PREFATORY NOTE

In the summer of 1931 I was able to make a fresh study of the Codex Marcianus (A) at Venice, confining myself, in the limited time at my disposal, to Books XI-XV. For the courteous treatment accorded to me by the authorities of the Biblioteca Marciana I offer sincere thanks. The notation "sic" in the critical apparatus indicates where my report of readings differs from that of Kaibel.

I have also studied carefully the readings in the Paris Excerpts (C), with the result that I have gained increased respect for that codex.

As for attempting to identify all the names of pottery catalogued in Book XI. with extant vases, I have been obliged to conclude, with many others who are wiser than I, that the game is not worth the candle.

BOOK XI

"COME now, what shall be the beginning of our recital" as the comic poet Cephisodorus^a puts it, friend Timocrates? For we had gathered early, spurred to eagerness for the cups^b; and while all the guests were still seated,^c and before conversation had begun, Ulpian said: "At the table of Adrastus, my friends, the nobles dine seated^d; but Polyidus, when offering sacrifices on a highway, made Peteôs, who was walking by, stop and recline in the grass; he then broke up some green twigs to serve as a table and placed before Peteôs some of the sacrificial meat. Again, Autolyeus once went 'to the rich land of Ithaea,' and the nurse (served him) while he was seated, of course, for that is the way in which the men of that time dined^e; and, says the poet,^f 'He found his daughter's son Odysseus a child new-born, and when he was making an end of supper, then Eurycleia placed the child on his knees'; she seated him, I say, on his knees and did not stand him beside his knees.^a However that may be, let us not dally, but recline forthwith, for I want Plutarch to render to us the account of cups as he has promised, and drink the health of all in the cups filled to the brim.

"The first mention of the word poteria (cups) that I know of occurs in the poet of Amorgos, Semonides; he says, in his Iambic Verses^b: 'He took away the table, whither the cups . . .' And the author of the Alcmaeonis also says^c: 'He laid out the dead bodies on a broad pallet strewn on the ground, and set before them a bountiful feast and cups as well, and placed crowns on their heads.' These cups (poteria) got their name from the word for drinking (posis), like the word ekpōma (cup) used by Attic writers; for they speak of water-drinking (hydropotein) and wine-drinking (oinopotein). Aristophanes in The Knights^d: 'In its bill the blood-drinking (haimatopōtēn) booby-dragon.' And in the same play he has said^e: 'Bacis certainly used the cup over much.' So Pherecrates in Tyranny^f: 'But this single cup is mightier than a thousand.' And Anacreon has said^g:

^a When an Athenian dined en famille, he reclined on a couch while his children stood beside him.

'I have been made a wine-drinker' (oinopotés). This expression also occurs in the Poet; for he says,^a 'When wine-drinking' (oinopotazón). So Sappho, in the second book, said^b: 'Many cups without number, and ivory too.' And Alcaeus^c: 'Thou drinkest out the cup, seated by Deinomenes' side.' There is also a 'cup-bearing' Demeter, worshipped in Achaea in the neighbourhood of Antheia, as Autocrates records in the second book of his Achaeian History.^d But there is another problem which I think worth your consideration before we have the catalogue of drinking-cups, of which the sideboard here (kylíkeion) is full; for this is the name given to the piece of furniture^e in which cups (kylíkes) are kept, by Aristophanes in The Farmers^f: 'Covered like a sideboard in front of which the linen curtain is drawn.' It occurs also in Anaxandrides' Melilot.^g Eubulus has it in Leda^h: 'Like one who, about to pour a libation, has smashed the cups in the sideboard.' And in The Harp-girl he saidⁱ: 'He has also invented the sideboards for us.' So in Semelé or Dionysus^j: 'Hermes, Maia's son in stone,^k whom (we approach) with offerings as he stands in the sideboard, scoured to brightness.' Cratinus the Younger

"I say then,^d it is worth considering whether the men of old drank from large cups. For Dicaearchus of Messenê, the pupil of Aristotle, says ^e in his book On Alcæus that they used small cups and drank wine mixed with too much water. Chamaelcon of Heraclæia, also, in the work On Drunkenness, says, if I remember his words ^f: 'If those who enjoy power and wealth esteem this devotion to drunkenness above everything else, it is not to be wondered at. For having no other pleasure better than this, or more easily indulged, they naturally find refuge in wine. This is why the larger forms of drinking-cups grew to be the fashion among persons in power. But this is, in fact, not at all an ancient custom among the Greeks, but is a recent invention, imported from the barbarians. For they, being lost to all culture, betake themselves to quantities of wine and procure for themselves superfluous foods of all sorts. But in the regions of Greece we shall not find a cup that has been wrought to very great size either represented in art or . . .^g in earlier times, except those in honour of heroic beings. For they assigned the cup called rhyton^a only to the heroes. This will seem puzzling to some, unless one explained, perhaps, that this custom was introduced because the demigods are so quick to show wrath when they appear. For people regard the heroes as harsh and ready to deal blows, and by night more than by day.^b In order, then, that the heroes may appear to be cruel, not because of their inborn character, but because they are drunk, the artists represent them as drinking from large cups. And for my part I think that they are quite right who say that the large cup is a "silver well."^c In all this it is plain that Chamaeleon ignores the fact that the bowl given to the Cyclops by Odysseus, in Homer,^d cannot be small. Otherwise the Cyclops, who was so huge, would not have been so completely overcome with intoxication after only three drinks. Hence the cups must have been large even in those days, unless one is to put the blame on the potency of the wine, as to which Homer himself was explicit^e; or on the unaccustomed nature of the drink taken by the Cyclops, since in most cases he was a milk-drinker. Or perhaps the cup, if it really was large, was of barbarian origin, taken from the spoil of the Ciconians. What, then, can we say about Nestor's cup, which a young man would scarcely have had the strength to lift, 'but Nestor, that old man, raised it easily'^f? Concerning this also Plutarch will give us some information. It is time, therefore, to take our places on the couches."

When we had lain down, Plutarch said: "Well, as the poet Pratinas of Phlius says,^a 'Not ploughing land already furrowed, but exploring a field undugged,' I am going to give a cup-talk^b although I am not one of the inhabitants of Cup-ville,^c of whom the comic poet Hermippus in his Iambic Verses mockingly says^d: 'Proceeding on my way I came to the spongy soil of Cup-ville. I saw, therefore, Heracleia, and a very fine city it was.' Now the Heracleots here meant are those who live at the foot of Oeta, according to Nicander of Thyateira; he asserts that they got their name from Cylix,^e a native of Lydia, one of those who accompanied Heracles in his expedition. They are mentioned also by Scythinus of Teos in the work entitled History,^f who says: 'Heracles captured and put to death Eurytus and his son when they exacted tribute from the Euboeans. He also pillaged the Cylicranians, who lived by plunder, and built in that place Heracleia, which is called the Trachinian.' Polemon in the first book of his Address to Adaeus and Antigonus says^g: 'As for the Heracleia at the foot of Oeta and Trachis, some of their inhabitants, the Cylicranians, arrived with Heracles from Lydia, while others were Athamanians; the regions continue (to be named ^a) from both; but the Heracleots, regarding them as of alien stock, allowed no share in the citizenship to them, though they dwelt with them. They are called Cylicramians because their shoulders have cups (cylices) tattooed on them.

"I am also aware that Hellanicus, in his Tribal Names, says ^b that some of the Numidians, in Libya, own nothing else but a cup (cylix), a knife, and a water-jar, and that they have houses made of asphodel, quite small, just big enough to afford shade, which they carry about wherever they go. To many persons, also, the place in Illyria is well known which is called Cups, and near which is the tomb of Cadmus and Harmonia, as Phylarchus records in the twenty-second book of his Histories.^c Polemon, too, in his book On Morychus, says ^d that at Syracuse there is an altar ^e at the extreme end of the island near the shrine of Olympian Earth, and outside the wall, from which they take on shipboard the cup when they put out to sea, and carry it until the shield on the temple of Athena becomes invisible; they then drop into the sea an earthenware cup,^f having put into it flowers, honeycomb, frankincense in lumps, and some other spices with them.

floor is swept, and clean are the hands of all the guests, and their cups as well; one slave puts plaited wreaths on their heads, another offers sweet-smelling perfume in a saucer; the mixing-bowl stands full of good cheer; and other wine is ready, which promises never to give out—mellow wine in jars, redolent of its bouquet; and in the midst the frankincense sends forth its sacred fragrance; and there is water, cool and fresh and pure. The yellow loaves lie ready at hand, and a lordly table groans with the weight of cheese and luscious honey; an altar in the middle is banked all round with flowers, and singing and dancing and bounty pervade the house. But men of good cheer should first of all praise the god with pious stories and pure words; they should pour libations and pray for power to do the right (for that is the duty closer to hand); 'tis no sin to drink as much as you can hold and still get home without an attendant, unless you be very old. Praise that man who even in his cups can show forth goodly thoughts, according as memory serves him and his zeal for virtue is at full stretch.^a In no wise is it good to relate the fights of Titans and Giants nor of Centaurs, the fictions of men aforetime, or their violent factions, in which there is nought that is wholesome; but it is good ever to have regard for the gods.' ' I love him not who, when drinking his wine beside the brimming bowl, speaks of strifes and tearful battle, but rather him who, mingling the bright gifts of the Muses and of Aphrodite together, is ever mindful of welcome good cheer.' And Ion of Chios says ^a: ' Long live our king, saviour and father! For us let the wine-pouring henchmen mix the bowl from silver pitchers,^b while another, with a golden jar^c in his hands, sets it on its base. Let us reverently pour libations to Heracles and Alcmena, to Procles and the Perseidae, beginning with Zeus, and let us drink, let us play, let our song go through the night; let everyone dance and gladly lead in the way of friendliness. And he for whom a fair female bed-fellow waits shall drink more lustily than the others.' The so-called Seven Wise Men, also, composed for themselves dinner-conversations. ' Verily wine consoles even the despondency of old age,' says Theophrastus in the treatise On Drunkenness.^d neighbours any harm. Don't you know that what, to amuse ourselves, we call "life" is but a name, a coaxing flattery of our human lot? Whether anybody will say that my judgement is good or bad I cannot tell you; but this, at least, I have made up my mind to on careful study: that all the doings of men are out-and-out crazy, and that we who for the time being are alive are only getting an outing, as though let loose^a from death and darkness to keep holiday, to amuse ourselves and to enjoy this light which we can see. And the man who laughs and drinks the most, and holds fast to Aphrodite, during the time he is set free, and to such gifts as Fortune offers, after he has had a most pleasant holiday can depart for home.' Therefore, as the fair Sappho also says^b: 'Come, goddess of Love, and daintily, from golden cups, pour out mingled nectar for our merry-making; for these boon-companions, mine and thine.'^c vessels are often very pleasant, like those we use, brought down the river from the Coptic territory ^a; for the clay of which they are made is mingled and baked with spices. Aristotle, too, in his work On Drunkenness, says ^b: 'The pots called Rhodian are used in drinking-bouts because of their pleasant taste and also because, when heated, they cause the wine to be less intoxicating. For myrrh and aromatic rush and other similar spices are placed in water and the pots are set to boil; when this liquid is added to the wine, it causes less drunkenness.' And in another part of his work he says ^c: 'The Rhodian pots are prepared by steeping myrrh, aromatic rush, anise, saffron, costmary, ^d cardamom, and cinnamon together; the liquor resulting from this, when added to the wine, arrests intoxication to such an extent that it even dispels erotic desires by softening the spirits.' ^e We, therefore, must not drink too madly as we gaze upon the large number of these beautiful cups, wrought with every variety of art. That word 'madness,' as Chrysippus says in his Introduction, the treatise On Good and Evil, is applied by the vulgar to the greatest number of things. ^f There is, for example, the term 'woman-madness,' and the term 'quail-madness.' ^g 'Some people even call philosophers "fame-mad," just as they call lovers of women "women-mad," and lovers of birds "bird-mad," since these words signify the same thing.' ^h

Hence it is not strange that other terms should be given in the same way. For the lover of fish and the fish-eater are in a way fish-mad, the lover of wine is wine-mad, and so on in similar cases; it is not strange that the word "madness" is applied to them, since they err madly, and are too far removed from the truth.' As for ourselves, therefore, let us, as they used to do in Athens, sip our wine, while listening to the clowns and the mimes here, and all the other artists as well. Of the Athenian custom Philochorus speaks as follows ^a: 'At the Dionysiac festivals the Athenians, after they had finished their luncheon and their drinking, would go to the spectacle and gaze at it with garlands on their heads, and throughout the entire festival wine was served to them and sweetmeats ^b were passed among them; when the choruses marched in they poured out drinks for them, and when they were marching out after the contest they poured again; this is attested by the comic poet Pherecrates, who says ^c that up to his time the spectators were not left unfed.' Phanodemus says ^d that at the temple of Dionysus in the Marshes the Athenians mix the must which they bring from their casks in honour of the god, and then drink it themselves; hence Dionysus was called god of the marsh, because the must was mixed and drunk with water on that occasion for the first time. Hence, too, the Nymphs ^e were called nurses of Dionysus, because water increases the wine ^a when mixed with it. Delighted, then, with the mixture, men celebrated Dionysus in song, dancing, and calling upon him with the names Flowery, Dithyrambus, Reveller, and Bromius. Theophrastus, also, in the treatise On Drunkenness, says ^b that 'the Nymphs are in very truth nurses of Dionysus. For the vines when pruned pour forth a great deal of moisture, and weep according to their nature.' Hence Euripides says ^c that one of the horses of the Sun is 'Fiery, ripening the autumn vine-rows of the Bacchic god, who loves flowers; because of this mortals call wine fiery.' ^d And Odysseus gave 'honey-sweet red wine, filling one cup, and poured into it twenty measures of water; and a sweet smell breathed from the mixing-bowl.' ^e Timotheus in Cyclops ^f: 'Into it he poured one ivy-wood cup of red drops ambrosial, bubbling with foam; then he poured in twenty measures, ^g and mingled together the blood of the Bacchic god with fresh-flowing tears of the Nymphs.'

“ I know of some persons, fellow-members of our company, who took great pride not so much in their money as in the possession of many cups of silver and gold. One of these is Pythcas, the Arcadian from Phigaleia, who, even when he was dying, did not hesitate to admonish his relatives to write this epigram on his tomb : ‘ This is the tomb of Pytheas, a good and sober man, who acquired a boundless number of cups of silver, gold, and shining elcctrum, and came to own more than all others before him.’ This is recorded by Harmodius of Leprenm in his book on the Customs of Phigaleia.^a Xenophon, speaking of the Persians in the eighth book of Cyropaedia, writes this ^b : ‘ And what is more, if they own the greatest possible number of cups, they pride themselves on that ; and if they have openly contrived to get them by dishonest methods, they feel no shame at that. For dishonesty and avarice have grown to great proportions among them.’ And it was on account of cups that Oedipus cursed his sons, according to the author of the Cyclic poem Thebais, because they had set before him a cup which he had forbidden ; the author says ^c : ‘ But the divine hero, yellow-haired Polyneices, first set the beautiful silver table of godly Cadmus before Oedipus ; and then he filled a fair golden cup with sweet wine. story of Gras, who led the colony to Lesbos with other chieftains, and says that an oracle told them to let down into the sea as they sailed across a maiden as offering to Poseidon; he writes also the following: 'Some of the people in Methymna tell the story of the maiden who was dropped into the sea, and they declare that one of the leaders, whose name was Enalus, had fallen in love with her and dived off the ship to save the girl. At that moment they were both hidden by a wave and disappeared from sight, but some time after, when Methymna was already settled, Enalus appeared and related the manner of life he had led,^a and he said that the girl was staying with the Nereids, while he himself had fed the horses of Poseidon; and finally, when a great wave came sweeping on he plunged along with it and emerged with a cup made of gold so marvellous that the gold they^b had, when compared with it, was no better than copper.'^c

The possession of drinking-cups was held in very high esteem in ancient times. Achilles, therefore, kept his cup as a special treasure, "and neither did any other man drink out of it, nor did he pour libation from it to any god excepting Zeus."^c And when Priam wanted to ransom his son with his most notable heirlooms, he offered also "a very beautiful cup."^d In fact, even Zeus himself thought that an adequate reward for bringing forth Heracles was to give Alcmena a cup,^a which, putting on the likeness of Amphitryon, he gave to her, "and she received it straightway and marvelled at the golden cup."^b Stesichorus says^c that the Sun voyages over Oceanus in a cup, by means of which Heracles also made his way over when he set out to get the cattle of Geryonês. We know also of the cup of the Arcadian Bathycles, which he left behind as a prize for wisdom to him who was adjudged the best among the Seven Wise Men, as they are called. As for Nestor's cup, many potter with that; I mean that very many have written about it.^d The cup is a thing even loved by the gods; at any rate, they welcome "one another with golden cups."^e It is even gentlemanly; Athenæus says, to pass the time with wine, provided that one does it reasonably, not drinking too deeply, and not gulping it down in a single breath, Thracian fashion, but mingling discourse with the potion as a medicine for health.

The ancients^f were very fond of having stories embossed on their cups. Cimon and Athenocles achieved fame in this art. People also made use of cups inlaid with precious stones. Menander speaks somewhere^g of "a cup turned on the lathe," and of "cups ornamented in relief." before them Hesiod wrote ^a : " And toward a spring ever-gushing and flowing and untroubled, and pour forth three parts of water, then put in the fourth part, of wine." Theophrastus ^b : " For as regards the practices pertaining to the mixture of wine, antiquity was opposed to present-day usage among the Greeks. They did not pour the water on the wine, but rather the wine on the water, in order that they might use a drink that was more diluted, and that, having obtained satisfaction with this, they might have less appetite for more. And besides, they used up most of the wine in playing cottabus-games." ^c

Famous workers in relief were Athenocles, Crates, Stratonicus, Myrmecides of Miletus, Callicrates of Laconia, and Mys, whose Heracleot bowl we have seen ; it has an artistic relief representing the sack of Troy, and bears the following inscription : " The design is by Parrhasius, the work by Mys. I am the representation of lofty Ilios, which the Acacidæ captured."

Favourite boys among the Cretans are called " illustrious." Eager zeal possessed them to carry off boys ; and so, in the eyes of the fair among them, it is a disgrace not to get a lover. she calls out his name she tosses the drops with a bend of the arm (ankylē) at the Corinthian—member.^a And Bacchylides^b: “When, raising high her white arm, she makes the ‘bend-toss’ for the young chaps.” Hence we can form a notion of what Aeschylus means^c by his “bended cottabi.” But spears also are spoken of as “bent-arm” spears—or “mid-arm” spears; but they are so called from the “bend,” that is, the right arm.^d And so the cup, the ankylē, is so called because the right arm is bent in the toss. For the ancients were very careful to toss the cottabus nicely and in good form. In fact the vulgar were apt to take more pride in that than in the skilful throwing of the javelin. Hence the name “bent” arose from the proper position of the arm which they observed when they tossed wine in due form at the prize. What is more, they built rooms specially adapted for this game.

Aoton among the Cyprians means drinking-cup, according to Pamphilus. Philittas says ^b that it is a cup without a handle. ^c

Aroklon means the phialê in Nicander of Colophon. ^d

Aleison and Depas are identical. Homer in the Odyssey says of Peisistratus ^e: "He poured wine into a golden cup (depas)."^f Then, proceeding a little further, he says of the same ^f: "Therefore I will give thee ^g the golden cup (aleison)."^g Still further on he again says of the same ^h: "And she ⁱ gave to Telemachus the beautiful double cup (depas)."^h Consequently Asclepiades of Myrlea says: "I think that the depas is a cup shaped like a phialê; for they pour libations with it. Homer, at any rate, speaks ^j of a libation to Zeus alone. And it is called depas either because it is given to all (didotai pási) who wish to make libation or who wish to drink, or else because it had two faces (dyo ôpas); these must be the handles. But the word aleison comes either from its being very smooth (agan leion) or because the liquid is contained (alizetai) in it. ^k And that it had two handles is plain ^l: 'Now he was just on the point of raising a fair two-handled cup (aleison) of gold.' ^c His etymology is a pun; hyperphialon is related to Lat. superbus, but here it means a super-phialē.

he means nothing else than that it was doubly-convex.^a Silenus, too, says that a "double" cup was one that had no handles. Others declare that the preposition amphi (on both sides) is used for peri (round about) so as to be drunk from on both sides, or convenient for drinking in any way.^b But Parthenius says the name amphikypellon arises from the handles being formed in a convex shape; for convexity is a curving round. Anicetus says that the kypellon is a shallow cup (phiale), whereas the amphikypellon is hyperphialon, that is, proud^c and beautiful. To be sure, one may understand by aleison whatever is ornamental in its design,^d being a departure from utter smoothness (leiotés). Peisander says^e that Heracles gave an aleison to Telamon as a prize of valour in the expedition against Ilios.

Baukalis. This vessel also is so named in Alexandria, as Sopater the parodist says ^a: "A baukalis is the cup containing four half-pints"; and again ^b: "Pleasant it is, for those in the grip of a mighty thirst that is fed by the morning-headache, to drink down (katabaukalisa) at dawn the flood that gushes from the bees." Athenaeus further says that the men of Alexandria make glass, working it into many varied shapes of cups, and copying the shape of every kind of pottery that is imported among them from everywhere. They say that in order to gratify Cassander at the time when he founded the metropolis of Cassandreia, he being fond of glory and desirous of appropriating to himself a special kind of vessel because Mendacian wine was exported from his city in large quantities, the sculptor Lysippus exerted his best efforts and, after comparing many pieces of earthenware of every description, copied something from each and so invented a special model.

Bromiades, a drinking-cup similar to the larger sorts of bowl.

A Lettered cup is that which has letters inscribed on it. Alexis^c: “A. Let me tell you first of all the shape of the cup. It was round, very small, old, its handles terribly chipped, and it had letters all about it. B. There were eleven, weren’t there, in gold, dedicating it to Saviour Zeus? A. To no other, be sure.” A lettered cup of that sort we have seen, dedicated to Diana in Capua, in Campania; it was made of silver according to the pattern described in the Homeric poems, and had the verses stamped on it in letters of gold, and was said to be the cup which belonged to Nestor.^d The tragic poet Achaëus, in Omphalé, also mentions a lettered cup and represents the satyrs saying this about it^e: “The cup of the god has long been inviting me, showing plainly its inscription—d, i, and third o; n and y are also there; and after that san (s) and o (=ou) proclaim their presence.” In this last syllable the letter u is wanting, because all the ancients not only used^f the letter o with the value now attached to it, but even when it denotes the diphthong (ou) they wrote o simply. In similar fashion, also, they wrote the letter e both when it was pronounced by itself alone and when i was combined with it.^a And so in the lines above quoted the satyrs have made it plain that the final syllable of the word Dionysou,^b since only the o was incised upon it, as though it were a short syllable, must have the u understood therein. As for the letter san, they constantly use that Doric name instead of sigma. Musicians, indeed, as Aristoxenus often says, advised against the use of s because it is harsh-sounding^c and unfitted to the flute; but they often adopt the sound r because of its nimble quality.^d Horses which had the letter san branded on them were called "san-bearers." Aristophanes in The Clouds^e: "Neither yourself nor your cart-horse nor your san-bearer (racer)." Pindar says^f: "Erstwhile there came the long-drawn-out lay, and san (s), which has a false ring on the lips of men." The lettered drinking-cup is mentioned under this name by Eubulus in The Chick thus^g: "A. I've always hated worst of all a lettered cup. And yet how like this one is the Gyalas. Philitas in Irregular Words^a says that the Megarians give this term to cups, gyalai. Deinos. This also is the name of a cup. Dionysius of Sinope, when giving a list of names for cups in The Woman who Saved, mentions this also, and says^d: "A. And every sort of lovely Thericleian vessels, my lady; double cups,^e triple cups, a large deinos holding ten gallons, a little sauce-boat, bowls, and drinking-horns. B. The old woman has an eye for cups, but for nothing else whatsoever." Now the philosopher Cleanthes, in his book On Substitution of Terms, says that the Thericleian cylix and the Deinias were named from their respective makers.^f Seleucus, after saying that the deinos is a kind of cup, quotes from the Medea of Strattis^g: "Do you know, Creon, what your head looks like? I know myself; a deinos turned upside down." And Archedicus, in The

And in the succeeding verses Antimachus says^b: "Golden cups, too, and a jar full of virgin honey, whatever may be his more precious sort."

Daktylōton is a cup called by this name in Ion's Agamemnon^c: "And you shall win a gift worthy of your speed in running, a daktylōte cup, unsullied by the fire, the prize that Pelias cherished, the work of art won by Castor's feet." Now Epigenes understands here the cup with two handles (amphotōn), into which it is possible to insert the fingers (daktylōi) on both sides; but others interpret as the cup which has figures like fingers all round it, or which has projections like those on the Sidonian cups; others define as "smooth" (to the touch). The phrase "unsullied by fire" imitates the Homeric "he offered as prize a cauldron untouched by fire,"^d that is, one adapted to the receiving of cold water, or convenient for cold drinks. But some say it is the drinking-horn. Now in the Molossian country it is recorded that the cattle have extraordinarily large horns; Theopompus gives an account of their construction.^c From these it is probable that Pelias^b also had obtained his. For Iolcus is near the Molossian country, and there the games were established in honour of Pelias. "It is better to say," Didymus declares^e in his Commentary on this play, "that Ion misunderstood Homer when he said^d: 'And for the fifth (in the contest) he set up a two-handled phialê untouched by the fire.' For Ion thought that the phialê was a drinking-cup; but in Homer it is a spreading^e cauldron-like vessel of bronze, adapted for the receiving of cold water. And the phialê is called daktylōton because it has hollows round it on the inside, as though made by fingers, or because it is grasped by the fingers of the drinkers. Yet some understand 'phialê untouched by fire' as meaning the drinking-horn; for that is not made by firing. However, Ion might perhaps call the phialê a drinking-cup by a trope." Philemon in Attic Words or Glosses, under the heading kalpis,^f says: "A daktylote cup also is one with two handles, into which it is possible to insert the fingers on both sides. But others say that it is one which has certain figures all about it, shaped like fingers."

Elephas.^g This was the name given to a kind of drinking-cup, as Damoxenus says in Mourning his own Demise^h: "A. If that isn't enough for you, the slave has come with the elephant. B. In the gods' name, what is that? A. A drinking-horn with two spouts, ^f Kalpis has a wide range of meaning; in Pindar, Ol. vi. 40, it is a pitcher, at 553 d a box, here a cup.

big enough to hold six quarts, and made by Alcon. Adaeus once toasted me with it in Cypselæ." This cup is mentioned also by Epinius in Child-foisting Wives,^a whose testimony I will cite in the account of the drinking-horn.^b

Ephebus.^c The cup called embasicoetas is also named ephebus according to Philemon of Athens in his work On Attic Words or Glosses. And the comic poet Stephanus says, in The Pro-Laconian ^d: "SOSIAS. To him the king pledged a village. B. Is that some new kind of cup that is now the fashion? S. No, it is a real village in the territory of Thurii. B. I was entirely carried away for the moment, Sosias, into thinking of those Rhodian vessels and those ephebi which are so hard to manage."

Hedyptides.^e Lynceus of Samos says that the Rhodians manufactured these in competition with the "Thericleians" made at Athens; that whereas the Athenians could make this style only for the rich, on account of the weight of metal contained in them, the Rhodians enabled even the poor to share in this beautiful luxury, because of the lightness of the cups. They are mentioned by Epigenes in these lines from

^b Below, 497 a, Kock iii. 331.

^c Adulescens, 424 c. The term embasicoetas is used of a cinaedus, Petronius, Sat. 24 (L.C.L. 34); κολλη was used sometimes to indicate any receptacle for food and drink (Pollux x. 91), hence the "cup" here mentioned is thought to have been a kind of dipper or ladle (Daremberg et Saglio s. Arystichos). Why it was called ephebus or why it was hard to manage is not known.

^d Kock iii. 360. The title apparently refers to one of the Laconomaniacs satirized by Aristophanes, Av. 1281, cf. Plato, Protag. 342 n, Plut. Phoc. 10. The king mentioned is Pyrrhus (Kock).

Semus, in the fifth book of his History of Delos, says^b that in Delos there is a votive offering of a gold draught-sweetener dedicated by a native woman named Echenicê; this he mentions again in the eighth book. And Cratinus the Younger says^c: "From Archephon, a dozen draught-sweeteners."

Heracleion. Peisander, in the second book of his Epic of Heracles, says^d that the cup in which Heracles traversed Oceanus belonged to the Sun, but that Heracles received it from Oceanus. Perhaps it was so called because the hero delighted in large cups, and on account of its size poets and writers in prose have invented in jest the story of his voyage in a cup (instead of a ship).^e But Panyassis, in the first book of his Epic of Heracles, declares^f that Heracles carried off the cup, which belonged to the Sun, from Nereus, and in it sailed across to Erytheia. That Heracles was one of those who drank great quantities we have stated already.^g And that the Sun also was conveyed to the west in a cup is told by Stesichorus in the following^h: "Now the Sun, begotten of Hyperion, was descending into his golden cup, that he might traverse Oceanus and come to the depths of dark and awful night, even to his mother and wedded wife and beloved children. Meanwhile he, the son of Zeus,^a strode into the grove o'ershadowed with bay-trees." Antimachus, too, has this to say^b: "So then, in the golden cup Erytheia of glorious fame was conducting the Sun-god." And Aeschylus, in Daughters of the Sun^c: "There, at the place of thy Sire's setting, was the cup wrought by Hephaestus, wherein he crosses the mighty circling path of the billows as he speeds forth, flying into the dead of sacred night, driver of black steeds."

Mimnermus, in Nanno, says that it is in a couch of gold constructed for this purpose by Hephaestus that the Sun is conveyed, while he sleeps, toward the place of his rising; thus the poet hints at the hollow shape of the cup. He says^d: "Yea, even the Sun-god hath received the lot of toil all his days, nor ever cometh any surcease for his horses or for himself, when rosy-fingered Dawn hath left Oceanus and mounted the sky; for a lovely winged hollow couch of precious gold, made by the hands of Hephaestus, bears him lightly across the billow, on the top of the wave, while he sleeps; it carries him from the land of the Hesperides even to the country of the Aethiopians,^e where his swift chariot and steeds stand waiting until early-born Dawn shall come. Then the son of Hyperion mounts his car." But Theolytus, in the second book of his Chronicles, says ^a that the Sun voyages in a cauldron, the first to describe it thus being the poet who wrote The Battle with the Titans.^b Pherecydes, in the third book of the Histories, speaks first of Oceanus and then proceeds ^c: "Now Heracles was drawing his bow against him with the intention of shooting him, when the Sun bade him stop, and he in fear desisted. In return for this the Sun gave him the golden cup which was wont to carry him, when he sets, with his horses at night over Oceanus to the eastern land where the Sun rises. Thereupon Heracles journeyed in this cup to Erytheia, and when he was on the high seas, Oceanus made trial of him by appearing in a vision and rocking the cup. Heracles was just on the point of shooting him when Oceanus in fear bade him stop."

Therikleios that Alexis, in Hesionê, represents Heracles as drinking, when he says ^a: "Recovering his senses at last, he demanded a cylix; and when he had got it he pulled off and swilled down many draughts in quick succession; and so, as the proverb says, the fellow is ever at one time a very pretty wine-skin, at another a very pretty mealsack."^b That the Therikleios is a cylix Theophrastus clearly shows in his Inquiry into Plants. In his account of the terebinth-tree he says ^c: "From it, too, Therikleian cylices can be turned on the lathe, such that no one could tell them from those made of clay." This cylix is said to have been made by Thericles of Corinth, a potter, from whom it got its name; he lived about the same time as the comic poet Aristophanes. And Theopompus mentions the cylix thus in Nemea ^d: "SPINTHER: Come this way, trusty child of Thericles; noble form, what name are we to give you? You're the mirror of a man's features, aren't you?"^e Ay! If you are full when offered, you are nothing else in the world. This way, then, I am going to fill you up. Theolytê! old woman, I say, old woman! THEOLYTÊ: Why do you call me, dearest one? SPINTH.: I want to kiss you; this way, Theolytê, into my arms, to the arms of your new companion in slavery. That's nice. THEOL.: Naughty Spinther, you're hurting me!^f SPINTH.: Yes, something like that. But I am going to pledge you this loving-cup. Take it; and after you have drunk all that your heart desires, hand me what's left over." Now Cleanthes, in his treatise On Substitution of Terms, says^a: "The inventions of these men, and all of a similar character, have names easily understood, like Therikleios, Deinias,^a Iphikratis^b; for such names at once indicated in earlier times their inventors, and make them plain even to this day; if this is not so, the name must have been changed slightly. However, as has already been said, in such matters one is not to take the word of every casual person." But others record that the cup was named therikleios because it had the skins of wild animals (theria) figured on it. On the other hand, Pamphilus of Alexandria derives it from the circumstance that Dionysus drove away the wild beasts in confusion when he poured libations over them from these cylices. The cup is mentioned also by Antiphanes in Just Alike, in these words^c: "When they had finished their dinner (for I want to cut short what they did in the interval), and there entered the therikleios, instrument of Zeus the Saviour, brimful and bubbling with the voluptuous drops from Lesbos made with reverent pains,^d and each guest [in turn] had seized it with right hand. . . ." So Eubulus in Dolon^e: "I have never yet washed a single dish; for I could make the crockery cleaner than Thericles could make his cylices when I was a youngster."

And in another epigram: "From daybreak till nightfall and again from the night-watches until dawn, Sociès drinks out of twelve-quart jars (kadoi). Then, all of a sudden, as chance will have it, he is gone! Yet in his cups he can write his playful verse much more sweetly than Sicelidas,^c and he is also, as you know, much stronger.^d How his charm shines upon us! Kadiskos. Philemon, in the treatise before-mentioned,^c defines the kadiskos as a kind of drinking-cup. It is also a vessel in which they set up the images of Zeus, god of property, as Autocleides says in his Expositor, writing thus^d: "The figures^e of Zeus, god of property, are to be consecrated in the following manner: a new, two-handled kadiskos, furnished with a lid, should have its handles wreathed with white^f wool, while from the right shoulder and the forehead . . . the fillet, and into the vessel you place whatever you find, and pour in ambrosia. This 'ambrosia' consists of pure water, olive-oil, and all kinds of fruit; these things put in." The kadiskos is mentioned by the comic poet Strattis in Lemnomena in these words^g: "The Hermes-potion, which they drain, some from a jug, others from a kadiskos, mixing thee half-and-half."

Kanthalos. That this is the name of a boat is well known, but that a kind of cup is also called by this name Ameipsias makes clear in Playing at Cottabus^h:

^a Lit. "tokens"; but possibly "meal-jars" should be read; see critical note 4.

^a Kock i. 374.

^b If the text is right and the quotation is not misplaced, the meaning must be that his tears would fill a hundred sloops that ordinarily carried wine. Kock's ελαττερ would mean "he lapped up a hundred goblets of wine in sober fashion" (σωφρονως ironical). In that case the citation is out of place.

ately contracted in the middle; it has handles which extend down to the base. The cup known as the karchesion is rather tall^a and perhaps has been thus named because it extends so high.^b Moreover, the karchesion is a very old type of cup, seeing that Zeus, when he consorted with Alcmena, gave it as a reward for lying with her; this is recorded by Pherecydes in the second book,^c and by Herodorus of Heracleia.^d Asclepiades of Myrlea says that its name is derived from one of the arrangements in a ship. "The lowest part of the mast is called the heel, which drops into the socket; the part approximately in the middle is the neck, and that at the top is the karchesion. This part has yards sloping downward on both sides, and upon it is fixed the so-called thorakion (crow's-nest),^e which is everywhere rectangular except at the base and the top; these extend a little farther out in a straight line.^f Above the crow's-nest, reaching aloft and tapering to a point, is the so-called distaff." Sappho mentions the karchesia (as cups) in these lines^g: "And so they all, with karchesia in hand, began to pour libations; and they fervently wished all good things for the bridegroom."

^b F.H.G. ii. 29, J. 1. 219.

^c Lit. "breast-work." See 208 e (vol. ii. p. 442).

^d The meaning is uncertain. The karchesion shown on monuments was usually a bell-shaped extension of the mast, in which the halyards played, and corresponding to the main-top. Here it seems to have been considerably enlarged in the form of a cube (to serve as a crow's-nest), except that the floor and the roof extended beyond the line of the walls or sides. See Jal, Archéologie navale, i. 163; Köster, Das antike Seewesen, pp. 32, 89. The distaff was the peak, capable of revolving.

Cratinus in Dionysalexander ^a: "A. What outfit did he have then? Tell me that. B. He had a Bacchic wand, a saffron-coloured tunic,^b an embroidered coat, a karchesion." Sophocles in Tyro ^c: "Flew to the midmost table among the foods and the karchesia," by which he means that the serpents came up to the table and were found among the foods and the cups. For it was a custom among the people of old to place cups with wine already mixed upon the tables, even as Homer represents them. Now the karchesion got its name from the circumstance that it had bead-like (kerchnocidē) roughnesses, and the word is formed by change of e to a, making karchesion instead of kerchesion; hence also Homer calls ^d men who are overcome with thirst karchalcoi (having rough throats). ten cups^a of water and five of wine." It is uncertain whether the kelebé is a special kind of cup or any cup whatever, since it is so called from the act of pouring (cheein) the libation (loibén) into it, that is, making a libation^b; and they habitually applied this word (leibein) in the case of any liquid, hence the word lebes (kettle) arose. Silenus and Cleitarchus say the Aeolians call a drinking-cup by this name.^c But Pamphilus says that only the so-called thermopolis^d is (properly) the kelebé. Further, Nicander of Colophon in his Glossary says^e the kelebé is a shepherd's bowl used for honey; and this is borne out by Antimachus of Colophon, who says in the fifth book of his Thebais^f: "And (he commanded) that the heralds with them should bring a skin full of red wine, and the best kelebeion^g that lay in his halls, filled with honey." And again^h: "Then, grasping a kelebeion set with two handlesⁱ and full of honey, the bowl which was his better one." In still another place he says^j: "And golden drinking-cups, and a kelebeion full of pure honey, the bowl which was his better one." Indeed he has in this example definitely used the word kelebeion for any bowl, since he has first mentioned drinking-cups in the word depastra. So Theocritus of Syracuse says in Girls practising Witchcraft^a: "Wreath the bowl (keleben) with crimson tufts from the sheep." And Euphorion^b: "Or else from some rivers thou hast drawn off water in a kelebé." Anacreon^c: "Then the handmaid, holding a kelebé containing a gill, poured out honey-sweet wine." But Dionysius the "Lanky,"^d in his exposition of Theodoridas's song To Eros, says that the word kelebé is used of the tall drinking-cup such as the Prusian and the Therikleian.^e

^a The κιάθος was a cup with a large handle like that of a ladle, holding about $\frac{1}{2}$ of a pint: this κελέβη, therefore, contained at least 1 pint, 1 gill. But see below, 475 f.

The Horn. It is said that primitive men drank from the horns of oxen; hence Dionysus is represented as growing horns, and he is still called a bull by many poets.^f So in Cyzicus there is set up a bull-shaped statue of him. That they used to drink from horns (kerata) is evident from the word employed even to-day when they mix together water with wine, for they say that they have "horned" (kerasai) it.^g And the vessel in which the wine is mixed is a krater,^h from the water being mixed together (with the wine) in it, being from keras, as though it were kerater, because the potion is poured into a keras from it. The manufacture of drinking-horns continues even to the present time. They are at any rate called rhyta by some people. So also many poets represent the men of old as drinking from horns. Pindar, for example, says of the Centaurs^a: "And when the Pheres perceived the man-subduing smell wafted from the honey-sweet wine, furiously they thrust with their hands the white milk from the tables, and drinking unbidden out of silver horns, they began to reel." Xenophon also, in the seventh book of The Anabasis, writes as follows when describing the symposium held in the house of the Thracian Seuthes^b: "When Xenophon and his companions had entered and come before Seuthes, they first saluted one another and in accordance with the Thracian custom tendered^c horns of wine." Again, in the sixth book, when he describes the Paphlagonians he says^d: "They lay down on pallets and dined and wined from horn cups." Aeschylus in Women of Perrhaebia represents the Perrhaebians as using horns instead of cups, in these words^e: "With silver-mounted drinking-horns fitted with golden mouthpieces." And Sophocles in Pandora^f: "And Kissybion. The cup with one handle, according to Philemon. But Neoptolemus of Parium in the third book of his Glossary says that it signifies the cup made of ivy-wood (kissos) in Euripides, Andromeda^d: "All the shepherd folk rushed together, one man bringing an ivy bowl^e of milk, that gives refreshment after toil, another the joyous fruit of the vine." For the kissybion,^f he says, is always spoken of when rustics get together, since there the wooden cup is especially appropriate. Cleitarchus, however, says that the Aeolians call the skyphos a kissybion; but Marsyas calls the wooden cup also a kypellon.^g Eumolpus says that it is a variety of cup, perhaps so called, he says, because in the beginning it was made out of ivy wood. Nicander of Colophon, in the first book of his Aetolian History, says^a: "In the ritual of the Zeus of Didyma they offer libations with leaves of ivy (kissos), whence the ancient drinking-cups are called kissybia." Homer^b: "Holding in my hands a bowl (kissybion) of dark wine." Now Asclepiades of Myrlea, in his treatise On Nestor's Cup,^c says: "No dweller in a city, even in moderate circumstances, ever used a skyphos or a kissybion; it is only swineherds, shepherds, and country-people who do; thus Polyphemus drinks from the kissybion, but Eumaeus drinks from the other vessel."^d So it appears that Callimachus is in error in using the terms synonymously; he says, on the occasion when his own guest was entertained with himself at the house of the Athenian Pollis^e: "For verily he declined to swill in greedy fashion a Thracian magnum of strong wine,^f but was content with a small bowl (kissybion). To him, then, I said, while the bowl (aleison) was going round for the third time . . ." Anyone, that is, who says that aleison^g and kissybion are the same fails to observe the exact use of the terms. One may conjecture that the kissybion was made in the beginning by shepherds from ivy wood. Others, however, derive the word from cheisthai, and Silenus, Cleitarchus, and Zenodotus besides define it as a cylix^a: "And on all sides round the corpse blood was flowing in cupfuls." Also^b: "Many things there are between the cup and the edge of the lip." Simaristus says that a little cup is called by this name.^c Diodorus says that the Poet has used the name kotylē for the kotylōs of some authors, "wheat-bread and a cup (kotylē)"^d: this certainly is not acylix, because it has not two handles, but it is like (in shape) a deep wash-bowl, though it is a variety of drinking-cup. It is also equivalent to the cup, called kotylōs among the Aetolians^e and some Ionians, which, like it,^f has only one handle. It is mentioned by Crates in Games of Childhood^g and by Hermippus in The Gods.^h The Athenians, moreover, call a certain measure a kotylē. Thus Thucydidesⁱ: "They doled out to each of them, for a period of eight months, a half-pint of water and two half-pints of grain." Aristophanes

Apollodorus^b describes it as a kind of cup, tall and deeply hollowed. Moreover he says that the ancients called anything that is hollow a kotylé, as, for example, the hollow of the hand; whence also the expression "blood flowing in cupfuls" means what can be scooped up in both hands. There is also a game called "in-the-cup," wherein the boys who lose hollow their hands to receive the knees of the boys who win, and so carry them about.^c Diodorus in Italic Glosses, also Heracleitus,^d according to Pamphilus, say that the kotylé is called also hemina; Diodorus cites the verse of Epicharmus^e: "And to drink twice as much warm water, two heminai." Also Sophron^f: "Toss off the hemina, son, bottoms up!" Pherecrates in Corianno has the (diminutive) form kotyliké^h: "That tiny half-pint? Never!" Aristophanes has another diminutive kotylikion in *The Acharnians*ⁱ: "A poor little half-pint cup with its brim nicked off." And kotylē is also the name given to the hollow part of the hip-joint^a; and the growths on the arms of the polyp are called by the derived term kotyledons. Further, Aeschylus in The Edonians even calls cymbals kotylai^b: "And another crashes loudly with the brazen kotylai." Marsyas says that the bone in the hip-joint is called aleison,^c also cylix. Kotyliskos is the name given to the sacred basin of Dionysus used by the initiates at the Mysteries, according to Nicander of Thyateira, who cites the verse in The Clouds of Aristophanes^d: "Nor shall I wreath a kotyliskos." Simmias, too, renders the word kotylē by aleison.^e Kottabis. Harmodius of Lepreum in his work On the Customs of Phigaleia, describing the dinners of that place, writes the following^f: "Having consecrated this food, each man was permitted to drink a little from an earthenware basin (kottabis), and the one offering it would say 'Good dinner to you!'" Hegesander of Delphi in his Commentaries, which begin with the phrase, "In the best form of government," says^g: "The game called kottabos was introduced into their symposia, the inhabitants of Sicily, according to Dicaearchus,^h being the first to bring it in. So great an interest was aroused in the pastime that prizes, called kottabeia, were also introduced into the original work of Athenaeus or in his sources.

duced into the symposia.^a Thereupon cups (cylices) which were thought to be especially adapted to the purpose were manufactured, and they were called kottabides. In addition to this, circular rooms were constructed in order that when the kottabos^b was set up in the centre, all might compete for the victory at an equal distance and from similar positions.^c For they made it a point not merely to hit the mark, but also to carry through each motion in the correct form. For the player, leaning on his left elbow,^d was obliged to swing his right arm with supple motion and so toss the latax; for that is what they called the liquid which fell from the cup; consequently some persons took greater pride in playing kottabos well than do persons who pride themselves on hurling the javelin.”

Kratanion. Perhaps the cup which is now called kranion (skull) was thus named by the men of old. Polemon at any rate, or whoever is the author of the book entitled Of Hellas, when discussing the temple of the Metapontines at Olympia writes as follows^e: “The temple of the Metapontines, in which are 132 silver saucers, two silver wine-jugs, a silver vessel for sacrifice, three gilded saucers. The Athenians also call the physician’s box a kylichnis, because it has been turned (kekylisthai) on the lathe. Celebrated cups of the cylix-type were those of Argos and of Attica. panions gathered at the feast, to the fruit which Dionysus grants, and to the cups from Athens, they shall be a sweet goad." But the Argive cylices seem to have had a shape different from those of Attica. At any rate they were pointed (phoxai) at the brim, as Semonides of Amorgos says ^a: "This is an Argive cylix with pointed brim," that is, one that is raised to a point, like the spouted cups called ambikes. For they use the adjective phoxos of this, as Homer does in the case of Thersites ^b: "His head was pointed at the top." The word, therefore, is for phaoxos, that which looks pointed at the place where the eyes are. Excellent cylices are also made in Naucratis, the native city of our boon-companion Athenæus. They are like phialai,^c made not as on a lathe but as if fashioned by the finger; moreover they have four handles and a broadly extended base (there are, by the way, many potters in Naucratis; from them also the gate which is near the potters' workshops is called the Ceramic Gate); and these cups are dyed to look as if they were of silver. In high esteem also are the cylices of Chios; they are mentioned by Hermippus in Soldiers ^d: "And the Chian cylix is now being hung high on its peg." Glaueon in his Glossary says that the Cyprians call the kytlê ^e a cylix. Hermonax, in Synonyms, writes my spit is sticky, by the two goddesses.^a B. What shall I get? Shall I mix you up a little cup (kylishē)? A. No, by no means a little one. For the bile gets stirred up in me at once, ever since I drank medicine^b from that kind of cup. Pour it now into this bigger cup that I have." That women liked to use big cups is attested by Pherecrates again in these verses from Tyranny^c: "Thereupon, for the men, they caused to be made flat drinking-cups which had no sides, only just a bottom holding not even so much as a thimbleful, like little 'tasters'^d; but for themselves alone they had cups (cylices) manufactured as deep as wine-transporting merchantmen, well rounded, delicately fashioned, yet bellying out in the middle; the women had had them made not without shrewd planning, and long before, for they wanted to be able to drink up the greatest possible quantity of wine without being called to account. And then, when we men accuse them of drinking up all the wine, they scold us and swear they haven't taken more than a single cup. But this single cup is mightier than a thousand!"

Kymbia are cups, and also small boats, according to Simaristus. Dorotheus says: "The kymbia are a variety of cups, deep and high,^a having no stem and no handles." But Ptolemy the son of Aristonicus says they are the kind with curving brim. Nicander of Thyateira says that Theopompus, in The Mede,^b so named the cup which has no handles. Philemon in The Ghost^c: "Rosa drank a kymbion of unmixed wine; she soon had you all under the table." Dionysius of Samos, in the sixth book of his work On the Cycle, expresses the belief that kymbion and kissybion are the same thing.^d For he says that Odysseus filled a kymbion with unmixed wine and handed it to the Cyclops. Certainly the kissybion given to him in Homer^e cannot be small; otherwise he, so huge of body, would not have been quickly overcome with intoxication after only three drinks. The kymbion is mentioned by Demosthenes, also, in the speech Against Meidias, in which he says^f that Meidias was accompanied by drinking-horns and kymbia. And in the same speech again^g: "He rode on a pillion^h from Argura in Euboea, with fine robes and kymbia and jars in a cart, which were seized by the customs-officers.ⁱ" The word occurs also in the speech Against Euergus and Mnesibulus.^j Didymus the grammarian says^a that the eup is long and narrow in shape, similar to a boat which is called kymbê.^b So Anaxandrides in The Farmers c: "A. Perhaps the big cups with which we were challenged and the kymbia full of unmixed wine have stupefied us. B. Stupefied! They've upset us completely!" Alexis in The Horseman a: "A. And how about the kymbia? Did they have faces of girls in gold? B. Yes, by Zeus, they did indeed. A. Alas, what bad luck is mine!" Eratosthenes, on the other hand, in the Letter to Agetor of Lacedaemon, represents the kymbion as shaped like a kyathos. He writes as follows a: "The same persons wonder how it was that if he had no kyathos, but only a kymbion, he also owned a phialê. It seems to me, then, that the first was for the use of men, whereas he had acquired possession of the second in order to honour the gods.^f In those days they made no use of a kyathos, nor again of a kotylê. For they used to set up a mixing-bowl in honour of the gods, one not made of silver, nor set with precious stones, but made of clay from Cape Colias.^g Every time that they filled up this bowl they would make a libation to the gods from the phialê, and then have the wine poured for themselves in due order, dipping up the fresh mixture with the kymbion,^a just as people do to-day in your messes at Sparta. But if they ever wanted to drink more, they used also to set before them the so-called kotylai, best and easiest of all cups to drink from. These also were of the same clay workmanship." Again, when Ephippus in The Recruits says,^b "Does not Chaeremon always bring cylices to dinners, hasn't Euripides fought with kymbia?" he does not mean the tragic poet but someone with the same name, a wine-bibber, that is, or one having a bad reputation, as Antiochus of Alexandria avers in his work On the Poets ridiculed in the Middle Comedy. For to bring along kymbia to an entertainment and to have the reputation of fighting with them points in each direction.^c This Euripides is mentioned also by Anaxandrides in The Nereids^d: "You there, Comus, fetch the kymbion and give the piteher to him. He will turn into a Euripides to-day." And Ephippus in Just Alike or The Obeliaphoroi^e: "Yes, and may I have to learn by heart some plays of Dionysius,^f or Demophon's lines against Cotys; and may I have to listen to Theodorus reciting pieces at dinner, and live next door to Laches, and supply the kymbia when I entertain Euripides."

^a In Athens the ladle-like kyathos was used for this purpose.

^b Kock ii. 255. Ephippus, as Athenaeus sees, is satirizing men of his own time (fourth century B.C.).

^a Kock ii. 146.

^b Ibid. 259; for the title see Athen. 111 b, 359 a (vol. ii. p. 23, vol. iv. p. 125). The scene is perhaps like that in Aristoph. Ran. 146 ff., esp. 151 ἢ Μορσίμων τὸν βῆσαν ἐξερπάφατο, involving a comic imprecation; cf. also Lysistr. 233 ff., and the whimsical curse, Acharn. 1150 ff.

^c Dionysius the Elder affected tragedy, Aelian, V.H. xiii. 18. Cotys (see Athen. 131 a), King of Thrace, at first an ally of Athens, became her enemy ca. 365 B.C. Theodorus was celebrated for his acting in the character of Antigone, Demosth. xix. 246; cf. Diog. L. ii. 102.

That the kymbê is also a boat Sophocles shows in Andromeda^a: "With horses or in boats (kymbai) dost thou travel over the earth?" Kybbā is a cup. Apollodorus says,^b in Paphos.

Kypellon. Is this the same cup as the aleison^c and the depas, differing only in name—"So then the sons of the Achaeans, standing upon this side and on that, pledged them in cups (kypella) of gold"^d—or can it be that the kypellon had a different shape; and was not a double-cup (amphikypellon), as the depas and the aleison were, but simply had a curving brim? For the word kypellon is derived from the word meaning rotundity (kyphotês),^e just as the word amphikypellon is; or perhaps it is called kypellon because it resembles the pellai,^f though with a more contracted curve; or else amphikypella may be as it were amphikyrtia or doubly convex, said of the handles, since they are like that in construction.^g For the Poet says^h: "Now he was just on the point of raising a fair golden, two-handled cup (aleison)."ⁱ So Antimachus in the fifth book of the Thebais^j: "And the heralds, going to them in turn, dispensed to all the leaders fair cups (kypella) wrought in gold." But ^a Il. ix. 670; a dêpas ἀμφικύπελλον had been used for a libation (656). Doubtless other quotations once stood here, to prove the identity in Homer of the three terms.

^c Lit. "curvingness." The root of the word, referring to any hollow place or thing, is widely extended throughout the Indo-European languages, and is still seen in Eng. "cup."^k See Glotta 16, 1926, 88.

^a That is, they were like bowls without handles; Silenus held, against Aristarchus, that the amphikypellon had no handles (783 b).

^b Frag. 140 Schneider; the quotation is lost.

Silenus says: "Kypella are drinking-cups similar to skypthoi,^a as Nicander of Colophon shows . . .^b 'The swineherd distributed kypella.'"^c Eumolpus says that it is a kind of cup, derived from the word kyphos (curved). Simaristus, however, defines it as the two-handled cup among the Cyprians, whereas in Crete it is the two-handled and four-handled cup. Again, Philitas says^d that the people of Syracuse call the crumbs of barley-cake and wheat loaves left on the table kypella.

It is adapted to military purposes for the reason that it is often necessary to drink water that is not pure. In the first place it was useful in that the water drunk could not be too

Polemon, also, in the . . . book of his Address to Adaeus and Antigonus, after saying that the Lacedaemonians used vessels of earthenware, writes as follows ^b: "But certainly, that this sort of discipline was ancient . . . (It is a custom) which may be seen even to-day among some of the Greek peoples: in Argos at the public banquets, in Lacedaemon during their festivals and on the occasion of dinners celebrating victory or the marriage of their maidens, they drink from earthenware cups; but in the case of the symposia and at the public mess (the wine is mingled) in casks . . ." Archilochus mentions the kothon as a drinking-cup in his Elegiac Verses thus ^c: "Up then, and with your wine-bottle pace up and down by the rowing-benches of the swift ship, and pull off the lids from the hollow jars; take the red wine from the very lees; for even we shall not be able to keep sober on such a watch as this." somebody! Seize the fire-born, round, small-eared, thick-lipped wine-bottle (kothon), minister to our throats, and pour out a drink, a drink!" Theopompus in Militant Females^a: "What, am I to bend my throat away back and drink from a neck-twisting canteen (kothon)?" Alexis in Toilers^b: "There-upon he socked me with a quart canteen—O ancient chattel of our house!" It is from this kind of cup that those who take too large a pull at unmixed wine are called "neat-winc-canteeners," as Hypereides says in the Speech against Demosthenes.^c And Callixeinus, describing in the fourth book of his work On Alexandria the proccession of Philadelphus, in which he enumerates many drinking-cups, writes also,^d "Two canteens holding twenty gallons." Now with regard to drinking from these large cups, and demonstrating that such hard drinking, at intervals of time, is beneficial, Mnesitheus, the Athenian physician, says in his letter On Hard Drinking this: "The result of people drinking large quantities of unmixed wine at social gatherings is considerable injury done to body and to mind. And yet hard drinking after several days' interval^e seems to me to produce a kind of purgation of the body and a relaxation of the mind. For certain superficial manifestations of acidity are caused in our systems by daily attendance at symposia; now the most appropriate outlet for them is by means of urination, while among the purgative processes that which is brought about by hard drinking is the most natural. For the body is thoroughly washed out by wine, since wine is both liquid and warm; the urine which is filtered out of us is acrid. At any rate the fullers cleanse garments by the use of it as a washing agent.^a Observe three points when you indulge in hard drinking. First, do not drink poor wine or neat wine, or chew nuts and raisins while drinking. Secondly, when you have had enough of it, do not lie down until you have vomited more or less. Thirdly, when you have vomited sufficiently, go to bed after a light shower-bath; but if you have not been able to empty yourself sufficiently, take a more extended bath, lying in a tub of very warm water." Polemon in the fifth book of his Address to Adaeus and Antigonus says ^b: "Dionysus Perfecter. He is seated on a rock; on his left is a bald-headed satyr, holding in the right hand a canteen with one handle and fluted sides."

Labronia are a kind of Persian cup, so named from the violence (labrotés)^c which arises in drinking. In design it is flat and large; it also has large handles;

All were disagreeably harsh in their action, as Dicaeopolis complains in Aristoph. Ach. 18 οὐτως ἐδίχθημι ὑπὸ κορίας. See Athen. 409 c (vol. iv. p. 352).

^b Frag. 60 Preller; see 483 c, where perhaps this quotation originally stood. It describes a painting or relief in catalogue fashion. The epithet Teleios, often given to gods, means "bringing to fulfilment," "granting perfection" (e.g. through the Mysteries). It is omitted in Bruchmann, Epitheta Deorum, who cites, however, τελεσσιγamos from Nonnus.

^c The same etymology is given to explain the name of the sea-bass, labrae, Athen. 310 f (vol. iii. p. 396).

From this word comes lapsai, that is, to drink at a gulp, opposed to the gurgling drink called bombylios. For Aristophanes also says somewhere ^j: "But you have gulped down

^a Kock i. 740. The hexameters are a mocking comment on the dissensions among the Greeks after the Peloponnesian War, of which the Persians were quick to take advantage. Callistratus of Aphidnae, the Athenian leader mentioned also at 44 a, 166 e, 449 f, urged the Arcadians to side with Athens, C. Nepos, Epam. 6.

Medea^a: "Thus did Callistratus once beguile the sons of the Achaeans, distributing welcome coin among them when he asked for an alliance; but one alone he could not beguile, Lysander, light of frame but a veritable Rhadamanthys—at least not with a canteen—before he had given him a lepasté."^b Amerias, however, says that the wine-jug was called a lepasté.^c But Aristophanes says^d it was a kind of cylix, and so does Apollodorus. Pherecrates in Good-for-Nothings^e: "And whoever in the audience is thirsty may have a lepasté filled, and swill it like Charybdis."^f Nicander of Colophon says^g that the Dolopes give this name to the cylix. Lycophron, too, in the ninth book of his work On Comedy, also cites^h the lines from Pherecrates and explains that the lepasté is a kind of cylix. Moschus, in his interpretation of Rhodian Diction, says that it is an earthenware vessel, like the so-called ptomatides,ⁱ but more outspread. Artemidorus, disciple of Aristophanes, says it is a kind of cup. Apollonophanes in The Cretans^j: "And a lepasté of sweet wine will cheer

^b Apparently Lysander remained as inexorable as Rhadamanthys, the judge in the lower world, to the offer of a canteen, but was finally won by a larger offering.

Lykiourgeis. Certain phiaiai^g have this name from their manufacturer Lycon, just as Kononeioi^h are those made by Conon. Demosthenes mentions Lycon in the oration On the Crown and in the speech Against Timotheus concerning Debt as followsⁱ: "Two phiaiai of Lycian workmanship." And in the speech Against Timotheus he writes: "He gave to Phormion to keep for him, among other possessions, two phiaiai of Lycian workmanship besides." Herodotus in the seventh book has^j: "Two hunting-spears, Lykiourgides or lykoergeis," (so called) because they are javelins adapted to hunting wolves (lykoi), or because they were made in Lycia. In explaining this word ^a the grammarian Didymus says ^b they are the cups manufactured by Lycius. Now he was from Eleutheræ, a Boeotian by birth, son of Myron the sculptor, according to Polemon in the first book of his work On the Acropolis.^c But the grammarian fails to see that you cannot find a form like this made from personal names; they are made only from names of cities or nations. And so, in fact, Aristophanes says in The Peace ^d: "My boat will be a Naxian-made schooner." Also Critias in his Constitution of the Lacedæmonians ^e: "A Milesian-made couch and Milesian-made stool, a Chian-made couch and Rhenaean-made clogs." And Herodotus says in the seventh book ^f: "Two hunting-spears Lycus-made." Perhaps, therefore, both in Herodotus and in Demosthenes we should write Lycian-made (Lykiourgeas),^g so as to understand it of things made in Lycia.

Melê. This is a name given to certain cups which are mentioned by Anaxippus in The Well. He says ^h: "You, Syriacus,ⁱ take this melê and carry it to her tomb, do you understand? Then pour over it (the libation)."

The cup which is offered after dinner, when they have finished the hand-washing.^a Antiphanes in The Torch^b: "An after-dinner cup to Good Luck, a bit of dessert to nibble, a libation, and clapping of hands." Diphilus in Sappho^c: "Archilochus, accept this brimming after-dinner cup in honour of Saviour Zeus, and to Good Luck. . ." But some, like Seleucus in his Glossary, explain it as the drink after the hand-washing. Callias in The Cyclopes^d: "And accept this after-dinner drink to Hygieia."^e Philetaerus in Asclepius^f: "He brandished a huge, brimming, after-dinner drink, mixed half and half, pronouncing over it the name of Hygieia." And the dithyrambic poet Philoxenus, pledging someone in his poem entitled The Banquet, after the washing of the hands, says^g: "Accept thou this after-dinner cup full of the refreshing dew of Bacchus. Verily the Bromian god, with this soothing joy that he hath given, invites all to take their delight." Antiphanes in The Torch^h: "The table (was then removed), and at once came an after-dinner cup to Good Luck." Nicostratus in

Rival in Love^a: "Pour him out an after-dinner cup to Hygieia."

Mastos.^b Apollodorus of Cyrene, quoted by Pamphilus, says that the Paphians call the drinking-cup by this name.

Mathalidas is (an accusative form) used by Blaesus in Saturnus^c: "Pour out for us seven mathalidae of your sweetest wine." And Pamphilus says: "Perhaps this is a kind of drinking-cup, or a measure of capacity, like the kyathos.^d" But Diodorus renders it by cylix.

Manês is a kind of cup. Nicôn in The Harp-singer^e: "And one said, right in the nick of time, 'I pledge you a cup, my countryman.' Then he took a stout manês of earthenware, holding perhaps five kotylai.^f I accepted it." These verses in iambic metre were cited by Didymus^g and by Pamphilus. The name manês is given also to the figure surmounting the kottabos, at which they used to aim the wine-drops in the game; this is what Sophocles in Salmoneus called "the bronze head," as follows^h: "Here are ticklings and the smack of kisses; for the one who best shoots the kottabos and hits the bronze head I set up prizes for victory." Antiphanes in Birth

^a Quoted on the same subject above, 477 b (p. 110). On this curious passage, wherein philology distorted by allegory and astrology is seen at its worst, see Lehrs, *Aristarchi Stud. Hom.*³ 196, B. A. Müller, De Asclepiade Myrleaco, Leipzig, 170 verses the first question is, what is the meaning of "pierced with golden studs"; secondly, what means the phrase, "there were four handles to it." For in the case of all other cups Asclepiades^a of Myrlea, in his treatise On Nestor's Cup, says that they had only two handles. And how can one imagine doves feeding round each one of the handles? What does he mean in saying there were "two stems" to the cup? Peculiar, too, is the statement that whereas others lifted the cup with difficulty, "Nestor, that old man, raised it easily." Having posed these questions, Asclepiades asks about the studs, in what way they should be taken as "piercing." Some authorities, to be sure, assert that the golden studs must be affixed to the silver cup from the outside, in the method required by the art of embossing, illustrating this from the case of Achilles' staff^b: "So he spake in his wrath, and hurled to earth the staff pierced with golden studs." Here, indeed, it is manifest that they are driven into the staff as nails are on clubs. Again, in the case of Agamemnon's sword^c: "Then round his shoulders he cast his sword; and on it studs of gold glistened; but the scabbard about it was silver." Now Apelles, the metal-worker, showed us, he says,^d the method of setting the studs in some Corinthian works of art. There was a small prominence raised above the surface by the artist's punch, giving as it were the effect of nail-heads. Hence the studs are said by the poet to be "pierced," not because they are attached and inserted by piercing from the outside, but because they look as if they had been inserted and were projecting a little outward, though being in reality merely elevations^a above the rest of the surface. And with regard to the handles they make this explanation, that whereas it had two handles at the brim as other cups have, it also had two other small handles at the middle of the curving bowl on both sides, resembling the handles on Corinthian water-jars. But Apelles further indicated by a very skilful drawing that the position of the four handles was as follows. Branching from a single root, as it were, which is attached to the base of the cup, are bands at the side of each handle, on both alike, at a small distance from each other. These bands extend as far as the brim of the cup and project also a little above the brim; they maintain the branching (most) where the distance from the bowl is greatest,^b but where their extremities are joined to the brim, the bands come together again. In this manner four handles are formed. This pattern is observed on only a few cups, not on all; it is especially characteristic of those called Seleukides.^c As for the question raised concerning the two "stems" and what is meant by "and there were two stems below," some authorities settle it in this wise: some cups have ^a Lit. "elevated," or in relief, as in embossed ware. No actual rivets were used, according to this interpretation.

The word here rendered "stems" (Leaf "supports") refers to the two strips of gold binding the bowl to the base in addition to the central stem.

^b Lit. "according to the distance from the bowl."

^a i.e. it is virtually a part of the bowl, or body of the vessel, and is scarcely discernible, as in a modern sancer. The other kind is a stem and base combined, such as may be seen in the modern goblet and the ancient cylix (with stem).

one base, the natural one which is welded together with the cup as a whole^a—such as the so-called kymbia (sauce-boats), the phialai, and any other vessel shaped to look like a phialê; some, again, have two bases, like the egg-shaped skyphoi,^b the kantharoi, the Seleukides, the karchesia, and the cups similar to these; one base, that is, is that which is fashioned at the natural bottom of the cup along with the cup as a whole, whereas the other is that which is attached separately, beginning in a narrow stem, and ending in one that is broader, being the support on which the cup stands. And so they assert that Nestor's cup (depas) was of this latter sort. But it is also possible that Homer suggests two stems, the one as it were supporting the entire weight of the cup and having a vertical height proportional to its larger circumference, whereas the other, describing a smaller circle, is contained within the larger, where the natural bottom of the cup converges to narrow dimensions, so that the cup is really supported by two stems.^c It is said that Dionysius of Thrace constructed Nestor's cup at Rhodes with silver contributed by his pupils; Promathidas of Heracleia, then, in expounding the design made by Dionysius, says that the cup is a skyphos with handles in juxtaposition,^d like ships with double prows, and on the handles were the pigeons; as though two bars,^e placed transversely

^c This means, apparently, that one stem of slighter circumference is superimposed, in the same axis, upon the other, which is larger and affords a firmer base.

^d This is better expressed by Schol. Il. xi. 632 (Aristarchus), who says that there were two handles on each side of the bowl, so arranged as not to interfere with the lips in drinking, therefore below the brim.

^e Lit. "staves." This sentence has become displaced, giving as it does a new explanation of the stem and handles.

and lengthwise to the cup, acted as its supports; these, then, were the two "stems." What it was like it is still possible to see to-day in the city of Capua, in Campania,—a cup dedicated to Diana, which the people there say belonged to Nestor; it is of silver, and has the Homeric verses embossed upon it in letters of gold.

"I, then," says our authority of Myrlea, "have the following comments to add concerning the cup. The ancients, who were the first to ordain for men the things pertaining to civilized life, being convinced that the universe is spherical in shape, and deriving distinct mental images from the shape of the sun and moon, thought it was only right to make the things pertaining to their own food like the element which encompasses the earth, according to the shape it seemed to have.^a Hence they made a table round; also the tripods consecrated to the gods they made circular and covered with stars, and (round) cakes also which they call 'moons.'^b So also they called a loaf artos, because, among geometrical shapes, the circle is perfectly even^c and complete. Hence, too, the cup, which contains liquid food, they made circular in imitation of the universe. But Nestor's cup is even more characteristic. For it has stars also,^d which the Poet likens to studs, because stars are round just as nails are, and are fastened to the sky, as Aratus says of them^a: 'They are ever fixed in the sky as the ornaments of the passing night.' In striking fashion the Poet has made this also plain, in that, by setting the golden studs side by side with the silver substance of the cup, he has brought out by contrast the true character of the stars and the sky in accordance with the outward appearance of their colours. For the sky is like unto silver, whereas the stars resemble gold in their fiery nature.

"Imagining, therefore, Nestor's cup as entirely covered with stars, the Poet passes on next to the most important of the constellations,^b those, namely, by the help of which men determine the acts of their daily lives;^c I mean the Doves.^d For when he says, 'And two doves of gold were feeding round each,' he does not mean by 'doves' the birds, which certain persons erroneously understand here as pigeons. No, for Aristotle says^e that the dove is one thing, the pigeon another. On the contrary, the Poet in this instance uses 'doves' for 'Pleiades,' and it is with reference to them that men sow and reap; they mark the beginning of the birth of the crops and of their harvesting, as Hesiod says^f: 'Begin ye the reaping when the Pleiades, daughters of Atlas, rise, and the ploughing, when they begin to set.' And Aratus ^a: 'These, to be sure, are alike small and dim, yet are they famous as they revolve—Zeus is the cause—in the morning and the evening. It is he who ordained that they should give the sign when summer and winter begin and the season of ploughing approaches.' So, then, the Poet has, through the embosser's art, quite properly represented the Pleiades as presaging the germination of the crops, and their coming to perfection, on the cup of the most sapient Nestor: for it is a vessel capable of receiving the other kind of food as well.^b Hence also he declares that the Doves (Peleiades) bring the ambrosia for Zeus ^c: 'On this side even winged things cannot pass by, not even the timorous Doves (Peleiai), which bring ambrosia to Father Zeus.' It must not be thought that it is the birds called peleiades that bring ambrosia to Zeus, as the majority imagine (for that would be beneath his dignity), but rather the Pleiades. For it is the appropriate office of those Maidens who give sign of the seasons to the human race that they should also bring ambrosia to Zeus. Hence he really distinguishes them from fowls when he says: 'Even winged things cannot pass by, nor even the Peleiai.' Further, that he regards the Pleiades as the most notable of the constellations is manifest from the way in which he puts them first in his enumeration of them and the other stars^a: 'And on it all the signs wherewith the sky is wreathed, Pleiades, and Hyades, and mighty Orion, and the Bear that men call also the Wain.' And so the majority have gone wrong in thinking that the pleiades are birds, first because of the poetic form which is made by adding the letter ^b; then secondly, because they took the word 'timorous' to be an epithet only of doves, since this bird, on account of its lack of strength, is cautious; for to be cautious is to be timorous. But the epithet is appropriate even when applied to the Pleiades; for in mythology they too are said to fly from Orion when their mother Pleionê is pursued by Orion. And the collateral form of their name, by which the Pleiades may be called either Peleiai or Peleïades, is to be found among many of the poets. Moero of Byzantium was the first to understand correctly the sense of the Homeric verses, declaring, in the work entitled Memory, that the Pleiades carried ambrosia to Zeus. Then the philologist^c Crates appropriated her idea as his own and published that interpretation.^d Simonides also calls the Pleiades Peleïades in these lines^e: 'Hermes, god of the games, grants renown, he the son of Maia with the fair tresses, and she loveliest in beauty among the seven dear daughters with violet tresses born unto Atlas, who are called the Peleïades of the heavens.' It is perfectly evident that he means the Pleiades, who are daughters of Atlas, in calling them Peleïades, as Pindar does ^a: 'And it is indeed seemly that Orion should move not far from the mountain-Peleïades.' As a matter of fact, Orion is very close to the constellation of the Pleiades; hence also the story about them, that they fly from Orion with their mother Pleïonê. Further, he calls the Pleiades oreias (mountain), equivalent to oureias by omission of the letter u, because they are situated at the tail (oura) of the Bull. And Aeschylus, also, more plainly punning on the name because of the similarity of sound, says ^b: 'And they that are called the seven daughters of Atlas bemoaned their father's mighty task of bearing up the heavens, where in phantom forms at night they have their station—the wingless Peleïadês.' ^c For he calls them wingless because their name is similar to that of the doves. And Moero herself speaks in this wise ^d: 'So then Zeus was nourished to full growth in Crete, nor did any of the Blessed have knowledge of him; anon he waxed strong in all his limbs. Him the timorous ones nourished within the

And when far-thundering Zeus had overcome his father Cronus, he made the eagle immortal and appointed him to dwell in Heaven. Likewise he bestowed honour upon the timorous Doves (Peleiades) which are the messengers of summer and of winter.' Simmias, on the other hand, says in Gorgo ^a: 'The Peleiai, swift ministers of the sky, were approaching.' And likewise Poseidippus in his Epic of Aesopus ^b: 'Nor, verily, do the cold Peleiai set at nightfall.' Lamprocles, the composer of dithyrambs, has said expressly that the Pleiades have the same name as the pigeons in these lines ^c: 'Ye that are of like name with the winged doves (peleiades) and are set in the sky.' And the author of the poem on Astronomy ascribed to Hesiod always speaks of them as Peleiades ^d: 'Which mortals call Peleiades.' And again ^e: 'The wintry Peleiades are sinking low.' Still again ^f: 'Then do the Peleiades hide their light.' It is, therefore, not at all improbable that Homer also, in accord with the poetic custom, has called the Pleiades 'Peleiades.'

“ It has, then, been proved that the Pleiades were embossed on the cup, and one must assume two at each handle, whether one insists that they were bird-shaped maidens or again human-shaped, and spangled with stars. But the phrase ‘round each, golden Pleiades were feeding’ must not be understood as meaning round every single handle; for that will make the Pleiades eight in number; on the contrary; since each pair of handles is separated into two divisions, and their joining again occurs almost at the point where the cup ends, the word ‘each’ must have reference to the fact that all the divisions of the handles number four, while ‘each pair’ refers to the fact that they grow together again at the point where their extension ceases. When, therefore, the Poet says, ‘And two doves (peleïades) of gold were feeding round each, and there were two stems below the cup,’ we shall understand that at each of the two points where the handles divide there was one dove; these he calls ‘two’ (doiai) because they grow into one another and are closely joined.^a For the forms doiōi and doiāi signify the general idea of number, ‘two,’ as in ^b ‘Two (doiōi) tripods and ten talents of gold.’ Also ‘two (doiō) henchmen.’^c But it signifies also the idea of grown together, and closely joined in pairs, as in these lines ^d: ‘So then he crept heneath two bushes that grew from one stem, the one a mastic, the other an olive.’ Thus there will be only four doves on the handles.

“ Again, when he adds (after ‘ two doves of gold were feeding round each ’) the phrase, ‘ and there were two stems below ’ (hypo pythmenes),^a we are not to understand two bases, nor are we to divide the words in reading, as Dionysius of Thrace does, but we should read the compound hypopythmenes, in order to construe it as an adjective modifying peleiades, because there were four on the handles, but two at the bottom of the cup; that is, it means ‘ at the bottom,’ like the epithet hypopythmenioi. Thus the cup was supported by two Pēleiades set beneath the bottom, and the whole number of Pleiades (on the cup) amounted to six, since that is the number visible (in the sky), though they are spoken of as seven, as Aratus also says^b: “ Moving in seven paths,” then, men say of them, though only six are plain for the eyes to see. Not in any wise is a star lost beyond the ken of Zeus, whose offspring we also are said to be;^c yet is it said for all that,^d and they are expressly called seven.’ . . . “ Only six are plain for the eyes to see.” The artist, therefore, has fittingly depicted by embossed work, in the pattern that we see, what is actually observed in the constellation. Authorities believe, moreover, that the Poet indicates this also of Zeus when he says^e: ‘ On this side even winged things cannot pass by, not even the timorous Doves which bring ambrosia to Father Zeus. But the smooth rock ever steals one of them away. Yet the Father sends in another to make up the number,' meaning that one of the Pleiades is stolen away by the suddenness and slipperiness of the Wandering Rocks, although another dove is sent in by Zeus to maintain their full number; in poetic fashion he implies that though only six Pleiades can be seen, nevertheless their full number is never lost, and they are counted as seven in number as well as in name.

"And in answer to those who say that the embossing of the Pleiades on the cup is not appropriate, since they are harbingers of dry foods, we may say that the cup (depas) is capable of holding both kinds of food.^a For a posset (kykeôn) is made in it, and this is a drink containing in its ingredients cheese and barley meal; both of these are mixed and drunk in this way, the Poet says^b: 'For them Hecamedê of the beautiful tresses prepared a posset. . . . She it was that had first set in front of them a table fair, with black legs, well polished, and upon it had placed a bronze basket; then, as a relish for their drink, she had brought an onion, and yellow honey, and the fruit of sacred barley besides, and a cup of exceeding beauty which the aged man had brought from home. . . . ^b A promise fortunately not redeemed, at least by Athenaeus. Machaon, grievously wounded in the right shoulder by a triple-barbed arrow, was forced to leave the battle, Il. xi. 505 ff.

^c Il. iii. 103.

^d Il. vi. 153. It is true that δς is never used as a mere white barley meal over it ; then she bade him drink, for that she had prepared the posset.'

"Now, when he says,^a 'Another (ἄλλος) had with difficulty moved it from the table when it was full, but Nestor, that old man, easily raised it,' the verse is not to be understood of Machaon and Nestor alone, as some think. They (read ἀλλ' ὅς for ἄλλος and) take ὅς (who) in the sense of ὁ (he), making it refer to Machaon alone : 'But he (ἀλλ' ὅς) had with difficulty removed it from the table'; they think this clear from the expression 'with difficulty,' meaning that he has been wounded. But that Machaon, according to Homer, has not been wounded will be shown in another chapter.^b And these interpreters are unaware that Homer did not apply the word ἄλλος (another) to Machaon and Nestor alone ; (he would not have used that form), since there are two persons here drinking, but he would have said ἕτερος (the other). For this is the word naturally used when two things are involved, as in the following case ^c : 'Bring two lambs, the one (ἕτερον) a white male, the other (ἑτέραν) a black female.' Furthermore, Homer never uses the form ὅς (who) in place of the prepositive article ὁ (the) ; conversely, however, he uses the prepositive ὁ in place of the relative ὅς, as for example^d : 'Where also article (the) ; but it often occurs as a demonstrative (that, he), which is the original function of ὁ (that, the) ; and when ὁ is used as a relative, as often happens, it is of course no longer prepositive or articular. Monro, *Hom. Gram.*² § 265. The correct reading ἄλλος is that of Aristarchus and Ptolemy of Ascalon, Schol. B, Il. xi. 636. It is noteworthy that however wrong the reasoning may be, the final conclusion is correct, viz. that the lines make Nestor the only one capable of raising the cup.

dwelt Sisyphus, who (δ) was the craftiest of men.' Hence the part of speech to be supplied is $\tau\iota\varsigma$ (any); the complete line, in fact, is 'Any other had with difficulty moved it from the table when it was full, but Nestor, that old man, easily raised it,' meaning that any other man would have found it hard to budge the cup from the table, but Nestor lifted it easily, without labour or trouble. For the cup is large in bulk and heavy in weight—this cup which Nestor, being a drink-lover, was strong enough to raise easily through constant habit.

"Now Sosibius, who is clever at solving problems, quotes the hexameters (as above): 'Another had with difficulty moved the cup from the table when it was full, but Nestor, that old man, raised it easily,' and then writes, exactly in these words: 'To-day the charge is brought against the Poet that, whereas he said all others raised the cup with difficulty, Nestor alone did it without difficulty. And it did seem unreasonable that, in the presence of Diomedes and Ajax, to say nothing of Achilles, Nestor should be represented as more vigorous than they, though he was more advanced in years. From these criticisms, then, we can absolve the Poet by assuming the figure called anastrophe."⁵ That is, from this (second) hexameter, "when it was full, but Nestor, that old man, raised it without difficulty," we shall remove the word "old man" from the middle of the verse and place it at the beginning of the first line after "another," and construe the words at the beginning thus: "Another old man had with difficulty moved it from the table when it was full, but Nestor raised it without labour." With the words in this order, it is clear that Nestor is the only one of the old men, no matter who they were, who raised the cup without difficulty.' Thus the marvellous solver of problems, Sosibius! He is the man whom King Ptolemy Philadelphus not unwittily satirized for this famous solution and others like it. For while he was the recipient of a royal stipend, the king summoned his stewards and commanded them, whenever Sosibius came to ask for his stipend, to tell him that he had already received it. And in fact he did appear not long afterward and made his request; but they told him that they had given it to him, and would say no more; so he went to the king and complained of the stewards. Ptolemy summoned them and commanded them to fetch the rolls containing the accounts of those who received stipends; taking them in his hands the king examined them and affirmed, as the stewards had, that Sosibius had received his stipend, proving it in this way: there were the following names ^a recorded therein, Soterus, Sosigenous, Bionos, Apolloniou. Scanning them, the king said, 'Marvellous solver of problems, if you take the so from Soterus, the si from Sosigenous, the first syllable from Bionos, and the last from Apolloniou,^b you will find that you yourself have received your due according to your own fantastic notions.^c And thus, "not by others, but by thine own feathers art thou caught," as the admirable Aeschylus says,^a because you labour to invent irrelevant ^b solutions."

Holmos, a drinking-cup made in the style of a horn.^c Menesthenes in the fourth book of his Politics writes as follows ^d: "From Albatanê, a collar and a golden holmos. The holmos is a cup made in the style of a horn, in height about fourteen inches."

Oxybaphon. Common usage gives this name to the vessel made to hold vinegar; but it is also the name of a drinking-cup, which Cratinus mentions in The Flask thus ^e: "How, oh how can one stop him from his drinking, his excessive drinking? I know a way. I'll smash his pitchers, I'll come down like a thunderbolt on his jugs and grind them to powder, as well as all the rest of the vessels he uses for drinking, and he won't own even so much as a vinegar-cruet of wine any more." Antíphanes, also, clearly shows in Mystis that the oxybaphon is a kind of small, earthenware cylix, in the following lines; a bibulous old hag is singing the praises of a large cylix and rejecting with contempt the oxybaphon as being too Aristoph. Av. 808, and in sense is equivalent to "hoist with his own petard."

^b The adjective ἀπροσδιωίτους alludes to another proverb, "Nothing to do with Dionysus," the complaint of those who saw a play the plot of which seemed to have nothing in common with the Dionysiac tradition of the theatre. Plut. 615 A, Suidas ε. Οὐδὲν πρὸς τὸν Διόνυσον, Haigh, Tragic Drama, pp. 33, 41.

^c The word more commonly means a mortar; originally a cylindrical stone, H. xi. 147.

She replies: "I'll yield to you in this; for somehow the cylix has an alluring shape—O ye gods!—and is in keeping with the glory of the festival. For where we were a little while ago, we had to drink out of little earthenware cruets (oxybaphia). As for this man, my child ^b—may the gods grant many blessings—to this artist who made you, such are your beautiful proportions and your simplicity." Again, in The Babylonians of Aristophanes we shall understand the word oxybaphon as meaning a cup ^c; that is when Dionysus says of the demagogues at Athens that when he departed to face his trial they demanded of him two cruets. One cannot infer that these were anything else than drinking-cups. Also, the "cruet" set up for persons playing at kottabos, into which they pour the drops of wine, ^d cannot be anything else than a broad and shallow cup. The oxybaphon is mentioned as a cup by Eubulus also in Maid of the Mill ^e: "I measured out separately a drink in a cruet, share and share alike. But then a demurrer was put in, the wine swearing that it was

A case at law has arisen between the two, the verb ὑπόμνητρο referring to the ὑπομνοσία, or plea made on oath for postponement of a trial. Cf. Eupolis fr. 326 (Kock i. 345): οἴνου παρόντος ἕξος ἤρασθη κτείν, "he was crazy to drink vinegar when wine was to be had."

originally similar to that of the Panathenaic jars, and then it was called pelikê; but later it took on the shape of a wine-jug, such as are set before drinkers at the holiday season, in fact the kind which they once called olpai and which they used for pouring the wine into cups, as Ion of Chios says in The Sons of Eurytus ^a: 'From sacred casks ladle out the potent ^b wine with your jugs (olpai), and make it gurgle loudly.' But to-day the vessel of that type is in a manner specially consecrated and set before the drinkers only at a festival, whereas the kind that occurs in daily use has undergone a change in form, being now most like a dipper, and we call it a chous.^c" As for the term olpê, Cleitarchus says that the Corinthians, Byzantians, and Cyprians use it for lekythos,^d the Thessalians, on the other hand, for a wine-jug with spout. (Besides pelikê), there is a term pelichna, by which, Seleucus says, the Boeotians mean the cylix, but Euphronius in his Commentaries ^e explains it as a pitcher.

Pella, a vessel shaped like a skyphos,^f with a rather wide bottom, into which they did their milking. Homer ^g: "As when flies in a stall buzz around the well-filled pails (pellai) of milk." But Hipponax calls this vessel a pellis ^h: "They were drinking from a pail (pellis), since she ⁱ had no cup; for the slave-boy had fallen down and smashed it to bits"; he thus makes it clear, I think, that the pellis was not a cup, ^d Kock i. 466. Apparently a slave's report of the drinking of the Centaurs. Photius s.v. πεταχνοῦνται seems to be the only authority for the verb-form, cf. Hesych. s.v. πεταλοῦνται and critical note 4.

^e i.e. the base, though seemingly rounded, permits a certain stability; cf. Pollux x. 74, who says its base is not pointed. Some words may be lost, but ἡουχῆ is not corrupt.

^f Full-pitchers-day; Pollux loc. cit. wrongly has the singular, ἡλημοχόην.

But Xenophon, in the eighth book of his Cyropaedia,^f speaks of certain prochoïdes, writing as follows (he is giving an account of the Persians): "It was their custom that prochoïdes should not be carried to their symposia, evidently because they thought that avoidance of excessive drinking would be less likely to injure body and mind; to-day, however, though the practice of not having them carried is still continued, on the other hand they drink so much that instead of carrying them in they are themselves carried out when they can no longer stand up and walk out."

mentioned before.^a Also that it got its name from Prusias the king of Bithynia, who became notorious for luxury and effeminacy, is recorded by Nicander of Calchedon in the fourth book of his Adventures of Prusias.^b

Rheonta.^c This was a name given to certain cups. Astydamas mentions them in Hermes, saying as follows^d: "First of all, two mixing-bowls of silver, fifty phialai, ten kymbia, a dozen rheonta; of these ten were silver, two were of gold—a griffin the one, a Pegasus the other."

Rhyton. The word has a short y and is accented with an acute on the last syllable. Demosthenes in the speech Against Meidias has ^a "drinking-horns (rhyta), kymbia, and phialai." Diphilus in The Eunuch or Trooper (the play is a revised edition of The Rampart-taker) ^b: "May we not have more cups poured out, and drink still more copiously than from the Rhodiades or from the drinking-horns (rhyta)?" And Epinicus in Child-foisting Wives ^c: "A. And what is more, to-day he will be obliged to drink three of the biggest horns in existence, letting them squirt to the time of the water-clock. ^d B. Absit omen! I shudder at both. ^e A. One is an elephant ^f—B. Why, do you lead elephants about in your train? A.—holding six quarts. B. But an elephant, big as he is, couldn't drink up all that! A. Yes, he could; I myself have done it often. B. Ay, for you are as big a brute as an elephant. ^g A. And so are you! The second cup is a trireme ^h; this holds possibly three quarts." And describing the third cup he says: "A. It is Bellerophon, on the back of Pegasus, having just hurled his javelin at the fire-breathing Chimaera. All right; take this too." Now the rhyton was earlier called a horn; and it appears to have been manu-

For in her left hand the queen carries that sort of object filled with all kinds of fruit, the artists thus indicating that this horn is even richer in blessings than the horn of Amaltheia.^a Theocles mentions it in his Ithyphallic Verses thus^b: "All we artists have to-day celebrated with sacrifice the festival of Salvation^c; in their company I have drunk the double horn and am come into the presence of our dearest king.^d" Dionysius of Sinope, when giving a list of some cups in The Woman who Saved, mentioned also the rhyton, as I have said before.^e And Hedyllus in his Epigrams, mentioning the rhyton made by the engineer Ctesibius, says^f: "Come hither, ye drinkers of strong wine, look also at this rhyton in the temple of Arsinoë the Gracious, lover of the West Wind^g: it is in the form of the Egyptian Besas,^h the dancer, who trumpets forth a shrill note when the spout is opened for the flowing wine—no signal for battle is this, but through the golden mouthpiece^a there rings the signal for revelling and mirth; it is like the ancestral melody which the Lord Nile produced from the divine waters, dear to the initiates who bring him their offerings. Nay then, if ye will honour this clever device of Ctesibius, come hither, young men, beside the temple of Arsinoë here." Theophrastus in his treatise On Drunkenness says^b that the cup called the rhyton is rendered only to the Heroes. Dorotheus of Sidon says that the rhyta are like horns, but have a hole bored in them,^c and from them, as the liquid is discharged in a slender stream, people drink at the lower end, and so they have got their name from this flowing (rhyxis).

^b Frag. 122 Wimmer, above, 461 b (p. 10). The rhyton often contained fruits (ἄρατα above, 497 c), which were appropriate offerings to heroes, Plat. Critias 116 c. For the gods other cups, especially the phialē, were used.

^c At the pointed end. Dorotheus is usually spoken of as a citizen of Ascalon.

Sannakra. Crates, in the fifth book of his work On the Attic Dialect, says that there is a cup so called. It is Persian. Philemon, after mentioning batiakai^d in The Widow and joking at the ridiculous nature of the word, says^e: "Sannakra, horse-goat-stags, batiakia, sannakia!"

Seleukis. That this cup got its designation from King Selencus has been stated before^f; the fact is recorded also by Apollodorus of Athens.^g And Polemon, in the first book of his Addresses to Adaeus, mentions^h as cups resembling each other the Seleukis, Rhodies, and Antigonis.

Skyphos. Some authorities pronounce the genitive of this word with an s^b under all circumstances, but wrongly; for when the word skyphos (ὁ σκύφος) is masculine, like lychnos,^c we shall pronounce it (in the genitive) without the s, but when it is neuter (τὸ σκύφος) we shall decline it with the s, skyphos, skyphous, like teichos, teichous.^d The Athenians give the nominative case sometimes as masculine (ὁ σκύφος), sometimes as neuter (τὸ σκύφος). Moreover Hesiod, in the second book of The Epic of Melampus, says skypphos, with p^e: "To him came Maris, the nimble messenger, through the hall, and filling a silver cup (skypphos), brought it and gave it to his lord." And again Hesiod says^f: "Thereupon Mantis grasped a thoug of ox-hide in his hands, but Iphiclus laid hold of his back. Then up from behind him came Phylacus, holding a cup (skypphos) in one hand, with the other raising his staff, and spake amongst his henchmen." Likewise also Anaximander in his Tale of Heroes, speaking as follows^g: "Amphitryon divided the booty among his allies and kept the cup (skypphos) which he had chosen for himself." And again: "Now Poseidon gave this cup (skypphos) to Teleboas, his own son, and Teleboas gave it to Pterelaüs; this he took when he sailed away." Likewise Anacreon also has the word with a p^a: "And I, with a cup (skypphos) filled to the brim, drank it out in honour of Erxion of the white crest," where "drank it out" is for "pledged." For, properly speaking, that is what pledging is, to give another a drink before oneself. So Odysseus also in Homer^b: "Placed in Arêtê's hands the double cup." And Odysseus in the Iliad^c: "Filled the cup with wine and greeted Achilles." For they filled and pledged each other with a greeting.

Panyassis, in the third book of his Epic of Heracles, says^d: "With the wine he mixed a mighty, shining mixing-bowl of gold, and taking frequent cups (skypphous) he quaffed the pleasant drink." Euripides in Eurystheus used the word skypphos as a masculine^e: "And a deep bowl." So too Achaeus in Omphalê^f: "The cup of the god invites me." And Simonides said^g: "The eared^h bowl." Ion, also, in *Omphalê*ⁱ: "There is no wine in the cup"; he has formed a peculiar dative skyphei from the nominative skypphos and em-

Epigenes, too, in The Bacchant^d: "I was glad to accept the cup." And so Phaedimus in the first book of his Epic of Heracles^e: "A broad, wooden cup of strong honeyed wine." Asclepiades of Myrlea, in his treatise On Nestor's Cup, says^g: "No dweller in a city, even in moderate circumstances, ever used a skyphos or a kissybion; it is only swineherds, shepherds, and country people who do, like Eumaeus^h: 'Filling the cup (skyphos) from which he was wont himself to drink, he gave it to him filled with wine.'" carriest a golden vessel, a mighty cup (skyphon) like those that shepherds have, and with thy hands pouring into it the milk of a lioness, thou didst mould a large solid cheese glistening white." Aeschylus, further, (has the term skyphoma) in Women of Perrhaebia ^a: "Where are my many rewards and choicest prizes? Where my cups (skyphomata) wrought in gold and silver?" And Stesichorus calls the cup used in the cave of the Centaur Pholus a skyphion depas, equivalent to "skyphos-like"; of Heracles he says ^b: "And taking the skyphos-like cup, measuring as much as three flagons, he put it to his lips and drank it — that cup which Pholus had mingled and set before him." Archippus, also, used the word skyphos as a neuter in Amphitryo.^d

Now they say that the flagon (lagynos) is the name of a measure among the Greeks,^e as are the chous and the kotylē. It contains twelve Attic kotylai. Moreover in Patrae they say there is this measure, the lagynos.^f Nicostratus uses the word as a masculine in Hecate ^g: "A. How large are our flagons of wine racked off from the casks? B. They hold three choes each."^h Again he says: "Hand us that brimming flagon." And in the play entitled The Couch ^a: "Nauseating, too, is this flagon that comes next; it's full of vinegar." So Diphilus in Safe Home ^b: "The flagon that I have, aged erone, is empty, but my meal sack is chock full." Now Lynceus of Samos in the Letter to Diagoras writes: "At the time you stayed in Samos, Diagoras, I remember that you often attended the drinking-parties at my house; at these a flagon ^c of wine, set at each man's place, was kept filled, thus allowing each to have a cup at his pleasure. ^d" But Aristotle in The Constitution of Thessaly ^e asserts that lagynos is used in the feminine gender by the Thessalians. So, too, the epic poet Rhianus in his Epigrams ^f: "This flagon, Archinus, contains exactly one-half resin from pine cones, one-half wine. And I know not the flesh of a leaner kid than this; yet Hippocrates who sent them is worthy to be praised on all accounts." On the other hand, Diphilus has it in the neuter in Brothers ^g: "Oh, that little flagon (lagynion) of burglars and sneaks, which is able to make its way into the sample-rooms ^h under an arm-pit, and to sell the stuff until,

^g Kock ii. 541; the form cited (λαγύνιον) is a diminutive, and of course neuter. The meaning of the verses is hard to see.—Alexis, Philemon, Apollodorus, Hegesippus, Euphron, and Menander also wrote plays entitled Brothers. The prologue of Terence's Adelphoe ascribes it largely to Menander, not Diphilus; yet the latter's Dying Together (Συναποθνήσκοντες) also furnished material for Terence.

^a On the ἔρανος see Athen. 362 e (vol. iv. p. 140); but what the allusion is here I know not. One may surmise that the bar-keeper (or peddler) mentioned is a bootlegger who has bought wine, much diluted, from thieves who carry it out as at a contribution-dinner,^a only one man is left, a bar-keeper cheated by a wine-seller." Now the phrase in Stesichorus's Tale of Geryonês,^b "measuring as much as three flagons," contains an ambiguity as regards the three genders.^c And Eratosthenes declares^d that petasos (hat) and stannos (wine-jar) are used as feminines by some writers.

As to the skyphos, that was named from the word skaphis.^e This latter is likewise a round wooden vessel used as a receptacle for milk and whey, as it is told in Homer^f: "And all the vessels swam with whey—the pails and the bowls—the well-wrought vessels into which he milked." But the word skyphos may be as it were for skythos, since the Scythians are in the habit of drinking to great excess. And Hieronymus of Rhodes, in his work On Drunkenness, even says^g that "to get drunk is to behave like a Scythian; for the sound of ph (as in skyphos) is related to the sound of th." In later times, by way of imitation,^h they manufactured skyphoi of clay and of silver. Of these the first to be made and to acquire repute were the so-called Boeotian skyphoi, and Heracles while on his campaigns was the first to make use of the style; hence they are also called

"Heracleotic" bowls" by some. Nevertheless when compared with other skyphoi they show a difference; for upon their handles there is the so-called Heracleian chain. The Boeotian skyphoi are mentioned by Bacchylides in the following lines, in which he addresses the Dioscuri and invites them to a feast^b: "No carcasses of oxen are there, nor gold, nor purple carpets, but a kindly heart, and a sweet Muse, and pleasant wine in Boeotian cups (skyphoi)."^c Next after the Boeotian, the Rhodian cups, so-called, were celebrated; Damocrates was the artist who made them. Third come the Syracusan. The skyphos is called by the people of Epeirus gyrtos, according to Seleucus; but by the people of Methymna, as Parmenon says in his book On Dialect, it is called skythos.^d Further, the Spartan Dercylidas was called Skyphos,^e according to Ephorus in the eighteenth book, speaking as follows^f: "The Lacedaemonians sent Dercylidas into Asia to replace Thimbron,^g hearing that the barbarians of Asia are accustomed to transact all business with deceit and cunning. Hence they sent Dercylidas, because they thought that he was least likely to be hoodwinked; for he was a man that had nothing in his character either Laconian or forthright, but on the contrary

Phialé. When Homer says,^f "He set as a prize an amphithetos phialé untouched by fire," and again,^g "A golden phialé and double-folded fat," he is not speaking of the cup known as phialé, but of a flat, basin-like vessel of bronze, probably having two handles extending from both sides.^h But Parthenius, the disciple of Dionysius, understands by amphithetos the vessel that has no stem. Similarly, Apollodorus of Athens in his little speech *On the Mixing-bowl*ⁱ says that it is the vessel that cannot be set up and supported firmly on its stem, but only on its brim. Some, on the other hand, declare that just as the vessel that can be carried by its handles on both sides is called an amphiphoreus,^j so also the amphithetos vessel gets its name.^a But Aristarchus explains that it means the vessel which can be set down on both sides, on the base or on the brim. Again, Dionysius of Thrace says that it simply means "round," the vessel that runs round (amphitheousa) in a circular shape. Asclepiades of Myrlea derives the word phialê, by the substitution of a letter, from piâlê, i.e. the vessel that supplies "drink (piein) in plenty (halis)"; for it was larger than the cup.^b Now as to the terms amphithetos and apyrotos: the latter is equivalent to "cold-forged,"^c or "never put on the fire," just as the Poet calls a cauldron in one case "made to stand on the fire," in another case "unfired"^d: "And among them (he set) a cauldron unfired, worth an ox, and embossed with flowers"—meaning perhaps a receptacle for cold water; wherefore the phialê also is like a flat vessel of bronze, containing cold water. Then as to the adjective amphithetos, are we to imagine that it means "having two bases," one at each end, or does the prefix amphi signify the same as peri, which in turn means "extraordinary"^e? On this latter theory any vessel exquisitely made would be said to be amphithetos, since the verb theinai^f was used for poiesai^g by the ancients. But it can also mean "the vessel that is set both on its stem and on its brim"; and this mode of setting the phialai is Ionic and ancient. At any rate the people of Massilia to this very day place the phialai face down.

^b i.e. Homer's phialê was larger than the cup so called.

^b “With acorn-bosses” was the meaning intended by Cratinus (see critical note 1). But the following discussion

Cratinus says in Runaway Girls ^a: "Receive these cups (phiaiai) with their acorn-bosses.^b" On this Eratosthenes in the eleventh book of his work On Comedy asserts ^c that Lycophron is ignorant of the meaning of the word; for the bosses on the phiaiai and the domed chambers ^d of the public baths are much alike; hence the joke on the shape is not without point. Apion and Diodorus both say: "A certain kind of phiaiai, the boss of which is rather like (the plug of) a drain." And Asclepiades of Myrlea, in his remarks On Nestor's Cup, says that the phiaiai are called "bath-bossed" by Cratinus because their bosses and the tholoi ^e of public baths are similar. And Didymus, though he also says ^f the same, quotes the comment of Lycophron to the following tenor ^g: "Derived from the plugs used in women's bath-tubs; it is there that they draw off the water by means of small bowls." Timarchus, too, in the fourth book On the Hermes of Eratosthenes,^h remarks: "One may regard the word as spoken in jest,ⁱ because most of the baths at Athens are built in rotunda form and have their drain-pipes in the centre, on top of which is set a plug of bronze." Ion in shows that there was a puu connecting βαλαρείον "bath" with βάλανος "acorn"; hence the reading in the text, with the explanation of Eratosthenes. The writer now turns from the Homeric phiaiê (basin) to the saucer-shaped drinking-cup with its characteristic boss.

^a Frag. 25 Strecker.

^d This meaning is given in L. & S. (ed. 1930). But it also meant a plug or valve in the water-pipes, see below.

the people of Argos and Aegina passed a law providing that no article from Attica should be brought to their sacrifices, not even a jar, but that in future drinking should be done there from pots (chytrides) of local manufacture. The Cynic Meleager^a also quotes the word, writing as follows in his Symposium: "The crisis being so great, he assigned to him a heavy task of toast-drinking, twelve deep pots (chytridia)."

So he filled this and drank it out first himself, and then commanded that it be filled for Socrates. . . . "When Archebulus^c undertook to lengthen out (the drinking-bout), the slave in the very nick of time spilled some of the beastly wine and upset the cooler." Alexis in The New Tenant says^e: "A cooler containing three half-pints." Dioxiippus in The Miser^f: "From Olympichus he got six Theracleian cups and then the two coolers." Menander in the play entitled Timbers' Holiday says^g: "That's the custom nowadays, as you know; they bawled 'Unmixed wine!' 'The big cup!' Why, pay him back, Pyrgothemis, with a word of your own, as if you were exchanging money.”^b Antiphanes in The Horsemen ^a: “A. But how, then, are we going to live? v. The saddle-cloth is our blanket, our nice helmet is our jug, as for a cooler—what would you? It’s everything! We’ve got a horn of Plenty.” And in The Carian Wailing-woman it is clearly shown that they used the cooler (psykter), pouring in the wine by means of a ladle. For after saying ^d: “He causes to be placed beside him a tripod and a jug, also a cooler of wine . . . and then gets drunk”; in the next lines he makes the drinker say ^e: “I’m going to have a stronger drink. Therefore let nobody mix the wines; no longer is it permitted, in our house, to ladle water in. Run, then, slave, and take the jug and the cup out of the room, and carry away everything else as well.” Dionysius, the disciple of Tryphon, in his Onomasticon says: “The men of old called the cooler (psygeus) a dinos.”^f But Nicander of Thyateira says that all grove-like, shady places dedicated to the gods, in which one may

And again the writer of the poem Aegimius, whether it is Hesiod or Cercops of Miletus, says^d: "There one day my place of refreshment shall be, thou ruler of the people."

Odos. Thus was called the cup, says^e Tryphon in his Nouns Substantive, which was given when the glee was sung, as Antiphanes makes clear in Twice as Much^f: "A. What, then, will be in it for the gods? B. Not a thing, unless somebody mixes it. A. Stop! Take the cup (odos). But then don't perform any of those old-fashioned glees, the 'Telamon' or the 'Paeon' or 'Harmodius.'"

Ooskyphia. Respecting the shape of these cups Asclepiades of Myrlea, in his work On Nestor's Cup, says^g that it has two stems, one fashioned at the rounded body of the cup, and another attached separately, beginning in a slender shaft, but widening out where it ends, to form the base on which the cup stands.^h

^a Diels, Vorsokratiker iii. 1. 47. Among the peculiarities of Gorgias's style was his use of extraordinary words for simple ideas (here ἐπιψακάζωσιν for “pour a little”). Xenophon's πυκνά, “frequent drops,” in contrast with μικραῖς their case also, when the god moistens them too copiously, they cannot remain upright, or even unfold in blossom at their proper seasons; but when they drink only so much as they can take pleasure in, they grow up very straight and reach the fruiting period in flourishing condition. In like manner we also, when we allow our drink to be poured out copiously for us, shall quickly lose control of our bodies and minds as well, and shall not even be able to take breath, to say nothing of being able to speak. Yet if our slaves let small drops drizzle into small cups—if I too may indulge in Gorgias-like phrases^a—we are then not violently forced into drunkenness by the wine, but are gradually led on and on until we arrive at a more playful mood.'

"When one regards these words of the noble Xenophon, he will be able to recognize the jealousy which the most illustrious Plato felt toward him, or it may be that both these gentlemen felt envious of each other from the beginning, when they came to perceive the peculiar merit each of the other; and perhaps they contended also for the chief rank, as we may infer not merely from what they have said on the subject of Cyrus, but also from those works of theirs which deal with the same topic.^b For both have written Symposia, and in them one is for banish-

And now coming to the subject of Cyrus, the one says ^f that from earliest youth he was thoroughly educated in all the traditional subjects, whereas Plato, as if in contradiction, declares in the third book of Laws ^g: 'Regarding Cyrus, I suspect that although in general he was a brave and energetic ^h commander of troops, yet he had never even so much as essayed a genuine course of training at all, or had even interested himself in any branch of household management whatever. Again, Xenophon accompanied Cyrus in his march against the Persians ⁱ with the 10,000 Greeks; he knew in detail about the treachery of the Thessalian Menon, and that Menon was himself responsible for the killing of Clearchus and his staff at the hands of Tissaphernes,^j and he plainly describes what sort of man Menon was in character, how ^b Rep. iii. and x. 595 v. Plato rejected μίμησις as the motive and essence of art, and retained διήγησις, or simple narration. The question has been often discussed, e.g. by harsh he was, and how sensual. But the noble Plato, all but saying 'That tale is not true,'^a runs through the gamut of praise in Menon's honour—Plato, who has flatly abused other people, in the Republic banishing Homer and imitative poetry (from his city)^b while he himself wrote imitative dialogues, the pattern of which he did not even invent himself. Before his time, in fact, Alexamenus of Teos had invented this type of literature, as Nicias of Nicaea and Sotion record. And Aristotle in his treatise On Poets writes as follows^c: 'Therefore we shall not deny that even the so-called Mimes of Sophron, which are not in verse, are conversations, or that the dialogues of Alexamenus of Teos, which were the first Socratic conversations to be written, are imitations,'^d and so the most learned Aristotle expressly declares that Alexamenus wrote dialogues before Plato. Plato also reviles Thrasymachus, the sophist of Chalcedon, W. C. Greene, Harvard Studies in Classical Philology, xxix. 1-75.

^c Frag. 72 Rose. Plato himself ascribes the use of dialogue to Parmenides, Soph. 217 c. Diog. Laert. iii. 48 adds another claimant in the Eleatic Zeno, but quotes also Aristotle on the authority of Favorinus. He gives the palm to Plato "for beauty and inventiveness."

^d i.e. artistic representation of life, like the mime. Both Sophron and Alexamenus have one element in common—μίμησις ἐν λόγῳ χωρὶς ἁρμονίας καὶ ῥυθμοῦ. I follow Natorp's interpretation (Pauly-Wissowa I. 1375). In Poetics 1447 b Aristotle explains that there is no common name for a mime of Sophron or Xenarchus and a Socratic conversation. See Bywater's note. Bernays (Zwei Abhandlungen, 1880, p. 83) keeps the text but changes the sentence to a question. The passage simply means that the unmetrical mimes of Sophron, admittedly works of art (μίμησις), come under the head of λόγοι, conversations (which are often not artistic), and per contra the prose conversations of Alexamenus are artistic μίμησις.

^a The name Thrasymachus means “bold fighter.” His truculence appears in Plat. Rep. 336 c, 341 c, and elsewhere, but the actual pun on the name is credited to Herodicus (Prodicus?) in Aristot. Rhet. ii. 23. 29 ἀεὶ θρασύμαχος εἰ.

^b The unfavourable description in Protagoras, Hippias Maior, Hippias Minor, and Gorgias may be exaggerations, but seem to rest on fact, at least so far as they apply to Hippias and Gorgias. On Parmenides see Plat. Parm. 127 b. The defence of the Sophists against Plato, begun in modern times by Grote, Hist. of Greece, chap. lxvii., has been carried to extremes by Gomperz and Dupréel.

^c 562 c, Athen. 433 f, 443 f (vol. iv. p. 465 note j). Apparently the author of this diatribe (Herodicus?) took evil wine-saying that he was like his name,^a as again he reviles Hippias, Gorgias, and Parmenides, and in a single dialogue, the Protagoras, many others,^b and used such terms as these in the Republic ^c: 'Whenever, I fancy, a democratic state, in its thirst for liberty, has the bad luck to get evil wine-pourers as its leaders, and has become intoxicated with strong wine.'

"It is reported that Gorgias, himself reading the dialogue named after him, remarked to his intimates, 'What nice satire Plato knows how to write!' ^d And Hermippus in his work On Gorgias says ^e: 'When ^f Gorgias arrived in Athens after dedicating the gold statue of himself at Delphi, Plato seeing him said: "Here comes our noble and golden Gorgias"; to which Gorgias replied: "Noble indeed and now is this Archilochus that Athens has produced." Others, again, say that when Gorgias read Plato's dialogue to his audience he observed that he had neither spoken any of these lines nor had he heard them from Plato.' ^g cf Gorgias fr.

pourers to refer to the Sophists, though Plato is speaking of demagogues.

^a A similar story is told of Socrates, Diog. Laert. iii. 35: Socrates hearing Plato read his Lysis cried out, "Heracles, what a heap of lies this young man tells about me!" Cf. below, 507 d (p. 278); ιαμβιζειν, says Hesychius s.v., is λοιδορεῖν, κακολογεῖν. The early iambographers were the first writers of satire; hence the mention of Archilochus ("Archilochum proprio rabies armavit iambo," Horace, A.P. 79, cf. Ep. l. 19. 23). ^b F.H.G. iii. 48.

^c So Socrates greets Hippias at the beginning of Hipp. Mai. (281 a): Ἰππίας ὁ καλὸς τε καὶ σοφός. Epicurus sarcastically turned the epithet "golden" upon Plato himself, Diog. Laert. x. 8. On the statue see Cicero, De Orat. iii. 32. 129, Val. Max. viii. 15, Pliny, N.H. xxxiii. 83. But Paus. x. 18. 7 says it was gilded.

^d Meaning, of course, from Socrates, the protagonist of the piece.

^a Wachsmuth 172, Diels iii. 1. 188. The verb and participle refer to things imagined, moulded, trumped up.

The same observation, they say, was made by Phaedo on reading the dialogue On the Soul. Hence Timon well said of him ^a: 'What portentous platitudes Plato plaited purposely!' In fact, to make Plato's Socrates converse with Parmenides is scarcely possible on account of Socrates' youth, which would have prevented him from making or listening to such a discourse.^b But the most outrageous thing of all is also to say, without any compelling need,^c that Zeno, Parmenides' fellow-citizen, was his darling. And it is also impossible for Phaedrus^d to have been a contemporary of Socrates, to say nothing of being his lover. But what is more, it is impossible also that Paralus and Xanthippus, the sons of Pericles, who died of the plague,^e should have conversed with Protagoras when he made his second visit to Athens, since they had died still earlier. Many other things, too, may be said of Plato from which one may show that he trumped up his dialogues.

"That Plato was in fact inimical toward everybody is plain also from what one reads in the dialogue entitled Ion, in which he first abuses all the poets, and then also the men promoted to power by the people,^f Phanosthenes of Andros, Apollodorus of Cyzicus, and

As to what he has said in the Symposium regarding Alcibiades, that is not even worth bringing to light in any discussion, any more than what he says in the first of the two dialogues addressed to him^e; the second Alcibiades, in fact, is said by some to be the work of Xenophon, just as The Halcyon is ascribed to Leon the Academic, according to Nicias of Nicaea. "In the Cimon^e Plato is unsparing in his accusation of Themistocles, as also of Alcibiades and Myronides, and even Cimon himself. The Crito, also, contains an invective against Crito himself, the Republic against Sophocles,^f while the Gorgias is equally critical not only of the man from whose name the title is taken, but also of Archelaüs, the king of Macedonia, of whom it is said not only that he was of shameful origin, but also that he had murdered his master.^g So this is Plato, of whom Speusippus said that he was very friendly to Philip^h and was the cause of his becoming king! At least Carystius of Pergamum in Historical Notes writes as followsⁱ: 'Speusippus, learning that Philip was uttering slanders about Plato, wrote in a letter something of this sort: "As if the whole world did not know that ^a There is not, and apparently never was, a dialogue by Plato so entitled. It is thought that the Gorgias is meant (esp. 503 c, 515 d), and the text has been altered accordingly. See critical note 5, also Theages 126 A.

^f Crito 45 A-B, Rep. 329 B?

^g Gorg. 471. Archelaüs was son of Perdiccas II and a woman who was a slave of his uncle (and therefore his master), Alcetas.

^h The mss. read: "was very friendly to Archelaüs and was the cause of Philip's becoming king." But even Herodotus could hardly have claimed a friendship between Plato and Archelaüs in view of Gorg. 471 and Alcib. II 141 d. Possibly Περδικκῆ should be read for Ἀρχελάφ (Gomperz).

Philip acquired the beginning of his kingship through Plato's agency. For Plato sent to Perdiccas^a Euphraeus of Oreus,^b who persuaded Perdiccas to portion off some territory to Philip. Here Philip kept a force, and when Perdiccas died, since he had this force in readiness, he at once plunged into the control of affairs." Now whether in fact this is really so God alone can know. But his beautiful Protagoras, besides containing invectives against numerous poets and men of wisdom, also exposes the life of Callias more theatrically than The Flatterers of Eupolis does.^c In the Menexenus it is not only Hippias of Elis that is held up to mockery, but also Antiphon of Rhamnus and the musician Lamprus.^d But the day would fail me if I should wish to proceed with all who were abused by the philosopher. Nevertheless I do not commend Antisthenes either; for he, too, abused many persons, not even abstaining from Plato himself, but giving him the vulgar appellation of Satho,^e he published the dialogue which has that title.

"Hegesander of Delphi, in his Commentaries discussing Plato's malice toward everyone, writes also these words^f: 'After the death of Socrates his intimate friends, gathered together on a certain occasion, were very despondent. Plato joined them, and taking up the cup he exhorted them not to be downcast, because he was competent to lead the

² Phaedo, though of good birth, had been taken captive and as a slave had worked in a brothel at Athens. He was

School himself, and proposed a toast to Apollodorus. But he said: "I would rather have taken the cup of poison from Socrates than this toast of wine from you." For Plato had the reputation of being jealous and having by no means a good name so far as his character was concerned. For he actually mocked at Aristippus for going to live at the court of Dionysius, although he himself had voyaged to Sicily three times: once to see the streams of lava,^a on which occasion he, in company with the elder Dionysius, risked his life, and twice to visit the younger Dionysius. Again, when Aeschines was poor and had only one pupil, Xenocrates, Plato enticed him to himself. Also he was caught in the act of instituting against Phaedo the lawsuit in which Phaedo was charged with being a slave^b; and in general, he was so constituted by nature as to have the disposition of a stepmother toward all the disciples of Socrates. Hence Socrates, on the occasion when, in the presence of several persons, he told a dream which he had had, made a guess about him not unwittily. For he said: "Methought Plato had turned into a crow and had lighted on my head, where he pecked at my bald spot and croaked as he looked all round. So I infer, Plato, that you are going to utter many lies over my head."^c But besides being malicious, Plato was eager for fame, for he said: "The last thing we put off at death itself ransomed at Socrates' instigation by Cebes (Alcibiades, Suid.), but it is intimated here that Plato, for some private grievance not explained, caused his status to be called in question. The whole affair remains very obscure (Meier n. Schömann, Att. Process ii. 624 note). Diog. Laert. ii. 31, Anl. Gell. ii. 18, Suid. s. Φαίδωρ, and Macrob. i. 11. 41, do not repeat the slander, though they tell of Phaedo's captivity.

is the tunic of fame, in our wills, in our funerals, and in our tombs"; so says Dioscurides in his Memoirs.^a When it comes to conceiving the wish to form a state and give it laws, who shall say that that is not a bad case of vanity? This is plain from what he says in the Timaeus^b: "I have a feeling as regards my Republic like that of a painter who wanted to see his creations moving and acting; just so should I like to see the citizens whom I describe."

"Now in regard to the statements in his dialogues, what can one say, really? The soul, for example, which he conceives as deathless, and which at the dissolution of the body is separated from it, is so spoken of by Homer first. For Homer has said that the soul of Patroclus 'went down to the house of Hades, bewailing its doom, leaving manhood and youth.'^c Be that as it may, even if one could affirm that the doctrine is Plato's, I cannot see what help we have got from him. For even though one concedes that the souls of the dead change into other beings, and mount upward to the higher and purer region since they share in the quality of lightness, what good does that do us? For we have neither remembrance of where we once were, nor consciousness whether we ever existed at all, and so what gratification is derived from that kind of deathlessness? Again, what results have been produced by the Laws compiled by him, or from the Republic, which is still earlier than the Laws? And yet, surely, he ought, after the model set by Lycurgus for the Lacedaemonians, by Solon for the Athenians, and by Zaleucus for the Thurians,^a in his own case also, supposing that his laws were of any use, to have induced some of the Greeks to adopt them. 'For a law,' as Aristotle says,^b 'is a definite statement, based on a common agreement in the community, indicating how things are to be done in each case.' Now as to Plato, is he not in a ludicrous position, seeing that of the three Athenians who became lawgivers and who acquired some fame, at least, Draco, Plato himself, and Solon, their fellow-citizens adopted the laws of two of them, but actually laughed at those of Plato? And the same reasoning applies also to the Republic; even supposing that this state is better than all others, if he fails to convince us of it, what good is it? It is plain, therefore, that Plato did not write his laws for actually existent men, but for those who are conceived in his imagination, so that one must seek far and wide for people who will adopt them. He ought, therefore, to have written down only those things which would win persuasion if he spoke them, and not do the same thing that people do who make pious wishes, but rather what people do who keep a hold on things which are practicable.

"Apart, then, from these considerations, if one should go through his Timaeuses and his Gorgias De Leg. ii. 6. 15), is more commonly associated with the Western Locrians, Athen. 429 (vol. iv. p. 442). On the origin of the laws of Thuri see Pauly-Wissowa iii. 2181.

and all other such dialogues, in which Plato discusses the sciences and things 'in accord with nature' and many other subjects besides, not even for this is he to be admired. For even from other authorities one may get these things said either better or not worse. Why, even Theopompus of Chios, in his Attack on Plato's School, says^a: 'One would discover that the majority of his dialogues are useless and false; and the greater number are borrowed, being taken from the discourses of Aristippus, some even from those of Antisthenes, and many also from those of Bryson of Heracleia.' Why, those speculations on mankind which he advertises and which we search for in his dialogues we fail to find; rather dinner-parties, and words spoken on the subject of Eros—very indecent, too—all of which he compiled in utter contempt of his future readers, just as most of his disciples proved to be men of tyrannical and slanderous disposition. Euphraeus,^b for example, when staying at the court of King Perdiccas in Macedonia, lorded it as regally as the king himself, though he was of low origin and given to slander; he was so pedantic in his selection of the king's associates that nobody could share in the common mess if he did not know how to practise geometry^c or philosophy. For this reason, when Philip succeeded to the throne, Parmenion seized and killed Euphraeus in Oreus, according to Carystius in Historical Notes.^d So also Callippus of Athens, another disciple of Plato, though he had been a friend and fellow-pupil of Dion, and had travelled in his company to Syracuse,^a presently observing that Dion was trying to appropriate the monarchy to himself, killed him and attempted to be tyrant himself, but was murdered. Then there was Euaeon of Lampsacus, as recorded by Eurypylyus and Dicaeocles of Cnidus in the ninety-first book of his Discourses, also by the orator Demochares in his speech as advocate in the case Sophocles versus Philon.^b He lent money to his native city, taking as security the acropolis, which he retained with the design of becoming tyrant, until the people of Lampsacus combined to resist him, and after paying back his money they threw him out. Then Timaeus^c of Cyzicus, as Demochares again says, after bestowing a largess of money and grain upon his fellow-citizens, thereby winning confidence among the Cyzicenes that he was a good man, a little while afterwards attacked their constitution through the agency of Aridaeus. He was tried, convicted, and disgraced, and although he remained in the city old and worn with age, he passed his life in dishonour. Some of the Academic philosophers of to-day are like that, living as they do wickedly and disgracefully. For after gaining possession of a fortune by sacrilege and by unnatural courses through trickery, they are now looked up to with admiration; just like Chaeron of Peilenê, who attended the lectures not only of Plato but also of Xenocrates. He too, as I was saying, ruled his native city with bitter tyranny, and not only drove out its best citizens, but also bestowed upon their slaves the property of their masters, and forced the masters' wives into wedlock with the slaves; these were the beneficial results he derived from the noble Republic and from the lawless Laws!

"Hence, also, the comic poet Ehippus in Shipwrecked has satirized Plato in person, as well as some of his disciples, for acting as venal informers, indicating that they adorned themselves sumptuously, and that they exercised more care to secure an elegant appearance than the rakes of our own day. He says^a: "Then up rose a smart^b young fellow, with a smattering of Plato—one of the small-coin-seizing-Bryson-Thrasymachus^c gentry from the Academy; smitten by penury, he had joined the school of lucrative words, and had a faculty for considered speech; well trimmed with scissors^d was his crop of hair, well did he let his beard grow down to uncut depths, well was

ALEXIS in Tyndareos, friend Timocrates,^a says^b :
 " I think you must be a man from Cyrene ; for over there, if a host invites one man to dinner, eighteen others turn up, besides ten chariots and fifteen pairs of horses ; you have to pour in food for all these, so that it would have been best not even to invite a soul." And in my own case, too, it would have been best to keep silence, and not heap other subjects upon the great number of things that I have said before ; but since you are very insistent in your demand for the promised discourse on those persons who made themselves notorious for their luxury, and on their way of enjoying life, (I will proceed).^c

Now the act of enjoyment, of course, is associated first with desire, and then with satisfaction.^d And yet the poet Sophocles, a man devoted to enjoyment, avoided finding fault with his old age by ascribing to self-control his failing powers in the enjoyment of ^a Plat. Rep. 329 c. The words "and yet" at the beginning of the sentence introduce the opposite phase of the matter, that freedom from desire may itself be a satisfaction.

^b An example of the allegorical method of interpreting the poets, in vogue from the days of Theagenes of Rhegium to the Renaissance, and later (cf. Plat. Rep. 378 D). A σύγκρισις was a trial or debate, very common in mediaeval sexual love, declaring that he was glad to be freed at last from it, as from a savage master.^a And I for one affirm also that the Judgement of Paris, as told in poetry by the writers of an older time, is really a trial of pleasure against virtue.^b Aphrodite, for example—and she represents pleasure—was given the preference, and so everything was thrown into turmoil. I think, too, that our noble Xenophon invented the story of Heracles and Virtue with the same motive.^c For according to Empedocles^d: “Nor had they any War-god, or Battle-din, nor was Zeus their king, nor Cronus, nor Poseidon, but Cypris only was their queen. Her that folk appeased with pious offerings—painted animals^e and richly-scented salves,^f with sacrifices of pure myrrh and fragrant frankincense, while they poured upon the ground libations from the yellow honeycomb.”^g Menander, also, speaking in The Harper of someone playing a musical instrument times, in which different qualities are compared, as in the Choice of Heracles, below.

^a Xen. Mem. ii. 1. 21-34, ascribed to Prodicus (below, 544 d, p. 466). The Judgement of Paris appeared first in The Cyprian Lays, a poem of the epic cycle (above, p. 113 and note d, Hdt. ii. 117).

^b Diels, *Vorsokr.*² i. 271; the people of the Golden Age are meant.

^c Of dough, cf. Diog. Laert. viii. 53, Athen. 3 c (vol. i. p. 12), Suidas s. βούς ἐβδουός, Hdt. ii. 47; a pious fraud to avoid shedding the blood of real animals, Porphyry. De Abst. ii. 21, Eisler in Archiv f. Religionswissenschaft xiii. 625. Cypris in Empedocles was the principle of love or attraction in the universe, and not, as Athenaeus says, the goddess of pleasure.

^f Salves, like incense, were often used to keep off evil spirits.

And yet some people say that pleasure is ordained by nature, because all living things are slaves to it,^b as if cowardice and fear and other feelings as well did not exist in all alike, though they are discountenanced by those who follow reason. And so to pursue pleasures recklessly is to hunt pain.^c This is why Homer, desiring to represent pleasure as reprehensible, declares that even the highest gods are in no wise protected by their own power, but receive the greatest injuries if they are misled by pleasure. For all the plans that Zeus made for the Trojans as he lay awake were upset when day came because he was overmastered by pleasure.^d Even Ares, the most doughty of all, was bound hand and foot by Hephaestus, the weakest of all, and was condemned to shame and a fine because he gave himself up to unreasoning amours. One ^e says to the gods, at least, when they come to look at him in his bonds: "Evil deeds thrive not; the slow catches the swift, since even Hephaestus, slow though he is, hath overtaken Ares, though swiftest of the gods that hold Olympus—he, the lame one, by his arts; therefore Ares owes him ransom."^f Still, no one speaks of the life of Aristides ^g as pleasurable, but only the life of Sindyrides the

Nor do they call the life of Agesilaus, king of Sparta, one of pleasure, but rather, perhaps, that of Ananis,^d though he remains so obscure so far as reputation goes ; nor that of the demigods who fought against Troy,^e but much more the life of the men of to-day. And this with good reason. For life in earlier times was lacking in equipment,^f and as it were undiscovered,^g since there was no free intercourse, and the arts had not been brought to perfection ; the life of our own day, on the other hand, is equipped with everything conducive to ease, enjoyment, and amusements in general."

Plato says in the Philebus^h : " Pleasure is the greatest humbug in the world. As report goes, in the indulgence of sexual pleasures, which are regarded as the keenest, even an act of perjury receives pardon from the gods, because, like children, our pleasures possess not the slightest reasoning power. ⁱ" And in the eighth book of the Republic Plato again is the first to give an example of the celebrated saying of the Epicureans,^a that "of the desires, some are natural and necessary, others, though natural, are not necessary, while still others are neither natural nor necessary"; he writes as follows^b: "Must not, then, the desire of eating to the point of health and fit condition, that is, the desire of just food and a relish, be a necessary desire? The desire of food, of course, is necessary in two ways, in so far as it is good for us, and in so far as it is capable of causing our lives to stop^c?—Yes.—But the desire of a relish is necessary in so far as it affords aid to securing a condition of fitness?—Quite so.—What then? The desire which goes beyond these things, for other kinds of edibles than these,—the desire which, if strictly controlled from youth up, is capable in many cases of being got rid of,—as harmful to the body and harmful to the soul in its pursuit of wisdom and self-control,—must not that desire rightly be called unnecessary?—Nay, most rightly."

Heraclides of Pontus in his work On Pleasure has this to say^d: "Tyrants and kings, being in control of the good things of life, and having had experience of them all, put pleasure in the first place, since pleasure makes men's natures more lordly. All persons, at any rate, who pay court to pleasure and choose a life of luxury are lordly and magnificent, like the Persians and the Medes. yet they are the bravest and most lordly of the barbarians. Indeed, to have pleasure and luxury is a mark of the freeborn; it eases their minds and exalts them; but to live laborious lives is the mark of slaves and of men of low birth; hence their very natures also become contracted. And so the city of Athens, as long as it enjoyed luxury, was very great and reared men who were very lordly and proud. For they wrapped themselves in cloaks dyed in purple, they put on embroidered tunics, they bound up their hair in topknots and wore golden cicadas on their forehead and temples^a; their slaves carried folding stools for them so that they should not sit as chance might have it.^b Such, then, were the men who won the battle of Marathon, the only people who overcame the power of all Asia. Even the wisest men, Heracleides says, they who enjoy the highest reputation for wisdom, recognize pleasure as the highest good, Simonides, for example, saying^c: 'What life among mortals is desirable without pleasure, or what lordly power? Without this not even the life of the gods is enviable.' And Pindar, admonishing Hieron, the ruler of Syracuse, says^d: 'Nor let thy joy grow dim while thou hast life; for joyful life, be sure, is best by far for man.' Homer, also, asserts that joy and merry-making are a more gracious end,^a "when feasters listen to a bard, and the tables beside them are laden." Of the gods he says that they live at ease^b (that is, without toil), as if to indicate that the greatest evil is hardship and toil in living."

This is why, also, Megacleides blames^c the poets later than Homer and Hesiod who say of Heracles that he was the leader of armies and the taker of cities: "For he passed his life among men in the enjoyment of the greatest pleasure, marrying very many women, begetting children from very many maidens clandestinely." One may say in answer to those who refuse to accept these traditions: "How does it come about, sirs, that you ascribe to him his devotion to food,^d or how did the custom come among men, that not a drop should be left in the libation-cup to him, if he did not approve of sensual pleasures? or why are all men agreed that the warm baths which appear out of the earth are sacred to Heracles,^e or why are people in the habit of calling soft bedding 'Heracles's beds' if he despised those who live in pleasure?" It is this hero, Megacleides says, whom the more recent poets dress up in the guise of a highwayman wandering about alone, carrying club and lion-skin and bow; the first to conceive this was Stesichorus of Himera. Yet the lyric poet Xanthus, who was older than Stesichorus, as the latter testifies himself,^a according to Megacleides, does not put this garb on Heracles, but rather that which Homer gives him. Many of Xanthus's poems have been copied by Stesichorus, as, for instance, that called The Oresteia. Antisthenes, too, alleged that pleasure is a good, but he added the qualification that it must be such as not to be repented of.^b

Now Homer's Odysseus seems to have led the way in showing Epicurus his much-talked-of pleasure, for he says^c: "As for me, I say that there is no more perfect grace than when joy reigns throughout the whole people, and feasters in the halls listen to a bard as they sit in order, and the tables beside them are laden with bread and meats, and a wine-pourer, drawing the wine from the mixing-bowl, offers it and pours it into the cups. This seems to my sense the fairest thing in the world." But Megacleides says that Odysseus was only deferring to the exigencies of the moment, in order to appear to be in sympathy with the manners of the Phaeacians, when he accepted their effeminacy, because he had previously heard Alcinoüs say^d: "Ever to us is the feast dear, the harp and dances, raiment oft changed, warm baths, and the love-couch." Only in this way did he expect to get what he hoped from them.^e Of similar character is the man who exhorts the boy named Amphilocheus^a: "Ah, my child, make thy mind most like the skin of the creature which lives among the rocks of the sea,^b in all the cities where thou resortest; give thy willing approval to him who is with thee, changing thy thought with each change of place." Likewise also Sophocles says in his Iphigeneia^c: "Be minded, as the polyp changes its body to the colour of a rock, so to turn thyself before a man whose thought is true." So Theognis^d: "Hold fast to the ways of the tangled polyp." And some say that Homer is of this opinion, because he often puts the life of pleasure above the good life, saying^e: "Now the gods, seated beside Zeus, were holding assembly on the golden floor, and in the midst the lady Hebe poured out to them their nectar, while they with golden cups pledged one another." And Menelaus, again, says in Homer^f: "And no other thing would have separated us in our love and joy in each other." Again^g: "We sat feasting on abundant meat and sweet wine." This is why Odysseus at the court of Alcinoüs assumes luxury and lust to be the "end" of life.^h

^b Cf. the Hebrew Susanna, "lily," and Athen. 689 d. Susa is Shushan (in Nehemiah i. 1 "the palace"). It is tempting to read ἐκείνων for Ἑλλήνων, giving a clearer meaning: "susan in their language is the lily." See the list of royal residences in How and Wells, Herodotus ii. 20-21.

The first men in history to become notorious for luxurious living were the Persians, whose kings wintered in Susa and summered in Ecbatana. (Now Susa was so called, according to Aristobulus and Chares,^a because of the beauty of its situation; for susson is what in the Greek language is called krinon or lily.^b) In Persepolis they spend the autumn, and in Babylon the remaining portion of the year. So also the Parthian kings live in springtime at Rhagae, but they winter at Babylon, (and pass) the rest of the year (in Hecatompylus).^c The very badge of rank which the Persian kings placed on their heads certainly was not calculated to hide their indulgence in luxury. For, as Dinon says^d: "It was made of myrrh and what is called labyzos. The labyzos is fragrant, and more costly than myrrh. Whenever the king descended from his chariot, Dinon says, he never leaped down, although the distance to the ground was small, nor did he lean on anyone's arms; rather, a golden stool was always set in place for him, and he descended by stepping on this; and the king's stool-bearer attended him for this purpose." "And so three hundred women watch over him,"

^c Strabo xi. 514. In Diodor. xvii. 75 Hecatompylus is described as a rich city offering every opportunity for enjoyment.

^d F.H.G. ii. 92. Hesychius s. κιδάρις variously defines the thing here described as a tiara, a skull-cap, a band round the head. The word λάβυζος occurs only here; what spice is meant is unknown. The inexact κατεσκενάζετο can only be interpreted as meaning that the turban or tiara built up, as it were, on the king's head, was richly scented with the two spices. For similar cases of obscure phrasing where spices are mentioned see above, 464 c-d (p. 24) and 3 c (vol. i. p. 12).

^a F.H.G. ii. 95, cf. Athen. 145 a (vol. ii. pp. 160 ff.). Athen. 557 b, quoting Dicaearchus, says that Darius III. was accompanied in battle by 360 concubines.

Heracleides of Cumae records^a in the first book of his Persian History. "These sleep throughout the day in order to stay awake at night, but at night they sing and play on harps continually while the lamps burn; and the king takes his pleasure of them as concubines^b . . . through the court of the Apple-bearers. These formed his bodyguard, and all of them were Persians by birth, having on the butts of their spears golden apples, and numbering a thousand, selected because of their rank from the 10,000 Persians who are called the Immortals.^c Through their court also the king would go on foot, Sardis carpets, on which no one else but the king ever walked, having been spread on the ground.^d And when he reached the last court he would mount his chariot, or sometimes his horse; but he was never seen on foot outside the palace. Even when he went hunting his concubines went out with him. The throne on which he sat in transacting business was of gold, and round it stood four short posts of gold studded with jewels, and on them was stretched an embroidered cloth of purple."

Clearchus of Soli, in the fourth book of his Lives, after speaking of the luxury of the Medes and saying that because of it they had made eunuchs of many neighbouring tribes, proceeds to add^e that the practice of "apple-bearing" was taken over by the Persians from the Medes not only in revenge for what they had suffered, but also as a reminder of what depths of degradation the luxury of the bodyguards had reached. For their immoderate and at the same time senseless luxury of life, it is plain, can turn even men armed with lances into beggars.^a Going on, Clearchus writes^b: "To those, at any rate, who supplied him with any delicacy he gave prizes for the invention, yet when he served these dainties he did not sweeten them by bestowing special honours, but preferred to enjoy them all alone, showing his sense!^c This, I think, is in fact the proverbial, 'A morsel for Zeus' and at the same time for the king." Chares of Mitylene in the fifth book of his History of Alexander says:^d "The Persian kings reached such a pitch of luxury that near the royal bed, beyond the head of it, was a chamber large enough to contain five couches,^e wherein were stored 5000 talents of gold coin filling the whole, and it was called the royal cushion. At the foot was a second, three-couch chamber, containing 3000 talents in silver money, and called the royal footstool. And in the bed-chamber a golden vine, jewel-studded, extended over the bed." Now Amyntas in his Itinerary says^f that this vine had clusters composed of the costliest jewels. Not far from it was ^a The obscure text should not be changed, for Clearchus wrote in a tortuous style, cf. 157 c-d (vol. ii, p. 214) and below, 515 e. "Special honours" would consist in inviting others to partake, as Cyrus the Younger did, Xen. Anab. i. 9. 25, Athen. 784 d (p. 54). For the meaning of ἐτέρας, "different," cf. Aesch. Agam. 151 θυσίαν ἐτέραν, "extraordinary sacrifice" (of Iphigeneia), and below, 515 c, ἐτέρας σκιάδας. The last phrase is ironical: yet see 529 d. The proverb Διὸς ἐγκέφαλος, "a delicious morsel fit for Zeus," recurs Athen. 642 f. Here it is expanded to include the king.

^a The meaning of this affected phraseology seems to be: the Persian kings caused their bodyguards, composed of Persian nobles (see above in c), to assume the apple-ornament in order to remind the subjugated Medes of their former splendour, and thus punish them for their former oppression of the Persians. The Medes had through luxury become like the emasculated priests of Cybele, the mendicant ἀγύρται, cf. Plat. Rep. 364 v.

Cf. below. 529 d (p. 388).

"F.H.G. iv. 289. The "golden water" is the Choaspes river, Athen. 45 b (vol. i. p. 194), "regia lympha Choaspes," Tibull. iv. I. 140, so called from its purity. Cf. II. xxi. 130, ἀργυροδίνης, "with silver eddies."

set up a golden mixing-bowl, the work of Theodorus of Samos. Agathocles, in the third book of his work On Cyzicus, says^a that in Persia there is also water called "golden." This water consists of seventy bubbling pools, and none may drink of it save only the king and his eldest son; if anyone else drinks it, the penalty is death.

Xenophon, in the eighth book of his Cyropaedia, says^b: "In those days they still retained the discipline derived from the Persians, and the Medes' luxury in dress. But to-day, while they allow the sturdiness derived from the Persians to pass into extinction, they preserve the effeminacy of the Medes. I wish now to explain the extent of their self-indulgence. In the first place, they are no longer content with having their couches merely covered with soft mattresses, but they proceed to set the feet of the beds on carpets in order that the hard floor may not offer resistance, and that the carpets may give a yielding effect. What is more, not only have none of the things cooked for the table which were invented in earlier times been taken from them, but they also constantly devise other novelties besides; the same is true also of fancy dishes; for they possess slaves who are inventive in both these branches.^c Again, in the wintry season they are not satisfied with having heads, bodies, and feet protected,^d but they also cover the extremities of their hands with thick gloves and finger-sheaths. In summer, too, the shade of trees or rocks does not

In succeeding paragraphs Xenophon also says of them ^a: "But to-day they have more coverings on their horses than on their couches; for they care not so much for horsemanship as for having a soft mount. Even the door-keepers, the bakers, the cooks, the wine-pourers, the waiters who serve at table and remove the dishes, the servants who put them to bed and wake them up, and the beauty-specialists who paint their eyes for them and rub them with cosmetics and do other things to put them into proper shape ^b . . ."

The Lydians went so far in wanton luxury that they were the first to sterilize women, as recorded by Xanthus of Lydia, or whoever is the author of the histories ascribed to him—it is Dionysius Scytobrachion, according to Artemon of Cassandreia in his work On the Collecting of Books,^c who, however, ignores the fact that the historian Ephorus ^d mentions Xanthus as being older and as having supplied sources for Herodotus—anyhow, Xanthus says ^e in the second book of his Lydian History that Adramytes, the king of Lydia, was the first to spay women and employ them in the place of male eunuchs.^f And Clearchus in the fourth book of his Lives says ^g: "The Lydians in their luxury laid out parks, making them like gardens, and so lived in the shade, because they thought it more luxurious not to have the rays of the sun fall upon them at all. And proceeding further in their insolence they would gather the wives and maiden daughters of other men into the place called, because of this action, the Place of Chastity,^a and there outrage them. And finally, after becoming thoroughly effeminate in their souls, they adopted women's ways of living, whence this way of life earned for them a woman tyrant, one of those who had been outraged, named Omphialé; she was the first to begin that punishment of the Lydians which they deserved. For the fact that they were ruled with outrage by a woman is a proof of their own violence.^b Being, then, herself a woman of unbridled passions, and avenging herself for the outrages previously done to her, she gave in marriage to the slaves of the city the maiden daughters of the slave-masters, in the very place in which she had been outraged by them; into this place, then, she forcibly collected the women, and made the mistresses lie with their slaves. Hence the Lydians, glossing over the malignity of the deed by a euphemism, call the place Sweet Embrace.^c But it is not merely the women of Lydia who were allowed free range among all comers, but also those of the Western Locrians,^d also those of Cyprus and of all tribes in general which dedicated their daughters to prostitution; these cases seem to be, in point of fact, a reminder of some ancient outrage and revenge. It was to gain revenge that one of the Lydian

^b Of the fate of Omphalè in this Lydian myth we learn nothing; see Roscher, Lex. d. griech. u. röm. Mythologie, s. "Omphale," 881. Art and literature after Alexander knew of an exchange of garments between Omphalè and Heracles (not Midas), she assuming the hero's club and lion-skin, he clad in saffron robe, with plaited hair like a woman's. Note the curious masculine form Ὀμφάλος in C.

^c See 160 b, where καρικῶν should perhaps be read, nobles, who had been oppressed by the rule of Midas over them, attacked him, since Midas in effeminate luxury lay in his purple robes, or helped the women at their looms to work the wool, while Omphalé slew all the strangers who had lain with her; so the nobleman punished them both; Midas, who had become deaf through his stupidity, he pulled by the ears,^a because by his lack of sense he had acquired the name of the most senseless animal in the world; and as for Omphalé^b . . ."

The Lydians were also the first to invent the spiced gravy called karykê,^c on the preparation of which the compilers of works entitled Art of Cookery have given directions—Glaucus of Locris, Mithaecus, Dionysius,^d also the two natives of Syracuse named Heracleides, and Agis, Epacnetus, and Dionysius,^e again Hegesippus, Erasistratus, Euthydemus, and Crito; in addition to these, Stephanns, Archytas, Acestius,^f Acesias,^g Diocles,^h and Philistion.ⁱ Such is the number, I know, of those who wrote works called Art of Cookery. In fact he lives always in the palace,^a spending his life in luxury and expensive outlay, and never does even the least thing, in his own person, nor does he consort with many; but delegates men to act as judges; and if a man thinks that they have given an unjust verdict, there is a window in the highest part of the palace, and this is fastened by a chain. So the man who thinks he has been unjustly convicted seizes the chain and jerks at the window; when the king perceives it he calls the man in and judges the case himself. And if it transpires that the judges have given an unjust verdict, they are put to death; if the reverse, the man who moved the window is executed. The daily disbursements for the king and his wives and friends are said to reach the sum of fifteen Babylonian talents.^b

Among the Etruscans, who had become extravagantly luxurious, Timæus records^c in his first book that the slave girls wait on the men naked. And Theopompus in the forty-third book of his Historiæ says^d that it is customary with the Etruscans to share their women in common; the women bestow great care on their bodies and often exercise even with men, sometimes also with one another; for it is no disgrace for women to show themselves naked. Further, they dine, not with their own husbands, but with any men who happen to be present, and they pledge with wine any whom they wish. They are also terribly bilulous, and are very good-looking. The Etruscans rear all the babies that are born, not knowing who is the father in any single case. These in turn pursue the same mode of life as those who have given them nurture, having drinking parties often and consorting with all the women. It is no disgrace for Etruscans to be seen doing anything in the open, or even having anything done to them; for this also is a custom of their country. And so far are they from regarding it as a disgrace that they actually say, when the master of the house is indulging in a love affair, and someone inquires for him, that he is undergoing so-and-so, openly calling the act by its indecent name. When they get together for companionship or in family parties they do as follows: first of all, after they have stopped drinking and are ready to go to bed, the servants bring in to them, the lamps being still lighted, sometimes female prostitutes, sometimes very beautiful boys, sometimes also their wives; and when they have enjoyed these, the servants then introduce lusty young men, who in their turn consort with them. They indulge in love affairs and carry on these unions sometimes in full view of one another, but in most cases with screens set up round the beds; the screens are made of latticed wands, over which cloths are thrown. Now they consort very eagerly, to be sure, with women; much more, however, do they enjoy consorting with boys and striplings. For in their country these latter are very good-looking, because they live in luxury and keep their bodies smooth. In fact all the barbarians who live in the west remove the hair ^a of their bodies by means of pitch-plasters and by shaving with razors. Also, among the Etruscans at least, many shops are set up and artisans arise for this business, corresponding to barbers among us. When they enter these shops, they offer themselves unreservedly, having no modesty whatever before spectators or the passers-by. This custom is also in use even among many of the Greeks who live in Italy; they learned it from the Samnites and Messapians. In their luxury, the Etruscans, as Aleimus records,^b knead bread, practise boxing, and do their flogging to the accompaniment of the flute.

The tables also of the Sicilians are notorious for luxury; these people say that the very sea on their coasts is sweet, so much do they enjoy the foods that come out of it; so says Clearchus in the fifth book of his Lives.^c Why need one even speak of the Sybarites? Among them, first of all peoples, the water-carriers and attendants who poured water were brought into the baths with shackles on their feet to prevent them from walking too fast and scalding the bathers in their haste. The Sybarites were also the first to forbid noise-producing crafts from being established within the city, such as blacksmiths, carpenters, and the like, their object being to have their sleep undisturbed in any way; it was not permitted even to keep a rooster inside the city.^d

^a In Greece, however, this was usually done by singeing; cf. Aristoph. Theam. 215 ff., Eccl. 13.

^c Athen. 138 d (vol. ii. p. 132).

^d This word, skopaioi (see critical note 4), and the following, stilpones, occur only here. It has been explained as referring to dwarfs, the word for which is ordinarily vānos, and which has been mentioned in the preceding ἀνθρωπάρια μικρά.

Concerning them Timaeus records ^a that once upon a time a man of Sybaris, going into the country, saw the farmers digging, and he told his friends that the sight had given him a rupture; one of those who heard him answered, "Listening to your story has given me also a pain in my side." In Croton an athlete was digging up the soil ^b on which the games took place when some Sybarites who were standing by expressed their surprise that, possessing a city of such importance, they yet had no slaves to dig up the wrestling-ground for them. And another Sybarite who went to Sparta was invited to their commons, and as he lay on the wooden benches and ate with them he remarked that he had always before been astounded to hear of the Spartans' courage, but now that he had seen them he did not think they were in any respect superior to other peoples. For the most cowardly man in the world would prefer to die rather than endure living that sort of life. ^c

It was customary also among the Sybarites for the boys, until they reached the age of young manhood, to wear purple cloaks and have their hair tied up in braids secured by gold ornaments. Another national custom arising from their luxurious habits was to keep tiny manikins and owlish jesters, ^d as Timaeus says,

But kai shows that a new category is introduced, and σκωπαῖοι may have reference to their owl-like faces (σκώπες), Athen. 391 c, or (less likely) to their scurrilous jests (σκώπτω). Cf. also the dance called σκώψ and σκώπευμα, Athen. 629 f. Kaibel read σπάδωνας, "eunuchs," for στειλπωνας, comparing 519 b and the well-known riddle of Panarces, Plat. Rep. 479 c and Schol., Athen. 452 c (vol. iv. p. 550). But in that case ἀνδράσιν would have been used below, 519 b, not ἀνθρώποις. There is no question of eunuchs here. The word probably refers to a dwarfish buffoon (cf. English "buff," now obsolete, "to make faces").

the men called in some communities stilpones; also Melitè lap-dogs, which accompany them even to the gymnasia. To these and men like them Massinissa, the king of the Mauretians, made an answer recorded by Ptolemy in the eighth book of his Commentaries ^a; they wanted to buy up a large number of monkeys, but he said to them: "In your country, sirs, don't the women bear babies?" For Massinissa delighted in babies and kept the children of his sons—he had many—as also those of his daughters, in his own house. And he reared them all himself until they were three years old; after that he sent them back to their parents, and others took their places. The comic poet Enbulus said the same thing in his Graces thus ^b: "For how much better, I ask you, for a human being to bring up a human being provided he have the means, than a splashing, quacking goose, or a sparrow, or a monkey, always plotting mischief!" And Athenodorus in his book On Jest and Earnest says ^c that Archytas of Tarentum, who was at once statesman and philosopher, and who owned many slaves, always delighted in having them ^d let loose in the dining-room when he was at meals. The Sybarites, on the contrary, took delight in Melitè puppies and human beings who were less than human. ^e

The Sybarites, besides, wore clothes made of Milesian wool^a; and it was from these things that friendships also arose between States, as Timæus records.^b For they came to like the Etruscans among the people of Italy, while among the people of the East they liked the Ionians, because both were devoted to luxury. The horsemen of the Sybarites, more than 5000 strong,^c paraded with saffron-coloured coats^d over their breastplates, and in summer their young men journeyed to the grottoes of the Nymphs on the Lusias river^e and there spent the time in every form of luxury. Whenever the wealthy among them went for a vacation^f to the country they took three days to finish the one-day journey, although they travelled in carriages. Further, some of their roads leading into the country were roofed over. Most of them own wine-cellars near the seashore, into which the wines are sent through pipes from their country-estates; part of it is sold outside the country, part of it, again, is carried over to the city in boats. They also hold many public banquets at frequent intervals, and they reward with golden crowns the men^g who have striven brilliantly for honours, and publish their names at the State sacrifices and games, proclaiming not so much their loyalty to the State as their service in providing dinners; on these occasions they crown even the cooks who have most skilfully concocted the dishes served. Among the Sybarites were also devised tubs in which they lay and enjoyed vapour baths.^a They, too, were the first to invent chamber-pots, which they carried to their drinking-parties.^b Ridiculing those who travelled away from their native cities, they prided themselves in their turn on having grown to old age at the bridges of their two rivers.^c

An important reason for their prosperity would seem to have resulted from the country they lived in,^d since the sea that stretches beside it affords no harbour, and so practically all the produce is consumed by the natives; and besides the situation of their city, the oracle which came from the god seems to have aided in provoking them all to excessive luxury, and to have caused them to adopt a life of loose indulgence beyond all measure. Their city lying, as it does, in a hollow, in summer enjoys very great coolness in the morning and evening, but at noon it has intolerable heat; hence most of them thought that drinking-houts contributed greatly to health; whence also it came to be said that anyone in Sybaris who did not wish to die before his allotted time must look neither upon the rising nor the setting sun.^e Now they once sent men, one of whom was Amyris, to the temple of the god to consult the oracle, because they wanted to learn how long they should enjoy prosperity. The Pythian priestess replied: "Happy, thou Sybarite, all happy shalt thou ever be in thy abundance, whilst honouring the race of them that live for ever. But whensoever thou hold a mortal man in awe rather than a god, then shall war and civil strife come upon thee." When they heard this they concluded that the god meant they would never stop living in luxury; for they did not think they would ever honour a human being more than a god. Well, the change in their fortunes came about when a man was flogging one of his slaves, and continued flogging him again after he had fled for refuge to the sanctuaries; but when, finally, he ran to the tomb of his master's father, the master let him go, out of reverence. And they were exhausted by an eager rivalry among themselves in self-indulgence, and the whole community also contended with all other States in luxury. And so, not long afterward, when many signs of their impending ruin came to them, concerning which there is no pressing need to speak now, they were destroyed.^a

To such a point had they carried their luxurious refinement that they had even trained their horses to dance at their feasts to the accompaniment of pipes. Now the people of Croton knew this when they made war on the Sybarites, as Aristotle

records ^a in his account of their Constitution, and struck up ^b the dance tune for the horses; for they had with them pipers in military uniform; and no sooner did the horses hear the pipers than they danced away, ^c and not only that, but with their riders on their backs they deserted to the people of Croton. The same story is recorded ^d also of the people of Cardia by Charon of Lampsæus in the second book of his Annals, writing as follows: "The Bisaltians took the field against Cardia and won the victory. Naris was leader of the Bisaltians. He, when a child, had been sold in Cardia, and after serving as a slave to a Cardian had become a barber. Now the Cardians had an oracle that the Bisaltians would come against them, and they would often talk about it as they sat in the barber-shop. ^e So Naris, escaping from Cardia to his native land, put the Bisaltians in readiness to attack the Cardians, and was appointed leader by the Bisaltians. All the Cardians had schooled their horses to dance at their drinking-parties to the accompaniment of the pipes, and rising on their hind legs and, as it were, gesticulating with their front feet, they would dance, being thoroughly accustomed to the pipe-melodies. Knowing these facts, Naris their hind legs, throwing off their riders, and so caused an easy victory for Croton. Cf. Aelian, Nat. Anim. xvi. 23.

^b Sounded off, or gave the keynote.

^c Aelian, loc. cit., says "they danced away the battle," τὸν πόλεμον ἐξορχήσαντο, cf. Hdt. vi. 129, of Hippocleides, suitor for the daughter of Cleisthenes: ἀπορχήσαθ' γε μὲν τὸν γάμον, "you've certainly danced away your marriage."

^a Sybaris was only about 25 miles from Croton, but a tiresome journey for any Sybarite by any conveyance. The blasé Sybarite would not take it even on land, much less on purchased a flute-girl from Cardia, and on her arrival in Bisaltia she taught many pipers; accordingly he set out with them to attack Cardia. And when the battle was on, he gave orders to play all the pipe-melodies which the Cardian horses knew. And when the horses heard the piping, they stood on their hind legs and began to dance; but since the whole strength of the Cardians lay in their cavalry, they were beaten in this way."

A Sybarite once desired to sail across to Croton from Sybaris and hired a boat for his own special use, stipulating that he shall not be splashed and that no one else shall embark on it, and that he shall take his horse on board. The skipper agreed to these terms, so he put his horse aboard and gave orders to spread bedding for the animal. He then requested one of those who were seeing him off to sail along with him, saying that he had previously arranged with the skipper that he should sail close by the land. But the man answered: "Not I! I would scarcely have listened to your invitation if you had been intending to make a land journey by the sea, instead of a sea journey by the land."^a

Phylarchus, in the twenty-fifth book of his Histories, says^b that among the Syracusans there was a law that a woman should not put on gold ornaments or wear gaily-coloured dresses or have garments with sea, even when keeping close to land; the weak joke turns on the use of παρὰ as either "close by" or simply "by." Kaibel thought the story a Byzantine interpolation. The late word παρτισθησεται and the mediaeval and modern use of ἔνα excite suspicion. In C the anecdote is given in curtailed form at 522 f (p. 350 crit. note 4).

purple borders unless she admitted that she was a common prostitute ^a; he also says there was another law that a man might not affect foppish ways or adopt a fancy and conspicuous mode of dress unless he confessed to being an adulterer or a pathic, and the free matron was not to go abroad after the sun had set, otherwise it would be a confession that she meant to commit adultery; she was even forbidden to go out by day without the permission of the Supervisors of Women, ^b and then only when accompanied by at least one maid. "The Sybarites," Phylarchus says, "after drifting into luxury passed a law that women should be invited to the public celebrations, and that those who issued the call to the sacrifices should do so a year beforehand, in order that the women might prepare their dresses and other adornments in a manner in keeping with the long time provided, before going forth in answer to the invitation. Again, if any caterer or cook invented a dish of his own which was especially choice, it was his privilege that no one else but the inventor himself should adopt the use of it before the lapse of a year, in order that the first man to invent a dish might possess the right of manufacture during that period, so as to encourage others to excel in eager competition with similar inventions. ^c On the same principle the eel-sellers were not required to pay a tax, and neither were those who caught them. In the same way they made the dyers of sea-purple and the importers of it exempt from taxes.

⁶ Called a demagogue by Diodorus Sic. xii. 9, who in general gives a clearer account of the events here outlined.

“ Drifting, then, into every kind of arrogance, it finally happened that when thirty ambassadors arrived from Croton the Sybarites murdered them all, tossed their bodies out in front of the wall, and left them to be torn to pieces by wild beasts. And this in fact proved to be the beginning of their disasters, because the divine wrath was provoked. It appeared, at any rate, that all their magistrates, a few days afterwards, had the same dream the same night ; for they saw the goddess Hera come into the centre of the market-place and vomit bile ; also a fountain of blood gushed forth in her temple ; and yet even so they did not relax their pride until all of them were destroyed by the people of Croton.” So Heraclides of Pontus says in his tract On Justice ^a : “ The Sybarites, after abolishing the autocratic government of Telys, ^b put to death those who had taken sides with his cause and murdered them at the steps of the altars . . . and at these murders the statue of Hera turned away, ^c and the pavement sent forth a fountain of blood, so that they had to block up the entire adjacent space with bronze doors in their desire to stop the rising stream of blood. For this reason they were laid waste and entirely destroyed—these people who had even wished to dim the glory of the festival held in honour of the great Olympians. ^d For they waited for the very time that this is held, and then, by an extravagant offer of prizes, they tried to lure the athletes to their own city.”

The people of Croton, however, according to ^b On this famous physician and surgeon see Hdt. iii. 125 ff. Iamblichus, Vita Pythag. 237 implies that he was a Pythagorean.

Timaeus,^a also drifted into luxury after the destruction of the Sybarites, and their ruler went about the city dressed in a purple robe, crowned with a golden crown, and shod with white boots. Yet others say that this occurred, not because of luxurious extravagance, but on account of the physician Democedes^b; he was by birth a citizen of Croton, but he joined Polycrates, the tyrant of Samos, and being taken as a prisoner after his death^c he was carried by the Persians up to the Great King,^d Oroetes having killed Polycrates. Democedes cured Atossa, the wife of Darius and daughter of Cyrus, when she had a pain in her breast,^e and he begged of her as a reward that he might be sent back to Greece, promising to return; he gained his request and went back to Croton. He wanted to settle down there, but a Persian apprehended him and declared that he was the king's slave; but the people of Croton took Democedes away from him, and stripping the Persian of his garments they put them on the servant of the chief magistrate. Ever since that time, therefore, he goes about visiting the altars on the seventh day of each month^f in company with his chief and wearing Persian garments, both of them doing this not so much because of luxurious extravagance or arrogance as to show spite against the Persians. Later, however, the people of Croton also, Timaeus says, tried to abolish the Olympic festival by setting up at the same time with it games with very rich silver prizes. But others say it was the Sybarites who did this.

Clearchus in the fourth book of his Lives says ^a that after the people of Tarentum had acquired strength and power they progressed to such a point of luxury as to have the skin of their entire bodies made smooth, and so inaugurated this practice of removing the hair for all other peoples. All the men, he says, wore a transparent cloak ^b with purple border—garments which to-day are a refinement of women's fashions. But later, blindly led by luxury into outrage, they uprooted Carbina, a city of the Iapygians, ^c made the boys, girls, and women in their prime gather in the temples of Carbina, and there got up a spectacle, exposing their bodies naked for all to gaze at by day; and anyone who wished, leaping like wolves upon a herd into this wretched group, could feast his lust on the beauty of the victims there gathered; yet while all were looking on, they little suspected that the gods were looking on most of all. For the divine powers were so angry that they blasted with a thunderbolt all the Tarentines who had committed this outrage in Carbina. And even to this day each of the houses in Tarentum has as many columns outside the front doors as it harboured members of the band dispatched to Iapygia ^d; at these columns, on the anniversary of their destruction, the people neither make lamentation for the departed nor pour

^b No record has survived of this search (see critical note 3), but the legends of a Glaucus are multifarious, see Athen. 296 d (vol. iii. pp. 328 ff.), and he may have been that son of Minos who went to Italy, Serv. Aen. vii. 796; see Pauly-Wissowa vii. 1415, cf. 1409. The Glaucus of Athen. 296

the customary libations in their honour, but sacrifice to Zeus the Thunderer.^a

So, again, the Iapygians. They were natives of Crete who had come to look for Glaucus^b and settled there; but their successors, forgetting^c the Cretan discipline of life, went so far in luxury, and then later in arrogance, that they became the first to rub cosmetics on their faces and assume false fronts attached to their hair;^d and while they wore gaily-coloured robes, they regarded working and toiling at a trade as too disgraceful. Most of them made their houses more beautiful than the temples,^e and the leaders of the Iapygians, in utter contempt of deity, looted the statues of the gods from the temples, giving notice to their betters^f to go elsewhere. Wherefore they were struck from the heavens with fire and copper, and handed on to posterity the report of it.^g For in evidence there were shown for a long time afterward copper specimens of the missiles from the sky^h; and all the survivors from those times to the present day live with hair close-cropped, clad in mourning garb, and lacking all the good things they had formerly enjoyed.

knew the elixir of life, and the Iapygians may have set out to find it, like the followers of Ponce de Leon who discovered Florida. For Glaucus cf. also the story in Ps.-Apollod. iii. 3. 1.

^c The affected language of the original says, "assuming forgetfulness." This passage also is probably from Clearchus.

^d In Aristoph. Thesm. 258 Agathon lends Mnesilochus a κεφαλήν περιθετον, "wig," to make him look like a woman.

^e Such a practice would have been scandalous in the Athens of the fifth century, Dem. Olynth. iii. 25, cf. Stob. Fl. xlii. 40, Ps.-Dicaearch. in F.H.G. ii. 254.

⁵ Plutarch, Proverb. Alex. 60, adds that they wore their hair long and reeking with perfumery. But Strabo 181 praises the people of Massilia for their culture and simplicity of life.

As for the Iberians, though they go forth in stately embroidered robes and wear tunics reaching to the feet, they are not at all impeded in the strength they display in war. But the people of Massilia, who wore the same fashion of dress as the Iberians, became effeminate.^a At any rate their behaviour is indecent on account of the weakness of their souls, and they are effeminate through luxury; whence also a proverb has become current, "May you sail to Massilia!"

Again, the people who made a settlement in Siris,^b which was occupied first by the refugees from Troy, and later by Colophonians, as stated by Timaeus^c and Aristotle,^d drifted into luxury no less than the Sybarites. It became the peculiar custom in their country to wear gaily-coloured tunics which they belted with very costly sashes, and for this reason they were called by their neighbours "sash-tunics," since Homer calls men without belts "non-sash-tunics."^e The poet Archilochus had great admiration for the country of the Sirites on account of its prosperity. Speaking, at any rate, of the island of Thasos as a place quite inferior, he says^f: "For in no wise is it a fair land, or desirable, or lovely, like that about the streams of Siris." It was called Siris, as Timaeus^g says, and Euripides^h also in Melanippé Bound, after a woman named Siris; but according to Archilochus, after the name of a river. In proportion to the luxury and prosperity of all that region the size of the population also became great. Hence the name Magna Graecia was given to practically all the Greek settlements in Italy.

The Milesians, so long as they did not enjoy luxury, were able to defeat the Scythians, according to Ephorus,^a and so they founded the towns on the Hellespont and settled the Euxine Sea with splendid cities, and all men prospered under the protection of Miletus. But after they had succumbed to pleasure and luxury, the masculine vigour of the state collapsed, as Aristotle says,^b and a proverb referring to them came into being, "Once on a time, long ago, the Milesians were mighty men."^c Heracleides of Pontus in the second book of his work On Justice says^d: "The city of Miletus fell upon disasters through luxury of living and civil animosities; for, not content with reasonable moderation, they destroyed their enemies root and branch. The men of property were at strife with the populace, whom they called Gergithes,^e and at first the populace got the upper hand, and after they had ejected the rich from the city, they gathered the children of the exiles on the threshing-floors and trod them to death with oxen, destroying them with a most outrageous death. Therefore the rich, again getting the upper hand, tarred and burned to death all whom they could get hold of, along with their children. While they were burning, among many other portents that are said to have arisen, a sacred olive-tree burst into flames spontaneously.^a Hence the god for a long time repelled them from his oracle, and when they asked him for what reason they were repelled he said: 'I too am mindful of the slaughter meted out to the helpless Gergithes, of their doom that were covered with pitch, and the tree that bloometh nevermore.'^b Clearchus in the fourth book of his Lives says ^b that the Milesians emulated the luxury of the Colophonians and passed it on to their neighbours; afterwards, being reproached for this, they said to themselves, "Things that are Milesian and native with us must stay at home and are not for everybody."^c

^a The olive, associated especially with the worship of Zeus and of Athena, was one of the most sacred trees throughout Greece. The removal even of a stump that had been marked as consecrated (μορία) was accounted a crime, Lysias, Or. vii. ; see Pauly-Wissowa iii. 164.

^c When Aristagoras of Miletus pleaded for an alliance with the Spartans against Persia (Hdt. v. 50), he appeared in rich robes. An Ephor said to him, “Milesian things should stay at home and not come here,” Eustath. 1358. 11, Zenob. v. 57, Suid. s. Οἴκοι. The Milesians in Clearchus's version turned the proverb on themselves.

Clearchus next goes on to record the following facts about the Scythians:^d "The Scythian nation alone adopted at first impartial laws; afterwards, however, they became the most wretched of all mortals^e through their insolence. For they lived in wanton luxury, as no others ever did, since an abundance of all things, wealth and other advantages, had got the mastery over them. This is evident from the mode of dress and manner of living that still survive to-day among their chieftains. But having become luxurious, and having in greatest degree and first of all men rushed eagerly into luxurious living, they proceeded so far in insolence that they cut off the noses of all men into whose lands they penetrated; and the descendants of these men migrated to other places and bear to this very day a name derived from that outrage.^a And their women tattooed the bodies of the women in the Thracian tribes who lived near them on the west and north, injecting the design with pins. Hence many years later, the Thracian women who had been thus outraged effaced the memory of that calamity in their own way by painting the rest of their skin, that the mark of outrage and shame upon them, being now included in a variety of other designs, might efface the reproach under the name of ornamentation.^b With such arrogance did the Scythians lord it over everybody that no service rendered them by their slaves was free from tears, but rather caused the meaning of 'the phrase derived from Scythians' ^c to be known only too well among containing the word Scythian," and Clearchus so uses it. But in a larger sense it refers to the rude, blunt mode of speech among the Scythians, like the threatening answer given by their king Idanthyrsus to Darius, Hdt. iv. 127 where, however, the words ταῦτό ἐστι ἢ ἀπὸ Σκυθῶν ῥῆσις seem to be interpolated. Diog. L. i. 101 says that the Scythian Anacharsis gave the impulse to the proverb "because he was free in his speech." Cf. Aelian. Ep. Rust. xiv. That relentless cruelty and not mere bluntness is implied in the proverb seems clear from Lucian, Dial. Mer. x. 4.

^b Cf. Eurip. Antigone frag. 157-158 (*T.G.F.*² 405) of Oedipus, quoted in Aristoph. Ran. 1182, 1187: ἢν Οἰδίπους τὸ κρῶρον ἐδδαίμεν ἀνὴρ, εἰρ' ἐγέμεν' ἀθθὺς ἀθλιώτατος βροτῶν. "Impartial laws" are here the supposedly simple laws of a primitive people as opposed to the laws of a complex civilization, Aesch. (*T.G.F.*² 66) εὐνομίαι Σκύθαι. The conception of the Scythians varied at different times and in different authors. Herodotus stresses their cruelty, later writers idealized them as examples either of "the noble savage" or of a civilization superior to the Greek in freedom and enlightenment. See Minns, Scythians and Greeks, especially ch. iv., Rostovtseff, Skythien und der Bosphorus 6 ff., 80 ff., 88 note 2. St. Paul apparently contrasts βαρβάρους and Σκύθης Coloss. iii. 11.

All the Ionians without exception are satirized by Callias (or Diocles) in The Cyclopes when he says ^b: "Come, tell us! How is yonder luxurious and richly-tabled Ionia doing these days?" And the people of Abydus (colonists from Miletus) are quite loose in their ways and wholly enervated, as Hermippus makes clear in Soldiers ^c: "A. Hail, battalion from over seas, how are we getting on? To judge from your looks, soft of body you are, with your long locks of foppish youth, and your plumpness of arm. B. Did you ever notice that a native of Abydus has ever shown himself a man?" Again, Aristophanes in Triple-Phales incidentally satirizes many of the Ionians ^d: "Then all the distinguished foreigners who were there followed close on his heels and besought him with insistence of the Scythians in time of mourning, often involving great cruelty, see Herod. iv. 71 ff. For their practice of scalping (σκυθίζω, ἀποσκυθίζω, περισκυθίζω), here confused with cutting off the hair in mourning, see Herod. iv. 64, cf. Cic. In Pison. viii. ^b Kock i. 695.

(= Τριφαλλοί Usener, Götternamen 359). The play was aimed at Alcibiades, and is quoted by Athen. only here, at least by name. The poet ridicules the Ionic form δκωσ for δπωσ, in dialect "haow."

how that, having the lad, he should sell him in Chios, another, how that he should sell him in Clazomenae, another, in Ephesus, still another, in Abydus. It was nothing but 'how that'!" Again, with reference to the people of Abydus Antiphon writes as follows in the speech Against Alcibiades, a libel case^a: "After you had reached your majority, and with the approval of your guardians, you took over from them your estate and sailed away to Abydus, not with the intention of calling in any debt owing to you, nor again to get any consulship,^b but rather to learn from the women of Abydus modes of action that would correspond to your own lawlessness and licentiousness of mind, in order that you might be able to use them in your future career."

The Magnesians, also, who live near the Maeander, perished through their excessive looseness, as Callinus says in his Elegies,^c also Archilochus^d; for they were overcome by the Ephesians. With reference to the Ephesians themselves Democritus of Ephesus, in the first of his two books On the Temple of Ephesus, tells the story of their luxury and of the dyed garments which they wore, writing as follows^e: "The garments of the Ionians are violet-dyed, and crimson, and yellow, woven in a lozenge pattern; but the top borders are marked at equal intervals with animal patterns.

Then there are robes called sarapeis dyed with quince-yellow, crimson, and white, others again with sea-purple. And long robes (kalasireis) of Corinthian manufacture; some of these are crimson, others violet, others dark red^a; one might also buy these robes in flame-colour or sea-green. There are also Persian kalasireis, which are the finest of all. One might also see, Democritus goes on, the so-called aktaiai, and this in fact is the most costly among Persian wraps. It is compactly woven to give solidity and lightness, and is strewn all over with gold beads; all the beads are fastened to the inner side of the robe by a purple cord attached at the centre." All these, he says, are used by the Ephesians in their devotion to luxury.

Discoursing on the luxury of the Samians, Duris quotes^b verses from Asius to show that they wore bracelets on their arms, and when they celebrated the festival of Hera they marched with their long hair carefully combed down over the breast and shoulders. This custom is attested also by this proverb, "Marching to the Heraeum with braided hair." The hexameter verses of Asius go thus^c: "And they, even so, whene'er they had combed their locks, would hie them to the precinct of Hera, swathed in beautiful vestments, with snowy tunics that swept the floor

Heracleides of Pontus, in his work On Pleasure, declares^c that the people of Samos, after living in excessive luxury, lost their city, like the Sybarites, because of their meanness toward one another.

The people of Colophon, according to Phylarchus,^d were in the beginning rigid in their discipline, but after they had drifted into luxury they contracted friendship and alliance with the Lydians, and went forth with their long locks decked with golden ornaments, as Xenophanes also says^e: "Learning useless refinements from the Lydians while they were still free from loathsome tyranny, they used to walk to the place of assembly clad in robes all of purple, no fewer than a thousand in all, with proud mien, delighting in their beautiful locks, drenched with the smell of ointments artfully prepared." And so dissolute did they become in unseasonable carousing that some of them never saw the sun either rising or setting.^f And so they passed a law, which was still in force in our day,^g that the flute-girls and harp-girls and all such entertainers should receive wages from ⁹ One of the earliest laws regulating hours of labour.

 The text is obscure, but the original meaning may be inferred.
 There were three "shifts" in the day, and wages were paid as from dawn until noon, or from noon until after dark, or from after dark until early dawn; a fraction of any period early in the morning until midday, and from then until lamplight; and from this time on they were immersed in drinking for the rest of the night.^a Theopompus says^b in the fifteenth book of his Histories that a thousand of them thronged the city wearing purple robes; this, as every one knows, was at that time a colour rare even for princes, and very much desired. For purple^c was reckoned as equivalent to its weight in silver. Consequently, by reason of this kind of regimen they became involved in tyranny and party quarrels,^d and were destroyed, fatherland and all. The same account of them is given by Diogenes of Babylon in the first book of his Laws. And Antiphanes has these lines on the luxury of all Ionians in general in his Dodona^e: "Whence come they and where do they dwell? Or is it some crowd of luxuriantly-cloaked Ionians, dainty and on pleasure bent, that here comes forth?" Theophrastus, too, in his tract On Pleasure, says that the Ionians, as well as other peoples, on account of their excess of luxury . . . even to this day the golden proverb has survived.^f

Some, also, of the peoples living on the sea-coast are had to be paid for as a whole period. The pay, of course, went to the owner of the girls, who were slaves.

^b P.H.G. i. 299, J. 2 B 563, G. and H. 114. The quotation obviously is based on Xenophanes, like that of Phylarchus.

^d A case of hysteron proteron: party quarrels led to tyranny, or dictatorship.

^e Kock ii. 48; the only quotation from this play.

^f The meaning may be: "On account of their excesses they gave occasion for the expression 'Ionic luxury,' the use of which still survives." See Hcsych. s. 'Ἰωνικόν' τροφερών, and critical note 8.

said ^a by Theopompus in the eighth book of his History of Philip to have been effeminate. For example, of the Byzantians and the Calchedonians ^b Theopompus says: "The Byzantians had by this time long had a democratic government; also their city was situated at a trading-post,^c and the entire populace spent their time in the market-place and by the water-side; hence they had accustomed themselves to dissipation and amours and drinking in the taverns. As for the Calchedonians, before they all came to have a share with the Byzantians in the government, they devoted themselves unceasingly to the better pursuits of life; but after they had once tasted of the democratic liberties of the Byzantians, they sank utterly into corrupt luxury, and in their daily lives, from having been the most sober and restrained, they became wine-bibbers and spend-thrifts." And in the twenty-first book of his History of Philip Theopompus says ^d that the Umbrian nation (who live near the Adriatic) are pretty effeminate and live a life comparable to that of the Lydians, possessing good land which caused their advance in prosperity.

Speaking of the Thessalians in the fourth book, he says ^e: "Their lives are spent, in the case of some of them, in the continual company of dancing-girls and flute-girls, while others pass the livelong day in gaming, drinking, and the like forms of dissipation,^f and they are more interested in having the tables that are served to them laden with all sorts of dainties than in making their own lives decent. men in the world (Theopompus says) the Pharsalians are the laziest and the most given to spending." Yet it is generally agreed that the Thessalians, as Critias also says,^a are the most extravagant of all Greeks^b in their food and clothing; this was their reason for bringing the Persians against Greece, since they emulated Persian luxury and extravagance. Concerning the Aetolians Polybius, in the thirteenth book of his Histories, says^c that on account of their continual wars and extravagant lives they became overwhelmed with debt. And Agatharchides, in the twelfth book of his Histories, says^d: "The Aetolians are so much the more ready than other men to face death, in proportion as they strive more strenuously to live in an extravagant way than other people do."

Notorious for luxury also are the Greeks of Sicily, particularly the Syracusans, as Aristophanes says in Men of Dinnerville^e: "But that's not what he learned when I sent him to school; rather, he learned to drink, then to sing dirty songs, to set a Syracusan table and feasts such as the Sybarites have, and to take a swig of Chian from Laconian . . . cups." And Plato in his Letters says^f: "It was with this intention,^g accordingly, that I went to Italy and Sicily on the occasion of my first visit. But when I arrived, the life there satisfied me in no way or

Again, in the thirty-first book he says^c that the Zacynthians were unskilled in war because they were accustomed to live luxuriantly in abundant wealth.

Polybius, in his seventh book,^d says of the Capuans who live in Campania that after they had come into the possession of wealth through the excellence of their soil, they drifted into luxury and extravagance surpassing the traditional fame of Croton and Sybaris. "And so," he says, "being unable to bear the prosperity they had,^e they sent a call to Hannibal; wherefore they suffered irreparable disasters at the hands of the Romans. But the people of Petelia,^f keeping faith with the Romans, went so far in endurance when they were besieged by Hannibal that after eating up all the hides in the city and consuming the shoots and tender stalks of all the trees in the city they finally surrendered, having endured the siege for eleven months without the aid or comfort of any Roman."

Of the Curetes Phylarchus, in the eleventh book of his Histories, quotes ^a Aeschylus as recording that they received their name because of their luxury ^b : " A ringlet as luxuriant as that of dainty maidens ; whence they approved the calling of that folk ' the Youthful.' " And Agathon in Thyestes describes the suitors for the hand of the daughter of Pronax as arriving adorned with all other embellishments and wearing the hair of their heads in long ringlets ; but when they failed to obtain their suit (he says) ^c : " We have shorn our locks, witnesses of our luxury, verily a possession we desired when our hearts were gay. Henceforth, at least, we have won the glory of a new name, Curetes, because of our close-cut hair." Again, the Cumaeans of Italy, according to Hyperochus or whoever wrote the History of Cumae which is ascribed to him, ^d continually wore gold ornaments and adopted gaily-coloured clothes, and rode into the country with their wives in two-horse chariots.

So much, then, I recall concerning the luxury of nations and cities. And now concerning that of individuals I have heard the following accounts. Ctesias that such a person should be their king, stabbed him to death. But Ctesias says ^a that the king got into a war, and after collecting a large army was defeated by Arbaces and died by setting fire to himself in the palace; he heaped up a pyre four hundred feet high, on which he placed a hundred and fifty gold couches and an equal number of tables, these also of gold. On the pyre he constructed a chamber of wood one hundred feet long, in which he spread the couches and lay down; and not only he, but his queen was with him, and the concubines were on the other couches. As for his three sons and two daughters, when he saw that things were going badly, he had sent them previously to Nineveh ^b and its ruler there, giving them three thousand talents in gold; he then roofed the chamber with huge, thick beams, and piled all round many thick timbers so that there should be no exit. In it he placed ten million talents of gold, one hundred million of silver, and garments, purple cloths, and robes of every description. He then gave orders to light the pyre, and it burned for fifteen days. The people beheld the smoke with astonishment and thought he was offering sacrifices; only the eunuchs knew the facts. And so Sardanapalus, after he had enjoyed pleasure in strange ways, died as nobly as he could.

^a T.G.F. 763; Agathon connects the name with κουρά, "cropping of the hair" (from κείρω, "shear"), a sign of mourning. Kaibel, however, takes χρήμα as referring to ἐκείραμεσθα, and παίρωσιν as said in mockery. He would apparently render "Verily that was a thing we chose to do with derisive intent." But it is hard to see how the close crop can signify derision when it is self-applied. Slaves and hetaerae were required (by others, of course) to wear short hair. The daughter of Pronax is named Amphithea by Ps. - Apollodorus i. 9. 13. Pronax was the brother of Eriphylé, wife of Amphiarauus.

delicacy he set prizes . . . showing his sense^a; this, I think, is in fact the proverbial, 'A morsel for Zeus' and at the same time for the king. Hence Sardanapalus, he who was the most prosperous man in the world, he who prized enjoyment throughout his whole life, shows also in death, by his attitude on his tomb as he snaps his fingers,^b that human affairs are worth nothing but mockery, not being worth the snap of a finger which he is represented as making twice in the choral procession. . . .^c Yet his interest in other matters (besides pleasure is evident). At any rate it is plain that Sardanapalus was not wholly inactive, as is proved by the fact that on his tomb is the inscription: 'Sardanapalus the son of Anacyn-daraxes built Anchialê and Tarsus in a single day, yet now he is dead.' " Amyntas^d says in the third book of his Stages that in Nineveh is a high mound which Cyrus demolished in raising counter-walls against the city during the siege; and that this mound is said to be the work of Sardanapalus, who had been king in Nineveh; surmounting it was a stone column, on which was an inscription in Chaldaean letters, which Choerilus translated and put into verse; it is this^e: "I became king, and whilst I looked upon the sun's light I drank, I ate, I loved, for that I knew the time to be short which mortals live, and moreover hath many changes and mishaps, and others will have joy of the goods I leave behind. Wherefore I have let no day go by whilst I pursued this my way." Cleitarchus, however, in the fourth book of his History of Alexander says ^a that Sardanapalus died of old age after he was deposed from the throne of Syria. ^b Aristobulus says ^c: "In Anchialê, which Sardanapalus built, Alexander pitched his camp when he was marching inland against the Persians. And not far distant was the tomb of Sardanapalus, on which stood a stone figure with the fingers ^d of the right hand brought closely together, as if snapping them. On it was inscribed, in Assyrian letters: 'Sardanapalus, son of Anacyndaraxes, built Anchialê and Tarsus in a single day. Eat, drink, and play ^e; for other things are not worth that'—meaning, he seems to say, the snap of a finger."

Yet Sardanapalus was not the only one who pampered himself, but there was also Androcottus the Phrygian. For he too put on gaily-coloured clothes and adorned himself more brilliantly than a woman, as Mnaseas says ^f in the third book of his Europe. And Clearchus in the fifth book of his Lives says ^g that Sagaris the Mariandynian in his luxurious indulgence was fed until he was an old man at the lips of his nurse, not wishing to take the trouble to chew, and that he never carried his hand down lower than his navel. Wherefore Aristotle also used to say jokingly

Theopompus in the fifteenth book of his History of Philip says^e that Straton, the king of Sidon, overtopped all men in pleasure and luxury. For the same holiday festivities that Homer in his story attributes to the Phaeacians,^f drinking and listening to harp-singers and rhapsodists, occupied Straton's time continually. In fact he so far exceeded them in his mad pursuit of the pleasures of life that whereas the Phaeacians, according to Homer, held their drinking-parties in the company of their own wives and daughters, Straton, on the other hand, used to arrange his parties ^a in the company of flute-girls, singing-girls, and girls who played on the harp; and he used to summon many courtesans from Peloponnesus, many singing-girls from Ionia, besides girls from every part of Greece, some of whom were singers, some dancers; he was in the habit of getting up contests among them in the company of his friends, and in their society he spent all his time, since he himself enjoyed this kind of life, being by nature a slave to his pleasures, but still more because he strove to outdo Nicocles.^b For, as it happened, they were exceedingly jealous of each other, and each was eager to live in greater pleasure and ease than the other; why! they went so far in this rivalry, as we have heard, that they would ask from all comers about each other's household arrangements and the cost of the sacrifices held there, and then did their utmost to outdo each other in these matters. And they made it a great point to seem rich and enviable. Nevertheless they did not carry their good luck through when it came to ending their lives, for both of them perished by a violent death. So Anaximenes, in the work entitled Vicissitudes of Kings, after recounting the same facts about Straton, says ^c that he kept up a constant rivalry with Nicocles, the ruler of Salamis in Cyprus, who had shown great eagerness for luxury and licentiousness, and that both died a violent death.^d

Now, in the first book of his History of Philip,

Theopompus, speaking of Philip, says ^a: "And two days later he arrived at Onocarsis, an estate in Thrace which included a very beautifully planted grove and one well adapted for a pleasant sojourn, especially during the summer season. In fact it had been one of the favourite resorts of Cotys, who, more than any other king that had arisen in Thrace, directed his career towards the enjoyment of pleasures and luxuries, and as he went about the country, wherever he discovered places shaded with trees and watered with running streams, he turned these into banqueting-places; and visiting them in turn, as chance led him, he would offer sacrifices to the gods and hold court with his lieutenants, remaining prosperous and envied until he undertook to blaspheme and offend Athena." And the historian goes on next to relate that Cotys got up a banquet on the pretence that Athena was to be married to him, and after erecting a bridal chamber he awaited the goddess in a drunken revel. And presently going entirely out of his senses he dispatched one of his bodyguard to see whether the goddess had arrived at the bridal chamber. When the poor fellow returned with the announcement that there was nobody in the chamber, Cotys shot him dead with his bow, and then killed a second messenger for the same reason, until the third man sagaciously said that the goddess had arrived a long while before and was waiting for him. This king once in a fit of jealousy against his own wife cut up the poor woman with his own hands, beginning with the pudenda.^b distributions of meat than on the administration of the State." And in Theopompus's treatise entitled On the Funds plundered from Delphi he says ^a: "To Chares of Athens, through Lysander's agency, were given sixty talents. With this sum he feasted the Athenians in the market-place, offering sacrifices for his victory in the battle which was fought against Philip's mercenaries." These were commanded by Adaeus, nicknamed the Cock, to whom Heracleides, the writer of comedies, alludes in these lines ^b: "He caught Philip's Cock when he was crowing too early and wandering about, and cut him up; for he had not yet got a crest.^c Yes, Chares cut up only one, and yet feasted many Athenians on that occasion; how generous he was!" The same facts are recorded also by Duris.^d or in his gardens, according to the account of Theopompus in the twenty-first book,^a but permitted anyone who wished to enter and take for his enjoyment whatever he desired; and this is what, at a later time, Cimon also did, following his example. Concerning Cimon in his turn Theopompus, in the account he gives in the tenth book of his History of Philip, says ^b :

 "Cimon of Athens stationed no guard in his fields and gardens to watch the crops and fruit, because he wanted all citizens who wished to enter and gather fruit and take whatever they desired of the products of his estates. Furthermore, he made his house free to all; and a simple meal was always ready for a large number of persons, and the poor of Athens who came to it could enter and have dinner. He also cared for all who day by day asked him for aid, and they say that he took about with him two or three young fellows who carried small change, and he gave them orders to dole it out to the needy whenever they approached him to ask for aid. They also assert that he likewise contributed to funeral expenses. Here is another thing he often did: whenever he saw one of his fellow-citizens poorly clad he would order one of the young men in his retinue to exchange clothes with the man. As a result of all these kindnesses, therefore, he enjoyed high repute and was foremost among the citizens." But Peisistratus was cruel in many instances, seeing that glad indeed (so he declared) if he could have filled it with friends.

Chamaeleon of Pontus in his work On Anacreon, after quoting the verse,^a "Yellow-haired Eurypylê has set her heart on the litter-borne Artemon," explains that Artemon got this title because he lived luxuriously and was carried about in a litter. In fact Anacreon does say that he careered from poverty into luxury, in these lines^b: "In the old days he used to wear a ragged coat,^c wrappings pinched in at the waist, and wooden knobs in his ears, and a hairless ox-hide strapped to his side, the unwashed covering of a poor shield—that vicious^d Artemon, associate of bread-selling wenches and all-too-willing pathics, devising a life of fraud; oft had he had his neck bound to the whipping-stoek or else to the wheel, oft had he had his back flogged with a leather scourge, and the hair of his head and beard plucked out. But to-day he, son of Cycê,^e mounts a chariot and wears necklaces

*P.L.G.*⁴ iii. 261-262, Diehl frag. 16, Edmonds ii. 186. Artemon was a rival of Anacreon. In the fifth century the epithet was wittily applied to another Artemon, an engineer under Pericles, who was lame and had to be carried about in a litter; Plut. Per. 27, Schol. Aristoph. Acharn. 850. Pliny, Nat. Hist. xxxiv. 56, mentions a statue of him by Polycleitus.

^b Diehl frag. 54, Edmonds frag. 96. Bergk prints the verses with the preceding, though sharing Blass's belief that they do not belong together.

^c Or, "of the Cerberians," to be taken with the following καλύματα. Cerberians was another form for Cimmerians (Hesychius), read also in Aristoph. Ran. 187 with the meaning "poor devils." See critical note 2. The word βεββέριον occurs only here.

^d Cf. ὁ περιπόνητος Ἀρτέμων, "Artemon, that all-round rascal," in allusion to περιφρόνητος, Aristoph. Acharn. 850.

In his account of the noble Alcibiades Satyrus says^a: "It is said that when he was in Ionia he was more luxurions than the Ionians; when in Thebes, he was more Boeotian than the Thebans^b themselves in his physical exercises and gymnastic training; when in Thessaly, in his schooling of horses and in his chariot-driving he was more devoted to horsemanship than the Aleuadae; in Sparta he could beat the Spartans in the practice of endurance and the simple life; and on the other hand he outdid the Thracians in their drinking of unmixed wine.^c Once, to test his wife, he sent her a thousand darics as though they came from some one else. Extremely handsome in appearance, he let his hair grow long during a great part of his life,^d and he wore shoes of a striking pattern, which from him are called Alcibiades.^e Whenever as choregus^f he entered the theatre with the procession, robed in purple, he was admired by men and women alike. Hence also Antisthenes, the disciple of Socrates, being one who had seen Alcibiades with his own eyes, affirms that he was strong, manly, cultivated, daring, and beautiful at every period of his life. Whenever he set out on journeys abroad he made use of four of the allied cities as though they were so many maid-servants. That is to say, the Ephesians set up a Persian pavilion for him, the Chians provided fodder for his horses, the Cyzicenes supplied animals for the sacrifices and distribution of the meat, the Lesbians provided wine and everything else for his daily necessities.^a Returning from Olympia, he dedicated at Athens two tablets painted by Aglaophon; one of these showed figures representing the Olympian and Pythian festivals placing crowns on his head, and on the other was the seated figure of Nemca^b with Alcibiades on her lap, more beautiful in appearance than the faces of the women. And even when he was a general he wanted to be a dandy still; he carried, for example, a shield made of gold and ivory, on which there was the device of Eros with a thunderbolt poised like a javelin.^c Once he burst in mad revel into the house of Anytus, who was his lover and rich, in company with one of his boon companions, Thrasyllus (who was poor), and toasting Thrasyllus with half of the cups that stood on the cup-stand he ordered his attendants to carry them off to Thrasyllus's house; he then, after showing in this way his affection for Anytus, took his leave. And when some persons objected that Alcibiades had done what was inconsiderate, Anytus replied like the gentleman and lover that he was, "Not by any means, as Zeus is kings to be no longer said to have come from Heracles,^a but from Alcibiades. When in command of the army he took with him everywhere Timandra,^b mother of the Corinthian Laïs, and Theodotê, the Athenian courtesan. After his flight^c he made the Athenians masters of the Hellespont and sent to Athens more than five thousand Peloponnesians whom he had captured; and later, starting on his return to his native land, he wreathed the Athenian triremes with green branches, streamers, and ribbons, and made fast to them the captiveships, numbering two hundred, the beaks of which had been cut away; and towing them along with the horse-transports, these also laden with booty and arms taken from Spartans and Peloponnesians, he sailed into the harbour. Now the trireme in which he himself returned coursed ahead under purple sails until it reached the entrance^d to Peiræus. And when it was inside and the rowers had grasped their oars,^e Chrysogonus, dressed in his Delphic robes, began to pipe the trireme-tune,^f while the tragic actor Callippides^g beat time for him, dressed in his theatrical costume. Hence somebody has wittily said: "Sparta could not have put up with two Lysanders, and neither could Athens have put up with two Alcibiadeses." ^a Alcibiades imitated also the Persian habits of Pausanias, and by way of winning the favour of Pharnabazus he used to dress himself in Persian raiment and learned the Persian language, as Themistocles likewise did. ^b Duris in the twenty-second book of his Histories says ^c: "Pausanias, the king of the Spartans, laid aside the coarse coat of his country and dressed himself in Persian raiment. So, too, Dionysius, the tyrant of Sicily, assumed a long robe ^d and crown of gold, besides a buckled mantle usually worn by tragic actors. And Alexander, as soon as he became master of Asia, began to wear Persian dress. But Demetrius ^e surpassed them all; for the footwear that he wore was made at great expense; as to the shape in which it was made, it was practically a half-boot, but it had a felt covering of the costliest purple; into this the manufacturers had woven, behind and in front, a very intricate pattern of gold. His riding-cloaks had a lustrous dark-grey colour, and the universe with its golden stars and the twelve signs of the Zodiac were woven in it. His headband was spangled with gold, and held tightly in place a hat of purple; the fringed ends of its woven material extended down to his back. When the festival of the Demetria^a was celebrated at Athens, he was represented, in a painting on the front wall of the proscenium, riding on the inhabited world."

^c Cf. the epigram, by Simonides, which Pausanias in-

Nymphiis of Heracleia, in the sixth book of the work dealing with his native city,^b says: "Pausanias, the victor over Mardonius at Plataeae, departed entirely from Spartan customs, and when he was staying at Byzantium he gave himself over completely to arrogance; he had the impudence, on the bronze bowl dedicated to the gods whose shrines are at the entrance—which bowl, as it happens, exists even to this day—to inscribe the following epigram as though he alone had made the dedication, entirely forgetting who he was in his wanton arrogance^c: 'This monument of his prowess is dedicated to lord Poseidon by Pausanias, ruler of Hellas with its wide spaces, at the Euxine sea; a Lacedaemonian by birth, the son of Cleombrotus, of the ancient race of Heracles.'"

The Spartan Pharax also lived luxuriously, as Theopompus records in his fortieth book^d; in fact he indulged in his pleasures so wantonly and lavishly that he was for this reason far more apt to be taken for a Greek of Sicily than, because of the place of his birth, for a Spartan. In the fifty-second book Theopompus says^e that the Spartan Archidamus deserted the traditional mode of life and adopted customs which were foreign and effeminate; hence he could not bear to live at home, but did his utmost to stay always abroad in order to satisfy his incontinence.

So, when the people of Tarentum sent an embassy to treat for an alliance, he hastened to march out with them to their assistance; and when he reached there and was killed in the war he was not even accorded the honour of burial, although the Tarentines promised large sums of money to the enemy for the recovery of his body.

Phylarchus, in the tenth book of his Histories, says ^a that Isanthes, who became king of the Thracian tribe called Crobyzi, surpassed all his contemporaries in luxury. He was rich and handsome. And in the twenty-second book the same author says ^b of Ptolemy, the second of that name who became king of Egypt, that in spite of his being the most august of all princes and devoted, if anyone ever was, to culture and learning, he was nevertheless so utterly distorted in judgement and spoiled by his unmeasured luxury that he thought he was going to live for ever, and boasted that he was the only one who had found exemption from death. And so, tortured by an attack of gout which lasted several days, when he began to feel somewhat easier, and spied through some windows ^c the Egyptians at lunch by the river-side eating plain food as they lay sprawled on the sands, he cried out, "Unlucky devil that I am! To think that I cannot even be one of those fellows!" ^d

^b This story is accepted as true by Boeckh-Fränkel, Staatshaushaltung, i. 566, rejecting the other story, invented to explain the epithet λακκόπλουτος, as told in Suid. s.v., cf. Plut. Arist. 5 and Aristodemus, J. 2 A 501. The Persian as Heracleides of Pontus in his tract On Pleasure records ^a some strange facts about him, I will take up the relation of them from the beginning. "It was at the time when the Persians made their first expedition into Euboea, ^b they say, that a man of Eretria named Diomnestus came into possession of the commanding officer's money. For the officer, ^c as it happened, had pitched his tent in the field which belonged to Diomnestus and had stored the money in one of the rooms of his house. When they all died, Diomnestus remained in possession of the gold without the knowledge of anyone else. When, however, the Persian king again dispatched his army to Eretria, with orders to destroy the city utterly, of course all who were rich in funds sent these to a place of safety. Accordingly, the survivors of Diomnestus's family sent their money to Athens for safekeeping with Hipponicus, nicknamed Ammon, the son of Callias. On the removal by the Persians of all the Eretrians, ^d bag and haggage, this money was retained by Hipponicus and Callias, being considerable in amount. Hence the Hipponicus who was descended ^e from the recipient of the deposit begged of the Athenians on one occasion a place on the Acropolis where he might cause to be built a storehouse for the funds, saying that it was not safe for so much money to lie in a private house; and the Athenians granted permission; but being warned against this by his friends, inroads occurred in 490 and 480 B.C., Hdt. vi. 100 and viii. 4. There is no record of an earlier invasion, and Grote thinks this story of Heracleides a myth, Hist. of Greece, chap. xxxvi.; P.-W. viii. 1908.

he changed his mind. So Callias^a became the possessor of this money and lived for pleasure. What flatterers, indeed, what crowds of companions did not gather about him! What lavish expenses did he not treat with careless disdain!^b But nevertheless his life of pleasure brought him to such a reversal of circumstances that he was compelled to live alone with a poor old woman of foreign birth, and died at last in need of the commonest necessities.^c Who was it that lost the fortune of Nicias of Pergasê,^d or that of Ischomachus^e? Was it not Autoeas and Epieles, who elected to live in company with each other and regarded everything as of less consequence than pleasure, and who then, after they had squandered all, drank hemlock and died together?^f

Speaking of Alexander the Great's luxury, Ephiippus of Olynthus in his book On the Death of Hephaestion and Alexander says^g that in the park there was erected for him a golden throne and couches with silver legs, on which he sat when transacting business in the company of his boon companions. And Nicobulê says^h that during dinner every sort of contestant exerted their efforts to entertain the king, and that in the course of his last dinner Alexander in person acted from memory a scene from the Andromeda of Euripides, and pledging toasts in unmixed wine with zest compelled the others also to do likewise. What wonder, then, that the Emperor Commodus of our time^e also had the club of Hercules lying beside him in his chariot with the lion's skin spread out beneath him, and desired to be called Hercules, seeing that Alexander, Aristotle's pupil, got himself up like so many gods, to say nothing of the goddess Artemis? Alexander sprinkled the very floor with valuable perfumes and scented wine. In his honour myrrh and other kinds of incense went up in smoke; a religious stillness and silence born of fear held fast all who were in his presence. For he was hot-tempered and murderous, reputed, in fact, to be melancholy-mad. At Ecbatana he arranged a festival in honour of Dionysus, everything being supplied at the feast with lavish expense, and Satrabates^a the satrap entertained all the troops. Many gathered to see the sight, says Ehippus^b; proclamations were made which were exceedingly boastful and more insolent than the usual Persian arrogance. For among the various proclamations made at the crowning of Alexander, one man in particular, a custodian of munitions, overstepped all the bounds of flattery and, in collusion with Alexander, he bade the herald proclaim that "Gorgus, the custodian of munitions, presented Alexander, son of Ammon, with three thousand gold pieces,^c and promised that whenever he should besiege Athens he would give him ten thousand complete suits of armour, the same number of catapults, and all other missiles besides, enough to prosecute the war."

rest of his forces, both land and naval, he entertained in the courtyard with the foreign embassies and tourists.^a Moreover the structure was decorated sumptuously and magnificently with expensive draperies and fine linens, and underfoot with purple and crimson rugs interwoven with gold. To keep the pavilion firmly in place there were columns thirty feet high, gilded and silvered and studded with jewels. The entire enclosure was surrounded with rich curtains having animal patterns interwoven in gold, their rods being overlaid with gold and silver. The perimeter of the courtyard measured four stadia.^b The call to dinner was sounded on the trumpet, not only at the time of the nuptial banquets, but always when on other occasions he chanced to be making libation, so that the entire army knew what was going on. The nuptials lasted for five days, and very many persons, foreigners as well as Greeks, contributed their services; for example, the jugglers from India were especially noteworthy; also Scymnus of Tarentum, Philistides of Syracuse, and Heracleitus of Mitylene^c; after them the rhapsode Alexis of Tarentum gave a recital. There appeared also the harp-virtuosi Cratinus of Methymna,^d Aristonymus of Athens, Athenodorus of Teos; there were songs with harp-accompaniment by Heracleitus of Tarentum and Aristocrates of Thebes. The singers to flute-accompaniment who appeared were Dionysius of Heracleia and Hyperbolus of Cyzicus; there came on also flute-

And from that day forth the people who had previously been called 'Dionysus-flatterers' were called 'Alexander-flatterers' because of the extravagant presents in which Alexander took such delight.^d Plays were acted by the tragedians Thessalus, Athenodorus, and Aristocritus, and by the comedians Lycon, Phormion, and Ariston. There was present also the harper Phasimelus.^e The crowns (Chares says) brought by the ambassadors and others were worth 15,000 talents."

Polycleitus of Larisa, in the eighth book of his Histories, says^f that Alexander slept upon a golden couch, and that flute-players, female and male alike, always accompanied him to camp and drank with him until daybreak. Clearchus, in his volumes On Lives, speaking of the Darius who was conquered by Alexander, says^g: "The Persian king gave prizes to those who catered to his pleasures, but brought his kingdom to defeat through all these indulgences, and did not perceive that he was defeating himself until others had seized his sceptre and were proclaimed rulers." Phylarchus in the twenty-third book of his Histories^a and Agatharchides of Cnidus in the tenth book of his work On Asia^b says that Alexander's courtiers also indulged in extravagant luxury. One of these was Agnon,^c who wore gold studs in his military boots. Whenever Cleitus, who was called the White, had business to transact, he walked about on purple cloths while conversing with those who had audience with him. Likewise Perdicas and Craterus, who were lovers of gymnastic sports, always had in their train piles of goatskins that would fill a stadium,^d under cover of which, after appropriating a place in the encampments, they would carry on their exercise; they were also followed by a long train of animals^e carrying sand to be used in the wrestling-school. Again, Leonnatus and Menelaus, who were fond of hunting, had in their luggage curtains measuring a hundred stadia,^f with which they surrounded the hunting-grounds and pursued the quarry. Moreover, the famous plane-trees of gold, even the golden vine under which the Persian kings often sat and held court, with its clusters of green crystals^g and rubies from India and other gems of every description, exceedingly costly though they were, appeared to be of less worth, says Phylarchus, than the expense lavished daily on all occasions at Alexander's court. For his pavilion alone contained a hundred couches and was supported by fifty golden uprights. The canopies stretched over the upper part to cover the whole were elaborately worked with gold in sumptuous embroideries. Inside, all round it, stood first of all five hundred Persians, Apple-bearers,^a with gay uniforms of purple and quince-yellow; after them bowmen to the number of a thousand, some dressed in flame-colour, others in crimson; but many, too, had mantles of dark blue. At the head of these stood five hundred Silver-Shields,^b Macedonians. In the centre of the pavilion was placed a golden chair, sitting on which Alexander held court with his bodyguard stationed close on all sides. Outside the tent the elephant-division was posted near in a circle with full equipment, also a thousand Macedonians in Macedonian uniform, next ten thousand Persians, and the large body, amounting to five hundred, who wore the purple; for Alexander had granted them the privilege of wearing this garment. And the number of his friends and servitors being so great, no one dared to approach Alexander; such was the majesty associated with his person. On one occasion Alexander actually wrote to the cities in Ionia, and first of all the Chians, directing them to dispatch purple dye to him. For he wanted to dress all his friends in garments dyed with sea-purple. When the letter was read to the Chians in the presence of the sophist Theocritus, he declared that now at last he understood the meaning of the Poseidonius, in the twenty-eighth book of his Histories, says^b that King Antiochus, nicknamed Grypus, held brilliant receptions when he celebrated the games at Daphne. In the course of them, he at the beginning made distributions of uncarved meats; afterwards of live geese, hares, and gazelles. There were also distributed to the diners, he says, gold wreaths and a great quantity of silver vessels, slaves, horses, and camels. And it was the duty of each man, after mounting his camel, to drink a toast and accept the camel and everything upon it as well as the attending slave. Again, in the fourteenth book Poseidonius tells about the ruler who bore the same name, the Antiochus,^c that is, who conducted the campaign into Media against Arsaces, and says^d that he held receptions every day to great crowds; on these occasions, not counting the heaps of food that were consumed or thrown out as waste scraps,^e every one of the feasters would carry home uncarved meat of land-animals, fowls, and creatures of the sea prepared whole, and capable of filling a cart; and after all that, quantities of honey-cakes and wreaths of myrrh and frankincense with matted fillets of gold as long as a man.

^c Cf. the case of the Megarian engineer Eupalinus, who built the great tunnel in Samos, Hdt. iii. 60. So Pericles two generations later, Lysias xii. 4.

Clytus the Aristotelian, in his work On Miletus, says ^a of Polycrates the tyrant of Samos that his instinct for luxury moved him to get together the special products of every country—hounds from Epeirus, goats from Scyros, sheep from Miletus, ^b and swine from Sicily. Alexis, too, in the third book of Samian Chronicles says ^c that Samos was enriched by Polycrates with the products of many cities: he imported Molossian and Laconian hounds, goats from Scyros and Naxos, and sheep from Miletus and Attica. He also encouraged, Alexis says, the immigration of artisans at very high wages. ^d Before he acquired supreme power he ordered the manufacture of sumptuous draperies and drinking-cups, and permitted them to be used by persons who were celebrating a wedding or holding unusually large ^e receptions.

In the light of all this, then, one must feel surprise that the tyrant is nowhere recorded as having summoned to his court women or boys, although he was passionately devoted to liaisons with males, so much so as to be a rival of the poet Anacreon; at that time he even cut off his favourite's hair in a burst of temper. Polycrates was the first man to build ships of the kind he called Samainai, ^f after the name of his country. Clearchus says ^g: "Polycrates, the tyrant of luxurious Samos, came to ruin on account of his dissipated mode of life, emulating as he did the effeminate practices of the Lydians. From this motive he constructed in the city the famous 'Quarter'^a of Samos to rival the park at Sardis called Sweet Embrace,^b and in competition with the flowers of Lydia he wove the widely heralded 'Flowers' of the Samians.^c Of these two innovations, the Samian Quarter was a lane crowded with professional women,^d and he literally filled Hellas with all kinds of foods that tempted to sensuality and incontinence; the flowers of the Samians, on the other hand, are the various charms of women and men.^e But while the whole city was still engaged in holiday revels and drunken orgies (the Persians attacked and conquered it^f).” So much, then, we have on the authority of Clearchus. But I also know myself of a lane in my own Alexandria still called “Rich Man’s Row” to this day, where everything conducive to wanton indulgence used to be sold.

Aristotle in his Wonders says^g of Alcisthenes the Sybarite that his desire for luxury led him to have a cloak made of such expensive magnificence that he set it up for display at Lacinium during the festival of Hera, at which all the Greeks of Italy gather, and that of all the objects exhibited it was admired the most. They say that when Dionysius the Elder came into possession of it he sold it to the Carthaginians for one hundred and twenty talents.^a Polemon, too, gives an account of it in the work entitled On the Robes at Carthage.^b Respecting the Sybarite Smindyrides and his luxury Herodotus has recorded in the sixth book ^c that when he sailed away to sue for the hand of Agaristê, the daughter of Cleisthenes tyrant of Sicyon, "from Italy (Herodotus says) came Smindyrides, the son of Hippocrates, of Sybaris, who had attained the highest degree of luxury possible for one man." He was followed, for example, by one thousand cooks and fowlers. Tinaeus, also, gives an account of him in the course of his seventh book.^d

^a By “Flowers” seem to be meant (1) any of the celebrated products of Lydian luxury, e.g. their sauces, Athen. 160 b, 516 c; pottery, 432 e, etc.; (2) as applied to Samos, the quarter or street where brothels abounded, cf. “tenderloin,” and Ps.-Plut. Prov. Alex. li., Eustath. 1082. 36.

In narrating stories concerning the luxury of Dionysius the Younger, tyrant of Sicily, Satyrus the Peripatetic in his Lives says ^e that rooms in his palace with a capacity of thirty couches were filled by the banqueters. In the same strain Clearchus, in the fourth book of his Lives, writes as follows^f: "Dionysius, the son of Dionysius, proved to be the evil genius of all Sicily; once he went over to the city of the Locrians, which was the town of his own origin (for Doris, his mother, was a Locrian by birth), and strewing the largest hall in the city with tufted thyme and roses, he summoned one after the other the young girls of the Locrians ; then naked among the naked girls he omitted no indecency as he rolled with them upon the pavement. Not long afterward, therefore, the outraged fathers got his wife and children into their own power, and standing them up in the street they indulged their lust upon them with brutal violence. And when they had sated themselves with outrage, they thrust needles under their finger-nails and killed them. They then chopped up the bones of the dead victims in mortars; the rest of the bodies they divided up as meat-portions and pronounced a curse on whosoever refused to taste them ; the reason why they ground up their flesh, in view of the unholy curse, was that the food might be entirely consumed as they ate their bread ; what was left over they sunk in the sea.^a As for Dionysius himself, he finally brought his life to a pitiable close as a mendicant priest of the Mother of the Gods, in whose rites he carried a tambourine.^b We should, therefore, beware of what men call luxury, since it is a subverter of lives ; and likewise we should regard insolence as certain to bring on the ruin of all concerned."^c p. 260 says that they burnt the bodies and ground up the bones ; but it seems clear that the flesh was removed from the bones first and then roasted and mingled with bread dough. Cf. Plat. Rep. 565 D.

Diodorus of Sicily in his work called The Library

^b This refers to the orgiastic worship of Cybele (μῆτηρ θεῶν) ; Demosth. De Cor. 259 brands with contempt the participation of Aeschines and his mother in these rites ; see J. H. Wright in H.S.C.P. vi. 67 note I.

^a Diod. xi. 25, referring to the public works at Agrigentum, Syracuse, and Himera after the victory at Himera, 480 B.C.; the only citation from Diod. Sic. in Athenaeus. The pool measured nearly a half-mile square. Since the excerpt is an ungrammatical jotting from Diodorus, the translation is says^a that the people of Agrigentum built a swimming-pool for Gelon at great cost; it had a perimeter of seven stadia and a depth of thirty feet, and into it water was drawn from rivers and springs to make a fish-preserve supplying many fish for the luxurious taste and enjoyment of Gelon; there lighted on it also a large quantity of swans, so that the spectacle was most delightful to see. At a later time, however, it was filled up with earth and abolished. Duris, in the fourth book of his Agathocles and his Times, says^b also that near the city of Hipponium there is shown a grove exceedingly beautiful and well supplied with flowing streams, in which also there is a place called the Horn of Amaltheia,^c which Gelon constructed. Silenus of Calê Acté in the third book of his History of Sicily, says^d that in the neighbourhood of Syracuse there is a garden magnificently constructed which is called the "Word"^e; in it Hieron the king held audience. But then the entire region round Panormus in Sicily is called a garden, because it is full of cultivated trees, according to Callias in the eighth book of his Histories of Agathocles.^f Poseidonius, too, in the eighth book of his Histories says of the Sicilian Greek Damophilus, who caused the stirring up of the slave war,^g that he was addicted to luxury, and writes as follows ^a: "He was, therefore, a slave to luxury and vice, driving round about over the countryside in four-wheeled carts,^b with horses and handsome grooms and a retinue of parasites and lads dressed as soldiers swarming beside him. But later he, with his whole household, ended his life after an outrageous fashion, having been grievously outraged by the slaves."

Demetrius of Phalerum, as Duris declares in the sixteenth book of his Histories,^c came into the control of twelve hundred talents a year,^d and of this sum he spent but little on the troops and the administration of the State, but squandered all the remainder in the indulgence of his inborn lusts, celebrating splendid feasts every day and entertaining a multitude of guests. In fact he surpassed the Macedonians in his lavish outlays on banquets, and in his refinement the Cyprians and Phœnicians; showers of perfume descended upon the ground, and many floors in the dining-halls were decorated in highly-elaborate flower-patterns by artists. Assignations with women were carried on in secret, as well as nocturnal amours with lads, and the Demetrius who made statutes and ordained the conduct of lives for other people constructed his own life with utter freedom from law. He was also careful about his personal appearance, dyeing the hair of his head a blonde colour, rubbing his face with rouge, and smearing himself with salves besides; for he wanted to have a glad appearance

^b For this form of luxury cf. Aristoph. Acharn. 71. Diod. says "grooms dressed as soldiers and a retinue of handsome lads."

^a P.L.G.⁴ iii. 634, Diehl frag. 2. The verses were a dithyramb in honour of Dionysus. Excessive flattery appears in the very first words, for Demetrius was the son of a slave; he became Chief Archon in 309 B.C. The adjective ζαθέϊος with τιμαῖσι, rendered "divine" above, may also mean "rich," "fragrant," H. Fränkel, De Simia Rhod. 51; but see below (note d), on divine honours.

and seem attractive to all who met him. And in the procession at the Dionysia which he marshalled when he became archon, the chorus sang verses in his honour written by Castorion of Soli, in which he was called "in beauty like the Sun"^a; "The archon above all others noble, in beauty like the Sun, celebrates thee with divine honours."

Carystius of Pergamum in the third book of his Notes says^b that Demetrius of Phalerum, when his brother Himeraeus was murdered by order of Antipater,^c went himself to live with Nicanor, having been accused of celebrating the divine appearing of his brother.^d Becoming a friend of Cassander^e he acquired great power. In the beginning, to be sure, his luncheon had consisted of bowls of olives, of any and every kind, and some island cheese.^f But when he became rich he bought Moschion, the best cook and caterer of those days; and so huge were the dinner menus prepared for him daily that Moschion, who received as gratuities what was left over, was able in the space of two years to buy three apartment-houses and practise wanton lust on freborn boys and the wives of the most eminent citizens. But all the boys were jealous of Demetrius's favourite Diognis; and so great was their ambition to come into relations with Demetrius that when he went for a stroll after lunch in Tripod Street the handsomest boys gathered in that place on the succeeding days in the hope of being seen by him.

^b Evidently his brother, as he thought, appeared to him as Patroclus had appeared to Achilles. The rites performed by Demetrius, probably in secret, were interpreted by his enemies as a sacrilegious act, implying that he believed his brother to be divine. Their real motive was political animosity, divine honours to the dead and even the living being common enough; see Pauly-Wissowa, Suppl. iv. 304 (s. Epiphaneia).

Nicolas the Peripatetic, in the hundred and tenth book of his Histories, says^a that after Lucullus returned to Rome, celebrated his triumph, and rendered an account of his campaign against Mithradates, he abandoned the old-time sobriety and drifted into an extravagant mode of life, becoming the foremost guide of the Romans in every form of luxury, because he enjoyed the wealth taken from two kings, Mithradates and Tigranes. Notorious also among the Romans for luxury and effeminacy was Sittius, according to Rutilius.^b Of Apicius we have spoken earlier.^c Practically all authorities record that Pausanias and Lysander were notorious for luxury.^d Hence Agis said of Lysander, "Here is a second Pausanias that Sparta has produced." But Theopompus, in the tenth book of his History of Greece, says^e just the opposite about Lysander, namely that "he was fond of hard work, ready and able to help private citizens as well as princes, self-controlled and master over all lures to pleasure. there is not a single one of its cities in which it can be proved that he was tempted into sexual indulgences or resorted to carousals and excessive drinking."

To such an extent were the delights of luxury and sumptuous expense cultivated among the ancients that even the Ephesian painter Parrhasius dressed himself in purple and wore a gold crown on his head, as Clearelius records in his Lives.^a For he indulged in luxury in a way offensive to good taste and beyond his station as a painter,^b and yet in talk claimed the possession of virtue, inscribing on the works of art wrought by him the following verse: "A man who lives in dainty style and at the same time honours virtue, hath written these words." Whereupon a certain person who felt great annoyance at this claim wrote by way of correcting him: "A man who lives by the painter's stile." Now Parrhasius inscribed on many of his works the following^c: "A man who lives in dainty style and at the same time honours virtue, hath written these lines—Parrhasius, from Ephesus, his glorious fatherland. Nor have I left my father forgotten, Evenor who begot me, his own son, to carry off the first honours in Greek art." He also made a boast, without provoking the wrath of the gods, in these lines^d: "Though I speak to them that hear and believe not, yet I speak thus: I declare that now at last the sure goals of this art have been reached by my hand;

^a Pliny, op. cit. xxxv. 72, giving a clearer narrative of the facts, says that he was beaten by Timanthes when he painted Ajax contending with Odysseus for the arms of Achilles. Cf. Ael. V.H. ix. 11, on the authority of Theophrastus.

insurmountable is the boundary that I have fixed. Yet nothing that mortals have done is without blame." On one occasion, in Samos, he competed against an inferior artist^a with a painting of Ajax and was beaten; when his friends condoled with him he replied that he cared little so far as he himself was concerned, but he sympathized with Ajax for being defeated a second time.^b In his fondness for luxury he wore a purple cloak and had a white band on his head; he also supported himself with a staff embossed with gold spirals, and kept tight the straps of his sandals by means of gold latches. Yet, on the other hand, he did not work at his art without pleasure; on the contrary, it was easy for him, so much so that he even sang while he painted, as Theophrastus records in his treatise On Happiness.^c In solemn earnest he used to tell how, when he began to paint the Heracles of Lindus, the god appeared to him in a dream, and assumed exactly the pose that was appropriate for the picture. Hence he wrote on the panel^d: "As he appeared in the watches of the night, oft visiting Parrhasius whilst he slept, even so stands he here to behold."

In fact, whole schools of philosophers, even, have claimed the pursuit of luxury as the guiding principle of life; there is, for example, the so-called Cyrenaic School, which derived its origin from Aristippus the Socratic^e; he taught that this life of easy-going pleasure we have discussed is the goal,^a and that happiness is based upon it ; further, that it is for the single moment^b ; like men of profligate life, he regarded the memory of past enjoyments as having no importance for himself, any more than the expectation of pleasures to come ; rather, he judged the Good by the sole criterion of the present, and thought that past and future enjoyment had no relevancy to himself, because the first no longer had being, the second had no being as yet, and was uncertain ; which is exactly what persons who indulge in luxury feel in claiming that only the present can do any good. Moreover, his mode of life was in harmony with his doctrine, for he lived amid every form of luxury and expensive indulgence in perfumes, clothes, and women. At least he made no secret of keeping the courtesan Laïs, and shared the enjoyment of Dionysius's extravagances although often treated with ignominy by him. Hegesander, at any rate, says^c that once he was assigned a couch at Dionysius's court in an obscure corner, but bore it with equanimity, and when Dionysius asked him what he thought of the place to which he had been assigned as compared with the one he had the day before, he replied that it was about the same. " For the one I had yesterday," he said, " is to-day in dishonour because it is so far from me, though yesterday it was the most honourable place of all on account of my presence ; and so this one that I have to-day has actually become honoured by my presence, though yesterday it was in dishonour because I was not there." In another passage Hegesander says also^d : " When the slaves of Dionysius spilled some water on him and Antiphon taunted him for putting up with it he replied : ' Suppose I had been fishing, should I have left my job and gone home?' " Aristippus spent most of his time in Aegina, where he lived in luxury; hence Xenophon in his Memorabilia declares^a that Socrates would often admonish him and bring in the moralizing parable which he had composed^b of Virtue and Pleasure. But Aristippus, referring to Laïs, would say, "I possess her and am not possessed by her."^c And at the court of Dionysius he disagreed with some persons on the choice of the three women.^d He bathed himself in perfume and declared that^e "Even in the revels of Bacchus she that is really modest will not be corrupted." And Alexis, satirizing him in Galateia, makes a slave say the following concerning one of Aristippus's pupils^f: "My master once went in for dialectic when he was a lad, and essayed to be a philosopher. There was a man of Cyrene in the town named Aristippus, as the story goes, a wise man of genius, or rather, a man who stood at the forefront of all men at that time, and exceeded all men who had ever lived—in dissipation. To him my master paid a talent and became his pupil,^g Aristoxenus, the writer on music, says ^e in his Life of Archytas that among the envoys sent by Dionysius the Younger to the city of Tarentum was Polyarchus, nicknamed the High-Liver, a man entirely devoted to physical pleasures, and this not merely in act, but also by his own confession. He was an acquaintance of Archytas and not an utter stranger to philosophic teachings; he frequented the temple-enclosures and would walk about with the other followers of Archytas, listening to the discussion. On one occasion a question and debate arose concerning the appetites and in general the pleasures of the body, and Polyarchus said ^f: "To me at least, gentlemen, it has often before this appeared plain, as I considered the question, that the whole system which sets up these virtues is quite absurd, and far removed from nature's intent. For when nature speaks in her own voice, she bids us follow our pleasures, and declares that this is the right course for a man of sense^a; but to resist them, to subjugate the appetites, is the mark of one who is neither prudent nor happy nor comprehends the composite character of human nature. A strong proof of this is the fact that all men, whenever they attain to a power of sufficient magnitude, are borne along in the direction of their bodily pleasures, and regard this course as the end and aim of power, while they regard practically all other matters, to put it simply, as occupying a subordinate station. To-day one may cite the case of the Persian kings and anyone else who happens to be lord of a considerable monarchy; in earlier times again, there were the rulers of Lydia, Media, and still farther back, Assyria; not a single variety of pleasure was left untried by them; on the contrary, it is said that rewards were offered among the Persians for all who could invent a new pleasure; and with very good reason. For man's nature is such that it is soon surfeited with protracted pleasures, no matter how elaborately they have been perfected; consequently, since novelty has a mighty power to make pleasure seem greater, it is not to be ignored,^b but great attention should be paid to it. For this reason many kinds of food have been invented, many kinds of cakes, many kinds of incense and perfume, many kinds of garments and rugs, of cups, too, and other utensils; for all these things do, in fact, contribute certain pleasures, whenever the basic material belongs to those things which are admired by human nature; this certainly is what happens in the case of gold and silver and most things that are a delight to the eye as well as rare—all, in fact, that are regarded as perfectly made according to the rules of those arts which work in them."

Following these remarks he described the comforts enjoyed by the king of Persia, the variety and number of purveyors that he had, his indulgence in sexual pleasures, the perfumed odour of his body, his elegance and manners of conversation, the spectacles and the entertainments by artists, and declared that he had decided that the king of Persia was the happiest man of the times.^a "For he has pleasures secured for him in greatest number and completest form. Next to him (he continued) one might set down our own ruler, though far behind. For in the case of the king, all Asia supplies (his pleasure), as well as . . .^b whereas the service rendered to Dionysius must appear as something utterly trifling when compared with the other. That, therefore, such a life is eagerly desired is plain from what happens as the consequence of it. For the Medes hazarded the greatest dangers to deprive the Assyrians of their empire, for no other reason than to become masters of the Assyrians' wealth, and the Persians did the same thing to the Medes from the same motive; and the motive here is the enjoyment of physical pleasures. But lawgivers, in their desire to reduce the human race to one level and to bar every citizen from luxury, have caused a class of things called virtues to bob up;^a and so they have written statutes dealing with contracts and all other matters which they thought were essential in furthering the social partnership, and in particular concerning dress and manner of living in general, in order that it might be of the same nature for all. Since, therefore, the lawgivers were carrying on their fight against all forms of greed, the praise of justice began to be extended, and some poet, I believe, uttered the phrase, 'The golden countenance of Justice.'^b And again^c: 'The golden eye of Justice.' And the very name of Justice came to be deified, so that among some peoples there arose altars and sacrifices to Justice.^d Next to her they brought in Sobriety and Self-control besides, and gave the name 'greed'^e to superior advantages in pleasure; thus it came about that the man who obeyed the laws and the voice of the common herd was moderate in his bodily pleasures."^f

^a A whimsical allusion to class legislation? If εἶδος here is to be distinguished from γένος, the class (εἶδος) of the virtues is made to emerge above the general level of the race (γένος).

Duris, in the twenty-third book of his Histories, adds his testimony that in ancient times all monarchs had a consuming desire for drink.^g Hence, he says, counts his own death with that of his men, at the hands of Aegisthus, to Odysseus, saying that the latter would have been most grieved at the sight of the bowl, etc.

Homer represents Achilles as reviling Agamemnon and saying ^a: "Thou, heavy with wine, and with the eyes of a dog." And when he describes the manner of the king's death he says ^b: "How we lay round the mixing-bowl and the tables laden," thereby showing that even his death occurred at the very time when he was indulging his appetite for drink.

Another devotee of pleasure was Spensippus, Plato's kinsman ^c and successor as head of the school. Dionysius, at any rate, the tyrant of Sicily, in his Letter to Speusippus, after denouncing his fondness for pleasure, reproaches him also for his avarice as well as for his love of Latheneia, the Arcadian woman, who had also been Plato's pupil.

Yet Aristippus and his followers were not alone in welcoming the pleasure which is the result of motion,^d but Epicurus and his followers did the same. And, not to enter into an account of his "gusts ^e" and his "titillations," all of which Epicurus quotes many times, also the "ticklings" and "solicitations" which he speaks of in his treatise On the End, I will mention the following. He says, namely ^f: "As for myself, I cannot conceive the Good if I exclude the pleasures derived from taste, or those derived from sexual intercourse, or those derived from entertainments to which we listen, or those derived from the motions of a figure delightful to the eye." So Metrodorus says in his Letters^a: "Yes, Timocrates, devoted to the study of nature as you are, it is indeed the belly, the belly and nothing else, which any philosophy that proceeds according to nature makes its whole concern." And Epicurus, again, says^b: "The beginning and root of all good is the satisfaction of the belly, and all wise and exquisite things have in this their standard of reference." And in the treatise On the End he says again^c: "We should prize the Good and the virtues and such things as that; provided they give us pleasure; but if they do not give pleasure, we should renounce them"; by these statements clearly making virtue the minister of pleasure, and occupying the station of a handmaid. In another passage he says^d: "I spit upon the Good and those who fruitlessly admire it, whensoever it causes no pleasure."

The Romans, therefore, the most virtuous of men in all things, did a good job when they banished the Epicureans Alcaeus and Philiseus from the city, in the consulship of Lucius Postumius,^e because of the pleasures which they introduced. Similarly the people of Messenia thrust out the Epicureans by public decree, as King Antiochus also ejected from his kingdom all philosophers, writing the following order^f: "King Antiochus to Phantias: We have written to you before now that there shall be no philosopher in the capital or even in the country. Yct we learn that there are not a few, and that our young men are being corrupted because of your failure to do any of the things which we have prescribed concerning them. So soon, then, as you receive this letter, draw up a proclamation to effect the immediate departure of all philosophers from our territories, and as for all the young men who shall be found in their company, they shall be strung up,^a and their fathers shall be held to answer for the gravest charges; and let it not be otherwise."

Before Epicurus, however, the poet Sophocles proved to be an exponent of pleasure when he uttered such language as the following in Antigone^b: "For when men abandon pleasurable deeds I reckon such a one not alive, but I regard him as a living corpse. Ay, heap up mighty wealth in your house, if you so desire, and live in sovereign state; if, however, joy be absent from these things, I would not purchase all the rest from a man at the price of the shadow of smoke, in comparison with pleasure."

Lycon, too, the Peripatetic, according to Antigonus of Carystus,^c when he began his residence at Athens in order to carry on his studies, acquired an accurate knowledge of drinking-bouts in which all stood treat, and of how big a price every one of the ladies of easy virtue exacted. And even later, when he became head of the Peripatetic school,^d he used to entertain his friends at dinner with much ostentatious expense.

For besides all the artists called in to furnish entertainments, and all the silver-ware and couch-coverings, the other arrangements, the elaborate fare at the dinners, and the mob of servers and cooks, were such that many persons were afraid, and although they wanted to join the school they were brought up short, like persons who fear to enter a city the government of which is vicious and burdened with expensive taxes.* For they were obliged to assume the regular administration of the school for a period of thirty days, which meant that they were in charge of the good behaviour of the new students; then on the last day of the month they received ninepence from each of the new students, and on that sum they had to entertain at dinner not only those who had paid the fee, but any others whom Lycon invited, besides all those among the older men who made a business of visiting the school; consequently the money collected was not enough even to pay for the perfumery and the wreaths; he also had charge of the sacrifices, and was administrator of the rites in honour of the Muses. Now all this plainly had nothing to do with dialectic and philosophy, but was more appropriate to the pomp and circumstance of luxurious living. For even supposing that some who were unable to spend money on these things were excused from the duty because the resources at their disposal were too meagre and trifling, yet the practice was very harmful, to say the least. For surely the followers of Plato and Speusippus did not rush in throngs to the same place and form their gatherings merely to enjoy a dinner that lasted until the morning hours^a or to get drunk, but rather to show that they revered the gods and consorted with one another as cultivated persons should; and, chief of all, to gain relaxation and take part in learned discussions. But all these aims, as we have seen, became in the eyes of their successors secondary to their love of soft cloaks and the lavish expense just described; nor do I except any of the others. But Lycon was so vulgar in his ostentation that he took a twenty-couch room in Conon's house, in the most conspicuous part of the city, which suited him for holding his receptions. Lycon, moreover, was a good and skilful ball-player.

Concerning Anaxarchus, Clearchus of Soli, in the fifth book of his Lives, writes as follows^b: "After great wealth had fallen to the lot of Anaxarchus (who was called the philosopher of eudaemonism) through the folly of those who rendered him benefits,^c his wine was poured out for him by a naked young girl who had been selected because she surpassed in beauty all others, although, to tell the truth, she laid bare not so much her own nakedness as the lustfulness of those who treated her in this way. His bread-maker wore gloves, and had a mask to cover his mouth when he kneaded the dough, to prevent sweat from streaming upon it and the kneader from breathing upon the mixture." Hence one might appropriately quote for this wise philosopher the verses from The Harp-maker of Anaxilas^d: "Oiling his skin with means that many persons supported Anaxarchus in luxury through mistaken notions of his worth. On his heroic death see Diog. L. ix. 59.

How much nobler than these persons was Gorgias of Leontini! Of him Clearchus, whom we just quoted, says^d in the eighth book of his Lives that because of his sobriety of life he lived in the full possession of his senses for nearly one hundred and ten years.^e And when somebody asked him what his mode of life was, seeing that he had lived so long a time so comfortably and with senses intact, he replied, “I have never done anything for the sake of pleasure.” But Demetrius of Byzantium in the fourth book of his work On Poetry says^f: “When Gorgias of Leontini was asked what was the cause of his living more than a hundred years he answered, ‘The fact that I have never yet done anything for the sake of anybody else.’”^g

Ochus,^h again, held the throne for a long time, and acquired, in general, resources for living in a style that

^b Cf. Athen. 435 d (vol. iv. p. 472). Antipater's economy led him to spread on his dinner-couch an ordinary curtain or rug-container, which had rings for suspending the curtain would suffice for anyone. When he was dying his eldest son asked him what he had done in order to preserve his kingdom so many years (since he desired to imitate him in this), and he answered, "I have practised justice before all men and gods." Carystius of Pergamum in Historical Notes quotes Cephisodorus of Thebes as saying ^a that Polydorus, the physician of Teos, ate at the same mess with Antipater; the latter had a cheap curtain to which the rings were still attached as in the case of the bales used for carrying rugs; on this he would recline at dinner, with a few bronze jars and cups for service; for he lived on a small scale and was entirely alien to a life of luxury. ^b

As for Tithonus, ^c lying as he did in bed from morning until sunset, his desires could hardly excite him when evening drew on; hence he is said to have lain with Dawn, but because he was so wrapped up in his lusts, in his old age he is shut up in a bird-cage, being literally "suspended" as a result. And Melanthius, ^d too, stretched his neck so far that he choked himself to death with his indulgence, being greedier than Odysseus's Melanthius. ^e And many other persons have become completely deformed in body through their unmeasured indulgence in pleasure, others have grown to bodily fatness, while still others through great luxury have actually reached the point of insensibility to pain. For example Nymphis of Heraclia in the twelfth book of his work On Heraclia on a pole, or for drawing a thong through them when rugs were transported in it.

^c The difficult and allegorical language, as well as the content, points to Clearchus as the author of this note, cf. Athen. 6 c (vol. i. p. 26). For the story of Tithonus, changed in undying old age into a chirping cicada, see Schol. II. xi. 1.

says ^a that Dionysius, the son of Clearchus, first tyrant of Heracleia, who also became tyrant of his native land, gradually became overloaded with flesh by reason of the luxury and gluttony in which he lived daily; hence, because of his obesity, he was afflicted with shortness of breath and fits of choking. So the physicians prescribed that he should get some fine needles, exceedingly long, which they thrust through his ribs and belly whenever he happened to fall into a very deep sleep. Now up to a certain point under the flesh, completely calloused as it was by fat, the needle caused no sensation; but if the needle went through so far as to touch the region which was free of fat, then he would be thoroughly aroused. When he held audiences with people who desired to see him he placed a box in front of his body in order that while hiding the other parts of his person, his face alone might project above them as he conversed with his interviewers. Menander, by no means given to malicious description, mentions him in The Fishermen, after first telling the story of some refugees from Heracleia. They say ^b: "Indeed he was a fat hog lying upon his snout"; and again: "He enjoyed luxury—but in such wise that he won't enjoy it long." And farther on ^c: "One thing for my own self I desire—and this seems to me the only death that is a happy dying—to lie on my back with its many rolls

Like him^b also was the seventh Ptolemy who ruled over Egypt, the king who proclaimed himself Benefactor, to be sure, but who received from the Alexandrians the name of Malefactor. The Stoic Poseidonius, at least, who travelled with Scipio Africanus when he was invited to Alexandria, and saw Ptolemy, writes in the seventh book of his Histories^c: "Through indulgence in luxury his body had become utterly corrupted with fat and with a belly of such size that it would have been hard to measure it with one's arms; to cover it he wore a tunic which reached to his feet and which had sleeves reaching to his wrists; but he never went abroad on foot except on Scipio's account."^d And that this king was not a stranger to luxury is attested by himself in the eighth book of his Commentaries, when he relates of himself how he became priest of Apollo in Cyrene, and got up a banquet for those who had been priests before him; he writes as follows^e: "The Artemitia is a very important festival in Cyrene, at which the priest of Apollo (who is chosen annually) gives a dinner to those who have preceded him in that office, and places before each guest a bowl; this is an earthenware vessel capable of holding about twenty artabae,^a in which are placed many pieces of wild game, nicely cooked, sometimes also many from domestic fowls, and several kinds of sea-fish and imported smoked fish; some persons often add the gift of a neat little foot-boy.^b But we abolished all that sort of thing, and procured phiaiai of solid silver, each alone having as great value as the entire outlay for the things we have mentioned; moreover we added a horse, all caparisoned, along with a groom and bridle-ornaments inlaid with gold, and invited every guest on leaving for home to mount the horse and ride." Ptolemy's son Alexander also grew fatter and fatter—the one who killed his own mother when she was joint ruler with him. At any rate Poseidonius says of him, in the forty-seventh book of his Histories^c:

"The master of Egypt, a man who was hated by the masses, though flattered by his courtiers, lived in great luxury; but he could not even go out to ease himself unless he had two men to lean upon as he walked. And yet when it came to the rounds of dancing at a drinking-party he would jump from a high conch barefoot as he was, and perform the figures in a livelier fashion than those who had practised them."

Agatharchides in the sixteenth book of his European History says ^a that Magas, who reigned over Cyrene for fifty years, was so undisturbed by wars that he abandoned himself to luxury, and was weighted down with monstrous masses of flesh in his last days; in fact he choked himself to death because he was so fat, never taking any exercise and always eating quantities of food. The same authority, on the other hand, records ^b in the twenty-seventh book that among the Lacedaemonians it was accounted no ordinary disgrace to a man if he was seen to have either a figure somewhat lacking in virility or a corpulence that made his belly prominent; hence, every ten days, the young warriors were made to stand naked before the ephors. The ephors also closely observed every day both the clothing worn by the young men and also the bedding they used; ^c and with good reason. There were, it is true, cooks in Sparta who were skilled in the preparation of meat, but of nothing else whatever. Again, in the twenty-seventh book Agatharchides has said ^d that the Lacedaemonians summoned Naucleides the son of Polybiades, whose body was overlaid with excessive flesh, having become obese through luxurious indulgence, to come before the assembly; there Lysander

* In 397 B.C., undertaken at the instance of Lysander, Xen. Hellen. iii. 4. 2 ff. On the quarrel between him and Agesilaus, and later reconciliation, ibid. §§ 8, 9, Plut. Ages. 8. 498 in open meeting reviled him so bitterly as a wanton profligate that the Lacedaemonians almost ejected him from the city, and warned him that they would certainly do so if he did not reform his manner of life; Lysander also remarked that when Agesilaus was quartered near the Hellespont in his war against the barbarians,^a observing that the Asiatics, while in the matter of clothing they were expensively dressed, yet as regards their bodies were for that very reason useless, he gave orders that those who were captured should be taken to the auctioneer stripped of their clothes, which should be sold separately, for he wanted his allies to realize that the contest ahead of them was for large stakes, but against worthless men, and so hurl themselves with more alacrity of spirit against their opponents. Again, Python, the orator of Byzantium, was very corpulent, as Leon, his fellow-citizen, records^b; and on one occasion, he said to his fellow-citizens, when their factions were quarrelling with one another, by way of exhorting them to a reconciliation: "You, fellow-citizens, can see what my person is like; but I have a wife who is much fatter even than I. When, then, we are of one mind, even an ordinary narrow bed can hold us; but if we quarrel, the whole house isn't big enough."

How much better it is, therefore, my good Timocrates, for us to be poor and rather thin as compared with the persons enumerated by Hermippus in The Cercopes, in preference to being excessively rich and look like the sea-monster of Tanagra,^a as the aforesaid worthies did! For Hermippus, addressing Dionysus, says^b: "The poor, indeed, are already sacrificing to thee small maimed cattle, skinnier than Leotrophides or Thumantis." Aristophanes also, in Gerytades, gives the following list of skinny people—men, he says, dispatched by the poets as envoys to Hades to visit the poets down there. He says^c: "A. And who to 'the hiding-place of the dead, unto the gates of darkness' has dared to descend? B. Why, we have chosen, in general convocation assembled, one representative of every art, men who, we know, are Hades-visitants and who love often to go down there. A. What, are there really men among you who are Hades-visitants? B. Certainly, just as there are people who are Thrace-visitants. Heaven is my witness. You've got it exactly. A. And who may they be? B. Well, first of all there's Sannyrion—he's

^a F.H.G. ii. 329, J. 2 B 677. For Python, a pupil of Isocrates, see Dem. De Cor. 136, and Goodwin p. 270, Philostr. Vit. Apollon. vii. 37. He spoke in the interest of Philip, the sedition in Byzantium having been stirred up by the Athenians. But the same story is told of Leon, here cited as the authority for it; see Suidas s. Λέων Λέωντος. Python and Leon seem to be confused with each other in Philostr. Vit. Soph. 514 (L.C.L. p. 70).

^a That this was a fat fish and not a fat man, as Meineke thought, is certain. Pausanias ix. 20. 4 tells of a marvellous Triton which he had seen in Tanagra; according to Aelian, A.N. xlii. 21 it was mummified (τάριχον Τρίτωνα). See Frazer, Pausanias v. 83 ff.; Wernicke, J. Arch. Inst. ii. 114 ff.

^a Kock i. 233; Leotrophides was a byword for leanness (Aristoph. Av. 1406 and Schol.), the memory of whom lasted until the time of Lucian (Hist. Conscr. 34): "It would be worth a good deal to be able to turn lead into gold or . . . Leotrophides into Milon." Thumantis is a "homeless" wanderer in Aristoph. Eq. 1266.

^b Kock i. 428; the first verse is adapted from Eurip. Hec. 1. Of Meletus, ridiculed again by Sannyrion below, very little is known, except that he was "a rather frigid poet" (Suidas s.v.). He wrote tragedies, drinking-songs (Aristoph. Ran. 1302), and erotic verse (Athen. 605 c). He was the father of the Meletus who accused Socrates in 399 B.C., for whom see Plato, Euthyph. 2 b and Apol. passim. Aristophanes did not approve the imperialistic designs of Athens in Thrace. Hesychius defines "Hades-visitants" as the lean and thin, with one foot in the grave (ἐγγὺς θανάτου ὄντες).

from the ranks of comedy, while from the tragic choruses there's Meletus, and from the cyclic choruses^a Cinesias." Farther on he says: "How very thin are the hopes you were riding on, after all! For these poor devils, if the river^b of diarrhoea come on all at once too vehemently, will be caught up by it and carried away." Regarding Sannyrion, Strattis, also, says in Keeping Cool^c: "Sannyrion's leathern reinforcement." And of Meletus Sannyrion himself says in Laughter^d: "Meletus, that corpse from the Lenaeum."^e As for Cinesias, he really was very thin and very tall, and Strattis has written a whole play on him, in which he calls him^f "Phthian Achilles," because he constantly used the word Phthian in his poetry; so, with jesting reference to his figure, he says "Phthian Achilles." Others, again, like Aristophanes,^g often speak of him as "linden Cinesias," because he got a board of linden-wood and to hide his leanness. The futility of such a device is further hinted at by the pun on the phrase σικίνη επικουρία, "weak help"—fig-wood being proverbially useless, cf. Athen. 98 f (vol. i. p. 426); σικυλίτη επικουρία is also used of the δλισβος, Aristoph. Lys. 110.

^a Kock i. 793.

^b The precinct sacred to Dionysus Lenaeus, god of the wine-press; see Dörpfeld u. Reisch, Griech. Theater 7 ff. Meletus appears to have come off badly in a contest of tragedy at the Lenaea. In Lenaeum there is an allusion also to the deme to which Meletus belonged, Πιδος, which means "cask," and which the audience would associate with Dionysus, the god of the festival.

^c Kock i. 716.

^d Av. 1377. The scholiast cites Callistratus as explaining φολέρινον, "having the colour of linden-wood," i.e. with a greenish-yellow complexion; but Euphronius, he says, referred the epithet to the lightness of the wood: Cinesias's poetry was thin in quality. See Plat. Gorg. 501 ε.

fastened it by straps around him in order not to be bent in two by his height and leanness. Further, the orator Lysias in the speech entitled In Defence of Phantias—the case involved an accusation of proposing an unconstitutional law—alleges that Cinesias was sickly and also in general clever, asserting that he gave up his profession, became a blackmailer, and got rich as a result. Note that he means the poet and not another Cinesias; he is clearly the same, as indicated not only from the emphatic way in which he (as poet) is ridiculed in comedy for godlessness, but also from the speech of Lysias, in which he is pointed to as a godless man. The orator speaks as follows ^a: "I am astonished that you feel no indignation because Cinesias poses as the defender of our laws, when you all know that he is the most impious and lawless man in the world. Is he not the man who commits crimes of such enormity against the gods that it is a scandal even to mention them to others, though you hear about them from the producers of comedy ^b every year? Was it not in his company that Apollophanes, Mystalides, and Lysitheus once dined together, appointing a day that religion forbids, and adopting the name for themselves of Evil-Spirit-Votaries instead of New-Mooners ^c—appropriately enough, considering their evil fate; not, to be sure, that they had got the notion that they were actually bringing this upon themselves, but simply because they mocked the gods and your laws. would; but in the case of Cinesias, the one known to the largest number of persons, the gods reduced him to such a condition that his enemies, rather than have him die, preferred to have him live as an example to others, so that they might know that for those who adopt an outrageously insolent attitude to religion the gods do not always put off vengeance upon the children,^a but miserably destroy the culprits themselves; laying upon them larger and severer punishments, in the shape of disaster and disease, than those which they visit upon other men. For to die or to fall ill in a normal way is the common lot of us all, but to continue for so long a time in such a condition as his, dying every day without being able to end his life, is the proper reward for those only who have committed such crimes as he has." This, then, is what the orator has to say about Cinesias.

Philitas, the poet of Cos, was also rather thin; why, his leanness of body was such that he had to wear on his feet balls made of lead to keep him from being upset by the wind. And Polemon the Periegete, in his book On Wonders, says^b that Archestratus the soothsayer, when captured by the enemy, was placed on the scales and found to have the weight of a penny; he was so lean! The same writer records also that Panaretus never resorted to a physician (he was a student of the philosopher Arcesilaus, and Polemon says he lived at the court of Ptolemy Euergetes, from whom he received twelve talents a year).^c But he was very thin, though always free from illness. Metrodorus of Scepsis in the second book of his treatise On Training says^a that the poet Hipponax was not only small of body, but also thin; and yet he was so muscular that, besides other feats, he could throw even an empty jug a very great distance; (a notable feat,) since unweighted substances, being unable to cleave the air, cannot have as a rule a forcible momentum. Another thin man was Philippides, against whom there is a speech by the orator Hypereides, who says that he was one of the politicians. His thinness made him insignificant in bodily appearance, as Hypereides says.^b And so Alexis says in The Thesprotians^c: "Thou, Hermes, escorter of the dead,^d thou to whom Philippides is allotted, and thou, eye of Night in sables robed." And Aristophon in Plato^e: "A. Within three days I'll make him skinnier than Philippides. B. What, you can make men corpses in so few days?" And Menander in Temperament^f: "If the famine in your country ever bites that fine fellow, it will make of him a skinnier corpse than Philippides." It is clear that "to be philippidized" was said for "to be very thin," from what Alexis says in The Woman who drank Belladonna^g: "A. Now it is much better to be like that in appearance than like the man of whom Antiphanes says in Aeolus^a: "This fellow, then, because of his drunken habits and his fat body, is called 'Wineskin'^b by all the natives." And Heracleides of Pontus in the tract On Pleasure says^c that Deinias the perfume-seller after plunging into a love-affair through self-indulgence and squandering large sums, when he had lost the power to satisfy his desires, became so crazed by grief that he castrated himself; all these cases^d are the result of unbridled indulgence.

There was a custom at Athens, among persons who lived in luxury, of anointing even the feet with perfumes; so Cephisodorus says in Trophonius^e: "Then you must anoint my body; buy me some scent of orris and of rose, hurry, Xanthias, and for my feet besides, buy me some asarabacca."^f Eubulus in Sphinx-Cario^g: "(You should have seen me) lying at

Again, in The Villagers of Thoricus^a: "A. So she's really bathing? Well then, what? B. Yes, she has a box inlaid with gold, and from it she anoints her feet and legs with Egyptian scent, her cheeks and nipples with palm-oil, one of her arms^b with mint, her eyebrows and hair with sweet marjoram, her knee and neck with tufted thyme. . . ." Anaxandrides, too, says in Protesilaus^c: "Perfume bought at Peron's shop, some of which he sold yesterday to Melanopus, and expensive Egyptian it is too; with it Melanopus anoints the feet of Callistratus." But even in the time of Themistocles^d the manners of life were luxurious, as Telecleides testifies in The Prytaner.^e And so Cratinus in The Cheirons brings out distinctly the luxury of the earlier times when he says^f: "Every man sat in the assembly with a sprig of soft mint, or a rose, or a lily at his ear, or lounged about the market-place with an apple and a staff in his hands."

Now Clearchus of Soli in his Amatoria says^g: "Why is it that we carry in our hands flowers and apples and such things as that? Is it because Nature tries to reveal through our love for these things those who have a desire for beauty^h? Is this, then, the reason—as a kind of revelation provided by Nature, why certain persons carry fruits and flowers in their hands and enjoy them? Or are there, rather, two reasons for their carrying them about? For in fact they do use these means as a first step towards a meeting, and also as a sign of their desire therefor;—for those from whom favours are desired, that they permit being accosted, while for those who have given the flower it is the public notice that they themselves have a right to share in the other's beauty. For the solicitation, made in the form of beautiful flowers and fruits, invites those who accept them to give in exchange the flower of their own bodies. Or perhaps they keep for themselves the beauty of the flowers as a comfort and consolation for the beauty possessed by the beloved, thus gratifying their desires.⁶ The yearning, that is, for the loved one is diverted by the possession of the flowers. Unless, to be sure, it is for the mere sake of personal adornment, just as they wear any other thing that tends to enhance their beauty, that people carry these things and enjoy them. For it is not only those who put wreaths of beautiful flowers on their heads, but also those who carry them in their hands, whose entire appearance is thereby further adorned. And so it may possibly be on account of their love of beauty; and there is thus revealed the passion for beautiful things and a fond disposition toward loveliness. Lovely indeed is the aspect of fruitage and prime when one beholds it in fruit and flowers. Or may we say that all lovers are made over-luxurious, as it were, by their passion and thus inclined to beautify themselves, and so take a wanton pleasure in beautiful things? It is, indeed, only natural that those who think themselves beautiful and ripe should gather flowers. Hence also the girls in the train of Persephone are said to be gathering flowers, and Sappho says^a she saw 'A very tender maiden plucking flowers.'"

So dependent on their sensual pleasures were the men of those days that they actually dedicated a temple to Aphrodite of the Beautiful Buttocks, from the following circumstance. A farmer had two beautiful daughters who once fell into a dispute with each other and even went out upon the highway to settle the question as to which of them had the more beautiful curves. One day a lad passed by whose father was a rich old man, and to him they displayed themselves; and he, after gazing at them, decided in favour of the older girl; in fact he fell in love with her so passionately that when he returned to town he went to bed ill, and related what had happened to his brother, who was younger than he. So the latter also went into the country to gaze at the girls, and he too fell in love, but with the other girl. Now the father, at least, begged them to contract a more respectable marriage, but since he failed to persuade them, he brought the girls from their country home to his sons, having got the consent of the girls' father, and joined them in marriage to them. The girls, therefore, were called "the fair-buttocked" by the townspeople, as Cercidas of Megalopolis relates in his Iambic Verses. He says^b: "There was a pair of fair-buttocked sisters in Syracuse." It was they, therefore, who, having come into possession of splendid wealth, founded the temple of Aphrodite, calling the goddess the Fair-buttocked, as recorded also by Archelans in his Iambic Verses.

Not without interest is the story of a very delightful life of luxury resulting from insanity, narrated by Heracleides of Pontus in his work On Pleasure. He writes as follows^a: "Thrasyllus the son of Pythodorus, of the deme Aexonê, was once so afflicted by madness resulting from luxurious living that he imagined all the ships putting in at Peiræus to be his own, and registered them as such in his accounts; he would dispatch them forth and transact all business for them, and when they returned from a voyage he would receive them with as exuberant joy as one would feel were he the sole owner of all the goods. To be sure, if they were lost he made no further search for them, but if they came back safe he showed his delight and lived in the greatest satisfaction. On the arrival in Athens of his brother Crito from Sicily, he was apprehended and placed in charge of a physician, who cured him of his insanity. But he often told the story of the way he had lived when mad, alleging that never before in his whole life had he enjoyed himself more; for no pain of any sort assailed him, and on the other hand the sum of his pleasures was enormous."

ADDITIONAL NOTE

P. 219 note c. Mr. W. W. Tarn, in J.H.S. liii. (1933), p. 60, believes, if I understand him aright, that the Saviour Gods are Ptolemy II and Arsinoë, and not Ptolemy I and Berenice. He adds: "probably as yet there were no θεοὶ σωτῆρες in the official sense."
