Church that brings forth children to God by the ministry of his word, and if we are children of this mother, we must feed on that milk which flows from her two breasts, the Old and New Testament; As new born babes (saith the Apostle) desire the sincere milk of the Word, that ye may grow thereby, 1 Pet. 2.2. In a word, out of the Church there is no salvation: who have not the Church their mother, cannot have God their Father, was the saying of old; and good reason, for out of the Church there is no means of Salvation, no word to teach, no sacraments to confirm, but all these, and all other means are in the womb of the Church: it is here, and here only, where the spirit of immortal seed begets grace in the heart, and so a man is born again.

This 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉] some read 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , from heaven, [Doct.]] and so the words run, Except a man be born from above] From above it is that every good & perfect gift cometh: Aman can receive nothing, except it be given him from heaven, Joh. 3.27. But how then saith our Savior of the wind (to which he compareth everyone that is born of the Spirit) that we know not whence it cometh, and whither it goeth? I answer, [Vers. 8] this [whence] respects more the cause than place, we know the wind comes from the South, or North, or East, or West, but why so and so, we cannot tell; we know the Spirit is above, and the new birth or regeneration comes from the Spirit: But 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 why it is so, or what moves the Spirit to do so, besides his 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , the good pleasure of his will, we cannot tell.

Or if we read 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , as others do, the words then run thus, Except a man be born again.] To this Nicodemus's reply seems more direct, How can a man be born when he is old? can he enter the second time into his mothers womb? No question he took Christ's 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 pro 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , only thus he mistook, that the second birth should be after the manner of the first birth, and therefore he saith, Can a man that is old (such as he himself was) be born again? No, saith our Savior, that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and there is but one birth after this manner; but to be born again] is to be born after the Spirit, and this is that second birth: A man is first born of the flesh, [Doct.] and he must be again born of the Spirit.

Hence appears the difference of the first and second birth; the first birth is of the earth, earthy; the second birth is of the Lord from heaven, heavenly; the first birth is of nature, full of sin; the second is of grace, full of sanctity: the first birth is originally of flesh and blood, the second birth is originally of the Spirit and water: In a word, the first birth kills, the second gives life; generation lost us, it must be regeneration that recovers us: O blessed birth, without which no birth is happy, in comparison of which (though it were to be born heir of the whole world) all is but misery! this was Moses praise, that he esteemed the reproach of Christ above all the treasures in Egypt, rather would he be the son of God, then to be called the son of Pharaohs daughter, Heb. 11.24. No question it is a great dignity to be called the son in Law to a King, but nothing in comparison of being the Son of God: this sonship is that degree, above which there needs no aspiring, and under which there is no happiness, no heaven, no kingdom: Except a man be born again] he cannot see the kingdom of God.

Thus far of the manner of the words, which containing the new birth, it appears in them, the father of it is God, the seed of it the Word, the mother of it the Church, the place of it, whence? from Heaven: the time of it, when? after a man is once born, then he must be again born: Except a man be born again.]

Secondly, as you see the manner of the words containing the new birth, so now see the manner of the new birth contained in the words. I know it is not wrought in all after one manner, nor is the manner known to us, but only so far forth as it is sensible in us, and therefore we must consider man before baptism, in baptism, after baptism.

In some is the new birth wrought before baptism, as in the eunuch, under Candace Queen of the Ethiopians, Acts 8.37. and in the Captain Cornelius, together with his kinsmen and and near friends, Acts 10.47. and in Lydia, Acts 16.14. and so our charity tells us, that every Infant dying before baptism, is renewed by the Spirit: but the manner of this working we know not, for it is one of the secrets of the Spirit of God.

In others is the new birth wrought in Baptism, which indeed is the Sacrament of the new birth, and seal of Regeneration; but howsoever in Paedo-Baptism we see the outward seal, yet we see not, we feel not the manner of the inward working; for this also is the secret of the spirit of God.

In others is the new birth wrought after Baptism; so Polanus: but whether after Baptism, or in Baptism, we will not dispute, only (as the case stands with us) this I affirm, That there is no manifestation of the new birth, until after Baptism. But when after Baptism? I answer, whensoever men receive Christ by faith, which though it be many years after, yet then do they feel the power of God regenerate them, and to work all things in them, which he offered in Baptism. Now the manner of this feeling (or of God's Spirit working) proceeds usually thus:

There be certain steps of degrees (say Divines) by which it passeth, and howsoever in those whom God hath blessed with that great favor of holy and Christian education (the Spirit of God dropping grace into their hearts, even very betimes) these steps, or degrees, are not so easily perceived: Yet in those men who have lived long in sin, whose sins have been gross, and great and grievous, no sooner come they to a new birth, but they can feel grace work in them step after step, and these steps we shall reckon to the number of eight.

The first is a sight of sin, and this our Savior reckons for the first work of the Spirit, When he is come, he will reprove the world of sin, John 16.8. Of sin? how? why thus: no sooner begins this blessed change from nature to grace, but the conscience (wrought on by God's word) opens its book, and presents to the soul a bed-roll of those many, mighty, heinous sins, committed against God and man, there he may read in bloody burning lines the abominations of his youth, the sins of all his life; and to bring them into method, the Commandments of God stand as a remembrancer before his eyes: the first tells him of his loving somewhat above God: the second, of his worshipping a false God, or the true God after a false manner: the third, of his dishonoring the great and mighty name of God: the fourth, of his breaking the Lord's days, either in doing the works of the flesh, or leaving undone the works of the Spirit; nor is this all: as against God, so against his neighbor hath he sinned: the fifth tells him of his stubbornness and disobedience: the sixth, of his passions, and desire of revenge: the seventh, of his lewdness and lustful courses: the eighth, of his robberies and covetous thefts: the ninth, of his lies and and slanders, back-bitings and rash judgments: the tenth, of his covetous thoughts, and motions of the heart to all manner of evil. Good Lord! what a number of evils, yea, what innumerable swarms of lawless thoughts, and words, and actions doth he read in his conscience? But above all, his darling-delight, his beloved sin is writ in greatest characters, this he finds to have bewitched him most, and to have domineered above all the rest in his wasted conscience; this sin in some is worldliness, wantonness, usury, pride, revenge, or the like; in others it is drunkenness, gluttony, gaming, scurril jesting, symony, or the like; whatsoever it is, the conscience tells him of it again and again; where that he may read it together with his other sins, the Spirit of God now opens the eyes of his mind, and lets him see the very mud and filth of his soul, that lay at the bottom before unseen, and undiscerned. Thus is the first working of the new life, to wit, a feeling of the old death of his soul in sins and trespasses; and here the axiom is true, no generation without corruption, a man must first feel this death, before he is born again.]

The second step is, Sense of divine wrath, which begets in him fear; so the Apostle, The spirit of bondage begets fear, Rom. 8.15. and thus it works: no sooner hath the man a sight and feeling of his sin, but then God's Spirit (now called the spirit of bondage) presents to him the armory of God's flaming wrath, and fiery indignation; this makes him to feel (as if he were pricked with the stroke of an arrow, or point of a sword, or sting of an Adder) that he is a most cursed and damnable creature, justly deserving all the miseries of this life, and all the fiery torments of hell in that life to come; yea, this makes him tremble, and stand, and look, as if he were thoroughly frightened with the angry countenance of God Almighty: Would you view him in this case? his conscience hath now awaked him out of his dead sensual sleep, by the Trumpet of the Law, his heart is now scorched with the secret sense of God's angry face, his soul is now full sorely crushed under the most grievous burden of innumerable sins, his thoughts are now full of fear and astonishment, as if no less then very hell and horror were ready to seize upon his body and soul. I say not what measure of this wrath is poured on all men in their conversion; for I suppose some feel more, and some have less of it; but I verily believe, some there are that (in these pangs of the new birth) have been scorched (as it were) with the very flames of hell, insomuch that they might truly say with David, God's wrath lieth hard upon me, and he hath afflicted me with all his waves, Psal. 88.7. And no wonder, for this is the time of fear; now it is that Satan strives busily to stifle the new man in the womb, and therefore he that before diminished his sins, and made them appear little or nothing in his eyes, when he once sees the man smitten down into the place of dragons, and covered with the shadow of death, then he puts into his mind his innumerable sins, and (that which immediately follows) the curse of the Law, and the wrath of God, which he yet makes more grisly and fierce, with a purpose to plunge him into the bottomless pit of horror and despair. By this means he persuaded Cain to cry out (when he was in this case) My punishment is greater then I can bear; or, as others translate, Mine iniquity is greater then can be forgiven, Gen. 4.13. And therefore thus far the unregenerate goes with the man born again, both have a sight of sin, and sense of wrath, but here they part; for the man unregenerate either sinks under it, or labors to allay it with worldly comforts, or some counterfeit calm: but the man born again, is only humbled by it, and seeks the right way to cure it, and at last (by the help of God's Spirit) he passeth quite through it, I mean, through this hell upon earth, into the spiritual pleasures of the Kingdom of grace, which is to be born again.]

The third step is Sorrow for sin, and this is more peculiar to God's child; there is a sorrow which is a common work of grace, which an hypocrite may have; and there is a sorrow which is a work of special grace, and this likewise precedes the exercise of faith.

But some object, Christ must work this sorrow, or it is good for nothing; now if Christ be in the soul working sorrow, then there is faith, therefore faith must go before sorrow.

I answer, although it is true that Christ cannot be in the soul, but in the same instant there is the habit of faith; yet it follows not that faith is before sorrow, for the habits of these graces are both together, and at once in the soul; or howsoever, it follows not that the soul is enabled by an act of faith to apply Christ to itself as soon as Christ is in the soul, or as soon as the habit of faith is infused into the soul: The question is, whether the soul in respect of us (who can only judge of the habit by the act) cannot be said to have sorrow or repentance before faith? the question is not, which the soul hath first in respect of God's gift, but which it acts first for our apprehension? Surely to us it first sorrows for sin, and then it acts or exerciseth faith by coming to Christ, and relying upon Christ for Salvation, &c. he grieves not only because he fears he must be damned (so Cain and Judas might) but because he knows he hath deserved to be damned: this is the more especial object of his sorrow, in that he is so wicked, so sinful, so rebellious, so contrary to God: this sin, I say, is it (wherein he was conceived, and born, wherein he hath lived, and continued) that makes him sob, and sigh, and sorrow, and mourn; and yet this sorrow is sometimes taken largely for the whole work of conversion; sometimes strictly for conviction, contrition, and humiliation; in like manner repentance is taken sometimes largely, and sometimes strictly: By this distinction it may easily appear how sorrow goes before repentance, and how repentance goes before faith. Indeed, for the latter is the great controversy, but some reconcile it thus: Repentance hath two parts, the aversion of the soul from Sin, and the conversion of the soul to God; the latter part of it is only an effect of faith, the former part of it, viz. the turning of the soul from Sin is also an effect, but not only an effect; for it is begun before faith, though it be not ended till our life end. Some object, that God works repentance and faith together: But we dispute not how God works them, but how the soul acts them; not which is in the soul first, but which appears out of the soul first: neither is it any new thing in Philosophy to say, Those causes which produce an effect, though they be in time together, yet are mutually before one another in order of nature, in diverse respects to their several causalities. Thus a man must have repentance before he have saving and justifying faith; and yet a man must have faith before the work of repentance be perfect in the soul. As we maintain repentance to be a precedent work; so we deny it not to be a subsequent effect: Sorrow is before the birth too, as the Apostle intimates, 2 Cor. 7.10. Godly sorrow works repentance, that is, sorrow prepares a man for repentance, it goes afore it, and prepares for it. And now it is, that God's spirit begins to renew his heart, as God himself proclaimeth, I will put a new spirit within them, and I will take the stony heart out of their bodies, and will give them an heart of flesh, Ezek. 11.19.

his heart that before was hard as flint, now begins to relent, and soften, and break in pieces: How so? it is God's Spirit that pricks the heart, and this pricking softens it, Dum pungit, ungit, saith Jorom, Compunction softens and supple the heart, so that be it never so stony, presently it becomes an heart of flesh; you know those that are apt to weep, or yern, or sorrow, we call them tender-hearted; you may be sure then he that is pricked, till his heart bleed inwardly, he that weeps blood (which every heart doth that is pricked on this manner) sure his heart is tender indeed; I say, tender, for as the very word imports, (< in non-Latin alphabet >) his heart weeps, why? his heart is broken: David joins these together, A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise, Psalm 51.17. And no wonder if an heart that is broken, and rent, and wounded, and pricked, falls a weeping blood; well might David say when he was broken, Psal. 38.8. (I have wept; nay more) I have roared for the very grief (or disquietness) of my heart: and again, My soul (or my heart) melteth (or droppeth) for very heaviness. Not that his heart dropt indeed, but because the tears which he shed, were not drops of water running only from his eyes (an onion may cause so much) but issuing from his heart; which heart being grieved, and sore grieved, it is said to be wounded; and so his tears coming from it, they may be called no less then very blood, drops of blood issuing from a wounded heart. Thus it is with the man now laboring in his new birth, his heart grieves, his eye weeps, whence the Proverb, The way to heaven is by weeping cross; the way to God's kingdom is to cry like children coming into the world, the way to be new born is to feel throws (as a woman laboring of child) and so is Christ formed in us. Can a man be born again without bitterness of soul? no, if ever he come to a sight of sin, and that God's sanctifying Spirit work in him sorrow for sin, his soul will mourn till he may say with Jeremy, Mine eye droppeth without stay — mine eye breaketh my heart, because of all the daughters of my City, because of all the sins of my soul, Lament. 3.51. True it is, as some infants are born with more pain to the mother, and some with less, so may the new man be regenerated in some with more, in some with less anxiety of travel; but more or less, it cannot be so little, but the man that labors in these pangs shall mourn, and mourn, There shall be a great mourning, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon, Zach. 12.11. What else? He cannot look on a Saint, that sailed not first through the Ocean of tears, and therefore he falls on his face with Abraham, he wrestles with God like Jacob, he roars out his grief with Job, he pours out his soul with Hanna, he weeps rivers of tears with David, he mourns as a dove with Hezekiah, yea, like a crane, or a swallow, so doth he chatter, Isa. 38.14. O the bitter pangs and sore travel of a man, when he must be born again.

The fourth step is, Seeking rightly for comfort: He runs not to the world, or flesh, or Devil, miserable comforters all, but to Scripture, to Prayer, or to the Ministry of God's word; if he find comfort in Scriptures, he meets with it in the Gospel; not the Law, but the Gospel (saith the Apostle) is the power of God to salvation, to everyone that believeth, Rom. 1.16. The Law is indeed the ministry of death and damnation, 2 Cor. 3.7. but the Gospel is the glad tidings of salvation, Luk. 2.10. The Law shows a man his wretched estate, but shows him no remedy, and yet we abolish not the Law, in ascribing this comfort to the Gospel only; though it be no cause of it, yet is it the occasion of it: those doleful terrors, and fears of conscience begotten by the Law, may be in their own nature the very gates and downfall to the pit of hell; yet I cannot deny, but they are certain occasions of receiving grace; and if it please God that the man, now laboring in his pangs of the new birth, do but rightly settle his thoughts on the Gospel of Christ, no doubt but thence he may suck the sweetest comforts and delights that ever were revealed to man. Or if he find comfort in prayer (to which he ever and anon repairs in every of these steps) then is it by Christ, in whose name only he approacheth to that heavenly throne of grace: no sooner had the King of Nineveh humbled himself, but his proclamation runs, Let man and beast be covered with sack cloth, and cry mightily unto God, — Who can tell if God will turn and repent, and turn away from his fierce anger, that we perish not? and thus the man now wrestling with the grievous afflictions and terrors of his conscience, Who can tell (saith he) if God will turn away his fierce anger? let me then cry mightily unto the Lord of heaven, let me cry, and continue crying, until the Lord of mercy do in mercy look upon me; and if for all this God give him a repulse, for reasons best known to himself, if at the first, second, third, fourth, or at many more times, he seem to have cried in vain, at last he flies to the ministry of the Word, and if he may have his will, he would hit upon the most skilful, experienced, searching, and sound-dealing man amongst all God's Messengers: thus was it with Peters hearers, whose hearts being pricked, and rent with legal terrors, then could they begin to cry it out, Men and brethren, what shall we do? Act. 2.37. Thus was it with the Jailor, who after his trembling and falling down to the ground in an humble abasement, could then begin to say, Sirs, what must I do to be saved? Act. 16.30. And thus the man now ready to be born again, if he find no means to assuage the rage and terrors of his guilty conscience, at last he comes to God's Minister with a What shall I do, what must I do to be saved? Alas! now I feel the wounded conscience, the broken heart, the spiritual blindness, the captivity and poverty of which often you have told me; if then there be any instruction, direction or duty, which may tend to my good, or free me from this evil, now open those lips that should preserve knowledge, now direct me in God's fear, and I will willingly follow it with my utmost endeavors.

And now (and not till now) hath God's Minister a strong and seasonable calling to amplify and magnify the soul-saving sufficiency of Christ's death and passion; were the blood of Christ, and promise of Salvation proffered to an unwounded conscience, what were it, but like the pouring of a most sovereign balsam upon a sound member of man? It is the only, right, everlasting method, first to wound by the Law, and then to heal by the Gospel; first to cause smart for sin, and then to lay to a plaster of Christ's blood; and therefore when the heart is broken, then hath the man of God his warrant to bind it up again, then may he magnify God's mercy, then may he set out to the height the heavenly beauty of Christ's passion and person, and thus playing the Midwife by his high and holy art of comforting the afflicted, at last the child of God (prepared for his birth) becomes a man born again.

The fifth step is a clear (I say not a general sight, which he had before) but The clear sight of Christ laid open to the eye of Faith; no sooner is the poor wounded soul informed thoroughly in the mystery and mercy of the Gospel, but he then looks on his Savior as the Jews on the brazen serpent, and seeing him lifted up on the cross, he cannot but see in him an infinite treasury of mercy and love, a boundless and bottomless sea of tender-heartedness and pity, a whole heaven of sweetness, happiness, peace and pleasures; After the spirit of bondage, enters the Spirit of adoption; the terrors of the Law leads him to the comforts of the Gospel, his sorrow for sin brings him to the clear light of his Savior; and then as a man in death-pangs, that lifts up his eyes to heaven whence cometh his help, so he in birth-pangs lifts up his eyes to Christ, who must either help him, or he sinks under his sin to the bottomless bottom of hell. And I must tell you, this sight of Christ Jesus to an humbled sinner (together with those glorious privileges which he brings with him, as Reconciliation to God, forgiveness of sins, adoption, justification, righteousness, wisdom, sanctification, redemption, it is a most pleasant, ravishing, heavenly sight: *Not Solomon in all his royalty, no, nor the lilies of the field arrayed better than Solomon; not all the curious sights on earth, nor all those glittering spangles in heaven, can possibly afford such pleasure or delight to the eye of man, as doth this one object (Christ bleeding on the cross) to the soul of a sinner. Imagine that you saw some malefactor (whose trial and doom were past) to be led to the doleful place of execution; imagine that you heard him wail and weep for his mis-spent time, for his bloody acts, for his heinous crimes; yea imagine his wailings and weepings so bitter, that they were able to force tears from others, and to make all eyes shoot and water that but looked upon him; if this man in this case should suddenly see his King running and riding towards him with his pardon in his hand, what a sight would this be? sure there is none to this. Thus, thus it is with the man sorrowing for sin, whilst he is weeping his case, and confessing what a little step there is betwixt him and damnation (as if he were now at hells mouth, the very place of execution) in a maze he looks upon Christ, whom he sees with a spear in his side, with thorns in his head, with nails in his feet, with a pardon in his hands, offering it to all men that will but receive it by faith. O here's a sight indeed, able to revive the wickedst man upon earth, dead in sins and trespasses. And now there is hopes of the birth, if it once come to this, there is more then probability of an happy delivery, we may call it the stirrings of God's child, or the first feelings of life, before he is born again.]*

The sixth step is, An hungering desire after Christ and his merits, and to this step blessed are they that arrive; Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled, Matth. 5.6. Filled? how? I will give unto him that is athirst, of the fountain of the water of life freely, Revel. 21.6. this is the step (as if it were in Jacob's ladder) that raiseth him on high towards heaven; it is such a token of true faith, that he who hath it, needs no more doubt that he believeth, then he that breatheth needs to doubt that he liveth; and why? his thirst of worldly things is cooled, his thirst of heavenly things inflamed.

Object. But Christ saith, He that drinks of the water that I shall give him, shall never thirst.

Sol. Non siti miserae indigentiae, sed siti copiosioris fruitionis. No hungry man did ever with more appetite wish for meat, nor thirsty man for drink, nor covetous man for money, nor ambitious man for glory, then he now longeth to be reconciled unto God in Christ; in this case, had he the pleasures and profits of a thousand worlds, willingly would he part with all for the application of Christ's sufferings, it is that sovereign blood that can only heal his soul, it is that bitter passion which can only quench his thirst; give him but the merits of Christ's death (whereby God and he may be at one) and he cares not though he suffer death and hell again, yea he will venture goods, life, all; or if that be not it which the Lord requires, he will do whatever behooves him, even sell all, all that he hath, part with all sin that he loveth, yea were it his right hand, or his right eye, nothing shall be dear to him, so that he may enjoy his Savior. O here's a thirst above all thirsts! it breeds ardent desires, vehement longings, unutterable groans, mighty gaspings, just like the dry and thirsty ground, that gasps, and cleaves, and opens for drops of rain. David, though in the desert of Ziph, a barren and dry land without water, yet he complains most because of his thirst, My soul thirsteth for thee O God, Psal. 63.1. This is that violent affection that God puts into the hearts of those who seek him in sincerity and truth; never was Ahab more sick for a vineyard, nor Sisera for milk, nor Sampson for water, when God was fain to open him a fountain in the jaw of an ass, then is a truly humbled soul after Christ, ever thirsting and longing, that he may hide himself in his righteousness, and bathe himself in that blood which his Savior shed for him. I have read of a gracious woman, who laboring in these pangs, and longing after Christ Jesus, cried out, I have born nine children with as great pain as other women, and yet I would with all my heart bear them all over again, yea bear them, and bear them all the days of my life, to be assured of my part in Christ Jesus. One replying; Doth not your heart desire and long after him? Oh! (said she) I have an husband and children, and many other comforts, I would give them all, and all the good I shall ever see in this world, or in in the world to come, to have my poor thirsty soul refreshed with that precious blood of my Savior. So eager and earnest is the heart of each man (parched with the angry countenance of God) after this blood of his; I thirst, I faint, I languish, I long (saith he) for one drop of mercy; my spirit is melted in me into tears of blood; my heart, because of sin, is so shaken and shivered; my soul, because of sorrow, is so wasted and parched, that my thirst is insatiable, my bowels are hot within me, my desire after Christ is extremely great and greedy. Stay! all these expressions are far short of those longings, no man knoweth them, save he that receives them, save he that is born again.]

The seventh step is, A relying on Christ: no sooner he considers and remembers those many melting invitations of our Lord and Savior: If any man thirst, let him come unto me: Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters: Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden with sin: but (resting himself on the impregnable truth of these blessed promises) he throws himself into the merciful and meritorious arms of his crucified Lord. Come life, come death, come heaven, come hell, come what come will, here will he stick forever: Who (saith Paul) shall separate us from the love of Christ? Shall tribulation, or distress, or persecution, or famine, or nakedness, or peril, or sword? No: I am persuaded (not these, nor more then these) neither death, nor life, nor Angels, nor Principalities, nor Powers, nor things present, nor things to come, nor height, nor depth, nor any other creature, shall be able to separate us from the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord, Rom. 8.35, 38, 39. Thus it is with the man laboring in this birth: what (saith he) doth Christ call the heavy laden? why, Lord, I am heavy laden with a weight, a mass of sin, and if he may come that is called, Lord, I come, I come, and now I am come, with thee will I build my tabernacle, with thee will I rest forever. Nor is this any wonder, experience tells us, the hunted beast flies unto his den, the wounded man hies unto the Surgeon, and so the poor man broken and bruised with the weight of sin, how should he otherwise but cast himself willingly into the sweet compassionate inviting arms and embracements of Christ, whose promises run, I will ease him, I will refresh him? You may see sometimes a little infant, upon apprehension and approach of some sudden danger, how hastily he runs into his mothers arms: even so a truly wounded soul (pursued by the terrors of the Law, and frightened with the angry countenance of Almighty God) it flies with speed into the bosom of its blessed Redeemer, there it clings unto his blessed wounds, there it rests upon his meritorious death, there it grasps about his crucified body, there it hides itself in the clefts of this Rock, yea there it sticks with this full resolution, that should all terrors, all temptations, all men, all devils, combine together to cast him into hell, they should tear him, rent him, pull him, hale him from the bleeding wounds, and tender bowels of his heavenly Savior. This was Jobs case, who in the bitterest of his pangs could cry it out, saying, Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him, Job 13.15. And I must tell you, this affiance, dependence, adherence, reliance (or whatsoever else we call it) upon the merits of Christ, is the right justifying faith, whither if a man once come, there is but one degree more, and he is then born again.]

The last and highest step is, Universal obedience to Christ. No sooner hath he cast himself upon him, but he takes him (not only as a Savior to redeem him from the miseries of sin, but) as an husband, a Lord, a King, to serve him, love him, honor him, and obey him: Now will he take his yoke upon him; now will he bear his cross and follow after him; now will he enter into the narrow way; now will he walk in the holy path; now will he associate himself to that sect and brotherhood that is everywhere spoken against; now will he oppose himself against all sin whatsoever; now will he shake off his old companions, brethren in iniquity; now will he keep peace and a good conscience towards God and man; now will he watch over his secret sins, lustful thoughts, occasions of evil; now will he direct his words to the glorifying of God, and to give grace to the hearers; now will he conform all his actions to the sovereignty of grace; now will he delight in the word, the ways, the Saints, the services of God; now will he never more turn again unto folly, or to his trade of sin, yea though Satan set upon him with baits and allurements, to detain him in his bondage, but by one darling-delight, one minion-sin, yet he resolves to answer him as Moses did Pharaoh, There shall not so much as an hoof be left behind; for well he knows, one breach in the City exposeth it to the enemy, one leak in a ship will sink it in the sea, one stab in the heart will speed a man to death, one knot in a thread will stay the needles passage as well as five hundred, and therefore he will sell all, all that he hath, even all his sins, to the last filthy rag of his minion-delight, his bewitching-beloved-bosom-sin. And now is the new man born amongst us, will you view him? Old things are passed away, behold, all things are become new, 1 Cor. 5.17. His heart, his eye, his ear, his tongue, his understanding, his will, his memory, his conscience; his love, his hatred, his hope, his fear, his joy, his sorrow; will you anymore? his thoughts, his words, his actions, his affections, are all new; this conversion is universal, this change is a through change; now is Christ formed in him, now is he transformed into a new creature, before he was in making a new man, but now he is made new, God the Father accepts him for his son, God the Son stamps on him the Image of his Father, but more immediately God the Holy Ghost hath thus molded and fashioned him, as I have let you see him, and now he is born again] which except a man be,—he (shall not) cannot see the kingdom of God.

Lo here those steps that raise up a man to the state of regeneration, A sight of sin, Sense of misery, Sorrow for sin, Seeking for comfort, A sight of Christ, Desire after Christ, Relying on Christ, Obedience to Christ: one word more before we have done.

You see how God brings along the man whom he purposeth to make his; [Use. 1] and yet let no truly humbled sinner be discouraged if he observe not so distinctly the order of these steps, and especially in that degree as (you see) we have related; for if in substance and effect they have been wrought in them, if he have them in truth (though perhaps not in this degree) I dare pronounce of him, that he is surely born again. It is one of our worthies hath said it, that in our humiliations, and other preparative dispositions, we do not prescribe precisely just such a measure and quantity, we do not determine peremptorily upon such or such a degree and height, we leave that to the wisdom of our great Master in heaven, the only wise God, who is a most free agent: But sure we are, a man must have so much, and in that measure, as thoroughly to humble him, and then to bring him to his Savior; he must be weary of all his sins, and of Satan's bondage wholly, willing to pluck out his right eye, and cut off his right hand, I mean to part with his best-beloved bosom lusts, to sell all, and not to leave so much as an hoof behind; he must see his danger, and so haste to the City of refuge; he must be sensible of his spiritual misery, that he may heartily thirst for mercy; he must find himself lost and cast away in himself, that Christ may be all in all unto him; and after must follow an hatred of all false and evil ways for the time to come, a through-change of former courses, company, conversation, and setting himself in the way and practice of sobriety, honesty, and holiness. The sum is, of every soul is required thus much: first, a truly penitent sight, sense, and hatred of all sin: secondly, a sincere and insatiable thirst after Jesus Christ, and righteousness, both imputed and inherent: thirdly, an unfeigned, and unreserved resolution of an universal new obedience for the time to come. If any man hath had the experience of these affections and effects in his own soul, whatsoever the measure be (less or more) he is safe enough, and may go on comfortably in the holy path.

Now then let me advise thee (whomsoever thou art that readest) to enter into thine own soul, [Use 2] and examine thine own state, whether or no thou art yet born again: Search and see, whether as yet the spirit of bondage hath wrought its effects in thee; that is to say, whether thou hast been enlightened, convinced, and terrified with a sensible apprehension, and particular acknowledgement of thy wretched estate: Search and see, whether as yet the Spirit of adoption hath sealed thee for his own; that is to say, Whether (after thy heart being broken, thy spirit bruised, thy soul humbled, thy conscience wounded and awaked) thou hast had a sight of Christ, and hast thirsted after him, and hast cast thyself on him, and hast followed his ways and Commandments by an universal obedience? If upon search thou canst say (without self-deceit) that so it is with thee, then mayest thou bless God that ever thou wast born, certainly (I dare say it) thou art born again. But if thou hast not sense or feeling of these works, if all I have spoken are very mysteries to thee, what shall I say? but if ever, if ever thou meanest to see the kingdom of God, strive, struggle, endeavor with thy might and main to become truly regenerate: thus whilst the Minister speaks, it is Christ that comes with power in the word, Ezek. 18.31, 32. thou mayest say perhaps, it is not in thy power, thou art only a mere patient, and God's Spirit the agent, and who can command the spirit of the Lord, that bloweth where he listeth, at his own will and pleasure? I answer, It is indeed the Spirit, and not man, that regenerates or sanctifies: but I answer withal, The doctrine of the Gospel is the ministration of the Spirit, and wheresoever that is preached (as I preach it now to thee) there is the holy Ghost present, and thither he comes to regenerate: nay, I can say more, there is a common work of illumination, that makes way for regeneration; and this common work puts a power into man of doing that, which when he shall do, the Spirit of God may, nay will in the day of his power mightily work in him, to his quickening and purging; if then as yet thou feelest not this mighty work of God in thee, and yet fain wouldst feel it, and gladly dost desire it (otherwise I confess it is in vain to speak) follow me in these passages; I shall lend thee two wings to bear thee, two hands to lead thee to the foot of this ladder, where if thou ascend these steps aforesaid, I dare certainly pronounce of thee, thou art the man born again.]

The first wing is Prayer, which first brings thee to God's throne, and (there, if thou hast thy request) then to the new birth; if I must acquaint thee how to pray; Hos. 14.2. Take with you words, and turn to the Lord; say unto him, take away all iniquity, and receive us graciously,—and then it follows, I will heal their backsliding, I will love them freely, ver. 4. Jerem. 30.18. I have surely heard Ephraim bemoaning himself thus, Thou hast chastised me, and I was chastised, as a bullock unaccustomed to the yoke, turn thou me, and I shall be turned. The soul may object, I may say thus, and be no better: But I answer, say it, though you be no better, because God bids you say it: Say it, and say it again; it may be he will come in when you say it, Hosea 14.4. Pray that God would please to prepare thy heart, to sanctify thy affections, to order thy will, to preserve thee from sin, to prepare thee for growth unto full holiness and righteousness: this was the effect of Jeremiah's prayer, Convert me, O Lord, and I shall be converted; heal me, O Lord, and I shall be healed; save me, O Lord, and I shall be saved: Turn thou us, O good Lord, and so shall we be turned, Jer. 17.14. and Lament. 5.21. It is the Lord that converts, and heals, and saves, and turns; and Prayer is the means to produce this effect in thee: when we are required to pray, to repent, and believe, we are not to seek strength in ourselves, but to search into the Covenant, and turn the promise into prayer. As the Command is, Repent, Act. 17.30. Now the Covenant is, Christ shall give repentance, Act. 5.31. and therefore pray, Turn thou me, and I shall be turned, Jer. 31.18. then bow thy knees, and humbly, heartily, frequently, fervently implore the influence of God's blessed spirit: Cry with the Spouse in the Canticles, Awake, O Northwind, and come thou Southwind, and blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow forth, Cantic. 4.16. The more rushing and mighty this wind of the Spirit is, the more will he make thee fructify in his graces and blessings; therefore cry again and again, O Lord, let thy Spirit come upon me: create in me a clean heart, O God, and renew a right spirit within me. O Lord Jesu, send thy Spirit into me, which may restore me from this death of sin, unto the life of holiness. Thus wouldest thou ask, and continue asking; thus wouldest thou cry, and continue crying, then could I assure thee of the promise which God hath made, and cannot deny, he that asketh receiveth; and, he that seeketh findeth; and, to him that knocketh (by continuance and perseverance) it shall be opened, Mat. 7.8.

The second wing, or hand, that bears and leads thee to these steps of the new birth, is, Constant hearing of the Word: thou must attend the gates of wisdom, and wait on her posts; thou must come to God's house, and hearken to the ministry of the Word: no doubt, but if thou beest constant in this duty, God will stir up some good Samuel, God will use some of his Priests (consecrated to that office) to beget thee again: Understand this soberly; for if Jesus Christ himself should preach to the soul every day, and give not out of himself, the ordinance would be empty to it: it is Christ's coming in to his people in the ordinances, that only fills the empty soul with good things. To this purpose are God's Ministers called Spiritual Fathers, I have begotten you (saith Saint Paul) through the ministration of the Gospel, 1 Cor. 4.15. The Pastors tongue is the Lord's Conduit-pipe, and hereby he drives the sweet and wholesome waters of life into the souls of his chosen; only do thou frequent the means, and thou shalt see at one time or other, God will remember thee in mercy: It is true, I know not when; and therefore I wish thee miss no Lord's-day to repair to God's house, lest the day of thy neglect might have been the day of thy conversion; certain it is, no man should expect God's blessing without his ordinances; no eating of bread without plowing and sowing, no recovering of health without eating and drinking, no posting on land without somewhat to ride on, no passage on seas, without somewhat to sail in; so no blessing, no grace, no regeneration, no new birth at all, without waiting upon God in his ways, and in his ordinances. Now then, as thou desirest heaven, or (the way to heaven) to be born again, I beseech thee make high account of this ordinance of God, the preaching of his Word: In preaching of the Gospel, light, motion, and power goes out to all, which men resist: and some are destroyed, not because they could not believe, but because they resist, and will not obey, and so die, Act. 7.51. Luke 13.34. Ezek. 33.11. Hos. 13.9. and yet I wish thee not only to hear it, but after thou hast heard, consider of it, ponder on it, and lay the threats and reproofs, the precepts and promises, unto thine own soul: thus if thou hearest and meditatest, I doubt not but God's word will be a Word of power to thee, and (together with prayer) bring thee towards the new birth, whither except a man come, he cannot (possibly) see the kingdom of God.

Thus far of the new birth: you see we have mounted those steps, whose top (like Jacob's ladder) reacheth up to heaven; witness the next word, he that is born again shall see the kingdom of God, but he that is not born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

He cannot see the kingdom of God.]

The privileges of the new birth are these two, to see,] and to see the kingdom of God.]

First, to see,] Which is all one (saith a Modern) as to enjoy: yet a man may see that which he doth not enjoy; but without regeneration there is no sight, much less possession of the kingdom of God.

To see then is the lesser happiness, of which the unregenerate are debarred; but to see, in itself is a great and gracious privilege, to which the regenerate are admitted: for whether by God's kingdom be meant the kingdom of grace, or the kingdom of glory, Happy are the eyes that see these things.

But whose eyes are they? If we examine the unregenerate, he sees no whit into the awful Majesty of God the Father, he sees no whit of the beauty, mercy, and pity of his Savior, he sees no whit into that glorious highness of God's Spirit in Heaven, nor yet of his nighness to his brethren on earth: Hence it is, that when he comes into the Temple, among the Congregation of God's Saints, his soul is not delighted with their prayers, praises, Psalms, and Service; he sees no comfort, no pleasure, no content in their actions. But the new man is of better sight, the graces of the Spirit, and the ward-robe of God's glory are all produced to his eye, as if the Lord should say, Come, and see: so Moses, Stand still, and see the salvation of God: so Christ to his Apostles, It is given to your eyes to see these things, to others but by parables. He that is born again hath a spiritual eye, and a celestial object, The eye of his understanding is enlightened (saith St. Paul:) anointed (saith S. John:) To what end? But that he may know what is the hope of his calling, and what the riches of the glory of his inheritance is in the Saints, Ephes. 1.18. See a privilege, of which the unregenerate is ever barred, his mind is dark, even darkness itself, Ephes. 5.8. And therefore it is no wonder, what is said by our Savior, that he cannot, cannot see] the kingdom of God.

The second privilege is the object of this sight, here called the kingdom of God.] By which some understand Heaven, some the way to Heaven; most of the Ancients say, that by this Kingdom is meant Heaven: Calvin is of mind, that not heaven, but a spiritual life is thereby understood: Aretius saith (and I am of his mind) that whether we understand the one or the other, It matters not much: Sure we are, that both these (Grace and Glory) are annexed to the new birth, and both very well may be implied in this word, the kingdom of God.]

First then, if by the kingdom of God is meant the kingdom of Grace (whereof our Savior speaketh, The kingdom of God is within you, Luke 17.21.) See to what a privilege the new man hath attained, all the graces of God, all the fruits of the Spirit are now poured into him: If you ask what graces? what fruits? St. Paul tells you, Gal. 5.22. Love, joy, peace, long-sufferings, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance: or would you have us to contract them? St. Paul doth it elsewhere, the kingdom of God is—righteousness, peace, and joy in the holy Ghost, Rom. 14.17.

First, Righteousness, and that is either active or passive; holiness of life, or (the cause of this holiness) our righteousness in Christ: If the first be meant, no sooner is man born again, but he enters into the holy path, he declines all evil, and stands at the sword point with his most beloved sin; or if ever any sin (through the violence of temptation) seize on him again, he is presently put again into the pangs of the new birth, and so renewing his sorrow, and repairing repentance, he becomes more resolute and watchful over all his ways: And as he abhors evil, so he cleaves to that which is good; his faith like the Sun, sets all those gracious heavenly stars on shining, as hope, and love, and zeal, and humility, and patience; in a word, universal obedience, and fruitfulness in all good works: not one, but all good duties of the first and second Table, begin to be natural and familiar to him, and though he find some duties more difficult, yet he resolveth, and striveth to do what he can, and is much displeased and grieved, if he do not as he should. Or if by righteousness is meant passive righteousness, to wit, our righteousness in Christ, no sooner is a man born again, but he is clothed with this righteousness; the other (God knows) is but weak and full of imperfection, and therefore to speak properly, It is the righteousness in God, that makes us appear righteous afore God: would you have a plain case? as Jacob to procure the blessing of his father, hid himself into the apparel of his brother, and so received it to his own commodity, under the person of another: thus the new man puts on the righteousness of Christ, with which being clad as with a garment, God accepts him in his stead, his faults being covered with his Saviors perfection.

Secondly, from this Righteousness ariseth Peace: no sooner is man righteous, but he is at peace with man, at peace with God, at peace with himself. He is at peace with man; The wolf shall dwell with the Lamb, and the Leopard with the Kid, saith the Prophet, Isa. 11.6. The meaning is, that in the kingdom of Christ, when a man is called into the state of grace (howsoever by nature he is a Wolf, or a Leopard, or a Lyon, or a Bear, yet) he shall then lay aside his cruelty, and live peaceably with all men, with all men, I say, bad and good; for if bad, the Apostle implies them, As much as in you is, have peace with all men, Rom. 12.18. Or if good, then he cannot but have peace with them, yea, although before his conversion he hated and maligned them, yet now he is ravished with the delight and love of them, and to this end he labors might and main to ingratiate himself into their blessed Communion; true, how should he but love them, and sympathize with them, whom he believes one day to meet in Heaven, and there to enjoy them, and they him forever? Nor is this all, he is at peace with God, he hath humbled himself, and confessed his fault, and cried for mercy, and cast himself upon Christ, and vowed amendment of life; so that now God by his word hath spoke peace to his soul, by the mediation of Christ it is obtained, and by the testimony of the Spirit he feels it within him. This is that Peace which passeth all understanding, it made the Angels sing; Peace upon earth, it makes his soul reply, My peace is in heaven: what else? The storm is past, and the rain is gone away, he that lay for a night in the darkness of sorrow, and weeping for his sins, now he beholds the Son of righteousness appear (as the Disciples often did upon the Mount of Olives, signifying peace) all quiet, and calm, and pleasant. Nor is this all, he is at peace with himself, I mean his own conscience; that which before stirred up the fire, that brought him to a sight of sin, and sense of Divine Wrath, that filled him with fearful terrors, compunction, remorse, and true sorrow for sin, it is now turned good and quiet. Solomon calls it a continual feast, Prov. 15.15. who are the attendants but the holy Angels? what is the cheer, but joy in the Holy Ghost? who is the feast-maker but God himself, and his good Spirit dwelling in him? Nor is this feast without music, God's word and his actions make a blessed harmony, and he endeavors to continue it by keeping peace and a good conscience towards God and man.

Thirdly, from this peace issueth joy in the holy Ghost; no sooner is a man at peace with man, with God, with himself, but he is filled with joy that no man can take from him; this joy I take to be those blessed stirrings of the heart, when the seal of remission of sins is first set unto the soul by the spirit of Adoption; For thus it is, the soul having newly passed the pangs of the new birth, it is presently bath'd in the blood of Christ, lull'd in the bosom of God's mercies, secured by the Spirit of its inheritance above; and so ordinarily follows a Sea of comfort, a sensible taste of everlasting pleasures, as if the man had already one foot in heaven. But I hear some object, They have felt the pangs, cast themselves on Christ, resolved against all sin, and yet no comfort comes. It may be so, though not ordinarily; certain it is, whosoever hath this joy is new born, yet not everyone new born hath this joy; if any then be in such case, let him hear what the Spirit of truth saith, Since the beginning of the world men have not heard, nor perceived by the ear, neither hath the eye seen, O God, besides thee, what he hath prepared for him that waiteth for him, Isaiah 64.4. Waiting patiently (saith a Modern) for the Lord's coming to comfort us, either in temporal or spiritual distresses, is a right pleasing and acceptable duty and service unto God, which he is wont to crown with multiplied and overflowing refreshings when he comes. To this end saith the Prophet, They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength, they shall mount up with wings as Eagles, they shall run and not be weary, and they shall walk and not faint, Isa. 40.31. Nay, and should a man die (saith my Author) in this state of waiting, if his heart in the mean time sincerely hate all sin, heartily thirst for the mercy of God in Christ, and resolve truly upon new universal obedience for the time to come, he shall certainly be saved; because the holy Ghost saith, Blessed are all they that wait for him, Isa. 30.18. Or if this will not satisfy his desire, let his desire quicken and set on work (with extraordinary fervency) the spirit of prayer, let him have recourse again and again unto the promises of Scripture towards the poor, heavy-laden, penitent souls; and when the time is come (if it will come) which God hath appointed, then shall he feel this joy unspeakable, the joy of the Holy Ghost; and this is the head, the height, the top, the highest step in this kingdom of grace, the kingdom of God.

Or secondly, if by the kingdom of God is meant the kingdom of glory, see then what a privilege waits on the new man; no sooner shall his breath and body be divorced, but his soul mounted on the wings of Angels, shall straight be carried above the starry firmament, there shall it inherit the kingdom, Luke 12.32. an heavenly kingdom, Matth. 7.21. the kingdom of God, Act. 14.22. and truly called so, for 'tis a kingdom of God's own making, beautifying and blessing; a kingdom beseeming the glorious residence of the King of kings; a kingdom creating all Kings that but inhabit in it. But here my discourse must give way to your meditations: I cannot speak this privilege, therefore conclude with Austin, Anima quae amat ascendat frequenter, & currat per plateas caelestis Jerusalem, visitando Patriarchas, salutando Prophetas, admirando exercitus. Mount your meditations on the wings of faith, and behold in Heaven those states of wonder, Patriarchs shining, Prophets praising, Saints admiring, hands clapping, harps warbling, hearts dancing, the exercise a song, the ditty Alleluiah, the quiristers Saints, the consorts Angels, &c. In this fountain of pleasure let the new-born Christian bathe his soul, for his it is, and he it is only that shall see it, enjoy it; Except the man born again, no man shall ever see the kingdom of God.

Thus far of the privileges of the new birth; there waits on it the eye of faith, and righteousness, and peace, and joy in the Holy Ghost; in a word, the kingdom of grace, and the kingdom of glory.

And now (beloved) say, [Use.] what would you do to obtain these privileges? should any hand reach you a Crown for the pains to take it? should any but cast at your feet a bag of gold, and you might make it your own for the stooping, would you not for so great a reward do so little a service? and what is God's service but perfect freedom, the yoke is easy, the burden is light, but the reward is grace, glory, endless felicity. Bestir then yourselves, and if ever you mean to see the kingdom of God, endeavor to run through this new birth, and to lead a better life than heretofore you have done. Thus whilst the Minister speaks, Christ comes with power, and therefore he speaks and persuades. I conclude with my speeth to thee (whosoever thou art) into whose hands this Book is fallen: the truth is, the work is weak, and answerable in that kind to the Author of it: many and many a stitch in my side, many a pull at my heart, many a gripe in my stomach (besides the pangs of my soul endeavoring to practice what I have writ) have I suffered and felt since I first begun it; and yet the comfort I have received myself in this one necessary thing, hath made me (contrary to the desires of my best friends) to run through this short work, by taking a longer time, as my continual disease would now and then suffer me. If (when I am gone) thou reapest any spiritual good by this my surviving pains, it is, next to God's glory, all my desire; Yet I live, but to save thy soul I care not how soon I might die, yea on that condition I could be willing (if God so pleased) the lines that thou readest were writ with the warmest blood in my heart: willing, said I? yea, I could be willing and glad (as little blood as I have in my body) to let it run and run, for thy spiritual good, to the very last drop in my veins. I say no more, consider what I have said, Except a man be born again, he cannot see the kingdom of God.

An appendix, containing a more particular Method, for the man not yet born again, to have his part in the second birth.

CHAP. I. The occasion and method of this Treatise.

SOME there are, who hearing the new birth (or first repentance) to be so necessary to salvation, but never feeling in themselves any such change or conversion, have therefore desired further helps, though naturally thou art blind, and wretched, and miserable, and poor, and naked; yet the Lord hath not left thee without means and helps: to this purpose he hath set up his ordinances; not that man of himself can dispose himself unto grace, but that the Spirit of Christ in the use of the ordinances (without any habitual or sanctifying grace in man's heart) can dispose of man to the reception of habitual or sanctifying grace. True it is, I advised them in the former Treatise to be frequent in prayer, and in hearing of the word: But so we have done, say they, and yet we feel no conversion: it may be so, for not always the doing of them, but perseverance in them through Christ obtains the blessing desired. And yet if they will out of hand settle themselves to the work, It is the Lord that saith, Break up the fallow ground, Jer. 4.3. (i.) seek to the Lord to break them for thee: Be in the use of the means, and the Lord may come in, and break thy heart. I shall, for their further satisfaction, give them a more particular Method, and without a Text taken, take myself more liberty to put them in the way.

Two things I suppose necessary for them that would have part in the new birth,

- 1. To get into it.
- 2. To be delivered of it.
- 1. The means to get into it, is
 - 1. Examination of themselves.
 - 2. Confession of their sins.
 - 3. Hearty prayer for the softening of their hearts.
- By which three are procured the three first steps,
 - Sight of sin.

- Sense of divine wrath.
- Sorrow for sin.
- 2. The means to be delivered of it, is by application of the promises, and these, according to their several objects, produce their several effects; some
 - A sight of Christ.
 - A desire after Christ.
 - A relying on Christ.
 - An obedience to Christ.
 - A comfort in Christ, not only sought for, but obtained, if the promises be rightly applied.

CHAP. II.

Sect. 1. The first means to get into the new birth.

THE means to get into the new birth, is first Examination; and the way to examine, is to set before men that Chrystal glass of the Law for their light and rule: To this purpose I have here annexed a Catalogue, or Table, to show them their offenses; not that I can possibly enumerate all sins, but only the kinds; and if herein I come short, yet consciences awaked may be occasioned hereby to bring into their thoughts those others not mentioned.

Now then (whosoever thou art that beginn'st this blessed work) examine thyself by this Catalogue, but do it warily, and truly, and where thou find'st thyself guilty, either note it in this book, or transcribe it into some paper, that so they may be ready for thine eye when thou comest to Confession.

Sect. 2. Sins against the first Commandment.

IN every Commandment we must observe both the duties required, and sins forbidden, for both these are implied in everyone of the Commandments; if in the first thou art guilty, thou must answer negatively; if in the second, thou must answer affirmatively: now then to proceed.

It is the first Commandment, Thou shalt have no other gods but me.

For the duties here required,

Say first, Hast thou ever in mind, will, and affections, took the true God in Christ to be thy God? Secondly, hast thou abounded in those graces by which thou shouldst cleave unto God, as in the warmth of knowledge, and love, and fear, and joy, and trusting in God? Thirdly, hast thou observed God's mercies, and promises, and works, and judgments upon thee, and (by a particular application) took special notice thereof? Fourthly, hast thou communicated with the godly, and joined thyself to God's people, and delighted chiefly in them?

Or for the sins here forbidden,

Say first, hast thou not sometimes been guilty of blasphemy, or idolatry, or witchcraft, or atheism, or epicurism, or heresy? Secondly, hast thou not been guilty of pride, a sin flatly opposing God, and first committed by devils? Thirdly, hast thou not had inward reasonings that there is no God, or that he seeth not, or knoweth not, or that there is no profit in his service? Fourthly, hast thou not failed to love God, and fear God, and to put thy whole trust in God? Fifthly, hast thou not trusted in man, or feared man, or loved the world, and thereby alienated thy heart from God? Sixthly, hast thou not resorted to witches, or in the first place to Physicians, and not to the living God? Seventhly, hast thou not tempted God, and in the matters of God, been either cold or lukewarm, or preposterously zealous? Eighthly, hast thou not a proneness to sin, yea to rebel against God in thy whole man? Ninthly, hast thou not been careless to perform the inward duties of God's worship in sincerity and truth? if in these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broken this Commandment, Thou shalt have no gods but me.

Sect. 3. Sins against the second Commandment.

IT is the second Commandment, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image.]

For the duties here required.

Say first, hast thou ever worshipped the true God purely according to his will? Secondly, hast thou observed all those outward duties of his worship, as prayer, and vows, and fasting, and meditating, and the rest? Thirdly, hast thou repaired to God's house, observed family duties, received the Preachers of the Gospel?

Or for the sins here forbidden.

Say first, hast thou not sometimes walked after the imaginations of thy own heart, serving God out of custom, or (after the manner of thy forefathers) by will-worship and superstitions? Secondly, hast thou not committed idol worship, conceiving of God in thy mind, or respecting him in thy sense in the likeness of a creature? Thirdly, hast thou not mentioned the names of other gods, either by way of swearing, or apology? Fourthly, hast thou not made an image to liken God to it, or used any gesture of love and reverence to any such images? Fifthly, in a word, hast thou not been careless to worship God, to call upon the Lord, to receive God's Ministers, or to perform any other of the outward duties of God's worship? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broken this Commandment, Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image.

Sect. 4. Sins against the third Commandment.

IT is the third Commandment, Thou shalt not take the Name of the Lord thy God in vain.]

For the duties required:

Say first, hast thou been ever a constant learner, hearer, and doer of God's Word and Will? Secondly, hast thou prayed with perseverance, understanding, and power of the Spirit, without doubting or wavering? Thirdly, hast thou come preparedly to the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper, and being come, hast thou discerned the Lord's body? Fourthly, hast thou used all the titles, and properties, and works, and ordinances of the Lord with knowledge, faith, reverence, joy, and sincerity?

Or for the sins here forbidden:

Say first, hast thou not sometimes in thy talk dishonored the titles, attributes, religion, word, people of God, or anything that hath in it the print of his holiness? Secondly, hast thou not sworn or forsworn, or loved false oaths? Thirdly, hast thou not caused the name of religion, or people of God to be evil thought of by thy ill course of life, or by committing some gross sin? Fourthly, hast thou not rashly, or unpreparedly, or heedlessly read the Word, heard Sermons, received the Sacraments, or performed any other part of the worship of God? Fifthly, hast thou not thought or spoken blasphemously, or contemptuously of God, or of anything whatsoever pertaining to God? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broken this Commandment, Thou shalt not take the Name of the Lord thy God in vain.

Sect. 5. Sins against the fourth Commandment.

IT is the fourth Commandment, Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day.

For the duties here required.

Say first, hast thou (according to the equity of this Commandment) ever observed the Lord's day, and other days and times set apart for God's service? Secondly, hast thou on those days rested from the servile works of sin, and rested and relied upon Christ, for the remission of sins, and led an holy and religious life, that so thou mayest enter into that rest of heaven? Thirdly, hast thou always prepared thy heart, before thou wentest into the house of the Lord, by meditation of God's Word and Works, by examination and reformation of thy ways, by prayer, thanksgiving, and holy resolution to carry thyself as in God's presence, and to hear and obey whatsoever thou shouldst learn out of the pure Word of God? Fourthly, hast thou repaired to God's house in due time, and stayed the whole time of Prayer, reading, preaching of the Word, singing of Psalms, receiving of the Sacraments? Fifthly, hast thou performed private religious offices upon the Lord's day, to wit, In private prayer and thanksgiving, in acknowledging thy offenses to God, in reconciling thyself to those thou hast offended, or with whom thou art at variance; in visiting the sick, comforting the afflicted, contributing to the necessity of the poor, instructing thy Children and servants (and the rest of thy family) in the fear and nurture of the Lord?

Or for the sins here forbidden:

Say first, hast thou not sometime spent the Lord's day in idleness, or in worldly business, in vanities, or in sin? Secondly, hast thou not omitted public duties, or comest in too late, or wentest out too soon? Thirdly, hast thou not on those days sold wares, carried burdens, brought in sheaves, or wrought in the harvest? Fourthly, hast thou not employed thy cattle, or servants, or children, or any other, though thou workest not thyself? Fifthly, hast thou not profaned the Lord's day, by needless works, words, or thoughts, about thy calling, or about thy recreation? Sixthly, have not the strict observance of the duties of that day been tedious unto thee, saying in thine heart, When will the day be gone? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broken this Commandment, Remember that thou keep holy the Sabbath day.

Sect. 6. Sins against the fifth Commandment.

IT is the fifth Commandment, Honor thy father and thy mother.]

For the duties here required, they are either in

- Family.
- Common-weal.
- Church.

First, for the Family: Say, if thou art an husband; 1. Hast thou ever loved thy wife, and dealt with her according to knowledge, giving honor to her as to the weaker vessel, and as being heirs together of the grace of life, that your prayers were not hindered? If thou art a wife: 2. Hast thou submitted to thine own husband, as unto the Lord in everything? 3. Hast thou put on the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, which is in the sight of God of great price? If thou art a parent: 4. Hast thou brought up thy children in the nurture and admonition of the Lord? 5. Hast thou corrected them, yet not provoked them by immoderate correction? 6. Hast thou provided for them in their callings, or outward estates? If thou art a child: 7. Hast thou obeyed thy parents, and received correction with submission and reverence? 8. Hast thou relieved them in their wants? 9. Hast thou observed their instructions, and covered their infirmities? If thou art a master: 10. Hast thou entertained God's servants, and given unto thy servant that which is just and equal? If thou art a servant: 11. Hast thou been obedient to thy master according to the flesh, with fear and trembling, in singleness of heart, as unto Christ? Not answering again, not purloining, but showing all good fidelity?

Secondly, for the Common-weal; if thou art a Magistrate, 12. Hast thou executed just laws? 13. Hast thou reformed others abuses, according to the power that is in thee? If thou art a Subject: 14. Hast thou obeyed the higher Powers in all just commands? 15. Hast thou been subject unto them, not only for wrath, but also for conscience sake?

Thirdly, for the Church; If thou art a Minister: 16. Hast thou taught in season, and out of season? 17. Hath thy light shined before men, that they might see thy good works? If thou art a hearer: 18. Hast thou communicated to them that teach thee in all good things? 19. Hast thou obeyed them, and prayed for them, and loved them, and followed them, considering the end of their conversation?

Or for the sins here forbidden,

And first for the Family: Say, if thou art an husband: 1. Hast thou not sometimes abused thy wife, or smitten her, or injured her, in thought, word, or deed? If thou art a wife: 2. Hast thou not been wasteful, or froward, or idle? If thou art a child: 3. Hast thou not despised thy fathers or mothers instructions? 4. Hast thou not mocked them, or despised them, or cursed them, or smitten them, or shamed them, or grieved them? If thou art a master: 5. Hast thou not governed thy family negligently? 6. Hast thou not withheld that which is just and equal in diet, wages, encouragement? If thou art a servant: 7. Hast thou not been idle, and slothful? 8. Hast thou not served grudgingly, and not from the heart?

Secondly, for the Common-weal: If thou art a Magistrate: 9. Hast thou not been as a Lyon, or a Bear, roaring and ranging over the poor people? 10. Hast thou not decreed unrighteous decrees? respecting the persons of the poor, or honoring the persons of the mighty? If thou art a Subject: 11. Hast thou not reviled the God's, or cursed the Ruler of thy people? 12. Hast thou not disobeyed the higher Powers, or not denied tribute, or custom, or honor, or fear to whom they are due?

Thirdly, for the Church; if thou art a Minister: 13. Hast thou not been profane and wicked in thy life and conversation? 14. Hast thou not run before thou wast sent? or being sent, hast thou not been negligent in the gift that is in thee? 16. Hast thou not prophesied in Baal, and caused God's people to err? 17. Hast thou not committed simony, or sought indirectly for the fleece, not regarding respectively the flock? 18. Hast thou not strengthened the hands of evil doers, in preaching peace to wicked men? 19. Hast thou not given heed to fables (or to some unprofitable matter) rather than to godly edifying, which is in faith? If thou art an hearer: 20. Hast thou not resisted the Minister, and the Word preached by him? whatsoever thou art, husband, or wife, or parent, or child, or master, or servant, or Magistrate, or Subject, or Minister, or hearer, if in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broke this Commandment, Honor thy father and thy mother.

Sect. 7. Sins against the sixth Commandment.

IT is the sixth Commandment, Thou shalt do no murder.

For the duties here required.

Say, 1. Hast thou ever desired and studied by all means lawful, to preserve thine own person, and the person of thy neighbor?

Or for the sins here forbidden.

Say: 1. Hast thou not sometimes envied others for their wealth, or for their gifts, or for their respects with others? 2. Hast thou not offended others in gestures, gnashing on them with thy teeth, or sharpening thine eyes on them? 3. Hast thou not fended others in words, by censuring, or reviling, or rendering evil for evil, or railing for railing? 4. Hast thou not offended others in deeds, plotting against the just, or doing evil to any man? 5. Hast thou not been angry with thy brother without cause, or continued long in anger, keeping thy wrath (as it were) forever? 6. Hast thou not rejoiced at others fall, or wished a curse to their souls? 7. Hast thou not done evil to thyself, by inordinate fretting, or grieving, or drinking, or surfeiting, or saying in thy passions, Would God I were dead? 8. Hast thou not been a sower of discord, or some way or other, a just occasion of the discomfort, or of the death of thy neighbor? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, thou hast then broken this Commandment, Thou shalt do no murder.

Sect. 8. Sins against the seventh Commandment.

IT is the seventh Commandment, Thou shalt not commit adultery.

For the duties here required.

Say: Hast thou ever kept thyself pure in soul and body, both towards thyself and others?

Or for the sins here forbidden.

Say: Hast thou not sometimes been defiled with buggery, Sodomitry, incest, whoredom, adultery, Polygamy, self-pollution, or with changing the natural use into that which is against nature? 2. Hast thou not offended in the occasions of uncleanness, as in idleness, gluttony, drunkenness, wanton company, whorish attire, or perfumes? 3. Hast thou not sinned in thy senses, or gestures, or words, by filthy communication proceeding out of thy mouth? 4. Hast thou not harbored in thy heart burning lusts, impure thoughts, inordinate affections? 5. Hast thou not behaved thyself immodestly, unsoberly, or shamelessly abusing thy body, or using some manner of dalliance and wantonness? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broken this Commandment, Thou shalt not commit adultery.

Sect. 9. Sins against the eighth Commandment.

IT is the eighth Commandment, Thou shalt not steal.

For the duties here required.

Say, Hast thou ever, by all good means, furthered the outward estate of thyself and of thy neighbor?

Or for the sins here forbidden.

Say: First, Hast thou not sometimes got thy living by an unlawful calling? Secondly, hast thou not impoverisht thyself by idleness, luxurious, or unnecessary expenses? Thirdly, hast thou not withheld from thyself, or others, that which should have been expended? Fourthly, hast thou not gotten, or kept thy neighbors goods by falsehood, or force, and made no restitution? Fifthly, hast thou not stolen by usury, or oppression, or fraud, in buying or selling, an abomination unto the Lord? Sixthly, hast thou not robbed God of his tithes and offerings by sacrilege or simony? Seventhly, hast thou not some way or other impaired thy neighbors state? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broken this Commandment, Thou shalt not steal.

Sect. 10. Sins against the ninth Commandment.

IT is the ninth Commandment, Thou shalt not bear false witness.

For the duties here required.

Say, Hast thou ever by all means sought to maintain thy own and thy neighbors good name, according to truth and a good conscience?

Or for the sins here forbidden.

Say, First, hast thou not sometimes loved (or made) a lie? Secondly, hast thou not raised a false report, to the defaming of many? Thirdly, hast thou not censured or judged others, yet never considered the beam that is in thy own eye? Fourthly, hast thou not flattered thyself and others, saying unto the wicked, Thou art righteous? Fifthly, hast thou not condemned some without witness, or forborne to witness for others when thou knewest the truth? Sixthly, hast thou not been uncharitably suspicious, or a despiser of thy neighbor? Seventhly, hast thou not told a lie, whether jestingly, or officiously, or perniciously? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broke this Commandment, Thou shalt not bear false witness.

Sect. 11. Sins against the last Commandment.

IT is the last Commandment, Thou shalt not covet.]

For the duties here required.

Say, First, hast thou ever been truly contented with thy own outward condition? Secondly, hast thou rejoiced at others good, and loved thy neighbor as thyself?

Or for the sins here forbidden.

Say, First, hast thou not sometimes conceived evil thoughts in thy heart? Secondly, hast thou not delighted in the inward contemplations of evil? Thirdly, hast thou not been full of discontent with thy own condition and state? Fourthly, hast thou not felt another law of thy members warring against the law of thy mind? Fifthly, hast thou not coveted after something or other that was thy neighbors, either with will, or by actual concupiscence? If in any of these thou hast transgressed, then hast thou broke this Commandment, Thou shalt not covet.

CHAP. III. The second means to get into the new birth.

AFTER examination (which may well serve thee for one days work or two) the next duty is Confession. Now then take the Catalogue of those sins (or if thy awaked conscience can tell thee of any other) which thou knowest thou hast committed, and noted, either in this book, or on some other paper; and kneeling on thy knees, spread thy Catalogue before the Lord, I say, spread thy Catalogue before the Lord, as Hezekiah did his letter; there read thou seriously and particularly, saying, O Lord, I confess I have committed this sin, and the other sin [as they are before thee in order] of all these sins I am guilty, especially of those sins wherein I delighted, my darlings, my minions, my bosom-sins, [take notice of them, and confess them again] of all these sins I am guilty; And now, O Lord, standing (as it were) at the bar of thy tribunal, I arraign myself, and accuse myself, and judge myself worthy of the utmost of thy wrath and indignation; for one sin thou cast Adam out of paradise, for one sin thou cast the Angels out of heaven, for one sin thou destroyedst a world of men, and what then shall become of me, that have committed a world of sins?—[here pause a while, and meditate on thy unworthiness.] O that I should be so foolish, so brutish, so mad to commit these sins, these manifold sins! O that by these sins I should break so holy a law, provoke so good and great a Majesty! What shall I do, but remembering my evil ways, even loath myself in my own sight (yea abhor myself in dust and ashes) for my iniquities and my abominations? &c.— For conclusion, thou mayst imitate the Publican, who not daring to lift up his eyes, smote his breast, so do thou, and sigh, and say with him, O God be merciful to me a sinner.

CHAP. IV.Sect. 1. *The third means to get into the new birth.

AFTER Confession (which may well serve thee for another days work) the next duty thou must labor for, is to seek for true sorrow and mourning for thy sins: Seek thou must, and never leave seeking, till thou feel thy heart melt within thee. To this purpose read some tracts of death, of judgment, of hell, of Christ's passion, of the joys of heaven: Last of all (and I take it best of all) resolve to set every day some time apart to beg it of the Lord: When Daniel set himself to pray, the Lord came in to him, Dan. 9.3. When Peter had gone apart to pray; and when Paul had prayed in the Temple, then the Lord came in to them, Act. 10.6. and 22.17. And why may not I bid thee pray, as well as Peter bid Simon Magus, yet being in the gall of bitterness and bond of iniquity? Act. 8.22, 23. and at the time appointed fall down on thy knees, spread thy Catalogue, confess, accuse, judge, condemn thyself again; which done, beg, beg of the Lord to give thee that soft heart he promised, Ezek. 36.26. A new heart will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you, and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you an heart of flesh. Say then to thyself, Is this the Lord's promise? O Lord perform it to my heart; take away my stony heart, give me an heart of flesh, a new heart, a new spirit, &c.—[here make thine own prayer, be not careful of words, only let the words be the true voice of thy heart:] and the more to work softening, thou mayest sob, and sigh, and beat thy breast, above all thou must pray, and call, and cry with vehemency and fervency not to be uttered. When thou hast done, if the Lord do not yet hear thee, pray again the next day, and the next day, yea put on this resolution, that thou wilt never leave praying till the Lord hear thee in mercy, till he make thee to feel thy heart melt within thee, yea (if it may be) till thou seest thy tears trickling down thy cheeks, because of thy offenses. The Lord will (perhaps) hear thee at the first time, or at the second time; or if he do not, persist thou, thy suit is just, and importunity will prevail; yea I can say, thy desire to sorrow being resolute, it is a degree of godly sorrow itself, and no doubt the Lord will increase it, if thou begst hard a while.

Sect. 2. The first reason for this sorrow.

THIS must be done, first because without pangs no birth: Quid sunt dolores parturientis nisi dolores poenitentis? (saith Saint Austin) the pangs of a penitent man are as the pangs of a woman: Now as there can be no birth without pains of travel going before, so neither true repentance without some terrors of the law, and straits of conscience. Ye have not received the spirit of bondage again to fear, saith the Apostle to the Romans; and what is that? but to show us, they once did receive it; when? but in the very first preparation to conversion: then it was that the Spirit of God in the law did so bear witness unto them of their bondage, that it made them to fear. And certainly thus it is with every man in his first conversion, his contrition must be compungent, and vehement, bruising, breaking, renting the heart, and feeling the throws (as a woman laboring of child) before there can be a new birth, or the new creature be brought forth.

Sect. 3. The second reason for this sorrow.

AGain, without contrition no Christ; therefore it was that God first opened the eyes of our first parents, to make them see and be sensible of their sin and misery, Gen. 3.7. before he promised Christ, verse. 15. therefore it was that John the Baptist (saith Chrysostom) first thoroughly frightened the minds of his hearers with the terror of judgment, and expectation of torment, and with the name of an axe, and their rejection, and entertainment of other children, and by doubling the punishment, to wit, of being hewn down, and cast into the fire; and when he had thus every way tamed, and taken down their stubbornness, then at length he makes mention of Christ. Why, then is Christ seasonably revealed (saith Musculus) when the hearts of men being soundly pierced by preaching repentance, are possessed with a desire of his gracious righteousness. Or if you will hear Calvin, To whom is Christ promised, but to them alone who are humbled and confounded with the sense of their own sins? Certainly the first thing that draws to Christ, is to consider our miserable estate without him; No man will come to Christ except he be hungry; no man will take Christ's yoke upon him, till he come to know and feel the weight of Satan's yoke; to this end therefore must every man be broken with threats, and scourges, and lashes of conscience, that so despairing of himself he may fly unto Christ.

Sect. 4. The third reason for this sorrow.

AGain, without hearty sorrow no spiritual comfort. We must first be humbled before the Lord, and then he will lift us up. Christ indeed was anointed to preach good tidings, but to whom? to the poor, to the broken-hearted, to the captives, to them that are bound, to the bruised, Isaiah 61.11. God pours not the oil of his mercy save into a broken vessel, God never comforts thoroughly, save where he finds humiliation and repentance for sin. The word of God (saith one) hath three degrees of operation in the hearts of his chosen: First, it falleth to men's ears as the sound of many waters, a mighty, great, and confused sound, and which commonly bringeth neither terror nor joy, but yet a wondering, and acknowledgement of a strange force, and more then human power; this is that effect which many felt hearing Christ, when they were astonished at his doctrine, as teaching with authority; what manner doctrine is this? never man spake like this man: The next effect is the voice of thunder, which bringeth not only wonder, but fear also; not only filleth the ears with sound, and the heart with astonishment, but moreover shaketh and terrifieth the conscience: The third effect is the sound of harping, while the word not only ravisheth with admiration, and striketh the conscience with terror, but also lastly filleth it with sweet peace and joy. Now albeit the two first degrees may be without the last, yet none feel the last, who have not in some degree felt both the first. He saith true, in some degree, though commonly the deeper is the sense of misery, the sweeter is the sense of mercy. In our dead security before conversion (saith another) God is fain to let the law, sin, conscience, Satan, a deep sense of our abominable and cursed state loose upon us, and to kindle the very fire of hell in our souls, that so we might be roused, and afterward more sweetly and soundly raised and refreshed; for after the most toylsome labor is the sweetest sleep, after the greatest tempests the stillest calms; sanctified troubles and terrors establish the surest peace, and the shaking of these winds makes the trees of God's Eden take the better rooting.

CHAP. V.

Sect. 1. The means to be delivered out of the pangs of the new birth.

ANd now if (by God's blessing) thou feelest this sorrow and melting of heart, the next thing thou must do is to seek for the remedy, which remedy consists of these ingredients: First, A sight of Christ; secondly, A desire after Christ; thirdly, A relying on Christ; fourthly, An obedience to Christ; fifthly, A comfort in Christ sought for and obtained. Thou wilt say, these ingredients are pearls indeed, but how should I procure them? I answer, by application of the promises; and since every ingredient hath its particular promises, I shall let thee see them in order, only do thou apply them thyself; it is enough for the Physician to prepare the medicine, thy own body must receive it; so in this medicine it is, thou must apply it if thou wilt have soulshealth.

Sect. 2. The promises procuring a sight of Christ.

THE first step or ingredient that brings comfort to thy heavy soul, is the sight of Christ: and to procure this sight, thou hast these promises:

Matth. 1.21. Thou shalt call his name Jesus, for he shall save his people from their sins.

Luke 2.10, 11. Behold I bring you good tidings of great joy that shall be to all people, that is, that unto you is born this day in the city of David a Savior, which is Christ the Lord.

John 1.29. Behold the Lamb of God which taketh away the sins of the world.

John 3.16. God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, to the end that all that believe in him should not perish, but have life everlasting.

John 3.17. God sent not his Son into the world that he should condemn the world, but that the world through him might be saved.

Rom. 3.25. God hath set forth Christ Jesus to be a reconciliation through faith in his blood.

1 Cor. 1.30. Christ Jesus of God is made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption.

1 Tim. 1.15. This is a true saying, and by all means worthy to be received, that Christ Jesus came into the world to save sinners.

Heb. 13.12. Jesus, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, suffered without the gate.

1 John. 2.1, 2. If any man sin, we have an advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins, and not for us only, but also the sins of the whole world.

Revel. 5.8. Thou wast killed, and hast redeemed us to God by thy blood, out of every kindred, and tongue, and people, and nation.

All these tell thee, that as thou art a sinner, so thou hast a Savior; only do thou apply them, and certainly they will procure thee the first step, the first ingredient of this remedy to thy misery, to wit, the sight of Christ.

Sect. 3. The promises procuring a desire after Christ.

THou mayst say, I see Christ, and I see that his person, and death, and blood-shed, are precious and saving; but how may I make him mine? how may I know that he is my Savior? I answer, thou must hunger and thirst after him; this desire is the second step: and to provoke thee to this duty, consider of these promises:

Isaiah 55.1. Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat, yea come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price.

Mat. 5.6. Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled.

John 7.37, 38. In the last day, that great day of the feast, Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; he that believeth on me, as the Scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water.

Revel. 21.6. I will give to him that is athirst, of the water of life freely.

Revel. 22.17. Let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely.

Psal. 63.1. O God, thou art my God, early will I seek thee, my soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth greatly after thee, in a barren and dry land without water.

Psal. 145.19. He will fulfil the desire of them that fear him.

All these may provoke thee to thirst after Christ, that most sovereign, and soul saving fountain, opened to the house of David, and to the inhabitants of Jerusalem for sin, and for uncleanness, Zach. 13.1.

Sect. 4. The promises procuring a relying on Christ.

YEt thou mayest say, I thirst indeed, but I dare not drink; I desire, but I dare not come near, to lay hold on Christ: How so? I am (sayest thou) a most vile, unworthy, wicked wretch, and my sins are of a scarlet, crimson die: True it is; for thee to pretend part in Christ, wallowing yet in thy sins, for thee to believe that Christ is thy righteousness, purposing yet to go on in the practice, or allowance of any one known sin, it were a most cursed horrible presumption indeed; but where all sin is a burden, every promise as a world of gold, and the heart sincere for a new way, there a man may be bold: A man may? yes, he must; if thou groanest under sin, if thou longeth after Christ, apply these promises, and they will force thee to lay hold upon the Rock, to take Christ for thine own, to throw thy sinful soul upon the bleeding wounds of Jesus, and to cast thyself with confidence into the bosom of his love.

First then, Take notice (saith a Modern) that Jesus Christ keeps open house for all hungry and thirsty souls.

Revel. 22.17. Let him that is athirst come, and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely. Or if open house will not fit without invitation, hear him call;

Matth. 11.28. Come unto me all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. Or if invitation will not fit without proclamation, hear him proclaim:

Joh. 7.37. Jesus stood and cried, saying, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink: he that believeth on me, out of his belly shall flow rivers of water. Or least thou shouldest think thou must come to thy cost, and bring somewhat in thy hand, hear how he doubles and trebbles his cry to the contrary:

Isa. 55.1. Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters, and he that hath no money, come ye, buy and eat, yea come, buy wine and milk without money, and without price. And yet lest thou say, I am so far from bringing anything in my hand, that I bring a world of wickedness in my heart, and my sins I fear will hinder my acceptation, no (saith he again)

Isa. 55.7. Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts (and this is thy desire, thy case) and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon. Or if all this will not do without a more solemn invitation, see then how the Lord of heaven sends forth his Ambassadors to move thee, and entreat thee to come in:

2 Cor. 5.20. Now then we are Ambassadors for Christ, as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead be ye reconciled unto God. Or if he cannot woo thee, lo he commands thee:

1 John. 3.23. And this is the Commandment, that we should believe on the name of his Son Jesus Christ. Or yet to drive thee to Christ, he not only commands, but threatens:

Heb. 3.18. And to whom sware he that they should not enter into his rest, but to them that believed not?

And what can he do more unto his Vineyard? First (to bid thee welcome) he keeps open house; secondly, he invites; thirdly, he proclaims; fourthly, he calls thee sans-fee, without money, or moneyworth; fifthly, he apologizeth; sixthly, he sendeth; seventhly, he commandeth; eighthly, he threateneth: Hear what mine Author concludes from these premises; How cruel then is that man to his own wounded conscience, who in his extreme spiritual thirst will not be drawn by this eight-fold merciful cord, to drink his fill of the fountain of the water of life, to cast himself with confidence and comfort into the arms of the Lord Jesus? — Yea, how is it possible, but that all, or some of these, should bring in every broken heart to believe, and everyone that is weary of his sins, to rely upon the Lord of life for everlasting welfare?

Sect. 5. The promises procuring obedience to Christ.

AND yet thou mayest say, I have cast myself on Christ, is this all I must do? no, there is yet another step, he is not only to be thy Savior, but thy husband, thou must love him, and serve him, and honor him, and obey him: thou must endeavor not only for pardon of sin, and salvation from hell, but for purity, new obedience, ability to do or suffer anything for Christ. And to provoke thee to this duty, consider of these texts:

Matth. 7.21. Not everyone that saith, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of heaven, but he that doth the will of my Father which is in heaven.

Matth. 11.29. Take my yoke upon you, and learn of me, for I am meek and lowly in heart, and ye shall find rest unto your souls.

Matth. 16.24. If any man will follow me, let him take up his cross and follow me.

2 Cor. 5.15. He died for all, that they which live, should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto him which died for them.

2 Cor. 5.17. If any man be in Christ, let him be a new creature, old things are passed, behold all things are become new.

1 Joh. 1.6, 7. If we say that we have fellowship with him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth. But if we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ his Son cleanseth us from all sin.

1 Joh. 2.5, 6. He that keepeth his word, in him verily is the love of God perfected, hereby know we that we are in him. He that saith, he abideth in him, ought himself also so to walk, even as he walked.

1 Joh. 3.6, 9. Whosoever abideth in him, sinneth not. — Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin, for his seed remaineth in him, and he cannot sin, because he is born of God.

1 Joh. 3.24. He that keepeth his Commandments, dwelleth in him, and hereby we know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he hath given us.

1 Joh. 5.18. We know that whosoever is born of God sinneth not, but he that is begotten of God keepeth himself, and that wicked one toucheth him not.

All these may invite thee to enter into the holy path, and to fight under Christ's banner against the world, the flesh, and the Devil, unto thy lives end.

Sect. 6. The promises procuring comfort in Christ.

ONce more thou mayest say, I have been truly humbled with the sense of sin, and sense of misery, and sorrow for sin; yea, I have seen, and thirsted, and relied, and purposed universal obedience to my Savior, and yet no comfort comes: it may be so, but hast thou praised God for this work of wonder, the new birth wrought in thee? If so, then is there another duty expected from thee, right precious and pleasing unto God, and that is waiting: yet I could wish thee address thyself to these precious promises, settle thy soul on them with fixed meditation and fervent prayer, and where thou perceivest the condition of the promises to be by God's grace formed in thee, thou mayest safely assure thy soul of so much favor, as is expressly contained in the promises.

Levite. 26.40, 41, 42, 44. If they shall confess their iniquity, — If their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, — Then will I remember my Covenant, — that I might be their God, I am the Lord: the condition is to confess and be humbled; and this if thou dost, the Covenant is sure, the Lord is thy God.

Job 33.27, 28. If any say, I have sinned, and perverted that which is right, and it profited me not; he will deliver his soul from going into the pit, and his life shall see the light. The condition is, If any say, I have sinned, if thy heart say thus in sincerity and truth, the promise is sure, God will deliver thy soul from hell, and thou shalt see the light of heaven.

Psal. 51.17. A broken and a contrite heart, O God, thou wilt not despise. The condition is, a broken and a contrite heart for sin; and if thy heart be thus, be sure God will not despise it.

Prov. 28.13. Whosoever confesseth, and forsaketh his sins, shall have mercy. The condition is, to confess and forsake sin: and this if thou dost, as sure as God is God, thou shalt have mercy.

Isa. 57.17. I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones. The condition is, to be of a contrite and humble spirit; and if thou art thus, God is true who hath said it, he dwells in thee, to revive thy spirit, and to revive thy heart.

Isa. 61.1. The Lord hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek, he hath sent me to bind up the broken hearted. The condition is, to be meek and broken hearted; and if this be thy case, then good tidings belong to thee, and Christ is sent to bind up thy broken heart in the bundle of peace.

Jerem. 31.19, 20. Surely, after that I was turned, I repented (saith Ephraim) and after that I was instructed, I smote upon my thigh, I was ashamed; yea, even confounded, because I did bear the reproach of my youth—Therefore (saith God) my bowels are troubled for him, I will surely have mercy upon him, saith the Lord. The condition is to repent, to be ashamed, confounded for sin, and if thy case be like Ephraim's, God is the same to thee, his bowels yearn for thee, he will surely have mercy on thee.

Matth. 5.6. Blessed are they which hunger and thirst after righteousness. The condition is, to hunger and thirst after the righteousness of Christ; and this if thou dost, then art thou blessed from the mouth of our Savior.

Matth. 11.28. Come unto me all ye that labor, and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest. The condition is to labor, and be heavy laden with sin; and if thou art thus, God's Word is sure, thou shalt have rest spiritual and eternal.

Revel. 21.6. I will give unto him that is athirst, of the water of life freely. The condition is to thirst after the heavenly streams of God's favor, and Christ's sovereign blood; and this if thou dost, then hast thou part in the fountain of the water of life, that proceeds out of the throne of God, and of the Lamb, Revel. 22.1.

All these are so full of comfort, that if thou but crush them with the hand of faith, they cannot but yield some juice of sweetness to thy afflicted soul.

Sect. 7. The means to apply the said promises.

I Said before, it was enough for me to prepare the medicine, it is thou must apply it; yet if thou feelest a backwardness to perform thy part, I shall tell thee of some means to incite thee, and help thee onward to the performance of this duty.

Take then the promises, and carry them (as thou didst the Catalogue of thy sins) into the presence of the Lord; and, fallen down on thy knees, beseech God for thy Saviors sake to incline thine heart to believe those promises. If thou hast the repulse, pray again and again, yea resolve never to make prayer, but to use this petition, that the Lord would please to let thee have some feeling of the life of those promises; Some soul may object, I have no heart or spirit to pray, yet use thy endeavor, and in thy endeavors God may come in; and whensoever thou feelest any of them to be spirit and life to thee, whensoever thou feelest (by a certain taste) the joys of the Holy Ghost to fall upon thee, O happy man that ever thou wast born! then art thou (to thy own knowledge) new born indeed: then hast thou (without doubt) done this most glorious exercise of passing thorough the new birth, and then hast thou cause (as thou canst not choose) to sing and praise God day and night, world without end: So true is that of Christ, Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted. Amen.

Sect. 8. The Conclusion.

HERE is an end, and to you to whom I have dedicated this work, my conclusion is this: The year hath now run his round since I first came amongst you, and how the Lord hath wrought by me you yourselves know best: for my part, if I did but know one poor soul amongst you truly converted by such a weak unworthy instrument, I would ever think myself most happy in that soul, and richly paid for my pains. I know it, neither Paul, nor Apollo can do this, except God give the increase: howsoever, I must tell you, with Paul, my desires have been this way, I have since my coming travelled of you, and travelled again, that Christ might be formed in you. And what's the issue? once could the Lord say, Shall I bring to the birth, and not cause to bring forth? and (to join issue with you) have I travelled of you in birth, and not one of you brought forth? the Lord forbid. I confess (beloved) I have received from you many kindnesses of love; now, for the Lord's sake do me this one kindness more; give me at least one soul among you, that I may give it unto God: O what a kindness would you then do me! not all the wealth in your Town, nor all the increase of your state, nor all you have, or ever shall have, would do me so much good in the day of my Lord Jesus, as this one boon I ask: then could I say, Lord, I have not lost the fruits of my labor in this Town, see here the soul now shining in glory which I converted by thy power; see here the soul of such a one, and such a one which through thy grace, and my ministry were converted unto thee. If this were thus, why then (beloved) you would bless me forever, and I should bless you forever, and we should all bless God forever, for this so gracious and so blessed a work. Now the Lord of his goodness give you a sight of your sins, and a true sorrow for sin, and if not afore now, yet now, this day, the Lord this day set his print and seal upon you.

The time draws on, and I have but a minute, a little time to speak to you; for a farewell then, let these last words take a deeper impression in your hearts: if you would do all I would have you do, I could wish no more, but that to this humiliation or repentance, you would add charity or love: the first you owe to God, and the second to your neighbor: by the first you might become new creatures, by the second true Christians, like them in the Churches infancy, of one mind, one heart, and one soul; sure it is not possible that we should have forgiveness of sins, but that we must be of the communion of Saints. A thousand pities it is to hear of the many factions in our Church, and Kingdoms, and Towns, and Families, O pray for the peace of Jerusalem, they shall prosper that love it; and let us pray (as need we have too) for our own peace one with another: You cannot come to a Communion, but you hear this lesson in the invitation, You that do truly and earnestly repent you of your sins, and be in love and charity with your neighbors, &c. Here's both repentance to God, and Charity (nay more then charity, as we use the word commonly) even love of your neighbors. For my part I wish that my very heart-blood could cement the divisions of Reuben (for which are great thoughts of heart) in this Town, in this Church, in these Kingdoms. I will say no more, but conclude with those words of the Apostle, Finally brethren, fare ye well, be perfect, be of good comfort, be of one mind, live in peace, and the God of love and peace be with you forever and ever.

P-IA-4. Redeeming the time a sermon preached at Preston in Lancashire, January 4th, 1657 at the funeral of the honorable lady, the Lady Margaret Houghton - Ambrose, Isaac, 1604-1664., Houghton, Margaret, d. 1657.

REDEEMING THE TIME.

A SERMON PREACHED AT Preston in Lancashire, January 4th. 1657. at the Funeral of the Honorable Lady, THE LADY MARGARET HOUGHTON.

Revised, and, somewhat Enlarged; and, at the importunity of some Friends, now published.

BY ISAAC AMBROSE. Preacher of the Gospel at Garstange in the same County.

LONDON, Printed for Rowland Reynalds, at the Sun and Bible, in the Poultry. 1674.

Eph. 5.16.

Redeeming the Time.

THE Apostle here gives many Lessons; exhorting 1. to love, Walk in love, as Christ also hath loved us: 2. To fly fornication, But fornication, and all uncleanness, or covetousness, let it not be once named amongst you, as becometh Saints. 3. To avoid intimate, dear, or familiar converse with graceless men, Be not, ye therefore partakers with them; for ye were sometimes darkness, but now are you light, walk as Children of light. 4. To walk warily, exactly, circumspectly, See then that ye walk circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise. And this last he amplifies from an effect, which testifies a circumspect, exact, and accurate walking, to wit, Redeeming the time, &c.

I am only to learn you some part of this last Lesson; wherein you have 1. The instruction itself, See that you walk circumspectly. 2. The amplification of this instruction; and that is either from the reason binding to it, not as fools, but as wise; or from the effect testifying of it, Redeeming the time.

1. For the instruction itself, See that ye walk circumspectly, 〈in non-Latin alphabet〉, exactly, precisely; no word fits the Greek better than this; it comes of two words, 〈in non-Latin alphabet〉, which signify to go to the extremity of a thing: we must be willing to go to the utmost of every Command. To which purpose are those precepts, to be hot in Religion, Rev. 3.16. to be zealous of good works, Tit. 2.14. to be fervent in spirit, Rom. 12.11. to strive to enter in at the strait Gate. Luk. 13.24. with an holy violence to lay hold upon the Kingdom of Heaven, Matth. 11.12. But this is not the point I shall now insist on.

2. For the reason binding to it, not as fools, but as wise. It points to us, that exactness, or preciseness in holy walking is a fruit of true Wisdom. Luther brings in the men of the World objecting against him, Num tu solus sapiis? Num solus tu De• places? What? are you the only Wise man in the World? do you only please God? The answer was easy from this Text, that exact walking, or a strict conversation, is the fruit of Wisdom. But neither is this the point that I shall insist on.

3. For the effect testifying of it, Redeeming the time. If I may open the words, 1. By time is meant oppertunity; which either it taken for the whole course of our remaining life, or for such and such particular occasions as God doth offer to this or that particular duty; and both these may be understood here. 2. By Redeeming the time, is meant either the avoiding of some hindrances, which would take us off from the opportunity; or the recompensing of some former unfruitfulness, which hath been in the former part of our life: or a gaining, stretching, improving of time by embracing all the occasions of doing all the good we can do: and we shall discover anon, that all these may be understood here. In the mean time we lay down this Position as a necessary, fundamental, Evangelical truth, that time must be Redeemed Look to it all ye that fear God; herein will your spiritual Wisdom, and exact walking appear, even in Redeeming the time.

In the prosecution of this point, I shall 1. give you the 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 2. The. 3. The 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . And then come to Application.

1. That time must be redeemed, the very Heathens confirm it: 'Twas the saying of one Pittacus, one of the seven Wise-men, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , know time; lose not a minute. Theophrastus had another saying near to this, Sumptus pretiosissimus tempus: time is of precious cost. Pliny seeing but his Nephew at leisure, taking some turns in his walk, was so very strict, that he tells him, Non licet has horas perdere, he should not lose so many precious hours. When Titus the Son of Vespasian who revenged, Christ's blood on Jerusalem, returned victor to Rome, remembering one night that had done no good that day, he cried out to his friends, Hen perdidit diem! O alas, I have lost a day! Little do we think of losing time, and is not this our shame? If such men without God and Christ, without Law and Gospel, without all the promises of God and Christ in Law or Gospel, could say thus much, how may they rise up in judgment against many of us? But we cite not them, as though we stood in need of their learning; the Apostles themselves give it us in charge, walk in Wisdom towards them that are without, redeeming the time, and exhort one another while it is called today, lest any of you be hardened through the deceitfulness of sin. And again, while it is said today, if ye will hear his voice, harden not your hearts. And, pass the time of your sojourning here with fear, forasmuch as ye know that ye were not redeemed with corruptible things,—but with the precious blood of Christ. q. d. Christ redeemed you, and therefore you had need to redeem the time. For the time past of our life may suffice us to have wrought the will of the Gentiles.—so that henceforth we should not serve sin.—or no longer should we live the rest of our time in the flesh to the lusts of men, but to the will of God.—Let us not be weary in well-doing, for in due season we shall reap if we faint not; as we have therefore opportunity, let us do good unto all men. It is Jerome's saying upon these words, O how short is this race of my life? how short is this time now in hand? my studying, preaching, writing, correcting, reading, what it is but a gaining or a loosing of my time?

2. What is it to redeem the time? I answer, it comprehends these particulars.

1. An avoiding anything which would hinder us from taking the opportunity. If you ask, what are these hindrances? I answer, 1. Ignorance; many think they are not in so strait a manner to be accountable for time. It is a general opinion of the grossly ignorant, that if they can but pass away in time without doing any harm (as they say) they are well enough; as if no account of time might be given at all: they are ignorant of this principle, that they are to improve, and to redeem the time. 2. Slothfulness; this makes men heedless, or careless of their time: As it is with the sluggard, Yet a little more sleep, a little more slumber, a little more folding of the arms is sleep. So it is with the idle person, Let this hour, and this day be spent in doing nothing. O the many golden hours, and days, and years that many thousands spend, and yet cannot give the least account wherein either they have glorified God, or served their generations. 3. Love of fleshly liberty: Alas, what care they for redeeming time who are set on their lusts and liberties to sin? All the care they have, it is merely to eat, and drink, and play: sensual pleasures are the whole study of these men, and if they can but enjoy them, let time slip away as it will, they never regard it.

2. A recompensing of some former unfruitfulness: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 hath this interpretation, it is a redeeming (as it were) of that jewel of time that hath been formerly lost. As a traveller that hath long stayed at an Inn, when he finds the night coming upon him, he mends his pace, and goes as many miles in an hour or two, as he did before in many. This me thinks comes nearest to the word Redimo, to redeem, or to buy back again. It is taken (say some) from the custom and practice of wise Merchants or Trades men, who use to buy their commodities while fit time of buying serves, and while the market holds; and having haply had great losses, or formerly spent their time idly or unthrifly, they do by their after diligence seek to redeem, and (as it were) to buy back again the time that is past.

3. An embracing of all occasions for acting graces, and doing good; and this agrees with the reason following, for the days are evil. q. d. Look to yourselves, for these are hard and dismal times; now is much corruption, and great persecution, and the opportunity of good is exceedingly straitened; and therefore it is very needful to catch at time, and to lay hold on an opportunity, both to exercise graces, and to be doing as much good as you may, while the time permitteth. I must work the works of him that sent me, while it is day, saith Christ, the night cometh when no man can work: And, yet a little while and the light is with you, walk while ye have the light, lest darkness come upon you: And as we have opportunity, let us do good unto all men, especially to them who are of the household of faith. Mark these sayings, while it is called today; and while the light is with you; and while you have opportunity. Thus you see what it is.

3. But why must time be redeemed? what necessity for that? I answer—

1. In respect of time past. Alas, many a golden season have we lost, how many hours, and days, and months, and years have we spent idly, and done little good? Is it not time then to lay hold of every opportunity to redeem time past? When God brought us forth into this world, his commands were upon us to work in his vineyard, and to that purpose he designed to everyone his time; thus many days, or months, or years shall you everyone live, and while you live be employing these and these talents; it is my command upon all the sons of men, in the sweat of thy face (i. e. of thy brow, or of thy brain) shall thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; and why then do ye stand all the day idle? why are ye not in the work; and especially in the work of the Lord? Now if this be so, that there is such a command, and that we have broke this command at such a time, and such a time, is it not our duty, and is there not cause to redeem the time? A fellow that hath loytered a great part of the day in his business, and yet must needs finish his work, will he not toil and sweat at it towards night? will he not double his pains, and put all his strength to it? So we, having not only been slack in our business about God's service, and slow in the way towards Heaven, but even for many years having perhaps run in a quite contrary course, and done the Devils work, how should we now towards the night of our natural life, and in the conclusion of the short span thereof, spare no pains, double our diligence, press hard to the price of the high calling with an holy kind of violence, lay hold upon the Kingdom of Heaven, with all zeal, courage, and resolution labor to redeem past, because it is past? This our reason.

2. In respect of time present: It is but a moment on which depends eternal bliss or woe, if we have lost time past, and if we do lose time present, we may be undone forever. In this respect may we say of time, as Boaz said to his kinsman concerning Ruth, If you will redeem it, redeem it: never think of redeeming it tomorrow, or the other day; or hereafter; for no time is properly yours but the present time. Behold now is the accepted time; behold now is the day of salvation: now while I am speaking and you hearing; now ere the night be done or the next day comes on. Oh why should we trifle away the time which is properly ours, and promise to ourselves great things in a time which is none of ours? When Christ mourned over Jerusalem he bemoans it thus, If thou hadst known, even thou at leas in this thy day, the things belonging to thy peace: So may I mourn over you, if thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day: when's that? while Ministers call and you hear, this is your day; and therefore he that never heard effectually, let him hear now; it is now high time to awake out of that cursed security wherein you lie; the Lord is now come near, Christ Jesus is calling, mercy is entreating, and wisdom is even hoarse with crying after you, if you lose this time, this hour of grace, who knows whether ever you shall enjoy such another season? Oh take time by the forehead! post est occasio calva; it will be too late soon. Now the Lord calls, and now it concerns us to bestir ourselves upon these grounds.

1. Because now are evil days; the very reason in the Text: these are the last times, which the Apostle calls perilous times; and why perilous? For men shall believers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, &c. One would think it rather an History than a Prophecy of our days. Oh is it not time now, if ever, to reedeem the time.

2. Because now are days of light: notwithstanding the evils of some or most in comparison, yet many glorious truths do now appear: the Devil, I know, now brings forth his ware, but withal God is now a communicating many blessed truths. In respect of us, our fathers before, and since the Reformation were in great darkness; the candle of God now shines upon this Nation with extraordinary light: And what then? Why therefore it concerns us to redeem the time: This is the Apostles argument, The time of this ignorance God winks at but now he commandeth every man everywhere to repent. This is another reason.

3. In respect of time to come: I shall instance only in time of death, and time of judgment.

1. Death is at hand, and then we cannot redeem the time: So the Preacher, Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might, for there is no work, nor device, nor knowledge, nor wisdom in the grave whither thou goest. q. d. If there be anything to be done, if there be any duty God requires, do it in life, for when death shall come there shall be no more preaching, praying, hearing. The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee, they that go down into the pit cannot hope for thy truth: the living, the living he shall praise thee, as I do this day.

2. Our doom for eternity of joys or woes draws on apace, and is even at the door. Then I am sure, account must be given for time, as well as for all other things. Come, will Christ say, give an account of thy stewardship, of all things done in the flesh, and of every moment of time: how didst thou spend such a day, such a Sabbath? was not such a day spent sinfully, or very unprofitably, and was it ever redeemed? Here's a reason indeed to force on us this duty. But of this and other reasons I shall speak more in the motives, when I exhort you to it.

Well then, is it so, that time must be redeemed? this may reprove several sorts of persons: as—

1. The idle; that are so far from redeeming time, that they are perpetually losing time. This was the sin of Sodom, pride, fullness of bread: and abundance of idleness, was in her. Give me leave a little to lay open this sin. Surely this sin is the fountain of all sins; by doing nothing we shall be sure to learn how to do ill. It is said of Rome, that during the time of their Wars with Carthage, and other enemies in Africa, they knew not what vice meant; but no sooner had they got the conquest, than through idleness they came to ruin. Rust you know will fret into the hardest Iron, if it be not used; so vice will infect the best heart, if given to idleness. Standing Water is sooner frozen than the running stream; and he that fitteth is more subject to sleep than he that walketh; so the idle man is far more subject to temptation than he that is profitably exercised. Idleness is the Devils special opportunity; and we have an instance in David's idleness, who at, that time, was set on by the Devil to commit other sins of Adultery and Murder. But this is a sin that very boys in Schools can declame against; and if it were not that I see many amongst us spend their time so very unprofitably, I had not once named it. Oh think of it! If a Master should set a light upon a Candlestick, and give his servant food, and time, and all things convenient wherewith to work, yet when he comes to see if his task be finished, he finds that the meat is wasted, the time is ended, the Candle to the very socket burned, and little or nothing of the work is furthered, how would such a servant excuse himself unto his Master? And is it not so with many of you? God hath given you meat, drink, and time; he hath given you Candle, Fire. and matter; but what have you done? Is not the lamp of your life almost consumed, and yet you have not finished the work that was given you to do? Oh why stand ye here all the day idle?

2. The voluptuous: these misspend their time as ill as the former. They take the timbrel and harp and, rejoice at the sound of the organ, they spend their days in mirth. They waste the fat and marrow (as it were) of precious time, even the flower of their age, in froth and folly. Lord, that men should live upon earth, as Liviathan in the Sea, only to take their sport and pastime therein! We have seen the sad Catastrophe of some who have led such lives; and I believe still there is a generation of men, that except they be continually exercised in variety of pleasures, they are sore troubled with time; what else is the meaning of all those pass-times (as they call them) but only a concatenation of such delights as please the flesh, that time may not be so tedious wearisome unto them? Little do these men consider that saying of Chrysostom, The present time is not for melting into mirth, but for lamentation and mourning; the Devil omits no time to hurt you, for he knows his time is short; still is he laying his snares to entrap men's souls; he goes about like a roaring Lion to devour; he roars, and fumes, and flashes out fire against your Salvation; and do you sit still, and jovially jest it out? Hark in your ears! the present time is not for mirth, saith Chrysostom; no, no, the present time is for virtuous actions, to do the great business for which you were born, to mourn, and sorrow, and sue out your pardon, and not to spend it in jollity, and fleshly delights. If a condemned man had two or three days granted him to sue out his pardon, were that a time for pleasure and sports? Surely the sentence of death is upon all flesh; In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die; only a little uncertain time is granted to sue out our pardon in the name of Christ: why then do you slip away your time sinfully, and will not redeem it?

3. The godly themselves: Alas, the best are short in this duty of redeeming the time. Did not the Lord complain against his own people, the Stork in the Heaven knoweth her appointed times; and the Turtle, and the Crane, and the Swallow observe the time of their coming, but my people know not the judgment of the Lord. Certainly God's own people do not so improve, as they ought, those many gracious seasons of love which the Lord affords them. O the omissions of Duties, and commissions of evils whereof we all stand guilty! of how many good hours have we been ill Husbands? I shall not need to reckon up our times of infancy when we knew nothing, nor of childhood when we knew very little, nor of youth when we knew not much of that we ought to know; but since our riper years, yea since the time of our regeneracy, how prodigal have we been of this precious commodity of time? those that keep exact diaries can easily tell you, such an hour lost, and such an hour ill spent; this day I did little good, and the other day I sinned against my God. If in this case I may speak out my own experiences, I must needs acknowledge that many and many a day I have lost such and such an opportunity, and now that evil days come thick upon me, wherein I would gladly redeem my days, oh how flow and backward am I as yet in this Heavenly Duty! My dear brethern, I shall not only reprove you, but myself in this: O why art thou so dull, and listless, and heavy, O my soul? Awake, awake! stir up thyself, and with redoubled diligence fall to the work of redeeming time, while yet the time, the day, the season, the opportunity of grace, of Heaven, or of Salvation lasteth.

2. Must time be redeemed? why then let me exhort you by the meekness and gentleness of Christ to be in the exercise of this Duty. Oh redeem your time! avoid all those hindrances that would take you off: recompense your former unfruitfulness by after diligence; embrace all occasions of acting grace, and doing good. I might dilate on all these particulars; but I shall contract all in these very words, Redeem the time, oh redeem your time.

The motives besides the former reasons may be these.

1. Time is ever on the wing, and stays for no man. The Scripture is very full of this; we meet with many similitudes hinting at the sudden, invisible motion of time. My days are swifter then a post, they fly away; they are passed away as the swift Ships, as the Eagle that hasteth to the prey. See how Job here multiplies comparisons, that if we will not learn by the first, we might learn by a second, or by a third: Go we to the land, and there we see time on the spur, in the swift riding post; go we to the Sea, and there we see time upon the wind, in the swift sailing Ship; go we to the air, and there we see time upon the wing, in the swift flying Eagle. Hence the Ancients emblem'd time with wings, as if it were not only running, or sailing, but flying. Oh how sad it is to see men live as if time had leaden heels, and not swift wings; or as if time would any time stay our leisure, and not be gone. Be not deceived, you that are weary of time, either now redeem it, or you will one day cry out, What hath pride profited us? or what good hath riches with our vaunting brought us? All these things are passed away like a shadow, and as Post that passeth by; or as a Ship; — or as a Bird; — or as an Arrow; — even so we, &c.

2. As time is swift, so our time is short. The Heavens indeed are said to be of swift motion, but of long continuance; but our time is otherwise. When the Corinthians propounded divers cases of conscience, after some answers the Apostle gives them in this: But this I say, brethren, the time is short; or time is cut off: he alludes to Sea-fearing men that have almost done their Voyage, and begin to strike sail. Time was in the beginning of the World that men might say, I may, by course of Nature, live a matter of six, or seven, or eight, or nine hundred years; but now God hath so cast out the time of our age, that so soon as we begin our Voyage, we are ready to strike sail: we have but a little time; If I should measure it out, what is it but an Ell, a Span, an Inch, a Point? And is it not time then to redeem the time?

3. Time is not only swift and short, but nothing, I say a very nothing in comparison. As some creatures are said to be nothing in comparison of others. What is the Ant to the Elephant; or the Shrimp to the Whale? what is the whole body of the Earth to the body of the Heavens? So is our time as nothing to all time; and all time is as nothing to Eternity. David that found out a short dimension of his time considered absolutely, or in itself, Behold thou hast made my days as an hand-breath; yet he could find out no dimension: little enough for his time compared with God, Mine age is as nothing before thee. God's being consists in one Eternal now; but man's time is divided into past, present, and to come; three nothings, which being added together amount in the total to this Sum, Mine age is as nothing before thee. Oh that we would consider of this language of the Holy Ghost! were it not enough, think you, to put us on this Duty of improving and trading our time while the time is ours, and while this short time lasteth?

4. Though time be swift and short, and as nothing in comparison, yet is it a commodity more precious than the Gold of Ophir. If herein we might hear lost Souls to utter themselves, Oh what would they say? or what would they give for a little of that little time they had on earth? If the Lord by Divine and Extraordinary dispensation would but grant them one months time to come hither again, and to make a new trial, do you think they would not prize this grant? would they not esteem that little short Golden season of grace at an high and mighty rate? Would they not make use of every opportunity to lay hold of Heaven, and to escape those fires wherein now they are burning, frying, and flaming? O yes! if you would then tempt them, saying, Come, spend this hour merrily; would they not answer; alas, we have but one months time to live here in this World, and then we must either to Hell again, or if we improve our time well, we must to Heaven; and what? shall we trifle away this time of trial and of grace in offending God? shall we cast away our Souls again to gratify you, or to please our own flesh, for so little a time as we have now to live? Oh God forbid! avoid Satan! avoid all Temptations! welcome now all those messengers of Heaven that will bring us the glad tidings, the tenders, the offers of Christ and of Salvation! let not one sand in the hour-glass run, but let us be doing some good; let this hour be spent in prayer, and the next in meditation, and the next in hearing of God's Word, and the next in the exercise of this and that grace, and so on; but not one hour in sin. Why surely thus would they prize and improve the time, that know by woeful experience what it is to lose the time. And by this we may guess the worth of time; oh it is precious so precious that if all the Earth were turned into Gold, it could not purchase one minute of it. Me thinks this motive should work, and now that we have a little time, it should prevail with us to redeem the time.

5. Our time hath been a very sinful time. Ah my brethren, think over your Ignorance, unbelief, worldliness, covetousness, pride, malice, lusts, lukewarmness, impatience, discontentedness, vain-glory, self love, wandering and wicked imaginations: in a word, all your pollutions, distempers, estrangedness from God in the time of your unregeneracy; oh were not those sinful, abominable, and rebellious times: or be it so that your gracious God hath since those times wrought in you effectually his saving grace, have you not since, then lost your first love, or at least grown remiss, and cold, and lukewarm in it? Say then, speak out your hearts and tell me, is it not time now to remember from whence you are fallen, and to repent, and to do your first works? Blessed Mr. Bolton hath a saying, that if it were possible that any uncomfortable passion were incident to a glorified Saint in Heaven, he would be sorry, and transported with extreme anger and indignation against himself that he was not a mere greedy ingrosser (as it were) and improver of time for doing excellently upon Earth, and that every hour, especially after his Conversion, was not Crowned with some rare and more remarkable exploit, with some more special and noble service for the glorifying of that most bountiful and ever-blessed God, who hath now honored him with such unspeakable glory in the Kingdom of Heaven. But if no such passion is in glorified Saints, I am sure we have all cause enough to loath ourselves in our own fight for our iniquities, and for our abominations. O come, let this be a motive to spur us on, and to quicken us in this duty of Redeeming the time, because our days were evil.

6. The Scriptures speak of a remarkable set time of grace, a time of visitation, Luke 19.44. a time of Salvation, 2 Cor, 6.2. a time whilst God may be found, Psal. 32.6. a time when he holds out the Golden Scepter. Esther. 5.2. a time wherein the Fountain runneth, and the spirit proclameth, Ho, every on that thirsteth come ye to the Waters, Isa. 55.1. Thus Jerusalem had her time; and all the several Churches in Asia had their time; and now England, Scotland, and Ireland have their time; and if we mis-improve this time, and walk unworthy of this grace and Gospel of Christ, this time will have an end, this Sun will go down at Noon, and set upon our heads. This day, if you will hear my voice harden not your hearts, said God to Israel; but they hardened their hearts, and therefore God sware to them in his wrath that they should never enter into his rest. If it be so with us as it was with Israel in the wilderness, we do not know but this very day the Lord may clap an Oath upon our heads, that we shall never enter into his rest. Oh then that we would learn of the Ant, that gathereth her meat in the Summer time! Oh that while we have this time of grace, we would redeem the time in praying, reading, hearing, meditating, and treasuring up the things belonging to our peace! This time is a set-time that hastens away: and we cannot with Joshua, bid the Sun stand still. O then let us say, This is our time, and therefore what we will do for our Souls, we will do it now. Surely better it is to redeem it now, than to wish in pain and torment for the time again when it is past redemption.

7. The time, is a coming, yea it is near, even at the door, when time shall be no more. This is the voice of the seventh Angel, And the Angel which I saw standing upon the Sea and upon the Earth, lifted up his hand to Heaven, and sware by him that liveth forever and ever, that there should be time no longer. Who was this? a man? no, an Angel: and what, did he say it? no, he sware it: how sware it, by himself? no, he sware it by him that lives forever: and what? that time should be little? no, it should be no longer, time should be no more. Needs must this time come, that hath all these circumstances to confirm it. And what if this time should come even in your time? what if now the seventh Angel should lift up his hand to Heaven, and take this Oath? If this time be far off as to the general Judgment (which I cannot think) yet sure I am, and without all peradventure, that it is not far off to thee and me. It may be before this year, this month, this week, this night be done, that God may say to his Angel, Go to such a man, and such a woman, I will give them no more time; bring them hither, and here let them give an account what they have done with all their time, for I must have a reckoning of all time past. And then comes in, Imprimis, so much time in Drinking and Revelling; Item so much time in Idling, Sporting, playing, &c. Oh, will God say, were these things I gave you time for? no, no, it was for Heaven and Salvation you had your time; and if that time be mis-improved, away, away time, and now enter Eternity upon these Souls. Is not here a motive to make us look about us? Oh my brethren, now, now if ever, redeem the time, for anon time will be gone, and then succeeds eternity, eternity, eternity.

But what are the means for redeeming time? I answer.—

They are so many, that I may have no time to enumerate the Particulars; shall we instance in some? you must pray, read, hear the Word, meditate, and watch over your hearts with extraordinary industry; mortify your members which are upon the Earth, as pride, covetousness, lusts, &c. grow up in grace, clear up your evidences against that day when all shall stand naked before that great and glorious Judge, &c. And these, and all other Duties (of which anon) must be done while the day lasteth. Here's a great work, and a little time; doth it not concern you to bestir yourselves? If a man have much to write, and but a little Paper to write on, he must write small, and thick, and close as ever he can: So must you do. I verily believe there's not one Soul amongst us but he may find out hundreds and thousands of sins to repent him of; he may find out many and many a Particular Duty that he should be exercised in from morning to evening, and from evening to morning; so that 'tis a wonder how he can spare any time at all for anything else. Well then, up and be doing; lose not a minute, but be in the use and exercise of some of these Dutys. These are the means, and in the use of these means you may (by the Lord's help and grace concurring) redeem your time.

One Objection I would remove. It may be the day of grace is done, the gate of mercy is already shut; and if so, how is it possible for me to redeem the time? I answer—

1. By way of Concession. I believe there is a day of grace indeed, and if that Sun set, it will never, never rise again. If thou hadst known, even thou at least in this thy day, the things belonging to thy peace, but now are they hid from thine eyes. q. d. Now is the gate of mercy shut, there is no means of grace or Salvation forever hereafter to be hoped for. As there is no Market or Fair-day that lasteth always; if the Country will not come in, the Trades-man will at last put up his wares: So the Lord's standing may be open, and his shop set wide for such and such a time; but if Souls will not come in, and buy without money and without price, he will at last put up his wares (all his jewels of grace) and then be gone.

2. Though it be true that there is a day of grace, and that this day may set; yet in respect of us the Ministers of Christ, we cannot determine it; and therefore so long as you live we call still, oh repent! oh redeem your time! I may add, in respect of yourselves, it is not in you to know the times and seasons which God hath put in his own power. And the commandment of Faith standing in force on you so long as you live, and therefore you are still to look to your Duty of redeeming the time.

3. It may be this day, this night, this Sermon, this very hour may be thy day of grace. Harken! is not Christ's Spirit now a knocking? is not Christ himself now offering mercy to thy Soul? O ye sons of men that have mis-improved your time, will ye now at least in this your day he wise to Salvation? why now I call to your hearts; now I command you to open your everlasting doors, that I, the King of Glory, may come in; oh let this be the time of love! Come, give me your hearts, and now redeem the time. Away, away with all objections, scruples, cavils that may hinder this Duty, and now, even now, hearken to this voice of Christ, or of the Spirit of Christ, that your Souls may live.

3. Must time be redeemed? Then for some Rules or Directions how we must redeem it.

Rule 1. A void we everything that would hinder us from taking the opportunity. What those things are you have heard before; as ignorance, sloth, and love of fleshly liberty. Many other particulars might be enumerated, but chiefly and especially foregoe we these.

Rule. 2. Repent we of all former mis-improvings of our time. There is no other way of recompensing former unfruitfulness but by repentance and after diligence. This is the scoundrel after shipwreck; in this way we may redeem, or buy back again the time that is past. The very word resipiscentia signifies to be wise again, after all our former follies. Oh that ever any should be so unworthy as to decry this godly-Gospel-golden Rule.

Rule 3. Live we every day as if every day were the last day we had to live. This Rule or direction is so comprehensive, that I must needs break it into particulars. Suppose then I were to begin this day, and that I looked on this day as the last day of my life, how should I redeem my time; or spend this day? I answer.—

1. My first and morning-thoughts should be on God, or on something in order to his service. My Soul waiteth for the Lord more than they that watch for the Morning.—O Lord be gracious to me. I have waited for thee, be thou my arm every Morning.—I will sing of thy power, I will sing aloud of thy mercy in thy Morning.—It is good to give thanks unto the Lord, and to sing praises unto thy name, O most high, to show forth thy loving kindness in the Morning.—How precious are thy thoughts unto me O God, when I awake, I am still with thee. Now these Morning-thoughts may be spent either in a way of Meditation, or of Prayer; and my Duties lie in both.

2. I should meditate. I shall not determine whether Morning or Evening may be more suitable for set, deliberate, and solemn meditation? only this I affirm, that either a solemn, or an occasional meditation is a Morning-duty. In some sort meditation and prayer should ever go together; and David thus, couples them, Give ear to my words, O Lord, consider my meditation, hearken to the voice of my cry.—My voice shalt thou hear in the Morning, O Lord, in the morning will I direct my prayer unto thee. Now these Morning-meditations (if occasional or ejaculatory) may be on such Objects as these.

1. Upon my first waking I may think on that Morning of my Resurrection, when the Lord will awake me from the dust; it is but a while till the trump shall sound, Awake, and sing ye that dwell in the dust, for thy dew is as the dew of herbs; and then shall the earth cast out her dead.

2. Upon sight of the Morning-sun I may think on that Sun of Righteousness that enlightens Heaven. The Sun that shines on me was only created for this nether World, and yet how glorious is it? Oh then what light is there in that City above, that hath no need of Sun, or Moon, or Star, for the glory of God doth lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof.

3. Upon the putting on of my apparel I may think on that garment of Righteousness where with my soul either is or should be clothed. Alas! what is this outward Robe but a Rag, or at best an excrement of dead worms, of which I have little reason to be proud? But my Souls Robe is as a garment cut out of the Sun, and put upon me. And there appeared a great wonder in Heaven, a woman clothed with the Sun. Oh that I may be clothed with that Sun of Righteousness, or with that Rightousness of the Son of God, that I may appear before God as I am in him, pure and spotless.

I shall not instance in any other objects of my Mornings meditation; only if I find my spirit most active and fit for meditation at such a time. I should then go on, and spare more time for set, deliberate, and solemn meditations.

2. I should pray; and to this Duty I may join the reading of the Word. That this is a mornings Duty the Scripture is express: In the Morning will I direct my prayer unto thee, and will look up.— And in the morning shall my prayer prevent thee.—And evening, and morning, and at noon will I pray, and cry aloud, and he shall hear my voice. It is true, that Prayer and reading of the Word are two distinct exercises, yet that they mutually help one another is most manifest, and consequently are fit to be joined together; for the word ministers matter of prayer, and is the ground of our petition, who have no promise to be heard, unless we ask according to God's word, 1 Joh. 5.14. And the fitness of the morning for these exercises is evident, not only because the first of time belongs unto God, but also the heart being then most free from worldly thoughts, it is therefore fittest for Holy exercises; and withal, when in the beginning of the day the heart of man is seasoned with Holiness, and with the fear of God, he shall find himself the better fitted to walk humbly with God all the day after.

2. All the rest of the day till evening should I spend my time in the Duties of my particular calling, nor know I the least reason why any man in the world, high or low, rich or poor, should be herein exempted. Adam must not eat his bread without sweat and labor. Abel was a keeper of sheep. Cain a tiller of the ground. Jabal was a Tent-maker. Jubal the father of such as handle the harp. Tubal Cain an Artificer in Brass and Iron. All the the Patriarchs of Israel were but Shepherds; and Jesus Christ himself was a plain Carpenter.

But you may object, may I not herein lose my time as to God's service? One would think, if this were my last day I should do no other work but pray, or hear, or read, or meditate, &c. I answer—

1. I grant there are such times wherein God calls us extraordinarily to such spiritual Duties all the day long; as either in afflictions felt or feared, or in some special mercies expected or received. And there are those times we call the Lord's days, wherein we are to do no work ordinarily but of a Spiritual nature And there are such times wherein God holds forth an opportunity of exercising graces, or of doing good; and so to embrace the occasion is one piece or part of our redeeming time. As we have opportunity let us do good to all men. And your care of me hath flourished again, (said Paul to his Philippians) but ye lacked opportunity. It seems their care for the Apostle was intermitted for a season, for want of opportunity to send unto him, but now they put forth again as flowers in Spring. I doubt not but in such cases as these, we may, and must for the time dispense with our particular callings. Yet.—

2. In my ordinary constant daily course I am to be in the exercise of my Particular calling, with which I may either mingle some actings of grace, or ejaculatory Duties, as suddenly to look up to Heaven, and to behold the face of God, to whom I am to approve myself in my particular calling; or if they clash, I am solely to follow my particular calling, and to leave other Spiritual actings till their appointed season. Nor do I herein decline God's service. For 1. I follow my calling out of an awful respect to the eye, presence, and command of God, who hath said. Six days shalt thou labor: Yea I do what I do in civil business as the work of Christ, so that I may say at that time now am I about the work of God, and of Jesus Christ.

2. Seeing myself thus working for him, I may easily apprehend that for that time I honor God as much, nay more by the meanest servile worldly act, than if I should spend all that time in Prayer, Meditation, or any other Spiritual employment to which I had no call at such a time. It is noted therefore, by some, of Peter's Wives Mother, that when Christ had healed her of her Feaver, she sat not down at Table with Christ in Communion with him, which (no question) was sweet, but she ministered unto them (i.e.) she ran to and fro, and served him, and acted for him, wherein she shown more love, and gave him more honor, than if at that time she had enjoyed Communion with him in a nearer way.

But I hear others object, May I not take up some little of this time in recreations? what, must I always be on my calling? Is there not a time to every purpose under Heaven? a time to weep, and a time to laugh; a time to mourn, and a time to dance.

I answer: There is indeed a time to recreate; but that time is then, I say only then, when our bodies or minds are wearied with our other employments. O what a sad thing it is to see many spend a whole day, it may be a whole week in unnecessary sinful recreations! What, is this to redeem the time? or dare I thus spend the last day of my life in this world? Surely, God's people that make conscience of their Duties, should not meddle at any time with recreations (though in themselves lawful) without true cause, and a just calling thereunto; nor should they use them any longer, nor to any other end, but only to quicken their minds, or to revive their bodies, that so they may return with some lightsomness and alacrity to their callings again. He that spends his time lavishly in recreations, is like him whose Garments are made of fringes, and his meat nothing but sauces. I am not against recreations lawfully used, but God forbid that we should trifle away our time (more worth than worlds) upon foolish, vain, empty, end unnecessary toys.

3. The evening should be closed up with spiritual duties. If you ask what Duties? I answer.

1. The evening is a time for prayer, Let my prayer be set forth before thee as incense, and the lifting up of my hands as the evening sacrifice. To this of prayer I join reading the Scripture, and good books; for it is fit to close up the day with the same duties wherewith we began it.

2. The evening was Isaac's time for meditation: And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the even-tide. It may be in this Duty the morning is not so seasonable for some tempers; but shall the evening pass without some spiritual Holy meditations? Some conceive the evening to be the very season of set and deliberate meditation; and in this case how fruitful might I be in the use of that Ordinance of Looking unto Jesus, as he carries on the great work of our Salvation from first to last? O that this Duty of meditation, either on that, or any other spiritual subject, were not so neglected as it is by Christians themselves! The Lord gave Joshua a charge, that he should mediate on his Law day and night; and David's character of the blessed man is, that his delight is in the Law of the Lord, and in his Law doth he meditate day and night. And David's own practice was to remember God upon his bed, and to meditate on him in the night-watches. And Paul's charge to Timothy was to meditate upon spiritual things, and to give himself wholly to them. Or if you will have another proof for the evening-season, not only was it Isaac's time, but David's time, Mine eyes prevent the night-watches, that I might meditate in thy word.

3. The evening is a season for self-examination. This is another glorious ordinance which many Christians use occasionally, and against some good time; but to set some time apart for this every evening, and that in conscience, as they do for reading the word, and Prayer, where is the Christian almost to be found? I am sure it was David's charge. Commune with your own heart upon your bed, and be still. And agreeable to this was his practice, I call to remembrance my song in the night, I commune with my own heart, and my spirit made diligent search. Chrysostom on these words of David, What means this (saith he) commune with your own hearts upon your bed? thus answers himself, after supper-time, when ye are going to sleep, and are ready to lie down on bed, and have great quiet and silence, without the presence or disturbance of any, then erect a tribunal for the conscience.—And when neither friend disturbs you, nor servants provoke you, nor multitudes of business do press upon you, then take an account of your life, what you have done in the daytime before. And Dorotheus lays it down as a rule which the Christians of his time had learned of their forefathers, that in the evening they should question themselves how they had passed the day. Oh that Christians now would Sum up their accounts at the foot of every page, I mean, that they would call themselves to scrutiny every evening when they are ready to compose themselves to sleep, as to the little Images of Death!

4. The evening is a season to consider my Privileges in Christ. When David was ready for his Bed, I will lay me down in peace, and sleep (saith he,) for thou Lord only makest me dwell in safety. See how he speaks of peace, and rest, and sleep, and safety: all these were Privileges. Me thinks it is a sweet conclusion of a good days work, and a blessed farewell to the World if this evening were my last, and that immediately I must go to God, to consider of some of those glorious Privileges in God and Christ. I might instance in my peace, and rest, and sleep, and safety, by virtue of a promise, or covenant of Grace; or I might instance in my Election, Redemption, Reconciliation, Adoption, Sanctification, Glorification: But because these are commonly handled; and our communion with God and Christ; and the spirit of Christ is the most ravishing Privilege in this World, my soul carries me out for the present to pitch on this. One of our Worthies hath writ eminently on it; and for a taste of his excellent work, the sweetening of my last thoughts with such an excellent subject, I shall contract it thus,

1. I would consider my communion with God the Father in love. This the Father peculiarly fixes upon the Saints; and this they are immediately to eye him in, God is love. Christians walk of times with exceeding troubled hearts concerning the thoughts of the Father towards them; they are well persuaded of the Lord Christ and his good will; the difficulty lies in what is their acceptance with the Father, what is his heart towards them? Now here is the work of the Gospel to discover the love of the Father: this is the will of God, that he may always be eyed as being, kind, tender, loving, yea as the Fountain and Spring of all gracious Communications and fruits of love; and when Christians apprehend this, that God is love, and so rest upon him, and delight in him as such, then have they communion with the Father in love.

Now for the exercise of my soul in this blessed communion, the directions are such as these.—

1. I must eye the Father as Love. I must not look on him as one that is always angry; but as one most kind and tender in himself, and as one that hath had thoughts of kindness towards his Saints from everlasting.

2. I must so eye the love of the Father, as to receive it by faith; I must believe this love of God as for myself. Certainly his love is not mine, nor will it be mine in the sweetness of it, until it be so received. Either I must know it, assent to it, embrace it, and have all my affections filled with it, or it will be in vain as to my Communion with God the Father.

3. This love must have its proper fruit and efficacy upon my heart in a return of love to him again. To this purpose God loves, that he may be beloved: this is the return that he demands, My son, give me thy heart, thy affections, thy love O the Privilege of Saints! they have meat to eat that the World knows not of they have close communion and fellowship with the Father; they deal with him in the interchange of love; so that everyone of them may say. If I have hatred in the World, I will go where I am sure of love; though all others are hard to me, yet my Father is tender and full of compassion, I will go to him, and satisfy myself in him.

4. I would consider of my communion with God the Son in grace. So the Apostle speaking of our communion with him as Mediator, concludes his Epistles, The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Not to mention any other grace, but his purchased grace of justification, or acceptance with God the directions for this Communion are such as these.—

I must eye Christ's doings and sufferings; not as for himself but for his Saints, and for their Righteousness. He was made under the Law, that we might receive the adoption of Sons, And he bare our sins in his body on the Tree. This was the end of Christ's life and death, to work out a complete Righteousness for believers, as to a perfect acceptance before God.

I must approve of this Righteousness of Christ as that alone which is absolutely complete, and able to make me acceptable before God. Of this I am convinced, that if I die this night, there is a necessity of a Righteousness, wherewith I must appear before God; and if I have nothing to commend me unto God but my own Righteousness, oh how should I appear before his glory? there is no other name but Christ whereby I can be saved; and there is no other Righteousness but Christ's whereby I can be justified. Surely shall one say, in the Lord have I Righteousness and strength.

3. I must make an actual commutation with the Lord Jesus as to my sins, and his Righteousness. And to that purpose

- 1. I must hearken to the voice of Christ calling me to him with my burden, Come to me thou poor soul with thy guilt of sin, for that is mine; this agreement I made with my Father from all Eternity, that I should come, and take thy sins and bear them away; they were my lot, give me thy burden, give me all thy sins, thou knowest not what to do with them, I know how to dispose of them well enough, so that God shall be glorified, and thy soul delivered.
- 2. Upon this call I must lay down my sins at the Cross of Christ upon his shoulders. This is faith's great and bold adventure upon the grace, faithfulness, and truth of Christ, to stand by the Cross, and say, Ah! he is bruised for my sins, and wounded for my transgressions, and the chastisement of my peace is upon him: He is thus made sin for me; here I give up my sins to him that is able to bear them; he requires at my hands that I should be content to throw my sins upon him, and to this I consent.
- 3. Having thus by faith given up my sins to Christ, I must draw nigh, and take from him that Righteousness which he hath wrought out for me: To this purpose he tenders himself and his Righteousness to be my Righteousness before God; and by my accepting of it, I complete this bartering and exchange of faith, and come into communion with Jesus Christ, as to my acceptance with God by grace. He was made sin for us, that we might become the Righteousness of God in him.

3. I would consider of my communion with the holy Ghost in comfort. We read usually in the Gospel that he is the Comforter. Oh the condescension of the Holy Ghost! he willingly proceedeth, or comes forth from the Father to be our Comforter; he knew what we were, and what would be our dealings with him; he knew we would grieve him, provoke him; quench his motions, defile his dwelling place, and yet he would come to be our Comforter. Now for my communion with the holy Ghost herein the directions are these.—

1. I must ask him of the Father in the name of Jesus Christ. This is the daily work of Believers; they look upon, and consider the holy Ghost as promised to be sent, and in this promise they know lies all their grace, peace, mercy, and comfort; for by him so promised are these things communicated. O then how should I ask him of the Father, who is as ready to bestow him on me, as I am to give my children bread? If ye being evil know how to give good gifts unto your children, how much more shall your Heavenly Father give the holy Spirit to them that ask him?

2. If comfort come, I must learn to act faith distinctly on the Holy Ghost, as the immediate efficient cause of all my comfort. It may be the Spirit is given, and he tenders, or administers consolations, but then I do not consider him as the Comforter, why surely this grieves him: a lively faith will take notice of his kindness; upon every work of consolation that I receive, I should write this Motto, This is from the Holy Ghost, he is my Comforter, and the God of all my consolation.

3. I must return praise and thanks, and honor, and glory, and blessings to him on the account of those comforts I receive from him. When I feel myself warmed with joy, supported with peace, or established in obedience, I should then ascribe to him the praise that is his due. And this praising of him is no small part of my communion with him.

Say now, is not here a Privilege worthy of my consideration? would not a thought of this, and my acting in this, leave a sweet favor in my soul when I am going to my Bed as to my grave? David could say, Thy statutes have been my song in the house of my Pilgrimage; I have remembered thy name O Lord in the night. And my soul shall be satisfied as with marrow and fatness, and my mouth shall praise thee with joyful lips. Ay, but when must this be? He answers, When I remember thee upon my Bed; and meditate on thee in the night-watches. And he fastens it as a Duty upon all Saints, Let the Saints be joyful in glory, let them sing aloud upon their beds. And the Church resolves upon it, With my soul have I desired thee in the night, and with my spirit within me will I seek thee early. Surely it is God (saith Elihu who giveth songs in the night. And in the night (saith David) his song shall be with me. And 'twas a blessed remedy to his heavy Soul, I call to remembrance my song in the night. Oh that with such thoughts and considerations of my communion with God, and Christ, and the spirit of Christ, for of some other Privilege, I might every night go to my Bed! for then like the Philomele should I sing in the night; yea then would my Soul be satisfied as with Marrow and fatness, and my Mouth would praise him with joyful lips.

I might instance in many other duties which would then be seasonable, but these are the main; and if this day were my last day, or if this night I must sleep my last in this world, yet I should comfortably hope that in the doing of these duties in a spiritual manner, I had in good measure redeemed my time; and that when I awake, though I never awake till the Resurrection day, yet then should I see God face to face, and I should be satisfied with his likeness: Psal. 17.15.

I have now done; only before we part, I would say something of the deceased party as to our edification, and so an end.

You know I have been sparing in this way, because of many abuses, and especially because all promiscuously look for praises at their death, howsoever they spend their life. But now God hath removed me from this pastoral charge, and I shall not here perform many of these last offices of love, probably never more than this; and therefore at this time I shall crave your patience and attentions to what may be spoken without any prejudice to truth or harm to you.

The Duty I am pressing on you, is to redeem the time; and this I believe of the deceased party, that she redeemed her time. I shall not speak of her Birth, Education, Progeny, Nobility: Stemmata quid faciunt? Alas! what's all this to a Funeral-Sermon? Nor shall I speak of her youth or flourishing time; as I am a stranger to it, so I believe she had, or might have her failings in that time. The temptations of honor, riches, prosperity, and youth are stronger than most imagine; and therefore prayed David, Remember not the sins of my youth: Psal. 25.7. and all that are honorable may pray, Remember not the sins of my honor, nobility, and greatness in the world. For my part I shall not take notice of these things, or of those times, but rather speak of her redeeming the time, since that time that forsaking the World in great measure, she gave up herself in a more retired and solitary way to serve her God.

Now then if here I begin; She hath for these many years redeemed her time; as thus,

- 1. In life,
- 2. In Death.

1. In life, it will appear in her general and particular calling.

For the first, ordinarily every Morning and every evening she was exercised in those duties of Meditation and Prayer: This was her course, not by fits and starts, but daily, in her pleasant Walks, or private Chamber, she spent both her early and later hours in Communion with God. Nor speak I this by report only, for of her goodness and bounty she was pleased every Spring to invite me to her House, and by this means I was acquainted with her constant course. Indeed I was the more willing to embrace her welcome, because her House seemed to me as a College for Religion, or as a retirement from the noises and more frequent Temptations of the World, and this gave her, and me, and all that pleased, an happy opportunity to continue our devotions without interruption. Some Books she had for contemplation, others for an Holy conversation, others for meditation, others for devotion; of all sorts some, and of all these sorts she made some use; but of all books for constant use and practice she preferred the Bible, telling me often that other Books had their use and delight; till with often reading they became more ordinary, and then they seemed to lose of their former luster, glory, and excellency; but the Bible was in her often-reading ever fresh, and green, and new: She found in it still such per petual streams of Holy, Heavenly, and Spiritual delights, that (as Teriullian said) she could not but admire and adore the fullness of the Scriptures.

2. Ordinarily she spent the rest of the day in her works of the needle, with her maids about her: Or if other things of Housewifery had interposed, she was never so transported with honor, as to scorn her duty in the way of a particular calling. Well she had learnt that idleness was the rust and canker of the soul, the Devils cushion, pillow, chief reposal, his very tide-time of Temptation; and therefore with conscience and faithfulness she was diligent in her particular, as well as general, calling. Now and then she would have visited poor cottages, and relieved their necessities; but ever was she courteous to the Neighbourhood, and careful in the affairs of her own House. Take all together, and for ought

I know she might be a pattern to most of the Ladies in our Nation, or at least as a bright Morning-star amongst other stars.

2. She redeemed her time in death, or near her death; now indeed she was taken off her particular calling, and therefore this time she spent (as she could for sickness) in the exercise of spiritual duties, and spiritual graces. For duties she was much in them, of which we speak before; and for graces she shined, and was most eminent in such as these. As—

1. In meekness: She was of a meek and quiet spirit: seldom have I seen her exorbitant in passions, but often have I seen her amidst provocations quiet, meek, gentle, and easy to be entreated. In her sickness she carried it as a lamb; not a word of passion or peevishness issued out of her lips, so far as I observed. The very Image of Christ was, in this respect, drawn fair within her, Learn of me, for I am meek: Matth. 11.29. Christ a meek Christ, and she a meek creature.

2. In humility, She was of high descent, and sprung of Royal blood; yet humble in heart, and lowly in spirit. She never scorned the poorest Creature, but often stooped to wonderful condescensions, as I conceived. In her sickness, as well as death, she laid her honor in the dust. She was far from the opinion of them that think humility a debasement, and meekness a derogation from their repute; no, no, she had othwise learned of Christ; humility was her Ornament, and therewith she decked herself (in the Apostles language 1 Pet. 5.5.) or clothed herself, both in health and in sickness, when she could put on no other clothing,. Hence she was styled by some, the humble harmless Lady.

3. In patience, submission, and contentedness of spirit to be at God's disposal. She had a sore sickness, and because of her former health it was to her the sorer. Of many years before she had not layn sick in Bed one day, but many a turn had she took in her Walks and Gallery, and through much exercise in that way she had the advantage both of her health and communion with God; but now the Lord laid her on a Bed of sickness, not for a day, or two, or three, or four, but for a long while together. She that before had walked with God, was now God's prisoner; and such was the nature of the sickness, that she could not stir nor move one foot, yet was she patient and submissive to God's hand; she kissed the rod, she learnt the Churches lesson, I will bare the indignation of the Lord, because I have sinned against him: Micah. 7.9. She never murmured not repined one whit, but as she was taught, so she learnt and conformed to that frame of Eli and David, Lord here I am, do with me as seems good in thine own eyes.

4. In faith. She was ever and anon, during her, sickness acting faith, often she acknowledged her own nothingness, vileness, wretchedness; that she was of little faith, and of no ability, in respect of herself, to help herself. Indeed her weakness in faith, in grace, and in all performances was her constant complaint; and this made me to mind her of that promise, that he would not quench the smoking flax, nor break the bruised reed, until he brought forth judgment unto victory: Mat. 12.20. Some others I have seen most confident in their sickness of salvation, whom though I dare not censure, beause unacquainted with their grounds, yet I ingenously acknowledge that I like dearly of an humble, trembling, self-condemning frame.

Sure I am, that they who are vilest in their own eyes, are persons in whom God most delighteth. I remember how Paul in Scripture bespattered himself, but are not those passages his beauty-pots? Give me a man amongst you that will lick the dust of Jesus feet, and I dare say of such a one, that Christ will take him into his arms, and lay him in his bosom: it was her condition, she was all in confession of her spiritual poverty, yet she cast herself into the blessed-bleeding arms of Jesus Christ; yea she lay at his feet crying, Lord, I believe, help thou my unbelief: and again, I rest upon Christ, and upon Christ alone for Heaven and Salvation: and again, Though the Lord slay me, yet will I trust in him: and again, He hath delivered, and he doth deliver, and I trust in him that he will deliver me still: and again, Hold out faith, and anon thou wilt come to vision. This last word, hold out faith, was one of the last words she spake on that last day of her life.

5. In her love to Ministers. Her heart was wholly set on Christ; and as a true sign of it, she loved Christ's image, especially in his Ministers. And now I speak my own loss; amongst others she was pleased to cast her affections on the unworthiest of all my Masters messengers. In her lifetime she prefer'd me to this place; the Lord made her the first wheel of his providence in bringing me hither, and it was some trouble to her spirit that I left this pastoral charge before she left the World. Indeed she honored all the Ministers of Christ, yea the very function itself for Christ his sake. Oh how will she rise up in judgment at the last day against those that make it their work to reproach, vilify, and contemn the dispensers of God's word:

6. In her love and charity towards all. Many discords have been in these sad times, and she hath suffered much in many respects, yet in her approaches near to the confines of Eternity, I desired her to forgive others, as she desired God to forgive her; at which she proclaimed it very affectionately, that She freely forgave all the World; and she desired all whom she had offended to forgive her. Her children then kneeling about her, she gave them a blessing, as Jacob gave to Joseph and his children: this blessing was pronounced with that cheerfulness; heartiness, and fervency of spirit, that it melted hearts, and caused a flood of tears round about, her Bed; in so much that she was forced to rouse up herself, and to bespeak them, as Christ did those weeping women, Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves; why should you weep for me that am going to my Christ, and to those joys prepared by Christ? And then she gave a charge; the subject of it was a relative, respective duty to be performed by brethren; it concerned him most who was the beginning of her strength, or the excellency of her power: Gen. 49.3. and so far as Justice, or Religion calls, I presume it will never be forgotten by him.

7. In her desire to die, and to be with Jesus Christ, which was best of all. Sometimes she cried, Oh when will that good hour come! And again sometimes, Oh that I were dissolved, that I might be with Christ! But telling her of her duty, that she must wait, for waiting was a posture fit for servants; Psal. 123.2. Behold as the eyes of servants look unto the hand of their Masters, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of her Mistress, so our eyes wait upon the Lord our God until he have mercy upon us. Why then (said she) I will wait, why Lord I will wait until my change shall come Only she minded that promise, Heb. 10.37. For yet a very little while, and he that shall come will come, and he will not tarry. One thing was her trouble, she was afraid that her strong heart would not yield without much struggling to the stroke of death; of this she told me and others once and again; her reasons were best known to herself, but she prophesied truly; for indeed when death came to her heart, she uttered such groans that she outgroaned all our prayers. At last death by degrees overcame the strength of nature, and then she calmly and quietly left the world in the midst of our prayers; just in that passage, that her soul might be taken up by the Lord Jesus Christ into the Bridegroom chamber.

You see now how she redeemed the time in life and death. As Christ said to the Lawyer, so I say to you, Go thou and do likewise, Luke. 10.37. It is but a while that all of you have to live, and therefore I beseech you improve time, lay hold of every season to get to Heaven. Live every day as if it were your last on earth. Walk accurately exactly, circumspectly, not as fools, but as wise, Redeeming the time, because the days are evil.

Soli Deo gloria.

AN APPENDIX, Containing both the Doctrine and Directions, but more especially the Practice and Behavior of a man in the act of The Second Birth.

The occasion of this TREATISE.

Hitherto I have given the Doctrine and Application of the Soul-saving Second Birth; but some there are whose hearts are so steely, that all this cannot work upon them: If any such desire yet anymore (and desire they must, or there is no remedy for them) I have, for their help in the practice, brought a Practitioner afore them. It was Caesars great praise, that he bade his Soldiers still, Come; and if men had but many Caesars or leaders in these practical points, I suppose there would be more followers. A plain Doctrine may win some, and a particular Direction may win more, but a good Example wins most. Howsoever then, concerning the New Birth, I have delivered the Doctrine in the Sermons, and Directions in the Appendix; yet one thing is wanting, which may help more then either, to wit, the Practice of some Saint in this one necessary thing: And what Saint? what man that hath writ more on this subject, then T. H? it was said of blessed Mr. Bolton, That for himself, he could profess to his comfort on his Deaths-bed, That he never taught any godly point, but he first wrought it on his own heart; the same, do I more then probably think, was the practice of this man. Now therefore I thought fit, not only to contract his Books in this Appendix (which some without his privity have unskilfully put out) but also, and that more especially, to set afore you (whosoever you are) those prime, powerful, pathetical expressions of his Soul-pangs in the New Birth, as matter for your imitation: These expressions indeed are they I most especially aim at, which if you observe, are always delivered in the first person [I] and I verily believe they were not feigned, but feeling from his own heart and soul. What needs more? if either Doctrine in the first part, or Direction in the second part, or Practice in the third part of the Book (which consists most of Practice) can work on your souls, I hope some of these, or all of these, will help you on in the way from Corruption to Christianity, and from the state of Nature into the Kingdom of Grace.

CHAP. I. The Souls Preparation.

BEfore the Soul can share in Christ's Merits (to speak in the Authors style or language, without any alteration) two things are required:

- 1.

A preparation to receive and entertain Christ.

- 2.

An implantation of the Soul into Christ.

That there must be a Preparation, is the first ground we lay; and herein observe we The

- Matter
- Manner
- Means

of this Preparation.

1. For Matter: The soul of a sinner must be prepared for Christ, before he can entertain him. When Kings go to any place, they send (to make readiness) their Harbengers afore them; if Christ (the King of Saints) come into a Soul, there must be a Preparation before he enter; and good Reason, he is not a mere man, an ordinary person, but a King, a King of Glory. David in this case could call upon his Soul (so we may expound his Gates and Doors) Lift up your heads, O ye Gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting Doors, and the King of Glory shall come in; as who should say, Be enlarged Love, Joy, Hope; set open, give way, for the Lord is coming: But who is the Lord? it is the Lord of Hosts, the Lord strong and mighty, the Lord mighty in Battle: And with that he knocks again, Lift up your heads, O ye Gates, and be ye lift up, ye everlasting Doors, and the King of Glory shall come in; as if he should say, What, shall the Lord knock? shall the King of Glory stand? open suddenly, and make all preparation.

2. The Manner of this Preparation consists in these three passages: First, the Soul breaks that League which formerly it hath had with Corruptions, and reserves itself for Christ: And secondly, the Soul is most willing to give way to Christ Jesus, and to let him overthrow whatsoever shall oppose him: Thirdly, the Soul is content that God should rule all, not only the eye, or hand, or tongue, or heart, but the whole man; it opens all the Gates, and desires Christ to come, and take all the Keys of the house upon him.

3. The Means of this Preparation is the powerful Ministry, which God hath appointed for this work; and it is discovered in three particulars: First, in a particular Application of the Truth to the Souls of men with courage: Secondly, in a confirmation of the Truth by soundness of Argument, and plain evidence of Scriptures: Thirdly, in a kind of Spiritual heat in the heart and affections of the Minister, answerable to that which he communicates to the people. And this powerful Ministry works on the soul, 1. By discovering what is in a man's heart, so that the soul seeth that it never saw before, and so is driven to a stand. 2. By driving the soul into an awe of sin, so that it dares not now meddle with sin, as formerly it hath done.

If any soul that hath enjoyed these Means any while, is not yet fitted and prepared, it is a fearful suspicion, that God will never confer any good to that soul: Go home then (if there be any such) and reason with your own souls, and plead with your own hearts, saying, Lord, why not yet am I humbled and prepared? will Exhortations never prevail with me? will Terrors and Reproofs never break my heart into pieces? I have heard Sermons that would have shaken the very stones I trod on, that would have moved the very seat I sate on; the very fire of Hell hath flashed in my face; I have seen even the plagues of Hell, and if anything can do me any good, why not then those. Exhortations, Instructions, Admonitions and Reproofs that I have often had? I have had as powerful means as may be, which never yet did me good. The Lord be merciful to such a poor soul; the Lord turn the heart of such a poor sinner, that he may lay hold of mercy in due time.

CHAP. II.

SECT. 1. The general Circumstances of Preparation on God's part.

BUT for a further distribution, which shall be our method: In this Preparation two things are considerable; The

- General circumstances.
- Substantial parts.

The general circumstances are twofold, some on

- God's part.
- Mans part.

On God's part they are these,

- 1.

The offer of Christ and Grace.

- 2.

The condition of this offer.

- 3.

The easiness of this condition.

On Mans part, two things are considerable:

- 1.

That corruption doth oppose this Grace.

- 2.

That God will remove this corruption.

The first general circumstance of the souls Preparation, is on God's part; wherein is The offer of Christ Jesus, The condition of this offer, and The easiness of this condition; we may have all in this one Comparison: As with a Malefactor convicted of High Treason, for plotting some wicked practice against his Prince, if (after the discovery of all passages) the King make a Proclamation, That upon the surceasing of his Enterprises, he shall be pardoned; nay, if the King shall continue to send Message after Message, secretly to tell him, that would he yet lay down his arms and take a pardon, he shall freely be remitted, and graciously accepted into favor again: if this Traitor now should rather fling away his Pardon than his Weapons, then should the King raise an Army and overcome him, and take him, and execute him without any pity or mercy, I appeal to your own Consciences, is he not justly rewarded? What will the world say? he had a fair offer of Pardon, and the King sent Messenger after Messenger unto him; seeing therefore he refused and neglected such offers, it is pity but condemnation should befall him: thus would all say. Why, this is the condition of every poor soul under heaven, we are all Rebels and Traitors; by our Oaths and Blasphemies, we set our mouth against heaven; and yet after all our pride and stubbornness, and looseness and profaneness, and contempt of God's Word and Ordinances, the Lord is pleased to proclaim Mercy still to everyone that will receive it: All you that have dishonored my Name, All you that have profaned my Sabbaths, and contemned my Ordinances, All you cursed wretches, Come; Come who will, and take Pardon; therein is the Offer: only let them lay aside all their weapons; therein is the Condition: and then have Christ for the taking; therein is the Easiness of the condition.

Blessed God (may every Soul say) if I will not do this for Christ, I will do nothing; had the Lord required a great matter of me to have attained salvation; had he required Thousands of Rams, and Ten thousand Rivers of Oil; had he required the first-born of my body for the sins of my soul; had he required me to have kneeled and prayed until mine eyes had failed, until my hands had been wearied, until my tongue had been hoarse, and until my heart had fainted, one drop of mercy at the last gasp would have quit all this cost: But what goodness is this that the Lord should require nothing of me, but to lay down my weapons, and to receive Christ offered? Lo the Lord this day hath sent from heaven, and offered Salvation unto you Sons of men; the Lord Jesus is become a suitor to you, and I am Christ's spokesman, to speak a good word for him: O that we may have our errand from you! O that there were such an heart in my people (saith God) to fearme, and keep my Commandments always! Shall the Lord and his Messengers thus woo and entreat? and will any yet stand out against God, and say, I will none of Christ, I will try it out to the last? O then, if the great God of Heaven and Earth shall come with Ten thousand thousand of Judgments, and execute them upon that man; if he shall bring a whole Legion of Devils, and say, Take him, Devils, and torment him, Devils, in Hell forever; because he would not have mercy when it was offered, he shall not have mercy; because he would not have salvation when it was tendered, let him be condemned: If God should thus deal with that man, the Lord should be just in so doing, and he justly miserable.

SECT. 2. The general Circumstances of Preparation on Mans part.

The second general circumstance of the souls Preparation, is on Mans part; and herein is observable,

- 1.

That Corruption opposeth Grace.

- 2.

That God will remove this Corruption.

First, The first is clear, 1 Cor. 2. 14. The natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God, neither can he know them; and Acts 7. 51. Ye stiff-necked, and uncircumcised in heart and ears, yedo always resist the Holy Ghost, as your fathers did, so do ye: Give us a man in the state of Nature, and though all the Mininisters under heaven should preach mercy unto him; though all the Angels in heaven should exhort and entreat him; though all glory and happiness were laid before him, and he were wished only to believe and take it, and it should be his forever; yet in his natural condition he could have no power to receive so blessed an offer: howsoever, this hinders not but he is to wait upon God in the means. And then—

Secondly, God may remove this Corruption, which he himself cannot do: Herein observe we The

- Author
- Time of this Grace.

First, The Author is God: I will take away their stony hearts (saith God) and give them an heart of flesh; I will remove that sturdy heart which is in them, and will give them a frameable, teachable heart, which shall ply, and yield to whatsoever I shall teach them: The taking away of the indisposition of the soul to any duty, and the fitting, framing and disposing of a soul to perform any Spiritual service, is the alone work of God.

Quiet then thy soul, and content thy heart; thou mayst say, I have an hard heart within, and it will receive no good from without, the Word prevails not, the Sacraments have no power over me, all the means, and cost, and charges that God hath bestowed upon me is lost, and my heart is not yet humbled, my corruptions are not yet weakened: But in this be thou comforted, though means cannot do it, which God useth at his pleasure, yet the Lord can do it, there is nothing difficult to him that hath hardness itself at command.

Be then Exhorted, you that have stony hearts, to have recourse unto this great God of heaven: Should a Physician set up a Bill, That he would cure all that were troubled with the Stone in the Reins, and that we should hear of many healed by him, this would stir up all to repair to him, that labored of this Disease: Why, the Lord this day hath set up a Bill, That he will cure all stony hearts that will but come to him, and all the children of God have found to the proof hereof, to the comfort of their souls: You wives therefore, that have husbands with stony hearts, and you parents, that have children with stony hearts, tell them, You have heard this day of a Physician that will cure them, and exhort them to repair unto him.

Secondly, the Time of this Grace is either in regard of the

- Means.
- Men.

1. In regard of the Means; and that is, when the Sons of men have the Gospel shining in their faces; if ever good work upon their hearts, it will be then.

This should teach us how thankful we ought to be unto the Lord, that enjoy these liberties in the Land of the living; That a man was born in such a time, in the last Age of the World, in such a place, in this Kingdom, wherein the way of life and salvation is so fully, so plainly, and so powerfully made known, that the Sun of the Gospel shines full in his face, and is not yet set: O how thankful should he be!

And for those that neglect the Means of their Salvation, how should we pity them? Me thinks I see a poor creature, that slighted mercy and Salvation when it was offered him; me thinks I see that soul lying upon his deaths-bed, light is departing from his eyes, and his soul is departing from his body; O the name of a Minister, of a Church, they are as Bills of Indictments against coming the Soul of this man; me thinks I hear such a man say at his last gasp, The day is gone, the gate is shut, and now it is too late to enter: And thus the soul departs from his body, the body to the grave, and the soul to hell; O what bitter lamentations will that soul make in hell, O the golden time that I have seen, and not regarded! O the gracious opportunities of Salvation that my eyes have beheld, and yet I neglected! O the mercy, and grace, and goodness of God, that have been offered unto me! All these I have contemned, and trampled under my feet, and therefore now must I be tormented with the Devil and his Angels, from everlasting to everlasting. Now the Lord give us hearts to take notice of these things. If I were now breathing out my last breath, I would breathe out this Legacy to all surviving Christians, This is the accepted time, this is the day of Salvation. Do you hear? This day is Grace offered, and if any here would entertain it, O what comfort might he have: I was never humbled afore (might he say) but this day I was humbled; I could never before receive mercy, but this day have I received it; O this was a good day to me, now blessed am I forever.

2. In regard of men on whom God works; that is to say, on some in their tender age, on some in their ripe age, on some in their old age: But however the Lord doth at several times convert several of his servants, yet most, and most usually before their old age; and that some Interpreters wittily observe out of the Parable of the Vineyard, Mat. 20. 3, 4, 5. The master of the vineyard (saith the Text) went out at the third, sixth and ninth hour, and saw some standing idle, and he sent them into his vineyard: He went then (say Interpreters) on purpose to see and hire, and to send in laborers to work in his Vineyard, but he went out at the eleventh hour, not to hire any, he expected not then to have seen any idle; he went out upon some other occasion, and therefore seeing them standing, he wondered at it, saying, Why stand ye here all the day idle? as if he should say, No man will hire you now, it is but an hour to night, and therefore rather a time to leave working, then to begin to work.

O let this provoke us, that while the flower is in prime, we would use all means for our good; let us now in the heat and summer of our days, improve ourselves in good works, that so when the harvest comes, we may be gathered into God's Barn: O would we be exhorted to take the best time and opportunity of salvation, then might we receive the fruits of our labors, the salvation of our souls.

CHAP. III. The substantial parts of Preparation on God's part; or his dispensations of his work on the Soul.

Hitherto of the general Circumstances of the souls preparing for Christ. Now the Substantial parts of this Preparation are generally two: The

- Dispensation of God's work on the soul.
- Disposition of the soul by God's work.

The Dispensation of God's work discovers itself in drawing the soul

- From sin.
- To himself.

But because these two are made up by one action and motion, we shall therefore handle them together; and the sum is this, That God by an holy kind of violence (which is called Drawing, Joh. 6. 44.) doth pluck the soul from those sins that harbor in it unto himself: wherein we may consider two things;

- 1.

What the nature of this drawing is.

- 2.

The means whereby God draws.

First, for the nature of this drawing, it is of a double kind: 1. There is a Moral drawing, when by Reasons propounded, and good things offered to the Understanding and Will, a man comes thereby to have his mind enlightened, and his will moved to embrace things offered: Thus was it with Paul, when he was constrained by Lydia to abide in her house, Acts 16. 15. 2. There is a Physical drawing, when the Lord is pleased to put a new power into the soul of a sinner, and withal to carry the will to the object propounded, that it may embrace it; when the Lord not only offers good things to the soul, but enables the soul to lay hold upon the things offered: And thus the Lord draws a sinner from sin unto himself.

Secondly, for the means whereby he draws, they are these four:

First, the Lord lets in a light into the soul of a poor sinner, and discovers unto him that he is in a wrong way: This the soul marvels at, because usually it comes on a sudden, the sinner perceiving nothing less, Isa. 66. 1.

Secondly, though a man would defeat the power of this light, yet God still follows it with forcible Arguments, and draws with the cord of his Mercy; I taught Ephraim to go (saith God) taking them by the arms; I drew them by the cords of love, and with the bonds of a man. This mercy consists in these bonds, or this love is made up of four cords:

1. The Lord reveals himself to be ready to receive, and willing and easy to entertain poor sinners when they come unto him: Let the wicked (saith the Prophet) forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, and he will have mercy upon him, and to our God, for he will abundantly pardon; the word in the Original is, He will multiply pardons: Hast thou multiplied rebellions? the Lord will also multiply pardons: The bowels of compassion are still open, and the arms of mercy are still spread abroad; he pardoned Manasseh, and Paul, and Peter, and so will he thee, his pardons are multiplied, there is yet mercy for thee also, and for a thousand thousand more.

2. The Lord is not only ready to forgive when men come to to him, but that they may come, he also calls and commands them: O but may I (saith a poor sinner) shall I, dare I go unto the Lord God for mercy? may I be so bold to press in for favor at the hands of the Lord? I have been a grievous sinner, and have heaped abomination upon abomination, I am afraid therefore to approach near unto the Lord's presence. Is it so? hear what the Lord saith, Come unto me, ye rebellious people, and I will heal your rebellions. You that never prayed, never came to hear, all Rebels, come unto me: and then the people answer, Behold, we come unto thee, for thou art our God. This is great encouragement to a poor sinner, he begins now to wonder, and say, Lord, shall all my sins be pardoned? shall all my oaths and abominations be forgiven? I that slighted so many mercies, and committed so many follies, shall I be entertained? Yes (saith the Lord) come unto me, and thou shalt be forgiven; come, I command you come.

3. The Lord doth not only command a poor sinner to come in, but when he is nice in this case, saying, There is mercy with God, but not for me; the Lord then followeth him still, and sends another cord after him, that if it be possible he may win him, and woo him to receive mercy of him: If command therefore prevail not, he intreats and beseeches him to come and receive mercy, and this (me thinks) should move the hardest heart under heaven. We (saith the Apostle) are ambassadors for Christ, although God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, be reconciled unto God: rather then you should go away from Christ, even Mercy itself will come and kneel down before you, and beseech you, and entreat you, for the Lord Jesus sake to pity your poor souls, and to receive pardon for your sins: A sinner is not able to comprehend this, but he begins to be at a stand, and at amazement, What, that the Lord should beseech him! O that thou wouldst receive pardon for thy sins, and be blessed forever! Good Lord (saith the Soul) is this possible, that the great King of Heaven should come and beseech such a Traitor, such a Rebel as I am, to take pardon? That a King on Earth should proclaim a pardon to some notorious Traitor, this were much; but that the King of Heaven should lay down his Crown, and come creeping to me, and beseech me (on his knee as it were) to take mercy; this is a thing beyond all expectation: What, shall Heaven stoop to earth? shall Majesty stoop to misery? shall the great God of Heaven and Earth, that might have condemned my soul, and if I had perished and been damned, might have took glory by my destruction—Is it possible, is it credible, that this God should not only entertain me when I come, and command me for to come, but entreat and beseech me to come and receive mercy from him? O the depth of the incomprehensible love of God! Imagine you saw God the Father entreating you, and God the Son beseeching you, as he doth this day, Come now, and forsake your sins, and take mercy, which is prepared for you, and shall be bestowed upon you: Would not this make a soul think thus with itself, What, for a Rebel? not only to have mercy offered, but to be entreated to receive mercy, it were pity (if I will not take it) but I should go to Hell and be damned forever. The Lord he complains, Why will ye die? as I live, saith the Lord, I desire not the death of a sinner: Turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die, ye sinful Sons of men? Mercy is offered you, the Lord Jesus reacheth out his hand to you: fain would he pluck the Drunkard out of the Alehouse, and the Adulterer from his Whore: O if you break this cord, I know not what to say to you, this is able to break a Mountain in pieces; Shake, O Mountains (saith the Prophet) Why? because God hath redeemed Jacob: The Redemption of Jacob was enough to break a Mountain, let his Mercy break our hearts; it is God that begs, the blessing is our own.

4. If yet all this prevail nothing at all, the Lord will then wait, and stay in long patience and suffering, to see if any time a sinner will turn unto him. Our Savior follows poor sinners from Alehouse to Alehouse, and says, I beseech you, Drunkards, take mercy, and have your sins pardoned: The Lord (as we may say) tires himself, and wearieth himself with waiting one day after another, and one week after another: It may be (saith Christ) this week, this Sabbath, this Sermon a sinner will turn unto me; what, will it never be? Are you not ashamed (my friends) that the Lord Jesus should thus wait your leisure, and follow you from house to house, and from place to place; nay, that Christ should every morning appear to your understanding, and every night come to your bed-side, saying, Let this be the last night of sinning, and the next day the first day of your repentance: O when will you be humbled? when will you receive mercy, that it may go well with you, and with yours forever! If none of the other will move you, yet for shame let this cord draw you to the Lord: Hear, hear his doleful pangs, O Jerusalem, Jerusalem, wilt thou not be made clean? O when will it once be? A woman that is in travel, O how she expects and longs for her delivery I now a throb comes, and then she cries; anon comes a second throb, and then she cries again, O when comes deliverance? Thus God the Father takes on him the person of a travelling woman; he travels and travels until he bring forth a son, until some soul be converted, and brought home unto him, O Jerusalem, wilt thou not be made clean? when will it once be? I have waited one, ten, twenty, thirty, forty years long have I waited on this generation; when will it once be? The Lord thus travels in patience, looking when we will receive mercy, will never our proud hearts be humbled? will never our stubborn hearts be softened? will never our profane hearts be sanctified? when will it once be? Christ hath waited this day, this week, this month, this quarter, this year, these ten, twenty, thirty, forty years on us: You old sinners, that are gray-headed in your wickedness, how long hath the Lord waited on you? O for shame let him wait no longer, but turn, turn ye unto him, that ye may receive mercy from him.

Thirdly, if bonds of love move not, the Lord hath iron cords, that will pluck in pieces; to wit, the cords of Conscience: which thus disputes, He that being often reprov'd, doth still harden his heart, shall perish everlastingly:

But thou being often reprov'd, dost still harden thy heart, therefore thou shalt perish everlastingly.

In this Syllogism are contained the

- Monition
- Accusation
- Condemnation of Conscience.

In the first Proposition, Conscience gives the sinner a Monition, to come from sin, upon pain of the heaviest Judgment that can be inflicted. It is the Lord that sends the Conscience on this errand, Go to such a man, and tell him, You have blasphemed God's Name, and you have spoken against God's Saints, and you have broken God's Sabbaths, and you have contemned God's Ordinances; Be it known then unto thee (saith Conscience when it delivers the Message) That I have a command from Heaven, and from God, I charge you, as you will answer it at the dreadful day of Judgment, take heed of those evils and sinful practices that heretofore you have committed, lest you damn your souls forever. Will you question his Commission? see Prov. 29. 1. He that being often reprov'd, hardeneth his neck, shall suddenly be destroyed; if you be often reprov'd, and will not be bettered, then the Lord says, and Conscience from the Lord tells you, Be it at your own peril, ye shall suddenly be destroyed. No sooner Conscience thus perks upon the crown, but the sinner hangs the wing, and withdraws himself from his former lewd courses. But now when wicked persons see their companion is gone, they make after him amain, and then Conscience plucks one way, and they pluck another way; at last, by carnal company, and cursed persuasions, the soul is drawn back again to his former wicked courses, and so perhaps this twist is broken, and the sinner is gone.

2. If so, then Conscience, that was a Monitor, now turns Accuser in the minor Proposition; before it was only God's Herald to forewarn him, but now it is become a Pursevant and Sergeant to Arrest him: it follows him to the Alehouse, and pursues him home, then takes him in his bed, and Arrests him in his sleep; there (by a Meditation) it hailes the soul before the Tribunal seat of God, saying, Lo, Lord, this is the man, this is the Drunkard, Adulterer, Blasphemer, this is he, Lord; an enemy to thy Servants, an hater of thy Truth, a despiser of thy Ordinances; at such a time, in such a place, with such a company this man despised thy Truth, this is he, Lord, this is the man. And when Conscience hath thus dragged him before God, and accused him, then Take him, Jailor, take him, Devil (saith the Lord) and imprison him; let vexation, and horror, and trouble, and anguish lie upon his soul, until he confess his sins, and resolve to forsake them. In this case was David, when he was forced to say, My bones waxed old through my roaring all the day long; for day and night thy hand was heavy upon me, my moisture is turned into the drought of summer: What then? O then (saith David) I acknowledged my sin unto thee,—I confessed my transgressions unto thee, O Lord, and so thou forgavest the iniquity of my sin. David he folded up his sins at the first, and therefore his bones were consumed, and he roared continually; when the Lord had him on the Rack, he made him roar again, and would never leave tormenting, till David came to confessing; but when he confessed this sin, and the other sin, then the Lord forgave him the iniquity of his sin. Thus Conscience brings the soul of a sinner on the Rack (as Traitors are used, that will not confess otherwise) and makes him to confess his sins, and then he cries, O the abominations I have committed which the Sun never saw; in such a place, at such a time, O then I railed on God's servants, & blasphemed God's Name, I profaned God's Sabbaths, and contemned his Ordinances: what then? Conscience will make him confess more yet, to the Rack again with him; and then he cries and roars for anguish of spirit, then he confesses all, and resolves to amend, then he will pray, and hear, and sanctify God's Sabbaths, and lead a new life. Thus Conscience receives some satisfaction, and begins to be quiet; and now having got some quiet, his cursed Companions set upon him again, Refresh (say they) your soul with some of your ancient dalliance, &c. To this and the like Temptations of Satan, he listens again, and then he begins to follow his old sins, perhaps with more violence and eagerness then ever he did before; and now is another twist broken likewise.

3. If so, then Conscience that was a Monitor and Accuser, now turns Executioner. The first Proposition admonished, the second accused, if neither of these prevail, then Conscience concludes, Thou must to execution, thou shalt perish everlastingly. And now Conscience cries, Monitions or Accusations could not prevail with this man; Come, come ye damned ghosts, and take away this Drunkard, this Blasphemer, this Adulterer, and throw him headlong into the pit of Hell; he would not be amended, let him be condemned, he would not be humbled, therefore let him be damned. The man hearing this, then he is amazed, and thinks himself past hope, past help, past cure: Did you ever see or hear a tormented Conscience in these pangs? Now he calls, then he cries, Lo where Devils stand, the Heavens frown, God is incensed, Hell-mouth is open: And now a Minister is sent for, who displays to this despairing soul, the Mercy and Grace of God in Christ Jesus; O (replies he) this is my bane, my damnation, if I had never heard of Mercy, if I had never lived under the Gospel, and the means of Salvation, then had I been an happy man: Alas! it is Mercy I have neglected, it is Salvation I have contemned, how then should I be saved? O the persuasions of the Lord that I have had! the Lord hath even wept over me, as he did over Jerusalem, O that thou hadst known the things belonging to thy peace! yet all these persuasions have I contemned, and therefore certainly to Hell I must go. The Minister replies, Truth it is, you have done thus, but would you do so still? is it good now to be drunk, or to blaspheme, or to rail on God's Saints, or contemn God's Ordinances? O no, no (saith he) I now find what the end of those wicked courses will be: God's Word could not prevail with me, the Minister could not persuade me; O the good Sermons that I have heard, the very flames of Hell have even flashed in my face, the Minister hath spent his pains, and would have spent his blood for the good of my poor soul! But alas, I despised the Word, and mocked the Minister: Woe, woe unto me forever; now my Conscience gnaws, and tears, and terrifies my soul here, and I shall to Hell hereafter, and perish forever and ever. The Minister replies again, The truth is, you have done thus, but would you do so now? would you still blaspheme, and curse, and be drunk, and riotous? or rather would you not now part with all these, and take mercy instead of them? Then the poor soul cries out, Now the Lord for his mercies sake remove these sins from me: O I had never so much delight in my sins heretofore, as now I have woe, misery and vexation for them; but (alas) it is not in my power to help my soul; if the Lord would do this, let him do what he will with it. What (saith the Minister) you are then willing and content to part with your sins: O yes, (saith the soul) I would rather offend all the world then God; I had rather go to hell, then to the committing of a sin; if it would please God to help me, I would forsake my sins with all my heart. Why, now the poor soul is coming again, and God is drawing him again from his corruptions and sinful distempers.

Fourthly, when the soul is thus loosened, the Lord then fully plucks it by the cord of his Spirit: with an Almighty hand he cuts the soul off from sin, and takes it into his own hand, that he may govern him, and dispose of him according to his own good will and pleasure. Thus much of preparation for the substance of it on God's part.

CHAP. IV.

SECT. 1. The substantial parts of Preparation on Mans part, or the disposition of the Soul by God's work.

NOW are we to observe the disposition of the soul on man's part, which God works on the hearts of whom he draws. It is known in two works:

- Contrition, whereby the soul is cut off from sin.
- Humiliation, whereby the soul is cut off from itself.

For so it is, that either the soul seeth no need to depart from sin, or else it thinks it can help itself out of sin; the first is called Security, when the soul being blind, takes rest, and seeing no need to be better, desires it not therefore: Against this the Lord sends Contrition, causing men thereby to know the misery of sin, and to see need of a change: The second is Carnal Confidence, when a sinner begins to seek succor, and to scramble for his own comfort in his self-sufficiency; against this the Lord works Humiliation, causing the soul hereby to see the weakness and emptiness of its Duties, and that there is enough in its best services to condemn him forever. Before we speak of the works, it is not amiss to begin with the lets.

The first is Security: When the soul is taken up with a secure course, and rests itself well apaid in his own practices, and therefore it never seeth any need of a change, nor ever goes out for a change: Now while a man lives thus, and blesseth himself in his sin, it is impossible that ever he should receive faith, or by the power of faith repair unto Christ: where faith comes, it ever works a change, Old things are done away, and then all things are become new; the Lord therefore to remove this let, he burdens the soul extremely, and says, You will live in drunkenness, in covetousness; you will have your sins, then take your sins, and get you down to hell with them. At this voice the Sinner begins to see where he is: Is this true? (saith he) then I am the most miserable creature under heaven; therefore as they said, Men and brethren, what shall we do? We have been thus and thus, but if we rest here, it will be our ruin forever, O what shall we do? So the soul comes to a restless dislike of itself, and saith, I must either be otherwise, or else I am but a damned man forever.

2. When the soul is thus resolved that it must of necessity change, when it seeth his wound and his sin ready before him to condemn him, and it hath (as it were) a little peep-hole into hell; the soul in this distress sends over to Prayer, and Hearing, and holy services, and thinks by his wits and Duties, or some such like matters, to succor itself; and it begins to say, My hearing and my prayer, will not these save me? Thus the soul in conclusion rests on Duties: I will not say but these Duties are all good, honorable and comfortable, yet they are not God's, but the Ordinances of God. It is the nature of a sinful heart, to make the means, as meritorious to Salvation: A man that seeth his Drunkenness and his base contempt of God, O then he voweth and promiseth to take up a new course, and he begins to approve himself in reformation of his ways, then he cries, Now I will have no more drunkenness, now no more scoffing and scorning at those that go to hear the Word: and then he thinks, What can I domore? to heaven I must go. All this is but a man's self: Why so? Christ (who is the Substance of all) and the pith of a Promise is forgotten; a Christ in hearing, a Christ in praying is not regarded, and therefore the poor soul famisheth with hunger. Mistake not, I pray you, these Duties must be had and used, but still a man must not stay here: Prayer saith, There is no Salvation in me; and the Sacraments and Fasting say, There is no Salvation in us: all these are subservient helps, no absolute causes of Salvation. A man will use his bucket, but he expects water from the well; these Means are the buckets, but all our comfort, and all our life and grace is only in Christ: if you say, your bucket shall help you, you may starve for Christ, if you let it not down into the well for water: So though you boast of Praying, and Hearing, and Fasting, and of your Alms, and building of Hospitals, and of your good deeds, if none of these bring you to a Christ, or settle you on a Christ, you shall die for Christ, though your works were as the works of an Angel. As it is with a graft therefore, first it must be cut off from the old stock; secondly, it must be pared, and made fit for implantation into another: so the soul by Contrition being cut off from sin, then Humiliation pares it (pares away all a man's privileges) and makes it fit for the engrafting into Christ Jesus. Thus much of the lets, and of the works of Contrition and Humiliation in general.

SECT. 2. A sight of Sin.

BUT for a further discovery of these two necessary things, we shall now enter into particulars, and begin first with Contrition; which contains these steps:

- A sight of sin.
- Sense of Divine wrath.
- Sorrow for sin.

The first step is A sight of sin; and sin must be seen

- Clearly.
- Convictingly.

First, Clearly: It is not a general sight, and confused sight of Sin that will serve the turn; it is not enough to say, It is my infirmity, and I cannot amend it, we are all sinners: no, this is the ground why we mistake our evils, and reform not our ways; a man must search narrowly, and prove his ways, as the Goldsmith doth his gold in the fire: I considered my ways, (saith David) and turned my feet unto thy testimonies; in the Original, I turned my sins upside down, he looked all over his ways. And this clear sight of Sin appears in two particulars:

1. A man must see his Sin nakedly in its own proper colors, we must not look on Sin through the Mediums of profits, and pleasures, and contentments of this world, for so we mistake Sin: but the soul of a true Christian that would see Sin clearly, he must strip it of all content and quiet that ever the heart received in it; as the Adulterer must not look upon Sin in regard of the sweetness of it, nor the Covetous man on his Sin in regard of the profit of it: you that are such, the time will come when you must die, and then consider what good these sinful courses will do you: How will you judge of Sin then, when it shall leave a blot on your Souls, and a guilt on your Consciences?

2. A man must look on Sin in the venom of it; and that you may do partly, if you compare it with other things, and partly, if you look at it in regard of itself. 1. Compare Sin with those things that are most fearful and horrible; as suppose any soul here present were to behold the damned in Hell, if the Lord should give any one of you a little peep-hole into Hell, that you saw the horror of the damned, then propound this to your heart, What are those pains which the damned endure, and your heart will shake and quake at it; yet the least Sin that ever you did commit, is a greater evil (in its own nature) then the greatest pains of the damned in Hell. 2. Look at Sin simply as it is in itself, what is it, but a professed opposing of God himself? A sinful creature joins side with the Devil, and comes in battle Array against the Lord, and flies in the face of the Lord God of Hosts. I pray you in cold blood consider this, and say, Good Lord, what a sinful wretch am I? that a poor damned wretch of the earth, should stand in defiance against God! that I should submit myself to the Devil, and oppose the Lord God of Hosts!

Secondly, Convictingly, that Sin may be so to us, as it is in itself; and that discovers itself in these two particulars:

1. When we have a particular apprehension in our own person, that whatsoever Sin is in general, we confess it the same in our own souls: It is the cursed distemper of our hearts, howsoever we hold the Truth in general, yet when we come to our own Sins, to deny the particulars. The Adulterer confesseth the danger and filthiness of that Sin in gross, but he will not apply it to himself: The Rule therefore is, Arrest thy soul (whosoever thou art) of those sins particularly whereof thou standest guilty; To this purpose, say, Is Murder, and Pride, and Drunkenness, and Uncleaness such horrible sins? O Lord, it was my Heart that was proud, and vain; it was my Tongue that did speak filthily, and blasphemously; my Hand that wrought wickedness; my Eye that was wanton, and my Heart that was unclean and filthy; Lord, here they are: Thus bring thy Heart before God.

2. When the soul sits down with the audience of Truth, and seeks no shift to oppose Truth revealed: when the Lord comes to make racks in the hearts of such as he means to do good to, the Text saith, He will reprove the world of sin; that is, He will convince the world of wickedness: he will set the soul in such a stand, that it shall have nothing to say for itself, he cannot shift it off. The Minister saith, God hates such and such a sinner; And the Lord hates me too (saith the soul) for I am guilty of that sin. Thus many time, when a sinner comes into the Congregation (if the Lord please to work on him) the mind is enlightened, and the Minister meets with his corruptions, as if he were in his bosom, and he answers all his cavils, and takes away all his objections: with that the soul begins to be in a maze, and saith, If this be so (as it is for ought I know) and if all be true that the Minister saith, then the Lord be merciful unto my soul, I am the most miserable sinner that ever was born.

You that know not your sins, that you may see them Convictingly, get you home to the Law, and look into the glass thereof, and then bundle up all your sins thus: So many sins against God himself in the first Commandment, against his Worship in the second, against his Name in the third, against his Sabbath in the fourth: Nay, all our Thoughts, Words and Actions, all of them have been sins, able to sink our souls to the bottom of Hell. And secondly, that you may see them clearly, consider of their effect, both in their Doom, and in the Execution: Only to instance in their Doom; Me thinks I see the Lord of heaven and earth, and the Attributes of God appearing before him, The Mercy of God, the Goodness of God, and the Wisdom of God, the Power of God, the Patience and Long-suffering of God, and they come all to a sinner, an hypocrite, or to a carnal professor, and say, Mercy hath relieved you, Goodness hath succored you, Wisdom hath instructed you, Power hath defended you, Patience hath born with you, Long-suffering hath endured you; now all these comfortable Attributes will bid you adieu, and say, Farewell damned souls, you must go hence to Hell, to have your fellowship with damned ghosts: Mercy shall never more relieve you, Goodness shall never more succor you, Wisdom shall no more instruct you, Power shall never more defend you, Patience shall never more bear with you, Long-suffering shall never more endure you: and then shall you to endless, easeless and remediless torments, where you will ever remember your sins, and say, My Covetousness and Pride was the cause of this, I may thank my sins for this. Think of these things (I beseech you) seriously, and see your sins here, to prevent this sight hereafter.

SECT. 3. Sense of Divine Wrath.

THE sinner by this time having his eyes so far opened, that he beholds his Sins; he begins then to consider, That God hath him in chase: And this sense of Divine Wrath discovers itself in these two particulars:

- 1.

It works a fear of some evil to come.

- 2.

It possesseth the soul with a feeling of this evil.

First, the soul considers, That the punishment which God hath threatened shall be executed on him sooner or later: he cries therefore, What if God should damn me? God may do it: And what if God should execute his vengeance upon me? Thus the soul fears, that the evil discovered will fall upon him: This is the reason of those phrases of Scripture, We have not received the spirit of bondage to fear again; the Spirit shows our bondage, and thence comes this fear: Again, God hath not given us the spirit of fear; that is, the spirit of bondage that works fear. It is with a soul in this fear, as it was with Belshazzar, when he commanded the Cups to be brought out of the House of the Lord; An hand-writing came against him on the wall, and when he saw it, his thoughts troubled him, and his face began to gather paleness, and his knees knocked against one another; as if he should say, Surely there is some strange evil appointed for me; and with that his heart began to tremble and shake: just so it is with this fear, he that runs riot in the way of wickedness, and thinks to despise God's Spirit, and to hate the Lord Almighty, and to resist the work of his Grace: now it may be there comes this fear and hand-writing against him, and then he cries, These are my sins, and these are the Plagues and Judgments threatened against them, and therefore why may not I be damned? why may not I be plagued?

Secondly, the Lord pursues the soul, and discharges that evil upon him which was formerly feared; and now his Conscience is all on a flame, and he saith to himself, O I have sinned, and offended a just God, and therefore I must be damned, and to Hell I must go: Now the soul shakes, and is driven beyond itself, and would utterly faint, but that the Lord upholds it with one hand, as he beats it down with the other; he thinks everything is against him, he thinks the fire burns to consume him, and that the air will poison him, and that Hell-mouth gapes under him, and that God's wrath hangs over him, and if now the Lord should but take away his life, that he should tumble down headlong into the bottomless Hell: Should any man, or Minister, persuade the soul in this case to go to Heaven for Mercy, it replies in this manner, Shall I repair to God? O that's my trouble! Is not he that great God, whose Justice, and Mercy, and Patience I have abused? And is not he the great God of Heaven and Earth, that hath been incensed against me? Oh, with what a face can I appear before him, and with what heart can I look for any mercy from him? I have wronged his Justice, and can his Justice pardon me? I have abused his Mercy, and can his Mercy pity me? What, such a wretch as I am? If I had never enjoyed the means of mercy, I might have had some plea for myself, but Oh, I have refused that mercy, and have trampled the Blood of Christ under my feet, and can I look for any mercy? No, no, I see the wrath of the Lord incensed against me, and that's all I look for.

SECT. 4. Sorrow for Sin.

THE next step is Sorrow for Sin; concerning which, are two questions: 1. Whether it be a work of saving grace? 2. Whether God work it in all alike?

To the first, I answer, There is a double Sorrow, one in Preparation, the other in Sanctification: They differ thus; Sorrow in Preparation, is when the word of God leaves an impression upon the heart of a man, so that the heart of itself is as it were a Patient, and only bears the blow of the Spirit; and hence come all those phrases of Scripture, as wounded, pierced, pricked, in the passive voice: So that this Sorrow is rather a Sorrow wrought on me, than any work coming from any Spiritual ability in me: But Sorrow in Sanctification flows from a Spiritual principle of Grace, and from that power which the heart hath formerly received from God's Spirit; so that in this a man is a free worker: Now both these are saving Sorrows, but they differ marvelously; many think, that every saving work, is a sanctifying work, which is false, Those whom he calleth (saith the Apostle) them he also justifies, and whom he justifies, he glorifies: You may observe, That Glorification in this place implies Sanctification here, and glory hereafter; now before Glorification, you see there is Justification and Vocation, and both these are saving.

To the second, I answer, Howsoever this work is the same in all for substance, yet in a different manner it is wrought in most: Two men are pricked, the one with a pin, the other with a spear; two men are cut, the one with a pen-knife, the other with a sword: so the Lord deals kindly and gently with one soul, and roughly with another: There is the melting of a thing, and the breaking of it with hammers; so there is a difference in persons: for instance, if the person be a scandalous liver, and an opposer of God and his Grace: Secondly, if a man have harbored a filthy heart, and continues long in Sin. Thirdly, if a man have been confident in a formal civil course. Fourthly, if God purpose by some man to do some extraordinary great work: In all these four cases he lays an heavy blow on the heart, the Lord will bruise them, and rend the caul of their hearts, and make them seek to a faithful Minister for direction, and to a poor Christian for counsel, whom before they despised. But if the soul be trained up among godly Parents, and live under a soulsaving Ministry, the Lord may reform this man, and cut him off from his corruptions kindly, and break his heart secretly, in the apprehension of his Sins, and yet the world never see it. In both these we have an example in Lydia and the Jailor: Lydia was a sinful woman, and God opened her eyes, and melted her heart kindly, and brought her to a taste of his goodness here, and glory hereafter: But the Jailor was an outrageous, rebellious wretch, for when the Apostles were committed to prison, he laid them up in stocks, and whipped them sore; now there was much work to bring this man home: when the Apostles were singing Psalms, there came an Earthquake, which made the prison doors fly open, and the prisoners fetters to fall off, but yet the Jailors heart would not shake: at last the Lord did shake his heart too, and he came trembling, and was ready to lay violent hands upon himself, because he thought the prisoners had been fled; but the Apostles cried to him, Do thyself noharm, for we are all here: with that he fell down before them, and said, Men and brethren, what shall I do to be saved? For Conclusion, give me a Christian that God doth please to work upon in this extraordinary manner, and to break his heart soundly, and to throw him down to purpose, though it cost him full dear, this man walks ordinarily with more care and conscience, and hath more comfort coming to himself, and gives more glory unto God.

Is it so, that the soul of a man is thus pierced to the quick, and run through by the wrath of the Almighty? then let this teach all how to carry themselves towards such as God hath thus dealt withal: Are they pierced men? O pity them! let our souls, O let the bowels of commiseration and compassion be let out towards them! let us never cease to do good to them, to the very uttermost of our powers! And to the performance of this, Reason and Religion, and pity (methinks) should move us: Hear the cry, Oh (saith the poor soul) will these and these sins never be pardoned? Will this proud heart never be humbled? Thus the soul sighs and mourns, and says, O Lord, I see this sin, and feel the burden of it, and yet I have not an heart to be humbled for it, nor to be freed from it: O when will it once be? Did you but know this, it would make your hearts bleed to hear him: Oh! the sword of the Almighty hath pierced through his heart, and he is breathing out his sorrow, as though he were going down to hell, and he saith, If there be any mercy, any love, any fellowship of the Spirit, have mercy upon me a poor creature, that am under the burden of the Almighty! O pray, and pity these wounds and vexations of Spirit, which no man finds nor feels, but he that hath been thus wounded. It is a sign of a soul wholly devoted to destruction, that hath a desperate disdain against poor wounded creatures: Is it possible there should harbor such a Spirit in any man? if the Devil himself were incarnate, I cannot conceive what he could do worse.

2. If ever thou wouldst be comforted, and receive mercy from God, labor never to be quiet, till thou dost bring thy heart to a right pitch of sorrow; thou hast a little slight sorrow, but Oh! labor to have thy heart truly touched, that at last it may break in regard of thy many distempers; remember, the longer seed-time, the greater harvest: Blessed are they that mourn, for they shall be comforted; but woe to you that are at ease in Zion: Thou hadst better now be wounded, then everlastingly tormented; and therefore if thou desirest to see God's face with comfort, if thou wouldst hear Christ say, Come, thou poor heavyhearted sinner, I will ease thee, Labor to lay load on thy heart, with sorrow for thy sin; O what a comfort shall a poor broken heart find in that day!

SECT. 5. The extent of this Sorrow.

Hitherto of Contrition; the next work is Humiliation, which differs from the other, not in substance, but circumstance: For Humiliation (as I take it) is only the extent of Sorrow for Sin, of which we have spoken; and it contains these two Duties:

- 1. Submission,
- 2. Contentedness, to be at the Lord's disposal.

The first part of Humiliation, is Submission, which is wrought thus: The sinner having now had a Sight of his Sins, and a Sorrow in some measure for Sin, he seeks far and wide, improves all means, and takes up all Duties, that (if it were possible) he might heal his wounded soul: Thus seeking, and seeking, but finding no succor in what he hath or doth, he is forced at last (in his despairing condition) to make trial of the Lord: It is true, for the present he apprehends God to be just, and to be incensed against him, he hath no experience of God's favor for the while no certainty how he shall speed, if he go to the Lord; yet because he sees he cannot be worse then he is, and that none can help him but God, if it would please him: therefore he falls at the footstool of Mercy, and he lies grovelling at the gate of Grace, and submits himself to the Lord, to do with him as pleaseth himself, or as it seemeth good in his eyes.

This was the Ninevites case, when Jonah had denounced that heavy Judgment, and (as it were) thrown wild fire about the streets, saying, Within forty days Nineveh shall be destroyed: See what they resolved upon, They fasted, and prayed, and put onsackcloth and ashes; who can tell (said they) but God may turn, and repent him of his fierce wrath, that we perish not? as if they had said, We know not what God will do, but this we know, that we cannot oppose his Judgments, nor succor ourselves: Thus it is with a sinner, when he seeth hell fire to flash in his face, and that he cannot succor himself, then he saith, This I know, that all the means in the world cannot save me, yet who can tell, but the Lord may have mercy on me, and cure his distressed Conscience, and heal all these wounds that sin hath made in my soul? This is the lively picture of the soul in this case.

Or for a further light, this Subjection discovers itself in four particulars:

First, he seeth and confesseth that the Lord (for ought he knows) will proceed in Justice against him, and execute upon him those Plagues that God hath threatened, and his Sins have deserved; he seeth that Justice is not yet satisfied, and those reckonings between God and him are not yet made up, and therefore he cannot apprehend, but that God will take vengeance on him: What else? when he hath done all he can, he is unprofitable still; Justice remains unsatisfied, and saith, Thou hast sinned, and I am wronged, and therefore thou shalt die.

Secondly, he conceives, that what God will do, that he will do, and he cannot avoid it; if the Lord will come, and require the glory of his Justice against him, there is no way to avoid it, nor to bear it: and this crusheth the heart, and makes the soul to be beyond all shifts and evasions, whereby it may seem to avoid the dint of the Lord's blow.

Thirdly, he casts away his weapons, and falls down before the Lord, and resigns himself into the sovereign power and command of God. Thus David, when the Lord cast him out of his Kingdom, he said to Zadock, Carry back the Ark of God into the City, if I shall find favor in the eyes of the Lord, he will bring me back again, and show me both it and his Habitation: But if he thus say to me, I have no delight in thee; behold, here I am, let him do with me as seemeth good in his eyes. This is the frame of a poor soul; when a poor sinner will stand upon his privileges, the Lord saith, Bear my Justice, and defend thyself by all thou hast or canst do: and the soul answereth, I am thy Servant, Lord, do what is good in thine eyes, I cannot succor myself.

Fourthly, the soul freely acknowledgeth, That it is in God's power to do with him, and dispose of him as he will; and therefore he lies and licks the dust, and cries, Mercy, mercy, Lord: he thinks not to purchase Mercy at the Lord's hands, but only saith, It is in God's good pleasure to do with him as he will, only he looks for favor, and cries, Mercy, Lord, mercy to this poor distressed soul of mine: O (replies the Lord) dost thou need mercy? Cannot thy Hearing, and Praying, and Fasting, carry thee to heaven without hazard? Gird up now thy loins, and make thy ferventest Prayers, and let them meet my Justice, and see if they can bear my Wrath, or purchase any Mercy: No, no (saith the sinner) I know it by lamentable experience, that all my prayers and performances will never procure peace to my soul. nor give my satisfaction to thy Justice, I only pray for Mercy, and I desire only to hear some News of Mercy, to relieve this miserable wretched soul of mine:▪ Me thinks the picture of those poor famished Lepers, may itly resemble this poor sinner, when the Famine was great in Samaria; There were four leprous men sate in the gate of the City, and they said, Why sit we here until we die? if we enter into the City, the famine is there, and if we sit here, we die also; now therefore let us fall into the hands of our enemies, and if they save us alive, we shall live, and if they kill us, we shall but die: They had but one means to succor themselves withal, and that was to go into the Camp of the enemies, and there, as it happened, they were relieved. Thus is the lively picture of a poor sinner in this despairing condition, when he seeth the wrath of God pursuing him, and that the Lord hath beset him on every side; at last he resolves thus with himself, If I go and rest on my privileges, there is nothing but emptiness; and if I rest in my natural condition, I perish there also: let me therefore fall into the hands of the Lord of Hosts. I confess he hath been provoked by me, and for ought I see he is mine enemy; I am now a damned man, and if the Lord cast me out of his presence, I can be but damned. And then he comes to the Lord, and he falls down before the footstool of a consuming God, and saith, as Job did, What shall I say unto thee, O thou Preserver of men? I have no reason to plead for myself, and I have no power to succor myself, my accusations are my best excuse, all the privileges in the world cannot justify me, and all my Duties cannot save me; if there be any mercy left, O succor a poor distressed sinner in the very gall of bitterness. This is the behavior of the soul in this work of Subjection.

The second part of Humiliation, is, Contentedness to be at the Lord's disposal; and this point is of an higher pitch then the former: For example, Take a debtor who hath used all means to avoid the creditor, in the end he seeth he cannot avoid the Suit, and to bear it he is not able, therefore the only way is to come in, and to yield himself into his creditors hands; but suppose the creditor should exact the utmost, and throw him into prison, to be content now to undergo the hardest dealing, it is an hard matter, and a further degree. So when the soul hath offered himself, and he seeth that God's Writs are out against him, and he is not able (whensoever the Judgment comes) to avoid it, nor to bear it, therefore he submits himself, and saith, Lord, whether shall I go? thy anger is heavy and unavoidable; nay, whatsoever God requires, the soul lays his hand on his mouth, and goes away contented, and well satisfied, and hath nothing at all to say against the Lord. This is the nature of Contentedness.

Or for a further light, this Contentedness discovers itself in these three following particulars:

First, the Soul reflects on God's Mercy, which though he beg'd when he submitted, yet now he seeth so much corruption and unworthiness in himself, that he acknowledgeth himself unfit for Mercy: O Mercy, mercy Lord! What (saith the Lord) I had thought your own Duties would have purchased mercy: O no (saith the Soul) it is only Mercy that must relieve, and succor me; but such is my vileness, that I am not fit for the least mercy and favor; and such is the wickedness of this wretched heart of mine, that whatsoever are the greatest plagues, I am worthy of them all, though never so insupportable: All the Judgments that God hath threatened, and prepared for the Devil and his Angels, they are all due to my wretched soul. O (saith the Soul) had the Devils the like hopes, and means, and patience that I have enjoyed, for ought I know they would have been better then I am: It is that which shames the Soul in all his sorrows, and makes him say, Had they the like Mercy? O those sweet Comforts, and those precious Promises that I have had! How many heavy journeys hath the Lord Jesus made to me? How often hath he knocked at my heart, and said, Come to me, ye rebellious children; turn ye, turn ye, why will ye die? O that Mercy that hath followed me from my house to my walk, and from thence to my closet; here Mercy hath conferred with me, and there Mercy hath wooed me; yea, in my night-thoughts when I awaked, Mercy kneeled down before me, and besought me to renounce my bad courses, yet I refused Mercy, and would needs have mine own will; had the Devil but such hopes, and such offers of Mercy, they that tremble now for want of Mercy, they would (for ought I know) have given entertainment to it; and what, do I seek for Mercy? shall I talk of Mercy? What, I Mercy? the least of God's Mercies are too good for me, and the heaviest of God's Plagues are too little for me; I suppose (for so is my opinion) that God cannot do more against me then I have justly deserved, but be sure, God will not lay more upon me then I am justly worthy of: Nay, sure it is, the Soul cannot bear nor suffer so much as he hath deserved, if God should proceed in rigor with him; therefore it reasons thus: I only for one sin deserve eternal condemnation, for the wages of all sin is death, being committed against Divine Justice, and against an Infinite Majesty; and then what do all these my sins deserve, committed and continued in, against all checks of Conscience, and Corrections, and the light of God's Word? Hell is too good, and ten thousand hells too little to torment such a wretch as I am: What, I mercy? I am ashamed to expect it; With what heart (I pray you) can I beg this Mercy, which I have trodden under my feet? The Lord hath often wooed me, and when his wounds were bleeding, and his side gored, and his hideous cries coming into mine ears, My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? then, even then this Christ have I slighted, and made nothing of his Blood; and can this blood of Christ do me now any service? Indeed I crave grace, but how do I think to receive any? All the Pillars of the Church can testify, how often Grace and Mercy have been offered and offered, but I have ever refused; How then can I beg any grace? O this stubbornness and villainy, and this wretchedness of mine! What, I mercy? it is more then I can expect, I am not worthy of any; Oh no, I am only worthy to be cast out forever.

Secondly, the Soul reflects on Justice, and now it acknowledgeth the Equity of God's dealings, be they never so harsh; he confesseth that he is as clay in the hands of the Potter, and the Lord may deal with him as he will: yea, the Soul is driven to an amazement at the Lord's patience, and that he hath been pleased to reprieve him so long, that God hath not cast him out of his presence, and sent him down to hell long ago: It is the frame of the Spirit which the poor lamenting Church had, It is the Lord's mercy that we are not confounded, because his compassions fail not. When the Lord hath humbled the heart of a Drunkard or Adulterer, he begins thus to think with himself, The Lord saw all the evils I committed; and what then? O then the Soul admires that ever God's Justice was able to bear with such a monster, and that God did not confound him in his drunkenness or burning lusts, and cast him down into hell. Oh (saith he) it is because his mercies fail not, that my life and all have not failed long ago. Hence it is that the Soul will not maintain any kind of murmuring, or heart-rising against the Lord's dealings; or if Nature and Corruption will be striving sometimes, and say, Why are not my prayers answered? I know such a soul humbled, and I see such a fowl comforted, and why not I as well as he? then the Soul stifles, and crusheth, and choaks these wretched distempers, and doth also abase itself before the Lord, saying, What if God will not hear my prayers? What if God will not pacify my Conscience, doth the Lord do me any wrong? Vile Hell-hound that I am, I have my sin and my shame; Wrath is my portion, and Hell is my place, thither may I go when I will, it is mercy that God thus deals with me. And now the Soul clears God in his Justice, and saith, It is just with God that all the prayers which comes from this filthy heart of mine, should be abhorred, and that all my labors in holy Duties should never be blessed; It is I that have sinned against checks of Conscience, against Knowledge, against Heaven, and therefore it is just that I should carry this horror of heart with me to the Grave; it is I that have abused Mercy, and therefore it is just that I should go with a tormenting Conscience down into hell: And O that (if I be in hell) I might have a spirit to glorify and justify thy Name there; and say, Now I am come down to hell amongst you damned creatures, but the Lord is righteous and blessed forever in all his doings and dealings, and I am justly condemned.

Thirdly, hence the Soul comes to be quiet and frameable under the heavy hand of God in that helpless condition wherein he is, it takes the blow, and lies under the burden, and goes away quietly and patiently: O this is an heart worth gold! O (saith he) it is fit that God should glorify himself, though I be damned forever, for I deserve the worst: Whatsoever I have, it is the reward of my own works, and the end of my own ways: if I be damned, I may thank my pride, and my stubbornness, and my peevishness of spirit: What, shall I repine against the Lord, because his wrath and his displeasure lies heavy upon me? Oh no! let me repine against my sin, the cause of all; let me grudge against my base heart that hath nourished these Adders in my bosom, but let me bless the Lord, and not speak one word against him. Thus David, I held my tongue (saith he) and spake nothing, because thou Lord hast done it: So the Soul, when the Sentence of condemnation is even seizing upon him, and God seems to cast him out of his favor, then he cries, I confess God is just, and therefore I bless his Name, and yield unto him; but sin, sin is the worker of all this misery on me. Jeremiah pleading the case of the Church, now going to Captivity, Woe is me for my hurt (saith he) my wound is grievous; but I said, Truly this is my grief, and I must bear it. Such is the frame of an heart truly humbled, it is content to take all to itself, and so to be quiet, saying, This is my wound, and I must bear it; this is my sorrow, and I will suffer it. Thus you see what is the behavior of the Soul in this Contentedness to be at the Lord's disposal.

Object. But some may object, Must the soul, or ought the soul to be thus content to be left in this damnable condition?

Ans. For answer, This Contentedness implies two things: First, a carnal security, and a regardlessness of a man's estate, and and this is a most cursed sin. Secondly, a calmness of Soul, not murmuring against the Lord's dispensation towards him; and this Contentedness is ever accompanied with the Sight of a man's sin, and Suing for Mercy: It ever improves all means and helps that may bring him nearer to God; but if Mercy shall deny it, the Soul is satisfied, and rests well apaid. And this, Contentedness (opposed against quarrelling with the Almighty) every humbled Soul doth attain to, although in everyone it is not so plainly seen. To give it in a Comparison: A Thief taken for Robbery, on whom the Sentence of Death hath passed, he should not neglect the means to get a Pardon; and yet if he cannot procure it, he must not murmur against the Judge for condemning him to death, because he hath done nothing but Law: So we should not be careless in using all means for our good, but still seek to God for Mercy: yet thus we must be, and thus we ought to be contented with whatsoever Mercy shall deny, because we are not worthy of any favor. The Soul in a depth of Humiliation, it first stoops to the condition that the Lord will appoint, he dares not fly away from God, nor repine against the Lord, but he lies down meekly. 2. As he is content with the hardest measure, so he is content with the longest time, he will stay for mercy be it never so long: I will wait upon the Lord (saith Isaiah) that hath hid his face from Jacob; and I will look for him: so the humbled sinner, Although the Lord hide his face, and turn away his loving countenance from me, yet

I will look towards Heaven, so long as I have an eye to see, and a hand to lift up; the Lord may take his own time, it is manners for me to wait: nay, the poor broken heart resolves thus, If I lie and lick, the dust all my days, and cry for mercy all my life long, if my last words might be Mercy, mercy, it were well I might get mercy at my last gasp. Thirdly, as he is content to stay the longest time, so is he content with the least pittance of mercy; Let my condition be never so hard (saith the soul) do Lord what thou wilt for me, let the fire of thy wrath consume me here, only recover me hereafter; if I find mercy at the last I am content, and whatsoever thou givest I bless thy name for it; he quarrels not, saying, Why are not my graces increased, and why am I not thus and thus comforted? No, he looks for mercy, and if he have but a crumb of mercy he is comforted and quieted forever: And now (you may suppose) the heart is brought very low.

Hence we collect, 1. That they which have the greatest parts, and gifts, and ability, and honor, are (for the most part) hardly brought home to the Lord Jesus Christ; they that are most hardly humbled, are most hardly converted: what is Humiliation, but the emptying of the soul from whatsoever makes it swell? the heart must not joy in anything, nor rest upon anything, but only yield to the Lord, to be at his disposing and carving: now these parts, and gifts, and abilities, and means, are great props and pillars for the heart of a carnal man to rest upon, and to quiet itself withal; whence the Apostle, Not many wise men after the flesh, not many mighty men, not many noble men are called: Indeed (blessed be God) some are, but not many, few (that have so much of themselves) are brought to renounce themselves; and no wonder for a rich man to become poor, and a noble man to be abased, and a wife man to be nothing in himself, this will cost hot water; and yet this must be in all that belong to the Lord: not that God will take away all these outward things and parts, but that they must loosen their affection from these, if they will have Christ.

2. That an humble heart makes all a man's life quiet, and marvelously sweetneth whatsoever estate he is in; indeed sometimes he may be tossed and troubled, yet he is not distracted, because he is contented; as it is with a Ship on the Sea, when the billows begin to roar, and the waves are violent, if the Anchor be fastened deep, it stays the Ship: so this work of Humiliation is the Anchor of the soul, and the deeper it is fastened, the more quiet is the heart: when Job in time of his extremity gave way to his proud heart, he quarrel'd with the Almighty, his friends, and all; but when the Lord had humbled him, then, Behold, I am vile, and base; once have I spoken, yea twice, but now no more.

And this Humiliation quiets a man both in

- Fiercest Temptations.
- Heaviest Oppositions.

1. In fiercest Temptations; when Satan begins to besiege the heart of a poor sinner, and lays battery against him, see how the humbled heart runs him out of breath at his own weapons: Dost thou think (says Satan) to get mercy from the Lord, when thy own conscience dogs thee? nay, go to the place where thou livest, & to the chamber where thou liest, and consider thy fearful abominations, sure God will not respect the prayers of any such vile sinners. True

(saith the poor soul) I have often denied the Lord when he called upon me, and therefore he may justly deny me all the prayers I make; yet thus he hath commanded, that seek to him for mercy I must, and if the Lord will cast me away, and reject my prayers, I am contented therewith; What then Satan? What then, saith the Devil? I thought this would have made thee to despair; but this is not all, for God will give thee over, and leave thee to thyself, to thy lusts and corruptions, and thy latter end shall be worse then thy beginning; thou mayest call and cry, and when thou hast done be overthrown; God will leave thee to thyself, and suffer thy corruptions to prevail against thee, and thou shalt fall fearfully, to the wounding of thy conscience, to the grieving of God's people, to the scandal of the Gospel, to the reproach of thy own person. To this answers the humbled soul, If the Lord will give me up to my base lusts, which I have given myself so much liberty in, and if the Lord will leave me to my sins, because I have left his gracious commands; and if I shall fall one day, and be disgraced and dishonored, yet let the Lord be honored, and let not God lose the praise of his Power and Justice, and I am contented therewith; what then Satan? What then, saith the Devil? I sure thought now thou wouldst have despaired; but this is not all, for when God hath left thee to thy sins, then will he break out in vengeance against thee, and make thee an example of his heavy vengeance to all ages to come; and therefore it is best for thee to prevent this untimely Judgment by some untimely death. To this replies the Soul, Whatsoever God can do or will do, I know not, yet so great are my sins, that he cannot, or (at least) will not do so much against me as I have justly deserved: Come what will come, I am contented still to be at the Lord's disposal; what then Satan? and thus he runs Satan out of breath.

The want of this Humiliation many times brings a man to desperate stands, and sometimes to untimely deaths: Alas, why will you not bear the wrath of the Lord? it is true indeed, your sins are great, and the wrath of God is heavy, yet God will do you good by it, and therefore be quiet. In time of war, when the great Canons fly off, the only way to avoid them, is to lie down in a furrow, and so the bullets fly over: So in all Temptations of Satan, lie low, and be contented to be at God's disposing, and all these fiery Temptations shall not be able to hurt you.

2. In heaviest oppositions: when Satan is gone, then come Troubles and Oppositions of the world, in all which Humiliation will quiet the Soul. A man is sometimes Sea-sick, not because of the Tempest, but because of his full stomach, and therefore when he hath emptied his stomach he is well again: So it is with his Humiliation of heart, if the heart were emptied truly, though a man were in a sea of oppositions, if he have no more trouble in his stomach, and in his proud heart, then in the oppositions of the world, he might be very well quieted. Cast disgrace upon the humble heart causelessly, and he cures it thus, He thinks worse of himself then any man else can do, and if they would make him vile and loathsome, he is more vile in his own eyes then they can make him: O that I could bring your hearts to be in love with this blessed grace of God!

Is there any Soul here that hath been vexed with the Temptations of Satan, oppositions of men, or with his own distempers? and would he now arm and fence himself, that nothing should disquiet him, or trouble him, but in all, to be above all, and to rejoice in all? O then be humbled, and then be above all the Devils in hell: Certainly they shall not so disquiet you, as to cause you to be misled, or uncomforted, if you would but be humbled.

What remains then? Be exhorted (as you desire mercy and favor at God's hands) to this Humiliation. And for Motives, consider the good things that God hath promised, and which he will bestow upon all that are truly humbled: I shall reduce all to these three following Benefits:

First, by Humiliation we are made capable of all those treasures of Wisdom, Grace and Mercy that are in Christ.

Secondly, Humiliation gives a man the comfort of all that good in Christ: Many have a right to Christ, and are dear to God, yet they want much sweet refreshing, because they want this Humiliation in some measure. To be truly humbled, is the next way to be truly comforted: The Lord will look to him that hath a humble contrite heart, and trembles at his word: The Lord will not only know him (he knows the wicked too in a general manner) but he will give him such a gracious look, as shall make his heart dance in his breast. Thou poor humbled Soul, the Lord will give thee a glimpse of his favor, when thou art tired in thy trouble; when thou lookest up to heaven, the Lord will look down upon thee, and will refresh thee with Mercy; God hath prepared a sweet morsel for his child, he will revive the humble: O be humbled then, everyone of you, and the Lord Jesus, who comes with healing under his wings, will comfort you, and you shall see the Salvation of our God.

Thirdly, Humiliation ushers glory. Whosoever humbles himself as a little child; shall be greatest in the kingdom of heaven; He shall be in the highest degree of grace here, and of glory hereafter: for as thy Humiliation, so shall be thy Faith, and Sanctification, and Obedience, and Glory.

And now (methinks) your hearts begin to stir, and say, Hath the Lord engaged himself to this? O then (Lord) make me humble. Now the Lord make me, and thee, and all of us humble, that we may have this mercy. See how Everlasting happiness and blessedness looks and waits for every humbled Soul; Come (saith Happiness) thou that hast been vile, and base, and mean in thy own eyes; Come, and be greatest in the Kingdom of heaven. Brethren, though I cannot prevail with your hearts, yet let Happiness, that kneels down, and prays you to take mercy; let that (I say) prevail with you: If any man be so regardless of his own good, I have something to say to him, that may make his heart shake within him. But Oh!—Who would not have the Lord Jesus to dwell with him? who would not have the Lord Christ, by the glory of his Grace, to honor and refresh him? Me thinks your hearts should yearn for it, and say, O Lord break my heart, and humble me, that Mercy may be my portion forever; nay, me thinks every man should say as St. Paul did, I would to God that not only I, but all my children and servants were not only thus as I am, but also (if it were God's will) much more humbled, that they might be much more comforted and refreshed. Then might you say with comfort on your deaths-bed, Though I go away, and leave wife and children behind me, poor and mean in the world, yet I leave Christ with them: when you are gone, this will be better for them, than all the beaten gold or honors in the world. What can I say? but since the Lord offers so kindly, now Kiss the Son, be humble, yield to all God's Commands, take home all Truths, and be at God's disposing: Let all the evil that is threatened, and all the good that is offered prevail with your hearts, or if means cannot, yet the Lord prevail with you; the Lord empty you, that Christ may fill you; the Lord humble you, that you may enjoy happiness and peace, and be lifted up to the highest pinnacle of Glory, there to reign forever and ever.

CHAP. V. The Call on God's part, for the Soul to close with, and to rely on Christ.

Hitherto of our first general, to wit, The Preparation of the Soul for Christ: The next is, The Implantation of the Soul into Christ; and that hath two parts:

- 1.

The putting of the Soul into Christ.

- 2.

The growing of the Soul with Christ.

As a graft is first put into the stock, and then it grows together with the stock: These two things are answerable in the Soul, and when it is brought into this, then a sinner comes to be partaker of all spiritual benefits.

The first part is, The putting in of the Soul: when the Soul is brought out of the world of sin, to lie upon, and to close with the Lord Jesus Christ; and this hath two particular passages:

- The Call on God's part.
- The Answer on man's part.

The Call on God's part is this, When the Lord by the Call of his Gospel, and work of his Spirit, doth so clearly reveal the fullness of Mercy, that the Soul humbled returns Answer.

In which observe the

- Means
- Cause

whereby God doth Call.

1. The Means is only the Ministry of the Gospel; the sum whereof is this, That There is fullness of Mercy, and Grace, and Salvation brought unto us through the Lord Jesus Christ. Hence the phrase of Scripture calls this Gospel, or this mercy, A treasury; All the treasures of wisdom and holiness are in Christ: not One treasure, but All treasures; not Some treasures, but All treasures: where the Gospel comes, there is joy for the sorrowful, peace for the troubled, strength for the weak, relief seasonable and suitable to all wants, miseries and necessities, both present and future.

If then sorrow assail thee (when thou art come thus far) look not on thy sins, to pore upon them; neither look into thy own sufficiency, to procure any good there. It is true, thou must see thy sins, and sorrow for them, but this is for the lower Form, and thou must get this lesson beforehand; and when thou hast gotten this lesson of Contrition and Humiliation, look then only to God's Mercy, and the riches of his Grace in Christ.

2. For the Cause: The Lord doth not only appoint the Means, but by the work of the Spirit, he doth bring all the riches of his grace into the soul truly humbled: if you ask, How? First, with strength of evidence; the Spirit presents to the broken-hearted sinner, the right of the freeness of God's grace to the soul: And secondly, the Spirit doth forcibly soak in the relish of that grace, and by an over-piercing work, doth leave some dint of supernatural and spiritual virtue on the heart.

Now the word of the Gospel, and the work of the Spirit always go together, not that God is tied to any means, but that he tieth himself to the means: Hence the Gospel is called, The power of God to Salvation, because the power of God ordinarily, and in common course appears therein: The waters of life and salvation run only in the channel of the Gospel; there are golden mines of grace, but they are only to be found in the Climates of the Gospel: nay, observe this, when all arguments prevail not with corruption, to persuade the heart to go to God, one Text of Scripture will stand a man instead above all human learning and inventions, because the Spirit goes forth in this and none else.

This may teach us the worth of the Gospel above all other things in the world, for it is accompanied with the Spirit, and brings salvation with it. What if a man had all the wealth and policy in the world, and wanted this? he were a fool: What if one were able to dive deep into the secrets of Nature, to know the motions of the Stars, to speak with the tongues of men and Angels, and yet know nothing belonging to his peace, what avails it? Why do we value a Mine, but because of the gold in it? or a Cabinet, but because of the Pearl in it? O this is that pearl we sell all for.

Wouldst thou know whether thou art carnal or spiritual? observe then, if thou hast the Spirit, it ever came with the Gospel: See then how the soul stands affected with the Gospel, and so it stands affected to the Spirit. Is it so (may every soul reason with itself) that I will not suffer the word to prevail with me? then shall I miss of the Spirit, then will Christ none of me. O remember, the time will come when you must die as well as your neighbors, and then you will say, Lord Jesus forgive my sins; Lord Jesus receive my soul: But Christ will answer, Away, be gone, you are none of mine, I know you not. Any man, whether noble or ignoble, let him be what he will be, if he hath not the Spirit he is none of Christ's: His you are to whom you obey; but Pride and Covetousness you obey: Pride therefore will say, This heart is mine, Lord, I have domineered over it, and I will torment it: Corruptions will say, We have owned this soul, and we will damn it. You therefore that have made a tush at the Word, This wind shakes no corn, and these words break no bones, little do you think that you have opposed the Spirit: What, resist the Spirit? methinks it is enough to sink any soul under heaven: Hereafter therefore think this with thyself, Were he but a man that speaks, yet would I not despise him; but that is not all, there goeth God's Spirit with the Word, and shall I despise it? There is but one step between this and that unpardonable sin against the holy Ghost, only adding Malice to my Rage: I oppose the Father, perhaps the Son mediates for me; I despise the Son, perhaps the holy Ghost pleads for me; but if I oppose the Spirit, none can succor me.

CHAP. VI.

SECT. 1. The Answer on man's part for the Soul to close with, and to rely on Christ.

Hitherto of the Call on God's part; now we are come to the Answer on man's part. No sooner hath the Gospel and God's Spirit clearly revealed the fullness of God's mercy in Christ, but then the whole soul (both the Mind that discovers mercy, and Hope that expects it, and Desire that pursues it, and Love that entertains it, and the Will that rests on it) gives answer to the Call of God therein. Mercy is a proper object of all these, of the Mind to be enlightened, of Hope to be sustained, of Desire to be supported, of Love to be cheered: Nay, there is a full satisfactory sufficiency of all good in Christ, that so the will of man may take full repose and rest in him; therefore the Lord saith, Come unto me, all that are weary and heavy laden; Come Mind, and Hope, and Desire, and Love, and Will, and Heart: they all answer, We come: The Mind saith, Let me know this Mercy above all, and desire to know nothing but Christ and him crucified: Let me expect this Mercy (saith Hope) that belongs to me, and will befall me: Desire saith, Let me long after it: O—saith Love, let me embrace and welcome it: O, saith the Heart, let me lay hold on the handle of Salvation; here we will live, and here we will die at the footstool of God's Mercy. Thus all go, Mind, Hope, Desire, Love, Joy, the Will, and all lay hold upon the Promise, and say, Let us make the Promise a prey, let us prey upon mercy, as the wild Beasts do upon their provision. Thus the faculties of the soul hunt and pursue this mercy, and lay hold thereupon, and satisfy themselves herein.

SECT. 2. A sight of Christ, or of mercy in Christ.

BUT for a further discovery of these works of the soul, we shall now enter into particulars: And for their order, First, the Lord lets a light into the mind, for what the eye never seeth, the heart never desireth, hope never expecteth, the soul never embraceth: If the soul then seems to hang afar off, and dares not believe that Christ will have mercy on him, in this case the Spirit lets in a light into his heart, and discovers unto him, that God will deal graciously with him. It is with a sinner, as with a man that sits in darkness, haply he seeth a light in the street out of a window, but he sits still in darkness, and is in the dungeon all the while, and he thinks, How good were it, if a man might enjoy that light? So, many a poor humble-hearted broken sinner seeth, and hath an inckling of God's mercies, he heareth the Saints speak of God's love, and his goodness, and compassion; Ah (thinks he) how happy are they, blessed are they, what an excellent condition are they in? but I am in darkness still, and never had a drop of mercy vouchsafed unto me: At last, the Lord sets a light in his house, and puts the candle into his own hand, and makes him see by particular evidence, Thou shalt be pardoned, and thou shalt be saved.

The manner how the Spirit works this, is discovered in three passages:

First, the Spirit of the Lord meeting with an humble, broken, lowly, self-denying sinner (he that is a proud stout-hearted wretch knows nothing of this matter) it opens the eye, and now the humbled sinner begins to see (like the man in the Gospel) some light and glimmering about his understanding, that he can look into, and discern the spiritual things of God.

2. Then the Lord says before him all the riches of the treasure of his grace; no sooner hath he given him an eye, but then he lays colors before him (the unsearchable riches of Christ) that he may see and look, and fall in love with those sweet treasures; and then saith the soul, O that mercy, and grace, and pardon were mine! O that my sins were done away! the Lord saith, I will refresh them that are heavy laden; then saith the soul, O that I had that refreshing! you shall have rest, saith God; O that I had rest too, saith the soul! And now the soul begins to look after the mercy and compassion which is laid afore it.

3. The Spirit of the Lord doth witness or certify thoroughly and effectually to the soul, that this mercy in Christ belongs unto him; and without this, the soul of an humble broken-hearted sinner hath no ground to go unto Christ: what good doth it an hungry stomach to hear that there is a great deal of cheer and dainties provided for such and such men, and he have no part therein? Take a Beggar that hath a thousand pounds told before him (he may apprehend the sum of so much gold and so much silver) but what is all that to me (saith he) if in the mean time I die and starve? It falls out in this case with a broken-hearted sinner, as with a prodigal child: The Prodigal he hath spent his means, and abused his Father, and now is there a Famine in the Land, and poverty is befallen him; he knows indeed there is meat and clothes enough in his Fathers House, but (alas) what can he expect thence but his Fathers heavy displeasure? if a man should say, Go to your Father, he will give you a portion again; would he (think you) believe this? No (would he say) it is my Father I have offended, and will he now receive me? yet should a man come and tell him, that he heard his Father say so, and then show him a Certificate under his Fathers hand that it was so, this would sure draw him into some hope that his Father meant well towards him: So it is with a sinner when he is apprehensive of all his rebellions; if a man should tell such a soul, Go to God, and he will give you abundance of mercy and compassion; the soul cannot believe it, but thinks, What, I mercy? no, no: Blessed are they that walk humbly before God, and conform their lives to his word, let them take it; but for me, it is mercy I have opposed, it is grace I have rejected; no mercy, no grace for me: But now if God send a Messenger from Heaven, or if it come under the hand of his Spirit, that he will accept of him, and pass by all his sins, this makes the soul grow into some hopes, and upon this ground it goes unto the Lord: But here observe me, that none either in heaven or in earth, but only God's Spirit can make this Certificate; when it is night, all the candles in the world cannot take away the darkness; so all the means of grace and salvation, all the candle-light of the Ministry, they are all good helps, but the darkness of the night will not be gone, before the Sun of Righteousness arise in our hearts. Hence it is that it proves so difficult a matter to comfort a distressed soul; I shall one day perish, saith David, I shall one day go down to hell: saith the soul, Let all the Ministers under heaven cry, Comfort ye, comfort ye: still he replies, I mercy? and I comfort? will the Lord pardon me? It is mercy I have despised and trampled under my feet, and I mercy? no, no: Thus we Ministers observe by experience, Some that in their own apprehensions are gone to the bottom of hell, we make known to them Reasons, and Arguments, and Promises, but nothing takes place; whats the Reason? O none but God's Spirit can do it, he must either come from Heaven, and say, Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, or it will never prevail: let me speak therefore to you that are

Ministers, you do well to labor to give comfort to a poor fainting soul, but always say, Comfort Lord, O Lord, say unto this poor soul, that thou art his salvation.

SECT. 3. Hope in Christ.

The mind being thus enlightened, the Lord calls on the affections; Come desire, Come love: but the first voice is to Hope, now Hope is a faculty of the soul that looks out for mercy, and waits for the same; So the Apostle, Phil. 1. 20. According to my earnest expectation: It is a similitude taken from a man that looks after another, and lifts up himself as high as he may to see if any be coming after him; so here the soul stands as it were a tip toe, expecting when the Lord comes; he hath heard the Lord say, Mercy is coming towards thee, mercy is provided for thee: now this affection is set out to meet mercy afar off, it is the looking out of the soul: O when will it be Lord? Thou sayest mercy is prepared, thou sayest mercy is approaching; the soul standeth a tip-toe, O when will it come Lord! here is the voice of Hope; This sinful soul of mine, it may through God's mercy be sanctified; this troubled perplexed soul of mine, it may through God's mercy be pacified; this evil and corruption which harbors in me, and hath taken possession of me, it may through God's mercy be removed; and when will it be, Lord?

The manner how God's Spirit works this, is discerned in three particulars: 1. The Lord doth sweetly stay the heart, and fully persuade the soul, that a man's sins are pardonable, and that all his sins may be pardoned, and that all the good things he wanteth, they may be bestowed; this is a great sustainer of the soul: when a poor sinner seeth his sins in their number, nature; when he seeth no rest in the creature, nor in himself, though all means, all help, all men, all Angels, should join together, yet they cannot pardon one sin of his; then the Lord lifteth up his voice, and saith from Heaven, Thy sins are pardonable in the Lord Jesus Christ.

2. The Lord doth sweetly persuade the soul that all his sins shall be pardoned; the Lord makes this appear, and persuades his heart that he intendeth mercy, that Christ hath procured pardon for the soul of a broken-hearted sinner in special, and that he cannot but come unto it; by this means Hope comes to be assured, and certainly persuaded to look out, knowing the Promise shall be at the last accomplished: the former only sustained the heart, and provoked it to look for mercy, but this comforts the soul, that undoubtedly it shall have mercy: The Lord Jesus came to seek and to save that which was lost: now saith the broken and humble sinner, I am lost; Did Christ come to save sinners? Christ must fail of his end, or I of my comfort: God saith, Come unto me, all you that are weary and heavy laden: I am weary, and unless the Lord intend good unto me, why should he invite me and bid me come? surely he means to show me mercy, nay he promiseth to relieve me, when I come therefore he will do good unto me.

3. The Lord lets in some relish and taste of the sweetness of his love, some scent and savor of it, so that the soul is deeply affected with it, and carried mightily unto it, that it cannot be severed; it is the letting in the riches of his love, that turneth the expectation of the soul another way, yea it turneth the whole stream of the soul thitherward.

This Reproves, 1. Those that cast off all Hope. 2. Those that without ground will do nothing but Hope. 1. If the Lord stir up the heart of his to hope for his Mercy, then take heed of that fearful sin of Despair. Despair we must in ourselves, and that is good; but this Despair we speak of, is heinous in the eyes of God, and hurtful to thee. 1. Injurious to God, thou goest to the deep dungeon of thy Corruption, and there thou sayest, These sins can never be pardoned, I am still proud, and more stubborn, this distress God seeth not, God succors not, his hand cannot reach, his Mercy cannot save. Now mark what the Prophet saith to such a perplexed soul, Why sayest thou thy way is hid from the Lord? the Lord saith, Why sayest thou? is anything too hard for the Lord? O you wrong God exceedingly, you think it a matter of humility, when you account so vilely of yourselves: Can God pardon sin to such unworthy creatures? It is true (saith the soul) Manasseh was pardoned, Paul was converted, God's Saints have been received to mercy, But can my sins be pardoned? can my soul be quickened? No, no, my sins are greater then can be forgiven. Why then, poor soul, Satan is stronger to overthrow thee, then God to save thee; and thus you make God to be no God, nay you make him to be weaker then Sin, then Hell, then the Devil. 2. This sin is dangerous to thy own soul, it is that which taketh up the bridge, and cutteth off all passages, nay it plucks up a man's Endeavors (as it were) quite by the roots: Alas (saith he) what skilleth for a man to pray? what profits it a man to read? what benefit in all the means of grace? The stone is rolled upon me, and my Condemnation sealed forever: I will never look after Christ, Grace, Salvation anymore; the time of grace is past, the day is gone. And thus the soul sinketh in itself, Will the Lord cast me off forever, and will he show no favor? I said (saith David) this is my infirmity: the word in the Original is, This is my sickness; as who should say, What, is mercy gone forever? this will be my death, then is life gone.

2. This Reproves and Condemns that great sin of Presumption, a sin more frequent, and (if possibly may be) more dangerous; as they said, Saul had slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands: So hath Despair slain his thousands, but Presumption his ten thousands. It is the counsel of Peter, That every man should be ready to give an account of his faith and hope that is in him. Let us see the Reasons that persuade you to these groundless foolish Hopes? you say, You hope to be saved, and you hope to go to heaven, and you hope to see God's face with comfort; and have you no grounds? it is a foolish hope, an unreasonable hope.

But comfort ye, comfort ye, poor drooping spirits; They that wait upon the Lord shall renew their strength: you say, You cannot do this, and you cannot do that; I say, If you can but hope, and wait for the Mercy of the Lord, you are rich Christians. If a man have many Reversions, they that judge of his Estate, will not judge him for his present Estate, but for the Reversions he shall have: Haply thou hast not for the present the sense and feeling of God's love and assurance; away with that feeling, do not dote upon it, thou hast Reversions of old Leases, ancient Mercies, old Compassions, such as have been reserved from the beginning of the world, and know thou hast a fair Inheritance.

You will say, Were my hopes of the right stamp, then might I comfort myself; but there are many false, flashy hopes, and how should I know that my hope is sound and good? I answer, you may know it by these particulars:

1. A grounded hope hath a peculiar certainty in it, it doth bring home unto the soul in special manner, the goodness of God, and the riches of his love in Christ Jesus. It stands not on Is's and And's, but saith, It must undoubtedly, it must certainly be mine; and good Reason, for this hope hath a Word to hang and hold upon: What is that? I will wait upon the Lord, and I hope in his Word; it is a Scripture-hope, a Word hope: the Word saith, The Lord came to save those that were lost; why, I find my self to be lost, saith the soul, and therefore I hope: The Lord will seek me, though I cannot seek him; I hope the Lord will find me, though I cannot find myself; I hope the Lord will save me, though I cannot save myself. So the Word saith, He appointeth them that mourn in Zion, to give unto them beauty for ashes: will you have a Legacy of Joy, Mercy and Pity? here it is, the Lord Christ left it you, I bequeath and leave this to all broken-hearted sinners, to all you humble mourning sinners, this is your Legacy, sue for it in the Court, and you shall have it forever.

2. A grounded hope is ever of great power and strength to hold the soul to the truth of the Promise; hence take a poor sinner when he is at the weakest, under water, when all Temptations, Oppositions, Corruptions grow strong against him, and he saith, I shall one day perish by the hand of Saul, this proud, foolish, filthy heart of mine will be my bane, I shall never get power, strength and grace against these sins. Here is the lowest under of a poor soul. If a man should now reply, Then cast off all hope and confidence, reject the means, and turn to your sins: Mark how Hope steppeth in, and saith, Nay, whatsoever I am and do, whatsoever my condition is, I will use the means; I am sure all my help is in Christ, all my hope is in the Lord Jesus, and if I must perish, I will perish seeking him, and waiting upon him. Why, this is Hope, and I warrant, that soul shall never go to hell; I will wait for the Lord, yea though he hath hid himself from the house of Jacob.

The last Use is of Exhortation: I desire you, I entreat you (I will not say, I command you, though this may be enjoined) if you have any hope of Heaven, if you have any treasure in Christ, labor to quicken this affection above all: The means are these—

1. Labor to be much acquainted with the precious Promises of God, to have them at hand, and upon all occasions: These are thy comforts, and will support thy soul, as the body without comfort is unfit for anything; so it is here, unless a man hath that provision of God's Promises, and have them at hand daily, and have them dished out, and fitted for him, his heart will fail.

2. Maintain in thy heart a deep and serious acknowledgement of that supreme Authority of the Lord, to do what he will, and how he will, according to his pleasure. Alas, we think too often to bring God to our bow, We have hoped thus long, and God hath not answered, and shall we wait still? Wait! Ah wait, and bless God that you may wait: If you may lie at God's feet, and put your mouths in the dust, and at the end of your days have one crumb of Mercy, it is enough; therefore check those distempers, Shall I wait still? It is a most admirable strange thing, that a poor worm, worthy of hell, should take up state, and stand upon terms with God: He will not wait upon God; Who must wait then? must God wait, or man wait? It was the Apostles question, Wilt thou now restore the Kingdom of Israel? to whom our Savior answered, It is not for you to know the times and seasons; as who should say, Hands off, it is for you to wait, and to expect mercy, it is not for you to know: If you begin to wrangle, and say, How long, Lord? When, Lord? And why not now, Lord? Why not I, Lord? now check thy own heart, and say, It is not for me to know, it is for me to be humble, abased, and to wait for mercy.

SECT. 4. A desire after Christ.

WHen the soul is humbled, and the eye opened, then he begins thus to reason, O happy I that see mercy, but miserable I, if I come to see this, and never have a share in it! O why not I (Lord?) why not my sins pardoned? and why not my corruptions subdued? my soul now thirsteth after thee as a thirsty Land, my affections now hunger after righteousness both infused and imputed; Now this desire is begotten thus:

When the soul is come so far, that after a through conviction of sin, and sound humiliation under God's mighty hand, it hath a timely and seasonable revelation of the glorious mysteries of Christ, of his excellencies, invitations, truth, tenderheartedness, &c. of the heavenly splendor, and riches, of the pearl of great price; then doth the soul conceive by the help of the Holy Ghost, this desire and vehement longing: And (least any cozen themselves by any misconceits about it, as the notorious sinner, the mere civil man, and the formal Professor) it is then known to be saving:

1. When it is joined with an hearty willingness and unfeigned resolution, to sell all, to part with all sin, to bid adieu forever to our darling-delight; it is not an effect of self-love, not an ordinary wish of natural appetite (like Balaam's, Numb. 23. 10.) of those who desire to be happy, but are unwilling to be holy; who would gladly be saved, but are loath to be sanctified; no, if thou desirest earnestly, thou wilt work accordingly; for as the desire is, so will the endeavor be.

2. When it is earnest, eager, vehement, extremely thirsting after Christ, as the parched earth for refreshing showers, or the hunted Hart for the Water-brooks. We read of a Scottish Penitent, who a little before his confession, freely confessed his fault, to the shame (as he said) of himself, and to the shame of the Devil, but to the glory of God; he acknowledged it to be so heinous, and horrible, that had he a thousand lives, and could he die Ten thousand deaths, he could not make satisfaction: Notwithstanding (said he) Lord, thou hast left me this comfort in thy word, that thou hast said, Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy laden, and I will refresh you: Lord, I am weary, Lord, I am heavyladen with my sins, which are innumerable, I am ready to sink, Lord, even into hell, unless thou in thy mercy put to thine hand and deliver me: Lord, thou hast promised by thine own word out of thy own mouth, that thou wilt refresh the weary soul: And with that he thrust out one of his hands, and reaching as high as he could towards Heaven, with a louder voice and a streined, he cried, I challenge thee, Lord, by that word, and by that promise which thou hast made, that thou perform and make it good to me, that call for ease and mercy at thy hands, &c.

Proportionably, when heavy-heartedness for sin hath so dried up the bones, and the angry countenance of God so parched the heart, that the poor soul begins now to gasp for grace, as the thirsty Land for drops of rain; then the poor sinner (though dust and ashes) with an holy humility thus speaks unto Christ, O merciful Lord God, Thou art Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end; Thou sayest it is done, of things that are yet to come, so faithful and true are thy Decrees and Promises; That thou hast promised by thine own word out of thy own mouth, that unto him that is a thirst, thou wilt give him of the fountain of the water of life freely. O Lord, I thirst, I faint, I languish, I long for one drop of mercy: As the Hart panteth for the water-brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God, and after the yearning bowels of thy wonted compassions: Had I now in possession the glory, the wealth, and pleasures of the whole world; nay, had I Ten thousand lives, joyfully would I lay them all down and part with them, to have this poor trembling soul of mine received into the bleeding arms of my blessed Redeemer. O Lord, my spirit within me is melted into tears of blood, my heart is shivered into pieces; out of the very place of Dragons and shadow of death, do I lift up my thoughts heavy and sad before thee, the remembrance of my former vanities and pollutions, is a very vomit to my soul, and it is sorely wounded with the grievous representation thereof: The very flames of Hell, Lord, the fury of thy just wrath, the scorplings of my own conscience, have so wasted and parched mine heart, that my thirst is insatiable, my bowels are hot within me, my desire after Jesus Christ, pardon and grace, is greedy as the grave; the coals thereof are coals of fire, which hath a most vehement flame: And, Lord, in thy blessed Book thou callest and criest, Ho, everyone that thirsteth, come ye to the waters. In that great day of the feast, thou stoodest and cried'st with thine own mouth, If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink; and these are thine own words, Those who hunger and thirst after righteousness shall be filled. I challenge thee, Lord, in this my extremist thirst after thine own blessed self, and spiritual life in thee, by that Word, and by that Promise which thou hast made, that thou perform, and make it good to me, that lie grovelling in the dust, and trembling at thy feet: Oh! open now that promised well of life, for I must drink, or else I die.

The means to obtain this desire, are these three:

1. Be acquainted thoroughly with thine own necessities and wants, with that nothingness and emptiness that is in thyself; a groundless presumption makes a man careless; see into thine own necessities, confess the want of this desire after the Lord Jesus Christ.
2. Labor to spread forth the excellency of all the beauty and surpassing glory, that is in the Promises of God: Couldst thou but view them in their proper colors, they would even ravish thee, and quicken thy desires.
3. After all this, know it is not in thy power to bring thy heart to desire Christ, thou canst not hammer out a desire upon thine own Anvil, dig thy own pit, and hew thy own rock as long as thou wilt; nay, let all the Angels in Heaven, and all the Ministers on Earth provoke thee, yet if the hand of the Lord be wanting, thou shalt not lift up thine heart, nor step one step towards Heaven; then go to him who is able to work this desire in thy soul. It is the complaint of a Christian, O they are troubled, because they cannot fetch a good desire from their own souls, and one falls, another sinks, a third shakes, and they are overwhelmed with discouragement: What a wretched heart have I? (faith one) I grace? No, no, the world I can desire, the life of my child I long for, and I say with (Rachel) Let me have honor or else I die: but I cannot long for the unconceivable riches of the Lord Jesus Christ; and will the Lord show any mercy upon me? Is it thus? remember now, desires grow not in thy garden, they spring not from the root of thy abilities: O seek unto God, and confess, In truth Lord, it is thou from whom come all our desires, it is thou must work them in us as thou hast promised them to us; and therefore, Lord, quicken thou this soul, and enlarge this heart of mine, for thou only art the God of this desire. Thus hale down a desire from the Lord, and from the Promise, for there only must thou have it: The smoking flax God will not quench: flax will not smoke, but a spark must come into it, and that will make it catch fire and smoke; thus lay your hearts before the Lord, and say, Good Lord, here is only flax, here is only a stubborn heart, but strike thou by thy Promise one spark from heaven, that I may have a smoking desire after Christ, and after grace.

SECT. 5. A Love of Christ.

WE have run through two affections, Hope & Desire, and the next is Love: A possible good stirs up Hope, a necessary excellency in that good, settleth Desire, and a relish in that good settled, kindles Love. Thus is the order of God's work: If the good be absent, the understanding saith, It is to be desired, O that I had it! then it sends out Hope, and that waits for that good, and stays till it can see it; and yet if that good cannot come, then Desire hath another proper work, and it goes up and down wandering, and seeketh and sueth for Christ Jesus. After this, if the Lord Jesus be pleased to come himself into the view of the heart, which longeth thus after him, then Love leads him into the soul, and tells the Will of him, saying, Lo here is Jesus Christ the Messiah, that hath ordered these great things for his Saints and people.

The Motive or ground of this Love, is God's Spirit in the Promise, letting in some intimation of God's love into the soul; thus Psal. 42. 8. The Lord will command his loving kindness in the day time: This is a phrase taken from Kings and Princes, and great Commanders in the field, whose words of Command stand for Laws; so the Lord sends out his loving kindness, and saith, Go out, my everlasting love and kindness, take a Commission from me, and to go that humble, thirsty and hunger-bitten sinner, and go and prosper, and prevail, and settle my love effectually upon him, and fasten my mercy upon him; I command my loving kindness to do it. Thus the Lord doth put a Commission into the hands of his loving kindness, that it shall do good to the poor soul, yea though it withdraw itself, saying, What, I mercy? will Christ Jesus accept of me? No, no; there is no hope of mercy for me: indeed if I could pray thus, hear thus, and perform Duties with that enlargement, and had those parts and abilities, then there were some comfort, but now there is no hope of mercy for me. We demand, Is this your case? is it thus and thus? are you thus humbled? and have you thus longed for the riches of his Mercy in Christ? Lo then, the Lord hath put a Commission into the hands of his loving kindness, saying, Go to that poor soul, and break open the doors upon that weary weltering heart, and break off all those bolts, and rend off that veil of ignorance and carnal Reason, and all those Arguments: Go (I say) to that soul, and cheer it, and warm it, and tell it from me, That his sins are pardoned, and his soul shall be saved, and his sighs and prayers are heard in heaven; and I charge you do the work before you come again.

Here is the ground of Love, God's love affecting the heart and settled upon it, it breeds a love to God again; We love him, because he loved us first: The burning-glass must receive heat of the beams of the Sun, before it burn anything; so there must be a beam of God's love to fall upon the soul, before it can love God again: I drew them with the cords of a man, even with the bands of love; God lets in the cords of love into the soul, and that draws love again to God: He brought me into the banqueting-house, and his banner over me was love; stay me with flagons, comfort me with apples, for I am sick of love. When the banner of Christ's love is spread over the soul, the soul comes to be sick in love with Christ.

Now this love of God doth beget our love in three particulars:

First, there is a sweetness and a relish which God's love lets into the soul, and warms the heart with; you shall see how the fire is kindled by and by: As when a man is fainting, we give him Aqua-vitae; so a fainting sinner is cold at the heart, and therefore the Lord lets in a drop of his loving kindness, and this warms the heart, and the soul is even filled with the happiness of the mercy of God; Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth (saith the Spouse in the Canticles) for his love is better than wine: The kisses of his mouth, are the comforts of his Word and Spirit; the soul saith, O let the Lord refresh me with the kisses of his mouth, let the Lord speak comfort to my heart, and this is better than wine.

Secondly, as that sweetness warms the heart, so the freeness of the love of God let in and intimated, begins even to kindle this love in the soul, that it sparkles again: God setteth out his love towards us, seeing that while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us. This commends the love of God, the Lord sends to poor and miserable, sinful broken-hearted sinners, and saith, Commend my mercy to such a one, and tell him, That though he hath been an enemy to me, yet I am a friend to him, and though he hath been rebellious against me, yet I am a God and Father to him: When the poor sinner considers this with himself, he saith, Is the Lord so merciful to me? I that loved my sins, and continued in them, had it not been just that I should have perished in them? but will the Lord not only spare his enemy, but give his Son for him? O let my soul forever rejoice in this inconceivable goodness of God! Be thy heart never so hard, if it have but the sense of this, it cannot but stir thee to Humiliation.

Thirdly, the greatness of the freeness of this mercy of God, being settled upon the heart, enflames it, the sweetness warms the heart, this freeness kindles the fire, and when the greatness of the sweetness comes to be valued, this sets the heart all on a flame; the Apostle desires, that the Ephesians being rooted and grounded in love, might be able to comprehend with all Saints, what is the breadth and height of the love of God in Christ; as if he had said, The unmeasureableness of God's mercy will blow up the soul, and enflame the heart with admirable love of God again, and will make the soul say, What, I that have done all that I could against this good God? O it breaks my heart to think of it! there was no Name under heaven that I did blaspheme and tear in pieces, more than this Name; no Command under heaven I so much despised, as the Command of God and of Christ; no Spirit that I grieved, so much as the good Spirit of God; and therefore had the Lord only given me a look, or spoken a word to me, it had been an infinite Mercy, but to send a Son to save me, it is incomparable: I could not conceive to do so much evil against him, as he hath done good to me: O the breadth of that Mercy beyond all limits! O the length of that Mercy beyond all time! O the depth of that Mercy below a man's misery! O the height of that Mercy above the height of my understanding! If my hands were all love, that I could work nothing but love, & if mine eyes were able to see nothing but love, and my mind to think of nothing but love, and if I had a thousand bodies, they were all too little to love that God that hath thus unmeasureably loved me a poor sinful Hell-hound: I will love the Lord dearly (saith David) O Lord my strength. Have I gotten the Lord Jesus to be my comfort, my buckler and my shield? if I have any good, he begins it; if I have any comfort, he blesseth it: Therefore I will love thee dearly, O Lord my strength, O how should I but love thee!

Me thinks there is a poor sincere soul that saith, My understanding are not so deep as others, my tongue runs not so glib assuch and such; I cannot talk so freely of the things of grace and salvation, I have meaner parts, and cannot enlarge myself in holy Duties and holy Services; I cannot dispute for a Savior, or perform such Duties as others can do: yet, sweet soul, canst thou love Christ Jesus, and rejoice in him? O yes! I bless the Name of the Lord, that all I have, all my friends, and parts, and means, and abilities, are but as dung and dross in comparison of Christ Jesus; it were the comfort of my soul, if I might be ever with him. Say you so? Go thy way, and the God of heaven go with thee: This is a work of God that will never leave thee, it is a badge and proper livery that the Lord Jesus gives only to his Saints; never a mere Professor under heaven ever wore it, never any Hypocrite under heaven to whom God did intend it, but only to those whom he hath effectually called, and whom he will save; therefore though thou wantest all, thou hast this to comfort thee in the want of all; and thou mayest say, I can say little for Christ, my tongue falters, and my memory is weak, yet the Lord knows I love the Lord Jesus. This is enough, David desired no more, but what God was wont to do to his children that loved his name, Do to me (saith the text) as thou usest to dounto those that love thy name; I know thou lovest them that love thee, and wilt save and glorify them in the end, I desire no more but this, do as thou usest to do to those that love thy name. And doth David, a King, desire no more? sure then if thou (poor soul) hast so much as he had, it is enough, be quiet with thy childe's part, Thy lot is fallen into a marvelous fair ground.

Some may say, this is all the difficult, How may I know whether my love be a true love, or a false love? How may I know, that my love is of the right stamp.

Let every man put his love upon the trial, and examine thus, Whether doest thou welcome Christ and grace, according to the worth of them? if thou doest, it will appear in these particulars: 1. Observe the root and rise from whence thy love came, canst thou say, I love the Lord, because he hath loved me? then thy love is of the right mettle, and know it forever, that that God which cannot but love himself, he cannot but like that love which came from himself: is thy soul affected and enlarged in love to the Lord, because thou hast felt and retained the relish and sweetness of his grace? canst thou say, The Lord hath let in a glimpse of his favor? and the Lord hath said in his truth, he looks to him that trembles at his word, the Minister said it, and the Spirit saith it, that my mercy is registered in heaven: Oh how should I love the Lord! my sins are many, which I have bewailed, my sighs and sobs I have put up to heaven, and at the last the Lord hath given me a gracious answer: Oh how should I love the Lord my strength dearly? If it be thus with thee, thy love is sound, and will never fail.

2. If thou entertain thy Savior, as it beseems him, thou must entertain him as a King, and that is thus; give up all to him, and entertain none with him upon terms of honor, but such as retain to him, or be attendants upon him; love all in Christ, and for Christ, but express thy love and joy to Christ above all: He is as a King, and all the rest are but as retainers; he that loves anything equal with a Christ, it is certain he did never love Christ; to set up anything cheek by jole with Christ, it is all one as if a man did put a slave into the same Chamber with the King, which is upon the point to drive him away.

3. The soul that rightly entertains Christ, and studies wholly to give him contentment, he is marvelous wary and watchful, that he may not sad that good Spirit of God to grieve him, and cause him to go away as displeased: See this Cant. 3. 4, 5. the Spouse sought long for her beloved, and at last brought him home, and when she had welcomed him, she gives a charge to all the house, not to stir nor awaken her love, till he please. When a Prince comes unto the house of a great man, what charge is there given to make no noise in the night, lest such and such a man be awakened before his time? the soul when it hath received the Spirit of the Lord Jesus Christ, doth thus; he gives a peremptory charge to keep watch and ward, and gives a charge to hope, and desire, and love, and joy, and the mind, and all, not to grieve and molest the good Spirit of God, Let there be no motion but to entertain it, no advise but to receive it, and do nothing that may work the least kind of dislike unto it.

4. He that truly entertains Christ, rejoiceth in the good and glory of Christ: When Mephibosheth had been wrongfully accused to David, and when David who had taken away all the inheritance from him, was returned in safety; Then said David to comfort him, Thou and Ziba divide the land: nay, said Mephibosheth, Let him take all, forasmuch as my Lord the King is come again in peace, it matters not for inheritance, and for myself and my life, I pass not, since the King is returned in peace; it is enough that I enjoy thy presence, which is better to me then goods, life or liberty: So it is with a kind loving heart, which cannot endure to see Christ's honor and glory laid in the dust, but if his praise be advanced, then is he glad, Lord, I have enough (saith the soul) that Christ is mine, and that his honor and glory is magnified, whatsoever becomes of me it matters not; let the world take all, if I may have Christ, and see him praised and magnified: Let this try any man's spirit under heaven, and labor to bring the soul to this pitch: A Minister in his place, and a Master in his place, and every Christian in his place; let it be our care to honor God, not ourselves; and let it be our comfort, if God may be better honored by others, then by ourselves: This is our baseness of spirit, we can be content to lift up Christ upon our shoulders, that we may lift up ourselves by it; but we should be content to lie in the dust, that the Lord may be praised; and if any of God's people thrive and prosper more then thou, let that be thy joy.

5. He that welcomes Christ truly, covets a nearer union with Christ: Love is of a linking and gluing nature, and will carry the soul with some kind of strength and earnestness, to enjoy full possession and fellowship of the thing that is loved; it cannot have enough of it: Nothing (saith the soul) but Christ, still I desire more of that mercy, and holiness, and grace, and love in Christ Jesus: As it is with parties that have lived long together in one house, and their affections are linked together in way of marriage, they will ever desire to be talking together, and to be drawing on the marriage; so the soul that loves Christ Jesus, and hath his holy affection kindled, and his spirit enlarged therein; when the Lord hath let in some glimpse of his love, he thinks the hour sweet when he prayed to the Lord Christ, he thinks the Lord's-day sweet, wherein God revealed, by the power of his holy Ordinances, any of that rich grace and mercy of his: it is admirable to see how the heart will be delighted to recover the time and place, and means, when and where the Lord did reveal it; Oh this is good (saith the soul) Oh that I might ever be thus cleared and refreshed! Or as the spouse contracted, thinks every day a year, till she enjoy her beloved, and take satisfaction to her soul in him: So the soul that hath been truly humbled, and enlightened, and is now contracted to Christ Jesus, Oh when will that day be (saith it) that I shall ever be with my Jesus! he takes hold of every word he hears, every promise that reveals anything of Christ, But oh! when will that day be, that I shall ever be with Christ, and be full of his fullness forever?

And now let me prevail with your hearts, and work your souls to this duty, Love the Lord, all ye his Saints; whom will you love, if you love not him? Oh you poor ones, love you the Lord, for you have need; and all you rich ones, love you the Lord, for you have cause; and you little ones too (if there be any such in the Congregation) he knocks at every man's heart, and persuades every man's soul, Love ye the Lord.

The means are these, 1. Labor to give attendance daily to the promise of grace, and Christ; drive away all other suitors from the soul, and let nothing come between the promise and it; forbid all other bands, that is, let the promise confer daily with thy heart, and be expressing and telling of that good that is in Christ, to thy own soul. If all things be agreed between parties to be married, and there wants nothing but mutual affection; the only way to fix their affections upon one another, is to keep company together, so as they meet wisely and holily: So let the soul daily keep company with the promise, and this is the first way.

2. Labor to be thoroughly acquainted with the beauty and sweetness of Christ in the promise: Now there are three things in the promise we must eye and apprehend, that our hearts may be kindled with love in the Lord: 1. The worth of the party in himself, Christ is worthy of it. 2. The desert of the party, in regard Christ deserves it. 3. The readiness of the party in himself to seek our good, Christ seeks it.

1. Christ is worthy in himself: if we had a thousand hearts to bestow upon him, we were never able to love him sufficiently; as Nehemiah said, The name of the Lord is above all praise; will you let out your love and affections? you may lay them out here with good advantage: what would you love? wouldst thou have beauty? then thy Savior is beautiful, Thou art fairer than the children of men, Psal. 45. 2. Wouldst thou have strength? then is thy Savior strong, Gird thy sword upon thy thigh, O mostmighty, Psal. 45. 3. Wouldst thou have riches? thy Savior is more rich (if it be possible) than he is strong, He is heir of all things, Heb. 1. 2. Wouldst thou have wisdom? then thy Savior is wise, yea wisdom itself, In him are hid all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge, Col. 2. 3. Wouldst thou have life eternal? Christ is the Author of life and happiness to all that have him; and he hath not only these in himself, but he will infeof thee in them, if thou wilt but match with him.

2. Christ deserves our love, in regard of benefits to us; be man never so worthy in himself, yet if he have wronged, or expressed the part of an Enemy, a woman saith, I will not have him though he had all the world, this takes off the affections; it is not so with the Lord Jesus: as he is worthy of all love in himself, so he hath dealt mercifully and graciously with you: In your sickness, who helped you? in wants, who supplied you? in anguish of heart, who relieved you? it was Jesus Christ: Oh therefore love him, deal equally with him, and as he deserves, so enlarge your hearts to him forever.

3. Christ seeks our love: Here is the admiration of mercy, That our Savior, who hath been rejected by a company of sinful creatures, should seek their love: for shame refuse him not, but let him have love ere he go: Had the Lord received us, when we had come to him, and humbled our hearts before him; Had he heard, when we had spent our days, and all our strength in begging and craving, it had been an infinite mercy: But when the Lord Jesus Christ shall seek to us by his Messengers (it is all the work we have to do, to woo you, and speak a good word for the Lord Jesus Christ; yea, and if we speak for ourselves, it is pity but our tongue should cleave to the roof of our mouth) when the Lord Jesus shall come and wait upon us, and seek our love, O this is the wonder of mercies! think of this, O ye Saints! The Lord now by us offers love to all you that are weary and have need, What answer shall I return to him in the evening? shall I say, Lord, I have tendered thy mercy, and it was refused: Brethren, it would grieve my heart to return this answer: O rather let every soul of you say, Can the Lord Jesus love me? In truth, Lord, I am out of love with myself, I have abused thy Majesty, I have loved the world, I have followed base lusts, and can the Lord Jesus love such a wretch as I am? yet saith the Lord, I will heal their backslidings, I will love them freely. He looks for no portion, he will take thee and all thy wants; get you home then, and everyone in secret, labor to deal truly with your own hearts; make up a match in this manner, and say, Is it possible that the Lord should look so low? that a great Prince should send to a poor Peasant, that Majesty should stoop to means? Heaven to Earth, God to man? Hath the Lord offered mercy to me? and doth he require nothing of me but to love him again? call upon your hearts, I charge you, and say thus, Lord, if all the light of mine eyes were love, and all the speeches of my tongue were love, it were all too little to love thee: O let me love thee dearly! If you will not say thus, then say hereafter, You had a fair offer, and that a poor Minister of God did wish you well. Alas, be not coy and squemish, the Lord may have better then you; lie down therefore, and admire at the mercy of the Lord, that should take a company of dead dogs, and now at the last, say as the Prophet did, Lift up your heads, O ye gates and be ye lift up ye everlasting doors, and the King of Glory shall come in.

SECT. 6. A relying on Christ.

WE are now come to the work of the Will, which is the great wheel and Commander of the soul. The former affections were but as hand-maids to usher in Christ and the Promises; the mind saith, I have seen Christ: Hope saith, I have waited: Desire saith, I have longed: Love saith, I am kindled: then saith the Will, I will have Christ, it shall be so: and this makes up the match, the spawn and seeds of faith went before, now faith is come to some perfection, now the soul repositeth itself upon the Lord Jesus.

And this reposing or resting itself, discovers a fivefold act:

First, it implies A going out of the soul to Christ: When the soul seeth this, that the Lord Jesus is his aid, and must ease him and pardon his sins, then let us go to that Christ, saith he, it is the Lord's call, Come to me all ye that are weary: now this voice coming home to the heart, and the prevailing sweetness of the call over-powering the heart, the soul goes out, and falls, and flings itself upon the riches of God's grace.

Secondly, It lays fast hold upon Christ: when the Lord saith, Come my Love, my Dove, O come away! Behold, I come (saith she) and when she is come, she fasteneth upon Christ, saying, My beloved is mine, and I am his: Faith lays hold on the Lord, and will not let Mercy go, but cleaves unto it, though it conflict with the Lord; Should he slay me (saith Job) yet will I trust in him: The case is like Benhadad's, who being overcome by Ahab, his Servants thus advise him: We have heard that the Kings of Israel are merciful Kings, we pray thee let us put ropes about our necks, and sackcloth on our loins, and go out to the King, peradventure he will save thy life: Thus the Servants go, and coming to Ahab, they deliver the Message; Thy Servant Benhadad saith, I pray thee let me live: and he said, Is he yet alive? he is my brother: Now the men diligently observed whether anything would come from him, and did hastily catch at it, and they said, Thy brother Benhadad, and they went away rejoicing: This is the lively Picture of a broken-hearted sinner, after he hath taken up arms against the Almighty, and that the Lord hath let in Justice, and he seeth (or hath seen) the anger of God bent against him; then the soul reasons thus, I have heard, though I am a rebellious sinner, that none but sinners are pardoned, and God is a gracious God, and therefore unto him let me go: with this he falls down at the footstool of the Lord, and cries, O what shall I do! what shall I say unto thee? O thou preserver of men! O let me live, I pray thee, in the sight of my Lord! The soul thus humbled, the Lord then lets in his sweet voice of mercy, and saith, Thou art my Son, my Love, and thy sins are pardoned: These words no sooner uttered, but he catcheth thereat, saying, Mercy Lord? and a Son Lord? and love Lord? and a pardon Lord? The heart holds itself here, and will never away.

Thirdly, it flings the weight of all its occasions and troubles (guilt and corruptions) upon the Lord Jesus Christ: He that walks in darkness, and hath no light, let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God; that is, if a man be in extremity, hopeless in misery, and walks in desperate discouragements, yea and hath no light of comfort, Let him trust in the name of the Lord, and stay upon his God: As when a man cannot go of himself, he lays all the weight of his body upon another, so the soul goes to a Christ, and lays all the weight of itself upon Christ, and saith, I have no comfort, O Lord, all my discomforts I lay upon Christ, and I rely upon the Lord for comfort and consolation: Who is this, saith Solomon, that cometh up from the wilderness, leaning upon her beloved, Cant. 8. 5. The party coming is the Church, the wilderness is the troubles and vexations the Church meets withal, and the beloved is the Lord Jesus Christ; now the Church leans herself all upon her Husband, she walked along with him, but he bare all the burden: Cast all your care upon him (saith Peter) for he careth for you, 1 Pet. 5. 7. the Original is, Hurl your care upon the Lord: The Lord will not thank you for carrying your cares and troubles about you, he requires that you Hurl them upon him, for he careth for you.

Fourthly, it draws virtue, and derives power from the Lord Jesus Christ for succor and supplies, and here is the especial life of Faith, it goes for mercy, and grace, and comfort in Christ, he knows 'tis to be had from him, and therefore he fetcheth all from him; With joy shall ye draw water out of the wells of salvation, Isa. 12. 3. The fountain of Salvation is Christ, and all the waters of life, of grace and mercy, are in Christ Jesus: Now it is not enough to let down the bucket into the well, but it must be drawn out also; it is not enough to come to Christ, but we must draw the water of grace from Christ to ourselves; They shall suck and be satisfied (saith Isaiah) with the breasts of her consolations, that they may milk out, and be delighted with the abundance of her glory: The Church is compared to a child, and the breasts are the Promises of the Gospel; now the Elect must suck out, and be satisfied with it; the word in the Original is, Exact upon the Promise, and oppress the Promise: as the Oppressor grinds the face of a poor man, so with an holy kind of oppression, you should exact from the Promise, and get what good you may from it.

Fifthly, Faith leaves the soul with the Promise; yea, notwithstanding all delays, denials, discouragements from God, faith brings on the heart still, it will be sure to lie at the gate, and keep the soul with the promise, whatever befalls it. Excellent is that passage, Gen. 32. 26. when the Lord and Jacob were wrestling, Let me go, saith the Lord, I will leave thee to thyself, I care not what becomes of thee; No, I will not let thee go, until thou hast blessed me, saith Jacob: So the faithful soul lays hold upon the Lord for Mercy, Pardon, Power and Grace, and though the Lord seem to give him up to the torment of Sin and Corruption, yet the soul saith, Though my soul go down to hell, I will hold here for Mercy, till the Lord comfort and pardon, and subdue graciously these cursed corruptions, which I am not able to master myself. As it is with a Sun-dial, the needle is ever moving, and a man may jog it this way and that way, yet it will never stand still, till it come to the North-point: So when the Lord leaves off a believing heart with frowns, and with the expression of displeasure, and the soul turns to the Lord Christ, and will never leave till it go Godward, and Christ-ward, and Graceward, and saith, Let the Lord do what he please, I will go no further, till he be pleased to show Mercy. Thus the soul once come to Christ, it will never away, but ever cleaves to the Promise, and is towards God and Christ, whatsoever befalls it.

But (poor soul) art thou yet shut up in Unbelief? do then as the Prisoners in New-gate, what lamentable cries do they utter to every Passenger by? So do thou, look out from the gates of Hell, and from under the bars of Infidelity, and cry, that God would look on thee in mercy, and say, Spare, Lord, a poor unbelieving wretch, locked up under the bars of Unbelief, good Lord succor, and deliver in thy due time. David could say, Let the sighing of prisoners come up before thee; that indeed was meant of bodily imprisonment, yet the argument prevails much in regard of the Spiritual: Good Lord, let the sighing of prisoners come up before thee; let the sighing of poor distrustful souls come up before thy Majesty: O send help from heaven, and deliver the soul of thy servant from these wretched distempers of heart. Is there no cause thus to pray? He that believeth not (saith our Savior) is condemned already: He is cast in heaven and earth, by the Law and Gospel, there is no relief for him abiding in this condition; lay this under thy pillow, and say, How can I sleep, and be a condemned man? What if God should take away my life this night? Alas! I never knew what it was to be enlightened, or wounded for sin; I can commit sin, and play with sin, but I never knew what it was to be wounded for sin; I never knew what it was to be zealous in a good cause; O I confess I have no faith at all! Beloved! would you yield this, then were there some hopes that you might get out of this condition and state, to have a sense of its want, to go to the Lord by prayer, and to ask hearty counsel of some faithful Minister, are the first steps to obtain it. And to help a poor wretch in this case, O you that are gracious, go your ways home, and pray for him: Brethren, let us leave preaching and hearing, and all of us fall to praying and mourning: In truth, I condemn my own soul, because I have not an heart to mourn for him; we reprove his sin, and condemn him of his sin; and we must do so: but where are the heart-blood petitions that we put up for such a one? Where are the tears that we make for the slain of our people? You tender-hearted Mothers and you tender-hearted Wives, if your children or husbands be in this woeful case. O mourn for them, let your hearts break over them, and say, O woe is me for my children, O woe is me for that poor husband of mine!

Or secondly, hast thou gotten faith? then labor to husband this grace well, and to improve it for thy best good. It is a marvelous shame, to see those that are born to fair means (I mean the poor Saints of God) that have a Right and Title to Grace and Christ, and yet to live at such an under-rate: I would have you to live above the world, for the Lord doth not grudge his people of comfort, but would have them live cheerfully, and have strong consolations, and mighty assurance of God's love: Is there not cause? why, faith (if it be right) will make the life of a Christian most easy, most comfortable. Unfaithful souls sink in their sorrows upon every occasion; but faith gives ease to a man in all his conversation: 1. Because faith hath a skill, and a kind of flight to put over all cares to another: We take up the Cross, but faith hurls all the care on Christ; an easy matter it is to lie under the burden, when another bears all the weight of it. Look how it is with two Ferry-men, the one hales his Boat about the shore, and cannot get off, but tugs and pulls, and never puts her forth to the Tide; the other puts his Boat upon the stream, and sets up his sail, and then he may sit still in his Boat, and the wind will carry him whither he is to go: Just thus it is with a faithful soul, and an unbeliever; all the care of the faithful soul, is to put himself upon the stream of God's Providence, and to set up the sail of Faith, and to take the gale of God's Mercy and Providence, and so he goes on cheerfully, because it is not he that carries him, but the Lord Jesus Christ: whereas every unfaithful soul tugs and pulls at the business, and can find neither ease nor success; Alas! he thinks by his own wits and power to do what he would. 2. Because faith sweetens all other afflictions, even those that are most hard and full of tediousness; and howsoever it apprehends all troubles and afflictions, yet withal it apprehends the faithfulness of God, ordering all for our good: and that's the reason why all our troubles are digested comfortably, without any harshness at all: When the Patient takes better Pills, if they be well sugered they go down the easier, and the bitterness never troubles him: So it is with Faith, it takes away the harshness of all inconveniencies, which are bitter Pills in themselves, but they are sweetened and sugered over by the faithfulness of God, for the good of the soul; and therefore it goes on cheerfully.

You will say, if faith bring such ease, how may a man that hath faith, improve it to have such comfort by it? I answer, the rules are four:

1. Labor to gain some evidence to thy own soul, that thou hast a title to the promise: The reason why poor Christians go drooping, and are overwhelmed with their sins and miseries, is because they see not their title to mercy, nor their evidence of God's love, To the word, and to the Testimonies: Take one evidence from the word, 'tis as good as a thousand, if thou hast but one promise for thee, thou hast all in truth, though all be not so fully and clearly perceived.

2. Labor to set an high price on the promises of God: One promise, and the sweetness of God's mercy in Christ, is better then all the honors or riches in the world; Prize these at this rate, and thou canst not choose but find ease, and be contented therewith.

3. Labor to keep thy promises ever at hand: what is it to me if I have a thing in the house, if I have it not at my need? If a man ready to sound and die, say, I have as good cordial water as any in the world, but I know not where it is; he may sound and die before he can find it: So when misery comes, and thy heart is surcharged, O then some promise, some comfort to bear up a poor fainting, drooping soul, my troubles are many, and I cannot bear them: Why, now Christ and a promise would have done it; but thou hast thrown them in a corner, and they are not to be found: Now for the Lord's sake let me entreat thee be wise, for thy poor soul; there is many a fainting and aguish fit and qualm comes over the heart of many a poor Christian; persecutions without, and sorrows and corruptions within, therefore keep thy cordials about thee, and be sure that thou hast them within reach, take one, and bring another, and be refreshed by another, and go singing to thy grave, and to heaven forever.

4. Labor to drink in hearty draught of the promise; bestow thyself upon the promise every hour, whensoever thou dost find the fit: coming; and this is the way to find comfort, Eat Ofriends, and drink ye abundantly O well-beloved: The Original is, in drinking drink; ye cannot be drunken with the Spirit, as you may with wine, drink abundantly, were dainties prepared: If an hunger-starved man comes in, and takes only a bit and away, he must needs go away an hungered: Think of it sadly, you faithful Saints of God; you may come now and then, and take a snatch of the promise, and then comes fear, and temptation, and persecution, and all quiet is gone again, it is your own fault brethren, you come thirsty, and go away thirsty, you come discomforted, and so you go away. Many times it thus befalls us Ministers; when we preach of consolation, and when we pray, and confer▪ we think we are beyond all trouble; but by and by we are full of fears, and troubles, and sorrows, because we take not full contentment in the promise, we drink not a deep draught of it: of this take heed too; 1. Of Cavilling and Quarelling with carnal reason. 2. Of attending to the parlies of Satan's temptations; if we listen to this chat, he will make us forget all our comfort.

CHAP. VII. The growing of the soul with Christ.

Hitherto of the first part of the souls implantation; to wit, of the putting of the soul into Christ: We are now come to the second, which is, The growing of the soul with Christ. These two take up the nature of ingrafting a sinner into the stock Christ Jesus. Now this growing together is accomplished by two means:

- 1.

By an union of the soul with Christ.

- 2.

By a conveyance of sap or sweetness (all the treasures of grace and happiness) that is in Christ to the soul.

First, Every believer is joined unto Christ, and so joined or knit, that he becomes one spirit. 1. He is joined; as a friend to a friend; as a father to a child; as an husband to a wife; as a graft to a tree; as the soul to a body: So is Christ to a believer, I live, not I, but the Lord Jesus liveth in me: Hence the body of the faithful is called Christ, 1 Cor. 12. 12. 2. So joined, that the believer comes to be one spirit with Christ; this mystery is great, and beyond the reach of that little light I enjoy: Only I shall communicate what I conceive, in these three following Conclusions: 1. That the Spirit of God (the third person in the Trinity) doth really accompany the whole Word, but more especially the precious promises of the Gospel: 2. The Spirit (accompanying the promise of grace and salvation) it doth therein, and thereby leave a supernatural dint and power, a spiritual, and over-powering virtue upon the soul, and thereby carries it, and brings it unto Christ: it is not so much anything in the soul, as a spiritual assisting, and moving, and working upon the soul, by virtue whereof it is moved and carried to the Lord Jesus Christ. 3. The Spirit of grace in the promise working thus upon the heart, it causeth the heart to close with the promise, and with itself in the promise; and this is to be one spirit. As it is with the Moon (the Philosopher observes, That the ebbing and flowing of the Sea, is by virtue of the Moon) she flings her beams into the sea, and not being able to exhale as the Sun doth, she leaves them there, and goes away, and that draws them, and when they grow wet, they return back again; Now the sea ebbs and flows, not from any principle in itself, but by virtue of the Moon: so the heart of a poor creature is like the water, unable to move towards heaven, but the Spirit of the Lord doth bring in its beams, and leaves a supernatural virtue by them upon the soul, and thereby draws it to itself.

Hence an Use of Instruction: This may show us that the sins of the faithful, are grievous to the blessed Spirit; not only because of mercies, bonds and engagements which the believer hath received; but because a man is come so near to Christ and the Spirit, to be one Spirit with Christ: Should a wife not only entertain a whoremonger into the house, but also lodge him in the same bed with her husband, this were not to be endured; and wilt thou receive a company of base lusts, and that in the very face and sight of the Lord Jesus Christ? What? lodge an unclean spirit, with the clean Spirit of the Lord! the holy Ghost cannot endure this: Let no filthy communication come out of your mouth, Ephes. 4. 29. What if there do? (you may say) what? a Christian and a Lyar? a Christian and a Swearer? O grieve not the holy Spirit of God, because by it you are sealed unto the day of Redemption: The good Spirit of the Lord hath sealed you unto Redemption, and knit you unto himself, and will you rend yourselves from him and grieve him? O grieve not the holy Spirit!

2. For Examination; If thy heart be therefore estranged from such as walk exactly before God, because they are humble and faithful; it is an ill sign; when they are made one spirit with Christ, wilt thou be of two spirits with them? I confess a godly heart will have his fits and excursions now and then, but all this while this is poison, and the soul of a godly man sees this and is weary of it, and is marvelously burdened with it, and saith, O vile wretch that I am, what would I have! and what is he, that I cannot love him? Is it because the good Spirit of the Lord is there? shall I resist the good spirit of the Lord? and so commit the sin against the holy Ghost? away thou vile wretched heart, I will love him: Thus the soul labors and strives for that exactness, and would fain have that goodness which he sees in another.

Secondly, as there is an Union with Christ, so there is a conveyance of all spiritual grace from Christ, to all those that believe in him: If you would know the Tenure of this Covenant, and how Christ conveyeth these spiritual graces unto us, it discovers itself in these Particulars: 1. There is fully enough in the Lord Jesus Christ for every faithful soul. 2. As there is enough in Christ, so Christ doth supply or communicate whatsoever is most fit. 3. As the Lord doth communicate what is fit, so he doth preserve what he doth bestow and communicate. 4. As the Lord doth preserve what he communicates, so he quickens the grace that he now doth preserve. 5. As the Lord quickens what he preserves, so he never leaves till he perfects what he quickens. 6. As the Lord perfects what he quickens, so in the end he crowns all the grace he hath perfected: And now may I read your Feoffment to you, You poor Saints of God, you live beggarly and basely here: Oh! if you have a Savior you are made forever; it is that which will maintain you, not only Christianly, but Triumphantly; what you want, Christ hath, and what is fit, Christ will bestow; if you cannot keep it, he will preserve it for you; if you be sluggish, he will quicken it in you; what would you have more? he will perfect what he quickens; and lastly, he will crown that he perfects, he will give you an immortal Crown of Glory forever and ever.

Hence we see whether the Saints of God should go to fetch succor and supply of whatsoever grace they want, yea increase and perfection of what they have already; Christ is made all in all to his Servants; why then, away to the Lord Jesus; he calls and invites, I counsel thee to buy of me eye-salve; if thou be an accursed man, buy of Christ Justification; if thou be a polluted creature, buy of Christ Sanctification: With thee is the well-spring of life (saith David) and in thy light we shall only see light: it is not with us, but with thee; it is not in our heads, or hearts, or performances, 'tis only in Christ to be found, only from Christ to be fetched: I deny not but we should improve all means, and use all helps, but in the use of all, seek only to a Christ, with him is the well of life; away to Christ, wisdom, righteousness, &c. all is in him, and there we must have them.

You will say, What are the means to obtain these graces from Christ? I answer: First, eye the Promise daily, and keep it within view. Secondly, yield thyself, and give way to the stroke of the Promise, and to the power of the Spirit; for instance, Imagine thy heart begins to be pestered with vain thoughts, or with a proud haughty spirit, or some base lusts and privy haunts of heart, how would you be rid of these? you must not quarrel, and contend, and be discouraged; No, but eye the promise, and hold fast thereupon, and say, Lord, Thou hast promised all grace unto thy Servants, take therefore this heart, and this mind, and these affections, and let thy spirit frame them aright according to thine own good will; by that spirit of wisdom (Lord) inform me, by that spirit of Sanctification (Lord) cleanse me from all my corruptions; by that spirit of grace (Lord) quicken and enable me to the discharge of every holy service: Thus carry thyself, and convey thy soul by the power of the Spirit of the Lord, and thou shalt find thy heart strengthened and succoured by the virtue thereof upon all occasions.

For conclusion (to dart this use deeper into your hearts) If every believer be joined with Christ, and from Christ there be a conveyance of all spiritual graces unto every believer; then above all labor for a Christ in all things: Never let thy heart be quieted, never let thy soul be contented until thou hast obtained Christ. Take a Malefactor on whom Sentence is passed, and execution to be administered, suggest to him how to be rich, or how to be pardoned, how to be honored, or how to be pardoned, he will tell you, Riches are good, and honors are good, but O a pardon or nothing: Ah, but then should you say, he must leave all for a pardon; he will answer again, Take all, and give me a pardon, that I may live, though in poverty, that I may live, though in misery: So it is with a poor believing soul, Every man that hath committed sin, must suffer for sin, saith Justice; the Sentence is passed, Every man that believes not, is condemned already, saith our Savior, What would you have now? thou sayest, thou wouldst have a pardon, but wouldst thou not have riches? Alas! What is that to me (saith the soul) to be rich and a reprobate? honored and damned? let me be pardoned, though impoverished; let me be justified, though debased, yea though I never see good day: Why then labor for a Christ, for there is no other way under heaven; get a broken-heart, get a believing heart; but O above all, get a Christ to justify thee, get a Christ to save thee: If I could pray like an Angel, could I hear and remember all the Sermon, could I confer as yet never man spake, what is that to me, if I have not a Christ? I may go down to Hell for all that I have or do; yet take this along, and understand me aright, Christ is not only a Savior of all his, but he is the God of all grace; as he is the God of all pardoning, so he is the God of all purging and purifying unto the soul of each believer: grace therefore is good, and duties are good, seek for all, we should do so, perform all, we ought to do so; but Oh, a Christ, a Christ, a Christ, in all, above all, more then all. Thus I have shown the way to the Lord Jesus, I have shown you also how you may come to be implanted into the Lord Jesus; and now I leave you in the Hands of a Savior, in the Bowels of a Redeemer, and I think I cannot leave you better.

FINIS. Soli Deo Gloria.

P-IA-6. Ultima, = the last things in reference to the first and middle things: or certain meditations on life, death, judgment, hell, right purgatory, and heaven: delivered by Isaac Ambrose, minister of the Gospel at Preston in Amoundernes in Lancashire. - Ambrose, Isaac, 1604-1664.

To the Reader.

READER,

NOT to stay thee too long at the door, come in, and thou mayst in this fabric see these several partitions.

- Here is
 - Mans misery in his
 - Life, Ser. 1.
 - Death, Ser. 2.
 - Judgment, Ser. 3.
 - The Execution, Ser. 4.
 - God's mercy in our
 - Redemption, Ser. 5.
 - Salvation, Ser. 6.

The first part may bring thee to a sight, and sense, and sorrow for sin; the second to a sight of Christ, and a comfort in Christ: and these are the principal means of conversion. Nor is the work unprofitable, if thou beest converted; use them as daily Meditations, and they will keep thee from sin, and help thee towards heaven. One of our Worthies can tell thee, that Nothing more strongly bends men to sin then security, or incogitancie of these things. If thou ask what things? he answers, The end of our creation and redemption, the certainty of death, the uncertainty of life, the severe account we must give, the just retribution we shall have, the misery of the damned in hell, the blessedness of the Saints in heaven, these things being sadly and frequently thought upon, would quench our burnings and lustings after sin. And true thou mayest find it, that such good thoughts, and an inordinate life, are scarce consistible: Will you hear another? A serious and fruitful meditation on these things (so blessed M. Bolton) hath ever been holden very material, and of special moment to make us (by God's blessing) more humble, unworldly, provident and prepared for the evil day. And I take it, everyone of these following subjects would be an excellent theam, or matter for our deliberate meditation. See the Middle things, Chap. 7. Sect. 4. Read then and practice these Meditations, and I trust by these means, thy end will be Heavens happiness. So ends this work, and to that end solely, next to God's glory, I built it for thee. Farewell.

Thine in all services I may, for thy souls salvation, I. A.

Lifes Lease.

GEN. 47.9.

Few and evil have the days of my life been.

WHen Pharaoh was Egypt's King, Joseph Pharaohs Steward, and Jacob Josephs father, there was a great famine which Pharaoh had dreamed, Joseph fore-told, and Jacob suffered: God that sent Joseph to Pharaoh, brings Jacob to Joseph, the same providence so disposing of all, that yet some food must be in Egypt, when nothing was found in all the land of Canaan: Thither come, & welcome (as you may see in the story,) Pharaoh salutes Jacob with this question, What is thy age? How many are thy days? How many? alas, but few: what are they? alas, but evil: Thus we find Jacob at his Arithmetic, the bill is short, and the number but a cyphar: Will you hear him cast his accounts? First, they are days, and without all rules of falsehood, by subtraction few, by addition full of evil; contract all and this is the sum of all, Few and evil have the days of my live been.

This Text, briefly, is the Lease of Jacob's life, God the chief Lord inricht his substance, yet limits the grant of his time: will you question the Lease? for what time? no more, but my life] saith Jacob: but a life? what years? no years, but days] saith Jacob:but days? how many? not many, but few] saith Jacob, but few? how good? not good, but evil] saith Jacob: who can blaze the arms of life, that finds not in it Cross and Croslet? the lease but a life] the term but days] the number few] the nature evil] nay, when all is done, we see all is out of date; the days are not, but are past, they have been] Few and evil have the days of my life been.]

We must, you see, invert the Text, and begin with that on which all hangs; it is but my life] saith Jacob.

Life.

WOULD you know what is that? take but a view of Nature, and Scripture, & these will sufficiently describe our life.

First, Nature, whose dim eye sees thus far: what is it? but a Rose, saith Tifernas, which if you view in its growth, the cold nips it, heat withers it, the wind shakes it; be it never so fair it withers, be we never so lively, immediately we die and perish.

A Rose? that is too beautiful! Life is but grass, saith Plautus, green now, withered anon; thus like the flower that is cut in Summer; as soon as we are born, Death is ready with his Sythe; as soon as we are dead, Angels gather in the harvest, on whose wings we are carried to that Barn of Heaven. Grass? no saith Philemon, life is no better then a counterfeit picture: what if the colors be fair, and the resemblance near? the shadow of death, and the Curtains of our grave will darken all. A picture? that is too honorable; life is (a worse resemblance) but a Play saith Luscinius, we enter at our birth, and act all our life, presently there is an exit, or a back return, and away we go, shutting all up with a sudden Tragedie. A Play? that is too large. Anonymous being asked what was life, he shows himself a little, then hides himself amain; his meaning was this, our life is but a little show, and no sooner are we seen, but immediately are we hid and gone. A show? that is too pleasant; life is nothing but a sleep, saith Philonius, we live secure, and Dormise-like we slumber away our time; when all is done, as if all this were too little, we sleep again, and go from (our grave) the bed, to (that bed) our grave. A sleep? that is too quiet, it is nothing but a dream, saith Aristophanes; all our worldly pleasures are but waking dreams, at last Death rouzeth our souls that have slept in sin, then lifting up our heads and seeing all gone we awake sorrowing. A dream, or the dream of a shadow, saith Pindarus; the worst, the weakest dream that can be imagined; sure one step further, were to arrive at death's door; and yet thus far are we lead by the hand of Nature: nay if you will lower, death succeeds life, and life is but the image of death, saith Cato. Here is a true picture of our frailty, life is like death; indeed so like; so near together, that we cannot differ each from other.

See here the condition of our life; what is it but a Rose, a Grass, a Picture, a Play, a Show, a Sleep, a Dream, an Image of death? such a thing is life, that we so much talk of.

[Use.] And if Nature give this light, how blind are they that cannot see life's frailty? you need no more but mark the Destinies (as Poets feign) to spin their threads: one holds, another draws, a third cuts it off: what is our life but a thread? some have a stronger twist, others a more slender: some live till near rot, others die when scarce born: there's none endures long, this thread of life is cut sooner or later, and then our work is done, our course is finished. Are these the Emblemes of our life? and dare we trust to this broken staff? how do the heathen precede us Christians in these studies? Their books were skulls, their desks were graves, their remembrance an hour-glass. Awake your souls, and bethink you of mortality: have you any privilege for your lives? are not Heathens and Christians of one Father Adam? of one mother, Earth? the Gospel may free you from the second, not the first death; only provide you for the first to escape the second death. O men, what be your thoughts? nothing but of Goods and Barns, and many Years? you may boast of Life, as Oromazes the Conjuror of his Egg, which (he said) included the felicity of the world, yet being opened, there was nothing but Wind: Think what you please, your life is but a Wind, which may be stopped soon, but cannot last long by the law of Nature.

[2] But secondly, as Nature, so Scripture will inform you in this point. The life of man is but of little esteem; what is it but a Shrub, or a Brier in the fire? As the crackling of thorns under the pot, so is the (life or) laughter of the fool: momentary and vanity, Eccles. 7.6. Nay, a shrub were something, but our life is less no better than a leaf, not a tree, nor shrub, nor fruit nor blossom: We all fade as a leaf, and our iniquities like the wind have swept us away, Isaiah 64 6. Yet a leaf may glory of his birth; it is descended of a Tree; life is a Reed, sometimes broken at least shaken, so vain, so infirm so inconstant is the life of man: What went you out to see? a reed shaken with the wind? Matth. 11.7. Nay, a reed were something, our life is baser, indeed no better than a rush or flag. Can a rush grow without mire? though it were green and not cut down, yet shall it wither before any other herb, Job 8 11, 12. What shall I say more? what shall I cry, a rush? All flesh is grass, and all the grace thereof as the flower of the field, the grass withereth, the flower fadeth, surely the people is grass, Esa. 40.7. I am descended beneath just patience; but not so low as the life of man; as all these resemble life, so in some measure they have life: but life is a smoke, without any spark of life in it, thus cries David, My days are consumed like smoke, & my bones are burnt like an hearth, Psal. 102.3. Yet is here no stay, the smoke engenders clouds, and a cloud is the fittest resemblance of our life: Our life shall pass away as the trace of a cloud, and come to naught as the mist that is driven away with the beams of the Sun. Wisd. 2.4. Neither is this all, clouds may hang calm, but life is like a tempest, it is a cloud and a wind too, Remember that my life is but a wind, and that mine eye shall not return to see pleasure, Job 7.7. Nay, we must lower, and find a weaker element, it is not a wind, but water, said that woman of Tekoah, We are as water spilled on the ground, which cannot be gathered up again, 2. Sam. 14.14. yet is water both a good and necessary element, life is the least part of water, nothing but a foam, a bubble: The King of Samaria (that great King) is destroyed as the foam upon the water, Hos. 10.7. I can no more, and yet here is something less, a foam or bubble may burst into a vapor, and What is your life? it is even a vapor that appeareth for a little time, and afterwards vanisheth away, I am. 4.14. Less then this is nothing, yet life is something less, nothing in substance, all it is, it is but a shadow, We are strangers and sojourners as all our fathers were, our days are like a shadow upon the earth, & there is none abiding, 1. Chr. 29.15. See whither we have brought our life, and yet ere we part, we will down one step lower; upon a strict view we find neither substance nor shadow, only a mere nothing, a very vanity: Behold, thou hast made my days as an hand breadth, and mine age is nothing in respect of thee, surely every man living is altogether vanity: Psal. 39.5.

Lo here the nature of our life, it is a shrub a leaf, a reed, a rush, a grass, a smoke, a cloud, a wind, a water, a bubble, a vapor, a shadow a nothing.

What mean we to make such ado about a matter of nothing? I cannot choose but wonder at the vanity of men, that run, rid, toil, travel, undergo any labor to maintain this life, and what is it when they have their desire which they so much toil for? we live, and yet whilst we speak this word, perhaps we die. Is this a land of the living, or a region of the dead? We that suck the air to kindle this little spark, where is our standing but at the gates of death? Psal.

9.13. Where is our walk, but in the shadow of death? Luke 1.79. What is our mansion-house, but the body of death? Rom. 7.24. What think ye? Is not this the region of death, where is nothing but the gate of death, and the shadow of death, and the body of death? Sure we dream that we live, but sure it is that we die; or if we live, the best hold we have is but a lease: God our chief Lord may bestow what he pleaseth, to the rich man wealth, to the wise man knowledge, to the good man peace, to all men somewhat: yet if you ask, Who is the Lessor? God. Who is the Lessee? Man. What is leased? This world. For what term? My life.] Thus Jacob tells Pharaoh, as the Text tells you, Few and evil have the days of my life] been.

This is the Lease, and now you have it, let us see what use you will make of it.

[Use. 1] It is a bad life some live, Come (say they) and let us enjoy the pleasures that are present, and let us cheerfully use the creatures as in youth, let us fill ourselves with costly wine and ointments, and let not the flower of life pass by us. What a life is here? Can it be that pleasures, wine and ointments should have any durance in this vale of misery? Suppose thy life a continued scene of pleasures, hadst thou Dives fare, Solomon's robes, David's throne, Croesus wealth, livedst thou many years without any cares, yet at last comes death, and takes away thy soul in the midst of her pleasures: alas, what is all thy glory, but a snuff that goes out in a stench? Couldst thou not have made death more welcome, if he had found thee lying on a pad of straw, feeding on crusts and crumbs? Is not thy pain more grievous, because thou wast more happy? Do not thy joys more afflict thee, then if they had never been? O deceitful world, that grieveest if thou crossest, and yet to whom thou art best, they are most unhappy?

[Use. 2] But to speak to you who have passed the pikes and pangs of the new birth, would you have life indeed, and enjoy that joy of life which is immortal? then hear, revive, watch and awake from sin: were you sometimes dead in sin? O but now live in Christ, Christ is the life. John 14.6. Were you sometimes dumb in your dying pangs? O but now abide in Christ, Christ is the word of life. John 1.1. Are you as yet babes in Christ, feeble and but weak through life's infirmities? why then use all good means, eat and be strong, Christ is the bread of life John 6.48. Here is a life indeed, would you not thus live forever? then believe in God, and in Jesus Christ whom he hath sent, and this is life eternal. John 17.3. O happy life, which many a man never dreams of! So much they strive to protract this brittle life, which but adds more grief, that they forget Christ, nay, they forget their Creed, which begins with true life, God; and ends with life never-ending, Life everlasting. Others that hope for heaven, fix not their thoughts on earth; if you be God's servants, lift up your hearts above, for there is life, and the God of life, the Tree of life, and the Well of life, the life of Angels, and the Life everlasting.

One sand is run, and the Text is lessened; but as you have the lease, so you may now expect to know the date: the lease is but a life, the date lasts but days.

Days.]

NOt weeks, nor months nor years; or if a year, the best Arithmatick is to reduce or break it into Days: so we have it in the last translations, The days of the year.

Here then is the

- Sum, a Year.
- Fraction, Days.

First, a Year; in the Spring is the youthful spring of our age, in the Summer is the aged time of our youth; in the Autumn is the high noon, or middle of our age, when the Sun (which is our soul) rules in the Equinoctial line of our life; in the Winter we grow old and cold, the nips of frost strip the tree of our life, we fall into the grave, and the earth that nourished us, will then consume us. See what is man! a Spring of tears, a Summers dust, an Autumns care, a Winters woe: Read but this map, and you need travel no further to enquire of life.

The first quarter is our Spring, and that is full of sin and misery; the infant no sooner breathes, but he sucks the poison of his parents: in Adam all sinned, and since his time all were defiled by his sin. Is it not Nature's rule, that every man begets one like himself? And is it not God's rule, that every sinner begets another no better than himself? How may a foul vessel keep sweet water? or how may an earthy sinner beget an heavenly Saint? we are all in the same state of sin, and so we fall into the same plunge of sorrow: the child in his cradle sleeps not so secure, but now he wakes, and then he weeps, cold starves him hunger pines him, sores trouble him, sickness gripes him, there is some punishment, which without sin had never been inflicted. It is wonderful to consider, how Nature hath provided for all creatures, birds with feathers, beasts with hides, fishes with scales, all with some defense, only man is born stark naked, without either weapon in his hand, or the least thought of defense in his heart; birds can fly, beasts can go, fishes can swim, but infant-man, as he knows nothing, so neither is he able to do anything: indeed he can weep as soon as born, but not laugh (as some observe) till forty days old: so ready are we born to woe, but so far from the least spark of joy. O mere madness of men, that from so poor, naked and base beginnings, can persuade ourselves we are born to be proud!

And if this be our Spring, what (think ye) is our Summer? Remember not the sins of this time, prays David, Psalm 25.7. and why? their remembrance is bitter, saith Job, Job 13.26. If mirth and melody should never meet with end, this were an happy life, Rejoice, O young man, in thy youth, let thine heart cheer thee in the days of thy youth, walk in the ways of thine heart, and in the sight of thine eyes; but remember for all these things God will bring thee to judgment, Eccles. 11.9. This judgment is the damp that puts out all the lights of comfort: could not Solomon have given the rains, but he must pull again at curb? Must youth rejoice, But for all this remember? what a bar stands here in the very door of joy? alas, that we should trifle thus with toys, which no sooner we enjoy, but in grievous sadness we repent our follies. The wise man that gave liberty to his ways, what cries he but vanity, and after, vanity of vanities, and at last, all is vanity? what was the wisdom of Achitophel? a vain thing: what the swiftness of Hazael? a vain thing: what the strength of Goliath? a vain thing: what the pleasures of Nebuchadnezzar? a vain thing: what the honor of Haman? a vain thing: what the beauty of Absalom? a vain thing. Thus if we see but the fruit that grows of sin, we may boldly say of laughter, thou art mad, and of joy, what is this thou doest? Eccles. 2.2.

And if this be our Summer, what may be our Autumn? an hour of joy, a world of sorrow; if you look about you, how many miseries lie in wait to ensnare you? there is no place secure, no state sufficient, no pleasure permanent, whither will you go? The chamber hath its care, the house hath its fear, the field hath its toil, the Country hath its frauds, the City hath its factions, the Church hath its Sects, the Court hath its envy, here is every place a field where is offered a battle: or if this were better, consider but your states, the Beggar hath his sores, the Soldier hath his scars, the Magistrate hath his troubles, the Merchant his travels, the Nobles their crosses, the great ones their vexations; here is every state a sea, tossed with a world of tempests: or yet if this were happier, bethink you a little longer of your fleeting joys; the sweet hath its sower, the Crown hath its care, the world hath its want, pleasure hath its pain, profit hath its grief, all these must have their end: here is a dram of sugar mixed with an Epha of bitter. Is this manhood, that is subject to all these miseries? Nay, what are these in comparison of all it suffers? It is deformed with sin, defiled with lust, outraged with passions, over-carried with affections, pining with envy, burdened with gluttony, boiling with revenge, transported with rage; all man's body is full of iniquity, and his soul (the bright image of God) through sin, is transformed to the ugly shape of the Devil.

And if this be our Autumn, what (I pray) is the Winter? then our Sun grows low, and we begin to die by degrees; show me the light which will not darken, show me the flower which will not fade, show me the fruit which will not corrupt, show me the garment which will not wear, show me the beauty which will not wither, show me the strength which will not weaken: behold, now is the hour that thy lights shall darken, thy cheeks wrinkle, thy skin be furrowed, thy beauty fade, and thy strength decay. Here is the ambition of a long life, thy lease lies a bleeding, and death raps at the door of thy heart to take possession: O forcible entry! will not pleasures delay? cannot riches ransom? dares not strength defy? Is neither wit nor wealth able to deceive nor bribe? what may rent this house, that the soul may but lodge there one night longer? Poor soul that dies (or departs) in unremedied pangs! our sins may run on score, and repentance forget her days of payment. Yet our lease shall end, the date expire, this body suffer, and the soul be driven from her house and harbor. See the swift course of our mortal Sun, at North and South, in our mothers womb and tomb both in one year.

[Use.] Consider this, yet that forget God, you have but a year to live, and every season yields some occasion to tell you, ye must die. In childhood, what is your chest of clouts, but a remembrance of your winding sheets? In youth, what is your mirth and music, but a summons to the knell? In manhood, what is your house and enclosure, but a token of the coffin? In age, what is your chair or litter, but a show of the beer, which at last shall convey you to your graves? Man, ere he is aware, hath dressed his herse, every season adding something to his solemnity. Where is the Adulterer, Murderer, Drunkard, Blasphemer? Are you about your sins? look on these objects; there is a sun now setting, or a candle burning, or an hour-glass running, or a flower decaying, or a Traveler passing, or a vapor vanishing, or a sick man groaning, or a strong man dying, be sure there is something pulls you by the sleeve, and bids you beware to commit such enormities: Who dares live in sin, that considers with himself he must die soon? And who will not consider, that sees before his eyes so many a remembrancer? Alas, we must die, and howsoever we pass from childhood to youth, from youth to manhood, from manhood to age, yet there is none can be more then old: here is the utmost of our life, a Spring, a Summer, an Autumn, a Winter, and when that is done, you know the whole Year is finished.

The sum is a Year] the Items are Days.] And what Days can ye expect of such a Year? my text, in relation to these days, gives us two attributes, the first is few, the second is evil: if you consider our days, in regard of the fewness, (which this word seems rather to intimate) you may see them in Scripture brought to fewer and fewer, till they are well near brought to nothing.

If we begin with the beginning, we find first, that the first man Adam had a lease of his life in fee and (as Lawyers say) To have and to hold, from the beginning to everlasting: but for eating the forbidden fruit, he made a forfeiture of that estate: of this he was forewarned, In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt die the death; Gen. 2.17. And this he found too true, Because thou hast eaten of the tree, whereof I commanded thee, Thou shalt not eat—what then? amongst other curses this was one, Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return: Gen. 3.19. After him, the longest life came short of the number of a thousand years, The days of Methuselah (saith Moses) were nine hundred, sixty, and nine years: Gen. 5.27. and had he come to a thousand, which never was attained by man, yet a thousand years are but one day with God: 2. Pet. 3.8. yea, but as yesterday, saith Moses, A thousand years in God's sight are but as yesterday: Psalm 90.4. But what speak I of a thousand years? no sooner came the flood, but the age of man (of every man born after it) was shortened half in half. These are the generations of Sem (saith Moses) Gen. 11.10. to wit, Arphaxad, and Selah, and Eber, none of which three could reach to the number of five hundred years; the longest liver was Eber, and yet all his days, before and after his first-born Peleg, were but four hundred, sixty, and four years: Gen. 11.16, 17. nay, as if half a thousand were more then too much, you may see God halves their ages once again: Peleg lives as long as any man after him, and yet his days were neither a thousand, nor half a thousand, nor half of half a thousand; no, no more then two hundred, thirty and nine years, Gen. 11.18, 19. but this was a long life too: If we come to arrive at the time of Jacob, we shall find this little time well-near halved again; when he spoke this text, he tells he was one hundred and thirty years old, and after this he lived no longer then seventeen years more, so that the whole age of Jacob was but (seven score and seven) an hundred forty, and seven years. Gen. 47.28. Nay, to leave Jacob a while, and to come a little nearer ourselves, in Moses time we find this little time halved again, he brings seven score to seventy, The days (saith he) of our age are threescore years and ten, and though men be so strong that they come to fourscore years, yet is their strength then but labor and sorrow, so soon passeth it away, and we are gone. Psal. 90.10. Here is halves of halves, and if we half it a while, sure we shall half away all our time: nay, we have a custom goes a little further, and tells us of a number a great deal shorter, we are fallen from seventy to seven, in life's leases made by us. Nay, what speak I of years, when my text breaks them all into days? Few and evil have the days been, so our former translation, without any addition of years at all: and (if you mark it) our life in Scripture is more often termed days then years: the book of Chronicles, which writes of men's lives, are called according to the interpretation, Words of days: to this purpose we read, David was old, and full of days. 1 Chron. 23.1. and in the days of Jehoram, Edom rebelled. 2 Chron. 21.8. So in the New Testament, In the days of Herod the King. Matth. 2.1. and, in the days of Herod the King of Judea. Luke 1.5. In a word, thus Job speaks of us, our life is but days, our days but a shadow: we know nothing (saith Job) and why so? our days upon earth are but a shadow. Job 8.9.

Lo here the length of our little life, it is not forever; no, Adam lost that estate, & he that lived longest after Adam, came short of the number of a thousand years: nay, that was halved to somewhat less than five hundred, and that again halved to little more than two hundred; Jacob yet halves it again to a matter of seven score, and Moses halves that again to seventy, or a little more: nay, our time brings it frō seventy to seven: nay, Jacob yet brings it from years to days few and evil have the days] of the year] of my life been.

[Use. 1] Teach us, O Lord, to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom, Psal. 90, 12. Moses Arithmetic is worthy your meditation; learn of him to number, pray to God your teacher, think every evening there is one day of your number gone, and every morning there is another day of misery coming on; evening and morning meditate on God's mercy, and your own misery. Thus if you number your days, you shall have the less to account for at that day, when God shall call you to a final reckoning.

[Use. 2] But miserable men, who are not yet born again, their days run on without any meditation in this kind: What think they of, but of long days, and many years? And were all their days as long as the day of Joshua, when the Sun stood still in the midst of heaven, yet it will be night at last, and their Sun shall set like others. True, God may give some a liberal time, but what enemies are they to themselves, that of all their days allow themselves not one? If any man long after life, and to see good days let him refrain his tongue from evil, and his lips that they speak no guile. How live they that would needs live long, and follow no rules of piety? many can post off their conversion from day today, sending Religion afore them to thirty, and then putting it off to forty, and not pleased yet to overtake it, promise it entertainment at threescore; at last death comes, and allows not one hour: In youth these men resolve to reserve the time of age to serve God in; in age they shuffle it off to sickness, when sickness comes, care to dispose their goods, loathsomeness to die, hope to escape, ma•tyrs that good thought. O miserable men! if you have but the Lease of a Farm for twenty years, you make use of the time, and gather profit; but in this precious farm of Time, you are so ill husbands, that your Lease comes out before you are one penny worth of grace the richer by it. Why stand ye here all the day idle? there are but a few hours or days that ye have to live; at last comes the night of death, that will shut up your eyes in sleep till the day of doom.

You see now the term of our Lease, our Life lasts but Days.] and although we live many days, yet in this thy day, saith Christ; and, Give us this day our daily bread, say we as if no day could be called thy day but this day: if there be anymore, we shall soon number them, my text tells you they are not many, but few, Few and evil have the days of my life been.

Few]

Our Lease is a Life, our Life is but Days, our Days are but Few. The Phoenix, the Elephant, and the Lion fulfill their hundreds; but man dieth when he thinks his Sun yet riseth, before his eye be satisfied with seeing, or his ear with hearing, or his heart with lusting, death knocks at his door, and often will not give him leave to meditate an excuse before he comes to judgment; Is not this a wonder to see dumb beasts outstrip man's life? The Phoenix lives thousands (say some); but a thousand years are a long life with man: Methushalem (you saw) the longest liver, came short of this number; and yet, could we attain to so ripe an age, what are a thousand years to the days everlasting? If you took a little mote to compare with the whole earth, what great difference were in these two? and if you compare this life which is so short, with the life to come which shall never have end, how much less will it yet appear? As drops of rain are unto the sea, and as a gravel stone is in comparison to the sand; so are a thousand years to the days everlasting. But will you have an exact account and learn the just number? It was the Arithmetic of holy men to reckon their days but Few;] as if the shortest cut were the best account. The Hebrews could subduct the time of sleep, which is half our life. so that if the days of men were threescore years and ten, here's five and thirty years struck off at one blow. The Philosophers could subduct the time of weakness, which is most of life; so that if vivere be valere that only a true life, which enjoys good health, here's the beginning and the ending of our days struck off at a second blow. The Fathers could subduct all times not present, and what say you to this account? were the days of life at noon, man grown to manhood? look ye back, and the time past is nothing; look ye forward, and the time to come is but uncertain: and if time past and time to come stand both for ciphers, what is our life but the present? and what is that but a moment? Nay, as if a moment were too much, look at Scripture, and you will see it brought to a lesser pass: Job (for his part) goes about to subduct the time of his birth, which is the bud of life; Let the day perish (saith he) wherein I was born; nay let it not be joined unto the days of the year, nor let it come into the count of months, Job 3.6. Solomon could subduct not only childhood but the time of youth too, which is the strength of life: Take away grief out of thine heart, and cause evil to depart from thy flesh; for childhood and youth both are but vanity, Eccles. 11.10. Paul could subduct the time of sin, which is the joy of life, She that lives in pleasure (lives not, nay she) is dead while she is alive, 1. Tim. 5.6. Sum all and suppose that the time of birth, and childhood, and youth, and sin were gone, to what an epitome were man's life come? Think of this all ye that travel towards heaven, had we not need to make haste, that must go so long a journey in so short a time? How can he choose but run, that remembers his days are few? nay, that every day runs away with his life? The workman that sets a time for his task, he listens to the clock, and counts the hours, not a minute must pass, but his work goes onwards: how then do we neglect our time while we should serve God? Work while it is day, saith Christ; and, this is the day of salvation, saith the Apostle. Would you know your task? you must work: would you know the time? it is this day: a great task, a short time, had we not need with Moses to number our days, lest we loose a minute? It is true, of all numbers we cannot skill to number our days: we can number our sheep, our oxen, our fields, our coin; but we think our days are infinite, and never go about to number them. The Saints that went before us cast another account; Moses had his tables, Job had his measures, all agree both for measure and number, magnitude and multitude, our life is but short, our days are but few. Few] and evil they have been.

Give me leave a little to amplify on this point: would we thoroughly know the shortness of out time, the fewness of our days? I shall then set before you the magnitude of the one, and the multitude of the other:

And first, for the magnitude of the time of our life; A man (say the Philosophers) is Microcosmus, a little world: little for goodness, but a world of wickedness. Of this world if you will have the dimensions according to the rules of Geometricians, the length, breadth, and depth of our short life; then first for our length from East to West, from our birth to our burial. I need not to take so many paces, as will make mille passus, a mile; our little life bears no proportion to such a length: I dare not say as Stobaeus relates, that our life hath the last of a cubits length: for that's more then the Scripture will afford it: it is but a span, or hand breadth, saith David, that's little: nay, Alcaeus in carmine Lyrico, saith, it is but an inch long, that's less: nay, saith Plutarch, All our life is but a prick, a point: yet less, saith Seneca, it is a point that we live, and less then a point. that's less then either I can say, or you conceive. What is it? not a mile, but a cubit, but a span, but an inch, but a point, nay less then that: here's little longitude of life. Well, but our latitude perhaps is greater: no, take a measure if you please from one pole to another, as we stand betwixt the terms of life and death and weresoever we are, death is within an hand-breadth of our life: if we be on the sea, there's but a thick board betwixt us and drowning: if on the land, there's but a shoe-sole betwixt us and our grave: if we sleep, our bed is our bodies grave, and there's but a sheet, (perhaps a winding-sheet) betwixt us and it: when we are awake, our body is our souls grave, and there's but a few skins (as say Physicians) betwixt death and us. What is it? but the breadth of an hand, of a board, of a shoe-sole, of a thin sheet, of a small skin: there's little latitude you see. Well, but our profundity may help all this: go to therefore, and see what that is. I shall not lead you down many steps, for indeed there are not many steps to lead you down: in one word come to the center of the heart of man: The Grecians to express the shallowness of this life, give the same name to the heart, that they do to death. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 is the heart, the author of life; and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 is destiny, the worker of death; to show that as every man hath an heart; so death hath a dart for every man. Christians! mortals! consider your magnitude in all these dimensions; alas, how is it that many of you make yourselves so great? what mean those titles which you take upon you? Your Greatness, Your Highness, your— I know not what. O consider the mortality of your bodies and that will tell you the just scantling of yourselves.

2. For the multitude of our days, he was branded with the name of a fool, that thought he had many years to live. Moses tells us, The days of our years are threescore years and ten, Psal. 90.10. But now (as you heard) we value our life but at seven years, as if six years we had to labor, and to do all we had to do; but the seventh were a Sabbath to rest with God, Revel. 14.13. nay yet the Scripture comes somewhat lower, and because a plurality might cause a security, it bestows but a unity upon our years, thus Jacob in this text reckons of a great number of one year, The days of the year of my life are an hundred and thirty year. Gen. 47.9. nay Austin comes shorter, and compares our life to a quarter of a year, like Jehoahash reign, which lasted about three months time. 2 Kings 23.31. nay, the Scripture descends from months to days, Few and evil are my days, saith Jacob: implying that this life is but a few days, or but one day, as some would have it, which is the meaning of Christ's prayer, Give us this day our daily bread. Matth. 6.11. And yet that we may not think our death a great way off, the Scripture tells us, it is not a day to come: no, boast not of tomorrow, for thou knowest not what a day may bring forth. Prov. 27.1. thy day is this present day, and therefore saith the Apostle, To day if you will hear his voice, Heb. 3.7. nay, to speak further, this day (saith Job) is past already, we are but of yesterday, Job 8.9. nay, as if a day were too long for the life of man, most resembles it to the grass that grows up in the morning, and is cut down in the evening, Psal. 90.6. and Gregory compares it to Jonah's gourd, that came up in a night, and perished ere the day was come, Jonah 4.10. The evening and the morning make but one day. Gen. 1.5. but our day is oft times an evening without a morning, and oft times a morning without an evening. Nay, yet to go lower, as if half a day were more then our life could parallel, Moses compares it to a watch, which is but the fourth part of a night. Psal. 90.4. yea and as if this were longer then our life doth last, the Scripture calls it but an hour. John 5.25. The hour is coming, and now is, saith Christ: nay our life is but a minute, or if we can say less, a moment, in a moment they go down to the grave, saith Job, Job 21.13. and in a moment shall they die saith Elihu. Job 34.20. And a lying tongue is but for a moment, saith Solomon, Prov. 12.19. and our light affliction is but for a moment, saith Paul, 2 Cor. 4.17. Lo here the length of our little life, this is the gradation that God makes of it: at first a matter of seventy years, but these were tythed from seventy to seven, this number again was made no number, one single year: a year? nay a month, nay a day, nay an hour, nay a minute, nay a moment, as soon as we were born, we began to draw to our end. Wisd. 5.13. There's but one poor moment which we have to live, and when that is spent, our life is gone, How? but one? and a moment? one is the least number that is, and a moment the shortest time that ever was: O what mean men to plot and project for the time to come, as if this life would never be done? O consider of the littleness of the time that thou hast to live! O consider of the greatness of the matter that depends upon it; thy body, soul, heaven, and hell, all hangs on this thread, a short life, a few days.] Few] and evil have the days of my life been.

You have learned Moses Arithmetic to number your days; practice a while, and you find this use.

[Use. 1] God shortens your time, you that are unregenerate, lest you defer your repentance: it is said of the Devil, that he is busy, because his time is short, Revel. 12.12. and are you worse then Devils? is not your time shorter? and yet are you more negligent? how do you give way to that old serpent? he delays no time to bring you to hell, and ye neglect all times to get you heaven: What is your life but a Jonas gourd, suddenly sprung up, and by and by withered again, and gone? whatsoever ye do, your wheel whirls about apace: in a word, ye die daily, and you all know thus much, that you have everyone of you a poor soul to save. I have wondered at men, that desire time after time, one time after another, why if your souls perish, the day will come soon enough. It makes me weep (said one of a better stamp) when my hour-glass is beside me, and I see every drop of sand follow other so speedily. Your days are but few, and yet who knows whether this day his sun may set? Take heed, you unregenerate, if death come unawares, it is the price of your souls how you are provided! Who (alas) would defer to be good, that knows not how soon he may go to judgment? The enemy keeps a daily watch, a friend prepares for your welcome, and are you such enemies to yourselves, that never are prepared to welcome death?

[Use. 2] But to speak to thee, whosoever thou art that readeest, regenerate or unregenerate, the best counsel thou canst learn, is to be still in a readiness; think every day thou risest to be thy day of death, and every night thou goest to bed, that thou art laid down in the grave: if thou shouldst forget, will not each object be a remembrancer? thy sheets, of thy winding-sheet; thy coverings, of thy clasping dust; thy sleep, of thy death; with whom (I may say truly) thou shakest hands every night: who can forget his grave, that lies him down in his bed? and who then would not so provide himself, as if every night he went to his grave? Our days are but few, and the night will be ere long that we die indeed. What are we but Tenants at will in this Clay Farm? the foundation of all the building is a small substance, always kept cold by an intercourse of air, the pillar is but a little breath, the strength some few bones tied together with dry strings, howsoever we piece and patch this poor cottage, it will at last fall into the Lord's hands, and we must give surrender only in this tenor, Few] and evil have the days of my life been.

You now see the time of our Lease to the full, out life lasts but days, our days are but few, who is so fond to settle his care on this Lease, that so soon is expired, nay, with a blast is gone out? The man that is wedded to this world, enjoys neither length of days, nor a day of joy; as he is mortal, so is he miserable: you shall see my Text join both the hands, nothing indeed but death can loose the bonds, the days of my life are few, the few days of my life are evil; few in number, evil in nature; neither many, nor good, but few, and evil.

Evil.]

Our life is but days, our days are but few, our few days but evil: Into what a sea of misery have I now rushed sail? Evil life, evil days; but few, yet evil.

There waits on our life

- Sin,
- Punishment.

Both these are evil; Sin, as the father, plays the Bankrupt; and Punishment, the son, must pay the debt: first, Lust conceives and brings forth sin, then sin being finished brings forth death. Here is both the work and wages, first we commit, and then we suffer evil.

The evils we commit are sins, and see what a troop of enemies march about us; if you expect the battle in array, what say you to those evils original? these are the inheritance which we have from our first parents; it is the same infection that distilled from them abides in us, and therefore the same punishment is due to us, that fell on them. O the flood-gate of evils that now are opened! Adams sin is ours by imputation, we are twigs of one root, streams of one fountain, and by the same reason partakers of one sin. And as no evil is alone, so besides that imputed, we have another inherent, this is the proclive disposition that we have to evil, because of the loss of those powers that we had to good; First, the sin of the person infected nature but now the sin of nature infects the person: Is not the mind doubtful of the ways of God? Is not the will prone to all manner of evil? Are not the affections disordered in their actions? But as for goodness, and holiness, and virtue, and grace, and temperance, and innocence, all these ornaments are lost; Adam received them for himself and us, and therefore lost them from us, as from himself: what wonder, if we being spoiled, nature be left naked; a rotten root must needs bear rotten branches; and if the first man be infected with sin, what follows, but a corruption of the whole nature of man?

But these are but the seeds, what say ye to the offspring? Evils original beget evils actual, and such are they (as Austin defines them) Whatever we say, or do, or think against the Law eternal. How many of these Furies haunt us? our saying, doing, thinking, all is evil that is against God's command: his will is the rule that should measure all our actions, our actions are the frame that should be measured by his will; here then is sins material and formal, the actions of man diverted from the will of God; and if all these be evils, how many evils are they all?

Look at our omission of good duties, and come they not in like moats in the Sun? How many alms have we denied? How many blessings have we refused? How many Sermons have we neglected? How many Lord's days have we mis-spent? This was the sin of that rich man, of whom though Lazarus had no hurt, yet because he could receive no good therefore he was tormented in that flame. You know a day will come, when a bill of negatives shall be framed against the wicked, not what ye have done, but what ye have not done: I was hungry, and ye gave me no meat; I was thirsty, and ye gave me no drink; I was a stranger, and ye lodged me not; I was naked, and ye clothed me not; sick and in prison, and ye visited me not, Matth. 5.42. It is the not doing your duties must incur that heavy sentence, Depart from me ye cursed. Mere harmless men are no fit members for God's kingdom; if you mean to avoid evil, you must neglect no good: alas, who would slip any occasion, that considers the just reward of this evil of omission.

But these are not half the count, there be evils of Commission, whereby we fight against God, and provoke his justice against us: of all the Commandments which we should perform, there is not one precept which we have not broken; God himself is dishonored, his worship is neglected, his name is blasphemed, his days are profaned: if we go any further parents are disobeyed, injury is maintained, adultery is committed, robbery is practiced, false witness is produced, covetousness is followed: thus is the manner of our keeping the Commandments, from the first to the last having transgressed against all. Hide thy face from my sins, O Lord, and put away all mine iniquities. We had need to pray, Hide them, for if they be not hid, how many of these evils will rise up in judgment against us?

But here is no end, there be evils external that accompany the body, and what part of the body is not possessed with some evil? Look at the senses, and wherein hast thou employed thine eyes, but in beholding vanity? wherein thine ears, but in hearkening to lies? wherein thy tasting, touching, smelling, but in sensual pleasures? and as the senses, so are the members full of evil, The head is sick, the heart deceitful, the tongue unruly, the teeth as swords, the jaws as knives, the hands are full of blood, and the feet swift to shed blood. Thus from the sole of the feet to the crown of the head, there is nothing whole, but wounds, and swellings, and sores full of corruption, Esa. 1.6.

And if these be our outward, what be those inward evils? should I thrust my hand into your bosoms, O how leprous should I pluck it out again! that Understanding created full of light, is now so blind, that it perceives not the things of the spirit of God, neither can it know them, for they are spiritually discerned. No doubt there is in us a remaining spark of Nature, and that is the light of reason which makes us men; but if you look at this reason, it perceives only natural and external things; it can perceive thy house adorned, thy lands tilled, thy grounds stocked; but those spiritual blessings, celestial promises, eternal privileges, it cannot see, nor so much as think of: What are all our thoughts but vanity, and imagination of man's heart, but only evil, Gen. 8.21. Neither is this all, God framing man's soul, planted in it two faculties, the Understanding that informeth, and the Will that followeth: and as the Understanding, so is the Will; it receives from Reason (her Counselor) sensual advice, and sends forth to the Affections (her Courtiers) injunctions of vanity; here is a Counselor indeed, what is it but reason without reason? and here is a will indeed, what is it but a slave to sin, without any will to good? Man is so holden captive with the yoke of sin, that of his own nature he can neither aspire by desire nor travel by endeavor to any goodness. I say not, but (as Bernard) to will is in us all, but to will evil is of nature, to will good is of grace, away then with our abilities, and confess we with the Apostle, that to will is present with me, but I find no means to perform that which is good, Rom. 7.18.

And yet this is not all, take a view of those affections which attend the will, and how are all evil? It is God should be the object both of our will and affections, and what say you? do you love him, and fear him, and trust in him, and serve him? your sins say, no: we can do nothing that good is, but we run upon evil; see thine anger like a Serpent, thy desire like a Wolf, thy fear like an Hart, thine envy like a Viper, all thy passions are become sensual, and Every man is a beast by his own knowledge, Jer. 10.14.

Blessed God! what a world of evils are within us? We have sinned (O Lord) above the number of the sands of the seas, our transgressions (O Lord) are multiplied, our offenses are exceeding many: Many sure, that contain these streams, and yet how many are the rivulets that issue from them? There be evils of weakness against God the Father, whose attribute is Power; there be evils of ignorance against God the Son, whose attribute is Wisdom; there be evils of malice against God the holy Ghost, whose attribute is Love. Can we add anymore? Mark but our thoughts, our delights, our consents to evil: or if these be not enough, see a swarm indeed that continually assault us, anger, hatred, envy, distrust impatience, avarice, sacrilege, pride, despair, presumption, indevotion, suspicion, contention, derision, exaction, (give me leave to breathe in the numbering of this bedroll) perjury, blasphemy, luxury, simony, perplexity, inconstancy, hypocrisy, apostasy: here is a number numberless, gross sins, little sins, known sins, hid sins; Who can understand his errors? O Lord, cleanse me from my secret faults, Psal. 19.12. The days of life are few, but the evils God knows how many; he that would number them may tell a thousand, and yet not tell one of a thousand: Can the proudest Pharisee justify himself? Remember the swarms that lurk in thy venomous conscience, number thy wanton words, thy carnal thoughts, thy unchristian gestures, thy outrageous sins, & come they not in by troops and herds, thicker then the frogs in Egypt? well may we stand amazed at their number, and as convicted prisoners, cry for that Psalm of mercy, Lord have mercy on us, most evil wretched sinners.

Thus you see, Beloved, how evil be our days, since every day we do evil: then to wander no further, now we have found such a world of them, will you see them in a map? here is evils original, evils actual, evils of omission, evils of commission, evils of the body evils of the soul; well may we pray, Deliver us from evil: what, so many evils of sin? now the Lord deliver us.

[Use. 1] Remember yourselves, and who will not sing David's burden, Mine iniquities are gone over my head, and as a weighty burden, they are too heavy for me to bear? There is in sin (saith Austin) both weight and number, and is any one so dull or dead, that he is sensible of neither? go ye to the balance, and what a mass lies upon you? enough and enough again to sink you down to hell: go ye to the count, and what a swarm comes upon you? a million, and a million of millions to keep you out of heaven; when all your sins must be called to account before that Judge of the world, what account shall be given of this account that is endless? see them like the stars, only these set and rise, but your sins rise, and never set; see them like your hairs, only these shed and lose, but your sins grow ever more and more; see them like the sands, only these are covered with the floods and waters, but your sins lie still open and are ever before you: think on these stars, these hairs, these infinite innumerable sands of sins, and when all is done, let your tears be the flood to hide them over. It was David's saying, Every night wash I my bed, and water my couch with my tears: if your days be evil, let not your night slip without repentance; go not to bed, but beat your breast with the Publican; lay you not down, but withal lift up your voice Lord be merciful unto me a sinner: How sweet a rest doth that night bring, whose sleep is prevented with the consideration of our sins? though we are begirt with a thousand devils this would be as the watch of our souls, and the safeguard of our persons.

[Use: 2] But I must speak with a difference: I stand over some of you, who are so far from washing away your sins with tears, that I fear you never took much notice of the multitude of your sins: should I tell you that you brought sin enough with you to damn you, when you first came into this world; should I tell you, that you have everyone committed thousands, and thousand of thousands of actual sins and yet any one of those thousands is enough to send you packing to hell: You would think these strange points; but if God be true, there is no sin of man, either originiall or actual, either of omission or commission, either of the body, or of the soul, which without repentance will not produce eternal death: and therefore in God's fear take notice of your sins, set before you the Commandments of God, and thereto comparing your life, you may find out such a catalogue of your sins, that will thoroughly convince you of your damnable estate,

You may ask, to what end should we be so careful to find out our sins? I answer to a very good end, both in respect of the

- Unregenerate,
- Regenerate.

First, in respect of the unregenerate: this is the first step of repentance; this is one of those paces that will lead you towards heaven. You may be sure, without repentance no heaven, without confession no repentance, and without finding out sin there can be no confession. It were good therefore, and a singular means to bring you out of corruption into Christianity, and out of the state of nature into the kingdom of grace, that you would everyone of you have a Catalogue of your sins. If you will not, I can tell you who will, there is an adversary called Satan (the adversary of mankind) that stands at your back, and (I may say figuratively) with a scroll in his hands, wherein he writes down your sins; not a day passeth on, but he can easily tell how many sins you have committed all day. Lord, that men would think on it! Are you about any sin? at that very time Satan is registering the act, and time and place, and every circumstance: now woe, woe to man, that lets Satan do his work for him! Would you do this yourself, would you but study for a Catalogue of your own sins, that so you might confess them to God, and repent you thereof, this would be a dash in the devils book, so that he could not have whereof to accuse you; but if still you go on securely in sin, and never go about to call your sins to remembrance, a day will come (woe worth the day) when that roaring Lion shall set all your sins and transgressions in order before you: then shall you read (perforce) your sins original and actual, of omission and commission, of your bodies and souls. And I must tell you, herein is a great policy of Satan, he lets you alone in your security a while, if you will not trouble him, he will not trouble you; if you will not tell your own sins, neither will he tell you of them; but he will change his note (at furthest) when your few evil days finish: it is the very case as many creditours deal with their debtors, while they have any doings as they say, and are in trading, they will let them alone, in policy they will say nothing; but if once down the wind, in sickness, poverty, disgrace, or the like, then comes Serjeant after Serjeant, arrest upon arrest, action upon action: just thus is Satan's dealing with the unregenerate man; if you will but sin, and never call yourselves to a reckoning, in policie he will say nothing, but when the score is full, and death comes to arrest you, then will he bring out his black book of all your sins committed all your days. O I tremble to speak of it! then shall your sins fall as foul on your souls, as ravens on the fallen sheep, and keep you down forever in the dungeon of despair.

Secondly in respect of the regenerate; that you have ready by you (or by heart) a catalogue of your sins, is necessary in many respects.

First, to humble you: for no sooner shall the poor soul look on all the sins he hath committed, both before and after his regeneration, but confessing them in prayer, it will pull down his heart, and make the wound of his remorse to bleed a fresh, as before: and therefore this catalogue is most necessary in days of humiliation.

Secondly, it is necessary to prepare you for the receiving of the Sacrament; for indeed I would have none to presume to taste on that Supper, but first to view over all his sins, and to confess them in payer to his heavenly Father: there be many that in Confession look on their sins, as they do on the stars in a dark cloudy night, they can see none but the great ones, of the first or second magnitude, it may be here one and there one; but if they were truly enlightened, and informed aright, they might rather behold their sins, as those innumerable stars that appear in a fair frostie winters night; they are many, and many: and therefore take a little pains in composing your catalogue, that so you may confess all (at least for the kinds) before you presume to come near that Table of the Lord.

Thirdly, it is necessary in times of desertion, or visitation: yea, if the Lord shall please to exercise you with any cross, or disgrace, or discountenance, loss of goods, disease of body, terror of soul, or the like; you may be sure as no misery comes but for sin, so then the enumeration of your sins from a bleeding broken heart, is the prime and first means to cause that Sun of mercy to break through the clouds, and to beget a clear day; alas, our days are evil, and sure we have as good reason as ever Jacob had to confess it: for my part, though I keep my catalogue to myself, yet in the general I cannot but confess to you all, My days have been evil, evil, evil: Few and evil.

And now we have done with the work, it rests that you should know your wages; there be days of sin, and then days of sorrow; as you have spent your days, so must you have your rewards; first we trespass, and then we pay for it; first we sin, and then we suffer evil.

[2] 2. The evils that we suffer may be ranked in this order; first, evils original fill up the scene, and what a multitude of evils do enter with them? No sooner had Adam sinned, but a world of miseries fell on man, so that as the infection, in like manner the punishment distills from him. By one man (saith the Apostle) entered sin into the world: what, sin alone? no, but death by sin, and so death went over all men Rom. 5.12. Infants themselves bring their damnation with them from their wombs; or if that be omitted, how many are the miseries of this life, as the fore-runners of that judgment? Look at the mind and what think ye of our ignorance, not only that of willful disposition, but (as the Schools distinguish) of pure negation; if it be not a sin, what is it but a punishment for sin? that our understanding should be obscured and darkened, our knowledge in things natural wounded, in supernatural utterly extinguished: O the miserable issue of that monster Sin! But as evils come by heaps, so of the same parent here is another brood, Ignorance and Forgetfulness; and is not this a misery, after all our time and study to get a little knowledge, quickly to forget that we are so long a learning? Man in his whole state, before the fall, could not forget things taught him; but now (as the hour-glass) we receive in at the one ear, and it goes out at the other; or rather (like the sieve) we always keep the bran, but let the flower go, so apt are we to retain the bad, but we very easily forget the good. And is this all? nay, yet more evils; see but our affections, and to what a number of infinite sorrows, griefs, anguishes suspicions, fears, malices, jealousies, is the soul of man subject? So prone are we to these miserable passions, that upon any occasion we fall into them; or for want of cause from any other, we begin to be passionate with ourselves: Why hast thou, O Lord, set me against thee? I am become irksome and burdensome even unto mine own self, Job 7.20.

Alas, poor man how art thou beset with a world of miseries? and yet, as if all these summed up together, could not make enough, look at the body, and how many are its sufferings? In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat thy bread, said God, Gen. 3.19. The Spider spins, and weaves, and wastes her very bowels to make her net, and when all is done, to what purpose serves it, but to catch a fly? If this be vain work, how vain is man in his fond imitation? the birds and beasts can feed themselves, without any pains, only man toils night and day, on sea and land, with body and mind; yet all is to no purpose, but to catch a fly, to protract a life, or to procure some vanity. And yet, as if misery had no mean; besides our industry, how is this body stuffed with many an infirmity? all the strength of man is but a reed, at best shaken, perhaps broken, howsoever weakened by every wind that blows upon it. The Physicians distinction of Temperamentum ad pondus, & justitiam, gives us thus much to learn, that no constitution is ever so happy, to have a just temper according to its weight; some are too hot others too cold all have some defects, and so are disposed to all kind of infirmities: man cannot carry himself, but he must needs carry about with him many forms of his own destruction. The books of the Physicians tell us of many diseases, and yet many are the diseases which their books cannot tell of: we see in our own days, most labor of new sicknesses, unknown to our fathers; or if any of us be free from any of these, yet every ones body nourisheth the causes, and may be a receptacle of a thousand diseases. How evil is sin, that incurs so many evils of punishment?

But as if all were too little (because our sins are so many) if you will number anymore, here is yet another reckoning, evils original, and evils adventitious, evils of necessity, and evils of chance. Austin saith, What shall we say of those innumerable accidents that befall a man? as heat, and cold, and thunder, and rain, and storms, and earthquakes, and poisons, and treasons, and robberies, and wars, and tumults, and what not? go whither you will, and every place is full of some of these evils: if you go on sea, every wave threatens you, every wind fears you, every rock and sand is enough to drown you: if you go on land every step dangers you, every wild beast scares you, every stone or tree is enough to kill you: if you go no whither, you cannot be without danger: Eli was sitting, and what more secure? yet at the news of God's Ark, that it was taken by the Philistines, he falls down backwards, and his neck was broken. Korah was standing, what more sure? yet as soon as Moses had made an end of speaking, the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed him and his family, and all the men that were with him. Indeed Absalom was riding, & what way more ready to escape the enemy? yet, as the mule carried him under a great thick oak, his head caught hold of the oak, & he was taken up between the heaven and the earth and the mule that was under him went away. Whatsoever we do, or whithersoever we go, so long as we do evil, these evils will meet us. Go into the ship, there is but a board betwixt thee and the waters: walk on the ground, there is but a shoe-sole betwixt thee and thy grave: take a turn in the streets, and so many perils hang over thee, as there are tiles on the houses; travel in the country, and so many enemies are about thee, as thou meetest beasts in the fields; if all these places be so dangerous, then retire to thy house, and yet that is subject to fire, or water, or if it escape both, it may fall on thy head: whithersoever we turn us, all things about us seem to threaten our death. Our days are evil indeed, and who is it that is exempted from every of these evils? Sinners are corrected, good men are chastened, there is none escapes free.

To see a little the state of God's own friends and children: Was not Abel murdered by his brother? Noah mocked by his son? Job scoffed by his wife? Eli slain for his sons? will you all at once? take one for all, and see Jacob our Patriarch, a notable example of extreme infelicity: he is threatened by his brother, banished from his father, abused by his uncle, defrauded of his wife, was not here misery enough to break one heart? But after this, for another wives sake, see him enter into a new service, In the day he is consumed with heat, in the night with frost: an hard service sure! nay after this that he got his Rachel, see then a division betwixt her and Leah, two sisters brawling for one husband yet neither content, after both enjoyed him. Blessed Saint! how wast thou haunted with afflictions? yet after this, he agrees his wives, and they all run from their father, and now see a fresh pursuit; behind him, Laban follows which an Hue and Cry, before him Esau meets him with 400 men; to go forwards intolerable, to go backwards unavailable; which way then? It was an Angel of God, nay the God of Angels that now must comfort him.

And yet again after his first entry into his own country, his wife Rachel dies, his daughter Dinah is ravished his son Reuben lies with his concubine, and if the defiling of a wife be so great a grief to the husband, what sorrow and shame, when the wickedness is committed by a man's own son? what can we more? If ye his heart be unbroken, here's another grief great enough to match all the rest, his son, his Joseph (they report) is lost, and what news hears he of him, but that he is torn with wild beasts? and now see a man of miseries indeed! He rends his clothes, he puts sackcloth about his loins, he will not be comforted, but surely (saith he) I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning. Alas poor Jacob! what can they say to comfort him? To comfort, said I? nay, yet hear the tidings of a new misfortune, a famine is begun, and another of his sons is kept in prison: What a grief is here? Another in prison, and nothing to redeem him but his only Benjamin; here is the loss of son after son, Joseph is not, and Simeon is not, and now ye will take Benjamin, all these things are against me. We need no more, if Jacob thus number, how many are the miseries he did daily suffer? would you have the sum? He himself the best witness of himself, affirms it to Pharaoh, Evil, Evil. Few and Evil] have the days of the years of my life been.

So miserable is our life, that no man can take his breath before some evil or other do seiz on his person: if you would that we knit up all in one bundell, there be evils original, evils adventitious, evils of the mind evils of the body, evils that are common, evils of the chosen, we had need pray again, Deliver us from evil.] What? so many evils of suffering? Now the Lord deliver us.

[Use. 1] What is sweet in this life, which so many miseries will not embitter? If this be a vale of rears, where is thy place to pleasure? If this life be a nest of cares, how canst thou settle so great a vanity as sin in a field of such misery as the world? O ye sons of men, how long will ye blaspheme mine honor, and have such pleasure in vanity, and seek after leasing? Were men not mad in their ways, or utterly besotted in their imaginations, well might these miseries of our life breed their neglect of the world. Can we choose but wonder to see how busily thou heapest up riches yet knowest not who shall eat the grapes of thy planted vineyard? God gave thee a countenance erected towards heaven, and must it ever be groveling and poring on the earth? God gave thee a soul to live with his blessed Angels, and wilt thou make it a companion fitter for no other then brute beasts? There is an evil sickness (saith Solomon) that I have seen under the Sun; and what is that, but riches reserved to the owners for their evil. See here the just judgment of a righteous God, to this end is thy riches, thou wouldest live at ease, and outlast many years, therefore thy life is but miserable, and thy death must be sudden, thy days are but few, and thy few days are evil.

[Use. 2] But to comfort all you that live in the fear of God, it may be your days are evil,] and what then? this is to make trial of your love to God, and a trial it is of God's love to you.

First it makes a trial of your love to God; Certainly if you have but a spark of this love, your days cannot be so evil, but in the midst of those evils you shall find some inward consolations that will sweeten all. It is memorable how Jacob for Rachel serves Laban seven years, but yet (saith the Text) they seemed to him but a few days for the love he had to her. Nay, after Laban had deceived him in giving him blear-eyed Leah instead of beautiful Rachel, Jacob then serves him another seven years prentiship; love makes the heart cheerful in the worst of sufferings: though Jacob was consumed with drought in the day, and frost in the night, which many and many a time made his rest and sleep to depart from his eyes; yet his love of fair Rachel sweetens all his labors. Why thus thus will it be with you that wait on the Lord your God: what though miseries come upon you as thick as hail-storms in a sharp winters day? you may remember you have a better master then Laban, a better service then Jacob's, a fairer prize then Rachel: who is your master but such an one as will surely keep his covenant, even the Lord your God? what is your service, but such a one as is most glorious and honorable, even a light burden, a perfect freedom? what is your prize, but such a one as surpasseth all prizes whatsoever, even the beauty of heaven, the beatifical vision of our blessed God, If then you but love God as Jacob did Rachel, what matters it how evil your few days be? nay be they never so evil, and were your days never so many, yet an hundred, a thousand years spent in God's service, they would seem but a few days for the love you bear to him. O Lord work in us this love, and then command what thou wilt, persecution, affliction, the Cross, or death, no service so hard, but we shall readily obey thee.

Secondly, as your evils of sufferings try your love to God, so they are a trial (or token) of God's love to you: Our light affliction which is but for a moment causeth unto us a far more excellent and an eternal weight of glory; and if this be the end, who would not endure the means? O divine mercy! therefore the dugs of this life taste bitter, that thereby God may wean us from the love of this world to attain a better: Certainly God is good unto us in tempering these so fitly; bitterness attends this life, that thou mayest sigh continually for the true life. Wouldst thou not run through dangers for a kingdom? wouldst thou not fetch a crown for fear of a thorn? nay, who would not go to heaven, although it were with Elijah in a whirlwind? I count (saith Paul) that the afflictions of this life are not worthy of the glory which shall be shown unto us. Come then ye that thirst for long life, believe in God, and you shall have life eternal. All is well that ends well: though a while we sink in miseries, yet at last the joys of heaven will refresh us: then shall we live in love, rejoice in hymns, sing forth in praises the wonderful works of our Creator and Redeemer, this is that life of heaven, and when our life ends here, Lord grant us life everlasting.

Thus far have you seen the state of our life, this lease breeds sorrow, but the reversion is our joy; no sooner shall this life expire, but God will give us the purchase of his Son, that inheritance of heaven; comfort then thy soul that wades through this sea of miseries, and the Lord so assist us in all our troubles, that he lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil. Amen.

Have been.]

Our life is but days, our days are but few our few days but evil, and now when all is done, we find all is out of date. Few and evil have] the days of my life been.]

This last word is the leases expiration: and why have been?] If you will needs know the reason.

The time that is past is best known to Jacob.

And the life of Jacob is but as the time that is past.

First, the time that is past is best known to Jacob: old men can tell old stories, and something it delights them to remember the storms gone over them. We all know how

- Many years we have lived.
- Great miseries we have suffered.

Jacob tells you, as you may tell each other, our years have been few, our few years have been evil. To make this good. Have they not been few? Let me ask some old man, whose hairs are dipt in snow, whose golden ewer is broken, whose silver cord is lengthened, how many be thy years? It may be thou wilt answer, as Moses gives the number, a matter of threescore years and ten, or fourscore years: I cannot say but it is a long time to come, but alas, what are these fourscore years now they are gone? Tell me you that have seen the many changes both of Moon and Sun, are they not swiftly run away? you may remember your manhood, childhood, and I pray what think ye? was it not yesterday? is it not a while since? who will not wonder to see how quickly it is gone, and yet how long it was a coming? The time to come seems tedious, especially to a man in hope of bliss, the time now past is a very nothing, especially to a man in fear of danger: go down to those cast-away souls that now suffer in hell flames, and what say they of their life, but as soon as we were born we began to draw to our end, Wisd. 5.13. go down to those putrefied bodies, and find amongst them the dusts of Adam, Seth, Enoch, Kenan, Mahalaleel, Jered, Enoch, Methushalem, everyone of whom lived near to the number of a thousand years, are they not dead? and what is their epitaph, but, they lived and died? Gen. 5. To sum up all in one, and to make this one serve for all, Jacob is an hundred and thirty years old (for so you see it registered in God's book) yet now being demanded to tell his age, he answers but Days, and his days are but Few; how should they be many that now are gone already? these few days, they have been.]

2. And as time past tells our days, so it counts all our miseries, who cannot remember the miseries he doth suffer? The poor, the sick, the banished, the imprisoned, the traveler, the soldier, everyone can write a Chronicle of his life, and make up large volumes of their several changes. What is the history of the Bible but an holy brief Chronicle of the Saints grievous sufferings? See the miseries of the Patriarchs described in the books of Moses: see the wars of the Israelites set down in the books of Joshua: see the afflictions of David in the books of Samuel, Ezra, Nehemiah, Esther, Job, everyone hath a book of their several calamities, and if all our miseries were but thus abbreviate, I suppose the world would not contain the books that should be written.] There is no man so cunning to know his future condition; but for those things which have been, everyone can read them. Look then (beloved) at the time now past, and will you not say with Jacob, your days have been evil? Evil for your sins, and evil for your sufferings: if you live more days what do you but increase more evils? the just man sins seven times a day, and everyone of us perhaps seventy times seven times: do we thus multiply sins? and think we to subtract our sorrows? think but of those storms that already have gone over our heads famines, sores, sicknesses, plagues, have we not seen many seasons unseasonable, because we could find no season to repentance? Our Springs have been graves rather than cradles, our Summers have not shot up but withered our grass, our Autumns have took away the flocks of our sheep, and for our latest Harvest, the heavens themselves have not ceased weeping for us, that never yet found time to weep for ourselves. And as this procured the famine, so famine ushered the pestilence. O the miseries miserable that at this time fell upon us! Were not our houses infected? our towns depopulated? our gardens made our graves? and many a grave a bed to lodge in it a whole family? Alas, what an hideous noise was heard about us? In every Church bells tolling, in every hamlet some dying, in every street men watching, in every place, everywhere, wailing and weeping, or groaning and dying. These are the evils that have been,] and how should we forget them that have once seen them with our eyes? Call to mind time past, was the rule of Bernard, & what better rule have we to square our lives, then the remembrance of those evils which our lives have suffered? Look back then with Jacob, and we have good reason to redeem the time past, because our days have been evil.

[2] 2. But there is yet another reason why these few evil days have been.] As the time past is best known to Jacob so the life of Jacob is but as the time past. Go to now (saith S^t. James) ye that say today or tomorrow we will go into such a City, and continue there a year, and buy and sell, and get gain, and yet ye cannot tell what shall be tomorrow. James 4.13. It is a mere presumption to boast of the time to come: can any man say he will live til tomorrow? look back ye that trust to this staff of Egypt, there is no man can assure you of this day, Man knoweth not his time, saith the Preacher, Eccles. 9.12. As near as it is to night, it may be before evening someone of us may be dead, and cold, and fitter to lodge in our graves under earth, then in our beds above it; nay, assure yourselves, our life is of no long continuance: what speak we of tomorrow, or this day? we are not sure of (that least of times division) a very hour: watch therefore (saith our Savior) and will you know the reason? for ye know neither the day, nor the hour when the Son of man will come, Matth. 25.13. The man with ten or twenty dishes set before him on his table, when he hath full intelligence that in one of them is poison, will he not refuse all, lest in eating of any be run upon the hazard of his life? What is our life but a few hours? and in one of them death must needs come; watch then for the hour is at hand, and we know not how soon it will seiz upon us. This hour the breath thou drawest may be thy infection, this hour the bread thou eatest may be thy poison, this hour the cup thou tastest may be that cup that must not pass from thee. But what speak we of this hour, seeing it is come, and gone? The sweetest ditty that Moses sung, were his briefs and semibriefs of life, and what is it but a watch? Psalm 90.4. what is it but a sleep? Psalm 90.5. we watch when it is dark, we sleep when it is night; if then our life be no more but a night-work, what is truer then this wonder, our life is done, our days they have been?

You may think we go far to prove so strange a paradox, yet Job goes further; what are we but of yesterday, for our days upon earth are but a shadow? Job 8.9. See here the chronologie of man's frailty, we have a time to live, and when is it, think you? not tomorrow, nor do day, nor this hour, nor last night, it is as long since as yesterday itself. Are not we strangely deceived? What mean our plots and projects for the time to come? why our life is done, and we are now but dead men. To speak properly, In the midst of life we be in death, our whole life being truly (if not past, yet) as the time past that is gone and vanished. The similitude or resemblance will run in these respects, the time past

- cannot be recalled.
- suddenly is vanished.

And so is our life: can we recall that which is fled away? the the life that we led yesterday, you see it is gone; the life that we led last night, it is past and done; the life that we led this morning, it is now a going, nay, it is gone as soon as we have spoken. Nicodemus saying according to the flesh was true, How can a man be born which is old? can he enter into his mothers womb again, and be born? John 3.4. How should a man recall that is past? can he receive again the soul once given, and begin to live? man never so great in power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree, a tree] most durable; a bay tree] most flourishing; a green bay tree] that is most in prime, if anything will stand at a stay, what is more likely? yet he passed away (saith the Psalmist) and lo he was gone, I sought him but he could not be found, Psalm 37.35, 36. We cannot stay time present, how should we recall time past? See here the man on whom the eyes of the world are fixed with admiration, yet for all this he passeth] without stay, he is gone] without recall, I sought him but to find him] is without all recovery. Time was that Adam lived in paradise, Noah built an Ark, David slew Goliath, Alexander overcame the world: where be these men that are the wonder of us living? we all know they are long since dead and the times they saw shall never come again. How fond was that fiction of Plato, that after the revolution of his tedious year, then he must live again and teach his Scholars in the same chair he sate in? our faith is above his reason, for the heavens shall pass away, the elements shall melt with heat, and the earth with the works therein shall be burnt up, 2 Pet. 3.10. Where then is the life of Plato, when all these things shall turn to nothing? we may now for his learning praise him where he is not, and he may then for his error be damned and tormented where he is. Is there any man with skill or power can call back but yesterday? once only we read of such a miracle, but it was only by the hand of God Almighty. Hezekiah was sick, 2 Kings 20. and to confirm the news that he must recover, he requires a sign. What shall be the sign that the Lord will heal me, and that I shall go up into the house of the Lord the third day? this was no temptation, for you see how the Prophet gives him satisfaction, This sign shalt thou have of the Lord; wilt thou that the shadow go forward tenn degrees, or go back tenn degrees? Hezekiah thinks of death, and the Prophet restores his life, not only a time of fifteen years to come, but of ten degrees now gone, and thus it was observed in the dial of Ahaz. This was a miracle that but once happened since the beginning of the world; he then that sleeps away his time in expectation of Hezekiah's sun, may sleep till his death, and then not recall one minute of his life; as the time, so our life, if once past it is irrevocable, irrecoverable.

2. And as it cannot be recalled again, so suddenly it is vanished; Nothing makes life long, but our hope to live long: take away those thoughts of the time to come, and there is nothing swifter then the life that is gone. Suppose then thou hadst lived so long, as from Adam to this time: as Austin saith, Certainly thou wouldest think thy life but short: and if that were short, which we think so long, how long is our life, which in comparison of that is so extremely short? The time once past, we think it suddenly past, and so is life gone in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, so soon indeed, before it can be said, This it is.] In everyone of us death hath ten thousand times as much as life, the life that is gone is deaths, and the life yet to come is deaths, our now is but an instant; yet this is all that belongs to life, and all the life which any of us all is at once possessed of: here is a life indeed, that so soon is vanished, before it can be numbered or measured; it is no time but now, yet stays not till the syllable now may be written, or spoken: what can I say? the life that I had when I began to speak this word, it is now gone since I began to speak this word. May we call this life that is ever posting towards death? Do we what we can, & could we do yet more, all we do, and all we could do, were to no purpose to prolong our life: see how we shore this ruinous house of our body with food, with raiment, with exercise, with sleep, yet nothing can preserve it from returning to its earth; we go, and we go suddenly, witness those two Caesars, who put off themselves whilst they put on their shoes; Fabius (styled Maximus for his exploits, and Cunctator for his delaying) yet could not delay death, till notice might be taken he was sick: but how many examples in this kind have we daily amongst us? you know how some lately have gone safe to bed, and yet in the morning were found dead and cold: others in health and mirth laid down by their wives, and yet ere mid-night found breathless by their sides. What need we further instances? You see how we go before we know where we are; the life that we had, what is it but a nothing? the life that we have, what is it but a moment? and all that we can have, what is it but a fleeting wind, begun and done in a trice of time, before we can imagine it. In a word, our Sun now sets, our day is done: ask Jacob (the Clock-keeper of our time) this Text tells the hour and now struck, you hear the sound? our days are gone, few and evil they have been.]

The Conclusion: Occasioned by the death of CHARLES BRIDGEMAN, who deceased about the age of twelve, in the year of our Lord 1632. he was a most pious son of a most pious mother, both now with God.

HEre I thought to have finished my Text and Sermon; But here is a sad accident to confirm my saying, and whilst I speak of him, what can I say of his state, his person, his birth, his life, of all he had, and of all he was, but that they have been.

Sweet rose, cropped in its blossom, no sooner budded, but blasted; how shall we remember his days, to forget our sorrows? no sooner had he learnt to speak, but (contrary to our custom) he betook him to his prayers; so soon had grace quelled the corruption of his nature, that being yet an infant, you might see his proneness to learn, nay, sometimes to teach them this duty, who waited on to teach him his devotion: not long after he was set to school, where he learned by book, what before he had learned by heart: the sweet care, good disposition, sincere religion, which were in this child, all may remember which cast but their eyes upon him. O God, how hast thou bereaved us of this Gem? Sure it is (as it was said of another) for this cause only, that it might shine in heaven. But this was but the beginning of his days, now they are past, they have been.]

Go a little further, we left him at school, but how learned he Christ, and him crucified? this was the knowledge taught him by the Spirit of God in a wonderful manner. Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings hast thou, O God, ordained strength. To consider again his religious words, his upright actions, his hearty devotions, his fear of God, all then concluded, as they did of John, What manner of child shall this be? No question the grace of God was with him. If I should instance in any of these his frequency in prayer, his reading of Scripture, his reasoning with others to get knowledge to himself, we may wonder at God's power in this child's poor weakness: Excuse me whiles I tell nothing but truths, and I hope they will tend to our own instruction. In the morning he would not stir out of doors, before he had poured out his prayers; at noon he would not eat any meat, before he had given the Lord thanks; at night he would not lie down on his bed, before he had kneeled down on his knees: we may remember those times, when sometimes that he had forgotten this duty, no sooner had he been in bed, but up he would have got again, and so kneeling down on his bare knees, covered with no garment but his linens, he would ask God forgiveness for that sin of forgetfulness; neither have his brothers escaped without his reprehension: for had they eat any meal or meat without a grace, his check was usual; Dare you do thus? unless God be merciful unto us, this bit of bread might choke us. The wise sentences, the religious words, which often dropt from his mouth like honey can we remember them, and not grieve at the death of him that spake them? What comfort had we in those days? What sorrow have we to think those days are done? Surely we cannot speak it without bitterness of soul, they are gone, they have been.

Thus he lived: will you know how he died? First, a lingering sickness seized upon him, against which to comfort him, one tells him of possessions that must fall to his portion: And what are they? (said he) I had rather have the Kingdom of Heaven, then a thousand such inheritances. Thus he minds Heaven; and God, so minding him, presently sent him his sickness that should summon him thither. And now how should I repeat his words with the life that he spake them dying? No sooner had God struck his body with that fatal sickness, but he asks, and needs would know his souls estate: I have heard of the soul (said he) but what is the soul? the mind? he questions, and questioning answers, better (I fear) then many, too many gray headed amongst us; but the answer given, how the soul consisted of the Will and the Understanding, he says, he is satisfied, and now understands better then he did before. Another comes to him, and then he begins another question, now he knows the soul, he desires yet to know further, How his soul may be saved? O blessed soul, how wisely couldst thou question for thine own souls good! The answer given, by faith applying Christ's merits: he heard it, and had it, anon telling them, who before had taught it him. Resolved in these questions, he questions no further, but will now answer them, that go about to question him: One asks him, whether he had rather live or die, he gives the answer, and not without Paul's reason, I desire to die (said he) that I might go to my Savior. O blessed Spirit, bow didst thou inspire into this child thy wisdom and goodness! This done, his pain begins again to afflict him, and this occasions another thus to question him, whether he would rather still endure those pains or forsake his Christ? Alas (said he) I know not what to say as a child, for these pains might stagger a strong man, but I will strive to endure the best I can. Upon this he presently calls to mind that Martyr, who being in prison, the night before his burning put his finger in the candle, to know how he could endure the fire; O (said he) had I lived then, I would have run through the fire to have gone to Christ. Sweet resolution of a silly child! who can hear, and not wonder? wonder, and not desire to hear that he may wonder still? Blessed child, hadst thou lived that we might have wondered at thy wisdom! but his days were determined, and now is the number turned to this poor cypher, they are not, they have been.

I cannot leave him yet, his sickness lasts long, and at least three days before his death, he prophesies his departure, and how strange a prophecy? not only that he must die, but foretelling the very day, On the Lord's day (said he) look to me. Neither was this a word of course, which you may guess by his often repetition, every day asking till the day came indeed, What, is Sunday come? At last the looked-for day came on, and no sooner had the Sun beautified that morning with his light, but he falls into a trance; What (think ye) meant his blessed soul, whilst the body itself used such an action? his eyes were fixed, his face cheerful, his lips smiling, his hands and arms clasping in a bow, as if he would have received some blessed Angel, that there was at hand to receive his soul; but he comes to himself, and tells them how he saw the sweetest boy that ever eyes beheld, and bids them, Be of good cheer, for he must presently go with him. One standing near, as now suspecting his time of dissolution, bids him say, Lord, into thy hands I commend my spirit; Yes (said he) Into thy hands, Lord, I commit my spirit which is thy due; for why? thou hast redeemed it, O Lord my God most true. Who will not believe this child now sings in Heaven, that so soon had learned this David's Psalm on earth? I cannot hold myself, nor will I hold you long; but how may I omit his heavenly ejaculations? Beloved, I beseech you pardon me whilst I speak his words, and I will promise you to speak no word, but the very same formally which were his own: Pray, pray, pray, nay yet pray, and the more prayers the better all prospers: God is the best Physician: into his hands I commend my spirit: O Lord Jesus receive my soul. Now close mine eyes, forgive me father, mother, brothers, sister, all the world. Now I am well, my pain is almost gone, my joy is at hand, Lord have mercy on me, O Lord receive my soul unto thee. Where am I whilst I speak these words? Blessed Saint, now thou singest in Heaven, God hath bid thee welcome, the Angels are hugging thee, the Saints rejoice with thee, this day is the Crown set on thy head, this day is the Palm of victory in thy hand now art thou arrayed in the shining robes of Heaven, and all the Host do triumph at thy coronation. Sweet soul, how am I ravished to think upon thee! What joy is this? The Patriarchs salute thee, the Prophets welcome thee, the Apostles hug thee, all hands clap for joy, all harps warble, all hearts are merry and glad. O thou Creator of men and Angels, help us all to Heaven, that when our days have been] we may all meet together in thy blessed Kingdom.

I have done: turn back by the same thread that led you through this labyrinth, and you shall have in two words the sum of this whole Text.

The time of our Lease what is it but our Life? what is this Life, but a number of few days? what are these days, but a world full of evil? But a life, but days, but few, but evil; can we add anymore? Yes, Life is life howsoever we live, and better you think to have a bad lease in being, then our life to be quite extinguished; nay, be not deceived, this life is but death, the days that we spend, they are past and done, few and evil they have been. Thus ends the Text with the expiration of our Lease: yet is not all done, when we loose this life we have another freehold prepared in Heaven, and this is not leased, but purchased; not for a life, but inheritance; not for days but forever: Cross but the words of my Text, and many and happy shall the ages of thy life be in Heaven, forever and ever. Amen.

FINIS.

Deaths. Arrest.

LUKE 12.20.

This night thy soul shall be required of thee.

Mans Body (we say) is closed up within the Elements, his Blood in his Body, his Spirits in his Blood, his Soul in his Spirits and God or Satan in his Soul. Who holds the possession we may guess in life, but then is it most apparent when we come to death: The tree may bend East, or West, or North, or South; but as it falleth so it lieth: Our affections may look up or down, towards heaven or hell; but as we die we receive our doom, and then whose we are shall be fully made manifest to all the world. There is a parable of poor Lazarus, whose life was nothing but a catalogue of miseries, his body full of sores, his mind full of sorrows; what spectacle could we think more pitiful, whose best dainties were but broken crumbs, and his warmest lodging but the rich man's gates? Here is a parable of a certain rich man, who enjoys (or at least purposeth) a delicious fare, he hath lands verse. 16. fruits, verse. 17. buildings, verse. 18. and if this be the Inventorie, what is the sum? see it collected in the verse succeeding, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years; now live at ease, Eat, drink, and take thy pastime. These two estates thus different, how should they be but of divers tenures? No man can serve God and Mammon. See Lazarus dying, and the Angels carry him in Abraham's bosom. See this rich man dying, and they (that is, devils) require his soul. God receives one, and his soul is in heaven; Satan takes the other, and drags down his soul to hell; he is comforted that received pains, and thou art tormented that wast full of ease: this is the doom, and that he may undergo this, death now gives the summons, This night thy soul shall be required of thee.

The Text we may christen Deaths Arrest, it is we that offend his Majesty of heaven, and his precepts are given unto Death to attach our souls. See here a president, a rich man taken on a sudden, who must instantly appear before the Judge of heaven: when? this night.] What? thy soul.] Why? it is required.] Of whom? of thee.]

Or if this will not find the offender, see yet a more narrow search, every word is like some dark closet, therefore we will open the windows that you may have full light. This Text is Deaths Arrest, which as it must be executed, so it admits of no other time but This] This what? this day, whilst the Sun gives light to the world, and the light gives pleasure to the eye? this were some comfort: no, but then suddenly whilst all sleep securely, not This day but This night.] And what, this night? Is it to attach the body of some great personage, whose looks might affrighten Officers had they come by day? No, let his body rot in dust, whilst the Soul must answer his defaults: it is not thy body; 'tis thy soul.] And what, of his soul? Is this a subject liable to arrests? rather can they beg it at his hands, or will he yield it at their fair entreaties? no, it is neither beg'd nor entreated; but by virtue of God's Writ, it is required.] And how required? of his sureties bound for his good appearing? he hath many friends, and all, either have or would have entered bonds: no, he must go without bail or main-prize, it is not required of his sureties, but himself; not of others, but of thee] is thy soul this night required.

You hear the Texts harmony, of each string we will give a touch, and first note the time, this night.

This.]

[Doctrine.] NO other but This? were it a fortnight, a seven-night, any but This] night, and his griefs were lessened; the news is more heartless in that it comes more sudden. You may observe, Then are the greatest losses when they come on us by heaps, and without fear or suspicion of any such matter. Here was a man swimming in his fullness, and a sudden death robs him of all his treasures. To give you a full view, see his possessions, and how great was the loss, because of the suddenness: This] night.

[1] First, those goods, whereof he boasted, are now confiscate; not a penny, not a dram, not a mite shall be left him, save only a token of remembrance (I mean his winding-sheet) which he carries along with him to his grave.

[2] Secondly, his goods and grounds both were took from him at his death; he that commanded so much of earth must now have no more earth to pleasure him but a grave; what a change was this? his grounds were fertile, and they brought forth plenteously, but a blast of death hath struck both the fruit and ground; and nothing is now left him but a barren Tomb.

[3] Thirdly, his lands and houses both went together. You may guess that great demesns must have stately Halls: we read of his building, and especially of his Barns; when these were too little for his store, he tells us, he will pull them down, and he will build greater. He never thinks of any little room in the bowels of the poor. Was his harvest so great that his barns would not hold it? Whence came the blessing but from God? How is it then he forgets God that bestowed this blessing? It is written, When ye reap the harvest of the Land, ye shall not reap every corn of your field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of the harvest. How? not reap it? not gather it? what then? why, Thou shalt leave them for the poor, and for the stranger: I am the Lord your God, Levite. 19.9. When Ruth came to glean in the fields of Boaz, that good Master commands his servants, Let her gather among the sheaves, and do not rebuke her. Had this Worldling been so pitiful to the poor, his barns might have stood, himself might have lived, his soul have been saved. But now what a strange lot happens on him? his Halls, Houses, Barns, Buildings, all run round in a dance of Death before his eyes.

[4] Fourthly, his house and friends both left him when death came: The Parable is common: A man hath three friends, two whereof he loved most entirely, the third he made no account of: this man being sent for to come before his King, he desires his first friend to go with him, but he could not, only he would give him something for his journey: He desires his second friend to go with him, but he would not, only he would bring him a little piece of his way: When both these forsook him, he goes to the last, which before he esteemed least, and this friend was the party that went with him to the King, and answered for him in all his causes: This is the case of every man dying; the King our Judge sends death his Serjeant to summon you to your judgment. Come to your first friends, (I mean your riches) alas! they cannot go with you, but give you a sheet as necessary for your journey: Come to your second friends (I mean your acquaintance) alas! they will not go with you, but bring you to your graves, and there leave you to yourselves: Come to your last friends, which you now least think of (I mean your Consciences) and you shall find that is the truest friend that will go with you to the Judge, answer for you to the King, and either acquit you, or condemn you; bring you to the gates of heaven, or deliver you to the goal of hell. Have a care of your Consciences, if you mean to speed well at this day: how blessed a man had this Worldling been, if only a good conscience had accompanied him to the Judge of heaven? but now when death summons him, there is no friend to solicit, no Advocate to plead no man to speak one word in his souls behalf: it is his bad conscience keeps him company, and though all others leave him, he can devise no means to shake this from him.

[5] Fifthly, there is a jewel irrevocable, of which this sudden death robs him, I mean his time, and what a loss was this? all his goods, grounds, barns, buildings, were they more worth than the world itself, yet were they not able to restore one minute of his time: if this could be purchased, what a rate would he give for a little respite? nothing is now so precious as a piece of time, which before by months and years he lavishly mis-spent: they that pass away time with mirth and pastime, shall one day see to their grief what a loss they have; now we revel it out, dally it away, use all means and occasions to make it short enough; but when this golden shower is gone, and those opportunities of salvation lost by negligence, then we may wish, and wish again, Oh had we a little time, a little space to repent! Imagine that this worldling (whom now you must suppose to lie frying in hell flames) were dispensed with for a little time, to live here again on earth amongst us; would but the Lord vouchsafe him one hour of a new trial, a minute season of a gracious visitation, oh how highly would he prize, how eagerly would he apprehend, with what infinite watching, praying, fasting, would he improve that short time, that he might repent him? I know not how effectually this may work an your hearts, but I am fully persuaded, if any damned creature had but the happiness to hear this Sermon, you should see how his very heart would bleed within him; bleed said I? nay, break and fall asunder in his breast like drops of water. Oh with what inflamed attention would he hear and listen? with what insatiable grasping would he lay hold on Christ? with what streaming tears would he water his cheeks, as if he would melt himself, like Niobe, into a fountain? Blessed God! how fond are foolish men that never think of this till their time be lost? we that are alive have only this benefit of opportunity, and if we neglect it, a day will come (we know not how soon) that we shall be past it, and cannot recover it, no not one hour, if we would give a thousand, ten thousand, worlds for it. What can I say? reflect on yourselves, you that have souls to save; you have yet a little time (and the time present is that time) what then, but so use it now, as when you are gone, you need not with grief wish you here again?

Sixthly, yet more loss, and that is the loss of losses, the loss of his soul; his riches, lands, houses, friends, time, and all were nothing to his soul. This is that Paragon, Peere, Rose, and Spouse of our well-beloved Christ. How many a tear shed he to save it? what groans cries, prayers, tears, and blood, poured he before God, that he might redeem it from the jaws of Satan? and is this lost notwithstanding all this labor? O sweet Jesu! what a loss is this? thou wast born, lived, died, and that a shameful death, (the death of the cross) and all this suffering was to save poor souls: yet see a soul here lost, and the blood of God, though able, not effectual to redeem it. Whose heart would not melt into blood, that but knew this misery? Suppose you could see the soul of this wretched worldling, no sooner had it left the body, but immediately was it seized on by infernal fiends, now lies it on a bed of fire, tortured, tormented scourged, and scorched in those furious flames; there his conscience stings him, his sorrow gripes him, his pain so handles him, that he cries, and roars, Woe, woe, and alas evermore. Who now for shadows of short pleasures, would incur these sorrows of eternal pains? In this world we can weep and wail for a loss of trifles: an house, a field, an Ox took from us, is enough to cruciate us; but how shall we bewail the loss of a soul, which no sooner plunged into that pit of horror, but it shall feel a punishment without pity, misery without mercy, sorrow without succor, crying without comfort, torment without ease, a world of mischief, without all measure or redress? Such is the loss of this man's silly soul, whilst he was cheering it with an home-bred solace; Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years: God whispers in his ears, and tells him other news: What? of his soul: how? it is required: when? this night: a fearful sound unlookt-for message, speedy dispatch, no more delays, nor days, only this night, for then must his soul be taken from him.

[7] You see all his losses; and now to contract them, there is one grief more then all, that all is lost on a sudden. Losses that come by succession are better born with, but all on a sudden is the worst of all; yet such is the misery of man, when he goes, all goes with him, and he and all pass away on a sudden: As in the days of Noah, they ate, and drunk, married, and gave in marriage, and knew nothing till the flood came, and took them all away; so is the coming of the Son of man, Matth. 24.38. How many have been thus took tripping in their wickedness? Belshazzar in his mirth, Herod in his pride, the Philistines in their banqueting, the men of Ziklag in their feasting, Jobs children in their drunkenness, the Sodomites in their filthiness, the Steward in his security, this Churl in his plenty: miserable end, when men end in their sin. Call to mind this (O my soul) and tremble: sleep not in sin, lest the sleep of death surprise thee: The hour is certain, in nothing but uncertainties; for sure thou must die, yet thou knowest not on what day, nor in what place, nor how thou shalt be disposed when death must be entertained. Do you not see most die, whiles they are most busy how to live? he that once thought but to begin to take his ease, was fain that very night (whether he would or no) to make his end: would you have thought this? he but flourished like a green bay tree, his thoughts full of mirth, his soul of ease, but I passed by, and loe he was gone: gone, whether? his body to the grave, his soul to hell, in the midst of his jollity, God threats destruction, Devils execution, death expedition, and thus like a Swan he sings his funerals. There is that saith, I have found rest, and now will I eat continually of my goods, and yet he knoweth not what time shall come upon him, and that he must leave those things to others, and die, Eccus 11.19. The higher our Babel-tower of joy is raised, the nearer it is to ruin and confusion. Sodom, in the heat of their sins, had that shower of fire poured on their heads: Nebuchadnezzar, in the height of his pride, became suddenly a beast, that ruled before as a King: once for all, here was a man solacing, singing warbling out pleasant songs of ease and pastime; but (O the misery) in the midst of his note here is a sudden stop; he dreams of longs and larges, he hears of briefes and semi-briefes, no longer a day, but this very night, and then shall thy soul be taken from thee.

See here the many losses of one man, his goods, his grounds, his houses, his friends, his time, his soul, and all on a sudden, whilst the word is spoken, this] night.

[Use. 1] Our neighbors fire, cannot but give warning of approaching flames. Remember his judgment, thine also may be likewise: unto me yester-day, and unto thee today. Whose turn is next God only knows, who knows all. Is not madness in the hearts of men whiles they live? In the least suspicion of loosing worldly riches, all watch and break their sleep; you shall see men work, and toil, and fear, and care, and all too little to prevent a loss; but for all these losses which are linked together, our riches, lands, houses, friends, time, and soul, and all we have, there is few or none regards them: O that men are so careful in trifles, and so negligent in matters of a great importance! It is storied of Archimedes, that when Syracuse was taken, he only was sitting secure at home, and drawing circles with his compass in the dust. Thus some we have, that when the eternal salvation of their souls is in question, they are handling their dust, nothing but suites or money-matters are their daily objects: but (alas) what will your goods or grounds, or houses, or friends avail you, when death comes? Where did ever that man dwell, that was comforted by any of these, in that last and sorest conflict? Give me a man amongst you, that spends the span of his transitory life in grasping gold, gathering wealth, growing great, enriching his posterity, without any endeavor, or care to treasure up grace against that fatal hour; and I dare certainly tell him, whensoever he comes to his deaths bed, he shall find nothing but an horrible confusion, extremest horror and heaviness of heart; nay, his soul shall presently down into the kingdom of darkness, and there lie and fry in everlasting fires. Nor speak I only to the covetous (though my text seem more directly to point at them) but whosoever thou art that goest on daily in a course of sin, in the fear of God unbethink thee of mortality: some of you may think I speak not to you, and others, I speak not to you; the truth is I speak to you all, but to you more especially that to this day have sinned with delight, but never as yet felt the smart for sin upon your souls or consciences: O beloved! this is it I call for, and must call for till you feel a change, a thorough-change in you: would but some of you at this present examine you consciences, and say, whether have I not been inordinate in drunkenness, or wantonness, or covetousness? whether have I not sworn an oath, or told a lie, or dissembled in my heart, when I have spoken? O who can say amongst you, I am clean, I am clean? and assure yourselves if you are guilty, you must either feel hearts grief, or you can never be provided for deaths dismal arrest. If you were but sensible of sin, if you felt but the weight and horror of God's wrath for sin, I am verily persuaded you would not take a quiet sleep in your beds for fear, and horror, and heaviness of heart: what is it but madness of a man to lie down in ease upon a feather bed, and to lodge in his bosom that deadly enemy, sin?

But (horror of horrors!) what if this night, whilst you sleep in your sin, death should arrest you on your beds? This I tell you is no wonder, are not sudden deaths common and ordinary among the sons of men? How many have we heard that went to bed well over night, for ought any man could tell, and yet were found dead in the morning? I will not say carried away out of their beds, and cast into hell fire; whether it be so or no, the Lord our God knows: but howsoever it is with them, if we for our parts commit sin, and repent not thereof by crying, and sobbing, and sorrowing for sin; it may be this night, (and that is not long to) you may sleep your last in this world, and then shall your souls be hurried by Devils to that infernal lake, whence there is no redemption. O beloved! O wretch, whosoever thou art! Canst thou possibly sleep in such a case as this? Canst thou go to bed with a conscience laden with sin? Canst thou take any sleep (which is the brother of death) when thou liest now in danger of eternal death? Consider, I pray, what space, what distance, how far off is thy soul from death, from hell, from eternity? no more but a breath, one breath and no more; no more but a step, one step and more: O beloved! were not this lamentable, that someone of us that now are standing, or sitting, should this night sleep his last, and tomorrow have his body brought to be buried; yea, and before tomorrow morning have his soul (which the Lord forbid) cast from his bed of feathers, to a bed of fire? and yet alas! alas! if any of us this night die in his sin, or in a state unregenerate, thus will it be with him whosoever he be; tomorrow may his body lie could under earth, and his soul lodge in hell with this miserable rich man.

[Use. 2] But let me speak to you, of whom I hope better things; it is good counsel for you all to expect death every day, and by this means, death foreseen cannot possibly be sudden; no, it is he only dyes suddenly, that dyes unpreparedly, Watch therefore, saith our Savior, be ever in a readiness: and finally, that this rich man may be your warning, you that tender your souls, learn that lessen of our Savior; Lay not up for yourselves treasure upon earth, where moth and rust doth corrupt, and where thieves break thorough and steal: but lay up for yourselves treasures in Heaven, where neither moth nor rust doth corrupt, and where thieves do not break thorough, nor steal: Mat. 6.19, 20. You will say, What treasures are those? I answer: These treasures are those stocks of grace that will last forever, it is that circumspect walking, Ephes. 5.15. that fervency of spirit, Rom. 12.11. that zeal of good works, Tit. 2, 14. that purity, which S^t. John makes a property of every true hearted professor, 1 Joh. 3.3. In a word, it is the work, the life, the power of that prayer, that the rest of our life hereafter may be pure and holy; these are heavenly hoards indeed, O that we would treasure up such provision against the day of calamity! If while it is called today, we would make our peace with his heavenly Highness, by an humble continued exercise of repentance, if in this time of grace we would purchase God's favor, and those rarest jewells of faith and a good conscience, if now before we appear at the dreadful Tribunal, we would make God and his Angels our friends in the Court of Heaven, O then how blessed would our deaths be to us? came it never so suddenly, still should death find us ready, and if ready, no matter how suddenly, yea though it were this] this night.

I have broke ope the writ, and you see when it must be served this] night; but in this Quando there is both suddenness, and sadness, it is not this day, but this night] Let this] end this days discourse, and the next day we will lay open the nights dark sadness: it is a dismal time, and God give us grace so to provide, that we may be ready with oil in our lamps, and enter with our Savior into his blessed Kingdom.

Night.]

HE sins all day, and dyes at night, and why at night? This you know is frequent, and there is reason, most are begot, and born, and therefore die at night: but we must further then the lists of nature, this night was more then ordinary, as being the fittest time to aggravate his grief: weigh but the circumstances.

[1] First, It was a night of darkness, and this may increase the horror of his judgment: think but what a fear seized on the Egyptians, when no power of the fire must give them light, nor might the clear flames of the stars lighten the horrible night that fell upon them. The Husbandmen, the Shepherds, the work-men, all were bound with one chain of darkness, No man saw another, neither rose up from the place where he was for three days, Exod. 10.23. Was not this fearful darkness? you may guess it by the effects, they were troubled, and terrified, and swooned, as though their own souls should betray them. Whether it were an hissing wind, or a sweet noise of birds, among the spreading branches, or a pleasing fall of waters running violently, or a terrible sound of stones, or the running of skipping beasts, or the noise of cruel beasts, or the echo that answereth again in the hollow mountains, these fearful things made them to swoon for fear: And if thus the Egyptians, how was it with this Worldling? a darkness seized on him that engendered a thousand times more intolerable torments. This was the image of that darkness which should afterward receive him, and yet was he unto himself more grievous then the darkness. It was not an outward, but an utter darkness, not only to be not seen, but to be felt and feared. Imagine then what visions, what sounds, what sights, what sudden fires appeared unto him? Unhappy Worldling, look round about thee; although it be dark, here is something to be seen: above is the angry Judge, beneath is the burning lake, before is gloomy darkness, behind is infallible death, on thy right and left hand a legion of evil angels, expecting every moment to receive the prey. Here is a sight indeed, able to break the very heart-strings of each seer. If some have lost their wits, by means of some dreadful sight; yea, if the very suspicion of Devils have caused many men to tremble, and the hairs of their heads to stand staring upright; what then was the fear and terror of this man, when so many dreadful, horrible hellish monsters stood round about him, now ready to receive him? O ye sons of men, stand in awe and sin not, commune with your own heart, and in your chamber, and be still: Will not this fear you from your sins? Suppose then you lay on your beds of death, were the Judge in his throne, your souls at the Barre, ths accuser at your elbows, and hell ready open to shut her mouth upon you: O then, how would you curse yourselves, and bewail your sins? What horrible visions would appear to you in the dark? horrible indeed? In so much (saith one) that were there no other punishment than the appearing of Devils, you would rather burn to ashes, than endure their sights. Good God, that any Christian should live in this danger, and yet never heed it till he sees its terror! How many have gone thus fearfully out of this miserable world? I know not what you have seen, but there is very few which have not heard of many, too many, in this case: What were Judas thoughts, when he strangled himself that his bowels gushed out again? What were Cain's visions, when he ran like a vagabond roaring and crying, Whosoever findeth me shall slay me? What are all their affrights that cry when they are a dying, they see spirits and Devils flying about them, coming for them, roaring against them, as if an hell entered into them, before themselves could enter it? I dare instance in no other but this wretched miser: What a night was that to him, when on a sudden a darkness seized on him, that never after left him? Thus many go to bed, that never rise again, till they be wakened by the fearful sound of the last Trumpet: and was not this a terror? whose heart doth not quake? whose flesh doth not tremble? whose senses are not astonished whilst we do but think on it? And then what were the sufferings of himself in his person? He might cry, and roar, and wail, and weep, yet there is none to help him; his heart-strings break, the blessed Angels leave him, Devils still expect him, and now the Judge hath pronounced his sentence, This night, in the dark, they must seiz upon him.

[2] Yet this was not all the horror, it was a night both of darkness and drowsiness, or security in sin. He that reads the life of this man, may well wonder at the fearful end of so fair beginnings: walk into his fields, and there his cattle prosper; come nearer to his house, and there his barns swell with corn; enter into his gates, and there every table stands richly furnished; step yet into his chambers, and you may imagine doun-beds curtain'd with gold hangings: nay, yet come nearer, we will draw the curtains, and you shall view the person; he had toiled all day, and now see how securely he takes his rest, this night, he dreams golden dreams, of ease, of mirth, of pastime, (as all our worldly pleasures are but waking dreams) but stay a while and see the issue: just like a man who starting out of sleep, sees his house on fire, his goods ransacked, his family murdered, himself near lost, and not one to pity him, when the very thrusting in of an arm might deliver him: this, and no other, was the case of this dying miser: at that night while his senses were most drowsy, most secure, death comes in the dark, and arrests him on his bed: Awake, rich Cormorant! what charms have lulled thee thus asleep? Canst thou slumber whilst death breaks down this house thy body, to rob thee of that jewel thy soul? What a deep, dull, drowsy, dead sleep is this? O fool! this night is thy soul assaulted, see death approaching, Devils hovering, God's justice threatening, canst thou yet sleep? and are thine eyes yet heavy? Behold, the hour is at hand, and thy soul must be delivered into the hands of thine enemies: heavy eyes! he sleeps still, his care all day had cast him into so dead a sleep this night, that nothing can warn him until death awake him, That thief is most dangerous that comes at night, such a thief is death, a thief that steals men, which then is most busy whilst we are most drowsy, most secure in sin; Hark the sluggard that lulls himself in his sins, Yet a little more sleep, a little more slumber, is not his destruction sudden, and poverty coming on him like an armed man? Prov. 6.11. Watch (saith our Savior) for you know not when the master of the house cometh, at even, or at midnight, at the cock-crow, or in the morning, lest coming suddenly he should find you sleeping Mark 13.35. Was not this the wretchedness of the foolish virgins? how sweetly could they slumber? how soundly could they sleep until mid-night? they never wake, nor so much as dream to buy oil for their lamps: imagine then how fearful were those summons to these souls, Behold the Bridegroom, go ye out to meet him. Sudden fears of all others are most dangerous: was it not a fearful waking to this rich man, when no sooner that he opened his eyes, but he saw death's ugliness afore his face? what a sight was this? at his door enters the King of fear, accompanied with all his abhorred horrors, and stinging dread: on his curtains he may read his sins, arrayed and armed in their grisliest forms, and with their fieriest stings; about his bed are the powers of darkness, now presenting to his view his damnable state, his deplorable misery: what can he do that is thus beset with such a world of woeful work, and hellish rage? his tongue falters, his breath shortens, his throat rattles, he would not watch, and now cannot resist; the cry is made, the mid-night come, God sounds destruction, and thus runs the proclamation, This night so drowsy, thy soul must be taken from thee.

[3] And yet more horror; it was a night of drowsiness and sadness. How is he but sad, when he sees the night coming, and his last day decaying? Read but the copy of this rich man's Will, and see how he deals all he hath about him; he bequeaths his garments to the moth, his gold to rust, his body to the grave, his soul to hell, his goods and lands he knows not to whom, Whose shall these things be? Here is the man that made such mirth all day, and now is he forced to leave all he hath this night. It is the fruit of merry lives to give sad farwells. You that sport yourselves, and spoil others; that rob God in his members, and treasure up your own damnations, will not death make sorry hearts for your merry nights? a night will come as sad as sadness in her sternest looks, and then what a lot will befall you? O that men are such cruel Caitiffs to their own souls! Is this a life (think ye) fit for the servants of our God, revelling, swearing, drinking, railing? what other did this miser? he would eat, and drink, and revel, and sing, and then came fear as desolation; and his destruction on a sudden as a whirl-wind: If this be our life, how should we escape his death? Alas for the silly mirth that now we pleasure in! you may be sure a night will come that must pay for all, and then shall your pleasures vanish, your griefs begin, and your numberless sins (like so many envenomed stings) run into your damned souls, and pierce them through with everlasting sorrow: away with this fond, foolish, sottish vanity, The end of mirth is heaviness saith Solomon, Prov. 14.13. What will the sons and daughters of pleasure do then? all those sweet delights shall be as scourges and Scorpions for your naked souls, Then (though too late) will you lamentably cry out, What hath pride profited us? or what profit hath the pomp of riches brought us? all those things are passed away as a shadow, or as a Poste that passeth by: Look on this man as he lies on his bed of death, here is neither smile nor dimple, All the daughters of music are brought low. His voice is hoarse, his lips pale, his cheeks wan, his nostrils run out, his eyes sink into his head, and all the parts and members of his body now lose their office to assist him: Is this the merry man that made such pastime? Sweet God! what a change is this? Instead of sweet smell there is a stench, instead of a girdle a rent, instead of well-set hair baldness, instead of beauty burning; instead of mirth mourning and lamentation, weeping, and wailing, and gnashing of teeth. Must not sadness seize on that soul which incurs this doom? Here is a malefactor stands at bar, indited by the name of Fool, charged with the guilt of treason, condemned by the Judge of heaven, and this night (the saddest that ever he saw) is that fearful execution, that his soul is taken.

[4] And yet more horror: It was a night of sin, and this doth increase the sorrow. How dear in the sight of the Lord is the death of his Saints? and we may say on the contrary, How abominable in the sight of the Lord is the death of the wicked? Was not this a grief to be took thus tripping in his wickedness? even now whilst he was busily plotting his ease and pastime, death stands at his door, and over-hears all his plots and projects. It was a death to his soul to be took in his sin: hear how he roars and cries, O that I had lived so virtuously as I should; had I embraced the often inspirations of God's blessed Spirit; had I followed his Laws, obeyed his Commands, attended to his will how sweet and pleasant would they now be unto me? We and alas that I had not foreseen this day, what have I done, but for a little pleasure, a fleeting vanity, lost a Kingdom, purchased damnation? O beloved! what think ye of yourselves, whilst you hear this voice? you sit here as senseless of this judgment, as the seats, the pillars, the walls, the dust nay, as the dead bodies themselves on which you tread: but suppose (and it were a blessed meditation) you that are so fresh and frolic at this day, that spend it merrily, use it profanely swearing, revelling, singing, dancing; what if this night, while you are in your sin, the hand of death should arrest you? Could I speak with you on your death-beds, I am sure I should find you in another case: how? but sorrowing, grieving, roaring, that your time were lost; and these words not heeded, whiles the time well served? how would you tear your hair, gnash your teeth, bite your nails, seek all means possibly to annihilate yourselves? and can nothing warn you before death seize on you? take heed, if you go on in sin, the next step is damnation. It was the Apostles advice, Now it is high time to wake out of sleep, for now is our salvation nearer, then when we believed, Rom. 13.11. If this wretched man had observed the present time, how happy had he been this hour of his departure? But as Officers take malefactors, drinking or drabbing; so is he nearest danger, when deepest in the mire of pleasure. Look at all those that are gone before us, and which of them thought their end so near, while they lived so merry? I must needs tell you, there is a fire, a worm, a sting, a darkness, an hell provided for all wicked wretches, and there most certainly must you be this night, if you die this day in your natural state of sin. Lord! that men should be so strangely bewitched by the Prince of the air, as for the momentary enjoyment of some glorious miseries, bitter-sweet pleasures, heart-vexing riches, desperately and willfully to abandon God, and to cast themselves headlong into the jaws of Satan. Such a prodigious madness seized on this Worldling, he sings, he revels, he dallies, then dies. Thus greatest evils arise out of greatest joys, as the ears with vehement sounds, and the eyes with brighter objects, so many by felicity have lost both their sense and being. Gallus dies in the act of pleasure, Ishbosheth dies in the midst of sleep, the Israelites die in their day of lust, this Worldling dies in that night of sin, even then on a sudden his soul is taken.

[5] And yet more horror, it was a night of death, and this was the worst of all: the darkness, drowsiness, sadness, sin, all were nothing to this, all nothing in themselves, if death had not followed: this is that most terrible of all terribles, all fears, griefs, suspicions, pains, as so many small brooks, are swallowed up, and drowned in this Ocean of misery. Now rich man! what sayest thou to thy barns, buildings, riches, lands? Do these pleasure thee in this thy extreme and dying agony? Thou liest this night on thy departing bed, burdened with the heavy load of thy former trespasses, the pangs come sore and sharp upon thee, thy breast pants, thy pulse beats short, thy breath itself smells of earth and rottenness: whither wilt thou go for a little ease or succor? what help canst thou have in thy heaps of gold, or hoard of wealth? should we bring them to thy bed, (as we read of one dying, commanded that his golden vessels and silver plate should be set before him, which looking on, he promised to his soul, it should have them all, on condition of his stay with him, but the remedy being silly, at last most desperately he commends it to the Devil, seeing it would not stay in his body, and so gave up the ghost.) Alas, these trifling treasures can no more deliver thee from the arrest of that inexorable Serjeant, then can an handful of dust. Wretched men! what shall be your thoughts, when you come to this miserable case? full sad and heavy thoughts (Lord thou knowest): you may lie upon your beds, like wild bulls in a net, full of the fury of the Lord: In the morning thou shalt say, would God it were evening; and at even thou shalt say, would God it were morning: for the fear of thine heart wherewith thou shalt fear, and for the sight of thine eyes which thou shalt see, Deut. 28.67. Here is the terror of that night of death, when you may wish with all your hearts, that you had never been born; if the Lord once let loose the cords of your conscience, what account will you make of crowns, of possessions? all these will be so far from healing the wound, that they will turn rather into fiery Scorpions, for your further torments. Now, now, now is the dismal time of death, what will you do? whither will you go? to whom will you pray? the Angels are offended, and they will not guard you; God is dishonored, and he will not hear you; only the Devil had your service, and only hell must be your wages. Consider this, ye that forget God, lest ye be torn in pieces, and there be none to deliver you: It is cruel for your souls thus to suffer, to be torn, and torn in pieces, and so torn in pieces that none may deliver you. Better this Worldling had been a worm, a toad, an adder, any venomous creature, then so to live, and thus to have died; yet hither it is come, his sickness is remediless, his riches comfortless, his torments easeless, still he must suffer, and there is none to deliver, he is torn, torn in pieces, and none may deliver him. What need you more, now we are come to this period? his glass is run, his Sun is set, his day is finished, and now this night, the very night of Death, his soul is required, and received of him.

Lo here the dismal, dreadful, terrible time of this man's departure, it was in the night, a night of darkness, drowsiness, sadness sin, death, and destruction.

[Use. 1] Who will not provide each day against this fearful night? howsoever we pass away our time in sin, we must of necessity, ere it be long, lie gasping for breath upon our dying beds, there shall we grapple hand to hand with the utmost powers of death and darkness: what should we do then, but sow our seed while the seed-time lasteth? we have yet a day, and how short this day is, God only knows: be sure the night cometh wherein none can work, and then what a fearful time will come upon us? I know there be some that dream of doing good in another world, or at least will defer it longer, till some time hereafter, such vain hopes of future performances hath undone many a soul: I must work the work of him that sent me, while it is day, saith our Savior. The way-faring man travels not in darkness, but while the day shines on him, then he knows he is under the protection of the Laws, the light of the Sun, the blessing of heaven; Are there not twelve hours in the day? if any man walk in the day, he stumbleth not, because he seeth the light of this world; but if a man walk in the night, he stumbleth, because there is no light in him.] Do good then, and lay hold of every season which may get you to heaven. Let the whole course of your life be a conscionable preparative against death. Suppose every day your last, as if at night you should be called to account before that high and great tribunal: in a word, whatsoever you think, or speak, or do, say thus with yourself, Would I do thus and thus, if I knew this night to be my last? Who is it would sin, if he thought at that instant he must go to judgment?

[Use. 2] But if we neglect the day, be sure the night will come to our condemnation: where be those wonders that so dazzled our eyes, while the day shone on them? Where is Absalom's beauty, Jezabel's paint, Saul's personage; nay, where is this wretched Worldling? he had a day to work out his own salvation, and that being lost, at last came night, before he had gone two steps toward heaven. O beloved! walk while ye have light, that ye may be children of the light. You may be sure the meanest soul that hath the work of grace upon it, death is to him no night, but the daybreak of eternal brightness. This may make us in love with the sincerity of religion, this may make us to labor, and never cease laboring till we have gotten out of the state of nature, into the state of grace. O that I could say of everyone of you, as Paul of the Ephesians, Ye were once darkness, but now are ye light in the Lord. Ye were once carnal, but now are ye spiritual: ye were once unregenerate, but now are ye a first-fruits dedicated to God. If it were thus with you, then (to your comfort) upon your dying beds you should meet with a glorious troop of blessed Angels, you should feel the glorious presence of the sweetest comforter, you should see the glorious light of God's shining countenance, you should have a night (if it were night) turned all into a mid-day. Now the Lord give you such a day, whensoever you die, through Christ our Lord.

You have heard the time of Deaths arrest,] This night.] Now for the party we'll make a privy search, and if we stir one word, we shall find him at next door, it is thy soul.]

Thy Soul.]

THE party under arrest is the rich man's Soul,] no warranty could prevail, no riches satisfy, no strength rescue, death now demands it, and there's none can redeem it, therefore This night they will have his soul.]

Every man hath a jewel better worth then a world, and the loss of this is so much more dear, by how much it is more precious. What profits it a man to gain a world, and to lose his soul? (said our Lord and Savior) Mat. 16.26. Nay, what are a thousand worlds when the soul is valued? Give me leave to ope the cabinet, and you shall see the jewel that is arrested; it is the Soul]

The Soul; what's that? it is (saith Austin) a substance that is created, invisible, incorporeal, immortal, most like to God, as bearing the image of its Creator. Please you that we illustrate this description, and you shall see how every word shows forth some excellencies (as the glorious lustres) of this glorious pearl the Soul.]

First, if you ask what is the Soul, 'tis a substance.] How fond were the opinions of some Philosophers? one would have it to be nothing, [vox, & praeterea nihil,] and how many of us are of this opinion? Do not we live as if we had no souls at all? The epicure is for his belly, the ambitious for his body, but who is he that provides for his soul? Sure we imagine it to be nothing valuable, or how should our estimation of it be so gross and vile, to prefer the body, to neglect the soul?] There were other Philosophers went a pace yet further, and they gave it a being, but what? no better then an accident, that might live or die without death of the subject; this they call 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 humorum, a certain temper composed of the elements, or nothing but the harmony of those humors in the body. Is this the soul? then of all creatures are men (say we), of all men are we (saith the Apostle) most miserable, most unhappy. Look at beasts, and in this respect we and they are even as one condition, Eccles. 3.19. Look at trees, and in their corruption you may see, the like constitution both of us and them. Look at stones, and by their dissolution we may argue this temper of composition in them also: if then our soul were nothing but this 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, not only men, but beasts, and plants, and stones, and metals have a soul: far be this from your thoughts, whose souls are prized to be of more worth then a world, there being nothing in the world that may give a recompense for our souls, Matth. 16.26. Others have gone a little further, and they suppose it to be a substance: but how? only bodily, and not spiritual; such gross conceits have many idolaters of the Deity, as if this our image were of God's own substance, and this substance nothing else but a bodily being. A spirit (saith our Savior) hath not flesh and bones, as you see me have. It is the body is the flesh, but the soul is the spirit: the body you may see and handle, but the soul is not seen, not handled: as the Disciples then did err in supposing a spirit when they saw his body, no less is their error, in supposing a body where is only a spirit. The worst soul is better then the best of bodies. O precious soul (saith Bernard) espoused to thy God, endowed with his spirit, redeemed by his Son, what art thou to the flesh, whose being is from heaven. Others again have passed this opinion, and they call it a form: but what? only material, not substantial, and such as are the souls of beasts that die with their bodies, as being deduced from the matter of some bodies pre-existent. It is not so with the souls of men, which though for a while they are knit and united to this house of clay, yet may they be separated from it, and subsist without it: this is that goodness of God, that as our souls are intellectual, so their being is perpetual, not but that our souls might die (seeing everything that is of nothing may return into the same nothing whence it sprung) but that God so sustains them by his glorious goodness, that as he gave the first being, so he would continue that he gave. What have we, that we have not received? Or to speak of the soul, what are we that God, and God only hath not bestowed upon us? our parents begot our bodies, God only gave our souls: our bodies are buried again in the womb of our common mother, but our souls return to God, as to their chiefest good. So immaterial is the soul, that neither will nor understanding depends on the dying organ. What then is the soul? a nothing, an accident, a body, a form only material: no, but on the contrary, an ens, a substance, a spirit, a form, a substantial being of itself subsisting.

But we'll ascend a little higher, it is a substance created,] not traduced, (as some would have it.) I must confess the opinion was not a little strong, that as our bodies, so our souls were both propagated from our parents. Tertullian, and the Fathers of the West (as Jerome witnesseth) were most on that side: the reason of this opinion was because of original sin, which defileth the soul, as well as the body of each man sprung from Adam, they could see no means how both were corrupted, except withal the soul were propagated. But are not our souls as the Angels? and therefore if our souls, then may the Angels beget one another; nay if this were true, what soul were generated, but another were corrupted: for the rule is infallible, There can be no generation without a transmutation, and so would every soul be subject to corruption. Concerning that objection of original sin (if the soul were not traduced from the loins of Adam, how then should that sin be imputed to our souls?) I must confess the question is intricate, we should rather believe it, then enquire of it, and we may better enquire of it then understand it, and yet more easily understand it, then express it. But so well as we can, we shall untie the knot. First then, we say 'tis a fallacy to divide soul and body, for not the soul without the body, nor the body without the soul, but the whole man sin'd in Adam, as the whole man is begot of Adam; so soon therefore as the soul is conjoin'd to the body, and of the soul and body is constituted whole man, that man being now made a member of Adam, is said to sin with him, and to derive that sin from him. But for a further satisfaction, although the soul depend on God according to its substance, yet is it created in that body which is produced of the parents: thus in some sort we may say that the soul is begotten, (non quoad essentiam, sed quoad 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 ,) God only gives the essence, but to exist comes from the parents. What is the soul but a form of the body? and of what body, but of that which is organical, as being apt for the soul? This aptness then whereby it is prepared for the form, being received from the parents, we may say of the soul, that thus it is generated, as not beginning to subsist before the body is prepared. This is true in some sort, though not properly. Consider then the excellency of man's soul, which is not born, but created,] and howsoever now it is bespotted with sin, yet was it then pure and undefiled, as the untouched virgin: how is it but pure, which the hands of God hath made? it was the devil that caused sin, but all that God made was good, and very good, Gen. 1.31. and such a soul hath every man. It is created by God, infused by his Spirit, of nothing made something, and what something, but an excellent work, befitting such an excellent workman?

[3] And yet there be more stairs to ascend: it is thirdly invisible.] Hath any man seen God? or hath any man seen God's image (which is the soul) and lived? Substances that are more pure are less visible. We see but darkly through a glass, nay, the best eye upon earth looks but through a lattice, a window, an obscuring impediment, mortal eyes cannot behold immortal things; how then should this corruptible sight, see a spiritual soul? the object is too clear for our weak eyes, our eyes are but earthly, the soul of an heavenly nature. O divine being! not only heavenly, but heaven itself: as God and man met both in Christ, so heaven and earth met both in man: would you see this earth? that is the body, Out of it wast thou taken, and into it must thou return, Gen. 4.19. would you see this heaven? that is the soul, the God of heaven gave it, and to the God of heaven returns it, Eccles. 12.7. The body is but a lump, but the soul is that breath of life: of earth came the body, of God was the soul: thus earth and heaven met in the creation, and the man was made a living soul, Gen. 2.7. the sanctified soul is an heaven upon earth, where the sun is understanding, the moon is faith, and the stars gracious affections: what heaven is in that body, which lives and moves by such a soul? yet so wonderful is God's mercy to mankind, that as reason doth possess the soul, so the soul must possess this body. Here is that union of things visible, and invisible: as the light is spiritual, incorruptible, indivisible, and so united to the air, that of these two is made one, without confusion of either; in like manner is the soul united to this body, one together, distinguished asunder: only here's the difference, the light is most visible, the soul is invisible, she is the breath of God, the beauty of man, the wonder of Angels, the envy of devils, that immortal splendor which never eye hath seen, never eye must see.

[4] And yet we must up another step, it is fourthly incorporeal.] as not seen with a mortal eye so neither clogged with a bodily shape: I say not but the soul hath a body for his organ, to which it is so knit and tied, that they cannot be severed without much sorrow or struggling: yet is it not a body, but a spirit dwelling in it: the body is an house, and the soul the inhabitant: everyone knows the house is not the inhabitant, and yet (O wonder!) there is no room in the house where the inhabitant lives not: would you please to see the rooms? the eye is her window, the head is her tower, the heart is her closet, the mouth is her hall, the lungs her presence chamber, the senses her cinque-ports, the common-sense her custom-house, the fantasy her mint, the memory her treasury, the lips are her two leave'd doors, that shut and open, and all these, and all the rest, (as the motions in a Watch,) are acted and moved by this spring, the Soul. See here a composition without confusion, the soul is in the body, yet it is not bodily: as in the greatest world the earth is more solid, the water less, the air yet lesser, the fire least of all; so in this little world of man, the meaner parts are of grosser substance, and the soul by how much more excellent, by so much more spiritual, and wholly with-drawn from all bodily being.

[5] And yet a little higher, it is fifthly immortal.] It was the error of many Fathers, That bodies and souls must both die till doomes-day, and then the bodies being raised, the souls must be revived. Were that true, why then cries Stephen, Lord Jesus receive my spirit? or why should Paul be dissolved, that he might be with Christ? Blessed men are but men, and therefore no wonder if subject to some error. Others more absolutely deny the souls immortality, We are born (say they) at all adventures, and we shall be hereafter, as though we had never been; (Why so?) for the breath is a smoke in our nostrils, and the words as a spark raised out of our hearts, which being extinguished, the body is turned into ashes, and the spirit vanisheth as soft air. What, is the soul a smoke? and the spirit no better then the soft vanishing air; wretched men! Have you not read what is spoken of God, saying, I am the God of Abraham, and the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob? now God (saith Christ) is not the God of the dead, but of the living. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, they are not dead then in (the better part) their souls, but passed indeed from the valley of death, unto the land of the living. Whosoever liveth and believeth in me (saith our Savior) shall never die, John 11.26. Not die,] against some, never die] against others: what can we more? only live and believe in him that redeemed us, and be sure his promises shall never fail us; our souls must live, live forever. Sweet soul, blessed with the felicity of eternal life! here's a joy unspeakable, that this soul now clogged with cares, vexations, griefs, passions, shall one day enjoy those joys immortal, not for a day, or two, (though this were more then we can imagine) but through all eternity; There shall be no defect, nor end: after millions of ages the soul must still live in her happiness, it is not of a perishing, but an everlasting substance.

[6] And yet the perfection of the soul goes higher; it is most like to God,] so far it transcends all earthly happiness: I cannot say, but in some sort all creatures have this likeness; every effect hath at least some similitude with its cause, but with a difference; some only have a being, as stones; others, being and life, as plants; but man above all hath a being, life, and reason, and therefore of all other the most like unto his Creator.

[7] Can we anymore? yes, one step higher, and we are at the top of Jacob's ladder: The soul is not only like God, but the image of God. I cannot deny, but there is some apparance of it in the outward man and therefore the body in some measure partakes of this image of the Deity, it was man, and whole man that was corrupted by sin, and (by the law of contraries) it was man, and whole man, that was beautified with this image. Please you to look at the body, is it not a little world, wherein everything that God made was good? as therefore all goodness comes from him, so was he the pattern of all goodness; that being in him perfectly, which only is in us partly. This is that Idaea, whereby God is said to be the exemplar of the world: man then in his body being as the worlds map, what is he but that image, in which the builder of the world is manifest? but if you look at the parts of his body, how often are they attributed (though in a metaphor, yet in resemblance) to his Maker? our eyes are the image of his wisdom, our hands are the image of his power, our heart is the image of his knowledge, and our tongue the lively image of his revealed will: God therefore, before he made the body, said, Let us make man in our own image: and what was the meaning, but that soul and body should both bear the image of his Majesty? Be astonished then, ye men of the earth! If this dust, this clay, this body of ours be so glorious, what think ye of the soul, whose substance, faculties, qualities, dignities, every way represents God's omnipotent Essence? Look on this glass, and first for substance, is the soul invisible? why so is God: No man hath seen him at any time, Joh. 1.18. Is the soul incorporeal? why so is God: We ought not to think him like unto gold, or silver, or stone graven with art, Acts 17.29. Is the soul immortal? why so is God: He is King of Kings, and Lord of Lord's, who only hath immortality, 1. Tim. 6.16. Is the soul spiritual? why so is God: God is a spirit, and they that worship him, must worship him in spirit, John 4.24. Is the soul one essence? why so is God: There is one God and Father of all, who is above all, and through all, and in you all, Ephes. 4.6. See here the lively image of God in every soul of man. But there is another character imprinted in every faculty, so that not only the substance, but the powers of the soul bear this image in them: As there is one God and three persons, so there is one soul and three faculties: the Father, Son, and holy Ghost are but one God; the Understanding, Will, and Memory are but one soul: the Father is not the Son, nor the Son the holy Ghost; so the Understanding is not the Will, nor the Will the Memory: and yet the Father is God, the Son is God, and the holy Ghost is God; so the Understanding is the soul, the Will is the soul, and the Memory is the soul. I dare not say, but there is some difference. This trinity in us we rather see it then believe it; but that Trinity of Persons, we more believe it then see it: Howsoever then our soul is no proof of the Godhead, yet is it a true sign of that image of God in the soul. Nay, yet (as if this stamp were of a deeper impression) see the dowry of God's Spouse, and who wonders not at the qualities & conditions with which the soul is arrayed? The Kings daughter is all glorious within, her clothing is of broidered gold. What say you to that heavenly knowledge inspired into us? God that created man, filled him with knowledge of understanding, and shown them good and evil, Eccles 17.6. What say you to those heavenly impressions that are stamped upon us? such are the new man's marks, which after God is created in righteousness and true holiness, Ephes. 4.24. These make the soul like God, and God loving to the soul; is it not clad with righteousness, as with a garment? witness the integrity of Adam, in that sweet subjection, his soul to the Lord, his affections to the soul, his body to the affections, the whole man to God, as to the chiefest good: and as truth and mercy meet together, so righteousness and holiness kiss each other: this righteousness to God is it that makes us righteous afore God, and this is that holiness wherein we are created. O blessed image! how nearly dost thou resemble thy Creator? he is the pattern of perfection, and we bear the image of that pattern. Be ye holy, for I am holy, 1. Pet. 1.15. And yet again, as if this picture were of deeper die, how like is the soul to its Creator in her full dominion over all the creatures? Thou art bountiful, O my soul, as Tirzah, comely as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners. What is it will not stoop to this God's Vicegerent? Beasts, and birds, and serpents, and things of the sea are tamed, and have been tamed of the nature of man, Jam. 3.7. What a thing is this soul? she can tame the wild, command the proud, pull down the lofty, do what she will, by compounding, comparing, contemplating, commanding. O excellent nature! that sittest on earth, canst reach to heaven, mayest dive to hell, nothing being able to resist thy power, so long as thou art subject to that power of God. Is this the soul? Lo, what is man that thou art mindful of him? thou hast made him to have dominion in the works of thy hands, thou hast put all things in subjection under his feet, Psal. 8.6.

O my soul, my soul! what can we say of such a creature? to sum up all, she is in nature a substance, created by God, invisible of men, incorporeal with Angels, immortal through grace, most like to God in a way of nearness, and bearing his image in the glorious stamp of her created likeness.

Is this the darling of our Lord? where then is the rich man that hath lost this pearl? he that could tell his soul, Soul, thou hast much goods laid up for many years, live at ease, eat, drink and take thy pastime. Now on a sudden his soul is taken, and whose shall those things be which he hath provided? The loss of all losses is the loss of a soul, without which, had we never so much, we could truly enjoy nothing; what trust then in your earthly treasures? what stay in such broken staves of reed? one day you shall find them most deceitful, leaving your naked souls to the open rage of wind and weather, to the scourges and scorpions of guiltiness and fear: Could you purchase a monopoly of all the world, had you the gold of the West, the treasures of the East, the spices of the South, the pearls of the North, all is nothing to (this incarnate Angel) this invaluable soul. O wretched worldling! what hast thou done then to undo thy soul? was it a wedge of gold, an heap of silver, an hoard of pearl, to which thou trustest? see, they are gone, and thy soul is required.] Alas, poor soul! whither must it go? to heaven? to its Creator? to God that gave it? no, there is another way for wandering sinners; Go ye into everlasting fire, prepared for the Devil and his Angels: thither must it go with heaviness of heart, into a kingdom of darkness, a lake of burning, a prison of horrible confusion of terrible tortures: O poor soul! what a misery is this? darkness, burning, confusion, torments, are these the welcomes of his soul to hell? what meant the rich man in his unhappy fore-cast? he propounded to his soul a world of ease, of pleasure, of pastime; it proves far otherwise: this other world is a world of torments, which (like infinite rivers of Brimstone) feed upon his soul without ease or end. What avails now his pompous pride at his doleful funerals? the news is sounded [he is dead] friends must lament him, passing-peals ring for him, an hearse-cloth wrap him, a tomb-stone lie over him, all must have mourning suites, and (may be) rejoicing hearts; but all this while his soul his going to judgment, without one friend, or the least acquaintance to speak in his cause: O that his soul were mortal, and body and soul to be buried both together in one grave! must his body die, and his soul live? in what world, or nation? in what place or region? it is another world, another nation, where Devils are companions, brimstone the fire, horror the language, and eternal death the souls eternal life; never to be cured, and never must be ended. O my soul (saith Bernard) what a terrible day shall that be, when thou shalt leave this Mansion, and enter into an unknown region? who will deliver thee from these ramping Lions? who can defend thee from those hellish monsters? God is incensed, hell prepared, justice threatened, only mercy must prevent, or the soul is damned. View this rich man on his deaths-bed, the pain shouts through his head, and at last comes to his heart, anon death appears in his face, and suddenly falls on to arrest his soul; Is it death? what is it he demands? can his goods satisfy? no, the world claims them: must his body go? no, the worms claim that: what debt is this, which neither goods, nor body can discharge? [Habeas animam ejus coram nobis] God's warrant bids fetch the soul: O miserable news! the soul committed sin, sin morgaged it to death, death now demands it; and what if he gain the world, he must lose his soul: This night [thy soul] shall be required of thee.

[Use. 1] Animula vagula, blandula, said the heathen Emperor; Pretty, little, wandering soul, whither goest thou from me? wilt thou leave me alone, that cannot live without thee? O what conflicts suffers the poor soul, when this time is come, must the soul be gone? help friends, physic, pleasure, riches, nay, take a world to reprove a soul; so different are the thoughts of men dying, from them living: now, are they for their pleasure, or profit, the body, or the world; but then, nothing is esteemed but the soul. what can we say? but if you mean your souls must be saved, O then let these precious, dear, everlasting things breathed into your bodies for a short abode, scorn to feed on earth, or any earthly things: it is matter of a more heavenly metal, treasures of an higher temper, riches of a nobler nature, that must help your souls. Do you think that ever any glorified soul, that now looks God Almighty in the face, and tramples underfoot the Sun and Moon, is so bewitched as was Achan with a wedge of gold? no, it is only the Communion of Saints, the society of Angels, the fruition of the Deity, the depth of eternity, which can only feed and fill the soul. So live then, as that when you die, your souls may receive this bliss, and the Lord Jesus our Savior receive all your souls.

[Use. 2] I must end, but gladly would I win a soul: If the reward be so great (as you know it) to recover a sick body, which for all that must die, of what reward is that cure to save a soul, which must ever, ever live? O sweet Jesu why sheddest thou the most precious and warmest blood of thy heart, but only to save souls? thou wast scourged, buffeted, judged, condemned, hanged; was all this for us? and shall we do nothing for ourselves? What is it thou wouldst have had, if thou couldst wish it good? not thy house, nor thy wife, nor thy children, nor thy good, nor thy clothes, but no matter for thy soul; I beseech you, value not your souls at a less price than your shoes; you can please the flesh with delicates, which is naught but worms meat; but the soul pines for want, which is a creature invisible, incorporeal, immortal, most like to God: are we thus careful of pelf, and so careless of this pearl? certainly, I cannot choose but wonder, when seeing the streets peopled with men that follow suits, run to Courts, attend and wait on their Counselors for this case, and that case, this house, or that land, that not one of these, no nor one of all us will ride, or run or creep, or go to have counsel for his soul: I must confess, I have sometimes dwelt on this meditation: and (Beloved, let me speak homely to you) be our Counsellors in this Town, every week solicited by their Clients? and have we no Clients in soul-cases? not one that will come to us with their cases of conscience? sure you are either careless of your souls, or belike you have no need of particular instructions: O let us not be so forward for the world, and so backward for the soul! yet I pray mistake not; I invite you not for fees, as noble Terentius, when he had petitioned for the Christians, and saw it torn in pieces before his face, gathered up the pieces, and said, I have my reward; I have not sued for gold, silver, honor, or pleasure, but a Church: so say I, in midst of your neglect; I have not sued for your good, or silver, for your houses, or lands, but for your souls, your precious souls: and if I cannot, or shall not woe them to come to Christ, God raise up some child of the Bride-chamber which may do it better; if neither I, nor any other can prevail, O then fear that speech of Eli's sons, they hearkened not unto the voice of their father, because the Lord would slay them: 1 Sam. 2.25.

In such a case, O that my head were full of water, and mine eyes a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for your sins! O that I could wash your souls with my tears from that filth of sin, wherewith they are besmeared and defiled! O that for the salvation of your souls, I might be made a sacrifice unto death! But the Lord be praised, for your souls and my soul Christ Jesus hath died; and if now we but repent us of our sins, and believe in our Savior, if now we will but deny ourselves, and take up his cross and follow him; if now we will but turn unto him, that he may turn his loving countenance unto us, if now we will but become new creatures, and ever-hereafter walk in the holy path, the narrow way which leads unto heaven, why then may our souls be saved. This is that we had need to care for, not so much for the body, as for the souls good: to this purpose saith Hugo, Why clothe we the body in silks, which must rot in the grave, and adorn not the soul with faith and good works, which one day must appear before God and his Angels. O think of this day, this night, this hour of death, for then must your Souls be taken from you.

Thus far you see the rich man's arrest: God enjoins it, death serves it, the time was this night, and the party is, his Soul.] God give us grace to provide our souls, that when death arrests we may be ready, and then, O God, have thou mercy on our Souls.

Shall be required]

The original is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , They shall require it: wherein you have, the

- Sergeants,
- Arrest.

The Sergeants, They,] and the arrest itself, They require] his soul.

We'll first take a view of the Sergeants.

They: who? not God, he knows not sinners, what should he do with a drunken, profane, covetous, sensual soul, he that never so much as thought on God in this life, will God accept of the commending of his soul to him at his death? no, the Lord of heaven will none of it: he that forsook God, is justly forsaken of God: See the true weight of this balance, he would not receive God's grace into his soul, and God will not receive his graceless soul into heaven. But who then? will the Angels take it? no, they have nothing to do with the soul of a dying sinner, the Angels are only porters for the souls of the just: Poor Lazarus that could neither go, nor sit, nor stand for sores, it is he must be carried on the wings of Angels, but for this rich man, not the lowest Angel will do him poorest service. Who then? will the Saints receive it? no, they have no such commission to receive a soul: that blind opinion (which everyone may blush at) that Saint Peter should be heavens porter, and that none may go in, but to whom he will open: if it be true, why may not a Saint help a departing soul? Away with this dreaming folly! not Peter, nor Paul, nor all the Saints of heaven have any such privilege; if God will not hear us, what will our prayers do to Saints? Heaven is too far off, they cannot hear, or were it nearer they will not, cannot help: it is God must save us, or we perish ever. Who then are the Sergeants? not God, nor Saints, nor Angels: no, there is another crew, Death and Devils stand in a readiness, and they are the parties that arrest this prisoner.

Stay, what would death have? the soul cannot die, and for the body, no matter who receives it. O yes! there is a death of the soul, as well as of the body: I mean not such a death whereby it may be annihilated, but a second death that shall ever accompany it: this is a death of the soul, that will always keep it in deaths pangs. But not to speak of this death, there is another death temperall, that shall sever the soul and body each from other: these two twins that have lived together since their first espousall, these two lovely ones that were made, and met, and married by the hands of God these two made one, till death them depart, and make them two again, now is their rueful time of divorce: when death comes he gives over the body to the grave, and arrests the soul, to appear in presence before God's high Tribunal. Such a Bailiff hath now laid hands on this rich man's soul, when he least thought on it, death comes on a sudden, and arrests his person. O wretched worldling! who is this behind thee? call we this God's Sergeant? What grim, ugly, monstrous visage is this we see? have ever any of you seen the grisly picture of death before you? how was it but with hollow eyes, open skull, grinning teeth, naked ribs, a few bones knit together with dry strings, as presenting to your eyes the most deformed image of a man in moldes? But what's that in his hands? an hour-glass, and a dart: the one expressing the decreasing of our life, and the other death's stroke, that he gives us in our death. Such emblemes are most fit to express mortality: and imagine such a thing to arrest this rich man, would it not terrify him, whilst looking back, death suddenly claps him on his shoulder, away he must with this messenger, all the gold and pearl of East and West cannot stay him one hour: now rich man, what avails all thy worldly pleasure? Hadst thou in thy hands the reigns of all earthly kingdoms, wert thou exalted as the Eagle, and thy nest set among the stars, yet all this, and whatsoever else thou canst imagine, is not worth a button: where did that man dwell, or of what cloth was his garment, that was ever comforted by his goods, or greatness, in this last and sorest conflict? See worldling, death requires thy soul, no bribe will be taken, no entreaty will prevail, no riches rescue, nothing at all redeem, death, death is impartial.

But (O horror!) death is not all, see yet more Sergeants, Devils, and Dragons are about thy bed, and these are they that will hurrie away thy soul to hell. How? Devils; O worldling stay thy soul, and never yield it! better to die a thousand deaths, then to leave it in their hands; but alas, thou canst not choose, thy last hour is come, and here is neither hope, nor help, nor place of any longer terrying. See but the misery of a miserable soul! what shall it do? whither shall it fly from these damned Furies? would they take it, and tear it into nothing, it were somewhat tolerable: but to tear it in pieces, and never to make end of tearing, to give it torments without all patience or resistance; this is that load which it cannot bear. and yet (O extremity!) it ever, ever must be born. Think on this, O my soul! and whilst thou hast a minutes stay in this body, call upon God to prevent this arrest of Devils: was it not (think ye) a terror to this rich man, when so many hell hounds waited for his soul? we read of one man, who being took away with a Devil through the air, was said so to roar and yell, that many miles distant his noise was heard, to many a man's trembling. And if a soul had but the organs of a sound, what a shriek would it make, being seized on by a Devil? witness the cries of many desperate souls, when as yet they are safe in their beds, how do they roar and rage? how do they call and cry, Help, help us, save us, deliver us from these fiends about us! these are those evening wolves enraged with hellish hunger, these are those ramping Lions ever ready to devour our souls, these are those walkers up and down the earth, which are now come and entered into this rich man's lodging. Wheresoever the dead carcass is, thither (saith our Savior) will the Eagles resort: and wheresoever a damned soul is, thither with a lacrity will these spirits come: O how they fly and flutter round about him, what fires do they breathe to enkindle them on his soul? what claws do they open, to receive her at the parting? and what astonishment is that poor soul in, that perceives these Sergeants even ready to clasp their in her burning arms? See (O Cosmopolite) what thy sin hath caused! lust hath transported thine eyes, blasphemy thy tongue, pride thy foot, oppression thy hand, covetousness thy heart, and now Death and Devils, they are the Sergeants that require thy soul.

[Use.] Reflect these thoughts on your own souls, and consider with yourselves, what may be your cases; it may be as yet thou standest upright without any changes, hitherto thou hast seen no days of sorrow, but even washed thy steps with butter, and the rock hath poured thee out rivers of oil. Alas! was not this the case of this wretched worldling? yet for all this, you see a night came that paid for all: and so may it be with thee; a day, an hour, a moment, is enough to overturn the things that seem to have been founded, and rooted in Adamant; who can tell whether this night, this storm may fall upon thee? art thou not strangely nailed and glued unto sense? art thou not stupidly senseless in spiritual things, that for pelf, vanity, dung, nothing, wilt run headlong and willfully into easeless, endless, and remediles torments? Yet such is thy doing, (if thou beest a worldling) to get riches to thy body, and let death and devils have thy soul. O beloved, consider in time, and seeing you have such a terrible example set before you, let this worldling be your warning.

We have done with the Sergeants, but what's their office? to beg? to sue? No, but to force, to require, thy soul is required.

How? requiried? is any so bold to approach his gates, and make a forcible entry? Yes, God hath his special Bailiffs that will fear no colors, riches cannot ransom, castles cannot keep, hollows cannot hide, hills nor their forts protect: Sits Herod on his Throne? there's a Writ of Remove, and the worms are his Bayliffs: is Dives at his Table? Death brings the Mittimus, and Devils are his Jaylours: sits Lazarus at his gates? the King greets him well, (we may say) and Angels are his keepers: poor, rich, good, bad, all must be served at the Kings suit, no place can privilege, no power secure, no valor rescue, no liberty exempt: with a non omittas propter aliquam libertatem, runs this Warrant: O rich man? what wilt thou now do? The sorrows of death compass thee, and the floods of Belial make thee afraid. What? no friends to help? no power to rescue, is there no other way but yield and die for it? O misery! enough to break an heart of brass again: Imagine that a Prince a while possessed some royal City, where (if you walk the streets) you may see peace flourishing, wealth abounding, pleasure waiting, all his neighbors offering their service, and promising to assist him in all his needs and affairs: if on a sudden this city were besieged by some deadly enemy, who coming (like a violent stream) takes one hold after another, one wall after another, one castle after another, and at last drives this Prince only to a little Tower, and there sets on him; what fear, anguish, and misery would this Prince be in? If he looks about, his holds are taken, his men are slain, his friends and neighbors now stand aloof off, and they begin to abandon him; were not this a woeful plight trow you? even so it fares with a poor soul at the hour of her departure: the body wherein she reigned like a jolly Princesse, then droops and languishes; the keepers tremble, the strong men bow, the grinders cease, and they wax dark that look out at the windows▪ no wonder, if fear be in the way, when the arms the legs, the teeth, the eyes (as so many walls wherein the soul was environed) are now surprised and beaten to the ground: her last refuge is the heart, and this is the little Tower whither at last she is driven: But what, is she there secure? no, but most fiercely assailed with a thousand enemies, her dearest friends (youth, and Physic, and other helps) which soothed her in prosperity do now abandon her, what will she do? the enemy will grant no truce, will make no league, but night and day assailes the heart, which now (like a Turret struck with thunder) begins all to shiver? here is the woeful state of a wicked soul, God is her enemy, the Devil her foe, Angels hate her, the earth groans under her, hell gapes for her: the reason of all, sin struck the alarm, and death gives the battle: it is but this night (a minute longer) and then will the raging enemy enter on her. Death is no beggar to entreat, no suitor to woe, no petitioner to ask, no soliciter to crouch and crave a favor: she runs raging, ruling, charging, requiring: hark this rich man's arrest, thy soul shall be required] It shall? yes, the word is peremptory; what? be required? yes, it comes with authority. Here's a fatal requiring, when the soul shall be forced by an unwilling necessity, and devils by force hurrie her to her endless fury. Adieu poor soul! the Writ is served, the Goal prepared, the judgment past, and Death (the Executioner) will delay no longer; This night thy soul shalt be required of thee.

[Use. 1] But to whom speak I? Think of it you miserably covetous, that join house to house and call the lands after your own names: You may trust in your wealth, and boast yourselves in the multitude of your riches, but none of you call by any means redeem his brother, no nor himself, Psal. 49.6. When Death comes, (I pray) what composition with the Lord of heaven? could ever any buy out his damnation with his coin? howsoever you live, mirrily, deliciously, go richly, yet Death will at last knock at your doors, and (notwithstanding all your wealth, honors, tears, and groans of your dearest friends) will take you away as his prisoners, to his darkest dungeon. Your case is as with a man who lying fast asleep upon the edge of some steep high rock, dreams merrily of Crowns, Kingdoms, Possessions; but upon the sudden, starting for joy, he breaks his neck, and tumbles into the bottom of some violent sea: Thus is your danger every hour, Satan makes you a bed, lulls you asleep, charms you into golden dreams, and you conceive you are wallowing in the Sea of all worldly happiness; at last death comes (against which there is no resistance) and then are you suddenly swallowed up of despair, and drowned in that pit of eternal death and perdition,

I have read of some, whom (in some sort) we might parallel with this rich man concerning their fearful horrid departure out of this miserable world: yea, I suppose the Books are so working, that any man whosoever he is, that would but read them, and ponder them in a serious way, they would certainly work in him much matter of humiliation, and make him to fly sin, as the very sting of a scorpion.

One of them I mean to speak of was an Englishman: Abbot. that relates the story, tells indeed of two in one year that died thus uncomfortably; the one so many ways looking homewards, that he died miserably rich: the other so lashing outward that he died miserably poor, both of different ways of life, yet both of uncomfortable passages out of the world. The one coming to his deaths-bed, the Author reports of him, that first the Devil presented himself unto him to be his Physician, and after Christ appeared to him sitting on the Throne, condemning his unprofitable life, and bidding him shift for himself, for he would have nothing to do with him: The other (of whom I mean to speak) as if he would prevent Christ, condemned himself to hell forever and ever: O (said he) that I might burn along time in that fire, so I might not burn in hell. — I have had (said he) a little pleasure, and now I must go to the torments of hell forever. Then praying to God (as he was pressed by others) to forgive him his sins, and to have mercy upon him, he would add, but I know God will not do it, I must go to hell for evermore. Whatsoever came between whiles, this was the close, I must be burned in Hel, I must to the furnace of Hel, millions and millions of ages. The Author of this story (who was Minister of the place where he lived) went to him, offered him the comforts of the Gospel, opened to him the promises of the largest size, shown him that God was delighted to save souls, and not to destroy them, and that his sweet promises were without exception of time place, person, or sin, except that against the holy Ghost, which he assured him too, was not committed by him: and what was the issue? all this could not fasten on him, but still he would answer, Alas, it is too late, I must be burned in hell. That man of God (the Shepherd of his soul) seeing his soul in this danger, came to him again and again, and at last secluding the company, he presses him with tears in his eyes, not to cast away that soul for for which Christ died; he told him, that Christ rejected none that did not reject him: but for all this he could have no other answer, but that he had cast off Christ, and therefore must go to hell. The Minister replies, Yet pray with me (saith he) that Christ would come again, there is yet an hour in the day, and if Christ come, he can and will assist you, to do a great deal of work on a sudden: no, he would not hear of that: former counsels and prayers might have done me good, said he, but now it is too late.

O horror, that ever any soul should suffer these conflicts for sin! But what sins were they? He was (saith the Author) no Swearer, no Whoormonger, no Thief, no scoffer at Religion, no perjured wretch, no willful liar at all, only Drunkenness and neglect of men's bodies (for he was an Apothecary) neglect of Prayer, God's Word, and his Sacraments, so awakt his trembling Conscience, that he was forced to pass this fearful doom upon his soul, I must be burned in the furnace of hell, millions of millions of ages: and at last (the Lord knows) in idleness of thoughts, and talk, he ended his miserable-miserable life.

The other I mean to speak of was an Italian, under the Jurisdiction of Venice, called Francis Spira, who being excessively covetous of money, and for fear of the world having renounced the truth, which before he professed, he thought at last he heard a direful voice speaking to him; Thou wicked wretch, thou hast denied me, thou hast broken thy vow; hence Apostate, and bear with thee the sentence of thy eternal damnation: at this voice he trembling and quaking fell down in a swoon; and after recovering himself, he professed that he was captivated under the revenging hand of the great God of heaven, and that he heard continually that fearful sentence of Christ, now past on his own soul: his friends to comfort him propounded many of God's promises, recorded in Scripture; Oh but my sin (said he) is greater then the mercy of God: nay, answered they, the mercy of God is above all sin; God would have all men to be saved: it is true (said he) he would have all men that he hath elected to be saved; but he would not have Reprobates to be saved; and I am one of that number: after this roaring out in the bitterness of his spirit, he said, It is a fearful thing to fall into the hands of the living God. These troubles of mind brought him to a distemper of body, which the Physicians perceiving, they wisht him to seek some spiritual comfort: those comforters come, and observing the distemper to arise from the sense and horror of hell pains; they ask him, Whether he thought there were any worse pains then what he endured? he said, He knew there were far worse pains; yet do I desire nothing more, said he, then that I may come to that place, where I may be sure to feel the worst, and to be freed from fear of worse to come.

As on this manner he was speaking he observed (saith my Author) divers flies that came about him, and some lighted on him; whereat, presently remembering how Beelzebub signifies the God of Flies; Behold, said he, now also Beelzebub comes to his Banquet, you shall shortly see my end, and in me an example to many of the justice and judgment of God. Then he began to reckon up what fearful dreams and visions he was continually troubled withal, That he saw the Devils come flocking into his chamber, and about his bed terrifying him with strange noyses; and that these were not fancies, but that he saw them as really as the standers by: and that besides these outward terrors, he felt continually a racking torture of his mind, and a continual butchery of his conscience, being the very proper pangs of the damned wights in hell.

But of all the rest, most desperate was that last speech of his, when snatching a knife (as intending to mischief himself, but stopped by his friends) he roared with indignation, I would I were above God, for I know he will have no mercy on me; and thus living a while, he appeared at length a very perfect anatomie, expressing to the view nothing but sinews, and bones, vehemently raging for drink; ever pining, yet fearful to live long; dreadful of hell, yet coveting death; in a continual torment, yet his own tormentor; consuming himself with grief and horror, impatience and despair, till at last he ended his miserable-miserable life.

And now (beloved) if such be the departure of a sinnfull soul, O who would live in sin to come to such a departure! For my part, I dare not say these parties, thus miserable in their own apprehensions, are now among Devils in hell: I find the Authors themselves to incline to the right hand; besides, what am I, that I should sit in God's Chair? only this I say, that their miserable deaths may very well give warning to us all; nor need you think much at me for uttering these (terribilia) terrible stories: for if sometimes you did not hear of God's judgments against sin; a day might come, that you would most of all cry out on the Preacher: To this purpose, we have a story of a certain rich man, who lying on his death-bed, My soul (said he) I bequeath to the Devil, who owns it; my wife to the Devil, who drew me to my ungodly life, and my Chaplain to the Devil who flattered me in it. I pray God I never hear of such a Legacy from any of you: sure I had better to tell you aforehand to prevent it, then not telling you to feel it. And let this be for my Apology in relating these stories.

[Use. 2] But for a second Use, give me leave, I pray you, to separate the precious from the vile. Now then to sweeten the thoughts of all true penitents, the souls of Saints are not required, but received. Rejoice then ye righteous that mourn in Zion; what though a while ye suffer? death is a Goal-delivery to your souls, not bringing in, but freeing out of thralldom. Here the good man finds sharpest misery, the evil man sweetest felicity; therefore it is just, that there should be a time of changing turns; The rich man's Table stood full of delicates, Lazarus lacks crumbs, but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented. Woe unto you that laugh, for you shall mourn, Luke 6.25. Blessed are you that mourn, for you shall rejoice, Matth. 5.4. Happy Lazarus! who from thy beggary and loathsome sores wert carried by Angels into Abraham's bosom: happy Thief, who upon thy true repentance, and unfeigned prayer, wert received from the Cross to the Paradise of thy Savior: happy are all they that suffer tribulation, Death shall lose their souls from bonds and fetters, and instead of a Bailiff to arrest them, shall be a Porter to conduct them to the gates of heaven: There shalt thou tread on Serpents, trample on thine enemies, sing sweet Trophies: were not this enough? thy Conquests shall be crowned by the hands of Seraphims, triumphed with the sound of Angels, warbled by the Choir of Spirits, confirmed by the King of Kings, and Lord of Hosts. Happy Soul! that art not required by Devils, but received by Angels: and when we die, Lord Jesus send thine Angels to receive our Souls.

You see now Deaths Arrest, and what remains further, save to accept of some Bail? But what Bail, where you have the Kings Commandment from his own mouth? this requiring is not of any other, but himself; of no surety, but of thee (saith God) must thy Soul be required.

Of thee]

ONce more (you see) I have brought this rich man on the stage, his doom is now at hand, and Death (God's messenger) summons him to appear by Requiring of his soul] but of whom is it Required? had he any Sureties to put in? or was any Bail sufficient to be taken for him? no, he must go himself, without all help or remedy, it was he that sinned, and it is he must pay for it; Of thee] it is required.

How? of thee? Sure Death mistakes; we can find thousands more fit, none more fearful; there stands a Saul, near him his armor-bearer; behold a Judas, such will outface deaths fury; nay, rather than if fail in its office, they will not much question to be their own Deaths-men: but this Of thee (who art at league with hell, in love with earth, at peace with all) is most terribly fearful.

Stay Death! there stands a poor Lazarus at the gates, like Job on his dung-hil, his eyes blind, his ears deaf, his feet lame, his body struck with Boyls, and his Soul choosing rather to be strangled and die, then to be in his bones: were not this a fit object for deaths cruelty? would he spare the rich, he should be welcome to the poor: but Death is inexorable, he must not live, nor shall the Beggar beg his own death for another: Of thee] it is required.

But (Death!) yet stay thy hand, here's a better surety; what needs death a press, when he may have volunteers? there stands an old man as ready for the grave, as the grave for him; his face is furrowed, his hairs hoary, his back bowing, his hammes bending, and therefore no song is fitter then old Simeons, Lord now lettest thou thy servant depart in peace: Youth is loath, but Age is merry to depart from misery; let Death then take him that standeth nearest deaths-door: No, the old must die, but the young may; he must die soon, yet be sure thou shalt not live long, Of thee] it is required.

Cannot this serve? let death yet stay his hand, there stands a servant waiting at this rich man's beck, as if he would spend his own life to save his Masters; he can make a Pageant of Cringes, act a whole speech of flatteries, every part owes him service, feet to run, hands to work, head to crouch, and as the eyes of a maiden unto the hand of a Mistress, so the eyes of his servants look unto the hands of their Master: but where be these attendants when death comes? was ever any Master better then Christ? were ever any servants truer then his Apostles? yet see their fidelity, must their Savior die? one betrays him another forswears him all run from him, and leave him alone in midst of all his enemies: what then is the trust of servants? the rich man may command and go without, if death should require them, they would not, or if they should desire death, he will not; his arrest concerns not the servants, it is for the Master himself he that command others, now death commands him: Of thee] it is required.

Will not all do? Let death but stay this once: there stands a friend, that will loose his own, to save his life: Greater love then this hath no man (saith our Savior) when any man bestoweth his life for his friends, John 15.13. Riches may perhaps procure such love, and get some friend to answer deaths quarrel which he owes this man: Jonathan loves David, David Absalom; and sure it was a love indeed, when Jonathan preserves the life of David, and David wisheth a death to himself in the stead of Absalom: O my son Absalom, would God I had died for thee: O Absalom, my son, my son. But where be any friends so respective of this Worldling? He wants a Jonathan, a David; upon a strict inquiry we find no friend, no father, no son, neither heirs nor assigns to whom he may bestow his lands. But what if he had friends as near to himself as himself? no man can die or another: or as the Psalmist, No man may deliver his brother, nor make agreement unto God for him: for it cost more to redeem their souls, so that he must let that alone forever. Should the poor man beg, the old man pray, his servants kneel, his friends lie at deaths feet, and all these offer up all their lives for this rich man's recovery, all were but vain▪ it is thy Soul is arrested, and it is thyself that must yield it: Of thee] it is required.

You see there is no way but one with him: to conclude then, we'll bid him his farewell (this is the last friendship we can do this rich man) and so we'll leave him.

The hour is come, and the dawning of that dreadful day appeareth; now he begins to wish that he had some space, some piece of time to repent him; and if he might obtain it, O what would he do! or what would he not do? Releive the weak, visit the sick feed the hungry, lodge the stronger, clothe the naked, give half his goods to the poor, and if he had done any wrong restore it him again seven-fold; but alas! all is too late, the candle that but follows him cannot light him to heaven; a sudden death denies his suit, and the increasing of his sickness will give him no leisure to fulfill those duties: what cold sweats are those that seiz upon him? his senses fail, his speech falters, his eyes sink, his breast swells, his feet die, his heart faints such are the outward pangs: what then are the inward griefs? if the body thus suffers, what cares and conflicts endures the soul? had he the riches of Croesus, the Empires of Alexander, the robes of Solomon, the fare of that rich man who lived deliciously every day, what could they do in the extremity of these pangs. O rich man, thou couldst tell us of pulling down barns, and building greater; but now imagine the vast cope of heaven thy Barn, (and that were large enough) and all the riches of the world thy grain (and that were crop enough) yet all these cannot buy a minute of ease, now that death will have thy body hell thy soul. O dark dungeon of imprisoned men! whose help wilt thou crave? whose aid wilt thou ask? what release canst thou expect from such a prison? the disease is past cure, the sickness wants remedy: alas! what may recover now the heart strings break asunder? thy date expires, thy last breath goes, and now is thy Soul and Body required of thee.

I have hitherto with Nathan beat sinful David on a strangers coat. You must give me leave to take off the mask, and show you your own faces in this glass.

Believe thou (O man) who readest this, that shortly there will be two holes where thine eyes now stand, and then others may take up thy skull, and speak of thee dead, as I have done to thee living: how soon I know not, but this I am sure of, Thy time is appointed thy months are determined, thy days are numbered, thy very last hour is limited. And what follows, but that thy body lie cold at the root of the rocks, at the foot of the mountains? Go then to the graves of those that are gone before us, and there see; are not their eyes wasted, their mouths corrupted, their bones scattered? where be those ruddy lips, lovely cheeks, sparkling eyes, comely nose, hairy locks? are not all gone as a dream in the night, or as a shadow in the morning? alas! that we neglect these thoughts and set our minds wholly upon the world and its vanity! we are careful, fearful, and immoderately painful to get transitory riches, like children following Butter-flies; we run, and toil, and perhaps miss our purpose: but if we catch them, what is it but a fly to besmear our hands? Riches are but empty, and yet be they what they will be all at last will be nothing. Saladine that great Turk, after all his conquests, gets his shirt fastened to his spear in manner of an Ensign, this done, a Priest makes Proclamation, This is all that Saladine carries away with him, of all the riches he hath gotten. Shall a Turk say thus, and do Christians forget their duties? Remember yourselves, ye sons of earth, of Adam; what is this earth you dote on? be sure you shall have enough of it, when your mouths must be filled and crammed with it, and (as your souls desire it, so) at that day shall your bodies turn to it. O that men are thus given to gasping greediness! there is a generation, and they are too common amongst us, that we may preach and preach (as they say) our hearts out, yet will not they stir a foot further from the world, or an inch nearer unto God, but could we speak with them on their death-bed, when their consciences are awaked, then should we hear them yell out those complaints, What hath pride profited us? or what good hath riches with our vaunting brought us? Assure yourselves this day, or this night will come, and imagine (I pray) that the ten, twenty, thirty, forty years, or months, or days, or hours, which you have yet to live, were at an end; were you at this present stretched on your beds, wearied with struggling against your wearied pangs, were your friends weeping your Physicians parting, your children crying, your wives houlng, and yourselves lying mute and dumb in a most pitiful agony.

[1] Beloved Christian! (whosoever thou art) stay a while (I pray thee) and practice this meditation: *Suppose thou now feelest the cramp of death wresting thy heart-strings, and ready to make that rueful divorce betwixt thy body and thy soul; suppose thou liest now panting for breath, swimming in a cold fatal sweat; suppose thy words were fled, thy tongue struck dumb, thy soul amazed, thy senses frightened; suppose thy feet beginning even to die, thy knees to wax cold and stiff, thy nostrils to run out, thine eyes to sink into thy head, and all the parts of thy body to lose their office to assist thee; upon this supposal lift up thy soul, and look about thee, (O I can tell thee, if thou livest and diest in sin) there would be nowhere any comfort, but a world of terror and perplexity: look upwards, there shouldst thou see the terrible sword of God's justice threatening; look downwards, there shouldst thou see the grave in expectation ready gaping; look within thee, there shouldst thou feel the worm of conscience bitter gnawing; look without thee, there shouldst thou see good and evil Angels on both sides, waiting whether of them should have the prey: now alas! (then wouldst thou say) The soul to depart from the body were a thing intolerable, to continue still therein were a thing impossible, and to defer this departure any longer (supposing this hour thy last hour) no Physic could prevail it were a thing unavoidable: what then would thy poor soul do, thus environed with so many straights? O fond fools of Adams sin, that neglect the time till this terrible passage! how much wouldst thou give (if thus it were) for an hours repentance? at what rate wouldst thou value a days contrition? worlds are worthless in respect of a little respite, a short truce would seem more precious then the Treasures of Empires, nothing would then be so much esteemed as a trice of time, which before by months and years thou lavishly mis-spent, Think on thy sins, nay, thou couldst not choose but think, Satan would write them on the curtains of thy bed, and thy agashed eyes would be forced to look upon them, there wouldst thou see thousands committed, not one confessed, or thoroughly repented, then too late thou wouldst begin to wish, O had I lead a better life, and were it to begin again, O then how would I fast and pray, how repent, how live! Certainly, certainly, if thou goest on in sin, thus would be* thy departure, thy carcass lying cold among the stones of the pit, and thy soul, by the weight of sin, irrecoverably sinking into the bottom of that bottomless burning lake.

[Use 2] But to prevent this evil, take this use of advice for thy farwell: whilst yet thy life lasteth, whilst yet the Lord gives thee a gracious day of visitation, ply, ply all those blessed means of salvation, as prayer, and conference, and meditation, and Sermons, and Sacraments, and fastings, and watchings, and patience, and faith, and a good conscience; in a word, so live, that when this day or night of death comes, thou mayest then stand firm and sure: as yet thou art in the way of a transitory life, as yet thou art not entered into the confines of Eternity: if now therefore thou wilt walk in the holy path, if now thou wilt stand out against any sin whatsoever, if now thou wilt take on thee the yoke of our Savior Christ, if now thou wilt associate thyself to that sect and brotherhood, that is everywhere spoken against; if now thou wilt direct thy words to the glorifying of God, and to give grace unto the hearers; if now thou wilt delight in the word, the ways, the Saints, the services of God; if now thou wilt never turn again unto folly, or to thy trade of sin, though Satan set upon thee with his baits and allurements, to detain thee in his bondage, but by one darling delight, one minion-sin, then I dare assure thee, dear, right dear would be thy death in the sight of the Lord: with joy and triumph wouldst thou pass through all the terrors of death, with singing and rejoicing would thy soul be received into those sacred mansions above. O happy soul, if this be thy case! O happy night or day, whensoever the news comes, that then must thy soul be taken from thee!

You may think it now high time, that we bid this far-well-funeral Text adieu. then for conclusion let every word be thy warning. Lest this] be thy time provide for this and every time; lest the night] be dreadful, Do not sleep as do other, but watch and be sober; lest thy soul] should suffer, desire the sufferings of thy God to satisfy, lest death require] it of thee by foree, offer it up to God with a cheerful devotion; and lest this of thee] be fearful, who hast lived in sin, correct these courses, amend your ways, and the blessing of God be with thee all thy life, at the hour of death, now, henceforth, and forever.

AMEN.

FINIS.

Doomes-day

MATTH. 16.27.

Then shall he reward every man according to his works.

THE dependence of this Text is limited in few lines, and that your eyes wander no further then this verse, therein is kept a general Assize; the Judge, Officers, Prisoners stand in array, the Judge is God, and the Son of man; the Officers Angels, and they are his Angels; the Prisoners men, and because of the Gaol-delivery, every man. If you will have all together, you have a Judge his circuit, his habit, his attendants, his judgments: a Judge, the Son of man; his circuit, he shall come; his habit, in the glory of his Father; his attendants, with his Angels: what now remains, but the execution of justice? then without more ado see the Text, and you see all; the scales in his hand, our works in the scales, the reward for our works, of just weight each to other; Then he shall reward every man according to his works.

This Text gives us the proceeding of Doomes-day, which is the last day, the last Sessions, the last Assize that must be kept on earth, or is decreed in heaven; if you expect Sheriffs, or Judges, Plaintiffs or Prisoners, all are in this verse, some in each word. Then] is times Trumpet that proclaims their coming. He] is the Judge that examines all our lives. Reward] is the doom, that proceeds from him in his Throne. Man] is the malefactor, every man] stands before him as a prisoner, Works are the inditements, and according to our works] must go the trial howsoever we have done, good or evil.

Give me yet leave, this Judge sits on trials as well as prisoners; it is an high Court of appeal, where Plaintiffs, Counsellors, Judges all must appear and answer: would you learn the proceedings? there is the Term, Then] the Judge, he] the sentence, shall reward] the parties, very man] the trial itself, which you may find in all to be just and legal, every man his rewards according to his works.]

We have opened the Text, and now you shall have the hearing.

Then.]

Then: when? the answer is

- Negative,
- Positive.

First, Negative, Then] not on a sudden, or (at least) not at this present. This life is no time to receive rewards, the rain and Sun pleasure both the good and bad, nay, oftentimes the bad fare best, and God's own children are most fiercely fined in the furnace of affliction, The earth is given into the hands of the wicked, saith Job: but, if any man will follow me, he must take up his cross, saith our Savior. Joy, and pleasure, and happiness attend the ungodly, while God's poor servants run thorough the thicket of briars and brambles to the kingdom of heaven: but shall not the Judge of all the world do right? a time shall come when both these must have their change; Mark the upright and behold the just, for the end of that man is peace, but the transgressors shall be destroyed together, and the end of the wicked shall be cut off: Psal. 37.38. The effect of things is best known to us in some issue of time, and then shall we have our rewards, when the Son of man shall come in the glory of his Father. Let this admonish us to have patience in all our expectations: what is it to suffer a while, an inch of time, considering the reward is great indeed, everlasting in durance? Rest in the Lord (saith David) and wait patiently for him, fret not thyself for him which prospereth in his way: and will you know the reason? for yet a little while, and the wicked shall not be, but the meek shall inherit the earth, and shall delight themselves in the abundance of peace: Psal. 37.10, 11. So they shall indeed, if only they will expect a little time; not now, but Then] stay yet a while, and be sure anon the reward shall be given.

2. But to answer positively, this Then is no other then Doomes-day, and when that shall be, will be known best by

- Conjectures,
- Signs.

We will begin with the former.

[1] Some would have it in the year 6000. from the beginning of the world: this was the sentence of Elias (say the Jews) whose prophesy thus runs, two thousand years before the Law, two thousand under the Law, and two thousand under the Gospel: how untrue this sounds, any one may guess that considers: in the first number he fails because it was too little; in the second number he errs, because it was too much: and if Elias say amiss for the time now past, how should we believe him for that yet to come? Others, besides testimony produce reason, that as God was creating the world six days, so he must be a governing it six thousand years, heres a seeming proportion, but upon what reason? Every day, (say they) must be a thousand years with man, because a thousand years, are but as one day with God. It were too frivolous a pains to repeat anymore, or to answer these: Is not this sacrilege, to break into God's place and pry into his Sanctuary? Why should we presume to know more then God would have us? Look at the Apostles, were they not God's Secretaries? Look at the Angels, are they not God's Heralds? Look at Christ himself, is he not the Son of God? and yet as he is the Son of man, he speaks of all, Of that day and hour knoweth no man, no Angel, neither the Son, but the Father only: Mark 13.32. It is not for us to seek where the Lord hath not a tongue to speak Why should we know more then other men, then all men, then Angels, then Christ himself, who (as man) was either ignorant of it, or (at least) had no commission to reveal it. It is not for you to know the times and seasons, which the Father hath put in his own power, Act. 1.7. It is a better use which our Savior makes, Take heed, watch, and pray, for ye know not when the time is, Mark 13.33. As a thief in the night, so is Doomes-day, it come suddenly, it will come shortly: would you needs know when? why then when you least imagine such a matter, then when worldly honors profit nothing, then when kindred & acquaintance fail, then when the world shall be set on fire, then] then] he shall reward every man according to his works.

[2] But secondly, if conjectures fail, the signs are certain: Jerome reports of fifteen miracles for fifteen days, which he writes to have found in the Hebrews Annals, and immediately must precede the Judges coming. The first day (saith he) the sea shall swell, and lift up her waves at least fifteen cubits, above the height of the highest hills. The second day unlike to the former, the sea shall ebb again, and the waves be fallen till they scarce be seen. The third day the sea must return to its ancient course, and so abide that day as it was before. The fourth day, sea monsters shall appear above the sea, whose bellowing roars shall fill the air with cries, which God alone understands, and men shall tremble at. The fifth day, all the fowls of the air shall flock together, and meeting in the fields shall there chatter, and starve for fear of the approaching times. The sixth day, floods of fire shall rise up against the firmament, which kindling at the falling Sun, shall run like a lightning to the rising morn. The seventh day, all stars and planets shall shoot out fiery comets. The eighth day, there shall be a general earth-quake, and the motion so violent, that the ground shall hop, and the living creatures not stand on their feet, that walk on the tottering floores. The ninth day trees shall sweat blood. The tenth day, all the stones of the earth shall war together, and with a thundering noise break one upon another. The eleventh day all buildings shall be ruined, and all the hills and mountains melt into dust and powder. The twelfth day, all beasts of the field shall come from their woods and dens, and so abstaining from their food, shall roar and bellow up and down the plains. The thirteenth day, all graves shall be open, from the rising up of the Sun, unto the going down of the same. The fourteenth day, all men shall come abroad, and such a distraction seize on their heavy hearts, that they shall lose the speech and volubility of their tongues. And the fifteenth (which is the last day) the living men shall die, and the dead shall live again, all above earth be changed, and those in their graves be raised and recovered.

I will not say these things are certain, (I leave you to the author that recites them) but if any whit true, why (blessed Lord!) what a day of appearance shall this be? I know not (saith one) what others may think of it, but for myself, it makes me tremble to consider it. It is a day of anger and wrath, a day of trouble and heaviness, a day of obscurity and darkness, a day of clouds and blackness, a day of the trumpet and alarm against the strong cities, and against the high towers: Zeph. 1.15. I will but run thorough the signs, as we find them in God's writ, and then see if your hearts will not fail for fear.

Then] shall the Sun be darkened: can Nature stand and suffer a general Eclipse? when God died, the Sun could discolour its beauty, and suit itself in black to its makers condition; and now man dies, the Sun is clad again in mourning robes. Alas! what can it do but mourn? God lives, but man-kind dies: though he was the Creator, yet we are the Creatures for whom it was created: when the householder dies, the family grieves: were all eyes dry, here is the eye of the world weeps itself blind to see this dissolution: Is man bereft of compassion, for whom the Sun itself undergoes this passion? think on those times, when darkness that may be felt, shall spread over all the earth; how should plants but wither? or beasts of the field but waste? how should men but die, when they stumble at noon-day? their eyes shall fail them, the light forsake them: miserable men! the Sun shall not shine on them, because God will judge them. But this not all.

Then] shall the moon not give her light: as the day and night are both alike with God, so the day and night shall be alike with man: the Sun will not lend his luster, nor can the Moon borrow anymore light: but what strange war makes this confusion of nature? the Sun shall look black, and the Moon be turned into blood. Here is a new Moon, and such a change as before was never seen: there is no increase, no full, no wane, but all the light is at once extinguished: unhappy creatures that depend upon her influence! how should they live, when she herself wades in blood? God made these Lights for signs, and for seasons, for days, and for years: but now signs are out, seasons past days are done, years abolished: The Angels hath sworn by him that lives forever, that time shall be no longer, Rev. 10.6. Who will not believe that hears this sacred oath? was it a man? no, an Angel:] did he say it? no, he swore it:] how? by himself? no, it was by him that lives forever:] and what? that time must be little? nay it must be no longer, time shall be no more] How shall it be anymore? the Sun is disfigured, the Moon disrobed, both eclipsed. But this not all.

Then] shall the stars be shaken; the powers of Heaven shall move, and the Lamps of Heaven shall tremble: these were God's threats against the Babylonians, Isaiah 13.10. For the stars of Heaven, and the Planets thereof shall not give their light. Against the Egyptians, Ezek. 32.7. I will cover the heaven, and make the stars dark over thee: Against all his enemies, Joel 3.15. The Sun and Moon shall be darkened, (but not they alone, for) and the stars themselves shall withdraw their shining: But what speak we of darkness, or the stars not shining? they shall not only dim, but down. In those days (saith our Savior) after that tribulation, the Sun and Moon shall darken, and the stars of heaven shall fall: how fall? so thick (say Expositors) that the Firmament shall seem to be without all light. I cannot say these signs shall be real; whether it is by subtraction of their light, or the conceit of brain-troubled sinners or the fall of some inflamed vapors, or the Apostasy of some enlightened persons: for certain (to speak literally) there shall be some change in the whole order of Nature: Sun and Moon, Stars and Planets, all must lose their lights, and by all likely-hood, it is the glory of the Judge that will dazel those Candles. Neither is this all.

Then] shall the Elements melt, the fire shall fall down from heaven, the air turn itself into vapors, the Sea swell above all Clouds, the earth be full of yawning Cliffes, and violent tremblings. A fire shall first usher the Judge, and such a fire as shall have the property of all fires; that fire in its sphere, this fire on earth, the fearful fire which torments in hell, all shall meet in one, and according to their several qualities, produce their several effects: the just shall be refined by one, the wicked shall be tormented by another, the earth be consumed by a third: There is no creature but it must be fuel for this fire; as the first world was destroyed with water, to quench the heat of their lust, so must this be destroyed with fire to warm the cold of our charity. But not the fire alone.

Then] shall the air breed wonders: what shall be seen but lightnings, whirl-winds, coruscations, blazing stars, flashing thunders? here a Comet runs round in a circuit, there a Crown compasseth that Comet; near them a fiery Dragon fums in flames everywhere appears a shooting fire, as if all above us were nothing but inflamed air. Yet not the air alone.

Then] shall the waters roar, Rivers shall wax dry, the Sea froth, and foam, and fume: those that dwell near shall wonder at the swelling tides, others a far off shall tremble at the roaring noise: what threats are those which the Surges murmur? war is proclaimed by noise, set on by blasts, continued by storms, the floods and tides shall run over all the plains, the the Sea and waves shall mount up to the very skyes; now would they war with Heaven, then overwhelm the earth, anon will they sink to hell: and thus shall they rove and rage, as if they would threat all the world with a second inundation. Nay yet again.

Then] shall the earth be shaken in divers places (saith Matthew) in all places (saith Joel) for all the earth shall tremble before him: here is an Earth-quake indeed; not some part of the land, by reason of some cloystered wind, but the Rocks, Mountains, Castles, Cities, Countries, some shall remove, others be ruined; thus all the earth shall be as a swallowing gulf, that all things here situated, may be then devoured. What can I more?

Then] shall Plants cease their growth, Beasts want their sense, men loose their reason: were this but little? you may wonder more. The Sibylls could affirm, that Nature should both cease, and change her being, the Trees instead of growth should sweat out blood, the Beasts should bellow up & down the fields, then want their sense. Men should have disfigured faces, astonished hearts, affrighted looks, then lose their reason: nay, what marvel then, if at the worlds end, they be at their wits end? O fearful signs, enough to move flintie stones! if this be the Term, what is the Suit, the Bill, the Doom, the Execution? a Trump shall summon, Death will arrest, God must have appearance, and Then] is the day: Then] he shall reward every man according to his works.

What a Chaos is here, when the world must be thus turned topsie torvie? the Sun the Moon, the Starrs; come yet lower, the Fire, the Air, the Sea, the Earth; nay Trees, and Beasts, and Men, all must be out of order in the whole course of Nature.

[Use. 1] Who can read or hear this Prognostication of Dooms-day, and not wonder at the signs which shall hang over our heads? we see by experience when any out-ragious storm happens on Sea or Land, how wonderfully men are dismayed, how strangely astonished: now then, when the Heavens, the Earth, the Sea, the Air shall be wholly distempered and disordered; when the Sun shall threaten with mourning, the Moon with blood, the Stars with their falling: yea when all the heavens shall shrink and pass away as a paper scroule, who then dares eat or drink, or sleep, or take a minutes rest? Be sure these days shall come, and the signs shall pass: Awake ye Drunkards, and weep all ye drinkers of Wine, because of the new wine; for it shall be pulled from your mouths. Gird yourselves, and lament ye Priests, howl ye Ministers of the Altar: alas! for the day, for the day of the Lord is at hand, and as a destruction from the Almighty shall it come. What are ye insensible of these signs? the imprisoned thief fears at the news of the assize: and is the sinner so impudent that he fears nothing? The day shall come when the men of earth shall fear, and be full of fear; every sign shall breed a wonder, and ever sight shall breed a wondrous terror, men shall hide themselves in the caves of beasts, and the beasts seek shall to save themselves in the houses of men: where then shall the wicked stand, when all the world shall be thus in uproar.

[Use. 2] Yet a word for us all, we have all warning, and we had best to provide; yet the weather is fair, we may frame an Ark to save us from the flood; yet are the Angels at the gates of Sodom; yet is Jonas in the streets of Nineveh: yet the Prophet woos, O Judah, how should I entreat thee? yet the Apostle prays, nay, we pray you in Christ's stead that ye will be reconciled unto God: to conclude, yet the Bride-groom stays the Virgins leisure; Lord that they would make speed, seeing the joys of heaven tarry for them. This Term is at hand, and is it not time to petition to the Judge of heaven? what a dangerous course is it, never to call to mind that Time of Times, until we see the Earth flaming, the Heavens melting, the Judgment hastening, the Judge with all his Angels coming in the Clouds, to denounce the last doom upon all flesh, which shall be unto some Woe, woe, when they shall call to the mountains to cover them, and for shame of their sins, hide themselves (if it were possible) in hell fire: if we have any fear this should move fear, if we have any care this should move us all to be careful indeed. We have not two souls that we may hazard one, neither have we two lives, that we may trust to another, but as thy last day leaves thee, so will this Doomes-day find thee. Who would not but accept the fatherly fore-warning of Christ our Savior? See you not how many signs, as the Heralds and fore runners of his glorious coming? The abounding of iniquity the waxing cold of charity, the rising up of Nation against Nation. Was there ever less love? was there ever more hatred? Where is that Jonathan that loves David as his own soul? nay, where is not that Joab, that can embrace friendly, but carries a malicious heart towards Abner? sure we are near the end indeed, when charity is grown thus cold. You then that would have the comfort of the day, take these signs for warnings, provide for him who hath thus long waited for you; and seeing you look for such things, be diligent that ye may be found of him in peace, without spot, and blamless. Who would endanger their souls for a little sin? busy Clients heed nothing but their cause, and if you would recover heaven, be sure that ye mark this Tearm. The time draws on, now the Writs are out, anon comes the Judge, and Then is the day. Then] he shall reward every man according to his work.

You see the Tearm, and now you may expect to view the Judge: the Tearm is Then] the Judge is He.] Stay a while and the next time you shall see him in his judgment seat.

He.]

HE? who? if you look at the fore-going words you may see who he is: The son of man shall come in the glory of his father, and it is he that shall reward us according to our works.

This title of the Son of man, denotes unto us the humility of the Son of God; what is the Son of man, but man? and this tells us how humble he was for us, that being God▪ was made man, or the Son of Man, which is as all one, according to that, Psal. 8.4. What is man that thou art mindful of him, or the Son of man that visitest him?

It is true, God is the Judge of all: Heb. 12.23. and yet it is as true, this God is man, Acts 17.31. God (saith Paul) will judge the world, but it is by that man whom he hath ordained. God hath the power, but God as man hath only the Commission. He (who is God) hath given him Authority to execute judgment. And would you know the reason? it is only because he is the Son of man, Joh. 5.27. In a word, God shall judge, the whole Trinity by prescription, Christ only in execution: the Father judgeth but by the Son; or as the Evangelist John, the Father judgeth no man but hath committed all judgment to the Son: John 5.22.

But because as man, there appears in him a double form, as humbled, as glorified; we'll discuss these questions, which resolve all doubts.

- 1. Whether Christ, as man shall appear unto us, when he will reward us.
- 2. Whether man, as glorified shall appear unto us, when he will reward us.

To the first we say, that only as man he will appear our judge, who as man appeared when himself was judged; what better reason to express the benefit of our redemption then so to judge us as he did redeem us? was he not man that suffered, died, and was buried? and is he not man that one day shall come to judge both the quick and dead? he that came obscurely to be judged by the unjust, shall then appear openly to judge all the just: the same man, who is God and man, shall be our judge in his human nature, by his divine power. Thus we say, God, (who is the ancient of days) hath the power original; but man (who is the Son of God) hath the power traduced, and therefore saith Daniel, One like the Son of man came with the clouds of heaven, and came to the ancient of days, and they brought him here before him, and there was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom.

[Use.] Consider this, ye that are going to the Bar; what a sight will this be to the faithless Jews, stubborn Gentiles, wicked Christians, when every eye shall see him, and they also which pierced him: This is the man (shall they say) that was crucified for us, and again crucified by us: why alas! every sin is a Cross, every oath is a Spear, and when that day is come, you must behold the man, whom thus you do crucify by your daily sins: Sure this will be a fearful fight; where is the bloody swearer, that can tear his wounds, and heart, and blood and all? at this day of Doom those wounds shall appear, that heart be visible, that body and blood be seen both of good and bad, and then shall that fearful voice proceed from his Throne, this was the heart thou piercedst, these are the wounds thou racedst, and this is the blood thou spilledst: Here is the fearful judgment, when thou that art the murderer shall see the slain man sit thy Judge, what favor canst thou expect at his hands, whom thou hast so vilely abused by thy daily sins? be sure the Son of man will come, as it is written of him, but woe be unto that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed, it had been good for that man if he had not been born, Matth. 26.24.

To the second question we answer; that as Christ shall appear in the form of man, so this man shall appear in a glorious form: he that is a Mediator betwixt God and man, must both intercede for man to God, and communicate those things which are of God to man, to this purpose both these offices are agreeable to him, in that he participates of both extremes; he is man to abide the judgments due from God, he is God to convey all his benefits unto man: as then, in his first coming, he pleased God by taking the infirmities of man upon him, so in his second coming will he judge us men, by appearing in that glory which he derives from God. But look about you! who is this Judge arrayed in such a majesty? A fire devours before him, and behind him a flame burns up, on every side the people tremble, and all faces shall gather blackness: here is a change indeed, he that was in a cratch, now sits on a Throne; then Christ stood like a Lamb before Pilate, now Pilate stands like a malefactor before Christ, he that was once made the footstool of his enemies, must now judge, till he hath made all his enemies his footstool. Where shall they run? and how shall they seek the cliffs of the rocks, and hollow places? the glory of his Majesty kindles a flame, while the heaven and earth shall fly from the presence of this Judge. O ye heavens! why do ye fly away? what have ye done? why are ye afraid? it is the Majesty of the Judge that will amaze the innocent, the greatness of whose indignation, will be able to strike all the heavens with terror and admiration; when the Sea is out-ragious, and tempestuous he that stands on the shore will be struck into a kind of fear: or when the Father goes like a Lyon about his house, in punishing his bond-slave, the innocent son stands in great fear and trouble: and how then shall the wicked tremble, when the very heavens shall be afraid? If the goodly Cedars of Lebanon be shaken, what shall become of the tender twiggs in the Desert? if the sturdy Rams stoop and tremble, how will the bleating Lambes cry and run away? and if the just and righteous scarcely be saved, where shall the ungodly and the sinner appear? The mountains and heavens shall melt before the Lord; and what stony hearts have we, that (for all this) are nothing at all yet moved?

But (may be) I prevent you expectation, if here be a Judge where is the guard? behold him coming from above with great power and glory: would you know this habit? he is clothed with Majesty: seek you the color; 'tis the brightness of his Father: would you view his attendants? they are an host of Angels: look you for the guard? they are a troop of shining Cherubims: nay, yet see a longer train, a further company, the souls of Saints descend from their imperial seats, and attend the Lamb with great glory, and glorious majesty: never was any Judge Lord of such a circuit: his footstool are the Clouds, his seat the Rain-bow, his justices Saints, his officers Angels, and the Arch-Angels Trump proclaims a silence, whilst a just sentence comes from his mouth on all the world. Thus are the Assizes begun to be solemnized the thrones (as Daniel saw in in his vision) were set up, and the ancient of days sate down, his garments white as snow, and the hair of his head like pure wool his Throne like the fiery flame, and his wheels as burning fire, Dan. 7.9. This is the Judge whose coming is so fearful, ushered by a fiery flood, appareled in snowy white, carried in his circuit on burning wheels, and attended with the number of thousand thousands. O ye Jews, behold the man, whom before you crucified like a Malefactor, behold him in his Throne, whom you said, his Disciples had stolen by night out of his grave: behold him in his Majesty, whom you would not deigne to look upon in his humility; the baser you esteemed his weakness, the heavier must you find and feel his mightiness. The Son of man appears, and the kindred of the earth must mourn; such a shout of fury follows the sight of his Majesty, that the vaults shall echo, the hills resound, the earth shake, the heavens change their situation, and all be turned to a confusion; then shall the wicked weep and wail, and yet their tears not serve their turn, their sins past betray them, their shame present condemns them, and their torment to come confounds them; thus shall they bewail their miserable hap, their unfortunate birth, and their cursed end: O fearful Judge, terrible as an Army with Banners; turn away thine eyes from us, which overcome the proudest Potentates: the Kings of the earth shall be astonished, and the Nations of the Isles shall fear from far: Every eye shall see him whom they have pierced, and tremble at the presence of his sight. Conceive the guilty prisoner coming to his trial, will not the red robes of his Judge, make his heart bleed for his blood-shed? doth not that scarlet Cloath present a monstrous hew before his eyes? O then! what sight is this, when the man slain, sits in the judgment seat, the rosie wounds of our Savior still bleeding (as it were) in the prisoners presence? These are the wounds, not as tokens of infirmity, but victory, and these now shall appear, not as if he must suffer, but to show us he hath suffered. See here an object full of glory, splendor, majesty, excellency, and this is He] the man, the judge the rewarder of every man according to his works.

The Judge we have set in his Throne, and before we appear, let us practice our repentance, that we answer the better.

[Use. 1] Think but (O sinner) what shall be thy reward, when thou shalt meet this Judge; The adultery for a while may flatter beauty, the Swearer grace his words with oaths, the Drunkard kiss his cups, and drink his bodies-health, till he bring his soul to ruin: but remember for all these things God will bring thee to judgment. Cold comfort in the end: the Adulterer shall satisfy his lust, when he lies on a bed of fire, all hugged and embraced with those flames; the swearer shall have enough of wounds and blood, when Devils torture his body, and rack his soul in hell, the Drunkard shall have plenty of his Cups, when scalding lead shall be poured down his throat, and his breath draw flames of fire instead of air: as is thy sin, so is the nature of thy punishment, the just Judge shall give just measure, and the balance of his wrath poize in a just proportion.

[Use. 2] Yet I will not discomfort you, who are these Judges dearest favorites; Now is the day (if you are God's servants) that Satan shall be trod under your feet, and you with your Lord and Master Christ, shall be carried into the holiest of holies. You may remember how all the men of God in their greatest anguishes here below, have fetched comfort by the eye of faith at this mountain: Job rejoiced being cast on the Dung-hill, that his Redeemer lived, and that he should see him at the last day stand on the earth: John longed and cried; Come Lord Jesus, come quickly; and had we the same precious faith, we have the same precious promises: why then are we not ravished at the remembrance of these things? certainly there is an happy faith (wheresoever it shall be found) that shall not be ashamed at that day▪ Now therefore little children abide in him, that when he shall appear, we may have confidence▪ Confidence; what else? I will see you again (saith our Savior-Judge) and your heart shall rejoice, and your joy no man taketh from you. O blessed mercy, that so triumphes against judgment; our hearts must joy, our joys endure and all this occasioned by the sight of our Savior; for He] shall reward every man according to his works.

We have prepared the Judge for sentence: he hath rid his circuit in the Clouds, and made the Rain-bow his chair of state, for his judgment seat; his Sheriffs are the Saints, that now rise from the Dust to meet their Judge, whom long they have expected: the summons is sent out by a shout from heaven; the cry no sooner made, but the graves fly open, and the dead arise: stay a while till I ready them; you have seen the Judge, and now we prepare the judged. He] is the Judge; every man] the judged: and He shall reward every man according to his works.

Every man.]

The persons to be judged are a world of men, all men of the world, good, and bad, elect and reprobates, but in a different manner: To give you a full view of them, I must lead your attentions orderly through these passages, there must be a Citation, Resurrection, Collection, Separation: follow me in these paths, and you may see both the men and their difference, before they come to their judgments.

First, there is a summons and Every man must hear it; it is performed by a shout from heaven, and the voice of the last Trump; the clangor of this Trump could ever sound in Jerome's ears, Arise ye dead, and come to judgment: the clangor of this Trump will sound in all men's ears, it shall wake the dead out of their drouzy sleep, and change the living from their mortal state, make devils tremble, and the whole world shake with terror: A terrible voice, a Trumpet shall sound, that shall shake the world, rend the rocks, break the mountains, dissolve the bonds of death, burst down the gates of hell, and unite all spirits to their own bodies. What say you to this Trump, that can make the whole Universe to tremble? no sooner shall it sound, but the the earth shall shake, the mountains skip like Ramms, and the little hills like young sheep: it shall pierce the waters, and fetch from the bottom of the Sea the dust of Adams seed, it shall tear the rocky Tombes of earthly Princes, and make their haughty minds to stoop before the King of heaven; it shall remove the center, and tear the bowels of the earth, open the graves of all the dead, and fetch their souls from heaven or hell, to reunite them to their bodies. A dreadful summons of the wicked, whom this sudden noise will no less astonish, then confound; the dark pitchy walls of that infernal pit of hell, shall be shaken with the shout, when the dreadful soul shall leave its place of terror, and once more re-enter into her stinking Carrion, to receive a greater condemnation: what terror will this be to the wicked wretch? what woeful salutations will there be between that body and soul, which living together in the height of iniquity, must now be re-united to enjoy the fullness of their misery? The voice of Christ is powerful, the dead shall hear his voice, and they shall come forth, they that have done good unto the resurrection of life, and they that have done evil, unto the resurrection of condemnation.

You hear the summons, and the next is your appearance; death the Goaler brings all his prisoners from the grave, and they must stand and appear before the Judge of heaven.

The summons is given, and every man must appear: Death must now give back all their spoils, and restore again all that she hath took from the world. What a gastly sight will this be, to see all the Sepulchers open, to see dead men rise out of their graves, and the scattered dust to fly on the wings of the wind, till it meet together in one compacted body? Ezekiel's dry bones shall live: thus saith the Lord, I will lay sinews upon you, and make flesh grow upon you, and cover you with skin, and put breath in you, and you shall know that I am the Lord, Ezek. 37.6. This dust of ours shall be devoured of worms, consumed by Serpents, which crawl and spring from the marrow of our bones: look in a dead man's grave, and see what you find; but dust, and worms, and bones, and skulls, putrefied flesh, an house full of stench and vermin; Behold then the power of God Almighty, out of this grave and dust of the earth; from these chambers of death and darkness, shall arise the bodies of the buried, the graves will fly open, and the dead go out; not an hair, not a dust, not a bone shall be denied, but whatsoever holds their dust shall yield their bodies: I saw the dead (saith John) small and great stand before God; and the Sea gave up the dead which were in it, and death and hell delivered up the dead which were in them, and they were judged every man according to their works, Revel. 20.13. what a wonderful sight will this be, to see the sea and earth bring forth in all parts such variety of bodies: to see so many sorts of people & nations to come together? huge armies, innumerable, as the Caterpillars of Egypt, all shall arise, and everyone appear before the Lord's Tribunal: worms, and corruption, cannot hinder the resurrection, he that said to Corruption, thou art my father, and to the worm thou art my sister and mother, said also, I know that my Redeemer liveth, and mine eyes shall behold him. O good God! how wonderful is thy power? this flesh of ours shall turn to dust▪ be eat of worms, consume to nothing, if there be any relics of our ashes, the wind may scatter them, the blasts divide them, our feet trample them, the beasts digest them, the vermin devour them; if nothing, yet time will consume them. But for all this, God is as able to raise us from the dust, as to create us of the dust, not one dust of this clay shall perish, though scattered, divided trampled, devoured, consumed, it shall be gathered, recovered, revived, refined and raised; and as one dust shall not be lost of one man, so neither shall one man be lost of all the world: this is that general day that shall congregate all, they shall come from the four winds and corners of the world, to make an universal appearance; all the children of Adam shall then meet together; yea, all the kindreds of the earth shall meet together, and mourn; Assemble yourselves, and come all ye heathen to the valley of Jehoshaphat, for there will I sit to judge all the heathen, Joel 3.12.

The summons are sounded, the dead raised, and yet to give you a fuller view of the parties, see how God the Judge now sends his messengers, to fetch the living bodies to his Court.

[Use. 3] He shall send his Angels (saith our Savior) and they shall gather together his Elect from the four winds, from one end of heaven to another, Matth. 24.31. True it is, all shall be gathered, yet with a difference, some with a swift pace fly to the Throne, where is the hope of their deliverance; others draw and pull back, while the Angels hale them to the Judgment seat; the righteous have nimble swift bodies, that fly to the Judge, as a Bird to her nest and young ones; but the wicked have their bodies black and heavy, they cannot fly, but flag in the air, and the Angels do not bear, but dragge them to the judgment seat: how can this choose but fear the wicked, when like malefactors, they are brought before the wrathful judge? as they were born or buried, so must they rise again naked and miserable; what a shame is this? and yet the more horrible, in that their nakedness shall be covered with a filthy blackness; needs must desperate fears sieze one the soul, when it is again united to her body, transformed to such an ugly form: is this the body fed with delights and delicates? is this the flesh pampered with ease and lust? is this the face masked from the wind and Sun? are these the hands decked with Rings and Diamonds? how become these so swarthy horrible, which before were so fair and amiable? this the change of the wicked, when through sorrow and confusion they shall cry to the Rocks, cover our nakedness, and to the hills hide our ugliness; nay, rather than appear, let the infernal Furies tear and totter us into a thousand pieces. Look your beauties (Beloved) in this glass: such is the end of this worlds glory, so vain the pleasure of this body. Now is the end of all things come and what remains, but a sea of fears and miseries rushing on them: before shall the Angels drag them, behind shall the black Crew follow them, within shall their consciences torture them, and without shall hot flames of fire fume, and fry and furiously torment them; fear within, & fire without: but worse then all, a Judge above all, thither must they go, Angels usher them, Devils attend them, the Cryer hath called them, the Angels trump hath summoned them, and now they must appear.

We have brought all together, now we must part them asunder, the sheep shall be put on the right hand, and the goats on the left, as every man hath deserved.

Two travellers go together, feed together, lie together, sleep together, but in the morn their ways part asunder: thus the sheep and goats eat together, drink together, sleep together, rot together but at this day there shall be a separation, let them grow together, corn and tares until the harvest: this world is the floor, fan while you will, there will be some chaff; love peace like lambs their will be some goats to trouble; the sheep and goats live both together in one fold, the world; lie both together in one cote, the grave: the world is a common Inn, which entertains all manner of passengers: the rode-way to death, is the Kings high-way free for all travellers: after the passage of this weary day, death hath provided a large bed to lay all in, the grave: all live together, and all lie together, all rest together, and all rot together: but when this night is past, and the last day is sprung, then is the woeful separation; some turn on the right, and those are the blessed; others on the left hand, and those are the cursed. Here is the beginning of woes, when the wicked shall curse, and howl, like the fiendes of hell. O Lord, punish me here (saith one devoutly) rack me in pieces, cut me in shreds, burn me in fire, so that I may be there placed at thy right hand: Blessed are they that have a place amongst those elect sheep; what now remains but their doom, which is a lot that must befall every man? for he shall reward (not one, or some, but everyone) every man according to his works.

The Summons are given, the dead are raised, the prisoners conducted to the bar, and the sheep and goats severed asunder each from other.

[Use. 1] And now see the parties thus summoned, raised, gathered, severed; is not here a world of men to be judged all in one day? Multitudes, multitudes in the valley of decision, for the day of the Lord is near in the valley of decision. Joel 3.14. Blessed God! what a multitude shall stand before thee? all tongues, all nations, all people of the earth shall appear at once, all we shall then behold each son of Adam, and Adam our grand-father shall then see all his posterity. Consider this, high and low, rich and poor, one with another, God is no acceptor of persons. Hark, O beggar, petitions are out of date, and yet thou needest not fear thou shalt have justice, this day all causes shall be heard, and thou (though a poor one) must appear with others to receive thy sentence. Hark, O Farmer, now are thy lives and leases together finished, this day is the new harvest of thy Judge, who gathers his wheat into his garner, and burns up the chaff in fire unquenchable, no boon, no bribe, no prayers, no tears can avail thy soul: but as thou hast done, so art thou sentenced at the first appearing. Hark, O Land-lord, where is thy purchase to thee and thy heirs forever? this day makes an end of all, and happy were thy soul, if thou hadst no better land then a barren rock, to cover and shelter thee from the Judges presence. Hark, O Captain, vain now is the hope of man to be saved by the multitude of an host: hadst thou command of all the armies on earth and hell, yet couldest thou not resist the power of Heaven: see, the trump sounds, and the alarm summons thee, thou must appear. Hark, O Prince, what is the crown and scepter against thunder? the greatness of man, when it comes to encounter with God is weakness and vanity. Hark, all the world, From him that sitteth upon the glorious throne, unto him that is beneath in earth and ashes; from him that is clothed in blue silk and weareth a crown, even to him that is clothed in simple linen: all must appear before him, the Beggar, Farmer, Land-lord, Captain, King, and Prince, and every man, (when that day is come) shall receive his rewards according to his works.

[Use. 2] But O here is the misery, Every man must appear, but Every man will not think on it: would you know the sign of that man which this day shall be blessed? it is he, and only he, that again and again thinks on this day, that Jerome-like meditates on this summons, and resurrection, and collection, and separation. Examine then yourselves by this rule; is your mind often carried to these objects? soar you on high with the wings of faith; and a sound eye to this hill? why then, you are right birds, truly bred, and not of the bastard brood? I pray you mark it, every cross and disgrace, and slander, and discountenance, loss of goods, disease of body or whatsoever calamity if you are the children of God, and destined to sit at the right hand of our Savior) they will ever and anon, be carrying your minds to those objects of Doomes-day. And if you can but say that experimentally you find this true in yourselves, if ordinarily in your miseries, or other times, you think on this time of refreshing, then be of good comfort, for you are of the brides company, and shall enter into the marriage-chamber to abide there there forever. But if you are destitute of these kind of motions, O then strive for these properties, that are the inseparable breathings and movings of an holy heart, sound mind, and blessed person: every day meditate that every man shall appear one day, and receive his reward according to his works.

You see how we have followed the cause, and well-near brought it to final sentence, the term is discovered, the Judge revealed, the prisoners prepared, and the next time we shall bring them to the bar, to receive their rewards. This time depart in peace, and the God of peace keep your souls spotless without sin, that you may be well prepared for this day of judgment.

According to his works.]

WEe have brought the prisoners to their trial, and now to go on, how should this trial be? I answer: not by faith, but works; by faith we are justified, by works we are judged: faith only causeth, but works only manifest that we are just indeed. Here then is the trial, that every soul of man must undergo that day. Works are the matter that must be first inquired of: and is there any wicked man to receive his sentence? let him never hope to be saved by another's super-erogating, the matter of enquiring is not aliena, but sua, not another's, but his] works. Or is there any good man on whom the smiling Judge is ready to pronounce a blessed doom? Let him never boast of meriting heaven by his just deservings; see the reward given, not propter, but secundum, (as Gregory tells us) not for his works, as if they were the cause, but according to his works] as being the best witnesses of his inward righteousness.

But the better to acquaint you with this trial, there be two points, of which especially we are to make inquiry.

- First, how all men's works shall be manifest to us?
- Secondly, how all men's works shall be examined by God?

1. Of the manifestation of every man's work, John speaketh, And I saw the dead small and great stand before God, and the books were opened, and another book was opened, which is the book of life, and the dead were judged out of those things which were written in the books according to their works, Revel. 20.12. God is said to have books, not properly, but figuratively: all things are as certain and manifest to him, as if he had registers in heaven to keep records of them. Remember this, O forgetful! you may commit, add multiply your sins, and yet run on score till they are grown so many, that they are out of memory; but God keeps them in a register, and not one shall be forgotten, there is a book and books, and when all the dead shall stand before God to receive their sentence, then must these books be opened.

That is, the book of

- God's memory,
- Mans conscience,
- Eternal life.

There is a book of God's memory, and herein are all the acts and monuments of all men whatsoever, enrolled and registered; A book of remembrance was written before God, for them that feared the Lord, and thought upon his name, Malac. 3.16. This is that which manifests all secrets, whether mental or actual; this is that which reveals all doings, whether good or evil. In these Records are found at large Abel's sacrifice, Cain's murder, Absalom's rebellion, David's devotion, the Jews cruelty, the Prophets innocence, good men's intentions, and the sinners actions; nothing shall be hid when this book is opened, for all may run and read it, stand and hear it. How fond are we that imagine heavens eye (such is this book) to be shut upon us? Do we not see many run to corners to commit their sins? there can they say, Let us take our fill of love until the morning, for darkness hath covered us, and who seeth us? who knoweth us? Isaiah. 29.15. But are not the Angels of God about you? We are a spectacle to the Angels (saith the Apostle) I am sure we must be to both, to Angels, and to men, and to all the world: O do not that before the Angels of God, yea before the God of Angels, which you would shame to do in the sight and presence of an earthly man! Alas, must our thoughts be known, and shall not dark-corner sins be revealed? must every word and syllable we speak be writ and recorded in God's memorable book: and must not ill deeds, ill demeanors, ill works of darkness be disclosed at that day? yes; God shall bring every work unto judgment, with every secret thing, be it good or evil, Eccles. 12.14. Wail ye wicked, and tremble in astonishment. Now your closet-sins must be disclosed your private faults laid open, God's keeps the account-book of every sin, every transgression: Imprimis, for adultery, Item for envy, blasphemy, oaths, drunkenness, violence, murder, and every sin, from the beginning to this time, from our birth to our burial, the total sum, eternal death and damnation: this is the note of accounts, wherein are all thy offenses written, the debt is death, the pay perdition, which fury pays over to destruction.

But there is another book, that shall give (a more full, I cannot say, but) a more fearful evidence then the former, which is the book of every man's conscience: Some call it the book of testimony, which every man still bears about him. There is within us a Book and Secretary, the Book is Conscience, and the Secretary is our soul: whatsoever we do is known to the soul, and writ in our book of conscience: there is no man can so much as commit one sin, but his soul, that is privy to the fact, will write it in this book. In what a woeful case will thy heart then be? in what strange terror and trembling must it stand possessed, when this must be opened, and thy sins revealed? It is now perhaps a book shut up and sealed, but in the day of judgment shall be opened: and if once opened, what shall be the evidence that it will bring forth? there is a private Sessions to be held in the breast of every condemned sinner, the memory is Recorder, grief an Accuser, truth is the Law, damnation the Judgment, hell the Prison, Devils the Jaylours, and Conscience both Witness and Judge to pass sentence on thee.

What hopes he at the general Assize, whose conscience hath condemned him before he appear? Look well to thy life, thou bearest about thee a book of testimony, which though for a time it be shut, till it be full fraught with accusations, yet then (at the Day of Doom) it must be opened, when thou shalt read, and weep and read, every period stop with a sigh, every word be enough to break thy heart, and every syllable reveal some secret, thy own conscience (upon the matter) being both witness, Judge accuser and condemner.

But yet there is another book we read of, and that is the book of life: Herein are written all the names of God's elect, from the beginning of the world till the end thereof: these are the golden leaves; this is that precious book of heaven, wherein if we are registered, not all the powers of hell, or death, or devils shall blot us out again. Here is the glory of each devout soldier of our Savior, how many have spent their lives, spilled their bloods, run upon sudden deaths to gain a perpetual name? and yet for all their doings, many of these are dead, and gone, and their memories perished with them; only Christ's soldier hath immortal fame, he, and only he is writ in that book that must never perish. Come hither ye ambitious! your names may be writ in Chronicles, yet lost; writ in durable marble, yet perish; writ in a monument equal to a Colossus, yet be ignominious. O were you but writ in this book of life, your names should never die, never suffer any ignominy! It is an axiom most true, they that are written in the eternal leaves of heaven shall never be wrapped in the cloudy sheets of darkness. Here then is the joy of Saints, at that Day of Doom this book shall be opened, and all the elect whom God hath ordained to salvation, shall see it, read it, hear it, and greatly rejoice at it. The Disciples casting out devils, return with miracles in their mouths, O Lord (say they) even devils are subject to us through thy name. True (saith Christ) I saw Satan as lightning fall from heaven, notwithstanding in this rejoice not, that the spirits are subject unto you, but rather rejoice because your names are written in heaven, Luke 10.20. And well may the Saints rejoice that have their names written in God's book, they shall see them (to their comfort) writ in letters of gold, penned with the Almighty's finger, engraven with a pen of a diamond: thus will this book give in the evidence, and accordingly will the Judge proceed to sentence.

[Use 1] Consider (thou that readest) what books one day must be set before thee: a time will come when every thought of thy heart, every word of thy mouth, every glance of thy eye, every moment of thy time, every office thou hast born, every company thou hast used, every sermon thou hast heard, every action thou hast done, and every omission of any duty or good deed thou hast left undone, shall be seen in these books at the first opening of them: thy conscience shall then be suddenly, clearly, and universally enlarged with extraordinary light to look upon all thy life at once; God's memory shall then shine forth, and show itself, when all men looking on it as a reflecting glass, they shall behold all the passages of their misspent lives from their births to their burials. Where is the wicked and deceitful man? wilt thou yet commit thy villainies, treacheries, robberies, murders, debates, and impieties? Let me tell thee (if so) to thy hearts-grief, all thy secret sins, and closet villainies, that no eye ever looked upon (but that which is a thousand times brighter than the Sun) shall then be disclosed and laid open before Angels, men, and devils, and thou shall then and there be horribly, universally, and everlastingly ashamed: never therefore go about to commit any sin, because it is midnight, or that the doors are locked upon thee, suppose it be concealed, and lie hid (in as great darkness as it was committed) till Dooms-day again, yet then shall it out with a witness, and be as legible in thy forehead, as if it were writ with the brightest stars, or the most glistering Sun beam upon a wall of crystal.

[Use. 2] As you mean the good of your souls amend your lives, call yourselves to account while it is called today, search and examine all your thoughts, words, and deeds, and prostrating yourselves before God, with broken and bleeding affections, pray and sue that your names may be writ in heaven, in that Book of life.] This will be the joy of your hearts, the peace of your souls, the rest of your minds: yea how glad will you then be to have all these books laid open? by this means (I speak it to the comfort of all true hearted Christians) shall your obedience, and repentance, and faith, and love, and zeal, and patience, &c. come to light and be known. God is not unrighteous to forget your works of labor and love. No, all must out, especially at that day when the books shall be open, our works manifested, and as we have done, so must we be rewarded, for then he shall reward every man according to his works.]

The books are opened, and now are the matters to be examined: there is first a view, and then a trial.

[2] The Law-book whereby we are tried contains three leaves, Nature, the Law, and the Gospel: the Gentiles must be tried by the first the unbelieving Jews and Gentiles by the second, and the faithful Jews and Gentiles by the last. Those that confess no God but nature, must be judged by the law of nature: those that confess a God, no Christ, must be judged by the Law of God without the merits of Christ: those that confess God the Father, and believe in God the Son, shall be judged by the Gospel, which reconcileth us to God the Father by the merits of Christ. Atheists by the law of nature, infidels by the law of God, Christians by the Gospel of our Savior Christ. To the statutes of the former who can answer? our hope is in the latter, we appeal to the Gospel, and by the Gospel we shall have our trial: They that have sinned without the law; shall perish without the law; and they that have sinned under the law, shall be judged by the law. But God shall judge the secrets of all hearts (of all our hearts) by Jesus Christ according to my Gospel, Rom. 2.12.16.

[Use.] Let this then forewarn us what we have to do: It is the Gospel that will either thoroughly justify thee, or extremely condemn thee. The Spirit shall convince the world of sin, (saith Christ) and why so? but because they believe not on me, John 16.9. There is no sin but infidelity, no righteousness but faith: not that adultery, intemperance, malice, are no sins; but if unfaithfulness remain not all, these sins are pardoned, and so they are as if they were no sins indeed. How quick a riddance true repenting faith makes with our sins? they are too heavy for our shoulders, and we cannot bear them; faith only turns them over unto Christ, and we are disburthened of them: whereas there would go with us to judgment an huge kennel of lusts, an army of vain words, a legion of evil deeds, faith instantly dischargeth them all, and kneeling down to Jesus Christ, beseecheth him to answer for them all, howsoever committed. O then make we much of faith! but not of such a faith neither, as goes alone without works: it is nothing at this judgment to say, I have believed, and not well lived: the Gospel requires both, faith to believe, and obedience to work: not only to repent and believe the Gospel, Mark 1.15. but to obey from the heart that form of doctrine, Rom. 6.17. True indeed, thou shalt be saved for thy faith, not for thy works, but for such a faith as is without works thou shalt never be saved; we say therefore, works are disjoined, from the act of justifying, not from the person justified: heaven is given to us for Christ's merits, but we must show him the fair copy of our lives. O then let this move us to abound in knowledge, and faith, and repentance, and love, and zeal, and clothing, and feeding, and lodging the poor members of Christ Jesus, and howsoever all these can merit nothing at God's hands, yet will he crown his own gifts, and reward them in his mercy. Say then, dost thou relieve a poor member of Christ Jesus? dost thou give a cup of cold water to a Prophet in the name of Prophet? Christ doth promise thee of his truth he will not let thee lose thy reward: certainly he will not, so thy works be done in faith: why this is the covenant, the glad tidings, the Gospel, to live well and believe well. O let not that which is a word of comfort to us, be a bill of inditement against us! albeit in our justification we may say, Be it to us according to our faith; yet in our retribution it is said (as you have it before you in this Text read unto you) Then he shall reward every man (for manifestation of his faith) according to his works.

A little to recall ourselves, The Prisoners are tried, the Verdict's brought in, the inditement is found and the Judge now sits on life and death, even ready with sparkling eyes to pronounce his sentence. This we must defer a while, and the next time you shall hear what you have long expected. The Lord grant us an happy issue, that when this day is come, the sentence may be for us, and we may be saved to our endless comfort.

Shall reward.

WHAT Assize is this that affords each circumstance of each prisoners trial? the time is Then,] the Judge is He,] the Prisoners Men,] the evidence Works,] which no sooner given in, but the sentence follows, which is, to reward] every man according to his works.

This reward is nothing in effect but a retaliation, if we live well here, God will then crown his own gifts; but if we sin without repentance, we may not escape without punishment. There is a God that sits and sees, and anon will reward us.

But to unfold this Reward,] there lies in it a

- Doom, and
- Execution.

God speaks it in the first effects it in the second: he gives it in our doom, and we receive it in the execution.

The doom is of two sorts, according to the parties that receive it. One is an absolution, which is the doom of Saints; the other is a condemnation, which is the doom of reprobates: there is a reward on the right hand bestowed on the blessed, and an heavy judgment which falls on the left hand upon the heads of the wicked.

To begin with that in our meditation, which our Savior begins with in action: Imagine what a blessed day will this be to the godly, when standing on the right hand of the Judge, they shall hear the heavenly music of their happy sentence, Come ye blessed of my Father, inherit the kingdom prepared for you from the beginning of the world.

In which gracious speech we may observe four gradations. First, a gentle invitation, Come. Secondly, a sweet benediction, Ye blessed of my Father. Thirdly, heavens possession, inherit the Kingdom. Fourthly, a glorious ordination to felicity, prepared for you from the beginning of the world.

First, you have Come.] It is the sweet voice of Christ inviting the Saints before, and now giving their welcome to his heavenly Canaan? he hath called often, Come all that labor, Come all that travel: The Spirit and the Bride say, Come, and let him that heareth, say, Come; and let him that is a thirst Come. Thus he calls all men to his grace, but only the elect to his glory: now he desires every man to Come, but the righteous alone shall have this Well-come. O how leaps that soul with joy, that hears this voice of her sweet Savior! all the music of Angels cannot so ravish the mind, as this voice of our Savior glads the soul, now are the gates of heaven open, and the Judge, who is Master of the feast, bids the guests Come and Well-come.

But who are they? Ye blessed of my Father,] a word able to make them blessed, when pronounced. Down on your knees rebellious sons; and so long as you live on earth, beg, pray, sue for the blessing of your Father in heaven. They that are God's servants, are no less his sons, therefore every morn, night, and noon, ask blessing boldly, and God will bestow it liberally. The first Sermon that ever Christ preached, was full of blessings, Matth. 5. Blessed are the poor in spirit. Blessed are they that mourn. Blessed are the meek. Blessed are the merciful. And as he begun, so he concludes, Come ye blessed, ye blessed of my Father.

Must they come? for what? to inherit the kingdom.] Of all tenures inheritance is best, of all inheritances a kingdom is most excellent, but that all shall inherit, and that there is no scantling, this is heavens wonder, and the Angels bliss. An heavenly inheritance sure, that is continued without succession, divided without diminution, common without envy, forever happy, and without all misery. This is the inheritance of the just, the possession whereof makes every Saint no less glorious then a King. Kings are they indeed, whose dominions are not limited nor their borders bounded, nor their people numbered, nor the time of their reign prescribed. Such glorious things are spoken of thee, O thou City of God.

Is this your inheritance? but upon what right? it is prepared for you from the beginning of the world.] Had the Lord such care to provide for his children before they were? how may his sons triumph born to such dignity? God will so certain their salvation, that he hath prepared it for them from before the foundation of the world. O blessed souls, if you be God's servants! though a while you suffer sorrow and tribulation, yet here is the hope of Saints, it is your Fathers good pleasure to give you the kingdom. Heaven is prepared of old, there is the place of God's majesty, and there the Saints of God shall receive the crown, the reward of victory.

[Use.] I cannot express what this joy affords to the one half of it. Come blessed souls, bathed in repenting tears, here is a sentence able to revive the dead much more the afflicted. Are you now sorrowing for your sins? leave it a while, and meditate with me on this ensuing melody. Hear yonder a quire of Angels, a song of Zion, an heavenly consort, sounding to the Judge whilst he is pronouncing of thy sentence. Blessed souls! how pant you dances at the uttering of each syllable? Come] saith our Savior, and if he but say Come, joy, happiness, glory, felicity, all come on heaps into the endeared soul. Ye blessed] saith our Savior, and if he but say Blessed, the Angels, Archangels, Cherubims, Seraphims, all joy at the enjoying of this blessed company. Inherit the kingdom] saith our Savior, and if he but say inherit, crowns, scepters, garlands, diadems, all these are the inheritance of God's adopted children. Prepared for you] saith our Savior, and if he but say Prepared, the love, mercy, election, compassion of our Lord will shine forth to the soul to her everlasting comfort. O ravishing voice! I charge you O daughters of Jerusalem, if you find my well-beloved, th• you tell him I am sick of love. What else? you that are God's servants are no less his spouse, your soul is the bride, and when the day is come (this day of doom) God give you joy, the joy of heaven forever and ever.

But I must turn to the left hand, and show you another crew, prepared for another sentence.

And what a terrible sentence will that be, which at first hearing will make all ears glow and tingle? His lips (saith the Prophet) are full of indignation, and his tongue like a consuming fire, Isaiah 30.27. What fire so hot as that fiery sentence, Depart ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his angels. Here is every particular full of horror, gradually enhancing their judgment. First, a grievous refusal, Depart. Secondly, the loss of salvation, from me. Thirdly, that deserved malediction, ye cursed. Fourthly, the horror of pains, into everlasting fire. Fifthly, the preordnance of their torments, prepared for the devil and his angels.

First, they must depart.] This seems nothing to the wicked now: depart? why they are contented to be gone, much more delight have they in sin, then in God's service. But as when a gracious Prince opening his long locked up treasury, bids in some to receive, but others to depart, this must needs be a disgraceful vexation: so when the glory of heaven, and those invaluable treasures shall be opened, and dealt about to the faithful, what horror will it be to the reprobates to be cast off with a depart? no share accrues to them, no not so much as one glimpse of glory must cheer their dejected countenances, but as ill-meriting followers they are thrust from the gates with this watch-word to be gone, Depart.

But whence? there is the loss, from me,] and if from me, then from all that is mine, my mercy, my glory, my salvation. Here is an universal spoil of all things, of God in whom is all goodness, of the Saints in whom is all solace, of the Angels in whom is all happiness, of heaven, wherein all pleasures live ever and ever. Whither O Lord shall the cursed go that depart from thee? into what haven shall they arrive? what Master shall they serve? is it thought so great a punishment to be banished from our native soils? what then is this to be banished from Almighty God? and whither, but into a place of horror; to whom? but to a cursed crew of howling reprobates. Depart from me.

Who are they? Ye cursed] Christ hath before invited you with blessings, but these refused, now take you the curse to your despite: the wicked man (saith the Prophet) as he hath loved cursing so let it come unto him: hath he loved it? let him take his love: as he hath clothed himself with cursing, as with a garment, so let it come into his bowels, like water, and like oil into his bones, Psal. 109.18. No sooner our Savior cursed the Fig-tree, but leaves and boughs, body and root, all wither away, and never anymore fruit grows thereon; and thus shall the wicked have a curse, like the Ax which put to the root of the tree, shall hew it down, and cast it into the fire. Go ye cursed.

But whither must they go? into everlasting fire:] O what a bed is this for delicate and dainty persons? no feathers but fire, no friends but furies; no ease but fetters, no light but smoke, no Chimes nor Clock to pass away the night, but timelesse eternity. A fire? intolerable, a fire burning, never dying? O immortal pains! which of you (saith the Prophet) is able to dwell in the burning fire? who can endure the everlasting flames? it shall not be quenched night nor day, the smoke thereof shall go up evermore; the pile is fire, and much wood, and the breath of the Lord like a river of brimstone kindles it. What torment, what calamity can be compared with the shadow of this? the wicked must be crowded together like brick in a fiery Furnace: there is no servant to fan cold air on their tormented parts, not so much as a chink, where the least puff of wind might enter in to cool them: it is a fire, an everlasting fire.

For whom? prepared for the Devil and his Angels] heavy company for distressed souls: the Serpents policy could not escape hell, nor can the craft of our age so deal with this Serpent, as thereby to prevent this fire: it was sure prepared for some, as some have prepared themselves for it; burning in lust, in malice, in revenge, until themselves, their lust, malice, revenge, and all burn together in hell. Tophet is prepared of old, whither that day-star as fallen from heaven, and a black crew of Angels guard him round in that lake of hell: there must these howling reprobates keep their residence; the last sentence that never is recalled, is now pronounced: what! Go; Who? ye cursed: Whither? into everlasting fire: to what company? to a crew of Devils and their Angels. O take heed that ye live in God's fear! least that leaving his service he give you this reward; Depart ye cursed.

[Use.] And is not this worthy your meditation? Consider, I pray you, what fearful tremblings seiz on their souls that have their sentence for eternal flames? If a Lord have Mercy on thee, Take him away Jailor, will cause such shedding of tears, folding of arms, and wringing of hands, what will this sentence do, Go ye cursed? &c. O which way will they turn? or how will they escape the Almighty's wrath? to go backward is impossible, to go forwards intolerable; whose help will they crave? God is their Judge, heaven their fo, the Saints deride them, Angels hate them, all creatures cry for vengeance on them. God Lord! what a world of misery hath seized on these miserable souls? their Executioners are Devils, the Dungeon Hell, the earth stands open, and the cruel Furnace ready-boiling to receive them: into what a shaking fit of distractions will these terrors drive them? every part shall bear a part in this doleful ditie, eyes weep, hands wring, breasts beat, hearts ache, voices cry, horror, dread, terror, confusion are lively equipages of this tragick Scene. Now (O man of earth) what will all thy wealth avail thee? what can all thy pleasures profit thee? one drop of water to cool thy fiery tongue in hell, is more worth then a world of treasures: all the gold and precious stones the world affords, will not buy one bottle of water: all thy golden gods, and silver plates cannot prevail one dramme of comfort; but rather as they were thy bane on Earth, so they will aggravate thy pain in Hel. Who pities not the vilest creature, to see it suffer torments, and no way to release it? who then will not pity this end of the wicked, when they must suffer, and suffer, yet never feel ease of pain, nor end of torments? A sentence not to be revoked, yet unsufferably to be endured; torment on torment, anguish on anguish, fire upon fire, and though a River (nay, a sea) of tears drop from their eyes, yet cannot one spark be quenched, the worm never dies, the fire never goes out. Go ye into everlasting fire, not piled of consuming wood, or the black moulds, turning to white ashes, but kindled, by the Judges breath, of pitch and sulphur; Rivers of boiling Brimstone run from everlasting springs: in these hot Bathes was that Dives dived, when those fiery words came flaming from his mouth as spitting fire: Let Lazarus dip the tip of his finger in water to cool my tongue: Alas! what should a drop of water do on a finger, when rivers cannot quench the tip of his tongue? he lies on a bed of never-dying flames, where brimstone is the fuel, devils the kindlers, the breath of an offended God the bellows, and hell the furnace, where body and soul must ever lie and frie in scorching torments. O let the heat of these flames quench the heat of our sin: if once the sentence pass, there is no reprieve to be hoped for; this is the last Day of Doom, when our sins must be revealed, our Reward proportioned, and as we have done, so we must be sentenced: for then he shall reward] every man according to his works.

Thus you have heard the sentence of the just and wicked: and now is the Judge rising from his glorious seat; the Saints that were invited guard him along, and the sentenced prisoners are delivered to the Jaylers to be bound in burning Steel and Iron, the reward of Execution.

The sentence being past in all prescribed order, the Execution must needs follow: but as there is a double sentence, so a double retribution: first, for the wicked, who immediately after the sentence shall be chased into hell, the Execution being speedily and fearfully done upon them, with all horror and haste by the Angels. O what a screech of horror will be heard? what woes and lamentations will be uttered, when Devils, and Reprobates and all the damned crew of hell, shall be driven into hell, whereunto they shall be thrust with violence, never to return again? How desperate is their case, when none will comfort them? the Saints deride them, Angels mock them, their own friends scoff them, devils hate them, the earth groans under them, and hell will swallow them. Down they go howling, and shrieking, and gnashing their teeth, the effect of a most impatient fury. The world leavs them, the earth forsakes them, hell entertains them, there must they live and die, and yet not live nor die, but dying live, and living die; death in life, life in death, miserable ever. If the drowning of the old world, swallowing up of Korah and his complices, burning up of Sodom with brimstone, were attended with such terrors and hideous out-cries, how infinitely transcendent to all possibility of conceit, expression, or belief, will the confusions and tremblings of that red-dread-fiery day be? It is not a few but many; nor many only, but all the wicked of the earth, being many millions of men, shall be dragged down, with all the Devils of hell to torments without end, or ease, or past imagination; then to speak it again, that I may the deeper imprint it in your minds and memories: sure there was horrible shrieking, when those five filthy Cities first felt fire and brimstone drop down upon their heads; when those Rebels saw the ground cleave asunder, and themselves and all theirs, Go down quick into the pit: when all the sons and daughters of Adam found the flood rising, and ready to over-flow them all at once. But the most horrid cry that ever was heard, or ever shall be heard in Heaven, or in Earth, in this world, or in the world to come, will be then when all the forlorn condemned reprobates upon sentence given, shall be violently and unresistably hailed down to hell; neither shall any tears, or prayers, or promises, or suits, or cries, or yellings, or calling upon Rocks and Mountains, or wishes never to have been, or now to be made nothing, be then heard, or prevail in their behalf: nay, (yet more to increase their torments) there is not one in Earth or Heaven that will speak one word in their behalf: but without mercy, without stay, without any farewell at all, they shall be immediately and irrecoverably cast down into the bottomless pit of easeless, endless, and remediless torments. Oh! what then will be the gnawings of the never-dying worm? what rage of guilty consciences? what furious despair? what horror of mind? what distractions and fears? what tearing their hair, and gnashing of teeth? In a word, what wailing, weeping, roaring, yelling, filling heaven, and earth, and hell? O miserable Caitiffs, caught and wrapped in the snares of Satan! What need we more? this is the Judges charge, the Sheriffs Commission, the sinners execution, Take them away, cast them into utter darkness, there shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth. A darkness indeed, that must ever be debarred from the sight of heaven: no sun-shine ever peeps within those Walls, no light, no fire, no candle, alas! nothing is there but Clouds and darkness, thick smoke, and fiery sulphur: and such is the portion of sinners, the Reward of the wicked.

[Use.] What faith or fear have the wicked that go dancing and leaping to this fire, as it were to a Banquet? or like Solomon's fool, that runneth, and swiftly runneth to the stocks? is this our pleasure, to sin a while, and burn forever? for one small spark of silly joy, to suffer universal and perpetual pains? Who buys at so dear a rate? Fear, and the pit, and the snare are upon thee, O inhabitant of the Earth, and he that fleeth from the noise of the fear, shall fall into the pit, and he that cometh up out of the pit, shall be taken in the snare: for the windows from an high are open, and the foundations of the earth do shake: the earth is utterly broken down, the earth is clean dissolved, the earth is moved exceedingly, the earth shall reel to and fro, like a drunken man, and shall be removed like a Tent, and the iniquity thereof shall be heavy upon it, so that it shall fall, and rise no more, Isaiah 24.17. O miserable fear to the wicked! If the Earth fall, how shall the sinners stand? Nay, They shall be gathered together as prisoners in the pit, and they shall be shut up in the prison, never more to be visited, released, or comforted. Be forewarn'd then (beloved!) least you also come into this place of torment. It is a fearful prison, and God give us grace so to arraign, judge, cast, and condemn ourselves here, that we may escape this execution of the damned hereafter.

I have no will to end with terror: Then to sweeten your thoughts with the joy of Saints, look upwards and you may see a blessed company.

After the wicked are cast down into hell, Christ and the blessed Saints ascend into heaven. From the Tribunal Seat of Judgment Christ shall arise, and with all the glorious company of Heaven, march towards the Heaven of Heavens. O what comely march is this? what songs of triumph are here sung and warbled? The voice of thy Watchmen shall be heard, they shall lift up their voice and shout together, for they shall see eye to eye, when the Lord shall bring again Zion, Isaiah 52.8. Here is a victory indeed, the soldiers in arrayed order both Marching and Triumphant: Christ leads the way, the Cherubims attend, the Seraphims burn in love, Angels, Archangels, Principalities, Powers, Patriarchs, Prophets, Priests, Evangelists, Martyrs, Professors, and Confessours of God's Law and Gospel, following, attend the Judge and King of glory; singing with melody, as never ear hath heard, shining with Majesty as never eye hath seen, rejoicing without measure, as never heart conceived. O blessed train of soldiers, goodly troop of Captains! each one doth bear a palm of victory in his hands, each one must wear a Crown of glory on his head; the Church Militant is now Triumphant, with a final overthrow have they conquered Devills, and now must they enjoy God, life, and heaven: And thus as they march along, heaven opens unto them: O infinite joy! Tell me, O my soul, what an happy hour will that be, when thou shalt first enter into the gates of heaven, when the Blessed Trinity shall gladly entertain thee, and with a Well done good and faithful servant, bid thee, Come, and enter into thy Masters joy: When all the Angels, and Archangels shall salute thee, when Cherubims and Seraphims shall come to meet thee, when all the powers of heaven shall congratulate thy coming, and joy for thy arrival at the Port of peace? Here is the end of the Godly, the fruits of his end, the Reward itself. What can I say? but live in GOD'S fear, and the LORD reward you; nay, he will so, if you live so, for Then he shall reward every Man according to his works.

And now this Sermon done, you see the Court is dissolved: Stay but to receive A Writ of review, and you shall hear in a word all the news of this Assize, from the beginning to the ending.

What a strange Assize was this, where every circumstance was to the wicked so terribly fearful? the Term full of horror, the Judge full of Majesty, the Prisoners full of anguish, the Trial full of fear, the Doom full of grief to the wicked, as of comfort to the elect. Seeing therefore that all these things are thus, what manner of Persons ought ye to be in holy conversation and godliness? A word of judgment could make Jeremiah weep, just Job be afraid, Felix to tremble, and cannot this usual sound of the hammers a little mollify our stony hearts? how is the gold become dross, and the silver iron? we run over reason, and tread upon conscience, and fling by counsel, and go by the word and poste to death; but will you not remember, that for all these things you must come to judgment? Be sure there is a Term for our appearance, Then] there is a Judge that will sit upon us He.] There is a band of Prisoners Every man.] There is a Bill of Indictment framed, according to our works.] And last of all, there is a sentence after which follows the Execution, the reward] due to us, which then he will give us: only now bestow on us those graces of thy Spirit, and then (O Lord) Reward us according to our works. AMEN.

FINIS.

Hels horror.

MATTH. 13.30.

Bind them in bundles to burn them.

THis Text is the harvest of Tares, and that that you may know the husbandry, here is first the sowing, verse. 25. Secondly, the coming up, verse. 26. Thirdly, the overseers of it, verse. 27. Fourthly, their intent to weed it, verse. 28. Fifthly the sufferance of its growth till the harvest verse. 29. Sixthly, the harvest itself, verse. 30. Or yet to give you the Parable in a more ample wise, here is a man sows good seed in his field, and the enemy whilst his servants sleep, sows tares amongst the wheat: the seeding done, and the fertile soil made fruitful by heavens showers the blade of the corn springs up, and the tares appear in their kind amongst them: those heavenly Angels, which are God's stewards of this field pitching their watchful eyes about, first see, then run to their Master with this message, Master, sowedst thou not good seed in thy field? from whence then hath it tares? God, whose all-knowing wisdom can resolve all doubts, tells them expressly, an enemy had done this: an enemy sure, yea as Peter calls him, a devouring enemy: such is the fruit issuing from so bad an author. Yet see the sedulous care of God's holy servants, they will not spare to root up what envy sows, and with a willing obedience expect only his command, Wilt thou that we go and gather them up? nay, see the Almighty disparkling a while his beams of mercy, all must stay till the harvest, and then goes forth his royal command to the reapers: Gather ye together first the tares, and bind them in bundles to burn them.

But, me thinks, I hear you say to me as the Disciples to our Savior, Declare unto us this Parable; for the doing of which I shall place before you a field, the world; the reapers, Angels; the householder, God; good men, as corn; the wicked, as Tares; the harvest that must gather all, is the end of the world, and then are the reapers enjoined this heavy task, Separate the bad from the good, and cast them into hell fire to burn them.

See here the miserable condition of impenitent souls, each circumstance aggravates their torment, and that you may in this text view a Series of the causes, here is first the efficient, Bind] the material, them] the formal, in bundles] the final, to burn them.] Every word like so many links, makes up this fiery chain of torment. Bind:] heavy doom to be fettered in hell fire! them:] miserable souls to be captived in those bands! in bundles:] cruel anguish to be crowded in throng heaps! to burn them:] intolerable heats to be scorched, blistered, burned. And yet see here at once, this heavy, miserable, cruel, intolerable doom, fall on the wicked; the command is out, what? Bind] whom? them] how? in bundles] for what? to burn them.] Not a word, but it speaks horror to the damned, either Binding, or bundling, or burning: Bind them in bundles to burn them.

The work you see, is ordered now we put in our sickle, only God prosper our labor, till we have done the harvest.

Them]

WE will begin first with the subject, that you may know of whom it is spoken, Bind them] Them? whom? If you will view the precedent words, the text tells you they are Tares, Gather ye first the Tares, and bind them. In God's field there is Corn and Cockle, and as for the one there is provided a barn, so for the other there is nothing better then binding and burning.

The Greek word calls them 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, tares; the Hebrews call them Hadul, thistles, or thorns; and both are apt expressions of the matter in hand: what are tares for? but to be gathered, bound, and burned, saith our Savior: and what are thorns for? but to be rejected, cursed, and burned, saith the Apostle, Heb. 6.8. Such is the penalty of this weed of the earth (for they are neither better) that as men deal with thorns, who first cut them up with bills, then lay them up to wither, and lastly, burn them in the furnace; so God deals with Tares, he weeds them, binds them, burns them; not a Tare escapes the fire, but all come to combustion.

But only to follow the Original, they are called 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, Tares; and that of a double derivation, the first is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, quasi 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 because they hurt the corn wherewith they are joined; the second is, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 quasi 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, because they innitiate, associate, and so unite themselves with the corn, as if they were the very same. To begin with the last.

We all come together to the Church, and amongst us are Tares and Wheat, good and bad; in all companies there will be evil intruders, Satan among the Angels, Saul among the Prophets, Judas among the Apostles, Demas among the Professors, yet who can discern the tares, but God alone who knows our hearts? Hypocrites can work dissimulation in a web, and this so cunningly is platted, that no difference is discerned: such are hot meteors in the air, which shoot and show like stars, but are indeed nothing less: your eyes may be fixed on heaven, your ears all listening to this Sermon, yet (as I condemn none, so) I never knew, but Darnell hath ever been in God's field. The Church Christ calls a net, an house, a floor, a field: a net that takes fish, good and bad; an house, that harbours vessels of wrath and honor; a floor, whereon is poured wheat and chaff; a field, wherein is sowed Corn and Cockle: thus good and bad seed are a while as that treasure hid in the field, which cannot be discovered: but is there not a God that searcheth both the heart and reins? Be not deceived, ye deceivers of the world! God is not mocked; it is not a false heart with a fair look, it is not a mere show of Religion which God accepts: Silly Tares, hide close your sins in the darkest sorrows, or mount up your heads amongst the flourishing wheat, yet know there is a fan that will purge the floor; you would grow, and you shall grow till the harvest, God suffers that seed till the fruit grows ripe, but then, Gather the tares, and bind them (wicked dissemblers) bind them in bundles to burn them.

Secondly, as the Tares are hypocritical, so are they hurtful, they seem at unity, but are at enmity with the wheat about them: and these Tares are either heretics, as most Fathers understood them; or any sinner whosoever, that is a child of the wicked one, as our Savior did expound them.

First, they are heretics, wicked Tares indeed: and that you may know who are these: 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 is a choice, or election, at first a good word in Philosophy, taken for a right form of learning: but now in Divinity it is a word of disgrace, and intends a stubborn deviation from the deceived truth. This infection (like the Tares) first begins whiles men sleep, the Pastors negligence gives way unto it, and because of its little seed, or small beginning, it is never heeded, or regarded, till the whole house be infected: thus Popery crept up in the dark, like a thief putting out the lights, that he might rob the house more securely; and as it began with a little, so it went on by degrees, till an universal Apostasy was (as it were) over the face of the world. Austin saith of Arius his heresy, It was at first but a little spark, but it spread so at last, that the flame of it singed the whole world: so the Pope rose by degrees, first above Bishops, then above Patriarchs, then above Councils, then above Kings, then above Scriptures, even so the Apostle speaks of Antichrist, He hath exalted himself above all that is called God, 2 Thess. 2.4. Heresy creeps in at a little hole, like a plague that comes in at the windows, and then propagates itself beyond all measure: O that these Tares were weeded, that Ishmael were cast out of doors, so that Sara and her son Isaac might live in quiet and peace; or if they must grow until the harvest, what remains, but, I beseech you, brethren, mark them which cause divisions and offenses, contrary to the doctrine that ye have learned, and avoid them.

But as heretics, so all reprobates whatsoever are the Tares here spoken of, they are offenders on all hands, both in doctrine and conversation: and thus our Savior interprets, The good seed are the children of the kingdom, but the Tares are the children of the wicked one, ver. 38.

And most fitly are the reprobates called Tares, in respect of their

- Intrusion here.
- Separation hereafter.

First, as the Tares grow amongst corn, so the wicked all their life associate themselves with the godly; the Church (saith Austin) is full both of wheat and chaff. I avoid the chaff lest I become chaff, but I keep the floor lest I become nothing. What else? in this life the best company is not free from the intrusion of Tares, therefore cries David, Woe is me that I am constrained to dwell with Mesech, and to have my habitation among the tents of Kedar, Psal. 120.4. No greater discomfort then to cohabit with the wicked: are they not pricks in our eyes, and thorns in our sides? yea they are thorns indeed, saith the Lord to Ezekiel, Lo the thrones and briars are with thee, and thou dost dwell among Scorpions, Ezek. 2.6. Sure we had no need of security, that are thus compassed with enemies, the briars may scratch us, the thorns prick us, the Scorpions sting us, we can hardly so escape, but some of these will hurt us. A good man with ill company, is like a living man bound to a dead corps, and (may I appeal to yourselves) is the living likely to receive the dead? or the dead more likely to suffocate the living? O ye children of the kingdom, bless you whiles you live, loe the Tares are among you like wolves amongst lambs; be wise then in your carriage, and save yourselves, your own souls.

Secondly, as the Tares, so reprobates shall one day be separated from the Wheat, the good: In the time of harvest (saith our Savior) I will say to the reapers Gather ye first the Tares; here is that woeful separation between true Christians, and the profane wretches of this world. It is begun at death, and then must they part till the day of doom, but when that comes, there must be a final separation, He shall sit upon the throne of his glory, and before him shall be gathered all nations, and he shall separate them one from another, as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats, Matth. 25.32. Here is a separation indeed, not for a day, or a year, but for timeless eternity. Lo a vast and immeasurable gulf betwixt heaven and hell, so that as Abraham tells the rich man, They that would pass from hence to you cannot, neither can they pass to us, that would come from thence, Luk. 16.26. This is that endless divorce of the Wheat and Tares, this is that unpassable distance twixt heaven and hell, through all eternity. O miserable Tares! what a loss hath befallen you? now you live with the Wheat, and you o'retop them, trouble them, vex them with your society, but hereafter you must shake hands forever; for the wheat must be gathered into God's barn, his kingdom, whilst the miserable Tares are gathered by Angels, and bound up in bundles for the burning.

Lo here a world of Tares, and that I may give you them in a map, what are they but hypocrites, heretics, reprobates; all children whosoever, that hath Satan to their father, for of them] is this spoken.

[Use.] The proverb is, Ill weeds grow apace, nay they are so common, that it is hard to set the foot besides them▪ Look into your hearts, you sons and daughters of Adam, 〈◇〉 •ot your furrows full of cockle and darnel? the earth (saith the Philosopher) is now an own mother to weeds, but a stepmother to good herbs; man by a proclivity to his own inclination, is apt to produce weeds and tares▪ but ere he can bring forth herbs and graces, God must take pains with him indeed: no husbandman so labors his grounds, as God doth our hearts: happy earth that yields him an expected harvest; and that our parts may be herein, what shall we say unto thee, O thou preserver of men? Awake O north wind, and come thou south, blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out, yea let my beloved come into his garden, and eat his pleasant fruits, Cantic. 4.16.

And yet again, that I may weed the Tares amongst us, consider with yourselves, you that go on in your sins, will you run upon ruin, and can we say nothing to keep you out of the fire? O sweet Savior! what didst thou endure for us, that we might escape this durance? and yet we are secure, and care not, vilifying that blood that was of more value then a world. Think of it, you that are in the blade ere the harvest come: No man desires to purchase land, that will bring forth nothing but weed; and shall God buy so base a ground, that will be no better, at so inestimable a price, as the incorruptible blood of his only Son? O ye weed of the earth, turn yourselves, or be ye turned into wheat, call, and sue, and cry for the mercy of God in Christ our Savior: yea again, and again, beg of your Jesus that he may root up your weed, and plant in you his graces, that like good corn you may fructify here, and when the harvest comes, you may be gathered into his barn, and remain in his kingdom.

Thus far you see the prisoners, the next point is the chains wherewith these prisoners are bound: but of that hereafter. Remember in the mean time the Tares, and as good seed bring ye forth good fruit, some thirty, some sixty, some an hundred fold, that when the reaping comes, we may be ready for the barn, and then Lord Jesus, come when thou wilt, even Lord Jesus come quickly. Amen.

Bind.]

THE ma•••ctor, whose hands are pinion'd, legs chained, feet corded, may lie restless in his thoughts, easeless in all parts: the wicked are cast into a prison under lock and bolts, where the devil is jailor, hell the prison, and the bolts such other as burning steel and iron. See here a jailor, jayle, and manacles, all which are provided for the damned: and because of their relation each to other, give me leave to produce them in their order.

The Tares must be bound, and for the executing of this doom, the Judge here delivers them over to the jailor. Jailor? whom? good and bad Angels: for both these are the executioners of God's direful sentence.

First the good Angels, so saith our Savior, The reapers are the Angles, ver. 39. and he will say unto the reapers, ver. 30. Gather ye first the Tares, and bind them up in bundles. They which are all mercy to the good, are here the executioners of God's judgments on the wicked. Thus was Sodom destroyed by an Angel, Gen. 19. The army of Sennacherib was overthrown by an Angel, 2 King 19. Seventy thousand men of Israel were struck with pestilence by an Angel, 2 Sam. 24. Blasphemous Herod was smitten by an Angel, Act. 12.23. Yea the Tares themselves must be gathered by Angles, who will bind them in heaps like faggots, and then cast them into hell fire to burn them.

How fearful is it, to fall into the hands of God's host? no power can resist, no policy prevail, all the stratagems of war are but folly to God's wisdom; then into what moats and atoms shall the proud dust of sinful man be torn? what? dares he struggle against heaven? See God and Angels are become his enemies, and whose help should he have, when heaven itself makes war? Mountains and rocks are no defense against God: shields and spears cannot keep safe the Tares: no, God hath his warriors that will pluck, and tear, and torture reprobates: the Angels are his reapers, that must Gather the Tares, and bind] them in bundles to burn them.

But secondly, good and bad Angles both join in this office to bind the Tares: if there be any difference, it is in this, the good Angles begin, and the bad continue, to make the binding everlasting. Here is a jailor indeed, and if you would see him in his form, you may take the description from that great Leviathan, Job 41.18. By his neesings a light doth shine, and his eyes are like the eye lids of the morning, out of his mouth go burning lamps, and sparks of fire leap out; out of his nostrils goeth smoke as out of a seething pot or cauldron; his breath kindleth coals, and a flame goeth out of his mouth, Job 41.18, 19, 20, 21. What an ugly devil is this, whom God only mystically describes with such terrible shapes? his neesing flames, his eyes stare, his mouth shoots fire, his nostrils smoke, his very breath sets all a burning round about him. Such a jailor hath God prepared for hell-prisoners. As God hath fettered him, so he lays fetters on them, revenging his own malice on his fellow-sufferers. The devil first tempts, and then he fetters Tares: while men live on earth, he lays snares for souls: thus he prepared flatterers for Rehoboam, liars for Ahad, concubins for Solomon, sorcerers for Pharaoh, witches for Saul, wine for Benhadad, gold for Achan, a ship for Jonah, and a rope for Haman: but he that makes gins, and nets, and snares on earth, makes bolts, and hammers, and whips in hell; thus he hath prepared darkness for Herod, a fire for Dives, plagues for Pilate, brimstone for Judas, snares for Demas, and fiery fetters for all Reprobate Tares: what need poor souls any further fetters, whom the Devil once shuts within his Den? Dare you live in such a nest amongst speckled poisons? there Serpents girdle the loins, and Cockatrices kill with their eyes, and Dragons spit fire from their mouths, and Wolves all devour men's souls, and Lions roar for the prey, and Vipers sting and strike with their Tayls: O fearful Jailers! what strange kind of furies live in hell.

You see the Jailer, now turn your eyes from so bad a spectacle, and let us view the Den where this Monster lies.

The Hebrews call it Sheol, a great Ditch or Dungeon; the Greeks 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, even darkness itself; the Latins Infernus, a place under ground: all agree, it is a Dungeon under earth, containing these two properties.

- Deepness.
- Darkness.

1. It is deep: as heaven is high so (most probable it is) that hell is deep. John calls it a bottomless pit, Revel. 9 1. as if Reprobates were always falling, yet never could find bottom, where to rest; or howsoever this be a Metaphor, yet without question, heaven and hell are as opposite as may be: and whether the Center be the place of torment, or (as others think) all the gulfs of the Sea, and hollows of the earth, as being more capable to contain the damned, I leave it to the Schools; as for the Pulpit, I think this prayer more fit, Lord show us what it is, but never where.

Secondly, the deepness is yoked with darkness; such a dungeon fits the Tares, they committed works of darkness, and are cast into utter darkness; a darkness that may be felt, thick Clouds that may be handled, damps and mists that strike at their hearts with sensible griefs. This is that bottomless pit in the heart of the earth: there shines no Sun, no Moon, nor Stars; there is no light of Candle, Torch, or Taper; shine the Sun never so fair, it is still night there; the Dungeon is dark, and this makes the place more sad, more uncomfortable. Let Poets fain of Tantalus tortures, Prometheus Vultures, Ixions Wheel, and Charons rowing, these come far short to express the pains of those that rage in hell: there plagues have no ease, cries have no help, time has no end, place no redemption: it is the dark prison where the Tares are chained, and the wicked bound in fetters of fire and darkness. Could men have a sight of hell whiles they live on earth, I doubt not their hearts would tremble in their bosoms: yet view it in a way of meditation, and see what you find? are there not wonderful engines, sharp and sore instruments of revenge, fiery Brimstone, pitchy Sulphur, red hot chains, flaming whips, scorching darkness? will you anymore? the worm is immortal, cold intolerable, stench indurable, fire unquenchable, darkness palpable: This is that prison of the damned, then whose eyes dare behold such amazing objects? but if not see, yet listen with your ears, is there any charm in hell to conjure away Devils, or to ravish souls? what music affords the place, but roaring, and crying, and houlings? cursing their Hymns, wailing their tunes, blasphemies their ditties, lachrymae their notes, lamentations their songs, screeching their streins, these are their evening and their morning songs; Moab shall cry against Moab, one against another, all against God. O fearful Prison! what torments have the Tares that lie here fettered? their feet are chained in the stocks, and the Iron pierceth their souls; it is a Dungeon where the light never shined, but the walls are as black as pitch, the vaults are smoaked as Chimneys, the roof as dark as hell, nay the Dungeon is hell, where the Tares lie bound and fettered. Think of this Jail, ye offenders of God's Law, and Majesty; the Angels see our doings, the Judge now expects our returning, the Tares grow till the harvest, and if still they offend, death apprehends them, God will judge them, the Jailor take them, Hell imprison them, there are they bound: You hear the Evidence brought in, and the sentence gone out, Take them, Bind them. bind them in bundles to burn them.

And if this be the Iaylers Goal, what then be the Bonds or Chains?

The Angles which kept not their first estate (saith Jude) God hath reserved in everlasting Chains, and God spared not the Angels that sinned (saith Peter) but cast them down to hell, and delivered them into Chains of darkness. Thus Christ doomed him that had not on his wedding garment, Bind him hand and foot: and what may these Chains and Bonds insinuate, but that the Tares are tied to their torments? might they but remove from place to place, this would afford some ease; might they but stir a foot, or but turn about, or have any little motion to refresh their tormented parts, this would yield some comfort; but here is an universal binding, hand and foot body and soul, all must be bound with everlasting Chains. The Reprobates are packed and crowded together, like Bricks in a fiery furnace, having not so much as a Chink where any wind may enter in to cool them. O ye that live in the sinful wealth of this world, consider but this one punishment of hell, and be afraid! if a man enjoying quietment of mind, and health of body, should lie chained on a soft Down-bed for a month, or a year, how would he abide it? but this is nothing: If a man should lie sick of a Fever, swoln in a Dropsy, pained with the Gout, and (though it were for the recovery of his health) without any turning, tossing, stirring, this were a great torture sure, and a question it were, whether the disease or the physic were more intolerable? witness poor Patients, who change their sides, wish other beds, seek other rooms, and all these shifts but to mitigate their pains: how wretched then are the Tares bound in Chains? they are not in health, nor bound for a month, nor sick of a Fever, nor lie for a year, their pain is grievous, their bonds heavy, their torments durable, their restless rest eternal. The worm shall gnaw their spirit, the fire torture their flesh; were these nothing, yet small sorrows grow great with continuance; the fire shall torture, yet never cease; worms gnaw the heart, yet never gnaw in sunder the strings: wretched souls are bound indeed, whose bonds are never out of date: A seven years prentiship would ere long expire, but what are seven years to a world of ages? the reprobates must serve years, ages, even to a million of millions, and yet are never free: O bondage not to be uttered, yet must be endured! Is it not a Bedlam fury, that must have such bonds? a little to express their torments by our sufferings, which yet are nothing, nothing in comparison: what means these Chains, and whips, and links, and scourges? Iron Chains, whips of steel, fiery links, knotty scourges? furies shake their bolts to frighten souls, the Irons strike through their ears, and the hooked Engines tear their Bowels, as if the torment of Tares were the delight of Devils. Here is a prison indeed, where is nothing heard but yells, and groans, and sudden cries; the fire slakes not, the worm dies not, the chains loose not, the links wear not, revenge tyres not, but forever are the torments fresh, and the fetters on fire, as they came first from their Forge.

What a strange kind of torture falls upon the wicked? they are bound to fiery pillars, and Devils lash at them with their fiery whips: Is there any part of man scapes free in such a fray? the flesh shall f, the blood boil, the veins be scorcht, the sinews racked, Serpents shall eat the body, furies tear the soul;* this is that woeful plight of Tares, which he bound in Hell. The sick man at Sea may go from his ship to his boat, and from his boat to his ship again: the sick man in his bed, may tumble from his right side to his left, and from his left to his right again; only the Tares are tied hand and foot, bound limme and joint, their feet walk not, their fingers move not, their eyes must no more wander as before, loe all his bound. O these manacles that rot the flesh, and pierce the inward parts! O unmatchable torments, yet most fit for Tares! sin made them furious, hell must tame their Frensy; the Judge thus commands, and the Executioners must dispatch; fetter them, fire them, Bind] them in bundles to burn them.

I have lead you through the Dungeon, let this fight serve for a terror, that you never come nearer: To that purpose (for exhortation) consider:

Alas! all hangs on life, there's but a twine thread betwixt the soul of a sinner, and the scorching flames, who then would so live, as to run his soul into hazard? the Judge threatens us, Devils hate us, the bonds expect us, it is only our conscience must clear us, or condemn us. Search then thy ways, and stir up thy remembrance to her Items: hast thou dishonored God, blasphemed his name, decayed his image, subduing thy soul to sin, that was created for heaven? repent these courses, ask God forgiveness, and he will turn away thy punishments. I know your sins are grievous, and my soul grieves at the knowledge: many evils have possessed too many, drunkenness, and oaths, and malice, and revenge, are not these guests entertained into all houses? banish them your hearts, that the King of glory may come in: As I live (saith the Lord) I desire not the death of the wicked, but that the wicked turn from his way and live. Would God bestow mercy? and should we refuse his bounty? as you love heaven, your souls, yourselves, leave your sins.

[Use. 2] And then (here is a word of consolation) the penitent needs not fear hell, God's servant is freed from bonds; yea, if we love him who hath first loved us, all the chains, and pains of hell can neither hold, nor hurt us.

[Use. 3] O then ye Sons of Adam (suffer a reproof) what do ye, that ye do not repent you of your sins? is it not a madness above admiration, that men (who are reasonable creatures) having eyes in their heads, hearts in their bodies, understanding like the Angels, and consciences capable of unspeakable horror never, will be warned, until the fire of that infernal Lake, flash and flame about their ears? Let the Angels blush, heaven and earth be amazed, & all the Creatures stand astonished at it. I am sure a time will come, when the Tares shall feel, what now they may justly fear; you hear enough, such weed must be bound, thus straight is the Lord's command; Bind] them in bundles to burn them.

But all is not done, Chains have their links, and we must bring all together. Sinners are coupled in hell as Tares in Bundles: But of these when we next meet, in the mean while let this we have heard, Bind us all to our duties, that we hear attentively, remember carefully, practice conscionably, that so God may reward accordingly, and at last crown us with his glory. The tares must be bound up in bundles; but Lord make us free in Heaven, to sit with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in thy blessed kingdom.

In bundles.]

The command is out: what? Bind] whom? them] how? in bundles.] The tares must on heaps, which gives us a double observation.

- General,
- Special.

In the general it intimates these two points; the gathering of the weed, and its severing from the wheat: both are bound in bundles, but the wheat by itself, and the tares by themselves: as at that doom (when all the world must be gathered, and severed) some stand at the right hand, others at the left; so at this execution, some are for the fire, and others for the barn; they are bundled together, yet according to the difference of the several parties, each from the other.

[Observ. 1] First, the tares must together: Woe is me (saith David) that I am constrained to dwell with Mesech: and if David think it woeful to converse with his living enemies, then what punishment have the wicked, whom the Devil and damned, the black angels and everlasting horror must accompany forever? The tares must be gathered, and bundled, and the more bundles, the more and more miseries: Company yields no comfort in hell fire; nay what greater discomfort then to see thy friends in flames, thy fellows in torments, the fiends with flaming whips, revenging each others malice on thyselves and enemy? It was the rich man's last petition, when he had so many repulses for his own ease, to make one suit for his living brethren; he knew their company would increase his torment, to prevent which he cries out, I pray thee, father Abraham, that thou wouldest send Lazarus to my fathers house, for I have five brethren, that he may testify unto them, lest they also come into this place of torment. Why, it may be God will hear him for them, especially making such a reasonable request as this was, that Lazarus might only warn his brethren of future judgment: no, but to teach you, if you sell your souls to sin, to leave a rich posterity on earth, you shall not only yourselves (without all remorse and pity) be damned in hell; but your posterity shall be a torment to you whilst they live, and a greater torment, if they come to you when they are dead. To converse with Devils is fearful, but altogether to accompany each other, is a plague fit for tares: In this life they flourished amongst the wheat, Let them grow both together, corn and tares until the harvest. But the harvest come, God will now separate them both asunder, and as in heaven there are none but Saints, so in hell there are none but reprobates: to increase this torment, as they grow together so all their conference is to curse each other: Moab shall cry against Moab, father against son, son against father: what comfort in this company? The Devil that was author of such mischiefs) appears in most grisly forms, his angels (the black guard of hell) torture poor souls in flames: there live swearers with their flaming tongues, usurers with talent hands, drunkards with scorched throats, all these tares like fiery faggots burning together in hell flames? this is the first punishment, all the tares must meet, they are bundled together.

[Observ. 2] Secondly, as the tares must together, so they must together by themselves; thus are they bundled, and severed, bundled all together, but from the wheat all asunder.

Hell is called damnation, Because it brings Heavens loss, and this by consent of most Divines, is the more horrible part of hell: so Basil; To be alienated or separated from the presence of God, his Saints, and Angels, is far more grievous, then the pains of hell. So Chrysostom, The pain of hell is intolerable indeed, yet a thousand hels are nothing to the loss of that most glorious kingdom. So Bernard, It is a pain far surpassing all the tortures in hell, not to see God, and those joys immortal, which are prepared for his children. O then what hels are in hell, when besides the pains of sense, there is a pain of loss, the loss of God, loss of Saints, loss of Angels, loss of Heaven, loss of that beatifical vision of the most Sovereigne Good; our everblessed Maker. Consider with yourselves, if at the parting of the soul and body there be such pangs, and gripes, and stings, and sorrows: what grief then will it be, to be severed forever from the Highest and supreamest Good, Suppose your bodies (as some Martyrs have been used) should be torn in sunder, and that wild horses, driven contrary ways, should rack and pul your arms and legs, and heart, and bowels, one piece frō another, what an horrible kind of death would this be, think you? and yet a thousand rentings of this member from that, or of the soul from the body, are infinitely less then this one separation of the soul from God. When Jacob got rhe blessing from his brother Esau, it is said in the Text, that he roared with a great cry and bitter, saying to his father, Hast thou not reserved one blessing for me also? Imagine then, when the wheat must have the blessing how will the tares (figured in Esau) roar and cry, and yell, and howl again? and yet notwithstanding this unspeakable rage, all the tears of hell shall never be sufficient to bewail the loss of heaven. Hence breeds that worm that is always gnawing at the conscience, a wor••: (saith our Savior) that dies not, Mark 9.44. It shall lie day and night, biting, and gnawing, and feeding upon the bowels of the damned persons. O the stings of this worm! no sooner shall the damned consider the cause of their misery, to wit, the mis-spending of their time, the greatness of their sin, the many opportunities lost, when they might have gotten Heaven for a tear, or a sigh, or groan from a penitent heart; but this worm (or remorse) shall at every consideration give them a deadly bite, and then shall they roar it out, Miserable wretch, what have I done? I had a time to have wrought out the salvation of my soul, many a powerful searching Sermon have I heard, any one passage whereof (had I not wickedly and willfully forsook mine own mercy) might have been unto me the beginning of the new birth; but those golden days are gone, and for want of a little sorrow, a little repentance, a little faith, now am I burning in hell fire: O precious time! O days, months, years, how are ye vanished, that you will never come again? And have I thus miserably undone myself? Come Furies, tear me into as many pieces as there are moats in the Sun, rip up my breast, dig into my bowels pull out my heart, leave me not an hair on my head, but let all burn in these flames, till I molder into nothing. O madness of men, that never think on this all the days of your visitation, and then when the bottomless pit hath shut herself upon you, thus will this worm gnaw your hearts with unconceivable griefs. Be amazed, O ye Heavens! tremble thou Earth! let all creatures stand astonished; whilst the Tares are thus sentenced, Bundle them, and burn them.

Thus far of the word in general: but if we look on it with a more narrow eye, it gives to our hands this special observation.

The tares must have chains proportionable to their sins: Bind them in bundles] saith my Text, not in one, but in many faggots, an Adulterer with an Adulteress, a Drunkard with a Drunkard, a Traitor with a Traitor, as there be several sins, so several Bundles, all are punished in the same fire, but all are not punished in the same degree; some have heavier chains, and some have lighter, but all in just weight and measure. The Proud shall be trod underfoot, the Glutton suffer inestimable hunger, the Drunkard feel a burning thirst, the Covetous pine in wants, the Adulterer lie with Serpents, Dragons, Scorpions, Give me leave to bind these in bundles, and so leave them for the fire; they are first bundled, then burned.

[1] Where is Lady Pride and her followers? see them piled for the furnace: you that jet it with your bals and bracelets, tyres and tablets, rings and jewels, and changeable suits, think but what a change will come, when all you (like birds of a feather) must together, to be bound in bundles. What then will your pride avail, or your riches profit, or your gold do good, or your treasures help, when you must be constrained to vomit up again your riches, the increase of your house departing away, and a fire not blown utterly consuming you and them. The rich man in the Gospel could for a time go richly, fare sumptuously, and that not only on Sabbaths or Holy-days, but (as the text) every day: yet no sooner had death seized on his body, but he was fain to alter both his suit and diet; hear him how he begs for water, that had plenty of wines, and see him that was clothed in purple, now apparelled in another suit, (yet of the same color too) even in purple flames: O that his delicate morsels must want a drop of water, and that his fine apparel must cost him so dear, as the high price of his soul! why rich man is it come to this? the time was that purple and fine linen was thy usual apparel, that banquets of sumptuous dishes were thy ordinary fare, but now not the poorest beggar (even Lazarus himself) that would change estate with thee: Change, said I? marry no: Remember (saith old Abraham) that thou in thy life time receivedst thy good things, and likewise Lazarus evil things; but now he is comforted, and thou art tormented: Luke 16.25.

[2] But there are other Bundles, where is Gluttony and her surfetters? Do we not see how the earth is plowed, the sea furrowed, and all to furnish one Epicures table? Sivill sends fruit, Canary sugars, Moluques spices, Egypt balsamum, Candy oyls, Spain sweet meats, France wines, our own land cannot satisfy, but foreign kingdoms and countries must needs be sacrificed to our belly-gods: but what dainties have such Nabal's when they come to hell? there is a black banquet prepared for devils and reprobates; the first dish is weeping, the second gnashing of teeth, and what mirth is there where these two courses must last all the feast? The lazy Friar sweating at ⟨◇⟩ long meats and meals, Heu quantum patimur cries he? alas how much do we suffer which are Friars? but alas how much must you suffer at this supper, where the meat is poison, the attendants furies, the music groans, and time without end the sauce of every dish? See here the provision for the damned, their chains loose not, their fire cools not, their worm dies not, their woes end not, such gall and vinegar bitters every morsel. God hath proportioned this punishment for these sheaves, they are sent from surfeits to an empty dungeon, that sent away beggars empty from their doors.

[3] But more Bundles yet, where is Drunkenness with her rioters? Lo they are trodden underfoot, saith the Prophet, they whose tables were full of vomit and filthiness, are now driven to that scarcity and want, that not a cup of wine, nor a draught of beer, nor a drop of water can be got in all hell for them. Sin must have its punishment in a just proportion: the tongue of that rich man that had turned down so many •uns of wine, cannot procure in hell one pot of water to cool it: in his tongue he sinned, in his tongue he is tormented: fiery heats breed a scorching thirst, yet because he denied Lazarus a crumb of bread, Lazarus must not bring him a drop of water: how? a drop of water? alas, what are ten thousand rivers, or the whole sea of water unto that infinite world of fire? here is a poor suit indeed, what begs he, but a cup of water, an handful of water, a drop of water, nay were it but a wet finger, to cool the tip of his scorched tongue? Hearken ye drunkards, and fear these flames that one day must parch your tongues. Here you may recreate yourselves by sleep when you have too much, or by idle company when you would have more, but hereafter you shall find no means to qualify these pains: sleep there is none, though it be nothing but an everlasting night: friends there be none, though all could profess their everlasting loves; you may indeed commerce with some company, but who are they save devils and reprobates, (miserable comforters) in the same condemnation? Who is not sober, that knows what portion must befall these reprobates? their mouths dry as dust, their tongues red as fire, their throats parched as coals, all their bowels clung together as the burning parchment. He that sows iniquity shall reap vanity; the drunkard that abuseth so much wine, must there want a little water, his tongue shall cleave to the roof of his mouth, and goblets of boiling lead run down his throat: as the pleasure, so the pain, he was comforted, and is tormented.

[4] And yet more Bundles, where is Covetousnes and her gripers? O the iron age we live in! was there ever less love? ever more dissembling? the covetous hoardeth, holdeth, oppresseth, or it may be puts out to usury, but never without sureties, pledges, morgages, bills or bonds; Think of those bonds ye covetous, that must hind you in bundles; had you then ten thousand worlds, and were they all composed of purest gold, and brim-full with richest jewels, yet would you call them all at the foot of some Lazarus, for one drop of water, or one puff of wind, to cool any part or piece of your tormented members. See the cruel effect of sin, he that hath no pity, shall not be pitied, no, he shall have judgement without mercy, that hath shown no mercy, James 2.13. Thus to pay the covetous in his own coin, coffers and chests shall be brought before him, there shall devils ring him a peal of this damned coin, of pounds, of shillings, of pence, these accounts shall sound through his ears; and to satisfy his heart, melted gold shall be poured down his throat, yea he shall be served too with his meat in pl^{•••} and plate and meat all boil together to his loathed supper; thus hath God satisfied him that could never satisfy himself, his gold now wants no weight, his silver is not scarce, mountains and loads are prepared for him to his greater torments.

[5] Yet again more Bundles, where is Adultery with her minions? Lo ugly fiends do embrace them, and the furies of hell be as their bosom concubines. I have read somewhere▪ but I will not deliver it as a truth) that a voluptuous man dying, and going to this place of torment, he was there saluted in this fearful manner: First, Lucifer commands to fetch him a chair, and forthwith an iron chair red-hot with sparkling fire was brought, and he set thereon: this done, Lucifer commands again to fetch him drink, and a drink of melted lead was brought in a cup, which they straightway pouring into his open mouth, anon it came running out of all his members: this done, Lucifer commands again, that according to his use they should fetch him musitians to make him merry, and a sort of musitians came with hot glowing trumpets, and sounding them at his ears (whereto they laid them) anon there come sparks of fire leaping out of his mouth, his eyes, and nostrils, all about him; this done, Lucifer commands again, that according to his wonted manner he should have his Concubines, and upon this they bring him to a bed of fire, where Furies give him kisses, fiery Serpents hug about his neck, and the gnawing worm sucks blood from his heart and breasts, forever and ever. Howsoever in this story, it may be altogether truth was not brought a bed, yet imagine what a welcome shall be to the damned souls? their eyes shall startle, their ears glow, their nostrils suck up flames, their mouths taste bitterness, and for the sense of feeling (according to the measure of their sin) they are wrapped in the grisly embracements of stinging and stinking flames: where now are those dainty delights, sweet music, merry company? are all left behind? and is there no recreation in those smokie vaults? Unhappie dungeon, where there is no order but horror, no singing but howling, no ditties but their woes, no consorts but shrieks, no beauty but blackness, and no perfumes or odour, but pitch and sulphur. Let the heat of this fire cool the heat of your lust, pleasure ends with pain. In as much (saith God) as the harlot glorified herself, and lived in pleasure, so much give ye to her torment and sorrow: Rev. 18.7.

You see now (Beloved) what Tares are in bundles, the Proud, Gluttons, Drunkards, Covetous, Adulterers; these and such others are bundled by the Reapers at the general harvest.

[Use.] O then, having yet a little time, how should we labor to escape Hels horror? let the Proud be humbled the Epicure fast, the Drunkard pray, the Adulterer chastise himself to pull down his body, and for the Covetous wretch let him with all holy greediness lay out his bags for the eternal good of his soul: Alas, one foot in heaven is better then all your lands on earth. I had rather be a door-keeper in the house of my God, then to dwell in the Tents (in the houses, in the Palaces) of the wicked. Now then in the fear of God, reform your lives, and your harvest without question, shall be the joy of heaven; or if Tares will be Tares, what remains but Binding, and Bundling? Bind them, Bundle them, Burn them.

The harvest is done, and the Angels sing and shout for their ended task: the Tares are reaped, the furrows cleansed, the sickles laid aside, the sheaves Bundled: and to shut up all, they must be Burned: But stay we them a while, and at our next meeting we will set them on fire. God make us better seed, that we may receive a better crop, even that Crown of glory in the highest heavens.

To burn them.]

WE have followed the Prisoners from the Barre, and brought them to the stake, what remains further, but to kindle the Faggots, and so to shut up all with the burning?

Hell-fire (at the first naming) makes my soul to tremble, and would the boldest courage but enter into a serious meditation, what it were to lie everlastingly in a red hot scorching fire, how could he choose but stand astonished at the consideration? it is a furios fire: Rouze up (beloved) for either this, or nothing will awake you from the sleep of sin wherein you snort too securely.

Some differences there are about this fire: many think it a Metaphoricall, others a material fire; be it whether it will, it is every way fearful, and far above the reach either of human or Angelical thoughts to conceive.

If it be Metaphoricall (as Gregory and Calvin are of mind) then is it either more, or nothing less terrible, when the Holy Ghost shadows unto us the joys of heaven by gold, and pearls, and precious stones, Revel. 21. there is no one thinks but those joys do far surpass these shadows: and if the pains of hell are set out by fire and flames, and brimstone, and burning, what pains are those, to which these are nothing but dumb shows or types?

Or if hell fire be material (as Augustine and Bullenger do conjecture) yet is it far beyond any fire on earth: mark but the difference: our fire is made for comfort: hell-fire is created for nothing else but torment: our fire is blown with some airy breath of man, but hell fire is blown with the angry breath of God; our fire is fed with the fuel of Wood or Cole, but hell fire is tempered with all the terrible torturing ingredients of Sulphur, and Brimstone; or (to cut the way nearer) I will reduce all the differences to some of these four, and so proceed in their order; they differ first in heat, secondly in light, thirdly in their object, fourthly, in duration.

First, in heat, The pile thereof is fire and much wood, and the breath of the Lord, like a stream of brimstone doth kindle it, Isaiah. 30.33. This fire is not made by the hand of man, nor blown from the bellows of some forge, nor fed with any fuel of combustible matter: no, it is the arm of God, and the breath of God, and the anger of God that kindles it sharply, and continues it everlastingly; and (I pray) if the breath that kindles it, be like a stream of brimstone, what is the fire itself? you know there is a great difference betwixt the heat of our breath, and the fire in our chimnies: now then if the breath of God that kindles hell fire be dissolved into brimstone: What a fearful fire is that, which a great torrent of burning Brimstone doth ever mightily blow? A torrent of Brimstone said I? no, it is not Brimstone, but like Brimstone, like to our capacity, although for the nature this like is not like; nay, could we know exactly what this breath were, you would say (I warrant you) it were far more hotter then ten thousand Rivers of Brimstone, were they all put together: Our God (saith the Apostle) is a consuming fire, Heb. 12.29. And if God be a fire, what then is hell fire, kindled by the breath God? O my soul, how canst thou but tremble at the thought of this fire, at which the very Devils themselves do quake and shiver? Pause a while and consider, wert thou arraigned at some earthly bar, thy doom past, the execution at hand, and thy body now ready to be cast, (as many a Martyrs was) into some burning fire, or boiling Caldron: O how wouldest thou shout and roar, and cry through the extremity of torment? but what is a boiling Caldron, to that boiling sea of fire and brimstone? pitch and sulphur, boil altogether, were not this enough? see there the perplexing properties of such heats; they burn as Brimstone, darkly to grieve the sight, sharply to afflict the sense, loathsomly to perplex the smell: it is a fire that needs no bellows to kindle it, nor admits of the least air to cool it; the fuel wastes not, the smoke vents not; the chimnies are but Reprobate credits, where they lie scorching, burning, houling their lullabies, and their nurses furies. The flames of Nebuchadnezzar's fire, could ascend forty nine Cubits; but if hell be a bottomless pit, sure these flames have an endless height, how hot then is that glowing Oven, where the fire burns lively the blasts go strongly, the wheels turn roundly, and the darkened fuel are those damned souls that burn in an heat surpassing ours, unspeakable of us, here is one difference.

Secondly, as hell fire differs from ours in heat, so in light. *Cast that unprofitable servant (saith our Savior) into utter darkness, Mat. 25.30. Utter] to perplex the mind, Darkness] to confound the eye. Consider but the terror of this circumstance, if a man alone in darkness, should suddenly hear a noise of ghosts, and spirits coming towards him, how would his hair bristle, his tongue falter, his blood run to the heart? yea, (I dare say) although he felt never a lash from them on his body, yet the only howling of devils, would make his very inmost heart to shake and shudder? O then, what horror is that when darkness must surround thee, and devils hollow to thee, and reprobates shrill at the lashing of their bodies, and all hell be filled with the cries and echoes of Woe. woe. woe for their torments, and the darkness? May be you will object, if there be fire, there is assuredly light: nay, (without question) this fire hath heat, no light; it is a dark smoky flame, that burns dim to the eye, yet sharp to the sense; it may be (as some do imagine) this fire affords a peculiar obscure light, but how? not for comforts, but confusion. Conceive it thus, he that in twilight sees deformed Images, or in the night beholds shapes of Ghosts, and spirits, by a dim dark light, why better he saw nothing, than such dim visages such fears, nay a thousand times worse are preserved to the view of Reprobates, they may discern through darkness, the ugly face of fiend of the foul visages of Reprobates, the furious torments of their friends, or parents, while all lie together in the same condemnation. What comfort affords this light, where nothing is seen but the Judges wrath, and the prisoners punishment? O (will they cry) that our eyes were out, or the flames were quenched, or that some period were put to this endless night of darkness! but all in vain, lo pillars of smoke arise out of the infernal pit, which darken the light, as the fire lightens the darkness: and this the second difference.*

Thirdly, there is yet another difference, in the fuel or object of this fire; ours burns not without materials, this works also on spirituals. It is (I confess) a question whether devils suffer by fire? and how may that be? some are of opinion, that they are not only spirits, but have bodies, not organical as ours, but aereall, or somewhat more subtle than the air itself: this opinion howsoever most deny, yet Austin argues for it; for if men and devils (saith he) are punished in the same fire, and that fire be corporeal, how are Devils capable of the suffering unless they have bodies, (like men) fit for the impression? And yet if we deny them to have bodies, I see no impossibility, but that spirits themselves may suffer in hell fire: is it not as easy with God to join spirits and fire, as souls and bodies? as therefore the soul may suffer through the body, so likewise may those spirits be tormented by fire. I will not argue the case either with, or against Austin, yet safely may we put this conclusion; not only men in their bodies, but devils and souls must together be tormented in hell fire. thus our Savior couples them in that last heavy doom, Go ye cursed into everlasting fire prepared for the devil and his Angels. What a fire is this? it tries the reins, it searcheth the bowels, it pierceth the very soul and inmost thoughts. O fire above measure! where spirits are the tormentors damnation the punishment, men and devils the fuel and the breath of an offended God the Bellows. Think not on your fires, that gives you heat for warmth, or light for comfort, neither fear you him that kills your bodies, but hath no further commission to hurt your souls: here is another fire, another Judge, a fire that kindles souls, a Judge that sends bodies and souls to everlasting fire: such heats, such darkness, such objects accompany this fire, the heat is intolerable, darkness palpable, body and soul both combustible, all burn together that have sinned together. This the third difference.

Lastly, there is a difference in durance, our fire dyes quickly, but hell fire lasts forever. This is done (saith Austin) admirably, yet actually, the burning bodies never consume, the kindled fire never wastes with any length of time. We read of a certain salt in Sicilia, that if put into the fire, it swims as in water, and being put into water crackles as in fire; we read of a fountain in Libya, that in a cold night is so hot, that none can touch it, & in a hot day so cold that none could drink it: If God thus work miracles on earth, dost thou seek a reason of God's high and heavy judgment in hell? I see the pit, I cannot find the depth; there is a fire that now stands as it was created, it must be endured, yet never, never must be ended. The custom of some countries, that burn malefactors, use the least fires for greatest offenders, that so the heat being lessened, the pains might be prolonged, but if this be so terrible to them, whose fire is but little, and whose time cannot be long, what an exceeding horrible torment is this in hell, where the fire is extreme great, and the time forever and ever lasting? Suppose you, or any one of you, should lie one night grievously afflicted with a raging fit of the Stone, Collick, Strangurie, Toothach, Pangs of travail, and a thousand such miseries incident to man, how would you toss and tumble? how would you turn your sides, tell the clock, count the hours, expect every moment for the gay-bright morn, and till then esteem every hour a year, and every pang a misery matchless, and intolerable: O then what will it be (think you) to lie in fire and brimstone, kept in highest flame by the unquenchable wrath of God, world without end? how tedious will be that endless night, where the clock never strikes, the time never passes, the morn never dawns, the Sun never rises; where thou canst not turn nor toss, nor tumble, nor yet take any rest; where thou shalt have nothing about thee but darkness, and horror, and wailing and yelling, wringing of hands and gnashing of teeth for evermore? Good Lord, that for a smile of present pleasure, men should run upon the rock of eternal vengeance! Come, ye that pursue vanity, and see here the fruit of sin at this harvest of Tares, Pleasures are but momentary, but the pangs are eternal: Eternal? how long is that? Nay, here we are silenced, no Limner can set it forth, no Orator can express it; if all times that ever were, and ever shall be should be put together, they would infinitely come short of this fiery eternity; the latitude thereof is not to be measured, neither by hours, nor days, nor weeks, nor months, nor years, nor Lustra's, nor Olympiads, nor Indictions, no Jubilees, nor ages, nor Plato's years, nor by the most slow motions of the eighth sphere, though all these were multiplied by thousands, or millions, or the greatest multiplier, or number numbering that can be imagined. Plainly in a word, count if you please, ten hundred thousand millions of years, and add a thousand myriads of ages to them, and when all is done, multiply all again by a thousand, thousand, thousand of thousands, and being yet too short, count all the thoughts, motions, mutations of men and Angels, add to them all the sands of the sea, piles on the earth, stars in the Heavens, and when all this is done, multiply all again by all the numbers, squares, cubicks of Arithmetic, and yet all these are so far short of eternity, that they neither touch end nor middle, nor the least part or parcel of it: what then is this which the damned suffer? eternal fire? we had need to cry out Fire, fire, fire: Alas, to what end? there is no help to extinguish fire that must burn forever: your Buckets may quench other fires, not this; no milk nor vinegar can extinguish that wild-fire: it is a fire which no means can moderate, no patience can endure, no time can forever change, but in it whosoever woefully lies, their flesh shall frie, their blood shall boil, their hearts consume; yet they shall never die, but dying live, and living die; death in life, life in death, miserable ever. This is that consideration, which shall bring all the damned Reprobates to shriek and howl everlastingly: were they persuaded that after millions of years they should have one year of pleasure, or after thousands of millions they should have some end of torment, here would be a little hope; but this word Ever] breaks their hearts asunder: this ever, ever, gives new life again to those insufferable sorrows; and hence it is, that when all those millions of years are done and gone, then (God knows) must the wheels of their torment whirl about and about: Alas? the fire is durable, the heat continual, the fuel immortal, and such is the end of Tares, they must burn without end: Bind them in bundles to burn them.

Lo here the fire of hell, which compared to ours on earth, it differs in heat, in light, in fuel, in durance: Let your souls work on these objects, that they never come nearer to those flames.

[Use. 1] Who amongst us would dwell with devouring fire, who amongst us would dwell with everlasting burnings? Beloved, as you tender your souls, and would escape the flames, reform your lives whiles you have yet a little time. You hear it sounded in Synagogues, and preached in pulpits: what sound? but heaven or hell, joys or torments; the one befalling the good, and the other the just end of the wicked. Do we believe this truth? and dare we commit sin, whose reward is this fiery death? upon due consideration, how is it that we sleep, or rest, or take a minutes ease? lesser dangers have bestraght some out of their wits, nay bereaved many of their lives: how is it then that we run headlong into this fire, yet never weigh whither we are going, till we are dropping into the pit, whence there is no redemption. Look about you while it is called today, or otherwise woe and alas that ever you were born, be sure a time will come, when miseries shall march, Angels beat alarms, God sound destruction, and the tents of his enemies be all set on fire, Bind them in bundles to burn them.

[Use. 2] Or yet if comparisons can prevail, suppose one of you should be taken, & brought along to the mouth of an hot fiery furnace, then (comparing sin with its punishment) might I question you, how much pleasure would you ask, to continue there burning but one year? how much (would you say?) surely not for all the pleasures and treasures that all this world can afford you. How is it then, that for a little sin, that endures but a moment, so many of you so little regard eternal punishment in hell fire? If we should but see a little child fall into the fire, and his very bowels burnt out, how would it grieve us, and make our very hearts bleed within us? how much more then should it grieve you to see, not a child, but your own bodies and souls cast away for a momentary sin into the lake of fire, that never shall be quenched? If a man should come amongst us, and cry Fire, Fire, thy house is all on Fire, thy corn, thy cattle, thy wife, thy children, and all thou hast are burning all together, how would this astonish us, making both the hair to stand upright on our heads, and the tears to gush out of our eyes? Behold then, and see the spirit of God cries out, Fire, fire; even the dreadful fire of hell gapeth ready to devour, not thy house, thy corn, or thy cattle, but t•• poor soul, and that for evermore: O then how should this break your flinty hearts asunder, and make your souls bleed again and again: if you have any spark of grace, this (me thinks) should move you to a strict 〈...〉, if you have any care of your souls, this (me thinks) should make you to walk humbly, and purely; carefully and consci••bly towards God, and towards man: if not, what remains but fire, fire: Bind them in bundles to burn them.

[3] Or yet if example can persuade us more, meditate on the miserable condition of that nameless rich man: Suppose you saw him in hell torments, compassed about with furies, fires, and all that black guard below, his tongue flaming, his eyes staring, his conscience biting, his soul suffering, his body all over-burning in that fire of hell. O lamentable fight! but to make it more lamentable, hearken how he roars and cries through the extremity of pains: O torment, torment! how am I tormented in this fire? my head, my heart, my eyes; my ears, my tongue, my tongue is all on fire, what shall I do? whither shall I fly for succor? within me is the worm, without me is fire, about me are devils, above me is Abraham, and what glorious star is yond I see, but Lazarus, poor Lazarus in his bosom? what is a beggar exalted, and am I in torments? Why Abraham father Abraham, have 〈◇〉 on me: See here a man burning, schorching, frying in hell 〈◇〉, one dram of mercy, one drop of water to a tormented soul; Oh I burn, I burn, I burn without ease or end, and is there none to 〈◇〉 me? Come Lazarus (if Abraham will not hear) let me beg of thee • beggar, and howsoever I denied thee a 〈◇〉 •f bread, yet be so good, so charitable, as to dip the tip of thy finger in water, and cool my tongue. It is a poor suit I ask not to dive, but dip; not thy hand, but finger; not all, but the tip of it; not in s••, but water; not to quench, but to cool; not my body, but my least member, be it my tongue only: no ease so little, no grant so poor, no remedy so small, but happy were I if I could obtain it, though I begged it with tears and prayers of a thousand thousand years continuance: But see Abraham and Lazarus deny my suits; I burn, and neither God, nor Saint, nor Angel takes pity on me: and shall I cry for help on devils? alas! they are my tormentors that lash me, and cut me with their whips of burning steel and iron. O beloved! what shall we say to the roaring rage of this tormented wretch? Alas! alas! how little do men think on this? they can pass away time sporting and playing, as if they went to prison but for a few weeks, or days, just like men, who having the sentence of death past upon them, run fooling and laughing to the execution; but when once hell mouth hath shut herself, then shall they find nothing but eternity of torments: in the fear of God take heed in time of this eternity, eternity, lest you also come into this place of eternity, eternity of torment: it is the doom of Tares, woe to them whosoever, that are of the number, for they they] must be gathered, and bound, and bundled, and burned.

We have now done our task, and ended the harvest: if you please to cast back your eye upon the particulars delivered, they amount to this sum.

Whatsoever a man sows that shall he reap, Gal. 6.7. If the enemy sow Tares, and we nourish the seed, what think you is the Harvest? Gather ye together first the Tares, saith our Savior to the Angels: they are branded in their name, Tares] sped in the time, first] cursed in their doom, gathered] but worst in the hands of their executioners, it is by Angels] and yet what is all this to the latter work in hand? If the Tares weeded up might rot in the furrows, the punishment were less; but as they are gathered, so they must be bound.] Is that all? nay, as they are bound, so they must be bundled] Is that all? nay, as they are bound and bundled, so they must be burned] Bind them in bundles to burn them. I must end this Text, yet am loath to leave you where it ends: As there is an harvest of Tares, so there is a better harvest of Wheat, They that sow in tears shall reap in joy; if we repent us of our sins, we shall have a blessed harvest indeed: how? forty grains for one? nay, (by the promise of our Savior) an hundred fold. A measure heapen, and shaken, and thrust together, and yet running over. Every Saint shall have joy and glory, fountains of pleasure, and rivers of delight, where they may swim, and bathe their souls forever and ever: what though Tares must to the fire? the Wheat is gathered into Heaven. Pray you then with me, that we may be Wheat, not Tares; and God so bless the seed, that every soul of us may have a joyful harvest in the kingdom of Heaven. AMEN.

FINIS.

Right Purgatory.

HEB. 1.3.

When he had by himself purged our sins.

THE point is not full, but to make it up, the Text stands compassed with words of wonder, concerning the word, our Savior; he that is the Son of God, heir of all things, creator of the world, the brightness of his glory, the image of his person, and upholder of all things by the word of his power, stands here as the subject of humility and glory: he purged our sins, and sits on the right hand of the majesty on high. He purged our sins, by his suffering on the cross, he sits on God's right hand, by obtaining the crown: he purged our sins by dying for them, he sits on God's right hand, by ruling with him; what need we more? here is his passion and session in the same order he performed them, for then he sate down on the right hand of his Father, when he had by himself purged our sins.

But to come nearer the words, they are as the drugs of an Apothecary, and we will examine the ingredients. O I am sick of love, saith the Church in Canticles, Cant. 5.8. Sick indeed, not of love only, but of sin also; a disease that infatuates the mind, gripes the conscience, distempers the humors, disturbs the passions, corrupts the body, endangers the soul: Is not he blessed that can help this malady? Come then ye that labor of sin, and to your endless comfort see here the manner of the cure: there is a Physician he,] the patient himself,] the physic administered when he had purged,] the ill humors evacuated, when he had purged our sins.]

Or to gather up the crumbs, lest in this costly receipt or physic anything be lost; see here the remedy girt and compassed with each necessary circumstance, the time when,] the person he,] the matter purged,] the manner, by himself,] the disease, sin,] the extent of it, ours.] Observe all, and you find no time more dismal then this when,] no person more humbled then this he] no physic more operative then this purge,] no disease more dangerous, no plague more spreading then sin,] our] sin, for which he suffered, When he by himself had purged our sins.]

We have opened the body of the Text, now look on the parts, and you may see the Anatomy of our Savior in every member of it.

When]

The Text begins with the time, When] he had purged:] and this time (saith Erasmus) according to the original denotes the time past, lest that we had thought he had purged our sins by his sitting him down at the right hand of God. First therefore (saith the Apostle) he purged,] and then sate:] he first purged by his death, and when that was done, he sate at the right hand of the Majesty, in the highest places. Whence observe:

[Doctrine.] The time that Christ purged was in the days of his humiliation. Then was he born, Matth. 1.18. then was he tempted, Matth. 4.1. then was he circumcised, Luke 2.21. then was he traduced, Matth. 11.19. then was he persecuted, John 8.59. then was he betrayed, Matth. 26.16. then was he apprehended, Matth. 26.50. then was he mocked, Matth. 27.29. then was he crucified, Matth. 27.35. But all his life was full of infirmity, so (according to the nature of all infirmities) he had those four times mentioned by Physicians in his life, the beginning, the increase, the Akmen or state, and declination. Give me leave but to prosecute these times, and by that time we have done, the hour (I know) will summon us to a conclusion.

[1] First then he had his 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , his beginning, and that was the first time of his purging, even at his birth; then took he our infirmities upon him, and in some measure evacuated the brightness of his glory, to become for us a poor, a weak, a silly babe on earth. Mark (I pray) how this purge works with him at his first entrance into the world, it brings him into so poor and low estate that heaven and earth stand amazed at so great a change: where was he born, but at Bethlehem, a little city? where did the shepherds find him, but in a poor sory cottage? and there if we look after majesty, we find no guard but Joseph, no attendants but Mary, no heralds but Shepherds, none of the bed-chamber but beasts and oxen, and howsoever he is styled King of the Jews, yet the Jews cry out, They have no King but Caesar. His mother indeed descended of kings, and he himself gives crowns to others, of victory, of life, of glory, but for his own head no crown is prepared but a crown of thorns: anon you may see him clothed in purple, anointed with spittle, but for the crown we speak of, they can afford him no richer then of the hedge, no easier then of thorns.

Thus for the beginning, what then is the increase of this?

[2] This increase (say Physicians) is when the symptoms more manifestly appear either of life or death; and no sooner was our Savior born, but he had manifest tokens evidently showing that for us he must die. If you run through his life, what was it but a sickness and a purge? Consider his parcitie in abstinence, his constancy in watching, his frequency in prayer, his assiduity in labor. But how soon, and Herod makes him flee into Egypt, and live an exile in a strange land? At his return he dwells at Nazareth, and there is accounted Jesus the carpenter. When he enters into his Ministry, he hath no house to repose him, no money to relieve him, no friends to comfort him. See him first set on by Satan, then by men; he is led into the wilderness by the spirit, and there he fasts forty days and forty nights, without bit of bread, or drop of water. The devil (seeing this opportunity) begins his temptation, who presently overcome, the Jews follow after him with hue and cry: mark but their words and works: In word they call him a glutton, a drunkard, a deceiver, a sinner, a mad-man, a Samaritan, and one possessed with a devil. Good words I pray! is not he the anointed of God? the Savior of men? yes, but they rendered me evil for good, and hatred for my good will, said the Psalmist in his person. When therefore he did miracles, he was a sorcerer; when he reproved sinners, he was a seducer; when he received sinners, he was their favourer; when he healed the sick, he was a breaker of the Sabbath; when he cast out devils, it was by the power of devils; what and how many unjust contumelies endured he of the Pharisees, who sometimes cast him out of the city, accused him of blasphemy, cried Out upon him, he was a man not worthy to live. And as they say, they do; observe but their works: First they send officers to apprehend him, but they being overcome with the grace of his speeches, return only with this answer, Never man spake like this man. Then took they up stones to stone him, but by his miraculous passage (whiles they are a conspiring his death) he escapes out of their hands: then lead they him to an hill, thinking to throw him down headlong, and yet all would not do for ere they are aware of it, he fairly passeth through the midst of them all. At last his last passion draws near, and then men and devils combine in one to make him at once wretched and miserable: He is despised and rejected of men: yea he is a man full of sorrows (saith the Prophet) and hath experience of infirmities, Isaiah 53.3.

Or for a further inquiry, let us do what our Savior bids, Search the Scriptures, for they are they which testify of him. We have but two Testaments in the whole Bible, and both these give full evidence of Christ's miserable life. In the Old Testament it was prefigured by Adams penalties, Abel's death, Abraham's exile, Isaac's offering, Jacob's wrestling, Joseph's bonds, Jobs suffering, David's mourning; yea, the Prophets themselves were both figures, and delivered prophecies of our Savior's afflictions. Thus Isaiah of him: Surely he hath born our griefs, and carried our sorrows, yet we did not esteem him stricken, smitten of God, and afflicted, Esa. 53.4. Thus Jeremy of him: He gives his cheeks to him that smites him, he is filled full with reproach, Lam. 3.30. Thus Daniel of him, After threescore and two weeks shall Messiah be slain: and shall have nothing, Dan. 9.26. Thus Zechary of him, What are these wounds in the midst of thy hands? and he shall say, With these wounds was I wounded in the house of my friends, Zach. 13.6. But come we to the New Testament; and in every Gospel, we may not only read, but see him suffer: Matthew who relates the history of his life, what writes he but a tragedy, wherein every chapter is a scene? Look through the whole book, and you read in the first Chapter, Joseph will not father him; in the second Herod seeks to kill him; in the third John the Baptist would needs out his humility deny him baptism; in the fourth he fasts forty days, and forty nights, and is tempted in the wilderness; in the fifth he foretells persecutions, and all manner of evil against his Apostles; in the sixth he teacheth his church that strict course of life, in fasting, praying, giving of alms, and forgiving of enemies; in the seventh he concludes his Sermon made on the top of a mountain; in the eighth he comes down, and towards night hath no house to harbor in, nor pillow to rest his head on; in the ninth he is rebuked of the Pharisees for not fasting; in the tenth all men hate his disciples for his sake; in the eleventh they call him that knew no excess, a glutton and a drunkard; in the twelfth they tell him how he casts out devils through Beelzebub prince of devils; in the thirteenth they are offended at him, and derive his pedigree from a Carpenter; in the fourteenth Herod thinks him to be John Baptists ghost; in the fifteenth the Scribes reprehend him for the breach of their traditions; in the sixteenth the Sadducees tempt him for a token; in the seventeen he pays tribute to Caesar; in all the rest he foretells and executes his passion: now count not chapters, but hours, from that hour wherein he was sought for, until the sixth hour of his crucifying: one betrays him, another apprehends him, one binds him, another leads him bound from Pilate to Herod, from Herod back again to Pilate; thus they never leave him, till his soul leave the world, and he be a dead man amongst them.

You have seen the beginning and increase, and we'll now draw the Curtains, that you may behold the Bridegroom where he lieth at Noon day, to wit, in the state or vigor of his grievous sufferings.

This state, or Akmen (say Physicians) is when nature and the disease are in greatest contention, when all the symptoms are become most vehement, so that neither nature or the infirmity, must needs, have the victory; and although (say Divines) all Christ's life was full of miseries, yet principally and chiefly is, that called his passion in Scripture, which he endured two days before death: and to this extreme passion (saith a Modern) is the purging of sins chiefly attributed. Come then, ye that pass by, behold, and see, if there was ever any sorrow like unto this sorrows; which is done unto him in the day of God's anger. His infirmities are now at full, and the symptoms which make it evident unto us, are some inward, some outward, inward in his soul, outward in his body: we'll take a view of them both.

First, his soul, it began to be sorrowful, saith Matthew: to be amazed and very heavy saith Mark: to be in an agony saith Luke: to be troubled saith John: Here is sorrow, and heaviness, and agony, and trouble, the estimate whereof we may take from his own words in the garden; My soul is exceeding sorrowful, even unto death: Now was the time he purged, not only in his body, but his soul too; now is my soul troubled, and what shall I say? Father save me from this hour, but for this cause came I unto this hour. A fatal hour sure, of which it was said before often, his hour was not yet come, but being come, he could then tell his Disciples, the hour is at hand, and after tell the Jews, this is your very hour, and the power of darkness: Now was it that Christ yielded his soul for our souls, to the susception of sorrow, perpeccion of pain, and dissolution of nature: and therefore even sick with sorrow, he never left sweating, weeping and crying, till he was heard in that which he feared.

Secondly, as his soul, so his body had her symptoms of approaching death: Our very eye will soon tell us, no place was left in his body where he might be smitten and was not: his skin was torn, his flesh was rent, his bones unjoynted, his sinews strained; should we sum up all? See that face of his, fairer then the Sons of men, how it is defiled with spettle, swoln with buffets, masked with a cover of gore-blood; see that head, white as white wool, and snow, how is it Crowned with thorns, beaten with a reed, and both head and hair died in a sanguine red that issued from it; see those eyes that were as a flame of fire, how they swim with tears, are dim with blood, and darken at the sad approach of dreadful death: see that mouth which speaks as never man spoke, how it is wan with strokes, grim with death, and embittered with that tartest potion of gall and vinegar: Should we any lower? See those arms that could embrace all the power of the world, how they are strained and stretched on the Cross; those shoulders that could bear the frame of Heaven, how they are lasht with knotty cords, and whips; those hands that made the world, and all therein, how are they nailed and clenched to a piece of wood; that heart where never dwelt deceit nor sin, how it is pierced and wounded with a soldiers spear: those bowels that yearned with compassion of others infirmities, how they are dry and pent with straining pulls: those feet that walked in the ways of God, how they are bored, and fastened to a Cross with nails: from hand to foot there is no part free, but all over he is covered in a mantle of cold blood, whose garments were doft before, and took of them that were his hangmen: Poor Savior, what a woeful sight is this? A bloody face, thorny head, watery eyes, wan mouth, strained arms, lashed shoulders, nailed hands, wounded heart, gripping bowels, bored feet: Here is sorry pains, when no part is free: and these are the outward Symptoms of his state that appear in his Body.

We have thus far seen our Sun (the Sun of righteousness) in the daybreak, and rising, and height of his suffering: what remains further, but that we come to the Declination, and so end our journey for this time?

This Declination (say Physicians) is, when Nature overcomes sickness, so that all diseases attain not this time, but those, and those only that admit of a Recovery: yet howsoever (saith my Author) there is no true declination before death: there is at least a seeming declination, when sometimes the symptoms may become more remiss, because of weak nature yielding to the fury and tyranny of death overcoming it. I will not say directly, that our Savior declined thus, either in deed, or in show: for neither was the cup removed from him, nor died he by degrees; but in perfect sense, and perfect patience both of body and soul, he did voluntarily, and miraculously resign his Spirit (as he was praying) into the hands of his Father. Here then was the true declination of this Patient, not before death, but in death, and rightly too: for then was it that this Sun went down in a ruddy Cloud; then was it that this Patient received the last dregs of his Purge; then was it that God's Justice was satisfied, the consummatum est was effected, all was finished: as for his burial, resurrection, and ascension which follow after this time they serve not to make any satisfaction for sin, but only to confirm it, or apply it, after it was made and accomplished.

[Use 1] But what use of all this? Give me leave (I pray) to shake the tree, and then do you gather the fruit: from the first part, his birth, we may learn Humility, a grace most prevailing with God for the obtaining of all graces; this was it that made David King, Moses a Governor: nay, what say we to Christ himself, who from his first entrance, until his departure to his Father, was the very mirror of true Humility it self? Learn of me (saith he) to be humble and lowly in spirit, and you shall find rest unto your souls. Hereunto accorded his Doctrine, when he pronounced them Blessed who were poor in spirit, hereunto accorded his reprehension, when he disliked their manners who were wont to choose out the chief rooms at feasts: hereunto accorded his practice, when he vouchsafed to wash his Disciples feet, and to wipe them with the towell wherewith he was girded. O Humility, how great are thy riches, that are thus commended to us! thou pleasest men, delightest angels, confoundest devils, and bringest thy Creator to a Manger, where he is lapped in rags, and clothed in flesh! Had we Christian hearts to consider the Humility of our Redeemer, and how far he was from our haughty dispositions, it would pull down our Pharisaical humors, and make us far better to remember ourselves.

[Use 2] Secondly, as we learn humility from his birth, so we may learn patience from his life. If any man will come after me (saith our Savior) let him deny himself, and take up his cross and follow me. Dear Christian, if thou wilt be saved, mind thy Christ: Art thou abused by lies, reproaches, evil sayings, or doings? we cannot more show how we have profited in Christ's School, then by enduring them all: if patience be in our calamities, they are no calamities, but comforts: this is that comfort that keeps the heart from envy, the hand from revenge, the tongue from contumely, and often overcomes our very enemies themselves, without any weapons at all. Come then, and do you learn this lesson of our Blessed Redeemer! are you stricken? so was Christ of the Jews: are you mocked? so was Christ of the Soldiers: are you betrayed of your friends? so was Christ of his Apostle: are you accused of your enemies? so was Christ of the Pharisees: why complain you of being injured and maligned, when you see the Master of the house himself called Beelzebub? Hereunto ye are called (saith Peter) for Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example, that ye should follow his steps, 1. Pet. 2.21.

[Use 3] Thirdly, as Patience from his life, so we may learn Remorse from his Passion, Is it nothing to you, all ye that pass by? O look on him, and let this look breed in you a remorse and sorrow for your sins: Our Savior labors in the extremities of pangs, his soul is sick, his body faints, and would you know the reason? Why, thus is the head wounded that he might renew health to all the body; we sin, and Christ Jesus is heavy, and sore, and sick, and dies for it: his soul was in our souls stead, his body endured a Purgatory for us, that we both in body and soul might escape hell-fire, which our sins had deserved: who but considers what evils our sins have done, that will not grieve and mourn at the sin he hath committed? Oh that my head were a fountain of tears, that I might weep day and night for the sins of the daughters of my people! We have sinned, we have sinned, and what shall we say to thee, O Savior of men? Alas! our sins have whipped thee, scourged thee, crowned thee, crucified thee; and if I have no compassion to weep for Thee, yet, O Lord, give me grace to weep for myself, who have done thus to Thee: O my Savior! O my sins! It is I that offend, it is thou must smart for it.

Fourthly, we may yet learn another lesson, Christ (saith Paul) humbled himself, and became obedient to the death, even the death of the Cross, Phil. 2.8. and is it not our parts to be obedient to him who became thus obedient for us? We may gather Humility from his birth, and Patience from his life, and Remorse from his Passion; and to make up the posie, here is one flower more, Obedience, which that Tree also yielded whereon he suffered. If you love me (saith our Savior) keep my Commandments. How, blessed Savior? If you love me? Who will not love thee, who hast so dearly loved us, as to give up thy dearest life for the ransom of our souls? But to tell us that there is no better testimony of our love, then to obey his commands, he woes us with these sugared words (whose lips like Lilies, are dropping down pure Myrrh) if you love me: If you love me, learn obedience of me, keep my Commandments: and to move us the more (if all this cannot) what love and obedience was there in him think you? Consider, and wonder! That the Son of God would banish himself thirty three years from his glorious Majesty; and what more? would be born man; and what more? would be the meanest amongst men; and what more? would endure the miseries of life; and what more? would come to the bitter pangs of death; and what more? would be made obedient to the death, even the death of the Cross; a degree beyond death. O Son of God, whither doth thy humility descend? but thus it must be, the Prophets had foretold it, and according to their prophesies the days were accomplished, When he himself must be purged: He was born, he lived, he suffered, he died, and thus run round the wheels of those miserable times; When] he had by himself purged our sins.

You see the Time's past, and a new Time must give you the remainder of the Text; the Time is when,] the Person He,] and he it is that in order will next come after, only have you the patience, till we have the leisure to draw out his picture, and then you shall see him in some mean proportion, Who had by himself purged our sins.

He]

WE have observed the time When he purged, and now time it is that you know the Physician who administers it: the Apostle tells you it is He] that is, Christ our Savior, who seeing us labor in the pains and pangs of sin, he bows the heavens and comes down; he takes upon him our frailty, that we through him might have the remedy to escape hell fire. Come then, and behold the man, who undertakes this cure of souls; He cometh leaping upon the mountains, skipping upon the hills, saith Solomon in his Songs: and would you know his leaps, saith Gregory? See then how he leaps from his Throne to his Cratch, from his Cratch to his Cross, from his Cross to his Crown; downwards and upwards, like a Roe or a young Hart upon the mountains of spices.

His first leap downwards was from heaven, and this tells us how he was God from everlasting: so said the Centurion, Surely this man was the Son of God, Mark 15.39. How else? the sin of man could no otherwise be expiated, but by the Son of God; man had sinned and God was offended, therefore God became man, to reconcile man to God: Had he been man alone, not God, he might have suffered, but he could not have satisfied; therefore this man was God, that in his man-hood he might suffer, and by his God-head he might satisfy: O wonderful Redemption! that God must take upon him our frailty: had we thus far run upon the score of vengeance, that none could satisfy but God himself? could not he have made his Angels Ambassadors, but he himself must come in person? no; Angels, or Saints could neither super-erogate, but if God will save us, God himself must come and die for us: it were sure no little benefit, if the King would pardon a Thief; but that the King himself should die for this Malefactor; this were most wonderful, and indeed beyond all expectation; and yet thus will the King of heaven deal with us, he will not only pardon our faults, but satisfy the Law: we sin against God, and God against whom we sin, must die for it: this is a depth beyond founding, an height above all human reach, what is he? God.

But we must fall a note, the Creator is become a Creature; if you ask what Creature? I must tell you, though it were an Angel, yet this were a great leap, which no created understanding could measure; what are the Angels in respect of God? he is their Lord, they but his servants, ministers, messengers, and howsoever it would dazzle us to behold their faces, yet cannot the brightest Angels stand before God, but they are fain to cover their own faces with a pair of wings: the difference may appear in Revel. 5.13, 14. where the Lamb is said to sit upon the Throne, but the four Beasts and four and twenty Elders fall down and worship him. Is not here a great distance betwixt the Lamb in his Throne, and the Beasts at his feet? and yet thus far will the Lamb descend that for our sakes he will dethrone himself, reject his state, take the office of an Angel, to bring us the glad tidings of salvation in purging our sins.

And was he an Angel? nay that was too much, he was made (saith the Apostle) a little lower then the Angels for the suffering of death, Heb. 2.9. What? the Son of God to be made lower then the Angels? here was a leap beyond the reach or compass of all human thoughts; he that made the Angels, is made lower by a little then the Angels; the Creator is not only become a creature, but inferior to some creatures that he did create: O ye Angels, how stand ye amazed at this humility? that God your Master should become meaner then his servants, that the Lord of heaven should deny the dignity of powers, principalities, Cherubims, Seraphims, Arch-Angel, or Angel: O Jesus! how contrary art thou to thy aspiring Creatures? some Angels through pride would needs be as God, but God through humility is made lower then the Angels, not equal with them, but a note below them, as David that sweet singer of Israel sung, thou madest him little lower then the Angels, Psalm 8.9.

But how much lower? by a little (saith Paul) and if you would know what that little was, he tells you again, that he took not on him the nature of Angels, but he took on him the seed of Abraham, Heb. 2.16. Here is that great abyss, which all the powers of heaven could no less but wonder at: Abraham's Lord is become Abraham's Son; the God of Abraham, the God of Jsaac, and the God of Jacob, hath took upon him the seed of Abraham, the seed of Isaac, and the seed of Jacob; wonder above wonders! that God should take the shape of Angels, is more then we can think, but to take on him the nature of man, is more then the tongue of Angels can express; that the King of heaven should leave his glorious mansion, and from the bosom of his Father come into the womb of his mother, from that company of Angels, and Arch-Angels, to a rude rout of sinful men: Tell ye the daughters of Zion, behold thy King cometh unto thee, saith the Prophet Isaiah in the 62. Chap. 11. verse. what could he less? and what canst thou more? wonderful love that he would come, but more wonderful is the manner of his coming; he that before made man a soul after the image of God, now makes himself a body after the image of man; and he that was more excellent then all Angels, becomes lesser, lower then the Angels, even a mortal, miserable, wretched man.

But what man? as he is King of heaven, let him be King of all the world; if he be man, let him be the ruler of Mankind: no, thou art deceived (O Jew) that expectest in thy Savior the glory of the world; fear not Herod the loss of thy Diadem, for this child is born, not to be thy successor, but if thou wilt believe, to be thy Savior; was he a King on earth? alas! look through the Chronicles of his life, and you find him so far from a King, that he is the meanest subject of all men: where was he born but at Bethlehem, a little City? where did the shepherds find him, but in a sorry cottage? who were his Disciples, but poor Fisher-men? who his companions, but Publicans and sinners? is he hungry? where stands his Table, but on plain ground? what are his dainties, but bread and a few fishes? who are his guests, but a rout of hungry starved creatures? and where is his lodging, but at the stern of a ship? here is a poor King, without either presence or bed-chamber, The foxes have holes, and the birds of the air have nests, but the Son of man hath not whereon to lay his head, Matth. 8.20.

[6] Descend we a little lower, and place him in our own rank, what was he but a Carpenter, say the Jews in scorn? Is not this the Carpenter, Mary's son? Mark. 6.3. A poor trade sure, but to show us that he was man, and how much he hated idleness, some time he will bestow in the labors of man's life: but O wonder! if he will reject majesty, let him use at least some of those liberal arts; or if he will be mechanical, let him choose to some noble trade, Thy Merchants were the great men of the earth, said the Angel to Babylon, Apoc. 18.23. Ay, but our Savior is no Adventurer, neither is he so stockt to follow any such profession; once indeed he travelled into Egypt with Joseph and Mary, but to show us that it was no prize, you may see Mary his mother steal him away by night, without further preparation: what, gone on a sudden? it seems there was no treasure to hide, no hangings to take down, no lands to secure, his mother needs do no more but lock the doors and away: what portion then is for the Lord of heaven? O sweet Jesu, thou must be content for us to hew sticks and stocks, besides which (after his coming out of Egypt, about the seventh year of his age, until his baptism by John, which was the thirtieth) we find little else recorded in any Writers, profane or Ecclesiastical.

And are we now at our just Quantum? alas, what quantity, what bounds hath the humility of our Savior? is he a Carpenter? that were to be master of a trade, but he took on him (saith the Apostle) the form of a servant, not a master, Phil. 2.7. It is true, he could say to his Apostles, Ye call me master, and Lord, and ye say well, for so I am, John. 13.13. and yet at that very instant mark but his gestures, and you may see their Lord and Master, become a servant to his servants: his many offices express his services, when he rose from supper, and laid a side his upper garments, and took a towell and girded himself, and after that he had poured water in a basen, begun to wash his disciples feet, and to wipe them with the towell wherewith he was girded. O ye blessed spirits, look down from heaven, and you may see even the Almighty kneeling at the feet of men! O ye blessed Apostles, why tremble ye not at this so wonderful sight of your lovely, lowly Creator? Peter, what doest thou? Is not he the beauty of the heavens, the Paradise of Angels, the brightness of God, the Redeemer of men? and wilt thou (notwithstanding all this) let him wash thy feet? no, leave, O Lord, leave this base office for thy servants, lay down the towell, put on thy apparel, see Peter is resolute. Lord, doest thou wash my feet? no Lord, thou shalt never do it. Yes Peter thus it must be, to leave thee and us a memorial of his humility; I have given you an example (saith Christ) that ye should do as I have done unto you: and what hath he done, but for our sakes is become a servant, yea his servants servant, washing and wiping, not their hands, or heads, but the very meanest, lowest parts, their feet.

[8] And yet there is a lower fall, How many hired servants (said the Prodigal) at my fathers house have bread enough, and I die for hunger? and as if our Savior's case were like the Prodigals, you may see him little lower then a servant, yea little better then a beggar: Ye know (saith the Apostle) the grace of our Lord Jesus Christ, that though he was rich, yet for your sakes he became poor, 2 Cor. 8.9. poor indeed, and so poor, that he was not worth a penny to pay tribute, till he had borrowed it of a fish, Mat. 17.27. See him in his birth, in his life, in his death, and what was he but a pilgrim, that never had house to harbor in? a while he lodges in an oxen-stall, thence he flies into Egypt, back he comes into Galilee, anon he travels to Jerusalem, within a while (as if all his life were but a wandering) you may see him on mount Calvary hanging on the cross, was ever any beggars life more miserable? he hath no house, no money, no friends, no lands, and howsoever he was God the disposer of all; yet for us he became man, a poor man, a mean man, yea the meanest of all men: and this another step downwards.

[9] But this now low enough, men are the image of God: ay but the Son of God is not used as a man, but rather as a poor dumb beast appointed to the slaughter: what was he but a sleep, said Isaiah of him? Isaiah. 53.7. a sheep indeed, and that more especially in these two qualities. First, as a sheep before the shearer is dumb, so he openeth not his mouth: and to this purpose was that silence of our Savior: when all those evidences came against him, he would not so much as drop one syllable to defend his cause: if the high Priests question him, What is the matter that these men witness against thee? Matthew tells us that Jesus held his peace, Mat. 26.63. If Pilate say unto him. Behold how many things they witness against thee, Mark tells us, that Jesus answered him nothing, Mark. 15.5. If Herod question with him in many words, because he had heard many things of him, Luke tells us, that he answered him nothing, Luk. 23.9. As a poor sheep in the hands of the shearer, he is dumb before his Judges and accusers, whence briefly we may observe, Christ came not to defend, but to suffer condemnation. Secondly (as a sheep he is dumb, and) as a sheep he is slain; He was led (saith the Prophet) as a sheep to the slaughter. O Jesu! art thou come to this? to be a man who art God, a sheep, who art man, and so for our sakes far inferior to ourselves: nay worse, a sheep: how? not free, as one that is leaping on the mountains, or skipping on the hills; no, but a sheep that is led:] led whether? not thither as David was, who could say of his Shepherd, that he fed him in green pastures, and led him forth besides the waters of comfort: no, but led to the slaughter. He is a sheep, a sheep led, a sheep led to the slaughter; and such a slaughter, that were he a dumb creature, yet great ruth it were to see him so handled as he was by the Jews.

[10] And yet will his humility descend a little lower, as he was the poorest of men, so the least of sheep; like a lamb, saith the Apostle, Act. 8.32. and, Behold the Lamb (said John the Baptist) even the Lamb of God which takes away the sin of the world, Joh. 1.29. This was that Lamb which the Paschal Lamb prefigured, Your Lamb (saith God to the Israelites) shall be a Lamb without blemish, and the blood shall be a token for you, that I will pass over you, Exod. 12.13. But was ever lamb like the Lamb of God? he is without blemish, saith Pilate, I find no fault in him, Luk. 23.4. and the sprinkling of his blood (saith Peter) is the right token of election, 1 Pet. 1.2. Such a lamb was this Lamb without blemish in his life, and whose blood was sprinkled at his death, in life and death ever suffering for us, who (had he not done so) should forever and ever have suffered ourselves. Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest! saith the Church in Canticles. tell me? yes: If thou knowest not (saith our Savior) go thy way forth by the foot-steps of the flock, Cant. 1.8. Our Savior is become a man, a sheep, a lamb, or if this be not humility enough, he will yet take a leap lower.

What is he but a worm, and no man yea the very scorn of men, and the outcast of the people, Psal. 22.6. Did you ever think we could have brought our Savior to thus low a degree? what, beneath a lamb, and no better then a worm? Heaven and earth may well ring of this, as being the greatest wonder that ever was: there is any bitter potion due to man, which the Son of God will not partake of to the utmost dregs; and therefore if Job say to the worm, thou art my sister, and mother; nay, if Bildad say, Man is a worm, and the son of man is but a worm; which is more then kindred: behold our Savior stooping thus low himself, what is he but a man? nay, as if that were too much, a worm, and not a man, as sung the Psalmist of him.

[12] I am so low, that unless we think him nobody, we can down no lower; and yet here is one leap more, that if we take a view of it, we may suppose him to be nothing in esteem, a Nobody indeed. Look we at every man in respect of God, and the Prophet tells us, All nations before him are as nothing, Isaiah. 40.17. And if man be thus, why sure the son of man will be no less: see then (to the wondrous astonishment of men and Angels) how greatness itself, to bring man from nothing, Exinanivit se, hath made himself nothing, or of no reputation, Phil. 2.7. How? nothing: yes, saith Beza; He that was all in all, hath reduced himself to that which is nothing at all: and Tertullian little less, Exhausit se, He hath emptied himself, or as our translation gives it, He hath made himself (not of little, but) of no reputation.

Lo here those steps (the Scripture lighting us all the way) by which our Savior descended; he that is God for us became an Angel, a man, a Serving-man, a poor man, a sheep, a lamb, a worm, a nothing in esteem, a man of no reputation.

[Use. 1] Let every soul learn his duty from hence; what should we do for him, who hath done all this for us? There is a crew of unbelievers that hear and heed not: all the sufferings of our Savior cannot move them a jot, either towards God, or from sin, and is not this a woeful lamentable case? I remember a passage in Cyprian, how he brings in the Devil triumphing over Christ in this manner: As for my followers, I never died for them, as Christ did for his, I never promised them so great a reward, as Christ hath done to his; and yet I have more followers then he, and they do more for me, then his do for him: hear, O heaven! and hearken O earth? Was ever the like frenzy? The Devil, like a roaring Lion, seeks ever and anon to devour our souls, and how many thousands, and millions of souls yield themselves to his service, though he never died for them, nor will ever do for them the poorest favor whatsoever, but pay them everlastingly with pains and pangs, death and damnation? On the other side, see our Savior (God Almighty) take on him the nature of a man, a poor man, a sheep, a lamh, a worm, a nothing in esteem; and why all this? but only to save our souls, and to give them heaven and salvation: yet such is the condition of a stubborn heart, that (to choose) it will spurn at heavens crown, and run upon hell, and be a slave to Satan, and scoff at Christ's suffering, yea and let out his blood, and pull out his heart, and bring him a degree lower then very beelzebub himself, rather then it will submit to his will, and march under his banner to the kingdom of heaven. Hence it is, that the Devil so triumphs over Christ, As for my followers (saith he) I never died for them as Christ did for his: no Devil, thou never diedst for them, but thou will put them to a death without all ease or end. Think of this, ye unbelievers; me thinks like a thunderbolt, it might shake all your hearts, and dash them into pieces.

But a word more to you, of whom I hope better things; let me exhort the Saints, that you for your parts, will ever love, and serve, and honor, and obey, and praise the Lord of glory, for this so wonderful a mercy; I pray, have you not cause? had your Savior only sent his creatures to serve you, or some Prophets to advise you in the way of salvation, had he only sent his Angels to attend you, and to minister unto you; or had he come down in his glory, like a King that would not only send to the prison, but come himself to the dungeon, and ask, saying, Is such a man here? or had he only come and wept over you, saying, Oh that you had never sinned; all these had been great mercies: But that Christ himself should come, and strive with you in mercy and patience, that he should be so fond of a company of Rebels and Hel-hounds, (and yet we are not at the lowest) that he would for us become a man, a mean man, a lamb, a worm, a nothing in esteem. O all ye stubborn hearts, (too much stubborn are we all) if judgment and the hammer cannot break your hearts, yet let this mercy break you, and let everyone say, O Jesus hast thou done all this for me? certainly I will love thee, and praise thee, and serve thee, and obey thee as long as I live. Say so, and the Lord say Amen to the good desires of your hearts. To what this on the more, remember still, it is you that should have suffered, but to prevent this, it is he that was humbled, it is he that was crucified, it is he that was purged: what needs more? I am he, said Christ to the Jews when they apprehended him; He? what he? I know not what: but be he what he will, he it is our Savior, Redeemer, Physician, Patient, Who had by himself purged our sins.

Thus far we have measured his steps downwards, and should we go up again the same stairs, we might bring him as high as we have placed him low: but his ascent belongs rather to the words following my Text; for after he had purged, then he sate down on God's right hand on high. Come we then to the next words, and as you have seen the Person, so let us look for a companion; This may in misery yield some comfort, if but any society bears a share in his misery; But me thinks I hear you say to me, as the Athenians said to Paul, We will hear thee again of this matter another time.

By himself]

The Time and Physician have prepared a Purge; but who is the Patient to receive it? it is man is sick, and it is man must purge, or otherwise he dies without all remedy or recovery: but alas! what Purge (what Purgatory) must that be which can evacuate sin? Should man take all the virtue of herbs and mineralls, and distill them into one sublime and purest quintessence, yet impossible were it to wash away sin: or the least dregs of its corruption: Not Galen nor Hippocrates, nor all the Artists, or Naturalists that ever lived on earth could find out, or invent any remedy for sin; this must be a work of Grace, and not of Nature; yea, and such a grace as neither man nor Angel could afford: Behold then who it is that both administers and takes the receipt prepared; it is man that sinned, and God is become man, that so being both, he might administer it as God, and receive it as man, the same Person, being Physician and Patient, Compounder and Purger.

But, what a wonder is this? Are we a-dying, and must he purge for it? can Physic given to the sound, heal the party that is sick? It was the saying of our Savior, The whole need not the Physician, but they that are sick, and Christ Jesus for his part is whole indeed, No fault in this man, saith Pilate; and he is a just man, said Pilate's wife of him: to what end then should he purge that is whole, and we escape it that are sick? O this is to manifest the dearest love of our Soul-Physician, our endeared Savior; the whole indeed need not the Physician, he needs no physic, no Purge, no Physician at all, but for us he is become a Physician himself, for us he became Physician and Patient: for us he was sick, for us he purged, that we through him might escape that danger of eternal fire.

But how purged he? By himself? Was there none to associate him in this misery? no, he purged by himself] only, and that without a - Partner.

- Comforter.

First, without a partner, there was none that laid a finger in the burden of his Cross to ease him: why, Blessed Savior, thou hast Myriads of Angels waiting on Thee, and can they not a little lighten thy heavy yoke? No, the Angels are blessed, but they are finite and limited, and therefore unable to this expiation of sin.

But what say we of the Saints? if you will believe the Rhemists, they can tell you that the sufferings of Saints (sanctified in Christ's blood) have not only a forcible satisfaction for the Church, and its members; but withal they are the accomplishments of the wants of Christ's passion; an horrible blasphemy: as if Christ's were not sufficient in itself, but his wants must be supplied by the satisfaction of others; my Text tells me, Christ purged by himself,] therefore not by any other, but sufficiently in his own person; and as for that Text they urge against us, Coloss. 1.24. Now rejoice I in my sufferings for you, and fulfill the rest of the afflictions of Christ in my flesh for his bodies sake which is the Church; whence they argue these two points, first the want of Christ's sufferings, and secondly, the abounding of Saints sufferings for the satisfaction of others. To the first we answer, that the afflictions of Christ, which the Apostle saith, I fulfill, are not meant of the afflictions which Christ suffered in his Person, but in his members, thus Augustine; Non dixit pressurarum mearum, sed Christi, quia membrum erat Christi, The Apostle saith not, my afflictions, but Christ's, because he was a member of Christ, who is usually said to suffer both with, and in his members. To the second we answer, that Paul's sufferings, for his body which is the Church, served not for satisfaction, but for confirmation of their faith; thus Ambrose, Christ's passion sufficeth to salvation, Peter and Paul's passion serve only for example; so then if you will have the true sense of the words, they run thus; Now rejoice I in my sufferings for you, whereby I fulfill the measure of those tribulations which remain yet to be endured of Christ in his mystical body, which I do for the bodies sake, not to satisfy for it, but to confirm it, or strengthen it in the Gospel of Christ: and good reason have we to admit of this comment; otherwise how is Christ a perfect Savior, if any act of our redemption be left to the performance of any Saint or Angel? no it is Christ, and only Christ Jesus, and only Jesus, nor is there salvation in any other, for there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we must be saved, Acts 4.12.

[3] But if not Angels, or Saints, what say we of good Works? Cannot they expiate sin? yea, say our adversaries, they are meritorious, and applicatory; and expiatorie, so here is a threefold use of them; what? hath Christ purged by himself? and is there any other means whatsoever to expiate sin? no saith the Apostle, so incompatible are these two, his grace, and our works, that if it be of grace, it is no more of works, or else grace were no more grace; and if it be of works, it is no more grace, or else works were no more works. By grace then ye are saved— not of works, lest any man should boast himself, Ephes. 2.8, 9.

[4] But if no purging by Angels, Saints, nor good works, what say we to purgatory itself? we say it is a fable, or were it an Article of Faith (as the Pontificians affirm) let us have Scripture for it; yea saith Roffensis, We went through fire and water, Psal. 66.12. and Sir Thomas Moor will have more Scripture yet, I have sent forth thy prisoners out of the pit, wherein is no water, Zach. 9.11. here are two places for Purgatory, and one saith, there is water, the other saith, there is no water; but to say truth of both the Catholic faith, resting upon divine authority believes heaven and hell, but third place (saith Augustine,) we know none, neither find we in holy Scripture, that there is any such place: neither speaks he only of places eternal, that are to continue forever, for he purposely disputes against Limbus puerorum: and rejects all places temporary; yea, elsewhere he acknowledgeth, there is no middle place at all, but he must needs be with the Devil, that is not with Christ: away then with those paper walls, and painted fires, a bug (could Harding once say) meet only to fray children; God will have no rivall in sins purge, no Angel in Heaven, no Saints, no works on earth, no purgatory under earth, it is he himself will purge it by himself, my text affirms it, (and who dares gainsay it) that he by himself (by no other) hath purged our sins.

Thus far you have seen Christ purging without a partner, he trod the winepress alone, and there was none to help him; but ô the bitterness of this purge that admits of no help, no ease; as he had no partner to help him, so no Comforter to cheer him in his so lamentable sufferings.

Some ease it is to have one or other touched with the sense of our miseries, and if they cannot help us, yet to do what they can (be it only to condole us) it were a comfortable refreshing; ay, but our Savior finds no refreshing at all, he purged by himself, without a Partner, without a Comforter; not any one on earth or in heaven, that afforded his poor heart any cure or cordial. First, look on earth, for to them doth he address that speech in Lamentations, is it nothing to you all ye that pass by? the most grievous torments find some mitigation in the supply of friends, and what friends hath our Savior to comfort him in his torments?

[1] If you say the Gentiles; I must confess he found faith in some, and a seeming favor from others: the Centurion is witness of the one, of whom our Savior himself confessed, I have not found so great faith no not in Israel, Matth. 8.10. and Pilate gives a token of the other, when he took water, and washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just man, Matth. 27, 24 but alas! did Pilate so favor him as to free him? no, he fears to condemn him being innocent, and yet dares not absolve him, being so envied as he was by the Jews; what then can a little water? what can Iordans floods? what can rivers of wine, and oil do, towards the washing of those hands, that had power to release him and would not? he knew they had delivered him of envy, Matth. 27.18. he confesses, I find no fault in this man, Luk. 23.14. he tells him that he had power to crucify him, and he had power to loose him, John 19.10. and yet fondly would he wash away the guilt of his unjust sentence, with a little water on his hands; no Pilate, that ceremony cannot wash away thy sin, that sin I mean, which thou and the Gentiles in thee committed, in delivering of Jesus to the will of the Jews.

[2] But if delivered to the Jews, sure it is well enough; he is their Country-man, Kinsman, of the stock of Abraham, of the Tribe of Judah, of the Family of Joseph; but this rather aggravates then alliaies his misery, that his own people should degenerate into Traitors: not a Gentile, but a Jew to be his Executioner: what torment had not been a lenitive, and a recreation in comparison of this? Daniel's Den, the three Children's Furnace, Esays wooden Saw, Israel's fiery Serpents, the Spanish Inquisition, the Romish Purgatory, are all as far short in torture, as the last of them in truth, to the malice of a Jew, witness our Savior's death, when they all conspired not only to scourge him, mock him, buffet him, slay him; but to slay him in such a manner, as to hang him on nails, and to make the Cross his Gibbet,

[1] But what? no comforter amongst them all? do the Gentiles condemn him? will the Jews crucify him? and is there none to pity him? Yes, what say we of his Disciples, that heard him, followed him, and were sent of him by two and two into every City and place, whether he himself should come? Would you think that these seventy, (for they were so many in number) which for a time did his Embassy with joy, would now have forsaken him? yes, if you mark it, many of them went back, and would walk no more with him. some stumble at his Doctrine, others at his passion, but all were offended, as it is written, I will smite the Shepherd, and the sheep of the flock shall be scattered, Matth. 26.31.

Yet if the Gentiles reject him, they do but like Gentiles who were ignorant of God; if the Jews hate and malign him, it is but their old wont of killing the Prophets; if the Disciples that are weaker, faint, and waver in faith, it was no more then was said of them: O ye of little faith! but what say we to the twelve Apostles, those Secretaries of his mysteries, stewards of his mercies, almnors of his bounties, will they also go away, and leave him comfortless alone? no, can Peter say, Master, to whom shall we go, thou hast the words of eternal life, John. 6.68. or if he will have deeper protestations; I am ready to go with thee (saith Peter) into prison and to death, Luk. 22.33. to death? yes, though I die with thee, I will not deny thee, and thus said all his Disciples, Matth. 26.35. and yet like Jonah Gourd, when the Sun beats hottest, how soon are they all gone, and vanished away? loe one betrays him, another forswears him, all run from him, and leave him alone in the midst of all his enemies.

[5] And yet if his Apostles leave him, what say we to Mary his mother, and other his friends? these indeed wait on him, seeing, sighing, wailing, weeping, but alas! what do those tears but increase his sorrows? might he not justly say with Paul, What mean ye to weep and to break my heart? Act. 21.13. Pity, and of all other feminine pity, it is the poorest, helpless salve of misery; but howsoever it was to others, this was so far from any salve to him, as 'tis one of his greatest, tenderest sores about him: Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves, and your children. O see the wonder of compassion which he bears to others in his passion; he hath more care of the women that follow him weeping, then on his own mangled self, that reels along fainting and bleeding even unto death, the tears that drop from their eyes is more to him, then all the blood in his veins, and therefore careless (as it were) of his own sacred person, he turns about his blessed bleeding face to the weeping women, affording them looks and words too of compassion, of consolation, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children: But O blessed Savior, didst thou flow unto us in showers of Blood, and may not we drop a tear for all those purple streams of thine? yes Lord, thou dost not here forbid us weeping, only thou turnest the stream of our tears the right way; that is to say, homewards into our own bosoms, pointing us to our sins, the truest cause of thy sufferings.

[6] But as for comfort to our Savior, whence (trow ye) may it come? if we compass the earth, the Gentiles, Jews, his Disciples, Apostles, Mary his own Mother, and all other his friends, they are but as Job's miserable comforters all; but let us go up into heaven, and there (if anywhere) be his comforters indeed: alas! what comforters? If you imagine the Angels, it is true they could attend him in the Desert, and comfort him in the Garden, but when he came to the main act of our Redemption, not an Angel must be seen: how, not seen? no, they must not so much as look through the windows of heaven to give him any ease at all; nor indeed were it to any purpose if they should; for who can lift up, where the Lord will cast down? O ye blessed Angels, how is it that your Hallelujahs cease? that your songs which you warbled at his birth, are finished at his death; that your glorious company, which are the delight of happy souls is denied to him, who is the Lord and Maker both of you and them: why, thus it must be for our sakes: I am full of heaviness (said our Savior in his type) and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none, and for comforters, but I found none, Psal. 69, 20.

[7] And yet if the Angels be no comforters, he hath a Father in heaven that is nearer to him: I and my father are one (saith our Savior) and it is my Father that honoreth me, John. 8.34. it is my Father that loveth me, John. 10.17. it is my Father that dwelleth in me, John. 14.10. and howsoever others forsake me, and leave me alone; (as himself proclaims it) yet I am not alone, because the Father is with me, John. 16.32. Is it so, (sweet Savior) whence then was that sorrowful complaint of thine; My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me? Leo it is that first reconciled it, and all antiquity allow of it: the union was not dissolved, but the beams, the influence was restrained: Affectione justitiae (saith Scotus) he was ever united to his Father, because he ever loved, trusted, and glorified him; but affectione commodi, that delight ever emergent from that divine vision, was for a time suspended, and therefore was it that his body drooped, his soul fainted, he being even as a scorched Heath-ground, without any drop of dew of the divine comfort on it.

[8] Yet be it that his Father now forsakes him, will he forsake himself? O yes! he burns in the fiery furnace of affliction, without all manner of refreshing; and this was it that was figured in the Law, by those two Goats offered for the sins of the people; whereof the one was the Scape-Goat, and the other was the Offering: the scape-goat departed away, and was sent into the wilderness, but her companion was left alone in the torments, and made a Sin-Offering for the people: even so was this Sacrifice of God-man, man-God, blessed forever, the humanity was offered, but the divinity escaped; the humanity suffered for the sins of the world, but the divinity departed away in the midst of sufferings, and left her sister and companion all alone in the torments: thus he purged himself, himself only in his humanity, no other with him, all other left him; the Gentiles, Jews, Disciples, Apostles, Mary his mother, and God his Father, nay he himself is bereaved of himself, the humanity of his divinity, if not in respect of the union, yet as touching the consolation, When he had by himself] (in his human nature, without any comforter) purged our sins.

Thus far you have seen Christ drink the cup of his bitter pains, pure and without mixture of any manner of ease; what now remains, but that we make some use of it?

[Use.] I will take the cup of salvation (saith David) and call upon the Name of the Lord, Psal. 116.13. and what can we less? if our Savior hath begun to us in pains, shall not we afford him our thanks? the Cup of death could not pass from him, and must the Cup of Salvation be removed from us? O praise him, praise him all his Hosts: howsoever he was alone in his sufferings, let us all bear the burdens in a song of thanksgiving, and in this song let us singing weep, and weeping sing; our sins may draw the tears which were the cause of his sufferings, and our salvation may make us sing, which those his sufferings did effect: what needs more? he suffered by himself] the cause our sins, the effect our salvation; let us mourn for the one, and praise him for the other; praise him, and him alone, for he had no partner in his sufferings, nor will he have any in our thanks, he had no comforter in his miseries, nor must any share with him, in the duty we owe him of praising his Name: Alas, have we not reason (think you) to give all the glory unto him? it was he that suffered that which we deserved he purged by himself] when we ourselves lay sick of sin, in peril of death and damnation; thus gracious is he to us, that when there was no other remedy for our recovery, then he by himself in our stead, came, and purged our sins.

Thus far you have seen the Patient, and order now requires that we prepare the Receipt, the Patient was himself] the Receipt is a Purge] but to confect this Purge, we must crave a further time; and in the mean while, and ever remember him in your thoughts, who hath done all this for you, and the Lord make you thankful.

Had purged.]

YOU see who it is that hath freed us from sin, to wit, Christ our Savior without a Compurgator; he purged by himself] but what did he by himself? do we say he purged? what need he to purge, who never committed any sin in thought, word, or deed? it is without doubt he needs not, and yet do it he will, not to clear himself, but us.

But this Purge doth imply a medicine, and so we must apply it, a medicine it was, and many medicines he used for the curing of man's soul; the first by diet, when he fasted forty days and forty nights. Matth. 4.2. the second by Electuary, when he gave his most precious body and blood in his last Supper, Matth. 26.26. The third by sweat, when great drops of blood issued from him falling down to the ground, Luk. 22.44. The fourth by plaster, when he was spit upon by the Jews, Mark 15.19. The fifth by potion, when he tasted vinegar mingled with gall, Matth. 27.34. The sixth by letting of blood, when his hands and feet were pierced, yea, when his heart vein was stricken, and his side goared with a Spear, John. 19.34. the last (which contains all the rest) was by purge, when by all his sufferings (and especially by his blood-shed) he washed us from our sins, Revel. 1.5. Here was the cures of all cures which all the Galenists in the world may admire with reverence, that our Lord and Savior should become our surety, that our soul-Physician should become our Purger: how? not by giving us Physic, but by receiving it for us; we (miserable wretches) lay sick of sin, and he (our Physician) hath by himself purged and delivered us of it.

But that we may the better see how this Purge wrought with him, we must know, that purging in general, is taken for any evacuation whatsoever: and to say truth in a word, the evacuation of Christ's blood was the right purging of our sins. Hence is it, that (as Scriptures affirm) the blood of Christ doth redeem us, cleanse us, wash us, justify us, sanctify us: Ye were redeemed by his blood, 1 Pet. 1.19. and his blood cleanseth us from all sin, 1 Joh. 1.7. and he washed us from our sins in his blood, Revel. 1.5. and being now justified by his blood, Rom. 5.9. and therefore Jesus suffered, that he might sanctify the people with his own blood, Heb. 13.12. This blood was it that was believed by the Patriarchs, witnessed by the Sacrifices, shadowed in the figures of the Law, expected of all the faithful from the beginning of the world; and therefore the Apostle concludeth, almost all things are by the Law purged with blood, and without shedding of blood is no remission, Heb. 9.22. It is true, Christ purged by his death and other his sufferings, and yet are all these contained in the shedding of his blood: this blood is the foundation of true Religion, for other foundation can no man lay. Wherefore neither was the first Testament ordained without blood, Heb. 9.18. Nor is the New Testament otherwise sealed, then with blood, Matth. 26.28. What needs more? If the blood of Bulls and of Goats (in the Old Testament) sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ (in the New Testament) purge your Consciences from dead works, to serve the living God. Heb. 9.13, 14. O sweet blood of our Savior that purgeth our Consciences, evacuates our dead works, restores us to our God, will bring us unto heaven.

But O my Savior, wherefore art thou red in thy apparel, and thy garments like him that treadeth in the wine-fat? is it thy precious blood that hath given this hew? yes, an hew often dipped in the Wine-fat, and that we may the better see the color, let us distinguish the times when his Blood was shed for us.

Six times, saith a Modern: seven times, saith Bernard, did Christ shed his blood for us; and (to reduce them into order) the first was at his Circumcision, when his name Jesus was given him, which was so named of the Angel, before he was conceived in the womb; and was this without Mystery? no (saith Bernard) for by the effusion of his blood he was to be our Jesus, our Savior. Blessed Jesu! how ready art thou for the Sacrifice? What? but eight days old, and then to shed thy blood for the salvation of our souls? Maturum hoc Martyrium, here is a mature Martyrdom indeed. It is a superstition took up with the Egyptians and Arabians, that Circumcision should fright away devils: and the Jews have a conceit not much unlike: for when the child is Circumcised, one stands by which a vessel full of dust into which they cast the Praepuce: the meaning of it is, that whereas it was the curse of the Serpent, Dust shalt thou eat all the days of thy life: they suppose therefore the Praepuce (or fore skin) being cast into the dust, the Devil by that Covenant eats his own meat, and so departs from the child. But howsoever they err, of this we are sure, that Christ delivered his flesh as a bait to Satan, held him fast with the hook of his Divinity through the shedding of his blood; this blood was it first shed at his Circumcision; and we cannot imagine it a little pain, seeing the flesh was cut with a sharp stone which made Zipporah to cry out against Moses, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me: what a love is this, that Christ newly born should so early shed his blood? but all was for our sakes, for the salvation of our souls.

[2] You see one vein opened, but in his second effusion not one, but all the veins in his body fell a bleeding at once, and this was at his passion in the garden, when (as the Evangelist testifies) he fell into an agony, and his sweat was like drops of blood, trickling down to the ground: here is a physic-purgative indeed, when all his body evacuates sweat like drops of blood: but what? be the pleurisie never so great, how strange is the phlebotomy? it seems not to consult where the sign lies, you see all his body falls at once to sweating and bleeding, not is the cure less strange then the physic; for we had surfeited, and it is he that purgeth; we had the fever, and it is he that sweats and bleeds for the recovery of our health; did you ever hear of such a remedy as this? oftentimes a bleeding in the head (say Physicians) is best stop by striking a vein in the foot; but here the malady is in the foot, and the remedy in the head; we (silly wretches) lay sick of sin, and Christ our Savior purgeth it out by a sweat like drops of blood trickling down to the ground: here is a wonder, no violence is offered, no labor is sustained, he is abroad too in the raw air, and laid down groveling on the cooler earth, or if all this be not enough to keep him from sweating, the night is cold (so cold that hardier soldiers were fain to have a fire within doors) and yet notwithstanding all this, he sweats saith the Text: how sweats? it is not sudor diaphoreticus, a thin faint sweat, but grumosus, of great drops, and those so many, so violent, as they pierce not only his skin, but clothes too, trickling down to the ground in great abundance; and yet may all this fall within the compass of a natural possibility. But a sweat of blood puts all reason to silence, yea, saith Hilary, it is again nature to sweat blood, and yet (howsoever nature stands agast) the God of nature goes thus far, that in a cold night (which naturally draws blood inwards) he sweats without heat, and bleeds without a wound. See all his body is besprinckled with a Crimson dew, the very veins and pores, not waiting the tormentors fury, pour out a showr of blood upon the sudden; foul sin that could not be cleansed save only by such a bath! what? must our surfeits be thus sweat out by our Savior? Yes (saith Bernard) we sin, and our Savior weeps for it, not only with his eyes, but with all the parts of his body: and why so? but to this end, That the whole body of his Church might be purged with the tears of his whole body. Come then ye sons of Adam, and see your Redeemer in this heavy case! if such as be kind and loving are wont (when they come to visit their friends in death or danger) to observe their countenance, to consider their color, and other accidents of their bodies; tell me, ye that in your Contemplations behold the face of your Savior; What think you when you see in him such wonderful, strange, and deadly signs? our sweat (howsoever caused) is most usual in the face or forehead; but our Savior sweats in all his body, and how then was that face of his disfigured when it stood all on dros, and the drops not of a watrie sweat, but of scarlet blood? O my heart! how canst thou but rend into a thousand pieces? O my beloved! well may our eyes shed tears at this, when his veins thus shed their blood for us.

[3] But here is yet a third effusion of blood, and that (as Bernard tells us) was in vellicatione genarum in the nippings and tearings of his sacred cheeks, to this bears the Prophet witness, beat him above these with many stripes, then thy brother should seem vile unto thee, Deut. 25.2, 3. Thus indeed were the Jews tied, but the G•tiles neither bound by law, nor moved with compassion, <ϕ> exceed this number; I have read that he received no less then 5400 stripes; which if we consider these things, is not altogether improbable. First, the law of beating; that every guilty should be stricken by everyone of the Soldiers, a free-man with staves, and a bond-man with whips. Secondly, the cause of this Law, that the body of him that was to be crucified, should be disfigured, that the nakedness should not move the beholders to any dishonest thoughts, when they should see nothing pleasing or beautiful, but all things torn and full of commiseration. Thirdly, the purpose of Pilate who hoped to spare his life, by this so great cruelty used against him. Fourthly, the great care and haste which the Priests used in carrying of the cross, lest Christ should have died before he was crucified: everyone of these reasons argue an unreasonable whipping, which our poor Savior endured. But (O joy of the Angels, and glory of Saints) who hath thus disfigured thee? who hath thus defiled thee with so many bloody blows? certainly they were not thy sins, but mine, that have thus evil entreated thee: it was love and mercy that compassed thee about, for I should have suffered, but to prevent this, thy mercy moves thee, and so thou takest upon thee all my miseries.

[6] But all this will not satisfy the Jews, Behold the man, said Pilate to them, when he thought to have pacified their wrath by that doleful sight, but this nothing moved them, though (presently after) it moved rocks and stones to shiver in pieces: Behold then a sixth effusion of blood, when his hands and feet were pierced thorough with nails: he bears indeed upon his shoulders an heavy and weighty cross of fifteen foot long, which must needs (say some) cause a great and grievous wound, but (to omit that which is questionable) here be those woeful sufferings; now come the barbarous inhumane hang-men, and begin to lose his hands that were tied to the p•st, to tie them to (a worser pillory) the cross, then strip they off his gore-glued clothes, which did so cleave to his mangled battered back, that they pull off clothes and skin together: nay, yet more (and how <ϕ> , I say it without tears for ••n,) the cross is ready, and nothing wanting but a measure for the holes; down therefore they lay him on it, and though the print of his blood gives them a true length, yet spitefully they take it longer, that so they may stretch and rack him on the cross, till you may tell his bones. And now all fitted, his hands and feet are bored, the greatness of whose wounds David fore-shown by those words, They digged my hands and my feet, Psal. 22.16. And well may we think so, for (as Ecclesiastical History reports) so big were the very nails, that Constantine made of them an helmet, and a bridle. O then what pain is this, when all the weight of his body must hang on four nails, and they •o be driven (not into the least sensible parts, but) thorough his hands and his feet, the most sinew it, and therefore more sensible p•rts of all other whatsoever; yet to hang thus for a time were (it may be) somewhat tolerable, but thus he hangs till he dies, and so the longer he continues, the wider go his wounds, and the fresher is his torture. And now (my brethren) behold and see, if there were ever any sorrow like unto this sorrow: alas! what else appears in him, but bleeding veins, bruised shoulders, scourged sides, furrowed back, harrowed temples, digged hands and feet? digged, I say, not with small pins, but with rough boisterous nails, and how then shot the blood from those hands and feet thus digged, and digged thorough? O, I am the rose of Sharon, it is truly said of Christ, Look on one hand, and on the other, and you may find roses in both; look on one foot, and on the other, and you may find roses in either; In a word, look all over his body, and it is all over rosie, and ruddy in blood.

[7] Can we anymore? yes, after all these showers of blood, here is one more effusion; for after his death, One of the soldiers with a spear pierced his side, and forthwith came there ••t blood and water, John. 19.34. The Soldier that gave this wound (they say) was a blind man, but our Savior's blood springing out on his eyes, restored him to his sight, and so he became a Convert, a Bishop, and a Martyr: a strange cure, where the Physician must bleed, but so full of virtue was this blood, that by it we are all saved. And yet (O Savior) why didst thou flow to us in so many streams of blood? one drop had been enough for the world, but thy love is without measure. Physicians are usually liberal of other men's blood, but sparing of their own; here it is not so: for instead of the Patients arm, it is the Physicians own side that bleeds; instead of a lancet here is a spear, and that in the hand of a blind Chirurgeon: yet as blind as he was, how right doth he hit the very vein of his heart? that heart where never dwelt deceit, see how how it runs blood and water for our sins, here is the fountain of his Sacraments, the beginning of our happiness: O gate of heaven! O window of Paradise! O place of refuge! O tower of strength! O sanctuary of the just! O flourishing bed of the Spouse of Solomon! who is not ravished at the running of this stream? me thinks I still see the blood gushing out of his sides, more freshly and fully then those sweet golden streams which run out of Eden to water the whole world. But is it his hearts blood? what? keeps he nothing whole without him, nor within him? his Apostles are scattered in the garden, his garments at the cross, his blood how many wheres? his skin they have rent with their whips, his ears with their blasphemies, his back with their furrows, his hands and feet with their nails, and will they yet have his heart too cloven with a spear? what a wonderful thing is this, that after all those sufferings he must have one wound more? why (Lord) what means this open cleft and wound within thee? what means this stream and river of thy hearts-blood? O it is I that sinned, and to wash it away, his heart runs blood and water in abundance.

Lo here those seven effusions of our Savior's blood, the first at his circumcision, the second in the garden, the rest when his cheeks were nipped, his head crowned, his back scourged, his hands and feet nailed, his side opened with a spear, whence came out an issue of blood and water.

[Use.] And be our sins thus purged? Lord in what miserable case lay we, that Christ our Savior must endure all this for us! were our sins infinite, for which none could satisfy but our infinite God? were not our iniquities as the sands, for which no less then an Ocean of blood could serve to cover them? sure here is a motive (if nothing else) to draw from us the confession of our manifold sins. Lord, we have sinned, we have sinned grievously, heavily, and with a mighty hand; and what now remains, but that we never cease weeping, crying, praying, beseeching, till we get our pardon sealed in the blood of Christ? O beloved! let me entreat you for Christ's sake, for his bloods sake, for his deaths sake, that you will repent you of your sins which have put him to these torments: and to this end I shall entreat you thus to order your repentance: [1] First (after confession of your manifold sins) look upon him whom you have pierced; and by your meditation supposing him to lie afore you, weep, and weep over him, whom you see, by your sins, thus clothed in his blood. Why thus shall it be with the house of David, Zach. 12.10. I will pour upon the house of David (saith God) and upon the inhabitants of Jerusalem the spirit of grace, and of supplications, and they shall look upon him whom they have pierced, and they shall mourn for him, as one that mourneth for his only son; and be sorry for him, as one that is sorry for his first-born: in that day there shall be a great mourning in Jerusalem, as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon. What is the house of David? and what are the inhabitants of Jerusalem, but the elect people of God? and if you be of that number, then do you look on him whom you have pierced, and mourn for him, or mourn over him, as one that mourneth for his only son, yea, be sorry for him, or be in bitterness for him as one that is in bitterness for his first-born. Is it not time, think you? do you not see how every part of our Savior bleeds afore you, his head bleeds, his face bleeds, his arms bleed, his hands bleed, his heart bleeds, his back bleeds, his belly bleeds, his thighs bleed, his legs bleed, his feet bleed: and what makes all this blood-shed but our sins, our sins? O that this day, for this cause, we would make a great mourning as the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon! O weep, or if you will not weep for him, yet weep for yourselves, and your own sins: alas, have you not cause? your sins were his murderers, and your hands by your sins were imbrued in his blood.

[2] Secondly, stay not here, but when you have mourned and wept over your Savior, then hate those sins that wrought this evil on your Savior. Which that you may do effectually, send your thoughts a far off, and see your Savior in his circumcision, in the garden, and when you have done so, then follow him a little further; behold the tears in his eyes, and the clodded blood that came from him when his cheeks were nipped, his head crowned, his back scourged, his hands and feet nailed, his side opened: and then, O then see if you can love those sins that have done all this villainy! love them, said I: no (if you have any share in Christ) I hope you will rather be revenged on your sins, rather you will everyone say, O my pride, and my stubbornness, and my looseness, and my uncleanness, and my drunkenness, these were the nails, and the whips, and the spear that drew blood from my Savior, therefore let me be forever revenged of this proud, subborn, rebellious heart of mine own; let me forever loath my sin, because it brought all this sorrow on my Savior. Is not this ordinary with men? should any one murder your Father or friend, whom you highly regarded and honored, would you brook his sight, or endure his company? nay, would not your hearts rise against him? would you not prosecute the Law to the uttermost? and if you might be the Executioner, would you not wound him and mangle him, and at every stroke cry out, Thou wast the death of my Father, thou wast the death of my Father: and is the heart of a man thus enraged against him, that hath but murdered his friend or his father? O then how should your hearts be transported with infinite indignation (not against the man but) against sin that hath shed the precious blood of your father, your Master, your God, your King, your Savior? O follow, follow, after these sins with an Hue and Cry, bring them to the Bar, set them be-the Tribunal of that great Judge of heaven, and cry, Justice Lord, justice against these sins of mine; these slew my Savior, Lord slay them; these crucified my Savior, Lord crucify them: Why thus persue and never leave them, until (if it possible may may) you see these sins bleed their last; never think you have done enough, but still give your corruptions one hack more, confess your sins once more and say, Lord, this pride, and this stubbornness, and this looseness of heart, these are they that killed my Savior, and I will be revenged of them.

[3] Thirdly, stay not here neither, but when you have mourned for your sins, and sought revenge on them, then by Faith cast them all on the Lord Jesus Christ; ease your own souls of them, and hurle your care on him that careth for you all. Certainly, there is no way to wash you clean from your sin, but only by Christ's blood, and how must you apply this but by Faith? now then, in the last place have faith, rence your soul (as it were) in the blood of this immaculate Lamb, and though you are polluted and defied, yet (questionless) the blood of Jesus Christ will purge you from all sin: If the blood of Bulls and Goats (saith the Apostle) and the ashes of an Heifer sprinkling the unclean, sanctifieth to the purifying of the flesh, how much more shall the blood of Christ, who through the eternal Spirit offered himself without spot to God, purge your consciences from dead works, to serve the living God: You may talk of a Purgatory, why here is the Purgatory, that true Purgatory, the fountain that is laid open for the house of Judah to wash in; and I pray you mark it, it is not only for justification, but being applied by faith, as effectual for sanctification; not only for the expiation of sin, that it be not laid to your charge, but withal to purge your Consciences from dead works to serve the living God. O then (as you tender your souls) believe, and cast yourselves upon Christ for salvation, and for pardon of sins: Do you not see him bleeding on the Cross? Do you not hear him graciously offering to receive your sin-wearied souls into his bleeding wounds? what should you do then but cast yourselves, with all the spiritual strength that you can (at least with infinite longings, and most hearty desires) into the bosom of your Savior? say with yourselves, the fountain is opened, and here will we bathe forever: Come life or come death, come heaven or come hell, come what come can, here will we stick forever: nay, if you must perish, tell God and man, Angels and devils, they shall pluck you out of the hands, and rent you from between the arms of your blessed bleeding Redeemer, your soul-purging Savior. Thus if you believe, you need not to droop for your sins, but to go on with comfort to everlasting happiness; the blood of Christ (no question) will make way for you into heaven: Yea, (saith the Apostle) by the blood of Jesus we may boldly enter into the holy places, by the new and living way which he hath prepared for us, through the veil which is his flesh. Such is the blessed fruit of this blood, and the Lord make it effectual unto us, to bring us into heaven, even for his sake who by himself thus purged our sins.

You see the Purge given and taken, only a time it must have, and then follows the Evacuation: He purged.] What? the ill humor is Sin,] the extent of it Our] sin: of both these together at our next meeting. Now the Lord so prepare us, that this Purge may work in us the everlasting well-fare, and health of our souls.

Our sins.]

SIn is our sickness, and to cure us of it, the Law yields corrasives, the Gospel lenitives, but especially Christ yields that Physic Purgative, which evacuates sin. To consider Christ as a man of sorrows, and not a Savior of sinners; were but a melancholic contemplation; to behold his wounds, and not so to think on 'em as they were ourselves, adds but more sorrows to our other miseries; but when we call to mind that his blood was our ransom, that his stripes were our cures, then with all our hearts we pray, his blood be upon us and our children. And why not, this blood (saith the Apostle) speaks better things than the blood of Abel. For Ables blood cried revenge, but Christ's blood speaks mercy; and (to our comfort be it spoken) if God heard the servant, he will much rather hear the son: yea, if he heard his servant for spilling, how much more will he hear his Son for saving, and regaining our souls? In the words are two parts,

1. The ill humor evacuated, Sin.]
2. The extent of this sin, it is mine, yours, Ours,] every ones.

What is it but Sin] which our Savior purged? this is that ill humor derived from our Parents, inherent in ourselves, imputed to our Savior, and therefore (saith the Prophet) he bare the sins of many, Isaiah 53.12. to who agrees the Apostle, that he his own self bare our sins in his own body, 1 Pet. 2.24. What a load then lay on his shoulders; when all our sins, the sins of all the world were fastened upon him? one man's sin is enough to sink him into hell; and had not our Savior intervened, everyone of us had known by a woeful experience, how heavy sin would have been upon the soul of each man: but (O happy we!) the snare is broken, and we are delivered. To prevent sins effect, Christ Jesus hath purged and washed it away.

And is this all the matter wherefore our Savior suffered? was sin all the disease of which he labored, when he had by himself purged? yes, it was all, and if we consider it rightly, we may think it enough to cause sufferings in him, when merely for its sake God was so wroth against us. O loathsome sin, more ugly in the sight of God, then is the foulest Creature in the sight of man! he cannot away with it, nor (so righteous are his ways) could he save his own Elect because of it, but by killing his own son: Imagine then what a sickness is sin, when nothing but the blood of the son of God could cure it: imagine what a poison is sin, when nothing but a spiritual Methridate, compounded and confected of the best blood that ever the world had, could heal it: we need not any further to consider its nature, but only to think of it, how hateful it was to God, how hurtful to his Son, how damnable to men.

[Use.] And was it Sin he purged? this may teach us how hateful sin is, that put him thus to his Purge: Every sin is a nail, a thorn, a spear, and every sinner a Jew, a Judas, a Pilate: howsoever then we may seek to shift it on others, yet are we found the principal in this act ourselves; you know it is not the Executioner that properly kills the man, sin only is the murderer, yea, our sins only are the crucifyers of the Lord of glory: yea, (if you will please to hear me) I will yet say more, our sins only did not crucify him, but do crucify him afresh, Heb. 6.6. and herein how far do we exceed the cruelty of the Jews? then his body was passable and mortal, but now it is glorified and immortal; they knew not what they did, for had they known, they would not have crucified the Lord of glory: but we know well enough what we do and say too: they buried Christ in the earth, and the third day he rose again from the dead; but we through sin so bury him in oblivion, that not once in three days, three weeks he ariseth, or shineth in our hearts; O shame of Christians to forget so great a mercy! O sin past shame to crucify afresh the Son of God! Think of it (beloved) sin is the death of Christ, and would you not hate him that kills your brother, your father, your Master, your King, your God? beware then of sin, that does it all at a blow! and if you are tempted to it; suppose with yourselves that you saw Christ Jesus coming towards you, wrapped in linnens, bound with a kercher, and crying after you in this gastly manner: beware, take heed what you do, once have your sins most vilely murdered me, but now seeing my wounds are whole again, do not (I beseech you) rub and revive them with your multiplied sins; pity, pity me your Jesus, save me your Savior, once have I died, and had not that one death been sufficient, I would have died a thousand deaths more to have saved your souls, why then do you sin again to renew my sufferings? O my Savior, who will not leave to sin that but hears thy voice in the gardens? lo the companions hearken unto thy voice, cause me to hear it: it is I that have sinned, and if this be the fruit of it, let me rather be torn of beasts, be devoured of Worms, be violently pulled or hailed with racks, then wittingly, or willfully commit a sin.

Secondly, he purged sin, whose; but our sin: and this tells us of the universality of this gracious benefit, together with its limitation.

First, of the universality: he tasted of death for every man, Heb. 2.9. and he gave himself a ransom for all men, 1 Tim. 2.6. and he purged our sins, saith my Text; what, ours only? no, saith the Apostle, he is the propitiation not for our sins only, but for the sins of the whole world, 1 John 2.2. You will say, all do not actually receive the fruit of his death; you say indeed truly, but I wonder through whose default: Our blessed Savior, what is he but like a Royal Prince, who having many of his subjects in captivity of thralldom under a Forrein enemy, pays a full ransom for everyone of them, and then sending forth his Ambassadors, he woes them to return to their home, and to enjoy their liberty; some there are that reject the offer, they will rather serve the enemy then return to the freedom of their Lord; and are these all the thanks they give their Redeemer? O sweet Savior! he made, upon the cross a full, perfect, and sufficient sacrifice, oblation, and satisfaction for the sins of the world, but not all receive the benefit, because many by their own demerit have made themselves unworthy; and yet howsoever some despise liberty, is the arm of the Lord shortened? no see his arms spread on the Cross to embrace all; and here is the universality of this gracious benefit.

[Use.] The use hereof is full of comfort: if any man (any sinner) will now come in with a truly penitent soul, thirsting heartily for Christ Jesus, and resolve unfeignedly to take his yoke upon him, there is no number or notoriousness of sin that can possibly hinder his gracious enterment at God's mercy seat. O then how heinously do they offend, who refuse to take Christ Jesus offered thus universally? if you ask who are they? I answer, they are offenders on both hands: First, those that too much despair, secondly, those that too much presume: to begin with the latter.

[1] Some there are, that howsoever Christ, and heaven, and salvation be offered unto them, yet so close do they stick and adhere to their sins, that they are loath to leave them, and they hope God is so merciful, that they can have Christ and their sins too. Alas deceive not yourselves, though the dearnesse, and sweetness, and freeness, and generality of Christ's offers be a doctrine most true, & we propound it unto you as a motive and encouragement to bring you in; yet not so much as one drop of all that bottomless depth of Christ's mercy and bounty doth as yet belong unto any that lie in the state of unregeneratenesse, or in any kind of hypocrisy whatsoever. Away then with this presumption, & bethink you what a grievous and fearful sin you commit time after time, and day after day in neglecting so great salvation, by choosing (upon a free offer of his soul saving blood) to cleave rather to a lust (O horrible indignity!) then to Christ Jesus blessed forever: what height and perfection of madness is this, that whereas a man, but renouncing his base, rotten, transitory pleasures, might have Christ Jesus, and with him a full and free discharge of hell pains, a sure and known right to heavens joys; yet: should in cold blood most wickedly and willingly, after so many entreaties, invitations, and offers, refuse this mighty change? Heaven and Earth may be astonished, Angels and all creatures may justly be amazed at this prodigious sottishness, and monstrous madness of such miserable men: they are the words of a late Divine, The World (saith he) is wont to call God's people precise fools, because they are willing to sell all they have, for that one Pearl of great price, to part with profits, pleasures, preferments, their right hand, their right eye, everything, anything, rather than to leave Jesus Christ: but who do ⟨1 page duplicate⟩ ⟨1 page duplicate⟩ *you think now are the true and great fools of the world? and who are likeliest one day to groan for anguish of spirit, and say within themselves, This was he whom we had sometimes in derision, and a proverb of reproach; we fools accounted his life madness, and his end to be without honor, now is he numbered amongst the Children of God, and his lot is among the Saints: Nay, if it once come to this, with what infinite horror and restless anguish will this conceit rent a man's heart in pieces, and gnaw upon his conscience, when he considers in hell, that he hath lost heaven for a lust: and whereas he might at every Sermon had even the Son of God his husband for the very taking, and have lived with him forever in unspeakable bliss; yet neglecting so great salvation, must now lie in unquenchable flames, without all ease or end. Sure it is the highest honor that can be imagined, that the Son of God should make suit unto sinful souls to be their husband, and yet so it is; he stands at the door and knocks, if you will give him entrance, he will bring himself and heaven into your hearts: We are Christ's Ambassadors (saith the Apostle) as though God did beseech you by us, we pray you in Christ's stead, to be reconciled to God. We are Christ's spokes-men, that I may so speak, to woo you and win you unto him; now what can you say for yourselves, that you stand out? why come you not in? if the Devil would give you leave to speak out, and in plain terms, one would say, I had rather be damned then leave my drunkenness, another, I love the world better then Jesus Christ; a third, I will not part with my easy and gainful trade of Usury for the treasure hid in the field; and so on; so that upon the matter, you must needs all confess that you hereby judge yourselves unworthy of everlasting life, that you are willful bloody murderers of your own souls: nay, and if you go on without repentance, you may expect that the hellish gnawing of Conscience for this one sin of refusing Christ, may perhaps hold scale with the united horrors of all the rest whatsoever. O then make haste out of sin, and come, come to Christ, so freely offered unto you! Hark how he calls, Come unto me all sinners, see my arms spread, my heart open. O how gladly would I entertain you, if you would come unto me: here is a general invitation indeed, all men, all sinners, of all estates, of all kinds, of all conditions, whosoever you are, he keeps open house for you, Come and welcome.*

[2] Secondly, they offend on the other side, who after invitation come not, through a kind of unmannerly modesty, or a bashful despair; Some there are, that may perhaps go so far as to acknowledge their sins, and to confess, that without Christ they are utterly undone, and everlastingly damned, that may be ravished with the thoughts and apprehensions of this invitation of Christ, and would ever think themselves happy if they had their hungry souls filled with Christ Jesus; but yet so it is, that (considering their manifold grievous sins, sins of a scarlet die, of an horrid strain against knowledge, against conscience, and that which troubles them most, for all these sins their sorrow being so little, and poor, and scant, and in no proportion answerable to them, they cannot, dare not; will not meddle with any mercy, or believe that Christ Jesus in any ways belongs unto them. To these I speak or rather let them hear our Savior himself speak to them: Whosoever will (saith he) let him come, and drink of this water of Life freely: yea, those that think themselves furthest off, he bids them come, Come all that are weary and heavy laden: if they find sin a burden, then Christ invites them, they (whosoever they are) that stand at the staffs end, he desires them to lay aside their weapons and come in; or if they will not do it, he lays his charge on them, for this is his Commandment, that we should believe on the Name of his Son Jesus Christ: nay, he counts it a sin worse then the sin of Sodom, a crying sin, not to come in when the Gospel is proclaimed; and therefore let them never pretend their sins are great and many, but rather (because of his offer, invitation, and command, it being without any restraint of person, or sin, (except that against the holy Ghost) if they will not come in, and cast themselves upon Christ, let them say, it is not the greatness of their sin, but a willingness to be still in their sins, which hinders them; or otherwise let them know, that sins, when men are truly sensible of them, should be the greatest encouragement, (rather then discouragement) to bring them in to our Savior: Those that be whole need not a Physician, but they that are sick: is it not for the honor of a Physician to cure great diseases? a mighty God and Savior loves to do mighty things, therefore in any case let them come in, and the greater sinners they are, no question the greater glory shall Christ have by their coming: And indeed to take away all scruple, it is a Maxim most true, That he which is truly weary of his sins, hath a sound, seasonable, and comfortable calling to lay hold upon Christ. Do they feel the heavy load of their sin? just then is Christ ready to take off the burden: do they thirst after righteousness? just then is the fountain of the water of life set wide open unto them: are they contrite and humble in spirit? just then are they become thrones for the high and lofty one that inhabiteth eternity to dwell in forever. O then come and welcome! Christ excepts none that will not except themselves, He died for all, and he would have all men to be saved.

But yet let us be cautelous: secondly, he purged our sins, and ours] with a limitation; the use of Physic (we say) consists in application; and howsoever our Savior hath purged our sins; yet this purge of his is nothing beneficial to us, unless there be some means to apply it: As then it is in all other Physic, so in this; we must first take it; secondly, keep it.

1. Take it, for as the best plaster if not laid to, can cure no wound; so Christ himself, and all his precious merits are of no virtue to him that will not apply them by faith: when you hear the Gospel preached, believe it on your parts, believe Christ is yours, believe that he lived, and died, and sorrowed, and suffered, and all this for you, to purge your souls of your sins.
2. But having taken it; you must secondly keep it; as men take Physic, not only in belief that it will do them good, but in hope to keep it by the virtue and strength of the retentive parts; so we take Christ by faith, but we retain him by holiness: these two, faith and holiness, are those two bonds wherewith Christ is united unto us, and we unto Christ: so that if we be of this number, then truly may we say that he purged our sins: for the both died for us, and by virtue of our faith and holiness through him, his death is applied to us; to us I say, not in any general acception, but as we are of the number of his Saints, for we had sinned, and they were our sins] only that he effectually purged, and washed away.

[Use.] And this lesson may afford us this use, that howsoever the free grace, and mercy, and goodness of Christ Jesus is revealed and offered to all men universally; yet our Savior takes none but such as are willing to take upon them his yoke; he gives himself to none but such as are ready to sell all and follow him: he saves none, but such as deny ungodliness and worldly lusts, and live soberly, righteously, and godlily in this present world: in a word, he purgeth none, or cleanseth none by his blood from all sin, but such as walk in the light as God is in the light, who make conscience of detesting and declining all sins, and sincerely set their hearts and hands with love and careful endeavor to every duty enjoined them; why these are the men only to whom his death is effectual; and therefore, as we mean to partake of his merits, or to have good by his death, let us become new creatures. It is true indeed, and we cannot but maintain it, that to justification nothing but faith is required, but this caution must be added, it must be a faith that purifies the heart, that works an universal change, that shows itself in the fruits: if therefore any of us would come in, let us have ready our answer, as a late Divine speaks the dialogue betwixt Christ and a true Christian on this manner: First, (saith he) when God hath enlightened the eyes of a man, that he can see where this treasure is, what then? Why (saith the Christian) I am so enflamed with the love of it, that I will have it whatsoever it cost me: yea (saith Christ) but there is a price upon it, it must cost thee dear, a great deal of sorrow, and trouble, and crosses, and afflictions: Tush, tell me not of price (saith the Christian) whatsoever I have shall go for it, I will do anything for it that God will enable me: Why (saith Christ) wilt thou curb thine affections? wilt thou give up thy life? wilt thou be content to sell all thou hast? I will do it (saith the Christian) with all my heart, I am content to sell all that I have, nothing is so dear unto me but I will part with it, my right hand, my right eye: nay, if hell it self should stand between me and Christ, yet would I pass through it unto him. This (beloved) this is that violent affection which God puts into the hearts of his children, that they will have Christ whatsoever it cost them: yet understand me, I pray you: It is not to sell our houses, or lands, or children, but our sins that I mean: the Lord Jesus and one lust cannot lodge together in one soul: no, if we are but once truly incorporated into Christ, we must take him as our Husband and Lord; we must love, honor, and serve him; we must endeavor after sanctification, purity, new obedience, ability to do, or suffer anything for Christ; we must consecrate all the powers and possibilities of our bodies and souls to do him the best service we can; we must grieve and walk more humbly, because we can do no better: and thus if we do, though I cannot say but still we shall sin so long as we live on this earth, yet here is our comfort, We have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, and he is the propitiation for our sins. I say for our sins] effectually, if we believe in his Name, for it was for us he died, and they were our sins he purged, and this is that great benefit we receive from our Savior, in that he by himself hath purged our sins.]

And now our sins being purged our souls recovered, I may well end this Text; only I shall give it one visit more, and so Farwell.

You see the malady, Sin,] the remedy, a purge,] the Physician, he,] the patient, himself,] ourselves;] for our infirmities were laid on him, and his sores became our salves, by whose virtue we are healed. Bless we then God for the recovery of our souls; and be we careful for the future of any relapse whatsoever: these relapses are they we had need to fear indeed, for in them the diseases are more dangerous, sins are more pernicious, and men become seven times more the children of Satan than ever they were before. Now then we are healed, be we studious to preserve it all the days of our life, and we shall find at our death, that he that purged our sins will save our souls; we need not any other Purgatory after death; no, when our souls shall take their flights from our bodies, then are the Angels ready to conduct them to his Kingdom: and thither may we come for his sake, and his only, who by himself (in his own person) hath purged our sins. AMEN.

FINIS.

Heavens happiness.

LUKE 23.43.

To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.

HE that purged our sins is here disposing of Paradise, at the same time when he hung on the Cross, even giving up the ghost, he is dealing Crowns and Kingdoms to a poor penitent soul: thus like a glorious Sun that breaks through the watrie clouds ere it appear unto us, our Savior (the Sun of Righteousness) shoots forth his rays of Majesty through all his sufferings on a dejected sinner. Two malefactors suffer with him, the one rails on him, saying, If thou be Christ, save thyself and us: but the other prays to him, Lord, remember me when thou comest to thy Kingdom: in the midst of his thralldom he proclaims his Kingdom, and whom he sees a Captive, he believes a Lord: Lord remember me; is it not strange, that through so many, such thick clouds of misery, this dying thief should behold his glory? but where grace aboundeth, what marvel is it? The Natural man knoweth not the things of God, but he that is spiritual discerneth all things. No sooner was this penitent thief converted a Christian, but on a sudden, even on the very rack of torture he confesseth himself a sinner, and Christ his Savior; and therefore desires to be remembered of him when he comes to heaven: Thus pouring out his soul in prayer, the Bridegroom that became an Harp, saith Bernard, (his Cross being the wood, himself stretched on it the strings, and his words the sound) hark how he warbles the most heavenly music that was ever chanted to a departing soul, To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.

The words are a Gospel, such as the Angels brought to the Shepherds, Luke 2.10. Behold, I bring you good tidings of great joy; here is tidings, good tidings; joy, and great joy, the greatest happiness that could ever befall a mortal, now waits on a malefactor, at that time when the execution was a doing, death approaching, and the horrors of hell laying hold upon him; when a word of comfort would have been most seasonable, like apples of gold in pictures of silver; then comes our Savior (as a messenger with a pardon) and he bids him be of good cheer, there was happiness towards him: when? today] what? thou shalt be with me] where? in Paradise.] Not a word but speaks comfort to the afflicted soul, be he howsoever afflicted for the present, yet there shall be a change, and the more to sweeten it,

Here is the

- Celerity, today]
- Certainty, thou shalt be]
- Society, with me]
- Ubi, or place where all joy is enjoyed, in Paradise.]

These are those four heads that issue out of Eden, may God give a blessing to the watering, that you may bear good fruit till you are planted in that garden, whereof it is spoken, To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.] We begin with the certainty of this promise, Thou shalt be.] &c.

Thou shalt be]

TO this purpose was that asseveration, Verily, verily, I say unto thee.] Nor is it enough that he affirms it, but he assures it, 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , thou shalt be.] Will and shall is for the King, and what is he less that bestows Kingdoms on his servants? here was a poor man desires only to be remembered of him, and instead of remembering him, he tells him he shall be with him:how? but as a coheir of his Kingdom. Blessed thief, that had such a gift, and that made unto him with such assurance as this was! It is the promise of our Savior, who to put him out of all doubt, he tells him it shall be so, Thou shalt be] with me in Paradise. Whence observe,

That Salvation may be made sure to a man. If you would needs know the means (howsoever it was true in this thief) it is not by any immediate suggestion, or revelation; Christ is now in heaven, and the holy Ghost works not by enthusiasms or dreams;The assurance of our salvation depends not upon revelation, but on the promises of the Gospel: there then must we search and see, and if our hearts be rightly qualified, thence may we draw that fullness of persuasion with Abraham who staggered not at God's promises, being fully persuaded, that what he had promised he was able to perform, Rom. 4.21. This doctrine we have confirmed by David, Psal, 35.3.Say unto my soul, I am thy salvation. By Peter, in the 2. Pet. 1.10.Make your election sure. By Paul, in the 1. Cor. 9.26.I therefore so run, not as uncertainly. From all which we may argue, David would never pray for that which could not be; nor would Peter charge us with a duty which stood not in possibility to be performed; nor would Paul serve God at random, uncertain whether he should obtain any good, or prevent any mischief; no, but as one that was sure, that by so doing he should attain everlasting life, and without so doing he could not avoid eternal death. We may then be sure, if conditions rightly concur; and seeing this is a point we would be all glad to know, that we are sure to be saved, I shall beg others help, God's assistance, and your patience, till we have opened the windows, and given you a light of the lodging, where securely our souls may rest at noon day.

Some lay the order thus, that to assure us of heaven, we must be assured of Christ; and to assure us of Christ we must be assured of faith; and to assure us of faith, we must be assured of repentance; and to assure us of repentance, we must be assured of amendment of life.

Others tell us of more evidences, and we shall reduce them to these heads; The testimony of our spirits, and the testimony of God's Spirit: It is not our spirit alone, nor God's Spirit alone makes this Certificate, but both concurring, and thus Paul tells us, Rom. 8.16. The Spirit itself beareth witness with our spirit, that we are the children of God.

1. Our first assurance then is the testimony of our spirit, and this witnesseth with God's spirit two ways,

By

- Inward tokens,
- Outward fruits.

Inward tokens are certain special graces of God imprinted in the spirit of a man, as godly sorrow desire of pardon, love of righteousness, faith in Christ, for he that believeth on the Son of God, hath the witness in himself, saith the Apostle.

Outward fruits are all good deeds, holy duties, new obedience, and hereby we are sure that we know him, if we keep his Commandments, 1. Joh, 2.3. To say then we are sure of heaven, and to live a life fitter for devils, what a fond saying is this? no, if we have a true testimony we must be of good lives; it is our holiness, and justice, and mercy, and truth, that will be our best assurance, and so the Apostle assures us; If ye do these things ye shall never fall.

2. Our second and best assurance is the testimony of God's Spirit, which sometimes may suggest and testify to the sanctified conscience thus, or in the like manner, Thou shalt be saved, thou shalt be] with me in Paradise.

But here I must satisfy two doubts: first, by what means the Spirit of God gives this particular assurance? secondly, how a man may discern betwixt the assurance of this Spirit, and the illusion of Satan, who is the spirit of lies?

To the first we say, the means is either by an immediate revelation, or by a particular application of the promises in the Gospel, in form of an experimental syllogism, as, Whosoever believes on the Son shall be saved; but I believe on the Son, therefore I shall be saved. The major is Scripture, the minor is confirmed by our faith, which if I have, I may say I believe: True, flesh and blood cannot say this, it is the operation of the holy Ghost; but if the work be wrought, and I feel this faith within my soul, what need I doubt but this assumption is true, I believe on the Son? Yet I hear some complain, they have neither sight nor sense of faith: and thus it is often with God's dearest children: the Sun that in a clear sky discovers and manifests itself, may sometimes with clouds be overcast and darkened; and faith, that in the calmness of a Christian course shines, & shows itself clearly to the sanctified heart, may sometimes in the damp of spiritual desertion, or darkness of temptation, lie hid and obscured: there is therefore in the Saints, the assurance of evidence, and the assurance of adherence: The assurance of evidence, is that which is without scruple, and brings an admirable joy with it, and this more especially appears either in our more fervent prayers, or in our heavenly meditations, or in time of martyrdom, or in some quickening exercises of extraordinary humiliation, or in beginning of our spiritual, or end of our natural life, as most needful times, then doth God's spirit speak comfortably to us, whispering to our souls the assurance of our happiness, that we shall be inheritours of his Kingdom. The assurance of adherence is that, which I doubt not the Saints have in their greatest extremity: for instance, many a faithful soul, that makes conscience of sin, lies and languishes upon the rack of fears and terrors, he shells nothing but a dead heart, and a spiritual desertion, yet in the mean time his soul cleaves unto Christ, as to the surest rock, he cries and longs after him, and for all his fears and sorrows he will still rest upon him, Job-like, though he slay me, yet will I trust in him, Job 13.15. Now this adherence unto Christ may assure him of salvation, for (if we speak punctually and properly) faith justifying is not to be assured of pardon, but to trust wholly upon Christ for pardon; and thus if he do, then may he with freedom of spirit say, I believe on the Son, whence ariseth this conclusion, which is the testimony of God's Spirit, therefore I shall be saved.

To our second doubt, how we may discern betwixt the testimony of God's Spirit, and the illusion of Satan? I answer.

First, the testimony of God's Spirit is ever agreeable to the Word, and thus to try us, the Scripture tells us, that Whosoever is born of God, doth not commit sin, 1 John 3.9. which is not to be understood simply of the act of sinning, for who can say, my heart is clean? but in this sense, he doth not commit sin, that is, he makes not a trade of sin, it doth not reign in him; if then thou allowest any lust in thine heart, or goest on in the willing practice of any one known sin & yet hast a conceit that thou art sure of salvation, alas, thou art deceived, thou hast made a lie thy refuge, and hid thyself under falsehood.

Secondly God's Spirit breeds in the soul a Reverend love, and insatiable longing after all good means appointed and sanctified for our spiritual good: and therefore that heart which sweetly is affected and inflamed with the word and prayer, and meditation and conference, and vows, and singing of Psalms, and use of good books, we doubt not but it is breathed on by the Spirit of God; whilst others that use all these Ordinances out of custom or formality, or some other sinister end, alas, their conceit of being right, is built on the sands, and therefore down it falls at death's flood, and is overwhelmed in destruction.

Thirdly, God's Spirit is ever attended with the spirit of Prayer, and therefore saith the Apostle, We know not how to pray, but the spirit itself, maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered, Rom. 8.26. O the blessed operation of this Spirit! it even warms the spirit of a man with quickening life, to pour out itself in the presence of the Lord his God, sometimes in more hearty prayers, and sometimes in more faint and cold, yet always edged with infinite desires that they were far more fervent then they are: But on the other side, every deluded Pharisee is a mere stranger to the power of Prayer, if he prays often (as I make it a question) yet never prays he from a broken heart, and this argues that all his confidence is no better than a weed which grows of its own accord, & therefore like Jonahs gourd, when affliction comes, it withers on a sudden.

Fourthly, the testimony of God's Spirit is often exercised and accompanied with fears, and jealousies, and doubts, and distrusts; and varieties of temptations, which many times will drive the soul thus distressed to cry mightily to God, to re-examine her grounds, to confirm her watch, to resort for counsel where it may be had; whilst on the contrary the Pharisees groundless conceit lies in his bosom without fears, or jealousies, or doubts, or distrusts, or any such ado, why so? alas, Satan is too subtle to trouble him in that case; he knows his foundation is falsehood, his hope of Heaven no better than a golden dream, and therefore in policy he holds his peace, that he may hold him the faster.

Fifthly, the testimony of God's Spirit is ever most refreshing at those times, when we retire ourselves to converse with God in a more solemn manner; when we feel that we have conquered, or well curbed some corruption of nature; when we are well exercised in the Ordinances of God, or in our sufferings by man for a good cause, and conscience sake; then (or at such times) shall we feel that sweetness of the spirit cherishing our hearts with a lightsome comfort that cannot be uttered; whilst on the contrary the deluded man is always alike peremptory in his confidence, you shall not take him at any time without a bold persuasion, that he hopes to be saved as well as the best, thus like a man who lying fast asleep on the edge of a Rock, he dreams merrily of Crowns and Kingdoms, and will not off it, but on a sudden starting for joy, he tumbles into the bottom of the Sea, and there lies drowned in the deep; that assurance which is ever secure is but a dream whereas the testimony of God's Spirit is sometimes mixed with doubts, and sometimes (to our unspeakable comfort) with a secret, still, heart-ravishing voice thus speaks to our consciences, thou shalt be] thou shalt be] with me in paradise.

You see the testimony of God's Spirit, how it works in us, and how it is discerned by us; it works in us by a particular application of the promises in the Gospel, and is discerned by us by the word, by our love, our prayers, our fears, our joys at sometimes while we are a doing our duties.

[Use.] O blessed man that feels in his soul this blessed testimony! what is here comparable to it? riches are deceitful, pleasure is a toy, the world is but a bubble, only our assurance of Heaven is the only real comfort that we have on earth; who then would not study to make this certain? if we purchase an inheritance on earth we make it as sure, and our tenure as strong, as the brawn of the Law, or the brain of Lawyers can devise, we have conveyance, and bonds, and fines, no strength too much; and shall we not be more curious in the settling our eternal inheritance in Paradise? a man can never be too sure of going to Heaven; and therefore in God's fear let us examine the testimony of our spirits by the inward tokens, and by the outward fruits: let us examine the testimony of God's Spirit by the means and the difference; and if we find both these testimonies to accord within us, how blessed are we in this vale of tears! it is an heaven upon earth, a Paradise in a wilderness, in a word, a comfort in all miseries, be they never so embittered. See a Thief hanging on the Cross, an Engine of most grievous torture; but who can tell the joy that entered into him before he entered into Heaven? you may guess it by his desire to be remembered of Christ when he came into his Kingdom; he begs not for life, nor pleasure, nor riches, nor honor, no, there is one thing necessary; give him Heaven and he cares for nothing; to this purpose doth he address himself to our blessed Savior, and he asks— what? if thou be Christ, save thyself, said the Jews in derision, and if thou be Christ, save thyself and us, said the other Thief to him; but this was only for the bodies safety: and here is a man quite of another mind, let the Jews rack him tear him, break all his bones, and pull him into atoms, if our Savior will but do so much as remember him in his kingdom, he desires nothing more: O blessed Christ speak comfortably to his soul that begs it thus vehemently at thy hands! but why do I prevent? the bowels of our Savior yearn to hear him; remember him? yes, he will remember him, and he shall be with him; comfortable news! how leaps his heart at these so blessed words? his desire is granted, and Heaven is assured, and the Spirit of God, yea, the God of Spirits thus testifies it to him, today [shalt thou be] with me in Paradise.]

Thus far of the certainty of his salvation, thou shalt be:] but as the grant is sweet that is certain, so is it yet more acceptable if done with expedition: and here is both the certainty, and expedition, thou shalt be, when? today] with me in paradise.

To day.]

OUR Savior defers not that he promises but as he quickly hears, and quickly grants, so he quickly gives him Paradise, and a kingdom. This sudden unexpected joy makes all more grateful; to tell us of Crowns and Kingdoms that we must inherit, and then to put us off with delays, abates the sweetness of the promise: men that go to suits for lands and livings, though Lawyers feed them with hopes, yet one order after another, spinning out time to a multitude of Terms, makes them weary of the business: it is the happiness of this suitour that he comes to an hearing but the highest degree of his happiness was the expedition of his suit: no sooner he motions, Lord, remember me when thou comest into thy Kingdom; but the Lord gives him that he asks upon his first motion, today, ere the Sun be down, the Kingdom shall be thine, thou shalt be with me in Paradise.

But you may object, Was there no Limbus Patrum, no Purgatory to run through? but the very same day he died, he must then go to Paradise? no, unless Limbus or Purgatory be Paradise itself, there is no such thing at all. Some there are, that rather than say nothing, speak thus; Christ giving up the ghost, his soul descended into hell, and the very same day was this Malefactor partaker of Christ's beatifical vision, with the other Patriarchs in Limbus. But of how great difference is Paradise and Limbus, we shall hear another time: sure it is, Christ promised not a Dungeon instead of a Kingdom, nor is Paradise a place of pleasure, of any such imaginary melancholy nature: we conclude then, To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise,] it is all one, as to say, To day, (thy day of death) thou shalt be with me in Heaven, and there enjoy me in my Kingdom.

But again you may object, That Christ rather that day, descended into hell, then ascended into heaven: The Creed teacheth, that after he was crucified, dead, and buried, he descended into hell.

To answer the objection; some go about thus; by hell (say they) is meant Paradise, where the soul of Christ was all the time that his body lay in the grave: If this be not a misconstruction, I am sure it is no literal Exposition, and me thinks a very strange kind of figure it is, to express Christ's ascent into Paradise by his descent into hell. Others more probably understand Christ's abode in the grave for the space of three days. Austin after some turns and wrenches concludeth thus: Est autem sensus multo expeditior, &c. It is a far easier sense and freer from all ambiguity, if we take Christ to speak these words, This day shalt thou be with me in Paradise] not of his Manhood, but of his Godhead; for the man Christ was that day in the grave according to the flesh, and in hell as touching his soul, but the same Christ as God is always everywhere. Thus he: But this will not satisfy all, and therefore they argue thus against it; These words (say they) must be understood of his Manhood, not his God-head: and why so? For they are an answer unto a demand, and unto it they must be suitable: Now the Thief (seeing that Christ was first of all crucified, and therefore in all likelihood should first of all die) makes his request to this effect; Lord, thou shalt shortly enter into thy Kingdom, remember me then: to which, Christ's answer (as the very words import) is thus much; I shall enter into Paradise this day, and there shalt thou be with me: but the God-head, which is at all times in all places, cannot be said properly to enter into a place, and therefore not into Paradise. Again, When Christ saith, Thou shalt be with me in Paradise] he doth intimate a resemblance between the first and second Adam: the first Adam sinned against God, and was presently cast out of Paradise: the second having made a satisfaction for sin, must presently enter into Paradise. Now there is no entrance but in regard of the soul, or man-hood, and therefore to apply it to the God-head, were to abolish this analogy betwixt the first and second Adam.

These reasons are weighty, but should we say with Austin, That Christ in his soul went down into hell, one of our Worthies can tell us, that Christ's soul, united to his God-head, might do all that, and yet be that day in Paradise: God works not lazily like man: Satan could show Christ all the Kingdoms of the world in the twinkling of an eye, and God's expedition exceeds his. To this agrees another, that we have no warrant in God's Word, so to fasten Christ's soul unto hell for all the time of his death, but that it might be in Paradise before it descended into hell. That he was in Paradise must be received, because himself doth affirm it, and that he descended into the deep must be received also, for the Apostle doth avouch it; but how he descended, or what time he descended, as also what manner of triumph he brought thence, cannot be limited by any mortal man. To conclude, I will not deny, but that according to the Creed, he descended into Hell, yet howsoever we expound it, Metaphorically or literally, it hinders not this truth, but that immediately after death his soul went into Paradise.

The objections thus solved, now come we to the Thief thus comforted by Christ, today] shalt thou be with me in Paradise.

What? today? without all doubts or delays? here's a blessed dispatch, if we either consider the misery endured, or the joy to be received.

First, in regard of his miseries, he was a Thief condemned and crucified: we read of four kinds of deaths in use amongst the Jews, strangling, stoning, fire and the sword: the Cross was a death whether for the pain, the shame, the curse, far above all other: we may see it in that gradation of the Apostle, He became obedient to death, even to the death of the Cross, Phil. 2.8.

What engine of torture was that? it spins out pain, it slows his death, yet a little and a little till it be more then any man can think: see his hands bored, his feet nailed, his legs broken, every part full of pain from top to toe, and thus hangs this Thief, the poyz of his body every moment increasing his pain, and his own weight becoming his own affliction; in this case were not a quick riddance his best remedy? were not the news of death better then a lingering life? Lo then to his eternal comfort, Christ our Savior (in the same condemnation) grants him his desire: What would he have? a dispatch of pain? he shall have it this day] as Samuel's appearance said to Saul, To morrow (yea, today) thou shalt be with me.

But secondly, here's a greater comfort, his miseries have an end, and his joys are at hand; while he is even gasping in deaths pangs, he is carried on a sudden from earth to heaven, from his Cross to Paradise, from a world of woe to a kingdom of happiness and eternal bliss. O how blessed is the change, when in the very moment of misery joy enters! Suppose you a poor man in the night time out of his way, wandering alone upon the mountains, far from company, destitute of money, beaten with rain, terrified with thunder, stiff with cold, wearied with labor, famished with hunger, and near brought to despair with the multitude of miseries; if this man upon a sudden, in the twinkling of an eye, should be placed in a goodly, large, and rich palace furnished with all kind of clear lights, warm fire, sweet smells, dainty meats, soft beds, pleasant music, fine apparel, honorable company, and all these prepared for him, to serve him, honor him, and to anoint and crown him a King forever; what would this poor man do? what could he say? surely nothing, but rather in silence weep for joy: Such, nay, far happier was the case of this poor malefactor: he was like the man wandering on the mountains, full of as much pain as the cross could make him; but on a sudden he and our Savior crucified with him, both meet in his Kingdom: and now, Lord, what a joy enters into him, when he entered into heaven! on Calvary he had nothing about him, but the Jews at his feet, and the nails in his hands, and the Cross at his back; instead whereof, no sooner comes he to Paradise, but the Angels, Archangels, Cherubims, Seraphims, all hug him, and embrace him; imagine with yourselves, how was he astonished, and as it were besides himself at this sudden mutation, and excessive honor done unto him! Imagine with yourselves what joy was that, when he met our Savior in his glory, whom that very day, he had seen buffeted, scourged, crowned, crucified; blessed day that could ever bring forth such a change! Beloved, I know not how to express it, but let your souls in some meditation fly up from Calvarie to Heaven; in the morning you might have seen Christ and this Thief hanging on two Crosses, their bodies stretched, their veins opened, their hands and feet bleeding in abundance, the one desiring to be remembered of the other, and the other complaining that he was forgotten of his Father: in this doleful case both leaving the world, ere night they meet again, and now what hugs, what kisses are betwixt them? When Joseph met with Jacob, he fell on his neck (saith Moses) and wept on his neck a good while; but never was any meeting on earth like this in Heaven: here we have a Joseph lift out of the dungeon to the Throne, where no sooner set, but our Savior performs his promise of meeting him in Paradise, at which meeting the Angels sing, the Saints rejoice, all Harps warble, all Hands clap for joy, and the poor soul of this penitent Thief, ravished with delight, what does it, or what can it do, but even weep for joy (if any weeping were in heaven) to see on a sudden so great a change as this?

[Use.] And if this be his case, who will not say with Balaam, Let me die the death of the righteous and let my last end be like his? O let us (I beseech you) present unto our souls the blessed condition to come, and this will be effectual to stir us up to every good duty, and to comfort us in all conditions whatsoever: what will a man care for crosses, and losses, and disgraces in the world, that thinks of an heavenly Kingdom? What will a man care for ill usage in his Pilgrim•ge, when he knows he is a King at home? we are all (in this time of our ab•ence from God) but even strangers upon •rth; here then must we suffer in dignities, yet here is the comfort, we have a better estate to come, and all this in the mean time is nothing but a fitting of us to that heavenly Kingdom. •s David's time between his anointing and investing was a very preparing of him that he might know himself, and that he might learn fitness for to govern aright, so we are anointed Kings, as soon as we believe, we have the same blessed anointing that is poured on our head, and runs down about us, but we must be humbled and fitted, before we are invested: 〈◇〉 time (and but a 〈◇〉) we have yet here to spend; and let this be our comfort (howsoever we 〈◇〉 here) it is not long ere we inherit. Alas, the 〈◇〉 of this life are not worthy of the glory that shall be shown us Rom. 8.18. and therefore Ig•••• i• a burn••g 〈...〉 say 〈...〉 gallows, beasts, breaking of my bones, quartering of •y 〈...〉 •••s••ng of my body all the torments of devils, let them come upon me, so I may enjoy the treasure of Heaven; and well ••g•• he say it, that knew what a ch•nge would be one day 〈◇〉 never was cold shadow so pleasant 〈◇〉 hot Summer, never was 〈◇〉 so delightful after ••our, as shall be this •e•t of heaven to an afflicted •our coming thither out of this valley of tears, O then what service should we do? what pain should we suffer to attain this •est? were it to run through fire and water, were it (as Augustine said) to suffer every day torments you, the very torments of Hell yet should we be con•en• to a•••e it; and how much more when we may buy it without money, or money-worth; we need not to part with anything for it but sin: This Thief (now a blessed Saint in glory) for a days suffering, an half days repenting, was thus welcomed to Heaven; imitate we him in his repentance, not in his delay, he indeed had mercy at the last cast, but this privilege of one infers not a common law for all: one find mercy at the last, that none should despair, and but one that none should presume. Be then your sins as red as Scarlet, you need not despair if you will but repent; and lest your repentance be too late, let this be the day of your conversion, now abhor sins past, sue out a pardon, call upon Christ with this Thief on the Cross, Lord, remember me, remember me now thou art in thy Kingdom; thus would we do, how blessedly should we die, our consciences comforting us in deaths pangs, and Christ Jesus saying to us at our last day here, our day of death, our day of dissolution, To day shalt thou be with me in paradise.

We have dispatched with expedition this dispatch, this expedition, today] the next day you shall hear the happiness of this grant, which is the society of our Savior, thou shalt be: with whom? with me] in paradise.

With me]

AND is he of the Society of Jesus? yes, though no Jesuit neither, for they were not then hatched) but what noble order is this, where the Saints sing, Angels minister, Archangels rule, Principalities triumph, Powers rejoice, Dominations govern, Virtues shine, Thrones glitter, Cherubims give light, Seraphim burn in love, and all that heavenly company ascribe and ever give all laud and praises unto God their Maker? here is a Society indeed, (I mean not of Babylon, but Jerusalem) whither Jesus our Savior admits all his servants, and whereto this Thief on the Cross was invited, and welcomed, thou shalt be with me] in paradise.

For if with me] then with all that is with me, and thus comes in that blessed company of Heaven; we will only take a view of them, and in some scantling or other you may guess at Heavens happiness.

With me] and therefore with my Saints; blessed man that from a crew of thieves (by one hours repentance) became a companion of Saints: and now he is a Saint amongst them, what joy is that he enjoys with them? O my soul, couldst thou so steal Heaven by remorse for sin, then mightest thou see— what? all those millions of Saints that ever lived on earth, and are in Heaven; there are those holy Patriarchs, Adam, Noah, Abraham, and the rest, not now in their pilgrimage tossed to and fro on earth, but abiding forever on Mount Zion, the City of the living God: there are those goodly Prophets, Isaiah, Jeremy, Ezekiel, and the rest, not now subject to the torments of their cruel adversaries, but wearing Palms, and Crowns and all other glorious Ensign• of their victorious triumphs: there live those glorious Apostles, Peter, Andrew, James, John, and the rest, not now in danger of persecution or death, but arrayed in long robes washed and made white in the blood of the Lamb: there live those women-Saints, Mary, Martha, and that Virgin-mother, not now weeping at our Savior's death, but singing unto him those heavenly songs of praise & glory world without end: there are those tender infants (an hundred forty four thousand, Revel. 14.1.) not now under Herod's knife bleeding unto death, but harping on their harps, and following the Lamb whithersoever he goeth: there lives that noble army of Martyrs, (they that were slain upon the earth, Revel. 18.24.) not now under the merciless hands of cruel tyrants, but singing and saying their Hallelujahs, salvation, and glory, and honor, and power be unto the Lord our God: there dwell all the Saints and servants of God (both small and great, Revel. 19.5.) not now sighing in this vale of tears but singing sweet songs that echo through the Heavens, as the voice of many waters, as the voice of mighty thunderings, so is their voice saying, Hellelujah, for the Lord God omnipotent reigneth. And is not here a goodly troop, a sweet company, a blessed society and fellowship of Saints? O my soul; how happy werit thou to be with them! yea, how happy will that day be to thee, when thou shalt meet all the Patriarchs, Prophets, Apostles, Disciples, Innocents, Martyrs, the Saints, and servants of the King of Heaven? why thus happy and blessed, is this penitent Thief: no sooner entered he into the gates of Heaven, but there meets him with music and dancing, all the quire of Heaven, and (Lord) what a joy entered into his soul, when his soul entered into his masters joy? Tell me (could I speak with thee that dwellest in the Heavens) what a day was that, when stepping from the Cross, and conducted to Paradise, thou wast there received with all honorable companies and troops above? there did the Patriarchs meet thee, and the Prophets hug thee, and the Martyrs struck up their Harps to bid thee welcome to the Tabernacle of Heaven. Such honor have all his Saints that attain the fellowship of the Saints in glory.

But more then so, thou shalt be with me] and therefore with my Angels: Lo here a blessed company indeed, these are the heavenly Choristers eternally singing Jehovahs praise: The 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 Seraphims cry aloud, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord of Hosts, an Army answer to the antheime, Glory to God on high. The whole Choir of heaven add the burden, Thou art wortby, O Lord to receive honor, and glory, and power for thou hast created all things, and for thy sake they are and were cre•••d O heavenly harmony consisting of ten thousand times ten thousand various sorts of Music! I heard (saith John the Divine) that 〈◇〉 of many Angels round about the throne, and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, thousand of thousands these are the shining and singing Stars of which God told his servant Job, The morning stars sing together, and the ser•••• of God shout for joy. These are the winged Ch•risters of 〈◇〉, whom John the Divine heard singing their song of Hallelujah and Hosanna, I heard (saith he) the voice of a great multitude, as the voice of many waters the voice of •any Angels, singing, and saying Hallelujah and again Hallelujah these are the nimble Posts of heaven, whom Jacob say• thing 〈◇〉 and down the Ladder: these are the Protectours of the godly whose aid God promised the Israelites; Behold, I send an Angel before thee to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee to the place which I have prepared. These are the Guardians of sucking Infants, of whom our Savior told his Disciples that in, Heaven their Angels always behold the face of his Father; these are the armies of God, who meeting Jacob in his journey, he said this is God's Hosts these are the Spirits and Ministers of God whom David describing by the purity of their substance, and readiness of their obedience, he calls the Angels spirits and his Ministers a flame of fire. They are shining and singing stars winged choristers, nimble Posts of heaven, Protectours of the godly guardians of children, the armies of the Almighty, the Spirits and Ministers of the great Jehovah.

What blessed company is this we shall enjoy in heaven• there is nothing in them but is amiable, nothing in them but is admirable: O that this clay of ours should come to dwell with th•se incorporeal spirits! and yet see here a man a thief 〈◇〉 the 〈◇〉 of men;) by his confession, and contrition, and faith in Christ is now become a companion with Angels.

Nor is that all, thou shalt be with me] not only with my Saints and Angels, but with me] (with my soul) in Paradise. His soul indeed was there, though his body at that time was in the grave; and if the soul be it that makes us men, what a passing great joy is that, when men standing amongst the Angels shall see their Lord, the Lord of heaven, not to be an Angel, but a man? Here is the solace of Saints, when they shall see & say, who is yond that rules on the Throne of heaven? who is yond that sits on the right hand of God the Father? and they shall answer themselves again, it is he that for us became man; for the salvation, it is he that of our souls hath took upon him a body & soul. And think now with thyself whosoever thou art that readst (if thou wilt but spend thy few evil days in his fear, & so die in his favor) what a comfort will it be unto thee to see that Lamb sitting on his seat of state? If the wise men of the East came so far, and so rejoiced to see him in the Manger, what will it be to thee to see him sitting and glittering in his glory? If John the Baptist did leap at his presence in his mothers belly, what shall his presence do in his royal and eternal Kingdom? It passeth all other glories (saith Austin) to be admitted to the inestimable sight of Christ his face, and to receive the beams of glory from the brightness of his Majesty: nay, should we suffer torments every day, or for a time the very pains of hell itself, thereby to gain the sight of Christ, and of his Saints, it were nothing in comparison. No wonder then, if Paul desire to be dissolved and to be with Christ. Alas, who would not be so? O most sweet Savior (saith one devoutly) when shall this joyful day come? when shall I appear before thy face? when shall I be filled with thy excellent beauty? when shall I see that countenance of thine, which the very Angels themselves are so desirous to behold? an happy time sure will it be to each faithful soul: And thus happy was this man, he parted sorrowfully with our Savior on the Cross, but he met him joyfully in his Kingdom: those sweet souls that both left the world at one time, no sooner had heaven gates opened unto them, but with mutual kisses they embraced each other in unspeakable manner.

Nor was this all, thou shalt be with me,] not only with my soul, but with my God-head: this indeed was the height of bliss, the very soul of heavens joy itself; set aside this, and crown a man with the Empire of all the earth, the splendor of heaven, the royal endowments of a glorified soul, the sweetest company of Saints and Angels, yet still would his soul be full of emptiness, and utterly to seek for the surest Sanctuary whereon to rest: only once admit him to the face of God, and then presently, and never before, his infinite desire expires in the bosom of his Maker: I deny not but the other joys in heaven are transcendent and ravishing, but they are all no better then accessories to this principal, drops to this Ocean, glimpses to this Sun. If you ask how can our souls enjoy this God-head? I answer, two ways; first, by the understanding; secondly, by the will. The understanding is filled by a clear glorious sight of God, called Beatifical vision; we shall see him face to face, saith Paul, 1 Cor. 13.12. We shall see him as he is, saith John, 1 John 3.2. For as the Sun by his beams and brightness illightens the eye, and the air, that we may see not only all other things, but also his own glorious face: so God, blessed forever (in whose presence ten thousand of our suns would vanish away as a darksome mote) doth by the light of his Majesty, so irradiate the minds of all the blessed, that they behold in him, not only the beauty of all his Creatures, but of himself; and thus shall we see and know that glorious mystery of the Trinity, the goodness of the Father, the wisdom of the Son, the love and comfortable fellowship of the holy Spirit; nothing that can be known, but in him we shall know it, in most ample manner.

Secondly, the will is forever satisfied with a perfect inward, and eternal communion with God himself; Christ that is God and man, by his Man-hood assumed uniteth us unto God, and by his God-head assuming uniteth God unto us, so that by this secret and sacred communion, we are made partakers (and as it were possessours) of God himself: O bottomless depth, and dearest confluence of joys and pleasures everlasting! here is the perfection of all good things, the Crown of glory, the very life of Life everlasting. And well may it be so, for what can the soul desire, God will not be unto her? It is he that is eminently in himself beauty to our eyes, music to our ears, honey to our mouths, perfume to our nostrils, light to our understanding, delight to our will, continuation of eternity to our memory; in him shall we enjoy all the varieties of times, all the beauty of creatures, all the pleasures of Paradise. Blessed Thief, what a glory was this to be admitted to the society of Christ in his Deity! thou shalt be with me?] how then should he be but happy? Where could he be ill with him? where could he be well without him? In thy presence there is fullness of joy, and at thy right hand there are pleasures evermore; joy, and fullness of joy: pleasures, and everlasting pleasures: Blessed are all they that live in thy house, O Lord, for they shall praise thee eternally world without end, Psal. 84.4.

You see now Heavens society, they are Saints and Angels, and Christ, and God blessed forever and ever.

[Use. 1] Who then would not forsake Father and Mother, the dearest fellowship of this world to be with Christ in his Kingdom? You that love one another in the deepest bonds, who cannot part out of this life but with the survivours grief, and hearts break: tell me what a merry day will that be, when (you shall not only meet again, never more to part asunder, but when) Christ our Savior shall gladly welcome you (everyone of you) into his society, thou shalt be with me,] and let me speak to the joy of us all, I mean all broken-hearted Christians, (as for you that are profane ones, you have your portion here, therefore stand you by, and let the Children come to their share) a day will come, I trust in the Lord, when I shall meet you, and you me in the Kingdom of heaven: a day will come, I trust in the Lord, when you and I shall be all admitted into the society of God, and of Christ, and of his Saints, and of the Aagels: a day will come, I trust in the Lord, when with these eyes we shall behold our Redeemer, together with that Thief that was crucified with him: a day will come, I trust in the Lord, when we shall meet again with all the Saints that are gone afore us: and is not this a comfort? what shall we say when we see our Savior in his Throne, waited on with Mary his Mother, and Magdalene and Martha, and Lazarus, and Paul, and Peter, and all the Apostles and Disciples of our Lord and Savior? yea, when this Thief shall be presented to our view, the wounds in his hands and his feet shining like Stars, and Pearls, and Rubies, all his body glittering in glory, and his soul magnifying the Lord for his conversion and salvation world without end.

[Use. 2] But stay, least we be lead too forward, there is no such thing for us, if now we are not in the Covenant of grace: heaven is both happy and holy, and if we would enjoy heaven, then we must fit ourselves to that estate to which God hath preserved us: to this purpose saith the Apostle, Our conversation is in heaven, from whence we look for the Savior, Phil. 3.20. He was assured of heaven, and therefore he conversed as a Citizen of heaven before he came there, every way he •rried himself (as much as earth would suffer him) like them that live in heaven: and thus must we (if ever we go to heaven) become like to those that are in that place. Deceive not yourselves, neither Whoremongers, no Adulterers, nor Extortioners, nor the like shall enter into the Kingdom of God, 1 Cor. 6.9. Do men who live in these sins without all remorse or repentance ever think to go to heaven? is it possible that ever any flesh should go out of the puddle into Paradise? no, no, Away ye workers of iniquity, I know you not, saith our Savior: let no man cherish presumptions of an heavenly Kingdom, except he abstain from all sins against Conscience. What then? but so live we here as becomes his servants, and thus when we part, it is but for better company: we lose a few friends, but we shall find him that welcomes all his with this heavenly harmony, thou shalt be—with whom? with me,] in Paradise.

Hitherto of the Society. The last thing considerable is the place or Ubi where his soul arrived; but of that hereafter, as the Lord shall enable me. God give us all grace •o to live here that howsoever we go hence one after another, yet at last we may all meet together with our Lord and Savior in his heavenly Paradise.

In Paradise.]

AND where was that? our Adversaries say in Limbus, and yet (to give them their due) Bellarmino so means not as that Limbus was Paradise, but that in Limbus this thief had his Paradise, to wit, the vision of God: The vision of God (saith Bellarmino) is a true Paradise indeed, not local, but spiritual. But with Bellarmino's leave we have no such sense of Paradise, in any part of holy Writ. In the Old Testament we read of an earthly Paradise, wherein Adam lived; in the New Testament we read of an Heavenly Paradise, whither Paul was caught, yet both these were local, for the one (saith Moses) was a garden Eastward in Eden, Gen 2.8. and the other (saith Paul) was in heaven, which he calls the third heaven, 2. Cor. 12.2. and that Paradise in my Text must be understood of Heaven, this resemblance confirms; the first Adam sinned against God, and was presently cast out of that Paradise on earth; the second Adam made satisfaction for sin, and so must presently enter into this Paradise of heaven: because of the sin of the first Adam, both he and all his posterity were thrust out of Eden; because of the sufferings of the second Adam, both he, and we, this Thief, and all believers, are to go into heaven. So then this Paradise whither Christ is gone, and this Thief went with him, what is it? but as Paul calls it, the third heaven? or as the Thief himself styled it in his prayer to our Savior, Remember me; where? in thy Kingdom.

And if this be it we call Paradise, what can we say of it? It is not for us (saith Bernard) in these earthly bodies to mount into the Clouds, to pierce this fullness of light to break into this bottomless depth of glory; this is reserved to the last day, when Christ Jesus shall present us glorious and pure to his Father, without spot or wrinkle. And yet because God in his Word doth here give us a taste of heaven, by comparing it with the most precious things that are on earth, let us follow him so far as he hath revealed it, and no further.

In the midst of Paradise is a Tree of Life, Rev. 2.7. and this Tree bears twelve manner of fruits, yielding her fruit every Moneth, Rev. 22.2. What more pleasant then life? and what life better then where is variety of pleasure? here is a tree of life, and the life of the tree; a Tree of life that renews life to the eaters, and the life of the tree bearing fruit every month, and as many months so many fruits; such are the varieties of heavens joys, where youth flourisheth that never waxeth old, change of delights and choice too entereth that never knoweth end. But look we a little further: John that calls this place Paradise, Revel. 2. calls this Paradise a City, Rev. 21. and hereof he gives us the quantity and quality, the bigness and beauty: first for the greatness of it; An Angel with a golden Reed measures it, and he finds the length and the breadth, and the height of it are equal. Secondly, for the beauty of it, The Walls (saith he) are of Jasper, and the foundation of the Walls garnished with all manner of precious stones, the twelve gates are of pearls, and the streets paved with pure gold: there is no need of Sun or Moon: for the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb (Christ Jesus) is the light thereof. See here the excellency of this City: on which words to give you a short Comment,

We'll begin first with the Greatness of it: The Angel sets it down twelve hundred Furlongs, verse. 16. Yet that we may know this certain number; it is but figuratively taken; you may guess at the measurable magnitude of this City, by those many Mansions, spoken of by Christ, John 14.2. In my Fathers house are many Mansions: How many? so many (saith one) as would suffice in finitis mundis, a thousand worlds of men, and though all the men in this one world attain not to it, it is not for want of room, but of will, They believe not in him who hath prepared these seats for them. And guess it you may by that incredible distance betwixt Heaven and Earth. Some Astronomers compute, that betwixt us only and the starrie Firmament, there is no less then seventy four Millions, seven hundred three thousand, one hundred, eighty miles; and if the Emphyreall Heaven (as many say) be two or three Orbs above the Starrie firmament, how many more miles is it then beyond? and the further it is distant (we all know well enough) the heavens being Orb-wise, and one comprehending another, that which is furthest or highest must needs be the greatest; hence is it that Scriptures compare the height of Heaven (and consequently the magnitude) to the perfection of God past finding out; Canst thou by searching find out God?—it is as high as heaven, what canst thou do? Job 11.8.

Secondly, If such be the immensity, what think you is the beauty? It is a most glorious City, whose walls are of Jasper, whose building is of gold, whose gates are of pearls, whose foundation of precious stones: and if such be the gates and streets, what then are the inner rooms? what are the dining Chambers? what are the lodging rooms? O how unspeakable is the glory of this City! Kings shall throw down their Crowns before it, and count all their pomp and glory but as dust in comparison; and well they may: for what is an earthly Kingdom to this heavenly Paradise? where is mirth without sadness, health without sorrow, life without labor, light without darkness, where every Saint is a King, adorned with light as with a garment, and clad in the richest robes that God bestows upon a creature.

But that which more especially commends the beauty of this City, is the luster of it, There is (saith John) no need of Sun or Moon, it is verus 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, wholly light itself, not like the starrie firmament, bespangled here and there with glittering spots. It is all as it were one great, one glorious Sun, from every point it pours out abundantly whole rivers of purest light, and then what a light is this?

Nor is this all; for the glory of God lightens it, and the Lamb is the light thereof; besides the native luster, there is the glory of God, the glory of all glories; this is it for which Moses prayed, O Lord, I beseech thee show me thy glory; to whom God answered, thou canst not see my face and live, —but I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while my glory passeth by; then will I take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back parts: but my face shall not be seen. And if Moses face shone so bright with seeing God's back-parts, that the Israelites were afraid to come nigh him, and that he was fain to cover his face with a veil while he spake unto them, how bright then is Paradise, not only lightened with the back-parts of God, but with his own divine glory? From the majesty of God (saith a modern) there goes out a created light, that makes the whole City glitter, and this being communicated to the Saints, God thereby causeth that they see him fully face to face.

Again, The glory of God, and the Lamb of God both give their lights; that Lamb that was slain from the beginning of the world, that body of his once crucified, now brighter then ten thousand Suns, O how infinitely glorious doth it make this Paradise, this City of God? His countenance is as the Sun that shineth in his strength, saith John, Revel. 1.16. But what stars are those in his hands and his feet? Where the nails pierced, now it sparkleth; where the spear entered now it glittereth gloriously: if we look all over him, his head and his hairs are as white as snow, his eyes are as a flame of fire, his feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace: no wonder then if such beams come from this Sun (the Sun of righteousness) that all heaven shines with it from the one end to the other.

And yet again the Lamb, and the Saints all give their lights; for we know that when he shall appear, we shall be like him, 1. Joh. 3.2. how like? why, he shall change our vile bodies, that it may be fashioned like unto his glorious body, Phil. 3.21. In what like? even in this very quality; for they that be wise shall shine, Dan. 12.3. How shine? as the brightness of the Firmament: nay more, as the stars, saith Daniel: nay more, as the Sun, saith our Savior; nay, yet more saith Chrysostom: howsoever the righteous in heaven are compared to the Sun, Matth. 13.43. It is not, because they shall not surpass the brightness of it; but the Sun being the most glittering thing in this world, he takes a resemblance thence only towards the expressing of their glory. Now then what a mass of light will arise in Paradise, where so many millions of Sunns appear all at once? If one Sun make the morning sky so glorious, what a bright shining and glorious day is there, where's not a body but 'tis a Sunn? Sure it is, There shall be no night there no need of candle▪ no need of Sun, or Moon, or Star. O that this clay of ours should be partakers of such glory! what am I O Lord, that being a worm on earth, thou wilt make me a Saint in heaven? this body of earth and dust shall shine in heaven like those glorious spangles in the firmament; this body that shall rot in dust and fall more vile then a Carrion, shall arise in glory, and shine like the glorious body of our Savior in the mount of Tabor. To come near my Text: See here a Saint-Thief shining gloriously he that was crucified with our Savior at whose death the Sun hid her face with a veil, now he reigns in glory without need of Sunn: for he is a Sunn himself, shining more clearly then the Sun at noon; he that one day was fastened to a Cross, now walks at liberty through the streets of Paradise, and all the joys, all the riches, all the glory that can be is poured upon him. What else? He is in Paradise, and what is Paradise but a place of pleasure? where sorrow is never felt, complaint is never heard, matter of sadness is never seen, evil success is never feared, but instead thereof there is all good without any evil, life that never endeth, beauty that never fadeth, love that never cooleth, health that never impaireth, joy that never ceaseth; what more could this penitent wish, then to hear him speak that promised Paradise, and per••••ed his promise, To day thou shalt 〈...〉 with me in Paradise.]

And thus in a Map have I 〈...〉 Paradise] for quantity great, for quality glor••••, 〈...〉 better, when you shall walk through the 〈◇〉 observe the towers, fully contemplate the glory 〈◇〉 that you may, not w••• of application before I 〈◇〉 .

[Use 1] Meditate then with what sweet delight every••• servant of God may bath himself before hand even in this valley of tears! Did we but think on this glory••• place, 〈...〉 •hose heavenly mansions prepared for us, did we spend many thoughts upon it, and ever and anon sigh and seek after it until we came to the fingering and possession of it; O how would these heavenly meditations ravish our souls, as if Heaven 〈...〉 before we entered into Heaven! Consider of this in what ••se soever we are, whether we are vexed, or injured, or oppressed, or persecuted for the name of Christ; there is nothing so embittered, that a thought of heaven will not sweeten: Yet I say not that we are only to think of it, withal let us strive and strain to get into this golden City, where streets are paved with gold and pearl; nay, where pearls are as common as stones, nothing worth in comparison of those things which shall be revealed unto faithful souls.

[Use 2] On the other side, Consider with yourselves what fools are they who deprive themselves willingly of this endless glory, who bereave themselves of a room in this City of Pearl, for a few carnal pleasures, what Bedlams and human beasts are they, who shut themselves out of Paradise, for what trifles? What sots and senseless wretches are they, who wittingly and willfully bar themselves out of this Palace, for the short fruition of worldly trash and pleasures. As for you of whom I hope better things, let me advise you for the love of God, for the love of Christ, for the love that you bear to your own soul, that you will settle your affections or things above, and not on things beneath; and then you shall find only the comfort of it when leaving this world, the Spirit of God shall whisper to your souls this happy tidings, To day shalt thou be with me in Paradise.]

Here is an end: Shall I now cast up the accounts of what I have delivered you? The Total is this:

Every sinner that repents and believes, shall be saved: you need no other instance then this Thief on the Cross, at one hearty tear, one penitent prayer, Lord, remember me in thy Kingdom, the Lord gives him his desire; see here the fiat, thou shalt be] the expedition, today] his admission, with me] the place whither he is inducted, it is into Paradise.] and there now he officiates, doing service to God without ceasing, world without end. O Lord, give me grace so to repent and believe, that whensoever I go hence, that day I may be with thee in Paradise. AMEN▪

An ADVERTYSEMENT to the Reader, Occasioned by the never enough lamented death of my dear friend the Author of this Fresh suite.

Vnderstand Christian Reader, that with the coming forth of this book into the light, the learned and famous Author D^r. Ames left the light, or darkness rather of this world. His name for diverse reasons (not needful here to be recited) hath been hitherto concealed, and that which generally was but imagined before, (viz. that the Repl. and this fresh suit to D. B. Rejoinder) to be his work, now it is certainly known to be his, that none need to doubt thereof. It pleadeth truth succinctly, yet perspicuously, and with sinewy Answeres to B.M. and D. B. poor Sophisms, as indeed his veinc in all his writings and discourses did most admirably lead him to do. Concerning this matter, I may not keep back what I heard him speak as in the sight of God, that he was in his conscience more persuaded of the evil of these relics of Popery and monuments of that superstition then ever, and yet he never had seen good in them, or come from them: and that moreover if D. B. or any other of them would yet be daubing with suntempered mortar, and not give over to paint rotten sepulchers, he was by the grace of God resolved still to maintain the cause, and while he lived never let fall the uit commenced this way, not that he sought victory to himself, no; That truth might return out of the field with conquest was the highest pitch of his ambition. And though this worthy of the Lord be with us no more, yet God (I trust) who is rich in mercy, and hath more then one blessing, will (as need shall require) supply the advantage truth had, and now hath lost in the loss of this glorious instrument. Together with his life

God hath put an end to all his travailes, wherein he shown himself a pattern of holiness, a burning and a shining light, and lamp of learning & Arts, a Champion for truth, specially while for the space of 12 years at least, he was in the Doctors Chair at Franequer, and having fought the good fight of faith, whereunto he was called, & professed a good profession before many witnesses, he hath now indeed laid hold on eternal life. His spirit gone to the spirits of just men, and his body committed to the ground, we commit his labors to thy use, wherein he being dead, yet speaketh, and his memory we hope shall live forever.

Fare well in Christ, the Fountain of all welfare.

To the renowned King, EDWARD THE SIXTH And so To our present Sovereign King CHARLES his Successor. IOHANNES ALASCO (a Godly Learned Polonian Baron and Superintendent of the Church of strangers at London) in the Epistle Dedicatory of his tractate Concerning the Sacraments, printed at London, Anno 1552.

Well doth that Father, and without doubt deserve praise, who having a daughter a Virgin drawn by the guile of panders into some lewd and dishonest house, and there trimmed after the whorish guise doth presently rescue her thence and bring her home to his own house before she be utterly spoiled. But the same Father (if he be wise) thinks it not enough for the safety of his daughter, and the honor of his house, that he hath brought her home again, unless he take from her wholly whatsoever he knows to be accounted in those houses a whorish attire.

Neither doth he inquire whence such attire came first: but judgeth it dishonorable to himself, and so unworthy his daughter and whole family, that any such thing at all as strompets have used for dressings in their houses, should appear in his.

Neither doth he give ear to their persuasions, who bear him in hand that all things are to be Esteemed according to the Fathers mind in his own house; and so think that the Fathers approbation can make that honest, in his own house, for his daughter, and whole family, which in another house, is most dishonest, for any daughters that regard their own credits: ascribing so much to the Fathers prerogative, that whatsoever he approves, must be of others well liked of, so far as it concerns his own house. For he knows full well, that although all those things which he hath authorized in his own house be there well thought of, yet that is not enough, since the honor of his daughter, and his whole Family, must not only be cared for within his own house, but also throughout the whole City, that he may remove all evil suspicions from his family among all his neighbors; and is heedful that the panders have not the least occasion left them, of challenging or laying claim to the said daughter, as having some of their whor-house-marks upon her.

Even so in the Church of God, as in a city, Magistrates and Ministers are in place of parents, having the pure and right Administration of the Sacraments committed unto them of God, for to be tended, and tendered as their own daughter. It is therefore very commendable in these parents of the church (as we may term them) if they rescue the lawful & pure Administration of the Sacraments from the violence and tyranny of the Romish Panders, by taking it into their own care and Custody.

But here they ought to remember (Especially they who are called by the holy Spirit, Eminent Ministers of God, and Nursing Fathers of his church I.E. Christian Kings and Monarchs, that it is not enough for them, thus to have brought this daughter out of the Papists stews, home into their own care and keeping, unless they also put of from her, all that dressing, which they know to be whorish in the said stews, that no such thing may be seen with them, which may be accounted whorish: Especially in that city where there is great Variety of judgments, the ouerruling whereof by man's Authority is not to be expected, and where there are so many hucksters for the stews remaining.

Nor let them hear the delusions of those who suggest, that such kinds of dressing from whence soever they be taken may be made good & honest by Authoritye. For well they know, they are not set over the whole church of God, but only one part of it, as a Family in a City, and that therefore though they could bear out such things at home by their Authoritye; yet it is their duty (as they regard public Chastity and honesty) to procure the honor of their daughter and familie not only within their own walls but alsoe throughout the whole city; not suffering anything to be seen within their house, which they know to be held, urged, and maynteyned by the Romish stews and their instruments as their proper whorish stuff.

Last of all they must be wary, least any signs or tokens be left upon their daughter, by which she may be questioned again by these panders as one of theirs.

Now (if it please your Excellent Majestye) you are one of these nursing Fathers of the Church of God blessed be his name therefore: and in this high calling (by God's providence) you have this Ministry of the Sacraments rescued out of the popish Brothels, and brought into your own care and keeping: Here therefore be pleased to set before your eyes the foresaid example of a good Father in those things which yet remain to be performed, I. E. in providing for the credit of this your reduced daughter and so of your whole Family, not only in this your Flourishing Kingdom, but also in the Catholic Church of Christ whereof you are a citezen, unto whom a principal part thereof as an honorable familie is Committed in trust.

This is that which all the Godly throughout the Christian world do expect from your hand, and that the more earnestly because they know that God hath enriched you with such excellent gifts, & placed you in so high a place almost above all others; even to this very end, that you might remove from the Ministry of the Sacraments all those popish trinkets, wherewith it hath been fearfully profaned, & restore unto it again that virgin-like attire, wherewith it was of old adorned by the high King of Kings, and lawgiver Christ the Lord in his holy Institutions. So shall your faith and fidelitye be famous throughout the Christian world: and the Church of England grow more honorable under your Government.

The Latyn words of Johannes Alasco himself.

Serenissimo Regi EDUARDO SEXTO Deigratia, Angliae, Franciae, & Hiberniae Monarchae, Fideiverae, Catholicae, & Apostolicae, Defensori; Omnium (in suis ditionibus) personarum &c. IOHANNES A LASCO, &c.

REcte facit Pater, laudem{que} meretur proculdubio, si Filiam Virginem, dolis lenonum, ad ganeas forte abreptam, rituque jam meretricis ornatam, protinus illinc eximat, incolumi adhuc pudicitia illius, inque suas rursus ipsius aedes reducat: Sed idem satis non esse putat, ad tuendam suam, filiaeque illius, & totius adeo familiae suae honestatem, exemisse e ganeis filiam, inque suas aedes reduxisse; nisi illi id totum plane detrahat, quod in ganeis illis pro ornatu meretricio haberi videt. Neque disquirat, undenam ornatus illi originem suam habeat: sed indecorum sibi, adeoque & castitate filiae suae, & familiae etiam totius indignum esse iudicat, ut aliquid omnino ejusmodi domusuae conspiciatur, undecunque tandem deductum esset, quod in ganeis ipsis pro ornatu meretricio haberi non ignoret. Neque hic audit eorum persuasiones, qui omnia ex Patris arbitrio domi suae, aestimanda esse dicunt; & proinde ornatum quoque meretricium illum in ganeis, honestissimum jam fore putant domi paternae, cum filiae illi, tum etiam reliquae toti familiae, si quidem paterna auctoritate comprobaretur; eo quod in Patris id potestate positum esse videatur, ut quae illi probantur, ea jam honesta etiam domusuae omnia esse censeantur. Intelligit enim, etiamsi domi suae, pro honestis haberentur omnia quae ipse sua auctoritate comprobasset; honestatem tamen filiae illius, & familiae suae totius, non intra domesticos sibi duntaxat parietes suos, sed per totam etiam civitatem reliquam, tuendam esse; ut omnem malam suspicionem, apud omnes omnino cives, a domo sua depellat: & cavet ne ullis rursus lenonibus, ullam deinceps etiam repositandae denuo ad ganeas filiae suae occasionem quoquo modo relinquat, pro jure ipsorum; si quae apud illam notae adhuc tales, ganeis familiares, conspicerentur.

Ita vero, etiam Parentum loco sunt in Dei Ecclesia, veluti in civitate quadam, & Verbi, & Gladij Ministri omnes; habentque sibi concreditum ab ipsomet Domino Deo, veluti filiae loco, purum ac legitimū ministerium Sacramentorum. Hic igitur istorum Ecclesiae Parentum (ut ita jam loquamur) fidem ac studium nemo non merito laudaverit, si concreditum sibi ab ipsomet Deo (veluti filiam quandam) purum ac legitimum Sacramentorum ministerium, ab Antichristi Romani, & lenonum suorum ganeis, in quas vi ac tyrannide ipsorum abductum fuerat, in suas ipsorum domos rursus, in curam (inquam) ac custodiam suam reducerunt. Sed hic cogitare debent utrique, potissimum autem ii, qui non frustra Praecellentes Dei Ministri, Altoresque Ecclesiae Dei a Spiritu Sancto vocantur, Reges (inquam) ac Monarchae Christiani, satis non esse, si filiam illam e ganeis Papisticis, in aedes rursus suas ipsorum, hoc est, in curam custodiamque suam recipiant, nisi eam etiam omni illo ornatu plane exuant, quem in ganeis ipsis, meretricium ornatum & esse, & haberi sciunt; nequid ejusmodi domi ipsorum conspiciatur, quod pro meretricio haberi posset: in ea potissimum civitate, in qua varia sunt adhuc judicia hominum; neque ab uno homine gubernari possunt; & in qua adhuc multam, infinitamque lenonum turbā superesse constat. Ne{que} hic audient persuasiones illorum, qui ornatum ejusmodi (undecunque tandē desumptus esset) honestum nihilominus domi paternae fore existimant, si Patris ipsius auctoritate comprobetur. Intelligunt enim, non toti se Civitati omnino, non toti (inquam) Dei Ecclesiae, sed parti duntaxat illius alicui, veluti domui ac familiae cuidam praeesse: et proinde, etiamsi domi suae, pro honestis jam haberi videant, quae ipsi sua auctoritate comprobassent; sui interim officij esse agnoscunt (quatenus equidem castitatis amantes, publicae{que} honestatis studiosi haberi volunt) ut filiae illius, totiusque adeo familiae suae honestatem, non inter domesticos tantum parietes suos, sed per totam illam civitatem etiam, omni studio, ac cura tueantur, nihilque domi suae conspici patiantur, quod in ejusdem civitatis ganeis, ac lupanaribus, maximo lenonúomnium conatu, ac tyrannide, pro meretricio haberi interim, urgerique, ac propugnari vident. Postremo, cavendum sibi modis omnibus esse putant, ne eisdem lenonibus rursus, aut eorum similibus, ullam omnino occasionem (pro jure ipsorum) relinquunt, quoquomodo repositendae fi•ae illius suae; si quae notae adhuc (ganeis illis familiares) apud illam conspicerentur.

I am vero tu quoque unus es ex hisce Ecclesiae Dei Altoribus (Rex Serenissime) quo quidem nomine, summas Deo Patri nostro coelesti gratias agimus. Et concreditum tibi, in praecellenti vocatione hac tua, a Domino Deo, Sacramentorum Ministerium, veluti filiam quandam, ganeis jam Papisticis, in tuas rursus aedes (Divino beneficio) hoc est, in curam ac custodiam tuam domesticam reductum habes. Hic tu igitur tibi quoque sequendum esse cogitabis, in his quae adhuc restant, propositum jam boni Parentis exemplum, in tuenda reductae filiae, totiusque adeo familiae tuae, publica honestate, non tantum in Regno tuo florentissimo, sed in Chatholica etiam Christi Ecclesia, cujus alioqui & ipse civis es, ejus{que} partem pulcherrimam, veluti insignem illius familiam tibi concreditam habes. Hoc vero abs te pij omnes, toto orbe Christiano, exspectant. Etquidem tanto majore desiderio, quanto majoribus atque excellentioribus donis te a Domino Deo nostro ornatum, ac sublimiore etiam, supra alios fere omnes, loco, positum esse non ignorant: nempe ut Sacramentorum Ministerium, illecebris meretricijs, in Papae ganeis, nefandissime profanatum, omni illarum ornatu meretricio exuas; suoque illud ornatu virgineo rursus induas; quo videlicet a summo illo Regum omnium Rege ac Nomothete, Christo Domino, in suis institutionibus ornatum esse constat. Sic enim nota demum erit toti Ecclesiae Christi, fides tua, in tuenda filiae tibi concreditae, non domi modo tuae, sed toto etiam orbe terrarum, publica honestate.

THE PRAEFACE.

They who put to sea, according to their several scopes & purposes, so do they steer their Compasses, & proceed in their travells answeareably. Such as set out merely to satisfy their pleasure, or some private end; when once the heavens begyn to be besett with clouds, the wynds grow high, & the storm approaching threatens apparent danger, when their companyes are scattered & severed from them, or when the foulness of their stomachs and the noisome humors there, cause, that they cannot brook the sea, but with much taedious disquiet & sickness; They turn their courses & make to shore with as much speed as they may.

Others who seriously intend to make a voyage of it, & are bound for some remote place, & resolved to fetch some precious commodityes from a far country; they reckon upon hazards, expect the common calamities of the sea, & determyne to undergo, what ever they do expect, or shall befall. The conclusion is: willing they are to adventure the loss of their lives, but not willing, to loose their voyage, therefore on they will: extreme necessityes may overbear them, but no fears can discourage them in there course.

As thus it fares in traveling, so fares it also, with men in professing the truth; their aims are several, & their proceedings suitable thereunto: Some take up the profession of the truth, as a voyage of pleasure: & such will be sure, to sail no further, then that they may see the smoke of their own chymneyes: they will serve Christ no longer, then they may serve there own turns, and therefore such will have no more of the gospel, then they may have their own private with it, not only within sight, but within reach: And its admirable to see, what falsenes they discover in there course, & yet what fair colores, they putt upon all their procedings, & would bear the world in hand, they wish nothing but soundness, when indeed there is nothing but shows & appearances, to please a sensual eye:

Its not amiss therefore, to take the scantling of both these kinds, that the Judicious Reader may be able to own them as they appear in his way, either in their writings, or behaviours: for the lives of men are like living books, which a wise man will serch into, & observe: To this purpose therefore we shall shortly consider: 1 what is the cause of this declyning? 2 what be the pretenses, whereby they labor to excuse it?

The cause of this declining, is the entertaynment of the truth upon false grounds: The apple which is unsound at the coar, will discover rottenness in the skin afterwards: when the foundation is not sure the whole frame will synke, when its shaken by the least storm.

Some there be, like the stony-hearted hearers, who from the present apprehension of the comforts & promises of the gospel, are tickled with the sweetness the rof, though but in general conceived, & have their hearts sudainly cheered, with the confused & unapplied grounds of good; And therefore they are said to receive itsuddaynly with joy:

But as they flourish speedily, so do they fade as soon: for these flashes of comfort, as they arise not from any deep root of an humbled & self denyng heart: So they leave no deep stamp or impression upon the Spirit: and therefore when sad & heavy pressures of sorrow do sease upon the soul, these slight impressions of flashy joy vanish away:

These comforts in Temporaries, are like the painting & complexion, which is laid upon the face by deformed harlots, which the least violence of cold, or heat takes off immediately; whereas, a sound joy issuing from grounded assurance, is like ruddy complexion, which ariseth from good blood, & a wholesome constitution, which the greatest heats or colds may increase, but cannot remove as long as life & strength lasteth:

Others again are brought to embrace the truth because of the company or multitude, which they see give credit or countenance thereunto: thus the Pharisee would not to heaven unless he might go in the crowd. Or because of the safety & commodity which the Lord sometimes vouchsafes to sincere Professors. Thus many turned Jews in Esters time, not because they were the better, but the stronger party; not for the truth of their profession, but for the safety of the Professors. These attend upon Christ for the loaves and follow the gospel no longer then profit follows them. The name of a prison, the noise of a chain, makes the truth so deformed in their eye, that they dare not, & therefore will not own it. As the leaves of a tree, while they be fed with moisture, drawn up in• the branches by the Sun in the springe, they flourish and cold frost drive back the moisture, they wither & fall. Like these leaves, is the love of these worldly gospellers. An instance of this temper is apparent in many of our Elizabeth Professors (as they are termed) who were whot at the entrance of the Gospel, when company, credit, & profit were attendants to it: but when the frowns & displeasure of authority, like winter blasts, plucked away their livings & dignities which were as the moisture, to feed their desires, they dried away in their (discretion) & retained nothing but the name of ancient Professors, like boxes in Apothecaries shops, which carry fair titles on the outsyde, & fill up room, but have not one healing or useful drugge in them.

A third sort there be, who at the first appearing of the gospel in a place, are taken up with the strangnes and novelty, either of the Doctryne, or the manner of delivery, & answerably with some affection make inquiry after it. This was their practice, when John the Baptist came preaching in the wilderness, Then went out to him Jerusalem, & all Judea, & all the Region about Jordan. This also our Savior acknowledged as there endeavor. John was a burning & a shining light, & you would have recoyced in him for a season.

It befalls the Gospel in this case, as it doth with some strange commodity: when it first comes to view, many see & cheapen, until the price proves too heavy, & then they depart & will not buy: So here: when our Savior sets open the sale of the gospel, in some obscure place, many will be comers, hearers, Cheapners, until they find that the word grows somewhat high rated, & the conditions of the Gospel seem too hard, & then they for sake it. Herod welcomes John the Baptist, & observes him, but at last murders him.

Others lastly, after some sad conviction of the truth revealed, as also of the necessity and excellency thereof, hold it a point of honor, to persevere in the defense & maintenance of it: and hence for their own praise, may, & do Suffer heavy persecutions, as, poverty, Exile in the profession of the truth, the power where of they never approved in the exactness of it.

Thus many in Queen Mary's days, were exiled for the Gospel, who afterward returned into England, & opposed, yea persecuted the power & accuratnes practice of it.

For there is a nick of temptation, which stuttes the humor of these temporizing hypocrites, & discovers them in their colors: & hence it is, that these of Diotrephes his generation, could endure banishment, because that hyndred not, but promoted their honor in that kind of suffering: yet when they came into place of supremacy, fell to beating of their fellow brethren, as conceaving the strictness of their course, carried a condemnation of their careless and pompous sensuality.

We have seen the causes, consider we now the excuses they would pretend for themselves. And here as men's corruptions are diverse, & act more or less strongly, their shifts carry more or less apperance vrith them. Here first your statist is most gross, to whom his Religion is as his coin. Al that, goes for currant gospel with him, that is stamped with the authority & allowance of the State: He is hovering betwixt several Religions, that he may take any for his turn, waits & eyes, to see which side is like to prosper, that so he may be of the safest side: And he •esseth himself with the name of a Christian Church, & the substance of Religion. And what ever things are like to prove trouble some, these he will make indifferent, that he may take them, or leave them, as he likes best for his ease.

He complaines much of the restless strictness of men's Spirits, who cannot see when they are well, put too great weight upon things, that are of no worth, stand upon trifles. He crieth out for Discretion as that which would umpire & determyne all doubts. And therefore he can run with the hare, & hold with the hound: (by discretion) He will do anything, rather than suffer anything: (by discretion.) He can soder with the times, & wink at the synnes of men, yea swallow them down, though with reluctance of conscience, & that he terms tolerating; & all (by discretion.) Authority is instead of all arguments to this man, he enquires after no other ground or warrant.

The Temporary Gospeller having had some touch of Religion, & light of truth, in his mind, can find no rest unto his conscience, unless he have some show of reason to allege: for he remembers the charge of the Apostle: ye are redeemed with a price: be not the servants of men: he recalls the limitation of God's command: obey in the Lord: that we ought to be followers of the Apostles no farther then they wer followers of Christ. That the utmost extent of our Savior's commission to teach, & for men to obey was: That men should be taught, to observe all that he commanded, not that men commanded.

Resolving therefore to decline, they seek to catch at any appearance, which they may plead for their declining. And because they are most led by example, and sense, these are the weapons with which they use to ward them selves, & maintain their course.

Common example carries a persuading power with them, its a sufficient reason for their doing because they see it is don. Here they take up their stand. All men for the most part do so, & why may not they? Thus like sheep they follow the drove though it be to the shambles. Especially if they hear of any noted & famous for piety, & godliness to go in such a way, they conclude forthwith, it is the right way: reasoning thus: They are wise and godly, & think you, they durst do it, they would do it, unless it wer good and pious? when the truth hath told us, that all m•n are liars, & either do, or may deceive, or be decey••d; even the courses of the strictest saints have there crackings: Peter was a good man, & yet dissembled: and Barnabas was a good man, & yet was snatched away by example into the same dissimulation. What madness is it because a wise man happily falls into the mire, that we should foul ourselves & wallow with him? But the main bulwark whereby they beat back all assaults, is if they can hold out some Ecclesiastical Canon: The Church enjoins it, & are you wiser then The Church? This stricks it dead, no man must dare to dispute any further; nay they count it unreasonale, once to demurr or doubt anymore: but expect, that all men should captivale their conceits presently, & put off reason, & pluck out their eyes, to see by other men's spectacles: which is intruth not only to cease to be Christians, but to be men.

Not that I detract any due respect & esteem, which each man should have both in opinion & affection of the true Church of Christ: I know she is the spouse of Christ; yet but the spouse. It is enough that she is next to her head, the Lord Jesus, she must not usurp to be head, her power is subordinate not supreme, ministerium not imperium, she must deliver the laws which she hath received, from her King, not dare to make laws: And therefore we must beware, lest while (for our own es) we would honor the Church too much, we dishonor Christ, wrong & grieve both: To crush therefore the former Cavil, & objection: I answer several things.

It is the Romish tenet, to a hair, & one of the most fulsom points, & loathsome dregs of the fylth of Popery. The Jesuits themselves having no other bottom •hey bear up, or to biuld up, their blind obedience: An opinion constantly & unanimously opposed by all our Divines (Chamier de votis, lib. 11. cap. 11.) abhorred by all Christian self denying, and sincere-belleiving hearts: For what is it else, but to jusle Christ out of his prophetical & Kingly office: to resolve our faith & obedience lastly, into the determinations & commands of men?

2. Why are the Berreans commended for examining Paul's Doctrine? why are all men enjoined to try all things, & to hold that which is good; If we be bound to take our Religion upon trust from the authority of the Church?

3. If Paul an Apostle & Doctor of the gentiles, disclaymes all such souveraignty as tyrannical usurpation, what man or Church dare challenge it? But disclayme it he doeth. 2. Cor. 1. last. Not that we have dominion over your faith, but are helpers of your joy, for by faith you stand.

4. Had men, or Curches, power to coin Ecclesiastical Canons, to forge new articles of faith, to make these senses of the Scripture Authentic, which suited their minds, and to charge these upon the consciences of men, as necessary to be believed, Believers should not stand by their faith, but they, and their faith, should stand or fall, according to the feeble determination of men.

5. If the faith of particular men depend upon the Church, upon what doth the faith of the Church depend? Either they be the rule, (which is too loathsome to affirm) or else they are guided by the rule of the word, in their determinations, which begets both saving light in their minds, & sound faith in their hearts: Eph. b. 20.10. Rom. 17. And if the word be able to give them light & faith, why not others as well as them?

6. The authority of the Church, unto which we must captivate our judgments, musteyther be the authority of the Universal Church, which acteth nothing but in the particulars; & these have varied in opinion, & practice, touching Ceremonies, & therefore cannot settle us in a certain determination; Or it must be the authority of a particular Church: but particular Churches have not only erred, but departed from the faith: Who Lorded it oter the law? did not the Church: 14. Math. 10? who condemned & crucifyd the Lord? (did not the Church?) who persecuted the Apostles & forbad them to preach & publish the Gospel? (did not the Church?) And this which is said of Churches, is true of Coun•else, of all kynds, as experience of all ages hath made it good.

Others of this rank, plead the love of their people, the necessity of preaching, & hope of doing good: how precious men's pains are, & what need of laborers in the vynyard. And therefore conclude, if all men should sit do wur in silence, as some do, the ruyn of the Church must needs follow. They confess (its true indeed) these popish relics, which are the bane of the Churches peace, being unprofitable & needless, nay scandalous & offensive, should be removed. But when they weigh that heavy charge: Woe if I: preach not the Gospel, they are then willing to bear all, rather than to deprive the Church of the benefit, & the souls of God's people, of the profit & comfort of their ministry: whereas alas all this pretence of mercy is a miserable mistake, & commonly that worldly watch word (of favor thyself) lies closely covered under these curious flourishes of care & compassion for the common good. For the question is not, whether preaching be precious, or the pains of faithful Ministers profitable? But the doubt here is, whether we may come to do lawful things, by unlawful means? To sin, that we may do service? As though the Lord had need of my lie; or else that he could not bring his servants to his own haven, without the devil's boat; or that Christ could not uphold his own kingdom without the pains & preaching of some men; now I conceive, it is undeniably evident, that the suffering, in the time of Queen Mary's days, did more settle & enlarge the bounds of the Gospel, than all the preaching did in King Edward the sixth his reign.

Others speak out, & deal down right: profess, it is against their hearts, & their hearts, to do this drudgery, but they are not able to undergo the extreme pressure which follows the refusal of them: Nay it is certain, some have openly protested, that, if it were but half an hour's hanging, they would rather suffer it, than subscribe. But for them & theirs, to lie in the ditch, & to be cast into a blind corner, like broken vessels; yea they & their families to die many hundred deaths, by extreme misery, before they could come unto their graves; This they were not able to undergo. A condition, I acknowledge, which needs & deserves a great deal of pity & commiseration, since it is true, that some kinds of oppression make a man mad: But oh that the God of mercy would put it into the minds & hearts of those whom it doth concern, that they would never suffer such refuse relics, long, to hazard, not only the comforts, but even the consciences & happiness of many distressed souls.

There is a third & last sort of men, more ingenuous than the former, who when they see, that such colors (of excuses, formerly propounded) are not laid in oil, & therefore will not continue, nor can give them any encouragement in their course; such feeble pleas being like fig leaves, which cannot cover the nakedness of their cause, being neither true in themselves, nor honorable to their proceedings: They come to the main hold; and profess the things are lawful, & commendable, & therefore they do no more but what they may, nay what they ought. And whereas they have been of another mind, they diversely discover the causes of their change; as they are diversely affected, or have a greater stroke of conscience, & conviction of judgment.

One man acknowledgeth, he hath been long staggering, about the things in question: But now he hath gotten greater light, sees more, & understands better. And yet no man could ever see, his candle lighted, his arguments alleged, nor yet were his overweighing reasons, ever offered to scanning.

Nay if he be put hard to, it will appear he hath, none: yea he is not acquainted with the things he doth, if he come to give an account, of what he hath done. Only you must believe, he hath private arguments, which do overpower his judgment: Otherwise he must grant, he doth practice without ground & reason: The sum in short is, he hath gotten a perspective about him, and perceives that ease, & liberty is good, & therefore, (Issachar like) is resolved to sit under his burden: he sees the way by swallowing o• ceremonies, how to sleep in a whole skin, & that o•urse he takes.

If some searching truth delivered in public, press him, or some sincere hearted friend persuade him to a further inquiry, he seeks after the truth, as a coward doth for his enemy, being a frayd to find it. Loath he is, to be in the society of such, whō he conceaves, to be either Judicious in their dispute, or Zealous in their course, against this trash. Secretly desirous, that other should not occasion conference, or that such should not enter into serious communicatiō of these things, & if they do, he is weary of it, & blames the Author of the discourse, as that more savory or seasonable talk were shut out: When he goes for counsel, and direction, it is to some such Authors, who write for the things he would practice, or consul• only with those men, that profess to maintain them, & so they make up the match at mydnight.

But if yet, their own consciences, the arguments or persuasions of others, provoke to a more serious examination of both sides: How wearishly & unwillingly go they to the vorke? Commonly they make choice of the weakest, whose opinion they know, to be cross, to their course: or if they advise with other, of more able understanding, it is upon a start or suddayne, that o•her can be no sad dispute, & if yet such arguments fall, which they are not able to gaynsay; They go their way, & can tell how to forget or neglect them, & profess o•hey were with such, but could not be convinced, o•or see any sufficient reason to set•e their judgments.

But when they consult with such, whose opi•ions they know will please their palates, & persuade o•hem to that, which, they are resolved before hand to o•ractise; Though happily they propound no reason, but o•nly administer some grave counsel, or savory advise to o•xpresse their own resolution, or allege that place Rom. o•3.1. Let every soul be subject to the higher powers; Oh they go away with abundant content, admire & thank him for his advise▪ profess they never heard so much, & that now he is fully settled, & hath his doubts answered to his desire, gives it out, that such a man is able to give satisfaction to any: when in the mean while, he never asked any argument, but took his bare opinion, because it pleased him, & yet will reject the reason sometimes of another, because it crosseth him.

May be, it so falls out, that some new book of great note & expectation, is publyshed, which might clear the cause to these men's contents: After they have viewed it, & wiped their eyes, all things then are so clear, that there is not a cloud in the sky, nay not a mote in the sun: Ther was never said so much before: Oh this book of D. Burgess, hath made all things evident to them, even to admiration, & conclude, it will do as much to any that reads it: so that, if men be not obstinate, they cannot, but be convinced.

But alas: these men, have they taken the arguments into serious consideration? have they labored to search & examyne the strength of them? have they propounded them to such who are held most able, & judicious, of the other opinion, who do not find themselves, yet persuaded? Alas here is deep silence? where is that ancient rule: Audi alteram partem? where is that charge of the Apost: try all things. Is it not likely the man should be persuaded by his author, who resolves beforehand never to question anything in him? He must needs be of his authors faith, who purposeth to believe all he says, or not to doubt of what he says. And while I was penning this preface, there was one curious prank of cleanly conveyance of a declining heart, brought to hand, & it was this: pressures growing heavy upon such, that would not conform them selves, The Court censures of the Commissary, proceeding to excommunication of such as refused, & adding aggravations thereunto: to wit, forbidding to buy or sell with such, that were so excommunicate, upon pain of excommunication: one amongst the rest was not able to undergo the burden: to profess he could not suffer, was too shameful, & therefore he professeth his judgement was changed by D. Burgess his book: & therefore he need not, nay he should not suffer. Some of his parteners or consorts, desiring satisfaction with him, entreat that he would point at the place, express the argument, or arguments, in this book, that prevailed with him. To which he answers: no particular, or particulars, in the book, persuades, but the wholl: The English of which speech & practice is this: I am resolved to conform: & I will be persuaded by Doctor Burgess his book to it; but neither I, nor you shall know, what persuades me; that so my grounds not being know, they cannot be answered, nor I unsettled anymore: oh the desperate folly of a declining heart, to betray & deliver up itself unto the delusions of Satan!

Ther is lastly another sort of profound disputers in the world, who apprehending their reach to be beyond the reasons & writings of other men, have out of the depth of their judgments, devised a way judiciously to deceyve their own souls; & out of their pick-lock subtilty, count it easy to make way for themselbes, & maintain their way in any question. And this they do by making a maze of Divisions, & cut things in so many shreds, by multitudes of distinctions, that at length they loose their cause, the truth, & them selves also in the issue, & must of necessity be wilder the reader, unless he be of a searching judgment: This kind of distinguishing is like snuffing of the candell too near, putting out the light wholly, while they intend to make the light burn more clear: so do these men darken the truth, professing to discover more of it. praegnable examples of this kind, the Rej. hath expressed unto us, when to avoid the dint of the argument concerning significant Ceremony: & worship, his distinctions are so many & intricate, that one member destroys another, & the true nature of worship also, as may appear in the 85. & 136. pag: of the first part of this Dispute.

All this I speak, not that I would fall out with any, who is not of the same opinion with myself: for I prosesse the contrary, in a word of truth: every man abounds in his own sense: Only this seems somewhat grievous, & I conceive also injurious to the truth, that after all hard dealing, she cannot get an indifferent hearing, Seeing it is the fashion of the world, to have men's persons in admiration, to gain some countenance thereby to their own courses, And therefore to blow up the fame of men's abilities, (as they do bladders) to the utmost greatness they can, that the greater warrant they may seem to have, to follow their opinions & ways. And contrariwise, the person must be disparaged, when we would have his cause, or work come into discredit: a fashionable, but a shame less piece of Rhetoric: Thus the writing of the Repl: must be a pamphlet, his manner of writing currilous, that when both are thus disfigured, by the dirt and soote, which the Rej. hath flung upon them, it may be conceyved, they were so misshapen in their first frame: whereas the answer of the Rei: must be lifted up & proclaimed, worthy, learned, & judicious: which puts me in mind of Demetrius his out-cry: 19. Acts: 28. Great is Diana of the Ephesians: the ground whereof was not so much the love of the Goddess, as the greedy desire of that great profit, they reaped thereby: So here, the answer must be learned & judicious, that men may conform learnedly, and judiciously.

Not that I envy the Drs. Honor, or would diminish anything of his due, but I cannot endure daubing, much less that the praise of men, should be advanced, to the prejudice of the truth. Laying aside therefore-all prejudice, & partiality, cast we the proceedings of the Repl: & Reioy. into the scales of righteous consideration, & where the blame most appears, let the Reader lay it on, & let-him bear it, to whom it is due by desert: And in this search, let no man think, I intend or seek the Rej. his dishonor, for my witness is in heaven, I do not; nay I dare not do it. I know the righteous judge would require it: but it is for the manifestation of truth, and innocence, where ever it is to be found.

That I may do the Doctor right then, I will set down the rules how far the failings of others may be laid open. 2. How far, & in what cases, some kind of tartnes, & sting of indignation may be expressed, in pen or speech, as allowable in holy writ.

That we may lay forth the limits of the farst, & see how far the compass of our Christian Commission reacheth in the discovery of others faults, we must wisely distinguish of Persons & Synnes that so we may not be deceived.

Persons then undergo many conditions, & relations: some are members of the same congregation, who have covenanted, to walk in the fellowship of the faith of the Gospel: Others are subjects of the same commonwealth only, professing the truth.

Both these again; are there repenting or pertinacious, & incorrigible sinners.

Synnes also are of sundry kynds some are private, some are public: both these again, are lesser scandals: or more heinous & Capitall Crymes, which threaten apparent hazard to the public good of a state, or the prosperous success of the Gospel: Now out of these distinctions, such conclusions may easily be collected, which may give answer to the first question, so far as concerns our purpose: & these be 3.

In private offenses, the rule of our Savior takes place: If thy Brother offend, tell him his fault betwixt him & thee alone, if he hear thee, thou hast gained thy Brother: if our admonition attain the end, in removing the evil, we need not then crave further help, from any other, to redress it. Beside, our Brother having regayned his honor by repenting, we should not cast the blott again upon him, by any fresh report.

2. If under private admonition, a Brother prove obstinate, & incorrigible, we may, & should publish, both person & fault to the congregation, as our Savior in that case enjoins it, as a duty to be discharged, & leaves it not to our freedom to omit: for the words run in force, & form a command: tell the Church.

3. If the offense be public, either left upon record in writing, & made so notorious to all that will attend, & read it: or acted in some sollemne assembly, or in open view before many witnesses, laying aside malice, & envy; which may stir us, or sinful and sinister ends, which may carry us hereunto, & spoil this, & the best service. Its very lawful, nay (in case) very necessary, to speak of such miscarriages, or write of them, as occasion may require, & that with out all breach of love: whether we look at others, who are but standers by, That they may not be scandalized, infected, or plucked away by the error of men: Or if we look at the offenders them selves, by way of Caution, & wholesome prevention, we stopp the poison of their practice, that so they do no more harm to others; nor bring anymore guilt upon their own souls: then which what greater love and mercy can be shown, to our fellow Brethren?

And out of this ground, and after this manner it is, that we shall bring some of the Doctors miscarriages to consideration, and present them to the view of the Reader: but such only, which he himself hath made open and notorious, either by writing or practice: and that for this end alone, that the false colors which he hath putt upon his course, and proceedings, may not prejudice the truth in in the hearts, or judgments of the ignorant, and unwary Readers; or any that are willing to declyne, who would very fain have the Doctors words without control, that so they might follow him without fear, and this may suffice for answer to the first question, & the warrant for our way to walk in.

The second admitts satisfaction in short: to wit How far & in what cases, some kind of tartnes may be expressed in pen or speech.

Ans: there be two instances in Scripture, which are plain & pregnant to this purpose, & left for our direction in this case.

The first is the behavior of Elias, towards Idolaters & their Idolatrous practices whom he jeares to their faces, & out of a holy kind of indignation, s•igs with a bitter & a deriding Irony. For so the 〈◊〉 : And it came to pass at noon, that Elijah mocked them, & said cry aloud, for he is a God, either he is talking, or is pursuing, or he is in a journey, & peradventure he sleepeth, & must be awakened: And hence it is, the Lord casts such loathsome terms of detestation, upon the Idol, that he besparckles the worshippers thereof with disdain.

The second instance is touching ambitious false teachers, or Idol shepherds. So Isaiah, his watchmen are blind, they are dumb dogs, they cannot bark, they are greedy dogs, they can never have enough. So the Apost. Paul gyrd the consciences, of those silken Doctors of Corynth, & their followers; which slighted the simplicity of the Gospel 1. Cor: 4.10. we are fools for Christ, & ye are wise in Christ; we are weak, & ye are Strong; ye are honorable, & we are despised; These tart Ironical speeches stable the heart, with a secret disdain, of their groundless, & ambitious folly: And indeed when the Lord enjoins it as a duty, & makes it a note, & argument of a happy man, that a vile person is contemned in his eyes; what expression of words, can suit such a contempt in the heart, unless they carry some tartnes of di•dayne with them.

We now see our limitts & allowance: let the judicious Reader according to this rule, consider of some Keene passages of the Reply: and I suppose it will be found, that the most of thē, if not all, are pointed against the unwarrantable standings, & places, the intolerable, & ambitious courses of our Prelates, or else their seeming & self-deceiving arguments.

If in any he hath exceeded the bounds of sobriety, I profess, neither to defend, nor excuse it, I know the Replier himself will not allow it: For he hath silenced, all such expressions in this second Reply: though he had never so just cause, to provoke him thereunto, & never so great advantage given him by the miserable mistakes of the Rej. in many places: which if the Rej. had found in him, (He that can haulke after words with such eagernes) we should have had exclamations, Proclamations, & outcries enough to have filled up a wordy & windy volume.

How ever, was the Reply: never so worthy, to have the reproach of scurrility cast upon him, or his work; the Rey; was most unworthy & unfit te do it, who hath, (I dare say) much exceeded in this kind: How unseemly is it, & how ill sounds it, to hear thieves complain of Robbers, harlots of adulteresses. The proverb is homely, but true: its a hard world, when heerring-men revile fisher-men. For proof whereof, I appeal to thine eyes to be witnesses Christian Reader. And that I may proceed, according to Allegata probata, I will not look beyond my line: Only that picture which the Rej. hath made of himself, I judge it not only lawful, but in this case necessary to present again to his view; that the world may know, & if God will, Doctor Burgess also, may know himself, & what his spleen hath been, against the people of the most High God, blessed forever.

A taste of the tartnes of Doctor Burgess his Spirit, in the several passages of his answer.

This tartnes will appear in 3. kinds.

- 1. His heavy Censures, and that, of the very hearts, & consciences of men.
- 2. His open reviling of the persons of the nō conformists: or secret inducements to bring them into distaste:
- 3. His Keene & scornful jests, which are his pastime, frequently expressed through the wholl.

Heavy Censures.

1. They who tell us, that all the Church may do touching rites is: but the application of circumstances, which are in nature, Civil: Adding that the Church may not ordain any Ceremony: merely Ecclesiastical; do Manifest a spirit which lusteth after contradiction p. 37 of manuduc.

In the answer.

2. If it seem so to him indeed: God hath smitten his contentious spirit, with Giddines: for who but a man forsaken of all wisdom. &c. 62. p.

3. The Convocation house is not so likely to conclude &c. as this Libeller, is to come to shame for his factious, & intolerable comparison, unless God humble him. p. 62.

4. For whosoever thinks not as (they) must either be condemned of gross corruption, or excused, as having some good meaning: yet much weakness with all, scil. in (comparison of them) And this pride makes them so scornful: p. 65.

5. It is so palpably false, that I should hardly believe, any Friar durst have set it down in print: p. 67.

6. And see how these men that talk & write in so haughty, & magistrall a fashion, do but gull, & deceive them with the names of worthy men.

Which is so great & shameful a sin, & in this Replier, so frequent, that I wonder he dares dispute about Ceremony: before he have learned the substance of common honesty: p. 83. in his alligations.

7. How can you believe any truth, cross to your opinion? when as you seek glory one of another, & presume of your new traditions, as if the spirit of truth came to you, or from you alone. p. 103.

8. As for terms of excrements, which he would be loath, one should apply to the hair of his head, It savoreth of a spirit of rancor, as doth the like Foule speech, in the Scotch Dialogue. God will judge them for these reproaches, by which they labor, to breed scorn, and abhorring of these, in the minds of ignorant men. p. 131.

9. This flim-flam Master Jacob lent you, and both he, and you take it up, merely for a shift, Not out of conscience, or judgment; but of hauty desire of defending, what you have once spoke. 207.

10. This Replier (in a common course) giving the name of a good Christian, to some unconformable. The Rej. breaks out into these words. This Addition savores Strongly of that spirit of separation, which hath been hunted after, in the chase of unconformity.

For this shows, that with these men the adversaries of Ceremonies & Bish. are the only good Christians. p. 216.

11. Doth this Repl. & such as he, who without law, without calling, without reason, without conscience, do smite with their touns, and condemn to the put of darkness, •he Bish. & the conformed Ministers, & in a manner, all that are not of th•ir party. 216. pa:

12. Nor is it rightly taken up, that these men are counted factious, for neglect of Ceremonious Canons, upon conscience, but for stiff opposition to Ecclesiastical laws, which they despitefully speak, & write against, & for contempt of these statute laws, by which the book of common prayer is established. For that they draw (as fast as they can) into a body of themselves, ingrossing a forehead, the name of brethren, The Godly, the Church, the good Christians, as though we had lost our Christ, & they had found him quite away: 222: pag:

13. The tearing of our Ceremony: Popish, is done out of faction, & to make the imposers, & Observers of them, hateful with the people of God, which I believe no Church would suffer, I am sure it should not: pag: 238.

14. This man forceth his wit, & I fear his conscience also, & doth not believe himself, when he saith, that these Ceremony. are imposed as parts of Gods worship; but only for faction & opposition, would fain have it thought so, that their opposition might be justified before men. 243. p.

15. For a wrangling spirit; yea an ill conscience, is so plainly to be observed, while he studies to persuade, what himself believes not. 243.

16. But what should I press these men, with the authority of men, who have themselves in estimation, for soundness of judgment, before all men. p. 370.

17. But the Repl. seeing no interpretation will help against the clear Testimonies of the Learned, by us alleged, confesseth they were men, (as if he, & his partners were more than men!) & that there is a little variety. So willing are men rather to cast dirt in the faces of others, then to confess any mistaking in themselves. Is this anything, but the spirit of pride, thus masterly to judge the Lord's worthies? 387. p.

18. This answer you think good to give: because you are resolved to sink the reputation of all men, ancient or latter, how learned, & zealous soever they were, rather then to confess your own mistaking.

Open Revilings of the Persons of Non-conformitants: or secret inducements to bring them into distaste.

In 52. pag: of the Praeface: some Noncōformists are brought in, & said to be of that temper: that when the remove all of Ceremony. only was mentioned: Their answer was.

They must not have a hoof-behind them: And the note in the Margent tells us.

- 1. This S^r Fran: Walsingham told M^r: Knewstubs, of whom I had it.
- 2. It is a ridiculous supposition; its a malicious surmise; all this scurrilous bundle is of no use, unless it be to ingraft himself, into the affections, (which he calleth the consciences) and applause of his own party. p. 633. Preface.
- 3. These two notes, note you to be an egregious wrangler. p. 6.
- 4. Did ever sober-man reason thus? p. 61.
- 5. I should be sory to find so much waywardness, & falsehood, in any man of our Religion; but cannot but wonder at it, ina man pretending more then ordinary sincerity p. 15.

- 6. How ever these men, who in effect say to all other men, stand back, I am more holy then thou, &c.
- 7. What a shame is it for men to glory of sincerity, for refusing Ceremony. And use no sincerity in alleging authors, 284.
- 8. But that use which the learned divines call Historical, these men call Religious, that they might by a false ear-mark, bring us into suspicion abroad, & into hatred wiht our Religious people at home, and yet they would be counted sincere men. 303.

Certain Quaeres, by which these passages may be weighed, in the balance of serious consideration.

Of all, in general, the quaeres are these: 1. If the Replier did anywhere give sentence of conformists consciences? 2. If he uttered any one bitter speech against all Conformists? 3. The former being negatively true, if the Rejoyner (in his over & under-lashings) was not overcome of his own evil, rather then the Repliers?

Quaere. 1.

1. If a man upon probability affirm such a point, or out of ignorance & mistake, conclude it certain, & so relate it, as by him conceived, doth he hereby necessarily manifest a spirit of contradiction, or the weakness of his own apprehension?

2. If charity hopes the best, that can be conceived in reason, to judge men's spirits by grounds weak, & feeble, out of which nothing can be concluded.

Quaere, whether it be not uncharitable censuring?

3. Do all those who contradict the like conceits of the Rej: as false, manifest a sinful spirit in lusting after contradiction?

Quaere 2.

Whether may not a man mistake a thing plain, & be of no contentious spirit?

Whether in such a mistake, is it certain God smites with giddines?

Whether is not this to judge men's consciences, beyond warrant of any word of God, or the nature of the work will bear?

But is not this, not only unreasonable, but intolerable, if the thing be true?

Quaere 3.

1. Whether these words come from a calm loving & merciful spirit?

2. Whether God may not abate a man, for his falls in executing judgments here: or may lay many punishments on him beside open shame?

3. Whether these definitive determinations of judgments upon men, for some light differences, & those not so clear, be not to jussle God out of the place of justice: & to cast thunderbolts where he doth not?

But if the replier make his expression good by his defense, as he hath; is not this a strange censure, upon so small a thing, & so strange a mistake?

Quaere 4.

Whether this charge issues not out of a principle, desirous to make the Persons of non conformists, odious to all, proclaiming them as such, whose intolerable pride, scorns & contemns, all men in regard of themselves?

Whether the Rej. his passion did not transport him beyond himself in this accusation, when it makes him contradict his own confession? preface: p. 5.

Ther be some moderate learned, Godly, loving. &c.

Whether his spleen is not great that would spare none, but even destroy the Nation of Nonconformists, in the esteem of men: As Haman the Jews? For of all he speaks: They: Them.

Quaere 5.

Whether he be not more charitable to Friars, then Nonconformists since he knows, what they have printed?

Quaere 6.

Whether if this Repl. was faulty, was it reasonable to fly in the face of all Nonconformists?
These men.

Whether the Rej. his conscience in cold blood dare say, that their is not amongst the NonConformists, the truth of worthiness, but only the names?

When in his preface he thus writes p. 3. some peaceable & very Worthy Ministers were cast out.

Quaere 7.

Whether they that cannot entertain truth cross to their opinion, & seek honor one from another, can have any truth of grace? our savior seems to gainsay it 5. John. And therefore Whether there be any color of argument, for the Rej. to condemn all Nonconformists as such, whom this charge condemns?

Quaere 8.

Whether doth the vilefying of a relique which one conceaves superstitions, argues a spirit of rancor?

How came the Rej: to be sure, that God will judge them for these?

Whether may they not repent, & then God will pardon them, not judge them?

How if the relics be base & deserve to be scorned?

Quaere 9.

How knows the R^j: but they might do it out of ignorance, & an error of ignorance may stand with a good conscience?

How knows the Rej: that it was a haughty desire, & no other passion?

But if all this be maintained, is not the Rej: extremely harsh in his censures, when no room will serve him, unless he sit upon men's consciences, & Pilate-like condemn the innocent?

Quaere 10.

If one call a non-conformitant a good Christian, doth he express a strong savor of separation?

He that names a Non-conformitant a good Christian, doth he conclude, that the adversaries to the Bish. are the only Christians?

Quaere whether reason, or passion against all color of reason, make these consequences? And whether the Rej. would suffer us to make the like out of his words, when he calleth Conformists: the faithful servants of Christ, as he doth pag: 628.

Quaere 11.

Would not the Rej. make Nonconformitants monsters of men, who shall commit so capital a sin, as condemnation of mē to Hell: & being void of law, calling, reason, conscience; in sodoing?

Where doth this Repl: condemn all that are not his party, or all conformed ministers?

•ay if neither he, nor any 〈1 page duplicate〉 〈1 page duplicate〉 Non-conformitant ever writ, spake, printed; nay thought so unreasonably: quaere: whence such an accusatiō comes, & what ground it argues, which exceeds the bounds of truth, or reason; yea common sense?

Quaere 12.13.

Whether these hundreds of ministers silenced at the beginning of K. I. were spiteful speakers against the cerem: or conscionable forbearers of their use?

Whether these, who desire to subscribe according to law, be despisers of the law, or those who deny them the benefit of it?

Where is that body, into which the Non-conformitants gather them selves?

How appears it, that they ever engrossed such Titles to them selves, so as to deny them to all others: or more then the Rej. engrosseth the title of the faithful servants of Christ, unto conformists, pag? 628.

Whether this imputation be not to bring them into hatred & distaste of the state?

Whether ever profane drunkards, riotous adulterers, scoffing Atheists, or the bitterest of the Jesuits, geared more tauntingly against many faithful? And is it not loathsome to lick up their vomits? For the worst of men, have not worse language, against the Nonconformists.

Quaere 14.15.

Whether the Rej. can judge of a man's heart any other way thē by his expressions outward?

Since the Repl: professions & expressions are plain one way, by what warrant can the Rej. conclude his conscience is other. Neither word, nor reason, nor love, nor Religion, learns or allows such inferences: what is the principle whence these proceed?

16. Quaere.

Whether any man, truly humble, & gracious, can prefer himself before all men?

Whether the Rej. accounts all Nonconformists, void of all truth of grace, when he layeth this to their charge?

17. Quaere.

Whether he that says the Auncients were men, doth thereby infer, that he himself is more than a man?

Whether to affirm the Fathers to be men, is masterly to judge them, or argues a Spirit of pride; when they them selves, so judge, & speak of themselves?

Whether to affirm the Auncients to be men, argues a man resolved to sink all men's reputation, how holy & zealous soever they be, rather than to confess his own mistake?

Quaere 18.

Whether there can be a heavier charge laid against a man than rotten hearted & unfit to live in the society of men? And yet what lighter ground, & more insufficient can be pretended to bear it up?

Quaere. 19.

What if no man should have known, what Mr. Knewstubbs told D^r. B: in private, conceaving him of the same judgment? ergo Quaere.

Whether it be safe for fellow brethren, to betrust their secrets to the Rej. his keeping?

2. Whether the Rej. did not rake up all the blind corners of his memory, to fetch out what might be, to bring Nonconformers into distaste?

Quaere. 20.

Whether this be not downeright railing?

Quaere 5.6.7.8.

Whether the Pharisees, in their Ceremonies, did not praetend more holiness, then other men? And whether Conformists be not therein more like the Pharisees, then Non-conformists?

Whether this be not to leave the Persons, & to gibe at sincerity itself?

Whether do the professed enemies against the power of godliness, use any other language, when they would jeare at the sincerity of God's servants?

Is not some historical use, Religious? what want of sincerity then is it, to distinguish that historical use of images, which is to stir up devotion, from other civil use, by the term Religious? Nay what sincerity is there, in branding such a declaration with a false affected ear-mark?

His tart jests & taunts are not as grains of salt, but so frequent, that they seem as Pickle, in which the passages of his book are laid to steep, & therefore I will but point at some number of places, to ease the reader, & myself.

P. Ag. 71. lyn: Praeface. pa. 14. lie. 29. pa. 19. pa. 33. lie. 22. pa. 15. lie. 1.2.11. pa. 37. lie. 24.25. And he not only takes, but seeks an occasion: yea is content to go some miles about, to reach men a blow, who were of Godlines & worth, by some slighting taunt to disparage their persons, or works.

That judicious & paynfull laborer, & faithful servant of Christ he slights, on this manner: M^r Parkars Gaudye & passionate treatise of the cross. A work in truth, of that strength, & beauty, that it bleares & dazells the eyes of envy itself. And therefore men out of hope, either to imitate it, or answer it, would bear the world in hand, it was not worth the while to spend labor in it.

But the Rej. wisheth, some would reduce it to Logical arguments: & then he doubts not, but it would soon be answered.

Which is such a mere put-of, & so unbeseeing the skill of a Logical disputer, much more the champion-like confidence of Doctor Burgess, that had not his heart secretly misgiven him, in this seeming bravado, such an expression would never have fallen from his pen.

For let any rational man be judge in this case. Are not Logical arguments plainly expressed in a continued discourse, & by a Logician easily collected? & what needs a reducing to a form then?

Beside M^r Parkars discourse is either empty, & void of sinews of sound reason, & then the weakness of it, is soon discovered, & may be confuted; yea disgraced with more ease; or else there be arguments, of that solidity, & strength, which either the Rej. cannot reduce, or else is not able, or not willing to answer. To say he cannot reduce thē to form, is a thing too mean to imagine, nor will the Rej. grant, nor will I, or do I think. To say he is not willing to answer, is to gaynsay his own course, the profession of his care, to traverse this cause, & his love to our Ceremony: & the peace of our Church, so much pretended in his answer.

The third therefore must be concluded, for I do not see what fourth thing can be given.

Only, Did ever any answerer, serious & judicious, amongst Divines, of any kind, Protestant Papist, Lutheran, propound such conditions, did ever any grant such? nay is it not to common sense ridiculous? For any Lutheran to send to a Calvinist, any Protestant to a Papist, having printed some serious treatise against them, to send I say this message; well: you have printed a treatise here, & you place some, yea great confidence in it: if you will (reduce it into sillogismes,) you shall be soon answered, & that there is nothing but bumbast, & painted vermilion putt upon it? Spectatum admissi risum? Would not the Papists laugh in there sleeves, at such an answer, I will say no more: but only propound this form to the Rej. & save him a labor to reduce it.

He that propounds such terms of answer, which never were yet asked, or granted, & indeed are unreasonable to yield: professeth he cannot make an answer, being willing thereunto.

But such terms the Rej. craves. The like jirkes he lends to M^r. Jacob, p. 16. To Godly learned Fenner. p. 38.

And he hath such a mind to chide, that upon the occasional mentioning of one word excrement, he fetcheth a vagary into Scotland, as it were, & sits in judgment upon the Author of the Scotch dialogue: pa. 131. l. 20. without any confutation of any ground, which I suppose had better suited his place, being an answerer, and not a judge.

In like sort, he vilifies M^r. Bradshaw: A pamphlet of things indifferent of M^r. Bradshaw. pa. 188. (your M^r. Bradshaw) Whom we are not ashamed to own, & suppose the Doctor would have been afraid to have grappled with him, in an arg; had he been alive.

Venerable M^r. Cartwright he taketh up sometime, as if he had written upon prejudice, without judgemēt. Thus much I thought good, to add in short, to wipe away that supercilious disdain, cast here by the Doctor upon divers of the Lord's dear servants; many thousands of whom together, he accuseth after of stupidity, or prejudice, even all that allow not of Organs, in Divine service, or Psalms-singing. We shall now summarily point at the rest of the places, as an inventory or treasury of the Rej. taunts p. 47. l. 22. p. 50. l. 7.8. p. 52. l. 33.34.35. p. 55. l. 26. p. 113. l. 32. p. 120. l. 12. p. 130. l. 10. p. 141. l. last. p. 180. l. 32. p. 182. l. 16 17. p. 213. l. 18. p. 247. l. 21.22. p. 312. l. 6.7. p. 315. l. 11.12. p. 316. l. 10.

These are some of the many common places of scoffs, to be found in his book, & are all contained within the compass of the three first chapters. as for the last, I had neither leysure, nor list, to trouble thee good reader, or myself, with writing them out.

Only to give thee a guess, how prittily the Rej. can play with words, find himself talk, & fill up pages: I shall take so much pains, as to transcribe a place or two: Thus he writes. p. 66.

So this & those rules after added, are as the proverb is, like a rope & butter, that if the one slip; the other may hold: So again.

p. 73. The truth is: M^r. Jacob could never get over the block, which M^r. Cartwright, & the Admonitors had laid in his way (how ever M^r. Cartwright himself a man of more activity, made a shift to leap over it) namely thus: What soever is not commanded in the word, must not be in the Church:

And yet M^r. Jacob, that he might seem to hold fair quarter with M^r. Cartwright, & other learned Divines, who acknowledge, that certain Ecclesiastical rites & Ceremony: appropriated to holy actions, were left to the determination of the Church, under some general rules of the word, will seem to allow somewhat, he cannot tell what, some circumstances only civil, or occasional, as the time & place, which he rather calleth circumstances, then Ceremony: that so, if any shall say, he alloweth nothing to the Churches determination, to be squared, by some rules: He may answer for himself & say: yes, certain circumstances are; namely such as are necessary in civil, as well as sacred actions. If on the other side, one challenge him to give some liberty to men, for the ordaining of rites, which are but extrinsical circumstances about the worship of God: He may answer for himself, he hath protested against all mere Ecclesiastical Rites, which are ordained by men, & not left so much as one, to their determination.

Thus, as he, that by turning of his picture of an horse, made it running, or a tumbling horse, which you would: So hath M^r. Jacob provided for himself, there to square some circumstances, by 4. rules, or to put of all by another, as the market shall require.

This is the substance (Christian Reader) of a whole page almost: Touching which I would propound these Quaeres to thy consideration.

Whether it was not easy to make up a massy volume with such talk as this?

2. If a man should set down such like passages word for word, & add an answer suitable, filled with such wind, would it not rather be accounted, & that justly, a blotting of paper, & abusing the reader, then rendering an answer of any worth & satisfaction?

And by the survey of these particulars, collected out of the three first chapters, & comparing the Reply therewith, I am confident, it will soon appear, to any not forstalled with prejudice, whether the reply, or answer, m^y most justly challenge & bear the name of scurrilous? And it will be as evident that the Rej. had no cause to accuse the Repl. of scurrility, unless he would condemn himself not only, of the same crime; but of somewhat beside far more sinful. For, though it be easily incident, I confess, to our corrupt natures, out of a pange of pride & passion, to cast unbrotherly contempt upon such, who seem to cross us in our opinions, & practices, when it comes to point of opposition, bewixt some particular men & ourselves; yet to vent such a mass of venom, in heavy censures, harsh Revilings, slighting scorns, & that not against one particular, which may appear in competition, & opposition against us, but even against the generation of those, which refuse human Ceremonies in Divine worship, many whereof, our pennis, & consciences acknowledge worthy & Godly; Nay not only to vent these expressions, but to keep them souring, & leavening by us, in our hearts, & writings, many years, wherein we have been persuaded by friends, & after persuasions resolved, rather to have thē burned by others, or to burn them ourselves; And yet after all this in cold blood, in saddest consideration, upon review, so far to approve of thē, as to print & publish them to the world; How such a man's spirit is principled? & whether it was a root of bitternes, or Godlines, whence such things issue: I leave it to the Almighty to judge, & to the wise hearted to discern.

These be the witnesses, which I have to produce out of the Rej. his own writings. All that I desire is, that their depositions may be impartially weighed, & in this desire, & endeavor, there is no wrong done to any rule of piety or charity.

We have also the Rej. his open practice, as an apparent evidence, to contradict what himself professeth in his Praeface, touching the constancy of his opinion, about the inconveniency only of these Ceremony: however he bears the world in hand to the contrary, & that with great confidence: To which purpose, we entreat the following Allegations may be indifferently heard, from those, who as witnesses can testify his walking by their experience.

That faithful servant of Christ, M^r. Arthur Hildersham, now at rest with God, upon his sick bed, with great regrate & grief, thus expressed himself to a fellow Brother; Doctor Burgess his conscience knows, that I know he speaks untruly. And that it may appear, these words were neither spoken passionately by him, nor forged by me; he hath left the proof of them, under his own hand upon record, which I now have by me, & shall be bold, for fuller satisfaction, to set down his own mind in his own words.

In the 19. pag. of the Praeface: The Rej. expresseth himself on this manner, I do ingeniously confess two errors in that my Apology; one that I trusted too much to the quotations of the Abridgement, which then I had in writing:

To which M^r. Hildersham thus replies in his notes: How false the quotations are in the Abridgement, will be seen hereafter. But this is manifestly false that he was (before the writing of his Apologye) deceived thereby, or that he had a Copy of it in writing before that time. For the Abridgement was not made till after he was deprived: & therefore no man could have any copy of it, either in print or writing. Nay the large book (where of it is an Abridgement,) was not delivered to his Majesty before that day he was deprived; & the Abridgement was made sundry months after. He proceeds Ibid: 19. p. Its true that the Ministers were resolved to have chosen him for one of those three, that should have disputed for them, (such profession he had made unto them of his full consent with them in judgment,) & he had been one of the disputants, if that (not the Dean of the Chapel; but) the King himself, had not expressly (in his message) excepted against him: which also argues, that his Majesty did hold him to be fully of the mind, that the rest (who had sent him the foresaid book) were of.

In his notes of the 20. pag: he hath these words. That there is no color of truth in this that he saith here: i. e. (That when he was chosen to be one of those, that should maintain their cause by disputation, he professed to his Brethren, that he could not speak against the things as unlawful; but only as inconvenient) may appear evidently to any reasonable man. For seeing they had in their book delivered to his Majesty our Kings Father, stated the question not against the inconveniency, but the unlawfulness of these things. Who will imagine, they would ever have chosen him to be one of the 3 to dispute for them, if he had professed to them at that time, that he had nothing to say against the unlawfulness of them? These be the dying words of that dear servant of God, as I have them to show in black & white.

If yet the witness of the dead deserve no credit: The Rej. may with some small consideration, recall to mind, how after the Revolt, or change of his former opinion, in an occasional concurrence & meeting of many fellow Brethren; when they out of human Civility desired him to take his place according to his years & gifts; I say, he may (if he will bethink himself) easily recall, what words he then openly uttered to this, or like effect: He told thē he was unworthy to sitt with them; to have respect from thē, since he had betrayed them, & their cause. Now the cause which they mayntayned was not inconveniency: but unlawfulness in these things. If the Rej. his memory serve him not about this particular, let him repair to Bambury side to his ancient friends there, & they can testify so much to his face. If then the construction that the King, & state, made of his course, the apprehension his fellow Brethren had of his practice: nay his own profession may be trusted: Lett all the world, & D^r. Burgess his own heart judge, whether he hath changed his opinion yea, or no?

In his preface, there is not much that expects answer. For to omit his biting language, & devouring words, where with we have cloyed the Reader in the foregoing Catalogue, and unto which rank many Gibes here may be referred: as That pag. 5. These do commonly call any small company of their party: The Church & the Christians of such a town. As if Christ were (I say not divided amongst us) but wholly taken away from us, to them, & what wants this of Schism in the heart, And that: pa. 9. The glory of suffering for (as they call it) the good cause: And that pa. 12. Others aim at Schism & Anabaptistical delusions: to lett pass these pangs of spleen, & other distempered carriages, which he himself cast upon some passionate people & Strongly conceited. All which being justly blamed, it neither hurts the cause against which he writes, nor helps that which he defends, since the most glorious Gospel of Christ hath such blotts cast upon it, by reason of the sinful weaknesses of some, who take up the profession thereof; Leaving (I say) all these, as not worthy the consideration, we shall entreat the Rej. at his return to give some satisfaction to these quaeres.

1. Why Atheists, Papists, profane varletts, brutish drunkards hellish blasphemers, together with the accursed crew of the most riotous wretches; yea the Generation of Newtralist, moral formalists, ignorant sotts of all sorts, are so zealous for these Ceremony. Are so violent to urge, so careful to practice them, who never had care of piety in all their lives?
2. After the Lord, hath cast in some saving illumination into the mind, convicted the conscience, & converted the hearts of scandalous sinners; after such have gained sweet peace of conscience, & assured evidence of God's love, sealed unto their souls; why do the hearts of such, rise in some strong indignation against these Popish relics; when they have never been persuaded thereunto by teachers, nor had time from their own inward troubles, to consider of them? That this is the disposition of many, I can speak by proof, I would have the Rej. speak to the reason of it.
3. When it is notorious to all the English world, that the most of the people (who live in the bosom of the Church, & profess the faith) be wholly taken up with conformity, both approving & practicing of it, countenancing those that do it: Why is the Doctor so troubled, that a few silly despicable people, void of wisdom (nay if his former charges be true) void of grace, should distaste the Ceremonies; when I know no Judicious Non-conformer, is disquieted that the crowde of the formal Gospellers should embrace them? while the Rej. is searching the reason of these things, it may chance, he may either search or see his own heart somewhat more clearly. Leaving then these to his consideration. Proceed we a little to survey the preface, & the substance of it may be referred to three heads. 1. He chargeth Non-conformity to because of many mischeifes. 2. He debates the cure, & administereth that, which he conceived most meet for redress. 3. He makes a defense for himself, & writing: Agaynst all which we eycept thus.

- 1. That his charge is not just.
- 2. His dealing in the cure not plain & through.
- 3. His defense in that where the stress lies, either not equal, or not sufficient.

Come we to skanne the particulars: The mischiefs, which he conceives to issue from Non-conformity are no less then Seperation & profaneness. A heavy charge, I confess, but the best is, his reasons have not the wait of a rush.

1. That of separation, p. 5. is supported upon so slender a ground, that he bewrays only his desire to have surpassed his power: therefore Rhetoricates instead of reasoning. If these (saith he) be Idolatrous will worships; how can you? how dare you join with us, in those acts of Religion wherein these are used?

Wherein he neither concludeth the question, because a man may refuse to join in such acts, without sepea <...> or utter condemning & renouncing all Church-•ommunion: Neither doth he prove that, which he con•cludeth about joining in such acts, by any other argument •ut only by how can you, how dare you? To which • answer, we so can, & darejoyne in good acts, to which •omthing perticipating of Idolatry is added, as Christ (our •eacher) & his Apost: did join in the Iewesworship, unto which were added many superstitions, as unlawful, as •ve had our Ceremony: Nay I will add one thing further, •hat, if D.B. be resolute in this point, i.e. that he must •perate from all Churches, & Church actions, in •which any superstition is exercised; then he must be one of the greatest Seperatists in the world. For •e holding error of judgment to be superstition, & those •uperstitious Brethrē, that abstain for conscience sake •rom things lawful, though only upon error in judge•ent: must upon the former ground separate frō all those Churches in whose Religious acts, anything in his jud•ement lawful, is so abstained from; & much more if •ny thing in his opinion unlawful, be put in practice: •rom one of which faults, few or no Churches will be •ound wholly free. Yet I would have another opinion •f D. B. & think, that though he hold bowing to •he altar, to be superstitious or Idolatrous, yet would he not therefore separate from the good prayers, that follow that ridiculous Ape of Idolatry.

That Other charge of profaneness p. 6. pretended to come from praecisenes, is so strange a consequence, that it can hardly with deliberation, be fathered upon Non-conformity, without Non-conscience.

For strictness in matters of Ceremony. hath no more force, to bring forth loosenes in matters of substance; then zeal in matters of faith, & charity hath to bring forth carelessness of both, nay then pure Religion hath, to breed Atheism.

Go we to experience: view the places where Non-conformists live; the people whom they teach▪ the ways of those with whom they walk; who they be that have reference to, & dependence upo• their persons, or ministeryes; & I suppose the walls of the Churches, & the stones of the streets, will give testimony against this accusation. Nay I suppose, I may speak it truly, as I profess, I think it, that someone Non-conformable minister, hath been a means under God, to bring more souls to grace & heaven; then all the Cloisters, or Cathedrals in all England in the same time, where all Conformity hath been the daily diet, & liuelehood, of the people.

Go we to reason: the best that either the Rej. or any beside, can make of our Ceremony: is, that they are things indifferent. Now that weak ones may doubt & stagger about such, That doubting, they ought not to practice them 14. Rom: last verse: is made a duty. That men's walking according to conscience, should be the cause of others disobedience; That keeping the law, should be an occasion in itself of profaning the law; that stopping the very appearance of the least evil, should set open a gappe to the greatest; I appeal to any reasonable man whether it be not a consequence void of common sense, unless men have a miraculous skill to soder quicksilver, or tysande together, or make heaven & earth meet!

Last of all, it is remarkable that Doctor Burgess himself pa. 8. doth impute these mischeifes unto civil war about Ceremonies: which if it be well weighed, it will manifest too much prejudice, in his former discourse. For in Civil wars, the mischiefs ensuing on them, are not wont to be charged upon one part alone, & that poor, passive, overpowered, obnoxious to the suffering of what-soever pressures their opposites please to lay upon them, which is the Case of the Non-conformists in these Commotions: Tell us I pray yow, if in your conscience, the Prelates Canons, courses, Courts, & proceedings, have had no hand in working mischief? nay diverse of these mischeifes, which you have affectedly placed on the other side?

If non-residents, double treble beneficed men, unable, perverse, scandalous, half-Popish Ministers, have not had a finger in them? If those trumpetours, & drummers, who proclaim the innocence, & justness of our Prelates proceedings, have not brought something to the furtherance of these mischeifes? If you speak your conscience, it must needs say, yes; & so confess, it was your passion, not your judgment, that obtruded all upon Non-conformity.

The state of this war is this: we (as it becometh Christians) stand upon the sufficiency of Christ's institutions, for all kind of worship: and that exclusively, the word, (say we,) & nothing but the word, in matters of Religious worship. The Prelates rise up on the other side, & will needs have us allow, & use certain human Ceremonyes of Religion in our Christian worship. We desire to be excused, as houlding them unlawful. Christ we know: & all that cometh from him, we are ready to embrace. But these human Ceremony: in divine worship we know not, nor can have anything to do with them; upon this they make fierce war upon us, & yet by the pen of D. B. lay all the fault of this war, & the mischiefs of it, upon our backs. Now all ye that pass by, consider, & judge, what equity is used, in such dealing? They will say, all things are to be done decently & in order. To which we willingly consent, but allege again, that we cannot apprehend these Ceremony: to be necessary for order, & decency. They (as our Lord's) tell us, it is enough for our Consciences, that They esteem them so. Our Consciences tell us, this is to usurp the place of God, what can we say less, then that we will follow our Consciences, rather then their wills?

To conclude, the Rej. p. 285. maketh Circumcision lawful to be imposed, upon the same grounds, that our English Ceremony: stand on. Now if it should please our Prelates in a Convocation to apoynt, that all English men should consent to the cutting of their fore-skins, & denounce war upon those that should refuse this goodly Canon; was it not a grave Accusation, to lay all the mischiefs of such a war, upon those which would not conform to such a Ceremony? But the weakest must always go to the wall, & the Lamb must die for troubling the water, if it please the Lyon so to determine it.

We have done with the disease, & mischief together with the cause of it. We are now come to consider the Remedy the D^r administers: & we except against his dealing herein as not plain; nay not profitable, even by his own rules.

1. He deals not plainly. For making the Abolishing of the Ceremony: by authority, to be one, & the chief course for cure, as despayring to obtain that, he refuseth to persuade thereunto: Because forsooth: to judge what is most convenient, & to determine thereof, belongeth only to those, who together with power of doing what they shall well like, have judgment to make choice of the best way. Which is a weak and a very unworthy conceit. For. 1. D. B. cannot deny, that those, who impose, urge, and with capital punishments enforce these Ceremony: upon Christ's, Ministers and people, do therein abuse that authority, which they received for the procuring of the quietness, peace, & safety of those, that desire to serve God according to his word, & not for the troubling, vexing, & scandalizing of them, by opposing their mere wills, in Religious affairs, to men's Consciences: depending wholly and only upon God's Word; He cannot (I say) deny this to be a grievous sin of those in place, & yet refuseth seriously to admonish them of the same, being called to give counsel, & advise about this very cause:

2. It is to be supposed that worthy Ministers of the Gospel, are not destitute of wisdom, and judgment concerning Religious affairs. By this reason therefore D. B. might as well have forborne to judge, what they should choose, as to determine so peremptorily thereof. Lastly, I would gladly know of D. B. whether the Scriptures be not able as well to make Magistrates, and Governoures, perfect to every good work, as they can do Ministers? whether; either Minister, or Magistrate should do, or ought to do anything, which God hath not commanded them? Whether a faithful Minister, in his office, ought not to understand, what that word reveals: ought not to teache all Magistrates what out of the word, he so understands? If all which particulars be plain & undeniable, it will appear that it belonged to D. B. being called to give counsel, declaratively to judge & determine, what was convenient to be done: which if he durst not declare, he durst not do his duty. And that I may fasten this nail yet more fully, I thus force the conclusion.

What ever duty of any calling, the word teacheth; that the Minister by the word ought to judge, determine, & deliver. Else how can he teach the wholl counsel of God? how can he give everyone his portion?

But the duties, and doings (if good) of all Magistrates the word teacheth.

Ergo the Minister ought to judge, & determyne of those, by the word, & so deliver them. Ergo it doth not belong to those only, who have power, & are in place, to judge & determine; which was the Doctors assertion.

Agayne: what ever God commands, that, and all that, the Minister should teach: & so judge, & determine, else the trumpet should give an uncertayne sound.

But what ever men, or Magistrates ought to do, that Christ hath commanded. Both the parts of the argument are in 28. Math: last v. therefore the conclusion follows: what ever men, or Magistrates ought to do, Ministers should teach, and consequently judge, and determine.

And as thus the Rej. dealt not plainly in his cure, •o whether hath be dealt profitably, in that his •ecept, is against his own rule; as it shall appear in •he scanning of his defense: Which we except against •s insufficient in those particulars, wherein the stress •nd weight of the plea lies: And those appear in •hree special objections he makes: the dynt of none of which, he is able to declayne.

The objections are pag. 12.13. & the sum of them •n short is, this writing stirs strife: ob. 2. exasperat•eh authority: Obj. 3. hinders the removal of the Ceremony: ob: 4.

Hear we now his defense to each of these, in order: To the first, he answers in truth by denial, that this course of his is so far from stirring the fire of contention, that its casting on water to quench •t: & to this also belongs that, p. 11. there is a neces•ity that some should speak for the cause, unless we shall suffer ourselves, not only to be rooted •ut of our livings, but which is worse, out of the hearts of our people, whom we serve in the Lord.

Ans: bare denial with-out reason, yields small relief to a cause, but when it is contrary to the wor• & itself, it betrays a cause, doth not defend it: & such is this.

1. It is contrary to the word, & that staple 〈◇〉 delivered by the Apostle, which he sets down, as station, & shelter for the weak in the faith to be take them selves unto. 14. Rom. 1. where the 〈◇〉 toleration of those, who are weak in the practice• things indifferent, is ever the ground of contention & disturbance in the Church. And therefore this cour•• of forbearance, he infers, 19. v. as the way to follow peace: sense teacheth it also: when a company of passengers are confined to one way to pass, or one door to enter, it causeth them to crowd & jussle.

2. This Denial is contrary to the Doctors ow• doctrine delivered in 3. pag. where its granted by him, and proved by the experience of thresco• years: that opposition begetts opposition, & th•• which was given to stir the humor, did only sharpen it. Putt we now the case to the Colledge• of Physicians; nay let D.B. himself be judge. Is it rational course? Or like to work a cure? that wh[•] the body hath been distempered many months wit[•] physic, we should still continue the same receipt[•] And its marvelous to see, how conviction wrests truth from a man, even against his own passion, & purpose. weigh these two passages, & see if they will accord?

The Doctor must write, that he may not be wrought out of the hearts of his people. pag. 11. And yet he confesseth by writing, he hath wrought himself out of the hearts of the godly.

His defense to the 2. obj: is yet more feeble, though more ingenious: For his answer is nothing but yielding the cause, in some compass and circumlocution of words.

For (1) when he graunts: that he forbore some years this course of writing, that he might not exasperate authority: he privily, yea plainly yields, the objection had such rational face in it, that it did not only press him, but prevail with him also: where as 2.^{lie} he adds: that by this means he hath some hope to persuade some to conform, & so to avoid the lash of authority. By this he doth not only yield the objection, but confirm & establish it. For if only those, who are persuaded by his answer, shall avoid the lash, therefore they who will not be persuaded, must expect the blow, and shall be sure to feel it.

3. He adds for his own intention: Sure I am that I desire not the vexation of any sober man: But his own bond will not be taken, because he hath so often broke his word; he must seek for other suretyes: (Quid verba audiam, cum facta videam?) Little power have words to persuade any of common understanding, when the practice goes the contrary way. Nor yet can I discern, how to judge of any man's desire, but only by his endeavor. Those heavy accusations, uncharitable censures, whereby he chargeth & that with much bitterness, the generation of Non-conformists, from what root they come, & what desire they imply, let any rational man determine: For it cannot be to ingratiate them, or procure favor for them, in the affections of the Governors, when he makes them appear such as deserve none; nay such as ought to receyve none, but the contrary at their hands.

Lastly when it is objected: That this course hinders the removeall of these things, which authority otherwise might possibly remove; His defense is; That he will never believe, that authority will remove them, with dishonor of it self, as yielding the things to be unlawful, which it hath so long mayntayned.

In which answer: these two particulars offer themselves to consideration.

- 1. To remove Ceremony: as unlawful, being long mayntayned is a dishoner to Authority.
- 2. D.B. beleives, authority will not thus dishonor itself.

Answ: The first of which is a most dangerous assertion; & is made a chief bar to stay Papists, & others from reforming of anything, that others have opposed, & they defended: And its usual in the mouth of false flatterers, & back friends to all reformation: & I would hope that D.B. did utter more in this, by his pen, then he meant in his heart. Beside the consequences are not so dangerous, but the ground is as weak For the long continuance, or maintenance of a thing, if evil & unlawful, is so far from bringing dishonor upon any, for the removeall of it, that retaining thereof, increaseth both his sin, & shame: & it argues a greater measure of humility & power of grace to abandon it.

Nay, were the thing lawful, if yet by circumstances it did appear, that God's Honor, the common good, the edification of our brethren, might more be promoted by the removal of it, though it were hoary headed with antiquity & continuance, it argued greatest love to God & man to alter it, rather than to keep it in use: & that would bring greatest honor to him that should so do; since by the verdict of God's Spirit, he is most honorable, that most honoreth God.

2. From these grounds, how rotten & unsavory the second particular of the Rej. his defense is, will easily be granted. For if in such a removal, the duty of Authority doth consist, the power of grace doth appear, the glory of God, & good of the Church & common wealth, will be advanced; To be of that belief with D. B. that Magistrates will never be brought to do what they ought, how uncharitable is it thus to lay their honor in the dust? And not to press them hereunto, when we may, & by our calling, ought, how unconscionable is it? And how contrary to that love we owe to the Almighty, & our Governors?

The crowd of objections, which he makes concerning himself, I conceive, as so many Strugglings of Spirit, which stood in the way, to withstand him in his course. His conscience, as it should seem, gave the consent, & let in some such intimations as these to him.

Why is not Popery coming in fast enough; but you must make a preparation thereunto: yea become a purveyor, & harbinger to make Roome, & lay in provision for it? Is it not sufficient, that the wicket is set open, that the Popish pack may be drawn in; but you must set open the great gate, that a Sumpter horse may amble in with a load of relics & Ceremony? For if the patent of the Church be so enlarged, to appoint Ceremony: at their pleasure, to admonish and teach, and it is in their power to appoint what, & how many, as seems good to them; why then let images be erected, let crosses & Crucifixes be set up in every corner. These are lawful admonitors, & instructors, & we cannot have too many good Companions, to putt us in mind of our duties.

Consider beside, how many poor Ministers are under pressure, some fled, some imprisoned, many suspended, themselves & families undone. Why will you not suffer them to lie in the dust, but will you trample upon them, even unto death? Is it not enough, they make brick, but must they be beaten also? Oh consider, as before the Lord, to whom you must give an account. Do you well to blow the fire in the Chymny, while the flame is in the thack? Is not the fury of the BB. yet fierce enough, their rage sharp enough, but you must set them on, and strengthen their hands, to strike harder? lastly, is not Cringing at Altars, bowing at the name of Jesus, like to be brought in, & practiced with great forwardness, & will you, dare you encourage, in such courses, yea give an approbation and commendation to them? For they will say, they are but significant Ceremony: they place no merit, putt no efficacy in them, only they are admonitors of our duties. Thus is the foundation of superstition laid, the Gospel Stopped, and an open way made for Popery, and you are the persuader, the encourager, yea defender of all these: how vill you answer this at the great day?

Yet do I not speak this, as though I were troubled, with the weight of anything he hath writ. For I profess unfaynedly the way of his traverse fynds welcome with me; wherein the nakedness, & indefensibleness of his cause I hope will be discovered. Only one thing I would most earnestly entreat, that he would show us but fair play in these proceedings: to wit, that he would not break our heads, while others have bound our hands: Lett him but grant us indifferent terms, even the common curtesy of the court, an impertiall pleading: we desire no more favor then the cause by its own credit will procure: Lett the larv be open, as the rigor of Justice allows: To which purpose shall he so far prevail with his Lord BB. that we may enjoy, the use of our books, the liberty of the press, & if not the benefit of our charges, yet freedom of breathing in our native soil, & with our poor desolate families; And I dare promise him he shall not want those, that will join issue with him, in this traverse, either by writing, or printing, & that without any gaudy expressions, (whereof he accuseth M^r. Parker) but by play dynt of Syllogism: & we will take our oaths, as he in desireth, that each man of us shall write his conscience. which I wonder why the D^r. putt in, since its openly known to all that will not shut their eyes, that all conscience doeth not live & die alone with conformable men. But if we neither have, nor he will procure us leave, or liberty, either to preach, or write, or print, yea scarce to live; then he must know, we are denied the benefitt of the law, & the Curtesy of the Court & in vain he braggs of his traverse.

To pursue all the particulars objected, & answered in his own beshalf, is not worth the while, since no weight of the cause lies there upon: Only one ravado here vented by the Rej. is not to be borne: which is observably set down in the 14. ob: D. Burgess. hath parted with more profitt, by taking up conformity, and a benefice, then any now in England hath done by his unconformity, and loss of a benefice. Surely he myndeth not so affectionately as he should, the affliction of his brethren. What did D. B. part with? Nothing but future, contingent, uncertayne profitt: which made him liable to be envied, and opposed by the college of phisitions; Profitt, which was not necessary to his life & being, depending upon extraordinary pains: such as in all probability, he could not have long endured, or at least with contentement of mind. His Pshisick practice made that change, which Tully commendeth in Merchandize: Satiata quaestu, vel contenta potius, ut saepe ex alto, in portum, sic ex ipso portu, se in agros possessionesque contulit. After sufficient gettings, it forsook both sea & sea-haven, and betook itself to quietness and plenty in the country.

On the other side, what have not? what do not men loose by unconformity? Even all their means of living; all their liberty, not only of providing for themselves, & their families; but even of breathing in any air, saving only that, which may be drawn out of stinking prisons. Nay sometime all the Commodity of their Country, or National habitation; being forced to fly even unto the indians for safety, to say nothing of their loss of life it self, by cruel imprisonments Now let our Savior judge betwixt us, & D.B. The poor widow (saith he) that parted but with two mites, parted with more then they did, who out of their plenty, parted with many sheckells, because those two mites were all that she had.

If this be true, then many & many a one hath parted with more profitt for Non-conformity, then D. B. did for Conformity, for soe much as they have parted with, all they had, & he only with part of that which he had, or might have hoped to get, superfluous in comparison of that, which others have lost. To conclude all, I suppose if we were willing to suffer, we should be more willing, both to search, & see the truth, & I doubt not, but the Lord would settle the hearts of such, & bless their indevoutors in that behalf. All that I would crave at thy hands (Christian reader) is this, that thou wouldest read without prejudice, and judge without partiality; judge not the person, or cause of the distressed the worse, because of their pressure or paucity.

Welcome Christ with his cross, any truth though with trouble. Be willing the truth should fall on any side as worthy to be prized & loved for it self. That is all I desire for my money: & Religion, conscience, reason will not deny this.

Rules for to direct the weak reader how to read the book with profit.

Where these abbreviations occur, D.B. signifies D^r. Burgess. Rej. signifies D^r. Burgess. Repl. notes the Replier. Def. signifieth D. Morton.

2. Because the Replier is forced to follow D^r. Burgess in his far fetched, & new coined definition, & the maze of the multitude of his distinctions, the weaker understanding will be at a loss, as not able to comprehend, or catch his meaning suddenly, & therefore, if I were worthy to advise, I would entreat such, to crave the help of some judicious Minister, who is faithful, not to betray him for having the book, but willing and able to inform him how to conceive of it aright.

The Replier his manner of writing being press & punctual, & therefor sets down so much of the Rejoynders words, as he conceived needful, if any difficulty arise therefrom, the Reader is to be entreated to consult with the answer at large.

A direction to the Reader.

THE author being constrained to be absent from the press, by reason of urgent occasions and being altogether destitute of any help from other, who were willing and able to correct the Impression (as it is the common Lott to poor men under pressures to be forsaken of friends and means) there be many faults escaped, in the printing, & some such, which pervert the sense, and will prejudice the truth, and Reader: and therefore he is to be entreated, before he read the book to mend the grosser mistakes with his pen: or else so attend and consider of them, that he may have recourse to them as occasion shall serve: the other faults which are of less consequence, common curtesy will easily pardon and pass by.

Faults escaped: thus to be corrected:

Many other flowers, of this sent, might have been gathered out of the Rej: his Garden. But I will not trouble the Reader with them: Because I perceive the Author of this Fresh Suit doth not much regard them. Nyether would I have noted these, but for the Rejoynders Bishoplike objecting of Scurrility to the Replier.

A manuduction to the following dispute.

ALTHOUGH it be but dead work, void of whetting pleasure or hope of great fruit, to spend much time, about human formalities, when as the divine substance of religion is in present danger, yet seeing the leaders of that course, which tendeth to this mischief, being themselves marched with a great part of their main body, through the fens and quagmyers of non residence, pluralities and ambition, towards the quicksands of Arminianism, popery and profaneness, have left these, as their pass and baggage to be kept and defended by men of good note, and worthy of better employment (such as D. B. is) to the amazing of many good fowls: It seemeth necessary to take into some consideration (though short, as such an unpleasant business doth require) what strength there is in these their new works: To proceed therefore in order.

CAP. I.

First touching the title of D. B. his reioynder.

In which two things are observable: First; that he styleth the reply a Pamphlet of a nameless author: in disgrace, as clearly appeareth in his second part, pag. 38. where he styleth not only the replyer, but many others, for this very cause, Libellers: But it cannot be esteemed any disgrace, for any writing upon just occasion, to want the name of the author, without involving, many excellent Divines, and divers pennmen also of holy Scripture, in the same blame. As for the term Pamphlet, I understand it, as noting a little contemptible writing: But the worth of a writing doth not consist, in bulk and belly, but in synewes, veins, and arteryes, which with good blood and spirits, may be couched into a little body: If he mean by Pamphlet the same which after, he expresseth in the term of scurrilous, that is as I take it, full of jesting, without respect of the persons: he hath to deal with. My answ: is: That if the Rep: had written to the convocation house, an Epistle with this Inscription, To the superstitious fathers of the Church of England: as the Def: entitleth his epistle to us, to his superstitions Brethren, (and yet this Rej: is not ashamed to adopt, this scurrility, and make it his own child, by maintaining of it, even against the very nature of D. Burgess) there had been more occasion of such a censure, then now is found, in all the Replye, as after shall appear.

The Repl: doth not anywhere to my remembrance, vilify the person of his adversary, but only his arguments, and answers, together with the vile courses of our Hierarchy, in which kind of jesting the Rej: his scurrility is far greater, then the Repl: saving the difference, which ariseth out of the outward greatness of Prelates, and the poor condition of them, which are oppressed by them. Now the Repl: is no admirer of B^s. persons, nether are disputations acquainted, with such court lāguage, as they are used unto: If it please your Lordship &c. but such is the condition of those, that have to do with Prelates, that they are usually censured either for scurrility, or flattery, and there is no doubt, but some will accuse the Rej: as much of flattery in blazing his Diocesans Admirable wisdom, as he doth the Repl: of scurrility, though I will not: Those who write against Prelates, are wont to expect such a censure from them & theirs. So Zwinglius in his Epistle touching the authors of sedition I doubt not, saith he, but there will be many, who having heard or read all these things, at length will be ready to say, what meant this scoffer? Calvin among others, was often accused of the same fault, not only by those, whom he calls usually, cornutos Episcopos, horned Bishops, but even by their diminutive aemulators among the Lutherans, his answer therefore unto Westphalus about this imputation may serve the Replier. It is easy for Ioachymus to object against me, the odious tarturs of unseemly scurrility, and slanderous bitterness of language, but it is as easy for me, to wipe away that calumny of his with one word &c. For what course should I take, since either the truth should have been betrayed in silence, or otherwise by an easy and toothless expression, the suspicion of fearfulness and distrust would have been discovered.

And in very deed, let any indifferent man judge, of <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> this imputation by any place of the Reply, where the Rej. noteth scurrility, and he shall find the Rej. him self, far more guilty: As for example pag. 63. in few lynes he may find these five terms packed together: It is a manifest untruth and calumny: It is a ridiculous supposition: It is a malicious surmise: It is a scurrilous bundle: It is to ingraft himself into affections which he calls consciences: These are baser terms, then are to be found in any one place, or (I think) in all the course of the Rep: And what is the occasion of them? forsooth, the Repl. said, the Prelates have power, to suspend, deprive, excommunicate nonconformists, at their pleasure: that the Defend: called for further help from Buckingham: that the Defend: may be acquired at a better Bishopric: In the former whereof, there is nothing said, which the Rej. could with color deny, before he himself had added for matter of accusation, interpretations of his own imagining: And in the last, there is nothing so much suspected of the defendant, D. B. himself knoweth, that it is scandalously true, almost of all Bishops, viz, that they aim at greater Bishoprics: But on the other side, what honesty is there, in adding unto the replyers words. Further then the Law of the State and Church require: And yet that also is true, de facto, though not de jure, that the Prelates take power to themselves, more then the laws require: What charity or religion is there in slighting the consciences of all that hold with the Repl? as if they pretended conscience upon perverse affections: What wisdom is there? in talking of the Repl. ambition, •o ingraft himself, into the affection of a few poor people, from whom he cannot expect either gain or worldly credit? This I am sure of, that the Repl. being twice putt out of all means of living, for that cause, never in those extremities gained from that party, the Rej. speaketh of, so much as the Emoluments of a tenn pound Prebendary, which the Rej. so much slighteth Pag. 15. As for his credit, until he either putt his name to his book, or seek by other means to have •it known, it cannot without injury be objected, that he sought it.

The other thing to be noted in Rej. title, is, that in opposition to a nameless Author, he nameth himself with such a name or title, as neither by our Prelates rules, nor by the Scriptures doth admit a good construction. Pastor of Sutton Coldfeild in Warwickshire, Our book of ordination acknowledgeth no such pastors, from whencealso it is, that in our convocation-church-language, we never hear of a Pastor of one Parish alone, None of our divines in the Synod of Dort, would take to themselves that tittle, though most others did in their subscription. D. Andrew's an ArchBishop in esteem, censureth this title for a Novelty. The names of Pastor and (in this sense also) of calling, are mere noveltyes, nor shall you read, that the Auncients ever styled in these terms, any, who take the charge of distinct parishes: The Scripture indeed doth warrant this title, even to D. Burgess, (and I do not detract it from him,) but not in such a manner as he taketh it: For where he writeth in defense of a Lord Bishop over that Diocese, where Sutton Coldfeild is contained, as a part: and every Ecclesiastical Bishop is a Pastor, he seemeth in one breath, to take and resign his pastoral office: If he say, that this variety is by human institution. D. Andrew's resp. ad Ep. 3. Moll. will take him up: It seems then, there is no divine right, in ordering the frame of the government of the Church, and then well-fare Amsterdam: which our Hierarchical men do so much traduce and despise. If he shall say, that one is a Lord Pastor, and the other a ministerial Pastor, inferior, and subordinate to him, especially in Jurisdiction, then I would have him consider, what D. Fulke saith against Allen, of the Popes pardons Pag. 381. God hath made all Pastors stewards of his household, and dispensers of his mysteries: And if every Pastor over his charge, be a steward of God's mysteries, why hath he not the Key of Jurisdiction over his parish, in as large and ample manner, as the Bishop hath over his Diocese, or the Pope? seeing the Keys are not given to one, but to unitye, as the fathers teach: why should the Bishops and the Pope have two Keys, and they but one: resolve these things (saith he to Allen, and I to D. B.) out of the Holy Scripture. It might be here also required how a faithful Pastor can defend a Bishop or Bishops, in obtruding human ceremonies upon that church, whereof he is pastor, and so partake in the obtruding of them. Certainly this is not agreeable, to the commissiō of Pastors, who are to teach only that, which Christ hath commanded to observe: Which I have commanded, Matth. 28. not what ye shall command or invent. Cajetan upon the place. Neither is it to preserve the Church, from the dominion of usurpers.

CAP. II. Of the rise and proceeding of Ceremonial contentions, with variety of tenets about them.

The first records the Rej. bringeth for contentions about Ceremony: are from Rom. 14. but he might, (and would also if it had served his turn) have fetched it further, from Math. 15. where the Pharisyes contend against Christ, and his Disciples about their ceremonial observations: Or from the first authors of that Sect, Sammay and Hilles, profane dissipators of God's Law, by their traditions, as out of their very names, Cardinal Baronius himself noteth. Neither is that contention Rom. 14. agreeable to our Quaestion, because the Ceremonies there questioned, were not of human institution, nor urged by authority of any Church or Prelates.

The second instance which the Rej. bringeth, is about the feast of Easter, whereabout he saith, the world was set on fire. And this indeed is worth the observing, that so soon as Victor-Bishops began to urge human cerem: upon the Church of God, all was presently in a fire, but were not these presumptuous Victors, the kyndlers of that fire? The next stepp which the Rej. taketh (over a thousand year wyde) is to Illiricus, about permitting the use of a surplice, where it is to be noted, that before Illyricus, there had been effectual pleading against Ceremonies, even Cross and Surplice, in Helvetia, at Tigure, whereupon they were removed, as Zwinglius relateth de baptismo: And a long time before that, the Waldenses (of whose blood were made torches to light us in the right way) did contend against all human traditions as unlawful. So Reinerus cap. 5. All customs of the church, which in the Gospel they do not read, they do contemn. They affirm that those things which are appointed by the Bishops and Prelates, are not to be observed: because they are the traditions of men and not of God. Where also the answer given by that refuter unto your Waldens. is very observable, for by that, it will appear, that human Ceremonies in Divine worship, were then impugned and defended after the same manner, they are to this day. Our allegations being the same with those, which the Waldenses used, and our adversaries answers the same, which the Papists opposed to the Waldenses. Answ: the Church is not content with those things which Christ taught, and therefore might make competent constitutions, as the Church of the Jews: in the 9. Est. 1. Maccabae 2. and 4. Touching the authorities alleged by the Haeretikes, Deut. 10. and 13. you shall not add. &c. Answ: is: The Jews might not add anything to the law, lest it might have seemed insufficient at that time. To that place Isaiah 29. Matth. 15. Answ: is: That the constitutions of the church come not only from men but God also: To that of Gall. 1. Answ: is: beside the word, that is against it.

2. That Illiricus in this part stood against that, which Calvin writ against, and many excellent Divines were silenced and deprived for. 3. That this contention of Illiricus was not properly about the Surplice: •o Calvin Ep. 117. That you affirm the Magdeburgenses to •ove contentions concerning the linnen garment, I perceive •ot what your purpose is in so speaking: Since I suppose the use •f the linnen garment (with many such fopperyes) to be yet •etayned amongst you and them. So Illiricus himself pro•esteth: Asuredly we contend not about trifles, nor is in need•ull, that some men should always cunningly propose a linnen •arment for instance of these proceedings, to such, as are un•acquainted with them, many & those most dangerous wounds •re given to the Church of Christ, by these reconciliations.

4. That the ceremonies then controverted were im•osed by Papists, with Popish intention, which kind of Ceremonies the Rej. doth seem, in all his book to dis•layme. 5. That in this Quaestion, the Rej. (under the •ame of certain reverend Divines, doth seem to join •im self with the Adiaphorists and the interim, against which Calvin, and Illiricus did contend. 6. It may •urther also be observed, that the Rej. doth on the other •art, join with Illiricus, in defense of images for religious use even in temples, for about these images did •lliricus write, against the reformed churches, as is to be •eene in Vrsine, Par. 2. Pag. 45. where he is confuted by name, and accused to have too large a conscience, in esteeming such images indifferent; yet both D. Morton, •nd D. Burgess are now come to the same largeness, that they may find room for significant Ceremonies in God's worship as appeareth in this Rej. cap. 3. sect. 7. For the Protestants most received opinion of human Ceremonies, Cassander (whose steps the Def. and Rej. follow in this cause) is a good witness. They have not only omitted these Ceremonies as less profitable, & superfluous, but the most have esteemed them, as foppish, babish and ridiculous, yea that they were to be condemned, and abandoned as noxious & pernicious. And our Martyr book doth give sufficient testimony, how diverse of the Godly Martyrs, did absolutely condemn all human Ceremonies in God's worship. To name one for all: This was the first occasion of Mr. Tho. Hawkes, his persecution, and this he defended unto the death, against Bonner: Harpsfeild, Fecknam and Chadsye: No ceremonies (saith he) but those which Christ hath appointed: In which story, it is to be marcked, that Bonners Chaplayne, and Kynsman Darbyshyre, granted as our Def. and Rej, do, that their human Ceremonies were not necessary to salvation, but only to instruction: In this cause of Ceremony. saith: Dr. Willet, Richard Gibson gave up his life pa. 111. Synop. In the beginning of Queen Elizabeth Reign, there was a company of honest men, that for the Ceremonies, refused to join with the Parish assemblies at London, as appeareth in the examinatiō of John Smyth, W. Nyxson &c. exstāt in the book called part of a Register, will any man think, that they esteemed those Cere: for which they made a kind of seperatiō to be lawful?

The first example then of human Ceremonies, by any orthodox church imposed upō God's people, which the Rej. brings, is in the Church of Engl. And here he •eginneth, with famous Queen Elizabeth's days, •hough he fetch that very story, out of the History of •ranckford troubles, which were in Queen Mary's •ayes: about the same Ceremony: and before that in King Edwards: To say nothing of the manyfold testimonies, of Martyrs against such corruptions, before King Edward: •s this any illustration of your Quaestion to be debated?

Now for the Tenets, which have been and are about •hese Ceremony. the Rej. noted out of T. C. that the old •enet of those, who opposed our Ceremony., was to hold •hem inconvenient only, not unlawful, But 1. he showeth no such thing about the Cross: 2. Nay the contrary appeareth in D.B. himself, who pag. 16. confesseth, that 39. years ago, he did at the least doubt, that the Cross was unlawful, and for that cause (not for scandal, as he did the Surplice) he refused it even to Deprivation: He would not have us think, I am sure, that he had then a singular new Tenet by himself, but inclined to the old. 3. M^r. Hooker P. 246. observeth, that the first pleadings of T. C. against other Ceremony: either inferred unlawfulness, or nothing. 4. The last rules, and resolutions of T. C. do evidently speak, of unlawfulness, of all significant Ceremonies: Although the Ceremony: of Crossing were indifferent and convenient, yet to raise a doctrine of it, is unlawful, for as much as it is not enough, to teach the truth, unless it be truly taught, and that is only out of the word of God. 2. Reply: P. 227. This was his judgment in these, and we have no other Tenet of significant Ceremonies until this day: Now if in the Hypothesis of one or two signif. Ceremony. he swarved a little there frō, out of extrinsical considerations, yet that doth not make his tenet such, as the Rej. would have it, but rather it is to be held, as an occasional declinatiō from his Tenet, which also (he is said) by faithful witnesses to have cōfessed, as an error before his death: 4. That tenet of inconveniency, or inexpediency was never yet sufficiently explained, and therefore had been fit work for it.

The commō Protestant tenet was always, as M^r. Fox, Mart. P. 4. expresseth it, that it is reproveable to add unto Christ's intention, new found rites, and Phantasies of men: And M^r. Burgess in an Epistle to King James, in the beginning of his Rain, witnesseth, that in those days, many hundred worthy ministers thought our cer. unlawful, and would surely die, rather then use them: which worthy men, surely were not the first authors, of that Tenet: If they were, why did he call them worthy, who now judgeth otherwise of us, for maintaining the same sentence. 5. That tenet of incōveniency or inexpediency, without unlawfulness in such Cer. was never yet sufficiently explained. And therefore had been fit work for the Rej.

Civil incōvenience, or incommodity may stand with lawfulness: But how a thing morally inconveniēt, or inexpedient, while it remaineth such, may be lawful, is not so clear: Nothing is thus inexpedient to moral or spiritual good, but it is impeding, or an impediment to it, and all such impediments of good, while they are such, •eeme to be opposite to good, & in that regard evil. I remember, I heard it once defended, in Cambridge, in these terms: What ever is morally inexpedient, so far as it is such, is unlawful. 6. This Tenet of the Cere: to be inexpedient, but yet lawful, hath confounded the thoughts of many, & made them to do that with grief, which they were ashamed of M^r. Hooker P. 246. maketh a speech in their persons, which I will here write out, because I remember myself, at the first reading, to have been much affected, & as it were bafled out of that countenance, which stood somewhat that way. Conformers of that sort, are feigned thus to declare their minds, & excuse their practice: Brethren, our hearts desire is, that we might enjoy the full liberty of the Gospel, as in other reformed churches they do else where, upō whom, the heavy hand of authority hath imposed no great burden: But such is the misery of these our days, that so great happiness; we cannot look to attain unto: were it so that the equity of the law of Moses, could prevail, or the zeal of Hezekiah could be found in the hearts of those guid• & governors, under whō we live, or the voice of God's own prophets could only be heard, or the example of the Apostles be followed, yea or their precepts be answered with full & perfe• obedience, the•e abominable rags, palluted garments, marks & sacraments of Idolatry, which power as you see constraineth us to wear, & conscience to abhor, had long •ere this day, been removed both out of sight, & out of memory. But as now things stand, behold to what narrow streits we are driven, on the one side we fear the words of our Savior Christ, woe to them by whom scandals and offenses come, on the other side, at the Apostles speech we cannot but quake and tremble, if I preach not the Gospel woe unto me, Being thus hardly beset, we see not any other remedy, but to hazard our souls the one way, that we may the other way endeavor to save them. Touching the offense of the weak therefore, we must adventure it: If they perish they perish: Our Pastoral charge is God's absolute commandment, Rather then that shall be taken from us, we are resolved to take this filth, and to putt it on, although we judge it to be so unfit, and inconvenient, that as oft as ever we pray or preach, so arrayed before you, we do as much as in us lies, to cast away your souls, that are weak minded, and to bring you unto endless perdition: But we beseech you brethren have care of your own safety, take heed to your stepps, that you be not taken in these snares, which we lay before you, and our prayer in your behalf is, that the poison which we offer you, may never have power to do you harm. This is the miserable Apology of a man, putting on the Surplice, which he thinketh inconvenient, upon such grounds as the Rej. did hold, and doth not yet condemn; This all such do speak either in deeds or words, that putt on a Surplice in that manner: The state of the question is now changed saith the Rej. and the Ceremony. held unlawful, whereupon many mischiefs follow: It may be the compass of our Prelates intention, to which the former tenet had reference, is varied by some degrees, towards the Autartique, as D^r. B. speaketh in his Apologye, if there be no other change, but that after more mischief don by these ceremonies, then was before, they are now more strictly urged then ever (which the Rej. confesseth) they are now at the least more hateful, if not more unlawful then before, This is also considerable, beside the change is little or none, the same mischeives which the Rej. imputeth to the new tenet, M^r. Hooker in his preface chargeth that Tenet with, which this Rej, calleth the old: Yet neither accusations have any force or color, but upon the supposal, that the ceremonies are innocent and lawful in their imposition and use. The plain truth is, that in the beginning of Queen Elizabeth's days, and before, in King Edwards time, the Ceremony: were accounted weeds of popery, as that zealous and famous preacher, M^r. Anthony Gilbye doth entitle them, in his letter to M^r. Coverdall, M^r. Turner, &c. M^r. Whittingham, D. Vmphyrey, and others, who then labored the rooting of them out. They were not curious of distinguishing of unlawfulness and inexpediency, but contented themselves to reject and oppose them: Some as M^r. Greenham refused to give their reasons fully, until they should be constrained: In the mean time they utterly refused them, as unlawful for them to use: This appeareth out of a book called a part of a Register &c. Synce that time, we have been forced to show more distinctly, what grounds we stand on, and so pronounce them unlawful. In the following pages spent principally about answering of objections, made or feared, or at least imagined, against the Author of this Rej. few things are found capable of any great dispute: Neither can many passages be touched, without odious grating upon D. Burgess personal credit, which I tender so much, that I would wish more added to it, by other works, then is detracted from it by this: I will therefore leave these things to stand or fall, without any pains or peril of mine, or the cause, and pass forth unto the style of our Ceremony: in giving and maintaining whereof the Def. and Rej. are so tender, as to proclaim them innocent.

CHAP. III. Concerning the just and proper style of our Ceremony. Answ: to the preface, Pag. 54.55.56.57.

IN answ: to the Reply. his preface, after certain words spent concerning the number, and such like circumstances of M^r. Sprynts arguments, not worth the repeating &c. The Rej. cometh to D^r. Morton his title, which he gave to our Ceremony: that they are innocent: whereunto was opposed, 1. That Calvin accounted them in the most favorable sense ineptias, fopperyes, and in proper speech noxious, pernicious. To this the Rej. answ: that Calvin meant not these titles to our Ceremony: but to some other things which were in King Edwards, book of common prayer, as lights, and crosses at the supper. Concerning which answ: 1. not only D. B. was wont otherwise to understand Calvin as we do, but the Prelates themselves, for so we read in D. B. his Apologie pag. 44. according to D. Covells disposition of it. The ordinary speeches of the Lordship and other Bishops were, that the Ceremony: are trifles, rags, beggarly rudiments, that in the books were multae tolerabiles ineptiae, which if it pleased the King to remove they would be gladd.

4. The Rej. cannot give us any probable reason, why lights should be more foppish, then the Surplice or crossings in the supper: Nay he undertaketh to justifye both lights and crossings in the supper, and a hundred other Ceremony: upon the same terms, that he defendeth these.

• Calvin did ordinarily call such Ceremon:as ours by no her name then these: Epist. 25.9. Adventitious trifles, ere mockeries: Epist. 505. babish and saplesse mixtures: gain Epist. 260. strange trifles mere fopperyes: again: Some erem. are openly Idolatrous others are foolish, and unmeet: And Epist. 117. the use of the linnen garment with many opperyes is retained both with them of Magdenburgh, and hem of Wittemberge. Neither was Calvin alone in these •rmes. Cassander pag. 852. complaineth that most of •ur writers consent in them. Not only they have omitted those as less profitable and superfluous, but the most (meaning our Protestant Divines) have judged them, foppish, ridiculous, and babish, yea to be condemned, and abandoned, as hurtfull, and pernicious. The puppy good of popish superstition. Those superfluous trifles. M^r. Fox in M^r. Hoopers Story, rifles tending more to superstition then otherwise, like unto stage players attire. 6. All human religious mystical Cer. are the byrths of folly, because every man is foolish in fynding out of religious worship, according to his own imagination. 7. These Cer. are of the same kynd with confessed fopperyes, as the placing of mysteries in every weather cock, upon church steeples, as some do: the Ludi Sacri among the papists in frequent use like unto stage plays: The rocking of a babe in a cradle all night, at the Nativity time, the Harrowing of hell at Easter; The representation of fighting horse and foot, according to the Custom of Mozarabo: Hist. Council. Trident. P. 642. If a May pole should be brought into the church, for children to dance about and clyme upon, in sign of their desire to seek things above: If a stiff straw were putt into the child's hand, for a sign of fighting against spiritual enemies, as with a spear: there would be no more folly in these thē is in the cross. 8. All experience telleth us, that such human inventions are not aptae to any spiritual use, as they are appointed unto, and therefore may justly be called according to the notation of the word ineptae.

Again it was opposed, that these Cere: were found by woeful experience to be very nocent and hurtful in that use, which hath been and is still made of them. To this the Rej. answ: that these mischiefs (which he cannot deny to follow upon our Ceremon: as they have been and are urged, are accidental events or sequells, not proper effects of them,) and that the extreme opposing of them as unlawful, hath been the cause or occasion of these evils. But 1. these mischiefs have followed upon these Ceremony: by more continual or contiguall succession (then the Pope can plead for his chayer) even from the time of the first urging of them, until this day. M^r. Fox speaking of a wicked persecutor, one Blumfeild, who threatened a good man, one Simon Harelson, to present him, for not wearing the Surplies: Addeth it is pity, such baits of Popery are left to the enemies to take the Christians in, God take them away from us, or us from them. For God knoweth they be the cause of much blyndnesse and strife among men: In his Iudgm: the Cer. were then nocent, and infamous for these sequells, and yet the Rej. fayd, they were not until of late so extremely opposed as unlawful. 2. Our opposition of them is no more guilty of these mischiefs, then the message of Moses and Aaron, were of the cruelty which Pharaoh's task mas•ers used, towards the poor Israelites, Exod. 5. though some people now may think so, as many Israelites did when. 2. When the Anabaptists in Helvetia opposed human Ceremonies as unlawful, they were by pu•like authority, and with common consent abolished: And the very Anabaptists were thanked for that opposition. So Zwinglius (their arch-adversary) Tom. 1. P. 70.

And here truly I shall grant to the Catabaptists, and will freely confess, that some commodity hath accrued, from that contention, which they have stirred about Baptism: For hence it hath come to pass, that those things which the foolish superstition of human conceits had added: (as namely the use of Exorcisme spittle and salt, and many other of the like kind, which were brought to light) are accounted of all for vain and frivolous. Who or what is in the way, that the contention of so many worthy (I dare say) of no less respect then Anabaptists, against the same kind of Ceremonies should be accounted a just cause, or occasion of so different a resolution, as the severest urging of them, is from the utter cashyering of them: Certain it is: the proper cause is to be sought in some other box, then extreme opposition, and esteeming of them unlawful. 3. Suppose these Ceremony. in regard of some places, times, and persons not unlawful, and the mischiefs accidental, yet that maketh not the general urging of them innocent, no more then fierce galloping of horses through London streets, where many men, women, and children, are endangered, want of intending mischief, would make that mudd hurry innocent. 4. The mischiefs being so great as fearful horror of conscience in some: Rej. P. 9. hardening, fopling, and distempering the conscience in other, silencing of so many hundred good ministers, and keeping off more from the ministry, troubling, unsettling, and vexing of thousands among the people, encoraging of Popish and profane men: with discouraging, and martyring the minds of many good: the mischiefs I say being so unaestimable that they can in no proportion be recompensed, by all human ceremonies that are in the world, the ceremonies which have such sequells, year after year, are much more hurtful, then the Cart and horse, that are driven over children in the street, and their urgers of them more guilty, then such Carters or Coach men, as drive them: The Def. therefore & Rej. which pronounce both innocent, and do not rather find the Ceremony. forfeited, and call the drivers of them to the bar, are neither good Crowners, nor fit to be of that Iurye: Luther Annot. in Math. 15. giveth a better verdit Viz. all human traditions or ceremonies (even those which in his judgment may in some cases be observed) have two properties of the Devil, as being liars, and murderers, when they continue and are not contemned. Such innocents God deliver his people from. 5. It is the very nature of such human ceremonies as ours, where they are urged and used (as with us) to do hurt: 1. because they are vain toys (as formerly was shown) and therefore prejudicial to so grave a business as God's worship: They trayne up the people of God in subjecting themselves, and their worshipping of God, unto the pleasure of men. 3. They make way for open imagery, and other gross superstitions, 4. they challenge that to themselves which is proper to God's ordinances &c. • It is the very nature of our Ceremonies, as they are imposed upon all our ministers, and congregations, in such dispositions and relations as they are known to have, to scandalize many in and out of the church, to disgrace the ministry, to force the consciences, or undo the outward state of many good Christians, to encorage Papists, to arm the profane, and to quench zeal against both.

CHAP. IIII. Concerning the nature and definition of a Ceremony: Pag. 29.30.

HEre we have the chief hynges, whereupon the doors and windows of the Rej. do always both open and shut, brought as it were into one box, by the examining of these therefore, we shall perceive what strength is in all the building.

The beginning of this doctrine is orderly taken from the definition of a Ceremony: A Ceremony is an outward action designed and purposely observed and done, in reference to some other thing, to the substance whereof it is neither a cause nor a part. I will no• here use Scalligers saying: Nothing more unhappy then a Grammarian adventuring to define. For this is not the fault of this Definitiō, that it is too Grammatical, because no Hebrew, Greek, or Latyn Grāmar, no nor Dictionarie neither, hath any such word, as beareth the sense of the thing here defined: Let any man make trial, and he shall find this true, that there is no word Hebrew, Greek, or Latyn, that hath any such meaning. But I may well apply, that rule of Lawyers: A definition is a dangerous thing in law: i.e. in those human laws, which have no ground, but man's will, such as those are whereby our Ceremonies have their being: The unhappines of this Definition is, that as it is recorded of Doria the Admiral of Genua in a great Seafight against the Turks, he fetched his course so far about to gain the wynd, that he could never come to strike one stroke, before the fight was ended: So this Rej. seeking to get some advantage of windy words, doth in this definition, go so far about, that by this course, he is not likely to come orderly unto the grapple.

An outward action may be designed or referred to another thing very many ways: now the Rej. taking in to his definition, reference to another thing in general, and excepting nothing but causes, and parts, he maketh all other references as they are found in outward actions Ceremony: D. B. wrote this his Rej. in Reference to the Church of England, his Diocesan, and other ministers, and people, as also in reference to the Replier, neither is his book any proper cause, or part of these, shall we say therefore that his book is a Ceremony. of all these? In reference to D^r. B. many taylors, shoemakers, bookbynders, Apothecaryes, Surgeons, Sextons, Paritors, Church-wardens (and who not?) have performed many actions, which yet were never esteemed his Ceremony. The Bishops corrupt and cruel dealing in troubling of many congregations, and depriving many better then themselves, have reference to the Ceremonies, but are no proper cause nor part of them? are they therefore the Ceremony: of Ceremonies? To prosecute the wildness of the definition, was too taedious a chase: but yet we must consider how he explaineth the terms of it: remembering always, that this explication is a Ceremony: to that definition, and is no proper cause nor part of it.

Concerning the general, that a Ceremon: is an action and external: Zwarez a great Master of the Ceremonies, telleth us, that a Ceremony is not only a transient action, but also a permanent thing: De Resig. vol. 1. ar. •. lib. 4. cap. 14. and that Ceremonies may be distinguished according to the number of the tenn predicaments, of which, action maketh but one, and an external action but half a one: But let us hear the Rej. express himself: The Cross and Surplice, are not Ceremony: but •he wearing of the Surplice &c. P. 30. Touching which we must understand, such outward things have a fourfold consideration: 1. According to their nature, as they arise •ut of their principles, as the lynnē cloth of a Surplice, •he wood of a crucifixe. 2. That artificial frame or •ashion that appeareth in these. 3. The impression or •rdination, which is put upon these to this or that end. •. The using of these, or stirring up the heart by these •n practice: So in the brazen Serpent, we may attend, •. the brass or metal out of which it was made: 2. the •ashion of it: 3. the impression of God in or by this so •ashioned to such a purpose: 4. the using of this, erec'ing of it up by Moses, the seeing and beholding of it by •he people: whence it is easy, to see the deceit of the <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> Rej. his assertion: Things in the second, & third senses, formerly mentioned, are by all writers truly called cerem: either not attending, yea excluding in our consideration, the fourth respect which is the use: Namely that habitude or impression which was imprinted upon a crucifix, or brazen Serpent, by which they had a moral fitness, either lawfully, or unlawfully putt upon them, for their several ends, are Ceremony. lawful or unlawful. Thus the current of writers Papistical confess: the church hath power, to make and appoint Ceremonies and enjoin the using of them, so that they are ceremonies, before they be used, their high Altar is a ceremony, yea holy all the time, before it be used, in bearing the unbloody sacrifice: Thus all Interpreters, term the types of the old law cerem., for that spiritual disposition they have, and typicalnes which the Lord set upon them, as well when no man used them, as when they were used: The Brasen Serpent being once set up: had been a Ceremony in the wilderness though the people would never look upon it, yea I ask, whether the massing vestments of Papists, such which carry a consecrating virtue with them, are not ceremonies, when they are kept, as well, as when they are worn, All men so speak, so write, so judge: and the like may be said of our Surplice &c. In a word: These which were properly types, were properly Ceremonies, but Legal institutions & rites amongst the Jews were properly rites, as well before and after they were used, as in the using. And therefore they were properly ceremonies, as well when they were not used, as when they were in use, in the night as in the day, when men are in sleep and cannot use them, as when they were awake, and did employ them in worship.

2. If we be truly and properly said to use Ceremony. then Ceremony. are properly such beside their use. True it is some Cere. consist in actions, and all actions being in motion, when the actions cease the Ceremonies grounded upon them must needs cease: but it is not, because they are Ceremony., but because they be such Ceremony., whose foundations are in actions: In sum then it appears, that the being or existence of the fashionableness of the brazen serpent, and the moral impression or appointment to its end, this being, or existence, I say is a ceremony, when it is not used by any: and therefore some being or existence is a ceremony point blank to the Rej. determination. He adds:

It is an external action, because internal actions of the mind, being matters of substance cannot duly be called ceremonies.

Peradventure these words, may have some true sense in some specialties, but they serve not his turn in this place, because though he only mentions outward actions: yet he requires a purposed observation of them, which carries the work both of mind and will and therefore includes an internal action of the man, for no man can purposely observe, but he must both judge what he should do, and affect what he judgeth, so that the Rej. here speaks daggers, nor can I see, how he can excuse a contradiction or two.

He that requires a purposed observation in a Cer. he requires an act of mind & will, & so an internal act.

But D. Burg. requires a purposed observation in a ceremony.

Therefore he requires an act of mind and will, and so an internal act, whence defining a Ceremony to be an action external, and yet making it internal also, he crosseth shynns with himself.

Or thus:

He that duly and of right judgment requires a purposed observation, he requires an internal, and so a substantial act or a matter of substance.

But D^r. Burg. requires duly and in right judgment (I mean in his apprehension) a purposed observation:

Therefore he requires a substantial matter in a Ceremony, which he denies should be done: and that is a contradiction.

The second term, is designed or purposely observed and done, and as he explicates himself: Institution or that which is all one, intended observation, is essential to a Ceremony: P. 30. Which words are confused, and draw with them dangerous inconveniences, when Institution and intended observation, are made simply all one: For neither is all institution, an observation, because many things are instituted, which are not observed. 2. Neither is an intended free observatiō for one time used: an institution, 3. an institution with authority implieth much more in it, then intended observation. D^r. Jackson in his original of unbeleif, pag. 334.335. very aptly to this purpose noteth, that some expressions may sometime be used, and observed well, which to use ordinarily, (much more to institute) •old be ridiculous or impious. As Jacob did unblameably •ish his son Joseph's coat, yet to have hanged it about his •edd, or table, that it might receive such salutations, evening and morning, or at every meal time, might have countenanced many branches of superstition: once and use it not, may be discretion, of those things whose continual use degenerates into abuse. All observers of Ceremonies are not instituters of them, I think D. B. would be loath, to institute the Cross, and Surplice, with other Ceremony: which yet he doth observe: In his interpretations of subscription he refuseth to defend, how well these be imposed (that is as I take it instituted) and yet acknowledgeth, the intended observation of them, to be very well: Besyde all this, it is to be marked, that the Rej. by confounding institution and purposed observance, doth exclude or forget all natural ceremonies, such as bowing of the body before superiors, embracing of those, who are dear unto us, lifting up the hands and eyes to heaven in ordinary worship, which nature itself doth teach all nations to observe, without any institution, though not without some government of council, nor without such variety, as nature itself is subject unto: Again if by this phrase he mean that a purposed observation of an outward act, with an aim and reference to such a thing, is of necessity required to make up a Ceremony: or a Ceremonious action, in worship or otherwise, it is a miserable mistake: Instance thus: A carnal Protestant presents himself amongst such, as are at Mass, he professeth to his companions, before he goes in, and doth in the purpose of his heart seriously loath the pix and Idol there, yet when its lifted up, he bows as others do: Lett any man in reason tell me, did he not use or abuse rather a Divine Ceremo. in that bowing or no? If the Rej. say yes, as he must, unless he will speak against all reason & truth: I then reply upon his own grounds: That outward action which is not purposely referred, that is not a Ceremony. but this action is not purposely observed with any aim to that end for the party intended no such thing, purposed no such matter, but did it as a thing of-course, as a man should bow his knee for exercise when he is alone. 2. Peter withdrawing himself from the Gentiles at the coming of the Jews, he did not purposely this, with reference to any Judaicall separation, as judging any legal pollution in joining with the Gentiles, or holiness in parting from them, and therefore he did not practise any Jewish Cere. according to the Rej. conceit, but directly contrary to the text: there is no end of these absurdities.

The differing term is placed in reference to some other matter, of the substance whereof it is neither necessary cause nor part, Pag. 30.

Where he seemeth to expound that, which before he called a proper cause by a far differing term of a necessary cause: what should be the intention of this variation I cannot guess: It may be the Rej. forgot, that he was in giving of accurate rules, and so fell into a loose varying of phrases: So likewise in illustrating of this difference, instead of part he nameth a substantial part, as distinguishing parts into substantial and accidental, of which addition I cannot tell what to make: How ever this is no form or essential difference of a Ceremony. from other actions. D. B. hath preached a thousand good sermons, in reference to his flock or people, yet I do not think, he esteemed them Ceremony. of his hearers: This Paradox he enlargeth with many similitudes, and examples, I looked he should have alleged some scripture, from whence this might have been gathered or concluded: at the least adjoined some convicting argument, which might have cleared this so main point of his definition, or if none of those, that yet he would have shown some authority or author, who had so writ and spoke, but here is deep sylene, and we must take all upon the D^{rs} bare word, but by the D^{rs} leave we are purposed to try his novellies and not to take them upon trust.

Here (1) it is justly to be faulted, that he goes against all rules of art and reason, making up the chief part of his definition, of a negative, and so in issue tells us, what the thing is not, not what it is: For having said, that a cerem. must be in reference, the demand might be, what reference is that, he adds it is not a cause, or a part, And any may in reason still enquire, if it be not either if those two, what is it then, or what intend you by it, here he leaves himself not a muse or a hole to escape, but even a broad field to walk at liberty in, either to affirm, or deny what he will: For press him thus: If it be not the reference of a cause or part, is it then referred by way of comparison? No: Is it by way of opposition? No: And thus where shall we hold him, or make him stay, Nay where will he himself find foothold to stand: Just for all the world, as if he should defyne a man to be a living creature, which is not a byrd, nor a fish, nor a lamb, nor an ox, how senseless and sapplesse would such descriptions be, and yet this of the Rej. in this place is the like. And hence it is, that instead of a clearer knowledge, and apprehension of the thing, which should be gained by a definition, I dare be bold to make it good (for I speak but what by experience I have found) that the most ordinary, yea judicious readers, when they thought they knew something of a Ceremony. before: after they had read this definition, they knew, just nothing at all: Thus his defining is like flinging dust in the eyes of a man's understanding, to delude and deceive, at the least to dazell and trouble his reason: I hope by the next return, the Rej. will be content to acknowledge this fault, and will tell us in plain English, what he means by this reference▪ which if he do, I am verily persuaded he will be forced to see, how far wyde he was, when he mynted and vented these feeble conceits. How ever we will see, what we can make of it, and in this our enquiry, it must not seem strange to the D^{rs} learning, that being simple men, our dull capacities compass several ways that we may find out the foundation, upon which this assertion is built, In which we profess in a word of truth, our desire is not to pervert his meaning, but to understand it.

This reference then in the general wherein it is propounded can carry but two significations we may consider both, that we may guess at the mind of the author.

1. Its taken for relation, in open phrase, and so also he declares it, and in a fair construction seems to intend it, for so he writes. It is not divine nor human institution that makes a Ceremon: for that it is the relation as hath been said which constituteth. If this be his meaning, then the two relats, betwixt whom this relation is, must be their action referring, and the matter or thing unto which it is referred: but in this sense it doth thrust itself & carries a contradiction with it: All relates are mutual causes one of another, And do consist of mutual affection between each other: As there cannot be buying without selling, giving without taking: assume we now in this sense, but the action outward to the thing whereunto it is referred, are relats: Therefore they are mutual causes one of another, therefore how can they be in this reference, and yet be not a cause one of another, which the Rej. expresseth and requireth: this sense not houlding, let us see how the other will serve his turn.

2. This reference in a large sense implies any kind of notionall respect, which can be considered and conceived, beside that of a cause or part, and this draws many absurdities with it.

1. That which belongs to substantial worship, as well as ceremonial, that cannot be the difference, or proper nature of a Ceremony, for then they should not be distinct one from another: but to be referred to something not as a cause or part, belongs even to substantial worship as well as Ceremonial: For each worship of God hath proper and particular causes of which it is made, and unto which it is referred, as an effect, not as a cause or part. 2. The Induction of particulars will make it undeniable, profession of the true God, and the truth of the Gospel is referred to both, not as a cause or part of either: ergo, sound profession is a ceremony: Prayer in all the kynds of it, confession to God, petitioning from God, are referred to him, not as causes or parts; ergo, they are ceremonies.

Hearing attending conserving, examining things heard, are referred thereunto, not as causes or parts of the things; ergo, they are ceremonies.

Nay to believe and hope in God, to love and fear him are referred to God not as causes or parts: ergo, these are Ceremon. If it be here said, yea but these are inward actions, whereas our Ceremony. are said to be outward by the Rej. I answ: be it granted, yet this kind of reference being the proper form of a Ceremon: the reason still holds good (though we have no need of this example having so many before mentioned) for wheresoever the form or proper nature of a thing is, there the thing formed will be, as its a sound kind of reasoning, where there is a reasonable soul as a form, there is a man: Lastly to deride contemn, rail, revyle Christ, his truth and servants is an outward action purposely observed with reference to these, by persecutors, not as causes and parts of them; ergo, these are but Ceremon: sins, and is not here wyld work, thinks thou Christian reader.

3. That which is common to all actions, and all things, cannot be a form and difference of a Ceremony. to make it differ from all other: but thus to be referred to another, not as a cause or part is common to all outward actions, natural, civil, religious, yea to all natural artificial things: Thus all acts may be referred one to another, and all other to Divinity, not as causes or parts of Divinity: are they therefore all Cer? Nay all precepts of art are referred the former to the latter, not as causes or parts; ergo are they in this Rej. conceit, and by the verdict of this definition Ceremo? Amongst the examples of this difference, the last is to be attended unto because it hath a remarkable note added unto it? Convening in one set place at an honor appointed unto worship saith the Rej. is in that relation a ceremony of worship: and yet as it is an observance of order it is no Ceremo. Of this there can be no doubt, but the observation of time and place, in reference to another thing, is according to the definition of the Rej. a ceremony: But how an observation of this time and place, can be considered as an order, without reference to something to be ordered in that time and place, that so it may be differenced from the same order, as it is a ceremony, this is a metaphisicall abstraction, as I cannot conceive of, let others therefore judge: When the Apost. chargeth the Corinth, to do all things in order: could he be so understood, that he spake of order, and of the ceremony of order, and that by doing of things in order, he meant a Ceremony: because there is a relation of order to things: but by doing orderly he meant no ceremony, because there is no relation to things: Order without relation to things ordered, is like the accidents in the Popish Sacrament, without any subject after transubstantiation: If the doctrine of human Ceremony. cannot stand, or be understood, without such miraculous subtleties let it go seek for those that will receive it. The note added to the former example is: that they who oppose matters of order to matters of ceremony, as if the same thing could not be done in double relations, do confound several notions of things, and oppose things coincident. Here first may be marked, how he crosseth that in this conclusion, which he laid for the ground of it: before he said reference or relation to some other matter doth distinguish a cerem. from order, because a Ceremony. hath such a relation, and order as order hath not: but now he telleth us of double relations one in order, and another in ceremo. Secondly he fighteth here without an adversary, except he understand by matters of order, mere order, and by matters of Ceremo. such observations, as are significant by institution, for no man doubteth but Ceremony. lawful and unlawful also may be done in order.

In the example of this rule, the Rej. is so subtle in his subliming and refining of notions, that he hath these words: The observance of the order appointed for reading, singing, praying, &c. is in respect of that order of the substance thereof, but referred to divine service is a cerem. In this (I say) no more good sense appears then needs must, for putt those words together: The observance of order, in respect of that order is of the substance thereof: without all question: as a man in respect of the same man is of his substance: So also the observance of a cerem. in respect of that ceremony is of the substance thereof: Here is no difference, neither indeed can any difference be intelligibly feigned betwixt order of divine service, and order in relation to divine service, but human Ceremony. must thus be handled.

For a conclusion of this, that we may not altogether send the Reader away with these uncertainties, withdrawing ourselves from the Rej. his by paths, we will in a word or two, a little enquire, what the word of truth, gives us to consider, touching Ceremonies, and see if we can hit the old and the good way, the Kings roade of righteousness.

If then we look into the scriptures, which are all to inform us, in all things we should do, we shall find no other names of such Cere. which the Lord hath either required, or the church used, but those: TO RAH CHOKIM MISPAT: but the Cere. part of God's service, was made known most usually by the last word CHO KIM, coming of a root, which signifies, to grave, frame, carve, fashion in manner of a statue or picture, and is applied as the Hebrews observe, to appoint or make the first rude draught of a thing, and so it fittly imports those services which were enjoined the Israelites, by means of outward sensible, carnal things, all which were but like the horn-book or prymmer, for the church to be schooled by, when it was in its infancy and nonage, and therefore are called, elements of the world, carnal rites, beggarly rudiments, to wit, because these were only supplementa to those spiritual ordinances, which are called moral or substantial: for whereas there be some ordinances of God, which carry a constant and perpetual equity and necessity of our honoring of the Lord: As that there should be a rule made known, to counsel and advise us, how he will be worshipped: requisite it is, we should hear, read, meditate, confer, suffer ourselves to be squared by this rule and word: Equi•y, ne•ssity requires we should pray, that we should have seals of the covenant to confirm us in regard of our infirmity, how ever there needed none in regard of God's immutability, but to lett out his love to us, in the full sourse of it: Again equal and necessary it is, we should in the name of Christ, cast out what is contrary, and will destroy his kingdom, his propheticall and priestly office, and so his honor: But to have outward elements carnal, and sensible rites, to teach our minds, to carry up our hearts to God, laying aside the minority of the church, there is not a perpetual necessity of these, nor add they to the substance of the service, but only help me, because I am weak, and dymme sighted, like so many spectacles, to succor my dazzling eye: and therefore are Ceremony. the first draught of outward ordinances: Now all the outward types appointed thus by God, which foretold Christ to come, and those other rites which by way of signification taught our minds, and so helped and stirred our hearts outward to grace or duty, all these are ceremonies: And consider them, and practice them, as they are in the word appointed, whether it be with any reference, to any other worship, or without reference had to any other worship, they are then and ever were at all these times in themselves, and in their use ceremonious worship: Instance thus: To put on frontletts before the eyes, &c. commanded 15. Numb. and by them to be admonished and stirred to the obedience of the law: take this Ceremo. in the work, and in its own nature, as a mean signifying, teaching, and so working, this is a Ceremony, and so to do is Ceremonions worsh•p: refer it; refer it I say to no other thing, but only to this, unto which it is appointed of God, as a mean to work & as a cause doth work this, I say look at it, as a cause to work, (which the Rej. excepted in his definition) in this sense it is a ceremony and ceremonious worship: the like of the rest. At a word: It is the verdict and voice of the scripture, and consent of all men, to divyde worship into moral, ceremonial. Whence I gather thus: If there be a ceremonial worship, a distinct species from moral or substantial worship, then is a ceremony in it own proper nature, as such a worship without reference or consideration had of moral or substantial, as a man in his own nature is a living creature, without any consideration of a beast. Again hence its clear, that as well as moral worship hath a complete nature of it own, without ceremonial: So ceremonial hath its complete nature without moral, because they are contradistinct species.

Again hence it follows, divine ceremonies as such, are parts of worship: every species as it is a species, is part of his genus: but divine ceremonies as such, are species of religious worship: whence that is false which the Rej. affirms in the seventh consecutory: That actions in some consideration may be real acts of Divine worship, and as so, be no ceremonies. For its evident, he doth and must needs speak of acts Ceremoniously religious, and then beside the former argument, I would reason thus: If a man, as he doth refer a religious action to another, doth worship God, then is it a species of worship even in that reference: but as he doth refer a religious action to another, he doth worship God: ergo, that action in that reference is a species of worship: And thus much his own words in the same consecutory seem to me to evince: The outward elements and acts in respect of the inward things they do represent and exhibit are cerem. So the Rej. Consect. 7. P. 34. But I assume, God is worshipped by them, or they be parts of worship, in that very use, and therefore as ceremonies they are parts of worship: Hence lastly the vanity of the fifth consecutory, is plainly discovered, as containing empty words without any worth of matter. For when its said: To acknowledge anything, to be ordained a Ceremony. by man, to be used in the worship of God, and yet to affirm the same to be a part of that worship to which it referreth, implies a contradiction: The answer is easy: It is confessed by all men, that Ceremo. are not part of that substantial worship, I say that particular worship, which they do accompany, and unto which they refer as none of the types in the old law, were either hearing, praying, believing, &c. and yet were real and proper ceremonious worship, in themselves considered, as being a contradistinct species thereof: So also the Sacraments, are no part of that particular inward worship whereunto they refer: namely, faith in God and his promises, and yet by signifying, sealing, according to God's institution, they are true divine cere. and real true parts of worship in the General: So also our human Cere. as the cross, it is not, nor we affirm it to be, part of our faith in God, or our constant obedience to him, and yet we say as its made a token to import these, and so made a teacher of these, its a ceremonious, yet a real species of worship in the general, though false: So that either the Consect. is to no purpose, carrying only an empty sound of words, or if it be taken in a fayer sense, it will not free our ceremonies, from the charge of false worship: Thus far we have made a little digression from the Rej. but not from the matter (Christian Reader) nay nor yet wholly from the Rej. because all this, adds still, to the manifestation and confutation of the desperate feeblenes of his definition, joined merely out of his own conceit, and vented to the world, without either proof or authority.

From these premises certain consecutaries are deduced, the quality whereof may easily be guessed at, by what which hath been found in the praemises viz. that they are either to little purpose, or false: For the conclusion being false, all the collections which hence he gathers, must needs be as untrue, so that either they are not sound, or else they take no force or foundation of soundnes and truth from hence, if there be any in them, and therefore I need add no further examination, for the tree itself falling, the boughs must needs follow: For any collection he makes must in this, or the like form be concluded: If a Ceremo. be an action external, &c. When this and that and the other will follow. Let me reason, and on the contrary side assume: but a ceremony is not an outward action instituted, &c. nor is that definition true, as hath been declared by the reply: ergo, none of all those consecutories, may be concluded, can be collected therefrom.

Yet for more satisfaction sake, let us take a view of the several; but very shortly: The first is, that therefore the same actions one at the same times may in several respects be ceremonies. & no ceremony: But if the nature of a ceremony doth not consist in reference or relation, as hath been evicted before sufficiently, then the change of the respect or relation, doth not bring in the change of a ceremony.

Second Consecutory is: That institution and observation, makes a ceremony not a natural habitude or aptness of any action to express this or that: Now if no natural aptness or habitude make a Ceremony. what will the Rej. say, to things of Decency, Comelines, and order which are ceremonies in his sense. 42. pag. and in a large sense of the word may truly be so called, do none of these arise out of the natural aptness and habitude of the action? The whiteness and cleanness of the communion cloth, doth not the decency thereof issue from the habitude of the thing, which if it was foul and nasty, would not be decent, let all institution do what it could: That a minister should turn his face to his people in the pulpit when he preacheth, and not his back, is not this comelines in the natural aptness of the action: That people should stand or sit in hearing the word, and not lie along upon their faces, doth not this issue from the natural aptness of the action, without institution, is there not decency in these, or can institution make the contrary decent? If therefore decency and comelines of some actions, to this or that, issue from the natural habitude, then some ceremonies do issue out of this aptness, because these are such, and so this consecutory is false.

The third is: that mystical signification is not necessary to make a ceremony (as some would have it) but relation only as appeareth in diverse observances of the law: though mystical signification added, may make a double and perhaps a triple ceremony. If this be granted no inconvenience followeth to the Repl. because the question still remaineth, about double and triple Ceremony. such as the cross is, whether it be lawful for men, to institute such in God's worship. And to argue, from a single Ceremony. to a double, and triple, this is not from the head of parity. And as for the observances in the law, I deny all of them to have been properly Ceremony. although they be some time so called improperly, and that with Judicious Junius on Exod. 25. Some Ceremonies are taken up to figure the truth of the thing, and those appertain properly to the nature of types by God's appointment, others are taken in, not so much, for the resemblance of the things, but for the nature of the figures: As in these Ceremonies. there be many things, that make nothing to the nature of a Ceremony. as such, but only to the nature of the thing, which thing after the manner of some matter liable to sense, is applied about the Ceremony and the Ceremonial figure.

The fourth is: That the difference which some make betwixt circumstances and Ceremonies is a mere nicety, or fiction: This is a strange nicety as ever I knew. The turning or jogging of the hour glass in relation to the measure of time for a sermon, the sweeping of the church before the church meeting, the carrying of some notes for remembrance upon occasion, the quoting of scripture without, or by the book, and a 100. such, were never esteemed ceremonies properly so called, before men began to bring a myst upon religious observances, that human presumptions might not be discerned.

The fifth hath his answer before.

The sixth is: That divine or human institution doth not make an action to be a ceremony or no ceremony. These consecrations follow marvelous strangely from the premises, when they seem to contradict both the premises, and themselves in some particulars: I would therefore entreat the Rej. to end the quarrel at his next rejoyning, and make a reconciliation between these.

- 1. To a ceremony Institution is essential, pag. 30.
- 2. It is not apenes of an action, that maketh it a ceremony, but Institution. Cons. 2. Pag. 32.
- 3. Now here we are told that Divine, or human institution, do not make an action a ceremony, whence I reason thus:

If neither Divine nor human institution make a Ceremony, then no institution doth: for all institutions are either Divine or human, and from the denial of all the species to the denial of the Genus, the consequence is good: as it is neither a beast, nor a man, therefore it is not.

But this sixth corollary saith, its neither divine nor human institution make a ceremony: ergo, I conclude, no institution doth make a ceremony; which is a direct contradiction to the second: which affirms, that institution doth make a Ceremony.

The seventh hath been discussed and confuted before in the substance of it: Pag. 34. only that strange kind of expression may here be observed as we pass by: It is not essential to a ceremony simplye, that it be no proper part of Divine worship: where let it be observed, that to be no proper part of worship, is a bare negation, or not being of worship: now plain it is, and manifest to all that have but common sense, that a bare negation, cannot be essential to anything, that hath being, neither simply nor comparatively. And by the same proportion, and upon the same ground, he might as well say, to be no part of worship, is not essential to anything, and therefore not to a Ceremony: now to what profit, or purpose are such expressions, which serve nothing to the cause in hand, but to darken the truth with words, and to dazell the minds of the ignorant.

The eight is; That it is not the use or end, which maketh a ceremony to be part of divine worship, or not, but institution: Divine institution maketh any circumstance a part; but human institution, though to the same end and use, maketh only an adjunct of divine worship, because the observance thereof cannot incur the act of any proper worship of God. How this is a consecration following upon the premises it doth not appear. The contrary seemeth to follow from the sixth consecration, where divine and human institution is denied to make a Ceremony, or no Ceremony, but rather to difference arbitrary, and necessary Ceremony. For by the very like reason; Divine and human institution doth not make worship, or no worship, but rather maketh a difference of necessary or arbitrary will worship. The reason of that is rendered, because relation doth constitute a Ceremo. And the same reason holdeth here, because relation doth constitute worship: The Institution Divine or human doth only difference the efficient cause, not the matter, form, and end, wherein the essence of worship doth consist. If God's institution did make any circumstance of worship to become worship, then the ceasing from worship should be worship, because there were circumstances of time appointed, when men should cease from solemn worship: The reason which supporteth the other part of this assertion viz: That human institution cannot make an action part of worship, because the observance thereof, cannot incur the act of worship, is just as much, as if it had been so set down: human institution cannot make worship; because that which it maketh, cannot be worship. If men appoint even places, and times, in the same manner, to the same ends, that God did, they are worship as well (though not so good) as the other: If this were not so, then wherefore doth the Scripture tell us, of will worship, taken up at the pleasure of men, or according to the institutions, doctrines, and traditions of men? For by the Rej. his rule, there can be no such thing, and therefore it is vain to forbidd it. This may suffice for this consecratory, yet because the reflection of it doth often occur in the dispute. I further undertake to prove, that it is neither true in itself: nor 2. is it truly inferred from the definition, and both these charges we will endeavor to make good.

For our right proceeding to discover the falsehood of the collection, when he saith: The same use and end maketh not a ceremony to be part of Divine worship, we must not understand true worship, for that all the world of orthodox divines, especially his opposites, against whom he raiseth this consecratory, do confess, that only the Lord's institution makes divine worship true, but there is religious worship which is false: So that the meaning is, whether the same use and end of a Ceremony, make it not to be in the kind of religious worship, as well without the institution of God, as its made true religious worship by it. Or whether: when the same use and end of a ceremony which was religious, when God's institution came, the institution being taken away (neither I say) the same use, and end, is not now religious properly: we •ffirme against the Rej. that Divine Institution being •aken away, continue the same use, and the same end, •here is still religious worship properly though false.

Again this also is especially to be minded, that we •re then said to keep the same use and end, not when we employ the same thing or action: but when we use •hem as under the act of the same rule, as in the same way, as in the like virtual respect unto the same end: I often mention that particle of similitude as, because •hough the ordinances of man, cannot have the same virtue as God's have, nor can attain the same end of honoring of God as his do, yet if we take them, and use them as such, they are false worship to us, so abusing of inventions, as the use of God's own ordinances, are true worship: So that where both these are, the same means in a proper religious use, to attain the end properly religious, there is Divine worship. And this thus opened, now comes to be confirmed.

Where the essential causes are of Divine worship, there is Divine worship.

Where there is the same use and end, properly religious; there be the essential causes of Divine worship.

Ergo, there is Divine worship.

The first part is beyond all exception, nor cannot suffer a denial of a man, that hath not forsaken and denied reason: The second part or the minor proposition, is thus made good:

Where there is the same operari, i. e. working or act of essential causes of worship; there is the same esse or being of the same causes.

It being an old received rule, amongst not only Logicians, but even reasonable men, idem operari, idem esse, the same working, and the same being, go together.

But where the same use and the same end is properly religious, there is same operari or acting of the essential causes of worship: Ergo, there must need be the same essential causes: For when God hath appointed such means to be used to such an end, the appointment being past, the worship is not yet, before those means and end come, and they carry the essence of the action.

2. We may borrow the ground of another argument from the Rej. own grant elsewhere, for pag. 38. speaking of superstitious Ceremonies he hath these words: Ceremonies are superstitious, when men worshiping only the true God, yet place and putt upon their own Ceremonies, the title of Divine, as in effect, when the proper service of God is placed in them, or merit, or necessity, holiness and efficacy, though by virtue of the churches institution: For what can be said more of God's ordinances then this, nay not all this truly, I mean, for merit &c. hence I reason diversely.

If the superstitious encroaching in God's service, by appointing means of the same use efficacy and end with the Lord's, be a breach of worship properly divine. Then also is it really and properly though falsely divine worship: for a sin directly contrary to the duty of a command, is even of the same kind with the duty: but the appointment and use of such means, in such a virtue to such an end, is a breach of true worship really divine, ergo it is really divine, false worship.

3. Again: That which makes a Ceremony properly species of divine false worship; that adds more then an adjunct to divine worship, for an adjunct, doth not vary the kind, or make a new species, but only alters the same species.

But institution thus superstitious, makes an action, a species of divine false worship: by the Rej. consent, nay by the confession of all Divines orthodox, that knew what they writ or spake: Ergo, it adds more then an adjunct to Divine worship, for it makes it a species, which is professedly contrary to that which the Rej. hath in this consecratory: namely; that human institution makes an action an adjunct to divine worship not a part: whereas here its plain it makes it a species, and so a part of Divine false worship.

4. Again its lawful to add an adjunct, which is properly Divine to God's worship, by the Rej. learning. Pag. 36.37. but it is not lawful, to add the means of the use, to the same end, which God hath appointed: As it was not lawful to the Jews to use other braceletts, about their necks, frontletts upon their foreheads, wherein they should write the law, answerable to the Frontletts, and fringes, which God appointed.

That which the Rej. adds, touching the appointment of the place of meeting, is a most miserable mistake: His words are; The Lord's appointment of one place for sacrifices, and of some set days for the solemn worship of God at the Sabbath, and their feasts to Israel, made the observance of that very place and these times, to be part of worship: But the churches appointment of a set place, or time, unto the celebration of the acts of religious worship, because it incurreth not the worship itself, leaves the observance thereof as a mere ceremony.

Herein (I say) the Rej. missed the mark miserably: For the Temple was a type of Christ's body: Pull down this temple, and I will raise it up within three days: but he spake of the temple of his body, John 2.19.21. and the very frame of it by God's institution and ordination, was holy, had an efficiency, and virtue through God appointment, to carry up the heart to God, by that virtual respect, and efficacy which it had, as his means to that end. Now lett the Church institute, and appoint a place, and put this virtue, & efficacy in it, by their institution to the same end, to which the temple was appointed, and I suppose the Rej. himself will say, its superstition and false worship: But our temples have no such thing, putt upon them, to no such end, & therefore are not in the same end and use: unless the Rej. will hold, that prayers better ascend in Paulls church, when he rounds a pillar in the ear, then when he prays abroad: and that he is of opinion, with Bishop Andrew's, that we are heard, not because of the prayer that is made, but because of the place in which it is made: but I hope the Rej. is far of from such delusions.

The second thing we charge upon this consecratory, is; that it is collected by any force of reason, from the foregoing definition: for cast it into a form, and the very expression will be confutation enough: for the frame must stand thus:

If a Ceremony be an outward action instituted, and purposely observed, in relation to some thing, whereof it is neither cause nor part: then it follows, that the same use and end, maketh not a Ceremony part of Divine worship.

These things have so ill connection, and sement of reason, that when they are set in a form, they fall all in pieces, as though the consequent was afraid of the antecedent, so far it is from following from the definition naturally, that all the cords of reason, cannot draw them together, as it will appear, if any man will putt it to trial, by all the topick places of invention: we will therefore rest, until we hear what Balsam the D^r. brings to heal this wound:

The nyth and last Consecratory is: That Ceremonies may in regard of their general kind and end be worship, so far as they are in their kind parts of order and decency, and yet in their particulars, not be of the substance of order, comlines, worship. We are at last therefore come to a strange reckoning. Cer. are in their kind, parts of order, & yet (as we were told pag. 31.) that order so far as it is order, is in that respect no ceremony. 2. A Ceremo. in respect of the genus and end is worship, and yet in the consecratory immediately going before, it was peremptorily pronounced, that use and end maketh not a Ceremony part of Divine worship: I take the cause of this cross Doctrine to be, that human ceremonies in divine worship, are such a cross knott, that he who seeks to open the conveyances of it, must needs run cross in his thoughts and words. To make this crossing more plain, let us first debate (a little more fully) the truth of this corollary, and then see what followeth therefrom. We here have three conclusions.

- 1. Ceremonies in their kind, as they are parts of order, and decency, may be acts of religion.
- 2. Yet the particulars may not be of the substance of order.
- 3. That the particulars are not Divine; which propositions are plainly expressed in the corollary, if they be not contradictious one to another, I must confess, I must bidd all reason and logic farewell, or else the Rej. hath a new logic, which yet never saw light: And therefore I reason thus.

If every particular have the whole nature of the Genus in it, then the general being divine, the particulars must be divine; but every particular of order and decency are species to general nature of order &c. therefore they have the whole nature of order in the general; & ergo are divine: & to affirm the contrary which here is done, is to say a living creature hath sense, but the species man and beast hath none: Or; the nature of man is reasonable, but the particulars: Thom. or John are not reasonable; and thus the 3. conclusion implies a contradiction to the first conclusion.

2. Again the second also is more gross, if more may be added, If the general, give his whole substance & nature to the particulars, then if there be any substance of order, the particulars have it, but the general nature of order gives all the substance to the particulars; ergo, they have it: the maintaining of the contrary conceit, is to bidd battle to all reason, and to deny a confessed common, and received principle of art. General is that kind of whole, which gives his essence to the particulars. For now far should a man be forsaken of common sense, who should affirm, that manhood, or the nature of man in general, should have the substance of reason: but considered in his species and particulars. Tho. and John, they should be wholly destitute of the substance of reason: And assuredly (good reader) when I considered, the wonderful confidence of the disputer, arrogating so much subtilty and learning, and yet to fall so foul and offend so heavily, against the very rudiments of logic, and principles of reason, I could not but look up to heaven, and lawfully as I could, and tremblingly remember, that of the Prophet: That the Lord is said to putt out the understanding of the Prudent.

Thus we have discussed the falsehood of the Corollary, we will now reason from it, for our own advantage, taking the false grant of the Rej. in this place.

Every species under a command, stands by virtue of the same command the Genus doth, as that is a common rule in reason, the general and special appertain to the same place, and it is a rule in Divinity received without gaynsaying: the general command by the same stroke and compass comprehends all the particulars under it: and when that, by way of precept is enjoined, all the rest by the same rule, & by virtue of the same command, are also required. We must preserve the life of our Brother, that is the general of the 6. Commaund, by the same precept, all the particulars of ways and means which are the specialls of preservation, are required: but the particulars of order and decency are under the general of order and decency; ergo, these particulars stand by virtue of the same command they do. And by the Rej. grant, these standing by a command of divine worship, and being proper acts thereof: ergo, it must needs follow that the particulars stand by virtue of the command of Divine worship, and are proper acts thereof: we see by this time whither the D^{rs}. Divinity hath brought him.

Again, if they be so commanded, and be such proper acts of worship: of such acts the Rej. confesseth the Negative arg. from Scripture concludeth well. Such acts of proper worship cannot be imposed by man or the Church, significant ceremonies, which carry such acts of worship, are unlawful, and thus by one grant, he hath yielded there of the arguments, which he strives after to answer and to overthrowe.

CHAP. V. Of the sorts and differences of Ceremonies.

The first partition of Ceremo. into private or public, close or open, may pass for the evidence of it, but yet it may be questioned, seeing institution is essential to a Ceremony, as before we have been taught, to whom the institution of private Ceremonies do belong? whether the convocation house may appoint men, when they eat and drink, go to bedd and rise up, to sign themselves with the sign of the Cross?

The second partition into Ceremon. civil, sacred or mixed: Civil, when their immediate object and end is civil; Sacred, when the immediate object and end is matter pertaining to religiō, requireth more attention. And 1. it is to be noted, that by this division, all natural Ceremo. are abrogated or excluded, for else the first distribution should have been; Ceremo. are either natural or instituted: Now Bellarmine himself more considerately maketh some ceremon. natural. Certain Ceremony. receive institution, as it were from nature itself, which may be called natural Ceremony. as to look up to heaven, to lift up our hands, and to bow our knees, when we pray unto God. Note also the varying of the phrase: In civil cerem. he requireth an immediate civil object & end, but in sacred he will have it enough, that the immediate object and end, be matter pertaining to religion. There may be some purpose in this, to exclu•e all civil Ceremony. and so civility out of matters pertaining to religion, that all things being counted religious, human mystical Ceremo. in religion, may not be discerned from common observations, which are equally and often used to the same immediate end both in civil, and in religious matters. These things reserved, the substance of this partition may pass, together with the illustrations of it: Only one illustration I would have remembered for future use. An action (saith the Rej.) imperated of religion, or springing out of the fear of God, may be civil, and belong to the second table. This is that which some of our Divines mean, when they speak of mediate worship, that is, there be duties belonging to the second table, imperated or governed by religion, but not immediately flowing from it. This the Rej. taketh hold of in many places, and maketh thus actions religious, which here he calleth civil. The conclusion drawn out of this partition is, that they have the spirit of contradiction, which say that the church may not ordain Cer. merely ecclesiastical, but only common, because all Cer. in religious affairs, are m•erely ecclesiastical: And beside the cross & surplice have there civil use, as a cross for a shop sign, &c.

But if one spirit cross another, those spirits must be tried (saith the Apost.) and where there is want of reason and good ground, there is that spirit, which the Rej. blameth, and objecteth to others. Now upon a short trial, it may appear, where it waketh: The Rej. told us before, that some ceremonies are mixed, partly civil, and partly sacred; now he telleth us with the same breath, that any ceremony in religious affairs is merely sacred and ecclesiastical: And by proportion any Ceremony. in civil affairs must needs be merely civil, what then is become of the mixed or common sort: here sure is a contradiction from what spirit soever it come. 2. What an assertion is this, any ceremony used in religious affairs, is merely sacred? If men and women come purposely in their best apparel to church, if they compose themselves to a grave posture, give the upper place to the chiefest persons, and take such to themselves, as they may hear the preacher in, and yet have no exception taken against them for it, if all the places and seats be made cleanly and fit for a meeting, to be held in a comely fashion, all these are ceremonies. according to the Rej. his definition, yet no man but out of contention will affirm they are merely religious, or ecclesiastical: For all these in the same manner & to the same immediate end, the same persons would do, if the meeting were to hear the magistrate propound unto them a grave civil business, concerning the common wealth affairs. And surely that which remaining the same may be civil, is not merely and properly ecclesiastical, but common to both uses, and rather merely civil, then merely ecclesiastical, because civility is supposed and included in ecclesiastical affairs, but ecclesiastical proceedings are supposed and included in civil. Dr. Jackson in his original of unbelief, pag. 337. doth well observe: That decent behavior doth change the subject only, not alter its own nature and form, whilst its used in matters sacred: Nor is the habit of civil complement, or good manners, such an unhallowed weed, as must be laid aside, when we come into the sanctuary. And indeed there is no more reason, to shut civility out of the church, or sacred business, then to shut religion out of the town-house or civil affairs. 3. That which is added of a civil use of the Ceremony. in question doeth nothing agree. If a porter or baker wear a linnen garment in the Church, upon occasion, as at other times, no man will except against it, or account it a ceremony, ecclesiastical, or religious.

A cross that is used for a shopp sign, hath no ecclesiastical or civil use in religion, except there be so many temples in one place, that they must be distinguished by signs, as shoppes are: As for the examples mentioned before, of the Bishops in their formalities, and the Clerks in their surplices, at a funeral for civil use: I answer, the immediate end of such formalities is religious, even in that, they are characters of ecclesiastical persons, and their religious office: Are not Rochetts and such like formalities ecclesiastical ceremonies, being signs of chief ecclesiastical officers as such? The funerall, at which they are present, doth no more make them civil, then among the Papists it maketh all their superstition to become a civil order: Nay by this it appeareth that both civil ceremonies may be used in ecclesiastical affairs, and ecclesiastical ceremonies in civil affairs, because both may be used in the same affairs. To traverse these notions more full, I add these considerations: These words, matter pertaining to religion added in the explication of sacred ceremonies. may carry a double sense. 1. That it is enough to make ceremonies sacred, if this be their end to be serviceable to something, which is an ordinance, or to some person, in a holy function, or performance of an ordinance, and this seems to be the Rej. meaning for his examples carry this meaning, when wearing of blacks, rending of garments, in days of humiliation are made by him sacred ceremonies as also by those words, wherein he is so peremptory, and expresseth his lordly censuring, even of men's hearts, in lusting after contradiction, if they deny ceremonies used in religious affairs to be merely ecclesiastical, but this we conceive to be false, & hope it hath in part, and shall appear to be more plainly in the following discourse.

Secondly it may carry this sense: that is truly sacred, when the object is God, and his honor aimed at immediately, as when we kneel to God in prayer, we do not kneel to the scripture, or man praying but God directly: or when the next object is a holy thing, but so attended as by that, or in the use of that, we tender up honor to God and attain that end. As the minister preacheth the word to the people, and they hear it preached, but by both and in the virtue of both, according to God's appointment, the heart is carried in holy affections, and apprehensions to him, and so both hold out God's honor: So Sacraments given and received, excommunicatiō dispensed, they hold out the spiritual government of God and his honor unto us, & bring our hearts under his hand to give that honor which is due to his power, sovereignty, and holiness, appearing therein unto us: This only makes a thing properly sacred, but if things of any nature, only so far attend a religious, either person, thing, or performance, as that they help not in carrying out the act to God, and so tendering honor to him, but stand only in a distance, and subordination as things of necessity, or in some conveniency presupposed to go before a religious work, in a common way to that, as to other things, in the like proportion, and have the self same work in that sacred as in civil affairs, this is not sacred at all: So place and time, a font, will do as much to any civil action, as to a sacred: So that only religion applieth, and takes to itself, that civil circumstance, that it might put forth his own act, as upon a stage, makes such things do as much for him, as for any politic and natural work, Religion serve its turn upon these occasions. In a word the ground lies here: The latter art, ever useth the work of the former, sometimes for necessity, sometimes for conveniency, and adjoining himself to it, doth of itself, do its own work: So that the thing, is either a subject unto which the act of religion or policy is applied, or else, that fitness which such things have in subordination, to have other things to be annexed to them, is that common end, which such things hold out indifferently, by the same rule, to civil and sacred actions, and ergo are common to them both, but are neither properly: Instance thus: A magistrate of the common wealth; A General in the field; A minister of a congregation, they may successively stand upon the same hill: the magistrate to deliver the law, and judgment, to the subject: The General to give his charge to the soldiers: The Minister to preach unto a congregation. Is any man such a wise••ker, as to say, this hill is a civil, or politic hill, a warlike hill, a sacred hill, because it serves all these actions of policy, war, and religion: so that to make the point plain, because we are forced to show forth the feebleness of the Rej. dispute, we will now from these grounds (Reader) reason, and exemplifye, that the meanest may understand.

If to be applied to a religious affaire, make a thing sacred, then all things almost and all arts may be sacred, because they may be applied to a matter, thing, or person religious, as the next object and end. If the pulpitt be a sacred thing, because it is applied to support the minister preaching: then is the air sacred, its applied to his speech in speaking: then is the light sacred, its applied to his eye in reading, then are his spectacles sacred, for they are used by him, reading his text, then the two pottle potts, which hold the wyne consecrated, should be sacred potts, Nay the ministers doublett, that covers him, yea if he was hoarse, and took some oil to help his voice, they should now become sacred doubletts, and sacred oil. The paper book which the preacher looked on, when he is out in his sermon, should be a sacred paper book, and to follow the Rej. if putting on of ashes upon the head, be sacred in the day of humiliation, then by like proportion, when God enjoines people in a fast, to putt on their poorest and meanest attire, those ragged bands, and old Capps, and Quoifes were sacred bands, and Quoifes and Capps: But do you laugh at these things masters? when the Rej. is so violent in this cause, that he breaks the bridle, and flies out against all, that will not yield to him in this: And I would wish the reader to consider how righteous it is, with God, to suffer men to fall foully whē they will follow their own imaginations: Erewhyle the Rej. made all things Ceremony. by the loosnes of his definition, and now to help the Ceremo. he would make all things sacred by the large compass he gives to religious Cere. The vanity of which expression, I hope appears sufficiently, by that, which hath been said, but yet that the meanest may feel with his finger, the grossnes of this mistake, I shall add one more instance. The height of the sun, or the sound of a clock one & the same, may at the same time, in the same city, be a directiō for Protestants, Papists, Jews, Anabaptists, & all sects to assemble for religious service: It may at the same time by the same sound be a direction, for magistrats to meet for judicature, for drunkards to meet to riott, for gaimsters to meet to play, for travelers to meet to set upon their journey: so that it hath relation to all these religious politic, profane practices at once, I would fain have the Rej. tell me, what a kind of Ceremony this is? If he say religious, I then demand, is it Anabaptistical, Papistical, Iudaicall, Lutheran, Protestant, Arminian, superstitious, or truly religious cerem. is it any one of these, or all of these, for to them all it serves in their intentions, and purposed observation, and by the institution of him that set it up happily. Nay it hath relation to many other affairs, and so it shall be a politic, civil cerem. it serves to that end, it may be called, a riding, a playing, a drunken cerem. for it serves at once to all these purposes, and in all their intentions and purposed observations hath equal relations unto all: Again those things whose end is immediatly God's honor, they must be able to cause that honor, for each thing can reach his own and immediate end, in the course of nature, or rational institution, one time or other: But all things which only attend upon religious affairs, can never attain this end, or cause the worship of God in lifting up his honor: of this kind are time and place, being bare circumstances: the like may be said of the font, which is no more sacred, then the mudd & banks were that contained the water of Iordā where baptism was celebrated.

Thus of the definition in the general, some other specialls be, in the explication whereof, I shall desire the Rej. judgment, and help a little, that I may understand his meaning, at his next return. When he saith, pag. 36.

If the next immediate use belong to religion, as Jereboam's setting up of his calves, that the people might worship there, the action shall be construed religious whether true or falsely so called.

Join to this the words of the eight corallary which go thus:

It is not the same end, and use, which maketh a ceremony part of divine worship, I desire a reconciliation of these two: For:

That which makes actions, such species of religious worship as Jereboam's bowing to the Calves, that makes them parts of divine worship, though false.

But the use and end here make actions such true and real species of false worship religious, as Jereboam's bowing to the calves was: ergo, the use and end makes Ceremony. parts of divine worship.

Again he saith: it is not so much the term from which, that shall denominate the action, as the term to which, Pag. 36.

If he mean by not so much, that is never a whitt, as I conceive he doth or must, I desire he would inform us, by his next answ: of this case: Conceave a man (coming to do homage according to custom to the King) shall by reason of an erroneous conceit, bow out of a sacred opinion and affection, though the object be civil, and the act terminated in the person of the King, whether is this action sacred or no?

Again I enquire what those words mean: The same Ceremony which is in present use sacred, may be forth with by the change of the object become civil: The people bowing down worshipped God and the King, the Ceremony was materially the same, but objectively different. These expressions need a comment: If by materially the same, he mean the natural action is the same, its true, but that is nothing to this purpose. Let him tell us, whether there is a peculiar specification of those actions in themselves, before they come at the object: Since the object supposeth the being of the thing in its kind, before it can be an adjunct to it: If there be the same specific and formal nature of the action, then that bowing being civil when it is performed to a man, why might not John have tendered the like to an Angel, and the angel received it, in that he might have done it, as to a fellow servant of higher honor and account, and the angel needed to have feared religious worship, for he being known once to be a creature, the change of the object would have altered the worship: But the angel it seems was of another opinion, then the Rej. and conceived that it was religious worship before it came to him, and would not have been civil worship if the object had been changed.

The third partition (of sacred Ceremo. into properly sacred, is those of divine institution, which are simply necessary, necessitate praecepti, & reductively so called, as those which in their particular have no divine institution, but are applied to things divine, and these are arbitrary and ambulatory cerem. This partition is something obscure and therefore should not have been set down in bare words, but had some sufficient warrant and explication: For 1. if these be true members they must have the true nature of things sacred agreeing to them both equally and essentially: but things which are applied to Divine actions, have not the nature or definition of things sacred, because they be applied as adjuncts to the subjects in a seperable manner. Its all one as if a man should divyde, a living creature, either that which is so properly, as a man, or that which is so reductively, as a garment, because it is applied to a man. 2. Proper is usually opposed either to tropical, or to common, or to alien, or else to unfit, unto none of these senses can it be referred in this place where it is opposed to reductive. 3. Sacred arbitrary cerem. are in truth arbitrary worship, and arbitrary worship is will worship. 4. I would know to whom our Cere. are arbitrary? Surely to the imposers only, and so all instituted Ceremony. are arbitrary, though to others, they be made never so necessary, they are not (it will be said) made necessary to salvation. No more say I are all popish Ceremony. nor all Divine, absolutely necessary to salvation, nor so made or esteemed: Ours are made, as necessary to salvation, as man can make them, when the ordinary means of salvation, are absolutely denied to all those that refuse them.

*The fourth partition is, of reductive sacred ceremo. into rightly so called, and abusively: which is indeed an explication of the former division, for sacred Ceremony. of Divine institution, are rightly called and the other abusively: But the Rej. fyndeth both these under the head of reductively sacred (Rightly reductively sacred strang amazing terms) are they whose object and end is good, and the things not unapt, &c. where I cannot but admire, that no place is given, to a good efficient or institutor, with fit authority in matters of institution: we cannot understand by this description, but a Ceremo. is as sacred and religious, when it is appointed by a Vestrye of Layicks, as when the convocation imposeth it. 2. The papists have as good ends, and objects, and also as much aptness in most of their Ceremony. as we have in ours, and yet they are taxed by our divines, as not rightly sacred, and they themselves are ashamed to defend sacred ceremonies, merely human, or without special authority of the institutors, how good soever they esteem them for object and end: So the Rhem. on Math. 15.9. Ceremony. are made by the H. Ghost, joining with our Pastors, in the Regiment of our Church. So also Bristow against Dr. Fulk in his Rejoi. to Bristow, pag. 104. Nay there is no order of Friars that will admit of new Ceremon. to be rightly reduced upon them, what ever their object, end, and aptness be, except they come from the institutor of the order: All Casuists do hold it for a wrong unto them, if their Priors, Abbatts Generalls, should impose upon them the observance of anything, beside the vow which they have made, to observe the rites instituted by their founder: And are not we Christians, as much tied by our vow unto Christ, as they are to Dominicus, Franciscus, &c. Or are we more subject to our Prelates, then they are to their superiors, by vow of obedience? Luther also hath given us a good item in Gen. 22. In religion nothing is to be attempted or rashly adventured upon, but in things belonging thereunto, we must always enquire, who, how good, and great the person is who commands: But the Devil changeth these things, in to what, of what quality, and how great the thing is. Is it not strange then, that from an ancient reverend minister of the Gospel, a hundred years after, there should come a doctrine, of right instituted reductive sacred Ceremon. without any respect of the authority, which is in the institutor? And yet even if these conditions made necessary by the Rej. a question may be made concerning the cross, whether two cross motions of a finger and a thumb, be things apt to putt Christians in mind of Christ's passion for us, and our passion and profession for him?*

Abusively reductive sacred Ceremony. saith the Rej. are Idolatrous, superstitious: Idolatrous, respecting a wrong object: Superstitious made divine in terms or in effect: Impious, casting-off God's Ceremony. or obscuring the Gospel, by representing the History and mystery thereof by dumb shows, as in the Pageants of the Mass. Here again the same fault is committed, that opposite members of a distribution, are made subordinate one to another, and may be predicated or affirmed, as Genus and Species, which is an infinite feebleness, in a judicious disputer: for are not idolatrous, impious: are not superstitious impious Ceremonies. as those which professedly cross the first and second command, wherein piety is most properly placed, and thus divisions fill up places and breed confusion.

CHAP. VI. Concerning the difference betwixt popish Ceremonies. and ours, in regard of necessity, holiness and efficacy, wherein how far we join with the Papists, is fully discussed by the confession of papists themselves.

To let pass the first abuse of Idolatry: Superstition is confessed to be present, where the proper service of God or merit, necessity, holiness, and efficacy, by the churches institution or the doers merit, or when omission of them is counted a sin without contempt or scandal, as it is amongst the Papists, saith the Rej.

We are now come by this distinction, to discern the differences betwixt the popish Ceremony. and ours, theirs being condemned and abominated, and that justly for these evils which are found in them: but ours are wholly acquitted, as though they shared not in the same guilt: Let us therefore enquire into this business, with that received caution, hear the other side.

First as touching merit, which is attributed to the doing of Ceremonies. by Papists: the difference here, lies not firstly in Ceremony. in particular, but about good works in general, the Papists making all good works of believers to be meritorious, and we denying that presumption. But set that controversy aside, our Prelates professed, the observation of our Ceremony. to be good works of the same kind, that many of the learned Papists do many of theirs. The main enquiry lies about, propriety of worship, necessity, holiness, efficacy: And (merit being excluded) if these be found in ours, as well as in those of the papists, they will prove guilty as theirs, and with theirs to be condemned.

Enquire we then, of the severalls: 1. In the doctrine of worship I see not how, or wherein the Jesuits do differ from the Def. and Rej. about such Ceremonies as ours. Balthasar Chavasius the Jesuit, in his notes of true religion saith thus: Ceremonies are called lesser, in respect of those which are termed greater, because these are held of greatest consequence, and to appertain to divine worship, of themselves, and directly: but those to wit such are ceremonies of lesser note, they so far conduce to the worshipping of God, as they serve for the ornament & signification of such worship, or the special parts thereof: which is so pat the Rej. & Def. doctrine, that they may seem to have translated his words.

For necessity to salvation, no learned Papist ever writ or taught any such thing of all their Ceremony. Darbyshyre Bonners Chaplyne, and Kynsman, professed to M^r. Thomas Haukes Martyr, that no Ceremony. (beside those which Christ himself instituted) are necessary to salvation, but only for instruction: whereupon M^r. Haukes answered; God send me the salvation, and take you the instruction. If necessity of observance be respected (which the Def. ca. 6. sect. 3. calleth obediential,) that is not only as great in our Ceremony. as in any of the Papists, and more also, but advanced by D^r. Covell to aequipage with the Decalogue, and D^r. B. by his silence yielding unto him, and imitating of him, doth seem to subscribe to his sentence, and certain it is, that he writ with Achyepis. allowance. Ecclesiastical constitution, saith he, doth change the nature of indifferent things, & by virtue of the commandment they become necessary, Men's Laws while they are in force, commanding or forbidding, bind the conscience as the Decalogue doth, in his preface to the confutation of Dr. B. his Apologie: The Rej. comes not far short of this plea, pag. 42. where he saith: They are ordained to be used necessarily, in respect of order and peace, though in respect of judgment, and immediate conscience to God freely: The former part of these words, layeth more necessity upon our Ceremony. then the learned Papists do upon all theirs: The latter doth take away no more, then the like words of theirs do, as by and by shall appear. In the mean time let him that can unriddle me this: They are ordained to be used necessarily in respect of order and peace, though in respect of Judgment, and immediate conscience to God freely: Is there one conscience mediate, and another immediate? Is necessity of order and peace free in judgment and immediate Conscience? Can any creature, or is any so foolish as to say, they can lay a bond upon conscience immediate to God? Is it not a contradiction, for men by their authority, to bynd immediately to God's authority? The truth is our convocation doth make our Ceremonies, as necessary as they can, either by ecclesiastical, Civil, or Divine authority, whereas the Papists say, they can make many of theirs more necessary, then they do, if they would: And yet in all, their highest pitch is, they call them necessary: Not out of any necessity to salvation, but out of the churches institution: and enjoined the Sacramentalia, not by any necessity of a sacrament, but of a commandment of the church, and we do no less.

For making it sin to omit these cere. even without the case of scandal & contempt. 1. This no learned papist doth say of all their cer. as you shall hear straight. 2. Our practice doth say so much in that, bare omission where none are scandalized or contemned, is made a fault punishable, nay more then that, when by the practice of them, many are scandalized, and great contempt doth follow to some users of them, yet is it, a capital fault for them to omit them so longe, until they may use them without scandal, and contempt: And what hath been said of worship, necessity, and sin as that we concur with papists cerem. pressing our Ceremon. upon the same conditions, as they in the former considerations, the like is true also touching holiness.

Now because some of these things, which I have affirmed, concerning the doctrine of the Papists about Ceremony. may seem strange to those, that take the measure of their opinion, not from them, but from the occasional and imperfect sayings of their adversary parties: It shall be necessary, to hear themselves speak: First let us hear Cassander with his allegations, who so much consenteth with D. Burgess, that his Rej. might better have been called, and entitled Cassander Anglicanus, then M. Sprints book was, save only, that there is more passion shown in it, then Cassanders temper, and professed moderation could be brought unto. Cassander in his consult. article 7. I conceive that to be false, that any of ours should have taught, those external rites and Ceremo. to be worships necessary to procure justification before God: Neither is any other thing attributed to those rites, but that their external observation may admonish us of the true and internal worship, and might by the hand lead us thereunto: And if they be done out of true faith in Christ and obedience unto the Church of Christ, to which Christ hath commanded as to be subject, they receive that acceptance from God, which other works of pyety do:

But that all ingeniously confess, our hope of happiness is not to be placed in them: Again, the same Cassander pag. 869. The false opinion of worship, merit, necessity, the Pontificans themselves (upon whom that conceit is fa•hered) do not acknowledge, but affirm that it is falsely attributed unto them. Of this judgment Thomas Aquinas, and Byell are said to be by the same Author pag. 870.871. And in p. 875. If the explicatiō of those positive precepts be considered, they will be found, not to differr much for an •dvice or exhortation, &c. If the sentence of some may ap•ear more rigid: I believe, that no man is forbid to follow •he more moderate opinion, which is explained by Gerson, and followed by many worthy men, who in the transgression of such kind of precepts, place the mortal sin only in •candall, and contempt. The same author in the same places. Alphonsus Verbesius thus: Our traditions bring no deadly •anger unto the transgressors thereof, unless the heart be im•ious and contemning. Perionius (out of the sentence of the •orbone School as I suppose) writes thus: there be many Cere. •n the church, which fall under the nature of a counsel, but •hose which come under the nature of a precept, the violators •o not of them, all ours would make guilty of sin, unless peradventure they shall be found contemners.

This which Cassander saith is fair, yet to make it more full, I will add some other testimonies, and those of note. Gregorius de Valentia a Jesuit, Tom. 4. dispute. 3. question. 1. part. 4. It is a notorious lie, that we attribute so much to these rites as we do to the Sacraments, and that we have them in the same account, as though a true Sacrament could not be instituted without them: If any of the vulgar sor• err in that behalf and so conceive, assuredly; neither the church nor divines so teach: If they be omitted without scandal and contempt, and the matter be small and that a seriou• will and full deliberation be wanting, it will be only a venial sin. So Cajetan a Cardinal: The rule is universal, that in those things which stand by a positive law, if the transgression be made without contempt, and crossing the end of th• law, from some excuse appearing to the party, if it procee• from him, who hath a mind no ways syding against the command which bynds to a mortal sin, a mortal sin is no• by that breach committed, because it is not the intention of th• holy and just mother the church, to ensnare such good souls▪ with so dangerous a bond.

Bellarmino also thus: Certain Ceremony. are immediate worship, some dispose unto worship, some are instruments of worsh•p: The same author in the s•me place, cap. 31. Calvin sayt• he judgeth it a fault, if Ceremony. be omitted out of contempt o• gross negligence, and our Church teacheth no other thing touching her Ceremonies. The same author again: Other Ceremonies are not laws, but admonitions, and holsome institutions, which bynd not a man over to any blame, such as many of the rites of Christians be, for he doth not offend, that without contempt, doth not sprinkle himself with holy water, when he enters into the temple.

It was but a poor proof therefore of the Rej. to allege, that which Bell• saith of some Ceremonies, as if it did agree to all popish Ceremony. and that in the common judgment of Papists. Calvin speaking in the person of Sorbonicall D^{rs}, declareth their opinion to be; That Ceremonies bynd consciences by accident, to wit, because of their ratification, in that the church intend this, and the people consent. Lastly the judgment of Papists is clear, that they putt no holiness in the Ceremony. instituted, you must place no holiness in images, Council. Trid. Sess. 25. By this which hath been said, it is (as I think sufficiently manifested, that the differences betwixt all popish Cere. and ours, of worship, necessity, holiness, and sinful omission, are vainly and without ground alleged by the Rej.

- 1. Do the Defend. and Rej. affirm, that our Cere. are not properly worship, but only to admonish us thereof: The Papists say the same.
- 2. Do the Defen. and Rej. affirm, that the omission of them without scandal and contempt, is not a sin: The Papists say the same.
- 3. Do the Def. and Rej. affirm, ours are not necessary to salvation, but necessary by the commaundof the Church to be practiced: The Papists say the same, nay of some of theirs, they say less, for they say, that many of theirs, are only appointed by way of counsel, not of command.

There is one other difference, which is added to the former, that Sacramental operation and efficacy is infeoffed upon Popish Ceremony. as he mentioneth pag 40. out of Bellar. I add concerning this: 1. That Bell. doth not affirm this of all Cere. 2. that he doth not ascribe this virtue to the cross as a human Ceremo. but as an imagined institution of God: especially from the institution of God: The chief Jesuits do disclaim this operative virtue of many Ceremony. Sacramentalls do not work remission of venial sins, neither are they appointed to signify that, but to stir up their mind to detestation of them: So the Jesuit Vasquez. Balthasar Chavasius another Jesuit: It is without question, that we putt so much difference between Ceremony. and the Sacraments, to which they are applied, as between the bark, and the wood, the body and the soul, the leaves and the tree, whence it is we grant that they may be omitted in any wayghty necessity. Cassander also Consult. art. 9. well observeth, that the best Papists do make the Cere. of Bapt. only, certain visible words: from whence it followeth, that they give no other operation to them then to words, which all favorers of sig. ceremo. must needs give: And our prelates do give in all their proceedings, and expressions: as by the following arg. shall appear.

1. What ever is a mean any manner of way ordained, to bring in divine worship, and to carry the mind and heart to God in that: is so morally efficacious, as the Papists require, and so as our Divines condemn it. Nay if it be by teaching, & stering towards these supernatural works, as God's spiritual worship: Its that which the Lord condemns in images, which tell lies, its that which the Lord threatens Isaiah. 29.13. that his fear is taught, according to men's commands. And this kind of efficacy our Ceremony. have by their institution as they are appointed, and enjoined to be used. The preface to the book of common Prayer, discovering the intendement of the imposers, hath these words: Such are retained, which are apt to stir up the dull mind of man to the remembrance of his duty to God, by some notable and special signification, whereby he might aedified.

2. These Ceremo. which are of the same kind, and homogeneal with the significative part of the actions in the Sacrament, they may be said, to have a real and true efficacy of teaching, and so be a work of proper worship: because that part of the Sacrament, which is placed in signification, is so: but these ceremonies are homogeneall, & of like nature, with that part of the Sacrament, doth baptism consecrate the child to God? and so doth the cross: doth baptism signify the covenant, between Christ & the child? so doth the cross: its openly said, to betoken the engagement, that is betwixt Christ and the child, that he shall be Christ's servant, and soldier to follow his colors, and to fight under his banner unto his dying day: though this image have no tongue of it own, yet its speaks by the mouth of the Prelates appointing, and their substitutes the ministers acting this image.

3. Consider that which is made end of our Ceremony. that our Ceremony. are able, or at least are conceived to be able to attain, for every rational means can reach the end, now this is the end of the cross his institution, the white at which it shoots, and the minister makes it spell this lesson, even our dedication unto Christ▪ and our continual perseverance in his service, so that as the end is, so the means are, the end is properly holy, and religious, ergo, the means appointed thereunto (such this is) must be holy religious and efficacious thereunto, in the intendement of the institutor.

4. Those which are of the same rank, and set in the same room, with God's own Cere. they must be conceived to have holiness, and efficacy in them, for so God's ordinances have. But these significant Cere. thus instituted, are of the like nature with some of God's own spiritual rites, As the Phylacteries Nub. 15.39. were appointed by God, for this end, to be remembrances, and admonishers of the law to those that used them: the same place our Ceremony. supply, and are ordained for the same purpose.

If it be here said, that God himself appointed his, and therefore they are holy and religious, but ours being instituted by man have no more then man can give them, I answ: God appoints his, and therefore they are truly holy, and religious, and ought to be embraced: Men's inventions being set in the same rank, are holy, •nd religious, but falsely and superstitiously such, and •herfore are to be abandoned.

CHAP. VII. Touching other partitions of Ceremonies, Pag.

A Fift partition is, that of sacred Ceremony. some are perpetual, as divine, some temporary, moveable, alterable, ambulatory as human, and of ambulatory some •re free, and some are fixed.

Of the perpetuity of Divine Ceremon. there is no question, of the alterableness of human, 1. That is a corrupt rule which the Rej. addeth viz. that they are all•enable, when in the judgment and consciences of those to whom it belongs to discern thereof (that is with us to the •nconvocation house) they become not unprofitable alone, but •angerous and hurtful. For not to repeat here, that all •umaine Ceremoniesare unprofitable, dangerous, hurt•ull, 1. unprofitableness alone is sufficient to cashyre a Ceremony of man's making: consider well of these •easons.

- 1. If God's own Ceremonies were therefore to be removed because unprofitable, then much more ours, Heb. 7.18.
- 2. If we must answer for idle words, then much more for idle ceremonies.
- 3. That wherein neither the governor, attains his end in cōmaunding, nor the governed his in obeying, tocommaund that is unlawful: but he that commands unprofitable Ceremo. he attains not his end in commanding, nor the governed his end in obeying: Ergo.

- 4. 2. Coll. 18. Those things which perish in the using, with those we must not be burdened: but unprofitable Ceremo. perish in the using: ergo, with those we must not be burdened.
- 5. Things indifferent, when they are used not in subordination to help forward moral duties, then their use is unlawful, but when they are unprofitable, then they are not in subordination to help forward the moral. Ergo.
- 6. That which crosseth the place and office of the governor, that he must not do or maintain: but to enjoin a thing unprofitable is against his office and place: for his office is to rule for our good, Rō. 13.4. but unprofitable things are not so. Ergo.
- 7. That which the magistrate can command or maintain in the Church, he must do by virtue of some precept: That which is done by virtue of a precept, will be avayleable to bring about that end, whereof there is a precept, but unprofitable things cannot attain that end: Ergo cannot be done by virtue of a precept: ergo, are not under the command of a magistrate.

Again when its here referred by the Rej. to the judgments and consciences of governors to discern of the dangerousnes of Ceremony. and I would fain know, whether the consciences of all the Christians in England, •e so subjected, and tied, to the flei••e of the convocations•onscience, that without it they may not judge, no nor •iscerne of the unprofitablenes, danger, and hurt of the Ceremo. which they are to practice, surely this is more •ervile, blind obedience, then the wiser sort of papists •ill admit of. The Inquisitor Silvester, in the word •rupulus, saith that: To interpret discretly, human precepts (ϕ) the court of conscience, belongs to everyone,as touching his •one practice. This was one ground that Paulus Venetus ••lgentius, and the other Venetian divines stood upon, •hat every man whom it did concern, might and ought • discern of any superiors precept, even the popes,•hither it were lawful and convenient or no: But •erein the Rej. had consented (as it seemeth with D. •ovell pag. 19. that in such things as these are, the prae•ept of the superior doth bynd, more then the consci•nce of the inferior can: And that the subject having •he command of King, or Bishop, for his warrant, ought •ot to examine, but only to perform what he seeth •ommaunded, A very good stirrup if it be well held, for • help men up by, that they may ride upon men's con••iences, at their pleasure. D^r. Davenant taught us other •octrine at Cambridge: when upon Coloss. 2.13. In •pposition to Jesuitical blind obedience, he shown •ven out of Thomas Aquinas, that subjects may and ought • judge with the judgment of discretion the decre•ees of their ••periors, so far as it concerns their particular: and against •he Rej. his contrary doctrine let these reasons be wei•hed.

If the judgment of the governor be not the rule of imposing, then is it not the rule of removing Ceremo• but the first is denied by all, even the Rej. and therefore the second part cannot be granted. 2. If Ceremony. mus• not be removed before they be discerned dangerous by the consciences of the Governors, then Governors do not synn, if they retain Ceremonie. never so bad, provided that in their judgments and consciences they seem no dangerous, that being by the former grant the rule of their removeall, but this is absurd: ergo. 3. If Governors have authority to keep any Ceremonies imposed, until they seem dangerous & hurtful unto them then all other are bound to obey in the practice, of such Ceremonie. though in their consciences they ought to be removed, because the judgment of the governor, is the rule of maintaining, or removing: and thus they should be brought into a snare and a necessity of synning, either to go against their consciences rightly informed, and so sin: Rom. 14. last: or to go against the judgment of the governor, and so against the rule (that being the rule of retaining by the new doctrine of the Rej.) and so also sin: Again of ambulatory free Ceremonie. the Rej. give only an example out of ancient times, but we could wish some examples in England. It seemeth we are more fettered and less free in all the Ceremonie we have, then any approved course doth warrant: The explication of ambulatory fixed Ceremonie is as uncouth, as their title: Their observation, must ever be free in respect of the judgment, to be had of them, but the practice only is required For if all judgment, to be had of them, be free, then they are free to account them unlawful, hurtful or unprofitable. 2. Ought the practice to be required either against the judgment or without it? A brute practice is not required, neither is there properly any good practice, but willing out of judgment, Those therefore that so require and fix our practice, must needs as much as in them lies, require and fixe our judgment in some manner: But in every deed no man or convocation of men (either de jure, or de facto) can fixe another's judgment, concerning lawful or unlawful, They may arrogate so much to themselves, & command men to captivate their wills unto them, & by their wills so far as they can their judgments, yet the judgment they cannot fixe, but only the outward practice: Neither is it anything to me, what authority others do arrogate to themselves, concerning my practice, but what they require me to practice: I should account him as good a master or Lord, that should say, do this upon judgment, that thou shouldest do it, because I command it, as him, that saith, thou shalt do this, judge what thou wilt judge: The Rej. it may be will say, that he meaneth a freedom of judgment, in not accounting of them necessary to salvation: But no learned Papist holds their Ceremonias minores necessary to salvation, if he speak of necessity of synning upon omission without scandal or contempt, that hath been handled before. Zanchius in his Ep. to Q. Elizabeth dealeth plainly, & patts to the point in hand. If these Cer. be propounded to Christians they must be propounded, either as indifferent or necessary: If this, we do impiously, to make those things necessary, which God hath left indifferent: If that, they are then to be left free, unto the church, but by commaunding & cōstraining we make them necessary: So Calvin de vera Ecclesiae reformatione Opus. pag. 337. They will except, that they be things of a middle nature, the use whereof is indifferent to Christians, why therefore do they forbidd anything to be omitted?

A sixth partition is of simple and double Ceremonie. double are described to be such, as beside their use, for order and decency, serve also to edification, by some profitable signification which either of themselves they have some aptness unto, or receive by appointment, as it were by common agreement. Where 1. the Rej. seemeth to double with us, when he maketh simple Ceremonie. to serve only for order and decency, without signification, when as before and after he telleth us, that no

Cere. may be dumb, but all must have their signification, 2. Order and decency seem to be separated from edification in some sacred Ceremon. which he knew not of that willed all things to be done unto edification. 3. All significant Ceremony. are supposed first to be in order and decency, and yet after so long a time, we are to learn what use our cross hath for order, more then a circle would have. 4. By the distinction or distribution here made, aptness of things for signification, either is in them of themselves or not, yet in the fourth partition our necessary rule was, that the things be not unapt unto their ends. 5. A strange power is here given unto the convocation, to make things apt for signification and edification, by their appointment, which before were not apt to any such thing. This was wont to be the peculiar of God, to call things that are not as if they were, and so make them this or that,

7. In the next place we are told of significant Cer. improperly sacramental, & those are so called either reductively, such 〈ϕ〉 are affixed to the use of the Sacrament, whether they bear no •ignificatiō, or bear some significancy, either of their virtues, •r of our duties, unto which we are obliged by the Sacrament: Or ••se they be analogically so called, if they be instituted to work ••pernaturall effects, the former are lawful, but not the latter. The delineation of these confused distinctions is this:

Significative Ceremonies are

- Sacramental
 - Properly,
 - Improperly.
 - reductive which are
 - not significative.
 - or significative.
 - analogical.
- Moral,

To all which members, I could have seriously wished the Rej. would have added acurate definitiōs or descriptions, and then he would either have been hyndered, from the confused setting of them down, or else he would have discovered, his infinite mistaking, and manifested to the world, how he had bewildered himself, while he mudds the water, and so would mislead the simple. But we will follow his foorstepps, only let us observe some conclusions out of the frame in general.

First is this: That some non significative Ceremony. are significative: or which is all one, significative Ceremo. are either

- non significative,
- or significative Sacramental.

This desperate absurdity lies open to the eye of any, that have their eyes anointed with the eye salve of Logic, and judicious discourse, for let but a fresh man, run up the special to his highest, and he shall perceive some nō significative to be the special to the Genus of a significative cere. 2. Cer. reductively sacramē•all & not significative, do properly appertain to sacred Cer. reductively, & by right so called, & have been handled before, & are here wholly heterogeneal. 3. Its well to be noted that human Cer. affixed to the Sacram. & bearing significancy of the Sacram. virtue, & obligations, are such as the Rej. fighteth for: But these are analogically sacramental, for analogy, similitude, or proportion, cannot be denied to be betwixt two signs, which signify the same virtues, the same duties, & the same obligatiō to these duties, And though the Rej. say again & again, they were never held unlawful: Ye• learned Chamier in the name of our Divines & reformed churches hath these words: We observe come•y circūstances in the celebration of the Sacrament, but we justly condemn those, who have added such things, unto which they have phansyed mysteries, & proper significations, & that of those effects which appertain unto the water of baptism: As though the work should be twice or thrice done, and that either nothing, or that was not sufficient which was done by divine appointment, unless human rashness should have added supply. And the Waldēses who first reformed their churches, & purged out all their popish levē, renoūced all such human Cer. or Traditious as unlawful as manifestly appeareth by all Papists and Protestants, that have set down their confession & practice. 4. If Analogically Sacramental Cere. be impious aemulators of God's holy Sacraments, as the Rej. confesseth, what can be said, why human significant Cer. analogical to divine significāt should not by parity of reason, be esteemed impious aemulators of God's holy signs, Is it forbidden to aemulate God's Sacra. only, & not all his holy ordinances?

After all these come in moral significāt Cer. which are only to express some benefitt, whi•h God giveth us, or to notify, profess, or express some duty, which we owe to him, or one to another. But I do not see wherein these differ, frō reductive Sacra. Cer. except it be in this, that it may so fall out, that these sometimes are not affixed to Sacraments, This head therefore seemeth to be added, only because D. Morton had used it before, and for his sake let us a little further weigh it, when therefore the Rej• affirms, that morally significant are ordained to express some benefitt on God's part, some duty on ours. By some benefitt or duty he must mean any spiritual benefitt, or duty, beside the covenant, which he professedly mentioneth & excepteth, for if one benefitt may be signified, why not any one, & this morally significant, are religious or sacred significant in the general, the Species as large as the Genus: Hence again morally significant, will be a genus to sacramental reductively significant, for that is but a particular signification of some benefitts, & duties in the Sacrament, which are included under this General, & so one species of the distributiō shall become a Genus to the opposite member, & contradistinct species. If it be here replied that reductive significative sacramental is annexed to the Sacrament: I answer, that is nothing to the nature of the significancy, for take & use a cross out of baptism, in the same manner & to the same end, as in it, & it will be the same in the specifical nature of significancy, only so much the worse, because it is set cheek by jole with baptism. 2. I ask what he means by those words, express, profess: is it barely to declare? if so, then let him show who is his adversary, unless he will fall out with his shadow, for do not all his opposites grant, that sign• indicantia, or showing sygnes are lawful, but not symbolica.

Lastly, when he affirms, that these Ceremony. morally significant are not to signify the covenant of grace: I reply, if they may signify any other spiritual duty or benefitt, if they may signify the several essential duties of the covenant of each side, why may they not signify the whole covenant? 2. If the cross signifieth the consecration of the child to God, and so entrance into the covenant, the relation of a soldier, to a Commander, a servant to a master, and so is continuance and faithful perseverance in that profession to Christ, and his respect and regard of us according to those relations, then doth it signify the covenant? By this which hath been said, it appears, that the question is falsely stated: for these Ceremo. are more then holy by application in his sense formerly opened, they are pressed as necessary, and are used as analogically sacramental, as well as properly moral, and in signification, do partake something of the proper nature of Sacraments, as also in the significative teaching, and stirring up the heart: when its said, they are used in worship, they are external acts of God's worship falsely appointed by man, and serve not for order, nor decency, nor edification.

CHAP. VIII. Concerning a national Church answ. to the 60.61.62. of the Preface.

OF the faithful congregations, wherein we were borne, baptized, and nourished up in faith, there is no question made, but they are our loving and beloved mothers: Yet much question ariseth concerning that which the Rej. teacheth viz. That all those churches together, have one mother, and so we have a grandmother, that is the Church of England, considered as one church: and that by way of representation, as the convocation house, 2. by way of association and combination into one profession, worship, and discipline, which includeth the orders and officers, that is, the Hierarchy, pertaining thereunto, but not by any other collective consideration.

1. I never read either in Scripture, or in any orthodox writer, of a visible particular Church, either grandmother of Christians, or mother of other Churches, if the Rej. hath, he should do well to inform us, where we may find this doctrine explained. 2. I would willingly know, whether Christians & Christian churches also, were not in England, before this great grandmother? I think, the Rej. will not deny it, nor yet fly for succor to his phisitians, who have found out an herb, which is called of them, Son before the Father, to justifie his intention of Daughter before the Mother: He must confess, that this Grand-mothe•, is only a mother in law, and that law also to be man's, not God's. 3. All the churches of England, may as well be considered as one in unity of profession, without any new motherhood, as all the Latin Schools of England one, in the unity of the same Grammar, or all Gallenicall, or Platonicall Schools, one in their kind. 4. A Representative mother is the image of a mother, and an image, with commanding authority in religion, without God's command, is an Idol: It was well therefore, to this purpose, said of Zwinglius Explan. arti. 8. That you be a representative church, we willingly believe, for you are not the true church: But show I beseech you, whence you had this name: who styled you with this title? who gave you power of meeting, and combyning together? who granted you authority of coining decrees and Canons, differing from the word of God? who suffered you to impose these upon men? who persuaded you thus to burden Consciencs? who enjoined you to call evil good, and good evil? You are therefore an hypocritical church, which hath nothing sound in it, and substantial, but all things feigned and painted, But you are not that true church, that bride beseeming our Savior, who stays herself, upon the truth alone, and the Spirit of God. He speaketh these things of these, which under the name of Representative churches, imposed their inventions, upon true churches, without Scripture, which is a true representation of our representative convocation. 5. The Rej. confesseth, that this Hierarchical convocation is human and not divine, and he will not deny, but Christians, and Christian congregations are Divine. Now what a monstrous, and preposterous generation, then doth he make (as it were in a Chymaericall dream) of Divine Children, proceeding from human mothers and grandmothers: Our Savior was of another mind; when he made these two opposite, from earth, and from heaven: The Rej. hath found out so great consent between these two, that earth may be the mother, and grandmother of heaven: Besyde the human mother of Divine children, is not of their heavenly fathers choice, nor by him appointed, to bear the person of their true mother: But she was first putt into this office, by the presumption of men, and afterward authorised, by the Archmother of Rome, continuing her profession, by sleight & might, to represent those, from whom she can show no other letters of credence, for the power she usurpeth, then she maketh herself, or hath gotten by stealth from civil power.

6. This representative mother, is very seldom exstant viz, when there is a Parliament, which now we have not had these diverse years: And when she appeareth, she can give no milk to her children, further then she hath commission from man: None of her children can have access unto her, only she appointed many years since, certain servants of hers, with restraint of their fathers allowance, to diet them, with dry ceremonies, and scourge them, with silencing, deprivation, excommunication, if they find fault with that provision, which is very pap, with a hatchet; Is not such a mother worthy grand titles and honor?

7. The examples of such motherhood, which the Rej. fetcheth, from the assemblies of Israel, Scotland, and our Parliament, have no agreement. For 1. we read of no assemblies of Elders (by office in Israel) from whence all other were excluded, styled either Mothers of Israel, or all Israel: Neither was there in any such assemblies, this motherly authority exercised, of appointing human sacred Ceremo. unto Israel. 2. The assemblies of Scotland, before Perth, had no such state, as our convocation, nor power of commanding, but only advized of, and directed those things which God had appointed, and the churches were known to desire, yet might their judgment be well called, the judgment of the church of Scotland, because they pronounced nothing, but that which all the churches of Scotland, did publicly profess, even in their solemn confession. 3. Our Parliament is not styled, the Mother common wealth of England, yet in civil affairs, more liberty is left for style, and power, unto public assemblies, then in religious: But if the lower house of Parliament, were not more freely chosen, and of greater power, then the poor lower house of Convocation, a quære might be made, whether the state or common wealth of England were there or no.

Now for the second way of one church, by association, and combination of all particular churches into one profession, worship, and discipline: This is good, thus far, and the very same with that collective consideration, which the Repl. mentioned, and the Rej. termed a new misty inexplicable nothing, except combination doth mistyly cover under it, the swallowing up of particular congregations, by National, Provincial, Diocesan churches. But for that clause, that this must needs include, such orders and offices as our Hierarchy: this is either a begging, or a stealing of the main question: For 1. this Hierarchy consisteth of officers and orders (by the Rej. own confession) human, not divine: now association of profession, worship and discipline, may certainly be had by officers and orders divine. 2. The reformed churches of France, have their association, and combination, without any Hierarchy. 3. The Hierarchy doth not associate churches, under it, but subdue all to itself, so that, as the Pope, is sometime esteemed the Church of Rome, and sometime, he with his assistants, so is our Hierarchy in England. Beza in his notes of the church not far from the end, giveth warning of this: I most willingly leave the wholl frame of Episcopal authority to the Papists: of which (I openly profess) the Holy Spirit of God, was never the author, but human policy, which if we do not observe, to be accursed by God, we certainly as yet see nothing at all: and nourish we do a viper in our bosoms which will kill the mother. This prophecy is too true of the Hierarchy, as in other respects, so in this, that it seemeth to devour, our mother churches title, liberty, right and power, and in a great part hath prevailed.

9. It was added by the Replier, that the Hierarchy, is a creature of man's making, and may more lawfully be removed, when it pleaseth man, then ever she was by him erected. To this the Rej. answereth, confessing, that sundry offices and orders in our church are human, and not divine: adding, that accidental forms of discipline, are not determined in the word of God, but left in the churches liberty, to devise, as all but Anabaptists, and such as edge too near upon them consent.

Which words are worthy of a note or two: For he 1. acknowledgeth our Hierarchy of Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Archdeacons, &c. to be creatures of man's making, not divine: Now of these principally consist, our convoked mother church, as its well known, a few ministers being added to her, for fashion sake, so that this church is a church of man, not of God, by his own confession, and this church is said to be devised by the church, now it soundeth strangely, A church of the churches devising: Nor know I well, what the devising church of England can be. The Rej. telleth us, that there be, but two ways of considering, the Church of England, as one, either in the convocation house, or in that combination, which must needs (saith he) include the orders and officers, pertaining thereunto: Now in both of these ways Hierarchical orders and officers are supposed and included, so that the Church of England, neither of these ways could possibly devise these orders and officers. 3. The distinction used betwixt the essentials of discipline, and the accidental forms thereof, is obscure: And if these terms, may be interpreted, by that sense, which is given by the Rej. of Doctrinal and Ritual, substantial, circumstantial worship, that must be essential, which is commanded in the word, that is accidental, which is not commanded, but permitted. Then the Rej. in affirming essentials to be determined, and accidentals not, saith nothing else, but that which is determined, is determined, and that which is not determined, is not determined. 4. If he mean by accidental forms, circumstances of time, number, place and occasional course of proceeding, then he accuseth unjustly, not only us, but the Anabaptists themselves of opposing so manifest a truth, by all men confessed. 5. It would be worth a little pains of his to declare, how, and in what sense our Hierarchy is accidental, to the church, and discipline of England? The Bishops are efficient causes, even in a high rank, of our Discipline, they are principal members, of our Diocesan churches, they have an Ecclesiastical rule, and command over the particular congregations within their Dominion, by them and in their name, the essentials of ordination, institution, introduction, suspension, deprivation, excommunication, &c. are dispensed and disposed of: who will say, that these things, can agree to accidental forms. 6. Concerning edging upon Anabaptists, in this point it may with better reason be objected, to those that maintain Diocesan Bishops, then to those that oppose them, for it is well known, that the Anabaptists, in Holland, Zealand, and Frisland, have their Bishops, which have care of many congregations, within a certain circuit, & in all of them (though there be others that teach) they only, at their visitations, perform some main things belonging to the pastoral office. 7. The position (that our Bishops are human creatures of man's making) is not only to us, but to many of themselves, sufficient to condemn their office, some of them having publicly protested, that if it were so, they would not keep their places one day.

CHAP. IX. Concerning Superstition: answer to 64.65.66.67.68. of the Preface.

BEhold a new crime (O ye Judges!) and unheard of before this day: These who hold the relics of Popish confessed superstition, unlawful, are (in that very name) indicted of superstition. Nay they must be content to have it for their solemn style, in public writings, for so D^r. Morton hath dubbed them (To his superstitious brethren the non-conformists) and D^r. Burgess will maintain it. If any man take it ill, and say, that such a title doth rather beseem those, which allow of religious holy water, images, circumcision &c. beside crosses and surplices (as these two D^{rs} do,) he is straight way scurlous: But let us inquire into the Inditement.

1. It was noted by the Replier as a ridiculous piece of Rhethoricke, and a trick of prevention, usual with crafty men. The Rej. answereth these two titles suite not well, and the charge is weightye: which is very true, they suite not well, neither, to them they were intended unto, nor yet, betwixt themselves, and the charge of superstition, if it be in good earnest and upon ground, is weightye: But not well suting, do meet often times in affected accusations, and so do here ridiculous Rhetoric, and craftiness: She that hasted, to call her party whore, in the beginning of their scoulding fray, for fear she should be prevented, with that salutation, as more deserving it, was therein crafty, and yet if she called her whorish Sister, it was ridiculous: Ridiculous I account, a new unexpected toy, which bringeth some admiration with it, Now this accusation is such, for until now, it hath scarce been heard of. The Jesuits want neither invention, nor good will, in accusing such, as reject their ceremonies with all kind of reproaches, and yet they could never yet, hit upon this imputation, to charge them with superstition for that cause: Nay Balthasar Chavasius (a Jesuit) lib. 2. cap. 7. s. 54. though he would fain have astened some such thing upon us, yet seeing it would not ache, but be accounted ridiculous, even by his own reinds, he doth so much as say, he durst not do it for shame: We must not expect saith he, many superstitious expressions of undue worship, from those who are falsely called, Evangelical professors, considering these superstitions are ont to be certain, vain and superfluous observations: but hey (meaning the reformed churches) do bitterly inveigh almost against all Ceremonies. So our Rhemists on Acts 7. Sect. 4. discharge us of superstition:

whereupon D^r. Fulk saith: we accept of your restimbnie as the witness of our adversaries: And is it not admirable then? that our Def. and Rej. should go beyond the Jesuits in their own element, and teach them how, and in what sense, they may here after better accuse Calvin, and those that agree with him of superstition, then of rash irreligious, or profane innovation, for rejecting so many Ceremonies of theirs: which not only they, but also our Divines (if we may believe the Def. and Rej.) esteem easily reformable to good use, & not simply unlawful: And by the same reason, Non-residents, Pluralists, Tot Quots, common swearers of diminutive oaths, & dicers, standing upon the lawfulness of their practice, may upon that supposition, call those, that gaynesay them superstitious brethren.

2. For the exploding rather then answering or confuting of the foresaid ridiculous accusation it was alleged: That superstition is a kind of excess of religious worship, and that an excess, or error in a negation, was never called by any author superstition, when he meant to speak properly, except that very negation, be held as a special worship. That we do not abstain from these Ceremo. but as from other unlawful corruptions (even out of the compass of worship: That every erroneous denial of things lawful is not superstition, and that all sorts of definitions which are given of superstition, do touch upon our Ceremony. rather then on the denial or condemning of them. All this could not stay the Rej. but he must maintain, and renew this weighty charge, as he calleth it, and pronounce, that if we can avoid it, it is our wit, (as if he would say) our book hath saved us: Lett us therefore consider, what the accuser can say, to bring us to this extreme pass.

3. There can be no plainer reason of this accusation (saith the Rej. then that out of Coll. 2.23. where will worship is instanced in negative observances, touch not, taste not, handle not, &c. But 1. we teach no negative observances so called, for observances are ceremonial: Tho. 1.2. q. 101. art. 4. we make no ceremonies of our negations, but make them moral duties: The Prelates on the other side, appointing positive observances, do seem to include the negations of them, as of the same kind: Bap•ize not without crossing, do not divine service without surplice, communicate not without kneeling, so that •y this means they are made guilty of double super•tition.

2. The practice of superstitious persons in those days, condemned here by the verdict of this place, caries no proportion or resemblance, with our cessation, or negative abstaining from cerem. because there touch not, •ast not, &c. were taken up by virtue of man's imposi•ion, and for the more special worship of God, in a more peculiar manner, but we cease from ours, by virtue of another rule, with no such intent, as to present any peculiar kind of honor to God thereby: And thus abstaining from our Ceremon. as unlawful, upon conscience (though they were lawful,) cannot be superstition, except first it be an elicited act of religion, or worship: Such worship it cannot be, except either in the intention of the absteiner, or in the nature of the forbearance, it be used as a means, to give unto God special honor, that is, other and more immediate honor, then we do, by acts of obedience, common to the second table, with the first: But this is neither in our intention, nor doth the nature of such forbearance as we use, implye it: For that common charge which usually occurs in scripture, cease to do evil, Isaiah. 1. Abstain from all appearance of evil, 1. Thess. 5. is a duty of obedience in general common to both tables: Now, if it be only materially determined, upon a work of the second table, not formally elicited, from love or justice to our brother, it is no act of love or justice. As if a man hating his neighbor, should yet for fear of God's judgment, abstain from killing of him, this was no act of love, or justice, toward him; Even so, abstaining from our Ceremony, as evil for fear of offending God, though it may materially be referred to the first table, yet cannot it be an elicited act of worship, except it floweth from religion, or a desire to do special honor to God thereby.

3. These negative prohibitions, were so plainly the Commandments of men, ver. 22. that from hence our divines do commonly argue against such popish Ceremony. as ours are: And therefore Papists in their commentaries, as Estius ad Corn. de lapide &c. upon that place, do strive to putt-off that blow from their Ceremony. but yet are constrained to confess, unprofitable and superfluous Ceremo. or instituted by a mere human spirit, (such as ours are) to be in those words condemned; If therefore this place, be the plainest reason, which the Def. and Rej. have, of charging us with superstition, it is plain enough, there was more affection and affectation, then reason in this weighty charge.

4. Whether any definition of superstition will bear up this weighty charge, forced upon those, that reject human Ceremony. the Rej. will not try by the Schoolmen, because he loveth them not so well, but only by a Definition which is found in D. Ames his Medulla: but passing by the Schoolmen, he might have found in our Divines, Definitions, very fit for this trial, as that of Vrsyne Tom. 1. in precept 2. Superstition is that which adds human inventions to divine precepts: That of D^r. Fulk in Act. 17. Sect. 4. A will worship is, more then appointed by the law of God: That of M^r. Perkyns on the second command, Superstition is worship of God, without his commandment &c. For there is not one of our writers, who treateth of superstition, and doth not give such descriptions of it, as from them it may be concluded, that the rejecting of such Ceremon. as ours are, is so far from superstition, that it is the opposing of superstition: Yet let him choose by what Definitions, the cause shall be tried.

5. The Definition which he maketh choice of is: Superstition is that whereby undue worship is exhibited to God: from hence the Rej. collecteth, and assumeth 1. that superstition properly is in the opinion and mind of the worshipper: 2. That a man may imagine himself to honor God in the use of such things, as God hath not forbidden or condemned, and hereupon forbear, even for conscience to God, things lawful: 3. That the very not doing of things prohibited in the first table (if it be for conscience to God,) is worship. Now the first of these, is to fetch quidlibet ex quolibet, anything out of everything: For there is nothing in the Definition alleged, from whence (by any logic) it can be concluded, that superstition is properly in opinion and mind: 2. The assertion is as false, as untowardly collected, for though inward superstition, be in the mind or soul, and springeth from an erroneous opinion, yet neither it, nor any moral vice or virtue, doth properly consist in opinion, but rather in affection, and disposition of the heart and will, as all that consider of the matter, will easily perceive and confess: And as for outward superstition, that consisteth in outward observances. 3. The second collection serveth nothing to the purpose: Neither yet the conclusion drawn from it, that there may be a negative superstition: yet is it so intricately set down, that it containeth a kind of contradiction, for the forbearing of things lawful, is termed the use of such things, in what sense I cannot conjecture: The last would prove something, if it were generally true as it is not: The avoiding of sin or things forbidden by God, is an act of common obedience, belonging as well to things forbidden, in the second table, as to those, that are forbidden in the first: And the terminanation of this act, upon matters of the first table, doth no more make it properly worship toward God, then the like termination of it, upon the matters of the second table, doth make the same act, properly justice, or charity towards men: It may, in this or that particular, be imperated or commanded by religion to God, and in others by charity to men, but it is not, in that particular elicited, or naturally flowing from either, as worship doth from religion and bounty from charity.

The Def. and Rej. abstain every day upon conscience from innumerable things forbidden concerning God's worship, as from Popish Idolatries, Mahometicall impostures, & all the rabble of those divillish divises, which are among the Heathen. Yet I do not think, that they themselves conceive, their acts of daily worship to arise in account, unto such a number, as is there to be found, of such things forbidden. The plain truth is, that an abstaining frō this or that instituted, or chosen to be observed, in the worship of God, & for the honoring of God herby, is a kind of Cere. worship: But the mere abstaining from this or that unlawful action upon conscience of God's command is no special worship, nor was ever so esteemed. 6. But out of D.A. who saith; That Religion is an observāce whereby we perform those things which directly belong to the giving of honor to God, so much may be wrung as the Rej. meaneth, viz. that if any observance be made of et doing anything, which God hath not forbidden, of purpose & directly to give honor to God in the not doing thereof, this must needs be an excess of religion a negative superstition. Just so as not observing, is observance; not doing a thing, is performance of it, as the purposed abstaining from that which appeareth a dishonoring of God is a direct giving of honor unto him. 7. Neither is the other allegation out of D. A. to any better purpose than the former: There is a superstitiō sometimes in abstaining from certain lawful things, viz. when some singular service, & honor is by that abstinēce intended. Did the Rep. ever deny this? Nay, doeth he not expressly confess as much in these words; The superstitions excess of religion, doth sometimes seem to consist in a negation, viz. when that very negation, abstinence, or forbearing is held for a special worship? The Rej. indeed, seemeth to find a difference in that term of singular: But that is to find a knott in a rush; For by singular D. A. meant the same thing which the Replier meant by special, according as these terms are often promiscuously used. The descant therefore which the Rej. maketh upon this occasiō, that we fancy our non-comformity so singular a piece of service, a singular point of piety, and of true sincerity, this, I say, is but a declamatory venting of bitter, but ungrounded, surmizes. We account our abstinence from these Ceremony. no special or particular worship, much less singular for degree of excellency; nor do we esteem it a point of piety, more singular, than to abstain from swearing by the Mass. Some point of sincerity there is, in refusing these mixtures, but not worship, or so singular in our opinion, as the Rej. would persuade his readers to our singular prejudice, & wrong. Many things are singular faults, if they be admitted, the leaving of which is no singular commendation. What if some had rather never preach the Gospel, or receive the supper than tell a lie for those ends? Will the Rej. thence conclude that they make the abstaining from a lie a more singular piece of worship, and piety, than either Word, or Sacraments? I would be loath to undertake the proving of such a wild consequence. Divine, and blessed Bradford refused to be admitted unto the Ministry by B. Ridley, except he might be excused from the abusive formalities, then and now, in use: yet Gardener, nor Boner, neither did, nor being asked would therefore (as is probable) have accused him of Superstition, as esteeming the abstaining from those abuses more singular service of God, or piety, than all he might do, and did afterward in the ministry.

8. The examples brought by the Rej. are like unto his Reasons: 1. The Pharisees did superstitiously restrain labor on the Sabbath, beyond that which God imposed; this was a negative superstition. True; it was an human instituted Ceremony something like unto Popish holy days: But the Pharisees abstaining from the feasts of Bacchus, Venus, &c. was no special worship. 2. The Jews not treading on Dagon's threshold was negative superstition: True, as the former, It was an observation instituted to honor Dagon by: But their not-admitting of Circumcision was no superstition. When therefore upon such wretched examples, and reasons as these were, the Rej. is so confident in laying his weighty charge of Superstition upon us, as that he pronounceth all the water of Nile not to be sufficient to wash us from gross superstition, the understanding reader hath no cause to think otherwise but that even the Rej. may have a confident full persuasion such as that he buildeth much upon, and yet but hollow empty supporters for the upholding of it.

9. Such also are his distinctions, whereby (as with a wet finger) he dischargeth the Convocation of all superstition, because they impose the Ceremonies, not as things directly, properly, immediately, but only consequently, and mediately, belonging to the giving of honor to God. For 1. If they be consequently directed to God in teaching of men God's will, as the word doeth, they are direct worship unless preaching be no worship. 2. If they be worship proper to this office, they are proper worship. 3. If they be worship belonging to the first table, then they are immediately worship: But all the former are true, as was before shown, yet one thing more would be known, what reason the Rej. hath to place the observance of our Ceremony. for the kind of it, in one degree of distance, and latitude: and the rejecting of them, in another? It seemeth to be as if the English day, and night should be so disjointed that our night should be in England, and our day in China. When he further expounds himself we shall be more able to discern his meaning.

10. Last of all, For ending of this question about superstition, I require a resolution of this not-unlike Quære, which with change of persons containeth the same case. Seeing there be different opinions concerning our Diocesan Bishops places, and functions, even among them that make benefit of them, some holding them to be of divine institution, or else not lawful, so that (as they say) without this persuasion they would give over their Bishoprics, today before tomorrow. Others holding them only of human Institution, and yet lawful; Let him, I say, tell us plainly, whether the Prelates of this later opinion may call the other Prelates superstitious brethren or fathers, for holding Ecclesiastical Bishops of Mans institution unlawful? If not, let not the Rej. nor his Diocesan be so liberal of this title to others that dissent from them about human Ceremonies as unlawful, except they either think Bishops cannot be superstitious, or that we cannot be wronged with any odious imputation.

CHAP. X.

Sect. I. Concerning Parliaments, and Convocations: answer to 70.71.72.73. of the Praeface.

BEcause the Def. objected the authority of Parliaments, and Convocations for establishing of these Rites, it was opposed by the Rep. 1. that Prelates •n these matters have no respect unto the authority of •arliaments, as appeareth by the testimony of the Par•ment it self An. 1610. in the Records thereof. 2. That •o Parliament doeth allow subscription, and Confor•ity to be urged as now it is by the Prelates. Which also •as shown out of the same Parliament records. 3. That •he Prelates proceedings are so ag^t. Parliament Laws, •hat by them they are subject to a Praemunire. Now see •hat is rejoined.

1. The first fillip is that though the Prelates regard •ot the authority of Parliaments, yet that is no answer to his Objection, these Ceremonies are established by sundry acts •f Parliaments. Where the Rej. forgetteth that some ar•uments, and answers are ad hominem, that is, they respect the thing in question, not simply, but as it come•eth from such a man. Now this was the meaning of •he Repl. that objecting of Parliaments by a Prelate, in •efence of Prelates who regard not the authority of Par•iaments, is a ridiculous plea.

2. In the second place, it is denied that the Prelates •espect not the authority of Parliaments, because, forsooth, they have the kings commission, and Broad seal 〈ϕ〉 they are by Parliament confined. That is; they neglect no• Parliamentary Statutes in all things. For so far as the• can turn any Statute Law to serve their turn, and i• those circumstances which they dare not, for thei• heads, omitte, they follow that which Parliaments pr•scribe.

13. To that first Evidēce which was alleged out of th• Records of the worthy Parliamēt An 1610. it is rejoyne•that it doeth only prove that the Prelates mistake (if th•y di• mistake) in one point, their own authority given them b• Parliam•nt. Now if by mistaking, he meaneth b•d, and unlawful taking, this which he saith may be granted But if he meaneth an error of ignorance, surely he mistaketh the matter one way or other. For 1. Ignoranc• of the Law doeth not excuse any violaters of the same mu•h less Scribes, and Doctors, Prelates, which use to be among Law-makers, and in Commission for to se• to the execution of Laws. 2. Those that err of ignorance, correct their fault upon information, and knowledge: But our Prelates being diverse times warned, eve• by the Parliament, have not mended, but more violently than before, persisted in, and pursued this mistaking▪ 3. Mistaking in matters of such weight, as are so many good men's livings, and free-holds, is a broad fault, of the same nature (in all Law) with ill (crafty) meaning. If the Prelates should take upon them to take away the life of some non-conformists, directly, and by sentence (as they have, in effect, done by long imprisonment, and should be called in question therefore, it would not •elpe them to say, they mistook their authority.

4. It is added here by the Rej. that the making of Ec••esiasticall Can•ns do properly belong to the Prelates. But 1. •cept there be some mysteriall distinction understood •etwixt Canons, and Laws, this is to rob both Par••meant, and King also of their just authority, that Pre••es may usurp it. 2. Say it be so, that it belongeth •operly to Prelates, for to make Ecclesiastical Canons, ⟨◇⟩ it therefore belong to them to make such Canons? •uppose the Ceremonies to be lawful, have the Pre*•ates* proper power to appoint any lawful Ceremonies? •hen they may institute, and appoint, in the Def. and •ej. his judgment, not only holy-water and Images, •roughout all England, but also command that all the •arliament, with the rest of English men, shall be circ•mcised; for the Def. Pag. 285. being asked, whether he •oldeth Circumcision as it is used under Prester John, lawful? •he Rej. answereth for, and with him, He doeth so, and you •y nothing to disprove it; Insinuating that if anything •e said to disprove it, he is ready to maintain it. Now ⟨◇⟩ appeal to the first Parliament that shall hereafter be •alled, and in the mean time, to any English man (be*•yde* those that are resolved to say what Defendants, and Rejoyners will have them) if they believe that the Pre*•ates* have power, and that from the Parliament, or with •he consent of Parliament, to appoint the people of England, even those of the Parliament it self, to be circumcised? Have the innocent Ceremonies brought us, and the Parliament into such bondage, that at the Prelates pleasure, we must all be circumcised? It seemeth then they are bloody innocents.

5. The second instance out of the same Parliament Records (saith the Rej.) blameth this in the Convocation, that it hath made the refusal of Subscription poenall, with deprivation of men's free-hold. Which is very true, and due: but not that only; For the Parliament condemneth expressly all urging of Subscription above that appointed by the Statute of 13th. Eliz. which only concerneth confession o• the true Christian faith, and doctrine of the Sacraments▪ Neither is their mentioning of free-hold so to be taken▪ as if they allowed the men should for refusal of oath▪ Subscription, be deprived of their Copy holds; bu*•* only as an exaggeration of the Prelates praesumption▪ who do not fear, nor spare to vihlate the fundamental Laws, and Liberties of England, such as that is, fo*•* no man to be deprived of free-hold, without the Law of Parliament, and a Jury of 12. legal men.

6. The Parliament addeth, that silencing and depriving of Ministers for non-conformity, and non-subscription (without, and against Law) hath been the great grief of sundry well affected subjects. To this the Rej. saith, that so it hath been the grief of those which deprive• thē; who yet deprived thē because they were commanded, leas• their error should be still maintained, and the Ministry of Cōformists contemned. This professiō of grief in depriving. Prelates, may be likened unto that of Queen Mary's Prelates, who whē they condemned the Martyrs, said they did it with grief. So Gardener in his sentce of condemnation upon Mr. Rogers, the first that suffered under Queen Mary. We therefore, said the B^{ps}. aforesaid, wit••orrow of mind, and bitterness of heart, do condemn thee •he said 10. Rogers, &c. Unto which may be added M. Fox •his Marginall note. Theis murderers pretend a sorrow of •eart, and they will not cease from murdering. But to follow only the Rej. his so grieved. It is very goodly so. The well affected subjects were, and are grieved, in that •ēse that scādalizing is called grieving: This scandal was at the Prelates proceedings: The Prelates are grieved for their own fact, but not to repentance, at least such, as they do not repent of. The grief of those well affected subjects stirred up in them, and in the Parliament a serious petition, and endeavor to stay the Prelates violence, and remove the scandal: but the Prelates, though they challenge the power, and care of Ecclesiastical affairs as properly belonging to them, could never be moved, either by others, or their own praetended grief, so much as to petition unto his Majesty, for the removing of the grievance, but were and are as ready as their Paratours, & Pursuivants to do that which belongs to them about this that grieveth the Parliament, and sundry other well affected subjects. The Parliament grieving with those that grieved, made a good Law to make void the Prelates Canons, as the cause of unsufferable grief: The Prelates, first makers of the Canons, and since urgers of their execution, in which also they often go beyond their own rules (as passionate executioners use to do) and many of them applaud themselves, glory, and triumph in their imagined victory. But it may be those are here meant, who, as D. B. in D. Covell pag. 44. urging subscription, and conformity, stick not to say the Authority sinneth in not remeoving some of these things. Now if they grieve for sinning against their consciēces, God give it may be to repentance not to be repended of: but yet this not so as the well-affected (of whom the Parliament speaketh) are grieved, by other men's unconscionable dealing. They are commanded, fo•sooth; But who procured that command? who should procure the ceasing of that same? And is it sufficient for Fathers in God to say they are commanded by man to undo the ministers, and vex the people of God? Bishop Grindal was commanded to suppress the exerrise which was called Prophecyng: yet he constantly refused to execute such a command. Tempora mutantur, & nos mutamur in illis. But the Prelates, (saith the Rej▪) proceed•d not against them, because they were painful, and fruitful ministers. As if the Parliamēt were to be so interpreted, or rather derided! or any but the Devil of Hell would profess such a cause of such proceeding? Wherefore then? Least their error should be still suffered, and the ministry of others contemned. It seemeth then that in the Rej: his opinion the Parliament in condemning these proceedings, went about to maintain dangerous error, and to bring conforming Ministers into contempt. But not to speak of his taking the question for granted, viz: which the Ministers held a dangerous error) the Parliamentary way of making void the Canons might have freed the praetended error from all danger, and left no ministers in contemptible conformity, unless some would contemn Christian liberty as having by custom their ears nay•ed to the door of servitude.

7 Concerning the Praemunire answer is given, that •f the Prelates be subject unto it, that is more than the Rej: •noweth; that they might incur that peril upon ignorance; and that by Statute Law the Ceremonies are •stablished, with •he penalty of refusing them, as all men know, and some have •elt at Assizes, and Westminster Hall. But for the first of •heis shifts, D: B: knows full well (whatsoever the Rej: will know) that Prelates cannot take from any English man his freehold, without Parliament Authority, and yet be free from the Statute of Praemunire: Now that they do so, the Rej: himself even now confessed. Moreover; who knoweth not that the Prelates do keep their Cour•s, silence, deprive &c, in their own names? which doeth evidently intrench upon the Praerogative Royal of the Crown, and so fall into the penalty of Praemunire by the Statute of Henr. 8.25. except they can show some special warrant by Statute for so doing; which that they cannot do is evident; because in King Edwards days they were enjoined to keep their Courts in the Kings name; and since that time, have no special warrant, by any Statute, for any such Courts in one or others name. Ignorance is here again vainly pretended, as before was declared. Are the Prelates only ignorant of that which they have so often been warned, and convinced of in many Parliaments? Now for the establishing of these Ceremonies, with the penalty of refusing them by Statute, the Rej: should have done well, if he had named that, or those Statutes where we may find this done. As for the penalty of deprivation for refusing these Ceremonies, the Rej: confessed before, that the Parliament Anno 1610. pronounced against it, as contrary to Law. If the Ceremonies themselves stand established by any Statute, it must be that of Eliz: 1. But that concerneth the book of king Edward in which this Rej: pag. 54.55. confesseth some vain Ceremones, now removed, to have been prescribed. Now either those tolerable fooleries were established by Statute of Eliz: 1. or not these; For no difference is found in the Statute; If those, why do our Opposites refuse them, and yet urge these upon that Law which no more established these than them? The truth is, though the book for substance was in some sort confirmed, yet every rubrick, and ceremony which was therein contained, though it was for a time tolerated, was not established. Why else was subscription, by that Statute, restrained only to doctrine of Faith, and Sacraments? If any therefore have been deprived, either at Assizes, or other Civil Courts, for mere refusal of these Ceremonies, (which I much doubt of) that, (without question) hath been by the Praelates procuring, not by such evidence of Law as just Judges require in such wretched causes. It would also be known what kind of Judges those were which are said to have been so Ceremonious. Sometime it falleth out, that a Hales is put out of Commission by a Gardener, and another, a friend of Gardener being put in his place, strange sentences follow thereon. At the least, it behooveth the Rej: who allegeth, and alloweth those Judges facts, to show us upon what grounds they proceeded?

8. Against the Convocation-house (as reasons for which the authority thereof is little, or none in men's consciences) some known things were briefly mentioned by the Replier, to which how the Rej. answereth, it is not unworthy consideration. 1. Convocations consist of a faction. No (saith the Rej.) but of men which submit themselves to the Laws of the Land, and Constitutions of the Church. As for the Constitutions of the Church, they are the Constitutions of the Convocation; so that he answer in that part is, they submit themselves to their owne constitutions: To the Laws of the Land that they do not duly submit themselves, it appeareth out of that which the Parliament, before alleged, saith; diverse painful, and learned Pastors ready to perform the legal subscription, have been deprived for refusing canonicall subscription: which could not be, if Canons were legal, and their makers obedient to Law. They charge also the bodies, lands, and goods of subjects further than is lawful, saith the same Parliament. So that it is by this plain how the Convocations may be said to make a faction even against Parliaments. Yet if they were obedient to Laws, they may (by conspiring for their private ends against the common good) be esteemed a Faction, as those that bare the greatest sway in the Council of Trent, were, and are of indifferent understanding men esteemed. So in Queen Mary's days, the persecuting Prelates, though they submitted themselves to Law, and cried out of others that did not so, yet they were a pernicious faction. And so (it seemeth) was the meaning of the Repl. in this charge, because he addeth for a reason thereof, that they never conclude anything for the common good of the Church. 2. They are servile to those on whom they depend, and tyrannical over the poore that are subject to them. This the Rej. doeth not deny, but saith; It may be an error of their persons, not of their Constitution. But what doeth this help us? If we must be subject to servile, and tyrannical Canons, which come from the error of their persons, their Constitution will no way relieve us. Their Constitution is for substance the same now that was in Queen Mary's days and yet we know what they did, and thereby may conceive what they may do again. 3. They are gross Violators of most ancient Canons, being non-residents, Pluralists &c. Neither is this denied by the Rej. so manifest is the truth of it. Only, that he may not be altogether silent, he alledgeth that this being true, yet the Def. his speech standeth unshaken, viz. Theis Ceremonies are established by Canons. But I think if the Convocations be such as have been shown, the credit, and authority both of them, and their Canons is so shaken, that they can afford little establishment to the Ceremonies in any free judgment.

CHAP. XI.

Sect. 2. Concerning the good and evil, which our Convocations have done.

Among the Objections mentioned against our Convocations, one appendix was, that in memory of man they never concluded anything for the common good of the Church, more than by others was better done (ϕ) their hands: but much evil hath come from them, and more old, if their commission had served thereto. Now because this is a weighty charge, and enough to sleight all their authority, if it be true, tis worthy to be severally, and diligently considered, what their Advocate can allege to the contrary. If in this point he be brought to a nihil dicit, then let him forever hold his peace about such Convocations.

1. The first answer is, that the accusation is not true, unlesse the Agreement of the Articles of Faith, and Religion were not good. But 1. this being granted to be good, yet the accusation may be true, because this Act of An. 1571. can hardly be said to have been concluded within the memory of man. 2. It may well be questioned whether in this, our Convocation hath done that which was not better done to their hands. To which purpose it shall not be extravagant, nor unprofitable, to compare a little the Articles as they were set forth in King Edwards days, Anno 1552. with the edition which the Convocation of Anno 1571. hath left us. In the former we find this Article De Gratia. The Grace of Christ, or the Holy Spirit which is given by him, takes away the heart of stone, and gives an heart of flesh; such as were unwilling to things lawful, he makes willing; and such as willed things unlawful, he makes unwilling. Which Article is, I know not wherefore, left out in the later edition. This I am sure of, that if the said Article had been renewed in the same manner as it was first set down, it had been one bar more than now is found against those among us which follow Arminius, and his Remonstrants, & one warrant for public preaching against them, Secondly, in the Article of Justification, it was before said, that the doctrine by sole faith in that sense in which it is explained in the Homily of Justification, is most certain; Now in the later edition this most certain is left out, and for co sensu is putt in an ambiguous term ut. Whatsoever was the occasion or meaning of this change, the former words were more full against those that broach new doctrines about Justification, such as D^r. Jackson doeth in his book of Justifying Faith. Thirdly, in the Article of Sacraments, the former editiō had, that the efficacy of the is not from the work done, which expression (in their Latin) as it is strange, and not known in holy writ, so it carrieth with it a sense savouring little of piety, but much of superstition. Which words, if they had been still retained, (as they are not) some superstitious conceits about the Sacramēts might by them have been suppressed. Fourthly, In the Article De Coena Domini, the old edition had these words: Seeing it is required to the true being of human nature, that the body of one, and the same man cannot be in many places at once, but must be in someone definite place, therefore the body 〈◇〉 Christ cannot be present in many, and diverse places at the same time. And because (as holy Scriptures deliver to us) Christ was taken up into heaven, and is there to remain unto the end of the world, none of the faithful ought to believe, or profess any real, and (as they speak) corporal presence of his flesh and blood in the Sacrament. In the new edition all this is blotted out: which yet had good use against the Lutheran error of Consubstantiatio. Fifthly, In the Article of Traditions, these words (not found in the former edition) are conveyed into the later. Every particular, or national church hath authority of instituting, changing, or abrogating Cere. or Ecclesiastical rites instituted only by human authority, so that all be done to edification. This addition seemeth to be added for the better advauncing of humane Ceremonies. Sixthly; The Article about the books of form, is very much transformed to the wronging of subscribers. For formerly it affirmed only that the booke of service, and that of Ordination of Ministers 〈◇〉 far as concerned truth of doctrine are good &c. but now in the later, this limitation (quoad doctrinae veritatem) is left out, and instead thereof is added, that the booke of Consecration, and Ordination containeth all things necessary thereunto, and that it hath nothing in it of it self either superstitious or impious, and that all that be consecrated, and ordained according to it, are orderly, and lawfully consecrated, and ordained.

These changes well considered, I think D. B. himself will confess that there was no great good done in the second edition of the Articles concerning Faith, and Religion: Yet be it so, that this was a good work of our Convocation, what a poor commendation is one good work, of a Mother-Church in a whole generation or age of her children? Tis for the poor to tell their store. But for a shepherd, in numbering of his flock to see them brought to one head, what should he say but bemoan himself with Alas! and weel a day?

2. The second answer is, that Convocations do good sometimes, in confirming what was decreed before. Which is sometime true, viz. If the things decreed before, were of themselves good, and had need of the Convocations confirmation. But sometime such confirmations are only for fashion-sake; As when the Council of Trent confirmed the Holy Scripture, the Apostolical Creed &c. and then there is very little, or no good done, more than was formerly done to their hands. Any other confirmation of good, I do not know our Convocations to be guilty of, nor can I understand, when, whence, and how the Convocation had Commission to confirm anything, without making of new Canons. A Law of Confirmation is necessary to Canons: but Canons of confirmation are not necessary to Laws established. Neither can it be shown that so much hath been given or committed to the Convocation. Nor if it were, could that be done without Canons (in some respect) new. And so much (it seemeth) D^r. B. knew, from whence it is that he addeth; Or if they have done nothing, because they have had no commission, to which they are limited by Act of Parliament, where lieth the blame? If they have done nothing! What a miserable supposition is this? To do nothing in so long a time, is to be no Synod, no Mother-Church, nor good Milk-nurse, but a dead Carcase, bearing an empty name of both. If they had no commission to do good, they had no commission to be a Mother-Church. If the Parliament hath limited them •o a commission, it was because they durst not trust •hem without. Yet the blame of not doing good cannot •ye upon the Parliament, because they never sought to •t, or by it, for a commission of doing any good; Nor yet of the Kings Majesty, (where the Rej. seemeth to leave •t) except they have declared what necessity there was •hey should do some good, and to that intent made petition for a commission; Let it lie therefore upon the convocation it self, which repraesenteth, as an Image, or maketh show of some good but doth none at all.

3. The third answer is; That in the book of Canons were many good provisions for more plentiful preaching, and •edressing the abuses of Ecclesiastical Courts, which would have done much good, if they had been as carefully executed as they were made. But 1. so there was also in the Council of Trent, many Canons of Reformation, at most of their sessions, nay such, as (without any straining) go far beyond those that are found in our Canons. As for example, in the fifth Session, under Paulus 3. it was decreed that expounding of the Scripture should be diligently observed in all Cathedral Churches, and also in other places where any stipend was, or may be had, and that Praebends, for that cause absent from their Chapter, should enjoy their dividends, as if they were present. And that all Parish Priests should be compelled to teach their people, at the least on the Lord's day, and in solemn feasts. In the sixth session, the Ancient Canons are revived which were made against Bishops that buisy themselves in Princes Courts, or other where with secular affairs, and so are either non residents, or non-praedicants. In the seventh, it is ordered that all collations of benefices be upon able men, and such as will be resident upon the same, under great penalties. Pluralities also are abolished, or made nullities. In the fifth session under Pius 4. all taking of money for Orders, for letters testimonial, for seals by Bishops, is condemned as simony: Nay, the Notaries, or Secretaries are forbidden to take anything except they have no wages▪ (& then also, not above the tenth part of one Crown) under great penalties. It is also under like penalties decreed, that none be ordained (except upon necessity, and then with patrimony, or pension sufficient to live on) which have not an Ecclesiastical Benefice, or special• charge. Moreover, it is decreed, that honest unlearned Parish-Priests should have learned Coadjutors adjoined to them upon their charges, and that scandalous Priest• should be either reformed, or removed. In the seventh Session, non-residency both of Bishops, and Curates, is again condemned, as a mortal sin. And (which D. Bancroft would have called English Scotizing, or Scottish Genevating, if it had been but mentioned in his Convocation) it was appointed, that the names of those which •esired to be ordained, should be the month before, •ubliquely proclaimed in the Church, and diligent in•uisition made concerning their life, and manners. It ••so confirmed that none should be ordained, that is •ot designed to a certain place of ministry. In the •ight Session it is enjoined to Bishops as their principal •ffice, to preach diligently in their Churches, and that •n all Parishes at least thrice a week, there should be preaching. And that one man should have but one Benefice •equiring residence &c. With what sincerity these, and •uch Canons of Reformation were propounded, is to •e seen in the History of that Council. But in verbal provisions it is evident that that Conventicle was not behind our Convocation, but rather led her the way, & taught her how to dissemble as if she had set down among other Canons, Who knows not how to feign, he knows not how to reign.

Secondly: That provision which is here added (if those Canons had been carefully executed) is as bald as any of the Canons. For 1. the question being of doing good, we are told they proceeded so far that they had done some good, if they had come to execution, that is, to doing of good, and not pretending it only. 2. To whom did it belong to see good Canons executed, but to Archbishops, Bishops, Deans, Arch-deacons, which were the makers of them? Had they commission both to make bad Canons, and execute them; but to make only good, and so leave them without execution? 3. This whole Plea is, as if for the cursed fig tree, which brought forth no fruit, one should have alleged that it brought forth leaves, and so made good provision for fruit, if fruit had followed answerable to the leaves. 4. What provision was made for preaching if it were fully executed, D. B. in his Apology, in the 67. page of D. Covell, showeth thus. By the Canons, no piece of the service must give way to a Sermon, or any other respect, which computed with the accessory occasions of Christenings, Burialls, Mariages, and Communions, which fall out all at sometimes, some at all times in many Congregations, doeth necessarily pretend, if not a purpose, yet a consequence of devouring of preaching, and so not widows houses, but God's house, under pretense of long prayers, while neither the time, nor the ministers strength, nor people's patience can bear that task of reading and preaching too. Of which intention if we be afraid, who can marvel, that either shall observe my Lord of London's motion, for a praying ministry as more needful in a Church planted, than preaching, as his speeches since also have professed: or that shall mark how some Canons are planted against Lectures in Market-towns, whereby the light hath spread to many dark places, and withal how skilfully all his Majesty's godly purposes against the ignorant, negligent, and scandalous Ministers, have been not so much delayed, as deluded, and the offenders covered &c. 5. If some little good had come from the Convocation about their Courts, yet that being covered, and overwhelmed with so great evil which came from thence, as the removing, or excluding of a thousand good preachers, the vexing, and disturbing of ten thousand good Christians, (I speak within compass of truth) should be no more doing of good, than the leaving or sticking down of a feather was by him that stole the goose.

All these things being well considered, he that should reach to the Convocation, may well take up, and repeat Mr. Latimer's words uttered before the same Assembly in the 28. year of Henry 8. The fruit of your consultation shall show what generation ye be of. What have ye done hitherto, I pray you? What one thing that the people of England hath been better for of an hair? or you yourselves, either more accepted before God, or better discharged toward the people committed unto your cure? For, that the people is better learned, and taught now than they were in time past, to whether of these ought we to attribute it, to your industry, or to the providence of God, and the foreseeing of the Kings Grace? What did ye, so great Fathers, so many, so long a season, so oft assembled together, whereby Christ is more glorified, or his people made more holy? I appeal to your own consciences. Mr. Latimer in this charge, excepteth two exploits of that Convocation; One that they burned a dead man, who had withstood their profit; the other, that they went about to rake another in the coals, because he would not subscribe to certain of their Articles. Such like exceptions may be made for our convocation, and those multiplied to a great number. But he that should make them must look for no other fee, or thanks, for such allegations, than Latimer was rewarded with, who (not long after this Sermon preached) was driven not only to cease from preaching, but also to take up his lodging in the Tower.

CHAP. XII.

Sect. 2. Concerning worship answer, to the Rej. premonition, Pag. 123.124.125.126.127.

WE here have the Rej. again entrenching himself, and raising up many distinctions and definitions, as so many blinds, as it were, that the ignorant sort, and such as are more weak in judgment, might not perceive, how the evidence, and strength of the arguments, which are leveled directly against the Ceremony. come in upon them, and prevail against them: As also, that in the tumult, and lumber of these distinctions, being thus hurried, and hurled together, those answers which are lame and wounded, may creep away, and escape in the crowd, unseen and unsuspected by the most, who either have not skill, or will and care, to examine things, before they pass, but are content, rather to take these conceits (which are accompanied with ease and quiet) upon trust, then to put them to the trial, or themselves to trouble & vexation, if they prove not true. And because this head is of wayght, & worthy the scanning, we shall therefore take into further trial, and examination, what ever principles or authorities the Rej. hath set down, either in the premonition to the second argument, or in the beginning of his treatise, touching kneeling at the Sacrament. That we may thereby discern, what succor the Rej. his cause is like to find, when he thinks to shelter under these outworks, which he hath reared up on purpose to be his sense.

Worship generally taken, is thus by him defined, Pag. 123.124.

Worship is the performance of respect, unto anything or person, according to the estimation and dignity thereof.

The terms of which description, are so loose and yde, and so far from laying out the bounds, of the thing described, that like a ship-man's hose, you may apply them to what you will, rather than to the purpose in end: A man hath estimation, of his life, his goods, his good name, answerable to the worth & dignity of the, and doth accordingly perform, that respect, that is fit caring for them: doth he therefore worship his house, his goods, his lands? Nay any Christian heart, esteems and performs respect to the worship of God: doth he therefore give worship unto worship: The Rej. therefore to be desired, to make accurate descriptions, if he desire to give satisfaction to a Judicious reader. Lastly we have here things & persons made the object of worship, and yet in the division immediately following, we are taught, that worship distinguished according to the object, and that truly: is either of our fellow Citizens, and so civil, of our God, and so divine: In the definition things and persons are the object: And now in the division only persons are the object, and things not mentioned: how this quicksilver will be soldered together, I see not.

Worship according to the degrees, is divided into veneration which is a due respect of God's ordinances or appertinances to his service or adoration which is due to God alone.

Its a received rule, that degrees vary not the kind of anything, but the quantity of it: As the diverse degrees of heat, or cold, in several things, degrees of whitenes in several walls, none of these degrees declare diverse qualities for kind, but diverse quantities and measures of the same kind of quality: as one thing is more or less hott, but both have the like heat, for kind of it whence it follows from the Rej. his ground, that veneration and adoration differing only as degrees of worship, they are both of the same kind, and then veneration being due to the ordinances, and appurtenances thereof, the essence or kind of true divine worship, is due to some creature beside God, which not only religion & reason, but all the world of Orthodox Divines deny, and the Rej. I presume also in cold blood will do the same.

3. Third division is: Divine worship is either principal or subordinate: Principal is that holy reverence and respect of the Divine Majesty, which is inwardly performed for his honor: either by the understanding, or will and affections: And this may falsely be pretended, but cannot be falsely performed.

I will not here be curious to pursue all the open weaknesses of these expressions: Only let the Reader take notice, that the Rej. makes those members of a distinction, & so, such as should be opposite one unto another, which are yet in subordination, and that by his own termes: for he makes one part principal, and the other subordinate to it, and so in agreement with it, which no reason will allow: As though one should divide a living creature into that which is principally so, as a man, or that which is subordinate, as the faculty of thinking, which is a token of a man: And that which forceth him to these inconveniences, is the fear, least should make external worship, true worship, in its own nature, as conceiving, a back blow is coming to its cause by that means.

2. I will not here ask, by what rule he makes reverence the Genus to principal worship, when the verdict of all writers, and text, casts religious reverence, as a proper duty in the third command, whereas principal worship, is made general to all the first table, and so the more particular is made a Genus to that which is more general than itself: I suppose this is the Rej. phrasiology, fitter for a declaimer, and one that should descant when define: 3. let it here be remembered, that the inward acting of understanding, will, and affections towards God, is made the proper form, and that which gives specific being to principal worship, because we all have use of this hereafter.

Only that which is most remarkable, and exceeding doubtful (& therefore desired proof and confirmation) that which is added, in the following words, viz. In all worship cannot be performed falsely: which is a conceit beyond my shallow apprehension, & therefore, at his next joining I desire to be satisfied in some particulars.

1. He that acknowledgeth one God, Eternal, Almighty, &c. and two persons: but conceives the Holy-Ghost, not to be a distinct person beside them, but a work proceeding from them both, and so also depend upon the Godhead thus apprehended: whether do such a man, falsely conceive of God, and falsely worship him: making no expression of this his conceiving or dependence.

2. If there be the same ground and reason, to make false internal, as external worship, then the one may be as falsely performed as the other: but that there is the same ground for both, let any man compare them together, and it will appear at the first view: For the heart, can, and doth go aside as many ways from the rule, as the outward man doth, or can do: A man may fear God, upon a false ground, after a false manner to a wrong end: as well as preach, or pray upon a false ground, after a false manner, to a false end: So that I see no color, nor can conceive, how those words can be excused: Internal worship is true, or not at all: Imaginary internal worship is no worship. For there is nothing, that can be called true, being ordered a right, according to rule, but there is a falsehood, which will arise by the wrong ordering, and ill disposing of the same thing: At a word, as every proper axiom• admits of a contradiction, and so of a falsehood necessarily: so likewise every individuall action, which can admit of alteration, must needs admit of a wrong, as well, as of a right disposition, and by consequent of a falsene• which may besall it in that kind.

3. All lifting up the honor of another, to whom, •n way of homage we present our services, that is, wor•hipping of such a party in our intent, and according to the nature of the action: but false conceaving of the •rue God, and fearing of him, upon false grounds is the •ifting up of the honor of God, in the intention of the person, and nature of the word: and therefore it must needs be worship of God, for of no other, it can be, as being tendered to him, but its not true internal worship, and therefore it must be false.

Lastly, if this be not at all false worship, then at all, it is no sin, and so must never be answered for, because unto any other head beside that of false worship, it cannot be referred.

Subordinate worship is that which is done in token, and testimony of the sovereignty, we acknowledge in God, and of our dependence upon him.

Here again, we have the like phrasiologie, words without wayght of reason, in describing or defining the thing intended: For token and testimony are too large and loose expressions to lay out the nature of this worship: Because 1. a man may several ways give a token, or testimony of his acknowledgment, and dependence, and yet in none of those ways be truly said to worship i. e. as by some pledge, by his hand writing, and seal annexed testify, that he doth thus acknowledge and depend, and yet none of these ways he worships: 2. Take actions in this reference only, as they look to our inward dispositions by way of testification, or signification, they are not worship, (I say go no further then that reference) but as they are presented as some services to God immediatly, and as by him instituted and required.

True external worship is said to be made up of 4. things: A person holy, 2. action and manner warranted: 3. end right, 4. the present intention of the worshipper bestowed, and employed upon the service.

Where let it be considered, how he broils things of all kynds together, contrary even to their nature, and right reason: In that he requires the inward holiness of the person, and his gracious acceptation with God: and secondly the present and religious intention of mind, as necessary to make up external true worship, which mixture and constitution, even the names of the things gaynesay, and their natures will not endure.

For 1. that which was the form, and made up the proper nature of internal worship before, that cannot constitute external worship, as common sense teacheth▪ but the inward performing of reverence, (and consequently present religious intention, which is of that kind) was made the proper form of internal worship, by the Rej. his grant.

2. All outward actions, in the frame and constitution are liable to censure of the church, either for approbation or reprehension, but the sincerity of heart, and intention of mind, the church cannot take notice •f nor pass a censure upon, provided the outward ex•ressions do not fail or be a wanting.

3. A man may be bonus ethicus, and yet not bonus Theologus, i. e. a well cariaged man outwardly, express•ing both the sense and practice of religion in his outward demeanor: And yet not be a sincere hearted Christian: So a man may be a member of a congrega•ion, and behave himself outwardly beyond exception, •nd yet want, both an upright mind, and intention sin•ere: So that though they be rejected of God without •hose, yet the fault lies not in the outward action, but in the inward & spiritual work, which God approves, and takes his complacency in, yet he looks upon these, and loves them so far as they be suitable to their rule, as he did in the young man, Mark 10.21.

At a word: an action may be done by the rule of Ethics, or the rule of outward ecclesiastical policy and church discipline appointed by Christ: Or lastly by an inward spiritual principle of grace: The two former, may be true without the last, though a man's sins in separating the last from the first, because though the first be good in their kind, yet they are not sufficient: the former therefore are to be continued, and the sin in the last to be reformed: Hence the Prophet Isaiah 1.16. Put away the evil of your doings, the Lord enjoins thē not to take away their works, but the evil of them: as though he should have said; sacrifice still according to rule prescribed; choose a sacrifice without blemish &c. for the matter; offer it according to rites appointed, for the manner, as before, but being also a heart humbled, a life reformed, wherein you have hitherto failed, keep that which is good, and add that which is awanting.

4. Lastly, when an unregenerate minister (gifted sufficiently for outward expressions, and called by the church) shall preach, administer the sacraments, beyond all exception to the eye of man, and to the approbation of the church: I ask: whether the true matter and form of right administration, may not undoubtedly be concluded to be there, so far as those services are external.

I presume the Rej. will distaste the contrary conceit, and scorn to entertain so silly an imagination, as to affirm, that a wicked man, cannot be a true minister, or his actions performed unrepveably in that kind, by what man can see, to be true ministerial actions.

If this he grant, which cannot be denied with any color, (and if it be, I shall be ready to make it good) I then reason.

Where the true matter and form is of external worship, there is the true complete nature of external worship.

But in the administration of the Sacrament, &c. by an unregenerate minister, there is the true matter and form of true worship.

Therefore in the administration of these by an unregenerate minister, there is the true complete nature of external worship.

To this place appertaineth that expression in his premonition to the receiving of the Lord's Supper, cap. 3. pag. 3.

External worship of God is some outward action, done in relation to the internal worship: which (viz. the internal worship) gives subsistence to it.

Concerning which passage, I desire one case may seriously be considered, and it is this: Whether is it not possible, that a man (either out of ignorance as not knowing, or out of base fear dissembling) may kneel down before an Idol, as Idolaters do, perform and express according to their manner all outward actions of reverence, and yet keep his heart, mind, & affections, inwardly acknowledging and loving of God.

That this practice is possible, nay too ordinary, that the heart may be carried one way, and the action another way in appearances, needs no proof, since each man's woeful experience gives undeniable evidence thereof: Hence then I reason.

If an action may have the real subsistence of superstition, without the intention of the mind, the work of heart and affection: then without these hath it the subsistence of external worship.

But without internal worship: to wit without, nay against the intention of mind, the work of my heart & affection, the action formerly mentioned hath the subsistence of real superstition.

Therefore without the internal worship, the external hath subsistence.

The fourth division: External worship is either mediate, or immediate: mediate, when any duty of the second table is performed immediately to man, but out of conscience, and in obedience to God, to his honor.

In this division of mediate, and immediate worship used by some Divines: The name worship, must needs be taken (by a synecdoche. the part putt for the whole) for obedience in general, and so they are to be understood and not in propriety of speech: For that which comprehends both the tables of the Decalogue in it (as in this division worship doth) cannot properly be referred, either to any one command, or any one table: And in this construction, it serves nothing to the Rej. his purpose, but only to fill up place, & make up the number of Divisions, which is the ready way to confound the reader: And that the Rej. cast lots almost what to say, it may appear, in that, he who makes external worship the Genus to mediate and immediate here: Elsewhere in his premonition to the receiving of the Lord's supper, he makes immediate the Genus to external and internal, so curious is he in his distributions, that in his sense, you may make the whole the part, the part the whole: And if in such Divisions there be like to be true sense and solidity, let the judicious reader determine.

But let us come more near his particular explication, which is this: That's mediate worship by the Rej. his definition when any duty is done to our brother, but in conscience to God.

Where I desire to be informed at his next rejoycing, whether he make this worship to consist, in the duty discharged to our brother or in the conscience to God, used in the discharge thereof: The former (I suppose) he neither will, nor can say, (though he can say strange things, for then worship should first be tendered to man, and to the Lord at the second hand.

I conceive then he must affirm the second, and place the worship, in the act of conscience, carried by virtue of a command: but then let him tell us how this can be called external worship, or can possibly accord with the words of his definition going before: external worship is, the performance of an outward action, he defines, but I assume, the inward work of conscience, is not the performance of any outward action, therefore external worship cannot consist in that.

And yet if this was granted, which sense gainsayes, see how unhappy he is in his expression, for neither in this would any worship properly appear. That which appertains to the right doing of every act of obedience as such, that cannot make up the proper nature of worship: but to be done in virtue, and so in conscience of God's command, belongs to every action of the Decalogue: what ever is not done of faith is sin Rom. 14. last.

The fifth Division. Immediate worship, is either properly so called or else reductively.

Proper immediate worship, is any action done to the honoring of God immediately, and in that act itself, are all such ordinances, which God hath appointed.

Improper worship is any act done, to the honoring of God by the orderly, and comely usage of his own ordinances which because they point at God's honor in their remote end, as they determine their first end, and use upon men, as tending to order, decency, and edification, and therefore but improperly acts of worship.

It is the nature of error, ever to be unlike itself, and he that goes out of the right way, will cross himself commonly in his going, and this is the reason; the Rej. doth so often interfere in his discourse, and which is his exceeding ill happ, though no occasion require it, he cannot conceal these crazy, and ill jointed expressions we shall therefore again, lay open the whole frame, that the description may be half a confutation:

Divine worship proper to God pa. 124. sect. 5. mark those words (proper to God) is

- principa
- subordinate & external, and tha

- mediate, done to man immediately but in conscience to God, and ⟨◇⟩ honor,
- immediate
 - proper
 - improper determine their use & end ⟨◇⟩ mediately upon man.

Where some things in the general are very observable.

1. That improper immediate external worship, is divine worship proper to God: this conclusion will appear, to any, that will but wisely apply the special and general together, according as they be ranked in the foregoing delineation.

2. That improper immediate worship, is mediate worship; for thus I reason: That worship which is immediately done to man, but in conscience to God, that is mediate worship, so the Rej. description teacheth: but improper immediate worship, is first done to man, so the very express words of the Rej. declare evidently: the acts of improper worship determine, in their end, and use upon men.

Therefore immediate improper worship, is mediate by the D^{rs} dispute.

If it be here replied, that the actions which make up mediate worship, must be actions of the second table, not of the first, as these be: I answer; It is the verdict of the word, and the common consent of all Divines, that all the actions and duties, which concern our brother as the next object and end, and so determine upon him are required, and regulated by the second table: since therefore these things of comelines and order, are of this nature, by the Rej. his grant, I do not see, how it can be avoided with any color of reason, but they must be commanded in the second table, and so come under the definition of mediate worship, directly contradictory to the Rej. his determination.

I might also putt the reader in mind, of these twicesod-colewarts, that are set again before us: viz. this misty distinction of properly, & reductively, which like a vagrant wanders up and down in every coast, and therefore should be whipped home to his own place: For it is propounded & applied upon the like mistake, that formerly it was pag. 37. in the division of Ceremony. And is here, as it was there, void of all art and truth.

1. Voyd of Art: For what reason, or rule, doth allow, any reasonable disputer, to make a distribution and so an opposition of parts, that are in consent, and agreement one with another, such is this here propounded. Worship is either proper; as God's ordinances, or improper, as the adjuncts to these ordinances, which appertain thereunto: As if a man should say: Ther be two kind of byrds, either an eagle, or her feathers.

2. Its void of truth: For whoever accounted all the civil circumstances, and attendants of decency in the discharge of God's worship to be worship. The band the preacher useth, the doublet he wears are decent attendants unto him, in preaching & praying, and it would be exceeding unseemly, to see him naked in those parts, rudely presenting himself amidst the congregation, in the work of the Lord, yet did ever any, before D. Burgess say, that the band and doublet of the minister, were improper immediate worship.

A midst these many mistakes, we have a ground of grant from the Rej. his own words: That kneeling in the act of receiving, cannot be improper, but proper worship: For we kneel not either, to man or to the bread, but to God directly, and it is to lift up his honor immediately in the use and end of that action, and therefore it cannot be improper, but proper worship.

Anna her example of serving God with fasting, and prayer, comes after to be scanned in the next section, only before we end, lett us consider in a word of that passage which the Rej. hath pag. 126. To the proper, circumstantial or accessory worship: the permission of God, and a right intention, and use, sufficeth to legitimate them. Join we unto these words, the definition of immediate worship, under which all these improper circumstantial worships are ranged: viz. Immediate worship is, when any act of obedience to the first table, is performed to honor God: out of which I thus reason:

Every act of obedience to the first table, is not only permitted, but required in the first table.

But the acts of improper immediate worship are acts of obedience to the first table: therefore they are not only permitted but required.

To this place belongs the considering and discussing of the variation of that phrase used in the premonition, touching kneeling at the Sacrament, cap. 3. p. 3. False worship, is said to be of the will of man merely, True, is said to be according to the will of God wholly.

The mistery is, that no worship is false, which hath anything in it of the will of God, And there is some worship true and good, which is not of the will of God as a cause, but only according to it, as not hindering or forbidding: This is the Papists plea just against our Doctrines for their traditions. Gregor. de Valent. Tom. 4. Disp. 6. Q. 11. P. 1. Christ doth not forbidd that we make such addition of worship, which doth not repugn to the law, but consents to right reason, and so to the will of God.

So Estius in Tit. 1.14. The Scripture so far as it speaks in the worst sense, touching the precepts and traditions of men, it always understands such, which are so appoint•d and commanded by men, as that they nothing at all conduct unto piety, or plainly oppose both it and the law of God, such which proceed from a human spirit or appetite, to wit so far as a man is acted of himself, and not of God. So the Rhemists on Math. 15.9.

The contrary assertion is the received doctrine of our Divines for, and out of the word of God against the Papists, and one fundamental principle of reformation.

So Luther Gen. 21. This is one main principle of the doctrine we profess (against the forged superstitions of the Papists) that we undertake no work in the things which appertain unto worship, concerning which we have not an express command of God: No man can boast of the performance of any worship, unless he be wholly as it were clothed, and confined within the compass of the word.

Hitherto also, is to be added, that distinction which is last mentioned by the Rej. in the forenamed place in his premonition for kneeling at the Sacram. Chap. 3. Pag. 3.4.

Immediate true ext^rnall worship, is so called in respect, ⟨ϕ⟩ of the means, or manner of worship, and that which ^eecteth means, is said to be grounded either on special ^emmaund, which is properly, in and of itself worship, or upon ⟨ϕ⟩ allowance only, as touching the particular, which is ^ership per aliud, by virtue of something else.

1. But first, there is internal means, and manner as well as external, 2. the manner and means do de^end on God's command and allowance in that also: Immediate worship in regard of the means of wor^epp, is just as much, as immediate mediate worship: And is suiteth well with that distribution, which we met ⟨ϕ⟩, in the former section of significant Ceremonies, to significant and non significant: 4. When as the Rej. ⟨ϕ⟩ much to this distinction of general and parti^elar command, he should have told us, whether he ^eaneth by the general, the Genus or the kind im^emediate, and next, or any other how remote soever: ^ehe former sense will not help our Ceremonies, the ⟨ϕ⟩ will serve at a lift, for many popish Ceremonies as well as ours, since God's command doth not make any ⟨ϕ⟩ immediate worship, in, and of itself, for then the ⟨ϕ⟩ of a murderer should be worship, in, and of it ⟨ϕ⟩ : 5. What reason or sense is there, that God's come^eund should make a thing worship of it self, and God's ^eowance should make it worship by virtue of some^eing else, when as the commandment, doth no more ^epect itself or other thing, then the allowance. 6. Al^ewance of this or that in general without allowance ⟨ϕ⟩ it, to be worship, maketh nothing at all to be worship.

7. It may justly be questioned, whether the Rej. ⟨ϕ⟩ this distinction of command and allowance, do no^e symbolize with the Papists in their distinction of commands and counsels.

For seeing this Popish distinction, cannot be avo^eded, but by another betwixt a common precept, and particular, according to the circumstances, Iun. Cont. lib. 2. To. 9. and no worship or good work can be without one of these precepts, certainly this worship upo^e allowance, without any particular precept, can neith^e be worship nor good work. 8. I ask whether that institution of worship which is grounded on allowanc^e be a work of obedience to God or not? If it be, the^e surely it hath a command and not an allowance onl^e. If not, then either let works of superarrogation be a^emitted, or this institution cashyred.

*The immediate external true worship in regard of maⁿner, is said to consist in a reverend usage of prescribed wo^eship, according to order and decency. Where observe^e that worship being formerly defined by an action, ⟨ϕ⟩ here specified by a manner, whereas the manner of ⟨ϕ⟩ action, is not an action, at least every manner is not ⟨ϕ⟩ 2. That in the manner here specified (reverend usag^e) the usage of an action differeth not from the action b^e only in reverence, which is a common adjunct of a worship, and therefore maketh not a distinct worshi^e. 3. That civility, order and decency is required, in th^e usage of prescribed worship, and so worship in regard ⟨ϕ⟩ the manner though it be religious, may be called c^evill: yet let the Reader be admonished, that under the^ere words of reverend manner, order, decency of wor^epp, much sacrilegious worship is mayntained by the ^epists: As our Rhemists on John* 6.58. have discovered, ⟨ϕ⟩ nature therefore of the things themselves, should be considered, and we should not suffer ourselves to be used by words. That which is quoted here out of D. ⟨ϕ⟩, will occasion the reader to look upon the place, edull. lib. 2. c. 14. th. 25. the words of that position ⟨ϕ⟩ these: Although these circumstances of time, place and order like, are wont by some to be called rites or religious ecclesiasticall ceremonies, yet in their nature they have nothing, ⟨ϕ⟩ is proper to religion, and therefore religious worship doth ⟨ϕ⟩ properly consist in them, however by neglect, and contempt ⟨ϕ⟩ such circumstances, the sanctity of such religious worship, is ⟨ϕ⟩ some sort violated, because the common respect of order ⟨ϕ⟩ decency, which do equally agree to religious and civil actions cannot be severed, from religious worship, without diminishing of the sanctity and dignity of it. What can the eye gather from hence, but that these circumstances are not worship, being only so required to religious actions as they are to civil: If his argument be this: they are not properly worship, therefore worship, it is ridiculous: If it be thus framed; they are commanded in general, therefore in their general nature, & in respect of their utmost end, they must be vouchsafed, the title of divine worship: He may as well conclude, that the office and act of a Justice of peace, or Constable, nay a Hangman, must be vouchsafed the same title of divine worship, for these are commanded in general, and their utmost end ought to be the honoring of God, and sometime they may have reference to something done in the worship of God: In the last place there is a memorandum added, that the same human Ceremony which is a worship in regard of manner, may also be worship in respect of a mean, but not of, and by itself. This is as much to say That the last distinction betwixt means and man is not distinct, and that a human Ceremony cannot be grounded on God's special command, the latter whereof no man ever doubt of, and the former, I do easily assent unto.

SECT. 2. Concerning the exemplifying of the former distinction of worship by instances, and confirming of it by witnesses in the same treat: Cap. 4.

Hanna served God in fasting and prayer, Luc. 2.3 Fasting here was worship, saith D^f. B. in some sense, or else S. Luke was deceived. Whatsoever becometh of this consequence, the example fitteth not our Ceremony for though D. B. hath often exhorted his Auditors to worship God in fasting & praying, in the same phrase, yet (I dare say) he never exhorted them, or any ministers to whom he hath preached amongst others, to serve God in Surplice and Prayer in crossing and baptizing, how much soever he favoereth these Ceremonies: The strange bleating such a phrase carrieth with it, would have amazed his people, and affrighted the ministers, and discredited his ministry: by this alone it appeareth, that the example of fasting is abused, when it is paraleled, with cross and surplice: 2. The consequence is all too peremptorily followed, or else S^t. Luke was deceived: I should rather think, that D.B. may be deceived in his interpretation of S^t, Luke: The phrase which S^t. Luke useth, doeth no more urge us, to make fasting worship in any sense, then S^t. Paul his phrase Eph 6. Watching unto all supplication with perseverance, doth constreyn us to make perseverance, or watching a worship, distinct from supplication: Or then, the same Paul's phrase Acts 20.19. serving the Lord with many tears and temptations, do make temptations a special kind of worship. 3. Fasting may be called worship by a trope, as being a special adjunct of some extraordinary worship, and yet not be a special kind of immediate reductive worship, or any other kind. 4.

The truth is that fasting, is such a help to extraordinary humiliation, as moderate fasting, is to extraordinary thanksgiving, and therefore is no more worship, then Christian fasting: And to this purpose do our divines answer, concerning this place, which is ordinarily objected by every Papist, as here by the Rej. See Chemnitz upon these words: See Polanus, Syntag. lib. 9. cap. 8. Fasting is a help to prayer, a sign of humility and repentance, but is not a worship of God. 5. Fasting such as Annas was, is not a human institution, as our ceremonies are, but partly natural, when the whole man is taken up with greater, and more instant employment, exclusive of all ordinary refreshments: and partly of Divine application, in extraordinary humiliation, so that it hath ground and example both in the O. & N.T. which our Ceremonies are destitute of.

2. M^r. Cartwright (many degrees and ages distant from S. Luke) is brought in next, acknowledging circumstantial worship, only allowed in the particular, though commanded in his kind in the second command: Now I have at hand, only that edition of Mr. C. his Catechism, which was printed Anno 1611. and therein I find no such thing, upon occasion I will seek for the other edition: In the mean time I find there, that all will worship, how great a show soever it makes, is condemned and images (in special in God's service even as laymen's books) which the defendant defend, than the Rej. rejoyneth for. 2. Suppose he grant a circumstantial worship, what is that to worship invented by man: There is no doubt, but some parts of God's worship, by himself instituted are comparatively circumstantial, but what is that to man's invention. 3. There is a mighty distance, betwixt the general of kneeling at prayer, & such like gestures, intended by M^r. C. (if he name circumstantial worship,) and the general of Cross and Surplice, as there is betwixt the general of this and that father, and the general of all entia and things, that have being: This testimony therefore maketh nothing to the purpose.

The third witness is, Chamyer, Tom. 5. l. 20.4.5 affirming that arbitrary vows are worship of God not per se, of themselves, but by accident, and for some other thing, where to omit the translation of per se, of themselves, which should have been by themselves betwixt which there is a great difference, (as betwixt a body living of the soul, and by itself.) Chamyer in that very place, if his whole sentence be expressed (which neglect, if it had been the Replyers, we should have heard outcries, proclamations and invective accusations enough) I say •his whole sentence is contrary to the Rej.: His words in sum are these: To vow, and to perform are elicited acts of religion, because by themselves and properly they appertain to religion, but the actions that are vowed, are imperated by religion, and belong unto worship, not properly, but by accident, those formally, these materially. He doth not speak of vows, in that part which the Rej. quoteth, but of things vowed, nor doth he acknowledge these worship, otherwise then the matter of an action, is an action: It were not far from his meaning, if one should say, this bakers bread, and that vynters wyne, is a Sacrament materialiter and per accidens. Lastly he doth not speak of any worship elicitus per accidens, such as immediate Ceremonial worship is, but only imperatus ordered and directed, such as service to ones father or friend may be, and is not this then a worshipful testimony for Ceremonies, invented by man and made formal, immediate reductive worship.

Junius in the fourth place is brought in, testifying, that the human feasts of the Nativity, and Easter, are not worship properly, but it may be figuratively: And what is that, I wonder, to immediate reductive worship of human invention: Worship figuratively so called, is any matter, instrument, subject, adjunct, effect or even similitude of worship: Are all such things immediate reductive worship? Just as bread, pottage, wyne, oil, or meat, having touched the skirt of a holy garment are holy, Hag. 2.12. Thus the words and wildernesses where Christians meet, may be called worship figuratively or by a figure, the place being putt for the thing done in the place: thus the ringing of the Bell, before the Sermon, may be called worship figuratively, because it is a sign civil to give notice that such a service will be: And hence it is that Junius doth in the same place affirm, that such observations are only contingent accidents, or adjuncts to worship. The same Junius doth explain his own meaning controv. 5. lib. 2. c. 16. n. 18. warning us to distinguish betwixt actions of worship, and such which are done in order unto worship, adding moreover this: Actions of worship, what ever are not commanded of God are forbidden, for as touching such, nothing can be detracted, added, altered: and in Levite. 9. No right way of disposing God's servants to his worship, can be invented by man, but that, which God himself hath prescribed.

Polanus is next, who (saith the Rej.) in his syntagme defineth true worship of God to be the performance of what he hath commanded in obedience to him, to his honor, yet in his partitions pag. 128. he saith, that an ecclesiastical rite or Ceremony. is outward worship of God, not forgetting or crossing himself, but taking the name of worship in one place properly, and in the other improperly, or reductively. Where it is to be noted, that Polanus saith nothing of improper, reductive worship, but those terms are putt into his mouth, or thrust into he speech by the Rejoyner. 2. Polanus writ his partitions, when he was a young man, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ divine, but his Syntagme was his last work: If therefore any crossing was found in these two writings, his Syntagme was to be taken, as his more mature judgment, and preferred as his last will and testament. $\langle \diamond \rangle$. In this his Syntagme lib. 8. c. 1. he hath not only $\langle \diamond \rangle$ definition of worship, contrary to the Rej. his tenet, $\langle \diamond \rangle$ many other Items: It belongs to the substance of a good work, that it be commanded of God, and therefore its require, that the worship of God, and everything appertaining therunto be commanded: Actions indifferent, are not the worship of God &c. 4. In the place quoted out of his partitions: That an ecclesiastical rite is outward worship, he doth not cross himself, for what he there meaneth by $\langle \diamond \rangle$ ecclesiastical rite, he showeth in the specialls, which $\langle \diamond \rangle$ after setteth down, as sacrifices &c. though he mingeth some human feasts, with the ordinances of God or his method sake, never intending to make such ceremony. as ours lawful worship, and therefore opposeth his ecclesiastical rites to those duties, that are performed only by speech: as Invocation, confession, thanksgiving.

6. Fenner (saith the Rej.) maketh bowing the knee or head, lifting up the hands, or eyes, to the parts of external worship: But what consequence is there from natural gestures, to cerem. instituted by man? From actions particularly commended unto us in God's word, as outward worship, to such as their patrons can find no allowance for, but in a remote transcendent racked Genus?

Tylenus (a man, that Dr. B. should rather have written against, for his errors, then alleged against other for his authority) is in the seventh place brought in saying; that a vow of a thing not commanded, is worshi• only by accident, Syntag. par. 1. dis. 42. th. 17. Yet 1. ⟨◇⟩ doth not say, it is worship, but that it cannot be called worshi• but by accident. 2. He giveth this limitation, so far as ⟨◇⟩ may, some way be referred to worship, as an arbitrary, contingent, indifferent mean. Such as in prayer the choosin• of the word, forgiveness, rather than pardon, is in th• petition of remission of sins. 3. The worship ⟨◇⟩ speaketh of, is not immediate in his opinion, as appe•reth disp. 40. th. 16. as it is in the Rej. his divisions: Na• Tilenus is so wise, as to say, that the most proper an• immediate acts of religion, do not respect God per se, ⟨◇⟩ and of themselves, Ibid. th. 18. is it any wonder then, ⟨◇⟩ granteth a worship, not in, and of itself, but by acc•dent only.

Bucanus is the eight witness, and yet nothing out of hi• is brought, but that ecclesiastical rites, are not worship ⟨◇⟩ themselves, and as a work done. Did any of us ever affirm• they were such worship? May be the Rej. would gathe• from thence, that there is a worship, which is not of i•self, and as a work done such, which (though it canno• be gathered from that phrase, with better reason, the• if from this, that faith (doeth not justifie of itself, an• as a work done, he should conclude, that some grac• there is, which justifieth of itself, and as a work done yet we may well grant of false worship: But see how unhappy the Rej. is in his wrested allegations. Bucan•• ⟨◇⟩ the place quoted Loc. 43. q. 20. give•h 1. this caveat: ⟨◇⟩ laws appointed for order, and comlines sake only, are ⟨◇⟩ of divine w•rship: 2. It should be provided, that in ⟨◇⟩ of a grave, seemly, and profitable order, those things be ⟨◇⟩ instituted, which are unprofitable, foolish, ridiculous stage•y like: And of this sort are those, which the Papists come••und, concerning the difference of days, and garments: ⟨◇⟩ the same Bucanus Loc. 33. q. 15. In things appertai••g to worship, we must attend for direction only unto the ⟨◇⟩ of God, and not to human traditions: No observance ⟨◇⟩ to rites, whereof some are foppish, vain, and light, ⟨◇⟩ either in regard of themselves or some other thing su••stitious, amongst which he reckoneth, the ma•ing of the ⟨◇⟩, holy-water, the consecration of altars, and magistrall ••erminations. And that lawful rites of order, are to be ••served, not in regard of themselves, but by the law of cha••y: where he plainly showeth, that per se is not always ⟨◇⟩ to relation ad aliud, as the Rej. understands ⟨◇⟩. The same Buc. also, Lo. 47. qu. 65. giveth this rule: ⟨◇⟩ human ceremonies ought to be used, but those which are ••ointed, and commanded by the authority of the son of ⟨◇⟩.

The last witness is Melancthon, who faith in one place: ⟨◇⟩ man may not institute any worship of God, i.e. works ••ich God so alloweth, that he holdeth himself to be honored them of themselves, or whose immediate end is, that God ⟨◇⟩ be honored by them: As if we did hold the contrary, ⟨◇⟩ is not this testimony wisely alleged, that all men ⟨◇⟩ his opposites may grant, and the grant of it, nei••er hurts them, or helps him: Nay take away that clause, God's allowance and holding himself honored, which no human institution can infer) we say that our Ceremony. are such, for it is as an immediate end, of all mystical teaching rites, to honor God, by them and in them as of the word, so far as it preacheth the same virtues that Ceremon. do teach: And so much is taught by th• Rej. in these very dictates, when he reduceth these reductive ceremonies, under the head of immediate worship, for nothing can be immediate worship, whose immediate end is not, that God may be honored by th^e performance of it. The same appeareth out of th^e which the Rej. pag. 313. affirmeth, viz. that the prope^r end of preaching is edification of men, if that be joined, which he everywhere teacheth, that the prope^r end of significant Ceremony. is edification: Of such Cere^m therefore may well understand.

Melanchthon, not only iⁿ this place alleged, but also Tom. 2. p. 142. The wor^{sh} understands not, how great a sin it is to forge worship wit^h out God's command: And P. 107. Idolatrous worships o^r all they, which are appointed without the command of G^o Here is no distinction betwixt worship of itself, or b^y itself and by accident reductively &c. The Rej. his test^{imon}ies being such as have been declared, there canno^t be much force in his examples, if they be agreeable t^o his rules, whereof he hath brought such cross witness^e. The first example is, *of free will offerings, when a man $\langle \diamond \rangle$ left at liberty to offer a bullock, a goat, or sheep at his pleasur^e where the particular was not commanded, but only allow^e though the manner was prescribed: Concerning which answer 1. that there were no oblations left wholly $\langle \diamond \rangle$ the pleasure of men, for though the particulars were not, nor could not be determined by a distinct rule in general, yet they were determined by the circumstances, as our Divines are wont to answer the Papists, about their vows, counsels, superarrogations, Not by a general law, but by concurrence of circumstances. So Deut. 16.10. Moses showeth that the freest offerings were to be according as God had blessed them, from whence it followeth, it had been sin for any Israelite, whom God had plentifully blessed, to offer a pair of pigeons instead of a bullock, or two, upon his own mere pleasure: 2. where that proportion was observed the choice of a goat, before a sheep, or a sheep before a goat, was no formal worship: 3. That it had been unlawful for the Priests out of their pleasure, to institute any such determinate free offering, either ordinarily to be observed, or upon occasion of a man's forwardness to such a duty, i.e. that every free offering should be a goat, or at the least, that a goat should be one part of it, which is the presumption of our Prelates, about the reductive worship of the cross. 4. It was not left to any man's pleasure, for to appoint an offering not appointed of God, in the special or least kind, but only to choose among those, which God had instituted, that which did best agree, with his condition and occasion, as it is also now of psalms, prayers, doctrines, interpretations, exhortations, let every man offer, according as God hath furnished him: But from hence to infer the free choice of offering now to God, a cross, surplice, holy water, images, this is, as if one should then have concluded from that freedom, the free offering of certain butterflyes, or such like pretty, odd, vermyn not prescribed in the law, nor by name forbidden.*

The second example is taken from Solomon's worship, at the dedication of the temple, 1. Kings 8.2. 2. Chron. 6. and 7. which he thus conformeth to his notions: The number of Bullocks and Sheep, were worship in respect of the end and allowance only, the Cere. of prayer, kneeling upon a Scaffold, & stretching out of hands, were worship reductive ad modum in genere suo, having respect to the manner in the general kind thereof: The burning of Sacrifices in the floor of the Court, was only lawful before the brazen altar was consecrated, and upon the present necessity: But 1. in the number of Bullocks and Sheep, there was not a different worship, but a different degree of the same worship, as a longer prayer or sermon is not another worship then a shorter, but another degree of extension in the same worship, Surely to pray and praise God twice, thrice or seven times in a day, are no different worships, one frō another, but only more or less exercise of the same worship. 2. Kneeling & stretching out the hands, were not worship in respect to a general manner, but special external worship, as being natural, immediate expressions of the inward: As for the scaffold that Solomon kneeled on, that was no more worship, then the asse was upon which our Savior did ride. Lastly, seeing none of these things carrying the nature of worship, were instituted ordinary observances, neither might the Priests in any convocation, have made such, these examples are nothing like ours in question.

The other examples of Joshua's monitory stone, Ios. 24 26. •sas oath, 2. Chron. 15.14. Nehemiah's subscription, Neh. 9. •lomons 14. days solemnity, 1. Kings 8. Hezekiah designing 7. days, 2. Chron. 30. Mordicayes Purim, Hest. 9. have little •meant in them, as the Rej. hath afforded illustration or de•ration by bare naming of them: It may be sufficient to •ny that which is barely affirmed: yet in few words: •ese for the most of them were actions managed by •ods Spirit, suggested by secret instinct, extracted by •traordinary and special occasions: and therefore (as •r. Jackson Orig. of unbelief, p. 332. warneth) are then ⟨◇⟩ lawful in others, when they are begotten by like •casions, or brought forth by like impulsions. 2. Jonah stone was, as Dr. Jackson Ibid. pag. 329. judgeth, but •olemne attestation, though something extraordinary, •d indeed was no more worship, then the heavens and ••rth which Moses & Isaiah did call to witness. 3. Asas ••th, & Nehemiah's subscription, were no more distinct •orship from the covenant, then the words of a simple •omise are a distinct promise from the meaning of ⟨◇⟩, subscription and swearing of Canonical obe••ence in England, were never (that I hear of) excep•d against as Ceremonies of worship, by those which •ondemne them in the substance of them. 4. The ••olonging of worship by Solomon and Hezekiah was •ch a distinct worship, as Paul's continuing his exercise •f religion to mydnight, Acts 20. Mordecah his Purim •ave their proper place in the dispute: Out of all these •ules, testimonies, examples, nothing followeth in fa•our fof our Ceremon. because no sound rule, just testimony, or allowed example, is brought for any Ceremony▪ of Mystical signification by man instituted, and brough• into the solemn ordinary worship of God, for the ⟨◇⟩ of teaching: which maketh the Rej. his full perswasio• which he protesteth, suspected, and his triumphing rid•culous to those that well attend to these his grounds.

Yet the Rej. hath a double conclusion looking th• way, 1. That this will show in what sense we may ⟨◇⟩ our Ceremonies worship, and yet deny them to ⟨◇⟩ worship, that is in such a non-sense as is usually foun• in contradicting shifts: The 2. to show the difference betwixt us and the Papists, which is here showed very briefly, but hath been handled, and answered at large before, and thither therefore we refer the Reader.

THE DYSPVTE about HVMANE CEREMONIES.

CHAP. I. Of the negative argument from Scripture,

SECT. 2.

MY purpose is not, to insist upon words, & circumstantial exceptions, as being of little moment, but only to discuss the material points that I meet with, in their order. Yet because the Rej. cometh on in the beginning, with such a heat, if the Repl. had marvelously offended, almost in every word; I will take his first accusations (though not uche material) into due consideration.

1. The Repl. made only mention of the all-suffi•encie, or perfect fullness of the Scriptures. Heerat the Rej. raesently complaineth of abuse, misreporting, and ma•ng a false show: as if (saith he) we denied the perfect •lnesse of the Scripture etc. Now 1. the Repl. said no such thing, but the contrary rather, when he observe that the same was granted by the Def. as it was r•quired by those he writ against. 2. If he had said that th• Def. and Rej. also do deny the perfect fullness of Scripture, in regard of Ceremonial worship, he had said• more then truth, for they teache, that some such worship is lawful and good, which is not taught 〈◇〉 Scripture, that many teaching Ceremonies, which Go• never instituted, may by man be instituted and brough• into worship, images themselves not excepted, that additions to God's word (so they be not contrary) m• and ought to be made.) The sum of their doctrine• in this point, is that which M^r. Hooker setteth down p. 125. Mucke the Church of God shall always: need, which 〈◇〉 Scrip•ure teacheth not.

Neither doeth it help, which the Rej. addeth, 〈◇〉 Scripture is as perfest in giving general rules, as it should b• in setting down of all particular instances. For 1. this 〈◇〉 not generally true, because general rules make only th• proposition tending to particulars, and the assumption 〈◇〉 left undetermined, they therefore do not so fully an• perfectly infer the particulars, as if they were s• down.

General rules are given in the New Testament, fo• civil policy or government of Common wealth: ye• no man (I think) will say that civil policy is so full• and perfectly taught in the New Testament as it was 〈◇〉 the old, or as religious worship is now in the new.

The rule for clean beasts (saith the Rej.) that they be suc• as chewe the cudde, and divide the hoof, was as perfect, as 〈◇〉 such beasts had been named. True, but here no de•rmination of the assumption was necessary, but such the beasts themselves did make to every man that was •ot blind, without any institution of man. It was as •ow it is in bread & wine for the Lord's Supper, which •e appointed in general, without naming of wheat, 〈◇〉, mislen bread, or Frenche, Spannish, Rhenish, Itali•, Greek wine: but cross and surplice (I hope) are •ot so in general appointed. The general rules which 〈◇〉 Rej. groundeth our Ceremonies upon, are:

let all things be done to edification, with order, and decency. Now these rules are such (saith Mr. Hooker p. 95.) as stand light of reason, and nature to be observed, though the Scripture had never mentioned them. So that in them there is no such perfection of Scripture, for particulars, as if the particulars had been named. 2. betwixt these generals and such particulars in question, there must come a humane institution, such as (to make the example good) if it had been prescribed in the old Test. only with clean beasts should be used in sacrifice, and left to the Priests for to determine, what kind of beasts should be used, or holden to be clean.

2. An untruth is charged upon the Replier, in that he said, nothing was denied by the Def. in the 2. section.

Now let any man read, over the section, and he shall find nothing denied. His answers are these: we do accept of your distinction; only the second member must be extended to general rules, permissions, commō aequitie, you must stand unto this distinction; which when you do not, you compute yourselves. Is here anything denied. Yea (saith the Rej. the Major is denied: because it is shown that something is warranted which is not prescribed. The major is: Scripture condemneth that which is done either against, or without warrant of the word of God, especially in matters of God's service. Let any man of common reason and indifferency, judge, whether this be contradicted, by that, something is warranted which is not prescribed.

3. The Replier is taunted with I know not what fault, for saying here, that, distinction to be granted, which after he denieth to be the non-Conformists. As if in dispute, it were not usual for one party to observe what the adversary doeth grant himself, though he himself doeth not own it. The Rej. might have spared all these words of this section, but that he affected to say much upon little or no occasion, that his answer might seem abundantly complete.

SECT. 3.4.5. Concerning the faithfulness of Christ and Moses. Heb. 3.2.

1. The Repl. once for all noteth, that the Def. his distributing of our confirmations, from Scriptures, fathers, and Protestant Divines, as if they were like in the intended confirmations, whereas the later are only used by occasiō of perverse prejudice in our adversaries who require such things, and also in constant styling the fathers testimonies, judgments, and others confessions, the Repl. I say noteth only that this is some wrong, except it be only idle Rhetoric. For this, the Rej. flieth in his face, saying he noteth himself an egregious wrangler, his notes are notorious Cavills, and wrangles, and shows what spirit he is of. I will not say this showeth what spirit D. B. is of: for I doubt not but his spirit is better then here is shown. Yet this showeth what spirit he took upon him with the person of a Rejoinder.

Is it so great a fault to suspect the Def. of some wrong-doing, or of using Rhetoric, without any moment, in variation of phrases? To do some wrong unto an adversary in propounding his allegations after another manner than he meant, is so ordinary, that the suspicion of it, and that with exception, cannot be accounted so heinous a crime as those toothed terms import. Praejudice is as common fault, and all prejudice is some way perverse. The Rej. after p. 461. accuseth all those of averseness, by distraction, stupidity or prejudice, which do not feel that organiall music work much upon their affections (in and to God's worship) though he knoweth as good mē as our adversaries deny it. Yet he would not have us, nor will we, from thence gather, what spirit he is of. Rhetoric is no more an ill word, then Grammar, or Logic. Idle is nothing but without use: and so the Rej. himself confesseth the Def. his variations to be, in making judgments and confessions all one. Neither could he find what to say against the former suspicion, without fayning a new objection, which the Repl. maketh not, of aequalling Divine and human authority. The only fault was, that such things which might be well spoken to another, were spoken to a Bishop.

2. Concerning Heb. 3.2. (to omitte altercations about what was said or not said by the Def. and take what the Rej. will have said, or saith himself.)

The Rej. saith that a distinction is made, of Ceremonies whereof some are substantial Divine, and Doctrinalls, and have particular determination in Scripture, some are not substantial, called, Rituals, and mere Ceremony: the former have particular determination in Scripture, but not the later. Now (to let pass, that this distinction concerneth not the proposition which formerly was said to be denied because there is no mention in it of any term here distinguished) let any man of reason consider the sense of this distinction: Ceremonies are either substantial, Divine, Doctrinal, that is, such as have particular determination in the word, or else not substantial, that is, such as have no particular determination in the word; the former have particular determination in the word; but the later have not. Which is as much as to say; those Ceremonies which have no particular determination in the word, have no particular determination in the word. This explication cannot be excepted against, except Divine and Doctrinal Ceremonies be not all one, with Ceremonies determined by doctrine Divine, which neither the Defen. or Rejoinder or any considerate man for them, will deny. The Rejoinder himself for instance of substantial, Divine, Doctrinal Ceremony: putteth all those of Moses, law, many of which were no way such, but only in that they were particularly appointed of God. And to put the matter out of all doubt, the Rejoinder p. 60. telleth us plainly: that the Def. useth, and all of his side do use in this question, the term Doctrinal passively, for a thing taught in the word.

3. For defense yet of this distinction of Ceremonies into dogmatical, and Ritual, or mere Ceremonial (though he confess it is not formal) the Rejoinder nameth all our Divines, but citeth only D.A. as distinguishing betwixt Doctrinal and Ceremonial points of religion. Which, if it be so, what make•h this for distinction of Ceremonies, into Dogmatical and Ritual, or merely Ceremonial? But let us view the places cited. The first is in Bel. Ener: tom. 1. pag. 66. Where it is said, that for the most part, the fathers by traditions, mean rites and Ceremonies, received without Scripture, concerning which, we dispute not, and they were too l•befall, though when they judge out of Scripture, they plainly condemn unwritten traditions. What is here, that can help, the Rej.

The fathers spake of Ceremonies, which neither Scripture, nor themselves, judging out of Scripture, did allow of: of them the question was not in that place, though in other places it is handled by the same author, in the same book, as De Pontifice, De Sacraementis, De cultu Sanctorum:

Ergo the distinction of Ceremonies into, Dogmatical and Ritual or mere Ceremonial, is allowed.

The second place is in the 71. pag. of the same book: the Apostles elsewhere have written nothing in the dogmatical kind, which Paul had not preached to the Galatians. Where Dogmatical is opposed to Propheticall• praedictions, such as S. John in the Revelation taught, as Bel. there alledged. And not to anything, not particularly contained in Scripture, Ergo (saith the Rej.) the distinction of Ceremonies into Dogmatical particularly contained in Scripture, and Ritual, not so contained, is allowed as good. The consequence is a baculo ad angulum.

4. The Repl. said that Ceremonial is sometime opposed to moral, and sometime to Substantial, but not to Doctrinal. Heerupon the Rej. concludeth, that therefore, the distinction of Doctrinal and Ceremonial Ceremonies may be allowed, because (forsooth) as there be some moral Ceremonies, viz. all those which are appointed of God, and some other, so there be some Ceremonial doctrines, or doctrinal Ceremonies, and some other.

Where 1. the consequence is such as the former: Sometime Ceremonial is opposed to moral, and substantial: ergo some Ceremonies are doctrinal, and some only Ceremonial. 2. What a miscarrying is there in that assertion, all Ceremonies appointed of God are moral? Was there then no difference betwixt the moral and Ceremonial law of God. 3. Ther neither be, nor can be such significant teaching Ceremonies, as ours in q••estion, and not be Ceremonial teachings, or tea••ing Ceremonies: which is all one with Ceremonial •o•trines, or doctrinal Ceremonies.

5. The Hierarchy (being questioned to which of these heads it belongeth) is referred by the Rejoinder to both in several respects. So then, the distinction is not real, but rational only, in respects.

I see not why all lawful rites ordained by men, may not as well be referred to both. Neither do I think our Hierarchy would take it well if they should be called Ceremonial Prelates: and Doctrinal for the greatest part they are not found to be actively, nor can so be proved passively, so far, as they differ from those ministers many of whom they will not suffer to be Doctrinal, because they cannot be at their pleasure Ceremonial.

6. Concerning the rest of the third section, all that is rejoined, dependeth only upon the term mereCeremoniall Ceremonies. This term the Replier did not understand (as it seemeth) according to the Authors meaning; neither can the Rejoinder interpret it, but with such sense as was formerly declared. Mere Ceremonies are not only such as the Rejoinder p. 33. called single Ceremonies, for in the same place, he maketh significant rites, having relation to a further worship, such as ours are, double, or triple Ceremonies. So that this mere Ceremony can be nothing else, but a Ceremony which God hath not instituted for his worship: and so the Def. and Rejoinder maintain here only this assertion: those Ceremonies which God hath not instituted, are not instituted by God. Which is so evidently true, that it cannot escape the imputation of idleness, either to dispute for, or against it. Only this I note, that by this distinction, God cannot appoint a mere Ceremony in his worship, though man can: for if God appoint any Ceremony, it is (eo ipso nomine) doctrinal, substantial, moral. No merveyl therefore if God have not appointed mere Ceremonies, seeing he cannot appoint any such, but man only can do that.

7. Concerning Heb. 3.2. it is further answered sect. 4. that the faithfulness of Christ, and Moses was aequall, and alike in real faithfulness, because they both did that which was commanded them of God. But howsoever this be true, yet if it were God's revealed will, that more immediate means of worship should be instituted in the Christian Church, then Christ hath instituted, who was ordained to institute the means of worship, and Moses (as is here supposed) instituted all such means of worship in the Old Testament, as God would have instituted, it followeth, that the faithfulness of Christ, was not so extended to all the necessities of the Church, as Moses his faithfulness was.

8. Concerning faithfulness in Ritual ordinances, the Def. mentioned the ordaining of two essential and necessary Sacraments. Which allegation the Replier esteemed nothing to the purpose. Yes verily (saith the Rejoinder) it is something. It is in deed something, but this something is nothing at all pertaining to mere Rituals. For so the Defend. and Rejoinder both confess expressly, that these two Sacraments are not mere Rituals.

9. The Def. addeth, that as Moses appointed Ceremonies, so Christ removed them. Which explication of Scripture being blamed by the Replier, the Rejoinder answereth 1. That it is not an interpretation of the text, but an answer to an objection from the text. And yet the same Rejoinder in his Sum of the Def. his answer that it is a comparison of the fidelity of Christ and Moses. And all the text, and objection, from the text, consisteth in this comparison. 2. It is a proper answer saith the Rejoinder, for if Christ was faithful in removing Ceremonies, before necessary, then he need not praescribe other Ceremonies then simply necessary, and so not all mere Ceremonies. Is not this a proper consequence? there is no connection at all betwixt the first and second part, the appointed Ceremonies are therefore only called simply necessary, because they were appointed by Divine authority: and yet of such it is said, that Christ need not appoint other, whereas in deed he could not appoint other; and that he needed not appoint mere Ceremonies, that is Humane, which if he should have done, it had implied a contradiction, mere Ceremonies (in the Def. and Rejoynders opinion being such as are not appointed by authority divine. 3. It is added by the Rejoinder that the fidelity of Christ appeared in removing those Ceremonies of Moses, and the thing compared is fidelity. Both which are true, but not to the purpose: because the comparison is not in fidelity abstractly considered, but in fidelity about the building and furnishing all the house of God; of which, the abolishing of Mosaical Ceremonies, is no substantial part.

10. About the Repl: his answer to a place cited out of Calvin the Rejoinder observeth much irreligious way wardnesse, with falsehood, and three gross untruths, in one short sentence. Which it pleased him to note also in the Table of his principal or most observable Contents: the Replier found guilty of three gross untruths together. p. 15. This peal of terrible words make such a noise in the readers ears, that he cā scarce hear, what may be spoken for the party accused. But if he will hearken a little, it shall be made plain unto him that hasty passion only (in reasons absence) made all this rattling sound.

The first wayward, false, irreligious, and gross untruth is, that the Def. should have dealt more plainly, if he had cited Bellarmine, and why (trow ye) is it so great a crime, for to say the Def. might have dealt more plainly? because (forsooth) no dealing could be more plain, then to set down the very words of Calvin, with the place, where they are to be found. Now be it so, yet it is not so heinous an offense to say some dealing, might be playner then that which is most plain, but as the Secretaries and Proctors of our Prelates cour•s do in imitation of Criminall inditements (wherein always stand felonious etc.) aggravate every trifling accusation, and citatiō, especially those which concern a Bishop, as ungodly, irreligious, false etc. so must he that writeth, against anything praejudiciall to Prelates, secundum stylum Curiae, But the truth is that any other man's words set down according to his meaning, is more plain dealing, then to set down Calvin's, beside his intention.

The second way ward, false, irreligious, and gross untrueth is, that the same words, which the Def. citeth out Calvin, are found in Bellarmine, de Pontif. l. 4. c. 17. the contrary whereof, the Rejoinder doeth aver upon his credit. Now here is to be marked, that the Repl. spake not of every word the same, nor understood individual sameness, but like only, and so did the Rejoinder understand him, when he saith upon my credit there be no such words anywhere in Bellarmine, of such words is the credit pawned.

This being praemised, let these words of Bellarmine in that very place exstant, be well considered.

For as muchas the law of the OLD TESTAMENT was given to one people and for a certain time only, as till the coming of Christ, that law might Easily determine all things in Special, as in deed it aid, for in special it prescribed all things &c. But the law of the gospel was given to all the world i.e, to the people's of Sundrie nations, and was moreover to endure to the end of the world, and therefore this law of the Gospel could not so easily Determin all things in particular as did the other, that no other laws might be supposed necessary then what are found in the new Test. Nor is it possible for diverse nations to agree together in the same laws and rites, and therefore God judged it far better if he delivered in the Gospel the most general and commune laws, leaving the more special things concerning the Sacraments and articles of faith to be ordered by the Apostles and their Successors according as circumstances of time and place should require.

Let there also a comparison be made betwixt this, and that translation which the Rejoinder maketh of Calvin's words.

Calvin saith, that the Lord hath both faithfully comprised, and perspicuously declared necessities. Bellarmine saith, that God in the Gospel hath delivered unto us the most common laws, concerning the Sacraments, and Articles of faith. Calvin saith, that Christ would not praescribe singularly and specially concerning external discipl•ine, and Ceremonies, for that he foresaw these things to depend on the occasions and opportunities of times, nor did he think one form to accord with all ages. Bellarminus saith, that all special things could not so easily be determined in the Gospel, so as more laws should not be necessary: because there must be diversity of laws and ritualls, according to the diversity of Nations and Peoples, places and times. I doubt not but the Rejoinder upon consideration of this collation, will repent him of pawning his credit for no such words in all

Bel. but I esteem D.B. his credit better, then I will hold it from his person, let only his Rejoyning credit be hence esteemed.

The third wayward, false, irreligious, and gross untrueth is, that in that place of Calvin, there is nothing at all, which without gross equivocation, will serve the Def. his purpose. If this were not true, yet I see no wool answerable to so great a cry.

But let us see what the Rejoinder can find in Calvines words, for the Def. his purpose. First (saith the Rejoinder) Calvin differenceth matters merely ritual, from matters real, as the Def. doeth. Which as the Def. doeth, is not true. For the Def. differenceth Ceremonies into substantial and merely Ritual, p: 7. whereas Calvin doeth not difference Ceremonies, nor maketh any mention of mere Ritualls.

Take away that as the Def. doeth, and then the Repl. doeth so also.

Secondly Calvin (saith the Def.) showeth that Christ hath left mere Rituals at the Churches choice under general rules only. Now hear that equivocation which the •epl. spake of, for by Ceremonies, Calvin understandeth no such thing, as the Def. and Rejoinder doeth by mere Ritualls. The Def. and Rej. (as Bellarmine doeth) comprehend under that name Mystical Ceremonies, which the Rejoinder calleth double or treble Ceremonies: but Calvin meaneth only single matter of order and Decency. For this cause it was, that the Repl. said, the Def. should have dealt more plainly in citing of Bellarmine, then of Calvin.

11. About Calvin's meaning the Rejoinder striveth much, but cannot draw it to his purpose. 1. He granteth, that Calvin meant not to teache, that men may praescribe at their discretion mystical signs in the Church which is all that we desire. 2. His meaning is (saith the Rej) that what Ceremonies the necessitie and utilitie of the Church do require, may be ordained by the Church. This is expounded in Calvin's own words, translated thus by the Rejoinder whatsoever the necessity of the Church shall require for order and decency; which is the same that the Repl. said. 3. Some toleration of some Ceremonies like unto the Jewish, Calvin is said to give, sect. 14. But that which he speaketh there obscurely, he doeth in this 36, sect interpret plainly:

I witness that I do only approve such Humane constitutions which are founded by the authority of God, and taken out of the Scriptures and so altogether divine, let kneeling in Solemn prayer be an Example. 4. Because Calvin was interpreted out of himself, to speak of things necessary in their kind, the Rejoinder opposeth, that abstaining from blood Act. 15. and such like things are not necessary in their kind. I answer yes: because the kind under which they were found, was abstaining from scandal. So Calvin, sect. 22. (which place is alleged also by the Rejoinder for the institution of Ceremonies not necessary in their kind, because it is there taught, that weak brethren first coming from Popery, and not yet seeing their freedom in some in different things, are not rashly to be offended, by public practice of such things) Calvin (I say) answereth in the same place: Who but a calumniator, Can say that, So a new law was made by them, who only as appeareth, went about to praevent scandals, expressly enough forbidden of the Lord? Nor can ought more be said of the Apostles Act. 15. who intended nothing else by taking away matter of offense then to urge the Divine law for avoiding offense. But Calvin saith the Def. epist.

379. teacheth that some scandalous things must be borne with, And what is this to the allowing men to institute Ceremonies unnecessary in their kind, which is the question in hand?

5. The Rejoinder objecteth further, that the particulars, and not generals are appointed as necessary. Which is the very same that the Rep. said, the kind is always necessary and the particular do so vary by circumstances that some time they may be necessary, and so appointed, sometime not necessary, and so not to be appointed. 6. When the Rejoinder perceyved that this testimony of Calvin's maketh nothing for significant Ceremonies, he at last denieth the question here to be of significant Ceremonies, but of Ceremonies. He might as well deny the question to be of sacred Ceremonies, or as he calleth them of double Ceremonies, but only of Ceremonies. And thus is that very ambiguous equivocation wherewith the Def. was charged, by his Rejoinder, confessed. For what is else but to aequivocate, when all men know the question to be of one kind of rites only, to bring an argument which concern rites in deed, but not of that kind?

12. After some pretye phrases of the Repl. his running away, looking back, showing his teeth angerly, the Rejoinder in answer to a sad argument, that Humane Ceremonies properly of religious nature use and signification, such as Cross and Surplice, are not necessary in any Church, nor any ways more necessary for England, then for any other nation; or then holy water and such other Ceremonies would, In answer (I say) to all this, the Rejoinder repeateth again his confuse aequivocall term of Ceremony, denying the question to be here of Ceremonies properly religious in their nature, use, and signification. i. e. such as Cross and Sirplice are, as if we, disputed here of an indetermined idaea. And upon this miserable shift, not knowing what to answer unto the demands propounded, (without speaking directly against his conscience and known profession) he telleth the reader (both in text, and table) that the Repl. hath plainly abandoned Heb. 3.2. and so retireth again to his fort, of phrases, of demolishing his Castle, firing his Trenches, running away, & of his chaff and stubble, carried away before the Def. his windy words, After all which, as a good Canoneer, he dischargeth (as he calleth it) one piece of ordinance after his flying enemies, which is this Basilisko: You (run aways) teache some Ceremonies to be unlawful, though not forbidden, because they are not commanded. Ergo. But alas this shot hath no metal of truth or sense in it, and therefore will never hurt us.

Is any man so void of reason, as to teache anything to be unlawful, & yet confess it is no way against law, or forbidden? Those that say, the Ceremonies are unlawful, because they are not commanded, though they be not forbið, do evidently mean, that though they be not specially and by name forbidden, yet they are generally forbidden, by that rule which forbiddeth man to add anything in God's worship, unto that which God hath commanded, for such a shot there is no need of ordinance: as good may be made out of any bell that hath a clapper in it.

SECT. 6. & 7. of David's purpose, to build a Temple. 2. Sam. 7.1. Chron. 17.

THis passage will soon be dispatched, if the question may be cleared. The purpose of David, was either conditional only, if God should allow and second the business, or else absolute, without such suspending condition, as supposing that God did allow, and would prosperously assist him, for the accomplishment of it. If it was of the former sort, and so far as it was considerable within those limits, there is no quaestiō, but it was godly, and worthy of all honor. But if it was absolute, it cannot be excused from some mixture of praesumption. For whatsoever a man may absolutely intend to do, that he may do, but for the doing of such a thing, as building of a Temple then unto God, the Rejoinder himself confesseth it to have been unlawful, for David, without further warrant: and so confesseth also, that the absolute intention could not be lawful. Hence are these speeches of the Rej. That which may be lawfully purposed, with submission to God's pleasure, might not be done without his pleasure known, and leave given. We grant, that David could not build the House, nor so much as set out the place for it, without leave and direction from God.

All the question therefore is, whether David had an absolute purpose or no? If he had not, we have no ground from this place, against absolute instituting of religious Ceremonies by mā. If he had such a purpose, then the Rejoinder doeth not gainsay, but our argument is good. Now that David's purpose was absolute, it is more then probable, by that which the Rejoinder confesseth, viz. that Nathan was unadvised in saying to David, "e do all that is in thine heart, the Lord is with thee, before he had consulted with the mouth of the Lord, to whom the designation or place, manner, and Man, did belong. Heerin saith the Rejoinder Nathan failed. For 1. Nathan so far as appeareth doth answer only to the question of David, allowing his purpose, if therefore Nathan's allowance was a failing in being too absolute, David's purpose was of like nature. 2. If David's purpose had not been absolute before, yet upon Nathan's counsel, from which no dissent of his is any ways insinuated, it became absolute. 3. If David had dissented from Nathan in that point, he ought to have admonished Nathan of his sailing, and would also no doubt have done so or at the least, it would have bē concluded betwixt them two, that counsel must be sought, and expected of God; but Nathan not being corrected, but rather confirmed by David, as David was by him, they both were (wit•out seeking) better informed by extraordinary revelation. 4. The Def. saith, and the Rejoinder mainteyneth it, that od did interpret David's affection for a deed. But no imperfect velleities of good, are so interpreted. The will which is accepted for a deed, must be absolute, and hindered only by defect of power. Howsoever, out of the Rejoinder his grantes, we are furnished with this argument:

It was not lawful for David to purpose absolutely the building any religious house for God's Ark, without God's special command, or warrant. Therefore it is not lawful for man to institute and build Ceremonies double and tr•b•e religious (as the Rejoinder calleth ours) without God's special command or warrant.

The grant of the Rejoinder is the common sentence of our Divines well expressed, among other, by M^r. W. Attersol, upon Numb. 3.4. David was deceyved, that he went beyond the Commandment of G•d. To seek to praevent God was to be reprov'd. It might have been said to him: who required these things at thy hands?

Howsoever his purpose (or simple affection) m•y be comm•nded, yet the fact (that is the absolute purpose resolving upon the fact) is reprov'd, He ought not the have enterprized that, which was not commanded either to any other, or to himself. He did not obey God, but follow his own mind and device. He did run too fast, travayling (as it were) without his guide, and sailing without his compass.

These things being considered, it were but vain labor to prosecute the Rejoinder in particular litigations about this matter, which would be little else then repetition of the same things. I will only therefore consider of the Def. his retorsion, and the Rejoinder his shot out of this place: which also should have passed, but for the boasting wherewith they are (with provocation) advanced above their measure.

The Def. his retortion is thus. This Act of David's without special warrant were commended by God. Ergo, all institutions of Ceremonies by man, belonging to God's service, are not therefore to be condemned, because they want express warrant. This Act. (saith the Def. that is (saith the Rejoinder) this conditional affection not lawful to be brought into act. From such a conditional affection, he argueth, to absolute and actual institutions, by what rule of consequence I know not. The Rejoinder teacheth us the clean contrary argument, as before was declared.

The Rejoinder his shot is thus in short: David (as M^r. Cartwright confesseth) had general warrant from the word of God, for building the Temple, and had no word to forbid him to do it (til that by Nathan) therefore for David to purpose to build (til that forbidding by Nathan, was lawful. I answer 1. the conclusion (being understood of a conditional purpose (as the Rejoinder expounded it) we willingly grant, as neither making, nor ever having made any question about it. 2. David had no general warrant, for his building of the temple, neither doeth M^r. Cartwright say any such thing, but only that it was revealed there should be such a Temple. Which was no more warrant for David to purpose the building of it, then other Prophecies were warrant for somme (upon supposition) to purpose the destroying of it. 3. Though there was no word of God which particularly or absolutely forbid David to build the Temple, yet there was word enough in generall forbidding him to attempt any such thing, until he should receive further Commission. So the Rejoinder before confessed: the designation of place, manner, man, and time, did belong to God: and was therefore forbidden to David, and so the building forbidden, until that designation should come from God.

Now add unto this shot of the Rejoinder thus repelled but a little altering the charge and turning the pieces mouths. viz. That our questioned Ceremonies have not so much general warrant, as that it is anywhere in Scripture revealed, there should be a Cross, and Sirplice, and that the places of Scripture which seem to forbid them, could never yet be otherwise cleared; and then see how it maketh for the Rejoinder his cause.

SECT. 12. Concerning that phrase, Ier. 7.31. etc. You do that which I commanded not.

THat which the Rejoinder (out of his abundant leisure) would needs enlarge most vainly about sect. 8.9.10. & 11. I pass over with silēce: because the Repl: refused to maintain that which is there objected, out of unprinted and uncertayn papers.

1. In the twelf section, we are to inquire, whether and how that consequence in God's worship, be good: I have not commanded this: therefore, you may not do it.

The Def. and Rejoinder say it is not good, except by not commanding, be understood, forbidding as Lev. 10.1. Deut. 17.3. Which is thus far true, that except some forbidding be included or (as the Rejoinder speaketh) imported in that not commanding, not commanding cannot make a thing unlawful. But that is the very question whether in things proper to religion, not commanding, doeth not include some kind of forbidding.

2. The place mentioned by the Rejoinder: out of Lev. 10.1. doeth most strongly make against him. For the sons of Aron are there condemned, for bringing strange, or ordinary fire to God's worship, as doing that which God had not commanded, and yet had not otherwise forbidden, then by providing fire proper to his worship, and not appointing any other to be used in the tabernacle, and this is the very plea which we make against Ceremonies of human institution, in God's worship. The scope of that text we are taught, by an English Bishop, Babington, in his notes upon that place: We may hence learn and settle in our hearts, with what severitie the Lord challengeth and defendeth his authority, in laying down the way and manner of his worship, not leaving it to any creature, to meddle with, but according to praescription and appointment from him. Content he is, that men shall make laws for human matters etc, But for his Divine worship, he onely will prescribe it himself, and what he appointed, that must be done, and that only, or else Nadab and Abihu their punishment expected, that is, God's wrath expected, in such manner as he shall please.

He was taught this by Calvin, who upon the place saith God forbid other fire etc. to be used that he might exclude all adventitious rites, and teach that he detested whatsoever was come from elsewhere. Let us therefore learn so to attend to the Commandment of God, that we desire not his worship, with any far fetched devises.

M^r. Attersoll also in his learned and grave Commentary upon Numb. 3.4. doeth largely declare out of this example, how God disliketh, and disclaimeth men's devises in his service, as trash, trumperie, and mere dotage: instancing (among other devises) in Ceremonies added unto Baptism.

3. Our reason was propounded in the words of Calvin upon Ier. 7.31. Seeing God under this title only condemneth that which the Jews did, because he had not commanded it them, therefore no other reason need to be sought for the confutation of superstitions, then that they are not by commandment from God. To which the Rejoinder answereth, that M^r. Calvin's conceit holdeth true in proper points of religious worship, which are all prescribed of God himself, but not in matter of rites, not prescribed of God. Now if this be not a miserable conceit, that God's not commanding doeth forbid that which he hath prescribed or commanded, but not that which he hath not prescribed, or commanded, let any man of sense judge.

Other meaning I cannot gather either out of these words, or out of the Rejoinder his doctrine of worship, which was before distinctly weighed, in the head of Worship. M^r. Cartwrightes conjecture (as the Rejoinder calleth it) is the very same with that which he calleth Calvin's conceit. The Rejoinder his answer also is the same for substance, that it is true in matter particularly determined by God, but not in matters of order and ceremony, of which God hath not determined particularly. The sense of which is, that we must depend upon God, so far as he hath determined particularly, but in other things, we must depend upon men, and in England, upon the Convocation house. But to depend upon God, and his mouth, being to follow only his determination and what sense then is this, you shall only follow God's determination, in those things which he hath particularly determined, but if you please to do anything in his worship, which he hath not determined particularly, you may therein depend upon whom you please? For matter of Ceremony, enough hath been spoke before: and of order, we shall after dispute.

4. The rest of this 12. section is spent about the Def, his wonderful wondering, at our symbolizing with Bellarmine and other Papists, because that as they distinguish sins into mortal and venial, so we (saith he) make a distinction of against, and beside the word. About which, the Rejoinder granteth that Chrysostom did well use this distinction, in matters of doctrine, yet he saith it is not to be extended unto matters of Ceremony. But (the question being only about the distinction) it is in the Def. and Rejoinder their opinion far more applicable to ceremonies, then to doctrines: because they hold many Ceremonies lawful beside the word, which are not against it, though they hold no such difference of doctrines. Now this distinction was used by us, according to their conceit, more then our own. The like is acknowledged of Junius, that he distinguisheth well betwixt beside and against the Word, in the question of traditions devised for divine worship, 1. e. essential worship, particularly determined by God. Which is not so, for in that place, Cont. 3. l. 4. c. 17. an 10. Junius hath no question either about essentials, or worship, or traditions, but only about Ecclesiastical laws, binding the conscience. And if he had, yet that clause particularly determined by God, would spoil all: because in such things there can be nothing either against, or beside the Word. But if it were true, what is the difference, betwixt Junius and us? The Rejoinder saith that we confound rites with worship, and yet confess rites not to be particularly described as the other. Which is neither so, nor so, except he mean those rites, which he calleth double or treble ceremonies: and therein we have Junius so for us, that not only in other places, but also in the words next going before this in question, he saith generally, in divine things to coin new laws is nothing but to decline. Yet the Rej. will have it, that Junius in that place cont. 3. l. 4. c. 17. sect. 10. doth refute this distinction, as used by Bell. Mark therefore what are Bell. words, which Junius confuteth) viz. Only a prohibition of addition contrary laws is understood.

Which are the words also of our Defender and Rejoinder. cap. 2. sect. 3.4.5. So that by this interpretation, the distinction is theris, and Junius confuteth them all, so well as Bellarmine.

The persuaders to Subscription, are also confessed to use the same distinction, but in another meaning. Let the distinction therefore pass (for shame) and dispute of the meaning. But the meaning expressed by the Rejoinder is the very same with ours, save that they differ in the conclusions deducted from it. The altercation therefore which the Rejoinder addeth about some speeches of Mr. Cartwright, is not worth the answering.

The plain truth is, that this distinction is ordinarily used by our Divines, against the Papists, even in case of Ceremonies. D. Fulke against the Rhemists, on Mat: 15.9. Of Popish traditions, some be repugnant to the laws of God, and some are beside them, as idle and unprofitable Ceremonies. It was therefore but an affected quarrel, which the Def. picked, and the Rejoinder maintaineth, about these terms, as if they had any reflection upon the Popish difference, betwixt mortal and venial sins. Nay in this fashion, the Def. and Rejoinder may accuse our blessed martyrs of symbolizing with the Papists that were the murderers of them. For they were wont to use this distinction in the same manner that we do. So heavenly radford, in his epistle to the University of Cambridge: these which a little after he applieth to Romish rags, and in his epistle to Walden (extendeth them by name to Ceremonies) opinions are not only besides God's word, but even directly against it. It is therefore more then time for the Def. and Rejoinder to pull in the horns of this dodmons accusation, and confess that they were unseasonable and rashly put forth upon inconsiderate fantasy, easily uttered, but hardly excused.

SECT. 13.14. Concerning the ancient fathers arguing negatively from Scripture.

1. TO diverse sentences of ancient Writers, about this matter alleged, the general answer is givē. 1. that they speak of things contrary to Scripture: which when the Repl. granteth, complaining of the Def. his willful mistaking, or mis-interpreting our meaning, the Rejoinder lest he should seem less willful, repeateth the same imputation, which yet he acknowledgeth to be contrary to the Repliers own confession.

What should a man say to such Rejoyners, that know full well our meaning, and yet will never leave threaping another meaning upon us.

We never said, or thought, that all particular rites pertaining to order and decency, are punctually determined in the Scripture. We never dreamed that all such rites being beside the particular determination of the Scripture, are against it, we speak of double or treble rites as the Rejoinder styleth them, which no mere order and decency doeth necessarily require, but only the mere will of man injoine.

All this the Rejoinder knoweth: and yet he ceaseth not to beat the air, with endlesse repetitions of this imputation, guilded over with some variety of tainting phrases, that it may be the easlier, swallowed by his unwary reader. 2. It is secondly answered by the Def. that the ancient writers speak of doctrines, not of ceremonies. Wherunto the Repl. granting that to be true for the most part yet answereth, that the truth of their sayings may be taken so generally, as to include all religious Ceremonies. Here the Rejoinder objecteth that limitation (for the most part) is only to abuse the simple, and that the ambiguous term of religious Ceremony, is a bush to hide I know not what in.

Now for the former charge Compare here the Abridgement and Def. The later accusation of hiding-bush, etc. cannot otherwise be avoided (as it seemeth) except to avoid the same, we would upō every occasion, when we are to speak of the questioned kind of ceremonies, repeat the Rejoinder his beadroul of terms: double or treble significant, sacred by application, mutable, ambalatorie, arbitrary, reductively sacramental, moral Ceremonies, immediate worship, in respect of means by virtue of something else, in respect of the manner, and reductively, in respect of the utmost ende Divine worship.

Whersoever we observe not these terms partly of his own forging, since the Reply was written he may as well spy a bush over our head, as in this place. It is thirdly answered, that a general proposition may well be extended beyond one special conclusion to which it is upon occasion applied. To this (after that out of spleen (as I take it) he styleth it the man's stomach) the Rejoinder answereth that it may only be applied to other of the like kind. This therefore is only the difference, whether those Ceremonies which bear all those titles even now rehearsed, be not of the like kind, or have not one common nature, with some of those things which the Rejoinder calleth substantial, and doctrinal, points: of which we have disputed before, and shall after, by God's grace.

2. To Tertullian's words: Prohibetur quod non ultro est permissum: that is prohibited, which is not permitted, the first answer made by the Def. was, that our Ceremonies are permitted. Heerunto it was replied, that Tertullian's meaning must needs be of other permission than the Def. can challenge to our Ceremonies, otherwise there should be no sense in his words. The reason is, because the Def. doeth not say that our Ceremony. are otherwise permitted, then that they are not forbidden. Which kind of permission if Tertullian understood, then his saying is: that is prohibited, which is not unprohibited.

The Rejoinder here for resolution of this difficulty saith, that Tertullian's meaning was to account that not to be permitted by the word, against which any reasons out of the word may be given, though there be no particular word against it.

Now if he had attended unto the question, considering that it was only what Tertullian in this place meant by this phrase not permitted, and that his meaning for the word must be the same, with that immediately before opposed: Quod non prohibetur ultro permissum est, he would not have given that gloss, for then the meaning of this sentence must be: that which hath no particular word against it, can have no reasons out of the word made against it. Such a clause of the Rejoinder, our meaning and his, are alike, and we hold our Ceremonies to be so permitted, and therefore not prohibited. So permitted is, by his interpretation, not to be prohibited by consequence, prohibited must needs be either the same, or else prohibited by particular word: if the former, then he saith thus: our Ceremonies are not prohibited by consequence: therefore they are not prohibited by consequence, if the later, then this is his saying: our Ceremonies are not forbidden by consequence only, therefore they are not by particular word forbidden. The former is no reason; the later neither is consequence, nor toucheth any question.

The Def. his second answer was, that we may blush, to speak of Tertullian, because he professeth traditions in the same book. It was answered, that then all may blush, which allege the Fathers for that which they in other places gainsay. The Rejoinder granting, that those need not blush, because the Fathers sometime are deaf and hear not themselves speak, and in some particulars left their sound general principles, yet will needs have us blush (if it be not impossible, as his Rejoyning charity suspecteth it is) because they never held that which we allege them for. But how doeth this appear, because they allowed of sundry Ceremonies not prescribed in the word. Now except he could prove, they were not as deaf on this the ceremonial ear, or side, as they were on the other, or that they did not leave their sound generals, in the particulars of Ceremonies, as well or ill as in other.

this occasion, especially with his affected exaggerations if it be not impossible.

And that the Rejoinder cannot prove this, D. Morton showeth in his appeal. pag. 324. They that erred in points of doctrine, could not be altogether free from some sprinklings and spots of Ceremonial corruptions.

Moreover, how the best of those ancient writers allowed of sundry human Ceremonies, then in use, Augustine showeth, epist. 119. Many such things I dare not so freely gainsay to avoid the offense partly of some holy minds and partly of some turbulent Spirits.

Which is the very case of the best English Divines that do so sparingly speak against our Ceremonies, and yet sufficiently insinuate, that they would speak more, if they durst for the times. How also our Divines do not blush to allege their testimonies against human Ceremonies, though they know that in other places they speak for them this may be seen in D. Whitaker. tom. 1. pag. 116. Augustine will have us be content with those very few Ceremonies which are contained in the Canonical Scriptures. If elsewhere he have written ought that may less agree with this sentence▪ for my part I will not much trouble myself to reconcile all his speeches. D. Fulke, Rejoinder to Martial, ar 1. saith plainly: The gates of hell in idle Ceremonies did assault the Church. The fathers (in them) declined from the simplicity of the Gospel, and art. 3. Every idle Ceremony that prevailed, had the Prelates of the Church, either for authors or for approvers, But Christ committed his Church to them, to be fed with his word, and not with dumb signs, and dead images, which things he hath forbidden.

SECT. 15. Concerning Protestants arguing negatively from Scripture.

1. THE first quotation by the Def. chosen to answer, is out of D. Mortons Apology: of which it is said by the Replier, that the Def. his answer is, he meant not matters merely Ceremonial, but doctrinal, and so he affirmeth the meaning of our argument to be, if by mere Ceremonies, he mean mere order and decency, as he interpreteth himself in the end of this section, Heerupon the Rejoinder asketh, if we call this a Reply? I answer yea: because it showeth, all that is opposed, though it be granted as true, nothing at all to cross or contradict our argument, in the right meaning of it. Now mark what he hath to say, why it should not be called a Reply. 1. The Def. telleth not only what he meant, but where his meaning doeth appear, and the Reply showeth not that he hath not meant as he said. As if either the place where a thing is spoken, did add any weight unto the speech! or all, that mean as they say, do speak to the purpose. 2. It is partiality to take up the word mere in this place, and not sect. 3. But this doeth rather show, that though the Replier took no knowledge of this mere shift, when he first met with it, yet afterward, seeing it often repeated, marked some emphasis to be placed in it, and so did not spare it before, upon partiality to one section more than another, which seemeth a strange conceit.

Howsoever this doeth neither prove the reply none, nor yet non-sufficient. 3. He pronounceth it untrue, that the question here is not of mere Ceremonies and rites: which charge he groundeth upon the word especially in the service of God. But that word doeth show the specialitie of our question to be about the matters of God's service, or worship, such as significant Ceremonies are, and mere order is not. 4. He is styled a deceyved man, that thinketh signification put upon a Ceremony, doeth necessarily make it more then a mere Ceremony.

To which I answer, that if he that thinketh so, is a deceyved man, then the Rejoinder doeth deceyve, when in his Manuduction, pag. 33. and 39. he teacheth that special instituted signification, doeth make a Ceremony double or treble more then mere single rites of order.

2. The second quotation is out of D. Mortons Appeal, l. 2. c. 4. sect. 4. where is confessed, he speaketh of Ceremonies, but of Doctrinal only, such as sopping in of bread into the cup, etc.

Wherupon question was made, why this Ceremony should be accounted more doctrinal, or more unlawful, then the Cross in Baptism.

To the former part of this quaere, the Rejoinder answereth that the Def. he himself & all such, in this question mean by Doctrinal, a thing taught in the word and that the Sacrament of the Lord's Supper is taught in the word. As if it had been asked, why the Sacrament is more doctrinal then the Cross? and not if Sopping be so? But here it is diligently to be observed, how we are deluded in this whole argument, and other also, with the shadow of a worldly distinction, betwixt Doctrinal, and Ritual Ceremonies. We say, God hath appointed all Ceremonies properly religious, which are to be used. They answer, that this is true of all doctrinal Ceremonies, but not of ritual: that is to say, as here we are taught, God hath appointed all Ceremonies that he hath appointed, but not all that he hath not appointed. We say, it is not lawful for man to add unto God's institutions, in religious worship. They answer, this is true of Doctrinal, but not of Ritual additions: that is, by this interpretation, Man may not add unto God's institutions, any of God's institutions, but man's only. Let this be borne in mind for all answers that hange on the hinges of this distinction.

To the other part of the question, the Rejoinder answers that sopping of bread in wine is worse then the Cross. 1. because the cross maketh no alteration, of what Christ did ordain saying do this. 2. it is not substituted in the place of Baptism, as sops in wine were by those Haerteikes in place of the Supper. 3. it is not esteemed an instrumental sign of any grace given by the use of it, as they took their sops to be. 4. their sopping destroyed the very Sacrament. And for these differences, the Repl. is bidden to hang down his head, for asking such a question. But 1. Addition is as evil as alteration. For when Christ said, do this, he meant as well, do this only, as do this all. Fac hoc totum: fac hoc tantum: as Zanchi expoundeth it. Addition also is some alteration, if not of the things instituted, yet of the institution, as making it insufficient, or incomplete, by itself alone.

2. Sops and wine were not substituted in place of bread and wine, but were bread and wine. Neither were they first or only, or (for anything appeareth) at all▪ used by Haereticks, as the Rejoinder for his advantage, without ground, avoucheth, but by ancient Churches, at least in some cases: as is manifest out of Prosper, de Promissionibus, Dimidium temporis, cap. 6. Puella particulam corporis Domini intinctam percepit, etc. Sopping was so far from being a matter of Haeresie, that as it seemeth, it was received among the Fathers, so longe as infants communicating in the Lord's Supper, which was, as D. Morton confesseth, Appeale, lib. 2. cap. 13. sect. 3. for six hundred years.

3. Sopping of bread in wine, considered abstractly from bread and wine, was no sign instituted as an instrument of grace.

For so saith Cassander pag. 1027. out of Ivo: this custom of Sopping prevailed only through fear of shedding and not by direct authority. 4. It is too severe a sentence, against those ancient Christians, in Prospers time and (which is more) as Cassander and Hospinian judge, in Ciprians, that they destroyed the very substance of Sacrament. The setting forth of Christ's death was not excluded, though some part of the blood was representatively joined unto the body. A man is dead, that lieth in his blood, though some of it soak again into his body. The Fathers, six hundred years together, did not destroy the substance of the Sacrament. Hitherto therefore appeareth no cause for the Repl. to hang down his head. Let us see if more cause be in the comparisons he maketh betwixt sopping▪ and crossing.

The first was, the bread and wine (the only things used in sopping) were ordained by Christ: so is not the Cross. The Rejoinder answereth here nothing to the purpose, save only, that they were ordained to be used apart. From whence it followeth only that it is unlawful to use them not apart. And so it followeth, that Baptism must as well be used apart, orseparated from the Cross: because it was ordained so to be used, and the Cross was not ordained for any religious use, either apart, or with other things.

The second is, that sopping hath some agreement with reasō, Crossing hath none. The Rejoinder hence maketh two consequences: 1. Ergo Christ in ordaining the Sacrament otherwise, hath done something not agreeable to reason, 2. Ergo the Church in Crossing hath been void of all reason, fiftē hundred year. And upon these grounds, he crieth out of madness. But so madness may be found in any assertion, if it be first put out of the right wits or sense, as this is. For the meaning was not, that Sopping is agreeable to right reason in the Sacrament, but in civil use, where the aerial Cross hath none. Yet▪ it may be added, if it were lawful for men to add to God's ordinances in the Sacraments, then there would be found more probability of reason to bring in sopping into the use of bread & wine as a manner of food, thē a mystical aereall cross into the use of water which is no manner of washing. As for the Church, it hath not universally used the cross so longe, except the Waldenses, and others like unto them, were none of the Church.

The same Church, that used crossing, used also for divers hundreds of years, to give the Sacrament of of the Supper unto infants, without reason, and the continuation of the Cross more hundreds of years, addeth no reason unto it, except reason in such things doeth increase with their age. Many things have been used in the Church without reason: or else there is reason we should still use all that have been used, caeteris paribus. If there be any good reason in the cross, let that be tried by reason, and not by slippery conjectures taken from the persons using it.

The third comparison was, that Sopping was used by Christ, at the very table of the Supper, but Crossing was never so much honored by him or his Apostles, as to use it at any time. The Rejoinder answereth, that this argument would prove as well, that the eating of a Paschal lamb before the Sacrament, to be better then Sprinkling of water on the forehead of the Baptized. Because CHRIST did that, and not this. But this is not so well. For that 1. Sprinkling of water is no instituted ceremony distinct from that washing which Christ and his Apostles used. 2. It is very probable that the Apostles going into the colder part of the world, did use sprinkling.

3. Concerning a Paschal lamb, used before the Sacrament, as a Ceremony morally significant and reductively Sacramental, I see not why it should not be praeferr'd before the Cross or any such invention, even because Christ did use it, if that Circumcision be now a lawful Christian Ceremony, as the Def. and Rejoinder profess and maintain, pag. 285. It is also credibly reported a great Bishop, not long since living, that every Easter day, he used to have a whole lamb, praepared after the Pascall manner, brought to his table. D. B. knoweth well who it was, and of whom he hath heard it.

The fourth comparison was, that sopping was no new sign, but Crossing is. The Rejoinder opposeth that it had been an abomination to eat the Pascall lamb sodden, but the addition of sitting or leaning on couches (though a new sign added by them selves) was lawful etc. Of which speech, the first part is granted, viz. a sodden lamb had been an abomination: neither is a sopping communion excused. In the second, there is observable partialitie, in that he calleth setting an addition to the Passover, and yet in the same answer, with the same breath, denieth the cross to be any addition unto Baptism. The ground of all is rotten, viz. that sitting was a religious significant Ceremony instituted by men.

These things considered, let any man judge what cause the Rejoinder had to talk in this place, of the Repl: his room-conscience, contentious spirit, smitten with giddinisse, forsaken of wisdom?

In that which followeth about sopping, there is no new matter to fasten any dispute on, proper to this place, but only why some ceremonial sopping may not be used, as near to the Communion, as the Cross unto Baptism? The Rejoinder answereth. 1. because it is not so safe, to use visible elementarie signs in holy actions, as a transient Character. 2. Because such sopping were worse then the use of any other bodily element, as coming so near to the very institution. Where 1. it is to be marked, that a religious Ceremony, of soppes and wine, immediately before or after the Communion, is not found unlawful, but only not so safe as the Cross. By the same proportion, Ceremonious eating of flesh, and fish, in the solemnity of the Communion, is only not so safe, not unlawful. Hath not the Cross brought us to a fair market? 2. If the Cross be not a visible elementary sign, what kind of sign is it? Character noteth a most proper sign: aereall is elementarie: crossing is either visible, or else it is no sensible sign: because it cannot be heard, felt, tasted, or smelled.

If he meaneth a permanent substance, beside that he crosseth his own definition of a Ceremony, an action &c. in other places he defendeth images, in this very section, he leaned even now, upon couches, as upon safe Ceremonies among the Jews.

3. The outward nearness or likeness of a human Ceremony, to a Divine Sacrament, is allowed on elsewhere by the Def. and Rejoinder both: as when cap. 3. sect 7▪ they maintain as Christian, a Ceremonial sprinkling of men with holy water, wherein, both water and sprinkling, have as great an outward nearness unto the outward elemēts of Baptism, as anything cā have.

If the outward material show of nearness unto a Divine Sacrament, doeth make a Ceremony unallowable, then much more, such a formal significant nearness, as is betwixt Baptism, signifying our putting on of Christ crucified, and the Cross signifying our putting on of courage to fight under, and for Christ crucified.

See here what further is to be said of Jewel, and Whitaker's, after the Def. and they are conferred.

3. The Replier, affecting brevity, and finding no new matter of dispute about the allegations out of B. Jewel, and D. Whitaker, passeth them over, with this reason: in excusing of them, nothing is said by the Def. which hath not formerly been confuted.

Now the Rejoinder doeth not go about to show that any new thing is brought forth by the Def. about thē, which had bē to the purpose, but only catcheth up that word excusing, and repeating the accusation, of impertinent alleging them for the negative argument from Scriptures, in case of Ceremonies, which they do except, he taketh upon him to discover an undoubted close meaning of the word excuse: and thereupon accuseth not only the Repl. but I know not how many (they, them) of being scornful out of pride of spirit. Who would have thought that one word (used according to the ordinary courteous fashion of those which instead of plain denying, use the phrase, (excuse me) could have stirred up such a passion, or occasioned such an injurious surmize? But to excuse this, which I hope we may do without any offense, I will yield so much unto his importunity and challenge, as briefly to show, that neythe B. Jewel, nor D. Whit. did except such Ceremonies as ours, when they speak of the Scriptures fullness. Jewel in the first article sect. 29. alledgeth for the negative argument, Origen, concluding that in the Lord's supper the bread is to be eaten, and not reserved unto the morrow, because that Christ did not command that reservation to the morrow. Now that this reservation is a ceremony, and a lawful one also in D. Morton his judgment, appeareth plainly ou• of his Appeal, where (lib. 2. cap. 5. sect. 1.) he saith plainly, that we may grant a longer time of reservation then two or three days, with a reference unto the intent of participating of it by eating.

D. Morton therefore cannot be defended in saying that Jewel excepted ceremonies.

For D. Whitaker his not excepting of significant Ceremonies from the Negative argument, may appear partly by his negative silence, and partly by his express assertion, de Sacramentis, pag. 203. for unto Bellarmine his assertion, that the Church may institute new Ceremonies, for ornament, and for signification, he granteth that of ornament▪ as he doeth after of order, but no such consent is given of signification, but rather the contrary: Rudes non sunt Ceremonijs erudiendi: dedit Deas, Scripturas, vt ex ijs rudes institutionem necessariam haurirent. So in Oper: tom. 1. pag. 116. Augustinus nos illis paucissimis Ceremonijs contentos esse vult, quae in Canonicis Scri•turis cont•nentur.

The truth is, that our Divines do ordinarily reject the Popish Ceremonies, upon this ground, So Gallasius in Exod. 22.7.

(Nihil tale a Christo aut factum, aut institutum. Ergo ne sapientiores nos ipso & Apostolis fore arbitremur.*)

* There is no such thing by Christ, either done or instituted, therefore let us not deem ourselves wiser then he or his Apostles.

4. Another omission, whereof the Repl is accused, for which he is called a gentle man, is, that the Def. in the end of this Argumēt, recalleth the state of the question, distinguishing betwixt mere Ceremonies, & mixed, by mere meaning altogether indifferent, and by mixed, some way forbidden, All which (saith the Rejoinder) the gentle Replier passeth by. Now sure he might also himself have passed this by, with more credit of the Def.

For what sense is in such a stated question: whether the Scripture doeth condemn such Ceremonies, as it leaveth indiff•rent, or only those which it some way forbiddeth? All that pass by, may see, that this was not worth the taking up.

Yet concerning the mixture of ceremonies with opinion of holiness, justice, merit, efficacy, or real necessity, which here the Rejoinder maketh the only grounds of forbidding, he is now, in such gentle manner as is requisite, answered, in the head of Difference betwixt popish Ceremonies and ours.

5. After this, the Repl. is charged with quarrelling, only because he saith the Def. answered nothing to a main point, upon which this first argument, in the Abridgement, doeth depend, namely the rules of Ceremonies, that they should be needful, and profitable, for edification, the more comely and orderly performance of God's instituted service, which being wanting in our Ceremonies they cannot be innocent, though all were granted which the Def. mainteyneth. And why is this a quarrel?

The Repl. (as it seemeth) can neither by speaking, nor houlding his peace, gain so much favor with the Rejoinder as that in either he may pass without some shrewd censorious note. If he hold his peace, he is a gentle man, if he speak, he is a quarreller. But what are the reasons of blame in this place?

1. The Defender (forsooth) was not tied to the Abridgents order 2. It were idle to speak of directive rules, if all human Ceremonies be unlawful. 3. If God hath left rules for direction of his Church in rites and orders Ecclesiastical, then he hath not determined of them in his word. 4. The Defender hath maintained, that our Ceremonies are agreeable to the rules of God's word: so as no Friar dare deny it, nor the Replier professing his name. In all which there is nothing of any moment. For 1. though it were granted, that the Def. was not tied to the Abridg, order, yet he may be tied to their matter, if he meant to give them a full answer. 2. Though it be needless to speak of directive rules in unlawful Ceremonies as they are simply unlawful, yet seeing rites of order and decency, which are confessed lawful, are by the Def. and others confounded with Ceremony. by others esteemed unlawful, it is very necessary, that at least the conditions of lawful Ceremonies should be Demonstrated to agree unto such Ceremonies as are defended to be lawful. 3. Though God hath left rules for rites of order and decency, yet he hath determined of all Ceremonies significant by institution. 4. If the Def. had maintained our Ceremonies to be agreeable unto these rules of God's word, it had been the most compendious way for the Rejoinder to have shown, where, and how?

For that of the Friar, I easily believe it. For not one friar of a thousand dare say that any allegation for Popish Ceremonies, though it be out of a lead legend, is not as plain a demonstration as any is in all Mathematickes. As for the Repliers concealing his name, that is a poor imputation, For I dare undertake, that the Rejoinder may have names enough for that which is said, and upon second thoughts, he may profess his own name among them, except he can show, where and how the Def. hath indeavored to prove our Ceremonies agreeable to those rules about which this question is moved. If the Def. had performed this before, what need the Rejoinder to have made here a solemn digression, touching the rules for Ceremonies. Which digression of his, shall now have a hearing.

Concerning Rules for Ceremonies.

1. IN the first place, he taketh great exception against one rule propounded by T. C. Rep. 2. pag. 62. that Ceremonies offend not any, especialy the Church of God. To this, D. Witgifts main answer was, that it was a rule for private men, & not for the Church. Of this the Rejoinder seemeth ashamed: and therefore seeketh after other exceptions. The first is, that the buisnesse for which this rule is given. 1. Cor. 10.32. was no matter of Church Ceremony, but of conversatiē. Where he should have considered. 1. that some Church Ceremonies had of old their place in ordinary conversatiō, so these two are not apposite one to the other. 2. that the eating of things offered to idols, was a heathenish Ceremony, and therefore the abstaining from it required in Christian Ceremonies. 3. that howsoever this rule is in this place applied, yet Rom. 14.15.20. it is by the same Apostle applied to some kind of Jewish Church Ceremonies.

The second exception is, that this rule is moral and general, belonging to all our actions not particular, for Ceremonies. But if by particular, he meaneth proper, then he overthroweth by this exception, all those rules by himself acknowledged for good (edification, comeliness and order;) because none of these are proper unto Ceremonies.

The third is that a negative (such as not to be scandalous) may well be a caution, but not a rule. About which I will not contend.

It is sufficient for our purpose, if it be a caution strictly to be observed in Ceremonies, for such a rule as is. Thou shall not murder.

2. Another rule urged by T. C. (that Ceremonies tend to the glory of God) is also rejected by the Rejoinder as the former. But no new reason is brought, but only that it is a common rule, not proper to Ceremonies, which in many words is enlarged. Now for this (being the same with that formerly objected about not scandalizing) the same answer which before was given is sufficient. Yet this moreover is to be observed for both these rules: that though they be not proper to Ceremonies, our Divines notwithstanding do usually apply these and such like general rules unto Ceremonies, because the breach of these rules is common to (and as it seemeth inseparable from) human significant Ceremonies proper to religion, taken from Papists. They tend not in their nature to God's glory, but rather to the glory of them from whom they have received their being. They are scandalous both to Protestants and Papists, as afterward is declared.

So Vrsine, tom. 1. pag. 365. giveth one rule for Ceremonies, that they be not impious, which is not proper to Ceremony: as Bucanus among the received rules of Cer. maketh this one, that they be not opposite to the analogy of faith. Because many of the Popish Ceremonies are impious and opposite to faith. And the same Vrsine addeth among other rules, that they be not scandalous. Junius also in his Hidelberg, theses de tradit. th. 58. requireth in a good Ceremony, that it be to the glory of God. So others many. D. Willet in his Synopsis, pag. 110. giveth 4. rules for Ceremonies: two of which are 1. that all things be done to the glory of God. 3. that all things ought to be done without offense.

Yet these rules in T. C. are such as may not pass without the Rejoinder his censure, laid out in divers digressing pages.

Lastly the Rejoinder himself when he would give a rule for distinguishing good Ceremonies from bad, useth to make this one, that they be free from opinion of merit etc. And yet he will not say that such opinions are proper to Ceremonies.

3. H. I. is in the last place brought in, as not holding the rules of T. C. Which (were it true) is little material, or to the purpose. But what is noted out of H. I. repugnant? He injoineth the same rules to be observed in the determining of mere Circumstances either Civil, or occasional, but denieth the Church to have any power of appointing Ceremony•nies merely Ecclesiastical. And this is in effect to take those rules away, removing the Ceremonies which should be fram•d by them.

Nay rather this in effect, and cause both, to acknowledge the rules, and only to point out the true objects to be ruled by them, and to give warning of abusive objects which have crept in under the colors of those true. Whether this discretion of his betwixt Circumstances, and properly religious Ceremonies, be justifiable or no, that question belongeth not to this digression, but to three whole chapters of this dispute. But if the Rejoinder would know who doeth directly take these rules, and the other also which he acknowlegeth, as they are Scripture Rules, it is one to whom both he and the Defend. are much beholding to M^r. Hooker by name, who p. 95. saith plainly of one, as well as of other, they are Rules and Canons of that law, which is written in all men's hearts. The Church had forever, no less then now, stood bounde to observe them, whether the Apostle had mentioned them, or no. Neither saith he therein much amiss, except that same no less bound. So that as it seemeth, the Defend, and Rejoinder making such courtesy of proving our Ceremonies agreeable to these Rules can very hardly show, that they are agreeable to light & law of nature. After this light skirmish about 2. rules, the Rejoinder soundeth a retreat, and saith, he will refer the consideration of the Agreement of our Ceremonies to the true Rules, unto a fitter place. But a fitter place can scarce be found, for here it was challenged by the Replier, here it was promised by the Rejoinder when he craved leave to speak more fully of rules •o be observed: and this is registered in the table,

Rules about Ceremonies shown in a digression. Now after all this, to make only a few pragmatistical exceptions against 2. rules which he termeth irregular, and out of square, not once touching upon the rules which the Replier required satisfaction about (v. 13. if our Ceremonies be needful, and profitable for the edification of the people, by the more comely and orderly performance of that service, whi•h God hath expressly prescribed in his word) and so to put of the buisnesse unto another invisible and uncertain place, this is nothing else but to be the Def. his Second, in the fault he was accused for, but not in releiving of him at all. It was not for nothing that he called the challenge a quarrel, as insinuating it was not a thing fit to be meddled in. The truth is the Rej. in his Conscience, holdeth our Ceremony. incommodious, or inexpedient, though not simply unlawful: and therefore can find no place to show, that they are needful, and profitable for edification. I doubt, whether another special Command from the Kinge, would bring him to printe a treatise about that question?

SECT. 16. Concerning Order, and Decency,

1. Cor. 14.40.

The only place (by the Rejoinder his confession, for Ecclesiastical power, in constituting Ecclesiastical Ceremonies.

THE Defender beginning to confronte and confute our tenent, neither bringeth, nor can bring any Scripture, for the authority of Churches to ordain Ceremonies, but only this one, 1. Cor. 14. He saith, in deed, that he nameth only this place, not to trouble us with any other at this present. But the Rejoinder more ingenuously confesseth, that this is the only place in the New Testament, by which all Divine• do conclude, that a power is given to the Church, to constitute Rites &c.

This place is all the answer they give, or can give, to those that are wont to trouble them with a quo warranto.

If this place then faileth them, or serveth not their turn, are not our Ceremonies confessed to be appointed without any warrant of the word, at least in the New Testament?

1. Now that it doeth not make to the purpose, it was first shown, from this, that the Defend. himself concludeth no more from thence, then that the Church may by virtue of this permission, ordain any Ceremonies that may be fit for the better serving of God. Which maketh nothing to the purpose, except first it be proved that God is better served with our Ceremonies, then without them. The Rejoinder here 1. denieth this to be his Conclusion, and yet they are his own words, & no other conclusion is mentioned by him, as appeareth in the Rejoinder itself, pag. 74. But by this (saith the Rejoinder) he undertakes to prove another thing. Let it be so, yet he must first prove this, which he immediately draweth out of the text, which he doeth not.

Neither doeth he so much as name that other thing which he undertaketh to prove, much less perform his undertaking. This was therefore no fit place for him to vente his phrase, of shooting beside the Butt. 2. He accuseth the Repl. of insult•ng, because he denied the Consequence, and gave a reason of it: and yet referreth the answer of that reason, to a fitter place I know not where. Only he repeateth the often exploded evasion, that the question is whether all lawful things be particularly, or expressly commanded in the word, which none of us ever writ, said, or thought. Yet we must be troubled with this groundless, useless repetition, over and over again.

2. The only back of the Consequence made out of this place, is that all Fathers, and all Divines, (the Rej. addeth, of whatsoever Religion not excepting Socinians, nor yet Anabaptists, whom he useth to acknowledge adversaries to his Conclusion) do use this place for one and the same conclusion.

Now this is easier to say, then to demonstrate, I do not find this place much used to any such purpose by the Fathers. Chrysostom expoundeth it of moral virtuous carriage, opposite unto such perverse walking as if a man go upon his hands, with his feet upward. Ambrose extendeth it no further then to things mentioned, in that Chapter: secundum ordinem supra dictum Oecumenius also maketh it a recapitulation of things formerly mentioned, of speaking by course, and women's being covered etc. 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 . He Summarily gathers together all that went before. Basil expoundeth it of time and place, ed. gr pag. 530.

〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , and of proportion to be observed betwixt divers members. pag. 459. These are some Fathers▪ and (as I am perswaded) more then either Def. or Rejoinder can bring, so to argue from this place, as he doeth▪ Amonge the ancient Schoolmen, it is hard to find, where any one of them doeth conclude Ceremonies proper to religion, out of this place. Thomas in his Comm. upon it, doeth so interpret it, that he leaveth no ground for any such conclusion: [Honestly] 1. e. while one Speakes that other be silent, and that women speak not in Church. in order] 1. e. that first one and then another speak. etc.

Erasmus consenteth: Decently and in order that no unseemlines or tumult arise.

Amonge later writers, these words are often applied to rites, but in a diverse manner. The Papists, and some other do prove from hence, their double treble, analogicall Sacramentalls, as the Rejoinder calleth them. See Hosius his Conf. de ritib. Bap. c. 37. Bell. de effect Sacram. l 2 cap. 31. Balthasar Chavassius. l. 1. cap. 21. and l. 2. cap. 7. where from hence they dispute against Calvin by name. •ccius (saith Musculus upon this place) In his Commune places, in the title of human traditions citeth these words of the Apostle let all things be done &c. To justify the traditiōs of the Bishop▪ as authentic & such as ought to be kept with a Consciencie of obedience, but this praescript of the Apostle is not to be applied to any Episcopal traditions, but the Apostles own, to wit such as he had delivered to the Churches.

Our Divines (few of note excepted) do only from hence conclude rites of mere order and decency. And some of the graver, Papists, to this day can find no more in it as Esius in his Comm. upon the place: It belongs to decency that women speak not in the Church, to order, that many speak not at once. What is now become of All Fathers, All Divines, for one and the same conclusion? M^r Hooker, pag. 95. doeth directly oppose the Def. his conclusion, contending that the Rules set down in this place, are the Rules of natural reason, and not of the Apostle, or properly of the Scripture, For if this be true, then that is false which the Def. so confidently averreth, that the Apostle doeth here grant a general license and authority to all Churches, to ordain Ceremonies: except the Apostle did give Churches license, and authority, to do that, which by the law of nature, they might do, and by the light of nature, know they might.

3. The Def. was requested to show, by what Logic he formeth his consequence from order, decency, and edification, unto such Ceremonies as ours?

The Rej. hath no other Logic to show for it then this: Sundrie Divines do manifest the Consequence, because the same particular circumstances, would not be comely and to edification in all places and times, the Church must have power to institute and alter them. But 1. this is not the consequence, meant by the Repl. expressed by the Def. The Apostle saith. let all things be done orderly, decently, and to edification. Ergo, he granteth a general license and authority to all Churches, to ordain any Ceremonies, that may be fit for the better serving of God. 1. e. such as ours are.

Neither yet is the Consequence, which the Rej. would have implied by the Def. upon supposition of the former: The Apostle hath granted a general license, and authority, to all Churches, to ordain Ceremonies, that may be fit for the better serving of God. Ergo, all Rites and Ceremonies, which are beside the prescription of the word (such as ours are) are not unlawful. It is in deed, the very same sentence, which the Rejoinder did so spurn from him, pag. 72. when it appeared under the name of M^r. Jacob: in the distinction, betwixt mere Circumstances, Civil, or Occasionall, and Ceremonies merely Ecclesiastical. What a miserable cause is this that our Opposites defend, which deeply concerneth the Consciences of all that urge our Ceremonies, or allow of their urging, and yet cannot be fathered, but on one only place of Scripture, and that with an invisible and inexplicable consequence?

Concerning an Argument against our Ceremonies, out of 1. Corin. 14. Which is acknowledged to be the only place in all the New Testament, that can be alleged for their imposing.

1. The Replier, seeing that all the cause (on the imposers part) dependeth on this place of Scripture, & finding nothing by any Logic could be drawn from it for our Ceremonies, thought good to try, if there may not, from the same place be formed a better argument against them. This the Rej. calleth beating up of a new Hare, and loosing the way: as if all the Def. his Retortions, and all the Rejoinder his paper shot which he maketh after the Repl. when he imagineth him to fly, or run away, were new Hares, and exorbitations. I know not else what privilege he hath, to use a weight and a weight, one for the Defend. with himself, and another for the Replier.

2. The Argument is thus put together, by the Rej. pag. 77. All that is left unto the Churches liberty, in things pertaining to God's worship, is to order them in comely manner. But to appointe and use the Ceremonies as we do, is not to order in comely manner any thing pertaining to God's worship. Therefore, to appointe and use the Ceremonies as we do, is not left to the liberty of the Church, I. e. it is unlawful. The Rejoinder answereth first to the proposition, and then to the assumption, but so as he mingleth both together, in many words: Yet I will follow his order.

3. First of all he denieth the proposition to be found, in the Repl. his meaning. But I can see no reason of this denial. 1. He saith, that Order and Ordering is taken sometime largely, for all *discipline, or policy, sometime strictly, for ranking of persons and actions handsomely one before, and another after, and so is opposed only to confusion, as in this place, 1. Cor. 14.40. Now this is far• from overthrowing the proposition, in the Repl. his meaning. For the Repl. meant order in the strict sense, which maketh also for his purpose: and this the Rej. granteth to be the meaning of the Apostle in this place 1, Cor. 14.40. Which place the same Rej. pag, 75. confesseth to be the only place (in the N. Test.) by which power is given to the Church to constitute Ceremony: Frō both which laid together it necessarily followeth that all which is left unto the Churches power under the title of order, is ordaining in the strict sense, 1. e. ranking of persons and actions handsomely, as the Rejoinder expoundeth it. Yet immediately after he accuseth the Repl. for saying order to be the right placing and disposing of things instituted, for time, place, etc. not showing why this disliketh him, or wherein differeth from his own explication. Only he saith that etc. often by the Repl. put to time, and place, is a blind. Which is not so, for by etc. is meant all circumstances of like nature with time and place, as number, measure, vicissitude etc. How many Psalms shall be sunge, or chapter read, what, and how much Scripture shall be at this or that assembly expounded, how one part of worship shall succeed another *etc. without a blind.

4. In the next place, the Rejoinder findeth a wrong meaning in the Repl. his use of the phrase (in comely manner:) because afterward in the ende of the Assumption, he saith, that comeliness is nothing but the seemlinesse of order. For (saith the Rej.) beside that comeliness of order, there is other comeliness. Now this the Repl. professeth immediately after the words quoted: other where comeliness may contain all natural and civil handsomenesse. etc. Neither will I contend about this, but it implieth so much in this very place. So that the Rejoinder hath not given any reasō, why the Proposition, or first part of the Argument should not be admitted. Yet after that he hath fathered it upon M^r Jacob and made the Repl. his disciple, he cometh to examine the proofs of it, though he himself (as is now shown) hath given sufficient assent unto all contained therein.

5. The first proof is, that it is manifestly collected out of the place in question, 1. Cor. 14. and the Def. seemeth to grant as much. To which the Rej. answereth. 1. that in that place, three distinct things are propounded, Edification, Decency, Order: and these three cannot be one. But edification being the ende, Decency and order the means, they may well be contained in one: decent order, tending to edification, or (which is as much to our purpose) in two: decency, and order, for edification. A holy Sacrament, decently, and orderly administered, for edification, is not fowr distinct things, but one. His 2. is, that these words are the conclusion of the whole Tract. beginning at the eleventh chap. wherein are handled some things only concerning Decency, some more properly pertaining to Edification, and some which belong more peculiarly to Order. Ergo more is commanded in these words, then the comely placing of one thing after another. Let this be granted, yet it followeth not, that more is left unto the Churches liberty, then order, and decency, unto edification. For all things that are commanded, are not left unto the Churches liberty.

But that speaking in unknowē tongues which the Rej. doeth refer to edification as distinct from order and decency, is by good Divines accounted to offend against the order and decency, spoken of c. •4. and 40. So D. Whitaker, de Script. q. 2. c. 18. disputeth against the use of an unknowen tongue in God's service, out of this very place: pugnat hoc vero cum 〈in non-Latin alphabet〉 quam maxim. 1. Cor. 14.40. 1. e. this mightly overthrowes that good order which he so much stands for. His 3. is, the Defend doeth no way seem to grant the proposition: because the Repl. undertaketh by argument to rescue this place out of the Def. his hands.

But this nothing at all argueth, that the Def. and the Repl. do not agree about the proposition, though they dissent about the place, as it is handled in the assumption. The Papists grant us, this proposition: No phrase is used by Christ, in those words: this is my body, but a Sacramental one. Yet because they deny the assumption: transubstantiating words, are not a Sacramental phrase, we undertake by argument to rescue this place out of their hands. So the Def. requiring no more, then order and Decency unto Edification, to be left unto the Churches liberty, for the establishing of our Ceremonies, doeth seem at least to grant, that all which is left to the Churches liberty is order and Decency unto edification, though he deny these to contain no more then mere circumstances, which is the assumption. Of Edification there is not mention made in the proposition, because that as an ende, is out of question, and always included.

6. Peter Martyr is cited, out of D. Whitaker, de Pontif. pag. 841.844. as agreeing with that which the Repl. would have. Here the Rej. enlargeth himself much for the sake (as he saith) of those that are unlatined.

1. He telleth us that P.M. doeth distinguish, though not divide, comeliness from order. Which we do also, For take the Repl. his words in the most rigorous sense you cā, yet comliness of order, doeth distinguish cōlinesse from order, no less then comeliness of a man, doeth distinguish it from a man. 2. He addeth, that P. Mart. doeth there instance in the Ceremony of thrice dipping, and in the observation or institution of Feasts. But let the Reader know, that those words, Ceremony, observation, institution of feasts, which the Rejoinder hath set down in a differing letter, to be noted as P.M. his words, are not to be found in the place of P.M. but are added by the Rejoinder for advantage. P.M. expoundeth the meaning he had in all his instances by what place, what time, what manner. If therefore the Repl. did not look upon that place, but took it on trust, from the trusty hand of D. Whitaker (as the Rejoinder objected to him) yet it proveth good and fitting. So that the Rejoined. forgetteth himself much, when upon this uncertain, and momentlesse conjecture, he compareth the Repl. to a hungry creature (or dog) that runneth away with a bare bone. D. Morton once (at the least) alleged some testimonies on trust: and therefore, being challenged for them, he confessed that he had them from M^r. Stock. Yet the Popish adversary (author of the Sober reckoning) did not compare him to a dog, but only said, that he sent to stocks and stones, for satisfaction about them. Which I do not allege to the disparagement of either D. M. or M^r. St. but only to show by comparison how the Rej. doeth sometime overflow, in his terms. 3. For D. Whitaker, he telleth us, that he only saith, that Ecclesiastical laws belong only to order, or orderinge, but not as it is distinct from comeliness. As if any of us did so. The Repl. his words: ordering in comely manner, do not (I hope) refer all to order, considered a part from all comeliness.

This is the full sum, of all that Rejoinder had to except against the first allegation. And yet here upon this nothing, it pleaseth him to accuse not only the Repl. but these men, of haughty and Magistrall fashion, gulling, and deceiving, great and shamefull sin, and the poor Repl. at the least, for a man destitute of common honesty. It seemeth he was very angry at something. Let the understanding Reader guess, at what?

6. For more manifestation of the Repl. his vacuity of common honesty, the Rej. referreth us to the second testimony out of Junius, against Bell. cōt. 3. l. 4. c. 16. n. 86.87. and cap. 17. n. 9.10.12.13.

Omitting therefore unnecessary repetition, let us hear the reasons of extraordinary dishonesty, 1. Junius ca. 16. n. 86.87. saith only first, that those human laws are only necessary, in the Church, which tend to this, that all things may be done decently, and in order, 1. Cor. 14.40. Secondly, that these are improperly called laws in the Church, being more properly constitutions, or Canons.

Now out of the first saying, the Repl. concluded, that Junius did judge the Apostle to leave no more to the Churches liberty, then to order God's ordinances in decent manner: And out of the seconde, he inferred the same conclusion: because any Constitution, above ordering in decent manner that which before was enjoined, is properly a law. What extraordinary dishonesty is here? 2. Junius cap. 17. n. 9. saith only that to make new laws in divine things is to decline 1. c. in points of faith or necessary rules of sanctimony. But Junius maketh no mention at all, either of faith, or sanctimony, or necessity, Nor Bell. himself in that place. Neither is the question there handled, of points of faith or things absolutlie necessary to sanctimony. All double treble Ceremonies reductively Sacramental, and worship, are by the Rej. his own dictates double sacred: and that is it which Junius meaneth by divine. 3. Bell saith that the addition forbidden Deut. 4. is of laws contra•ie to the law of God. Wherunto Junius n. 10. answereth, that any laws at all, added to God's laws, are contrary to the law of God, speaking of proper laws, without any backing of God's law, binding the Conscience, as he showeth cap. 16. n. 86.8. Here 1. the Rej. left out those words of Junius, neither cantrarie nor beside the word: which if he had translated, then the Readers memory might have recalled, how this place cited before for the defēce of that phrase, was but shifted by the Rej. p. 46.2. It is to be marked, that the Def. and Rej. there answer to Deut. 4. is the same with Bel. p. 134.3. That exposition of laws without backing, is of the Rej. his own forging. No such thing is found in the places quoted, nor yet did Bel. profess to defēde any such thing.

Of binding the Conscience, enough hath been said in the head of Difference betwixt our Ceremonies and Popish.

4. Junius n. 12. answering to Bellarmine's his saying, that God (in the N.T.) gave only the common laws of faith and Sacram. leaving the specialls to the Church etc. affirmeth God's laws to be perfect re, ration & modo, and those of the Church to be but Canons and disposings of conveniency, for better observing of divine laws.

Where note 1. an example of an etc. for a blind, or blindinge, which the Rejoinder formerly told of. For in that ete. is contained, pro locorum & temporum diversitate: quia non possunt diversissimi populi conuenire in ijsdem legibus & ritibus. 1• e. for this cause, special laws of ritual things, are left to the Churches liberty, because of variety, which falleth out now by occasion of times and places: Which is the very thing that the Rejoinder pawnd his credit, Bell. never said, pag. 15.16. Note also 2. that Junius doeth not in this place mention Canons, as the Rej. pleaseth to alter his words in reciting of them. But Cautions, and dispositions. Now a Caution about the performance of anything, is not an institution of a new thing. 3. Junius is found to say as much as he was alleged for, and to the contrary we have from the Rejoinder a nihil dicit.

5. Junius n. 13. saith only that Christ is the only law-giver, that is, to give laws, that in themselves and by the very authority of the law-maker, do bind the conscience. As if Junius in confuting of Bell. did only say the very same thing, with him that he goeth about to confute! for Bellarmine in that very place saith: Christ is the chief law-giver who by his own Authority can judge and make laws.

Now out of all these allegations, the Rejoinder maketh his interrogatories. 1. Where be these words all that is requisite, as spoken of Rites and Ceremonies? Answer the sense of these words as spoken of all Ceremonies above mere order and decency, is cap. 16.86.2. Where find you in Iunius that the Church may constitute no new thing? Ans. cap. 17. n. 9. this in things Divine is to turn aside, for the Rejoinder his interpretation of those words, that they mean points of faith, and necessary rules of sanctimony, is confuted, by conference of Bellarmine's words there opposed, who in that place instanceth in Ceremonia^l and Judicial laws, and speaketh not at all of faith and necessary sanctimony. 3. Where are those words, ordering in seemly manner? Ans. cap. 16. n. 86. those only human laws are necessary in the Church, which make that all things be done decently and in order. 1. Cor. 14.40, 4. If the Church may appoint no new thing, but only see to decency and order, then saith the Rej. what patent hath she to make particular ordinances for time, and place? unless these be no new things. I Ans. 1. Time and place considered as mere occasional circumstances, are no more new things in God's service, then concreated time and place, were new things in Creation, distinct from the created world. And Calvin inst. l. 4. cap. 10. sect. 22. severely censureth those, that call such kind of determinations new laws: Quis nisi calumniator, sic novam ferri^b ijs legem dicat, quos constant duntaxat scandalis occu^rere, quae sunt a Domino satis diserte prohibita? If procuring that scandals be avoided, be no new thing, then neither is procuring that disorder, and undecencie, for time, place, etc. be avoided, any new thing.

As for a patent to appoint double, treble, sacred Ceremonies, it is a vain thing for them to plead it, that cannot show it under the great Seal. I do not think, that any earthly King would have his subjects submit themselves to that power, which is fetched out of a Patent, invisible, and only avouched by conjectures.

7. A reason was given of the foresaid proposition, out of Iun. de Transl. Imp. l. 1. c. 2. n. 26.27.31. viz. that the Church hath only a Ministry, to observe such things as Christ hath appointed, not authority of appointing new things. Here the Rejoinder 1. observeth, that those words, (new things) have no foot steps in Junius. As if new things could be appointed lawfully without authority of appointing. Surely, he that denieth all authority of appointing, and leaveth only ministerial performance of things appointed, he denieth appointing of new things. 2. He argueth thus: If the Church have a ministry to appoint and do such things as Christ hath commanded, then must she needs have a Commission legative to appoint and use rites serving to order and decency. Add to this only, and then it is not only that, but all that which we require. 3. He crieth out of miserable perversion, either by gross negligence, or mistaking.

And why so I pray? Because (forsooth) all that Junius saith is good to prove, that no Ecclesiastical person hath any power by his calling over temporal Princes. But this is nothing against their delegated dependant power, by Commission. But 1. these are very strange distinctions: they have not any power by their calling, but some by commission. They have not any power over temporal Princes (though they be members of the Church) but over the Church they have. 2. The Rejoinder maketh Junius only to deny that which Bellarmine never affirmed, viz. absolute independent power of Ecclesiastical persons, as supreme Lord's. Nay Bellarmine answereth to Calvin in the very same manner that the Rejoinder doeth: The Pope is not the chief lawgiver but the vicar of Christ, & by Christ's authority maketh laws. 3. He addeth that Junius disp. de trad. distinguisheth betwixt decency, and the seemliness of order alone.

As if this were the main question? Or any part of the Proposition! or denied by the Repl. at all. The Rejoinder having little to say that was to the purpose, catcheth hold of one word in the ende of the Assumption used by the Repl. seemliness of order (which yet is immediately there differēd frō other decency, as well commanded as this) and that he maketh the main matter of the proposition: whereas the meaning is, that nothing is left unto liberty in God's worship, above decency and order, for which these testimonies are brought, and not for the other.

8. For more full support of the foresaid Proposition, a reason is added, from the fullness of a perfect law, which leaveth no more unto Ministerial judges, then needs must.

For answer, the Rejoinder 1. observeth, that some cases are of necessity variable, and so left. So the occasions of different Rites and Ceremony•nies a•e so various, that if our Lord had fixed any one certain fash•on, he should have made rather snares then l•ws for his Church. As, if he had appointed sitting at a table in t•e Communion: or kneeling in prayer. This is strange stuff. 1. So much is granted, as is desired, viz. that God hath left nothing (about his worship) undertermined in his word. 1. e. uncommanded, and unforbidden particula•lie, save only that which he could not command or forbid. Now let any man think• and judge, whether it had not been possible for God in his word, either to have commanded, or forbidden the signing of those that are Baptized with the sign of the cross all so well, as Baptizing of them with water? 2, How can that too too bold and inconsiderate assertion be excused: if our Lord had fixed (or commanded) any one certain fashion of Ceremonies, he had made rather snares, then laws for his Church. If it had pleased God to command or forbid the sign of the Cross in particular, what snare had it been? When God appointed all the Ceremonies of the old Testament, he did not (I hope) make snares for his Church, though he did lay a burden upon it. 3. Whereas the Rejoinder maketh sitting at a table, in the Lord's Supper, and kneeling at prayer, to be such things as the Lord could not command, but as snares, because sometime a table may be wanting, or something to sit on, or ability to sit, and so of kneeling, this is as poor a snare to cache any man of understanding in, as one sh•l lightly see made. For 1. Many affirmative commandments of God there are, which in extraordinary cases cannot be fulfilled, and cease to bind: as praying unto and praising of God, with our voice: which is no snare, to him that cannot speak.

The appointing of wine for the Supper, is no snare, though some Countries have it not, and some mē cannot well drink it. See Beza ep. 2. Pareus and Symb. Sacram. l. 1. cap. 9.2. I would know, whether it had bē a snare, if God had appointed sitting at the Table, with exception of such extra ordinary cases? if yea, then m•che more when men appoint kneeling, sirplicing, and crossing, if no, then our Argument may proceed.

Kneeling in public prayer, might have been appointed without snaring, as appearing before the Lord thrice in the year, was appointed to every Male in Israel. Deut: 16.16. For (without doubt) many men in Israel, were, by accident, more unable to travel up to Jerusalem, then any Christian that hath knees, is to kneel.

After this observation, of which the Rejoinder saith it may be as we will, he answereth, that our Lord hath left nothing absolute to the will of his Officers: but hath left even ambulatorie Rites, under general rules, which will try them as perfectly, as if everyone had been named, and with less cumber. But 1. this is nothing to the purpose: because so the imperfectest law that is in any nation upon the earth, if it be worthy the name of Law, leaveth nothing so absolute to the will of inferior Officers, as that it should be without the general rules of justice, common good, etc. Nay not without the rules of order & decency. 2. Concerning the comparison of perfection, betwixt general and particular rules, though enough hath been said before, upon like occasion, yet this I will add.

If he meaneth, that a general rule if it be perfectly understood and applied, doeth as perfectly try as particulars. I grant it to be a truth. And so was the old Testament as perfect a rule of Christian faith as the New, thou shalt love thy neighbor, as perfect as the six Commandments of the second Table. But if he mean that a general rule is as fit and full for our direction of us imperfect men, as particulars are, then I think no man conscious of human frailty, will beleiv him.

Neither do I beleiv, that he himself is so fully persuaded in Crossing the Baptized, by any rule which he hath out of God's word, for that, as he is for Baptizing, by the rule of that.

9. The Repl. having (as he thought sufficiently grounded the general, that a perfect law leaveth nothing more then needs must, unto inferior Officers, goeth on to assume, that in the worship of God, all, but particular Circumstances of order, might easily, be (as indeed they, were) appointed by Christ, and therefore need not be left to the Churches wisdom. Upon this, it pleaseth the Rejoinder to say little to the purpose, in many words. 1. He saith, that Circumstances of order were not harder to determine, then those of decency. Now it is plain enough, that the Repl. here, naming Order, did also understād Decency, though he named Order only. 2. He asketh, what School of Divinity hath taught the Repl. to say, that our Lord forbore the determining of such circumstances, because all else was easy. I Answer, no rule of Divinity did either teache the Repl. to say so, nor yet the Rejoinder to impute unto him, which he never said.

But if he meaneth (as it seemeth he doeth) because it was not so easy to determine circumstances of time and place as real worship.

I then answer, that this (as I think) the Replier learned out of that Divinity School, out of which the Def. and Rejoinder learned. That which they cite out of Calvin, pag, 15.16. Junius is cited to the contrary, out of Cont. 3. l 4. cap. 17. n. 12. (which place the Rej. looked upon, by occasion of the Repl. his former citation of it.) But he in that very place, distinguisheth betwixt laws, properly so called, and cautions, leaving only cautions to the Churches liberty, which is the very same that the Repl. meaneth. The plain truth is, that supposing God's will to be, we should worship him in any place, and any time fitting, it was necessary, that the particular choice of fitting time and place, should be left undetermined to any particular time or place, exclusively.

Calvin also is cited, as more comely expressing the cause to be, that Christ would not, then that he could not determine such matters.

Now though Calvin, being so excellent in his expressions, may easily be granted to have expressed the same meaning in more comely manner then the Repl. yet here was no cause of noting disparity. For the Repl in saying, all things but particular order and decency may be easily appointed, did not say what Christ could do, but what might be easily for us appointed, or with our ease, or with the ease which we do conceyve of in law giving, or of an ordinary law giver, having such authority as Christ had. And who doeth not see, that it is not so easy, to appoint every particular place, and time, wherein God shall be worshiped, throughout all the world, then with what worship he shall be served? For that particular description, a thousand books, so great as our one bible, would not have suffized.

The world (as John saith) would not be capable of the Volumes that must have been written. The Rej. himself pag 89. telleth us of cumber, and much ado, that would have been, in naming every particular, is not this as much as less easy? Yet it pleased him to seek matter or altercation about this phrase, and that (which agreeth not) immediately after he had without reason accused the Repl. of picking quarrels pag. 88.

10. A Second reason, of the Repl. his proposition, was, that whatsoever in worship is above order and decency, is worship. Bec. whatsoever is acted by him that worshippeth, in that act, beside ordinary civilitie, must either be an act or means of worship, or an orderly decent disposing of those acts, or else at the least idle, and so unlawful. The Rej. answereth 1. that a significant Ceremony for edification, is lawful, yet cometh not under any of those heads. But he himself confesseth a significant Ceremon: instituted of God, to be essential worship, and instituted of man to be worship, though not in itself, of which distinction, enough hath been said, in the head of worship. Yet this by the way: A significant Ceremony for edification, is the same, in itself, by whomesoever it be inst•tuted: because institution is extrinsicall to the thing instituted, and alters it not in itself, internally. If therefore it be essential lawful worship, in itself when it is instituted by God, it is also essētiāll (though not lawful) worship, in itself, when it is instituted by man. Beside that Ceremony whose proper sole ende is edification, toward God, is properly done to the honor of God, and so properly divine worship.

His 2, answer is, that comeliness grounded on civil human considerations, is not mere civilitie, in sacred actions, and use, but sacred by application. Which is very true if civil application be meant by mere civil, but then it is nothing to the purpose. For sacred by application is seemly clothing, put on for to go to Church in, and yet is in itself mere civil. The question is not of application, but of internal nature.

Sacred things applied to Civil buisnesse, do not therefore become Civil, for who will say, that Prayer, at the beginning of a Parliament, is a Civil act, though it were used in the Vpper, and lower house, and applied to that Civil meeting, as it ought to be? And why then shall application of Civil decency unto Sacred buisnesse, make it alter the nature or name of it?

His 3. answer is, that all means of worship are not worship. But he knew well enough, that this was meant of proper means of worship.

His fourth is, that ordering and manner of disposing, is ill divided from comeliness. Neither did the Repl. intend so to divide, but rather to conjoine them, understanding by that manner of disposing, comeliness. But if the Rejoinder had not cached up some show of confounding comeliness with order, which was not intended by the Repl. he had been in this argument wholly at a loss.

His 5. and last answer is, that by Basils leave some things, in themselves, may, and sometime must be tolerated. But he should have remembered, that the question here is not of tolerating, but of appointing and using.

Now if it be lawful, to appoint and use empty and unprofitable Ceremonies in God's worship, let those Worshippers judge, that tremble at the Majesty of God, and are afraid in any manner to appear empty and unprofitable before him. Nay (to pass by our Divines) let the Papists themselves judge. Bellar. de Pontif. l. 4. c. 17. ad 4. confesseth those Ceremonies to be forbidden, which are unprofitable altogether, and vain precepts, unprofitable & frivolons Ceremonies, only by human Spirit invented. And de effect. Sacrament l. 2. cap. 32. empty and good for nothing. Morethen needs, and not a jot tending to any Godines, and who not?

11. Thus far concerning the Proposition of our Argument: the Assumption followeth, which is this: To appoint and use the Ceremonies as we do, is not to order in comely manner, anything pertaining to God's worship. The reason is, because order requireth not the institution or usage of any new thing, but only the right placing and disposing of things formerly instituted.

1. The Rejoinder answer 1. that order requireth new time, place, and measure: which is a Sophistry in the Proposition before abused, and confuted.

2. His second is, that ordering in comely manner, or comeliness requireth the institution of such formalities, as shall be suitable to the dignity and variety of divine actions. Where the term formalities is not so formal, that a man may spy in it the difference it hath from other things, the Rejoined. in his manuduction, pag. 36. appropriateth it to Bishops Roshe's etc. evē as they are distinct from Surplices: the Bishops went before the Hearse in •heir formalities, the Clerks in their Surplices. So that it seemeth to mean some Ceremonies of state, and dignity: of which kind neither Cross, nor Surplice is any. Howsoever, unto ordering of one thing doeth not require another new thing, but only disposing of that one. For if it did, then that new thing (because that also must be ordered) would require another new thing, and that also for order sake another, so that no one thing could be ordered, without an infinite heap of new things.

As for the Dignity of divine actions, that is best suited with man's reverent and humble simplicity, not with outward shows of dignity, invented by man. The woman's ordinary veil was more suitable to the dignity of God's worship, then if she had adorned herself with gold, and precious stones.

Paul's plain cloak was more suitable then the richest Coap in all Rome. If Order requireth outward shows of dignity, then Rome, which is a confused Babel, may be to all Churches an imitable example of religious order, for the Council of Trent sess. 22. professeth, their mass Ceremonies to be invented. That the Majesty of such a Sacrifice might be set out.

12. To show further that Order requireth not such Ceremony as ours, the notation of the word was brought in, signifying no such thing. Now the Rejoinder granteth that originally the word doeth not contain within the compass of it, such kind of Ceremonies, though by usage it may. Which is very true: but helpeth not, except the Def. or Rejoinder whose principal Argument is taken from this place, and only retorted by us, can prove, that in this place, the word order is extended beyond his original signification. He will not therefore stand with us, about the signification of the word in this place: let order (saith he) in this place signify no more then placing. But he maketh his retrait to the word Comelinesse: asking if comeliness be nothing? I answer yes, it is something: but the Replier did not insist in that word, because he took the force of the Def. his Argument from this place principally to lie upon order.

But seeing the Rejoinder hath given up Order, I will add a word or •woe concerning Comelinesse.

I take this for granted, that seeing the Rejoinder confesseth Order here to be taken in strict signification, as opposed only to confusion, pag. 78. he will also consent with us, that Decency in the same place and sentence, is to be taken in strict signification, as opposed only to the vice of undecencie. Now hence it followeth, that Decency requireth nothing but that which is necessary to the avoiding of undecencie.

I ask therefore, if undecencie in God's worship cannot be avoided, without double, treble, sacred significant Ceremonies, of man's inventing? If not, then the Apostles did much forget themselves, in their public worshipping of God, before men had invented such Ceremonies, for that is no answer which the Rejoinder after giveth: all Churches are not bound to this or that particular way of Comelinesse. All Churches are bound to avoid undecencie, and to do that which Decency requireth, or bindeth them unto. If yea, then Decency doeth not require such kind of Ceremonies.

Neither doeth it in deed, anymore thē Order. So M^r. Perkins, lat. to. 2. p. 888. Decency is, when the service of God is performed with convenient and fit circumstances of time, place, person, and gesture, and hereof the Apostle speaketh. 1. Cor. 14.40.

The plain simple truth, without Ceremonial affectation, is, that Decency is (in this place) nothing but good civil fashion, agreeable not only to worship, but also to any grave assembly. Decency (saith Pareus upon the place) is opposed to vanity, Spottes, ryott it stands not in hoods, Caps, or vizardes of fond Ceremonies. etc.

I dare appeall to D.B. his conscience, if Baptism be not as decently administered without the Cross, as with it? and public prayers made as decently without a Surplice, as with it? Let Conscience here speak, and the Rejoinder hearkening unto it, will (without doubt) confess, that Decency in this place doeth no more require either Cross or Surplice, then Order, and that both of them together doeth no more require those Ceremonies, then a hundred other, which in England (though not at Rome) are denied unto them.

To this purpose, M^r. Attersoll, in his second book of the Sacram. cap. 5. saith well: If they refer all this trash and trumperie (of human Ceremonies in Baptism) to order and comeliness, as Hosius doeth, do they not thereby blasphemously accuse the Baptism of John, and of the Apostles, of uncomelinesse and disorder? whereas the comeliness and dignity of the Sacraments is to be esteemed by the word of God, by the institution of Christ, by the simplicity of the Gospel, and by the practice of the Apostles: Nothing is more comely, decent, and orderly, then that which Christ commandeth and alloweth: nothing is more uncomely and unseemly, then that which man inventeth in the service of God, and in the celebration of the Sacraments, thereby inverting and perverting the holy ordinances of God.

12. The received definitions of Order are brought in to the same purpose, by the Replier. And the Rejoinder yieldeth so much as they import, viz. that order in strict signification doeth not imply such Ceremonies as ours.

He must therefore either prove, that in this place. 1. Cor, 14.40. that word is not taken strictly, which he himself formerly granted, or give up this place which is (by his own confession) the only place of all the New. Testament, for warranting of such Ceremonies, or fly to Decency, upon which he cannot anymore fasten then upon order, as hath been shown.

Nothing material is added in the rest of the Rejoined. his answer unto this Argument (where our Divines are observed, to distinguish order and decency from mystical Ceremonies, the context of the chapter. 1. Corinth 14. Is declared to respect no mystical Ceremonies, the phrase of Scripture is shown to consent,) nothing (I say, and the Reader may see) is added: but only the same things are repeated about Order, and Decency which are now sufficiently discussed.

So that the Rejoinder hath nothing to say to the contrary, but that we may safely conclude, Ergo, to appoint and use the Ceremonies as we do, is not left to the liberty of the Church, 1. e. it is unlawful.

If there were nothing else against them, in all the Scripture, then this place, beside which the Def. and Rejoinder can find none in all the New. Testament, for them, any indifferent man would say they are not allowed.

Those that are devoted to the Ceremonies, may shuffle up and down, first to order, and when they are beaten thence, to Decency, and from Decency, when they can defend that no longer, to Edification, as the Rejoinder doeth: but all will not help. Let them pitch or insist upon one of these grounds, without starting, I will pawn my head, their anchor will come home to them again as finding no fast ground, either in Order, or Decency, or edification, for double significant Ceremonies (such as ours) to ride at.

The Def. could frame no Consequence out of any of these words, the Rejoinder saith there is one, but he cannot show it. To the contrary consequence nothing is answered of any moment.

And is not this a miserable cause, which hath no place in all the New Testament, which the best Advocates can allege for it, but only that; out of which it is utterly confounded? To the Defend. and Rejoinders mainteyning such a cause, this testimony may be given that they would willingly, so far as they can, favor things which the times favor, and therefore strive to make something, of that which maketh nothing for them. In the former section, when Order, Decency, and Edification, should have been handled as Rules, according to the title of the digression, the Rejoinder soddainly breaketh off, referring them to a fitter place. Now here in this place, he was constrained to touche upon them, but so softly and sparinglie, that it appeareth he found this no fitter place then the former, for those reserved considerations. When shall we come to the fitter place?

SECT. 17. Concerning the ancient Fathers allowing of Humane Ceremonies.

1. OF these, the Repl. answered, it cannot be proved, nor is probable, that from the first beginning of the Primitive Church they brought in any new inventions. Upon this, the Rej. accusing not him alone, but others also, that they can believe no truth cross to their opinion, because they seek honor one of another, & praesume of their new traditions, as if the spirit of truth had come only to them, or from thē alone, answereth that it is a matter of fact, proved by Records of Churches, against which nothing can be said. But if he could keep-in his passion, so longe, as to hear this only word, that there are no sufficient Records of any such thing, exstant from the beginning, then he might see that sufficient answer is given, unto the name of all Fathers, always.

Yet I will add one conjecture, to show, that those observations which seem to have been universal, in the Primitive Church, were not so in deed, without exception. Praying toward the East, hath as ancient testimony, as any other human Rite. Tertullian Apol. cap. 16. witnesseth, that that was one cause why the Christians were esteemed to worship the Sun. And yet Socrates, lib. 5. cap. 22. doeth witness, that at Antioch which was the first Church of Christians by name, they used not to place their Mysteries which directed their posture of prayer, toward the East, but rather toward the West. And why may we not conceyve the like of Easter, as well as of this East observation?

2. It was secondly answered, that those, Feasts, which the Primitive Church is said to have observed, were not by Canonical imposition, but voluntary accommodation to the infirmity of some, as appeareth by the variety of their observation, and Socrates his testimony. Mark now, what a Rejoinder is given? 1. He telleth us of a strange conjecture of his, even from this answer▪ viz. that the Churches held, it not only lawful, but also convenient, to impose upon themselves such Feasts. As if occasional accommodation, were all one with imposition, or voluntary joining in action for the good that is in it, were always a certain argument of holding that opinion which others do affix unto it. But if they had thought them so cōveniēt, yet that Arg. would be of little force. For many Ceremonies were thought then convenient, which longe since are universally thought otherwise of, & therefore left off, though no reason of inconvenience can be shown, which did not agree to those times as well as to succeeding times, except further abuse: which cannot be denied of our Ceremonies in question, as religious use of milk, honey, & abstaining from washing ones hands for certain days after Baptism etc. 2. That which was mentioned of infirmity occasioning this accommodation, the Rej. (after his manner) crieth down as a fiction, boldly delivered, without proof, or color, merely for opposition sake: Whereas notwithstanding it is so clear, that the infirmity of men newly converted from Judaism, and Gentilism, did bring into Christian Churches customs like unto those in use among Jews and Gentiles, that Cardinal Baronius, from that ground mainteyneth many Ceremonies. What wonder if the grown customs among the Gentiles (and we may add the Jews also) were such as from which, though they were converted to Christianisme, they were yet so hardly taken, that it might seem impossible to putt them quite off, what wonder I say then if the most holy Bishops have granted them place in the worship of God?

Doctor Jackson, in his Original of Idolatry sect. 4. chap. 23. showeth the first occasion of Superstition in Christians, to have been the infirmities, whereby it came to pass, that heathenish (and Jewish) Rites, whereto men had been longe accustomed, could not easily be extirpated. Where also about such accommodations, he hath this remarkable observation. To outstrip our adversaries in their own policies, or to use means abused by others to a better ende, is a resolution so plausible to worldly wisdom that even Christians have mightily overreached and entangled themselves, by too much seeking to circumvent or go beyond others.

About the Varietie which was of old in the observation of these feasts, the Rejoinder answereth, that it notwithstanding, the agreement for the things themselves was universal. Which if he would take with a grain of salt, viz. that after some space of time, it was (for ought we know) universal, but not upon any Ecclesiastical imposition, nor upon any known grounds out of God's word, it is the same that the Repl. affirmeth, and Socrates lib. 5. cap. 22. laboreth to confirm.

3. Mention was further made of the mischiefe that came in by those human observations. To which the Rejoinder answereth, that the Anniversarie solemnities have not obscured, but praeserved that simplicity of the Gospel. And if they had so done, by accident Satan's malice, and man's frailty, that is nothing but what may be affirmed of Divine ordinances, But 1. the Def. his position was in general of universal Ceremonies by human institution, and not Feasts alone? Now those first Ceremonial observations are guilty of opening that gate, for all the human praesumptions to enter into God's house, which pressed in after them: which gate could never be shut from that day to this. 2. Those very Feasts made a composition or mixture of human institutions with divine, and therefore did not praeserve simplicity. They also were from their first rise not only aequalled unto, but also extolled above the Lord's day. Easter brought in a superstitions Lent to attend upon it, made Baptism wait for her Moon: and conformed our Lord's Supper unto the Jewish Passover in unleavened bread, etc. It was the first apple of contention among Christians, the first weapon, wherw•h the Bishop of Rome played his prizes against other Churches, & after slew so many Britons with, by Austin the monk. Holy-days in honor of Christ invited unto them Saints holy Days etc. 4. It is praesumption, to make men's inventions as guiltless of evil consequences, as God's holy ordinances. They are active efficacious occasions given of evil: these are only passive occasions taken.

Neither is there any corruption of God's ordinances, whose original occasion may not be found in men's (nay fathers) Ceremonious praesumptions.

4. It was finally answered by the Repl. that the always of these Feasts, cannot include the Apostolical times, and for other always, Bellarmine Cont. 1. l. 4. c. 9. hath the same plea, and the answer given unto him by our Divines, may serve here. The Rejoinder here 1. insinuateth that it is very likely, these Feasts, or some of them, were on foot while some Apostles lived: because Polycarp praetended John to have taught Easter.

On foot indeed was the mystery of Antichristian corruption in the Apostles times. But that which Polycarp is said to have praetended, was for the fourteen day of the month, and is confuted by a contrary praetense of the latin Churches, from Peter and Paul. Socrat. l. 5. cap. 22. He 2. addeth, under Augustine's name that it is insolent madness, to think that not to be well done, which hath been done by all the Church, though it began after the Apostles times. Now though I find no such saying of Augustine's, in the epistle quoted for it, but to the Contrarie, I find this rule, that it is lawful or not lawful to believe or not to believe other witnesses or testimonies besides that of the Scriptures) so far as you see they bear or do not bear weight to make us give more credit to a thing. Which being granted, the fact of the Church cannot so confirm, this or that to be right and well, as that it should be madness to deny it. Yet let it be his saying, I answer, if this be true then it must needs follow, that giving of the Communion (and that as is most likely sopped) upon opinion of necessity, cannot be denied well and good, for that (as is well known) was done generally in Augustine's time, and longe before. It must follow also, that they were special insolent mad men, that first began to disallow either that, or any other ancient thing of general observatiō: which Augustine would never have said, who professed of his time, that the Church of God set in the heap of chaff and tares, did only suffer many things, only ep. 119.

He 3. distinguisheth betwixt Bellarmine's, and the Defendants alleging of traditions, because Bell. spake of doctrines necessary to salvation. Which is not true for Bell. in that chapter maketh no mention of doctrines necessary to salvation: and in the next chapter but one cap. 11. he confesseth, that all things absolutely necessary to salvation, are written in the Scriptures, and (which is much more) all things that are either necessary, or profitable for all men to know.

SECT. 18.19. Concerning Protestants witnessing against the Negative argument from Scripture.

1. BELLARMINI was brought in by the Def. as an indifferent Adversarie, confessing that Protestants hold the Apostles to have instituted some things, pertaining to rites and order, which are not written. Which was also granted unto him, as making nothing against us. Only the vanity of that allegation was in some particulars declared, which how they are cleared (it being a matter of no moment) I refer to the Readers judgment.

2. Chemnitz was alleged, saying, there be some Ecclesiastical Rites, which have neither command, nor testimony, in Scripture, which yet are not to be rejected. Answer was made, that this in a right sense is granted by us. The Rejoinder taxeth this as an idle shift: because 1. Chemnitz did not intend such a restrictive sense. 2. Circumstances of Order have command and testimony in Scripture. But 1. It is no idle shift so to interpret an allegation objected, as that the interpretation cannot be confuted, but barely denied. 2. As Circumstances of order and decency have their general command or testimony in Scripture, so have those Rites which Chemnitz understandeth, or else his sentence is without any ground out of Scripture.

3. The same answer is given, and no other Rejoinder made, about Calvin, Danaus, Whitaker's and Zanchi, saving that of Zanchi, it is observed & urged by the Rejoined. that he saith some Ceremonies may help for the furtherance of piety which have no foundation in the word: giving instance of the solemnities of Easter, etc. Tract. de Sacra. Scriptura. For whom I answer, that his sentence must be understood of no particular foundation, or else he should give more then any Papist will require, concerning their human Ecclesiastical Ceremonies. As for his instances in the solemnities of Easter, it seemeth he reckoned them among Ceremonies of order and decency, because as the Def. and Rej. confess, that is the only place authorizing human institutions in Religion. If he meant otherwise, he did as a man, cross his own rules, as after (God willing) shall be shown.

For the present, let that testimony of Zanchi be well considered, which he setteth down in Col. 2.8. It is certain, that this consequence is very good: this or that is not according to Christ: therefore it is not to be admitted. This ought to be enough to any Christian man: It is not according to Christ: therefore I admit it not, in the buisnesse of atteyning to salvation. Where is to be noted, 1. That according to Christ, is opposed (by the Apostle) to according to the traditions of men, and therefore is all one, with not appointed by Christ. 2, that all Ceremonies instituted to teache the doctrine pertaining to salvation, are part of the means whereby we are supposed to be helped & directed, in seeking and atteyning salvation.

4. About Junius, there is more ado, because his words are set down at large on both pars. But as for that which the Def. and Rejoinder cite out of him, pag. 109. I cannot say much more then hath been answered to the other Divines, until a consequence be framed out of them, more effectual to the purpose, then is in that which the Rejoined. only quaestioneth. And doeth the rule 1. Cor. 14. concern nothing but circumstances of Order? Or can our opposites be accorded with this saying? For it hath been formerly manifested what that rule doeth require, and how it may be accorded with our tenent.

On the other part, this professed, sworn sentence of Junius is alleged: If any man, either by Civil, or Ecclesiastical authority, will add things not necessary, nor agreeable to Order, we would not pertinaciously contend with him, but desire only that he would seriously consider of three things. 1. By what authority, or example, he is led to think, that the holy Church of God, and the simplicity of the mysteries of Christ (whose voice only is heard by his sheep) must be clad with human traditions, which Christ doeth reject? 2. To what ende he judgeth, that thes things should be added unto those that are divine? For if the ende be conformity with others, it were more aequitie, that other Churches should conform to those, which come nearest to the Word of God (as Ciprians counsel is) then that these should conform to the other. If the ende be comeliness, what is more comely then the simplicity of Christ? What is more simple then that comeliness.

If there be no other reason beside will, then that of Tertullian is to be thought of: The will of God, is the chief necessity, and that the Church of God is not tied unto man's wisdom in things Divine. The third thing to be thought on is, what event always hath followed upon human traditions, as longe experience doeth show? Ecclesiastici, lib. 3. Cap. 5. This testimony is so full, and clear, that it needeth no candle of Commentary, or Consequence, to be set by it. What can the Rejoinder answer?

1. His first is, that Junius doeth not here condemn our Ceremonies even because they are not commanded in the Word. But he might have remembered out of sect. 2. that the argument is of warrant and direction from the word, not of direct and special commanding. Now Junius plainly denieth authority or example of the word, or any thing but man's will, to be the ground of such Ceremonies, and for that cause would have them avoided.

2. His second is, that Junius wrote not this of such Ceremonies as ours: because he speaketh of those that are neither necessary, nor according to order, rejected by Christ, added to Divine things, which must needs import necessity and worship a fixed unto them. But had it not been better counsel, for the Rejoinder to have held his peace, then to let every man see what miserable shifts he is driven to? 1. Junius having made this conclusion: that Magistrates may not constitute, and change persons, things, Ceremonies at their pleasure, and that those which teli them they may (as our Def. and Rejoinder do in part) are therein no well willers to the Church, propoundeth this question: if it be not in the Magistrates power, to appointe, or abrogate such things? to which he answereth negatively: because all necessities, and essentials are appointed by Christ, and as for other not necessary things, above the sphere of order, he gives those reasons, which are in the words, largely cited. Now 1. what a wretched evasion is this, that he spake not of our Ceremonies?

He spake of all not necessary not appointed by Christ: but yet he spake not of ours.

This is as some should deny that rule which some logicians call de omni & de nullo, to hold in Ceremonies: or affirm that to be false of English Ceremonies, which is true of all Ceremonies. 2. When our Divines speak against Popish Ceremonies, the Rejoinder his ordinary answer is, that they speak of Ceremonies held necessary, and therefore not of such as ours. Now when Junius expressly speaketh of Ceremonies not necessary, the Rejoinder concludeth, that he could not mean ours or such like. How should any man speak, to put such a Rejoinder from having something to speak? 3. Junius said, that those Ceremonies are unlawfully appointed, which are not convenient to, or required by Order: Ergo (saith the Rejoinder.) he could not speak of such as ours are. And yet the same Rejoinder manud. pag. 33. confesseth our Ceremonies to be double or treble Ceremonies and those of order, to be only single. Neither could he ever yet find any fit place, to show our Ceremonies agreeable to order.

Nay when the Repl. by this argument, out of 1. Cor. 14.40. proved these Ceremonies unlawful, the Rej. fled from Order, to Decency, and Edification.

And yet here in this place, being beaten out of those coverts by judicious Junius, he betaketh himself again to that halfmoon of order, which before he had quitted. 4. Junius saith, such Ceremonies are rejected by Christ: Therefore (saith the Rejoinder:) he cannot mean such as ours. As if he should say, those that affirm our Ceremonies are rejected by Christ, cannot mean our Ceremonies. 5. Junius speaketh of Ceremonies added to divine things: and so (by the Rejoinder his collection, not of such as ours, because that must needs import necessity, and worship affixed to them. And yet both Def. and Rej. cap. 2. sect. 3. can find out many additions to Divine things, which are intended only for praeservation of them, and the•fore (by their own judgment) must not needs import necessity, and worship. Suche turning, winding, and running against walls, you shall seldom see an ingenuous man use in a good cause.

5. Two things yet the Rejoinder noteth in the by: 1. Junius would not resist such things pertinaciously, as the Repl. doeth 2. Junius speaking against cladding God's ordinances with the garments of human Ceremonies, had another meaning, then the Def. p. 3. Rejoinder pag. 5. where he calleth such Ceremonies as ours, the garment of Religion: because by clothing Junius meant adorning and hiding of nakedness, but the Def. opposed garments to members of the body: and therefore the Repl. need not by his marginal note have applied Junius his clothing to the Def. his garment. Now for the first of these, there is difference betwixt pervicacious contending, without reason and measure, which Junius modesly putteth from him, and that constant restistance which he himself teacheth here in this place, where he affirmeth that Christ's sheep (even in such Ceremonial matter) will not nor ought to hear any voice but Christ's. For this, he foreseeing that it would be accounted pervicacie, disclaimeth that, and yet doeth thoroughlie resist. So would the Rep. if he may have leave: If not, I see not why he may not do the same thing, though he be censured for it, as Junius feared he should be.

And this I may truly say, I have heard the Repl. more then once profess, that whē, in studying of Divinity, he was something perplexed about Ceremonies and such like human institutions, by reason of some ambiguous, and ill consenting passages of some others, this one place of Junius (so solemnly confirmed with the oath of such a man, for his sincerity and unpartiallness in the buisnesse, and alleging such grave reasons for his judgment therein) did very much affect him, and first settle his mind for such matter. So that if he be deceyved, Junius hath deceyved him. But he hath now more cause then before, to esteem much of this place because, the utmost that the Rejoinder could say to it, is as good as just nothing.

As for the difference which the Rejoinder would find, betwixt that clothing of Religion, which Junius taxeth, and the garment of Religion, which the Defend mainteyneth, I cannot discern it.

For 1. If Junius meant adorning, as the Rejoinder saith he did, that is one office of a garment, and such a one as the Rejoinder ascribeth to Ceremonies in respect of Religion, pag. 95. where is said that they are comely formalities, suitable to the dignity and variety of divine actions.

2. If Junius meant hiding of nakedness of Religion, he meant it only in the esteem of those which impose such Ceremonies. And so all they that add their Ceremonies to Religion, as useful garments, do seem to account it (in comparison) naked without them. 3. If the Def. meant to show, that our Ceremonies are not essential limbs of the body of Religion, so did Junius mean to show, that those which add their Ceremonies to God's ordinances, do pretend, they add only clothing, not members, to the body of Religion. Neither is this snatching at words, as the Rejoinder termeth it. For it is, and hath been an ordinary commendation of Ceremonies, that they are as a garment to Religion. Whence it was that a Scottishman (as I remember) at the first coming of King James into England, hearing them maintained under that name, answered that he wondered then how Religion did live, and thrive, in the cold country of Scotland; without such linsiewoolsy garments?

6. Unto this full testimony of Junius, the Repl. added the words of Zanchi, another witness of the Defend. His words in his epistle to Q. Elizabeth, are these: the Church must be ordered by the rule of the Apostolcall Church, as well in Ceremonies, as in doctrine. The Rejoinder answereth 1. that this is no more contrary to the Def. then to Zanchi himself, acknowledging (elsewhere) some Ceremonies lawful, which have neither command nor testimony of Scripture, which he would never say of doctrinals. Now 1. If it be also against Zanchi himself, yet it disableth his testimony, for the Def. 2. This which is alleged out of him, for Ceremonies without testimony or foundation in Scripture, hath been answered before, that it must needs be understood of particular foundation. And so he might well say the same of doctrinals. For in this there is no difference betwixt Ceremonies, and many other things, which are not Ceremonies, and yet appertain to Conscience. As the Apostle said: let all things be done comely and in order, so said he also: whatsoever things are venerable, or honest, just, of good report, and praise, let them be done.

All the particulars of these latter, are not Ceremonial: and yet many hundreds of such things have no more command, or testimony in Scripture, then the particulars of order and Decency: Neither have the generals of order and Decency, less command and testimony in Scripture then the general of these.

His 2. answer that Zanchius comparison is to be understood of similitude, not of aequalitie, is in the former words answered.

For no disparity can be shown, betwixt many particulars of Doctrinal pointes, in their cases of practice, considered with all circumstances, and the particulars of Decency and Order: much less betwixt their generals. As for example it is as difficult for D. B. to fetch from any doctrine in Scripture, this particular: It is venerable, just, and of good report, for him to write su^{he} a Rejoinder as he hath done, as this particular: the Cross in Baptism is orderly, decent, and to edification. I take both to be impossible. But suppose both to be probable, the former (being no Ceremony) is no more determined in Scripture, then the later.

There hath been a fashiō taken up of speaking otherwise, but no reason can be rendered of it. Let any man show the reason, and I will yield.

The epistle out of which this quotation is, was written in deed against our Ceremonies, yet the Repl. leaving to a fitter place, noted only for the present purpose, that it was written of them. But the Rejoined. being great with an observation or two, addeth about that: Moreover Zanchi when he wrote to Q Eliz. to persuade her not to urge the Ceremonies so severly, did write at the same time to B. Jewel, that Ministers should rather yield to them, then leave their places: because they are not simply unlawful.

To which I answer 1. Zanchi writ to Q. Eliz not only that the Ceremonies should not be so severely urged, but also that they ought not to be urged, imposed, or allowed of at all, but abolished. And of this his judgment, he gave such effectual reasons, as can never be answered. Amonge other, one is proper unto this place, and fit here to be remembered, because it overthroweth all that warrant which the Def. and Rejoinder have hitherto, or can heerafter plead for them, out of 1. Cor. 14. Order, Decency, Edification. These Ceremonies saith he make not for edification, but for public dissention, private perturbation of conscience, with scandal of good and bad. They make not for order, but disorder, and confusion of good Ministers with evil or Popish, who ought even in garments to differ. They make not for decency of Christ's Spouse: because they are a strange ridiculous, idolatrous attire of this Romish whore.

2. Zanchi when he writ unto B. Jewel, gave no reason of this counsel for yielding, but left them to be invented by B. Jewel. Now because those reasons of yielding were never yet made known, whereby the former reasons directed by Zanchi against urging can possibly be overborne, I cannot otherwise think, but this later counsel was more out of charity guided by human erring prudence, then out of judgment grounded on Scripture. Howsoever our question is, not only of yielding in case of extreme necessity, but also of appointing and urging men to that extreme necessity.

3. Zanchi doeth not persuade to allow of these Ceremonies by subscription, or silence, but only in extreme necessity, to yield unto them, and that with Protestation. Now this was according to a kind of charitable Pollicie, which Luther is author of about all Popish Ceremonies: de Libertate Christiana, in these words: Although we must manfully resist those Masters of traditions, and the laws of the Popes wherewith they overrun the people of God are tartly to be dispraised, yet the timorous multitude (whom those wicked Tyrants lead captive with the same laws) must stoop till they be plainly laid open. You may inveigh against the laws and law makers, but withal you may observe them with the weak, until both they do know the Tyranny and come to understand their liberty.

But 1. what warrant have we for such a course but of God's word? 2. M^r. Hooker, pag. 247. derideth this course, as a Theorie neither allowable, nor any way practicable in England.

3. Our opposites, that defend, and commend the Ceremonies, as orderly decent things, tending to Edification, cannot without contradiction assent unto this counsel. D. B. in deed did formerly begin after some manner, to put some piece of this course in practice. But the ill success that he found in it, hath since made him, & others, keep far from that part of it, which concerns Protestation, and instead thereof, to turn them unto Commendation. Did ever any that writ for our Ceremonies, write such an Epistle as Zanchius, unto Queen, or Kinge? Can they say so much, and do as they do? Nay is there any Bishop, that dare license Zanchi his Epistles, to Queen Eliz and B. Jewel, both together, for to be printed in English?

These things being so, I leave it unto consideration, unto whom the Rejoinder his affected censure belongeth: Now well-sare a good stomach: He cannot resist, but he will not yield.

SECT. 20.21. Concerning Reasons against the Negative Argument from Scripture.

1. The Def. his first reason is: Whatsoever is unlawful is a transgression of some law revealed in the word. Ergo against it. Ergo not only beside it. The Repl. granteth all: and showeth, that it is a mere fantasie, before confuted, as a cavil, in the Reply, and longe since, by M^r. Cartwrights, 2. Rep. p. 56. not agreeable to the very words of the Argument, to which it is opposed. Upon this the Rejoined. poureth out words He turneth head: O strange! a Babe owned from the birth, suckled by many Scriptures, an ill favored faced brat, absurd, contradictory, when he is taken in a snare, he saith he is mistaken. And what reason hath he to back or bear out all these words with? If the Scriptures (saith he) condemn whatsoever is done not only against, but beside the direction thereof, then doeth it condemn something as unlawful for being only beside it, and not any way against it. To which I answer, that it doeth not follow: because a thing may be only beside the word some way, and yet some way against it. Only beside the particular praescript of it, and yet against the general command of it.

If a Father charge his son, or a Master his servant, first that for a certain time, he do nothing beside that which he shall bid him: and then command him for that time, to read in a certain book, if that son, or servant, shall beside reading paint antick faces in his book, he shall do only beside the particular command, and yet against the general charge, & both ways censurable. Let the Rejoinder therefore spare his words, and see better to his Argument, or rather eat both, that others be not troubled with them.

2. The second reason, brought by the Def. was: Nothing that is indifferent, can be pronounced simply unlawful. But some Ceremonies of man's invention are indifferent. Ergo, not to be pronounced simply unlawful. All which is granted of circumstances of Order, if by invention, be meant determination; otherwise, the Assumption is denied. Though it was added also (exsuperabundante) that things indifferent are sometime taken so generally, that in that sense, the proposition may be denied. Against this, I cannot discern what material thing is Rejoined. He saith, that it is easy to say the Assumption is false, and not to show wherein. But I have hitherto thought that it is sufficient for answer to any Argument, to deny the Assumption, until it be proved: and that the falsitie of any sentence, doeth consist in this, that it pronounceth otherwise then the thing is, and therefore in saying an assumption is false, it is not needful, to show wherein.

He saith also that the largest sense of things indifferent, doeth make no variation of things indifferent. But the Author, and place, was named to him: Sopingius in his Apology ad lib. Anonym. pag. 166. Where the case is very pertinent. For Doctor Sibrandus was challenged by a Remonstrant, who entitled his book, Bona fides Sitrandi, that as in an Epistle Dedicatorie to the Arche-Bishop of Canterbury, he had, to win his favor the more against Vorstius, and his, declared his judgment of the Hierarchy (and Ceremonies) of England, to be things indifferent, so he spake of the Magistrates power, under the same term unfitly, Sopingius, a godly learned man, who had bē a Scholar under Sibrandus, and so desired to help him out of this brier, had no other way to do it, but by saying that all those things are sometime called indifferent, which are not necessary to salvation, or without which a man may be saved.

Now in this sense, the Repl. said, the proposition might be denied: viz. that nothing indifferent i. e. not necessary to salvation, is unlawful. The Rejoinder (it seemeth) had not the book, and so ventured to contradict he knew not what.

3. The third argument was: There must needs always be variety of Ceremonies in several Churches. Ergo all are not prescribed.

The Repl. answereth, that there neither need, nor ought to be any variety, but only in particular circumstances of order, for time and place etc. Here the Rej. (complaining of Coleworts, and of not caring to say any thing, so it be in opposition) bringeth in to the contrary some examples of civil decency, variable according to times and places. But all such things the Repl. contained in his etc. He addeth also variety of solemn feasts But before those can have place here, it must be proved, that such feasts must needs be. But (saith he) never any Divine so spake before M^r Jacob. And hath he soon forgotten, what was even now recited by himself out of Junius? Suche kind of Rejoynders will never be wanting.

4. The Def. his fourth reason was, that the Nonconformists like well, that every Minister in his Parish, should determine of Rites and Orders: whence would follow variety. Ergo they hold some rites of human invention and ordination, lawful.

To this the Rejoinder addeth, as an explication in text, and table, that Non-Conformists set up Parish-omnipotence without referen^e to Bishops, as some teache, or to Synods, as other. Whereby a Minister, and some of his Parishioners, may ordain some Rites and Ceremonies for their use, and the King, and Church under his authority may not. Now before we come to the Repl. his answers unto the Def. his reason, let us consider a little the Rejoinder his addition. 1. The malignant imputation of Parish omnipotency, ill beseemeth our Opposites, except that they can show, more power to be given by us unto Ministers and Elders, in their several Congregations, then by them is given to Bishops, For until they can show this (which they are as able to do, as to call effectually that which is not, as if it were) in accusing us, of setting up Parish omnipotency, they confess themselves, to set up Diocesan omnipotency, Convocation-omnipotency, etc.

2. It worse beseemeth D. B. then most other, except he will confess, that he, when he was Minister at the Hagh, in Holland, and with the consent of his people, ordered things in that Congregation (as to receyve the Communion sitting at the table, to leave out the Cross in Baptism, and Surplice in all Divine service) did then and there set up Parish-omnipotency. 3. It is an injury, more then ordinary, to make us (any way) extol the authoritie of a Minister, above the authority of the Kinge, in any matter of appointing and ordaining. For though a Minister may do something in his administration, which no other man can lawfully do, yet none of us ever thought, that he may appoint and ordain anything to be done, with coactive authority, which the King may do, in all things lawful, and convenient; even in Church affairs. So that our tenent is, that the Minister, and his people, may use no Ceremony, nor exercise any public act of worship, which the King may not appoint, commād, and compel them to. For in holding that no such thing is to be done, beside that which Christ hath appointed, and that the Kinge may, and ought to see that all Christ's institutions be observed, we must needs be confessed to hold that assertion, which is the conclusion of these two. 4. The fallacious ground of this accusation is, that the Minister with his people, may occasionally order some things, which no man absent can, not for want of authority, but for want of presence to observe the occasion: as what time the Church meeting shall begin, upon that day, that the Communion is to be administered, together with Baptism, and other buisines, more then ordinary. 5. That which he intermixeth, of reference to Bishops, bringeth all the Churches of France, Netherlands, etc. under his Censoriall note, of Parish-omnipotency.

Thus much for the Rejoinder apart. Now to the Def. 1. His Argument is rejected, as supposing, all Circumstances to be of like nature with these in controversy. No (saith the Rejoinder) but only that one would like one thing, and one another. But I say yes, or else he cannot argue from one to the other. For what consequence is in this: Men may determine of simple circumstances for order and decency: Ergo they may ordain double, treble, sacred, significant Ceremonies proper to Religion? beside he nameth in his supposition Festivall days.

2. The second fault, found in the Def. his argument was, it supposeth all circumstances to be of institution. No, saith the Rejoinder again. Let him therefore put ordaining out of the Sum which he hath made of the Def. his reason, and confess also, that this reason maketh nothing for men's instituting of Ceremonies.

3. The third was, it supposeth contrary circumstances, ceremoniously to be practiced, by the same men as of institution. Not so (saith the Rejoinder:) but only cantrarie fashions practiced by several men, out of their election. Yet it seemeth to be for the most part so: because the question is of Ceremonies, and Ceremonious practicing, not of incidentall fashions. Of institution, which the Def. calleth ordaining, not of voluntary occasional election. If by variety of observing Festivall days, and not observing them, was by the Def. understood of several men, then in that part he was misunderstood by the Repl. Now upon these premisses, the Rejoinder concludeth all the Repl. his answer to be nothing but bogling and scurrilitie. What would he have said, if one had accused him of setting up Diocesan, and Convocation omnipotency.

It seemeth that (though he aboundeth in that faculty) he would have wanted reproachfull words, to express his indignation of such an imputation.

5. In opposition to this misshapen Argument of the Def. taken from Non-conformists confession, the Rep. propounded one, from the Conformists confession: You say these Ceremonies are Divine, and yet dare not deny, but the rejecting of them in other Churches, is Divine.

You retain these Ceremonies as Divine, and yet reject other Ceremonies, of like nature, as divine as these. What divinity (or agreement) is in such courses? To this, the Rejoinder answereth, that this argueth an ill conscience: because the Def. doeth not say that these our Ceremonies are Divine, but that in respect of permis•ive appointment, and in these, they are divine, in particul•r, and hypothesi, human. And this may be said of the different Ceremonies of several Churches. For ill Conscience, I will not be so liberal in charging the Rejoinder as he is prodigal of it toward the Repl. But ill science I can easily prove. For 1. He denieth the Def. to call our Ceremonies Divine: because (forsooth) he calleth them so in the general, and not in their special: for so the Def. doeth interpret his own terms.

Which is as much as to say, he that doeth not call them every way Divine, doeth not call them Divine. 2. He passeth by the main terms of our Argument Divine rejecting of the same Ceremonies in other Churches, Rejecting of other Ceremomnies, as Divine as these in our Church; and for these he putteth only, different divine Ceremon. in several Churches. This sure is no scientificall kind of answer. 3. No Divinity will suffer anything to be called Divine, but that which (all circumstances considered) may at least necessarily be concluded out of the Divine law. Otherwise all good human laws may be called Divine laws. Now we have hitherto expected in vain, when our Ceremonies may be so concluded.

It is altogether impossible, that the institution, and Rejection, of Cross, and Surplice, in divers places, should be both Divine, or that the urging of these, and abolishing of Images, should be Divine, in the same place, and time. This part therefore of the Argument, the Rejoinder thought good, to answer with silence.

SECT. 22. Concerning the Assumption, of the main Argument, handled in this Chapter.

1. THE Repl. set down the Def. his plea, with a general answer thus: After all this ado about the Proposition of the first Argument, Now we are told of an Assumptiō, out of the Abridgement, and Mr. Hy: viz: that Ceremonies have no warrant out of the word of God being human inventions, For Mr. Hy: I cannot say much (because his reasons are not in printe) but for •he Authors of the Abridgement, they have great wrong done them. Whosoever will turn to the place quoted by the Def. in the Abridgement, shall see, that the words which our Def. hath turned into a Proposition, are there but part of an illustration, belonging to this proposition: All Ceremonies that swerve from the Rules given in the Word, for the Churches direction, in matters of Ceremonies, are unlawful. The Assumption of which is: But the Ceremonies in question, do swerve from those Rules. Now all this chief pith, both of Proposition, and Assumption, is by the Def. omitted: A by thing is put in place of the Proposition. A new assumption is formed: and yet all fathered upon the Abridgement. What hath the Rejoinder to say against all this? 1. This demurrer should have come in at the first. But first, or last, if it be true which here said, the Def. cannot be defended.

2. The Repl. granted the whole Argument, sect. 2. In saying (forsooth) that he took for granted, whatsoever was there said for the all-sufficiency of Scripture.

3. This of itself, is an Argument against our Ceremonies. What then? the Authors of the Abridgement, may yet have wrong, if it be made theirs, against their will. 4 It is fit to be the first Argument, because if this be granted, all other rules are vain. The question is nothere of fitness for place, but of fitting it to the Abridgement. Yet this whole Argument being granted (according to our meaning) of those that the Rejoinder calleth double triple Ceremonies, the Rules have use about single ones. 5. The Proposition is taken out of the Abridgement, pag. 44. and the Assumption is fitted to it, Let it be so, yet if that be made a proposition of theirs, which only was an illustration, or confirmation of their proposition, and (a new assumption fitted unto it according to an adversaries pleasure) the whole argument fathered upon them, as a first and chief one, this surely cannot be excused from wrong doing.

2. To the Def. his answer unto the Assumption, viz. that in general and permissive appointment, our Ceremonies are (not human but) Divine, the Repl. said that he understood not a permissive appointment, to be other then an appointment without appointment: because to permitte, is neither to command or appointe, nor forbid.

Here the Rejoinder among many shrewed words, hath this reason that the same things are commanded, in general, but in particular are only permitted, And for ignorance of this, he twi•teth the Repl. with want of logic. But I cannot yet see, out of any logic how a general can be commanded, generally, and any true special or particular of it be only permitted. He that commandeth all order and comeliness, commandeth also every special of it. Every general command, applied unto his true special subject, maketh that specially commanded.

It is commanded in general that every husband should love his wife, not in special, that Aquila should love Priscilla: yet suppose Priscilla to be Aquila his wife, she may challenge conjugal love, all so well as if hername had been in that Command in special. Else we may as well say, that superstition, will-worship, or at least disorder, to which order is opposed, is forbidden in general, but some specialls of them or it, are only permitted. The truth is, Cross and Surplice, cannot with any show of reason, or common sense, be said to be commanded in general, anymore then in special, no nor yet permitted, either in special or in general. The Rejoinder hath yet found no fit place, to prove the command though it mainly concerneth his cause, and of itself alone might satisfy any man's conscience, if it could be proved, and the permission is the main question of this whole Dispute.

Chapter second, Concerning worship.

All the material doctrine of this Chapter is before discussed, in the Manuduction, sect. 5.6.7. Where the nature, distinctions, and differences of worship, are weighed, and found of no moment for our Ceremonies aide. It shall suffice therefore here, to refer the Reader unto those places, adding only some notes, upon some passages, formerly not declared.

SECT. 1. Concerning worship, distinguished into proper, or essential, and improper, or accidental.

1. The Def. saith, that by proper and essential worship, he understood Ceremonies so necessarily required to God's service, as that the contrary thereof must needs displease him.

Hereupon the Repl. inferred, that all Ceremonies, which serve for decency, and edification, must needs be proper and essential worship: because the contrary of decency and edification must needs displease God, in his worship.

Mark now the Rejoinder his answer: The contrary of decency and edification displeaseth God. But the contrariety of particular Rites, serving to decency and edification, do not displease him: because they fall into one and the same general kind, without contrariety thereto, or therein. As fire & water are not contrary to an element, nor black and white, to color, nor reasonable, and unreasonable, to a creature: so contrary orders, contrary formalities of decency, and contrary means of edification, are not contrary to order, decency and edification. All this answer dependeth upon a distinction betwixt general, and special.

Now 1. This is a certain, infallible rule: what essence soever is found in any general, that must needs be in every special, contained under it. Ther is no essence in an element generally taken, which is not both in the fire, and water, none in color so taken, but is both in black and white, none in the notion of a creature, which is not in man and beast. From hence therefore it necessarily followeth, that if Order and decency in general, be essential worship, every true special of them must needs be so.

2. It is not of, or for nothing, that the Rejoinder doeth so waver in his speech: contrary Ceremonies serving to comeliness, and edification, contrariety of orders, contrariety of formalities of comelinesse, and means of edification. For this means, all his answer is at least put out of comely order serving to edification. For that which serveth to comeliness, and order, all formalities of them, and all means are not specialls, under the genus or general of decency, order, edification, but under the general of means, formalities, etc. So that the whole distinction is confounded, by this wordy explication of it. 3. Contrariety of orders he confesseth, and yet denieth them to be contrary to Order: As if order contrary to order, were not contrary to order! He will say no, not to order in general. But then that order in special, must have some specifical difference, not contained in the general of order, making the contrariety: which should (if it could) have been declared. By the same proportion, also as he acknowledgeth contrary orders, he must also acknowledge contrary decencies, and edifications: and this hath need of declaraiion, because it is a new inventiō▪ not to be trusted, before it be tried. 4. By order, in this place, must needs be meant good order, otherwise, it were as well order, to set the carte before the horse, as the horse before the carte. Now in good order, the things ordered may be someway contrary, as black and white horse set before the carte, and yet the order one and the same: and so in decency. Edification is only an ende. But good order, and decency of the same things, in their particular or inividuall use, can be no more contrary to any good order, & decency of the same things in the same use, thē blackto black & white to white. 5. The plain truth is, that order and Decency (as they pertain to our question) do arise out of the outward disposition and temper of things, as health doeth out of the inward disposition and temper of the body, and therefore doeth admit no more contrariety, then good health doeth.

2. Because the Def. in his distinction, placed Edification only on the part of Accidental worship, that was noted as a flaw. To which the Rejoinder answereth, that essential parts of worship serve also to edification, and worship of themselves. But 1. this can be no more gathered out of the Def. his words, then that all essential worship serveth for decency: for he placeth these two together, as ends of accidental parts of worship, that they serve for decorum, and edification. 2. This is but to help a broken leg, with a broken crutche. For essētiāll worship tending to worship of itself, is as broken a phrase, as the former was a distinction.

3. It was noted also, that the Def. confounded appurtenances, and parts of worship. The Rejoinder answereth, that those things which are appurtenances only in proper, simple, and strict sense, are partes of worship improperly, and in a sort. So in deed at the University, among Sophisters improprie, laxe, modo quodam, quodammodo, are wont to help at a dead lift. But that which is only an appurtenance of worship, is no more worship, then a Bishops Rochet, is a Bishop.

4. About the same distinction, a question was made how any worship can be not essential, that is, not having the essence of worship in it. The Rejoinder answereth, that these appurtenances have in them the essence of accidental worship, but not the essence of substanciall. So then, they are essential accidental worship: and why not as well substantial accidental? A Rochet hath no more in it the essence, then the substance, of an accidental Bishop.

5. The Repl. his last, was, that those which the Def. calleth accidental parts of worship, have not (by his own express confession, in this sect.) so much communion with the essential, as the hair of the body (which is but an excrement) hath with the body, and therefore cannot be accounted a part of worship. The Rej. here. 1. answereth, that they are in deed no part of essential worship, but of the complement of worship, as garments are of men's external honor. So that now we are come to have that expressed, which before was implied, the Ceremonies may be called worship, as a Bishops Rochet, or other Bishoply garment may be called a Bishop. Though it might be also further inquired, if Ceremonies be parts of the complement, what the other parts of that complement may be? Certes he that divided worship into essential and accidental parts, did not mean worship, and the complements of worship, much less, parts of essential worship, and parts of complement. If he did, his speech, and meaning, do not well agree together. 2. He taketh great exception against the term of excrement, as not well appliable to the hair of ones beard, savouring of a spirit full of rancor, to be judged of God as a reproach, tending to breed scorn and abhorring of these Ceremonies, in the minds of ignorant mē. At all which a mā might have laughed, if God's name had bē spared, in so frivolous a matter. All Philosophers, that ever I I heard, or read, heathen, and Christian, call and define the hair of men's bodies, an excrement. All Divines, when they speak of hypocrites in the Church, compare thē to the hayr of a man's body, under the term of excrement. I therefore would not be loath to hear one call the hayr of my beard, an excrement. Neither can I smell any savor of a rancourous spirit, or any reproach, in that phrase. As for breeding of scorn in the minds of ignorant men, one would think, it should not be objected by him, that a little before spake of Parish-omnipotency, and stuffeth his book with such terms, as I am loath (for his sake) to repeat, but that they cannot be more gently refuted, then by bare repeating, after the occasion of them is discussed.

SECT. 2. Concerning adding to God's worship.

IN the second section, the Rejoinder hath nothing materially, to be newly, or now first confuted, save only that about adding to God's word, and worship: which only therefore, needeth here to be discussed.

1. God's laws of Praemunire, against all human presumptions, in his Worship, are famously known. Deut. 4. and 12. Thou shalt not add anything thereto. No man ever writ one sheet of paper against Popish Ceremonies, which did not confute them by these places. The Papists have marked this: Haeretici accusantes Ceremonias a Deo non institutas, superstitionis, & idolatriae, fundantur praecipue in Deut. 12. Swarez de Relig. vol. 1. lib. 2. cap: 1. The Def. and the Rejoinder their answer, is the same, that most Papists use: In these places, where addition is forbidden, is meant only addition of corruption, not any addition of preservation and additions made divine, not human. Now 1. for the first part of the first distinction, God forbiddeth only an addition of corruption, It is worth the considering, which learned Chamier answereth, The bringing in of a Contrarie precept is neither used for, nor can be called Addition, for in Addition both remain, but contraries destroy each other. He that setteth a house on fire, or poisoneth a man, or corrupteth anything, is not usually said to add unto them. 2. By the second distinction, no addition unto God's will and testament, is more forbidden, then unto man's. As it were a sin to add anything unto God's Testament as divine, so also were it to add anything unto man's testament, or testimony, and make it his, when it is not his. None may add anything to D. M. his Defense, or D. B. his Rejoinder, and make it theirs, when it is not theirs. Suche additions, are usually called lies, sufficiently forbidden by the ninth Commandement: so that no indifferent man will think, that nothing more is contained in these prohibitions, so often and earnestly urged, in strict reference unto the holy ordinances, and worship of God, which by this interpretation, can challenge no privilege from them.

2. For the second part of these distinctions: human additions of praeservation, the Repl. observed, that addition was, in the text, expressly forbidden, as a means of keeping or praeserving God's word, and worship: Deut. 4.2. To which it seemeth a contradiction, that addition may be for Keeping, or praeserving. To which the Rejoinder answereth nothing else, but that, therefore addition hindering is forbidden, but not addition keeping. That is, he denieth the conclusion, but answereth not to the proof. But he addeth an example: He that leaves a jewel to be safely kept, doeth not forbid the provision of a Cabinet, with lock, and key, to keep it in. True: Neither doeth any man dream, but the Kings authority, and Churches care, may, and ought to be as a Cabinet with lock, and key, to praeserve God's ordinances and worship. But what is this to additions? and to such additions, as our Ceremonies in question? The Lord's ordinance is, that the Sacrament of Circumcision should cease. For the preservation of this ordinance, the Def. and Rejoinder pag. 285. provide a lawful Cabinet, under lock and key, that Circumcision as it is used in some places, may be lawfully appointed, and commanded. The Lord's ordinance is, that Baptism should be administered according to the primitive institution, without such sacrilegious crossings, as are in use among Papists. They have provided a Cabinet, under lock and key, for this, that all which are baptized, shall be crossed. The Lord's will is, that his holy supper should be received, and used as a supper, not adored.

They have provided, that all men shall kneel in the receiving of it, for a Cabinet, like to the former.

3. Cardinal Cajetans interpretation, was (by the Repl.) alleged addition is forbidden even with the pretext of keeping the commandments of God, as more judicious, and religious. The Rej. answereth, that Cajetan doeth allow the distinction, of additions, into corruptive, and praeservative, in Thom. p. 3. q. 6. a 8. and that in the alleged words, meaneth additions corrupting, though pretended for keeping. Now this is as true an interpretation of Cajetans meaning, and ours also, as can be invented: only that is wanting, which Cajetan (with us) intended, that all additions for preservation, are but pretenses. But as for Cajetan his allowing this questioned distinction in 3. q. 60. (for 6. was an error) whosoever will look upon the places, shall find, that neither in Thomas, nor in Cajetan, is any mention of addition preserving, which here is the only question. They speak in deed of adding words, to the form used in Baptism, and note, some words do corrupt the sense, and some do not: but not a word of adding Ceremonies preservative. The wordy additions, which they speak of, are as Thomas hath it, I baptize thee in the name of the Father, the Son, the Holy Ghost, (and the Virgin Marie:) or as Cajetan hath it: I baptize thee (Sexton what is a clock) in the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost. If these be additions of preservation let any Christian, that regardeth Baptism, judge.

4. It was wished, that the Def. had set down some examples, of preservative additions. The Rejoinder undertaking it for him, nameth for the Text diverse readings, marginal notes, etc. and for the sense, interlineary glosses, notes, marginal references, and commentaries, and then, readings by sections, building and ordering of Synagogues, and a thousand such. And in deed he might as well name diverse thousands, as these. But 1. if so many thousand Ceremonies may be added lawfully to God's law, what meant Augustine, and all our Divines, out of him, to complain of such an intolerable burden of Ceremonies, in regard of their number? 2. Diverse readings, are no more additions, then Coningstable and Constable, are to the Statute of Constables. Marginal notes, no more, then an exposition is to the text, which kind of addition, the Papists do wickedly allege for their doctrinal traditions. Interlineary glosses, notes marginal references Commentaries of the same nature. Reading by sections, building, and ordering, are evidently things of mere order, of which, if any man shall say they are additions, then if he be a poor man, he may make great addition to the little money he hath, by dividing it into sections, placing it fitly, and disposing of it orderly a hundred ways, to the increase (as it were) of a hundred fold: which would be a welcome doctrine (if it were true) to many a poor man, and even to those which are impoverished by the Bishops silencings, deprivations, and excommunications, for not allowing of additions to God's worship.

5. It was also justly questioned, if there were not a deminution, or taking from, for preservation, as well as an addition of that kind: because in the Text they are joined together, as drawing in one yoke? The Rejoinder answereth no. And denieth the consequence, by example of hardening, and showing mercy, joined together, without the same meritorious cause. But 1. the example doeth not agree: because the question was not of a meritorious cause, but of a final. And in the chief or last ende, hardening, & showing mercy do agree. 2. I can easily, find out a detraction, as of good praeservation, as the addition of a Cabinet with lock and key.

For from a sword, or any other iron weapon, a man may well detract rust, for the preservation of it, From an aguish man, blood may be detracted, for the preservation of his life, nay sometime a leg, or an arm, may be cut off, for praeservation of the body. So that, all things considered, the Rejoinder will upon second thoughts, either cashier in God's worship, his addition of preservation, or else add unto it, a detraction or deminution of preservation. Calvin in his nineteenth sermon upon Deutrinomie, hath this remarkable sentence.

Let us assure ourselves, we shall ever be unruly and wild-headed, until our Lord hath tamed us, by long handling, and made us stick to this ground, that it is no more lawful for us, in any wise, to add any thing to his law, then it is lawful for us, to take any thing from it.

6. It was likewise observed, that this praetence hath been always the shoeing-horn, to draw on superstition with. For (as Calvin noteth on Matt. 15) Legislatoris ipsi non jactabant, se novum quicquam tradere, sed tantum addere cavendi formulas, quae media ossent adminicula, ad servandam Dei legem. The old Masters of Ceremonies praetended always, that they meant only to bring-in additions of preservation. Like enough (saith the Rejoinder:) But this very inlet of superstitious things, under the praetence of bringing in only preservative means, doeth witness that such additions as are preservative, were always allowed by God's people, as confirmation of error by Scripture, doeth show the dignity of holy Scripture. This is in deed as fair a praetence, for an inlet of superstition, as can be made. But withal it is manifest from thence, that is is no sufficient, but a very suspicious answer, for Ceremonies, accused of superstition, to say, and not to prove, that they are preservations. Yet these Ceremony-mongers had all their pretense properly from means of preservation, which are and were always allowed by God, and his people, not from additions.

Our Parliament statutes made for establishing of true religion, are a means of praeserving it in England: but I think that Hon. Assemblie would take it ill, if the Rej. should publish to the world, that their Laws are additions to the word, and worship of God.

The Rejoinder addeth, that Calvin in the place alleged, doeth account these praetented additions to have been corruptions, from the first. Now (though this is not here, but in another place, after to be handled) let the Reader guess of Calvin's account, by these his words: Afterward there came teachers who did not think themselves should be esteemed acute enough unless they did patch something of their own to the word of God. Yet no addition to that word is tolerable. Those secondary laws are devised of curious men, as if the single and simple command of God were not enough. To invent new washinges was an idle vanity. Had they rested in the law of God their modesty would have ben more pleasing to him, then their Scrupulous anxiety in doing otherwise.

If this be not enough, to show Calvin's judgment, of Ceremonious additions, let that be added, which he saith to Cassander, and therefore to the Def. and Rejoinder teaching the very same doctrine of Ceremonies, that Cassander did. Opusc. pag. 355. He taught that the Ceremonies ordained by Christ are to be kept entirely, and incorruptly: and nothin• must be added to their institution as if they were lame or imperfect, which indeed is some•what, but it is not all, because by an indirect shift he would lett into the church all other rites. But this half truth is overturned, when he believes a right given to the Apos•les and their Successors, to institute such ceremonies in the administration of the Sacraments which may be for ornament. Therefore he which confessed before nothing should be added, doeth now not only admit such by-Ceremonies, but also commands them. Yet will he help himself with a subtle shift, viz. additions are to be endured, if the Sacraments be not held lame or imperfect, therefore with what mixtures you will, the Sacraments may be wholly changed, and yet all be well, so be you charge not Christ to his teeth, that any of his institutions go lame, and halting etc.

7, It was lastly added, that this answer of the Def. was Bellarmine's answer to Calvin, about this very point and place: de effect Sacr. lib, 2. Cap. 32. Prohibit Dominus additionem corruptentem, as the Def. translateth it, an addition of corruption is forbidden. Which was the rather added, because the Def. had so vainly objected unto the authors of the Abridgement, symbolizing with Bell•mine. It might otherwise have been added, th•t it is not only Bellamines answer, but also Gregory's de Valentia, tom. 4. disp. 6. q. 11. p. 1. et tom. 3. disp. 6. q. 2. p. 7. Swarezes, de Relig. vol. 1. lib. 2. cap. 1. Baroninses; ad an 53. pag. 459. and that it is the common answer of Papists, in defense of their Ceremonies against this place, urged upon them by our Divines. Yet some few spying the vanity of this answer, as being ashamed of it, have found out another, of like stamp: For Cornelius a Lapide, in his Commentary on Deut. 12.32. so expoundeth the words of this prohibition: In rebus & Ceremonijs Dei, fac tantum illud, quod Deus, vel per se, vel per Vicarios suos, puta sacerdotes praeceperit. Which agreeth well with that of the Def. and Rejoinder. Use •hose Ceremonies only, which God, either by himself, or by the Convocation house doeth command. And some more ancient, and therefore less praejudiced Papists, confess, this law did forbid all human Ceremonies to the Jews. So Tostatus, Defensorij par. 2. cap. 8. as also in Deut. 12. q. 12. that consequencie is found among the Hebrews about the observation of Ceremonials. Something is not found written in the law, therefore the Jews are not bound to keep that. Yea which is more, it was not lawful for the Jews to observe any Ceremony about the service of God, unless that were written in the law as appears Deut 12.

The Rejoinder hath many words, wherewith he raiseth up a great dust, to darken the cause with all. But no man can discern any direct answer of his to the allegation, save only his confession, that the Def. his answer, was Bellarmino's answer to Calvin, about th•s very place. All that he addeth to that confession, hath been before confuted. It shall be sufficient in this place, to set down Calvin's resolute conclusion, out of Sermon 85. in Deut. It is devilish blasphemy, to say, that God hath not taught men all that it behooveth them to do. The common by word here hath place: thou art the Devils servant: for thou hast done more then was commanded thee. Here is no limitation, of new worships properly so called, which is the Rejoynders shift, but all that it behooveth us to do, is limited to God's command.

In the fourth section, about Isa. 29. Mat. 15. Col. 2.27 hath nothing material in it, beside those distinctions of worship, which before in the Manduction, section 5.6. and 7. are distinctly examined, and discussed. To those places therefore I refer the Reader, for satisfaction, if there be any needful.

SECT. 6. Concerning our Divines judgment about Ceremonious worship invented by man.

THOUGH those three staple sections of the manuduction. 5.6.7. may be sufficient also for clearing of all the materials here exstant, yet referring the Reader thither for the main, I must add something, about diverse particulars.

1. The Replier said▪ that Worship doeth not vary according to mē opinions, but consisteth in the nature of the action itself. This is (saith the Rej.) to speak monsters. If he had said, things to him unknowen, it had been enough. For all that he hath not known, are not monsters. But what is his reason of this so deep a censure? because (forsooth) opinion, by error of opinion, doeth make that to be essentially false worship, which without such opinion, were no such worship. Of which I may as well say, that this opinion, by error of opinion, doeth make the reason essentially false. For 1. the question was not here of essential false worship, but of essential, and accidental worship, whether opinion did make the difference? which the Def. affirmeth, the Repl. denieth, and the Rejoined. declineth. 2. The Rejoinder hath not yet (that I know of) nor can (as I think) define unto us, what is essential false worsh•p, according to his rules.

3. Every error of opinion doeth not make essential false worship: he should therefore have told us, what error he meant. The Def. nameth opinion of justice, sanctity, efficacy, or divine necessity: and the Rejoinder mentioneth often such and such opinion, held of the Papists, concerning all their Ceremonies. Of this enough is said, Manud. sect. 7. For the present, I deny, that such an erroneous opinion, by itself, and of itself, doeth not make essential false worship. Opinion is but an adjuvant efficient cause of that affective act, wherein the essence of internal worship consisteth: and the external acts of worship, though efficiently differenced by opinion, or faith, are essentially distinguished by their form, and ende. A man may have an opinion, that is just, holy, efficacious, and necessary, to perform diverse works of the second Table, nay upon some occasions, to tell a lie, even against the second Table. Yet none speaking properly, will call, that essential false worship, which is a sin directly against the first Table. Hitherto therefore, I see no monster of the Repl. his making. And if we consider his reason well, which the Rejoinder made to it, the mishaping of things will be found on the other side. If (saith the Repl.) worship did vary according unto men's oppinions, then a man may go to Mass, conceyving another private opinion to himself, then Mas-mongers use to have: and our Convocation may appoint us the grossest of all Popish Ceremonies, if they set another opinion upon it. The Rejoinder his answers are diverse, and some of them strange ones. 1. His first is, that going to mass may be a sin of scandal and presumption, though a man go not thitherto worship. By going to Mass (according to the use of our speech) is meant, doing all those external actions, which Mas-mongers use to perform. Now the question is, whether he that performeth all those external actions (intending only to save his life thereby, as having no opinion of any other good in so doing) doeth only sin of scandal, and praesumption, or else over and beside this, is guilty of external false worship? the Rejoinder seemeth to say, no, he is not guilty of false worship. But when the Christians of the Primitive Church, did with such an opinion, lay but a little incense upon the Heathens Altars, they were by all Orthodox censured for Idolatry. The story of Origen is well known, how he delivered Palme, to those that offered it to the image of Serapis, with this expression of his intention: come, and receyve the bows, not of the image, but of Christ. Yet was he therefore censured as a worshipper of that Idol. Calvin writing of purpose concerning this very case, of going to Mass with such an opinion, accuseth them that do so, of externally professed idolatry: and therein was justified by Melancthon, Bucer, Martyr, Opus. de vitandis superstitionibus. And if this be not right, then all external acts, and real professions, whether symbolizing with Papists, or with Turks, or Heathens, may be in themselves, (set scandal and danger aside) easily excused. So Calvin argueth, in the forenamed treatise and in a Homilie, Opusc, pag. 532. he showeth, that those wise men which think otherwise, would have derided the simplicity of Sidrac. Misach, and Abednego, if they had then lived, in such a fashion: Miserable men, yow may do that external act which is required of you: it is no worship, so long as you have no faith, trust, or devotion to that idol. 2. His second answer is that those which are present at false worship, by violence, are not false worshippers, and upon this he triumpheth, with fie man, fie. I may better say, alas alas, that good D. B. (I speak as I think) should be driven to such extremities, in defense of those Ceremonies, which he never loved, nor doeth at this day. For going to Mass, or doing all those external acts, which Masmongers use to perform, implieth more then violent carrying thither, and deteyning there. 3. His third is, that nothing but opinion doeth make human inventions essential worship of God. Which is an essential denying of the conclusion. 4. For that which was inferred of the Convocation house, he saith first, it is a flinge. Let it be so, yet it may hit that Ceremonious Goliath, as it is such, in the fore head. He addeth, that the grossest rites of Popery cannot possiblie be washed from their opinion. Which is not for a Rite, being an external thing or act, any Rite may be separated from any internal opinion. The last is, that some other Popish rites might be lawful, if they could be cleansed, though we need them not. As if the grossest might not be lawful, if they could be cleansed, or the Rejoinder had shown that we more need the Cross, then those other.

2. Because the Def. placed so much in opinion of sanctity, the Repl. in the second place, opposed, that Sanctitie cannot be separated from such Ceremonies, as are proper unto Religion, only used in the solemn worship of God: because they are neither civil, nor profane, and therefore holy. Heer the Rejoined^r being put to his shifts, as before, answereth that they are in deed holy by applicatiō, but not with inherent, or adhaerent holiness in them, or their use as those which God hath sanctified, nor so as they sanctify the actors, and actions, which is proper to God's ordinances. Now how many strange things are here? 1. That Ceremony, whose essence consisteth in application and use, is holy by application^r and yet not by any holiness that doeth adhere to them, or their use. Holiness is an adjunct received by the thing that is holy, and therefore either inherent, or adhaerent. 2. Is this a good reason: they are not holy truly, as God's ordinances, therefore they are not by men made holy? 3. Have any outward ordinances of God inherent holiness in them? 4. If God hath no way sanctified our Ceremonies, who can make them holy? 5. Do not Ceremonies teaching holiness, sanctify the actors, actions or spectators, after the same manner, that the teaching word doeth sanctify them?

3. Upon occasion of the other part, in the Def. his distinction, (that Accidental worship is any rite, which serveth for the more consonant, and convenient discharge of essential worship,) the Repl. whereas he might have said, that this is a misshapen definition of Accidental worship in general, as it may be divided into true and false, good, and bad, opposeth only this: that no judicious Divine useth to call circumstances of mere order and decency, (which notwithstanding serve for the more consonant and conveniēt discharge of essential worship) that is a Pulpit, a Table, a fair-Cloath, etc. Worship.

The Rejoinder answereth, that in deed, the *Ceremonies themselv*s cannot be called worship without madness, but only the use and application of such circumstances, and rites*. Now 1. mark here, how the Rejoinder who defineth a Ceremony, it is an action etc. and laffeth at the Repl. (because he said, some Ceremonies may be put to other good use, as if all Surplices were turned into poor-folks under-garments) as if the good wife of Bilson had burnt a Ceremony, whē she burnt a Surplice in her oven, mark (I say) that this same Rejoinder doeth distinguish Ceremonies from their use and application. 2. Who ever was so mad (because it pleaseth him to use this term) as to say, that standing in a Pulpit, the better to be heard (which is all the use of it) is to be called worship? 3. Crossing with such expression of the signification thereof, as is used in Baptism, can neither be distinguished from the use of a Cross, nor aequalled to the use of a pulpit, not yet lawfully styled true worship, without a spice of one disease or other.

4. The first witness brought in for us, is Calvin, inst. l. 4. cap. 10. sect. 8. All those constitutions are wicked, in the observation whereof we place any worship to God. The Def. answereth, he meant not by worship, circumstances of order. Which the Repl. readily granted: because it were non sense, to say, all observations in which circumstances of order are placed, be wicked. To this the Rejoinder saith first, it is a babie. 2. he saith, that Calvin meant not to comdemne all constitutions of order: which is as true a babies as the former. 3. Calvin (saith he) defineth what Constitutions are contrary to the word of God, namely such as are ordained and imposed as necessary for consciencie, etc. But Calvin doeth only show that such are of the forbidden kind: and every notifying of a special, is not a definition of the general kind. 4. He addeth, that Calvin doeth allow of some significant Ceremonies sect. 14. Of signification, we are to consider in the next chapter. In the mean time this: Calvin generally speaketh against all worship invented of men, without any distinction. One ambiguous phrase of Ceremonies in general, without any example, save only Divine, in which he instanceth immediately after the words cited, doeth not make a cōtradiction to the former sentence. All the rest of the Rejoinder his allegations out of Calvin, about this answer have their answer, in the staple sect. of the Manuduction. 5.6.7.

The Def. having thus told us, what Calvin did not mean, addeth that Calvin meant by woeship, the inward virtue of worship, which consisteth (saith he) in an opinion of holiness and justice. The Repl here justly noted the ill sound of those words: the inward virtue of worship consisteth in an opinion, to which the Rejoinder saith just nothing. And yet in all this chapter mainteyneth all that doctrine of opinionated worship, which the Def. let fall. But a man would think, that upon this occasion, he should have declared, how, and how far worship doeth constift in opinion? As for inward virtues and vices consisting in opinion, it is as great a paradox, and greater also, then that of the Stoics, who made all other differences of men's estate, beside virtue and vice, to consist in opinion.

In the second place, it was asked by the Repl. how an inward virtue, can be planted in an outward Ceremony? the Rejoinder by error of opinion. But it is more then error, nay more then ordinary madness, for any man to think, his inside, is in his outside, his heart is in the feather that he weareth on his hat.

Th• Repl. added in the third place, that the proper nature of worship, doeth not consist in holiness, and justice, but in the honoring of God: so that all external Ceremonies, whose proper use, is the honoring of God, are external worship. This was directed against those words of the Def. the inward virtue of worship (placed in outward Ceremonies) consisteth in an opinion of holiness, and justice. Now what saith the Rejoinder? 1. No man can in any action aim at God's honor, without opinion of justice and holiness in that action. Which may be granted, if justice (in this form of speech, whereby our Divines use to condemn many Popish Ceremonies) did not signify justification as it doeth. But yet it doeth not follow from thence, that every opinion of holiness, and justice, doeth make worship, much less inward worship, and least of all, the inward virtue of worship.

2. Then (saith he) all external Ceremonies must needs be worship. And this is that which we avouche, of all Ceremonies, whose proper use is the honoring of God. 3. It is not (as he addeth) the immediate and peculiar use of our Ceremonies, to honor God, but to aedifie man unto the honoring of God.

No more (may I say) is it any otherwise the immediate ende of preaching the word, to honor God, but only by aedifying of men, to the honoring of God: and yet preaching of the word is essential worship. 4. Pulpits, Fonts, Tables, Table-cloths, and Cups, are as much appropriated unto religious uses, as our Ceremonies in question. But this is confuted in the staple section of the Manuct. 3. and 4. And the difference is acknowledged by the Rejoinder, in that, he maketh Pulpits etc. to be only simple Ceremonies, and ours in question, double and trible. For by that it followeth, that our questioned Ceremies are twice, or thrice more appropriated to worship, then Pulpits.

5. Calvin (saith the Rejoinder) doeth mark out false worship by a false opinion of worship and necessity: He doeth so in deed: but never meant to make it a convertible, or reciprocal mark, much less that wherein the essence of all false worship consisteth, as hath been cleared. Paul Phil. 3. marketh out Dogs, by urging of Circumcision: but he never meant, that there were no other Dogs but such. Calvin also many times marketh out false worship by an opinion of merit: yet surely a man may use false worship, without such an opinion.

In opposition to these allegations out of Calvin, the Repl. nameth one place, epist. 259. where he saith, according to the Rejoinder his own translation: If it be well and thoroughly looked unto, what it is, that doeth so much provoke man, to the making of Ceremonies, we shall find, that they all flowed from this spring-head, because every man made bold •o fancy some new worship of God: whereas God not only refuseth all forged worships, but utrerly abhorreth them. This (saith the Repl.) is a direct confutation of the Def. (and I add, of the Rejoinder.

For if all human Ceremonies flowed from affectation of will-worship, then a Pulpit, and such like matters of order, and decency, are no Ceremonies. If all the worship which is placed in human Ceremonies, be unlawful, then no such Ceremonies are lawful, what opinion soever there be of their necessity, etc. If this be so (answereth the Rejoinder) then Calvin hath confuted his more public writings, in a private epistle.

Which is nothing so, but only it followeth, (as the Repl. said) that he hath confuted the collection which the Def. made from a shred or two of his more public writings. He hath expressed so much in public writings as he doeth in that private epistle. As to add one place of note, opusc. pag. 356. disputing against Cassander, who maintained human Ceremonies, upon the very same grounds, terms, and condition, that the Def. and Rejoinder do, he saith of them: Seeing God will be worshipped by the rule of his law, and therefore detests all feined services, it is undoubtedly contrary to faith that anything be added to his precepts by the judgment of man.

But that answer being only for a flourish, the Rejoinder his second is, that Calvin spake of mystical Ceremonies excescively multiplied. As if both these could not stand together, for to speak against any sin excessively multiplied, and yet withal against sin. The Prophets often speak of multiplying idols altars, fornications, according to the number of cities, or towns, on every high hill, under every green tree. Do they not withal speak simply against all idolatry? But Calvin (as the Rejoinder addeth) alloweth in some case, the mixture of a like water with wine, in the Lord's Supper. What? for a religions Ceremony? show the place, and after that, see how it can be justified, against those accusations, which the Rejoinder layeth upon Sopping the bread in wine, pag. 61.62.63. Calvin (as he lastly addeth) epist. 120. could have wished, that Hooper had not so much struggled against the Cap, and Rochet, or Surplice. But beside that Calvin did not, nor we neither esteem a Cap, or a Rochet either (a Surplice is added by the Rejoinder) so evil as the Cross in Baptism, Calvin could not say so much, without a shrewed item (ut illa etiam non probem, though I do not allow of such things.) Which manifestly declare that his wish was not grounded on such an opinion, as the Def. and Rejoinder maintain. It might also be added, that Calvin in the same place accused them, of wicked perfidiousness, who though they seemed to favor the Gospel, yet made a party against Hooper, about that trashe, unto the hindering of his Ministry: which is the case of all our depriving and silencing Prelates.

5. The second witness, produced by the Def. for to be answered, is Chemnitz. To whose condemning of all worship instituted without the word, the Def. answered by his wedge, saying, that he meant only that which is made essential worship, not accidental. Concerning this distinction, enough hath been said in the 5. and 6. staple sect. of the manudiction, let this only be remembered, that it is all one, as if he should divide worship, into worsh•p, and no worship: for both Def. and Rejoinder often say accidental worship is no worship. They add some time, for explication, that it is no essential worship: but so they may say essential worship is no worship, and then add that they mean no accidental worship. The Repl. therefore justly required, that should be shown, if Chemnitz distinguish will-worship, as he doeth, into lawful and unlawful.

Upon this occasion the Rejoinder 1. criethout of a falsehood shameful, and to be blushed at, for saying that the Def. distinguisheth will-worship into lawful, and unlawful. But let any man judge where is the falsehood, shame, and cause of blushing. The question is of worship invented by man, which Chemnitz (with other Divines) call will-worship, whether it be lawful or no? the Def. answereth by a distinction, that some is unlawful, as essential, and some lawful, as accidental. What can be more plain? But (saith the Rejoinder) Accidental worship, be denieth to be properly worship, and therefore denieth it to be will worship, unless it be imagined essential. What a consequence is this, to bear up so weighty an accusation? It is not properly worship, and therefore it is not will-worship. He may as well say: it is not properly worship, and therefore it is not lawful worship. May it not be improper will-worship, though it be not properly worship? Or no improper worship come merely from the will of man? It is rather a property of Ceremonies, to depend merely on the will of the institutor. So Tostatus in Exod. tom. 1.148. et in Levite. pag. 585. A Ceremony is a certain observation, or a special manner of worshipping God determined out of the sole Commandment of of the lawgiver.

His second exception is frivolous. His third is this: Chemnitz hath this distinction in substance, though not in terms. For he saith, that right inward worship being supposed, right external expressions will follow of their own accord, and they are external worship, though not acceptable in themselves. Where 1. Mark the partiality of the Rejoinder.

In the former answer, he requireth the Repl. to show the distinction which he attributeth to the Def. in his words, or terms, otherwise he may blush for shame. Now, when he is urged to show his distinction out of Chemnitz, he forsaketh words, or terms, and flieth to substance, without once thinking of shame and blush•ng. 2. This substance is a mere shadow. For first, Chemnitz acknowledgeth no outward expressions to be right worship, but only those, that flow of their own accord, without any institutiō, from inward worship. And who will say, that the Def. and Rejoinder their accidental worship, of Cross and Surplice, do so flow from internal. Secondly, those external expressions, are as essential to external worship, as profession of faith is to a visible Church. Nay there is no external worship, beside the expressions, and setting forth of the internal. Thirdly, Though those expressions, be not acceptable of, or in themselves, being separated from the internal, yet it doeth not follow from thence, that they are in their nature accidental worship, and no ways substantial. For the Rejoinder confesseth, that all God's ordinances are substantial worship: and yet he will not say that God's outward ordinances are acceptable unto him, when they are separated from internal worship.

Upon supposition (which now appeareth true) that the Def. could not show his distinction out of Chemnitz, he was desired, at the least, to show, that there is some worship, which is not necessary: because otherwise he must needs sink under Chēnitius his charge To this the Rejoinder answereth, 1. that Chemnitz understandeth by will worship, whatsoever of man's device, is imagined necessary. 2. that there is some external worship, which is not in the particularities of it necessary. For the first of which, enough is said, in the 7. s. of the manud. Yet here I may add, that it is so far from truth, (no will-worship can be without imagination of necessity) that on the contrary, whosoever doeth take upon him, for his will sake professedly to apoynt any worship, cannot possibly imagine it absolutely necessary, but acknowledging there hath been worship, without his addition, he professeth to add something, not simply necessary to the being, but only to the better being of it. As for the second, In God's own ordinances, which were substantial, and essential, by the Rejoinder his confession, the particularities were not always absolutely necessary Levite. 5. a lamb, or two turtle doves, or two young pigeons. And this answer may serve for all that is further rejoined about Chemnitz. For it beareth wholly upon perpetual necessity of the same particularities. The expressions which he instanceth in, are natural gestures, such as kneeling, lifting up of eyes, or hands to heaven etc. which have as manifest impressions in them, of God's will, without man's institution, as the offering of doves or pigeons ever had, and in their particularities upon occasion carry as much necessity with them. What is this to such unnecessary worship, as Cross and Surplice?

6. About Peter Martyr his testimony, beside the repetition of that thread bare distinction of worship, into essential and accidental, he looseth also a knot by it. Peter Martyr saith, it is lawful for men, to appoint circumstances of order, but unlawful to appoint any worship. The Def. contradicteth him thus: if it be lawful to appoint circumstances of order, then it is lawful to appoint some worship. The Rejoinder excepteth here 1. that the Repl. calleth that some worship ambiguously, which the Def. called accessory, and accidental worship. The accidental worship belike may be called worship, but not some worship, without ambiguity. 2. He answereth, that P.M. condemneth only the framings of essential worship. But first P.M. his words are, lest anything should seem to make for worship the Apostle absolutely damns all will worship.

Secondly he discerneth all worship from order and decency, Thirdly he opposeth order, to significant Ceremonies, of man's institution, admitting the one and rejecting the other. Others argue thus: the people is unlearned and rude, therefore to be held in with Ceremonies. Put this difference is between us and them of old, they had many Ceremonies, and we exceeding few, but some there must be for order and decency.

To the instance of bowing the knee, called by P.M. external worship, answer was given a little before. It is no voluntary invention, or institution of men.

7. In the next place, D. Morton set down himself, as last at this table: which was excepted against by the Repl. because divers others were invited to this meeting. Heerupon, the Rejoinder after a few words of form, not all sound (as that he would have him that set himself down last, not to be too hasty, though he shut the door for hast against others that were invited) taketh occasion to say something, of Melanchthon, Bullinger, Bucanus, Polanus, Cartwright, Fenner, Tilemus, Chamier, and Perkins.

But he bringeth no answer of moment, but that wether-beaten distinction of essential and accidental worship, which is examined, Manud. sect. 5.6.7. Where also is handled of Tilemus, Polanus, Bucanus, Cartw. and Fenner, by name. It is not therefore needful to add much in this place: yet something in brief, of the rest.

8. Melanchthon (saith the Rejoinder) reckoneth it an error, in constitution of things indifferent, to account them worship: but he meaneth, with opinion of rightousnesse, and necessity, worship of themselves, whose immediate ende is God's honor, not vestments, Feasts, and fasts, etc. Now concerning all these exceptions, enough hath been spoken, Manud. sect. 5.6.7. Yet concerning Melanchthon, he meaneth by righteousness, justification, by neces^{it}ie, that which is necessary to justification, by of themselves, considered apart from God's ordinances, by immediate ende, that which belongeth to the first table.

Now 1. the Rejoinder will not say that any human worship, is lawful, beside that which is held absolutely necessary for justification, for then it may be lawful, though it be every way aequalled to many of God's ordinances. 2. The sign of the Cross, to signify our courage, and constancy in Christ's service, were worship, though it be considered, or were used alone by it self. 3. Our Ceremonies belong to the first table, so far as they belong to any part of his law. 4. Vestments, fasts, and feasts also, are accounted by Melancthon, matters of mere order. For so Tom. 1.297. and 305. he compareth them to order of lectures in schools, and to the order of reading and praying, in families, morning and evening. And so far, we also allow of them. Yet one thing is worth the noting, that whereas imposers of Ceremonies do much ground themselves upon the Apostles example, Acts. 15. and are therein allowed by the Rejoinder pag. 45.46. of his manuducction, Melanchthon doeth so disallow of this collection, that therein he condemneth all imposition of such Ceremonies as ours. For Vol. 3. pag. 91. he saith thus.

It followeth not: the Apostles retained the rite of blood and things strangled, therefore we may set up new things as matters of worship, tis Consequence is false, because the Apostles did not Establish this rite, but only take it up for a while. 2. Though they had instituted some new thing here follows nothing for innovation. This imitation hath ever been hurtful to the Church. The Bishop is the hearer, and takes the word and rites from the Apostles with a certain charge, that he delivereth them over to the Church unchanged.

9. Bullinger (saith the Rejoinder) undoubtedly condemneth all worship of God, which is merely of man's tradition: but not Ecclesiastical laws, nor worship agreeable to God's word, as public meetings for worship, set times, places, manner of administration, holy days, and fast days.

Now in all this we fully agree with Bullinger, understanding only by holy-days fit times of preaching and praying and by days of fasting, occasional times of extraordinary humiliation.

10. Chamier (saith the Rejoinder) To. 3. l. 20. c. 5. four times, useth this distinction, of worship proper and accidental. But Chamier only calleth those special material acts, which are conjoined with formal acts of worship, accidental parts of worship: as if a man vowed to drink no wine for a certain time, his abstaining from wine pertaineth to worship, only by accident. So if in solemn prayer for a Prince, his titles, and style be rehearsed, or any special terms of honor, this pertaineth to prayer, by accident. What is this to such instituted worship, as the Cross?

11. Mr. Perkins (saith the Rejoinder) condemneth that worship instituted by men, which is so simple, and in itself. For he granteth a bodily worship necessary (as kneeling, lifting up of hands, and eyes etc.) terming it less principal worship. As if this were not the very same thing that we profess. But if any man see Mr. Perk. on the second Comandement, in his gold chain, in his explication of the Decalogue, and in his treatise of idolatry, he shall find this constantly taught by him, as a positive doctrine, that all worship, all things obtruded under the name of worship (without any exception) if they be not by God commanded, are unlawful, superstitious worship.

12. Now last of all (in due place) the Rejoinder answereth for D.M. that he in that place, Apol. par. 1. c. 89. condemneth Romish Ceremonies, because they were so many and burthensome. Now except he meaneth, that these were the only causes, it is no answer, and (though I have not his Apology now at hand) I dare venture something on it, that other reasons are there alleged. This I am sure of, that in his Defēce, cap. 6. sect. 6. he condemneth them not only for their number, but also for their nature. And it is as manifest, as anything can be, that a number of them have no other nature then ours have. Beside one or two human Ceremonies may be burthensome.

If Circumcision were imposed in England, a the Cross is, upon which condition, the Def. and Rejoinder allow of it, pag. 285. I think these allowers of it would account it a burden. And howsoever the light aerial Cross is not so burthensome to the body, as that, yet to the Conscience of many thousands, it is altogether as importable a burden.

13. Upon occasion of that reason which the Def. rendered for condemning of popish Ceremonies, the Repl. addeth: because he had heard men often speak in this manner, of the fault that is in multitude, he would willingly know, what certain limits, and bounds are set, by God's law, for the number of human Ceremonies, such as ours? If there may be three, why not four, five, six, and so forth, as many as shall please the Convocation? Surely (saith he) if once we depart from God's institution, there will be no place to rest our foot on, but we must ever follow wind and tide, which in religion is baseness itself. The motion is reasonable, even according to received grounds: because we must have a rule for number, if some number doeth make Ceremonies to be justly condemned: and if that number doeth make them condemned by the word, we must also have that rule out of God's Word. Now see what fluttering and flying answers are given, by the Rejoinder. His 1. is that all our Divines do censure Popish Ceremonies for their number. So did all or most of the Prophets censure not only the Idols of Israel, but even their high places, for their number. His 2. is, that just so many Ceremonies must be allowed, as shall not clog an overcharge the Churches, in the judgment of those, to whose discretion it belongs, to judge thereof: Where he meaneth the Convocation house, for England. Now to pass by here, that which formerly hath been noted, (how corrupt this position is, to appropriate the judgement of discretion; even in Ceremonies, unto Prae•ats) if this be all the rule, then Augustine was too rash, in his time, to judge the number of Ceremonies used then to be a burden more then Jewish. For it did no more belong to him, for to discern of Ceremonies used especially out of his Diocese, then it doeth belong to every Minister in England, to discern what Ceremonies he and his people may use. Nay then all our Divines do wrongfully charge the Popish Cer•monies, for their number: because in the judgment of those among them, to whose discretion it belongs to judge of such things, as well as to our Convocation, they are not thought to clog and overcharge the Churches. Thence also it would follow, that no Prelates could offend, in instituting of Ceremonies, without sinning directly against their Consciences: whereas we are more charitablie persuaded of many, even Cōvocatiō mē. His 3 is, from a comparisō, of Kings laying up of treasure, & multiplying of horses, Deut. 17. as likewise of eating more or less.

But 1. if there be no more certain rule of instituting of mystical Ceremonies, then for these things, thōn wiser men then any in our Convocation, may abuse the people with them. For so Solomon without question did, both in horses, & treasure. 1. King. 10. And so what assurance have our Consciences, from their judgments of discerning? Kings multiplying of treasure, and horses, concerneth (in conscience of acting) only themselves, and their officers. but the Ceremonies (in acting) concern all the Churches. In that there is not only a disparity, and dissimilitude, but such a one, as requireth the rule to be more accurate in one, then in the other. 3. Within a latitude, it were easy to determine, how much treasure, and how many horses, ordinarily are lawful to be multiplied, by this or that Kings, as also how much is lawful, for an ordinary man to eat at one meal. But if the number of Ceremonies do depend wholly on the Prelates discretion, there can be no other rule given of them, then: so many as the Convocation house think good to injoin. His 4. (as I take it) is, that on the margent, from another comparison, one or two cruches may help a weak man in his going, whereas 6. or 7. would hinder him. Which is very true. But if it should be appointed to all men in England, to go upō three Cruches, though they do not see, nor any could show them, that they had any need of them, only upon this ground that the Parliament judged, they had need first of cruches, and then of just three cruches, were not this (think you) a wise statute and to be observed as a law? His 5. and last is, that peril of leaving God's institution, there may be some, in matters of faith, and necessary duties to salvation: but in other matters, to speak of peril, is ridiculous. But some in matters of faith, and principal obedience? none to be feared but ridiculously, in point of Rites? It is strange that ever any man of D.B. his knowledge, and profession, should let fall such a sentence.

He himself will recall it, when he hath considered how deadly a thing it is to depart from God's institution in fundamental pointes, and also, how great mischief hath arisen, by leaving God's institution even in Rites. It is well known that Ceremonies and rites, opened the door and paved the way for invocation of Saints in heaven, and evocation of men out of Hell, for the Sacrifice of the Mass, and Idol of the Altar, and such like pretie stuff to enter into the Church. And they were Ceremonies which came in with the wind and tide of custom, to which wind and tide if we yield ourselves again, God knoweth, what will become of us.

But this especially is in the conclusion, to be marked: the Def. and Rejoinder have hitherto said much upon the general rules for Ceremonies, Order, Decency, Edification, as if they did try the taste of every occurrent Ceremony, as perfectly, as if everyone had been named: they are the Rejoinder his words, pag. 89.

Now when we are come to the issue, they are found to be nothing, but only wind and tide of custom. As if wind and tide did try the taste, or discern distinctly of every ship, or boat, that is carried by them. What meant they to trouble us about certain rules, if every wind and tide be enough? If the practice of this be not baseness, in any kind of worsh•p, essential, or accidental, then it is not base, for a Christian man's conscience, in some worship, to be led through hedge, or diche, only because some went before, or to crouche upon every Maisterly man's word, or nodde, which certaynly is against the dignity both of Conscience, and also of Worship: because neither of them are subject to any mere pleasure or custom of men. Mr. Latimer Serm. 3. before King. Pd. seemeth to respect Ceremonies, when he said, that the Lutherans, in Germany, made a mingle-mangle hotchepotche of Popery with true religion, as in his country, they call their hogs to the swine-trough: Come to thy mingle-mangle, come pyr, come pyr. If this be not base, to be thus called to mingle-mangles, let any man judge, that is not wont to be fed with husks.

Beside, one question yet remaineth▪ when winds, and tides, fall cross, as often they do, the winds of authority driving one way, and the tide of good Christians bent, the clean contrary, what is here to be followed? If we may make conjecture of D. B. his judgment, in such a case, by his practice, it will be very uncertayn.

SECT. 2. Concerning Vrsines and Zanchius judgment, about will-worship.

1. HEere (for brevity sake) the question was repeated, in these words: whether all will-worship, whtsoever, is to be condemned, or no. The Rejoinder upon this, first accuseth the Repl. of falsifying and changing the proposition. Now he cannot mean this of words: because the verity and falsitie of a proposition, doeth not consist in words. And the sense he cannot deny to be falsified. For human Ceremonies, imposed and observed as parts of God's worship, must needs be worship proceeding from man's will, or will-worship. This therefore is but a blushing at the name of that which without blushing is defended. 2. The Rejoinder himself doeth, in the very next words, confess so much, when he professeth, that some will-worship is not condemned.

But I wonder from what good Divine he ever learned this assertion? The Papists are ordinarily charged by us for teaching, and practicing of will-worship: yet diverse of them are ashamed to profess the defense of such a monster, in plain terms. ESTIVS upon the Epist. to the Col. Cap. 3. ult. disputing against someone or two Jesuits, that had been forced to let fall such a speech, saith of them, as we say of the Rejoinder, Docere non poterunt 〈in non-Latin alphabet〉 usquam accipi in bono. They can never show, that will-worship is taken in good sense, 〈wed of and not condemned. All our Divines might here be opposed to these two Doctors opinions. But it shall suffice, to allege only two for the contrary, and they are Vrsin, and Zanchi, whose authority are so much urged by the Def. and Rejoined. in this section, Vrsin in the place quoted by the Def. upon the 2. Commandment saith thus: All feigned worship is forbidden: all worship which is not of God, but set up by men, when worship or honor is feigned to be done to the true God, in some work which he hath not enjoined. Zanchi also upon the same Com. q. 4. thus: We may not worship God with any other worship (though it be in the kind of ex•ernall and Ceremony•nia•l worship) then with that which he hath required in the holy Scriptures to be worshiped of us by. 3. Concerning the examples, which are here brought forth of warrantable will-worship, free-will offerings, vows, and kneeling in public prayer, enough hath been answered before. Yet briefly again free-will offerings were only to be made of such things as were manifestly known to be prescribed by God's revealed will: and so not the offering, but undertaking of it, at such a time, or in such a measure, was left unto the free choice of men, according to occasion.

It is no will-worship, to pray thrice or seven times in a day, or to preach thrice in one Lord's-day upon special occasion. Some vows are no more worship, for the matter of them (and that only is left unto choice, not the manner) then fighting in a lawful war, upon the bond of an oath, is religious worship. Kneeling in prayer is expressly allowed by God's revealed will: and the determination of it to this or that time, is to be ruled by occasion. 4. As for that conclusion which the Rejoinder draweth from the former grounds, viz. that order comeliness and edification. 1. Cor. 14. give power to men, for to appoint accessory parts of external worship, first, it hath no connection with them, as hath been shown in part, and may further be observed by this, that the inference is, from free-will-offerings, vows, and Kneeling, that therefore the Apostle 1. Cor. 14. doeth give Churches power to appoint such formalities as our Cross, and Symplice: which is to tie harp and harrow together with a rope of sande. Secondly, suppose it had, then it is not fully and resolutely expressed: because from will-worship of free will-offerings may as well be concluded essential, as accessory will-worship to be in the Churches power for to appoint it: because they were as essential offerings, as other sacrifices, which were by name commanded. If by accessory worship, he meaneth that which is appointed by man, in opposition to essential, as appointed by God (which his manuductive interpretation beareth) then instead of a conclusion, we have a mere confusion: the Church may appoint that will-worship which God hath not appointed, but man doeth. Thirdly, the appointing of this or that, doeth not follow upon the practice of free-will-offerings, and vows, except it be understood, that the Church might have appointed men, what, and how many free-will offerings they should offer, which were to turn free worship into forced.

2. About Vrsines testimony, we have such turnings, and windings of words obtruded upon us, as afford no matter capable of sad dispute. It shall be sufficient therefore to note only the passages, which seem to look towards the question. The Rejoinder pag. 179. told us, that the Def. offered to confute, out of Vrsine, this proposition: All human Ceremonies which are imposed, and observed, as parts of Gods worship, are unlawful. Now first upon this, the Repl. brought forth the main assertion of Vrsin, in the place alleged, viz. that human Ecclesiastical Ceremonies, not only are not the worship of God, but also they bind not the conscience. To this the Rejoinder answereth, that Vrsin in his answer to an objection made against this assertion, saith, that such Ceremonies are not worship in themselves, therefore (addeth the Rejoinder) his meaning is, that there is some true lawful worship, improperly, and by accident.

Which is as if from these words: man's clothes, or armor, are not a man by themselves, one should conclude, that therefore they are affirmed to be a man improperly, and by accident.

Secondly, the Repl. noted diverse words of Vrsin, sounding wholly to the denial of the honorable title of good worship unto human institutions. Upon which the Rejoinder complaineth, of willful omitting these words of Vrsin: worship properly so called doeth so please God, that the contrary of it would displease him. Where (saith the Rejoinder) we have an exact description of worship properly so called. But he is herein deceived. For if this be an exact description of proper worship, then whē a child honoreth his father, he doeth properly and immediately honor and worship God: because such an act doeth so please God, that the contrary of it (dishonoring of ones father) must needs displease him.

And so, in very deed, was the meaning of Vrsin, to call the moral duties even of the second table, worship properly so called. Which form of speaking, though it cannot be excused from great impropriety, yet maketh it nothing for, but rather against the Rej. because Vrsin hereby denieth human Ceremonies so much to participate the nature & name of worship, as any mean moral duty of the second table doeth, no not so much as the hang-man's office, in the due execution of it.

Thirdly the Repl. observed, that the Def. concludeth the very same thing out of Vrsin, which we maintain, and he undertook to confute, viz. that divine worship properly so called, is that which is ordained of God.

To this the Rej. answereth (after an angry charging the Repl. with a contradictious spiri, that this is not alleged, because we deny it, or to confute our proposition, in the sense of Vrsine, but to show what sense we must hold of it.

Now did not the Rejoinder himself tell us pag. 1794. that the Def. offered to confute out of Vrsin, our proposition? How can this be excused from contradictions (I will not say spirit, but) dealing, to say, and unsay the same thing, in the breath of one and the same section?

Fourthly, to that which the Def. said, of Ceremonies, in a large sense, to be held worship, the Repl. answered, that thts should be proved. The rejoinder is, that the large sense it set down, viz. as circumstances apperteyning to the setting out of divine worship.

As if we had not required a proof, but only an explication. Yet this explication hath no more truth in this large sense, then if one should say, that all circumstances appertayning to the setting out of a man area man.

But (saith the Rej.) Vrsin, or at least Pareus saith, that the genus commune nature of these Ceremony. as well as of civil laws is moral, and therefore worship. What could he have said more to confute both Defendant, and Rejoinder• they are worship, (and that only in their general nature) just as civil things: that is not otherwise then all good deeds are worship. So forbidding, or hindering of false worship (which may be done by Atheists) is worship, in this uncouth manner of speaking.

One argument yet is of the Rejoinder his own invention: Suche things done to the honoring of an Idol were idolatry, as to build a temple, to the honoring of an Idol. Therefore the same things done by the rule, to the right ende, are some way a worship to God. Wherein there are two ambiguous phrases observable: 1. such things. 2. to the honoring of an idol.

If by such things, he meaneth such as cross and surplice, we not only grant, but urge, that such things done to the honoring of an idol, are idolatry, and therfrom conclude, that such things done to the honoring of God, are (not some way but) properly, latria, or worship of the true God, though (being destitute of his allowance) false, or superstitious worship. But if he mean such as circumstances of time, and place, then he accuseth all Princes, that ever granted time, and place, for idolatrous worship, to be Idolaters. Let him consider, how far this stretcheth.

Secondly, if by the honoring of an Idol, he meaneth a devout intention of such an honor, we grant, that the taking up of a straw directly to such an immediate ende, is idolatry. For howsoever such intention is not necessary to external worship, yet the praesence of it doeth make that worship which otherwise were none.

Yet all circumstances of time and place, which are occasionally applied to idolatry, are not idolatry, either essential, or accidental. For then the same circumstances, should be (in diverse Ci•ies) both Idolatry, and also true worship of the true God, as being circumstances of both.

3. Concerning Zanchi. His name is by mistaking, much abused. For howsoever he distinguisheth worship into that which he calleth essential, and such thing as are annexed unto it, yet under these annexions, he compriseth such things as God hath commanded, all which the Def. and Rej. call essential worship. His words are these: Things annexed to worship are holy ordinances which among the Jews were very many, as their temples, Altars, persons, garments, vessels, times &c. And afterward Ministers, Elders, Deacons, Lord's Day &c are the holy things of the Christian Church. So that Zanchi calleth those annexed, which these men call essential worship: what an unhappy witness is he, that doeth not agree with them of whom he is produced: But to take all that the Rejoinder would have, this is the sum: If human Ceremonies be some part of external worship, and yet not of that worship which is essential, as Zanchi showeth, then (in a large sense) Ceremonies applied to religious actions, may be called parts of God's worship, though not essential.

To which I answer, that according as Ramus showeth, about distribution, sometime adjuncts of a thing may (in a large sense) be called parts, and yet they cannot have the abstractive name of that subject attributed unto them: because the adjuncts of a man cannot (with any sense) be called men. The consequence •herfore of this argument is rotten at the root.

But such a reason, as that from the adjuncts of a man, to a man, was thus propounded by the Repl. the cross is annexed to a Sacrament. To this the Rejoinder answereth, that the Cross is not annexed to the Sacrament, but only to the solemnity of the Sacrament, and so it is not a part of the Sacrament, but of solemnity.

Now here let any man of reason judge, 1. If the Cross in Baptism, be not so much as a circumstance a Ceremony, or Rite (which all Papists, Lutherans, and our Conformists ordinarily, acknowledge) annexed unto Baptism? Common use of speech calls that annexed, which is joined unto another thing, as an adjunct. Now who can doubt, but the Cross is so joined to Baptism?

2. If the Cross be not an essential part, or member of the solemnity, and therefore not an annexed adjunct of it, no more then a man's hand is to be esteemed a thing annexed unto him, or his body?

3. If this being granted, that the solemnity of Baptism is annexed to Baptism, it doeth not follow, that the Cross, a main part of that solemnity, be not also annexed to the same Sacrament? Such figleaves, so ill-favoredly sowed together, cannot cover the nakedness of will-worship.

SECT. 8. & 9. Concerning Mr. BRADSHAW his argument, whereby he proveth our Ceremonies to be esteemed, imposed, and observed, as parts of God's worship, viz. because they want nothing to true, or right worship of God, but only a right efficient cause, or author.

1. THE 8. section was neglected by the Repl. as containing nothing but affirmation on one side, and negation on the other. This omission (saith the Rejoinder) was for advantage, because (forsooth) here the Def. his assertion was clearly set down, namely, that our Ceremonies are not imposed, or observed, as proper, essential and necessary parts of God's worship.

But 1, If this had been a clear explication, yet seeing we meet with it, and handle it in a hundred several places, before, and after, little reason had the Rejoinder to suspect advantageous craft, in passing by the same terms in this one place. 2. Ther is no clearness at all in heaping up terms, without any explication of them. 3. When these terms, proper, essential, necessary worship are now expounded, by the Rejoinder to mean nothing else but worship specially commanded of God, the sense is so absurd, that it was for his advantage, if they were omitted. For what answer is this: men appointing Ceremonies of their own making, do not say that they are specially appointed of God?

2. The argument was thus formed by the Repl. Those Ceremonies, which have the kind, nature, and definition of worship belonging to them, so that they want nothing but a right author, to make them true worship, those are in their imposition and use, worship, and for want of a right author, false worship. But our Ceremonies are •uche. Ergo. Here the Rejoinder first complaineth again, that the term Real. is left out of the assumption, into which it was put by the Def. But 1. who gave license to the Def. for to put new terms into our arguments? It is not true, that he put any such term into the assumption, but only mentioned in the title of this section. 3. Except such a ridiculous sense be put upon this term Real, as was even now observed, of prop•r essential, ne•essarie, it may be understood both in the proposition, and in the the assumption also. For if the kind, nature, and d•finition of worship do agree to our Ceremonies then they are not only verbal worship, in some fashion of speech (as the Rejoinder distinguisheth, but real worship.

3. Upon occasion of that scorn which was cast on the authors of this argument, viz. that this learning never saw print before, as the Def. thinketh, Mr. Bradshaw was named, as a man not to be slighted for his learning, who had long since put in print, without receyving any printed answer, unto it, or the book wherein it was contained. To this diverse things are rejoined, not worthy any answer, but that they tend to the disgrace of a godly learned man, whose memory is worthy of all honor. 1. Mr. Bradshaw is ranked among discontented persons. Which imputation if it be understood of distentment for want of preferment, or great living, could hardly have lighted upon any man in England, whose course and conversation would more beat it off then Mr. Bradshaws did, in the consciences of all indifferent men that knew him.

2. His tracts of indifferency, and worship are styled little Pamphlets, such as do creep in the dark, and are hard to be seen of men that walked by day light. This is (up and down) the language of great prelates, when Goliath-like, they confute their adversaries with scorning of their little stature, and ignoble state. But the Def. or Rejoinder might have put that little pamphlet into the belly of a whale, by setting it forth with a large confutation, in folio, and so also have helped it from creeping, to some kind of riding on horseback.

Neither is it harder for day-light men, to see such treatises, though thrust by their command into dark corners, then it is to open their mouths for to ask after them, and then their eyes to look on them. Howsoever, if this be a sufficient answer, then what shall become of many little books for instruction, and help, dispersed by good men among the Papists, where public authority doeth make thē to keep thē selves in a little cōpass, & to creep in the dark, for fear of being apprehēded by the inquisitours day-light walkers? Mr. Bradshaw was made for accurate, short, & mere logical fashion of writing. So much appeareth out of other treatises of his: as that of Justification. For to have drawn forth him unto large wordy discourses, it had been as hard, as to confine wordy men, unto the accurateness of mere logical dealing.

3. Because the learning of this argument was derided by a Bishop, the Repl. doubted not to aequal Mr. Bradshaw, for his skill in framing of an argument, unto any of the Bishops. To which the Rej. answereth, that this is no more praise to him, thē it is for a Carpenters boy, to drive a pin as well as his Master. Which might be admitted for true, if there be any Bishop, that may in this kind of learning be Magister ejus. Howsoever, it is not to the purpose, except the Master carpenter, may deride his boy for driving a pin, which is as well driven as he himself can drive any.

4. The Rejoined. raiseth up a report, without showing from whom he received it, that Mr. Bradshaw reversed his own opinion of things indifferent. Which until it be some other way confirmed, then by an adversaries bare telling, and that in a humor of disgracing his person, it must be accounted a mere tale. But he had good reason to reverse his opinion (saith the Rejoinder) because against all reason and sense, he resolved that there is nothing indifferent.

If this were so as it is related, reason would persuade to some recantation. But it is only the Rejoinder his telling again, without any show of proof.

I, for my part, can find no such words in Mr. Bradshawe his treatise, neither anything from whence such a raw sentence may be reasonably collected. He concludeth in deed cap. 3. that there is no absolute indifferent thing. 1. e. evereway, as well in order of nature, as of morallitie. He affirmed also cap. 7. there is nothing actua^lie indifferent, which is not potentially good or evil, and cap. 8. there is no action of man's will so indifferent, but the doing thereof, by some circumstances, may be evil. Ther is no action that a man can do, by the power of his will, that is merely and absolutely indifferent. These passages come the nearest to that which is here fathered upon the treatise: in all which this crudity appeareth not: there is nothing indifferent. Nay the harshest of these assertions, may be found not only in little Pamphlets made by Carpenters boys, against learning and sense, but in great volumes, written by those that go for very learned, and sensible in such matters as this is. Thomas Aquinas, in the great book, called his Sum, prima secundae, q. 18. ar. 9. hath this conclusion: It must needs be that every individual act of man (proceeding from deliberate reason) is either good or bad. And all (or almost all) those which have written upon that place, do confirm, and defend the same, who yet were men, that in questions of such a nature, did not usually write against all learning and sense.

4. At length, we have leave given, to examine the Argument itself: but with this remembrance, that is not like to be very sound, which all this while came into no man's head, till Mr. Bradshaw rise up. But who told the Rejoinder that it never came into any man's head before? though if that were true, the soundness may be likely enough.

Many reasons have been in other men's heads, which never came to the knowledge of our Def. and Rejoinder. And he is immediately told, that it is for substance in everyone of our Divines, which hath written of worship: because they all, teaching that the common nature of worship required no more, then that it hath the honoring of God for the direct end of it, they add, that if this be according to God's commandment, it is true worship, if not, false. And the Def. was urged to show one instance to the contrary. The Rejoinder is made, 1. by repeating over the empty terms, of in itself proper, essential, real, necessary, etc. Which have been so often discovered to be nothing but terms, that it were an idle tedious buisnesse, for to insist upon them again. Yet some few things may be observed, as proper to this place.

First we are told here, that it is essential to proper essential worship, be it true or false, that it tend of itself, and immediately, to the honor of God. So then we have the common nature of proper worship, as it is common to true and false worship. Now add unto this that which is added, pag. 125.126. that this worship, if it be required of God, is true, if not, false. Now this being granted, our whole Argument is granted, so far as it concerneth proper worship. For by this confession of the Rejoinder it is plain, that the institution of God doeth not make a thing proper worship, but only true proper worship, and the want of it doeth make proper worship false.

And this is all that we intend in this Argument, for which also we are twitted with new learning by the Def. pag. 185. where also he affirmeth that God's institution doeth distinguish essential worship from accidental, and therein he is maintained by the Rejoinder as by and by we shall see.

But how can these things stand together God's institution is first the specifical difference, whereby essential worship is distinguished from accidental, and yet the specifical difference also whereby true essential worship is distinguished from false? Can any one thing be a specifical form of diverse effects, or difference of diverse subordinate things, such as essential, and true essential worship are? Can there be ore and the same difference, betwixt a living and a lifeless creature, and also betwixt a reasonable and unreasonable living creature.

It is in the second place observable, how the Rejoinder seeketh to convey, or (to speak plainly) steal away from us, that which he had given. Divines (saith he) do distinguish proper worship, from that which is after a sort so called, by immediate end, and per se.

Be it so: this doeth not contradict any thing here in question: and it hath been expounded before, in the head of worship. The Divines of Saxony, and Wittenberge, Vrsin also, and Zanchi are alleged for the same purpose, 1. e. nothing to the purpose, Of Vrsin and Zanchi, enough hath been spoken in the former section. As for the other, see how they agree.

It was required, that one of our Divines should be named, who handling the common place of worship, doeth not distinguish true worship from false, by this, that one is appointed of God, and the other not.

He bringeth in some Lutherans not fully consenting with our Divines, neither treating on any common place of worship, but only writing a brief confession, teaching a difference betwixt lawful rites of order, and proper worship, which we never doubted of. He taketh hold of those terms immediately, & of itself, by which (saith he) these divines distinguish proper worship from that which is after a sort so called.

But it is more probable of the places cited, that they rather distinguish worship (by those terms) from mere rites of order and decency, which they do never call worship, after a sort. Beside, of our Ceremonies, it hath been shown, that their immediate end, is to honor God: in which respect also, the Rej. himself ranketh them under the head of immediate worship.

As for per se, or of it self, it may mean also as much as ex opere operato, the mere work wrought. In which sense some Divines pronounce generally of all external worship, that of it self, and in it own nature, it doth not please God. Perkinse, in his Cases, lib. 2. cap. 6. Howsoever, to show how the authors of these confessions did not esteem significant Ceremonies Cross, Surplice etc. to be matters of lawful order, those words of the Wittenberge Confession do sufficiently declare. It is not lawful for Bishops, to thrust upon the Church, the Ceremonies of the old law, etc, where come in the words quoted by the Rejoinder and immediately after, these: Neither is it lawful, either to restore the old Ceremonies of the law, or to devize new, to shadow forth the truth already laid open, and brought to light, by the Gospel: as in the day light, to set up candles, to signify the light of the Gospel, or to carry banners and Crosses, to signify the victorie of Christ thorough the Cross. Of which sort is all the furniture of Massing attire.

Upon such grounds as these, the Rejoinder concludeth thus: Therefore the institution of God alone is that which maketh the same things to be worship truly, and really, which without such institution, were no such real worship, though done to the same ende, and in the same manner. But I know not how the term truly, and then again such worship came into the question. We stand upon this, that God's institution of worship, doeth make true worship, and deny only that it maketh that worship, which otherwise, or without such institution, were no worship at all. How can then the Rejoinder be excused in confounding true worship, with real worship in this conclusion? Now take away this intruded truly, and then let any man tell me, how this conclusion can be reconciled with those his principles of concerning worship, pag. 125? Any action done to the honoring of God immediately, and in that act itself, is proper immediate, external worship of God. If God requires it not, then that worship is false. And even now: such an act is proper worship of God, be it true or false. Proper and Real to him are all one: and yet granting some proper worship to be false (for lack of God's institution) he denieth it to be real worship, if it want God's institution: as if God's institution did make that real proper worship, which for want of that institution is false worship.

This wild conclusion is further confirmed by a reason out of Tilenus, which is answered before, in the head of Worship, and by one example out of Fenner, whom the Rejoinder is pleased to call our own Master. Where, I will not say, what kind of men may (by like reason) be proclaimed his own Masters, but only desire him to consider, what reason he had, to avouche, that to hold the Ceremonies unlawful, is a new tenet lately broached, contrary to that which was held in Queen Elizabeth's days, whenas he accounteth Mr. Fenner our Master in this doctrine, who had to do in the first infamous silencing of Ministers for Ceremonies, in the beginning of D. Whitgifts Domination? But what is that which is brought forth out of our own Master? Nothing but this: that after public worship, the people are to use a reverent gesture, as bowing down the head before the Minister. Whereupon the Rejoinder demandeth, whether this adoration be essential, necessary worship or no? and in what sense this respect of the Minister be by him called worship of God? To which I answer 1. that I do not find it by him called worship of God at all 2. that it were a great absurdity for him to call a respect of man, worship of God, as the Rejoinder doeth. 3. that the adoration spoken of Neh. 8.7. from whence he took that observation, was proper essential external worship. In this therefore nothing is found to purpose.

One observation is added further by the the Rejoinder, namely, that diverse of our Divines do make this part of the definition of proper worship, that it be according to the commandment of God. To which I answer, that such definitions are to be understood of true and lawful worship, even as those definitions of an oath, which require the true God to be sworn by, are to be taken of right and lawful oaths only, because swearing by false God's, is swearing, as all worshipping, of false God's, is worship, though both unlawful.

In the next place, answer is tendered to this reason of Mr. Br. The bare ratifying of the present use of anything, cannot make it true and lawful worship, if it had not before some nature of worship in the use of it. The force lieth in this, that bare ratifying or authorizing of anything to have that use which it had before without such authority, doeth not change the physical entitie, essence, or use of it, but only the authority, or legalitie of it. The instances brought by the Rejoinder to the contrary, may have some show, but have no force to that purpose. 1. The sole stamp of the King, makes that current money, which was not money at all before, but only used by way of bartery. In which comparison, he utterly mistaketh and varieth the quality wherein it consisteth. For on the one side, it standeth thus: If God should command and us to use our Ceremonies, after the same manner that we have used them, without his command, they should be parts of God's proper outward worship. On the other side it standeth thus: if the Kinge command that piece of metal to be used for current money, which before was not used so, but only for bartery, it should be current money. Here is no similitude, because no proportion of quality.

2. As the sole word of God, made living creatures of those that were not living, before, so saith the Rejoinder the sole institution of God, makes that action to be true worship, which was before no real worship at all, though used to the same ende, and in the same manner. But 1. the creating word of that which was not before in being, differs so much from that ratifying word which presupposeth the being of the thing ratified, that here is not so much as a show of proportion. 2. This is a direct contradiction to that which the Rejoinder teacheth, pag. 125. If any thing be done to the honoring of God immediately and of itself, which God requires not so to be done, it is proper immediate external false worship. For hence it immediately followeth, that nothing can be done, to the same ende with true proper worship, but it must be proper worship, either true, if it be required of God, or false, if not so required. 3. The place of Sacrifice, before God had determined the particular place, though used to the same ende, and in the same manner, was not in itself any part of real worship to God: and yet after God's determination, it was. I answer. There was a great difference in the manner, wherein the place determined (so as it was) ought to be used. For there was special mysteriall signification to be observed in the one, which was not in the other.

Otherwise, I see not what more real worship there was in Jacob's place of sacrificing at Bethel, upon God's special determination, Gen. 35. then in Abraham's sacrificing at Hebron, without any such special determination of God, Gen. 13.

When all other Essays fail, the Repl. himself is brought in as guilty of contradiction, because he affirmeth these two things: the institution of God doeth distinguish true worship from false: and yet it doeth not alter the common nature of worship. For (saith the Rejoinder) it is as if one should say: the reasonable soul doeth distinguish man from creatures that have not understanding: and yet it doeth not alter the common nature of the creature. But the Repl. had answered this before, if the Rejoinder would have attended unto his words, as they are by himself set down, pag. 189. alter the common nature of worship, that is, make that worship, which otherwise, being used to the same ende, and in the same manner, without God's institution, were no worship at all. In which words he plainly expressed, that by altering the common nature of worship, he meant nothing less, thē making true worship of false, but only creating or making the common essential nature of worship. And certain it is, that the reasonable soul (as it is reasonable) doeth not make the common essential nature of a living creature, for then there could be no living creature, without a reasonable soul as the Rejoinder affirmeth, there can be no proper worship, without God's appointment.

5. Against the Def. his invention of indifferent worship, it was excepted (to pass by repetitions) that no Scripture, Divines, or good reason doeth acknowledge any such worship. The ground is, because in Scripture, all worship is either approved as good, or condemned as evil: all Divines do distribute worship into true or false: and they have reason so to do. To this the Rejoinder opposeth nothing but the contrary assertion, grounded upon examples. 1. So far (saith he) as we may call the particularities of external disposition, in the manner of worship, respectively to their ende, worship, so far may we call them indifferent worship: as kneeling, standing, bowing, or prostration, the place, and hour of worshiping, singing of this or that Psalm.

I will not here write over again, that which hath been declared about these things in the head of Worship. But in brief thus: 1. The question is not, what this or that may be called, by a Rhetorical trope, but what it is in the nature of it. 2. Respect to the utmost remote ende, doeth no more make matters of order, time, and place, worship, thē it maketh worship of eating, & drinking, and whatsoever we do to the honor of God, 1. Cor. 10.31.3. In place, and hour, or in the election of one Psalm, before another, there can no worship be placed, except we will make one worship to be worshipped by another, when it is timed, placed, and chosen. 4. There is no special worship in one of the gestures named that is not in the other. Neither is any of these gestures so indifferent, as that it may be lawful, to forbid, or refuse any of them, generally, and for all occasions, nor yet so, as that by circumstances (without any law or canon) they may become necessary. These examples therefore serve not the turn they were brought for.

2. There is also (addeth the Rejoinder) an arbitrary choice of essential Divine worship, as when we will pray or read, etc. where in respect of this liberty of choice, the kind of worship is indifferent in some respect. Of which assertion I know not what to say: Necessary worship is in some respect indifferent. Certainly that respect must make a worship, distinct from that necessary worship whereof it is a respect: or else, as (by the Rejoinder his doctrine) all things in respect of their relation, are Ceremonies, and in respect of their utmost ende, worship, so all things, or at least all human actions, are also in some respect arbitrary and indifferent. There is no ende, or bottom in such reasons. The truth is, that this when which is here spoken of, is one and the same thing with hour which was mentioned in the former instance, and therefore needeth no new answer.

6. The Def. for proving of his assertion (that God's institution doeth difference necessary and essential worship, from indifferent and accidental) did bring in the instance of lambes for color unspotted, which was necessary and essential (as he affirmed) after the law, though before indifferent and accidental.

To this it was first answered, that this law of offering lambes for color unspotted, is nowhere exstant, and therefore that this instance was alleged either out of ignorance, or for want of due consideration. The Rejoinder being constrained to grant this exception to be just, turneth himself to those last words, either ignorance, or want of due consideration: and for them accuseth the Repl. of flying in the Def. his face, without Christian moderation. But if it be so great a crime, to impute either some ignorance or some inconsideratenesse (such as no man alive is wholly free from) unto the Def. and if this be unchristian flying in his face, I am sure the Rejoinder hath gone beyoynd the face and stabbed deeper into our Vitals, in many passages of his Rejoinder.

As succedaneall instances to the former, which was found failling, the Rejoinder bringeth in diverse, out of the Levitical, or Ceremonial law, which were arbitrary before the law, and necessarily essential after. To all which, the second answer to the failing instance, giveth direct satisfaction. As for those Rites, which are further alleged, out of the Legende of fabulous Rabbin's, by Mr. Ainsworth, and ratified by the Rejoinder we regard them no more, then the Popish leaden Legendes. Only the marginal conclusion out of these Instances is observable: The Repl. fallaciously supposeth, that all worship is only true, or false, not observing a subdivision of true worship, into substantial, and circumstantial.

For 1. what reason can he render, of that which he layeth upon the Repl. as if he had supposed all worship to be only true or false.

The Repl. never denied, but all worship is also good, or evil, internal, or external, natural, or instituted, etc.

2. The reason which he bringeth, is only from the subdivision of true worship. But that doeth not hinder a superdivision, or aequidivision, into common, and special, Ecclesiastical, and domestical, as Mr. Perkinse divideth in the place before cited. 3. That division into substantial, and accidental, cannot possibly (with any reason) be more applied unto true than false worship, except the Rejoinder will say, that no false worship is either substantial, or accidental.

The seconde answer to the former instance (belonging to all those by the Rejoinder adjoined) is, that i• before the law, the same worship had been performed, with the same mind, that is, in the same manner, and to the same ende, it had been as essential worship, as after, though not so true, and lawful.

The Rejoinder here first, observeth a contradiction to that which was formerly said sect. 6. worship doeth not vary, according to men's opinion. But if he understand the matter well, he shall find both sayings well to agree. For though the want of some opinion doeth not vary the nature of worship, so as that the absence of this or that opinion, doeth make any external worship, not essential: and yet it doeth so vary the nature of worship, as that the presence of some opinion, doeth (as an efficient, not as a formal cause) make some external act essential worship. The Rejoinder his second observation is, that our Ceremonies are hereby discharged from will worship, and superstition, except it can be proved, the imposers, or users of them, do hold, that God is better pleased with them, then without them, in themselves, or that they are as pleasing to him, as if he had commanded them.

The consequence of which hereby conclusion, no logician in the world can make good. Yet (taking out in themselves, as an intrusion) all the consequent part may be maintained. For if there be anymore good h•lde in the imposing and observing of them, then in the omitting of them, then God is better pleased with them, then without them. And that which is lawfully and justly commanded by men authorized thereto, is as pleasing to God as if he had commanded it. Nay •t must be received, as commanded of God himself.

7. It was also by the Repl. brought into the Def. his remembrance, that matter, and form do usually make up the essence of things, and that to instituted means, a proper ende is also required, but a right efficient cause not so. About this, the Rejoinder showeth himself perplexed. For 1. he answereth, that this notwithstanding, actions have as it were matter, form and essence of accidental, though not of essential worship.

Where he manifestly separateth the essence of worship, from essential worship, as if the essence of a man could exist without an essential man, 2. He gathereth from that which was said of respect to the ende, in institutions, that thereby their assertiō, is cleared: viz. that Cer. respecting the honor of God mediately, are not properly parts of Divine worship. As if here had been any mention or questiō, of mediately, or immediately, proper, or improper, and not only of essential. But for so much as the Rejoinder would needs here cite D. Abbot, for his term immediately, I would desire him to consider of the whole sentence in that place pronounced by him, viz. Def. of Mr. Perk. pag. 844. Order and comeliness (saith the popish Bishop) is some part of God's worship. But (saith D. Abbot.) Who taught him this deep point of Philosophy, that an accident is a part of the subject, that the beauty, or comeliness of the body is a part of the body? Order and comeliness properly and immediately respect men, and therefore can be no parts of the worship of God. If this be not a plain refuting of the Def. and the Rejoinder their assertion, then none is attempted in all the Reply.

3. He in like manner concludeth, that every respect of the honor of God, doeth not make a thing to be properly religious worship. As if the Repl. had ever spoken, or dreamt of such a fantasy, except it were in the Rejoinder his name! His words are: beside the respect of the ende, is also required institution of means to an ende. What Paracelsian can draw so wild an assertion, from such a ground as this?

8. It was (in the last place) demanded, whether, if the Temple of Jerusalem had been built, with institution of all the appurtenances, sacrifices, and observances, there used, without any Commandment of God, according as they were by his appointment, whether (saith the Repl.) they had not been essential false worship, erected to God? The Rejoinder answereth: Yes no doubt, if we may call (as the manner is) essential disworship, essential false worship: either in respect of the things themselves, or in the opinion conceyved in their use. Now mark (all readers that have sense) how this Rejoinder (here in the conclusion of all) is constrained to confess, that to be true, which he hath hitherto striven against as false. 1. The Repl. his assertion was, that God's institution doeth make that worship, which being used in the same manner and to the same ende, were otherwise no worship, or (as it pleaseth the Def. and Rejoinder to speak) no essential worship? The Rejoyn-hitherto hath contended against this, as against a great error.

Now in the winding up of the whole Argument, he confesseth, that some essential worship may be, without any institution of God. Certainly, if this be so, then the institution of God, is not required to essential worship, neither is it of the essence of essential worship, that it be instituted of God. 2. He affirmed before, pag, 125. that proper immediate, (or essential) worship are only such things as God hath to that ende ordained Yet here he confesseth, that essential worship may be without any command of God. 3. The Rejoinder before, made essential and accidental worship to be a subdivision of true worship. Now he confesseth, that there is an essential worship under the head of false worship. 4. He acknowledgeth, that in all the former senseless assertions, he did not speak, as the manner of speech is.

That was therefore against the manner of speech, which the Def. & he used before. 5. He granteth some worship to be essential, in respect of the things themselves, separated from men's opinion. Yet hitherto, he would have made us believe, that opinion did vary the nature of worship, as sect. 6. If this be not a plain yielding, and granting of the whole Argument, there can be none, save only in plain terms, to say, I yield.

SECT. 10.11.12.13.14.

The former argument being (though demonstrative) yet to the Def. his apprehension new, was derided as new learning: these following are excused from that censure, as being more popular, and seeming more fadomable. Of which it is to be observed, that most of them are fetcht out of incertaine papiers, under the name of Mr. Hy. and others, upon the Def. his credit: wherein, what aequall dealing hath been used, it is very suspicious to any judicious reader, and some of those others, (for Mr. Hy. is past writing to) being asked, have testified, that in diverse passages they are much abused. Yet even these relics of Arguments are defensible.

1. The first is: because they are imposed to breed an opinion of holiness, by Mr. Hookers doctrine and therefore, as parts of God's worship. To which the Def. answereth, that it is no meant of operative holiness, either by infusion, or inhaesion, but only significative. Whence he concludeth, a perverse purpose of calumniation: and the Rejoinder (adding another distinction, betwixt holiness in them, and in the users of them) maketh mention also of dotage. But 1. the Def. his distinction is vain: because even significative holiness is also a part of God's worship. Otherwise some holiness must be feigned, which having no other immediate ende but that which directly and immediately tend to the honoring of God, is no part of his honor. The Rejoinder also is vain in limiting the matter to holiness in them.

For those things which are instituted to that immediate ende only, that they may breed an opinion of holiness, and so holiness, in others, do (in all reason) deserve the opinion of holiness some way causal, or operative in themselves: because all breeding is causing, or working, 1. e. operative.

It was also observed by the Repl. (only in a parenthesis, by the way) that holiness either by infusion or inhaesion, were unreasonable by the Defend. disjoined.

This the Rejoinder excepteth against, and saith, in those terms there is no more disjunction, then in these love or charity, Magistrates, or Governors.

But he forgotte the proper English note of disjunction, either, or.

Where did he ever read such a phrase: either love, or charity, either Magistrates, or Governors?

It was also replied, that Mr. Hooker attributed operative holiness to the Cross, in allowing all that the Fathers ascribed to it. The Rejoinder his only material exception is, that the instance was here not of the Cross, but of the Surplice. Yet the question is of our Ceremonies, which is as well concluded from one, as another, and the Rejoinder himself, even now, spoke of holiness in them, as of many, not in it, as of one Ceremony only.

Neither is there anymore holiness in one, then in the other, if both be only significative.

The Repl. further affirmed, that Mr. Hooker spoke of reverence to be signified towards the Ceremonies. To which is rejoined I know not what. But let Mr. Hookers words, going before those nakedly cited by the Def. and Rejoinder, be considered. The wise man could not mention so much as the garments of Holiness, but with singul^r reverence, and it will be evident, whereto he required reverence.

In the last place, Mr. Hookers opinion is slighted, as private. Whereas all know, that he is in our Ceremonial controversies, of as public note, and approbation, as Bellamine in any Popish.

2. The second reason being slēderly propounded by the Def. out of Mr. Hy. his mangled manuscript, was thus by the Repl. distinctly explained: A holy assembly of Spiritual Lord's, and their Assistants, if they be truly holy, and spiritual in their authority, and in the exercise of it, will appoint no Ceremony but holy: and by the observance of the said Ceremonies, have some spiritual honor redounding unto themselves: because the virtue which is found in any effect, doeth redounde always to the praise of the cause. Of this argument, the Rejoinder pronounceth, that it is a pouring out of sal• scurrilitie, to the very lees, a scornful jest, ascoffing, a spiteful jest, a vagrant thing, the very noting whereof is answer enough. Now how should a man deal with such disputers?

The Def. brought this Argument out of unknowen papers, into a public book, and answered it with sharp words. The Repl. only shown the force of it: and for that, he is set upon a fresh with new words, like swords and daggars. Could they neither suffer this reason to sleep in the dark, nor endure any light of explanation should be set by it?

And what fault can be found with the repeating of those titles, which the Prelates in Convocation take to themselves, or in drawing a conclusion from them?

In the second place, our Rejoinder undertaketh to give a real answer to this reason. To which purpose, 1. he denieth that our Ceremonies are of the institution of the Convocation-house. And yet the same Rejoinder in answer to the Repl. his preface. pag. 61. complaineth of us, for infringing the liberty of the Church in her Convocation, touching the appointment of external Rites, or Ceremon. And pag. 71. as in diverse other places, he telleth us that the Convocation house maketh and establisheth Canons upon & with the Kings Commission, and allowance.

They are the words also of the Parliament, set down pag. 70. that the Clergy of England made the Canons. Neither can any man doubt of this, that have but looked on the book of Canons. The ratification of such things by Civil authority, doeth no more take the institution of them from the Clergy, then the like ratification of any point in true worship, doeth take the institution of it from God and Christ. 2. He denieth the consequence: because a holy assembly may ordain them, and yet not make them holy.

But it is manifest, that a holy assembly, as it is such, gathered together in the holy name of Christ, as their efficient, and final cause, cannot but put a holy form upon their ordinances. Qualis causa, tale effectum.

3. His third answer is that these Ceremonies may be called holy, because, they are used in holy actions. Which is just so, as a pesse, hassok, or cushin may be called holy, because it is used to kneel upon, in the holy act of prayer. But instituted significant Ceremonies are evidently of another holiness, to all that do not of purpose shut their eyes.

4. The Repl. (after the Def.) goeth about to prove that the Convocation may be called a sacred Synod, and holy in regard of their function. Which is so far from being denied by us (upon the supposition of the lawfulness of such a function, as they take upon them) that it is the ground of our reason, to prove their ordinances holy. So that the Rejoinder might (in this place) have spared those sweet words of his: stomach, without wit, or learning: these men say (in effect) to all other men, stand back, I am holier then thou, they are censorious, and uncharitable. Yet the Repl. could not consent, that our Convocations should be so accounted holy as Churches instituted of Christ, and gathered for true holy worship: because neither of these do agree to our Convocation. Heerupon the Rejoinder (having nothing to say that was pertinent) speaketh something of right Ecclesiastical Synods, accuseth the Separatists with Mr. Jacob, and lastly affirmeth our Convocations to be gathered for a special duty of God's service, though he will not tell us, what it is, and confesseth, that little good is sometimes (he might have said at any time) done at their meetings. Which kind of answering I leave to the judgment of any reader.

3. A third reason, feched out of M. Hy. his papers, is, that Cross and Surplice are set apart from civil uses, and appropriated unto the acts of religion in God's service. To which the Def. answered, by equal comparison of Pulpit-cloth, Communion cup, and place of meeting in like manner appropriated. Wherupon the Repl. was, in general, that the Def. did well understand what was meant by appropriation. This put the Rejoinder into a passion, expressed by many words: a pretty sleight, for that which cannot be defended, by those which are pusled and toiled, a fim ⟨⟩, lent by Mr. Jacob, a mere shift, proceeding out of an haughty desire of defending that which hath been once spoken. And this is all that I find rejoined to that passage. To which I say nothing.

A reason was rendered of the former assertion: because a Pulpit-cloth Communion-cup, and Meeting-place are only civil, being taken from the ordinary civil customs of men. To which the Rejoinder opposeth, that no civil man will say, that they are only civil in their application: Which is very true. Nor will any Grammarian say, that good Hebrew, Greek, or Latin, are only gramaticall in their application, because they are applied to the expressing of all kind of truths and falsehoods: and yet they are only gramaticall etimologie and syntaxe. No Naturalist will say, that the earth and air are only natural in application, and yet they are only natural beinges.

It was further added, that clothes, cups, meeting places etc. are of the same use out of God's service, that they are in it.

This is occasion of admiration, and exclamation to the Rejoinder. But he might have considered, that the immediate ende of a clothe, is to cover; of a cup, to drink out; of meeting places, to meet in: and then where is the strangeness of this assertion? Is there not the same immediate use of a man's eyes, in reading one book, as another, of a man's ears, in hearing one voice, and another, how soever the subject seen, or heard, may differ in nature or kind.

A distinction was likewise used, betwixt appropriation of this or that individual, and of the kind. To this it is rejoined, 1. that the individualls are nevertheless appropriated. Which is not so: because appropriation of the kind and individual both, is more then of the individual alone. Individuals may be extrinsically, & accidentally appropriated, the kind remaining intrinsically common, & indifferent. 2. That some individuals (without all their kind) have been appropriated to holy uses. Of which no man doubteth: because one individual may be so used, without other. But is there therefore no difference, betwixt extrinsic, accidental appropriation of one Levite to the Ministry, and the whole tribe? 3. Not all kind of linen garments, or crosses are appropriated to religious uses. As if the question were of linen garments simply, though they were used without any such institution as a Surplice hath, only for the natural conveniency of it, or of crossing the fingers, upon occasion, to drive away flies, that come cross upon a man's face. There was (in the last place) mention made of the significancie of our Ceremonies, which maketh them in their intrinsical nature (as such) without any further expectation of occasional application, to be proper to religion. But of this our Rej. would not hear, in this place. Let it therefore pass to the next chapter.

4. A fourth confirmation wholly dependeth on Matth. 15. Where the Def. would have it, that our Savior condemneth not the act of washing (that is saith the Rej.) the monitorie significant sign of washing, used by the Pharisees, but their intention, & opinion, in attributing legal and operative sanctity, to that their own invention. Now concerning monitorie significancie, enough hath been spoken, in the head of Ceremonies, and it remaineth to be discussed in the following chapter.

For the present, it was first noted by the Repl. that some intention and opinion of holiness cleaveth to our Ceremonies. This is denied by the Rej. and yet in his whole dispute, he maketh them worship, though accidental, arbitrary, and improper. Neither can any man impose a double or treble religious Ceremony without intention and opinion of some holiness belonging to it, more then to that which is not so religious.

It was in the second place observed, that more holiness was attributed to those washings, then is by many among us to the cross, cannot be proved out of the text, there being no one circumstance in it, which may not fitly be applied to our Ceremonies. To which the Rej. saith 1. that those are blind & superstitious persons, which attribute such things to the Cross, not the Church imposing. Just as Bellarmino, in the place by and by to be cited, answereth Calvin. about the same matter: If there be anymore rude among hir Catholics, we hold them worthy to be corrected. But are not our blind Protestants, and those rude Papists, hardened in their superstition, by the imposing & urging of those things which they superstitiously dote on?

The Pharisees (addeth the Rej.) were so strongly conceyted of this washing, that they thought, without it, the very creatures of God should defile them. But that of the very creatures defiling, is not in the text: It is but probablie collected out of our Savior's following discourse, that they esteemed some defiling to follow upō the eating of the creature, not as it was a creature, but as it was so used against the tradition of their Elders. And are there not many to be found in England, that their very Baptism is deficient, insufficient, and so defiled: if it want the Cross?

For further answer, it was alleged by the Repl. that not only Calvin in Mat. 15. but also Bellarmino himself (de eff. Sacr. l. 2. cap. 32.) saith, that the Pharisees washing was condemned as vain, and unprofitable, setting aside, intention, and opinion of legal, operative holiness. The Rejoinder answering first for Bellarmine, saith he is abused: because (forsooth) he speaks that falsely, to defend the Popish Ceremonies. As if it were not the common notion of all Christians, that vain and unprofitable Ceremonies are to be condemned, or as if Bellarmine alone said this! or as if this could defend the Popish Ceremonies, which are more easily defended from any other charge, then they can be from this, that they are vain and unprofitable.

Who would have thought, that D.B. would defend vain and unprofitable Ceremonies, in God's solemn worship? But Chemnitz (saith he) observes, that Christ condemned not these washings simply as profane fopperies, nor as simply unlawful, but in respect of religion placed in them. Not simply profane fopperies, that is, void of all show from Scripture, or reason, nor simply unlawful, if the acts in themselves be considered or abstracted from all relations by institution added unto them: but in respect of religion placed in them, 1. e. superstition adjoined unto them. Now there is superstitio not only pernicious, but also vain, and superfluous. Filucius, tract. 24. cap. 2. And chemnitius, in the same place affirmeth, the Pharisees washings to have been condemned, for that (notwithstanding their vanity; and want of Divine institution) they were made some part of God's worship.

As for Calvin, the Rej. doeth not deny, but that passage alleged is found in the place, the inventing of Ceremonies was an idle vanity, before the high opinion of Religion was added unto it. Yet (saith he) 1. he cleareth our Ceremonies, which was cast upon the Jewish superstitious washings. From some of that blame, (it may be granted) but not from all. For then those words (which the Rejoinder confesseth him to set down) should have bē a contradiction to the other. 2. This shread (added he) is falsely alleged as touching the intention. And why so I pray?

Because (forsooth) Calvin's meaning was, that to devize new washing, to the like ende, and with the like opinion of them, as of those which God had set, wa of idle vanity.

But if this were his meaning, how can that meaning agree with the meaning of these words: It was of idle vanity before the high opinion of Religion was added unto it?

Was there any higher opinion of Religion added unto those washings, thē to the washings which God had set? Extremitie drives men to hard shifts.

For the fuller clearing of this reason, that idle and vain or superfluous worship is condemned by Christ, Mat. 15. let these testimonies, and reasons be well considered.

The Priests had brought in many Novelties, though Moses with great terror had threatened them not to ad anything, of which number of additions were those things of washing. There was a double fault for the innovation it self was not a slight metter and then this, that they stood more upon those observations of their own then they did on the Commandments of God. 1. That first offense Christ doeth not presently reprove them for saying it was a frivolous and superfluous, thing, lest they should have been inflamed.

Another cause for which he despised these washings was their superstition. The Pharisees had put in the said washings, not for any natural and civil decentie or cleanness, but as pertaining to religion, who so did contemn thē were judged to offend against God's worship, and who so did observe them seemed chiefly to regard, God's worship in them. But this was in no wise lawful for them to do who were so straitly charged of God, Deut. 4. that they should add nothing. For this Christ rejected these washings as superstitious, which reason Mat. 15. ch. intimates when he saith: Every plant which my heavenly Father hath not planted, shall be rooted out. And Marc. ch. 7. In vain do they worship me teaching the Doctrines, and praecepts of men, &c. Such things as men set up of themselves against any Commandment of God.

In Mat. 15. Marc. 7. the Commandments of men do mean such Commandments which conduce nothing at all to piety, as those Superfluous washings.

5. In the fifth place, another reason (or charge) was brought out of Mr. Hy. his papers, that the Ceremonies imposed, are (for their use and practice) preferred before principal parts of God's worship: because this is the Pralats Canons: wear a Surplice, or preach not: Cross, or baptize not. This the Def. accused of dull Sophistry: because by this means, only an orderly discreet preacher is preferred before one that is factious and exorbitant. Of this base Bonnerly speech, the Repl. shown his just detestation. For which he is censured by the Rejoinder of casting it out of the mouth of his stomach, of malice, intemperat railings, and a furious spirit. All which I leave to the readers judgment. Only this I observe, that he would excuse all or most of the Prelates, from willing silencing any able and godly ministers for omission of our Cerremonies, and doeth absolutely deny, that the Def. ever silenced any Minister (willingly or unwillingly (for only omission of Ceremonies. Concerning which terms (willingly, and only omission) some light of explication were needful. For only omission of Cross, or Surplice, by oversight, or other accident, the Pope himself will not silence a Priest, as all Popish Divines tell us, in affirming that to be no mortal sin. And how those which make Canons for silencing upon purposed continued omission, and execute the same partly by themselves, and partly by their instruments, can be said to do it unwillingly, this requireth interpretation, which will certainly be found tardy. For clearing of this charge, from the imputation of dull Sophistry, the Repl. first propounded it in this manner: an able godly Minister without the use of these Ceremonies, is not suffered in the Ministry, whereas an unable & ungodly one, with the use of them, is suffered: therefore they are praeferrred before main things: Upon this, the Rejoinder 1. observeth, that from hence doeth not follow that conclusion: therefore our Ceremonies are made parts of God's worship. As if this conclusion were once named by Mr. Hy. or by the Def. in this charge.

If he will make it supposed, he must show us Mr. Hy. his concealed papers for the proof of that supposition. He addeth 2. that all Prelates are to be charged with this practice: and that they have no such power for depriving of bad, as they have for depriving of good Ministers. To which I answer, the question is not here of all, but of that which standeth by our Canons, and Canonical practice. Yet neither any authors, nor any defenders of the Canons, can be excused from partaking in this practice, no not the Rejoinder himself. And as for those Prelates, which have great power to do evil, and little, or none, to do good (or which is all one, power effectually to hinder good, and not evil) they have a very dangerous standing, dangerous (I say) as well for others, as for their own selves. Yet, when our Prelates procured that authority of doing evil, they might as easily, and more lawfully have procured the other, of doing good: not to say, that none of them do so much for reforming or removing of bad Ministers, as is in their power to do, either by themselves, or by other means. Nay is it not known, how such kind of cattle are not only borne with, but borne up by the Prelates in bad causes?

The third Rej. is of a calumniation, because some inconformable Ministers are suffered, and some unable, and ungodly deprived. But 1. this calumniation concerning some inconformable suffered for a time, extraordinarie, besides, nay against Canonical order. 2. He can scarce name one, that he hath known deprived for that he was unable. 3. The Turks and Infidels would cashier their Priests for some ungodliness. What a poor rejoinder is this?

A fourth consideration is, that a far less offense defended, is more punishable then a greater confessed, and that certain evils, in themselves lesser, may do more hurt, then others in themselves greater. Which consideratiō, if it be applied to the purpose, will appear in the proper colors: If a Minister confess himself unable and ungodly, he is not so punishable, as he that defendeth the Ceremonies are not to be used. The refusing of our controverted Ceremonies, may do more hurt, then an unable and ungodly generation of Ministers conforming. In that which is further added, under the title of lastly I find nothing but words & assertions, without backing reasons. Valeant igitur, quantum valere possunt.

The same charge was (in the second place) thus framed, by the Repl. Though there cannot be found able and discreet conformable Ministers, enough to supply all the Parishes of England, yet many of godly men are shut out of the Ministry for unconformitie. Therefore Conformitie is praeferr'd before the main duties of God's worship. Heer the Rej. having little to say, setteth notwithstanding two colors on the matter. 1. That the consequence is not simply true, but only that they conceive the non-conformity may, by consequence, be a greater hurt, then an able and godly Ministry, in such places, as want it, would recompense. As if this crying sin were only their conceit, not their practice, or that their conceits could make this sin no sin! or that the salvation of many thousands of souls, could not recompense the hurt that would come upon the refusing of human Ceremonies? What is this other then daubing rotten walls with untempered mortar.

His second color is, that non-conformitans are no less blameable, who had rather have no worship, then conformity. Which is as much as if he should say, that whosoever will not sin for God's glory, doeth as much offend, as he that will not suffer God to be glorified by those which will not to that ende be content to sin against his conscience.

Because this reason was accused of dullnesse, it was noted (by the way) that every Plowman, being a good Christian, did usually make it in this blunt manner, against the Prelates proceedings, and that the Repl. (being, as it seemeth first brought up among such plain people) had from his childhood took it to be unanswerable. Heerupon, the Rej. 1. answereth the blunt argument, with this sharpness: It is like as if one should say, that God, admitting no man to the Priesthood with bodily blemish, did therefore praeferre bodily perfection before spiritual. Wherein, he deceyveth him•elf, & others much, whether he respecteth the first explication of this reason, or the second. For according to the first, it must be affirmed, that God would suffer men blemished in their bodies, to be priests, though they had no spiritual fitness for that office. And according to the second, he should have said, that God having otherwise to furnish the Priesthood, according to a superior law, which he might not of his will dispence with, did notwithstanding exclude some of those which that law did allow. But both these assertious are too absurd for the Rejoinder to own.

His second note is of Plowmen, and Children, that they are not the best Logicians. Which though it be true, yet is nothing to the purpose: because many Plowmen have good natural logic, to reason withal. Otherwise they did very inconsiderately, who vented so good reasons under the title of the prayer, and complaint of the Ploughman, as in M^r. Fox is to be seen, Edw. 3. among which reasons (a remarkable thing) this very slighted argument is one. For so are the words: O Lord, for breaking of thy law, the Prelates will set men penance, or pardon them, and maintain them, as oft as they trepasse. But Lord, if a man once break their laws, or speak against them he may do penance but once, and after be burnt.

The sum of which, M^r. Fox, in the margent, thus gathereth: The breaking of the Popes law is more punished, then the breaking of God's law. And as for children, I am persuaded, that D.B. himself, had some trueths so evident unto him, that by no contrary show of logic they could ever be wrunge out of him. Sure I am that Timothy, knowing the Scriptures from a child, had many such.

Neither was there mention made either of plowmen or children, But only to show the evidence of this truth, not the logical Demonstration of it.

That which was added, by way of limitation, to the name of a plowman, namely, that it was understood of such a plowman, as is also a good Christian, is very bitterly, and yet as very unreasonable carped at by the Rejoinder as savouring strongly of that spirit of Separation, which hath been hunted after in the ch•se of inconformitie. For (saith the Rejoinder if any will believe all his conceytes) this shows, that with these men the adversaries of Ceremonies and Bishops are the only good Christians.

Which is a strange strain, to come from D. B. who both hath been an unconformist, and since he hath changed that title, cannot but know, that sundry unconformists have carried themselves towards himself, in all respects, as toward a good Christian. And what strong savor is in this: every plowman that is a good Christian doeth unsua•lie make this Argument. Doeth he imagine, that only those plowmen, that are professed adversaries to Ceremonies and Bishops, do• make it? Nay he knoweth, that many, and many of those that could otherwise well digest both, yet do apprehend this course of Bishops silencing Ministers for such Ceremonies is ungodly, and Antichristian. If he did not know so much, yet he cannot be ignorant, that the word here interposed by the Repl. for limitation, usually, doeth except some more ignorant, or less attentive good Christians. And I doubt not, but the Rejoinder will affirm, that every good conforming Minister in England, doth usually account them for scismatickes that condemn the Ceremonies: yet I would not thence conclude, that with him, those of that judgment are the only good Ministers. For there is as much sin against charity, in rash accusing others of uncharitableness, as there is in being uncharitable: of which fault, the Rejoinder can never clear this affected passage, which he in opposition let fall from him.

For overthrow of the former reason, an instance was brought in by the Def. taken from a Chancellor, who may (saith he) put out of Commission him that refused to sit in the place appointed, without praeferring that place to the Kings service. To this the Repl. 1. answered, that no wise Chancellor, would, for his own pleasure, or for the circumstance of a place easily change, or put out of Commissiō a grave wise mā, whē another like unto him cannot be found. These last words another like unto him cannot be found, are cached up by the Rejoinder and under the show or sound of them, the Inconformists are by him tossed (as it were) in a blancket, as being of a high strain, beyond all other men, in their own persuasion etc. But he might have considered (if sinister affection had not hidden it from him) that the case immediately going before this answer, was of shutting out able godly Ministers for inconformitie, when there cannot be found able and fit conformable Ministers enough. Wherupon is inferred, that the comparison of the L. Chancellor will not help the Def. in this case.

Now what kind of strain is this then in the Rejoinder to conceal the case, and stretch the words as it were with his teeth, unto such a strange odious meaning of so witless a brag. Yet if there had been no such dependence of these words upon that case, they might be well defended, as understood of an absolute comparison (either for ability, or piety) but in relation to this or that people; from whom such Mininisters are sometime plucked away by violence, whose like, in regard of that people (which have been much edified by them, and more inwardly known, and also (upon good ground) affected unto them, then they can suddenly unto any other) cannot be found.

Otherwise, D. Burgess, in his Apology (towards the conclusion) would not have alleged against the silencing of himself, and others like him, that those (at the least) should succeed thē, which were not so well acquainted with the condition of their sheep. It might be also added, that though another like might be found, yet it is not in the power of that L. Chancellor, or the Bishop to find, bring, & place him in the same Commission, because (for the succession) he must depend upon the Patrons pleasure, not limited to another like the predecessor.

But that this wresting of the Replier his words, was affected (in some sort against conscience) it may appear by this, that no man will surmize, the Repl. to think, that to no unconformable Minister a Peer may be found: because it is to be supposed (at the least) that another unconformable one may not only be equal, but also superior unto him in all absolute perfection.

It was also observed, for answer to this instance of a L. Chancellor, that about the circumstance of place, for Commissioners to meet in, there can be no Conscience pretended, whereas in our Ceremonies, solemn oaths are offered, that nothing but conscience doeth keep us from them. The Rejoinder 1. opposeth, that this unlikenesse maketh, nothing to the question. And yet it showeth, that a Chancellor may in civil matters, where no conscience can be pretended, take more upon him without preferring, or comparing the matters, then a Bishop can, where Consciēce evidently withstandeth: because Cōsciēce is not to be vexed, except the matter be so great, that (in respect of God's glory) it cannot be neglected. He 2. opposeth, that many more of the Conformitans, are ready to take it s^r upon their oath, that nothing but conscience makes them conform. To which I say 1. that he who was immediately before, so curious in houlding to the question, should not presently have digressed from it: as the Rejoinder here doeth, in turning the comparison, which was made betwixt a L. Chancellor and a Bishop, in respect of a conceyted Commissioner, and a conscionable Minister about preferring one thing before another, into a new comparison, betwixt the consciences of Conformitants, & of those which refuse to conform. 2. Of that so, if the same meaning be kept on both sides, I much doubt.

For our Conscience is, that in no place, nor upon any man's command, we may conform: and theirs is, that upon great urgent extremities, they may some time, and in some place conform. I am persuaded, that if it had been free in England to use these Ceremonies, or not to use them. D. B. himself hath no conscience, that would ever have made him conform.

After this, the Repl. added something, about the Def. his Pontifical terms, factious and exorbitant men. opposed to orderly and discreet Preachers. As 1. that the Def. himself in his conscience will not say, that Mr. Midsley of Ratsdale, and others like him, were factious and exorbitant men. 2. That this is the language of that evil servant, who beat his fellow-servants, better than himself: Mat. 24.49.3. That all those who are placed in the room of silenced Ministers, are not orderly and discreet Preachers. 4. That faction and exorbitancie may better be charged upon the Prelates, for breaking many substantial, ancient, wholesome Canons, than upon us, for breaking a Ceremonious Canon. Now (setting aside the Rejoinder his wandering words, with the honey and gall of them) see what he bringeth to the purpose. 1. The first he granteth to be true. But denieth that the Def. meant so generally. And yet the Def. his words are: who seeth not, that to deprive men of their Ministry for not using of the Ceremonies (for that was objected) is to prefer an orderly and discreet Preacher, before one that is factious and exorbitant. If this be not generally spoken, let any reasonable ear discern.

2. The second he doeth not absolutely gain-say but casteth the like, or rather a far greater fault in our faces: that we (forsooth) do condemn to the p^t of darkness. Bishops, Conformitants, and in a manner all that are not of our party. Which is so manifest a slander, that the evil servant spoken of Matth. 24.49. could hardly vent one more shameless.

3. The third he confesseth: But would make it impertinent though it clean overthroweth the Def. his general assertion, before expressed. He addeth also certain frothy words, containing little else, beside manifest slanders, which if he were put to such an oath, as they call juramentum calumniae, he would not own.

4. The Prelates willful, and continual breaking of many, substantial, & wholesome Canons, is not denied by the Rej. but yet to save their credit, he addeth, that all such Canons do not bind every particular Church, but her own. In which words there is neither rime, nor reason. The Canons objected, may be seen in Master Parker, part. 2. c. 9. sect. 4. to be Canons of our own Church. What then hath the Rejoinder said to the purpose? His other stuff hath been sundry times examined, and found nothing worth.

5. All these considered, it will appear, that the Rej. had more will, then power, to maintain, that the silencing of Preachers for our Ceremonies, is the praefering of orderly discreet Preachers, before those that are factious and exorbitant.

6. After all this, out of Mr. Hy. his papiers, it pleased the Def. to bring in some pieces out of the Abridgement: which for substance are such as diverse times have been handled before: and therefore need not much labor in this place.

The first is, that many people in our land, are known to hold the Sacraments not rightly and sufficiently administered or received without them. For the force of such an opinion in the multitude, many testimonies are alleged in the Abridgement, and applied unto this assertion, not in deed to prove the same simply, but to show what is the consequence of it. All these the Def. left out, and the Rej. had no mind to take them in, but chose rather to rest in this: they are no proofs of the assumption. It was added by the Repl. the opinion even of a few, may make some action unlawful, which the opinion of many other cannot make lawful. 1. Cot. 10.28. To avoid this, the Rejoinder had nothing material to say, before he had changed unlawful into simply unlawful.

The just number of those that are so minded, cannot be proved, or disproved, without numbering and examining all the people. It was not therefore any meaning of those that gave the rule to reckon by the poul▪ as the Def. and Rejoinder would have us.

Neither is this observation brought in to prove imposing and observing, conjunctly, as they would bear the reader in hand, but only for the observing, other proofs being added for the imposing. Yet it was observed by the Repl. that while actions of this kind are superstitiously observed, they that still impose them in those places where they are so observed, may truly be interpreted so to impose them. To which the Rejoinder giveth no other proper answer, but only leaving out the pith of that assertion, may be truly so interpreted, substituteth another; of a purposed ende: and then misinterpreteth actions of this kind, as if they were meant of the special kind of things, and not of unnecessary actions known to be superstitiously abused.

It was also noted as ridiculous in the Def. that those people which think that Sacraments are not rightly administered, or received without the Ceremonies, are brought into that conceit by our condemning of the said Ceremonies. The Rejoinder answereth, that this condemning of them, must needs make some think that they are imposed as parts of religion, and so occasion the simple to think that we esteem them so.

In which answer, beside that I know not who are meant by we, and that an occasion of the second or third hand, is made a cause, there is no mention made of right or unright Sacraments.

For lessening of the number of those which so esteem of our Ceremonies, the Papists are first removed, as having no great conceit of them. Which I leave to experience. Only because the Rejoinder requireth testimony, I can inform him, that Gretser, Apol. pro Greg. 7. p. 8. hath these words: A Lutheran, preaching in erteine garments like the Ape of the priests, celebrates a German Mass. And the Rejoinder himself confesseth in the next words, they have a better conceit of them, then of the contrary, and that such as hath been held likely to araw them to our service, and that they have a great disaffection to those that will not tollerat the resemblance of their religious Ceremonies. Add further, that after B. Babington, and B. Andreos, D. Morton himself, in the last words of his Protestants Appeal, hath confirmed the rumor, that Pope Paulus quaertus, did offer to confirm our whole Service and Liturgy. The Papists therefore have no cause whie they should not have a good conceit of our Ceremonies, which of all the Service come nearest to, and make most for them.

As for the rest, that so conceit of the Ceremonies, which are not of your disciplining, saith the Rejoinder) and yet are conformable they are not many. As if those of our disciplining, were so conceyted, or those of Wales, Non-residents, and dumb-residents forlorn charges, who are not disciplined by us, were either few or of reformed judgment. Surely D.B. is not like himself, when he upon engagement defendeth that which cannot be defended.

7. The second thing brought out of the abridgement, is about the punishment inflicted for omission of our Ceremonies, greater then for breaking of God's law, in perjury and adultery. Now this hath formerly been handled. In this place therefore, it shall suffice, to set a few notes, upon the Rej. his answers. 1. He distinguisheth betwixt punishing, and punishing as a sin. As if punishment in the internal nature of it, were not of sin! 2. He distinguisheth betwixt internal peace of the Church, consisting more in observance of God's commandments, and the peace of her external policy, impeached by the neglect of her constitutions. Whereas he should have made the distinction betwixt one consisting, & another, or betwixt one impeaching, & another.

And yet both the consisting and impeaching of the Churches peace, doeth principally depend on the keeping of God's commandments: which is all the Repl. affirmed. 3. He distinguisheth betwixt an offense every way less, and in it own nature less, whenas the question is not, whether the neglect of our Ceremonies, be not only in it own nature a less offense, but also in all the circumstances of it. The Def. and Rejoinder themselves confess, that this neglect, in the nature of it, is no offense at all. 4. Because such answers were termed Sophisticall evasions, the Rejoinder twice crieth out of railing: forgetting (without doubt) how often he had abused the same term against the Repl. and that in the next former section, he had maintained the Def. his accusing a plain popular argument, not only of Sophistry, but even of dull Sophistry. For the Rejoinder certainly will not confess himself a rayler. The rest is not worth repeating, that paper should be twice blotted with it.

Against the Def. his distinction, betwixt omission, and contempt, the Reply was 1. that mere omission hath been punished with suspension. Of which the Rejoinder requireth a continued instance. To which I answer, that one instance may be given in Ipswicke, where D. B. was Preacher. For most of the Ministers were suspended upon the complaint of one Web, who professed, that he would not put on the Surplice except others did. D. B. may inquire easily if it was not so. As for continuance, it maketh not to the purpose, except all malefactors be not only put in prison, but also continued in the same, above the Judges pleasure.

The Repl. for affirming, that punishments for mere omission, are provided for by Canon, is accused by the Rejoinder of an untrueth in print.

Yet the Rejoinder cannot be ignorant (beside other examples) that every man not kneeling, is to be denied the Sacrament, and that the Minister administering to such, is by the Canon, to be suspended.

So that this was truth in print, ever since the Canons were in print: except suspension from the Sacrament, & from the Ministry be in his account no punishment.

8. The last thing noted out of the Abridgement is, that non-Cōformitants are accounted Scismatikes, Puritans, and excommunicates, ipso facto, without appeal: which is without example. The Rejoinder here 1. denieth that flatly, without more words, which is plainly cited out of the 6. Canon, let the Canon therefore be looked upon, and that is enough. 2. He saith that the old anathema sit was as much as to excommunicate ipso facto.

And yet King James himself, in his answer to Perone, doeth show, that the old anathema sit, was only a declaring who ought to be excommunicated, and not an excommunication de facto. 3. He saith for Appeal, that none is admitted, from the highest Court, such as the Convocation is. As if either the Convocation were the highest court, or any court at all, for ought that I ever heard of the Court of Convocation, as I have of a Court of Parliament, or as if so much liberty were left unto a poor Minister, now standing at the Bishops bar, as to appeal to the next Convocation. The Rejoinder surely did not well consider what he spake.

4. Whereas the Def. granted, that we have reason perhaps to wish, that some poenalties were released, the Rejoinder interpreteth this reason to be such as all men that feel the smart of punishment (for whatsoever offense) may have. Which is nothing else, but to look on, with laughter, at all the grievous things which any Ministers have suffered, for this cause. And yet every foot the Rejoinder putteth on another person, and (as I am persuaded) hath another heart.

After this, the Rejoinder cometh to the slanders of Puritamisme, and Schism. And as for Puritanism, he saith the Def. slided by it, as a term not imposed upon us by him. As if we may not complain of, or infer a consequence, from any term, except it be imposed upon us by D. Morton, or D. Burgess or at the least, they were not bound to answer for any terms, except such as they themselves have imposed!

For Scisme, and Separation, after some sparkeling words of rash-blasphemous, and fiery Sirs, he telleth us 1. (1. that nothing may be established in the Church, which God hath not commanded in his word, 2. that all forms of worship and all more Ecclesiastical rites, not prescribed, are will-worship. 3. That the calling of our Bishops, and consequently of our Ministers, is Antichristian. 4. That our Ceremonies are idolatrous.) are the first principles of Separation. Now if it would please the Rejoinder either to declare what is Separation, or what is a principle, this question would be easily decided. In the mean time, I answer. 1. the first principle is from Moses, if it be understood, as we mean it: thou shalt not add anything thereto. 2. The second confounding mere rites, with forms of worship, is not ours, but only by the Rej. his fiction. 3. The third supposeth, that which we utterly deny, that the calling of our Ministers doeth essentially depend upon the Bishops calling. 4. The fourth is made scismaticall, by a scismaticall conceit of the Rej. namely, that every Church is to be utterly condemned▪ and so separated from, that hath any thing in it, by participation idolatrous. His ever being of this opinion, may be answered in that fashion which he answereth the like phrase withal, pag. 216. He hath not ever been the best Logician. His profession, of separating (this day, ere he sleep) if he did believe these principles, is nothing else but a rhetorically flourish, which he would twice recall, before he would separate from those that bow to Altars, or even those which worship an ubiquitarie body, in the Lord's supper, though these are more palpable idolatrous (in his conscience) then the Ceremonies questioned are in ours.

As for the addition, with a yea, that Mr. Bradshaws very arguments are pretended for Separation so as they cannot be denied with any forehead, etc. It is not worth a refutation: because Mr. Bradshaw himself in a book entitled, the unreasonableness of the Separation) hath sufficiently shown how unreasonably they are pretended, and abused. If the Rejoinder hath anything to rejoigne thereto, I would willingly see with what fore-head he can do it.

The other talk of this section, as also the recounting of a confutation in the 15. section, I leave to be counted as it deserveth, by him that will compare what hath been said, with the wordy rejoinder to it, so vainly opposed, and so often repeated.

Only (in few words) let it be noted 1. how in the 15. section, he slighteth the sentence of D. Covell as not worth any answer) who confuted his Apology, and in that writing (at the least) was a kind of public wrighter, having had as much approbation, as this Rejoinder hath for his rejoinder as appeareth out of the Rejoinder his Praeface pag. 18. namely of the then L.A. D. Bancroft, etc. 2. How he maketh the imposers sentence, to be an adequate rule of observance, de facto. 3. How he denieth some divine worship only to be unholy in the kind: as if some singular true divine worship may be unholy. 4. What a wild consequence he buildeth upon: if the cross be no part of the Sacrament, then it is no part of worship: because it may not (in the Repl. his opinion) be a part. 5. How unreasonably he defendeth this consequence: our Ceremonies are changeable, and therefore not essential worship; when yet he confesseth the Popish Ceremonies to be changeable, and yet essential worship. 6. What science there is, for a Rejoinder upon such grounds to charge the Repl. for violating his conscience?

CHAP. 3. The third Argument, taken from the significant nature of our Ceremonies.

SECT. 1. and 2. Concerning certain miscelaneall notions and testimonies against human relegious significant Ceremonies.

1. THis Argument pleadeth, that no human Ceremonies, appropriated to God's service, ordained, or instituted, to teache any spiritual duty, by mystical signification, are lawful. About this the Rejoinder threateneth blows. But we have had now such experience of his forcelesse indevours in other Arguments, that the fear of his blows is past.

2. The first proof of our proposition was taken from the second Commandment: which the Def. omitted in this place, and the Rejoinder will not have any man to take exception against the said, omission: but with what reason, let his reader judge.

3. A second proof was, that Christ is the only teacher of his Church, and appointer of all means whereby we should be taught and admonished of any holy duty, and all Christ's doctrine, with the means thereof, is perfectly contained in the holy Scripture. Here (saith the Rejoinder) the Def. forgot to tell, how absurd this collection is, Christ is the only authentic teacher of his Church etc. therefore they may be no means of teaching or admonishing unto duties, but such as be ordained as necessary. As if it were sufficient for the Def. or Rejoinder to tell us anything as they please, how little ever it be to the purpose.

He maketh show of a distinction, betwixt an authentic teacher, and another, what do you call him? to which we cannot say much until he remember to tell us the name, style, and office of that other by-teacher?

Only this, by the way, I would learn: how we can acknowledge and receive any means of religious teaching with faith, except it appear to be appointed by an authentic teacher and lawgiver? And how our Prelates in appointing means of spiritual teaching which Christ appointed not, can be accounted (therein) Ministerial teachers under him as their and our only authentic teacher? As also, if Christ be our Authentic Teacher in all good that we learn about religion, who taught our Prelates such good manners, as to put fescues, of their own making, into his hand, and so appoint him after what manner, and by what means he shall teach us? P. Mart. (in Reg. 8. thus disputeth. For as much as God is most wise he needs not our devise for instruments to stir up faith in us which also no tradesman in his kind would endure, but would choose to himself at his own pleasure what he should think most fit. Nay I would be resolved of this doubt: whether this be not a doctrine religious in England: The sign of the cross doeth signify unto us that we should not be ashamed of Christ crucified etc. If it be (as no Conformist can deny) then I would know: whether and where Christ, our only Authentic teacher, doeth teach this doctrine? or if our Prelates may bring in a new doctrine into the Church, and cause Ministers to preach it? He leaveth out of our proof, that Christ is the only appointer of means, as also that those means are limited to admonition of a holy duty: and instead of our conclusion, he bringeth in another, of ordaining as necessary.

The support also of our collection he omitteth: to acknowledge any other means of teaching and admonishing us of our duty, then such as Christ hath appointed, is to receive another teacher into the Church, beside him, and to confess some imperfection in the means by him ordained. Yet in the midst of this shuffling, and cutting, he telleth us, that our collection is absurd. His reason is not by manifesting the fault of our consequence, but only by objecting some instances, and those also nothing to purpose. Then (saith he) it should not be lawful to use any help of Art Memorative, nor to set up a gybbett, or a traitors head on a pole, to give men warning against murder, or treason. Had he so soon forgotten, that the question is of Ceremonies, appropriated to God's service, teaching by ordination, or institution? If he had not, what did he mean, to instance in things that were never called Ceremonies (before this Rejoinder made all things in the world, in some respect, Ceremonies, by his wild definition of a Ceremony,) things that have no use in God's service, much less appropriated thereto, things not teaching by virtue of any ordination, or institution, but only by their natural relation, nay things not teaching at all any spiritual duty directly, and immediately? Characters and such like helps of memory, do no otherwise teache trueh, then error, and heresies no more spiritual duties, then carnal lusts, as experice doeth teache. One of the ancientes, and learnedest Schoolmē of our Countrie (Alex. Alēsis, p. 4. q. 1. m. 1.) teacheth us, that Letters that signify sacred sentences do not signify them as they are sacred, but as they are things. And if it be lawful to institute significant Ceremonies, for all things, that we may note in characters, for memory sake thē certainly our Convocation may institute Ceremonies properly Sacramental, even such as do signify and seal the Covenant of grace. For there is no doubt, but that we may note in characters or writing all that belong to that Covenant. Gibbets, & traitors heads (besides the former exception out of Alex. Hales) are remembrances of death inflicted upon such malefactors: but neither to be appointed by any, without that authority, by which death is inflicted, nor in their use imposed upon any, nor determined by institution, to the teaching of anything, which they would not otherwise teache, not yet such remembrances as may be brought into God's worship. Nay, from them some good Divines do reason against images in Churches, and such like significant Ceremonies. D. Fulke against Sanders of images, hath these words: Images (saith Sanders are profitable: because they bring us in remembrance of good things. I deny this argument: because nothing is profitable in religion, but that wh•ch is instituted by God. For otherwise we might bring the gallows into the Church, which bringeth us in remembrance of God's justice.

4. To pass by those exceptions of the Repl. against the Def. which the Rej. calleth wranglings (though they be defensible enough) The first proof of our proposition is taken from Mar. 7. and Matth. 15. where (as we allege) our Savior by this argument (among others) condemneth the Jewish purifijnges, and justifieth himself, and his Disciples, in refusing that Ceremony: because (being the precept of men) it was taught, and used, as a doctrine, by way of significatiō to teache what inward purity should be in them, and how they ought to be cleansed from heathen pollutions. To this the Rej. (supplying again that which the Def. had forgotten) answereth, that this reason (among others) of signification, is our fiction. Now (though these places of Scripture have formerly been handled, in the second chapter) let any man consider this observation: we find in our Savior's answer, three reasons of reprehending the Pharisees: 1. That their washing was praeferrēd before the Commandments of God. 2. That it was hypocritical. 3. That it was a vain worship, & therefore sin. If any say, it was not vain, as significant, we reply, it could be no outward worship, but as religiously significant. For washing, without signification had been mere civil. And Marc. 7.4. The Pharisees are reprovēd, for mere undertaking to observe washinges, no mention being made of any other reason, but only that observance, which must needs be understood of all observance, which was not civil, but (by institution & intention) religious.

5. For this interpretation, and collation, many good Divines were cited as fathering the same. They are all abused, saith the Rej. Now of Chrysostom, enough hath been said, in the former chapter. D. Whitaker's his approbation of the same sentence is shifted of, with binding of conscience, and holiness placed in them. But these shifts are sufficiently discussed in the former part of this book. To the Confession of Witenberge it is answered. 1 That it doeth not so much as give any glance at Marc. 7. Which how true it is, may appear by these their words: Nor is it lawful to restore either the old rites of the law, or to devise new in their place to signify the truth of the gospel now come to light, as for example, to use banners and Crosses to sign Christ's victory on the Cross: of which kind of i•lie devised repraesentations, is the whole furniture of Mass accoutrements, which they say doeth set forth the whole passion of Christ, and many such like things. Of which sacred ceremonies Christ preacheth out of Isajah; In vain they worship me teaching for doctrines the precepts of men.

Which last words are (in every syllable of them) found Marc. 7.7. Is not this so much as a glance at Marc. 7? Suerly here the Rej. had more affection to his cause, then attentation to the place in question,

6. Of Calvin, see the former chapter. Yet here also let these words of his be remembered: In these words it is evident, that all will worships are condemned. Christ pronounceth them erroneous, which for Doctrine obtrude men's p•aecepts. Let this stand firm, all devised worships are most vain before God. Under which censure and sentence, that he includeth such significant Ceremonies as ours are, it appeareth, as out of his condemning them in the Lutherans, against Westphalus, so out of his own practice in Geneva and France, where all such are abolished: for he professeth (de necess. ref. Eccl.) We have touched nothing no not with the least finger to remove it except that which Christ accounts nothing, seeing he pronounceth God is vainly worshipped by human traditions.

7. Virel (in Catechism. in praecep. 2.) extendeth the second Commandment, unto the forbidding of every human religious likeness. The Rej. also confesseth, that the same Virel, there condēneth all superstition: to which he if he had added his definition of superstition, viz: that it is a worshipping of God by rites and Ceremonies devised of man, all would have been plain. Neither is it material, that Virel pointeth not to Marc. 7. (as the Rej, noteth) seeing he groundeth his doctrine upon Matth. 15.9. where the same words are found, which in Marc. 7.7. are repeated. The Rej. therefore had no show of reason to say, that Virel was abused, in that he was cited as interpreting Mark, because (by his own confession) he doeth interpret the same words which are found in Mark.

8. Zepperus his testimony (which was not his alone, but the common sentence of diverse Protestant Synods, as appeareth out of his preface) is so full, that the Rejoinder in him forbare his common accusation, that he was abused. His words are these, de Pol. Eccl. lib. 1. cap. 10. reg. 3. Since God is worshipped in vain by human traditious Mat. 15.9. Nor will be of an efficacy by such things in the hearts of men, and being mere will-worships, Carrying but an opinion of wisdom through which God will never stir up devotion, prayer, faith, and repentanc• in us &c. And again. The ceremonies Cobled or botcht by men to the administration of the Sacraments are so many seminaries and nurseries of error, idolatry and superstition such ceremonies are to be abolished Mat. 15. Marc. 7. Whence it is manifest that about Baptism oil, salt, holy water, tapers, the sign of the cross &c. are to be abrogated.

If these words be not to the purpose, in the Rejoinder his own conscience, then I despair of satisfying him about any testimony that maketh against that tenet which he is resolved to maintain (as they say) by hook or crook.

9. D. Fulke (saith the Rejoinder did not think human Ceremonies to be condemned for being significant, when no religion, or service of God is placed in them. Which is as much as if he had said: D. F. did not think human Ceremonies to be condemned for being significant, when they are not significant: For (as hath been shown in the former part, all religious Ceremonies instituted, by their signification to raise up the heart unto the honoring of God, have some religion and service of God placed in them. And that D. Fulke did mean by placing of religion, or God's service in them, the using of them unto religious use, it appeareth by a like place in Act. 17. sect. 5. Though it be not simply unlawful, to express in painting the visible shapes shown in Visions to the Prophets, yet to make those shapes for any use of religion, is abominable idolatry.

10. For D. Reynolds, the Rejoinder answereth 1. that he giveth no hint touching the interpretation of this place. 2. that he only inveigheth against the multitude and burden of Symbolical rites, showing their use in Popery to be Jewish. 3. that D.R. judged our significant Ceremonies lawful to be used in case of silencing and deprivation. Now for the first, I answer, that as there are hints of interpretation for many places of the old Testament, in the new, which yet are not cited there, so may it be that D. R. gave a hint, without quoting. About the third point, I 1. observe, that by the Rejoinder his own relation, D. Rain, was not of his and D. Mortons judgement. For he judged our Ceremonies only tolerable in case of extremity: but they allow the very institution of them, as good and profitable for order, decency, and edification. 2. D.R. never manifested to the world in public any reasons for that judgment, but rather for the contrary, as by and by we shall hear. 3. There is a kind of suspensive judgment (such as Cyril, Peter Lombard, as Estius in 2. d. 21. alledgeth and interpreteth them, say Eve had, about the Serpents speaking) to which the iniquity of times do draw many godly and learned men, not only about Ceremonies violently urged by & with grievous poenalties, but also about greater matters, as experience in all ages hath shown. But that is nothing to others as being destitute or forsaken of certain grounds or supportes.

Concerning the second and main point, the best way is, to set down D.R. his own words, which are these: Were it so, that the Popish Unction had another, either work, or meaning, with the Papists, then with the Jew, as after a sort, it hath, yet might the Ceremony be Jewish notwithstanding, as sacrificing of a lamb, to signify Christ already come. At the least S. Peter did constrayne the Gentiles to Judaize (Gal. 2.12.) though he, and those Gentiles had another meaning, then that wherein that choice of meats was prescribed to the Jews. Adv. Hart. chap. 8. sect. 4.

Thus far I had in my notes, out of the English editiō but there is this more in the book, as I now find in the latin copy, not having the English at hand: your rites in the very kind are Jewish or as the Jewish were. Now out of these last words I argue thus: 1. If all umbraticall rites be Iudaicall, and therefore unlawful, then all religious significant Ceremonies are Jewish and unlawful.

But D. R. saith the first: therefore he teacheth also the later. 2. Out of the former I conclude thus: if a Jewish rite may be without a Jewish opinion, then our Ceremonies may be Jewish, or Popish, without a Jewish, or Popish opinion, or doctrine.

But the first is affirmed by D. R. therefore the later also. Which if it be true, then both the Defend. and Rejoinder have taken a false ground of their Ceremonial doctrine, in affirming so confidently upon all occasions, that it is the opinion and doctrine only which maketh a Ceremony Jewish, Popish, or any way unlawful.

All this notwithstanding, the Rejoinder could not forbear, to accuse the Authors of the Abridgement, his old reverend friends, of shamefull abusing the world, with false allegations of these Divines, nor to triumph in his discovering of this shame.

But I could wish, from my heart, that he, and his best friends living, had no more cause to be ashamed of his Rejoinder, then they had of these allegations, which none of the Authors, if they were on earth alive would disavow.

11. In the last place, upon occasion of our disliking all the significant Ceremonies, brought in by the Pharisees, it pleased the Def. to tax us for being too like the Sadducees, in refusing such Ceremonies. Now of this accusation the Replier only desired the Def. to consider, if it did not touche our blessed Savior himself, who by his example, and doctrine opposed the same Ceremonies? Heerupon the Rejoinder answereth, that our Savior walked a middle path, betwixt the excess of the Pharisees, and the praecisenes of the Sadducees, in Ceremonies, observing many human significant Ceremonies in religion, as the Feast of Dedication, embaulming at burials, sitting at burials, sitting at the Passover, and the Synagogues, with their formalities. In which answer, the Rejoinder hath shown, that upon occasion, he dare go as far, and say as much for human Ceremonies, as any that went before him, if not more, and that with such confidence as is not abated with reverence of our Savior himself, whom this passage doeth concern. But beside this audaciousnesse, I find no truth in these words, For. 1. That which he saith of the Sadducees praecisenesse in flying all human Ceremonies, is not true. The Sadducees (saith Epiphanius lib 1. c. 14.) omnia aequabiliter cum Samaritis observant. i. e. they observe all that the Samaritans observe: and who can doubt but the observations and Ceremonies proper to the Samaritans, were all inventions of men, with the Devils help. The Sadducees also were sometime high Preistes at Jerusalem, as for example, Annas is noted by Josephus (l. 20. c. 15.) and by like historians, to have been a Saducen. Now it is not credible, that any high Priest in those times, did abstain from all human Ceremonies, used commonly by all the Jews Mar. 7.3. At the least the high Priest did observe the feast of Dedication, sitting at the Passover, and such like (in the Rejoinder his account) human Ceremonies. 2. The Sadducees were profane beasts, not hoping for Heaven, nor fearing Hell, and so were always ready to observe any Ceremonies that made for their temporal advantage, of what kind soever they were. 3. It appeareth out of the premisses▪ that our blessed Savior (in favor of our paltrie base Ceremonies) is wronged in his holy name, as if he had been more observant of human mystical constitutions in religion, then many of the worst Jews, whom yet he reprov'd for following traditions of men. 4. Because the Rejoinder speaketh of a middle path, betwixt the excess of the Pharisees, and preciseness of the Sadducees, observed by our Savior, it would be known, whether that middle were medium participationis, or medium abnegationis? i. e. Whether it was only a third way partaking of neither extreme? or had in it part of the Pharisees excess, and part of the Sadducees preciseness? The former sense we may (upon the Rejoinder his supposition acknowledge: and that maketh nothing to the purpose.

If the later meaning be the Rejoinders, then he must show us, how far our Savior did agree in practice with the Pharisees? And to clear that, he must prove that the Pharisees had lawful authoritte, for appointing or instituting mystical Ceremonies, and which of them were allowed by our Savior? 5. The examples here given, pertain nothing to the question. The feast of Dedication cometh after to be handled. Embalming at burials, was no significant religious Ceremony, but a civil rite common to the Israelites with the Egyptians, and other Heathens. If it were, yet being from the time of the Patriarchs, how will the Rejoinder prove that it was instituted without Divine direction? Sitting at the Passover can neither be proved to be mystical, nor yet instituted by man. Synagoges were no more significant Ceremonies, then was the school of Tyrannus, Act. 19.9. The opening, closing, and delivering of the Book, Luc. 14.17.20. was no more mystical a Ceremony, then the opening of a man's mouth, when he speaketh, and the shutting of it again, when he hath no more to say. Are not these worthy grounds, for to conclude upon, that our Savior was an observer of human religious mystical Ceremonies?

SECT. 3. Concerning S. Augustine.

1. AVgustine, in the Abridgement, was among other Divines cited, as allowing of one proof belonging to this Argument, taken from significancie. This the Def. caught hold of before the time or place of it, as matter of a section by itself, distinct from the testimonies of other Divines. Which dealing we must not speak of: because the Rejoinder saith, it was orderly done. But if their Printer-hath failed in right noting the numbers, he will needs have that a very slipery trick. If also the Def. brought in this testimony out of place, that was (in the Rejoinder his language) because he would not teather us up too straight. All this we may let pass, as formality of words, suitable to his Ceremonies, which he seeketh to maintain.

2. But (saith the Rejoinder) if instead of lib. 3. c. 35. be put in lib. 2. cap. 1. as the Repl. would have it, yet nothing is found to the purpose. Now (though it skilleth not much: because this place was but conjecturally pointed at, instead of another miscited yet) in that place, this is to be found, so much to the purpose, that I know not how the Rej. will avoid the weight of it: that S. Aug. distinguishing betwixt natural, and instituted signs, saith presently after, that there is no use or cause of instituted signs, nisi ad expromendum, & trajiciendum in alierius animum, id quod in animo gerit is qui dat, i.e. but to declore and make intelligible, what the institutor meaneth. From whence, we gather, that our Prelates instituting significant Ceremonies, can signify no more then what they would have, and not what God would have.

3. Another place of Augustine was alleged. out of Ep. 5. Signs when they belong to divine things are called Sacraments. Of these words. the Rej. (differing from the Def. saith) that his meaning was to show, that the name of Sacraments belong properly to divine things, and not to all signs of holy things.

But it is plain, that his meaning was, to show, that all things instituted imbuendo virtutibus animo, i. e. to stir up the mind to virtue, as he speaketh immediately before, are Sacraments. In defense of the Def. he answereth, with the Def. that in Augustine's language, all signs of holy things, are familiarly called Sacraments, and that we bewray small acquaintance with Augustine's language.

Where (because both the Defend. and Rej. would seem so familiarly acquainted with Augustine's language) I would desire only, that they would interpret unto us (strangers from it) the meaning of these words of his, Epist. 119. Dies natalis Domini, non in Sacramento celebratur, sed tantum in memoriam revocatur, quod gestum est. Pascha sic agimus, ut Sacramenti significationem non omittamus. Sacramentum est in celebratione quum rei gestae ita commemoratio fit ut aliquid etiam significari intelligatur quod sancte accipiendum est. i. e.

The celebration of Christ's nativity is no Sacrament: but the celebration of Easter is a Sacrament. Here we must have a new distinction, never had of since Augustine's time, or else it cannot stand (which yet they, who will seem so versed in Augustine's phrase, will needs dictate unto us) that all signs of holy things, are, Augustine's phrase, Sacraments: except perhaps (against their often professed tenet) they will say, that holy-days no not that which is appointed for memory of Christ's own nativity, is a sign of a holy thing. Neither can it be (according to Augustine's phrase) but all such significant Ceremonies as Easter was, must have more then the mere name of Sacraments.

4. And this was that, for which Augustine's testimony was only brought in for, viz: to show that religious significant Ceremonies participate part of the Sacraments nature. To this (after some words of course) it is rejoined, that the name Sacrament improperly given to other things, doeth not prove them to participate the property and nature of Sacraments, no more then the Swanne in Houlborne, or the Idols of the Gentiles, do participate the nature of a Swanne, and God: such denominations not being real, and proper, but logical, or relative. And if it were so, then the taking away of that name from our Ceremonies, doeth discharge them from partaking the nature of Sacraments. To which I have this to say 1. that our Argument is not taken from the mere name: for we know that some names are common to things quite differing in nature, so falling (as they say) by chance, But this community of the name Sacrament, was not so: it was communicated to Mystical Ceremonies upō certain counsel and reason. And that reason was not mere similitude outward, such as is betwixt the picture of a Swanne and a living Swanne: Because there is no such outward likeness betwixt the Cross, and any proper Sacrament: but frō some proportion of inward nature, either in men's esteem, as an Idols was called God, or in deed wholly so far as man's institution can effect, as •he Popish five Sacraments are so called, or else in part, as this kind of significant Ceremonies, which are in question. Now that this last was the reason, Augustine himself teacheth in the for-alleged sentence, concerning Easter: and Chemnitz, out of him, doeth largely declare, in the beginning of his 2. tome, de Sacramentorum numero. Bellarmine also (de effect. Sacrament. l. 2. T. 24.) giveth the same rule, and reason: All are called Sacraments which have a mystical sense, and are types or figures of other things. 2. From the former answer, the Rej. his Hoste in Holborne can gather, that not the picture of a Swanne, but a living Goose, hath that proportion to a living Swanne, which is betwixt other mystical Ceremonies, and proper Sacraments. 3. It is but a picture of a reason, which the Rejoinder maketh, from giving of the name Sacrament, to the taking of it away. For no man will say, that a name taken from the nature of a thing doeth argue more the nature of it, then the taking away the name alone, doeth argue the taking away of the nature. The ancient naming of such Images as the Papists are, did argue them to have an idolatrous nature: but the removing of that name from them, by the Papists, doeth not argue they are now of idolatrous nature.

5. From the name Sacrament, which first was given to this kind of Ceremonies, it came that afterward they were called Sacramentalls. For so saith Swarez de Relig. Vol. 1. tract. 3. lib. 4. cap. 14.) They use to be styled Sacramentalls, or more generally all Ceremonies & holy blessings done in the Church. To this observation of the Replier, the Rejoinder answereth, that the name Sacramental, taken properly, is given out of relation to Sacraments, not out of participation or resemblance of their nature. And that analogically such Ceremonies as are consecrated to signify and work supernatural effects are called Sacramentals. The first of which interpretations we do not deny: saving only, we see not why the Rejoinder should say in that sense only that name is taken properly.

In the second, he confesseth as much as we desire: saving that he shuffeth in two terms unfitting: consecrated to work. For many Mystical Ceremonies were not consecrated at all among the Papists (as the aereall sign of the Cross etc.) and some were consecrated in Augustine's time, (the practice whereof is here defended by the Rejoinder) nor can be condemned by those that consecrate Churches, Church-yarders, Altars etc.

And as for working, if it be understood of moral working by admonition▪ then it cannot be denied unto mystical signs by institution admonitorie. Howsoever a principal Jesuit may profess as much at Rome, of Popish Ceremonies, as the Rejoinder doeth here of ours. So Vasquez (in 3. Disp. 128. cap. 5. ar. 4. Sacramentals do not work remission of venial Sins nor are instituted to that end, but to stir up the mind to detest them.

6. It was in the conclusion of this passage, granted by the Repl. that neither Augustine, nor other fathers, did constantly in doctrine, and practice reject human mystical Ceremonies. Wherupon the Rejoinder inferreth, that Augustine therefore is wronged, and we are mere Navalists. But here he forgot, that all our Divines, and also our English Articles of confession with our Apology, do reject divers things (as prayer to, & for the dead, men's falling from grace etc.) which those Fathers did not constantly in doctrine and practice, reject, and yet are neither to be esteemed mere Navalists, not yet accused of wronging those Fathers, when they cite some testimonies out of their writings, against those errors. Concerning Ceremonies, it is the commune sentence of our Divines, which Beza expresseth (ad Bald winum) It is not to be doubted but that most of your ancient Bishops were somewhat too busy in devising rites etc. but unhappy was the Counsel.

7. To make an ende of this one testimony, which it pleased the Defend. to take into so large consideration, for advantage. Augustine Epist 119. ad Ian. is cited by all, as condemning the multitude of human Ceremonies which were then crept into the Church and worship of God:

and therein (without all doubt) he said that out, which many other godly men did inwardly conceyve: yet neither he, nor they, did constantly reject that multitude, nor he declare his mind, but when he was urged by Ianuaris. The stream of the times, bearing toward Popery, made him (with others despairing of reformation) yield too much unto such abuses. Yet in that famous place (Epist. 119.) not only the number, but even the nature of such Ceremonies is condemned. 1. For the manifesting whereof, I note these passages: 1. He noteth these Ceremonies, that they were instituted, ut quasi observatio Sacramenti sint. i. e. so that they partaked the nature of Sacrament. For as quasi contractus, and quasi peculium castrense, do in the Civil law note participation of the nature of such things to which they are quasi; so doeth, quasi Sacramentum. 2. He professeth, that by reason of times, he durst not speak against such Ceremonies so freely as his judgment did lead him: liberius improbare non audeo. 3. He calleth them servilia onera, and humanas presumptiones: servil burdens, and human praesumptiones. 4. He accounteth the Church, in regard of them, to be troubled with much chaff, & tares: inter multam paleam, multaue zizania constitutam. 5. He saith, that such Ceremonies, though they were tolerated, yet they were not to be allowed of, but upon the first opportunity to be cashiered resecanda, yea though it were not discerned, how they made against faith or good manners.

Let any man now judge, if Augustine did in this his clear sentence about Ceremonies, agree with our Def. and Rejoyner.

SECT. 4. The judgment of Protestant Divines concerning significant Ceremonies.

1. The Rejoinder was not so large in the former section, about one Divine, but he is as brief, in this, about many. For first in general, he would persuade us with words, that the Def. in answering four testimonies, had answered all, in one word: that no Protestant Divine (except Beza) hath spoken absolutely against signs symbolical and merely significant

Which kind of rejoinding, had had some sense, if mere denying of a conclusion, were a sufficient answer to an argument drawn from diverse testimonies alleged for the proof of it. But yet not trusting to this kind of answering, he adventureth, to clear the particular allegations: which was more then the Def. would undertake. One would have expected, that here he should have answered, that which is so pertinēt to the purpose, found in the Abridgement, pag. 32. because he put it of before (pag. 247.) with a tale of boy, and promised after to show, that it is nothing to the purpose. The allegation is this: To them that say Images may stand in Churches, as helps to stir up devotion, and to put men in remembrance of good things (with whom the Def. and Rejoinder consent) it is answered (by P. Martyr, Gwalter, Lavater, Vrsine, Polanus, and others) that the Lord himself hath appointed means enough to do that; and that no means may be used to that ende, but such as he hath ordained. This certain was to the Rejoinder as it were a noli me tangere: that no means must be used to stir up devotion, and to put men in remembrance of good things, but only those which God hath ordained. He was therefore contented to pass it over without meddling with it. And he that with is answers to the other allegations, may think that the better way for him, had been, to deal in like manner with all. This will appear in the examining of them, one by one.

2. In the first place, therefore, we expect his answer to that which is found in the Harmonie of Protestant Confessions, generally approved, by Reformed Churches. About which he is very brief, as his cause required. The Divines of Witenburge (saith he) and those of France, and the Lowe Contries: viz. that they speak only of those significant Ceremonies, which serve to shadow out the Mysteries of the Gospel, or to supply the office of true Sacraments. Now (for the present) we will not stand much upon those phrases, shadows of the Mysteries of the Gospel, supplying of the true Sacraments office. It shall be sufficient, to receive the words which he hath so easily and often answered. The Wittenburge Confession (sect. 17.) saith thus: It is not lawfull, either to restore the old Ceremonies of the law, or devise new, to shadow forth the truth already laid open, and brought to light, by the Gospel: as in the daylight to set up candles, to signify the light of the Gospel▪ or to carry banners and crosses, to signify the victory of Christ, through his Cross. Of which sort, is all that Massing attire, which (they say) doeth shadow out the whole passion of Christ, and many other things of that kind etc. The other words are these: No Mysticull rites (that is, which carry some mystery, or signification, in them) though not otherwise impious (as namely such as should be partes of God's doctrine, or kinds of Sacraments) but only such laws as pertain to order and decency are lawful. Let any man that understandeth English, and reason, judge, if these words ought, or can be interpreted, only of (I know not what) mysteries of the Gospel, or Ceremonies supplying the office of true Sacraments, further then our Argument doeth import. If not, then the Rejoinder granting the premisses, denieth the conclusion as he did before.

The Confession condemneth banners by name and Crosses, signifying the victory of Christ through his Cross: Our men defend the sign of the Cross, signifying that Christians shall not be ashamed, to fight manfully against Satan under Christ's Banner. The Divines of France and the Lowe Contries, (with the Confession) reject all Ceremonies, that carry some mystery or signification in them: Our question is, whether human Ceremonies of mystical signification, be lawful? If these testimonies be not plain enough, I know not what is plain.

3. Peter Martyr (on 1. King. 8) is the next witness of whom the Rejoinder saith, that he speaketh of Exorcisme, oil, spittle, and exsufflation, to all which the Papists ascribe operation, and to that ende do consecrate some of them, by prayer. Beside (saith he) Martyr did approve these our Ceremonies as lawful, and bowing of the knee at the name of Jesus: so that he wondereth Martyr should be alleged in this cause. Now therefore let us hear P. Martyr himself speak: The most wise God needeth none of our help to devise means to excite faith, nor would the meanest Mechanie endure to &c. See before, how bold then are these men who will praescribe to God wherewithal to help forward our salvation.

They multiply signs which they will leave to be sacred as oil, spittle, exsufflations etc. & that one Sacrament of Bap^t. is much degenerate. Nor are they to be heard when to abuse the simple they use to distinguish between Sacrament and Sacramentals mere Sophistry. As for operation, we have often shown, that many Papists ascribe no more of that, nor no other wise, to many of their Ceremonies, then the Def. and Rejoinder do allow of in ours. Consecration by prayer, may as well be used about a Surplis, as about a Churchyard. It is plain by the words, that P. M. doeth condemn all means instituted by man, for the stirring up of our faith: which are in the Def. and Rejoinder his language, mystical moral ceremonies, serving for edification: saying that no

Carpente, or Mason would be so dealt with in his occupation, as the institutors of such mystical Ceremonies do deal with God. He accounteth human sacred signs in Religion, to be human Sacraments: and will not admit of such distinctions, as the Rejoinder hath multiplied: Sacred properly, and reductively, rightly, or abusively sacred, simple or double sacred. Sacramental, or moral, reductive, or analogical Sacramentalls, etc.

Yet we deny not, but the same P.M. being sometime perplexed in the case of England, did suffer his affection to carry him so far, that he seemeth to make some of our Ceremonies, in some case, tolerable. But then any man may perceyve wavering in his words: as when (in his epist. to Hooper) he requireth five conditions in such Ceremonies, 1. that the Church hath liberty to ordain them: 2. that the worship of God be not placed in them: 3. That they be few: 4. Not burdensome. 5. Not a hindrance to better things.

The two first of which conditions are the very question: viz: whether the Church hath any such liberty, and whether all such Ceremonies be not part of worship: and for the two last, experience teacheth, how burdensome our Ceremonies have been, and are still, to many good men's consciences, and how much good hath been hindered, by the urging, and practizing of them.

4. Sadeel is put of, with the like shift, of consecration, necescitie, efficacy Sacramental. Now these terms have been sufficiently unmasked before, in the first part. Let Sadeel here only be heard, and he will tell his own meaning. The exorcism holy water, taper, salt spittle, white garment, the little bells, &c. what good do they do in Baptism? Do they indeed being added to Baptism ad at all to its ornament? but what are these devisers of such things wiser then Christ Jesus who instituted Bapt. with such simplicity and purity as knowing better then all men besides what ornamēts suite best with his own ordinances? what arroganice is this to ad thus to Christ's institutiō? Gal. 3. the unction added to Bapt. we allow no more thē that of Confirmation. Bec. it belongs to God only to appoint Sacraments The old pastors of the Christiā church did more then was mete accomodate themselves to Jews and Gentiles whence many cere: cr̄pt into the Church but Experience shows God blessed not such Counsel. In these words 1. all human addition to God's institutions are absolutely condemned. 2. Those that undertake to add such Ceremony. are censured of intolerable arrogancy, as presuming to be wiser then Christ. 3. Lights, and white garments, are by name condemned, which only offend, in their mystical signification upon man's will. 4. Chrism or oil in Baptism is esteemed a Sacrament, though the Papists deny it conferreth grace, as the Sacraments. 5. The first bringers in of Ceremonies (only significant) into the Church, are taxed for departing from the simplicity of God's word, as therein finding rather the curse, then the blessing of God upon their presumptions.

5. Daneus is the next (who maketh it blasphemy, to think, and teache, that any outward things (of human institution) may be made a sign, in the Church, of spiritual things) the first answer is, that this was spoken in opposition to Bellarmine's consecrating of creatures to signify, and work supernatural effects. Which is very true: but this must be added: that in this sētēce, he toucheth only the signification, not the operation of those Cere. as any that readeth his words, may observe. The second answer is that Daneus (elsewhere) alloweth some significant Cere. But the Rej. should have done well, to name the place or places, which he meant by elsewhere. For we cannot by conjecture find it.

This I am sure of, that it is not Isagoge, p. 3. l. 3. c. 11. where he saith, that the teaching under the law was 〈ϕ〉 signs, & earthly figures, as a Schoolmaister speaketh to young children: but under the Gospel, open, and manifest, as one dealeth with grown men. They then that thrust in significant Ceremonies, what do they but confound the most wise dispensation of God, and make a mingle-mangle of those things, which he hath separated asunder?

6. Polanus (misprinted, or uncertainly printed in the Abridgement) is said to allow some significant Ceremonies, as feasts, Fasts, Gestures: and his definition of Superstition, is thought to make only against Ceremonies Sacramental, not Morally significant. The only way therefore is, to set down his words, out of which his judgment about this pointe may appear of superstition, he saith thus (Syntag. l. 9. c. 3.) Superstition stands in choosing worship to God, or exceeds measure therein. True religion worships the true God in a manner prescribed by the word: false, (that is to say Superstition) worships God otherwise then he wills or enjoins. In another place whatsoever pertaines to God's worship must by him be required. Again it is a foolish ill zeal of the popish clergy to use such playerake apparel in Divine service and by apparel to be distinguished from laicks, that difference and variety was in the Old Testament typical, but the substance being come, what mean they to require types anymore?

7. The next witness is Mr. Perkinse, on Gal. 3. but (by variety of editions) uncertain what verse of the Chapter was designed.

The Rejoinder therefore guesseth, that the words upon v. 2. or rather 1. were intended, where Mr. P. condemneth the setting up of Images, to be lay-men's books. To which he answereth. 1. That he also doeth blame the same. 2. that Mr. P. in some persons and places, preferreth dipping, before sprinkling, in Baptism. Now for the first of these, if the Rejoinder when he writ these words condemn (with Mr. P.) such images or pictures as are lay-men's books, it is wonder, he forgot, or changed this judgment, before he came to the seventh section of this very Chapter, where he doeth defend them. And this is plain, that if images be to be condemned, as they are lay men's books, or teachers, then all human signs, ordained to be lay-men's teachers, in religion, are also to be eondemned with them.

The second is an affected flim-flam. For dipping (upon just occasion) rather than sprinkeling, is no more a human Ceremony, in Baptism, then drinking a convenient draft of wine rather than slight tasting is an human significant institution.

But yet (howsoever the Rejoinder upon conscience of the consanguinitie, betwixt Images, and significant Ceremonies did suppose this first verse of the Chapter to be meant by the Authors of the Abr.) I think rather that they intended the four and twenty verse, where M.P. doeth distinguish betwixt Ceremonies significant, and those of Order, and saith that the former sort were alsolutely abolished, but the other only in respect of their special determination.

8. Master Merbur•e was cited (out of a Manuscript, (as it seemeth) as giving the same judgment of significant Ceremonies. But in his later time, he crossed not so much others, as himself in blotting out this sentence I leave therefore his name under that blot, and other like, wherewith he soiled himself in his later times.

9. D. Witgift him self, is brought in (by Abr.) disliking any praescript apparel, should be used in God's service, for significat•on. Def. pag, 291. To this the Rejoinder answereth 1. that in the same place. P. Martyr is alleged, as approving white apparel, for Ministers (who are compared to Angels) to use in signification of their office, because Angel app•ared in white: which should have put him (at the least) out of our Bill. But it followeth not, that therefore all testimonies of Martyrs, must be put out of our Bill, because he varieth from them, in this. In the other places, he speaketh from good grounds of Divinity: but this reason of his, hath no more force in it, then if from the picture and apparation of Angels, it should be gathered, that no Minister should wear a black night-cap, a black tippet, or a black hood, which our Canons do command: or that every Minister should have six wings fastened to his body, with certain, vizard faces, like unto the faces of Lions, Eagles, and open, because Angels have so appeared, Isa. 6. Ezech. 1.

It is answered 2. that we should believe the said D. Whitgift in this, that our Surplices are not appointed for any moral signification. But we cannot beleiv, whatsoever one Prelat saith of our Ceremonies, (for to avoid the dint of Argument, though it be against the common profession of our Church, in the very Service-book,) is presently to be believed.

The 3, answer is, that D. Whitgift did use, defend, and urge, significant Ceremonies, which is true, with shame and all: but many a man, upon the rack of an Argument is brought to confess that, which other while he is wont to deny. Finally this consequence is denied: D. W. did not approve of the Surplice for signification: ergo of no significant Ceremony: the reason of which consequence is given in the Abridgement (p. 35.) because no good reason can be given, why the Church may not injoine a prescript apparel for signification, as well as any other Ceremony.

Thus the Rejoinder hath tried what he could say to those testimonies, which the Def. had omitted, in this place: and doeth so please himself therein, that he beginneth a plaudite to himself, saying that he hath openly whipped the Repliers friends: he meaneth the Authors of the Abr. who were wont to be his reverend friends also. But this whipping of his, is just as if a man should whip thorns, and pricks, with his bare hands, getting more gashes thereby, then he dealeth or giveth blows. It is not safe so much as to handle sharp edges much less to whip them, with naked fingers.

10. Now we must hear, how the Rejoinder doeth say for the defense of those answers which the Def. gave to four• Divines, chosen out by himself to answer, of whom, Calvin is the first. Of whom it is said, that he condemneth only such Ceremonies, as are subs•ituted to the very office of Sacraments. Where if he meaneth part of the office of Sacraments, he and we consent about Calvin but if he mean the whole complete office of Sacram. then he wrongeth Calvin. For upon Lev. 4.21. his meaning cannot be, that all the old Ceremonies of the Jews, had such a complete Sacramental office, as Circumcision, and the Passover had. Upon Isa. 20.2. speaking of Isays going barefoot for a sign of future captivity (which was not the full office of a Sacrament) he saith: If Isaie had done this of himself he might well have been laughed at. Those rites are of no worth which have not God for their author, which we are carefully to note, against the papists who obtrude upō us empty ceremonies for true Sacraments. This rule is for them: if they come from God we are to embrace them, if not, to scorn them, nay they cannot be received without dishonor to God, when therein mortal men take upon them the authority of God. And upon Mat. 21.25. he hath this doctrine: no sacred sign ought to be admitted among the godly, unless it be shewwen to be of God, nor is it in men's choice to mint anything. But the Rejoinder affirmeth, that Calvin doeth expressly allow Symbolical signs, as excercises, and incitements of piety. The Place he meaneth is Inst. lib. 4. c. 10. sect. 14. where there is no express allowance at all, of mere human Symbolical signs, but only of some Ceremonies, to help the ruder sort of people in their unskillfulnesse. Now this kind of Ceremonies Calvin himself in the 28.29. sect. of the same chapter, doeth manifestly declare, to be matters of mere and necessary decency. The end of decency is, that (while such things are used which purchase respect to holy things we be stirred up to piety. That is a Decoium which so makes for the reverence of holy things that is that it be a fit exercise of Godlines. This being considered, and withal, that the Rejoinder in his great Charter, (cap. 1. <ϕ> 16.) dureth not build his mystical Ceremonies upon that decency, which Paul doeth appointe, and Calvin only admitteth, it is plain, that Calvines excercises and incitementes of piette, are not his more human <...> Ceremonies.

11. The second witness, whom it pleased the Def. to take notice of, is Zepperus, or rather, sundry Protestant Synods, by Zepperus divulged, as he showeth in his preface. Now his words are set down before in the 1. and 2. •ection of this chapter: so that here we are only to consider what the Rejoinder hath to say against, or upon them. And first he flesh to his old muse of Ceremonies efficient of grace, in Popery. But this muse-hole hath been formerly stopped. And if it were open in other assaults, yet Zepper hath sufficiently provided for it here. For beside that he directed his censure of Ceremony. (in a great part) against the Lutherans, who deny all efficacy that the Rejoinder denieth, he saith plainly that by these human mystical Ceremonies, God will nor sti• up devotion, faith, and repentance, in the heart of Christians not at blank cross to our Def. and Rejoinder his tenet. For the relieving of that weak shift, the Rejoinder (in the second place) affirmeth, that Zepper (cap. 16.) doeth allow of dipping, and thrice dipping, in Baptism, as an human Ceremony stated in God's worship to signify the Trinity, and our Lord's resurrection on the third day. Now in the 16. chapter, there is no one word of these matters (which kind of misciting or misprinting the Rejoinder useth to make a great matter of in others) but in the 12. chapter, I find such a fond allegory of thrice-dipping merely related out of Augustine, but no allowance of the same. Nay, if the matter be well considered, I think the Rejoinder himself will scarce allow of it. For 1. there can be no better reason given for placing of a mystery in thrice dipping for Baptism, then in dividing of the bread to be received in the Supper, into three partes, as the Papists do for a mystery, among other of their massing toys. 2. This thrice-dipping for mystery, is so mingled with the true Mystery of Baptism, that (to all appearance) it is made a part of that Holy Sacrament 3. For man to institute an outward representation (as an Image) of the Holy Trinity, is a very great praesumption, against the second Commandment. Christ himself never appointed any such mystical real sign neither can that incomprehensible mystery be fitly represented by any such triplicities as is of man's making. 4. To invoke the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost over the baptized, and then by thrice redipping, or sprinkling, upon man's pleasure, to signify they are three Persons, is as if one should light a candle, for the manifesting of something, and then put a bushel over it, for signifying of the same thing. 5. How can the same three at one and the same time, signify three Persons, & three days? Can men give manifold disparate senses to one and the same Ceremonies, as literal, allegorical, tropologicall, and anagogicall? 5. Why may not as well three Crosses be made upon the Baptized; for the same mysteries? 6. It could not be of any moment, for those ancient Bishops, sometime to dip thrice, for signifying of the Trinity, and some time once, for signifying of the Unity. Seeing Trinity and Unity are not to be separated in the solemn signification of them, and Heretics are not confuted with human signs.

12. Jewel is the next in order. But for so much as neither his words are quoted, nor the place where they may be found noted, (on either side) but only according to one English Edition, which I have not, I cannot say much of them: Yet this I may truly say, that the Rejoinder is put to hard shift, in opposing of the Repliers answer, when he distinguisheth betwixt graces, and duties, actually performed. For these two are expressed by the same name, of the Apostle Paul, 2. Cor. 8.1. I do you to wit of the grace of God, bestowed on the Churches of Macedonia etc. But it seemeth that human mystical Ceremonies are of like nature unto those old legal Ceremonies, which only signified what men ought to do, but gave not grace to do it: so that they are to be referred unto the killin letter.

In searching also for the place, in my latin copy of Jewel, I found these words Act. 1. pag. 23. The Papists have blurred Christ Sacraments with a number of Superstitious and Childish Ceremonies, and have added such like Sanctions to them. Now if by the superstitiousnes, and childishness, which is found in the Popish Cere. before their multitude, and before their sanctions binding consciences to them, he did not mean their mystical signification, upon human institution, I would willingly learn of the Rejoinder what his meaning was?

13. Beza was by the Def. granted to speak for us. But the Rejoinder (having now exercised himself unto confidence in such elusions) will needs have it, that Beza's phrase only, not his meaning doeth make for us. Let us therefore hear his reasons. 1. Beza (saith he) condemneth all Symbolical rites, which he calleth Sacramental, that is signifying spiritual graces, not duties. Now Beza's words (ep. 8.) are these: I affirm that so often as the ancients brought into the Church any Sacramentals i. e. Significant ceremonies of Spiritual things so oft they grievously offended. Withall I think that all symbolical rites should be once profligited out of the church whereinto by no right they could ever enter nor as long as they remain can the Church have her native beauty restored. Here is no mention at all of graces, but only of spiritual things: and yet the Rejoinder would persuade his reader, that he saith not spiritual duties, but graces. His gloss is naught. Spiritual things comprehend so well spiritual duties, as graces. How this reason will be excused, I cannot guess: except perhaps it be answered, that human Ceremonies do signify duties as they are carnal, and not as they are spiritual. It is further to be marked, that Beza there speaketh of of such human significant Ceremonies, as were in common use among the ancient Fathers. Now the Rejoinder will not say that they had in common use, so many human Sacraments, as Beza noteth them to have had significant Ceremonies. 2. The second reason, by which the Rejoined. would prove that Beza meant not simply to condemn all significant Ceremonies, is, because he alloweth some Feast-days, confesseth the Surplice and kneeling to be in their nature indifferent, and saith that the Cross might sometime of old have had lawful use. For the former of which, if the words of Beza, had been noted, more might be said. In the mean time, let this suffice: If Beza did allow of some human Feast-days, it may better from this place be gathered, that he did not account them significant of spiritual things, then it can from them be gathered, that in this place he did not condemn all such significant of man's making. Neither doeth he affirm a significant Surplice to be indifferent. And as for kneeling, that is more excepted against for other causes, then for instituted signification.

But in the last, there is odd dealing. For whereas Beza saith of the Cross, ut olim aliquis fuit usus ejus etc. which is as much as to say though this were granted, that there was some use of it of old, the Rejoinder make•h him to say that there was of old a lawful use of it.

It is enough for any man, to read over Beza his eyght and twelf Epistle, for understanding not only of his meaning, but also of his reasons.

14. Because the Def. made Beza a singular man, in opposing all human mystical Ceremonies, the Replier added out of Bellarmine's observation (de effectu Sacram. l. 2. c. 30.) that at least Calvin, Barentius, and Chemnitz were of the same mind. Now concerning Calvin, enough hath been said before. For the other, mark what the Rejoinder hath to say.

The question (saith he) in that place of Bellarmine disputed, is of Ceremonies meritorious, and binding the conscience, out of the case of scandal. And is this all? Surely then the Rejoinder had no reason to object unto the Abridgers, and the Replier, abusing the Reader. For (to omitte that which in the first part of our Dispute, hath been answered, concerning merit & binding) any one that looketh upon Bellarmine, de effect. Sacram. l. 2. cap. 30. may see, that he divideth the controversy betwixt us and the Papists, into six heads, the fourth is about binding the conscience, and the fifth about merit, but the third is whether the Church may appoint new Ceremonies? The Affirmative of this question Bellarmine proveth, from the Feast instituted by Mordechay, and that of Dedication, instituted in the Maccabees time, etc. which are the Def. and Rejoyners chief arguments for significant Ceremonies. And professeth plainly (as our men do) Our Proposition is no more but this against heretics, that the church may appoint new Ceremonies not indeed to justify us from mortal sins but to other ends. On the Negative part, Bellarmine nameth Calvin, Brenz, and Chemnitz. Now the Rejoinder to darken all, confoundeth the third, & fifth question into one hoche-poche. Who then doeth abuse the Reader? Of Calvin, enough hath been said before as also of Brenz, under the title of Witenberge Confession, Chemnitz only (being altogether passed over by the Rejoinder though he was not only propounded by the Replier, out of Bellarmine but also in the Abridgement, pag. 32,) is here to be represented, in his own words. Yet concerning Brētius first, a few words may be needful. The words of Wittenburge Confession (before cited) are plain. It is not lawful, to devise new Ceremonies, to shadow forth the truth already laid open, and brought to light by the Gospel: as in the day light to set up Candles, to signify the light of the Gospel, or to carry banners & crosses, to signify the victory of Christ, thorough his Cross. Of which sort is all the massing attire. Of this Confessiō Brenz was the penman: and therefore Bellarm. citeth the same as Brenz his sentence about Ceremonies. The Rejoinder answereth 1. that Bellarm. saith only that Brenz reproveth the hallowing of water, oil. &c. consecrated to signify and work supernatural effects: because the mysteries of faith should not now be shadowed out. De cultu Sanct. l. 3. c. 7. Which to be nothing so, the very words of Bellarm. will show. for neither out of Brentins, nor against him, doeth Bel. make any mention of consecrating such things to work, but only to signify spiritual effects. First they are blessed to signify spiritual operations. For the sprinkling of the ashes signifieth poenance, &c. Nor doeth the reason of Bre'tius of adumbration hinder, for those significations are not properly adumbrations, but outward repraesentations of present invisible things, and of things spiritual. Or else of things past, most useful to stir up the affection. Hence it is plain, that Brenz is opposed by Bellarm. for houlding the Proposition of this our third. Argument, that his reason is ours: and that Bellarm. his answer, so well as his tenet, is that which the Def. and Rejoined. do maintain against us. 2. A second answer, or rather objection, is used by the Rej. that Brenz allowed Lutherun Crosses, and Images, as being a Lutheran. Now it is well known, that Brenz at the first did write as became a grave Divine: but after broke out into the Vbiquitary faction, siding against those whom he called Zwinglians and Calvinists. That which we allege, was written in the name of the Church of Wittenburge, & so praesented unto the Counsel of Trent, out of his and others best judgment. If either out of security, or out of faction, he did, and writ otherwise, after, it ought not to be put in balance against this Confession. It is no great mervayll, if a Lutheran doeth cross his own Doctrine, even about Ceremonies.

For in the same kind they have Luther himself for their example: No man did more hardly inveigh against those trifles then Luther did, and yet retained them for the times sake. That when occasion required he was so vehemente we commend him, but that while he contended against them, he submitted to the them, we pardon in him.

Something like was the case of Chemnitz, whose words the Rejoinder thought good to pass over in silence. They are these (de ritib. Sacr. ad Can. 13.) When Christ himself so instituted the Sacraments that he required them to be used with such and such rites, it is a very hard question whether it be lawful for men to add other and that so many over and above. As if what rites Christ himself prescribed were either not enough, or not fit enough. In divine institutions as we must take nothing from, so we must add nothing to them. But whereas they say by such rites many things are proffitably signified, we answer that belonged to the State of the Old Testament, but what Christ in the New Test. would have learned, must be taught with the light of the word, not by shadows. And we have a promise of the force of the word; but not of the efficacy of shadows devised by men. And what rites he would have used by the word, those he himself appointed, etc.

There was some cause, why the Rejoinder did not care to insist on these words. For Chemnitz maketh it a very hard thing to justify human significant Ceremonies in God's worship. The Rejoinder saith, it is as easy as to justify writing by Characters. Chemnitz maketh them additions to God's Institution. Nothing less (saith the Rej.) no more then a Cabinet, wherein a Jewel is kept, is an addition to it. Chemnitz judged them repugnant to the New Testament.

The Rej. saith, that there is manifest allowance for them, and authority left unto men for instituting of them: (as forsooth) in those words of Order, Decency, and Aedification.

15. The Replier added unto the witnesses aforesaid, Junius & Daneus. But concerning Daneus, we have already considered what the Rej. had to except. Junius only remaineth: whose words were quoted out of his animadversions upon Bell. de cultu Sanctorum, lib. 3. cap. 7. an. 12. Heer the Rej, rouseth up himself, as if he had gotten a great advantage, putting on such confidence, or rather forth such shows of it, as if it had been mere folly in the Repl. to make mention of Junius. His rejoinder therefore is to be considered in all the parts of it. 1. First, he concludeth that the Repl. is no wise man, in not telling them, to what objection, or assertion Junius doeth there answer: because (forsooth) the Repl. himself had said, it was no wisdom for any man, to take up an answer made to an objection, before he considereth the assertion against which the objection is made. As if it were all one to consider the assertion, and to tell them what it is. Is not this a fine consequence? 2. He attributeth unto the Repl. a Sophisticall wit, in concealing, that the assertion of Bell. by Junius opposed, was, that the Church may of her power, consecrate creatures, to signify, and work supernatural effects, &c. But from hence nothing can be gathered, for the advantage of the Def. and Rej. except it appear, that Junius did only speak of the working, and not distinctly of the signifyng, which Bell. would have given unto those Ceremonies: which how false it is, shall presently appear. 3. He noteth a shameful falsification of Junius his words, in the translation of them. Junius his words are: Homo non potest creaturas ad significationem adhibere. The Translation is: Humane Ceremonies cannot be lawfully used for signification. Where is that great falsification, which drew from the Rej. Are you not ashamed? or can you not blush? The Rej. his own translation of the same words, is: No man-can lawfully apply things to signification. He must discover the mystical difference betwixt using for signification, & applying to signification, before he can cast such shame upon the Repl. & none upon the Rej. 4. To show Junius in his own posture, and the mis-reporting Repl. in his own colors. The Rejoinder translateth that whole passages of Junius, and noteth upon it, first, that Junius speaketh of consecrating ceremonies. To which I answer, that in the words, as they are by the Rej. translated, he expressly condemneth all applijng to signification. And if consecration were included therein, I hope the Rej. will not disavow consecrating of Churches, Churchyardes, Altars, &c. Secondly, he observeth, that Junius doeth professedly sever the point of signification, from that of efficacy. As if the Repl. had confounded them, and not rather distinctly insisted upon signification only which Junius doeth as distinctly and professedly condemn, as efficacie. Nay it is the Rej. his common fault, that where the Papists speak of efficacy and signification, and our Divines distinctly answer of both, he will have no answer, nor those of Calvin, Brenz, Chemnitz, Daneus, nor this of Junius, to belong unto signification distinctly, and by itself. In the third place, he telleth us, that Junius in the two next annotations, doeth allow voluntary significant Ceremonies. Let it therefore be considered, that Junius in the thirteenth annotation, insinuateth at the least his doubt, whether any voluntary significations can proceed from good: a bono, si forte. 2. He saith they proceeded from simplicity, and turned to superstition. Which phrases of his, he so interpreteth other where, that it may easily appear, he did not allow that which here he calleth simplicity. For cap. 5. annot. 15. he calleth it vanity, in opposition to the simplicitie of Christ. And in the second book, de reliquijs & imaginibus, cap. 27. annot. 29. he calleth it plainly simple superstition. In the fourteenth annotation, he mainteyneth this assertion: In divine things no shadows are rightly used in the Church but what God hath instituted. But (saith the Rej.) he doeth by name allow standing in prayer, on the Lord's days, as a significant Ceremony, as also holybread: annot. 10. Whereas Junius testifieth plainly, in the 9. note, immediately before, how he did only excuse, as comparatively tolerable, such ancient Ceremonies of the Fathers. Primum suit tolerabile: Patrum simplicitatem piam excusamus. So that Junius being seen in his own posture, and the reporters in their colors, let the Reader judge, where is the cause of shame and blushing?

SECT. 5. Concerning the wrong, that is done to God's Sacraments, by human significant Ceremonies.

1. The Argument dependeth on this: that human Ceremonies appropriated to God's worship, if they be ordained to teache any spiritual duty, by their mystical signification, usurp a chief part of the nature of Sacraments. This was in the Abr. backed with many testimonies: which the Rej. having before eluded (so well as he could) here contenteth himself to say, they are counterfeit, forced, or forged stuff: The contrary whereof hath been declared. Now for the naked Arg. he affirmeth it to have no sienws which must be tried by the answers, & defense of them.

The Def. first answereth, by a distinction, betwixt the signification of grace conferred, and the signification of man's duty, the former whereof he maketh Sacramental, but not the later. To the which was replied, that Sacr. also do signify the duty of man towards God. This (saith the Rej.) is not true: bec. Sacr. do only imply that duty. But I would know of him, 1. how the Sacr. as signs, do imply that which they do not signify, all so well as our sign of a cross doeth signify any duty? The aerall cross doeth (though very untowardly) represēt the wooddē cross, whereon our Savior was crucified, & so by a trope, Christ crucified: & then implieth our duty to Christ. And do not Sacraments signify Christ, & our duty toward him so well as this? 2. I ask,

If Baptism do not signify our whole mortification, vivification, and putting on of Christ? 3. If the Sacraments do only by themselves, imply these duties, yet that implication being explicated in their administration, what use is there of putting that explicated duty under a bushel, or bed of man's making?

2. The Rejoinder not trusting to that denial, saith further, that if the Sacraments did signify man's duty, yet that is not a chief part of their nature. To which I may reply, that if it were not a chief part of their nature, but a part only, yet it is presumption for men to take any part of the Sacraments, and set it upon other things, at their own pleasure. But seeing by the nature of the Sacraments, is meant their office, and use, and there be many offices and uses of them, some of which come not so near their chiefest office as this signification doeth, it may with good reason be termed a chief part. Calvin (Consens. de re Sacram.) saith thus: Sacraments are notes and badges of our Christian profession and incitements to thankfulness, Exercises of piety, & bonds under our hands to tie us to God's service, but their chief end is to signify and figure the grace of God to us.

Now though this last be the chief office, yet among the former one is more chief than another, and which of them more chief, then this of signifying spiritual duties with obligation to the performance of them?

3. To prove that the Sacraments signify moral duties (which first the Def. and in defense of him, the Rejoinder denieth) it was alleged, by the Repl. that the whole Covenant is in them signed and sealed, betwixt God and man in which Covenant man's duty, thorough grace is there professed, and represented. Wherupon the Rejoinder 1. concludeth, that such signs as do neither sign nor seall the covenant of grace, cannot partake the office, or special nature of Sacraments. Whereby he gaineth nothing but his own ideal shadow. 2. He gathereth, that unless signifying, without sealing, be a more principal part of the nature of Sacraments, then sealing, such signs as communicate with them only in signifying, do not participat any chief part of their nature. Which is as mere non sense, as if one should say, that unless teaching, without sealing be a more principal part of Sacraments, thē sealing, then the preaching of the doctrine which in Sacraments is signified and sealed, doeth not participat any chief part of their nature. 3. He answereth, that the Sacraments do confirm our obligation unto sanctimony, in general, but not signify any moral duty in particular. Here then is the mystery: the Sacraments to confi•me (by signification) all our duties, but not this, or that duty.

If our Convocation had been of the Counsel, when Sacraments were appointed they would (as it seemeth) have made them more perfect. But this is certain, our Savior meant to put a difference, betwixt the old A. B. C. and the new manner of t•aching fitting for riper years: and therefore did not s•oll out every letter concerning our duty, in signs, as of old, but give us the sum in a few signs. Whosoever therefore goeth about to multiply significant signs, crosseth th• very intention which was respected, in the institution of two Sacraments only. Beside, the Cross itself, doeth not signify our duty of constant fighting under Christ, in pa•ticular, against this or that temptatiō of sin, the world, or the Devil, but only in general, so that by this reason, we should, or may have as many significant Ceremonies, as there be particular temptations to be resisted. Whither shall we come, at length, by walking in this Ceremonial way?

4. The second Argument, to the same purpose, by the Repl. alleged, was, that the name Sacrament, as it signifieth an oath, or obligation, doeth import, that the Sacraments signify our duty to God. To this the Rejoinder answereth, that the Sacraments do in deed imply, but not represent any moral duty. Now let any reasonable man judge, whether dipping under the water, and rising up again, or taking of food for strength, and growth, doeth not more represent spiritual duties, then making a Cross with ones finger, in the air?

5. The third reason mentioned, was taken from the name Eucharist, notifying thankfulness, and the taking of the same, in remembrance of Christ. The Rejoinder his answer is, that the word Eucharist is no Sacrament, but a term brought in by men to put them in mind of their duty in receyving it. But that word doeth notify the nature of the Sacrament, at least in the judgemēt of all Divines, •hat have in this meaning used the term, though it be not a Sacrament. And they are more then that the Rej. his judgment can counter-balance. Yet if significant Ceremonies be like unto words and characters, as the Rejoinder formerly maintained, that very word must needs be a Sacrament, or a significant sign of a Sacrament: because it was brought in to put men in mind of their duty in receyving, as the Rej. speaketh. He addeth 2. that there is no element, nor action of that Sacrament, so particularly repraesenting thankfulness, as kneeling doth reverence, or humility, Where first, he maketh kneeling a significant Ceremony, which hitherto he hath seemed to deny. 2. I answer, that the very action of receyving so great a gift, in a cheerful humble manner, doeth repraesent both thankfulness, and humility, so far as Christ would have it repraesented by signs. The very celebration of a great benefit received, is a sign of thankfulness. Otherwise, let the Rejoinder tell us, what repraesentation of thankfulness was in the Passover, for that benefit of passing over the Israelites houses, when the first-borne of the Egyptians were slain?

6. Instance was given (by the Replier) that both sanctity, and constancy, which are the things signified by Surplice, and Cross, are signified in Baptism. The Rej. his answer is, that they are not barely or only signified in Baptism, as duties, nor by any distinct sign repraesented. As if this were the question, and not this: if Sacraments do signify moral duties! Certainly, if Sacraments do signify these virtues as graces and duties (as is proved, and also confessed) no Christian need desire to have them signified over again barely and only as duties, no more then after an instrument made betwixt the Lord of Manner, and his Tenant, containing the conditions of both partes, the tenant should seek for a new instrument, signifying his conditions a part: and not only so, but after that his conditions had been expressed generally, that he should keep all the land in good culture, according as he found it, he should seek for one instrument about the woodes, another for the arable land, another for the meadows, another for the pastures, and another for the broom feilds, or for every aker one, & that not from the Lord of the manner, but from some Justice of peace, or high Constable of the Hundred. Neither is it a thing profitable, for Christians to remember their duty, without remembrance of God's grace thereto apperteyning.

7. Against mystical-moral Ceremonies, of human institution, the Repl. brought this Arg. in Mr. Baines his words: To be a teacher of my understanding, and an exciter of my devotion, are such effects, as require virtue, inherent, or assistant, to those things which should be causes of them. But no sign of man's divizing, hath any such virtue, in it, or with it. For then it must come either from the word of creation, or from God's after institution.

But from neither of these, have the signs of man's divizing any such virtue. Therefore no sign, of man's divizing, can be a teacher of mine understanding, or an exciter of my devotion.

This the Rejoinder confuteth first, with skornefull words, as a sickly childish, and long some objection. After, he answereth, that our monitorie Ceremonies, are only external occasions, and objects, whereby the mind of man worketh upon itself, not causes working by some virtue in them.

Where 1. observe, how he mangleth and marreth the Argument, that he may master it: the words are, that such effects require virtue inherent, or assistant: he interpreteth them only of virtue in them, i. e. inherent, leaving out assistant: and yet dareth affirm, that upon this fiction of virtue in them (which is his own fiction) the whole objection is built. 2. He maketh our Ceremonies to be only occasional objects, and no causes: whereas every instituted sign is a means, and so a cause of that effect for which it is appointed, as Logic teacheth. And if they were mere occasions of conceyving that which they signify, then a white Surplice would not prove half so significant a Ceremony of Ministers sanctity, as a white Cock, especially when it croweth, nor an aerial Cross, so significant, as a Gallows. Beside, if our Ceremonies be occasional objects only, then no man is tied to regard the whiteness of his Ministers Surplice, thereby to think of his sanctity, anymore then he is bound to regard the fownesse and soil of it, when for a longe time, it is unwashed, and he also useth it instead of a handkerchif, about his nose, thereby to think of the imperfection, spots, and blots, which are found in Ministers disposition, and conversation. Concerning, Letters, Characters, and Giblets, mentioned here again by the Rejoinder, answer was made before, in the first section of this Chapter.

8. To like purpose, the Repl. used this reason: If human inventions be such moral admonishers, in spiritual duties, then our consciences are bound to subject themselves to their admonitions, and so to those mortal men, who made them admonishers. The Rejoinder his answer is like his former: human significant Ceremonies have no virtue of teaching the understanding, or exciting the devotions of mē: but only external objects tending by their signification to those uses, to the use of which, the consciences of men are not bound simply but only collaterally, and for another thing. In which answer, 1. there is a strange mystery confessed: that human Ceremonies are appointed to do that, which they have neither antecedently, nor consequently, any virtue to do. 2. External objects are made opposite unto admonishers with virtue to admonish: as if no external objects (as Baptism administered to a child, before mine eyes) had any virtue of admonishing 3. As strange a distinction is made betwixt simply, and collaterally, and betwixt simply, and for another thing: which are such sustian stuff, that there is no fear, they should satisfy any but such as take terms without reason• or right reason.

9. Another reason of the Repliers, was, that every teaching sign, of public use in the Church, ought often to be interpreted, in preaching, and also defended if they be called in question, in the same preachings, which kind of preaching, upon Cross and Surplice, were very absurd, especially in those Parishes, that scarce have Quarter-Sermons. The Rejoinder answereth 1. that the Cross having interpretation with it, need not be interpreted: and that the Surplice signifieth, he doeth not well know what, but such a thing as may be soon taught. Now that which he saith of Cross, he may as well say of the Sacraments, that because in their administration, they have the interpretation going along with them, therefore no Minister need much preach of them. But indeed, there is special need, that the very interpretation which goeth along with the use of the Cross, should be well interpreted: because few or none, either of the people, or of the Crossers themselves do understand, how it hath that signification which the Convocation hath laid upon it, anymore, then any other toy, which may easily be devised by the same Convocation: as if they should put a straw into the childe hand, instead of a spear, to signify, that he should manfully fight, against all enemies of Christianity. And of the Surplices signification, seeing the Rejoinder himself is not yet certainly informed, what it is, there must needs be great use of much preaching about it, first to declare certainly (if it may be found) what it signifieth, secondly to show the ground of that signification, or authority from whence it cometh, lawful, and thirdly to urge it upon the consciences of those that are to make use of that signification. His second answer is a bundle of phrases: and so let it pass. Only let it be noted. 1. that he calleth it fury, to charge our Ceremonies of superstition and yet in sobriety, maintained before, that those which count them unlawful, are superstitious brethren. 2. that he determineth absolutely, upon his refuted grounds, that we have stopped our own mouths, from preaching the Gospel, by calumniations. Whereas all England knoweth, that those which never preached, or writ against the Ceremonies, have their mouths stopped by his Prelates, though they only profess, they cannot use them, by reason of scandal, of which number, Doctor Burgess himself hath been one. 3. He would persuade the world, that some of us place all religion in opposing Ceremonies by speaking and writing: which is greater calumny, then any he charged us with, or then he can prove of any one. 4. He affirmeth us to be of all men he ever knew, the most impatience of opposition, and so most partial, and Pharisaically proud as if his Prelates were very patient toward those that oppose their Ceremonies, no way so partial, nor drew any thing from the Pharisees, or as if himself in this Rejoinder, had not shown more of these virtues, then any other. 5. He showeth where the store lieth: in rooting of them out of the hearts of their people, by clamours, and calumnies. We cannot then defend our practice, but with clamours and calumnies, nor answer for our hearts, without rooting them out of people's hearts.

10. For the further manifesting of the useless signification of our significant Ceremonies, the Repl. appealed to the consciences of the best conforming Christians in England, whether ever they found themselves truly stirred up to holiness, by the Surplice, or to constancy in faith, by the Cross? The Rejoinder answereth, that no man is stirred up by them, as by causes, but only as by the sight of the creatures, or other memorials: of which use if men deprive themselves, it is their prejudice or negligence. Now of causes there was no mention in the quaere. And the question being made of the best conforming Christians (among whom the Rejoinder himself is one) prejudice, and negligencie of some, make up no answer. The truth is, that he himself could not say, out of his conscience, that ever he felt such motions within him, by occasion of a Surplice, or Cross, and therefore baulked the question. Yet this is here to be observed: that by the Rejoinder his confession, our sacred Ceremonies are no more admonishers unto spiritual duties, then any creature of God, i. e. then any butterfly is. And are not then our Ceremonies very sacred, or religious. Or is our representative Churches institution, of anymore force, or worth, then any childes, that catcheth butter-flies?

11. It was added also which by experience, it is found) that in someone Congregation, where these Ceremonies have not been used, more holiness, and constancy of faith hath appeared, then in many Cathedral Churches, where they were never omitted. The Rejoinder his answer is, that where other helps stand equal, there is no difference, save only in a Pharisticall opinion of those, who count their very opposition of Ceremonies an high point of devotion, and stiffnesse therein, constancy in the faith.

Behold the man, that even now complained of clamours, and calumnies. The reasonable part of this answer is, that in Cathedral Churches, other helps (as diligent preaching, catechizing, admonishing, directing in Christian duties) are not aequall or answerable to that which is found in divers Congregations where the Ceremonies have not been used: otherwise there were no difference. Now herein, 1. he confuteth himself, in confessing that his Prelates, even those whose admirable wisdom he extolleth, though they have power enough, do not provide the chief helps of edification, for their Churches, aequall to those that are found in poor Congregations, which receive not their Ceremonial helps, and yet will not suffer those poor Congregations to enjoy their helps. For do they not by this, place a high point of devotion in their Ceremonial helps? 2. How can this stand with reason: where other helps are aequall, there is no difference? Certainly, if our Ceremonies be helps to Edification (as the Def. and Rejoinder maintain) then where other helps are aequall, the Cathedral Churches have a great advantage in helps, above other, that want those Ceremonies. Nay one Cathedral Church exceedeth another in this kind: as Durrham, for Ceremonies, doeth Chester, and Lichefeild.

12. Because the Def. (to make way for an injurious accusation) changed the phrase used in the Abridgemēt, a chief part of the Sacraments nature, into another more obnoxious unto exception, the chief part, the Repl. justly noted this, as no plain dealing. The Rejoinder (being loath to leave any of the Def. his words un-maintained) answereth, that the Sacraments have but two parts, signification, and obsignation: and therefore if signification be a principal part, it is also the principal part: so that the Defend (saith he) dealt herein fairly, and pressed us with such words as our Argument requires.

But 1. who authorized the Defend. to change the terms of our Argument, and then press us with his changelings? Let him reserve such fair dealing for other occasions, when it may pass with less notice taken of it. 2. What doeth the Rejoinder mean, to imitate the Defend. in attributing unto us, that we make mere signification, without any qualification or limitation, either the or a chief part of the Sacrament? The Abridgement saith only, that such signification as is ordained mystically to teache and admonish us of spiritual duties, is a chief part of the Sacrament. 3. Mr. Hooker, (lib. 5. pag. 3.10.) saith that there are great store of properties belonging to the Sacraments▪ as that they are bounds of our obedience, obligations to mutual charity, provokation to godliness, preservations from sin, memorials of great benefits, marks of distinction from strangers etc. How then can the Rejoinder so resolutely determine of two only offices, which belong to them? 4. If all essential parts of the Sacrament may be reduced to these two, yet the lesser of these may be called a principal part, without any prejudice to the other, in respect of those mē, which make accidental, circumstātiall, & improper parts of God's worship, and so of his Sacraments, as the Def. and Rejoinder upon every occasion do shift off Arguments with those terms. The rest of this section (beside words of no weight) containeth nothing which hath not been in the former passages, sufficiently cleared.

SECT. 6. Concerning Jewish Ceremonies.

1. IN the Abridgement, after the former reason, now maintained, this was brought in: that In the time of the Law (when God saw it good to teache his Church by significant Ceremonies) none might be brought into, or received in the worship of God, but such only as the Lord himself did institute. Ergo. And after that, this: It is much less lawful, for man to bring significant Ceremonies into God's worship now, then it was under the Law. For God hath abrogated his own (not only such as prefigured Christ, but such also, as served by their signification, to teache moral duties) so as now (without great sin) none of them can be continued in the Church, no not for signification. Upon which last ground, they infer thus: If those Ceremonies which God himself ordained to teache his Church by their signification, may not now be used, much less may those which man hath devised.

Now the wisdom of the Def. was, to pass over the former grounds, and only to insist upon this last inference derived from them. But let us see what he, and the Rejoinder have to say of that.

2. About this inference, many testimonies of great Divines, were alleged in the Abridgement: all which the Def. passeth by, as not worthy answer: for which, he was challenged by the Replier. The Rejoinder answereth 1. that this is wrangling, spoken not out of conscience, but out of a spirit of contradiction, etc. To which I answer nothing. But that which the Def. neglected, the Rejoinder taketh to supply, least we should brag, as it pleaseth him to phrasifie. See therefore how he dischargeth that which he undertaketh. 1. The Nicen counsel (saith he) is twice falsified: first; that it is supposed to condemn significant Ceremonies, by man devised, upon this reason, that God had abolished his own, and secondly, that the Council is affirmed to condemn such Ceremonies at all.

It seemeth the Rejoinder hath more skill (about this cause) in multiplying falsities, then in dividing of them from trueths. For the Nicen Council was brought in as speaking for one proposition: and the Rejoinder maketh two false assertions of that one simple axiom. Beside the words of that Council, or Constantine, speaking for it, are (in the Abridgement) only brought in as testifying this▪ that the old Ceremonies of the law, being abrogated by God, cannot (without sin) be now continued in the Church for signification. Instead of this, the Rejoinder faineth two other propositions, and then faith, that they are two falsifications: which if they be, let him (who is the coiner of them) see how he can excuse them. The words of Constantine are: It seemed unworthy to celebrate the Passover with imitation of the Jewish custom. Let no (such) thing be commune to Christians, with the Jews. We have received another way from our Savior, a more lawful and convenient of our holy Religion. This is pat to the purpose, for which it was alleged.

2. The testimony of all the rest (saith the Rej.) are perverted. 3. Sundrie of the witnesses are known to have allowed our, and all, some significant Ceremonies. It is a shame therefore for men gloring of sincerity, in refusing the Ceremonies, thus to leave all sincerity, in alleging of Authors. In which never any protestant writers abused the world so much, as the Abridgement, and this cavilling Repl. Now 1. for the perverting of all testimonies, it is affirmed only, but not proved. Only some general suppositions are brought in, to support the accusation, all which have formerly been confuted. 2. Among those which he saith were known to allow of our Ceremonies, he nameth D. Humphry, of whom Cambden in his history of Q. Elizabeth, observeth, that he (though very learned and worthy) never was raised to Ecclesiastical preferments, because he allowed not our Ceremonies etc. Harding also objecteth him by name, with Mr. Samson, as one that had rather loose all, then use our Ceremonies, and Jewel (Apol. c. 5. div. 1.) doeth not deny, but defend it: besides how well he allowed of our Ceremonies, let all men judge by a certain letter of his here printed, written to the Bishops, the Copy bearing this inscription.

A letter sent to the Bishops from Doct. Laur. Humphrey president of Magdalene College in Oxford and Reader of Divinity lecture there.

YOur Lordships letters directed unto us, by our vice-Chancellor, although written in general words, yet hath so hearted our adversaries, that we are now no more cōpted brethren & friends but enemies: & syth the old mass attyres be so straightly commanded, the mass is self is shortly looked for. A sword now is put into the enemies hands of these that under Q. Mary have drawn it for Popery, & under pretence of good order are ready without cause to bewreck their popish anger upon us, who in this will use extremitye, in other laws of more importance partiali•y, I would have wished My Lord's rather privy admonition then opē expulsion, yea I had rather have received wounds of my brother, then kisses of mine enymye, if we had privily in a Cōvenient day resigned, then neither should the punisher have ben noted of cruelty, neither the offender of temerity, neither should the pap. have accused (in their seditious book) protestants of contention. Religion requireth naked Christ, to be peached, professed, Glorifyed that Graviora legis, by the faithful ministrye of feedinge pastors, should be furthered, & after that orders tending to edification, & not to destruction, advanced, & finally, the spouses friends should by all means be cherished favoured & defended & not by counterfite & false intruders, condemned & overborne, & defaced. But alas a man qualified with inward gifts for lack of outward shows is punished, & a mā only outwardly conforable, inwardly clean unfurnished, is let alone, yea exalted, the painful preacher for his labor is beaten, the unpreaching Prelate, offending in the greater is shot free, the learned man without out his cappe is afflicted, the capped man without learning is not touched. Is not this directly to break God's laws? Is not this the Pharisees vae? It not this to wash the outside of the Cup, and leave the inner part uncleansed? Is not this to praeferre mint and anis to faith and Judgment and Mercy? Mans tradition before the ordinance of God? Is not this in the school of Christ, and in the Method of the Gospel aplayn disorder? hath not this praeposterous order a woe? That the Catechism should be read is the word of God. it is the order of the Church, to preach is a necessary point of a Priest, to make quarterly sermons is law, to see poor men of the poor men's box relieved, vagabonds punished, Parishes Communicate. Roode lofts pulddowne, monuments of superstition defaced service done and heard, is scripture, is statute, that the oath to the Q. Majesty should be offered and taken, is required as well by ordinance of God as of man. These are plain matters necessary, Christian and profitable. To wear a Surplys, a Coape, or a cornerd cappe is (as you take it) an accidental thing, a devise only of man, and as we say a doubt or question in Divinity. Syth now these substantial points are inall places of this realm almost neglected the offendes either nothing or little rebuked, and syth the transgressors have no color of conscience, it is sin and shame to proceed against us first, having also reasonable defēce of our doings. Charity My Lo. would first have taught us, equity would first have spared us, brotherlinesse would have warned us, pity would have pardoned us, if we had bē found trespassers God is my witness who is the beholder of all faith. I think of your Lordsh. honourably, esteeming you as brethren, reverencing you as Lord's and Masters of the congregation: alas why have not you some good opinion of us, why do you trust known adversaries? and mistrust your bretkren? we confess one faith of Jesus, we preach one doctrine, we acknowledge one ruler upon earth, in all things (saving in this) we are of your judgment, shall we be used thus for a surplus? shall Brethren persecute Brethrē for a forked Cap, devised singularly of him that is our enemy? Now shall we fight for the Popish Coat, his head and body being banished? shall the controversy so fall out in conclusion, that for lack of this necessary furniture (as it is esteemed) laborers shall lack wages? Churches preaching? shall we not teach? shall we not exercise our talents as God hath commanded us. Because we will not want that which our enemies have desired, and that by the appointment of friends Oh that ever I saw this day that our adversaries should laugh to see bethren fall together to the ears! Oh that Ephraim should thus eat up Manasseh, Manasseh Ephraim. My Lord's before this take place consider the cause of the Church, the Crests and triumphs of Anti Christ. The laughter of Satan, the sorrow and sighs of a number, the mysery and sequel of the tragedy: I write with zeal without proof of my matter at this time present, but not without knowledge of it, nor without grief of mind. God move your spirit at this present to fight against Carnem, Circumcisionem, imo Concisionem, against literam et legem, which principally is now regarded & rewarded. Speak I humbly beseech you to the Queens Majesty, to the Chancellor, and to Mr. Secretary and the rest, that these proceedings may sleep, that England may understande your zealous mind toward the worship of God, your love toward the poor welwillers, your hate toward the professed enemies your unity in true conformity, the other neither be needful now, neither exacted in any good age. So shall the little flock be bound to you, so shall the great shepherd be good to you.

By this we may judge of some others, whom he only nameth.

3. That all allowed some significant Ceremonies, is manifestly proved false, in the former allegations. 4. We glory no more of sincerity, in refusing the Ceremonies, then the Rejoinder doeth in using of them. 5. It is no abusing of the world, to allege general sentences of men condemning that which they seem to allow in their practice. If it were, I can name one protestant writer, who hath more abused the world, in this kind, then any, or all of us: and that is no other, then our Def. D. Morton. For he hath written many books of good use, against the Papists, the chief grace whereof is, that (having a good Librarie, and using it with deligence, and discretion) he hath alleged many thousands of their own testimonies, for the disproving of those errors and superstitions, which the same Authors, in other places, or at least in their practice, do apparently either allow, or admit of. This is the wordy answer which the Rejoinder giveth unto the testimonies alleged in the Abr. (pag. 33.34.) for to praevent our bragging: now let us try if the Argument naked of testimonies, will not stand.

3. The Argument is this: If those Ceremonies which God himself ordained, to teache his Church, by their signification, may not be used, much less may those which man hath devised, The Def. his first answer is, that the use of some Jewish rite, without any Jewish opinion, as Circumcision, and Easter. In which answer nothing is found, that toucheth any term of the Argument. Yet upon the occasion of it, the Def. was asked how a Jewish Rite, can be used, without some part of a Jewish opinion?

The Rejoined. answereth, materially, but not formally, and in use, But he should have remembered that the Argument is of significant rites using, and the Def. his answer is of Jewish significant rites using: so that in his grant, there must needs be granted some formal use for signification. Beside, in all using of human mystical rites, upon due consideration, there is some part of a Jewish opinion. I prove it thus: All they that consideratly use carnal, beggarly rudiments, in God's service, have this opinion, that such rites as the Jewish (set praefiguration aside which no Christian ever admitted) are good in the Christian Church. But all that so use human mystical rites, use carnal, beggarly rudiments, in God's service. Ergo. The assumption I prove thus: All that use mystical rites, whereto there is no Spirit annexed by God, as unto the Evangelical institutions of the New Testament, use carnal beggarly rudiments, in God's service. But they which use human mystical rites, use mystical rites, whereto there is no Spirit annexed by God. Ergo. The Proposition cannot be denied, until a better definition of such rites be given: nor the assumption, except an Evangelical promise can be shown of Spiritual blessing upon the use of human mystical rites.

Concerning Circumcision.

4. Because the Def. for an example of a Jewish rite, lawful for Christians to use, named Circumcision, the Repl. concluded, that belike, he holdeth Circumcision, as it is used under Prester John, to be lawful.

The Rej. therefore resolveth us, that He doth so: and also challengeth the Repl. for saying nothing to disprove him. Upon this provocation, it is necessary to say some-thing against these patrons of Circumcision. Where it is to be marked, that the question is of Ecclesiastical Ceremonies devised by man for signification of moral duties; whether it be lawful, for a Church repraesentative, (such as our Convocation) to appoint, and urge Circumcision, in this kind, and to this purpose, upon those Christians who are under their power?

5. Now of this question in the formal state of it, I find not, that scarce any doubt was among understanding Christians, before this Def. and Rej. being urged thereto by direct consequence from their principles, have now found it necessary, to maintain the affirmative part, for defense of our beggarly Ceremonies.

There was some difference betwixt Jerome, & Augustine, about observing of legal Rites, & in special about Circumcision (as appeareth out of the Epistles which passed betwixt them, yet exstant) but both of thē agreed on this, that as well to Jew, as Gentile, all religious use of Circumcision, for Ceremony, &c. is now after due publication of the Gospel, unlawful or deadly. All that have written since, agree about the same truth, except Cajetan in one place; who is forsaken & opposed therein by all Papists, the Jesuits themselves not excepted. Our Divines are so confident of this, that from the unlawfulness of Circumcision, they usually dispute against other human Ceremonies: and the Jesuits in answering, are forced to fly unto this (which must be our Def. and Rej. their answer) that the Ceremonies of the old Testament, are not absolutely abrogated, but only in regard of their special manner, end, & intention. Greg. Valent. tom. 2. disp. 7. quaest. 7. punct. 7. Bellar. de effect. Sacr. l. 2. c. 32. which answer is called by D. Fulke (ag. Saund. of images, pag. 672.) a beastly doctrine.

But because it were an infinite and needless labor, to allege the testimonies which may be easily alleged, against Ceremonial Circumcision, among Christians, as unlawful, I will pass on to reasons against it; that the Rej. may no more say, You say nothing to disprove it.

6. First, The only place, in the New Testament, by which all Divines (as the Rejoinder speaketh, pag. 75.) prove a power in the Church to constitute Ceremonies, is 1. Cor. 14.26.40. Edification, decency, order. But the Apostle, in that chapter, doeth no way give leave either unto our, or any other Church to constitute Circumcision for a Ceremony. Therefore no Church hath power to constitute Circumcision for a Ceremony. For Order, and Decency, no man in his right wits will say that Circumcision cometh under their notion, And as for Edification, it hath been formerly shown, that it doeth not require new instituted significant Ceremonies, much less a rejected or abrogated Ceremony, but only is the ende of orderly and decent carriage of things instituted by God.

7. Secondly, no part of the partition wall, betwixt Jews and Gentiles, may by any Convocation-house, or other Church be reared up again. But Circumcision is a part, nay a principal corner-stone of that partition-wall, howsoever it be interpreted, so it be appointed. Ergo.

8. Thirdly, Circumcision cannot be esteemed more lawful to be instituted for a significant Ceremony, then a Paschal lamb: and they two being brought into the Church, what shall hinder (if it please our Convocation house) but the greatest part of the old Ceremonial law, may in like manner follow? For the Rejoinder cap. 2. sect. 6. acknowledgeth no other limites, or bounds for number of such Ceremonies, then the judgment of those to whose discretion it belongeth to judge thereof.

9. In the fourth place, It is not lawful for any Church to impose Ceremonial burdens upon Christians. But Circumcision is a great burden to them upon whom it is imposed: as our Convocation men would confess, if it were imposed upon them. Ergo.

10. Fifthly, It is not lawful for any Church, or Convocation-house, to usurp authority over the bodies of men, especially unto blood. But appointing of Circumcision is usurping of authority over men's bodies, to the shedding of blood. Ergo. Add unto this, that the Convocation-house may better appointe, that all English men, should have their lips, or their ears pared, or their ears nailed to their Parish-Church door, for signification of that duty, which they are bound to perform with their ears and lips, then such Circumcision as is in use with the Jews, and Prester-John. These things considered, I think there is no reasonable man, but will sooner reject our Ceremonies, for bringing such a foul tail after them, (as that our Convocation may cause all English-men to be Circumcized) then admit of Circumcision, for love of our paultrie Ceremonies.

11. Presently after the Def. had excused Jewish Rites, if they were used without Iewish opinion, he cōfesseth (without distinction) that all Jewish-Rites are abolished. Wherein the Repl. noted a contradiction. But the Rejoinder (to help at a dead lift) distinguisheth betwixt Jewish Ceremonies, as they were typical or figurative and necessary, and Jewish Ceremonies, as they are morally significant, and free. Now for necessity and freedom, enough hath been spoken in the first part. In the other distinction, he disliketh nothing but typical signification: so that

(in his imagination) any Jewish Ceremony may be now used, and by our Convocation-house imposed upon us, if typical signification of Christ to come be taken from it. And is not this a Christian doctrine of Ceremonies; that sacrifying of a lam•e to signify Christ already come (as D. Reinolds ag. Hart. cap. 8. div. 4. doeth conclude from the like answer of Hart• is now lawful? It may be he will answer, that he doeth not allow of Ceremonies signifying Christ at all.

But it hath been formerly shown, that our sign o• the Cross doeth immediately and directly signify Christ his death upon the Cross.

But let all this be as the Rej. would have it: what i• this for the defense of the Def. who said even now▪ that a Jewish Rite, without a Jewish opinion, is not unlawful; and then addeth, that yet it is more safe to inven• new Ceremonies, then those Jewish rites now abolished? Is • Jewish Rite used without a Jewish opinion, typical▪ Or is it only less safe, to use abolished types, then new invented Ceremonies? This is nothing else but to make ropes of sande.

12. Upon the former grante (that all those Jewish rites, which were once God's institutions, are now abolished) the Repl. concluded, in the words of D. Whitaker's: Num vero veteres figurae sublatae sunt, ut locus esset novis? Num Divinae sublatae sunt, ut humanae succed•ent? Are Divine Ceremonies abolished, that human may be erected in their place?

The Rej. heerupon complaineth of manifest abusing and perverting D. Whitaker his words. And why so, I pray? 1. D. Whitaker spake of Divine figures, and the Repl. by corrupt translation maketh him to speak of Divine Ceremonies. As if D. Whitaker's did understand by •igures typical praefigurations of things to come only, in his di•pute against the Papists, who by Bellarmino in that place confess, the Ceremonies of the Old Testament were figures of the New Testament, and therefore when the thing it self is come should cease.

And what else could he understand, but significant Ceremonies? Doeth not the Rej. rather pervert D. Whitaker's meaning, in making him to conclude against typical praefigurations, which Bellarmino did as well disclaim, as himself?

2. He cuts off by the wast, D. Whitaker's his sentence, saith the Rej. Let us therefore take-in the next words, according to the Rej. his own translation: Therefore if the Ceremonies of Moses were removed because they were typical, why should not the Popish Ceremonies be removed which are not less typical? Is not this above the wast, against significant Ceremonies? Certainly It was not the meaning of D. Whitaker to charge the Papists with typical praesignifications of Christ yet to come: and therefore he must needs understand, by typical, significant Ceremonies.

3. The wholl• intention saith he) w•s, to condemn the Popish Ceremony, as necessary, or Sacramental, But this could not be so: because Bellarmino in that place, first answereth about their figurative nature, and then after addeth:to that which is objected of the number and weight of popish laws. 4. D. Wh. (addeth he) did all•w of human signi•icant Rites: as certain Feasts. Now if D. Wh. yielding something to the stream of time, and custom, did account some such human institutions tolerable, that is nothing to the purpose. For we urge here his general rule only: of Feasts we shall after answer. In the mean time, concerning D. Wh. his general sentence of human significant Ceremonies, let these his words be considered: Bellarmino saith, the *Ceremonies are instituted of the Church to help the ruder sort. I answer the rude are not to be instructed with Ceremonies, God hath given Scripture that out of them the rude may draw instruction. And it is to be observed, that D. Wh. in that place confuteth the one and thirty Chapter of Bell. his second book, de effectu Sacram. But the confutation of the two and thirty Chapter is wholly wanting: in which this Argument was to be handled, in defense of Calvin's, Chemnitz, and Brenz his reason: God would have this difference between us and the Jews, teaching them as children by sensible signs, us, as men more simply without signs. Now that D. Wh. in his Lectures passed over that Chapter with silence, it is not credible; but it seemeth rather, that honest Mr. Allēson found his sentence there so cross to our English tenets about Ceremonies, that he durst not set forth his words in printe. For of D. Wardes fidelity, in setting forth what M. Allenson had praepared for the press (ne verbulo immutato) cannot without wrong be doubted of.*

13. For the backinge of the former consequence, this reason was added, by the Repl. If it had been the will of God, that we should be taught, by other signs, then those which are appointed in the N. Testament: He could easily, and would surely, either have chosen some of the old, for that use, or appointed some new in their places. The Rej. his answer is, that God willeth human significant teaching Ceremonies, only permissively, not praeceptively. Of which distinction I know not well what to make: as being uncertayn whether he meaneth, that God hath only permitted in general, that Christians may be taught (if men shall think fitting) by human signs; or that he hath commanded that in general, and only permitted the particulars to men's discretion! Howsoever, those who usurp this authority, must show good evidence of this permissive will of God, before we can find ourselves, either praeceptively, or permissively willed of God, to subject ourselves unto their institutions. But that evidence we have hitherto expected in vain. The Rej. to darken the cause objecteth, that It is God's will, that we should worship him constantly in one set place, at such an hour, in such an order; and yet these are not prescribed by God. Where it is not true that it is God's will, to have us bound constantly to one place, time, and order of worship. 2. So far as we can discern God's will for to have us use any one place, time, and order, we discern that will to be praeceptive, and not merely permissive.

For all know, that God hath commanded most convenient place, time, and order, for to be observed in his service: When therefore (all circumstances considered) we find this place, time, and order, most convenient, we observe it as commanded of God. The like cannot be said of our Ceremonies: except first it be shown, that God hath commanded human significant Ceremonies in general: and after it be made apparent, that our significant Ceremonies are more convenient for us, then others.

14. The Def. having given a reason, why it is safer to invent new Ceremonies, then to use those old ones of the Jews: because they might ingender an opinion of necessity: and so might bring in all the Levitical law: was answered by the Repl. 1. that though more danger may be in some respect, on the one side, yet more may be absolutely on the other. To this (though it be evident) the Rej. answereth with a bare denial. 2. The Repl. observed, that the inventing of new human Ceremonies have engendered an opinion of necessity in them: and have brought in all the Popish law of Rites: so that the comparison, even in these respects, may be questioned.

The Rej. here first observeth, that it was formerly alleged out of Calv. Ep. 259. that the original of all human Ceremonies was, that men would needs forge new worships of God. In which words, he findeth more then any other man can: opinion of necessity: and upon that accuseth the Repl. of I know not what varying uncertainty, without any reason at all. Afterward, he observeth, that Jewish Ceremonies have more color of necessity, because of their first Divine institution.

Now let that be so: yet if preaching, or the Churches sentence declared in a Convocation, be sufficient to remove from Ceremonies all false opinion (as the Def. and Rej. would persuade us) that maketh no such difference, but that the comparison may still be questioned.

SECT. 7. Concerning Images, &c.

1. A Third reason brought against significant Ceremonies, was, that they open a gap to Images, &c. where the Reader must remember, or consider, that the meaning is: Images instituted for signification of moral duties, may as well be set up in Churches, as Cross and Surplice. The Def. his answer was (to pass over superfluity of words) that Images are not to be accounted Popish, or unlawful, but only in regard of superstitious adoration. Wherunto it was replied, that then Cassanders Images (not for adoration, but for information & incitement) are not Popish: which the Rej. doeth not only grante, but also proveth it, by the consent of Calvin himself, Instit. lib. 1. capit. 11. sect. 12. where he saith, that Historical Images, or Pictures, may have some use, in teaching, and putting, in remembrance.

Now for this, let it be considered, that Calvin in that section, speaketh only of ordinary pictures, for teaching and putting in remembrance of that which they repraesent of themselves, without any Ecclesiastical institution, as certain words written do signify a certain meaning, without any special institution. Suche (it may be) would be the picture of Ananias in a white Surplice, signifying with other pictures agreeable to the story, that Paul esteemed and called him a whited wall, Act. 23.3. But in the very next section, which is the thirteenth, Calvin, disputing against setting up of any Images in Churches, doeth sufficiently declare, that he allowed of no Ceremonial religious use of Images, such as is of our Cross, and Surplice.

2. The Replier alleged against this defense of Ceremonial religious use of Images, especially in Churches, the common consent of our Divines. Against this, the Rej. first opposeth Luther and the Lutherans: and then asketh if they be none of our Divines? To which I answer, that they are in most main points our Divines: but about this buisnesse they are no more our, then about Vbiquitie, Consubstantiation, &c. for which they disclaim us, even the whole Church of England, as no part of the Catholic Church, but Sectaries, Sacramentarians, &c. Secondly, the history of Luther about Images is well known: how in opposition to Carolastadius, who brake down Images without his consent, he would have them to be tolerated, only for a time, until men were more fully instructed. But that he allowed them for good Ceremonies of religion, that cannot be shown. M^r. Fox, in the story of Luther, hath this: Luther disliked the rashness of Caro•astadius, in stirring up the people, to throw down Images, without authority, and before the people were taught, that Images serve to no purpose. Not that he would maintain Images (as he said) to stand, or to be suffered: but that this ought to be done by the Magistrate &c. This was Luther enforced unto, by the slanderers, that accused Protestants of sedition and tumultes, &c. This is no argument, for the Magistrate to let Images stand; who may and should remove them, and will not. The cause why Luther did so stand with the standing of Images, was time, and not his own judgment. He wished them away. Nay (as Zwingli relateth) he turned them, some with their feet upward, and some with their faces toward the wall, & their backs to the people, for to make them not religious, but ridiculous. Thirdly, the Lutherans make this one of their controversies, against Calvin, Beza, &c. whether Images may be tolerated in Churches, or in religious use. Fourthly, Polanus (who was borne among the Lutherans in Silesia) in Ezech. cap. 11. testifieth, that the Lutheran Images, are worshipped of most Lutherans, &c. and therefore are Idols to be avoided. And will the Rej. then defend the Lutheran use of Images?

3. In the next place, the Rej. asketh, in mumminge fashion, if Vrsinus, Junius, & M^r. Perkins be not of our Divines? or if they do not acknowledge an historical use of Images lawful? To which I answer, that they are in our consenting Divines.

For Vrsine, his words are plain (parte 2. pag. 45. they must needs have large consciences, who blush not to reckon a thing of the worst example, and from heathenish rite, and custom brought into the Church, not without the great disgrace and hurt thereof, among indifferent things. Where it must be observed, that he disputed against Flaccius Illiricus, about Images, even in the Lutheran use, which our Def. and Rej. maintain. Junius also is ours. His words are these (adv. Bell. de Imagin. lib. 2. cap. 12. v. 30. It is God's cause and ours (as is plain out of the word, that neither his Image nor Christ's, nor any of the Saints for a religious end, be set up in any place (specially that is appointed for God's worship) or at any time without his order. Verily those Images are to be reckoned not only among things Superfluous, but Scathie and Forbidden things. M^r. Perkins (being in every man's hands) may be easily consulted with, upon the second Commandment, and in his treatise of Idolatry.

4. Beza, with his fellow Ministers of Geneva, are next brought in, who allowed many pictures, to be set forth in the Frenche Bible. Beza his judgment (even of Lutheran Images) is plain in his answer to Westphalus, a Lutheran, capit. 36. The placing of Images in Churches we think a 1000. times flatly forbidden by the word of God. Whosoever would see Beza's resolute judgment, about the Lutheran use of Images, which the Def. approveth of, let him look upon his Antithesis ad th^s. 4. Witenbergentium, in Colloquio Mompelgardensi: & ad Colloquium Mompelgardense, parte 2. And he shall find enough to satisfy him, not only about Beza's judgment, but (if he be a good Protestant) concerning the cause, or question it self. For no answer of moment could ever be brought forth, by any either rigid, or gentle Lutheran, from that time, unto this day.

As for those pictures in the Frenche Bible, they are not significant Ceremonies of religious use by special institution; but such signs as Characters or letters, concerning which, answer is given, in the first section of this Chapter, out of Alexander Hales: They signify holy things not as they are holy, but as they are things.

The Rej. therefore fore-seeing what would be answered, goeth about to praevent it, by saying, that the Def. condemneth all religious use of Images, properly so called, 1. e. whose determination must be to Godward, as Polanus in 2. Praecep. expresseth the meaning. Which expression I cannot find in Polanus, but this to our purpose: Images are not to be allowed in Churches for laymens books.

Neither can the Def. or Rej. deny all religious use of Images, properly so called; except they deny significant Images, appointed for commonefaction and institution of men in religious duties, to be a religious use. Which if they could have done, they needed not have admitted Images into the same rank with their income significant Cerimonies, accidental parts of religious worship. By this also is answered that which he addeth of simple historical use of Images, as separated from all religious use.

5. Of having Images for religious use, the negative is defended by Calvin, and the affirmative by Bellarmine, de Imag. lib. 2. cap. 9. in which question, it was observed by the Replier, that the Def. taketh Bell. his part.

The Rejoinder here first maketh a kind of doubt, whether Calvin did not therein contradict himself! But not trusting to that, he addeth, that the question was, whether Images may be well (recte) placed in Churches? because things lawful in them selves, are not lawful in all times & places to be used. Now the mere looking upon that Chapter of Bell. will presently manifest, that Calvin, calling Images in Temples, Idolatrour signs set up wherewith the Churches are defiled, never meant so to minse the matter, as to make them lawful, but not expedient. And in deed, if Images may be used for commonefaction, and institution, as Ecclesiastical significant Ceremonies, there can be no reason given, why they should be shut out of the Church, where Ecclesiastical significant Ceremonies have their chiefest use.

This is certain, that the Def. expressly denieth the bringing in of Images into Churches, for some such uses as Bellarmine speaketh of, cap. 10. For instruction, and erudition, for stirring up unto imitation, and for praeserving of the memory of Christ, and Saints, he denieth (I say) this to be any part of Popis' use or abuse about Images, when he saith, that Only in regard of superstitious adoration, the use of Images is to be called Popish.

6. It was added by the Repl. that the Def. his assertion is directly against the Homilie against the peril of Idolatry, unto which we are bound to subscribe. If this be true (saith the Rejoinder) the Bishop deserveth to be suspended: the Replier, if it be untrue. Now I do not desire that he alone, (separated from the rest either partaker of the same or guilty of equal faults,) should be supended: but I dare adventure my suspension, against his, that neither he nor the Rej. can clear his assertion, from direct contradiction unto that Homilie. I will take no other words for proof of that which the Repl. saith, then that found in a book written against M^r. Richard Montague, about the like sentence, called A dangerous Plot, &c. pag. 94. and 95. where these words are quoted out of that Homilie: The words Idol and Image, be words of divers tongues, and soundes: yet used in the Scripture indifferently, for one thing always. To bring Images into the Churches, is a foul abuse, and great enormitie. They be forbidden, and unlawful. They are not things indifferent, nor tolerable. If the Def. will say, that his assertion is not contrary to these words, then I am contented, that his suspension should be deferred longer then M^r. Mountagues promotion was, after he had written this, and such like scandalous doctrines, tending directly to the overthrow of our religion. And this reason may be alleged for him: that M^r. Montague in some points went so far beyond D. Morton, that he reckoneth him among the Puritan Bishops.

7. The Repl. noted also, that the Def. his assertion confirmeth Bellarmino's fowl words, who saith, that the Apology of the Church of England lieth, in affirminge the Council of Franckford to have decreed the abolishing of Images: de Council. lib. 2. cap. 8. because the only answer is that which Junius (in his notes upon that chapter) giveth: He that forbiddeth Images to be worshiped, doeth forbid having of Images worshipable, especially in Churches: which answer this Def. doeth flatly deny. The Rej. answereth, that the meaning of B. Jewel, in that place of the Apology, was, not that the Council did simply take away Images, but contrary to the Council of Nice, which required the adoration of them. But 1. If these words do not show Jewel's meaning, yet certainly they declare Junius his mind and judgment, plainly. How then dare the Rej. avouche Junius to have allowed Images worshipable? 2. Jewel his words are: Charles the Great had a Council at Franckford, contrary to the 2. Nicen Council, concerning the taking away of Images: where the taking away is not limited by contrariety to the Nicen Council, but manifestly explaineth the sentence wherein that contrariety did mainly consist. 3. Learned Jewel knew, how to write plainly, so that his words and meaning may be understood. Now what his judgment was of Images for religious use, (adoration set a part) appeareth evidently, as in his 14. Article, so especially in that notable and Prophetical sentence of his, concerning the Image of the Cross of Christ, as it was in some place or places of England: Si illa mala Crux stat, nos cadimus. If that evil Cross stand▪ we (or our religion) must fall.

This is related by D. Humphrie, in the history of B. Jewel's life and death, a little before the ende. And in very deed, except those which write against the Papists, do refute all Images instituted for religious signification, they do not make any difference bewixt us, and a great part of Popish Doctors. For (as Bilson, against the Jesuits Apology, pag. 572. well observeth) this is the doubt, betwixt us and the Papists, whether we should not content ourselves, with such means as God hath devised for us, and commended unto us, thereby daily to renew the memory of our Redemption; or else invent others of our own heads? Nay if we admit of significant Images, as religious Ceremonies, I would fain know how we in England can condemn, those that wor•hip before them, or them commemoratively, or recordatively, as Petrus de Crabrera (in 3. q. 25. a 3. disp. 2. n. 35.) speaketh, and Vasquez defendeth to be the common tenet of the Romish Doctors. For that is nothing else, but at the beholding of a Crucifix, or such like Image, and calling to mind Christ, and our duty to him, upon the same to worship him which (upon the supposition of their religious signification lawful) can hardly be condemned by those which hold kneeling at the Communion good.

Concerning Oil, Lighte, Spittle, Creame and H. Water.

8. In the Abridgement, unto Images were joined Oil, Lights, Spittle, Cream, and Holy Water. But it pleased the Def. to pass over Lights, and Cream, untouched. And concerning Oil and Spittle, by the Rejoinder his own correction of the Repliers collection, his answer is: that they, having their birth and being from an Apish imitation of a miraculous employment of them, are therefore to be kept out of doors, though some significant Ceremonies be let in. Now this is no answer (as the Replier observed) except the miraculous using of anything doeth forbid, that it should at any time after be used for signification. Which the Rej. would neither affirm, nor deny; but only calleth it a flout. But it is such a flout, as being granted, it cashiereth the Cross, as being above all other Ceremonies for fame of miracles wrought by it, and the Surplice also, as being, in part, an Apish imitation of the Angels miraculous apparitions in white. But the truth is: our Prelates do place it in the Churches power, to retain, as Ceremonies of Baptism, Chrism, Salt, Candles, Exorcismes, Ephata, and the Consecration of the Water, so well as the Cross. These are the very words of Lancelot Andruus, the late famous B. of Winchester, in his answer to the 18. Chapter of Cardinal Perrons Reply, pag. 12. or sect. 17. For Holy Water, his more distinct answer was, that their (i. e. Papists) sprinkling of water upon the People, for remembrance of their Baptism, if it were applied only for to make them often mindful, and careful to keep their vow of Christianity, made once to God in Baptism, it might be called a moral Ceremony and Christian. But as it is used in Romish Church, as operative, to the purging of venial sins, and driving away of Devils, it is Popish and execrable. I am constrained to repeat the Def. his words, that they may discover the vanity of the Rej. his exceptions against the reply to them opposed: which was, that Calvin Inst. lib. 4. cap. 10. s. 20. And Junius in Bellarmine de Cultu Sanctorum, libr. 3. cap. 7. n. 8. were of another mind: &c.

The Rejoinder 1. blameth the Replier for making show, as if the Def. were fairly inclined to let in the use of Holy Water: But without any cause, except he will deny the Def. to be fairly inclined, to let in the use of a moral Christian Ceremony, as the Defender calleth it. 2. He observeth, that the Def. named not H. Water, but sprinkling of Water upon the People. Now the Rej. saith expressly thus: We come to that which they (the Papists) call H. Water their (i.e. the Papists) sprinkling of Water upon the People, &c. confounding plainly these two terms. 3. He noteth, that the Defender did not say it may be, but it might be called Christian: that is (by the Rejoinder his interpretation) if superstition had not stained it. Now I cannot see any difference betwixt that which the Replier saith, it may be accounted Christian, were it not for this or that; and this of the Rejoinders: It might be so accounted, if it were not for this or that. But if a stain of superstition, doeth hinder, that a human Ceremony cannot be after called Christian, though that superstition be taken from it, by doctrine & profession, what will become of our Ceremonies, which the Rejoinder doeth so labor to maintain as Christian, that he hath scarce one thread left about him dry, or free from his sweating? 4. He denieth the Defender to have said, that were it not for the operative power which is ascribed unto it, it might be accounted Christian.

Wherein whosoever will but look upon the Defender his own words, even now quoted, must needs wonder, what subtle difference the Rejoinder can conceyve betwixt his formal words as only making mindful, it is Christian, but not as operative: and that sense which he denieth. 5. Because both the Defender and Rejoinder do make so much of operative virtue ascribed by the Popish Doctors unto Holy Water, for cleansing from venial sins, as that therein they place all the Popery and fault of it: let them know, that diverse of the best learned among them do flatly deny it. As Estius in 4. pag. 14. Some speak improbably, that Holy Water Con•erreth remission of venial sin, only by the deed done. Vasquez in 3. disp. 128. cap. 5. ar. 4. Sacramentals do not work remission of venial sin, nor were instituted for any such end, but to stir up the mind to abandon them. Now as for necessity, wherewith the Rejoinder would put off Calvin: Bellarmine himself (de Pontif. l. 4. c. 18.) answereth: It is an admonition or holy institution only without any obligation to a fault if it be omitted. They sin not who (without contempt) do not Sprinkle themselves with Holy Water, when they enter the Church. Junius his words are so full and plain, that they admit no answer: no human ordination can make it good. 6. The Rep. conclusion: that such sprinkling of water as the Def. alloweth, may perhaps be called I wish: but not Christian, without taking Christ's name in vain; cannot be eluded by the Rejoinder his comparatively Christian, no more then some uncleanness may be called Christian, in comparison of filthiness contrary to nature.

9. In the following passages, concerning abuse of imposing human Ceremonies, and P. Martyrs, judgment, nothing is worth the answering, which hath not been formerly cleared. Only about that which the Def. affirmeth, concerning the shutting up of the gap, which was said to be opened by this doctrine of human significant Ceremonies, in God's worship, something must be answered unto the Rejoinder his fierce accusations. 1. The Rejoinder asketh, If anymore significant Ceremonies have been brought-in this threescore years? To which I answer, first that there have been of late more bringing in of Altars, with bowing unto thē, then was before: and at Durrham, the third Seat of our Def. more superstitious observations are now said to be urged, then in threescore years before. Secondly, it is well known, that in threescore years, there have scarce any general significant Ceremonies been newly brought into the Church of Rome: yet Chamier (tom. 2. pag. 1299.) answereth to the like evasion: We are to regard not only what is brought in, but what may be brought in. For while such authority is challenged, the oke is not certain, but wavering. 2. Because the Replier said, that the gap is every day made wider and wider by such defences as this is, which allow of Images themselves, for some religious use; because by this means any Crucifix may come in, that is not greater then the Church door: the Rejoinder accuseth him of a steeled conscience, if he doeth not bleed for such an injurious jest of falsehood, tending to bring them into suspicion, and hatred: so that in his charity, we can no longer be accounted sincere men. And I pray you why? Forsooth the Def. doeth not allow all Images, and in Churches too, and for religious use. Now (if his heat be over) let him consider the Def. his words, cited, allowed, and maintained by himself, pag. 291. the use of Images, only in regard of superstitious adoration, is to be called Popish, and not true. What distinction is here betwixt Images? though he was not by the Replier accused, as favoring all Images, but only a Crucifix. And let him tell us, if he doeth (or can by his grounds) disallow of all Crucifixes? or if there be no use of such Images, in Churches, but only for superstitious adoration? or if there be no religious use of a significant Image beside adoration? The case is so plain, that every man may see the Rejoinder in this place, breaking out into an intemperat passion, for want of a reasonable answer to that which he was ashamed to confess.

3. The Rejoinder confessing that our Prelates can when they please, open the gap, to many other Ceremonies like to these which now they urge upon us, addeth notwithstanding, that the Replier his spirit in saying so, transported him, to involve his Majesty, and the State, by an uncharitable surmize. And that this gap shall never be opened, unless our janglings, and our sins bring God's displeasure upon our land. Now alas, what involving is this of Civil powers, to say, that the Prelates, by their permission, may bring in threescore Ceremonies, as well as three. And what human religious Ceremonies can be brought into England, without our sins desert? As for his intermixing of our janglings, as a possible cause, it is not worth any jangling.

Concerning the second Commandment.

10. One Argument is yet to be handled, either omitted, or (as the Rejoinder saith) put off unto another place, by the Defendant. The Argument standeth thus: The second Commandment forbiddeth to make unto ourselves, the likeness of any thing whatsoever, for religious use: as Bucer, Jewel, Fulke, Andrew's and Bilson do interpret it. Therefore to make, appoint, or use significant Ceremonies, of man's devising, is unlawful.

The Rejoinder answereth, in general, that Religious use, by these fore-named Authors, is taken. 1. For worship to the Image: 2. Worship to God, by the Image: and not simply, that which may any ways confer to the furtherance of Religion. Wherein, he saith nothing but truth, and yet no truth at all to the purpose: except he understandeth in the that which he affirmeth, only, 1. e. that they meant no more, but worshipping to, and by: and in that he denieth, by simply, no difference, betwixt any of those things that help forth or further Religion: as if civil circumstances, and instituted religious Ceremonies, were all one. And if this be his meaning, it requireth more than his simple testimony, to confirm it.

11. For the backing of this Argument, it was first observed by the Replier, that the word likeness, used in the second Commandment, is general, and comprehendeth under it, all religious similitudes: because they are homogeneall to Images, there expressly forbidden. To this the Rejoinder answereth nothing: but only saith, that our Ceremonies are not religious similitudes in such a sense as the Commandment intendeth, and Divines understand. And that the Replier speaketh ignorantly: because the Commandment doeth as expressly forbid such similitudes, as any graven Images.

Now the first of these sayings, we cannot understand, until the Rejoinder explaineth himself, what that sense is, in which the Commandment intendeth to forbid all religious similitudes? As for the second, to leave the Repliers ignorance unto the readers judgemēt, more in it is granted, then was demanded: viz: that all religious similitudes are expressly forbidden in the second Commandment.

12. It was secondly added by the Replier, that significant Ceremonies are external acts of religious worship, even as they are used to further devotion▪ Suarez, in 3. q. 65. ar. 4. Bell. de Eff. Sacr. lib. 2. cap. 29, and 31. and therefore being invented by man, of the same nature with Images, by which, and at which, God is worshiped. The Rejoinder here (for want of a better answer) flieth to his old Sanctuary, of meritorious, necessary, and immediate worship grossly held by Papists of their Ceremonies, whether they be significant, or not significant. But he hath in the former part of this writing, been so beaten out of this burrow, that we need not again spend time in digging about it. Let any man look upon the places quoted, and he shall find, that (merit necessity, and immediatnesse set a part) significant Ceremonies are external acts of religious worship: which was all that this argument required. And I dare leave it (though not to the Rejoinder yet) to D. Burgesses judgment, if merit, necessity, be things either chiefly, or at all, forbidden in the second Commandment, more then in any other? Certainly, meritorious conceits are generally forbidden: but in no one Commandment specially: and necessary binding of Conscience by man, belongeth to the first. The Replier looking for an answer something like this, of essential and accidental worship, for praeventing of it, said that such a distinction would help no more here, then that of the Papists, betwixt 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 , and 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 .

For this the Rejoinder accuseth him of an uncharitable heart, and an unlearned head. But I see no cause: as hath been fully shown in the confutation of that distinction, both in the first part of this writing, and also in the second Argument, or Chapter, of this part. Yet because the Rejoinder is so impatient, of hearing his distinction of essential and accidental worship, compared with the Papists vain distinctions: let any man consider a little the Popish distinctions, which Rivet hath well noted and expressed in his Cases, on the second Commandment: Worship religious is either of it self, or by accident proper or improper of it self, or some other thing, for itself, or in regard of another. Primarie or secondary, proper or Analogical. Absolute or respective, simple or according to some respect. Direct, or reductive, perfect or imperfect. And compare with them the Rej. his distinctions of Ceremonies, and worship, in the first part examined. I doubt not, but he will say, they come nearer together, in the very terms, then one would have expected.

13. The Replier in the next place, argued from the affirmative part of the second Commandment, unto the negative, thus: This Commandment injoyneth obedience to all the worship appointed by God, all which was significative, Heb. 8.5. and 10.1. therefore it forbiddeth any significative Ceremonies to be brought in to the worship of God, devised by man: &c. The Rejoinder here 1. answereth out of M^r. Cartwright, that the Affirmative part injoineth us, to use such as himself doeth approve in his word. Now though in that edition of M^r. Cartw. his Catechism printed an. 1611. the affirmative part is thus expressed: Do that which I command thee, and do no more; Yet that which he quoteth, out of another edition, is enough to cashier all human significant Ceremonies. For what can be more plainly spoken against them, then that only such outward means must be used in God's worship as himself hath allowed▪ But (saith the Rejoinder) M^r. Cartw. reckoneth the reverend gestures of the body, among those outward means▪ What then? Then bodily gestures in religious actions are either determined by God, or may be lawfully appointed for signification, by man. A strange consequence: as if, when God allowed for an offering either a pair of Pigeons, or two Turtle doves, without particular determination, the Priests might have appointed for signification, that only two Turtle doves should be offered!

His second answer is, that all worship of God among the Jews, was not significant in his sense of significant. What his sense is, I know not: but the sense and words of the Replier his argument, was of worship appointed, or instituted, beyond that which is naturaall, or necessary, without any institution, except the law written in every man's heart, be an institution; which he seemeth not to have conceived.

14 The last consideration by the Replier propounded was, that significant Ceremonies, which are by institution, must needs belong unto the second Commandment; as he that maketh an accurate distinction of the Commandments, will presently see: but to man the second Commandment is (in regard of making) wholly negative. Ergo. The Rej. answereth first, that significant Ceremonies may belong rather to the third Commandment, as D. Ames referreth them; or accidentally to the fourth. Now as for accidental belonging to this or that Commandment, it is not in question. To the third Commandment they cannot be directly referred, according to that distinction of the Commandments, which the Rej. himself produceth, in the next words as accurate. As for D. Ames, let any man look upon his Medulla, lib. 2. cap. 13. th. 34.35.36. and he shall see how the Rej. mistook him.

His second answer consisteth in distinguishing the Commandments of the first Table: Wherein (to let other things pass) he maketh the second to provide, that from God we take the prescription of all that, by use of which we may really worship him, and esteem him to be truly and properly honored of us: and the Third to provide, that in all acts of his worship, we carry our selves sincerely and reverently, from this he concludeth, that the right use of Ceremonies, belong rather to the third Commandment, then to the second, as touching their end. Of this I know not well what to make: 1. The argument was of significant Ceremonies, in regard of their institution and making, the Rej. answereth, touching their end. 2. Touching their end, I cannot understand (nor I think any man else) how the proper end of the Cross in Baptism, should be sincerity and reverence; except mixture of human inventions with God's ordinances be sincerity; and presumption of doing so, be reverence. 3. If the second Commandment doeth provide that we take from God the praescription of all real worship; then also of significant Ceremonies, except they be fantastical worship: and yet even figmenta cerebri, cordisve humani, the very phantasies, or images of the mind, not prescribed by God, are (by the most interpreters) held as well forbidden, as outward real images. If the same Commandment doth bind us to God's prescription, in all true worship; then human significant Ceremonies, being not prescribed by God, are fa•se worship. If also in proper true worship; then they are only metaphorical worship, like unto true worship, or at least tropical; which hath been sufficiently confuted in the first part, and in the second Chapter of this.

The third answer given by the Rej. is, that in the second Commandemēt, nothing is forbidden, as touching making, but the instituting, or fancying of our own mere devises, as an immediate means of worshipping God thereby. The force lieth in those two terms, mere devises, and immediate means of worship. Now for the distinction betwixt immediate and mediate worship, it hath been sufficiently canvized in the first part. The other evasion, of mere human devises, is the common refuge of Jesuits, when they are pressed with this argument. So Bellarmino (de effectu Sacram. lib. 2. cap. 32.) to Calvin, alleging that all human will-worship is condemned in Scripture, answereth: That is called human and will-worship which is merely human. &c. but what the Church teacheth is of another nature. Beside, lay these two terms together, and then this is Pes computi: man's devises may be even immediate means of worship, if they be not merely man's.

15 In vie of those grounds, laid by the Repl. against human significant Ceremonies, out of the second Commandment, the Rej. by way of Reconvension faineth two grounds to the contrary: the first whereof is taken from supposed true worship, & means necessarily inducing thereto, as only forbidden in the second Commandment: and the second, from our placing the worship of God, in forbearing these Ceremonies, which he hath not commanded us to fo•bear. Now to both these earthy dead grounds (or Capita mortua) answer hath been given in the first part; partly in the chapter of Superstition, and partly in that of Difference betwixt our and Popish Ceremonies. So that nothing need here be added. Yet in few words, 1. He forgetteth himself much, in distinguishing significant Ceremonies (which he confesseth to be some kind of worship) from true worship; except he will confess them to be false worship. 2. He considered not what he writ, when he speaketh of means necessarily inducing to true worship. For no Papist ever conceyted, that their Ceremonies, were either necessary to true worship, as if no true worship could be without them: or necessarily inferring true worship, as if he that used them, howsoever he did it, must needs perform true worship: and yet one of these senses must needs be the meaning of that phrase, if it hath any meaning at all. 3. He taketh the whole question for won, or granted, when he speaketh of our forbearance of that, which God hath not commanded us to forbear: and thereupon concludeth thus: God hath not commanded us to forbear human •significant Ceremonies. Ergo.

SECT. 7. Concerning the Oath-gesture of Abraham's Servant.

1. IN this section, the Def. beginneth a confutation of the fore-proved Proposition: All human Ceremonies, being appropriated to God's service, if they be ordained to teache any spiritual duty, by their mystical signification, are unlawful. His Scripture confutation (for want of rule or precept) is only by Examples.

Now to omit words of no weight, his first example is Abraham's directing his servant, to put his hand under his thigh, when he did swear. Gen. 24.2. Against this, the Replier first excepted, that in probability, Abraham was not the appointer of this Ceremony. The Rej. answereth, that this is not material to the point, what man appointed it, so that it was not of Divine appointment. So that their first proof of Ceremony appointed by man, is from an example appointed they know not by whom: only begging of us to grant, that it was not appointed by God, which they ought to have proved. Yet the Replier for citing Calvin and Junius, as leaving it most probable, that is, was an ancient custom before Abraham (which any man looking upon their interpretations, may see to be true) is called by the Rej. a false man in all his allegations. But let that go.

2. Because the Def. for magnifying of this example, said, that there is not a more Divine service of God, then the taking of an oath; the Replier denied this: affirming the proper, and principal ende of swearing is (not to worship God, but) to confirm a truth. To this the Rejoinder answereth 1. that so the proper ende of Preaching, Sacraments, Petitioning, is edification of men, confirmation of faith, and obtaining of mercies. Where if he had repeated the Repliers other term, proper and principal ende, his exception had been at an ende: because the principal ende of these means, is to honor God. Beside those very ends which he mentioneth, edification, confirmation of faith, and obtaining of mercy, are illfavorely distinguished from God's worship, as no more appertayning to it, then the fidelity which a Vassall, or Copi-houlder, doeth by oath confirm ordinarily unto his Lord. The Rejoinder his second answer is, the Replier before placed worship in the nature of the action it self▪ and yet now placeth it in the ende of the action. As if the nature of an action, may not be gathered from the proper or natural ende of it! Nay the Replier before declared, that the ende of an instituted means, is part of the nature thereof, and hath a place in the definition of it.

D. Jackson (in his Original of unbelief, pag. 327. and 328.) by the difference given of the Replier, doeth well answer the Popish Proctors for Images, who allege as like, the Ceremony used in an oath: Particular oaths, given only for satisfaction of men, are not such proper acts of God's service, as supplications, thanksgivings, and solemn vows are. The honor of God would be no whit losse, if the use or necessity of oaths among men, were none. In supplications, and thansgivings, it is far otherwise, the more often & solemnly we praise God, or pray unto him, the more we honor him; because these are direct and immediate acts of his service, &c.

3. Because the Def. proved nothing to the purpose, about this Gesture, he was required to prove it significative of some spiritual duty: For it was in probability only a common sign of subjection, as well out of an oath, as in it, without any respect unto Christ. The Rejoinder instead of a proof, saith, that some Ancient and Later Writers do so conceit. And if the Def. and he also do conceit it so, we do not strive with them, about that: but men's conceits are no great proofs. He addeth 2. that if it were a sign of subjection yet might it be significant of a spiritual duty. But may be, and might be, is no proof.

He subjoigneth 3. that it was a common sign used in solemnity of that kind, as well out of an oath, as in it; this (saith he) is barely and boldly affirmed, & implieth a contradiction, as importing other solemnities without an oath, of the same kind with this, wherein was an oath. Now for bareness, or boldness, of a probable conjecture, by way of answer, it should not be objected by him that bringeth mere conceits and might bees, for proving Arguments. And as for contradiction, if he had repeated the word subjection, then he might have discerned signs of that kind, as well without, as with an oath. By the noting of this also he may see how the Replier herein agreed with Calvin. For no Gesture of subjection to a superior man, is wont to be proper unto subjection signified in time of swearing.

Neither is the Repliers observation (that as imposition of hands, in those parts, did always signify some superiority: so this underposition of hands was, by proportion, fit to signify inferiority, or subjection) this I say was not a mere fiction, as the Rejoinder would have it. For, beside that the meaning was, of the usual imposing of hands in blessing, where the lesser is blessed of the greater, as Scripture teacheth: the Rejoinder hath brought but two examples, to infringe the generality of it Act. 13.2. Lev. 1.4. and in both of these it holdeth. For they that laid hands on Paul and Silas, did it not only in the name of the whole society, which in such cases hath some dispensative superiority over particular members; but also by Commission from God, which gave them in that buisnesse superiority. And he that brought a beast to be sacrificized, Lev. 1. had certainly power over it. If the Rejoinder could have shown us, where, and when, a servant imposed his hand upon his Masters head, or a son upon his fathers, that had been to the purpose. We on the contrary say with Tostatus on Gen. 47. that the putting under of the hand, was never used, but by an inferior, to his superior.

4. Yet the Rej. hath more to say: namely, that the sign of a servants duty to which he is bound by oath, is a mystical sign of some spiritual duty: because all the law is spiritual; and obedience to masters, for conscience sake, is a service of God. Whereto I answer, that I never heard the Hangman's office, which is servile, called a spiritual duty; no though he be bound to it by oath. 2. The oath maketh the thing sworn to, no more spiritual, then a carnal obligation unto it (which may concur with the obligation of an oath) maketh it carnal. 3. The Law is all spiritual, in the manner; but yet all the works required by it are not spiritual, nor so esteemed. The Apostle (1. Cor. 6.) distinguisheth 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉 things pertaining to this life, from spiritual things. All Divines usually distinguish the common moral duties practiced by light of nature, from such as are spiritual. 4. Obedience to masters for conscience sake, is a service, or obedience to God, as it cometh from conscience toward God: but every sign of subjection, is not a sign of it as it cometh from conscience toward God.

5. In the last place, the Replier, supposing all true that hitherto the Def. and Rej. have striven for, yet denieth that anything could be concluded from thence, for our Convocation-power in appointing such Ceremonies: because such Prophets as Abraham might do more then our Convocation.

The Rej. here, would have us show that this was done by Prophetical inspiration: and because this is not done, he calleth this answer a boulting hole, fit for a distressed and willful disputer, whose cause cannot be defended and yet his stomach will not yield. But if he had well considered, that it belongeth not properly to the answer, but to the Opponent, to produce reasons; and how unreasonable it is, for to require a reason proving a thing to be done, of him that judgeth it false, and only for disputation sake granteth his adversary to suppose and take it as true, he would never have abused so many words by misplacing of them. All these things considered, I doubt not (as the Replier said) but Abraham's servant, if he were here present, and need required, would swear, that his example maketh nothing for our Ceremonies.

SECT. 10. Concerning Suarez the Jesuit, his stating of the Controversy, betwixt Protestants, and Papists.

1. IN this section an objection of ours is brought in, without rank or file, in the middle of Examples, forgotten (as the Rej. saith) in the proper place. But nothing of moment is answered thereto, either by the Def. or Rej. which is not sufficiently cleared in the first part of this Writing, Chapter the sixth; except the state which Suarez maketh of the question betwixt us and Papists. This therefore (as being very observable) remaineth here to be declared.

2. The place quoted is in 3. tom. 3. Disp. 15. Sect. 2. The words (as the Replier hath them) are these: The first error is, that only those signs which are written, ought to be retained and used in the Church. The second, that no outward worship of God is lawful, but only that which is appointed by God. The third, that the Church hath not power of commanding, and ordaining those things, (he meaneth mystical Ceremonies) which are necessary for convenient celebration of the Sacraments. Of which three points, there is none, wherein Suarez and the Def. do not jumpe. To this the Rej. first answereth, that Suarez doeth not propounded these three points, as three errors of the Protestants: because he mentioneth not Protestants, but Heretics, which reason is not worth the answering: because he mentioneth Heretics of this time, which phrase is oftener in the Jesuits writings, understood of Protestants, then of any other, as all know that have looked upon them. By the same reason, one may argue, that he understood no special Sect, or persons: because he mentioneth not any by name. But it shall appear, that his meaning could be of no other then Protestants.

3. He addeth in the second place the words going before those quoted, he spake of Suenkflians. And this is true: but nothing to the purpose. For he leaving them as desperate phantasticks, passeth on to others, that is, Protestants, as by and by shall appear.

4. In the next place (saith the Rej.) Suarez speaketh of such as allow some external worship of God, but refuse all Ecclesiastical Ceremonies in his worship, as the inventions of men; and hold nothing to be lawful in God's service, but what is commanded in holy Scriptures; which is the ground of those three errors mentioned by the Replier. This may be called truth: but it is not all the truth, which belongeth to our present purpose. For Suarez his words are these: Others reprove Ecclesiastical Ceremonies as human inventions without authority or precept in Scripture: For they think it unlawful to worship God with any other worship then is in Scripture enjoined. In which ground three errors are contained. Here may a great difference be observed betwixt the Rej. his translation, and Suarez his words; especially in that for those words: They think it unlawful to worship God with any other worship then is in Scripture prescribed, the Rej. giveth these: they hold nothing to be lawful in God's service, but what is commanded in Scripture. For many things are lawful in God's service, which are not worship: as civil circumstances, &c.

5. After those three errors, the Rej. observeth Suarez to speak of some that dissallow not Ceremonies in general, but impugn the Ceremonies of the Church of Rome, as vain and superstitious. These no doubt (addeth the Rej) are the Protestants: to whom he imputeth there no other error, but their opposition against Romish Ceremonies, as vain and superstitious, as the Defender doeth. Concerning this, 1. This therefore was not mentioned by the Replier, because Suarez himself testifyeth, that it is concluded in the former: Which error cannot be founded, but upon one of the three above reject'd errors. 2. Suarez also addeth that these men of whom he in these words speaketh, say nothing against all their Ceremonies, but only, that they are used with intention of worship, as pertaining to the virtue of Religion: that they are done by us with intention of worship and as pertaining to the virtue of Religion. This they hold Superstitious▪ For though in the Sacraments we are to observe a measure and due circumstances, yet this they will onlie have as a certain human polity, not out of intention of worship and religion: for this they say is Superstitious.

Out of these two observations, I make these two conclusions: 1. If this error be necessarily founded on those three mentioned, (as Suarez saith, and showeth) then such Protestants as hold this (among whom the Rejoinder professeth the Defend. and his own name) hold also those. 2. If Protestants hold this tenet, that it is Superstition, for to intend worship in human Ceremonies (as Suarez saith) then our Defender and Rejoinder in this point are by Protestants found guilty of Superstition. For they place special immediate, though improper, accidental, and secondary worship in human Ceremonies; as is to be seen in this Rejoinder pag. 125.127. &c.

Heer they cannot scape, by alleging (as they use to do) that the Papists place proper essential worship in all their Ceremonies. For Suarez in the same place expoundeth the Popish tenet, concerning worship, just as they do theirs: Sacramental Ceremonies belong to secondary worship: not only because they contain External worship, but also in the very External worship it self, they are as it were accidents of other more noble actions.

6. Hitherto we have had noting directly answered, concerning the three errors, which the Replier said Suarez imputed to Protestants, about Ceremonies in general. Nor is any other given but this: that Suarez chargeth those errors, not on Protestants, but on Anabaptists: who hold this negative argument: whatsoever is not commanded in the Word, is unlawful. This the Anabaptists, and not the Protestants, hold, fanatically even about rites, and formalities, &c. To which I reply 1. that if Suarez his words be taken as before they were recited, & not as the Rejoinder doeth ill-translate them, then no man is conversant in the Protestant writings, or have read over that which is formerly cited out of them in these three general Arguments, but must needs confess, the very same sense is to be found in most of our principal Divines: and the same words in many: It is not lawful to worship God with other external worship save with that which is in Scripture prescribed us. And human inventions without warrant from God in Script. are to be reprehended.

2. If all things be Ceremonies, which are circumstances of order, and decency (as the Defender and Rejoinder do not only affirm, but make their chief Anchor) then (whatsoever Gui de Errs discourseth of one furious company of them) much injury is done to the Anabaptists, in making them to hold, that all Ceremonies are unlawful, which are not contained in the Word.

For it is well known, that they have certain times, & places of meeting for worship; certain order of preaching & praying; nay in Baptizing of men-grown more formalities than many Protestant Churches; and even Bishops over divers Congregations, for order sake (as they say.) D. B. having lived in Holland, can scarce be ignorant of these things.

3. To put it out of doubt, that Suarez, under the name of Heretics, in this place, meant Protestants, let any man look upon his book de Religion, Volume 1. treatise 3. lib. 2. cap. 1. and there he shall find these words, to the same purpose: The Heretics of these times say every ceremony, and all worship not prescribed of God, or not contained in the Gospel is Superstition, yea and Idolatry. They stand much upon Deut. 12. Now 1. this cannot be understood of the Anabaptists: because they make no such account of Deutronomie, or the old Testament, as that they found any doctrine chiefly on that. 2. Suarez himself, in the same Chapter, showeth plainly that he there meant Protestants. For he sendeth the Reader, for confutation of these Heretics, to Gregorius de Valentia, tom. 3. disp. 6. q. 11. p. 1. where he disputeth against Herbrandus, a Protestant, not an Anabaptist: & to Lessius de just. & jure, l. 2. cap. 43. dub. 4. where he disputeth about this question, against Calvin. And (lest any man should think, he meant one kind of Heretics there, and another in this place questioned, he there referreth his reader, for further satisfaction about that question, unto this very place, in 3. tom. 3. disp. 15. What can be more clear? When as therefore the Rejoinder upon such sandie grounds, concludeth, that we are somewhat encamped in the Trenches of Anabaptists; because we do not jumpe with Suarez, in condemning these three Errors; we may better conclude, that he and the Def. by rash undermining of us have, unawares, broken into the works of Papists; because they do condemn with Suarez, those three Protestant trueths. And withal (seeing so great a School-Papist as Suarez, in stating of the controversy, maketh no mention of merit, necessity, efficacy, number, or holiness, either inherent or adhaerent) it is but an evasion of the Defend. and Rejoinder upon every occasion, to fly unto these, as only differences betwixt us and Papists, about Ceremonies. And so we have more cleared, then that, for which Suarez his testimony was produced by the Replier: namely, that learned Papists have no opinion of all their significant Ceremonies, which the Defender and Rejoinder do not maintain.

SECT. 11. Concerning the Feast of Purim. Ester. 9.

1. THis example was, seven hundred year since, objected by Papists, unto the Waldenses, for human Ceremonies: & since, by all Papists that have written against Protestants about Ceremomnies; as Gregorius de Valentia, Bellarmine, Suarez, in the places before noted. And we need not seek for new answers about it, seeing that which our Divines have answered is sufficient. Our first answer is that of Junius to Bellarmino, de Cultu Sanct. lib. 3. cap. 10. Praeceptum •uit politicum: which words because they were translated, a precept of order, the Rejoined. catcheth occasion to conclude from thence, that order doeth require institution of new things. But therein he misseth, except he can prove some new religious thing instituted, beside a circumstance of time, which the Replier (whom he seeketh to involve in a contradiction) doeth expressly distinguish from things. His answer is, that though this precept were Political, yet by Junius himself, annot. 17. it was also significant. Wherein he mistaketh Junius his meaning, which is expounded annot. 28. It signifieth no days, nor repraesents mysteries, but is a commemoration that day instituted.

2. It was added by the Replier that some of our own writers at home, say that it was appointed for a civil rejoicing day. Heer the Rejoinder (naming M. Jacob for such a writer) accuseth him of making it a Guttide: As if no Civil day of rejoicing could be without Gutting. Yet there be men reverend for learning, and piety, which say some such thing as the Rejoined. detorteth M. Jacob's words to. For Pellicanus upon that place of Ester, saith thus: The Hebrews solaced themselves with feasts. We read of a festival Solemnity instituted, and that for two days, wherein they please themselves with meats and drinks, &c. But the Jews took up that rite voluntarily as being more prone to the Contentments of the belly, then to the Confidence of the Spirit toward God, whereof in those times they seem to have ben little Careful. And for this sentence, it seemeth to make, that the Jews are said to have made such feasts, before and without any public institution: and that nothing is mentioned in the text: Which two observations do not agree to the Feast of Tabernacles, Neh. 8. which the Rejoined. would make like unto this. Add heerunto, that, if Josephus may be credited) the heathen King, Artaxerxes, was the instituter of this Feast, among the Heathen, and, the Jews at Susan following his order, it came to be propagated by Mordecai, and Hester, unto all other Jews. Josephus, lib. 11. cap. 6.

3. Another answer is, (upon supposition of a religious Ceremony instituted by Mordecai) that it was by Divine direction. The Rejoinder to this returneth, 1. that no man ever so defined before. But he might (when he was a Student in Cambrige) have heard D. Whitaker's thus defining. For in his printed Lectures, de Sacramentis, pag. 206. it standeth so: I answer that both Mordecai did this, God inspiring him, and peradventure by order from some Prophet. And however we do not read that either God, or any Prophet did require this, yet for as much as it stāds approved in Scripture there is no doubt but it was done by Divine authority. As for the several Holy-days instituted 2. Chr. 30. cast in here by the way of the Rejoinder as a President for the Feast of Purim; they agree not. For they were not yearly Holy-days; nor Holy-days at all, of institution properly so called: but an occasional continuation of free-will offerings, (which might be offered any day in the yeear, without new Holy-days) for that one time. If it had been by men appointed, that every year, 14. days should be observed for the Passover Feast, it had fitted to the purpose. But that had been no less praesumption, then if they should have decreed, that every year after, the Passover should be celebrated in the second month, as it was then, by occasion.

SECT. 12. Concerning the Feast of Dedication. John. 10.22.23.

1. A Feast of Dedication is brought-in as an instance of a human Ceremony appropriated unto God's service, out of John 10. Now what Feast of Dedication this was, & whether it were merely of human institution; this hath always been, and is still in great question. Nonnius taketh it for that which Solomon appointed: Chrysostom, Theophilact, Euthymius, Cajetan, Calvin, &c. interpret it of that which began in the time of Ezra: Others of that instituted by the Maccabees 1. Mac. 4. This last the Defender took for granted, and thereupon buildeth his Argument: and yet neither the former, nor this can easily be so evidently proved merely human, as it may be made a foundation for human Ceremonies now. Junius de cultu Sanct. lib. 3. cap. 5. thus answereth Bellarmino, affirming that God did not appoint this Ceremony: It is false: Solomon, Ezras, the Maccabees, followed the Analogy of that place Ex. 4. Lev. 8. the right of which law if it had not been, yet we must needs say that as Prophets they were led by extraordinary & singular revelation, not to be Exemplarie therein to us.

2. The Replier first observed, that this example is much alleged by Papists, against Protestants for their Ceremonies: and so indeed it hath been always, from the time of Waldenses, as was noted, in the 2. Chapter. of our first part. Bellarmino hath it twice: once, de Rom, Pont. l. 4. c. 17. and again, de Cultu Sanct. l. 3. c. 1. To this the Rej. answereth, that this example served ⟨ϕ⟩ Bellarmino's turn, for imposition of Ceremonies upon the conscience as of necessity to be observed, as God's laws; but it serveth the Defender his turn: because as Junius saith, Cor. 3. l. 4. c. 17. an. 5.) it was not enjoined by way of authority, but taken up by consent. He would make us (as it seemeth) believe, that our Ceremonies are not enjoined by way of authority: and if he can do this, he may also persuade us, that we are for refusing them, excluded, suspended, deprived, excommunicated, fined, & imprisoned, without any way (lawful or unlawful) of authority. Concerning necessity in conscience, see the first part, chap. 6.

Another answer of the Rejoynders is notorious: Bellarmino (saith he) allegeth this feast of Dedication, to prove the Dedication, or Consecration of Churches: which is nothing to our question of significant Rites. Now surely if Dedication and Consecration of Churches be nothing to our question of significant Rites; the Def. and Rej. say nothing to the purpose, when they prove this question of signifying Rites, by the Maccabees Feast of Dedication. And if that Feast of Dedication, doeth not prove human Dedications lawful; much less doeth it prove the lawfulness of other significant Ceremonies, such as ours are.

3. The Defendant for backing of this instance, added, that our Savior seemeth to approve that human Feast, by his presence, John. 10. To which it was replied, that he seemeth only: because we only read, that he walked in Solomon's Perch, at that Feast: which he might do, without observing or approving of it. This is Junius his answer to Bellarmine, alleging that Christ by his presence honored that Feast: Christ did not properly honor the Feast, but the Congregation of the faithful at the Feast: For Christ took all such occasions then, to wit, before those solemnities were abolished, of sowing the seed of his Gospel: Nor did Christ ought that we read at those times, but preach in the Temple. And sure I am, that neither walking in the Porch, nor declaring that he was that Christ, belonged properly unto the solemnity of that Feast. If he had preached of Dedications and Consecrations, with allowance, that had been something.

The Rej. objecteth 1. That we plead Christ's approbation of marriage, by his presence. This indeed added unto evident grounds, addeth some honor unto that state: especially, in that a miracle was wrought to the furtherance of a marriage feast: if we had no other plea for lawfulness of marriage, but that mere presence; I, for my part, would as soon separate from my wife, as the rejoinder saith he would from the Church of England, if he were of our mind, about Ceremonies; that is, today, before tomorrow. His 2. objection is, that Christ whipped the buyers and sellers out of the Temple, John. 2. Ergo. Which maketh directly to the clearing of this cause: For there were two whippings of these Merchants out of the Temple; the first whereof was this John. 2. in the beginning of his preaching; the other toward the end of it a little before his passion; so that it appeareth plainly, they were not so driven out, but they came in again, and continued their merchandise there: and yet in the mean space, our Savior was often present in the Temple, without allowance of that their practice. So had he often condemned the traditions of men, in God's worship; and yet was present some time, where they were observed. Beside, because the Def. and Rej. are wont to accuse the Jews for placing holiness, necessity, efficacy, and proper essential worship in human traditions, whereby they would avoid the dint of that general censure which our Savior giveth of them, Mat. 15. Mar. 7. &c. I would fain learn of them, how it appeareth, or may be conjectured, that they placed not as much holiness, necessity, efficacy, &c. in this and such like human Feasts, as in washing of hands before meat. If they did (as any man will think) then how can they say, that our Savior condemned the one, and allowed the other?

The following 13. and 14. Sections are spent about some objections taken out of M'. Cartwrite. But because the slitenesse of this Instance is already sufficiently discovered, I will not cloy, nor deteyne the Reader about them, at this time; but pass on to the next Instance.

SECT. 15. and 16. Concerning the Altar of Jordan. Josh. 22.

1. IT is the Def. and Rej. their fashion, to produce Instances, without proof of their fitness, and so expect from us that they should be disproved: which is all one, as if John a Stiles should in a great traverse, bring forth against John a Nokes, some instrumens, for evidence of his cause, which few, or none, beside himself, can read, (at least so as to discern anything in it making for him) and plead that in them was evidence enough, except John a Nokes could prove the contrary. So it is here, about the Altar of Jordan: no demonstration is first made, how it agreeth to the purpose: but we are challenged to show how it disagreeeth. Yet yielding them this liberty, we have enough to oppose.

2. And first of all, we answer, that this Altar of the two Tribes, was not in the state, or use, religious, as the Cross is, by the confession of an English Bishop, Babington on the 2. Commandment.

The Rejoinder 1. opposeth out of M^r. Parker, par. 1. sect. 34. and 36. that religious in use is that which hath a religious ende: and religious in state, which is Ecclesiastical, belonging to God's service. Ergo. But M^r. Parker in those sect. told him, that religious in a sense common, or mix'lie, all things are, that are done to an holy ende: and religious in sense special, or in state, all those things are, that have Order, Obligation, and a kind of Immobilitie, in God's service. Now the question is not of the former common mixed sense: but of the later special state: according to which, no man can say the Altar of Jordan to have been religious, upon ground of Scripture or reason. Let any man judge then, whether partiality did put out M^r. Parkers eyes (as the Rej. speaketh) or blear theirs, that see not the vanity of this allegation?

3. B. Babingtons words on the 2. Commandment are these: They erected that Altar, not for religion, but in deed for a civil use, as you may see, Josh. 22. The Rejoined. answereth, that he calleth the Altar civil Analogically, because it was ordained by consent of fellow-Citizens, which is as mere a shift, as any yet invented by the Rejoinder. For 1. he calleth not the Altar, but the use, civil. 2. He opposeth this civilitie not unto Divine Institution, as the Rejoinder would have him, but unto the same fellow-Citizens erecting of an Altar for Religion. 3. What he meaneth, appeareth plainly, by his third Proposition, there set down in these terms: It is lawful to make pictures of things which we have seen, to a civil use, but not to use them in the Church, and for Religion.

4. To pass over circumstantial passages, the Def. (proving this Altar to be appointed unto God's service, because it was a pattern of the Lord's Altar, as our Cross is a resemblance of Christ's Cross) was 1. reproved by the Replier: because the Cross, whereon Christ did suffer, was no more holy then Judas: and so not to be compared unto the Lord's Altar. To this the Rejoinder in many words, maketh show of saying something, but I leave it to the Reader, if he saith any thing. I (for my part) cannot discern what it is.

5. The Replier also in the second place alleged▪ that every resemblance of a holy thing, is not therefore holy: because then every Ale-house picture taken from holy things mentioned in Scripture, should be holy; and a model of the Temple, carried by a Tyrian workman, into his country for news, should have been holy.

To this the Rejoinder (after a few words of course) answereth, that this is to separate the resemblance of a thing, from the use of it. As if the Def. had not argued simply, & merely, from the resemblance, making, as yet, no mention of the use! If there be any Sophistry in this argument (as the Rejoinder saith there is) it is first found in the Defender his uncouth reason.

6. The Defender went about to prove, first, that this Altar did mystically signify a spiritual duty, in respect of the Gileadites then living; viz: to teache that the Lord was God.

To this it was replied, that it doeth not appear out of the text, that there was intended any use for the present age, that then lived: nay the contrary may be gathered out of the 24. and 25. verses: We have done it for fear of this thing, saying: In time to come, your children might speak unto our children, &c. So shall your children make our children cease from fearing the Lord. The Rejoinder opposeth, that there is afterward mention made of us, and you. But that is nothing: because it noteth only, that the generations to come, may deny us, on this side Jordan, not to have been joint Tribes with you on the other side of that River. Upon this, the Repl. concluded, that this Altar was no direct help unto devotion. To which is rejoined, that it was not a direct (that is immediate) help unto devotion; but immediately significative, & collaterally for devotion it was. Suche distinctions I never heard, nor read. Any man may see, that a Ceremony directly and immediately signifying a spiritual duty, is a direct & immediate help to devotion. To what other help, this help was collateral, I would fain know.

A further reason of this conclusion was added: viz: then most of the other Tribes should have had use of it, and also reason, to have set up Altars of devotion at every three-way-leet, as Crosses stand. The Rejoinder is 1. that the other Tribes (no doubt) had use of it, as of a witness that the Lord is God. Now let any man consider, whether they which ordinarily resorted to the Tabernacle, and Altar of God, had need of a human Altar, far removed from their sight, to put them in mind, that the LORD was God? And whether the two Tribes and a half, without the consent, or knowledge of the chief Priests, the chief Magistrates, the far greater part of people, and power to appoint unto all Israel a solemn significant Ceremony, for their common use? The Rej. addeth in the 2. place, that all are not bound to the same helps to devotion, and the other tribes needed no such monument, or pattern, having the Altar it self in possession. Where 1. except he holdeth the two Tribes, and a half bound to set up this Altar, he maketh in that no difference: if he so holdeth, then it is no instance of a mere Arbitrarie Ceremony. 2. The two tribes had the Lord's Altar in present possession, as well as divers of the other: so that by this reason, they also for the present need no such monument and pattern: which is the very point in this place questioned.

7. The Replier affirmed, that (in regard of posterity) the immediate ende of this Altar was, to testify, that those Tribes beyond Jordan, belonged to the same people, and so had right to the same worship, with those of this side Jordan: which is nothing to a Ceremony of state and immediate use, in the special solemn worship of God. The Rejoinder asketh if this were not a holy religious ende? I answer, It was so holy and religious, as every Land-mark of a Parsons Glebe-land, or every sign of a Parish-bound is holy and religious: but not so as mystical Ceremonies. B. Andrew's (against Perone, p. 18.) giveth some light to this, by the ancient use of Lights, and incense: There were lights (saith he) there was incense, used by the Primitive Church, in their service; not for any mystical meaning, but (as it is thought) for this cause, that where the Christians in time of persecution, had their meetings most commonly in places dark, and so needing lights, and dampish, and so needing good savors, they provided lights against one, and incense against the other. After the Churches retained these things, to show themselves the successors of those ancient Christians, &c. the After-ages devised meanings and significations of their own, which from the beginning were not so. If this be so (as it is thought) then there may be signs of succession unto religious forefathers, without any mystical meaning: which is all that by us is pleaded about this Altar of Jordan.

And for further manifesting, that it was so in this Altar, let it be well considered: what Josephus, one of the learnedest, and most ancient Jews now exstant, saith, Antiq. lib. 5. cap. 4. They placed an Altar on the bank of the river as a memorable sign of the nearness and affinity of them that dwelt beyond Jordan, viz. with them within Canaan: Again, it was not placed for worship, but symbolically and as a memorandum of their relation to you.

8. The Rejoinder as having sufficiently confuted all other answers, bringeth in one made to himself in conference, (though he hath not found it in print) as a grand absurdity: namely, that the Gileadites did ill, in erecting this Altar; and the rest also in allowing of it. Now as for allowance by the High Priest, Princes, and all the Congregation of Israel, which he speaketh of, I find it not evident in the Text. About the other, I find this: 1. that D. Fulke, no absurd Divine, (against Sanders, of Images, pag. 649.) writeth thus in print: The two Tribes and a half, Josh. 22. made not an Image, but an Altar for a memorial: and yet their fact was not commendable, though it was, in some sort excusable. 2. I find also that Calvin, before him, upon Josh. 22. saith thus: Duae tribus, •um dimidia, non leviter peccarunt, &c. The two tribes and a half did very ill: Which is the great absurdity that the Rejoinder had heard in conference, but not seen in print, before now.

SECT. 17.18.19.20.21. Concerning the Brazen Altar, built by Solomon. 1. King 8.64.

1. The Defender bringeth for instance, a Braze• Altar, built by Solomon. It was replied, that in the Text, there is no mention either of Altar, or Brasse, or Building, but only of Sanctifying the inner part of the Court. The Rejoyner answereth, tha••he word Brazen slipped in by oversight; the Court may well be called an Altar, in respect of present use. The Rej. before, upon far less occasion, talked of slipper•• tricks, &c. but I leave this slipping in, and out, unto the Readers censure, so that no advantage be made of it, in prosecution of this Instance.

2. Yet because not only the Defender named a•Altar, but the Rejoinder also mainteyneth it for good let us see, what may be answered unto the Replier hi• collection therfrom; namely, that if man may on hi• own head appoint an Altar (as they say) then man may appoint not only accidental worship, but also such a• is greater then some essential worship; because the Alta• which sanctifieth the Offering is greater, then the Offering Mat. 23.19? The Rejoinder here accuseth the Reply• for want of Judgment, in this allegation: because tha• which our Savior saith, is proper to that one only Altar in the Temple, by reason of the special command of God to use them, and their superadded mystical signification: whereas other Altars were only permitted, and so helps to the Offerings, but not sanctifiers of them; nay they were sanctified by the Offeringes; as also the Altars of God's appointment, in the time of Moses, Solomon, Ezra, and Machabeus, were first sanctified by the gift that was offered on them, and so installed in their peculiar privilege, of sanctifying the Gifts which were afterwards offered upon them. For all this, no consent is shown of any Divine: Only we are bidden to see Zanchi, de Redem. lib. 1. cap. 16. thes. 2.3. Now 1. Zanchi hath nothing to the Rejoinder his purpose: he doeth not distinguish betwixt Altars commanded and Altars permitted: but saith of the commanded Altars, that they were annexed unto the acts of worship. And so he doeth of the Ark it self, and all the principal & most essential means appointed by God. What can the Rejoinder make of this? 2. The special command of God was as well for the Offeringes, as for the Altar: so that cannot be the reason, why the Altar did sanctify the Offering, more then the Offering the Altar.

And the same aequalitie is in the superadded mystical, and typical signification. 3. I am sorry to hear from D.B. that the Altars built by Abraham, Jacob, &c. before Moses, were only permitted. He may as well say, that all the Sacrifices before Moses, were only permitted. Bellarmine himself, de Eff. Sacr. lib. 2. cap. 31. confesseth, that they were by inspiration, and impulsion Divine: and all our Divines, disputing against Papists about will-worship, make that Divine instinct, for substance, a Divine command. 4. How could Altars be sanctified by Offeringes, when the Offerings themselves were not in state of sanctification actually, and properly, before they came to the Altars? He that left his gift at the Altar, that is ready to lay it thereon, and then went to be reconciled with his brother, had not yet actually sanctified the same. 5. The Altars of Moses, and Solomon, were not first Sanctified by Offeringes upon them, but by Moses his Annoyning: the manifestation of God's glorious praesence in a Cloude, filling the Tabernacle, and Temple: and by that fire which came down from heaven to consume the Sacrifice. Ex. 40. Lev. 8. & 9, 1. King. 8. 2. Chr. 7.6. If Solomon's sanctified Court▪ did not sanctify the Sacrifices offered thereon, then either those Sacrifices were less holy, then those which were offered on the Altar, and sanctified thereby: or else they had more sanctifying virtue in them, then the other, which did not sanctify their Altar, as those did their Court. The like may be said, and more also, of Abraham's Altars, &c. but this is enough.

3. Our first answer is the same that D. Whitaker's, D. Sutlife, &c. giveth to Bellarmine (who de Pont. lib▪ 4. cap. 19. hath the same objection against Calvin) Quicquid Solomon fecit, id Dei auctoritate & Spiritus Sancti nutu fecit (saith D. Whitaker's) that is, Solomon did this by Divine authority, and instinct of the H. Ghost. The Rej. excepteth 1. that Bellarmine would prove by this example, proper, essential worship, by man ordained. But if he had looked upon the chapter quoted, he might have seen, that the only question there, is, whether it was sin, for men, by their own authority, to erect a new Altar in the Temple? And this the Def. and Rej. with Bellarmine deny, against Calvin. 2. He addeth, that all our Divines do not give this answer alone. As if we also did not follow them, in adding other answers to this!

4. Our second answer (for I will not dwell on words) is, that Solomon did this from aequitie of the Law. This is Junius his answer to Bellarmine, Cont. 3. lib. 4. cap. 9. It was done extraordinarily and by singular occasion and according to the Analogy of the commune ground, whereby they did other things, and it may be by special revelation. To this the Defend. answered, that this interpretation overthroweth the former. Nothing less (saith the Replier) because Solomon might be directed, to see, and authorized to follow that aequitie. The Rej. here, having little reason to oppose, putteth down, instead of it, great words: as this is to confound Ordinary, and Extraordinarie; Special, and Common; Scripture-light, and immediate Revelation; and so hath no sense in it. And what show of wool for this great cry? May not one be extraordinarilie, specially, and immediately directed, to see that Scripture-light which in itself hath ordinary, & common shining? Surely, the Apostles had ex•raordinarie, special, immediate direction, to see the meaning of divers passages in the old Testament (as the allegorical meaning of Sara and Hagar, Sinay and Zion, &c.) which was before contained in the Scripture.

Yet (addeth the Rejoinder) Solomon (by this reason) needed no special Authority. Which I grant, if he be considered as a perfect man; but if he be conceived as Peter, who after he was sent unto all Nations, needed after a Vision from Heaven, to send him unto the Gentiles, then this consequence is nothing worth.

4. Passing over the third answer (in pity) the fourth is, that this sanctification of the Court by Solomon, was no addition of a divers kind. This is Danaus his answer to Bellarmine, Cont. lib. 1. cap. 19. To this the Defender answered nothing, which either the Replier thought worthy any answer, or Rejoinder of improving. So that I need not add anything to it, but only a fitting explication which I find in Tostatus (in 3. Reg. cap. 8.) thus expressed: It was lawful to do what Solomon did, because though it were forbid to offer sacrifice elsewhere then at the Altar of whole burnt-offerings; yet now upon necessity it might be, when the Altar was not sufficient to hold all. Nor did Solomon against the Law, because now sacrifices were burnt at the Altar, and on the Altar together, and so the whole Court of the Priests was in a manner but as one Altar, and the intent of the Law was no other, then that they should not offer in divers places, but here was but one continued place.

SECT. 22. Concerning Synogogues.

TO this simple instance, the Replier answered, 1. that Synagogues were no significant Ceremonies. 2. That it is most likely, they were first founded by those Prophets, which brought in Schools of the Prophets. 3. That in them, there was (of old) no significant human Ceremony used. To the first is rejoined, that the Synagogues bare some representation of the Sanctuary. But I ask, How? Was this representation in matter, or form, or use? He seemeth to refer it unto use, in resorting to solemn worship. Now let any man consider, whether every place appointed for solemn worship, be a significant Ceremony? If so, then no Anabaptists ever denied significant Ceremonies of mansappointing, which yet the Rejoynderaccused them for. But this fond conceit is sufficiently confuted in the first part of this writing, Chap. 4. and 5. Yet suppose the Synagogues had been a repraesentation of the Sanctuary, which was a Ceremony; is every repraesentation of a Ceremony, a new Ceremony? then any man may make more Ceremonies, then there are men in his Parish. The second (about the founding of Synagogues by Prophets) which the Repl. said, is most likely, the Rejoinder maketh a bold affirmation, without proof. But what boldness is, in conjecturing that to be likely, which no man can give any likely reason against? The third (of no human significant Ceremonies used in Synagogues) is absolutely pronounced false. But no reason of this sentence is given out of the Scriptures, but only that they used there reverend gestures: as if all reverend gestures were significant Ceremonies of man's invention! The rest that he quoteth out of Purchas his Pilgrimage, are wandering Pilgrimes, without house or home, and therefore worthy no other answer, but that which our law hath provided for Vagabondes

SECT. 23.24.25.26. Concerning Love-Feasts.

1. The Instances out of the old Testament were such, as we have now shown them to be: Out of the New Testament first are brought in the Feasts of love, or charity. Now concerning these Feasts, no man can certainly inform us, who did appoint them! I mervayl (saith the Apostle, according to Erasmus his Paraphrase, on 1. Cor. 11.) Quis ritus istos i• vos invexerit: who brought-in these Love-Feasts? No man can tell us, what religious signification was by institution annexed unto them? Nay it cannot be shown, where they are spoken of, without reproof? Yet the Defend. and Rejoined. will needs have them significant human Ceremonies, ordained, and used by the Apostles.

2. To this, it was 1. answered by M^r. Nic. that if they were of Apostolical, then they were of Divine insti•ution. Then which (saith the Defender) he could not have uttered a more unlearned position. Nay soft (it was replied) this censure is too too Magisteriall: because to say that that which came from the Apostles, as Apostles, came from the Spirit of God, is no unlearned Position. O yes (answereth the Rejoinder) because the Apostles ordained some things, not as Apostles, not by immediate revelation, but by the direction and authority of God's Word. In which kind of rejoyning, I see no more learning then needs must. 1. The question was of Apostolical institutions: the answer is of that which the Apostles did, but not as Apostles, that is not properly Apostolical. 2. That which is manifested by the Holy Ghost shining •n the Word (they are the Rejoinder his words) is de•ied to be Divine. 3. No example is, or can be brought, of a new significant Ceremony instituted by the Apost•es, without immediate revelation. The allegations opo•osed, may fill up paper, but not satisfy any reasonable Reader.

3. For removing of that Magisteriall censure of the •reat unlearnednesse of the fore-said Position, it was no•ed that some learned men, were authors of it, or parta•ers in it. Junius is one: who (Cont. 1. lib. 4. cap. 2. an. 6) •ayth, that this distinction betwixt Divine and Apostoli•all traditions, is almost imaginary and superfluous. Wher •he Rejoinder hath nothing to catch at, but only that •article almost. Take therefore another place of the same •unius (in his Hidelberg Theses de Traditionibus, th. 24) where without almost, he saith fully thus: The distinction of traditions into Divine and Apostolical is a false distinction, because such traditions are of one sort, for there be no Apostolical traditions but such as are delivered from God.

4. It was added also by the Replier that Danaus (upon the same place) calleth it a childish distribution. True (saith the Rejoined.) but he meaneth by Apostolical, things determined by the Apostles, by their ordinary faculty, as Pastors, and yet having the same authority with their writings: Now let the Reader mark, that the Defender his charge of unlearned rudeness, depended on this, if Apostolical traditions may be called Divine, as being commanded of God. To talk here of faculty, ordinary, pastors, authority equal to Scripture, &c. it is nothing else, but to bring him unto loss. Neither is, or can this limitation be justified by any other proof then the Rej. his own testimony.

5. When the Repl. spake of more learned men allowing of the foresaid position, and rejecting the distinction made betwixt Divine and Apostolical traditions; the Rejoinder stayeth him, and confesseth that the distinction is ridiculous, in the Papists sense: yet (saith he) in another sense (not telling what) it may stand. And is the great charge of a most unlearned Position come now to this: the contrary words in some sense may stand? Be sparing (my masters) in crying down your poor neighbors, for such extreme want of learning, when you• opposite learning can scarce stand in any sense.

6. After these testimonies, the Replier inquired into the Logic of this distinction between Divine and Apostolical traditions. But the Rejoinder correcteth his interpretation, and saith this distinction is taken chiefly from the different Authors, Christ, and the Apostles. Be it so: yet it were not extreme rudeness, to say that whatsoever the Apostles as the Apostles of Christ, appointed, that Christ himself appointed. But saith the Rejoinder, some things were appointed by Christ himself immediately, and others by the Apostles occasionally. Which is true: yet 1. this overthroweth that which was even now alleged, that this distinction is chiefly taken from different Authors: because this is only a difference of manner, as Polanus (Syntag. lib. 1. cap. 47.) doeth clearly manifest, in his large confutation of this self same distinction. 2. By the same or somewhat like reason, a distinction may be made, betwixt the word of God, and the word of the Prophets, 3. It were worth the knowing, upon what occasion these Feasts were ordained by the Apostles?

7. It is brought in by the Def. as a second answer of M^r. Nic. That these Love-feasts, were abrogated by the Apostles. From which he gathereth, that then they were not of divine institution. No say we, nor yet Apostolical. For it was only said before, that if they were of one, they were also of the other: but not positively that they were of either. So that the Defender forgot, when he inferred: So this second answer confuteth the first.

8. The third answer of the same M^r. Nic. was (as it is reported) that these Love-feasts were not of mystical signification, nor yet merely Ecclesiastical. And this the Replier undertook to maintain: because no signification was added unto their nature by any institution, so far as by any certain evidence can be declared.

The Rejoinder opposeth, that the appropriating of their natural signification, to the signifying of Christian love, might be in that use, by Ordination. Where, First might be, is not a proof: and we require in an instance objected for an Argument, that it should be proved fitting. Secondly, Every Ordination doeth not infer mystical signification. I• it be ordained (as it is) that Collection of Alms, for the poor, be used in the Church, hath it therefore a new mystical signification put upon it above that which it would have out of the Church?

9. Ecclesiastical the Replier denied these Feasts to have been, or Religious, because they were used in the same manner, or to the same ende, out of the assemblies, that is, to the relief of the poor, and maintenance of brotherly love. The Rejoinder, First, opposeth appropriation: as if all things used in the Church, were appropriated to it! So common salutations used at Church should be appropriations. He secondly concludeth from thence, that (by this reason) Eating of things offered to Idols, in the idols Temple, should not be religious. But this doeth not agree; except the meat used in Love-feasts, were first sacrificed to God: which yet hath not been proved: nor then, except the eating of things offered to Idols, were merely religious; which the Christians of Corinth (ep. 1. cap. 8.) did not think, nor the Apostle teach. Yet might those Eatings have such a relation unto the Idols, as might make them superstitious (even without that superstitious opinion which the Defender and Rejo. require unto superstition) though such a relation unto the true God, and his religion, do not make feasts by man invented, truly and merely religious.

10. It was finally replied, that the Ordination of these feasts cannot be shown, to have been Apostolical: and to that purpose P. Martyr was alleged, in 1, Cor. 11.22. The Rejoinder opposeth 1. that the Argument so much the stronger: because then they were merely of human institution, and yet had Apostolical approbation. Secondly, that P. Martyr confesseth the same feasts to be mentioned everywhere in the fathers, as a thing descended to them, from the Apostles, as their Spring-head.

To the first, I answer, First, that the Def. his Argument which was taken from the ordination of the Apostles, cannot possibly be strong at all, if these Feasts were not of Apostolical ordination. Secondly, Apostolical Approbation of them, hath not yet been proved. As for P. Martyr, his testimony is clear. We see here how dangerous it is to add to divine institutions, which the Corinthians did, setting up these feasts without warrant from the word. To P. Martyr, add Calvin, upon the same place: We may see hence, that their manner of feasting wholly displeased the Apostles, albeit the forementioned abuse were away. It is not well to turn a holy meeting into strange customs. As for the after-continuation of like feasts, which the Rejoinder maketh so much of; Hospinian (Histor. Sacram. lib. 1. cap. 6.) answereth fully: This was first to be found fault with in their love feasts, that they did not in simplicity keep the institution of Christ, but added somewhat thereto. The Apostle recalled them to the first institution. But it seems his authority was not such with them that came after, but that as the Corinthians had done, so also they would appoint many things in great zeal, I confess: but very vnadvisedly, which also in time brought in most pestilent superstitions.

SECT. 27. Concerning the kiss of Charity.

1. This instance is like the former, in that neither the institution, nor the mystical signification of it can be shown out of Scripture. Our answer also is the same with that before: It is a natural indicant sign of peace and reconciliation; used in those parts, as embracing, and shaking of hands, with us. For this M^r. Nic. is accused, as more civil, or rather uncivil, then spiritual. But with whom the civility or uncivility about this matter resteth, neither the Def. nor Rej. are fit Judges. It may prove this charge hath as little ground, as the other of an extreme unlearned Position.

2. The Replier passed over allegations mentioned by the Def. as Oratoriall Phrases: but the Rejoinder will have them Explicatorie; & setteth them down again, at large. I will therefore take the said Allegations into a summary consideration. He citeth Justin, Origen, Tertullian, Cyril, Clemens Al. not noting the places where their words are to be found. But Baronius had An. 45. (out of whom he seemeth to have borrowed these quotations) affordeth us some light that way. Where this is by the way to be marked, that Cardinal Baronius himself concludeth no more out of them then this: The kisses of the Gentiles being tokens of peace and love are not to be quite taken away but with a kind of moderation to be used among Christians, as the Apostles provided when they so often put them in mind of Saluting one another with a holy kiss. Out of the two first, nothing is alleged, but that when Prayers were ended, Christians were wont to salute one another with a kiss: which proveth nothing more then we grant.

Tertullian calleth it Signaculum Orationis, the Seal of Prayer; the words of prayer therein used being Peace be unto thee. Now though Tertullian maketh no words of this form of Prayer to be used; yet suppose all: 1. this is manifestly an Oratoriall phrase (which the Rejoinder denied) not Explicatorie, but needing explication; which yet I will not spend time about. 2. Tertullian according to his hyperbolical fashion, ascribeth so much to this Kiss, as smelleth of Superstition: What prayer is there perfect which is separated from a holy kiss? He showeth notwithstanding that it was used in private houses as well as in the Congregation: At home perhaps you may put off till another time the Salutation of peace. 4. He discovereth a custom something contradictory to his former assertion. At Easter we do well to lay aside the Kiss. 5. Ther were even in Tertullian's time, divers superstitions creeping in among Christians, about prayer, as he in that his treatise of Prayer showeth: Washing, doffing of cloaks, sitting upon beds. What then can be made of this testimony?

Cyrril is the next, who calleth it Signaculum reconciliations, quo in sacris utimur: the Seal of reconciliation used in Divine Service. But 1. we may well question the Author of that Catechism, whether Cyril was he (as D. Andrues saith, in his answer to the 18. chap. of Person, pag. 3.) 2. Whosoever was the Author, he was so prodigal of dealing significations, according to his pleasure, that we may say of him, as Jerome of Origen, His brains were the Churches Sacraments: so that he hath no credit left about such things. 3. How do Tertullian and Cyril agree in their testimony? One saith, the Kiss was a Seal of Prayer; the other, that it was a Seal of Reconciliation. 4. The same Cyril, in the same place, Cat. 5. giveth another mystery of Kissing: Because Christ's body goes thorough our mouth. Just so therefore we kiss the mouth as we do the doors we enter into the Church by. How doeth he agree then with him-self?

Clemens is the last: who calleth this gesture Mystical, (Paedag. lib. 3.) But this was a Rhetorical phrase. For it signifieth nothing else (as the fore-going words show) but that they should not use it, qui non habent intus amicitiam; but as a true sign of good will. In the words also next following that common salutations (dilectorum in via salutationes) should be with mystical grace, mystice, intus, amanter & benign alloqui. Now let the Def. and Rejoinder. cast up their accounts, and tell, what they have gained by these Testimonies more then before was given them?

3. But yet (saith the Defend.) this gesture is called Holy, and the object of it is Peace: Tis true: But all our civil actions ought to be such as becometh Saints, 1. e. so far Holy for manner, that they be free from sin; and to the Glory of God: many also have Peace for their direct object.

Furthermore, if this Kiss was holy in the nature of it, I ask whether a representation of it may not be made also for a holy use, as the Altar of Jordan, and the Synagogues were in the Def. and Rejoynders opinion? And if so, whie have we not a Pax to kiss at the Communion? I see not (by these tenets) what should keep out Paxes, more then Altars, with bowing to them, but only the mere pleasure of our Prelates Regent.

Now we have thus dispatched the Defender we need not trouble ourselves with his Second, the Rejoinder proceeding another way, against the Replier. Yet I will note what new weapons he useth.

4. The Rejoinder thinketh it strange, that constant Application by direction, or custom, should not be Institution. But it is no more strange, then that the common using of one way from Lichefield, to Coventrie, or from thence to Coldfeild, may be without Institution; or that the same word which of old signified Love, is now among Christians commonly applied unto Christian Love, without any new institution.

5. He saith, that natural fitness for signification, doeth hinder Institution. True: but fitness, with actual use for signifying of true love, doeth praevent an institution of the same signification: as the former signification of the word Love, doeth so hinder a new institution of the same word to signify Christian love, that it would make the Authors of such an institution, ridiculous, & idle.

6. He affirmeth, that the ordained seating of a Minister in an higher place, in way of Reverence to his Function, is as Mystical a Ceremony, as the Cross in Baptism. Then (say I) a Mothers kissing of her froward child, in the Church to still it, in reverence to Preaching or Praying, is as Mystical a Ceremony, as the Kiss of Peace. And what need any other institution, then constant application of such gestures, by the Rejoinder his rule?

7. He quoteth Calvin, upon the place, as for him, whom every man that will, may see to be against him. So Beza, and Pareus. Only he hath a little show (but no substance) out of P. Martyr his words, upon 1. Cor. 16.20. Whoe yet upon Rom. 16.16. in few words, showeth his meaning all one with ours: and his judgment of human significant Ceremonies hath been before declared.

8. Notwithstanding all this weakness of his praemisses, he concludeth strongly, that those which do not yield unto his proofs, have themselves, above all other men, in estimation for soundness of judgment. To which I will only say this, we have (by God's grace) more judgment, then either to accuse others so vainly, or to make any account of this accusation, as if it would prejudice us with any man of judgment.

SECT. 28 Concerning Womens Vailes. 1. Cor. 11.

1. The last example of Apostolical Humane, Significant Ceremonies by Institution, and Appropriated unto God's worship, is a Woman's Vail, such as a Huik is, in the Low-Countries, or a french Hood, with a Bon-grace, was wont to be in England. Now at this it was answered, that the Vail was neither Apostolical, nor merely of human institution, nor of instituted signification, nor yet appropriated unto God's worship: but a civil order of decency, used as well out of God's worship as in it. And the Rejoinder granteth, that it was a civil custom: but addeth, that it is as absurd, from thence to conclude, that it was in religious worship civil, and not religious, as to affirm this of blowing of Trumpets in the new Moons, &c. Where first, he should have remembered, that we are here in answering, not in proving, and concluding, which is the Def. his part. Secondly, The Replier said it was a civil order of decency, expressing the immediate end, which it had as well in, as out of worship, which will well bear this conclusion: that it was no more religious, then Womens proper apparel, long garments, &c. (to which Chrysostom upon 1. Cor. 11.) compareth the Vail, as one part to another, or their shoes, or slippers are. 3. Concerning Trumpets, in some use of them, we have their instituted signification, expressly set down in the Word, Nunb. 10. show the like, for going to Church in shoes, or Vailes; and then we will confess a parity of reason.

2. The Def. proceeding by interrogatories, maketh this the first: whether the Vail was not significant of some good thing? To which the Repl. answered, yes, it did declare, or argue a good thing, as indeed all civil apparel of modest fashion doeth. For this he is checked, and bidden to stand by, with his answer while his elders speak. As if we were now in the High-Commission; and he as Commissioner, might prescribe us when, and how much we may speak for ourselves, though much without ground be spoken against us, and interrogatories propounded to the prejudice of our cause!

3. He asked secondly, what it did signify? Answer was made, that it signified subjection to superior power. Then a moral duty was professed by it, saith the Rej. just so, as modesty, and shamefastness, gravity, and care of not offending, are professed by all apparel of modest honest fashion. And yet I never heard all modest apparel called a mystical religious Ceremony. Theophilact (in Cor. 11.) maketh a man's beard like and equal unto his uncovering in signification. And will the Def. and Rej. say, that Beards are religious mystical Ceremonies?

4. The Def. added, that it had some relation unto God. To which it was answered, that so there is in an upper Seat, of an Heathen Magistrate, sitting in judgment: which yet is no mystical Ceremony of religion. The Rej. (altering first the case, into a throne set up to that end, to represent the Sovereignty of God, for religious cognizance, and document) affirmeth the Seat of a Heathen Judge, to be a mystical Ceremony of Religion. Now set aside his changing of the question, and take him as answering, that every Seat, of judgment among all Heathen, is such a Ceremony; and then, let any man consider, if he hath not brought his pigges to a fair market? Seats of Justice, are religious Ceremonies, even among those that know not what religion meaneth: what is become of intended immediate, though improper worship, which he is wont to require as necessary unto a religious Ceremony of mystical signification? He may as well say, that such veils as Tamars was wherewith she deceived Judah, even unto incest, was religious Ceremonies among the Heathen; because a Vail (in the nature of it) declareth a moral duty. For many of those Seats (in their nature tending to justice) are but veils of injustice, as Tamars was of uncleanness. If those High-seats be religious Ceremonies, then the bowing of inferiors unto them, kissing of their feet, or foot-stools, must be such also. Why then did the Def. seek (as with a candle and lant-horn) in every dark corner for instances or examples of religious significant Ceremonies of man's appointing? every civil meeting, every Company of Soldiers, every School of Children can afford examples enough, and more then enough.

5. It was added, by the Repl. that the Def. allegeth nothing out of Divines, which may not as well be applied to the Judges Bench, as to the Vail of Women. Yes, this (saith the Rej.) that the one used in civil actions, is religious in use only, not in state: the other used in religious actions, is religious, both in state and use; which is (saith he) M^r. Parkers distinction. Now 1. there was no such distinction as this, alleged by the Def. out of our Divines: so that this contradicteth not that which the Repl. affirmed. 2. This distinction as it is here explained, was never used by M^r Parker, or (as I think) by any reasonable man, before now: A circumstance used in civil actions, is religious in use; the like used in religious actions is religious in use and state. Is the Criers O wize Religious in use, because, or as it is used in civil actions? And is the Paraters citation religious in state, because, or as it was used in Spiritual Courts? 3. What if Judges have a peculiar Seat in the Church, as in divers places, they have? Is that Seat therefore religious in state, as an Altar, a Cross, the Chair of Peter, &c.?

6. The Repl. also observed, that the Vail was of the same nature with long hair, such as becometh women; and therefore, no religious mystical Ceremony. No (saith the Rej.) because long hair is of nature; and the Vail of institution, which to a Ceremony is essential. To which I oppose 1. the true observation of P. Martyr, the Def. his chief witness, about this instance: A woman ought seeing her hair is given her of God, to follow this his institution, and to imitate her Maker, and cover her head: which if she will not do, as much as is in her, she throws off the natural veil. where he showeth that it is so natural, that it cannot be imitated without some violation of nature, by any woman, though no new institution impose it upon her. 2. Chrysostom (upon the same place) hath this: That is from nature it self, that we women should cover our heads, and we men should uncover our heads. Nature would that women should be covered: she is taught to be covered even from thence. 3. Paul himself saith not only that nature it self hath taught women to use a veil; but also, that the disguising of it is all one, with shaving: so that long hair, and a veil, according to the Apostle, is all one, for the ground of it. If therefore special institution, above nature, be essential to a Ceremony, then certainly vailing of women is no Ceremony; much less religious, and mystical significant, by institution human.

7. The Def. his third demand was, whether these Ceremonies of covering, and uncovering, were not instituted to be observed in God's public worship? Answer was given (by the Repl.) that this indeed was required, in every grave meeting of men and women: but not primarily, and principally instituted for God's worship. Paul surely did not institute them for new Ceremonies, but only urged the Corinthians, not to neglect them, as being natural. The Rej. opposeth 1. that requiring is an institution. As if the Kings requiring his subjects to observe Christ's institutions, did therefore institute the Sacraments, &c. 2. His second answer is, that application, by injunction, was (as it were) an institution. So that by and (as it were) the Lord's Sacraments have been so often instituted, as they have been applied, and enjoined; that is an hundred thousand times, and more. But if any man will needs use the term institution in such a sense, that is nothing to our question; <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> which is of Ceremonies, whose first author and appointer, in special, was man. Otherwise, all Divine Ceremonies will prove human institutions; and so the Rej. hath disputed all this while, about nothing. The rest of the Rej. his words, in this Section, are either mere repetitions of confuted fictions, or such as need no confutation, I may well again repeat (as justified) the Repl. conclusion: Seeing the Def. could find but three examples of human Ceremonies, in all the New Testament; and none of those there can be shown, to be of mystical signification, or appropriated only to God's worship, or of human institution; the Prelates may be ashamed in such domineering fashion, to urge human Ceremonies upon the consciences of Ministers and People of the New Testament.

SECT. 29. Concerning the Ancient Custom of Significant Ceremonies among Christians.

1. AS the Def. was passing over from Scriptures, to human writings, and customs, he was told by the Replier, that here he may find more fish for his net, in the troubled waters of man's infirmity, then were to be looked for in the Scripture fountains. This the Rej. thought not worthy of any answer. Let the Reader yet take knowledge, that we esteem not anything like of a thousand objections fetched from testimony subject to error, as we would have done of one plain testimony Divine, if it could have been produced.

2. The oldest Records we have (saith the Rej.) do mention human mystical Ceremonies in God's worship, as Apostolical traditions. Which 1. is not true: because those which call them Apostolical, use not to call, or esteem them human. 2 The Records of the first age, which we have, are so imperfect, and uncertain, that God (in so disposing of them by his Providence) doeth in a manner warn us, not to depend on them, but only on his written Word. 3. The great variety that was found, in the first ages, about the observation of Lent, and Easter, doeth manifestly prove, they were not Apostolical: as Chamier showeth (De jejuniis, cap. 7.) Not out of any certain law, but out of private devotions, and consequently Superstition. In the next place, for a main ground of this assertion (that the universal Church observing human Rites, took them to have been of Apostolical allowance) the Rej. bringeth in the common text of Papists, out of Augustine, ep. 118. Such universal observations, not being written in Scripture, must be understood to be commanded by general Councils, or from the Apostles. Where 1. he faulteth twice in the translation, in (turning dantur intelligi, into must be understood, when D. Morton himself (Pr. Ap. lib. 2. cap. 28. • 3.) maketh a strong probability only; and in turning commendata, by into commanded. 2. This being but a probable rule, and And Augustine's conjecture of that probability, being also but probable, it may fail, with all that is built upon it. 3. Chamier (in the place fore-mentioned) answereth Bellarmine about it, that it must either include the Apostles time (whose history is in Scripture) and so the human Ceremonies come not within the compass of it; or else it may be denied as false. 4. If this rule be good, then Apostolical Ceremonies cannot be known from other, but only by those who know certainly what is and hath been always observed in all Churches: which will fall hard upon most Christians. 5. Augustine (in the same place) complaineth of men's presumptions and burdensome Ceremonies, contrary to Christ his merciful institution; requiring the easiness and lightness of that yoke or burden which Christ hath imposed in his Sacraments, to be still preserved in the Church. Now those Ceremonial observations, which are said to have been universal in the Primitive Church, did not agree to this rule. For they had then in common use, beside other solemnities, fifty Holy- days, betwixt Easter, and Pentecost, Ambrose in Luc. 17. of which Tertullian boasteth (lib. de Idololatria, cap. 13.) that they were more then the Heathen used: Reckon all the observations of the Heathen in order, and they will never fill up Pentecost. They had also with Lent and all) more then fifty fasting-days. Add unto these, the Ceremonies the which Tertullian reckoneth up, de Corona cap. 3. and then, I ask, if any man can upon consideration, believe, that all these were either Apostolical, or so accounted by Augustine? Certainly, to exceed or equal the Heathen, in human observations, was not agreeable to the Apostles rules, nor the Fathers. 6. It is a received rule, that the writings of the Apostles, are the only certain rule of true Apostolical traditions. D. Fulke, Rej. ag. Brist. cap. 7. But this rule, as it is understood by our Rej. maketh those writings not the only certain rule.

4. The Fathers practice (saith the Rej.) interpreted their rules touching the perfection of Scripture, and purity of God's worship, to be understood of necessary doctrine, and proper worship. The contrary whereof appeareth, partly by the fore-mentioned place of Augustine, where he complaineth of the Ceremonies which he practiced, as disagreeing from the Doctrine of the Gospel which he taught. Beside, (because proper worship hath been discussed in its proper place) it would be inquired, what the Rej. meaneth by necessary doctrine? If he meaneth only that doctrine which is absolutely necessary to salvation, it is a poor commendation of Scripture-perfection: because that is found in every good Catechism; and Bellarmino himself doth not deny that perfection to Scripture. I cannot guess at his thoughts, by his words: because (to my remembrance) this distinction (betwixt necessary, and unnecessary doctrine) is 〈 in non-Latin alphabet 〉, in this place only let fall. But for the interpretation of doctrine, by practice, if the Rejoinder will have this hold in the ancient times, what reason can he give that it should not also hold in our time? If so, then why is not our argument good: Calvin, Bucer, Beza, the Divines of Helvetia, France, Netherland, &c. have in their practice, banished Cross, Surplice and kneeling, Ergo, their doctrine is against them?

5. The Rej. calleth it, a spirit of singular singularity, to think, the whole Church, in the days of purest zeal, and frequent martyrdom, did not dislike examine their Ceremonies. And yet the same Rej. (without any spirit of singular singularity) acknowledgeth, that in the two first ages, after the Apostles, there was either want of cleanness, or a manifest touch of error, about some sixteen points of doctrine, very important: pag. 458. Which if he will reconcile with this affected accusation, he must say, that Christians in those times, more attended to certain human Ceremonies, then to divers points of divine doctrine, though in the main power of Godliness they went beyond those which are purer both in Ceremonies and doctrine. But the truth is, he spake there for excessive commendation of our English-Church-doctrine, and so, in comparison, depressed the Primitive; and here he seeketh to defend our Ceremonies, by theirs, and so extolleth their judgment of Ceremonies; in both places (according to occasion) exceeding their just measure, as it usually falleth out to those, who dispute out of affection, more then out of judgment.

6. The Rej. taketh it ill, that the Repl. should say, that the bringing in of human Ceremonies, made any way for Antichristian superstition. But seeing that the Antichristian Papists, argue so strongly from those first human Ceremonies, to divers of those which they use, and by us are rejected, that they cannot be fully confuted, but by rejecting of both, I see no reason for his indignation. Gideon's Ephod, in the argument of the eight chapter of Judges (according to our new translation) was a cause of Idolatry. And was not the old crossing, at every step, at every coming to and going out, at the apparreling themselves, at washing, at eating, at lighting candles, at sitting, &c. as a great cause of that Idolatry which hath been, and is-used, about the cross? D. Fulke (in his Rej. to Bristow, cap. 3.) mainteyneth, that many abuses and corruptions, entered into the Church, immediately after the Apostles time, which the Devil planted, as a preparative for Antichrist. The same Doctor also (ibid. sect. 4) proveth many Ceremonies of the Primitive times, to have been unprofitable; because they are abrogated. And (cap. 9.) he saith plainly, that the error of conceiving and using some superstitions, or superfluous Ceremonies, is common to the Fathers, with Papists.

6. A great matter is made of that which the Replier said, concerning 1500. years experience of human significant Ceremonies. For about this the Rej. saith, that it is wonderful rashness, answering the spirit of montanus, to challenge the whole Church of error, in this matter, for 1500. years. But 1. it is rashness in the Rej. to accuse one of challenging the whole Church, who mentioned not, in his challenge, either Church or whole. 2. The whole Church cannot be understood, except the Waldenses and all like unto them, that is the purer part, be excluded out of the whole Church. 3. Doctor Morton himself (Prot. Apol. cap. 25. sect. 9.) maintaineth this sentence of M^r. Calphill: the Fathers declined all from the simplicity of the Gospel, in Ceremonies; if by simplicity be understood a virtue, opposite, either unto superfluity, or superstition. And And are not superfluity and superstition, errors? 4. From the primitive times by the space of six hundred years, the Church generally erred, in giving the Lord's Supper unto infants, as D. Morton showeth (Prot. Apol. l. 2. cap. 25. sect. 10.) and after that for many hundred years, it mended (for the common course of errors) as sour ale doth in Summer. 5. The Rej. cannot name any Church in all that time free from errors: neither can he deny, but the Church that erreth in doctrine, may err in Ceremonies. Ergo. 6. He was unhappy in mentioning Montanus his spirit, which breathed, and broached so many human Ceremonies, that the Church hath ever since been more wronged thereby, in Ceremonies, then in any other respect, or by any other spirit of that time, as all men know, that have read those writings of Tertullian, which were dictated by a piece of Montanus his spirit. Montanus would have three Lents, instead of one: Montanus advanced the Cross unto more honor, then ever it had before: Montanus (in one word) was of a ceremonial spirit.

SECT. 30.

IN this section, four or five Protestant Divines are named, as allowing of some significant Ceremonies. But there is not any one of them, whose judgment to the contrary, hath not been manifestly declared. I will not therefore so much distrust the Readers attention, and understanding, as to weary him with needless repetitions.

SECT. 31.

HEere the Defend. urgeth upon us, the ordinary form, of swearing upon a book. To which if the Replier hath not said enough, I leave it to the Readers judgment, after he hath compared the Rej. opposed: which speaketh 1. of Gamballing; 2. of Bucklers and Quarrelling; 3. of a proof necessary to an answer; 4. of swearing by a bocke; 5. of Sophistication, in confounding our Churches esteem, and the truth about this form of swearing; 6. of equality betwixt special solemn worship of God, and occasional swearing, in civil Assemblies. I will only add, as an explication of the Repliers answer, that which D. Jackson answereth the Papists, about this fashion (Orig. of unbel. sect. 4. cap. 35.) We use the book, only as a complement of the civil act, whereby we give satisfaction unto men; or as a visible resemblancer partly, to by standers, or spectators, whose eyes by this means may become as true witnesses as their ears, that such protestations have been made; partly unto him that makes them, who will be more wary and circumspect what he avoucheth and protesteth, when he perceiveth his speeches must be sealed with such remarkable circumstances, as they cannot be often recalled to his own and others memory. To the same ende, men of honorable place and calling, use to lay their hands upon their hearts, when they take a solemn oath.

SECT. 32. Concerning the Lord's-Day, Temples, and ceremonial Festivals.

1. THE Def. having spoken of his much sailing in the main, and narrow Seas, cometh to object the observation of the Lord's Day, as a fit example of a human Ceremony: whereupon, the Replier continuing his similitude, saith, that he was at this time, either sea-sick, or sleepy, with his much sailing. This the Rej. calleth a scurrilous jest, and scoff: so liberal is he of terms, when reasonable answers are not at hand. But if he had thought of the ordinary sayings, Quandoque bonus dormitat Homerus; animi perturbatio est quaedam ejus aegritudo; he would have spared an innocent usual phrase of speech, and not marked it with so foul pich or tarre as Scurrilitie.

2. Now let us hear, how he can excuse the Def. his allegation, from all sickness, and drowsiness! The observation (saith he) of the Lord's Day, in place of the Jews Sabbath, is not a human institution: but the analogical and allegorical instructions, lawfully rais'd from that Day, are of human institution, not divine. I say again, as the Repl. said, (without fear of the Rej. his Spitte of scurrility) this is a sick or drowsy answer. For 1. it maketh all analogical instructions, instituted Ceremonies: as if nothing could be gathered from any fact, or text, in the Scripture, by analogy, or proportion, but it must be straight a ceremonial institution! 2. These analogical instructions, are, (as the Def. expresseth them) meditation of Christ's resurrection, and of our eternal rest to come. And whoever heard or read, that these were human insti•utiō? what mā instituted them? when? by what authority? upon what necessity? Are they ambulatorie, or mooveable Ceremonies, which our Convocation may change at their pleasure? Awake, awake, both Def. and Rej. and see the vanity and scandal of this allegation.

3. As a Parallel of the former example, Temples were added by the Defend. And to make it agree, the Rej. is driven to this issue, that if it be lawful by accommodation, to put men in mind of heavenly things by earthly; then it is lawful to institute things to that use. Which is as if he should argue thus: if it be lawful, by accommodation, to put men in mind of God's faithfulness in keeping his Covenant of Grace, by the constant course of nature which he hath set in heaven and earth, or by the faithfulness and constancy of men morally honest; then it is lawful for men to institute sacred signs for confirmation of the Covenant of Grace, and so new Sacraments properly so called.

4. Concerning Ceremonial Festivals, of man's making, our practice cannot be objected: because we observe none. We take occasion of hearing, and praying upon any day, when occasion is offered. We say (with Hospini·n de Orig. Fest. Christ. cap. 2.) Not the day, but the Word of God, &c. puts us in mind of the nativity, resurrection, and ascension o· Christ. And this might be the reason, why the Repl. passed over this example, as of no moment. For we do not fear (as the Rej. imagineth) lest all the Churches of God will condemn us herein. Those that consent with Geneva, nor those of Scotland; (except some of the new edition) no nor any that follow Bucer's judgment (in Mat. 12.) I would to God that every Holy-day whatsoever beside the Lord's Day, were abolished. That zeal which brought them first in, was without all warrant of the Word, and merely followed corrupt reason, forsooth to drive out the Holy days of the Pagans, as one nail drives out another. Those Holy days, have been so t·inted with superstitions that I wonder we tremble not at their very names. See the place. Occolampadius (in Isaiam, cap. 1. v. 4.) thinketh that no wise Christian will condemn us. I never heard wise man yet, who did not judge that a great part at least of other feasts beside the Lord's Day should be abolished. He insinuateth manifestly more then he speaketh. Zanchi (how favorable soever he speaketh of some festivals) cannot condemn us by that sentence of his, (in 4. praec) It is most agreeable to the first institution and Apostolical writings, that only one day in the week be kept holy.

SECT. 33.

IN this Section (which the Repl. thought to require no answer) the sum is, that we are cross and contrary to the Authors of our Service-book, who thought our Ceremonies to be the better for being significant. Now if this be understood so, as if we disliked the significancy of them, because those Reverend men did like it; then we are uncharitably wronged by rash judgment. If so, that though such excellent men did think so, yet we think otherwise; then our answer is they were men; and though they saw much evil in Popish Ceremonies, yet not all; and therefore judged some tolerable for a time, which were free from some faults, that others were guilty of; though they banished divers, which were as free from darkness and dumbnesse, as those they retained. Why they removed those, we see good reason: why they retained, or rather tolerated these, more then them, we see none, that experience hath not confuted.

SECT. 34.

1. IN this last section, this reason is brought (accordding to the Rej. his construction) If all Ceremonies (properly so called) must some way be significant; then either all Ceremonies are unlawful, or some significant Cer·monies are lawful. To which I answer 1. that all outward actions designed or purposely observed, and done in reference to some other thing, beside the cause or part thereof, which is the Rej. his definition of a Ceremony, Manuduct. p. 29.30. are not mystically ·significant, by the Rejoinder his own doctrine, ibid. pag. 32.33. Mystical signification, or the want of it, doth not make a Ceremony, or no Ceremony. A character of significancie, maketh a double or treble Ceremony; Relation without signification, maketh a single Ceremony▪ So, pag. 39. Simple Ceremonies are those, whose use is only for order and decency: Double are those, which serve also to edification, 1. by some profitable signification. 2. If all Ceremonies were significant, yet it doeth not follow, that they all teach a spiritual duty, by their instituted mystical signification: of which kind of signification, all the question is in this chapter, as is to be seen in the first section. 3. If all Ceremonies be significant, then there is no sense in exposing double Ceremonies to significant: because none are, or can be dumb. And yet this opposition is made use of by the Def. and Rej. as other where, so in these two last sections.

2. The Repl. taking from the Def. this proposition: Nothing is properly called a Ceremony, if it be altogether destitute of signification; saith that this convinceth not us at all: because, if this be true, then our tenet is, that all ceremonies properly so called, of man's invention, should be packed out of the Church. What? (saith the Rej.) even Sitting at the Communion, and a communion-Table? Yea, say we, even these if they can be proved to be Ceremonies of man's invention.

3. From the former consideration, the Defen. was challenged, for having gone about to deceive us, often times before, by confounding all circumstances of order and decency, with properly called Ceremonies; whereas now, in the winding up of all, he confesseth, that they cannot be properly called Ceremonies, except they be significant. The Rejoinder his answer is, that all such circumstances are some way significant, though not symbolically: because they signify some way what is to be done, or where, or when, or why, or how. Now though every circumstance doeth some way argue that whereof it is a circumstance, and so in a large sense may be called a sign of it; yet 1. every circumstance is not a sign of what is to be done: because some have no place, until the thing be done. 2. Both the Def. and Rej. have hitherto confounded indicant and symbolical signs, except only one place, where (for a shift) the Rej. saith, Beza, differing in phrase from other Divines, meaneth by Symbolical, Sacramental signs, pag. 264.265. Here therefore to distinguish them, is to confess their former dealing not fair.

4. If all circumstances belonging to time, place, person, instruments or manner of actions sacred, be sacred significant Ceremonies; then not the Clock only, but the leaden weights of it, not the ground only upon which men stand in worship, but the Rushes also strowed by occasion upon it, or the Besome wherewith it is swept; not the Preachers voice only, but his black Cap, his comely heard; not the Communion Table-cloth only, but the color of it; not distinct speaking only, but every Preachers proper Tone, are sacred, significant, ceremonial Weights, Rushes, Besomes, Caps, Beards, Colours, Tones, &c.

See what an argument the Def. made against us, according to the Rej. his explication: If Signs Indicant that is, such as by the nature of the things themselves, without any religious signification put upon them by institution, are lawful; then Symbolical signs, that is, those which teach a spiritual duty, by their mystical instituted signification, cannot be unlawful. In striving to help the Def. out of the water, he hath sunk, and followed him deeper in, then before he seemed to be plunged.

5. Calvin (said the Def.) and some other, do accuse some Popish Ceremonies, because they are dumb. They accuse them also (answereth the Repl.) for speaking: as the Scripture doth condemn images, both for being dumb, and also for teaching lies.

Well said, (saith the Rej) When the Ceremonies are altogether dumb, they condemn them for not speaking: when they speak idly, or falsely, they condemn them for speaking amiss. But you condemn them simply for not being dumb. But here is a great mistaking of the Rejoynders. For we condemn human Ceremonies for speaking idly, that which God's Ordinances do sufficiently speak; and falsely also for their manner of speaking, as if they had just commission to speak in God's name, when they have not. When an image of the blessed Virgin, spake in the Church, to Bernard▪ good morrow Bernard, good morrow; Bernard answered, (ϕ) Madam you forget your Sexe: it is not lawful for a woman to speak in the Church.

The Scriptures also condemned the same image for standing (at other times) dumb in the Church. Even so we condemn human Ceremonies, both for standing in the Church dumb and unprofitable; and also for speaking in such a place, idly, and above that which beseem their Sexe or degree. I repeat therefore again, not as a mere jest, in which name the Rejoinder putteth it off, but as a sad and serious truth, that which the Replier concluded this Argument withal: Lay all together which our Divines say, and you shall find, that in their judgments, Humane Ceremonies in God's worship, are like a fool in a place of honor, who whether he speaketh, or holdeth his peace, still showeth himself unworthy of that place.

CHAP. 4. Concerning Idolatrous Ceremonies.

SECT. 1. About the forming of this argument, and the general answer given thereto.

IN the former Argument as being most essential, I suffered my pen to run a larger course, then in the beginning I intended. Here I purpose to hold it shorter. Passing over therefore by-matters,

1. The Argument was thus propounded in the Abridgement: It is contrary to God's word, to use (much more to command the use of) such Ceremonies in the worship of God as man hath devised, if they be notoriously known, to have been of old, and still to be abused unto Idolatry, and Superstition, by the Papists, especially, if the same be now of no necessary use in the Church. But our Ceremonies are such. Ergo.

The Def. his answer was so set down, that (by the Rej. his own confession) no sense could be discerned in it. But the said Rej. (after three patchings of the words, and the distinctions, about abolishing, abused, and necessary) bringeth, for account, this answer, out of all: If by abolition, be meant, Abscission, and not Cure, the Proposition being meant of things indifferent, is false. But if in the exception, of things, necessary, be meant not an absolute, but a convenient necessity, the Assumption is false, which saith: that our Ceremonies are of no necessary use in the Church. Here we have three distinctions, betwixt 1. abscission, or cutting off, and curing; 2. things evil in their nature, and indifferent: 3. necessity absolute, and convenient. Now 1. see how they agree among themselves: In the first, the Ceremonies are considered as members of our Religion, or worship, which must be either cut off or cured (for so the Def. explaineth it of cutting off the members by the joints) whereas they were never members jointed to our religion, or worship, but to the Harlot of Rome. In the second, they are considered as no members, but things indifferent; and in the third (at the best) only convenient. 2. For the first, it is well known that they are cloutes, which have lien upon the plague-soars of Idolaters, many hundreds of years: and what wise Physician, or Surgeon, was ever known, to go about the curing of such clouts? 3. For the second, it is a mere affectation of casting a myst before the Readers eyes. For both the Def. and Rei. knew well, that the Authors of this Argument, hold our Ceremonies not indifferent, but unlawful in their nature, and yet upon supposed indifferency, undertake to make good their Proposition; as having all sense on their side, namely, that things otherwise merely indifferent, receive some difference, by their notorious abuse to Idolatry. 4. For the last, The Ceremonies are here, only in a blind distinction, (as it were in a parenthesis) affirmed to be of convenient use in our Church. Now let any man consider of this dealing, whether it be not more necessary for the Def. and Rej. then convenient for the Reader. In the Abridgement, pag. 42. and 43. &c. it is largely proved, that these Ceremonies in controversy, are not convenient. The Def. (professing a full answer to all that is objected) giveth no answer to anything there alleged to that purpose. When he was challenged by the Repl. for not showing them convenient, the Rej. pag. 167. accuseth him of more impudency, then he would have expected from any Friar, and yet directeth us not to the place, where he hath gone about any such matter. The Rej. himself, undertaking to manifest their conveniency by the Rules of God's Word, suddenly breaketh off, pag. 74. and referreth that demonstration to a fitter place: which place hitherto he could not find, nor ever will. Beside, the Rej. confesseth, a multitude of godly learned men, (among whom were) Calvin, Beza, Martyr, Bucer, Hooper, Jewel, Fulke, Rainolds, Whitaker's, Humphrie, Perkins, &c. to have held our Ceremonies inexpedient, or inconvenient, at the least. Nay he himself hath been in the same heresy. All this notwithstanding, he thinketh it not significant, in one word, to say (for a shift) without any proof or declaration, that they are convenient for our Church. Conveniency is esteemed when as a thing after the consideration of all circumstances, is found to bring more good (at the least) then evil with it. And I dare appeal to the Rej. his own conscience, whether our Ceremonies have been causes, or occasions of more good then evil? They may do hurt (saith Beza) but they can do no good. God knoweth (saith M^r. Fox) they be the cause of much blindness and strife among men.

Let this (by the way) be well observed out of this general answer, that the particular answers following, in this argument, are nothing worth, but only upon this supposition, that our Ceremonies are not only curable and indifferent, but also convenient for our Church: which neither Def. nor Rej. nor any for them, will ever be able with any show of reason, and honesty, to demonstrate, while the world standeth. So that this whole fourth Argument is here in the first section, sufficiently yielded, For all that we desire, is plainly granted, concerning the unlawfulness of all such human Ceremonies in God's worship, as are notoriously known to have been and be abused unto Idolatry and Superstition, if they be now of no convenient necessary use in the Church.

SECT. 2. Concerning the second Commandment. Lev. 18.3. and 19.19.27.28. Exod. 23.24. Deut. 14 1. and 12.4. and 30.32. 2. Cor. 6.14.18. Rev. 18.4.

1. The second Commandment was here alleged, in the Abridgement, as forbidding all provocation unto spiritual fornication, as the seventh <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> doeth unto that which is carnal. This the Def. passed by in silence; and therein is defended by the Rej. because, according to his method, in one particular argument, he taketh knowledge of it, par. 2. c. 2. s. 2. As if John a-Stiles his plea, for 3. akers of ground, were sufficiently answered by John a-Noxe, if he cold with any show ward it off from 1. aker. His own answer is, that as the seventh Commandment doeth not forbid the use of all such things, as accidentally do, or may provoke some men to base uncleanness; but only such, as in and of themselves, are working incitements thereto; so neither doeth the second Commandment forbid the use of all such things, as the lust of some Idolaters may turn to spiritual fornication; but only of such, as have in themselves, or in such use of them, an habitude, or aptness, to provoke thereto. But 1. Our Divines generally teach (as Zanchi de Red. lib. 1. cap. 14. briefly expresseth their meaning) The sum of the second Commandment is, that in the worship of God, or Ceremonies thereabout, we are to devise nothing of our own brain, or borrow ought of Heathenish idolatrous rites. 2. Let this be so: the question yet remaineth; whether our Ceremonies, the Cross (for example) hath not some habitude, and aptness, to provoke towards Idolatry? I think it will not be denied, but the Cross is an Idol, at Paris, at Calis, and among the Papists, in England. Now suppose a known harlot to be brought out of the Stues at Paris, or Calis, unto Dover, and lodged there in an honest man's bed, or bed-chamber (as the Cross is in the bed of our Religion, the holy Sacrament) would any man say, that there were no habitude nor aptness, in such a harlot, and her lodging, to provoke, even an honest man, and much more, a dissolute companion, unto filthy folly? Difference I know none; but only that the spiritual folly may be more secretly, and mystically provoked, and exercised, then carnal can. The Rej. should have done well, if he had given us a certain rule, whereby we might have distinguished, betwixt those monuments, or relics of Idolatry, which have an habitude or aptness in them to provoke unto Idolatry, and those which have not. For then more might have been said therefrom, either for, or against our Ceremonies. Now we cannot tell where to take hold, saving only in this; that habitude and aptness of provoking, towards Idolatry, is in every consenting relation that any Ceremony (otherwise unnecessary) hath to any Idol: and all such relation of our Ceremonies to Idols cannot be denied: neither can their necessity to true Religion be with any show of reason, or honesty, maintained. Beside, what jealous or wise husband, if his wife should receive anything from a known adulterer, who hath also gone about to undermyne her honesty, and keep it always in her bosom, would take this for a sufficient excuse; that such a thing hath not in it self any habitude or aptness of provoking unto Adultery? And doeth not God tell us, that he is in like sort, a Jealous God? From hence it is, that M^r. Perkins, with divers others, in writing on the second Commandment, doctrinally, without special meddling with controversies, making one head of things therein forbidden, the monuments and relics of Idolatry.

2. To Lev. 18.3.4, and 19.19.27. the Def. his answer was (according to the Rejoinder his extraction) that these places do not prove the abolishing of things indifferent in nature, merely for the abuse of them to Idolatry, which was (saith he) the point to be proved: because cutting off the flesh for the dead was evil in it self; and sowing with divers seeds in one field, was forbidden for a typical document of that sincerity which God required in his people. Where 2. he mistaketh, or perverteth the question: which was not of things indifferent, but not necessary, nor of all things not necessary, but of Ceremonies. 2. Cutting off the flesh for the dead, with a good meaning, nor was, nor is more evil in it self, then Circumcision, which both the Def. and Rej. allow as lawful, under Prester John. pag. 285.3. That typical doctrine of sincerity, forbiddeth plainly all mixing of Idolaters relics, with God's holy ordinances.

3. The Repl. alleged, that the words Lev. 18.3.4. are general: after their doings ye shall not do: neither shall ye walk in their ordinances. To this the Rej answereth, that these general words are to be restrained unto the matter spoken of, that is, incest, and such mad doings of the Egyptians, and Canaanites. But 1. why are these words more to be restrained unto the matter spoken of in the same chapter, then those, 1. Cor. 4.40 Let all things be done decently and in order, which the Def. and Rej. extend as far as it pleaseth our Convocation to call things decent, and orderly. 2. That they cannot be so restrained, is manifest out of the context; where the ordinances of Idolaters are opposed to all those Ordinances, Statutes, and Iudgements of God, to the doing whereof is promised life. 3. Junius a judicious Interpreter, in his Analysis of the place, maketh the four first verses of this 18. chap. to pertain unto divers chapters following, and not, to the 18 only: ne alienis exemplis, aut legibus vivant. Pelican also upon the place, speaketh home, in this manner: God, by this one law, would have them cast away and abhor, whatsoever had (in worship) pleased the Gentiles. Muche more care ought Christians to have of this; who being taught to worship God in spirit and truth, ought, first and last, to have abhorred the idle, unreasonable, and deceitful forms and rites of Idolaters. Which if the ancient Bishops had well considered, the Church had never been pestered with so many profane rites, and base Ceremonies; by which it came to pass, that some Christians differ little from Gentiles, save in the names of their Idols. Lyra also (a Papist) on Lev. 18. saith plainly: He intended to exclude from the children of Israel every rite of the Gentiles. And on Lev. 19.19. This is commanded, for detestation of Idolatry: because Idolaters did so, the Israelites may not do so.

4. Exod 23.24. (saith the Rej.) Speaketh of superstition, or vicious worship. And this (say we) is the point by us intended: viz: that Ceremonies borrowed from Idolaters, are vicious and superstitious worship.

5. To Deut. 12.4. (Thou shalt not do so to the Lord thy God) the Rej. after many words, answereth (with the Def.) that not unlawfulness, or abuse, but another reason produced this Law. To which it shall suffice to answer, that the other reason was, as Pelecan upon the place noteth; In Ceremonies, we must hold us strictly to the word of God; least we should transgress either in number, or in form, if men's traditions were to be followed.

6. Deut. 30.32. was (as it seemeth) misprinted, for Deut. 16.22. and so cometh after to be handled in the next Section.

7 As for 2. Corint. 6.14. (saith the Rej.) that place condemneth only marriage or familiar society with infidels, and v. 17. partnership with men in uncleanness, by consenting thereto. But he should have remembered 1. that the general condemnation of Fellowship, implieth more then marriage, or familiar society. 2. That using of Idolaters Ceremonies, is more religious fellowship with them, then familiar society civil. 3. That Idolaters Ceremonies cannot be wittingly and willingly used, without implicit consent unto them, hitherto, that their Ceremonies are lawful.

8. To Rev. 18 4. the Rej. answereth in many words; but to the purpose thus: As concerning Ceremonies only separating from those of Babylon's Ceremonies is enjoined, which cannot be separated from sin. Which if it be understood of sin in the religious use of them about God's solemn worship, is as much as we desire: we only add (which is our defense) that such an use of them is sin in itself.

9. Calvin's grave collection, on Lev. 19.27. was by the Replier alleged, which thus soundeth, according to the Rej. his own emendation of the translation: Although rounding, or cutting the hair, was in itself indifferent, yet God would not have it indifferent to his people that they as little children, might learn by small rudiments, that they could not have his favor, unless they should be unlike to the aliens, and uncircumcised, & be altogether and far different from their examples, especially in those Rites wherein religion was shown. The Rej. answereth 1. that the cause of this restraint, was the Jews childlike estate, by Calvin's own words. But Calvin's meaning is removed from the right center. For that he meant not to exclude our age, he showeth in the next words: Experientia docet, &c. Experience doeth (not did) teache. And this childlike estate was the cause (according to him and truth) not of the doctrine taught, concerning unlikenesse unto Idolaters, but of the manner, or means, wherein it was taught, namely, by abstaining from that fashion of hair, and beards, which Idolaters used. God teacheth us to teache our children, agreeable to their age, not that afterward they should forget, that which was taught them, but that they may remember what they were then taught, and not depart from it, when they are old. Prov. 22.6. And did he give us a contrary example? The precepts given in the Churches minority, are her direction (by proportion) in her ripest years. And what direction is in these precepts, for us, the Rej. doeth not show. Surely, I should think, if the common sort of Gods people might not fashion themselves then to Idolaters, then neither now our Ministers: if not then in a matter of passion, much less now in actions pertaining to God's worship: if not then in a tuft of hayr, much less now in a Ministring garment, a Ceremony consecrating us and our children to Christ, and a solemn manner of receyving him in his mysteries. The difference of child-hood, from perfect age, may teache us, that we should not look for such particular warnings now what things of Idolaters we are to shun, as were given in the Churches infancy, but make use of them; being now also generally warned to fly from all Idolatry, & that in the same forms of speech which then were used. 2. He answereth, that It pleased God to set up a partition-wall betwixt Jews and Gentiles, in things otherwise lawful. Which is very true: but among those things, otherwise lawful (as Calvin clearly insinuateth) Rites of human invention, wherein religion was shown, had no place. 3. The Rej. addeth, that neither Calvin, ever affirmed, nor any learned and advised man, dare affirm, that no conformity with Idolaters in any Rites, abused by them to Idolatrous superstition, is lawful to be used of God's people in his service. To which I answer 1. that if he taketh any Rites so largely, that among them he reckoneth God's ordinances, then he saith nothing but truth, and yet nothing to the purpose. For the question is, of Rites devised by man, not necessary in the Church: as may be seen in the terms of our Argument, expressed in the Abridgement, though in part omitted by the Def. which omission was so approved by the Rej. that he accuseth the Repl. of wrong-doing for mending it. Pag. 404. We see now for what advantage. 2. If we may have leave to put in that part of the question, as it standeth in our Argument (Rites devised by man, not necessary) then hear Calvin's and some other learned and advized man's judgment. Calv. Resp. ad Versipellem: It is more right and sound, to say, that the institutions of God may not be abolished for any abuse: but human institutions, being defiled, and so proving hurtful, and offensive to our brethren, are to be abstained from. The superstitions against which true worshipers of God do fight, came (for a great part of them) from unknown pudles: and all of them are soiled with ungodly errors, which never can be removed, but by utter abolishing of their use. Why then do we not simply acknowledge that which is truth, namely, that this remedy (of abolishing their use) is a necessary remedy, for taking of dross from the Church? Mr. Farrel Calvin's fellow-minister, and in some sort, Father, Epist. Calv. 49. disputing against a popish fellow, whose name was Carolus, saith thus: When Carolus would obtrude his significations, in garments, and other magick-like signs; we opposed, that Christ hath taught us a purer manner of worshipping the Father, in spirit and truth, without shadows. And Princes may learn by Hezechias his abolishing of the brazen serpent, what they are to do in those Rites which idle men have erected, and added significations unto, according to their own pleasure. Beza, their son, Disp. Genev. 66. The trifles which had proceeded unto manifest superstition, we have abolished as will-worship. We also affirm, that they which retain the relics of unprofitable Ceremonies, and (out of preposterous judgment) correct them rather than abolish them, deserve ill of the Churches. Yet some there are, who would have Pastors put on garments, which if not by their first bringing in, yet by their abuse, are Baals garments. You Papists have so abused these Ceremonies, that without violating of religion, we cannot retain them.

D. Morton, our Defend. Appeal. lib. 1. cap. 2. Sect. 25. Pope Stephen prescribed in such like cases of human inventions: If our Ancestors have done anything which is afterward turned into superstition, it is to be abolished without delay. Which was also the only remedy which the ancient Council of Eliberis propounded against Idolatry. To omit particulars; it hath hitherto been received for a ruled case among our Divines, as Rivet (one of our last writers) showeth, on the fourth Commandment: It is a rule, that things indifferent, not being necessary, if they be polluted with horrible Idolatry, are to be abolished. The Rejoinder his confidence therefore in this point, did exceed all comely measure. The opposite assertion may be better maintained: viz. that no learned and advised Divine, can be named, free from manifest prejudice, arising from the use and urging of such Ceremonies in that Church where he lived that doeth not condemn all conformity with Idolaters, in their religious unnecessary Ceremonies.

SECT. 3. Concerning Pillars, Lev. 26.1. and the name Baal, Hos. 2.16.17.

1. IT was said by the Repl. that for preventing of an evasion, or stopping of a muse, the Abridgers added; that even such things are to be cast away, which had a good original, and use, (if they be not still necessary and commanded of God) when once they are found to be defiled by Idolatry, as Lev. 26.1. &c. To this the Rej. (abounding as it seemeth with leisure, and words) saith divers things in general, not worth much refutation. 1. He objecteth Tinkers-luck, because then all our Churches must down. But this Ting-tongue shall not have the luck to stay us: because we hold our Churches commanded, in general, though not for their particular places and forms; which particularity was neither mentioned, nor meant in the Argument. 2. He seeketh more then one knot in that rush (necessary or commanded) as if in either sentence that particle or must needs be disiunctive, and not the same with and; which he himself will not affirm in his second thoughts. 3. He affirmeth some distinction to be betwixt things originally evil, and those that are successively evil: which we deny not; but only say, that distinctiō doth not make such a difference, as that therefore one should be <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> <1 page duplicate> rejected, and the other received. 4. He denieth the 2. sertion plainly: which he might have done with fewer words, to as good purpose.

2. Concerning Lev. 26. it was alleged by the Rep. that those (at lest some of those) titular pillars were first only set up for civil use. To which the Rej. answereth, that this was not the first beginning of their religiou• use: which is nothing to the purpose, except no use be good but religious. 2. that though many statues which afterward only for worship, were at the first, for civil respects and had still a civil use, (for this antecedent only is the Repliers) yet it doeth not follow, they were civil at the first which answer is by it self confuted.

3. Calvin's collection or conjecture, was objected: that these statues were erected, to represent God: and this was answered, that according to Calvin's phrase, there is a representation of God, in all pictures that corrupt God's spiritual worship. The Rej. opposeth, that Calvin on Deut. 12.3. showeth his meaning to be only of such representation as was in the golden Calf, and Michas Seraphim; not such as Jacob set up for a monument. Which may be Calvin's Conjecture of that place in Deut. though not of this in Lev. Yet to such a monument as Jacob's was, being grossly abused unto Idolatry, Hezechias would have shown no more courtesy, then he did to the Brazen Serpent. So Pelicanus, upon the place, collecteth: We must ceremonize according to God's Word only. as upon Lev. 26.1. Even triumphal statues were forbidden. And Lyra, The memory of Idolatry is totally to be wiped out.

4. The Def. objected Jacob's pillar, Gen. 28.18. So (•ayth the Reply• he did offer sacrifices, in other manner, and place, then after the Law, was lawful. To this the Rejoinder answereth, 1. that that which Jacob did, was not unlawful by the moral Law. But he is mistaken; not dis•inguishing betwixt the moral Law forbidding religious Ceremenies of mere human appointment, and allowing the same derived from Divine inspiration. So Tertullian (de Idol. cap. 5.) answereth him that defended Images by the brazen Serpent: Idem Deus, qui lege •etuit similitudinem fieri, extraordinario praecepto, serpentis •imilitudinem indixit. Si eundem Deum observas, habes le•em ejus. Imitare tu Mosem, ne facias adversus legem, simu•achrum aliquid, nisi & tibi Deus jusserit. 1. e. The same God which in his Law forbad images, did extraordinarily command the image of a Serpent. If thou wilt obey that God, thou hast his law. Imitate thou Moses, not making any image (contrary to the Law) except God command thee. So all our Divines in answer of Papists, objecting this & such like examples for will-worship) refer these doeings to Divine revelation or instinct. Among these (for this cause) • reckon D. Jackson: who in his Original, pag. 332. giveth us this Catholic remedy and rule, seriously to be considered. Such actions as have been menaged by God's Spirit, suggested by secret instinct, or extracted by extraordinary and special occasions, are then only lawful in others, when they are begotten by like occasions, or brought forth by like impulsions.

5. To Hos. 2.16.17. (where the very name of Baal seemeth to be forbidden, because it had been given unto Idols) the Defend. answered (saith the Rej.) implicitly, i. e. so as I have now answered to all that he hath brought about this fourth Argument. But he undertaketh, by a little change of words, to make that answer satisfactory. For this end, he allegeth first, that the word Baal, in religious use and application, was originally, o from the first use of it, evil: because before Moses was borne, the great and common Idol of the Gentiles was mark out by it, as by a proper name. But 1. If the civil use of this word was originally good, that is sufficient to our purpose. For our Argument speaketh only generally o good originals and beginnings. 2. If this word Baal did originally signify Lord, Master, Husband, (as it is generally taken) then by the Rej. his interpretation, it did originally signify a religious relation. For he holdeth every sign of a servants duty for conscience sake, to be a mystica sign of a spiritual duty: pag. 314. And is not every sign of a Lord's, Masters, or Husbands duty, or state, for conscience sake, of the same nature? 3. Ther is some question among the learned, whether Baal was derived from King Bel, or King Bels name from Baal? The most probable opinion is the later: as Sir Walter Raughly showeth lib. 1. c. 10. sect. 6. because Bel, Beel, or Baal, was as much to say as God. And Arias Montanus, in Hos. 2. saith it signifieth Numen, or the chief sovereign power, whatsoever it be, without restraint to this or that Idol. Now if this be so, what more evil was there in the first use of the name Baal, then of God?

6. In the next place, the Rej. undertaketh to prove, that all religious use of this word Baal, in application to God, is not forbidden; but only as it might further he practice, or bear the appearance of gross Idolatry. In which answer, if he doeth not distinguish gross Idolatrie from slight; nor hath any mental reservation, about pppearance, nor yet taketh might further, otherwise then he words sound, he saith nothing but that which we ot only grant, but also make our plea. To this end e allegeth the use of it in Is. 54.5. Ier. 31.33. Nah. 1.2. o which I answer 1. The Lord, in this place of Hos. did ot speak of every time, but of that day. 2. He did not orbid himself to use this or that term, at his pleasure, ut men. 3. The word Baal Is. 54. Ier. 31. seemeth to be sed in an allusion only reproving, and upbraiding the dolatrie of the people, which had followed Baal; as ewing that what they had sought for in Baal, was to e found only in Jehovah. Otherwise it may be answe••d, that the word appellative is used, without any re••exion unto the proper. And Nah. 1. it is no more gi•en to Jehovah, then the name Idol is given to men, whē n worthy teachers are called Idol-shepherds; or then he name Jehovah is given to dumb creatures, when hey are called Jehovah Iireh Gen. 22. Jehovah Nissi, Ex. 17. ehovah shammah, Ezech. 48.

7. He bringeth four interpretations of the place: of which, the first only (as he saith) may serve our turn n any part. But the first, third, and fourth, are in di•ers Interpreters conjoined. And there is scarce any grave Interpreter, which doeth not gather so much from the context, as we require. See Jerome, Arias Montanus, Oecolampadius, Calvin, Zanchi, Tremellius, Junius. Sir W. Raughly, himself, in the fore-noted place, observeth the sum: Although the name of Baal be justly to be used toward God; yet in respect that the same was given to Idols, God both hated it, and forbad it. And it is not credible, that so many, and such Divines, should make a collection, which hath no foundation in their intrepertation of the text.

SECT. 4. Concerning the aequitie of the Commandments formerly mentioned; &c.

1. The third proof (saith the Replier) in the Abridgement standeth thus: The aequitie of these Commandemens is thus set down in Scriptures: 1. The detestation which our jealous God beareth unto all instruments and tokens of Idolatry, Exod. 20.5.6. Deut. 7.25.26. 2. That we cannot be said sincerely to have repented of Idolatry, &c. except we be ashamed of, and cast away the instruments and monuments of it. 1. Chron. 33.15. Is. 1.29. and 2.20. and 3. 22.2. Cor. 7.11. See Calvin in Deut. serm. 52. Eph. 86. 3. that we shall be in danger to be corrupted. Ex. 34.1. 15. Deut. 7.25.26. Judge. 2.13. Gal. 2.5.4. We shall harden Idolaters. Ezech. 16.54. 1. Cor. 6.10. 5. Ther is more danger in Popish Ceremonies, because the Pope is Antichrist, and we converse more with Papists, then with other Idolaters. Now of all these reasons, and allega•ions, the Def. answereth directly to nothing, but only to those words: See Calvin. The Rej. doeth not deny, but the proof was such as hath been said: neither could he say, that the Def. had answered to anything, but See Calvin.

Yet 1. he goeth about (by many words) to persuade •he Reader, that here was no fault. To this end he speaketh of a Mark sh•t•t, and hit by the Def. of the Def. his professed method (to profess a full answer unto all ob•ected, and answer what he pleased to object to himself) of perverse and injurious dealing, that he should be told of this truth; of welts, guards, and gallant shows, and garnish only, in so many reasons, and Scriptures: What aile you? (saith he) What mean you? To all this, I answer nothing. 2. He himself undertaketh to answer all. To this there•ore I will attend, according to the skill I have.

2. His general answer is, that these five reasons of equity, do not prove, that we are bound unto all and the very same ways of repressing Idolatry, &c. which the Jews were bound to. This we confess, as the Rej. testifieth, neither could they, upon that supposition, be called five reasons of equity only, but of rigor. And what a kind of answering is this; to say, reasons do not prove that which they were not brought to prove? The question is, whether they do not prove, that it is contrary to God's Word to use (much more to command the use of) such Ceremo•ies in the worship of God, as man hath devised, if they be notoriously known, to have been of old, and still to be abused unto Idolatry, by the Papists, especially if the same be now of no necessary use in the Church? This was the opppsition, for proof whereof, these five reasons of equity were brought. And for this we have all our Divines that confound Popish Images, out of the self-same places of Scripture, as Vrsine on the second Commandment, Polanus, Syntag. lib. 9. cap. 26. and whom not?

His answer in particular, is first, to Exod. 20.5.6. Deut. 7.25.36. Isai. 1.29. and 30.32. that these places speak o• Idols themselves, or their garnish, not of indifferent Ceremonies. But 1. these places were not alleged against indifferent Ceremonies; but against Ceremonious instrumen• and tokens of Idolatry, not necessary unto true worship, 2. If they make against the use, or urging of those thing• which are either Idols, or Idols garnish (as is confessed) it is sufficient. For the Cross is an Idol, and both Cross• and Surplice, are the Garnish of Idols.

4. Some of these places (saith the Rejoinder) are grossly mistaken, misalleged, and abused. as Isai. 1.29. an. 2.20. where confusion, and not Godly shame for sin is spoke of: Ezech. 16.54. not speaking of hardening others: 1. Cor. 8.10. speaking of a thing in it self evil: Exod. 34.12. an. Deut. 7.4. speaking of marriage and league with Heathen and Gal. 2.5. not respecting Ceremonies abused. To the first, I answer, 1. that the shame and confusion judicial which is brought upon Idolaters, is because they are not ashamed unto repentance. 2. All those of whom the Prophet speaketh, were not judicially confounded, but penitentially ashamed. Ier. 31.19. Ezech. 16.54. should have been joined to the former allegations, as speaking of men's shame in themselves, not of hardening others. 1. Cor. 8.10. condemneth embolding others to sin, by eating things offered to Idols, though it were otherwise lawful, as appeareth, 1. Cor. 10.29. And a question may be made, whether it had been more unlawful, to eat such things in the Idols Temple, then to take from thence things notoriously known to be such, and eat them in Christian Congregations, at Love-feasts? Exo. 4.12. Deut. 7.4. speak not only of a civil, but also of religious league, such as should hinder them from breaking down their Altars, Images, Groaves, &c. as Iunius (in his Anal.) noteth, and the words immediately following show. Gal. 2.5. placing danger in conformity to Jewish Ceremonies, doeth insinuate as much (at the least) in conformity to Idolaters.

5. The Rejoinder addeth, that Isai. 1.29. and Jude 23. confute our Assertion: because men may pray in Gardens; and a garment spotted with the flesh, being washed, might be used. And such confutations the Rejoinder aboundeth with. But we can distinguish betwixt God's good necessary creatures, and man's inventions of Idolatrous abuse, and unnecessary use.

Yet Gardens might not be used by the Jews, for their ceremonially solemn worship. Neither is every washing polluted garment sufficient to make it fitting for an honest man, that hath other clothes to put on. The washing of a Cross, is like the washing of a piece of clay, or of a Leopards spots.

6. Now Sir (saith the Rejoined.) You have your will. The third proof is examined, and found to be light, facing, to be repented of, as having abused men. Bate an acequoth Coulton: The whole proof is not examined. Nothing is said to the substance of the reasons, but only to the testimonies, which yet are not found to be light, facing, abusive, &c. And nothing at all is said to the fifth reason: Seeing the Pope is revealed to be that great Antichrist, 2. Thes. 2. Apoc. 17. and his Idolatry troubleth the Church, at this day, more then any other, and our people converse more with Papists, then with any other Idolater, there is more danger, in retaining the Ceremonies and relics of Popery, then of any other Idolatry whatsoever: Lev. 18.3.

See Calvin.

7. Calvin was alleged in his 52. Sermon on Deut. speaking thus: If we have any drop of good zeal in us, it must needs vex and grieve us, to see the marks and signs of Idolatry: and that we must to the utmost of our power, deface them. The Rejoinder answereth, that he spake this of proper instruments and monuments of Idolatry; and namely of Images. Which we willingly grant except he mean by proper such as never any beside Idolaters, either before, since, or at the same time, did use. And we add, that the Cross is more then a proper instrument of Idolatry: because it is an Idol: Neither hath either the Defend. or Rejoined. denied, as yet, that it is an Idol. We add also, that mystical Ceremonies, are (in Calvin's phrase) Images, either living, such as God's institutions, or dead, as men's inventions. Inst. lib. 8. cap. 11. sect. 13. Add lastly, that seeing the Def. and Rej. have admitted historical Images, as of the same nature with other mystical Ceremonies (in the former Chapter) it is too late now to distinguish their natures.

8. A second place of Calvin, is out of epist. 87. where he warneth the L. Protector of England, that nothing upon pretence must be tolerated in the Church, which came either from Satan, or from Antichrist. To this the Rej. (calling for all Calvin) answereth, that Calvin in that Epistle, speaketh against precise extremities about Ceremonies: and that he professedly intended rather to exempt our Ceremonies from those he condemneth: as appeareth by his judgment of the Service-book in Q. Mary's time, the heads whereof were sent unto him from Franckfort, by M. Knox, and M. Whittingam, not one whit bettered (as the Rej. saith he dare say) & out of his Epist. to Bull. an. 1551. &c. Now 1. because he will have all Calvin, he shall have enough of Calvin.

Thus therefore he writeth unto the L. Protecteur, I come to the other head about abolishing and plucking up by the very roots •buses and corruptions, which the Devil in the ages past hath brought into God's ordnance. It is evident that the Christianity or religion of Popery is bastardly and false. Wherefore if we resolve to bring the people out of that gulf, we must follow the Apostles example 1. Cor. 11. From whence is generally taught: that when men would reform as they ought to do and acceptably to God, they must then betake themselves to the pure word of God. For look how many mixtures (which man's brain hath hatched) do remain; so many pollutions are there which distract men from the right use of those things which the Lord had appointed for their Sa•vation. Wherefore while such a sink as that, is but in part pumpt out, things cannot be said to be as they should be, specia•y when religion appears rather masked, then sincere and with open face, which I therefore note because I perceive many now a-days of another judgment; as if petty abuses were to be let alone, as long as grosser maters be removed. Whereas contrari-wise experience it self showeth what a fertile soil and fruitful seed-plot of lies, man's invention is, that being but thin sown (as it were) with lesser grains, groweth to such a heap as if his nature did intend nothing else. Now the Scripture is far different from this. When David speaks of Idols, he professeth their names should not go in or out at the doors of his lips, to show extreme detestation. Let us remove our foot as far as possibly we can from all the leaven of Satan. For what were all thos• Ceremonies but so many who•rish enticements to lead s•ely souls unto mischief• yea even snares to catch them in? But if we talk that the people may be warned (forsooth) lest they stumble, yet notwithstanding who doeth not behold men hardened by them? So little doth that warning avail to any purpose. Therefore if any such thing b• left untouched, it will be but the foment and fuel of greater mischief, and a very blind set up to hinder sincere Doctrine from all entrance as were meet.

Then follow the words which the Rejoinder citeth for all Calvin. Let any understanding Reader judge now of Calvin's judgment: if we require anymore praecise rigor then Calvin did not only wish, but also contend, for, and that with such Arguments, as no De•ender or Rejoinder will ever answer? 2. Whereas he saith that he dare say M^r. Knox and Whittingam sent the heads of the Service-book not one whit bettered, insinuating that they made the worst they could of it, quoting the Discourse of Frani•so •t troubles, it is as much as to say, he dare deny, that which those good men said, and proved (by repraesenting their writing) concerning their own fact, without any reason. Surely their conclusion was this: Other things not so much shame, as pity, compelleth us to keep close: &c.

Note (saith the Author of that Discourse) that the description is very favorably put down. If you confer it with the Book, and the usage of the same in many Churches of this Realm▪ you can confess no less. And thereof you may gather, what M. Calvin would have written, if they had noted all the abuses of the same. Beside the Letter itself (written by M.K. and M. Wh. unto Calvin) is to be seen & read, in that Discourse; where mention is made of the Surplice, Kneeling, and Cross; But none of Confirmation, Offeringes, Womens Purification, and such other things as the Rejoinder would have Calvin only to have respected▪

3. For Calvines Epistles to Bullinger, 1551. they were two: and in the first, epist. 120. he excuseth only as tolerable in extremity, the Cornerd cap, and Rochet: and what is this to our Ceremonies using and urging? In the second epist. 121. he exhorteth the Protectour, to help Ho•per, standing even against those fopperies, What can the Rejoinder glean from hence. 3. As for that the Rejoinder addeth, that Calv. Instit. lib 4. cap. 17. sect. 37. (for Easter day was handled before) professedly alloweth our Kneeling, it is nothing so. For he speaketh only against the Papists kneeling unto the Hoste in Procession; and for aggravation of that Idolatry, saith▪ that in the Supper itself, we may kneel to Christ. There is not one word of such kneelinge as ours is. There is no Non-Conformist, which refuseth to kneel unto Christ, in the celebration of the Lord's Supper.

9. But Calvin (saith the Def.) hath these words: that in laboring to remove such things as may seem to nourish Idolatry, we must take heed of being too supersti•ious, i• urging too vehemently things in their own nature i•different. To which there needeth no answer, then this: we assent to those words, without any exception. Afte•Calvin, the Replier made mention of Martyr, Gryncu•, Wolphius, Vrsinus, Machabeus, Zanchius, Simlerus, Z•pperus, Fulke, and the Authors of our Homilies, as quoted i• the Abridgement (pag. 24.) to the same purpose. Bu• the Rejoinder thought not them worth the answering in special: and therefore I must leave them to consideration only. To the rest of this Section I answer nothing but, Nihil dicit.

SECT. 5. Concerning Daniel's abstinence.

HEere nothing is handled but Daniel's example, Dan. 1.8. Neither doeth the Rejoinder add anything to the Defendant, but only, that Daniel's forbearance of the Kings meat, was grounded on special ceremonial injunctions of God, and not upon our moral rule, that the abuse had made the use unlawful; nor was this a Ceremony in God's worship. To which I answer 1. that our argument is also grounded on the equity of Ceremonial injunctions, and that equity is our moral rule.

2. It must needs be, that if good meats (not otherwise unclean) were unlawful unto Daniel, then it was because they were defiled by Idolatry: which is all that this place was alleged for.

3. If this was not a Ceremony of God's worship, the Argument is so much the stronger: because all Christians know, that whatsoever is unlawful out of God's worship, the same (not being by God appropriated to his worship) is much more unlawful in it.

SECT. 6. Concerning Hezekias his breaking down the brazen Serpent.

1. THis example is so pregnant, that it hath by all sortes of Divines been used and improved to so much as our Proposition doth require from it. The Superstitious Authors of the Canon-law, could not shut their eyes wholly against this light. For so D. Abbot (Def. of M^r. Perk. part. 1. pag. 168.) translateth that law, Dist. 63. cap. Quia. If our Pred•cessors have done some things which at that time might be without fault, and afterwards be turned to error and superstition; we are taught by Hezekias breaking the brazen Serpent, that the Posterity may abolish the same, wit•out any delay, and with great authority. And the same Doctor Abbot confesseth, the force of this consequence from Hezekias his example, to make against such private use of the Cross, now, as Constantine, and the ancient Christians had of it▪ What then but the time, did hinder that good and learned man, from seeing that it maketh much more against the public use of the same Cross in Baptism? I never yet could meet with that Papist, which denied the consequence: The brazen Serpent (having been God's own ordinance) was for Idolatrous abuse, to be abolished. Therefore human inventions, for like abuse, much more. Yet the Def. and Rej. deny it. With what reason, shall appear•.

2. The Def. gave five reasons for Hezekias his abolishing the Serpent. To which it was replied, that no man doubteth, but Hezekias had reasons, more then five, for that he did: and that the like may be alleged for abolishing of our Ceremonies. This last (saith the Rej.) should have been shown. So it is (say I) in the following dispute.

Let them (addeth the Replier) be abolished by public authority, and I will undertake, reasons to justify the action done, will easily be acknowledged, even of those that now can see none to persuade unto the doing of it. Like enough; (answereth the Rej.) and well enough: because it is lawful, and just to abolish them as inconvenient. Now let this be well noted. In the general answer to this Argument, it was pleaded (pag. 406.) that Ceremonies abused to Idolatry are to be abolished, if they be not conveniently necessary. Here our Ceremonies so abused, are confessed to be such, as that, if they were once abolished by public authority, reasons could easily be found to prove them justly abolished as inconvenient. So that nothing but public authority, doth make them justifiable, or free from such inconvenience as deserveth and requireth the abolishing of them. And who can conceive such a virtue in public authority, as to make that morally convenient which before was inconvenient? or to make reasons forceable, for justifying an action done; which are not forceable for justifying the same, as to be done? Our cause by this confession, wanteth nothing but one Fiat, or act of public authority, to make it justifiable; so far at least, as concerneth this question: whether the Ceremonies are to be abolished or no?

3. Because the Def. did make this one ground of denying our consequence from Hezekias zeal against the monuments of Idolatry, that He did not abolish the Idols which Solomon suffered to be set up in favor of his strange wives; because they were (at that time) neglected Idols. It was replied, that it may well be thought, they were destroyed by Hezekiah, and set up again before the time of Josiah. This the Rej. calleth rashness to be repented of: because it is said (2. Reg. 23.13.) that Iosiah destroyed those high places, which Solomon had set up. And was it such a rashness, to say that it may be thought so? the phrase is more modest then theirs, who peremptorily affirm those Idols to have been neglected until after Hezekias time; when the Scripture testifieth plainly, that Ahaz, Hezechias his father, worshipped Molch (which was one of those Idols) by making his son to pass thorough the fire; and was so madly given to superstition, that he sacrificed under every green tree. 2. Reg. 16. Nay less was said, then some learned have with great probability affirmed: namely, that these Idols with their appurtenances were first defaced by Solomon himself, after his repentance; and being restored after by Idolaters, were again defaced. Salianus (in his Annals ad an, 3309.) saith thus: We think also that while Solomon lived, that whole shop of devils was broken up and ruined. And withal, the statues, the groves, and altars, as also the rest of idolatrous monuments 2. King. 23.13. to have reference to Manasseh and Ammon (who had set them up in the same place, and upon the same foundation) and not to Solomon, who died 250. years before. It is incredible to speak that when Asa, Jehoshaphat, and Ichoiada did far and near destroy idolatry, they notwithstanding suffered a skandall so apparent. And to the year 3406. it were very strange if those Idols after 350. years, should yet remain, the which Solomon after his repentance, and other good Kings had abolished. So that it is probable that such like temples and Idols were repaired, and bui•t up again by other succeeding ungodly Kings, which Solomon in former time had made: that that which Solomon built should be all one with such like as he had built.

Where he showeth by divers instances, both out of Scripture, and out of common speech; how that word which, doeth not always note the same singular substance; therein confuting all the ground that the Rej. had for censuring the Repl. of rashness to be repented of. This sentence is the more also to be favored; because according to the other, which our Def. and Rej. maintain, it will be very hard to answer that objection against Solomon's repentance, which Rabanus on 2. Reg. 23. groundeth on that superstition: Solomon never truly repented of his idolatry: for if he had manifested fruits worthy repentance, he would have taken order with those Idols, which he had set up by removing them, and (being so wise a man) never have left them to stand for stumbling blocks to fools, as if what he had erroneously devised, had been well and wisely done. Beside all this, it is not credible, that the same individual Temples stood by Jerusalem from Solomon's time, to Josiah; if it were but for this, that the Assyrians came even unto the gates of Jerusalem, spoiling and breaking down all costly buildings, (such as Solomon's Temples were) not sparing▪ but deriding the gods of Nations. 2. Reg. 18.

4. It was added by the Replier that those Idols should have been destroyed, (though they had been for the time, neglected) because that evil for which Iosu destroyed them ought as well to have been praevented, as corrected. To this the Rejoinder answereth 1 that this is not true, except Hezekia had suspected that evil. And who will say, that there is no cause to suspect evil of an Idol, though it be for a time neglected? Or can any man think, that if Israelites had neglected them, no Sidonian, Moabite, or Ammonite, gave occasion of any evil to be suspected by those Idols? The Spanish and Frenche Papists (to say nothing of English) when they, in passing by the Cross in Cheapside, do reverence unto it, give they not cause to suspect, some evil to cleave unto it? 2. The same means (saith the Rejoinder) are not always requisite for praevention, which must be used for recovery. Yes truly, about Idols (if we judge out of the Scripture) the very same means. Burn then (saith the Rejoined.) all your Popish bockes, lest they fall into the hands of Popelings to abuse them. So will I certainly, if you can show me, that they must be burned when Popelings have had them in their hands, and abused them which here you grant concerning these Idols.

5. Zanchius was cited by the Defend. to prove, that this abolishing is not the universal remedy for all abuses of Ceremonies (he meaneth) unto Idolatry. And because the Replier could not find the place, we are by the Rejoinder directed to the later edition, pag. 678. where I find these words: This rule is to be observed: that things grown to abuse & defiled by superstition, if they be indifferent may, yea oftentimes ought, to be taken away. Here (I hope) is nothing against our proposition. And yet the Def. hath nothing else to catch at, nothing else (I say) but those words: they may be removed, as signifying, that they may also not be removed: As if every thing that may be removed, may also not be removed! The Rejoinder addeth, that he admitteth of some Feast-days, as tolerable. I want, he speaketh something favorable of them: but herein, he neither speaketh to our question directly, nor sheweth how that which he saith may be accorded with his own rule. But pag. 800. (saith the Rejoinder) he strayneth the consequence to things manifestly Idolatrous, not to indifferent Rites. So do we also: But the rejoinder as it seemeth, maketh Solomon's Idols, (if they be for a time neglected) indifferent rites, which Chancie never did. Nay Zanchi pag. 649. from this example of Hezekia, reprooveth those that keep in secret the monuments of Superstition, though out of Churches. True (saith the Rejoinder) but betwixt such Monuments, and indifferent Ceremonies, he distinguisheth. And so do we, in some sense: but that things otherwise indifferent, may by becoming monuments, prove unlawful, Zanchi never denied. To Zanchi, were added (in the Abridgement, pag. 24.) as witnesses of our consequence from Hezekias his example, Augustine, Calvin, Martyr, Wolphius, Lavater, Sadeel, Jewel, Bilson, Fulke, Rainolds, Andrues, and Perkins. To all these it was unseasonable (saith the Rejoinder) to answer at full, in this place. We must therefore wait (though in vain) for a place which will seem seasonable.

6. The Defender in fine, noted two disparities betwixt the brazen Serpent, and our Ceremonies: 1. That the Idolatry of the Jews about that was public, general, and in the same Church; which is not so with our Ceremonies. 2. That there was no other means to cure the Idolatry of those times; as now there is. To the former it was answered 1. that these circumstances are not rendered as reasons of abolishing the brazen serpent, in the Text, but invented by the Def. True (saith the Rej.) yet any man may conceive that they might be reasons. But for generality, I cannot conceive how it can be proved: and the public abuse, though it might be a reason, yet not such a one, as that with it, abolishing should be used, or suspended. But our Ceremonies (addeth the Rej.) must in comparison be likened to the brazen Serpent used well, at Jerusalem; which ought not to have been abolished, for such another in relation to that, set up at Bethel, and made an Idol. Wherein he mistaketh much, For first our Ceremonies were never good, or well used. Calvin is allowed of by the Def. and Rej. for his moderation about them. Let him therefore speak: I answer the turn-coat, What is there in the Papacy unlike the brazen Serpent, except only the original? Epist. 265. The Popish Ceremonies are naught from the beginning. 2. The Papists did not take these Ceremonies from us, but we from them. 3. It may be very well questioned, whether the serpent at Jerusalem, considered as no way commanded of God, should not have been abolished, if the ten Tribes should have taken occasion by it of Idolatry? It was answered 2. that private idolatry is also to be removed, as well as public. That cannot be de facto, saith the Rejoinder. Yet thus far it may be very well de facto, that nothing be used in public, which is known to nourish idolatry in private. It was answered 3. That all these circumstances did more then agree to our Ceremonies, in the beginning of our reformation. To this it is rejoined 1. that our Ceremonies were never the object of gross idolatry: which he would not have said, if he had thought of the Cross, or that the proper means of idolatry are as well to be abolished, as the objects. The 2. rejoinder is, that though they ought to have been removed; in the beginning of reformation, yet now not: which is as if a debtor should plead, that he owed indeed so much money to his creditour long ago, but now (though it hath been every year called for) he is quit by deferring the payment. Sure (saith the Repl.) our Ceremonies are not grown better since the reformation, by any good they have done. That is not here considered (answereth the Rejoinder) but if they be not grown to less abuse? As if less superstition, with much mischief, were not enough to cashiere such Ceremonies as do no good!

To the second disparity, it was replied, that this is the very question, whether any other means be sufficient to cure the disease of human Ceremonies idolatrously abused, beside abolishing? This (saith the Rej.) you make a question of. And was not the Defend. disputing against us? what reason then had he, to make our question an argument, or answer against us? It was replied also, that experience hath shown the disease of our Ceremonies is not cured, in the Dominions of our Hezekia. Yet (saith the Rej.) the means (without abolishing) may be sufficient, if they were well applied, that is, given and received. As if the same means would not have been in like manner sufficient in Hezekias time, against the Idolatry of the Serpent, if they had been well applied i. e. given, and received! Heerin certainly is no disparity.

A piece of a Comparison, betwixt the Primitive, & the present English Church.

1. Because the Def. 3. or 4. times, repeated, and urged, (as much making for his cause) that our Church is so truly reformed, that it doeth most lively express the face, & full body of her Primitive Mother-Church; the Repl. therefore at last, was forced to say something to this; especially in this place, where it is questioned, if we will allow it to be called a reformed Church. He answered therefore in general, that in the main pointes of doctrine, and the grossest superstitions, our Church is reformed; but in regard of Ecclesiastical government, and some Ceremonies, it is not. To this it is rejoined, 1. That by face and body, was meant only doctrine and religion, not government, or Ceremonies. The Defend. therefore understood this term, as Cardinal Perone; and the Replier as D. Andrues, who in the beginning of his answer, hath these words: Points of faith seem rather to pertain to the inward parts, then to the face. It is the Agend (of the Church, •e should have held him to. In that is the face of the Church, &c. After this, the Rejoinder making all the Primitive Church, that was within divers hundreds of years after the Apostles age, out of the Century-writers, and others, gathereth a catalogue of errors and defects, in doctrine, and observances, which by little and little, began in those times; and thence concludeth, that our doctrine is purer then it was in the Primitive Church, and also some observances. Now 1. this extension of the Primitive Church is taken without leave. 2. Those errors of doctrine may no more be attributed to the Primitive Church, then the errors of M^r. Montague, and others like him (who are neither few in number, nor mean for power, as things go) may be to the English Church, 3. In the other matters of Ecclesiastical Policy, and Ceremonies, we hold that for which the Rejoinder formerly objected unto us, as a spirit of singular singularity, pag. 384. and now confesseth to be true; namely, that the Apostolical purity began presently after to be corrupted, and so proceeded in defection more and more. Yet all this doth not hinder, but divers corruptions may be found among us, which were not known in the first primitive ages. Nay let it be marked well, how strange an assertion is made up by this reckoning of the Rejoinders! In Hezekias time (saith the Defendant) the idolatry about the Serpent, could not be cured but by abolishing the Serpent: but in our most truly reformed Church, which doth most lively express the face and full body of her Primitive Mother-Church, this disease would be found curable without any such extremity. The meaning is according to the Rejoinder his interpretation: the disease of idolatry is more easily cured, in that Church, which doeth lively express the face, and full body, of those Churches, which were infected with many errors, and declining in many things, to superstition, then in Hezekias Church, most purely at that time reformed. Surely the Rej. in a great part of his gloss, forgot his text: otherwise he would never have in this manner confuted it.

Cathedral music with Organs.

2. The first question was, If the Primitive Church had such chaunting Idol-service, as is in out Cathedral Churches? The Rejoinder after some words spent about singing, (about which he bringeth not the least resemblance of that in question, until the fourth age after Christ) excepteth first, that Organall music was gods ordinance in the Old Testament, and that not significant, or typical; and therefore is sinfully call•d Idol-service. 2. That all men whose hearts are not averse, by distraction, stupidity, or prejudice, feel such music to work much upon their affections. To this I say 1. that his denying of Organall music to have been significant or typical, is without reason, and against the current of our Divines; taken (as it may seem) out of Bellarmine de missa. lib. 2. cap. 15.) who useth this evasion against those words of P. Martyr: Musically organs pertain to the Jewish Ceremony, and agree no more to us, then Circumcision. So that we may neglect it, and take him as saying, that nothing which was ordained in the Old Testament (no not sacrificing of beasts) is now an Idol-service. 2. For that, and the other, both together, it is fit the Rejoinder should be put in mind how many, and what kind of men, he accuseth of distraction, stupidity, or prejudice!

1. Thomas Aquinas (in whose time this faction was not in general request, much less in the Primitive) in 22. q. 91. a. 2.4. opposeth thus: The Church useth no music for divine praises, lest it should seem to Indaize, and answereth thus: Musically instruments do more stir up the mind to delight, then frame it to a right disposition. In the Old Testament there was some need of them, both, &c. and also because they did figure out something. Erasmus, in 1. Cor. 14. saith thus: We have brought a tedious and player-like music into the Church, a tumultuous noise of many voices, such as I think was not heard among the Theaters of Grecians or Romans. For which purpose, whole flocks of boys are maintained at great charges, whose age also is all spent in learning such gibble gabble. At such cost is the Church •or a pestiferous thing, &c.

It is evident that that some Ecclesiastical chanting and roarings in our Temples (scarce also understood of the Priests themselves) is a most foolish and vain abuse, and a most pernicious let to piety. I make no question but all that kind of music was a part of the legal pedagogy. In the solemn worship of God, I do not judge it more suitable, then if we should recall the incense, tapers, and other shadows of the Law, into use. I say again, to go beyond what we are taught, is most wicked pervacity.

It would be too tedious, if I should reckon up all that have assented to these. I will add only the two and thirty grave learned men, which were chosen in King Edwards days, to reform Ecclesiastical laws, and observances they judged this law fitting, It likes us well to have this tedious kind of music taken away. Certainly these were neither distracted, nor stupid men: whence their prejudice came, let the Rejoinder himself judge.

Chancelours, Commissaries, and Officials.

3. The second question was about these children of the earth, dealing with the keys of Christ's Heavenly Kingdom, whether they can be found in the face, or body of the Primitive Church? The Rej. 1. answereth plainly and roundly, No. Yet these human creatures, are those that keep most mis-rule among poor Christian men and Ministers also, in Ecclesiastical censures, of suspension, and excommunication, with intolerable exactions. That assertion therefore of the Defend. that the Church of England doth most lively express the face and full body of her Primitive Mother-Church, is in one great part of it, dashed by the Rejoinder his No. 2. The Rejoined, addeth, nor did any Presbyters execute any Church censures, without leave or consent of their Bishops, or unpreaching Elders at all, execute any censures of the Church. Now $\langle \diamond \rangle$ this is nothing to the purpose, but a mere diversion, that something might seem to be said beside No. 2. For the first, I answer with Junius in Bel. Cont. 5. lib. 1. cap. 4. an. 27. Censures are in common to be acted by the Presbytery: so that as the other Presbyters did not act them without the consent of the chief Presbyter, or Bishop, so neither could any Bishop do it without them, of and by himself. That Bishops afterward dared so to do, it was tyrannidis indignae, mere tyranny. 3. For the confutation of the second, I propound a remarkable place in Origen, against Celsus lib. 3. extant also in his Philocalia, collected by Gregory Naz. and Basil, set forth in Greek and latin, by Tarinus: were cap. 18. Unto Celsus, objecting that Christian teachers sought for simple foolish auditors, Origen answereth, that Christian teachers did first discern and try their auditors; and of the approved, they had two orders, one of beginners (that were catechised) and another of those which had made further progress. And among these latter (distinct from teachers) he relateth thus: Some are appointed who are to look to the life and manners of such as are admitted, that they which do ought unseemly, may, as need shall require, be excluded the Congregation, and they which do otherwise, may be cherished, and daily grow better. This is the translation of Tarinus. The rest of the Rejoinder to this question hath nothing in it but words.

Pompos Bishops with sole power of Ordination and Excommunication.

4. The question is if any such were in the Primitive Church? The Rejoinder 1. answereth concerning Pomp, that Peace and beneficencie of Princes brought in this difference of outward state. But all difference of outward estate was not meant by Pomp. For so $\langle \diamond \rangle$ Ministers, that have convenient means for a liberal kind of life, with hospitality, should be pompous. We are not so simple, as to account the Pastor of Sutton Colfield, (as such) pompous. There is certainly a pomp that doeth not agree to a Minister of the Gospel: as the pompous state of a Baron, or Earl (which the Defender himself, at his third flight, unto Durham, is risen to that requireth many idle attendants, for no other use but only for Comportment, & Luster of state; that which must have so much time spent in bridling of the Bishops horses, as the ancient B. b. took to preach diverse sermons in, as M. Hooper speaketh; that which makes a poor man afraid to speak unto his Minister, without such trembling, as Majesty breedeth; that which would make it ridiculous, for a mean man to desire a visitation of him, for himself, his wife, or children, in sickness or other perplexity; that which requireth a Chaplain not only to do other duties of religion for him, but even to give thanks at his table, and that standing, which he sitteth; that (to omit other characters) which maketh all his doings Lord-like, by way of Commandment: I will not here speak of, draw an excommunication against him; take him Pursivant; Jailour, see to your prison; as being notorious in divers of them: but only note one example, out of mine own experience, which many others can parallel by theirs: I was once, & but once (I thank God) before a Bishop: and being presented unto him, by the chief Magistrates of an Incorporation, for to be preacher in their town; the lowly man first asked them, how they durst choose a preacher, without his consent? You (said he) are to receive the preacher that I appoint you. For I am your Pastor, though he never fed them. And then, turning to me, how durst you (said he) preach in my Diocese, without my leave? So that without any other reason, but mere Lordship, the whole Incorporation, and I, were dismissed, to wait his pleasure: which I (for my part) have now done this twenty year, and more. If this kind of Pomp were in the Primitive Church, or if it be not in ours, the Replier may be blamed for mentioning Pomp in his Quaere.

2. Concerning Ordination, the Rej. his answer is, that the Bishop doth it not (regularly) all alone. What is this to sole power of doing it? If an Irish or Welch Bishop, ordeineth one at London in his chamber, or in some Chapel, and admitteth him that commended the person to him, for to join with him, for fashion sake, in the gesture of hands-imposing, be he of what place or Diocese soever, in whom is the power of Ordination? If the Bishop of London, ordeyneth a minister at large, and biddeth his Chaplain, or Chaplains, do so much as add their hands to the business, is there power in the Chaplain, more then in any other, that by chance may be present? Power of Ordination is not given (by our Laws) to individua vaga, that is to say, Vagrant men, of whom the Law taketh no notice, such as were wont to be called Hedge-Priests, but to authorized Prelates. These are toys, to mock the Church (if not God) with. Such doings were never heard of in that Church which deserveth the title of Primitive. Of Excommunication, the same answer is given; and so the same answer may serve. Let this only be added, that therein, the Bishop hath such absolute power, that he may derive the same to his Chancelours, Commissaries, Officials, & such like Vnderlings, to be dispensed by them, even unto the commanding of God's Ministers for to denounce their Censures, without any discerning what aequitie there is in the cause, and what assistance of Ministers is required, appeareth by this style: John Hone, D. of Law official &c. to all Rectors, &c. For as much as we (proceeding rightly and lawfully) have adjudg'd all and everyone, whose names are under-written to be excommunicated; and since the discee M^r. Rouland Allen Priest, hath excommunicated them, by our mere office in writing; we do therefore commit to you &c. to denounce openly, &c. given under the Seal of our Officiality, such a day, and such a year. If any footsteps of such an approved power could be shown in the Primitive Bishops, all Christians might merveil at so sudden and monstrous a defection. But both Defend. and Rejoined. know, that it is a relique of Popedom.

Calling of Ministers, without express consent of the Congregations over which they are set.

5. The question was whether any such thing was in the Primitive Church? The Rejoinder his answer is affirmative; that it seems there was such a thing: because. It is said only of the Apostles, that they ordained Elders to the Churches, Act. 14.23. and Titus, Tit. 1.5. appointed the Ministers. 2. Sometime Ministers were chosen by prophesy; and sometime by lot. 3. The people's consent was not held of divine necessity. For the grave Council of Laodicea, Can. 3. restrained the people from choice of their Ministers. Beside, the people of this Land have given their implicit consent in Parliament, to such as the Patrons and Bishops call: And if they do their parts, it is as well, and sometime better, then if they were chosen by the people. Finally, God hath not forbidden our manner of calling Ministers, nor commanded the other. Wher 1. let it be marked, that the question was only of the people's consent; concerning which the Rejoinder on all these words, answereth just nothing. 2. The first place he bringeth against the people's election, Act. 14.23. is the chief place, which Protestants use to bring for it; as Bellarmine (de Clericis. lib. 1. cap. 7.) observeth of it. This argument is the chief foundation of Illyrius, Calvin, Chemnitz, and others. Of Bellarmine's answer, the Rejoinder maketh an Argument, against our Divines, who have confuted that answer, and so sufficiently answered his Argument, long before he framed it: which yet he taketh no knowledge of, but nakedly propoundeth it, as if this were the first time of beating it off the stage. It is (saith he) only said of the Apostles, & not of the Churches, that they did ordain Elders. Act. 14.23. So (say I) it is only said of the Apostles, and not of the Churches, in the very same verse, that they did pray and fast: doeth it follow from hence, that the Churches had no hand, part or consent, in prayer and fasting? If not, then neither doeth the only mentioning of the Apostles in creating Presbyters, exclude the people's formal choice, much less their consent. If any man desires large and full clearing of the place, he may find it in Iⁿius his Notes on Bellarmine, Contr. 5. lib. 1. cap. 7. annot. 59.63.64. where the Conclusion is, that Bellarmine doeth in this argument nugari, nothing but trifle, disioyning things that ought to be conjoined, as if there were a contradiction betwixt these two Propositions: The Apostles ordained; the Churches ordained. If the Rejoinder would have brought a fitting example, he should have shown us, that Paul, or Barnabas, being at Jerusalem, ordained a Minister, and sent him to Antioch, Iconium or Lystra, signifying by letters, that such a man was appointed their Pastor, though they never knew, or heard of him before. For that had been something like unto the practice of a Bishop, who upon the Patrons praesentation, wheresoever he be, sendeth his Minister from the place, or Palace of his residence, unto a Congregation 20.30. or 40. miles of; which poor despized People, must be content, with towling of a Bell, as sufficient notice given of their Ministers fitness, and their necessity to acknowledge the same. 3. In the second place Tit. 1.5. whereas our translation hath, that Titus was to ordain Ministers, the Rejoinder turneth ordaining into apointing, and I may better turn it into setting, or placing. Now (which soever translation be admitted) the Rejoy. is argument is lighter then a feather, except it be supposed that Titus could not effect that Ministers should be in every Church of Creete, neither by, nor with the Churches consent: which is too absurd a proposition for any reasonable man to father. Take the Rej his translation in ordinary rigor; Our King doeth appoint Bishops; and yet they are not placed in their Seats, without some kind of consent and election of others. And yet I hope the Rej. himself will not say, that Titus took so much upon him, as this cometh to.

4. As for choosing Ministers by Prophecy, that was very extraordinary, and therefore hath no place in the question of ordinary calling. Yet 1. Prophecy did no less require the concurrence of the Churches consent, in an ordinary Minister, then it did the Presbyteries ordination in Timothies person. 1. Tim. 4.14. It was only an extraordinary cause of that consent, which otherwise should have been grounded on the persons qualification. Prophecy also or Vision did sometime follow the Churches election, as in Celerinus, of whom Cyprian (Epist. 34. ed. Goulart.) recordeth: When he wavered about consenting to the Church, by a vision of the night he was forced to assent.

5. As for election by lot, I do not think any example can be given of it, wherein the Churches election of divers persons betwixt whom the lot should design, with their consent, did not concur.

6. As for the Primitive Churches tenet of Divine authority, nothing can be proved out of the Council of Laodicea, which was after Julian's time. The Synod of Africa (Epist. 68. Cypr. ed. Goul.) doeth inform us thus: The people it self hath power both to choose worthy Priests, and to refuse unworthy ones. The which also we see to come from Divine authority. Yet Calvin answereth, that even that Laodicean Council did not restrain from election, but only from disorderly electing, by themselves. And is therein learnedly seconded against Bellarmino's rejoinder, by Junius, in Bell. Cont. 5. lib. 1. cap. 7.

7. As for implicit consent in Parliament, it maketh nothing to the question. And yet it cannot be proved, that everything decreed by Parliaments, have the Churches implicit consent. For then the Church did implicitly consent unto all the alterations of religion, in King Henries, King Edwards, Q. Mary's, and Q. Elizabeth's days, how opposite soever they were one to another, neither can it be shown lawful, for the Churches of Christ, to leave their privileges which Christ hath given them, to the pleasure of any Parliament.

8. To say, that the Patrons and Bishops sending without the Churches consent, is as good, or better then the Churches free consent, well ordered, and directed; is all one as to say, it is as good, or better, that Women should be married without their consent, then with it.

9. As for the final answer, I refer the Reader partly to that already said, and partly to D. Ames his answer unto Bellarmino, tom. 2. lib. 3. cap. 3.

Ministers going to law for their places.

6. The question is, if this was known in the Primitive Church? It is rejoined 1. that Bishops were often in question at Synods, about their title to their places, which was as much. But 1. This was not in the Apostles time. 2. Questioning before Synods, about Ecclesiastical affairs, is of Ecclesiastical nature; going to law, not so. In Synods all things ought to be determined by God's Word: at the Kings Bench, and Assizes, the Judges pronounce sentence by man's law. Yet the good ancient Bishops, were so far from seeking a title to their places, by Synodical judgment, that they withdrew themselves, as being afraid to have such a title put upon them, either by Churches or Synods: examples of which modesty, we have even in declining times, Basil, Gregory &c. A law we find also (Cod. de Epist. & Cler.) mentioning the same disposition: The Prelate ought to be so far from ambition, that nothing but compulsion should draw him, though he be desired, let him give back, and when invited, let him shift, &c. For certainly he is unworthy the office of Priesthood, unless he be ordained unwillingly. Certainly, these men would never have sought those places by course of law, which they hardly accepted, being obtruded upon them. 2. The Rejoinder saith, Lawing about places ariseth upon the title of Patronage, a civil inheritance. Whereas the question is not from whence it ariseth, but if it appeared in the face of the Primitive Mother-Church? This answer is as much as to say, our Church hath a special wound, or sore in her face, which the Primitive Church had not; and therefore must have a plaster upon it now, in those times unknown: that is, our face doth not lively represent that face, which is the question. Beside, if the lawing be necessary, about the Patrons civil title, what hath the Minister to do with it, except ambition or covetousness, doth cause him to take other men's business upon him, for his own advantage?

Pluralists, Non-residents, Dumb-Ministers.

7. About these, the Rejond. confesseth that they are the sore of our Church, but not allowed, or tolerated, further then Mr. Hooker showeth. Now 1. If they be sores, being also in the face, that is, our chief eminent, Convocation men, bearing them in their fore-heads, surely they must needs disfigure the Primitive face. 2. Though I have no more leisure to seek and confute M^r. Hooker's mitigations, then the Rejoinder. had to allege them; yet I dare say, if the Stues be tolerated, and allowed at Rome, these sores are tolerated, and allowed in England, they are as well known; more publicly professed; they are practiced in the Bishops Palaces; and not only the Court of Faculties, but most Bishops do gain by them. But (saith the Rej.) If you can tell us the Certain and safe remedy of this sore, I am persuaded the Church will thank you. But I am neither so persuaded of the Convocation-Church, not yet that the Rejoinder himself is so persuaded Men do not usually give thanks, for that which formerly they did not desire, and if this Church had desired a remedy, the Convocation-men would long since have begun (according to their skill and power) with themselves, their Chaplains, the Benefices in their gifts, &c. They would also have hearkened unto Parliament-remedies of wise and careful Physicians, which have been often prescribed, prepared, tendered, & almost applied, but by the Convocation-men, refused, and opposed, as the world knoweth, and the Rej. is not ignorant of it. In the clouse of this question, the Rej. insinuateth, and (as half ashamed) only insinuateth a secret distinction, betwixt careless-Non residents, and another kind, of them that are careful: the former of which he affirmeth to have been often condemned, though never removed. Of which distinction, as being left obscure, I cannot speak so much as I muze. Only this: Carefull Non-residents seem to be such as have great care to get some pretense in Court, University, or some great man's house, for absenting themselves from their charges (which God hath laid upon them, if they be lawfully called) and some care to provide a tolerable

Curate, for supplying their places. Now these the Rej. seemeth to excuse, for which they are more beholding to him, then the Churches are, upon whose spoils they live, and aspiring by them unto higher places. And as for the careless Non-residents, how cometh it to pass, that non conformity can as easily be removed, as condemned; and such condemned fellows as these, be so long reprived, after their condemnation? Certainly, if they were as great enemies to the Bishops kingdom, as they are to Christ's, a quicker dispatch would have been made of them.

Simony.

8. Of this, it was asked, if it were so ordinary either in the Primitive Church, or (almost) in the Popish, as it is in England? Here the Rejoined. venteth a proverb, that almost saveth many a lie; adding, that the Papists faces are washed with fair water, and foul water cast upon us: and then telleth of a Canon imposing an oath for prevention of Simony: and not only the guilty man looseth his place, but the Patron his title, for that time. Now though all this be nothing to the Primitive Churches face, yet it is not so to be passed over. For (to begin with the last) 1. The course taken against Simony, which he speaketh of, is no Canon of the Convocation house, but a Parliament-law. Canons (I hope) do not deprive Patrones of their title, which they have by civil inheritance, as the Rejoinder told us even now. 2. This oath imposed (if it be generally urged) doeth make our English Simony worse then that which is found among Papists, as adding perjury unto it. 3. Because the Rej. will not take the considerate limitation of almost, in other sense, then as if it were the cover of a lie, I am content it be left out, and then desire him to prove the assertion a lie. If he cannot, it had been sufficient for him (who so familiarly accuseth others of scurrility) to have denied that which was said, putting us to prove it. And prove it we can (so far as vices of that nature use to be proved) by the general voice, even of conformable men. Doctor Andrew's (long since) in a latin Sermon before the Convocation, told them enough, after his playing fashion: They give out, that not only we Minorites do with money, or more basely purchase our Parsonages, but also you Majorities do either with great sums of money, or with the spoils of the Churches, unworthily hukster your Cathedral places, of which disease our Church hath long been sick, and for which it hath long been ill spoken of: Did his fere, or almost all save a lie? Ifit did then, now it hath not so much to save. For many conformable men, will almost (if I may use that word with good leave) swear, that nothing hath hindered them all their days, from Benefices, and kept them in Curateships, but only the general abuse of Simony. Every Page, and Lackie, at the Court, and many Scriviners, can tell, how much this and that Bishop, or Dean, gave to such or such a Buckingham; and how much the said Bishop received from his under Officers, and other, by him promoted. Neither is all Symony in buying of Benefices, and Bishoprics. Selling of Visitations (which is an usual practice of our Prelates) and such like tricks are in the same nature in the fourth degree. 4. As for washing the Papists faces with fair water, the Rejoinder may as well say, that he washed Sodom's face with fair water, who said, that Israel, and Judah, had justified Sodom in her abominations.

Profane contemners of Religion, members of the Church.

9. The question was, if so many such, were members of any Primitive Church? This the Rejoinder doeth not affirm: but denieth any members of our Church to contemn professedly our Religion. Which I leave to the judgment of every Reader; if he doeth not know some in England, who contemn Religion? I would to God, the Rejoinder were (in this point) on the true part, and the Replier on the false. But when the practice of Religion is derided on stages, and that derision applauded by so many spectators, when those that make conscience of sin, be they never so conformable, are scorned by so many, as Puritans; when in all Pulpits that are possessed of good Preachers, warning is ordinarily given, of scoffers and scorners at Religion: I think the Rej. will not find so many assenting to this negation, as he shall to the point of Conformitie. His meaning is such, that by the same reason, it may be said, there is no professed contemner of all Christian Religion, among the Papists, nor of all Religion, among the Turks.

Carnal proceedings in Spiritual Courts.

10. The question was, if such courses were in the Primitive Church? The Rejoinder confesseth no. But (saith he for excuse) they are not instituted, nor allowed by our Church. The confession I accept: the excuse cannot be excused. Are not those courses instituted, or allowed, which are every day practiced, in the Bishops, Chancelours, Commissaries, and Officials Courts? Is it not the Church that practizeth these things? Doeth the Church neither institute, nor allow that which it continually practizeth? The Rejoinder in his Definition of a Ceremony, confoundeth Institution and Observation: now, constant observation is without any institution. Is our Church a Medea, in professing, she alloweth better things, and professedly practiseth worse; meliora video, pro•oque; deteriora sequor? If this be true, what need any man make any conscience of those Excommunications, which sent from our Spiritual Courts, fly about the whole land, to fetch in money? the Church doeth not allow them. It is no scurrilitie (I hope) to repeat that which D. Andrues preached to the Convocation-house: The Church-Censures now a-days do only touch the purse. Evil doers when they have paid their fee return scot-free. If no money then have at the offenders with the Episcopal word; presently one blow they are cut off from the Church delivered over unto Satan, proclaimed Publicans, Heathens, Anathema. For the most ridiculous things, and against every good man, these brutish thunderbolts do fly up and down, and only to be feared of the purse.

Taking of money, for Ordination, Citations, Absolutions, Change of Paenance, &c.

11. Concerning any show of these abuses, in the Primitive Church, our Rejoinder hath nothing to say▪ He turneth himself therefore to deny, or defend them, 〈◇〉 our Church, so well as he can. 1. No man with •• (saith he) may take money for Ordination. To which I answer, if may be understood of a lawful may, I think it is true, not only of our Church, but also of Rome, as may be gathered out of the fifth Session at Trent. But such mays are kept in the pocket, both there, and here, whe• the contrary may, de facto, appeareth publicly in the face and forehead. If any one Minister be ordained, o• instituted, without giving of money, a hundred other may wonder at him, and the Star or Planet, that was then over the place. 2. As for Citations, and Absolution•• they (saith the Rejoinder) are things of industry, necessarily to be recorded, and therefore money may be taken for them. As if there were more industry in Absolution, then in Ordination, in Baptism, or any other Ecclesiastical Act! o•there were more necessity of recording Absolution, then Ordination, or Baptism! And if there were such a difference, or if all these required industry in recording of them, I hope the revenues, and in-comings of our Bishops may suffice for that industry, without new exactions of money. 3. He affirmeth Commutation, or Panance to be grounded on Exod. 21.29.30. where it is written, that the price of an Ox, or Bull, may be taken for he head: and it is allowed (addeth the Rejoinder) by •. Ames, Cas. Consc. lib. 5. cap. 54. num. 48. where he •yeth, that the party condemned to pay twenty pound fine, may •wfully pay it, before it be required, to escape the extorting •f forty pound, or a greater mischief. But if either this, or •hat, make anything for changing the public confession of a scandalous sin, into paying of money; I leave (with this whole comparison o•faces) as the Rejoyn•er doeth, to the Jury of discreet, impartial, and honest •en.

SECT. 7.8.9.10.11.12.13.14.15.16.17.18.19.20. Councils, and Ancient Writers.

These testimonies were as illustrations briefly brought in of the Abridgers: but largely ranked by the Defender into so many sections, as ⟨◇⟩ the main burden did lie upon them. The Replier •erfore conjoined them in brief: and so will I not pas•ng upon the Rejoinder his many words; who saith ⟨◇⟩ . That in the Abridgement, they fill seven whole pages:•hen as these answered by the Defend. in 14. Sections, make in the Abridgement, little more than one page. ⟨◇⟩ . He desireth us also to help their dullness, who cannot •istinguish, betwixt testimonies, and proofs. To which, •hough it be but skornfully propounded of them that accuse us of dull Sophistry, cap. 2. sect. 11. I answer, that common use of speech doth show a difference, betwixt some testimonies or witnesses, and proofs. For all good Christians are said to give witness unto God and his truth, but not properly to prove either God, or his Word.

2. Out of a Carthaginian Synod, two things were alleged: 1. that certain Altars in high ways, erecte• in memory of Martyrs, should be abolished. 2. Tha• all relics, and monuments of Idolatry should be utterly destroyed. In the first, the Replier confessed, that there is nothing express to our purpose: because those Altar are noted which are destitute of Martyrs relics. Ye• (saith he) there was as good reason, for abolishing other as them. No (answereth the Rejoinder) because by th•s Altars destitute of relics, the Church was mocked. And s• was the Church mocked (say I) by those which had relics in them: not only because they had no certain rule of discerning true relics from false; but also, because they were by such means induced, to place a special holiness in those places, and led-on to the invocation of Saints departed.

The second place is expounded by the Defend. an• Rejoined. only of Idols and immediate instruments of Idolatry: which cannot be true, except all places groves an• green trees (there mentioned) which had served to the use of notorious Idolatry, were immediate instruments. And if that were so, why not, or were not once ou• Ceremonies as immediate? Because (saith the Rejoined, they were rather subjects of superstition. Which is a new nothing. For subjects often are all one with objects, and ma•y objects of superstition are Idols. Places were rather •subjects (distinct from objects) then Images, such as our Cross is. The sum is (•ayth the Rejoinder) that •ynode in the former Canon, reformed and continued a hu•an Ceremony notoriously abused to superstition: and in the •ater, were zealous against all monuments of idolatry. Zea•ous indeed they were against known Idolatry: but •hey did not discern all the superstitious and idolatrous •eedes, which at that time were springing up among •hem, in immoderate and unwarrantable honoring of •aints. As for their reformation of Altars with relics, ⟨◇⟩ was no more, then divers Popish Synods have profess•ed to do. But this I would have marked, that Altars •ith Relics honored as they were in those days, are now with the Rejoinder accounted good religious Ce•emonies.

3. A council of Braca, or some other (it is all one) •orbad Christians to decke their houses, &c. in such •aner, and at such time as Idolaters did, that is saith the •ef. and Rej. at the same time, in the same place, and man•er. This the Replier accepted: and assumeth, that ours •iffer not in these circumstances, but in opinion only.

The Rejoinder here first rejoyneth, that this Canon •s to be understood so, as if it had said, we must not keep the festival-days of Pagans, with them, as they do: but may •eepe in a Christian manner unto God, the same days, which •hey observed impiously to the service of the Devil. Now let this be understood, for me (though his marginal quo•ations prove it not) in his sense, Chrysost. hom. 1. de Laz. speaking of no more Christian observing that day, then the day following. Hesternum diem, &c. A•e it•que & hodie, &c. And more ancient testimonies may be brought even against sending of Newyeares gifts, at tha• time (Tert•ll. de Idol. cap. 14.) Let this (I say) be granted: yet the allegation is strong to our purpose, except it can be shown, that our Ceremonies have no mo•• agreement with the Papists, then preaching and praying upon New-years day, hath with the Pagans idolatrou• luxury, upon the same day; or that they have not th•• proportion unto Popish Ceremonies, which bay leave• and green bows used of Christians would then have ha• to Pagans bay-leaves, and green bows.

After this, the Rej. taketh great pains in a large digression, that our Ceremonies differ from the Papists Cere••nies in time, place, person, and not in opinion only. Whic• is very little to the purpose except lawfulness and unla•fullness do depend on that difference of time, place, an• person. For the Replier did here respect those passages, wherein the Defendant flieth only to opinion fo• succor, in differencing our Ceremonies from Popis•• that ours may be lawful, though the Papists be unlawful: as cap. 2. sect. 6. Yet •ee in short what the Rej. ha•• found out.

Surplice.

1. It must (saith the Rej.) among Papists be hallowed or consecrated. But this is nothing to time, place, and person: neither is consecration of Surplices more unlaw•ull, then of Altars, Churches, and Church-yards.

2. Among Papists, no act of ministerial service may be •awfully performed without it, except the mass. This is not •rue in either part. For they preach without Surplices though divers in England hold them on in the Pulpit) •nd the Mass-garment of linen, Pontifical surplice; •nd many times put over the Surplice. So the Rejoined. •imselfe testifieth in his third difference: which there•ore answereth it self, and their practice of putting on more magnificall vestures, at high Masses, or high places, either upon that, or without that, is sufficiently practiced, according to our Canons, in Cathedral Churches, Coopes.

4. They in Popery pin a number of mystical significations upon the parts of it. But this pertaineth to opinion, not to time, place or person: and containeth no difference, save only in number.

Crossing.

1. The Minister (saith the Rejoinder) with us, may not cross himself, the people, or other things.

Now though this be nothing to the purpose, yet I would fain know, out of what Canon, he fetcheth this may not with us? And if there were any such, upon what reason it is grounded, that will not take our crossing of the baptized person, by the nose?

2. With us, the child may not be crossed before Baptism, nor after, with Chrism-oil. But of that same may not before, I ask as before. And as for crossing with oil, I would be informed, what religious difference there is, betwixt dry Crosses, and oil, as G. Parisiensis distinguisheth them?

3. The Cross is so used with us, that it neither addeth virtue to the Sacrament, nor capacity of grace to the child. No more it is among the Papists, by the judgment of many learned, as hath been shown in the first part of this writing (though this be but matter of opinion, which concerneth not the present question) See Thomas Aquinas, 3. q. 66. a. 10. But why is it used? To intimate what Baptism bindeth unto. That is, to do that by man's institution, which Baptism had done by God's appointment. Whether this be a good reason or no, I here inquire not: this I affirm; The Papists profess the same.

Kneeling.

1. This gesture (saith the Rejoinder) may before, $\langle \phi \rangle$ by occasion of any of God's ordinances, be performed lawfully to God. By occasion, I grant: but before importeth more, Might the Jews kneel before the Cherubims of the Vail, as they might before the Ark? Might they kneel before the Brazen-Serpent? Might they before every Ephod? May we before every Pastor? When the Rej. hath resolved these questions, we shall further consider.

2. The gesture of kneeling, in the act of receiving, was never any instituted Ceremony of the Church of Rome. Then the Rejoinder deceived us, when in his Manuduction, pag. 30. he told us, that institution, and intended observation, are all one. For he himself confesseth, in the next page, 479. that among the Papists, the receivers of the Hoste, do kneel, of an ancient custom. Custom surely, ancient, and constant, hath (by all law) more in it, then every intended observation.

3. Bellarmino and the Mass-book, mention not kneeling in the act of receiving. They mention not indeed the people's kneeling; because they make small account of their receiving, the mass being complete without it, and that being (with them) an accidental complement of it. But they mention the Priests bowing to the Hoste many times, in his receiving.

4. The Pope himself receiveth the Hoste standing. The Pope is a lawless man, and may do what he please, as also impose what he please upon others. But yet, in the place quoted (Sacrae Ceremoniae, lib. 2. pag. 181. Colon. 1558.) no such thing appeareth. In the page next before, I find this: The Pope boweth low, at the •omming of the Sacrament, and reverently adoreth it. And one thing (worthy of observation) concerning the Popes receiving, I find in Alexander Hales, (in the last words of the second part of his Tractate concerning the Mass, which is the tenth question of his fourth part) that the Pope was wont to receive sitting, in imitation of Peter and the other Apostles, Confirming that which our Defend. and Rejoinder doubt of. If it be asked wherefore S^r. Pope receives sitting, it may be answered, in memory of B. Peter, and other Apostles, who ate the last Supper sitting. This may by some be imputed to the Popes great pride, for that as it is in that book of Ceremonies which the Rejoinder quoteth, pag. 160. The Romish Bishop doeth reverence to no man under heaven, by rising up to him, or by inclining, or uncovering his head. So it may be thought from the same principle, he doeth not reverence to the Hoste. But I the rather assent to Alexander Hales, because I have read some where, I think it is in Hospinian de Templis, that the Pope hath no Organ-piping-music in his Church or Chapel. And these I account the relics of ancient simplicity, in worship, which the Pope received from the first Bishops of Rome, and regarded not to make alterations of, without advantage.

5. The People which receive not, do reverently bow themselves. Much more therefore they that receive.

6. True it is, the receivers do kneel, of an ancient c•stome; but only for conveniency of putting the Hoste into their mouths, by the Priest. The former part indeed is true. But the latter is so false, that the Lutherans themselves, who as Apes of the Papists in this part, put the Hoste into the receivers mouth, in like manner as they have received the custom from the Papists, profess, and mainetayne, that they do it for adoration. By omitting this outward veneration of Christ (viz. kneeling) the people seem to deny Christ's bodily presence with the Calvinists. All these things being well considered, it will be found, that (opinion of some set aside) our Ceremonies differ not so much from Papists, as the Popish shaving of Crounes do differ from that which was in use among Jews, and Gentiles, of shaving whole heads, according to Baronius his distinction, and an. 58. or then the Britons square shaving of crowns did differ from that round shaving, which Augustine the Monk, sent by Gregory, enforced upon them: wherein Pitsens a Papist, in his historical relations of England, pag. 19. doeth note one part of that Controversy to have consisted: or rather (to return unto the argument of this section) the difference is (by the Rej. his plea) as if Christians should have in old time, hung out bay-bows, unconsecrated, out of an upper-chamber, in the afternoon; when the Heathen hung them out consecrated, before noon, in their lower chamber; and that upon institution, when the Heathen did it only upon an ancient received custom. Are not these fine distances from idolatrous, and superstitious abuses?

4. An African Council condemned certain Feasts used in memory of Martyrs, because they were drawn from the errors of the Gentiles. This the Replier affirmed to make against our Ceremonies. The Rejoinder answereth 1. That this is not enough to defend the Abridgement, nor to oppose the Defendants answer. But if the Ceremonies be hereby condemned, it is all that the Abridgement sought for; and as much opposition to the Defend. as the Replier cared for. He answereth 2. That the Council doeth not condemn any Feasts used by Christians, but only the very Feasts of the Heathens. But it seemeth otherwise, so far as I can conster these words of the Council: And this we are to seek of the Emperors, that such Feasts as are in many places contrary to God's Word, and from the errors of the Gentiles, be forbidden. I remember not any such phrase of those times, wherein Gentiles are said to draw from the errors of Gentiles. They did certainly traduce Feasts unto Christians, findeing them too ready for to draw such things from them. They were not Heathens, that are spoken of, in the third Council of Toledo, cap. 22. The people that should attend divine Service, give themselves to unseemly dancings. Hospinian (de Orig. Fest.) after Beat. Rhenanus, in Terul. de Coron mil. speaking of these, and such other Feasts, declareth the truth in these words: The old Bish•ps were wont when they could not call men from the superstitions of the Heathens by the preaching of the Word, to seek at least to do it by observing their holy days, with their own worship. But this was to drive out one nail with another, no way to take off the Superstition. Albeit then the beginning of these Solemnities were tolerable at first, yet at last they grew to such a heap of superstitions, that they became the fountain and beginning of most horrible things. Yet suppose the meaning to be of Heathen Feasts, the reason notwithstanding (drawn from the errors of the Gentiles) pertaineth to Christians, except Christians may draw frō the error of Gentiles, though Gentiles may not. In the 3. place the Rej. undertaketh to prove, that the Council did establish those Feasts of Mar•yrs: because the petition made for abolishing Heathen Feasts, was to provide for the due and free observation of the Martyrs Feasts. Whereupon he concludeth, that the Church may lawfully make use of an human Ceremony, for her good; though the same kind of Ceremony, have been notoriously abused, by, and to Idolatry. And in the parting, he giveth us gentle thanks for these Witnesses. Now 1. for his thanks, the matter is not so much worth. We can afford him (without any damage to our cause) ten times as many witnesses, who in their practice have confuted that, which sometime in their doctrine they have taught concerning Ceremonies. 2. I will grant him also, that it was not the in•ention of that Council, wholly to abolish the Celebra•ion of Martyrs birth or death-days. Yet those Feastings (Convivia) which were used at them, in imitation of the Heathen, they did (in all probability) labor to abolish. For Augustine, who was then alive, and is likely to have had a hand in the Decree, did wish them abolished. This •ppareth everywhere in his writings: As Epist. 64. and •19. And great reason there was for that, and more also. For the superstition, and luxury of them was intolerable. Those luxurious banquets (saith he• Epist. 64.) are supposed of the sory people to be as well the solace of the dead as •he honor of Martyrs, whosoever carry their meats thither which the better sort of Christians do not and almost all the World over is neglected) yet whosoever doth that will have •hen sanctified by the merits of the Martyrs. And as for •he Celebrations themselves, they were partly used by Christians, as the same Augustine saith (cont. Faustum.) For the Prayers and merits-sake of the Martyrs. If the Re•oynder holdeth this a due observation of a human Ceremony, and so teacheth, we have no cause to thank him for it.

The Papists confess in deed, that there is no example of such Feasts in Scripture, much less precept: but yet they will hardly grant them to be human. Baron. ad •n. 58. We grant them to be human: but the common doctrine of Protestants deny them to have been duly observed at the least in that time, & in that manner which Augustine declareth, it being not only without example or precept of Scripture, but also directly against the rules of it.

D. Abbot (Def. of Perk. pag. 886.) saith more, namely, that Offerings yearly made for the dead, and for birthdays, were first brought in by the Haeretick Montanus, who made gain of them.

5. Tertullian (out of Coron. milit.) was cited in the Abr. thus: We may give nothing to the service of an Idol; nor borrow anything from it. If it be against religion, to sit at table in an Idols temple; what is it, to be seen in the habit of an Idol. The Defender answered, he spake of habits then dedicated and appointed unto the service of Idols: but our Ministers are not urged, to reverence the Mass-Priests brazen Idol, or to put on the very same Romish Surplice, now used at their Mass, even therefore, because it is Popish. Of this the Replier proveth, that this sameness is vainly alleged, and less then nothing. The Rejoinder for succor, saith that this individual sameness was a straggling soldier, and confesseth it to be taken prisoner. But in an answer grounded on dissimilitude, where the same quality is affirmed of one thing, and denied of another, if that quality be straggling, in either part, and so taken prisoner, the whole answer must needs be held captive. And this captive soldier may easily be taught to fight against him from whom he was taken; as once (by report) it was in this manner: A Minister in Queen. El. her days, was urged by his Ordinary to wear the Surplice, who after other delays, alleged, that the Surplice proffered him to put on, was the very same that the Mass-Priest was wont to sacrifice in: the Ordinary admitting that excuse, commanded another to be made: which being done, when it was brought him in the Church, he took it up, and spake thus to those present: Good people, the Bishop himself confessed, that the former massing Surplice, was not to be worn by a Minister of the Gospel; and judge you if this be not as like that, as one egg to another? let this therefore go after the other: and so he justly cast it away.

Yet let us see what other soldiers the Rejoinder can find in this squadron, not straggling and taken? There are words set down (saith he) in a different letter: dedicated and appointed. As if a different cassock did save a soldier from straggling! The business dependeth on him that weareth the cassock: and who was that soldier in the Defender his answer? or what was the thing dedicated and appointed, but the same individual habit? if other, then first show the congruity of the Defender his dissimilitude; and then show also, that other Crosses, and Surplices are not dedicated and appointed unto the service of Idols, by Papists. The Defender also (addeth the Rej.) adds, that the comparison betwixt Papists, and Pagans is not altogether so aequal. He said in deed, that he would heerafter show such a thing: but with soldiers promised, or threatened only, I never knew any serious combat fought.

After this, the Rejoinder allegeth, that it cannot be said of these our Ceremonies, (as Tertullian said of the habits he opposed) that they were dedicated and appointed to the service of an Idol, from the first, and never used by any godly men. But first, this can be no good explication of those words: we may borrow nothing from an Idol: i. e. nothing which hath not been used by some godlyman. Secondly, he saith not, that no godly man had ever used Crounes. Thirdly, Every old usage of godly men, doeth not lessen the Idolatry of it. For then sacrificing of Oxen, should now be less Idolatry, then of unclean Beasts. After these skirmishes, the Rejoinder finding that there was no houlding of ground with such soldiers as the Defender had mustered, presseth new▪ at his own charges. And first he bringeth in one persuasion, that Tertullian's clear and professed judgment, was directly against our assertion, and for conformity: because he saith▪ Finally those things agree to our, and the use of others above us, and to the things of God, and to Christ himself, which indeed are proffitable to the life of man. Meaning the Sun, the Moon, the Starrs, Fire, Earth, and such like good creatures of God. If this be against us, then we are also against ourselves. For never any Non-Conformist, in England, or (as I think) in the World, dreamed (no not in an ague) anything to the contrary. And that this may directly make for Conformitie, the Rejoinder must show, how our Ceremonies are mere profitable helps unto the necessity of man's life? In the next place he maketh use of Diversion, alleging that Tertullian brought other arguments withal, against the Garland. But we keep our standing upon the argument of borrowing from the service of Idols: let others shift for themselves.

Thirdly, he adjoyneth Accusation, that Tertulian di•emper•d; in bitter contention, and factious opposition, wrote •hat booke against the Church: quoting for it, Renatus, or •as I understand him) Rhenanus, and Doctor Abbot. But •either of these can help. For Rhenanus in the Argu•ent of that book (de Coron. mil.) defendeth Tertul•an, about the Garland; and showeth him to have main•ed the same sentence in his Apollogie, which was his Master piece, written without distemper, and not equal•ed by the best tempered writing extant, of the same kind. •octor Abbot. speaketh sharply of Tertullian, for his •aintaining of ceremonial traditions; wherein he was to •e blamed: but not for his general rule of not borrowing (ϕ) the service of Idols: whereas the Defendant and Re•oynder allow those traditions, as appeareth in this Re•oynder, pag, 493. and oppose this rule. And it is most •rtaine, that Tertullian did not receive any distemper, or •ctious disposition from Montanus, against Ceremonies •used to Idolatry. For Montanus brought in the blood (ϕ) Children into the Supper, but about the Cross he did •n the judgment of Doctor Abbot, and all our best divines.

I have somewhat merrily answered, in this passage, •y occasion of the Rej. his mentioning of a stragglng •ouldier: if any man will accuse me therefore, of this or •at fault, as the Rejoinder doeth the Replier, upon like •ccasion, Tertullian, whose cause I plead, shall make •y Apology: It will agree to truth to laugh, because it is •f a pleasant disposition; and to sport with her competitors, •cause it is secure, and fears not the walls of her Bulwark. •nely this would be regarded, that our laughter be not unworthy lest it be laughed at, but if it be worthy, it may be a duty.

6. Another place Tertullian (de oratione, cap. 11. & 12.) was objected, where he saith, that Christians might not wash their hands (for a Ceremony) or lay aside their cloaks, before prayer; nor sit upon their beds, after prayer; because the Heathen used to do so. The Def. his first answer being that these Ceremonies were not condemned merely for resemblance with Idolatry, but for opinion of necessity; it was replied, that Tertullian speaketh plainly: therefore it d•serveth to be proved in us, because it is observed in the service of an Idol. To which the Rej. opposeth nothing, but that the Heathens might use their Idolatrous Ceremonies with opinion of necessity. Let it be so: yet Christians may be reprov'd for mere likeness unto them, though either they have not the same opinion, or the consideration of that opinion set apart. Meerely doeth not always signify only; nor can it so stand in the Def. his answer. For then thus he should speak: not only for resemblance, but (without any also) for opinion. If he did mean so, we say on the contrary, not only for opinion, but also for resemblance. So far as I can understand the word merely for, it noteth not more, then is implied in Tertullian's therefore it deserveth. A deserving cause is merely a cause, or else malefactors are not punished merely for their evil deserts. In the former testimony, out of Tertullian, pag. 484. the Rej. translated meras utilitates, any commodious use. If mere commodities, be all one with any commodities, then merely for resemblance is anything at all for resemblance: and so the Def. denieth Tertullian to have condemned those Ceremonies he speaketh against, anything at all for resemblance with Idolatry; which yet Tertullian doeth as plainly speak, as ever he spake anything at all.

B. Jewel (said the Replier) doeth urge these Testimonies of Tertullian, merely in regard of resemblance: of others it is not needful to speak. The Rej. answereth 1. that Jewel doeth not urge these Testimonies of Tertullian. But it is to be seen in his Def. Apol. par. 3. cap. 5. div. 1. how he citeth Tertullian de Coron. mil. and de Idol. with which the Rejoinder will not deny, this (de Orat) to consent. 2. He citeth them (addeth the Rej.) not for unlawfulness, but for inconveniency of resembling Idolaters. Concerning this distinction, enough hath been said in the first part. Yet this here is worthy of observation; that both the Def. and Rej. in the first section of this fourth chapter, confessed, that human Ceremonies abused to Idolatry, are therefore unlawful, except they be of convenient necessity, as the Rejoinder speaketh, pag. 406. What reason then had Jewel, or hath the Rejoinder in his name, to confess such Ceremonies inconvenient, and yet make them lawful? But that Jewel understood Tertullian, to speak against such Ceremonies, as unlawful, it appeareth out of these his words: Tertullian disputes sharply therein, that a Christian may not wear a lawrell-crown, and that for no other cause, but because the Gentiles did so. I have only the latin edition at hand; and therefore quote it. But either the interpreter failed much, or else Jewel expressly spake there of unlawfulness (non licere) and not of other inconveniency. The Rejoinder his next answer dependeth only on that which was formerly confuted, namely, that merely is only.

The Replier added, that it doeth not appear out of Tertullian, that he respected opinion of necessity and efficacy, in these Ceremonies. For which, he is charged by the Rejoinder, with offense, against men, simple, and learned, as also against God himself. And why all this? Because (forsooth) Tertullian saith, that such washings and cleansings, as many superstitiously affect, against every prayer, are not true; but those which we have in Christ, and in purification of the heart. But this is no sufficient ground for so deep an accusation. For if now one should admonish a Non-resident, who sendeth a reading Curate, to supply his place, in these words: This is not true fulfilling of your Ministry; but those personal offices, which are in Scripture enjoined; and the meaning of these words being questioned, one should deny, that by them it was implied, that the said Non-resident held it necessary for him, in conscience, to be absent, and send such a Curate for supply; would any man accuse the denier of offending against God and man? It was further observed by the Replier, that the washing condemned by Tertullian, had relation to Christ's delivering by Pilate, after washing of his hands, and so like unto our sign of the Cross, in regard of the original signification and use of it. The Rejoinder answereth many words: but to the purpose (beside repetitions) he saith, that those washers did believe Pilate to have been cleansed by his washing, and so themselves by theirs, from guilt of sin. And this he gathereth from Tertullian's confutation: We adore Christ, and not deliver him: we should abhor the example of him that did deliver him. But out of these words no such collection can be made; anymore then some like invention out of these: we adore Christ, and not crucify him: we should abhor the example of them that did crucify him, and left a Cross in the place, for a sign and memorial that he was crucified. That washing was a sign immediately of Pilats washing, and so of Christ's delivering: our Cross is immediately a sign of Pilats Cross, and so of our Savior's crucifying. This is the likeness which the Replier truly noted.

Concerning the Ceremony of Dossing cloaks, before prayer, the Defender put it off to opinion of necessity; because Tertullian in condemning it, hath these words: si sic oporteret, i. e. if it must be. It was replied, that our Prelates say also of our Ceremonies, sic oportet. i.e. It must be so, and yet disclaim absolute necessity. But (answereth the Rejoined.) they held an internal simple necessity of conscience; not external only for order sake, as our Prelates do. Of this distinction, see the first part of this Suite. The collection of this opinion, from Tertullian's scoff; nisi si qui putant, except there be any so foolish as to have such an opinion is so palpably vain, that any man may see, he durst not impute that opinion unto those washers he spake against; but only showeth, that from their practice, such a fond and absurd opinion, which themselves would condemn, might perhaps by some be collected, Tertullian spake, as we now speak. If Crossing ought to be used in Baptism, the Apostles in their doctrine concerning baptizing would have made some mention of it: except perhaps some think, that they did not then know, or cared not to use, the right or best way of signifying Christian valor, and constancy, in fighting under Christ's banner.

In opposition to that which was alleged for Tertullian's respect unto opinion of necessity, and efficacy, in condemning those Ceremonies, it was replied, that he condemneth them only (that is, if they had but this fault alone) that they were empty observations, and to be worthily upbraided with vanity, as being done without any warrant from Christ or his Apostles. For such things serve not to religion, but to superstition, and are affected, and forced, and rather over-curious, than anything rational at all, and even therefore to be restrained, they do so suit the Gentiles. Here the Rejoinder after a little touch upon the particle only, now expounded, answereth, that this was because of a^a opinion of necessity, which is properly superstition: because the same Tertullian (de Coron. mil.) alloweth sundry huma^a signi[•]cant Ceremonies, held as free, and used for instruction. In which answer, the first part is manifestly false; if Tertullian's own words may be heard: those Ceremonies are supervacuous and vain, which are us^d without any authority of Divine or Apostolical command, and are to be accounted superstitious: and even therefore to be repressed, because they make us (in some sort) like the Gentiles. The second part, which containeth a reason, is void of all truth. For 1. Tertullian did not account those Ceremonies human, but of Apostolical though unwritten tradition: Traditio auctrix, consuetudo confirmatrix, & fides observatrix. 2. For freedom, to allege this, is clean contrary to Tertullian's intention: because he went about to prove the necessity of abstaining from the Lawral-Croune, by the necessity of observing these unwritten traditions. 3. For instruction, I would be informed, what instruction there was, in Crossing, at every step, and going forward and at every turn, at clothing ones self, at washing, at bed, at board &c. 4. D. Abbot (whose judgment of Tertullian, the Rejoinder commendeth, pag. 485.) in that very place which he commendeth (Def. Perk. pag. 883.884. &c.) saith plainly, that Tertullian defended those traditions against the Church; that therein he contradicted himself; and that those traditions were partly heathenish and haeretical devises. About Tertullian, nothing material followeth.

7. Melchiades decreed, that no Christian should fast on the Lord's day, or friday, because it was a known custom of Pagans, to fast on those days.

The Rejoinder 1. saith one answer was, the incongruitie of fasting unto the Lord's day. But this not being fetched out of Melchiades, the Replier justly passed by, and so will I, though enough may be said against it, as the Reader may see in the Altar of Damascus, pag. 669. &c. 2. He telleth us also of another answer, by a distinction, betwixt a light Ceremony, and a sacred solemnity. But this neither is in Melchiades, nor holdeth congruity either with Scripture, forbidding symbolizing with Idolaters in light Ceremonies; nor with itself, the light Ceremony being sacred, and also a solemnity. 3. The Rejoinder addeth out of his own store, that the prohibition was only of open and solemn fasting, not appointed by the Church. Which is as wreched an evasion, as the former: because the question is of open and solemn Ceremonies; and Melchiades disallowed that any Church should appoint it, in condemning the thing without any distinction, or limitation, for a reason, that layeth more fault upon the Churches, if they should appoint it, then upon private persons, if they should observe it without appointment. For he groundeth his condemnation upon 2. Cor. 6. What concord hath Christ with Belial? What agreement hath the Temple of God with Idols? May the Temple of God have agreement with Idols, in Ceremonies, if the Church appoint so? 4. The Rejoinder addeth a note out of a later Council, being a Jury of twelve Bishops, wherein other phrases are used. Much good might it do them that can make anything of it.

The passage being thus cleared, let us now come to that which the Replier took for the Def. his only answer: Melchiades for bad fasting at the same time with Pagans, because they lived in the same Countrie, at the same time, and place. This (said the Replier) could not make the difference because so little a distance may be betwixt one Countrie, and another, that it can bring up no difference of moment. The Rejoinder answereth 1. that it was a reason of inconvenience only. But Melchiades said out of 2. Cor. 6. that it was to make the Temple of God agree with Idols. Is that only inconvenient, and not unlawful? And if it were nothing but inconveniency, was it not confessed, in the beginning of this Chapter, that Ceremonies Idolatrously abused, if they be not of convenient necessity, are unlawful? If this be so, then much more unlawful are they, if they be inconvenient. He addeth 2. that some place & time may make a difference: which the Replier denied not; but only said, that every distance of Countrie (such as is betwixt Dover and Calise, is not sufficient.

8. Ambrose taught Monica, Augustine's mother, to leave bringing of Wine and Cakes to Church, because it had a show of conformity with the Gentiles funeral-feasts. The Defender answered, that it was an act of sacrificing, &c. as Bellarmino doeth, de Sancto. Beat. lib. 1. cap. 14. Nay saith the Rejoinder Bellarmino neither so answered, nor had occasion so to answer. But if he had considered, that the Defender maketh this fact of Monicas, to be a sacrifice, derived from the Collyridian haereticks; and that Bellarmino there answereth to the argument taken out of Epiphanius, against those Collyridians, as may appear by comparison of cap. 11. in the ende; and that in the objection, there is no mention of sacrificing, but Bellarmino answereth by covert of that term; he would have forborne this censure.

It was also pronounced an incredible thing, that Augustine's religious mother, should then sacrifice to a creature, which the Papists now will nor profess to do. To this the Rejoinder is, that the Defender never said Monica did sacrifice. Consider therefore his words, reprinted by the Rejoinder pag. 501. The act (objected) was sacrificing: You compare our Ceremonies, with Ceremonies of sacrific'ing. Did we object an act as comparative to our Ceremonies, any act, beside that of Monica? Certainly no. If therefore the act objected & compared, were a sacrifice, then Monicas act must needs in the Defender his account, be sacrificing.

The other passages depend upon the difference now touched, until that answer of the Replier cometh in: Neither Ambrose, nor Augustine, nor Monica, his mother, regarded anything in condemning that act, but only, lest any occasion should be given to intemperate ones of filling themselves beyond measure; and because these funeral rites as it were resembled the Superstition of the Gentiles. The Rejoinder here 1. denieth that Ambrose, Augustine, or Monica did condemn this act. Which is very strange; seeing Ambrose did publicly forbid it, by the Rejoinder his confession; Monica hearing the reasons, was affected with them in her conscience, to forbear it; and Augustine applandeth them both. Yet the Rejoinder hath reasons for his denial, such as they be: 1. Augustine saith his Mothers intention was good. 2. It was usual in Africa. 3. He thought that his Mother would not have been so taken-off from that custom by any beside Ambrose. 4. Ambrose did only restrain Monicas private devotion, as having publicly forbidden that manner, for a double inconveniency, not for unlawfulness.

Now the first of these reasons import, that Augustine condemned nothing that was done of a good intention. The second implieth, that he condemned nothing that was usual in Africa. The third supposeth, that Christians are not more easily drawn from unlawful customs, by one man, then by another. The fourth contradicteth first itself, conjoining the restraining only of private devotion, with public forbidding; and secondly, the Defender and Replier who (in the beginning of this chapter) confess Ceremonies Idolatrously abused, to become unlawful, except they be of convenient necessity; and so much more, if they have a double inconveniency in them. The rest of this section doeth only jarre upon the same strings.

9. To a grave sentence of August. (Hom. 6. de verb. Dom. in Matth.) If you ask how the Pagans may be won, enlightened, called▪ leave all their solemnities, and forsake their toys. The Defendant answered, that those solemnities and toys, are not to be used together with Pagans. The Rejoinder addeth, that Augustine meaneth feasting with Idolaters, in the Temples of Idols, which could not be used apart from Idolaters. Suppose it were so: yet the question remaineth, whether using such toys of theirs apart, as may be used apart, make more for their conversion, or for their hardening, according to Augustine's judgment? But it is not so as the Rejoinder imagineth. For 1. Augustine spake of them, which were present at feasts, made at the solemnity of the Genius or Patron of Carthage, whom those Christians, he reprooveth, denied to be an Idol. 2. All the Citizens of Carthage could not celebrate that feast in one Temple. 3. It doeth not appear, that the Patron had any proper Temple. 4. The Citizens being parted into divers places of feasting, why might not the Christians that would keep that feast, have one place apart? 5. Suppose the Christians had taken some part of the Banket, or made one like it, and carried it into their own Temple, to use it there, with another opinion then the Heathen had;

would Augustine have allowed it; 6. The case was at Carthage, as it was in Popish times, with the Company of Smiths at London, who after some worship done to their Patron, Dunstan, had a Feast in their Hall. Now if some Protestants refusing to be at their worship in Dunstons Church should yet have been at their Feast in the Hall. I would know, whether they had more symbolized with Papists, in the worship of Dunstan, then our Conformists do in the worship of the Cross?

That which is after added by the Rejoinder out of other places of Augustine, concern not our present question: because there Augustine considereth not any relation unto idolatrous abuse. Neither by citing one general rule of Augustine's, did we bind ourselves to follow all his counsels.

10. Concerning the Councils of Nice forbidding Easter to be kept on the same day with the Jews Passover, the Rejoinder maketh long work, to little purpose. 1. He saith (with the Defendant) that it was not for unlawfulness. 2. He confirmeth that answer, by a story of the business, marking, that the Council said about Easter, only, It seemed good to us. 3. He excepteth against the words, as they are cited in the Abridgement. And so spendeth many good words, and phrazes, not requiring any confutation. Now. 1. Concerning the words, as they are found in constantines letters patents, they were cleared before, cap. 3. sect. 6.2. The same, or like form of words, is used in the same Council about things unlawful, though not so desperately evil, as denying the Faith. 3. The succeeding practices, and censures, do show, that unlawfulness was understood. For presently after, those which kept Easter with the Jews, were accounted a sort of Heretics, styled Quartadecimani. And what ruffeling, Augustine sent into England by Gregory, made against the ancient Britons, for dissenting in that observance, after, and out of other stories, Mr. Fox doeth at large relate. But for such matters, I leave them (with the Replier) to those that are skillful in human traditions; not regarding that judgment of the Rejoinders. If you be not skillful in human traditions, you may hazard yourselves and others: because I doubt not, but skill in God's word alone, is sufficient against all such hazard.
