PIUS XII, POPE

Pontificate: March 2, 1939, to Oct. 9, 1958; b. Eugenio Maria Giuseppe Giovanni Pacelli, Rome, March 2, 1876. He was the second of four children of Filippo Pacelli, a lawyer, and Virginia Graziosi.

PREPAPAL CAREER

He was educated in Rome, studying philosophy at the Gregorian University, and theology at Sant' Appollinare (today the Lateran University). After ordination (April 2, 1899), he studied Canon Law, and won a doctorate in utroque jure (1902). Entering the papal Secretariate of State (1901), he became (1904) the close collaborator of Pietro GASPARRI in the gigantic task of drawing up the Code of Canon Law. He was professor of ecclesiastical diplomacy (1909–14) at the Pontificia Accademia dei Nobili ecclesiastici. He became assistant secretary of state (1911), pro-secretary of state (1912), and secretary of the Congregation for Extraordinary Ecclesiastical Affairs (1914).

Nuncio. Consecrated titular archbishop of Sardes by Benedict XV (May 13, 1917), he was at the same time appointed nuncio to Bavaria, representing the Vatican in its peace efforts with Germany. He dealt with the German chancellors Von Bethmann-Hollweg and Michaelis and with Kaiser William II. Pius XII revealed in later years that the absence in the German reply of any assurance that the integrity and independence of Belgium would be reestablished were enough to frustrate papal mediation.

He became nuncio to Germany (June 22, 1920) and dean of the Berlin diplomatic corps. He signed the concordats with Bavaria (March 29, 1924) and Prussia (June 14, 1929).

Secretary of State. Created cardinal (Dec. 16, 1929), he replaced Cardinal Gasparri as secretary of state (Feb. 7, 1930), and concluded the concordat with Baden (Oct. 12, 1932). Cardinal Pacelli went as papal LEGATE to the Eucharistic Congress in Buenos Aires (October 1934), to the jubilee celebration in Lourdes (April 1935), to Lisieux to dedicate the basilica of St. Thérèse (July 1937), and to the Eucharistic Congress in Budapest (May 1938).

He traveled (October 1936) in an unofficial capacity to the United States, mainly to experience at first hand its Catholic life. Covering more than 9,000 miles by land and air, he visited 12 of the 16 ecclesiastical provinces, met 79 bishops, and observed Catholicism at work in education as well as in social and charitable endeavors. He was invited by President Roosevelt to dine at Hyde Park.

Concordat with Germany. Soon after the concordat (June 5, 1933) with Austria, whose chancellor was Dollfuss, another was concluded (July 20) with the German Republic. The Hitler regime had first proposed it at Easter; it was the German government that initiated the proceedings. Previously (March 24), the Center party and the Bavarian People's party, whom German Catholics rightly considered representatives of their interests, had approved the enabling act that gave Hitler unlimited powers. Also the German bishops had declared unequivocally (March 28) that Catholics could cooperate with the new state despite obviously irreconcilable differences between the Catholic Church and National Socialism. Cardinal Pacelli had in no way influenced either of these events; yet he had to take them into consideration. Since the new concordat agreed to all the demands of the Holy See, even to the continuation of Catholic schools and the earlier concordats with the German states, Rome would have put itself in the wrong and placed German Catholics in a dangerous situation by refusing to sign. At this time also German Catholics expected the Holy See to intercede in their behalf, because guarantees of their rights had become questionable since Hitler's accession to power (Jan. 30, 1933). The Holy See could fulfill these expectations only by negotiation and a treaty with Berlin. During the negotiations the dissolution of the Center party was not discussed. Cardinal Pacelli regretted very much this party's dissolution of itself (July 5, 1933) during the concordat negotiations, because, for good reason, he wanted to see it survive until the signing of the concordat.

Later negotiations between Pacelli and the Hitler government (1933–39) are contained in some 60 memoranda, written in Pacelli's own hand, which make clear his struggle to have the German government observe the concordat. The encyclical of PIUS XI, Mit brennender Sorge (March 14, 1937), climaxed this controversy.

PONTIFICATE

Cardinal Pacelli was elected pope March 2, 1939, and crowned March 12.

World War II. In the following months, until September 1, he sought to prevent war. The climax of these efforts was his diplomatic move (May 3) proposing that existing differences between Italy and France and between Germany and Poland be settled peacefully by a conference attended by these four powers and England. Many considered his proposal premature. Hitler thought it pointless. In August, with war imminent, the pope kept uninterrupted contact with both sides until the last moment, hoping to prevent the catastrophe. His appeal to the world (August 24) declared: "Nothing is lost by peace; everything is lost by war."

Pius XII relayed messages (November 1939–February 1940) between the German resistance movement and the Allies. The former wanted to know if the Allies would be ready for an armistice and peace negotiations in the event of a German general strike. Pius XII had at that time offered to leave nothing undone to end the war. As an important English official observed in 1944, he went as far as a pope could possibly have gone. In these communications it was presumed and understood that Poland would regain its former status, and that Austria would decide its own future, whether of independence or annexation to Germany.

Myron Taylor was named by President Roosevelt as his personal envoy to Pius XII (Dec. 25, 1939).

The meeting between Pius XII and Hitler's foreign minister, Joachim von Ribbentrop (March 10, 1940), could have no bearing on war or peace, since Ribbentrop refused any conversation on this topic.

The pope's efforts to keep Italy out of the conflict kept increasing from late 1939, and included personal meetings with King Victor Emmanuel III (Dec. 21 and 28, 1939) and correspondence with Mussolini. With Italy's entrance into the war (June 10, 1940) Pius XII intervened to save Rome. He wanted it declared an open city, recognized as such by the warring nations, and kept free of troops and commandos. This goal was realized in good part, although not perfectly, and only after the greatest difficulties. When Ernst von Weizsäcker was asked who saved Rome, he replied: "Above all others it was the pope, who merely by staying in Rome forced the opposing armies to spare the city.” Pius XII was determined not to leave Rome save under duress. Contrary to rumors, he did not leave Rome during the entire war.

Papal Mediation. The Allies declined to negotiate with Hitler under any circumstances. It was also inconceivable that Hitler would make any move to save the German people. This situation blocked the way to any kind of mediation. Of the two systems, National Socialism and Communist Bolshevism, Pius considered the latter more dangerous. But he never approved Hitler’s war with Russia, nor did he consider it a crusade. He regretted very much the unconditional surrender terms promulgated at Casablanca (1943) because they could only lengthen hostilities. On the other hand, Berlin would not agree to let Rome intervene for the cessation or even lessening of aerial warfare because it hoped to develop a more lethal weapon than the enemy possessed. Italian Fascists were responsible for the bomb that fell on the Vatican (March 1, 1943).

Papal Charities. Assistance for needy individuals and countries was organized by the Pontificia Commissione Assistenza (PCA), which since 1952 has operated under the name Pontificia Opera di Assistenza (POA). Aid was extended without discrimination to all suffering persons during the war: prisoners of war, deportees, internees, refugees, the hungry and homeless, the politically and racially persecuted. Sums were also expended for the protection of buildings, especially churches and libraries. Papal kitchens during 1944 served 3,600,000 portions of soup monthly. Of the refugees who poured into Rome throughout the war, the PCA helped 52,000 to return to their homes. The pontifical information service received 9,891,497 inquiries about missing persons and in turn sent 11,293,511 inquiries of its own. Many of these appeals were handled under unusual circumstances.

Help to Jews. Jews received extensive aid. From the very start of his pontificate, Pius XII continued Pius XI’s program of aid to Jews, especially to German Jews. Jewish refugees received financial aid, and Pius contributed his total private funds to them in cases of extraordinary urgency. After the German occupation of Rome (September 1943), the pope responded to Jewish pleas by offering them 15 kilos of gold in the event that they were unable to raise the 50 kilos demanded of them, but in this case his help proved unnecessary. Cloister regulations in religious houses were lifted to supply refuge to 4,447 Jews, exclusive of the large number in the Lateran and Vatican along with non-Jews. A special agency of the pontifical information service searched for Jews, especially in Germany, and handled 37,000 cases. Close cooperation existed between the pontifical St. Raphael Society and the Jewish Delasem to help Jews escape overseas. Pius XII’s financial aid to Jews far exceeded $4 million. The Catholic Refugees Committee in the United States supplied the pope with plentiful financial means.

In his appeals for the humanizing of war and abolishing its brutalities and atrocities, Pius XII twice condemned unequivocally the exterminating of Jews, in his Christmas message (Dec. 24, 1942) and in his speech to the college of cardinals (June 2, 1943). One reason for a certain caution on the pope’s part was the belief, which proved ill-founded, that a class of European Jews, for example those in Theresienstadt, would merely be restricted to their ghettos, but not exterminated. He did not want to endanger these people. All qualified judges, even those less favorably disposed to the pope, deny that any further formal papal move would have deterred Hitler from annihilating the Jews.

With the appearance of Rolf Hochhuth’s play The Deputy in 1963 began the practice of distorting the actions of Pius XII with regard to the Nazis. A pope whose extraordinary efforts on behalf of Jews during the Nazi hegemony had hitherto been universally praised was now portrayed as the secret sharer of Nazi antisemitism if not an actual participant in the holocaust. Such libels were more than adequately addressed by Pincas Lapide in his magisterial The Last Three Popes and the Jews (1967). It was the careful calculation of this Jewish author that 860,000 Jews had been saved from certain death at the hands of the Nazis thanks to the efforts of Pius XII. No one has been able to refute the number given by Lapide—he thought the number could be as high as a million. Nevertheless, criticism of Pius grew—much of it fueled by popular books that distorted the historical record, but some prompted by a desire to give a responsible answer to the question whether the pope could (and should) have done more on behalf of the Jews.

Vatican Excavations. During and after the war Pius XII promoted the excavations under ST. PETER’S BASILICA. Msgr. Ludwig KAAS and the archeologists Bruno M. Apollonj Ghetti, Antonio Ferrua, SJ, Enrico Josi, and Engelbert Kirschbaum, SJ, were in charge. Their excavations resulted in discoveries important for Christian and secular archeology. Among other things they fixed with certainty the location of the original grave of the Apostle St. PETER (see VATICAN).

Pius XII as Teacher. In volume and scope the teachings of Pius XII surpassed those of any of his predecessors. His oral allocutions alone numbered nearly 1,000. He spoke 36 times to Catholics from the United States, and on five occasions asked help for hungry children from Catholic students of the United States. The fundamental theme of his principal speeches was the confrontation of contemporary civilization and culture with the Catholic outlook on life. He defended Catholic schools strongly. Topics common to the medical profession and Catholic moral theology received thorough treatment. Although disinclined to be hyperspiritual, he opposed the opinion that politics has nothing to do with religion. He held it a moral obligation, and a serious one under certain conditions, to exercise the right to vote.

Social Questions. In his numerous promulgations on social questions, Pius XII maintained the traditional Catholic social doctrine. He insisted that if the objectives of social reform and social policy are to be realized, then the social question must concentrate on preserving the dignity, freedom, and eternal value of the human person, and consequently on the proper functioning of the three indispensable divisions of social structure: the family, private property, and the state. The individual and the family take precedence over the state. The state cannot dispose of a guiltless individual's body and life, or sacrifice his moral or physical integrity in the interest of the common good, or compel him to act contrary to the dictates of his conscience. It is the purpose of society to serve the individual and not the contrary (see SOCIAL THOUGHT, PAPAL).

War and Peace. Pius XII gave a classic definition of the religious, psychological, and legal structure of a lasting peace, especially in his Christmas messages between 1939 and 1942. As a realist, he did not favor peace at any price. Presupposing these principles, he insisted on bilateral, controlled disarmament as the only effective means to prevent war. However, he maintained that as long as disarmament was not a reality, and any government could use an offensive war as a means of attaining an international political goal, then peaceful nations could not be denied the right to coordinate a system of defense, which, through its very existence and corresponding strength, might prevent enemy aggression (see WAR, MORALITY OF).

Government. Although Pius XII was legalistic by natural inclination and by training, he viewed governments and political systems with strict objectivity. His outward reserve toward the choice of the Italian people (May 5, 1946) between a monarchical or republican form of government was necessary, and in no way a "Vatican revenge on the House of Savoy." The general principles that Pius XII supplied for the new order, during and after the war, excluded totalitarian systems. The democratic state, for its part, to be equal to its task, must make great demands on the moral responsibility of its people (Christmas message, 1944). He indicated to the Roman nobility (Jan. 14, 1952) that the age of privileged classes was past, and that they should place themselves at the service of the new state. The Prussian Concordat, which dealt with the rights of the Catholic Church in Prussia at the time of the Weimar republic, was the work of Pacelli as nuncio and the socialist minister President Otto Braun. The concordat with Spain (Aug. 27, 1953) permitted closer cooperation between the Church and State, and a stronger governmental influence in episcopal appointments than in the other concordats concluded since 1918; yet it did not mark a return to the PATRONATO REAL of the old Spanish monarchy. Pius XII was a man of the Church, who always strove to realize the Church's mission as well as possible under given circumstances.

Doctrinal Topics. The encyclical HUMANI GENERIS (Aug. 12, 1950) combated some recent theological trends. MUNIFICENTISSIMUS DEUS (Nov. 1, 1950) defined the ASSUMPTION OF MARY, while intentionally avoiding the question of the Blessed Mother's physical death. The encyclical Ad caeli Reginam (Oct. 11, 1954) dealt with the sublime dignity of Mary (see MARY, BLESSED VIRGIN, QUEENSHIP OF). Purposely he left the question of her MEDIATION and COREDEMPTION open to theological discussion. The encyclical MYSTICI CORPORIS appeared June 29, 1943.

On the subject of TOLERANCE, Pius XII stated (Dec. 6, 1953; Sept 7, 1955) that the Church, in its awareness of its divine mission to all men, practices tolerance toward other religious-ethical confessions mindful of the good faith of those living in invincible ignorance, and attentive to the common good of Church and state within individual nations, and also of the entire Church. On Sept. 7, 1955, he characterized as a product of the times the "medieval concept" that all temporal authority comes from God through the pope as Christ's representative.

In an address concerning man's nature and origin (Richiamo di gioia, Nov. 30, 1941), Pius XII insisted that the spiritual soul elevates man above all other living creatures, but that, on other questions regarding man's nature, nothing up to now has been positively ascertained. Concerning EVOLUTION, he declared in Humani generis that Catholic teaching holds the immediate creation of the soul by God and finds polygenism evidently irreconcilable with the testimony of Holy Scripture on original sin. The encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (Sept. 30, 1943) affirmed that the time, the character, and the literary style of the inspired writer can and should be considered by the Catholic exegete in establishing the literary meaning.

His important address to Italian midwives, Vegliare con sollecitudine (Oct. 29, 1951), supplemented the marriage encyclical of Pius XI, Casti connubii. On Sept. 29, 1949, the pope condemned any kind of artificial insemination.

nation. The natural performance of the marital act, he said, must remain an entirely personal function.

Pius condemned the concept of collective guilt (Nesuno certamente, Dec. 24, 1944; L'ardua missione, Feb. 20, 1946; Oct. 3, 1953).

The apostolic constitution Sacramentum ordinis (Nov. 30, 1947) dealt with the validity of ordinations of deacons, priests, and bishops, exclusive of the necessary matter and form. For theological inquiry, this was one of the most important decisions since the Council of TRENT (1545–63).

The motu proprio In cotidianis precibus (March 24, 1945) concerned the new translation of the Psalms by a commission of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL INSTITUTE, undertaken at the direction of Pius XII for use in the DIVINE OFFICE. The encyclical MEDIATOR DEI (Nov. 20, 1947) was of great importance for the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT. The encyclical Musicae sacrae (Dec. 25, 1955) summarized the norms for the lay participation in liturgical functions. Pius XII was willing to compromise with new musical trends and did not exclude instrumental music from liturgical ceremonies.

Disciplinary Matters. New regulations on the Eucharistic FAST appeared March 19, 1957.

The establishment of SECULAR INSTITUTES was treated in the apostolic constitution Provida Mater Ecclesia (Feb. 2, 1947) and in the motu proprio Primo feliciter elapso (March 12, 1948). In an allocution (Dec. 8, 1950) dealing with the relationship between religious and diocesan clergy, the Pontiff noted that Christ instituted one priesthood. The difference between the two forms of priestly life he attributed to the historical growth of the Church.

Pius XII terminated (Feb. 1, 1955) the long dispute concerning the KNIGHTS OF MALTA, and the reconciliation of their claim to sovereignty with their status of a religious order.

A decree of the Holy Office against communism appeared July 1, 1949. In the apostolic letter Carissimis Russiae populis (July 7, 1952) the pope distinguished between the communist-bolshevistic system and the Russian people.

Radio, television, and motion pictures were the subject of the encyclical Miranda prorsus (Sept. 8, 1957).

Pius XII called two consistories (Feb. 18, 1946; Jan. 12, 1953) to create 56 cardinals. The college numbered 57 at his death. He canonized 33 saints. Dioceses, excluding titular sees, increased from 1,696 in 1939 to 2,048 in 1958. Hierarchies were established in China (1946), Burma (1955), and several parts of Africa.

Conclusion. A man of genuine classical formation, extensive historical knowledge, level-headed realism, remarkable exactitude, and industry, Pius XII was highly esteemed in the ecclesiastical circles in which he had held office since 1900, as well as in the diplomatic and political world. He was well prepared to lead the Church through World War II and the postwar years, and did so with such wisdom that respect for the papacy reached an all-time high.

PIUS X SCHOOL OF LITURGICAL MUSIC

The Pius X School of Liturgical Music was the first school founded to give Catholics in the United States the opportunity to share in the revival of church music urged by Pope St. Pius X. It was organized in 1916 at Manhattanville College of the Sacred Heart in New York City (now located at Purchase, New York). The school was founded as a partnership between Mother Georgia Stevens and Mrs. Justine B. Ward. The school was subsequently affiliated with the Pontifical Institute of Sacred Music in 1954. The school continued as a center of liturgical music until 1969, when a unilateral administrative decision combined the function of the School with that of the music department of Manhattanville College.

PLACE

An exclusively Aristotelian and scholastic notion, place serves a threefold purpose in their physical systems: (1) it is the condition of the possibility of local motion; (2) it is the external foundation for the category location ($\pi\omicron\upsilon$, ubi, where), the internal foundation being quantity or structure; and, (3) as external reference of location, it constitutes the measure of the quantity of bodies. This article presents the historical development of the notion up to the high scholastic period, a systematic analysis following St. Thomas Aquinas, and an explanation of the modern rejection of the notion in favor of that of space.

Historical Development. Aristotle complains that he has inherited nothing about place from his predecessors (Phys. 208a 35). Nonetheless, there are two earlier traditions that he sets out to combat. The first proposes the concept of space (rather than place) as a basic constituent of the physical world—a concept expounded in Plato's Timaeus, where physical bodies are conceived of as parts of space limited by geometric surfaces (53B–55A). The second view, fostered by the atomists, also concentrates on space, designating it as a void contained within bodies and the condition of the possibility of their local motion. Against the background of these views Aristotle elaborates his own theory. Although he has a notion of space as a species of continuous quantity (Cat. 5a 7), which can be generalized into space as the summation of the dimensions of bodies (Jammer, 15), the notion is not developed and plays no part in his physical system. The emphasis is entirely on place.

Aristotle considers place primarily as a condition of the possibility of local motion, maintaining that the notion would never have come up except for the fact of local motion (Phys. 211a 12). His definition of place is “the innermost motionless boundary of what contains” (212a 20), or the unchanging surface of the surrounding physical environment in immediate contact with the contained body. It is a container, separable from the contained body, and neither larger nor smaller than it (210b 35). For Aristotle, all bodies in the universe are surrounded by other bodies, and are thus in place, but the universe as a whole is not in place (212b 22). This obviously implies the rejection of the void, or empty space, as upheld by the atomists. The ultimate reason for this rejection, however, is Aristotle's conception of natural places and natural local motion. “Either nothing has a natural locomotion, or else there is no void” (215a 12). For Aristotle the world is an interrelated system of concentric spheres, each in contact with that next to it. The natural place of heavy and inactive elements is at the center, that of more active elements farther and farther from the center in proportion to their activity or lightness. Voids or empty spaces would not allow for these interrelated activities, nor could a featureless void have a natural up and down.

It is sometimes maintained that Aristotle's basic notion of place can be accepted by one rejecting natural place. An argument for this is that Aristotle does not establish a close connection between the two in his treatment of place in the Physics (Solmsen, 127–129). Against this it can be argued that the apparent failure to make the connection is purposeful and methodological: Aristotle is there setting out general principles to be combined in his special treatment of natural local motion in the De caelo.

The history of the concept of place in late antiquity can be traced fairly clearly with the help of Simplicius, who has outlined much of it in his commentary on Aristotle's Physics, in a Corollarium de loco (Sambursky, 1–7). For the most part, the notions offered closely parallel one or other of the classical theories of Plato, Aristotle, or the atomists. The Epicurean LUCRETIUS expands the atomist notion of the void into infinite space; the Stoics accept Aristotle's plenum and make it the vehicle for the transmission of physical activity by giving it the qualities of a “tension” or field of force (Hesse, 76); the Neoplatonist PROCLUS identifies place or space with light; etc. In general, “until the fourteenth century Aristotle's and Plato's conceptions were the prototypes, with only minor changes” (Jammer, 21).

Analysis of the Concept of Place. In the Middle Ages, though there were some differences, the Aristotelian view is fairly represented by St. THOMAS AQUINAS. In general agreement with the other scholastics and with Aristotle, he defines place as the unchanging surface of the immediately surrounding body (bodies)—terminus immobilis continentis primum (In 4 phys. 6.16). Four properties follow from this definition. Place is a container, distinct from the thing contained. It is equal to the body contained and corresponds to it part to part. Every body surrounded by others is in place, and no physical body (except the universe as a whole) is without a place. Place implies natural place, a natural up and down both within a given place and in the universe as a whole.

There are two main divisions of place. The first distinguishes between common and proper place. Common place is the nearest immobile container or surrounding environment—immobile at least relatively to the body in question. Proper place is to be taken in strict accord with the definition—it is equal to the body in place, and its immobility is purely formal, as part of the whole system contained within an immobile common place (In 4 phys. 6.14–15).

The second division distinguishes natural from non-natural place. The natural place of a body is its suitable physical environment—suitable for its proper activity in accord with its heaviness or lightness and for its consequent proper sense qualities. Nonnatural place is any other physical environment.

A necessary connection between place and natural place is demanded by the Aristotelian notion of natural motion or CHANGE. According to this notion, all nonnatural motion presupposes natural motion (In 3 cael. 5.2). The ultimate ground for this is the overall Aristotelian view of NATURE as an interrelated system, with quantity and such basically quantitative realities as natural local motion supplying the ground for qualitative changes, chemical reactions, etc. (cf. Jammer, 17–18).

Although Aristotle and some scholastics believed it did, this notion of natural place need not imply an absolute up and down. All that is required is a natural locus of operation within a given system such that the more massive and stabilizing elements, which are less active, are at the center, the unstable and highly active elements at the periphery. Neither does natural place imply an anthropomorphic conception of elements desiring their natural place as a known end; a directional tendency to a suitable functional environment suffices. The scholastic explanation of gravity follows as a direct consequence of this. Heavy bodies do not move themselves to their natural place by a sort of desire; their natural motion is simply a datum, given along with the nature of the body and in accord with it.

Modern Rejection of Place. The modern rejection of place belongs properly to the history of space. Some of the earliest rejections, however, should be mentioned, since they were proposed within a general Aristotelian framework. Aristotle had stated that the outermost of his celestial spheres was not in place, but that it did have a circular motion. His explanation of this (Phys. 212a 35–212b 10) did not satisfy all, and it was this problem of how a body without place could move locally that motivated most of the late medieval and Renaissance rejections of place in favor of space. Some, such as the natural philosophers of the Italian Renaissance, rejected the notion of place altogether, and postulated an infinite void in which the heavens could move. COPERNICUS chose the other alternative and made the heavens stationary.

None of these views alone, however, could have effected the total rejection of Aristotle, though they did contribute to the general disfavor toward him. The decisive grounds for rejecting place were three: the rise of the mathematical conception of nature, with its emphasis on a Euclidean notion of absolute space; the rejection of space dynamism and natural place, as represented in William GILBERT; and the revival of atomism, as represented by Pierre GASSENDI (Čapek, 7–31).

Since the Einsteinian revolution against Newtonian absolute space, a number of authors have remarked on the general resemblance between modern field theory and Aristotelian natural place, and some have spoken even of a return to Aristotle. Nevertheless, though the similarities are in some ways striking, the differences are important. Perhaps most important is the fact that, where natural place is a purely physical theory, Einstein's relativistic space is based on non-Euclidean geometry and other highly mathematical considerations (Čapek, 272–273).

In general, despite its rejection by classical physics, place can still be considered a valid concept. It is essential for modern Thomists who accept the natural, as opposed to the mechanistic, conception of MOTION. Again, the application of place is still the normal way for measuring the QUANTITY of a physical body, i.e., by surrounding the body with another body marked off in arbitrary units. And finally, especially in the context of relativity, it makes good sense to locate physical bodies relative to their nearest frame of reference (in a modified Aristotelian conception), rather than with respect to an absolute space.

PLAGUES OF EGYPT

By the term plagues of Egypt is meant those prodigies that Yahweh inflicted upon the Egyptians as signs to them and to the Israelites that He alone was God and the Israelites were His chosen people, whom He would bring out of Egypt with a mighty hand. The book of EXODUS (Ex 7.14–12.30) recounts ten plagues in all, occurring intermittently during a period of nine or ten months. The first nine of these prodigies and signs are founded upon natural phenomena characteristic either of Egypt, or of the Near East in general, but were miraculous in the manner in which they occurred. The last plague, the killing of the firstborn of the Egyptians, stands in a class by itself, both in its effect upon Pharaoh and the Egyptians and in its place in Israel's memory and liturgy.

Under divine inspiration, the final redactor of the PENTATEUCH has skillfully interwoven into a unified and dramatic account the mighty deeds with which Yahweh brought His people from the land of bondage, by selecting some of the traditional accounts of these divine acts as transmitted in Israel's memory and recorded by the YAHWIST, the ELOHIST, and the Pentateuchal PRIESTLY writers. The second plague would seem to be peculiar to the Yahwist and Priestly traditions; the third and sixth may come from the Priestly tradition alone, and the fourth and fifth from the Yahwist source. The rest of the plagues seem to belong to all three streams of tradition.

Conflict between Egypt and Yahweh. The divine drama opens when MOSES and AARON present themselves before Pharaoh to request that the Israelites be allowed to go into the desert to celebrate a feast to their God. "Who is the Lord that I should heed his pleas to let Israel go?" Pharaoh asks. "I do not know the Lord; even if I did, I would not let Israel go" (Ex 5.2). When Moses has recourse to the Lord, he is told "Now you shall see what I will do to Pharaoh. Forced by my mighty hand, he will send them away. . . . You will know that I, the Lord, am your God when I free you from the labor of the Egyptians. . . . Yet I will make Pharaoh so obstinate that, despite the many signs and wonders that I will work in the land of Egypt, he will not listen to you. Therefore I will lay my hand on Egypt and by great acts of judgment I will bring the hosts of my people, the Israelites, out of the land of Egypt, so that the Egyptians may learn that I am the Lord, as I stretch out my hand against Egypt and lead the Israelites out of their midst” (6.1–7; 7.3–5). The plagues are thus set in a religious context as divine signs that Yahweh is omnipotent Lord and the Israelites His chosen people with a special destiny in SALVATION HISTORY.

First Four Plagues. At the Lord’s command, Moses and Aaron confront Pharaoh at the Nile. Moses tells him the water will be turned into blood, so that all the fish will die and the water will be unfit for use. Then Aaron strikes the water with his staff, the Nile turns into blood, the fish die, and the Egyptians must dig for drinking water. Here there is more than the usual reddening of the Nile at the flood season, for at that time the fish do not die and the water remains potable. Moreover, the effect is predicted beforehand, and follows upon a symbolic action evoking it as a divine sign, but Pharaoh ignores the event.

The second plague is one of frogs, with which Moses threatens Pharaoh seven days later if Pharaoh does not let Israel go. At the divine command transmitted through Moses, Aaron strikes the river with his staff and frogs infest Egypt in unprecedented numbers. This time Pharaoh summons Moses, asks him to pray the Lord to remove the frogs, and promises to let the people go. After Moses’ prayer to the Lord, the frogs die, but Pharaoh becomes “obdurate” and will not let the people go.

The third and fourth plagues are similar to each other. In the third, at the Lord’s command, Aaron strikes the dust of the earth, and a swarm of gnats comes upon men and beasts. Pharaoh remains obstinate. Again Moses and Aaron meet Pharaoh at the river. This time Moses announces a coming plague of flies, the fourth plague—with the added note, however, that an exception will be made in the land of Goshen, where the Hebrews live. Although flies are a normal part of Egyptian life, the Lord now sends them in thick swarms that exceed anything Egypt has known. Pharaoh is again ready to negotiate and promises to let the Israelites go. At Moses’ prayer, the Lord removes the flies, but once more Pharaoh becomes obdurate.

Fifth, Sixth, and Seventh Plagues. The fifth plague strikes the livestock of the Egyptians with a severe pestilence, but that of the Israelites is spared. We are told that “all of the livestock of the Egyptians died,” but since some remained to be destroyed by hail, “all” may mean that every type of livestock was affected, or perhaps this is merely a case where the editor did not bother to harmonize one tradition with another. Pharaoh, however, remains obdurate.

As the sixth plague, Moses, at the Lord’s command, scatters soot toward the sky in the presence of Pharaoh, and festering boils appear on the persons and beasts of the Egyptians, but the Israelites are spared. Pharaoh remains obstinate.

The seventh plague is a terrific hailstorm. Hail falls occasionally in Egypt, but the hailstorm the Lord now sends upon the Egyptians, as foretold by Moses, exceeds anything they have ever experienced, both in its intensity and in the lightning and thunder that accompany it. Beasts and servants left in the fields are killed, and the flax and barley crops are ruined. No hail falls in the land of Gosen, however. At this point, Pharaoh sends for Moses, confesses his fault, and begs him to pray the Lord to stop the hail. At Moses’ prayer, the hail and thunder cease, but Pharaoh returns to his obstinacy.

Eighth, Ninth, and Tenth Plagues. The whole Middle East dreads the coming of locusts. At the Lord’s command, Moses stretches his staff over the land of Egypt, and a strong east wind blows in swarms of locusts that destroy what has been left of the crops. Hastily summoned by a seemingly contrite Pharaoh, Moses begs God to remove the plague. At Moses’ prayer, the Lord sends a strong west wind to blow the locusts into the Red Sea.

The ninth plague is a blinding sandstorm. When Pharaoh again becomes obdurate, the Lord sends a desert sandstorm, now called the khamzin, which comes when Moses stretches his hand toward the sky. Except for the land of Gosen, the whole of Egypt is plunged into thick darkness for three days. Pharaoh summons Moses and Aaron and tells them they may go, but to leave their herds in Egypt. When Moses insists their herds must accompany them, Pharaoh drives the two from his presence with threats.

Now the stage is set for the tenth and last plague, the killing of the firstborn of the Egyptians, which caused Pharaoh to send the Israelites away that very night. That a pestilence should strike every family in a given land is extraordinary, but that it should strike only the firstborn of every family and every beast puts the tenth plague in a class by itself. The poetic license to exaggerate should not be denied to the ancient storyteller even in the Bible, and the ones affected by the plague may have been in the vicinity of Gosen only, despite the statement of the text. The memory of this night, when the Lord spared the firstborn of the Israelites to kill those of the Egyptians, was liturgically perpetuated in the Israelite feast of the PASS-OVER.

Special Problems. A true miracle is always a perceptible event, inexplicable by the normal course of nature, produced by God within a religious context as a sign of the supernatural. Judged by this definition, the plagues of Egypt can be seen to be true miracles, even though they do not in themselves transcend the powers of nature. As natural calamities they are of unprecedented intensity. Foretold by Moses as divine signs, they begin after symbolic gestures on the part of Aaron or Moses, and they cease abruptly when Moses asks the Lord to stop them.

The sacred writer sometimes says God hardened Pharaoh's heart, and again that Pharaoh hardened his own heart. How can this seeming contradiction be explained, for God cannot be the cause of moral evil? The answer will be found in the Semitic outlook that does not distinguish between direct and permissive causality. Other texts in Scripture throw light on the problem; for example, "Why do you harden your hearts, as Egypt and Pharaoh hardened their hearts?" (1 Kgs 6.6) indicates the personal responsibility involved. On the other hand, the place of this permitted obduracy in the divine plan is indicated in Ex 7.3-6; 9.16; Rom 9.17.

PLANT LIFE (PHILOSOPHICAL ASPECTS)

The careful choice of paradigm, or typical cases, enables a broad distinction, at the descriptive level, of inorganic materials, plants, and animals. All three types of natural objects are alike in exhibiting an identifiably stable set of properties, so that it is appropriate, in each case, to speak of a natural mode of action. Beyond this general similarity, however, particular instances of each type exhibit marked dissimilarity.

Descriptive analysis. Plants differ markedly from inorganic systems in their tendency to carry on an active metabolic exchange of materials with the environment. Again, plants grow and mature and even enter resting phases of nearly total inactivity with respect to ordinary organic functions (respiration, metabolism). Plants may reproduce themselves either asexually (by budding or sporulation) or sexually (by pollination), producing one or more new individuals of the same organic type. Tendencies of this sort have no near analogues in inorganic systems. It should be noted, however, that these characteristics are dispositions and not continuously present properties or processes. Even as dispositions, they do not serve as necessary and sufficient conditions for the identification of all living things at the botanical level: sterile botanical forms may very well be referred to as living plants. Again, certain viruses reproduce only when allowed to infect a specific, nonimmune, bacterial host. Thus the question of the vitality of virus-like macromolecules may remain moot while a search is made of appropriate host organisms.

Animals exhibit vegetative activities usually considered philosophically indistinguishable from those found in plants, i.e., they metabolize, grow, pass through an orderly life cycle, and reproduce themselves. The distinction of plants and animals, within the context of the traditional scholastic philosophy of nature, is thought to rest upon the fact that animals possess powers of sensory cognition and appetition, while plants do not. Of course, plants do respond to a wide range of environmental stimuli with activities that are generally adaptive or beneficial to the continued survival of the organism or its species. On the other hand, a line may be drawn between organisms that exhibit definitely formed sense organs and coordinated neuromuscular systems and those that do not (or between those that exhibit plastic behavior patterns that become increasingly adaptive with repeated performance and those whose patterns are absolutely stereotyped or invariable in form). In other words, it seems more appropriate to attribute sensation to those organisms that seem to learn from EXPERIENCE or that spontaneously search out absent sources of food or other stimulation or that exhibit some analogue for affective experience, e.g., "loyalty" to a herd or to a master. One can speak of those higher animals that exhibit such behavior as knowing their environment or having feelings about it without appearing to indulge in metaphor, whereas the use of the terms know and feel with respect to plants is ordinarily regarded as metaphorical.

Evaluation. The descriptive distinctions drawn in the scholastic philosophy of nature between minerals and plants and between plants and animals are reasonable enough and, in fact, are quite compatible with ordinary ways of speaking and talking about these objects. What is contested by nonscholastics is the suitability of this same material as a base for an abstract theory of NATURE, requiring such explanatory principles as plant and animal souls and nutritive, sensitive, and appetitive faculties.

A number of contemporary points of view contest the distinctions in question as either inconsequential or injurious. The geneticist employs information gathered from the study of bacteria in the elaboration of a general theory of inheritance, hopefully applicable to all living things. The ecologist studies the interaction of all the elements of a given environment; a balanced population involves the commerce of all its organisms without specific regard for their botanical or zoological overtones. For the artist and the man of letters, the picture of nature as an unbroken, continuous chain may be a source of considerable inspiration. The alternative claim that nature is stratified into SPECIES and levels that are essentially distinct, while tenable, does not accord so simply with these points of view.

Once it is established that nature is essentially stratified, the traditional distinction between a substance and its powers (e.g., between a living thing and its powers of nutrition, growth, and reproduction) reflects the fact that one can adequately characterize a living thing only in terms of its dispositions or tendencies and that one may insist that a thing is living even when circumstances prevent the activation of these tendencies. It should be noted, however, that scholastic philosophers of science to date have not given biological problems the attention they deserve. With regard to plant life, for example, there is need for clarification of the grounds on which one may urge the view that nature is stratified rather than continuous and for adequate illustration of the point that these grounds can be made intelligible only through a system of substantial forms and powers.

PLANTIN, CHRISTOPHE

French bookbinder, printer-publisher; b. 1520?, near Tours, France; d. Antwerp, Belgium, July 1, 1589. He settled in Antwerp in 1549 as a bookbinder who turned to printing, achieving eminence in the late 16th century. Through employment of good type designers, such as Claude Garamond and Robert Granjon, his works reflected fine craftsmanship. His most famous publication was the eight-volume polyglot Bible (1569–73) in Aramaic, Greek, Hebrew, Latin, and Syriac, with text in parallel columns. The basic edition was 1,200 paper copies with an additional 13 on parchment for the patron, Philip II of Spain. In 1579, Plantin was designated by the Holy See and Philip as official printer of liturgical books for Spain and the Netherlands, a privilege held by his successors for two centuries. Between 1555 and 1589 he issued more than 1,600 works. His printer's mark, a hand from the clouds guiding a compass on earth, with the motto "La-bore et Constantia," symbolized his life's work. He was succeeded by his son-in-law, Jan Moretus (1543–1610). His original building with its typographical equipment has been preserved as the Plantin-Moretus Museum.

PLANUDES, MAXIMUS

Byzantine humanist and theologian. b. Nicomedia, c. 1260; d. Constantinople, c. 1310. Born of a family that migrated from Nicomedia to Constantinople after 1261, Planudes attempted a civil career, but because of religious-political difficulties entered a monastery (1283) and changed his name from Manuel to Maximus. He was appointed hegumen, or director, of the monastery of the Five Saints on Mt. Auxentius in Bithynia by the metropolitan of Chalcedon, but soon returned to Constantinople. Despite the opposition of the Patriarch Athanasius I, he founded a monastery for laymen and opened a school close to the Emperor's palace with access to the imperial library. Grammar, mathematics, and science, as well as Latin, were the main subjects taught. The success of this novel enterprise in Constantinople was guaranteed when the children of the imperial family were sent there.

Possessing an excellent knowledge of Latin, Planudes had consistently favored a rapprochement with the Roman Church, and he strove to defend the orthodoxy of the Western theology under the Palaeologi Emperors MICHAEL VIII and ANDRONICUS II; under pressure the latter forced him to reconsider his opinions. Planudes was sent on diplomatic mission to Venice in 1295; but since it proved a failure, he refused a similar assignment to Cilicia somewhat later.

Among his numerous writings was a defense of the Western doctrine on the procession of the Holy Spirit that has not been preserved. Later he wrote, evidently under the pressure from Andronicus II, a De Spiritu Sancto adversus Latinos, published first by Arcudius (Rome 1630), which, in manuscript played an important part in the 15th-century polemics between BESSARION, Gemistos PLETHON, and George METOCHITES. Of his correspondence, some 121 letters have been preserved, and they have importance for the history of his epoch. He translated St. Augustine's De Trinitate into Greek, as well as works of Cicero, Ovid, Boethius, and Caesar. He also wrote hagiographical tracts, including an encomium of SS. Peter and Paul and another of St. Diomedes, discourses, and poetry. He was a figure of importance in the debates surrounding JOHN XI BECCUS from 1282 to 1297.

PLASDEN, POLYDORE, ST.

London martyr of 1591; b. probably London, 1563; d. there, Dec. 10, 1591. He is thought to have been the son of a humble craftsman. After studies at the English College formerly at Douai, then at Rheims, he was ordained in Rome in 1586. In the same year he signed the oath “to proceed to England for the salvation of souls,” and in 1588 he did so. Little is known of his movements in the next few years, but possibly he labored in Sussex. In November of 1591, he was in London with Bl. Edmund GENNINGS and was in the house of Swithun WELLS when agents of the English government discovered them during the celebration of Mass. Plasden and Gennings, as Roman priests, were tried and sentenced for high treason; the others were condemned for aiding and abetting them. During his trial, Plasden defended his priestly calling. Later, on the scaffold, he protested his loyalty to Queen Elizabeth while remaining faithful to his religious convictions. Sir Walter Raleigh, who supervised the execution, ordered leniency, directing that he be hanged until dead before the process of dismembering began. Plasden was beatified in 1929 and canonized on Oct. 25, 1970, as one of the martyrs of ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES.

Feast: Dec. 10; Oct. 25; May 4.

PLATO

One of the greatest of Greek philosophers; he incalculably influenced the nature and orientation of subsequent thought. Plato was born in Athens (428 or 427 B.C.), of aristocratic parents, during the Peloponnesian War. Originally, he was called Aristocles, and only later was given the name Plato (πλάτων, meaning broad), a sobriquet for which various reasons have been offered: his wide forehead, his robust physique, the breadth of his knowledge. He was both athlete and poet, excelling in the Isthmian games at Corinth and composing dramatic and lyric verse. The most decisive influence in Plato's commitment to philosophy and in his intellectual formation was the life-and-death devotion of SOCRATES to truth.

After the demise of Socrates in 399, Plato withdrew temporarily from the political tumult of Athens and found refuge with the philosopher Euclid at Megara. Between 390 and 388 he traveled extensively in Greece, Egypt, and Italy to acquaint himself with the principal schools of that time and to broaden his culture. About 387 he returned to Athens and founded his famous school, the Academy. Through this institution, Plato intended not only to promote philosophy and science but also to affect politics vicariously. His supervision of the Academy was interrupted on two occasions (367 and 361), when he journeyed to Sicily with the hope of making Dionysius II a philosopher-king and his city Syracuse an ideal state; both attempts, however, failed (Epist. 7). Henceforth, Plato remained at Athens, devoting all his powers of thought to philosophizing, teaching, and writing at the Academy, until his death at the age of 80. Already under way was the war that would bring Greece under the domination of Philip of Macedonia.

Works and Chronology. The authenticity of the writings in the Platonic corpus has been a matter of dispute since antiquity. The genuineness of four dialogues is still in question: Hippias Maior, Menexenus, Alcibiades I, and Epinomis; the first two are probably genuine, but the others are most likely spurious. Modern scholars generally agree that 24 dialogues and at least two epistles are definitely the work of Plato; they have also established the order of composition of these works. The chronology of Plato's writings represents the gradual evolution of his philosophy through four stages.

Initial Socratic Period (399–388). The dialogues of Plato's youthful philosophical life, before the foundation of the Academy, re-create and vindicate the spirit and mission of Socrates. In these dialogues of inquiry, there is a systematic pursuit of the one Form or Idea common to similar moral phenomena in order to arrive at the definition of a particular politicoethical virtue, e.g., courage. This group of writings is notably anti-Sophist in inspiration. In a manner characteristic of Socrates's confession of ignorance, most of these dialogues end without reaching any definite conclusion, thus emphasizing the need of seeking further enlightenment. This period includes the Apology, Crito, Euthyphro, Laches, Ion, Protagoras, Charmides, and Lysis—all distinctly ethical dialogues.

Transitional Period (387–380). As his intellectual and literary powers advanced, Plato found his way to a personal explanation of vexing contemporary problems. In addition to intensifying his polemics against the SOPHISTS, he undertook the building of the Socratic concept into a metaphysical theory of Forms. Whereas the earlier dialogues are limited in their scope to one facet of virtue, the works of this transitional and formational period manifest a broadening and deepening of Plato's speculation concerning the greater questions of wisdom and the good life. Here are found the Gorgias, Meno, Euthydemus, Hippias Minor, Hippias Maior, Cratylus, and Menexenus. These represent the inchoative constructive stage of the Platonic mind and the beginnings of a systematic philosophy.

Mature Period (380–361). At the height of his genius, Plato fully evolved his ontological theory of Forms and expressed the ramifications of this doctrine in epistemology, psychology, ethics, politics, and aesthetics. In dialogues of criticism and application, he subjected his speculative teachings to new facts and difficulties arising from other points of view. This period of maturity embraces the Symposium, Phaedo, Republic, and Phaedrus.

Of all the dialogues, the Republic, Plato's teaching of the ideal state, appears as the full development of his constructive powers.

Final Period (361–348 or 347). In the last period of his activity, Plato's dramatic power declined, but his critical acumen advanced. A lifetime of reflective experience, the appearance of different problems, social and political changes—all these impressed on Plato the need for further investigation and for a reconsideration of his philosophy. With brilliant intellectual apperception, he critically elaborated his metaphysics and epistemology, modified his politicoethical concepts, made greater use of logic, and discovered new interest in the mystery of the cosmos. Written in the final period of his life were the Theaetetus, Parmenides, Sophist, Statesman, Philebus, Timaeus, Critias, Laws, and Epistles 7 and 8. The continual development of Plato's thought through these periods indicates that he never achieved a completely rounded-off system; it is an unfinished symphony of philosophy.

Platonic Method. The Platonic method, in general, consists in an intellectual and moral conversion from particular, concrete sense phenomena to universal, abstract Forms. Motivated by Eros, an inborn love of good, man can purge himself of bodily desires and rise to a knowledge of true being (Phaedo 65–68). This conversion is accomplished in three different, but complementary ways, according to the object under consideration. First, on the occasion of experienced sensible things, the mind can formulate a hypothesis and logically deduce from it true conclusions. The mathematician, for example, proceeds from a hypothesis such as a triangle to a knowledge of the essence of this object. Second, moral truths are treated by way of myth, the exposition of a concept or event in poetic imagery. The eschatological myths in the Gorgias (523–527), Phaedo (107–114), and Republic (613–621) present the soul as immortal, free within the limits set by necessity, and responsible, under God's government, throughout all its transmigrations. Third, the supreme means in the soul's ascent to the highest principles is dialectic, which “by the light of reason only, and without any assistance of sense” (Rep. 532A), advances “from Forms, through Forms, and in Forms she ends” (Rep. 511C). The dialectic method is masterfully dramatized by the give-and-take conversation of the dialogues, the major part often and very appropriately being taken by Plato's dynamic spokesman, Socrates.

Teachings. Plato's primary intuition is Form, the rest of his philosophy being a function of this central constant. With the influx of other insights, Plato critically explicated the implications of Form and developed what scholars generally recognize as a dynamic, dichotomous dualism, pervading four dominant aspects of reality—the epistemological, the metaphysical, the psychological, and the politicoethical.

Epistemological Dualism. In his famous Allegory of the Cave and Simile of the Line (Rep. 509E–511, 514–517), Plato distinguished between universal knowledge and particular opinion. Since sense perception, on the one hand, concerns only continually changing, relative, shadowy images, it admits at most fallible opinion. True scientific knowledge, on the other hand, is oriented toward the stable, absolute, and universal properties of cognition realizable only in intellection (Crat. 440B, C). In this clear distinction between sensation and understanding, Plato exposed the Protagorean error of confusing the former with genuine knowledge and refuted the RELATIVISM of the Sophists. Socrates's quest for truth, then, was defended and justified by Plato's epistemology.

Metaphysical Dualism. Corresponding to the two kinds of cognition, Plato also distinguished two radically different entities: the object of understanding is absolute reality; that of sense perception is relative phenomena. Universal concepts have an objective reference to transcendent Forms (Phaedo 102B)—unalterable, universal, intelligible realities. Since reality is rational only so far as it is unchanging, then immutable, suprasensible Forms alone, e.g., Justice itself, are fully real and fully intelligible (Phaedo 65C, D, 100C, E; Symp. 210B, D). In this realm of true reality, there is a hierarchy of beings culminating in the Form of Forms, the Good—the paramount principle of intelligibility, unity, and order. According to Aristotle (Meta. 987b 14–988a 15), Plato taught later a mathematical dualism in which the One is conceived as the supreme principle of limit and the indeterminate great-and-small as the cause of plurality. This doctrine of ultimate principles does not imply, however, that Plato ever dropped the theory of the Ideas. The identification of the One and the Good, confirmed both by Aristotle and Aristoxenus, must be accepted as well founded.

The lesser pole of Plato's ontological dualism is the empirical object of perception—relative phenomena. Because fluctuating phenomena are neither truly real nor fully knowable, the cosmologist cannot attain an exact and altogether self-consistent explanation of the physical world, but must be satisfied with a probable account (Tim. 29D). Yet the reality present in phenomena Plato discerned in terms of a rational order and uniformity, pointing to something fully real and implying its dominating presence. Sensible things are relatively real and intelligible only so far as they participate in absolutely real and intelligible Forms. For instance, a flower “can be beautiful only in so far as it partakes of absolute beauty” (Phaedo 100C). The unparticipating is the ultimate raison d'être of the participating. Participation or imitation, therefore, is the bridge by which Plato spanned the Parmenidean realm of being, unity, and permanence, and the Heraclitean realm of becoming and plurality.

Psychology. Between the realm of Forms and the purely sensible world there are mathematical objects, existing on an intermediate level (Aristotle, Meta. 987b 14–18). There is also Soul: the world-soul, celestial souls, and human souls. Souls share in both realms: in the ideal world insofar as they are immortal and closely related to the intelligible, and in the sensible world insofar as they are living and moving. The starting point in Plato's reasoning to the existence of a world-soul is the orderly motion and harmony in the empirical world. Since the motionless exemplary Forms by themselves cannot explain their exemplification in things, Plato found it necessary to posit the existence of a superlatively intelligent agent—the Demiurge. This preeminent intelligence is called God and Father of the world. As the Creator of Soul he must be ranked on the level of intelligible Being, which, in Plato's hierarchy, is placed directly under the One or the Good. The Divine Craftsman introduced harmony and symmetry into the primitive chaos of disorderly motion by fashioning the world according to the eternal exemplars (Soph. 265C–266C). Modeling the world after the Ideal Living Creature (Tim. 30B, C), the Demiurge formed the cosmic body by conferring geometrical patterns on the primary qualities in the indefinite space-receptacle—earth, water, air, fire—after having first formed the cosmic soul for its function of animating, ruling, and unifying the vast bodily sphere. Together with the world-soul, the Demiurge created the stars and planets with their souls, and next the souls of men. Then, at his request, the “created gods” (i.e., the star-souls) created bodies for the human souls.

Man is composed of soul and body, the former being akin to Forms and the latter to corporeal phenomena. The soul exercises two basic functions: as self-moving, it is the source of life; and as consciousness, it is the principle of intellectual and moral operations. From a fine analysis of the inner conflicting tendencies in man, Plato concluded to three diverse principles in the human soul: (1) the appetitive part, unruly and amenable to the siren of pleasure; (2) the spirited, noble and prompt to honor and courage; (3) the rational, the “god within man,” able to contemplate Forms, and as charioteer, to check and direct the impulses of the instinctive and spirited steeds for the good of man (Rep. 436–441; Phaedrus 246–247). Thus the human soul is tripartite.

Nevertheless, Plato's dualism passes sharply and deeply through his notion of the human soul. The irrational parts, like the body, are mortal, whereas the rational principle is immortal. The immortality of the rational soul is maintained in four main arguments: (1) Opposites generate opposites; as the living die, so the dead return to life (Phaedo 70–72). (2) As self-moving, the soul necessarily lives and survives death (Phaedrus 245C, E). (3) The soul is akin to the Forms that it contemplates; it is simple and imperishable (Phaedo 79D, E). (4) The soul, living in virtue of its essential participation in the Form, Life, can never share in the contradictory Form, Death; a dead soul is an impossibility (Phaedo 95–106; Rep. 608–611). In the cognitional dualism between reason and Forms, Plato linked the knower and the knowable by his theory of anamnesis, or reminiscence. The repeated experience of changing, relative, particular, sensible images is the occasion of the soul's recalling the stable, absolute, universal, intelligible Forms it once contemplated in a preexisting state, but that have been forgotten since its ingress into the body. Knowledge is basically recollection (Meno 82, 86; Phaedrus 246, 248).

Politicoethical Dualism. The speculative dualism of Plato finds its practical application and extension in his contrast between ideal values and phenomenal values. Platonic ethics is objectively oriented toward ideal values, primarily the Form, Good, as its supreme ontological goal. The ethos of man's life is to care for his soul (Apol. 29; Phaedo 114D, E), gradually liberating it from the bonds of the body that, like Prometheus unbound, it may freely wing its way to an ever-clearer vision of the Good and True and Beautiful—man's foremost subjective happiness. The essential means by which man participates in formal values is virtue. Virtue is knowledge, and consequently, teachable (Meno 87B–89C); with knowledge of good, "no man voluntarily pursues evil" (Prot. 358C). The virtues are many in one, different expressions of wisdom in diverse fields of activity. Wisdom is the rational charioteer of the soul, courage the rein of the spirited steed, and temperance the rein of the appetitive steed, while justice is their proper functioning, right order, and cooperation for the good of the whole soul (Rep. 428–441). Plato admitted a phenomenal value to relative goods, e.g., innocent pleasure and moderate emotions. Hence, Plato's ethics is tensely dualistic, inasmuch as it attempts a delicate and harmonious balance between man's irrational attraction to relative goods and his rational proclivity to absolute Good.

Plato's political theory unfolds in the Republic, Statesman, and Laws, as inseparably related to his ethics. The disorders and injustices of actual empirical city-states can be rectified only by reforming and reorganizing them after the archetypal City-State. The organization of the ideal State parallels the threefold structure of the human soul: (1) The lowest class, the numerous workers who provide the economic necessities, are marked by a desire for things of the senses and so are in particular need of temperance. (2) Higher in hierarchy are the guardians—their membership including also qualified women—who valiantly defend the state against hostilities within and without, and faithfully enforce the decisions handed down by the rulers. The ideal State requires that all their property, wives, and children be possessed in common, lest these auxiliaries be impeded in their singular purpose of serving the common interest of the state. Rulers, however, must exercise strict eugenic supervision of marriages for the good of the social organism. (3) The political counterpart of human reason is the superior class of rulers, the elite in knowledge, bravery, and patriotism, who wisely govern in the light of ideal values. When each individual performs his due function, and the lower classes are properly subordinated to the prudent ruler, justice prevails. The unshakeable basis of the just state is absolute Justice.

The most important institution in the transmission of culture and the maintenance of virtue is education. The state has the primary authority to educate its citizenry, even under compulsion. Education has two branches: gymnastics for the body; art, science, philosophy, and religion for the soul. Since art is an imitation of an imitation of true reality, and a creation inspired by the Muses but originating also from irrational forces in the artist, it must be conscientiously superintended by the magistrates of the state. The ideal State is open only to beautiful art—the representation of the true and good and enjoyable. Love of artistic beauty can lead the soul to the vision of Beauty itself.

Various historical states more or less approximate the ideal State. Measuring up least to the Form is tyranny, the lawless rule of a strong man whose reason is a slave to brutish passion and whose subjects are his slaves. Closer to the ideal is democracy, government by the unqualified masses without fixed standards, devotees of freedom and equality to the point of anarchy; weak and inefficient, it is the worst of all lawful governments and the best of all lawless ones. More perfect is oligarchy, rule of the affluent few for their own profit. Superior to plutocracy, or government by the wealthy, is timocracy, government by a militaristic minority who, though prizing honor and valor, are wanting in rational purpose. The ideal State is philosophical, a true polity in which one or more philosopher-kings, enlightened by abiding norms of reason, are the real statesmen piloting the ship of state on the right course of civilization for the good of all classes.

Conclusion. Plato was among the noblest embodiments of the ideal philosopher and his Dialogues contain one of the finest philosophies ever envisioned by the human mind. His all-pervading dualism is tense with inner opposition and difficulties; yet the poles of his thought are unified in a grand Olympian synthesis under his fundamental Zeus-like insight—Form. His Academy survived from 387 B.C. to A.D. 529—an enviable longevity. Even more important, his philosophy has persisted for more than 2,300 years, profoundly influencing such luminaries as ARISTOTLE, St. AUGUSTINE, St. THOMAS AQUINAS, and Alfred North WHITEHEAD, and prodigiously advancing the life and thought of Western culture.

PLATONISM

A term with a variety of meanings in the history of philosophy. In its original imposition, it refers to the doctrines of PLATO himself, and by extension includes the teachings of others who developed characteristic Platonic themes such as (1) the teaching on forms or ideas, with its accompanying absolute REALISM, emphasis on mathematical intelligibility, and mistrust of sense knowledge; (2) the accent on recollection and use of a priori method; (3) the doctrines of a demiurge, PARTICIPATION, WORLD SOUL, and the relative nonbeing of MATTER; (4) the notion of the human SOUL as immaterial and endowed with various powers and virtues; and (5) the concept of the GOOD and its associated ethical idealism, theory of the state, and theory of education.

Manuscript page from Plato's "Timaeus," Latin translation of Greek, commentary by Calcidius, written in Italy, ca. 1500. Marginal diagrams depicting Platonic cosmology illustrate text. (MD Lat. 13, fol. 55, Charles Patterson Van Pelt Library, University of Pennsylvania).

In more specialized senses, Platonism refers first to the succession of philosophers of the Academy in Athens, and their associates, continuing—with some interruptions and possibly a loss of records—to the scholiarchate of Damascius, when an edict of the Emperor Justinian in 529 prohibited the teaching of philosophy in Athens. It is also used by some for Neoplatonism, although this is more commonly considered a separate philosophical movement closely related to Platonism. Among patristic, medieval, and modern scholars, the term is generally used to designate currents of thought of Platonic origin that flourished among the Greek and Latin Fathers, among medieval schoolmen, in the Platonic Academy of the Renaissance, or among the Cambridge Platonists. Not infrequently, Platonism has also influenced the elaboration of religious doctrines, and on this account is variously called Jewish, Islamic, or Christian.

This article is concerned mainly with the meaning of Platonism in the more specialized senses and is divided into two parts: the first treats of Plato's disciples and the schools they founded, under the title of Early and Middle Platonism; the second considers the use made of Platonic doctrines by Christian philosophers and theologians, under the title of Christian Platonism.

Early and Middle Platonism

Plato's thought continued to exert its influence after his death, particularly in the Academy he had founded. Although scholars are not unanimous on the status of the Academy's development, they usually speak of the Old Academy and the Middle and New Academies. Doctrinally, the Old Academy more or less maintained Plato's teachings intact, although it placed special emphasis on the Pythagorean elements that it contained. The Middle Academy was given over to SKEPTICISM, while the New Academy was more eclectic in its tendencies as it sought to develop a Platonic position in opposition to that of the Stoics (see STOICISM).

Old Academy. Speusippus (c. 407–339 B.C.), head of the Academy from 347 to 339 B.C., wrote numerous memoirs and dialogues of which only fragments remain. Favorinus related in the second book of his Memorabilia that Aristotle purchased Speusippus's writings for three talents (Diogenes Laertius, 4.5). His successor as head of the Academy was Xenocrates (396–314 B.C.), who served from 339 to 314 B.C. Xenocrates's writings were treasured in the Academy and presumed lost when the building was destroyed by fire in Sulla's siege and sack of Athens in 86 B.C. Polemon was then head of the Academy from 314 to 269 B.C.; he and Crantor were fellow pupils of Xenocrates.

A comparison between the teaching of these men and that of Plato is contained in the Metaphysics of ARISTOTLE (1028b 19–27). There the Stagirite says that Plato posited two kinds of substance—the forms and the mathematical, and also a third kind, the substance of sensible bodies; that Speusippus posited several more kinds of substance, starting with the One, and assumed that there was a principle for each kind—one for numbers, one for configurations, and another for souls; and that other philosophers, presumably followers of Xenocrates, held that forms and numbers have the same nature, and that other things, e.g., lines and planes, and eventually the substance of the world and sensible bodies, are derived from these.

Middle and New Academies. Crates, pupil of Polemon, was head of the Academy in the 3d century B.C. One of his pupils was Bion; another was Arcesilaus, who was also a pupil of Crantor and the first to reject the traditional doctrine of Plato in favor of skepticism, being thereby named the founder of the Middle Academy by Diogenes Laertius (4.28). Lacydes was his successor (c. 242–216 B.C.), and, for Diogenes, founder of the New Academy (4.59).

Cicero has given a history of the chief persons in the New Academy (Acad. prior. 2.1–16). He starts his account with Arcesilaus, teacher of Lacydes, and says that Lacydes taught Evander, and Evander, Hegesinus. Carneades, “fourth in line from Arcesilaus,” was then the pupil of Hegesinus, and served as head of the school for a long time, living to be 85 years old. Clitomachus succeeded him as head in 129 B.C. Then came Philo of Larissa (c. 140–c. 77 B.C.), and then Antiochus of Ascalon (c. 128–68 B.C.), both teachers of Cicero (De nat. deor. 1.6). Among the Roman Academicians, in addition to Cicero, should also be enumerated Atticus and Varro.

CICERO (106–43 B.C.) himself acknowledged that he was an Academic (De nat. deor. 1.11), and stated that sufficient reason for his allegiance had been given in the four books of his Academics; this survives in two editions, both incomplete, the first known as the Lucullus, and the second as the Catulus, after the leading interlocutor in each. Cicero also named the ambulatio, or place of exercise, in the lower level of his Tusculan villa near Rome the “Academia” (Disp. tusc. 2.9; 3.7). His Tusculan Disputations, On the Nature of the Gods, Concerning the Last Object of Desire and Aversion, Laws, and Republic are his important philosophical writings. At the end of the sixth book of the Republic (6.9–2.9) is a passage known as “Scipio's Dream,” reminiscent of the story of Er at the end of Plato's Republic (614B–621D), upon which MACROBIUS commented at the end of the 4th century. Titus Pomponius Atticus (99–32 B.C.) was a fellow student and lifelong friend of Cicero; he edited the letters Cicero sent him, and these reflect his own philosophical opinions.

Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 B.C.) also studied at Athens under Antiochus of Ascalon. A voluminous writer, he is reported as saying that up to the day he had entered upon his 12th hebdomad of years he had written 70 hebdomads of books, many of which were lost when his library was plundered at the time of his proscription. Among his books was one called Images or Hebdomads, fragments of which survive. His Logistoricus, a collection of philosophical and historical treatises, is lost.

Both Varro and Cicero were eclectic philosophers. Apart from his concern with the cult of the State, Varro was influenced by the number mysticism of NEOPYTHAGOREANISM and also by the teachings of the CYNICS. Cicero himself was hardly an original thinker, but his flair for expression enabled him to transmit a variety of Greek doctrines to Roman readers. His arguments against skepticism were not speculative but practical and based mainly on his personal intuition of moral consciousness. In his ethical teaching, he borrowed elements from the Stoics and from the Peripatetics, while in matters of religion he urged belief in divine providence and the immortality of the soul.

Middle Platonism. The Middle Platonists, as opposed to the earlier members of the Academies, were a group of writers of Greek who flourished from the beginning of the reign of Hadrian in A.D. 117 to the end of the reign of Marcus Aurelius Antoninus in 180. They continued the interest of the New Academy in eclecticism, while attempting to effect a fundamental synthesis between Platonism and Peripatetic thought, using Aristotelian logic to this end. Again, they were influenced by the mysticism of the Neo-Pythagoreans. In keeping with the practice of the times, they commented more than their predecessors on the Platonic Dialogues, and in so doing sought to develop an orthodox Platonist doctrine in opposition to the Peripatetics and the Stoics. The resulting tensions between orthodoxy and eclecticism left this intermediate stage of Platonism in a state of flux, from which a true synthesis was to be effected only with the emergence of Neoplatonism at the end of the middle period.

Plutarch of Chaeronea in Boeotia (c. A.D. 46–120) is the best known of the Middle Platonists, chiefly for his Parallel Lives of the Greeks and the Romans. His principal philosophical work is the Moralia. The 13th book contains Platonic questions, especially about the origin of the soul as expounded in the Timaeus and arguments against the Stoics. The 12th book includes a short treatise (945E–955C) dedicated to Favorinus (A.D. 80–150), from the city of Arelatum (Arles) on the Rhone River, who himself wrote on the tropes of Pyrrho.

Tiberius Claudius Herodes Atticus (A.D. 101–177), a student and protégé of Favorinus, also studied the doctrines of Plato with Calvisius Taurus of Tyre (2d century A.D.). The latter was scholiarch of the Academy in Athens during the rule of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius. His probable successor as scholiarch was Atticus, an Athenian philosopher, who is known to have written a commentary on the Timaeus, and another treatise quoted at length without title by Eusebius Pamphili of Caesarea (c. A.D. 260–399), both works surviving in fragments.

At Pergamum in the 2d century A.D. influence was exerted by a Platonist named Gaius (b. c. A.D. 75). In A.D. 144 Galen (c. 130–c. 200) attended the lectures of a “pupil of Gaius” at Pergamum, and in 151 or 152 went to Smyrna to make the acquaintance of the Platonist Albinus. The catalog in Codex Parisinus Graecus 1962 mentions that Albinus edited the lectures of Gaius on the doctrines of Plato. All Gaius’s writings have been lost, although some of his treatises were among those read in the school of Plotinus. Two writings of Albinus survive: a short prologue to the Dialogues of Plato, the introductory lecture of his course on Plato; and a much longer epitome of the doctrines of Plato, entitled Didaskalikos and usually published under the name of Alcinoüs. An unnamed Platonist, probably another pupil of Gaius, wrote a commentary on the Theaetetus that is extant (Papyr. 9782). Characteristic of the school of Gaius is esteem for the logic of Aristotle, in that this offered a respectable alternative to the tropes of Pyrrho.

Diogenes Laertius (3d century A.D.), it should be noted, has been thought an Epicurean because of his life of EPICURUS, which constitutes Book 10 of the Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers and ends with 40 major maxims of Epicurus. However, Diogenes spoke approvingly of “an enthusiastic Platonist” (3.47), devoted Book 3 of the Lives to Plato, and in Book 4 wrote lives, many of high literary merit, of the important persons of the Academy from Speusippus to Clitomachus.

It is impossible to detect any systematic unity in the teachings of the Middle Platonists. Their attempts at synthesis, however, were incorporated into the movement that was later to be known as Neoplatonism, which had its proximate origin in Alexandria during the 3d century A.D. and its more remote beginnings at Apamea in Syria in the writings of the Stoic philosopher Poseidonius (c. 135–c. 51 B.C.) and the Neo-Pythagorean Numenius (2d century A.D.). For further details of this movement, see NEOPLATONISM.

Christian Platonism

Neoplatonism, in the view of one historian, “was the last breath, the last flower, of ancient pagan philosophy; but in the thought of St. Augustine it became the first page of Christian philosophy” (F. C. Copleston, History of Philosophy [Westminster, Md., 1946–75] 1:506). Apart from influences that are now recognized as Neoplatonist, however, Christian writers found much in the older Platonism that helped them in their understanding of Christian theology and much that helped them answer philosophical questions without compromising their theology. They found evidence for the unity of God, preexistence of the forms of things in the mind of God, creation of the world, providence, God the true and highest Good, memory as a way to know God, the virtuous life, and the spirituality and immortality of the human soul. Their main points of criticism, though not the only ones, are doctrines that they found to be irreconcilable with Christian theology.

Each period in history in which there occurs a movement identifiable as Christian Platonism is marked by a confrontation of Christian theologians with some newly available Platonic materials. As already noted, these periods were not restricted to reaction to the works of Plato; in most cases they showed involvement with writings other than Plato's, especially those more recently classified as Neoplatonic. For purposes here, they may be divided roughly into periods corresponding to those of the Greek and Latin Fathers and the Middle Ages, and the special movements of the Platonic Academy, the Cambridge Platonists, and modern Platonism.

Greek and Latin Fathers. The Greek apologists during the reign of the Antonines were educated in the pagan schools of philosophy. They used their knowledge to point out to the emperors, themselves philosophers, that Christian doctrine was reconcilable with philosophy, and therefore not to be condemned, and also to furnish an answer to questions about God, life, and death, to which philosophers had found no satisfactory solution. ARISTIDES, a "philosopher of Athens," wrote an apology to Hadrian (117–138), while JUSTIN MARTYR wrote one to Antoninus Pius (138–161) and another to Marcus Aurelius Antoninus (161–180) and his imperial partner, Lucius Verus (161–169). ATHENAGORAS, "the Athenian, a philosopher and Christian," addressed his Embassy for the Christians to Marcus Aurelius Antoninus and his son, Lucius Aurelius Commodus (161–192). These apologies were written in Greek and are extant.

In Alexandria Christian scholars adapted Platonic thought to religious instruction and scriptural exegesis. Titus Flavius Clemens, or CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA, taught in the Christian catechetical school. He knew Greek philosophy and considered Plato to be the greatest of philosophers (Paedagogus 2.11). In his Exhortation to the Greeks he showed the acuteness, and yet the limitations, of the teachings of philosophers on the nature of God (6.59P–61P; cf. also Miscellanies 1.14). His pupil was ORIGEN, of whom EUSEBIUS quotes Porphyry as saying that he "was most celebrated, and is still celebrated by the writings that he has left," and that "he was always in company with Plato," but also read works of other philosophers (Hist. eccl. 6.19).

Somewhat more than a century later, after PLOTINUS and PORPHYRY, several of the Greek Fathers in Cappadocia continued the work of instruction in homilies. Thus GREGORY OF NYSSA wrote a dialogue De anima et resurrectione, modeled on Plato's Phaedo, in which Gregory's sister on her deathbed states the Christian doctrine of resurrection and of the restoration of the world (13). He said, after Plotinus, that the human mind is capable of direct experience of God, "a divine and sober inebriation" (Beatitudes 6; In Canticum Canticorum 10). About the same time, PALLADIUS (fl. 408) modeled his Dialogue concerning the Life of Chrysostom on Plato's Phaedo; and Methodius, the Symposium or A Treatise on Chastity on Plato's Symposium. Methodius wrote an answer, no longer extant, to Porphyry's attacks on the Christians. Under Porphyry's influence, NEMESIUS OF EMESA (fl. c. 400) wrote the Nature of Man, which was available in the Middle Ages in a Latin translation of Alfanus I, archbishop of Salerno 1058–85, under the title Prennon Fisicon (Codex Abrincensis Bibl. Municipalis 221, saec. XII).

In the Latin West, the predominant influences on Christian writers were Plato's Timaeus and Porphyry's Isagoge or introduction to Aristotle's logic. Cicero had translated the Timaeus in 45 or 44 B.C. after he had written the Academica. Four centuries later, CALCIDIUS translated the Timaeus anew, and wrote an elaborate commentary on it, dedicated to Ossius (c. 256–357 or 358), bishop of Cordoba. MARIUS VICTORINUS translated the Isagoge into Latin before 355, the year of his conversion to Christianity late in life, and also parts, if not all, of Plotinus's Enneads. AUGUSTINE OF HIPPO told the story of Victorinus's conversion as he had heard it from Simplicianus (Conf. 8.2–5).

The scene of the confrontation of the Latin Fathers with Platonism was in northern Italy: at Milan, where Augustine listened to Ambrose's homilies, and about 20 miles farther south at Pavia, where BOETHIUS was imprisoned. Ambrose later worked his homilies into treatises, some of which, notably the Hexameron and the Funeral Orations, indicate the use of Plotinus's "On the Beautiful" (Enn. 1.6). Augustine himself mentions in his City of God some books of Platonists he had read: Apuleius, The God of Socrates (8.14); Porphyry, De philosophia ex oraculis haurienda (19.23) and the letter to the Egyptian Anebo (10.11). In one chapter he lists those whom he means by the term "Platonists" (8.12): Plato, Speusippus, Xenocrates, Plotinus, Iamblichus, Porphyry, and Apuleius.

Anicius Manlius Severinus Boethius held high governmental positions under Theodoric the Ostrogoth (c. 454–526) but fell into disfavor. While imprisoned at Pavia, he wrote the Consolation of Philosophy, which includes autobiographical details. In his commentary on Aristotle's On Interpretation (comm. 3, proem.), he says that it is his intention to make available to his countrymen translations of all the works of Plato and Aristotle and a reconciliation of the seemingly different doctrines of the two. (See PATRISTIC PHILOSOPHY.)

Medieval Platonism. The Benedictine Abbey of SAINT-DENIS in the environs north of Paris, burial place of many kings of France, is the site of the next major development in Christian Platonism. Michael Bekkos, "The Stammerer," emperor at Constantinople, sent a copy of the Greek writings of Dionysius the Areopagite (Codex Parisiensis Bibl. Nat. grec. 437) to Louis the Pious (778–840), son of Charlemagne and emperor in the West, who received it at Compiègne in 827 and deposited it in the Abbey of Saint-Denis, where HILDUIN was abbot. Hilduin, on orders from Louis, translated the writings into Latin with the help of several collaborators (825–835). A few years later, in the reign of Charles the Bald, king of France from 840 to 877, JOHN SCOTUS ERIUGENA made, on the king's order, a new translation (c. 867) from the same manuscript. These writings consisted of four treatises: On the Divine Names, On the Celestial Hierarchy, On the Ecclesiastical Hierarchy, and On Mystical Theology, and ten letters, with an eleventh letter that Hilduin wrote and included. Their author, PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, in effect presented summaries or quotations from PROCLUS (411–485): Elements of Theology (2.9–10), Ten Doubts concerning Providence (4.1–4), On Providence and Fate (4.15–17), On the Subsistence of Evil (4.18–35). He also showed the conformity of the doctrines to Sacred Scripture.

In the 12th century an interest in Platonism was maintained in the cathedral schools of CHARTRES, a town about 55 miles southwest of Paris. The chief Platonic document was the Timaeus in the partial translation of Calcidius (17A–53C), together with his commentary. JOHN OF SALISBURY was chronicler in his Metalogicon. The sequence of chancellors of the schools in the period was: BERNARD OF CHARTRES, GILBERT DE LA PORRÉE, and THIERRY OF CHARTRES. The first named was called by John of Salisbury “the foremost Platonist of our time” (Metalogicon, 4.35); he explained Porphyry (4.35), followed Plato in the doctrine of ideas (2.17), and tried to reconcile the teaching of Plato and Aristotle, “a vain effort to reconcile in death ones who had disagreed in life” (2.17).

WILLIAM OF CONCHES, “most accomplished grammarian since Bernard of Chartres” (Metalogicon 1.5), wrote a commentary on the Timaeus, of which fragments survive. He identified the “soul of the world” with the Holy Spirit. The Timaeus was read in the faculty of arts in Paris, along with explanations from his commentary, until 1255 or earlier, when it was superseded in the official curriculum by the works of Aristotle.

Several Latin translations of Plato and Proclus, from the Greek, were made in Sicily in the middle of the 12th century. Although they survive in a dozen manuscripts, they were known by few scholars before the Renaissance. Their production was a result of the enterprise of HENRICUS ARISTIPPUS, a Greek in the service of the king of Sicily. Henricus began a translation of Plato's Phaedo into Latin at the siege of Benevento in the spring of 1156 and completed it a short time later at Palermo; he also translated the Meno between 1154 and 1160. These are the only dialogues of Plato that name an Aristippus, and each has the name in the beginning of the dialogue (Phaedo, 59C; Meno, 70B).

Thus, toward the beginning of the 13th century a considerable collection of Platonic writings in Latin had been assembled. It included Calcidius's work on the Timaeus; works by Augustine, Boethius, Dionysius, ALKINDĪ, ALFARABI, and AVICENNA; Eriugena's De divisione naturae, the LIBER DE CAUSIS, and the Fons Vitae of AVICEBRON. The Phaedo and Meno of Plato and the Elementatio physica of Proclus had also been translated.

This material had been exploited by theologians at the Abbey of Saint-Denis, particularly by SUGER OF SAINT-DENIS; at the Abbey of Saint-Victor, by HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR; at Cîteaux, where ALAN OF LILLE remonstrated with the Albigenses; and at Toledo in the original writings of DOMINIC GUNDISALVI. The wealth of material and its wide dispersion led to the use of it in a variety of ways. As a result, the Platonism of the 13th century was a many-sided jewel, with facets that were labeled Augustinian, Avicennian, Franciscan, Dionysian, Albertist, and mystical. (See AUGUSTINIANISM; SCHOLASTICISM.)

An important achievement toward the end of the century was the translation of Proclus from the Greek by WILLIAM OF MOERBEKE. The latter's translation of the Elements of Theology in 1268 was taken by St. THOMAS AQUINAS as the occasion for his commentary on the Liber de Causis and for a treatise De substantiis separatis. Aquinas's commentary is practically also a commentary on the Elements of Theology. Before Thomas's death in 1274, William made a partial translation of Proclus's Commentary on the Timaeus, and in February of 1280 he completed at Corinth, where he was archbishop from 1278, the translation of the “three little works” that traditionally were together since the days of Dionysius: Ten Doubts concerning Providence (February 4), On Providence and Fate and That which is in our Power, to Theodorus, the Mechanist (February 14), and On the Subsistence of Evil (February 21). William also completed the translation of Proclus's commentary on the Parmenides just before his death at Corinth in 1285 or 1286 and before he could send a copy to his friend, Henry (Bate) of Mechlun, as he had promised. These translations were in harmony with the metaphysical disposition of St. ALBERT THE GREAT. Their influence was felt where his was greatest, among the German Dominicans.

Platonic Academy. In 1439 Gemistos PLETHON came from Mistra in Greece to Italy to attend the Council of Florence as a representative of the Eastern Orthodox Church. He met Cosimo de' Medici (1389–1464), leading citizen of Florence, who was so attracted by his enthusiasm for Plato's philosophy that he decided to have young Marsilio FICINO, native of Figline near Florence, trained by Plethon in philosophy and Greek with a view to translating Plato's complete works into Latin. Cosimo founded the Platonic Academy in 1459 in Florence and made Marsilio its first director.

Marsilio completed the translation of Plato, a translation of the Enneads of Plotinus, of Albinus's Didaskalikos, and of Proclus's Elementatio physica, Elements of Theology, Hymns, and part of the Commentary on the First Alcibiades. An original work of his, Platonic Theology (1482), was dedicated to Lorenzo de' Medici (1449–92).

Cardinal BESSARION was a pupil of Plethon and his defender (In calumniatorem Platonis), from charges made in George of Trebizond's (1396–1484) comparative study of Aristotle and Plato, that Plethon's philosophy was unchristian and that it was a new religion, neither Christian nor Muslim, but Platonic and heathen. Bessarion also defended Plethon in De natura et arte against Theodorus Gaza's (c. 1400–75) De fato.

Giovanni PICO DELLA MIRANDOLA proposed in 1486 his readiness to defend in a public disputation in Rome 900 theses; he based 55 of them on Proclus's Platonic Theology. Later he came to Florence and joined the Academy. He wrote Of Being and Unity (1492), part of a prospective treatise on the harmony of Plato and Aristotle.

In the early 16th century, a translation into Latin, perhaps the first, of the Theology of Aristotle was made from the Arabic by Francesco Rosi of Ravenna, putting it into Greek at Damascus, and Pier Niccolo Castellani, putting the Greek into Latin in Rome, where the Latin text was published in 1519. Fifty years later, Jacques Charpentier (1521–74) designated the earlier translation as bad, corrected it, and published the revision with notes in Paris in 1571. A translation by Geoffrey Lewis from the Arabic into English about 1959 was the occasion for Paul Henry's (1906–) establishing the work as that of al-Kindī, who excerpted it in large part from the Enneads of Plotinus.

Spiritus Martinus Cuneas made a Latin translation of Proclus's Elementatio physica (Paris 1542). Francesco Patrizzi translated the Elementatio physica and Elements of Theology into Latin (Ferrara 1583). Aemilius Portus (1550–1612) had his Latin translation of the Platonic Theology and the Elements of Theology published posthumously alongside the Greek text in Hamburg in 1618.

Giordano BRUNO and Jakob BÖHME were influenced by the writings of the Platonists; the former especially by Plotinus and Raymond LULL, the latter by Proclus and NICHOLAS OF CUSA.

Cambridge Platonists. In the 17th century, a group of Christian philosophers, most of them at the University of Cambridge, united in opposition to corpuscular physics and the mechanism of Thomas HOBBS as appropriate foundations for philosophy. They sought to reconcile science and religion in a Platonic framework and to establish ethics as law of nature. Their founder was Benjamin Whichcote (1609–83). The chief members were Ralph Cudworth (1617–88), Richard Cumberland (1631–1718), Joseph Glanvill (1636–80), Henry More (1614–87), and John Norris (1657–1711). See CAMBRIDGE PLATONISTS.

G. W. LEIBNIZ developed his philosophy in conscious opposition to the Cambridge Platonists, as he said in his Discourse on Metaphysics (10). He did not thereby accept a mechanist approach but simply pointed out that there was much more to Plato than the doctrines of world soul, subsistence of the ideas, and purification of the soul. He preferred Plato's teachings on virtue, justice, and the state; on the art of defining and classifying concepts; and on knowledge of the eternal verities and the innate principles of the mind.

Anthony Ashley Cooper, third earl of Shaftesbury (1671–1713), styled Lord Ashley from January of 1683, was sympathetic to the Cambridge Platonists. In 1698 he published the first edition of the Sermons of Dr. Whichcote, for which he wrote the preface; in The Moralists: A Philosophical Rhapsody, published in 1709, he spoke of Cudworth as "that Pious and Learned man" (2.3).

Jean Le Clerc (1657–1736), in his capacity as publisher, was in correspondence with Cudworth, Leibniz (whose philosophy he did not approve), Shaftesbury, and John LOCKE. He had great influence through his Bibliothèque universelle et historique (25 v. Amsterdam 1686–93), begun with J. C. de la Croze; Bibliothèque choisie (28 v. Amsterdam 1703–13); and Bibliothèque ancienne et moderne (29 v. Amsterdam 1714–26). In volumes 6 and 7 of Bibliothèque choisie he gave a sympathetic exposition of Cudworth's philosophy.

Modern Platonism. Unique among moderns is the philosophical position of Thomas Taylor, "the Platonist" (1758–1835). He abjured the Christianity of his day, openly avowed belief in the Greek gods, and wrote as a religious exercise hymns in their worship. He translated the complete works of Aristotle into English; and, with Floyer Sydenham (1710–87), the complete works of Plato. His chief interest was in the later Platonists, whose doctrine he approvingly designated, in their words, "the Platonic theology." He translated much of Plotinus, Porphyry, Apuleius, Iamblichus, and Proclus.

The Platonism of the recent past is closely related to Platonic studies. Thus Victor COUSIN published unedited works of Proclus. G. F. Creuzer (1771–1858) edited Proclus and Plotinus. Clemens Baemker edited Platonic writings of the Middle Ages. Constantin Ritter (1859–1936) edited Plato. Edward Caird (1835–1908) and F. M. Cornford (1874–1943) were interested in the evolution of theology in Greek philosophy. Charles Huit (1845–1914) and Ernst Hoffmann (1880–1952) took a scholarly interest in the history of Platonism.

Other names that must be mentioned are George Burges (1786–1864), George Grote (1794–1871), Benjamin Jowett (1817–93), Eduard Zeller (1814–1908), Walter Pater (1839–94), Charles Bigg (1840–1908), Thomas Whittaker (1856–1935), Stephen MacKenna (1872–1934), A. E. Taylor (1869–1945), William Temple (1881–1944), Émile Bréhier (1876–1952), Wincenty Lutoslawski (1863–1954), W. R. INGE, and C. S. LEWIS.

In the United States, a group of enthusiasts fostered Platonic studies in the Midwest as an antidote to the pre-occupation with science and an alternative to Hegelianism. Their inspiration was Thomas Taylor, whose writings they carefully collected, but the spirit of their philosophy was consciously that of R. W. EMERSON and the Concord School. Leaders in the group were H. K. Jones (1818–1903) of Jacksonville, Ill., “the Athens of the West,” and T. M. Johnson (1851–1919) of Osceola, Mo. They associated with Thomas Davidson (1840–1900), Alexander Wilder (1823–1908), and K. S. Guthrie (1871–1940), translators of Platonic writings into English.

At the universities, Paul Shorey (1857–1934) and P. E. More (1864–1937) worked mostly with Plato; E. K. Rand (1871–1945), with Cicero and Boethius; C. S. PEIRCE, Josiah ROYCE, and A. N. WHITEHEAD with human values in a universe of science.

PLEASURE

A state of gratification, as opposed to pain or sorrow. The moralist usually associates this state with a situation of repose in a conative function and relates it to an object. Thus Aristotle considered pleasure to be a “certain motion of the soul and a sensible establishing thereof all at once, in keeping with the nature of a thing” (Rhet. 1369b33). Aquinas understood this to mean that pleasure is a passion of the soul, an actuation of the animal appetite arising from an apprehension of sense (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 31.1). But pleasure may be taken more widely to include the satisfaction of the spiritual appetite, or will, arising from the contemplation of truth.

It follows from what has been said that for pleasure in the subjective sense four things are necessary: first, an appetite for the pleasant; second, something pleasant to satisfy the appetite; third, the union of the appetite and its object; and fourth, the perception of this union. Whenever these conditions are verified, there is pleasure.

Kinds of Pleasure. Pleasure is either sensible or intellectual. Sensible pleasure results from the gratification of some sense. Sensible pleasure has been called the feeling-aspect of a satisfying experience. Although it is neither feeling nor sensation but something attached to the experience, it means for the moralist the repose of the sense object in its proper object. Of these sensible pleasures the keenest one is that of the pleasure of touch; the highest and most intellectually useful is the pleasure of sight (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 31.6).

Intellectual pleasure is spiritual, since it follows on the satisfaction of a spiritual nature and its appetite. This type of pleasure resides in the will and results from the possession of the truth. Special synonyms for it are joy, gladness, and delight.

Pleasure and Man’s Final End. The view that pleasure is man’s final end, and therefore, the right and proper motive of all human activity, has been held for centuries by various hedonistic schools of philosophy. These schools got their name from the Greek word for pleasure, ἡδονή. (See HEDONISM.) The fallacy latent in all forms of hedonism results from failure to distinguish pleasure as an end in itself and pleasure as the accompaniment of possession of a valued object which is the end. Pleasure, although subjective, depends partly upon the object that is “pleasant” as having a worth or goodness of its own. If pleasure is viewed as an end in itself, to which the object is made only a means, pleasure is ultimately found to be only a chimera.

It is nevertheless true that there is a sense in which pleasure is associated with the goal of life. There is no happiness without it. Pleasure accompanies and rewards all worthy achievement. It is the afterglow, the final repose of a will that has achieved its final end. But it is not itself the final end, the supreme good that is man’s beatitude. “What matters most” Aquinas insisted, “is the object that gives pleasure” (C. gent. 2.26).

Moral Evaluation. While hedonists thought of pleasure as always good, that there is nothing right but pleasure, nothing wrong but pain, Stoics thought of it as always bad. For the hedonist pleasure was man’s final end and therefore to be sought everywhere, always and at all costs; for the Stoic it was an animal gratification unworthy of a man. From the conclusions arrived at in the preceding paragraphs it appears that pleasure, viewed apart from its object, is neither good nor bad. Like all the passions of the soul it is in itself morally indifferent. The goodness or badness of pleasure depends primarily on its object. If a man takes pleasure in what is evil, e.g., bad thoughts, desires, or actions, his pleasure is evil. Not all pleasure is morally good because not everything pleasurable is morally good. The pleasurable, like the merely useful, is not necessarily honorable; to be honorable, one must sometimes forgo the pleasurable. On the other hand, there is always a pleasure attaching to the honorable, the virtuous good. The joy of a good conscience exceeds the pleasure of sense. The goodness or badness of a man’s life can even be judged according to that in which he habitually finds his pleasure. For this reason Aquinas said “the man is good and virtuous who takes pleasure in the works of virtue; and the man is evil who takes pleasure in evil works” (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 24.4).

It follows that pleasure must never be sought for its own sake and without reference to a reasonable and legitimate object. Only if the object be good will the pleasure be good. If, for any reason, the object cannot be legitimately desired, the pleasure must also be forgone. The pleasure of the act is the goal of the intemperate man (Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 13.3 ad 2). Intemperance means indulgence in pleasure without regard to reason. Innocent XI, therefore, censured these propositions: To eat and drink to satiety simply and solely for pleasure (ob solam voluptatem) is not a sin, provided that it is not injurious to health. The marriage act done solely for pleasure (ob solam voluptatem) is without any fault whatsoever, without even a venial defect [H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer (32d ed. Freiburg 1963) 2108–09].

Apart from its obvious associations with morality, pleasure implicates the whole moral agent in ways that can be either valuable or devastating. Human experience provides ample evidence that individuals have a level of sense pleasure almost indispensable for well integrated life and for efficient work, and which is of no small significance as a protective shield against temptations due to the displacement of unsatisfied human drives.

Christianity has never enjoyed complete freedom from members unduly suspicious of human pleasure. This attitude finds no justification in its Judaic origins, but there have been recurrent revivals of it in Christian history. These appear to have stemmed in large part from various forms of dualism. Instances of this attitude in modern times are to be found in Puritanism and Jansenism, and among the immoderate devotees of supernaturalism.

PLEGMUND OF CANTERBURY

Archbishop; b. Mercia, England; d. Aug. 2, 914. A hermit at Plegmundham (now Plemstall), in Cheshire, he became tutor and adviser to ALFRED THE GREAT and participated in the literary revival. Appointed archbishop of Canterbury in 890, he received the pallium in Rome from Pope FORMOSUS (891). Plegmund, the recognized leader against pagan influences, crowned Edward the Elder at Kingston (901), consecrated the New Minster at WINCHESTER (c. 903), and after a second journey to Rome (908) aided in the subdivision of the two West Saxon sees into five, consecrating seven bishops in one day (probably c. 909).

Feast: Aug. 2.

PLESSINGTON, JOHN (WILLIAM), ST.

Priest, martyr; b. Dimples Hall, Lancashire, England, c. 1637; d. Chester, England, July 19, 1679. His family, always Catholic and royalist, maintained a chaplain in their house. Until the age of nine John was probably instructed by (Bl.) Thomas WHITAKER (later a martyr), who was chaplain at Dimples. Later John went to a Jesuit private school at Scarisbrick Hall, near Ormskirk, before crossing to St. Omer in Flanders to complete his education. Then he joined the English seminary at Valladolid, Spain, and was ordained at Segovia (March 1662). Leaving Spain in April 1663 he was sent as a missionary to Holywell in Flintshire, the shrine of St. Winefride, and a center of pilgrimage all through penal times. From his headquarters in Ye Crosse Keyes Inn he worked in Flintshire and the neighboring counties. It is uncertain when he left Holywell for Puddington Hall, the home of the Massey family, in the Wirral Peninsula, but he was certainly established there by 1670. For at least eight years Plessington was at Puddington, officially as tutor to the Massey children, in reality as a missionary. It was his firm stand against the marriage of a Catholic heiress to a Protestant that led to his betrayal and arrest at the time of the Titus Oates plot. The authorities were not able to involve him in the plot, but he was charged with being a priest. His popularity was so great that no witnesses could be found to charge him until three apostates came forward; one was the mentally deranged Margaret Plat; another he swore he had never seen before; the third was a valid witness. After condemnation for his priesthood he remained nine weeks a prisoner in an underground cell of Chester Castle. When visited by the undertaker sent to measure him for his coffin, he remarked to a friend that he was now giving an order for his last suit. He was executed at Chester on July 19, 1679. After a spirited speech the cart was drawn away, and he was heard to call out, “O Jesus, be to me a Jesus.” His quartered body was returned to Puddington with instructions that it should be exposed on the four corners of the house. The Masseys flagrantly disobeyed this order and reverently buried the body in the neighboring churchyard of Burton. Although the burial was recorded in the Burton register, when the traditional grave was opened in 1962 no remains that could be certainly identified as the martyr’s were discovered. Plessington was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929, and canonized by Paul VI on Oct. 25, 1970 as one of the Forty Martyrs of England and Wales.

Feast: June 20; Oct. 25 (Feast of the 40 Martyrs of England and Wales); May 4 (Feast of the English Martyrs in England).

PLESSIS, JOSEPH OCTAVE

Eleventh bishop of Quebec, Canada; b. Montreal, March 3, 1763; d. Quebec, Dec. 4, 1825. He was the son of a blacksmith; his outstanding ability enabled him to complete his philosophical studies and to receive tonsure by the age of 17. While awaiting the required age for ordination, he taught in the Quebec seminary and was secretary to Bp. J. O. BRIAND. After ordination on March 11, 1786, he remained in Quebec, where he served on the bishop’s council and at 29 became pastor of the cathedral. In 1797, when Bp. Pierre Denaut succeeded to the See of Quebec, he requested that Plessis be named his coadjutor. Because the bulls from Rome were delayed, the consecration did not take place until 1801; five years later he succeeded to the see. During his administration he energetically supported the rights of the church and of the French in Canada in opposition to the policies of Gov. James Craig and other Protestant high officials of Quebec. In recognition of his influence in ensuring the loyalty of French Canadians to the British cause in the War of 1812 with the United States, the English ministry expressly recognized his episcopacy and approved his appointments in 1815 and later named him an ex officio member of the legislative council (1817). His pastoral visits, accounts of which remain, finally convinced him that one bishop could not govern the 500 leagues of territory from Cape Breton to Red River. Thus in 1819 and 1820 he went to London and to Rome to urge a division of his diocese and succeeded in obtaining the creation of four suffragans as well as the status of archbishop for himself. However, in deference to the sensibilities of the English government, he did not assume the title, which was not used publicly by an incumbent of the see until 1844. His concern for education led him to establish many elementary schools, and he founded or encouraged the seminaries of Nicolet, St. Hyacinthe, and St. Roch, as well as the old Seminary of Quebec, where he resided and helped in the formation of future priests. He interested himself in school legislation and succeeded in neutralizing the Protestant-oriented system of l'Institution Royale (1801) and in having a parochial-based school system finally adopted in 1824. His Journal de deux voyages apostoliques dans le Golfe Saint-Laurent et les provinces d'en bas, en 1811 et 1812 was published in 1865.

PLETHON, GEMISTOS

Late Byzantine philosopher and humanist; b. Constantinople, c. 1355 or 1360; d. Mistra, June 25, 1452. Apparently born George Gemistos, he was educated at Constantinople but as a youth spent considerable time at the Ottoman court in Brussa or Adrianople, where he studied occult arts and the teachings of Zarathustra (Zoroaster) with a Jewish savant named Eliseus. On the violent death of his mentor, Plethon, as he called himself, evidently in honor of Plato, moved to Mistra in the Peloponnesus, near Sparta, and opened a school of esoteric philosophy and religion. In 1413 he directed memoirs to Emperor Manuel concerning the affairs of the Peloponnesus and in 1414 another to the emperor's son Theodore, concerning the fortification of the Morean Isthmus, in which he proposed a complete reorganization of the civil and military society. In 1428 he was consulted by Emperor JOHN PALAEOLOGUS concerning the reunion of the Latin and Byzantine Churches and was brought to the Council of FLORENCE (1439) as one of the Greek theologians. He signed the decree of reunion, despite the fact that he later wrote an opposing treatise On the Procession of the Holy Spirit. While in Italy he presented the humanists with the tract Difference between Aristotle and Plato.

On his return to Mistra, Plethon published his chief work, Nomōn Syngraphē, in which he described a kind of political utopia. He proposed an idealized paganism built on elements of Neoplatonic philosophy: human felicity consists in the harmony between man's nature and the universe, of which man is only an element. Sin is but error; morality and religion can achieve only earthly, not heavenly, happiness; and in death, the soul returns to a spiritual, but not a supernatural, state and will exist in a sinless and happy condition.

Plethon's political philosophy was directed toward the complete reformation of life in the Peloponnesus, whose population he considered of pure Hellenic strain. In the reconstitution of society, he proposed three classes: the cultivators of the land, the merchants, and the imperial functionaries. The first two were to support the state with their products and money; the third, with military service. Among his many writings Plethon produced a treatise On Virtues, several tracts on the teachings of Zarathustra, a commentary on the Analytics of Aristotle, a tract on the Incarnation and on Latin theology, and orations for the death of the Princess Cleopas (1433) and the Empress Helen. His three books on the Laws contain a description of the liturgy of the new religion he desired to found. He was of original genius and had a strong influence on the Byzantine scholars who stimulated the Renaissance in Italy, but Plethon had no successors. His teachings were opposed by BESSARION, who had been one of his pupils in Mistra, and his Laws were publicly burned by George Scholarius after he became patriarch of Constantinople as GENNADIUS II.

PLINY THE YOUNGER

Nephew and adopted son of Pliny the Elder, Roman orator, letter writer, and administrator; b. Comum (in north Italy), A.D. 61 or 62; d. before 114. After his adoption Pliny's name became C. Plinius Caecilius Secundus. As a member of the senatorial class he received the typical rhetorical education of the time and entered a career of public service. He served as praefectus aerarii mili-

taris under Domitian and was appointed praefectus aeararii Saturni by Nerva—both important financial posts. As consul suffectus in 100, he delivered the laudatory address that he developed subsequently into his elaborate and fulsome Panegyricus. He achieved a reputation as a prosecutor and defense counsel in political cases, but his forensic speeches are not extant. It is most probably owing to his special knowledge of Bithynia, exhibited when he defended two former governors of that province accused of maladministration, that Trajan sent him as an imperial legate to order the affairs of Bithynia. He served in this capacity from 111 to 113.

The nine books of letters Pliny wrote between 97 and 109 were originally intended for publication and lack the intimacy and sparkle of Cicero's Letters to Atticus, but they contain much personal information on both Pliny and his times. Book 10 of his Letters is different, however, because it is comprised of official correspondence between Pliny and Trajan respecting affairs in Bithynia—even those of minor import. It is only too evident that a provincial governor had very little scope for personal initiative—or at least did not deem it prudent to show any appreciable independence in action.

Letters 96 and 97 are of prime importance because they are about the policy to be adopted toward the Christians. Pliny's letter (96) describes the Christian gatherings in some detail and makes the earliest non-Christian reference to the celebration of the Eucharist and Agape. Trajan's reply (letter 97) contains the first extant statement of imperial policy respecting Christians. Its inconsistency, as was pointed out later by TERTULLIAN, indicates that the Roman state was faced with a new and unique problem and was conscious of that fact.

PLOTINUS

Neoplatonic philosopher; b. probably in Upper Egypt, A.D. 205; d. Rome, 270. Plotinus's race is not known, but by education and cultural background he was thoroughly Greek, as the evidence of his own writings shows. He came to Alexandria to study philosophy in

Roman coin with portrait bust of Plotinus. (©Araldo de Luca/CORBIS)

232, but could find no one to hold his interest until someone took him to hear Ammonius Saccas, a former Christian, with whom he remained 11 years. Fellow pupils of his were the two Origenes, one a pagan Neoplatonist, and the other a future Christian theologian. Thus, Christianity was in some way associated with the very beginnings of NEOPLATONISM, but too little is known of Ammonius Saccas to ascertain how much his Christian upbringing may have influenced his teaching and, indirectly, the works of his more famous pupil, Plotinus. At any rate, Ammonius seems to have reconciled the teachings of PLATO and ARISTOTLE, perhaps after the manner of the Middle Platonists (see PLATONISM).

Character of Thought. In 243 Plotinus joined an expedition by the Emperor Gordian to the East, in the hope of making contact with Persian and Indian philosophers; but Gordian was murdered and Plotinus escaped to Antioch. He never made any contact with Eastern thought, and the balance of opinion among modern Neoplatonic scholars seems to find his entire system readily intelligible in terms of Greek philosophy, without postulating the introduction of Eastern elements. Plotinus came to Rome in 244 and taught philosophy until his death from a painful form of disease. From 254 onward he wrote, not a complete system, but tentative discussions of central points in his system, which have been rather arbitrarily arranged by his pupil PORPHYRY into six groups of nine treatises called Enneads.

The thought of Plotinus is a final synthesis of various elements of GREEK PHILOSOPHY. It expressly claims to follow the philosophy of Plato and merely to make explicit what was already implicit in his Dialogues and Letters (cf. 5.1.8), but it incorporates a great deal from Aristotle (especially through his great 2d-century commentator, Alexander of Aphrodisias), and from STOICISM, Neo-Pythagoreanism, and Middle Platonism. In fact, it may be regarded as the culmination of a movement toward the conflation of the various Greek schools of thought that began in the 1st century B.C., and gradually developed over the 1st and 2d centuries A.D. Hence Plotinus is not in the literal sense a Platonist, but in the wider sense of tradition, influence, and general viewpoint he most certainly is.

Teaching. For Plotinus the first substantial principle or hypostasis is the One or the Good. The double title reflects the influence of both Neo-Pythagoreanism and Middle Platonism, and ultimately of Plato himself, whose preoccupations were both ethical and mathematical. This first principle is also termed God and is beyond Being (following the Republic 509B).

Emanation. Next, by a process of necessary emanation, comes nous or intellect, also referred to as divine, in which the whole world of ideas or forms is contained. It is on this level that being, which always entails some multiplicity, and life appear. From intellect, in turn, comes soul, which at its highest level belongs to the world of intellect. The world-soul forms and rules the material universe, and at its lower level, where it acts as a principle of life and growth, receives the name of nature, which is almost a distinct fourth hypostasis. Each of these principles has proceeded from the previous, and then turned back in contemplation of it in order to be fully constituted, according to a law of abiding, procession, and reversion. But the last principle is too weak to produce anything further than the forms immanent in bodies, beneath which exists only formless matter.

Matter. This material visible world is therefore good, as emanating ultimately from the Good, but unformed matter is evil, in the ontological sense of lacking form, definition, or shape (1.8.3). Moral evil consists in the assimilation of the soul to matter, with all that this entails in terms of deficiency. Evil is simply the complete lack of good (1.8.5; 2.4.16). Some critics have taken matter in Plotinus to be a separate principle of evil that almost introduces a Manichaean dualism into his system, but a careful reading of the relevant texts does not seem to justify this conclusion (e.g., 4.8.6, 18–24).

Soul. Individual human souls are one with the universal soul, but with distinct identity, and descend by destiny into the body. Plotinus harmonizes the seemingly opposed views that the soul's entry into the body is somehow a fall, and yet at the same time for the benefit of the universe (4.8.5). But human souls are only expressions on the level of Soul of particular intellects within the sphere of intellect, and so man's highest and most real point never descends into union with the body. Each human soul has three levels—the transcendent intellect, the intermediate soul, and the lowest soul that immediately gives life to the body. Whether one's life is to be virtuous or not depends upon the decision of the intermediate soul, either to return in contemplation to the sphere of intellect, or to devote itself to the needs and cravings of the body.

Contemplation. The process of return to contemplation is much as Plato described it, the most suitable souls being those of the musician, the lover, and the philosopher. The first two still need to learn detachment from particular images of beauty, but the last can go straight on to the study of mathematics and then dialectic—the complete knowledge of the world of forms within the unity of intellect. One is led to this state of intellectual contemplation by the practice of the virtues—practical wisdom, courage, moderation, and justice. In their normal exercise these are civic virtues, but as specially directed toward detachment from the body they become higher virtues or purifications (1.2.3). The purified soul can rise still higher and be united to the One by the intellect, although only intermittently while it is still in this life (4.8.1). This union is beyond thought or expression in word; it is a unity of love in which the lover is no longer conscious of any distinction between him and the beloved. It is the simplicity of a single glance, and once attained all else seems worthless in comparison with it (6.7.34–36).

Influence. The philosophy of Plotinus immediately became dominant in the Greco-Roman world of the later Empire. Its terminology was used in the definitions of the Trinity at Constantinople in A.D. 381 with this difference: that for Plotinus procession entails inferiority, whereas the Christian Trinity is a procession of equals. St. AUGUSTINE found his inspiration in Plotinian thought, which led him out of the despair of MANICHAISM and SKEPTICISM. Perhaps most important of all, the psychology of Plotinus became, via the medium of PROCLUS and PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS, the accepted framework of mystical theology, again with a difference. For Plotinus, the human soul at its highest level never descends into union with the body (a point upon which Proclus, following IAMBlichus, disagreed with him); thus it can by its own efforts return to the contemplative life of Intellect and even to union with the One, whereas, for the Christian mystic, the mind may be raised to the contemplation of God only by the freely bestowed grace or gift of union. However, the faculty of Nous was widely accepted as the nurlural vehicle of this grace by such authors as HUGH OF SAINT-VICTOR and RICHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, St. BONAVENTURE, J. TAULER, and the Flemish and Spanish mystics.

PLOWDEN, CHARLES AND FRANCIS

Members of a distinguished Catholic family that contributed ten members to the Society of Jesus; lineal descendants of Edmund PLOWDEN.

Charles, rector of Stonyhurst College; b. Plowden Hall, Shropshire, Aug. 19, 1743; d. Jougne, France, June 13, 1821. Charles, the son of William and Frances Plowden, was educated at the Edgbaston Franciscan school. While registered at the College of ST. OMER under the alias of Simons, July 7, 1754, he entered the Jesuit novitiate at Watten (1759). After theological study at Liège and Bologna, Plowden was ordained at Rome, Sept. 30, 1770. When assigned to the English College at Bruges, he taught with John CARROLL, the future American bishop. Both were arrested and Plowden was imprisoned from September 1773 to May 1774, following the papal suppression of the Jesuits and the Austrian confiscation of Jesuit property in the imperial domains. Upon his release, Plowden joined a number of former Jesuits in conducting the Academy of Liège. He subsequently served as chaplain to the Smythe and Maxwell families, Jacobite exiles living on the Continent. In 1784, he became chaplain at Lulworth Castle, home of Thomas Weld, a prominent Dorset Catholic; there Plowden assisted and preached at the episcopal consecration of John Carroll (1790). Until Carroll's death (1815), the two maintained a correspondence that is of historical significance. Upon the provisional restoration of the Society of Jesus in 1803, Plowden became master of novices at Hodder Place. At its formal establishment by PIUS VII, he was named provincial and rector of Stonyhurst College (1817), which he and Weld had helped to found in 1794. It was while returning from the Jesuit General Chapter in Rome (1820) that Plowden died.

Francis, lawyer, historian, brother of Charles; b. Plowden Hall, Shropshire, June 28, 1749; d. Paris, Jan. 4, 1819. Francis had been educated at Edgbaston, St. Omer, and the Jesuit novitiate at Watten (1766), and was teaching at Bruges (1771–73) at the time of the Jesuit suppression. Since he was not yet ordained, he was released from his vows, and, returning to England, he entered the Middle Temple. When the Relief Act of 1791 relieved Catholics of legal disabilities, Francis expanded his law practice. His interest in research led to the publication of Jura Anglorum (1792), a commentary on English law, which brought him condemnation from his Jesuit brother Robert, but also an honorary degree from Oxford, a rare distinction for a Catholic. He abandoned his law practice to write extensively on Church-State relations. His Historical Review of the State of Ireland (1803), written at the request of the British government, was a harsh indictment of government policy and administration. A later volume, Ireland since the Union (1811), caused a libel suit in which Plowden was ordered to pay £5,000 to the government. The independent and forthright, if impractical, Plowden, refusing to pay the fine, fled to France, where he died in relative obscurity and poverty.

PLOWDEN, EDMUND

English recusant, jurist; b. Plowden Hall, Shropshire, 1518; d. London, Feb. 6, 1585. Plowden was educated at Cambridge for three years, but left to enter the Middle Temple in London (1538). He was a distinguished lawyer who additionally obtained a license in surgery from Oxford in 1552. Plowden was a member of the council of the Marches of Wales during the reign of Queen Mary I (1553), also serving in Parliament during those years. Upon succeeding to the Plowden estates in 1557, he devoted himself to his law practice, especially at the Middle Temple, where he served as treasurer (1561) and counsel of the court of the Duchy of Lancaster (1562).

Although a faithful Roman Catholic, he worshiped in the established church until Pius V issued the Regnans in excelsis (1570) excommunicating Queen Elizabeth I. During those years, Plowden appeared in litigations defending well-known Catholics, such as Bp. Edmund Bonner and Gabriel Goodman, dean of Westminster, when their religious authority was legally assailed. Along with Sir Thomas TRESHAM, Plowden was the leading Roman Catholic layman of his day. He suffered penalties for his religious convictions, and it is said that he sacrificed Elizabeth's offer of the Lord Chancellorship rather than renounce his Roman allegiance. His fame as a lawyer was very great. Both Sir Edward Coke and William Camden, the famous antiquarian, paid tribute to his learning and skill. Camden described him as "second to no man of his profession." There seems to be little doubt that he was the "foremost Catholic of cultural attainments of his day" (Trimble 32).

PLUMMER, ALFRED

English theological and historical writer; b. Heworth, near Gateshead, England, Feb. 17, 1841; d. Bideford, England, April 17, 1926. From Lancing College he went to Exeter College, at the University of OXFORD, where he graduated in 1863. He was a fellow of Trinity College from 1865 to 1875 and tutor and dean there from 1867 to 1874. From 1874 to 1902 he was master of University College, Durham. He was admitted to the diaconate in 1866 by the bishop of Oxford, Dr. Samuel Wilberforce (d. 1873), but he never sought ordination to the priesthood.

He was a prolific writer, and his translations of DÖLLINGER's works introduced the latter to many English readers. His commentaries on the New Testament, noted especially for the section dealing with the Gospel of St. LUKE (Edinburgh 1906), and his introductions to the books of the Old Testament are scholarly and conservative. His devotion to ANGLICANISM appears in his historical writings: Lectures on English Church History (1575–1649) (1904), The Church of England in the 18th Century (1910), The Churches in Britain before A.D. 1000 (1911). In 1887 he wrote Handbook on the Church of the Early Fathers.

PLUMMER, CHARLES

Scholar, fellow and chaplain of Corpus Christi College, Oxford, and deacon of the Church of England; b. Heworth, Durham County, England, Jan. 24, 1851; d. Sept. 8, 1927. The son of the Rev. Matthew Plummer, he won a scholarship to Corpus Christi in 1869 and was elected to a fellowship in 1873. While serving as college dean (1891–98) he edited Bede's Historia ecclesiastica gentis Anglorum (2 v. 1896) and later wrote the Life and Times of Alfred the Great (1902). Thenceforth he turned to Celtic studies and carried out John COLGAN'S design of publishing the lives of the Irish saints. The Latin lives edited in his Vitae sanctorum Hiberniae (2 v. 1910), as well as the vernacular lives in the Bethada Náem nÉrenn (2 v. 1922), are models of erudition. His Miscellanea hagiographica Hibernica, published by the Bollandists in the Subsidia Hagiographica (Brussels 1925), contains a valuable catalogue of hagiographical materials, and his British Academy lecture, On the Colophons and Marginalia of Irish Scribes (London 1926), is a classic. He is buried in Holywell Cemetery in Oxford.

PLUMPE, JOSEPH CONRAD

Patristic scholar and editor; b. April 12, 1901, Cloverdale, Ohio; d. Dec. 8, 1957, Worthington, Ohio. He was the son of August H. and Mary (Gerding) Plumpe. He received his B.A. (1922) and M.A. (1924) from the Pontifical College Josephinum in Worthington, was ordained in 1928 at Toledo, Ohio, and studied at the University of Münster (Ph.D. 1932) and at the University of Berlin in Germany. He taught classical languages and German at the Josephinum (1932–41), and was professor of ecclesiastical Latin and New Testament Greek at the Catholic University of America (1954–57). His scholarly works include: Wesen und Wirkung der auctoritas mai- orum bei Cicero (Münster 1935); a translation, Life and Work of Prince Demetrius Augustine Gallitzin, by Peter Henry Lemcke (London and New York 1940); and Mater Ecclesia: An Inquiry into the Concept of the Church as Mother in Early Christianity (Washington 1943). He was also joint founder-editor of the patristic series "Ancient Christian Writers."

PLUNKET, OLIVER, ST.

Martyr, archbishop of Armagh, primate of Ireland; b. Loughcrew, near Oldcastle, County Meath, 1629; d. Tyburn, London, England, July 1, 1681. Oliver Plunket (Plunkett) was a member of a prominent Irish family that was related to the earls of Fingall and Roscommon. The young Oliver was educated by his kinsman Patrick Plunket, Benedictine abbot of St. Mary's, Dublin, later bishop of Ardagh and Meath. In 1647 Father Pier Francesco SCARAMPI, who had served as Innocent X's envoy to the Irish Catholic Confederacy (1643–45), returned to Rome accompanied by Oliver and four Irish seminarians. Plunket was enrolled in the Irish College, where he made an outstanding record. After his ordination in 1654, Oliver, instead of returning to Ireland, received permission to remain with the Fathers of Charity in Rome. He worked among the poor and also took degrees in canon and civil law at the Roman College. Plunket was appointed Roman representative of the Irish bishops and served as professor of theology and apologetics at the College of Propaganda until 1669. In that year Edmund O'REILLY, the exiled archbishop of Armagh, died in France, and Pope CLEMENT IX chose Plunket as the new archbishop.

Irish Mission. Plunket was consecrated in Ghent on Nov. 30, 1669. Clement also appointed bishops for the sees of Cashel, Tuam, Ossory, and Dublin. Plunket's cousin Peter TALBOT was named archbishop of Dublin. Plunket returned to Ireland by way of London. There he remained for several days as guest of Philip HOWARD, OP, almoner of Queen Catherine of Braganza, wife of Charles II. Plunket reached Ireland in the spring of 1670 after an absence of almost 25 years. Not only was Armagh a large and long-neglected ecclesiastical province, it was also a difficult area to administer. Fortunately, English Lord Lieutenant John Lord Berkeley of Stratton, whose wife was secretly a Catholic, was on friendly terms with Plunket and his priests; even a new school, conducted by the Jesuits, was opened in Drogheda. Berkeley's successor, Arthur Capel, earl of Essex (1672), was also considerate of Plunket's interests. Essex did not persecute Catholics, but he did stir up dissensions among the Catholic clergy over precedence and jurisdiction.

Plunket and Talbot exchanged written arguments concerning Armagh's primacy over Dublin. Likewise, the FRANCISCANS and DOMINICANS engaged in rancorous disputes over parishes, foundations, and churches. The Franciscans, who had remained in Ireland during the persecutions of the 1650s and 1660s, were somewhat resentful of Dominican efforts to re-establish former Dominican foundations that they had abandoned when they had withdrawn from Ireland a few years before. The Franciscans had kept the faith alive, but their growth had been hasty and not carefully regulated. Plunket was fearful that the Irish province would become a dumping ground for undesirable friars. Plunket tried to restore peace by adjudicating the dispute between the Franciscans and Dominicans. The problems of begging and questing were as important as jurisdiction. Plunket resolved the conflict in favor of the Dominicans. He also tried to improve the character and discipline of the Franciscans by making formal recommendations to the Franciscan provincial chapter. The archbishop, a strict canonist, was anxious to eliminate irregularities and laxity. Shortly after Plunket began his efforts, the persecution of 1673 against Catholics changed the favorable attitudes of officials to hostile repression. Stemming in part from the passage of the Test Act of 1673, the persecution led to the closing down of religious houses, which dispersed friars, monks, and priests throughout the country. Plunket, along with Dr. John Brennan, later archbishop of Cashel, was forced to go into hiding.

Pastoral Work. Before the renewal of the persecution of 1673, Plunket had addressed himself to problems other than the squabbles and discipline of religious orders. One of his first actions was the summoning of the Synod of Clones (1670). Plunket set down rules for the education and ordination of priests. He also tried to raise money to overcome the dire poverty of the Church and its clergy. The primate warned his flock against cooperation with Tories, Irish outlaws who had turned to brigandage and robbery after the English had confiscated their property. Since the Tories were mostly Roman Catholic, Plunket was torn between sympathy for his coreligionists and his firm belief in law and order. The archbishop himself frequently went into their hiding places to plead with these outlaws to abandon their illegal activities. That Plunket knew that these criminals were often sentenced to exile in America far from the comforts and consolation of their religious faith did not make his task any easier. The English, however, held the clergy responsible for the rebellion and political activities of their parishioners. The persecution interrupted his work and forced Plunket to carry on his pastoral duties in disguise and secrecy.

Arrest, Trial, and Martyrdom. Plunket's letters to Rome described the hardships of these years (1673–79).

Priests were forced into hiding or exile. The Drogheda school was closed and the faculty driven out. Church services had to be conducted in secret. In 1677 James Butler, marquis, later duke of Ormond, replaced Essex as lord lieutenant. The suppression of convents and seminaries was ruthlessly enforced. Edicts of expulsion were widely circulated. Catholics were even forbidden to enter the city of Dublin or any other principal seaport (Nov. 20, 1678).

In the midst of these difficulties, the Titus OATES PLOT in England (1678) caused the English government to redouble its anti-Catholic efforts. Plunket, despite increased dangers, visited his aged relative Patrick Plunket, bishop of Ardagh and Meath, who was dying. The government had him arrested and imprisoned in Dublin Castle (Dec. 6, 1679). There he was denied all outside communication for six weeks. Finally, he was shown some consideration; he was able to attend Archbishop Peter Talbot, who had been jailed and who was close to death.

Plunket was accused of remaining in the kingdom despite the edict of expulsion and of conspiring to bring a French army into Ireland. These charges were based on statements given by several informers, among them some former friars and apostate priests who had suffered from Plunket's disciplinary measures. The grand jury hearing the case dismissed the charges because of the numerous contradictions in the witnesses' testimony. The government as well as the informers, aided and abetted by William Hetherington, an agent of Anthony Ashley Cooper, earl of Shaftesbury and one of the originators of the anti-Catholic campaign, drew up new charges. A trial was held at Dundalk in July of 1680. There Plunket was accused of fomenting a revolt that would lead to the murder of Protestants and the establishment of the "Romish religion." The government was fearful that it would not obtain a conviction in Ireland; thus, over Plunket's objections the trial was moved to London. The earl of Essex pleaded for him, but to no avail. Plunket was imprisoned in Newgate. At the Winter Assizes, a grand jury refused to find a true bill of indictment; but in June, after a trial in which Plunket was unable to present all of his witnesses, he was found guilty of high treason after the jury had deliberated for only 15 minutes. One of the prosecution's chief witnesses, Henry O'Neill (O'Neale), later confessed that he had perjured himself. A number of the other witnesses against the archbishop were later hanged as robbers. On July 1, 1681 (O.S.), the archbishop was brought to Tyburn, where he was hanged, drawn, and quartered.

Before his death, Plunket had written, "And being the first among the Irish, I will teach others, with the grace of God, by example, not to fear death" (Curtis, 172). For his courageous life and example, LEO XIII declared him venerable on Dec. 9, 1886, BENEDICT XV pronounced him blessed on May 23, 1920, and Paul VI canonized him on Oct. 12, 1975. His feast is celebrated in Ireland, Australia, New Zealand, and the Diocese of Clifton, England. His head is preserved in St. Peter's church, Drogheda, Ireland.

Feast: July 11.

PLURALISM, PHILOSOPHICAL

The term pluralism has two uses in philosophy. In one it designates a philosophical position about the nature of reality and is opposed to MONISM. In the other it designates a phenomenon of philosophy itself, namely, that in history one does not find one philosophy but rather many philosophies. This raises a question of "metaphilosophy," that is, a question about philosophy: why are there many philosophies and not one? This article is concerned with the second use of pluralism and considers the problem it poses and various types of responses it elicits; a sketch of a solution along lines acceptable to Catholics is presented in conclusion.

The Problem of Philosophical Pluralism

A characteristic of philosophy as it is known in history is the multiplicity and diversity of philosophical systems. This is not merely a question of historical development, which obtains in all fields of human learning, nor is it a question either of the proliferation of divisions of philosophy as in the proliferation of the positive sciences, or of division within the sciences. Rather the historical situation is that philosophy exists not simply as philosophy, but as individual philosophies that are wholes or systems; these systems are in varying degrees different from and opposed to each other, and some tend to endure or to recur in the course of history.

Different Philosophies. To take the Greek period as an example, there are the classic philosophies of PLATO-

NISM, ARISTOTELIANISM, STOICISM, EPICUREANISM, SKEPTICISM, and NEOPLATONISM. Some of these systems are themselves repetitions in a more developed way of pre-Platonic philosophies (Stoicism of HERACLITUS, Epicureanism of DEMOCRITUS, skepticism of the SOPHISTS, etc.), and they are repeated again in the late medieval and Renaissance periods of European philosophy.

That they are designated as “isms” itself shows that they are not simply the thought of one man, but rather express a viewpoint and a doctrine that became a school and a tradition to which groups of philosophers adhere. They are in other words different philosophies. Moreover, they are not only different, but they are frequently explicitly and radically opposed to each other. Thus Aristotelianism is opposed to Platonism; Stoicism and Epicureanism are opposed to both and to each other; skepticism rejects all of them. In this feature of diversity and pluralism philosophy resembles religion and culture more than mathematics and the positive sciences. Thus, as there is a history of religions rather than religion, so there is a history of philosophical systems (see V. T. A. Ferm).

World Philosophy. The problem of philosophical pluralism can be situated within circles of narrowing dimensions. There is first the circle of the whole civilized world and the question of the comparison of Chinese, Indian, and Western philosophy. This question came into prominence after World War I with the increase of communication between all peoples (see C. A. Moore, S. Radhakrishnan). A difficulty with this comparison is the use of the term philosophy, how it is distinguished from religion and culture, and to what extent it is a Greek and therefore a Western phenomenon (See CHINESE PHILOSOPHY; INDIAN PHILOSOPHY).

Western Philosophy. Second, there is the circle of Western philosophy, which is traditionally divided into three periods: ancient, medieval, and modern. The ancient period is the time of the Greco-Roman philosophies mentioned above. The medieval period is the time of the religious philosophies: Jewish, Islamic, and Christian. Peculiar to the period was the problem of reconciling philosophy as developed by the Greeks (reason) with scripture (revelation, faith). Each religion had its polarity of Platonism and Aristotelianism (Jewish: Avicbron and Maimonides; Islamic: Avicenna and Averroës; Christian: Bonaventure add Thomas) (see JEWISH PHILOSOPHY; ARABIAN PHILOSOPHY; CHRISTIAN PHILOSOPHY).

The beginning of the modern period in philosophy witnessed the rebirth of the Hellenistic philosophies (Stoicism, Epicureanism, and skepticism) and of Platonism, the issuance of Averroism into rationalism (the rejection of a divine revelation and an effort to return to the pre-Christian Era), the division of Christianity into Greek Orthodoxy, Protestantism, and Roman Catholicism, and the continued development of new philosophies (Continental rationalism, British empiricism, Kantian criticism, German idealism, American pragmatism, Marxism, existentialism, analytical philosophy, etc.).

Catholic Philosophy. The third circle is that of Catholic philosophy and includes all the philosophies that have been developed in the Catholic community from its origins. There are in the main three families, or traditions, which are not, however, completely cut off from each other: the Greek Neoplatonic tradition (Pseudo-Dionysius, Erigena, Eckhart, Cusa); the Augustinian tradition (Anselm, Peter Lombard, Bonaventure); the Aristotelian-scholastic tradition (Boethius, Aquinas, Scotus, Ockham). This third circle has become especially significant in the third phase of the neoscholastic revival: for while the non-Thomistic scholastic schools have receded, nonscholastic philosophies have become increasingly important—philosophy of the spirit (M. Blondel, M. F. Sciacca), phenomenology (D. von Hildebrand), existentialism (G. Marcel), etc.

Scholastic Philosophy. The fourth circle is that of scholastic philosophy. Though three schools (THOMISM, SCOTISM, and NOMINALISM) eventually dominated the medieval scholastic period, historical study has concluded that SCHOLASTICISM was not a collection of two or three schools, but of many philosophical theologies: each master of theology was precisely a teacher and not a disciple. When nominalism moved in the direction of Protestant Christianity and modern rationalism, or scientism, its place in the scholastic circle was taken by SUAREZIANISM, which, however, intended to be a Thomism. The “second scholasticism” of the 16th century became largely a competition among these three schools. The first stages of the Leonine revival at the end of the 19th century brought back a repetition of this old competition, particularly between Thomists and Suarezians (R. Garrigou-Lagrange and P. Descoqs), but gradually the issue developed between Thomism and nonscholastic contemporary philosophies.

Thomism. The fifth circle is that of Thomism. The preferred status given to St. THOMAS AQUINAS within the Church led to a diversification within Thomism itself. Three categories can be designated: classical Thomism, which is the Thomism of the commentators and of the “second scholasticism” (Cajetan, Báñez, John of St. Thomas, J. Maritain); historical Thomism, which went behind the commentators and approached the 13th century from a historian’s point of view (É. Gilson, C. Fabro); and developmental Thomism, which aimed to develop the thought of St. Thomas in relation with modern science (D. Mercier, American Dominicans, B. F. Longan) or with modern philosophy (J. Maréchal, K. Rahner).

Church Legislation. The issue of philosophical pluralism became particularly acute with the publication of the new Code of Canon Law for the Latin Church in 1918, which directed that theology and philosophy in seminaries must be taught ad Angelici Doctoris rationem, doctrinam et principia (1917 CIC c.1366.2). This raised two difficulties. One was the problem of determining what the “doctrine” of St. Thomas was, not to mention the method and principles, for there was controversy about this among the theologians and philosophers. Three schools of interpretation were discernible. One was literal and restrictive and understood the doctrine of St. Thomas in the sense of the classical Dominican commentators. The second was broader and interpretative and understood the doctrine in the sense of an Aristotelian-scholastic philosophia perennis that fitted a Suarezian version of Thomism. The third maintained the Thomist position but reinterpreted it in the light of modern philosophy.

The other difficulty rose from the very idea of this sort of legislation in philosophy. It appeared to restrict Catholic philosophy to one particular historical system and to exclude or at most to tolerate all other philosophies past or present. First, this appeared to be the destruction of philosophy itself, for it seemed to close off the search for new philosophical understanding. Second, it seemed to put an impossible psychological burden upon philosophers who had elaborated a non-Thomist philosophy either by reason of having been formed in another Scholastic or Catholic tradition, or of having been converted to Catholicism as mature philosophers (e.g., Edith Stein, Von Hildebrand, Marcel), or of having come to philosophy with different problems and concerns than St. Thomas (e.g., contemporary science, evolution, history, socialism). Furthermore, the legislation tended to widen the gap between clerical and lay philosophy, since it applied directly and explicitly only to seminaries, though the encyclicals Aeterni Patris and Humani generis were directed to the Church at large. From these difficulties there arose the question of philosophical pluralism within the Church or within Thomism as intended by the Church.

Types of Responses

However, the problem of philosophical pluralism is broader than the question of philosophy in the Church. Catholicism adds another dimension and context to the problem because of the unity of faith and the completion of the deposit of faith in a definite time in the past. But the question arises also from the pluralism of Greek and modern philosophies. It is a question of ultimate truth and whether truth is one or many: and if one, in what way; and if many, in what way. There have been many responses to these questions. They can be summarized into the following five types.

Denial of Ultimate Truth. First, there are the various types of denial of a unified ultimate truth. The very phenomenon of the diversity and disagreement of philosophies was one of the arguments used by the Greek skeptics and by the skeptical tradition for rejecting absolute knowledge and speculative truth. Modern empiricism since D. Hume has denied the validity of metaphysical truth and granted meaning only to the empirically verifiable or to fruitful action (pragmatism). Though not adherents of the skeptical tradition, philosophers of the finite, such as N. HARTMANN, have rejected any overall system of thought and truth.

Unity of Ultimate Truth. At the opposite pole is the response asserting the absolute and univocal unity of ultimate truth and identifying this truth with a particular historical system or tradition in such a way that all other philosophies are measured by this system and are judged false or inadequate insofar as they differ from this system. Thus the true system is that of Plato, of Aristotle, of Thomas, of Kant, or of Hegel.

Philosophia Perennis. Next there is an intermediate response—that of the philosophia perennis, though this term itself has been used in different senses. According to this view philosophy is not a collection of different systems, but rather a continuous and gradual development by many philosophies and philosophers of an increasingly more adequate explanation of reality. Philosophy itself is continuous with nonphilosophical thought; there is a continuity between pre-Christian and Christian philosophy. The term seems to have been originated by A. Steuco in his De perenni philosophia libri X (Lyons 1540), but the idea harmonizes with the notion of the Catholic tradition since Justin and Origen. The general notion that there is truth in all systems and that they can be reduced to one synthesis was an ideal with G. W. LEIBNIZ. Both the notion and term are found in the documents of the neoscholastic revival along with the affirmation of Thomism. It was the position of the (German) Suarezian tradition, which, however, tended to limit the perennial philosophy to the Aristotelian tradition.

Parts of a Whole. Next there is the response that considers all particular philosophies even in their contradictions as parts of a whole or of an infinite unity. In one form of this position, the infinite can be expressed only in finite modes that are contradictory or opposite (Spinoza). In another, reality is dialectically structured so that opposition forms a stage in the process of the whole (Hegel). This response is generally that of the pantheisms or monisms, whether Oriental or Western.

Different Expressions. Finally, there is the response judging that, though the many philosophies are apparently diverse and opposed, they are simply different expressions from different viewpoints and by different methods of one ultimate truth (R. P. McKeon, N. P. Stallknecht, and R. S. Brumbaugh). They can either be translated into each other if one studies the semantics involved or they simply point at the ineffable truth across the dialogue, as is stated in Plato's seventh letter.

Outline of a Solution

Only the general lines of a solution can be given here. It is necessary to note first of all that the solution itself does not escape the problem of pluralism, for any solution will involve a notion of philosophy and the notion of philosophy is itself involved in pluralism. The different philosophies conceive philosophy differently.

Personal Aspects. The reason for this is that philosophy is a reflexive science or WISDOM that includes its own subjective viewpoint in its philosophizing. This characteristic of philosophy is derived from the fact that philosophy aims at ultimate and universal understanding of reality. As a consequence of this aim philosophy must include itself in its investigation of the real, for the philosopher and his knowing are a part of the real. In other words, the philosopher must inquire not only into the world before him but also into himself and into his relation with the world. As a consequence of this, philosophy is intrinsically concerned with the question of the destiny of man as well as with the nature of the universe. That is why philosophy has always had two orientations, cosmological and scientific (Ionian), and humanistic and ethical (Italian). Both, if pressed to the ultimate as they must be, lead to the theological question and thus a third possible orientation is given, the theological. It is for this reason that philosophy shows some of the characteristics of religion as well as of science.

Because the reflexive character of philosophy so engages the subject in the work of philosophizing, personal choice and decision have a central role to play. For the philosopher determines his own fundamental orientation. That is, a man must ultimately determine his attitude toward the world, toward himself and his ultimate destiny. He may determine his attitude by default, that is, by not making any decision, by simply allowing himself to be carried along, or he may determine it by a series of minor decisions or by one major decision; but ultimately he must determine his basic freedom by a fundamental choice (cf. St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa Theologiae 1a2ae, 90.6).

Because the world and man himself are diversified and complex, many choices are possible to him. He may choose to rest in a polar opposite, in determinism rather than in freedom, in skepticism rather than in absolutism, etc.; or on a level of being, matter rather than spirit, nature rather than grace; or in a sphere of life, in art, political action, science, or business, etc.; or he may accept a contradiction between his way of life and his metaphysics. Thus according to J. G. FICHTE, the difference between idealism or materialism is determined by a choice—which, however, is conditioned by the kind of person the philosopher is—and William JAMES speaks in this connection of tough-minded and tender-minded men. The ultimate choice for a philosopher is whether he will open himself to the infinite and receive the word of the transcendent being (Blondel, K. Rahner), or whether he will close himself within the finite or the world of space and time. Thus ultimate philosophical truth depends upon the exercise of man's freedom.

Communal Aspects. This ultimate choice and orientation automatically makes a man a member of a community and a part of a tradition, the community and tradition of those who have made a like choice. This it is that makes for the fundamental diversity of philosophies in the world. Since the fundamental choice and orientation of the Catholic is the acceptance of the revelation of Yahweh and Jesus in the Church, he by that fact becomes a member of the community of the Church and a part of the tradition of the Church. His philosophia perennis, then, is determined by his membership in that community. But the community of the Church permits further determination and consequently there are communities within the community, specifications of the fundamental orientation. Typically these are the religious orders with distinctive spiritualities. Thus the diversity of philosophies in the Church frequently accompanies the diversity of spiritualities.

Philosophy therefore has both an objective, communal and traditional aspect, and a subjective, individual and creative aspect. It participates in the general conditions of all human knowing, which is developmental and dialogic, and hence social and historical. It never begins completely anew without antecedents, and consequently it shows continuity with its past. On the other hand, because it is seeking the ultimate and comprehensive, it must continually attempt to rethink the whole, to find a deeper integrating center or point of synthesis between itself and the world, the past and the future. Because philosophy is the work of finite thinkers in a complex and changing environment, it has many possible starting points. Because it is constantly striving to transcend its finite situation, it keeps trying new methods. Yet the philosopher works within a tradition, the larger tradition of the universal philosophia perennis, and the more specific tradition of his ultimate orientation.

Because of the personal element in philosophy, it is not possible to formulate the tradition once and for all. For philosophy is not a collection of single propositions that can readily be compared with other single propositions. Rather philosophy is a unity of viewpoints and totalities that are worked out in history not according to a straight, additive development, but by devious personal, social, and historical movements. Each philosopher is committed to remake the synthesis between the personal and traditional elements. He must recapitulate the tradition in himself, as did Aristotle, Plotinus, Aquinas, Suárez, Hegel, etc.

Catholics and Revelation. For the Catholic philosopher another possibility is given for determining the common elements and the tradition: revelation as developed in the Church. For revelation teaches ultimate truth. Besides drawing the fundamental distinction between the supernatural and the natural, it teaches truth directly or indirectly relevant to the natural investigations of man. These provide a center or outline for man's life and reflection. Like the universal tradition, the Catholic tradition is not formulated once and for all. It is gradually built up, by the work of many, over the centuries. This work of determining the Catholic tradition for philosophy must always be redone in the light of new knowledge and new problems.

The conclusion must be that philosophy cannot be only objective and communal; it must also be personal—not by moral obligation, as it were, but by the very nature of man and philosophy. Hence even within the Catholic community there will be different philosophies and schools. It is not possible to make one of these schools in its personal and individual elements the common philosophy of all, because these elements simply cannot be repeated by all. It is possible, however, to set one of the schools in its common and traditional elements as a norm for the developing tradition of the community. But this tradition will always be developed in personal and different philosophies.

PLUS, RAOUL

Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Boulogne-sur-Mer, Jan. 22, 1882; d. Lille, Oct. 23, 1958. Plus entered the Society of Jesus at Saint-Acheul in 1899 and made his studies abroad because of the 1901 laws against religious orders in France. During his philosophical studies, his spiritual father was Germain Foch, SJ, who expounded the doctrine of incorporation into Christ that later became the core of Plus's spiritual writings. As a French army chaplain during World War I, he gave the soldiers talks that were to serve as the material for his first two books, Dieu en nous (Eng. tr., God within Us, New York, 1924), and L'Idée réparatrice (Eng. tr., Ideal of Reparation, New York, 1922). These were well received because of their style, as well as their doctrine, and were translated into other languages, as were many of his later works. For his wartime services Plus was decorated with the croix de guerre.

Between the wars Plus served as professor of religion and spiritual director at the Université Catholique at Lille, except during the years 1935 to 1939 when he taught at the Institut Catholique of Paris. This was the period of his greatest literary activity, from which eventually came more than 40 books and innumerable articles. In addition to his other work, he preached and gave retreats. After spending World War II at a retreat house, Plus returned to Lille as spiritual father for the Jesuit community and remained there until his death.

In his writings Plus popularized the principal chapters of the spiritual life, constantly reemphasizing the doctrine of the Mystical Body of Christ. A synthetic résumé of his teaching is found in his Marie dans notre histoire divine (Toulouse 1932; Eng. tr., Mary in Our Soul-Life, Cincinnati, 1940).

dowed by Alexander II in 1230 for an austere community of VALLISCAULIAN monks from Burgundy, the monastery enjoyed the protection of popes and Scottish kings through the 13th century; and much of its present structure, finely restored, dates from this period. After the Scottish wars of independence, however, and particularly after being sacked and burned (1390), the monastery declined and was obliged to amalgamate with the Benedictine priory of Urquhart (1454). After the Reformation the priory with its lands passed into private hands. Purchased in 1897 by the Marquess of Bute, it was given by his son to PRINKNASH (Gloucester) with the hope that it would eventually become a daughterhouse. In 1948 a small band of monks reopened Pluscarden; they have restored much of the priory to its former use besides participating in the religious life of northeast Scotland.

PLYMOUTH BRETHREN

Also called the Christian Brethren. In 1827 groups of Christians in England and Ireland began to meet apart from the established churches to study the Bible, pray, and hold weekly communion services. John DARBY (1800–82), a former Church of Ireland clergyman, led the movement for many years. Members of these fellowships eventually were identified as Darbyites or Plymouth Brethren. The latter name came from the largest and most influential of these groups at Plymouth, England, but has no official acceptance. Beginning in 1838, Darby spent seven years in Switzerland; when he returned to England and encountered opposition to his leadership, he started a rival body of Plymouth Brethren.

Most Plymouth Brethren congregations meet for worship in "remembrance meetings," in private homes or rented halls, and include only 35 or 40 people. The Plymouth Brethren oppose seminary training, clerical titles, and ordination of ministers. Although they are devoted students of the Bible, they do not favor higher education. The various groupings of Plymouth Brethren have no national or international coordinating agencies. Local churches follow a congregational form of government. There are no official spokesmen or periodicals. The Brethren follow a fundamentalist theology based on the literal and verbal interpretation of the Bible. Their position is Calvinist, but they reject all creeds and confessions. The congregations hold a weekly communion service. In their preaching the Brethren emphasize the imminent Second Coming of Jesus Christ (see PAROUSIA).

PNEUMATOMACHIANS

A 4th-century Christian sect that denied the divinity of the Holy Spirit; its devotees were known as Macedonians from the time of Pope DAMASUS I and had their center at the Hellespont. Relying solely on the Scriptures and repudiating metaphysical speculation, the Pneumatomachians denied that the Holy Spirit was God since the New Testament said nothing about His participation in the work of creation; they claimed He was not of the same essence as the Father and Son. As they denied the divinity of the Spirit, they received the name of opponents of the Spirit (Pneumatomachoi). The earliest information on this group was supplied by ATHANASIUS OF ALEXANDRIA in his Ad. Serapion (Patrologia Graeca 26:530). Ecclesiastical action against this group was taken in a synod at Alexandria (362) that declared a heretic whoever spoke of the Holy Spirit as a creature (kstima: Patrologia Graeca 26:800). The Cappadocian fathers opposed the theology of the Pneumatomachians and in a synod at Iconium (377) the heresy was condemned (Patrologia Graeca 39:93). In 379 Pope Damasus I, at a Roman synod, and the bishops of the Orient, in a synod at Antioch, likewise opposed this teaching. It was definitively anathematized at the Council of CONSTANTINOPLE I and condemned by a law of THEODOSIUS I (Cod. 16.5, 11–13). Despite the assertion of DIDYMUS THE BLIND (c. 380), Macedonius, the semi-Arian bishop of Constantinople (342–360), was not a founder of this sect.

POBEDONOSTSEV, KONSTANTIN PETROVICH

Russian jurist, political philosopher; b. Moscow, Nov. 10, 1827; d. St. Petersburg, March 10, 1907. After studying law at St. Petersburg, he worked as a civil servant from 1846 until his death. He tutored Czar Alexander II's children in Russian law and history. He became a senator (1868), a member of the Council of State (1872), and lay head of the HOLY SYNOD (1880). The effect of his immense influence over Alexander III and Nicholas II was to make Russia's domestic policies reactionary and repressive, particularly in matters affecting religion, education, censorship, and religious and national minorities. Pobedonostsev was called the "Grand Inquisitor." Until 1895, when his influence declined, he was feared as a symbol of the old regime by Russian liberals and radicals. He was a friend of Dostoevskiĭ and a good scholar fluent in several European languages. Yet his writings reflected his determination to destroy all Western influence in Russia. A collection of his essays, Moskovskii sbornik (1896), clearly manifested his hatred and fear of constitutional government, freedom of the press, religious liberty, trial by jury, and free education.

POETA SAXO

Medieval Latin poet; fl. last quarter of the 9th century. He was a monk of CORVEY in Westphalia, and is known only under the name of "the Saxon Poet." About 888, early in the reign of the East Frankish king Arnulf (877–899), he composed a historical poem on Charlemagne in five books (2,683 lines). He titled books one to four Annales de gestis Caroli Magni imperatoris, and book 5 De vita et obitu eiusdem. The work exhibits no originality but is essentially an annalistic account of the reign of Charlemagne, based closely on the so-called Annales Einhardi, Einhard's Vita Caroli, and similar earlier sources. While his poetic talent is of a low order, his prosody is relatively good. Books one to four are in hexameters, but he thought it would be more fitting to write his fifth book, on the last days of Charlemagne, in elegiac distichs.

POETICS (ARISTOTELIAN)

The Poetics, in length, is one of Aristotle's slightest works, forming barely a hundredth part of the extant Aristotelian corpus. But short as it is, it "is the most fundamental study we have of the art of drama" (Fergusson, 2). Moreover, "it is largely through the Poetics . . . that the main poetic 'kinds' are still distinguished, even in their names, through all the literature of Europe, as Tragedy, Comedy, Epic and Lyric" (House, 14). Finally, there is widespread agreement that "after twenty-two centuries it remains the most stimulating and helpful of all analytical works dealing with poetry" (Cooper, 3). (See ARISTOTELIANISM.)

Content of the Work. A summary of the main parts of the work reveals an underlying logic of construction. The first five chapters constitute a general introduction to poetic art. The common genus is imitation; the various arts differ in terms of (1) the means of imitation (the medium in which the artist works), (2) the object of imitation (human action and passion), and (3) the manner of imitation (lyrical, narrative, and dramatic). The fourth chapter deals with the common origin of poetic art, with a brief history of tragedy, while the fifth chapter treats the origin of comedy and compares epic and tragedy.

Tragedy. Chapters 6 through 22 form the substance of the work and treat tragedy in considerable detail. After defining tragedy—"an imitation of an action that is serious, complete, having a certain magnitude, expressed in enriched language employing various kinds in different parts of the play, by means of action, not narration, through events arousing pity and fear which bring about the appropriate purgation of these emotions" (1449b 24–28)—Aristotle lists the six elements of tragedy: plot, character, thought, diction, song, and spectacle. Diction and song relate to the means of imitation; spectacle or scenery pertains to the manner of imitation; and plot, character, and thought belong to the object of imitation. These are qualitative parts of a tragedy; the quantitative parts are acts or episodes of the play, and are discussed in chapter 12.

Plot. Plot occupies the chief attention, for it is "the soul of tragedy," the metaphor by which Aristotle expresses plot as the life-giving principle that shapes human action into actual tragedy. He observes that eight conditions are realized in good plots: (1) an action is represented as complete in itself, that is, a whole with its appropriate beginning, middle, and end; (2) the plot has a fitting magnitude ("beauty is a matter of size and order" 1450b 36); (3) it has unity, the parts being so ordered that if one of them is destroyed or removed or transposed the unity of the whole is lost; (4) it has dramatic possibility or plausibility, i.e., the plot deals with what could conceivably take place rather than what actually has happened; (5) it is not episodic, a series of events in which there is no inevitable or likely sequence of events, yet allows for the unexpected; (6) the plot contains something astonishing or marvelous, for in this way the tragic emotions of pity and fear are aroused; (7) it is complex, a course of events involving change, for example, from happiness to misery; a reversal, therefore, accompanied by discovery, a change from ignorance to knowledge; and (8) it contains some calamity, or painful action, in order to arouse sufficiently the emotions of pity and fear.

Character. Aristotle then proceeds to discuss (beginning with chapter 13) the sort of tragic character the poet chooses: a man who is good, but not eminently so, whose misfortune is brought about by a "tragic flaw." The tragic emotions of pity and fear spring from the plot itself, not from the spectacle. The tragic character expresses moral qualities that are appropriate to him, and he should be consistent and coherent. After noting some practical rules that have guided the poet in his construction of a tragedy, Aristotle discusses the elements of thought and diction. The remainder of the Poetics (chapters 23–26) treats epic poetry, terminating in a comparative evaluation of epic and tragedy. Three key topics are here discussed briefly.

Imitation (Mimesis). Imitation is proposed by Aristotle as something common to all fine art, but its crucial role will be appreciated only if imitation is understood in a distinctive sense. It must first of all be distinguished from mere natural likeness or copying. A natural likeness is not an imitation at all; one egg may be like another egg, but it is not an imitation of it. The image of a man in the mirror is both a likeness and an imitation, for there is dependence of the image upon the original from which it proceeds. But this is mere duplication or reflection. In an artistic imitation, the image as expressed in some sense medium has a dependence upon some original referent in reality (such as a shape, color, sound, passion, or character), but there is also dependence upon man's creative conception and imagination. Aristotle's notion of imitation, therefore, does imply a creative vision on the part of the artist as well as something that relates in one way or another to the real. In the Poetics, Aristotle develops imitation chiefly in relation to the construction of plot that imitates "an action that is serious, complete, having a certain magnitude," (1450b 24) and so on. (See ART [PHILOSOPHY]; CREATIVE IMAGINATION.)

Hamartia. The translation of this as "tragic flaw" can be misleading if it is understood simply as moral fault. Rather, it is at once intellectual and moral, a flaw in the deliberation and judgment of prudence as inseparably bound up with some flaw in the ordering of man's appetite to good ends. It is a "mistake," therefore, but not one purely of the intellect, and is bound up with the elements of reversal and discovery in the development of the plot. The Greek word ἁμαρτία, as Aristotle uses it, means a failure or a mistake and is midway between ἄδικημα (intentional wrong) and ἀτυχημα (a fault of ignorance). Hence when Aristotle speaks of the tragic character as one who is not wholly virtuous or one who suffers misfortune because of wickedness, we are led to understand that the tragic character, basically well-intentioned, is nonetheless brought to a downfall by mistaken judgment swayed by some moral defect in the impulse of desire.

Catharsis. The understanding of the cathartic effect in drama presupposes understanding the role pity and fear play in tragic representation. The two emotions are inseparably joined in good tragedy; one without the other becomes either mere sentimentality or sheer horror.

The first meaning of catharsis is medical, referring to some physical purgation in respect of the body. In an artistic context, Aristotle obviously extends this meaning. Just as a physical purgation eliminates a bodily disorder so as to achieve a better physiological state, so artistic catharsis is purgative and purifying in relation to the movement of human passion as the play is witnessed. We naturally have some emotional tension that is unresolved or is resolved somewhat unsatisfactorily. Good works of art, in arousing and resolving the emotions, bring us to the state of repose we need but often do not achieve in daily life; herein lies the great appeal of art, and not only tragedy. Elsewhere Aristotle speaks more explicitly of such catharsis in listening to music whereby persons can be restored as though they had found purgation and healing. "Those who are influenced by pity and fear, and every emotional nature, must have a like experience, and others insofar as each is susceptible to such emotions, and all are in a manner purged and their souls lightened and delighted" (Politics, 1342a 11–15).

Hence catharsis, as purgative and purifying, is basic to artistic enjoyment and appreciation. By artistic tension and release, the emotions receive an orderly subjection to reason as shaped by artistic form. Nevertheless, catharsis remains basically instrumental in art; it is ordered to the proper end of art—CONTEMPLATION and the ensuing delight we find in such contemplation.

Place in the Aristotelian Corpus. The usual order of Aristotle's works has the Poetics, preceded by the Rhetoric, at the very end, and some think that this may represent the ordering instituted at the Lyceum. The practical slant of the two works is one reason adduced for putting them at the end of the corpus.

Another tradition places the Rhetoric and the Poetics at the end of the Organon (the logical works). The Organon appears first because logic treats the common method for all knowledge. Within the Organon, the Rhetoric follows the Topics since, as Aristotle explains at the beginning of the Rhetoric, rhetoric is the counterpart of dialectic, the subject of the Topics. The Poetics follows the Rhetoric, first because of an affinity it has with rhetoric, and second because poetics, too, deals with a special type of argumentation.

The association of poetic art with argumentation is not acknowledged by all. The purpose of any argumentation, however, is to lead one to a new truth from previous knowledge, and poetic art has its own means of inducing assent to a truth. The poet does this by constructing a pleasing representation of what is true or plausible; for example, he composes metaphors and similes for the sake of presenting poetically imaginative meaning that conveys in its way a truth, or he constructs a plot so as to present a convincing similitude of the working out of human action. Thus Shakespeare induces us to accept the general judgment that jealousy can lead to a man's downfall; he does this by a particular representation of this in the person and action of Othello. Herein, lies the significance of the phrase "argument of the play" as often stated in a program. Such argumentation is properly found in the poetic arts, and in proportion as we speak of a poet's work of art as convincing, we acknowledge the existence of a poetic form of argumentation.

POGGIO BRACCIOLINI, GIOVANNI FRANCESCO

Humanist; b. Terranuova, near Arezzo, February 11, 1380; d. Florence, April 30, 1459. Early in his boyhood his impoverished family moved to Florence where Poggio was able to pay for instruction in Latin from Giovanni da Ravenna from fees earned in copying MSS. He probably learned Greek, of which he never had full mastery, on his own initiative. In 1404, at the age of 24, he entered the service of the apostolic chancery during the pontificate of Boniface IX, serving as a scriptor; he held that post as a layman under eight popes for almost 50 years. On June 8, 1453, he assumed the office of chancellor of the Republic of FLORENCE, and functioned in that capacity until shortly before his death. His proficiency in Latin epistolography, an accomplishment much admired in his time, exerted considerable influence on the development of the curial style of the papal chancery. Poggio's most enduring claim to distinction rests on his remarkable industry in "recovering" MSS of Latin authors in monastic libraries such as WEINGARTEN, REICHENAU, and SANKT GALLEN, where he found the complete text of Quintilian's Institutio oratoria, which he copied and forwarded to Leonardo Bruni.

As an author, Poggio is best known for his Letters and his most frequently translated Liber facetiarum, a collection of witty and generally indecent anecdotes filled with invective against clergy and religious. In imitation of Seneca he composed his Historia disceptiva de avaritia, Historiae de varietate fortunae, In hypocritas et delatores, and De humanae conditionis miseria, all of which show traces of a Christian STOICISM. The Historia Florentiae, modeled on Livy's history of Rome, is useful but labors under the defects of its annalistic approach. In his translations of Greek authors, such as Diodorus Siculus, Lucian, and Xenophon (Cyropaedia), Poggio's defective knowledge of Greek is all too evident; he was unable to render faithfully a Greek author's trend of thought. In controversies with Zeno of Feltria, Guarino, Ciriaco of Ancona, Filelfo, and Lorenzo Valla, to name but a few, he was frequently scurrilous and stirred up life-long hatreds. Poggio's Urbis Romae descriptio and his interest in collecting Latin inscriptions give him a place of honor at the beginnings of classical archeology.

POHL, ALFRED

Orientalist, author, and editor of scholarly publications on the ancient Near East; b. Köbernitz, Upper Silesia, Dec. 1, 1890; d. Rome, Oct. 23, 1961. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1912 and studied Assyriology under Bruno Meissner from 1924 to 1930. In 1930, he went to the Pontifical Biblical Institute in Rome as professor of Assyriology and of ancient Oriental history. In the next decade, he published several original editions of Babylonian and Sumerian economic texts: Neubabylonische Rechtsurkunden aus den Berliner Staatlichen Museen, 2 v. (Rome 1933–34), Vorsargonische und sargonische Wirtschaftstexte (Leipzig 1935), and Rechts- und Verwaltungsurkunden der III. Dynastie von Ur (Leipzig 1937). He became dean of the Oriental faculty of the institute in 1945.

Pohl was especially known for his long and successful career as an editor. Assuming charge of Orientalia in 1932, he built it into a periodical of international stature. As editor of Analecta Orientalia, he provided scholars with a series of basic grammars and historical studies on the ancient Near East, while his furthering of the Materialien zum sumerischen Lexikon (Rome 1937–) laid the groundwork for much-needed study on Sumerian lexicography. Scholars are further indebted to him for his founding and personal compilation of the indispensable Keilschriftbibliographie (1940–), the only comprehensive annual bibliography in Mesopotamian studies.

POHLE, JOSEPH

Professor; b. Niederspay, Germany, March 19, 1852; d. Breslau, Germany, Feb. 21, 1922. After completing his studies at Trier, Germany, he attended the German College in Rome, as well as the Gregorianum. He received his Ph.D. in philosophy in 1874, his S.T.D. in 1879. He was ordained in 1878.

When prevented from accepting an official appointment in Germany by the restrictive laws of the Kulturkampf, he studied at Würzburg, Germany (1879–81), and was influenced by the noted botanist, Julius von Sachs. After teaching secondary school in Baar, Switzerland (1881–83), he became professor of theology and Scripture at St. Joseph's College, Leeds, England (1883–86). When episcopal seminaries were reopened in Germany by Bismarck's partial repeal of the Falk laws, Pohle became professor of philosophy (1886–89) at the seminary in Fulda. There, with Constantin Gutberlet, he served as cofounder and coeditor of the Philosophisches Jahrbuch of the Görres Society.

In 1889, at the request of Bp. John J. Keane, Pohle joined the faculty of the Catholic University of America in Washington, D.C., as professor of apologetics. In the United States his name came to be linked with the German-American party in the Cahensly dispute (see CAHENS-LY, PETER PAUL). This may have prompted his acceptance of an offer to return to Germany in 1894 as professor of dogma at Münster. After transferring to Breslau in 1897, he continued to occupy himself with various scholarly pursuits until his death. Among his works were Angelo Secchi (1883), Die Sternenwelten und ihre Bewohner (1884), Lehrbuch der Dogmatik (1902–05), and Soldatentod und Martyrertod (1917). He collaborated on several other books and contributed to various learned journals. He also wrote 21 articles for the Catholic Encyclopedia.

POIDEBARD, ANTOINE

Archeologist, originator of aerial photography for archeological research; b. Lyons, France, Oct. 11, 1878; d. Beirut, Lebanon, Jan. 17, 1955. He entered the Society of Jesus at d'Aix on June 2, 1897; in 1904, with several confreres, he formed the nucleus of the Armenian mission entrusted to the Jesuits by Leo XIII. During this mission he studied Turkish and Armenian. From 1912 to 1914 he studied theology at Ore Place. During World War I he was a chaplain in the armed services and undertook several missions for the French government in the Near East. In 1924 he organized the services rendered to the Armenian refugees. He was commissioned a lieutenant-colonel of the reserve air force in 1925, and on Jan. 4, 1951, the air force medal was bestowed on him for outstanding services as a missionary explorer.

As a result of his aerial research, two works of considerable interest were published: La Trace de Rome dans le désert de Syrie (Paris 1934) and Le Limes de Chalcis; organisation de la Steppe en Haute-Syrie romaine (Paris 1945), a work done in collaboration with R. Mouterde as historian and epigraphist. This study marked a considerable advance in the knowledge of the history of Upper Syria. His observations concerning water supplies were used by the Syrian department of water services for supplying water to the nomad tribes. Poidebard's interest in aerial photography led to the discovery in the Mediterranean of an ancient seaport. The results were published in Un Grand port disparu: Tyr; Recherches aériennes et sous-marines (Paris 1939). In collaboration with J. Lauffray, he published Sidon: aménagements antiques du Port de Saida; Études aériennes, au sol et sous-marines, 1946–1950 (Paris 1952). This new method of research inaugurated by Poidebard produced significant results. The use of aerial photography for archeological purposes is frequently employed today.

POIRTERS, ADRIAEN

Flemish Jesuit spiritual writer; b. Oisterwijk, The Netherlands, Nov. 2, 1605; d. Malines, July 4, 1674. Poirters attended the Jesuit secondary school at Bois-le-Duc and studied philosophy at the University of Douai before he entered the Society of Jesus on July 25, 1625. He was ordained in Louvain on March 20, 1638 and pronounced the four solemn vows at Roermond on Dec. 26, 1641. He was afterward active as a preacher and a confessor, mainly in Roermond and Malines. From 1640 on, he was remarkably productive as a popular writer. His main works are Het Masker van de Wereldt afghetrocken (1645, The Mask Torn from the World), Het Duyfken in de Steen-Rotse (1657, The Little Pigeon in the Rock), and Den Spieghel van Philagie (1671, The Mirror of Philagy), all of them reprinted as late as the 19th century.

These writings are in the current of the Counter Reformation, of which they represent the popular and pessimistic aspect; they aim at animating and deepening spiritual life among religious and laymen generally, and especially among women. In the course of his work Poirter mildly satirizes the contemporary love of splendor so eloquently illustrated in the paintings of Rubens, van Dyke, and Jordaens; he further resorts to somewhat sentimental and highly personal meditations on Christ's sufferings and death. In form, Poirter's works belong to emblematic literature, of which they represent the last phase: the inscriptions in verse and prose have come to be more important than the engravings. The verses are fluent and suggest the influence of the Dutch poets Cats and VONDEL. The pithy and colorful prose fragments have considerable literary value.

POISSY, CONFERENCE OF

Held Sept. 9 to Oct. 18, 1561, the Conference of Poissy was summoned by the regent Queen Catherine de Médicis because France was on the brink of civil and religious war and she hoped for a theological compromise between Catholics and Huguenots. Several Catholic leaders, including the Queen and probably the cardinal of Lorraine, were content to seek a national settlement of religion without reference to Rome. The conference met in the refectory of the convent at Poissy near Paris. Of the Protestant deputies the chief was Theodore BEZA, from Geneva, later assisted by Peter Martyr Vermigli, from Zurich. The moderates hoped for formulas of compromise. But in an opening speech when Beza expounded the Calvinist doctrine of the Presence in the Eucharist, the Catholic prelates would hardly listen. A few days later it was evident that no agreement was possible. A legate, Cardinal Hippolyte d'Este, and shortly after, the Jesuit Diego LAÍNEZ, arrived and diminished the influence of those ready to compromise. The conference dwindled into a few private conversations among theologians. Its failure left Queen Catherine to walk a tightrope between the rival armies. Four months afterward the first of the French wars of religion broke out.

POKAGON, LEOPOLD AND SIMON

Father and son, Native American Catholics.

Leopold, a Native American chief; b. 1775?; d. July 8, 1841. Legend relates that Leopold was really a Chipewa, captured and adopted into the Pottawatomis; he married the daughter of the war chief and became a civil chief of the first rank. His name was really Pugegun, "the rib." His village was in Bertrand Township, Berrien County, Mich., about six miles from South Bend, Ind. The Pottawatomis had a fierce devotion to the teachings of the French Jesuits, who had attended the old St. Joseph Mission, Ind., as far back as 1690. These tribes on the St. Joseph River often made trips as far as Kaskaskia, Ill., and Quebec, Canada, to make their Easter duty. After Chief Leopold appealed for a priest for his tribe, Rev. Frederic Résé went to Leopold's village and baptized him, his wife, and about 30 others, registering them in the parish church of Bertrand, Mich. As a result of this eloquent appeal Rev. Stephen T. BADIN spent three years (1830-33) in Pokagon's village and won more than 350 converts. In September 1833 Leopold regretfully signed the treaty of cession of the Pottawatomis lands and four years later took up land in Cass County, near Dowagiac, Mich. There at Silver Creek he organized and built the first Catholic church; he was later buried under it.

Simon, b. 1830?; d. Jan. 28, 1899. One of Leopold's several children, Simon was regarded widely "as the best educated and most distinguished full-blooded Native American in America." He was educated at Notre Dame University, Ind., and Oberlin College, Ohio. He spent his entire life interpreting the Native Americans to the American public, the Congress, and several presidents and was successful in securing the annuities due the Pottawatomis. A noted public speaker, he made his most famous appearance at the World Columbian Exposition (1893) at Chicago, Ill. He wrote Queen of the Woods, a romance centering in events of his own life, as well as articles about Native American life, lore, and legend in magazines such as the Forum, Harper's, and Review of Reviews. He was buried in the Rush Lake (Mich.) church cemetery, with his two wives and four children. Pokagon State Park in Indiana is a memorial to the Pokagons.

POLANCO FONTECHA, ANSELMO, BL.

Bishop of Teruel, Augustinian; martyr; b. Buenvista de Valdavia, Palencia, Spain, April 16, 1881; d. "Can Tretze" of Pont de Molins (near Gerona), Spain, Feb. 7, 1939.

Born to modest farmers, Anselmo Polanco was professed as an Augustinian friar at Valladolid (1896), studied at Santa María of La Vid Monastery, and was ordained in 1904. He began his priestly career teaching theology in the seminary, then served as prior until he was sent to the Philippines as provincial councilor. He returned to Valladolid upon his election as provincial superior (1932) of the Philippines Province, which entailed sending missionaries to various parts of the world. In that position he travelled to China, Colombia, Peru, and the United States.

Three years later he was named bishop of Teruel (Spain) and appointed apostolic administrator of Albarra-cín. Polanco remained in Teruel throughout the terrors of the Spanish civil war. In 1938, he was arrested and imprisoned by the Republican Army for refusing to remove his signature from a collective letter of the Spanish bishops denouncing the persecution of the Church. Shortly thereafter he was joined by his vicar general, Felipe RIPOLL. After thirteen months incarceration, the two were used as human shields as the soldiers disbanded at the end of the war. The bodies of both martyrs are enshrined in Bishop Polanco's cathedral.

During Bishop Polanco's beatification, Pope John Paul II observed: "As a presentiment, [Polanco] said on the day he took possession of his diocese: 'I have come to give my life for my flock.' This is why, together with Felipe Ripoll, he chose to stay at the side of his flock in the midst of danger, and it was only by force that he was taken from them." John Paul II beatified Polanco, Oct. 1, 1995.

Feast: Feb. 7.

POLAND, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

Poland, the largest of the West Slavic States, has exercised a marked influence on the history of Eastern Europe. Under the Piast dynasty (960–1386), it was comprised of Great Poland (with its chief centers at Gniezno, Poznań, and Kruszwica), Little Poland (Cracovia), Mazovia, and Silesia. Under the Jagiellonian dynasty (1386–1572) Poland spread far to the east and became a great power. In the period of the Elective Monarchy (1572–1795) and of foreign rule (1795–1916) the Poles had a checkered history. Then, following the restoration of an independent Polish State (1919–39), came a new division of Polish territory in the wake of World War II and ultimately the formation of the Polish People's Republic (Polska Rzeczpospolita Ludowa), a Communist regime. Although Poland once had a mixed population of Poles, Germans, Lithuanians, Ukrainians, Russians, and White Russians, after World War II its inhabitants were overwhelmingly of Polish origin. The ecclesiastical history of Poland, which is the main concern of this section of the article, may be divided conveniently into five major periods. The main features in the history of the Church are presented systematically under each period.

The Middle Ages

The first traces of Christianity are found in the area of Cracovia during the second half of the ninth century and are connected with the missionary activity of Methodius, the Apostle of the Slavs, in Moravia. The spread of Christianity in Poland, however, really began under the Piast Prince Mieszko I (c. 960–992). In 965 he married the Czech princess Dobrava (Dabrowka) and was baptized the following year. In 968 a missionary bishopric was established for Poland, and Jordan, the first bishop, carried on his work from Poznań. To counteract the efforts of the German Church and of the first two Ottonian emperors to put the Polish bishopric under the jurisdiction of the archbishopric of Magdeburg, Mieszko placed his land in a kind of vassal status under the protection of the pope (990).

Establishment of the Polish Hierarchy. In the year 1000, the archbishopric of Gniezno was erected with Kolobrzeg, Wrocław, and Cracow as its suffragans. Pope SYLVESTER II, Emperor OTTO III, and Bolesław Chrobry, the son and successor of Mieszko (992–1025), all had an active part in this foundation. Chrobry continued his father's policy as a vigorous and successful promoter of Christianity in Poland, and a year before his death he received the royal crown from Rome. The boundaries of the archdiocese of Gniezno at first corresponded to those of the Piast realm. The archbishop was responsible for the care of souls in Great Poland. His suffragan bishops had the task of spreading and solidifying the Christian faith in the border areas: the bishop of Kolobrzeg, in Pomerania; the bishop of Cracow, in Little Poland and the adjacent territories acquired in the North and East; and the bishop of Wrocław, in Silesia. The establishment of the Polish hierarchy in the year 1000 was decisive for the incorporation of Poland into Western Christendom.

Growth in the 11th, 12th, and 13th Centuries. Among the missionaries at the end of tenth century and the beginning of the eleventh were the martyrs St. ADALBERT OF PRAGUE (d. 997), St. BENEDICT OF BENEVENTO,

John and companions (d. 1003), and BRUNO OF QUERFURT (d. 1009). The spread of the Church was threatened temporarily by a pagan reaction in 1046–47. In the eleventh and twelfth centuries Gniezno acquired new suffragans: Poznań, Włocławek, which replaced the shortlived bishopric of Kruschwitz, in Kujavia, Płock in Mazovia, Lebus on the Middle Oder, and later Wilna (Vilna), Lutsk, and Chełmno. Bishops, such as St. Stanislaus of Cracow (d. 1079), defended the rights of the Church against the encroachments of the state, and in the period of the division of inheritances among the Piasts, they maintained the consciousness of Polish unity. The metropolitans of Gniezno and other ecclesiastical princes emphasized the importance of the Polish language in the light of the threat of the German colonists whose immigration resulted in Polish decline in the western lands of the Piasts, especially in Silesia. The idea of Polish unity was kept alive also in the Polish kingship, and enjoyed the full support of the Church.

The monastic and cathedral schools, which were the vehicles for all education and culture, the cathedral chapters, the development of parish organizations, and the spread of the religious orders (BENEDICTINES, CISTERCIANS, PREMONSTRATENSIS, FRANCISCANS, DOMINICANS, CARMELITES, AUGUSTINIANS, Hospitallers, and TEMPLARS) all contributed to the solid establishment and growth of Christianity. The Order of Knights, the Frates Militiae Christi, or Knights of the Sword, founded by Duke Conrad of Mazovia in 1228, which because of its location was also called the Knights of Dobrin, passed in 1237 into the Order of the TEUTONIC KNIGHTS, which established a state of its own in Prussia. The interior growth of the Church in the age of the Piasts is evidenced by the number of saints and blessed. Among them are: Bp. Wincenty Kadłubek of Cracow (d. 1223), author of the Chronica de gestis (illustrium) principum ac regum Poloniae; Bp. Jan Prandota of Cracow (1242–66), who represented in his person the ideal bishop of his time; the Dominicans, Czesław (d. 1222), who defended Wrocław during the great attack of the Mongols, and Hyacinth (Jaczek Odrowąż, d. 1257), who was active as a missionary in Prussia and South Russia; duchess Hedwig (Jadwiga, d. 1243), mother of duke Henry II of Silesia who fell in battle against the Mongols at Liegnitz; in 1241, a woman equally honored by Germans and Poles as a patroness of Christian charity; the Premonstratensian nun Bronisława (d. 1259); and the Poor Clares, Salomea (d. 1268), Kinga (d. 1292), and Jolanta (d. 1298).

Under the First Kings of the Jagiellonian Dynasty. In the middle of the fourteenth century Poland had again become a closely knit state. King Casimir III the Great (1333–70), the last famous Piast, extended its territory by the incorporation of the principalities of Halicz (Galicia) and Volhynia. To serve the spiritual needs of his Orthodox subjects, he brought about the restoration of the Galician metropolitanate, with Przemyśl, Chełmno, and Vladimir as its eparchies. Roman Catholic bishoprics arose also in these places. In 1367 he recognized the Armenian bishop of Lvov, so that three Christian confessions existed side by side in his realm. Shortly before 1364 he founded the Studium generale or University of Cracow. The marriage in 1386 of Casimir's granddaughter Hedwig (Jadwiga), the youngest daughter of King Louis of Hungary (1342–82) and Poland (1370–82) with the grandduke Jagiełło of Lithuania, who became King of Poland as Władysław II (1386–1434), inaugurated the union of Poland and Lithuania under the Jagiellonians. This union was more strongly established in the course of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries and was sealed by the union of Lublin in 1569.

Władysław II, in 1387, founded the bishopric of Vilna, through which Roman Christianity was spread in Lithuania. This missionary work was aided very much by the establishment of the faculty of theology at the University of Cracow in 1397. Several Polish bishops and professors, among them the rector of the University of Cracow, Paul Vladimiri (Paweł Włodkowicz), were present at the Council of Constance. Paul in his tractate De potestate papae et imperatoris respectu infidelium condemned all conversion of pagans by force. Through this work he involved himself in the diplomatic battle between Poland and the Teutonic Order that took place after the military defeat of the German knights at Tannenberg (1410).

Under Casimir IV (1447–92) a thirteen-year war (1454–66) weakened the political independence of the Teutonic Order, and the bishopric of Ermland passed under the protection of the Polish king. The marriage of the king to Elizabeth of Hapsburg made possible the expansion of the power of the Jagiellonian house to Bohemia and Hungary. During Casimir's long reign the Orthodox population in Poland-Lithuania continued to enjoy toleration, but through the development of the Archbishopric of Lvov tensions arose between the Latin hierarchy and the Orthodox eparchs, and between those who went over to Catholicism and the majority of the population who were adherents of Orthodoxy. Bishop Zbigniew Oleśnicki of Cracow (1423–55, cardinal from 1449) exercised, as an adviser for many years, a strong influence on the internal and foreign policies of the three first kings of the Jagiellonian dynasty. He suppressed the Hussite movement, which entered Poland from Bohemia, and his secretary Jan Długosz (1415–80) was the preceptor of the royal princes and the author of several historical works (among them Historiae Polonicae libri XII).

Spiritual Life in the Late Middle Ages. Polish bishops and professors who had participated in the reform councils spread HUMANISM in Poland-Lithuania, and in the second half of the fifteenth century the Devotio Moderna also made its influence felt. In the midst of the breakup of the rather circumscribed medieval outlook and of criticism against high ecclesiastics, benefices multiplied and churchmen devoted themselves more to political activities than to the care of souls. Yet, one should not overlook the contributions of outstanding pastors, especially the archbishops of Gniezno, such as Jakób Świnka (1283–1314) and Jarosław Bogorja Skotnicki (1342–74, d. 1376), or the first bishop of Vilna, the Franciscan Andrzej (d. 1398), or the holy and fruitful activity of provincial and diocesan synods. Besides the new monasteries erected by the orders already mentioned, foundations were made by HIERONYMITES, Bernardines, MINIMS, BRETHERN OF THE COMMON LIFE, and others.

Worthy of particular note also are the several distinguished saints and blessed, among them Abp. Jakob Strepa of Halicz-Lvov (d. 1409); Jan Kanty (d. 1473), who was well known as a professor at the University of Cracow and as a friend and helper of needy students; the Bernardine Simon of Lipnica (d. 1482) a promoter of the veneration of the Holy Name of Jesus; the Jagiellonian prince Casimir (d. 1484), who was distinguished for his veneration of the Blessed Virgin Mary; the Bernardines Bl. Jan of Dukla (d. 1484), who despite his long blindness was famous as a preacher and confessor; and Władysław of Gielniów (d. 1505), who was active as a missionary in Lithuania and who as a writer of religious poems promoted the veneration of the Passion of Christ and devotion to the Mother of God.

The Jagiellonians defended the West against the Turks, who flooded southeastern Europe after their capture of Constantinople (1453), and in 1529 they penetrated as far as Vienna. Against them and the Orthodox Russians, Poland-Lithuania served as a bulwark of Christendom (antemurale christianitatis, przedmurze chrześcijaństwa).

Reformation to the Final Partitions

Numerous young nobles who had studied at foreign universities, for example, at Wittenberg, Geneva, and Strassburg, and the German burghers, who played a very important role in some cities, were favorably disposed to the ideas of LUTHER, CALVIN, and the other leading personalities of the Reformation. Following the secularization of the State of the Teutonic Order into a duchy (1525) and the conversion to Protestantism of the grandmaster Albrecht of Brandenburg-Ansbach, who became the first duke of Prussia (1525–68), Königsberg developed rapidly as a Protestant center from which the new teaching was channeled into Poland and Lithuania, where it was quickly absorbed.

Spread of the Reformation into Poland. The rapid spread of the Reformation is to be explained by the shortcomings of the higher clergy, by abuses in the lower clergy and numerous monastic establishments, and by the quarrels between the higher and lower nobility over the extent of ecclesiastical jurisdiction. Royal officials, men of learning, and politicians, such as Andrzej Frycz-Modrzewski (1503–72), and poets, such as Mikołaj Rej (1505–69) prepared the way for Protestantism in Poland. As early as 1520, King Sigismund I (1506–48) issued an edict against Luther's writings, but he did not succeed in halting the spread of Protestantism. After his death the adherents of the Reformation put their hopes in Sigismund II Augustus (1548–72), who was in communication by letter with MELANCHTHON and Calvin. He did not abandon Catholicism, but the Protestant movement in Poland reached its zenith during his reign. At the imperial diet held at Piotrków in 1565, a constitution was drawn up and put into effect by which ecclesiastical courts were deprived of the jurisdiction they formerly enjoyed. The nobles could then establish PROTESTANTISM in their own properties and territories.

The Protestants in Poland at that time fell into three groups: the Lutherans, the Reformed, who were headed by Jan Łaski (1499–1560), and the BOHEMIAN BRETHERN. From 1555 they carried on negotiations among them with the object of establishing an independent Polish national church. At the convention held at Sandomierz in 1570 they reached agreement on the fundamental elements of belief. This consensus Sandomirensis has been called the first attempt at realizing the idea of Protestant universality. At any rate, it made it possible, following the death of Sigismund Augustus, for the dissenters to become politically united at the Warsaw Confederation of 1573. Temporarily, Stancarism, which stemmed from Francesco Stancar (1501–74), and Socinianism, which took its name from Fausto Sozzini (Socinius, 1539–1604), played important roles. This anti-Trinitarian movement, whose adherents were also called Arians or Polish Brethren, was suppressed in 1658.

The Beginnings of the Counter Reformation. Sharp disputes among the various Protestant groups, Catholic reforms, and the Counter Reformation weakened the position of Protestantism, which had gained its chief support in the noble classes and in the higher levels among the burghers. Faced with the political threat to Poland-Lithuania of the Swedes in the north, of the advancing Russians in the east, and of Turkish attacks in the south, Polish political leaders and bishops emphasized the necessity of the abolishment of all ecclesiastical division and of return to the Catholic Church as a matter that was absolutely vital to the national interest. Catholicism had already taken on new strength.

Numerous diocesan and provincial synods issued decrees against the abuses that had become widespread in the late Middle Ages, and they also came to grips with the Protestant religious views. The Archbishops Jan Łaski of Gniezno (1510–31) and Andrzej Krzycki (1535–37), who as bishop of Przemyśl (1523–27) had written against Luther, sought to check Protestantism. The polemical works of John Eck, Johannes Cochlaeus, and Georg Witzel (Wicelius) were disseminated throughout Poland. Stanislaus Hosius (1504–79) was especially zealous in defending the Church through his polemical and systematic writings (for example, his Confessio catholicae fidei) and his pastoral and ecclesiastico-political measures. As bishop of Chełmno from 1549, of Ermland from 1551, and as cardinal from 1561, he succeeded in bringing about a renewal of the life of the Church.

Work of Papal Nuncios and Jesuits. Polish Catholicism received essential help from Rome through admonitory papal briefs to the Polish kings and through the work of the nuncios, who by political means and visitations strove to put into effect the decrees of the Council of Trent. The nuncio Giovanni Francesco Commendone (1563–65) persuaded King Sigismund II Augustus to give the Jesuits the protection of the crown; the nuncio Alberto Bolognetti (1581–85) through his letters and sermons contributed to the return of many nobles to Catholicism; and the nuncio Germanico Malaspina (1593–97) made the preparations for the Union of Brest (1596), through which most of the Orthodox bishops of Poland-Lithuania were united with Rome. The Union of Brest was a great victory in the struggle for the unity of the Church. However, the national tensions between Poles and Ukrainians and the political altercations involving Poland-Lithuania, the Cossacks, and Russia hindered the development of the Union. The Basilian St. Josaphat Kuncevyč (1580–1623, archbishop of Płock from 1618) and the Jesuit St. Andrew BOBOLA (1592–1657) were murdered by fanatical Cossacks.

The nuncios were strongly supported by Cardinal HOSIUS and other members of the Polish episcopate. It will suffice to mention: Martin KROMER of Ermland (1579–89); Marcin Białobrzecki of Kamieniec (1577–86); Stanisław KARNKOWSKI of Włocławek (1567–81), and later archbishop of Gniezno (1581–1603), who as preacher, writer, and diplomat opposed Protestantism, and by synods, the erecting of seminaries, and patronage of the Jesuit order, hastened the re-Catholicization of Poland; and Jan Dymitr Solikowski, archbishop of Lvov (1583–1603). In the religious strife of the age the Jesuits Melchior Grodziecki (1584–1619) and St. John SARKANDER (1576–1620) died as martyrs.

Success of the Counter Reformation in Poland. Sigismund III Vasa, king of Poland (1587–1632), and also king of Sweden (1594–1604), whom Rubens glorified as the “Tamer of Heresy,” completed the Counter Reformation in Poland-Lithuania. The JESUITS were its acknowledged champions. They were active as teachers and leaders in new educational institutions and as diplomats, preachers, missionaries, confessors, writers, and publicists. Typical representatives were Benedict Herbest (1530–93), Jakób Wujek (1540–97), Piotr Skarga (1536–1611), Maciej Kazimierz Sarbiewski (1595–1640), and Gaspar Druzicki (1590–1662). The older orders, the Dominicans, Franciscans, Bernardines, Paulites, Augustinians, and Carmelites played an important role beside the Jesuits. The new orders or congregations as, for example, the Reformati (OFM Ref), PIARISTS, Capuchins, TRINITARIANS, VINCENTIANS, and others, spread rapidly. Orders and congregations of women engaged actively in education, in the care of the sick, and in other works of charity. Among the mystics of the age, the Carmelite Teresa Marchocka (1603–52) deserves mention.

out these enemies of her religion. The heroic defense of the Paulite monastery on the Jasna Góra at Częstochowa in 1655 was the occasion for raising this place of pilgrimage with its icon of the “Black Mother of God” to the status of a Polish national shrine. In 1666 King John II Casimir (1648–68) proclaimed Mary Queen of Poland (regina Poloniae, królowa Korony Polskiej). Pope ALEXANDER VII bestowed the title of rex orthodoxus on John and his successors. Marian devotion, which had struck deep roots in Poland in the Middle Ages, flourished anew. Catholicism was officially recognized as the religion of the state.

Political Decline and Repressive Religious Policy.

In the period of the Elective Monarchy (1572–1795) Poland-Lithuania lost the position as a great power that it had attained under the Jagiellonians. Because King John III Sobieski (1674–1696) won victories against the Turks and played a major role in freeing Vienna from the Turkish siege in 1683, he received from Pope INNOCENT XII the title of defensor fidei. In the eighteenth century, Poland-Lithuania faced the catastrophe of partitions under the Saxon electors, Augustus II (1697–1733) and Augustus III (1733–63), who were forced upon it as kings by its neighbors.

The victory of the Counter Reformation led to measures that went beyond the solid establishment of Catholicism. Protestantism was suppressed, and in 1717 the erection of new Protestant churches was forbidden. Following an attack by the Protestant population on the Jesuit Gymnasium in Toruń in 1724, the burgomaster and nine other Protestants were executed. The United Catholics, or adherents of the Union, who even in the preceding century had to overcome external and internal difficulties, were now treated as Catholics of “the second class;” they were forced to accept certain forms and practices of the Roman Catholic State Church. The rights of the Orthodox were also curtailed. The kings of Prussia and the Russian czars took action to protect the Protestants and Orthodox respectively under Polish rule. Catherine II (the Great) set her favorite Stanisław August Poniatowski (1764–95) upon the Polish throne. Through Gen. N. V. Repnin, her ambassador in Warsaw, she interfered in ecclesiastical affairs; e.g., in 1767 she had Bp. Kajetan Soltyk of Cracow (1759–88) and Bp. Jozef Andrzej Zaluski of Kiev (1759–74) arrested and deported to Russia. The patriotic Catholic opposition, under the leadership of Bp. Adam Stanisław Krasiński (1759–95, d. 1800), formed the Confederation of Bar. Jan Dołowicz, the Carmelite prior of Bar (d. 1801), even founded an “Order of the Holy Cross” to protect the faith, but after a four-year struggle the confederates were wiped out by the Russians.

The Partitions of Poland (1772–1815). In the first partition (1772) carried out by Russia, Austria, and Prussia, Poland lost about 30 percent of its territory and 35 percent of its inhabitants. In the attempts to stabilize conditions by reforms, several ecclesiastics took a prominent part. Among them should be mentioned as preacher, educational reformer, and statesman the famous Piarist Stanisław Konarski (1700–73), Abp. Michał Jerzy Poniatowski of Gniezno (1785–94), Bp. Adam Stanisław Naruszewicz of Lutsk (1790–96), the founder of modern Polish historiography, and Canon Hugo Kołłątaj (1750–1812), who carried out important curricular reforms. They participated actively also in the formation of the Constitution of May 3, 1791, in which the Catholic religion was recognized as the official religion of the state, but in which also the free practice of religion was guaranteed for all dissenters.

The second partition of Poland by Russia and Prussia in 1793, and the third in 1795, by which the three neighboring Great Powers seized the rest of Poland, brought an abrupt end to the efforts at internal reform. The papal nuncio in Warsaw, Lorenzo Litta (1793–95), registered a solemn protest against the injustice done to Poland-Lithuania, but his protest died away unheard. Russia seized two-thirds, and Prussia and Austria the remaining third between them. The name of Poland vanished from the map. The Church was seriously weakened materially by the confiscations and secularization of her possessions. The grand-duchy of Warsaw, established by Napoleon, was abolished in 1813 and its territory divided between Prussia and Russia. The Congress of Vienna, which is rightly charged with the fourth partition of Poland, delivered the final blow in 1815: Russia received 82 percent, Austria 10 percent, and Prussia eight percent of the former Polish kingdom.

Foreign Domination, 1815–1918

The Poles did not meekly accept the loss of independent statehood, but held tenaciously to their national consciousness and to their language. As in earlier crises, the Catholic Church in this period also was a bond that united the Polish-speaking population at home and abroad. In the Congregation of the Resurrectionists, whose first members made their vows in Rome in 1842 (Congregatio a Resurrectione Domini Nostri Jesu Christi; in Polish, Zmartwychstancy), belief in the Resurrection of Christ and the firm conviction that Poland would be restored were combined in a special way.

Polish Catholics under Russian Rule. In the parts of Poland annexed by Russia, the oppression of the Poles and of Catholicism, which was regarded as a foreign body, was especially severe. The Russian government conducted a continual campaign against the United, or adherents of the Union, in particular. Already under Catherine II eight million United were incorporated into the Orthodox Church by force. The eparchies, which had not been abolished earlier, comprising 1.5 million faithful and 1,500 parish churches, were placed under the control of the United-Greek College in St. Petersburg in 1829. Nicholas I (1825–55) granted the request of the Synod of Płock that the adherents of the Union should be reunited with the “Old Orthodox Mother Church.” Those who did not abandon the Union with Rome voluntarily were forced to do so. In 1875 the Diocese of Chełmno in Congress Poland (Russian Poland) was declared to be an Orthodox bishopric, and thus the Union was abolished in the whole territory under Russian rule. Small groups of faithful continued in secret to be loyal to the Union. The Edict of Toleration of April 17, 1905 permitted them to become Roman Catholics, but a return to their old United status was forbidden.

Dependent Status of the Roman Catholic Church.

The Roman Catholic ecclesiastical administration was reduced to a condition of severe dependence under Russian rule. In Stanisław Sienściewicz-Bohusz, whom she appointed to head her newly erected archbishopric of Mogilev (1782–1826), Catherine II found a willing helper. Alexander I (1801–25) established (1801) the Roman Catholic Ecclesiastical College in St. Petersburg in order to control the Church. In the grand-duchy of Warsaw, Polish Catholics had a short breathing spell. But in the period of the “Kingdom of Poland,” which from 1815 to 1830 was governed in personal union with Russia, it was soon evident that any cooperation with the Church was to be based purely on considerations of public policy. In order to break the influence of the bishop of Gniezno, who as primate of Poland possessed a measure of authority that extended beyond the boundaries of his own jurisdiction proper, Alexander I had Warsaw, which had been made a bishopric in the Prussian partition territory in 1798, raised to the status of an archbishopric in 1817. In the following year seven bishops were placed under its jurisdiction as suffragans.

The expulsion of the Jesuits from Russia in 1820, the dissolution of the numerous monasteries, the possibility of divorce from a Catholic partner on the occasion of the other partner’s conversion to the Orthodox faith, were all threatening portents. After the failure of the Polish revolution of 1830–31, they were followed by harsh measures against the Church. The government refused to give official approval to episcopal candidates (the archiepiscopal See of Warsaw, for example, was vacant from 1829 to 1836, and from 1838 to 1856); in 1832 it suppressed 200 monasteries; in 1834 it restricted freedom of movement on the part of the clergy; and in 1841 it confiscated the major portion of ecclesiastical property. In 1846 the priest Piotr Ściegienny, who advocated the freeing of the peasants and national revolt, was arrested in Kielce and condemned to hard labor in Siberia, from which he was not permitted to return before 1871. The convention of 1847 made between Nicholas I and Pope PIUS IX was never really implemented.

Tensions mounted under the government of Alexander II (1855–81), when the Poles rose in revolution against the Russian terror in 1863–1864, only to be suppressed with much bloodshed. Archbishop Zygmunt Szczęsny Feliński of Warsaw (1862–83, d. 1895), Bishops Adam Krasieński of Vilna (d. 1891), Wincenty Chościak-Popiel of Płock (archbishop of Warsaw 1883–1912), and Konstanty Lubieński of Sejny (1863–69), along with 400 clerics, were banished to Siberia. Almost all monasteries and Catholic societies were abolished, and processions outside churches and May devotions were forbidden. In 1866 the government repudiated the convention made with Rome in 1847. In 1869–1870 it ordered the use of the Russian language in divine worship and punished numerous bishops and clerics who opposed the new regulations with banishment to Siberia. No permission was given the bishops to attend VATICAN COUNCIL I.

Improvement after 1882. It was only after 1882, when Pope LEO XIII and Alexander III (1881–94) had worked out an agreement, that some alleviation of the oppressive conditions was introduced. The use of the Russian language in sermons and devotions was limited to communities with a Russian population. The use of Polish was permitted in Polish cities and Polish rural areas. In 1884 Leo XIII was able to fill the vacant sees. The Edict of Toleration of 1905 under Nicholas II (1894–1918) brought further alleviations, but restrictions were again imposed only two years later (1907). The government recognized and supported the MARIAVITES, whose leading personalities were excommunicated by Rome in 1906.

The Poles under Austria. In Galicia the situation for Polish Catholics was better. The government in Vienna was the only one of the three partition powers to give them assistance and support, although in the first half of the nineteenth century the influence of the State Church of Josephinism was still active. The Concordat of 1855 and the autonomy granted to the Poles in 1867, with their own diet, were fruitful for the life of the Church. Education at all levels was conducted in Polish. The Academy of Cracow was founded in 1872. Cracow and Lvov with their universities and theological faculties were outstanding Catholic centers. From 1884 the Jesuits in Cracow published the monthly, Przegląd Powszechny, which became a vehicle for leading Catholics. Distinguished bishops were active as ecclesiastical statesmen, theological writers, and preachers. Special mention should be made of the Prince-Bishops of Cracow, Albin Dunajewski (1879–94) and Jan Kozielko Puzyna (1895–1911, cardinal from 1901), Abp. Józef Bilczewski of Lvov (Lemberg, 1900–23), and Bp. Józef Sebastian Pelczar of Przemyśl (d. 1924).

Between the Roman Catholic hierarchy and the United, who had acquired a separate archbishopric of Lvov in 1807, relations became strained, resulting essentially from the national opposition between Poles and Ukrainians. After long negotiations a formula of agreement was worked out at Rome in 1863, which dealt with disputed questions but did not clarify all points. The United, under the leadership of their metropolitans, especially Sylvester Sambrytovyč (1885–98, cardinal from 1895) and Andreas Count Szeptyckyj (1900–44), strove to gain political and ecclesiastical independence.

Polish Catholicism under German Rule. In the Prussian partition area the differences between the Protestant government and the Catholic, and especially the Polish-speaking, population became worse decade by decade, although the bull of Pope PIUS VII, De salute animarum, issued in 1821 had regulated anew ecclesiastical affairs in the eastern parts of Prussia. The bishopric of Posen (Poznań) was raised to an archbishopric and was united in a personal union with the archbishopric of Gnesen (Gniezno), which retained the greatly extended diocese of Kulm (Chełmno) as a suffragan. The dioceses of Ermland and Breslau (Wrocław), which meantime had been freed from their dependence on Riga and Gniezno respectively, were placed directly under the Holy See. Following the Polish revolution of 1830–1831, the Prussian Lord Lieutenant Eduard von Flottwell (1830–41) promoted German institutions and culture and Protestantism in order to restrict the influence of the Polish nobility and clergy. In 1839 the demands of the government on the question of mixed marriages led to the internment of Abp. Martin von Dunin of Gniezno (1831–42) in the fortress of Kolberg. His successor Leo Przyłuski (1845–65) in 1848 demanded the restoration of the national rights of the Poles.

The quarrel between the German government and the Poles reached its zenith in the period of the Kulturkampf. Through his policy Bismarck wished, among other things, to deprive the growing Polish nationalism of its spiritual leaders. Abp. Mieczysław Halka LEDÓCHOWSKI (1865–86) of Gniezno-Poznań (Gnesen-Posen), two auxiliary bishops, and numerous clergy were arrested, and their parishes left vacant. The pressure of the Kulturkampf, which slackened after some years, and other government measures, for example, the suppression of the Polish language in schools and in public life, did not have the success expected. Archbishop Julius Dinder (1886–90) tried in vain to bring about a settlement. After long negotiations, Abp. Florian Oksza-Stablewski (1891–1906) succeeded in obtaining permission for the use of Polish in religious instruction in the schools. An expropriation law was passed against Polish landed property in 1908, against which Cardinal Georg Kopp of Breslau protested in the Upper House of the German Parliament. This law enkindled a general outburst of anger that had repercussions beyond the borders of Germany.

The tension remained, as was evidenced by the vacancy in the archiepiscopal See of Gniezno-Poznań during the years 1906 to 1914.

Along with the Polish bishops, who during the period of the domination of Poland by the partition powers defended the Catholic tradition, one must praise the old orders and new congregations for their splendid service in maintaining Catholicism and in spreading and deepening the knowledge of the Catholic religion. Mention should be made of the Jesuit writer and missionary Karol Antoniewicz (d. 1852), the Salesian August Czartoryski (d. 1893), the Carmelite Rafal KALINOWSKI (d. 1907), and the Redemptorist Bernard Lubienski (d. 1933). Several new Polish communities were founded in the second half of the nineteenth century. In 1855 Edmund BOJANOWSKI (d. 1871) founded the Little Servant Sisters of the Immaculate Conception, and Sofja Truszkowska founded the Felician Sisters (Felicjanki); in 1857 Jozefa Karska (d. 1860) and Marcelina DAROWSKA, the Sisters of the Immaculate Conception of Mary (Niepokalanki); in 1875 Franciszka SIEDLIKA (d. 1902), the Sisters of the Holy Family of Nazareth (Nazaretanki); in 1891–92 Brother Albert, “the Polish Francis” (Adam CHMIELOWSKI, d. 1916), the Albertines, including both men and women; in 1893 Bronisław Markiewicz (d. 1912), the Sisters of St. Michael the Archangel (Michaelitki).

The Church in the Republic of Poland 1918–39

When the Polish Republic was created in November 1918, the bishops, who had cared for the faithful in the three partition areas, were faced with difficult problems of organization. In the rebuilding of Polish Catholicism, the leaders were the Archbishops Edmund Dalbor of Gniezno (1915–26) and Aleksander Kakowski of Warsaw (1913–38), who were made cardinals in 1919, and the nuncio Achille Ratti (1919–21), the later Pope PIUS XI. The Concordat of Feb. 10, 1925, and the bull Vixtum Poloniae of Pope Pius XI, issued October 28 of the same year, constituted the foundation for the new ecclesiastical order in Poland. Two new archbishoprics, Cracow and Vilna, were erected beside the existing archiepiscopal sees of Gniezno-Poznań (Gnesen-Posen), Warsaw, and Lvov, and four new dioceses were established: Częstochowa, Katowice, Lomza, and Pinsk. The new organization comprised five ecclesiastical provinces with a total of 15 suffragan sees.

The Polish census of 1936 indicated that Catholics comprised 75 percent of the population (Roman Catholics 63.8 percent, and adherents of the Union 11.2 percent), the Orthodox and Jews, 10 percent each, and Protestants, 3 percent. Catholicism, which was the acknowledged religion of the great majority of the Polish population, was respected even by religiously indifferent statesmen, as Józef Piłsudski (d. 1935) who as chief of state headed the Republic from 1918 to 1922 and guided it in the years 1926 to 1935 under several authoritarian governments. The generally harmonious relations between Church and State were seriously impaired by the new marriage legislation, the proposed penal code, and, above all, in the summer of 1938, by the expropriation and destruction of Orthodox churches in the Lublin area with governmental authority and support. The papal nuncio in Poland Filippo Cortesi (1936–47) and the Polish episcopate disassociated themselves definitely from this harsh action on the part of the government. Under the leadership of the bishops, at whose regularly held conferences the Primate Augustyn Hlond (1926–48) served as president, the Church, through an effective consolidation of its forces, exercised a strong influence on public life.

Flourishing Catholic Life. The number of bishops in the period from 1918 to 1938 rose from 23 to 51, and the number of diocesan and regular clergy increased by about 43, reaching a total of nearly 13,000. The religious orders enjoyed a marked growth in this same period. At the outbreak of World War II there were about 2,000 monastic foundations, 1,600 priests, 4,500 lay brothers, and 17,000 sisters. The numerous pilgrimages to the shrines of the Blessed Virgin at Częstochowa, Piekary, and Ostra Brama in Vilna and the increasing participation in the foreign missions and in religious congresses bore witness to a flourishing religious life. The Church intensified the care of souls by the multiplication of parishes, by the development of its social work in its organized charities and in its St. Vincent de Paul societies, by CATHOLIC ACTION, which furnished a more solid adult education program, and by the apostolate of the press. In 1939 there were more than 250 Catholic periodical publications, 38 of these being organs of the United Church. Every diocese had its own Sunday paper. The religious orders also exhibited marked zeal in the field of the Catholic press. The scholarly life of the Church, which had a solid foundation in obligatory religious education, was promoted through the theological faculties of Warsaw, Cracow, Lvov, and Vilna, by the Catholic University of Lublin, founded in 1918, and by the diocesan seminaries. This scholarly activity was reflected in a series of important theological journals.

The United Catholic Church of Poland was composed of the Armenian Bishopric of Lvov, which had 4,000 faithful, as well as the 3,500,000 members of the Greek-Catholic Church in East Galicia, and some parishes of the Eastern Slavic Church totaling about 25,000 faithful. They in common were opposed to the Polish government, which wished to restrict their separate status within the Church in favor of the Latin rite. The government hoped that Latinization would lead to the complete assimilation of the United faithful into the main stream of Polish life and culture.

The Church in Poland, 1939–65

Until the end of World War I, Polish Catholicism led a different kind of existence in the eastern provinces of Prussia, in the Russian Vistula area, and in Austrian Galicia, but within two decades an abrupt standardization was put into effect. The German-Soviet Pact and the German Polish campaign of September 1939 created a new political situation for the Church. The incorporation of the eastern Polish territory into the Soviet Union entailed the prohibition of religious propaganda, persecutions, and deportations of clergy and laity.

The Poles under the National Socialist Regime.

The German National Socialist regime seized the territory of the ecclesiastical province of Gniezno-Poznań (Gnesen-Posen) and parts of the archbishoprics of Warsaw and Cracow, which it designated "the incorporated eastern territories," and established a general government that included the main parts of the ecclesiastical provinces of Warsaw and Cracow and the western border areas of the ecclesiastical provinces of Lvov and Vilna. Following the outbreak of the German-Soviet War, East Galicia, with the major portion of the ecclesiastical province of Lvov was added to the general government also. The harsh measures of the German authorities, the ideological outlook of Alfred Rosenberg, race theory, and Jewish persecutions threatened the Church, which was reduced to a slave status in the Warta District and was heavily oppressed in the general government.

In the Warta District members of the hierarchy were brutally beaten; the clergy was decimated; seminaries, numerous establishments of religious orders, and all Catholic schools and associations were abolished; ecclesiastical property was expropriated; sisters were driven from their convents; churches in large part were closed (in Poznań, for example, of thirty churches only two were left open for Polish-speaking Catholics and one for German-speaking faithful); wayside crosses and shrines were destroyed; Polish inscriptions on gravestones were effaced; and loyalty to religion was made extremely difficult. More than three million Polish Catholics were left outside the pale of the law and were at the mercy of the despotic whims of the National Socialists.

The Archbishop of Cracow, Adam SAPIEHA (1925–51, cardinal from 1946), served as spokesman for all the Polish bishops, making repeated representations to the administration of the general government in order to obtain alleviations in the treatment of priests under arrest and sent into exile, to provide for the recruitment and theological training of seminarians, and to maintain the charitable activities of the Church. Following the systematic elimination of the Church from public life, and especially after the liquidation of the Catholic press and of higher Catholic education, the spiritual activity of the Church under the general government was confined to divine worship, the care of souls, and religious instruction. The youth organizations and societies of men under the leadership of Catholic Action were forbidden, but in the underground they served in part as assistance organizations for persecuted clerics and Jews. The German occupation officials were bent on depriving the Church of her age-old function of being a protective shield for all that was characteristic in Polish life and culture. Their anti-ecclesiastical attack paralyzed Catholic life.

In all, 13 Polish bishops were exiled or arrested and put in concentration camps. Of these the following died: Auxiliary Bishop Leo Wetmanski of Płock on May 10, 1941, and Archbishop Antoni Nowowiejski of Płock on June 20, 1941, in Soldau (Działdowo); Auxiliary Bishop Michał Kozal of Włocławek on Jan. 26, 1943, in Dachau; and Auxiliary Bishop Władysław Goral of Lublin at the beginning of 1945 in a hospital bunker in Berlin. There were 3,647 priests, 389 clerics, 341 brothers, and 1,117 sisters put in concentration camps, in which 1,996 priests, 113 clerics, and 238 sisters perished. On August 14, 1941, Maximilian KOLBE met his death in the concentration camp at Auschwitz. He offered his life in substitution for that of a father of a family who had been condemned to die. The diocesan clergy of the Polish Church, who at the beginning of World War II numbered 10,017, lost 25 percent (2,647). The National Socialist terror raged against leading Catholic laymen as well as against the clergy, and many laymen were also put to death.

Reorganization of the Polish Church. The collapse of the German East Front and the end of World War II introduced a new chapter in Polish history. The Polish Committee for National Liberation, the so-called Lublin Committee, in a manifesto of July 22, 1944 guaranteed, among other things, freedom of conscience and respect for the rights of the Catholic Church. Clergy and faithful devoted their efforts to healing the material and mental wounds caused by the occupation and the effects of the war. The Primate, Cardinal Augustyn HLOND—from 1946 also archbishop of Warsaw—undertook the rebuilding of ecclesiastical organization. He consecrated several bishops; restored the seminaries; made provisions for religious instruction, for the restoration of Catholic schools, and for the redevelopment of the ecclesiastical press; and revived the activity of the religious orders. Owing to the political territorial changes, modifications in the Polish ecclesiastical organization were necessary. In the East the largest part of the archdiocese of Vilna and Lemberg (Lvov) were lost. In the West, the new organization was fitted into the structure of the ecclesiastical province of East Germany. In the occupied German eastern territories, the so-called Polish West and North territories, five apostolic administrations were established in 1945 with their centers at Oppeln (Opole), Breslau (Wrocław), Allenstein (Olsztyn), Landsberg (Gorzów Wielkopolski), and Danzig (Gdańsk).

Difficulties of the Church under a Communist Government. On Sept. 12, 1945 the Polish government abrogated the Concordat of 1925. The nationalization of Catholic presses and the censorship of Catholic publications marked the beginning of restrictions on the freedom of the Church. They were followed (1948–50) by the censorship of all ecclesiastical publications, by the elimination of Catholic youth associations and broadcasts, by the dissolution of the Caritas Association, the nationalization of hospitals, and by the expropriation of the largest portion of ecclesiastical property. Primate Stefan WYSZYŃSKI (later cardinal) took over direction of the archdioceses of Gniezno and Warsaw after the death of Cardinal HLOND on Dec. 16, 1948. He made an agreement with the government on April 14, 1950, securing recognition of the bishops' dogmatic, liturgical, and catechetical demands, but the normalization of relations between Church and State, which they expected, did not take place.

Out of the latent battle between Church and State a more open conflict broke out in 1952. The government decree of Feb. 9, 1953, on the filling of ecclesiastical offices, subordinated episcopal jurisdiction to the supervision of the State. Bishop Czesław Mieczysław Kaczmarek of Kielce (1938–63) had already been arrested in 1951. In 1953 Cardinal Wyszyński, and, in 1954, Auxiliary Bishop Antoni Baraniak of Poznań (archbishop from 1957) were likewise deprived of their freedom. The absolute authority of the governmental office for ecclesiastical affairs; the dissolution of some major and minor seminaries, including seminaries of religious orders; the measures directed against the Catholic University of Lublin; the abolition of the Catholic faculties at the beginning of the winter semester of 1954; the prohibition of January 1955 against the imparting of religious instruction in the elementary schools; the arrest and imprisonment of priests; the frequent search of private domiciles by the police; and the expropriation of monasteries all endangered the independence of the Church. In addition to pressures from the outside, attempts were made to split the interior unity of Catholicism by means of the so-called "patriotic priests," who were pushed into key positions in the Church by the office of ecclesiastical affairs, and of "progressive Catholics" who organized themselves as the Pax-Movement and were supported by the government. These Catholics of leftist orientation developed the Pax Press and presented themselves as the true representatives of Polish Catholicism. The Church was pushed very much into the background in public life. The number of churches and chapels declined about 30 percent; the monasteries for men, 40 percent; and convents for women, about 45 percent. Because of the arrests, imprisonments, and banishments of priests, many parish posts could be filled in a temporary fashion only. On Dec. 8, 1955 concern for the unity of the Church in Poland moved Pope PIUS XII to address a letter to the Polish episcopate. He not only dealt with the persecution of the Church, but he emphasized, among other points, the danger of the "Progressive Catholics."

Church-State Relations 1956–57. In the fall of 1956, after the thaw that freed Poland from Stalinism, Władysław Gomułka took over the political leadership and the situation of the Church improved. Cardinal Wyszyński was freed and returned to Warsaw on Oct. 28, 1956. A commission made up of representatives of both Church and state was established to remove the existing tensions. The government decree of Feb. 9, 1953, was withdrawn. Imprisoned bishops and clergy were given their freedom, the vicars capitular who had been appointed in the Polish west and north territories by the office for religious affairs in 1951 were now selected from loyal supporters of the cardinal. Religious instruction was permitted as an elective subject in schools before and after the hours set for obligatory studies. The Catholic laity obtained influence in internal political affairs, the press, and journalism. In May of 1957 Gomułka declared that he saw the necessity of a coexistence between believers and nonbelievers, between the Church and socialism, and between the people's sovereignty and the hierarchy of the Church.

Polish Catholicism, 1956–1965. The Church utilized the alleviations that had been granted in 1956 to make itself heard. Through a carefully prepared and successfully conducted nine-year Novena (1957–66) the Church injected itself into the celebration of the millennium of Poland. The ideological reaction of communism was hesitant at first but soon became clearer. In the preparations for the Sejm (Parliament) elections of April 16, 1961, the watchword went out that Polish atheism must fight with the Catholic hierarchy, and that the domination of the souls of the whole nation was the issue at stake. On June 15, 1961, a law again abrogated the teaching of religion in the schools. The Church replied by constructing a thick network of catechetical support points that the ministry of education tried in vain to bring under its control. The State applied the screw of taxation against the Church; used the pretense of paper shortages against ecclesiastical papers and periodicals; attacked Cardinal Wyszyński and other bishops, charging them with demagoguery and fanaticism; and restricted the freedom of the Church in systematic fashion.

In 1965, the Church was seeking to overcome these threats through a concentration of her forces. Her interior development was evidenced by the sound training of numerous seminarians in the major seminaries (4,000 seminarians in 1965); by the further development of the Catholic University of Lublin and of the Catholic Academy in Bielany near Warsaw; by appropriate methods of pastoral care; by the zealous activity of numerous religious orders and congregations; by courageous argumentation against dialectic and practical materialism; by the publication of several theological journals of high standing, as, for example, the Ateneum kapłańskie (Włocławek), the Collectanea theologica (Warsaw), and the Homo Dei (Warsaw); by cooperation in the Ecumenical Movement; by close contact with Rome as the center of the Church; and by the implementation of the decrees and suggestions of VATICAN COUNCIL II. There was a flourishing religious life that was evidenced by zealous attendance at divine worship, the reception of the Sacraments, the intense devotion to the Blessed Virgin, and the restoration of old churches and erection of new ones. It was reflected also in the appearance of weekly Church papers like Przewodnik Katolicki (Poznań) and Gość Niedzielny (Katowice), in the sociocultural weekly Tygodnik Powzechny (Cracow), as well as in the monthly paper Znak (Cracow).

[B. STASIEWSKI]

The Church in Poland, 1965–2000

The Failure of the Five-Year Plan. The five-year plan introduced by the Władysław Gomułka regime ended in failure, further reducing living standards. It worsened shortages in consumer goods, stoked hidden inflation, and widened the gap between Poland and the West. The still-unsettled question of Poland's western borders on the Oder and Neisse Rivers continued to impede relations with West Germany (which did not recognize those frontiers) while heightening Polish dependence on the Soviet Union. In 1965 the Treaty of Friendship, Cooperation and Mutual Assistance between Poland and the Soviet Union was extended a further 20 years. Conflict with the Church grew over ecclesiastical preparations to mark the millennium of Christianity in Poland in 1966; the Polish government wanted to treat the occasion as merely the thousandth anniversary of the Polish State. The Polish episcopate addressed a letter to its German counterpart, "forgiving and seeking forgiveness" between Poles and Germans. This effort at mutual reconciliation resulted in Gomułka, now first secretary of the Polish United Workers' Party (PZPR), accusing Primate Wyszyński of interfering in the prerogatives of the State. Within the PZPR itself, dissidents succeeded for the first time in expanding civil rights, particularly in the area of culture.

In reaction to the conservatism of Gomułka and hard-line communists ("partisans"), a liberal dissident wing emerged within the PZPR, made up primarily of the party's intelligentsia, which enjoyed some support from youth and students. Gomułka and other hard-liners would seize upon events following the 1967 Arab-Israeli Six Day War and anti-Russian student protests in early 1968 following performances of Mickiewicz's play Dziady ("Forefathers' Eve") to purge those "revisionists" in the name of "anti-Zionism." This internecine party warfare, inspired from Moscow, resulted in the migration of about 10,000 Jews from Poland (not all of them party members) at the time.

The Gomułka regime lost further public credibility after the 1968 Soviet-led invasion of Czechoslovakia and the worsening economic situation in Poland. The ongoing failure of communist central planning only deepened Poland's dependence on the Soviet Union. Although the Gomułka regime sought to maintain control of the situation, it found itself increasingly isolated, distrusting even its closest collaborators; party and government purges continued.

Departing from its traditional anti-West German stance, however, the Polish government signed a treaty in December 1970 with Chancellor Willy Brandt's government, normalizing Polish-West German relations and recognizing Poland's postwar western borders. This resulted in the normalization of ecclesiastical government in those areas through the creation of dioceses and the appointment of ordinaries in lieu of apostolic administrators.

The economic crisis of 1968 to 1970 resulted, in part, in a weak supply of basic goods. Steep price increases announced just before Christmas 1970 spurred protests by workers in Gdańsk, Sopot, Gdynia, and Szczecin. The protests were put down bloodily, with 45 dead and about 1,200 wounded. In the wake of those protests, the Central Committee forced Gomułka and his coterie to resign. Edward Gierek became first secretary of the PZPR; Piotr Jarosiewicz replaced Józef Cyrankiewicz as premier. Gierek, who had begun his career as a communist activist in Belgium and France, gave the impression of a technocrat who promised to raise living standards and improve the economy, thereby buying a certain measure of social confidence ("Help us?" "We'll help!" was a contemporary slogan). Gierek fostered the illusion of liberalization in the areas of culture (censorship became more elastic), social control (travel abroad became easier) and toward the Church. At the same time, persecution of the opposition in fact intensified; for example, a 1971 law provided for convictions in the absence of court decisions. These efforts went in tandem with slogans about patriotism and the building of socialism in close alliance with the USSR. One outcome of these campaigns was the approval by Parliament on Feb. 3, 1976, of constitutional changes previously adopted by the Seventh Congress of the PZPR that acknowledged the leading role of the party in the building of socialism and pledging Poland's indissoluble friendship with the USSR. Both the Church and dissident circles protested that decision, emphasizing that it conflicted with provisions of the 1975 Helsinki Final Act signed by Poland at the Conference on Security and Cooperation in Europe. Despite increased diplomatic contacts with the West, Polish dependence on the Soviets grew in the Gierek-Brezhnev era.

In the sphere of Church affairs, the government's authority grew as direct talks between the Polish government and the Vatican took place and efforts were made to repair relations with Cardinal Wyszyński. A new internal administrative division of the country into 49 voivodships occurred, although it served to intensify centralized party leadership while reducing the significance of the local party apparatus.

Economically, a boom in investments, overextension of western credit, and growth in consumerism in the period 1971 to 1975 were all passed off as evidence that Poland was growing closer to Western affluence. The lifestyle bought by over-indebtedness to Western credit eventually destabilized the economy by increasing the money supply even as the availability of real goods continued to decline. Starting in 1974, a new economic crisis (which, in socialist states also meant a new political crisis) began. Price increases announced by Premier Jarosiewicz on June 24, 1976 resulted in workers' protests in Radom, Ursus, and Plock. The militia suppressed the protests, resulting in about 1,000 arrests and 100 jailings.

Solidarność. The opposition acquired a new lease on life. On Sept. 23, 1976 the Committee for the Defense of Workers (KOR) was founded. The Church came out on the side of workers, providing shelter and succor for members of the opposition, irrespective of their religious convictions (or lack thereof). The government backed down from the price hikes, which simply hastened economic collapse. The majority of those convicted in the 1976 protests were pardoned in the amnesty of July 19, 1977, which still punished opposition activities with short-term punishments or punishment by time served.

Opposition labor organizing continued. On March 26, 1977 the Movement in Defense of Human and Civil Rights (ROPCiO) was formed. In 1978 some free trade unions, the Self-Defense Committee of Farmers and the Trade Union of Farmers were all founded on local levels. Contacts were also formed with opposition movements in the other satellite countries. The Church, particularly through Primate Wyszyński, criticized the situation in Poland with the aim of fostering its improvement.

The election of Cardinal Karol Wojtyła as Pope JOHN PAUL II in 1978 and his first pilgrimage to Poland, June 2–10, 1979, emboldened society to take initiatives apart from party and government direction. Malaise in turn led to half-hearted prosecution of independent opposition organizations. The politico-economic crisis in the USSR was also slowly deepening.

One of the repercussions of this situation was the foundation in 1979 of a radical pro-independence organization led by Leszek Moczulski, the Confederation of Independent Poland (KPN). Independent trade unions also began asserting themselves more vigorously and the first strikes broke out in Lublin. Against this setting, the Eighth Congress of the PZPR in February 1980 resulted in nothing new. The only changes were at the level of personnel, e.g., Edward Babiuch replaced Jarosiewicz as premier.

Spring 1980 saw more shortages and price increases announced in July ushered in a wave of strikes in Lublin and Swidnik that spread on August 14 to the Gdańsk shipyards and all along the Polish seacoast. An Interfactory Strike Committee was formed in August in various production centers throughout the country. In contrast to 1970, this time the government did not use force. Instead, it negotiated with the strikers, under the proviso that permitting independent trade unions would not be allowed to undermine the leading role of the official government party nor seek changes to the Constitution. That process led the way to the formation in the Gdańsk shipyards of the independent trade union Solidarność (Solidarity) under Lech Wałęsa's leadership. Solidarity soon encompassed the whole country as regional trade unions were founded (the first in the Mazowsze region on Sept. 4, 1980). A National Committee for Understanding was set up in early September with Wałęsa as its head. The struggle to register Solidarity as an independent trade union went on until Nov. 10, 1980, when the Supreme Court confirmed the union's constitution.

Gierek was removed from office on Sept. 6, 1980 by the Sixth Plenum of the Central Committee of the PZPR. Stanisław Kania replaced him as first secretary. Kania advocated finding a political solution to the Polish crisis. But neither the party nor the government could constrain independent union organizing of diverse sectors of society: students, artists and scholars, farmers. Having begun with about 3.5 million members, Solidarity reached more than 9 million by the end of August 1981. The regime grew confused and fearful of a Soviet invasion. But the governing apparatchiks had no intention of giving up power and, under the leadership of General Wojciech Jaruzelski preparations for martial law began. Conflict between Solidarity and the government increased in 1981 as the regime took an increasingly hard line. Militia-initiated provocations (in Bydgoszcz, for example, Solidarity activists were beaten up in the local voivodship council's chamber) and efforts by the PZPR to limit Solidarity's local influence further fueled distrust and propelled events towards conflict. Ongoing Soviet pressure (e.g., the "Letter of the Central Committee of the Communist Party of the Soviet Union to the Central Committee of the PZPR"), the radicalization of attitudes in the party and in Solidarity, and the May 1981 death of Primate Wyszyński, who had exercised a moderating influence, all brought confrontation closer.

The second half of 1981 saw an increase in mutual accusations between the party and Solidarity and a growing wave of strikes. During Solidarity's General Congress on Sept. 5, 1981, a "Message to the Working People of Eastern Europe" was adopted, expressing an interest in expanding the ideals of Solidarity to other satellite countries. Absent from the document were any traces of the postulates of socialist ideology or adherence to the doctrine of the party's "leading role" in society.

General Jaruzelski's assumption of the role of First Secretary of the PZPR in October 1981 signaled the beginning of a reckoning with Solidarity, which had already been suggested by the use of the army in quelling strikes. Solidarity sought to call a national strike. Its National Commission assembled on Dec. 11, 1981 in Gdańsk. On the night of December 12, martial law was declared in Poland and the majority of Solidarity activists interned. The Church, through the Primate's Committee for Assistance to Persons Deprived of Liberty, intervened in the name of human rights. Armed reserve militias (ZOMO) and army took over Solidarity-controlled factories. At the Wujek Mine in Silesia nine miners were killed. The regime transformed itself into the Military Council of National Salvation (WRON), with the Council for the Defense of the Nation acting as its shadow. The party nevertheless lost members, with about 700,000 quitting. Solidarity too lost members and went underground. Military commissars assumed control over the direction of all spheres of life, including the economy. Instead of the normalization that the WRON promised, however, chaos and acute shortages of basic goods afflicted the population.

The regime intended to liquidate Solidarity. The Trade Unions Act of Oct. 8, 1982 adopted by the Sejm sought to regulate the union without its consent. A Patriotic Front for the Rebirth of the Nation (PRON) was created, intended to facilitate the party's dialogue with society. That dialogue included gestures of reconciliation like the release of Wałęsa in November of 1982, the gradual freeing of other internees, and finally the suspension of martial law on Dec. 18, 1982. At the same time, more intense repression of the opposition meant losses for the underground Solidarity movement, now led by its Temporary Coordinating Commission (TKK) with offices in Brussels. Although Pope John Paul II's second pilgrimage in June 1983 and the formal lifting of martial law on July 22 were further conciliatory gestures on the regime's part, repression of the opposition continued. The Church paid for its public encouragement of Solidarity with the murder of several priests, including the Rev. Jerzy Popiełuszko. But even harsher punishments (the Criminal Code was updated on July 1, 1985, and there were 386 political prisoners by the end of 1986) could not staunch the hemorrhage of the regime's authority.

On Nov. 6, 1985 Jaruzelski further took over the Office of Chairman of the Council of State. The regime sought to reach some understanding with society by establishing a Consultative Council on December 6, 1986. Although limited participation in the Council by the opposition was permitted, it refused to take part.

Pope John Paul II's third pilgrimage to Poland, June 8–14, 1987, took place amid an atmosphere of the regime's weakening grip and the reappearance of active, though weakened, structures of Solidarity. On Oct. 25, 1987, the National Executive Commission of Solidarity was founded but, at the core of the union, permanent divisions in ideology and tactics had already occurred. In December 1987 regional structures of Solidarity reappeared publicly. Throughout 1987 and 1988, it was apparent that the government's economic program had failed. Following a wave of strikes General Kiszczak, the interior minister, met with Wałęsa on Aug. 31, 1988. On September 27, Mieczysław Rakowski became premier.

The End of the PZPR. The regime, while still displaying strength, called for roundtable dialogue with the opposition. The discussions took place from Feb. 6 to April 5, 1989. They guaranteed immunity to the departing regime. On April 7 the Sejm adopted a new electoral law and established a presidency and senate. The semi-free elections of June 4, 1989 manifested social support for Solidarity and utterly discredited the regime. On July 19 General Jaruzelski was chosen by a majority of three votes in a joint session of Parliament to become president. On Aug. 24, 1989, Tadeusz Mazowiecki became premier. The PZPR formally ceased to exist in January 1990, although part of that grouping formed the Social Democracy of the Republic of Poland (SdRP) party, which included Aleksander Kwasniewski. Multiple other parties arose.

Solidarity, which had at first entered Parliament as the Citizens' Parliamentary Club (OKP) soon broke up into several political groupings of varying orientations. The "Centrist Understanding" (PC), formed in January 1991, eventually became a Christian-Democratic type party. Another faction that broke off in January 1991 later named itself the Democratic Union, taking the name Freedom Union in 1994.

Liberals and the left frequently found a coincidence of interests on various subjects, e.g., the exclusion of the Church from public life. Gazeta Wyborcza, at first the only independent daily newspaper independent of the communist regime, dominated public opinion. Public disorientation in political matters manifested itself in the 1990 presidential elections. The finalists were Wałęsa and Stanisław Tyminski, a candidate of indeterminate provenance who had outpolled Mazowiecki in the first round. Wałęsa won.

Jan Krzysztof Bielecki of the Liberal-Democratic Congress became premier. The electoral ordinance fostered Parliamentary fracturing (there were 29 parties) and made it difficult for the government to function. In 1991 Parliamentary elections eight parties and 29 smaller groups competed. The Democratic Union won 12.3 percent of the vote, followed by the Democratic Left Alliance (SLD), with the former communists assembled from various smaller groups also polling 12 percent. Solidarity won five percent. The government of Jan Olszewski (PC) lasted from December 1991 to June 4, 1992; Wałęsa's own ambivalence was decisive in Olszewski's fall, since that government had promised to undertake decommunization and lustration. The next government, from Waldemar Pawlak's leftist Polish Farmers' Front (PSL) lasted from June 5 to July 7, 1992. Hanna Suchocka's (UD) government endured until the end of May 1993.

The difficulties of successive governments were caused by the economic reforms of Finance Minister Leszek Balcerowicz, by the lack of a decisive break with the legacy of the communist regime, and by the contradictory interests among different parties and actors. A growing anticlericalism could also be felt, especially in the SLD, UW, the Union of Labor (UP) and parts of the PSL. One expression of this anticlericalism was the fight over the concordat between Poland and the Vatican, signed at the end of July 1993 but entering into force only in early 1998. In 1992 a new ecclesiastical reorganization of Poland took place, dividing the country into thirteen metropolitan and forty suffragan sees. Liberal circles, represented by journals like Gazeta Wyborcza and Tygodnik Powszechny, sought to divide Polish Catholicism into two camps: “fundamentalist” (i.e., those acknowledging traditional Catholic truths) and “open” (i.e., subordinating Catholicism to secularized ideology).

Political Division, Social Reform, and an Uncertain Future. On Nov. 17, 1992 Wałęsa signed the so-called “Little Constitution” that was to remain in force until adoption of a new fundamental law. A leftist alliance won the Nov. 19, 1993 parliamentary elections. Their victory was caused by divisions in the political landscape, discontent with the pain of economic reforms, and popular hopes fueled by the former Communists that they would spur economic growth. The SLD and PSL together won 45 percent of the vote. The decline of Wałęsa’s and Solidarity’s influence was the consequence of political conflicts, economic scandals, the communist past of various high-ranking officials, and the growing disparity between the generally poor (and growing poorer) public at large and the nouveau riche of the former communist nomenklatura.

In 1999 Poland became a member of NATO. Within the framework of preparing for accession to the European Union the government began economic reforms one consequence of which was the pauperization of villages and a rise in unemployment (caused by the sale of Polish factories that were then downsized or closed by their new owners). These reforms, in turn, generated opposition to the government, particularly among farmers. Reforms of the health service also struck hard at the poorest. Fractures within the governing coalition itself deepened while the left prepared for a populist campaign.

The lack of political stability in the decade after the fall of communism in Poland affected social morality, particularly in a growing crime rate and the continual legal sanctions. Sentimentality for the old Communist regime continued to be manifested in some social opinion.

POLDING, JOHN BEDE

First bishop of Australia; b. Liverpool, England, Nov. 18, 1794; d. Sydney, Australia, March 16, 1877. Educated by the Benedictines, he joined the order (1811), was ordained (1819), and was assigned as a tutor at St. Gregory’s College, Downside, England. In 1834 he was consecrated as first vicar apostolic of New Holland and Van Diemen’s Land (Australia). He reached Sydney in 1835. After visiting Rome to request the establishment of an Australian hierarchy, he was named archbishop of Sydney and metropolitan of Australia in 1842. During a period when convict transportation was ending and immigration increasing, he consolidated the Church’s position, making pastoral visitations through wild bush frontier country, establishing a Catholic education system, founding new dioceses and parishes, and bringing clergy from overseas. His original diocese was roughly the size of the U.S.; but when he died, there were 12 dioceses with 135 priests. His archdiocese of SYDNEY contained 82 churches, 53 schools, a Catholic hospital, and St. John’s College within the University of Sydney.

POLE, MARGARET PLANTAGENET, BL.

Married woman, martyr; b. Castle Farley, near Bath, Aug. 14?, 1473; d. London, May 27, 1541. She was of the house of Plantagenet; the niece of Edward IV and Richard III; daughter of George, duke of Clarence; mother of Cardinal Reginald POLE. Margaret was three years old when her mother died (Dec. 22, 1476). A year later her father was arraigned on a charge of high treason and put to death in the Tower (Jan. 16, 1478). Margaret and her brother Edward, earl of Warwick, found their position insecure at the accession of Richard III (1483) since they were children of Richard’s eldest brother. Edward, nearest male heir to Edward IV, was judicially murdered by Henry VII (1499). Margaret married Sir Richard Pole, son of Sir Geoffrey Pole, and was made countess of Salisbury (Oct. 14, 1513) by Henry VIII, partly to atone for her brother’s murder. At the birth of Mary (1516), daughter of Henry VIII and Catherine of Aragon, Margaret carried the princess to her baptism at Greyfriars church in Greenwich and later, was also sponsor at her confirmation. As lady governess for Princess Mary, she gained the affection of the queen. Following Thomas Cranmer’s pronouncement of Henry's divorce (1533), Margaret was separated from court, although she returned at the downfall of Anne Boleyn in 1536. In that year her son Reginald, soon to be a cardinal, wrote against the divorce and attacked the king's usurpation of the title of head of the Church in England. While Reginald's blunt outspokenness came from the relative safety of the Continent, it brought reprisals to Margaret and her family. Henry Pole, Lord Montague, a son of Margaret, was charged with treason and beheaded on Tower Hill. A cousin, Henry Courtney, marquis of Exeter, met a similar fate. A third son, Sir Geoffrey, under examination had incriminated his brothers and Exeter.

Parliament, in May 1539, passed an act of attainder against the executed men, Lady Margaret, and Reginald Pole. Thomas Cromwell produced a tunic of Margaret's bearing the five wounds of Christ, the banner of the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE. Without trial, with no crime imputed to her, and upon this sole evidence, Margaret was thrown into the Tower. After two years, she was beheaded with only an hour's warning on the morning of May 27, 1541. Ludovico Beccadelli, Reginald Pole's first biographer, has recorded the words of the cardinal when the news of his mother's death was brought to him at Viterbo: "Until now I thought that God had given me the greatest blessing of being son to one of the best and most honored ladies in England. . .but from now on He has wished to bestow an even greater blessing by making me the son of a martyr. . . .May God's will be done." Margaret was included in the decree of beatification of the English martyrs that was approved by Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886.

Feast: May 28.

POLE, REGINALD

Cardinal, papal legate to the Council of Trent and to England under Queen Mary I, last Roman Catholic archbishop of Canterbury; b. Stourton Castle, Staffordshire, March 3, 1500; d. Nov. 17, 1558, Lambeth Palace, London, a few hours after the death of Mary Tudor. His simple monument is in Canterbury Cathedral near the tomb of Thomas Becket.

Patronage of Henry VIII. Pole's mother was Margaret of Salisbury, later beatified, daughter of George, duke of Clarence, and niece of King Edward IV. Sir Richard Pole, Reginald's father, was a cousin of Henry VII. Thus, Pole, of Tudor and Plantagenet descent, was cousin to King Henry VIII of England. He was tutored by William Latimer, a Greek scholar, was educated at the Carthusian monastery of Sheen and Magdalen College, Oxford, and continued his studies (1519–1527) in Rome, Padua, and Venice. Henry VIII paid for the early education of his kinsman, and Pole never forgot his debt of gratitude. Even in later years when bitter controversy marked their relationship, Pole wrote to him: "May God be my witness that never has the love of a mother for her only son been greater than the love I have always had for you."

On his return to England he refused to support the king's divorce proceedings against Catherine of Aragon, even though Henry offered him the sees of York and Winchester. In a stormy scene with Henry, Pole boldly defied the king. In 1532 he received permission to return to Italy. There an urgent appeal from Henry VIII sought Pole's opinion on the divorce. The result was Pole's Pro ecclesiasticae unitatis defensione (De Unitate) (1534–35), written for Henry VIII alone. It was a classic defense of the papacy and a strong statement of righteous indignation at Henry's moral and political transgressions. He begged Henry to repent and told him: "I can conceive of no greater injury you could inflict upon the Church than to abolish the head of the Church from the face of the earth. . . . Nothing more ignominious could ever have been imagined than this pretentious title of supreme head of the Church in England." Henry, angered by this vigorous tone, reacted by having Pole's brother executed and then by imprisoning Pole's innocent and devout mother, Margaret of Salisbury, in the Tower, where she was later beheaded. In 1536 Pope Paul III created Pole cardinal. At the time of the PILGRIMAGE OF GRACE in England he was named legate, though when he reached Paris in April of 1537, the rising had been crushed, and Pole returned to Italy.

Leader of Reform. In July of 1536, Paul III had appointed Pole, with Cardinal Gian Pietro Caraffa (later Pope Paul IV) and three other prominent reform leaders to a special commission. The Consilium de emendanda ecclesia that resulted was a fearless statement on the existing abuses in the Church and contained the outline of the general reform program for the Council of Trent. In August of 1541, Pole was appointed governor of Viterbo and the Papal States in Italy, where tolerance and kindly sympathy marked his administration. Barely three weeks before the opening of the Council of Trent, on Feb. 22, 1545, Cardinals Giammaria Del Monte, Marcello Cervini, and Pole were empowered to preside. In the absence of one, the other two were to have full authority. At the Council of Trent Pole's dominating personality and his restrained and conciliatory approach impressed the delegates as he reminded them that they themselves were alone to blame for the evils burdening the flock of Christ. He exhorted them to acknowledge the spiritual wickedness existing in high places.

Following the death of Paul III on Nov. 10, 1549, and the political maneuvering at the conclave, Pole received a large number of votes but not the two-thirds necessary for election. The imperialist cardinals offered to elect Pole by acclamation and rendering homage (per adorationem), but Pole refused to cooperate with this devious strategy. After considerable haggling Cardinal Del Monte (Julius III) was elected with the aid of French cardinals who arrived too late to participate in the early voting.

Marian Restoration. In 1554 Pole was appointed papal legate to England. Mary Tudor, his cousin, was now queen. On Nov. 30, 1554, Pole absolved the English nation from schism and brought about the short-lived Catholic Restoration. He made every effort to restrain Mary from excessive retaliation against the Protestants, favoring instead a policy of moderation and reconciliation. He was ordained and consecrated archbishop of Canterbury (1556), and he introduced Tridentine discipline and reforms. Throughout Pole's time as archbishop he was hampered by the unfounded suspicions and criticisms of Paul IV, who distrusted him. Ill health also restricted his effectiveness.

Pole's Achievement. Pole's ideals represented a humanism tempered by personal sanctity, the cultivation of man's intellectual gifts, and unswerving defense of the apostolic succession to the papacy. His moral conduct was above reproach, and compared with the majority of his contemporaries he was conspicuously gentle, both in his opinions and in his language. His learning, generosity, and charity inspired warm friendships. If his total achievements appear minimal, his permanent contribution was in his firm stand on papal supremacy and his reasoned reform program for the Church Universal, which permeated the Council of Trent and later inspired Vatican Council II.

Reginald Cardinal Pole, after 1556 oil painting on panel, by an unknown artist.

Pope Paul VI in Summi Dei Verbum (1963) referred to Pole by recalling his decree to the London Synod of 1556. It was there that Pole first introduced the word seminarium (a seed-bed, seminary) for the proper training of candidates to the priesthood. He urged the bishops to imitate the example of St. Ignatius Loyola and his Roman College by founding adequate seminaries. This decree of Pole's became the model for the canon on the institution of seminaries that emanated from the Council of Trent in the De Reformatione decree approved on July 15, 1563.

POLIGNAC, MELCHIOR DE

Cardinal, diplomat, and apologist; b. Puy-en-Velay, Oct. 11, 1661; d. Paris, Nov. 20, 1742. Polignac studied at the Collège de Clermont and later at the Sorbonne, excelling in Cartesian philosophy. While at Rome in 1689, he refused to subscribe to the four Gallican Articles of 1682, thereby disavowing the schism (see ASSEMBLIES OF FRENCH CLERGY). In 1693 he was made ambassador to Poland by LOUIS XIV, and at the death of King John Sobieski (1696) he succeeded in having Prince François Louis de Conti chosen as candidate for the throne. When the Prince de Conti was displaced by Augustus II, Elector of Saxony, Polignac was recalled and confined to the Abbey of Bomport from 1698 to 1702. In 1704 he was elected to the French Academy to succeed Bossuet; two years later he was named auditor of the Rota and took up residence in Rome. He participated in the conferences of Gertruydenberg and in the Peace of Utrecht (1713). On March 8, 1712, he was created cardinal, and later became archbishop of Auch (1726).

Because he was involved in the conspiracy of A. Cellamare during the minority of Louis XV, he was confined to the Abbey of Auchin in Flanders. While in exile, he composed the famous poem Anti-Lucretius sive de Deo et natura libri novem. In this poem, containing nine books of 1,000 verses each, he refuted the ancient materialism of Lucretius and Epicurus, and that of his contemporary P. Bayle, and demonstrated the existence of God, the supernatural world, and the immortality of the soul.

[I. J. CALICCHIO]

POLISH NATIONAL CATHOLIC CHURCH

The Polish National Catholic Church was established on March 14, 1897 in Scranton, Pennsylvania. It came into existence as a result of the resentment of Polish Catholics to the lack of Polish-speaking clergy and disputes over legal, property, and other administrative issues. Its origins go back to the turn of the century when thousands of Poles arrived in the U.S. and, like most national groups, tended to settle among their own countrymen in Polish-speaking communities located in Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Ohio, Michigan, Illinois, and Wisconsin. The predominantly Irish and German hierarchy and clergy in these areas were unfamiliar with the ways of the Poles, who in turn wanted to have their own priests and to run their own parishes on a trustee basis, contrary to the decrees of the Councils of BALTIMORE. Conflict between the non-Polish clergy and some strongly nationalistic Poles led to small schisms and eventually to the formation of a separate and distinctly Polish National Catholic Church.

The first significant schism occurred in 1895, when Anton Koslowski, an assistant at St. Jadwiga's parish, Chicago, Ill., and a large group of parishioners clashed with the bishop over parochial administration. When Koslowski set up his own church, All Saints, he was excommunicated. After organizing several other parishes, he associated himself with the Old Catholic Church and received episcopal consecration (see OLD CATHOLICS). He then formed The Polish Old Catholic Church, which at the time of his death in 1907 had 23 parishes.

In Scranton, Pa., a similar and far more significant situation arose in 1897 in Sacred Heart parish. The parishioners, who had built the church, wanted to retain control of the property under lay trusteeship, but their bishop could not accept this arrangement and directed that the deed be turned over to the diocese. Under Rev. Francis Hodur, a group of 250 families built another church, St. Stanislaus, which the bishop refused to bless. When Hodur continued as rector after an unsuccessful appeal to Rome for support, he was subsequently excommunicated. Other dissatisfied Polish groups followed Hodur's example and in 1904 formed a synod, electing Hodur its bishop. His consecration by the Old Catholics was postponed until after the death of Koslowski; Hodur then united his church with the Chicago churches to form the Polish National Catholic Church (PNCC). This was externally distinguished from the Roman Catholic Church only by its use of Polish (later, English) in the liturgy and lay control of property and the appointment of pastors.

The sect grew quickly, from 16,000 in 1904 to 62,000 in 1926. It gained many adherents among Polish Catholics who felt at home in its parishes. By the 1950s and 1960s, membership had exceeded 280,000 members.

Hodur remained prime bishop of the church until his death in 1953; however, he did not hold complete authority. This is centered in the general Synod, which meets every four years. The function of the bishop primate is to preside at the Synods and consecrate bishops elected by it, to direct the church's sole seminary in Scranton, and to oversee the church's publications. Hodur himself rejected certain theological truths such as original sin and the existence of hell, but his opinions were not normative for his church. Over the years, decisions of the Synod accepted the teachings of the first four Ecumenical Councils as necessary, thereby deepening their separation from Roman Catholicism. The Synod also declared that there are seven Sacraments. The other five are identical with those of the Catholic Church. Synodal action likewise permitted a married clergy since 1921 and introduced new liturgical feasts expressive of Polish nationalism, such as the Commemoration of the Polish Fatherland. The PNCC catechism justifies its national character in these words: "Christ called all men from all nations and races to serve God, each to contribute its particular spiritual and cultural gifts toward the building of the Kingdom of God on earth."

Under the terms of an agreement made in 1946 between the PNCC and the EPISCOPAL CHURCH, U.S.A., each church admits members of the other to its sacraments; both remain independent and do not necessarily accept the other's doctrinal viewpoint, acknowledging only that the other holds essential Christian faith. However, this sacramental intercommunion was ended in 1978 over the issue of women's ordination in the Episcopal Church.

In 1921 the PNCC established a mission in Poland and in time set up 55 parishes for its 55,000 native Polish communicants. However, in 1951 the Communist regime suppressed all contact between the Polish and American branches. Since that date, a separate national church, the Polish Catholic Church, has been established in Poland.

Ecumenical endeavors have been especially encouraged by Hodur's successor, Leon Grochowski. The church holds membership in the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN THE U.S.A. and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES. It also maintains a close relationship with the Old Catholics of the Declaration of Utrecht.

POLITICAL THEOLOGY

Political theology has two distinct meanings. Firstly, it is the implicit or explicit use of religious symbols to interpret, to justify, or to criticize political events, systems, or units. As implicit, it is almost coexistent with religion. As explicit, political theology is a distinct division of theology which, in middle Stoicism, was distinguished from mythic and natural theology. In the European Enlightenment and Catholic Restoration, it was contrasted with the notion of CIVIL RELIGION, and in the 1960s it was a theological response to existentialism that stressed the public significance of Christian ESCHATOLOGY. Secondly, in its other meaning, political theology stands for a foundational theology that analyzes the interrelation between political patterns and religious beliefs. Their mutual influence is studied to uncover the meaning, truth, and practice of religious symbols.

Historical Analysis. Although both meanings of political theology are quite clear, political theology has often been confused with political ethics or has often been identified either with traditionalism or with LIBERATION theology. A historical survey will underscore its distinctive meaning.

Antiquity. In middle Stoicism, political theology appears along with mythic and natural theology as parts of a tripartite division. This Hellenistic division became current in Roman theology when Pontifex Quintus Mucius Scaevola argued for the necessity of political theology as a defense of the Roman civil religion. This tripartite division is elaborated by Marcus Terentius Varro (116–27 B.C.) in his Antiquities, a major source of information about the tripartite division. Since it is no longer extant, it must be reconstructed from TERTULLIAN's Ad nationes and AUGUSTINE's De Civitate Dei and their discussions of political theology. In this tripartite division, each theology has a specific source, locus, and theme. Mythic theology consists of the poet's narration of divine stories and its locus is the theatre. Natural theology consists of the philosophical world views propounded by the philosophers in their schools. Political theology is attributed to priests and statesmen; its locus is the cities. Varro distinguishes between uncertain and certain gods, elucidates a natural theology, and gives an allegorical interpretation of Roman myths in order to salvage and defend the Roman political theology.

Both Tertullian and Augustine criticize political theology. For Tertullian, valid theology demands criteria of certitude, morality, and universality. Political theology lacks universality, for each city has its own religion. Augustine's criticisms are much more fundamental. Political theology rests upon a mythic theology. If the myths and fables are false, then the political theology is invalid. Likewise it is only as valid as its underlying metaphysical or natural theology. Augustine's analysis and critique contributes several insights. Political theology along with natural and mythic theology are viewed as three fundamentally distinct ways of speaking of God. They are distinct, but are radically intertwined. Moreover, Augustine challenges the adequacy of utilitarianism as a theological criterion of political theology. He argues against the immanence of the Roman natural theology and confronts political theology with his eschatological conception of the City of God.

Enlightenment and Restoration. Distinct evaluations of political theology appear in the ENLIGHTENMENT and Catholic Restoration. The tripartite division of theology is cited by such leading representatives of the Enlightenment as H. Grotius (1583–1645), E. Lord Herbert of Cherbury (1581–1648), P. Bayle (1647–1706), G. Vico (1668–1744) and M. Diderot (1713–1784). Just as they criticize positive religion and seek to replace it with a natural religion, so too do they criticize political theology. Rousseau introduces “civil religion” as a replacement for the confessional political theologies. It should become the basis of the social contract and should encourage citizens to love their civil duties and sacrifice themselves for them. Since the religious wars were seen as the consequences of confessional political theologies, a natural civil religion would avoid such strife. Nevertheless the notion of civil religion faces a dilemma since the particularity demanded by a civil religion is undercut by the universality of natural religion. Social utility and universal truth are often in conflict.

The Catholic Restoration, represented by Catholic nobility in exile, not only elaborated, but also defended, a political theology. J. Donoso Cortes (1809–53), Louis G. A. de Bonald (1754–1840), Joseph de Maistre (1773–1821), Carl Ludwig von Haller (1768–1854), and the early Félicité Lamennais (1782–1854) constitute this restoration and can all be classed under the heading of seeking to reconstitute society on the basis of religion. They perceived the interrelation between political ideas and religious ideas and asserted that changes in religious and philosophical world views led to changes in political patterns. Therefore, they saw the French Revolution as a result of the Enlightenment and criticized both. Against the Enlightenment they argued that no natural religion exists, but only positive religion. Only a positive religion, not a civil religion, could demonstrate its utility for the state. They developed an apologetic for the social necessity of positive religion, gave primacy to the social over the individual, and suggested political utility and common consent as social criteria of theological affirmations. Their political theology underscored the sinfulness of human nature, the need for strong authority, and the Lordship of God and Christ.

Current Usage. In Germany the term political theology was used in the 1960s by Johannes B. Metz to characterize a distinct theological approach and endeavor. It expressed a theological response to the secularization and privatization of religion in industrialized, technocratic societies. Against the individualism and subjectivism of EXISTENTIAL THEOLOGY and philosophy, political theology argued that existentialism failed to come to grips with the privatizing tendencies of modern society. In fact, it only reinforced and justified them. Political theology was therefore proposed primarily as a public theology or political hermeneutics that sought to draw out the public significance and practical import of religious symbols. It especially sought to retrieve the meaning of eschatology as a source of critique and amelioration in the socio-political order (see THEOLOGY OF HOPE).

Since political theology underscores the public significance of faith, it turned toward analyzing the questions of hermeneutics and the theory-practice relation. It sought to distinguish itself from previous Constantinian political theologies and to elaborate a post-Enlightenment conception of theology’s relation to political practice. These issues moved political theology in the direction of fundamental theology.

Systematic Clarification. The historical survey indicates that, despite diverse uses, political theology primarily refers to the implicit or explicit use of religious symbols to legitimate or to criticize political reality. The contemporary use of political theology as response to the Marxist critique is an important shift, for whereas previously political theology justified and legitimated political systems, now it was ordered to their critique.

Although the Enlightenment distinguished between a confessional political theology and a natural civil religion, political theology generally refers to the reflective theological attempt to justify or defend civil or political religions. In its most recent usage, political theology was appropriated precisely as an explicit theological criticism of civil or political religions, even though some would see the civil religion itself as exercising a critical function within a country. This meaning of political theology distinguishes it quite clearly from political ethics and liberation theology.

Distinction from Political Ethics. Political ethics focuses on deontic judgments of moral obligation or on ar-etaic judgments of moral value and rightness; political theology analyzes how religious symbols either legitimate or criticize a political and social order. To the extent, however, that any symbolic vision leads to concrete action, it needs to be complemented by ethical reflection. On this point the advocates of political theology disagree; some demand that a specifically theological ethic as an integral part of the religious vision link theory and practice; others claim that the pluralism of modern society demands a more universal rational ethic.

Distinction from Liberation Theology. Political theology, moreover, differs from liberation theology as the general from the specific. Liberation theology is a specific political theology insofar as it is usually linked with a specific group (Blacks, women, minority groups, underprivileged nations). These appeal to their specific experiences; they then analyze their religious tradition in relation to their experience, and, drawing on their tradition, they propose a concrete vision and praxis of liberation. Since liberation theology is theoretically and practically concerned with the interrelation between religious symbols and political praxis, it is a political theology, but its methodic basis is formed by a specific experience as a starting-point and is ordered to particular political and social goals.

A Foundational Theology. In addition to its primary meaning, political theology has come to be understood as a FOUNDATIONAL THEOLOGY. As such its primary concern is not the practical application of religious symbols, but the analytical and reconstructive task of studying the pragmatics of religious symbols. It investigates their origin, development, and use in relation to the sociopolitical order. Political theology so understood seeks to come to terms with the sociology of religion and the sociology of knowledge insofar as these affect the foundations of faith and the basis of theology. It thereby extends the historical-critical method into a socio-critical method. Whereas the historical-critical method studies the historical context of diverse texts, political theology analyzes the social conditions and political effects of religious beliefs. Political theology would therefore come to grips with a Weberian analysis of the correlation between social status and religious beliefs, with a Durkheimian analysis of the correlation between religious and political patterns of organization, and with the Marxist analysis of the possible ideological function of religion. This foundational task would make systematic theology and theological ethics more explicitly self-reflective of their basis. Its method would not be simply hermeneutical or transcendental, but rather reconstructive, since it would take into account the history of the intertwinement of the religious and the socio-political.

POLLEN, JOHN HUNGERFORD

Historian and journalist; b. London, England, Sept. 22, 1858; d. Roehampton, April 8, 1925. He was the third of ten children born to John H. Pollen, professor of fine arts at the Catholic University in Dublin during Newman's brief rectorship, and Maria Margaret Laprimaudeye, daughter of the future Cardinal MANNING's curate at Lavington. After schooling in Münster, Westphalia, and later at the Oratory, Birmingham, Pollen entered the Society of Jesus in 1877. A year spent, between his philosophical and theological studies, in assisting Father John Morris, then vice-postulator of the cause of the English martyrs, determined the direction his own work was to take; after ordination (1891) he was appointed to the Jesuit House of Writers at Farm Street, London, where he led a life of single-minded devotion to the tasks of research, writing, and lecturing, mainly on the English martyrs and related matters. (See ENGLAND, SCOTLAND, AND WALES, MARTYRS OF.) He became vice-postulator of the cause, in succession to Father Morris, whose "Life" he wrote. He also edited and contributed to sundry volumes published by the Catholic Record Society, and contributed to the "Lives of the English Martyrs," collaborating with Dom Bede Camm, OSB, in the first series, and with Canon E. H. Burton in the second.

For almost 40 years, although not formally attached to the staff of the Jesuit review, the MONTH, he regularly contributed articles that evidenced a first-class historical mind. These soon led to an invitation to speak before the Scottish Historical Society, which resulted in the publication of the documents contained in Papal Negotiations with Mary, Queen of Scots (1901) edited by Pollen with a long introductory study. He returned to the theme intermittently in the pages of the Month until 1922, when he published Queen Mary and the Babington Plot.

Pollen's most considerable work was The English Catholics in the Reign of Queen Elizabeth: A Study of Their Politics, Civil Life, and Government, 1558-1580 (1920). It gave final shape to the conclusions he had reached in piecemeal studies published in the Month over the years, and was generally accepted as at once scholarly and authoritative. It has stood the test of time, as reference to such a work as Philip Hughes's The Reformation in England (5th ed. 1963) clearly indicates.

POLLIEN, FRANÇOIS DE SALES

Carthusian spiritual writer; b. Chèvenoz (Haute-Savoie), France, Aug. 1, 1853; d. Calabria, Italy, Feb. 12, 1936. He was ordained at Annecy in 1877, became a novice at La Grande Chartreuse in 1884, and took his vows the following year. He was coadjutor (i.e., guest master and spiritual adviser) in several charterhouses, became prior at Mougères in 1901, and at Pleterjé (now in Slovenia) in 1911. In 1914 he retired to St. Bruno's in Calabria.

Dom Pollien was accustomed to write as he meditated upon what he had been reading. The Scriptures and SS. Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, and Francis de Sales provided his favorite reading material, but he had the capacity to find inspiration for devout meditation even in juridical documents. His written meditations were sometimes given or lent to those who came to him for counsel, and in this way they began to circulate through Europe, often in more or less inaccurate copies. Several of his works were published, in some cases without his knowledge. He edited none of these writings himself. His La Vie intérieure simplifiée [he preferred unifiée] et ramenée à son fondement, edited by Joseph Tissot in 1894, became a spiritual classic that contributed greatly to the renewal of ascetical and mystical doctrine in the first quarter of the 20th century.

His voluminous La Plante de Dieu (cf. Is 61.3) is a sequel to La Vie intérieure. Whereas La Vie treats mainly the rational “creational” foundations of that life, La Plante is a powerful synthesis of the entire Christian life as far as mystical union, dealing with Christocentric aspects.

POLLO, SECONDO, BL.

Military chaplain, diocesan priest of Vercelli, martyr; b. January 2, 1908, Caresanablot (near Vercelli), Lombardy, Italy; d. December 26, 1941, on the plain of Dragali (near Montenegro), Yugoslavia.

Secondo Pollo completed the minor seminary at Montecrivello, then studied philosophy and theology at the Pontifical Lombard Seminary in Rome. Following his ordination he taught at his alma mater in Montecrivello, while ministering in various parishes, including Cigliano, Borgo d'Ale, Saluggia, Livorno Ferraris, and others. He was particularly gifted as a catechist, preacher, and spiritual director. Later he taught philosophy and theology at the archdiocesan major seminary, served as chaplain of the Italian Youth of Catholic Action (September 1936), and ministered to prisoners. Pollo enjoyed parochial ministry and administered a parish in Larizzate (1940–41) until he was drafted as a military chaplain.

He was assigned to the Val Chisone battalion of the Alpine regiment, which was sent to Montenegro. He died on the battlefield between Italian and Yugoslav forces as he comforted a wounded soldier. The mortal remains of this priest, who was declared venerable December 18, 1997, were translated to Vercelli's cathedral in 1968. Pope John Paul II beatified him, May 23, 1998, during a pastoral visit to northern Italy.

POLTERGEIST

A term that signifies some type of force to which is attributed a set of spontaneous, puzzling, and troublesome occurrences. The term is derived from the German Polter, meaning noise, and Geist, meaning spirit. Paranormal occurrences reported in poltergeist cases are classified by parapsychologists as physical psi-phenomena. These take the form of noises, self-propelled stones, the popping of bottle caps, and the like. Apparently these occurrences are never dangerous to persons, but they are perturbing and frightening.

Poltergeist Phenomena. Series of poltergeist phenomena begin and end spontaneously. Such occurrences differ from the physical phenomena reported in séances. Raps, sounds, and “voices” that are part of a séance have a purpose: usually to confirm the power of the medium. Poltergeist phenomena occur for no obvious purpose and on no special occasion; they are completely unpredictable. For this reason, scientists have difficulty finding reliable methods of investigation. Frequently all that the trained specialist can do is report the occurrences and judge whether or not there is evidence of deception.

Poltergeist activities differ from cases of diabolic possession. In most reports of possession, a human person is possessed or obsessed. A poltergeist “force” remains aloof and operates through no human medium or instrument. Such phenomena differ also from reported cases of “haunted houses.” Poltergeist incidents are of relatively short duration and are of a mischievous nature; “hauntings” are reputed to be more permanent and threatening. Though the name suggests specters and goblins, poltergeist has become a technical term with no religious or occult connotations.

There have been reports of poltergeist phenomena throughout man’s history and from every part of the world. Before man began to investigate such occurrences closely, there was a readiness to believe in the reality of occult phenomena and to attribute them to some ephemeral being. It is difficult to sift the legendary from the real; thus, most reports in history have to be discounted. Nonetheless, there are accounts of poltergeist phenomena that seem above suspicion of deception. Scientific proof does not rest on these alone.

Systematic Study. In England the Society for Psychological Research was founded in 1882 with the express purpose of studying all paranormal phenomena scientifically. Sir William Barrett and other cautious scientists have admitted that deception was not present in all of the many poltergeist cases investigated. Since its foundation the society has tried to study every report of poltergeist occurrence; reports of these investigations can be read in its Proceedings.

Meanwhile Charles Richet devoted himself to the study of poltergeists and other paranormal phenomena in France. His work attracted others: in 1919 the International Metapsychical Institute and in 1941 the French Association for Parapsychological Studies were formed. Both proposed to study psi-phenomena scientifically, although they did not bar practitioners of the occult from membership. In Belgium a similar committee was begun to research paranormal phenomena systematically; mediums and spiritists were there excluded.

In the U.S. the Society for Psychological Research was founded in 1884. Eminent scholars, such as Henry Sidgwick (1838–1900), William JAMES, and Josiah ROYCE, have been members. More than 500 poltergeist phenomena have been carefully investigated. None has been so thoroughly covered as the poltergeist reported at Seaford, N.Y., in 1958. J. G. Pratt, of Duke University, studied this occurrence while it was still active. While fraud was definitely ruled out, this one case did not provide sufficient material on which to base answers to all questions concerning poltergeists.

Explanation. The general conviction of those who have studied poltergeist phenomena is that there is definitely something in operation that cannot be explained by normal physical causes.

Examining the evidence compiled, one can detect some elements of uniformity. There seems to be one person, an “agent,” whose presence coincides with the occurrences. While this person is not the observed performer of poltergeist phenomena, his presence is apparently necessary. Also, such phenomena take place in homes in which there are children. The principal agent considered necessary is most often an adolescent; only rarely is he an adult.

Fraud has been discovered in some cases. Even young people can learn to perform magical tricks, and this could explain some of the reported phenomena. However, certain phenomena cannot be explained as sleight-of-hand. The presence of deception in some cases is not, in itself, reason to suppose that fraud is present in every case. Usually there is no evident motive for fraud. Nothing can be gained by the performance of complicated and difficult pranks, unless it is momentary notoriety. This seems an insufficient motive for all cases. Fraudulent cases would be stopped only by the decision of the deceiver. Yet in some cases the occurrences dramatically ceased after the recital of a religious prayer.

In those cases in which fraud cannot be proved, there is little on which to base a theory or explanation. The popular belief is that these occurrences, since they exhibit a certain intelligence, are the work of a “playful ghost.”

There is no scientific foundation for such an explanation. A more technical hypothesis is proposed: poltergeist phenomena are merely psychokinetic phenomena set in motion by the subconscious mind of some uninhibited person in the household, e.g., the adolescent agent.

The reaction of the Catholic Church to poltergeists is one of caution. In her Ritual and manuals of theology, she advises her subjects to be very slow to attribute such phenomena to angelic or diabolic spirits. When it is clear that the occurrences are of a nonreligious nature, the Church does not interfere—particularly when the phenomena are under scientific investigation. It is only when some theory takes on religious implications that she speaks out. Indeed, she welcomes explanations providing natural or normal causes for occurrences once erroneously believed to be the work of God or the devil.

POLTON, THOMAS

Curialist, bishop; b. Mildenhall, Wiltshire, England, c. 1370; d. Basel, Aug. 23, 1433. A bachelor in laws of Oxford, he became commissary general in the Diocese of BATH AND WELLS. From 1394 he was a regular member of the Roman Curia, becoming an ABBREVIATOR of papal letters by 1401 and prothonotary apostolic by 1414. He was provided to the archdeaconry of Taunton in 1395 and later received other English benefices, some by PROVISION; in 1420 he held the deanery of York, a rectory, and three prebends. Royal pardons for accepting provisions indicate that Polton was useful as an agent for English interests. He returned to England as a papal envoy in 1413 and the next year was appointed King Henry V's proctor at the Curia. Polton was a prominent member of the English delegation at the Council of CONSTANCE. Afterward he resumed his curial duties under Pope MARTIN V, who provided him to the See of HEREFORD in 1420. Although the king recommended that he be promoted to the Diocese of London in 1421, John KEMP was chosen and Polton succeeded Kemp at Chichester. He was appointed a delegate for the English kingdom of France to the Council of Siena. He retired to England shortly before his translation to WORCESTER in 1426 (cf. Cal. Patent Rolls 1422–9, 283, and Rotuli Parliamentorum 3:296). He died while attending the Council of BASEL.

POLTZMACHER, JOHANN

Canonist. He first appears in 1436 as a doctor juris regens in Vienna, where he was dean of the faculty of law intermittently for six terms between 1436 and 1447. He fulfilled various political and diplomatic roles, such as legate to the Diet of Presburg and agent of Albert II. He produced one of the few canonical commentaries to emanate from the University of Vienna, Lectura magistri Johannis Poltmacher, ordinarii juris canonici in generali studio Viennensi, Pataviensis, pro annis 1439 et 1442 secundum Cardinalem et Panormitanum. POLYCARP, ST.

Bishop of Smyrna, 2d-century martyr. Polycarp, a disciple of St. John, probably the Apostle, was visited by IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH in the course of Ignatius's journey to Rome for martyrdom (c. 116); and Ignatius wrote a letter to Polycarp from Troas, as well as a letter to the community at Smyrna. Some 40 years later Polycarp journeyed to Rome as representative of the churches in Asia Minor and dealt with Pope ANICETUS (155–166) on the QUARTODECIMAN question and the date for the celebration of Easter. During his stay in Rome he met many Valentinian heretics and came face to face with MARCION and his followers.

At the age of 86, on a "great Sabbath," Polycarp was put to death in the Stadium at Smyrna, possibly on Feb. 22 or 23, 155 (Mart. Poly. 21), under the Proconsul Statius Quadratus. As EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA (Hist. Eccl. 4.15.1) records his death in the reign of Marcus Aurelius (161–180), it is possible that the date should be between 161 and 169.

Information concerning Polycarp's life, though scanty in detail, is authentic. The acts of his martyrdom (Martyrium Polycarpi) are the earliest-preserved, fully reliable account of a Christian martyr's death; and Irenaeus (Adv. Haert. 3.3.4) and Eusebius (Hist. Eccl. 4.14.3–8; 5.20.4–8; 24.16–17) concur in the main facts. The Vita by Pionius (c. 400), however, is a legendary account of his life.

Polycarp's Letter to the Philippians is preserved in Greek (ch. 1–9.2) and wholly in an early, poor Latin translation. Eusebius recorded also ch. 9 and 13 (Hist. Eccl. 3.36.13–15), The letter was written in response to a request from the community at Philippi, who had also asked Polycarp to furnish them with a collection of the letters of Ignatius. It appears that in the MSS of the letter, ch. 13 is an interpolation that served originally as the covering note to the Ignatian letters (Harrison); while ch. 1–12 (and possibly 14) are a pastoral epistle that Irenaeus described as “a vigorous letter . . . in which those seeking salvation can apprehend the nature of the faith and the teaching of the truth” (Adv. Haer. 3.3.4).

Polycarp based his moral exhortation on the imitation of Christ in his patience (8.2; 9.1). He inculcated Christian virtue following the Gospels and St. Paul (2–3), citing liberally from these NT writings, and included all members of the community in his admonitions; bishop, priests, deacons, married couples, virgins, widows, young men, and orphans (4–6). Almsgiving was an essential practice (10.2), and the Christian was to pray for kings, powers, and rulers, for his enemies and persecutors (12.3–13).

POLYCARPUS

A Canon Law collection, preserved in 14 manuscripts in two forms. The first (13 MSS) was written between approximately 1104 and 1106 by Cardinal Gregory, who lived during the pontificate of Pope Paschal II (1100–18). It is divided into eight books, subdivided into topics that are in turn subdivided into chapters; every topic has a summary preceding it and every chapter a title. The collection contains regulations on all areas of ecclesiastical life and was intended to serve the aims of the GREGORIAN REFORM. Its chief source is the collection of ANSELM OF LUCCA; other sources are numerous concil-iar canons and papal decrees, passages from the letters of Gregory the Great, texts from the Fathers of the Church, etc. The collection, although not widely disseminated, exercised an influence on some later collections. The author of the second form (1 MS) is unknown, but he seems to have been close to the Roman Curia and to have been active about 1120. The number of books is the same as in the first form, but the number of topics has been increased. The new chapters are regularly taken from the same sources as the first form. The second form was less widely disseminated than the first.

[G. MAY]

POLYGLOT BIBLES

Bibles containing the text in several languages, usually in parallel columns, for the purpose of comparison. The term “polygot” is taken from the Greek words, πολύ (many, several) and γλῶσσα (tongue, language). The derivative from better-known Latin words would be “multilingual.” Similarly formed words are “triglot,” “hexaglot,” “heptaglot,” used to designate Bibles in three, six, or seven languages, respectively.

Nature. Strictly speaking, the term polyglot is applied only to a Bible (1) that contains the whole biblical text of the Old and New Testament, according to the author's accepted canon; (2) that at least in its greater part is printed synoptically, i.e., in parallel columns, so that the reader has under his eyes the simultaneous reproduction of the same passage in all the different languages without turning a page—facing pages often being used for this purpose; (3) that contains the original language of each book and its oldest versions. Only a few polyglots fulfill these conditions adequately.

In a wider sense, the term is used when the original text and its ancient versions are reproduced only in part, or when modern translations are used, but hardly when the versions are not printed synoptically.

Purpose. The aim of a polyglot is to facilitate an immediate comparison between the different renderings for the purpose of establishing the genuine text and its interpretation. For various reasons, the era of such Bibles seems to be past, not because they have ceased to be very useful, but because the expenses and the herculean labor they demand are preferably spent on other kinds of equally useful and deeper scientific work, more readily condensed into smaller volumes.

Great Polyglots. The following points must be understood: (1) There is a considerable variety in the presentation of the various texts when dealing with the OT or the NT, or when dealing with the protocanonical or deuterocanonical books or passages. (2) Each polyglot uses its own manuscript sources, by which the individual text must be evaluated. Extensive studies have been published on this subject (Dictionnaire de la Bible 5:513–529). But sometimes the author of a later polyglot merely reproduces the text of an earlier one. (3) Of the major polyglots, only the fourth (Walton) was not published under Catholic auspices; the others were published with the approbation of the ecclesiastical authorities, which, in one case, was only reluctantly granted. (4) No single person is exclusively responsible for any of the major editions. Both the material and the scientific endeavors were shared and distributed among a number of men. Only the names of the most important are listed in the table. The patrons financed and favored and sometimes even initiated the enterprise.

The Complutensis was important for the fact that it was the first Catholic printing of the Hebrew, the Septuagint, and the NT Greek text. The Antwerpiensis was an improvement because of the larger number of languages and the magnificence of its printing. The Parisiensis was ill-fated from the beginning; it had no chance to compete with the Londinensis, which was and remains, as a whole, the best.

The most recent so-called polyglot is the Biblia Polyglotta Matritensis, published in Madrid by the Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas and the Biblioteca de Autores Cristianos. In 1957 the Prooemium and the Psalterium Visigothicum-Mozarabicum were published. The Psalterium S. Hieronymi ex hebraica veritate appeared in 1962. The Targum Palaestinense in Pentateuchum has been announced. All these volumes are critical editions. The whole ambitious plan covers the entire field of the major polyglots, and so far it has been carried out in a very competent way by the foremost Spanish biblical scholars. However, it should not, strictly speaking, be called a polyglot, since each text is edited in a separate volume.

POMBAL, SEBASTIÃO JOSÉ DE CARVALHO E MELLO

Portuguese prime minister; b. Soure, near Coimbra, Portugal, May 13, 1699; d. Pombal, May 8, 1782. The Marquis of Pombal, the title granted in 1770 by which Carvalho is generally known, was the son of Manuel de Carvalho, a cavalry captain and landowner. Pombal served in the army and was later a lawyer. In 1733 he secured a position at the Academy of History. It was at this time that he eloped with Dona Theresa Noronha, niece of Count Arcos, in a marriage opposed by the exclusive Portuguese aristocracy. In 1739, aided by Marc António de Azevedo Coutinho, an important relative, Pombal was sent as minister to London, where he tried to adjust Anglo-Portuguese differences over India, as well as problems arising from Portuguese neutrality during the War of the Austrian Succession. In 1744 he returned to Lisbon, but within a year was sent by King John V to act as Portuguese minister at Vienna and as mediator in a dispute between the King's niece, Empress MARIA THERESA, and Pope BENEDICT XIV. At Vienna he received news of his wife's death. Pombal, a childless widower, married the poor but noble Countess Leonor Ernestina Daun. Two children were born of the second marriage. His mediation successfully concluded, Pombal was recalled to Lisbon (1749), where his diplomatic experience and skill were to be employed by King Joseph I (1750–77), the successor of John V. Pombal, at first minister of foreign affairs and war, and later prime minister, dominated the Portuguese political scene for the entire reign of Joseph I.

Jesuit Controversy. Pombal was called upon to settle a dispute arising from the Colonial Boundary Treaty of 1750, which had settled rival Spanish-Portuguese claims in South America. Under the treaty seven of 30 Jesuit REDUCTIONS (missions) of Paraguay, where the Jesuits had attempted to set up a federation of Christian communities, were placed under Portuguese control. It was an area where 200 priests ruled 140,000 natives. The treaty of 1750 had called for Jesuit and native evacuation and emigration. The resulting resistance led to a series of revolts that lasted for three years. Pombal blamed the Jesuits for this turmoil and opposition. In 1755 Pombal issued an edict freeing the natives, denying civil authority to Jesuits and all priests, and establishing the Gran Pará

Trading Company to carry out all commercial transactions under civilian rule.

That year (Nov. 1, 1755) Lisbon was practically destroyed by a great earthquake and tidal waves. For three days the city was in chaos. Pombal efficiently organized the relief and rebuilding of the stricken city and reestablished law and order with remarkable skill and courage. The destruction of the city made a tremendous impact on all of Europe. A noted Jesuit preacher, Gabriel MALAGRIDA blamed the catastrophe on Pombal and his policies and described the earthquake as God's retribution, a work of divine wrath. Pombal attributed it to scientific causes and a royal edict condemned Malagrida's denunciation. The nobles, however, backed Malagrida against the ambitious and powerful minister.

Jesuit Expulsion. The Jesuit refusal to accept the boundary changes, their opposition to Pombal's scheme to reorganize colonial administration and trade, and their opposition and ill feeling toward him at Lisbon increased tension and led him into his campaign against them. In 1757 Joseph I ordered all Jesuit confessors to leave the court. In February of 1758 a Portuguese protest was filed at the Vatican, enumerating many charges against the Jesuits. Benedict XIV was prevailed upon to appoint Cardinal Saldanha, Patriarch of Lisbon, as Visitor and Reformer of the Society of Jesus. The Jesuits were forbidden by the patriarch to preach or hear confessions (June 1758). Their Portuguese superior was banished from Lisbon and the society stripped of all power and privileges.

A few months later, an effort to assassinate Joseph I (Sept. 3, 1758) gave Pombal another pretext for expelling the Jesuits. The assassination plot was organized by José de Mascarenhas, eighth Duke of Aveiro, and his brother-in-law, Francisco de Assis, third Marquis of Távora, whose wife was a fervent disciple of Malagrida. It was not until December that the plot and assassination attempt were publicly denounced. A decree called for the arrest of the principal conspirators, including Malagrida and 12 prominent Jesuits who were also accused of aiding the plot. In January of 1759 Aveiro and the Távora family were tried and condemned. The Jesuits were imprisoned and many accused nobles were racked, strangled, burned, or beheaded. Pending an appeal to Pope CLEMENT XIII, all Jesuit property in Portugal was to be sequestered. By this time all Jesuits, by order of Saldanha, were confined to their colleges and forbidden to communicate with anyone outside their walls. Pombal's policy was inspired in part by his hatred of the Jesuits and by his "rationalist" policy of establishing royal supremacy and independence in all ecclesiastical matters within Portugal and its colonies.

On Aug. 18, 1759, Clement XIII issued Exponi nobis, a brief granting the Portuguese government the right to put the accused priest conspirators on trial, but the decree did not authorize future trials. A month later Pombal issued a decree of expulsion (Sept. 3, 1759). The Jesuits were accused of crimes against God and King. Those Jesuits not solemnly professed who asked for release were permitted to leave the society. All others were removed without possessions and transported to the Papal States. Nearly 1,100 destitute and half-starved Jesuits were brought to Civitavecchia. Jesuits in Portuguese colonies were brought to Lisbon, where after imprisonment and interrogation they were deported to Rome. Pombal never put any imprisoned Jesuits on trial save Malagrida. Most of them were left in solitary confinement, where they died. The King's scruples probably prevented him from executing them. The unfortunate Malagrida, accused of heresy, blasphemy, and false prophecy, was condemned by the Inquisition and was executed by strangulation, and his body was burned (Sept. 21, 1761). At the time of their expulsion the Jesuits conducted 20 colleges and three seminaries in Portugal, 20 colleges in the islands of West Africa, 13 in Goa, ten in Malabar, and five in China.

Religious and Political Aftermath of the Expulsion. Pombal continued his attack on the Church, ordering the papal nuncio to leave Lisbon and breaking diplomatic relations with Rome. Portuguese bishops were also compelled to exercise powers independent of Rome. In 1761 the former Jesuit schools were secularized, and free schools, as well as a College of Nobles for the children of the aristocracy, were established in their place. An abortive attempt at reconciliation with the papacy in 1767 was followed by further antireligious legislation limiting the amount of money that could be willed for Masses for the dead. Many convents were suppressed and those remaining forbidden to accept novices under 25 years of age. Bishops were appointed without papal approval. Pombal also inspired the publication of Chronological Deductions, a three-volume attack on the nefarious influence of the Jesuits on Portuguese history. Chief author of this masterpiece of vindictive indictment was José Seabra de Silva, later Pombal's secretary of state.

Pombal's expulsion of the Jesuits demonstrated the weakness of the society, and the governments of France, Spain, and Naples were quick to follow the Portuguese example. All the powers clamored for the suppression of the society. At first CLEMENT XIV resisted, but by degrees he modified his opposition. From 1769 to 1770 Pombal and the Pope negotiated an agreement in which Pombal's power over the Church was acknowledged. His brother Paul was given a cardinal's hat, although he died before it arrived at Lisbon. Pombal in return promised to restrain his campaign against the Jesuits. In June 1770 a nuncio returned to Lisbon. By 1773, however, Clement XIV had weakened so much that he issued Dominus ac redemptor, suppressing the Society of Jesus.

In 1756 Pombal had become minister of internal affairs and first minister. In this capacity he attempted to introduce many agricultural and commercial reforms. In his efforts to strengthen the depressed and faltering Portuguese economy, he established and encouraged printing, manufacturing, wine monopolies, and trading companies, and introduced and expanded widespread coffee, sugar, rice, cocoa, and indigo cultivation in Brazil. He reorganized the Portuguese army, rebuilt fortifications, and established a censorship board that, although it licensed or suppressed all books written or imported into Portugal, nevertheless encouraged the distribution of the works of Voltaire, Rousseau, and the Encyclopedists.

His Fall from Power. Pombal exercised almost absolute power over Portugal despite his advanced age. His ruthless methods included torture, bribery, espionage, and terror. He accumulated millions through gifts, pensions, properties and investments. His purchase of confiscated estates and the advantageous marriages of his children to grandes increased his family fortune. His power, however, also depended on the King's cooperation. By 1777 Joseph I was dying, and after Feb. 1, 1777, no edicts appeared under Pombal's name. Queen Maria I succeeded her father on his death (Feb. 24, 1777). Pombal, who had always taken the legal precaution of having the King countersign his edicts, was allowed to resign, but the Queen forbade him to reside within 20 leagues of the court. Pombal lived to see much of his work undone. Prisoners, including 60 surviving Jesuits, were freed; offenses were pardoned. The Távora verdict of 1759 was declared null and void (1780). The clergy persecuted by Pombal were restored. The Gran Pará Company was abolished (1778) and the Treason Tribunal dissolved (1777). Pombal himself was sued by a number of his victims, and despite his poor health he was accused of fraud and murder and stood trial. It ended with Pombal pleading for the mercy of the court (1780). In 1781 he was labeled an infamous criminal, but he was permitted to spend his declining years at his estate. The bishop of Coimbra, whom he had persecuted and imprisoned, consoled him at his death.

POMBEIRO, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine monastery of St. Vincent in Lugo province, Spain; founded in 964 by the widow of Sancho Ordoñez, Queen Goto of Galicia, who gave the surrounding land to Abbot Asterigo and his brothers. In 997 Bermudo II confirmed and increased the donation, but in the late 11th century Alfonso VI subjected the abbey to CLUNY, thus depriving it of its abbatial title and some of its prestige. This loss was real despite the statement of Alfonso VII in a donation of 1139 that the monks served the Almighty, under the governance of Cluny. Pombeiro survived the stormy end of the Middle Ages in Spain without event and in 1527 was attached to the nearby abbey of San Esteban de Rivas del Sil and incorporated into the Benedictine Congregation of Valladolid. The monastery disappeared with the dispersal of the monks in the suppression of religious orders (1834) but its church now serves the parish of the small town that grew up around it.

POMERIUS

Julianus, African ascetical writer; b. Mauretania, North Africa; d. Gaul, after A.D. 498. Nothing is known of the education or ecclesiastical career of Pomerius, who migrated to Gaul, opened a school of rhetoric in Arles, and was ordained to the priesthood. One of his pupils was CAESARIUS OF ARLES. Pomerius attained considerable fame in his lifetime, as is attested by letters addressed to him by several bishops. His treatise De vita contemplativa was famous in the Middle Ages, and owed its preservation to its ascription in most manuscripts to PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, perhaps because of its praise of St. AUGUSTINE. The Jesuit Jacques SIRMOND in the 17th century was the first to cast doubt on the ascription to Prosper; today no one seriously contests that Pomerius is the author of the work.

The De vita contemplativa describes the combined ideals of the contemplative and active life. The first two books are addressed to bishops and concern the manners and asceticism of priests, as a pastoral manual for clerics, and the third book is addressed to all Christians. Pomerius intended to set forth in the first book the contemplative life; in the second, the active life; and in the third, the vices and virtues of Christians. His distinction between the active and the contemplative life is founded on states of soul: that of the soul seeking perfection (the active life) and that of the soul possessing and enjoying it (the contemplative life). This conception is less exteriorized than the modern notion and seemingly more profound. The style is generally clear and smooth, more elegant than vigorous. Pomerius's knowledge of secular literature appears in his quotations from Terence, Cicero, and Vergil and in echoes from other authors.

From the middle of the 8th to the late 9th century the authority of the De vita contemplativa all but rivaled that of the leading Latin Fathers. BONIFACE quoted from it in 747, and several decades later it was mentioned by CHRODEGANG, Bishop of Metz. Copious quotations from it appear in the Church councils of the 9th century. Almost a 100 manuscripts of the work exist in codices of widely diverse provenience that date from the 8th to the 15th centuries.

Pomerius wrote three other works. Two of them, De virginibus instituendis and De contemptu mundi, have completely disappeared; but his eight books in dialogue form, De anima et qualitate eius, are known from summaries in Pseudo-Gennadius (Vir. ill. 99) and Isidore of Seville (Vir. ill. 25).

POMMEREL, CELESTINE, MOTHER

Religious superior; b. Feillens, Burgundy, France, April 7, 1813; d. Carondelet, Mo., June 17, 1857. As the daughter of André and Louise (Pommiers) Pommerel, she was baptized Marie. Although educated by the Sisters of St. Charles in Mâcon, France, she entered the novitiate of another community, the Sisters of St. Joseph, in Lyons, France. As Sister Celestine she received the habit on May 18, 1831, and made her vows on Oct. 15, 1833. She then taught in the Diocese of Chambery until the superior general, Mother St. John Fontbonne, selected her for the missions in St. Louis, Mo. Following a year's preparation in working with the deaf, Sister Celestine arrived in St. Louis on Sept. 4, 1837. After teaching for two years at Carondelet, near St. Louis, she became the first superior general of the Sisters of St. Joseph in the United States. By 1840 she had founded the novitiate of the Sisters of St. Joseph of Carondelet, opened the first U.S. school for the deaf, established seven elementary schools (one for black children), and formed a Native American mission. She also built three hospitals and established novitiates in Wheeling, W. Va.; Philadelphia, Pa.; Toronto, Canada; St. Paul, Minn.; and Buffalo, N.Y. At her death she left 149 sisters to continue her work.

POMPALLIER, JEAN BAPTISTE FRANÇOIS

Missionary bishop in OCEANIA; b. Lyons, France, Dec. 11, 1801; d. Puteaux, near Paris, Dec. 21, 1871. Pompallier, who came from a family of silk manufacturers, was ordained in 1829. In 1836 he was appointed vicar apostolic of the newly created Vicariate Apostolic of Western Oceania, and he sailed from The Havre with the first group of MARIST FATHERS to evangelize the Pacific islands. On the way to NEW ZEALAND, his eventual destination, Bishop Pompallier left Pierre BATAILLON with one brother on Wallis Island and St. Peter CHANEL with another brother on nearby Futuna Island. Pompallier, accompanied by one priest and one brother, landed in New Zealand on Jan. 10, 1838.

Despite prolonged Protestant hostility, the vicar apostolic's success was remarkable. Two mission stations existed by January 1840, when British rule was established. In 1841 Pompallier reported about 1,000 Maoris baptized and another 45,000 under instruction. By 1844 there were 12 stations, 16 priests, 11 lay missionaries, 2,166 baptized Maoris, and about 1,400 European Catholics. The vicariate was divided in 1842 when the Vicariate Apostolic of Central Oceania was created, with Bataillon as its first vicar apostolic.

Pompallier visited Rome in 1846. His differences with Marist superiors induced the Holy See in 1848 to divide New Zealand into two dioceses. The Marists were transferred to Port Nicholson (later Wellington) in the south, with Philip Viard, SM, as bishop. Pompallier returned in 1850 with ten secular clerics to head the Diocese of Auckland. Retaining priests was a constant problem; despite fresh recruits, he had only ten in 1859. He returned from Europe in 1860, however, with 20 more. Maori wars during the 1860s and economic depression (1866–67) crippled missionary endeavors. When further support from Europe failed to materialize, Pompallier returned to France and resigned his see (1869). He had an impressive bearing, a winning personality, and a talent for attracting native peoples by his cordiality and respectful manner, but his forte was extension, not consolidation. He was one of the century's leading missionaries.

POMPONAZZI, PIETRO

Italian philosopher; b. Mantua, Sept. 16, 1462; d. Bologna, May 18, 1525. Pomponazzi, the son of a wealthy and noble family, studied at the University of Padua under the eminent Aristotelian, Nicolettus Vernias, and received a degree in medicine there in 1487. The next year he began teaching at the same university and continued to do so (except for a three-year interruption) until the university was closed in 1509. He then taught at Ferrara for one year and in 1511 went to the University of Bologna, where he taught until his death.

During his stay at Bologna, Pomponazzi published several philosophical works, the most important being On the Immortality of the Soul (Bologna 1516), which defended the position that the immortality of the soul cannot be demonstrated by reason but must be accepted on faith alone. This writing, though severely attacked, was never actually condemned by the Church. Soon afterward, Pomponazzi wrote two separate defenses: the Apologia (Bologna 1518), written against Gasparo CONTARINI, and the Defensorium (Bologna 1519), directed against Agostino NIFO. In 1520 he completed two other important works: De fato, libero arbitrio, praedestinatione et providentia Dei (Basel 1567) and De incantationibus (Basel 1556). At his death he left a number of unpublished works, the majority of which still remain in manuscript.

Pomponazzi has attracted attention in the 20th century for modern elements in his thought that anticipated attitudes common to 17th-century scientists. His On the Immortality of the Soul shows a favorable attitude toward reason and a reliance on sense experience that were uncommon in his day. The conclusions to which he came, combined with his professed orthodoxy and willingness to submit to the authority of the Church, led him to adopt what has been called the theory of DOUBLE TRUTH. Thus he held the immortality of the soul on the authority of the Church's teaching, but denied that this immortality could be demonstrated by reason unaided by faith.

POMPOSA, ABBEY OF

Former Benedictine abbey four miles from Codigoro in the Province of Ferrara and Diocese of Comacchio (Emilia), Italy. The remains of an inscription date the existence of the primitive church from the 7th century, but written records go back only to the 9th century. A letter of Pope John VIII (874) attests that the monastery came directly under the authority of the Holy See. Later it passed under the temporal jurisdiction of the archbishops of Ravenna, until Emperor Otto III made it a royal abbey. Its power increased with imperial and papal privileges and with donations from princes and private persons alike. From the 11th century on, Pomposa held large estates of cultivated land, as well as salt and fishing marshes. The abbot, as a prince of the Empire, exercised wide ecclesiastical and civil jurisdiction, and gave judgment according to the statutes of the abbey. It was a center of cultural activity as early as the 11th century; PETER DAMIAN wrote part of his works there, GUIDO OF AREZZO spent his youth at the abbey composing his musical system, and Emperor Otto II and the poets Dante and Tasso were its guests. In the 16th century increasingly bad climatic conditions and earthquakes obliged the monks to transfer to Ferrara, where the Duke of Este had offered land for a new monastery (San Benedetto). Pomposa itself continued to be used as a secular parish.

The numerous codices and manuscripts from the abbey's archives and library were dispersed when the abbey was suppressed during the Napoleonic period. The chief monuments remaining at Pomposa today are the basilica, the oldest building, with splendid mosaics and frescoes; the bell tower (11th century) in the Lombard style; and the Palazzo della Ragione, where the abbots administered justice. After the Napoleonic suppression it became private property and was turned into a farm. In the last few decades, however, considerable restoration has been undertaken.

PONCE, ALONSO

Franciscan chronicler; b. Castile, probably Ciudad Real, date unknown; place and date of death unknown. Ponce went to New Spain in 1584 as commissary general of his order. Between 1584 and 1592 he traveled 2,000 leagues, visiting the Franciscan provinces of Mexico, Guatemala, Honduras, San Salvador, Nicaragua, Costa Rica, and Granada. Some Franciscans denied Ponce's authority and he excommunicated them. Viceroy Villamanrique then ordered the exile of Ponce, who was obliged to embark "under the staff of authority." Providentially the ship landed at Campeche, Mexico, and Ponce continued his visitation. The king confirmed him in his post and later summoned him to Spain. Fray Alonso de San Juan and Fray Antonio de Ciudad Real accompanied Ponce on his journeys and probably wrote the Relación breve y verdadera de algunas cosas de los muchas que sucedieron at P. Fray Alonso Ponce en las provincias de Nueva España siendo comisario general de aquellas partes. This famous and interesting work is a description of geography, hydrography, customs, clothing, climates, and crops. It is an unsurpassed work for the study of the first century of the Spanish colony and of many pro-Hispanic antiquities.

PONCE, MANUEL MARÍA

Popular Mexican composer, pianist, and teacher; b. Fresnillo (Zacatecas), Dec. 8, 1882; d. Mexico City, April

Manuel María Ponce. (©CORBIS)

24, 1948. At ten he was a choirboy; at 15, organist at San Diego church, Aguascalientes, where his brother was a priest. In 1906, after studying with Luigi Torchi in Bologna, he made his piano début in Berlin. In 1912 he was soloist at the première of his Piano Concerto, his first large work, in Mexico City. Gradually he turned less to European classics than to the Spanish-American melos for inspiration, and his ingratiating canciones mexicanas (including Estrellita) appeared in 1914. During another extended European residence (1925–32), his style matured contrapuntally and harmonically, and thereafter he made imaginative use of native materials. In 1941 he made a highly successful South American tour, during which his Concierto del Sur for guitar and orchestra (Andrés Segovia, soloist) had its first hearing. As a teacher Ponce introduced DEBUSSY and other moderns to Mexico City, and one of his first pupils was the distinguished composer Carlos Chávez.

PONTANUS ROMANUS, LUDOVICUS

Canonist; b. Spoleto, 1409; d. Basel, 1439. He was a student at Rome, assuming for this reason the surname Romanus. After pursuing his studies at Perugia and Bologna, he became a doctor in 1429. In 1431 he was nominated as an auditor of the Apostolic Camera. As a professor at Siena he compiled his famous Singularia, a series of legal questions, which he recorded daily in a notebook for future publication. By 1444, only five years after his death, they were widely known and circulated. He became a member of the Papal Curia in 1435 and was sent as an envoy to the Council of Basel to safeguard the interests of Alfonso V of Aragon. He was associated with PANORMITANUS at Basel. His premature death of plague brought to a close a decade of exceptional canonical studies. Besides the classic Singularia, he wrote commentaries on the Corpus Iuris Civilis, Digestum vetus, Digestum novum, and the Codex.

PONTAS, JEAN

Moral theologian; b. Saint-Hilaire-du-Harcouet, Dec. 31, 1638; d. Paris, April 27, 1728. He studied at Rennes and Navarre and at the age of 25 was ordained. After receiving his doctorate in Canon Law, he became vicar of Sainte-Genevieve-Ardents in 1666 and sub-penitentiary at Paris in 1693. Although he wrote a number of works during his active career, his most important work was published during the long years of his retirement. The Dictionnaire des cas de conscience appeared first in two volumes (Paris 1715), but was followed by a supplement of three volumes in 1718. The entire work was reedited in 1724 and 1726, and several times edited after his death. Numerous editions were published in both French and Latin translation in the 18th century. Benedict XIV regarded Pontas as an eminent theologian.

PONTIANUS, POPE, ST.

Pontificate: July 21, 230 to Sept. 28, 235. The Liber pontificalis states that Pontianus was from Rome and presided over that see for five years. Little is known of his pontificate, but the Roman church enjoyed peace under the tolerant emperor Severus Alexander (222–35). Alexander's successor, Maximus Thrax (235–238) exiled Pontianus to Sardinia with the theologian and antipope, HIPPOLYTUS. After maltreatment, he died in October of 235. His body and that of Hippolytus, with whom he had been reconciled, were returned to Rome for burial by Pope FABIAN in 236 or 237.

Pontianus may have been the first occupant of the new bishop's grotto in the Cemetery of Callistus. The DEPOSITIO MARTYRUM published by the CHRONOGRAPHER OF 354 lists him as the first Roman bishop-martyr, while his epitaph also lists him as a martyr; he is so celebrated. The date he resigned the episcopacy, Sept. 28, 235, although this designation is obviously an addition to the original inscription, is the oldest precise date in the history of popes. Under his direction a Roman synod reaffirmed the excommunication of ORIGEN pronounced by two Alexandrian councils in 231–232.

Feast: Nov. 19.

PONTIFF

This term, borrowed from the vocabulary of pagan religion at Rome, made its way early into Christian discourse. Lexicographers derive it, although with clear misgivings, from the Latin words pons (bridge) and facere (to make, build). If this derivation is accepted, it is easy to see how readily it applies to those who build a bridge to make a way for men to God. Nevertheless, in Roman religion it designated members of the council of priests forming the Pontifical College, which ranked as the highest priestly organization at Rome and was presided over by the pontifex maximus.

It is not clear when the term first made its appearance as a designation for Christian religious leaders, or whether Tertullian's ironic use of the designation pontifex maximus (in his De pudicitia, c. A.D. 220) for a Catholic bishop represents current terminology or not. In the Vulgate pontifex is used in Hebrews as a translation for the Greek ἀρχιερεύς (chief priest, high priest).

In present ecclesiastical usage the term "pontiff" (with its derivatives, "pontifical" and the verb "pontificate") is applied to bishops and especially to the pope. Although for the sake of clarity we still prefix supreme (sovereign) or Roman to the word pontiff in designating the pope, it is generally to him that there is reference when we speak of "the pontiff." The reference to all bishops is maintained in such expressions as "the Common of Confessor Pontiff" (in the Roman Missal and Breviary), "all holy pontiffs and confessors" (an invocation in the Litany of Saints). In the derived forms, too, the reference at times is clearly to all bishops: the Roman Pontifical is the liturgical book that contains the rites and formulas for liturgical acts performed by all bishops; and bishops (and certain other dignitaries) are said to pontificate when they celebrate the Eucharistic sacrifice and perform other liturgical acts with all the insignia of their office or dignity.

It is to be noted, however, that the English adjective pontifical has come more and more to designate that which is concerned with or belongs to the pope. Thus when institutes, colleges, universities, atheneae, and societies are described as pontifical, the adjective indicates that the corporation in question has been directly established or approved by the pope or is immediately dependent upon him. In the Code of Canon Law (c.488.3) religious congregations that have received approbation from the Holy See are technically described as of "pontifical right"; others not yet so approved are said to be of "diocesan right." And when the expression "pontifical teaching" or "pontifical document" is employed, the reference is clearly to the Holy Father. The same exclusive reference is found in the cognate noun form pontificate (e.g., "in the pontificate of").

As a consequence of this restriction of meaning, the term that in earlier times looked to fullness of priestly and sacramental power (possessed by all bishops) is gradually becoming one that denotes the fullness of pastoral and teaching power and therefore applies (without addition of supreme or Roman) to the pope alone.

PONTIFICAL, ROMAN

In Latin, Pontificale Romanum; one of the books of the Roman liturgy, it contains the rites for ordinations, consecrations, and all other liturgical rites and ceremonies reserved to bishops. The Roman Pontifical has its source in the early Roman Sacramentaries and Ordinals. Beginning with the 8th century, however, attempts were made to collect into one book the various rites proper to the bishop. The Pontifical of Egbert, archbishop of York (736–766), and the Pontifical of Poitiers (c. 800) are examples of this procedure. A more direct forerunner of the Roman Pontifical is seen in the Romano-Germanic Pontifical of the 10th century. Michel ANDRIEU gave this name to a compilation of 10th-century manuscripts containing episcopal rites and published part of it in the Ordo L in volume 5 of his Ordines Romani du haut moyenâge (Louvain 1962). Brought to Rome by the Ottos, it was adapted and later appeared in the 12th century as a papal pontifical. In the 13th century, the Roman Curia accepted an edition from Avignon.

In 1294 Bp. William DURANTI, the Elder of Mende, France, wrote a new edition for his diocese which, in less than a century, was used in nearly every European diocese. He transcribed some prayers of identical meaning, allowing bishops a choice, but this was discontinued in subsequent editions and repetitions became obligatory. Innocent VIII (d. 1492) charged Agostino Patrizi and John Burckard (d. 1506) with revising Duranti's book for the Roman Curia. This revision was approved on March 2, 1486, but it was not made obligatory. After several further revisions, by Alberto Castellani in 1520 and Pius V in 1561, Clement VIII in 1596 promulgated an official edition and forbade the use of any other pontifical in the Latin Church.

Until 1961 the pontifical remained unchanged. In that year a revision was prepared by a commission named by Pius XII (d. 1958). Promulgated by John XXIII (d. 1963) this was but a reform of Part II, in which some rites were reduced and placed into more logical order, and from which other repetitious, obsolete, or seldom-used ceremonies were eliminated. In its Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, Vatican Council II ordered a revised edition of Parts I and III.

In the wake of Vatican II, the various liturgical rites of the pontifical were revised in stages, in keeping with the directives of Vatican Council II (Sacrosanctum Concilium 25, 71, 76, 80). Translations of these, prepared by the INTERNATIONAL COMMISSION ON ENGLISH IN THE LITURGY (ICEL), were first published separately. In 1978 the Roman Pontifical, Part I, appeared as a compilation of these rites. Except for two additions, the book corresponds in scope to the Pontificale Romanum, of Clement VIII, promulgated in 1596 in compliance with the decree of the Council of Trent on the matter (Session 25, Dec. 4, 1563; in Conciliarum oecumenicorum decreta 3d ed., p. 797).

The following are the contents of the 1978 Roman Pontifical. Part One contains rites for the celebration of the Sacraments of Christian Initiation, i.e., Baptism, Confirmation, and the Eucharist, along with the rites of admission to the catechumenate and reception of baptized Christians to full communion. At all of these rites the accompanying instructions recommend that the bishop preside (although priests may and often do so). Part Two is on the institution of lay ministers, specifically of readers and acolytes. Part Three contains the rites of ordination of deacons, presbyters, and bishops; also of admission to candidacy for diaconate and presbyterate and of commitment to celibacy (the latter as a part of diaconal ordination for unmarried men). Part Four comprises blessings for persons publicly dedicated to God: the rite of consecration to a life of virginity, the blessing of an abbot or abbess. In addition, the Roman Pontifical contains two other rites, belonging to Part II of the Pontificale: the Blessing of Holy Oils and Consecration of Chrism (English, 1972) and the rite for the dedication of a church and altar.

PONTIFICAL ACADEMIES

Pontifical academies are loose networks of scholars and representatives of various professions organized by the Holy See for the advancement of the arts, science, and culture. Each has its own by-laws and, in most cases, the members are appointed by the Roman pontiff. The Annuario Pontificio for the year 2000 lists the following pontifical academies: (1) the Pontifical Academy of Sciences; (2) the Pontifical Academy of Social Science; (3) the Pontifical Academy for Life; (4) the Pontifical Academy of St. Thomas Aquinas (formerly the Pontifical Academy of St. Thomas and Catholic Doctrine, founded in October, 1879); (5) the Pontifical Academy of Theology; (6) the Pontifical Academy of Our Lady Immaculate, founded in 1835; (7) the Pontifical International Marian Academy, founded in 1946; (8) the Distinguished Pontifical Academy of Arts and Letters of the Pantheon Virtuosi, founded in 1543; (9) the Pontifical Roman Academy of Archaeology, founded in 1810; and (10) the Pontifical Academy of the “Cult of the Martyrs,” founded in 1879. There have been other pontifical academies in the course of the centuries. Those listed here represent true pontifical academies. Additionally, institutions such as the Pontifical Ecclesiastical Academy, formerly known as the Academy of Noble Ecclesiastics, founded in 1701, enjoy the prerogatives of a pontifical academy, but are entrusted with special duties in service to the Church’s diplomatic corps.

The most prominent pontifical academy is the Pontifical Academy of Science, the senatus scientificus, according to Pope Pius XI, dedicated to the mathematical, physical, and natural sciences. It attempts “to pay honor to pure science, wherever it is found, and to assure its freedom and to promote its research, which constitute the indispensable basis for progress in science.” At its full complement the membership stands at 80, a number established by Pope John Paul II in 1986. This academy is directly responsible to the Holy Father, who appoints the members, and its expenses are met through the Patrimony of the Holy See. Members, regardless of religious confession, are drawn from different countries, and they are appointed for life. By reason of their office, the directors of the Vatican Observatory and its Astrophysical Laboratory and the prefects of the Vatican Library and the Secret Archives of the Vatican are appointed “Academics pro tempore.”

The Pontifical Academy of Sciences has its roots in the Academy of the Lincei (Accademia Linceorum, from its emblem, a lynx) which was founded in Rome in 1603 by Federico Cesi, Giovanni Heck, Francesco Stelluti, and Anastasio de Filiis, all contemporaries and sometime rivals of Galileo. In 1847 Pope Pius IX reestablished the Academy as the Pontifical Academy of the New Lincei. Pope Pius XI renewed and reconstituted the academy in 1936, and bestowed upon it its present name. The academy’s activities range from a traditional interest in pure research to a concern with the ethical and environmental responsibility of the scientific community. The premises of the academy are in the Casina Pio IV, built in 1561, and it is there that members gather in plenary session.

The Pontifical Academy of Social Sciences was founded by Pope John Paul II on Jan. 1, 1994, with the motu proprio called Socialum scientiarum. Its statutes indicating that its objective to promote “the study and progress of the social, economic, political and juridical sciences, and of thus offering the Church the elements which she can use in the study and development of her social doctrine.” The academy is autonomous and at the same time, maintains a very close relationship with the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, with which it coordinates the planning of various initiatives. Its academicians are named by the pope and their number cannot be fewer than 20 nor more than 40. They are chosen because of their high level of competence without distinction to religious denomination. In its early years, the academy centered its plenary sessions and workshops on three themes: work and employment, in 1996, 1997, and 1999; democracy in 1996, 1998, and 2000; and social dimensions of globalization in 2000 and 2001. The headquarters of the academy are in the Casina Pio IV, in the Vatican Gardens. The Pontifical Academy for the Social Sciences has its own foundation to provide for its financial needs.

With the motu proprio titled Vitae mysterium of Feb. 11, 1994, John Paul II instituted the Pontifical Academy for Life. Its primary objective is to study problems of biomedicine and law, especially as they relate to the promotion and defense of life, in accord with Christian morality and the directives of the Church’s magisterium. The Vitae Mysterium Foundation, instituted in October 1994, finances this academy which is linked to the Pontifical Council for Pastoral Assistance to Health Care Workers and various other dicasteries of the Roman Curia committed to the service of life. Seventy members are named by the pope and represent different branches of the biomedical sciences. The academy’s activities focus on issues related to the HUMAN GENOME Project and specifically on the identity, localization, heterogeneity, and the mutability of those genes which constitute the hereditary patrimony of humanity. Further, because of the substantial unity of the body with the spirit—corpore et anima unus: una summa—the human genome has not only a biological significance, but is the bearer of an anthropological dignity, which has its foundation in the spiritual soul which pervades it and vivifies it (cf. Discourse of His Holiness John Paul II to Members of the Academy, Feb. 24, 1998).

The Pontifical Academy of St. Thomas took on renewed significance in view of Pope John Paul’s encyclical FIDES ET RATIO (1999), in which the pontiff made a sustained plea for the value of the Angelic Doctor’s work among moderns (see especially no. 57). Similarly, Fides et Ratio (nos. 92–99) would have the Pontifical Academy of Theology assist in the promotion of the sacred sciences, but always in dialogue with and in light of contemporary culture.

The Pontifical Academy of Our Lady Immaculate grew out of a small circle of students at the Gregorian University in Rome and became recognized by the Sacred Congregation for Studies, as it was then called, in 1847. One of its traditions has been presenting a “floral homage” before the statue of Mary Immaculate in the Piazza di Spagna on December 8. Pope John Paul II approved the new statutes for the academy in 1988 and 1995. Another Marian academy, the Pontifical International Marian Academy, founded by Carlo Balić, OFM, in 1946, promotes historical studies related to the Virgin Mary. In this connection (and largely through Balić’s own scholarship), the academy has helped sponsor the herculean effort to develop a critical edition of the works of John Duns Scotus. It was also charged with the organization of various Marian congresses throughout the world. Raised to the status of a pontifical academy by Pope John XXIII in 1959 through the motu proprio called Maiora in dies, the academy enjoys a continued working relationship with the Friars Minor at the Antonianum in Rome.

Of the three remaining pontifical academies, the Academy of the Arts is the oldest, with a history stretching back to Pope Paul III in 1542. Its statutes were revised and approved by Pope John Paul II in 1995. The academy seeks to support sculptors, writers, architects, film makers, musicians, poets, and painters. The academy works cooperatively with the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR CULTURE, and its virtuosi are nominated by the Holy Father. The Pontifical Academy of Roman Archaeology (formerly the Academy of Roman Antiquities) was founded in 1810, becoming a pontifical academy in 1829 under Pius VIII. It seeks to promote the study of archaeology and the history of ancient and medieval art. The Cardinal Secretary of State is its protector. Finally, the Pontifical Academy of the Cult of the Martyrs was founded as the Collegium Cultorum Martyrum in 1879 and collaborates with the Congregation for Divine Worship and the Discipline of Sacraments. Its work involves liturgical studies, archeology, and hagiography. Its statutes were revised and approved in 1995. The academy is historically based at the German College in Rome.

PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION

In the history of the Pontifical Biblical Commission a sharp distinction must be made between its form and function before and after the Second Vatican Council.

Before Vatican II

The Pontifical Biblical Commission was created by Pope LEO XIII in 1902 through his Apostolic Letter Vigilantiae (Enchiridium biblicum. Documenta ecclesiastica Sacram Scripturam spectantia [Naples-Rome² 1954] 137–148). Its function was, according to this founding document, “to strive and effect with all possible care that God’s words will both be given, everywhere among us, that thorough study that our times demand and will be shielded not only from every breath of error but even from every rash opinion.”

The pre-Vatican II Commission consisted of a limited number of cardinals, named by the pope, the majority belonging to the Roman CURIA. To these members were joined as consultors Catholic biblical scholars from various tendencies and countries though most resided in Rome. The seat of the Commission was Rome. From 1938 until the post-Vatican reorganization the president of the Commission was Cardinal Tisserant. The last four secretaries were J. M. Vosté (1939–49); A. Miller (1949–58); A. Kleinhans (1958–62); and B. N. Wambacq from 1963 until the reorganization.

Activities. Between 1905 and 1953 a number of decrees or Responsa (“answers”) were issued. Some of those from the period 1905–1915 are well known for their negative impact, e.g., the Responsa on the narratives in the historical books (1905; EB 161), on the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch (1906; EB 181–184), on the authorship of the book of Isaiah (1908; EB 291–295), and on the historical character of the first three chapters of Genesis (1909; EB 336–343). Particular publications were judged to be inaccurate and their use in Catholic schools was forbidden.

The letter written by Commission’s secretary to Cardinal Suhard of Paris (1948) struck a positive note. It allowed Catholic scholars considerable liberty “concerning the time of the documents of the Pentateuch and concerning the literary genre of the first 11 chapters of Genesis” (EB 577–581). The last intervention of the Commission occurred during the Council by way of the instruction Sacra Mater Ecclesia (1964; DS 3999) on the historical truth of the gospels. The open-mindedness of the document was praised, especially because of its distinction among the three stages of the gospel tradition: what Jesus of Nazareth actually did and said, what the disciples and apostles preached about what Jesus said and did, and what the evangelists wrote down from that preaching. Consequently, the gospels cannot be regarded as direct reports of the facts about and the words of Jesus. The content of this instruction has been integrated into the Dogmatic Constitution Dei Verbum of Vatican II (1964, paragraph 19).

Before its reorganization by Pope PAUL VI, the Pontifical Biblical Commission functioned as an organ of the magisterium. Twice, in 1907 and 1910, PIUS X emphasized that the decisions of the Commission require religious assent: "All are bound in conscience to submit to the decisions of the Pontifical Commission pertaining to doctrine, whether already issued or to be issued in the future, in the same way as to the decrees of the Sacred Congregations approved by the Pontiff; nor can they avoid the stigma both of disobedience and temerity or be free from grave sin who by any spoken or written words impugn these decisions" (1910, EB 341).

The rise of MODERNISM in the early years of the Commission explains, to a great extent, the defensive and apologetic character of many Responsa that caused serious conflicts of conscience for many Catholic scholars. Later letters and instructions manifested a more open approach, especially thanks to the encyclical Divino afflante Spiritu (1943; EB 538–569).

From 1904 until 1928 the Pontifical Biblical Commission alone had the power to grant Catholic academic doctoral degrees in Scripture.

After Vatican II

The Pontifical Biblical Commission was restructured by Paul VI through the promulgation of the apostolic brief Sedula Cura in 1971. The stated reasons for this action were both the prescription of Vatican II, "that the rich treasures of the word of God be made more amply and plentifully accessible to the faithful," and the fact that "progress of modern scholarship daily presents new questions in this discipline which are not easy to solve."

The two most notable changes in the nature of the reformed Biblical Commission are its close linking with the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith and the constitution of its membership by biblical scholars and not, as formerly, by cardinals, who were assisted in their function by scholars merely as consultants.

The new regulation, which can be compared with the statutes of the International Theological Commission (created in 1969), is set forth in 15 points. (1) The chief function of the Commission remains that "of rightly promoting biblical studies and of offering assistance to the magisterium of the Church in interpreting Scripture." (2)

Its president is "the Cardinal Prefect of the Sacred Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith." (3) The membership is limited to 20 scholars "from various schools and nations," considered to be "outstanding for their learning, prudence and Catholic regard for the magisterium." (4) They are appointed by the pope on the recommendation of the cardinal president, "after consultation with the episcopal conferences," for five years, a term that may be renewed. (5) The secretary is appointed by the pope for five years; he is also named a consultant of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. (6) A plenary meeting of the Commission is to be convoked annually. (7) Subcommissions may be set up to study particular problems, and can consult "other experts, including non-Catholics." (8) Consultation of the membership by letter is made possible. (9) The pope or the president designate the questions to be studied. These may be proposed by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, by the Synod of Bishops, the episcopal conferences, the Biblical Commission itself, or by Catholic universities and biblical societies. (10) Conclusions reached in plenary session are to be submitted to the pope for use by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. (11) This latter body may "publish with special mention of the Biblical Commission" instructions or decrees "which are the fruit of the scholarly investigation of the members." (12) Relations with "institutions of biblical studies, both Catholic and non-Catholic," are to be cultivated by the Commission. (13) Before new norms concerning Scripture are issued within the Church, the Commission is to be consulted. (14) The Commission continues to confer academic degrees in biblical studies, but its members do not, as such, conduct the examinations leading to these degrees, as formerly. (15) Finally, secrecy "in keeping with the character and importance" of its business is to govern its transactions.

Paul VI appointed the 20 members of the postconciliar Commission in 1972. Bishop A.-L. Descamps, former rector of the Catholic University of Louvain, was named secretary in 1973. Although the international and collegial character of this postconciliar body is assured, it has been more than once noticed that in the first five terms (1972–2000) no woman scholar was a member of the Pontifical Biblical Commission.

The first plenary session of the Commission took place in 1974; its activities were devoted to reviewing the norms for examinations and degrees in biblical studies. The investigation of the second and the third sessions concerned the Conditio mulieris in Sacra Scriptura (1975) and De munere mulieris in societate humana et in activitate religiosa ad mentem S. Scripturae (1976). It became known that a majority of the Commission was of the opinion that Scripture is not enough to exclude women from priesthood. In 1977 the first group of the Commission met for the last time. They dealt with the use of Scripture in the writings on liberation theology. No publication of texts followed. There was no plenary session in 1978 (nor for that matter in 1984, 1990, 1996 and 2001).

The second group also had Bishop Descamps as its secretary. The theme of the 1979 plenary session was acculturation in Sacred Scripture itself. The majority of the discussion papers have been published in revised form in Fede e cultura alla luce della Bibbia – Foi e culture à la lumière de la Bible (1981). No common conclusions are offered. After the tragic death of Bishop Descamps in 1980, H. Cazelles replaced him as secretary. The four successive sessions (1980, 1981, 1982 and 1983) were devoted to recent questions concerning christology. The work of these sessions resulted in the publication of Bible et christologie (1984). The volume consists of two main parts: the official document of the Biblical Commission (in Latin and French, pp. 14–109) and nine contributions by individual members (all in French, pp. 113–287).

In 1984 H. Cazelles was named secretary of the Commission's third group as well. Four sessions (1985, 1986, 1987 and 1988) investigated the relation between local churches and the universality of the unique people of God. This examination led to the publication of the volume Unité et diversité dans l'Eglise (1989). The book contains the official French text of the Commission (pp. 9–28) and twenty contributions by individual members in different languages (pp. 31–311). The ecumenical importance of this publication is recognized. In the fifth session (1989) a new theme was approached: the interpretation of the Bible in the Church; this work was interrupted at the end of the five-year term.

In 1990 Prof. A. Vanhoye was appointed secretary of the fourth group. Within three sessions (1991, 1992 and 1993) the same theme, the interpretation of the Bible, was further studied and a joint document redacted. On Saturday, April 24, 1993, during a solemn audience at the Vatican, a double anniversary was celebrated: the encyclical PROVIDENTISSIMUS DEUS (Leo XIII, 1893; EB 81–134) and the encyclical DIVINO AFFLANTE SPIRITU (Pius XII, 1943; EB 538–569). This commemoration, however, did not take place with the issuing of a new encyclical. During that audience the Pontifical Biblical Commission submitted to Pope JOHN PAUL II its document The Interpretation of the Bible in the Church.

Why this new document? There have been, from different quarters, complaints about the scientific study of the Bible. Moreover, the historical-critical method is often attacked because of its so-called sterility; not seldom, it is said, doubt, if not unbelief, arises from its use.

What about the new and seemingly more promising approaches? The Pontifical Biblical Commission was asked to reflect on this malaise. Could the Commission “indicate the paths most appropriate for arriving at an interpretation of the Bible as faithful to its character both human and divine?”

The Commission presented its considerations in a lengthy document consisting of four main parts. First there is a discussion of the different methods and approaches: thirteen of them are analyzed and carefully evaluated (e.g., rhetorical analysis, narrative analysis, the sociological approach, the liberationist approach, the feminist approach). Then the document investigates the philosophical question of what “hermeneutics” actually involves and it deals with the question of the meaning or meanings of inspired Scripture (the literal, spiritual and fuller senses). In the third part the characteristics of a Catholic interpretation of the Bible are considered: what has exegesis done during the long tradition of the Church and how can the task of the exegete be defined today? The last part is concerned with the interpretation of Scripture in the life of the Church: how can the Bible be actualized? What kind of attention must be given to inculturation? Which are the different uses of the Bible, in liturgy, in individual or communal reading, in pastoral ministry and in ecumenism?

In his address during the 1993 audience Pope John Paul II praised the document for the spirit of openness in which it was conceived, for its balance and moderation, for its stress on the fact that the biblical Word is at work speaking universally, in time and space, to all humanity. The reactions from both scholars and religious leaders, not only Catholics, underline the importance of this document.

In the sessions of 1994 and 1995 a new theme of discussion was brought forward: what does the Bible say about the universalism of salvation through Christ? Because of lack of time no final document could be achieved. The individual contributions, which had been updated after discussion in the plenary sessions, were brought together and presented to the Theological Commission.

A. Vanhoye remained the secretary of the fifth group. In the sessions of 1997, 1998, 1999 and 2000 the Commission investigated the place of Israel in Scripture and a final document is now ready. The publication of Le peuple juif et ses Saintes Ecritures dans la Bible chrétienne is announced for 2002. Its three main parts are: I. “Les Saintes Ecritures du peuple juif partie fondamentale de la Bible chrétienne”; II. “Thèmes fondamentaux des Ecritures du peuple juif et leur réception dans la foi au Christ”; III. “Les juifs dans le Nouveau Testament.”

Bibliography: The postconciliar Commission published the five following documents: 1. *Fede e cultura alla luce della Bibbia – Foi e culture à la lumière de la Bible. PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR CULTURE

In 1982 Pope JOHN PAUL II created the Pontifical Council for Culture and with a sense of symbolism signed the letter on the feast of the Ascension. This new body was to serve at the crossroads between faith and lived realities, as an organization of encounter and of research; it was to deepen “the relations of the Holy See with every manifestation of culture.” Similar to other Vatican dicasteries involved with dialogue, this council was intended to communicate ad extra, and especially with those places where the meanings and values of humanity are being formed. Its very existence was to witness to the desire of the Church to collaborate with people of culture everywhere.

Three principal factors lay behind this papal initiative. At the Second Vatican Council, Gaudium et spes devoted a substantial chapter to the topic of culture, noting that the concept had widened from an older meaning of conscious development and creativity to include various ways of life in society. Second, the pastoral relevance of different cultural contexts came to the fore during the seventies, especially through the 1975 call of Pope Paul VI for an in-depth “evangelization of cultures” (Evangelii nuntiandi). Third, Pope John Paul II had shown a personal interest in the whole field of culture and had often spoken of it as the key to what makes us human and as a crucial dimension for the very future of humanity, most notably visiting UNESCO on June 2, 1980.

In the letter of foundation the pope expressed his vision thus: “The synthesis between culture and faith is not just a demand of culture but also of faith. A faith that does not become culture is a faith which has not been fully received, not thoroughly thought through, not faithfully lived out.” Gradually the Pontifical Council entered into collaboration with international organizations and cultural institutions throughout the world. It organized many international conferences, such as a symposium on “Christianity and Culture in Europe” to prepare for the 1991 Synod of Bishops. It worked, in cooperation with other Vatican organizations, on a document on the presence of the Church in university culture. It is actively involved with Catholic Cultural Centers in many countries, seeking to be a channel of contact and communication between them.

In 1993 Pope John Paul II issued the motu proprio titled Inde a Pontificatus, which merged the previous pontifical councils for culture and for dialogue with non-believers under the title of Pontifical Council for Culture. With this refoundation the aims of the Council are further clarified. It has two sections: (1) faith and culture and (2) dialogue with cultures. Its aims are fourfold: to foster meeting places between the gospel and contemporary cultures; to help toward evangelizing cultures and inculturating the Gospel; to build up contacts with cultural institutions at the local level and to further intercultural dialogue; and to promote dialogue with unbelievers and reflection on this issue.

The council’s publications include books arising from the various congresses organized over the years, and a quarterly review titled Cultures and Faith. Since its inception it has had only one president, Paul Cardinal Poupard.

PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR INTERRELIGIOUS DIALOGUE

The Pontifical Council for Interreligious Dialogue (PCID) is a dicastery of the Holy See responsible for relations with followers of other religions. The PCID promotes dialogue with other religions in accordance with the decrees of the Second Vatican Council, particularly Nostra Aetate. Founded at first as the Secretariat for Non-Christians during Pentecost 1964, it was raised to the dignity of a pontifical council in 1988 through the apostolic constitution Pastor Bonus, when it was renamed. In accordance with that constitution’s regulation (§161), the PCID may at times, in the course of its work, consult with the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, as well as the Congregations for the Eastern Churches and the Evangelization of Peoples. The PCID does not have responsibility for the promoting relations with Jews. That is the proper competence of the Commission for Religious Relations with Jews, an office of the Pontifical Council for the Promotion of Christian Unity.

The goals of the PCID are threefold: to promote mutual understanding, respect, and collaboration between Catholics and the followers of others religious traditions; to encourage the study of religions; and to promote the formation of persons dedicated to dialogue. In aid of this task the PCID has produced several documents, “The Attitude of the Catholic Church towards the Followers of Other Religious Traditions: Reflections on Dialogue and Mission” (1984), “Pastoral Attention to African Traditional Religions” (1988), “Dialogue and Proclamation” (1991), “Pastoral Attention to the Traditional Religions of Asia, America, and Oceania” (1994), “Journeying Together: The Catholic Church in Dialogue with the Religious Traditions of the World” (1999), and an “Inter-religious Dialogue Directory.” Other documents also serve as guides, particularly the papal encyclical letters ECCLESIAM SUAM (1964), REDEMPTOR HOMINIS (1979), and REDEMPTORIS MISSIO (1990).

The permanent staff in Rome includes staff members for Africa and Asia and a staff member for new religious movements. The PCID also has a special commission for religious relations with Muslims, instituted by Paul VI on Oct. 22, 1974. It engages in studies on different aspects of Christian-Muslim relations and has produced a document with special attention given to dialogue with Muslims.

The PCID usually publishes the acts of the dialogue meetings it organizes. A bulletin, called Pro Dialogo, is published regularly three times a year. Typically, the president of the PCID or his delegate sends greetings on the occasion of the major festivals of non-Christian religions. For example, widely published messages have been sent to Hindus around the world on the feast of Diwali, to Buddhists on the feast of Vesakh/Hanamatsuri, or to Muslims on the occasion of Ramadan.

PONTIFICAL COUNCILS

Pontifical councils operate on the fourth tier of the HOLY SEE’s governing structure. They have within their competence special functions in connection to ecclesial life that the pope deems to be of primary importance. As such, they carry out their duties in an official capacity in the pope’s name and by his authority (CIC, c. 360). At the end of the 20th century there were 11 pontifical councils, all of which fell under the regulations of Pastor bonus, the 1988 apostolic constitution of Pope JOHN PAUL II that reorganized the Roman CURIA. These include the Pontifical Council for the Laity, the Pontifical Council for the Promotion of Christian Unity, the Pontifical Council for the Family, the Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace, the Pontifical Council “Cor Unum,” the Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant People, the Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Assistance of Health-Care Workers, the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts, the Pontifical Council for Inter-religious Dialogue, the PONTIFICAL COUNCIL FOR CULTURE (which subsumed the Pontifical Council for Dialogue with Non-Believers in 1993), and the Pontifical Council for Social Communications.

Structures. All the pontifical councils are led by a cardinal or archbishop who takes title of the office of president (Pastor bonus I, a. 3, §§1). They are assisted typically by a secretary and undersecretary. Members are usually selected from the episcopate; consultants and professional staff are employed to assist in the work of each council. Lay participation is permitted on all councils, though clerics continue to dominate. Each dicastery may issue norms relative to its field of competence or may join with other curial bodies in issuing joint statements of mutual concern. The councils meet on a regular basis, sometimes in plenary assembly. Membership on each of the councils is by term appointment or at the pleasure of the Holy Father. Many of the pontifical councils are housed in offices located in the St. Callixtus complex in Rome’s Trastevere neighborhood.

History and Aims. The history of pontifical councils varies, though they all sink their roots in the 20th century. Some, such as the Pontifical Council for the Laity and the Pontifical Council for the Promotion of Christian Unity, emerged directly from commissions established to participate in the Second VATICAN COUNCIL. Other dicasteries were shaped by Pope Paul’s apostolic constitution Regimini Ecclesiae universae (Aug. 15, 1967) which established norms for the implementation of the conciliar decrees during an “experimental period” in which the local churches would seek ways to adapt to the new situation created by the Second Vatican Council. Pope John Paul II has established several pontifical councils either as entirely new entities (Health Care, Legislative Texts, Culture) or by raising already established secretariats or commissions to the dignity of a pontifical council (Christian Unity, Family, Justice and Peace, Migrants and Itinerant Peoples, Social Communications). What follows here is a brief history of each of the pontifical councils, together with a short description of their fundamental purposes.

Pontifical Council for the Laity. The Pontifical Council for the Laity seeks to engage the lay apostolate on all levels through sustained interaction with international lay groups, national laity councils, and institutions participating in CATHOLIC ACTION. It promotes the lay apostolate under the guidance of the relevant texts of the Second Vatican Council as well as the post-synodal apostolic exhortation CHRISTIFIDELES LAICI (1988). The council's history may be traced as far back as 1908 when Pope PIUS X issued the apostolic constitution Sapienti consilio. That text reformed the Roman Curia and was later made part of the universal law of the Church (1917), making the Sacred Congregation of the Council competent for "the discipline of the secular clergy and of the Christian people." The importance of Catholic Action in the years preceding the Second Vatican Council provided the impetus for a more formal recognition of the lay apostolate in the council itself. The conciliar decree Apostolicam actuositatem proposed that a secretariat for the laity form part of the Roman Curia (AA 26), and this was formally constituted "ad experimentum" for five years by the motu proprio Catholicam Christi ecclesiam of Pope Paul VI (January 6, 1967). Pope Paul gave both recognition and definition to this secretariat. With Regimini, the "Consilium de Laicis" was given general and particular norms, the latter of which were altered with only minor changes in Pastor bonus. Nearly ten years after the creation of the "Consilium de Laicis," Paul VI's motu proprio Apostolatus peragendi (Dec. 10, 1976) further solidified this dicastery by making it a pontifical council. The current council comprises sections pertaining to youth, Catholic international organizations, and (in conjunction with the Congregation for the Clergy) new ecclesial ministries within parishes and other contexts, as well as emerging associations of the lay faithful.

Pontifical Council for the Promotion of Christian Unity. In 1966, after the council had ended, Pope Paul VI confirmed the Secretariat for Promoting Christian Unity as a permanent dicastery of the Holy See. In Pastor bonus Pope John Paul II changed the secretariat into the Pontifical Council for Promoting Christian Unity (effective March 1, 1989). The council exercises a double role. First of all, it is entrusted with the promotion, within the Catholic Church, of an authentic ecumenical spirit according to the conciliar decree Unitatis redintegratio. It was for this purpose that an ecumenical directory was published in 1967–70 and a revised edition issued in 1993 as Directory for the Application of Principles and Norms on Ecumenism. The council also aims to develop dialogue and collaboration with other churches and world communions. Since its creation, it has established a cordial cooperation with the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (WCC); 12 Catholic theologians have been members of the FAITH AND ORDER COMMISSION, the theological department of the WCC. The work of this dicastery is divided between an Eastern section, dealing with Orthodox churches of Byzantine tradition and the Oriental Orthodox Churches (Coptic, Syrian, Armenian, Ethiopian, and Malankara), as well as the Assyrian Church of the East; and a Western section, dealing with the different churches and ecclesial communities of the West and the World Council of Churches. This dicastery also maintains the Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews that Pope Paul VI established on Oct. 22, 1974. Although it is an autonomous unit, it is largely staffed by members of the pontifical council.

Pontifical Council for the Family. This dicastery was instituted by John Paul II with the motu proprio Familia a Deo instituta (May 9, 1981), replacing the Committee for the Family created by Paul VI in 1973. The committee had remained closely linked to the "Consilium de Laicis" and was governed by Catholicam Christi Ecclesiam. There are still links between the two pontifical councils, such as the presence of the two secretaries in each of the presidential committees. The council is responsible for the promotion of the pastoral ministry of and apostolate to the family, assisting in all dimensions of family life and encompassing such issues as responsible procreation, theology and catechesis of the family, marital and family spirituality, the rights of the family and the child, lay formation, and marriage preparation courses. Due to the influence that issues such as PORNOGRAPHY, PROSTITUTION, and drugs can have on the family, these topics also fall under the council's purview.

Pontifical Council for Justice and Peace. Pope Paul VI created the Pontifical Commission "Iustitia et Pax" in 1967 as an experiment (together with the Pontifical Council for the Laity) but made it a definitive dicastery of the Holy See with the motu proprio Iustitiam et pacem (1976). It became a pontifical council with Pastor bonus. The council's raison d'être is to promote peace and justice in the world according to the gospel and the social doctrine of the Church. It is principally concerned with labor and human rights and frequently collaborates with other organizations, not necessarily affiliated with the Church, who share common goals.

Pontifical Council "Cor Unum." The Pontifical Council "Cor Unum" was created by Paul VI who described it, in his lettera autografa (hand-written letter) Amoris officio (July 15, 1971), as a dicastery at the level of the universal Church "for human and Christian promotion." The council is concerned with understanding the demands of solidarity and development and enacting them according to the principles of the gospel. The council promotes the catechesis of charity and stimulates the faithful to bear witness to it, coordinates initiatives of those Catholic institutions that help the less fortunate, helps promote a more just distribution of aid in times of disasters, and acts as a go-between with Catholic charitable and humanitarian organizations. Half of the council's members are bishops and representatives from developing countries, while the other half represent Catholic aid organizations. "Cor Unum" is also responsible for the Holy Father's charitable donations. From the World Council of Churches (Unit IV), the council receives information on aid programs for those countries that have been struck by natural calamities, ethnic conflicts, or civil wars. In 1984, Pope John Paul established the John Paul II Foundation for the Sahel, providing drought relief and programs against desertification. In 1992, the Holy Father also founded the Populorum Progressio Foundation, which is at the service of indigenous, racially mixed, Afro-American, and campesinos of Latin America and the Caribbean.

Pontifical Council for the Pastoral Care of Migrants and Itinerant Peoples. Pope Pius XII drew attention in 1952 to a pressing pastoral need that had been fomenting throughout the aftermath of World War II, namely, the plight of the emigrant. The apostolic constitution Exsul familia (1952) established both the Superior Council for Emigration and the Work of the Apostleship of the Sea within the Consistorial Congregation, now known as the Congregation for Bishops. Six years later Pope Pius broadened the scope of the congregation's duties to include air travelers through an institution called "Opera dell'Apostolatus Coeli o Aeris." In 1969, at the request of the Congregation for Bishops, Paul VI updated his predecessor's creations and the following year established a single entity with his motu proprio Apostolicae caritatis (March 19, 1970), calling it the Pontifical Commission for the Spiritual Care of Migrants and Travelers. This commission embraced all those pastoral ministries regarding human mobility: migrants, exiles, refugees, seafarers, air travel personnel and passengers, nomads, pilgrims, and tourists. To these were later added gypsies and "circus people." With Pastor bonus the commission was raised to the dignity of a pontifical council.

Pontifical Council for Pastoral Assistance to Health-Care Workers. With the motu proprio Dolentium hominum (Feb. 11, 1985), John Paul II instituted the Pontifical Commission for the Pastoral Assistance to Health-Care Workers, which with Pastor bonus became a pontifical council. It stimulates and promotes the work of formation, study, and action carried out by the diverse international Catholic organizations in the health-care field. The council coordinates the activities of different dicasteries of the Roman Curia as they relate to the health care sector and its problems. It spreads, explains, and defends the teachings of the Church on health issues and favors its involvement in health-care practice. It also maintains contacts with the local Churches and especially with bishops' commissions related to health care.

Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts. With his motu proprio cum iuris canonici (Sept. 15, 1917), Pope BENEDICT XV inaugurated a pontifical commission for the authentic interpretation of the Code of Canon Law, promulgated the previous May. At the time of the Second Vatican Council the commission became an instrument by which the council's legislation was prepared. In the post-conciliar era, the commission was responsible for delivering authentic interpretations of the conciliar texts as well as working toward a revised code of canons in light of the new legislation. That code was approved by Pope John Paul II in 1983. He later charged the commission with the task of interpreting the new code through his motu proprio Recognito iuris canonici codice (Jan. 2, 1984). Pastor bonus raised the commission to the dignity of a pontifical council, and placed it council in charge of all authentic interpretations of both singular and inter-dicasterial documents.

Pontifical Council for Culture. Dating back to the Second Vatican Council, this pontifical council's roots are grounded in Gaudium et spes 53–62. It did not emerge as a distinct entity until John Paul II founded it in 1982 (personal letter to the Cardinal Secretary of State, May 20, 1982). In his motu proprio Inde a Pontificatus (March 25, 1993), John Paul II merged the Pontifical Council for Dialogue with Non-Believers (founded in 1965 by Paul VI) with the Pontifical Council for Culture. The council's main tasks are to bring the gospel into diverse cultures and seek ways to enliven those in the sciences, letters, and arts through the Church's sustained interest in their work "in the service of truth, goodness, and beauty." As such, this dicastery coordinates the activities of the pontifical academies and cooperates on a regular basis with the Pontifical Commission for the Cultural Heritage of the Church.

Pontifical Council for Social Communications. This dicastery has undergone a number of incarnations since the secretariat of state of Pope Pius XII first ordered that a Pontifical Commission for the Study and Ecclesiastical Evaluation of Films on Religious or Moral Subjects be established (Jan. 30, 1948, by letter, protocol no. 153.561). On Sept. 17, 1948, Pius XII approved the statutes of this new office and renamed it the Pontifical Commission for Educational and Religious Films, later to become the Pontifical Commission for Cinema, the statutes of which were approved Jan. 1, 1952. After consultation with bishops and Catholic film organizations, the name of the commission was once more changed, this time to the Pontifical Commission for the Cinema, Radio, and Television (Dec. 31, 1954). Pope John XXIII entrusted the commission with developing the Vatican Film Library. Pope John also added the responsibility of coordinating the communications media needed for the Second Vatican Council. Pope Paul VI transformed it into the Pontifical Commission for Social Communications (motu proprio in fructibus multis, April 2, 1964). It was responsible for dealing with all the problems raised by cinema, radio, television, and the daily and periodical press in relation to the interests of the Catholic religion. With Pastor bonus, the commission became a pontifical council.

PONTIFICAL INSTITUTE FOR FOREIGN MISSIONS

(PIME, Official Catholic Directory, #1050) an international society of secular priests exclusively dedicated to mission work, with a special emphasis on training local clergy and establishing local hierarchies. The society works under the umbrella of the Congregation for the EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES. Members of the society work in Africa, Asia and the Americas. The society is the result of a merger effected by Pius XI in 1926 of the Institute for Foreign Missions of Milan and the Pontifical Seminary of SS. Peter and Paul for Foreign Missions of Rome. The Milan branch, the larger of the two, is the second oldest foreign mission society in the Church. Under the direction of the hierarchy it was established in 1850 at the request of Pius IX by Angelo Ramazzotti, who later became patriarch of Venice, Italy. Pietro Avanzini (1832–74) founded the Roman branch in 1871, also at the request of Pius IX. Priests from this branch worked in the California missions at the beginning of the 20th century. One of its members, Giovanni Bonzano (1867–1927), was apostolic delegate to the U.S. from 1911 to 1922, after which he was raised to the cardinalate. The society officially came to the U.S. in 1948 when, on the advice of the Holy See, it decided to become international. Cardinal Edward MOONEY invited the fathers to establish their American headquarters in Detroit, MI. The generalate is in Rome.

PONTIFICAL MISSION FOR PALESTINE

Founded by Pope Pius XII for the care of Palestinian refugees, presently the Holy See's relief and development agency for the entire Middle East. In the aftermath of the first Arab-Israeli wars, Pope Pius XII was concerned about the plight of more than one million Palestinians displaced or impoverished by the hostilities. He unified the Holy See's humanitarian and charitable assistance into one pontifical agency and appointed as its President the Secretary of the Catholic Near East Welfare Association.

On June 18, 1949, Eugene Cardinal Tisserant, Secretary of the Sacred Congregation for the Oriental Churches, announced the erection of the Pontifical Mission for Palestine and outlined its competence: “. . . it has been decided to bring together under the Pontifical Mission, operating in the Holy Land, all those organizations and associations which are engaged in activities concerning the East, and which are scattered throughout many countries of Europe and other continents.”

Immediately a headquarters office was opened in Beirut, Lebanon and, following that, a local office in Jerusalem. Seven local emergency aid committees involving papal representatives, hierarchy, clergy, laity and charitable agencies were organized for Arab Palestine, Egypt, Gaza, Israel, Lebanon, Syria and Transjordan, and field staff were recruited.

In the years that followed, the Pontifical Mission not only distributed many tons of food, clothing, medical supplies, temporary shelters and cooking equipment to the newly dispossessed, but also constructed homes for those who had lost their own. An outstanding achievement of the Pontifical Mission was its encouragement and endowment of training and educational programs to enable the refugees to help themselves through newly acquired skills and trades and to accede to literacy and higher schooling.

With the Israeli occupation of the West Bank and Gaza in 1967, the Pontifical Mission moved from assisting displaced and refugee Palestinians to responding to the needs of an entire civilian population living under martial law. Besides supporting the humanitarian activities of the local churches, the Mission began to establish and subsidize social service institutions, including schools, libraries, hospitals and orphanages.

The new influx of Palestinian refugees into the Hashemite Kingdom of Jordan prompted the Mission to open an office in the capital city of Amman to provide the poor and the refugee—Jordanian and Palestinian—with medical care, employment assistance and other social services. After the Gulf War in 1991, the Pontifical Mission also offered emergency assistance to Iraqi refugees seeking refuge in Jordan.

On the occasion of the twenty-fifth anniversary of the Pontifical Mission for Palestine in 1974, Pope Paul VI gave new impetus and new dimensions to its work:

Our Mission for Palestine is thus about to be faced with a compelling task. In addition to continuing its assistance, without distinction of nationality or religion, to those who have suffered or are suffering in any way as a result of repeated conflicts which have devastated that region, the Mission will now have to expect, in the situation which is now evolving, to contribute to projects of aid, of rehabilitation and of development for the population of Palestine.

With the increase of civil strife in Lebanon in 1975, the beneficiaries of the Pontifical Mission there were no longer only Palestinian refugees, but Lebanese themselves too. After the cessation of hostilities in 1991, the Pontifical Mission launched—in addition to its substantial program of institutional support—a regional village rehabilitation and resettlement project.

The start of the Palestinian intifada, or uprising, in 1987 offered new challenges, as the Pontifical Mission aided grassroots organizations, providing medical assistance, agricultural aid, legal advocacy and other vital services.

Because of its modest administrative structure, its non-governmental nature and the confidence it enjoys among the local churches, the Pontifical Mission is able to act quickly, expeditiously and effectively to alleviate human suffering and aid human development. It concentrates especially on trying to meet those needs that are either too limited to be addressed by larger agencies or which fall outside of their funding guidelines.

The following have served as President of the Pontifical Mission for Palestine: Monsignor Thomas J. McMahon (1949–55); Monsignor Peter P. Tuohy (1955–60); Monsignor Joseph T. Ryan (1960–66); Monsignor John G. Nolan (1966–87); and Monsignor Robert L. Stern (1987–).

PONTIFICAL ROMAN UNIVERSITIES

This article is concerned with those institutions of higher learning in Rome that have been founded as universities by the pope or given university status by papal action. All such universities are subject to the governing structures set out in Pope John Paul II's apostolic constitution SAPIENTIA CHRISTIANA (1979) regulating ecclesiastical faculties and seminaries, together with the accompanying norms of the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education, the Roman dicastery that has jurisdiction over them. The pontifical Roman universities provide service to the universal Church by lending their expertise to the Roman curia. While independent of one another, many of the universities share resources or are linked through agreements that have an impact on curriculum and formation of the student body. In 1991, several of the libraries of the major universities became part of the URBE (Roman Union of Ecclesiastical Libraries) network that allows students access to nearly four million volumes for specialized research.

The Annuario Pontificio 2000 reported seventeen institutions comprising the "Atenei Romani." Many of them contain specialized centers devoted to proscribed areas of study and many of these have degree-granting capabilities.

Pontificia Università Gregoriana. The Pontifical Gregorian University (PUG) is the largest of the pontifical Roman universities and is under the direction of the Society of Jesus. The prefect of the Sacred Congregation for Catholic Education is the chancellor, and the general of the Jesuit order is the vice-chancellor. Its faculties include theology, canon law, philosophy, church history, missiology, and social science. The PUG has three additional departments in spirituality, psychology, and religious studies. It also houses a school for the study of the Latin language. Finally, the PUG is home to the Pontifical Biblical Institute and the Pontifical Oriental Institute, both of which are discussed below.

The history of the PUG can be traced to St. IGNATIUS LOYOLA who, in 1551, founded the Collegium Romanum with St. Francis Borgia in what is today the Piazza d'Aracoeli. In 1555, a year before Ignatius died, the school was all but bankrupt, but in the next decade it prospered and grew. After the suppression of the Jesuit order in 1773, the Gregorian's faculty consisted mainly of alumni and secular clergy until the JESUITS were again assigned to staff the university by Pope Leo XII in 1824.

By a rescript of December 4, 1873, Pius IX granted the rector use of the title "pontifical university." In 1876 the canon law faculty was added and in 1924, by his motu proprio Latinarum litterarum, Pius XI instituted the School of Latin Letters. His predecessor, Benedict XV, had the land for the present building set aside on the Piazza della Pilotta in 1919, although formal dedication ceremonies did not take place until 1930. By a letter of the Congregation for Catholic Education of May 20, 1958, the faculty of theology began the Institute of Spirituality. In 1970 and 1971, respectively, that same congregation established the Pontifical Institute “Regina Mundi” for research into societies of apostolic life and secular institutes and the Institute for Religious Studies. Also in 1971 the Institute of Psychology was established.

At the turn of the millenium, the library of the PUG contained some 1.2 million volumes, including those of the Biblicum and the PIO, for use by nearly 3,000 students and over 400 faculty. The PUG’s publishing house prints books in the following series: Analecta Gregoriana, Documenta Missionalia, Inculturation, Miscellanea Historiae Pontificiae, and Tesi Gregoriana. Three periodicals are based at the Gregorian: Gregorianum (1920—), Periodica de re Canonico (1912—), and Archivum Historiae Pontificiae (1963—).

Pontifical Biblical Institute. The Pontifical Biblical Institute (PBI) is a university-level institution of the Holy See located on the Via della Pilotta. Its grand chancellor is the cardinal prefect for the Congregation for the Eastern Churches. Pope St. Pius X established it with the apostolic letter Vinea electa of May 7, 1909, in order to be “a center of higher studies for Sacred Scripture in the city of Rome and of all related studies according to the spirit of the Catholic Church.” From its foundation, the Institute was entrusted to the Society of Jesus, and Father L. Fonck served as organizer and first rector.

At the beginning the PBI prepared its students to take the examinations of the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION. With the apostolic letter Cum Biblia sacra (August 15, 1916), Benedict XV authorized the institute to grant the academic degree of licence in the name of the Biblical Commission. The motu proprio Quod maxime (September 9, 1930) of Pius XI gave the institute academic independence from the Pontifical Biblical Commission and permitted it to grant the doctorate. With this same document, the PBI was officially associated with the Pontifical Gregorian University and the Pontifical Oriental Institute. These three institutions have the same vice-grand chancellor (the general of the Society of Jesus), but each has its own proper statutes. The grand chancellor of the institute is the prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education. On August 7, 1932, the Faculty of Ancient Near-Eastern Studies (Oriental Faculty) was erected, with the same academic privileges accorded to the Faculty of Biblical Studies for the granting of the licentiate and doctoral degrees.

The purpose of the PBI is to cultivate and promote, by means of scholarly research, the biblical and relevant ancient near eastern disciplines, in order to obtain “a more profound understanding and exposition of the meaning of Sacred Scripture” (Dei Verbum, §12). Second, it is to offer to the students, by the teaching and the practice of these various disciplines, in particular the biblical languages, an adequate preparation both for scholarly research and for the teaching and spread of Sacred Scripture and of the disciplines connected with it. Third, it is to work toward “a better understanding and explanation of the meaning of Sacred Scripture, so that through preparatory study the judgment of the Church may mature” (Dei Verbum, §12) and that Sacred Scripture may have an ever more active role in the study of theology, in pastoral ministry, in ecumenical dialogue, in the sacred liturgy, and in the reading of the faithful. An indispensable means for the PBI to achieve this goal is a specialized library, presently at about 160,000 volumes with subscriptions to 600 periodicals. The PBI has its own publications, including the journal Biblica, as well as a branch in Jerusalem, which was begun in 1927 and staffed by the Society of Jesus. At 2000 the PBI had 375 students from approximately 60 nations.

Pontifical Oriental Institute. The Pontifical Oriental Institute (PIO) was founded by Benedict XV on October 15, 1917. Initially it was located in the Piazza Scossacavalli near the Ospizio dei Convertendi. It began academic life on December 2, 1918 under the rectorship of Alfredo Ildefonso Schuster, the abbot of St. Paul’s Outside-the-Walls and future archbishop of Milan. In 1920 it obtained permission to grant academic degrees for studies of the eastern churches. In 1922, Pius XI entrusted the PIO to the Jesuit order and transferred it and the Pontifical Biblical Institute to the Piazza S. Maria Maggiore, though it was not until 1928 that the Gregorian “consortium” of the PIO, Biblicum, and university was formed. Pius XI, a former librarian of the Ambrosian library, generously supplied the library of the PIO with books pertaining to issues affecting the Eastern Churches. He continued to endow the school with leading faculty as well, largely through his exhortation Rerum Orientalium (1928) addressed to the world’s bishops. By a decree of the Congregation for Catholic Education in 1971, the section of the Gregorian’s canon law faculty pertaining to the Code of Canon Law for the Eastern Churches became its own faculty within the PIO. In 2000 the grand chancellor was the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for the Eastern Churches. Noted for studies of the Eastern Rites of the Church, the PIO has also been active as an ecumenical bridge between the Orthodox world and the Holy See. It houses a library of some 200,000 books and 2,500 periodicals. These served about 435 students in the year 2001, along with 52 faculty. The PIO publishes Orientalia Cristiana Periodica.

Pontificia Università Lateranense. The Pontifical Lateran University (PUL), under the chancellorship of the vicar of Rome, is organized into faculties and institutes. The four faculties are in theology, philosophy, civil law, and canon law. These last two faculties brought into being an institute that is the only one of its kind in the world, the Institutum Utriusque Iuris, for the study of both canon and civil law. It also contains the Pontifical Pastoral Institute, which has a special department for the social teaching of the Church. Formally recognized in May of 1996 by the Congregation for Catholic Education, this department can issue graduate degrees with a speciality in the Church's social doctrine. The PUL is home to the Religious Education Institute, Ecclesia Mater, which trains pastoral assistants and catechists. It was established by the Congregation for Catholic Education in 1973, and that same congregation formally approved its statutes on June 27, 1994, permitting it to grant the licentiate degree. One of the great achievements of the PUL is its publication of a 13-volume dictionary of saints, the Bibliotheca Sanctorum (ca. 1970), one of the most thorough reference works of its kind.

More than 30 institutes across the world are in some way linked to the Lateran, comprising a student body of over 6,000, from over 100 countries. One such institute is the Pontifical JOHN PAUL II INSTITUTE for Studies on Marriage and the Family. It was founded by John Paul II on October 7, 1982 with the apostolic constitution Magnum Matrimonii Sacramentum, according it the power to grant both the licentiate and doctorate with concentrations in marriage and the family. Although housed at the PUL, it is an autonomous body by statutes approved by the pope on November 21, 1992 and March 17, 1993. Its satellites have multiplied to include branches in Washington, D.C. (1988), Mexico City (1996), and Valencia, Spain (1994).

Three additional institutions are closely linked by statute with the PUL, the "Alfonsiana," the "Augustinianum," and the "Claretianum."

The Alphonsian Academy is a higher institute of moral theology founded in 1949 by the REDEMPTORISTS. On August 2, 1960, by a decree of the Sacred Congregation for Seminaries and Universities, the academy was elevated to full university status. Shortly after St. ALPHONSUS LIGUORI was proclaimed a doctor of the Church in 1871, the Redemptorists conceived the idea and began to make plans for the establishment of an institute dedicated to teaching and promoting the moral theology of St. Alphonsus. The Redemptorist General Chapter of 1894 approved a decree encouraging this. The first institute opened its doors in 1910 with six professors and 26 student priests. The faculty offered courses in dogmatic and moral theology, as well as canon law, philosophy, and Hebrew. The fledgling institute was forced to close its doors at the beginning of World War I. On February 9, 1949, Father Leonard Buijs, the Redemptorist superior general, founded the Alphonsian Academy as an internal institute of the Congregation. On March 25, 1957 the academy was formally recognized by the Vatican Congregation for Religious as a "public internal institute" entrusted to the Redemptorists, granting it the opportunity for extern students.

In 2001, the Alphonsian Academy was the academic home for over 287 post-graduate students, divided between the licentiate and doctoral programs. The students come from over 60 countries and all five continents. Twenty-eight professors, of whom 21 are Redemptorists, comprised the faculty. The Alphonsian Academy is responsible for publishing the journal Studia Moralia (1963—).

The Library of the College of St. Alphonsus was founded in 1855, when the Redemptorist Fathers opened their General House in Rome. Its modest beginning came from the legacy of Cardinal Clement Villecourt (d. 1867). By 1905, the library already contained 20,000 volumes and was considered among the best ecclesiastical libraries of Rome. In 2001 it housed almost 165,000 volumes in its collection, with its major strength continuing to be in the field of moral theology.

The Patristic Institute Augustinianum was founded in 1905 as an official organ for the general curia of the Augustinian order. It affiliated with the PUL in 1969. It is known for its distinguished publishing repertoire under the banner Analecta Augustiniana. By 1939 it had established itself as one of the leading houses for critical editions of patristic texts in philosophy and theology, as well as medieval AUGUSTINIANISM. In 1961, the periodical Augustinianum was begun by the Patristic Institute of the PUL, treating all aspects of Christian antiquity and the Church fathers.

The Theological Institute on the Religious Life "Claretianum" was affiliated with the PUL in 1972 and is in the care of the Sons of the Immaculate Heart of Mary (Claretian Fathers) on the Largo Lorenzo Mossa in Rome.

Pontificia Università Urbaniana. The Pontifical Urbanian University (PUU), the college of the Congregation for the EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES (Propoganda Fidei), is an international seminary with almost 90 affiliates worldwide, constituting a student body of about 11,000. Located on the Gianicolo Hill, its large complex is the center for 1,250 students in Rome, representing about 100 nations. It had 156 faculty in 2000. The grand chancellor is the cardinal prefect of the Congregation and the vice-chancellor is the secretary of that dicastery. The PUU is overseen by a rector magnificus. It is open to clerical, religious, and lay students. Its library contains some 300,000 volumes and is strong in mission studies.

The PUU offers the doctorate in theology, philosophy, missiology, and canon law. In addition to these faculties, the PUU is also home to an Institute for Missionary Catechesis, founded in 1970 by the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. With the decree Cum catechesis pars of May 25, 1980, the Congregation for Catholic Education permitted this institute to issue baccalaureate degrees.

A number of joint programs emerged in the late 20th century. For instance, in 1986 the faculties of canon law and missiology began a joint venture. Similarly, by decree of the Congregation for Catholic Education, April 12, 1999, the faculty of missiology was given charge of the Higher Institute for Catechesis and Missionary Spirituality "Redemptoris Missio" in response to the John Paul II's encyclical letter of the same name.

Since 1949 there have been special sections devoted to languages, particularly those of Asian origin. In 1960, by university statute, the faculty of philosophy was placed in charge of administering the Higher Institute for the Study of Beliefs, Religion, and Culture. This institute, in turn, oversees two centers, one for the study of Chinese and the other, more generally, the Cardinal Newman Center, both of which were begun in 1975. John Henry Cardinal Newman was a student at the Urbaniana while preparing for ordination in 1847.

The PUU also boasts its own publishing organ, the Urbaniana University Press, founded on April 19, 1979. In addition to a book list, the press prints the theological journal Euntes Docete.

Pontificia Università di S. Tommaso d'Aquino in Urbe (Angelicum). The Pontifical University of St. Thomas in Rome, known as the Angelicum, is under the direction of the Order of Preachers (DOMINICANS). The master general of these friars is the grand chancellor. The Angelicum is the descendent of the medieval studium of the Dominican Order in Rome. Beginning in 1698, it had at its disposition the Biblioteca Casanatense. In 1906, Pope Pius X changed the title of the College of Saint Thomas to the Pontifical Angelicum College, and allowed for the recognition of its academic degrees. In 1908, Father Hyacinth Cormier, master of the Order of Preachers, erected the Pontifical International College "Angelicum." Officials of the Italian government occupied the old building, constructed by Pius V, from 1873 to 1908, while the College of Saint Thomas operated on Via San Vitale. The government took control of the rich collection of manuscripts, palimpsests, and incunabula of the Biblioteca Casanatense. As part of a deal with Italian dictator Mussolini in 1931, a newer building was exchanged for the monastery's library. It has since grown to nearly a half million volumes.

In 1950 and 1955, respectively, the Institute of Spirituality and Social Sciences were added to the Angelicum. Founded in 1950 by Father Paul Philippe, OP (c. 1984), the Institute of Spirituality was approved by the Congregation for Seminaries and Educational Institutions on May 1, 1958. On March 7, 1963 (the feast of Saint Thomas), Pope John XXIII raised the school to the rank of a pontifical university through his motu proprio Dominicianus ordo. In the same year, a section of the theology faculty dedicated to ecumenism and patristics was erected in Bari, and in 1964, the Higher Institute of Religious Sciences Mater Ecclesiae, directed in particular to the laity, was annexed. In 1972, the Congregation for Catholic Education granted the Mater Ecclesiae power to issue graduate degrees. On Nov. 25, 1974, that same congregation allowed the Institute of Social Sciences to become a full-fledged university faculty.

Pope Paul VI visited the university in the spring of 1974 for the closing of the International Congress marking the 700th anniversary of the death of Saint Thomas. In his address, the pope emphasized the relevance of Thomism in the modern world, a position echoed by his successor, John Paul II, in his encyclical letter Fides et ratio (§§ 43–44). In 1983, the Institute of Saint Thomas was established to promote the study of the works of the Angelic Doctor. The school's periodical, Angelicum, continues this exploration of St. Thomas's thought.

Pontificia Università Salesiana. The Pontifical Salesian University is under the care of the Society of St. Don Bosco (Salesians). The head of the Salesian order is the grand chancellor. The school's rector, also a Salesian, oversees the faculties of theology, canon law, philosophy, education, and social communication. By his motu proprio Magisterium vitae of May 24, 1973, Paul VI elevated the Ateneo Salesiano to university status and granted it the title "pontifical." In 2001 the library of the Salesiana contained around 700,000 volumes and the largest number of serials in the URBE network, approximately 4,800 titles. These serve the needs of nearly 200 professors and over 1,600 students.

Among the oldest of the university's faculties is the education department, begun and shepherded by the Brazilian Salesian Carlos Leóncio da Silva, dean from 1940 to 1952. Paul VI made the Higher Institute for Pedagogy into a full-fledged faculty of education studies. The pope took the occasion to link the importance of the faculty with the charisma of Don Bosco. Education continues to be of prime interest to the university, as typified by the important collective work by this faculty, the three-volume Enciclopedia delle Scienze dell'Educazione and the Dizionario di Scienze dell'educazione (1997).

By a decree of the Congregation for Catholic Education, dated June 29, 1986, the Higher Institute for Religious Studies "Magisterium Vitae" was granted the power to award graduate degrees. On May 27, 1998, that same congregation elevated the Institute for the Study of Social Communications, created in 1988, to a permanent faculty.

The faculty of Christian letters and classics includes a Pontifical Higher Institute for Latin. Though recognized independently in the Annuario Pontificio, it is actually semi-autonomous. Its impetus was Pope John XXIII's apostolic constitution Verum Sapientia (art. 6) and made concrete by the action of Paul VI in his creation of the Pontificium Institutum Altioris Latinitatis through his motu proprio Studia latinitatis of Feb. 22, 1964. The institute's status was remanded to the Congregation for Catholic Education, which eventually wed it to the philosophy faculty of the Salesianum in 1971.

Pontificia Università della Santa Croce. The Pontifical University of the Holy Cross is under the care of the personal prelature of OPUS DEI. The grand chancellor of the university is the prelate of Opus Dei. The university is the realization of a desire of Blessed Josemaría ESCRIVÁ, the founder of Opus Dei, to promote a Roman educational institution at the service of the whole Church. Blessed Josemaría's successor, Monsignor Alvaro del PORTILLO, sought the approval of the Holy See for the project. This it granted by a decree of the Congregation for Catholic Education on Jan. 9, 1985, erecting the Centro Academico Romano della Santa Croce and linking it to the canon law faculty of the University of Navarra. Five years later to the day, this same congregation canonically erected the Ateneo Romano della Santa Croce, conferring upon it the right to grant academic degrees in theology and philosophy. On March 28, 1993 the canon law faculty was erected and on June 26, 1995 Pope John Paul II raised this institution to the status of a pontifical college. By a similar act of July 15, 1998, he bestowed on it the title pontifical university. At the turn of the millennium, the university had faculties of theology, canon law, philosophy, and the communications of social institutions, the latter of which was erected on Feb. 26, 1996, and given the power to grant licentiate and doctorate degrees. The Higher Institute of Religious Studies "Apollinare" has been subsumed within the theology department and has a faculty specializing in distance learning. It was established as a university entity on Sept. 17, 1986, but it was not until an act of the Congregation for Catholic Education on June 10, 1998 that it was enabled to grant graduate degrees in religious studies.

The faculty publishes Annales Theologici, Ius Ecclesiae, Apollinare Studi, and Acta Philosophica. The student body, which for the academic year 1999 and 2000 numbered nearly 1,300, was drawn from over 60 countries. Of these, 541 students were in the Apollinare. Aply, the university campus is in the Palazzo di Sant' Apollinare. Both Pius XII and John XXIII were students in the Apollinare, from 1895 to 1903 and from 1901 to 1905, respectively. The library is housed in the via di Farnesi, near the Church of St. Girolamo della Carità, and possesses some 75,000 volumes.

Pontificia Ateneo di S. Anselmo. The College of Sant' Anselmo in Rome (Anselmianum) is an institute of theological studies operated by the Cassinese Congregation of the Order of Saint Benedict. Its grand chancellor is the Abbot Primate of the Benedictine confederation. Founded in the 17th century, it was granted the right to confer academic degrees by Leo XIII on Aug. 20, 1891. This was confirmed by Pope Pius X in his motu proprio Praeclara inter opera of June 24, 1914, in which he decreed "that the College of Sant' Anselmo, like the other academies of Rome, should have the privilege of conferring all academic degrees in philosophy, sacred theology, and canon law upon both diocesan and religious seminarians."

The Monastic Institute was erected as a division of the Faculty of Theology by decree of the Sacred Congregation for Seminaries and Universities on March 21, 1952. Among its faculty have been such noted scholars as K. Hallinger, B. Steidle, J. Leclercq, B. Studer, J. Grimbomont, and A. de Vogüé. Since 1977 its program of teaching and research has concentrated on the preparation of students for the licentiate and doctorate in monastic studies. The institute also attempts to respond to the new demands of monasteries and of the Church by extending its interests to the study of Eastern monasticism, to ecumenical concerns, and to the emerging communities of Africa, Asia, and Latin America.

The Pontifical Liturgical Institute was erected by a decree of June 17, 1961 with its own statutes. By a decree of the Congregation for Catholic Education on Dec. 8, 1977, the Pontifical Liturgical Institute was incorporated into the Abbey of Santa Giustina in Padua and remains an affiliate of the campus in Rome. With a decree of Aug. 23, 1978, that same congregation raised the Pontifical Liturgical Institute to the level of a faculty with the authority to grant the license (SL.L.) and doctorate (SL.D.) in sacred liturgy. The general statutes of the Athenaeum and those of the faculties of philosophy, sacred theology, and sacred liturgy were approved by the Congregation for Catholic Education on April 21, 1987. Beginning in 1970, the theology faculty offered courses leading to the license and doctorate with specializations in sacramental theology. In the academic year 1997 and 1998, the faculty of philosophy began a new cycle leading to the license and doctorate with a specialization in philosophy and mysticism. A number of seminary programs in Italy are affiliated with the Anselmianum. In 2001 its library numbered approximately 100,000 volumes, serving about 400 faculty and students.

Pontificio Ateneo “Antoniano.” The Pontifical College “Antoniano” is under the care of the Friars Minor, with the minister general of these FRANCISCANS as grand chancellor. The vicar-general of the order is the vice-chancellor. The initial college, founded in 1887, was formally created the Collegium S. Antonii Patavini in Urbe by Leo XIII in 1890. In more recent times, the Antoniano has grown to include two off-site institutes, more notable of which is its house of biblical studies in Jerusalem. This Franciscan Biblicum’s statutes were redrawn on Feb. 28, 1989 to reflect the changes brought on by the apostolic constitution Sapientia Christiana. Additionally, there is the Institute for Ecumenical Studies in Venice. The theology faculty allows its students to specialize in dogmatics, spirituality, evangelization, moral theology, church history, and Franciscan history. On site, the Franciscan Institute of Spirituality (coordinated with the Capuchin friars), the Higher School for the Study of Medieval and Franciscan History, and the Higher Institute for Religious Studies “Redemptor Hominis,” comprise additional institutes within the college. The Higher School for the Study of Medieval and Franciscan History is a member of the International Federation of Institutes for Medieval Studies (F.I.D.E.M.). The “Redemptor Hominis,” so named for John Paul II’s first encyclical letter, was begun in 1982, but it was canonically erected by the Congregation for Catholic Education on July 31, 1986. It seeks to bring “intelligence to the faith” in the training of catechists and others in pastoral service. Lastly, the International Scotist Commission, producing critical editions of the works of John DUNS SCOTUS, is located at the Antoniano.

The library possesses nearly half a million volumes, with particular strengths in Franciscana. It boasts a large number of incunabula that are, as of the year 2001, at the disposal of about 460 students and 110 professors. The multi-lingual periodical Antonianum has been published quarterly since 1926, giving special attention to sacred scripture, theology (dogmatic, moral, and pastoral), history (of the Church, of theology, of spirituality), canon law, philosophy, the human sciences, and especially medieval and Franciscan studies.

Pontificio Ateneo “Regina Apostolorum.” Directed by the LEGIONARIES OF CHRIST, the Pontifical Athenaeum “Regina Apostolorum” was canonically erected by the Congregation for Catholic Education on Sept. 15, 1993, with a faculty of theology and philosophy. The superior general of the Legionaries is the grand chancellor and the Athenaeum is overseen by a “retorre magnifico.” On July 11, 1998, John Paul II granted it the title “pontifical.” It maintains an information center on the human sciences and a center for telecommunications. On April 23, 1999, the Congregation for Catholic Education erected the Higher Institute for Religious Studies “Regina Apostolorum” within the theology faculty and gave it the power to grant the graduate degree Magisterium in Scientiis Religiosis.

The Regina Apostolorum encourages certain pious devotions among its students and faculty, which at the turn of the millennium numbered 529 and 59, respectively. On the first Friday of each month, the Athenaeum community is invited to participate in adoration of the Blessed Sacrament which is solemnly exposed in the chapel. This adoration is offered for the special intentions of the Holy Father. Also, a plenary indulgence may be obtained (under the normal conditions) by visiting the Athenaeum Chapel on March 25 (Feast of the Annunciation), September 15 (Feast of the Virgin of Sorrows), December 12 (Feast of Our Lady of Guadalupe), December 25 (Feast of the Nativity of Our Lord), and on the Solemnity of the Sacred Heart.

Presently, the library of the Athenaeum contains more than 102,000 volumes and receives over 400 different publications. The library was enriched in 1993 by the acquisition of the De la Torre Villar Latin American collection consisting of over 13,000 volumes. The faculty publish a multilingual journal titled Alpha and Omega.

Pontificio Istituto di Musica Sacra. Located on the Via di Torre Rossa, the institute offers various music and liturgical disciplines—for instance, organography and Gregorian chant—with particular attention given to the practical, theoretical, and historical aspects expressed in the diverse cultures that comprise the Church. It trains musicians and forms teachers of sacred music for service around the world. The grand chancellor is the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education. It has an honorary president and a rector and a faculty of some 20 church musicians.

The institute offers the baccalaureate, the license, and the master’s degree in a specialized field. Courses leading to the doctoral degree are also offered. The library is structured to cater to the needs of didactic liturgical activities, as well as for research within the institute. The reading room now occupies the spacious areas previously used by the Commission for the New Vulgate.

Pontificio Istituto di Archeologia Cristiana. The Pontifical Institute of Christian Archeology was created by the motu proprio I primitivi cemeteri of Pius XI on Dec. 11, 1925. Its grand chancellor is the cardinal prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education. In the year 2000, it was the only institute of all the Atenei Romani that had a lay person as rector. Located on the Via Napoleone III, this institute has a fivefold mission. First, it is to gather and place at the researcher's disposal all those tools that will permit the scientific study of monuments and early Christian institutions (photographs, reproductions, books, journals, etc.). Second, it seeks to promote the scientific study of the ancient world generally and the antiquities of Christian Rome in particular. Third, the institute must develop new methodologies for the study of the Christian monuments of Rome, especially in their application to knowledge of the meanings of visible objects. These methodologies may be undertaken either in personal research questions, the exploration of the teaching of sacred archaeology or the institutions of the early Church, or conservation techniques. Fourth, the institute publishes the Revista di Archeologia Cristiana (1926—), together with important monographs on catacombs, monuments, inscriptions, pictures, and sculpture relative to early Christianity. Fifth, it acts as the center for the promotion of the International Congress of Christian Archeology, which meets occasionally in various cities.

Students in this institute enroll in a three-year course for the doctorate. A second course of studies, lasting one year, allows one to obtain a certificate.

Pontificia Facoltà Teologica "San Bonaventura" (Seraphicum). The Theological Faculty of St. Bonaventure is under the direction of the Friars Minor Conventual in Rome. Its patrons are St. ANTHONY OF PADUA (the Evangelical Doctor) and St. BONAVENTURE of Bagnoregio (the Seraphic Doctor), for whom the faculty is named. Erected on June 24, 1905 as the Collegio Serafico Internazionale di San Francesco, the faculty has its roots in the "studi generali" of the Franciscan order. It is thereby the oldest of all the Roman faculties, with its first impulse arising from Franciscan Minister General Elias of Assisi in 1236 and later Alexander of Hales, although it does not possess an unbroken tenure. After the suppression of religious orders in 1873 by the Italian government, it would be 37 years before the Franciscans could re-engage their work.

On July 15, 1561, through his apostolic letter Ut ampliores et uberiores fructus, Pius IV allowed the minister general of the Friars Minor Conventual to permit his faculty to grant the master's degree in the arts and theology. When Sixtus V formally inaugurated the faculty as a Roman college in 1587, he ennobled it with a cardinal protector. Sixtus V, himself a Conventual Franciscan, desired the college to concentrate on the thought of St. Bonaventure, later writing this into the college's statutes by the decree Cum nuper of April 13, 1590. In 1629, a number of Franciscan studia were granted the power to confer the doctorate, including the house in Rome. Extern students were allowed to enroll when the Congregation for Catholic Education approved the faculty's new statutes on March 14, 1973.

Among its distinguished alumni are Lorenzo Ganganelli, who would become Pope Clement XIV (d. 1774), and St. Maximilian Kolbe, who attended from 1912 to 1919. The present site of the Seraphicum is a short distance from the location of St. Paul's martyrdom. The building was formally inaugurated on January 4, 1964. The minister general of the Friars Minor Conventual is the grand chancellor. The faculty maintains a number of affiliations with other Franciscan institutes in Italy and abroad.

Pontificia Facoltà Teologica e Pontificio Istituto di Spiritualità "Teresianum." The Pontifical Faculty of Theology and the Pontifical Institute of Spirituality "Teresianum" are directed by the Discalced CARMELITES of Saints Teresa of Jesus and John of the Cross. The general of the Discalced Carmelite order is the grand chancellor. Through the efforts of the order's superior, William of St. Albert (1878–1947), and at the behest of previous general chapters, the college opened on November 14, 1926 for the theological and spiritual formation of postulants. In 1935 the faculty was authorized to grant licentiate and doctoral degrees in sacred theology. Two of the Carmelite fathers general, Siverio of St. Teresa (1878–1954) and his predecessor, Pier Thomas of the Virgin of Carmel (1896–1946), were able to construct the present campus in the Piazza San Pancrazio in 1954, with a solemn inauguration occurring in April of 1955.

In 1973 a revision of the Teresianum's statutes was approved by the Congregation for Catholic Education, permitting students to specialize either in theological anthropology, unique among the Atenei Romani, or spirituality, through the Institute of Spirituality. This institute, originally founded in 1957, was the hope of Father Gabriel of St. Mary Magdalene (d. 1953) and the Carmelite General Chapter of 1955. The Institute of Spirituality was canonically linked to the theology faculty on Sept. 8, 1964, by the Congregation for Seminaries and Universities. Thereafter it was empowered to grant the license and doctorate in sacred theology with a specialization in spiritual theology. For many years, the institute grew more autonomous from the rest of the Teresianum, both by virtue of its specialization and its statutory construction. Under the norms of the apostolic constitution Sapientia Christiana, the institute sought to re-establish its old links to the rest of the faculty, and on April 8, 1988, the Congregation for Catholic Education formally acknowledged the “Pontificia Facoltà Teologica Teresianum e l’Istituto di Spiritualità.”

On April 28, 1987 the Congregation for Catholic Education incorporated the International Institute of Pastoral Theology Camillianum into the Teresianum. This is under the direction of the Camillians, who minister to the infirm. The same congregation aggregated to the Teresianum the Pontifical Faculty Studium de Notre Dame de Vie, with its center in Venasque, France, on Sept. 21, 1993, as well as the Theological Institute Leoniano di Anagni on June 21, 1995.

The Teresianum’s library was started in 1735, when the headquarters of the Discalced Carmelites in the convent of Santa Maria della Scala was situated in the Palazzo Barberini. In 1896 it received a major gift when Cardinal Raffaele Monaco La Valletta bequeathed to it his library. Similarly, the two Carmelite cardinals, Gerolamo Maria Gotti (d. 1916) and Adeodato Giovanni Piazza (d. 1957), provided significant accessions from their personal collections. In 2001 the library possessed some 350,000 volumes, with important collections on Discalced Carmelite missions and spirituality.

Pontificia Facoltà Teologica “Marianum.” The Pontifical Faculty of Theology “Marianum” is an academic institution entrusted to the care of the Order of the Servants of Mary (the SERVITES). The prior general of the Servite order is the grand chancellor. On Jan. 1, 1971, with the decree of the Congregation for Catholic Education “Theologicas Collegii S. Alexi Falconierii Scholas,” the faculty received the title “pontifical.” It conferred all the rights granted to other pontifical universities and faculties, including permission to grant academic degrees with specializations in Mariology.

The faculty seeks to promote Christian theological reflection on the figure of the Virgin Mary through the six degree programs that it offers: a two-year certificate program in Marian theology; a three-year baccalaureate in theology; a two-year master’s program in theology specializing in Marian theology; a doctoral program in theology specializing in Marian theology; a two-year certificate program in religious studies; and a two-year certificate program in the history and spirituality of the Order of the Servants of Mary. In 2000 it was home to 47 professors and 215 students, both clerical and lay.

Founded in 1950, the Marianum library is the successor of two previous Servite theological libraries in Rome, namely, the Henry of Ghent College library (1666–1870) and that of its successor school, Saint Alexis Falconieri International College library (1895–1950). In 1917 the Servants of Mary formalized a Marian section in the Saint Alexis library as part of an International Marian Center. As the library of the Marianum Pontifical Faculty of Theology, the Marian collection became its primary concern. By 2000 it numbered about 20,000 volumes and was one of the world’s largest collections on the subject. In 1946 Pius XII placed about 3,000 volumes dealing with Marian subjects in the custody of the library. In 1956 Pius XII gave the library all of the documentation sent to the Holy See on the occasion of the Marian Year of 1954. In August of 1988, the Holy See’s secretary of state gave the library the archive of the Consilium Primarium Anno Mariali, pertaining to the Marian Year of 1987 and 1988. Another section, while incomplete, nevertheless contains the largest amount of material on the Servite order in the world. In 2001, the library had a collection of about 105,000 books and close to 1,400 serials.

The faculty publishes the journal Marianum, founded in 1939 by Fr. Gabriele M. Roschini, O.S.M. as a multi-lingual periodical concentrating on Marian theology, especially from the Christological, ecclesiological, and ecumenical perspectives, and studies of the figure of Mary in doctrinal, historico-cultural, literary, and artistic aspects.

Pontificio Istituto di Studi Arabi e d’Islamistica. The Pontifical Institute of Arab and Islamic Studies began in Tunisia in 1926 and was canonically erected by the Congregation for Seminaries and Universities on March 19, 1960. It is directed by the Missionaries of Africa. The cardinal prefect of the Congregation for Catholic Education is the grand chancellor and the superior general of the Missionaries of Africa is the vice-chancellor. It was given the title “Institut Pontifical d’Etudes Orientales” and charged with developing pastoral sensitivities among clergy and laity to the Arabic language and letters, as well as the religion and institutions of Islam. In 1964 it was transferred to Rome, where later the Holy See renamed it the “Pontificio Istituto di Studi Arabi.” It is located on the Viale di Trastevere. The Congregation for Catholic Education, through decrees of May 18, 1965; May 19, 1966; and May 25, 1980, enabled the institute to confer the doctorate under the norms of its statutes.

Pontificia Facoltà di Scienze dell’Educazione “Auxilium.” The Pontifical Faculty of the Science of Education “Auxilium” was canonically erected by the Congregation for Catholic Education under the name of the “Istituto delle Figlie di Maria Ausiliatrice” on June 27, 1970. At the end of 1954, the original Istituto delle Figlie di Maria Ausiliatrice was founded in Torino as the International Institute of Pedagogy and Religious Studies. It was reconstituted by the Congregation for Religious on July 13, 1956. On Jan. 31, 1966, through a decree of the Congregation for Seminaries and Universities, this institute was incorporated into the Higher Institute for Pedagogy at the Pontificio Ateneo Salesiano in Rome. It was made juridically and academically autonomous by statute in 1970. However, it has kept its links to the Salesianum insofar as the institute's grand chancellor is the major rector of the Society of Don Bosco, who is also the grand chancellor of the Salesianum. In 1978 the faculty occupied a site in Rome along the Via Cremolina. On July 25, 1986, the Auxilium was given power to confer the graduate degree of "Magisterium in Scientiis Religiosis" within the Higher Institute for Religious Studies. In 2000 there were 53 faculty members and 364 students enrolled. The library collection numbered about 50,000 volumes, with 663 periodicals.

PONTIGNY, ABBEY OF

Second daughter abbey of CÎTEAUX (Lat., Pontiniacum), founded in 1114 in France in the former Diocese of Auxerre (the present Diocese of Sens). The first abbot, Hugh of Mâcon, entered Cîteaux with St. BER-NARD and later became bishop of Auxerre (1136). The second abbot, Guichard, was archbishop of Lyons in 1165. William, archbishop of Bourges in 1199, had been a monk at Pontigny. Between 1160 and 1240, three archbishops from Canterbury in conflict with the English king found refuge at Pontigny: THOMAS BECKET (1164), STEPHEN LANGTON (1207), and EDMUND OF ABINGDON (1240); the last-named was buried at Pontigny and his grave became the object of pilgrimage. As a result of war, the abbey experienced serious financial difficulties. Conditions had begun to improve under the last abbot when the French Revolution broke out. The buildings were sold, the abbey church became a parish church, and the cult of St. Edmund was reestablished. The buildings were occupied for a time by the Fathers of the Society of Saint Edmund; later (1910–39) Paul Desjardins bought and restored the buildings for his Union pour la vérité, a moral, areligious movement that inspired especially the Nouvelle revue française. Then, after having sheltered a Franco-American college, they became in 1952 the seat of a prelate nullius of the Mission de France.

PONTILLO, EGIDIO MARIA DI SAN GIUSEPPE, ST.

Baptized Francesco Antonio, also known as Giles Mary of St. Joseph, Franciscan lay brother; b. Nov. 16, 1729, near Taranto (Apulia), Italy; d. Feb. 7, 1812, Naples. He practiced his father's trade of rope making and supported the family with this skill after his father's death (1747). Before entering the Alcantarine Franciscans at Galatone, Lecce, Italy (1754) under the impetus of an extraordinary spiritual experience, he led a very devout life and participated zealously in the activities of the Sodality of Our Lady of the Rosary. From 1759 to 1812 Egidio lived at the friary of San Paolo a Chiara in Naples, where he labored as cook, porter, and alms gatherer (quaestor). His simplicity and serenity won him the affection of the Neapolitan sick and poor, among whom he propagated devotion to Mary and Joseph. He was beatified Feb. 5, 1888, and canonized by John Paul II at Rome, June 2, 1996.

PONTIUS OF BALMEY, BL.

Carthusian, bishop of Belley; d. Meyriat, France, Dec. 13, 1140. Of noble lineage, Pontius (Ponce) became a canon and schoolman at Lyons. In 1116, deeding his own property for the purpose, he founded the charterhouse of Meyriat, entered the CARTHUSIAN Order, and made his profession at the Abbey of La Grande-Chartreuse. Two years later Pontius was named prior at Meyriat, and in 1121 he was elected bishop of Belley. About 1134, however, he resigned from his see and returned to Meyriat to spend his last days in solitude. The theological works attributed to him by the anonymous author of a late 12th-century vita are lost.

PONTIUS OF FAUCIGNY, BL.

Abbot; b. early 12th century; d. Abbey of Sixt, Savoy (now in Switzerland), Nov. 26, 1178. From a noble family of Savoy, Pontius (or Ponce) entered the Abbey of ABONDANCE near Chablais as a CANON regular of St. Augustine at about 20 years of age. He revised the constitutions of this foundation and was instrumental in the organization of a daughterhouse at Sixt, in Savoy, of which he was made the first abbot (1144). In 1154 he saw to the elevation of the Priory of Entremont to the status of an abbey. After about 26 years at Sixt, Pontius was elected in 1171 to succeed Burchard as abbot of Abondance. The following year he raised Grandval to the rank of an abbey. After a few years he resigned his office and returned to Sixt to die a simple monk. On Nov. 14, 1620, FRANCIS DE SALES, bishop of Geneva, who held the abbot in high esteem, opened his tomb and arranged for the translation of his relics to the abbey church. Pope LEO XIII confirmed his cult in 1896.

POOR CHILD JESUS, SISTERS OF THE

(PCJ, Official Catholic Directory #3220); founded, 1844 at Aachen, Germany, by Mother Clara FEY for the care and education of children and young people. The constitutions were based on the Augustinian Rule and were approved definitively by Rome in 1888. Assisting in the foundation and early spread of the congregation were Bishop Laurent; André Fey, brother of the foundress; and Wilhelm Sartorius, her spiritual director and composer of the first rule. The congregation, expanded from the Rhineland throughout Germany, Austria, and Luxembourg. The sisters who were expelled from Germany during the KULTURKAMPF went to Holland, Belgium, France, and England. Upon their return, they reoccupied their former houses. During the 20th century new foundations were made in Italy, Spain, Latvia, Java, and the Americas. The sisters established their first American house at Parkersburg, West Virginia, in 1924. The generalate is at Simpelveld, Holland; the U.S. headquarters is in Columbus, Ohio.

POOR CLARES

An order of contemplative nuns, originally called the Poor Ladies, founded at Assisi, Italy, in 1212. They comprised the Second Order of St. Francis and took their inspiration from him, under the leadership of St. CLARE OF ASSISI. At 18 years of age Clare received the habit from the hands of FRANCIS OF ASSISI in the Portiuncula (now incorporated into the basilica of St. Mary of the Angels in Assisi). After a sojourn with Benedictine nuns, Clare and her followers were established by Francis in the convent of San Damiano near Assisi, where she remained until her death in 1253. Her followers subsequently became known under various titles, among which the more prominent are: Poor Clares (PC), the Order of St. Clare (OSC), and Poor Clares of St. Colette (PCC).

POOR HANDMAIDS OF JESUS CHRIST

(PHJC, Official Catholic Directory #3230); known also as the Ancilla Domini Sisters, a congregation of religious women founded in 1851 at Dernbach bei Montaubaur, Germany, by Katharina KASPER (Mother Mary), with the sanction of Bp. Peter Joseph Blum of Limburg. When the foundress died in 1898, the congregation numbered 2,000 members and staffed 193 missions in Germany, Holland, England, and the U.S. The rules and constitutions of the Poor Handmaids, modeled on those of St. Vincent de Paul, received temporary papal approval in 1870 and were finally confirmed by Leo XIII.

In 1868, at the request of Bp. John Henry Luers of Fort Wayne, IN, the congregation made a foundation in his diocese at Hessen Cassel, where the sisters engaged in teaching and home nursing. Within a year they had established their motherhouse and a hospital (St. Joseph's) in Fort Wayne, with Sister M. Rose as first provincial. From it were founded St. Anne's and St. Elizabeth's in Chicago, IL; St. Mary Mercy, Gary, IN; St. Catherine's, East Chicago, IN; St. Mary's, East St. Louis, IL; and smaller institutions in Indiana, Wisconsin, and Minnesota. The congregation's Angel Guardian Orphanage in Chicago was opened in 1868 and early adopted the cottage system.

In the U.S., the congregation is involved in academic education at all levels, child care, healthcare, retirement homes, parish ministries, and retreats. The generalate is in Dernbach, Westerwald, Germany. Since 1922 the American motherhouse and novitiate has been located in Donaldson, IN.

POOR SERVANTS OF THE MOTHER OF GOD

(SMG, Official Catholic Directory #3640); founded, 1869, in London by Frances Margaret TAYLOR, aided by Lady Georgiana Fullerton (1812–85). The congregation, which follows an adaptation of the rule of the JESUITS, received final papal approval in 1900. It engages in a variety of apostolic works. When the foundress died in 1900, there were 12 houses. The sisters came to the U.S. in 1947. In the U.S., the sisters are engaged in education, healthcare, pastoral ministries, retreats and spiritual direction. The motherhouse is in London, England; the U.S. headquarters is in High Point, NC.

POOR SISTERS OF JESUS CRUCIFIED AND THE SORROWFUL MOTHER

A diocesan congregation (CJC; Official Catholic Directory 3240) founded in Pennsylvania by the Lithuanian Passionist priest, Rev. Alphonsus Maria Urbanavicius, C.P., for works of charity among newly arrived coal-mining families. The congregation is familiarly known as the “Sisters of Jesus Crucified.” The principal patrons of the community are the Sorrowful Mother, St. Joseph, and St. Paul of the Cross. The congregation was begun in 1924 in the Diocese of Scranton, Pa., where its pioneer members received initial training under the guidance of the Sister Servants of the Immaculate Heart of Mary. The novitiate and motherhouse were established at Saint Mary’s Villa, Elmhurst, Pa. With the gradual increase of members, the sisters began to teach the youth and nurse the aged in the states of Pennsylvania and Massachusetts, and later in Kansas, Connecticut, and New York. In 1945, in response to the invitation of Archbishop Richard J. Cushing, the motherhouse was transferred to the Archdiocese of Boston. The new headquarters and the novitiate were established at Our Lady of Sorrows Convent, Brockton, Mass. In the mid-1960s, the congregation reached its peak membership of over 100 professed members. Even though the number of professed sisters has fallen, they still carry on the mission of the congregation: to extend the love and compassion of Jesus Crucified. The congregation conducts healthcare facilities, St. Mary’s Villa Nursing Home and St. Mary’s Villa Residence, in Elmhurst, Pa. In association with Covenant Health Systems, the Sisters of Jesus Crucified sponsor St. Joseph Manor Health Care, Inc. and Mater Dei Adult Day Care in Brockton, Mass.

POOR SISTERS OF NAZARETH

(PSN, Official Catholic Directory #3242); a religious congregation with papal approval (1899), set up in 1851 in London by Mother St. Basil (Victoire Larmenier, 1827–78) under the patronage of Cardinal WISEMAN. The sisters left France to begin work in England at the request of the cardinal, having for their purpose the care of the aged, together with the care and education of underprivileged infants and children. The first house in the U.S. opened in 1924. The motherhouse is in Hammersmith, London, England. The U.S. regional headquarters is in Los Angeles, CA.

POOR SOULS

The term used to designate the souls of the just who are suffering in PURGATORY. The adjective “poor” has no sanction in the official language of the Church, probably being used to indicate that these souls cannot help themselves to escape the punishments that they must undergo for their sins.

POPE

As a name, it is derived from the Latin papa, in turn derived from the Greek πάππας (πάππας), which in classical Greek was a child’s word for father. Papa and πάππας appear in Christian literature from the beginning of the 3d century as a title used of bishops, suggesting their spiritual paternity. From the 3d to the 5th century the name was applied to all bishops, but in the 6th century it began to be reserved to the bishops of Rome. The first writer to do this with any consistency was Magnus Felix ENNODIUS (d. 521). The practice of restricting the title to the Roman bishops has been universal in the Western Church since the 8th century.

The office of the pope is described in the Annuario pontificio (official directory of the HOLY SEE) by the following titles: “Bishop of Rome, Vicar of Jesus Christ, Successor of the Chief of the Apostles, Supreme Pontiff of the Universal Church, Patriarch of the West, Primate of Italy, Archbishop and Metropolitan of the Roman Province, Sovereign of the State of Vatican City.” Of these titles, the basis of all the rest is the third, Successor of the Chief of the Apostles. VATICAN COUNCIL I defined that Christ constituted St. PETER chief of all the APOSTLES and visible head of the whole Church militant, granting him a PRIMACY not merely of honor but of true jurisdiction; that Christ established that Peter should have perpetual successors in this primacy; and that the Roman bishops are these successors (Enchiridion symbolorum 3055, 3058). The pope, then, being bishop of Rome and successor of Peter in his primacy, is the supreme PONTIFF of the universal Church. The term pontifex, used in classical Latin of the members of the college of high priests, began to be used of bishops late in the 4th century. The term supreme pontiff applied to the pope means that he is the first and chief bishop in the Church, and head of the episcopal college, having truly episcopal authority over all the faithful and all pastors, whether singly or all together (Vatican I, Enchiridion symbolorum 3060). As Christ, the good shepherd (Jn 10.11), before His Ascension appointed Peter pastor of all His flock (Jn 21.15–17), thus leaving him as His visible substitute or vicar on earth, endowed with the KEYS and the power of BINDING AND LOOSING (Mt 16.19), so also the pope, as successor to St. Peter, is the vicar of Christ for the spiritual government of the universal Church. The titles Patriarch of the West, Primate of Italy, and Archbishop of the Roman Province are based on the principle that the Roman see, being that of St. Peter, is the chief see of any jurisdictional area of the Church of which it is a part. The last of the titles in the Annuario is based on the Lateran Treaty, by which Vatican City is recognized by Italy as a sovereign state with the pope as its temporal ruler.

[F. A. SULLIVAN]

POPE, ALEXANDER

Poet; b. London, May 21, 1688; d. Twickenham, May 30, 1744. His mother was a member of an old Catholic Yorkshire family and his father a devout convert to Catholicism. Pope's formal education was desultory and his life ill-starred in many ways: he belonged to a proscribed "sect"; he was deformed and suffered ill health throughout his life; and he was hypersensitive. On the other hand, he had more than the usual allotment of courage, and he was unquestionably the most talented writer of his generation.

Early Work. His earliest published work, four graceful Vergilian Pastorals (1709), showed the poetic promise that was more than amply fulfilled in his Essay on Criticism (1711), which, if derivative, incorporating ideas from Aristotle, Horace, Vida, and Boileau, nevertheless possesses a sprightliness, a jauntiness of its own. Old truths are given a new relevance; each line, each couplet is marvelously felicitous. The first version of The Rape of the Lock, the most delightful of English mock-heroic poems, appeared in 1712. The occasion, a foolish quarrel between two prominent Catholic English families over a social indiscretion, the impulsive and playful snipping of a lock of hair from the head of Miss Arabella Fermor by Lord Petre, teased Pope into a jocular treatment designed to persuade the participants in the feud to make sense. The poem is, however, much more than an occasional piece; it was simultaneously lighthearted, amusing, good-humored, persuasive—and a profound study of the values men live by. Pope obviously found the poem a challenge and two years later published an expanded and far superior version.

The restless interest in technique exhibited by neoclassical poets has been largely unnoticed. Between the two versions of The Rape of the Lock, Pope tried another classical genre, the topographical poem. Windsor Forest (1713) is important on many counts. It not only suggests that Pope (and his contemporaries) could appreciate external nature, even before Wordsworth publicized the Lake District; it hints that the kind of moralized description of nature that James Thomson made popular in The Seasons (and that has accordingly been viewed as a kind of foreshadowing of English Romanticism) was not foreign to neoclassicism. Further, it shows Pope's deep concern with the urgent issues of his day, e.g., the Peace of Utrecht that brought a long war with France to an end and was looked upon as the dawn of a new age of peace and prosperity.

Translations. If neoclassical poets were very much aware of contemporary events, they were also excessively respectful toward the achievements of the past. Pope not only imitated the classical pastoral and eclogue (as in Windsor Forest), but he devoted many years of his creative life to translating Homer. Classical scholars even in his own day complained that he had done violence to the spirit of the original. He had. He meant to. Samuel Johnson, however, called Pope's Iliad (1715–20) "a performance which no age or nation can pretend to equal." Johnson was much more perceptive than many of his contemporaries. He understood that Pope was not preparing a translation for schoolboys but rather a new poem for sophisticated readers.

This translation brought Pope a considerable fortune. He bought (not only for himself but for his mother, whom he idolized) a villa at Twickenham on the Thames, and amused himself with gardening and with the decorating of a fantastic grotto. He went on to translate the Odyssey (12 books, completed 1725), also a great financial success, and began work on an edition of Shakespeare's plays (completed 1725). His editorial principles in this labor are calculated to horrify a modern editor. But his determination to make Shakespeare available to his generation, to men brought up with the tastes (and prejudices) that he shared, makes his Shakespeare all of a piece with his Homer. The fact that his Homer has, to some extent, survived, while his Shakespeare is but a curiosity, is a kind of accident of history.

While Pope was still working on his translation of the Iliad, the first collected volume of his poetry appeared (1717), notable for its inclusion of two poems not hitherto published: Verses to the Memory of an Unfortunate Lady and Eloisa to Abelard. These two famous poems are often thought to represent a somewhat aberrant romantic strain in Pope; actually Eloisa is classical and Ovidian, and the Verses exhibit an awareness of the language and of the attitudinizing of classical tragedy. They remain interesting evidence of the many-sidedness of Pope's genius and of his interest in problems of form.

Satires. Pope's later work is chiefly satirical. His reworkings of the satires of Horace and Donne are notable, but perhaps the best known is the Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1735), which became the Prologue to the Satires and which contains the famous sketches of Addison and Lord Hervey. The fundamental seriousness of the satires is also to be found in Pope's Moral Essays (1733), and the impetus behind the Moral Essays is the same impetus that gave the world the incomparable Essay on Man (1733–34). The profundity of this poem, its relationship to the permanent ethical problems that confront mankind, its dependence on traditional theology and philosophy, have only recently begun to be sensed. The "sublime" is one of the critical shibboleths of the 18th century. Pope's characteristic utterance was anti-sublime, but in the Essay on Man it mysteriously blended the cool common sense of the 18th century with an amazing awareness of the heights and depths of the mystery of the universe. He achieved the same kind of marvel in the Dunciad (1728–43). The conclusion of its fourth book is one of the most sublime and most frighteningly prophetic passages in English poetry.

Religious Background and Reputation. In spite of his family background, Pope's grasp of the fundamentals of his faith seems never to have been conspicuously firm. Not a few of his critics have accused him of paying lip service to Catholicism while actually professing the fashionable DEISM of his day. Doubtless Pope was somewhat affected by what seemed to be the enlightened and magnanimous principles of Deism, but careful readers have become increasingly convinced that these Deistic elements in his thought have been overly stressed. His lifelong adherence to Catholicism, even after the death of his beloved parents and even when the advantages of a change of allegiance were obvious and their practical benefits actively urged by influential friends, demonstrates that his religious profession was more than nominal.

The history of Pope's reputation is singularly complex: in his own time he was both extravagantly admired and hated for the cleverness and ruthlessness of his personal satires. To the 19th century in general, Pope's poetry seemed that of a bygone age; its power was not felt, and his genius not apprehended. And a myth grew in which Pope was represented as a venomous monster, twisted in body and mind. New perspectives have gradually developed, however, and Pope is now almost universally recognized as one of the outstanding geniuses in the English tradition. The alleged "savageness" of his attacks on the fools and dunces of his day is now seen to be a brave man's defense of himself against conscienceless enemies—and also an implicit profession of belief in a highly moral and nobly humane credo.

POPE, HUGH

Scripture scholar and preacher; b. Kenilworth, Warwickshire, England, Aug. 5, 1869; d. Edinburgh, Nov. 22, 1946. Educated at the Oratory School under Cardinal NEWMAN, Henry Vincent Pope became a Dominican and received the name of Hugh in 1891. After his ordination at Hawkesyard, Staffordshire, in 1896, he became a lector of theology in 1898, and later professor of Scripture at Hawkesyard until his appointment to the same post in the Collegio Angelico at Rome in 1909. In that year he gained the doctorate of Scripture from the Pontifical Biblical Commission, and in 1911 the master's degree in theology. Returning home, he held, from 1914 to 1920, the priorship of Woodchester, where he began a course of open-air lectures on Christian doctrine that helped to develop the future nationwide Catholic Evidence Guild. From 1920 to 1932 he was in control as regent of Dominican studies in England, and afterward held in succession the priorship of Hawkesyard (1935–41) and the office of vicar of St. Albert's in Edinburgh, where he died. He was a preacher always in demand and a writer of an immense output, principally scriptural works, of which the chief are The Date of Deuteronomy; Catholic Aids to the Bible, 5 v.; The Layman's New Testament; The Church and the Bible; and The Life and Times of Saint Augustine of Hippo.

POPES, ELECTION OF

Any consideration of the election of the pope is founded upon the teaching of the Church concerning succession to the papacy, the history of papal elections, and the present legislation governing such elections.

Catholics accept on divine and Catholic faith that the Holy Father is the successor of Peter. He attains the primacy of Peter by succeeding to the See that Peter established. But the method of selection, who selects, and how the Holy See is vacated are matters of ecclesiastical law and not divine decree. The pope has the freedom and the right not only to make, but also to abrogate, derogate, or alter a law concerning papal elections. Therefore the code of rules that is in effect is at the disposal of the pope. He could alter it, and he could even appoint a successor since there is nothing here that is determined by faith.

The ways in which the papacy may be vacated also admit of diversity. Physical death is the usual manner of vacating the see of Peter, but irremedial loss of reason (mental death) and resignation are legitimate means. The pope, however, since he has supreme power, can never be deposed.

History. Until the 4th century the method of election of the bishop of Rome did not differ considerably from that used in other bishoprics. The neighboring bishops, the Roman clergy, and the laity of Rome each participated in the election. Since the role of these various classes of electors was somewhat unclear and the office was one of extreme importance, the procedure was open to abuse. Consequently, with the advent of the Christian Roman emperors (4th century) the imperial influence was brought to bear on papal elections.

From the 4th to the 11th century the influence of temporal rulers in papal elections reached its zenith. Not only the Roman emperors but also, in their turn, the Ostrogoth kings of Italy and the Carolingian emperors attempted to control the selection of the Roman pontiff. This civil intervention ranged from the approval of elected candidates to the actual nomination of candidates (with tremendous pressure exerted on the electors to secure their acceptance), and even to the extreme of forcible deposition and imposition. It was at this time that, in an attempt to avoid the inevitable disputes that accompanied papal elections, two popes—Felix IV (526–530) and Boniface II (530–532)—proceeded to the rather striking innovation of naming their own successors. Their right to do so, however, was not generally accepted by the electors and, as a result, the attempts were for the most part ineffectual.

The history of papal elections from the 11th to the 16th century is characterized by the gradual development of the conclave as we know it today. The first important step in the attempt to reform papal elections was taken by Pope Nicholas II on April 13, 1059, at the Council of Rome. The decree, which he published, declared that the papal electors were henceforth to be only the higher clergy of Rome (i.e., the cardinals) with the rest of the clergy and the laity permitted merely to give approbation to the election. The emperor was likewise to be informed of the results of the election and allowed to confirm the choice that had already been made, although it was made clear that this was only a concession granted to him by the Holy See. Provisions were made also for holding the election outside the city of Rome if conditions warranted. (See PAPAL ELECTION DECREE [1059].)

At the Lateran Council of 1179 Pope Alexander III, in the apostolic constitution Licet de vitanda discordia, further stipulated that all cardinals were to be considered equal, and that a two-thirds majority of the votes was necessary for a valid election. With the passage of time it became apparent that the college of cardinals was on occasion prone to delay its selection of a pope and, as a result, to inflict upon the Church the harmful effects of a long interregnum. To remedy this situation, Gregory X, by means of his bull Ubi periculum (1274), instituted the conclave system of strict seclusion in order to secure a more rapid papal succession. Further modifications were added in 1562 by Pope Pius IV who issued regulations regarding the method of voting in the conclave through his bull In eligendis.

The method of election established by the end of the 16th century has remained for the most part intact, with various modifications and codifications of existing regulations effected by several pontiffs as the need arose. In 1882 Pope Leo XIII published his constitution Praeaeccussores nostri, which contained a number of modifications of electoral procedure. Pius X, through his bull Commissum nobis (Jan. 20, 1904), effectively removed any remnants of secular influence, and on Dec. 25, 1904, he issued the constitution Vacante Sede Apostolica that was for the most part simply a codification of prior legislation. The current rules governing elections are those established by Paul VI (apostolic constitution Romano pontifici eligendo [1975]) and revised by John Paul II (apostolic constitution Universi dominici gregis [1996]).

Procedure. Preparation for the Conclave. It is the duty of the dean of the sacred college of cardinals to notify all the cardinals of the vacancy of the Holy See and to call them to the election of the new pontiff. These in turn are bound in virtue of holy obedience to respond to this summons and to proceed immediately to the place designated for the election, unless they are detained by a legitimate obstacle that is recognized as such by the sacred college of cardinals. After 18 days at most have elapsed since the vacancy of the Holy See, as many cardinals as are present enter the conclave and proceed to the business of the election. If a cardinal should arrive after the conclave has begun, but before a pope has been elected, he is admitted. In such a case, however, the newcomer must take up his duties at whatever stage of progress the conclave has reached at the time of his arrival.

The cardinals will be lodged in the Domus Sanctae Marthae, a new accommodation that will certainly do away with the strictures to shorten the length of the conclave as conceived by Pope Bl. Gregory X in his constitution Ubi periculum (1274). The cardinals will have to be transported to the traditional voting place: the Sistine Chapel. The chapel itself is to be carefully checked, by “trustworthy individuals of proven technical ability, in order to ensure that no audiovisual equipment has been secretly installed for recording and transmission to the outside” (Universi dominici gregis 51).

At the appointed time, after the dean of the sacred college has celebrated a Mass in honor of the Holy Spirit, the cardinals hear an oration warning them of the sacredness of their duties, and on the same day they begin the conclave. After a brief entrance ceremony all outsiders are excluded, the cardinals repeat their oath, and all others who have not yet taken the oath, now swear to abide by all the rules and prescriptions of the conclave. At this point the conclave is closed within and without, and its closure is duly certified.

The Conclave. On the morning following the sealing of the conclave, all the cardinals present gather in the appointed chapel for the celebration of Mass, the reception of Communion, and the recitation of the hymn Veni, Creator Spiritus. After this, they proceed immediately to the matter of the election.

The mode of the election is by secret, paper ballot. For a valid election the candidate must receive two-thirds of the votes of the cardinals; if the number of the cardinals present cannot be divided into three equal parts, another vote is required for the validity of his election.

Election by ballot is divided into three stages: preparatory steps, the actual casting of ballots, and subsequent tallying and recording of the votes. In the preparatory stage two or three ballots of a set form are distributed to each cardinal. Then, three tellers for the election are chosen from among the cardinals by lot, as well as three to bring the ballots of the sick, and three to review the results of the election. After all the officials are chosen, the cardinals write the name of the candidate they favor on the ballot. They alter the style of their penmanship to help prevent recognition, and they write only one name on the ballot. When finished, they fold the ballot once lengthwise.

In the actual casting of the ballots, each cardinal in turn approaches the altar according to the order of precedence. He carries the folded ballot between the first two fingers of his right hand. He kneels for a short prayer, and on rising he testifies in a clear voice that as Christ the Lord will be his Judge, he is choosing whom he judges according to God should be chosen. Then he places his ballot on the provided paten, and with the paten he places it into a chalice. He bows to the altar and returns to his place. After all the ballots have been cast, the first teller covers the chalice with the paten and shakes it a few times to mix the ballots. If the number of ballots corresponds to the number of cardinals, the election process continues; if not, all the ballots are burned and the vote must be taken up again. When all have been counted, the three tellers read each ballot successively, and the third one reads aloud the name appearing on each ballot. All the cardinals can keep a record of the voting. The last teller strings all the ballots together and puts the ensemble into an empty chalice or on a table to one side.

The tallying and recording of the votes is performed officially by the tellers, even if the outcome of the balloting is already obvious. They count all the votes any candidate has received. Not until one receives at least the necessary two-thirds of the votes, is a pope canonically and validly elected. The three official cardinal reviewers chosen at the beginning then verify the whole procedure by a careful examination. Then the tellers burn the ballots, whether a pope has been elected or not. If, when no one was elected, there is to be a second balloting immediately following, the ballots of both are burned together. There are to be two such sessions in the morning and two in the afternoon every day until a pope is elected.

When a pope has been canonically elected, the dean of the cardinals, in the name of the whole college, asks him if he accepts his election as pope. When he answers in the affirmative within the time set by the majority vote of the cardinals, he is duly elected and true pope having full and absolute jurisdiction over the whole Church. Once the pope-elect accepts his election, the conclave is at its end as far as any canonical effects are concerned.

Previously, at a time designated by the pope, the eldest cardinal deacon would crown the new pope with the triple tiara of the papacy. This has been replaced with the "solemn ceremony of the inauguration of the Pontificate" (Universi dominici gregis 92), the praxis introduced by John Paul I in 1978.

Current Legislation. The apostolic constitution Romano pontifici eligendo of Pope Paul VI (Oct. 1, 1975; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 67 [1975] 609–645) introduced numerous changes in the legislation regarding papal elections, while retaining many traditional elements.

Electors, Cardinals Only. In addresses given on March 5, 1973, and March 24, 1973, Paul VI announced his intention of consulting interested persons to see whether Oriental patriarchs who were not cardinals, as well as the members of the Council of the General Secretariat of the Synod of Bishops should participate in papal elections. The results of the consultation were not conclusive and, hence, only those persons who have been named cardinals of the Church were to be electors (Romano pontifici eligendo 33).

Number and Age of Electors. The number of electors is limited now to 120. While formerly the number of cardinals was fixed at 70, each cardinal could bring two or three assistants to the conclave. Currently, only in exceptional cases may an infirmarian accompany an elector, thus reducing the overall number of participants (ibid. 33, 45). Following upon the prescriptions of the motu proprio Ingravescentem aetatem of Nov. 21, 1970, only those cardinals who have not completed their 80th year of age are eligible to vote in papal elections (ibid. 33).

The Conclave. The conclave is not required for validity (ibid. 41), but is to be understood as a carefully determined place, a kind of sacred retreat, where the cardinal electors choose the supreme pontiff and where they remain day and night until the election is complete (ibid. 42). New norms regarding the observance of secrecy provide for an examination of the premises to determine whether listening devices or other such instruments have been introduced into the quarters (ibid. 55, 61). These precautions, as well as the other norms, have two purposes: to ensure a free election and to provide for a rapid carrying out of the business to be transacted.

Episcopal Character. If the newly elected pope is a bishop, he is immediately bishop of Rome and head of the episcopal college. He possesses and can exercise full and supreme power over the universal Church. If, however, the elected person does not possess the episcopal character, he is to be immediately ordained a bishop. This change is in line with Vatican Council II's teaching on the unity that is to exist between the power of orders and the power of jurisdiction (Lumen gentium 22).

Period of Prayer. If no person is elected after three days of voting, a day is to be allowed to pass without voting (Romano pontifici eligendo 76). The electors are to pray and may converse freely among themselves. Two other such days are foreseen if the ballots are not conclusive. After this point, forms of compromise may be adopted.

Pastoral Dimensions. The cardinals are strongly exhorted not to be guided by likes or dislikes in electing the pope, but to vote for the person whom they judge most fit to rule the universal Church (ibid. 85). Likewise, the entire Church is to be united in a special way with those who are electing a supreme pontiff: the election is to be considered the action of the entire Church, and, thus, prayers are to be offered in every city and in other places as well for the successful outcome of the election (ibid. 85).

Other Simplifications. Matters of lesser importance include changes in the various excommunications to be levied against those who do not observe secrecy (ibid. 46, 58) and prescriptions regarding photographs to be taken of the deceased pontiff (ibid. 30). An ecumenical council or a synod of bishops that may have been in progress at the death of a pope is automatically suspended pending authorization by the newly elected pontiff to proceed (ibid. 34).

Universi dominici gregis maintains all the essential elements of Romano Pontifici eligendo: the powers of the College of Cardinals during the vacancy of the Apostolic See are limited and well defined; the cardinals of age remain the sole electors of the pontiff; the election is to take place in the secrecy, under pain of excommunication, of the conclave; and two-thirds of the votes are required for election unless there is a prolonged deadlock. The introduction identifies the reason for the new document as “the awareness of the Church’s changed situation . . . and the need to take into consideration the general revision of Canon Law.” But at the same time it has been careful “in formulating the new discipline, not to depart in substance from the wise and venerable tradition already established.”

The most significant changes introduced by the constitution concern the rules for electing the pope. The previous legislation had established that if there was a deadlock after 33 ballots and periods of prayer, exhortation, and consultation, the cardinals could unanimously agree to change the required two-thirds of the votes for a valid election to election by an absolute majority or else a vote in which there are only two candidates, namely, the two who received the most votes in the immediately preceding balloting. Universi dominici gregis changed the required unanimity to an absolute majority; it also specified that if the cardinals agreed to hold a vote between the two previous leading vote-getters, only an absolute majority is required for election (no. 75). This last point had not been clearly specified before. The constitution also abolished two of the three methods of election: by acclamation and by compromise (in case of deadlock, allowed the cardinals to delegate their votes to a small committee of their own). Secret, paper ballot is now the only valid way to elect the Roman pontiff (no. 62). In a further, slight modification, the constitution requires two-thirds of the votes for a canonical election. Both Paul VI and Pius XII had required that one vote would be added to the traditional two-thirds established by Alexander III in his constitution Licet de vitanda in 1179. The reason behind the extra vote was to guarantee that the elected had obtained the traditional percentage even if he had voted for himself. The only instance in which the plus one vote will be required is if the total number of cardinals voting is not divisible by three (no. 62).

Universi dominici gregis maintains the limitation of the total number of electors to 120 and the prohibition of the cardinals who are 80 years of age from participating in the conclave, though it moves the date at which the age limit is enforced from the beginning of the conclave to the death of the previous pontiff (no. 33). The over-80 cardinals are asked, “by virtue of the singular bond with the Apostolic See which the Cardinalate represents,” to lead the prayers of the faithful in Rome and elsewhere asking for divine assistance for the cardinal electors (no. 85). The only reason a cardinal elector can be excluded from voting is if he refuses to enter the conclave or abandons it with no valid cause and without the permission of the majority of the participating cardinals (no. 40).

POPES, LIST OF

This list of popes is taken from Annuario Pontificio for 2001, and it reflects the results of the most recent historical research. For the first two centuries of the Christian era the dates of the pontificates are not secure, and until the middle of the eleventh century there often remain doubts as to the precise day and month. The Annuario has formatted this list so that “two or three dates at the beginning of the pontificate indicate the election, ordination and coronation from which pontiffs were accustomed to calculate their pontificates.” The last date reflects the pope’s death, deposition, or resignation. When dates of consecutive pontiffs overlap, it is often because the validity of a papal election was disputed, and it is difficult to determine the party that has the legitimate claim, “which, existing de facto, assures the legitimate and unbroken continuation of the successors of St. Peter (A.P., p. 12*).” The names in square brackets are those of antipopes.

The liturgical books and hagiography of the Church consider as martyrs all popes before Sylvester I (314–335) and as saints those from Sylvester I to Felix IV (526–530) inclusive. There are two exceptions, Liberius (352–366) and Anastasius II (496–498).

Throughout the almost 2,000 year history of the papacy, anomalies have arisen in regard to the sequential numbers given to popes who have had or chose certain names. Antipope Felix (355–366) was erroneously confused with St Felix, a Roman martyr and was given a place in the list of Roman pontiffs as Felix II. Thus the next two legitimate popes who were named “Felix” have been called Felix III (483–492) and Felix IV (526–530), instead of Felix II and Felix III. An antipope of the fifteenth century took the name Felix V (1439–1449).

A Roman priest named Stephen was chosen pope after the death of Zacharias (741–752), but he lived for only four days after his election and died before his consecration, which according to the canon law of the time was the true the beginning of a pontificate. A pope is now considered to be pope from the time of his election, so Stephen should today be counted as a legitimate pope, and this unusual circumstance has added to confusion to the numbering system. To make the matter more complex, the man who followed him to throne of St. Peter was also called Stephen. He now is given the name and number Stephen II (III) by the Annuario Pontificio. The same accommodation is made for all other popes named Stephen.

The most dramatic skewering of papal numbers concerns the name “John.” The pontificate of John XIV (983–984) was erroneously attributed to two men with the same name. In addition, Antipope John XVI (997–998) has had his pontificate counted in the numbering system of legitimate popes. When Romanus of Tusculum, was elected pope in 1024, he took the number XVIII, his rightful number, but he was designated in documents recorded a little later as John XX. Since by the thirteenth century this corrupted numbering had been everywhere accepted, the next Pope John, Peter of Spain, took the name John XXI on his accession in 1276. Subsequently, Romanus of Tusculum’s number was changed to John XIX (1024–1032), but since Peter of Spain remained John XXI (1276–1277), there is no Pope John XX listed in the Annuario Pontificio. All this explains what the Annuario calls the “the strange nomenclature” that can be found in the Basilica of St. Paul’s Outside the Walls in Rome, where portraits of all the popes line the walls. Captions read “John XVI or XVII,” “John XVII or XVIII,” “John XVIII or XIX or XX,” etc.

Simon of Brie became Martin IV (1281–1285) upon his election by placing Marinus I (882–884) and Marinus II (942–446) as well as Martin I (649–655) among the Martins. Oddo of Colonna took the name Martin V in 1417. An antipope, Ottaviano of Monticello called himself Victor IV (1159–1164) instead of Victor V. He did so, the Annuario speculates, because a previous antipope Victor IV (1138) reigned only two months before spontaneously submitting to Innocent II. Thus he was not counted when Ottaviano of Monticello assumed the name of Victor. Both are listed in Annuario Pontificio as Antipope Victor IV. Antipope Benedict X seems to have been included in the numbering of the legitimate popes named Benedict. Finally Alexander VI (1492–1503) should have become Alexander V, a name that had been assumed in 1409 by an antipope created by the Council of Pisa during the Great Schism.

POPES, NAMES OF

It is an old custom, but not a regulation, that upon election every pope assumes a new name. The new name is practically always one already used by a predecessor. The last pope to assume an “original” name was Lando (913–914). The 144 popes from then until 1978 used only 32 names. Those of Clement, John, Benedict, Gregory, Innocent, and Pius have each been adopted more than ten times. In 1978 Albino Luciani combined the names of his two immediate predecessors, becoming Pope John Paul I.

Origins of the Change of Name. This custom originated shortly before 1000. Examples from earlier times of John II (533–535), previously Mercurius, and John XII (955–964), previously Octavianus, both pagan names, probably can be explained by their double names. In the first clear case of a change of name, Peter, bishop of Pavia, when elected to the papacy (983), exchanged his baptismal name for that of John (XIV). He did so doubtless out of reverence for the first pope, St. Peter: quia Petrus antea extiterat (Epitaph). Boniface VII and John XV, his immediate successors, kept their former names. Then followed the first transalpine pontiffs, Bruno of Carinthia (996) and Gerbert of Aurillac (999). The precedent of the change of name by John XIV encouraged them to change their “barbarous” sounding names to the genuinely Roman ones: Gregory (V) and Sylvester (II). After John XVII and John XVIII, another Peter, bishop of Albano, ascended the throne of Peter (1009) and called himself Sergius (IV). Since that time the practice of changing one's name has persisted to this day, except for two Renaissance pontiffs, Adrian VI and Marcellus II, who retained their baptismal names.

Motives. If at first pagan origin, or "barbarous" sound, or reverence for St. Peter induced several popes to drop their former names, people later interpreted this alteration as a determination to place the individual completely in the service of the new office. Moreover, the examples of the holy Apostles Peter and Paul were cited (e.g., Bernard of Clairvaux, Ep. 238, c. 1; Peter Lombard, Collect. in Ep. ad Rom., c. 1). Persons changed their names upon entering religious orders, a custom that established itself in the 6th century. In the choice of the new papal name various, often complicated, motives are involved, such as veneration for a predecessor of the same name, accidental influence of date and locale, and familiarity with the works and ideas of earlier popes. A special attitude is noticeable during the century beginning with Clement II (1046–47), when all the popes wanted to circumvent the "dark" age of the papacy and reverted to the names of popes of the first centuries. As a result 13 of the 18 popes were the "second" of their name. With Eugene III (1145–53) began a long line of popes with the ordinal "III." Only after 1276 were several names, such as John, taken once more from the period 867 to 1046.

The Ordinal Number The oldest example of an ordinal number added to a pope's name is most probably that of Gregory III (731–741). Two centuries older is the custom of calling the second of two popes with the same name junior, and the third, if there were three, secundus junior. Appending the actual ordinal number became common only in the 10th century. Since Leo IX (1049–54) the ordinal number has been on the lead seal. The ordinal number, however, is omitted even today in the declaration of the papal name (intitulatio) at the beginning of every papal document sealed with lead, and in the solemn papal signature: Ego N. Catholicae Ecclesiae episcopus.

POPPE, EDWARD JOHANNES MARIA, BL.

Diocesan priest of Ghent; b. Dec. 18, 1890, Temse, East Flanders, Belgium; d. June 10, 1924 in Moerzeke, Belgium.

Edward Poppe, a baker's son, entered the diocesan seminary in May 1909. His first assignment following ordination (1916) was the working-class Sainte Colette's parish in Ghent, where he exhibited a special love for children, the poor, and the dying. Poppe's concern regarding the secularization of society led him to emphasize catechesis and the formation of Eucharistic associations.

He was appointed rector of a religious community in rural Moerzeke (1918) because of poor health. Although he was often too ill to get out of bed (1918–22), he used his time well for prayer, study, and writing about contemporary problems: ten short works, 284 articles, and thousands of letters.

He adopted the "Little Way" of Saint THÉRÈSE DE LISIEUX after a pilgrimage to her tomb in 1920 and began an intense campaign for re-evangelization centered around the Eucharist. Although he continued to concentrate on the religious instruction of young people, he also formed an association of priests, mobilized the laity, and invigorated social action in Flanders. He had a profound effect on a generation of Belgian priests when he was sent (October 1922) to Leopoldsburg as spiritual director to military chaplains.

He died two years later at age 34. On July 3, 1998, a miracle attributed to Poppe's intercession was approved, leading to his beatification by John Paul II, Oct. 3, 1999.

POPPER, KARL

Philosopher of science, political theorist, b. Vienna, July 28, 1902; d. London, Sept. 17, 1994. The son of a leading Jewish lawyer who had converted to Protestantism, Popper studied science, philosophy, and music at the University of Vienna, earning in 1928 a doctorate for a thesis on methodological issues in the psychology of discovery. He qualified in 1929 as a schoolteacher in mathematics and physics, a career he followed until his departure from Austria. Popper's masterpiece, Logik der Forschung (The Logic of Scientific Discovery) was published in 1934. In opposition to the doctrines of the Vienna Circle, it elaborated a radically new approach to the methodological problems of natural science and also articulated thorough-going objectivist interpretations of probability and quantum mechanics. For many years anxious for the safety of democracy in central Europe, and for their own safety in a totalitarian state, Popper and his wife eventually left Austria in 1937 for New Zealand, where he had been offered a lectureship at Canterbury University College. There he wrote The Open Society and Its Enemies, a rousing defense of democracy and of rationality, published in 1945.

Shortly after the end of the World War II, Popper returned to Europe to take up a readership at the London School of Economics. He was a frequent visitor to the United States and continental Europe beginning in 1950, the year he gave the William James Lectures at Harvard. That year Popper remained in London as professor of logic and scientific method, a post he held until his retirement in 1969. He was knighted in 1965, and made a Companion of Honour in 1982. He published scores of papers and several books on an extraordinary range of subjects: ancient Greek philosophy, the formalization of logic, the axiomatics and interpretation of probability, quantum mechanics, thermodynamics, indeterminism, evolutionary biology, logical problems in both natural and social science, political theory, the theory of knowledge, the body-mind problem, and more.

Philosophy. Central to Popper's philosophy is the Socratic maxim that there is no easy road to understanding the world we live in, and that any wisdom we have resides in acknowledging our lack of knowledge. This is not skepticism, since he insists that the irremediable unsureness of our ideas need not prevent some of them from being preferable to others and, perhaps, true. The achievement of Logik der Forschung was to show that scientific knowledge, usually thought to be the best founded of all our knowledge, consists not of laws established by the traditional empiricist methods of observation, experiment, and induction, but of a network of hazardous speculations whose pretensions to truth we probe constantly by empirical tests. Inductive inference, says Popper, has no role to play in science: hypotheses are not inferred, but invented; and the only inferences needed are the deductive ones used to derive testable predictions from them. More generally, according to Popper, rational argument has been universally misconstrued as a form of justification or proof, and not seen to be simply a method for uncovering mistakes. His methodological view of rationality, critical rationalism, restores some sense after more than 2,000 years of unsuccessful responses to skeptical and mystical assaults on man's claims to rational knowledge.

For Popper the methodological question, "How can we detect, and eliminate, mistakes?" replaces the unanswerable epistemological question "How do we know?" Likewise a question of social engineering, "How can we set up institutions that stop our rulers from doing too much damage?" replaces the authoritarian question, "Who should rule us?" that has dominated political philosophy since Plato. There is no authority that we may not challenge, in either intellectual or political affairs; though we may hope for the best, for enlightening thoughts and enlightened rulers, we should also prepare for the worst. Democracies are special not for the way in which they appoint good leaders, for they seldom do, but for the way they are able to dismiss bad ones without bloodshed.

Popper is widely recognized as one of the most important philosophers of science and as a social and political thinker of courage and imagination, but the impact of his revolutionary epistemological ideas on most traditional philosophical problems has been oddly underrated by the philosophical profession. His influence on the general public, and on those who value a philosophy that is both rational and humane, has been profound.

POPPO OF STAVELOT, ST.

Abbot and monastic reformer; b. Deinze, Belgium, 978; d. Marchienne-au-Pont, Belgium, Jan. 25, 1048. After a career in the army and pilgrimages to the Holy Land (1000) and to Rome (1005), Poppo renounced the world and entered the BENEDICTINE Order at the Abbey of Saint-Thierry near Reims in 1008. There he met Richard (d. 1046), abbot of VERDUN-SUR-MEUSE, who had him transferred to his own monastery as prior, to help in the reformation of several abbeys in Flanders. Poppo's work drew the attention of Emperor HENRY II, who had him transferred to the abbatial see of Stavelot-Malmédy in 1020. From there he proceeded to reform a network of abbeys in Lorraine and Flanders. Poppo showed his gratitude to the emperors by negotiating alliances between the Empire and France, and he is regarded as an example of the imperial abbot of that day. He was buried at Stavelot, where his relics were elevated in 1624.

Feast: Jan. 25.

POPULAR PIETY, HISPANIC, IN THE UNITED STATES

Hispanic popular piety in the U.S. encompasses a wide range of practices, rituals, meanings, and functions. It is highly affective, accessible to all, and often filled with color, pageantry, vivid religious imagery, lively participation, a fervent spirit of embodied prayer, and confident assurance in the tangible presence of Jesus, Mary, and the saints. Practitioners of Hispanic popular piety enact their faith expressions both individually and collectively, as well as both outside official Catholic rites and during sacramental liturgies. Although they consist primarily of lay-controlled practices, Catholic clergy have fostered particular faith expressions that evoked significant lay participation among their Latino co-religionists. The primary promoters and teachers of Hispanic popular piety are Latina mothers, grandmothers, aunts, godmothers, and other women, who for centuries have transmitted communal faith, identity, and values to the next generation through their leadership in celebrating familial and collective religious traditions.

Hispanic popular piety has been continuously extant within the continental U.S. since 1565, when Spanish Catholic subjects established the first permanent European settlement at St. Augustine, Florida. The Hispanic penchant for Marian devotion expressed in activities like constructing Marian shrines, for example, was evident in Florida as early as 1620, when Catholics at St. Augustine built the first Marian shrine in the United States. In 1973, Cubans in Miami dedicated a shrine to their national patroness, Nuestra Señora de la Caridad del Cobre (Our Lady of Charity).

In the latter half of the 20th century, the numbers and influence of Hispanics in the U.S. have increased dramatically. An influx of newcomers from such diverse locales as Puerto Rico, Cuba, the Dominican Republic, El Salvador, Guatemala, Nicaragua, Colombia, Peru, Ecuador, and Argentina, along with ongoing Mexican immigration, added to the ranks of an established Hispanic population comprised primarily of Mexican-descent Catholics. These arrivals from Latin America and the Caribbean bring their treasured expressions of faith with them. The faith expressions of Hispanic popular piety differ from group to group. While Mexicans are the principal Hispanic group that celebrates las POSADAS during the nine days before Christmas, for example, Puerto Ricans enact the parranda, in which devotees take images of the magi from house to house collecting aguinaldo, offerings used for a communal fiesta at the end of the Christmas season. Many national groups favor a particular Marian image such as Nuestra Señora de la Altigracia (Dominican Republic), Nuestra Señora de Lujan (Argentina), Nuestra Señora del Carmen (Colombia), and Nuestra Señora de Guadalupe (Mexico), the patroness of the Americas. Some national groups also exhibit strong devotion to particular saints or images of Jesus, like the Puerto Rican devotion to their patron San Juan, Guatemalan faith in El Cristo Negro de Esquipulas (the Black Christ), Peruvian veneration of Santa Rosa de Lima and Nuestro Señor de los Milagros (Our Lord of Miracles), and El Salvadoran dedication to Oscar ROMERO, the slain archbishop of San Salvador who is popularly acclaimed as a martyr and saint.

Some Hispanic faith expressions are common among several and even to all Latino groups. Although San Martín de Porres is a Peruvian saint, many Hispanics revere him for his life of charity and his perseverance in the face of the racist treatment he endured as a mulatto. Mexicans and some Central Americans retain the tradition of the quinceañera, which celebrates the maturing to adulthood of a young woman, usually in the context of the Eucharist around the time of her fifteenth birthday. Hispanics of various backgrounds also exhibit profound dedication to el niño Jesús (the child Jesus), the Sacred Heart of Jesus, and the Blessed Sacrament. Pilgrimages, processions, holy cards, crucifixes, saints medals, and other sacred images abound, as do the reception of ashes on Ash Wednesday and palms on Palm Sunday, the lighting of candles, and the keeping of mandas or promesas (offering promises in exchange for the granting of a petition).

Many Hispanics construct home altars, use agua bendita (holy water) to bless themselves and their children, place a strong emphasis on padrinos (godfathers) and madrinas (godmothers) in baptism and other sacraments, bless graves and hold novenas for loved ones who have died, offer special prayers for their beloved deceased on ALL SOULS DAY (known in some communities as el Día de los Muertos, the Day of the Dead), and ask priests to bless their homes, cars, and other possessions. One of the most widespread traditions among all Latino groups is the extensive devotion to the crucified Jesus and his suffering mother on Good Friday. In Hispanic communities this devotion encompasses rituals and devotions like a public reenactment of Jesus' way of the cross and crucifixion, the siete palabras or proclamation and preaching on the seven last words of Christ, the servicio del santo entierro (entombment service) for Jesus, and the pésame (condolence) offered to the Virgin on Good Friday evening.

Pastoral ministers respond in diverse ways to Hispanic popular piety; their responses are frequently shaped by the particular faith expression that they address in a given pastoral situation. Some pastoral ministers discourage or even condemn certain practices of Hispanic popular piety as inimical to Catholic faith and the Catholic tradition. Others try to incorporate traditions like Marian devotion into parish life and even into sacramental celebrations, often attempting to engage these traditions as a means to augment participation in parish and sacramental life. Still other pastoral ministers engage faith expressions like the Way of the Cross as a means to prophetically denounce the ongoing suffering of Jesus in today's suffering peoples and challenge devotees to live gospel and church teachings on social justice. In some instances, of course, pastoral ministers ignore or are unaware of home-based celebrations and faith expressions, making more visible or even accentuating tensions and separation between church officials and Catholic liturgy, on the one hand, and Hispanic devotees and religious traditions, on the other. Often missing in these various pastoral responses to Hispanic popular piety is an attempt to probe the complex and multi-layered meanings of Latino popular Catholicism from the practitioners' perspective. Pastoral responses to Hispanic popular piety are greatly enhanced by careful studies of these meanings, which collectively embody the worldview that underlies Hispanic faith expressions.

Recent studies highlight the rich meaning and underlying religious worldview in Hispanic popular piety. These studies provide critical insights about the theological significance of Hispanic faith expressions, as well as the pastoral opportunity and challenge to serve their practitioners in the life of local faith communities. Virgilio Elizondo contends that Mexican-American rituals and devotions reinforce identity and a sense of belonging, help a suffering people endure their pain and struggles, and enable this people to celebrate hope and new life. Ana María Díaz-Stevens states that many Puerto Rican migrants to the mainland brought the complex constellation of religious practices from their jíbaro (peasant or mountain dweller) roots. This constellation of practices illuminates God's action in daily life, enacts rites of passage, expresses devotees' desire for harmonious relations with nature, and reminds them of the need for mediators, both among the heavenly saints and the hacendados (major landowners) who so influenced their lives in their homeland. Roberto Goizueta proposes a theology of accompaniment rooted in the powerful network of relationships that popular faith expressions mediate between Jesus, Mary, the saints, and their Hispanic devotees. Orlando Espín has also proffered some analysis of the worldview that underlies expressions of Hispanic popular Catholicism. Espín posits that Latinos project many features of their familial relationships onto the sacred realm of the Trinity and the saints and that their popular Catholicism enables them to interpret and endure their personal and collective suffering. He also outlines basic tenets of the Latino popular worldview such as the constant intervention of the divine in human life, the belief that human existence always encompasses the conflict between good and evil, and the assumption that the only way people can change their state in life is through divine sanction granted after persistent prayer or fulfilling a series of challenges or tests.

POPULAR PIETY, POLISH

Polish-style Catholicism is an intimate network of popular religious practices, closely bonding home, church, and community. Since the Baptism of Prince Mieszko I in 966, the Gospel has rooted itself and gradually Christianized seasonal, life cycle, and national events, through blessings, family religious ritual, devotional prayer, and pilgrimages.

Blessings and devotional prayer celebrate the liturgical calendar as well as the religious nature of the seasons. This is particularly true of the Lent/Easter cycle. The “Bitter” Lamentations or Gorzkie Żale are congregationally sung reflections on the personal and cosmic dimensions of Jesus’s passion. Their melodies, along with other Lenten hymns, inspire an intensely personal, yet communal, meditation on the Lord’s suffering. This reflection culminates in the Holy Saturday prayer vigil at the Lord’s Sepulchre. On this day, faithful pray at a Garden Tomb constructed in a special side chapel. This devotional dimension of the Paschal Triduum arose out of tenth-century reflection on the psalms and antiphons of the Liturgy of the Hours commemorating Christ’s burial and repose.

The entire cycle reaches full completion in the early morning “Sunrise” procession on Easter Sunday: the glorious antithesis of Lenten lament. Parishioners gather at the now empty Garden Tomb to chant morning prayer and celebrate Christ’s Resurrection in a jubilant outdoor eucharistic procession, ending with a solemn celebration of the Mass of Easter. Eucharistic devotion, stands at the heart of Polish piety, especially evident during city-wide processions on the Solemnity of Corpus Christi, parish feast days, and monthly Sacred Heart Devotions. This originally BAROQUE response to the Protestant Reformation solidified Catholicism among the general populous, during an era when official government policies promoted a national climate of religious pluralism.

Lenten and Easter practices give evidence to a mutually enriching relationship between the parish and home life. Children ask their parents for forgiveness in preparation for celebration of the sacrament of penance, as adults seek sacramental reconciliation during parish Lenten retreats. Throughout these 40 days, individuals fast and abstain from rich foods ascetically identifying with Christ’s temptation in the desert. The fast is broken at the Eucharist of Easter morn. The celebration at the Lord’s Table extends into the home through a domestic liturgy beginning with the characteristic egg-sharing ritual. The Holy Saturday rite of priestly blessing, with eighth-century Western Catholic roots, reveals the Resurrection symbolism of the holy day meal: round cross-breads and wine—the Eucharist, the “butter” lamb and smoked meats—the victorious Lamb of God; horseradish—the bitterness of crucifixion; pussy-willow branches and greens—the new life of Easter. Exquisite batik-style, dyed Easter eggs radiate with floral patterns dating to the tenth century. The colorful shells of the eggs suggest Jesus’s miraculous tomb, while their yolks represent the Easter sunrise. Parishes, also, share blessed foods with the poor and the homeless.

On Christmas Eve families celebrate the holiest night of the year with a Vigil Supper, called Wigilia. This domestic liturgy begins only after the youngest child sights the first star of Christmas Eve, recalling the Wise Men in the Gospel. The head of the household initiates a bread-breaking ritual around a festive table set with a thin layer of pure hay and a white tablecloth—reminiscent of Bethlehem’s manger. The leader extends wishes while the gathered share a fine, wheaten wafer or oplatek. This holy day exchange of wishes and bread breaking expresses the intimacy of familial love and reconciliation, as all present “forgive and forget” all wrongdoing. A meatless meal follows, gathering together the bounty of the entire year. The festival continues with an exchange of gifts and the singing of carols, the latter of which finds full expression at the parish Midnight/Shepherd’s Mass.

Other domestic liturgies include the Epiphany house blessing and the lighting of the “thunder” candle, blessed on February 2, as a prayer during storms or times of family crises. The liturgical feasts of the spring and summer months are occasions to bless palm bouquets, wreaths, wildflowers, herbs, seeds, and grain—symbols of the Pole’s mystical solidarity with creation, a profound reverence for the environment, and divine solicitude. Senior tradition bearers lead family ritual with simple elements, blessed by the parish priest, expressive of the close relationship between the family and the parish, a hallmark of Polish popular piety.

Participation in parish and domestic celebrations forms an individual’s faith, as well as community identity. Prior to beginning formal religious education, the mother teaches her children the content and value of personal prayer. This attitude matured in the nineteenth century when Poland ceased to exist as a political entity. During this time a “domestic stronghold” outlook developed where prayer, religious ritual, and the passing on of community values centered in the family home. Early immigrants to the United States were “home-schooled” in this very manner, and many of these attitudes remain operative to this very day. Family tradition bearers continue to creatively adapt agrarian customs to the more urban environment of the United States.

Milestones along the various phases of the human birth-life-death cycle emphasize annual name days (the feast of one’s patron saint) over birthdays, patronal feast-days, anniversaries and commemorations of the deceased. National resistance to two centuries of totalitarianism and the tragedy of two World Wars demonstrate that suffering has been a part of recent Polish history. ALL SOULS' DAY, therefore, is a national holiday of homecoming. People return to the resting places of deceased family members to pray, light vigil candles, arrange flowers, and celebrate Mass. During the evenings prior to All Souls, cemeteries across the country blaze with thousands of candles. In the United States, similar practices emerge during Memorial Day celebrations.

Pilgrimages to religious shrines frequently celebrate national festivals, as the Polish word święto denotes both the holy day and holiday. Among these are famous, week-long, on-foot pilgrimages to Marian shrines, above all, to the Shrine of Our Lady of Częstochowa. Pope John Paul II best expressed the mysticism of this national "Upper Room" or spiritual capital in stating that Poles are accustomed to come here "to listen to the nation's heart beat in the heart of its Mother." Similar pilgrimages are held each August to the Salvatorian Fathers' Shrine southeast of Chicago and to the Shrine of the North American Martyrs in Midland, Ontario, Canada.

POPULATION

The systematic study of population has assumed growing importance in recent decades consequent to the maturing of demography as a scientific discipline and the increasingly evident implications of population trends for individuals, society, and the Church. Within the Church cognizance has been taken of population questions by the papacy under Pius XI, Pius XII, John XXIII, and Paul VI. A number of participating fathers of Vatican Council II expressed themselves as concerned about practical and ethical aspects of population growth. This concern is reflected in portions of the Constitution on the Church in the Modern World. Nevertheless, a full doctrinal appraisal of questions relating to population was not forthcoming during the council sessions but was referred for further study.

Inasmuch as the Church, by divine mission, is concerned with the salvation and spiritual well-being of the individual persons who compose human populations, it necessarily gives attention to their numbers, location, age-sex composition, and social characteristics, as well as to the impact of population trends and movement upon personal and societal behavior. It is not incorrect to say that the Church officially was interested in certain practical aspects of demographic analysis well before the science of demography as such developed. The Council of Trent (1545–63) made a great step forward in insisting that births, deaths, marriages, etc., be recorded in the respective parishes. The Code of Canon Law promulgated in 1917 is quite explicit about the obligation of keeping accurate records on the parish and diocesan levels (canon 470). On the international level, each year the Annuario Pontificio (Vatican Polyglot Press) publishes summary ecclesiastical statistics for the many dioceses and other circumscriptions of the world.

Doctrinal and Moral Aspects

Man is under moral obligation to use both the resources of the material universe and his own powers and abilities in a manner befitting a rational being. Moreover, rights of the individual, whether directly from the nature of man or by acquisition, have corresponding duties, including that to respect the rights of others and the legitimate claims of society. These broad principles apply in various areas of human activity and extend to the use of the procreative faculty.

The interrelation of population and the means of subsistence can occasion misunderstandings on both the dogmatic and the moral levels. Continuing analysis of this relation by competent scholars, without compromise of traditional doctrine, is called for in view of recent population trends, as well as of the mounting complexity of modern society and the valid findings of science. In his address to participants in the World Population Conference in Rome (Sept. 8, 1954), Pius XII indicated the timeliness of such study, also emphasizing the importance of maintaining doctrinal integrity.

Some Misconceptions. In the past, a misconceived belief held that Divine Providence would always see that human beings brought into the world are adequately provided for. If they are not, it was argued, the deficiency is traceable largely to social injustice, inefficient distribution systems, or both. This line of thought was pursued by some 18th-century French authors and by various advocates of social reform. Analogously, English critics of Malthus charged him on occasion with ignoring or minimizing the role of Providence. The truth is that Divine Providence always presupposes in rational beings the exercise of human providence and of prudence in using the goods of this world. Institutional change, then, is no substitute for needed personal reform or individual responsibility, as Pius XI pointed out in the encyclical letter QUADRAGESIMO ANNO (1931). History testifies to the many natural disasters that overtake even prudent men, and the Apocalypse suggests distress to come. It would, therefore, be improper to overlook the necessity of personal responsibility in entering marriage and using the same, or to exclude the implications thereof in economic life and for society.

Another incorrect interpretation concerns the relation of population to subsistence viewed in the light of the finality of creation. Some have proposed that since man is the one who consciously gives glory to God, it is incumbent upon individuals who marry to reproduce to the maximum extent possible or at least close to it. It is argued that in this way more individuals will come into existence and give glory to the Creator. As sometimes expressed, this position is doctrinally ambiguous. It seemingly implies, however, that the world should be populated as quickly as biologically possible, even though the process becomes disorderly and hardship results. If the position implies that no regard need be had for the welfare and education of children or for the family as a social institution, it is in contradiction of traditional Catholic teaching, which links procreation and education as the primary end of marriage (1917 Codex iuris canonici c.1013.1). Procreation without concern for the prospects of education (upbringing in the full sense), as well as willful neglect in actual upbringing of offspring, is not adequately rational and hence involves some moral defect.

If the argument set forth does not go quite that far but nevertheless suggests that only the welfare and education (upbringing) of the individual family need be taken into account, then it falls short of proper social responsibility. It would, in a sense, make of the family a fully autonomous social entity, which it is not. On the one hand, the family is composed of individuals with a personal destiny, and on the other, the society must look to the common good of all.

Another extreme of misunderstanding revolves around the idea that society has special claims upon individual members to the extent that they must subordinate their personal interests and welfare to the transcending interests of the body social. Pushed to the limit, this readily becomes a totalitarian position. Population policies based thereon can become grossly immoral, as became clear before and during World War II, when various minorities were systematically liquidated in the name of social policy.

Even in its more moderate form this position seemingly implies that society's claims have a priority that ordinarily supersedes those of its members. For example, some mercantilists of the pre-Malthusian era urged marriage and reproduction as social goals and social goods, going so far as to penalize celibates and bachelors. Such an approach involves infringement of personal freedom in the interests of social policy. As a general principle, individuals have a right not to marry should they so choose.

If, on the other hand, the position set forth merely means that man is by nature social and therefore should behave with the needs and legitimate claims of society in mind, it is in conformity with the traditional teaching of the Church and the conclusions of the perennial philosophy. It should not be overlooked, however, that society exists to enable individuals the better to fulfill their destiny to life. Society is not an absolute end in itself.

Necessity of Economic Development. The development of natural resources and of the local and regional economies whereby the material needs of men are met is not a convenience or luxury but a true necessity as population trends continue upward. If expansion of output in goods and services is insufficient to cover the requirements of the human numbers added annually, levels of living inevitably will decline. Where improved levels of living are sought—as is especially fitting in the less developed regions with low income and unsatisfactory conditions of health, nutrition, and education—the respective economies must expand at a rate significantly above that of population. Among other things, this means that those in positions of leadership or decision making have a responsibility to foster and facilitate such development. This responsibility, however, is shared by all to some degree, especially the more educated, in line with established principles and legal and distributive justice. Necessary economic growth and social improvement do not come to pass simply by good intentions or by attempting to implement schemes of redistribution of property or income. Economic progress is impossible without appropriate motivation, pride of achievement, acquisition of skills, and the kind and amount of investment calculated to raise output and job opportunities.

Furthermore, educational institutions, both public and nonpublic, have special responsibility to society to foster and facilitate the needed training and skills, according to their capacity and type of educational programming. In the developing regions especially, an adequate supply of individuals with the appropriate skills and motivation must be forthcoming if progress is to be genuine. It is noteworthy that for many decades, and even centuries, pioneering work in education on all levels has been done by Christian mission groups. With population growing at recent rates, the need for such educational effort is greater than heretofore.

Resource development and economic expansion cannot resolve all problems associated with the population-subistence relation. As indicated in the demographic analysis of world and regional trends, populations have been increasing at rates unprecedented in history. These trends are likely to continue so long as the recent patterns of marriage and reproduction prevail. This increases the likelihood that in some instances, at least, famines, epidemics, and even wars will be instrumental in bringing births and deaths more nearly into balance.

Since, if long continued, such population growth eventually will exhaust space and meanwhile outstrip capacities for food production, the reduction of birth rates has been deemed necessary by a number of informed demographers and economists. Others point out that even if science and technology can multiply many times over the possibilities of food production, there still remains a problem in achieving economic expansion while populations multiply at such rapid rates. The reduction of birth rates that has been suggested involves ramifications for normative values as regards sex and marriage. Accordingly, a review of the authoritative teaching of the Church on sexuality, marriage, and reproduction is given here in summary form.

Applications of Sexual Morality. As a rational animal possessed of free will, man in his human acts is necessarily subject to moral law as ordained by the Creator. He therefore is obliged to use his capacities in accordance with properly ordered reason and his human nature. In the case of sexuality and the implementation of the reproductive capacity, this means acting both reasonably and responsibly, and not merely in line with passion or instinct.

It is the perennial teaching of the Church that concupiscence, in this case sex urge, is not fully subject to reason. Although God originally gave man the gift of bodily integrity, voluntary control over sexual appetite was not restored to mankind after the fall of Adam and Eve. Accordingly, in the present order of grace (that is, of man fallen but redeemed), it is not uncommon to experience conflict between moral duty and sexual passion. Hence it is the obligation of man to avoid deliberate actions that are prohibited and to develop self-control to the greatest extent possible.

Cultivation of the virtue of chastity is incumbent on the married and the single, each according to their state. In both the unmarried and the married there normally is recurring tension between reason and impulse, between instinctual response and moral norms. In view of man's composite nature of body and spirit this is not surprising. The difficulty of such spiritual development presupposes that one will avail himself of supernatural grace in attaining chastity. For believing and practicing Christians the acquisition of such grace is facilitated through the Sacraments, particularly those of penance and the Eucharist. The Church has always taught that habitual resolution of problems associated with sexuality cannot adequately be achieved apart from these supernatural aids. This teaching is stated in the Catechism of the Council of Trent (Roman Catechism, 1572), more especially the parts on sex in marriage (part 3, ch. 7). Recent popes, in addresses and statements, repeatedly have made the same point.

Traditional teaching, through the ordinary magisterium of the Church, and more explicitly in the Council of Trent (session 5, decree on original sin), has been that concupiscence in itself is not a sin. Sexual passion and impulse become sinful only when, and to the extent that, man deliberately arouses or indulges sex contrary to moral law. Thus the true Christian position is at variance with views on the integral sinfulness of sexual urges, as proposed over the centuries by MANICHAISM, illuminati of various types, and some reformers of the 16th century and after. The doctrinal errors indicated by Trent with regard to original sin, concupiscence, grace, and the sacramental system should not be revived or repeated.

Periodic Continence. As for use of sex by the married, the Church has not taught, nor does it teach, that intercourse is permissible only when conception is possible and intended. It permits the marriage of those beyond reproductive age and does not prohibit natural intercourse to a couple unintentionally infertile. Whereas the Code of Canon Law notes appropriately that antecedent and perpetual impotence "invalidates marriage by the law of nature itself" (c.1068.1), it then clearly states that of itself "sterility neither invalidates marriage nor renders it illicit" (c.1068.3). Among humans conjugal society manifestly is more than an ad hoc mating procedure for reproducing the species. At very least, appropriate human upbringing of offspring is implied. Accordingly, canon law indicates that "mutual aid and the allaying of concupiscence" constitute a secondary end of marriage (c. 1013.1). The same is the underlying assumption of the discussion in the Roman Catechism of the reasons why people marry (part 2, ch. 8). Additional light was thrown on the subject by Pius XI in CASTI CONNUBII (22–25), the monumental encyclical on chaste wedlock (1930).

The use of marriage for its secondary ends has at times been misconstrued, so as allegedly to justify direct intervention in the reproductive process. Ignoring for the moment the question of abortion, feticide, or other intervention after conception has occurred, it is noteworthy that the Roman Catechism expressly rejects the direct prevention of conception. On the other hand, the authentic position of the Church always has been that regulation of offspring may licitly be accomplished by abstinence from intercourse. The implications of this position were not fully recognized until the basic facts about the female cycle were established scientifically in the 1840s. It then became evident that during much of the cycle conception is objectively impossible whatever the intentions of the spouses, and that it would be possible to avoid conception by confining marriage relations to the infertile days.

The question as to whether marriage might licitly be used on both the fertile and infertile days was substantially answered by traditional teaching and practice, including canonical acceptance of the validity of marriages among the overaged and sterile. The question as to whether marriage relations might licitly be restricted to days known or thought to be infertile was up for discussion. Queried at an early date about the matter by the bishop of Amiens, the Sacred Penitentiary replied (March 2, 1853) that “those mentioned in the petition should not be disturbed, so long as they do nothing to prevent conception.”

Although some Catholics have questioned the legitimacy of periodic continence, the majority of moral theologians have taught that the practice is in itself lawful. Inasmuch as there is no specific obligation to have marital relations with any given frequency, periodic abstinence is then justifiable for a reasonable cause. This was pointed out by Pius XII in his address to the Italian midwives (Oct. 29, 1951): “Serious reasons, such as those often found in medical, eugenic, economic and social ‘indications,’ can exempt for a long time, perhaps even for the whole duration of the marriage, from this positive duty. From this it follows that the observance of the nonfertile periods can be morally licit, and under the conditions mentioned it is really so” (Vegliari con sollecitudine, Acta Apostolicae Sedis 43 [1951] 846).

Abortion. Direct intervention in the development of human life has always been reprobated by the teaching Church. Once conception has occurred, special malice attaches to any intervention that not only stops the reproductive process but also destroys the product of conception at whatever stage of development. Over the years the essential immorality of ABORTION, or feticide, as a means of controlling number of offspring, or of avoiding them altogether, has been stressed repeatedly. For example, on March 4, 1679, the Holy Office condemned the notion that the unborn fetus may be killed to escape personal or social complications. In the Casti connubii Pius XI referred to direct abortion as a “very grave crime” and repudiated the idea that it can be justified by “medical and therapeutic indications” or eugenic reasons. The same standard was applied by Pius XII in his address to the midwives and in other statements and addresses.

Sterilization. Direct sterilization, that is, the deliberate rendering sterile of the reproductive organs or processes, in order to avoid conception, is intrinsically immoral. This is the perennial teaching of the Church. The question is not a new one, as evidenced by discussions in centuries past as to when and under what circumstances surgical castration is permissible. In the period between World War I and World War II, however, the morality of sterilization became specially relevant, in view of various legislative enactments compelling sterilization for eugenic or social reasons. In Casti connubii (68–71) reference is made to eugenic sterilization, and the practice is rejected as immoral. Specific reference was made to laws enacted by the Nazis and other totalitarians in statements of Pius XI in 1933 and 1935. In 1936 the Holy Office was quite specific in discussing the enactments and in condemning the underlying assumptions.

In a specially noteworthy decree of Feb. 24, 1940, the Holy Office stated that “direct sterilization of man or woman, either perpetual or temporary,” is illicit and “is forbidden by the law of nature.” Pius XII was cognizant of the proposed condemnation and ordered its publication. The implications are far-reaching, since by that time experiments were under way with temporary (reversible) sterilization by biochemical as well as surgical means. Subsequently, in a series of addresses to professional groups, Pius XII clarified particular points as to what is and is not permissible in suppressing functions that relate to reproduction. It is clear that direct suppression of either ovulation or spermatogenesis, in order to avoid conception, cannot be approved morally.

Contraception. Artificial CONTRACEPTION, which is to be distinguished from both sterilization and destruction of the product of conception, is immoral. This is the perennial teaching of the Church, and problems of excess fertility do not and cannot render it permissible. Perhaps the best-known condemnation of the practice is that by Pius XI in Casti connubii (55): “No reason, however grave, can be put forward by which anything intrinsically against nature may become conformable to nature and morally good. Since, therefore, the conjugal act is destined primarily by nature for the begetting of children, those who in exercising it deliberately frustrate its natural power and purpose sin against nature and commit a deed which is shameful and intrinsically vicious.” The teaching of the Church in this matter has not changed, as was indicated several times during 1964 and 1965 by Paul VI, amid ill-advised demands by some for change.

The Church is not unaware of the fact that many persons outside her membership do not perceive, at least clearly, the grave immorality of artificial contraception. She does not condemn their good faith or perhaps confusion of thought in the matter. But she rightly insists, and will continue to insist, that those calling themselves Catholics recognize her teaching authority in this regard.

The population trends of recent years make it clear that both research and instruction are needed on a continuing basis, in order to render periodic abstinence increasingly effective. Moreover, the doctrinal and pastoral aspects of the practice of periodic continence merit continuing attention. The values of chaste celibacy must not be minimized, and the prudent delay of marriage is quite properly to be encouraged for those who realize that the conjugal relationship does not resolve all the moral problems associated with sexuality.

POPULORUM PROGRESSIO

Encyclical letter, “On the Development of Peoples,” promulgated by Pope PAUL VI on the feast of Easter, March 26, 1967. The pope’s intention is to encourage “the development of those peoples who are striving to escape from hunger, misery, endemic disease, and ignorance; of those who are looking for a wider share in the benefits of civilization and a more active improvement of their human qualities; of those who are aiming purposefully at their complete fulfillment” (no. 1).

The encyclical is divided into three principal parts. In the first part, “On Man’s Complete Development,” the pope reflects on human development under three headings. First, in “Data of the Problem” (nos. 6–11), he isolates the problem that impedes human development: “Freedom from misery, the greater assurance of finding subsistence, health, and fixed employment; an increased share of responsibility without oppression of any kind and in security from situations that do violence to their dignity as human beings; better education—in brief, to seek to do more, know more, and have more: that is what people aspire to now when a greater number of them are condemned to live in conditions that make this lawful desire illusory” (no. 6). Next, in “The Church and Development” (nos. 12–21), he presents a Christian vision of development: “Development cannot be limited to economic growth. In order to be authentic, it must be complete: integral, that is, it has to promote the good of every man and of the whole man” (no. 14). Based on this vision, in the final subsection, “Action to Be Undertaken,” the pope recommends actions to enhance human development (nos. 22–42).

In part 2, “The Development of the Human Race in a Spirit of SOLIDARITY,” Pope Paul establishes as a point of departure that “there can be no progress towards the complete development of humanity without the simultaneous development of all people in the spirit of solidarity” (no. 43). He proposes specific mechanisms for achieving universal solidarity under three headings. In “Aid for the Weak” (nos. 45–53), he contends that human development requires “building a world where every person, no matter what his or her race, religion or nationality, can live a fully human life, freed from servitude imposed by other people or by natural forces over which he or she has not sufficient control; a world where freedom is not an empty word and where Lazarus can sit down at the same table with the rich person.” Ultimately, the achievement of this goal demands “generosity . . . sacrifice . . . and unceasing effort on the part of the rich” (no. 47). In “Equity in Trade” (nos. 56–65), the pope contends that “efforts to assist developing nations . . . would be illusory if their benefits were . . . partially nullified as a consequence of the trade relations between rich and poor nations” (no. 56). Thus, for international trade to be “human and moral, social justice requires that it restore to the participants a certain quality of opportunity.” To reach this long-range objective, “we must begin now to create true equality in discussion and negotiations” (no. 61). Additional factors that militate against universal solidarity include “nationalism” (no. 62) and “racism” (no. 63). Finally, in “Universal Charity” (nos. 66–75), the pope claims that the “illness” of the world “consists less in the unproductive monopolization of resources by a small number of individuals than in the lack of brotherhood and sisterhood among individuals and peoples” (no. 66). In view of this void, he emphasizes “the duty of welcoming others—a duty springing from human solidarity and Christian charity—which is incumbent both on the families and cultural organizations of host countries.” Conviviality of this sort offers protection from “loneliness, the feeling of abandonment and distress, which undermine all moral resistance.” In the end, “hospitality should aim to provide . . . the warm atmosphere of a fraternal welcome, with the example of wholesome living, an esteem for genuine and effective Christian charity, an esteem for spiritual values” (no. 67).

In part 3, “A Final Appeal,” the pope entreats all persons to assume responsibility for the cause of human development through universal solidarity. He prevails first upon Christian laypersons “to take up as their own proper task the renewal of the temporal order.” Their specific charge is, “without waiting for orders and directives, to take initiative freely and to infuse a Christian spirit into the mentality, customs, laws, and structures of the community in which they live” (no. 81). Next, he encourages “all Christians . . . to expand their common cooperative effort in order to help humanity vanquish selfishness, pride, and rivalries, to overcome ambitions and injustices, to open up to all the road to a more human life, where each person will be loved and helped as a brother or sister, as his neighbor” (no. 82). The pope also calls upon members of non-Christian religions to “work with all their hearts and their intelligence . . . that all the children of humanity may lead a life worthy of the children of God” (no. 82). Finally, to “all people of good will who believe that the way to peace lies in the area of development”—particularly to “delegates to international organizations, government officials, members of the press, and educators”—the pope acknowledges, “all of you, each in your own way, are the builders of a new world” (no. 83).

In his concluding remarks Pope Paul VI speculates that “if the world is in trouble because of a lack of thinking,” resolution will come from “people of reflection and learning” who are called to “open the paths which lead to mutual assistance among peoples, to a deepening of human knowledge, to an enlargement of heart, to a more fraternal way of living within a truly universal human society” (no. 85).

PORMORT, THOMAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Whitgift, Price, Meres; b. c. 1560 at Little Limber, Lincolnshire, England; d. Feb. 20, 1592, hanged, drawn, and quartered in St. Paul’s churchyard, London. He was probably related to the Pormort family of Great Grimsby and was the godson of Protestant Archbishop Whitgift. He studied at Cambridge for a short time, then at Rheims (1581–82), and Rome (1582–87). After his ordination, he entered the household of Bishop Owen Lewis of Cassano (March 1587) and served as prefect of studies in the Swiss College at Milan for a time before starting off for England. Upon reaching Brussels around Nov. 29, 1590, he used the name Whitgift to obtain a job as manservant to Mrs. Geoffrey Pole, traveling with her via Antwerp to England, where he was arrested in London on July 25, 1591. He managed to escape but was arrested again and convicted on high treason for having “persuaded to popery” a haberdasher named John Burrows. Archbishop Whitgift endeavored to delay the execution in order to persuade his godson to conform but without success. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

PORNOGRAPHY

The term pornography, derived from the Greek porne (prostitute) and graphein (to write), came into common use in English in the 19th century to describe life, manners, and activities of prostitutes and their patrons. In present usage, the term is a generic label for a wide range of books, magazines, films, videos, broadcasts, Internet communications, taped phone messages, and live public performances intended to be sexually arousing. A further and relational characteristic of pornography is the removal of “real or simulated sex acts from the intimacy of the partners in order to display them deliberately to third parties” (Catechism of the Catholic Church 2354), a voyeuristic condition on which is based major moral objections to the material. In both popular speech and in the legal and cultural battles over this issue, a distinction is sometimes made between “soft core” and “hard core” pornography. The former denotes erotic representations conveyed suggestively, the participants displaying a degree of mutuality in the intimacies they share; the latter connects the sexual acts with violence, hatred, pain, and degradation, the principals relating to one another in purely instrumental ways. The word “obscenity,” often used interchangeably with “pornography,” is more usefully identified with a range of offensive conduct that extends beyond the sexual. Thus a rally of the Ku Klux Klan or an act of spousal abuse could be called obscene though free of any sexual content. On these definitions and their linguistic refinements hangs a complex history of legal and moral wranglings that has only increased in intensity over time.

Examples of pornography are found throughout human history and in many cultures, although attitudes toward it varied widely. Examples include the salacious songs associated with the fertility rites of Dionysus in ancient Greece and erotic paintings found on the walls of Pompeian ruins. The craft, both visual and verbal, of these productions does not entirely remove them from invidious classification, their clear purpose being to celebrate the pleasures of the flesh exclusive of other human values. Other alleged pornographic practices have historically served the purpose of satirizing the pretensions and hypocrisies of individuals and institutions. Thus a medieval poet such as Boccaccio as well as an 18th-century graphic artist such as Hogarth employed the bawdy to skewer the self-righteous, the erotic subject matter dissolving in cathartic laughter. For this reason, societies with strong centralized governments and/or a state supported religion have used anti-pornography laws to prosecute political humorists as threats to civic order.

The invention of printing and subsequent advances in photography, motion pictures, and the electronic media have made possible the mass production of pornography in ever-increasing amounts. Thus a behavior confined to a primarily literate and privileged elite became in the 20th century a mass phenomenon, one that has come to permeate popular culture. It is this phenomenon that is the primary focus of this article, a summary of efforts by the Church, private interest groups, civil governments, and academics to deal with the issue.

Church. The Catholic Church, which affirms the dignity and sovereignty of all humans, individual and collective, and opposes all influences that threaten these values, entered most forcefully into the regulation of offensive print materials during the Counter-Reformation. The first general decree of prior censorship was promulgated by the Lateran Council of 1515; a half-century later, the Council of Trent (1562) issued the INDEX OF PROHIBITED BOOKS, which shaped Church policy well into the 20th century. The Index, a checklist of specific titles, established normative guidelines to regulate censorship, among which was one that forbade the publication, selling, reading, and possession of obscene works. Revisions over time and under different pontificates changed the titles but the norms remained intact.

As a consequence of the Second Vatican Council, the duties of monitoring the Index were transferred in 1965 to the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. That body a year later issued a statement declaring the Index to have “no ecclesial force,” but reserved to itself as well as diocesan ordinaries and episcopal conferences the right to condemn writings for the protection of the faithful. These norms and the procedures for enforcing them have been codified in canon law. However, the explicit condemnation (ex professo) of obscene publications in the 1917 Code has virtually disappeared in the 1983 Code, which confines its concerns to works that carry or should carry the marks of Church orthodoxy in matters of faith and morals.

In the U. S. especially, the actions of the Church in defense of morality have been directed both internally and externally: individual bishops as well as national conferences have organized the faithful for their own moral protection, for example through such agencies as the Legion of Decency, which regularly published lists of unacceptable movies. Also, sometimes alone, often with the collaboration of other faith communions, Catholics have formed pressure groups to support censorship of the media, to oppose or limit the spread of “adult” venues such as bookstores and massage parlors, in direct actions such as boycotts and protest marches. Joining in these actions as well as promoting the enactment of prohibitory laws through at least the 1960s, Catholics mounted the most active opposition to pornography of any church or civic body. The effectiveness of that opposition—both in accurately targeting the offensive material and in limiting its spread—was not, however, always consistent. Norms as well as judgments of specific works of popular entertainment were often simplistic, their articulation paternalistic and condescending. At present the voice of the American Church has grown more nuanced in discussing the morality of popular entertainment, reflecting the increased educational level of the laity. But its counter-cultural position is perhaps more pronounced than ever.

U.S. Courts. European states, more concerned with sedition and subversive ideas than aberrant sexual behavior, exercised control over printed works in the name of established religious and state powers. In Catholic countries sexually explicit materials were not generally condemned except when they were blasphemous, undermined religious doctrine, or subjected clergy and nuns to ridicule. Colonial America, influenced by the Puritan ethos, also linked obscenity with disrespect toward civic and religious authority. Nathaniel Hawthorne’s short story “The Maypole at Merrymount,” based on the short-lived 17th-century experiment in collective hedonism led by Thomas Morton, illustrates this connection: the civil authorities of Massachusetts Bay jailed and then deported the free-living colonists as a threat to orthodoxy. In 1711 the same government enacted a statute prohibiting the “composing, writing, printing, or publishing of any filthy, obscene, or profane story, pamphlets, libel or mock sermon, in imitation of preaching or any other part of divine worship.”

The history of protective legislation and court actions in the American Republic is long and complex, characterized by a constant back and forth movement in a dynamic generated by the opposing values of individual freedom and community solidarity. States and local governments enacted obscenity statutes; and courts measured these norms against the materials actually proscribed. But in the course of time, the norms themselves came under constitutional scrutiny, resulting in an erratic if evolving judicial center.

Reviewing U. S. court cases over a period of 150 years, one can discover a limited understanding of this evolution. An early precedent turned on the distinction between authorial intent and actual content. Thus, although a work was recognized to have been written to secure a social value, the presence of scatological elements (whatever their purpose) rendered the work legally offensive. In a celebrated 1934 case before the Supreme Court, this principle was overturned: James Joyce's celebrated novel Ulysses, formerly banned because of obscene content, was found by reason of the artistic integrity of the whole work to be unobjectionable. This calculus pitting artistic merit against offensive content continues to be a source of judicial dispute, serious art by its very symbolic nature being resistant to easy reductions.

A second area of contention concerns the question of harm, and the obligations of the state to protect individual victims as well as the community. Restricting the distribution of pornography on this basis is regularly opposed by appeal to the First Amendment to the U. S. Constitution, the "free speech" clause. As this fundamental issue works itself out in case after case, more points of conflict are exposed. The Court in 1957 (Roth v. U. S.) found that publications "utterly without redeeming social value" deserved no protection. But this near absolute "utterly" condition caused considerable trouble for the bench, leading to minimal regulation for several years. The Burger Court stiffened the code in 1973 with two decisions: Miller v. California found that "public portrayal of hardcore sexual conduct" is far removed from the free exchange of ideas the Constitution is designed to protect; it went on to invoke "contemporary community standards" as the benchmark for specific judgments. In a related action decided on the same day in 1973, the Court in Paris Adult Theater v. Slaton defined an "environmental" principle for ruling against a chain of adult moviehouses, arguing that their presence alone was a threat to the quality of life of a neighborhood and could therefore be restricted by zoning laws.

The vigor of this prosecutorial offense—at one point demanding not just proscription of targeted materials but monetary damages to the victims—gradually weakened, again from a difficulty in identifying key conditions: e.g. "taken as a whole," "violates community standards," and "inherent harm."

This long history, linguistic and legal, ecclesiastical and civil, brings us in this new century to a point of impasse. The opposing camps, libertarian and communitarian, are themselves deeply divided. And their professional supporters, lawyers, social scientists, and moral theologians, multiply the points of contention. A third force, amoral at its center, is economic; the explosion of pornography as a market phenomenon—in 1996 there were 665 million pornographic video rentals, 150 titles were added each week, and this does not include electronic transmissions to millions of subscribers—has generated enormous profits in the industry shifted the balance of power between providers and society so radically that only the state can restore a measure of parity. And this does not take into account the role of organized crime, a steady and malignant presence.

At this writing, a new contest over the rights of the pornographer has reached the doors of the Supreme Court. However this matter is decided, the case illustrates many of the complexities of this long history as well as a new element. Child pornography has long been one of the secure areas in the battle to protect community values. This is because the production process itself—the use of underage boys and girls to make the product— independent of the content or the merchandising, exploits and violates children. No area of this industry has so consistently drawn the enmity of the law and the courts, from village to nation, as child pornography. Congress has enacted Child Protection laws (1988) and the Supreme Court has upheld them (1994, U. S. v. Knox).

Recently, however, producers have moved to create and distribute virtual depictions of child sex, the images electronically produced, and hope thereby to avoid prosecution based on harm to the child "actors." In moving through the appeals courts, the legal adversaries have also reenacted the debate over violence to women allegedly inherent in pornography; viz. does the consumption of pornography, child or adult, lead to anti-social behavior by devaluing women and children, portraying them as willing victims of sexual assaults, and thereby legitimizing violence? Does such material victimize the consumer by weakening their moral judgment, their capacity for mature relationships, alienating them from society, closing them off in addictive fantasies? Or, as libertarians argue, does such experience provide an "innocent" release of sexually aberrant impulses that otherwise might be spent in criminal acts? And does their repression too conveniently serve to cover a more pernicious attack on uncomfortable ideas?

However these things work themselves out in the future, if they work themselves out, what seems most certain is that pornography is one of a number of crucial lifestyle behaviors that have intensified a spreading culture war in the United States. Political parties, religious bodies, age groups, and even geographical regions have become polarized over these issues. Anyone who wants to track the direction of the United States at this millennial divide must attend to this unsavory issue.

PORPHYRIAN TREE

A porphyrian tree is a diagrammatic representation of the relationship of GENUS, SPECIES, and individual in the category of SUBSTANCE. Based on a passage of the Isagoge of PORPHYRY, it became common in logic texts of the Middle Ages and was called the scala predicamentalis (κλιμαξ). In its usual form, the predicamental line of the supreme genus, substance, is subdivided into its subjective parts by the specific differences given in the left-hand column. These divide the genus and constitute the species. In treating rational animal as a genus, Porphyry followed the Stoics, who posited the existence of another kind of rational being, eternal in time, with a body of a tenuous airlike matter. This type of division could be pursued in any of the CATEGORIES OF BEING.

PORPHYRY

Neoplatonic philosopher greatly influencing the development of philosophical and theological thought at the close of antiquity; b. Tyre, 234; d. Rome?, after 301. At Athens, in 254, he became a pupil and constant friend of the Platonist Longinus Cassius. In 263 he went to Rome to join the school of PLOTINUS, whose teaching led him astray from the outset. Yet he was not slow in becoming one of the most important members of this school. Five years later, possibly as a result of his intellectual labors, he fell victim to neurasthenia and contemplated suicide. Under advice from Plotinus, who discerned his difficulty, he went to Marsala (Lilybaeum) in Sicily. After Plotinus's death (270), he returned to Rome, became head of the school, and married Marcella, the widow of a philosopher.

Porphyry wrote an immense opus, comprising almost 70 treatises; only fragments of this work remain. It is not quite correct to hold, as many do, that Porphyry was content merely with popularizing Plotinus's teaching. Besides the edition of the Enneads, the only Plotinian thought in Porphyry's writings is that in the Sententiae ad intelligibilia ducentes, whose title J. Bidez has rendered "Treasury of thoughts for a soul wishing to arrive at the intelligible" (Vie 106). Here Porphyry reproduces complete sentences from Plotinus but often adds his own reflections. One can detect that, while seeking to systematize Plotinus, Porphyry distorts his thought, notably as regards the distinction of virtues into political, purificatory, contemplative, and paradigmatic (Sent. 32). Although he proposed to make a résumé of Plotinus (Enn. 1.2), Porphyry actually presented a quite different teaching. Yet this distinction among the virtues prevailed throughout the Middle Ages.

Generally, Porphyry seems not to have understood Plotinus perfectly, notably as regards the latter's teaching concerning the transcendence of the One in relation to the intelligible world. He seems instead to have remained partially faithful to the traditional Platonism of Longinus. When Plotinus violently criticized the Aristotelian teaching in the Categories, Porphyry wrote a commentary on this treatise and actually refuted Plotinus's objections. His Isagoge, a sort of introduction to Aristotle's Organon, systematizes the teaching on the PREDICABLES. By asking whether GENUS and SPECIES are realities subsistent in themselves or mere conceptions of the mind, Porphyry proposed the problem of UNIVERSALS to the Middle Ages. Moreover, he commented upon many dialogues of Plato, especially the Timaeus (traces of this commentary are found in CALCIDIUS, MACROBIUS, and PROCLUS) and the Parmenides (14 pages of this have been recently identified in a palimpsest at Turin). Porphyry identifies the first One, corresponding to the first hypostasis in the Parmenides, with the act of being, and the second One, corresponding to the second hypostasis with the subject receiving being. This distinction, found also in MARIUS VICTORINUS, was used by BOETHIUS in his De hebdomadibus and was eventually formulated in the Middle Ages as the difference between EXISTENCE (esse) and what exists (quod est).

Porphyry was much preoccupied throughout his life with moral and religious questions concerning the salvation of the soul and spiritual cult. Bidez maintains that his thought on this subject underwent an evolution. Before his encounter with Plotinus, he had written a work titled "Philosophy Drawn from the Oracles," a collection of oracles gleaned from various centers of cult. Here Porphyry professes a strong belief in the most uncouth superstitions and practices of paganism. He attacks Christianity, while admitting that Christ could have been a superior man. After meeting Plotinus, however, he discovered that the true salvation of the soul could come only from mystical union with the divinity. In his De regressu animae, of which fragments have been conserved by AUGUSTINE (Civ. 10), he claims nonetheless that the religious practices advised by the Chaldaic Oracles could afford salvation for the inferior part of the soul (see NEOPLATONISM). In his letter to the Egyptian priest Anebo, he enumerates a whole series of doubts and criticisms concerning the public cult given to the gods. These criticisms can be seen in his De abstinentia: bloody sacrifices cannot honor the gods; they can, at best, appease the evil demons. The philosopher, as a priest of the supreme God, refrains from these practices. As Bidez notes (Vie 101), the religious teaching of Porphyry recognizes three levels: the lowest is the public cult rendered by the cities—this protects the masses from evil demons; above this, the mystery rites purify man's imagination and turn it to the visible gods; and at the summit, the contemplation of the wise provides the only cult that is worthy of the supreme God.

In Sicily, after 268, Porphyry wrote his 15 books against the Christians, which deal with numerous points of chronological or philological detail and attack especially the veracity of the Gospel narratives. Despite his desire for objectivity, Porphyry makes many errors in details and quite simply represents the prejudices of the Greek mind against Christianity. Yet this great adversary of Christianity has exercised a great influence on Christian thought. To formulate the Trinitarian dogma, Marius Victorinus and SYNESIUS OF CYRENE (in his Hymns) employ the schemata Porphyry had used to translate into Platonic terms the data furnished by the Chaldaic Oracles. The Oracles placed, at the summit of all, a triad formed by the Father, His Power, and His Intellect. Porphyry identified the Father with the first One and the triad Father-Power-Intellect with the triad being-life-thought. Thus he compromised the transcendence of the Plotinian One. In similar fashion, Victorinus and Synesius identified the Father with the One and the Being, and made the Son and the Holy Spirit correspond to the Power and the Intellect (otherwise known as Life and Thought) to form a triad with the Father. St. AMBROSE and St. Augustine also seem to have been strongly influenced by the metaphysical and moral doctrine of Porphyry.

Porphyry's works are still poorly known; important fragments may yet be found in Arabian translations.

PORPHYRY OF GAZA, ST.

Fifth-century ascetic and bishop; b. Thessalonica, c. 347; d. Gaza, Feb. 26, 420. A generally authoritative but chronologically unreliable biography by Mark the Deacon records that Porphyry lived ten years as a monk in Egypt and Palestine, then sold his property in Thessalonica and distributed the money among the monasteries of Egypt and the poor of Jerusalem. Ordained in 392, he had in his charge the relics of the Holy Cross until in 395 he became bishop of Gaza, a hotbed of paganism. His success in making converts brought persecution on the small Christian community. He appealed to Emperor Arcadius, who closed the pagan temples, but they were soon reopened and the persecution resumed. Empress Eudoxia helped Porphyry obtain a new rescript. This time troops destroyed the temples. On the site of the largest, the Marneion, Porphyry built a basilica called Eudoxiana after the empress, who had donated plans and funds. Porphyry tirelessly instructed his people and made many converts despite continued pagan opposition.

PORPORA, NICOLA ANTONIO

Baroque opera and church composer of the Neapolitan school; b. Naples, Aug. 17, 1686; d. Naples, March 3, 1768. He began his music studies in Naples at ten and staged the first of his 44 operas there in 1708. After an interval (1711–25) as Kapellmeister to Landgrave Philip of Hesse-Darmstadt, he was invited in 1733 to direct the Opera of the Nobility set up in London to rival HANDEL's company. The venture failed, and he left after three years. A renowned teacher, he gave lessons in Dresden (1747) and in Vienna (1751), where Franz Joseph HAYDN was his student and protégé. Intermittently he held also teaching posts at conservatories in Venice and in Naples, where he lived after 1758. Besides his operas and some 11 oratorios, he composed many Masses and motets, most of them in the operatic style of the day. In both operatic and sacred forms his melodies reveal an elegance of line not usually found in the music of his contemporaries.

PORRAS Y AYLLÓN, RAFAELA MARÍA, ST.

Known in religion as María of the Sacred Heart, foundress of the HANDMAIDS OF THE SACRED HEART OF JESUS; b. Pedro Abad (Córdoba), Spain, March 1, 1850; d. Rome, Jan. 6, 1925. She was the youngest of 13 children of well-to-do, pious parents, Ildefonso (d. 1854) and Rafaela (Ayllón y Castillo) Porras (d. 1869). She and her sister Dolores, four years her senior, became the first Spanish novices of the Society of MARY REPARATRIX (1875). When action by the bishop of Córdoba compelled the congregation to transfer to Seville, Rafaela followed the advice of her spiritual director, José Ortiz Urruela, and remained with her sister in Córdoba. Out of this situation the Sisters of Reparation of the Sacred Heart developed as a new congregation. Rafaela established the first community in Andújar, moving it to Madrid in 1877. With the assistance of Father Cotanilla, SJ, Rafaela wrote a rule that was approved by the archbishop of Toledo. Rafaela and Dolores, who became Maria of Pilar, pronounced their vows June 8, 1877. The institute devoted itself to perpetual adoration, teaching, and catechizing in order to make reparation for the outrages against the Blessed Sacrament. In 1886, when the congregation received approval from the Holy See, it changed its name to the present one. Rafaela became the first superior general. Mother Pilar, who had charge of the temporalities, caused domestic tensions by her poor administration; yet in 1893 she succeeded her sister as superior general. Rafaela continued to dwell humbly in the convent in Rome without any position of authority. She remained there as mistress of novices after Mother Pilar was removed as superior general (1903). Rafaela was beatified May 18, 1952 and canonized Jan. 23, 1977.

PORRES, MARTIN DE, ST.

Peruvian Dominican; b. Lima, Dec. 9, 1579; d. there, Nov. 4, 1639; canonized May 6, 1962. His baptismal record states, "Martin, son of an unknown father," but eight years after Martin's birth John de Porres, a noble Spanish gentleman and knight of the Order of Alcantara, acknowledged him as his son and provided for his education. The illegitimate son of a Spanish grandee and of Anna Velasquez, a free black woman, might have grown into an embittered boy and a violent man, for the Spanish were still the proud conquerors of his country. Instead, even as a child, Martin gave his heart and whatever few possessions he had to the poor and the despised. At 12 he apprenticed himself to a cirujano, who in those days was a barber, pharmacist, doctor, and surgeon. After a few years of medical apostolate among the poor, he applied to the Dominicans of the monastery of the Most Holy Rosary, asking to be admitted as a lay helper, since in his humility he did not even aspire to the rank of lay brother. He was accepted, but after nine years his superiors and the entire community were so impressed by his life of prayer, penance, humility, and charity that they asked him to make full profession as a religious. The remaining years of his monastic life after religious profession were spent exactly as the preceding ones. The extraordinary was ordinary in Martin de Porres's life: visions, ecstasies, terrifying penances, bilocation, infused theological knowledge, miraculous cures, and astonishing control over animals. He was judged to be a saint because of his perfect obedience, profound humility, and unbounded love of all God's creatures. This half-Spanish, half-black Peruvian loved all people without regard to race, color, or station, and he served Christ in all people without measuring the cost. In long nights spent in prayer and penance, he slaked his thirst for God, and in long days spent in unremitting nursing of the sick, caring for the poor, and laboring for his monastery, he slaked his thirst for the souls of humankind. Martin's sanctity was so clearly recognized by his own brethren that the religious of his monastery took him as their spiritual director, yet his humility was so great that he called himself only "a poor slave" or a "mulatto dog." His contemporaries called him "father of charity, father of the poor." Today he would be called a far-seeing social worker as well, and a champion of the rights of those denied full freedom because of their race or color.

PORT-ROYAL

Port-Royal was a Cistercian abbey of nuns situated in the Chevreuse Valley about nine miles from Versailles, and within the Diocese of Paris until 1802, famous for its role in the history of JANSENISM. It was established in 1204 by Mathilde de Garlande, wife of Matthieu de Marly. By the end of the 16th century the spirit of the abbey had deteriorated; 12 nuns lived there in mediocrity, without any well-defined rule or enclosure. In keeping with a practice current at that time, on July 5, 1602, the community received a 10-year-old girl as their abbess, Jacqueline Marie Angélique Arnauld, who later became Mère Angélique (1591–1661). She was the daughter of a Parisian lawyer, but owed this elevation to her maternal grandfather, a friend of Henry IV. At first the abbey was managed by the ARNAULD FAMILY, which partly restored its material prosperity.

The Reform of Mère Angélique. About March 25, 1608, the young abbess was converted. She resolved to reform her monastery and to reestablish the Cistercian rule in its full vigor. She overcame resistance from her nuns and, on Sept. 25, 1609, in the course of the famous Journée du Guichet, she broke the opposition of her own family by refusing to let them enter the cloister. Her renown as a reformer spread, and, with the help of Capuchin, Jesuit, and Feuillant confessors, Port-Royal became a center of spiritual life. In 1618 Mère Angélique received the mission to reform the abbey of Maubuisson, near Pontoise. She made the acquaintance of St. FRANCIS DE SALES, who was then at Paris and who became her director. He made a visit to Port-Royal in July 1619. After his death in 1622, she accepted Sebastian Zamet, Bishop of Langres, as her director. The unhealthy climate of the valley of Port-Royal decimated the nuns. On the advice of Zamet and the Jesuit Étienne BINET, she transferred her abbey to Paris and, in 1626, closed Port-Royal-des-Champs and installed her community in a house in the Faubourg Saint-Jacques, soon put under the immediate jurisdiction of the archbishop of Paris. In 1633, she left Port-Royal-de-Paris to establish, under Zamet's authority, a new order, called Institut du Saint-Sacrement. The new foundation was strongly attacked and its orthodoxy questioned with regard to a writing of Mère Agnès (1593–1671), a sister of Mère Angélique; the work, which was entitled Chapelet secret du Saint-Sacrement, was deferred to the Sorbonne.

Direction by Abbé Saint-Cyran. Upon Zamet's entreaties, the Chapelet was defended by a theologian then enjoying a well-established reputation among the devout, Jean DUVERGIER DE HAURANNE, Abbé de Saint-Cyran (1581–1643). This was the occasion for Mère Angélique, who had known him superficially since 1621, to discover him as a spiritual director. She invited him to Port-Royal, where the nuns enthusiastically accepted his teaching and spread his rigoristic ideas about penance and the Eucharist, which occasioned public controversies. In August 1637, a nephew of Mère Angélique, the young and brilliant lawyer Antoine Lemaître, was converted and decided to live in seclusion and penance, without becoming a priest or religious. Saint-Cyran agreed to take him under his direction, but he was highly criticized for doing so.

The Solitaries of Port-Royal. Lemaître became the first of the Solitaries or gentlemen (Les Messieurs) of Port-Royal. Others joined him, including two of his brothers, the grammarian Claude Lancelot, and the priest Antoine Singlin, who was to play an important role as confessor at Port-Royal. Forty other men joined them later. However, Saint-Cyran openly criticized Cardinal RICHELIEU's policies regarding the welfare of Catholicism. To get rid of him, Richelieu had him arrested and imprisoned at Vincennes, May 14, 1638. In prison, Saint-Cyran continued his role as director by way of letters. The Solitaries and other witnesses were interrogated, but Richelieu could not discover any charge against Saint-Cyran, who was freed on Feb. 6, 1643, shortly after the cardinal's death. He died the following October 11, exhausted by his detention. In August 1643, one of the theologians of the group, Antoine Arnauld (1612–94) published a treatise De la fréquente Communion, a vigorous defense of Saint-Cyran's ideas. The AUGUSTINUS, a posthumous work of Saint-Cyran's friend Jansenius, had been previously published in 1640. Although Saint-Cyran had some reservations about this work, he had commanded his disciples to defend it. Furthermore, from 1646 onward, the Solitaries organized Les Petites-Écoles where many of them taught. Despite difficulties with the royal power, Les Petites-Écoles continued until 1660 and reared about 100 children, Jean Racine being among them. At that time Port-Royal enjoyed a great reputation and the number of nuns quickly mounted. The foundation of the Institut du Saint-Sacrement, which had not succeeded, was united with Port-Royal, and on Dec. 24, 1647, the nuns received the white habit with a scarlet cross on the scapular, and dedicated themselves to perpetual adoration. Their constitutions were redacted by Mère Agnés. In 1648, as the nuns became too numerous for the Parisian monastery, a group of them returned to occupy Port-Royal-des-Champs.

Jansenist Controversies. In France, the Jansenist controversies began in 1649 with the question of the five propositions. Seconded by the Solitaries, and especially by the theologian and moralist Pierre NICOLE, Arnauld defended Jansenius energetically. Since the court had taken a clear stand against Jansenism, the position of Port-Royal became perilous, especially from 1655, when Arnauld brought the debate to the public at large by his Lettre à une personne de condition. At one time the nuns feared they would be dispersed. But the Lettres provinciales of Blaise Pascal and, on March 24, 1656, the miracle of the Holy-Thorn, the instantaneous cure of a niece of Pascal who was boarding at the monastery, restored opinion in favor of Port-Royal and led to a period of calm. Persecution began again in 1661, when Louis XIV sought to force the nuns and Les Messieurs to sign a formula condemning the five propositions and attesting that they were in the Augustinus. Though none of the nuns had read the book, they agreed to sign if certain restrictive clauses were added. After three years of waiting and negotiating, Hardouin de Péréfixe, archbishop of Paris, took rigorous steps in August 1664 and transferred 12 of the nuns to other convents. In July 1665, the 12 nuns who had signed were left at Port-Royal-de-Paris, now raised to the status of an independent abbey, and the nuns who refused to do so were interned at Port-Royal-des-Champs under police supervision and were deprived of the sacraments, while Les Messieurs hid through fear of imprisonment. Upon the initiative of Pope Clement IX, a compromise was reached in 1669 and the monastery at Port-Royal-des-Champs regained its freedom and remained separate from the abbey in Paris. This period of tranquillity, called "Peace of the Church," was an exceptionally brilliant one for Port-Royal. The Duchess de Longueville, cousin of the king, protected it, and famous friendships surrounded it, including that of Madame de Sévigné. The group became distinguished by some outstanding publications, such as Pascal's Pensées and Saint-Cyran's Considérations (1670), as well as Lemaître de Sacy's translation of the Bible (1672).

Decline and Suppression. Upon the order of Louis XIV, who was irritated at finding resistance to his absolutism at Port-Royal, the new archbishop of Paris, Harlay de Champvallon, renewed persecution in 1679 by forbidding the monastery to receive novices and thereby condemned it to progressive extinction. Arnauld and other Jansenists went to foreign countries. However, the last years of the declining monastery were peaceful until 1706, when the nuns refused to sign the bull Vineam Domini against Jansenism. After troublesome chicanery, Louis XIV, urged by Madame de Maintenon, personally intervened and, on Oct. 29, 1709, the 22 old nuns still living in the house were deported to separate monasteries by the police. Two years later Louis XIV had the buildings destroyed, and the corpses in the cemetery exhumed and amassed in a common grave at nearby Saint-Lambert. The place became a center of Jansenist pilgrimages. Repurchased after the French Revolution by a lawyer named Louis Silvy, the ruins of Port-Royal are now the property of a private association that has had a small museum erected there. Another museum belonging to the estate is at the Granges de Port-Royal, in the house where Les Messieurs lived.

PORTER

Also known as doorkeeper, or ostiary. Historically, the first of the minor orders or steps that led to the priesthood. In the early Church the principal function of the porter was to guard the doors of the church and to exclude those who were not authorized to enter. The porter was also given the duties of ringing the bells to announce the divine services and of assisting the preacher.

This order, instituted by the Church, was not considered a sacrament by many theologians. In the rite of ordination the candidate was first instructed by the ordaining prelate in the duties of his office. The essential action in this rite was the presentation of keys to the candidate along with the words recited by the ordaining prelate as found in the Pontifical. The ceremony also included the opening and shutting of the doors of the church and the ringing of the church bell by the candidate.

By the apostolic letter Ministeria quaedam dated Aug. 15, 1972, Pope Paul VI suppressed, among other things, the minor order of the porter.

PORTER, FRANCIS

Irish Franciscan controversialist and historian; b. Kingstown, near Navan, County Meath, 1632; d. St. Isidore’s College, Rome, April 7, 1702. It is not known where he received his early education. On Oct. 10, 1654, on the eve of his solemn profession in the FRANCISCAN order, he made a renunciation of his possessions, thus indicating that he had entered the order a year before. He studied for the priesthood, probably at St. Isidore’s College, Rome. After ordination he became professor of philosophy and theology at that college, where he resided until his death. He did valuable work on some of the Roman Congregations and acted as one of the procurators at Rome for the Belgian anti-Jansenists (1680–84). His Securis evangelica (Rome 1674) is a fine piece of controversial writing, but it depends to a great extent on Bossuet’s Exposition de la foi. His Compendium annalium ecclesiasticorum regni Hiberniae (Rome 1690) gives a brief account of the ancient kings and laws of Ireland and of its conversion to Christianity, but most of the material is derived from other Irish historians. He acted at Rome as procurator of the Franciscan province of Ireland (c. 1680). On Oct. 6, 1690, he was appointed theologian and historian to the exiled King James II, and on Dec. 19, 1695, he was commended for promoting the affairs of that monarch.

PORTIER, MICHAEL

Bishop; b. Montbrison, France, Sept. 7, 1795; d. Mobile, Ala., May 14, 1859. As a seminarian at Lyons, France, he volunteered for service in Louisiana when Bp.

Louis Dubourg appealed for helpers in 1817. Upon arriving at Baltimore, Md., in September, he received the diaconate and proceeded to New Orleans, La., as a catechist. After being ordained in St. Louis, Mo., Sept. 29, 1818, he returned to New Orleans where he served as priest and educator. He was named to the new Vicariate Apostolic of Alabama and the Floridas in 1825, and was consecrated by Bp. Joseph ROSATI, CM, at St. Louis, Nov. 5, 1826. His vicariate had some 6,000 Catholics centered at Mobile, Ala.; and Pensacola and St. Augustine, Fla.; it was totally without clergy. In June 1828, he went to seek laborers and funds in Europe. Jean Mathias Pierre LORAS and others offered to join him, and the Society for the Propagation of the Faith at Lyons promised liberal assistance. While Portier was in Rome (May 1829), Pius VIII established the Diocese of MOBILE. Lack of clergy remained a chronic problem for Portier, who seldom had more than a dozen diocesan priests at his disposal. Nevertheless, Spring Hill College, Mobile, the oldest institution of its kind in Alabama, was founded in 1830, and conditions improved after 1847 when the Society of Jesus undertook to run the college. In the same year the Brothers of the Sacred Heart opened an orphanage and school for boys, while as early as 1832 four Visitandines arrived from Georgetown, Washington, D.C., to begin an academy for girls. The Sisters of Charity from Emmitsburg, Md., entered the diocese in 1841, and in spite of nativist opposition during the 1850s expanded their work to include education, two hospitals, and a girls’ orphan asylum. Under Portier, Catholicism in Florida enjoyed a marked growth at Pensacola, and churches were built at Apalachicola, Tallahassee, Jacksonville, and Isle Key West. In Alabama he opened new parishes and missions in the vicinity of Mobile, and supplied pastors for Montgomery and Tuscaloosa. In 1850 at Mobile he consecrated the Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception.

PORTILLO, ALVARO DEL

Bishop, prelate of personal prelature; b. Madrid, March 11, 1914; d. Rome, March 23, 1994. Alvaro del Portillo held doctorates in civil engineering, history, and canon law. In 1935 he joined OPUS DEI, a predominantly lay organization founded by Josemaria ESCRIVÁ for the spiritual, ascetical, and doctrinal formation of persons in the world. As a close associate and collaborator of Escrivá, del Portillo remained with him during much of the Spanish civil war (1936–39).

After the civil war, del Portillo worked with Escrivá to rebuild Opus Dei in Spain and foster its spread elsewhere. As a layman, he traveled to Rome in 1943 on the founder's behalf in order to introduce the new organization to Pope Pius XII and curial officials and to prepare for the establishment there of its international headquarters. On June 25, 1944, del Portillo became one of the first three members of Opus Dei to be ordained as a priest.

Del Portillo was secretary general of Opus Dei from 1940 to 1947 and again from 1956 to 1975. From 1947 to 1950 he was counselor (regional director) of Opus Dei in Italy, and from 1947 to 1956 also served as its procurator general. He was first rector of the Roman College of the Holy Cross, a position he held from 1948 to 1953. He often accompanied Escrivá on trips to prepare for or consolidate the apostolic work of Opus Dei in Europe and, between 1970 and 1975, in Latin America.

In the preparatory phase for the Second Vatican Council, del Portillo was president of the preparatory commission for the laity and was among the first 100 per-iti to be named. During Vatican II he served as secretary for the Commission on Clerical Discipline and the Commission of the Christian People.

Beginning in the 1950s, successive popes—Pius XII, John XXIII, Paul VI, and John Paul II—named del Portillo a consultor to various dicasteries and other bodies of the Holy See. Among these were the Congregation for Religious, the Commission for the Revision of the Code of Canon Law, the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, the Congregation for the Clergy.

Personal Prelature. Following Escrivá's death in Rome on June 26, 1975, a general congress of Opus Dei on Sept. 15, 1975 unanimously elected del Portillo to head the association of the faithful as its founder's first successor.

During the next 19 years, Opus Dei grew from approximately 60,000 members to approximately 77,000 while beginning apostolic activities in 21 new countries in Latin America, Africa, Europe, Oceania, and Asia. In the United States, where it was introduced in 1949, the number of cities with centers of Opus Dei rose from eight to seventeen, and apostolic activities were begun in several other places.

Another major initiative of Opus Dei during these years was the establishment in 1984 of the Roman Athenaeum of the Holy Cross, with faculties in theology, canon law, and philosophy.

By the Apostolic Constitution Ut sit (Nov. 28, 1982) Pope John Paul II created the Prelature of the Holy Cross and Opus Dei, the first personal prelature of the Church, and named del Portillo its first prelate. Pope John Paul II ordained del Portillo titular bishop of Vita on Jan. 6, 1991. Finally, in 1992, a cherished goal of del Portillo's was realized when, on May 17th, Pope John Paul II beatified Escrivá.

In 1994, del Portillo suffered a heart attack and died in the early morning of March 23.

PORTIUNCULA

A rural chapel on the plain below Assisi, Italy, called also St. Mary of the Angels, favorite church and headquarters of St. Francis of Assisi. E. d'Alençon (1904) and L. Canonici (1963) have demonstrated that an alleged foundation of the chapel by Syrian monks in the 4th century and restoration by St. Benedict in the 6th were invented by S. Vitale in 1645. It was probably built in the 10th or 11th century; its site is first mentioned in a document of 1045, and the chapel itself about 1150. The chapel was originally known as St. Mary of the Angels because of local reports of angelic visitations, but it was called St. Mary of the Portiuncula in the mid-13th century; later both names were used. Its proper ecclesiastical title is uncertain: it may be the Assumption, or it may be the Annunciation (as is suggested by the polyptych behind the altar painted in 1393). The church belonged to the Abbey of San Benedetto on Mount Subasio, but it was abandoned late in the 12th century, until the young Francis repaired it in 1207. There he received his vocation and founded his first order (1208), acquiring the Portiuncula from the Benedictines (1210) and having it consecrated (1215?). There he vested St. Clare (1212), held general chapters, and died in an adjacent cell (1226). The church and friary, at first subject to the basilica of San Francesco, passed to the Observant Franciscans in 1415. A triple-aved basilica (papal since 1909) of St. Mary of the Angels was erected over the chapel and death cell (1569–78), and was later rebuilt after an earthquake (1836–40); a marble façade and portico were added in the 20th century (1926–30). Since about 1270 the Portiuncula has been one of the major Marian shrines of Europe, owing to the fame of the "Pardon of Assisi" or the Portiuncula Indulgence, a plenary INDULGENCE, without offerings, gainable by pilgrims yearly on August 2, which Honorius III is reported to have spontaneously granted to Francis in 1216 at Perugia, upon hearing of a private revelation received by the saint. The prolonged controversies regarding its historicity and subsequent extensions have been documented by R. Huber. Its validity has not been questioned since the first extant papal briefs affirming it under Boniface VIII (1294–1303). In 1622 it was extended to all visitors to Franciscan churches; Benedict XV on April 16, 1921, made it a daily toties quoties indulgence, under the usual conditions [see Enchiridion Indulgentiarum (Rome 1952) n.698].

Modern scholars have questioned the granting of the indulgence in 1216 because: (1) it is not mentioned in early Franciscan biographies, chronicles, or official acts, or in a sermon by an archbishop of Pisa in Assisi in 1261 listing indulgences gainable at the basilica of San Francesco; (2) in 1215 the Fourth Lateran Council ordered that indulgences granted for consecrations of churches be restricted to 40 days; (3) Honorius III in 1222 conceded to the Basilica of St. Mary Major in Rome only a partial one of one year and 40 days; (4) plenary indulgences could then be gained only by participants in or material supporters of the various Crusades; (5) documents attesting the Portiuncula Indulgence date only from 1277 and are contradictory in details; and (6) two basic compilations by the Catalan Andrea Batlle (or Bajuli; c. 1315), edited by A. Fierens (1910) and J. Cambell (1963), and by Fra Francesco di Bartolo della Rossa of Assisi (c. 1334), edited by P. Sabatier (1900), include improbable visions, miracles, and legendary materials. (New biographical data on Francesco di Bartolo were published by A. Fortini in 1959.)

Historians who accept the granting of the indulgence in 1216 reply that the first compilation of evidence made by Bp. Theobald of Assisi about 1310 contained critically acceptable attestations by Friar Benedict of Arezzo (d. 1282) and Giacomo Coppoli (fl. 1276), a prominent Perugian friend of Bl. Giles of Assisi. They stated that they had heard it narrated by Brother Leo of Assisi (d. 1278), St. Francis's confessor, or by Brother Masseo, who accompanied the saint to Perugia in 1216. Benedict of Arezzo and a companion testified in 1277 that they frequently heard Masseo describe the granting; their testimony, incidentally, implies that Masseo was then dead and so did not die in 1280 as traditionally reported. In 1311 Bl. John of La Verna testified that numerous friars had informed him they had also received the account from the eyewitness Masseo. Fra Francesco Venimbeni of Fabriano (d. 1322) wrote in his minor Chronica [cf. partial ed. by G. Pagnani in Archivum Franciscanum historicum 52 (1959) 153–177] that he went to Assisi in 1268 to gain the indulgence and heard Leo tell about it. A treatise defending it by Peter John Olivi (d. 1291) indicates that it was accepted and disputed c. 1279. The spiritual writer Ubertino da Casale declared that he gained the indulgence in 1284. The testimony of such witnesses establishes the fact of the granting in 1216, in the judgment of P. Sabatier, M. Faloci Pulignani, L. Oligier, M. Bihl, G. Abate, and R. Huber. However, they question or reject a number of additional incidents narrated in the two late compilations.

One of several points still requiring clarification is whether St. Francis in 1216 publicly announced the indulgence at the Portiuncula in the presence of seven bishops; for, once proclaimed, how could it have been, in effect, ignored for 50 years? The late accounts stress that the Curia urged Honorius to retract it and induced him to restrict it to one day a year. That, owing to this potent official opposition, the saint voluntarily allowed it to lapse soon after receiving it is suggested by his reported advice to Leo to keep it a secret until near the end of Leo's life. A few writers have seen a discreetly cryptic allusion to the indulgence in a friar's vision, recorded by both Thomas of Celano in 1245 and St. Bonaventure in 1261, of a countless throng of men kneeling before the Portiuncula, imploring and obtaining God's mercy.

PORTLAND, ARCHDIOCESE OF

The metropolitan see of Portland (Portlandensis) erected as a vicariate apostolic Dec. 1, 1843; created Archdiocese of Oregon City July 24, 1846; name changed to Archdiocese of Portland in Oregon Sept. 26, 1928. It comprises 29,717 square miles in western Oregon, from the Cascade Mountains to the Pacific Ocean between California and the Columbia River, with a total population in 2001 of 2,869,750, including 297,841 Catholics. The metropolitan province of Portland includes the dioceses of Baker, Boise in Idaho, and Great Falls-Billings and Helena in Montana

Early History. During the period that the Oregon Country was jointly occupied by Great Britain and the U.S. (1818–46), it was the home of native peoples, explorers and fur traders. Gradually the Hudson's Bay Company, under the guidance of Dr. John McLoughlin at Fort Vancouver, dominated the territory. French Canadians, mostly Catholics, and fur trappers settled in the Willamette Valley near St. Paul around 1830, and in 1834 they sent a letter to Bishop Joseph PROVENCHER of Red River, Canada, begging for priests. The bishop arranged to bring the Columbia area into his vicariate, and eventually responded to the settlers' requests. In anticipation of the arrival of priests, the French Canadians built a log church on French Prairie in 1836, the first Catholic church in Oregon.

The archbishop of Quebec selected Francis Norbert BLANCHET (Sept. 3, 1795–June 18, 1883) to be vicar general of the Columbia Mission on April 17, 1838. On May 3, 1838, Father Blanchet left Montreal for Red River, where Father Modeste Demers joined him; and the two missionaries reached Fort Vancouver on Nov. 24, 1838. Soon after their arrival Blanchet visited the log church on French Prairie, celebrating the first Mass in what became the state of Oregon and dedicated the chapel to St. Paul the Apostle (Jan. 6, 1839).

Peter DE SMET, SJ, working in the Rocky Mountains, learned of the priests in the northwest, and in 1842 he came to Fort Vancouver and St. Paul Mission to discuss the future of the mission with Blanchet and Demers. On their own initiative, the three men laid out a plan for the development of the church in the Oregon Country. De Smet left for Europe to secure personnel; Demers went to New Caledonia (now British Columbia) to expand the missions to native tribes; while Blanchet continued to serve the existing missions, writing to church authorities urging support for the plan.

In August of 1844, De Smet returned to Oregon with a party of five Jesuits and six Sisters of Notre Dame de Namur. Meanwhile, Blanchet's letters influenced the decision to elevate the Columbia Mission to a vicariate on Dec. 1, 1843. When the news reached Oregon on Nov. 22, 1844, Francis Blanchet reluctantly accepted the nomination as bishop of the Vicariate of Philadelphia (later changed to Drasa). Blanchet journeyed to Montreal, where he was consecrated bishop on July 25, 1845, and from there he sailed for Europe to gather personnel and financial support. Assisted by Vatican insiders, Blanchet convinced the Holy See to establish the ecclesiastical Province of Oregon City in the Oregon Country; it would have two suffragan bishops, a bishop of Walla Walla, and a bishop of Vancouver Island. On June 18, 1846, the U.S. Senate ratified the treaty bringing Oregon into the Union. On July 24, 1846, Oregon City became the second archdiocese in the United States.

Blanchet's triumphal return to St. Paul on Aug. 26, 1847, with a group of 21, including eight priests and seven more sisters, inspired a flurry of ecclesiastical activity. In December of 1848, Archbishop Blanchet officially moved to Oregon City, the seat of his see. Following the Whitman Massacre in 1848, during which the Cayuse tribe killed 14 people at the Protestant mission and for which Catholics were blamed, a time of widespread anti-Catholicism ensued. Along with the debts from building and departure of much of the male population to the California Gold Rush, the archdiocese struggled to avoid bankruptcy. The desperate archbishop made a successful two-year trip to South America to raise funds.

The Oregon Donation Land Law of 1850 drew population to the territory. Although few of the newcomers were Catholics, the church slowly recovered, and new parishes were established. Oregon City, however, failed to develop, and in 1862 Blanchet transferred his episcopal residence to Portland. In 1851 the Reverend James Croke had established the parish of the Immaculate Conception and the church he built became the procathedral. Twelve Sisters of the Holy Names came from Quebec to revive Catholic education in Oregon in 1859. They soon had schools throughout the state and by 1871 had a novitiate in Portland. Catholic lay societies began to grow, particularly in Portland. With the assistance of the St. Vincent de Paul Society, the Sisters of Providence opened St. Vincent's Hospital in Portland in 1875.

While Blanchet was in Rome attending the first Vatican Council (1868–1870), a Portland group established a newspaper, The Catholic Sentinel, still in existence. Blanchet used the paper to battle inequities in Grant's Peace Policy, which turned supervision of native reservations over to religious groups, most often Protestant ones.

Establishment of the Vicariate of Idaho in 1868 reduced the size of the archdiocese, but the resignation of its bishop in 1876 forced Blanchet to take over its administration once again. The aging Blanchet tried for some time to resign. Charles John SEGHERS, Bishop of Vancouver Island, became his coadjutor in 1878, arriving in Portland in July of 1879. Blanchet retired in 1880 and died June 18, 1883.

Bishop Seghers (Dec. 26, 1837–Nov. 28, 1886) left Vancouver Island reluctantly. While waiting for acceptance of Blanchet's retirement, Seghers toured the archdiocese, visiting places no priest had ever been before. A consummate missionary, Seghers paid special attention to the native peoples. During the Seghers administration the Benedictines came to Oregon and established an abbey at Mount Angel, while Benedictine Sisters took up educational work. The archdiocese was consolidated within the state boundaries when vicars apostolic were named for Idaho and Montana. While at a meeting in Rome, Seghers resigned from Portland to return as bishop to the Diocese of Vancouver Island. He was killed by a crazed assistant on Nov. 28, 1886, while on a missionary trip to Alaska.

A man of firsts, William Hickley GROSS, bishop of Savannah, became third archbishop of Oregon City on Feb. 1, 1885. Among other attainments, he was the first American-born archbishop of Oregon City, as well as the first American-born bishop in the west and first member of a religious congregation, the Redemptorists, to become an archbishop in Oregon. One of his first acts was the dedication of the second Cathedral of the Immaculate Conception in Portland, begun in 1878. By 1894 this building was replaced by a temporary cathedral elsewhere, as the area around the second cathedral became commercial.

Gross attracted many new religious communities to the state; and not content with importing nuns, he created his own congregation, now known as the Sisters of St. Mary of Oregon. During this period the church grew rapidly, with new parishes and a dramatically expanded parochial school system. With Gross' encouragement and support, the Benedictines founded Mount Angel College (1887) and a seminary (1889) at their abbey. Social work advanced with the arrival of several congregations of Sisters who opened institutions to serve various needy groups. Eastern Oregon parishes also grew during this period, with more parishes, schools and a Catholic hospital in Baker City.

Archbishop Gross died suddenly in Baltimore on Nov. 14, 1898, and was buried there. Again the Diocese of Vancouver Island provided an archbishop when Bishop Alexander Christie (May 28, 1848–April 6, 1925) became fourth archbishop of Oregon City in February of 1899. The archdiocese was deeply in debt, but the population was growing and more varied than before. In 1903 the archdiocese shrank to its current size, with the establishment of the Diocese of Baker City in the eastern part of the state.

Later Archbishops. Archbishop Christie purchased a former Methodist college in Portland in 1901 to found a school, originally named Columbia University. In 1902 Holy Cross priests and Brothers took over the institution, which became the University of Portland.

Anti-Catholicism, led by the Ku Klux Klan, played an important role in Oregon affairs in Christie's time. In 1922 the state legislature passed the Oregon School Bill intended to force all children up to the age of 16 to attend public schools. Designed to close parochial schools, it lead to the famous OREGON SCHOOL CASE. The Sisters of the Holy Names challenged the law and won. The State in turn appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, which declared the law unconstitutional in 1925. Christie organized the Catholic Truth Society, which joined the Knights of Columbus in fighting for Catholics' rights. Visits from the chapel cars sponsored by the Catholic Church Extension Society beginning in 1909 led many towns to build churches. Archbishop Christie proposed a new edifice to replace the building that had served as a temporary cathedral but just as his dream for a new cathedral was about to be realized, he died on April 6, 1925.

His replacement was a former teacher and college president from Iowa, Edward Daniel Howard (Nov. 5, 1877–Jan. 2, 1983), destined to serve for over 42 years, from 1924 to 1966. He immediately moved to officially transfer the archdiocese from Oregon City to Portland, which was effected in 1928. With the archdiocese near bankruptcy, Howard consolidated financing and set up a chancery office. The Catholic Truth Society (today the Oregon Catholic Press) began publishing weekly missals that were distributed all over the country. Social work was coordinated under Catholic Charities, as was education under the superintendent of education. The archbishop supported Catholic Action and was deeply involved in social welfare problems, for which he received numerous awards; and he encouraged apostolates for racial minorities. One of his special projects was development of a diocesan-supported Central Catholic High School in Portland, to encourage candidates for the priesthood. Archbishop Howard was the oldest archbishop from the United States at Vatican II. He implemented changes and allowed innovations, starting a Priests' Senate and encouraging ecumenical programs. In 1966 he resigned at the age of 89, and died at the age of 105 years.

Robert Joseph Dwyer (Aug. 1, 1908–March 24, 1974), bishop of Reno, succeeded Howard. Having been a newspaper editor, he continued to write erudite, articulate columns for the Catholic Sentinel. While church programs and activities increased in the post Vatican II era, the loss of priests and nuns contributed to school closures. Conflicts over Vatican II changes caused turmoil. Dwyer set up a business manager for the archdiocese, and established a formal budget and accounting practices. He created a vicariate for the Spanish speaking and encouraged inner city social work. The Maronite rite came to the state; the permanent diaconate was reinstated; Newman centers at colleges and universities expanded. Failing health forced Dwyer's resignation in 1974.

The first native northwesterner to become archbishop of Portland was Cornelius Michael Power (Dec. 18, 1913–May 22, 1997). Former bishop of Yakima, he was appointed as seventh archbishop of Portland on Jan. 22, 1974. Continuing the work of Archbishop Dwyer, he organized the archdiocese using a business model. Rome appointed two auxiliary bishops, Paul Waldschmidt, C.S.C., and Kenneth Steiner to assist him, and he divided the archdiocese into area vicariates, also establishing a Southeast Asian vicariate, and welcomed the Byzantine Rite to the area. Power retired in 1986.

Installed as eighth archbishop of Portland on Sept. 22, 1986, William Joseph Levada (June 15, 1936—), supported lay ministry, ecumenism, and social programs. He reorganized Catholic Charities and carried on a successful campaign to provide a retirement home for priests. Catholic school enrollment began to grow again. In 1993 the archdiocese formed a political action committee which carried on a vigorous but ultimately unsuccessful campaign against the Oregon Assisted Suicide bill. Levada left in 1995 to become archbishop of San Francisco.

For only the second time, a member of a religious community became archbishop of Portland when Francis George, OMI (Jan. 16, 1937—), who had been bishop of Yakima, came to Portland in 1996. His was the shortest administration of any Portland archbishop, not quite one year, before he was named archbishop of Chicago in 1997. The Most Reverend John Vlazney (Feb. 22, 1937—), bishop of Winona, was appointed Oct. 28, 1997 to succeed him.

PORTLAND, DIOCESE OF (MAINE)

The Diocese of Portland (Portlandensis) comprising the entire state of Maine is a suffragan of the metropolitan see of Boston. At the time it was established by Pope Pius IX (July 29, 1853), it included Maine and New Hampshire, formerly parts of the Diocese of Boston. After Henry B. Coskery (1808–72), Vicar General of Baltimore, refused, Rome appointed David William BACON (1815–74), a priest of the Diocese of New York, as Portland's first bishop (Jan. 23, 1855).

During Bacon's tenure, the diocese expanded to include the Madawaska territory which the United States had acquired under the Webster-Ashburton Treaty of 1842 but which had remained under the administration of Canadian bishops until the First Vatican Council. As a participant at Vatican I Bacon joined 18 other American bishops in stating, before its pronouncement as a dogma, that it was inopportune to proclaim the doctrine of papal infallibility. An energetic builder of churches and schools as well as an effective speaker, Bacon set the foundations of his new diocese firmly in place before his untimely death at the age of 59.

Bacon's successor, James Augustine HEALY (1830–1900), the first black American Catholic bishop, was named Feb. 12, 1875. He led the diocese for the next quarter-century during which time New Hampshire was separated from the Diocese of Portland with the creation of the Diocese of Manchester in 1884. The influx of a large French-speaking population from Quebec had helped to expand the Catholic population in cities like Biddeford, Lewiston, and Waterville so that it became necessary to provide even more schools and parishes for an ethnic group that constituted the majority of the state's Catholic population, almost 100,000 at the time of the bishop's death. Healey's work had been enhanced by the charitable and educational works of the Sisters of Mercy among the Irish and French as well as among the Native Americans on the reservations.

William Henry O'CONNELL (1859–1944), a native of Lowell, Massachusetts succeeded Healy, February 8. O'Connell remained in office until he was named Boston's coadjutor on Feb. 21, 1906. While his tenure in Portland was short, it was distinguished by his attempts to improve relations with peoples of different faiths and of different ethnic backgrounds within the state. By encouraging Catholics to become part of the social mainstream, O'Connell brought prestige to the church just as he did when he was appointed, Aug. 31, 1905, papal envoy to the Emperor of Japan in the wake of the Russo-Japanese War.

When O'Connell moved on Boston in 1906, Louis Sebastian Walsh (1858–1924), a native of Salem, Massachusetts, was named bishop of Portland. While Walsh provided national parishes for immigrants from Italy and Poland, his emphasis on education, including the founding in 1917 of what became Cheverus High School, and his advocacy of public funds to support the Catholic school system proved very controversial in an era when his coreligionists were defending their right to send their children to parochial schools.

The next two bishops were natives of Waterbury, Connecticut. On May 25, 1925, Rome named John Gregory Murray (1877–1936), who had been auxiliary Bishop of Hartford, to succeed Walsh. His facility in languages helped him to strengthen the faith among the state's immigrant groups. However, the financial stress induced by the worldwide Depression towards the end of his tenure severely handicapped the subsequent development of his diocese. After Murray was appointed Archbishop of St. Paul, Minnesota, Oct. 29, 1931, Joseph Edward McCarthy (1876–1955) became the bishop of Portland, on May 13, 1932. A heavy diocesan debt severely limited McCarthy in what he able to do by way of developing the parishes, schools, and other services of his geographically extensive jurisdiction. To his credit, McCarthy was able to lighten that burden and to become for his flock a good shepherd who was regarded with deep respect to his last days.

Portland's next bishop, Daniel Joseph Feeney (1984–1969) took office Sept. 8, 1955. As a native son who for ten years had served as auxiliary bishop and coadjutor to Bishop McCarthy, he was well prepared for the tasks that lay ahead. Once he effectively freed the diocese of its financial constraints, Feeney was able to undertake the construction of a number of new schools and churches. Feeney, who had attended the Second Vatican Council, moved forward to implement conciliar reforms even when the changes were controversial.

Peter Leo Gerety (b. 1912), who succeeded McCarthy on Sept. 15, 1969, served the diocese of Portland until March, 25, 1974 when he was appointed to the archiepiscopal see of Newark. Although Gerety's tenure in Portland was of short duration, it was distinguished for his innovations in revamping the Church's social services so that it reflected more comprehensively the teachings of the Second Vatican Council.

When Gerety moved on to Newark, Edward Cornelius O'Leary (b. 1920), who had served as Auxiliary Bishop of Portland since 1971, became the ordinary on Oct. 22, 1974, Bishop O'Leary resigned on Sept. 27, 1988, but in the 14 years he served as Portland's bishop, he brought the leadership of the church closer to the people. This was reflected, for example, in the appointment of Armadee Wilfrid Proulx (1932–1993), a Franco-American, as auxiliary bishop. Franco-Americans constitute the largest ethnic group among Maine's Roman Catholics.

With O'Leary's resignation on Dec. 21, 1988, Rome appointed the former abbot of St Anselm's Abbey and auxiliary bishop of Manchester, N.H., Joseph John Gerry O.S.B., (b. 1928), as the Tenth Bishop of Portland. Gerry brought with him his monastic love of the Holy Scriptures which emerged in his homilies, but at the administrative level Gerry had to face the consolidation of parishes and schools because of the shortage of priests, religious and laity necessary to staff them. With Bishop Michael Richard Cote as his auxiliary, Gerry's task of leading a flock of over 200,000 Roman Catholics is made easier by presence in the diocese of men religious like the Dominicans, Franciscans, Jesuits, and Brothers of Christian Instruction, women religious like the Sisters of Mercy, Sisters of St. Joseph, the Ursulines, and a host of others to help the diocese in its charitable, educational, and pastoral ministries.

PORTUGAL, THE CATHOLIC CHURCH IN

The Portuguese Republic is located on the Atlantic coast of the Iberian Peninsula of Europe, and is bordered on the north and east by Spain. Mountains and the Douro, Mondego and Tagus Rivers divide the country into east-west regions. The south has a Mediterranean climate while the central and north have an Atlantic climate. Portugal, including the Azores and Madeira islands, possesses natural resources that include cork, tungsten, iron ore, uranium and marble. Among its agricultural products are grains, potatoes, olives, grapes, livestock, poultry and dairy products. Earthquakes occur frequently in the Azores.

The region was visited by Celts from the 6th to the 2d century B.C., Romans c. 137 B.C., and Suevi in the 5th century, was invaded by the Moors between the 8th and 13th centuries, and received Jewish and African immigrants between the 15th and 18th centuries. In Roman times the area of modern Portugal covered most of the province of Lusitania and part of Galicia. Barbarian Suevi held the north from 411 to 585, and in the 10th and 11th centuries the county of Porto gradually spread south to include all Portuguese territory freed from the Moors in 1095. Since 1139 Portugal has been independent except for a period under Spanish rule (1580–1640). In 1910 the country adopted a republican form of government, and from 1932 to 1968 it was dominated by António de Oliveira Salazar (1889–1970) who ruled as a virtual dictator. A coup in April of 1974 brought constitutional democracy to the country following initial revolutionary instability. Subsequently, all the Portuguese overseas territories became independent, the last, Macau, returning to China in 1999. The liberation movement in the overseas provinces, especially in Angola, had far-reaching demographic and economic consequences because it caused many of Portuguese descent to seek refuge in Portugal. Portugal became a member of the European Union in 1986.

The following essay is in three parts. Part one covers the early church through 1495; part two covers the Church from 1495 to 1900; the third covers the Church through the 20th century.

Ecclesiastical History to 1495

There were Christians in Portugal probably shortly after Apostolic times. The accounts of the early 4th-century martyrs Verissimus, Maxima and Julia in Lisbon and Victor in Braga are of later date. Bishops Liberius of Mérida, Vincent of Ossonoba and Quintianus of Évora attended the Council of ELVIRA c. 304; and Potamius of Lisbon (357) was an important adversary of Arianism. The 4th century was more noteworthy, however, for the lengthy controversy over Pelagianism, which exhibited the attraction of novel doctrines and rigorous asceticism in Galicia and Lusitania, as well as the strong reaction of local Christians against heresy. The monk Baquiarus and two priests of Braga named Avitus distinguished themselves in this controversy. By 400 Braga (Bishop Paternus) joined Ossonoba, Évora and Lisbon as a known Portuguese bishopric (metropolitanate of Galicia).

Barbarian Suevi, Vandals and Alans invaded and occupied the west of the peninsula in 411. While the Vandals and Alans moved on to Africa, the Suevi formed an independent kingdom (411–585) and revived paganism and Priscillianism before King Rechiarius (d. 457) became Catholic; but in 465 they adopted Arianism. Paul OROSIUS had to flee Braga, and in 460 HYDATIUS of Chaves was imprisoned. Religious decline was halted by St. MARTIN OF BRAGA, who c. 550 converted the Suevi king to Catholicism and organized the first rural parishes. JOHN OF BICLARO, a native of Scalabis (Santarém) and Apringius of Beja lived in this period, when Braga was extending its influence south at the expense of MÉRIDA. Christian prosperity under the Suevi was threatened by the Arian Visigoths conquest of 585, but continued after the conversion to Catholicism of Visigoth King Reccared in 587. With the establishment of the religious center of Spain in Toledo, Galicia became less prominent in the Christian world, but its bishops and those of Lusitania always attended the councils of TOLEDO. Only in 650, however, did Mérida regain the sees made suffragan to Braga in the previous century. St. FRUCTUOSUS OF BRAGA (d. 665) is famous for his pastoral and monastic activity under Visigothic rule.

Like Spain, Portugal experienced an Arab invasion from 711 to 713. Christians remaining under Muslim rule continued for the most part to practice their religion, yet little is known of the conditions of their life. Many bishops fled to the north, and used the titles of their sees in exile. Reconquest expeditions of the 9th and 10th centuries restored the Sees of Porto, Coimbra, Lamego and Viseu, but until the definite reconquests by the Castilians Ferdinand I (1055–64) and Alfonso VI (1093) life remained precarious. Although Braga was restored in 1070, the bishop of Coimbra administered Lamego and Viseu until the 12th century and Lugo retained the metropolitan rights it obtained during the exile of the bishop of Braga. The success of SANTIAGO DE COMPOSTELA as a pilgrimage center led its bishop to also claim metropolitan rights. Braga's rights to the pallium were thus not restored until 1101.

Saints FROILÁN (d. 905), ATILANUS (d. 916) and Rosendus (d. 977) restored monasteries and reorganized Christian life throughout Galicia. Those cities abandoned in the face of warfare were slowly restored, especially the important economic and political center of Porto, although they continued as traditional ecclesiastical centers. Of more importance, especially north of the Douro, were the monasteries, strong points in the repopulation of the country and in close dependence on the rural nobility. In the 10th century were founded Guimarães, Cete, Vairão, Lorvão, Arouca, Paço de Sousa and Santo Tirso; in the 11th century, Pedroso, Pendorada, Rio Tinto, Vilar de Frades, POMBEIRO, Bostelo and others.

The French Influence: 1080–1185. Christian life changed course c. 1080 and became more vigorous after contact with French monks and knights and with pilgrims returning to the peninsula from abroad. Whereas previously the ideal had been to restore Visigothic tradition and institutions, now many influences from beyond the Pyrenees were incorporated with the support of Bishop Cresconius of Coimbra (d. 1098). Dioceses adopted the Roman liturgy and the organization of archdeaconries; monasteries adopted the Benedictine rule and the customs of CLUNY. In 1095 the county of Porto was granted to Henry of Burgundy, son-in-law of Alfonso VI of Castile. The See of Braga was occupied by St. GERALD (d. 1108), a monk of MOISSAC; the See of Coimbra by Maurice Burdin, from LIMOGES; and the See of Porto by Hugh, probably also a Frenchman. Cluny had three priories: Rates, S. Justa of Coimbra and Vimieiro. The GREGORIAN REFORM came into effect; simony, lay patronage, marriages of kinship and other abuses were suppressed.

Before 1150, however, exempt monasteries were extremely rare.

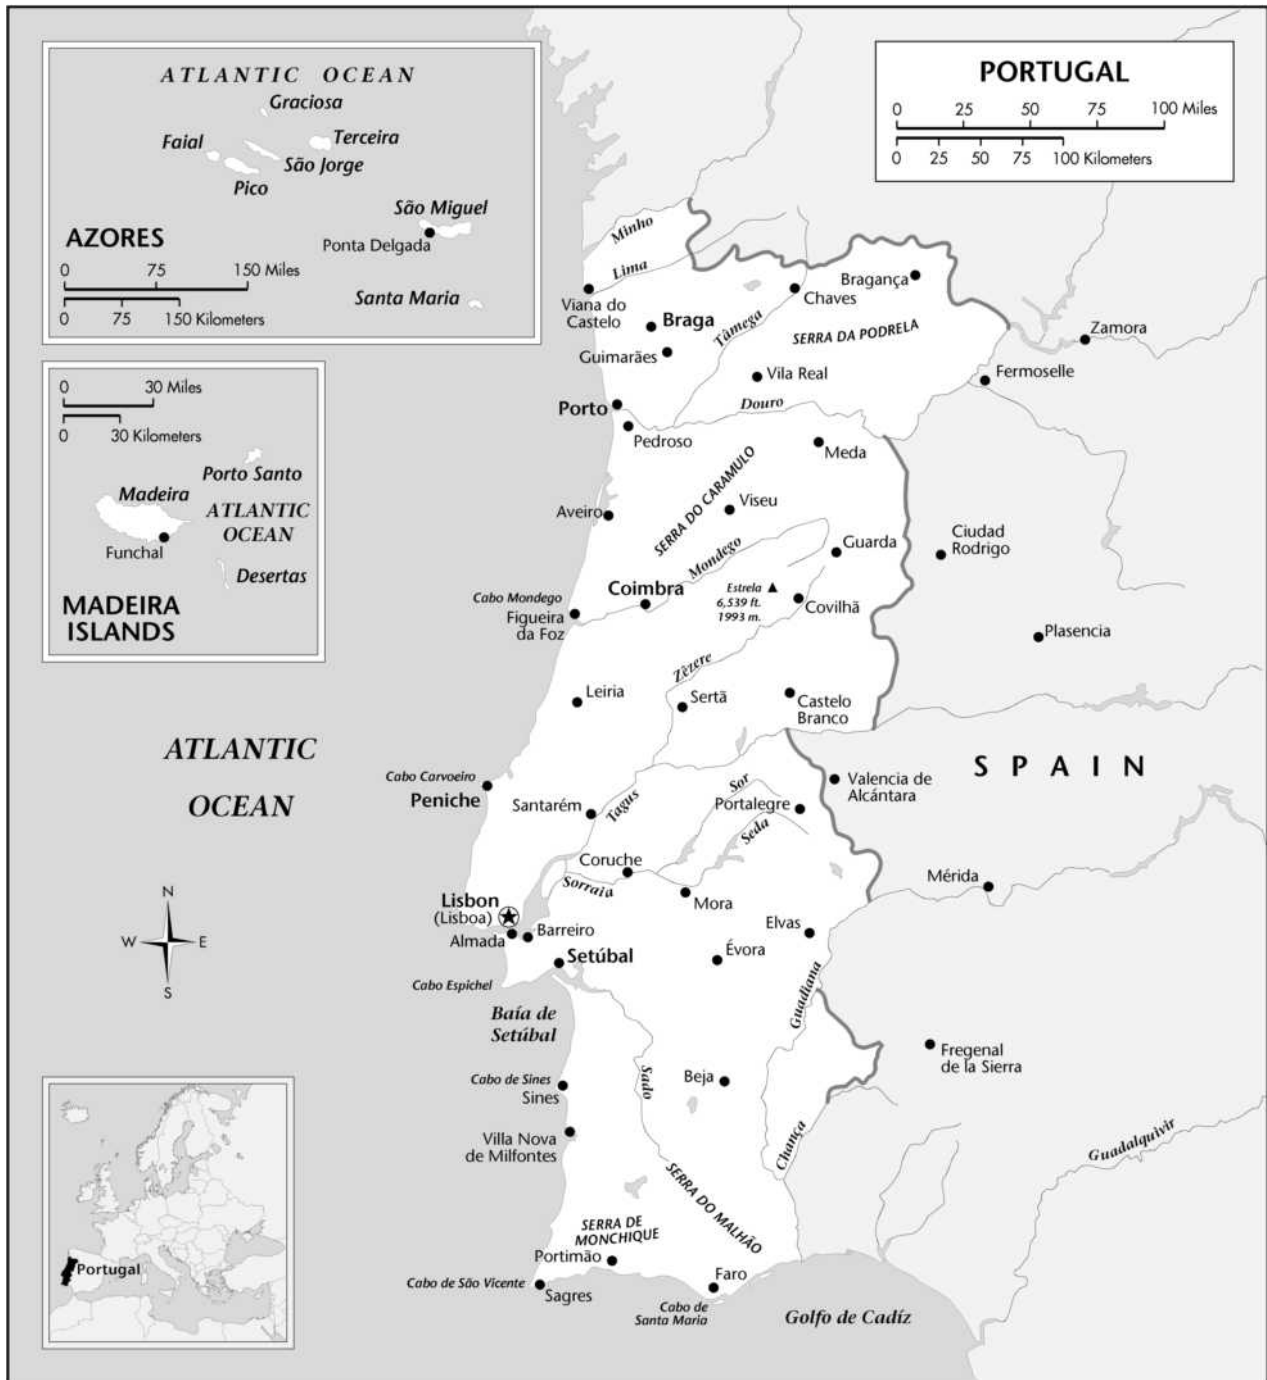

When Alfonso I became king of Portugal in 1139, the prelates supported Portuguese independence from Castile, which was confirmed with the acknowledging of vassalage to the Holy See in 1143. Lisbon was reconquered in 1147 with the help of a Crusader fleet of English, Frisians and Germans, and the see was bestowed on an English crusader. In his domestic policy too, Alfonso relied on close collaboration with the clergy: restoring the Sees of Lisbon, Lamego, Viseu (1147) and Évora (1165), granting charters of immunity to almost all monasteries of any importance, strongly supporting the canonical reform (1131) of Telus and St. THEOTONIUS in SANTA CRUZ of Coimbra, introducing Cistercians in ALCOBAÇA with generous grants (1153), supporting the foundation of a military order in Évora (1164) and making concessions to the Templars in THOMAR (1160). With such royal backing, Cistercians and Augustinians spread widely, Cistercians in Tarouca, Lafões, Salzedas, Sever, Fiães and Aguiar; and Augustinians in Grijó, Moreira, S. Simão da Junqueira, Vilela, Roriz, Cárquere, Refojos de Lima and S. Vincente of Lisbon. The most powerful bishops were those of Braga and Porto, holding exempt lands from 1112 and 1120. The richest Benedictine monasteries had scriptoria to copy manuscripts (almost all lost), but most devoted themselves to a well-organized life of rural work. The MILITARY ORDERS, rich in lands, assured the defense and repopulation of central and south Portugal.

Tension between Church and Throne. The prosperity and influence of the Church in Portugal provoked stronger and stronger reactions from the civil authority, beginning with Sancho I (1185–1211), whose conflicts with Bishops Martin Rodrigues of Porto in 1208 and Peter Soares of Coimbra in 1210 were sporadic and personal. Alfonso II (1211–23) made the conflict a legal one, promulgating laws against the MORTMAIN of ecclesiastical goods and ordering inquiries as to whether or not clerical property had been acquired by usurpation. Jurists at court, such as Gonçalo Mendes and Mestre Vicente, followed the spirit of Roman law and supported royal claims. The failure of Sancho II (1223–45) to suppress disorders led to his deposition by Innocent IV after the Council of LYONS, at the request of the Portuguese bishops. The throne passed to his brother, Alfonso III (1245–70), count of Bologna, who, seeking to increase royal power, ordered new inquiries into ecclesiastical holdings in 1258 and maintained the struggle against the clergy until his death. The tension ended only under Denis (1279–1325), who established a concordat with the clergy in 1282.

Power struggles between the clergy and the crown were not a symptom of crisis; on the contrary, the secular clergy was growing in prestige and number, and gained official recognition of the privileges that gave them their own courts, military exemption, special jurisdiction with regard to wills and tax exemption. Only the first of these privileges was contested with frequency during this time. The new mendicant orders, Franciscans and Dominicans, favored by the royal family and the people, served as mediators in Church-State disputes. The military orders kept their powerful organizations, but after the reconquest of Portugal was completed in 1249, the king regarded them as a standing army to defend the country, and they turned to the cultivation of their extensive farm lands.

The 1282 concordat of Denis with the clergy began for the Church a period of peace and submission to the State. In 1361 King Peter I (1357–67) required that papal bulls be published only with royal approval. During the WESTERN SCHISM King Ferdinand I (1367–83) decided first to support the Roman claimant Urban VI (1378–89), then to observe neutrality (1379), then to follow Clement VII (1380) and finally to recognize Urban again (1381). The bishops were also undecided; some sees had two prelates, one named by Rome and one by Avignon. The Church's political decline showed itself in other ways, and by 1345 the immunity of the powerful bishop of Porto was suppressed. Benedictine, Cistercian and Augustinian monasteries, at odds with the ruling nobility and unable to keep pace with the urbanization of society, suffered in revenue and discipline. Dominicans and Franciscans multiplied, but were divided into conventuals and observants. The military orders organized their possessions into grants, which were distributed to their knights. Many instances of witchcraft and superstition occurred. Bishop ALVARO PELAYO OF SILVES (d. 1352) vehemently denounced the religious deterioration. Despite the decline, King Denis, on the initiative of several abbots and priors, founded in 1290 the University of Lisbon, which moved to COIMBRA in 1308. The military ORDER OF CHRIST was created in 1319 and endowed with the possessions of the Templars.

From Decline to Revival: 1385–1495. The Aviz dynasty (1385–1580) in the person of John I (1385–1433) gained the throne of Portugal as the national hero Nuno Álvares Pereira defeated the Castilian attempt at succession in the battle of Aljubarrota (1385). The ensuing political renaissance was accompanied by a religious resurgence and conflicts between king and clergy arose in 1426, 1436 and 1455. Alfonso V (1438–81) again required royal approval of papal bulls, but King John II's repeal of the order in 1487 showed the strength of the revived Church, a strength that derived from the new spirit characteristic of the expansion overseas after the 1415 conquest of Ceuta. The expeditions sent along the coast of Africa by Prince Henry the Navigator almost always carried Franciscan and Augustinian missionaries who evangelized the natives.

Many events figured in the religious renaissance. A new metropolitan see was created in Lisbon in 1393 with Évora, Lamego, Guarda and Silves as suffragans. Portuguese sees incorporated territory hitherto subject to Spanish bishops. The Order of Christ assumed spiritual jurisdiction for overseas territories in 1456. The Holy See created the Portuguese nunciature and in 1460 gave the king the title "Most Faithful." John Álvares and Gomes Anes of Florença reformed the Benedictines in Paço de Sousa and the Augustinians in Santa Cruz. Hieronymites entered Portugal in 1389; Carmelites, Augustinians and Hermits of Serra de Ossa prospered; and houses of strict observance appeared among Dominicans (1399) and Franciscans (1443). The order of Canons of St. John the Evangelist for charitable work was founded in 1420. Saints flourished: Gonçalo de Lagos (d. 1422), Nuno Álvares Pereira (d. 1431), the Infante Blessed FERDINAND (d. 1443), Princess Blessed JOAN (d. 1490) and Beatrice da Silva (d. 1490) foundress of the Conceptionists. However, by 1450 decline began to spread rapidly, especially in the old monastic orders and the secular clergy, among whom there were several unworthy bishops. The changes in society caused by overseas discoveries were becoming evident.

Ecclesiastical History since 1495

In 1415 Portugal began the conquest of MOROCCO and the exploration and colonization of the west coast of Africa: the Madeira Islands (1418–20), the Azores (c. 1430), the CONGO (1482), and the Cape of Good Hope (1487). In approximately 1497 Vasco da Gama reached India by an all-sea route, and in 1500 Pedro Álvares Cabral reached Brazil. Because of the 1494 Peace of Tordesillas with Spain, Portugal's empire extended from Brazil to the East Indies. A maritime empire was organized with centers in Ormuz, Goa and Singapore that evolved into a royal monopoly of the spice trade. In 1551 the king became grand master of the Order of Christ, which had ecclesiastical jurisdiction of the overseas possessions.

Missionary work was done by several orders. Missions to the Congo began in 1490–91 and had success under the native King Alfonso, whose son Henry was consecrated bishop in 1518; but after Alfonso's death (1543) the activity declined as Portugal directed her efforts to the East. The mission to Mozambique in 1560 had quick and spectacular success but failed almost as quickly and spectacularly, probably due to the opposition of Islam. The mission to Angola in 1560 failed, but another in 1578 succeeded, and in 1596 a bishopric was established at Massangano. An elaborately prepared mission to Christian Ethiopia (1545–56) came to nothing. The weakness of Portuguese missions was that the personnel were too few and far between to deal with continental areas and only a peripheral effort on the coasts could be made. The greatest success came in BRAZIL, where Jesuits expanded rapidly south from Bahia after 1549, and with only 63 missionaries, covered the coast by 1600. Missionaries exercised considerable civil authority in organizing the nomadic natives of Brazil, but their efforts were hindered by the disrupting practice of slavery pursued by Portuguese colonists. Missionary activity in the Portuguese empire declined after 1600; and in the 18th century, when the religious orders were expelled from Portugal, it dwindled further.

The Decline of the State: 1495–1580. The strong reign of Manuel I (1495–1521) was followed by a period of political decline that culminated in 1580 when Spain ended Portuguese independence. The Church then reformed herself for a new period of splendor. Sometimes brutal steps were taken to purify the faith, one of which was the expulsion of thousands of Jews and Muslims in 1496, an action that was motivated by Manuel's desire to marry a Spanish princess (deporting the Jews was a condition of marriage imposed by King Ferdinand and Queen Isabella, who had done the same in Spain four years earlier). Rather than lose a valuable segment of society, Manuel forced many Jews to convert to Christianity, the threat of prison, torture or death at the stake serving as an inducement to many. Other steps to purify the faith included the initiation of the INQUISITION in 1536 by John III (1521–57) and its extension overseas. The Scot George Buchanan, who taught at Coimbra (1547–50), was imprisoned by the Inquisition (1550–52) and Damião de Goes, brought to trial for contact with Luther and Melancthon, was abjured (1572). The Inquisition served mostly to increase royal authority.

More effective in raising the religious level were the Jesuits, established in 1540; the appointment of zealous bishops such as Jerónimo Osório of Silves (d. 1580), Baltasar Limpo of Porto and Braga (d. 1558) and Bartolomeu dos Mártires of Braga (d. 1590); the provincial synods of Lisbon, Braga and Évora (1566–67) to enforce the Council of TRENT; the creation of new dioceses in Leiria, Miranda, Portalegre and Elvas, and the new metropolitanate in Évora; the 18 new dioceses established outside the country, including Funchal (1514), which at first embraced all overseas possessions; the reorganization of the University of Lisbon and the creation of that of Évora in 1559; the building of seminaries in Lisbon and Braga; and the gradual suppression of commendatory abbots in Benedictine, Cistercian and Augustinian monasteries. Such measures as these reinvigorated spiritual and intellectual life. The monastic orders were reformed through the influence of the Hieronymites, Augustinians, Arrábidos and Jesuits. There were saints, such as St. JOHN OF GOD (d. 1550) and the overseas martyrs. In recognition of the missionary endeavor, the Holy See in 1514 granted the king of Portugal the padroado over the metropolitanate and all overseas possessions, a right of patronage that lasted in India until 1950.

The Intellectual Age: The 17th-18th Century Church. After King Sebastian (1557–78) was slain in an attempt to conquer Morocco, the aged and feeble Henry II (1578–80) was unable to prevent the annexation of Portugal by PHILIP II OF SPAIN. John IV (1640–56) restored Portuguese independence, which continued under the Bragança dynasty from 1640 to 1853. This dynasty was characterized by a period of religious stability characterized by a constant defense against heretics and an isolation that slowly drained the practice of the faith of vigor and originality. Several orders entered the country—Hospitallers in 1606, Capuchins in 1647, Theatines in 1650, Discalced Augustinians in 1663 and Apostolic Missionaries in 1679—but their influence was limited, and most attention was devoted to speculative theology, Canon Law, history and to sacred oratory. More serious was the refusal of the Holy See, on the request of Spain, to name bishops to Portuguese dioceses between 1640–70. One bishop served in Portugal and its overseas possessions from 1658 to 1668, and none in 1669. This attitude of Rome promoted a tendency to regalism. Only Oratorians (1659) were important, because of their educational work; their college in Lisbon (1750) became famous for studies in natural science and philosophy.

King John V (1706–50), titled “Most Faithful” by the Holy See in 1748, began a policy of regalism with Church support. In return for aiding Pope Clement XI against the Turks he received extraordinary powers for the archbishop of Lisbon (made a patriarch in 1716). While also presenting the pope with lavish gifts and constructing impressive monasteries at Mafra and Vila do Conde, John broke relations with Rome from 1728–31 and in 1728 made royal approval of papal acts necessary in Portugal.

John’s successor, Joseph I (1750–77), influenced by the ENLIGHTENMENT and by his minister the Marques de POMBAL, pushed regalism further. He expelled the Jesuits from Portugal and its vast colonial holdings, closed the University of Évora (1759), severed relations with Rome (1760–69), promulgated decrees against the Oratorians, turned the Inquisition into a royal tribunal, suppressed several Augustinian monasteries, secularized education (1772), favored the spread of GALLICANISM and JANSENISM, and interfered in a number of religious congregations on the pretext of investigating the Jacobean and Sigilista fanatical movements. Inevitably Christian life declined. The religious orders that entered Portugal—Camillians, Vincentians, Minims and Ursulines—were unable to turn the tide, and the traditionalist movement that followed the fall of Pombal had no lasting results.

The invasion by the French from 1807–11 ended the spread of revolutionary ideas in Portugal. The monarchy fled to Brazil from 1807 to 1820 until that region gained independence in 1822. Meanwhile, the revolution of 1820 in Portugal installed a liberal regime and suppressed clerical privileges, which the traditionalist and absolutist government of Michael I (1828–34) did not restore. In the struggle between liberals and absolutists the clergy were divided. In 1834 liberalism suppressed male religious orders and closed women’s novitiates, expelled the papal nuncio and regarded as invalid the nominations of bishops by Michael I. Relations with Rome were restored in 1841, but property that had been confiscated was not restored to the Church. Gradually religious returned, but their presence was barely tolerated in an atmosphere wherein the Church was without prestige or social influence. Instead, it was subjected to constant attacks by the intelligentsia, ridiculed in the press and restricted in its activity by some public officials (see ANTICLERICALISM). The number of dioceses in Portugal was reduced in 1881, and apostolic life was evidenced only by the foundation of the National Center in 1874 and the Academic Center of Christian Democracy (CADC) in 1903; by the holding of several congresses; and by the beginning of a Catholic daily newspaper, A Palavra, in 1872.

The Modern Church

Following the assassination of King Charles I in 1890, the republican revolution of 1910 expelled the papal nuncio, confiscated seminaries and episcopal residences, dispersed religious, forbade processions and the wearing of clerical garb, appointed lay committees to regulate church services, and tried, imprisoned and exiled priests and bishops. However, instead of destroying Christian life, it generated a reaction. The episcopacy united. New associations appeared, such as the Catholic Union (1913). In Coimbra an elite group of Catholic intellectuals formed, among them António de Oliveira Salazar, then a professor of economics at the University of Coimbra. In 1917 a military coup installed Sidonio Pais, who restored relations with the Holy See in 1918 and ended the harassment of the Church. The military coup of 1926 that brought Salazar to power six years later stabilized politics and finances and inaugurated a period of cooperation with the Church, during which the State gave special protection to missionary congregations. The concordat confirmed this cooperation with the Holy See in 1940, that among other things, permitted the government to veto the appointment of bishops nominated by the Church, upheld the denial of divorce in cases of Catholic marriage, provided that morality be taught in schools and gave the Church responsibility for religious education in public schools.

Salazar and the New State. While the “New State” introduced in 1933 by Prime Minister Salazar represented a welcome reaction against the anti-clericalism of the Republic of 1910–26, there remained some dissatisfaction among a minority of Catholics with the social and political shortcomings of the regime. The Portuguese hierarchy, led until 1971 by Manuel Gonçalves Cardinal Cerejeira, a student friend of Salazar, generally shared the government’s vision of an orderly and stable regime well disposed toward the Church, whose social principles it claimed to follow, with overseas territories constitutionally incorporated into the state in 1951. Cerejeira naturally defended the Church’s interests but usually accepted the regime’s version of events. Opposed to totalitarianism, a category from which he excluded the “New State,” he warned his flock against collaboration with communists.

One episcopal exception to the general harmony was António Ferreira Gomes, bishop of Oporto, who in 1958 sent Salazar a letter, which became public knowledge, in which he advocated political pluralism and criticized the regime’s social and labor policies. A year later, after Catholic activists in Lisbon had been arrested for conspiring to overthrow the regime, the bishop was refused entry when returning from Rome, being allowed back only in 1969 by Marcello Caetano, who succeeded Salazar as premier (1968–74). Other critics included Sebastião Soares de Resende, bishop of Beira in Mozambique, who clashed with the secular authorities over publication of his defense of human rights in that territory in 1965, and Manuel Vieira Pinto, bishop of Nampula (Mozambique), who was removed from his diocese in 1974 by Caetano’s administration for criticism of colonial policies and opposing the expulsion of priests denouncing atrocities committed by Portuguese forces.

Church-state relations were also troubled by Pope Paul VI’s visit to the Bombay Eucharistic Congress in 1964. Portugal’s foreign minister called it a gratuitous insult, for by visiting India the pope was seen as condoning that country’s forcible incorporation of Portugal’s Indian territories (chiefly Goa) in 1961. The censorship of the visit in the Portuguese media led to the removal from state radio of António Ribeiro for opposing the government’s line. The state then objected to Ribeiro’s appointment to the see of Beira in 1967, the only known instance of a state veto under the terms of the Concordat of 1940. Ribeiro succeeded Cerejeira as patriarch of Lisbon in 1971 and was named a cardinal by Paul VI in 1973.

Effects of Vatican II. Forty-nine Portuguese bishops attended the Second Vatican Council in 1962–65. In the short term, the Council resulted in Mass in Portuguese, and the bishops formally acknowledged the Council’s decrees, decisions and declarations. The majority of the Portuguese clergy and laity, however, were unenthusiastic about change, and debate was confined to members of the clergy and the (generally urban) lay elite. Differences of opinion on implementation of conciliar recommendations often overlapped with the widening divisions of opinion in Catholic circles from 1958 regarding the authoritarian practices of the “New State” regime and the colonial wars of 1961–74. Although the majority of the laity, like the older bishops and clergy, generally remained conservative in attitude, the application of Vatican II’s recommendations made gradual but steady progress after the revolutionary disorientation of the mid-1970s.

The influence of Vatican II eventually found its way into a number of state-funded organizations. One success was the foundation of the Portuguese Catholic University in Braga. It achieved juridical recognition in 1971 and by 1988 had 6,000 students in Faculties of Theology, Philosophy and Human Sciences in Lisbon, Braga, Oporto and Viseu. Prominent charitable institutions include diocesan Caritas Portuguesa and the Santas Casas da Misericórdia. Over 380 of these traditional welfare institutions, running hospitals, hospices, orphanages, homes for the elderly and disabled, and canteens, often with state support, were reorganized in 1976 into the Union of Portuguese Misericórdias. The Lisbon Misericórdia, under the Franciscan Vítor Melícias, funded by the state, was responsible for most welfare services in the capital. The Union of Private Institutions of Social Solidarity that oversaw social centers, youth clubs and crèches were also state supported.

A Radicalized Clergy. By 1974 Portugal contained a minority of activist clergy and lay persons among such groups as Portuguese Catholic Action, Catholic Workers' Youth, Catholic Workers' League, and in the male and female Catholic University Youth, caught up in campus protests. Battles for independence in Portugal's many colonies waged, sparking differences of opinion regarding many aspects of government and society. The relaxation of authoritarianism during Caetano's regime highlighted the increased diversity of Catholic opinion. In the elections of 1969 prominent Catholic laymen ran as candidates for the state's National Union as independents, as monarchists and in alliance with communists. After a military coup and the granting of independence to all of Portugal's African colonies in 1975, the minority of progressive Catholics channeled their energies into leftist parties, notably the Portuguese Democratic Movement (PSD) and Socialist Left Movement. Free Assemblies of Christians and radicalized priests called for the resignation of some or all of their "collaborationist" bishops. The bishops responded by exhorting Catholics to aid in building a pluralist system based on the Christian conception of democracy. Marxism was condemned, as was extreme capitalist individualism, but moderate socialism was specifically deemed within the parameters of political acceptability.

Constitutional Democracy Forms. As Portugal struggled through several years of political unrest, the revision of the concordat of 1940 was agreed by negotiation with the Holy See. The 1971 Law on Religious Freedom granted the Church favored status through tax exemptions and control over the naming of chaplains. Divorce was legalized for Catholic spouses. In 1975 the episcopacy expressed its growing concern over the nationalization of charitable institutions and the occupations of Catholic educational establishments and highlighted the need for freedom of education.

Following the election of President Antonio Eanes in 1976, a new constitution was promulgated that specified freedom of religion and freedom of education. A 1979 law ensured parity of treatment for Catholic schools. The bishops continued to condemn Communism and pure economic liberalism. The PSD, which governed either in coalition or alone from 1980, upheld "Religion and Morality" classes in the school curriculum, supported the Catholic University, subsidized the building of Braganza cathedral, allowed the clergy tax exemptions and awarded a television channel to a church consortium. The most serious clash between church and state occurred over abortion. A draft law for its decriminalization proposed in 1982 was denounced as immoral by the episcopacy. Despite Catholic street demonstrations, a law permitting certain abortions in cases of rape, when the mother's health was endangered or when the fetus was deformed, was passed in 1984. Legislation to legalize abortion was reintroduced in 1997 but was defeated by a single vote.

During the last decades of the 20th century Portuguese bishops voiced continuing concern over abortion, Catholic schooling, family life and values, housing, health care, the renewal of the Church, the role of the laity, the Church's cultural and historical patrimony, the problems of immigrants and the unemployed, corruption and social degradation, immorality, environmental conservation, the campaign against AIDS and such international issues as human rights in the former Portuguese colony of East Timor, China and elsewhere. Throughout the 1990s Manuel da Silva Martins, bishop of Setúbal, was a leading critic of social injustice and poverty.

A major obstacle to the fulfillment of the Church's mission continued to be a shortage of clergy. While the north and the Atlantic islands were relatively well provided with priests, numbers were lacking in the south. Vocations, never plentiful in Portugal, fell off dramatically in the 1960s and 1970s. By the early 1990s two-thirds of the clergy were over 56 and nearly a quarter over 70 years of age.

Despite the shortage felt among the clergy, popular religiosity continued to be impressively seen in the continuing pilgrimages of hundreds of thousands of Portuguese to FÁTIMA on May 13, the date of the first apparition of the Virgin before three children in 1917. Crediting the lady with saving his life during an assassination attempt on her feast day, Pope John Paul II paid three visits to Fátima. During the first, in 1982, he was assailed by the Spanish priest Juan Fernández Krohn, but visits in 1991 and 2000 were peaceful. Popular religiosity also survived in other pilgrimages, in traditional festivals such as those of St. Antony in Lisbon and St. John in Oporto and Braga, in veneration of local saints and village festivals and in romarias (often noisy outings to destinations of religious significance).

Into the 21st Century. By 2000 there were 4,359 parishes tended by 3,273 diocesan and 976 religious priests. Other religious included approximately 345 brothers and 7,000 sisters, many of whom attended to the operation of Portugal's primary and secondary Catholic schools. By 2000 the socialist government was attempting to diminish the privileged status of the Church through a bill that would fund religious education through the voluntary allocation of money from taxpayers rather than through a state payment. Discussion was also underway regarding renegotiation of the Concordat of 1940 with the Vatican.

Issues of continued concern to the Church into the next millennium included the migration from countryside to city, the changing role of women in society and the increased influence of the mass media on culture. In addition, the increased prosperity and the quest for upward social mobility continued to exacerbate materialism, individualism and hedonism, which Church leaders saw as corrosive to traditional and family values.

POSADA Y GARDÜNO, MANUEL

Thirty-second archbishop of Mexico; b. San Felipe del Obraje, Mexico, Sept. 27, 1780; d. April 30, 1846. In 1818 he was appointed curate of the Sagrario in Puebla, later becoming vicar-general and diocesan administrator. In Mexico City in 1824 as senator from Puebla, he was named curate of the Sagrario and later doctoral canon there. When FONTE was forced to resign the See of Mexico, Pope Gregory XVI proclaimed Posada archbishop in December 1839, and he was consecrated in Mexico City on May 31, 1840. Posada actively defended the rights and privileges of the clergy. In 1823 he vigorously rejected an attempt by the military governor of Puebla to silence him, and in the following year he successfully stood as a candidate for the senate. Because of his staunch clericalism, Posada was forced to spend a year in exile in the United States by the liberal and anticlerical Gómez Farías government in 1833 and 1834. His reign as archbishop proved somewhat anticlimactic. His participation and influence in Mexican politics were minimal and even in ecclesiastical matters he accomplished little of significance. He established Forty Hours devotions, introduced some modest reforms in the seminaries, and secularized a few mission churches.

POSADAS

A manifestation of popular piety in Mexican and Mexican-American communities in the U.S., celebrated between December 16 and Christmas Eve, Las Posadas comprise a festive procession whereby participants go from home to home singing carols, reenacting the journey of Mary and Joseph in search for lodging (posada). Participants play the various roles of Joseph and Mary, innkeepers, choir, and onlookers. At the first two homes, the participants are rejected, but at the third home, they enter and the fiesta of welcome begins. At the final house, the choir sings the same song of petition, but this time the innkeepers welcome them singing an additional verse of welcome. Each evening ends in a celebration, the final night usually a large fiesta hosted at the local parish church. The celebration generally consists of prayers and singing with refreshments of hot chocolate and sweet bread (pan dulce) for everyone. Blindedfolded children also attempt to hit a suspended, paper maché piñata, usually in the form of a star or animal and filled with candies that are released when the piñata breaks.

One tradition attributes the origins of Las Posadas to Spaniard Brother Pedro de San José Bentacur, a Third-Order Franciscan who settled in Guatemala. Historically, Spanish missionaries used Las Posadas as a catechetical device for explaining the Christmas story to the indigenous people. Among Mexican-American communities, the celebration of Las Posadas reminds immigrant families of their own journeys and experiences of rejection and welcome.

POSITIVISM

A name given to a doctrine taught in the 19th century by A. COMTE or to any one of a set of general philosophical views, of which Comte's is but one exemplar, that tend to limit human knowledge to what can be established by the methods of "science." For the most important 20th-century version of positivism, see LOGICAL POSITIVISM; few contemporary philosophers, however, call themselves "positivists": they prefer the name "logical empiricists," mainly in order to suggest their opposition to the narrow verificationism of the Vienna Circle. In what follows, consideration is given to the background of Comte's doctrine; then those elements of Comte's doctrine that continue to have importance are discussed, some later developments are reviewed, and finally a brief evaluation is made.

Historical Background. The history of positivistic views extends over the 3½ centuries of the modern period, in which the progressive expansion of modern science has taken place. What struck many thinkers, perhaps most notably I. KANT, was the contrast between the status of science and that of philosophy: progress in the former, stagnation and deadlock in the latter. A necessary condition of growth in established knowledge appeared to them to be the application of the techniques of science to the still backward areas of human thought; and philosophy itself was increasingly considered to be no longer the handmaid of theology, but rather the handmaid of science. Resistance from the "metaphysicians" who, the positivists said, claimed to have information about what lies beyond EXPERIENCE, aroused a progressively strong antimetaphysical reaction, a scornful and dogmatic reaction that reached its full strength in the late 19th and early 20th centuries. Anti-metaphysical bias tends to be the most striking property separating those in the positivist tradition from others who give full credit to the achievements of science.

Forerunners. It is impossible to do justice in a few words to the forerunners of 19th-century positivism, for given the fact that positivism can be seen as a variety of EMPIRICISM (which, as opposed to RATIONALISM or its variant, IDEALISM, emphasizes the role of experience and minimizes the role of reason), any of those who contributed to the development of empiricism can be considered as having contributed to the development of positivism. And if one speaks, rather vaguely, of "positivistically inclined thinkers" or of positivism as a "temper of mind," one might range all the way from the SOPHISTS of the Greek Enlightenment through the philosophes of 18th-century France to the American pragmatists of the early 20th century—and even include, along the way, men such as DUNS SCOTUS, who is called a "moral positivist" because of his teaching that a thing is good (or bad) simply because God wills it to be good (or bad). Nevertheless it seems fairly clear that full-blown positivism had its day in the 19th century when the distinctive intellectual influence in the modern world, the natural sciences, had reached the high tide of their domination of the philosophical world.

As contributing to the development of 19th-century positivism, one might first mention Francis BACON, the "trumpeter" of the new sciences detached from philosophy in the 16th and 17th centuries. Bacon characterized past philosophy as mere childish prattling and expressed his utter confidence in the brilliant future of the natural sciences and of humanity under their guidance. (In his New Atlantis he gives a vivid picture of a mankind served and guided no longer by traditional aristocracies but by the new aristocracy of science.) Another important precursor of Comte in the field of social and legal philosophy was Thomas HOBBS, whose opposition to traditional "natural-law" positions clearly puts him in the ranks of the major forerunners of self-conscious positivists.

Major Influences. Certainly, however, the two major influences on Comte and other early positivists are those of D. HUME and Kant. The very notion of science as the study of the invariable relations of coexistence and succession observed to hold between elements of experience, the notion of scientific knowledge as relative and tentative, the notion of unknown and unknowable NOUMENA, the notion of metaphysics as a surrogate of science that offers a total (but false because characterized by a sort of mathematical necessity) explanation of the universe, the suggestion that perhaps the methods of science might be adapted to the solution of philosophical problems—all these themes had Humean or Kantian sources.

The most immediate and direct influences on Comte were those of J. d' Alembert, J. L. Lagrange (who first stated the principles of mechanics without any reference to ultimate cause or hidden forces, merely describing the laws by which phenomena were connected), CONDORCET, Turgot, and, most important of all, SAINT-SIMON, whom Comte served as secretary.

Comte's Doctrines. The most influential doctrines of Comte were three: the "Law of Three States," the hierarchy of sciences, and his notion of sociology and the social sciences.

Three States. According to Comte, the structure of the human mind is such that all thought has followed a law of progress, the Law of Three States. There is first a primitive stage in which explanations of puzzling phenomena are theological, changes being attributed to the will of the gods, conceived of as very powerful human beings. The intermediate stage is that in which metaphysical explanations predominate, when forces or powers having abstract names take the place of superhuman agents. The third and final stage is that in which not explanation but pure description of phenomena takes the place of discarded powers or agents. Thus, for example, gravitation was first explained theologically as effected by divine beings attracting or repelling one another from their seats in the stars or planets; later, gravitation was explained anthropomorphically as a force or a power assumed to cause the movement of bodies; and only in the positive stage was a mathematical equation given that describes "how" but not "why" movement occurs. The positive method is well summarized by J. S. MILL: "We have no knowledge of anything but phenomena; and our knowledge of phenomena is relative, not absolute. We know not the essence nor the real mode of production of any fact, but only its relations of other facts in the way of succession and similitude. These relations are constant, i.e., always the same in the same circumstances. The constant resemblances which link phenomena together, and the constant sequences which unite them as antecedent and consequent, are termed their laws. All phenomena without exception are governed by invariable laws, with which no volitions, either natural or supernatural, interfere. The essential nature of phenomena and their ultimate causes, whether efficient or final, are unknown and inscrutable to us" (A System of Logic, bk. 2). One might note that there was a general consensus in the 19th century, shared, as Émile Meyerson (an important critic of positivist anti-ontologism) has shown, even by G. W. F. HEGEL, that empirical science must be purely descriptive, confined to establishing the regularities of observed phenomena; Hegel did not, of course, like Comte, deny value to explanation, for his idealistic philosophy of nature provided the grounds of all explanation.

Hierarchy of Sciences. A second key Comtean doctrine was his conception of the "positive hierarchy" of the sciences. The fundamental sciences were said to fall into a logical order (one depends on another for certain of its principles), a single linear order of decreasing generality and increasing complexity; and this is also the historical order in which they developed: mathematics, physics, chemistry, biology—and finally, with Comte's own work, sociology. Psychology, that "last transformation of theology," was denied a special role in his hierarchy because Comte denied the possibility of knowledge through INTROSPECTION (it is impossible to observe one's own mental processes without at the same time destroying them). In the positive stage one will limit himself to a consideration of the organic conditions on which various psychic functions depend: as A. Bain put it, "psychologus nemo nisi physiologicus." The International Encyclopedia of Unified Science (Chicago 1938–) is a contemporary answer to Comte's demand for a coherent synthesis of all science.

Sociology. The third important area of Comte's significance and influence is that of the social sciences or of sociology. Comte thought of himself as first and foremost a social reformer. He believed that satisfactory social organization could be achieved only after the spiritual foundation—the reorganization of all knowledge along "positive" lines—had been laid: institutions rest on morals, morals on beliefs; and once a stable and unified body of beliefs is available, social beatitude is possible. Of course, implied in Comte's notion of the hierarchy of science is the basing of social science on physical science, thus making it possible to treat social phenomena in purely physical, nonanthropomorphic language. A leading idea of positivist sociology was first given expression by Condorcet when he wrote that to an observer from another planet, physical and social phenomena would appear in the same light, "a stranger to our race, he would study human society as we study those of the beavers and bees."

Though an archenemy of anthropomorphism and the "empathetic fallacy," Comte nevertheless thought of sociology as the study of the evolution of mankind as a sort of collective organism ("the whole of the object is here certainly much better known and more immediately accessible than the constituent parts”), conceiving of humanity as a “social being,” a kind of superperson. Comte and his followers thus committed what A. N. Whitehead has named “the fallacy of misplaced concreteness.” Such notions are quite consistent with the historicist orientation of 19th-century Continental social thought, an orientation best known today in the works of K. MARX and F. ENGELS.

The positivist view of society as organismic—humanity alone is real and the individual only an abstraction—clearly has the effect of suppressing or obliterating the freedom of the individual subject to it and of sanctioning a “scientific” despotism; J. S. Mill described the resulting system as “liberticide” and as “the completest system of spiritual and temporal despotism which ever yet emanated from the human brain, unless possibly that of Ignatius Loyola.” (Like his early mentor, Saint-Simon, Comte also founded a “religion” of veneration and cult of “the Great Being: Humanity,” well-described by T. H. Huxley in his epigram “Catholicism without Christianity.”)

It is especially in treating social phenomena that Comte’s practical bent most clearly shines through: “I have a supreme aversion to scientific labors whose utility, direct or remote, I do not see.” For him as for so many of the 19th-century positivists, science is the handmaid of humanity (though few went quite so far as Comte in considering sidereal astronomy—by contrast with the study of the solar system, in which man lives—a “grave scientific aberration” serving only to satisfy vain curiosity). For Comte and many later positivists, knowing is for the sake of foreseeing and then controlling: voir pour prévoir, prévoir pour prévenir, prévenir pour pouvoir.

Later Developments. Comte’s influence on the later history of positivism was achieved in great part through his influence on Mill and a few other leading English thinkers. (The sixth book of Mill’s Logic, which deals with the methodology of the moral sciences, is little more than an exposition of Comtean doctrine.) The writings and translations of George Lewes, Harriet Martineau, and George Eliot were important in making Comte known in Germany, where L. FEUERBACH became known as the founder of German positivism. Herbert SPENCER, though severely critical of Comte, attempted a not dissimilar task in attempting to formulate a law of progress and the development of a unified “synthetic” philosophy of science.

In sociology, Émile DURKHEIM was Comte’s principal disciple and, though divesting sociology of Comte’s religious and politically reactionary elements, continued to emphasize the group mind as the point of reference for all human knowledge. In legal philosophy, positivism confines itself to positive law (laws actually valid at a certain time in a certain place) and strongly opposes any “higher” law. The Allgemeine Rechtslehre in Germany, analytical jurisprudence in England, H. Kelsen’s “pure theory of law” (which leaves no place for an ideal of justice), and American “legal realism,” though poles apart in some respects, are united in their common aversion to metaphysical theories in general and natural-law theories in particular, and so are generally known as types of legal positivism. (Legal positivism today is, however, under something of a cloud because of the ease with which a form of positivism facilitated Hitler’s subversion of German law.) See POSITIVISM IN JURISPRUDENCE.

An important contribution to the development of contemporary philosophy was made by the left-wing positivists, the late 19th- and early 20th-century scientist-philosophers G. R. Kirchhoff (1824–87), E. Mach, W. K. Clifford (1845–79), and K. Pearson (1857–1936), all of whom had a phobia of the invisible and intangible and the thrust of whose thought led, not to an acceptance of the “law of three states” but to the discarding of all statements that cannot be reduced to perceptual data. The right-wing idealist, quasi-Kantian branch of positivism flowered but briefly in the writings of F. A. Lange (1828–75) and Hans Vaihinger (1852–1933), who believed that metaphysics is arrant nonsense considered as anything but poetry, though as poetry it may have a certain beauty.

Evaluation. It is clear, as H. Feigl has remarked, that the issues that divided G. BERKELEY and Locke, Hume and Kant, Mach and H. von Helmholtz, phenomenologists, neorealists and critical realists, cannot be solved by positivistic fiat. Second, the positivist, like all other antimetaphysicians (with the possible exception of the early Greek skeptics) is, as F. H. BRADLEY has remarked, a “brother metaphysician with a rival theory of first principles.” The assumption is made that there are facts, each distinct from every other, that man can observe and then correlate; but when an attempt is made to say what “facts” are, various positivists give as widely differing answers (Bacon’s “simple natures,” Hume’s “impressions,” Comte’s “special or general facts”) as do self-confessed metaphysicians. Third, though positivism may well have served as a useful reminder against the dangers of a priori speculation and formed a useful counterbalance to the yeasty absolutisms of idealist metaphysics, its attempt to show, for example, that FINAL CAUSALITY has no valid use or meaning because it has no place in mechanics or in an intellectual system based on mechanics is an unwarranted limitation on the range of human experience. Finally, even in their chosen field of scientific METHODOLOGY, the 19th-century positivists misconceived the role of hypothesis as a function of science (taking the relation between hypothesis and confirming evidence to be purely logical or analytic) and found no place for what science has no way of directly testing. This led them to condemn as meaningless many propositions later accepted as scientific truth, such as propositions about the chemical structure of the stars.

Perhaps one might accept the analogy of R. W. Sellars as a benign expression of the general impact of early positivism; this, he suggests, "might be compared to the action of a firm of scientific accountants going over the books of that ancient firm called philosophy. It has been a healthy thing for philosophy; and it may be that the accountants have also learned something."

POSITIVISM IN JURISPRUDENCE

The term "jurisprudence" refers here to exercise of private and public decision-making functions involved in administration of the system of law of a particular political society, performance of functions related to making these decisions, scholarly critiques of these actions, and the knowledge and skill out of which these actions proceed. This is the classical notion of jurisprudence. The same term refers also to scholarly studies that principally concern the general nature of law, legal institutions, and legal processes in the application of law. Jurisprudence in both instances is a knowledge of law. In the first sense it is a working knowledge of a particular system of law. In the second sense it is a theoretical knowledge of law.

Scholars engaged in jurisprudence in the second sense are generally known in Anglo-American legal circles as jurists. The position of positivist jurists, whatever else it may include, may be described as minimally involving the assertion that in defining the nature of law of a political society the proper object is to separate the law as it is from the law as it ought to be, or to separate law from morality. Since in Western thinking positivism in the broad sense is much more extensive than the position of separating law from morality, it would be well to characterize the latter as "legal positivism." Some current discussions have attempted to distinguish legal positivism from a study called analytical jurisprudence. The latter has been asserted to be a neutralistic study of the meanings and usages of terms belonging to law and the relations of these terms to each other and to nonlegal language. The two concepts and studies that they are asserted to represent may be distinguished; however, the leading positivist jurists, in elaborating their positions, either have not attempted or have not succeeded in the attempt to separate their analytical jurisprudence from their legal positivism.

Finally, although positivism in jurisprudence originated as a theory about the nature of law obtaining in political societies generally, and indeed is even called by its principal Continental exponent a "pure" theory of law, it is far from being a neutral theory free of practical implications for those engaged in jurisprudence in the primary sense. It is in fact inseparable from and probably is better described as a general theory concerning the proper interpretation of law of political societies. Positivism in jurisprudence was unquestionably intended by its proponents to have, and in fact has had, a profound impact on the practical jurisprudence of modern political societies. The jurist, as H. Kelsen has put it, approaches the study of law as a law teacher, a law student, or a lawyer who seeks to determine what the law is. He does not concern himself with the specific meaning of particular legal rules of a given political society, but with a general theory of legal interpretation applicable to the legal system of any political society.

Principal Interpretations. Positivist jurists have focused principally upon two problems of legal interpretation: the identification of law and the general method of expounding the meaning of what has been identified as law.

Identification of Law. In attempting to identify law, positivists have proceeded from at least two different vantage points. One of these is represented by the work of John Austin, the English jurist, and the other by the work of Hans Kelsen, his Continental counterpart. Austin, a utilitarian, doubted whether even judges could engage in rational discourse concerning problems of justice presented in the administration of positive law, and whether they could agree on guidelines to be used or results to be reached in decisions resolving these problems. He expressed some hope for future generations in this respect as mankind progressed in knowledge of moral principles. Nevertheless, he developed his theory of law in light of his judgment that for the foreseeable future it would be impossible to obtain certain desirable goals of political society and at the same time admit into a working concept of positive law a working concept of justice. If one was to promote through a working concept of law the goals of societal stability, certainty in identification and elaboration of law, and ready obedience to law, one must necessarily exclude from that concept the uncertainty and imperfection inherent in human judgment about problems of justice.

Kelsen reached the same result because of his denial of the possibility of rational judgments about justice. He viewed a judgment about justice as a judgment of value always determined by emotional factors, subjective in character, and valid only for the judging subject. For this reason, jurisprudence as a scientific discipline whose aim is cognition of law must exclude from the domain of positive law the problem of the justice of law. Although it is certainly desirable, from this point of view, that the law of political societies will, when created, be considered generally to be just, administration of law is not a quest for justice but for cognition of legal norms.

Thus, for Austin and Kelsen, although for different reasons, the identification of law became a total separation of law from the morally just. They identified as law a working concept that might or might not in fact coincide with true moral justice (Austin) or with a subjective and merely emotional view of what is moral justice (Kelsen). As positivist jurists are fond of saying, "Laws, however morally iniquitous, would still be laws." In his effort to separate law from morality Austin sought to treat as law only those rules he could comprehend within the concept of a command. For Austin, a command involved the power to inflict an evil upon the person directed to do something if he failed to comply. All that could not be fitted within this mold was rejected as not being law. Similarly, Kelsen sought to embrace all law by the concept of a social order based upon directives to officials to apply coercive measures to persons engaging in specified conduct when these directives were issued in accordance with a basic norm.

H. L. A. Hart, in the mid-20th century, rejected the command theory of law as "threadbare" and the directives-to-officials theory as a dogmatic suppression of other aspects of law. To secure a more adequate separation of law from morality, Hart proposed both an ultimate "secondary rule of recognition" whose function is to provide merely procedural criteria by which may be determined the validity of "primary rules of conduct" in the legal system and certain less ultimate secondary rules that govern both the application and modification of the primary rules.

Expounding the Meaning of Law. In constructing a theory for expounding the meaning of such law, positivist jurists have excluded the concept of justice from the theory either totally or in large part. Kelsen, for example, employed the concept of an "objective meaning" of law, essential to the very possibility of a science of law. This concept implied techniques for determining the meaning of legal rules that focus primarily upon the words through which they are expressed. On the other hand, in order to preserve the unity and meaningfulness of an entire legal system, he incorporated a number of principles of interpretation designed for resolving logical contradictions in that system. For example, in order to deal with rules that in the light of their "objective meanings" contradicted previously formulated rules, he included within his general theory the principle lex posterior derogat priori.

Austin was far more definitive in elaborating a general theory relative to expounding the meaning of legal rules, particularly when statutory in form. His most characteristic statement concerning statutes is that "the law is one thing, the reason [for the law] another. . . ." This bears a marked resemblance to his position that the existence of a law is one thing, whereas its merit or demerit is another. The expressions of statutory law, according to Austin, are to be viewed as having an objective meaning to be drawn from the provisions themselves and not from other indicia of meaning. Only if these provisions are ambiguous may the ratio legis and the history of the statute be considered. A fortiori, the judge must disregard considerations of justice that might move him to assign a meaning at variance with the objective meaning of the law. Moreover, Austin conceived of statutory law as precluding a judge from administering it except through the vehicle of the precise rules through which it was expressed, although he perceived an underlying principle that would logically indicate the propriety of other applications than the one expressed in the statute. Otherwise, the judge might engage in spurious interpretation, a process Austin condemned as subjecting administration of statutory law to the arbitrary disposition of tribunals. Although Austin recognized that traditional law was frequently administered in new ways by judges resorting to principles underlying specific rules for deciding cases, he strongly favored each political society's rejecting this form of law in favor of a statutory code of law wherever possible. He believed his general theory of interpretation as applied to statutory law would make possible a much greater measure of certainty in law administration. However, he and his followers conceded the necessity of judges making new law both in the traditional and statutory areas. But while deeming this necessity an ungovernable area of discretion except through precise legislation, they have not explored or elaborated an interpretative theory to provide for it.

Criticism. Four central criticisms of legal positivism have been made. They are objections to the positivistic interpretation given to legal process, identification of law, and law administration, and a warning that certain societal harms may arise from positivistic assumptions.

Legal Process. The first criticism asserts that the theory, in whatever form it has been stated, fails to reflect the reality of legal process, whether in identifying law or in elaborating and applying its meaning. In turning their attention away from the content of law by their mode of theorizing, legal positivists have necessarily had to turn away from the legal process by which that content is developed and modified in the course of time. This process throughout its extent is affected in fact by considerations of justice, conceptions of the purpose of law and political society, and a consensus concerning the modes and techniques of authority. The disregard for legal process by legal positivists indicates that their view is not realistic, however pure or analytical it may be. In prescinding to a greater or lesser extent from the content and processes of law, this theory deforms its object and, consequently, prevents its proponents and users from attaining the principal objective of the theory, which is the cognition of law that serves as part of a developing legal system.

Identification of Law. A second criticism of legal positivism is that its proponents misconceive what the problem of identifying or defining law really involves. In elaborating this criticism, L. L. Fuller has remarked that law is a social institution and that what is identified as law must be something with characteristics enabling it to serve the function of that particular social institution and, above all, to promote the objective of fidelity to law that legal positivists now generally concede is a prime objective of their theory. Inevitably, however, there are some characteristics about what legal positivists recognize or define as law that preclude the latter from adequately serving the function of law as an institution or of promoting fidelity to it. These objectives must be worked or planned for in the defining of law. A theory for defining positive law that prescinds from a consideration of these objectives is a faulty theory since it does not comprehend the necessary elements of the particular definitional problem.

Law Administration. A third criticism of legal positivism focuses upon the failure of its proponents to come to grips with undeniable difficulties of law administration. Their theory does not hide these; it may even highlight them. Currently, legal positivists are talking about the intersection or overlapping, especially in certain problem areas, between positive law and justice. Some of the major problem areas confronting them are the following: the assigning of meaning to laws where, according to any description of the task, law is being made; the field of procedural justice in the administration of law, which exacts objectivity and impartiality; the defining of the content of a legal system; the issuance of official decisions concerning the application of "law" to a transaction in light of its grossly immoral quality. By and large, legal positivists now recognize these problems, but only by way of acknowledging them as evidence of the inappropriateness of a total separation between law and morality in defining a working concept of law. They do not consider that their "minor" concessions of certain intersections weaken in any substantial way their effort to keep law separate from morality. Neither do they seek to resolve these problems but defer to other disciplines for their solution. The problems are, however, problems that those engaged in jurisprudence in the primary sense have to meet and solve. Critics of legal positivism insist that its proponents must also face them.

Societal Harms. The fourth criticism of legal positivism is that in proffering a working point of view regarding identification and elaboration of law, it may be responsible for certain societal harms. One of these is the failure of modern jurists to discuss the prudential aspects of problems of justice involved in the operation of a legal system. Instead of making uncertainty or inability to attain science about questions of justice a reason for putting these questions beyond the pale of the legal discipline, jurists should make them the occasion of effort to understand as much as possible about the process of justice. To do so involves no necessary commitment to eternal verities about the minimal content of positive law, nor does it preclude affirmation of them. To the extent that it achieves acceptance, legal positivism defeats that inquiry into justice which ought to be one of its contributions to improvement of administration of law. Moreover, legal positivism can contribute to the dangerous tendency of men, including members of the legal profession, to accept as respectable law whatever has been officially recognized or proffered as such. One need not refer merely to the example of the legal profession in Germany, which, by its adherence to legal positivism, aided the Nazi drive for establishment of a dictatorship. One may see in the United States, positive harms resulting from practical effect being given in law administration to the views of legal positivism. Consider, for example, two decisions of the United States Supreme Court: Korematsu v. United States, 323 U.S. 214 (1944), and Application of Yamashita, 327 U.S. 1 (1946). These decisions were the product of the viewpoint of legal positivism. The doctrine provided a convenient principle for crediting as law what had been administratively formulated as the legal basis for placing a person in a concentration camp without regard to his innocence or guilt, in the first case, and as the basis for depriving a person of his life irrespective of any knowledgeable commission of wrong, in the second case. Legal positivism has also long provided in the Anglo-American legal systems the basis for an attempt to justify literalism and extreme devotion to precedent. To the extent that this has prevented the administration of law from proceeding in accordance with its purpose, the result has been to frustrate the realization of justice, and to some extent, the operation of the democratic principle. Legal positivism is possibly waning in significance as a doctrine of jurisprudence, but its practical legacy is still very much present in the practical administration of law.

POSSENTI, GABRIEL, ST.

Commonly known as St. Gabriel of Our Lady of Sorrows, Passionist seminarian; b. Assisi, Italy, March 1, 838; d. Isola del Gran Sasso (Teramo), Italy, Feb. 27 1862. Francesco (his baptismal name) was the 11th of 13 children of Sante and Agnese (Frisciotti) Possenti. His father was governor of Assisi and later assessor of Spoleto. Until 1856 Francesco studied at the Jesuit college in Spoleto, where he was known for meticulousness in dress, fondness for dancing and the theater, and an inclination to vanity. After twice failing to fulfill promises to enter religion made during grave illness, he experienced, while watching a religious procession honoring the miraculous icon of Spoleto, a strong urge to follow his vocation. Despite his father's objections he joined the PASSIONISTS at Morrovalle (1856) and took as his name in religion Gabriel of Our Lady of Sorrows. During the next six years he was a model seminarian, exact in his observance of his religious rule and noted for his spirit of prayer and penance. His spiritual director singled out devotion to the Blessed Virgin Mary as his preeminent characteristic and the source of his spirituality. He received minor orders in 1861 but died before advancing to major orders. He was beatified May 31, 1908, and canonized May 13, 1920. He has been declared patron of the Abruzzi region and copatron of Italian Catholic youth.

Feast: Feb. 27.

POSSESSOR IN GOOD, BAD, OR DUBIOUS FAITH

A possessor is a person who exercises actual control over a thing in such a way that he can dispose of it at will, regardless of whether he enjoys rightful ownership of it. An owner, on the contrary, is a person who has full right to dispose of a thing, with or without the corresponding exercise of that right. Ownership thus indicates a condition of right, whereas possession is merely a condition of fact, which may, nevertheless, be protected by law and be productive of juridical effects.

This article will treat the possessor's rights and obligations in relation to the owner, whether they concern the property itself, the income derived from it, or the expenditures incurred during the period of possession. Since these rights and obligations vary according to whether the possessor is in good, bad, or doubtful faith, each kind of possession requires separate consideration.

In Good Faith. A possessor in good faith is one who sincerely believes that property in his possession belongs to himself when in fact it belongs to another. Thus he is unaware that he is violating another's rights. His obligations and rights are as follows.

In Relation to the Property Itself. (1) As soon as he becomes aware that the property belongs to another, he is obliged in justice to restore it to its lawful owner, if it still exists. (2) He is absolved from further obligation in justice if the property has perished and he is no richer for having had it in his possession. The same is true if he has given it away, although in this case, if it can be done conveniently, charity requires either that he admonish the present possessor to restore the property to the owner, or that he bring the matter to the owner's attention so that the latter may recover his own property. (3) He acquires true ownership of the property in question if he fulfills all the requirements for lawful prescription.

In Regard to the Products. (1) Since a thing fructifies to its owner, the possessor in good faith must restore to the owner the products of his property, whether they be natural products, such as animal offspring, or civil products, such as rent from his house. However, the possessor is not obliged to restore industrial products, or the fruits of his own labor, such as profits realized from a business. (2) Modern codes of civil law frequently allow the possessor to retain all products, whether natural, civil, or industrial, which he acquired during his period of good faith. The prescriptions of civil law may be safely followed in conscience.

In Regard to Expenditures. The possessor in good faith is entitled to compensation for all necessary and useful expenses incurred in the maintenance or improvement of the property. No compensation is due him, however, for superfluous expenses, that is, for those that have not benefited the owner, or which the latter would not have reasonably authorized.

In Bad Faith. A possessor in bad faith is one who culpably takes or keeps a thing that he knows to be the property of another. In general, he is bound to repair all foreseen damage caused to the lawful owner. Therefore: (1) He must restore the property itself, if it still exists, or its equivalent, if it has perished or passed into the hands of a third party. (2) He must compensate the owner for all ensuing loss, so that the owner receives as much as he would have had if he had not been unjustly deprived of his goods. This obligation, of course, presupposes that the unjust possessor foresaw the losses at least indistinctly. (3) Like the possessor in good faith, he must restore all natural and civil products, but may retain the fruits of his own labor, and is entitled to compensation for necessary and useful expenses. (4) Unlike the possessor in good faith, he may never acquire ownership of the property by prescription.

In Doubtful Faith. A possessor is said to be in doubtful faith if he has serious reasons for questioning the lawfulness of his possession. Since his obligations differ according to whether the doubt was present at the beginning of his possession or arose only during its course, both alternatives must be considered separately. In either case, however, he must undertake a reasonable investigation in proportion to the seriousness of his doubt and the value of the property in question.

When Doubt Is Subsequent to Possession. (1) If such a doubt persists after a diligent inquiry, the possessor may keep the property, since in this case the presumption is in his favor. (2) If, on the contrary, he discovers that the property belongs to someone else, he has the same obligation to make restitution as the possessor in good faith. (3) If he culpably neglects to settle the doubt, he becomes a possessor in bad faith.

When Possession Begins with Doubt. (1) If the disputed property had been taken away from another who possessed it in good faith, it must be restored to the former possessor since here the presumption supports his claim. (2) If, on the other hand, the property had been acquired by legal title, for example by purchase or donation, from a possessor in good faith, after fruitless attempts to dispel the doubt, the present holder may retain the disputed object. (3) If the property was acquired from a person in doubtful faith, or from one whose good faith was reasonably suspect (because, for example, he was known to have stolen in the past), and this doubt persists after the inquiry, the possessor must, according to the degree of his doubt, make restitution to the probable owner, or to the poor, if the owner is completely unknown.

POSSEVINO, ANTONIO

Missionary, linguist, educator, and papal diplomat; b. Mantua, 1534; d. Ferrara, Feb. 26, 1611. As a vigorous opponent of the Protestant Reformation, Possevino entered the Society of Jesus in 1559, and one year later was sent to Savoy to preach against the Waldensers. From 1562 to 1572 he preached in France with great success. In 1573 Everard Mercurian, the new Jesuit General, named Possevino as his private secretary

In 1577 Gregory XIII appointed Possevino as his personal representative to John III of Sweden because John had expressed a desire to become Catholic. Possevino arrived in Stockholm in December of 1577 with power to negotiate the matter. In May 1578 John III, without reservations, made his obedientia and was absolved from schism. The king insisted that the conversion of Sweden would be facilitated if the pope would make certain concessions: Mass in the vernacular, communion under both species, and marriage of the clergy. Possevino personally asked Gregory for these during the summer of 1578, but the pope refused. The legate's return to Stockholm in 1579 was anticlimactic, and John III, fearing the loss of his crown, lapsed from the Catholic faith. Possevino left Stockholm in August 1580.

Gregory next appointed Possevino as legate to Russia. Czar Ivan IV (the Terrible), having been decisively defeated by Stephen BÁTHORY, King of Poland, appealed to the pope for mediation and suggested the possibility of the reunion of the Russian Church. Possevino left Rome in March of 1581 with broad instructions to negotiate these points. He entered Russia in August, and after protracted discussions was able to secure a desired armistice. Once the armistice was signed, Ivan grew cool to the reunion proposals, and in May of 1582, the ambassador left for Rome with his mission only half accomplished.

In October Possevino was accredited as nuncio to Poland, with additional instructions to continue working for reconciliation with Russia, however, Ivan's death in 1584 terminated all official contact between Russia and the papacy. Possevino remained in the North for three additional years, preaching, writing, and founding schools. Although the Pope wished him to remain in Poland as his resident legate, the Jesuit General, Claudius ACQUAVIVA, insisted on his recall in 1587.

From 1587 to 1591 Possevino taught theology at the University of Padua where the most famous of his pupils was St. Francis de Sales. In 1595 he was instrumental in obtaining full papal absolution for Henry of Navarre. Possevino's writings include: Moscovia (Vilna 1586), an important early authority on Russian history; Apparatus sacer ad Scripturam Veteris et Novi Test (Venice 1603–06), an analysis of more than 8,000 books treating of Sacred Scripture; and the Biblioteca selecta (Rome 1593), which deals with the method of study, teaching, and practical use of various sciences.

[J. W. ROONEY]

POSSIBILITY

A term taking its root meaning from the Latin posse (to be able, to have the power to) and thus closely associated with the term "POTENCY." When the notion of potency, or capacity, is referred exclusively to the order of BEING, it becomes possibility, i.e., the absolute potentiality, or capacity, to be. This article surveys the historical development of the concept from the Greeks to the present and concludes with a Thomistic explanation of how possibility is related to the divine omnipotence.

Early Origins. The concept of possibility, like many philosophical notions, had its beginning with the Greeks, and in particular with PARMENIDES (Fragments 2–3) and PLATO. Plato held the natures of things to be eternally subsistent Forms existing apart from the things of which they are Forms (Phaedo 100D–102B; Phaedrus 247C; Parm. 132D). Natures, or essences, have their truth and being in and of themselves. For Plato, therefore, there is a dichotomy between being and existence. True being is Form, whereas existence is a reflection of the world of true being in sensory changing matter, the world of opinion rather than of true knowledge (Rep. 509D–511E). In Plato's metaphysics, which may be referred to as a metaphysics of essence, the possible has a being of its own in the world of Forms.

For Aristotle, on the other hand, the ontological possible—which he identified with power and matter—is always located in the world of things. It is already a being, although potential to further actuality (Phys. 187a 12–192h 3, 200b 12–201b 15; Metaphysics 1045b 27–1052a 12). The possible thus denotes the state of that which is able to be or can be, and as such is contrasted with the impossible, that which is not able to be or cannot be. It is defined in relation to the actual, which itself is identified simply by pointing to examples, such as a bird flying or a man walking.

The possible has several analogical meanings for Aristotle. It may denote (1) that which is actively possible, as the sculptor's active possibility of carving a statue; (2) that which is passively possible, as the marble's passive possibility of being made into a statue; (3) that which is possible in the sense of being able, not only to be done, but to be done well, actively or passively, as one may speak of an able sculptor; and (4) that which is possible in the sense of being powerful and able to resist change, in contrast to that which is weak and unable to withstand transmutation from opposing forces. All of these meanings are reducible to the first, the possible as implied in active potency. Thus the actualization of passive potency is dependent on activity deriving from active potency. Similarly, to be able to act well depends on being able to act, but not conversely. And again, the possible understood as ability to resist change clearly requires an active source that is able to be resisted.

Medieval Thought. The transition from the notion of ontological possibility contained in Aristotle to that of logical possibility is traceable historically to the Christian doctrine of CREATION. In the context of Judeo-Christian revelation, "to be" no longer meant to be a thing, or a kind of being, but simply to exist. Thus the Aristotelian notion of potency, which was drawn from the operational order of substance and accident and from the essential order of matter and form, was extended to the existential order of ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE. As a consequence, essence came to be viewed as potency in the order of being, or potency to exist simply, which is actualized by the act of existence. This application was consistent with Aristotle's understanding, for potency in his view is always the power of a being, i.e., the potentiality of something already existent for further change or for realizing its actuality by the reception of other forms.

With the Neoplatonic interpretation placed on Aristotle by Arab philosopher Avicenna, however, a new element was introduced. As Avicenna conceived it, essence, if it is to receive existence, must possess a being of its own in its proper state as essence. Under his influence, the Platonic Forms, i.e., the essences of things existing apart from the things of which they are the essence, came to serve as the philosophical model for the conception of essence as that which is of itself, but then exists by its act of existence. HENRY OF GHENT, GILES OF ROME, and John DUNS SCOTUS (and later F. SUÁREZ) all seem to have accepted this notion of the possible essence as the logical possible (possibile logicum, as Duns Scotus termed it), distinguishing it from the Aristotelian ontological possible. A further development was the application of the Aristotelian ontological perspective to the existential order as the real possible (possibile reale, again in the terminology of Duns Scotus, Opus Oxon. 1.43.1.3, 6).

Christian thinkers generally have agreed that essences derive their truth or intrinsic possibility from God. But within this consensus they have disagreed as to the precise attribute of God that provides the ultimate foundation of possibility, the possible essence.

St. THOMAS AQUINAS and Thomists generally have taught that the formal and immediate foundation of essences is the divine intellect. The remote and ultimate foundation of the possibility of things is the divine essence. The essences of all things are reflections of the divine ideas, or exemplars, which in turn are the divine essence perceived as imitable in this mode or that by the divine intellect. Essences are knowable inasmuch as they are involved in being, and the origin of all beings is the divine essence.

WILLIAM OF OCKHAM and the nominalists, on the other hand, have taught that God's power is the ultimate foundation of possibility, or essences. The ability of God to make something explains why it is intrinsically possible. Likewise, something is intrinsically impossible simply because God cannot make it. Thus the ultimate explanation of the possibility of things lies not within things themselves but within the Being responsible for making them. The omnipotence of God is the ultimate foundation for essences.

Modern Philosophers. With the advent of modern philosophy, further developments were associated with attempts to discover the ultimate foundation of possibility. According to René DESCARTES, possibility derives from the divine will, not from the divine omnipotence or the divine essence. In fact, in a much-quoted illustration, Descartes claims that a triangle has three angles equal to two right angles not only because of its components, but because ultimately this is the way God has willed it. If God had willed it otherwise, then it would have been otherwise. Thus the absurd and the impossible would be possible if God willed them to be so.

In the view of G. W. von LEIBNIZ, possibility can be explained antecedent to and without actuality. The foundation of the analytic proposition or statement is possibility, or the autonomy of an order of the possibles. For Leibniz the present world is only one of an infinite number of possible worlds. Synthetic propositions are true of the actually existent world. But some statements are true of all possible worlds as well, and these are called analytic propositions. They are necessary or eternal truths such as are to be found in mathematics and in logic. Leibniz, though differing from Plato and St. Thomas, like them reduces possibility to conceivability. A statement is possible if its contradictory is inconceivable, i.e., if no contradiction follows from the assumption of its existence. The necessity of logic, the necessary analytic statement, thus depends on an order of possible being that is independent of and antecedent to existence.

For Christian WOLFF, the necessity of the possibles is identified with the necessity of the divine essence. Wolff taught that essences are dependent on God not in respect to their intelligible or ideal constituents, but only as regards their existence. The absolute necessity of the possibles is in the order of ideal essences; their existence depends on the necessary existence of God. Consequently, Wolff defined metaphysics as the science of essences, or of the possibles, a definition that has had a long history and is still influential in scholasticism. Essence, in his view, is the intelligible content from which is drawn the meaning of the thing, namely, what makes it to be the kind of thing it is, and this apart from its existence.

For Immanuel Kant, as for modern IDEALISM, essences, or the intrinsic possibilities of things, arise from the human intellect and from the conditions of knowledge. Possibility is thus defined as agreement with the formal conditions of experience, although as such it is definable only under the conditions that make sensible experience possible (Critique of Pure Reason, B266, A220). Kant does not concede possible being a being of its own apart from the actual world of sensation. Such an attribution, in his view, would be a result of the transcendental illusion. Contrary to Leibniz, he holds that possibility cannot be defined independently of the actual world of sensible intuition.

For E. HUSSERL, on the other hand, the possible, along with the probable, the questionable, and the doubtful, are ontic modalities. As ontic, these modalities can change without any type of (subjective) thought, i.e., without concepts or judgments playing any part in the change. Possibility, for him, is objective in a Cartesian rather than in a Kantian sense.

Contemporary Logicians. In the usage of contemporary logicians, logical possibility has greater extension than physical possibility. The criterion of logical possibility is the compatibility of a statement with the laws of logic. Since the laws of logic are reducible to the principles of CONTRADICTION and IDENTITY, this is a return to the position of Leibniz, to an abstract order of essences that are in themselves apart from existence. Bertrand RUSSELL, for example, conceives of number in this way, as does Alonzo Church. Numbers are not abstracted from concrete sense data; they simply are, like Platonic Forms. Similarly, an argument is sound only if it is not possible for its premises to be true and its conclusion false. Every conceivable situation in which the premises would be true would make the conclusion true.

According to Nelson Goodman, counterfactual conditionals explain possibility in the logical order. The empiricist or nominalist position is also behind the identification of meaning and evidence as circular. W. V. O. Quine's rejection of possibility by reducing it to the role of a modal operator offers a good illustration of how a thorough-going empiricism would eliminate possibility. In Quine's view, the object-directed pattern of man's thinking confuses defective nouns with propositions. Yet there is a metaphysical foundation of his criticism of possibility, which seems to be directed more against the idealistic possible, with a being all its own, than against the possible of scholastic philosophy.

Contemporary Scholastics. Interest in the problems posed by possibility has also been manifested by É. Gilson and other scholastic proponents of EXISTENTIAL METAPHYSICS, who claim St. Thomas as the source of their doctrine. They point to such texts of St. Thomas as "That which entirely is not, is infinitely distant from act; it is not in potency in any way at all" (C. gent. 1.43). In their view, instead of discussing possible being in terms of a second intention such as possibility or in terms of schematic metaphysical notions such as potency and act, it should be discussed in terms of the more immediate metaphysical principles of essence and existence. Formulated in this way, a possible is an essence without existence. Possible being is thus a relic of the Platonic essence, and as such contradicts an existentialism that finds in existence the source of all perfection, including that of essence. The possible essence, in this view, is simply an intentional being existing only in the mind by a mental divorce from existence (esse). The being (esse) of a quiddity is a kind of being of reason (quoddam esse rationis—In I sent. 19.5.1 ad 7). Between being (esse) and intentional being (esse intentionale) there is no alternative except the nonexistent world of Platonic Ideas and Avicennian essences.

For Leibniz and N. HARTMANN, existence is dependent on essence; this is why all that can be is. But this is a reversal of the values of being, according to the existentialist interpretation. Existence is primary and only that which is, is. Whatever can be is dependent on that which is, and what it is. Thus pure possibility can occupy a place in reality, play a role in the real, only if the essence possesses some mode of existence. Of course, man can know things that do not exist. But when he knows essences that are nonexistent, this is in virtue of a secondary act of the mind, a REFLECTION on human knowledge itself. In this case the intellect knows essences apart from their existence, but such essences themselves exist by the act of existence of the human knower. They exist in a precise mode of being, the mode of INTENTIONALITY. Possible essences exist as concepts, as accidental being, with the kind of existence proper to accidents. The unicorn, the gold mountain, the elder brother of the eldest brother are all brought into existence by an act of reflection on prior knowledge that is restructured and reconstructed in the mind of the knower. Those who would attribute to such possibles an extramental existence in their own right fall under the very criticism Thomas Aquinas made of the Platonic Forms (In lib. de causis 2). They consider things as they exist under the conditions of thought as if they were existing under the conditions of reality. In St. Thomas's moderate realism, the existence that grounds and supports the possible essence is the act of existence of the knowing subject, whether this be human or divine.

Possibility and Divine Omnipotence The possibility conceived of as already present in the nature of things and able to be actualized in the ordinary course of events, called natural possibility, is situated under a further, all-embracing possibility that includes and transcends the former, called by scholastic theologians absolute, or logical, possibility. The possible is this absolute, or logical, possibility. The possible in this absolute sense is the domain of the divine OMNIPOTENCE, an active potency infinite in extent. Unlike the case of created active and passive potency, in which the possibility of the former is circumscribed by the limitations of the latter, the divine active potency, identical with the divine nature and the divine actuality, is wholly unlimited and produces from nothing, according to the motion of the divine will and the dictates of the divine wisdom, the totality of all other being, including all natural potency or possibility, whether active or passive.

Strictly speaking, nothing is impossible to this divine potency, since that which is logically impossible by a repugnance of terms has, by virtue of its intrinsic contradiction, the status of nothingness. It is impossible in itself rather than to God. Things impossible to nature, on the other hand, such as the raising of the dead, the giving of sight to the blind, are so solely because of the determination of the limits of nature by the Author of nature. They are not impossible to the divine potency, which is infinite, but rather are connatural to it. Although past events cannot be reversed, as the discovery of America cannot now be made not to have happened, nevertheless this does not denote any limitation of the divine power. The occurrence of every event, past, present, or future, signifies instead a definitive realization, permissive in the case of sin, of the divine plan, to which, in the decree of the divine wisdom, no amendment of a more desirable nature can exist or be possible.

Divine activity in the production and conservation of things is not qualified by the necessary and the contingent, the possible and the actual, as these are present in things. Rather God, in producing being, also determines the mode of being, what will be and what cannot be, and, in what is to be, whether it will exist as that which cannot be or as that which may or may not be. Those possible things that by nature do not occur with necessity but may or may not be, though proceeding according to the infallible sequence of divine providence and coming into being when so ordained, yet do so according to their nature, i.e., as contingent rather than as necessary. Hence the possible and the impossible, the necessary and the contingent in natural things should be considered as they are present in secondary, or natural, causes, since, barring divine intervention, that is the way their occurrence takes place.

The limitless potency inherent in the divine omnipotence, because man does not know positively the extent of that omnipotence, is discerned by man in a negative way as being everything that is not intrinsically contradictory. (An intrinsic contradiction is one in which two terms contradict each other as, for example, in the combination “square circle.”) Hence the possibility that what it implies is called logical as well as absolute. A gold mountain would be considered possible in this sense, even should there be in the present nature of things no natural potency allowing for an accumulation of gold in one place sufficient for the amount to be qualified as a mountain. The concept of gold simply has nothing repugnant in it that would exclude its being present in a quantity equivalent to a mountain. A centaur, however, conceived as a creature half man and half horse, would not be considered possible even in the logical, or absolute, sense, since here one term by its very nature negates or excludes the other. The rationality proper to man could not be combined with the irrationality proper to a horse. The same internal contradiction makes it impossible for a man simultaneously to sit and not sit or, at a given moment in the past, to have been seated and not to have been seated (which latter would occur if an event in the past were able to be made not to have taken place). The all-embracing type of the possible, found in the divine omnipotence, grasped negatively by man as whatever is not internally contradictory, may be stated in the logical sense as “that which, supposing it to exist, nothing (absolutely) impossible follows,” or “that whose contradictory is not necessarily true.”

POSSIDIUS, ST.

Fifth-century African bishop, biographer of St. Augustine; d. after 437. One of the first of Augustine's disciples at Hippo (c. 391), Possidius became bishop of Calama in Numidia c. 397. He took part in the 8th Council of Carthage, Aug. 25, 403 (Mansi, Sacrorum Concili- orum nova et amplissima collectio 3:790); the 11th, in 407 (ibid. 806); and the 15th, June 14, 410 (ibid. 810). He served as spokesman for the Catholic bishops in their great discussion with the Donatists, held at Carthage in May and June 411 (Mansi 4:8). He participated in the Council of Milevis (416) against Pelagianism (ibid. 335; Augustine, Epist., 137, 176), and was at the Council of Carthage in 419 (Mansi 4:433) (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM).

On a pastoral visitation in 404 Possidius was attacked by the Donatists (Vita Aug. 12; Augustine, Epist., 105.4), and in 408 he retired before the fanaticism of the pagans of Calama. He was sent to Italy as ambassador to the imperial authority and visited PAULINUS OF NOLA (Augustine, Epist., 95.1), but returned to Africa in 410. When the Vandals invaded Calama (428), Possidius took refuge at Hippo and assisted Augustine on his deathbed (Vita Aug. 28–29, 31). Forced to return to Calama in 435, he was expelled with other African bishops by the Vandals under Geiseric in 437 (Prosper of Aquitaine, Chron.; Monumenta Germanica Auctores Antiquissimi 9:475) and disappears from history.

His principal work, the biography of St. Augustine, composed between 432 and 437, delineates Augustine's career as a monk, priest, and bishop. A modest work, it avoids the overlaudatory style usual to that age. Its account of Augustine's activities is trustworthy for the most part; the Indiculus (list of Augustine's writings) is invaluable, though not complete or without error.

POSTEL, MARIE MADELEINE, ST.

Foundress of the Sisters of the CHRISTIAN SCHOOLS OF MERCY; b. La Bretonne, Normandy, France, Nov. 28, 1756; d. Saint-Sauveur-le-Vicomte, Normandy, July 16, 1846. Postel was born in comfortable circumstances and was given the baptismal name of Julie. After attending school at Barfleur and at the Abbey of Valognes, she opened a school in La Bretonne for poor children (1774).

During the French Revolution she continued to teach religion to them and to befriend nonjuring priests. Desirous of founding a religious congregation dedicated to the education of girls, she went to Cherbourg in 1805 and gathered around her three women who began leading the religious life. The four pronounced the vows of religion in 1807, and Julie took the name Madeleine. She composed a rule for her institute, but this was replaced in 1837 by the one written by St. John Baptist de LA SALLE for the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS. Sister Marie Madeleine, as superior general, moved her community to Tamerville in 1816, and it remained there until 1832. She then established its headquarters in the abandoned Abbey of Saint-Sauveur-le-Vicomte, which has since been the location of the congregation's motherhouse. During her remaining 14 years of life she restored the abbey church and supervised the growth of her institute, which in 1846 had 150 members and 37 convents. Sister Marie Madeleine was noted for her fortitude amid many trials. As an educator she improved the unimaginative curriculum then provided for poor girls by introducing sewing and embroidery and by supplementing Guizot's Charte with subjects such as poetry and singing. She was beatified in 1908 and canonized in 1925.

POSTGATE, NICHOLAS, BL.

Priest, martyr; alias Watson, Whitmore; b. ca. 1596–97 at Kirkdale House, Egton (Eyton) Bridge, Yorkshire; hanged, drawn, and quartered Aug. 7, 1679 at York under Charles II. He studied at Douai (1621–1628), where he was ordained priest in 1628. On June 29, 1630, he began his fruitful, 49-year apostolate in Yorkshire. He was apprehended by the exciseman Reeves at the house of Matthew Lyth of Sleights, Little Beck (near Whitby), and was condemned for his priesthood. Following his execution, his remains were given to his friends and interred. One of his hands was sent to Douai College and his portable altar-stone to Dodding Green, Westmoreland. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

POSTULATE

A postulate is an assumption advanced with the claim that it be taken for granted as axiomatic. In reference to further investigation it is a statement so assumed as to require no proof of its validity. In the development of THEORY, it corresponds to the first principles of philosophy. Practically, a postulate is roughly the same as a hypothesis except that the postulate is considered to be the idea content of the assumption and the hypothesis the logical statement of the postulate. In scientific theory postulates are generally either laws or principles that are considered as established, e.g., Newton's laws of motion, or convenient concepts that can neither be proved nor disproved, e.g., the principle of the conservation of energy.

POTENCY

Potency, a technical term used principally in philosophy and theology, is the capacity or aptitude in a being to receive some perfection or perform some action. Always a relative term, it means capacity "for" something, e.g., potency to receive energy, to grow, to learn mathematics, to become wise, virtuous. The correlate of potency is ACT, which expresses the fully present realization or completion of potency. (See POTENCY AND ACT.)

Origins with Aristotle. The general theory of act and potency, with its terminology, originated with ARISTOTLE and became the central doctrine of his philosophy (Phys. 187a 12–192b 3; Meta. 1045b 27–1052a 12). For him, potency was necessary to explain CHANGE, that is, the transition from one mode of being to another, or the coming-to-be of some new being or mode of being. Change, he argued, requires not only a state of being at its end different from that at the beginning, but also some underlying element or subject that remains throughout the process, thereby forming a bond of continuity between the two terms. This underlying element cannot be identified with either of its changing states or modes of being, since it is now without one, now without the other. It must have the capacity or potency to be now in one state, now in another, so that while in possession of one mode of being it still remains in potency to all other possible states. Thus water that is now actually cold is at the same time potentially hot; an acorn is in potency or has the potency to become an oak tree, and so on.

St. Marie Madeleine Postel.

Every BEING that is capable of change must therefore be composed of two distinct but mutually interrelated principles called act and potency, the second of which is in act with respect to its present state of perfection and in potency with respect to all other acts within its range of change. In a nonessential or accidental change the potency corresponds to the whole SUBSTANCE or ESSENCE of the being, which is thus in potency to its various possible accidental states or modes (see ACCIDENT). In a substantial or essential change the potency corresponds to ultimate or primary matter, which is in potency to diverse substantial forms (see MATTER AND FORM).

Thus did Aristotle answer the question that had baffled early Greek philosophers, viz, how is change possible, since new being cannot arise out of pure nothingness, nor, it seems, out of already actualized existing being? His answer was that the new being appearing in change arises out of a relative or partial nonbeing, i.e., out of a preexisting potency that is "not yet" the new being, but has the positive aptitude to become it.

Thomistic Development. Aristotle applied the notion of potency only to the order of change or process.

Where no change is possible, according to him, there is no potency but only act. St. THOMAS AQUINAS, however, applied this doctrine more widely to explain the intrinsic reason for limited or FINITE BEING (De pot. 1.1–2; C. gent. 1.16,18; 2.52–54). He saw potency not merely as a positive aptitude for some attribute, but also as a capacity limiting the amount of perfection a being can possess or receive. Since different limiting capacities can determine different degrees or modes of possessing a common perfection, such as life, knowledge, or power, the notion of limiting potency also explained, for him, how perfection could be multiplied or shared by many different beings, each according to its own potency or receptive capacity (see PARTICIPATION).

Thus St. Thomas explains all degrees of being as different combinations of potency and act. God alone has no potency, either as limiting capacity or as aptitude for change. All beings below Him have at least the composition of the act of EXISTENCE with the limiting potency of essence, which makes them exist at this particular level, as this particular being. All beings except God have also the act-potency composition of accident and substance, allowing them an individual history of development and change. All material beings, moreover, are composed of substantial form and primary matter.

The notion of LIMITATION was already implicit in Aristotle's theory of potency as receptive capacity, but was never made explicit by him. The reason undoubtedly was that for Aristotle, as for practically all Greeks of the classical period, the finite was identified with the finished, the intelligible, the perfect, i.e., with FORM or act, and the infinite with the unfinished, the unintelligible, the imperfect, i.e., with MATTER as pure indeterminate potency. Hence in this perspective the role of limit was associated with act rather than with potency. St. Thomas, on the other hand, synthesized Aristotelian doctrine with the Neoplatonic participation theory developed during the first centuries of the Christian era. According to the latter, any participated perfection has its source in an unlimited plenitude; each subject participating in this perfection shares in it according to its own finite capacity (see NEOPLATONISM; EMANATIONISM). St. Thomas identified the infinite source with act and the limiting capacity with potency. Thus the two great currents of Greek metaphysics are synthesized in a basic Thomistic doctrine: "No act is found limited except by a potency" (Comp. theol. 1.18); "Every act inhering in another is terminated by that in which it inheres. Hence, an act that exists in nothing is terminated by nothing" (C. gent. 1.43).

Other scholastic thinkers, like DUNS SCOTUS and SUÁREZ, stay closer to Aristotle and incorporate less Neoplatonic doctrine than did St. Thomas. They do not hold or do not stress the role of potency as a necessary limiting principle for finite being, and explain the limitation of act merely by the extrinsic efficient cause or agent that makes the being such as it is.

Meaning and Kinds. The term potency, as understood by St. Thomas, means simply a real capacity for some act. It includes both the positive note of aptitude for act and the negative note of capacity limited to receive only so much act and no more. This potency may, but does not necessarily or always, imply aptitude for change. Because of its essentially relative character potency must be defined in relation to its proportionate act, and hence neither its existence nor its nature can be known except through its fulfillment in actuality.

Active Potency. Potency as aptitude or capacity for act is divided into two main types, active and passive. Active potency is the inner power of an agent to perform some action, though it may not be actually so doing, e.g., the power of an artist to paint a picture, of a bird to fly, or of God to create beings. Since active potency does not of itself imply imperfection, it can be found in both God and creatures. In creatures, however, which now act and now do not, it implies some inner change from inactivity to activity, usually stimulated by an outside agent. When divisions into act and potency are compared, active potency belongs more properly with act than potency; the latter, unless further specified, usually means passive potency. Hence, to avoid confusion in terminology, active potency is more safely referred to as active power.

Passive Potency. Passive potency is the capacity to receive or be enriched with some new perfection not previously possessed, e.g., to acquire new knowledge, to receive heat energy, and so on. This potency alone plays the role of limiting capacity already explained. No passive potency possesses in its own right the perfection or act that it receives; if so, it would itself be the act in question and not a potency for it. Therefore passive potency can be activated only through the action of a cause or causes already possessing, at least in some equivalent way, the perfection that is actualized in the recipient potency. This priority of act over potency is used by Aristotle, St. Thomas, and other scholastic philosophers as a key notion to demonstrate the existence of God as First Unmoved Mover, the PURE ACT required as ultimate cause of change (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF; GOD, PROOFS FOR THE EXISTENCE OF).

Pure Potency. The only pure passive potency in the universe, according to Aristotle and St. Thomas, is primary matter. This doctrine has often been grossly misinterpreted to mean that pure potency is a distinct material thing existing on its own, like an atom. Since this potency is of itself pure indetermination, it can exist only as co-principle in a composite of act and potency that is itself structured or “informed” matter. Hence it can never be isolated or observed by laboratory analysis, and can be grasped only by philosophical analysis as a necessary condition for the properties of beings that can be observed. All complete real beings in the universe, therefore, are either Pure Act or varying combinations of act and potency. Apart from primary matter, all levels and kinds of passive potency are a blend of passive and active potency. Thus, whenever a new perfection is received by any being, this involves some aspect of passivity, or reception, and some aspect of activity, or assimilation of the new perfection into the being of the recipient.

Obediential Potency. Theologians also speak of a special passive potency in creatures as obediential potency. Unlike a natural potency, this does not flow directly from the nature of a thing, but is rather the basic openness or docility of the creature to elevation by God toward some level of perfection beyond its normal fixed status in the hierarchy of being. The principal instances of this type of potency actually given in the present historical order (endless others may be hidden in God’s providence for the future) are: (1) the aptitude of rational creatures to be raised to the life of GRACE and the BEATIFIC VISION as adopted sons of God; (2) the aptitude of human nature to be assumed into a special HYPOSTATIC UNION with one of the Persons of the Blessed Trinity, as happened in the human nature of Christ in the INCARNATION, and (3) the aptitude of material things to be made efficacious instruments or channels of divine grace in the Sacraments. [See SACRAMENTS (THEOLOGY OF).]

Potency in Modern Philosophy. With the RENAISSANCE, the theory of act and potency fell into disrepute along with other Aristotelian and scholastic doctrines (see RENAISSANCE PHILOSOPHY). One of the reasons was that decadent SCHOLASTICISM often substituted this general metaphysical theory for proper scientific explanations relevant to particular areas of experience. To explain the phenomenon of sleep, for example, by postulating a dormitive potency might be quite correct, but this explanation is so general as to be scientifically sterile. Nor was the theory of potency and act ever intended for such purposes.

Most modern philosophers outside the scholastic tradition have attacked the notion of potency. The notable exception is LEIBNIZ (1646–1716), who attempted to restore it to use in his theory of the MONAD. A principal reason for this attack is that potency is knowable only through its fulfilling act and is not a complete entity that is discoverable by sense observation or scientific experimentation. Act and potency is the general model of a metaphysical composition of incomplete copinciples within a complete being; when this notion was lost, the idea of real potency was distorted into that of a physical entity hidden somewhere inside a being, which, if real, should be able to be uncovered by a sufficiently probing scientific analysis. When nothing such was found, as of course it could not be, the notion itself was rejected as medieval superstition. The “clear and distinct ideas” of Cartesian RATIONALISM, the radical EMPIRICISM of the English tradition culminating in HUME, the conception of nature found in MECHANISM—all had no place for the authentic conception of potency.

Modern philosophies of change, such as that of BERGSON, make continuous process or succession of states the very essence of reality. Since, for them, no underlying immobile substances exist, they either deny the reality of potency as distinct from act or consider it a mere mental projection of the present into the past.

With the breakdown of mechanistic pictures of the universe in 20th-century science, and the recent return of metaphysics to respectability among philosophers outside the scholastic tradition, the notion of real potentiality is being restored as indispensable for an adequate analysis of reality. This is true not only among philosophers, but even among scientists, most notable of whom is Werner Heisenberg. Indeed it is difficult to see how one can explain any process of organic growth, or the range of unpredictable possibilities of action found in nature from man to subatomic particles, without the help of some such notion.

POTENCY AND ACT

Separate studies on POTENCY and ACT are demanded if one is to gain a knowledge of their significance and the range of their application. But these leave something to be desired. Since they isolate the notions from one another, they offer a static picture with only suspicion of the dynamic quality of potency and act. To supply this quality, one must seek a situation in which the two notions are involved in intimate relationship. This is found in the context of BEING that does not exceed the limits of the predicamental order (see CATEGORIES OF BEING). For it is of this being that potency and act are principles (see PRINCIPLE).

In such a context potency and act reveal themselves for what they are entitatively. They are simply principles, not things. Both are essentially incomplete, since neither is able to claim more than an imperfect participation in the form of being. Furthermore, they are naturally corroborative. Potency is the indetermined and perfectible element that looks to act as its determinate and perfecting complement. Because of their imperfect grasp on the form of being, the two necessarily require mutual assistance to exercise their role as principles of an existent. (For an exception, however, see SOUL, HUMAN, 4.)

Origin with Aristotle. It is Aristotle who must be credited with the discovery of the notions of potency and act. Initially it was his concern with the problem of CHANGE that provided the occasion for the discovery (Phys. 184a 9–192b 5). Prior to his time change was conceived as limited to the order of accidents; all the early naturalists steadfastly denied that it ever penetrated to the level of SUBSTANCE. Moreover, for them it was more a case of unveiling what was actual but hidden than of discovering the nature of change itself (see Saint Thomas Aquinas, In 1 phys. 9.2–3). With Aristotle's discovery of the notion of potency and his projection of that notion to the substantial order in the concept of primary matter, the whole picture was altered (see MATTER AND FORM). A true science of change was initiated. But important as this is, it is far from being the only application of the notions of potency and act in Aristotelian philosophy.

The further one ventures into the corpus of Aristotle's natural studies, the more evidence one encounters of the significance of these principles. These are, one learns, the basis of the theses that constitute the heart of his philosophy of nature and his psychology, such as, for example, the definition of MOTION (Phys. 201a 10) and that of the SOUL (Anim. 412a 6–28). But it is in his Metaphysics (1017a 35–b 9; 1045b 28–2052a 12) that Aristotle explicitly extends their horizons by bringing potency and act into the focus of being itself. Here he gives them a distinctively metaphysical aspect and lays the groundwork for the special use to which medieval philosophers would put them in their teachings concerning essence and existence.

Thomistic Development. With the ascendancy of ARISTOTELIANISM among the schoolmen, the doctrine of potency and act assumed great prominence in scholastic philosophy. But while all made it a major feature of their respective systems, none equaled Saint THOMAS AQUINAS in his fidelity to Aristotle's concepts or in the role he granted them in his philosophy. Whereas other outstanding figures, such as Duns Scotus and F. Suárez, adulterated the Aristotelian notions of potency and act, Saint Thomas preserved them in their original purity and made them the cornerstone of his philosophy of being. Special topics that deserve mention in that philosophy are the real distinction between the concepts, their relative priority, the limitation of act by potency, and the distinction between essence and existence.

Real Distinction. There are instances in which the actual separation of act and potency prove beyond doubt the reality of their distinction. It must be admitted, however, that such instances are too few and are verified in too limited a context (that of the soul's operative powers) to constitute a premise warranting a universal conclusion. It is for this reason that Thomists look in a new direction for a compelling proof, namely, to the conceptual order.

While aware that not every conceptual distinction is an actual reflection of the ontological order (e.g., the distinction between the concepts of GENUS and difference is a case in point), Thomists argue that the extensive distance between the concepts of potency and act is a proof of their real distinction. The concepts of potency and act far exceed the distance that separates concepts that are virtually distinct by a virtual major distinction, as is the situation with regard to the concepts of genus and difference (see DISTINCTION, KINDS OF). The latter share a commonness despite their distinction. Both signify the totum: the genus indeterminately, the difference determinately. Neither signifies a wholly new form but rather the same form, the sole variation arising from the mode of signifying. Consequently, their distinction, while having roots in the reality they represent, does not pass over from the conceptual to the ontological order. The case of the concepts of potency and act is altogether different. The concept of each stands diametrically opposed to that of the other, and there exists no ground on which this opposition can be resolved. The concept of potency formally signifies capacity or the absence of perfection, whereas that of act signifies perfection. Thus potency formally negates the very substance of act. Granting the correctness of each concept, it necessarily follows that the one and the other signify notions that defy identification, and this not only conceptually but also ontologically.

Relative Priority. In the order of knowledge, act naturally is prior to potency. Because potency signifies possibility and the measure of the knowableness of an entity depends on its actuality (In 1 phys. 1.7), potency can be known only through the act that is its fulfillment (In 9 meta. 7.1846).

In the ontological order, in which potency and act are constituent principles, potency is in most cases anterior to act. This follows because potency is generally the subject of act and therefore must be prior to it in time or solely in nature, or both in time and in nature. If one considers the matter absolutely, however—i.e., without reference to the circumstances associated with potency and act as constituent principles of being and attending solely to their respective natures—one must acknowledge the priority of act over potency. The reason for this is that the only source that can effect a transfer from potency to act is a being that is already in act (see MOTION, FIRST CAUSE OF).

Limitation of Act by Potency. The multiplication of act affords sufficient proof of the compatibility of the notions of limitation and of act. But the source of the compatibility is not quite obvious. Can the two notions be immediately joined or must they be mediated? Saint Thomas's answer is constant: the two notions can be associated only through the medium of potency.

Three alternatives suggest themselves as explanations for the limitation of act: act itself, potency, and the efficient cause. The first and third alternatives must be excluded. Were act self-limiting, it would negate itself, for it would be forced to assume a contradictory character, i.e., that of presenting itself as the principle of a perfection and of its negation. Similarly, appeal cannot be made to the efficient cause. It is not within the competence of this cause, be it infinite or finite, to resolve a natural incompatibility such as exists between the notions of act and self-limited act. There remains, then, potency as the final possibility, and here Thomists find the principle of act's limitation. The explanation follows from the nature of potency itself. Potency is self-limiting; it is a capacity for a definite act. Possessed of this inherent limitation, it naturally imposes limitation upon the act it receives; whatever is received must be received according to the measure, or limiting capacity, of the recipient (see PARTICIPATION).

Essence and Existence. The notions of potency and act provide maximum service within Thomism for solving the problem of the relationship between essence and existence. Other arguments can be given as a basis for maintaining the real distinction between essence and existence, but the doctrine of potency and act here assumes the greatest cogency. In particular, the Thomistic analysis of the nature of act and of its principle of limitation furnishes the middle term through which the real distinction between essence and existence is demonstrated (see ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE).

Later Scholasticism. One finds in the philosophy of the schoolmen a strong echo of Aristotle's evaluation of the importance of potency and act. Every major system of metaphysics elaborated within the scholastic tradition, whether of Thomist, Scotist, or Suarezian persuasion, places major emphasis on these notions. But while Aristotle's influence is far from negligible, it would be erroneous to see the thought of the scholastic tradition as a mere copy of that of the Stagirite. For one thing, a new use was made of potency and act by the scholastics; for another, though it is debatable whether this was a development, the Aristotelian notions came to be greatly modified.

The Thomistic application of the notions of potency and act to the problem of essence and existence, for example, was a wholly new venture. Though Aristotle himself did employ potency and act in his study of being, he did not consider the question of essence and existence in the context of the actual existent, nor did he apply the doctrine of potency and act to its general resolution. This was left to the scholastics, especially those of the Thomist school (see THOMISM).

Notable but regrettable changes in the structure of potency and act were much in evidence in both the Scotist and Suarezian systems. John Duns Scotus expanded the structure by attempting to introduce an intermediate between potency and act, viz, the notion of virtual act. F. SUÁREZ, in his turn, conceived of potency as an actus imperfectus, thereby restricting, rather than expanding, the traditional structure. These changes were significant. With the introduction of virtual act Scotus felt compelled to challenge the universality of the distinction between the moved and the mover (Opus oxon. 2.25.1.12), and consequently the metaphysical character of Saint Thomas's prima via. Suárez's interpretation of potency as an actus imperfectus had similar repercussions. Because of it he was forced to deny the basic opposition between potency and act in the systems of both Aristotle and Saint Thomas. Furthermore, he had to reject the principle "whatever is moved is moved by another" as not having metaphysical validity (see SCOTISM; SUAREZIANISM).

Modern Thought. So long as modern thought followed the pathways of IDEALISM or EMPIRICISM in any of their variations, the doctrine of potency and act could not hope for any type of recognition. The philosophical neglect of these principles varied in direct proportion to the rejection of REALISM, whether this was its complete repudiation, as in idealism, or merely its limitation to the sensibly perceived, as in empiricism.

In contemporary philosophy, however, a new interest in realism has begun to emerge. Rejecting idealism's attempt to impose its own image on the world of things, existentialists have become absorbed with the anguish of existence. Their concern with EXISTENCE, although presently fettered with the chains of IRRATIONALISM, could ultimately open the way for a renewed interest in potency and act (see EXISTENTIALISM).

POTTER, MARY

Foundress of the LITTLE COMPANY OF MARY; b. London, England, Nov. 22, 1847; d. Rome, Italy, April 9, 1913. She was the daughter of William Norwood and Mary Anne (Martin) Potter. Her mother, an Anglican, was received into the Catholic Church in 1845, and her five children were raised as Catholics. Mary was educated in a small private Catholic boarding school. She showed no inclination toward the religious life until her early twenties when, convinced that God was calling her to a life dedicated to the sick and the dying, she broke her engagement to be married. Given permission to influence others in devotion to the dying and to bring together in community life women with similar interests, she founded the Little Company of Mary at Hyson Green, England (1877). Several of her writings have been published. Her cause for beatification has been introduced in Rome (Decretum super scripta, July 25, 1952, and Nov. 25, 1956).

POTTHAST, AUGUST

Important German historian and editor of canonical sources; b. Houser, Aug. 13, 1824; d. Leobschütz, Feb. 13, 1898. After his studies in theology, philosophy, and history at the University of Halle, he was commissioned as a teacher in 1855. He was appointed custodian of the royal library in Berlin in 1868, and from 1874 to 1894 he was librarian of the legislative assembly of Germany. He was a fellow worker on the Monumenta Germaniae Historia. His most important works are the Regista pontificum Romanorum inde a post Christum natum MCXCVII ad annum MCCCIV (Berlin 1874–75) and the Biblioteca historica medii aevi. . . (Berlin 1862, 2d ed. 1896). This latter work is still considered an indispensable work for the history of the Middle Ages. It lists the original sources, with information on the chief collections, editions, and translations. In 1965 the first volume of an entirely recast edition of the Biblioteca was issued: Repertorium Fontium Historiae Medii Aevi primum ab Augusto Potthast digestum, nunc cura collegii historicorum e pluribus nationibus emendatum et auctum, I: Series Collectionum (Rome 1962), published by Istituto Storico Italiano per il Medio Evo.

POUGET, FRANÇOIS AIMÉ

Oratorian, author of a controversial catechism; b. Montpellier, France, Aug. 28, 1666; d. Paris, April 4, 1723. After his ordination, he obtained his doctorate at the Sorbonne in 1692. He was then attached to the church of Saint-Roch, Paris. While there, he reconciled La Fontaine to the Church. In 1696 or 1697, Pouget joined the Oratorians and returned to Montpellier, where he became rector of the diocesan seminary. Later, he served for a time as parish priest in the Diocese of Saint-Malo. His last years he spent in Paris. During this time, he was a member of Abp. Louis Antoine de NOAILLES' liturgical commission for the archdiocese, and also gave conferences in the seminary of Saint-Magloire.

Pouget's fame is due completely to one of his works, popularly known as the Montpellier Catechism, but to which he gave a long, rambling title in order, as he himself put it, "to soften a little the name catechism, which most people falsely think to be written for children." Like many another catechism, it was a work on the Christian life and was written for adults. The first part explained the principles of religion, its beginnings and its growth from the creation to the end of the world, and the achievement of eternal life. The second part showed the way a person must live on earth in order to reach the kingdom of heaven. In the third part, he considered the means given men by which they can live rightly.

This work, published in a large and a small edition, the latter for the use of children, had immediate and widespread popular success. It went through 30 editions in French alone, from the first publication, in 1702, to 1710. Each edition, with corrections and annotations by the author, was an improvement over its predecessor. Very quickly, translations appeared in English and in most of the European languages.

The French versions were placed on the Index of Forbidden Books, Jan. 21, 1721, and the English version was similarly condemned, Jan. 15, 1725. Both original and translations were condemned as containing Jansenist doctrine. In his last years, Pouget, who was then almost blind, translated the catechism into Latin. He revised the original, adding citations from Scripture, definitions of the Church, and statements from the Fathers, but because of his blindness he had to depend on others. When the Latin version was published in 1725, it was so filled with inaccuracies that it immediately fell under the ban of local Church authorities.

Pouget's work had the misfortune to appear under the patronage of Archbishop de Noailles of Paris, always inclined to favor Jansenist doctrine, and Bishop Colbert of Montpellier, a militant Jansenist. The defenders of Pouget's orthodoxy sometimes charge that his condemnations were largely the result of politics. He himself once noted that the desire to vindicate one's own school of thought often dictated loyalties in the Jansenist controversy. However, even those who attempted to vindicate the catechism and its author had to note that the condemned editions contained expressions that were distinctively Jansenist in connotation.

The history of the numerous French editions and of Pouget's own Latin translation has been called bizarre, and it is so complicated as to be practically incomprehensible. Numerous French editions continued to be printed, each one the object of much discussion and controversy. A Polish version was issued in Warsaw in 1791. Finally, in 1836, a French version was adopted in the Diocese of St. Pierre, Martinique, apparently without objection. The final Latin version, published in Venice in 1764, had been purged of many, but not all the original faults.

Pouget wrote little else of note. In 1712, he published Instructions sur les devoirs des chevaliers de Malte (1712), a work of which he was editor, not author. Another work by him, Instruction chrétienne sur la prière, was published in Paris in 1728.

POUGHKEEPSIE PLAN

A compromise educational plan initiated in New York State in 1873 in an attempt to avoid Church State conflict while maintaining the cooperation of both. It was similar in purpose to the plans from 1831 to 1852 in Lowell, Mass., and 1891 in Faribault and Stillwater, Minn. (see FARIBAULT PLAN; LOWELL PLAN).

On June 11, 1873, Rev. Patrick F. McSweeney, pastor of St. Peter's church, Poughkeepsie, with the approval of Abp. (later Cardinal) John McCloskey of the Archdiocese of New York, proposed a compromise arrangement with the public board of education on behalf of his parish school for boys on Mill Street and for girls on Clover Street. The board of education approved the plan on July 16 and signed the document on August 21, with Egbert Q. Eldridge acting for the Poughkeepsie board of education. Henceforth the schools were known as School 11 (which enrolled 413 pupils in the first year of the new arrangement) and School 12 (322 pupils).

This plan called for the school board to pay St. Peter's Church $1 per year for each of the school buildings and their furniture, each of the buildings constituting thenceforth a public school. The board was to care for the repair and insurance of the buildings, which were to be under the board's control during school hours, but at other times to revert to the owners. During school hours, the board's authority was to be as complete as in other public schools: teachers were to be selected, employed, paid, and subject to dismissal by the board; non-Catholics as well as Catholic pupils were to be admissible by board regulation and subject to the board's rules during school hours; and the schools were to be subject to visitation by members of the board. Either the board or the owners could terminate the lease at the end of any scholastic year by giving 30 days' notice. No religious exercises were to be held or religious instruction given during school hours, and no child was compelled to attend religious exercises given after school hours and during lunch hour except by parental wish. The Catholic teachers, including some nuns, were retained, and it was tacitly understood that Catholics would continue to be hired for these schools, provided they were equally competent with other teachers under the board's supervision.

The plan for the most part seemed satisfactory: an 1875 inspection by Wolcott Calkins, a Presbyterian minister and bitter foe of Catholicism, went well; Abp. John IRELAND lauded it in 1890; in 1898 it was praised by Orlando D. M. Baker, president of the board of education of Poughkeepsie, and by Charles W. ELIOT, president of Harvard. But there was some dissatisfaction: in 1887 Andrew S. Draper, state superintendent of public instruction, declared it illegal to employ as a public school teacher anyone wearing “an unusual garb worn exclusively by members of one religious sect”; in 1889 Bp. Bernard J. McQuaid of Rochester voiced disapproval for “many Catholics”; in 1890, Rev. James Nilan, McSweeney’s successor, complained of some “harsh and witless” Catholic criticism. From 1891 the plan became involved in the heated debate aroused by Rev. Thomas Bouquillon, professor of moral theology at The Catholic University of America, whose pamphlet, Education: To Whom Does It Belong?, granted a wider right to the state in education than had been traditional among American Catholics (see BOUQUILLON CONTROVERSY). State Superintendent Charles R. Skinner in 1896 opposed the plan as “unwise as a matter of school policy, and a violation of the letter and spirit of the Constitution” and on Dec. 23, 1898, ordered its discontinuance. Church authorities immediately complied; Nilan reopened School No. 11 as a parochial school on Jan. 3, 1899, and leased School No. 12 to the city until 1902. Similar plans in other localities of the state (e.g., Lima, Corning, West Bridge, Niagara, Watervliet, and Ogdensburg) were also affected by Skinner’s ruling. On April 17, 1906, the court of appeals of New York State, in the Lima case of O’Connor v. Hendrick, affirmed the decision, citing art. 9, sec. four of the New York State constitution, which prohibited the appropriation of public funds for schools wholly or partly under sectarian auspices.

POULAIN, AUGUSTIN

Jesuit mystical theologian and writer; b. Cherbourg, Dec. 15, 1836; d. Paris, July 19, 1919. Poulain entered the Society of Jesus in 1858 and after completing his studies, taught mathematics at Metz and Angers, directed the schools there, and was for five years director of the artists’ guild in Paris. His publication of Des Grâces d’oraison (Paris 1901) surprised his associates, no one of whom seemed to have known that he was interested in, or capable of writing in, the field of mystical theology. The book won immediate success, going through nine editions during the author’s lifetime, and was translated into several foreign languages. Poulain, though not a strong theologian and apparently without any direct experience of the purely mystical states that he described, succeeded in writing a clear didactic treatise on a delicate and difficult subject. By doing so he contributed to the revival of interest in mystical theology, which had been largely neglected since the 17th century. The clear distinction that Poulain maintained between the ascetical and mystical states aroused considerable controversy.

POULENC, FRANCIS

Contemporary composer noted for his religious works; b. Paris, Jan. 7, 1899; d. there, Jan. 30, 1963. Poulenc was one of the creative musicians who formed the Groupe des Six under the leadership of Erik Satie and Jean Cocteau (the other five were Darius Milhaud, Arthur Honegger, Germaine Tailleferre, Louis Durey, and Georges Auric). Strongly opposed to the refinement and elegance of DEBUSSY and Ravel, “Les Six” wished to be thought barbares, but Poulenc for one was much more than that. While his style revealed influences of SCHUBERT, FAURE, Satie, and Moussorgsky, his clarity, spontaneity, and irresistible melodic gift were his own. He composed some of the finest French art songs of the 20th century, as well as attractive instrumental works, such as the sparkling Organ Concerto (appreciated more in the U.S. than in France), and the operas Les Dialogues des Carmélites, based on the Bernanos-Bruckberger scenario for Gertrud von Le Fort’s Song at the Scaffold (U.S. première, San Francisco Opera, 1957; also on NBC-TV), and La Voix Humaine (1960). His particular glory, however, is his choral writing, which ranges from Petites Voix for small girls to the demanding Mass (1937) for unaccompanied mixed chorus, in the spirit of the motu proprio on sacred music. In all his sacred choral works, which include a setting of the Prayers of St. Francis, the Litanies à la Vierge Noire de Rocamadour (1936), Salve Regina (1941), and Stabat Mater (1951), Poulenc gives free expression to a naturally religious temperament without falling into the banality of much religious music. The Gloria, commissioned by the Koussevitsky Foundation and first heard in Boston on Jan. 20, 1961, is not a Mass setting but, like the Vivaldi Gloria, a cantatalike work in several movements. Abounding in simplicity, humility, and joy, as well as in mystical sonorities, it places its composer among the masters of religious music. The Sept Répons des Ténèbres, commissioned by the New York Philharmonic for its opening season in Lincoln Center and first performed in April 1963, three months after Poulenc’s death, takes its place with the classic TENEBRAE settings in “an enticement of sound that is an act of faith in itself,” in the words of one commentator.

POULLART DES PLACES, CLAUDE FRANÇOIS

Founder of the Seminary and the Congregation of the Holy Ghost; b. Rennes, Brittany, France, Feb. 26, 1679; d. Paris, Oct. 2, 1709. He was educated at various Jesuit schools. Intellectually gifted, well-born and rich, Poullart des Places gave up his original plan to become a priest and studied law at Nantes and Paris. After obtaining his licentiate in law (1700), however, he made a serious retreat and decided to study for the priesthood at the Jesuit College of St. Louis-le-Grand, Paris. His attention was soon drawn to the many needy ecclesiastical students roaming the streets of Paris for food and lodgings, because the Tridentine type of seminary was still largely unknown in France. His charities to these students led him almost imperceptibly to the foundation of the Seminary of the Holy Ghost (May 27, 1703), in which he took care of their spiritual and material welfare, and provided for their solid training in ecclesiastical sciences. To secure the continuation of this work, the youthful founder associated carefully selected students with his work, thereby laying the foundation of the Congregation of the Holy Ghost. He was ordained in 1707, and died less than two years later.

POUNDE, THOMAS

Jesuit lay affiliate and confessor; b. Belmont, near Winchester, England, May 29, 1539; d. Belmont, March 5, 1615. Thomas was the elder son of William Pounce, wealthy country gentleman, and Anne Wriothesley, sister of Thomas, Earl of Southampton. Until c. 1562 he was educated at Winchester, then at Lincoln’s Inn, London. Thomas, admitted to Elizabeth’s court and appointed esquire of the body, outwardly remained a Protestant until, following a humiliation at court (c. 1569–70), he retired to Belmont and was reconciled to the Church. Four years of spiritual preparation followed: two as a hermit, two with Thomas Stephens. In 1574 while preparing to leave for Rome, he was arrested in London. According to Pounce’s own reckoning, over the succeeding 30 years there followed 15 imprisonments of varying lengths and in numerous prisons. During this time he was also fined £4,000 for recusancy. He was admitted to the Jesuits in 1579 by a letter from General Everard Mercurian that was smuggled to his prison cell in the Tower of London. His brief treatise “The Six Reasons” (1580), an attack on the scriptura sola position, was circulated in manuscript among English Catholics. In 1604 following James I’s accession, he was released and retired to the seclusion of his Belmont home until his death. His lengthy imprisonment may well be the longest for any English Catholic layman of the period.

POURRAT, PIERRE

Theologian; b. Millery (Rhône), France, Feb. 7, 1871; d. Lyons, March 12, 1957. He was one of six children of thoroughly Christian parents, farmers in modest circumstances, and at an early age felt called to the priesthood. He did his minor seminary work in Lyons, studied philosophy at Alix, and, after three years of theology at St. Irénée in Lyons, completed his course at Saint-Sulpice in Paris, where he was ordained Dec. 19, 1896. Most of his teaching work was in dogma at the major seminary in Lyons, where from 1908 to 1926 he was rector and also a vicar-general of the archdiocese. In 1926 he was named superior of the Solitude, the quasi novitiate of Saint-Sulpice at Issy-les-Moulineaux. He held this post until 1945, when for reasons of health he returned to Lyons, where he spent an active retirement at the university seminary. His first major work, Théologie sacramentaire, published in 1907 (tr. Theology of the Sacraments [4th ed. St. Louis 1930]), grew in part out of the need he felt to refute the modernism of the day. From 1917 to 1928 he labored on the four volumes of his pioneering work La Spiritualité chrétienne (tr. Christian Spirituality, 4 v. [Westminster, Md. 1953–55]), a concise and critically sound history of spirituality from biblical to modern times.

POUSSEPIN, MARIE, BL.

Foundress of Dominican Sisters of the Presentation; b. Oct. 14, 1653 near Chartres in the village of Dourdan, France; d. in Sainville, France, Jan. 24, 1744.

Marie's well-to-do middle class parents, Claude and Julienne Fourier, were hosiers and actively engaged in the local parish and in the Confraternity of Charity dedicated to works of mercy. When her mother died in 1675, Marie assumed responsibility for looking after her younger brother and rescued the family business from bankruptcy by expanding into the manufacture of woolen stockings and introducing the latest advances in looms. She also revolutionized the work place by abolishing the customary apprenticeship fee. In addition Marie was generous to the young employees, rewarding them with bonuses and offering them opportunities for advancement.

Sometime after 1690 she joined the Third Order of St. Dominic, and in 1696 she moved to Sainville, where she gathered a community of women to serve in the local parish, educating girls and ministering to the sick and poor of the area. Marie placed her sisters under the protection of Mary in the mystery of her Presentation in the Temple. They took simple vows, living according to the rule of the Third Order of St. Dominic, and they dedicated themselves to apostolic work at a time when most women religious lived a cloistered life.

When Marie died at the age of 90, the community had established 20 houses in northern France. Her tombstone bears the simple inscription: "She saw what was good in the eyes of God and accomplished it." Pope John Paul II beatified her Nov. 24, 1994.

Feast: Oct. 14 (the anniversary of her baptism).

POVEDA CASTROVERDE, PEDRO, BL.

Priest, martyr, scholar, founder of the Teresian Institute, and Carmelite tertiary; b. Linares, Spain, Dec. 3, 1874; d. Madrid, Spain, July 28, 1936. Although Pedro desired to become a priest, his family experienced financial difficulties, and he lacked the means to continue his studies at the diocesan seminary at Jaen. Fortunately he was offered a scholarship by the bishop of Guadix to attend his seminary in southern Spain. Following his ordination in 1897, Father Poveda taught in that seminary. In 1900, he earned his licentiate in theology at Seville, then worked in Guadix and Madrid. In 1906, he was appointed canon of the Basilica of Covadonga in Asturias. He returned to his first seminary at Jaen to again teach theology.

Throughout his adult life, Poveda's primary apostolate was education. He built an elementary school and started workshops for the cave-dwellers of Guadix. In 1911, he founded Saint Teresa of Avila Academy as a residence for students that became the basis for the Teresian Institute, an organization dedicated to the formation of teachers. It received diocesan and civil approval in Jaen, then Vatican approbation in 1924. Additionally, Poveda initiated pedagogical centers, opened the first university residence for women in Madrid (1914), and served as the spiritual director of Los Operarios Catechetical Center. He also continued to take an active role in teacher formation. He published articles and pamphlets and founded several periodicals to advance pedagogy in Spain.

After moving back to Madrid (1921), Poveda was appointed chaplain to the Royal Palace and sat on the Central Board Against Illiteracy. He continued to guide the growth of the Teresian Institute as it spread to Chile and Italy (1934) until he was killed at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War. He was beatified on Oct. 10, 1993 by Pope John Paul II.

Feast: July 28.

POVERTY

The Church's long history with poverty and the poor originated with Jesus' preferential treatment of the marginalized in society. Poverty became glorified as Jesus' regard for the poor was identified with the renunciation of personal property, a state considered to be a divinely intended way of life. The glorification of poverty also emanated from the works of the Eastern Fathers of the Church and the Eastern monastic traditions. A different view of the Christian life highlighted the role of charity, which requires both a donor and a recipient. In such a view, the role of the poor beneficiary is foreordained. The "Life of Saint Eligius" explains that God made the poor in order to give the rich an opportunity for redemption. While they were clearly the objects of the Church's concern, the poor were encouraged to accept their lot with humility.

After the glorification of poverty peaked with the rise of the MENDICANT ORDERS in the 12th and 13th centuries, a combination of human and natural upheavals significantly increased the number of those relying on charity. By the 14th century, poverty was linked with social disintegration and was regarded much more dimly. At the same time, the efficiency with which charitable institutions handled poverty came into question. In the 16th century the Catholic Church was challenged for its role in glorifying and thus spreading the social problem of poverty, even though throughout the Middle Ages Church policy clearly made the distinction between those who were poor due to an inability to work and the condemned state of vagrancy. In an effort at renewal, the Council of Trent called for an even greater charitable role for the Church as well as an attempt to reorganize the charitable systems for greater effectiveness. The Church struggled through the following centuries to maintain its relationship with the poor against the advancing claims of modernity that strove to place social responsibility completely in secular hands. Throughout the 16th and 17th centuries Rome, like most large urban areas, followed a policy of segregating the poor, particularly those able but unwilling to work. During the 18th and 19th centuries much attention was given to understanding the causes and the likely outcome of poverty. While some still contended that poverty is inevitable, advocates of socialism linked it to the after-effects of the labor-market economy. Others blamed it on laziness or addiction. In the 20th century an increasing number of theorists began to look to societal structures that limited the economic and general development of people.

The contemporary relationship between the Church and poverty should begin with the definition of terms. In the case of poverty difficulties arise. Extensive research has not produced a commonly agreed upon definition. Following on this point is the fact that the line at which one is poor also lacks clear distinction. The level of means generally considered adequate for existence in one population may fall well below tolerable conditions in another. Poverty and its definable boundaries have been linked to income-level relative to a percentage of national productivity. Poverty has been connected with dietary requirements, and it has been associated with the availability of the adequate necessities for survival. No one form of measurement has proven universally adaptable. Another concern with poverty research is that much of it is performed to support various social policies, not all of which are intended to alleviate the suffering of the poor. Social scientists have even gone so far as studying the utility value of the poor for the non-poor; the presence of poor people willing to perform undesirable tasks for very low wages frees the wealthy for other, more rewarding, endeavors.

Defining poverty as a lack of something sets it up as a conflict issue, a cause of strife and upheaval. It requires the transfer of whatever is lacking from those who have to those who do not. Theorists who insist that the economy need not be considered a zero-growth system challenge this view. Noting that the beginning of the modern era found the majority of the world's population poor by most standards, these thinkers suggest that more attention should be given to those who advanced from poor to non-poor and the path they followed. While many people benefitted in this way, certain demographic sectors of nearly every nation have not. Children, women, minorities, and the elderly continue to lag behind in sharing the benefits of growing economies. Changing trends in the societal value of children has affected both the children and their mothers. When children are not viewed as assets, neither is the maternal labor directed toward caring for them. This female labor-value stigma carries into the workplace where women, regardless of parental status, have been chronically paid lower wages for the same work as men. Equally vulnerable minority sectors of society have faced similar labor-value perceptions that are only overcome against great resistance. When a culture sets its value standards relative to economic productivity, the elderly are also drawn into the web of poverty, often in spite of their former contribution to the overall growth of the economy.

Most recent Church statements and positions on poverty set their foundation on the groundbreaking 1891 encyclical of Pope LEO XIII entitled RERUM NOVARUM. Leo attempted to counteract socialist efforts to usurp personal freedom. The socialist system called for the transfer of responsibility for human productivity to the state in the name of protecting the working poor. Leo was also interested in reversing the recurrent view that the poor endangered society. The focal point of this issue was the right to possess private property. Leo advocated a more equal distribution of goods that is voluntary yet encouraged and expected, while he maintained a strong position on the rights of individuals to hold private property. Rerum novarum set the tone for future Church statements that refuse to accept poverty as the inevitable condition of a portion of society. Forty years later, Pope PIUS XI reaffirmed Rerum novarum with the release of QUADRAGESIMO ANNO. The Great Depression had wiped away any lingering notion that poverty was a localized concern or that it was the lot of the lazy and weak. Pius advocated the use of capital to expand employment opportunities, and he called for a just wage that would allow for the eventual accumulation of wealth by the average working person. Pius was also a pioneering supporter of profit sharing.

Recent popes have promoted various economic activities in the hope of advancing the development of all people. Noting the unequal social and economic development in different parts of the world, Pope JOHN XXIII insisted, in his 1961 encyclical MATER ET MAGISTRA, that wealthy nations should assist under-developed nations in achieving similar levels of growth with a hoped-for ensuring equitable distribution. The encyclical also supports social insurance systems to reduce class imbalances. John related the security provided by such social insurance programs to appropriate human development in his later encyclical, PACEM IN TERRIS. From this point poverty is clearly considered a limitation to human development, and its effects are expanded to include cultural deprivation. Language emphasizing the development and advancement of the human person is prevalent in the Second Vatican Council's Gaudium et spes. Calling for an end to "excessive economic and social differences," the council was concerned with structures that limit human freedom. The council supported the right to private property, but emphasized that this must be held along with the conviction that the goods of the earth are ultimately intended for the COMMON GOOD of all. Recognizing that the solution to poverty was not yet at hand, Pope PAUL VI, in POPULORUM PROGRESSIO, called upon people of intellectual capacity and social status to continue seeking answers to the problem of poverty. He appealed for the collaboration of governmental and non-governmental organizations to influence economic and trade initiatives that would positively affect the international poverty gap. The encyclical SOLLICITUDO REI SOCIALIS, released by Pope JOHN PAUL II in 1987, draws attention to certain governmental programs, arms-related in particular, that channel money away from opportunities to advance more just development. Concerned with equally dangerous threats to human development and to the human soul, John Paul challenges radical consumerism by noting the tension between “being” and “having.” Some have so little that their ability to be is impoverished, and some have so much that their ability to be is also impoverished.

With the demise of communism in the former Soviet Union and Eastern Europe, consumerism took center stage as a magnet to the poor and non-poor alike. John Paul recognized this situation when he recalled the 100-year anniversary of Rerum novarum in his 1991 encyclical CENTESIMUS ANNUS. While following the growth model of the non-poor allowed many of the previously-poor to share in some of the benefits of economic prosperity, a noticeable rise in the quality of life has been absent. Asserting that consumption does not directly equate to increased satisfaction, John Paul claimed that every economic decision must be made as a moral decision considering the enhancement of human integrity, the improved quality of life for those directly and indirectly affected by the decision, and the ecological ramifications. Based on these precedents, future efforts of the Church to confront poverty will be directed toward the overall advancement of the human person through a continuous struggle to justly embrace the many gifts God has bestowed for that purpose.

POVERTY, RELIGIOUS

The majority of people in the world today live in material POVERTY or destitution. Worse still is their inability to shape their own futures, with the result that they often experience a sense of fatalism and a loss of hope. Men and women throughout the world have paid a high price for the present affluence of many in our Western technological society. Part of the price has been extracted from the poor nations whose fields, forests, and factories have been exploited so that commodities may be produced for the rich in the world. Part too has been paid by the poor who in fact live and work within the wealthy countries but without sharing equitably in the profits. A great part has been paid by affluent people themselves, for they have purchased prosperity at the expense of a staggering impoverishment of their own humanity.

CONVERSION and change must begin in the hearts and life-style of the consumers. Not only must the poor be delivered from their poverty; modern men and women, and especially Christians, must allow themselves to be liberated from the oppression that comes from an acquisitive, consumerist mentality. The social and economic conditions of millions of poor people in the world are issuing a call from God to the wealthy and comfortable to be freed from the economic and political assumptions about affluence and power which shackle their own freedom as well as that of the destitute. There is no ultimate liberation of the poor from their destitution except through the deliverance of the wealthy from their blindness and greed. The Christian response to the situation must involve generous service to the destitute in terms of the caring love outlined in the twenty-fifth chapter of Saint Matthew’s Gospel. It involves a willingness to share with others, rooted in gratitude to God who is the ultimate source of all good gifts. It implies an acknowledgment that goods are to be owned personally only if they are held in trust for the service of those in need.

The Christian response also involves just decision-making which realizes that efficacious charity must be rooted in justice. The enemy of justice today is often not malice or lack of good will but rather blindness and lack of vision. Poverty today requires that Christians reflect on their actual positions in society as persons and communities so that contemplation might free them from their blindness by revealing the truth of the situation and then call them to make radical decisions.

Finally there must be the response of witness through life-style, following the example of Christ’s simplicity and detachment. This has always been the Church’s clearest proclamation of the nature of ownership and of its essentially communal character. It also has revealed the reverence that human beings must have for created things which are more truly God’s gifts than human achievements. At a time when many people are uninterested in or insensitive to theoretical teaching, they are keenly alert to detect what difference Christianity makes in the lives of those who profess it. Furthermore, many people in the world in fact yearn to be liberated from the sophisticated, domineering, and alienating consumer mentality which characterizes our technological culture. To that yearning, the life of Christians who espouse simplicity and a commitment to responsible stewardship can be a significant response.

Poverty in the Bible. In the Bible there is a development in the understanding of poverty, which is described both as that unavoidable distress which opens a person to God and as the humble, loving abandonment of one's own rights. Hence it is not simply an economic or social condition but also an interior disposition.

Initially the Old Testament writers usually represented wealth as a blessing, whereas poverty was a misfortune to be borne, often as a manifestation of divine retribution. The sapiential writers recognized that there were virtuous poor people, but experience taught them that destitution was often the result of laziness or disorder.

The prophets defended the poor who were often the victims of injustice. They denounced violence and robbery, fraud in trading, abuse of power, and enslavement of the lowly. The prophets echoed the Mosaic law which prescribed charitable attitudes and social measures to lessen the sufferings of the needy, for God had identified with the unfortunate people on the margins and shown compassion toward the poor. The prophets also proclaimed a Messiah who would defend the rights of the poor and destitute.

Even before the Exile the prophets had helped the Israelites to realize that the rich are apt to harden their hearts to the distress of others, to enclose themselves in self-righteousness, and to exploit the underprivileged. But in light of the humiliating experience of servitude in Babylon and the many disappointments after their return from exile, the Israelites were helped by the prophets and other sacred writers to understand poverty as a religious value, more or less synonymous with humility and piety. They came to see it as a virtue which enables people to find refuge in God and to await God's coming with trust.

The religious meaning of poverty was clarified with the incarnation of the divine Logos whose life of self-sacrifice and self-denial revealed God as one who always lives for giving. The incarnation was both a sacrament of God's love for us and an example for us to follow. In his inaugural discourse Jesus taught that the poor were the privileged heirs of the Kingdom he proclaimed. As the Messiah of the poor, he lived a life of simplicity and invited the weary and the burdened to come to him as their meek and humble savior. He sharply criticized the idolatries of power, pleasure, and possessions not by violently attacking them but by identifying himself with the materially or morally indigent, by sharing his life with all who came to him, and by inviting his followers to trust his Father who knows their needs. He promised salvation to all those who trusted him in time of hunger, but the food he promised was the Kingdom. He proclaimed that with him and in him the KINGDOM OF GOD had arrived, and that with the coming of the Kingdom men and women are placed in a situation in which they must make radical de-isions about their lives. Jesus clearly affirmed that with the advent of the Kingdom human riches have become a danger and an obstacle to the acceptance of God's reign in human hearts, to such an extent that it is easier for a person to pass through the eye of a needle than for a rich person to enter the Kingdom of God.

The New Testament does not teach that possessions are immoral in themselves or that the absence of possessions constitutes a moral value. What it does say is that riches and the accumulation of possessions constitute a grave danger for people in that once they have become preoccupied with the cares of this world they tend to become blind to the presence of God's Kingdom, deaf to the cries of the poor, and unresponsive to the call to live according to the gospel. The person attached to riches does not have that spirit of freedom which is necessary for a whole-hearted acceptance of God's reign in human life. Hence Jesus requires that his disciples share their possessions with the poor and be prepared to become poor themselves. He did not commend poverty out of contempt for wealth or for purely ascetical reasons but because it helps men and women acknowledge their ultimate dependence and enables them to be open to the needs of others. In his teaching on discipleship Jesus requires that those who voluntarily decide to become poor for the Kingdom must give their riches to the poor who are brothers and sisters in the Kingdom. When faith in the Kingdom is lived out in the form of voluntary poverty, this faith must be expressed by the unity in love of all those who are united in the Body of Christ. Hence those who have faith do not defend their material goods as though they were the bastion of their own self-defense against others; rather they give others a share in their goods because they can look upon others in a spirit of trust and can love them as members of the Body of Christ. Hence the acknowledgment that all people have a right to the riches of God's creation is an intrinsic element in Christian poverty. Holding property in common is an expression of the community of all people in Christ.

The early Christian community had a clear understanding of the spirit of Jesus' teaching on poverty. They knew that a literal application of his teaching was neither essential nor always possible. They knew that Jesus himself did not live in destitution nor was he usually threatened by hunger. He was able to obtain support from his wealthy friends when he needed it. His lavish generosity at Cana and his sharing in the feast in Matthew's house suggest a spirit of MAGNANIMITY far distant from any puritanical condemnation of the enjoyment of good things. Yet he was radically free and detached in his use of goods because of his primary commitment to his mission. Likewise, Paul had a budget for his missionary and charitable work, but he often preached the gospel without any recompense and sometimes lived in want and distress. The early Christians shared what they had with each other and with those in need. Service rendered to the poor was an expression of their love for Christ, who being rich became poor for our sake, so that he might enrich us by his poverty.

Poverty and the Christian Tradition. The birth of MONASTICISM in about 270 in Egypt, Palestine, and Syria was partly an attempt to reassert the call to poverty. Antony heard the gospel call to the rich young man and then sold all that he had and entered the desert. The DESERT FATHERS and mothers realized that poverty in the material sense can never be permanently total, for men and women must eat, have shelter, and be clothed. Hence the first monastic men and women of the desert worked and received money with which they provided for their basic needs. While Antony was still alive, Pachomius established communities of monks who modeled themselves on the early Christians, with all things held in common and supported by their own work done under obedience.

In his Dialogues Saint Gregory says that Saint BENEDICT left all his possessions with the desire of pleasing God alone. It is within Benedict's Rule that we find the nucleus of the medieval monastic tradition on poverty. Benedict never uses the word "poor" or the abstract noun "poverty" when speaking of his monks. He directs that his disciples should have no other goal than to seek God. They are to give away all they possess; hence they are to be protected from all personal attachment. After profession the monk is unable to possess anything of his own; he shares everything with the community. Moderation is characteristic of the rule, yet Saint Benedict is adamant that possessions must be renounced. The monastery may possess goods, but the abbot is not to be oversolicitous for material possessions. The produce of the monastery is to be sold a little cheaper than it is sold by others in the world so that in all things God may be glorified. Saint Benedict was conscious that the monastery must share its goods with the poor, the sick, and the stranger. He feared avarice in his monks but prescribed that they should receive what they needed from the resources of the monastery. Throughout history the basic Benedictine attitude toward material goods has been that of stewardship. This tradition is in keeping with the second chapter of Genesis in which God places man in the garden of Eden not as a master but as a steward. In this regard Benedictines have something to say to men and women in the modern world. By establishing the right order of relationships between people and nature, among men and women themselves, and between men and women and God, Saint Benedict established the primacy of persons over things, and at the same time he saw the importance of respect for material things and an ordered and humane environment in helping his monks develop as persons whose whole life is directed to the glorification of God. However, there is the serious problem that a commitment to simplicity of life, celibacy, and obedience, when allied with hard work, can in the course of time make for corporate wealth simply because monks have limited needs and no families to consume the fruit of their labors. This is precisely what happened throughout the Middle Ages, for the principal dissolvent of monastic fervor was the possessiveness of both individuals and communities, including abbots. The urgent question was raised: Who would stand for God against Mammon?

The answer came from Saint FRANCIS OF ASSISI. He consciously and explicitly reacted against the monastic rules and constitutions in regard to their teaching on poverty. Akin to Antony and Macarius rather than Cassian and Benedict, he took the words of Christ literally and lived them. His was a direct and absolute imitation of Jesus, not as Jesus lived in Galilee or at Bethany, but as he died on the cross, with even his clothes appropriated by others. Francis stood not only for a literal interpretation of the poverty of Jesus but also for a sense of freedom which he could only describe by a romantic name, Lady Poverty. He felt that the most sordid enemy of this freedom was money, which he saw as a token of possession and security against the future. However, the early history of the Friars Minor gives sad evidence of the perpetual problem of embodying a spirit, a difficulty which was made visible in the case of Franciscan poverty because human beings, as embodied spirits, cannot fully divest themselves of the material world by taking a vow or joining a community. It was Saint BONAVENTURE who found a mean between the commands of Francis and the conditions of human life by establishing principles close to those in the Rule of Benedict. A serious dispute over the interpretation of Franciscan poverty resulted in a theological controversy of great bitterness which was finally ended by Pope John XXII, who insisted that even Christ and his apostles had a true right to own property; he handed back to the Franciscans the ownership of property of which they had been deprived.

The early Franciscans stood apart from the other orders of friars both in their interpretation of poverty as the center of their religious lives and in the various controversies which this brought upon them. The Dominicans, though standing for an austere life and accepting a mendicant status, interpreted poverty in line with the teaching of Saint THOMAS AQUINAS, who emphasized that the essence of the virtue of poverty was interior detachment. The use or even the ownership of goods was not illicit for Christians or even for religious communities, provided they observed the prescriptions of canon law in financial matters.

A review of the whole of monastic and medieval spirituality suggests that poverty is not the best word to describe a spiritual ideal. It was not the word used by patristic or monastic spiritual writers; nevertheless it found its way into the vow patterns of religious institutes from the late Middle Ages until the present time. The 1983 Code of Canon Law describes the vow of poverty in canon 600 which reminds those who take the vow that they are meant to imitate Christ and commit themselves to a life that is poor in fact as well as in spirit. They are obliged to work in accord with the nature and ends of the institute to which they belong and to live in dependence on the institute. This is not the poverty of destitution experienced by countless people who are deprived of the basic necessities of life and which Christ and the Church strive to eliminate. Unlike the vow of chastity, which is absolute, that of poverty admits of a wide variety of expressions in accord with the nature, spirit, and purpose of each institute. Hence the effects and obligations of a vow of poverty may differ widely from one religious institute to another. The various apostolates undertaken by religious and their institutes witness to the dignity of human work and the life of service to which religious are called. In addition to the traditional apostolates of education, social services, and health care, work in other areas is frequently undertaken by members of religious institutes to alleviate hunger, ignorance, sickness, unemployment, and the deprivation of basic human freedoms. Often from their own resources they provide for those in such circumstances.

At the heart of all religious life are values that directly oppose blindness, materialism, greed, and the structures that dehumanize persons and communities. These values are above all poverty of spirit, simplicity of life, sharing and giving, self-denial prompted by love, freedom of heart, gratitude, care for persons, and the kind of sound judgment with regard to created things that proceeds from exposure to God in prayer. Material privation is never an end in itself, and it is in no sense a part of religious poverty to assess everything economically by materialistic standards or to override aesthetic or other values for the sake of cheapness or squalor. Such a mentality narrows the human spirit and even creates those very evils accompanying destitution, which all Christians have the duty to eliminate from the earth. A life of simplicity, stewardship, and sharing of goods can surely help to counteract those forces that lie at the roots of world poverty today.

POVERTY CONTROVERSY

A term denoting a series of disputes over the nature and practice of poverty. Beside the mendicant controversy (1252–72) between the professors at the University of Paris and the friars over the issue of poverty and the sacred ministry (poverty controversy in the less strict sense), two further instances can be distinguished:

(1) First there was the practical controversy among Franciscans regarding the extent of the obligation of poverty under their vow. Whereas generally the community sought certain mitigations of the rule and adaptation to other orders, the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS, influenced by Joachimite doctrines (see JOACHIM OF FIORE), rejected papal interpretations of the rule and declared the life and the last will of the founder to be binding and poverty to be the summit of perfection. NICHOLAS III (Exiit qui seminar, 1279) and CLEMENT V (Exivi de paradise, 1312) were unable to achieve unity in the matter. Thereupon JOHN XXII (Quorundam exigit, 1317) censured the Spirituals, had four of them burned as heretics, and ordered other recalcitrants, later called FRATICELLI, to be prosecuted by the INQUISITION.

(2) There was further theoretical controversy between DOMINICANS and FRANCISCANS over poverty and its relation to evangelical perfection. In 1321 the Dominican John of Belna rejected the opinion that Christ and the Apostles had possessed nothing, either in common or individually, and that the highest perfection consisted in extreme poverty. Against John of Belna, the Franciscans appealed to the pope. But since John XXII tended toward the Dominican opinion, the general chapter of Perugia 1322 solemnly proclaimed that Nicholas III in Exiit had defined the doctrine concerning the poverty of Christ and the Apostles as an article of faith, a teaching that was now doubted by the pope. Angered by the chapter's action, John (Ad conditorem canonum, 1322) rejected the papal title to Franciscan property and forbade the friars to elect a procurator in the future. He then declared (Cum inter nonnullos, 1323) that the opinion on the poverty of Christ was heretical. The general of the order, MICHAEL OF CESENA, together with Bonagratia and WILLIAM OF OCKHAM, joined the excommunicated Emperor Louis IV the Bavarian, who also, in the appeal of Sachsenhausen (1324), had rejected the papal decision as heretical. Cesena's successor, Geraldus Odonis, however, personally and in the name of the order, submitted to the pope, and apparently all the Michaelists were reconciled with the Church before their death. As a result of these disputes, devotion to the ideals of the order suffered a severe temporary decline.

POVERTY MOVEMENT

A trend among various classes and groups in the Middle Ages, identified by their adherence to the ideal of radical evangelical poverty. A more profound understanding of the religious life, as it had been awakened by the GREGORIAN REFORM (HUMBERT OF SILVA CANDIDA, PATARINES, GREGORY VII), inspired a striving for personal sanctification. The Crusades, in bringing the monasticism of the East into contact with the West, presented a concrete picture of the poverty that Christ and the Apostles encountered in their pastoral life (Lk 9.1–6), leading to a more vigorous reading of Holy Scripture and to an imitation by “Christ's poor”; of the vita apostolica which contrasted sharply with the monastic poverty of Cluny. Even after dualistic doctrines, under the influence of the BOGOMILS, were gradually accepted, the controversy still centered around the religious life and the Church, and as a result, the poverty movement often stood in opposition to the Church and was suppressed.

Problem for the Church. Until the 11th century, ecclesiastical discipline recognized religious life exclusively as the life of a religious order and distinguished between an order of the priesthood, whose function was the administration of the Sacraments and preaching, and an order of religious vocation, which consisted in striving for personal sanctification. Since, however, the poverty movement, as promoted by preachers and justified by reference to Mark 16.15, belonged to neither of these two “orders”; it was rejected as spurious religiosity and was referred to as religio simulata and as heresy without any indication at least in the beginning of any specific heretical teachings. In contrast to earlier sects, the movement had no definite founder. While its members might be called rustici, idiotae, illitterati, or textores, only the distinction between them and scholars (docti, litterati, sapientes, clerici) was underscored and nothing was said about their social origin, for members were recruited from amongst the nobles and the commoners, and might be clerics, monks, nuns, or laity who followed the profession of weavers only to earn a living in the manner of Saint Paul (Acts 18.9). Furthermore, the Church was scandalized because women belonged to the poverty movement, by virtue of 1 Cor 9.5. The membership were accused of sexual excesses, even though they were called boni homines by the people and no wrongdoings could be proved against them.

The Church's Position. The stand taken by bishops and popes was both inconsistent and vague, and there were no unified standards by which heresy could be judged. Heretics were recognized by ORDEAL or else bishops and popes hesitated inconclusively until the suspected “heretics” generally became victims of lynch justice. BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX (Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 183:1101–02) was the first to call for the continuance of the traditional procedure for determination of heresy: to protect their good name and to allow them to fulfill their vows; to require men and women of the poverty movement to be placed in separate monastic communities; and to consider those who refused to comply to be guilty of heresy. Bernard's view soon became the official policy of the Church and, since at the time there were no definite canonical norms for determining heresy, only the heretics of southern France were punished by the Third LATERAN COUNCIL in 1179. However, when the WALDENSES and HUMILIATI, themselves enemies of the CATHARI, asked the council, because of their difficulties with the bishops, for permission to live the life of wandering mendicants, the pope and the council reverted to their former position and, without even examining their writings for orthodoxy, practically forbade them to preach. Finally, a fundamental norm was agreed upon by LUCIUS III and FREDERICK I BARBAROSSA at Verona in 1184: unauthorized preaching, disbelief in the Sacraments, and the express declaration of a bishop were to be accepted as evidence of heresy, and the suppression of such became the duty of the bishops. INNOCENT III was the first to use these new powers to the Church's advantage and permitted members of the movement to adopt apostolic poverty and to preach as long as they recognized the hierarchy and the Sacraments of the Church. It was thus possible for him to receive back into the Church the Humiliati (1210) and individual groups of Waldenses, and above all the Poor Catholics of Durandus of Huesca (1208) and the Society of Bernard Prim (1210). Although the Fourth Lateran Council condemned the use of ordeals for determining heresy, it established, as a criterion, a confession of faith (Firmiter credimus Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 206) and called for Church reform, but it also issued penal laws against recalcitrant heretics and made it compulsory for new orders to adopt already existing rules (Ne nimia Conciliorum oecumenicorum decreta 218), i.e., it attempted to force upon the pope the former position of the Church.

Relation to the Church. The development of this phenomenon is discernible in three distinct categories: (1) various heretical sects; (2) the older orders; (3) the new orders.

Heretical Groups. These also may be categorized as three types: the dualists, the spiritualists, and the antihierarchical group. (1) The dualists appeared among the heretical Cathari (ALBIGENSES), who taught either strict (Church of Dragovitsa) or moderate (Old Bulgarian) dualism. Since the movement's teaching on dualism was not completely formulated until 1270, its emphasis on the relationship to the world took precedence; poverty was considered the means to renunciation of the world. Furthermore, the Luciferians, who shared this dualism, demanded extreme renunciation and the rejection of marriage. (2) The spiritualists were individuals whose Catharist ideas were bound to those of JOACHIM OF FIORE: poverty was practiced as a protest against the possessions of the Church. The Franciscan Gerard of Borgo S. Donnino put forth the opinion in the Introductorius in evangelium aeternum (1254) that the promised spiritual Church, as realized in the Franciscan Order, would replace the established Church of the priests; in this regard, he was followed more or less by the FRANCISCAN SPIRITUALS and the FRATICELLI. The AMALRICIANS, who interpreted the pantheistic teachings of AMALRIC OF BÈNE as "rules of life," and combined them with Joachimite ideas, also rejected the sacramental Church. In about 1250 their teachings were continued by the BROTHERS AND SISTERS OF THE FREE SPIRIT, who spread in the region of the Swabian Ries and along the Rhine (Cologne, Strasbourg, Basel). In this group were also the APOSTOLICI, founded by Segarelli of Parma (burned 1300) and his successor Fra DOLCINO (burned 1307), who were originally similar to the Franciscans, but after 1285 were prosecuted by the Church for having denounced it as the "whore of Babylon"; (3) To the antihierarchical group belonged the unreconciled Waldenses and the rebellious Stedingers, who, following the Waldensian tenets, rejected the tithe and fought with the archbishop of Bremen; they were crushed after FREDERICK II placed them under the ban of the empire in 1253 and after a crusade was preached against them.

The Older Orders. (1) All Catholic wandering preachers, both men and women, cooperated with the work of the Church and, as Bernard of Clairvaux had proposed, fostered their ideal of poverty in separate monasteries (e.g., ROBERT OF ARBRISSEL at FONTÉVRAULT, NORBERT OF XANTEN at PRÉMONTRÉ, VITALIS OF SAVIGNY, and BERNARD OF TIRON). The exception was HENRY OF LAUSANNE, who consequently broke with the Church and was imprisoned in 1134. (2) Apostolic poverty led to the establishment of the Order of GRANDMONT, founded by STEPHAN OF MURET, whose members followed the BENEDICTINE RULE and were popularly called the boni homines. Poverty as an ideal prompted the founding also of the CISTERCIANS by ROBERT OF MOLESMES and Bernard of Clairvaux, who in his controversy with CLUNY (Patrologia Latina 182:895–918) proposed his interpretation of Benedictine poverty: the Cistercian nuns were chiefly women of the movement. (3) To the lay poverty movement were affiliated various HOSPITALLERS, male and female, among them the lay society of Saint Anthony, approved by Urban II in 1095 for the staffing of a hospital at Saint-Didier de la Mothe. Originally living without vows and unified by their interest in nursing, they eventually professed the Rule of Saint AUGUSTINE (1218) as prescribed by the Fourth LATERAN COUNCIL. The same development accounted for the Bridge-building brotherhood of BÉNÉZET of Avignon (117–99), approved by Clement III in 1189 as a pious lay society with the purpose of building bridges. In the category of the lay poverty movement belonged also the BEGUINES, who, as a society of women living by their own handiwork, were organized into communities by JACQUES DE VITRY with the approval of Honorius III; under the direction of MARY OF OIGNIES, they accepted mendicant poverty; their male counterparts were the Beghards. Since the Beguines were technically neither religious nor seculars, they were often accused of heresy, and in 1274 the Second Council of LYONS attempted to suppress them; they generally then became associated with the various Third Orders in the Church.

New Orders. (1) FRANCISCANS (Friars Minor, Poor Clares, Brothers and Sisters of Penance). Innocent III had previously approved only those dissenters who had sought reconciliation, but by his oral approbation of the rule of the Friars Minor (1209 or 1210), he established the first new order to emerge from the movement. For FRANCIS OF ASSISI poverty was the bride of Christ whom he personified as Lady Poverty. Contrary to the Fourth Lateran Council's ban on new orders, Innocent III granted CLARE OF ASSISI the privilegium paupertatis, and Honorius III gave written approval to the rule of the Friars Minor in 1223, while Cardinal Hugolino (GREGORY IX) vitalized the Third Order of Saint Francis in 1221. (2) DOMINICANS. By preaching against heresy, DOMINIC came to found his order and adopted mendicant poverty as a prerequisite for a successful preaching crusade. After the Fourth Lateran Council had prohibited the founding of new orders, he chose, as a former canon, the Rule of Saint Augustine, to which he added special constitutions. (3) The CARMELITES, a previously existing order, adopted mendicant poverty in 1245 and, after changes in the rule (1247), founded also a third order. (4) The Hermits of Saint Augustine (AUGUSTINIANS), who also later founded a third order, came into existence when Innocent IV (1243) united various groups of hermits living in Tuscany, to which Alexander IV (1256) added all other hermits who professed the Rule of Saint Augustine, creating the fourth mendicant order. In the poverty controversy at the University of PARIS (1252–72), the antimendicant party wished the Church to return to its traditional position on poverty as held in the days before Innocent III. A similar attempt at the Council of Lyons (1274) was averted by the Franciscan Cardinal BONAVENTURE.

Modern Poverty Movements. Various poverty movements continue to persist in the poverty-based religious orders that have retained their identity and spirit. Additional claimants to this tradition may be added. Not motivated as heavily by the pursuit of spiritual perfection in the imitation of Christ, more modern movements have used poverty as a basis for transformative action in the world. Exemplifying the spirit of poverty in action are members of the Catholic Worker Movement, founded by Dorothy DAY and Peter MAURIN, and the practitioners of liberation theology. The Catholic Worker Movement formed in an effort to raise the dignity of the working poor and the underemployed in urban settings, as well as to bring attention to the plight of these sufferers. Liberation theology, based on the preferential option for the poor, seeks to highlight and reconstitute social and political structures that create conditions of injustice, predominantly in so-called third-world countries, for the most vulnerable, the poor. A tenet held by many liberation theologians is that one must be amongst the poor in order to stand with and for the poor.

The worker-priest movement in France involved ordained clergy and associated laypersons locating themselves completely within the social conditions of their industrially impoverished, urban, working parishioners. Poverty, as it is integrated with an active presence in the world, not only frees the practitioner to concentrate on the mission; it also makes a visible entreaty for the right of the most vulnerable to participate in the world. The Little Brothers and the Little Sisters of Jesus introduced this latter effort into their way of life, on the inspiration of Charles De FOUCAULD. These movements employed the "sign-value of poverty" to pre-evangelize the poor. The mere presence of those willing to embrace the lot of the poor in the name of Jesus opens a channel for the Good News to reach and transform the lives of the most marginalized in society. In a world economy increasingly dependent on consumerism, it should not be surprising to see the increasing use of the "sign-value of poverty" as a counter-balance to a possession-centered lifestyle.

POWEL, PHILIP, BL.

Benedictine priest and martyr; alias Morgan, Prosser; b. Trallong, Breconshire, Feb. 2, 1594; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Tyburn (London), June 30, 1646. After completing grammar school at Abergavenny, Powel, son of Roger and Catherine Powel, became a law student at the Temple, London. There he fell under the influence of David Baker, who later became the Benedictine Augustine Baker. Philip joined the Benedictines (1614) at St. Gregory's and was ordained in Douai (1618). In 1622 he returned to the English mission where he labored for 20 years in Somersetshire and Devonshire. During the Civil War he was chaplain to the Catholic soldiers in General Goring's army in Cornwall. When the force was disbanded, he set sail for Wales, but the ship was captured, Feb. 22, 1646. Powel was recognized as a priest, arrested, taken to London, and imprisoned at St. Catherine's in Southwark. Following torture, he suffered from pleurisy. He was tried at Westminster Hall, June 9, convicted, and condemned. His mortal remains were buried in the old churchyard at Moorfields and some of his relics are preserved at Downside Abbey, Bath. He was beatified by Pius XI on Dec. 15, 1929.

POWELL, EDWARD, BL.

Theologian, priest, and martyr; b. Wales, c. 1478; d. hanged, drawn, and quartered at Smithfield (London), July 30, 1540. Powell, a fellow of Oriel College, Oxford (1495), earned his master's and doctorate in theology (1506) at Oxon. He was sometime rector of Bleadon, Somerset, and held a number of prebends.

King Henry VIII, who regarded Powell highly, ordered the priest to publish a reply to Martin LUTHER. This took the form of a dialogue in three books entitled Propugnaculum summi Sacerdotii Evangelici, ac septem Sacramentorum, aeditum per virum eruditum, sacrarum literarum professorem Edoardum Poelum adversus Maratinum Lutherum fratrem famosum et Wiclifistan insignem (London 1523), which won praise from the University of Oxford.

Powell was among those theologians selected to defend the legality of the marriage of Catherine of Aragon in the royal divorce proceedings. In connection with this, he wrote the Tractatus de non dissolvendo Henrici Regis cum Catherina matrimonio (London). Powell debated Hugh Latimer, then fell into further disfavor by denouncing Henry's marriage to Anne Boleyn.

He was discharged from the proctorship of Salisbury in January 1534. Upon refusing to take the Oath of Succession (November 1534), he was attainted for high treason along with Bishop John Fisher of Rochester, deprived of his benefices, and imprisoned in the Tower of London. Following a six-year confinement, he was executed together with BB. Thomas ABELL and Richard FETHERSTON. They were beatified by Pope Leo XIII on Dec. 29, 1886.

Feast of the English Martyrs: May 4 (England); July 30 (Wales).

POWER, EDMUND

Biblical scholar; b. Herbertstown, County Limerick, Ireland, March 2, 1878; d. Dublin, Ireland, Aug. 3, 1953. After his early education with the Christian Brothers in Limerick, he studied philosophy at Thurles and Maynooth (1893–96) and entered the Society of Jesus (Oct. 1, 1896). After his novitiate, he studied classical languages at the Royal University, Dublin, and Oriental languages at the University of St. Joseph, Beirut, where he received the doctorate (1906). He then completed his studies in philosophy at Valkenburg, Netherlands (1907–09), and in theology at Hastings, England (1909–13). After his ordination, he was appointed professor of Arabic and Syriac at the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL INSTITUTE. During his long residence there (1914–38), in certain years he also taught biblical geography and archeology. From 1938 to 1953 he was professor of Sacred Scripture at Milltown Park, Dublin. He contributed many articles on biblical topics to Biblica (of which he was the editor 1926–31), Verbum Domini, Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture, and Dictionnaire de la Bible, Supplément, v. 1–3.

POWER, EMILY, MOTHER

Educator; b. County Waterford, Ireland, Jan. 12, 1844; d. Sinsinawa, Wis., Oct. 16, 1909. The Power family came to the U.S. in 1851, settling in St. Louis, Mo. When the father died, his widow took the family to a farm near Sinsinawa. At the age of 13, Ellen Power entered an academy at Benton, Wis., established by the Rev. Samuel Mazzuchelli, OP, founder of the Sinsinawa Dominicans. At the age of 17 she was received into the community of the Dominican sisters in Benton and given the name of Sister Mary Emily. In 1867 she was chosen head of the community. With the aid of a wealthy Catholic, William Ryan, she moved the group, both sisters and students, from Benton back to Sinsinawa. On this base she built an organization that in 1961 staffed educational institutions in 20 states, Europe, and South America. Her educational apostolate included the elementary, secondary, and college levels. Rosary College, River Forest, Ill., and its branch in Fribourg, Switzerland; Edgewood College of the Sacred Heart, Madison, Wis.; and Pius XII Graduate School of Fine Arts, Florence, Italy, were all part of Mother Emily's plan. St. Clara of Sinsinawa was one of the first Catholic secondary schools to establish affiliation with a state university, and the curriculum of Corpus Christi School, New York City, has been a model for many elementary schools. Mother Emily was one of the first superiors to send sisters to secular institutions and to the Catholic University of America, Washington, D.C. She was aware of the problems of poverty and sympathetic with workers, and was associated also with social movements. She directed aid for the miners of Spring Valley, Minn., for the locked-out workers of the Anaconda in Montana, and for the strikers of the Chicago stockyards. She anteceded Leo XIII in teaching the need for understanding between capital and labor; when the pope's pronouncement came, she put it into action as an educational factor of essential importance.

POWER, JOHN

Missionary; b. Rosscarberry, County Cork, Ireland, June 19, 1792; d. New York City, April 14, 1849. He studied at St. Patrick's College, Maynooth, was ordained in 1814, and after serving as a curate at Youghal, taught in the diocesan college of Cloyne. In 1819 he immigrated to New York City, where he became a curate and then pastor at St. Peter's Church. As one of the most prominent Catholics in New York, he was named vicar-general and administrator of the diocese (1823–49); he attended the First and Second Provincial Councils of Baltimore, and accompanied Bp. John Dubois on a visitation of the entire diocese (1828). Power was keenly interested in the Catholic Orphan Asylum, and he encouraged the founding of the Truth Teller, New York's first Catholic newspaper. He distinguished himself by his zeal during the yellow fever epidemics of 1819 and 1822, and the cholera epidemic of 1832. Like all New York priests of the time, Power was an itinerant missionary and on occasion ministered to the Catholics of Brooklyn, N.Y.; Jersey City and New Brunswick, N.J., where he said the first Mass; and Connecticut. His tenure at St. Peter's was beset by TRUSTEISM and financial difficulties that were climaxed by bankruptcy in 1844, when the church was auctioned to satisfy the creditors.

Power was an excellent linguist, with a good command of Latin, Greek, French, Spanish, Italian, and Gaelic. An able exponent of Catholic doctrine, he successfully answered the attacks of Calvinist ministers William Brownlee and John Breckenridge. His publications include several books of devotion, a translation of part of the Royaumont Bible, and a catechetical history of the Old Testament. His remains were interred in old St. Patrick's Cathedral, New York City.

POWER, LIONEL

Church composer and singer; b. England, c. 1375; d. Canterbury, June 5, 1445. He ranks next to DUNSTABLE in importance among early 15th-century English composers, by reason of the artistic quality and quantity (about 50) of his works, all church music. Neither Power nor Dunstable was a member of the chapel royal, but Dunstable's membership in the Duke of Bedford's private chapel suggests that Power too may have accompanied the Duke into France. Most of his music is found in Continental MSS, although the Old Hall MS also provides examples of his early and later styles. Some of his liturgical music could have been written for Christ Church Priory, Canterbury, for he was received there as a lay oblate as early as 1423. His early works were strongly influenced by the angular and often recondite features of the late ars nova, and two of his Mass sections exhibit many of the complexities of proportional notation. His later music, especially the 15 motets in honor of the Blessed Virgin Mary, assumes the flowing and consonant style developed and perfected by Dunstable.

POWERS, JESSICA

Religious name: Sister Miriam of the Holy Spirit; American poet and Carmelite nun; b. Cat Tail Valley, Wisconsin, Feb. 7, 1905; d. Pewaukee, Wisconsin, Aug. 18, 1988. Jessica Powers grew up in a small farming community near Mauston, Wisconsin. The grandchild of pioneers, she counted the Scottish poet Robert Burns among her ancestors. Catholicism, nature (especially winter), and death are major themes in her lyric poetry. Her formal education ended after one semester at Marquette University's School of Journalism (1922–23). For the next few years she worked in Chicago in a secretarial pool while nurturing her inner work of poetry. Her poems regularly appeared in newspapers, journals, and anthologies. However, when symptoms of tuberculosis appeared, she returned to Cat Tail Valley.

After her mother's sudden death in 1925, Powers gave up her dream of living and writing in New York in order to help her brothers with the farm. It was during the "farm years" she first read the poetry of JOHN OF THE CROSS, to whom she has been compared. Her brothers eventually married, and in 1937 she felt free to go to New York, where she was active in the Catholic Poetry Society. There she met Clifford Laube, a New York Times editor. Laube had his own publishing company, Monastine Press (after SS. Monica and Augustine) in the basement of his home. In 1939 he published her first volume of poems, The Lantern Burns.

As her poetic work was becoming recognized, Powers abruptly left New York in 1941 to enter the new Mother of God Carmelite monastery in Wisconsin. She lived there for the remaining 47 years of her life, exploring the secrets of the soul in prayer and poetry. Her largest collection, the Selected Poetry of Jessica Powers, was published posthumously in 1989. Her papers are in the Marquette University archives.

POYNTER, WILLIAM

English vicar apostolic; b. Petersfield, Hampshire, England, May 20, 1762; d. London, Nov. 26, 1827. Sent to the English College at Douai, France, by Bp. Richard Challoner, he was ordained (1786) and remained as prefect of studies at the college. Imprisoned during the French Revolution, he returned to England as vice president of the new College of St. Edmund, Old Hall Green (1795), becoming its president in 1801. In 1803 he was consecrated coadjutor to Bp. John Douglass of the London District. He succeeded to the vicariate at Douglass's death (1812), but retained the presidency of St. Edmund's until 1813. During his episcopate, Poynter opposed the rough controversial methods of Bp. John MILNER and won the support of leading Catholic laymen who had been dissatisfied with the position of the bishops on the Relief Act of 1791. Poynter also served after 1816 as the spokesman for English bishops seeking compensation for property lost during the French Revolution.

PRADO, JOHN OF, BL.

Restorer of the Morocco mission, martyr; b. Morgovejo, Spain, 1563; d. Marrakech, Morocco, May 24, 1631. John entered S. Gabriel Province, whence, as superior, in 1620 he established the new S. Diego province of Andalucia and became its provincial. With good prospects of reopening the Moroccan mission, in 1630 he was named its prefect apostolic. John left Cadiz with Father Matías de S. Francisco and Brother Ginés de Ocaña, and at Mazagan secured letters and safe-conducts of the Spanish governor to Sultan Muley Abd el-Malik. Upon reaching Marrakech, he learned that the benevolent sultan was dead and had been replaced by his brother, Muley el-Walid, who in the audience of April 3, 1631, rejected the credentials of the friars and threw them into prison, asking that the Spanish governor and garrison evacuate Mazagan in exchange for their release. Later the sultan violently attacked the Christian faith, while Father John with the eloquence of a saint moved the apostates among the Christian captives to repent. Summoned before the furious sultan on May 24, Father John asked him to renounce Muḥammad and to worship Christ. Instead, the sultan stabbed him to death. The martyr was beatified by BENEDICT XIII on May 14, 1728, and was chosen patron of the Morocco mission.

PRADT, EL ABATE DE

French prelate, diplomat, and publicist who supported NAPOLEON I and promoted Spanish-American independence and other causes by his pen; b. Chateau de Pradt, Allanche, Auvergne, April 23, 1759; d. Paris, March 18, 1837. Born the second son of a large noble family, Dominique Georges Frédéric de Riom de Prolhiac de Pradt was ordained in 1784, and took a doctorate in theology at the Sorbonne (1785). His uncle Cardinal de Larochevoucauld made him canon and vicar at Rouen. He represented that diocese in the Estates General (1789). Initially hostile to revolutionary ideas, especially the CIVIL CONSTITUTION OF THE CLERGY, he emigrated in 1792. In 1798 he published the first of his 70 volumes, L'antidote du congrès de Rastadt ou Plan d'un nouvel équilibre en Europe, which revealed the influence of Montesquieu, Raynal, and the Encyclopedists but was still antirevolu-tionary. After 18 Brumaire, however, his relative General Duroc introduced De Pradt to NAPOLEON Bonaparte. He became the first consul's chaplain, bishop of Poitiers (1805), and archbishop of Mechlin (1808), although the last post was never confirmed by papal bull. De Pradt negotiated with the Spanish Bourbons at Bayonne (1808) and served ineptly as ambassador to the Grand Duchy of Warsaw (1812). Estranged thereafter from the emperor, De Pradt helped his friend Talleyrand engineer the Restoration (1814).

After 1815 De Pradt turned to prolific and facile writing on international politics and Church-State relations. In his books, which were widely read in the New World as well as in Europe, he developed liberal themes begun earlier in Les trois âges des colonies (1802). Most influential was his Des colonies et de la révolution actuelle de l'Amérique (1817), which brought him heavy criticism from the Ultra press and the admiration of such Spanish Americans as Rivadavia, Bolívar, and Servando Teresa de MIER. In Les quatre concordats (1818) De Pradt, a Gallican, bitterly denounced the political motivations of the papacy in withholding the bulls that destroyed his ambitions at Mechlin. Although not a systematic thinker, he proposed as a solution the clear separation of Church and State. This and other works on clerical problems attracted liberal attention in the infant Spanish-American republics. He wrote steadily until 1837; he died reconciled to the Church.

PRAEMUNIRE, STATUTE OF

A statute of 1353 that forbade—on pain of outlawry, confiscation of goods, and imprisonment at the king's pleasure—all appeals to authorities outside England in cases cognizable before the royal courts. Ever since the 12th century, both secular and ecclesiastical judges in England had claimed jurisdiction over cases involving ad-vowsons; and although the Statute of Praemunire did not specifically mention the papal Curia, its purpose was to prevent appeals to Rome in cases concerning English benefices. It was thus closely related to the preceding Statute of PROVISORS. Subsequent statutes of 1365 and 1393 explicitly forbade appeals to Rome, but none of these 14th-century acts was regularly enforced. They became of great importance in the 16th century when HENRY VIII invoked the medieval legislation, first to bring about the downfall of Thomas WOLSEY in 1529, and then to coerce the whole English clergy in 1531. Subsequent legislation extended the penalties of Praemunire to a wide variety of offenses, mostly political ones. The last such statute was the Royal Marriages Act of 1772.

PRAEPOSITINUS OF CREMONA

Theologian; b. Cremona, 1130–35; d. Paris, Feb. 25, 1210. He was a student of MAURICE OF SULLY, ACHARD OF SAINT-VICTOR, and PETER COMESTOR. Before 1194 he taught at Paris and lived among the Cathari in Lombardy or Mainz; he was master of the episcopal school of Mainz (1194–1203), was used by the Holy See as judge-delegate, and was chancellor at the University of Paris (1206–09). His authentic writings include a Summa theologica (1190–94); the lost Distinctiones Praepositini, which was the source of the Collecta ex distinctionibus Praepositini; Summa super psalterium (before 1196–98); and the Summa de officiis (1196–98), which was used almost completely in Durandus of Mende's Rationale divinatorum officiorum. Unauthentic are the Porretanian Quaestiones Praepositini (1170–80), Summa contra haereticos (c. 1200), and the Summa de poenitentia iniungenda (after 1202).

PRAEPOSITUS (JOANNES DE SAN GEORGIO)

Lay canonist; b. Bologna, Italy; d. Bologna, c. 1378. He completed his studies in law and became professor of Canon Law at Bologna in 1320. He left that position in 1347 and in 1352 became professor of Canon Law at Padua, where he remained until 1361. He married the daughter of another important canonist of this period, Joannes Andrea, and there was considerable communication between these canonists in their work. He was a member of a group of 14th-century commentators upon the Decretum of Gratian and upon papal decretals. His most important works were a commentary on the Clementine constitutions (Reportationes super clementinis) and a collection of commentaries on various juridic problems (Quaestiones). His Reportationes can be considered a supplement to Joannes Andrea's apparatus on the Clementine constitutions.

PRAETEXTATUS OF ROUEN, ST.

Archbishop; d. Rouen, France, April 14 or Feb. 25, 586. Raised to the episcopacy (c. 544), Praetextatus (or Prix) assisted at the synods of Tours (567) and Paris (556–73). His interference in affairs of state, justifiable or not, earned him the personal hatred of Chilperic and Fredegund and involved him in the political intrigue of his day. At a synod held in Paris (577), he was accused by Chilperic of treasonable activities, deposed, and placed in confinement on an island in the neighborhood of Coutances. GREGORY OF TOURS was the only bishop at the synod who spoke in his defense. After Chilperic's death (584), Praetextatus was recalled and honorably reinstated, despite the vigorous opposition of Fredegund. In 585 he assisted at the synod of Mâcon. The following year, at the instigation of Fredegund, he was murdered in his cathedral.

PRAETORIUM

The Greek word πρατώριον was taken over directly from the Latin praetorium, which originally signified the headquarters of the commanding officer (the praetor) in Roman military encampments. In its military usage, the word came to be used also of the council of war held in the commanding officer's headquarters and of the bodyguard of the emperor (the Praetorian Guard) or of a Roman governor, whether his title was that of praetor or not. Finally, its meaning was extended in a local sense, as well, to designate the governor's official residence in a Roman province or administrative district.

In the Gospels. The praetorium is mentioned in the accounts of the Passion (see PASSION OF CHRIST, I) as the place where Jesus was mocked by the Roman soldiers (Mt 27.27; Mk 15.16) and interrogated by Pontius PILATE

(Jn 18.28, 33; 19.9). Immediately in front of this praetorium at Jerusalem, or in an outer part of it, in a place called Lithostrotos in Greek and Gabbatha in Aramaic, the tribunal or curule chair of Pilate was apparently located, at least on this occasion, and there final sentence was passed on Jesus (Jn 19.13). Because of the diversity of the Gospel accounts, it is a matter of debate among Biblical scholars whether the scourging of Jesus also took place inside the praetorium, or outside of it, and whether it took place before or after the sentence of condemnation was pronounced. Further, whether the praetorium itself and the place called Lithostrotos or Gabbatha are also to be located at the Antonia fortress situated at the northwest corner of the TEMPLE area in the lower city, or at HEROD THE GREAT's palace in the western or upper part of the city, is likewise a subject on which scholars are fairly evenly divided. In favor of the Antonia as the place of Pilate's residence during the Passion is the argument that it would have been more likely for Pilate to choose as his headquarters this site close by the Temple area, where rebellious outbreaks often originated, in order to be on hand in case of trouble during the large gathering of the people for the feast of the Passover. Furthermore, recent excavations at the site of the Antonia have uncovered an extensive pavement of large stone blocks, dating from the time of Christ, that its discoverers have identified with the Lithostrotos of John's account. Since Lithostrotos (λιθόστρωτος) means "paved with stones" (cf. Septuagint of Est 1.6, Sg 3.10, 2 Chr 7.3) and is most probably used substantively in John 19.13 to denote a proper name, the name would appear to fit the place well. In addition, if, as seems probable, the name Gabbatha (gabbātā', called "Hebrew" in John 19.13, but really Aramaic) is connected with the root gb' (to be high), this name too would be appropriate for the same site, since the Antonia was situated on high ground overlooking the entire temple area. Against this view, however, is the fact that Philo (Legatio ad Caium 38) and Josephus (De bello Judaico 2.3.1–4; 2.9.4; 2.14.8) seem to indicate Herod's palace in the western sector of the city as the ordinary residence or praetorium of the Roman governors when they were present in Jerusalem. So the basic difficulty of identifying the Antonia as the praetorium of the Passion hinges on whether or not the term praetorium itself was used so loosely that it was applied indiscriminately to any place where the governor might have taken up residence, no matter how temporary that residence might have been. Also, Herod's palace was situated at a higher point in the city than the Antonia. It is possible, too, since knowledge of the ancient localities in Jerusalem, along with their names, is by no means complete, that there may have been another pavement made of large stones standing before this western palace that would be more in accord with the Gospel narrative than the one discovered at the Ancient pavement discovered under the convent of the Sisters of Sion and the Franciscan Monastery of the Flagellation at the Ecce Homo Arch in Jerusalem. It formed part of the courtyard of the Antonia Fortress and may have been the praetorium where Pilate condemned Jesus. Cuts on the pavement were made for playing Roman games.

site of the Antonia, which appears to have been an inner courtyard rather than an outside plaza.

In Acts and Philipians. In Acts of the Apostles 23.35 mention is made of “the praetorium of Herod,” i.e., the palace that Herod the Great built for himself at Caesarea. In accord with the frequent practice of Roman governors in taking over the palace of the former ruler as their official residence or praetorium, this palace of Herod at Caesarea became the normal headquarters of the Roman procurators of Judea (cf. Josephus, De bello Judaico 2.14.8). There St. Paul was imprisoned under the procurator Felix. The meaning of praetorium in Philipians 1.13, where Paul writes that his imprisonment is known “throughout the praetorium” to be for the sake of Christ, depends largely on whether Paul is thought to have been writing from Rome, Caesarea, Ephesus, or elsewhere. Since a personal, rather than a local, interpretation of the phrase appears to be called for by the context in which it occurs, it is probable that, if Paul was writing from Rome, he was referring to the members of the Roman Praetorian Guard who, through periodic changes of the guard on Paul, would all have come to know his case. If, however, Paul was writing from Caesarea, Ephesus, or elsewhere, the word could be applied to the members of the Roman governor’s guard, or possibly even to other members of the governor’s court or household. However, if a local sense for the term is preferred, the praetorium could indicate the governor’s palace at Caesarea, Ephesus, or elsewhere. But a similar local interpretation could not be supported under the hypothesis of a Roman origin of this letter, since the palace of the emperor in Rome is never called a praetorium, even though his palace outside of Rome is sometimes so named.

PRAETORIUS, MICHAEL

Church composer and theorist, authority on baroque organ; b. Kreuzberg (Thuringia), Germany, Feb. 15, 1571; d. Wolfenbüttel, Feb. 15, 1621. His full name was Michael Hieronymus Schultheiss, of which surname Praetorius is the Latin form. He was the son of a Protestant minister, and was at one time prior of Ringelheim Abbey (in Protestant possession 1570–1643), but resigned to devote himself to music. From 1612 until his death he was Kapellmeister in Wolfenbüttel. Praetorius published many oversized collections of his church music, much of it based on German chorale tunes, developed in the new Italian concertato style. Among these collections are the Musae Sioniae (1,244 settings in 16 v.; 1605–10); Musarum Sioniarum (1607); Eulogodia Sionia (60 motets “for the conclusion of worship”; 1611); Hymnodia Sionia (1611); and Kleine und Grosse Litanie (1613). His great theoretical work is the Syntagma Musicum. Of its published volumes the first is a (Latin) treatise on ancient church music (1615); the second, with its illustrated appendix, is a primary reference on baroque instruments, particularly the organ [1620; tr. from German by H. Blumenfeld (St. Louis 1949)]; the third, a treatise on contemporary secular music.

PRAGMATIC SANCTION

A fundamental law of the state regulating important affairs of Church or State, e.g., the Pragmatic Sanction of 1713 that determined the successor to the throne after the death of Emperor Charles VI. In France the term was used to designate the regulations of the general councils that, after lengthy legal advice, were enforced by the king. Royal sanctions of this type occurred in 1407 and 1418, but more famous and consequential than these was the Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges (1438).

Antecedents of Bourges. After the suspension of EUGENE IV by the Council of BASEL (Jan. 24, 1438), France, like the empire, sought to remain neutral in its relations with both the pope and the council. At a meeting convened at Bourges (May 1, 1438) King Charles VIII took the opportunity to discuss with the French clergy their attitude toward the threatened schism. After regaining most of the royal domain, thanks to JOAN OF ARC, Charles was able to consult with representatives from nearly all parts of France. When agents from the pope and from Basel had vigorously presented their opposing points of view, the assembly decided that the king should strive to restore harmony by sending envoys to both parties, by requesting them to end the controversy, and by allowing the council's reform decrees to be tested by a commission in France. The 23 decrees of Basel were accepted with partial modifications, and the changes were to be approved by the Council of Basel. The decisions became immediately effective with the king's endorsement on July 7. Six days later the Pragmatic Sanction was registered by the parlement. The council, however, did not give its approval until Oct. 17, 1439.

Content. Among the approved decrees were Frequens and Sacrosancta, which legislated respectively regarding the regular convening of councils and the supremacy of a council over the pope. Other decrees regarding elections, the granting of benefices, papal jurisdiction, and ANNATES sharply limited the rights of the pope. Still others affected the celebration of the liturgy and choir chant or were directed against current abuses in the Church, against concubinage and immorality, and also against excessive use of EXCOMMUNICATION, INTERDICT, and reservation. Nevertheless, the Pragmatic Sanction, with more concern than the council, wished to spare the person of Eugene IV and not deprive him of all his resources.

Conflict. The Pragmatic Sanction was a thorn in the side of the popes, not so much because it painfully restricted their income and limited their rights, but especially because, by its recognition of Basel's supremacy, it had furthered the demands and threats of CONCILIARISM. Thus the papacy's struggle against this legislation was quite understandable. However, the concordat negotiations, begun in 1442, produced no results. Cardinal G. d'ESTOUTEVILLE, as the legate of Nicholas II, demanded in vain that the Assembly of the Clergy of 1452 abolish its restrictions, offering a concordat instead.

Moreover, pragmatic decrees were often used by the king as a means of bargaining against concessions of the pope in French and Italian affairs, and in this period a spurious Pragmatic Sanction, signed supposedly by St. LOUIS IX in 1269, made its appearance. In the hope of gaining papal support in the struggle over Naples, Louis XI, much to the chagrin of the clergy and the parlement, abolished the Pragmatic Sanction in 1461. Since he did not achieve the desired objective, however, in 1463 he again issued a long list of decrees "as a protection against Roman encroachments and for the reestablishment of ancient Gallican liberties." Both Julius II and Leo X condemned the Pragmatic Sanction as a work of the schism, but as late as 1510, an assembly of French bishops expressed the desire that it be observed. The bull of Leo X was read at the 11th session of the Fifth LATERAN COUNCIL (1516). But the popes paid a heavy price for the replacement of the Pragmatic Sanction by the French concordat of 1516. The Pragmatic Sanction lived on in the form of GALLICANISM, since it was generally held by the French clergy that only those articles had been abolished that were explicitly corrected or retracted in the concordat. Thus, some articles survived until the French Revolution. However, the maxim that "the absolute and infinite authority of the pope has no place in France" became a fundamental principle of Gallicanism.

PRAT, FERDINAND

Jesuit exegete; b. La Fréterie (Aveyron), France, Feb. 10, 1857; d. Toulouse, Aug. 4, 1938. After his ordination in 1886 and his studies in Oriental languages at Beirut and Paris and in exegesis under R. Cornely in Rome and J. Knabenbauer in England, he taught Scripture at various times in France, Belgium, and Lebanon. In Rome from 1902 to 1907 as one of the first consultants to the PONTIFICAL BIBLICAL COMMISSION, he influenced the earliest decisions on "implicit citations" and the historicity of the Bible and helped in the planning of the proposed Pontifical Biblical Institute. For his service as chaplain during World War I, he was awarded the Croix de la Légion d'honneur. Attached intermittently to the editorial staff of Études, he published many more than 100 articles in that and other journals. His books include Origène: le théologien et l'exégète (1907), Saint Paul (1922), Jésus-Christ, sa Vie, sa Doctrine, son Oeuvre (1933), and his most lasting work, La Théologie de saint Paul (2 v., 1908, 1912).

PRAT Y PRAT, MERCEDES, BL.

Known in religion as María Mercedes; martyr of the Society of St. Teresa of Jesus; b. Mar. 6, 1880, Barcelona, Spain; d. July 24, 1936, Barcelona.

Mercedes' Christian parents, Juan and Teresa, died while she was still a child. She combined her special talents as a painter, needleworker, and catechist to evangelize other girls. In 1904, she entered the novitiate of the Society of Saint Teresa of Jesus at Tortosa, where she pronounced her initial vows (1907) and served as a dedicated teacher. From 1920, she was assigned to the motherhouse at Barcelona, from which the community was forced to flee (July 19, 1936) at the beginning of the Spanish Civil War. Stopped by militiamen, Mercedes was arrested on July 23 upon identifying herself as a religious. She was shot at dawn on July 24 on the road to Rabasada. Although mortally wounded she survived for some hours in extreme pain. Her cries attracted the attention of the passing militiamen, who shot her again.

At her beatification (April 29, 1990) Pope John Paul II said: "Her great love for God and neighbor brought her to engage in the apostolic work of catechesis. . . . Her love for her neighbor showed itself above all in her act of pardoning those who shot her."

Feast: July 24 (Carmelites).

PRATENSIS, FELIX

Editor of the first printed edition of the Hebrew Bible; b. Prato, Tuscany, toward the end of the 15th century; d. Venice, Dec. 5, 1558. Felix was born a Jew, the son of a rabbi, and was well versed in Hebrew. In 1506 he was baptized and entered the order of the Hermits of St. Augustine. He taught Hebrew to the famous printer Daniel BOMBERG of Venice. Bomberg in turn printed the edition of the Hebrew Bible prepared by Pratensis in 1518. This edition contained marginal notes of the rabbis and a Latin dedication to Pope Leo X. Another feature of this edition was the indication, in Hebrew letters, of the Christian division of the Bible into chapters. Felix's work influenced Jacob ben Chayyim in the preparation of his edition of the Hebrew Bible that was printed by Bomberg at Venice in 1525–26. This work became the principal edition of the Hebrew Bible until 1929, when it was supplanted by the third edition of Kittel's Biblica Hebraica. See C. D. Ginsburg, Introduction to the Masoretic-Critical Edition of the Hebrew Bible (London 1897) 925–974. Felix's writings and sermons were instrumental in attracting many Jewish converts.

PRATULIN, MARTYRS OF, BB.

Also known as Wincenty Lewoniuk and Companions or the Martyrs of Podlasie, martyrs; d. Jan. 24, 1874, Pratulin, Poland; beatified by John Paul II, Oct. 6, 1996.

The background for the martyrdom was the the Union of Brest (1595–96) that marked the reunion of Polish Orthodox to the Church of Rome. It retained the Byzantine-Ukrainian Rite, while permitting their priests to marry. When Poland fell under Russian domination, "Uniate" Catholics were systematically persecuted by the Czarist regime. Bishops and priests who refused conversion to the Orthodox Church were deported to Siberia or detained in Siedlce or Biała Podlasie (now eastern Poland). By 1874, only the Byzantine Catholic Eparchy of Chelm remained.

When the Russian Kutanin, district prefect of Pratulin village, wanted to nominate an Orthodox priest to replace the pastor of Pratulin, the parishioners objected. Kutanin brought Colonel Stein and his Cossack troops into the town to make the transfer by force. The unarmed parishioners surrounded the church to defend it and refused to disperse despite promises of favors and then threats. Thirteen Byzantine Catholics, led by Wincenty Lewoniuk, were martyred when the soldiers shot them to death for their fidelity to the Catholic Church. Another 180 survived their wounds. The martyrs were buried without ceremony. The decree of martyrdom for the 13 killed was pronounced on June 25, 1996. Those beatified were Andrzejuk, Jan (John), married, b. 1848, Derło; cantor in the church.

Bojko, Konstanty (Constantine), married, subsistence farmer, b. Sept. 25, 1826, Derło.

Bojko, Łukasz (Luke), unmarried farmer from the village of Legi; b. 1852, Zaczopki. Łukasz, the son of Dymitra Bojko and Anastazji Wojda, spread the news of the arrival of the Cossacks to encourage others to defend the church in Pratulin and rang the church bells throughout the attack. He was shot in front of the church doors.

Franczuk, Ignacy (Ignatius), married layman, b. 1824, Derło (age 50). Ignacy, son of Daniel and Akacja Franczuk, had seven children by his wife, Helena.

Hawryluk, Maksym (Maximilian), married farmer in Derło, b. May 22, 1840, Rolnik. Maksym and his wife, Dominika, had three children. He died at home of a wound in his stomach.

Hryciuk, Anicet, unmarried layman, b. 1855, Zaczopki. Anicet, the only son of Józef and Julianna Hryciuk, was shot in the head.

Lukaszuk, Konstanty (Constantine), married farmer, b. c. 1829, Zaczopki. Konstanty, husband of Irene and father of seven children, was pierced with a bayonet in the cemetery.

Karmasz, Daniel, married, layman; b. 1826, Odznaczał. He was the uneducated farmer from Legi who encouraged others to defend the church against the Cossacks and was shot holding the Cross in his hand.

Kiryłuk, Filip (Philip), married farmer, b. 1830, Zaczopki. Shot.

Lewoniuk, Wincenty (Vincent), married layman; b. 1849, Krzyczewie. Vincent, husband of Marianna, was persecuted for supporting the Union of Brest. During the defense of Pratulín's church, he was shot to death.

Osypiuk, Bartołomiej (Bartholomew), married farmer; b. 1844, Bohukały. Son of Wasyla Osypiuk and Marty Kondraciuk; had two children of his own. He guarded the church, was wounded, and died at home praying for the pardon of his attackers.

Wasyluk, Onufry (Humphrey), married layman, village administrator; b. 1853, Zaczopki. Onufry's parents paid 800 rubles to the Russians to keep their son out of the army. He was shot in the head during the defense of the church.

Wawryszuk, Michał, layman, b. 1853, Derło. Michał had only recently been married in Olszyna before his martyrdom.

At their beatification Pope John Paul II declared: "The martyrs of Pratulín defended not only the parish church in front of which they were killed, but the Church that Christ entrusted to the Apostle Peter, the Church which they felt a part of, like living stones."

PRAXIS

A transliteration of the Greek word, praxis is a noun of action that implies doing, acting, and practice. According to Aristotle there are three ways of knowing that he designates as theoria, praxis, and poiesis, roughly corresponding to three kinds of living that we might call the contemplative (philosophical) life, the practical (public) life, and the productive (creative) life. In the Aristotelian framework, praxis is directed to the right ordering of human behavior in the sociopolitical world. The term appears in medieval Latin (Albertus Magnus, Meta. 5.5.2; and John Duns Scotus, Ord., prologus, 5.6), but it is only in the 19th century with G. W. F. Hegel and Karl Marx that the technical concept of praxis returns to the center of the philosophical debate and begins to influence theology.

The term has become commonplace and, according to many, the issue of praxis is the key question in contemporary theology. In spite of widespread use, however, it is not always clear what authors intend when they use the term "praxis." The reason for this lack of clarity is that a plurality of philosophical backgrounds has been brought to bear on the theological usage of this term: ARISTOTLE, MARX, the FRANKFURT SCHOOL of Critical Theory, Paolo Freire, and Habermas. The purpose of this article is to shed some light on the different theological usages of this term and to indicate briefly the challenge they pose for the future of theology.

Liberation Theology. By far the most common use of the term "praxis" is to be found in Latin American LIBERATION THEOLOGY. In this regard it should be remembered that what is truly significant about liberation theology is not so much its content as its method. Within the method of liberation theology praxis plays a central role.

According to G. Gutierrez, theology is "a critical reflection on Christian praxis in the light of the word." As such, theology is "a second step" coming after the praxis of involvement with the liberation of those who are oppressed in the world. The point of departure, therefore, for liberation theology is the existence of a prior commitment to the cause of the poor in the world today. The source of this commitment is humanity's intuitive awareness that there is something intrinsically wrong with "the myth of things as they are." There is an instinctive consciousness abroad that the existence of so much poverty in the world is contrary to the fundamental solidarity of the human race; and that the dangerous divisions throughout the globe go against the grain of creation and human nature. Liberation theology reflects critically on this underlying commitment to liberation, seeking to make it more complete, and highlighting its connection with the gospel of Christ. In particular, liberation theology shows how liberation is an important step on the way to the gift of SALVATION.

A number of points should be noted here concerning the use of the word “praxis” in liberation theology. First of all, praxis is about that particular human activity that is directed toward the transformation of the conditions and causes of poverty. Further, this activity, once initiated, is guided and governed by a process of critical interaction with the gospel of Christ. Thirdly, the relationship between action and reflection, between theory and practice, is dialectical in liberation theology. Lastly, the experience of actually changing structures in the world is regarded as an important source of new knowledge that enables liberation to talk about the existence of an “epistemological break” within its praxis method. In brief, the praxis of liberation theology is intuitive and reflective, transformative, dialectical, and epistemologically significant.

While it is true that the importance of praxis in liberation theology has been the subject of much discussion, by and large it has won overall acceptance by the theological community. One example of this discussion can be found in the 1984 Instruction on Certain Aspects of the “Theology of Liberation” issued by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith, which has both negative and positive comments to make about the place of praxis in theology. In that document the association of praxis with “the class struggle” and its identification with “partisan praxis” is seriously called into question (8.25). While this particular understanding of praxis may belong to some isolated instances of liberation theology, it can hardly be said to represent the mainstream of liberation theologies.

The praxis of liberation theology is not intended to promote the class struggle as an end in itself nor is it solely a partisan praxis. Instead the praxis of liberation theology is ultimately inspired by a radical commitment to justice for all animated by the great commandment of love and its gospel imperatives. Having criticized that form of praxis which promotes the class struggle, the 1984 Instruction went on to make two positive observations on praxis. It pointed out that a “healthy theological method no doubt will always take the praxis of the Church into account and will find there one of its foundations” (8.3). Further, the 1984 Instruction suggests “it is necessary to affirm that one becomes more aware of certain aspects of faith by starting with praxis, if by that one means pastoral praxis and social work which keeps its evangelical inspiration” (11.13).

Primacy of Method. The philosophical background to the primacy of praxis within liberation theology is, loosely speaking, Marx and Freire. This does not mean that liberation theology takes its primary inspiration from Marx or indeed that it identifies with his basic philosophy. Rather, liberation theology is only partially influenced by Marx. One area of this partial influence is Marx’s Eleventh Thesis on Feuerbach: “Philosophers have only interpreted the world; the point is to change it.” Equally, liberation theology is partially influenced by Freire who brings out the importance of reflective action for the conscientization of people to the possibility of determining their own destiny, of changing the given structures of oppression within society, and of moving beyond an understanding of knowledge as merely the transfer of information.

A similar emphasis on the place of praxis can be found in the POLITICAL THEOLOGY of Johann B. Metz. According to Metz, contemporary theology is undergoing a transition from a transcendentalist-idealist paradigm to (RAHNER and LONERGAN) a postidealist paradigm. Within this new postmodern situation the primary focus of attention is given to the dialectical relationship that can and should exist between theory and practice within Christianity. What is ultimately important for Metz is a practical discipleship of Christ. Within this paradigm shift, Metz acknowledges the power and influence of liberation theology on the rest of theology.

Likewise, much of FEMINIST THEOLOGY today shares with liberation theology a similar emphasis on the centrality of praxis. Feminist theology operates out of a prior commitment to the liberation of women from the constraints of patriarchy. The experience of women, like the experience of the poor in liberation theology, is a crucial category within the construction of feminist theology. The methodology of feminist theology is very close to the methodology of liberation theology—both emphasize praxis as the basic point of departure for the interpretation of the gospel.

What is common to liberation theology, political theology, and feminist theology is the presence of a strong emphasis on the primacy of praxis in the method of theology. This unified focus on praxis is inspired by a common reaction against a purely theoretical, essentialist, and universalist understanding of Christian faith. In particular, there is an emerging consensus within these three theologies that something is intrinsically wrong with the way society is structured and that the world as we experience it today is amenable to a radical process of making, unmaking, and remaking. The key to bringing about change in the world from the way it is to the way it might be is this new focus on the primacy of praxis within theory.

This does not mean that these three theologies naively think that there is ready to hand some social and political blueprint for the resolution of the problems facing humanity today. This charge, often made against these theologies, misreads the meaning of the primacy of praxis within theory. Instead, these theologies consistently emphasize the importance of social and cultural analysis of the circumstances surrounding the existing praxis as well as the need for a critical reflection on this praxis in the light of faith before any movement toward a new and liberating praxis can be effected.

Hermeneutical Theology. Alongside these developments there has also been the rung to HERMENEUTICS within European and North American theology. First World theology has witnessed a recovery of theology as a complex exercise embracing understanding, interpretation, and application—not as separate and independent activities but as internally related moments. Hermeneutical theology is not simply about putting forward new, theoretical interpretations of Christianity derived from interplay between the text and the interpreter, or human experience and the Christian tradition. Instead, hermeneutical theology also includes a critical reference to the praxis of the faith and as such intends to influence that praxis. To this extent hermeneutical theology also claims to embrace a turn to praxis within the process of interpretation.

The philosophical impulses behind this recovery of hermeneutics within theology are manifold. They include in a particular way the influences of Martin HEIDEGGER and GADAMER. For Heidegger the act of human understanding is not simply about the discovery of knowledge pure and simple; rather, human understanding is a self-involving existential act that affects the individual's mode of being and becoming in the world. In a similar but by no means identical way, the human act of understanding for Gadamer (who was influenced by Aristotle), involves practical reason in its application to particular social and political issues.

These philosophical influences can be found in the pioneering hermeneutical theology of David Tracy and Claude Geffré. Both of these theologians and others bring together hermeneutics and praxis in their understanding of the task of theology. Both claim that a Christian interpretation of text must also include reference to the contemporary praxis of the faith. As Tracy puts it, “without some applicatio, there is no real hermeneutical intelligentia or explicatio. In that sense the contemporary hermeneutical concern with praxis is entirely correct” (Plurality, 101). Going a step further, Geffré claims that Christian praxis is “both a place of production of the meaning of Christianity and the place of the verification of that message” (The Risk, 19).

Hermeneutics and Liberation. At this stage it should be quite clear that the word “praxis” is prominent in all the above forms of theology and that the language of praxis is by no means alien or unacceptable to the language of the magisterium of the Church as expressed through the teaching of the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith. What is not quite so clear is the particular meaning and direction of this common usage of the word “praxis” in First World and Third World theologies. This ambiguity derives ultimately from a difference of political ideology and social location concerning the context within which these theologies take place.

For one thing, the point of departure of hermeneutical theology and liberation theology seems to be quite distinct. Hermeneutical theology is primarily concerned with the interpretation of the text and the effect that this can have on the consciousness of the interpreter. This kind of praxis might be called individual noetic praxis. Liberation theology on the other hand is primarily concerned with the praxis taking place on the ground and the effect this has on the historical lives of people. This latter type of praxis can be described strictly speaking as social praxis. To this extent the impression is given that hermeneutical theology sets out to provide “a theory for practice” while liberation theology operates out of “a theory of praxis” i.e., the recognition of praxis as an important source of human understanding. Thus hermeneutical theology accords primacy to theory whereas liberation theology gives primacy to praxis insofar as theory follows praxis and reflects upon praxis. In other words, hermeneutical theology tends to relate theory to praxis via the principle of application. Within application to the relationship of theory to praxis, however unintentionally, tends to be extrinsic. On the other hand liberation theology sees that relationship between praxis and theory as one in which these two dimensions are constitutive of each other. According to the principle of constitution, the relationship between theory and praxis is intrinsic.

A second difference between hermeneutical theology and liberation theology concerns the particular pre-understanding out of which each operates. The pre-understanding of hermeneutical theology appears by and large to belong to that of the liberal human autonomy. On the other hand, the pre-understanding of liberation theology goes beyond liberalism to focus on the individual as bound to the community, highlighting the importance of social responsibility and structural change. Consequently, while hermeneutical theology calls for the fusion of horizons between text and interpreter and the transformation of the understanding of the interpreter, liberation theology demands a transformation of structures as a matter of justice.

Lying behind these two different emphases in hermeneutical theology and liberation theology is the presence of two distinct perceptions of society: a functionalist versus a dialectical understanding of society. By and large, hermeneutical theology sees society in functional and organic terms. Within the functionalist approach to society the principal emphasis is placed on maintaining order and harmony; changes are effected from within the given structures of society. On the other hand, according to liberation theology, society is seen as conflictual and dialectical. Within this dialectical understanding of society attention is placed on the importance of struggling against the social contradictions and injustices of the world; changes require a transformation of given structures; what is needed is a new recipe for the structuring of society and not simply an alteration of the ingredients.

A third difference between hermeneutical theology and liberation theology concerns the complex area of human understanding. For hermeneutical theology the risk of interpretation vis-à-vis the text is the source of human understanding generating new theory, whereas in liberation theology the risk of interpretation vis-à-vis praxis is the source of human understanding, generating new praxis. In both instances theory, however explicit or implicit, plays an important role. In hermeneutical theology theory animates new theory, initially inchoate and subsequently explicit, animates new praxis.

It would be a serious misrepresentation of both hermeneutical theology and liberation theology to reduce their differences simply to that of the former being concerned with the purely theoretical and the latter being concerned with the purely practical. This, not uncommon, misrepresentation is based on the illusion that there is such a thing as pure, nonhistorical theory and pure transhistorical praxis. The theoretical self-understanding of hermeneutical theology is colored by personal experience and social location. Likewise, the self-understanding of the praxis of liberation theology is influenced by some form of background interpretation and understanding, no matter how implicit or explicit this may be. Given this view of things it would be a great mistake to polarize the contributions of hermeneutical theology and liberation theology.

Hermeneutics and Praxis in Dialogue. Instead, the challenge facing theology today is to allow the developments of hermeneutical theology and liberation theology to critically complement each other. There is no reason why the interplay between text and interpretation cannot be brought to bear more explicitly on the interpretation of the contemporary praxis of faith. The dialogue between the present and the past in hermeneutics must begin to include explicit reference to the contemporary praxis of faith. Equally there is no reason why the contemporary praxis of faith cannot be allowed to interrupt constructively the conversation between the text and the interpreter. Is not this exactly what the praxis of the poor and the praxis of women has done with extraordinary result in liberation theology and feminist theology? If this interaction between hermeneutics and praxis could begin to take place, then the way might be opened for tackling one of the most intractable problems facing Christianity today, namely the existence of so much theory without praxis and of so much praxis without theory.

A second area within this conversation between hermeneutics and praxis that might be addressed concerns the mediation of the universal and the particular. Critical attention to the particular questions of praxis discloses the hazardous and ambiguous character of universalist Christian answers. In so many instances, especially relating to questions of justice, universal answers simply are not available or do not work on the basis of the application simply of theory to praxis. An explicit recognition of this limitation of the universal message of Christianity was made by Pope Paul VI in his Apostolic letter, Octagesima adveniens, where he points out: "In the face of such widely varying situations it is difficult for us to utter a unified message and to put forward a solution which has universal validity. Such is not our ambition, nor is it our mission" (a. 4). Similar recognition of the limitations of universal Christian claims was made by the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith in its 1986 Instruction on Christian Freedom and Liberation (see a. 2 and a. 72). Once this is admitted then it becomes clear, as the 1986 Instruction points out, that the teaching of the Church and the gospel message is far from being a closed system but is rather open to new questions that continually arise requiring the contributions of all charisms, experiences, and skills (1.72). An acknowledgment of this situation challenges theology to look in places other than texts and traditions for new light on the particularity of questions relating to justice. One such place must surely be praxis of liberation and its ability to shape new theory in and through the fragile experience of transforming structures.

A third area of mutual concern to hermeneutics and praxis is the whole concept of Christian TRUTH. Both hermeneutics and praxis are agreed on the need to go beyond a classical understanding of truth as some kind of correspondence or conformity between the mind and reality. Christian truth is more than an adequatio intellectus et rei. In this regard liberation theology is quick to point toward the contradictions and distortions that exist within social and political reality. For liberation theology truth is to be found not by conforming to the distorted social structures of reality but by engaging in the praxis of transforming these structures. According to liberation theology the individual as knower must be complemented by the individual and the community as agent of a transformative praxis. It is this focus on the importance of “knowing by doing” that prompts liberation theology to talk about an epistemological break.

This epistemological break, however, must be tempered by the call of hermeneutical theology to dialogue with the existing tradition. In making a case for dialogue with the past, hermeneutical theology warns against reifying the tradition, setting it up as something that simply exists in an nonhistorical vacuum. Tradition must always be interpreted in the context of the interpreter’s historicity. The dynamics of dialogue with tradition in hermeneutical theology and the praxis of a solidarity with and for the poor in liberation theology provide complementary approaches to the question of truth. The truth that Christian theology seeks is something that is both revealed and concealed, both historically given within the tradition and eschatologically promised in the future.

A final area in which hermeneutics and praxis might enrich each other concerns the dialectical relationship that exists between praxis and theory. Accepting that there is a dialectical relationship between praxis and theory, and that praxis has an important epistemological contribution to make to theory, the question arises: what particular norms and criteria should guide this dialectical relationship must be guided by the basic principles of hermeneutics and praxis as outlined above, namely that of a dialogue between the particular praxis of Christian faith and horizons of contemporary understanding as retrieved from within the Christian tradition (theory) as well as the existence of a fundamental solidarity with and for those who are the weakest members of society.

These principles of hermeneutics and praxis in turn must continually be informed by explicit reference to the life, death, and Resurrection of Jesus. In the life of Jesus there is a dialectical relationship between praxis and theory, between words and deeds, between action and reflection. The vision of Jesus that dialectically embraces a radical praxis is contained in His parables about the coming Reign of God, in His teaching on the Beatitudes and the great commandment of love, and in the story about the final judgment scene in Matthew 25. Equally the praxis of Jesus that dialectically inspired this vision is illustrated in terms of healings, exorcisms, forgiveness, table fellowship and the presence of love in action unto the end. As Dei Verbum points out, “Jesus perfected revelation by fulfilling it through His whole work of making Himself present and manifesting himself: through His words and deeds. His signs and wonders, but especially through His death and glorious Resurrection form the dead and final sending of the Spirit of truth. Moreover, He confirmed with the divine testimony what revelation proclaimed: that God is with us to free us from the darkness of sin and death, and to raise us up to eternal life”

(a. 4). In the end a Christian theology of hermeneutics and praxis must be guided and controlled by the vision and praxis of Jesus and the ongoing presence of His Spirit among us today.

PRAYER

Prayer, a universal phenomenon of religion, has passed through a long history in the development of mankind.

PRIMITIVE PRAYER

Primitive prayer is a rather complex phenomenon. It is treated here under its more significant aspects.

Definition. In its primal and elemental form it may be defined as an act of cult by which man enters into communion with a higher, superhuman, supersensuous being, somehow conceived as personal and experienced as real and present, upon whose power he feels himself dependent. In the world of primitive man there exist a great number of living things and inanimate objects that impress him as mysterious, charged with a preternatural dynamic energy producing effects beyond the ordinary limits of natural processes. In approaching them he treats them with reverential awe, but he does not pray to them. Because they are impersonal, there is no way of his coming into personal relations with them. In order to have prayer, more is required than just the presence of some supernatural, superhuman power. This power must be borne by a personal being capable of governing it by an act of will.

The objects of primitive man’s prayer, therefore, are always personal supersensuous beings who possess superhuman power and make him feel this power. Moreover, because of the anthropomorphic conception primitive man has of them, they acquire the features of a human person. Hence, his way of dealing with them quite naturally takes the forms of the relations of human social life. Since speech, gesture, and countenance are the means of communication with his fellow man, it is by these means, also, that primitive man explains to the higher being he invokes all that moves his soul. His prayer is a communication between an "I" and a "thou," whether it is verbal or remains unspoken, whether it finds no outward expression at all or is expressed by gestures only, whether it is offered by an individual or performed collectively by a group, whether it is a free spontaneous creation of the moment or a fixed, stereotyped prayer formula.

Primitive Prayer and Magic Formula. Though primitive prayer and magic formula contain some common elements, such as the belief in the transcendent and a certain awe toward the beings or forces invoked, they differ in one essential point. While in prayer man tries by persuasion to move a higher being to gratify his wishes, the reciter of a magic formula attempts to constrain that being or to force the effect to his own ends by the very words of his formula, to which he ascribes an unailing, immanent power. In the first instance the answer to man's invocation lies within the will of the higher being, in the second the binding of the higher being effected by the formula is considered to be absolute, automatically producing the result desired. In many ritual acts, it is true, the two attitudes exist side by side and often blend one into the other so completely that it is difficult, if not impossible, to decide which of the two attitudes is present or dominant. It is also true that of the two attitudes the one taken by the reciter of a magic formula is cruder. But this does not warrant the conclusion that the magic formula is older than prayer and that the latter grew out of the former. No factual evidence for the priority of the magic formula is adducible.

Motives and Content. The prayer of primitive man arises from concrete environmental needs in which the vital interests, either of the individual or the community, are at stake, and it is directed toward definite, material objectives. Longing for delivery from his predicament, primitive man turns to higher, mightier beings. To make them yield to his desires, he uses every means of persuasion: praise, flattery, allurements, manifestation of gratitude, complaint, self-commendation, apology, self-accusation, lament. If all these verbal artifices are of no avail, he does not shrink from reproaching or reprimanding the mightier beings, or even resorting to insults and threats.

To the various motives urging primitive man to pray correspond certain types of prayer. The commonest type is the petitionary prayer, which, in accordance with primitive man's childlike selfishness, is concerned almost exclusively with his own material well-being. Reflecting the conception of prayer as a give-and-take relationship between man and the higher being invoked, prayers of this type are often strengthened by vows or by sacrifices. Some primitive prayers contain, in place of a petition in the strict sense, an emotional complaint, man either simply pouring out his need and misery before a divinity, or quarreling with the deity, indignantly questioning its power, and even reprimanding and insulting it, because his previous prayers have remained unanswered. The same naïveté manifests itself in primitive man's prayers of cursing and vengeance, in his passionate appeals to higher beings for the destruction of enemies and evildoers. On the other hand, primitive man is not devoid of social feelings. The intercessory prayer for living and dead members, either of the family or the tribal community, has a surprisingly prominent place in primitive devotion. The same is true concerning the prayer of thanksgiving. Though many primitive peoples possess no special word for "thanks," they actually give thanks either by an offering or by simply acknowledging the bestowal of a gift by a benevolent deity.

Form, Prayer Formula, Sacred Language. Primitive prayer has a very simple form, consisting of two parts, the address and the prayer itself. The first word uttered in the invocation is usually the proper name of the divine being. In this way the attention of the deity, who may be either at some distance or not listening, is called to the presence of the worshipper. Sometimes a loud cry or a long, drawn-out whistle precedes the deity's name, or some such word as "Hear!" is added to it. Ordinarily, the worshipper is not satisfied with simply mentioning the name of the deity. He feels it necessary to add one or more epithets to pay tribute to the deity from whom he hopes to obtain a favorable hearing. Often he also ceremoniously apologizes, begging for only a moment's attention. This does not prevent him, however, from becoming verbose in the prayer proper, whose main theme he likes to repeat over and over with now slight and now more elaborate variations.

Primitive man appeals to higher beings not only in moments of distress. He brings to them also his permanent needs, concerns, and wishes. Thus, besides the extraordinary occasions of prayer, there are regular, customary ones suggested by such phenomena as sunrise and sunset, the changes of the phases of the moon, and the alternations of the seasons. Because of the frequent recurrence of these occasions and their connection with ritual acts, the prayer loses its originally flexible, elastic outline, tends to become more rigid in the arrangement of thoughts and their wording, and finally hardens into fixed formulas whose words are chosen with the utmost care to obviate any displeasure on the part of the divinities invoked. Deities whose power is especially feared are generally referred to by affectionate and flattering names that emphasize their beneficent character and veil the darker side of their nature with conciliatory euphemism. As a result, there arises a particular prayer language, marked by great solemnity, wholly ritual in character, and regarded as sacred.

PRAYER IN THE GREAT ANCIENT RELIGIONS

In the ancient Chinese, Vedic, Babylonian, Egyptian, Homeric and old Roman religions, prayer in general retains the peculiar qualities of primitive prayer. It is essentially eudaemonistic, that is, directed toward the attainment of material blessings. The feeling for ethical values is seldom powerful enough to serve as a motive of prayer. The prayer of the Chinese religion is characterized by ceremonial stiffness, that of the Roman religion by legal formalism. In the Vedic-Brahmanic religion prayer is the business of the priestly caste. In possession of a comprehensive collection of prayer formulas, the priests alone know "the right art of prayer."

On the other hand, of the numerous Egyptian and Greek prayer hymns that have been preserved, many not only show a high degree of artistic perfection, but they also contain a lofty conception of the Deity and promote the tendency toward monotheism. The vitality and personal character of the Greek religion keep prayer from stiffening into a ritualistic formula and enable it to rise to ever higher moral purity. Prayer finds its most sublime expression in the petition of Socrates for "inward beauty." By excluding eudaemonism from piety and purifying the conception of the divine from all anthropomorphic features, Greek philosophy creates a new ethico-religious ideal of prayer. It is the product of rational and ethical criticism. Its content is threefold: petition for moral blessings, perfect surrender to the eternal decrees of fate, adoration and praise of divine greatness.

In Mystic Religions of Redemption. The mystic religions of redemption arrive at a spiritualization of the prayer by another route. Mystical prayer tends to pass from prayer in words, either uttered aloud or inwardly framed, to wordless prayer, to meditative absorption in the spiritual or metaphysical. It may be called a state of prayer rather than an act of prayer. In the various ramifications of Indian mysticism the prayer is largely replaced by silent contemplation that, gradually perfected by the means of the Yoga exercises (correct sitting posture, control of the process of breathing, withdrawal of the senses from the external world, calm and concentration), aims at the liberation of the soul from the mechanism of the forces of life and its final absorption in the Absolute (see YOGA). In the Neoplatonic religion of redemption, the most sublime manifestation of Hellenistic mysticism, contemplative prayer leads the mystic, in an ascent of the soul in successive steps, from the transitory world to a union with the One, the imperishable foundation of all existence.

In the Prophetic Religions. In the Pentateuch and in the Gāthas of the Avesta, which reflect the prophetic experiences of Moses and Zarathustra (Gr. Zoroaster), respectively, prayer appears as the spontaneous, personal communion with the Godhead, in which the harassing emotions of fear and doubt are first overcome by the feelings of hope and trust, and finally replaced by the blissful certainty of being cared for by the infinite goodness of an all-wise, omnipotent God.

The same spirit of prayer is alive in the Psalms of the Old Testament, which often begin with a troubled question and a moving lament, and then shift to heartfelt outpouring of trust, joy, praise, and thanksgiving; it is present also in the entreaties of the prophets who intercede with Yahweh for faithless, wayward Israel. With the Babylonian captivity and the end of the old sacrificial cult there arises a purely spiritual congregational worship in which the psalter becomes the prayer book of the exiled Jewish community. The religious vitality of the Jewish people, strengthened by a succession of highly gifted mystics, has protected Jewish prayer from petrification.

The development in the Iranian religion is different. With later Zoroastrianism hardening into a constricted, legalist religion, spontaneous devotional intercourse gives way to regular recitation of ethical prayer formulas, a practice considered as the performance of a duty imposed by divine law and a meritorious work.

A similar development takes place in Islamic prayer. While the prayer life of Muḥammad and his disciples is, in its spontaneity, akin to that of the Old Testament prophets, and the devotional piety in the Ṣūfistic mysticism of Islam shows personal warmth and fervor, the daily obligatory prayers and the liturgical prayers recited on Fridays and holidays in the mosque become ritually fixed in wording and gesture.

PRAYER (IN THE BIBLE)

There is no one definition of prayer that will completely cover all references to it in the Bible. Prayer is often described in terms of intercourse and spiritual communion with God, with or without the mediation of priests or heavenly beings; it is usually, but not necessarily, vocal. By it the petitioner's will and activities are identified with God, effecting an intimate personal contact and relationship with Him.

In the Old Testament. The most common Hebrew verb meaning to pray or intercede is hiṭpallēl; from it is derived the noun ṭṭpillā (prayer), which is often used in the Psalm titles. Several other Hebrew terms also are used in the sense of praying, e.g., qārā' (to call), hiṭhannēn (to seek favor), ṣā'āq (to cry aloud), and šāpak nepeš (to pour out one's soul).

Prayer as expressed in the Old Testament was founded upon the realization of the Israelites that Yahweh was present in their midst and acting in their behalf; His personal presence invited their response [Ps 17(18).7; 139(140).7–10; 1 Kgs 8.23–58]. The response on their part was the fruit of abiding confidence (see FAITH, 1) that God would hear and answer their prayer, because He had revealed His covenanted love [see LOVE (IN THE BIBLE)] for them and was powerful to help them. Later, as they came to realize Yahweh's constant active intervention in their behalf, they saw Him as creator and sustainer of the universe, and this idea, too, was frequently expressed in prayer [e.g., Ps 103 (104)].

The prayer of the Israelite was always deeply rooted in confidence in Yahweh's response [Ps 24(25).1–4; 27(28).6–7; 45(46); 90(91)]; a confidence so firm that accompanying expressions of thanksgiving appeared even in anticipation of the reception of favors they had petitioned [Ps 13(14); 22(23); 26(27); etc.]. Yet on occasion a certain anxiety about prayers' not being answered introduced a note of pleading, challenging, and even wrestling with Yahweh, as in Jeremiah and Job.

Spiritual blessings and, more frequently, temporal prosperity were the objects of Israelite prayer [Ps 16(17); 32(33); 53(54); 87(88)]. They petitioned life in the full sense: good health, long life, prosperity, rich progeny, the happiness of seeing fellow Israelites flourish, and the joy of participating in the worship of Yahweh [Ps 38(39); 41(42); 83 (84); 125 (126); Tb 8.10; 1 Sm 1.10–11]. Spiritual values of the highest order came to be embraced in their petitions. They desired to share in the praise of Yahweh and pleaded for the preservation of true religion, associated always, however, with the idea of triumphant vindication of Yahweh's own nation and the punishment of its enemies [Jgs 13.6–9; Ps 3; 10(11); Jer 17.14–18]. Their prayer involved intercession for others: for the king, for the country in which they were exiled, for their brethren in the faith, and in the latest period of their history, for those who had departed this life (1 Mc 12.11; 2 Mc 12.44).

Three types of prayer are evident: petition, thanksgiving, and those of a penitential character. Those of petition stated not only what was desired, but also frequently the reasons for the request (e.g., Jgs 16.28). Occasionally such prayers were lengthened by the adding of a summary of favors previously granted and often became so verbose in expressing the praise of Yahweh for earlier favors that they developed into a review of Israelite history [2 Chr 20.6–12; 1 Kgs 3.6–9; Ps 102(103)]. Penitential prayers, requesting forgiveness of sin and remission of punishment following a simple confession of guilt, were sometimes joined to a plea for deliverance from threatening danger and a promise of amendment (Jgs 10.10, 15; 1 Sm 12.10; Est 9.6–15; Dn 9.4–19). Prayers of thanksgiving for blessings received usually included an admission of man's unworthiness to receive divine favors [2 Sm 7.19–29; Ps 12(13).6; 21(22).26].

Some fixed formulas of prayer for certain occasions are found in the Old Testament. The priestly blessing (Nm 6.24) and the words said in offering the first fruits (Dt 26.3, 5–10) and tithes (Dt 26.13–15) are examples of early liturgical prayer formulas. Later, certain passages from Scripture were used as fixed types of prayer, e.g., the confession of faith known as the Shema (Dt 6.4–9; 11.13–21; Nm 15.37–41) and the Hallel [Ps 112(113)–117(118)].

Prayer was not limited to the place of public worship, however, but was offered anywhere; it accompanied sacrifice [Ps 21(22).26; 53(54).8; 115(116B).8; Jn 2.10] and the making of vows [1 Sm 1.11; Ps 64 (65)]. A quiet room in the home with a window facing Jerusalem was a favorite place for family prayer (Tb 3.11; Dn 6.11; 1 Kgs 8.38; 2 Chr 6.34). Prayer was often communal (Jl 2.15–17; Jdt 4.7–9; Jgs 10.10; 20.26–28). The Book of Psalms constitutes the inexhaustible source of relevant expressions for communication with God for all ages, places, persons, and conditions of earthly existence.

In the New Testament. The ordinary Greek terms used in the New Testament in regard to praying are προσεύχομαι (to pray) and προσευχή (prayer); several synonyms for praying, such as αἰτέω (to ask) and εὐ-τυγχάνω (to intercede), are used occasionally.

The Gospels often describe Christ in prayer (Lk 3.21; 5.16; 9.29; 10.21; 11.1; 22.32); He prayed, publicly as well as privately, before important acts and decisions (Lk 3.31; Mt 14.23; Heb 5.7). However, in virtue of His special relationship with the Father, He is presented as living in continuous prayer (Jn 1.51; 4.34; 8.29; 11.41). He taught His disciples to pray, giving them the sublime form expressed in the LORD'S PRAYER; yet, as is evident from its two variant recorded forms (Mt 6.9–13; Lk 11.2–4), He did not teach strict adherence to the formula, but to its spirit, "In this manner you shall pray. . . ."

The new relationship by which Christians come to the Father through Christ, that of adoptive sonship, forms the basis of prayer in the New Testament. A joyful awareness of this relationship evokes a deepened childlike loving confidence and tender intimacy whereby Christians come to pray to God with "unutterable sighs" of the Spirit (Rom 8.15, 26; Gal 4.6). The requisites for prayer are explicitly set forth: unshakable confidence born of faith (Mt 11.24; Lk 17.5; Jas 1.5); perseverance with urgent insistence (Mt 7.7–1; 15.21; Lk 11.1–13; 18.1–8; Eph 6.18; 1 Thes 5.17); absolute inner sincerity, as opposed to the hypocritical externalism of the Pharisee (Mt 6.5–8); humility; and the loving fulfillment of God's commandments. Where prayer fulfills these conditions, its efficacy is unlimited (Mk 11.24). Particular efficacy is ascribed to communal prayer of the Christian community (Mt 18.10; 1 Tm 2.1–2).

The Acts and Epistles show that the prayers of the early Christians were dominated by interests of the kingdom of God and spiritual values (Acts 4.29; 16.25; Rom 15.30; 2 Cor 2.11; Eph 6.19). Objects of prayerful intercession included not only fellow Christians, but all men, especially those in authority (1 Tm 2.1) and even enemies and persecutors (Mt 6.44; Lk 6.28).

Usually in the New Testament, all prayer, private as well as public liturgical prayer, is addressed to God the Father through Christ. Yet, occasionally, prayer is directed to Christ as Lord (Jn 14.14; Acts 7.59; Rom 10.12; 1 Cor 1.2; 2 Cor 12.8; 1 Tm 1.12). The various doxologies and hymns of adoration and praise form a veritable treasure house of prayer formulas (Rom 9.5; 11.36; 2 Cor 11.31; 16.27; 1 Pt 4.11; etc.).

PRAYER (THEOLOGY OF)

Prayer in its general notion and its differences of kind is here presented in the light of revelation, according to the teachings of the Church and Catholic theology.

PRAYER IN GENERAL

Prayer (Greek, ευχή, προσευχή; Latin, preces, but most frequently since the 2d century, oratio, meaning petition, request, pleading) is, in the strict sense, the filial expression of one's desires for self and others to the heavenly Father from whom come all good things, natural or supernatural. In a wider sense, it is the ascent of the mind to God; and in the widest sense, it is speaking with God. These three definitions are found in every age of the Christian Era.

History of the Christian concept. We are not concerned here with the notion of prayer in non-Christian religions (see PRAYER). For the idea of prayer as it is found in the Bible, see PRAYER (IN THE BIBLE).

Patristic Age. Prayer in the strict sense is a petition to God. St. Basil says prayer is “an appeal for good things made to God by devout people” (Patrologia Graeca 31:244). According to St. Augustine prayer is a petition (Patrologia Latina 38:409–414). St. John Damascene says, “To pray is to ask becoming things of God” (Patrologia Graeca 94:1089). The most perfect example of the Christian prayer of petition is the Our Father.

Prayer in a broad sense is “raising the mind to God” (St. John Damascene, ibid.; Evagrius of Pontus, PG 79:1173). In its broadest sense prayer is “speaking with God” [St. Gregory of Nyssa (ibid. 44:1124); St. Augustine, Serm. 130 de temp. (Patrologia Latina 39:1886); St. Jerome (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 54:178)] or as St. John Climacus says, “Prayer considered in its essence, is a conversation and union between God and man” (Patrologia Graeca 88:1129).

Scholastic Age. In the scholastic period, the definitions of the Fathers and early Church writers were analyzed and retained. St. Thomas, quoting Augustine and John Damascene, defines prayer (oratio) as petition and considers it in this sense in 17 articles of the Summa (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.1–17; 3a, 21.1; In 4 Sent., 15.4.1.1). He also attests to the wider definitions, citing St. John Damascene (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.1 ad 2) and St. John Chrysostom (ibid. 2a2ae, 83.2 ad 3). F. Suárez holds with St. Thomas that prayer in the strict sense is a petition to God and says that this is also the mind of St. Bonaventure, Richard of Middleton, OFM, and others (De oratione, 1.1.8).

Modern Age. With the decline of scholasticism, the notion of prayer was less and less restricted to petition, so that in the 16th and 17th centuries prayer frequently included meditation and the various degrees of contemplation. Consequently, while spiritual writers in the 20th century accept the patristic definitions of prayer and recognize that in the strict sense it is a petition, some show preference for the wide definition, “speaking with God.” This wide sense has the advantage of including all the forms of prayer while at the same time it emphasizes that prayer is not a monologue but a dialogue in which man responds to God, who has first spoken through His word and especially through the Word made Flesh [A. Fonck, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 13.1:175; J. de Guibert, Revue d'ascétique et de mystique (1930) 227].

Those who prefer the definition “the ascent of the mind to God” generally add the motive, or the end, since the elevation of the mind alone is insufficient for prayer. In study, for example, one thinks of God without praying. The “elevation of the mind,” therefore, is further qualified as both an affective and a noetic act, as is done in the following typical modern definition: “Praying means raising our hearts to God to praise Him and thank Him or ask something of Him.”

Value of prayer. There have always been some who find prayer worthless: the skeptics who say that God already knows one's needs, the Deists who say that contact with Him is impossible since He is not interested in the world, others who find petition an expression of selfishness, and those who find petition an unreasonable attempt on man's part to bend God's will to his own.

Against these errors Catholicism teaches that since God knows everything, prayer is not an attempt to inform Him of man's needs, but rather an act of acknowledgment of one's insufficiency and dependence on God. Furthermore, prayer is not selfishness since one seeks the object of prayer with humble submission to God's will and in obedience to His command (Lk 11.9–13). Finally, man cannot attain salvation without graces from God, and many of these according to divine providence are granted only in answer to prayer (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.2). Prayer, therefore, is not useless or selfish but a postulate of man's filial relationship with God. It is an obedient and loving response of a child to his Father.

More specifically, prayer has four special values in relation to man; namely, satisfactory, meritorious, impetratory, and psychologico-moral. In common with every good work (e.g., giving alms), prayer has satisfactory and meritorious value; that is, when man is in the state of grace, his prayer can obtain satisfaction for temporal punishment due to sin and can merit for him an increase of grace. The impetratory value, distinct from the meritorious value, is proper to prayer. Something merited is given in justice. Something obtained by impetration is given because of the generosity of the donor, who is in no way obliged to grant the gift. For example, the increase of grace merited by the prayer of the just man is bestowed in justice, since God has promised it to him. On the other hand, the gift of final perseverance, in no way promised as a reward for prayer or good actions, cannot be merited but is given in answer to prayer solely through the mercy of God. Likewise, the sinner cannot merit sanctifying grace in strict justice through prayer, but his prayer moves God to show mercy (ibid. 2a2ae, 83.16). The psychologico-moral value of prayer is a particular spiritual refreshment (ibid. 83.13): prayer furnishes the intellect with religious knowledge; produces in the will sentiments of admiration, respect, fear, joy, and desire for God; and makes the virtues of faith, hope, and charity more vital and dynamic in a person's life.

In view of all these effects, it is not surprising that the habitual practice of prayer is sanctifying. Spiritual writers emphasize its role in effecting detachment from creatures with hatred for sin and imperfections, progressive union with God, and gradual transformation into Christ.

Ends of prayer. Prayer in the broad sense may be directed, as is sacrifice, to one or several of four ends: adoration, thanksgiving, propitiation, and petition. Other classifications of ends—praise, love, abandonment to God's will—may ultimately be reduced to this classical division. Praise, for example, which is the expression of joy in adoration, is a specification of adoration. The four ends are proximate objectives of prayer, namely, acknowledgment of God's excellence and man's absolute dependence, gratitude for benefits received, sorrow for sins, and petition for fitting things. These ends are intimately connected so that often they form parts or elements of the one prayer of petition. In every petition there is at least virtually adoration, thanksgiving, and sorrow. This is clearly seen in the Our Father, essentially a prayer of petition, in which one finds adoration ("hallowed be Thy name") and sorrow ("forgive us our trespasses"). Thanksgiving for favors received is only implicitly expressed. While the prayer of the wayfarer is especially one of petition and sorrow, in heaven after the general judgment, when all petitions will have been fulfilled, the prayer of the blessed will be essentially one of adoration and thanksgiving.

Efficacy of prayer. To the prayer of petition alone Our Lord has added the promise of infallible efficacy. "Amen, amen, I say to you, if you ask the Father anything in my name, he will give it to you. Hitherto you have not asked in my name. Ask, and you shall receive, that your joy may be full" (Jn 16.24; Mt 7.7, 21–22). Theologians agree that this promise is infallibly fulfilled not only for the just man but even for the sinner, provided that a person prays for himself with the proper dispositions listed below and directs the prayers to an object that will be advantageous to his eternal salvation (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.14; 83.15 ad 2). Prayer for another is not always infallibly heard because resistance to the grace of God on the part of others is not under the control of the one who prays. Finally, prayers for souls in purgatory, certainly effectual in general, may not be heard for a particular soul, for one does not know what conditions God requires for prayer to be efficacious for a particular suffering soul.

Necessity and obligation of prayer. While the Sacraments and meritorious works are also means of obtaining God's grace, nevertheless, in the ordinary providence of God, for an adult, prayer of petition is a necessary means of salvation (ibid. 3a,39.5; Suárez, De oratione 1.28; A. Liguori, 2:428–430, citing St. Augustine and other theologians). St. Augustine, writing against the Pelagians, who denied the necessity of both grace and prayer, says "that God gives us a few things even when we do not pray, such as the beginning of faith, but that He has provided the rest, including final perseverance, only for those who pray" (Patrologia latina 45:1017). According to theologians, one can reduce to three the divine graces that cannot be merited but can be obtained only by prayer of petition: internal efficacious graces, the gift of final perseverance, and external efficacious graces [P. de Letter, "Merit and Prayer in the Life of Grace," Thomist 19 (1956) 472].

Because prayer is a necessary means of salvation, Christ has imposed upon man a precept to pray (Suárez, De oratione 1.28.4). "And he also told them a parable that they must always pray and not lose heart" (Lk 18.1). "Ask, and it shall be given to you; seek, and you shall find; knock, and it shall be opened to you" (Mt 7.7, 26.41; Col 4.2; Eph 6.17–18; 1 Thes 5.17; see Persons Who Pray, infra, for the time when the precept obliges).

Qualities of prayer. To be efficacious, prayer must be adorned with special qualities. It should be devout, attentive, full of confidence, and persevering.

Devotion. The will should be turned to God, humble and submissive, ready to do the things that concern His service (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.1). True devotion should not be confused with spiritual and sensible consolation, which may be present or absent in true prayer, because even in the state of aridity the will can be determined to serve God promptly. The more devout one is, the closer his friendship with God and the more likely the prayer will be heard (ibid. 114.6). Nevertheless, the sinner, although lacking devotion, is obliged to pray, and Christ often invited sinners to pray (Lk 18.13–14). “Oh, what a sweet consolation for a poor sinner, to know that his sins are no hindrance to his obtaining every grace he asks for, since Jesus Christ has promised that whatever we ask of God, through His merits, He will grant it all!” (A. Liguori, 2:441).

Attention. Some attention is required in every prayer. In mental prayer, internal attention is necessary, that is, the application of one’s intellectual faculties to the consideration of truths and the eliciting of affections. In the recitation of a vocal prayer, the minimum requirement is the intention of praying and external attention, that is, the avoidance of any act incompatible with the correct pronunciation of the words (e.g., writing or talking to another). Internal attention to the meaning of the prayer, while praiseworthy, is not necessary. Consequently, the recitation of prayers (e.g., the Divine Office in Latin) that one may not understand has satisfactory, meritorious, and impetratory value, and, if one’s thoughts are devoutly centered, may not be wanting in spiritual refreshment. Perfect attention in vocal prayer consists in turning the mind to God in loving adoration and union. The devout Christian will always try to have his mind and heart centered on God and the meaning of prayer (1 Cor 14.14–15). Involuntary distractions that come and go during prayer do not destroy its value.

Full of Confidence in God. One should pray in the name of Jesus, that is, full of confidence in His redemptive love and in the power of His merits to obtain from the Father what one asks. Thus in many official prayers of the Church addressed to the Father, the petition ends with the words “Through Christ our Lord.” To approach God with little or no hope is to offend Him (Jas 1.6).

Perseverance. One should never cease to ask in prayer. “And he told them a parable—that they must always pray and not lose heart” (Lk 18.1–7; 11.5–13; 21.36). Short, frequent, devout prayers are preferable to long, tedious ones, which tend to discourage lasting prayer.

Psychology of prayer. When man speaks to God to ask something, the intellect and the will, the supernatural virtues, and the emotions all play a part. In prayer the whole man with his natural and supernatural faculties goes forth to meet God. Other factors that influence prayer are the following: imagination and memory, the conscious and the unconscious, temperament, education, mental health, the cultural ambient, and other circumstances recognized in applied psychology. [G. Frei, “Gebet, psychologisch,” Lexikon für Theologie und Kirche (Freiburg 1957–65) 4:550–551].

Prayer in its strict sense is an act of the intellect. The intellectual act here is not merely speculative, an act of simple apprehension, judgment, or reasoning, but practical, i.e., causative: man asks God to do something (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.1). St. Thomas taught this doctrine against certain voluntarists such as Hugh of Saint-Victor (Patrologia Latina 176:474) and St. Bonaventure (In 3 sent, 17.1.1; ad 3), who considered prayer an affective motion of the will. As St. Bonaventure pointed out, the prayer of petition is not the desire of the heart, but the interpreter and expression of that desire (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.1 ad 1). Both intellect and will are operative, it is true, but prayer is formally of the intellect because the will’s role is to move the intellect to make the petition.

Besides the intellect and will there are other faculties, and these are supernatural, that function in Christian prayer. Prayer, while it involves the exercise of the theological virtues, is actually an act of the moral virtue of religion. The theological virtues are rather dispositions for prayer. They enable man to enter into divine intimacy with God. The virtues of faith and hope, for example, give man the proper and befitting disposition of belief and trust in the goodness of God, his Father, as he stands before Him pleading for his needs. The habit of charity, too, should be present, although the sinner who is without habitual grace and the habit of charity can and should pray with the help of actual grace. Perfect prayer, however, the prayer of the loving child, is the one that is directed by charity. Prayer should be an expression of one’s friendship with God, just as it is an expression of one’s faith and hope.

But to elicit an act of prayer is proper to the virtue of religion. Religion gives God the honor that His divine nature deserves. Every prayer is an act of homage in which man bows before God, recognizing that all good things come from Him. Prayer, then, is an act of the virtue of religion and after devotion the principal act of this virtue. Without prayer religion would be merely external, like a body without a soul.

The moral virtues, some more than others, are, like the theological virtues, dispositions for prayer. Humility, obedience, penance, and fortitude, for example, are virtues that provide the qualities of prayer mentioned in the preceding section: humility, submission, contrition, and perseverance. While prayer depends upon the infused virtues, the emphasis here is to show that the virtues depend on prayer for their increase and subsequent influence on man's moral conduct. The Church prays, "Almighty, everlasting God, grant us increase of faith, hope, and charity" (Collect for the 13th Sunday after Pentecost).

The intellect and will elevated and perfected by the virtues are thus the efficient cause of prayer. But in their complex activity at prayer, as at other things, these higher faculties are sometimes influenced for good or evil by the emotions, which can be useful or harmful to the spiritual life of man. In prayer, controlled or reasonable emotions can stimulate and help one to pray more intensely. Joy can excite one to fervent adoration and petition. On the other hand, uncontrolled emotions (e.g., violent anger and fear) can disturb the attention of the intellect and make prayer difficult or almost impossible. In general the emotions, controlled by reason and faith, should be made to aid prayer.

Persons who pray. Only intellectual beings can pray. In their order of excellence they may be listed as follows: Christ as man, the Virgin Mary, the angels, the blessed, the souls in purgatory, and wayfarers. The devils and damned souls cannot pray for they are turned irrevocably away from God.

Although our concern here is primarily with the wayfarer, it is important to observe that the object of prayer will vary according to the state of the one who prays. For example, Christ in His human nature adores the Father and renders eternal thanks to Him in heaven. He also intercedes for mankind. The Virgin Mary prayed on earth and prays now in heaven, where she intercedes for mankind, obtaining by her suppliant omnipotence the graces that man needs for salvation. The angels can pray for an increase in their accidental glory and for the salvation of mankind. The blessed can petition for the glorification of their body on the day of final judgment, for accidental glory of honor and cult, and for all the needs of men on earth. The souls in purgatory can pray for themselves, although they are not able to satisfy or merit a condonation of their punishment. St. Thomas thought that the souls in purgatory do not know the needs of the faithful and consequently cannot help them (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.4 ad 3), but some theologians hold as a pious opinion that the souls in purgatory do intercede for the faithful (Suárez, De oratione 2.8.25–28). In spite of this opinion, in liturgical prayers the Church never prays to the poor souls but always prays for them.

As for the wayfarer, whether he be in grace or in sin, he should in the first place pray for himself. Second, charity urges him to pray for his neighbor, "Pray for one another that you may be saved" (Jas 5.16). In particular, prayer should be made for the Holy Father, bishops, priests, religious, members of the Church, catechumens, the suffering, enemies, the souls in purgatory, rulers of states, and for all outside the Church that there may be one flock and one shepherd. No one except the damned should ever be excluded from prayer, for charity must extend to all. In the mind of the Church, prayer's social value is immeasurable. "This is truly a tremendous mystery upon which we can never meditate enough: that the salvation of many souls depends upon the prayers and voluntary mortifications offered for that intention by the members of the Mystical Body of Jesus Christ, and upon the cooperation which pastors and faithful and especially parents must afford to our Divine Saviour" [Pius XII MysCorp 27–28]. Obviously, one does not pray for the blessed in heaven, except in the sense of praying that their name be held in higher esteem and their virtues be more widely imitated.

Those to whom prayer is addressed. Man prays to the one, triune God: the Father, the Son, and the Holy Spirit. One may direct his prayer to all three Persons or to one of them. Liturgical prayers usually address the Eternal Father through His only-begotten Son. But on some occasions, even during the Holy Sacrifice of the Mass, prayers are immediately directed to Christ, for the Man Jesus Christ is truly God (ibid. 81). The first known prayer addressed to Christ is that of St. Stephen, "Lord Jesus, receive my spirit . . . Lord, do not lay this sin against them" (Acts 7.60). One prays to the Blessed Virgin, to the angels and saints in heaven, but only in the sense that they may intercede before God for us. To God one prays, "Have mercy on us"; to the saints "Pray for us," as the litanies exemplify.

Objects of prayer. For what does one pray? One asks for all desirable goods and in the order that Christ has given us in the Our Father. One asks absolutely for God's glory, the coming of His kingdom, the fulfillment of His will by men and for salvation and the graces necessary and useful for it. "All our prayers should be directed to the acquisition of grace and glory" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.4). One asks for temporal goods conditionally, that is, if they are expedient for salvation. No one would expect from God anything that would be injurious. Consequently God does not grant every request for good health, gainful employment, and other worldly goods that He foresees may be spiritually harmful. Nevertheless, prayers for temporal goods are heard by God, and some spiritual good (e.g., merit and spiritual refreshment) can be obtained.

Circumstances of prayer. Although one can pray for fitting things at any time, in any place, and in any posture, there are certain principles that govern the order of prayer.

Time. When must one pray? It is difficult to determine precisely when this obligation binds. Nevertheless, it can safely be said that one is bound to pray many times a year. Some say that to omit prayer for one month or at least for two months could be a mortal sin [J. Aertnys and C. A. Damen, Theologia moralis (Turin 1958) 1.414]. “We must certainly pray in temptations that cannot, without prayer, be overcome; also when other precepts (e.g., the precept of confession) require prayer, and on occasions (such as war, famine, pestilence) when divine help is necessary. Lastly, we must pray at the hour of death if we are not in the grace of God, for then most of all it behooves us to be friends of God” [H. Davis, Moral and Pastoral Theology (London 1941) 2.7]. Catholics who pray at Mass on Sundays and feast days surely fulfill the divine precept to pray often. Although there is no precept to say morning and evening prayers or table prayers, these are laudable Christian customs and should not be neglected. The good Christian will pray many times each day.

Place. Certain places, such as a church or one’s private room, lend themselves to recollection and are more conducive to prayer. But if one wishes to learn to pray always, one must become accustomed to speak to God in short prayers while walking, riding, sitting, or working. In a word, one can pray wherever one may happen to be.

Posture. The general rule is to assume a posture that helps one to pray better and with less hindrance. One may kneel, sit, stand, walk, or lie down. Exterior reverence, being an outward sign of interior sentiment, should regulate the circumstances of prayer, but in such a way as not to cause discomfort, admiration, or embarrassment to others. One’s interior devotion or state of health will often indicate external behavior; for example, the sick will be forced to pray while lying down and fervent souls may be moved, as early Christians were, to stand erect with hands extended, imitating Christ on the cross.

MENTAL PRAYER

In general, prayer is mental when the internal acts of intellect and will are not expressed externally in words or gestures. In modern usage the term is not restricted to an internal petition but embraces every interior act of faith, hope, charity, every thought of God with the object of serving Him and of fostering charity and the other virtues, every movement of praise, thanksgiving, penance, petition, adoration, and love.

Kinds of mental prayer. As an exercise in the spiritual life, mental prayer may be either formal or diffused (virtual). It is diffused when internal acts are intermingled with other occupations, as in the practice of aspirations while cooking or sewing. It is formal when a definite space of time is devoted to making these internal acts to the exclusion of all other occupations.

Necessity of formal mental prayer. There are some simple souls with little education who cannot regularly practice formal mental prayer and nevertheless by the devout practice of vocal prayer and asceticism come to a high state of perfection. For this reason it cannot be said that formal mental prayer is necessary for all who strive for Christian perfection. Nevertheless, it is a normal means of Christian perfection, and usually it cannot be neglected without spiritual loss (De Guibert, The Theology of the Spiritual Life, 210). Its daily practice is strongly recommended to the clergy and religious in Canon Law (1917 Codex iuris canonici cc.125.2, 595.1n2) and by numerous popes. Pius XII, writing to the clergy in Menti Nostrae [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 42 (1950) 657] says there is no substitute for it; and John XXIII in the first Roman Synod made the daily practice of prayerful meditation a law for clerics living in Rome because “this is very necessary to foster piety in souls” [Prima Romana Synodus (Rome 1960) 28]. St. Thomas says that meditation is necessary for devotion (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 82.3).

Division of formal mental prayer. Since the 17th century, it has been common among spiritual writers to distinguish three degrees of formal mental prayer: (1) discursive, (2) affective, and (3) contemplative. The latter is subdivided into acquired contemplation (also called active contemplation or the prayer of simplicity) and infused contemplation (passive contemplation or mystical prayer). Here emphasis will be placed on the basic form of mental prayer, namely, discursive prayer or meditation. (For the other degrees, and infused contemplation, see CONTEMPLATION.)

Discursive prayer or meditation is most strongly recommended for beginners in the spiritual life, although it remains most useful even for the advanced (H. U. von Balthasar, Prayer 211). It is composed of reasoning, analyses of concepts, and comparisons, as well as affections, resolutions, and communion with God and the saints. Its characteristic element is the predominance of reasoning and consideration. It has always been practiced by God-fearing people in some form or other, as is evident in the Scriptures [Ps 38(39).4; 62(63).7; 76(77).13; 1:18(119); Eph 6.18; Col 4.2; 1 Tm 4.15; 1 Cor 14.15]. In the course of time, systematic methods of this type of prayer were constructed. Here only the principal ones and their value will be considered. All modern methods, as we shall see, are essentially the same, and one or another is used more or less regularly by seminarians, priests, religious, and devout lay people at set periods of the day. But history shows that this was not always so.

The early Christian Fathers and monks had daily periods of holy reading (lectio divina), during which they often meditated and prayed. The Rule of St. Benedict provided for about four hours of reading every day and recommended that the monks frequently give themselves to prayer.

Methods of Mental Prayer. It is only in the Middle Ages that the foundations of methodical prayer were prepared. Guigo II, a Carthusian, in his small masterpiece Scala claustralium (c. 1145) tells how monks prayed in the 12th century. He presents four steps of man's "spiritual exercise": reading, meditation, prayer, and contemplation. Reading is the application of the mind to the Holy Scriptures, meditation the careful consideration of the truths, prayer the heart beseeching God (petition), and contemplation the soul resting in God. These parts of prayer are intimately linked: the first are of little use without the others, and the last are rarely attained without the first. Through these four steps man ascends to union with God. St. Bernard made a remarkable contribution to the technique of mental prayer by teaching souls to center their meditations on the mysteries of Christ and by outlining a formula for meditation. Later, in the 14th and 15th centuries, under the influence of St. Bonaventure, who suggested how to apply the faculties in meditation and prayer (De triplici via 1.19), the Franciscans popularized meditation on the life of Christ [Meditations on the Life of Christ, St. Bonaventure (Princeton 1961)].

However, it was only in the 15th century with the DEVOTIO MODERNA that the first full-scale systematic methods of meditation were developed. In 1483 John Wessel Gansfort composed his Scala meditatoria and presented a method of 23 steps. This set the pattern for future methods, but with time they were simplified. In 1500, Ximenes Garcia Cisneros, abbot of Montserrat, produced such a simplified method, with subjects for each day of the week. St. Ignatius, who visited Montserrat after his conversion, was probably familiar with it. In the 16th century, many methods were developed among the new apostolic congregations—the Jesuits, Oratorians, Minims, and Theatines—all of them seeking a practical prayer for their active life. The most influential treatise in this development of methodical prayer was the SPIRITUAL EXERCISES of Ignatius Loyola. In the same century, another important method, often underestimated, was that of Louis of Granada, which was later simplified by Peter of Alcántara; this highly effective method was recommended by Teresa of Avila and influenced the method used among Carmelites and other religious orders [Gabriel of St. Mary Magdalen, La mistica Teresiana (Fiesole 1935) 52; K. Healy, Methods of prayer in the Directory of the Carmelite reform of Touraine (Rome 1956) 108–120]. In the following centuries Francis de Sales (2.2–7) and Alphonsus de Liguori evolved their own methods but with dependence on Ignatius and Louis of Granada. Finally came the method of Father Olier, later developed and known as the Sulpician method, which is highly affective and Christocentric. These methods, still in use, are helpful for progress in the spiritual life. But since the Holy Spirit is the principal guide in prayer, methods should be subordinated to His divine action.

Every method has three essential parts: the preparation, the body of prayer, and the conclusion. Although commonly considered in relation to discursive prayer, these three parts can be found also in affective prayer and the prayer of simplicity. We consider them here especially in relation to discursive prayer. The preparation is remote and proximate. The former consists in one's accumulated religious experience; the latter includes reading the subject before the meditation, or at least at its beginning, placing oneself in the presence of God, and asking His help to meditate well. The subject matter varies with individual tastes and needs. The body of prayer consists in the profound consideration of the subject matter with consequent affections. The memory, imagination, and intellect serve to arouse the will to elicit affections. Consequently the actions of these faculties should cease, once the will is moved. Even in times of aridity, ample attention should be given to thoughts and affections but without violently attempting to arouse the will to devotion. A specific resolution, although beneficial in every meditation, is not necessary.

The conclusion, especially important in the Ignatian method, always consists of a colloquy with God, our Lady, or the saints. Attention should also be given to acts of adoration, thanksgiving, and petition. Francis de Sales and others suggest a spiritual "nosegay," that is, taking some thought or affection from the meditation to ponder during the day. In this way meditation extends its influence over the whole day.

Such is the general plan of mental prayer in all the methods. The various ways of developing the body of the meditation give rise to the different methods of prayer. (1) In the method of the three faculties, the best known of the many methods proposed by Ignatius (Spiritual Exercises, 1st week), the memory and intellect play an important part. The use of these faculties is important for beginners who stand in need of profound thought before conviction and affections are reached. (2) In the method of contemplation (ibid., 2d week), the intellect with the aid of the imagination contemplates or considers a mystery in the life of Christ, for example, the Christ Child in the manger, the bleeding Christ of the cross. The persons, the words, the actions, etc., that pertain to the particular mystery are then considered (who, what, why, when, by what means, etc.). Finally, a practical application is made to oneself. (3) In the method of the application of the senses (ibid.), one employs the five senses to move the will to affections.

Other beneficial methods that can be used in the body of the prayer, especially for those who have difficulty with the standard discursive methods, are meditative reading and mixed prayer. In the first one reads, then reflects, in order to move the will. Such a process is repeated during the period of prayer, as often as necessary (Teresa, The Complete Works 2.69). In mixed prayer (oral and mental) one employs a fixed formula (e.g., the Our Father) and repeats it slowly, stopping to reflect after each thought or petition, with the intention of eliciting affections (Ignatius, 4th week).

Affective Prayer. This kind of prayer stands between discursive and contemplative prayer. It received this name in the 16th century (Philippe, "Mental Prayer in the Catholic Tradition," Mental Prayer and Modern Life 51). It is not discursive prayer because it has little or no reasoning and the affections predominate. It is not contemplative prayer because it has a multiplicity of affections (e.g., humility, sorrow, hope, love), whereas contemplation is characterized by its simplicity of affection. Although it is proper to those who have progressed in mental prayer, Teresa of Avila, who practiced it, recommended it even for beginners (The Complete Works 1.71). In fact she defines mental prayer in terms of affective prayer. "And mental prayer, in my view, is nothing but friendly intercourse, and frequent solitary converse, with Him Who we know loves us" (1.50). Carmelite and Franciscan spirituality lean heavily toward affective prayer, as did the original method of Father Olier (Lercaro, Methods of Mental Prayer 2–36). Some even consider the method of contemplation and the application of senses in the spiritual exercises of St. Ignatius as forms of affective prayer (Tanqueray, The Spiritual Life 989–995).

Those who practice affective prayer must at times return to discursive prayer to keep the mind occupied and the will motivated. For unless convictions are deeply rooted, there is danger of mere sentimentality with little effect on one's moral life, especially in those of an affectionate temperament. But should the Holy Spirit invite one to leave discursive prayer for affective prayer, it is important to recognize the opportune time. The signs for the transition are the following: considerations become fruitless, convictions are so deeply rooted that the will is easily moved, and the soul tends easily and gladly toward God.

Diffused mental prayer (virtual prayer). Besides formal mental prayer, the soul may engage in exercises of mental prayer that consist in short, frequent internal acts in the midst of daily occupations. The chief forms of this practice are the following: (1) the exercise of the presence of God, (2) prayer of aspirations, and (3) the renewal of the good intention. Acts of conformity with and abandonment to the will of God and short periods of recollection and retreat may also accompany these practices. This value of diffused prayer consists in prolonging the thoughts and affections of formal mental prayer and thus influencing and pervading man's conduct throughout the day. For this latter reason it is called virtual prayer. By this prayer one does "the work of Martha with the spirit of Mary" (J. M. Perrin, "Making One's Life a Prayer," Mental Prayer and Modern Life 113). Thus, the conjunction of diffused prayer with other spiritual exercises enables one to fulfill to an eminent degree the admonition of Christ to pray always and not to lose heart (Lk 18.1; 1 Thes 5.17).

The Exercise of the Presence of God. This is a practice in which the soul thinks lovingly of God frequently throughout the day and often speaks to Him in aspirations, ejaculations, or colloquies without interrupting or neglecting one's daily duties. This is dealt with elsewhere (see PRESENCE OF GOD, PRACTICE OF).

Prayer of Aspirations. According to their role in the spiritual life aspirations are brief, fervent elevations of the heart to God. Sometimes they are called ejaculations because like arrows shot toward their target, they go quickly to the object of the affections. In this sense they are affective prayers proceeding from charity. Generally speaking, therefore, the greater the charity, the more perfect and frequent the aspirations. The faithful practice of discursive prayer is a normal disposition for the prayer of aspirations, which is often considered a distinct exercise of prayer. Some, however, prefer to make aspirations the predominant part of the exercise of the presence of God, in which the memory recalls God's presence, the intellect focuses its attention upon Him, and the will fervently turns toward Him in aspirations (F. Blosius, Book of Spiritual Instruction, ch. 4, 6; A. Liguori, Complete Ascetical Works 1.508; and Carmelite Directory, 439–480). Such a mode of presentation has many advantages, but one should remember that the exercise of the presence of God does not always terminate in aspirations, but sometimes in loving thoughts or even colloquies.

The Good Intention. There is not a single action of the day that cannot be directed to God's glory, subjected to His will, and offered for the good of the Church and the salvation of souls. It is usually done through the good intention made in the morning offering and renewed at intervals throughout the day. "I offer to Thee, O my God, all my thoughts, words, acts, and sufferings of this day; grant that they may all tend to Thy glory and my salvation." To make the intention more pure, one should have removed not only every bad motive but every natural motive and strive to act from love (J. M. Perrin, "Making One's Life a Prayer," Mental Prayer and Modern Life 114). To act from lesser supernatural motives, e.g., obedience, gratitude, renders the act less perfect but still meritorious. However, sometimes only a lesser supernatural motive will be effective, and it is better to use it. One may act with many motives, e.g., desire for happiness, fear of hell, but should try to place them all under the direction of "Making One's Life a Prayer," Mental Prayer and Modern Life love [A. Rodriguez, The Practice of Christian Perfection, (Chicago 1929)]. The renewal of the good intention not only exercises influence on one's actions but prolongs prayer throughout the day. Alphonsus de Liguori considers it along with aspirations as part of the exercise of the presence of God (Complete Ascetical Works 1.510).

Purity of intention is aided by joining it with acts of conformity to God's will. To say often "Thy will be done" in union with the good intention helps one to act from a more pure love (ibid. 604). Pope John XXIII granted a plenary indulgence to be gained once each day under the usual conditions by the faithful who in the morning offer to God their labor of the whole day, whether intellectual or manual, using any formula of prayer, and a partial indulgence of 500 days as often as with contrite heart they offer the work at hand, using any formula of prayer [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 53 (1961) 827].

Vocal Prayer

From the point of view of expression, prayer is vocal when it is manifested externally in words or, sometimes, in gestures. An internal act of the mind is always presupposed. Vocal prayer may be an intimate and personal cry that springs spontaneously from the heart, but more often than not it is a recitation of a fixed formula, for example, the Our Father, psalms, hymns, and such repetitive prayers as litanies, the angelus, and the rosary. (For an excellent collection of prayers, see A. Hamman.)

Usefulness. In opposition to Quietists the Church has defended the usefulness of vocal prayer for every state of the spiritual life (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2234). Everyone should at times pray vocally for the following reasons: first, to awaken thoughts and desires that may have been dormant, and thus, to stimulate devotion; second, to serve God with the body as well as the soul, for the whole man should serve God with all that he has from Him; third, to express the feelings of the soul that naturally find their outlet in the body; and last, to give good example to others (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 83.12; 91.1).

Kinds. Vocal prayer may be private (either individual or common) or public, depending on whether one prays in his own name or officially in the name of society. Private prayer is individual when said alone, communal when recited in a group (e.g., the family rosary). Public prayer, called by St. Thomas "common prayer" (ibid. 2a2ae, 83.12), requires the following three conditions: use of an approved formula, recitation in the name of the society, which for the Christian is the Church, and legitimate delegation. Consequently, a priest or cleric in major orders who recites the Divine Office alone, offers public prayer because he not only uses the approved formulas but because as the Church's official delegate he prays in her name (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 3757).

Liturgical prayer. The public prayer of the Church is called liturgical prayer and is found in liturgical actions, namely, in the Mass, the Sacraments, the Divine Office, the sacramentals, and Benediction of the Blessed Sacrament [J. H. Miller, Fundamentals of the Liturgy, (Notre Dame, Ind. 1960) 27–28]. In all liturgical prayer it is Christ who prays in the first place, and His members pray only insofar as they pray through Him, with Him, and in Him. In the Mass, for example, Christ is the High Priest and Victim with whom the faithful spiritually associate themselves and along with the priest at the altar offer themselves with Him and through Him to the Eternal Father.

The relative excellence of liturgical prayer in comparison with private prayer, especially mental prayer, has often been discussed [L. Bouyer, Liturgical Piety (Notre Dame, Ind. 1955) 243–256]. The Church's teaching is quite clear: "It is true that liturgical prayer, being the public prayer of the august Bride of Christ, is superior to private prayers; but this superiority does not mean that there is any conflict or incompatibility between them" (Pius XII, Mediator Dei). Indeed, there exists the greatest harmony between private prayers and liturgical prayer, and both are necessary if Christ is to be formed in man. Consequently, private devotions (e.g., the Rosary or the Way of the Cross) may be considered as aids to the liturgical cult. Through them the Christian is prepared to offer the Sacrifice of the Mass with better dispositions, to receive the Sacraments with more fruit, and to participate in the sacred rites with greater fervor and recollection. "But these devotions should be so drawn up that they harmonize with the liturgical seasons, accord with the sacred liturgy, are in some fashion derived from it, and lead the people to it, since, in fact, the liturgy by its very nature far surpasses any of them" (Vatican Council II, Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy 13).

PRAYER, CENTERING

The prayer of centering is a process of turning inward to gather the faculties to a center in the depths of the self. The integration of body, mind, and spirit in a point of stillness releases deeper levels of consciousness and opens the self to more contemplative union with God, not as an object of meditation but as a presence within and the source of all being. In contemporary writing on Christian prayer the term "centering" reflects the influence of Eastern spirituality and depth psychology and suggests the action of a potter bringing clay into a spinning, unwobbling pivot on the wheel. Commonly used techniques to facilitate centering are rhythmical breathing, process meditation, the use of a mantra, mandala, or sacred symbol, and the repetition of the JESUS PRAYER.

Centering Prayer is a modern name drawn from the writings of Thomas MERTON (Fr. Louis, OCSO of Gethsemani Abbey) for the ancient method of meditation or prayer found in the writings of Saint John Cassian (d. 435) and once attributed to Abba Isaac (Second Conference). It comes from the same source as the Jesus Prayer, namely, the Fathers of the Desert, but represents the greater suppleness with which it was passed on in the West. The most notable representative of this prayer form in English spiritual writings is the anonymous author of The CLOUD OF UNKNOWING. The method as refined and popularly presented by the Cistercian monks of Saint Joseph Abbey in Spencer, Massachusetts may be summarized in this way:

1. Sit relaxed and quiet.
2. Be in faith and love to God who dwells in the center of your being.
3. Take up a love word and let it be gently present, supporting your being to God in faith-filled love.
4. Whenever you become aware of anything else, simply, gently return to the Lord with the use of your prayer word.
5. After 20 minutes of meditation let the Our Father (or some other prayer) pray itself quietly within you.

PRAYER BOOKS

Collections of prayers, hymns, meditations, etc., intended for private or community devotions; to be distinguished from collections containing the official texts used in liturgical services. Some prayer books contain both private prayers and liturgical texts, while others contain various prayers—often paraphrases of the liturgical text—for silent reading during liturgical services. So common were these latter collections over the past century that the Missal itself has been frequently referred to in common parlance as a prayer book. It is noteworthy here that even the Missale Romanum includes private prayers as preparation for and thanksgiving after Mass for ad libitum recitation by the priest.

There is no extant collection of private prayers from the early Christian era; in fact there is not even a mention or intimation of such a collection in apostolic and patristic documents. While it is true that the Scriptures, the works of the apostolic Fathers, the Martyrology, and early papyri and ostraca contain individual prayers of many types, yet there is no actual collection of private prayers from the ancient Church that can be classified as a prayer book in the contemporary sense of the term. The short collections of prayers found in the Didache, Hippolytus, the Apostolic Constitutions, and the Euchologium of Serapion—to name but a few—must all be considered liturgical rather than private. The systematic destruction of Christian documents during the persecution of Diocletian can be blamed for the paucity of extant documents from the early Church period.

The obvious question engendered by this dearth of evidence is: Did the early, literate Christian use any particular book for his private devotions? Although the testimony is somewhat indirect, there is evidence in the popularity of the commentaries on the Psalms by Augustine and Cassiodorus, as well as from statements by Cassian (De coenob. inst. 2.5; Patrologia Latina 49:34) and Eusebius (In psalm.; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne 23:647), that the Book of Psalms sufficed both for private and public devotion. Indeed the popularity of the Psalter (the texts of the Psalms along with liturgical and private prayers) during the whole of the Middle Ages lends additional strength to this judgment. The Psalms were to become the basis of the later Divine Office; and the famous teacher of Charlemagne's court, Alcuin, was to write a work on the use of the Psalter for private devotion (De psalmorum usu liber; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne 101:465–508). The large number of extant Psalters from both East and West also bespeaks the popularity of this type of collection for private and liturgical devotion. It is often the case, however, that surviving manuscripts were “collectors’ items” from the beginning, and their lack of use no doubt contributed to their survival. The very fact of their desirability as collectors’ items is indirect evidence for the existence of innumerable other, simply executed Psalters worn to destruction by their devout readers.

Examples of Surviving Semiliturgical Prayer Books. The earliest extant Psalters from the Church of the East come only from the 9th and 10th centuries, but their illustrations and text frequently show that they had been copied from models dating back to the early centuries of the Christian Church. These books from the East, on the basis of the sumptuousness of their production, are generally divided into two groups: aristocratic and monastic. The first group is representative of those deluxe editions that only the wealthy could afford; they were produced for the aristocracy of Constantinople and for the members of the imperial court of that city. The manuscripts are frequently characterized by the typical Byzantine gold ink and purple dye, and often betray in their illustrations the neoclassic style that developed after the period of iconoclasm. Representative of the aristocratic or “aulic” Psalter are the Paris Psalter (Bibliothèque Nationale) and the Psalter of Basil II (Biblioteca Marciana, Venice), both of which are outstanding for their rich and extensive illumination. The second group, much less ornate, was intended for more ascetical tastes and practical use; but even among the manuscripts of this group marginal illustrations are to be found, and these were to become quite common in the prayer books of the East during the 10th and 11th centuries. Typical of the monastic group are the Theodore Psalter, named after its illuminator, Theodore of Caesarea, and a profusely illustrated Psalter of the 11th century. The former is now in the British Museum; the latter is designated as “Ms suppl. 14” in the Walters Art Gallery collection in Baltimore. Psalters were continuously copied for private devotion in the East throughout the Middle Ages up to the time of the fall of Constantinople in the middle of the 15th century.

In the West the Psalter was to remain a popular book of devotion into the 15th century, even after the later Book of Hours overshadowed its popularity to some degree. Extant Psalters from the 9th to the 15th centuries are generally illuminated and many of them represent the finest artistry of the period. Among the better known Psalter of the age, the Utrecht Psalter, produced by the school of Rheims in the 9th century, presents enigmas both to the art historian and the paleographer. Its lively, unadorned outline drawings are a shocking contrast to the elaborately colored and static illustrations found in the typical books of the time. And where one would expect the usual Caroline minuscule writing, this Psalter has instead a combination of scriptura communis (rustic capital) for the general text and uncial for the titles and incipits. Although logically plausible explanations have been offered for these peculiarities, the Utrecht Psalter still remains a strikingly unique work of the Caroline period. As is usual with Psalters of the Middle Ages, this manuscript contains, in addition to the texts of the Psalms themselves, the Pater Noster, Ave Maria, Gloria, Credo, and other formulas used both for private and liturgical exercises. Every Psalm in the work contains an illustration that either literally or figuratively explains the text. The Utrecht Psalter was brought to England toward the end of the 10th century, where it was used as a model for other illuminated Psalters in later centuries, and had some influence on manuscript illustration there. The work is now owned by the university library at Utrecht.

British Psalters. From Britain, where the Canterbury school produced the first artistic books of southern England, comes the Canterbury Psalter (British Museum), known also as the St. Augustine Psalter; it was written and illuminated around the middle of the 8th century, and consequently is one of the earliest such works extant today. Its elaborate illumination presents a mine of material for the art historian as well as for the historian of books and writing. From the later Winchester School of book production come two important Psalters: the Arun del Psalter (British Museum) of the late 11th or early 12th century, whose illuminations have been described as in the finest style of English art; and the Winchester or St. Swithin's Psalter (British Museum) produced in the St. Swithin's scriptorium in the middle of the 12th century. During the 12th, 13th, and 14th centuries England produced a large number of truly beautiful Psalters, many of which are proud showpieces in the libraries that own them today. The Windmill Psalter, Tickhill Psalter, and a legion of other masterpieces are adequately described in the standard histories of manuscript illumination mentioned in the bibliography, and frequently the better known Psalters have been published in facsimile with elaborate introductions. Suffice it here to mention only one more of these prayer books that appeared in the later period of the Psalter's popularity as a book of private devotion: the so-called Queen Mary's Psalter. Although executed in the first half of the 14th century, it carries the name of Mary Tudor to whom it was presented in 1553, after it had been confiscated by customs officials on its surreptitious way to the Continent. It is profusely illustrated with outline drawings filled in with transparent washes, and represents one of the finest works of the East Anglian school of illumination. The manuscript is now a proud possession of the British Museum.

The few Psalters mentioned above are only representative of the many extant manuscripts that indicate the devotional and artistic trends of their times. The use of the Psalter is, of course, of particular interest to us in that it formed the basis of both the Divine Office and its offspring, the Book of Hours, which appeared as the popular prayer book of the laity during the last few centuries of the medieval period.

Books of Private Prayers. Contemporary with the Psalters of the Carolingian period were the first extant collections of private prayers: books containing prayers composed by the early Church Fathers, along with the usual Pater, Ave, and some popular Psalms. Several of these prayer books have been edited and published from manuscripts in recent years; four of them, written between the years 800 and 850, were published by Dom A. Wilmart (Precum Libelli IV aevi Karolini, Rome 1940) and represent collections of private prayers that are typical not only of the Middle Ages, but of modern times as well. The first book of the group, entitled Libellus Trecentensis by its editor, was written in the early 9th century at Tours; it contains prayers composed by Augustine, Jerome, Gregory, Ephraem, Isidore, and other early writers, and includes some Psalms and prayers to be recited at certain hours. The second work in Wilmart's edition is entitled Libellus Parisinus, probably written at Tours also, c. 820; it has a prayer of St. Martin along with various anonymous prayers and devotions for certain hours of the day. The Libellus Coloniensis, third of the group, was composed probably in Cologne in 805; its contents include prayers for various activities of the day, prayers before each of the penitential Psalms, a prayer of Ambrose, and various others, and anonymous prayers. The final work of the collection is a comparatively large book called Magnus Libellus Turonensis, written in 850 at Tours. In addition to the usual prayers before various daily activities, it includes the Confessio S. Fulgentii, the litany, prayers after the penitential Psalms, hymns for different hours, various prayers and hymns for different seasons and feasts, and the "Little Psalter" of Bede.

Other early prayer books that are of interest include the famous Book of Cerne (Cambridge University Library), written in Mercia in the early 9th century and extensively illuminated. It is a compilation from various sources showing both Roman and Irish influences in its prayers. The collection includes 74 prayers and hymns, the Psalter of Aethelwold, and the apocryphal Descensus ad inferna; the book begins with the Passion story as told by the evangelists. This medieval prayer book was edited and published by A. B. Kuypens (The Book of Cerne, Cambridge, England 1902). Another British work of interest among prayer collections is the anonymous Royal MS 2.A.XX of the British Museum. This manuscript contains gospel passages, hymns, canticles, and prayers of various saints; it is 52 leaves in length and had its origin in England during the 8th century.

Among medieval collections for private devotion the Liber Manualis of Dodana, written for her son Wilhelm in 841, is well known, although it might be considered more a handbook of Christian perfection than a collection of prayers (Le Manual de Dhuoda, ed. E. Bondurand, Paris 1887).

J. P. Migne's Patrologia Latina (101.1383–1416) contains a miscellaneous collection of prayers and devotions that dates from the last part of the 9th century. In its published form it is entitled Libellus sacrarum precum (ex MS floriacensi, c. 900), and its contents include prayers and hymns of Hilary, Ambrose, Augustine, Jerome, and other Fathers; the litany also is included.

Books of Hours. During the following centuries collections of private prayers continued to be compiled and copied, but one begins to notice in the later Middle Ages the growing popularity of the Horae, or Book of Hours. These devotional collections received the name of primer in England. The core of the Book of Hours was the Office of the Blessed Virgin Mary, a collection of Psalms, hymns, prayers, and readings arranged according to the canonical hours of the Divine Office. However, the extant Horae contain many other prayers and devotions, as will be seen later.

The fundamental work on the origin of this popular book of devotion is an article written by Edmund Bishop "On the Origin of the Prymer" in his Liturgica Historica (Oxford 1918, repr. 1962) 211–237. Since the work is readily available, it is sufficient to summarize Bishop's scholarly presentation: The origin of the Office of the Blessed Virgin can be traced to the extra devotions (cursus) added to the ordinary recitation of the daily Office in the monastery. Benedict of Aniane in the latter part of the 8th century is said to have introduced the recitation of 15 additional Psalms and other prayers before the singing of Matins (Ardo's life of Benedict, Monumenta Germaniae Historica, Scriptores 13) as well as the Office of the Dead as a further devotional supplement. Later in the 10th century, Vespers and Lauds of All Saints began to be added as a supplement to the regular Vespers and Lauds of the day in various monasteries; and in the latter half of this century the groundwork of the Little Office had been laid. For it was at this time that a cursus in honor of the Blessed Virgin was said, and more Psalms were added as extra devotions to the recitation of the regular Divine Office. In time these "extras" were incorporated into a special collection for lay use; Bishop believed that these "accretions" were adopted by the secular clergy from the monks, just as they had taken the practice of reciting the Office from monastic use. Finally, Bishop saw the adoption of the primer by the laity as growing out of a natural desire to imitate the clergy in their devotions. Bishop dates the beginning of the primer's popularity in England from the close of the 10th century as a result of a spread of devotion to the Blessed Virgin from this time until the Norman Conquest.

Distinction of Book of Hours from Psalter. From the 11th to the 13th century the Book of Hours and the Psalter are sometimes hard to distinguish, since some Psalters might contain the Little Office in addition to their ordinary contents. However, from the 13th century onward the two books went their separate ways. Certainly the vast number of Books of Hours extant from the last centuries of the Middle Ages and the beginning of modern times attests to the popularity of this collection of private devotions. Indeed, some of the most beautifully illuminated books of western Europe extant today are Horae meticulously produced for wealthy nobles and royalty in the 14th and especially the 15th centuries by accomplished lay artists of France, Italy, and the Low Countries. Although the contents of these collections might differ slightly among themselves, for the most part a Book of Hours would contain at least the following items: a liturgical calendar, gospel passages, the Office of the Blessed Virgin, the seven penitential Psalms, the 15 gradual Psalms, the litany, and the Office of the Dead.

Illumination of Books of Hours. Because of the nature of its contents the Book of Hours stirred the imagination of the medieval artist. The sequence of the hours of the Office represented events in the life of the Blessed Virgin and her Son; consequently one usually finds at least one illustration for each of the hours, as well as other pictures accompanying the liturgical calendar and the various other Psalms and devotions outside the text of the Office itself. A large number of the extant Books of Hours, particularly French, were produced by unknown artists in the service of noblemen; and so such books are described as originating in a certain atelier, or as being produced by the artist of such-and-such a work. The famous Rohan Hours (Bibliothèque Nationale), with its 11 full-page miniatures, is such an anonymous work, for its origin can be attributed only to the "Rohan atelier."

The first truly outstanding artist to illuminate a Book of Hours was the 14th-century painter Jean Pucelle, whose Hours of Jeanne d'Evreux (Metropolitan Museum) shows an early grasp of the art of perspective. Toward the end of that century the Limbourg brothers, who painted in the service of the Duke of Berry, produced the magnificent Très Riches Heures (Condé Museum, Chantilly). Their employer, Jean, Duke of Berry (d. 1416), brother of Charles V of France, has been called the “prince of medieval bibliophiles”; the deluxe editions of his library represent the epitome of 14th- and early 15th-century French illumination. The Belles Heures illuminated for this nobleman, now in the Metropolitan Museum, is one of the most beautiful manuscripts of the late Middle Ages.

In the 15th century Jean Fouquet, an artist at Tours, produced, among other precious works of manuscript illumination, the Hours of Étienne Chevalier. His work shows an unusual independence of the Flemish school, although Italian influence is marked in his use of perspective and classical architecture for background. Among other well known Horae, brief mention might be made of the Boucicaut Hours (Jacquemart-André Museum, Paris), executed in the early 15th century for the Maréchal de Boucicaut and his wife. Instead of the usual ten to fifteen miniatures, this exquisite manuscript contains no less than 45 large pictures and shows a markedly improved grasp of artistic realism. From this time on, Books of Hours often contained 20 to 40 or more miniatures—their artists perhaps influenced by the “Boucicaut master.” The Laval Hours (Bibliothèque Nationale), indeed, contains 54 miniatures and many other illustrations; and in the profusion and richness of their illustrative material they are typical of the late 15th-century Books of Hours.

It is interesting to note that these beautiful manuscripts are more frequently studied for their artistic aspects than for their possible effect upon private devotion or personal piety. And it is highly probable that, in spite of their obviously devotional content, the purpose behind their original purchase lay in artistic acquisitiveness rather than piety. Certainly the almost spotless and perfect preservation of many such books betrays no extensive use on the part of their owners. However, it is encouraging, at least in the context of this article, to examine the small, anonymous, and comparatively unknown Books of Hours in the manuscript divisions of libraries—books that are dog-eared and often so worn from constant use that the lettering is extremely difficult to discern or completely worn off. These were the real prayer books of the period.

Printed Books. Since the French undoubtedly produced some of the most exquisite manuscript Books of Hours, they continued after the invention of printing to maintain this artistic excellence in their printed Horae. The Parisian printers and publishers chiefly associated with this work were Jean Dupré, Antoine Vérard, and Philippe Pigouchet, who frequently printed their livres d'heures on parchment and employed manuscript illuminators. These printed Books of Hours appeared from 1486 on into the 16th century. The first English prymer to be printed came, appropriately enough, from the press of the first English printer, William Caxton, at Westminster c. 1478. Other printed Horae followed in the next century, among which the Horae eboracenses (York Prymer) is well known. It was first printed in 1536 and reprinted as volume 132 of the publications of the Surtees Society (London 1920). This work presents the typical contents of the popular lay prayer book of the late Middle Ages: liturgical calendar, formulae communes (Pater Noster, Ave Maria, etc.), gospel passages on the birth of Christ, occasional prayers, Office of the Blessed Virgin, penitential Psalms, litany, vigiliae mortuorum, Psalms on the Passion of Christ, and various suffragia.

In this early age of the printing press the popularity of the Horae did not, however, exclude the printing of other prayer collections and books of devotion. Other pious compositions such as the Hortulus Animae (Strassburg 1498) and Paradisus Animae (Basel 1491) made their appearance, and frequently such collections would contain fantastic spiritual promises and indulgences; these latter were condemned by a bull of Pius V, dated March 11, 1571. It should be noted also that the first work to show the true culmination of the invention of Gutenberg was a Psalter printed in 1457 by the successors to his establishment, Johann Fust and Peter Schoeffer. During the period of the Counter Reformation many Catholic prayer books were published; these seem to have originated as a result of the activity of Peter Canisius, and often appear as manuals for the sodalities in honor of the Blessed Virgin.

In modern times every country has had its favorite prayer books, and accounts of these individual collections can be found in the various national Catholic encyclopedias. In English North America the first extant printed book was the 1640 metrical edition of the Psalms—again attesting to the popularity of the Psalter as a book of devotion. However, Challoner's Garden of the Soul (1740) became the first Catholic prayer book to be printed here.

PREACHING, I (HISTORY OF)

The sermon by its nature is intended to be spoken and heard, and few sermons have been preserved exactly as they were preached. Those preserved in written form have generally been edited for publication. For the early Church no verbatim report of a sermon has survived. Even the accounts of the sermons of Christ recorded in the Gospels give us no more than extracts of the substance of His preaching.

Preaching of the Apostles. It may be assumed that the Apostles followed Christ's practice of speaking in the synagogues after the reading of the Sabbath pericope (Lk 4.14–22). Specific mention of such procedure is not infrequent (Acts 7.4–5; 9.20; 10.42; 13.16–41). While there is information about the Christians gathering for the "breaking of the bread" in apostolic times (Acts 2.42) and meeting for prayer, there is no surviving record of a sermon preached on such occasions. There are indeed records of seven discourses delivered by Peter (Acts 1.16–23; 2.14–37; 3.12–26; 5.29–32; 10.34–44; 11.4–18; 15.7–11), and six by Paul (Acts 13.16–41; 14.15–18; 17.22–32; 20.17–36; 22.1–22; 26.2–23). With the exception of Peter's remarks in connection with the election of Matthias and the record of his unwillingness to impose the obligations of the Mosaic Law on Gentile converts, these addresses would be designated in later terminology as "missionary sermons" for prospective converts and may faithfully reproduce the preaching of these Apostles or may be an account of it as reported by a Christian writer near the end of the 1st century A.D. In either case this record yields little direct evidence for the history of the sermon preached in the Christian community. As sermons of traveling missionaries Peter's discourse delivered to the crowd after the healing of the lame man (Acts 3.12–26) and Paul’s address on the Areopagus (Acts 17.22–33) show some interesting parallels in their structure. Both begin with a formal greeting of the audience followed by a brief summary of the blessings God has conferred on mankind, a reference to guilt for offenses, a call to repentance, a reminder of the judgment to come, and finally a reference to Christ’s Resurrection [cf. E. Norden, Agnostos Theos, 3–12 (Stuttgart 1912, repr. 1956)].

The preachers of the apostolic age were the Apostles and those appointed by them to be in charge of the Christian communities. It is difficult to judge how widespread was the charismatic speaking mentioned by Paul (1 Cor 12.1–11, 27–31; ch. 14; Eph 4.7–16). In any case, the phenomenon seems to have disappeared as the catechumenate developed.

Subapostolic and Early Patristic Age. IRENAEUS mentions the discourses that POLYCARP gave to the people in Smyrna (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.20.6), Irenaeus also spoke to the people, and his discourses were collected in a book still extant in Eusebius’s day (ibid. 5.26). From this same era comes the earliest extant evidence showing the sermon as part of the liturgical service, JUSTIN MARTYR (Apologia 1.67) says that the Christians gathered on Sundays and that the memoirs of the Apostles, and writings of the Prophets were read. When the reader had finished, “he who presides gives the admonition and invites us to imitate these noble men.” Slightly later, TERTULLIAN makes two references to preaching in similar circumstances. In the Apologeticum (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum—CSEL— 69: 91–92) he relates, that the faithful met for prayer and the reading of the Scriptures; thereupon by admonitions they were strengthened in the practice of their teachings. In his De anima (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 20:310) he specifically states that there were addresses (allocutiones) during divine services

“Christ Preaching” by Rembrandt van Rijn, c. 1635. (©Burstein Collection/CORBIS.)

(inter dominica sollemnia). This practice is clearly attested for the Church in northern Africa. Similar evidence for Asia Minor seems to be found in the homily on the Passion preached by MELITO, Bishop of Sardis in Lydia (J. Quasten, Patrology, 1.243). As an interesting item from the subapostolic age, the so-called Second Epistle fo Clement to the Corinthians (c. 150) deserves mention as the oldest extant Christian sermon. It is written in Greek and was read to the assembled Christian community. “Therefore, brothers and sisters, following the God of truth, I am reading you an exhortation to pay attention to that which is written, and that you may both save yourselves and him who is the reader among you” (2 Clement 19.1).

In sharp contrast to the unliturgical style of 2 Clement there is the sole surviving homily of CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA Quis dives salvetur, (Who is the rich man that is saved), on the text of Mk 10.17–31. This rather lengthy homily, if really preached, is possible early evidence of preaching by a priest, although scholars are not agreed on the priesthood of Clement. In any case, instances of preaching by priests and laymen occur in the early part of the 3d century.

During the pontificate of Zephyrinus (199–217), ORIGEN, Clement’s successor at the catechetical school in ALEXANDRIA, came to Rome (Jerome, De viris illustribus 54) and was present in a church when HIPPOLYTUS preached a sermon in Greek, On the Praise of the Lord Our Savior (ibid. 61). This sermon has been lost; it is significant, however, that a priest (Hippolytus had not yet become bishop and antipope) preached in Rome some time before 215. After a brief stay in Rome, Origen returned to Alexandria and remained there until 215, when he left for Palestine, where he was eventually ordained a priest, to the displeasure of Demetrius, Bishop of Alexandria (ibid. 54). EUSEBIUS makes the following report on Origen’s activity in Palestine:

And although he had not yet received the presbyterate, the bishops there requested him to discourse and expound the divine Scriptures publicly in the church. That this is so is clear from what Alexander, the bishop of Jerusalem, and Theoctistus, the bishop of Caesarea, write with reference to Demetrius. They make their defense somewhat as follows: And he added to his letter that such a thing had never been heard of, nor taken place hither, that laymen should preach in the presence of bishops; though I do not know how he comes to say what is evidently not true. For instance, where there are found persons suited to help the brethren, they are also invited to preach to the people by the holy bishops, as, for example, in Laranda Euelpis by Neon, and in Iconium Paulinus by Celsus, and in Synnada Theodore by Atticus, our blessed brother bishops. And it is likely that this thing happens in other places also without our knowing it. [Bede, Ecclesiastical History 6.19]

All the places mentioned were important cities in Asia Minor: Iconium and Laranda in Lycaonia, Synnada in Phrygia. The statement of the bishops then indicates that laymen preached in this region (at least by Eusebius's time) even though such practice may have been unheard of in Egypt, if Demetrius's judgment was not clouded by his prejudice. Origen's preaching followed this structure; exordium, practical application of a chosen scriptural text in the allegorical interpretation, exhortation, and finally a doxology. There was no striving for rhetorical adornment. As a result of long preparation he had an extraordinary facility in speaking and, in his later years, permitted shorthand-writers to take down the discourses he delivered in public (ibid. 6.36).

Shortly after Origen's death a new manner of preaching appeared at least briefly in Antioch. Apart from his doctrinal errors, Paul of Samosata, Bishop of Antioch (c. 260–268), aroused disgust with his pulpit antics. Only a few fragments of his discourses are extant, so one can judge only from reports. Eusebius takes Paul to task for "the quackery in church assemblies that he devises, courting popularity and posing for appearance sake . . . with the tribunal and lofty throne that he prepared for himself not befitting a disciple of Christ. . . . He smites his hand on his thigh and stamps the tribunal with his feet; and those who do not applaud or wave their handkerchiefs, as in a theater, or shout out and jump up in the same way as do the men and wretched women who are his partisans—these he rebukes and insults. . . . He brags about himself as though he were not a bishop but a sophist and a charlatan" (ibid. 7.30).

The meager evidence extant for preaching in Latin down to the 4th century centers around the Church of north Africa. Tertullian's references to preaching have already been mentioned. That he himself may have preached can be inferred only indirectly from Lactantius when the latter states that Tertullian was not a persuasive speaker (Divinae institutiones 5.1, CSEL 19: 402). Cyprian's sermons, admired and praised by Lactantius (ibid.) as being diligently prepared for the faithful, are lost. One sermon in Latin, perhaps from Africa and preached c. 300, is preserved. It is the discourse Adversus aleatores, or De aleatoribus (CSEL 3.3.92–104), which inveighs against dice players as persons who have denied the faith.

With the end of the great persecutions and the peace that came to the Church with the accession of Constantine, a new era for preaching began. The preachers themselves, educated in the best schools of the day at Athens, Antioch, and Alexandria and trained by such outstanding masters of rhetoric as Himerius and Libanius, brought to the office of preaching a wealth of learning and an amazing familiarity with Sacred Scripture. As the Church penetrated the more educated strata of society, an audience was at hand that could relish the accomplishments of the preachers.

Greek Preaching. The great Cappadocians GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, BASIL the Great, and JOHN CHRYSOSTOM dominate Greek preaching during the 4th century. Of these preachers, Gregory of Nazianzus is distinguished as both poet and orator. His fame in preaching rests on his proficiency in the panegyric (a form already Christianized by Gregory Thaumaturgus in his eulogy of Origen delivered in 238), the liturgical sermon, and the funeral oration. In this genre Gregory Christianized the pagan epitaphios logos. Of his four extant funeral orations, the one delivered at the death of St. Basil is the masterpiece of Christian Greek funeral speeches. The discourses of Gregory were greatly admired and were soon studied as models; marginal annotations (scholia), the earliest dating from the early 6th century, clearly show this. Rufinus translated nine of Gregory's discourses into Latin, c. 399.

Basil the Great made significant contributions to the exegetical homily by enhancing it with the embellishments of Greek rhetoric. This artistic effect is seen at its best in the homilies on the six days of creation preached during Lent while he was still a priest. AMBROSE, well versed in Greek, used these homilies freely for his Hexaemeron. A Latin translation of the homilies made by Eustathius the African appeared as early as 440.

GREGORY OF NYSSA, the younger brother of Basil and a teacher of rhetoric before he became a bishop, merits at least passing mention for his funeral orations, even though they fall short of the excellence of those preached by Gregory of Nazianzus.

John Chrysostom, who was renowned as a preacher both in Antioch and Constantinople, has left a larger legacy of discourses than any other orator of the golden age of Greek preaching. His oratorical skill is evident in the homily (exegetical, dogmatic, and polemical), the catecheses for those about to receive Baptism, the moral discourse, the liturgical sermon, the panegyric, and the occasional discourse. The best known of his sermons are probably the 21 homilies On the Statues, preached in Antioch in 387 and generally considered the finest examples of his eloquence, and the two homilies on the fall of Eutropius, delivered in Constantinople in January 399. The pleasing effect of the rhetorical adornment of his sermons frequently elicited spontaneous applause from his audience (Migne, Patrologia Graeca, 60:226).

Amphilochius of Iconium, who delighted in presenting scriptural personages engaged in dialogue in his sermons, and Asterius of Amasea, whose sermon on St. Euphemia bears early witness to the veneration of sacred images, are overshadowed by their contemporaries, Basil and Chrysostom.

The golden age of Greek preaching had its last moments of splendor in the early years of the 5th century. As the catechumenate fell into desuetude, the catecheses gradually disappeared. On the basis of extant evidence, however, the homily and sermon on special topics remained in use as can be seen in the works of Flavian of Antioch, SEVERIAN OF GABALA, Antiochus of Ptolemais, NILUS OF ANCYRA, THEODORET OF CYR, Basil of Seleucia, DIADOCHUS OF PHOTICE, GENNADIUS of Constantinople, John the Faster, JOHN DAMASCENE, and THEODORE THE STUDITE.

The sermon for special feast days, the panegyric of martyrs and other saints, and the funeral oration received special attention. In particular, sermons on the Blessed Virgin (Theotokos) became very frequent as CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA, Hesychius and Chrysippus of Jerusalem, Theodore of Ancyra, Proclus of Constantinople, Abraham of Ephesus, John of Thessalonica, SOPHRONIUS of Jerusalem, GERMANUS of Constantinople, ANDREW OF CRETE, and TARASIIUS of Constantinople clearly show. Significant for the history of Greek preaching is Canon 19 of the Trullan Synod (692), which directed bishops to instruct both clergy and laity daily, and especially on Sundays (Mansi 11:951). The synod bade the bishops in their treating of scriptural topics not to depart from, but to follow, the fathers, "the luminaries and teachers," rather than to compose their own sermons. This synodal enactment explains at least in part the proliferation of collections of homilies especially for use on Sundays during the following centuries. Of all the forms of preaching, the panegyric was the most cultivated after the golden age of preaching had passed. In the long list of panegyrists the emperors themselves find a place. Leo VI the Wise and Constantine Porphyrogenetus are notable examples.

Latin Preaching. The surviving evidence that Latin sermons were preached in Gaul, Spain, and Italy becomes increasingly specific as investigation focuses on the 4th century. Hilary of Poitiers is, in Jerome's opinion, "the Rhone of Latin eloquence" (Migne, Patrologia Latina, 26:355A) even though the same critic does not admire Hilary's involved periodic sentences "adorned with the flowers of Greece" (Epistola 58.10). Victricius of Rouen is remembered for his sermon De Laude Sanctorum (Migne, Patrologia Latina, 20: 443–458). Gregory of Elvira is known especially for his homilies on the Cantic of Canticles; he is the earliest known preacher in the West to apply the bridal imagery of this book to Christ and the Church. The first preacher in Latin whose sermons survive in an appreciable number is ZENO OF VERONA. His 16 longer sermons show their author's skill in the use of anaphora, alliteration, and cursus. But Ambrose of Milan was the first real Latin rival of the great preachers in Greek. His sermons were a delight to the trained rhetorician (Augustine, Confessor 5.13). Ambrose as preacher has a twofold claim to distinction. He has great proficiency in the exegetical homily and is a pioneer and master in the Christian Latin funeral oration. In the first category he is indebted to Philo of Alexandria, Origen, and, as already noted, Basil. In the second, he is vastly more independent of pagan models than his Greek contemporaries and gives to the funeral oration a much more Christian tone.

Latin preaching in the 5th century was dominated by AUGUSTINE, whose preaching career began with his ordination to the priesthood in 391. Valerius, Bishop of Hippo, entrusted him with the office of preaching, although in many places it was not the practice for priests to preach in the presence of bishops (Jerome, Epistola 52.7). For more than 30 years, both as priest and as bishop, Augustine preached frequently and at times twice a day. He addressed his audience in the exegetical homily, in special sermons emphasizing the chief mysteries of salvation or commemorating saints' feast days, or in discourses on various moral topics. The style of these sermons ranges from the highly rhetorical to the almost colloquial, adapted to the capacity of those who lacked formal training. More important for the history of preaching is the fourth book of Augustine's De doctrina christiana, in which he gives guidelines for preaching based on his own personal experience.

JEROME preached exegetical homilies to his monastic community in Bethlehem. As in the case of Augustine, the text of the sermons we possess is the stenographic report taken down by secretaries (notarii) in the audience, Peter Chrysologus, Archbishop of Ravenna, and Maximus, Bishop of Turin, both popular and effective preachers, are overshadowed by Pope St. LEO I. His carefully prepared sermons, with their neatly balanced clauses and close attention to cursus, rival Augustine's in artistry. The topics of Leo's sermons are chosen chiefly from the liturgical cycle. From the doctrinal point of view, however, three sermons preached on the anniversary of his election to the papacy merit special attention. In these sermons Leo is the first pope to state specifically that the Roman pontiff is the heir to the petrine powers (Migne, Patrologia Latina, 54:144A, 147A, 155A). To the list of renowned preachers of this century must be added the names of Hilary of Arles and Gaudentius of Brescia.

6th to 9th Centuries. The year 529 has special significance for the history of preaching in the Latin Church. In that year the second council of Vaison met. The second canon approved at this council granted priests the right to preach: "for the edification of all the churches and the benefit of all the people not only in the cities but also in the rural areas. If, because of illness, the priest is unable to preach let the homilies of the holy fathers be read by the deacons" (Monumenta Germaniae Concilia 1:56; G. Morin, S. Caesarii opera omnia 2.86). Juridically this canon marked the end of the bishops' monopoly on the right to preach in the Latin Church (Hefele-Leclercq, Histoire des Conciles 2.2:1112). As already mentioned priests did de facto preach in the Latin Church, but it was not customary (cf. Jerome, loco citato).

It is worthy of note that CAESARIUS OF ARLES presided at this council. He was a very important bishop in 6th-century Gaul and a most zealous preacher. His Vita (G. Morin, opere citato 296–345) states that he preached every Sunday and on all feast days as long as his health permitted; if illness prevented him from preaching he had the deacons read the homilies of Ambrose, Augustine, and those of his own composition, which he also readily gave to those who asked for them. Frequently too, when people gathered in the church at the time of Lauds or Vespers, he had homilies read to them so that no one could plead ignorance of his religious duties. Even more, Caesarius sent sermons to churches in Italy, in Spain, and in distant places so that through preaching, the faithful would be incited to the pursuit of good works.

St. GREGORY I was the author of 40 homilies composed c. 590 and 591, of which 20 were read to the people by a secretary in the Pope's presence, and the rest preached by Gregory himself. These homilies, considered models of eloquence, were widely read in the Middle Ages. Extant also are 22 longer sermons explaining portions of Ezechiel. Even more important for the history of preaching is Gregory's Liber regulae pastoralis, the third section of which gives practical directives for preaching. This work enjoyed wide popularity and was translated into Greek during the Pope's lifetime. Other noteworthy preachers of this century were Avitus, Bishop of Vienne; Fulgence, Bishop of Ruspe; and the opponent of Faustus of Riez, Martin of Braga, author of the famous sermon De correctione rusticorum (used later especially by Eligius of Noyon and Pirmin of Reichenau).

The meager extant evidence on preaching in the 7th century makes it practically impossible to determine to what extent the legislation authorizing priests to preach was implemented. Apart from some general remarks about the eloquence of certain well-known bishops of this century, and sermons either incorrectly or doubtfully attributed to them, we know with certainty of a sermon of Ildelfonsus of Toledo and a collection of homilies known as Homiliae Toletanae, which owes its origin either to Ildelfonsus or Julian of Toledo.

Early in the 8th century Bede was ordained to the priesthood. His homilies, based on the Gospel pericopes for feast days and preached to the monks of his abbey, are indebted in great measure to the sermons of Jerome and Gregory the Great. The collection of patristic homilies made by Paul the Deacon and intended primarily for use in the monastic office in choir indirectly served the needs of the clergy in their office of preaching. A deplorable state of preaching, at least in the Frankish kingdom, is indicated in the Admonitio generalis (Monumenta Germaniae Capitularia 1:52–62) of March 789. The bishops were admonished to find out whether the priests themselves understood the Our Father and preached it to the people. They were also to see that priests preached according to the Scriptures and that they did not fabricate teachings of their own. To implement these directives, the Admonitio gave a summary of essential sermon material. Theodulf of Orleans in 797 presented an equally gloomy picture of preaching. He exhorted his priests to instruct the people. He who was versed in the Scriptures should preach scriptural sermons; he who was not should at least preach to the people that "they turn away from evil and do good: seek after peace and pursue it. The eyes of the Lord are upon the just: and his ears unto their prayers" (Migne, Patrologia Latina, 105:200A; Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio, 13:1001).

Preaching in the 9th century received invaluable aid from the collections of homilies and sermons made by Alcuin, Rabanus Maurus, and Haymo of Auxerre. Great as these contributions were, the progress of preaching was far more vitally affected by the third Council of Tours and the second Council of Reims, both of which met in 813. Canon 17 of the Council of Tours decreed that each bishop should have homilies containing the necessary admonitions for the instruction of his people. He was directed moreover to translate these homilies into the early Romance language or German so that "all could more easily understand what is being said" (Mansi 14:85). Canon 15 of the Council of Reims similarly instructed the bishops to preach the sermons and homilies of the holy Fathers in the vernacular "so that all may understand" (Mansi 14:78). Some 30 years later the first Council of Mainz (847) repeated the legislation of canon 17 of the Council of Tours (Mansi 14:903).

Medieval Preaching. After the legislation regarding the use of the vernacular in sermons, the Crusades, the flowering of scholasticism, and the founding of the mendicant orders were the most significant factors that influenced preaching in the Latin Church. From the 10th to the early 13th century important preachers were active. A selective list of the most outstanding must mention the following at least in passing: AELFRIC GRAMMATICUS, FULBERT OF CHARTRES, PETER DAMIAN, BERNARD OF CLAIRVAUX, ANSELM OF CANTERBURY, HONORIUS OF AUTUN, IVO OF CHARTRES, ROBERT OF ARBRISSEL, GUIBERT OF NOGENT, RUPERT OF DEUTZ, HUGH OF SAINT VICTOR, AELRED OF RIEVAULX, PETER COMESTOR, MAURICE OF SULLY, FULK OF NEUILLY, ALAN OF LILLE, and Adam Scotus. The sermon texts of medieval preachers have come down to us in Latin. This is not conclusive evidence, however, that the sermons were delivered in Latin. It is known that Bernard of Clairvaux preached to the lay brothers in the vernacular. Jacques de Vitry clearly states that sermons for clerics were in Latin while those for the laity were in the vernacular. The Latin text, moreover, was intended primarily for the preacher's own use in preparation, as can be concluded from the complaint of Adam of Perseigne that sermons, when translated into the vernacular, were like wine poured from one container into another; some of the color, taste, and bouquet of the original was always lost in the process (C. Langlois, Revue des deux Mondes 115:173–175).

The Scholastic Preacher. Toward the end of the 12th century the scholastic method of teaching had an effect on preaching. The logic and dialectic of the schools was applied to the sermon topic. The preacher announced his theme according to the method of propounding questions and defending conclusions in the schools of theology. He then proceeded to definition, division, subdivision, and distinction, citing numerous passages from Scripture and the Fathers and adding arguments from reason to prove his point. The tactful preacher generally left, as his parting impression, an outline of future bliss and glory "to which may He lead us who lives and reigns forever. Amen." These scholastic sermons were delivered before faculty and students at such university cities as Paris, Oxford, and Cambridge by William of Auvergne, Odo of Chateauroux, Stephen Langton, and Robert Grosseteste. With the founding of the mendicant orders, the Dominicans and Franciscans became famous for such sermons delivered by Hugh of Saint-Cher, Thomas Aquinas, Peter of Tarantasia, John of Rupella, Bonaventure, Guibert of Tournai, and Matthew of Aquasparta.

The Popular Sermon. Popular preaching at the end of the 12th century was generally at low ebb. Conditions were such that few among the parish clergy, according to the Fourth Lateran Council in 1215, had the least proficiency in letters (Concilliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta, 226). To meet this deficiency, unauthorized preachers and laymen came forward, among whom were the HUMILIATI and WALDENSES. But their lack of training for preaching eventually involved them in doctrinal errors. As a consequence Alexander III forbade the Humiliati and Waldenses to preach, and Lucius III finally excommunicated them for failing to obey the prohibition.

The founding of the Dominicans and Franciscans provided a more effective remedy for the situation. Some of the friars distinguished themselves in the more academic type of preaching mentioned above, but great numbers of them gave themselves to apostolic preaching among the people. They preached in the vernacular upon concrete themes, and applied their message in a practical way to daily life. Homely expressions and examples as well as the Scriptures and the lives of the saints were freely used. The timeliness of this type of preaching can be judged from the Council of Vienne (Hefele-Leclercq, Histoire des conciles d'après les documents originaux-opere citato 6.2:674–678), which empowered the Dominicans and Franciscans with the apostolic authority to preach freely and ordered prelates and parish clergy to receive the friars kindly and cooperate with them. Distinguished preachers among them were David of Augsburg, Berthold of Regensburg, Raymund LULL, Bartholomew of Vicenza, Guido of Évreux, James of Lausanne, and Peregrine of Breslau.

A special form of the popular sermon was the sermon in verse, or rhymed sermon (sermo rimatus), which enjoyed special popularity in England. The Franciscan John of Grimston achieved fame in this type of preaching, which Peter of Limoges criticized as a deadly snare to seduce the ear rather than to convert the soul.

The beginnings of the mystical sermon can already be discerned in some of the preaching of Bernard of Clairvaux and Bonaventure, but the genre was developed later by Meister ECKHART, Johannes TAULER, HENRY SUSO, NICHOLAS OF STRASSBURG, JOHN OF STERNGASSE, Henry of Nordlingen, and Jean GERSON.

Literature. As the various types of sermons were developing, a wealth of sermon literature was produced. Technical treatises, the artes praedicandi, offered direction for the preparation and delivery of the sermon. Frequently, however, some of these artes were really “sermon encyclopedias” as, e.g., the work of Humbert of Romans. Among the best known medieval sources for sermon material were the Exempla of JACQUES DE VITRY and the Legenda aurea of JAMES OF VORAGINE. Sturdy competitors were the Liber exemplorum and the Speculum laicorum, written by two anonymous Franciscans, and the impressive Summa predicantium of the Dominican John of BROMYARD.

Preaching in the Open. Another development in the history of preaching in the Middle Ages must yet be noted. The sermon did not have to be delivered in the church during the celebration of Mass. In 1312 the Council of Vienne granted the Dominicans and Franciscans permission for street preaching (in plateis communibus) and ordered prelates, of whatever preeminence, and parish priests not to look askance at this procedure (Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta, 342, 344). This decree did not introduce a novelty (Berthold of Regensburg had already preached in this manner), but gave formal legality to something already in existence.

14th and 15th Centuries. Preaching, which in the 13th and 14th centuries had attained an uncommon splendor, had, in the subsequent centuries, varying fortunes in different regions. Generalizations about its effectiveness are particularly hazardous. When the enthusiasm for the sermon was over and the preacher gone, fickle audiences, which “like snails in fright had drawn in their horns . . . shot them out again as soon as the danger was over. Cards, dice, false hair, rouge-pots, and other tribulations even to chess boards” might well be burned in Florence when Bernardine of Siena had finished his sermon, but the more calculating Englishman was not likely to be moved in similar fashion (G. Owst, Preaching in Medieval England, 190). At all events, the 14th century produced works noteworthy in the history of preaching. The most outstanding is the Postilla litteralis of Nicholas of Lyra. This treatise, of which 700 copies were made within one century, differentiated clearly between the literal and mystical meaning of Scripture and profoundly influenced subsequent preaching. Its impact on Luther, while perhaps oversimplified, was neatly expressed in the dictum: “Si Lyra non lyrasset Lutherus non saltasset” (Had Lyra not played the tunes, Luther would not have danced). Collections of sermons for Sundays and the feast days of saints were written by John of S. Gemini-ano, Francis of Meyronnes, and HENRY OF FRIEMAR; homilies on the Lord’s Prayer, the Hail Mary, the Apostles’ Creed, and sermons on the Blessed Virgin, by HENRY HEINBUCHÉ OF LANGENSTEIN. ROBERT HOLCOT produced the popular compendium of sermon material: Lectiones super sapientiam Salomonis, and Conrad of Waldhausen inveighed against the vices of his times and indulged in hackneyed invectives against the mendicants charging them with laxity and avarice.

In the 15th century there was a notable increase in the publication of collections of sermons. The most popular was that of Johannes of Werden (d. 1437) published under the forthright title Dormi secure (Sleep without Anxiety). The numerous editions of this work (almost 90 within 100 years) are an indication of its popularity and may also be a significant commentary on the condition of preaching at this time. Slightly less popular was the work of an unknown author, Parati sermones, which furnished several sermons for every Sunday and the feast days of certain saints. There were 17 editions of this sermon aid. The largest and most unusual collection of sermons was the Hortulus reginae, composed by Meffreth, a priest (c. 1447). This work supplied at least three sermons for every Sunday and for the feast days of certain saints. The sermons were long and, in addition to scriptural references, contained quotations—some quite lengthy—from Aristotle, Pliny, Horace, Ovid, Terence, Martial, Juvenal, Lucretius, the distichs of Cato, Sedulius, and Boethius. By 1500 there had already been ten editions of the Hortulus, and many more followed in the 16th and 17th centuries. Other well-known sermon collections of the period were those of Johann NIDER, Johann Herolt, and Anthony Rampegalus. Another noteworthy development of the century was the Lenten sermon, frequently mentioned in records of this period.

The mission sermon also attained eminence through such renowned preachers as VINCENT FERRER, BERNARDINE OF SIENA, JOHN CAPISTRAN, and JAMES OF THE MARCHES.

A selective list of important preachers of the period must include such names as: John of Retz, NICHOLAS OF DINKELSBÜHL, NICHOLAS OF CUSA, Leonard of Udine, Gabriel Barletta, Anthony of Vercelli, Pelbart of Temesvar, BERNARDINE OF FELTRE, Roberto CARACCILO, and Gabriel BIEL. The most widely known preacher of this century was undoubtedly Girolamo SAVONAROLA.

As the evidence shows, there was no dearth of preaching in the years immediately preceding the Reformation. There were, in fact, ecclesiastical benefices that obliged the incumbent to preach. The proliferation of “sermon encyclopedias” also made it possible for the laymen to read sermons, if they were neglected in church. On the other hand, that the quality of the sermons must have left much to be desired is deducible from the Circa modum praedicandi of the 11th session of the Fifth Later-an Council, dated December 19, 1516. This document deplores the fact that preachers were often more concerned with a display of their own talents than with the needs of the audience. The meaning of the Scriptures was distorted in sermons; preaching was often long-winded; the Gospel was not being preached, but fictitious miracles, false prophecies, and idle tales found their way into the sermon. Some even went so far as to proclaim the arrival of anti-Christ and the imminence of the Last Judgment. Bishops and prelates in positions of authority were being openly denounced (see Conciliorum Oecumenicorum Decreta, 610–614). It is difficult to determine how widespread these abuses were. The list of shortcomings does, however, contain many charges that the reformers themselves were soon to make.

The Reformation. With the Reformation, a new emphasis was placed on preaching. The sermon became the focal point of the revised divine worship. The duly called minister based his sermon on the literal meaning of Scripture. In the new theology, the sermon was the living voice of the gospel, and Christ spoke in the preacher's words. The new doctrines on justification and the role of Scripture as the sole rule of faith were proclaimed in the sermon.

This renewed emphasis on preaching was reflected also in the Council of Trent. The Decretum super lectione et praedicatione, (ibid. 645) declared that it was the duty of bishops, archbishops, primates, and other prelates to preach the holy Gospel of Jesus Christ. Pastors were to preach, either themselves or through suitable priests, at least on all Sundays and solemn feast days. Similar emphasis was placed on preaching at the 24th session in De Reformatione, where special sermons during Advent and Lent were recommended (ibid. 739). Among the early opponents of the new teachings were Thomas MURNER, Johann ECK, Wendelin Fabri, Johann Hoffmeister, and especially Peter CANISIUS.

In addition to determining responsibility for preaching, the Council of Trent took further steps to secure trained men for preaching by decreeing that seminaries be established to train priests (ibid. 726–729). This legislation was enacted to eliminate the recurrence of the plight deplored in the Fifth Lateran Council.

Charles BORROMEIO was untiring in efforts to implement the decrees of Trent. He was personally a zealous preacher, as were JOHN OF AVILA and LOUIS OF GRANADA. Of the impressive number of preachers whose sermons were delivered entirely, or at least in great part, during the 17th century only the following can be mentioned: JOSEPH OF LEONESSA, LAWRENCE OF BRINDISI, Robert BELLARMINE, Procopius of Templin, and Paolo SEGNERI.

17th to 19th Centuries. The last half of the 17th and the beginning of the 18th century witnessed a brilliance of pulpit oratory rare in the annals of preaching. The era was dominated by Jacques BOSSUET, Louis BOURDALOUE, Valentin-Esprit Fléchier, François FÉNELON, and Jean Baptiste MASSILON. Two other preachers of the same era cannot go unmentioned: the inimitable ABRAHAM OF SANCTA CLARA and the great mission preacher, LEONARD OF PORT MAURICE. The conferences of Henri LACORDAIRE drew crowds to the cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris. Gustave RAVIGNAN and Joseph Felix also achieved fame for conferences in the same venerable cathedral. Sacred eloquence continued at a high standard in the preaching of Louis PIE, Bishop of Poitiers, often called the Hilary of the 19th century, and Étienne de Boulogne. Among English-speaking preachers, the three well-known English cardinals, WISEMAN, MANNING, and NEWMAN, hold places of distinction.

In large part because of the writings and example of the English cardinals there was new interest in the forms and frequency of preaching. In the United States the number of books and periodicals that addressed the technical aspects of preaching and the composition of sermons, as well as collections of sermons multiplied. In the United States the sermon was a regular feature of the Sunday Mass. Religious congregations, and some dioceses, organized bands of traveling preachers who conducted parish missions in which the sermon was a main feature. Lenten sermons and sermons during weekly holy hours and novenas were a regular part of parish life. Street preaching, often apologetic in purpose, and radio sermons were popular up to the advent of television. After World War II preached retreats for the laity became popular in mid-century, but it was the Second Vatican Council that brought new vitality to the preaching ministry by the emphasis that it gave in the various documents to theology of the word.

The Documents of Vatican II. The first document of the Council, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, that deals with preaching relates it to three fundamental aspects of the mystery of Christ and the Church: (1) it reaffirms the primacy of the work of preaching in the mission of Jesus and his followers (Sacrosanctum Concilium 6); (2) it reaffirms also the necessity of preaching as the unique instrument of faith and conversion (ibid. 9), thus providing the basis for that intense “evangelical” preaching which is a notable feature of the ministry of the Word in the postconciliar world; (3) it designates the privileged place for preaching within the liturgical celebration itself, that is, in the HOMILY, by means of which “the mysteries of the faith and the guiding principles of the Christian life are expounded” (ibid. 52). Specific guidelines for liturgical preaching include the regrounding of the Homily in the scriptural Readings and its restored status as the natural climax of the Liturgy of the Word.

The various instructions and decrees implementing liturgical reform after the Council made it clear that the Homily is an integral part not only of the Eucharist but of the other Sacraments as well; and the new rituals for each of the Sacraments reflect this conception and this concern. Baptism, even when celebrated outside of Mass, has its own Liturgy of the Word and its own Homily; the same procedure is indicated for the rite of Penance when it is celebrated for more than one penitent and for the rite of Matrimony when celebrated outside of Mass; even the rite of Anointing of the Sick calls for a brief explanation of the scriptural texts when circumstances permit. The Homily following sacred Readings is now an integral part of the entire sacramental ritual, so that liturgical reform may be said to be governed everywhere by the necessary union of Word and Sacrament—contactus fidei, contactus sacramenti (cf. Summa Theologiae 3a. 48.6 ad 2)—in order to bring about a true interiorization of the sacramental encounter with Christ.

The documents of Vatican II are very rich also in their sensitivity to the ecclesial character of the preaching act and to the widespread sharing of the prophetic ministry throughout the Church. As in the Decree on the Church's Missionary Activity (Ad gentes 3) so in the Constitution on the Church the task of the Church is seen as always centered on the act of proclaiming the Gospel (Lumen gentium 17). This same Constitution, as well as other conciliar documents, clearly identifies those who are called upon to exercise this central ministry of preaching. First, bishops are said to “receive from the Lord . . . the mission to teach all nations and to preach the Gospel to every creature” (ibid. 24). More particularly they are to “preach to the people committed to them the faith to be believed and put into practice” (ibid. 25). According to the Decree on the Pastoral Office of Bishops, their prophetic mission is shared by pastors who are “cooperators of the bishop” in preaching and catechetical instruction (Christus Dominus 30), as well as by priests and lay people. “By the power of the sacrament of Orders . . . they (priests) are consecrated to preach the Gospel . . . and to announce the divine Word to all” (ibid. 28). According to an emphasis characteristic of the documents of Vatican II the laity also are designated as “witnesses” of the faith and “powerful proclaimers of a faith in things to be hoped for” (ibid. 35). The role of the laity as preachers is also affirmed in the Decree on the Apostolate of the Laity (Apostolicam actuositatem) wherein lay people are said to share in “the prophetic office of the Church,” not only “by their efforts to permeate and perfect the secular order of things with the spirit of the Gospel” but also by their more direct efforts “to bring the news of the Gospel and the ways of holiness to mankind” (Apostolicam actuositatem 2). The final document of Vatican II, the Pastoral Constitution on the Church in the Modern World underlines the same prophetic mission of the laity, a mission not only “to penetrate the world with a Christian spirit” but also “to be witnesses to Christ in all things in the midst of human society” (Gaudium et spes 43).

Along with the rehabilitation of the Homily, the phenomenon of lay preaching is one of the most distinctive developments in the prophetic mission of the Church after Vatican II. In practice this phenomenon covers a whole range of paraliturgical preaching, much of it very informal and spontaneous. Such “preaching” is usually based upon Scripture and can take the form of “teaching” or “sharing” or “witnessing,” the last-named having to do with the confession of personal experiences that have challenged or restored or deepened a person's faith. It is evident that the term “preaching” as it includes communications such as these takes on a very broad signification. It ceases to be restricted to public proclamation of the mysteries deriving from episcopal mandate and associated with clerical ministry. Preaching becomes, rather, any public communication of faith by any believer under a right and an impulse deriving from the baptismal character itself and, even more urgently, from Confirmation. Moreover, the rightful and fruitful exercise of such a ministry should be looked upon as normal in the Church, granted a right understanding of the dynamism of Baptism and Confirmation and a right understanding of the act of preaching as a charism or grace-of-words given by the Spirit in the Church for the building up of the Church in faith and love.

The Apostolic Exhortation on Evangelization. A second major source for renewed emphasis on the theology of preaching is the apostolic exhortation On Evangelization in the Modern World, issued by Pope Paul VI and inspired by the Third General Assembly of the Synod of Bishops (1974). In this document the term “evangelization” has both a specific and a general meaning: specifically, it refers to the initial proclamation of the Word of God or the Good News aimed at CONVERSION (Paul VI EvangNunt 10); in other contexts it refers to any exercise of the ministry of the Word. The specific meaning of evangelization, however, and the stress upon that meaning in the document reflect a growing awareness that Christian ministry is exercised today in an increasingly non-Christian and non-religious environment, so that preaching must be first defined as the call to conversion. Under this aspect preaching in the Catholic sector tends to link with the evangelical character of those forms of Protestant preaching which focus almost entirely upon the call to conversion and spiritual rebirth.

While the apostolic exhortation reflects this specific need and this specific mode of preaching, the entire document provides, in addition, a vital and eloquent restatement of the chief elements in a theology of preaching.

(1) The character of the preaching act is Christological after the example of the preaching of Jesus, the first evangelizer, and as the historical extension of his preaching (ibid. 7).

(2) An ecclesial character marks the act of preaching. The exhortation insists that evangelization or the proclamation of the Good News “constitutes the essential mission of the Church. . . which exists in order to evangelize” (ibid. 14). Preaching is never “an individual or isolated act; it is one that is deeply ecclesial” (ibid. 60).

(3) The preaching act is charismatic in so far as the Holy Spirit is its principal agent and the new humanity generated by the Spirit its very goal and purpose (ibid. 75). In an authentic theology of preaching it is the Spirit who moves both the preacher to preach efficaciously and the hearer to respond with a living faith.

(4) The content is revealed or God-given, a content which, however diversely expressed (the Love of the Father, the Good News, Salvation, Jesus himself) touches principally on “a transcendent and eschatological salvation” (ibid. 27), though secondarily and consequently on human liberation here and now from temporal evils (ibid. 31–38).

(5) Preaching is ministry, a ministry pertaining to the whole Church and to each of its parts. It pertains, first, to the ordained ministry of pope (ibid. 67), bishops and priests (ibid. 68); and to religious according to the silent witness of example or the overt witness of proclamation (ibid. 69). The document stresses also the ministry of the laity (ibid. 70), in virtue both of their presence in the midst of temporal affairs and of their direct service to the ecclesial community (ibid. 73). In this sense the apostolic exhortation supports the distinctive stress in the documents of Vatican II on the role of the laity in proclaiming the Good News and extending the Kingdom of Christ.

(6) Preaching as a ministry calls for such special virtues and qualities as the witness of a holy life (ibid. 76), the spirit of unity and amity among believers (ibid. 77), great reverence for truth (ibid. 78), authentic love for those to whom the Gospel is proclaimed (ibid. 79), and that spiritual fervor which makes the preaching of the Good News a matter of urgent personal necessity (ibid. 80).

(7) Finally, preaching is an act of discernment and accommodation, an act in which the specific character, needs, and life-situation of the hearers affect the mode of proclamation (ibid. 51–57; 62–63), though without prejudice to the universality of the preaching mandate (ibid. 49), or the claims of the universal Church (ibid. 64), or the unimpaired content of revealed truth expressed by the magisterium (ibid. 65).

In conclusion, it may be said that while the documents of Vatican II and the apostolic exhortation on evangelization clearly and persuasively restate a traditional theology of preaching—its source, its purpose, its content, its agency, both divine and human—these same documents give special emphasis and provide special insight into three distinct areas or concerns in the contemporary regime of preaching: (1) the importance of conversional preaching, or the initial moment in the proclamation of the Gospel; (2) the restoration or renewal of liturgical (homiletic) preaching, not only during the celebration of the Eucharist but as an integral part of the entire sacramental system; (3) the phenomenon of lay preaching grounded in the baptismal character of the believer and as the expression of the distinctive role of the laity in communicating the Gospel in the modern world.

PREACHING, II (HOMILETIC THEORY)

The theory of preaching in the Church has had a long development and several names. In the Middle Ages it was called "the art of preaching." In the 16th and 17th centuries it became "ecclesiastical rhetoric" and "sacred eloquence." Since the end of the 17th century it has most commonly been called "homiletics." This article traces the main outlines of its development in the contributions of Catholic authors in patristic, medieval, and modern times.

Patristic Times (until c. 600). Christian preaching appeared in the 1st century as a force unique in its origin, content, aim, and spirit. It had originated in a divine mandate (Mt 28.19–20), contained a divinely revealed message, aimed at the radical conversion of its hearers, and breathed a spirit of earnestness and power.

Apostolic Contrast. The Apostles and their successors found their models of Christian preaching in the instruction and example of Christ our Lord (e.g., Mt 10.16; 13.52), and of the Old Testament prophets. They continued the synagogue custom of explaining the Scriptures at divine services (Lk 4.16–20; Acts 42) in a type of free, familiar, artless discourse that came to be called a HOMILY, from the Greek word for familiar conversation (ὁμιλία); cf. 1 Cor 15.33; Lk 24.14; Acts 24.26). In writing to the Corinthians St. Paul disclaimed any reliance on "sublimity of words or of wisdom," (1 Cor 2.1, 4; 2 Cor 10.10; 11.6), an apparent reference to the art of eloquence that played a dominant role in the Hellenic environment of the time.

Implicit in Paul's disclaimer is the abiding challenge of inculturation, and more specifically of maintaining the supernatural character and divine efficacy of the act of preaching while utilizing effectively principles of general rhetoric. In the four centuries preceding the Christian era the solid foundations of an authentic art of persuasion had been laid in Greek and Roman treatises. The challenge for the Church was how to perfect the natural eloquence of the preacher without succumbing to the superficiality and ostentation that characterized recurring periods of rhetorical decadence.

Classical Rhetoric. A classical rhetoric had been established by close observation of constant elements in the persuasive process. For the soundness of its basic doctrines it has sometimes been called "the perennial rhetoric," by analogy with the philosophia perennis that developed beside it. It was ideally conceived by Plato (Gorgias, Phaedrus), philosophically analyzed by Aristotle (Rhetoric), studied in its practical applications by Cicero in seven separate works on the subject, and construed as a complete system of education by Quintilian. It was in the composite a body of doctrine divided into five tracts: invention, arrangement, style, memory, and delivery. Its aim was to give persuasive impact to the cause of truth and justice. In the early Christian centuries, however, this functional rhetoric had been overlaid by the contrived art of the so-called Second Sophistic, a decadent period marked by a recrudescence of the spirit of self-display and an obsession with stylistic ornament against which Plato had striven much earlier.

As Christianity won more converts from among the educated classes, the unsuitability of sophistic as a vehicle for the word of God became an acute dilemma as the values of Christianity and Hellenism clashed. To pagan listeners with a developed taste for sophistic discourse and a lofty disdain toward the uncultured masses who had embraced the Gospel, the plain-spoken artlessness of Christian preaching had little appeal. Yet to earnest believers, whatever their tastes before conversion, it now seemed desecration to embroider the simple directness of the Gospel with sophistic conceits. Scattered passages containing reflections on this dilemma are found in the works of Tertullian, St. Cyprian, Arnobius, Lactantius, St. Jerome, St. Clement of Alexandria, and Origen (see Labriolle, 1–28). The rigoristic view was that the principles of eloquence developed by pagan rhetors could be of no practical use to the preacher sent by God. The moderate view that gradually won out was that the really valid principles constant in the persuasive process should be taken into the service of Christian preaching, while the superficial mannerisms that entrusted and embarrassed them should be discarded.

The 3d Century. ORIGEN (d. 153) made a lasting impression on homiletics. His views, revealed only in passing, stressed a side to effective preaching that had to be developed by the preacher's own efforts (Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 14:1215–16). He held that true preaching must combine instruction and persuasion, just as true fire gives both light and warmth (Patrologia Graeca 12:392). His chief influence, however, lay in his far-reaching principle of interpreting Scripture in the Alexandrian tradition of a fourfold exegesis. Each passage was explained in a literal, moral, and mystical sense, the mystical being subdivided into allegorical and anagogical. The belief that single verses and even single words of Scripture contained meanings hidden deep beneath the literal sense filled his homilies with allegory. The term homily itself took on the technical meaning of an explanation of a Scriptural passage, and the verse-by-verse explanation that this exegetical method required has become known as the "first form" of homily, or the "lower homily," or the versicular homily.

The Golden Age of Patristic Eloquence. From the Peace of Constantine (313) to the Council of Chalcedon (451) there was progress toward a theory of Christian preaching and a solution of its basic conflict with sophistic. Large congregations in spacious basilicas, public celebration of Christian feasts, violent controversy on doctrinal issues, and prominent bishops who had spent their youth in the study of public speaking made for vigorous eloquence. Besides the versicular homily there now appeared funeral discourses and panegyrics on the martyrs and theological orations that established the thematic sermon as another form of Christian preaching, differing from the homily chiefly in that it set out to explain a certain doctrine or a certain event rather than a scriptural passage. The great Fathers of this age, influenced on the one hand by their early training and continued friendship with leading sophists, and on the other by their profound reverence for the word of God, gave their attention to the question of the relation of Christian preaching to general rhetoric. St. BASIL (d. 379), who had earlier followed the career of his renowned rhetorician father and sent students to the sophist Libanius (see Basil's Letters 335–360), made an indirect contribution in his treatise To the Youths by endorsing the principle that the genuine values of pagan literary achievement should be preserved. His brother, St. GREGORY OF NYSSA (d. 394), personally exemplified the Christian confronted with sophistic standards he could neither honor nor escape. St. GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS (d. 389) left more numerous obiter dicta on the problem. For him, the greatest “wisdom” (σοφία, cf. 1 Cor 1.22; 2.2–8) was to despise “wisdom” that consisted only in word play and false antitheses (Patrologia Graeca 35:935). He attacked the theatrical preachers who destroyed the simple eloquence of the Christian message (Patrologia Graeca 36:237). Yet he esteemed true eloquence as a most precious possession (Patrologia Graeca 35:635), a pearl of great price (Patrologia Graeca 35:727) that he had acquired by great efforts in his youth (Patrologia Graeca 35:762).

The great influence on preaching among the Greek Fathers was exercised by St. JOHN CHRYSOSTOM (d. 407). Following the preference of the Antiochian school for the literal rather than the allegorical sense of Scripture, he did much to develop the second or mixed form of homily, in which a Scriptural passage was first explained verse by verse and then its central thought was treated as a unified theme as in the thematic sermon. Although for this versicular-thematic homily he left no connected theory, he did devote the fourth and fifth books of his treatise On the Priesthood to the ministry of preaching. Because they lacked the apostolic power of miracles, he argued, later Christian preachers needed the power of eloquence, to acquire which they had to expend great effort, since not nature but training made a speaker. This was all the more essential because of “the great passion for eloquence that has taken hold of the minds of Christians” (op. cit. 5.8). But while these books dealt with the attitude of the preacher toward his office and the dangers surrounding it, they did not constitute a homiletic theory properly so called.

St. Augustine. The first technical theory of preaching was provided in 427 by St. AUGUSTINE (d. 430), in the fourth book of his treatise On Christian Instruction (De doctrina christiana). By devoting the first three books, which had been written much earlier (c. 397), to methods of interpreting Scripture, and the fourth to techniques of proximate preparation and delivery, he anticipated a modern distinction between material and formal homiletics. His major contribution, however, was to establish once for all time the principle that the Christian must press into the service of the Gospel all the perennially valid principles of general rhetoric. Clearly rejecting sophistic, he reached back to the works of Cicero for his rhetorical doctrine, adapting to Christian preaching the triple Ciceronian aims of teaching, pleasing, and persuading (docere, delectare, movere), and the corresponding concepts of instructive, affective, and persuasive styles. In a thorough discussion of the whole foundation of the theory of preaching he showed the way for very many subsequent treatises, so much so that what Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian were to the establishment of the perennial rhetoric, this work of St. Augustine was to homiletics. Another of Augustine's works that contained much advice for preachers is his The First Catechetical Instruction (De catechizandis rudibus) in which he provides practical suggestions on how to engage an audience and maintain their attention as well as contents for an introductory sermon for individuals inquiring about the faith.

Medieval Times (c. 600–c. 1500). In the early Middle Ages (600–1100), there was a sharp decline in preaching. In the making of Europe after the fall of the Roman Empire, clergy were ordained with only the most essential preparation, books were scarce, the ministry of the word was closely reserved as the bishops' prerogative, and the ideal of monastic stability during these Benedictine centuries made traveling preachers exceptions to the rule. Those who did preach depended almost entirely upon the early Fathers for both doctrine and expression, being content merely to repeat or paraphrase some patristic homily on the scriptural lesson of the day, for which the more fortunate had at hand homiliaries such as the widely used collection edited for Charlemagne by Paul the Deacon. These conservative customs were reflected in the lack of any substantial developments in homiletic theory from the 5th to the 12th century. St. GREGORY THE GREAT (d. 604) did give detailed instructions in his Pastoral Rule on themes for different types of listeners, and in his Homilies and Dialogues set a precedent for the use of illustrations or exempla in preaching. CASSIODORUS (d. c. 575), St. Isidore of Seville (d. 636), St. Bede (d. 735), and ALCUIN (d. 804) did write concise summaries of general rhetoric. RABANUS MAURUS (d. 856) summarized St. Augustine's tract and St. Gregory's Rule in his treatise on the training of the clergy (De clericorum institutione; Patrologia Latina, ed. J. P. Migne, 107:297–420). But of any original technical treatise on preaching after St. Augustine's in 427 there is no trace for 700 years.

The late Middle Ages (1100–1500), by contrast, was a highly creative period in the history of homiletic theory. Seeds sown in the 12th century flowered in the 13th, but ran to seed again during the 14th and 15th centuries. Passages in St. BERNARD (d. 1153) give evidence of the 12th-century transition. On the one hand his sermons reveal a low opinion of rhetoric and a reluctance to allow monks to preach outside the cloister; on the other hand, they exhibit a unity of theme and an orderly progression and originality of conception that anticipate the flowering of medieval homiletics. His contemporary, the Benedictine Abbot GUIBERT OF NOGENT (d. 1124), also sowed new seed by his tract on how a sermon should be prepared (Quo ordine sermo fieri debeat; Patrologia Latina 156:21–32). While not a technical treatise, this little work has seminal suggestions about the fourfold interpretation of Scripture, the importance of moral application, the knowledge of the human heart to be gained by observing one's own inner life, the necessity of lively delivery, and the usefulness of examples from history and of allegories from observation of gems, birds, and beasts. More technical than this is the treatise published a little later by the Cistercian scholar ALAN OF LILLE (d. c. 1203). Its 48 chapters (Summa Magistri Alani doctoris universalis de arte praedicatoria; Patrologia Latina 210:111–198) are mostly illustrative sketches of how to develop sermons on certain virtues and vices (ch. 2–37) and different states of life (ch. 40–48). Only the first chapter, after repudiating all puerilities in preaching such as the rhyming sermon then popular, presents the technical theory. The recommended technique is to begin with a text from the Gospels, Psalms, Pauline Epistles, or Books of Solomon, since these afford many moral themes, for which confirmatory texts can be sought in other parts of the Bible. Then the preacher must get the good will of his listeners by his humility and his explanation of the usefulness of what he is about to say, promising to be brief and to the point. Then he must develop his text, bringing in other authorities to confirm the proposition, sometimes even quoting the classics, as St. Paul sometimes did. He must also employ pathos to soften hearts and draw tears. Toward the end he may clinch the lesson by using exempla, since teaching by stories is popular (familiaris). These suggestions foreshadowed the elements of the numerous treatises that in the following century were to establish a characteristic technique for the late medieval sermon.

The 13th Century. In the 13th century the Fourth Lateran Council's decree on preaching (X. De praedicatoribus instituendis) gave authoritative impetus the renewal of preaching already well underway. The rapid growth of the mendicant Orders, notably the Franciscans and Dominicans, the rise of the universities and scholasticism, and the determination to meet on their own ground the heretics who were spreading their doctrines by preaching, all conspired to produce a vast homiletic renewal. In contrast to earlier monastic stability, thousands of mendicant friars became itinerant preachers, while professors took turns in the university pulpits and required trial sermons of candidates for degrees. Many technical treatises appeared, gradually developing a fairly standardized theory. Authors of widely used treatises in the 13th century were WILLIAM OF AUVERGNE (d. 1249), the Franciscans John of La Rochelle (d. 1245) and John of Wales (d. c. 1300), and the obscure Richard of Thetford (13th century), whose tract inculcated the conventional eight modes of developing a theme, resembling the "commonplaces" or topoi (τόποι) of classical rhetoric. The fifth Dominican master general, HUMBERT OF ROMANS (d. 1277), published two books (c. 1240) on the training of preachers in a single volume De eruditione praedicatorum, which was used extensively by both Dominicans and Franciscans (Zawart, 374). The first book contains reflections on the preacher's office and conduct (translated in 1951 as Treatise on Preaching, ed. W. M. Conlon), and the second contains sermon models for all types of listeners and all occasions.

The 14th Century. In the 14th century, prominent authors were Robert of Basevorn (fl. 1322?), the Dominicans Jacques de Fusignano at Paris (early 14th century) and Thomas Waleys at Oxford (d. c. 1349), and the Augustinian Thomas of Todi (fl. 1380). Still later works were the Franciscan manual written by Christian Borgsleben after 1464 for student friars at the University of Erfurt, and the chapters on preaching included by the Dominican St. ANTONINUS of Florence (d. 1459) in part three of his Summa theologiae moralis.

Compilations of Sermon Material. Besides the many technical treatises on preaching—the ARS PRAEDICANDI—as the genre was called, the medieval preacher had many promptuaries of sermon material indexed under such headings as the virtues and vices. His lapidaries and bestiaries afforded him abundant illustrations of sermon themes by way of analogy with the properties of gems and characteristics of animals. His collections of exempla or pious stories, which he liked to employ especially toward the end of a popular sermon, enabled him to preach on any theme with only short notice. In imitation of the 2nd century Alexandrian bestiary Physiologus and of the early Lives of the Fathers ascribed to St. Jerome's disciple PALLADIUS, and of the Dialogues of St. Gregory the Great, which was their counterpart in the West, many medieval authors edited such collections. Outstanding were the compilations of the Cistercian Abbot CAESARIUS OF HEISTERBACH (d. c. 1240), whose Homiliae and Dialogus miraculorum followed the methods of St. Gregory and of the Augustinian Cardinal JACQUES DE VITRY (d. 1240), whose published sermons contained as many as three and four exempla each. Major Dominican compilers were Étienne of Bourbon (d. 1261), William Peraldus (d. c. 1207), the above-mentioned Humbert of Romans (d. 1277), and much later Johannes Herolt (d. early 15th century). In England a Summa praedicantium was compiled by the Oxford-Cambridge Dominican and adversary of Wyclif, John Bromyard (d. 1390), running to nearly 1,000 folio pages containing some 1,200 exempla under 189 alphabetical headings, with a prologue and a little treatise on preaching under the heading "Praedicator." The Franciscan John of Kilkeny is credited with a 13th-century collection (Zawart, 366). A number of his confreres compiled a Liber exemplorum Fratrum Minorum somewhat later, and still another anonymous Franciscan edited the Speculum laicorum (c. 1285).

Technique. The technique of the late medieval sermon described in the standard treatises was the product of the scholastic spirit. It emphasized strict unity and sought to evolve the whole sermon systematically from a carefully chosen Scripture text that stated the theme. After the text came the pro-theme, which led to the invocation for divine help for preacher and listeners. The theme was then restated and divided, usually into three parts, which were then subdivided and developed according to conventional modes of amplification. Theme, pro-theme, invocation, division, declaration of parts, and development proceeded in a logical unfolding that was seen by the systematic scholastic mind as the homiletic equivalent of PORPHYRY'S tree. In fact the medieval artes praedicandi often contained diagrams illustrating the sermon process by the organic structure of a tree, with its root (the theme) developing into the trunk (pro-theme), which then divided into the major limbs (three parts), these then subdividing into branches bearing leaves and fruit. In the declining Middle Ages, while the popular sermon to the uneducated laity, especially in the hands of preachers such as the Franciscan Berthold of Regensburg (d. 1272), could for the most part escape it, there lay in the formalism of the scholastic sermon a tendency to an obsession with style and excessive subtlety.

[J. M. CONNORS]

Modern Times (from c. 1500). From the time that Poggio, on his way to the Council of Constance (1414), recovered the complete Quintilian in a tower of the Abbey of St. Gall and Gherardo Landriani in 1425 came upon Cicero's rhetorical treatises in the Duomo at Lodi, it was predictable that the Renaissance enthusiasm for classical rhetoric would influence the theory of preaching. Actually, the Manuale curatorum by Ulrich Surgant in 1503 was about the last well-known homiletic treatise in the medieval scholastic mold. The next year the renowned humanist Johann REUCHLIN published a brochure of concise notes on preaching as Liber congestorum de arte praedicandi in 1504. In less than 24 pages, he summarized the typical features of the perennial rhetoric: the five basic tracts on invention, arrangement, style, memory, and delivery; the topoi or commonplaces as tools of invention; the classic arrangement of exordium, narration, division, confirmation, confutation, and peroration; the stylistic modes divided into figures of thought and figures of words; orderly arrangement and frequent meditation as aids to memory; and treatment of delivery in sections on voice and on action. In several places he explicitly mentioned Cicero and Quintilian, revealing himself as the first of dozens of 16th-century authors who took timbers from the Greek and Roman treatises for the framework of their homiletic theory. The trend became more firmly established in 1535 with the publication of Ecclesiastes sive de ratione concionandi by ERASMUS. This very long and loosely organized treatise, begun at the urging of St. John FISHER (d. 1535) and published in the year of his martyrdom, shows the effects of Erasmus's personal hardships during its composition, but firmly advances St. Augustine's principle of adopting the perennial rhetoric as the framework for homiletic theory.

With these precedents, the way lay open for the many authors who saw a demand for homiletic manuals implied in the decrees of the Council of Trent on frequent preaching and on the establishment of seminaries with homiletic training in the curriculum. St. Charles BORROMEO worked these decrees out in fuller detail in his First Provincial Synod of Milan in 1565, and in 1575 published his instructions on preaching as Instructiones praedicationis verbi Dei, which went everywhere as part of the Acta ecclesiae mediolanensis [ed. Achille Ratti (1890) 2:1207–48], the bishops' handbook at many local councils after Trent. These decrees of Trent and Milan and the CATECHISM OF THE COUNCIL OF TRENT came to form the core of a Tridentine tradition in conciliar legislation on preaching for the next four centuries. To fill the great need for manuals thus created, leading ecclesiastics took up their pens. In 1562 the Franciscan Lucas Baglioni published L'Arte del predicare. An Augustinian preacher at the Spanish court, Lorenzo de Villavicente, put out in 1565 a work De formandis sacris concionibus seu de interpretatione scripturarum populari, reproducing the title and substance of a renowned earlier work by the Protestant writer Andreas Hyperius. Technical treatises also appeared by the famous Franciscan preachers Cornelius MUSSO (d. 1574) and Francesco PANIGAROLA (d. 1594), who have a controversial place in history as originators of the baroque concetti. In 1570 Alphonsus Garsias Matamoro, professor of rhetoric at the then thriving University of ALCALÁ, published De tribus dicendi generibus sive de recta informandi styli ratione and De methodo concionandi juxta rhetoricae artis praescriptum. Antonius Lanquier, a Carmelite, published in 1578 his Synopsis ad faciendam piam concionem orthodoxis, and in 1595 appeared the Divinus orator vel de rhetorica divina by Ludovico Carbone. To the Capuchin LAWRENCE OF BRINDISI (d. 1619) is attributed a long unpublished treatise for young preachers, Tractatus de modo concionandi, quo instruuntur novi concionatores.

The most successful authors, however, were Augustinus Valerius, Didacus Stella, and Louis of Granada, whose works so complemented each other that they were sometimes published together in subsequent editions. Valerius (d. 1606), Bishop of Verona, writing so closely under the observation of St. Charles Borromeo that he called him the true author of the treatise, based his three books on ecclesiastical rhetoric, De rhetorica ecclesiastica sive modo concionandi libri tres (1574), squarely upon Aristotle's Rhetoric. DIEGO OF ESTELLA, a Franciscan exegete (d. 1578), derived his theory more from the preacher's role as interpreter of the Scriptures in his De ratione concionandi, sive rhetorica ecclesiastica of 1576. Most widely used of all, and recommended even by Bellarmine and Bérulle, was the Ecclesiasticae rhetoricae sive de ratione concionandi libri sex published in 1576 by LOUIS OF GRANADA (d. 1588). This outstanding Dominican, praised by the Jesuit Rapin as the very model of a preacher, stressed in the preface to his work the importance of style and delivery as well as invention, and relied for his principles heavily on Quintilian.

The Jesuits. This movement to employ classical rhetoric as the framework of homiletic theory received strong and enduring support from the Jesuits. A zeal for preaching was evident from the beginning in the writings of the early Jesuit generals. St. IGNATIUS OF LOYOLA promulgated the 24 rules for preachers, and other directives. Diego LAÍNEZ wrote a long unedited treatise of advice for preachers, Monita pro iis qui concionandi munus suscipiunt. St. Francis BORGIA published a short but much-reprinted tract De ratione concionandi, and Claudius ACQUAVIVA (1581–1615) included an instruction for preachers in his Instructiones ad provinciales et superiores societatis in 1613. St. Robert BELLARMINE (d. 1621) also gave a half-dozen pages of instructions, De ratione formandae concionis (Opera oratoria postuma, I; S. I. selecti scriptores Rome 1942); and even in the foreign missions St. Francis XAVIER (d. 1552) wrote letters including extensive advice on preaching. More to the point concerning the perennial rhetoric, Gerónimo Nadal (d. 1580) gave detailed instructions on Jesuit homiletic training in his De ministerio verbi Dei (Monumenta historica Societatis Jesu, Epistolae Nadal 4.653–670), in which he explicitly called for a theory of preaching utilizing the best of Aristotle, Cicero, and Quintilian (p. 657). Execution of this clear policy was aided by the ardent classicism of the RATIO STUDIORUM, which took as its own objective Quintilian's ideal of "the good man skilled in speaking," and for more than two centuries trained Jesuit students on such compendia of classical rhetoric as the De arte rhetorica (1560) of Cyprian Soarez, SJ. The homiletic treatises of dozens of Jesuit authors in the 17th and 18th centuries reflected this background (see C. Sommervogel et al., Bibliothèque de la Compagnie de Jésus).

France. In the 17th century the initiative in homiletic theory passed to France, where the reform of preaching was a particular manifestation of the general Catholic revival. Influential beyond all proportion to its brevity was the Letter to André Frémiot on preaching written in 1604 by St. FRANCIS DE SALES (d. 1622). His effect on St. VINCENT DE PAUL (d. 1660) helped to shape "The Little Method," which the latter employed in his efforts to reform French preaching through the Tuesday Conference for the diocesan clergy and his own Congregation of the Mission and his retreats for ordinands. He employed it everywhere also in the work of the internal missions, which he originated in 1617. As a spirit, The Little Method was a rejection of the sophistic taste that had once more revived in the form of the exaggerated classicism of the Renaissance. As a technique, it was a way of constructing a moral sermon on a sequence of motives, nature, and means pertaining to some virtue or vice, employing the most stirring stylistic modes or figures of speech and short texts and examples. Among others, J. J. Oiler, L. TRONSON, and even BOSSUET learned The Little Method from St. Vincent, and Tronson as tutor and Bossuet as colleague undoubtedly communicated at least its spirit to FÉNELON. Its influence is evident also in the tract on The Apostolic Preacher by St. John EUDES (d. 1680). Meanwhile, the Orator christianus (1612) by the Jesuit Charles Regius (d. 1612) had been made a standard manual for the Society by Acquaviva's instruction in 1613. A French Jesuit, formerly chaplain to Louis XIII, Nicholas Caussin (d. 1651) published the unwieldy and disorganized Eloquentiae sacrae et humanae parallela in 1619. Much shorter and clearer was the theory by which another Jesuit, Paolo SEGNERI (d. 1694), did much to combat the Sophistic taste of the early baroque period in Italy. In 1670 the Capuchin Amadeus Bajocensis (Amadée of Bayeux) published a huge work on homiletic theory based on St. Paul, Paulus Ecclesiastes seu eloquentia christiana, qua orator evangelicus ad ideam Pauli efformatur. René RAPIN, SJ, wrote Reflections upon Eloquence, (1671) and the Oratorian Bernard LAMY put out his L'Art de parler with a section on preaching in 1675.

Reaction to the Baroque. In the 18th century the plea for a return to apostolic simplicity and earnestness was characteristic of the major treatises. In France, Blaise Gisbert, SJ, produced his Christian Eloquence in Theory and Practice (1702), a volume of 23 chapters and 435 pages in its English translation, making an eloquent statement of the highest homiletic ideals, profusely illustrated from the works of St. John Chrysostom. In 1710 Jean Gaichiès published his less valuable but well-known Maximes sur le ministère de la chaire. A high point in the history of French homiletics was the work of Fénelon (d. 1715). In his Letter to the Academy of 1714 he called for scholars to construct an ideal rhetorical treatise by drawing from the best of the Greek and Roman classics, and for a comparable treatise on preaching based on the principles of St. Augustine. In 1717 his Dialogues on Eloquence were published posthumously. Much admired and quoted, they define eloquence as the art of persuading men to truth and goodness, demand full understanding of listeners' obligations and motives, list the aims of preaching as to prove, to portray, and to strike, prescribe careful preparation but extempore delivery, reject formal divisions and the artificial conceits dear to the baroque taste, insist on full knowledge of both Holy Scripture and human nature, advocate that pastors be chosen for ability to preach, propose a return to the patristic homily and a style of preaching that, because it did not make heroic demands in preparation, enabled the preacher to speak as often as his listeners desired. Fénelon is the zenith of the golden age of French homiletic theory, of which later treatises like Cardinal Jean Siffrein Maury's Principle of Eloquence in 1782 are but the sunset before the nightfall of the French Revolution in 1789.

Spain. In the 18th century, meanwhile, the campaign against baroque sophistic was cleverly waged by the Jesuit Jose Francisco de Isla (d. 1781), whose lampooning History of the Famous Preacher Friar Gerund of Campazas (Spanish 1758) became a classic of Spanish satire rivaling Don Quixote. This novel, which Benedict XIV stayed up all night to read and then highly praised, stirred up such opposition as to land on the Index until 1900, but it succeeded in overcoming the current bad taste by making "Gerundianism" a term of ridicule. Almost at the same time, in Italy St. Alphonsus Liguori (d. 1787), founder of the Redemptorists, circulated among bishops and religious superiors in 1761 his Letter to a Religious on Apostolic Preaching. It was one long appeal for simplicity and practicality, and repeatedly recommended the ideals expressed by Lodovico Antonio MURATORI in his Dei pregi dell' eloquenza popolare of 1750. In addition, St. Alphonsus wrote technically on homiletic theory in part three of his Selva (1760). For the Passionists, founded in Italy at the same time for the same work of internal missions, St. Vincenzo Strambi (d. 1824) dictated notes in 1789 that were later published as A Guide to Sacred Eloquence. This work, strongly classical in orientation, bears such intrinsic resemblance to St. Alphonsus's treatise as to indicate either dependence upon it or the sharing of a common source. Contemporary were the works of the two Capuchins, Gaetano da Bergamo, L'uomo apostolico i xtruito nella sua vocazione al pulpito (1729), and Andrea da Faenza, Lettera didascalica sopra la maniera di ben comporre la predica (n.d.).

Germany. In 18th-century Germany the ENLIGHTENMENT was followed by the appearance of the first Catholic homiletic works in German. Rudolf Graser, OSB, published Vollständige Lehrart zu predigen in 1766 and Praktische Beredsamkeit der chr. Kanzel in 1769. Ignaz Wurz, SJ, produced in 1770 his Anleitung zur geistlichen Beredsamkeit, many times republished. Another Jesuit, Joseph Anton Weissenbach, began in 1775 his nine-volume work on patristic eloquence, De eloquentia patrum libri xiii, which was abridged in Rome as Ratio utendi scriptis sanctorum patrum ad conciones sacras (1825), only to have the abridgement translated back into German in 1844 by M. A. Nickel and J. Kehrein. It is a statement of homiletic theory filled out with abundant illustrations from the Fathers. The reorganization of theological studies by the Benedictine Abbot Franz Stephan RAUTENSTRAUCH (d. 1785) and the subsequent decree of Empress Maria Theresa that vernacular lectures on pastoral theology be held in all theological faculties of her empire created a demand for more manuals and established the German custom of writing large handbooks of pastoral theology comprising treatises on homiletics, catechetics, and liturgy. The appearance in 1788 of the lectures on pastoral theology, Vorlesungen aus der Pastoraltheologie, by the renowned Johann Michael SAILER set a new standard, in a time when even some theological manuals were tinged with rationalism, for sound theology and exact knowledge of Scripture, to which Sailer added, in treating homiletics, a sure grasp of technique. The homiletic part of the manual gave that constant attention to the connections between doctrinal themes, moral themes, and Scriptural Selections that became typical of German homiletics. Sailer's students followed his lead, especially Aegidius Jais and Ignaz Schüch, OSB, the homiletic part of whose phenomenally successful Handbuch der Pastoraltheologie was translated by Lubberman in 1894 as The Priest in the Pulpit. Less valuable than the untranslated parts of Schüch's manual that account for its many German editions, the translated treatise on homiletics has had little acclaim in English.

The 19th Century. In the 19th century the early decades of upheaval were followed by the restoration of the French seminary system and the supplementing of its traditional supervised refectory practice-preaching by extensive systematic courses in homiletic theory. Manuals appeared, such as those of J. X. Vètu (1840), L. H. M. Bellefroid (n.d., 2d ed. 1847), Mullois (1853–1863), and, at Mechlin in Belgium, Van Hemel (1855), whose work presented a plan for consecutive homiletic training throughout the seminarian's philosophical and theological courses. Most successful among the new French manuals, however, was the Traité de la prédication by the Sulpician André J. M. Hamon in 1844. In 1853 an anonymous abridgement of it was published by the Vincentian Joseph Lament in his De la prédication, and in 1866 Thomas J. Potter of All Hallows, the Dublin seminary for English-speaking countries, paraphrased its first part in his Sacred Eloquence, and in 1869 its second part in his The Pastor and His People. In this way the same basic theory of Hamon became standard for seminaries directed or influenced by the Sulpicians and Vincentians and emigrating Irish clergy, who together in the 19th century established prototype diocesan seminaries in English-speaking countries. Other technical treatises, not intended as textbooks, based mainly on Fénelon's Dialogues, were The Art of Extempore Speaking by L. Bautain (1856) and The Ministry of Preaching by the great DUPANLOUP (1866, tr. 1890). In 1851 the Jesuit Cyprien Nadal assembled an encyclopedia of homiletic theory for a Migne six-volume series, Dictionnaire d'éloquence sacrée: Nouvelle encyclopédie théologique. Georges Longhaye, SJ, published his popular La prédication, grands maîtres et grandes lois in 1888.

The restoration of the Jesuits in 1814 and their assignment to the theological faculty at Innsbruck in 1856 were influential events in the development of German homiletic theory in the 19th century. In Rome in 1847 the German Jesuit Joseph Kleutgen published his Ars dicendi, which in the revised Ratio Studiorum achieved the place so long held by Soarez. Kleutgen tried to assimilate the aesthetic and belletristic tendencies of rhetoricians like Hugh Blair (Lectures on Rhetoric and Belles Lettres, 1783) without submerging the character of the perennial rhetoric as essentially a theory of public speaking in an omnibus treatise on all forms of prose and verse composition. Like Blair, however, and like other prominent Jesuit theorists (C. Coppens, F. P. Donnelly) he organized his treatise in such a way as to imply that homiletics is only a species of general rhetoric, or that the theory of preaching is little more than the theory of public speaking for priests. The same inclination to make general rhetoric the foundation rather than merely the framework of homiletic theory was visible in the Grundzüge der Beredsamkeit published in 1859 by Nikolaus Schleiniger, SJ, (tr. 1909 as The Principles of Eloquence). Schleiniger did, however, produce another specifically homiletic treatise on the ministry of preaching in Das kirchliche Predigtamt in 1861, in 1864 a manual on Die Bildung des jungen Predigers for training of young preachers, and in 1865 his sermon models in Muster und Quellen des Predigers. At Innsbruck, Josef JUNGSMANN, SJ (d. 1885), after an earlier study on aesthetics, wrote his monumental Theorie der geistlichen Beredsamkeit (2 v. 1877–78), building his theory around his "two supreme laws" of popularity and practicality. In 1883 the popular spiritual writer Alban Stolz was author of a posthumously published work on how to preach the Gospel to the poor, Homiletik als Anweisung den Armen das Evangelium zu predigen. In 1888 the renowned apologist Franz HETTINGER published his maxims on preaching and preachers, Aphorismen über Predigt und Prediger.

While France and Germany in the 19th century enjoyed this abundance, and Italy had at least Guglielmo Audisio's Lezioni di sacra eloquenza (3 v. Turin 1839–58), the English-speaking countries had only the modest beginnings of a Catholic homiletic literature. After three centuries of Catholic disabilities, during which a vernacular tradition of Catholic pulpit eloquence had been utterly impossible, the Catholic Emancipation of 1829 and the rapid growth of the seminary system called forth the first efforts. Fénelon, Gisbert, Isla, Bautain, Mullois, and Maury had been translated, as also St. Alphonsus and St. Vincenzo Strambi, but the only original works in English by Catholic authors were Newman's essay on "University Preaching" (c. 1855), published as part of the Idea of a University, and in 1881 a poorly done Sacred Eloquence by Thomas MacNamara, CM. An English adaptation of the fourth part of Kleutgen was made by Charles Coppens, SJ, in his Art of Oratorical Composition in 1885. The standard theory of preaching in English-speaking countries in the 19th century, remained that expounded by Thomas J. Potter in his trilogy on Sacred Eloquence, The Pastor and His People, and The Spoken Word. Sharing its theory with Hamon and Lamant in a uniform Sulpician-Vincentian-Hibernian tradition of seminary training, drawing also from Bautain, Bellefroid, Van Hemel, and Newman.

Having no serious rival among Catholic authors in English, Potter's is the representative work of the late 19th and early 20th century. Briefly, he teaches that the general aim of preaching is to move to action, so that every proper sermon is persuasive, issuing in a practical resolution. A discourse that does not prove a proposition and issue in definite action cannot be called a sermon. Intermediate aims are St. Augustine's "to teach, to please, to move." The set sermon is a formal oration with sublime concepts and elevated style for special occasions; the familiar instruction, with simple ideas and colloquial style, is typically employed at Sunday Mass. The set sermon follows the classic Ciceronian plan; the familiar instruction may take the form of the various types of homily or of The Little Method. Unity in a sermon is essential, and may best be tested by reducing the sermon to a syllogism. Psychological steps in sermon preparation are to meditate the theme, to conceive the central idea that will unify the discourse, to write at a time when mind and heart are enlightened and warmed by the subject, and to revise and polish the hasty first draft. Extempore preaching is the ideal, although beginners must write and memorize. Delivery cannot be taught in a book, but coaching must produce vocal variety and effective action. For the rest, Potter's theory is not in the familiar mold of classically oriented treatises, except for the Ciceronian arrangement of the set sermon and the threefold intermediate aims. The topoi or "commonplaces" are not developed, but only listed and defined. Figures of speech are disposed of in a single paragraph. Types of style correspond vaguely to the set sermon and familiar instruction, with no vestige of St. Augustine's three styles. There is no effort to discuss the role of homiletics as a part of pastoral theology, or to treat in depth the question of sermon content.

The 20th Century. In the 20th century many historical studies and a few manuals appeared in French. At the behest of his superiors, Jacques M. MONSABRÉ, OP, published in 1900 his Avant, pendant, après la prédication as an official Dominican handbook. In 1923 Raoul Plus, SJ, published Prédication 'réelle' et 'irréelle': Notes pratiques pour le ministère paroissial. Antonin G. Sertilanges, OP, put out L'Orateur chrétien in 1931. In German, Albert Meyenberg produced his huge Homiletische und katechetische Studien in 1903, which after great success was translated in 1912 as Homiletic and Catechetical Studies. Meyenberg borrowed his formal theory from Jungmann, but in the bewildering organization of his book, which must have become popular in German more for its liturgical than its homiletic content, Jungmann's thought is done little justice. Jacob Herr wrote Praktischer Kursus der Homiletik in 1913, the Capuchin Dionys Habersbrunner produced Ein Weg zur Kanzel in 1933, and Peter Adamer published Predigtkunde in 1937. The most vigorous activity in homiletic theory in the early part of the century, however, has been the movement carried on in Germany by Bishop Von Keppler and his associates, Adolf Donders and Franz Stingeder. A major aim in Von Keppler's campaign from the time of his articles in the Tübinger Quartalschrift in 1892, until death overtook him while he was preparing for a homiletic convention in 1926, was to restore the homily to a place of honor side by side with the thematic sermon, which had too long monopolized the pulpit. He also insisted that homiletics is independent of general rhetoric in its origin, content, and aim. It is not derived from rhetoric any more than Catholic theology is derived from scholastic philosophy, but it can make a similar use of the concepts and principles of the perennial rhetoric as tools of investigation and forms of expression for the content it derives from divine revelation. It is the difference between a foundation and a framework. Von Keppler's papers at the Ravensburg convention of 1910 were translated in 1927 as Homiletic Thoughts and Counsels, but they are not as representative of his theory as are his periodical articles and his "Homiletik" and "Predigt" in Wetzler-Welte, Kirchenlexicon. His Predigt und Heilige Schrift was published after his death in 1926. In 1910 Stingeder wrote a critique of contemporary homiletics as Wo steht unsere heutige Predigt? In 1920 he contributed a history of the use of Scripture in preaching, Geschichte der Schriftpredigt, to the nine volumes of homiletic studies edited from 1919 to 1931 by A. Donders and Thaddeus Soiron, OFM. Soiron was the most prominent of the Paderborn Franciscans who showed prolific zeal in homiletic publications; he edited from 1918 to 1935 a scientific homiletic journal called Kirche und Kanzel.

English-speaking Countries. In English-speaking countries, meanwhile, the turn of the century brought forth the first generation of Catholic authors of original homiletic treatises. Some of the theory was published incidentally as parts of books on other subjects. Rapid expansion of the seminary system after the Third Plenary Council of Baltimore (1884) and the growth of an indigenous English-speaking clergy prompted many works on the duties of the priesthood, which often contained chapters on preaching. At a time when the elocutionary movement led by the followers of François Delsarte had brought it into disrepute, it is not surprising that writers on preaching took a negative view of rhetoric.

Cardinal MANNING in 1883 devoted chapter 14 of The Eternal Priesthood to the importance of remote rather than proximate preparation for preaching, and to a plea for simple, earnest, extempore discourse. Cardinal GIBBONS wrote in the same vein in 1896 in The Ambassador of Christ. Bishop Hedley in Lex Levitarum in 1905 argued that "it would be a waste of time to enter too deeply on the study of rhetoric as an art" (p. 110). Arthur Barry O'Neill, CSC, in chapter 11 of his Priestly Practice in 1914, felt the need to refute the idea that "rhetorical" is a synonym for "artificial." The extempore method advocated by Manning was greatly furthered by J. Ward's biography of William Pardow of the Company of Jesus in 1915, and by C. C. MARTINDALE's The Life of Monsignor Robert Hugh Benson in 1916.

Of the treatises dealing ex professo with the technical theory of preaching before 1936, Bernard Feeney's Manual of Sacred Rhetoric in 1901, Win. B. O'Dowd's Preaching in 1919, and Charles H. Schultz's Sacred Eloquence in 1926 were general homiletic manuals, dealing, that is, with all aspects of sermon composition and delivery. Works consisting almost entirely of the proposal of a sermon formula and its explanation were George S. Hitchcock's Sermon Composition in 1908, which describes a sermon arrangement akin to the "Ignatian Method" in discursive meditation, and the Passionist Mark Moeslein's Mechanism of Discourses in 1915, which draws from St. Vincenzo Strambi. Presentations of a professedly simplified approach to the theory of preaching were Thomas Flynn's Preaching Made Easy in 1923, and Aloysius Roche's Practical Hints on Preaching in 1933. John A. McClorey, SJ, published The Making of a Pulpit Orator in 1934. In 1936 John K. Sharp published Our Preaching, followed in 1937 by his Next Sunday's Sermon.

The most prolific publishers of periodical articles on homiletic theory in the United States were the American

Ecclesiastical Review (AER) since 1889 and the Homiletic and Pastoral Review (HPR). The outstanding contributor and most representative author of homiletic theory in English-speaking countries in his era was Monsignor Hugh T. Henry (d. 1946) of the Catholic University of America, who republished the best of his hundreds of articles from the AER and HPR in his Hints to Preachers in 1924, Papers on Preaching in 1925, and Preaching in 1941. Other books and brochures whose chapters first appeared as articles in the AER were the Jesuit Francis P. Donnelly's The Art of Interesting in 1920, Edmond D. Benard's The Appeal to the Emotions in Preaching in 1944, and the Passionist Luke Missett's The Pews Talk Back in 1946.

Earlier, in 1942 a layman, O'Brien Atkinson, skilled in modern advertising and street preaching, published How to Make Us Want Your Sermon, in which he challenged many concepts traditional in standard writers such as Potter, Henry, and Sharp. Also in 1942 appeared the Carmelite Albert Dolan's brochure of Homiletic Hints. In 1943 Thomas A. Carney built A Primer of Homiletics around St. Vincent's Little Method. In 1950 William R. Duffey's Preaching Well appeared as a substantial paraphrase of Bellefroid. Thomas V. Liske published his Effective Preaching in 1951 (rev. 1960). Ferdinand Valentine, OP, put out The Art of Preaching in 1952. Unless They Be Sent by Augustine Rock, OP, in 1953, was a theological study of the nature of preaching, based especially upon St. Thomas and St. Albert the Great. Like The Canon Law on Sermon Preaching by the Paulist James McVann in 1940, and The Canonical Obligation of Preaching in Parish Churches by Joseph L. Allgeier in 1949, it was done as a doctoral dissertation. Sylvester MacNutt, OP, published Gauging Sermon Effectiveness in 1960 as a method and checklist for judging sermon composition.

New Development. In retrospect, the year 1936 can be seen as the beginning of a new period in the development of Catholic homiletic theory. In that year Josef Andreas Jungmann, SJ, (not to be confused with the 19th century Jesuit who also taught in Innsbruck) published Die Frohbotschaft und unsere Glaubensverkündigung, and the fifth pastoral convention at Vienna raised the question of determining more clearly the theological nature of the ministry of preaching. Numerous studies began to appear concerning the content of preaching, and about "the whole Christ" as the core of the Christian message. The pastoral revival, of which the Catholic LITURGICAL MOVEMENT and the KERYGMA concept in catechetics were a part, had spread to homiletics and given to the German homiletic movement the theological dimension so eagerly sought earlier by Von Kepler.

Jungmann's call for a return to kerygmatic preaching as well as his subsequent Missa Solemnia, a history of the Roman Mass, exercised direct and indirect influence at Second Vatican Council, especially on Lumen gentium, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy. The Constitution did not attempt to formulate a homiletic theory but it contributed greatly to the building up of a theological tract "on preaching" that could stand beside the traditional tracts on the Sacraments and on the Church (see Alszegey-Flick). It clarified the nature and aim of the preaching ministry and became the basis for the pastoral guidelines incorporated into Book III, "The Teaching Office of the Church," in the 1983 Code of Canon Law.

PREACHING, III (THEOLOGY OF)

In its broadest usage, the English term "preaching" comprises the multiple ministries of the word—evangelization, the liturgical homily, catechetical instruction, exhortation, mystagogy, et al.,—through which the Christian community announces and expounds the Gospel. The theology of preaching begins with the premise that the proclamation of the good news of salvation—the announcement that "the reign of God is at hand"—constituted the focus of the life and ministry of Jesus and remains central to the life and mission of the Church.

Apostolic Proclamation. As preacher of the reign of God, Jesus stood within the prophetic tradition of announcing the saving power of God active in human history by calling to memory God's fidelity in the past, evoking trust in God's presence here and now, and rousing hope in God's promise to create a new future. Anointed by the power of the Spirit, Jesus proclaimed and embodied the presence and power of God at work in human life and throughout creation. The "signs of the kingdom" evident in Jesus's ministry confirmed the message of the saving rule of God which the prophets promised and which Jesus declared was "at hand"—a "year of favor" when the poor would hear glad tidings, the brokenhearted be healed, captives set free, and prisoners released (Is 61, Lk 4). In his words, especially his characteristic mode of speaking in parables, as well as in his liberating deeds and relationships, Jesus reinterpreted the living tradition of Jewish faith he inherited, announcing the unlimited compassion and forgiveness of God. The Gospels of Matthew and John further portray Jesus as Wisdom (Hokmah/Sophia) the prophetic street preacher from the book of Proverbs who proclaims God's ways at the city gate, reaches out her hand to the needy, clings to truth, decides for justice, orders all things rightly, and invites her children to an abundant feast. Just as Sophia fashioned others into "friends of God and prophets," Jesus gathered a band of disciples whom he sent to continue his preaching mission in the power of the Spirit "even to the ends of the world" (Lk 9:1–6; 10:1–12; Mt 28:12). Mounting resistance to Jesus's announcement of the reign of God culminated in his execution as a political rebel and false prophet. Historical-critical biblical scholars argue that the bold preaching of the disciples in the face of their devastation at the time of the death of Jesus gives testimony to the truth of the claim which formed the core of the apostolic kerygma (proclamation): Jesus who was crucified has been raised from the dead, and all who repent and believe in him will be saved (cf. 1 Cor 15:3–8; Acts 2:22b–24, 3:12b–26, 10:34–43).

The resurrection narratives testify to the necessity of the conversion of the preacher for effective proclamation of the good news of salvation. The New Testament records specifically the post-Easter commissioning of Mary Magdalene (Jn 20:17), the Twelve and their companions (Mt 28: 16–20, Mk 16:14–20, Jn 20: 19–23), and Paul (Gal 1:11–17). The Pentecost narrative in the ACTS OF THE APOSTLES further highlights the role of the Spirit in both the proclamation and the hearing of the word of God in diverse voices and cultures.

In the tradition of Jesus and the Hebrew prophets, the apostolic preachers announced the dabar YHWH—the word of God—as creative, dynamic, and saving event that brings about what it promises. Thus the Acts of the Apostles describes the success of the Church's ministry in a specific area with the summary statement: "The word of God continued to spread" (Acts 6:7). As the Hebrew roots of the word "dabar" indicate, to proclaim God's word is to announce God's activity in history in such a way that renders salvation history present and operative in the present moment. Although distinctions based on purpose and style can be drawn between various modes of preaching such as KERYGMA (direct proclamation of Jesus as Lord and the good news of the reign of God), didache/didaskalia (teaching, catechesis, or doctrinal instruction), and the homily (liturgical preaching), all preaching from the standpoint of theology draws its power and effectiveness from the saving power of God. As a salvific event, the word of God effects what it signifies as promised throughout the scriptures: "So shall my word be that goes forth from my mouth: it shall not return to me void, but shall do my will, achieving the end for which I sent it" (Is 55:11); "Indeed God's word is living and effective, sharper than any two-edged sword. It penetrates and divides soul and spirit, joints and marrow; it judges the reflections and thought of the heart" (Heb 4:12).

Preaching and Teaching. The apostolic proclamation of God's fidelity throughout history focuses on the Word made flesh—the good news of what God had done in the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus. The proclamation of the Gospel identified by Paul as "the power of God for salvation" was a call to conversion (METANOIA)—radical turning towards God and away from sin. Claiming a vocation he identified with a "compulsion to preach," (1 Cor 9:16), Paul stressed that the power of preaching is "the power of God" (Rom 1:16, 1 Cor 1:18), active in spite of human weakness (1 Cor 1:25), its persuasive source found not in wise argumentation, but only in "the convincing power of the Spirit" (1 Cor 2:4). Paul likewise insisted on the centrality of the cross in the Christian proclamation of God's wisdom: "The message of the cross is complete absurdity to those who are headed for ruin, but to us who are experiencing salvation, it is the power of God" (1 Cor 1:18; cf. 1 Cor 2: 1–5).

Endowed with the Spirit's charisms of "wisdom in discourse" (logos sophias) and prophecy (1 Cor 12:8–10), prophets, teachers, and apostles embraced their mission to proclaim the good news of God's salvation in Jesus Christ through diverse ministries of the word in the early Christian communities and house churches. The First Apology of JUSTIN MARTYR in the mid-2nd century gives evidence of liturgical preaching (the homily) as an integral part of the Christian eucharist. The closely related ministries of preaching and teaching shared the common intent of drawing both initial and more experienced hearers of the word into embracing the Christian life of discipleship. Concern for the authenticity of the tradition led to a growing emphasis on the ministry of bishops as the official preachers and teachers of the Gospel and overseers of the ministries of the word, although gifted and educated lay preachers such as ORIGEN, head of the catechetical school at ALEXANDRIA, were invited by bishops to preach even in the liturgical assembly.

By the 4th century, preaching had become predominantly doctrinal, catechetical, and mystagogical formation in faith. Convinced that God's word was revealed pre-eminently in Jesus Christ, preachers searched for the "spiritual sense" of the scriptures (seeking a Christological interpretation, for example, of the Hebrew scriptures) and pointed to the sacraments as continuations of God's saving work. AUGUSTINE articulated an early sacramental theology of preaching by identifying a sacrament as a "visible word" (verbum visibile) and preaching as an audible sacrament (sacramentum audibile). Although he outlined principles of rhetoric for Christian preaching in Book IV of On Christian Doctrine, Augustine viewed preaching as a share in Christian wisdom that goes beyond rhetorical skill. The preacher's interpretation of a biblical text was to highlight how the signs of the Trinity are to be found throughout creation and history. The ultimate hermeneutical key for the interpretation of any scripture passage, as delineated in On Christian Doctrine, is to be found in love of God and love of neighbor. Augustine maintained that when the preacher announces the word of God, it is in fact "Christ who teaches; his pulpit is in heaven . . . and his school is his [mystical] body" (Sermo de disciplina christiana, ML 40, col. 678).

Medieval understandings of preaching were grounded in the sacramental and incarnational conviction that in the divine economy all of creation, and every word of scripture, speaks of Christ (BONAVENTURE). The goal of preaching was to draw out the spiritual senses of scripture so as to "offer instruction in matters of faith and behavior" (ALAN OF LILLE, The Art of Preaching, ch. 1). THOMAS AQUINAS emphasized that the "grace of speech" was needed for one to speak in a way that not only instructs the intellect, but also moves the affections of the hearers so that they might love what is signified and want to fulfill what the word urges (Summa Theologiae II–II, q. 177, a. 1, reply). To emphasize that preaching communicates the word of God and not merely human words, Aquinas used scholastic terminology to identify God as the "principal cause" of preaching and the preacher as "instrumental cause." CONVERSION requires not only the outer word of the preacher, but also the inner word of grace that is the effect of the anointing of the Holy Spirit (Summa Theologiae II–II, q. 1, a. 4, ad 4; q. 6, a. 1; q. 2, a. 9, ad 3).

Ministry of the Word. In the sixteenth century, Protestant Reformers Martin LUTHER and John CALVIN developed rich theologies of the word, but these were not developed in the post-Tridentine Roman Catholic tradition that continued to emphasize the Church's ministry of teaching and instruction. Post-Reformation disputes about the efficacy of preaching (preaching brings about faith, but cannot effect sanctifying grace), and the relationship between sacraments and preaching (preaching is not an eighth sacrament) dominated Catholic theologies of preaching well into the 20th century. In 1936 Joseph JUNGSMANN charged that preaching had become "the vulgarization of theological tracts" rather than the announcement of good news. The kerygmatic renewal in catechetics which Jungmann promoted and the liturgical movement provided resources and impetus for a similar renewal in preaching.

Along with the developments in critical biblical scholarship and the "return to the sources" (resource-ment) in theology, the impact of the liturgical and catechetical movements on the Church's understanding of preaching are evident throughout the documents of Vatican II. One of the central purposes of the Council as expressed by John XXIII in his opening address, was for the Church to make itself "better fitted for proclaiming the Gospel to the people of the twentieth century" (Acta Apostolicae Sedis 54 [1969] 792). Of particular note in the conciliar documents are the claims that "The Church has always venerated the divine scriptures just as she venerates the body of the Lord" (DV 21); that preaching is crucial to the mission of the Church (LG 17; AG 3); that preaching is the Church's chief means of evangelization (AG 6) and that preaching is necessary as a call to faith and conversion (SC 9). At various points the documents identify preaching as central to the ministries of bishop (LG 25; CD 12) and priest (PO 4; LG 28). At the same time the documents speak of all baptized members as sharing in the prophetic office of the Church (LG 12; AA 2,3; GS 43).

In a major liturgical reform, the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy restored the ancient liturgical homily, by means of which "the mysteries of the faith and the guiding principles of the Christian life are expounded," as "part of the liturgy itself" (SC 52, 35) and climax of the Liturgy of the Word. Likewise, the Decree on the Life and Ministry of Priests reestablishes the centrality of the preached word to the sacramental celebration since "faith is born of the word and nourished by it." The homily, according to that document and numerous liturgical sources, is to be drawn from scriptural and liturgical texts of the day, and to "apply the perennial truth of the Gospel to the concrete circumstances of life" (PO 4; see also SC 10, 35, 51–52; General Instruction on the Roman Missal, n. 41; and second edition of the General Instruction on the Lectionary for Mass, n. 24).

Ten years after the close of the Council, Paul VI's apostolic exhortation "On Evangelization in the Modern World" (1975), used the term "evangelization" to refer both to the initial proclamation of the word of God as a call to conversion and to any exercise of the ministry of the word. The exhortation reaffirmed that preaching is an ecclesial act and that proclamation of the good news of the reign of God "constitutes the essential mission of the Church" (EvangNunt, 14). The document also accents the pneumatological dimension of a theology of preaching with the reminder that the Holy Spirit is the principal agent in preaching and that the new humanity generated by the Spirit is the goal of all preaching (ibid., 75). The Spirit is the authentic source of both the proclamation and the hearing of the word that moves the hearers to initial and ongoing conversion. The Spirit forms ministers of the word—both ordained and lay—so that the preacher's words can be supported by the witness of a holy life, the spirit of unity and friendship among believers, a reverence for truth, an authentic love of those to whom the Gospel is proclaimed, and the spiritual fervor that gives preaching its character of urgency (ibid., 76–80). The apostolic exhortation recalls the universality of the preaching mandate of the Church, but also recognizes that preaching requires careful pastoral discernment which takes account of the specific character, needs, and life-situation of the hearers of the word.

Ministry of the Word. Following on the kerygmatic renewal earlier in the century, Catholic theologians discovered rich resources for a theology of preaching in biblical theologies of the word as well as in ecumenical dialogue with Reformation traditions that have emphasized the saving power of the proclaimed word. Theologians such as Otto Semmelroth, Yves CONGAR, Edward Schillebeeckx, Michael Schmaus, Domenico Grasso, and Charles Davis all contributed to a renewed theology of preaching grounded in a sacramental theology of revelation. Semmelroth, for example, stressed that the Liturgy of the Word and the Liturgy of the Eucharist constitute an integral representation of the saving event of Jesus's total life of self-surrender from the time of the incarnation through his saving death on the cross. Word and Sacrament together make present the fullness of the paschal mystery embodied in Jesus Christ who is both God's saving Word of grace as offer (Wort) and the Spirit-empowered answer (Antwort) of self-offering obedient love. The incarnation constitutes "God's own sermon" to humankind; the goal of all preaching is to invite the gathered community into deeper participation in the paschal mystery (The Preaching Word, 1962).

Karl RAHNER's lament that Catholic theology lacked an adequate theology of the word was attenuated by his own groundbreaking insights into the word as sacrament and sacraments as the “highest words” of the Church’s self-expression. Rahner’s development of Augustine’s insight that the proclaimed word is an “audible sacrament” provided an important theological foundation for contemporary Catholic theologies of preaching. While he did not develop an explicit theology of preaching, Rahner identified the proclaimed word as a sacrament in which grace (God’s self-communication) is embodied in the explicitness of word. Thus the role of the preacher is to name the depth dimension of the mystery of human existence as God’s self-offer and thus draw the hearers of the word into a deeper relationship with God. The Church is called to be the abiding sacramental presence in the world of the primal sacramental word of definitive grace—Jesus Christ. Preaching and the sacraments function as the self-expression of the Church, naming, proclaiming, and celebrating the deepest truth at the heart of reality—God’s self-offer in love. According to Rahner, all the words of the Church, preeminently the words of liturgical preaching, are oriented toward the celebration of the sacraments. The eucharist functions as the “highest word of the Church” in which the Church locates its deepest identity in the proclamation of the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ.

William J. HILL also recognized the centrality of the apostolic kerygma, but Hill stressed that effective preaching involves the “kerygmatic reinterpretation” of texts and events from the tradition. That retrieval is possible, however, only from the perspective of the contemporary milieu. According to Hill, the task of the preacher is to render salvation history present and operative in the contemporary world in a way that moves the community to surrender to the unconditional claims of God. New questions and experiences—both those of the preacher and those of the community—elicit previously unrecognized dimensions of the biblical text and produce a genuinely new word. Remarking that effective preaching requires both the conversion of the preacher and serious theological reflection, Hill drew on the resources of Bernard LONERGAN to describe preaching as a moment in the theological process. The preacher’s task is to discern the meaning God intends and the human response required today based on the normative expression of God’s word located in the New Testament as proclaimed in the community of faith. The word of God—or as Hill states, “God’s meaning” becomes incarnate in the words and deeds of the preacher. The word inaugurates the process of conversion in both preacher and community. In the process of mediating God’s meaning to today’s world both the preacher and the community are newly constituted. Through the process of discerning and announcing God’s meaning, the preacher is constituted as a herald of the message of Christ and the community is constituted as “the place where the word takes root.”

Edward Schillebeeckx’s early writings on revelation and theology reflect a sacramental theology of revelation and the word very similar to that of Karl Rahner. In his later writings on revelation in his Christological trilogy (notably Christ: The Experience of Jesus as Lord, 1980), Schillebeeckx moved beyond the distinction between revelation-in-reality and revelation-in-word with the claims that all experience has a narrative structure and that revelation occurs within, but cannot be identified with, human experience. Christianity began with the first disciples’ experience of salvation in and through Jesus and continues as a living story of discipleship. To announce salvation, Schillebeeckx emphasizes, is not only to proclaim a memory of God’s fidelity in the past as recorded in the scriptures and handed on in the living Christian tradition, but also to preach the good news of how God’s Spirit continues to work in the world today and promises a future even in the most desperate of situations. The goal of preaching and of every ministry of the word is to interpret the human story and the story of creation in light of the story of Jesus in such a way that people can find hope to believe that God is at work in the world in spite of all the evidence to the contrary. That kind of proclamation remains credible only if Christian communities give evidence of that hope by “writing a fifth gospel” with their lives.

Recent theologies of liturgical preaching stress the Spirit’s activity in the community of the baptized and the claim of the Second Vatican Council’s Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy that the presence of Christ is located in the gathered assembly and the word proclaimed as well as in the sacramental elements and the minister. That approach characterizes the implicit theology of preaching in Fulfilled in Your Hearing: The Homily in the Sunday Assembly, issued by the National Conference of Catholic Bishops’ Committee on Priestly Life and Ministry in 1982. The document begins with the liturgical assembly and stresses that the purpose of the homily is “to enable the gathered congregation to celebrate the liturgy with faith” (20). Shifting the focus of preaching from the application of biblical texts to life, Fulfilled in Your Hearing suggests that “the goal of the liturgical preacher is not to interpret a text of the bible . . . as much as to draw on the texts of the Bible as they are presented in the lectionary to interpret people’s lives” (20).

As the word of God is proclaimed around the globe in multiple and diverse communities of faith, and the Church responds to John Paul II’s call for a “new EVANGELIZATION” that includes the “evangelization of cultures,” the Gospel’s call to conversion takes on new meaning. The call to preach requires that preachers first listen to the word of God not only in the scriptures and liturgy, but also in the unique cultural contexts and life situations of the communities in which they preach. The word of God has been entrusted to the entire community of faith. Thus one of the roles of pastors and preachers is to encourage members of the community to share their own insights into the word of God as revealed in their daily lives. Likewise, the call to embody the word of God extends beyond sacramental praxis. As the 1971 Synod of Bishops' statement proclaimed, "action on behalf of justice is a constitutive part of the preaching of the Gospel" (Justice in the World, Washington: USCC, 1972, p. 34). The call to repent and believe the good news is a call that needs to be heard and embraced by the Church and its preachers—especially those from dominant groups and cultures—if it is to be proclaimed authentically beyond the boundaries of the Church.

PREACHING, IV (CANON LAW OF)

The 1983 Code of CANON LAW treats the topic of preaching in Book III, "The Teaching Office of the Church." In that Book, preaching is treated as one facet of Title I, "The Ministry of the Divine Word." The other facet of Ministry of the Divine Word is catechetical instruction. However, there are references to preaching in other canons of Book III and in other sections of the Code, all indicating that the activity of preaching has several forms and various levels of relationship to the teaching authority of the Church. The most fundamental level of preaching is entrusted to the whole Church; that is, every member of the Christian faithful, by reason of baptism. A second level of preaching pertains to the ordained; bishop, priest or deacon, by reason of ordination. A third level of preaching is that undertaken by laity at the specific invitation of the ordained.

Preaching Entrusted to All the Baptized. The Code, reflecting the teaching of Vatican II, acknowledges the responsibility of all the baptized to preach the Gospel through the witness of their lives. This obligation, explicit throughout Chapter II of Lumen gentium, is implied in canon 204 which states that all who are baptized share "in their own way" in the priestly, prophetic and royal functions of Christ, and are called to exercise the mission of the Church "in accord with the condition proper to each." Canon 204 has its roots in Lumen gentium. This implication of the baptismal obligation to preach is repeated in canons 208, on the equality of all the baptized in dignity and action as they carry out the mission of the Church, and 211 on the right and obligation of all the Christian faithful to evangelize.

The obligation of all the baptized to preach the Gospel message is stated explicitly in canon 747, the opening canon of Book III, and again in canon 759. This most fundamental form of preaching is proper to all Christians and requires no permission or authorization from the hierarchy.

Preaching Entrusted to the Ordained. For the ordained—bishops, priests and deacons—preaching can take on a number of forms and purposes. For instance, the preaching done by bishops can be directly related to their role as teachers of the faith, while the preaching done by priests or deacons is not seen as an action of magisterial teachers. For all the ordained, preaching can take on a catechetical or liturgical character, depending on the context within which it is done.

Some norms on preaching are applicable to all the ordained. First, all the ordained are reminded in canon 762 that their principal duty is to proclaim the Gospel. Thus, preaching must be held in great esteem. This emphasis is placed on preaching because of the value of the Word of God for the community of believers as the cause of their gathering and their source of ongoing strength. As the canon states, "the people of God are first brought together by the word of the living God." The canon concludes with the statement, taken from the Presbyterorum ordinis 4, that the people rightly have the expectation to hear this word of God from the ordained.

Canon 768 provides guidance for the content of preaching, first in general and then more particularly. In general, preaching is intended to proclaim to the Faithful what must be done and believed "for the glory of God and the salvation of humanity." More specifically, preaching is to present magisterial doctrine on the "the dignity and freedom of the human person, the unity and stability of family and its duties, the obligations which people have from being joined together in society, and the ordering of temporal affairs according to the plan es-established by God.” This canon is derived from Christus Dominus 12, on the preaching responsibilities of bishops, and from Gaudium et spes 40–42, which describes the vital relationship between the Church and the world and between faith and life. Together these sources provide a rich theological foundation for understanding preaching as the ministry which aims to make the Word of God active in the hearer.

The canon that follows (canon 769), builds on this goal of preaching to relate faith and life, by stipulating that Christian doctrine, that which is preached, is to be accommodated to its hearers and adapted to the needs of the times. This same theme is emphasized again in canon 770 which directs bishops and pastors to arrange for other forms of preaching in their respective dioceses or parishes, namely spiritual exercises or missions which meet the needs of their people. Then canon 771 widens the circle of concern by obliging all “pastors of souls,” that is, bishops and priests, to have concern that the word of God reaches both those who do not present themselves for ordinary pastoral care and those in the territory who are not believers in Christ.

Also applicable to all the ordained is canon 767 on the HOMILY. The homily, described by the canon as pre-eminent among all forms of preaching and an integral part of the liturgy, “is reserved to the priest or deacon.” The homily, according to the canon, is rooted in Scripture and is an explanation of “the mysteries of faith and the norms of Christian life.” Homilies are required at all Sunday celebrations and holy days of obligation when a congregation is present, unless a “grave cause” indicates otherwise (canon 767 § 2). Homilies are recommended at all other masses when people are present, especially during Advent and Lent (canon 767 § 3). Responsibility for seeing that these directives are observed falls to the pastor or rector of a church (canon 767 § 4).

Norms Specific to Bishops. The 1983 Code contains norms on preaching which apply only to bishops. They, in virtue of their role in the Church, have a right (ius) to preach everywhere in the world, “including churches and oratories of religious houses of pontifical rite.” In his own diocese an individual bishop may prevent another bishop from preaching, but this must be done explicitly and for a particular instance (canon 763).

Further, bishops are directed to preach frequently in person and propose in their preaching the truths of the faith and how those truths of the faith and how those truths are to inform Christian living. Lastly, bishops are obliged to oversee the proper implementation of the law concerning all aspects of the Ministry of the Word, especially homilies (canon 386 § 1).

Norms Specific to Priests. While bishops have a right to preach everywhere in the world, priests are given, in the law, the faculty to preach everywhere in the world. This faculty to preach may be restricted by the appropriate authority with respect to the person or with respect to certain territory (see canon 764). The exception to this world-wide faculty is that permission from the appropriate religious superior is required for a priest to preach to members of a religious institute in the institute’s own church or oratory (canon 765).

Priests who are pastors of parishes are specially charged with the obligation of preaching to their people on the sacrament of marriage so that “the matrimonial state is preserved in a Christian spirit and advances in perfection” (canon 1063, 1°).

Norms Specific to Deacons. Deacons, similarly to priests, are given, by the law itself, the faculty to preach everywhere in the world. Deacons are subject to the same restrictions and permissions stipulated for priests in canons 764 and 765.

Preaching Entrusted to Laity. The 1917 Code was quite specific in stating that laity, even religious, were not permitted to preach in churches (1917 Code, canon 1342). The documents of Vatican II, specifically the Constitution on the Sacred Liturgy, n. 35, directed that in areas of the world where priests were not available, bishops should appoint deacons or lay persons to conduct “Bible services.” This directive was implemented by the instruction Inter oecumenici (issued September 26, 1964) which indicated that such Bible services could be presided over by deacons or laity, but only a presiding deacon, with proper permission, could preach. Both these documents are the indicated sources for canon 766 of the 1983 Code which states that lay persons are permitted to preach in churches or oratories “if necessity requires it, in certain circumstances or it seems advantageous in particular cases.” The canon also stipulates that in every country, lay preaching is regulated by norms issued by the conference of bishops, “without prejudice to canon 767 § 1.” That is, the homily is reserved to the priest or deacon.

Much of the discussion and development concerning lay preaching has revolved, not around canon 766 itself, which states the acceptability of lay preaching, but around canon 767 which excludes laity from preaching homilies. An early difficulty arose from a lack of consistency in the wording of canon 767 itself. The first paragraph of the canon refers to the homily at “liturgy,” while subsequent paragraphs refer to the homily at “Mass.” For any interpretation of the canon, the latter wording indicates the exclusion of laity from preaching at Eucharistic celebrations, while the former wording calls for wider application to all liturgical celebrations. A number of official documents issued subsequent to the 1983 Code indicate that the canon applies only to preaching at Mass. For instance, the Directory for Sunday Celebrations in the Absence of a Priest (issued May 21, 1988) and the interdicastery instruction "Some Questions Regarding Collaboration of the Nonordained Faithful in Priests' Sacred Ministry" (issued August 14, 1997) refer to laity preaching in at non-Eucharistic services. However, even these documents have not been entirely consistent, since the latter refers to laity giving "homilies" at non-Eucharistic liturgies, which seems to contradict the wording and intent of canon 767 to restrict homilies to the ordained.

A second area of difficulty over the relationship of canons 766 and 767 came in the early years of the implementation of the 1983 Code. Because the restriction of the homily to the priest or deacon stated in canon 767 was considered to be a disciplinary norm, diocesan bishops felt free to dispense from the norm, according to the common understanding of their dispensing power, thereby allowing laity to preach. An authentic interpretation of the law was issued on May 26, 1987 [see AAS 79 (1987) 1249] which stated that such dispensations were not permitted to bishops.

This authentic interpretation and continued effort to implement canon 766 has given rise to further discussion on the nature of the homily and the meaning of its restriction to the ordained. It leaves open the question whether the homily is to be defined by its content (an explanation of the Scripture which has been proclaimed), or by its placement in the celebration. For instance, were an ordained person to preach during a Eucharistic celebration on a topic other than the Scripture which has been proclaimed, would that be a homily? If the ordained person preaches before the Gospel rather than after, or at some other point in the celebration and explains the Scriptures which have been proclaimed, is that a homily? Likewise, if a lay person preaches after the Gospel, but does not speak on the Scripture which has been proclaimed, or speaks at some other time in the celebration but does comment on the Scripture readings, is that an acceptable implementation of canon 766?

There are many differences of opinion on these questions, and consequently many differing opinions on how and when canon 766 can be implemented. Clearly, lay persons are excluded from giving homilies, but there is not universal agreement on what constitutes the homily. Consequently, the forms of preaching available to laity according to canon 766 such as reflections, commentary, personal witness or testimony, are clouded by the ambiguity.

Acknowledging that there is the restriction concerning the homily, canon 766 states the broad principle that preaching by laity, when advantageous to the community in question, is appropriate. There is no mention that lay preaching is conditioned upon a lack of priests. However, laity who undertake this formalized preaching are invited to it by an appropriate ecclesiastical authority. The canon does not designate where decisions about necessity or advantage to the community are made, or by whom. Neither is the level of authority who invites the lay person to preach identified in the canon. However, such determinations may be stated in any norms established by a particular episcopal conference for its own territory. Examples of norms established by various conferences indicate that some conferences have restricted lay preaching by its placement in the liturgy. Others do not mention placement, but require special preparation for lay preachers and/or permission from the local ordinary before preaching is undertaken. (Examples in the Canon Law Digest, volume 11.) In the absence of any national norms or diocesan norms, decisions about lay preaching are made at the local level and in conformity with universal law.

PREACHING, MEDIEVAL ENGLISH

Medieval English sermon literature (c. 1000–1500) was founded on the beginnings of English Christianity; the importance attached to the preaching function produced a pulpit literature important to the development of the English language and established literary traditions recognizable centuries after the close of the Middle Ages.

Early Collections. Among the earliest surviving collections of sermons in English is the Blickling Homilies, 19 sermons recorded c. 970 and named by scholars after an early home of the MS. In these sermons, the homilist is concerned more with exhorting his audience than with expounding doctrine. The sermons of AELFRIC GRAMMATICUS (d. 1020), a monk of Cerne Abbas and later abbot of Eynsham is perhaps the most important of the Anglo-Saxon sermon writers. He prepared a large body of sermons for delivery to the laity. Two homiletic collections have survived: Sermones Catholicae and Lives of the Saints. The first consists of two series of 40 sermons each, intended for use throughout the liturgical year. The second, describe saints “whom monks honor.” Many of his sermons had a catechetical purpose. Their contents, following an English paraphrase of the gospel pericope, were adapted from the writings of the Latin church fathers. If Aelfric’s sermons were intended for instruction in doctrinal matters, those of his contemporary, WULFSTAN, are calculated to stir their hearers to repentance.

From the earliest times, the sermon following the Gospel of the Mass could be replaced by the reading in the vernacular of a homily of one of the Fathers. Although little evidence survives from the 11th and 12th centuries, it is likely that the sermons of this time, however infrequent, were in English. See, for instance, Goulburn and Symonds, Life, Letters, and Sermons of Bishop Herbert de Losinga [of Norwich] (Oxford 1878), the Homilies of the Vercelli Book (c. 1100), and the sermons of MS Bodley 343 (c. 1175). Examples could be multiplied, although one should note that the existence in MSS of vernacular sermons does not demonstrate that they were preached in English. They may have been reproduced to edify or to serve as models for clergy not proficient in Latin. ROBERT GROSSETESTE, however, shortly after he became bishop of Lincoln in 1235, issued constitutions requiring the clergy of his diocese to teach their parishioners, in English, the Decalogue, the seven deadly sins, the seven Sacraments, and the Creed. His example apparently inspired others: in 1281 JOHN PECKHAM, Archbishop of Canterbury, for instance, issued the Constitutions of Lambeth, commanding every pastor, personally or by deputy, to explain to the people four times a year in their own tongue the 14 articles of faith, the ten Commandments, the two precepts of the Gospels, the seven works of mercy, the seven deadly sins, the seven cardinal virtues, and the seven Sacraments.

Whereas “the edicts of the Lateran Council in 1215 imply that the office of preaching was generally at that time either badly performed or totally neglected” (see A. Lecoy de la Marche, 30–31, in bibliography; the author is describing conditions in France, but the state of preaching in England was similar). However, the advent of the friars to England transformed that situation. “It seems clear that church-going increased in the later Middle Ages, and it is reasonable to attribute the growth of this situation. Sermons were no longer delivered infrequently, or even as seldom as four times a year.” The importance medieval England attached to preaching is attested by the great number of manuals and books of models that survive. More than 80 MSS of 30-odd artes praedicandi (arts of preaching) have been discovered in English libraries, 12 of them from the 13th century. A number of the identifiable authors were Dominicans and Franciscans, and it is clear that the friars were responsible in large measure for the flowering of the preaching art that was such a force in England for 300 years after their coming.

The friars were not the only ones who preached in the vernacular. There is ample evidence of preaching in English by clergy of all kinds from the 13th century onward, and for those who needed them, there were abundant models, manuals, and collections of sermons and exempla. The sermon books were often in Latin, but there was no lack of them in English. Indeed, it is often difficult to determine whether a collection or cycle of sermons was intended for pulpit delivery or to serve as models. Instances are the Northern Homily Cycle, written in short couplets, presumably of single authorship; or the sermons of British Museum MS Royal 18 B. xxiii, which include a famous sermon preached by Thomas Wimbledon at Paul’s Cross in 1388–89; and three sermons from John Myrc’s Festial; besides 51 others. Some were apparently for pulpit use and others seemingly served as models.

Later Manuals. Among the interesting manuals besides the Festial are Instructions for Parish Priests, also by Myrc, largely a translation from the Latin of William de Pagula’s Oculus Sacerdotis; Jacob’s Well (early 15th century), developing in 95 sermons an elaborate allegory in which man is likened to a well that must be cleaned and protected from pollution entering through the five senses; the Lollard translation of the Speculum Christiani, prepared, doubtless, for the many unlearned Lollard preachers (see LOLLARDS). Two centuries earlier, c. 1200, Orm, or Ormin, a canon regular of the Order of St. Augustine, wrote the Ormulum. He states that he planned to present in English the Gospels in the Mass book for the year, with interpretations and applications, so that simple men might understand Church doctrines. He never completed his project, but his achievement is monumental; it is valuable today for linguistic study more than as sermon literature, but surely it was used as a sermon manual.

There are many other collections. Some are translations from Latin or French, and the authors of many of the individual sermons are identifiable. The Lambeth Homilies (MS Lambeth 487, c. 1200) include material from Aelfric, and the five Kentish sermons of MS Laud 471 (late 13th century) survive along with their French originals by Maurice de Sully. There is a large body of Wyclifite sermons; however, it is difficult to separate the writings of Wyclif from those of his followers. Most of the two volumes of sermons are probably his, but they are brief, and perhaps were meant as sermon notes for poor priests. G. R. Owst’s great studies, Preaching in Medieval England and Literature and Pulpit in Medieval England, identify a large number of medieval preachers by name and affiliation.

Structure and Matter of the Sermons. The manuals are specific on the structure of the sermon, although not all sermons followed the directions set forth. First came the text or thema, taken from the Lesson, the Epistle, or the Gospel of the day, except on feast days, when any Bible text could be used. Next followed the prothema or antethema, an apology, which could be made elaborate; and a prayer (sometimes a prayer alone); sometimes the prothema was replaced by a “prelocution” that cited authority for proof of the thema, followed by a statement of the divisions of the sermon, and a prayer. Next came a restatement of the text, or thema, and the “process,” a statement of the divisions in which the text was to be treated. In the 13th century, at least, there were two types of division: infra, when the sermon was addressed to clerks; extra, when addressed to the people. Each division of the “process” was a “principal,” and each subdivision of the “principal” was a “part,” or socius. The amplification of the “parts” could be highly complicated. Traditionally, the rhetorical modes were the historical or literal, the allegorical or personified, the tropological or moralized, and the anagogical or mystical. The development often included citations of authority, parallels from natural history, and analogies from the Bible or saints’ lives. Caplan lists 20 forms of amplification (“Classical Rhetoric . . .,” 88; see also his “The Four Senses of Christian Interpretation . . .,” 282–290, and Bowers, Publications of the Modern Language Association 65 (1950) 590–600).

The mode and tone of the sermon varied with the audience, the occasion, and the talent of the preacher. Although the subject might be the same, the discourse would be different if the preacher addressed a popular audience at the crossroads than when his audience was a congregation of clerks, or when he preached before the king.

Sermons could be very short or very long. The prose “Lithir lok” in Trinity College, Cambridge MS 43 (a Dominican MS, printed by Carleton Brown, Bulletin of the Modern Humanities Research Association, 2.5, September 1926) is about 400 words; the verse sermon on the Lord’s Prayer from Cambridge University Library MS Dd XI. 89 [printed by Frank A. Patterson in Journal of English and Germanic Philology 15 (1916) 406–419] is 592 short lines in couplets; whereas the “Per Proprium Sanguinem” of Austin Friar John Gregory (printed by Pfander, The Popular Sermon of the Medieval Friar in England, 54–64) runs to more than 5,000 words.

Sermons are frequently in pedestrian verse, intended apparently to be mnemonic rather than artistic; often a popular sermon would begin with a few lines from a popular song (St. Francis himself once used a secular couplet as a sermon text). Friar Nicholas Phillip (15th century) interlards his prose sermons with rhymes and short poems; and Carleton Brown believed that the Franciscan Herebert’s (d. 1333) translations of Latin hymns “were designed primarily for pulpit use” [English Religious Lyrics of the Fourteenth Century (Oxford 1924) xiv].

The subject matter of the sermons was also varied: interpretation of the Scriptures, the Creed, the Pater Noster, and the Decalogue was of first importance; exposition of the vices and virtues; reproofs for wrongdoing and commendation of uprightness; setting forth the rewards of right conduct and the punishment of evil—these made up the substance of the sermons.

When the Dominicans and Franciscans reached England in 1221 and 1224, they immediately addressed themselves to the neglected common man, and he responded with an enthusiasm of which there is abundant record. This concern for the common man led the preachers to learn his idiom, his hopes and fears and frustrations. They developed a new kind of vernacular sermon that was instrumental in bringing about the upsurge in church attendance from the 13th century onward.

Influence on Secular Literature. It is impossible to assess this influence adequately. To begin with, the popular preacher must have been a force during the later 11th and the 12th century, as he demonstrably was during the 13th, in the preservation of English as a worthy medium of expression; and he clearly was a major instrument during the 13th century in the fusion of the diverse elements that became the language of Wyclif and Chaucer. He dealt with the commonplace realistically and in picturesque, forceful language, and it cannot be doubted that the realism and vigor of the literature of the 14th and later centuries owes much to his style.

The association of the Church and early drama is a commonplace of literary history; and from pulpit treatment of life and death came the plots of morality plays and a tradition that is still recognizable in the speech on the Seven Ages of Man of Jacques in As You Like It. (See DRAMA, MEDIEVAL) The allegoric characters of Evil found in Langland are familiar in the homily books; the abstractions of Good and Evil in Pilgrim’s Progress have their prototypes in the personified vices and virtues of medieval sermons and religious poems; the symbolic castles that dot the landscapes of 14th- and 15th-century literature—Langland’s Tower of Truth, “Maudelyn” Castle in the Digby play, the Castle of Perseverance, and many more—were first homiletic symbol and metaphor. Chaucer’s and all other attacks on corruption both within and without the Church have their counterparts in the Summa Predicantium of the great Dominican John BROMYARD.

Indeed, the whole body of the literature of satire and complaint reflects directly what Owst (Literature and Pulpit, 213) calls “. . . at once the profoundest and most abiding influence of the English pulpit.” To cite but one of many available examples, the great collection of homiletic tales, the GESTA ROMANORUM, is a storehouse drawn on by Chaucer, Gower, Lydgate, and Hoccleve; it supplied Elizabethan dramatists with the plots of some of their best-known plays. Wherever one turns in examining the growth of secular literature in England, from the most sedate to the most ribald, one finds it firmly rooted in popular pulpit oratory and in homiletic writings.

PREAMBLES OF FAITH

Classically, those conclusions taken from the natural and philosophic sciences that are of use in demonstrating the validity of the Catholic faith or of the apologetic that is designed to defend it. In the pyramidal structure of the 19th-century scientific-historical apologetic, the praeambula fidei were presumed to have been previously demonstrated from first principles in the study of the several sciences that are related to apologetics, so that only relevant conclusions needed to be considered in the defense of faith. Thus, the objective validity of the human power to know, the existence and absolute nature of objective truth, the existence and spirituality of the soul, the freedom of the will, the existence of a personal God and His principal attributes, the ethical necessity for man to worship God, etc., were all included among the preambles of faith without which, it was felt, a scientific apologetic could not be constructed. These propositions were presumed to have been conclusions validly drawn in the sciences of epistemology, theodicy, psychology, and ethics. Any philosophic or scientific theory that impugned one or more of these fundamental propositions was to be rejected, while any theory that supported them was to be favored.

In more recent apologetic thought there is a departure, to some degree, from the closely reasoned and what many consider to be the almost rationalistic method of the 19th-century defense of the reasonableness of faith. The pioneer work of J. H. NEWMAN (A Grammar of Assent) raised the question regarding the reasonableness of the faith of the multitude of Catholic believers who are unable to grasp the reasoning involved in the apologetic employed to demonstrate its reasonableness. His conclusion was that it is by the convergence of evidence and the congeniality of orthodox beliefs among themselves that one comes to a reasonable basis for belief, rather than by the syllogistic method employed in scientific apologetics. Within the structure of his thought, the metaphysical question raised is how could there be such a convergence of evidence if the point toward which all the evidences gravitated were not the truth. This approach widens considerably the traditional definition of praeambula fidei to include not only the propositions previously noted, but a number of evidences that are personalistic in character and may be recognized only vaguely by the ordinary Christian. Newman’s approach left room for the investigations of depth psychology and a consideration of the influential but not fully conscious convictions of the individual that form the context of his entire reasoning capacity.

In the 1960s the a priori conditions of faith were sought in the historical dimension of human existence experienced as transcendental openness to the absolute mystery of being and thus predisposing man to accept the revelation of God-man as the concrete historical and social realization as well as the historical, objective expression of his existential openness (see Bouillard, RAHNER, Darlap). As a consequence Rahner takes for a starting point of the way to faith man as the potential believer who, thanks to the abiding presence of the eschatological Christ-event in the world, is already in possession of what he is to believe, e.g., God’s self-communication in Jesus Christ. Preambles of faith are therefore an implicit faith as an abiding feature of man’s existence oriented to explicit faith as to its objective and conscious self-expression in the society of believers.

Since man discovers more and more the unlimited varieties of his own historical tradition, and thus a common philosophical ground for all believers and unbelievers is found extremely difficult, in the 1970s the preambles of faith were sought rather in the empirical fact of the already existing believing community. This conception of the preamble of faith does not assume any philosophical notion of human existence or religion in general by determining a priori which philosophy or religion should be the most adequate for man. It takes the community of believers as God-given, Christ-sign-event as puzzling datum strong enough to raise in man questions concerning God's personal presence in Jesus Christ.

Preambles of faith will be defined according to the concept of the apologetics they are designed to support. In an apologetic designed to arrive at the necessity of belief (credendity), they appear in strictly demonstrable, propositional form, whereas in the more recent Biblical and personalistic approaches to apologetics that strive to show no more than the reasonableness (credibility) and desirability of belief, they assume a less rigid and wider aspect that is more a way of life than the foundation for a syllogistic analysis.

PRECA, GEORGE, BL.

Dun Ġorġ (in English, Father George) Preca; founder of a religious order, b. Feb. 12, 1880 in Valletta, the capital of Malta; d. July 26, 1962, in Santa Verera. The seventh of nine children born Vincenzo Preca, a businessman, and Natalina Ceravolo, a teacher, he was baptized Ġorġ on February 17. After completing his studies at the Lyceum, Dun Ġorġ studied philosophy and theology at the University of Malta. He attend the Seminary of the Archdiocese of Malta in Floriana, and was ordained to the priesthood Dec. 22, 1906.

Even before his priestly ordination Dun Ġorġ was inspired to devote his life to the catechetical ministry. He gathered a group of young men and instructed them in the teachings of the Church. His goal was that these educated and formed men devote their lives to the ministry of catechesis. In 1910 he founded a female branch. All members dedicate themselves to catechize the young for an hour every day and thereafter meet among themselves for personal continuing formation. They embrace a simple evangelical lifestyle and lead prayerful lives by saying short prayers at regular intervals during the day. He called the group Societas Papidum et Papidissarum ("Society of the Sons and Daughters of the Pope"). The locals nicknamed his association the Museum because of the run-down building where the members held their meetings. The members in turn adopted the epithet and created out of it an acronym in Latin: Magister Utinam Sequatur Evangelium Universus Mundus ("Divine Teacher, may the whole world would follow the Gospel").

The innovative idea of the laity catechizing raised suspicions among the Church authorities. In 1909 the bishop ordered Dun Ġorġ to close down all the centers he had so far opened, but the parish priests rallied behind Dun Ġorġ and the ban was soon lifted. A few years later destructive articles about the Society appeared in the local press. As a response Dun Ġorġ required that the members take a vow of meekness. After further investigations by the Church, the bishop canonically established Dun Ġorġ's group as the Society of Christian Doctrine on Apr. 12, 1932, and in time the Society established branches in Australia, England, Albania, Sudan, Kenya, and Peru. Dun Ġorġ wanted his members to study, pray and proclaim God's word in their own native tongues. He translated parts of the Bible into Maltese and wrote a good number of books on systematic and moral theology as well as on spirituality, mainly for the continuing formation of the members of his society. He had a great devotion to the mystery of the incarnation and instructed his members to wear a badge with the words Verbum Dei caro factum est ("The Word of God became flesh"). Dun Ġorġ was a zealous apostle of the word of God, a faithful minister of catechesis. He was a priest of great humility, goodness, meekness and generosity. Dun Ġorġ died July 26, 1962 and was buried in the Church of Our Lady of the Miraculous Medal adjacent to the Society's motherhouse at Blata l-Bajda. He was one of three Maltese beatified by Pope John Paul II on his visit to Malta May 9, 2001.

PRECEPT

A precept is a command by a legitimate authority that binds in conscience. Since this is also true of law, canonical usage has restricted the scope and meaning of the word precept. All laws are precepts but, conversely, not all precepts are laws. A further precision, then, is necessary. A precept is commonly understood as a command, by a qualified superior, given to an individual person, either temporarily or permanently, or to a community temporarily. The source of the authority imposing the precept may be either jurisdictional or nonjurisdictional power. The former is public power to govern a perfect society; the latter is either domestic power, by which qualified heads of private societies (e.g., conjugal or parental) exercise their respective authority over certain persons, or dominative power, by which properly constituted superiors of imperfect societies govern their subjects, e.g., parishes, some religious institutes.

With regard to the scope of the precept itself, to create a true obligation in those on whom it is imposed, it must be objectively just, possible, and morally good and useful; and finally, it must be made known to those whom it proposes to bind. On the part of the superior, it requires the requisite juridical relationship, by way of either jurisdiction, domestic power, or dominative power, by which the superior may impose the precept; and this relationship must be actual in order for the precept to be obligating, at least at the time of the issuance of the precept. A distinctive characteristic of precepts given to individual persons in virtue of nonjurisdictional power is that its prescriptions are personal and binding everywhere, and not only in a specific locality (unless this had been otherwise indicated by the superior or by the nature of the precept itself).

Precepts are usually temporary expedients and normally cease with the cessation of authority of the individual imposing the precept, through either death, resignation, transfer, or loss of official status. The precept is imposed by the superior and not by the law itself, and means of enforcement are limited to disciplinary measures such as paternal exhortation and the extrajudicial imposition of penances. A precept given to a community likewise is obligatory for the members of the group as individuals, in accordance with the above. On the other hand, precepts imposed on individuals in virtue of jurisdictional power are both personal and temporary, but lose their binding force with the cessation of the preceptor's juridical power, unless the precept had been imposed with the formality of a legal document or before two qualified witnesses. If this latter measure was taken, the precept could be enforced judicially, i.e., by an ecclesiastical trial. If the precept is given to a community, it seems that the common good requires its duration, even after the cessation of the official authority of its author. However, when for any reason the precept ceases to bind because of the superior's loss of office, the effects of it that have already been executed retain their force and remain unchanged, although the precept itself and its future effects lose their capacity to bind. Thus, a religious transferred to another in virtue of a precept must remain there although his superior who issued the precept has since lost his office.

The precept is akin to law in many ways: its imposition gives rise to moral obligation as is the case with law; its object must be morally good, possible, and reasonable; the excusing causes that obtain with regard to law, i.e., impotence, ignorance, revocation, etc., are the same. There are, however, some notable qualifications that distinguish precept from law: the law has as its object the common good, while the precept may be issued for the good of the individual himself or any other person, including the superior. Law requires legislative power, while dominative or domestic power (e.g., paternal or domestic) suffices for a precept. A precept can be imposed on a community that would not be capable of receiving a law. A law by its nature implies a relative stability and perpetuity, whereas a precept is usually ineffective after the authority of the superior ceases. Generally, laws are territorial, while the precept, unless otherwise stipulated, is personal.

PRECEPTS, CANONICAL

A canonical precept is an injunction given to a person or group of persons imposing an obligation to do something or to refrain from doing something [Codex iuris canonici cc. 35, 49; Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientalium, c. 1510]. A precept has binding force upon those to whom it is given, which distinguishes it from a counsel.

Precepts differ from law in many ways. Precepts are commands or orders given to individual persons, whereas law primarily affects territory and affects persons indirectly. Law is established to preserve and promote the common good; precepts are issued for the individual good. Laws bind within territorial limits; precepts bind the individual everywhere. Law by nature is relatively perpetual; precepts are relatively temporary in nature.

Penal precepts are primarily preventive measures to avert serious transgressions of the law [Codex iuris canonici c. 1321 §1; *Codex canonum ecclesiarum orientaliu*m, c. 1414 §1]. There is a supposition of previous violation of the law that will be the occasion of further transgressions, or that may easily result in grave scandal. One who would issue a penal precept must employ a certain reserve. This is in keeping with the law's preference that penalties be employed as a last resort.

The canonical usage concerning penal precepts is that the offender is first admonished privately. If this fails to produce the desired effect, a public admonition follows, along with private or public correction. When these are likewise without deterrent effect, the precept is issued. This precept indicates what the party in question is to do or to avoid, along with a statement of the penalties that may be incurred if the precept is not obeyed.

PRECIOUS BLOOD, I (IN THE BIBLE)

The term Precious Blood is traditionally used of the blood of Christ in keeping with the words of 1 Pt

1.18–19: "You were redeemed . . . with the precious blood of Christ," i.e., the blood that was the price of our Redemption.

The New Testament writers are anxious that Christians should see the excellence of Jesus' sacrifice. It surpasses the bloody sacrifices of the Old Law because blood is no longer merely a sign or symbol of the flow of life between God and man. The blood of Jesus is divine blood and bears the life of God in itself. It is the cause of the divine life that it brings to those in whose favor it works.

While the New Testament writers stress the preeminence of the sacrifice of Jesus, at the same time they develop a theology of the Precious Blood according to the sacrificial theology of the Old Testament. The Apostles' teaching enters three areas: the salvific death and RESURRECTION OF CHRIST, the Eucharistic liturgy, and the heavenly liturgy.

John recalls how blood and water flowed from the heart of the Savior (Jn 19.34; 1 Jn 5.6–8), assuring us that the Spirit of God, whom the water symbolizes, flows to us through the sacrifice of Jesus' blood. Peter, in a passage of great power, proclaims our Redemption through the Precious Blood (1 Pt 1.18–19). Paul assigns our Redemption (Eph 1.7) and justification (Rom 5.9) to the saving blood. Through it we are brought near to God (Eph 2.13). It has given us peace (Col 1.20) and "has been put forward" (i.e., displayed publicly) as a propitiation for our sins (Rom 3.25). The "great price" with which we have been bought (1 Cor 6.20; 7.22) is the blood of Christ (Acts 20.28). All the rich theology here is easily understood by referring to the theology of blood in the Old Testament.

The bloody sacrifice of Jesus is reenacted sacramentally in the Eucharist. When Jesus instituted the Eucharist and declared, "This is my blood of the new covenant" (Mk 14.24), He was resuming the words of Moses (Ex 24.8) by which the Sinai covenant had been inaugurated. Jesus' blood is the blood of the covenant because it effectively sets up a bond of friendship with those upon whom it is sprinkled. The Church repeats the Eucharistic action according to Christ's command, and the bread and wine become the body and blood of Jesus. The sacrificial blood of each Mass renews the covenant of Calvary. It effects a real union with God because the body and blood of Jesus are given to the redeemed as their food and drink. This banquet is the pledge of eternal glory for body and soul (Jn 6.54–58). In the resurrection of the body the total life-bearing efficacy of the Precious Blood is realized. Paul reminds us that the blood of the Eucharist joins us to one another as well as to Christ. The "sharing of the blood of Christ" (1 Cor 10.16; 1 Jn 1.7) makes Christians one.

In heaven the blood of Jesus remains the eternal bond joining the redeemed to the throne of the Father. Through it the saints have been victorious (Rv 7.14; see also 1.6), and they continuously proclaim the glory of the blood of the Lamb (Rv 5.9–13). The picture that Hebrews presents of Jesus entering the heavenly sanctuary with His own blood (Heb 9.11–14; 10.19–22) shows how acceptable the sacrifice of Jesus was. By His eternal priesthood He offers the sacrifice of His blood in glory (Heb 7.24–25). The tableau of the festive assembly of those in heaven and on earth gathered around the “sprinkling of blood” brings together the earthly and the heavenly liturgy in a tribute to the blood of Jesus (Heb 12.22–24).

PRECIOUS BLOOD, II (THEOLOGY OF)

The theology of the Precious Blood deals with the mystery of Redemption through the Blood of Christ in all its phases: the real shedding on Calvary as summation of the whole earthly redemptive work of Jesus, the mystic shedding in the central action of the sacramental Church and focal point of the life of GRACE, and the final consummation in the celestial liturgy and the eternal priesthood. It is the special function of this theology to explain the mystery in relation to the devotion to the Precious Blood. In both the basic concern is the whole work of Redemption: totum opus redemptionis.

This work is divine redemptive action on the part of the triune God offering mercy to man, wrought through Christ, the priest-mediator between fallen mankind and God. It is accomplished through the INCARNATION of the LOGOS, the Second Person in the Holy TRINITY, all His acts (called objective Redemption) bringing grace (and glory) to man (called subjective Redemption).

Who and Why. The mystery of Redemption by Blood properly involves the mystery of the why (motive) and the who (Person) of the Incarnation. Was the Incarnation eternally decreed because of the Redemption through the Blood? All agree that in this present sinful order it was. But some theologians (Thomist) maintain that had there been no sin, there would have been no Incarnation at all; others (Scotist), that there would have been an Incarnation without pain or Blood. Still other writers reject this ancient dispute as purely hypothetic and in no way dealing with the present world. The dispute, they say, assumes an order of priority in the divine decree. They hold that God, by one simple decree (with no interior order of priority), determined to create this universe in which sin would be permitted (not caused) by God and the sinful creature redeemed. A world redeemed, they contend, gives greater glory to God than a sinless world not in need of Redemption. In this view the Blood of Redemption is central in the universe, the source of grace to ADAM in his innocence and to the angels (F. Malmberg).

As to the who in the Incarnation, faith teaches that only the Second Person became man, though St. Thomas holds that either God the Father or Holy Spirit could have become incarnate, giving striking arguments ex decentia for the Incarnation of the Logos. But, it is being asked, is there not a more profound cogency to his argument? Perhaps the very order of origins in the Trinity makes it impossible that the Father eternally unborn be born in time; perhaps only the Son born from eternity in the Godhead could be born in time. This bold linking of the oikonomia (God’s work outside the Trinity) with the theologia (the Trinity itself) would relate the work of Redemption to the very heart of the inner life of God.

Whether one accepts or rejects these insights (they are not presented as certain at all), there is a special significance (which no one denies) in the Second Person’s being the image of the Father and His becoming man, having the created IMAGE OF GOD, patterned on the Logos in whom all things were made.

Indeed this very relation of the two images . . . is the more basic reason why in the Incarnation the one image could be and should be hypostatically united with the other. For the Incarnation is . . . the penetration of the inner image of God into the external image, manifesting and communicating in and through it the entire inner glory externally. . . . And conversely, this external image of God is drawn to the internal. Thus the external image of God, which is man, is perfected and crowned through the inner image of God. [M. Scheeben, Dogmatik 3.147 (No. 356)]

Incarnation. Through Mary mankind responded and accepted its mediator. Now He who spoke to man as the Word of the Father turns to God with Mary and a united mankind, offering homage of obedience and love to an offended majesty in the one sign and symbol that is the supreme act of submission, the loving acceptance of death in the shedding of Blood. It was MERIT, satisfaction, Redemption, efficacy, and sacrifice: it was death because the giving of one's life for friends is the most exalted act of love. It was death because Christ chose to share human existence and experience, a kind of life that is marked by death. In human existence all one's life acts receive their final impress and definitive integration in death (A. Grillmeier).

Calvary and the Church. Calvary was death, but it was bloody death, the death unto life. The climax of Good Friday, the culmination of Christ's merit, satisfaction, sacrifice was the glorious RESURRECTION OF CHRIST. Through the Resurrection-Ascension Christ has become the life-giving Spirit bestowing the Christ-life, the God-life of grace on man. Now man redeemed, purchased by Blood, is God's possession, no longer slave given to death: death has erased death and given immortality.

This divine life is given to men under the veil of SIGN, as all Christ's actions in the flesh are sacramental, grace-producing. He is the Sacrament of God, visible sign of SALVATION. And the Church that flowed from His riven side in the symbol of blood and water is His sacrament, for it is the sign of all His grace. In union with it men are one with Him, men's prayers mingling with those of the Church and His. In the Eucharistic prayer there is communion and communication with God through Him. All partake, the priest through official sacral order and indelible sign of priesthood, the laity through the sacerdotal signs of Baptism and Confirmation that link every member of the Church with Christ, the Priest. Though all the Sacraments are in the order of worship, these three are Sacraments of perpetual priesthood, deriving their meaning from the High Priest who forms the Church in its supreme duty of offering worship to the Father through Him and thereby sanctifying men. The bond is sealed in the Blood of covenant-love, between the Church, between High Priest and ministers, between ordained priest and members of the Society of Worship: the bond is the bond of Calvary's Blood.

Heaven. Awaiting the Second Coming of its Lord, the Church celebrates the memorials of His Passion and death under the sacramental veils. When He removes the veil, the Church will celebrate with Him the celestial liturgy. It seems preferable to follow the theologians (e.g., J. Alfaro) who place the resurrected Christ, resplendent in His Wounds, in the very center of the blessed congregation who adore the Lamb that was slain. This glorified humanity (as subjective disposing cause, not as a medium) prepares the blessed for the vision of God. Thus the redemptive action continues forever in eternal fruition, the work of the everlasting priesthood. The term itself, consecrated in theology, would have little meaning were the priesthood to end on the day of final judgment, and the wounds in glory to be merely a memory.

In explaining the devotion to the Precious Blood, theology goes far beyond the adoration of the blessed Humanity infinitely adorable in all its parts. It must embrace the totum opus redemptionis. The shedding of Blood is sign and symbol of that total work. Progress in this study parallels the progress in CHRISTOLOGY, MARIOLOGY, ECCLESIOLOGY, and the LITURGICAL MOVEMENT inaugurated by St. Pius X, attaining its climax in the liturgical constitution of Vatican II. As never before, because of the progress of theology, one today understands better Christ in His history (Scripture-tradition), in His MYSTICAL BODY, in His glory—and all this in the light of the Redemption through His Blood. The decisions of the Church through John XXIII, Pope of the Precious Blood (Inde a primis, a new Litany of the Most Precious Blood, the addition of "Blessed be His Most Precious Blood" to the Divine Praises) were official recognition of the importance of the devotion and its proper theology.

PRECIOUS BLOOD, III (DEVOTION TO)

Devotion to the Blood of Christ is the Christian's response of love and gratitude to Jesus who offered His Blood for man in atoning sacrifice. Christ Himself spoke of it as the Blood of the new covenant shed for many unto the forgiveness of sins (Mt 26.28). With it He purchased the Church (Acts 20.28). It is precious (1 Pt 1.19). By it we are justified (Rom. 5.9), cleansed (Heb 9.14; 1 Jn 1.7), washed from sin (Rv 7.14, 22.14), and redeemed for God (Rv 5.9). Jesus called it "my blood" (Mk 14.24) and invited His followers to drink it that they might have everlasting life (Mt 26.28; Jn 6.54–57).

The Fathers re-echo these statements of Scripture in both the East (see Pollack) and the West (see Rohling) and not infrequently add some devotional sentiment in their commentaries and sermons, especially when speaking of the REDEMPTION or the Eucharist. Of the Fathers, St. John Chrysostom is the most eloquent. The liturgical devotion has its deepest roots in the celebration of Christ's triumph at Easter and in the offering of the Eucharistic Sacrifice together with the reception of the Holy Eucharist under the species of both bread and wine.

The devotion became more explicit as the minds of the faithful gradually emphasized the sufferings of Christ preceding the triumph of His Resurrection. Relics of the Precious Blood (not hypostatically united) were venerated at Mantua as early as 553, at Weingarten since 1090, and at Bruges since 1158. The many (supposed) relics that the crusaders returning from the Holy Land brought back to Europe tended to focus the attention of the faithful on the humanity of Christ, particularly on His sufferings and bloodsheddings.

While artists produced graphic representations of the effectiveness of the Precious Blood, medieval theologians and mystics, such as St. Albert the Great, St. Bonaventure, St. Mechtilde, St. Gertrude, and St. Catherine of Siena, found in the Blood the inspiration for the most profound mystical love. There is evidence of confraternities honoring it in Spain in the 17th century. Benedict XIV approved a Mass and Office in its honor in 1747.

The greatest epoch in the history of the special devotion began early in the 19th century, which witnessed the remarkable missionary activity of St. Gaspar del BUFALO in the Papal States and the founding of the Society of the PRECIOUS BLOOD (CPPS, 1815), the establishment of the Archconfraternity of the Precious Blood in Rome (1815), and the founding of several sisterhoods. The feast (previously celebrated only in the Society and in certain localities in Lent), at the suggestion of Don Merlini, third moderator of the Society of the Precious Blood, was extended (1849) by Pius IX to the whole Church, to be celebrated on the first Sunday of July. In 1917 the date of the feast was changed to July 1. The 1969 reforms of the liturgical calendar combined the Feast of the Precious Blood with the Feast of the Body of Christ (Corpus Christi), under the title "Solemnity of the Body and Blood of Christ" (CORPUS ET SANGUINIS CHRISTI).

The devotion also received official papal approval from John XXIII in 1960. He not only approved the Litany of the Precious Blood for private and public recitation throughout the world and ordered the ejaculation "Blessed be His Most Precious Blood" inserted in the Divine Praises, but even wrote an apostolic letter, Inde a primis, to the bishops of the world (June 30, 1960), urging them to foster the devotion to the Precious Blood.

PRECIOUS BLOOD, MISSIONARIES OF THE

A male Society of Apostolic Life, the Missionaries of the Precious Blood (C.P.P.S.) were founded by St. Gaspar del BUFALO (b. Jan. 6, 1786, Rome, Italy) in 1815 in the Papal States. The purpose of the institute was the renewal of the clergy and laity through the preaching of popular missions and retreats. Gaspar had been inspired to a devotion to the Precious Blood by Canon Francesco Albertini, who had established an Archconfraternity of the Precious Blood in the church of St. Nicola in Carcere in Rome in 1808.

Early Years in Italy. As a result of his refusal to swear allegiance to Napoleon I when he gained control of the Papal States, Gaspar was imprisoned and exiled. It was at that time he originated the idea of establishing a society to perpetuate devotion to the Precious Blood. He found the society of missionary priests at Giano in Umbria on Aug. 15, 1815. According to his conception, the society was to include priests and brothers, and was to be dedicated to the task of giving parish missions and to fostering devotion to the Precious Blood. The members were not obligated by religious vows but by a bond of charity. They were to adhere to a common life and to be an example to the diocesan clergy. Their garb was the ordinary Roman cassock and cincture, with the distinguishing feature of a large crucifix and gold chain.

Pius VII had encouraged the establishment of the institute, and assigned the missionaries the task of converting the brigands in the southern parts of the Papal States. In this work the missionaries were quite successful. Despite various objections to the institute, Gaspar was able to establish it by the time of his death in 1837, when it numbered around 200 members. The rule for the missionaries was approved in 1841.

The turmoil involved in the unification of Italy hampered development of the institute in the 1860s and 1870s. That members were bound to the institute only by the bond of charity made it also unstable, as members could enter and leave as they wished. The limited nature of its work missions, novenas, and retreats also tended to restrict its usefulness to the larger Church. It often lacked the leadership needed for the times. Nevertheless, several of its members were selected as bishops of Italian dioceses, and notable among the moderators general were Biagio Valentini (1837–47), Ven. Giovanni MERLINI (1847–73), and Enrico Rizzoli (1873–90). Several communities of nuns were founded, and subsequently spread throughout Europe and America.

Development in North America. The acceptance of a Swiss priest, Francis BRUNNER, into the institute marked the beginning of a new era. As the first non-Italian member, he was sent to establish a foundation in Switzerland at Castle Loewenberg in Canton Graubünden. The turmoil in Central Europe at the time prevented establishing permanent foundations until one was begun at Trois Epis in Alsace. In 1843, Brunner set out with a small group of priests and seminarians for the diocese of Cincinnati, which at that time encompassed the entire state of Ohio, to answer an appeal of Bp. John Purcell for help in ministering to German immigrants. Brunner established himself in northern Ohio at Peru, near Norwalk. From there, some ten houses were established, principally in Seneca, Putnam, and Mercer Counties. Ties were relinquished with German-speaking Europe, except for a house in Schellenberg, Liechtenstein, which served as a place of entry for candidates for the American missions.

In the last four decades of the nineteenth century, the missionaries spread beyond the confines of Ohio, moving as far west as Missouri. An ill-fated plan to open a vicariate in northern California failed in the 1870s. In the 1880s a mission school for Native Americans was taken over from the diocese of Fort Wayne in Indiana; St. Joseph's College was founded there in Rensselaer, Indiana, in 1889.

The twentieth century saw the missionaries expanding as far west as California, and into Florida and Texas in the south. In 1946 a revised rule was approved by the Congregation for Religious for the entire institute. The burgeoning numbers in the American Province led to the division of the U.S. into three provinces, Cincinnati, Kansas City, and Pacific, in 1965. Meantime, the Italian Province had sent priests to minister among Italian immigrants in the U.S. and Canada. This foundation became the Atlantic Province in 1987, with headquarters in Canada. Among the notable members of the CPPS in America have been Bp. Joseph DWENGER, one of the major architects of the Catholic parochial school system, and pioneering biblical exegete Edward Siegman.

Worldwide Developments. Other foundations grew out of the institute in Italy as well. A foundation in Cáceres in Spain in 1898 led to the formation of the Iberian Province, embracing Spain and Portugal, in 1987. A province embracing the German-speaking countries began in 1922. Work in Latin America began in Brazil in 1929, followed by Chile in 1947, Peru in 1962, and Guatemala in 1982. A foundation began in Poland in 1982. Work in Africa began in Tanzania in 1966, and in Asia in India in 1988. Since then, the Missionaries of the Precious Blood are found in 18 countries around the world.

Charism, Mission, and Spirituality. Gaspar founded a missionary society dedicated to the renewal of the Church through preaching and retreats. This defined the work in Italy, and has always been part of the work in other parts of the institute. The revised 1969 Constitution defined the work of the institute as renewal of the Church through the ministry of the Word. As the institute has spread throughout the world, it has seen its work of renewal as meeting the needs of local churches in their moment of need: be that ministry to immigrant groups, setting up schools, building up the diocesan church where structures were not yet in place, to meeting the needs of special groups. Helping the Church in need, especially through the ministry of the Word, has become its hallmark. At its inception, devotion to the PRECIOUS BLOOD was the central spiritual focus of the institute. In the ensuing decades after Vatican II, its spirituality has expanded to encompass themes of covenant, cross, chalice, community-building, working with the suffering, the centrality of the Eucharist, and the ministry of personal and social reconciliation.

PRECIOUS BLOOD SISTERS

Under this title are included several congregations of religious women who owe their origin, directly or indirectly, to the influence of St. Gaspare del BUFALO.

Adorers of the Blood of Christ. (ASC, Official Catholic Directory, #0100); founded, 1834 in Acuto, Diocese of Anagni, Italy, by Bl. Maria De MATTIAS, according to the plan of St. Gaspare del Bufalo and under the direction of Giovanni MERLINI. Dedicated principally to the education of the poor, the sisters opened 65 schools in central Italy before the death of the foundress in Rome (1866).

On Oct. 17, 1860, a group of Precious Blood Sisters, who had been established originally at Steinerberg, Switzerland, in 1845, and who later moved, because of government hostility, to Gurtweil, Baden, Germany, formally joined the Italian foundation. Ten years after this amalgamation the Gurtweil sisters opened a school in the U.S. at Piopolis in southern Illinois, when the KULTURKAMPF threatened them in Baden. While the majority of the sisters who went to America between 1870 and 1873 became an independent congregation (Sisters of the Most Precious Blood of O'Fallon, MO), the few sisters remaining at Piopolis under the direction of Mother Clementine Zerr, the novice mistress, continued under the Italian affiliation. When Mother Clementine was approved as superior of the U.S. foundation by the superior general, she transferred headquarters to Ruma, IL, in 1876. Subsequently, the sisters extended their work through Illinois, Missouri, and the Great Plains states, with a second central house and novitiate in Wichita, KS. The small band of German sisters who remained in Europe found a permanent home in 1879 in Banja Luka, Bosnia, whence new foundations were later made in Germany, Austria, Switzerland, and Poland. Sixteen sisters, brought from Banja Luka to the U.S. in 1906 by Mother Pauline Schneeberger, formed the nucleus of a third U.S. province with its central house in Columbia, PA.

In 1855 Pius IX granted initial approbation to the congregation; final papal approval of the constitutions was given in 1897. The spiritual ideal of the congregation is centered in the mystery of Redemption through the Blood of Christ, which the sisters worship in particular through daily eucharistic adoration. Their active apostolate consists primarily of work in schools and hospitals. The generalate is in Rome. There are three U.S. provinces: Ruma (1876), Wichita (1929) and Columbia (1925).

[A. MYERSCOUGH/EDS.]

Sisters of the Most Precious Blood. (CPPS, Official Catholic Directory #3270); a congregation with papal approbation whose motherhouse is in O'Fallon, MO. The community was founded originally in 1845 at Steinerberg, Switzerland, by Rev. Karl Rolfus and Magdalena Weber (Mother Teresa) to honor the Precious Blood in convents of perpetual adoration. In 1848 the Swiss government forced the young community into exile, and a new settlement was made at Ottmarsheim in the Alsace region of France. Some eight years later, at the invitation of Rev. Herman Kessler, 18 sisters went to Gurtweil, in Baden, Germany, to establish a school and open a home for delinquent girls. The combined responsibilities of perpetual adoration and the active apostolate of teaching posed serious problems. The conflict was resolved in 1860 when the sisters of Gurtweil separated from those of Ottmarsheim and became affiliated with the Sisters Adorers of the Most Precious Blood, a congregation dedicated to the active apostolate.

Difficulties with the government in Baden, which sought to establish nondenominational schools, led the sisters to answer a call for teachers from Rev. Blasius Winterhalter of St. John's, IL (later Belle Prairie, now Piopolis), in the Diocese of Alton (now Belleville). On Feb. 2, 1870, nine sisters set sail for America; others followed in the next few years. The majority of these sisters soon separated themselves from the European congregation and became known as the Sisters of the Most Precious Blood of O'Fallon, MO. This was accomplished in 1874 with the assistance of Abp. Peter Kenrick of St. Louis, MO, and his vicar-general, Henry Muehlsiepen. Mother Augusta Volk was the first superior general of the new community to which the Holy See granted final approval in 1938.

The congregation is engaged in academic education, catechetics, pastoral ministries, social outreach, care of elderly, parish ministries, and foreign missions.

[M. P. THAMAN/EDS.]

Sisters of the Precious Blood. (CPPS, Official Catholic Directory, #3260); a congregation with papal approbation whose motherhouse is in Dayton, OH. The community originated in 1834 at Castle Loewenberg in the Diocese of Chur, Switzerland. Mother Maria Anna Brunner, the foundress, was then an elderly widow and the mother of six children. In the previous year, during a pilgrimage to Rome for the Holy Year of 1833, she came in contact with the Society of the Precious Blood, whose founder was (St.) Gaspare del Bufalo. Inspired by his example, she determined to devote her remaining years to the adoration of the Precious Blood and to the spreading of this devotion. After returning to Castle Loewenberg, she soon attracted a sufficient number of associates to keep up nocturnal adoration before the Blessed Sacrament. By the time of her death in 1836 the nucleus of the future congregation was formed and its main features indicated. Her eldest son, Father Francis de Sales BRUNNER, guided the early years of the community and eventually transferred it to the U.S.

In 1844 three of the sisters went to Peru in northern Ohio. About six months later a permanent foundation was made at New Riegel, OH, where there now stands a convent adapted for the use of a cloistered group that was later formed within the congregation. The motherhouse in the U.S. was transferred from New Riegel to Maria Stein, OH, in 1846, and then to Dayton in 1923. The U.S. community was granted final approval by the Holy See in 1946.

In accord with the primary purpose of the foundress, daily eucharistic adoration is maintained in the community's principal houses. In fulfillment of Mother Brunner's secondary aim, the sisters from the beginning engaged in academic education and catechetics. Gradually their apostolate broadened to include care for the sick and the aged, healthcare, retreats and spiritual direction, social outreach to immigrants and homeless, and pastoral ministries.

PRECIOUS STONES

From prehistoric times precious stones have been employed universally as personal ornaments and amulets and as elements of adornment in religious and profane art and architecture in general. Men of past ages prized many precious stones because they believed that they possessed magical properties and gave special protection and strength to their owners. An accurate classification of precious stones before the rise of modern chemistry at the end of the 18th century is impossible. Many of the stones mentioned as precious in ancient and medieval writers were not precious in the strict sense but merely resembled genuine diamonds, rubies, emeralds, etc.

Employment in Judaism and Early Christianity.

There is frequent mention of precious stones in the Bible, the jeweled breastplate of the high priest, for example, being described in detail [see PRECIOUS STONES (IN THE BIBLE)]. In the Greco-Roman civilization, in which Christianity appeared and developed, the demand for precious stones was intense, and the amount of jewelry displayed or worn by possessors approached the fantastic. Pagan moralists attacked such ostentation in adornment as morally wrong, but their censures were not effective. The early Christian writers and Fathers of the Church did not condemn the use of precious stones as such, but warned repeatedly against the evil of luxury so often associated with them and, above all, against belief in their magical properties. Thus, Clement of Alexandria denounced luxury in dress and adornments, mentioning the excessive fondness for gold ornaments and precious stones. He admitted, however, that women married to wayward husbands might need adornment to make themselves more attractive to such men, and he recognized the necessity of signet rings or seals for protecting property. But pagan devices on seals, especially those of a licentious and magical character, were strictly forbidden. The Christian should use a dove, a fish, a ship, an anchor, or a fisherman (see Clement, Paedagogus 2.12:118–129 and, esp. 3.11:57–60). All these symbols have important Christian meanings, and the references to them in literary texts are confirmed by the large number of seals and engraved precious stones brought to light by archeology (see “Gemmes,” Dictionnaire d’archéologie chrétienne et de liturgie, ed. F. Carroll, H. Leclercq, and H. I. Marrou, 15 v. (Paris 1907–53), esp. 816–). Luxury in jewelry was a persistent evil, however, and all the Christian writers of

East and West found it necessary to attack it again and again in the strongest terms.

Alleged Magical Properties of Gems. Diamonds were said to give protection against poison and evil powers; agate and sapphire, against despair and envy; emeralds and amethysts, against spells, hail, and locusts; serpentine, against snake bites. The sardonyx was a good luck stone. The beryl gave knowledge of the future and promoted marital harmony. The ruby furnished strength and was a charm against poison and evil spirits. Blood jasper stopped bleeding, and limonite aided pregnancy. Numerous other stones were regarded as efficacious in similar ways (see Pliny, Hist. Nat. bk. 37, and Apuleius, Apol. 31). For many centuries, precious stones in powdered form have been used as medicines. Symbols or formulas inscribed on gems gave them an important role in astrology and other kinds of magic. The employment of month-stones or birthstones, however, is largely modern. As is evident from medieval lapidaries, above all from the classic De lapidibus of Marbod of Rennes (1035–1123), with its description of 60 stones, belief in the marvelous powers of precious stones was widespread in the Middle Ages. It is still far from dead in the East—or even in the West.

PRECIOUS STONES (IN THE BIBLE)

Humankind has always and everywhere been fond of using precious stones as personal ornaments. Whether a small stone was considered precious or not depended partly on its relative rarity and partly on custom or taste in any given culture. In the ancient Near East precious or semiprecious stones were commonly worn as necklaces. Gems were also cut and engraved in the form of seals (Sir 38.27) and scarabs. Since such valuable possessions were often buried with their owners, precious stones are frequently found in ancient tombs.

In Palestinian archeology it is generally only in the tombs of wealthy people that jewelry, consisting of precious metal and gems, is found. Hardly any precious stones are native to Palestine, so those that are found in Palestinian archeological sites must have been imported, mostly from south Arabia (Gn 2.12; 1 Kgs 10.2, 10–11; Ez 27.22), with the Edomites often acting as middlemen in the traffic (Ez 27.16). Actually, precious stones are mentioned rather rarely in the Bible. The longest list of gems is that given in connection with the description of the “breastpiece of decision” worn by the Israelite high priest (Ex 28.17–19; 39.10–12). This breastpiece consisted of a square of richly woven cloth on which were mounted 12 precious stones, in four rows of three stones each. On each stone the name of one of the 12 tribes of Israel was engraved. The meaning of most of the Hebrew words for these gems is obscure.

Nine of these gems are mentioned in the gloss that is added to the phrase addressed to the “Paradise man” in Ez 28.13: “Every precious stone was your covering.” This gloss is apparently connected with Ex 28.17–19, since these nine gems are the same, although in somewhat different order, as the stones in the first, second, and fourth rows of the high priest’s breastpiece.

The Hebrew names of other gems mentioned in the Old Testament, together with terms used for them in the Confraternity Old Testament are: p^enînim, coral (Prv 3.15; 8.11; Lam 4.7; etc.); râ'môt, coral (Jb 28.18); kadkōd, ruby (Is 54.12; Ez 27.16); 'eqdāh, carbuncle (Is 54.12); šāmîr, diamond (Jer 17.1; Ez 3.9; Zec 7.12). In the New Testament pearls (μαργαρίται) are mentioned in Mt. 7.6; 13.45–46; 1 Tm 2.9; Rv 17.4; 18.16; 21.21.

In Rv 21.19–20 there is a list of 12 precious stones “adorning the foundations of the walls of the city” of the heavenly Jerusalem. The exact meaning of most of the Greeks names of these gems is uncertain.

PREDEFINITION

An absolute divine decree that a man shall perform a good act, infallibly effective before man’s consent is given. Because such decrees are implied in scriptural teaching that every good act is the work of God, the gift of God, that His providence infallibly rules human action, Catholic theologians unanimously affirm these decrees for all good acts, but differ in explaining them. Some hold formal predefinition: God first absolutely decrees that a man shall perform good acts and consequently decrees efficacious graces to obtain them. So say they who reject God's middle knowledge (SCIENTIA MEDIA), affirming that the efficacy of grace comes from its intrinsic nature; and also say some who affirm middle knowledge, deriving the efficacy of grace partly from it—some of these affirm God would seek endlessly by middle knowledge to obtain effective grace, so determined is He to have these good acts.

Strict Molinists hold virtual predefinition: God simply intends to give man this grace to which, by middle knowledge, He sees man would consent, thereby intending the resulting good act; but He would give the same grace if He foresaw man's dissent, because He had no prior absolute intent to have a good act, but only if obtainable with this grace. This difference of Catholic opinion is due to differences about the condition under which God intends to save all men, and the source of grace's efficacy.

PREDESTINATION (IN CATHOLIC THEOLOGY)

Predestination is the plan eternally conceived by God whereby He conducts rational creatures to their supernatural end, that is, to eternal life. Of necessity this plan is very complex. It must be concerned, first of all, with the SUPERNATURAL ORDER: its end, which is eternal life; its means, the complexus that we term supernatural GRACE (sanctifying and actual, efficacious and sufficient grace, the infused VIRTUES, and the gifts of the HOLY SPIRIT). Predestination also closely involves the divine foreknowledge of future free acts, the exercise of the FREE WILL of man, and divine predilection.

This article will consist basically of three parts: (1) an exposition of the nature of predestination and the concepts with which it is necessarily concerned; (2) a presentation of Catholic teaching concerning this great mystery (here emphasis will be on the historical development); and (3) a survey of the chief theological systems formulated by the great theologians of the Church in their attempts to delineate and clarify this revealed truth.

Predestination and related concepts. In its most general sense, predestination is a decree of God, an inner decision of the divine wisdom and will, whereby God resolves and determines what He Himself will bring to pass. According to St. Paul, it is the counsel of the divine will whereby God works all things (Eph 1.11), or, according to St. AUGUSTINE, it is that whereby He disposes within Himself what He intends to accomplish (Persev. 17.41; Patrologia Latina 45:1018). In this general sense, divine predestination has a bearing on all the works of God. Everything that He does and effects is predestined by Him through an eternal decree before it is carried out in time.

More precisely, however, predestination signifies the ordination of God by which certain men are led efficaciously to the attainment of SALVATION. On the part of God, this divine ordination involves two actions. There is, first, an act of the divine intellect, by which God infallibly foreknows which men are to be saved and the precise means whereby they will attain this salvation. Second, it includes an act of the WILL OF GOD by means of which He decrees to save these men in the very fashion that He Himself has planned.

For this reason, St. Augustine has defined predestination as “the foreknowledge and preparation of those gifts of God whereby they who are liberated are most certainly liberated” (Persev. 14.35; Patrologia Latina 45:1014). According to Augustine, the object of predestination is salvation, the freeing from servitude of SIN, and all the benefits through which salvation is attained, i.e., efficacious graces, including the gift of final PERSEVERANCE. The infallible connection between these benefits, that is, the means and the freeing from servitude, has its ultimate foundation in God Himself. The subject of predestination is all men who are in fact saved. Predestination, therefore, formally exists in God. It is an act of God in His divine ETERNITY. In the definition above, the “fore” in foreknowledge and the “pre” in preparation express the independence of the activity of God in this process rather than the ETERNITY OF GOD.

Although the definition of Augustine is classic, that of St. THOMAS AQUINAS is, perhaps, more exact. According to the Angelic Doctor, “predestination is a plan existing in the divine mind for the ordering of some persons to eternal salvation” (Summa theologiae 1a, 23.2). The object of predestination for St. Thomas, then, is the supernatural end to be attained by a rational creature and the infallible ordination of means to that end.

It is evident that the subject of predestination can only be an intellectual creature. It is also clear that predestination exists formally in God alone, that is, in the divine mind.

Viewed, therefore, in its totality predestination includes on the part of God the following: (1) the prevision of the end; (2) a determined grade or degree of glory; and (3) the ordination of the means. These three factors are concerned with acts of the divine intellect. In addition, there are the following, which are concerned with the divine will: (1) the first calling of the elect to JUSTIFICATION; (2) the decree to confer efficacious graces; and (3) the decree to confer the gift of final perseverance.

Although the act of the divine will is most simple, it nevertheless does not attain its created objectives in the same way. Hence, predestination has been considered by the theologians in concepts of varying comprehensiveness:

(1) Predestination viewed in its totality. This is predestination insofar as it is concerned with the complete series of graces by which man is saved. Predestination in this sense considers the entire process from beginning to end, from the first calling of a soul to the way of salvation to the conferral of final glory.

(2) Predestination partially viewed. This is predestination considered in only one aspect of the entire series of effects. It is derived from the division of the entire process of predestination into its logical, component parts. Thus, one may consider predestination to FAITH alone, predestination to justification alone, or even predestination to glory alone.

According to the teaching of the Church and of Sacred Scripture itself, predestination viewed in its totality is, in the fullest sense of the word, gratuitous; it is not merited, on the part of man; it is independent of all that is purely human or outside of God. The proper gratuitousness of predestination consists in this, that there is absolutely no reason or foundation on the part of any man why it should pertain to him to have the total series of effects that constitute predestination viewed in its totality, that is, from its initial step of first calling to the ultimate conferral of glory.

Despite the fact that the will of God cannot be moved by any created will, the question has, nevertheless, arisen whether the existence of this entire series of created effects, that constitutes total predestination, may not have some basis or foundation in the individual man who is saved?

The only answer that can be given to this question is that the ultimate and definitive reason for the salvation of any man is not to be found in man himself but rather in the mercy of God. However, this basic fact, fundamental though it may be, need not exclude, as the proximate reason for salvation, the meritorious acts of man himself.

Also, basic to any discussion of the theology of predestination is the distinction between the gratuitousness of the supernatural order, the destining of all mankind to a supernatural end, and the gratuitousness of predestination. One is not the other. The universal fact of the gratuitousness of man's supernatural destiny consists in the truth that God, by His mere liberality, gives to every member of the human race the possibility of salvation. It is, therefore, a gratuitousness in the order of merely sufficient graces. The gratuitousness of predestination adds this to the above, namely, that the ultimate reason for the actuation of this possibility of salvation is to be found in God Himself. It is a gratuitousness in the order of efficacious graces. This is what is called the principle of divine predilection. It is a special predilection of God toward those who are eventually saved. God is so disposed to these men not because of any good in them that attracts His love; He acts in this way simply because He so wills. In itself divine predilection is at the very core of the mystery of predestination.

Catholic teaching. The presentation of the nature of predestination according to Catholic teaching will become more clear and meaningful as it is viewed in its historical setting.

The mystery of predestination stands in the middle of two extremes, each of which either completely abandons one or the other of its two organically connected elements, or, at any rate, puts such excessive emphasis on one that the other is neglected. Either the independence and self-activity of man is overly stressed to the exclusion of God's initiation and guidance of man's preliminary steps and continued progress (Pelagianism and Semi-Pelagianism), or the divine initiative and guidance is represented as inexorably driving and hurrying man along in such a way that his own free movement and advance are obscured or completely denied (predestinationism).

Prior to the time of St. Augustine the Fathers of the Church were not preoccupied with the problem of predestination. It was the bishop of Hippo who first treated the mystery exhaustively, with the theological decisiveness so characteristic of him.

From 418 until 531, there took place in the Western Church many grave controversies concerned with explaining the ultimate foundation for the salvation of those who are saved (the elect) as well as ascertaining the reason for the condemnation of those who are in fact not saved (the reprobate). This theological ferment centered around the Pelagian and Semi-Pelagian controversies.

Pelagianism. This heresy (see PELAGIUS AND PELAGIANISM) denied the necessity of supernatural grace and consequently did not admit of predestination in the true sense of the word. It maintained that man, by the mere use of his free will and by his other natural powers, is able to believe and act in a salutary manner without the assistance of supernatural grace and thus obtain eternal beatitude. According to this doctrine, some species of predestination could be admitted. It would be nothing more, however, than the foreknowledge of God through which He foresees which men will attain salvation through their own efforts. Consequently God, through His divine prevision, chooses as the blessed those whom He has foreseen would be saved solely through their own powers.

Semi-Pelagianism. On the other hand, Semi-Pelagianism attempted to mitigate the extreme position of Pelagianism. It affirmed that without the assistance of divine grace fallen man is unable, by his natural powers, either to be justified or to posit acts that would be meritorious of eternal life. But above all else, the universal salvific will of God must be maintained. It was felt that this salvific will would really be denied, unless it was unequivocally affirmed that the ultimate foundation for the salvation of the saved and the condemnation of the reprobate is to be found in the good use or abuse of human freedom. If God truly and sincerely desires all men to be saved, He must, on His part, will the salvation of all with a complete equality and indifference. He must show no favoritism or special preference regarding the salvation of one man over that of another. If this were not the case, then the salvation of one man and the DAMNATION of another would be directly due to God's action alone. This would destroy any semblance of a universal salvific will and would be unjust.

Semi-Pelagianism claimed, therefore, that Augustine's basic principle, of the gratuitous predilection and preelection of God being the ultimate reason for the salvation of the elect, is irreconcilable with the dogma of the universal salvific will. The ultimate foundation for salvation must be found in man, not in God. Man, though he is fallen, is able through his own natural powers to desire and ask for salvation. He is able to believe and thus posit the first step in the process of salvation, which is faith. God then comes and confers the rest, i.e., justification, meritorious acts, and glory. Despite the disparity between man's meager natural efforts and the conferral of the supernatural gifts by God, it is, nevertheless, this unaided free use of his will directed toward God that is the ultimate reason why one man rather than another attains justification and salvation. In addition, Semi-Pelagianism rejected the doctrine that final perseverance is a gratuitous gift of God, the conferral of which depends solely on the divine largesse. This position would be untenable in view of God's necessary impartiality toward all men. God is not a respecter of persons.

Doctrine of St. Augustine. Against all of this St. Augustine and his followers denied emphatically that any man is predestined for salvation because God foresaw that he would attain this state through his own efforts. The contrary is true. Men lead holy lives and perform meritorious acts because they have been preelected by God. They were so chosen precisely that they might be justified by the grace of God, posit meritorious acts, persevere, and consequently be saved. That is, God did not choose these men from eternal salvation because they were already holy, but rather, for reasons known only to Himself, He chose them while yet unworthy in order that He Himself might make them holy and thus worthy of eternal glory (Praed. sanct. 17.34; Patrologia Latina 44:985).

According to Augustine, the decrees of the divine will are infallible regarding predestination not because God foreknows that man will give his consent; they are infallible because He is omnipotent and accomplishes what He wills (Corrept. 14.43; Patrologia Latina 44:942).

After the death of St. Augustine (430), a variety of pamphlets and treatises were written; some distorted the teaching of Augustine; others were frankly critical of it as being too extreme. Among the critics (Semi-Pelagians) were John CASSIAN, St. VINCENT OF LERINS, FAUSTUS OF RIEZ, and GENNADIUS OF MARSEILLES. Those who defended Augustine were PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, FULGENTIUS OF RUSPE, and St. CAESARIUS OF ARLES.

True to the teaching of the master, Prosper wrote: "We must most sincerely believe and profess that God wills all men to be saved. For this indeed, is the mind of the Apostle (1 Tm 2.4), who most urgently commands what is a most devout custom in all Churches, that supplicant prayers be offered to God for all men. That many of these perish is the fault of those who perish; that many are saved is the gift of Him who saves" (Liber Responsum 2, Patrologia Latina 51:179; cf. Fulgentius, Epist. 17, Patrologia Latina 65:451–493; St. Caesarius, Dictionnaire de théologie catholique 2.2:2178).

The Semi-Pelagian controversy can be considered to have been terminated through the intervention of Pope BONIFACE II (530–532), when he approved as Catholic doctrine the teaching of the Second Council of ORANGE (529) concerning "the beginning of faith" (initium fidei): "by the sin of the first man, the free will of man was so inclined and attenuated that subsequently no one was able either to love God as he should, or to believe in God, or to accomplish what is good because of God, unless the grace of divine mercy first comes to him . . . in every good work, it is not we who first initiate it and only afterwards are assisted by the mercy of God, but it is He Himself, who, without any prior merit or good on our part, inspires us to faith and to love of Himself” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 396–397; see FAITH, BEGINNING OF).

Papal approval (Denzinger 398–399) equivalent to a dogmatic definition was given to the doctrine of Orange II; the Church afterward thus accepted the doctrine approved by Boniface II and already contained in the Indiculus Caelestini (Denzinger 238–249).

Although neither Orange II nor Boniface II expressly taught the gratuitousness of predestination itself, nevertheless, they did teach, as being of faith, the gratuitousness of an efficacious calling to faith; they taught that the ultimate source of man’s faith, justification, and subsequent salvation is the gratuitous gift of God. It may be stated, therefore, that the gratuitousness of predestination viewed in its totality is contained at least virtually and perhaps formally implicitly in the above pronouncements of the magisterium.

Other Errors. Pelagianism and SEMI-PELAGIANISM, which deprived God of His rightful role in the total process of predestination, were followed by a variety of doctrines that went to the opposite extreme. These predestinationist teachings attacked the universality of God’s salvific will. On the occasion of these errors, the doctrine of the Church was reaffirmed with still greater precision and clarity as the need required.

Substantially, predestinationism teaches that God does not sincerely will the salvation of all men. On the contrary, God wills absolutely the salvation of only some men; the rest He absolutely and unconditionally wills to condemn. In fact, the latter were created for the express purpose of being condemned to eternal punishment. Toward them God has never had a salvific intent. This pernicious doctrine was first taught by a priest of Gaul, Lucidus by name. It was condemned at the Council of Arles in 475 and again at Orange II (Denzinger 330–342, 397).

In the 9th century, the monk GOTTSCHALK OF ORBAIS renewed the same error. This was condemned in the Council of Quercy in 853 (Denzinger 621–624) and again by a synod of Valence in 855 (Denzinger 625–633). The latter was extremely important, because it explicitly posited a distinction between the foreknowledge of God and predestination itself.

The 16th century witnessed another form of the same heresy, as it was taught by CALVIN (1509–64). His position may be summarized as follows: (1) From all eternity, God chooses a certain portion of mankind to be saved; the others He positively and antecedently wills to condemn. (2) God not only wills the damnation of the latter, but also directly wills moral evil or sin itself in the same way that He wills moral goodness. (3) Predestination, therefore, is nothing more than the eternal decree of God by which He has decided upon the fate of each man. Some are preselected to eternal life, and others positively are preordained to eternal damnation.

In the 17th century, the followers of Calvin split into two groups. One group, the SUPRALAPSARIANS, maintained that God from all eternity, antecedently to the prevision of original sin, did not desire the salvation of all mankind, but rather predestined a portion of them to glory, while the rest He condemned absolutely to eternal punishment. A second group, the INFRALAPSARIANS, varied the above doctrine to the extent that this uneven decree of God came only after His prevision of the FALL OF MAN, not before.

Lastly, Cornelius Jansen of Louvain (d. 1638) agreed with the infralapsarians to the extent that he taught it is Semi-Pelagian to hold that Christ died for all mankind.

Teaching of the Church. Throughout the years, on the occasion of these pernicious doctrines, the Church condemned these aberrations from revealed truth. In addition, the Church reaffirmed with greater precision and clarity the revealed doctrine of the sincere universal salvific will of God.

The following are some of the declarations that are pertinent:

1. God predestines no one to evil (Denz 1567).
2. He wills, on the contrary, the salvation of all men (Denz 623).
3. Christ did not die solely for the predestined or the faithful (Denz 2005, 2304, 2430).
4. There is a grace that is truly sufficient and that is a true gift of God (Denz 2306).
5. The grace of conversion is offered to sinners (Denz 1542).
6. They only are deprived of it who, failing in their duty, refuse it; this is something which God permits but of which He is by no means the cause (Denz 1556, 1567, 2866).

To sum up, one must say that the Church affirms particularly three truths against Pelagianism and Semi-Pelagianism: (1) The cause of predestination to grace or justification is not the divine foreknowledge of naturally good works that are performed by men, neither is the cause preliminary to any act of the NATURAL ORDER that prepares man for salvation. This efficacious calling is due solely to God. It is initiated by Him because of His divine largesse. (2) Predestination to glory is not a result of foreseen supernatural MERITS that would continue to be effective apart from the special gift of final perseverance. (3) Predestination, viewed in its totality, that is, the entire series of graces from beginning to end, is gratuitous, and hence previous to the foreseen merits of man. In a word, that some are saved is the gift of Him who saves (Denz 623).

Against the various forms of predestinationism the Church teaches that: (1) God sincerely wills the salvation of all men and thus makes the fulfillment of His precepts possible for all. (2) There is neither predestination to evil as a final end nor predestination to any evil deed in particular. (3) Christ died for all men without exception. (4) Nevertheless, God has decreed from all eternity to inflict eternal punishment for the sin of final impenitence, which He has foreseen for all eternity. He is by no means the cause of the impenitence, but merely permits it.

In the words of St. Prosper, "That many . . . perish is the fault of those who perish; that many are saved is the gift of Him who saves."

Theological systems. The fundamental point at issue in this difficult problem is the necessity of reconciling predestination, viewed as a species of predilection for a select group, with God's will to save all mankind. Sacred Scripture emphatically declares that God wills all men to be saved (1 Tm 2.4), and yet God's sacred word asserts with equal force that in fact all are not predestined, but that those "whom He has predestined, them He has also called; and . . . also justified; . . . and glorified (Rom 8.30). Hence the difficulty.

Is it human effort that makes God's help efficacious, or is it rather the intrinsic efficacy of God's help that prompts human effort? And if grace is of itself efficacious, how is it that God mercifully grants it to the elect and justly refuses it to the rest of men? Moreover, predestination is not concerned merely with two groups of souls, the saved and the unsaved, but it is especially concerned with individuals. The question is: why has God placed in the number of the elect this particular person and not that other? Why has He chosen James rather than John and not vice versa? This unequal distribution of such exceedingly important gifts to individuals who are equal both by nature and by reason of ORIGINAL SIN is seemingly unjust on the part of an all-loving God.

Such is the inherent difficulty of the problem or rather the obscurity of the mystery with which the theologians of the Church have grappled. They have attempted to formulate answers that would be within the framework of revealed doctrine and the magisterial pronouncements of the Church.

Different points of departure, a variety of diverse opinions concerning many basic theological problems (divine CONCURRENCE, divine foreknowledge of future free acts, human freedom and supernatural grace), led to serious theological controversy and to a plethora of theological systems.

Among the outstanding efforts on the part of the greatest minds in the Church are the following.

St. Thomas Aquinas. The Angelic Doctor defined predestination as "a plan existing in the divine mind for the ordering of some persons to eternal salvation" (Summa theologiae 1a, 23.2). It is, therefore, the plan conceived in the divine mind whereby a selected group of rational creatures is so governed by God that they will infallibly obtain eternal beatitude. Consequently, predestination is formally in the divine intellect, although it presupposes the act of the will (De ver. 6.1). Predestination is a single process which encompasses at one and the same time all the graces by which each person is led to his final end, as well as the conferral itself of glory (ibid. 6.1). The conferral of grace is the effect of predestination, insofar as it is the means that leads a creature to the attainment of his end. The granting of glory is also the effect of predestination, insofar as it is the end for the attainment of which efficacious grace was given to these select souls.

Logically, predestination may be distinguished into three operations: dilection, election, and formal predestination. Dilection is the absolute decree of the divine will whereby God wills eternal life, that is, a determined measure of eternal HAPPINESS for a select group of men. Election is the same act of the will, insofar as through it God chooses a certain group of men to be saved rather than others whom He could have chosen. Formal predestination is the plan existing in the divine intellect according to which God accomplishes the salvation of those whom He has chosen. These three divine operations are so united that logically dilection is prior to election, and election is prior to formal predestination (Summa theologiae 1a, 23.4; In 1 Sent. 41.1). According to Aquinas, the foreknowledge of merits is neither the cause nor the reason for predestination; meritorious acts are rather the effects of predestination (Summa theologiae 1a, 23.5).

Luis de Molina, SJ. The founder of MOLINISM, and along with him Francisco de TOLEDO, Gabriel VÁZQUEZ, and St. FRANCIS DE SALES, agreed substantially with St. Thomas concerning the nature of predestination. He agreed that it is the divine plan that is formally in the divine intellect, although conjoined with the will. Predestination is one. It concerns all the means from first calling to the attainment of beatitude itself (Concordia 23.1.1, 2) and is entirely gratuitous. Therefore, predestination is not granted because of the divine foreknowledge of the free will of the creature, as if God predestined some because He foresaw the good use of their free will and reprobated the rest because of His foreknowledge of the abuse of their free will.

MOLINA taught that there exists in God a knowledge of all possible beings, as well as a knowledge of all possible orders of things. As a result, God knows all possible free acts of all possible men in all possible world orders. Presupposing this knowledge on the part of God, He, for His own reasons, freely chooses one order of things and wills its fulfillment. Thus, He chooses, those men to be saved whom in this world order He has foreseen would make good use of the graces that would be granted to them in these particular circumstances, men whom He has foreseen would persevere and ultimately merit eternal felicity. There is absolutely no causal influence, on the part of rational creatures, that influences God to choose this particular world order over other possible world orders. As a matter of fact, the very men whom God has foreseen will attain the blessings of eternal life in this present world order He also has foreseen in another equally possible world order as the group constituting those who would die unrepentant and thus be condemned. For this reason, it must be firmly held that election and predestination itself is entirely gratuitous.

The absolute decree of God to choose this world order is directly concerned with His foreknowledge of graces, which for some will be efficacious and for others merely sufficient. In knowingly choosing this world order in which a select group of men will receive graces which will prove to be efficacious, God is exercising toward these men a special predilection that He does not exercise toward others. The choice of this world order, in a sense, can be said to be the basic reason why the men thus benefited are saved.

The explanation of Molina is founded on his opinion concerning the manner by which God knows future free acts. He maintains that this knowledge is in God independently of any decree of the will of God that would physically predetermine the will of man to one course of action, PREDETERMINATION, he holds, would destroy human freedom. He concludes, therefore, that each individual freely determines himself to cooperate with grace or not. Molina, therefore, believes that the conferral of glory can be decreed absolutely by God only after He has foreseen absolutely the cooperation with grace and hence the meritorious acts of man. The reason for this is that the decree of election and predilection is concerned only with the graces to be conferred. Accordingly, in Molina's system there exists neither antecedent positive REPROBATION nor antecedent negative reprobation. Consequently, after the prevision, as absolute futures, of the merits of the first group and the demerits of the second group, God absolutely wills to give glory to the first and eternal punishment to the second.

Domingo Báñez. In opposition to Molina the Spanish Dominican theologian held that predestination to glory, viewed in itself, is decreed before the provision of any merits whatsoever (ante praevisa merita). The very first action of God concerning the chosen group of men (the elect) is their election to glory, and, conversely, His very first action concerning the rest of men is their exclusion from glory or from an efficacious election to glory. This predestination of certain souls to glory before the prevision of their merits is, of course, not a result of any merit on the part of man, but is entirely gratuitous. God wills this by reason of His absolute dominion over all creatures and through His inscrutable counsel. This is the first decree of God in the order of intention.

God in His divine wisdom has decreed to confer glory to the elect as the reward of merit. Therefore, after the decree of predestination to glory, God absolutely decrees the meritorious acts that are to be posited freely by each of the elect. Following this second decree, God absolutely decrees to give for each meritorious act graces that are intrinsically efficacious, graces that will infallibly predetermine man's will to a meritorious act. To those who were not elected, the negatively reprobated, God, subsequently to the decree excluding them from glory or from an efficacious election to glory, decrees not to give them efficacious graces, but graces that are merely sufficient. He removes them to the matter of sin and permits malice. Having posited these decrees, God knows infallibly that they will freely sin and perish unrepentant.

For the elect the execution of this divine plan is accomplished in the inverse order of its intention: (1) the granting of graces that are intrinsically efficacious; (2) the positing of meritorious acts, and death in the state of grace; (3) the conferral of glory because of merit. Conversely, for the reprobate, the nonelected, the execution of the divine plan is in a similar fashion. There is (1) the granting of merely sufficient graces; (2) permission to sin and the subsequent death of the unrepentant sinner; and (3) the positive reprobation of the sinner, subsequent to the prevision of his death in an unrepentant state. (See BÁÑEZ and BANEZIANISM.)

Congruists. The Jesuits St. Robert BELLARMINE and Francisco SUÁREZ presented a doctrine called CONGRUISM. In agreement with Báñez, congruism stated that there existed in God a predestination to glory for chosen souls, a predestination that is prior to the provision of any absolute merits on the part of the elect. By His middle knowledge (SCIENTIA MEDIA), God foresees as FUTUR-

IBLES the merits and demerits of all men. God's prevision of this, however, is not a factor that moves Him to choose this world order over any other. It is necessary, however, to posit this knowledge on the part of God in order to explain how He acts wisely and intelligently in His election of one group of men rather than another.

The first decree of God in the absolute order is the will to predestine a select group of men to glory before the provision of any absolute merits on their part. The reason for this decree of God is not a result of the provision of any goodness on the part of these chosen souls, but rather is a result entirely of the predestination and mercy of God. The choice is completely gratuitous. Following the will to select these chosen ones, God decrees to confer on them graces that through middle knowledge He foresees will be efficacious, that is, graces that are infallibly connected with SALUTARY ACTS. This decree of the divine will concerning efficacious graces and merits is necessary, and God has decreed to give glory to those whom He has chosen.

Conversely, God absolutely decrees to exclude the nonelect from an efficacious election to glory. It is important to note that He wills this exclusion antecedently to and in fact independently of the provision of any demerits on the part of the reprobate. He is able to do this because of His absolute dominion over all creatures and because of His inscrutable counsel. This is termed negative antecedent reprobation. As a consequence of this decree to exclude them from an efficacious election, He wills to exclude them from the order of efficacious graces. He confers upon them graces that are not congruous, graces that through middle knowledge He has foreseen will be merely sufficient. As for Báñez, so for Bellarmine, the order of execution of the divine plan is inverse to the order of intention.

Conclusion. Such were the answers given by the great theologians of the Church to the almost insurmountable problems involved in the doctrine of predestination. In matters of this type, theology may avert the evident contradiction, but it is not within its province to demonstrate philosophically the intrinsic possibility of mysteries. See MYSTERY (IN THEOLOGY). Just as the reality of the mysteries of the Trinity, Incarnation, and predestination remain obscure in this life, so does their intrinsic possibility (Denz 3015–20).

In this very difficult question of predestination, one must always bear in mind that he knows God merely by ANALOGY, through concepts that are completely unequal to the task of representing Him exactly as He is in Himself. For God unites in His essence various aspects that appear inharmonious to man for the simple reason that man's cognition is potential and imperfect.

Following the example of Christ, it is possible practically to consider the question under the light that shines forth in His preaching. The inspired description of the salvific will of God in the Gospels presents Christ weeping over Jerusalem and contains those heartrending words, "Jerusalem, Jerusalem! thou who killest the prophets and stonest those who are sent to thee! How often would I have gathered thy children, as a hen gathers her young under her wings, but thou wouldst not!" (Mt 23.37). The sincere unambiguous salvific will of God appears, indeed, forcefully in the Gospels; recall the widow seeking the lost drachma, the father and his prodigal son, and the Good Shepherd leaving the 99 sheep in the desert in order to find the one that is lost (Lk 15.1–32). Only Christ, who is one with the Father, can narrate what attitude of mind the Father has toward men, and from the above examples it is evident that it is one of infinite love and mercy.

PREDESTINATION (IN NON-CATHOLIC THEOLOGY)

At the very beginning of this article it should be clearly stated that actually there is no single doctrine concerning predestination that would be acceptable to all branches of Protestantism. Therefore, it would be inaccurate and ill-advised to present this article as being the Protestant theology of predestination. All that one can do is treat historic Protestantism as it has faced the problem of predestination, i.e., trace the theories of election and REPROBATION that can be found in the main currents of Protestantism as it has flowed through the history of the past 400 years. The approach, therefore, will be historical: the beliefs of some of the chief personalities will be delineated, the interrelation of their diverse opinions will be shown as far as possible, and, in conclusion, the doctrine of perhaps the most eminent of modern Protestant theologians, Karl Barth, will be set forth.

Martin Luther. The two men who played key roles in the early history of Protestantism, Martin LUTHER (1483–1546) and John Calvin, were both deeply influenced by the theological thinking of the centuries previous to those in which they lived. St. Augustine, as understood by them, was a great influence. So were Gotschalk of Orbais in the 9th century and, more proximately, John Wyclif in the 14th.

Luther, in his earlier years at least, maintained as extreme a doctrine of predestination as Calvin himself was later to profess. This is important to note since, by and large, modern LUTHERANISM rejects the extreme approach to predestination that was so emphatically taught by its founder. There are some who claim that in his later years Luther mitigated his doctrine of predestinarianism to a less rigid form of predestination. Actually, however, it seems that although there is a difference in the technical terminology utilized by Luther in the first and later form of his theology, nevertheless the later form does not constitute a radical departure from his earlier conception.

When Luther first began to grapple with the problem of predestination, about 1509 or 1510, he accepted the solution that was common among the schoolmen, that predestination is in some way to be explained by God's foreknowledge of man's conduct. But upon more assiduous study of the Bible and St. Augustine, Luther gradually underwent a complete reversal of opinion and finally professed the doctrine of predestinarianism, which he claimed to be the true teaching of the Bible as well as of St. Augustine.

The most complete sources concerning Luther's teaching on predestination are his commentary on the Epistle to the Romans and his work De servo arbitrio (The Will Enslaved), the latter being written in answer to Erasmus's attack on his doctrine, De libero arbitrio (Free Will). Essentially, the doctrine contained in these works may be summarized as follows.

There exists on the part of God an irrevocable election of some souls to eternal beatitude and positive rejection of the rest, who go to eternal perdition. As proof, Luther gives Paul's references to the scriptural stories of God's election and rejection in the three cases of Isaac and Ishmael, of Jacob and Esau, and of David and Saul.

According to Luther, all objections to predestination, as he understands it, come from human reason and not from the wisdom of God. The objections follow: 1. Man has been given a free will by which he can earn either merit or demerit. (Luther replies that man's will in itself has not the least ability to secure justification, because the will itself is totally corrupt, totally unable to choose anything but sin. Indeed, the will is not free but captive.) 2. Predestination, as held by Luther, is inconsistent with the teaching of Sacred Scripture, which states (1 Tm 2.4) that "God our Savior . . . wishes all men to be saved." (Luther's reply is that all such statements are realized properly in the elect. One must make a distinction between "the apparent will" and "the hidden will" of God. It is interesting to note that in his translation of 1 Timothy Luther renders the above as "God wills that all be assisted.") 3. If men sin of necessity, then they are unjustly condemned. (Luther replies that men are sinners of necessity and so are under condemnation, but no one is a sinner by external coercion or against his will. Man's will has been so corrupted by original sin that it interiorly always chooses evil and of itself is incapable of doing otherwise.) 4. God's hardening of the will of man makes God the cause of man's sin and condemnation. [Luther answers that what God wills cannot be unjust. For what right has the clay to criticize the Potter? God's law exists that the elect may obey it (for this divine grace is conferred) and that the reprobate may be caught in it (for this divine grace is withheld). Thus there is displayed both God's wrath and His mercy.]

Luther's presentation of this extreme position caused a violent reaction on the part of his humanist friends as well as of others. He was roundly criticized; most important of all, Erasmus broke with him and in two treatises bitterly attacked his former friend.

For the person who is tormented by the question as to whether or not he is among the elect, Luther's advice is to turn away from such thoughts and instead look to Christ. If one believes in Christ, then he may be assured that he is called; and if called, he may be sure that he is predestined to eternal salvation. Despite the efforts of certain followers of synergistic tendencies to maintain that Luther mitigated his earlier opinions concerning predestination (see SYNERGISM), it is fairly evident from many sections in his "Table Talk" of later years that Luther never retracted the rigid doctrine outlined above.

Huldrych Zwingli. The Swiss reformer (1484–1531) was a contemporary of Luther and according to many was profoundly influenced by him, though he himself was unwilling to admit it. Although ZWINGLI was much more under the influence of humanism than either Luther or Calvin, some scholars still believe that predestinarianism was the determinative principle in his theology. Zwingli taught a thoroughgoing determinism, declaring that all evil, as well as all good, is due to the causality of God. This generalization includes the fall of Adam. Faith is the fruit and present pledge of election so that he who has faith already knows that he is elected. Zwingli believed in the twofold character of predestination. Election is given to those who are to be saved, positive reprobation and rejection to those who are lost.

Philipp Melancthon. At first an adherent of Luther's rigid predestination and the denial of free will in man, Philipp MELANCTHON (1479–1560), perhaps because of humanistic tendencies, gradually changed his opinion. The AUGSBURG CONFESSION, in the formation of which he played the leading role, manifests a deliberate avoidance of the question of predestination. The Formula of Concord (see CONCORD, FORMULA AND BOOK OF) became the accepted Lutheran doctrine in the 17th century. This document states that predestination is the will of God that all who believe are saved. It states that foreknowledge deals with both the good and the evil, but that predestination deals with salvation. However, the promise of salvation is made to all men and not to just a few. Those whom God foresees will believe, He eternally elects. If certain men are not elected, the fault is their own. Thus it came to pass that the vast majority of Lutherans eventually held a position directly opposed to that of their founder.

John Calvin. A second-generation reformer, John CALVIN (1509–64) absorbed many of his ideas from the writings of Luther and Zwingli. In his Institutes of the Christian Religion (3.21.5, 7) Calvin teaches:

We call predestination God's eternal decree, by which he determined with himself what he willed to become of each man. . . . eternal life is fore-ordained for some, eternal damnation for others. Therefore, as any man has been created to one or the other of these ends, we speak of him as predestined to life or death. . . . We assert that, with respect to the elect, this plan was founded upon his freely given mercy, without regard to human worth; but by his just and irreprehensible but incomprehensible judgment he has barred the door of life to those whom he has given over to damnation. Now among the elect we regard the call as a testimony of election. Then we hold justification another sign of its manifestation, until they come into the glory in which the fulfillment of that election lies. But as the Lord seals his elect by call and justification, so, by shutting off the reprobate from knowledge of his name or from the sanctification of his Spirit, he, as it were, reveals by these marks what sort of judgment awaits them.

It is evident from the above that the first and absolute intention of God at creation was that certain men should be saved and the rest condemned to eternal damnation. This will of God is incapable of being frustrated. It imposes on secondary causes, even man himself, a direct internal necessity. Freedom of the creature consists in mere immunity from extrinsic coercion. Only the elect are justified; grace cannot be lost. The rest of men God precludes from the possibility of life, since He refuses them grace, without which they are internally incapable of positing a morally good act. In fact, God actually wills that they sin and die in the state of aversion from Him. This, however, is truly sinful and blameworthy on the part of man, because he is free from external coercion. (See CALVINISM.)

Jacobus Arminius. A theologian of the Reformed Church and professor at the University of Leiden, Netherlands, ARMINIUS (1560–1609) and his followers protested against Calvin's doctrine of unconditional election and irresistible grace. They maintained that for God to elect some men to salvation and to deny the privilege to the rest would be unjust on the part of God, and injustice is impossible with Him. The truth is that God knows in advance that a man will sin by free choice, but He does not will nor does he predestine him to do so. Man's freedom must be in contrast to all compulsion, necessity, and spontaneity. Freedom exists only when there is the power of alternate choice. Man does face alternate choices and therefore is actually free. For Arminius grace is not irresistible. (See ARMINIANISM.)

In the face of this mitigated doctrine and the controversy that it engendered in the Reformed Church, the Synod of Dort (1618–19) was convened. The Arminians were subsequently condemned and excluded from their pastorates; rigid Calvinism was strongly reiterated. There were, however, two groups among the members of the synod. One group, the SUPRALAPSARIANS, maintained that prior to any knowledge of original sin, and in fact independently of it, God eternally wills some men to be saved and positively reprobates the rest. The second group, the INFRALAPSARIANS, maintained that God's positive decree to predestine the elect to glory and to reprobate the rest came only after His prevision of the fall of man. The influence of Arminian theology was extremely important, because it was widely diffused when adopted by John Wesley and Methodism, as well as by related movements in the 18th century. The theological influence of Melancthon, Arminius, and Wesley provided a basis for the fact that the united stand that the original reformers had taken regarding the doctrine of predestination of free will steadily lost ground. As a result, today most of Protestantism takes a synergistic position that in many ways is similar to that held by the Catholic Church in opposition to the reformers.

Karl Barth. No new development of importance occurred until that of the present day, when NEO-ORTHODOXY has produced a departure in an entirely new direction from historic reformed doctrine. This position is best exemplified in the theology of an outstanding Protestant theologian of the 20th century, Karl BARTH.

Election in Christ. For Barth predestination is essentially connected with Christology. The root of every error that has crept into the doctrine of predestination lies in the blindness of its classic exponents to the fact that the ground of the electing will of God is identical with the reality of Jesus Christ. The divine election of grace means that God in the eternal counsel of His will has chosen for Himself fellowship with man, and for man fellowship with Himself—thus a double choice and predestination. This double choice is revealed in Jesus Christ and takes effect in Him on the stage of time. Christ is both the electing God and the elected Man. As the eternal Son of the Father, He is very God. His will is one with God's will. There is no other will of God for man but what is expressed, realized, and fulfilled in Him. And Christ is also the elected Man. In Him, through Him, and for Him, man's humanity is laid hold of and gathered into the life of God. Jesus Christ is true man. In the light of Christ one can no longer speak of God purely in Himself or of man purely in himself. One can only speak of God and man united in that communion wherein God meets man in pure sovereign grace and man meets God in faith and obedience.

God not only chooses but He also rejects. He chooses to be man's God, and He chooses not to be not man's God. This negative decision is just as truly a decision as the positive. The man to whom God binds Himself is fallen man, who as such lies under divine rejection. But the election of grace, eternal in the counsels of God, is not nullified by man's sin and fall. In Christ, God takes upon Himself the sentence of rejection and bears it in man's stead. In Christ, God Himself enters into the dark shadow of man's rejection and dissipates it. There is, therefore, because of Jesus Christ no positive decision of God to reject man, but only the gracious decision to accept him. There are not, therefore, two spheres, one of election and the other of rejection, standing independently over against each other.

Old and New Israel. According to Scripture, the first reference about divine election is not to man in general but to a chosen community, named Israel in the Old Testament and the Church in the NT. It must be emphasized, however, that it is the individual man who is the object of divine election and not the community as such. Both Israel and the Church exist to serve the electing purpose of God, which is for the individual man. In their life and history they mirror and reflect the great divine events of election and rejection that took place in Him, and so bear witness to Him, mediate Him to the world. The peculiar function of Israel in this regard is to mirror and illustrate the sinful actuality of all mankind and the divine rejection that became event in the Crucifixion of the Son of God, and so of the world that passes away in Him. The peculiar function of the Church is to mirror the new humanity in Christ, to bear witness of the divine election that was manifested in His Resurrection, and so the new coming world of God. Israel and the Church are one and the same community with two historical magnitudes. The one community of God in its departing form as Israel serves to set forth the divine judgment and in its coming form as the Church serves to set forth the divine mercy.

It is necessary to recognize that election is no mere dead, stationary decree fixing in advance all that should follow after. The election of grace is a living, moving thing. It is the action of the living, electing God upon the acts and decisions of men. Predestination as such is salvation history and as such is the secret of all history.

Individual Man. It has been noted that it is not the community as such that is the real object of divine election, but individual man, the single man in his simple humanness, as he exists in relation to the various forms of collectivity with which he is related. What does this individuality mean from the standpoint of divine election? This individual man is a sinful individuality that strives continually to isolate itself from God and make itself its own God. As such, man stands under the rejection of God and must cease to be in order that the true individual, the elect man, may appear. This is attained by a judgment borne by Christ in His death on man's behalf in order that man may receive the promise of his true manhood in Christ's Resurrection.

The election of the individual man is in reality, therefore, a derivation from the election of Jesus Christ. As his life becomes a hearing and receiving of the promise that is his in the election of Jesus Christ, the election becomes the transcendent mystery of his own existence. The elect man allows himself to be loved by God in that he sets aside all claims of his own to that love and permits a love that he has not in any way earned or deserved to determine his life. He allows God's love to overflow to him and finds in that love his one sure ground of hope, his joy and blessedness. However, man is not simply the object of God's love and blessedness; he is also the subject of them. He does not just passively receive; he actively shares. This love and blessedness must pass beyond himself in the direction of the world, which God in His election of grace has chosen for His own. The elect man must be a witness of God's election to others. He must become a further stage along which God's election of grace takes effect in the world. This he does in the very living of his life as an elected man.

Rejection is but the reverse side of election, but nonetheless real. The rejected man, in the crisis into which God's election of grace places him, sets himself in opposition thereto. God is for him, but he is against God. The rejected man exists as the object of God's not willing; that is to say, his existence is determined by the fact that God will not have him as he is. He exists as rejected insofar as he attempts to live in withdrawal from that positive will of God that claims him for divine grace. His life is a life without meaning and substance, without future. It is such a life because it is determined as such by the will of God, which, in electing him for grace, condemns him as one who strives to live in independence of grace.

It is important to note that since God's love is universal, Barth rejects the idea of the predestination of only a certain number of men; instead he would leave the number of the elect indeterminate. However, he would not make this open number of the elect equal to the number of all men. This would limit God's freedom.

Some critics maintain that, since Barth states that all men are elect in Christ, the basic difference between believers and unbelievers is only that the unbeliever does not yet know that he is elected. Moreover, since Jesus took upon Himself the rejection of all men, no man therefore is rejected by God. His critics maintain that because of this basic doctrine, it is difficult to see how Barth can escape from the charge of universalism, the doctrine that holds that all men are de facto eventually saved. It seems that this part of Barth's exposition is as yet a bit uncertain. Despite this limitation, Barth's teaching on election and rejection, with its Christocentrism, has had a remarkable appeal to all forms of Protestantism.

PREDETERMINATION

Historically, a term connoting the controversies of the CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS (1598–1607), and which the Thomists came to accept as a term expressing the intrinsic efficacy of actual GRACE. The nature of this efficacy was described as a physical predetermination or as a help that predetermines physically (Historiae Congregationum de Auxiliis, 2:171B; 4:515C). Such expressions were more frequent than the expression “physical PRE-MOTION.” Doctrinally the term raises the problem of the relationship between divine causality and the free human act and requires careful precision.

Divine Causality as Predetermination. The causality of God as intelligent first cause may be described as predetermination. The priority of this causality, so that it is a “pre-” determination, is its eternity. Identical with the divine being, the divine causality does not evolve but exists all at once. Thus it is prior to all the temporal effects to which it extends, including the voluntary actions of man.

This same causality is a determination because God is an intelligent cause. This determination can be taken as equivalent to the plan of divine PROVIDENCE, which extends to every created reality, all the way to singular beings and the events of their individual development and thus to the concrete acts of FREE WILL. Because this plan is divine, it is infallible; there can be no conjecture, no waiting or uncertainty about God's knowledge. God's eternity is itself a reason for this infallibility. In His knowing plan the actual events of all created history, including the voluntary acts of every man, are present before the simple, unevolving gaze of the divine mind. But this infallibility also presupposes that God's plan, His intelligent causality, is effective and not a mere theoretical apprehension of possible worlds. The source of that effectiveness is the decree of the divine will—the divine choice that certain beings and certain events, including the actions of men, should in fact exist. Thus, although the actual presence of all history in God's plan is explained by His eternity, that His knowledge be knowledge of the actually existent presupposes the sure source of all actuality, the efficacy of His own will. The infallibility of God's plan cannot be based on secondary causes; these are defectible, contingent and impeditable. Thus because it is a knowledge of all events (including the act of free will) in their subordination to the efficacious decrees of His will, God's plan, His determination, is infallibly certain.

All of this, however, is rejected in MOLINISM. The Molinist SCIENTIA MEDIA is a knowledge anterior to any decree of the divine will. Its certainty lies in its being an eternal comprehension of all the free acts to which the human will might determine itself with the aid of a merely simultaneous concurrence (Concordia, 14.13.52). The bases for this certitude are variously assigned, but the point of opposition to St. Thomas Aquinas's teaching is that the scientia media is an infallible knowledge of the existent anterior to the decrees of God's will (see Summa theologiae 1a, 14.5, 8, 13). The divine plan actually operative, for the Molinists, is a scientia libera. As eternal, this could be called predetermination, but the term is not apt because the decrees underlying it follow upon the perception in the scientia media of the autonomous determination of the free creature.

Physical Premotion as Predetermination. The eternal and infallible efficacy of divine causality is the basis for referring to physical premotion as predetermination. Physical premotion properly designates the effect of God's causality in every created agent, an effect by which the agent actually is conjoined to its own action. As such, physical premotion may well be described as predetermined. This serves to emphasize its nature as an effect of God's causality, belonging to His government, the execution of the divine plan in time. Because premotion is from God, it bears the marks of its origin, corresponding to the infallible efficacy by which God as first cause determines all actual existents. Thus premotion is not indifferent; it is not an indefinite energy variously determinable by created agents, but is itself predetermined and causative according to the universally extensive causality of God, which reaches to the singular existent, even to the free act.

Again, premotion may be designated as predetermining. This simply emphasizes its being a causal influence by which the created agent causes in subordination to God, the first cause. As such, it is prior to the actual effect, the action itself, by a causal antecedence. Precisely as a divinely causal influence, it is determining and not indeterminate. This is again to say that it extends to each concrete act to be exercised.

Thus understood, premotion is contrasted with the merely simultaneous concurrence espoused by Molinists. Such concurrence is proposed as a divine help conferred on the action of free will, and not on the faculty itself; thus both the divine help and the will-act become coordinated causes of free choice. The divine help, in this explanation, is in itself indeterminate; by its own choice, the human will concretizes and diversifies the divine help so that it becomes effective of a particular act.

But what is left unexplained is the will's passage to actual choice from a prior state of potency. In the final analysis, premotion is invoked simply because of this suspension of the will faculty. The divine help must be truly causal because the human will is dependent; the divine help cannot be indifferent and determinable, simply because it is primarily causative; the human will is so subordinated to divine help that without such help it could not exercise its choice at all. Thus the will could not determine the divine help to this or that choice; rather it is the divine help that is itself determined, namely, the help the will needs precisely to exercise this concrete act of choice, to pass from potentiality to actual choice. It was, in fact, because a merely simultaneous concurrence is an indifferent divine help that would make the divine plan uncertain, fallible, determinable that scientia media had to be invented. The Thomist position, as opposed to the Molinist, rests the certainty of God's plan on the efficacy of His decrees, to which physical premotion as predetermination corresponds.

Predetermination and Freedom of Choice. No attempt to see the compatibility of God's primacy as cause with the freedom of the will's choices can rid itself of obscurity. But certain strands of the problem can be separated. Physical premotion as it relates to its source, divine causality, is predetermined; the infallibility of the divine plan and its efficacy require this. As it relates to the free choices of the will, premotion is predetermining, in the sense of being causal with regard to each particular free choice. This causality takes place in the movement by which the will passes from potentiality to the actual exercise of its act. But freedom itself exists in the actual exercise of choice. This means that both as to what is chosen and as to the choosing itself the will has dominance; not only is it not coerced, but its basic orientation toward man's fulfillment is not fully evoked. The object and act of willing do not necessitate the will. As it wills, the will fully achieves its choice both of object and of action. From the point of view of conjoining the will to actual choice, then, physical premotion no more takes away freedom than does the will faculty itself in actually choosing its own act.

Yet the ultimate problem remains: predetermination implies the incompatibility of a physical premotion conferred and the will not placing the corresponding act. The nonpositing of this choice is incompatible with the infallibility and efficacy of the divine causality itself. The Molinist position escapes this problem by leaving the divine assistance indifferent and by relying on the scientia media. St. THOMAS AQUINAS faces this natural mystery by pointing to the unique effectiveness of God's causality that reaches each effect according to the connatural mode of being and acting that is proper to the secondary cause (Summa theologiae 1a, 19.6; 22.4 ad 1, ad 2, ad 3; C. gent. 3.148; De ver. 24.1 ad 3). Thus, for him, physical premotion is not predetermining in the sense of necessarily coercing the will. All the dynamism that leads up to the point of free choice takes place connaturally. The apprehension of this choice as desirable has gone on because of its conformity with the abiding dispositions of the will. The choice itself is made when, with the indispensable help of premotion, the will actually causes its own act. That the premotion, while retaining its own infallibility, does not coerce the will, rests upon God's acting on the will according to its proper nature, dispositions and mode of acting. The will is moved to make the free choice, so to exercise its freedom.

PREDICABLES

The predicables (Gr. κατηγορούμενα) are the relations involved in saying something is one of many; they express the five basic ways in which one thing "can be said" of many as of a subject by way of formal predication. Such predication manifests a formal perfection of the subject; an otherwise unexpressed determination and is opposed to mere predicates of identity. The five predicables were enumerated in the third century by PORPHY-

RY in his Introduction (Isagoge) to the Categories of ARISTOTLE. They are the classic quinque voces: genus, species, difference, property and accident. The notions were examined at great length in medieval logic (see LOGIC, HISTORY OF).

Purpose. The predicables are used in the dividing of being into the ten supreme genera (Gr. κατηγορίαί, categories), which are divided and subdivided by specific differences that ultimately constitute the lowest species, the term of the process (see CATEGORIES OF BEING). Since the categories are drawn up in order to help in classifying and defining natural objects, it is obvious that the predicables also share this purpose. In a DEFINITION, several concepts, generic and differential, are ordered in such a way as to express distinctly the determinate kind of being of an object, thus setting it off sharply from other objects. Through the verbal formula that stands for these concepts, the mind knows a limited class of things with a peculiar identity. Thus it selects predicates that will set off a given class by its proper determinations. In the definitions sought, the whatness or QUIDDITY (quod quid erat esse) is known and expressed as the starting point of scientific knowledge.

Of the words used in formulating a definition, not all are equally effective. For example, an essential predicate will manifest the quiddity better than an accidental one. The several relations of these words to the subject being defined are called predicables. By an exhaustive division one discovers that there are five of these. Such words are predicable of a subject because they are first related to the subject, as a universal would look to its inferiors. Predicability presupposes that what is said of many is in some way in the many. Since predicability follows on universality as a necessary attribute, the relations of predicability correspond to the five relations of logical universality, wherein the mind recognizes the ways in which a nature, abstracted from singulars, may be found in them as in its inferiors (see UNIVERSALS).

Number and Definitions. The five predicables are attained in the following way: When something is said of a subject it can either (1) belong to the nature or essence of the subject and express its quiddity, or (2) belong to the subject in some other way beyond its essence, that is, as accidental to it. In the former case it will manifest either the whole NATURE or ESSENCE of the subject, or part of that nature. The predicable designating the whole nature is called SPECIES. The part of the essence that the subject has in common with other classes of things resembling it is called GENUS, or including class. The part that distinguishes the subject from all other classes is called the difference. In the latter case the predicate may indicate something outside the essence but necessarily following on it, the PROPERTY; or may indicate something contingently associated with the subject, the predicable ACCIDENT.

In the Isagoge the definitions follow in this order. Genus is the said universal of many differing in species, in answer to the question “What is it?” (“animal,” of man and brute). Species is the universal said in answer to “What is it?” of many that differ only in number (“man,” of Plato and Socrates). Difference is predicated as the qualitative part of the essence (in quale quid) of those differing in number or also in kind (“rational,” of man; “sensitive,” of animal). Property is a universal said of a species as belonging only, necessarily and always to that species and its individuals (“able to speak,” of man). Accident is a universal said of a species as belonging contingently to that species and its individuals (“white,” of man).

The order in which the predicables are given reflects a proportionate share in the notion of universality. This is found more formally in essential predicates than in those that are outside the essence of the subject. And of the essential predicates, the generic are more universal than the specific, so that genus and species are given first as substantial predicates, then difference as a qualitative predicate, followed by property and accident as yet more distant from the essence of the subjects.

Predicates vs. Predicables. The predicables are distinct from the classes of predicates listed by Aristotle in the Topics (101b 11–103b 19). In this treatise on DIALECTICS, he sets out to classify problems concerning which arguments take place. Since dialectical reasoning inquires simply whether the predicate does or does not inhere in the subject in a given way (quia est), these problems can be reduced to four relations that the predicate of a proposition may have to its subject. The division is made on the basis of essentiality of predicate to subject, and of convertibility of predicate and subject. There are four possible combinations: (1) definition (Gr. ὄρος)—essential and convertible; (2) property—nonessential but convertible; (3) genus and generic difference—essential but not convertible; and (4) accident—nonessential and nonconvertible. Species is not listed separately because species is the subject of inquiry and not a predicate. Specific differences are tested in the same way as definition and may be reduced to it as a problem. Moreover, the question of specific difference is more proper to the specific science treating of the subject than to dialectics.

The division into classes of predicates is made so that the dialectician may discover the common means (loci) for testing each kind of predicate. The predicables, on the other hand, follow on the several relations of one to many, of one nature in many inferiors that are immediately contained under the superior or universal. These inferiors may be singulars or other universals. Thus species and difference constitute distinct relations of universality to inferiors, but not classes of predicates or problems for the dialectician. Individuals enter as terms of the relation of universality, but not as subjects of dialectical propositions.

PREDICATION

A predicate is a term affirmed or denied of a subject in a categorical or a simple modal PROPOSITION. Subject and predicate compose a sort of matter, which the copula, asserting agreement or variance between them, forms into the proposition. An individual TERM can be a predicate only if the subject also is individual. Other terms, whether concrete or abstract, positive or negative, are not so restricted. Since to be without an attribute is a kind of attribute, no distinction is made here between positive and negative terms.

Predication is the assertion that an attribute (signified by the predicate) does or does not characterize something (signified by the subject). There are thus two kinds of predication: affirmative, asserting such characterization; and negative, denying it. Consideration of the objective status of what the terms signify discloses that both affirmative and negative predication can be of two sorts, identical and disparate. Predication is identical when the attribute the predicate signifies does in fact characterize every referent of the subject; it is disparate when this attribute does not characterize any, or fails to characterize some, referent of the subject. Both of these can be either formal or material. The identical is formal when the predicate is the genus, difference, or property of the subject. Formal disparity results from incompatibility between what the predicate signifies and an attribute the subject signifies. When the subject neither entails nor excludes the predicate, the identity or disparity actually present is material.

Traditional LOGIC teaches that an affirmative proposition is true if and only if its predication is identical, and that a necessary proposition is true if and only if such identical predication is formal. The TRUTH and FALSITY of negative propositions are not determined by identity or disparity of predication.

PREFACE

In current usage, the term “Preface” refers to that prayer of praise and thanksgiving addressed to God the Father located between the introductory dialogue (a.k.a. the Sursum Corda) and the SANCTUS.

Term. The word praefatio, used to designate in a general manner that part of the Mass to which it is applied in the present Missal, is found with certitude for the first time in the Hadrian edition of the Gregorian Sacramentary. While some have claimed the word should be understood as an introduction to the Canon, many liturgical scholars (spearheaded by J. A. Jungmann) think that the pre-Carolingian Roman liturgy employed the term in that sense used in ancient Roman religion. The “before” (prae-) would then have reference to place, designating the position assumed by the priest when speaking the words. Hence, praefatio would refer either to a formula or prayer uttered solemnly to God “before” or at the head of a gathered assembly, or to such an utterance proffered “before” or in the presence of God (possibly, some propose, a translation of the Greek prophētia). Thus the word is more properly applied not only to the section of the Mass to which it is restricted in the Missal today, but to the entire solemn Eucharistic Prayer or Anaphora. This solution brings out better the theological significance of the term, especially in the light of recent theology of the Church as the “People of God” and the Qahal Yahweh. Moreover, certain aspects in the historical evolution of our present Mass formulary seem to lend support to this hypothesis.

Historical Considerations. Whatever may be the original sense of the term, historical study leaves little doubt that today’s Preface was initially an integral part of the Eucharistic Prayer (eucharistia, actio) or Great Prayer (oratio, prex), or Canon Actionis in some manuscripts. Several ancient Sacramentaries, in fact, place titles such as Incipit canon actionis before the dialogue that introduces the present Preface.

The solemnity of the Preface is heightened by an admonition to dispose oneself for the holy activity to follow (“Lift up your hearts”), and by the people’s assurance that they are so prepared (“We lift them up to the Lord”). With the next phrase, which culminates the dialogue between celebrant and people, the specific purpose of the gathering is solemnly set forth in an expression that probably has its origin in a Biblical, Jewish context. “Let us give thanks to the Lord our God” may well be borrowed from the traditional Jewish form of thanksgiving at meals; “Let us give thanks to Adonai our God,” from the BERAKHOT. In these blessings God the Father is thanked and praised for His glory manifested in the history of the Chosen People, past, present, and future.

This link with the Jewish service, which seems borne out even more explicitly in the body of the Preface itself, aids in the understanding of the “eucharistic” aspect of what takes place. It is not thanksgiving in an abstract sense, nor in a narrow, isolated sense, but it primarily designates a response on the part of the present ecclesial community to the activity of God in the whole of salvation history. To the celebrant’s solemn invitation to engage in actions of gratefulness, the people respond Dignum et iustum est (literally, “It is right and just”), a formula possibly taken from Hellenism by which the citizenry ratified an election or an important decision. Thus the assembly or ekklesia acclaims its union with the celebrant with respect to the rest of the eucharistic prayer.

At this point dialogue ends, and the celebrant directs the Eucharistic prayer-action to God the Father in the name of all. In earliest times this whole prayer-action appears to have been uttered in a loud voice in a kind of speech-song. Moreover, the formula was by no means set in its details, and the celebrant was allowed to indulge in a degree of improvisation. Rather quickly, however, because of its nature, the latter portion of the prayer, including the words of institution, tended to become almost invariable, thus starting the historical process that would eventually lead to distinction between the various parts. In the earlier part of the prayer, in which God is praised-thanked for the whole mystery of salvation, the practice arose in the West for the celebrant, in his improvisation, to stress some particular aspect of the total mystery that the specific feast or circumstances brought into special focus. These elaborations tended to proliferate in number, style, and length, thus increasing the distinction between this first portion and the unvarying, brief, and sober ending. Thus the Leonine Sacramentary (late 6th century) has 267 examples of what we today call “Prefaces,” although even these seem to be only models or patterns to be imitated rather than definitive formulas. Through the centuries the number of variations fluctuated. The Tridentine Roman Missal (1570) contained 15 Prefaces, and certain dioceses and religious congregations had additional prefaces.

Other developments also tended to obscure the unity of the great Eucharistic Prayer. The SANCTUS chant was interpolated (probably about the 4th century) and seems to have introduced a split in the inner continuity of the prayer, especially when, about the 12th century, a new attitude of piety brought about the silent recitation of the words following the Sanctus. The cleavage was further heightened when, in the manuscripts, the initial “T” of the Te igitur prayer began to be stylized and finally became the full-page illustration of the crucifix that we find in today’s Missals.

The oldest formula of the complete Eucharistic Prayer that we now possess, found in the Apostolic Tradition, traditionally attributed to Hippolytus, manifests much more explicitly the spirit of praise-thanksgiving for the wonders God has worked in history, with emphasis on the Christological aspects: through Christ we can offer fitting thanks because of the wondrous works the Father has performed in and through Him.

We offer thanks to you, O God, through your beloved child, Jesus Christ, whom in the last days you have sent us as savior and redeemer and messenger of your will . . . whom you sent from heaven . . . who, fulfilling your will, . . . stretched out his hands when he suffered to free from suffering those who believe in you . . . [who] taking bread, making eucharist [i.e., giving thanks], said: Receive, eat: this is my body . . . Being mindful, therefore, of his death and resurrection we offer thee . . . [Apostolic Tradition, 4].

One can see in Hippolytus’s prayer and its Christ-centered concern a specifically Christian adaptation of the ancient Jewish blessing prayer (berakah) of praise-thanksgiving to the New Covenant ANAMNESIS (memorial) of Christ’s death and Resurrection. Historical studies suggest that the earliest anaphoras or Eucharistic Prayers were structured after the Jewish Berakah (or after-dinner thanksgiving) of the time of Christ, which was composed of a threefold, interconnected theme: (1) a statement of praise and adoration addressed to God as the creator and provider of food; (2) a solemn declaration of thanks to God for his redeeming actions in sacred history; and (3) a prayer of petition, asking God to continue to bestow his mercy and care on the people of Israel. The Jewish prayer had itself been an anamnesis of God’s providence, His mercies and wonders worked for the Chosen People of the Old Covenant; it concluded with a petition for the coming of the Messiah. The basic structure of the berakah, certainly, is paralleled in certain New Testament prayers, e.g., “Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Father of mercies and the God of all comfort, who comforts us . . .” (2 Cor 1.3; cf. 1 Pt 1.3). Some scholars would argue that the eucharistic prayer appears to be a Christianization of that berakah, or thanksgiving.

It appears that two types of Eucharistic Prayer developed, one within a basically Eastern tradition which retained the tripartite form of the original, the other, more Western tradition, which assumed a bipartite pattern in which the first two parts of the original Jewish rite (praise and thanksgiving) coalesced into the initial “thanksgiving” that came to be known as the Praefatio, and which tended both to be variable according to the occasion and the feast and to appear somewhat isolated from the later supplication by reason of the Sanctus acclamation.

Developments since Vatican II. The “General Instruction of the Roman Missal,” first issued in 1969, indicates the official ecclesiastical acceptance of the assertion of the liturgical historians that the Preface, with its opening dialogue, is an integral part of the Eucharistic Prayer:

The eucharistic prayer, a prayer of thanksgiving and sanctification, is the center and high point of the entire celebration. In an introductory dialogue the priest invites the people to lift their hearts to God in prayer and thanks: he unites them with himself in the prayer he addresses in their name to the Father through Jesus Christ. The meaning of the prayer is that the whole congregation joins Christ in acknowledging the works of God and in offering the sacrifice (General Instruction of the Roman Missal 54).

The chief elements of the eucharistic prayer are these: a) Thanksgiving (expressed especially in the preface): in the name of the entire people of God, the priest praises the Father and gives him thanks for the work of salvation or for some special aspect of it in keeping with the day, feast, or season. b) Acclamation: united with the angels, the congregation sings or recites the Sanctus. This acclamation forms part of the eucharistic prayer, and all the people join with the priest in the singing or reciting it . . . (ibid. 55).

In its “Index of Prefaces” of the SACRAMENTARY there are 84 listed for various seasons, feasts, and occasions; most are provided with subtitles which rather clearly summarize the doctrinal or theological contents. Moreover, the impression is given that the further composition of other Prefaces suited to particular circumstances may be the rule rather than the exception.

The season cycle of the liturgical year has been quite liberally enriched by additional formulas which strive to bring out with increasing subtlety the thematic evolution of both the Christmas cycle and the Easter cycle. Thus, for example, the Advent-Christmas-Epiphany season now has seven Prefaces; the Lent-Passion-Easter-Ascension-Pentecost cycle has 21. For Sundays in ordinary time there is a variety of eight Prefaces, while six are for weekdays.

The sanctoral cycle is similarly enriched. The feasts and mysteries of the Lord account for 13 new formulas, while there are 16 for the feasts of the saints. Certain other celebrations have also been provided with their own Prefaces, e.g., marriage, religious profession, Order of Christian Funerals, such civic observances as Independence Day and Thanksgiving.

PRELATE

From the Latin, praeferre, to put before, is a general term for an ecclesiastical dignitary who has jurisdiction in the external forum, whether he is a secular or religious cleric (1917 Codex iuris canonici c.110). True prelates are those who, either in their own right or as a member of a college, are vested with some power to assist the pope in the governing of the Church. These include the following: (1) prelates a flocculis (i.e., those with specific offices, and who wear distinctive garb); (2) assessors and secretaries of the Roman Congregations; (3) the Maestro di Camera, the secretary of the Apostolic Signatura, the dean of the Roman Rota, and the substitute secretary of state; (4) four colleges of prelates—prelate auditors of the Roman Rota, clerics of the Apostolic Camera, prelates of the Apostolic Signatura, prelates referendarii of the Apostolic Signatura; (5) metropolitans; (6) bishops and all those listed as ordinaries in 1917 CIC c.198; (7) vicars-general; (8) superiors and provincial superiors of the institutes of exempt clerical religious.

Patriarchs, primates, metropolitans, archbishops, and bishops are classified as major prelates. Minor or subordinate prelates are those who have quasi-episcopal jurisdiction. The Code of Canon Law, when treating of minor prelates, speaks only of abbots nullius and prelates nullius. However, superiors in clerical exempt institutes as well as certain members of the household of the pope also are classified as minor prelates.

The title prelate is also granted by the Holy See to some clerics as an honorary distinction without jurisdiction. They do not enjoy any special office because of the prelate but are entitled to the honorific rights of prelates.

PRÉMARE, JOSEPH HENRI DE

Missionary and sinologist; b. Cherbourg, July 17, 1666; d. Macau, Sept. 17, 1736. He was admitted into the Society of Jesus on Sept. 17, 1683, and departed for the mission to Middle China in 1698, where he labored principally in the province of Guangxi. Prémare was confined with his fellow missionaries to Canton after Emperor Yongtching forbade further Christian proselytizing. Another imperial edict exiled him to Macau. In his banishment he studied the language and literature of China, and his success in appreciating their subtlety and beauty is shown in his major work, Notitia linguae sinicae (Malacca 1831; Eng. tr. J. G. Bridgman, Canton 1847). Here he explains the rules for the use of the Chinese vulgar (siao shue) and literary (wen tchang) language. He also translated several pieces of Chinese poetry, including the Chinese tragedy L'orphelin de la maison de Tschao (1731). The Jesuit Joachim BOUVET proposed a theory of figurism, holding that Chinese characters suggest allusion to Christian mysteries. Prémare defended it in Vestiges choisis des principaux dogmes de la religion chrétienne, extraits des anciens livres chinois (Paris 1878). J. B. du Halde has published some of Prémare's letters in Lettres édifiantes et curieuses (Paris 1711) and Description de la Chine et de la Tartarie chinoise (Paris 1735; Eng. tr. E. Cave, 2 v. London 1738–41). Others are to be found in the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris.

PREMONSTRATENSIAN RITE

The liturgical usages proper to the Premonstratensian Order. They are not properly a rite.

History. Liturgical reform was integral to the reform of religious life in all medieval communities from Cluny to the mendicants. Thus, the particular forms of expression for consecrated life from the eleventh to the thirteenth centuries—the eremitical (CARTHUSIANS), the monastic (CISTERCIANS), the canonical (PREMONSTRATENSIIANS) and the mendicants (especially DOMINICANS and CARMELITES)—legislated and enforced liturgical reform as strictly as the other aspects of their ritualized life. Liturgical uniformity was seen as necessary to the success of reform in these orders. Contrary to the prevailing opinion held throughout the twentieth century, liturgical uniformity among the Premonstratensians was not as strictly enforced as it was among the Cistercians. The early growth of the Premonstratensians was as much due to already existing canonical and collegiate chapters accepting the ordo vivendi praemonstratensis as it was to new foundations. These existing communities already were united by usages proper to the non-monastic liturgy of canons. They could not be expected to jettison their liturgical libraries immediately upon accepting the Premonstratensian way of life.

In the course of the second half of the twelfth century, the long and increasingly centralizing administration of HUGH OF FOSSE, successor to the founder St. NORBERT and first abbot of Premontre, the influence of Cistercian government and liturgy on the Premonstratensians and papal encouragement towards uniformity all contributed to greater, but never complete, liturgical uniformity throughout the order.

The oldest Ordinarius or basic description of the order's liturgy dates from the last quarter of the 12th century. In the Middle Ages it was a strong factor in maintaining continuity and solidarity throughout the order and served as a principal source for the spiritual formation of its members.

The liturgical books of the order were revised in the 15th and 16th centuries. In the wake of the Tridentine reform of the liturgy, all orders having a liturgical tradition of less than two hundred years were obliged to follow the revised Roman rite. In 1574 and 1578, during the administration of Abbot General Jean Despruets, the processionale, breviarium, and missale of the order were reprinted on the basis of authentic medieval manuscripts. In the same period, however, it became more and more the tendency to imitate the new Roman rite. The general chapter of 1618 voted to maintain the order's liturgy, but did adapt more Roman elements (breviarium of 1621, missale of 1622 and Liber Ordinarius of 1628). This hybrid liturgy was further adapted in 1739 and remained in force until the end of the 19th century.

In response to the liturgical renewal initiated by SOLESMES and PIUS X, the order decided to review and re-integrate elements of its medieval liturgy. A chant commission was established in 1904 and new liturgical books published: a graduale in 1910, a revised calendar in 1924, a breviarium in 1930, a processionale in 1932, and an antiphonarium in 1934. Throughout this period, the general chapters debated the value of an integral reintegration of medieval usage against one adapted to 20th-century life, especially in the many parishes served by Premonstratensians. The more adapted reintegration marks the Liber Ordinarius published in 1949.

The General Chapter of 1976 decided to retain its right to proper usages, but in conformity with the principles of liturgical renewal set forth by the Second Vatican Council. A revised calendar was approved in 1977 and a Thesaurus Liturgiae Praemonstratensis for the celebration of Mass and the Liturgy of the Hours appeared in 1988. In practice, almost all communities follow the Roman liturgy according to the order's calendar.

Description. The order's liturgical tradition places heavy emphasis on the celebration of the paschal mystery. In the pre-Vatican II usages, the expulsion of penitents and their reconciliation on Holy Thursday were solemnly celebrated. The Easter octave was celebrated with the greatest solemnity. Post-baptismal Easter Vespers was celebrated each day of the octave. The Order had an eighth "O antiphon," O Virgo virginum. The medieval Christmas sequence, Laetabundus, was retained. The rites of the Ordo Romanus Antiquus (c. 950) were retained in the celebrations of Candlemas, Ash Wednesday, Holy Week, and the Rogation Days. Some elements in the rites for the dying and burial went back to the Carolingian period. The older Mass rite was a canonical adaptation of the Carolingian version of the Ordo Romanus primus (Andrieu's Ordo Romanus 5) and was an important witness to the Romano-Germanic tradition of the Western liturgy. The order retained a proper chant dialect that was largely retrieved through the work of the chant commission established in 1904.

The most important change in the order's liturgy since Vatican II has had to do with its spirit. The hallmark of Premonstratensian liturgical prayer has shifted from that of splendor cultus to ecclesial prayer in medio populi. Throughout the twentieth century many Premonstratensian abbeys in Western Europe, especially Berne in the Netherlands and Tongerlo and Averbode in Belgium, were centers of liturgical renewal.

PREMONSTRATIENSIS

An order called also Norbertines, Canons Regular of Prémontré, and (in England) White Canons, the Premonstratensians (O. Praem.) were founded by St. NORBERT OF XANTEN at Prémontré, France, in 1120. This religious community was intended by its founder to blend the contemplative with the active religious life; it was one of the canonical orders of the 12th century that provided a link between the strictly contemplative life of the preceding period and the life of the MENDICANT ORDERS of the 13th century.

Foundation and Growth. At the outset Norbert's associates, attracted to him by his preaching and exemplary life, did not deem it necessary to form a new order or adopt a special rule; they considered the counsels and example of their director sufficient for their spiritual needs. When Norbert convinced them of the need for a definite rule of life, the Rule of ST. AUGUSTINE was a natural choice. Many of the members of the original Prémontré community were canons, and some reformed houses of canons had already adopted Augustine's rule. The canons of Prémontré then assumed the white habit customarily worn by the canons regular of that day. The first community, numbering about 40, made their profession of vows on Christmas 1121.

Following the example of other communities of canons, Norbert did not contemplate a centralized order. However, Bl. HUGH OF FOSSE, Norbert's successor at Prémontré and the first abbot of the original foundation, perfected the organization of the new religious institute with the adoption of practices and rules that were for the most part Cistercian in origin. Hugh persuaded the other Premonstratensian abbots of the need for some kind of federation of their otherwise autonomous houses.

With the help of papal bulls, culminating in that of Alexander III in 1177, the Order grew into a well-defined organization with an abbot general (the abbot of Prémontré), an annual general chapter of the heads of the various houses, the system of filiation of houses, and a method of visitation, all adopted largely from the system at Cîteaux with accommodations according to the peculiar needs of canons. The houses of Saxony, the chief of which was Magdeburg, resisted this attempt at centralization by appealing to the views and policies of Norbert. Traditionally, the Magdeburg-oriented houses also emphasized the active apostolate more than did the western European abbeys, where Cistercian influence was more pronounced.

In the 12th century the order spread rapidly over practically all of Europe and, with the Crusades, even to Palestine, where three Premonstratensian foundations had been made by 1145. The famous Abbey of FLOREFFE (Belgium) was founded as early as 1122, and St. Martin of Laon (France) became a Norbertine house when the church there was accepted by the Order in 1124. In the same year the Abbey of St. Michael was established in Antwerp, largely as the result of the successful preaching of Norbert's canons against the heresy of TANCHHELM, who denied the Real Presence. It is because of his victory over this heresy that Norbert is often portrayed with a monstrance in his hands and with a figure representing Tanchhelm under his feet.

Many of the abbeys that were founded during Norbert's time or shortly thereafter have either survived the turmoil of the centuries or have been refounded and still flourish today. In Belgium, the abbeys of Averbode, Tongerlo, Grimbergen, Park, and Postel are among the great Premonstratensian houses of the 20th century. Berne abbey in the Netherlands is the oldest continuously existing abbey in that country. It was founded as a house of Premonstratensian canons in 1134, the year that Norbert died. Henry Zdik, Bishop of Olmutz (d. 1150) was responsible for the erection of the great Abbey of Mount Sion at STRAHOV, Prague, in 1140. This abbey, along with several other Premonstratensian houses in the Czech Republic, Slovakia, and Hungary, were suppressed by the Communist government in 1950. Since the fall of Communism in those countries, these abbeys have been reopened and religious life has been restored.

By the middle of the 13th century, according to a conservative estimate, there were at least 500 abbeys or priories located in France, Belgium, Germany, Austria, Switzerland, Hungary, Spain, Greece, Palestine, Poland, Portugal, the British Isles, and the Scandinavian countries. Many of these were founded as double monasteries by colonies from established houses; others were existing communities, especially of canons regular, which were incorporated into the order. Foundations and donations were received from bishops and nobles who were interested in Church reform. In 1122, for example, St. Godfrey, Count of Cappenberg (1097–1127) ceded his vast properties to the order and received the habit himself. In 1139 Ven. Louis of Arnstein founded a magnificent monastery in his feudal palace. Some bishops invited Premonstratensians to take the place of their cathedral canons. At Laon and Magdeburg secular canons were replaced by canons of Prémontré. In some instances, as in the case of St. Alexis (Rome) and of St. James (Mainz), communities of monks were replaced by these reformed canons.

During this period of great fervor and growth, the Premonstratensians were particularly noted for their xenodochia (hospices), where the poor and the sick were assisted and pilgrims housed and fed. In this work the canons had the assistance of Premonstratensian nuns, whose communities were attached to most of the abbeys in the early period. While Norbert himself always remained an active preacher, the foundations that he made before Magdeburg were essentially contemplative and frequently located in isolated places. The original statutes provided that the Premonstratensians were not to serve parish churches except those attached to the abbeys. The numerous requests from ordinaries and the need for priests in churches located in the vicinity of Norbertine foundations led to a relaxation of this regulation concerning parochial ministry. In 1188 Clement III formally approved parish administration by the Premonstratensian canons. The abbeys soon became training centers for clerics, secular as well as regular, and eventually schools of humanities were established.

The Order's first century and a half witnessed not only great expansion, but also a rich harvest in spiritual and intellectual life. Among the saintly figures, in addition to those previously mentioned, were: Bl. Ricvera of Clastre, who aided Norbert in organizing the nuns of the order; St. GILBERT, who in 1150 founded the monastery of Neuffontaines (France) and became its first abbot; Bl. Hroznata, martyr (d. 1217), a member of the Bohemian nobility who gave himself and his possessions to the order, thus founding the Abbey of Teplá (Czech Republic); St. Evermode (d. 1178), a companion of Norbert who became provost of Magdeburg and later bishop of Ratzeburg; and St. Herman Joseph, canon of Steinfeld, (d. c. 1241), one of the earliest promoters of devotion to the Sacred Heart, who later became the patron of youth in his native section of Germany. Noteworthy among those who made important contributions to the intellectual tradition of the Premonstratensians were Gervase of Chichester (fl. 1170), Adam Scotus (Dryburgh), and PHILIP OF HARVENGT. Gervase was one of the more notable abbots general in the order's long history. During his lifetime he acquired a reputation for zeal and learning, and in 1215 he was called to Rome by Innocent III to assist at the Fourth Lateran Council. Gervase was eventually named bishop of Sées (Normandy) in 1220. Through the influence of such learned men, the Order of Prémontré contributed significantly to the medieval renaissance.

Decline and Recovery. By the late 13th century the first symptoms of decline in religious fervor appeared in the order. The wealth of some of the houses and the practice of peculium (funds for private use) were factors in this deterioration, and no doubt the increasing pastoral activity beyond the walls of the monasteries cooled the claustral spirit. The large land holdings of many abbeyes led to the abuses of commendatory abbots, many of whom had no interest in the material or spiritual welfare of the communities whose properties they administered. Then, too, on some occasions plagues depopulated entire communities.

During the Reformation every Norbertine foundation in England was lost as well as the houses in Ireland and Scotland. A similar fate befell abbeyes in northern Germany, Frisia, Hungary, and the Scandinavian countries. In the 16th century, as the Catholic reform spread throughout Spain, France, and the rest of Catholic Europe, the Premonstratensian Order also experienced a revival. The Norbertine Nicolas PSEAUME, Bishop of Verdun, was one of the influential figures of the Council of Trent. Especially noteworthy within the order was the reform of Lorraine, fostered by Servais de Lairuels (1560–1631), which spread through the monasteries of Lorraine and France. Eventually, by pontifical decree, the Congregation of Ancient Observance of Prémontré was withdrawn from the jurisdiction of the general chapter and authorized to govern itself by a separate chapter at which the abbot general or his personal delegate always presided. In 1630 new statutes based on decrees of the Council of Trent were adopted for houses of the common observance. So fruitful were these reforms that the 17th century might well be called the renaissance of the Order. Not only was there a rebirth of religious fervor in existing Premonstratensian houses, but some monasteries that had gone out of existence were reestablished, especially in Hungary. This was the period also when houses of study were established near the great European universities in order to provide for the higher education of the canons. The ancient privileges pertaining to the apostolate, previously granted by earlier pontiffs, were reconfirmed by Pope Benedict XIV in 1750.

The French Revolution and its aftermath, as well as the monarchical reforms in Austria, almost completely demolished the order. After 1791 not a single abbey remained of the 94 that had existed in France. The invasion of Belgium and the Rhenish lands by the revolutionary armies brought destruction or suppression. Some years previously, Joseph II of Austria sequestered Premonstratensian abbeyes when the canons refused to conform to his decrees regulating the training and activities of religious within his realm. By 1820 the only Premonstratensian houses remaining in all Christendom were those in Spain, and a small number that had survived in Austria-Hungary. The Spanish monasteries were suppressed after the revolution there of 1833.

Modern Development. Revival in the 19th century was extremely slow. In the 1830s, after the separation of Belgium from Holland and the granting of religious freedom in the former colony, the surviving Premonstratensians reconstituted the houses of Averbode, Grimbergen, Park, Postel, and TONGERLOO. In France, the Abbey of FRIGOLET was founded in 1858, and the Abbey of Mondaye was restored in 1859 by canons from Grimbergen. Similarly, in 1857 there was a reestablishment of common life at Heeswijk, Holland, of Berne Abbey, which was the house destined to undertake the first permanent foundation in North America. General growth, however, was hampered by the lack of unity.

After the Abbey of Prémontré was suppressed in 1790, Jean-Baptiste L'Ecuy, the last abbot, was unable to function as abbot general until his death in 1834. After 1834 there was no abbot-general until a general chapter was convened in 1869 and Jerome Zeidler, the abbot of Strahov, was elected. He died before his confirmation by the Holy See. In 1883 a general chapter, convened in Vienna, again selected the abbot of Strahov, Sigismund Stry. To facilitate the handling of business before the Holy See, it was decided to have the procurator general reside in Rome. The election of Gummarus Crets of Averbode as abbot general in 1922 was evidence of the success of the revival in the Low Countries, where the abbeyes are the largest in the order and have been most active in the missionary field and the liturgical apostolate. In 1937 the procurator general, Hubert A. Noots, a canon of Tongerlo Abbey, was elected to succeed Crets as abbot general. He separated the generalate from the administration of a particular abbey by taking up his residence in Rome.

In 2001 the order consisted of six circaries (provinces) organized along language lines. Within these six circaries there were thirty-six independent houses or canons located on six continents in twenty-three countries. In addition to these houses there were several houses of sisters, under the jurisdiction of local bishops. There were also missions and dependent priories in various countries around the world.

The first permanent Premonstratensian foundation in North America resulted from an invitation in 1893 from the Bishop of Green Bay, Wis., Sebastian G. Messmer. He asked the canons of Berne Abbey to send missionaries to his diocese to combat the heresy of Joseph René Villatte among the Belgian settlers in northeastern Wisconsin. Bernard Henry Pennings was chosen to lead the first missionary group of three; the small community was later augmented by eight other religious. By February of 1898 the heresy was a dead issue, and Pennings turned his attention to the establishment of a Norbertine foundation in De Pere, Wis. Eventually, there were four independent Norbertine houses in the United States: St. Norbert Abbey (De Pere, Wis.), Daylesford Abbey (Paoli, Pa.), Immaculate Conception Priory (Claymont, Del.), and St. Michael's Abbey (Orange, Cal.).

Government, Spirit, and Apostolate. Supreme authority rests with the general chapter composed of the abbots and delegates from each autonomous Premonstratensian house. The general chapter regularly convenes every six years, and in the intervening period the enforcement of the will of the chapter is entrusted to the abbot general, who is elected for life, and his council (Definitory). The abbot general is represented in each circary by a vicar general. In a non-centralized order such as the Premonstratensian, the individual abbots enjoy considerable autonomous power in the administration of the spiritual and temporal affairs of their own houses. While the order had already received many papal privileges in the 12th century, it was in 1409 that Alexander V formally granted exemption from episcopal jurisdiction.

The Premonstratensian order is composed of priests, clerics, lay brothers, canonesses and lay sisters. The canonesses live a cloistered life. In the 19th and 20th centuries communities of third-order sisters were established in some countries of Europe to do work that did not involve a strictly cloistered life. While the order has for many centuries had lay third-order members, more recently there has been a move toward accepting oblate members and associate members who are more closely involved with the life and work of the order.

Norbertine life is intensely liturgical, with a strong paschal character most evident in the celebration of post-baptismal Easter Vespers and its proper chants in Eastertide. The so-called Premonstratensian Rite rooted in the medieval liturgical practice of Franco-Rhenish collegiate churches has largely been replaced since Vatican II with the renewed Roman Rite according to the calendar proper to the order. The order's earlier commitment to splendor cultus in the canonical tradition has been superseded by a commitment to ecclesial prayer in medio populi.

The Norbertine apostolate has varied throughout its history. Norbert at first envisioned preaching as the chief ministry of his disciples, but a diversification set in even in his lifetime, since it became customary for the order to assume work arising from the needs of the area in which the houses were located. The Norbertines of Belgium and France emphasize missionary activity and specialized apostolates, such as retreats, teaching, and the liturgical apostolate. In Austria and Germany the traditional parochial ministry prevails. Many members of the restored Hungarian, Czech, and Slovak houses are engaged in parochial ministry. In the U.S. the Premonstratensians until the mid-1970s were mostly active in the field of education, as well as in parochial ministry. Since then there has been a shift to view the abbeys as spiritual and liturgical centers. While teaching is still part of the work of some abbeys, activity in others has centered on retreats, spiritual direction and opportunities for prayer.

PRÉMONTRÉ, MONASTERY OF

From the Latin praemonstratum (the place shown forth), cradle of the Order of Canons Regular of Premontré or PREMONSTRATENSIS (Norbertines), near Coucy, Aisne, former diocese of Laon, now Soissons. The land was given by Bishop Bartholomew of Laon to NORBERT OF XANTEN, who founded the monastery there (1120–21). The foundation was originally a double cloister. In 1128, Norbert was succeeded by HUGH OF FOSSE, an able organizer, and the order grew. The abbots of Prémontré became generals of the order, and annual general chapters were held there. The abbey was ruled by zealous abbots, but on three occasions free elections were interfered with, when Cardinals Francis of Pisa, D'Este (1535–71), and Richelieu (1636–42), were named commendatory abbots. The survival of this crisis and the reform of the order was attributed to Abbot Jean Despruets, freely elected in 1572. The abbey added several large buildings in the 17th and 18th centuries. It had 80 canons when it was suppressed in the French Revolution (1790). The large medieval church and Gothic chapterhouse were demolished, and subsequent attempts (1843, 1856) to rebuild the monastery failed. The bishop of Soissons sold the property, and it became an asylum of the Department of Aisne. The three 18th-century buildings surrounding the court of honor (the praelatura, the provisor's offices and the residence for older confreres) have been preserved as historic monuments while serving as offices for the asylum. The ruins of the first abbey church of St. John the Baptist built by St. Norbert have been incorporated into a wall of the property.

PREMOTION, PHYSICAL

A translation of the Latin praemotio physica, an expression that is itself contrived, connotative of controversy, and pleonastic. Historically it is tied to the Thomist side in the controversies of the CONGREGATIO DE AUXILIIS (1598–1607); yet it was in fact thrust upon Thomists as part of the case to be defended [see J. H. Serry, Historiae Congregationum de Auxiliis (5 v., 2d ed. Venice 1740) 2:171 B; 4:515 C].

Historical Background. The expression “physical premotion” certainly had arisen in theological circles at Salamanca earlier than the Congregatio. It is found, for example, in a work of Juan Vicente (Asturicensis) completed in 1589 and entitled De origine gratiae (MSS in Archivum Generale OP, Rome, XIV-366, fol. 816r–817v). In his rejection of the notion, as in the usage of the De Auxiliis, the formula used ordinarily is praedeterminatio physica (see PREDETERMINATION).

The reality underlying both expressions is a special divine causal influence upon all created causes, including man in his voluntary acts. The explication of the expressions is closely bound to the theological contexts in which they were disputed, viz, PREDESTINATION and FREE WILL, the efficacy of divine GRACE and human freedom, and divine CAUSALITY and the act of SIN. Yet the causal influence designated by physical premotion can also be subjected to a philosophical analysis in terms of the creature's dependence on God.

St. THOMAS AQUINAS proves that God is the cause of all causes' causing in three ways: as ultimate end, the source of all finality; as source and conserver of the operative, forms by which agent causes are constituted; and as applying or moving these operative powers to actual exercise (Summa theologiae 1a, 105.5). Physical premotion refers only to the last. In St. Thomas's terminology, the simple term motion would suffice; his followers accepted the redundancy of the complex term as expressing the meaning of motus. The causal influence is “motion” because it is transitory and also because it affects the agent's power to act. It is called “pre-” motion, or a previous motion, to indicate its causal priority with regard to the actual operation of the created agent. It is called “physical” with a view of the human will, to emphasize that the will faculty is interiorly affected by it.

By its redundancy the term opposes the Molinist conception of God's causality on the free act. Luis de MOLINA professed his incomprehension of St. Thomas's statement concerning the application of the created agent to its act [Concordia 14.13.26 (Paris 1876) 152]. He taught instead a divine causal influence only on the free act itself, and this coordinated with the will's causality of its own act. The two causalities are simultaneous, hence “simultaneous concurrence,” as opposed to premotion (see CONCURRENCE, DIVINE). For Molina, the only causal influence antecedent to the will-act is moral, that is, through the object of choice. The Molinists, throughout the De Auxiliis and subsequently, were at pains to interpret physical premotion as a kind of natural impulse, taking physical to mean natural and thus as necessitating the will. The Thomists, on the other hand, insisted on the insufficiency of the SCIENTIA MEDIA, the cornerstone of the Molinist position, to defend the infallibility of God's knowledge and of His causality; in their analysis, a motion that is merely moral and simultaneous concurrence are what make the scientia media indispensable to MOLINISM.

Premotion as Motion. Physical premotion is neither God's causality itself nor the causality of the created AGENT. God's causality is identical with Himself, with the operations of His intelligence and will with regard to creatures, and for this reason it is called His power (ST 1a, 25.1 ad 4). But this causality does not pass outside of God as does a transient action, for, if it did, God would be perfected by the developing process. The divine causality is itself immanent what does “pass outside of God” are the effects of His causality. Physical premotion is one of these—an acknowledgment resting upon God's being the first cause of all the acts of creatures as their first mover.

In receiving its own grade of being from God, every agent has a certain type of action that is proportionate or connatural to itself. But no created agent is identical with the exercise of its own activity. This is experientially plain from the transitoriness of actions and the perdurance of the agent with its operative form or power. The fact is seen also as an intelligible necessity: identity between agent and action presupposes identity between ESSENCE AND EXISTENCE. Thus only God is identical with His own action; only He is first mover. Every other being, thus every other agent, is composed of POTENCY AND ACT on the level of substantial existence, and again on the level of accidental existence, where action properly belongs. There is necessarily, then, a real distinction between an agent with an operative form and the actual exercise of its operation. Thus every agent is dependent on God as first mover, the source by which its potentiality to operation is actualized. Whether or not other movers are involved, God's causality always is. Other movers function only insofar as they themselves are reduced from potency to act; they are moved movers. The unique effect attributable to the divine causality is thus the created agent's overcoming its potentiality. It is this that is indicated in the term premotion (see Thomas Aquinas, In two sent. 37.2.2; De pot. 3.7 ad 7; C. gent. 3.67, 66, 89; Summa theologiae 1a2ae, 109.1; In lib. de caus. 1).

In English the term motion is active. Its active sense can be used to connote the reference of this effect to its source, God's causality as first mover, and also to indicate that God applies and moves the operative forms or powers to actual operation (ST 1a, 105.5). The same effect, however, might well be called MOTION in the sense of the Latin motus, according to which the action of the mover is motion in the subject moved (see Aristotle, Phys. 202a 13–22). This passive sense connotes the passivity of the created agent, viz, that it must receive the divine causal influence to undergo a transition from POTENCY to actual operation. Because it is not identical with its own operation, the created agent receives the divine effect that is premotion; it cannot communicate this to itself, for its passivity must be overcome by something extrinsic to itself. With the insight provided by this distinction one may avoid the error of seeing premotion as the anticipation of, or the substitute for, the creature's action. It is neither of these; rather it is the creature's passage to action. This action is the term of the premotion as this brings about the ultimate realization of the operative form, conjoining it to its actual operation. The action once begun, this formality of the creature's dependence on God ceases; the moment of action-motion ceases as the term is realized.

A merely simultaneous divine concurrence would have to be centered on the action itself, and thus would leave unexplained the agent's passage to activity. The real distinction between potency and act in regard to this activity is what causes St. Thomas to affirm: "No matter how perfect any nature, corporeal or spiritual, may be, it cannot proceed to its action unless it be moved by God" (ST 1a2ae, 109.1). And because this real distinction is found in the ontological structure of the creature, he further states that the autonomous power to move itself to act could not be conferred on any creature; this would be to transform it into the primary source of existence and act, to make it God (De pot. 3.7 ad 7).

Premotion as Prior. For St. Thomas to speak of motion is already to indicate a priority; this is what makes the term premotion itself redundant. But the priority in question must be properly understood. Actually it is a causal anteriority that permits a threefold distinction. It is verified first with reference to the action of the agent, the term of the premotion. Just as the agent itself, with its permanent operative form or power, is the cause of its own action, and thus its power is causally prior to the action, so the premotion by which the agent becomes ultimately active is causally anterior to the action. Certainly this premotion is not the temporal anticipation of the action itself.

The priority can be made more precise by reflecting on the one reality that is the agent's motion. There is a sense of priority here, but not a real priority, since the one reality cannot be prior to itself. Rather there is a conceptual priority: the connotation of origin in God's causality is prior to the connotation of the creature's passive passage to operation; the reference to God's giving is prior to the reference to the agent's receiving.

Finally, while the priority of premotion is emphasized to reject a merely simultaneous divine concurrence, it does not exclude simultaneous concurrence. God's causal influence on the agent continues during the exercise of the agent's action. For this action is a reality, and no reality perdures without God's continuing causality. But this causal influence is no longer a previous concurrence; the agent's own causal energies are actually engaged; the agent is simultaneously causing the action in subordination to the divine causality, which is thus designated simultaneous.

Premotion as Physical. This designation refers to the divine causal influence on the WILL. It does not mean that a corporeal or a compulsive necessitating impulse is exercised on the will. The connotation of the term physical is rather that, for the exercise of the will-act, man is dependent on God as first mover just as is every other created agent. The divine causal influence is received in, and exercised on, the faculty itself; the potency of the will to the exercise of its action is not overcome simply by the attraction of the object proposed by the intellect. This attraction is designated as a moral motion, in the sense that the object proposed functions as an END drawing the will and also determining the kind of act the will is to exercise. Such causality is necessary for the will to function, since the will is an APPETITE whose functioning is consequent upon knowledge; i.e., it is an elicited appetite. When, therefore, God influences the intellect to apprehend an object as good and desirable, the intellect's causality on the will-act is called a moral motion (ST 1a2ae, 9.1; 10.1–27). As has been said, it is the only antecedent causality upon the will faculty that is admitted by Molinists.

Efficient Causality. For St. Thomas, however, this moral premotion, though admittedly present, does not suffice to explain the will's activity. In his teaching, the object itself is not the efficient cause of the will's actual exercise; it remains a moral or final cause. Thus any causal influence on this level is insufficient to explain the effective exercise of activity (ST 1a, 82.2, 4; 1a2ae, 9.1; 10.2.). Because the will is in potency to actual operation, efficient (physical) causality must be exercised on the faculty itself.

In its natural choices, the will itself exercises such causality. It does so by accepting the object proposed by the judgment of reason, by following this as the last decisive practical decision to act. In so doing, it accepts not only some good to be chosen but its own act of willing, the choosing itself. The basis for this power to will or not to will is the same as the general dominion of the will over all objects of choice. The will is the faculty of human nature for its own good, its fulfillment. Every object proposed is a concrete good that contributes only to some degree to this fulfillment. Among the goods that can be chosen is the very act of choice itself. Thus the will has power over its own act, to will or not to will. When it exercises that power, it effectively causes its own act, it moves itself (ST 1a2ae, 9.3). But the exercise of this causality is the will's very act of choice. By choosing, by acting, the will causes its own act. At the point of choosing, however, the will is not identical with its choice; it is in potency to it. Like every other agent the will is subordinated to, and dependent on, God as first mover. It cannot exercise its own act; it thus cannot cause its own act, except insofar as it receives the divine causal influence, a premotion directed to the faculty itself. The influence of reason and the object proposed by the intellect do not effectively overcome the will's suspension from act. Thus the premotion required is physical.

In fact, the will is more plainly in need of divine assistance than is any other power precisely because no other mover can directly act on the will (ST 1a, 105.4; 106.2; 111.2; 1a2ae, 80.1; De malo 3.3; De ver. 22.9). With the help of God's premotion the will is reduced from potency to act; in acting, it chooses, and it chooses its own act. The premotion does not anticipate the will's act; it makes possible the act's exercise. Nor does it deprive the will of its own causality; rather, in bringing about the transition to act, it makes this causality effective. "The will, when beginning to make a new choice, is changed from its previous disposition in the sense that it was previously in potency to making a choice and then actually is making it. This change has its source in some mover, namely, in that the will moves itself to its act, and in that it is also moved by an exterior agent, namely, God. It is not moved by necessity" (De malo 6.1 ad 17).

Freedom. The last statement of this text is important in that it suggests the problem of FREEDOM and physical promotion. But the suggestion is somewhat misplaced in this context. The problem of freedom and the divine causality is more properly associated with premotion as this is also predetermination. Simply from the viewpoint of the will's need for physical premotion, there is no conflict with freedom. The will itself is truly the cause of its own act in choosing. Its acceptance of the decision of reason as final, and thus its causality of its own act, does not make this act necessary; it remains a choice. The object and the choice itself appeal to the will's thrust toward human fulfillment; they do not exhaust it, since they are concrete particular goods. When the will is actually engaged by its choice, its dominance over object and act is actualized. Thus the will, when choosing to act, is not acting under necessity but is exercising its freedom. Since, then, physical premotion does bring about the will's exercise of its own act, such promotion is not opposed to freedom. On the contrary, premotion brings this freedom to fruition in the act of choice that it causes the will to cause.

PRENDERGAST, EDMOND FRANCIS

Archbishop; b. Clonmel, County Tipperary, Ireland, May 3, 1843; d. Philadelphia, Pa., Feb. 27, 1918. Two brothers, Peter and Francis, were priests, and two of his sisters entered the religious life. One of his three priest uncles, Rev. Francis Carew of St. Rose of Lima's parish, Carbondale, Pa., arranged (1859) to have young Edmond begin his studies in the Philadelphia seminary for that diocese. He was ordained by Bp. James Wood on Nov. 17, 1865. After several assignments as curate and pastor, he became pastor of St. Malachy's, Philadelphia, and later was named vicar-general. On Feb. 24, 1897, he was consecrated auxiliary bishop of Philadelphia; he succeeded to the see and was enthroned as the third archbishop of Philadelphia on July 16, 1911.

Prendergast's 45 years as a parish priest in the archdiocese had given him a wide knowledge of personnel and parochial conditions. During his episcopate he increased the number of parishes from 297 to 327, provided parochial schools for 23,000 more children, erected the free West Catholic High School for boys, and opened the free Hallahan High School for girls. He doubled the capacity of the diocesan seminary by the additions of St. Edmond's Hall and the Archbishop Ryan Memorial Library, and he procured 13 religious communities for work in the archdiocese. He opened the Archbishop Ryan Memorial for the Training of Deaf Mutes, the Madonna House for Italian immigrants, a similar home for the Spanish-speaking immigrants, St. Francis Country Home for Convalescents, St. Edmond's Home for Crippled Children, a boarding home for working girls, and three new orphanages. He also relocated the Catholic Home for Destitute Children and St. Vincent's Home. He established the Catholic Home Bureau, sponsored the erection of the Misericordia Hospital, and provided a Catholic hospital for Allentown. At the cost of more than $250,000 he made the first major renovations of the cathedral. Under his direction the forerunner of the Newman Club was established at the University of Pennsylvania, Philadelphia.

PRESBYTER

An official in the early Christian Church. This article treats of the use of this title, first as found in the Bible, then as employed in the early postapostolic Church.

In the Bible

After a consideration of the origin of the term, a brief description will be given of the nature of the office of the Christian presbyters as found in the New Testament.

Origin of the Term. The English word presbyter is derived, through the Latin, from the Greek word πρεσβύτερος, literally "older" (the comparative of πρεσβύτερος, "old man"), but often with no comparative force, "elder." Although the English word priest is also derived from the same Greek term, in strict usage presbyter is not synonymous with priest.

The Septuagint sometimes uses the plural πρεσβύτεροι to translate the Hebrew word zeqēnīm (Ex 19.7; Nm 11.16, 24; Ru 4.2; etc.), the Old Testament elders who had authority in the Israelite community. In the New Testament this Greek word is used for the Jewish elders, the members of one of the groups in the Sanhedrin (Mt 16.21; 21.23; 26.3; etc.). Apparently it was by analogy with this Jewish usage in Palestine that the first Christians employed this term for the officials of their own community. The Hellenistic use of the term, however, for officials of certain pagan associations may also have had some influence on New Testament usage. Greek-speaking Jews of the Diaspora do not seem to have employed the term for officials of their communities before the Christian era.

Christian Presbyters in the New Testament. According to New Testament usage Christian presbyters were dignified, mature officials of the Church (1 Pt 5.1, 5) who performed functions that would now be described as both episcopal and sacerdotal. The New Testament writers use the terms πρεσβύτερος and ἐπίσκοπος interchangeably (cf. Acts 20. 17 with v. 28; Tm 1.5 with v. 7; also the variant reading in 1 Pt 5.1-2: πρεσβυτέρους . . . ἐπισκοποῦντες). It was only in the postapostolic age that these terms took on the precise technical meanings of priest and bishop.

In an efficacious liturgical rite that included the IMPOSITION OF HANDS (Acts 14.23; 1 Tm 4.14; 5.22; 2 Tm 1.6), the candidate who satisfied the Church's moral and spiritual requirements (1 Tm 3.2-7; Ti 1.6-9) was raised to the presbyterate by Apostles, such as Paul and Barnabas (Acts 14.22), or by an episcopo-presbyter, such as Timothy (1 Tm 5.22) or Titus (Ti 1.5). The authority of the presbyter was not essentially dependent on a charismatic gift; it was mediated by ordination (2 Tm 1.6; see A. Farrer, 144–45). The sacerdotal aspect of his office was especially evident in the liturgical function he performed in the breaking of bread (see J. Colson, 42–43). The presbyter, by reason of his office, ruled and gave good example to his community (Acts 20.28; 1 Pt 5.1–3; Ti 1.5), corrected abuses (Ti 1.5), was vigilant against false teachers (Acts 20.31), anointed and prayed for the sick (Jas 5.14–15), presided at the celebration of the Eucharist (Acts 2.42; 1 Cor 10.16–21), and was an authoritative teacher and arbiter of doctrine, as seen especially in the Council of Jerusalem (Acts 15.2, 4, 6, 22, 23); if he was an episcopo-presbyter like Titus, he constituted and directed fellow presbyters (Ti 1.5–6).

[J. J. O’ROURKE]

In the Early Church

The term presbyter was used also to designate the “companions of the disciples of the Savior” who handed on the oral preaching of the Apostles (Papias of Hierapolis, quoted by Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 3.39.4), as also bishops such as Papias himself and POLYCARP (Irenaeus, Adversus haereses 5.33.3). The precise meaning of the word or office it signified in the 1st and 2d centuries of the Church’s existence has been the subject of considerable discussion.

From the End of the 1st to the Mid-2d Century.

In CLEMENT I’s First Epistle to the Corinthians, c. A.D. 96, the term presbyter appears in the plural frequently. It has the meaning of “older men” to whom respect is due (1.3; 21.6), but also of priests who had been “removed from the ministry [λειτουργία] which they performed blamelessly” (44.5). Distinguishing clearly between the laity and the clergy, a reference is made to the malcontents “disloyal to the presbyters” (47.6); and they are cautioned to “submit to the presbyters” (57.1) and “be at peace with the presbyters set over the flock of Christ” (54.2). Describing the sources of authority in the Church, Clement says, “The Apostles received the Gospel from the Lord Jesus Christ . . . the Christ sent from God” and the Apostles “appointed their earliest converts [ἀπαρχαί] . . . to be bishops and deacons of the future believers” (42.1–43.1). He says the Apostles were given to understand by Christ “that the office of bishop would give rise to strife” (44.1); however, he calls those presbyters blessed “who have before now completed life’s journey, and taken their departure in mature age,” for they have “no fear of being dislodged from the place appointed to them” (44.5).

The lack of consistency in referring to the “bishops and deacons” appointed by the Apostles, and the presbyters charged with the ministry of the community, to whom obedience was due, renders it difficult to form a precise idea of the organization of the Church under Clement. It has been suggested that the terms bishop and presbyter here are interchangeable, and likewise that the Church of Rome was governed by a group or college of presbyters. This latter interpretation seems to go against the tradition registered for the Church at Rome in Irenaeus, Eusebius, and the early lists of the popes. It is certainly contrary to the organization evident in the letters of IGNATIUS OF ANTIOCH (d. before 117), in which a hierarchy is described as of “one bishop assisted by the presbytery and the deacons” (Ad Phil. 4), and “the bishop presides in the place of God while the presbyters function as the council of the Apostles” (Ad Magn. 6.1). The presbyters are subject to the bishop (Ad Ephes. 4.1, 3; Trall. 12.2); and are delegated by the bishop for the functions of celebrating the Eucharist, baptizing, and holding an AGAPE (Smyrn. 8.1, 2).

Neither the DIDACHE nor the Shepherd of HERMAS employed the word presbyter. In the mid-2d century, Justin Martyr spoke of a president of the assembly and described his function in relation to religious cult and the life of the Christian society (Apol. 1.65), but did not use the word presbyter. However, Irenaeus of Lyons, before the turn of the same century, continued the post-apostolic usage and generally employed both bishop and presbyter indiscriminately, although he did distinguish at least once between bishops and priests in the Ignatian sense (Adversus haereses 3.3.3).

The evidence thus far available indicates that in the primitive Church the word presbyter was used generically to designate men invested with authority in the local Church, and that this authority was present through apostolic institution. Likewise, at the beginning of the 2d century there existed a monarchical type of episcopate to which the other grades, including that of the presbyter, were subordinate.

From Mid-2d to End of 3d Century. Beginning with the second half of the 2d century, the function of the presbyter in the ecclesiastical hierarchy is clear and in accord with the modern use of the word priest. While CLEMENT OF ALEXANDRIA did not speak of the hierarchy as such, he did distinguish the three grades of bishop, priest, and deacon (Paed. 3.11; Strom. 3.12; 6.13). ORIGEN did the same (In Ezech. 10.1; In Ps. 37, Hom. 2.6). Among the Latin Fathers, TERTULLIAN spoke in similar fashion of the priests and deacons, who came after the bishops (De Bapt. 17) and said that in the absence of the bishop, the priest presided over the assembly and distributed the Eucharist (De corona 3). Only after his defection to Montanism (after 196) did he agitate in favor of an ascendancy of the laity over the hierarchical priesthood (De exhort. cast. 7).

At the beginning of the 3d century, the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus described the organization of the Western Church in a precise fashion; and Cyprian of Carthage did the same. Cyprian described the priests as associated in the government of the diocese, which is the task of the bishop primarily; they formed his ordinary council (Epist. 14.4) and acted for him in cases of necessity in the administration of the Eucharist and Reconciliation (De lapsis 25; Epist. 18.1). In the East, the same hierarchical structure and function of the priest is described in the Didascalia, a document of the end of the 3d century (4.1; 9.3), and in the Apostolic Constitutions, which are a reworking of the Didascalia some time later (50.2, 27).

PRESBYTERAL COUNCILS

The 1983 Code of Canon Law mandates the establishment of a presbyteral council in each diocese. According to the code, the presbyteral council “is to aid the bishop in the governance of the diocese according to the norm of law, in order that the pastoral welfare of the portion of the people of God entrusted to him may be promoted as effectively as possible” (c. 495n. 1).

The impetus for establishment of councils of this kind in Catholic dioceses throughout the world came from the Second Vatican Council intent on reforming diocesan consultative bodies, including the cathedral chapter. Lumen gentium (n. 28), Christus Dominus (n. 27) and Presbyterorum ordinis (n. 7) describe the theological relationship of presbyter to bishop as that of coworkers and friends. A circular letter of the Sacred Congregation of the Clergy (April 11, 1970) traces the development of presbyteral councils at Vatican II. In 1987, speaking in the United States, Pope John Paul II called “the development of presbyteral councils committed to the solidarity of priests with one another and with their bishop in the mission of the Universal Church,” a “most encouraging sign.”

Role and function. The intention of the 1983 Code of Canon Law is clear: the more serious matters of diocesan governance require the collective wisdom of the presbyterate acting in concert with the bishop. Specifically, the presbyteral council must be consulted on such concerns as the advisability of a diocesan synod (c. 461 n.1), the establishment of parishes (c. 515 n.2), modification of parishes (c. 1222 n.2), offerings of the faithful on the occasion of parish services (c. 531), norms for parish pastoral councils (c. 536), and imposition of a diocesan tax (c. 1263).

The code determines the membership of the council. About half of the counselors are to be elected by the presbyterate (c. 497 n.1). The others are members by reason of their position in the diocese or by reason of being appointed by the bishop.

Canon law gives the resident bishop the right “to determine the questions to be treated by [the presbyteral council] or to receive proposals from its members” (c. 500 n.1). According to the code, the bishop of the diocese presides at council meetings, but in practice it is the custom in many places for the bishop to be a participant in the discussions while the meeting is chaired by an officer of the council. The content of council discussions and resolutions may be published. Each council is to draw up its own statutes (c. 496). The council ceases when there is no diocesan bishop (c. 501 n.2) or when the bishop determines the council needs restructuring. In either case, the new bishop or the bishop after dissolving the council has one year to establish the council anew.

College of consultors. The 1983 code calls also for a College of Consultors whose members are selected from among the members of the presbyteral council (c. 502 n.1). The consultors do not have a general mandate; their responsibilities are limited to those explicitly stated in canon law, namely, the election of the diocesan administrator when the see becomes vacant (c. 421 n.1); certain duties when the office of bishop is impeded or vacant (cc. 272, 413 n.2, 419, 422, 485, 501 n.2); and designated financial duties such as the hiring of the finance officer (c.

494), consent for acts of extraordinary administration (c. 1277), and consent for the alienation of certain ecclesiastical property (c. 1292 n.1).

The College of Consultors is to have between six and twelve members, serving for a five-year term. In some smaller dioceses the members of the Presbyteral Council are the same as those of the College of Consultors.

PRESBYTERIAN CHURCHES IN THE UNITED STATES

Adherents of the Reformed (Calvinist) Church tradition implanted in Scotland under the name Presbyterian (Gr. presbyteros, the elder, an officer of the Jewish synagogue at Jerusalem before A.D. 70, then of the Christian congregations) and thereafter in other English-speaking countries and mission territories. The title denotes church government by elected representatives, in contrast with congregational government, and episcopacy, or government by bishops. Historically, Reformed Churches were Continental, and Presbyterian were British and North American.

Origin and Historical Development. Presbyterianism came to North America first as an interpretation of church order held by certain Puritan colonists in Massachusetts, against Increase and Cotton MATHER of Boston, who taught that church authority belonged solely to congregations. Solomon Stoddard (1643–1729) of Northampton, Mass., organized congregations in associations possessing authority to examine and ordain candidates for the ministry and determine disputes within or between congregations. Governing power in regional bodies, called presbyteries, is a distinctive mark of Presbyterianism; this usually includes the right to ordain, install, discipline, and remove ministers and governing (lay) elders of congregations; to establish discipline, refute error, remedy schism, and receive and determine appeals from congregations; to maintain a corporation for holding property; and to attend to the general spiritual welfare of the congregations in the membership of the presbytery. Although presbyteries are not sacerdotal in character, they may be compared with bishops, and they may be described as a form of corporate episcopacy.

Presbytery of Philadelphia, Pa. For a century Presbyterians lived on the seaboard and the Appalachian hinterland; after 1800 they moved west. Presbyterian church history in the U.S. is marked by major steps of reorganization, schism, and reunion.

Early Schism. The Presbytery of Philadelphia was composed of some clergy schooled in the Puritan piety of Old and New England and others formed in the controversies of the Church of Scotland. Scotland had just emerged from an epoch of bitter strife with the Church of England and had enforced strict Calvinist orthodoxy on its clergy as a defense against LATITUDINARIANISM. In 1729 the clergy of Philadelphia enacted an Adopting Act, declaring the WESTMINSTER CONFESION of faith—composed by the Westminster Assembly of Puritan divines in England (1646), adopted by the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland (1647) and by the English Parliament (1648)—to be the confession of the new American church. Its ministers were required to subscribe to it. Dispute concerning the strictness or permissiveness of this measure was continuous until 1741, when rigorists of Scottish background expelled a core of Presbyterian clergy led by Gilbert Tennent of Freehold, N.J. Tennent’s father was training ministers at a woodland academy at Neshaminy, Pa.; he was formed in the Puritan tradition of personal religion and had been a leader of the revival.

REVIVALISM is popularly associated with John and Charles WESLEY; in fact, the earliest outbreak of the GREAT AWAKENING occurred in New Jersey in Dutch Reformed and Presbyterian congregations about 1730. Gilbert Tennent and his associates protested against religious formalism, unspirituality, and materialism, and preached with a view to arousing consciences, renewing conviction, and strengthening Christian obedience. Their doctrine was orthodox, but they attacked their opponents as unconverted and unspiritual; they preached in parishes, training and ordaining ministers in the presbytery they controlled. The revival was immensely successful in winning volunteers for the ministry.

The schism of 1741, a consequence chiefly of revivalism, ended in 1758 with reunion of the Old Side (subscriptionist) and New Side (revivalist) Presbyterian churches. Tennent apologized for his excesses; yet the revival proved to be the vital force of the times. Led by Jonathan Dickinson of Elizabethtown, N.J., a friend of the revival, the New Side body had established the College of New Jersey (Princeton University) in 1746. Under a succession of able leaders, such as John WITHERSPOON, the college trained Presbyterian clergymen until the separate establishment in 1811 of Princeton Theological Seminary.

After the establishment of the new republic, the southern and westward movement of Presbyterianism called for new steps of organization. Although it originally consisted of a single presbytery, by 1758 Presbyterianism had nine, extending from the New York area to Virginia and west into the valleys of the Alleghenies. In 1788 the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church in the U.S. was founded, uniting 16 presbyteries and four intermediate bodies or synods in a single national church extending from New York to Kentucky and the Carolinas. Ministers had increased from seven in 1706 to 177.

To assist the new settlements on the frontier, the Presbyterians formed a board (1816) authorized to organize, finance, and direct the mission to the west, reporting annually to the General Assembly. On a similar basis other agencies were established—theological seminaries, boards for education (1818), foreign mission (1831–37), academies and colleges, and a highly organized and effective system for promoting the interests of the Church.

Later Divisions. The second major division of American Presbyterianism (1810) was a consequence of the stresses of westward expansion and resulted in the founding of the Cumberland Presbyterian Church. A second wave of revival, first in Virginia (1790), then in Kentucky, had multiplied congregations greatly by 1810. Ministers were few in Kentucky, and the revival overtaxed the power of the College of New Jersey to supply the new congregations. Methodists and Baptists solved their problem by ordaining preachers with spiritual gifts, but little education, and assigning them to circuits, i.e., groups of congregations to be visited periodically. Presbyterians preferred a well-educated, settled ministry. Suspicious of the doctrinal reliability of untrained men, seaboard Presbyterians would not permit freer ordination; they were unable to supply clergy, and the Cumberland Presbytery revolted in 1810. The new church flourished, attaining a large membership by 1906, when the majority merged with the Presbyterian Church. Two continuing Cumberland Presbyterian churches remained, one white, the other predominantly African-American.

The third major division of Presbyterianism (1837) involved a complex range of issues: doctrinal controversy between rationalistic Calvinism (the Old School), fostered by such leaders as Charles HODGE of Princeton Seminary, and adherents of the New England Theology of Nathaniel TAYLOR and Samuel Hopkins (the New School); a trend toward denominationalism, specific for Presbyterians in the breakup of a plan of cooperation (the Plan of Union of 1801) with the CONGREGATIONALISTS that had united mission effort on the frontier while, according to its critics, introducing doctrinal error; an internal struggle for ecclesiastical power between the two parties; and the early stages of the sectional schism between North and South. The Old School party won the southern clergy by agreeing to exclude slavery from ecclesiastical discussion; the New School was generally abolitionist, more pragmatic than theological in orientation, and opposed to rigid discipline. After 20 years of friction (1818–37), the Old School captured control of the major action agencies established in the first quarter of the century, made its peace with southern Presbyterians, and expelled its critics.

Efforts at Reunion. The national sectional dispute did no further harm to this divided and realigned Presbyterianism until the Civil War broke out. Socially quiescent until President Abraham Lincoln called upon the nation to oppose the secession, the Old School then declared for national unity, and the Presbyterian Church of the Confederacy took shape immediately (1862). The small Southern branch of the New School that had existed since 1837 joined this body in 1864. After the Southern defeat, the Southern denomination became The Presbyterian Church in the U.S. By 1870 it had assembled certain independent Presbyterian groupings in Kentucky and Missouri.

American weariness with strife aided the movement of reunion in the North, however, and the schism of 1837 ended (1869–70) with the reunion of the northern Old and New School under the original name (1788), Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. Insistence on doctrinal conformity was tacitly yielded by conservatives, but the organizational structure developed by the Old School before and during the schism became permanent. The trend toward denominational separatism yielded to concern for ecumenism and the Presbyterians entered into a variety of interdenominational groups: the World Presbyterian Alliance, formed in 1872; the Federal Council of Churches of Christ, formed in 1908 and absorbed into the NATIONAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST in the U.S.A. in 1950; and the WORLD COUNCIL OF CHURCHES (1948). Efforts for reunification of Presbyterianism were continued, with measurable success: Calvinist Methodist (Welsh) and some German groups were absorbed; in 1958, following failure of a plan for a three-way union that would have included the southern Presbyterians, the United Presbyterian Church of North America (1858–1958) merged with the Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A. (1788–1958) to form the United Presbyterian Church in the U.S.A.

The United Presbyterian Church of North America was formed in 1858 from two Scottish traditions of dissent from the Church of Scotland: the Covenanters of 1638 and the Seceders (official title: Associate Synod) of 1733. These Presbyterians originally imported Scottish disputes as the basis of their distinctness from one another, but these gradually lost their influence; in 1858 the United Presbyterian Church of North America was formed.

In 1982, the Southern and Northern churches were finally reunited, when the Presbyterian Church in the United States (PCUS) joined with the United Presbyterian Church of North America (UPCNA) to form the Presbyterian Church (U.S.A.). This healed the formal separation that began during the Civil War and lasted for 122 years. In 1988, the national headquarters of the united church was moved to Louisville, Ky., from the Southern Church's Atlanta headquarters and the Northern Church's New York offices.

PRESBYTERIANISM

One of the earliest, most influential, and enduring forms of Protestantism, essentially a system of ecclesiastical polity, namely, the government of the church by presbyters. In a larger sense, however, it connotes the theology, liturgy, and discipline that stem from John CALVIN and as such constitutes the general tradition in Protestantism called "Reformed." This entry surveys the origins, history and significant developments in the evolution of Presbyterianism in Europe.

The specific designation "presbyterian" derives from the Greek presbuteros, the "elder." The presbyter's function in the New Testament church provided a model for the Calvinist ideal of a reformed church that would be neither tyrannical nor anarchical. Calvin sought, by divine warrant, to avoid the two extremes of episcopal authoritarianism and congregational egalitarianism. The entire subsequent history of Presbyterianism can almost be summarized as the struggle to maintain and extend this scripturally based balance in church order.

By definition pre-Calvinist, Presbyterianism traces its origins to the OT, where the tradition of elders in Israel provided an obvious working pattern for the first Christian communities of the NT. The occasional references to elders (presbuteroi) and especially the apparent equivalence of that term with “overseers” (episcopoi) established a sufficient scriptural basis for the later Calvinist elaboration of an integral presbyterian polity. Nevertheless, the fact that neither Calvin nor the earliest Reformed churches stemming from him ever really insisted on the claims of presbyterianism to be the only polity with a scriptural sanction lessens the problem of the continuity of the presbyterian system through the centuries that extended from the apostolic age to the Reformation. Practically, then, Presbyterian history begins with Calvin.

Calvinist Origins. The Reformation in the Swiss cantons was already well under way when Calvin arrived in Geneva in 1536. Yet the intellectual eminence of his theology as evidenced in his INSTITUTES and the practical acumen of his organizational directives as seen in his Ecclesiastical Ordinances secured for him an ascendancy not only in Geneva but in Protestantism. Under his leadership Geneva became the “Protestant Rome,” the model and training center of Reformed religion. Skillfully adapting biblical prescriptions to the circumstances of an autonomous, republican city-state, Calvin devised a system of church government that incorporated four basic features: (1) the autonomy of the church—independence from the state and competence to administer its own internal discipline; (2) the unity of the church—interdependence of the individual local congregations in a graded series of disciplinary courts, or judicatories; (3) the parity of ministers—corporate uniformity of clerical power substantiating the presbytery and its varied functions; and (4) the representation of the people—ratification by the laity of the clerical power and functions. All four features were thus mutually integrated and geared toward the ultimate realization of a church wholly incorporated in Christ.

The implementation of this Calvinist scheme was never complete, even in Geneva. Calvin had to accede to the demand of the secular magistrates that they share formally in the appointment of the elders—the lay members who were to complement the dual commission of the clerical ministers to preach the Word and administer the sacraments by their own dual commission to rule (i.e., legislate and enforce discipline) and care for the sick (and other temporalities). Moreover, a certain Genevan character remained impressed on all subsequent presbyterian polities: an aristocratic, homogeneous body, with a curious proclivity toward ERASTIANISM or sectarianism, or both. Not surprisingly, perhaps, an authentic Calvinist presbyterianism never succeeded in displacing the earlier and looser Zwinglianism as the dominant Protestant form in Switzerland.

Growth of Presbyterianism. In the other German-speaking lands Calvinism was likewise a late arrival; but within the lifetime of the founder it became a considerable force, particularly in the Palatinate. In 1563 the Heidelberg Catechism appeared and in 1566 the Second Helvetic Confession, two of the most influential documents in the Reformed tradition. A well-knit presbyterian system posed as much of a threat to the Lutheran territorial churches as to the Catholic Church, and this complicated the situation that eventually led to the THIRTY YEARS' WAR. In spite of the toleration finally secured for it at the Peace of WESTPHALIA—perhaps because of it—German Calvinism lapsed into a quiescence in which, after some 200 years, it was practically absorbed into the prevailing Lutheranism. Meanwhile in Eastern Europe the originally fast-growing Calvinism was effectively countered by a revitalized Catholicism under Hapsburg auspices. Of these German and eastern Reformed churches, the one that best survived the Catholic dominance of the 17th century, the “enlightened” laxity of the 18th, and the interconfessional confusion of the 19th has been that of Hungary, where a presbyterian Calvinism is still a vigorous minority.

Although Calvin's initial success lay in German-speaking Strassburg, while his initial plea to Francis I was a failure, his interest in his native France never flagged. Both Catholic and Protestant appreciated the centrality of this greatest kingdom in Christendom; and if the Catholics succeeded in maintaining possession of the crown and the majority of the nation, the Protestants, spearheaded from Geneva, proceeded with skill and momentum to build a powerfully based minority. The first Reformed, or Huguenot, congregation was established in 1555; by 1559 there were enough to justify the adoption of a Gallican Confession and the establishment of a national synod. This first presbyterian church on a nationwide scale was likewise the first to be organized according to a Calvin-inspired series of pyramided judicatories: the local congregations, or consistories (more commonly called sessions), forming regional colloquies (or presbyteries), which in turn were grouped into provincial synods (or simply synods), which finally reached a national unity in the National Synod (or General Assembly). The long politico-religious war that almost inevitably resulted from this organized rupture in French society ended (Edict of NANTES, 1598) practically where it began: a Catholic majority and a Protestant minority facing each other in an uneasy truce. Political absolutism (revocation of the Edict of Nantes, 1685) and cultural secularism (the Enlightenment) successively reduced the extent of that Protestant minority; but largely because of their tough presbyterian polity, the Huguenots retain a permanent position in France.

Already strongly affected by Lutheran and Anabaptist influences from Germany, the Netherlands quickly responded to the later and more organized impulses of Calvinism coming from France and the Palatinate. In 1566 a synod in Antwerp adopted the Belgic Confession, composed some years earlier by Guy de Brès, and published in Dutch in the Heidelberg Catechism. In the following years, while Spain pursued a policy of stern repression, refugees in Wesel and Emden organized the Dutch Reformed Church along the same lines as the Reformed Church of France. The declaration of independence of the United Provinces of the North introduced the ambiguous Church-State relationship that would remain a permanent feature of the new Dutch nation. Under the stress of the Spanish war the Calvinist religion assumed an increasingly "established" character, while the Estates-General assumed an increasingly ecclesiastical competence. This ambiguity was compounded by the Arminian controversy, which broke out in 1609 after the Spanish truce, and was finally resolved—in favor of rigid "orthodox" Calvinism—in 1619 by state intervention at the Synod of Dort. In spite of their numerical majority and political dominance, the Dutch Presbyterians underwent much the same vicissitudes in the subsequent centuries as did their coreligionists elsewhere on the Continent (see CONFESSIONS OF FAITH, PROTESTANT; REFORMED CHURCHES).

English, Scottish, and Irish Presbyterianism.

While the militant ecclesiasticism called the Reformed religion was taking over the vanguard of Continental Protestantism, another wing of the movement was finding its greatest opportunity yet—and its greatest ultimate success—in the British Isles. England appeared precluded from direct Calvinist inroads by its formidably state-dominated and instinctively conservative Established Church. Scotland, on the other hand, presented a vacuum. Remote, feudal, and beset by a succession of royal minorities, the country was disunited and pressured by the alien, competing interests of England and France. In 1560, under the driving leadership of John KNOX, the Reformed Church of Scotland was officially inaugurated by the parliamentary approval of the First Scottish Confession and by the convocation of the first General Assembly of the Kirk, in which a Book of Discipline was adopted. The revised Genevan liturgy of the Book of Common Order completed the formulation of the Scottish Reformation in 1564, by which time the efforts of MARY STUART, the young widowed queen, to restore Catholicism had manifestly failed. Although Knox's Kirk was disposed to tolerate bishops as possibly useful superintendents, a rigid presbyterian reaction, claiming an exclusive scriptural sanction, was launched by Andrew MELVILLE in 1574 and codified in a Second Book of Discipline in 1581. Episcopacy thus became the classic point at issue between the churches of Scotland and England in the politico-religious crisis that became immediate in 1603 when both countries recognized the sovereignty of a common crown.

Despite the original harrying of radical Protestants under Henry VIII, both the momentum and the ambiguity of his schism indirectly favored the introduction of an integral Protestantism. The dominantly Lutheran and Zwinglian influence gradually yielded to the Calvinist in the course of Edward VI's reign, and this trend was confirmed by the sojourn of the Marian exiles principally in Frankfurt and Geneva. If on Mary's death it was clear that a schismatic Anglicanism would be politically reestablished, it was equally clear that this establishment would be strongly bent theologically toward Calvinism. This fact of a common theology, however, only intensified the quarrel over polity that the anonymous Admonition to Parliament brought to a head in 1572. Demanding a full-scale renovation of the liturgical and organizational fabric of the national church, and encouraged by the antiroyalist example of the Huguenots and the Scots, the "Precisians," or "PURITANS," as they were called, were repressed by Elizabeth I and her bishops as dangerous subversives. On their part the Puritans were not unanimously agreed regarding the right order in Church and State. The majority, led by Thomas CARTWRIGHT, advocated a formal presbyterian polity on a nationwide scale; only a minority as yet tended toward the Separatism (or Congregationalism) that would disestablish the church and dissolve it into independent local congregations.

The accession of the Stuarts signaled an ecclesiastical crisis in both kingdoms. In 1603 James I refused the millenary petition for certain Puritan reforms; in 1610 he reintroduced bishops into the Kirk. Against this alliance of high church Anglicanism and divine-right monarchy there coalesced an alliance of Puritans and parliament men, and under Charles I the inevitable crisis came. In 1638 the Scottish General Assembly abolished episcopacy and solemnly adopted the National League and Covenant. In 1641 the English Long Parliament began discussing a reformation of "root and branch." In 1643 an Assembly of Divines of the dominant presbyterian party met in Westminster to formulate the new religious settlement for all three British kingdoms. The result of their four years of labor was the remarkable collection of documents that have been the standards of all English-speaking Presbyterians ever since: the WESTMINSTER CONFESSION, the Larger and Shorter Catechisms, the Directory of Public Worship, and the Form of Church Government. Ironically, the Westminster Standards were at the time successfully adopted only in Scotland, where they supplanted the earlier formularies of Knox. In England the brief Presbyterian triumph succumbed to the congregational Puritans, then called Independents, who abolished the monarchy and the state church. This revolutionary force could not survive Oliver CROMWELL, and the immediate reaction in 1660 meant not only the restoration of king and bishops but also the "Great Ejection" of the Presbyterian clergy. Thereafter, in spite of toleration secured by the Revolution of 1688 and the partial revival of Calvinist principles by the eventual Evangelical Movement, Presbyterianism as such retained but a small minority in England.

Outside England, in Wales and Scotland, where the LATITUDINARIANISM of the 18th century was less marked, the residual Calvinism of the early Reformation kept its vigor. In Wales this took the form of a revival, under the leadership of Howell HARRIS (1735), that anticipated and subsequently fused with John WESLEY's movement. Like Wesley, Harris had at first no intention of leaving the established Anglican Church. Only when his "societies" were proscribed did he ordain his own ministers and, in 1811, organize a regular Presbyterian church. The Calvinist Methodist Church of Wales was structured like the Scottish, with which otherwise it has no connection: local societies (sessions) formed monthly meetings (presbyteries) and quarterly associations (synods) and finally a general assembly. In Scotland, meanwhile, the Kirk had been reestablished (1690); but the Patronage Act of 1712 introduced an Erastian irritant that provoked a series of secessions and partial reunions. The divisions, however, were jurisdictional, not doctrinal; and the basic Presbyterian polity was never substantially modified in any of them.

Of almost equal significance with Scotland in the history of Presbyterianism was Ireland. From the first years of the 17th century a royal policy of promoting plantations in the conquered island gave rise to an immigration of Scottish Presbyterians to Ulster. When the native Irish revolted in 1641, the Ulstermen, or "Scotch-Irish," replied by forming a church of their own, a militant Presbyterianism modeled on the Kirk, and equally opposed to the Catholicism of the national majority and to the Anglicanism of the government. Although the victory of William of Orange over James II at the Boyne was a triumph for Ulster, nevertheless the Scotch-Irish felt neglected and discriminated against by the government at Whitehall. One reaction was the decidedly conservative trend of the two synods that later united in 1840 to form the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of Ireland; another was the emigration of many Ulstermen to America. Beginning even before 1688, they were laying the foundations of Presbyterianism in the future United States.

Seeing their church as a mean between the authoritarian and the anarchical, Presbyterians view it also as both an individual, autonomous entity and a constituent part of a larger whole. The first large-scale and lasting ecumenical achievement within Protestantism, the Alliance of the Reformed Churches throughout the World Holding the Presbyterian Order, established in 1875, represents 90 churches and nearly 50 million members. Through and beyond this world alliance, as well as participation in the World Council of Churches, Presbyterian Churches have committed themselves to the eventual realization of a Christian universality.

PRESCRIPTION, THEOLOGICAL USE OF

Prescription is a legal term to express one way of acquiring property or extinguishing a debt. Natural law, as well as civil law, acknowledges that the public good requires that long possession of property or long failure by a creditor to claim a debt should be a title to property or a release from liability for debt. Moral theology accepts this position, stipulating that unless the civil law's ruling be effective in conscience, the public good would suffer harm. However, it imposes the conditions that the civil law's requirements be observed and that the beneficiary should throughout have good faith, which means that a person who knows that a property belongs to another or who culpably fails to pay a debt cannot by prescription acquire the property or be released from liability.

Tertullian (De praescriptione haereticorum, c. A.D. 200) transferred this juridical notion to theology, in order to prove that the teaching that the Church was its rightful possession from the time of the Apostles, from whom it received the teaching. Since his time this argument has been regularly used by theologians.

The nature of the argument is seen from its use. As in law, legitimate possession can be proved either by direct documentary evidence or by prescription, so too in theology Church teaching may similarly be proved. As in law, prescription is a legal title founded on long possession, so too in theology the long possession of a doctrine by the Church may give the Church a title to that teaching, i.e., be a proof that the teaching is an original possession of the Church.

The strict argument from tradition is that in which evidence is drawn from the records of tradition that a particular teaching has been faithfully transmitted from the Apostles to subsequent Christians. It is a difficult and long process, and sometimes impossible in that records going back right to the Apostles may be lacking. In these circumstances, the proof by prescription may be used. Since the early Church was extremely tenacious of tradition, novelty being strongly resisted, this argument gains in power. It may be propounded either as a purely historical argument or as a theological one. As a theological argument, the Church's infallibility is invoked to bring about the conclusion that what the Church has long held to be revealed must be revealed—otherwise the Church would be in error. As a historical argument, the inherent improbability of a large number of people over a long period coinciding in the same error is invoked. In either case, the conclusion is the same: the undisturbed possession by the Church over a long period of some doctrine is a sure, though indirect, proof of its truth.

As an example, the belief in seven Sacraments may be cited. Although it was 1150 before the strict definition of a Sacrament was given, and that only in the West, nevertheless the Eastern Churches not in communion with Rome—the Orthodox who broke with the West in 1054 and the Nestorians and Monophysites who broke away in 431 and 451—all hold the belief in seven Sacraments and have done so over a long period. This fact alone proves the Church's prescriptive right to this teaching.

PRESENCE OF GOD, PRACTICE OF

A spiritual exercise in which a person cultivates a habit of recalling the presence of God, with silent acts of love, without interrupting one's other occupations. Although, in a strict sense, placing oneself in the presence of God is an act of the intellect, one does this in order to raise the heart to Him in acts of adoration, love, contrition, etc. While a purely speculative exercise is not a prayer, the simple averting to God by an act of faith is a prayer, for it involves the will as well as the intellect.

The doctrinal basis for the practice is the presence of God in all things by His immensity, the divine indwelling, and the Eucharistic presence. Through His immensity, God is present in a threefold manner: by His power, inasmuch as all things are subject to His domain; by His presence, inasmuch as all things are bare and open to His eyes; by His essence, inasmuch as He is present to all things as the cause of their being (cf. Acts 17.28). God is present in the souls of the just through grace: "if anyone love me, he will keep my word, and my Father will love him, and we will come to him and make our abode with Him" (Jn 14.25). Also, in the Eucharist Jesus Christ is present, true God and true man.

One can respond to these modes of God's presence in different ways. By looking at, or considering, sensible creatures, as, for example, the sun, the stars, the flowers, one can raise his mind to God, who is present in these, and in all things, by His immensity. Or one may practice the "imaginative" presence by looking at a picture of Christ or by summoning up to the imagination an image of Christ as being present here and now. Further, one may practice the "intellectual" presence of God by thinking of Him with the aid of reason enlightened by faith, with little or no use of a particular image. Thus, one makes an act of faith in God's presence by His immensity or by the divine indwelling. Too, one can practice the "affective" presence of God, turning the will toward Him as present here, or one can make an act of "spiritual communion" by willing to receive Christ, who is present in the Eucharist.

Intellectual and affective acts of God's presence are inseparable. The former without the latter would be mere speculation, and the affective act is not possible without at least a fleeting thought of God. Thus, the exercise of the presence of God, like formal mental prayer, terminates in the act of the will. All types of practice of God's presence are useful in that they turn the mind to God. The affective, rather than the intellectual element should be fostered. If the affective element prevails, the will moves the mind easily to think of God, even when the mind is primarily occupied with some other subject.

The cultivation of this practice is recommended by the saints and other spiritual authorities. It helps one to acquire a firm will in the presence of temptation. It arouses a horror of sin, a strong desire to practice virtue, and a continual desire to serve and love God.

PRESENT, THE

In common usage taken in its secondary sense to mean an interval of time coextensive with this minute, this hour, or today. Purged of its crudities, the so-called specious present roughly corresponds to the minimal present immediately perceivable. The present as presented event is central in the making of the triadic continuum of past-present-future. In its primary sense, present signifies the punctiform now, distinguishing and linking past and future segments on the time-line. This existential present limits past and future; beyond it lies no part of the past, within it nothing of the future. As a divisor, the present must be indivisible. Were it a divisible common term, one of its parts would include something of the past, another something of the future. Without a divisor that cannot be divided, past and future would interfuse in an irrational m \grave{e} lange. The existential present both divides and continues the parts of TIME. It is formally divisive because from the now, precisely as other, emanates actual otherness, the distinction of part from part in time. It is materially continuative, so far as the perduring identity of the now bears no essential reference to the plurality and diversity that are the properties of time.

PRESENTATION, SISTERS OF MARY OF THE

(SMP, Official Catholic Directory #2450) A community with papal approbation (1959) whose motherhouse is in Broons, C \hat{o} tes-du-Nord, France. The congregation was founded in 1828 by Rev. Joachim Fleury for the purpose of engaging in teaching, nursing, and other works of charity. The suppressions and confiscations carried out by the anticlerical government in France in 1902 caused the sisters to seek new foundations in other parts of Europe and in North America. They came to the U.S. in 1903 and established their novitiate in Spring Valley, Ill. The U.S. provincialate is in Valley City, ND. In the U.S., the sisters are engaged in academic education, catechetics, hospitals, homecare ministries, parish ministries, and social outreach.

PRESENTATION BROTHERS

The popular name for the Brothers of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary (FPM), a congregation of brothers whose principal ministry is the education of children and youth. In 1802 a mitigation in the Penal Laws, which had outlawed Catholic education in Ireland, permitted Edmund RICE, the founder, to open a school in Waterford for poor boys. He and a few companions began to lead a religious life according to the constitutions of the recently founded Sisters of the PRESENTATION OF MARY of Cork. In 1809 they took vows and were henceforth called Presentation Brothers. Schools were then opened in other cities. In 1821 Rice and a majority of the brothers voted to adopt the rule of the CHRISTIAN BROTHERS of St. John Baptist de LA SALLE. Thus originated the IRISH CHRISTIAN BROTHERS, whose first superior general was Rice. A few of the brothers, led by Brother Michael Augustine Riordan chose to remain with the original Cork community. Other brothers joined Riordan and continued to live according to the original Presentation rule. Each house was autonomous in regard to personnel and finances, and was subject to the local bishop. In 1889, however, the Holy See approved an amendment to the constitutions that allowed central government. Papal approbation was formally granted in 1899. Subsequently, the brothers expanded from Ireland into England, Canada, United States, the West Indies, Peru, and Ghana. The general motherhouse is at Mount St. Joseph, Cork, Ireland. In the U.S., the brothers have houses in Kissimmee, FL and Knoxville, TN.

PRESENTATION OF MARY

The only reliable and pertinent source concerning the presentation of Mary, mother of Jesus, in the Temple by her parents is the Mosaic Law; the apocrypha speak in detail of her birth and presentation, but with no definite historical basis.

Firstborn males were necessarily dedicated to God (Ex 13.12–16), and at the time of Jesus this was done by a ceremony in the Temple (Lk 2.22; see PURIFICATION OF “Presentation of the Virgin in the Temple,” oil on canvas painting by Titian, 1538.

MARY). Since the firstborn of humans and beasts were to be in general consecrated to God (Ex 13.1–2), there may have developed some pious custom of bringing firstborn girls to the Temple with the mother as she performed her duty of purification (Lv 12.5–8). When a woman gave birth to a daughter she was to spend 80 days in seclusion, after which she must present herself to the priest in the Temple with an offering of a yearling lamb as a thanksgiving holocaust and a pigeon or turtledove as a sin offering.

The apocrypha indicate that Mary was presented in the Temple as the result of a vow made by her parents rather than because of a law or universal custom. The Protoevangelium of James (7.1–2) has it that Joachim and Anna agreed to fulfill their vow only after Mary was three years old, lest the child be immature and long for her parents. She was then left in the Temple for permanent residence and applied herself more diligently than did the other virgins. According to the Gospel of Pseudo-Matthew (4), when Mary was three years of age her parents took her to stay in the Temple; at the gates she was so eager that she ran up the steps without ever looking back and never asked for her parents as would an ordinary child. It must be chiefly from the apocryphal accounts that there has arisen a special interest in Mary’s presentation as a symbol of self-offering and dedication to the spiritual life. The feast was not finally extended to the universal Church until 1585, by Pope Sixtus V.

The presentation of Mary has been a favorite subject of Christian iconography from the Middle Ages on. Thus, for example, Giotto di Bondone, Domenico Ghirlandaio, Titian, and Tintoretto all painted their interpretations of the apocryphal material.

PRESENTATION OF MARY, SISTERS OF THE

(PM, Official Catholic Directory, #3310); founded in France on Nov. 21, 1796, by Anne Marie Rivier. Despite the upheaval of the French Revolution, with its dispersal of religious orders and confiscation of property, by 1805, Madame Rivier, as she was called, had opened 20 schools throughout France in an effort to counteract the spiritual decline caused by the Revolution.

The congregation, which enjoys papal approbation, established its motherhouse in Bourg-Saint-Andeol, France, on the right bank of the Rhone. Houses of the Presentation of Mary were founded in France, England, Spain, Portugal, Italy, Switzerland, and the Madeira Islands. In 1853 the sisters went to Canada. From Canada, in 1873 they entered the U.S., where they maintained provincial houses at Manchester, NH, and at Methuen, MA. Besides teaching, the sisters are engaged in catechetics, healthcare, retreats and spiritual direction, care for the young and elderly, youth ministries, pastoral ministries and social outreach. The generalate is in Castel Gandolfo, Italy.

PRESENTATION OF THE BLESSED VIRGIN MARY, SISTERS OF THE

A congregation (PBVM, Official Catholic Directory #3320 for the U.S. foundations, #3330 for the Irish foundations) of religious women begun in 1775 by Honoria (Nano) NAGLE, in Cork, Ireland. Because the Penal Laws banned the Catholic education of youth, Miss Nagle resolved to devote her life and fortune to the education of poor children. She began her noviceship with three companions in Douglas Street, Cork; on June 24, 1776, they received the habit of the newly established community to which Nano gave the title, Sisters of Charitable Instruction of the Sacred Heart of Jesus. One year later the novices pronounced their vows in the presence of Bp. John Butler of Cork, who appointed Nano, now Mother Mary of St. John of God, as superior of the community, which she directed for seven years.

During her years as superior Mother St. John examined the rules of three orders and, meanwhile, on Oct. 30, 1779, she accepted temporarily the rule drawn up by the curé of Saint Sulpice. Before she reached a final decision in this matter, Mother St. John died (1784) and was succeeded by Sister Angela Collins. Shortly afterward Bp. Francis Moylan and Rev. Lawrence Callanan of Cork drew up constitutions based on the Rule of St. Augustine; these were completed in 1793 and approved by Pius VI; final approbation was granted by Pius VII in 1805. The society was renamed Sisters of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary.

The special purpose of the congregation is to educate the young, and to minister to the sick, elderly, dispoessed and marginalized. Each motherhouse of the congregation is independent, but all are united in the observance of the same rule and traditions and in the recognition of the same foundress. The expansion of the Sisters of the Presentation included foundations in England, North America, Asia, Oceania and Africa. The first filiation from the motherhouse in Cork was established in the Kerry diocese, and the second in Dublin. In 1833 the first Presentation establishments were made in Newfoundland and England. Madras, India, received its first foundation in 1841. In 1875 the community was established in Australia, and by 1886, in Tasmania. Other foundations include Zimbabwe (1949); New Zealand (1950); and the Philippines (1960).

The first U.S. foundation was established in San Francisco in 1854. In the U.S., Presentation Sisters are engaged in education, youth ministries, campus ministries, parish ministries, healthcare, nursing, chaplaincies, care of the elderly and disabled, pastoral ministries, social outreach, retreats and spiritual direction. Since 1953 the U.S. Presentation houses have been amalgamated in the North American Conference of Presentation Sisters (Official Catholic Directory #3320). In addition to the U.S. foundations, a number of Irish foundations sent their members to the U.S. beginning in the 1950s to supplement the efforts of the U.S. foundations. In 1989, the Irish sisters established the U.S. Province of the Union of Sisters of the Presentation of the Blessed Virgin Mary (Official Catholic Directory #3330).

At the beginning of the 21st century, there were more than 1600 sisters in Australia, Papua New Guinea, Thailand, Africa, China, New Zealand, the Philippines, Latin America, India, Pakistan, North America, England, Ireland and Slovakia. In 1991, the Society of Australian Presentation Sisters, the Union of Sisters of the Presentation and the North American Conference of the Presentation Sisters established the International Presentation Association (IPA), with its headquarters in New York City, as a vehicle to promote international collaboration in joint projects and sharing of resources.

PRESTER JOHN

Legendary ruler of a Christian kingdom in the East. The name of Prester (priest) John appears first in 1145, in the chronicle of Otto of Freising, where John is described as a Christian king reigning "in the Far East, beyond Persia and Armenia," the vanquisher of the Moslem kings of Iran. It was hoped he would come to the aid of the Holy Land. The victory alluded to here was actually that of the Khan of the Kara-Khitay over the Seljuk King of Persia (1141). But the name "Prester John" was certainly in use prior to 1141 and doubtless designated the Christian emperor of Ethiopia, whose existence was vaguely known in Palestine. After the victory of 1141, the Christian West tended to localize the kingdom of Prester John in the Indies. An apocryphal letter, widely disseminated from 1165 on, from this ruler to the Byzantine Emperor Manuel I Comnenus made Prester John the guardian of the tomb of the Apostle Thomas in Mylapore.

In the 13th century, John's name was interspersed throughout the West's information on the Mongol conquest. A text disseminated c. 1220 made Genghis Khan, under the name "King David," the son of Prester John and a Christian as well. Later it was supposed by some that Genghis Khan had destroyed the kingdom of Prester John, a kingdom identified by some with that of one of the Christian peoples in Central Asia, the Kéraït, or the Naimans; and by others believed to be a kingdom located in India. The latter group further believed that the kingdom had escaped the Mongol conquest thanks to the miraculous intervention of the three royal Magi, or Wise Men, whose heir Prester John was reputed to be. Finally, John of Monte Corvino affirmed that Ongüt, king of the Turks, was the descendant of Prester John.

Another tradition, however, persisted in identifying Prester John with the emperor of Ethiopia; and when Western Christendom actually came into direct contact with this emperor in the 14th century, he seemed willing to seize the Muslim states from the rear in order to back up the Crusades and to aid in freeing the Holy Land. And so the name of Prester John survived until the 17th century.

PRESTON, THOMAS (ROGER WIDDRINGTON)

Theologian who defended James I in his quarrel with the pope; b. c. 1567, Shropshire(?), England; d. 1640, London. He was educated at Oxford and the English College, Rome, where he was ordained. He entered the Benedictines at Monte Cassino and was professed in 1592. He soon acquired the reputation of learning as a theologian and was chosen to be one of the first two Benedictine missionaries to England, arriving there in 1603. By 1605 he had become friendly with the Anglican Archbishop of Canterbury, Richard Bancroft, and later, with his two successors, George Abbot and William Laud. By arrangement with English authorities he was held in comfortable custody as a supposed prisoner of the faith; at the same time he produced learned justifications of the king's position in the oath of allegiance controversy. Most of these were published under the pseudonym of Roger Widdrington. Maintaining this disguise, he wrote more than 12 controversial works in both Latin and English. Several of these were censured by Roman authorities. He maintained his disguise until the end, having, according to Dr. Kellison, "a conscience like an ostrich's stomach."

PRESTON, THOMAS SCOTT

Prothonotary apostolic, administrator; b. Hartford, Connecticut, July 23, 1824; d. New York City, Nov. 4, 1891. His parents, Zephaniah, an insurance agent, and Ann Canfield Preston, were of English ancestry. When Thomas graduated from Washington College (later Trinity), Hartford, in 1843, he gave the valedictory in Greek. He studied at the General Theological Seminary, New York City, but was refused ordination by the bishop of New York because of his pronounced Episcopal High Church views. He was ordained (Sept. 14, 1848) at Holy Innocents Church, West Point, by Bishop DeLancey of Western New York, and became a curate (November 1848) at St. Luke's Church, New York City, under Dr. John Murray Forbes. Preston, his brother William, and Forbes were received into the Catholic Church (Nov. 18, 1849) by Rev. James Roosevelt Bayley.

Preston studied at St. Joseph's Seminary, Fordham, New York, and was ordained on Nov. 16, 1850, by Bp. John McCloskey. After a brief curacy at Old St. Patrick's Cathedral, he became pastor of St. Mary's in Yonkers, New York, in July 1851. Successively secretary (1853), chancellor, and vicar-general (1853-91), he was named pastor of St. Ann's Church upon Forbes's return to the Anglican Church. Preston, a domestic prelate (1881) and a prothonotary apostolic (1888), was a notable administrator but was less successful in personal relations owing to the inflexible rectitude with which he applied the letter of the law to himself and to everyone else. He was deeply devoted to Abp. Michael Corrigan and regarded him as "the finest ecclesiastic I have ever known." With Mother Mary Veronica Starr, Preston founded the Sisters of the Divine Compassion. His published works include more than 12 volumes of sermons and conferences.

PRESUMPTION

The sin against the virtue of HOPE by apparent excess, the opposite extreme to the sin by real defect, which is despair. In presumption the excess is apparent rather than real, because it is impossible to hope too much, if by hope is meant aspiring to the good that God has promised and relying on the means that He has made available. Instead of hoping too much, one who presumes substitutes for the Christian virtue a distorted counterfeit that looks to a good or trusts in means other than those guaranteed by God's promise.

Like despair, presumption may be based upon a corruption of faith, in which case one presumes because he thinks perversely about the object or motive of hope. This is known as heretical presumption, which is a sin primarily and directly contrary to faith, rather than to hope. Such would be presumption based on the belief that God will not punish sin. In distinction to this, simple presumption, which is directly opposed to hope, supposes no false belief, but arises from a failure to make practical application to oneself of the truths known by faith.

There is a kind of presumption that is opposed to the moral virtue of MAGNANIMITY rather than to hope, as when one aspires to something humanly possible, but beyond the limits that a reasonable estimate of one's capacities should impose.

Theologians distinguish two kinds of the simple presumption opposed properly to hope. One kind is directly opposed to hope and essentially corruptive of the virtue (praesumptio contra spem); it either rejects hope's proper motive and looks for the attainment of eternal life by one's own unaided efforts, or it expects salvation by a gift of God that would be incompatible with the divine perfections (as when one expects salvation without repentance for sin). The other kind of presumption consists in trusting beyond the limits of hope (praeter spem), but in a way not essentially corruptive of the virtue, as when one looks rashly to God for what God could, but has not promised, to give; for example, extraordinary graces or an extended opportunity for repentance at the end of life.

Presumption directly contrary to hope is always a grave sin unless its malice is lessened by an imperfection of awareness or consent. As a sin directly opposed to a theological virtue, it is more serious, other things being equal, than a sin against a moral virtue. Because it involves a repudiation of God's plan for one's salvation, it is listed by some as a sin against the Holy Spirit. Nevertheless, it is not as grave as the sin of despair, because its affront to divine justice dishonors God less than that of despair to divine mercy, mercy being more characteristic of God than justice (St. Thomas Aquinas, Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 21.3).

Presumption of the kind called praeter spem may be seriously or venially sinful. Provided there is no serious want of submission to divine providence and no contempt of the ordinary means of salvation, it is not grievously sinful to hope for extraordinary graces or favors, although such hope is likely to be inspired by an inordinate vanity or egoism.

[P. K. MEAGHER]

PRETERNATURAL

A concept used mainly for certain gifts of the state of ORIGINAL JUSTICE and for the theology of miracles.

Concept. Preternatural is a division of the SUPERNATURAL: generally it is defined, by contrast with the simply or absolutely supernatural, as the supernatural in a certain sense (secundum quid) or the relatively supernatural. (Some authors, however, identify preternatural with the modally supernatural as opposed to the substantially supernatural.) Whereas the simply or absolutely supernatural is a gift of God surpassing the powers and exigencies of every possible creature (e.g., the BEATIFIC VISION), the preternatural surpasses the powers and exigencies of only some particular nature (e.g., the immortality possible to Adam, which surpassed the powers and exigencies of human but not angelic nature). Thus the preternatural is supernatural only with respect to some particular nature. Further, unlike the simply supernatural, the preternatural does not elevate the creature to share the life of the Trinity but adds something that perfects this nature in its own order (thus Adam's gift of immortality would have perfected his human life by preserving it perpetually).

Word. Preternatural comes from Latin praeter naturam, a phrase used of miracles by, among others, Ambrose (De Mysteriis 9.51, 53), Peter Chrysologus (Sermon 156), Peter Lombard (2 Sentences 18.6), and Thomas Aquinas (De potentia 6.2 ad 3), who also applies it to a body's unnatural place and the separated soul's mode of knowing (Summa theologiae 1a, 89.1). John Damascene (in Burgundio's translation) speaks of a disordered moral life as praeter naturam (De fide orthodoxa 3.14). Praeternaturalis itself is used by Albert the Great of the heat of hectic fever (Metaphysicorum 2.11) and by Aquinas of a violent cause (In 2 In libros de caelo et mundo expositio 28.1; cf. Contra gentiles 1.19); in Albert it means contra naturam, in Aquinas it means that which is not in accord with nature. Cajetan, however, distinguishes praeternaturalis from contra naturam in describing the separated soul's mode of knowing (in Summa theologiae 1, 89.1 no. 13), and Suárez presents it as a mode of the supernatural when using it of miracles (De gratia 2.4.4; De substantiis separatis, seu de angelorum natura 2.29.2). Only in the 19th century does the word come into common use concerning certain gifts of original justice; in theology today this application tends to predominate.

Miracles. The notion of preternatural is strictly verified in those miracles where natural causes could produce the effect, but not in the mode employed by the divine power (e.g., a sudden cure): the mode of activity surpasses the power of the creature involved, but the creature is not elevated to a higher order of being. In this strict sense miracles praeter naturam form one class of miracles among others; some theologians, however, call all miracles preternatural to distinguish them from simply supernatural effects. By extension preternatural is applied to the extraordinary but not strictly miraculous effects of angelic or diabolic activity in lower beings; some, indeed, maintain this to be the proper use of the term in this area. (See MIRACLES (THEOLOGY OF).)

Gifts of Adam. Besides the simply supernatural gift of GRACE, Adam was given the gift of INTEGRITY and bodily immortality (on other gifts see ORIGINAL JUSTICE). The preternatural quality of these gifts other than grace is vital to Catholic teaching about the effects of ORIGINAL SIN: were they natural to man, their loss would entail an intrinsic corruption of human nature; since they were preternatural, their deprivation as punishment left man intrinsically whole and good. Although the Fathers and earlier theologians had with varying terminology taught the supernatural quality of these gifts, M. Baius in the 16th century, and later the Jansenists, held that Adam's grace, integrity, and bodily immortality were natural as due to man by an exigency of his nature, that their loss brought evil to human nature intrinsically. (See BAIUS AND BAIANISM; JANSENISM.) The Church's rejection of this (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, ed. A. Schönmetzer [32d ed. Freiburg 1963] 1921, 1923–24, 1926, 1955, 1978, 2616–17) led to more detailed study of the supernatural quality of Adam's prerogatives and to a clearer distinction of grace from the other gifts. The latter were now said to be supernatural secundum quid or quoad modum or per accidens and, later on, preternatural. While Biblical research and paleontology today lead theologians to reexamine the number and content of these gifts, they hold in common that those present in Adam were preternatural.

The concept of preternatural is also used in eschatology, where it is applied to the separated soul's mode of knowing and to the final perfecting of the entire created universe under the headship of Christ.

PREUSS, ARTHUR

Editor, lay theologian; b. St. Louis, Mo., March 22, 1871; d. there, Dec. 16, 1934. The son of Edward Preuss, convert and editor of the St. Louis Amerika, German Catholic daily, Preuss was educated at Canisius College, Buffalo, New York, and St. Francis College, Quincy, Illinois (M.A. 1890). After a year on the Amerika staff, he went to Chicago in 1892 as editor of Der Weltbürger, Katholisches Sonntagsblatt, and Die Glocke. On April 1, 1894, he began his own Chicago Review. He moved this to St. Louis in July 1895, where he again worked on the Amerika staff while continuing his own magazine, retitled the Catholic Fortnightly Review (1905–11) and the Fortnightly Review (1912–35). His magazine was important because of its independent and courageous opinions on such controversial questions as the FARIBAULT PLAN, Cahenslyism (see CAHENSLEY, PETER PAUL), Americanization of the foreign-born, especially Germans, the MCGLYNN case, and most contemporary issues affecting the Church.

From 1896 to 1934, Preuss was literary editor for the B. Herder Book Co. of St. Louis, for which he translated three German theological texts, Joseph Pohle's often-printed 12-volume Dogmatic Theology (cited as Pohle-Preuss), Johannes Brunsmann's four-volume Fundamental Theology (1928–32), and Anthony Koch's 5-volume Moral Theology (3d ed. 1918). His own three books were: The Fundamental Fallacy of Socialism (1908), A Study in American Freemasonry (1908), and A Dictionary of Secret and Other Societies (1924). He also edited the one-volume translation of Hartmann Grisar's Martin Luther (1935) and the two-volume Meditations for Religious (1935) by Johannes Janssen. He served as literary adviser to the Society of the Divine Word Press at Techony, Illinois, and was a contributor to the Catholic papers the Echo of Buffalo, New York, and the Wanderer of St. Paul, Minnesota. He refused all of many honors offered except a doctorate from the University of Notre Dame.

PRICE, THOMAS FREDERICK

Cofounder of the Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America; b. Wilmington, N.C., Aug. 19, 1860; d. Hong Kong, China, Sept. 12, 1919. His parents, converts to Catholicism, were Alfred Lanier and Clarissa Bond; his father was editor of Wilmington's first daily newspaper, the Daily Journal. As a youth Price sometimes served the Masses of Bishop James Gibbons, vicar apostolic of North Carolina (and future archbishop of Baltimore), who resided in Wilmington's St. Thomas parish. After studies at St. Charles Seminary, Catonsville, Md. and St. Mary's Seminary, Baltimore, Price was ordained on June 20, 1886, becoming the first native diocesan priest of the vicariate of North Carolina. From 1887 to 1896 he was pastor of the vicariate's oldest parish at New Bern, traveling by horse and buggy to its over 17 dependent missions.

Toward a Wider Apostolate. Though widely scattered, Catholics were relatively few in North Carolina. Price concluded that more of the Church's efforts should be devoted to a wider apostolate. Influenced by the convert programs of the Paulist Fathers in the north, he secured authorization from the then vicar apostolic, Bishop Leo Haid, O.S.B., abbot of Belmont, to be released from his parish to engage in preaching to the mostly protestant general public. In 1896 he acquired land near Raleigh as a base for his work, naming it Nazareth. As he began his new preaching campaign, he launched Truth (1897), a monthly devoted to correcting misunderstandings about Catholicism. Edited entirely by Price, it was non-polemical in style and soon attracted a national readership. At Nazareth he established an orphanage, inviting the Sisters of Mercy, led by his sister, Sr. Catherine, to staff it. He also began seeking priests and seminarians who would join him as a community of missionary preachers. At Nazareth he built a center for this "North Carolina Apostolate" with a preparatory seminary for future apostles (1902). Although a few priests joined him and some candidates entered his training program, and while others, including some Northern seminarians, lent their services in summer months, the project did not succeed as he had hoped.

The Foreign Mission Challenge. In 1904 Price attended a meeting of the Catholic Missionary Union in Washington, D.C., an organization of leaders of the principal home missionary projects in the United States. Price presented a report on his methods. He also listened as the young director of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith from Boston, Fr. James A. WALSH, proposed that home mission interest and vocations might well be increased if the wider challenge of foreign missions were likewise promoted. Price was attracted to Walsh's vision. The foreign mission theme now appeared frequently in his editorials in Truth, and he followed Walsh's appeals in The Field Afar. During the next several years he began to feel that the future of his North Carolina project should be its becoming a national mission society for home and foreign missions. He also realized that Bishop Haid would not approve of his expanding the Nazareth project.

Cofounder of Maryknoll. In September of 1910 Price and Walsh met by chance while attending a Eucharistic Congress in Montreal. Price urged that they take steps together to establish the mission seminary they felt was needed by the U.S. Church. Walsh accepted the challenge. Price then conferred with Cardinal Gibbons and the apostolic delegate, Diomed Falconio, who were favorable to making the project a national one. Gibbons submitted the project to the U.S. archbishops, who approved it at their meeting on April 27, 1911, directing Walsh and Price to proceed to Rome to secure the authorization of the Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (June 29). Upon their return, they established The Catholic Foreign Mission Society of America near Ossining, N.Y. on property they named Maryknoll. For the next seven years, Price traveled throughout the East and Midwest, promoting the new society and seminary, seeking vocations and raising funds. When he was at Maryknoll, he served as a spiritual director. During these years his personal spirituality became more mystical, marked by an intense devotion to Mary and to the Venerable Bernadette Subirous of Lourdes. The fact that the new society did not include missions in the United States was a disappointment to Price, and he continued to nourish the hope of eventually establishing such a society. In this effort he was not encouraged by Cardinal Gibbons. In 1918 Price accepted the charge of superior in the first group of four Maryknoll missionaries assigned to work in China. In 1919 he developed acute appendicitis and died at St. Paul's Hospital in Hong Kong. In 1936 his remains were returned to Maryknoll, N.Y., where they now rest beside those of Bishop James A. Walsh in the crypt of the society chapel.

PRIDE

Pride is the inordinate desire to excel. Pride springs from a self-love that is exclusive of others. There is a self-love that is legitimate, necessary, and even virtuous; such a love embraces others and recognizes and rejoices in whatever excellence they may have. In this sense a man can be proud of certain talents or achievements that are his, while still recognizing their relative value in line with the talents and achievements of others. He has a place in the universe of which he can be justly proud, but it is alongside others and under God and God's visible authority.

When man isolates self from God and the rest of humanity and makes self absolute or central, either ignoring all others or using them solely toward the achievement of his own private ends, he has the vice of pride. It is in this sense that pride is traditionally regarded as one of the seven capital sins and the queen of vices. It is a capital sin because it is a source or foundation for other sins, especially such sins as presumptuousness, which inclines the proud man to attempt what is beyond his powers; inordinate ambition, which is the inclination to aim at an honor and dignity beyond one's deserts or to use sinful means in the pursuit of them; and vainglory, which is the inordinate effort to manifest one's own excellence, real or fictitious. At the root of all such sins there is an exaggerated love and concern for self that clouds one's knowledge and appreciation of the true self and the corresponding worth of others.

The malice of pride varies according to its degree or kind. There is, for instance, a pride that is satanic, that aims at withdrawing man from subjection to God and incites him to reject the commands of superiors. It breeds contempt for God and all authority and for every value and judgment that is not a man's very own. It is the father of all nihilistic thinking and acting. Such pride is, of course, most seriously sinful, and though rarely, if ever, starkly manifest, it nevertheless seems to be the undercurrent of much of present-day immorality. Wherever there is the tendency to debase and to level, to deny the relevance of God and of ethical values in the affairs of man, there is pride in its most grievous and satanic form.

Pride is less sinful when God and legitimate authority are not denied but simply disregarded at certain times. God's dominion, the authority in which it is manifest, and the worth of others are accepted, but still much is made of self unduly. For instance, a man may think he has gifts that in fact he has not, or he may unreasonably seek to be esteemed above others. Such cases of pride, though always harmful to a degree, are not generally seriously sinful, unless, of course, such pride causes grave injury to another or is such that a man is prepared to commit serious sin because of it.

PRIESTHOOD IN CHRISTIAN TRADITION

Current interest in the use of the imagery and theme of priesthood in Catholic theology arises in great part from their use in the documents of the Second Vatican Council and in its aftermath. It is also affected by the ecumenical currents that found their focus in the Catholic Church after the Council. To relate the life and mission of the Church to Christ, the conciliar teaching distinguished the threefold mission or office of Jesus Christ as Priest, King, and Prophet. The Church, as a body and in each of its members according to their order, was then said to share in this threefold mission and office. To set this teaching within Christian tradition, an extensive investigation is needed into how images and definitions of priesthood have been used in the past, both in explaining Christ's salvific work and in explaining the life, mission, and ministry of the Church. While the immediate concern of this article is priesthood, it is apparent that its relation to kingship and even prophecy must be kept in mind.

Here it is only possible to offer a selective reading from a long tradition, and to some extent systematize a vast body of literature in which the terms are used in diverse ways. There is no uniform notion of priesthood or kingship at work, but at times the language is used symbolically and metaphorically and at times more conceptually, and contexts also change. A chronological approach is unavoidable in order to see how language and thought developed, but from the start four ways in which priestly and kingly images occur are noted: (a) to describe the salvific work of Christ; (b) to designate the Church, his Body; (c) to describe the share in the royal priesthood of the Church given through Baptism; and (d) to describe the share in it given through the laying-on of hands, or what came to be called the Sacrament of Order. New Testament texts, patristic literature, medieval writings, sixteenth-century controversies and their aftermath, and modern theology all need attention.

New Testament Texts

The New Testament provides the imagery and thematic of the priesthood of Christ and of the royal priesthood of the Church. The second however is not introduced as a deduction from the first, and they are to be considered separately.

The Priesthood of Christ. The texts which present the death of Christ as a SACRIFICE, or which attribute priesthood to him, belong in a larger context wherein other images and descriptions are used. There is a very varied soteriology in the works of the New Testament, and a proper placement of priesthood, kingship and sacrifice has to resist the temptation to reduce all understanding to such a thematic. It is asked rather what such imagery adds to the meaning of Christ's salvific suffering, death, and resurrection, as it is appropriated primarily from the Hebrew scriptures.

Several images used of Christ's work provide the context. Jesus is the new Paschal Lamb (e.g. 1 Cor 5:7). He is compared to Isaac (Jn 10:17; Rom 8:12). He is the victim offered in EXPIATION for sin (Mt 26:28; 1 Cor 15:3; Gal 1:4). Compared to the SUFFERING SERVANT of the songs of the Book of Isaiah, he is said to give himself in service for others (e.g. Jn 12:38). In such images, there is a ready appeal to a sacrificial background in explaining the death of Jesus as the culmination of his life and ministry, but the key to its understanding is the contrast made with the inefficacy of ritual action.

The Letter to the HEBREWS is the high-point of the appeal to notions of mediation, priesthood, and sacrifice, and it is this work which has exercised the primary influence in Christian literature in these areas of thought. The letter is written to encourage believers and disciples in communities that suffer and endure persecution. Its focus is on the mediation of a new covenant, according to the eternal plan of God, whose intention is to save humanity and all of creation from servitude to the devil and to subject them in obedience to his own will and rule. It is through Christ, the eternal Son made flesh, that this work is accomplished (1:1–4). Through his suffering in the flesh he showed perfect obedience to the Father and became for humankind the purification for sins (10:8–13). The comparison with God's covenant with Israel and with the levitical priesthood and its rituals is apparently prompted as a suitable way to convey the letter's message of salvation through Christ to its particular readership. Those addressed seem to have been nostalgic for the worship of the temple and steeped in a knowledge of the story of the covenant made with the people through Moses and sanctioned by sacrifice.

It is to demonstrate the dominance of the Son and his superiority over all creatures, his solidarity in the flesh with suffering humanity, and the perfect obedience which he learned through suffering, that the author introduces the themes of covenant, mediation, priesthood, kingship, and sacrifice. Heb 4:14–16 might be cited as a key text:

Since therefore we have a great high priest who has passed through the heavens, Jesus the Son of God, let us hold fast to the faith we profess. Ours is not a high priest unable to sympathize with our weaknesses, but one who has been tested in every way as we are, only without sinning. Let us therefore boldly approach the throne of grace, in order that we may receive mercy and find grace to give us timely help.

Jesus Christ is a perfect high priest, who, being the SON OF GOD, has taken on our human weakness. He is declared so by divine oath from all eternity (5:5–10). He is the mediator of a new and more perfect covenant in which the forgiveness of sins shown to be impossible under the old covenant is brought about. His priesthood is unlike that of the old covenant, or that of Aaron, and is a priesthood according to the order of Melchizedek (chap. 7), for it has no human origin but only a divine one. The sacrifice of this mediator and high-priest is made once and for all, and his priesthood is now exercised in priestly intercession at the right hand of God in heaven (10:13).

There are five aspects of this priesthood, developed through chapters 5 to 10. First, Christ, Son of God, coming in the flesh in the fullness of time, is qualified to be a priest because he is declared so from eternity by divine oath and because he lived and suffered in perfect solidarity with those whom he is to save through his death. Second, this priesthood is perfect and unique, a priesthood according to the order of Melchizedek, not that of AARON. Third, through the offering of his death in perfect obedience to the will of the Father, this priest entered not an earthly sanctuary but a heavenly sanctuary and there continues to exercise his priesthood on behalf of sinners. Fourth, unlike the sacrifices of the earthly sanctuary, the offering of this priest achieves once and for all the forgiveness of sins, so that no further sacrifice is needed. Fifth, the notion of kingship is conjoined with that of priesthood, because through his sacrifice Christ has gained dominion over sin and the devil and has subjected all things in obedience to the rule of God (10:13).

Two acts constitute the exercise of this priesthood. The first is the death through obedience, the piercing through the veil of the flesh into the heavenly sanctuary. Second, there is what results from this, the eternal priestly intercession which Christ makes for his own at the right hand of the Father. For the writer of the letter, in his attention to the suffering of the faithful, this priesthood and its sacrifice is the foundation of the spiritual life of Christ's followers. It is to be confessed by them in faith and confidence (10:19–25). They are guaranteed the forgiveness of sin. They are given dominion over sin and the works of the flesh. They, too, through suffering can gain their salvation because of Christ's solidarity with them and of theirs with Christ.

Placed within the entire corpus of the New Testament, these notions of priesthood, sacrifice and kingship are not to be isolated as though they were the primary notions of teaching about salvation. They are used in conjunction with other images to give some understanding of what Christ achieved for a humankind that needed to be saved from sin and death, through his coming in the flesh, his ministry, his preaching, his suffering, even his rejection, and his death. It is the metaphorical transposition of these terms from a ritual and legal order to this work of Christ that carries weight and power. The contrast with what is sought and not achieved through ritual action and through the law is basic.

The Royal Priesthood of the Church. The idea of the Christian community as a royal priesthood may in fact predate the elaboration of the theme of Christ's priesthood, though in hindsight it has been understood in relation to this. The most commonly invoked text is I Peter 2:4–10.

While this text is often called upon in support of the priesthood of all baptized, or all believers, it is to be noted that it speaks of the people as a whole or as a unity. The aim of the letter is to encourage the followers of Christ in their suffering, especially in the suffering which comes from finding themselves aliens and disregarded. They can endure these sufferings through union with the redemptive suffering of Jesus Christ. According to the author, Christ leads them on the way of suffering. He can do so because he has released them from bondage through the ransom paid by the pouring out of his own precious blood. The letter compares Christ to the Passover lamb and makes of the death of Jesus a sacrifice of expiation (1:18–19).

Though they may sense themselves a people subjected to alien powers, his followers are in fact a chosen people, an elect people. They are built up as a household, or as a living temple, on the foundation who is Jesus Christ, who was himself rejected and spurned. Evoking the scene of the Covenant narrated in Exodus 19, the author calls the disciples whom he addresses a "royal priesthood." The term is taken from Exodus 19:5–6, which describes a scene of election and covenant. It is because they were a chosen people, a people with whom Yahweh makes covenant, that the Israelites were a royal priesthood, that is, a nation which has dominance over its enemies through God and which can engage in true worship, and indeed one in which all may be seen as kings and priests, unlike their Gentile neighbors. This is now applied to Christ's disciples. Chosen in Christ, redeemed by his blood, they are a royal priesthood, a people that has spiritual dominance and which can announce the good news of salvation to their neighbors. They are a people in which each and all are kings and priests, all anointed by the Spirit in the building up of the one household of God. It is the collective denomination which stands behind any application to individuals of the terms of chosen race, holy people, kingly priesthood.

Christ is said to be, in virtue of the RANSOM paid by his blood, the foundation of the people, this living temple of God's Spirit. If there is any reference in the letter to Christ himself as priest, it is oblique and is contained in the idea that the people offer spiritual sacrifices which are pleasing to God "through Jesus Christ" (2:5). The idea of Christ as king is more to the fore in the letter than that of Christ as priest, for it is his rule that now leads this new people as God's rule led the Israelites of old through the desert (cf. Is 43:20–21).

A comparable text is Revelations 1:6, which also draws on Exodus 19:5–6. There it is said that those saved in Jesus Christ are a kingdom (not kings) and priests (sic) for God, the Father of Jesus Christ. It is the rule of Christ which is here emphasized, for he is called the prince of the kings of the earth in virtue of being the firstborn of the dead. He is a faithful witness of God's love, who washed us from our sins with his own blood (v. 5). Being the people whom he thus acquired, the company of his disciples are a kingdom in which all are priests because all can give glory to God the Father. The same image of ruling as priests, because they are redeemed in the blood of Christ, is found in the chant of the elders before the throne in Revelations 5:9–10.

By way of postscript to New Testament usage, what has often been noted may be briefly recalled. Images of priesthood and sacrifice are never used to describe the role and function of the apostles or of the leaders of the community. This would contradict the sense in which these terms are used of the people, in their subjection to the way and the rule of Christ and in their reliance on him and on him alone for salvation, since it would suggest a dependence on ritual rather than on faith in Christ.

Summary. Those texts, especially Hebrews, which speak of Christ as priest and of his priestly work, do so by way of contrast with a ritual religion. Priestly and sacrificial imagery is allied with the imagery of a new rule and kingship. What is underlined is Christ's suffering, his solidarity with sinners and sufferers, and his obedience to the Father's will. Salvation given in this way is in sharp contrast with the search for salvation through obedience to the Law or through ritual sacrifice.

When the image of priesthood is used of Christ's followers, this is founded in the thought that Christ's people are a new kingdom, chosen by God and with whom he has made covenant. Living by faith in him and the power of his suffering, they have dominion in this world over their own selves, over sin, over all who oppose the rule of God, because they are redeemed by the blood of Christ. Where Christ is proposed as exemplar to the people in 1 Peter, it is in the endurance of his suffering. It is in suffering in witness to God's love and rule, that those who believe in him are one with him and can expect with him the resurrection from the dead, in which his and their dominion is perfected.

It is not possible to grasp the full import of this usage of priestly terms without noting the deliberate move away from any idea that God is to be served and glorified through dependence on ritual practice, as well as from the idea that priesthood belongs to only one portion of the people. It is not through cult and the observance of a law that we are saved but through the obedient dedication of Christ, his life and even his death, through his faithful witness. As a result of his death and resurrection, to live the life of the spirit is not to be dependent on cult or law. The people themselves are royal and priestly, a living temple. They can offer spiritual sacrifices in everything they do, their suffering is priestly and kingly, as they live in memory of the power of Christ's suffering and in faith in it. They have no need of further sacrifice and are free of the Law which subjects them because they are subject in spirit and have dominion over sin in virtue of the obedience and service of Jesus Christ. The symbolic and metaphorical quality of this language of priesthood, sacrifice, and kingship is what gives it its power.

Patristic Teaching

Early Christian Literature. In proclaiming salvation through the passion, death, and resurrection of Jesus Christ, writings of the apostolic and post-apostolic age develop the theme of sacrifice to some degree, especially in emphasizing the spiritual nature of Christian sacrifice, which is contrasted with the levitical cult. The imagery of Christ the Passover or Paschal Lamb is prominent in Paschal Homilies and in Irenaeus. Irenaeus acclaimed Christ to be mediator because in his flesh the conflict between good and evil, life and death is worked out and because in him there is a recapitulation of all creation, whereby all that was snatched from the Father is again surrendered to him in obedience (Adversus Haereses III, 18, 7. Irénée de Lyons. Contre les hérésies. Livre III. Ed. A. Rousseau et L. Doutreleau. Sources chrétiennes 211. Paris 1974). While the language of sacrifice is used, there are only occasional references to the priesthood of Christ, especially when authors draw on the Letter to the Hebrews, e.g. Ignatius of Antioch, Letter to the Philadelphians 4 (Ignace d'Antioche—Polycarpe de Smyrne. Lettres—Martyre de Polycarpe. Ed. T. Camelot, Sources chrétiennes 10. Paris 3e. ed., 1958).

On the other hand, in the life of the Church during this period, a distinction was made between clergy and laity which had an enormous effect on the way in which later centuries treated participation in the one priesthood of Christ. In this context, the canonical collection called the Apostolic Tradition associated priesthood with episcopacy. The bishop, it says, acts as priest in offering the gifts of the people, and in the teaching by which he brings them holiness of life (La Tradition Apostolique de Saint Hippolyte. Essai de Reconstitution. By Dom Bernard Botte O.S.B. Münster 1963. Pp. 7–11). By way of association, the presbytery of the Church is joined in this priesthood, since they extend hands with the bishop over the gifts in the prayer of thanksgiving.

In Letter 63 on the sacrament of the Eucharist (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3, 2.701–717), CYPRIAN of Carthage appealed to the figure of Melchizedek to typify the exercise and offering of Christ's own priesthood in this celebration. He then called the bishop a priest (sacerdos) because in his offering of the Eucharist for the people he acts vice Christi (Ep. 63. 14, loc. cit.). In some of his letters, he referred to presbyters as consacerdotes, people who in some way share in the priesthood of the bishop.

School of Alexandria. The themes of mediation, priesthood, and sacrifice were developed in the School of Alexandria, with mediation as the key term. This is found first in ORIGEN, and to some extent in CLEMENT, and later in ATHANASIUS and CYRIL. With these one may also associate the similar teaching of JOHN CHRYSOSTOM. The ideas of Philo influenced Origen and Clement. In the temple priesthood and in the figure of Melchizedek, Philo found images of the Divine Word. Remaining within a Jewish perspective, he spiritualized the act of sacrifice. He connected priesthood and Passover, and in his allegorical commentary on the vestments of the high priest he indicated the universal character of the new spiritual priesthood.

Origen attributed the work of mediation to the Logos or the Son. He located this mediation already within the Trinity in the procession of the Spirit (see his commentary on John's Gospel Bk. II.X.75, Commentaire sur Saint Jean 1–V, ed. Cécile Blanc. Sources chrétiennes 120. Paris 1966) and its manifestation in the world in the taking on of human nature. In line with this, he explained how Christ is High Priest, according to the Order of Melchizedek. Eternal Word, he never leaves the sanctuary of heaven, where he dwells in light inaccessible. There he offers himself as a gift to the Father. In the flesh, on earth, when he is able to sympathize with sinners and their weakness through his own experience, he offers himself for sins "outside the camp" (Homily XII on the Book of Leviticus, Homélie sur le Lévitique, texte latin, traduction et notes par Marcel Borret. Sources chrétiennes 287. Paris 1981). In his offering in the flesh he blotted out sins and the "bond that was writ against us" so that not even a trace is left. Thus Christ exercised both priesthood and kingship, winning dominion over principalities and powers, "making a show of them openly" when nailed to the Cross. The eternal and the earthly are not so much two stages of the one priesthood as two complementary offerings.

In several places, e.g. his commentary on John, Bk VI. 51), Origen relates the royal priesthood of the Church to the priesthood and kingship of Christ. The true Jerusalem, he says, is the Church, built of living stones, a royal priesthood in which spiritual sacrifices are offered. Martyrdom is the most perfect form of this spiritual worship, but it is exercised by all who live according to the Law of the Spirit. In the Eucharist, by drinking the blood of Christ the people are initiated into the mystery of the flesh and blood of the Word, who in his flesh rendered God propitious to sinners so that they might become one with him in his eternal offering (e.g. on Matthew 26:26–28, Die griechischen christlichen Schriftsteller der ersten drei Jahrhunderte, Origenes 11, 196–200).

In Homily V on Leviticus, and in Homily XI on Numbers (Homélie sur les Nombres, introduction et traduction de André Méhat. Sources Chrétiennes 29. Paris 1951) Origen relates the ministry of the ordained to the priesthood of Christ. Christ is said to have "eaten the sins of the people" in his death. Bishops too must eat the sins of the people "in a high place," which is that of perfect faith and charity, by teaching them sound doctrine and purifying their consciences. These priests are victims of the Word of God which they must teach. They propitiate the sins of the people by advising them, exhorting them, teaching them, and instructing them, and thus leading them to penance. Thus through their ministry Christ the High Priest sanctifies his people, making of them a royal priesthood, who offer spiritual sacrifices (On Numbers, Homily XXIV).

Thus it is that in Origen we see an early mention of the four aspects of priesthood. First and foremost, there is the priesthood of Christ, the Word made flesh, which is both heavenly and earthly. From this there arises the royal priesthood of the Church, which is the people saved and sanctified by his blood and his obedience to the Father, and with which it is particularly associated in the Eucharist. This priesthood is exercised by each and all of the faithful in offering spiritual sacrifices, in their daily lives and in the sacrament of the Eucharist. Finally, the ministers of the Church are configured to the priesthood of Christ by themselves eating the sins of the people, living in complete fidelity to the Word in order to sanctify the people by their teaching and spiritual guidance.

Athanasius and Cyril. In these writers, the theme of mediation is even more highly developed, but it is also more securely related to the mystery of incarnation than in Origen. Athanasius and Cyril relate Christ's role as Mediator to his genealogy from the tribe of Judah. Through this genealogy, priesthood and kingship are combined in the one person. Eusebius, it may be noted, in his Ecclesiastical History 5,3.13 (PG 22, 365,389) adds the title of Prophet, noting that in Christ the three Old Testament types of king, priest, and prophet are fulfilled.

The sense the Alexandrians give to Christ's priesthood, kingship, and sacrifice can be understood within the broader descriptions of his work of mediation. It is because Christ, the Word of God in his divine nature, took on human nature and human flesh that he is mediator between God and a fallen humanity. The imagery used of this is quite diverse, a typical example indeed of mixed metaphors. The core notion is that the Word took on human nature in the weakness of the state to which sin had reduced it in order to lift it up out of this state and bear it with him to the right hand of the Father. To do this he had to pass through death, death being portrayed as a conflict with death itself and with sinful flesh. He, holy and innocent, encountered sin and death on the earth, entered into conflict with them, and won a victory for all those for whom he chose to live, suffer, and die.

Athanasius and Cyril use various biblical metaphors to describe this mediation. Enlarging upon the language of painful but victorious conflict, they use the language of paying a debt, occasionally of paying a debt to the devil but most of all to death itself. The language of sacrifice, taken primarily from Paul in all the harshness of the victim's identification with sin, is also employed. They call the Mediator "King" because he was victorious over sin and death and now reigns over the faithful who have been redeemed and who dominate these enemies in their own flesh in the hope of being with Christ in eternity. Drawing especially on Hebrews, they call him Priest because he offered himself as sacrifice in the once and for all offering of his death and his entry into the heavenly sanctuary.

Commenting on Hebrews and on the Psalms, both Athanasius and Cyril contrast the priesthood of Aaron and the priesthood according to Melchizedek. They do this to show the distinctive character of the priesthood of Christ and the unique quality of his offering, through which cultic priesthood is not only replaced but surpassed. He is priest according to the order of Melchizedek because his priesthood had no origin in this world but comes from the eternity of the Word's communion with the Father. Being exercised once and for all in his transition through death to heaven, it is an eternal priesthood whose act of sacrifice need never be repeated but is forever efficacious.

The texts in both authors are numerous, but some specific examples may be mentioned. In his treatise On the Incarnation (Patrologia Graeca 25, 95ff.), Athanasius says that by the sacrifice of his own body Christ did two things: He put an end to the law of death which barred humanity's way to God, and he made a new beginning of life for those who obtained the hope of the resurrection (II.9). Christ settled humanity's account with death by paying the debt which was owing to it (IV.20). In IV.21 of this treatise, Athanasius elaborates quite dramatically on the struggle with death which Christ took on in his own mortal flesh for "it was precisely in order to die that he had taken a body."

In the Second Oration Against the Arians (Patrologia Graeca 26, 146ff.), Athanasius relates Christ's priesthood to the life of the Church. Having acted as High Priest in the sacrifice of his death, he became an eternal High Priest who entered through his death into the heavenly sanctuary. Now he acts as High Priest in the Church by sanctifying it through communion with his life-giving flesh, bringing believers near to God and offering to the Father those who in faith approach him.

A similar approach is found in Cyril, for example, in his Commentary on Hebrews (Patrologia Graeca 74, 967) where he says that our pontiff or archiereus subjected himself to the malediction of death, not that he might demand punishment from sinners, nor that he might subject those guilty of sin to judgment, but so that he might save them by faith, absolve their crimes, make them holy, and make them participants in his own nature. He joins the images of Priest and King together by relating them both to anointing. The Son of God was anointed for the apostolate in coming into the world, joining the created thing in union with himself and anointing humanity with his deity, making one out of the two. This is the basis for the power of his sacrifice and for the royal priesthood of the Church.

Athanasius briefly pursues this theme of the royal priesthood which derives to the Church from its Head by the anointing of the Spirit (Commentaries on Psalms 77 and 78: Patrologia Graeca 27). The members of the Church make spiritual offerings in union with its Head, who offers in the heavenly sanctuary. Not only has Christ entered into conflict with sin and death on our behalf, not only has he entered the heavenly sanctuary through his resurrection, but his flesh has become a life-giving flesh and the redeemed partake of his wonderful exchange. They are brought into communion with him in grace and so are his body, one with him in his communion with God in the Spirit.

In his Paschal Homilies XX to XXII, Cyril, drawing on Old Testament types, speaks at length of the self-offering of the faithful through the Lenten fast and Lenten exercises in preparation for the Pasch when Christ would unite them with himself in his glorified flesh, but he says little about priesthood. On the other hand, in Homily 142 on Luke 22, 17–22 (Commentary on the Gospel According to Luke by St. Cyril of Alexandria, trans. from the Syriac by Payne Smith, Oxford 1859, 664–669), he explains that the royal priesthood mentioned in 1 Peter 2 is exercised by drawing near to God with Christ through faith. The people are made holy through communion in the Word made flesh. They offer prayers of thanksgiving and praise, drawing near to the eucharistic table from which they receive life and blessing both spiritually and corporeally, “for we receive in us the Word of God the Father, who for our sake became man, and who is life and life-giving.”

John Chrysostom. The work of John Chrysostom deserves special mention because he associates the priesthood of Christ and of his Body in a special way with the Eucharist. Though connected with the Churches of Antioch and Constantinople, John shares the Christology of the Alexandrians. He traces the priesthood of Christ to the Incarnation of the Word. There are two moments to its exercise: terrestrial and heavenly. The terrestrial culminates in the sacrifice of the Cross, where the testimony of the Word made flesh is sealed by the death of the testator. The heavenly exercise is located in the priestly intercession which continues for eternity. A special development of the theme is found in John’s homilies on the Letter to the Hebrews, where he draws on other biblical texts that accentuate the KENOSIS of the Word in the flesh to elaborate on what Hebrews says of his suffering, his obedience to the Father and the prayer which he made for his sisters and brothers.

The Eucharist is the sacrament and representation of Christ’s mysteries, as explained, for example, in Homily XIV on Hebrews 8, 1–2 (Patrologia Graeca 63, 329–336) and Homily VII on John (Patrologia Graeca 59, 61–66). Because of this, Chrysostom writes of the priestly character of the Bishop, since in the mysteries he represents Christ the High Priest. However, this share in Christ’s priesthood is also connected with the bishop’s teaching office and with his exercise of the power to bind and loose. As for the royal priesthood, this originates in Baptism, where John points to the anointings found in this rite. Christ, who is a descendant of the tribe of Judah and not Levi, is both king and priest (Homily XIII on Hebrews: Patrologia Graeca 63, 321–329). Through baptism, the faithful are made kings, priests and prophets (Homily IV on II Corinthians: Patrologia Graeca 61, 417–428). They are kings because they have been given victory over sin. They are priests because they immolate their bodies in offering a sacrifice to God. They are prophets because they are given a knowledge of what is to come. Their royal priesthood is founded in the communion with Christ, priest, and victim, given through the eating and drinking of his sacramental body and blood. By reason of this sacramental communion, the faithful are able to offer spiritual sacrifices by living a holy life and by offering prayers of thanksgiving to God. The hymns sung and the rites performed in the sacraments, whether this be the Eucharist or the act of binding and loosing in rites of penance, are done in concert with the heavenly choirs. Since this is a new and better covenant, Chrysostom waxes at some length on the promises which such priesthood hold forth.

When in Homily XVII, on Hebrews 9.24–26 (Patrologia Graeca 63, 345–352) Chrysostom elaborates on the death of Christ as his priestly and sacrificial offering, following the letter’s own comparison with the ritual of Yom Kippur. He again points to the Eucharist as its remembrance. The sacrifice is not repeated, but what is performed is a remembrance of the sacrifice. Of this sacrifice those who have been initiated into the mysteries partake through communion but they must do so worthily, lest they face judgment for their sins.

Two aspects of the bishop’s priesthood come together in the treatise On the Priesthood, which John wrote before his own ordination. In looking to the representative symbolism of the eucharistic mysteries, John likens the bishop to the High Priest “standing over the sacrifice and praying,” with the Lord sacrificed and lying before him (On the Priesthood, III. 4. Patrologia Graeca 48, 642). With more elaboration, however, he associates the priesthood of the ordained with the office of sanctifying through teaching the Word of God and with the office of purifying the people from their sins by leading them to do penance (Ibid. III, 5). Thus the episcopal priesthood in which the bishop is configured to Christ includes his sacramental ministry, his teaching ministry, and his office in leading the people to penance and the purification of their sins.

The Latin West

On developments in the Latin West during the patristic era, this survey is limited to the teaching of Saint AUGUSTINE of Hippo and to the influence of the notions of order and hierarchy on thought about the priesthood of the Church.

Augustine. In the western Church, it is the teaching of Augustine on priesthood which is the most important in the development of tradition. For Augustine, as for the Alexandrians, reference to the priesthood of Christ is to be found within his treatment of the mediation of Christ, or of Christ as mediator between God and a sinful humanity. Mediator is, as it were, the primary title given to Christ. His argument against Porphyry and against sacrificial cult in De Civitate Dei, Book X (Corpus Christianorum, Series latina 47, 271–314) gave him ample occasion to enlarge on the theme of Christ’s priesthood and sacrifice and on Christian sacrifice.

In X. 24 (Ibid., 297–298), Augustine relates the mediation of Christ to the notion of Principle or source of life and grace. The Principle is the Word and it is this Word who assumed human nature. The flesh of Christ purifies us and gives us life because it is the flesh of the Word. In the flesh he took on death, laid down his life in death, and so changed our nature to something better by the resurrection. In X. 29 (Ibid., 304–307), Augustine says that this Word, who is the Son, assumed humanity and thus gave humanity the hope of his love, bringing us near to God the Father, whereas we had been far off. Treating of the mediation of the Word made flesh, in Bk X. 20 (Ibid., 294) Augustine writes of him as Priest and sacrifice, a sacrifice to which all other sacrifices must give place. It is here that Augustine says that the Church has the Eucharist, which is the daily sign or sacrament of the one and unique sacrifice of Christ.

In relation to Christ's mediation in X.5 and 6 (Ibid., 276–279) Augustine discoursed on the sacrifice of Christians by way of contrast with pagan sacrifices and pagan mediators. True sacrifice is an attitude of soul before God and deeds done out of mercy. The visible sacrament of this invisible sacrifice is what makes clear that all are united with God as one holy fellowship (una sancta societas). The Eucharist is the sacrifice of Christians, for it is the sacrifice of the Body, head, and members. As a sign of the sacrifice of Christ's death, it includes in its offering both head and members because of the actions which the faithful perform as members of this head.

In the same work on the City of God we find a very clear statement about the royal priesthood of the Church. The priesthood, he says in XVII.5 (Corpus Christianorum, Series latina 48, 562–566), is “the people itself, of which Christ is the Priest who is the Mediator between God and men,” and which the Apostle Peter calls “a holy people, a royal priesthood.” Indeed, the people may also be called God's sacrifice, so that Paul says, “We being many are one bread, one body,” adjuring them, “Present your bodies a living sacrifice.” They are a priesthood and a sacrifice because they eat of the flesh of the Priest himself. Augustine here seems to mean eating by faith, but no doubt the saying also has eucharistic implications. The designation is collective, as it is in 1 Peter, though of course it has implications for the way in which each of the faithful partake in it (see also Sermo 272: Patrologia Latina 38, 1246–1248; Sermo 227: ed. Sources chrétiennes 116, 234–242; Sermo 7, ed. G. Morin, Miscellanea Agostiniana 1, 462–464).

There are a few places where Augustine relates the priesthood of Christ to his work in the Church in the present in a way that extends beyond the celebration of the Eucharist. In the commentary on Psalm 85:1 (Patrologia Latina 37, 1081) he says that Christ prays for us as our priest, prays in us as our head, and is prayed to by us as our God. Commenting on Psalm 44:17 (Patrologia Latina 36, 504) he makes a statement which was taken up by Isidore of Seville and had an influence in later medieval treatises. To keep the play on words, it is necessary to cite the Latin text: “Quomodo et sacerdos a sanctificando nos, ita et rex a regendo nos.” This indicates that there is both a relation and a distinction between his work as priest and his work as king. From what has been said above, however, it seems clear that the claim to both titles comes from his offering sacrifice and ruling over sin and death by his death on the Cross and his entry into heaven.

In De Civitate Dei XX.10 (Corpus Christianorum, Series latina 48, 719–720), Augustine associates priesthood with resurrection from the dead. Christ's own resurrection is the ultimate anointing of his priesthood according to the order of Melchizedek. To this all believers are assimilated by the anointing with chrism and so live in the hope of the resurrection. In this chapter, Augustine makes a distinction between the special use of the title sacerdos when used of bishop and presbyters and the more general use when applied to all the faithful, but it is to emphasize the point that through the royal priesthood all share in the anointing of Christ as priest in his resurrection.

Hierarchy and Order. How the relation of the Church to Christ was seen, how clergy and laity were distinguished, was greatly influenced by the notion of ordo/order. Roman bishops, and in particular Leo the Great (see LEO I, POPE, ST.), often speak of diverse orders in the Church and of the ranking of orders within the clergy. The ranking of laity, clergy, and bishop, however, for Leo is within the one royal priesthood and by the anointing of the Spirit, as he explains in commenting upon 1 Peter 2 in a sermon given on the anniversary of his episcopal ordination (Tractatus in natale eiusdem, IV. Corpus Christianorum, Series latina 138, 20–25). By the anointing with the Spirit at baptism, all are enabled to submit themselves to God in ruling their bodies and in consecrating themselves with a pure conscience through offering spiritual sacrifices. The grace of this anointing, however, flows out more fully over the bishop when he is ordained to his office, placing him in rank and dignity above all others so that the anointing may flow unsparingly from him over those whom he serves. What sets the bishop apart and fits him for his service is the more abundant outflow of the gift of the Spirit who consecrates all as priests within the one royal priesthood.

The strongest influence of the notions of order and hierarchy in the Latin west came through the translations of the writings of the Syrian monk, known to history as the PSEUDO-DIONYSIUS. Though he did not mention priesthood, he allied the idea of hierarchy or sacred power with that of rank to a vision of the cosmos and of Church order in particular. At the center of his mystical vision stands Christ, the Word of God manifesting the divine in the flesh. It is his role to draw humanity from this obscure and symbolic manifestation to a mystical contemplation of God, supreme light, and truth. The Christian must be drawn from attachment to the material world through a gradual process of purification, illumination, and perfective contemplation. Those closer to God in communion must lead those farther from this state to union with God along this threefold path.

In the work called The Ecclesiastical Hierarchy (English translation, Pseudo-Dionysius. The Complete Works, trans. Colm Luibheid. New York/Mahwah, 1987, 193–259), the bishop is called hierarchés or hierarch. This is a pagan word, meaning one who presides at sacred rites, or, indeed, high priest. The term hierarchia means sacred source or principle. It is defined in chapter three of the Celestial Hierarchy (Ibid., 143–192) as a “sacred order, knowledge and activity” which assimilates one to likeness with God and from which graces may flow to others. The bishop who is at the head of the ecclesiastical hierarchy is a font or source of the wisdom that brings others into communion with God. Presbyters, next in rank, are charged with the work of illuminating or teaching the divine mysteries as expressed in rites and symbols, while deacons are charged with the work of purification.

What this position says is that one does not lead others towards God unless one has entered into communion with him, at whatever degree of ordering one stands. This was given another twist in Latin theology when it resorted to legal and ontological categories to explain the hierarchy of bishop and presbyter, especially in the sacraments. Order was then applied more to official position and function than to the holiness of the minister. This accentuated the distinction in office and order between hierarchy or clergy and laity, and within hierarchy between the different ranks. The sharpening of the distinction between the holiness of the minister and his power was heightened toward the turn of the millennium as a result of disputes with those spiritual groups that questioned the validity of the sacramental celebrations of unworthy ministers.

Summary. During these early centuries, the images of priest and king are attached to a fundamental conception of Christ’s mediation between God and humanity. The possibility of this mediation is rooted in the incarnation of the Word or Son and is effected through the combat with sin and death which he undertook in the flesh. The priestly character of this mediation is, on the one hand, by way of contrast with ritual acts of sacrifice. The comparison, on the other hand, with the process of priestly sacrifice shows that by his reason of his access through suffering into the heavenly sanctuary Christ continues to act as mediator in his heavenly intercession and through his active presence in the Church. The most central thought is that of suffering, conflict, and victory over sin and death. The use of the images and titles of king and priest comes mainly from scriptural commentary and is subordinate to the fundamental idea of the mediation of the Word, who reconciles God and humanity in his own person and in the work he was sent to do.

The imagery of sacrifice, priesthood, and kingship is used also of the Church. They are related more directly to the priesthood of Christ than is done in the New Testament itself, by way of showing that the Church, Christ’s Body, exists and acts only by participation in the mystery of Christ himself. Initiated into the royal priesthood by baptism and Eucharist, the Church and its members are purified of sin through Christ’s death, anointed with the anointing of Christ himself, and nourished by his life-giving body and blood. Sacramental participation makes possible daily spiritual sacrifices. Sacramental and spiritual participation in Christ’s priesthood are one, neither making any sense except in relation to the other.

Within the royal priesthood of the Church, Christ’s Body, there are various ministries and various manifestations of holiness, modes of participation in the one priesthood of Christ himself. Leadership and pastoral ministry in the name of Christ always stood out as special roles within the one royal priesthood. In particular, the more the word Priest was used of Christ in relation to the action of the liturgy, the more the term was transferred to bishops and presbyters who preside over it. It was, however, the growing, practical, and then theological distinction between clergy and laity, as well as use of the notions of hierarchy and order, that made for more sharply defined differentiations between the participation of the faithful and the participation of the ordained.

Liturgical Developments

Developments of language and thought that gave pride of place to the ordained in the use of sacerdotal terminology are linked with the liturgy. It was within the liturgy, or in relation to the liturgy, that the distinction between clergy and laity was given focus. On the one hand, this is nothing other than a practical distinction, prompted by the need to distribute charges and assure the financial arrangements necessitated by the call to ministry. The clergy are those who take their place at the altar, who also have other community responsibilities, and so must be by and large free of concern about their financial support. When TERTULLIAN (De baptismo 17.1: Corpus Christianorum latina I, 291) makes the distinction he refers to the fact that anyone can baptize, all being priests, but it is the summus sacerdos, the bishop, who retains the primary right to do this, and following him presbyters and deacons. This, he says, is a matter of peace and good order in the Church. Origen (Homily on Josuah 17.3: Sources Chrétiennes 71, 381) also has a practical approach but one heavy with symbolic meaning. It comes from the law of God that priests and levites are to be free of external preoccupations so as to dedicate themselves to the word of God, but then it is the part of the laity to assure their material needs. In Letter 1 (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 3), Cyprian uses the same Old Testament typology to apply the distinction between clergy and laity to their different roles in the eucharistic sacrifice. As is known, this typology was pursued in the west in the papal decretals to underline the duty of the clergy to serve in the liturgy and to promote in tandem with this the call and obligation to clerical celibacy.

Distinctions in the relation of congregation and bishop to Christ were given meaning within the eucharistic action. The offering of the bread and wine was done by the priestly people, not necessarily in any ritual sense but in the sense that they provide them. The meaning of what the people offer in bread and wine comes from the fact that they are a free people, made free in the Spirit (Irenaeus), or Christ's priestly people (e.g. Augustine). Christ prays in them as they make an offering of their gifts and of themselves and in turn receive gifts in gratitude. However, liturgically in this offering the priest leads them in thanksgiving, that is, he offers on their behalf with thanksgiving for creation and for God's salvific work, and it is through his words that the sacramental sacrifice is perfected.

A distinction is made in Sermon 5. 7–8 of the mystical catechesis of Cyril of Jerusalem between the offerings of the people, the spiritual sacrifice of the prayer proclaimed, and the propitiatory sacrifice present on the altar when the spiritual sacrifice over the offerings has been completed (Cyrille de Jérusalem: Catechèses Mystagogiques, ed. A. Piédagnel et P. Paris. Sources Chrétiennes 126. Paris). The idea that the offering of the gifts and the bread and wine sanctified by the prayer constitute a twofold sign of Christ's sacrifice appears, for example, in the anaphora of Basil of Caesarea (Præx Eucharistica. Textus e variis liturgiis antiquioribus selecti, ed. Anton Hänggi et Irmgard Pahl. Fribourg), which distinguishes between prophora or offering and thusia or sacrifice. The bread and wine laid on the table are an offering, a sign of the people's own self-offering and a sign of Christ's offering. In the course of the eucharistic prayer proclaimed by the bishop, with the people's assent, when the Word or the SPIRIT is invoked, or when Christ's supper words are proclaimed, as different authors variously explain the power of the prayer, the sacrament is perfected as the sacrament of Christ's sacrifice. Hence the blessed elements show forth the sacrifice of Christ the High Priest through which he entered the holy of holies, in which he is the one in whose humanity all are forgiven and made free, the Head of his body, which is one with him in this priestly offering and Passover. Though the priestly people make their offering through the sign of the bread and wine, their primary mode of participation in Christ's sacrifice and priesthood is through eating and drinking of his Body and Blood. It is in partaking of the sacramental sacrifice by eating and drinking of the body and blood of Christ that their royal priesthood is given its most fundamental sacramental and spiritual form.

Medieval Thought

The Order of Priesthood. In the work of ISIDORE OF SEVILLE in the Latin west, there is a formal treatment of orders and offices in the Church which had considerable influence on later writers. In commentaries on the books of the Pentateuch, Isidore associated both kingship and priesthood with anointing and pointed to the figure of Christ, who by his anointing with the Spirit became the true high priest and king. The Church shares as a body in this anointing by the Spirit and hence as the Body of Christ is a royal priesthood and a kingly people. Some share in it through baptism, others through ordination. In the Eucharist, the priestly people eats and drinks of the body and blood of Christ and is itself offered with Christ in the sacramental action.

Treating of the ordo sacerdotalis in the Etymologiarum, Liber VII.12 (Patrologia Latina 82, 291–292) and the De Ecclesiasticis Officiis, Liber II.5–7 (Patrologia Latina 83, 780–788) Isidore includes bishops and presbyters in this priesthood. The definition of sacerdos is “to give the sacred or holy (sacrum dare).” The word comes, he says, from sanctificando just as rex comes from regendo. He traced the ordo sacerdotalis back to the giving of the power of the keys to Peter (Matt 16:18). It is exercised in ruling and governing, in preaching and teaching, and in the consecration of the body and blood of the Lord. Within the priestly order, only the bishop bears the title of Pontifex, since he is the prince of priests by reason of his place in the apostolic succession.

After Isidore, ecclesiastical writers maintained this broad understanding of the nature and functions of the ordo sacerdotalis but focused increasingly on the priestly power exercised in the act of consecration in the Mass, drawing extensively on the Aaronic priesthood as type of the sacerdotal order in the Church. This meant that the consecration of the body and blood of Christ was also viewed as the act of eucharistic sacrifice. Authors made a distinction between the action of the priest in consecrating and that of the people in offering by distinguishing in sacrifice between offerre and immolare. In Christ's own death the consummation of the sacrifice is in his immolation. In the Mass this means it is found in the consecration when the bread and wine are changed into his body and blood and his immolation represented. All offer (themselves, bread and wine, even Christ) but only the ordained priest can consummate the sacrifice and represent the immolation of Christ's death [On this, see for example Amalar of Metz, Liber Officialis (ed. Hanssens II, 106–108), and Paschasius Radbertus (Liber de corpore et sanguine Domini (Corpus Christianorum, Series latina)].

An example of how this applied to liturgy may be found in an eleventh century writer, ODO OF CAMBRAI, in his work Expositio in Canonem Missae (Patrologia Latina 160:1053–1070), in which he explains the Canon of the Mass. Odo locates the sacrifice of praise, sung by all the people, in the Sanctus of the Mass, the consecration of the body and blood of Christ in his own words repeated by the priest, and the daily offering of this sacramental sacrifice by the whole Church (both present and absent) in the prayers of offering that follow the consecration when the body and blood of Christ are on the altar. The people are thus able to join their sacrifice of praise with the real sacrifice, which is that of Christ, now sacramentally represented in the Mass through the offering of his body and blood made really present through the words of Christ repeated by the priest.

Sacerdotium et Regnum. An important medieval influence on concepts of priesthood and the ordering of the Church came from the quarrel over sacerdotium and imperium or regnum that marked the relations of Pope and bishops with kings and emperors. With the emperor CHARLEMAGNE there emerged the idea and pursuit of a single societas christiana and a new vision of the divine commissioning of emperor and later of kings. The role of the Prince was to defend the Church and uphold a Christian society against its enemies. At times the claim was made that his task was to rule the Church when it came to the ordering of society. Liturgical books (e.g. Ordines Romani XLV, XLVI, XLVII, in Michel Andrieu, Les Ordines Romani du haut moyen âge, t. IV. Louvain 1965) of the time included rites for the consecration, and even the ordination, of emperors and kings, making of them a special order in the Church, distinct from both clergy and laity. The model was taken from the Old Testament, according to which kings, priests, and prophets were all anointed. The divine origin of temporal power, whether through natural law or by special ordinance, was confirmed by jurists, canonist, and even theologians. Though usually princely power was not related to Christ's kingship, at times the emperor or kings were called vicars of Christ in the exercise of their rule.

Around the cusp of the millennium, episcopal authorities found the encroachment on ecclesiastical affairs by princes impossible to concede and responded by an assertion of their supremacy over principalities in both religious and temporal matters, though without however claiming direct temporal rule for themselves. To limit trespass on affairs of the Church, strong popes like GREGORY VII and INNOCENT III thus found it necessary to claim some authority in temporal matters. Innocent was ready to admit that temporal rule came to lords of the realm from God, whatever be that process, but he asserted some control over the temporal in virtue of his spiritual authority. This came from the subordination of the temporal to the spiritual, so that temporal rulers needed to acknowledge papal superiority over the regnum in virtue of the higher order of sacerdotium (See the letter of Oct. 30, 1198, Epistula ad Acerbum consulem Florentinum: Patrologia Latina 216, 1186). Between the two luminaries set by God in the universe, the pontificalis auctoritas and the regalis potestas, the first to rule over souls and the second to rule over bodies, the greater dignity is that of the pontifical, so that from it, as the moon from the sun, the regal receives its dignity and splendour.

These attitudes were confirmed by THOMAS AQUINAS in his work on the rule of princes (De Regimine Principum ad Regem Cypri, ed. Joseph Mathis. Turin and Rome: Marietti, 1948). Kings, he taught, hold their authority from God, both by reason of the very nature of rule and by reason of the ordinances of divine providence. This power, however, is exercised in temporal things. He separated earthly rule clearly from the kingship of Christ since Christ's power has to do with the spiritual realm, the kingdom of God (chapter XIV). Christ is both king and priest, and from him there derives a royal priesthood (regale sacerdotium) in virtue of which all the faithful are kings and priests. The regimen of this kingdom is not given to earthly princes but to priests, especially to the High Priest, who is the successor of Peter and the vicar of Christ, the Roman Pontiff. Since this is the highest kingdom, the one that is the end of all earthly administration, earthly kings are subject to this high priest. This does not mean that the Pope, in virtue of his kingly priesthood as vicar of Christ, exercises temporal power as a matter of course. It only means that kings and rulers have to acknowledge his ultimate supremacy and that he may intervene in temporal affairs when this seems to be served by the spiritual end of the rule and priesthood which he holds from Christ. This reasoning placed the kingship of Christ clearly in the spiritual order but the theory of the subjection of the temporal to the spiritual provided popes and bishops a say in temporal affairs.

Scholastic Theology on Priesthood

All of these influences on the meaning of priesthood just outlined were present in the Church and in Christian thought about ministry and priesthood when the writers of the schools took on the challenge of offering a system of faith and doctrine. The Master, PETER LOMBARD, defined order and priesthood as a sacred power given through consecration and itself the power to consecrate the Body and Blood of Christ and this influenced those whose task it was to comment on his Summa.

A prior issue is the way in which authors deal with Christ's priesthood and mediation. Consideration is here confined to the primary authors of the period.

In THOMAS AQUINAS's Summa Theologiae, the question on Christ's mediation (III, Q. XXVI) comes several questions after that on priesthood. Attributing the role of mediator to the humanity of Christ, Thomas mentions two functions. The first is to give gifts and teaching to humans on behalf of God; the second is to offer satisfaction to God and to intercede for human beings on behalf of humanity (art. 2). There is no mention of priesthood or sacrifice here, though one recognizes that normally the act of intercession is listed as a priestly function.

On the priesthood of Christ, Thomas (Summa Theologiae III, Q. XXII) had said that what is proper to a priest is that he is the mediator between God and humankind. Being mediator involves three things: to give holy things (sacra dans), to offer the prayers of the people to God, and to satisfy for their sins. Where he says that Christ in his death is both priest and victim, quoting Augustine, De Civitate Dei X.5, he points to visible sacrifice as the sacrament of the invisible and adds that everything which is held out to God (Deo exhibetur) so as to bring the human spirit towards God may be called a sacrifice. Drawing parallels with levitical sacrifices, which according to Rom 4:25 and Hebrews 5:9 have been fulfilled in Christ, he says that the three purposes of sacrifice are to remit sins, to keep the human person in the state of grace, and to unite it with God. When it is said that Christ's priesthood is according to the Order of Melchizedek, this means that it is more excellent than any other priesthood and that it endures for ever in its end and purpose, which is to bring those for whom the sacrifice is made into union with God.

When Thomas treats of the sacrifice of Christ in Summa Theologiae III, Q. XLVIII, art. 3, he uses the definition of Augustine in De Civitate Dei X.6, namely that sacrifice is whatever good work brings us into holy fellowship (sancta societas) with God and then adds the note from this same book, X.20, that the perfection of Christ's sacrifice comes from the perfection of his charity or love. He also quotes Augustine from In Tim IV.14 to the effect that in every sacrifice we may distinguish the one to whom it is offered, the one by whom it is offered, what is offered, and those for whom it is offered. On this score, Christ's sacrifice is most perfect because he is one with the one to whom it is offered, he is the one who offers that which is offered, and one with those for whom it is offered.

There is no mention of the priesthood of Christ in Bonaventure's discussion of mediation in his Breviloquium IV and in the Collationes in Hexameron I, reportatio B, but he does take up the patristic themes of mediation with which the Fathers linked this priesthood. In the work on the Hexameron Bonaventure relates the mediation of Christ to the Cross. It is here, where he takes on sin for humanity's sake, that he is at the most distant point from the divine, but it is here also that the impotence of the crucified is united with the power of the Word. It is then in his ascension that Christ becomes the center, the mediating point, where the divine and a transformed humanity come together. Here and in the Breviloquium IV, 1 and 10, it is the image and function of Principle which stands out. In this, Bonaventure is in line with the thinking of Augustine. Christ as Word of God is principle of creation and principle of redemption.

At the same time, in his explanation of the Eucharist (VI.9) Bonaventure gave prominence to the sacrifice of immolation as an actual offering of the Church and of Christ in the Church. He says that in his suffering Christ offered to God a fully satisfactory obedience. The purpose of this offering is to make satisfaction for sin but it is also to inflame human hearts with the love of the Spirit and thus to unite them to God. It is this love which unites the Church to Christ as a body to its head (V.8). On the other hand, the concept of priesthood gets no treatment in his discussion of the sacrament of Order (VI.12), apart from the use of the title sacerdos in reference to the agent of the consecration of the bread and wine. It is of order and dignity that Bonaventure treats and in ordination he sees a sign of the giving of power (VI.12,5).

It is in his treatment of the sacraments, Summa Theologiae III, Q. 63, that Thomas deals with the participation of the Church in the priesthood of Christ, developing his thought around the notion of the sacramental character. Writers before him had spoken of the character as some share in Christ that undergirds the participation in grace, but it was his own insight to relate this to worship and to participation in Christ's priesthood. This participation is both passive and active. One shares passively in this priesthood by receiving of its fruits through the celebration of sacraments. Ministers share in it actively by serving as instruments in the instrumental action of Christ's priesthood through which the effects of his passion extend into the present. The power for passive participation is given through the sacramental character imprinted in baptism, which equips the baptized to take part in the public worship of the Church, which is his Body. The adjective passive does not signify that the people remain inactive in the liturgy, for indeed Thomas insists on the activity of their faith and on their part in the prayers and the rites. What it brings out is that Christ's grace is totally gratuitous, that not even faith merits or is in any way causative of grace, for humans are always recipients in face of Christ's redemptive action.

If the character of the sacrament of order is said to give an active participation in Christ's priesthood this is strictly as instrumental cause, as the channel and expression of the sanctifying act whereby the passion of Christ is still operative in the present, as explained in Q. 48, art. 5. In Q. 83, art. 4, on the rites of the Mass, Thomas points to three actions of the ordained minister: to say the priestly prayer through which the offerings of the people are made acceptable to God, to consecrate the bread and the wine in the act which signifies Christ's immolation and which is itself a kind of immolation of these gifts since they are now changed, and to give communion to the people.

Aquinas did not get to the treatment of the sacrament of order in the writing of the Summa Theologiae. In other writings, he was so inclined to related order to priesthood and priesthood to the consecration of the Lord's body and blood, that he deemed the episcopacy not to be a sacrament but a higher order given to one who was already a priest in the order of presbyters. In the opusculum De perfectione vitae spiritualis he says that what the bishop possesses is a higher and a holy power which allows him to teach and to govern the Church, as well as to perform his own distinctive liturgical functions, such as consecrating, ordaining, and confirming, which go with this office and ministry. This is the power which Christ gave to the twelve apostles and which is passed on through apostolic succession. Though Thomas described this power as a jurisdiction, he retains enough of the vision of the Pseudo-Dionysius to look upon the episcopacy as a state of acquired perfection and to expect outstanding holiness from those who would exercise this power.

The Sixteenth Century

The Reformers. The Reformers of the sixteenth century were intent on applying Christ's titles of King and Priest to spiritual things and not to temporal, as they were intent to overcome the distinction between the baptized and ordained ministers associated with the doctrine of the sacramental character and priestly anointing.

Martin Luther. In his writings on the role of Christ in human salvation, as well as in what he says of the baptized, Martin LUTHER joins the function of king with that of priest. He elaborates on the sacrifice of Christ in several of his biblical commentaries in terms that often sound similar to those found in patristic writers, but with his own particular view of the imputation of Christ's righteousness to sinners and of justification by faith. In his incarnation, Christ took on the effects of Adam's sin, indeed took on his sin, in order to endure suffering and death on behalf of sinners and thus earn the right to have his righteousness imputed to them. It is by the death and the blood of Christ that the baptized are cleansed and sanctified. Taking on the form of a servant and offering himself in the flesh, Christ is the true Aaron, or fulfills the type of the Aaronic priesthood. None can share in this priesthood, because his sacrifice is unique and once and for all and does away with all sacrifices. His anointing as priest according to the order of Melchizedek is associated more readily with his present role in heaven and his present relation to the Church. By his anointing, like Melchizedek Christ is both king and priest and he enters into these offices through the sacrifice of his death.

While it is mentioned in several places in Luther's writings, a convenient and short presentation of his view of the priesthood and kingship that Christ now exercises and in which the faithful participate, is found in the 1520 treatise on The Freedom of a Christian (Luthers Werke in Auswahl, 31:333–377). He starts with the affirmation that under the Old Testament the birthright of the first-born male was that of priesthood and kingship, but that this is only a type of the priesthood and kingship of Christ, who is the first-born of the Father. Of his kingship, Luther says "he reigns in heavenly and spiritual things" that pertain to the righteousness by which God makes us righteous and rules over believers, protecting them against evil onslaughts. His priesthood is also exercised in spiritual things, not in outer ceremonies and is related by Luther to his heavenly prayer and intercession. In both cases, Christ exercises his kingship and priesthood through the living instruction of the Holy Spirit that guides those who believe in his word and receive his righteousness.

All faithful Christians have a share in this kingship and priesthood, because of the freedom they have been given through Christ and their faith in him. In virtue of a spiritual power, Christians are kings and lords of all things spiritual and cannot be harmed by evil, even though of course they are subject to suffering and the onslaught of the devil. As priests, Christians are able to appear before God and pray for others, as well as to teach one another spiritual things. In the Babylonian Captivity (Luthers Werke in Auswahl 36, 11–57), Luther elaborates on the many spiritual offerings which the baptized can make because of their life in Christ. These include prayer and alms-giving and the self-offering in which they cast themselves upon Christ. In later years Luther evolved his teaching on ministry, and while he recognized the need and Gospel mandate for ordained ministers of Word and Sacrament, he did not acknowledge any participation in Christ's kingship and priesthood other than that of baptism. To preach the Word and duly administer the sacraments, as ministers are called to do, is to exercise their baptismal priesthood.

Luther resolves the conflict between regnum and sacerdotium in his own unique way, for example, in the work Secular Authority: To What Extent It Should Be Obeyed, Luthers Werke in Auswahl 45, 81–129). He believes in Christendom, that is, that society should be organized and ruled to serve the kingdom of God and the mission of the Church. Secular authority is willed and ordained by God in the interests of the Gospel. Its role is to protect the followers of the kingdom and to punish the wicked. However, it is not said to be in any way a participation in Christ's kingly powers. Luther's fundamental principle is that through baptism all are of the royal priesthood, all are priests and kings without distinction. Within this priesthood or kingship, each must serve according to the position which he holds. Some are called to ministry, some to rule, others to do more ordinary tasks. It is by meeting these duties that one lives out the common priesthood or kingship that comes from Christ, through baptism and the Spirit.

John Calvin. While the division of the three offices of Christ was already developed to some extent by Erasmus, Osiander, and Bucer, in the sixteenth century it received its fullest and most lasting treatment from John CALVIN in the Institutes of the Christian Religion, Bk II, 15. For all three offices, Christ was anointed by the Father when he was sent into the world. The prophetic office was and is exercised through the proclamation of true doctrine. The royal office is the rule that he has over believers through his resurrection from the dead and his sitting at the right hand of God. To explain the priestly office, Calvin predicates it of Christ's role as Mediator and looks both to the sacrifice of his death and his heavenly intercession. Because of the adequacy of his satisfaction for sin, he is now our heavenly intercessor, and it is only through his prayers that we have access to the Father.

For Calvin, there is a sense in which the baptized participate in both roles of Christ's priesthood, that of offering and that of prayer: "We are," he writes, "defiled in ourselves, yet we are priests in him, offer ourselves and our all to God, and freely enter the heavenly sanctuary that the sacrifices of prayer and praise that we bring may be acceptable and sweet-smelling before God" (II.15.6). In fact, to speak of another priesthood, as to speak of the Mass as an immolating of Christ, is "detestable" (ibid.).

With the special priesthood of the ordained in the Church, the Reformers have no truck. Among other things, both Luther and Calvin associate the claim to the chalice at the Lord's Supper with the baptismal priesthood (Luther, The Blessed Sacrament of the Holy and True Body of Christ, and the Brotherhood, Luthers Werke in Auswahl 35, 49–75; Calvin, Institutes Bk IV, 17, 44–47). Calvin eloquently appeals to the testimony of the Fathers in this regard, quoting what they say about the meaning of eating and drinking from the flesh and blood of Christ to which all are called without distinction. This reminds us of how early Christian writers saw participation together at the table of the Lord's Supper as the most fundamental exercise of the royal priesthood.

Council of Trent. It was not one of the tasks of the Council of TRENT to resolve questions of Christology and soteriology, which were not the issues in dispute. The Decree on Justification, chapters six and seven (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1526–1530), when speaking of the redemptive work of Christ used the categories of merit and satisfaction rather than those of priesthood and sacrifice, since these touched more closely on the dispute with Martin Luther. The Decree on the Sacrifice of the Mass (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1738–1750), whose separation from the Decree on the Sacrament was highly significant, explained that in the sacrifice of the Mass Christ is both priest and victim, the same priest and victim as offered on the Cross but now offered in an unbloody manner in this memorial representation, which he left to his Church. The immolation, deemed the essence of sacrifice as this had been spelled out in scholasticism, is located in the words of Christ at the Supper, repeated by the ordained priest who acts by the power of Christ. For the faithful, the best participation in this Mass, according to the conciliar decree, is to receive communion, but assistance at the priestly action, offering oneself in communion with Christ, is also a way to take part in the sacrifice and in its fruits.

The Decree on the Sacrament of Order (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1763–1778) affirmed the institution of the priesthood along with the institution of the eucharistic sacrifice at the Last Supper. In priestly ordination, the recipient is endowed with an indelible sacramental character, which distinguishes the ordained from the baptized. The Council did not resolve the debate about the sacramentality of the episcopacy but did affirm the superiority of bishops over presbyters, attributing to bishops the power to govern the Church, which they hold as successors of the apostles (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 1767/8).

From Trent to the Twentieth Century

In the aftermath of the Council of Trent, marked particularly by the treatise De Ecclesia of Robert BELLARMINE, the royal priesthood of the baptized suffered an eclipse. The Church was viewed as a congregation of the faithful and a hierarchical society, the bishops being endowed with the powers of order and jurisdiction needed to govern the Church, Priesthood as such, and the Sacrament of Order, were practically identified with ordination to the presbyterate and with the celebration of the Eucharist. In his treatise, De Christo Capite totius Ecclesiae (Opera Omnia, Tomus Primus. Naples and Paris: Laureil, 1872), in chapter one Bellarmine treated Christ as Mediator, but without mentioning priesthood. He is mediator in four senses: he judges, he speaks to the people on behalf of God, he prays and makes supplication for others, and he makes satisfaction by shedding his blood for sin and offense, thus releasing sinners by his death. In the first three senses, others also can act as mediators, but it is in the fourth sense that Christ is the one mediator between God and humankind.

In the third book of the treatise, De Romano Pontifice (ibid.), in chapter XXI, Bellarmine connected mediation with priesthood in order to explain, against the attacks of the Reformers, how Christ acts in the actions of priests, especially in the Eucharist. Christ is a priest forever because he offered himself once and for all through his death in order to make satisfaction for sins. Contrary to what the Reformers said of Catholic doctrine, the Mass does not take from this offering, but it is the same priest now offering himself through the ministry of many priests in mystery. Bellarmine mentions the priesthood of Christ only in connection with ordained priesthood, and then the meaning which he gives to the offering of his death is that of making satisfaction for sins.

French School. To understand the theology that prevailed at the outset of the Second Vatican Council, one cannot pass over the influence on the ideal of priesthood of the French School of Spirituality, associated with Cardinal de BÉRULLE and Saint-Sulpice. Pierre de Bérulle's basic theological insight or intuition was what he saw as the intimate union between the ordained priest and Christ the mediator. Sacrifice, in communion with the sacrifice of Christ, is at the heart of this vision of the priesthood. This is not, however, understood in a narrow sacramental or liturgical sense, albeit the celebration of the Mass is at the core of the priest's ministry and of his life. Sacrifice is a gift of self and an act of mediation on behalf of others and must be operative in the entire ministry of the priest, in word and pastoral care as well as liturgy. The perfection of the priesthood in the order of mediation has to carry with it a perfection in the spiritual order, so that it constitutes a higher calling in the Church (see "A Letter on the Priesthood," in Bérulle and the French School: Selected Writings, edited with an introduction by William H. Thompson, translated by Lowell M. Glendon. New York 1989, 183–185).

Monsieur OLIER consolidated Bérulle's ideal of priestly holiness by writing of the special union of the priest with Christ, priest, and victim. Olier's major influence on priestly life came through his conferences on the seven clerical orders, published posthumously as a treatise by Monsieur Tronson (Traité des saints ordres, publié par M. Tronson selon les écrits et l'esprit de Jean-Jacques Olier. Paris 1953). Priesthood is not purely a sacramental office but embraces the entire work of priests for the sanctification of the faithful. Sacrificing his Son as an act of divine sovereignty in restoring holiness to the world, God now unites the priest with himself, as well as with the victim, Jesus. The priest now shares with God the power to produce the Son, in the sacrament of the altar and in the lives of the faithful. He also shares the power to give or send the Spirit, for the sanctification of the Church. This calls for a profound holiness of life, which is nourished by the adoration of Christ in the Blessed Sacrament.

John EUDES (The Priest: His Dignity and Obligations, translated by William Leo Murphy. New York 1947) in turn wrote of priests as other Christs, "walking among men," representing his authority and perfections. Eudes calls on the Celestial Hierarchy of the Pseudo-Dionysius to speak of them as visible gods, who take the place of God in this world. In godlikeness, the bishop is first in rank, the priest second, and the faithful third. Eudes did not neglect the priesthood of the baptized, since they too share in Christ's priesthood, but he ranked them lower than the ordained. He exhorts the faithful to respond to their calling by offering themselves with Jesus Christ as priests and as victim and to welcome Christ to dwell in them through sacramental communion.

Priesthood in Theology before the Second Vatican Council

Before the Second Vatican Council, there were two comprehensive studies of the priesthood of Christ and of the Church which amply cited texts from a long tradition and offered a theological synthesis. In Das Priestertum Christi im Anschluss an den hl. Thomas von Aquin. Vom

Mysterium des Mittlers in seinem Opfer und unserer Anteilnahme (Paderborn 1934), Emil J. Scheller offered a thomistic synthesis but within the boundaries of a long historical study. The nature of the priesthood is rooted in the incarnation of the Son of God and hence is an eternal priesthood. In his understanding of the Alexandrian and Augustinian traditions, Scheller identified mediation and priesthood without differentiation. In his view, for Thomas Aquinas the essence or constitutive form of Christ's priesthood is to reconcile, that is, to atone or make one God and sinful humanity. Scheller located the exercise of this priesthood in the sacrifice of Christ's death, which he called his immolation. Done once and for all on the Cross, this immolation continues to be sacramentally offered in the Eucharist.

For his part, in Le sacerdoce dans le mystère du Christ (Paris 1957) Joseph Lécuyer connected the priesthood of all the baptized and the priesthood of the ordained with the priesthood of Christ through an appeal to patristic writings. With priestly anointing, he associated kingly and prophetic, showing that for both Christ and the Church the three may not be separated. Amply quoting patristic texts, he offered a dynamic view of Christ's priesthood, tracing its origin and enactment through different stages. These are the incarnation, the anointing at the Jordan, the offering on the Cross, his consummation in the glorification of his resurrection and ascension, and finally his eternal priestly intercession. Jesus is the one true priest because he alone could offer the true sacrifice which reconciles humanity with God and penetrate with his immolated and glorified humanity into the heavenly sanctuary. The faithful are priests because through union with Christ and through the gifts of the Spirit, they participate sacramentally in his paschal mystery and can offer spiritual sacrifice in communion with Christ's sacrifice. Their anointing is prophetic and kingly as well as priestly. The ordained share in the threefold anointing of Christ, as did the apostles, that is, as ministers through whom the paschal mystery of Christ is enacted and participated in the Church. Lécuyer thus put the relation between ordained and baptized in the sacramental enactment of the paschal mystery. Ordained priesthood belongs first and foremost to bishops since it is they who are the successors of the apostles. Presbyters share in this priesthood through their communion with bishops. This reverses the medieval tendency to distinguish the two orders by identifying priesthood with presbyters and governing with bishops.

A third theological work of importance to thought on the priesthood was the historical concatenation of texts on the royal priesthood of the faithful by Paul Dabin, Le sacerdoce royale des fidèles dans la tradition ancienne et moderne (Paris 1950). While the author insists strongly on the distinction between the priesthood of the faithful and that of the ordained, and while the texts offered need study in context, the compilation made it clear that ecclesiology cannot be done without considering the royal priesthood of the baptized.

On a practical level, in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries, new perspectives on the relation of all the baptized to the priesthood of Christ and to his kingship began to emerge through their renewed way of taking part in the liturgy and through Catholic Action in the apostolate. While an official recognition of the priesthood of the faithful was already found in the encyclical letter of Pius XII, MEDIATOR DEI (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum, 3851), the key work in giving this theological formulation may justly be said to be Jalons pour une théologie du laïc (Paris 1953) by Yves CONGAR. Congar evoked the words of Saint Augustine where he spoke of the una sancta societas, which is offered to God in the Eucharist, head and members. This communion in faith, service, and worship is the fundamental reality of the Church in which its members partake in different ways according to their order. By the baptismal character, all the faithful share in the priesthood and kingship of the Church and of Christ.

Priesthood is exercised in spiritual sacrifice and through an active participation in the liturgy, both intimately connected. Kingship, as well as prophecy, provide the ground for an active participation in the apostolate. Certainly, kingship (Jalons, 314–366) consists first and foremost, according to Congar, in dominion over the self and in submission to the will of God in all things. A Christian practices freedom of the Spirit in relation to temporal matters and thus in their exercise appears as an eschatological sign of the ultimate nature of Christ's kingship. However, it is also in virtue of this kingship that lay persons have some active role in the apostolate and in regulating the affairs of the life of the Church itself, something for which canon law should make provision.

The Second Vatican Council

Such writings amply prepared the way for consideration of the Church at the Second Vatican Council. In the course of the Council itself, one of the first issues which the bishops had to decide was whether the episcopacy is a sacrament or simply a governing and jurisdictional power added to the priesthood already received. Once it was decided to treat of it as a sacrament, it was clear that the ministry which flows from ordination could not be seen uniquely as sacramental or liturgical. Liturgical history, now better known through the critical edition of liturgical sources, made it clear that a person could be ordained to the episcopacy without receiving any previous order. It was also noted that bishops were ordained by the laying-on of hands to a ministry that comprised sacrament, teaching, and pastoral care.

The way found to allow for this ampler view of the episcopal office was to relate it directly to Christ's own mission and then to distinguish the threefold office of Christ as priest, prophet, and king, in each of which the bishops are said to share. This same distinction was used to explain the ordination and ministry of presbyters and deacons. It was likewise followed in presenting the relation of all the baptized to Christ and his Church. All the members of the Church, each in their own place, were thus said to participate in the priestly, royal, and prophetic anointing and office of Christ.

While the term "royal priesthood" was used by the Church or of the baptized in a comprehensive way (e.g., Lumen gentium 10), it is clear that in the documents of the Second Vatican Council priesthood is not the fundamental term by which to designate order and the role of the ordained. Mission, consecration, and anointing, as ways of participating in the reality of Church and of Christ's redemptive work, serve as more basic terms for both the baptized and the ordained. These terms provide the foundation for talking of a share in the anointing and mission of Christ as priest, prophet, and king.

The role or office of Christ as Priest is associated primarily with the Church's sacramental worship. In the composition of the conciliar texts, the comprehensive designation of the Church, the Body of Christ as "royal priesthood" gives way to a use of the separate terms of priesthood, prophecy, and kingship. Priesthood is usually predicated of liturgical participation, prophecy of a role in spreading or teaching the Gospel, and kingship of witness to the kingdom of God in the world and of the role of Church government. While these titles offered a useful way to face some of the emerging questions about episcopacy, laity, and the mission of the Church, the distinctions and the use of the titles are closer to the thought of John Calvin than to that of the patristic Church.

Though they have served good purpose in theology and in ecumenical dialogue, there are some problems about the use of these titles as a way of retrieving a scriptural and patristic tradition. Where it is said that the Church has been constituted as a royal priesthood by Christ the High Priest in LG 10, the scriptural texts cited are Revelations 1:6 and 5:9–10, and 1 Peter 2:4–10. However, in these texts the kingdom and the priesthood of the Church are said to flow from Christ as king and as witness, rather than as priest. This, as seen from the scriptures, is significant for the meaning of priesthood as a quality of the Church and of its members.

Differentiating priesthood from other offices, whether of Christ or of the Church, does not have a clear scriptural foundation. As already seen, in the early Church "priest" alone, or "priest and king" as a couplet, served as symbolic terms that presented and interpreted the entire work of Christ, often in this case being joined with "sacrifice." In describing the redemptive work of Christ, his overcoming of sin and death, his reconciliation of humanity with God, these terms were used as metaphors to express the unique and distinct character of his atoning mission.

While the tendency has been to follow through with the Calvinistic and conciliar distinction, the theological elaboration of the insights contained in a larger view of the Church's mission and ministry would benefit from a careful study of scriptural and patristic tradition. The prevailing usage does not do full justice to the original use of the metaphor of priesthood and its relation to the overcoming of sin and death through the taking on of flesh, self-emptying, and suffering. Nor does it do justice to the image of royal priesthood. To list priesthood alongside other offices or to predicate it narrowly of sacrament and liturgy misses its comprehensive allusion to the whole life of the Body of Christ in its participation in Christ's mystery.

Conclusion

The overview of tradition has brought to light three ways of using the image or the idea of priesthood.

The first has its origin in scripture and patristic writings. Christ is called the priest or king of the new covenant, his death is called the sacrifice by which sin and death are blotted out and through which humanity is given access to God. This priesthood is from eternity because it springs from the Father's love and fidelity. It endures into eternity where Christ sits in his risen flesh at God's right hand. Priesthood, kingship, and sacrifice are terms used by the scriptures and by ecclesiastical writers to express the identification of the Son of God with weak humanity and the strength of the suffering through which he took on the powers that would undo humankind. Transformed in their own flesh by reason of the taking flesh of God's Son and their sacramental communion with him, those who are given access to God through Christ, the Church his body and his people, are a royal priesthood. In this, there is no difference of kind among his members and the only difference of degree is in the depth of communion with him, in the splendor of holiness that manifests and transmits God's love. It is this which readies for ministry and ordination to the service of others.

A second attribution of priesthood follows from this. The communion of Christ and his members in the one Body is sacramentally celebrated through rituals of initiation and in the eating and drinking of his life-giving flesh and blood. Sacramental communion is the basic act of the royal priesthood and the offering of spiritual sacrifices flows from the sacramental gift. Within this context of sacramental representation, however, the role of the bishop took on its own representative character. His actions in the sacramental mystery represent the presence and the action of Christ and his teaching and pastoral ministry lead the faithful to this mystery. Hence there emerged a special attribution of priesthood, as well as of kingly power, to bishops, and thus to presbyters. However, this usage remains firmly grounded in the priority of the sacramental representation of Christ's life-giving sacrifice in the gift of his body and blood and so in the prior attribution of royal priesthood to the whole Church.

A third attribution of priesthood emerges later, particularly in the Latin West, and it is given to the ordained in virtue of their role and power to act as instruments of Christ in the sacraments and especially in the Eucharist. This attribution manifests a change of concern, language, and thought-structure wherein categories of being, power, order, and office prevail. The concept of Christ's own priesthood is affected, for it is closely related to his action in the sacraments and in the offering of the Eucharist. The combat with sin, suffering, and death, which is foremost in the Letter to the Hebrews, recedes in favor of the language of cult and satisfaction for sin. Instead of being used as metaphors to express the meaning of this combat and its efficacy, priesthood, sacrifice, and kingship are used as definable concepts in their own right.

In terms of the exercise of instrumental power, participation in Christ's priesthood was distinguished into passive and active, into being recipient and being instrument. Enough was retained of the scriptural and patristic imagery of priesthood, as in the French School of Spirituality, to see that being a priest must mean close identification with Christ in his suffering and his service of others. However, the concepts of office and power dominate. To be a bishop or a priest is a call to communion with Christ, priest, and victim, but it is fundamentally a communication of power. In contemporary documents and theological writing, rather than attributing a passive power to the priesthood of the baptized, they are said to have an active part in liturgy and in offering spiritual sacrifices in virtue of their baptism.

It is in regard to the third attribution of priesthood that the doctrine of the Second Vatican Council speaks of a difference not only in degree but in kind (LG 10). The meaning is clear, and a distinction of offices and roles in the Church is necessary for the sake of the ordering of community and of communion. The language of power is indeed tempered by the language of service, and it is often repeated that the mission of the ordained priesthood is to serve the priesthood of all the baptized. However, to speak of differentiation in priesthood through kind obscures the fundamental sacramental mystery of the royal priesthood of the Church as a sacramental and spiritual body. A preferable use of language may be to distinguish mission, ministry, and service. It would be more respectful of the first, fundamental and most original use of the language of priesthood which has to do with the power of Christ's suffering for sinful humanity and with the royal priesthood of his people, those who have been saved through this mystery.

PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL

Term applied to those responsible for one of the main traditions in Israel that was gradually edited to become the "Priestly Code" and conflated with the YAHWIST and ELOHIST traditions and with Deuteronomy to form the Pentateuch. The Priestly Code (abbreviated P) contains a story of creation, genealogies, a story of the flood, patriarchal narratives, an account of the Exodus and Covenant and a large number of laws. Because of its interest in laws and in the cult and because of the liturgical cast of its narratives, it is attributed to the priests of Judah. It is recognizable by its more didactic and redundant style, its numerical symbolism, chronological precision, and liturgical and legal emphases. P developed over a long period of time, many of its laws reflecting a primitive milieu. Probably in the postexilic period it incorporated the originally independent Holiness Code (or "H," Leviticus ch. 17–26; see HOLINESS, LAW OF) and other material and, in the middle of the 5th century B.C. was conflated with the Yahwistic, Elohist, and Deuteronomistic traditions (J, E, D). P now provides the chronological and ethnological framework for the Pentateuch. (see PENTATEUCH for details and bibliography.)

PRIMACY OF THE POPE

The word primacy, which in general use means the state of being first, as in time, place, rank, etc., as applied to the pope means his state of being first of all the bishops, not only in rank or dignity, but in pastoral authority. The primacy of the pope, then, is that full, supreme, and universal authority over all the bishops and faithful of the Church which belongs by divine right to the bishop of Rome as the successor of St. PETER, who received such a primacy among the APOSTLES directly from Christ.

The doctrine of papal primacy, while always present in the deposit of revealed truth, was not always and in every part of the Church so clearly understood or explicitly professed as it has been in the Western Church since the time of Pope St. Leo the Great (d. 461). Lacking the space that would be needed to trace the history of this doctrine, this article will limit itself to presenting the three most authoritative statements that the Church has made on the nature of the papal primacy, namely, the decrees of the Council of FLORENCE and of the two Councils of the Vatican.

Council of Florence. The bull of union with the Greeks, Laetentur caeli (1439), contains the following solemn definition of papal primacy: “We likewise define that the holy, apostolic see and the Roman pontiff hold the primacy over the whole world, and that the Roman pontiff himself is the successor of blessed Peter, prince of the Apostles, and that he is the true vicar of Christ, head of the whole Church and father and teacher of all Christians, and that to the same in blessed Peter was given the full power of feeding, ruling, and governing the whole Church, as is contained also in the acts of the ecumenical councils and the sacred canons” (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 1307). While this decree enjoyed only short-lived acceptance by the Greeks, it did mark a decisive victory in the West over conciliarism, the doctrine of the superiority of an ecumenical council over a pope.

Vatican Council I. In the canon concluding the third chapter of its dogmatic constitution Pastor aeternus, the first VATICAN COUNCIL solemnly defined that the Roman pontiff has not merely an office of inspection or direction, but the full and supreme power of jurisdiction over the whole Church, not only in matters that pertain to FAITH AND MORALS, but also in those that pertain to ecclesiastical discipline and government throughout the whole world; that furthermore he has not merely the greater share, but the whole plenitude of this supreme power, and that this power is ordinary and immediate, both over all the Churches as well as over all the pastors and faithful (Denzinger 3064). Other aspects of the doctrine of papal primacy contained in the decree, but not resumed in the canon, are the following. The end for which Christ instituted the primacy is to ensure the undivided unity of the episcopate, by which in turn the whole body of the faithful is maintained in UNITY OF FAITH and communion (Denzinger 3051). While the pope’s power of jurisdiction over the whole Church is truly episcopal (3060), it does not conflict with the authority that the bishops have to rule their flocks as true pastors (3061). The pope has the right to communicate with the bishops of the whole world without interference from secular rulers (3062). He is the supreme judge to whom appeal can be made in all ecclesiastical cases; there is no higher authority in the Church to which appeal can be made over his judgment (3063).

In the Acts of the Council one finds an authoritative explanation of the terms episcopal, ordinary, and immediate, by which papal power is described in the decree. The intention of the council was to exclude the doctrines of such writers as J. von HONTHEIM, J. Eybel, and P. Tamburini, who had allowed the pope an authority outside of the Diocese of Rome only similar to that of a metropolitan archbishop with regard to the other dioceses of his province, that is, an authority of inspection rather than of true pastoral jurisdiction, limited to certain extraordinary cases of the neglect of their duties on the part of the local bishops. Against this, the council defined the pope’s authority over the whole Church to be truly episcopal, meaning that he has the same kind of authority over the whole Church as each bishop has in his own diocese; to be ordinary, meaning that it belongs to the very nature of the papal office; and to be immediate, meaning that the pope can exercise his episcopal authority over the faithful of any diocese, without being required to use the bishop’s mediation (J. D. Mansi, Sacrorum Conciliorum nova et amplissima collectio 52:1103D–06A).

On the other hand, as the official spokesman for the conciliar Commission on Faith explained, papal power is not unlimited or arbitrary. It is limited by the divinely given constitution of the Church, one of the basic elements of which is the episcopacy; hence the pope could neither in theory nor in practice deprive the bishops of their pastoral function or reduce them to the status of mere vicars of the pope [Mansi 52:715B–C; cf. Leo XIII, Satis cognitum, Acta Sanctae Sedis 28 (1895–96) 732].

St. Peter received his supreme power not for the destruction but for the building up of the Church, and in using it he was bound by the divine and natural law (Mansi 52:1105C–D; 1109A). Still, it must be admitted that there is no juridical appeal in the Church against a possible misuse of papal power. In the case of a publicly heretical or schismatic pope, most theologians hold that the other bishops collectively would have the authority to declare this man no longer pope, and to sanction the election of his successor. But against an abuse of papal power, the Church would have to resort to moral remedies: to persuasion and to prayer, relying on Christ's promises of divine aid (Mt 28.20).

Vatican Council II. In the third chapter of its Dogmatic Constitution on the Church, the second VATICAN COUNCIL, while affirming the collegial nature and authority of the episcopate, at the same time emphasizes the role of the pope as the divinely appointed head of the episcopal body or college. This college, it declares, has no authority except in union with its head, who has, in virtue of his office as vicar of Christ and pastor of the whole Church, the full, supreme, and universal authority over the Church, which he can always freely exercise. The college of bishops, always understood as united with the pope and never as separated from him, is likewise a subject of supreme and full power over the whole Church, but it cannot exercise this power without the consent of the Roman pontiff. It exercises this supreme power in a solemn manner in ecumenical councils, which it is the prerogative of the pope to convoke and to confirm; moreover, collegial authority can be exercised by the bishops dispersed throughout the world, provided that the head of the college summons them to a collegial action, or at least approves or freely receives their united action, so that it becomes a truly collegial act [22; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 25–27].

From this it follows that there are two ways in which supreme authority can be exercised in the Church: either personally by the pope, or collegially by the whole episcopate, necessarily including the pope; there are not two separate supreme authorities that could ever come into conflict. The pope, as head of the body, remains free to decide whether a particular decision calls for collegial action or not. The other bishops, even collectively, have no authority to oblige the pope to choose the collegial rather than the personal exercise of supreme power in any given case. The fact that they can share in acts of universal jurisdiction does not give them such a right to do so as would conflict with the pope's liberty to exercise his supreme authority as he judges best [Nota explicativa 3–4; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 74–75]. Hence there is no reason to see in the doctrine or practice of collegiality any conflict with the doctrine of papal primacy. To say that the pope, as head of the episcopal college, is in all his acts inseparably united with his fellow bishops, who by their membership in this body are made capable of sharing with him in the exercise of supreme authority, is in no sense to diminish that plenitude of authority which Vatican Council I defined the pope to have. The one visible head, to whom all the members are joined in love and obedience, is, by Christ's will, the manifest sign and the efficient cause of the unity of the episcopal body, by whose unity, under the guidance of the Holy Spirit, the whole Body of Christ is assured of its oneness.

PRIMEVAL AGE IN THE BIBLE

The period of the origins of the world and of man as related in Genesis ch. 1–11. Although the Pentateuch as a whole is based upon four main sources, only two of these, the priestly (P) and the Yahwistic (J) sources, are represented in the first 11 chapters of Genesis (see PRIESTLY WRITERS, PENTATEUCHAL; YAHWIST). Moreover, the literary genre of these chapters is of such a peculiar nature that it must be studied in detail for a proper understanding of the narrative.

Ancient Traditions

The primeval age covers the period from the creation of the world to Abraham. It can be divided into three main parts: (1) the creation and the Fall: Gn 1.1–6.4; (2) the Flood: 6.5–9.17; (3) the Flood to Abraham: 9.18–11.32.

Structure and Contents. Although the J and P traditions are mixed in Genesis ch. 1–11, it is useful to list each tradition separately.

1. J tradition
 - a. 2.4b–3.24: creation of man and woman, paradise, temptation, and Fall
 - b. 4.1–26: Cain and Abel and genealogies
 - c. 6.1–8: increasing corruption of humanity
 - d. 7.1–8.22: Noah and the Flood (interwoven with P)
 - e. 9.18–27: sons of Noah; sin and curse of Canaan
 - f. 10.8–19, 24–30: peopling of Earth
 - g. 11.1–9: tower of Babel
2. P tradition
 - a. 1.1–2.4a: creation account
 - b. 5.1–32: genealogy from Adam to Noah
 - c. 6.9–22: Noah and the ark
 - d. 9.1–17: covenant with Noah
 - e. 10.1–7, 20–23, 31–32: descendants of Noah; Table of the Nations
 - f. 11.10–26: descendants of Sem

History and Nature of Traditions. The tradition called J (10th century B.C.) contributed the underlying structure and gave the theological bearing to Genesis ch.1–11. It assured continuity and provided perspective for patriarchal history, since the latter was based upon a history that went back to the world's origins. About the 5th century B.C., the tradition called P received its present form, having previously been fluid from the 10th to the 5th century. During these 500 years, both traditions, representing popular collections of oral and written material, some of which was very ancient, underwent a formative process of reshaping and rethinking. The men who formed J and P were not creators of traditions, but rather religious thinkers and interpreters of events that were significant in the life of ISRAEL. So too, when the final redactor integrated the traditions into the present Genesis account, he presented a highly evolved compendium of theological insights on Israel's experienced history.

An analysis of these isolated J and P sections discloses far-reaching agreements as well as marked differences. Common to both is the general content and the central theme of universal good and evil. The differences lie chiefly in details of the accounts. The creation accounts clearly show two distinct traditions. Even though P is later, it does not use J's earlier material. Substantial unity is evident; yet there are differences in style, vocabulary, and the method of representing God in His relations with men. Thus both J and P traditions must have been incorporated side by side in the final editing.

Such an arrangement, however, is not used throughout primeval history. The Flood story, ch. 7–8, is the best example of a composite account, or a combination of P and J sources. In this narrative, the editor, respecting his source material, did not alter either tradition, but skillfully intertwined the two as into an artistically woven tapestry. The intricate combination caused duplications (cf. 6.13–22 with 7.1–5), contradictions in regard to the number and kind of animals taken into the ark (cf. 6.19–20; 7.14–15 with 7.2–3), variations in the timetable of the Flood (cf. 7.24; 8.3–5, 13–14 with 7.4, 10, 12; 8.6, 10, 12), and separate sources of the Flood's water (rain in 7.4, 12; 8.3, but the fountains of the abyss and heaven's windows in 7.11; 8.2). The traditions, even when fused, were reverently left unaltered because they were sacred and untouchable history. Although the traditions were recounted side by side in writing and thus in all their glaring contrast, they could not be changed by whim, for the contrasts themselves had become parts of sacred history.

Literary Genre

Genesis ch. 1–11, along with the patriarchal history of ch. 12–50 (see GENESIS, BOOK OF) form a prologue to Israel's history that actually began with the experience of election and salvation in the exodus from Egypt. Both these introductory sections were added later and were composed in the light of Israel's experience. The first 11 chapters related Israel's particular history to that of the whole world. Through its constant experience of God's salvation, Israel had developed, over many centuries of theological reflection, a profound understanding of the human-divine relationship and of God's activity in history. Chapters 1–11 are the compendium of that reflection, written in a literary form that bound together a group of independent but meaningful narratives into a religious epic that reaches historical proportions.

Description of the Genre. The primeval age as described in this account is not prehistory in the modern sense of the word, for the aim of the biblical writers was not to present a scientific, biological, anthropological, or geological record of the past; nor were they capable of rendering such an account of either the universe or man's origins. This primeval history is not even history for its own sake; it has an altogether different purpose. It is, rather, interpreted history or faith—imbued perception and understanding of experienced history. It uses historical data as well as legendary or popular traditions and sagas to teach fundamental religious truths. The literary form chosen by the biblical author is not comparable to modern literary types, nor does it correspond to the classical categories and thus must not be judged according to their norms. The literary forms of Genesis ch. 1–11 are to be evaluated on the basis of how well they achieve their own authors' desired goal. The ancient historical form employed a simple, popular style proper to a recently civilized people who used concrete and graphic narratives vividly to impress religious truths of great importance.

Ethical monotheism is the essential, vital, and distinguishing mark of these early biblical accounts. The basic tenets of Israel's monotheism are expounded through the integration of vivid stories, which contained a theological message, into a drama for the purpose of expressing the doctrines presupposed in the plan of salvation, namely, creation by God at the beginning, the special intervention of God in the production of man and woman from whom all humanity is derived, an original state of moral integrity and happiness, sin of the first pair of humans, the Fall, and the hereditary trials and punishments for sin.

Through its experience of God and His mighty acts, through faith and reflection, as well as practical and speculative wrestling with the great problems of life, Israel arrived at the knowledge of these early events. The religious conviction of good and evil was reflected upon, universalized, and extended in a historical mode to the very beginning of God's creation. Cast into a loosely historical genre whose vagueness was inevitable because of the time span between the events and the date of the writing, the colorful pedagogic narrative was the vehicle most fitting for Israel to express and to teach its beliefs in the divine and human realities of its ethically monotheistic system.

Origin of the Genre. The external form of the biblical narratives of events before the time of Abraham was not something that had been invented by Israelite tradition; it was available from the traditions of other cultures. Biblical tradition was familiar with Mesopotamian stories; the Patriarchs, in fact, had come from this region. Among the many foreign etiologies, or origin stories, the most conspicuous sought to explain such insoluble mysteries as the origin of man and the universe, order, the diversity of peoples and language, the pain of childbirth, the attraction of the sexes, the necessity of labor, and the inevitability of death. Given the relationship in theme between the biblical and other ancient eastern narratives, the biblical authors were probably indebted to ancient models also in matters of arrangement, phraseology, and details. Of far greater moment was the intentional interpretation imparted by the authors of J and P to the independent stories, which resulted in the spiritual message that was conveyed through unifying the separate scenes into one drama of religious history. Through dominating religious themes, the etiologies were turned into a profound theology that was related to Israel's SALVATION HISTORY.

Contents and Themes. At the very outset, Israel manifested its polemic with polytheism by presenting the creation story in an ethicomontheistic framework and by emphasizing that in the beginning all creation was good, since God had created it. The best known of various ancient creation myths was the Babylonian ENUMA ELISH (J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament [2d, rev. ed. Princeton 1955] 60–72). Purified of any suggestion of biological relationship or struggle between chaos and God, the P tradition simply affirmed that everything that is came from the effortless word of God. The J tradition colorfully affirmed the profound theological truth that the essential datum of man's life is his immediate, direct, and total dependence on God. Thus Israel declared its faith that its own history was inseparably related to the world's history and that Israel's role in the world had meaning only because Earth and all men were made and preserved by Israel's God. Israel's experience that God had created it as His people presupposed that He existed as the unique Master of all peoples (Ex 19.5). From the awareness of election, Israel developed its consciousness of God's creation of and concern for all mankind and the universe.

Creation and Fall. The stage had been set for a panoramic view of universal history with the creation stories that formed a basic structure for all reality. Written in what has been called a liturgical didactic hymn, the creation story of ch. 1 was part of Israel's all-including praise of God in which it depicted His original plan. God's goodness was shown in His establishing of man over all creation. But even more important was God's granting to man an intimate friendship and union with his Creator. The story of PARADISE with the TREE OF KNOWLEDGE and the TREE OF LIFE became a theological medium to express that God placed only one restriction upon man—that he acknowledge his character as creature by acknowledging his Creator. Otherwise man was free and autonomous. From this picture of what God intended life to have been, the rest of the creation account portrayed what life actually was, what man had become, and how he had arrived at his present sad state. God was good, and there was good in the world; but in Israel's experiences, evil, disorder, and man's unhappiness were obvious. How did evil originate? The condition of man surely was not the blessed state described in the paradise account. God's plan had somehow been thwarted. Israel explained evil's origin as the result of man's willful separation from God. The alienation from God was not willed directly by God, but was the result of man's rebellion. Couched in anthropomorphic symbolism, the dramatic scenes of the temptation by the SERPENT in Paradise, the fall of man, and its consequences, taught a theology of sin and punishment that explained the reason for man's dire situation. The determination of the specific character of the first sin was not the author's preoccupation; through disobedience man violated the one simple law of the creation COVENANT and thus denied his own status of dependency. The theme of condemnation following upon sin was commonplace throughout salvation history.

All was not lost, however. God, on His part, did not withdraw all the blessings of His creation pact; the human couple did not immediately die, but were condemned to a hard life that would end in death. Nevertheless, the battle against evil continued, indicating that man had not been completely conquered by the serpent. The PROTO-EVANGELIUM had been proclaimed. God continued to have concern for man by clothing him (3.21) and by allowing him to use his function as the source of new human life (3.20; 4.1). Yet man could not himself undo sin's effects; only God could take away the curse.

As the narrative progressed, the effects of sin and evil became, however, more serious. Chapter 4 presupposes an already highly developed civilization (4.2), institutional worship (4.3), and widespread population (4.14). It does not relate, then, the fortunes of the first man's sons. Originally the tradition may have reflected the animosity between shepherds and farmers, but the story has been elevated from a tribal saga to a universal lesson by the biblical author. The bitter fruits of rebellion infected all the descendants of the first humans. Sin led to sin and gathered momentum; it had repercussions in every walk of life. The first sin resulted in a strained relationship between God and man that led to enmity between man and his brother. Murder, jealousy, bigamy, and revenge were added to the list of rebellion. In the story of Cain and Abel the author used the theme of freedom of divine choice or election, an undercurrent of all sacred history. Verse 6 summed up the author's purpose for inserting the story at this point. "Sin is crouching at the door like a beast" means that sin was loose in the world, but man could and must master its temptation. The entire story, however, ends on a note of hope by emphasizing God's mercy toward Cain. Throughout salvation history sin evoked God's punishment; but in punishing, God always tempered justice with mercy.

Genealogies. The schematic mnemonic device, adopted from oral transmission, that linked present men to their ancestors by name was a form common to the priestly tradition. Here in Genesis the lists are not historically genealogical trees, but serve to span immense time gaps. The biblical author, desirous of demonstrating the unity of the history of salvation and of building toward the climax of his epic, employed the genealogies of P and a few from J to achieve both ends. (See GENEALOGIES, BIBLICAL.) Neither P nor J traced the genealogies back to the first man merely for purposes of national history. Rather, they recognized that God transcended history and played the decisive role in it from the first man down to their generation. The Cainite list in J (4.17–26) was based on two combined streams of tradition that were not harmonized. To Cain's progeny (v. 17–24) was appended a parallel line of Seth (v. 25–26), which also contained Cainite names. The J tradition described the cultural progress of organized community life, new occupations, and new professions. But simultaneous with cultural progress, there was an apparent increase in sin, expressed in the increased brutality of the "Song of the Sword" (4.23–24).

The Sethite genealogy of P (5.1–33, continued in 11.10–26) was a continuation of Gn 2.4a. There were 10 Patriarchs before the Flood and 10 after, corresponding to Babylonian king lists. But the long lives are very moderate when compared to those in Babylonian lists. The symbolic significance of the numbers is not known, but with the diminishing life spans, the biblical author wished to teach that man was deteriorating morally, thus setting the stage for the FLOOD (see PATRIARCHS, BIBLICAL).

The Deluge. A warning of impending disaster is given in 6.1–4. This mysterious and isolated fragment is mythological in flavor and has been the source of many controversial opinions. Recently discovered Hittite texts containing translations of Hurrian myths with Mesopotamian elements, dating back to the 2d millennium B.C., relate a popular legend regarding the birth of Nephilim or giants (Nm 13.13) from the union between mortals and heavenly beings. (See SONS OF GOD.) The J author might have alluded to such a legend. Without making any judgment on its truth, he placed it in the context of the Flood for etiological reasons. The mixture of superhumans with men served as an example of the increasing human perversity that occasioned God's punishment. The 120 years of 6.5 was already a shortening of the life span because of increased depravity.

In the biblical traditions, the Flood was not described as a natural event. In J it is employed as a parable of God's mercy and justice. The essential difference between the Flood story in J and in other ancient versions of such a cataclysm lies in the religious interpretation of the disaster. The J tradition expanded legendary stories about what might originally have been a great Mesopotamian flood to universal proportions to emphasize that YAHWEH, in contrast to the mythological gods, was a moral God who did not act capriciously but with a righteous purpose. His judgment was tempered by the mercy shown to Noah and his family. Yahweh was a saving God, and from the small remnant, He would make a new beginning. A new covenant was made between God and man (9.1–17) in language that was almost the same as that of the creation covenant. Yahweh would never again destroy mankind by a flood; the regularities of nature and the rainbow (8.20–22) were signs of His faithfulness to the pact. The Flood thus marked the end of one epoch in the relationship between God and man and the opening of a new one.

From Noah to Abraham. The salvific mercy shown to Noah did not long hold in check man's inclination to evil (8.21). The story of the discovery of wine, Ham's sin, and the curse of Ham's son, Canaan, came from J and indicated its low esteem for the Hamites and CANAAN and the Canaanites (9.18–27). The J tradition concluded its epic by inserting the TOWER OF BABEL story. Since the diversity of nations was already contained in Yahwistic elements in ch. 10, which came mainly from P, the story of the confusion of languages must have been incorporated in order to inculcate a religious lesson. The actions of the men in this story implied that man's impulse to revolt was still deeply rooted in him. Mankind had made little progress in his relationship to God.

The narratives of paradise, Cain and Abel, the Flood, and the tower of Babel were progressive variations on one theme. Man was a creature who had rebelled by arrogantly defying his Creator. In each case the sin was punished by God. Man attempted to obtain control of creation by severing himself from God and by obtaining complete security by himself alone.

The Yahwist thus brought his primeval history to a close on a sad note. The human situation appeared irremediable; men were geographically dispersed, separated from their fellow men and alienated from God. Yet it was precisely toward this perplexing situation that the Yahwist had orientated his dramatic epic. From Adam to the tower of Babel, he portrayed man in his highest dignity and in his pitiful distress. Unable by his own strength to bring order into his disordered world, man had to wait patiently and trustingly for God to take the initiative in restoring him to the full measure of the inheritance he forfeited by sin.

Genesis ch. 1–11 ended in utter tragedy, but it described only a part of the whole plan of salvation; the story was not over. Beginning with the call of Abraham (ch. 12), God's redemptive activity was to initiate His salvation response to man's need.

Jesuit missionary and architect; b. Milan, Italy, Oct. 10, 1673; d. Paraguayan Reduction of La Candelaria, Sept. 11, 1747. He entered the Society of Jesus in 1716 and went to Buenos Aires with another architect, Brother Andrés Blanqui. After completing their novitiate in 1719, they began their collaboration. Both were professional architects, and they acted also as builders, working well together. The contention that one worked as the architect, the other as the builder is not true. Together they were responsible for most of the constructions in La Plata during their lifetimes: the cathedrals of Córdoba and Buenos Aires; the churches of La Recoleta; Las Catalinas, San Francisco, and La Merced in Buenos Aires; the Monserrat School in Córdoba; and the Cabildo of Buenos Aires, as well as many churches in the Reductions and many private homes in Buenos Aires, Santa Fe, and Córdoba. They generally adhered to the prevailing style in the country, which had a charming simplicity of line and harmonious proportions. However, when circumstances demanded, they knew how to introduce innovations as in the church of San Francisco in Buenos Aires and the façade (now destroyed) of the cathedral of Buenos Aires.

PRINCE-BISHOP

A medieval, ecclesiastical institution peculiar to the Holy Roman Empire—even beyond the boundaries of Germany proper—denoting certain bishops (and abbots) who possessed not only spiritual jurisdiction but also temporal authority. They were independent governors of specific civil territories under the exclusive sovereignty of the emperor, and, like the secular princes, they participated in the governing of the empire itself.

Origin and Development. The origins of this institution lie in the early Middle Ages when the Germanic tribes closely associated priesthood with authority either among kinsmen or within a tribe. They lie also in the advancement of the social position of bishops effected by Constantinian imperial Church law, even though the episcopal power of arbitration was unable to make headway in Germanic territories. Furthermore, during the period of the migration of the barbarian nations bishops became the protectors of their flocks, saw that their people were fed and their cities defended, and handled all negotiations with the enemies. In consequence, by Merovingian times they had become almost lords in their sees—a situation comparable to that of the popes in the STATES OF THE CHURCH. The MEROVINGIAN and the CAROLINGIAN rulers, who, with few exceptions, named all bishops throughout their kingdom, generally attracted these educated, usually noble, and, because of the Church's property, wealthy bishops into government service. The bishops were treated as secular nobles. CHARLEMAGNE entrusted all of them, as membra imperii, with the establishment of law and order. In return they were granted numerous civil privileges: tax exemption, legal immunity, and, eventually, such sovereignty rights as the privilege of market and mint. As early as 887 Emperor Charles III had granted the rank of count to the bishop of Langres, and in 927 Henry I did the same for the bishop of Toul.

The Ottonian System. This development reached its climax under Emperor OTTO I, who opposed the secular nobility within the empire by establishing a reliable aristocracy of churchmen who were extensively invested with imperial rights and property. The economic and military services that the bishops and abbots were to render the empire were precisely regulated, and with their help the German emperors ruled supreme. But difficulties arose when, because of the political influence of his prelates, the emperor felt he had the right to intervene in their appointment (see INVESTITURE STRUGGLE). The problem, however, was resolved in the compromise Concordat of Worms in 1122, after which the bitter investiture controversy subsided. Meanwhile the conceit of the hierarchy was severely shaken. During the Ottonian period they had considered themselves partners in the regale sacerdotium, living as they did in the security of an undivided secular and religious world (e.g., BRUNO OF COLOGNE, ULRIC OF AUGSBURG). But the investiture controversy had drawn them into a serious internal conflict, which each had to resolve differently, according to his own judgment and insight. Furthermore, the Concordat of Worms made them conscious of a certain independence and autonomy that they as churchmen possessed.

Religious Governors. The imperial reform of the 12th century connected princeliness with a specific territory that was now within the feudal authority of the king. This was the origin of the first real "imperial" bishops and abbots. Through the letters of privilege of Emperor FREDERICK II (1220 and 1232), imperial bishops and abbots became completely sovereign within their territory: the membra imperii became principes imperii and were an integral part of the empire. The prince-bishops were elected by their cathedral chapters; they, in turn, through their superiors, the three ecclesiastical electors in the Rhineland (Mainz, COLOGNE, and TRIER), soon won great importance at the election of kings or emperors. On an even broader scale, the prince-bishop (e.g., Berthold of Henneberg, Archbishop of Mainz), concerned with the imperial reform that Emperor Maximilian I had initiated in his German lands, made common cause with the GRAVAMINA of the German nation against Rome. The character and level of religious devotion evidenced by prince-bishops varied greatly over time and from place to place. In the later Middle Ages and the early modern period anti-clerical polemic and peasant rebellions frequently singled out the prince-bishops for some of their harshest attacks. Following the Council of TRENT many of the prince-bishoprics remained noble dominated institutions that were resistant to reform efforts. In modern times the prince-bishops tended to become the chief supporters of the empire, great patrons of art and culture (e.g., SCHÖNBORN), and especially the exponents of the trend toward a German national church.

The territories controlled by prince-bishops were relatively small when compared with their political importance. Thus even the archbishop of Mainz, who from the 10th century was arch-chancellor of the empire, governed a territory that would be considered modest by modern standards. Besides the three Rhineland Archdioceses, Salzburg, AQUILEIA, Utrecht, LIÈGE, and Würzburg were among the larger prince-bishoprics of the Holy Roman Empire.

Secularization. The so-called reform of Emperor SIGISMUND had already broached the issue of secularization of ecclesiastical territories. Then, during the Reformation, the middle and northern German principalities were actually secularized; those of northwest Germany were preserved only through the military intervention of the house of Wittelsbach. Later FREDERICK II THE GREAT, as part of his anti-Hapsburg imperial policies, forced the dissolution of all prince-bishoprics in Germany. The 1803 enactment of the delegates of the empire (Reichsdeputationshauptschluss) under Napoleon abolished them entirely, with the exception of Abp. Karl Theodor von DALBERG, who remained for a few years more in Regensburg. A few dioceses in Austria still retained the title of prince-bishopric in the 20th century.

Not to be confused with the prince-bishops are those prelates of the very numerous (about 40) imperial monasteries, who did not hold lands through feudal tenure and who had a voice in the diet only insofar as they were associates of the bench of prelates, at whose invitation they could participate.

PRINCIPLE

Something first in a certain ORDER, upon which anything else follows. An order of before and after is found in many things and in different ways. This article merely describes the scholastic notion of principle as applied to nature and to knowledge, and gives some distinctions that are commonly associated with it.

Principles in nature and knowledge. A succession of parts, one after another, is discernible in the material world, not only in the magnitudes of bodies but also in their MOTION and in TIME. The order of parts identifiable in local motion, itself most evident to man, enables him to understand the order in other changes. Hence he speaks of the principles of making or generating, which may be either intrinsic to the product or extrinsic to it. The foundation, or first part made in an edifice, is an intrinsic principle; likewise, the first part developed in organic generation, such as the heart or the brain, is such a principle. On the other hand, the mover or source of the motion is an extrinsic principle, as is the end or goal of the agent, insofar as the agent tends to a good beyond itself. The first principles in the order of nature are usually identified as matter, form, and privation (see PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE; MATTER AND FORM).

In the learning process, that which first becomes known and leads to further knowledge is called a principle. The basic truths prerequisite for all learning are named axioms; other propositions that are only relatively first and of particular application, whether true or merely probable, are called hypotheses or postulates. According to the natural realism of ARISTOTLE and St. THOMAS AQUINAS, axioms express reason’s grasp of things as intelligible, with their necessary and universal reasons of being. According to Immanuel KANT, principles of thought merely express reason’s understanding of necessary and universal relationships included in ordinary analytic judgments and, more especially, in judgments referred to as synthetic a priori. Kant doubted whether these principles are valid or true of things distinct from man’s knowledge.

Furthermore, the rules and standards of art are called principles. In morals and politics, the rules of conduct and the standards of judgment are similarly referred to as principles, and this term is applied in law to the basic sources from which consequences flow. In each science and art, besides the first principles basic to the whole discipline, there are other principles proper to particular kinds of things included in the general subject. In arithmetic the basic principle is the unit, but each number is a principle of its own properties. Likewise, in geometry the point and the line are basic principles, but particular curves and figures serve as further principles. In physical science also, general principles hold for all natural things, and special principles for special kinds of things. In this way the principles of a science are about as numerous as its conclusions.

Common distinctions. A distinction is usually drawn between a principle and a cause. Every cause is also a principle, but some principles are not causes. Cause implies a certain influence on the being of the thing caused, and is defined as that upon which something follows of necessity and with dependence in being. But for a principle it is sufficient that it be first upon which something follows, whether or not it influences being in another. Moreover, a principle is not always something positive, as a point or part of a line, but may be something negative, as the darkness that precedes dawn, or something privative, as sickness that precedes health recovered.

From the examples given it is evident that the priority signified by a principle is often relative to a certain order under consideration and is not usually absolute or in every order. Only GOD is the absolutely first and strictly necessary principle (see UNIVERSE, ORDER OF). According to Catholic theology, there are certain principles even in the Holy TRINITY, as the Father is a principle with respect to the Son, and Father and Son are one common principle with respect to the Spirit.

What is a principle in one respect may be consequent in another respect. Some principles are first and prior in the nature of the case, that is, according to the order of being, whereas others are first only in regard to man’s knowledge or consideration. Some principles are first in the order of theoretical knowledge, as the principle of CONTRADICTION or the principle of CAUSALITY, whereas others are first in the order of practical knowledge, as the principle of doing good and avoiding evil, and of preserving and perfecting the self (see SYNDERESIS).

PRINKNASH ABBEY

Benedictine abbey outside Gloucester, southwest England. Anglican Benedictines under Aelred Carlyle (d. 1956) settled on Caldey Island (1906 and 1913); and, together with the nuns' Abbey of St. Bride, converted to Catholicism in 1913. They continued as Benedictines, but their conversion occasioned a decline in their material resources. CALDEY (now a Trappist abbey) was sold, and the Benedictines moved to Prinknash Park, given to them by Thomas Dyer-Edwardes (1928). Under Abbot Wilfrid Upson (1938–61) Prinknash flourished and founded priories at FARNBOROUGH and PLUSCARDEN (Scotland).

PRIOR

The official title of certain superiors in some religious communities. The Latin noun prior was used in the 6th century with a meaning close to that of the modern English “superior”; with this meaning the word is used seven times in the Rule of St. Benedict. The contemporary meaning of prior came into use with the Cluniac reform and became common in England only after the Conquest. At this time the term appeared in reference to monastic officials who replaced and subsumed the praepositi and decani of the Rule—that is, those chosen by the abbot to share in the government of the community. From that time to the present, the Benedictines and the Cistercians have had three principal kinds of superior called prior. (1) The conventual prior is the elected superior of a conventual priory, an independent house that has not been elevated to the dignity of an abbey; with minor exceptions the conventual prior has the same power in his own house as the abbot does in his. According to the custom of the congregation, he is elected by his own monks for life or for a definite period. (2) The obedientiary or simple prior is the ruler of a dependent priory; he is appointed by the superior of the motherhouse and may be removed at the will of his superior. (3) The claustral prior is an official in an abbey and is appointed by the abbot; he shares as much of the rule of the monastery as is delegated to him by the abbot. To these three kinds of prior, found everywhere among the Benedictines, could be added the cathedral prior of medieval England, where the unique custom developed by which the bishop's chapter was constituted by an independent Benedictine priory. In some congregations of the 11th and 12th centuries, such as that of Cluny, in addition to the prior claustralis, there was a prior major, whose power extended to various dependencies of the monastery. In large medieval monasteries, second and third priors were sometimes appointed. The term prior passed over into the vocabulary of the later medieval institutions. The Premonstratensian canons preserved the full monastic vocabulary with respect to superiors. The Carthusians, Dominicans, Augustinian friars, Carmelites, and Servites preserved the use of the word prior to designate the superiors of their conventual priories; this usage was preserved, too, among some orders no longer existing, such as the Gilbertines and the military orders. Also, the word prior was used to refer to several new kinds of superior; thus the head of a group of priories is called a prior provincial among the Dominicans, Augustinians, Carmelites, and Servites; and the head of the order is called the prior general in the orders of the Augustinians, Carmelites, and Servites.

PRIOR MARRIAGE (IMPEDIMENT TO MARRIAGE)

Among the impediments to marriage, the Code of Canon Law lists that of prior marriage: “One bound by the bond of a prior marriage, even if it was not consummated, invalidly attempts marriage” (Codex Iuris Canonici c. 1085 1). The Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches also states that one bound by the bond of a prior marriage invalidly attempts marriage (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 802 §1).

The foundation of this impediment is not merely the law of the Church, but also the divine law. By both natural law and divine positive law, marriage possesses the property of unity. Therefore, any valid marriage precludes the possibility of entering another marriage by either consort unless the previous marriage has been dissolved. The Church teaches that the natural law itself forbids such a plurality of marriages, so that even the unbaptized cannot enter a valid marriage so long as the bond of a prior marriage exists.

The basis of this impediment is the property of unity that marriage enjoys and not the property of indissolubility. The prior marriage in question may be capable of dissolution for a cause other than the death of one of the spouses. Such would be the case in the use of the Pauline Privilege, whereby the marriage of two unbaptized persons is dissolved at the moment the marriage that favors the faith is contracted. Moreover, a marriage that has not been consummated may be dissolved by papal dispensation for a just cause (Codex Iuris Canonici c. 1142; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 862).

In the 12th century there was a dispute among two schools of canonists as to whether or not an unconsummated marriage was a perfect marriage. Some argued that a second marriage that was perfected by consummation would not be invalid because of the existence of the prior marriage. Pope Alexander III (1159–81) opposed such a theory, even though he probably held this opinion as a member of the School of Bologna before his accession to the Papacy. By the phrase “even it was not consummated” the code reaffirms the correct solution to this dispute.

“Even if the prior marriage should be invalid or dissolved for any reason whatsoever, it is not allowed to contract another marriage until it has been lawfully established that the former marriage was certainly invalid or dissolved” (Codex Iuris Canonici c. 1085 §2; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 802 §2).

It is to be noted that the absence of a spouse for a long time is not in itself sufficient proof of death. If death cannot be proved from public documents, the diocesan bishop can issue a declaration of presumed death (Codex Iuris Canonici c. 1707 §1; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1383 §1). The bishop must have moral certitude of the death of the spouse in order to issue the declaration (Codex Iuris Canonici c. 1707 §2; Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1383 §2). In uncertain and complicated cases, the Latin bishop must consult the Holy See (Codex Iuris Canonici c. 1707 §3), while the Eastern bishop is to consult either his patriarch or the Apostolic See of Rome (Codex Canonum Ecclesiarum Orientalium c. 1383 §3).

PRIORESS

The religious superior in certain houses of religious women. The word prioress is derived from the late medieval Latin word priorissa, which was certainly not in common use before the 11th century. This word was used to designate three kinds of superior: the claustral prioress, who assisted the abbess in government of the abbey; the prioress of a dependent house; and the prioress of an independent or conventual priory. The Benedictine prioresses of medieval England were often sophisticated aristocrats, as may be gathered from Chaucer’s caricature, The Prioress, which was probably meant to represent the wealthy superior of an independent Benedictine house. The terminology has been preserved into modern times not only by the Benedictines and Cistercians, but also by the later medieval foundations that have survived: the Dominican nuns, the Poor Clares, the Carmelite nuns, the various congregations of the Canonesses Regular, and the Bridgettines.

PRIORY

Any religious house governed by a prior or a prioress. The equivalent Latin word, prioratus (like the word prior, from which it is derived), did not come into common use until the 11th century. At this time there occurred a vast multiplication of religious houses, especially in France. Cluny was the principal, but by no means the only, house of this period that established many dependent houses. Some of these new houses, or priories, remained dependent on their motherhouse; others became independent, conventual priories; still others were advanced to abbatial status. In each case, the name priory was given because of the title of the superior, the prior or prioress. In England, besides the dependent and conventual priories of nuns and monks, there were also the cathedral priories attached to the cathedrals (see PRIOR). The term priory has been preserved not only by the Benedictines and Cistercians but also by many of the institutions of the later Middle Ages; thus today not only the monks but also the Premonstratensian Canons, the Dominicans, Carmelites, Carthusians, Augustinians, and Servites call some of their houses priories.

PRISCA (PRICILLA) AND AQUILA

There are three references to Prisca (Priscilla) in the Pauline letters (1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:2–5; 2 Tm 4:19) and another three in the Acts of the Apostles (Acts 18:2–3, 18, 26). In the Pauline letters she is called Prisca, whereas in Acts she is called Priscilla, which is the diminutive of Prisca. Among the individuals connected with Paul's evangelizing work, Priscilla and Aquila stand out because they are always mentioned together as a married couple. A Judeo-Christian couple, originally from Pontus in northern Asia Minor, they converted to Christianity most likely in Rome. Priscilla is usually named before her husband, which may imply that she had a stronger personality or that she was the more active of the two.

By examining the historical and social setting in which their mission took place, a more comprehensive view emerges of the couple's evangelizing activities.

They moved from Rome to Corinth, as a result of the Emperor Claudius's edict, probably in 49 A.D., of expulsion against the Jews (Acts 18:1–2). In Corinth they met Paul. They hosted him in their home, offering him not only a place to stay but also employment in their tent-making workshop (Acts 18:2). When Paul left Corinth for Ephesus, the couple accompanied him (Acts 18:18). In Ephesus they hosted a community in their house and were actively involved in instructing Apollos "more accurately" about Jesus (Acts 18:26). The earliest reference to the couple is 1 Cor 16:19 when Paul, probably writing from their home in Ephesus, associates the couple in greeting the Corinthians. In the letter to the Romans (16:2–5) they head the long list of people greeted by Paul. Paul speaks highly of them and calls them "my co-workers in Christ Jesus." The title "co-worker" is given by Paul to a limited number of people associated with his missionary work, and Prisca and Aquila are the only married couple given this title. As close friends of Paul, they even "risked their own necks" (Rom 16:3) for him; how or when is unknown. Since only Roman citizens would be sentenced to decapitation, one wonders whether this phrase hints to death by decapitation, thus revealing the social status of the couple as Roman citizens. Their willingness to face dangerous situations for a common cause strengthened the bond between Paul and the couple. Paul says then: "To whom the Churches of the Gentiles give thanks." Though of Jewish origin (at least Aquila), the couple was supportive of Paul's mission to the Gentiles in Corinth and Ephesus.

The church that met in their home in Rome was probably a mixed assembly of Gentiles and Jews. Gentile Christians felt welcomed by Prisca and Aquila and were grateful to them. In 2 Tm 4:19 Paul, imprisoned in Rome, sends greetings to Aquila and Priscilla who are in Ephesus. If 2 Tm is an authentic letter of Paul, it provides additional information about Paul, Priscilla and Aquila, and if it is not written by Paul, it evidences how renowned Priscilla and Aquila were in the post Pauline era. Taking advantage of the sophisticated transportation system of the Roman Empire, Priscilla and Aquila traveled extensively and established themselves in some of the most bustling cities of the empire, like Rome, Corinth, and Ephesus. In these cities they opened their house to host other Christians. In early times of Christianity the house was the gathering place to celebrate their liturgy and to support one another. Of the four times (Phlm 2; Col 4:10; 1 Cor 16:19; Rom 16:4) in which the house churches are mentioned in the NT, two of them refer to Aquila and Priscilla's house in Ephesus (1 Cor 16:19) and Rome (Rom 16:4). The apocryphal Acts of Paul refers to Priscilla and Aquila when Paul enters their house in Ephesus. The Acts of Aquila mentions Clement and Niketas as the sons of this couple and describes the relationship of Aquila and Priscilla with Peter in Rome. Some archaeologists relate the church of St. Prisca in Rome to the site of the house of Prisca and Aquila on the Aventine.

PRISCA VERSIO

The Prisca Versio is a canonical collection from the fifth century. It is also called the Itala Versio and is dependent upon the Atticus Versio. It is different from the HISPANA VERSIO with which it should not be confused. The Prisca contains the canons of Nicaea and Sardica, with the same numbering, omits the Council of Laodicea, adds the Council of Chalcedon (whose canon 28 is attributed to the Council of Constantinople), and includes also some African canons. The Prisca was established at Rome. Its date is controversial. According to C. H. Turner, it was after Chalcedon; according to E. Schwartz, it was made under Pope Anastasius II (496–498) or Pope Symmachus (498–514). It is best preserved in the Collectio Ingilrami (also called the Codex Chieti or Teatini) of cod. Vat. Reg. 1997, and in the MS of Justel (Bodleian, Mus.100–102). According to W. M. Peitz, the Prisca Versio is the work of DIONYSIUS EXIGUUS.

PRISCILLA, ST.

Priscilla, also known as Prisca, was thought to be a Roman lady of the senatorial family of Acilii Glabrones.

Her name is associated with the ancient cemetery on Via Solarea. She is not to be confused with the Prisca mentioned by St. Paul (Rom 16:3; 1 Cor 16:19) and in Acts 18:2, 18–26. In the 5th century there appeared in Rome a titulus Priscæ on the Aventine, and this, as in like cases, became at the end of the 6th century Sanctæ Priscæ. However, in the Martyrology of St. Jerome for January 18, mention is made of a virgin Prisca or Priscilla; in one codex she is called a martyr and in later codices is connected with Rome. The 7th-century Itineraries know a Prisca martyr, buried in the cemetery of Priscilla and in the Sacramentarium Gregorianum there is the Mass of Bl. Priscilla martyr. The present Church of St. Priscilla on the Aventine stands over an ancient sanctuary of Mithras.

PRISCILLIAN

A highly educated Spanish nobleman after whom the ascetic movement of PRISCILLIANISM is named; b. Spain, c. 340; d. Trier, 386. After his conversion to Christianity Priscillian joined a lay community of ascetics, who became wandering preachers. After seeking to reform the clergy, they turned to a wider mission and encountered considerable success but also a fanatical reaction in Lusitania. Priscillian and his supporters, Bps. Instantius and Salvian, were denounced by Bp. Hyginus of Córdoba to their metropolitan, Bp. Hydacius of Mérida. The Council of Saragossa (380), at which only ten Spanish bishops were present, passed canons against the participation of women with men in religious gatherings; against lay doctors or teachers; and against Christians absenting themselves from church during Lent (c.1; 7.2). Canon five was probably directed at the rebellion of Priscillian, Instantius, and Salvian against their metropolitan. Despite this, Priscillian was elected bishop of Ávila. His opponents, Hydacius and Ithacius of Ossonoba, appealed against him to the secular authorities, alleging charges of Manichaeism and magic. Exiled from their province, Priscillian, Instantius, and Salvian traveled to Rome; Salvian died there, and the others journeyed to Milan. They failed to win the support of Pope DAMASUS or St. AMBROSE, but were reinstated by the civil authorities. Upon the successful revolt (383) of the usurper Maximus, however, their position was again jeopardized; and Instantius was deposed by a Council at Bordeaux (384–385). When Priscillian unwisely appealed to Maximus, he was condemned as a Manichaean, together with six supporters, and was executed at Trier.

PRISCILLIANISM

Early Priscillianism was a mystical movement that originated in Spain during the late 4th century. It betrayed traces of that early Christian disdain for the institutions of the world that reminds one of DONATISM, and it became suspect because of its originally lay leadership and intense proselytism. Priscillianism created groups of devotees, especially among women, who withdrew from the regular church services to hold gatherings of their own. It made use also of apocryphal writings filled with a spirit hostile to marriage, wine, and meat, and it insisted on a theory of inspiration, based on the place given by the New Testament to prophecy in the early Church. Priscillianist asceticism seemed more coherent and logical than orthodox asceticism in that it directed its message intentionally to all the faithful and was not content with reaching merely a select minority.

The fragmentary and biased nature of the sources for the study of Priscillianism that is represented by the writings of adherents or of violent opponents makes it all but impossible to resolve the main problems concerned with this movement. Historians have not decided whether PRISCILLIAN himself was merely a leading ascetic and the founder of an ascetic movement or a heretic. It is important to distinguish rigorously between (1) the works ascribed to Priscillian himself or, alternatively, to his supporter, Bishop Instantius, (2) later Priscillianist writings, and (3) the references and quotations found in the works of adversaries of Priscillianism. The extreme asceticism recommended in authentically Priscillianist tracts can be paralleled in the practice of many contemporary Eastern ascetics, whose orthodoxy was never questioned.

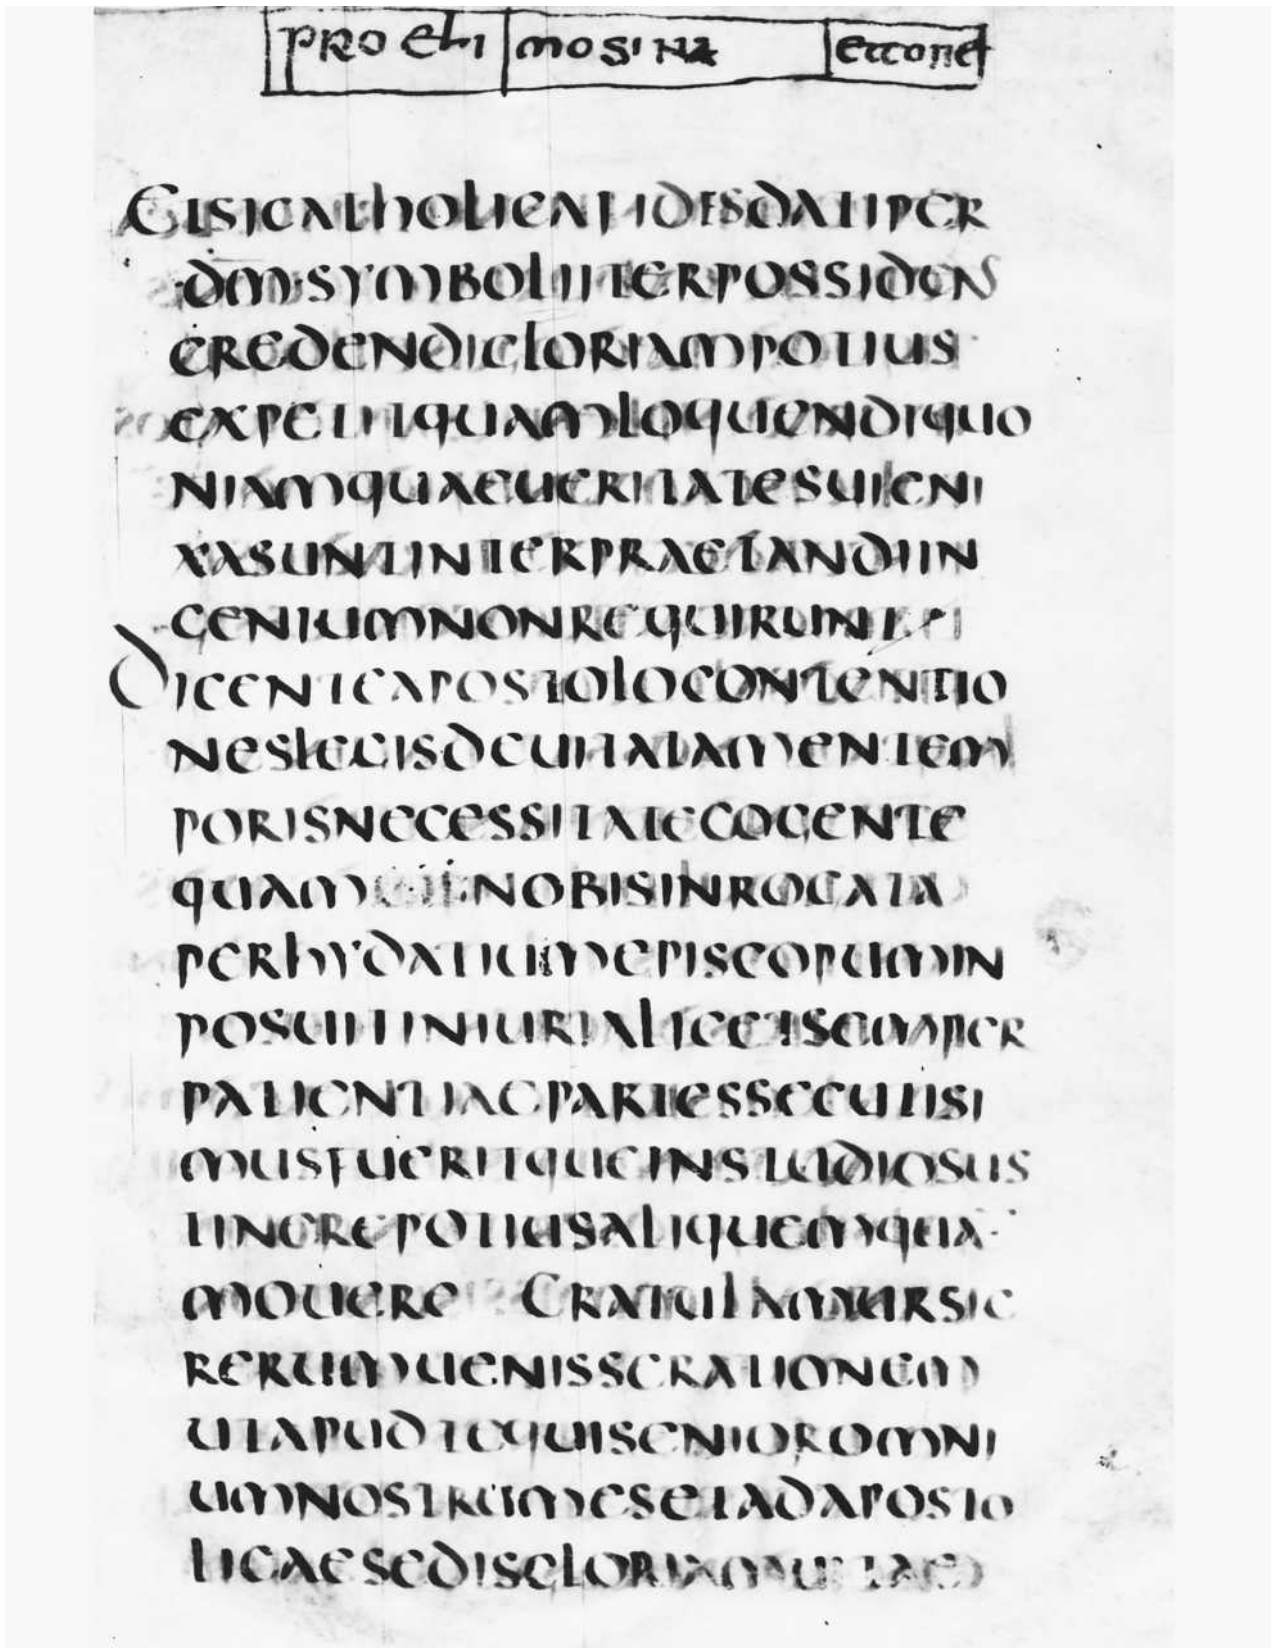

The accusations of GNOSTICISM and MANICHAISM leveled against early Priscillianism do not seem capable of proof; the condemnation of Priscillian himself and his execution at Trier were due mainly to political reasons and to the personal hatred indulged by Priscillian's opponents, Hydacius of Mérida, Ithacius of Ossonoba, and other worldly bishops. The execution was condemned not only by Priscillian's supporters, who saw him as a martyr, but by St. MARTIN OF TOURS, St. AMBROSE, and Pope SIRICIUS. The refusal of Pope DAMASUS and St. Ambrose to support Priscillian and his friends when they were first exiled in 381 seems to have been due to the fact that the Spaniards were canonically in the wrong, being in opposition to their metropolitan, Hydacius, and to the Council of Saragossa. Hydacius and Ithacius resigned or were deposed after the fall of their protector, the Emperor Maximus, in 388. But the stories they spread about Priscillianism were generally credited, and the Priscillianists themselves aroused legitimate suspicion among Catholics.

Having first dominated virtually all the province of Galicia, the movement deliberately aimed at obtaining the election of its leaders as bishops in Lusitania. Later it extended to southern France; and there was a Priscillianist bishop in Provence as late as 417 (Zosimus, Epistolae. 4.3). Almost inevitably, Priscillianism came into conflict with the not very strict Spanish bishops and later with the imperial authorities.

Priscillianism secured the support of some educated laymen, who produced apologetic works, now lost. After Priscillian's execution Galicia remained solidly Priscillianist until 400, when most Galician bishops were reconciled to the Church at the First Council of TOLEDO. Among them was Dictinius of Astorga, author of the Libra, which was denounced (c. 420) to St. AUGUSTINE because it justified lying to escape condemnation for heresy. After 400 Priscillianism survived in Galicia, where it was condemned by Orosius (c. 414), by Bp. Turibius of Astorga (c. 445), by Bp. Montanus of Toledo (c. 530), and by the First Council of Braga in 561. That council anathematized 17 errors, attributing them to Priscillianists. But Priscillianist works were produced after this date, and the errors denounced by opponents of later Priscillianism are a compound of SABELLIANISM, GNOSTICISM, and MANICHAISM. The influence of Priscillianism can be noticed in the maintenance of the tradition of continence in clerical marriage already upheld at the Council of ELVIRA (c. 33); its effect on the text of the Bible should be noted also.

PRITCHARD, HUMPHREY, BL.

Lay martyr; sometimes given as Humphrey ap Richard; b. in Wales; d. July 5, 1589, hanged at Oxford, England. While the pious Humphrey worked at St. Catherine’s Wheel Inn, opposite the east end of St. Mary Magdalen’s Church, Oxford, he covertly assisted refuge Catholics for 12 years. He was arrested and sent to Bridewell Prison, London, with BB. Richard YAXLEY, Thomas Belson, and George NICHOLS for assisting unlawful seminary priests. When told during his trial in Oxford that he did not know what it was to be a Catholic, he replied that he knew what he was to believe and that he would willingly die for so good a cause. He was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Nov. 22, 1987 with George Haydock and Companions.

PRIVATION (PHILOSOPHY)

Privation is the lack of a quality or form normally required by the nature of a thing. It is a type of contrariety, and is thus to be distinguished from simple negation, which is based on contradictory OPPOSITION. Privation (Gr. στέρησις) is opposed either to possession (Gr. ἔξις, Lat. habitus) or to form (εἶδος) as to its contrary.

Historical Development. ARISTOTLE claims, with justice, to have introduced the concept of privation into philosophy (Phys. 192a 3). His dialectic concerning the principles of CHANGE and the changeable shows that monistic cosmologists, such as Anaximenes, and pluralistic ones, such as Anaxagoras, invoked a sort of contrariety, but that all failed, as did PLATO, to distinguish between privation and the underlying substratum of change. St. THOMAS AQUINAS defines privation as neither an aptitude for form nor an inchoate form, nor some imperfect active principle, but the lack or contrary of form itself (In I phys. 13.4). For Aristotle and St. Thomas privation is an incidental (per accidens) principle of CHANGE.

A new note was added in the Renaissance philosophies of NICHOLAS OF CUSA and Giordano BRUNO. They made privation a third essential principle of change and the changeable, together with MATTER and FORM. For them, privation implies matter and form and reconciles their contrariety: their position thus anticipates in a way the Hegelian “negation of the negation.” Maurice BLONDEL, in his philosophy of action, perceived in privation the foundation of the inexorable process of human will and action, regarding it as the principle from which one should start when investigating the origins of will and of man’s theandric destiny [L’Action (Paris 1893) 293, 368].

Privation is here considered from the Aristotelian-Thomistic viewpoint as a principle of change and of changeable being, with emphasis on its relationship to matter, its role in Aristotle’s astronomical theory, its ontological status, and its causality.

Principle of Change. Although the concept of privation can be investigated through logical and linguistic analysis (cf. Cat. 12a 26–13a 36), its full richness is uncovered through the study of change. Here it is found that the coming-to-be of physical being requires three principles: an underlying subject or substrate that persists through the change; a determination of that subject, which is the term or end of the process; and a lack or absence of determination, which is its inception (see MATTER AND FORM). Both the substrate (matter) and its determination (form) are essential or per se principles of the coming-to-be; the third principle, privation, is incidental or per accidens. The term incidental or per accidens, sometimes associated with the contingent, has a special meaning in this context. Although privation is incidental, it is not contingent, for while it may be contingent that a subject have this particular form, or be deprived of it, it is still necessary that it be in one state or the other. Thus privation is a necessary principle of change. Incidental (per accidens) here has the meaning of “through another” (per aliud). It merely “happens” (accidit) that a subject lacks the form of which it is deprived, and therefore privation exists through this subject in an incidental or indirect way (In 1 phys. 13.3).

Relationship to Matter. The relation of privation to the subject can be understood only in terms of the pure potentiality of primary matter. Throughout the early chapters of bk. 1 of the Physics, Aristotle avoids the term matter (ὕλη), speaking rather of subject (ὕποκειμενον). Only in ch. 9 does he clarify his usage: “For my definition of matter is just this—the primary substratum of each thing, from which it comes to be without qualification, and which persists in the result” (192a 31). Until this point he has been concerned with change as it takes place in a determinate subject, e.g., in this gold or this man. Such a subject, while numerically one, must be twofold conceptually: it must contain an aspect that survives through change, a substratum, and an aspect that does not change, a privation (Phys. 190a 13–20).

Privation and Potentiality. Privation is intimately associated with matter, but can be distinguished from it in terms of matter’s potentiality and natural appetite for form (In 1 phys. 15). Potency and act divide being and every genus of being, including that of substance. Potentiality is not a property of matter, but matter itself as ordered to substantial form. Privation bespeaks no such ordering. It is NONBEING by its very nature, while matter is nonbeing in a qualified sense, precisely as lacking determination to a certain form. Molten bronze in a crucible is nonbeing only as it is amorphous: it becomes a statue when poured into a mold. Again, although primary matter is, in St. Augustine’s phrase, “nearly nothing” (prope nihil—Conf. 12.6), it is for St. Thomas “nearly a thing” (prope rem—In 1 phys. 15.4) because it is potency in the genus of substance. Privation, then, is not identified with the potentiality of matter.

Privation and Appetite. Aristotle describes matter as having a natural desire or appetite for form, as a woman desires a man, or the ugly the beautiful (192a 17–24). The simile is Plato’s, but the application is quite different from his. Under the Platonic confusion of matter and privation, matter was conceived as desiring its contrary (form), and therefore its own destruction. For Aristotle, however, matter is ordered to form as to an end, and this ordination constitutes its natural appetite. Yet matter stands in different relationships to different forms: (1) It looks to forms it has not yet had with a sort of desire, for desire bespeaks a tendency to an absent good. In primary matter this natural desire is purely passive. (2) With regard to forms once possessed, but later passed away, matter may be said to have an inefficacious desire. The proportion between matter and form remains, but there is no potentiality in nature for the past, and no natural agent is capable of reintroducing the same numerical form. (3) As to the form actually possessed, the natural desire is quieted, but not satiated, for no natural form is infinite in act. Since matter possesses infinite potentiality, it has an inclination to all forms not possessed; this non-possession is privation.

Principle of Changeable Being. A particular difficulty arises in connection with these distinctions. All scholastics agree that privation is a principle per accidens of change itself and of changeable being in coming-to-be. Several present-day manualists deny that privation is a principle of changeable being once it is constituted; for them, privation ceases with the coming of form. The position is understandable, but it is not that of Aristotle and St. Thomas. The latter states: “But someone could object that privation does not happen to a subject when it is under a form; thus privation is not a per accidens principle of existing. Therefore it must be said that matter is never without privation because when it has one form it is with the privation of another form. . . . Thus the privation of the opposite form is the per accidens principle of existing” (In 1 phys. 13.4, tr. Kocourek).

It should be noted, however, that the privation that is a principle of coming-to-be is not to be entirely identified with the privation that is a principle of being. The first is the contrary of the form that is the term of the process; the second is the lack of every form not now actually informing the matter, but that could inform it. In the second case, privation is the unfulfilled potentiality of matter.

Privation, then, is always associated (per accidens) with matter and changeable being, whether in coming-to-be or in being itself; it is a necessary principle of changeable being, furnishing the radical explanation of its changeability.

Aristotle’s Astronomical Theory. Additional light is shed on privation by the use Aristotle makes of it in his astronomical theory. For him, privation is not found in heavenly bodies. Inadequate observational data and presuppositions now known to be untenable led him to assert a radical difference between sublunary and celestial bodies. The latter do not come to be, but are eternal and not subject to substantial, quantitative, or qualitative change. They are neither heavy nor light by nature, and hence have no natural MOTION, either upward or downward. Since the motion of terrestrial bodies, like all other kinds of change, is between contraries, the only type of motion possible to the heavenly bodies is rotation, which has no contrary.

Aristotle offered a reasoned explanation of these presuppositions in terms of HYLOMORPHISM. Since the heavenly bodies are eternal, they do not come to be, as do other bodies, in a subject and from a contrary. Nature has justly exempted them from the law of contraries. Thus there is no privation in their composition, and this can be learned from their rotational motion (Cael. 270a 12–22). St. Thomas examined this position in light of the teaching of previous commentators such as Simplicius, JOHN PHILOPONUS, and AVERROËS. In defending Aristotle's solution, he points out that heavenly bodies are indeed composed of matter and form, but their perfect forms so fulfill the potentiality of matter that no privation remains in them. Although matter is not act, in this case it has actuality completely; there remains only a certain privation of LOCATION (In 1 cael. 6.6). The entirety of this doctrine, of course, must be rejected.

Ontological Status. The problem of the ontological status of privation does not admit of easy solution. For some Thomists, privation has real existence. It is modally distinct from its subject, matter, and therefore is not merely a being of the mind (see MODE; DISTINCTION, KINDS OF).

Others hold that the nonbeing of form, or the lack of form, is found in the nature of things and not merely in the mind. However, the privation or nonbeing that is a principle of changeable being is conceived after the fashion of a positive entity. Precisely as nonbeing, it is not positive and can have no real existence. It is a being of the mind, existing only as an object of knowledge, but with a foundation in reality. The foundation in the extramental world is the unactualized potentiality of matter, the unfulfilled natural appetite always present in changeable being. Privation exists incidentally to changeable being because it is incidental (per accidens) to matter.

Is privation one or many? Since privation is the lack of form in an apt subject, there are as many privations as there are possible forms. Since the potentiality of primary matter for the reception of substantial forms is manifold, even when such matter is actually under a given form, privation must be multiplied according to the number of substantial forms.

Mode of Causality. Another problem is the mode of causality proper to privation. Although privation is an incidental principle of change, in that substantial change proceeds from the privation of form, it is difficult to see how causality can be attributed to nonbeing. It seems, then, that its mode of causality will be analogous to its mode of being. Just as privation exists through matter, as its unfulfilled potentiality, so too its causality is exercised in matter. The proper effect of privation is precisely the substantial mobility of changeable being. Privation is therefore in the order of formal causality, for it is the opposite of form, and its effect is produced in matter. Eadem est ratio oppositorum: opposites are to be defined by affirmation or negation of a common nature or note.

While the concept of privation is first considered in the PHILOSOPHY OF NATURE, its applicability is not limited to that science. The metaphysician makes extensive use of the concept in his treatment of evil and nonbeing.

PRIZEFIGHTING

A contest of punching between two men wearing padded gloves. No adequate definition applicable to boxing or even to its most important levels is possible without introducing many distinctions. This article is restricted to a moral analysis of a single type of prizefighting (professional), though amateur fighting at some levels possesses many of the characteristics of professional boxing and would share to some extent the same moral analysis.

The Catholic Church has made no official pronouncement on the morality of professional boxing. However, theologians applying traditional principles have found it increasingly difficult to defend the sport. In assessing its morality they have admitted its advantages: the opportunity it affords for the development of physical fitness, alertness, poise, confidence, sportsmanship, initiative, and desirable character traits. Furthermore the game has given countless underprivileged youngsters a chance to better themselves. It is generally accepted that the fatalities that occur are accidental to the sport and not central to the moral question. Three considerations have been basic in theological literature.

The Knockout. Many fighters aim for a knockout. Not a few theologians find it difficult to admit that the knockout is justifiable. Directly and violently to deprive oneself or another of the use of reason is morally reprehensible except for a sufficient reason because it is the rational faculties that distinguish man from brute. Sport, money, or fame do not qualify as sufficient reasons. If such violent deprivation of higher controls is reprehensible, then the intent to produce it is reprehensible. A sport in which this intent is integral must be condemned. The argumentation is not completely convincing. The knockout is understood in a limited sense (rendering unconscious). This is not a necessary sense of the word. It is realistically capable of meaning the incapacity to continue. Second, such deprivation of the use of reason, if it occurs, generally lasts only a few seconds. Independently of other factors (injury, injurious intent), it is doubtful that so brief a deprivation would suffice to condemn the sport.

Intent of Injury. Professional boxing is the only sport in which the immediate object is to damage the opponent. In all other sports the immediate objective is something else, (e.g., to score a basket in basketball); injury and incapacity to continue are incidental. In boxing, however, injury of the passing or permanent variety is the object of direct intent. Intent of transient injury is clear. A puffed eye, a lacerated cheek, a bleeding nose are signals for an intensified attack on the vulnerable area. Intent of lasting damage is more difficult to show. Certainly few fighters would explicitly desire to maim permanently. However, it seems that every head-pommeling is likely to leave some portion of the brain tissue permanently affected. While such injury does not manifest itself clinically until later and while it need not imply malfunction of the brain, it is cumulative. Hence, though the fighter's only explicit intent is to win as decisively as possible, the means he chooses are directly injurious. Man does not possess the right to inflict damage on himself or another in this way. He is charged with the duty of a reasonable administration of his person. When he pounds another into helplessness, scars his face, jars his brain and exposes it to the danger of lasting damage, he has surpassed the bounds of reasonable stewardship of the human person. Hence, a sport in which such an intent is central is immoral.

Brutalizing Effect. Boxing as we know it today tends to foster the brutish tendencies in man by provoking him to take pleasure in the sufferings of another. The nearer the knockout, the more frenzied the howling of the crowd. The fighter is goaded by the crowd; his own intensified fury further stimulates them. Because the modern prizefight is too often the canonization of brute force and because man tends to grow in the image of that which he cheers, the sport is seen as one that fosters growth in the brutish responses.

In recent years there has been a growing consensus among theologians that the moral discussion must begin with the sport itself, not only with its circumstances. Theologians increasingly see the sport as involving a directly injurious intent and as unduly fostering the instinct of brutality. These conclusions are not necessarily true; nor are they factually true of all fights or fighters; but they are too generally true of the sport as a whole. Thus the overwhelming unfavorable, if still somewhat tentative, majority vote of the theologians who have discussed the moral question.

PRO JUÁREZ, MIGUEL AGUSTÍN, BL.

Mexican Jesuit martyr; b. Guadalupe, Jan. 13, 1891; d. Mexico City, Nov. 23, 1927. The son of Miguel Pro and Josefa Juárez, a well-to-do, socially prominent couple, as a child, Pro was noted for his open and sympathetic nature and his firm piety. He entered the Jesuit novitiate in El Llano, Michoacán in 1911 and devoted himself fervently to the religious life, believing "that God wanted him among His saints." Because of the religious persecutions under President Carranza, he studied in Los Gatos, Calif. (1914-1915). He was then sent to Spain, where he stayed until 1924 except for the years (1919–22) during which he taught in Granada, Nicaragua, a task that proved very difficult because of his ill health. In 1924 he went to Enghien, Belgium, for special studies in sociology and was ordained there in 1925. He then became gravely ill. In 1926 he returned to Mexico City where public worship had ceased because of the persecutions of President Calles. Pro undertook so many religious duties that they would have exhausted even a well man. He was seized by the police on Nov. 13, 1927 and executed with his brother Humberto ten days later amid much public uproar. Officially, he had been accused of plotting against General Obregón, but his innocence was clearly proved. Father Pro was beatified by Pope John Paul II on Sept. 25, 1988.

Feast: Nov. 23.

PRO MUNDI VITA

Pro Mundi Vita (PMV), an international study and research center located in Brussels, served for almost 30 years as a clearing house for information about the challenges facing the Christian churches and, specifically, the pastoral response of the Roman Catholic Church to the Second Vatican Council. Shortly before Vatican II, a group of Western European and Brazilian bishops, major religious superiors, aid agencies, and scholars created a kind of clearing house named Pro Mundi Vita, motivated by concern over the lack of Church personnel in non-Western countries. Under the inspiration of a Dutchman, Montanus Versteeg, OFM, its center was located in Tilburg, the Netherlands. Following an international conference in Essen, Germany, in 1963, presided over by Bishop F. Hengsbach, the center moved to Brussels. Its first secretary general, Jan Kerkhofs, SJ, a professor at Louvain University, transformed the PMV foundation into an international study and information center, with an international team of multilingual scholars and an intercontinental board of directors.

The Center focused on the challenges facing the Roman Catholic Church, as well as the main Protestant Churches, and the pastoral responses inspired by Vatican II. PMV developed its activities in three directions. First, it published scientific studies (country profiles and major problem areas) that were sent free of charge to thousands of bishops, major superiors, and international Christian organizations. Second, a service for episcopal conferences and Church institutes in need of pastoral surveys and advice was established. Third, international meetings on a wide variety of topics were organized. The center published hundreds of bulletins and studies in English, Spanish, French, German, and Dutch that dealt with topics as varied as the Christian and Muslim, Hindu, and Buddhist dialogues; the Church in Russia, South Africa, and China; the family, pluralism, and polarization in the Church; and the evolution of vocations. It also published hundreds of dossiers in four series on Latin America (in Spanish), Africa (in English and French), Europe and North America (in English and French), and Asia (in English). PMV also published a worldwide information bulletin, Ministries and Communities, and a quarterly, CECC Newsletter, on China. The center had launched a group of China scholars called “Catholics in Europe Concerned with China.” Together with a China committee of the Church of England, PMV established the Ecumenical China Liaison Group. Often in cooperation with the Lutheran World Federation, PMV organized some forty international meetings on China alone. PMV co-edited the review, Religion in the People’s Republic of China: Documents.

PMV carried out surveys in Thailand, Nigeria, Ghana, Ethiopia, and Brazil. Particular attention was given to the role of women in the Church. The first ecumenical conference co-organized with the World Council of Churches, took place in Louvain in 1975, and many publications dealt with this topic: Women in Japan, Women in China, Women and the Priesthood, Cooperation of Women and Men in Church and Society. Among the main international conferences was a 1973 colloquium, New Forms of Ministry in Christian Communities, that in turn inspired the 1977 Hong Kong meeting of the FEDERATION OF ASIAN BISHOPS’ CONFERENCES, co-sponsored by PMV. In 1970 in Brussels, PMV co-organized the first world conference of the review Concilium. In 1978 PMV launched the European Values Study (EVS), surveying the evolution of values in the Western world. Later, the EVS became an independent foundation in Amsterdam and continues its surveys of all European countries, the United States, and Canada. After a period in the course of which PMV was transferred to Louvain, organizational and financial problems forced the center to close in 1991.

PROBABILIORISM

Probabiliorism is the moral system according to which, in a doubt of conscience concerning the morality of a certain course of conduct, one must follow the opinion for law unless the opinion for liberty is certainly more probable—which is equivalent to saying unless it is much more probable. If both opinions are about equally probable, the opinion for law must be followed. This system seems to have been commonly accepted in practice before Bartolomé de Medina, OP, in 1577 enunciated the fundamental principle of probabiliorism. It was revived, especially among Dominicans, through the approval of this system communicated by Alexander VII to the Dominican general chapter in 1656. One of the outstanding defenders of probabiliorism in the 18th century was C. Billuart, OP (1685–1757). St. Alphonsus was a probabiliorist in the early years of his priesthood, but later renounced this system because he thought that some of the decisions of its school were keeping the faithful away from the Sacraments. Few, if any, uphold this system today.

PROBABILISM

Probabilism is the moral system according to which in a doubt of conscience about the morality of a particular course of conduct, a person may lawfully follow the opinion for liberty, provided it is truly probable, even though the opinion for law is definitely more probable. The defenders of this system apply their fundamental principle: “A doubtful law does not bind” (Lex dubia non obligat) to both divine and human laws, whether the doubt concerns the existence or the cessation of the law. However, they admit the exceptions to the use of reflex principles. Moreover, they require a person reasonably to seek direct certainty regarding the moral problem before seeking indirect certainty through the use of reflex principles. The outstanding exponents of this system emphasize that the opinion for liberty must be truly and solidly probable, for if it is only slightly probable it has no value against the opinion for law. Thus, probabilism is clearly distinguished from laxism. Jesuit theologians are the best known exponents of probabilism.

PROBST, FERDINAND

Liturgist; b. Ehingen, Germany, March 28, 1816; d. Breslau, Dec. 26, 1899. After his ordination in 1840, he served as a curate in Ellwangen. The following year he was sent for higher studies to the University of Tübingen. In 1843 he was appointed pastor at Allgäu. In 1851 his doctorate in theology was conferred by the University of Tübingen. He was called to teach pastoral theology at the University of Breslau in 1864; he became a canon in 1886, rector of the university in 1889, a domestic prelate in 1890, and dean of the cathedral chapter of Breslau in 1896. As the author of a prodigious number of books and articles, most of which deal with the liturgy, Probst gained a widespread reputation for scholarship. His studies were limited to the liturgy of the Church as it developed in the first few centuries. They manifested a facile acquaintance with patristic literature; but the author's conclusions were criticized in some quarters as being largely concoctions of his own imagination. Notable among Probst's works are his Kirchliche Benedictionen und ihre Verwaltung (Tübingen 1857), Liturgie der drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderte (Tübingen 1870), Sakramente und Sakramentalien in den drei ersten christlichen Jahrhunderten (Tübingen 1872), Geschichte der katholischen Katechese (Breslau 1886), Liturgie des 4. Jahrhunderts und deren Reform (Münster 1893), and Die abendländische Messe vom 5. bis zum 8. Jahrhundert (Münster 1896).

PROCESS PHILOSOPHY

Broadly understood, process philosophy refers to any position that gives the central place to flux or BECOMING. HERACLITUS, HEGEL, SPENCER, BERGSON, PEIRCE, JAMES, S. ALEXANDER, C. Lloyd Morgan, Dewey, G. H. Mead, and TEILHARD DE CHARDIN have all been classified as philosophers of process. (The best survey of process philosophy in this sense is Nicholas Rescher's Process Metaphysics.) The term is used principally to refer to the philosophies of A. N. WHITEHEAD and C. HARTSHORNE, and this narrower usage has gained increasing currency since it was introduced by Bernard Loomer in 1946. In this philosophy events (actual occasions) are the primary actualities. Enduring substances are reconceived as series (societies) of these occasions, each repeating the society's common defining characteristic, which functions much like an Aristotelian substantial form. Each occasion is self-creative. In other philosophies causes are conceived as active agents producing passive effects. Whitehead reverses this, treating effects as actively producing themselves in appropriating their causes.

Whitehead. The model for such causation is perception, understood in a Kantian sense as the mind spontaneously organizing and unifying its sensations into a single, intelligible experience. Perception is then generalized by abstracting from it any necessary reference to consciousness. Prehension, the more general concept, means any (conscious or unconscious) taking account of another. An occasion is then the growing together or concrescence of its prehensions. The way B prehends A is the way A causally influences B. Thus physical causality and mental experiencing are unified to overcome Cartesian dualism.

Each occasion is an atomic unit of becoming. Physical (objective) time consists of these droplets of self-creation, each with its own temporal thickness. Each is a process of determination whereby an indeterminate multiplicity of causal factors is transformed into a determinate past. Past actualities are determinate and fixed, yet as objectified they function as causal factors for the occasions now prehending them. Whatever is objective (since determinate) is therefore past. This means that all present immediacy is subjective. Thus subjectivity is presentness, for the only present immediacy we can ever directly experience is our own subjectivity. Since only determinate elements can be prehended, even the objective components of our present experience must be considered past, for the events we directly experience must already have occurred in order to be experienced. This identification of subjectivity with temporal immediacy entails a pansubjectivity akin to PANPSYCHISM. Since every occasion concresces in the present, it must then enjoy its own subjective immediacy. Its present can only be expressed in subjective terms if distortion is to be avoided, since the present can never be objectively experienced.

However, we must not anthropomorphize subjectivity by endowing every occasion with the characteristics of human experience. Subjectivity is regularly confused with mentality and consciousness. If subjectivity is the general capacity to be influenced by actuality, mentality is the capacity to be influenced by possibility, especially by novel possibility. Consciousness is a more specialized contingent feature of some highly complex occasions displaying massive mental originality. Few occasions in the universe are conscious; many display noticeable degrees of mentality (novelty); all are equally subjective.

If each occasion actively produces itself, its "causes" need only be prehensible objects, which can include possibilities, values, and ideals in addition to past actualities. Since no occasion can integrate all the conflicting tendencies of its inherited past, each must have a "subjective aim" or ideal of what it should become. This aim functions as a principle of selection by which to appropriate the past. It both affects and is affected by the influence of the past, and this reciprocal interaction constitutes the occasion's freedom. Since it becomes the final form of the determinate outcome, the subjective aim is the dynamic, emergent counterpart of an essence or substantial form, but one particularized to each individual actuality.

The occasion's subjective aim cannot be derived from its own past taken collectively, since it must function as a means for selecting amidst this welter of incompatibilities. Nor can the ideal be derived from some single past actuality, since every occasion has a different past and needs a different principle of selection. Occasions may, and often do, have privileged past occasions to serve as their predecessors, but then the origins of these predecessors must be taken into account. Ultimately these individual ideals must be derived from an actuality that is not a temporal occasion, namely God. God's power is the worship he inspires through the ideals provided to each occasion. God creates by the way in which he persuades each creature to create itself.

Hartshorne. Hartshorne's conclusions are basically similar to Whitehead's, but his characteristic mode of argument differs. He sets up a series of polar opposites, and then asks which is the more inclusive, which can best account for its opposite. If neither can include the other, we have irreconcilable dualisms. Thus he argues for panpsychism on the grounds that mind can account for matter, but not matter for mind. Freedom can account for whatever causal determinism there is, while determinism can only account for freedom by explaining it away. Becoming (change) includes being as an abstract aspect of itself, while being cannot include change without thereby changing. God as the perfect being supremely worthy of worship is not to be conceived merely in terms of one set of these categories to the exclusion of their opposites, but as the eminent instantiation of both sets. Thus God's omniscience is abstractly absolute as utterly free from error and ignorance, but concretely relative to what in fact there is to know. In championing this logic of perfection, Hartshorne defends the ONTOLOGICAL ARGUMENT, but applies it only to God's abstract essence, not his concrete actuality. The abstract essence is eternal and necessary, but the concrete actuality is temporal, contingent upon the divine experience of an emerging world. God knows all there is to know, the actual as actual, the possible as possible, but future contingents cannot be known as determinate actuality.

Because of its clarity, cogency, and accessibility, Hartshorne's version of process philosophy has been enormously influential. A major divergence among process thinkers centers on whether Whitehead's concept of God as an everlasting concrescence is correct, or whether it must be revised as an ongoing series of divine occasions. Cobb has worked out this Hartshornean revision most extensively, while Christian and others favor the original concept. Ford also affirms an everlasting concrescence but has made other far-reaching modifications in order to insure God's effectiveness in the world.

New Developments. Whitehead's unfamiliar terms and conceptuality presented formidable difficulties to early readers of Process and Reality. Between 1958 and 1966 a new era in process studies was inaugurated by the publication of three excellent aids: Leclerc's introduction, Christian's commentary, and Sherburne's Key. The Key is a heavily abridged and rearranged version of Process and Reality, with notes and glossary, well designed to facilitate the reader's understanding of the system.

Besides its obvious relevance to PROCESS THEOLOGY, process philosophy has been applied to aesthetics, evolutionary theory, physics, biology, the analysis of religious language, biblical studies, literary criticism, political science, the theory of civilization, and the history of religions (particularly Buddhism). A Center for Process Studies has been established at the School of Theology in Claremont, California, which also publishes a scholarly quarterly, Process Studies.

Criticisms. Process philosophy has been criticized by proponents of alternative viewpoints on many different counts, but three persistent internal criticisms stand out as particularly worthy of notice. Many, including Hartshorne, have rejected Whitehead's theory of forms (eternal objects) as too Platonic, preferring a more temporalistic understanding of the emergence of possibilities. The eternal objects are not permanent forms, somehow always subsisting, for they are only intermittently temporally instantiated. On the other hand, they are uncreated and to that extent an exception to Whitehead's ontological principle, which grounds all reasons in actualities.

Others question whether a theory of persons as series of momentary selves does justice to our experience of continuous, persistent self-identity and the requirements of responsibility. But the theory can explain relative self-identity in terms of memory and anticipation, and questions whether absolute self-identity permits us to be radically constituted by our experience of others. As Hartshorne wryly observes, we cannot love our neighbors as ourselves if our relations to ourselves must be absolutely different from our relations to others. Nor does responsibility for past acts depend upon absolute self-identity. If officials can be held responsible for the actions of their predecessors, should not the same be true for momentary selves with respect to their predecessors?

Edward Pols, in the most thoroughgoing critique of Whitehead published to date, develops the objection also made by Paul Weiss that these actual occasions cannot do anything, that there are no real agents. This is true insofar as any action consists in the unity of intentional activity and causation, while in process theory this unity is split between two actualities: the first creates itself by its own intentional activity, and it only exerts causal influence as it is objectively appropriated by another. This simply means, however, that actions are inherently relational, necessarily involving the activity of the effect as well as the cause. Any theory vesting the action solely in one actuality as agent permits some causes to completely determine their effects, contrary to the postulate of universal creativity.

PROCESS THEOLOGY

The core of process theology centers upon the understanding of God derived from the philosophies of A. N. WHITEHEAD and C. HARTSHORNE. In this philosophy God is not a casual adjunct introduced for reasons of religious apologetics, but is necessary for its overall coherence. At the same time this philosophy is thoroughly conversant with contemporary science, for it was originally conceived as an effort to do justice to the revolution in physics occasioned by Einstein's special theory of relativity. Whitehead, then an agnostic sharing Bertrand Russell's religious opinions, first came to appreciate that temporal presentness could not be adequately explained in terms of the purely objective categories of nature, and later concluded that the origins of subjectivity required an appeal to God.

Process theism is also significant for its challenge to classical theism, a challenge that may well further contemporary efforts at de-Hellenizing the Christian faith. Whitehead was particularly troubled by the problem of EVIL. If God wills or allows all that is, having the omnipotence to change whatever is, then He may be faulted for the evil that exists. Even if God permits our evil decisions for the sake of fostering human freedom, He could prevent or ameliorate their consequence. But need OMNIPOTENCE be understood in this fashion? It cannot mean the monopoly of all power, for then we would have no power, and power is essential for freedom. Hartshorne argues that perfect power means all the power appropriate to a divinely perfect being that is consistently conceivable with creaturely power. If God does not compete with creatures for power, his power must be persuasive, not coercive.

Whitehead's reinterpretation of causality leads to similar conclusions. Instead of causes producing their effects, the effects produce themselves out of their causes, guided by the lures received from God. Without the ordering possibilities of divine persuasion, finite occasions would simply be random combinations of their causal pasts, quickly degenerating into chaos. The occasion freely modifies and actualizes the divine aim. This is its self-creativity. It is free from the causal determinism of the past insofar as it selectively appropriates from that past according to the divine aim, but it is also free from divine determinism insofar as it allows that aim to be modified by the past it appropriates.

Now a plurality of free decisions, insofar as they are uncoordinated, will inevitably (though not necessarily) lead to conflict, which is the source of evil. Divine coordination prevents total chaos, but it can achieve total harmony only to the extent to which creaturely occasions freely actualize divine aims.

On this view freedom is ontologically basic. It is not as if God can create some creatures with freedom and some without, for any lacking freedom would be merely intentional objects of the divine imagination, having no separate reality. In place of the traditional dualism of an uncreated creator and creatures that cannot create, all actualities are self-creative. God's creative activity is exercised in guiding each creature in its self-creation.

Because each finite actuality requires a past to appropriate, there is an infinite chain of causal pasts. The world is seen as having no beginning. Hartshorne argues that the existence of the world, like God, is abstractly necessary, though the concrete character it assumes is contingent. For him the metaphysical principles (which entail, among other things, the necessary existence of some world or other) have no consistent alternative, and hence are determined by no one, not even God. For Whitehead, God's primordial envisagement determining all possibilities thereby also determines the metaphysical principles. He is not explicit on the point, but if the existence of God without a world is a valid metaphysical alternative, then God in determining the metaphysical principles would be in effect determining whether to create or not to create. But this is nontemporal decision, applicable to all times, including the infinite past.

Hartshorne and Others. Hartshorne's The Divine Relativity is sharply critical of the Thomistic claim that God in knowing creation is not really related to creatures. Generally, in knowing one's knowledge is affected and largely determined by the existence and character of what is known, and it would seem inconsistent to make an exception in God's case. That exception is made to protect God's IMMUTABILITY. Hartshorne argues that though God's formal attributes are abstractly necessary, their concrete content is contingent. God as the perfect being is necessarily all-loving, but what God loves is dependent upon whatever there is to love. Far from being absolute and immutable, God is supremely relative, sensitively responding to every change in the world. Our actions thus contribute to the enrichment of the divine experience, and find their ultimate meaning in being cherished by God forever.

Many have resisted this argument because it entails that God's experience is (partially) caused by the world. This objection derives its force from the traditional axiom that the cause is superior to its effect, which implies a hierarchy of causes culminating in God as first cause. If Whitehead's reinterpretation of causality is correct, however, the effect is superior as the creative, novel unification of its many causes. Thus God is supreme as the effect of the world as well as the ultimate source of all its final causes.

Schubert Ogden has forcefully developed Hartshorne's thesis that the meaningfulness of life can only be justified by its enrichment of the divine experience. John Cobb, in addition to writing some foundational studies, has explored some important ways in which process thought has enriched our understanding of, among other things, world religions, evolutionary biology, economics, ecology, and political theology. Bernard Loomer and Bernard Meland have examined the more empirical dimensions of Whitehead's thought, seeking to describe as sensitively as possible the impingement of divine activity upon human experience. Daniel Day Williams has attempted the first full-scale process theology centered on the interpretation of love. These theologians, together with Peter Hamilton, Norman Pittenger, David Pailin, and David Griffin, have been exploring the contours of a process Christology. Others have considered its implications for the doctrine of the Trinity.

Catholic Interest. Catholic interest in process theology has been increasing since Vatican II, as the static categories of the natural and supernatural have given way to more dynamic, biblical categories. Whitehead may well provide the philosophical foundations for TEILHARD DE CHARDIN's vision, even though there is a major conflict with respect to the nature of the future. Teilhard de Chardin, faithful to the biblical witness, looks forward to the final consummation of all things in God; while Whitehead, attuned to the unending advance of creative freedom, insists that there is no one perfection capable of embracing all other perfections within itself. God seeks the actualization of all perfections, each in due season.

Joseph Bracken, SJ has sought to interpret Catholic theology in process terms, especially with respect to the Trinity as three persons in interaction. There has been particular interest in correlating Whitehead with St. Thomas Aquinas, as evidenced by recent work by James W. Felt, SJ, and Stephen T. Franklin. Norris Clarke, SJ gives an excellent Catholic assessment of process theism in the book cited below.

God in Process Theism. For process theism, God is both abstract and concrete, necessary and contingent, unchanging and changing, independent and dependent upon the world. These contrasting predicates can be applied to the same individual, provided they apply to diverse aspects: God is abstract, necessary, unchanging with respect to metaphysical attributes, but concrete, contingent, and changing in the experience of the world. Insofar as God is held to be radically simple, excluding all but nominal distinctions, this logic is inapplicable. But Whitehead agrees with Duns Scotus in affirming formal distinctions. As the subjective unity of a multiplicity of prehensions, God experiences many distinct objective data, but these prehensions are not separable because of the indivisible unity, even simplicity, of their subject.

The use of formal distinctions grounded in prehensive unity obviates one need for analogy. Analogy would also be needed to speak about God if our experience were only sensory. Whitehead, however, defends our nonsensuous experience of divine purposing. In this he is reviving a version of Augustinian ILLUMINATION, yet in a context that takes full cognizance of the role of EFFICIENT CAUSALITY as developed in contemporary science. Nevertheless, the analogy of being plays a role in process thought: every instance of creativity is thoroughly analogous with every other, having with respect to creativity no univocal elements in common.

Because God is constantly being enriched by the experience of novel events in the world, many have assumed that the God of process theism must be finite. But God's contemplation of all pure possibilities is necessarily infinite, and God's actual experience of the past must also be infinite if the world has no beginning. The mathematical concept of the potential infinite (for any x , $x + 1$) applies to God more accurately than the notion of an actual infinite (which cannot be enriched). Although Whitehead holds all determinate being to be finite, God is by contrast infinitely becoming, constantly in process of determination.

PROCESSIONS, RELIGIOUS

In the history of religion an important socio-religious ritual action or form of worship. It is found especially, but not exclusively, in the higher religions and is a worldwide custom. The procession was a marked feature of public religion, e.g., throughout the Near East and the Mediterranean world. Solemn processions were regularly held to honor a given divinity, as a part of the enthronement ceremony of a king, to celebrate the New Year and the harvest, to avert calamities, or to propitiate the god or gods when calamity had occurred. Statues or symbols of the gods were usually carried in religious processions and the ritual normally combined magical as well as religious elements. It is sufficient to mention the great religious processions connected with the enthronement of the Egyptian pharaoh, the elaborate processions of the Babylonians from the Sumerian Age to the end of the Chaldean Empire, the Athenian processions in honor of Athenae the patron goddess of Athens, and the long procession from Athens to Eleusis connected with the celebration of the Eleusinian mysteries. At Rome, procession was an essential feature of lustration ceremonies, and the Roman triumph was a solemn religious procession culminating in an act of thanksgiving to the Capitoline Jupiter for victory. The joyous pagan processions associated with bountiful harvests were usually accompanied or followed by much license, however religious their motivation. Hence, the frequent condemnation of such processions in the Old Testament and in the Fathers of the Church.

Group activity and movement spring so spontaneously from human religious psychology that the Church did not hesitate to adopt some of these rites from paganism, as in the substitution of the Rogation procession of April 25, for the Roman Robigalia, and to develop many more of her own. The Christian Church can never forget that its spiritual life has its roots in the Old Testament, when God accompanied His chosen people on their long pilgrimages out of Egypt and later back from exile. The Christian life is a continual "Passover" as we follow in the footsteps of Christ and His cross along the road leading to heaven. Processions, ordinarily led by the cross, are an expression of the fact that the Christian life is a constant movement toward God and that prayer is always a kind of "walking with God"; they are a public image of the Church in continual pilgrimage here on earth.

It is important to distinguish between strictly liturgical processions (e.g., the Palm Sunday procession), whose rite, chant and prayer are specified in liturgical books, and non-liturgical processions. There are two kinds of liturgical procession: (1) ordinary processions are those connected with certain feast days, such as the processions on CANDLEMAS, PALM SUNDAY, ROGATION DAYS, and CORPUS ET SANGUINIS CHRISTI. Extraordinary processions are those enjoined or permitted by the bishop for some special occasion, e.g., the solemn transfer of relics.

Some processions, such as those of the palms and of the EASTER VIGIL, relive a special event in the history of salvation. Others are called functional because they simply solemnize a necessary movement from one place to another, as, for example, funeral processions and the first entrance of a bishop into his see. Still others have as their purpose to bless and sanctify certain places, to provide public pilgrimages to sacred shrines, or to offer supplication to God for good weather or for help in time of war, famine, epidemic, etc.

The most popular processions are those that honor the Eucharist and the Blessed Virgin. Besides the Holy Thursday procession, the best known Eucharistic processions are those of Corpus Christi. At an early date processions in honor of Mary were introduced, especially in connection with her major feasts. The one with the longest history is that of the Assumption. The present-day May processions, while not strictly liturgical, are in accord with this tradition.

PROCESSIONS, TRINITARIAN

The MYSTERY of the one God revealed in history as Father, Son, and Spirit was from the very beginnings of Christianity never a mere mathematical or logical puzzle. Rather Christians experience this divine one-in-three or triune reality as a saving and gracious mystery, sharing its life with humans through creation, redemption, and sanctification. God is understood as a mystery of communion—communion among Father, Son, and Spirit, and communion between these three divine "persons" and each human person. Furthermore, this double communion is also experienced as the basis of and condition of possibility for the communion among humans themselves, in the Church and in the world at large. These three intrinsically interrelated communions—communion among the three divine persons, communion between the divine persons and each human person, and communion among all humans with and in the cosmos—constitute for Christians the goal and meaning of human history and the universe.

New Testament Roots. This faith in the one God as Father who communicates Himself to humans in His Son and by the power of His Spirit is already expressed in the New Testament, especially by means of triadic formulas that entail both distinction and equality among the three divine persons (e.g., Mt 28:19; 2 Cor 13:13; Eph 2:18; 3:14–17; 4:4–6; 5:18–20; Rom 8:14–17, etc.). Beside the Father, both Christ and the Spirit are referred to as "Lord" and divine attributes are predicated of Jesus and, to a lesser extent, of the Spirit. In His preexistence (Jn 1:1–18; Heb 1:1–3), conception (Mt 1:23; Lk 1:32), baptism (Mk 1:11), transfiguration (Mk 9:2–13), and Resurrection (Rom 1:4) Jesus is confessed to be the beloved Son of God in power. Similarly, though less explicitly, the Holy Spirit is depicted not only as a divine power but also as a divine "person" speaking through the mouths of the apostles (Acts 8:20), sending the disciples out on mission (Acts 13:4), leading the Church (Acts 20:28), and dwelling in Christians to give them life and to bear witness to their being a son or daughter of God (Rom 8:14–16; Gal 4:6). For this reason "God," "Lord," and "Spirit" can be used in parallelism to one another (1 Cor 12:4–6; 2 Cor 3:17).

For the first Christians who were Jews, this faith in the triune God was bound to be baffling in light of their unqualified monotheism. As a result, there is already in the New Testament an attempt to justify this Trinitarian faith by clarifying the relationships among the Father, Son, and Spirit, even though there is no elaboration of a Trinitarian theology as such in the New Testament. Most prominent is the Fourth Gospel's teaching on the two "sendings" or "processions," namely that of the Son from the Father (Jn 3:17, 34; 6:38; 20:21) and that of the Spirit from the Father and through the Son (Jn 14:16–17, 26; 15:26). Of course, the focus in these Johannine texts is on the sendings and processions of the Son and the Spirit in the history of salvation (the oikonomia), on what is termed the "economic Trinity," and not on their eternal origination in the Godhead (the theologia), within what will be termed the "immanent Trinity." In later theologies of the Trinity, however, these texts will be invoked to explain the eternal relationships among the Father, Son, and Spirit within the Godhead itself, in other words, the divine "processions."

Underlying Theological Issues. The Christian understanding of God can be summarized in two statements.

First, in continuity with the faith of Israel, it is affirmed that there is only one God, and God is Yahweh, the Father. In light of later Latin theology, it is important to note that in the New Testament and in the pre-Nicene theology, “the one God” refers to the Father and not to the divine nature or substance that the three divine persons possess in common. Second, this one God the Father is confessed to have manifested himself in the End Time, that is, in the life-death-resurrection of Jesus and in the outpouring of the Spirit, as the Father of Jesus who is therefore the Son and as the Sender of the Spirit who therefore proceeds from Him. Hence, Jesus the Son and the Holy Spirit are divine and not created. The one God is therefore somehow a Triad. The theological challenge is how to maintain these two apparently contradictory statements together, in such a way that the one God does not become a monad, and a divine triad does not jeopardize the monotheistic faith, and to come up with a plausible explanation of how unity and trinity in God are not mutually contradictory.

Historically, three positions regarding the Triune God have been condemned as heretical. First, SUBORDINATIONISM, which holds that the Logos/Son and the Spirit are not divine but created. Arius, who taught that the Logos is not eternal but only a preeminent creature, was condemned by the Council of Nicaea (325), and the “pneumatochoi” or Macedonians, who held that the Spirit is a creature, were rejected by the Council of Constantinople (381). Second, MODALISM, which denies that Father, Son, and Spirit are distinct realities, and comes in two forms. Some, like Noetus, Praxeas, and Sabellius thought that “Father,” “Son,” and “Spirit,” are mere names for the various roles of the one Godhead in the economy (“Modalist Monarchians”), while others thought that Christ was a mere man indwelt or inspired in a special way by divine power (“Adoptionist” or “Dynamic Monarchians”). Third, Economic Trinitarianism, whose classic defender is Tertullian and which holds that God in His eternal being is a strict Monad, but becomes a Triad in His decision to create, when God’s immanent Word (the Logos endiathetos) was uttered forth in creation and Incarnation (the Logos prophorikos) and when, in a similar fashion, God’s inner Spirit was breathed forth into the world.

The first attempt at reconciling God’s unity and trinity by way of processions was made by the Cappadocian Fathers who drew a distinction between that which is generic or common (to koinon) shared equally by all members of a class and that which is particular or individual (to idion) possessed by a particular member and no other. That which is common and answers the question of “what” is called nature (ousia), whereas that which is particular and answers the question of “who” is PERSON (hypostasis). Hence, ousia + idioma = hypostasis. Applying this distinction to God, the Cappadocians argue that what is common in God is the divine nature (ousia) and that this divine nature is particularized by the characteristics that constitute their persons (hypostasis). These characteristics (idiomata), which differentiate one divine person from another, are brought about by the ways in which the Son and the Spirit originate or proceed from the Father: The Father is unoriginated (agennesis), the Son is generated (gennesis), and the Spirit proceeds (ekporeusis or ekpempsis).

The Legacy of Augustine, Thomas Aquinas, and Scholastic Theology. The first comprehensive attempt at explaining the compossibility between unity and trinity in God was made by AUGUSTINE in his De Trinitate. Augustine chooses as the starting point of his Trinitarian theology the unity of the one divine substance or nature, which unfolds subsequently as it were into three persons, Father, Son, and Spirit. The bishop of Hippo effectively abandons the earlier tradition that the one God is first and foremost the Father, and that the unity and unicity of God resides in the Father. This is a momentous methodological change, with far-reaching implications for the way in which the relationships between each divine person and humans are understood. In fact, for Augustine, and through him, THOMAS AQUINAS and scholastic theology, since there is only one substance and since substance is the basis of action, all the divine attributes as well as the operations of God in the history of salvation (the opera divina ad extra) are to be predicated of God absolutely and not relatively of particular persons. Consequently, it is only by way of appropriation that these actions are attributed to a particular divine person on the basis of some affinity between these actions and the distinctive characteristics (proprium) of that person. An unintended but disastrous result of this approach is a separation between the Immanent Trinity (which is truly a Triad) and the Economic Trinity (which is not Trinitarian but fundamentally unitarian, namely, the divine substance).

Augustine devotes the second half of his De Trinitate to exploring the analogies of the Trinity in humans, since humans are created in the image and likeness of God. He first considers the triad involved in the phenomenon of human love—the Lover, the Loved, and the Love—but abandons it because it does not appear to him to adequately reflect the divine Triad’s equality. He then investigates the rational processes of the human mind and finds them more satisfactory: the mens or memoria, the intellectus, and the voluntas. By mens or memoria Augustine means the person’s self-consciousness. This self-consciousness is actualized in the act of knowing and the act of willing. There is then a three-in-one triad in human cognition: the mind, its knowledge of self, and its love of self. The mind, the originating source of the whole cognitive process, is analogized to the Father; the production of knowledge by the mind resulting in the knowledge of itself, i.e., the “conception” of the idea, is analogized to the generation of the Son/Word/Image by the Father; and the termination of the rational process in love is analogized to the procession of the Spirit from the Father and the Son, who, according to Augustine is the mutual love between the Father and the Son. These reflections serve as the foundation of the later theology of divine processions as elaborated by Thomas Aquinas and popularized by scholastic theology.

By “procession” is meant the origination or coming forth of one being from another. Derived from biblical texts such as Jn 15:26 (“the Spirit of truth, who proceeds [ekporeuetai] from the Father”), the term is used in theology to explain how the Son and the Spirit originate from the Father eternally in the Godhead. Thomas Aquinas’s interpretation (Summa Theologiae I, q. 27) later popularized by scholastic theology, remains the best known. Thomas begins by positing a real distinction between the principle or source from which something proceeds, and the term or that which proceeds from the principle or source. Furthermore, he notes that there are two kinds of procession: the transient (ad extra), in which the term comes to exist outside the principle, e.g., the chair exists outside the carpenter, and the immanent (ad intra), in which the term remains within the principle, e.g., the idea or concept remains within the mind that conceives it.

The two eternal processions in the Godhead belong to the second kind. They are not produced in time by God the Father by way of efficient causality like creatures. Rather they are eternal “events” within the Godhead itself by which the Godhead is a triad, all three members of which are truly and equally divine. Taking a clue from Augustine, Thomas analogizes these two divine processions to the two activities of the human spirit, namely, knowing and loving. The first procession, that of the Son/Word, is termed by the Bible as “generation.” In generation, there are three things: the vital act whereby something is given birth by another living thing, the specific resemblance between the generator and the generated, and the identity of nature between the two. These three things are found, analogously, in the generation of an idea by the mind, and the generation of God the Son from God the Father. The Father contemplates Himself eternally and generates in the divine mind a perfect idea or word or image of Himself, just as when a person conceives in the mind an idea that is identical in nature with the mind. Hence the Son can be said to be the Word, Wisdom, the Image of God.

Beside the procession of the Son by generation the Bible also speaks of the procession of the Spirit from the Father. This procession may be analogized to another act of the human spirit, namely, willing or loving. In the cognitive process of the human spirit, what is known is also often loved. The act of knowing is different from that of love, which proceeds from the will, and not the intellect. Analogously, God the Father loves the Son and vice versa, through the divine will. This mutual love between the Father and the Son is the Spirit. Whereas there is a specific term in the Bible to refer to the act whereby the Son proceeds from the Father, namely, generation, there is none to describe the procession of the Spirit. This procession ought not to be called “generation” but “spiration” or breathing-forth, an act of communication through love. Hence, the names of the Spirit are Gift and Love, and not Son.

In the Bible the Spirit is said not only to proceed from the Father (Jn 15:26) but also to have been sent by the Father and the Son (Jn 14:26; 15:26). In light of this, Latin theology (e.g., Augustine, Anselm of Canterbury, and Thomas) holds that the Spirit proceeds from the Father and the Son but as from one principle, even though the Creed of the Council of Constantinople professes only that the Spirit “proceeds from the Father.” This so-called double procession of the Spirit constitutes a long-standing difference between the Latin and Orthodox Churches, a difference exacerbated by ecclesiastical and political rivalries.

Contemporary Theology. Despite the enormous authority of Augustine and Thomas Aquinas behind this “psychological theory” of the Trinity, many contemporary theologians have found it ultimately unsatisfactory. Though it clarifies in some way how faith in the one and trine God is not self-contradictory, the speculation on the divine processions by way of intellect and will is arid and unbiblical. As a result, some theologians have dropped it altogether and even suggest that no discourse on the Immanent Trinity is possible or useful. Others argue that the language of origination or procession implies hierarchy and subordination and negates the equality among the three divine persons.

The most serious critique, however, comes from Karl RAHNER and his many followers. For them, the psychological theory of the divine processions implicitly separates the divine nature from the divine persons, even though it explicitly affirms that the divine persons are identical with the divine nature. Because it is assumed that the starting point for the theology of the Trinity is the divine substance, and not the Father, God is said to act in the history of salvation through the divine substance, so that all the divine actions ad extra are to be attributed to the common substance and not to each of the divine persons. This is the teaching of the Fourth Lateran Council (1215), the Council of Florence (1442), and later scholastic theology: opera divina ad extra communia sunt tribus personis tamquam uno principio (divine actions outside of the Trinity are common to all three persons as one principle). It is only by way of appropriation that God's actions in history can be attributed to a particular divine person. As a consequence, there is a loss of the Economic Trinity in theology, and Christians, despite their professed faith in the Trinitarian God, are in fact "monotheists" or unitarians.

To retrieve the Economic Trinity Rahner affirms the principle that "the 'economic' Trinity is the 'immanent' Trinity and the 'immanent' Trinity is the 'economic' Trinity." What Rahner intends with this formula is to assert that God acts in history not through the divine nature but through each divine person, each in a distinctive way, so that humans are related to each divine person relatively and distinctively, and not to the divine substance absolutely. In the concrete, "God" does not refer to the divine substance but to the Unoriginated and Originating Father who acts in history in two really distinctive (therefore not modalist) and ordered (therefore mutually conditioned) ways, in the Incarnation of the Logos under the aspects of origin, history, invitation, and knowledge, and in the grace of the Spirit under the aspects of future, transcendence, acceptance, and love. Consequently, the ways in which we experience God in history (the Economic Trinity) do tell us really and truly, though never exhaustively, about the ways in which the Father, the Son, and the Spirit are related to each other eternally (the Immanent Trinity). God's communication to us is indeed self-communication. This self-communication is therefore to be understood not by way of efficient causality by which God creates something distinct from Himself but by way of formal or more precisely quasi-formal causality by which the three divine persons indwell in humans, each in its distinctive way.

Consequently, speaking about the two temporal ways of God's self-communication by means of narrative and/or metaphysical language is already speaking about the two eternal "processions" from the Father. Trinitarian theology is not something one does after one has dealt with the "one God" (divine substance, its existence and its attributes). Rather it is the systematic and critical reflection on the two ways in which God the Father has acted in history by way of self-communication and on what these two ways reveal about who God is, that is, one and trine, or on how the Son and the Spirit "proceed" from the Father.

PROCLUS

Also generally called Diadochus (successor) because he succeeded to the head of the Platonic Academy at Athens, a pagan Greek Neoplatonist who was hostile to the Catholic Church but who greatly influenced medieval and Renaissance Christian philosophy and theology; b. Byzantium, A.D. 410 or 412; d. Athens, April 17, 485. After his elementary education at Xanthus in Lycia, Proclus went to Alexandria, Egypt, where he studied rhetoric and Roman law, then mathematics and philosophy, the last under Olympiodorus the Peripatetic. Moving to Athens c. 430, he continued his study of philosophy in the Platonic Academy under Plutarch of Athens and, especially, under Syrianus. Shortly after the latter's death, Proclus assumed the leadership of the academy, which he held until his death.

Proclus wrote voluminously on literary, scientific, religious, and philosophical topics. The following are his most important writings still extant in whole or in part. On literature: commentary on Hesiod's Works and Days. On science: commentary on Euclid's Elements, on the introduction to Nicomachus' Arithmetic; Sphaera, on eclipses, elements of physics. On religion: several hymns, the hieratic art, on the Chaldean philosophy. In philosophy: commentaries on Plato's Parmenides, Timaeus, First Alcibiades, Cratylus, Republic; Eighteen Arguments in Favor of the Eternity of the World Against the Christians; The Platonic Theology; Ten Doubts Concerning Providence; On Providence, Fate and Free Will; On the Existence of Evil; Elements of Theology. Medieval and Renaissance authors were acquainted almost solely with the last four treatises and best of all with the fourth of these.

In Elements of Theology Proclus speaks of many items that may seem to be subsistent and autonomous: limit, infinity, being, eternity, wholeness, life, time. Eventually, though, all these merge with one or other of those hypostases that he clearly intends as somehow independent: the One, the intelligence, the soul, nature. Hence, his universe is made up of four levels, hierarchically arranged: the One (together with multiple “ones” or henads), the intelligence (and intelligences, both divine and merely intellectual), the soul (and souls, both supermundane and intramundane), nature and the sensible world. Proclus’ view of this universe is a cosmogony, since at least two sorts of causality are operative in it, both of which are spontaneous and necessary. The one is a process of participation: participations come to be present in participants, which they complete and perfect as integral parts. The other is not: the participations themselves and their participants originate by emanating from the monads (e.g., the intelligence, the soul), which stand at the head of each level of reality and which ultimately arise from the One. Throughout the twofold causality two forces are constantly at work: a procession of everything downward from the One and a reversion of everything back to the One because of desire. Proclus’ universe is also a monism since the effect is never totally distinct from the cause. Finally, in his Weltanschauung Proclus owes more to Plato, Iamblichus and Syrianus than to Plotinus; he leans heavily also upon the Orphic hymns and Chaldean oracles.

PROCLUS, ST.

Theologian, bishop of Cyzicus, and archbishop of Constantinople c. 434–46; d. Constantinople, 446. Proclus was an admirer of JOHN CHRYSOSTOM. He served as episcopal secretary to, and was ordained a priest by, Bp. Atticus of Constantinople; he was selected by Sisinnius I as bishop of Cyzicus in 426, but because of popular opposition, he was not able to take possession of that see and remained in the capital. A renowned preacher, Proclus delivered a homily on the THEOTOKOS (Hom. 1) during the Christmas season of 428 in the presence of Archbishop NESTORIUS (428–431) that seems to have precipitated the Nestorian crisis, although Proclus did not play an important part in that controversy. At the instance of the Emperor THEODOSIUS II, he was selected archbishop of Constantinople (April 12, 434) to replace Maximianus, who had succeeded to the see after the deposition of Nestorius at the Council of EPHESUS (431).

In his sermons Proclus did not discuss contemporary events, but he attacked the beliefs and morals of the Jews in classical fashion. In 435 he received a request from the bishops of the Church in Armenia regarding the theology of THEODORE OF MOPSUESTIA whose works were being translated into their language, and whom they suspected of Nestorian teaching. In his famous answer, Tomus ad Armenios de fide, Proclus did not mention Theodore; he discussed the Church’s teaching on the single hypostasis and the two natures in the incarnate Word, and intimated the errors that could be ascribed to Theodore. In 438 Proclus had the relics of the exiled John Chrysostom (d. 407) returned to Constantinople, and through his letters seems to have extended the authority of his see. He is also thought to have introduced the Trisagion (Holy God, Holy Almighty . . .) into the liturgy, but a fragment of a De traditione divinae liturgiae attributed to him is a 16th-century forgery.

Approximately 35 of Proclus’ homilies about feasts of Christ and the saints have been preserved. Homily six has long been suspect because of an interpolation on virginity (ch. 2–7) and two acrostic dialogues (see ROMANUS MELODUS). The sermon itself, however, is contemporary and could be his. Recent research has restored to credit to him for a mystagogic homily on Baptism (27), a homily on Good Friday and the Trinity preserved in Arabic (30), and another on the credulity of St. Thomas (Hom. 33; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne [Paris 1857–66] 59:681–688). Of the 17 letters preserved under his name, seven were written by him. The fourth letter contains the famous phrase unum de Trinitate secundum carnem crucifixum that became the center of the Theopaschite controversy in the following century.

PROCOPIUS OF CAESAREA

Byzantine historian; b. Caesarea, in Palestine, toward the end of the 5th century; d. after 562. Procopius was educated in Caesarea and in Gaza, where he studied rhetoric and law and went to Constantinople early in his life to practice law. There he became associated with BELISARIUS, the famous general of JUSTINIAN I, as his legal adviser and private secretary. He accompanied Belisarius during the first Persian war from 527 to 531; in Africa, during the war against the Vandals (533–34); and in Italy, against the Goths. He was still with Belisarius in 540, but whether he accompanied him in the second Persian war in 541 is uncertain. In 542 he was in Constantinople. He is known to have borne the title of illustris and then the title of patricius. Procopius, who was the prefect of Constantinople in 562, was most probably also this same historian.

Procopius was the author of three important historical works: the History of the Wars in eight books (De bellis, libri VIII); Secret History (Historia arcana); and On Buildings (De aedificiis). A detailed account of the Wars of Justinian, the History of the Wars is at the same time a general history of the reign of that Emperor. The first two books relate the history of the Persian wars: the next two, that of the campaign against the VANDALS; the next three, that of the war against the Goths. The last book is more general in nature and relates the history of the period 551 to 553. The first seven books were composed sometime between 545 and 550 and published in 550; the last, after 553. The Secret History, composed c. 550 but never published during the lifetime of the author, is a vicious libel upon the characters of Justinian and the Empress THEODORA, and upon Belisarius and his wife, Antonina. It is the principal source of what is known concerning the scandalous behavior of Theodora. The Buildings, composed probably between 558 and 560, is, on the other hand, an encomiastic account of the building activities of Justinian. Procopius modeled himself after Herodotus and Thucydides and is considered the most accomplished Greek historian since Polybius.

PROCOPIUS OF GAZA

Christian rhetorician and Biblical exegete; b. Gaza, c. 475; d. Gaza, c. 528. Procopius was the foremost member of the school of rhetoric that flourished in Gaza during the 5th and early 6th centuries; among his colleagues were Choricus, Aeneas, and his brother Zacharias. Here the programs and techniques of the Greek sophistic education were applied to Christian purposes. Among his nontheological works are a panegyric to the Emperor Anastasius I and a lost paraphrase of Homer. Modern scholarship rejects the Procopian authorship of several occasional pieces in rhythmic prose and assigns to Nicholas of Methone (12th century) the polemical treatise against the Neoplatonism of Proclus, an example of Byzantine pseudepigraphy. A collection of 163 elaborately rhetorical letters devoid of theological interest but supplying biographical data has survived. Further information about his life is contained in the funeral oration for Procopius by his pupil Choricus.

Procopius's major achievement was in the field of scriptural interpretation, specifically the compilation of CATENAE for a number of the books of the Old Testament. These catenae, or chains, of passages selected from earlier authors (e.g., PHILO, ORIGEN, BASIL the Great, Theodoretus, CYRIL OF ALEXANDRIA), are so arranged as to provide, along with the collector's personal exegesis, a continuous and comparative explanation of the Biblical text. Procopius composed two commentaries on the Octateuch: the shorter survives in a Latin translation with some Greek fragments, while the longer has been identified as essentially the Catena Lipsiensis assembled by Nicephorus Hieromonachus. Other genuine works by Procopius are the commentaries on historical books of the Old Testament, Isaiah, and Ecclesiastes (not yet edited). The Migne edition prints two commentaries on the Canticle of Canticles: one (Patrologia Graeca 87:1545–1754) is genuine, the other (Patrologia Graeca 87:175–580) is spurious. Scholars reject the authenticity of the commentary on Proverbs (Patrologia Graeca 87:1221–1544); however, some sections of a genuine work on this book have been discovered.

PROFANITY

Profanity is the irreverent use of names, or irreverent reference to attributes or qualities of God or of holy persons or things held in esteem because of their relationship to God. Its essential relationship with the holy is gathered from the derivation of the word (from the Latin pro and fanum), according to which it indicates a quality of something outside the temple, i.e., unholy. Hence, if careless expressions have no connection with the holy, or if an original connection with the holy has been lost to sight in popular usage, they are not properly profane, but should rather be classified, if they are offensive to convention or good taste, as vulgar (see SPEECH, INDECENT AND VULGAR). Such, for example, would be expressions like “oh hell,” or “damn it.”

However, even though profanity is properly thus connected with the holy, it is not to be confused with BLASPHEMY, understood as the utterance of contemptuous speech against God. Intent must be considered in distinguishing particular instances of blasphemy and profanity. If one wishes to dishonor God by his words, an expression that would in other circumstances be merely profane becomes blasphemous and gravely sinful. However, as it is generally understood, profanity involves no positive intent to show contempt for holy things. Rather, it does them less honor than is their due by careless, or too frequent, or inappropriate reference to them. There can be moral fault in this, but it is not serious enough to amount to mortal sin. Sometimes, indeed, there may be no sin at all, as when profane statements are simply ways by which the illiterate unthinkingly try to give emphasis to their statements, or when the expressions used have, through widespread social usage been more or less denatured and have lost their original sacred connotation. Profanity, however, always carries with it the danger of giving disedification or scandal, especially to the young.

Some use of profanity in literature can be fully justified, as when such language is put in the mouths of the characters for the purpose of indicating that such is the type of character being portrayed. However, an excessive use of this device might indicate a certain moral insensitivity or a penchant toward vulgarity or culpable irreverence.

PROFESSION OF FAITH

Faith is necessary for salvation. This means that there must be acts of FAITH (for those capable) that are at least internal (Mk 16.16; Heb 10.38; 1 Jn 3.23).

Theology. The Church teaches that a man must elicit acts of faith at least sometimes during life (H. Denzinger, Enchiridion symbolorum 2021). When such acts of faith are externalized in word or action they are called professions of faith. Certainly such professions are required of the Christian by divine precept. Christ Himself said explicitly, “Therefore, everyone who acknowledges me before men, I also will acknowledge him before my Father in heaven. But whoever disowns me before men, I in turn will disown him before my Father in heaven” (Mt 10.32–33). Such a precept is, moreover, in perfect conformity with man’s nature. To avoid exterior profession would mean lack of conformity between actions and internal belief. Such conduct could not but weaken the belief of the Christian. Nor would it be in keeping with the social and visible nature of the Church to which he belongs.

Thus no one doubts the serious obligation to profess one's faith openly. But it is harder to determine the exact practice and extension of it. The precept would seem to be taken care of in the ordinary performance of duties prescribed under other laws; e.g., attendance at Sunday Mass involves profession of faith. So the real question is, when is a person obliged to profess his faith apart from the profession implicit in normal Christian duties? Theologians say that the obligation to profess one's faith in word and deed binds whenever the honor and glory of God or the salvation of one's neighbor demands it.

Denial of the faith is never justified under any conditions, not even the threat of torture and death. The above words of Christ do not allow fictitious or merely external denial whether by word or sign, even if the faith is upheld interiorly. Thus one may not simulate denial by externally venerating idols, for example, so as to escape danger or mockery.

While denial of faith is forbidden, temporary concealment can be justified for serious reasons (as long as it is not equivalent to denial). Eating meat in Muslim lands on days of abstinence can be licit (except where such partaking is imposed as a test of one's faith). One must confess one's faith in answer to legitimate questions by lawful authority, though evasive or equivocal answers may be given to private and unauthorized questioners—if good reason is had. Sometimes a convert is justified in delaying open profession of his faith, e.g., to prevent attacks on the Church, to avoid danger. But one is not allowed to continue formal practice of another religion. A person may not conceal his faith if such concealment imperils the faith of others, especially of those weak in their religion and looking to a leader. One is permitted to hide from or flee from persecution. Yet bishops and pastors may not forsake their people if there be reasonable hope of ministering to them (Jn 10.11–18). Flight can be justified by a long-range view of such care (Mt 10.23).

Formulas of Profession. Besides the normal outward expression of faith, the Church sometimes asks certain people to externalize their faith by means of determined formulas, called professions of faith. Such acts are considered acts of worship and are meant to edify others, or indicate the integrity of a bishop's or teacher's faith, or occasionally to unmask a deceiver.

The earliest profession of faith was, "Christ is the Lord" (cf. 1 Cor 12.3; Phil 2.11; Rom 10.9). This contained the whole Christian faith and from it the longer creeds developed. This original statement emphasized the point that Christians profess faith in the Person of Christ, or God in Christ, and not merely in a set of statements.

Soon the Trinitarian professions used in the rites of Christian initiation emerged (see the Apostolic Tradition of Hippolytus); before long the Apostles' Creed became the fixed profession of faith for Baptism in the West, as did the NICENE CREED in the East. By the 7th century candidates for orders, the bishopric, and even the papacy had to show their orthodoxy by professions of faith. Anyone suspect of heresy could clear his name in this way; thus Berengarius, accused of denying the substantial presence of Christ in the Eucharist, was asked to subscribe to a special profession of faith in 1079 (Denzinger 700).

At the time of the Protestant Reformation, Pius IV drew up the Tridentine Profession (Denzinger 1862–70). Public adherence to this soon became obligatory for all Catholics attaining degrees in theology or acquiring positions of authority in the Church. In 1877 Pius IX added certain details related to the Immaculate Conception and Vatican Council I. St. Pius X, in 1910, ordered that the profession be confirmed with an oath, and signed. In 1989 the Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith issued a new formula of profession, the PROFESSION OF FAITH AND OATH OF FIDELITY.

[W. F. DEWAN/EDS.]

PROFESSION OF FAITH AND OATH OF FIDELITY

Canon 833 of the 1983 Code of Canon Law of the Latin Church requires a profession of faith, "in accord with a formula approved by the Apostolic See," to be made by (1) everyone who has voting rights in an ecumenical or particular council, a synod of bishops, or a diocesan synod; (2) individuals named to the college of cardinals; (3) persons promoted to the episcopacy and those equivalent to a diocesan bishop; (4) diocesan administrators; (5) vicars general, episcopal vicars and vicars judicial; (6) pastors, rectors of seminary, professors of theology and philosophy in seminaries and those promoted to the diaconate; (7) rectors of Catholic universities and university teachers who teach disciplines dealing with faith and morals; and (8) superiors in clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life. At the end of February 1989, the Roman Congregation for the Doctrine of the Faith (CDF) issued a new formula of the profession in L'Osservatore Romano and at the same time introduced an oath of fidelity to be made by some, but not all, those listed in canon 833 "on assuming an office to be exercised in the name of the Church." Both the profession of faith and the oath of fidelity were to become obligatory four days later, March 1, 1989.

Although the Latin texts printed in L'Osservatore Romano were accompanied by a "note of presentation," the document as a whole had grave canonical defects. In addition to the inadequate interval before it was to go into effect, it lacked signatures and date. Neither did it explain the exceptional use of the newspaper for canonical promulgation, nor did it make mention of the requisite papal approval that is required for a significant innovation. Since 1917 the issuance of a such a general decree (i.e., a law) without papal delegation exceeds the power of the departments of the Roman Curia.

The question of the document's validity, however, became moot in the following October when the official Acta Apostolicae Sedis published a retroactive rescript dated September 19, and signed by the cardinal prefect of the CDF. The rescript stated that in an audience on July 1, 1988, Pope John Paul II had approved the action and ordered the decree promulgated. It also introduced a further norm: the approbation of vernacular versions of the two texts was reserved to the congregation.

Approved Formula. Canon 833 remained unchanged. The innovation lay in the new text itself. Prior to 1967 the approved formula of the profession of faith that was canonically required (and prefixed to the 1917 code) consisted of the creed of the councils of Nicaea and Constantinople, augmented by several paragraphs that summed up the teaching of the ecumenical councils of Trent and Vatican I. The additions to the fourth-century creed were removed in 1967 in the wake of Vatican II. Only a simple formula, with obvious references to the three modern ecumenical councils, was to be said at the end of the ancient creed:

I firmly embrace and accept all and everything which has been either defined by the Church's solemn deliberations or affirmed and declared by its ordinary magisterium concerning the doctrine of faith and morals, according as they [the teachings] are proposed by it [the Church], especially those things dealing with the mystery of the Holy Church of Christ [Vatican II], its sacraments and the sacrifice of the Mass [Trent], and the primacy of the Roman pontiff [Vatican I].

The 1989 text replaced this 1967 formula with three new paragraphs. The oblique references to the modern councils were suppressed; more important, the suggestion of the diverse levels or modes of proposal of teachings was lost, although this had evidently been derived from the 1964 dogmatic constitution on the Church (Lumen gentium 24). The purpose of the new text, according to the note of presentation, was to update the profession of faith "as regards style and content" and to bring it "more in line with the teaching of the Second Vatican Council and subsequent documents." The paragraph appended to the creed in the 1967 formula was modified "in order to distinguish better the types of truths and the relative assent required."

Commentary and Explanation. (For the text, see accompanying box.) In the new formula the first paragraph simply mentions matters to be believed "with firm faith," namely, matters taught "as divinely revealed and calling for faith." The wording is derived from the teaching of Vatican I, and it corresponds roughly to the norm of canon 750.

The second paragraph requires the firm acceptance and holding of Church teachings that are "definitively proposed." Nothing in the text suggests that this implicates an affirmation of divine and catholic faith. Theologians and canonists showed concern about the very nature of this "acceptance," about the ambiguity of "definitively proposed," about the distinction between truths of Christian faith infallibly defined and other teachings, about the possibility of future development or changes in such "definitive" teachings, and the like. When the text appeared, it was quickly noted that this dimension of Church teaching (unlike the first and third paragraphs) had not been touched upon in the canons of the code promulgated in 1983.

Finally, the third paragraph goes beyond matters of "divine and catholic faith." It is an assertion of adherence to other teachings of the pope and the other bishops. Not unexpectedly this corresponds to the nondefinitive, noninfallible, nonirrevocable teaching similarly characterized by canon 752, namely, teachings enunciated by the Roman pontiff or the college of bishops "when they exercise the authentic magisterium even if they do not intend to proclaim it with a definitive act." For this, the canon properly requires "not the assent of faith [like the creed and other revealed truth embraced in the first appended paragraph] but a religious obsequium of intellect and will.”

The translation of obsequium is far from certain: it may mean anything from blind obedience or total submission to simple religious respect or docile reflection, even faithful, loyal dissent. The officially approved English text of the new profession of faith chooses “submission.”

Oath of Fidelity. The 1989 Oath of Fidelity is distinct from the profession of faith, and different persons are canonically bound to take it “on assuming an office to be exercised in the name of the Church.” The text is a promissory oath; by definition it adds to a simple promise the invocation of the name of God and obliges the oath-taker by reason of the virtue of religion. A review of the text (see accompanying box) reveals that it is not, either strictly or conventionally, an “oath of office,” namely, an oath to fulfill the responsibilities of a given Church office. (Such oaths of office do exist in the Latin Church for certain officeholders, e.g., officers of tribunals required by canon 1254 to swear “that they will fulfill their function properly and faithfully.”) The oath is rather a broad promise to preserve ecclesial communion and to maintain Church doctrine and discipline required of individuals on assuming of certain, but not all, ecclesiastical offices.

The note of presentation compares the new oath of fidelity to the oath of fidelity to the Apostolic See taken by bishops-elect (c.380), but the wording of the two oaths bear very little resemblance and have very different purposes. Even “fidelity” or faithfulness is not a common element: the new oath does not mention fidelity to the Roman See, and most of the promises seem concerned with the existing duties of all the Christian faithful, now to be confirmed by oath. Overall the text is a kind of pastiche of obligations, unexceptionable in themselves but without direct reference to the duties assumed by individuals appointed to Church offices.

Each of the five paragraphs deserves a word of explanation. (There are minor variants of the last two paragraphs for “superiors in clerical religious institutes and societies of apostolic life.”)

Paragraph 1. The one taking the oath promises both in words and conduct always “to preserve communion with the Catholic Church.” This is partially based on canon 209, §1, and binds all the Christian faithful alike. The context demands only that this obligation be sworn to and seems to imply that officeholders have a greater obligation of communion than the rest of the faithful.

Paragraph 2. This section (alone) does have aspects of an oath of office, since one promises to carry out carefully and faithfully “the duties incumbent on me toward the universal Church and the particular church in which . . . I have been called to exercise my service.” The language, however, is derived from canon 209, §2, again a description of duties incumbent on all the Christian faithful. The ultimate source of the language is in Lumen gen- tium 30 and the conciliar decree on the laity, Apostolicam actuositatem 10, although both passages refer to lay, non-ordained members of the Church without reference to any Church office.

Paragraph 3. The paragraph begins, “In fulfilling the charge entrusted to me in the name of the Church,” a phrase that explicitly confirms the interpretation that the positions in question are true ecclesiastical offices to which appointments are made by Church authority, which acts officially “in the name of the Church.”

The substance of the paragraph refers to doctrine; it is a promise to “hold fast to the deposit of faith in its entirety,” faithfully to “hand it [the deposit of faith] on and explain it,” and finally to “avoid teachings opposed to that faith.” The mention of handing on the faith appears to apply to those officials who exercise the ministry of the word through preaching, catechetical formation, and other means. More important, it is the DEPOSIT OF FAITH in the strict sense (as referred to in the profession of faith, both the credal text and the first added paragraph) that is at issue. The text is a digest of canon 750, concerning what must be believed with divine and catholic faith; the canon also requires the believer to avoid contrary doctrines and adds that revealed truth “is manifested by the common adherence of the Christian faithful under the leadership of the sacred magisterium.”

Paragraph 4. As in the preceding paragraphs, it is the common duties of the faithful that are specified, with a mention of “fostering” as well as following “the common discipline of the whole Church”—presumably the greater duty for Church officials. The second clause bears no relation to Church office: “I shall observe all ecclesiastical laws, especially those which are contained in the Code of Canon Law [of the Latin Church, since the Eastern Catholics are not bound by the oath].” The oath to observe all ecclesiastical laws involves one in the graver transgression of the virtue of religion when one does not observe the canon law.

Paragraph 5. The final paragraph of the promise is somewhat repetitive and has two parts. First there is a promise “in Christian obedience” to unite oneself with the bishops, both as teachers of the faith and as those responsible for Church governance. The reference is to both doctrine and Church order. It is clearly adapted from canon 212, §1, although in that context the duties are those of the Christian faithful in general rather than those of officeholders. Second, there is a promise faithfully “to assist the diocesan bishops” in carrying out apostolic activity. While this is surely both proper and desirable, the language is somewhat ambiguous in its reference to diocesan bishops; either the local bishop or diocesan bishops in general may be meant.

Such a commentary or critique of the text of the oath of fidelity reveals no responsibilities that are unacceptable, but it does raise the grave question of binding oneself so broadly with the invocation of the Name of God in support of the oath-taker’s promise.

Persons Obligated to Take the Oath. The principal question asked by canonists and especially teaching theologians is, who are obliged to take the oath of fidelity? The document specifies many named in the latter part of canon 833 (numbers 5–8), but not all the officeholders listed in the second half of the canon are included. As the title of the oath indicates, it is to be taken by individuals “on assuming an office to be exercised in the name of the Church.” It is an important qualification for some of those enumerated in canon 833 do not hold Church office at all, much less one to be exercised in the name of or on behalf of the Church.

Perhaps the principal category of those simply unaffected by the new norm are teachers in colleges and universities “who teach disciplines which deal with faith or morals.” Such teachers do not receive an appointment to any ecclesiastical office, unless in some exceptional case. To take another example, the president (rector) of a Catholic university may or may not be appointed to a duly established Church office; if not, he or she is bound by canon 833, no. 7 to make the profession of faith, but not bound to take the oath of fidelity.

PROFESSIONAL ETHICS

Within the broad field of applied ethics, professional ethics assesses the moral dimension of human activity in the classic occupations of law, medicine, ministry and by extension higher education, engineering, journalism, management and other occupations that aspire to professional status. Professional ethics is concerned with the standards and moral conduct that govern the profession and its members. More specifically, professional ethics examines issues, problems, and the social responsibility of the profession itself and individual practitioners in the light of philosophical and, in some contexts, religious principles among which are duty and obligation.

Occupations that by social consent enjoy professional status are generally characterized by the following criteria: technical training that implies generalized knowledge, detailed information and practical skills in a specific field; an institutionalized mode of validating or certifying mastery of this knowledge and the accompanying skills; and, an institutionalized means of insuring that they will be put to service in the public good. Associations made up of the professionals themselves set standards to secure the competence and integrity of members engaged in private practice and, in some fields such as medicine and law, structures to monitor their conduct. These same standards are in many cases reinforced by civil law through a process of examinations and licensing.

It is characteristic of professional ethics that, in addition to providing guidelines that govern the relationship of the professional with clients, as in the case of a doctor-patient relationship, they define norms that govern the professional's responsibility to colleagues and the public as a whole, as in the case of lawyers who are officers of the court and sworn to serve the cause of justice. This latter point is illustrated by the guidelines provided by the American Bar Association and the American Medical Association governing advertising. Lawyers and doctors may participate in programs that provide information and educate the public regarding services available in order that individuals be in a position to make informed choices regarding the selection of specialists who can address their needs. It is improper, however, for advertising to promote one lawyer or doctor at the expense of others.

Theoretical Issues and Specialized Questions. Professional ethics raise a number of theoretical and specialized questions that are not easily resolved. Among the theoretical issues is the extent to which the special norms and principles governing the professions override individual rights and other moral principles. Professional ethics is concerned with the obligations and responsibility that arise out of a particular kind of service performed for individuals or groups, and in that sense approximate obligations arising out of contractual agreements. In themselves the norms of professional ethics do not define the social or personal relationships of individuals towards one another.

Every code of professional ethics puts greater or lesser emphasis on the confidentiality that is intrinsic to every professional relationship. Counselors, accountants, clergy and other professionals are narrowly restricted in what they can discuss about their clients, and it goes without saying that they cannot reveal information that they have come to know through private conversation or examinations. The client's right to privacy must be safeguarded on the one hand, and the professional cannot use information for personal gain or aggrandizement. The right to confidentiality, however, is not absolute. Laws in many states require that doctors report gunshot wounds, and teachers, counselors, nurses, and others report evidence of child abuse.

Contribution of Catholic Ethics. Although philosophical and religious ethics hold much in common when analysis in each discipline is brought to bear on the dilemmas faced by and the virtues and character required of professionals, there is a specific meaning as well as a transcendent horizon or purpose that religious ethics generally, and Catholic ethics in particular, bring to the discussion.

The Roman Catholic understanding of professional ethics is based on a theology of work and vocation. In biblical and papal teaching, it is not just physical labor that is central to human identity, but work includes the notion of intellectual activity and service as well. The Church opposes every economic and political system that erodes the connection between human dignity and work. Catholic values, shared by other religious believers, see work as a calling from God, a sharing in divine creativity that is directed to the common good as well as the transcendent horizon, the Kingdom of God. The Second Vatican Council declared in Gaudium et spes,

People are not deterred by the Christian message from building up the world, or impelled to neglect the welfare of their fellows. They are, rather, more stringently bound to do these very things (n. 34).

In LABOREM EXERCENS, Pope John Paul II stated, "Work serves to add to the heritage of the whole human family, of all the people living in the world" (par. 10).

"To profess" has clear resonance in the Catholic tradition. Members of religious orders and congregations profess their vows publicly. They affirm their membership in a community and proclaim their willingness to fulfill the mission of the group as set forth in the rules and constitutions. Similarly, Catholic social teaching reaffirms that the professional's primary obligation is to the public good in some form, with financial remuneration playing a distinctly subordinate role.

Crisis in Professional Ethics. In the 1980s the popular media reported a widespread collapse of ethical standards in general and in the professions in particular (Time, May 25, 1987). One reason for the crisis in professional ethics was said to be that professions had lost their heritage, one which is rooted in the Christian understanding of profession as commitment (Campbell 1982). This loss of heritage, however, is not an indictment of the professions so much as a statement that is descriptive of a cultural crisis presently facing Western civilization.

This loss of a cultural consensus has its roots in the profound changes wrought by technological innovation and scientific discovery in the middle of the 20th century: splitting the atom, developing the computer and telecommunications, and unlocking the genetic code. An emphasis on individualism, human freedom, and privacy (summed up as human rights) coupled with unprecedented economic power in a pluralistic/heterogeneous American society contribute to the loss of consensus that explains much of the present concern about professional ethics. The central question becomes "What is the social responsibility of the doctor, lawyer, minister, and by extension, educator, manager, engineer, accountant, journalist, social worker, and public policy maker?" It is a question that was not likely to be asked in a social context which assumed that certain standards and values were held in common. Professional behavior was virtually dictated by a consensus among the practitioners and popular expectations woven into the fabric of everyday life. (It must be acknowledged, however, that the consensus also resulted to some extent in a society in which women and minorities, whose roles were also sharply defined, found many of the professions closed to them.)

Although the moral complexity created by technological innovation and cultural pluralism is not of the individual's making, it is the responsibility of the individual professional—doctor, lawyer, scientist—to take a stance. Not everything that is medically and scientifically possible is permissible. To what extent does the technological imperative alone define the moral and legal context? The question is not one that individual professionals can be expected to resolve in principle even though, by default, they must resolve it in practice on a case-by-case basis. They face ethical dilemmas for which there is no precedent. Their responsibility to clients must be balanced against larger social issues as, for example, the right of an AIDS patient to anonymity and the need to safeguard the public from an infectious disease. Consequently, the requirements of social responsibility are central in any discussion of professional ethics.

The task facing the professions in the last decade of the 20th century is to discern ethical responsibility tentatively in an age of change while building a community in which the common good has primacy. The twin challenges of discerning personal moral behavior and the common good are no small matters. In Roman Catholic ethics this individual/social issue is clarified by the natural law tradition as well as by contemporary Catholic thinking which emphasizes historical consciousness and interprets the human person as responding to God's call in history and community.

To be designated a professional demands a commitment to the common good. Thus, to be a professional is to be called. It is to have a vocation, not just a career connoting upward mobility, success, and wealth. In the Catholic tradition, this call is from God and signifies that it is not only in our work (in vocatione) but through our work (per vocationem) that we carry out the task of continuing creativity and preparing for the Kingdom of God (Frankena 1976).

PROKOPOVICH, FEOFAN

Russian Orthodox archbishop, theologian; b. Kiev, June 8, 1681; d. St. Petersburg, Sept. 9, 1736. After studying theology in the Academy of Kiev he became a Catholic (1698) and joined the Basilian monks. During his graduate studies in Rome he was accepted as a member of the Society of Jesus. Instead of entering the order, however, he returned to Kiev and reverted to Orthodoxy. In 1704 he became a professor at the Kiev Academy and served as its rector (1711–16). Although Stefan accused him of Calvinism, he became bishop of Pskov (1720) and archbishop of Novgorod (1725). He was a close adviser of Emperor Peter I (the Great), who used him as his principal theorist on ecclesiastical policies. Prokopovich supported Peter's creation of the HOLY SYNOD (1721) and became its first vice president. The Holy Synod replaced the patriarchate as the governing body of the Russian Orthodox Church, which it subjected almost completely to state control. For his role in this change Prokopovich has been called the father of Russian CAESARO-PAPISM. He published numerous literary, philosophical, and theological works, mostly in Latin. Their influence lasted until 1836, when the reaction in favor of traditional Orthodox beliefs began. His work on ecclesiastical regulation, published in conjunction with the Czar in 1720, urged the Church's subjection to the State. In a treatise on the justice of the emperor's decision (1721), Prokopovich combined Western ideas on absolute power with Byzantine theocratic concepts. His views on the procession of the Holy Spirit, the cult of images, and the Blessed Virgin conformed to those of Orthodoxy, but his teachings on grace, free will, justification, and ecclesiology showed strong Lutheran influences. The seminary that Prokopovich started in St. Petersburg, patterned on the Protestant one in Halle, became a center for spreading his ideas.

PROMISE, MORAL OBLIGATION OF A

A promise is an assurance one gives that he will do, give, or refrain from something to the advantage of another. A promise of some kind is involved in all contracts, but ordinarily when a moral theologian speaks of a simple promise he excludes from consideration mutual or onerous agreements and thinks only of unilateral, gratuitous commitments that an individual may make to the benefit of another.

A promise binds in virtue of commutative JUSTICE if it is contractual in the strictest sense of the term, for in that case the promisor intends to obligate himself seriously and the promisee accepts the assurance with that understanding. The deliberate violation of such a promise is therefore gravely sinful, provided that the matter with which it is concerned is not too trivial of its nature to be an object of serious injustice.

More commonly the promises of daily life bind only in FIDELITY. They involve no strict contract because there is no formal acceptance on the part of the promisee, and the promisor does not intend to put himself under grave moral obligation. The keeping of such promises, therefore, is not a matter of strict justice but is rather a form of truthfulness in which an individual makes his actions conform to his words. Fidelity is a most commendable quality of soul, but it is less urgently necessary to the social good than justice, and its violation under ordinary circumstances is not considered mortally sinful.

A promise, whether binding in justice or fidelity, ceases to oblige (1) if the promisee is willing that it should not be fulfilled, (2) if fulfillment becomes impossible, unlawful, useless, or harmful to the promisee, or (3) if it can be reasonably assumed that the promisor would not have bound himself had he foreseen some supervenient change of circumstance connected with the promise.

When what is promised is morally wrong, the promise is invalid and without binding force from the beginning.

PRÔNE

The Prône began in medieval times as a vernacular service in extra-liturgical settings that came later to be included in the Latin High Mass on Sundays and other feasts. In its more developed form the Prône included a translation or paraphrase of the Gospel reading, sometimes with an explanation, a catechetical instruction based on the creed, Lord's Prayer, or Commandments, bidding prayers, as well as notification of the banns of marriage and other announcements. The term also was used to refer to sermons, especially of an instructional type. The word itself is derived from the French prône, a grill separating the chancel from the rest of the church on which notices were posted.

In France the Prône became a common means of catechetical instruction as is evident in the following 17th century account:

The Prône contains four parts: (1) Prayers for the Church, for princes, for the state, for public and special needs. (2) Instruction on how to serve God, explanation of the Pater, the Credo, the Sacraments, the Commandments, the Gospel. (3) Announcements of Church regulations, feasts and fasts, indulgences, processions, marriages, candidates for Holy Orders and all public acts of piety. (4) Promulgation of the commands of prelates, cases of excommunication, public sinners. . . . It is a public function that serves to carry out what the Fathers, the Councils, and the popes teach to the faithful, to instruct them in piety, to teach them the law of the Lord; the people, therefore, are obliged to assist at it and the parish priests to read it or have it read, as has been ordered by the capitularies of Charlemagne and since then by numberless councils, even by the first council of Orleans, as is reported by Ivo of Chartres: "On Sundays and feast days, after the sermon preached during the solemn Mass, the pastor will, in accordance with the advice of the Apostle, have the people pray for all the different needs, to pray for the king, . . . for peace, for the sick of the parish, for the dead; and for each of these intentions each one will say privately the Lord's Prayer and the priest will say the appropriate orations." [M. F. Granelas, Les Anciennes liturgies (Paris 1697) 1:525–526]

An edition of the Prône in French and in English, published in Quebec in 1874, after beginning with an instruction on avoiding servile works and attending Sunday Mass, adds a series of petitions:

"We offer Thee our prayers for Thy holy Church . . . for the peace and tranquility of this country . . . for widows and orphans. . . . We beseech thee to protect from all danger pregnant women, that their children may receive the holy Sacrament of Baptism . . . to preserve the just in a state of grace, to enlighten the mind and change the hearts of sinners . . . to unite in the bonds of charity all the inhabitants of this parish. And, in order that we may ask of Thee all that is necessary for us, we will offer to Thee the prayer which Jesus Christ Himself has taught us."

The Lord's Prayer, the Hail Mary, the Apostles' Creed, the Ten Commandments, and the Precepts of the Church follow. Finally there is the Collect from the 22d Sunday after Pentecost (in Latin), the names of deceased, the De Profundis, and the prayer Fidelium.

In the United States a vestige of the Prône endured almost to the time of the Second Vatican Council. After the Epistle and Gospel of the day were read in Latin, the celebrant would then mount the pulpit or, where there was no pulpit, stand at the communion rail, make announcements, including the bans of matrimony, read an English translation of the Epistle and Gospel, and deliver a sermon that was often an exposition of the catechism (Creed, Commandments, sacraments, and prayer).

PRONOUNCEMENTS, PAPAL AND CURIAL

The pronouncements of the Holy See, either directly from the pope, or through the various offices of the Roman Curia. Certain documents are used for teaching faith and morals; some for church governance, and others for disciplinary purposes.

Documents of the Pope. The decretal letter is one of the most solemn forms of papal proclamations. It is presently used for the canonization of saints and is generally presumed to invoke infallibility.

An encyclical is a pastoral letter written by the pope for the entire Church. Encyclicals are used to present the moral and social teachings of the Church, or to give counsel on points of doctrine which must be made more precise or which must be taught in view of specific circumstances.

The APOSTOLIC CONSTITUTION is the most solemn form of legal document issued by the pope in his own name; it is issued only in relation to very weighty matters. For instance, the Code of Canon Law for the Latin Church was promulgated as a constitution, Sacrae disciplinae leges, Jan. 25, 1983; the same for the Code of Canons of the Eastern Churches, Oct. 18, 1990. The Catechism of the Catholic Church was formally published through the constitution Fidei depositum (Oct. 11, 1992).

The apostolic letter motu proprio is the most common source of canonical legislation after the Code itself. It deals with matters that are significant, but would not merit a constitution. Motu proprios are legislative in nature and are directed to the Church at large. More recently, the pope has been using a more general form, simply entitled Apostolic letter to make proclamations. For instance, the letter Ordinatio sacerdotalis (May 22, 1994) addressed the issue of admission of women to priestly ordination: "I declare that the church has no authority whatsoever to confer priestly ordination on women and that this judgment is to be definitively held by all the church's faithful." The preparations for the Jubilee Year 2000 were also announced in an apostolic letter, Tertio millennio adveniente (Nov. 10, 1994). The place this type of papal document will occupy in years to come is not yet totally clear. There is no doubt that it is considered to be a major papal document.

APOSTOLIC EXHORTATIONS are also a significant expression of the magisterium of the Church; although they are not legislative in nature, they are morally persuasive and quite influential because they are frequently the product of consensus.

Papal allocutions are the regular addresses given by the pope on the occasion of meetings with bishops, congresses, pilgrimages, and so forth. These express the ordinary papal magisterium; they are not legislative by nature. However, the repetition of a given theme in a number of allocutions gives particular insight into the personal thought of the pope on the matter. For instance, the annual addresses to the Roman Rota at the opening of the judicial year constitute a privileged opportunity for the pope to express his views of matters relating to the application of procedural law and the canons on marriage.

The Second Vatican Council recognized the diversity of texts and their particular significance when used by the pope to further his teaching. "His mind and will . . . may be known chiefly either from the character of the documents, from his frequent repetition of the same doctrine, or from his manner of speaking" (LG 25). Canon 754 addresses this in legislative terms: "All Christ's faithful are obliged to observe the constitutions and decrees which lawful ecclesiastical authority issues for the purpose of proposing doctrine or of proscribing erroneous opinions; this holds particularly for those published by the Roman Pontiff or by the College of Bishops."

Curial Documents. The decree is the highest form of document issued by a department of the Roman Curia. It is a law whose interpretation is governed by the canons on laws (see canon 29). The term decree is given many practical meanings: 1) where it is used in administrative matters, it is applied to designate the decisions of the Roman dicasteries (for instance, the approval of the Constitutions of a religious institute); 2) in legislative matters, the term is applied specifically to disciplinary laws (for instance, the undated decree of the Cong. for the Doctrine of the Faith prescribing an automatic excommunication for any person who abuses the sacrament of penance by using tape recorders and similar means of social communication — AAS, 80 (1988), p. 1367); 3) in judicial matters, the various procedural decisions taken by the judge (as, for instance, the decisions of the Supreme Tribunal of the Apostolic Signatura).

Instructions clarify the prescriptions of laws and determine an approach to be followed in implementing them (see canon 34).

Declarations are of three types: 1) the simple declaration, which must be interpreted in the light of existing legislation (such as the Declaration of the CDF relating to membership in Masonic organizations, Nov. 26, 1983); 2) authentic interpretations or declarations, which have the force of law and must be promulgated (such as those issued by the Pontifical Council for the Interpretation of Legislative Texts); 3) extensive declarations, which to a certain extent modify the law, by having it apply to instances not originally covered by the legislation.

Circular letters express the intentions and policies of the Roman Curia. When accompanied by rules, these letters explain the intention, spirit and purpose of these rules (for instance, the letter and norms governing dispensations from the obligations of priestly celibacy, Oct. 18, 1980, as revised slightly, June 6, 1997).

Directories, such as the 1993 Directory for Ecumenism (March 25, 1993) are given for the application of accepted principles and are seen as "an instrument at the service of the whole Church . . . [whose] orientations and norms of universal application . . . provide consistency and coordination . . . with the discipline that binds Catholics together" (No. 6). The importance of a directory lies in the fact that it provides the basic principles of pastoral theology, taken from the magisterium of the Church, by which pastoral action in the ministry can be more fittingly directed and governed.

Classification. Documents can be examined from a descriptive approach, according to form and the authorities who issued them. But they can also be classified according to their juridical value or weight. Some documents are magisterial (flowing from the munus docendi), while others are juridical (based on the munus regendi). Those that are juridical can be either laws in the proper sense of the term, or administrative documents for the whole community; they can bind only the executors of the law (such as texts addressed particularly to bishops), or even be non-binding (such as guidelines).

PROOF

Proof is the means of ascertaining the truth of an alleged fact or proposition. It may consist in presenting empirical evidence, documents, or witnesses. More often it is taken to mean a reasoning process. Proof is inductive if it proceeds from the singular to the universal, or from the less to the more universal. It is deductive (syllogism) if it proceeds from the more to the less universal, or from one universal to another coextensive universal. From the viewpoint of truth-value, deductive proof is either demonstration, in which certitude is attained, or dialectics, in which probability is attained. Reasoning from hypothesis and analogy yields dialectical conclusions. Statistical proofs are a mode of induction. The ancients assigned proper modes of proof also to RHETORIC and POETICS.

PROPAGANDA

The term applied to the content and the process of communication in which actual or alleged facts, arguments, and opinions are presented in such a way as to induce judgments and attitudes favoring the interest or point of view of those sponsoring the communication. In the United States, propaganda is associated with sinister activities, in that it is perceived as slanted and biased. It usually involves loaded or heavily weighted material to assure consent and agreement. The term came to be used by English and Continental writers in the late 18th and early 19th centuries, when some who were anticlerical and anti-Catholic identified this type of material with the publications of the Roman Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith (De Propaganda Fide). "Propagating the faith" was judged by these writers as "sheer propaganda." However, the term lost its original connection with anti-Catholicism, and it is currently used to identify the vast body of political, partisan, and high-pressure mass communication designed to promote persons or causes in the modern world. Within modern communist movements, the term is associated with the agitation and indoctrination of the masses. Others associate the term with the highest degree of deception comparable to that of the Nazis' Ministry of Public Enlightenment and Propaganda. As a contemporary phenomenon, especially associated with wars and political strife, propaganda has been studied by social psychologists and political analysts in great depth. In moral society, propaganda falls under the same moral laws as do other forms of speech and communication.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, CONGREGATION FOR THE

The Congregation for the Propagation of the Faith (Congregationis de Propaganda Fide or "CPF") was established to coordinate and spearhead the missionary activity of the Church. This entry deals with the history and activities of CPF from its founding to its reorganization by Pope Paul VI in 1967, when its name was changed to Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples. For developments since 1967, see EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES, CONGREGATION FOR THE.

History. The idea of a special congregation in the Roman Curia to devote its attention to missionary matters appears to have originated with Raymond LULL, a Franciscan tertiary, who in the 13th century petitioned Celestine V and later Boniface VIII to establish such a congregation. Jean VENDVILLE revived the idea, proposing in 1567 that the pope institute a congregation for the conversion of the Greeks, another for alleviating the lot of Christian captives in Muslim lands, and one for the "Christian apostolate." In 1568 at the urging of Francis Borgia, Pius V established two temporary commissions for the propagation of the faith, one in Protestant lands, the other in non-Christian lands. In 1573 Gregory XIII instituted a provisional congregation of three cardinals for the conversion of non-Christians. Clement VIII enlarged the importance of this commission of cardinals.

During Clement VIII's reign four things were being proposed: (1) a congregation of cardinals for the propagation of the faith, (2) an organization to procure financial support for the missions, (3) a publishing house to print Christian literature to be distributed among non-Christians, and (4) a seminary for the training of missionaries. Prominent among the promoters of these ideas were Cardinal Santori, the Capuchin Girolamo Narma, and the four Discalced Carmelites, Girolamo Graziano della Madre di Dio, Domenico di Gesu e Maria, Tommaso di Gesu, and Pietro della Madre di Dio. Clement VIII established a congregation of nine cardinals in 1599 for handling missionary affairs, and under this he placed the national seminaries founded by Gregory XIII.

This gradual evolution of a central missionary organization reached its climax and permanent institutional character in the formal erection of CPF by Gregory XV on Jan. 6, 1622. It was confirmed by the bull Inscrutabili Divinae of June 22, 1622. The original congregation consisted of 13 cardinals, two prelates and one secretary. One of the prelates was John Baptist Vives, who presented his palace in the Piazza di Spagna to serve as its headquarters.

The two factors that necessitated a missionary congregation were the lack of unity and collaboration among the various religious orders charged with carrying out missionary work, and the excessive control that Spain and Portugal were then exercising over the administration of the missions under the terms of the right of patronage. (See PATRONATO REAL.) Pius V had earlier attempted to wrestle control of the Church's missionary activity from the Portuguese and Spanish Crowns, but was unsuccessful. The erection of the CPF was an important step in mission history, marking the transfer of authority over missionary activity from states to the Holy See. State control of this field had resulted in a hierarchical organization ill-suited to the needs of the missionaries. The frequent interference of colonial officials into the administration of missions, and the close identification between the colonial regimes and missionaries in the eyes of the indigenous people hindered the missionaries from winning over the hearts and minds of the local populace. Reform was urgently needed to institute reforms and to bring about more united and concerted missionary action.

The new congregation set to work at its first meeting on Jan. 14, 1622. The first order of the things was the momentous task of conducting a study of existing missions to identify areas of strengths and weaknesses. This task fell on Francesco Ingoli, a priest from Ravenna, who as secretary for the first 20 years, proved to be the driving force behind the early congregation. Through his painstaking efforts, the newly established CPF was able to accumulate a wealth of knowledge on missionary affairs that enabled it to draw up the fundamental principles destined to govern all future missionary activity. Some of the evils revealed by this study were: the insufficient number of missionaries, their ignorance of native languages and cultures, the mercenary preoccupation of some of them, the discord between missionary orders, the failure to train native clergy, and a lack of willingness to adapt to indigenous cultural values. Having learned the evils and the obstacles, CPF set out to improve missionary methods, to increase the supply of missionaries, and to foster the development of an indigenous clergy. It strove actively to centralize control of the missions, and to emphasize the spiritual character of mission work. Under CPF, the Catholic missions once again began to assume that supranational character that they had had during the Middle Ages. In its objectives one can see the lofty spiritual ideal with which it was concerned, yet it had to face a long and bitter struggle with the Spanish and Portuguese authorities before the necessary reforms could be carried out. Although CPF had been given exclusive jurisdiction over all missionary activity, including the mission territories and personnel, it was not immediately able to exercise its authority freely. It was opposed not only by the governments mentioned but also by religious orders jealously clinging to privileges and faculties granted in the past by the Holy See.

In order to promote unity and uniformity, the CPF assumed responsibility for granting all missionary faculties. Missionaries were obliged to report to it every year on the status, prospects, and resources of their missions. CPF also urged the generals of religious orders to found schools of languages and controversy for missionaries destined for the East. In 1627, under Urban VIII, a seminary of the CPF called the Collegium Urbanum was founded to train for the secular priesthood candidates from all nations. In order to circumvent the excessive authority claimed by Spain and Portugal under the right of patronage, CPF appointed the first three vicars apostolic for the Far East in 1659, at the same time furnishing them with wise and far-reaching directives relating to the preservation of indigenous values and the development of an indigenous clergy. In contrast to the colonizing policies of Spain and Portugal, which had unfortunate repercussions on mission methodology, CPF had insisted from the beginning on the preservation of cultural characteristics and social autonomy of the non-Western lands. Regrettably, however, CPF, while still young and relatively inexperienced, found itself embroiled in the bitter controversies about rites and jurisdiction. (See CHINESE RITES CONTROVERSY; PATRONATO REAL.)

In order to supply Christian books and literature for the mission world, CPF set up its own printing press in 1626. Much of this equipment, and books as well, were stolen during the Napoleonic invasion of Rome. Because of the revolutionary occupation of the city, CPF was closed between 1809 and 1814, but it was reestablished by Pius VII in 1817. In 1862 there was established within CPF a congregation for the Oriental Church. In Pius X's reorganization of CPF in 1908, the Oriental congregation was separated from CPF and given complete autonomy for Oriental affairs.

Administrative Competence. In the beginning, CPF's competence was very broad, embracing all matters related to missionary activity, the only limitation being that particularly serious affairs had to be referred to the pope. Its competence was exclusive for each and every mission region, and it included all persons and cases. The exclusive authority of CPF was guaranteed by the abrogation of all contrary legislation, including the privileges and indults that had been granted to different orders or congregations. Since it had the right to handle for its territories all matters that other Roman Congregations handled for European dioceses, it was commonly said of CPF ceteras Congregationes habet in ventre. It enjoyed not only administrative jurisdiction but also judicial, since it could judge cases, even in the first instance. It had legislative power also; in fact, its decrees had the force of apostolic constitutions and were to be observed inviolably by all persons. The conferral of this broad jurisdiction on CPF did not automatically assure its recognition and acceptance by all who were legally subject to it. For a long time CPF had much opposition to face.

These sweeping powers were modified by Pius X in his constitution Sapienti Consilio of 1908. This constitution abrogated CPF's competence in regard to extent of territory, matters of faith, matrimonial cases, the discipline of the sacred rites, and religious as missionaries, restricting it to mere regulatory authority over the various missions to ensure their proper administration. In reality, CPF had special faculties from the Roman pontiff, which dispensed it from ordinary canonical prescriptions under special circumstances prevailing in mission territories. It was vested with true legislative power, although it is restricted in its exercise. It was authorized to issue instructions in order to explain the practical application of laws or to suggest more efficacious means of the mission apostolate. These instructions did not have the force of law but were rather directive norms to be followed in general. More specifically, CPF was granted the power to erect mission territories, and divide them according to needs or opportunities. It had the power to name the ordinaries of these territories, and it regulated the proper administration of all mission regions, including local councils, seminaries and indigenous religious orders.

Territorial Competence. From its very beginning, CPF was entrusted with mission territories in those regions of Europe where Protestantism prevailed. It was only in 1908, according to the provision of Sapienti Consilio, that Great Britain, Holland, Luxembourg, southern Canada, and the U.S. were removed from its jurisdiction. The bulk of Central and South America were never under CPF because of difficulties with the Spanish and Portuguese crowns under the patronage system. Most of Africa and Asia, where the control of the Spanish and Portuguese colonial authorities were more tenuous, came to be subjected to CPF, except for those jurisdictions which had been ceded earlier to the Portuguese and Spanish crowns.

External Organization. The territory under CPF's jurisdiction was divided into dioceses, vicariates, and prefectures, ruled over respectively by bishops, vicars apostolic, and prefects apostolic. At one time there was a territorial organization known as the missio sui juris, which flourished particularly when Cardinal Van Rossum was prefect. Their number steadily diminished after his death in 1932. By the time of the 1967 reorganization into the Congregation for the EVANGELIZATION OF PEOPLES, only three remained. The general practice was to erect a new mission territory in the form of a prefecture, and elevate it to a vicariate after suitable growth, particularly in the number of local clergy.

The hierarchical organization, however, originated not as an indication of missionary development but in the endeavor to overcome the abuses, excesses, and failures of the right of patronage, so strongly defended by the Spanish and Portuguese crowns. Originally the Holy See appointed vicars apostolic for territories outside the effective control of the Portuguese authorities, but within already constituted dioceses. It was only later that vicariates and prefectures independent of dioceses were erected.

In the 19th century, the practice of CPF upon opening a new mission region was to entrust it to a particular religious order or mission society commissioned to develop the region, at the same time appointing as ecclesiastical superior a member of the same institute. This practice, formally known as "ius commissionis," was abolished in 1966, and indigenous bishops took over the administration of these mission territories from superiors of religious orders.

Emphasis upon indigenous leadership received renewed impetus after World War I when Benedict XV assigned to CPF as its special task that of building up as soon as practicable an indigenous clergy and hierarchy, to whom the government of the Church in the mission territories should be turned over without delay. The fruits of this policy were quite remarkable; the first bishop of Asian origin was consecrated in 1923, and the first apostolic vicars of African origin were named in 1939. When Vatican Council II opened in 1962, there were a total of 90 Asian bishops and 58 African bishops present. The development of an indigenous episcopacy and the erection of the hierarchy in nearly all mission lands was a landmark development in the history of the Church's mission.

PROPAGATION OF THE FAITH, SOCIETY FOR THE

The "organ of the Holy See for collection everywhere of the alms of the faithful and their distribution among all Catholic Missions" ["Romanorum Pontificum," Acta Apostolicae Sedis 14 (1922) 321]. It aids the Near East, Latin America, and the home missions of the United States, as well as those territories under the Congregation for the Evangelization of Peoples.

Origin. At 19, Pauline JARICOT (1799–1862) had her first intuition of the plan for the Propagation of the Faith. The French missionary establishment had been fatally hit by the revolution of 1789 and the three leading missionary institutes wiped out; only seven missionaries left France between 1793 and 1798. French organizations in Asia and Africa were cut off from the motherland for 25 years. Missionary societies lacked both vocations and monetary support. Aware of this situation and also of the fact that various organizations were trying to set up collecting agencies, Pauline Jaricot did not believe that particular and competing associations would advance the missions. She wished, rather, to establish a single collecting agency for all Catholic missions everywhere.

Three stages may be distinguished in the foundation of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. The first, from 1818 to 1819, was Pauline Jaricot's implementation of a proposal by the directors of the Missions Étrangères for an association of prayer and good works for the missions—one, however, that culled but meager contributions. The second stage, from 1819 to 1822, was the organization of the association according to a plan she had conceived. Watching a family card game one evening, Pauline thought how easy it would be for each of her friends and relatives to find ten associates who would each donate a weekly sou to the missions. One among them would be chosen to receive the contributions of 10 groups of 10; another, 10 groups of 100, and so on. The future of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith, which was born that evening, appeared bright; however, only a few weeks later its very existence was threatened. Several Lyonese priests warned their parishioners against the society in their Sunday sermons, calling the association a schismatic enterprise dreamed up by an ambitious bigot, and they refused absolution to its associates. These attacks were triggered by the displeasure of the friends of certain missions in the United States who resented a general collecting association. Fortunately, through the efforts of influential laity and clergy, the society was saved and immediately afterward took a great step forward. The third stage was the universalization of the association and its subsequent reorganization. This began at a meeting on May 3, 1822, purportedly held to raise money for Bp. Louis William DUBOURG's missions in Louisiana and attended primarily by members of the Congregation de la Vierge, an organization dedicated to works of charity in post-Revolutionary France. They agreed to constitute themselves a provisional council and adopted the collection method and name of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. Pauline Jaricot was persuaded to bring her own collection groups into the generalized society, and for the next 30 years "left to whomever wished to assume it, the honor of having founded the Society for the Propagation of the Faith." However, in 1881, in a brief addressed to Julia Maurin, Pauline Jaricot's first biographer, Leo XIII designated her as the foundress.

History. The society spread with extraordinary rapidity on the national level. After Pius VII authorized it on March 15, 1823, what so far had been the concern of pious laity was enthusiastically promoted by bishops and clergy. By 1826 the society had become international; the first branch outside of France was established in Belgium in 1825, and two years later others followed in Germany, Italy, and Switzerland. By 1836 the society had spread over most of Europe. In 1839 local units extended to the land that was its first beneficiary, the United States, and in 1840 to South America.

In 1822, when the society sent its first donation to the United States, the Church there had only one archdiocese and eight dioceses, while Catholics numbered about 200,000. For the next ten years, the United States received 42 percent of the society's total allocations. In recognition of this, the First Provincial Council of Baltimore (1829) stated: "The bishops and clergy of the United States make it a duty never to offer the Sacrifice on our altars without thinking of the venerable Association of the Propagation of the Faith." In 1884 the Third Plenary Council of the United States bishops endorsed Cardinal James Gibbons' suggestion for a national organization of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in the United States. No substantial work was done, however, until 1896, when at the proposal of Abp. Patrick Riordan of San Francisco, California, the metropolitans authorized the appointment of a national director and the American branch of the society was incorporated. The following year, 1897, Bp. Henry Granjon, a Sulpician missionary of Lyons, was appointed first national director, and headquarters were established at St. Mary's Seminary in Baltimore, Maryland.

Until 1922 the central council of Lyons and the central council of Paris decided on the distribution of the alms received, in accordance with the missionary demands brought to their attention. Displeased by the monopoly held by the French council over the distribution of monies collected in the entire Catholic world, the bishops of other countries, and especially the United States bishops, tried to bring about the transfer of the international center of the society to Rome. So did the heads of mission territories who complained that the central council did not understand their needs. Decided and prepared by Benedict XV, this transfer was realized by Pius XI in 1922 and carried through by a young prelate, Msgr. Angelo Roncalli (later Pope John XXIII), National Director for the Society for the Propagation of the Faith in Italy. Through his motu proprio Romanorum Pontificum of May 3, 1922, Pius XI established the society as a pontifical society to be governed by the Congregation of the Propagation of the Faith and directed by a general council selected among the clergy of the countries notably contributing to the collection. With its headquarters in Rome, the society received from the same Pontiff a new set of rules and regulations for its administration and coordination. Later Pius XI issued an important encyclical, Rerum Ecclesiae, which conferred upon the society in a certain way "Roman citizenship" and made it "all mission organizations . . . the principal one" [Acta Apostolicae Sedis 18 (1926) 65]. Through the same document it received "charge of all mission needs that exist at present, or that shall exist in the future."

Organization. The Pontifical Society for the Propagation of the Faith is administered by a supreme council chosen by the pontiff himself from among those nations that contribute to the work. Over this council presides the secretary general of the Congregation of the Evangelization of Peoples. The roster of officials administering the council, as well as the regulations for its conduct, have been laid down by Romanorum Pontificum. The two main functions of the council consist in augmenting its administrative sphere through the establishment of national and diocesan offices of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith and in centralizing the alms of the faithful in order to be in a position to effect a “just division of the alms among . . . all the Catholic Missions” (Pius XI, Romanorum Pontificum, op. cit. 321). Subject to the superior general council are the national and diocesan directors of the Society for the Propagation of the Faith. The national directors are directly responsible to the pope through the superior general council. Diocesan directors, named by the bishop in each diocese, assist their national director to whom they send the alms that have been donated to the society by the faithful in every parish throughout the world.

Distribution of alms collected through the society belongs strictly to the superior general council. Those in charge of the national and diocesan offices of the society are the trustees of the pope’s mission money. Therefore it may not be disposed of by anyone except the superior general council without violating positive and natural rights. Accordingly, the same council found it necessary to declare that “according to the motu proprio: Romanorum Pontificum, the right and duty of allocating to the Missions all offerings made to the Society belongs exclusively to the Superior Council” (Plenary Session, Rome, April 26, 1938). It further asserted that “all stringless offerings, even those made outside of Mission Sunday and membership ought to enter the General Fund to be placed at the distribution of the Superior Council” (Dec. 15, 1951). This distribution is made at the annual international meeting in Rome.

Fides News Service. From its inception, the Society started a service of mission information — “News from the Missions.” Three years later, it was renamed “Annals of the Propagation of the Faith.” During a meeting of its Superior Council in April 1927, the Society decided to establish Fides News Service, “to make the missions known to the People of God” through the press. Fides was to “provide to the Propagation of the Faith Directors of the world two classes of publicity material: (1) news copy and photos, the timeliness of which is such that they will be valuable not only to the Annals but for the non-mission press of each country; and (2) Studies of contemporary mission conditions of religious and social affairs throughout the world so far as they affect the conversions of non-Christians” (First Statutes of Fides). Fides was launched immediately after the feast of Saint Francis Xavier in 1927, the first news bulletins being issued in English and French. The Italian edition began in 1929, the Spanish in 1930 and the German in 1932. Fides provides a mission statistics service and assists in the worldwide promotion of missionary publications. With more than 100 volumes in English and other languages, Fides is a source of accurate documentation of the work of evangelization throughout the world.

PROPASSIONS OF CHRIST

From the times of St. Jerome and St. John Damascene theologians have customarily used the term “propassions” to designate the functions of the concupiscible and irascible sensitive appetites of Christ’s hypostatized human nature (e.g., love, desire, hope, fear, sadness). It is likely that the prefix pro (in place of, for, instead of) was originally employed by the early writers to deny to Christ the passions as then imperfectly understood. Because of the prevailing influence of Greek philosophy, and of Stoicism in particular, these lower powers of man were generally thought to involve, essentially, a state of irrationality or rebellion and opposition to the higher powers (reason).

St. Thomas Aquinas, arguing from the Aristotelian philosophical view that the passions are in themselves perfections of human nature, states (Summa theologiae, 3a, 15.4) that Christ truly possessed all the psychological or animal passions, properly understood, in a most perfect and eminent fashion.

Respectful, as always, of past traditions, however, Thomas retained the term “propassions” in order to stress the fact that in Christ the passions were always perfectly subject to reason and were never a source or result of sinful excess by reason of object, principle, or effect (ibid.).

Modern psychological considerations of the unparalleled psychosomatic unity of Christ’s sinless sensual faculties emphasize the resultant extreme sensitivity of these powers and, consequently, the intensity of Christ’s suffering, especially in His Passion.

PROPERTIES, DIVINE PERSONAL

By divine personal properties Trinitarian theology understands that which is proper to and exclusive to one of the Divine PERSONS, to the exclusion of the other two. The very existence of three Persons necessarily implies the existence of differentiating qualities.

The name Father expresses that which is most intimate and necessary in the First Person, i.e., the act of generating the Son. In order to express this divine fecundity as a necessary and inseparable feature of the Father, Greek theology often refers to Him as the source, root, and principle of the other two Persons (Basil, Athanasius, Cyril of Alexandria, John Damascene; Tertullian among the Latins). These expressions convey the idea not of efficient causality, but rather of self-diffusion by communication of the same NATURE. If the act of generating a Son consubstantial to Himself belongs so intimately to the Father, then He cannot be understood except through an essential relation to the Son: the Father is paternity itself, nothing but an eternal, subsistent, generative act.

As a consequence the Son, necessarily generated by the Father, is “the radiance of the Father’s splendor and the full expression of his being” (Heb 1.3). Just as divine paternity exclusively constitutes the Father, so also divine FILIATION constitutes the Person of the Son. The paternal act of generation is essentially productive of a perfect image of the Father, and this paternal image is an exclusive personal property of the Son. As such, the Son is the perfect replica of His Father; He manifests His Father and is consubstantial with Him. The second of these three qualities is at the root of the divine mission that constitutes the Incarnation. Divine filiation is considered as the act of an intellectual faculty (Latins) or as an operation of the entire nature, proceeding from the innermost core of the divine substance (Greeks). In any case, generation and filiation are essentially correlative terms, each constituting a different Person.

It is the same with regard to the Spirit. A constant Greek tradition sees in divine sanctity an exclusive, personal trait of the Spirit, as constitutive of a Divine Person as generation and filiation. “In God, whatever appertains to nature is common . . . but the Person is known by the character of paternity, or filiation, or sanctifying power” (St. Basil, Epist. 214.4; Patrologia Graeca 32:789). This conception, common in the 4th century, is further supported by Athanasius, Gregory Thaumaturgus, Cyril of Alexandria, Gregory of Nazianzus, Eulogius, and John Damascene. Sanctity as a personal property of the Spirit is, however, conceived not merely as an internal act, like generation and filiation, but with an outward bent: the Spirit is sanctity to be poured out on men. In addition to this sanctifying power, the Spirit possesses also as a personal character an ineffable intimacy with the Son originating from a special immanence in Him. Greek theology conceives the origin of the Divine Persons as it were in straight line, with the Father as divine principle of the Son, and the Son as the only immediate source of the Spirit. This was the current conception in 4th-century Cappadocia (Basil) as well as Alexandria (Athanasius, Cyril). On the contrary, for the strictly rational, almost geometrical conception of the Latins, the only differentiating personal property of the Spirit is passive SPIRATION, His being breathed forth, as though from equidistant points, by Father and Son. In this view, sanctity is not a personal property of the Spirit but rather a common treasure equally shared by all three. In current Western theology, therefore, divine personal properties are only three: generation, filiation, and passive spiration; at times, broadening the concept, two more are included: agennētos for the Father, and common spiration, common to Father and Son.

PROPERTY (LOGIC)

Property (Gr. ἴδιον, Lat. proprium), one of the five PREDICABLES described in the Isagoge of PORPHYRY, designates an attribute or characteristic that is peculiar to a thing of a certain type. It is important in the logic of DEFINITION. In examining the differences that can be used to distinguish a given SPECIES classified within a common GENUS and thus to help in formulating the definition of the species, one discovers several kinds. (1) Common differences predicate no more than some otherness in the condition of the subject; e.g., Plato as an adult differs from himself as a boy. They are called predicable accidents; if used in formulating definitions, several must be used in a conjunction proper to the species. (2) A more proper difference is an accident that is inseparable from an individual, that belongs to him and is proper only to him (e.g., a scar, an aquiline nose). (3) The most proper differences are those that are commensurable with the specific nature; any one of these will serve to differentiate a nature. The difference that is the most proper determination by which a nature may be designated, and is also the reason for all other proper differences, is given a special name, specific difference (e.g., rational as said of man). The other proper differences that are outside the nature but follow necessarily on it, and are convertible with it, retain the more generic name of property or proprium. This is defined as the universal said of a species as belonging only, necessarily, and always to that species, and to every individual of that species.

Properties in this strict sense may follow either on the specific nature or on generic natures to the extent that these are definable by a difference. For example, having a nervous system is a property of the genus, animal, following on sensibility. In a broader sense property is frequently understood as designating an attribute that belongs to something always, but neither only, nor necessarily (e.g., two-footed, as said of man).

In the logic of reasoning property also designates one of the four kinds of predicates enumerated by ARISTOTLE in his Topics (101b 11–37; 128b 14–139a 20) as constituting one type of dialectical problem.

In strict scientific reasoning, i.e., that which employs a proper cause, properties are demonstrated of their subject through the real definition of the subject (see DEMONSTRATION). Predication of an attribute of its proper subject is the second mode of per se PREDICATION (Anal. post. 73a 35–73b 24). The aim of SCIENCE is to reduce attributes to their proper cause, so far as this is possible. The methodology of each science must determine the kind of property to be proved of the subject of the science, the causes through which they are to be proved, and in what order this is to be done.

PROPERTY, EARLY CHURCH

This article deals with Church property in the first six centuries and the doctrine on property among early Christian authors.

Church Property before Constantine. The question of Church property does not seem to have arisen in the Christian communities before the middle or end of the 2d century. Confusion with the Jews, as Suetonius attests (Claudius 25), apparently permitted the first Christians to benefit from the juridical statute that the Jewish community had enjoyed since Caesar (Josephus, Ant. Jud. 14.25).

Religious gatherings in private houses and burial in cemeteries belonging to private families, such as the catacombs of Priscilla or Domitilla in Rome, made it possible for a community to function without property. Even though it was not under continual persecution, the Church was not recognized by the government and had no legal existence. This was a precarious regimen since a proprietor could refuse to offer hospitality to religious services; and in the cemeteries, Christians and pagans were buried side by side, as the excavations under Saint Peter's in the VATICAN attest.

A deposit of funds did exist, however, in the 2d century. During the reign of Antoninus (138–61), MARCION gave 200,000 sesterces to the Church of Rome (Tert., De praescrip. 30) and Tertullian spoke of a collection, augmented by monthly contributions and used for charitable purposes (Apol. 39.5). Literary testimony, epigraphy, and archeology prove that after the end of the 2d century, cemeteries and churches were no longer the property of private individuals. In 198 Pope ZEPHYRINUS confided the administration of a cemetery to the deacon Callistus, who seems to have functioned as the agent of the community (corpus). In the course of the 3d century this property (belonging to a group not legally recognized) existed at least in fact.

The suspect testimony of the Historia Augusta (Vita Alex. Sev. 49.6) reports a debate before the emperor between the Christians and the wine merchants of Rome concerning the use of a locus publicus between 222 and 235. Of more certain value is the testimony of EUSEBIUS OF CAESAREA concerning the granting to the Christians places for religious worship by the Emperor Gallienus (Ecclesiastical History 7.13). The text adds that they were enabled to take possession of their cemeteries in 260 and that a decision given by Aurelia (270) in favor of the Christians of Antioch against the heretical Bishop PAUL OF SAMOSATA gave the property of the house of the Church to the bishop who was in epistolary relation with the bishops of Rome and Italy (Ecclesiastical History

7.30). Excavations and inscriptions in Rome, Africa, and Asia as well as papyri from the end of the 3d and beginning of the 4th century name churches and funerary monuments that imply a form of property holding. The restitutions of property to the Christians under Galerius in 305 (Ecclesiastical History 8.2, 9.10), by Maximian (ibid. 9.10.11), and finally by Constantine I and Licinius in 313 (ibid. 10.5.9–12; Lactantius, De mort. pers. 47.7–9) point to an even earlier recognized possession.

The confusion of Christians with the Jews could not have endured very long. But the use by the Christian communities of a juridical form of association proper to a lower class (collegia tenuiorum), as suggested by G. de Rossi and accepted by G. Monti, although not inconceivable, raises too many difficulties, as has been pointed out by L. Duchesne and others. Nor is there proof for a kind of “corporate” holding, or for the legal existence of a corpus (or juridically recognized body), since the thesis of a recognition by the pagan state making the community licit is hard to accept. Finally, there is no evidence for maintaining, with G. Bovini, that from the beginning of the 2d century, churches had a civilly recognized patrimonial capacity.

The development of Christianity and the support it received from at least the 3d century on, in the entourage of certain emperors, explain the tolerance of actual appropriation, but an appropriation that was necessarily precarious and without juridical title. According to whether the policy, locally or temporarily, was tolerance or persecution, the Christians could have held their landed property, disposed of it, been deprived of it, or obtained restitution for it.

In any case, it is certain that the title holder of these possessions was not the community of the universal Church. It was the local community, directed by its bishop, that used the churches and cemeteries. Eusebius makes this clear with many instances; and the restitution ordered by Constantine and Licinius confirms it: the goods are rendered ad jus corporis eorum id est ecclesiarum (Lactantius, De mort. persec. 48).

Christian Community as Proprietor. The right of the Christian communities to be proprietors of immobile property cannot be doubted after the Edict of MILAN. In 321 Constantine authorized the donation of property to the Church (Corpus iuris civilis, Codex Iustinianus, ed. P. Krueger, 1.2.1), and he himself proved generous. His donation of the Lateran property to the bishop of Rome is the most celebrated manifestation of his great generosity.

However, the actual juridical condition of this property is still not known with precision: was it the property of the local community considered as a moral person? Of the bishop, who in some fashion “incarnated” it? The attribution of the property to God or to a saint? Or a patrimony given for a pious cause or charitable foundation? There are as many solutions as there are texts offered in proof; but none of the solutions is without difficulty. A. Steinwenter believes in an evolution leading from the ecclesiastical corporation under Constantine to an ecclesiastical institution under Justinian. The form of such a development appears perhaps in the law of Justinian. Before that, ecclesiastical goods were doubtless considered the property of the local church under the bishop, whose development, administration, and privileges are discussed by J. Gaudemet in L'Église dans l'empire romain (Paris 1958) 299–315.

Patristic Doctrine on Property. If the exigencies of cult and charity required ecclesiastical property, the Christian teaching was also occupied with formulating certain principles in regard to the right of private property, its purpose, and its legitimacy. Certain decisions were gathered in canonical collections and are embodied in the Decree of Gratian (Corpus iuris canonici, ed. E. Friedburg, D.47, c. 8; c. 14.q.4.c.11). Taken out of context, they have given rise to contestable interpretations of patristic thought. Very often they are not principles but counsels given in particular cases and from which one cannot generalize without abusing their meaning.

Economic and Social Situation. The economic and social situation of the later empire made it legitimate for the moralists to intervene. Wars, invasions, and local revolts aggravated the misery of many, while the masters of the great landed properties already prefigured the medieval lords. But the Christian authors are rare who made much of this political crisis. LACTANTIUS denounced the economic troubles of his times (Div. inst. 5, 6). His ideal was that of the golden age of the pagan poets. He desired a fraternity conformable to the gospel, but had no thought of the introduction of a communism, which he considered dangerous, impossible, and unjust (ibid. 3, 21; Epitome 38).

SALVIAN also underlined the social disequilibrium (De gub. Dei 3). But he neglected the other causes, such as the invasions and the inefficacy of political institutions. If he saw in a man's fortune the occasion for numerous sins, it was the bad use of riches that he condemned, not riches themselves (Ad eccl. 1.7.35).

With Saint Ambrose it was the same (De Nabuthae). He criticized the attachment of his contemporaries to their riches (De Off. 2.21). Councils, such as Toledo I (c. 11) denounced the abuses of the powerful and invited the bishops to excommunicate them if they did not amend. The council appealed to the emperor to protect the poor against the rich (Codex eccl. Afric. c. 75). In regard to riches, patristic doctrine oscillates between the evangelical counsel of renouncement and the Roman regimen of private property. It did not solve the conflict by a prescription of absolute poverty, of perfect equality, or of holding riches in common. But it preached the disdain of riches and the necessity of almsgiving.

In patristic writings, private property was not considered the basic form that the use of earthly goods should take, for God had created these goods for the use of all. Hence one should not be an egoist in the employment of his private goods, but should use them generously in succoring the less favored. More than the proprietor of riches he has not created; man is the custodian (custos) or the steward (minister) of them. He should act as custodian and not as absolute master.

Teaching of the Eastern Fathers. In the East, Fathers such as BASIL of Caesarea, GREGORY OF NAZIANZUS, and GREGORY OF NYSSA evoked an ideal state of absolute equality and of holding goods in common. But while they condemned usury, they did not reject private property. It is in detachment from riches, disdain toward that which so often causes sin, and generosity toward the unfortunate that they found a conciliation between the egalitarian ideal and the juridical regimen of their times, which they had no intention of overthrowing. But as Saint JOHN CHRYSOSTOM made clear, man owns nothing of his own (In Ep. 1 ad Cor. hom. 10.2; Patrologia Graeca, ed. J. P. Migne, 61:84). God alone is the true proprietor of all goods.

According to S. Giet, the Greek Fathers, and in particular Basil, had distinguished between the common destination and the private ownership of goods (Hom. in illud Lucae: Destruam 7; Patrologia Graeca 31:2768).

But this doctrine, for lack of a good knowledge of Greek, was misunderstood in the West. Ambrose of Milan and Rufinus of Aquileia transformed this condemnation of exclusive use into a reprobation of private property. Thus is explained the famous interjection of Ambrose: usurpatio jus fecit privatum, usurpation gave rise to private right (De off. 1.28.133). If the Fathers evoked a primitive state before the fall in which private property was unknown (ibid. 1.28.132), thus confusing Paradise and the golden age of the pagans, they did not condemn the established order or the Roman right of property. In any case, a community of goods does not belong to sinful man. AUGUSTINE proposed community of goods to the priests of Hippo without being able to impose it upon them.

The essential in the patristic attitude is the determination of the limits and the purpose for property. Man has a relative proprietorship, since God is the sole and true master of goods. Man is only the custodian of property. He may use what is necessary for his well being, but he should dispense the surplus to those who are in need (Augustine, Sermo 61.11–12; Leo, Serm. 6.11.1; 18.3; 20; 49.6; 85.1, etc.).

PROPHECY (IN THE BIBLE)

The primary sense of prophecy in the Bible is not prediction, but rather the word of a man inspired by God to speak in His name. First and foremost, it was revelation and admonition, though the element of prediction was never lacking, and it became increasingly important as Biblical revelation progressed. However, the effort to fix more exactly the Biblical concept of prophecy runs up against a familiar problem: the Bible does not itself provide definitions. Still, the Bible does have a quasi-technical vocabulary in the area of prophecy as well as certain regular ways of utilizing sayings considered prophetic. This vocabulary and these uses are the means to a more exact idea of the Biblical concept of prophecy. See REVELATION, CONCEPT OF (IN THE BIBLE).

The belief that the prophet received and communicated the word (dābār) of Yahweh, was expressed in the formula “thus says Yahweh” that was used to introduce the prophetic ORACLE. This same idea is contained in the phrase “utterance [ne’ūm] of Yahweh,” which became more and more common as a designation of the prophetic saying in later times. The use of vision (hāzôn) to designate the prophetic word points up another aspect of OT prophecy. The older Hebrew vocabulary, then, emphasized that prophecy was revelation from God to the prophet, which he passed on to others, rather than prediction.

However, the concept of prophetic promise and fulfillment was early associated with Hebrew prophetic activity, as is seen in Nathan's promise that David's line will endure (2 Sm 7.8–16). Indeed, the regular appearance of prophets whose words are fulfilled in the history of the kings of Israel and Judah is a basic part of the theological interpretation of Israel's history as the working out of God's word, as may be seen in the Books of KINGS. Again, Deutero-Isaiah (see ISAIAH, BOOK OF) points up the future reference of God's word when he uses the fulfillment of Yahweh's prophecies as an argument for His supremacy over the gods of the nations (e.g., Is 41.26–29; 42.9; 43.12). Actually, the argument runs: Yahweh, not another god, foretold these things; but the one who can best foretell is the one who produces something; therefore Yahweh must have produced the things foretold, and so He alone must be the effective God, that is, the only true God. An idea such as this probably represents the high point of sophistication in the OT theological conception of prophecy.

The men of the last centuries of OT times were much concerned with the fulfillment of prophecies (e.g., Dn 11.14; Sir 36.14–17), so much so that prediction, especially the foretelling of the last things, tended to obscure the other elements in the old concept of prophecy. See ESCHATOLOGY (IN THE BIBLE). In this atmosphere it is not surprising that at a later period predictions were sought in every part of the OT, not merely in the strictly prophetic books. Even so, the older idea of revelation and admonition, God's word directed to the prophet's contemporaries, was not lost; e.g., in Sir 46.20, the elements of prediction and of admonition were neatly combined.

The NT sees the coming of Christ and the Church as the definitive fulfillment of prophecy, which it therefore conceives primarily as prediction. The Gospel according to St. MATTHEW develops this concept most thoroughly, but the argument from fulfillment of prophecy is basic to the NT kerygma from its beginnings (see Acts 2.14–36). In the manner of the times prophecy as used in this argument is not limited to the words of the OT prophets strictly so-called. For the NT the whole of the OT spoke of Jesus Christ. (See TYPE AND ANTITYPE.)

Finally, it must be noted that the NT Church was fully conscious of its own charismatic prophets, members of the community whose prophecies not only predicted the future (e.g., Acts 11.28) but served for the present edification of the community (e.g., 1 Cor 14.3, 31).

The Prophet Ezekiel.

PROPHECY (THEOLOGY OF)

The theology of prophecy has never formed a specific treatise in theological manuals. Parts of it are scattered in fundamental, dogmatic, Biblical, and mystical theology, as well as elsewhere.

Prophecy in Tradition

For the scriptural theology of prophecy, see PROPHE- TISM (IN THE BIBLE). Here the theology of prophecy is first of all studied in the tradition of the Church (positive theology).

Beginnings until Montanism Inclusive. The New Testament shows that some received a special share in Christ's prophetic Spirit (Eph 4.7–11; 1 Cor 12.28; Acts 11.27; 13.1; etc.), while others shared this CHARISM in a more general way (Acts 2.17, 33–38; 19.6; 1 Cor 11.4–5; 14.26, 29–33). Abundant evidence indicates the continuation of the prophetic Spirit in the early Church: Didache 11–13; Ascension of Isaia 3.25–27; Justin, Dial. 87; Irenaeus, Haer. 2.32.4; 4.33.15; etc.

According to the Didache, prophets were more respected than bishops and deacons. They performed a similar service for the community, possibly a priestly service also (15.1–2; 10.7; 13.3). What they spoke “in the Spirit” was to be accepted (11.7). Some of the HIERARCHY enjoyed this charism in a special way: Ignatius of Antioch (Philad. 7.2; Polyc. 1.3; 2.2), and Polycarp of Smyrna (M. Polyc. 16.2).

False prophets, on the other hand, do not have “the ways of the Lord” about them (Didache 11.8). Hermas warned against the false prophets who are not Christlike (Mand. 11.7–10). Justin ascribed Gnostic ideas and Greek myths to them (Dial. 82.1; 35.3; 51.2; 8788; etc.). Though Irenaeus rejected the teaching of the false prophet Montanus, he also rejected the extreme position of the Alogi, who rejected prophecy (Haer. 3.11.9; cf. 2.49.3; Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.7.5).

Asiatic Christianity with its history of prophets, MILLENARIANISM, and exaggerated Johannine teachings was a fertile soil for the Montanistic explosion of prophecy; as the “inspired” spokesperson for the Paraclete, Montanus, c. A.D. 172, inaugurated the era of the Paraclete (cf. Jn 16.12–13). Charismatic ministers ranked above the hierarchy (Jerome, Epist. 41.3). One sees the trend toward a purely spiritual Church in the writings of its great convert Tertullian, c. A.D. 207 (De pudicitia 21, 12). Although never officially anathematized, MONTANISM was condemned by local synods for, among other reasons, its ecstatic exaggerations (Eusebius, Ecclesiastical History 5.16–18). After the Montanistic experience the role of prophets in the Church diminished. Origen (d. 254) acknowledged traces of this charism in his day, but says that there were no more prophets like those of the Old Testament (Cels. 1.2.46; cf. Acta of Perpetua and Felicity; Cyprian, Epist. 16.4; 2.3–4).

After Montanism. Subsequent to the Montanist episode, two main streams of charismatic prophecy continue down to the present day: a mystical, sometimes ecstatic, tradition of seers and heralds, and a more rational tradition of interpreters of the Spirit in the Scriptures.

Mystical (Ecstatic) Tradition. The roots of this tradition reach back into Greek and Hebrew history. Origen was mainly responsible for introducing to Christianity the Hellenistic prophetic tradition of Plato, Posidonius (d. after 51 B.C.), and the Jew, Philo (d. 1st century A.D.). This Greek-Hebrew tradition influenced the Alexandrians and, through them, the Cappadocians, especially Gregory of Nyssa (Vita Moysis). The pagan Plotinus (d. A.D. 270) developed this same tradition with his Neoplatonic ideas. He so emphasized ECSTASY that the prophet became a mere mouthpiece of God. His teachings in turn influenced St. Augustine's theory of visions and prophecies (Gen. ad litt. 12). Pseudo-Dionysius the Areopagite (c. A.D. 500) also continued in the tradition of Plotinus and Nyssa, and was further influenced by the emanationism of Proclus (d. 485). Gregory the Great (d. 604) follows this same tradition in his mystical homilies that he delivered on Ezechiel.

According to this mystical tradition, the monks and martyrs retained the charismatic gifts of the early Church. The classical PROPHETS were models of the monastic ideal for their virtues, not their charismatic gifts, which were allegorized to serve as models for all monks (Nyssa's Vita Moysis). This trend confused inner charismatic gifts and gifts of the Holy Spirit. The monks considered the charismatic gifts to be signs, even the essence, of perfection. In Syria (c. A.D. 350) this trend led to Messalianism, a heresy analogous to Montanism (condemned at Ephesus, 431). It founded Christian perfection upon the confused idea of charismatic gift. The exaggerated Messalian emphasis on charism died quietly, but helped the Areopagite's anticharismatic mysticism triumph in the East throughout the Middle Ages. In the West down to the scholastics the theology of prophecy may be studied in a theology of mysticism derived from Augustine and St. Gregory and in hagiographies of saintly people to whom the prophetic charism was attributed.

Joachim of Fiore (d. 1202) announced a third dispensation of the Holy Spirit to begin in 1260, causing a Montanistlike revival among many groups, especially the Fraticelli (condemned 1317–23 by Pope John XXII). By the 16th century the Church had stamped out many forms of spiritual enthusiasm, but they found new life in the Reformation's non-Catholic sects. R. Knox distinguishes mystical and evangelical streams of this tradition that have continued down to the present day (Enthusiasm 581–591).

While the revival of enthusiastic prophetism in the 1200s had little influence on scholastic treatises, St. Thomas Aquinas (d. 1274) did make discriminating use of a Jewish-Arabic stream of prophetic tradition. The Arabic philosophers Avicenna (d. 1037) and Averroes (d.

1198) and the Jewish philosopher Moses Maimonides (d. 1204) wrote of their respective prophets, Mohammed and Moses, and transmitted with varying emphases a Neoplatonic tradition of a natural prophecy.

Tradition of Rational Interpretation. The tradition of the prophet as interpreter appears in Aaron's relationship to Moses as prophetic interpreter (Ex 4.16; 7.1), as well as in the prophetic interpreters of the ecstatic Pythia of Delphi (see Fascher, 11 and following). In the New Testament, Christ is the interpreter of previously unintelligible Old Testament prophecies (Lk 24.27, 44–45; cf. Justin, Apol. 1.32.2). In 1 Corinthians ch. 14, Paul stresses the prophet's role as interpreter. As speaking in tongues lessened, the interpretation of the Spirit incarnated in Scripture became the content of prophecy.

The anti-Montanist reaction focused interest on the tradition of prophetic interpreters. St. John Chrysostom (d. 407) depicts Christian prophets as conscious, moderate people in contrast to the senseless, ecstatic pagan diviners (Hom. 29 in 1 Cor. 1; Patrologia Graeca 61:241). The twofold aspect of prophecy is concisely stated by Ambrosiaster: "Prophets may be understood in two ways: both those foretelling the future and those revealing the Scriptures" or "interpreting Scriptures" [on 1 Cor. 12.28, Eph 1.11 (Patrologia Latina 17:249, 378); cf. (Pseudo-) Jerome, Comm. in epist. 1 ad Cor. 12 (Patrologia Latina 30:756); Eucherius, d. c. 450, Instruct. liber, 2, 1 ad Cor. (Patrologia Latina 50: 805); Cassiodorus, d. c. 583, In psalt., praef., 1 (Patrologia Latina 70:12–14); Glossa ordinaria, 12th century, Lib. psalm., prothemata (Patrologia Latina 113:842)]. The prophetic interpreter became the preacher who used the literal sense as a point of departure for exegeting the spiritual, prophetic, allegorical, and mystical sense of Scripture [see EXEGESIS, BIBLICAL, 5]. For other references in this tradition, see: Sedulius, c. 850, Coll. in epist. 1 ad Cor. 14, Patrologia Latina 103:155; R. Maurus, d. 856, In epist. ad Rom. 12, In epist. ad Eph. 4; Haimo of Halberstadt, d. 853, In epist. 1 ad Cor. 14, Patrologia Latina 117:587; Bruno the Carthusian, d. 1101, In epist. 1 ad Cor. 12–14, Patrologia Latina 153:189–197; R. Ardens, d. 1200, Hom. 20, In epist. ad Rom. 12.6, Patrologia Latina 155:1740; Abelard, d. 1142, In epist. Pauli ad Rom. 12, Patrologia Latina 178:939; St. Bonaventure, De prophetia, Cod. Assist., 186 fol. 11b. St. Thomas reproduces this tradition in his Scripture commentaries, but makes little use of it in the Summa (In epist. ad Eph. 3.5, lect. 1; In epist. ad Rom. 12.6, lect. 2; In epist. 1 ad Cor. 14, lect. 5; see P. Benoit, "Révélation et inspiration" 334).

Later Emphasis. Since the time of these scholastics the emphasis has been on the mystical (ecstatic) tradition of prophecy. The commentaries on the Summa of St. Thomas by the Dominicans—Cajetan, Cano, Soto, D. Báñez—and the Jesuits—Salmerón, Suárez, and De Lugo—have continued this tradition. Extraordinary prophets also manifest the continuance of this charism in the Church (e.g., Catherine of Siena, Teresa of Avila, Margaret Mary, Catherine Labouré, etc.). The 19th-century rationalists forced the Church to defend the miraculous character of supernatural prophecies of the future (see "Prophecy and Apologetics," below); Modernists forced the Church to safeguard the doctrinal, transcendental character of revelation. Prophecy as interpretation received little attention, though it harmonized better with the post-World War II development of prophecy. In scattered allusions in MYSTICI CORPORIS and in more elaborate studies of Y. M. J. Congar, K. Rahner, C. Journet, et al., the prophetic role of Christ in the Church has received greater attention. Vatican Council II's Dogmatic Constitution on the Church expresses this broader understanding of the nature of prophecy [12, 35; Acta Apostolicae Sedis 57 (1965) 16–17, 40–41].

In the Constitution one is told that all the people of God share in Christ's prophetic office through their anointing by the Spirit (1 Jn 2.20, 27). This charism may be extraordinary or more simple and widely diffused, but in any case "suited to and useful for the needs of the Church" (12).

The hierarchy continues Christ's office by teaching in His name and with His authority. Moreover, the discernment of the genuine character and proper use of this charism belongs to them. They are not to extinguish the Spirit but to test all things and hold fast what is good.

The laity's prophetic role is to bear witness socially (Eph 6.12). Their living and spoken testimony, especially in married and family life, have a special force in the ordinary surroundings of life. For this purpose God has given them understanding of the faith (sensus fidei) and an attractiveness in speech (Acts 2.17–18), and so they must cooperate in the external spread and dynamic growth of the Church. To accomplish this mission the laity should acquire a more perfect grasp of revealed truth and pray for the gift of wisdom.

Prophecy and Apologetics

Prophecy is also a subject of concern to APOLOGETICS (practical theology).

Historical Background. The fulfillment of Old Testament prophecies has been a motive of credibility since the earliest days of the Church (see Acts 2.30, 34; 3.18, 22–26; 4.11; 7.52; 13.16–41; and the Evangelists, Mt 1.23; 2.6, 15; 4.15; Mk 9.11; 12.36; Lk 4.18; 22.37;

24.25–27; Jn 3.14; 5.46; 12.14–16). The early apologies to the Jews continued in this vein; in fact most of the OT prophecies used are found in the NT. See: Epistle of Barnabas; Justin's Apology 1, and especially his Dialogue with Trypho; Irenaeus's Demonstration of the Apostolic Teaching 42–97; and other passages in Tertullian's Adversus judaeos 8–9 and Adversus Marcionem 4–22; Origen's C. Celsum, passim; Cyprian's Quod idola dii non sint 13–14; Lactantius's Divinae institutiones 4.11; 5.3; Chrysostom's Quod Christus sit Deus 11; Augustine's In psalm. 66.9; Fid. invis. 5–9; etc. Apologists of the Middle Ages also used this argument: Amulo, Fulbert of Chartres, Peter Damien, Guibert of Nogent, Gislebert, Peter the Venerable, Abelard, Peter of Blois, etc. St. Thomas referred to this argument briefly (C. gent. 1.6) but concentrated on the theology of prophecy. The tradition of this argument survives to the present in the apologetics developed in the 17th century against deism and rationalism.

Faced with rationalism and liberalism in philosophical and theological thought of the 19th century, Pius IX twice defended prophecies as valid arguments for the divine origin of the faith (Denz 2779, 2907). Vatican Council I reemphasized this point: "Miracles and prophecies . . . constitute the surest signs of divine revelation suitable to everyone's understanding" (Denz 3009, cf. Oath against Modernism, Denz 3539).

Apologetic Proof from Old Testament Prophecies. There are presuppositions regarding the purpose and significance of Old Testament prophecies. (1) Only the general and consistent tenor of these prophecies was meant to be literally fulfilled in the great majority of cases. Only certain repeated major themes are true predictions, and these were fulfilled in a surpassing way in the NT. These general theme-fulfillments form the basis for the argument from OT prophecies. (2) NT fulfillment was not just equal to OT expectations, but surpassed them. Although the Prophets had no blueprint of the messianic era, they would have recognized in it the overfulfillment of their prophecies. (3) Ordinarily details in the OT prophecies cannot be used in a prophetic proof for a number of reasons. There is a poetic element in OT prophecy, conveying an idea by concrete details. But it is the idea and not the details that the author intends. There is a lack of temporal perspective. Though separated in time, events may be united in the prophetic perspective. There is sometimes a conditional element, even when the condition is not clearly stated. The Messiah and messianic era are described in terms of their own generation. The contemporary coloring of the prophecies is largely artificial and representative of unknown but ideal desires, personalities, etc., of the messianic era. The Prophets knew that their prophecies were only approximations, that the new covenant would be different from the old, even though their knowledge and their mentality forced them to describe the new covenant in terms of the old, which they knew.

Furthermore, the starting point for the proof should lie in the NT fulfillment and not in OT prophecy. The NT fulfillment greatly surpasses the OT prophecies. If one tries to find in OT prophecy what would come to pass in the NT, he is trying to find the greater in the less. The conclusion would contain more than the premises warrant. Hence, this method compels adjustments and modifications in the meaning of the OT prophecies to equate them to their NT fulfillment. On the other hand, beginning with the NT fulfillment, the greater, one can show that the OT prophecies relate to this NT overfulfillment.

20th-Century Theologizing

Attention may be directed to recent theologizing (speculative theology) concerning prophecy.

Prophecy in General. The current theology of prophecy is a modified descendant of St. Thomas's somewhat mystical explanation of prophecy in the Scripture Prophets. Accordingly, prophecy is a special charism of knowledge given for the instruction of mankind in whatever is necessary for salvation (De ver. 12.2). As a charism of knowledge it primarily affects the prophet's mind, not his will (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 171.1; 174.3–4). This knowledge concerns truths normally hidden to the prophet's mind and is supernatural, if not in its essence, at least in its manner of acquisition (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 171.2; 173.1; 174.3; De ver. 12.7).

Prophecy and Revelation. The manner in which the prophet receives his instruction involves two distinct elements. The principal element is an intellectual light illuminating the object and permitting the prophet to form a judgment about it. The secondary element consists in representations (ideas and, antecedently, the sensations and images from which the ideas are abstracted); these furnish the subject matter for the intellectual light.

The degree of revelation granted the prophet will vary according to his reception of light and representations (see Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 173.2; 174.2 and ad 3; 174.3; De ver. 12.7). (1) The highest degree of prophetic knowledge (revelation in the strict sense) occurs when the prophet receives both intellectual light and new ideas, e.g., oracles of OT Prophets, Jer 28.16–17. (2) The prophet may receive light alone (revelation in the broad sense). In this instance the ideas may come from another (e.g., Joseph received light to interpret the dreams of the Pharaoh) or may be already familiar to the prophet but now with supernatural certitude and firmness of judgment. Hence, the light of revelation and of inspiration (see below) may intermingle and represent a borderline case of prophecy. This case did not concern St. Thomas but interests modern theologians. (3) When one receives representations alone without intellectual light for judgment of them, it is not strictly a matter of revelation or prophecy, e.g., Pharaoh's dreams.

In a somewhat different approach, K. Rahner stresses three points in his theory of prophetic knowledge. (1) Prophecy involves the whole mind in all its capacities. It usually takes the form of an imaginary vision. God contacts the depths of the prophet's soul, and a sensory experience results. Vision and auditory elements intermingle in keeping with the nature of God's contact. The echo or reflex of this experience in the rest of the prophet's sensibilities is influenced by all his dispositions: elements of fantasy, attitudes of expectation due to religious training or historical situation, etc. (2) The subjective principle of the experience must be a divine reality, grace as a self-communication of God; otherwise it could be a parapsychological experience. (3) The objectification of this grace-experience in words does not give full expression to it. Evidence for the agreement between the grace-experience and its objectification may be: a miracle; inner evidence, a conviction of being spoken to by God; the transcendental character of the grace-experience making the prophetic insight self-evident. In the case of revelation in the OT and NT a supernatural saving providence of God controlling and guaranteeing this agreement is presupposed. (See discussion of private revelations below.)

Prophecy and Inspiration. Prophecy involves not merely revelation, but inspiration also. St. Thomas cites Peter Lombard's definition of prophecy (Comm. in ps., praef.), an abbreviation of Cassiodorus's (In psalt., praef., 1): "Prophecy is a divine inspiration or revelation announcing the issue (eventus) of things with invariable truth" (Summa theologiae 2a2ae, 171.6 sed c.). In this definition, revelation and inspiration are complementary ideas (Summa theologiae 2a2ae 171.1 ad 4). Revelation concerns the perception of divine truth through intellectual light and representations. Inspiration connotes a preparatory elevation of the mind to the supernatural level by a movement of the Holy Spirit. Commentators have tended to oversimplify St. Thomas's notion of inspiration by restricting it to a supernatural light or judgment without any representations (Zigliara, Lagrange, Vosté, Bea; see P. Benoit, "Révélation et inspiration" 322–324). St. Thomas, however, says inspiration may involve intellectual visions (De ver. 12.12 sed c.; ibid. 12.9 corp.).

Prophecy as Revelation and Inspiration. In distinguishing revelation and inspiration as aspects of prophecy, St. Thomas was limited by the problematic of his time. It viewed prophecy in the speculative, abstract, Greek tradition of truth. Viewed in the Semitic tradition, prophetic revelation and inspiration take on a broader meaning. Revelation in the Bible is a concrete, living manifestation of the personal God in the holiness of His being as creator and savior, truth and life. It does not require a direct "vision" or "hearing" of some spectacle or divine oracle, although this is often the case. It can take place through the varied manifestations of history in which God makes Himself visible to His people. From the psychological viewpoint of the prophet, revelation includes all the activity of speculative knowledge brought about by the supernatural light of the Holy Spirit. Its central and specific element is the supernatural judgment or knowledge attaining truth with a divine certitude, whether the truth be revelation in the strict or broad sense (see REVELATION, THEOLOGY OF).

Inspiration directs all the practical activities of the prophet as he is involved in communicating these revealed truths. This inspiration also enlightens his judgments: (1) Speculative-practical judgments that deal with the truths revealed to him; sometimes through inspired intellectual visions, further revelation in the broad sense results. Revelation and inspiration may thus intermingle. (2) Practical judgments that direct the concrete execution of the work in conformity with the end intended; the end of this inspiration might be to speak, to act, or to write the truths that are communicated.

Revelation and inspiration are not clearly distinct. All supernatural revelation requires a supernatural elevation of the mind, an inspiration. On the other hand, every inspiration or supernatural elevation of the mind enlightening judgment leads to some perception of revelation.

Prophecy and Private Revelations. Revelations are "private" not because they are addressed to a few (they may concern many), but because they do not belong to the DEPOSIT OF FAITH (closed since the death of the last Apostle, Denz 3421). They are not prophetic assertions, but commands showing the Church how to act in a concrete historical situation. In approving them, the Church does not act infallibly but acknowledges such revelations as worthy of human faith. Since they lack the providential safeguards of public revelation, the prophet's subjective involvement sometimes misrepresents the grace-experience. Even saints and blessed have communicated historical and theological errors (see K. Rahner, Visions and Prophecies, 64–75). Hence, much uncertainty surrounds the content of their message and must be left to the personal judgment of each inquirer.

In particular, genuine supernatural prophecies of the future must be distinguished from (1) magical, (2) parap-psychological, (3) national, and (4) fabricated prophecies that do not involve revelation. Supernatural prophecies tell one nothing essentially new beyond the perspective of Scripture, but manifest God as Lord of history. Usually they announce a call to penance, prayer, trust. Their authenticity depends somewhat on the prophet's personal piety, integrity, and mental and bodily health. The only absolute proof is a miracle confirming the prophecy itself (see REVELATIONS, PRIVATE).

Prophecy in the Community and in the Hierarchy. As was noted above, the NT charism of prophecy is shared by all God's people, laity and hierarchy. The broader community of baptized non-Catholics and even non-Christians oriented to God also share in it to some extent. Regarding the individual prophet, his inspiration and revelation (private or public, as the case may be) have a community or ecclesial context. One cannot say how much their prophesying has been influenced by a more general revelation and inspiration in the community, but prophets enjoy their charism to a greater or lesser degree as spokesmen representing a common understanding, attitude, or need of God's people (see P. Grelot).

The role of the hierarchy is to safeguard and preserve the faith and to discern the prophetic Spirit. While the hierarchy has this gift of discernment, it must not extinguish the Spirit. It is a duty, not a condescension, for the hierarchy to heed the suggestions of God's people as long as they are not contrary to the Spirit. The Church is both charismatic and institutional (Eph 2.20); exaggeration of either aspect distorts the nature of the Church. Understanding is necessary for the prophetic Spirit to manifest itself harmoniously in both the hierarchy and the community (1 Cor 14.33).

PROPHET

This article is limited to the Biblical notion of prophet. For general information and bibliography, see PROPHE-TISM (IN THE BIBLE).

The etymology of the Greek προφήτης, from which prophet derives, suggests the fundamental note in the definition of a prophet: he is one who speaks (φημί) for (πρό) another, i.e., in the present case, for God.

It is not clear that the Hebrew word for prophet, nābî', has exactly this significance. Most likely it is a passive participial form of a root meaning to call (cf. Akkadian, nabû); that is, it designates someone called by God, although it is possible that the Hebrew word is active in form and so designates a speaker (for God). In any event, the central concept is surely one of divine communication; and if etymology cannot determine the concept completely, the actual history of the Prophets of the Bible makes it clear that they were men who brought God's word to others.

The basic sources of information on what constitutes a Prophet are the accounts of the call to prophecy in the Old Testament (Is 6.1–13; Jer 1.4–19; Ez 1.1–3.21; Am 3.7–8; 7.14–16). These and other passages reveal the following essential factors in the prophetic role: the Prophet is delegated to speak for Yahweh (Is 6.8–9; Jer 1.9); the prophetic vocation is compelling even though the Prophet be reluctant or untalented (Am 3.7–8; Jer 1.7–8); God communicates His word to the Prophet (Is 6.9; Jer 1.7–9; Ez 2.8–3.3); and this communication involves visions and auditions, states analogous to those known in later mystics. The last assertion is often denied, but this is largely because of confusion concerning the meaning of mystic. Thus, the Biblical Prophet is one who has heard God's call and brings God's word to men. Primarily, then, the Prophet is an inspired speaker.

The Prophets did not write the books now called prophetic. Their words were preserved in oral tradition, and inspired writers recorded and arranged the traditional words; thus, it is the prophetic word as edited, arranged, and even added to by these writers that the Church now possesses in the inspired text. The modern interest in history has emphasized the effort to sift out the original prophetic message. This is important for reconstructing the history of Israel and its religion, but for theological interpretation it is the inspired prophetic book that counts. A study of the prophetic book in its present structure along the lines of Redaktionsgeschichte is often a fruitful avenue of interpretation. [See EXEGESIS, BIBLICAL].

The Prophets of the Old Testament are divided into the four Major Prophets (Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and Daniel) and the 12 MINOR PROPHETS, Hosea, Joel, Amos, Obadiah, Jonah, Micah, Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi. The terms major and minor have nothing to do with the relative importance of these men and their message; they simply refer to the respective extent of the PROPHETIC BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. It must be remembered also that in the Old Testament the prophetic name and office were not confined to the 16 canonical Prophets of the modern Bible, the so-called writing Prophets. There are other men who appear in Israel's history, men such as ELIJAH and ELISHA, who were equally the inspired bearers of God's word, although few of their words have been preserved in writing.

The New Testament offers few details about the experiences of the prophets in the early Church; but since they had much the same function as the Old Testament Prophets, admonition and prediction, one may conclude that the New Testament concept of prophet carries on that of the Old Testament.

Prophetess. In the Old Testament a number of women are referred to by the designation prophetess (Hebrew nēbī'ā, feminine of nābî), but little is told of the nature and function of the office. Presumably they acted and were regarded as being much the same as the male prophets. The earliest to be so designated are Miriam and Deborah. Miriam, the sister of Moses, is called a prophetess on the occasion of her song of triumph after the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 15.20). Deborah was a "judge" in Israel, one who regularly decided cases brought to her (Judges 4.4–5). However, she is doubtless called prophetess because of her inspired (charismatic) intervention to save Israel and, more especially, because of her connection with the song found in Judges chapter 5.

The name prophetess is, to be sure, an anachronism in the time of Miriam and Deborah, as the Old Testament itself witnesses (1 Sm 9.9). The name is attributed to the two women by later writers, and the reason seems to be their connection with songs considered inspired. It is not likely, however, that the attribution would have been made unless later writers knew of women who functioned as prophets and spoke under inspiration at a later stage of Israel's history.

"Prophetess Being Inspired," frescos by Giovanni Battista Tiepolo. (©Elio Ciol/CORBIS)

Direct evidence of the presence of female prophets in Israel is found in 2 Kgs 22.14–20. When a book of the law was found on the occasion of the Temple restoration, Josiah consulted a prophetess, Huldah. (See DEUTERONOMY, BOOK OF.) Further, a false prophetess (and an effective false prophetess implies the acceptance of the possibility of a true one), Noadiah, opposed Nehemiah's efforts to restore Jerusalem (Neh 6.14).

Isaiah's wife is called a prophetess in Is 8.3. Some have thought this should be taken strictly, i.e., that she functioned as a prophetess, and have argued from Isaiah's connection with her that he and she belonged to a band of professional prophets. However, the attribution is sufficiently explained by her connection with Isaiah, who considered that the members of his family were caught up in his own prophetic activity (Is 8.18).

The New Testament speaks of a number of prophetesses: Anna who recognized Jesus as the Messiah (Lk 2.36–39), the daughters of PHILIP THE DEACON (Acts 21.9), and the false prophetess Jezebel (surely a symbolic name; Rv 2.20–23). The last two passages suggest that it was possible for a woman to act as a prophetess, i.e., to teach in the early Church. Presumably the Christian prophetesses had the same function as the Christian prophets.

PROPHETIC BOOKS OF THE OLD TESTAMENT

Biblical writings composed by or attributed to the Prophets of the Old Testament. In all Bibles, except Jewish ones, it is customary to distinguish between the so-called four Major Prophets and the 12 MINOR PROPHETS. The distinction, which goes back to St. Augustine (Civ. 18.29; Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 40.2.306), is merely one of relative length, not one of relative importance. Following the Septuagint (LXX), the Vulgate (Vulg) and all other Christian versions of the Old Testament consider the Book of DANIEL to be the fourth of the Major Prophets, the first three being the Books of ISAIAH, JEREMIAH, and EZEKIEL. In the LXX, Jeremiah is followed by the Book of BARUCH and LAMENTATIONS; in the Vulg and Catholic vernacular versions, by Lamentations and Baruch; in Protestant versions, by Lamentations alone, since these versions place Baruch among the so-called apocrypha. Only in the LXX are the Minor Prophets (in a somewhat different order among themselves) put before the Major Prophets.

All the books of the Hebrew Bible and of Jewish versions derived from it are divided into three main groups: the Torah (Pentateuch), the Prophets (nebî'im), and the Writings (ke tûbîm). The Prophets are divided into the

First Prophets (nebî'im rî'sônîm) including Joshua, Judges, Samuel, and Kings, which were believed to have been written by Prophets, and the Later Prophets (nebî'im 'ahărônîm) including Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the 12 Minor Prophets (reckoned as a single book). The Hebrew Bible puts Lamentations and Daniel among the Writings, and it does not have Baruch at all.

PROPHETISM (IN THE BIBLE)

I. Engnell and some other Scandinavian scholars have argued that much of the prophetic material, and the Old Testament in general, had a very long history of oral tradition, being fixed in writing only at a late period. As prophetic disciples and schools passed on the materials, they were reinterpreted and adapted to ever new situations. As a result, they thought, the line between the prophet's original words and later adaptations was virtually non-existent and the attempt to recover the ipsissima verba of the prophet became impossible. S. Mowinckel, on the other hand, had argued early for the importance of a careful investigation into the role of both oral and written tradition in shaping the prophetic tradition. Other scholars have been attempting to demonstrate from the prophetic books that, in some cases at least, the beginning of the written tradition goes back to the prophets themselves.

The formation of the prophetic books as we have them remains an elusive process. There is general agreement that, in most cases, the process began with smaller collections, which, through a gradual process of expansion and combination, resulted in our canonical books. Ever new theories continue to be put forth on the specific procedure in the case of each book. H. Barth has attempted to reconstruct a so-called Assur-Redaktion of Isaiah 1–39, according to which many passages that relate to the downfall of Assyria would have been added around the time of that nation's demise; he is closely followed by Clements, who speaks, rather, of a Josianic redaction; how widely this theory will be accepted remains to be seen.

Important work has been done on the redaction of Jeremiah by E. W. Nicholson. Whereas it had become commonplace to distinguish three types of material in Jeremiah, poetic oracles by the prophet himself, biographical prose (attributed to Baruch), and prose discourses (the prophet's words as preserved among the circle of his followers), Nicholson argues that the prose sections (in which he rejects the distinction implied above) are all the work of the deuteronomists, whose interest was not biographical but rather concerned the function of God's word through the prophet, human reaction to it, obedience to the law, results of disobedience, etc. The book in its edited form was intended for the exiles and vindicates their claim to be the "true" Israel over those who remained in the land. Nicholson does not thereby deny that the prose discourses rest on genuine words of Jeremiah or the historical truth of the events related or the traditional link with Baruch.

The redaction and organization of Deutero-Isaiah (Is 40–55) continues to be debated. T. N. D. Mettinger's analysis places emphasis on eight hymns of praise and argues for a closely knit, tightly organized structure, while Clifford divides the composition into 17 speeches aimed at persuading the exiles to return home. Clifford suggests a date after Cyrus has already issued his decree permitting the exiles to return; C. Stuhlmueller sees chs. 41–48 dating to before the fall of Babylon, chs. 49–55 to after the fall and initial return of the exiles, with the Servant Songs (42:1–4; 49:1–6; 50:4–9; 52:13–53:12) and ch. 40 composed by Deutero-Isaiah but added at a later stage of redaction, by him or a disciple. The Servant of the Lord continues to be the object of extensive study, though with no one solution finally accepted. Mettinger denies the Servant can be distinguished from Israel in the oracles of Deutero-Isaiah; for Clifford the Servant is Deutero-Isaiah and those who go back with him in the new Exodus-Conquest; Blenkinsopp thinks the first song refers to a royal figure (Cyrus or possibly Jehoiachin or Zerubbab), the second to the exiled community (but later expanded by the prophetic group reflected in chs. 56–66), the third to (and by) Deutero-Isaiah, and the fourth to Deutero-Isaiah and his prophetic group; for Elliger the Servant is to be identified with Deutero-Isaiah himself.

Ezekiel's book has undergone many vicissitudes since C. C. Torrey suggested (1930) that it was not written by Ezekiel and was to be dated to late postexilic times. Such extreme views are no longer current. Scholars generally agree with W. Zimmerli that Ezekiel was responsible for a solid core of the book (not including chs. 38–39), which has been fleshed out with later reworkings by his disciples. Which parts are to be attributed to the latter continues to be a disputed question, but, contrary to the view of the Scandinavian scholars referred to above, bases are found for making the distinction.

PROPORTIONALITY, PRINCIPLE OF

It is a common sense axiom that there should be a reasonable balance between human activity and its consequences. In Roman Catholic moral theology, the principle of proportionality states that the moral rectitude of an action is a function of the preponderance of human value over disvalue that results through the action.

Attention to proportionality, as pertinent to the moral evaluation of behavior, has long been part of the Catholic ethical tradition. The principle of the DOUBLE EFFECT, for instance, holds that an action having both good and bad effects is permissible if four conditions are fulfilled. One of those conditions is that there be a "proportionate reason" for tolerating the evil consequences. Similarly, the principle of TOTALITY justified attacks on a part of the human body if the whole body/person stood to benefit and if there was "proportionate reason" to tolerate the attack. The idea of proportionate reason also appeared in discussions of material cooperation in evil, the just war theory, and the permitting of passive scandal.

Within the Catholic theological tradition, this perspective was also evidenced in the emphasis upon the virtue of prudence in the living of the moral life. Thomas Aquinas, for example, viewed prudence as the central moral virtue (I–II, 61, 2), since deciding rightly among concrete options in a finite world is utterly dependent upon the skill of comparative assessment. Thus, it can be said that prudence is the virtue by which one rightly discerns the proportionate reasons for acting or not acting, and for selecting one action in preference to another.

Implied in these traditional usages is the insight that it is not humanly possible to avoid all injury/harm. Even more, it is not possible to do all possible good. For example, one cannot always safeguard professional secrets without (deliberately) deceiving others; one cannot at times defend oneself against aggressors without a violent response. Similarly, to visit a sick friend in the hospital is to take time away from family, prayer, study, etc. In a finite world all decisions are choices among values. Hence, the Christian's central moral duty is to do "as much good as possible and as little harm as necessary," to give attention to all the various values and disvalues that are simultaneously part of the concrete action.

Points of Controversy. Although discussions about the most accurate way to define the principle of proportionality continue, it has for many Catholic theologians achieved the status of a fundamental moral norm. And that, in turn, has led to controversy. The controversy is not about whether the principle is useful in some settings. Rather, it is about its universality and about its applications.

With regard to its universality, the question is asked if there are some actions which are never morally proper, no matter how little harm may result. The responses fall into two broad categories divided along basic approaches that various authors take to moral issues, Teleologists (Gr. telos, end or result) deny that actions can be adjudged morally proper or improper apart from reference to their actual impact on human life for, in their judgment, it is precisely the fact of overwhelmingly destructive results that is the reason for the action's immorality. Some proponents of this approach would describe it as "consequentialist," because of its emphasis on the results and/or consequences of actions. Deontologists, who judge the fundamental rectitude of an act in categories of duty and obligation (Gr. deontos) assert that some actions are always wrong, not for reasons of disproportionate harm but because of either intrinsic impropriety for human persons or specific divine prohibition. (These philosophical categories are, perhaps, used with less than complete precision in depicting the alternatives in this theological debate. According to some Catholic authors, moral philosophies defy simple categorization into teleological-deontological polarities.)

This debate is sometimes obfuscated by the accusation that the principle of proportionality amounts to an assertion that "the end justifies the means," and that its proponents are prepared to tolerate the doing of moral evil for an allegedly greater good. But defenders of the principle presume that all human acts involve both helpful and harmful, constructive and destructive aspects, and that an act is moral precisely because it is proportionately more positive than negative. Thus, an "end" never justifies an immoral means, since such a means counts as immoral precisely and only because it is unduly and unnecessarily destructive. Hence, all Catholic ethicists agree that the end does not justify an immoral means. The debate is about whether acts can be characterized as moral or immoral apart from attention to the proportion of good and harm involved.

The controversy also reveals itself in the application of the principle of proportionality. There is no doubt that some authors, spiritual directors, and confessors have used the principle to justify artificial contraception, re-marriage after divorce, and certain forms of homosexual behavior. Thus, debates about the principle are often, in fact, disguised debates about the morality of these behaviors. But, at least in theory, the two debates are separable. That is, one could affirm a fundamentally teleological understanding of morality and could accept the principle of proportionality as an adequate norm for prudential judgment, and at the same time reject all of the behaviors mentioned above. Similarly, one could espouse a more deontological moral theory and support these behaviors.

The clarification of the principle of proportionality has occurred in the process of a thorough reassessment of Catholic moral theology, especially as it was articulated in the 18th, 19th, and early 20th centuries. That relatively recent moral tradition seemed in the eyes of a number of reputable Catholic writers in Europe and America to have become improperly legalistic, detaching moral norms from the concrete assessment of complex human behaviors. The desire of these authorities is to retrieve a teleological understanding based on the ends and consequences of human actions and the richer approaches and visions of earlier ethical writings. At the same time, their negative assessment of the moral tradition of the past two or three centuries shows itself in a willingness to question the concrete application of moral norms which were, until recently, so much a part of standard textbooks. In particular, they question the confidence with which very detailed, concrete behaviors, especially sexual behaviors, were evaluated, judged immoral, and prohibited. They further question whether the conventional answers of a just war theory and the principle of double effect in medicine are credible in the face of advances in modern science and technology.

Thus the retrieval of the traditional notion of proportionate reason and its elevation to the position of fundamental principle has occurred in the context of that more general renaissance in Catholic moral theology.

PROPOSITION

A proposition is often said to be a verbal expression that can be true or false. This definition is imprecise for two reasons. First, a proposition is the sense of the sentence that expresses it; one proposition can be expressed by several sentences in different languages or in the same language. Secondly, TRUTH and FALSITY belong neither to sentences nor to propositions, but to judgments; only the intellectual act of JUDGMENT assenting to the proposition expressed by the sentence is in the proper sense true or false. To say that a proposition is true or that it is false is to say that anyone asserting it would be judging truly or falsely. Nevertheless, with the understanding that the usage is elliptical, sentences are here called propositions, and they are declared to be true or to be false.

Kinds of Proposition. Propositions are either assertoric or modal. The former merely declare that a given state of affairs obtains; the latter qualify such declarations as necessary, contingent, possible, or impossible. Hence there are four kinds of modals. Obviously, every assertoric proposition can be qualified by each mode, so that there are four modals for every assertoric. Assertoric propositions are of two kinds: categorical and compound. A categorical proposition is one in which an attribute (signified by the predicate) is said to characterize or not to characterize something (signified by the subject). These terms, SUBJECT and predicate, constitute the matter of the categorical. Its form, making it a proposition of a specific kind, is the copula, which affirms or denies the predicate of the subject. There are thus two species of categorical, affirmative and negative. Based upon the matter is the division into singular propositions, whose subjects are proper names or demonstrative words or phrases, and general propositions, whose subjects are common nouns or descriptive phrases. Also based upon the matter is the division into universal and particular propositions. UNIVERSALS are those in which the predicate is affirmed or denied of everything denoted by the subject; they are identified by some such modifier of the subject as "all," "every," "none." The subjects of universals are said to be distributed. Particular propositions are those in which the affirmation or denial is extended only to some of the things the subject signifies; such restriction of PREDICATION is indicated by the use of "some," "not every," or the like to modify the subject. The restriction does not positively exclude from the predication anything the subject denotes; the particular proposition is noncommittal as to whether the predication could be truly made of everything the subject denotes. Subjects of particulars are said to be undistributed.

Reflection on the nature of affirmation and denial discloses that the distinction between distributed and undistributed terms applies to predicates also; for to deny a predicate of a subject is to state that nothing the predicate denotes is referred to by the subject, or that everything the predicate denotes is excluded from the subject's referents. Affirmation has no such exclusive force, but leaves unanswered the question whether the attribute the predicate signifies belongs to other things besides the subject's referents. Hence, predicates of negative propositions are distributed, while those of affirmatives are undistributed. Since both of these can be either universal or particular, there are four kinds of categorical propositions: A. Universal affirmative, with subject distributed, predicate undistributed (Every S is P). I. Particular affirmative, with subject undistributed, predicate undistributed (Some S is P). E. Universal negative, with subject distributed, predicate distributed (No S is P). O. Particular negative, with subject undistributed, predicate distributed (Not every S is P). When these propositions have the same subjects and predicates, they constitute two pairs of contradictories: A and O are mutually exclusive and also exclusive of a middle, as are I and E.

Existential Import and Equivalence. With what has been said up to this point, logicians are in general agreement; concerning another aspect of categoricals, their existential import, there is no such consensus. Concerning this aspect, there are three schools of interpretation: the first understands particulars as stating that what their subjects signify exists in some realm of discourse, and understands universals as leaving the question of existence open; the second understands affirmatives as requiring for their truth the existence of whatever their subjects signify, and understands negatives as true if what their subjects signify does not exist; the third holds all categoricals to be alike in existential import, either all existential or all nonexistent.

Conversion and Obversion. Modification of a proposition's matter or form produces a new proposition, whose relation to the original interests the logician. Conversion affects the matter; it is the interchange of subject and predicate, the copula remaining unaffected. There are two kinds of conversion: simple conversion, in which the propositions are the same in quantity; and conversion by limitation, in which the new proposition is particular, the original being universal. Obversion has to do with the proposition's form; it is the change of quality from affirmative to negative or vice versa, with the compensating substitution for the predicate of its contradictory term. The older logicians discussed another process, called equipollence, by some mistakenly identified with obversion, which it superficially resembles. It is effected by the insertion of non at appropriate places in Latin sentences, expressing propositions to produce other propositions equivalent to the contradictories, contraries, subalterns, and superalterns of the original (see OPPOSITION). The resulting equivalents are not obverses, however, for they are of like quality, both affirmative or both negative. They are not different propositions at all, but different sentences expressing one proposition; they have identical matter and form, and differ only in syntax.

Contraposition and Inversion. The product of obversion is a proposition having the same subject as the original; that of conversion is a proposition whose subject is the predicate of the original. Two other processes, contraposition and inversion, consist of alternating obversions and conversions. The contrapositive, product of the former, is a proposition whose subject is the contradictory of the original predicate. The full contrapositive is of the same quality as the original and has for its predicate the contradictory of the original subject; the partial contrapositive is of opposite quality and has the original subject as its predicate. The inverse has for its subject the contradictory of the original subject. The distinction between full and partial inverses is analogous to the distinction between full and partial contrapositives.

Implications. A proposition implies another derived from it in any of these ways, if and only if (1) any term distributed in the derived proposition is also distributed in the original, and (2) either the original is existential or the derived proposition is nonexistent. It follows that when distribution and existential import are the same for both propositions they imply each other, that is, they are equivalent. Whichever interpretation be accepted, these conditions are fulfilled in the simple conversion of I and O. But since subject and predicate differ as to distribution in A and O, neither of these implies its converse; A and O are independent of their converses. For the second school of interpretation, however, a universal implies its converse by limitation: "Every man is just" implies "Some just being is a man"; and "No man is just" implies "Not every just being is a man." The first school, of course, rejects this implication. For this school, on the other hand, every proposition implies its obverse, and A and O imply their contrapositives. Contrariwise, for the second school, only affirmatives imply their obverses. It holds, therefore, that A propositions imply their partial contrapositives, but that full contrapositives are independent. For instance, "Every man is just" implies "No not-just being is a man," but neither implies nor is implied by "Every not-just being is a not-man."

The first and second schools hold that a proposition and its inverse are independent. Since for the second, the full contrapositive is not implied by the original, neither is the inverse, which is derived from it. The first accepts the equivalence of contrapositives, but rejects conversion by limitation, whereby one derives the inverse from the contrapositive. However, the third school holds that A and E imply their inverses. It teaches that "Every man is just" implies "Some not-man is not-just" and "Not every not-man is just." The term "just," however, which is undistributed in the original, is distributed in the partial inverse. For this reason the first and second schools hold that contradictories differ not only in quality and quantity, but in existential import also.

Compound Proposition. A compound proposition has for its matter two propositions, categorical or themselves compound; its form is a conjunction affirming or denying a given relation between these two. Instead of the one relation of characterization they may hold between terms, four basic relations are possible between pairs of propositions, namely: 1. Implication, the first implying the second; 2. Subimplication, the first being implied by the second; 3. Contrariety, the two excluding each other; 4. Subcontrariety, the two excluding any other that denies both. Letting p and q represent propositions, and $\sim p$ and $\sim q$, their contradictories, one may affirm and deny these relations by means of the following compound propositions: Of the propositions affirming relations, the first two are conditional, the third is disjunctive, the fourth is alternative; all those denying relations are of the same kind, and are called conjunctive. These then are the four species of compound propositions.

Every conjunctive denies each of these relations between one or another pair of propositions, and consequently contradicts four other compound propositions. Thus "Both p and q" contradicts these: 1. If p, then $\sim q$ 2. If q, then $\sim p$ 3. Not both p and q 4. Either $\sim p$ or $\sim q$ Consequently, these four are equivalent. Similarly, each of the other three conjunctives composed of p, q, $\sim p$, and $\sim q$ contradicts two conditionals, a disjunctive, and an alternative, which are therefore equivalent. The equivalent conditionals are said to be contrapositives, the relation among their parts being analogous to the relation among the parts of categorical contrapositives. The contradictories of converse conditionals are contraries to each other: "If p, then q" and "If q, then p" contradict respectively "Both p and $\sim q$ " and "Both q and $\sim p$," which are contraries. Since contradictories of contraries are subcontraries, such is the relation of these conditionals: one of the converse conditionals must be true.

Modal Proposition. Concerning the modal propositions corresponding to categoricals little need be said. To determine whether a modal implies another derived from it by obversion or conversion, one must add to the conditions mentioned above a third: that either the original proposition is in the MODE of NECESSITY or of impossibility or the derived one is in the mode of POSSIBILITY. Between modal and assertoric compounds, however, there is an important difference. The necessary conditional, like the assertoric, is equivalent to its contrapositive; unlike the assertoric conditional, it is not subcontrary to its converse. For the contradictory of the necessary conditional is a conjunctive in the possible mode, and a possible proposition does not imply a necessary one. Thus the contradictory of "If p , then necessarily q " is "Possibly both p and not $\sim q$," which does not imply "If q , then necessarily p ." A necessary conditional and its converse are therefore independent of each other.

PROPRIETARY CHURCHES

Term denoting a system of private ownership of churches and monasteries that developed in Western Europe from the 7th and 8th centuries and lasted until the 12th. The essential features were control of the temporal possessions (ius proprietatis) and the right to nominate the priest, abbot, and in some cases the bishop. Usually such churches were in the hands of laymen who had founded them or taken them under their protection, but it was not unusual, especially after the 10th century, for monasteries and bishops to hold proprietary churches. In this sense the Church became feudalized.

The origin of the institution is a disputed question. The major disagreement is whether proprietary churches were Germanic or Roman in origin; but the most likely explanation is that any one or a combination of causes led to proprietary churches in such countries as Germany, France, England, Italy, and Spain. It was a development that coincided with and formed part of the rise of FEUDALISM in secular institutions.

Until the GREGORIAN REFORM the system as such was accepted by the Church. Abuses, of course, were inevitable when the overlord could treat a church or monastery as a piece of property to be sold, given away, transmitted to one's heirs, and inherited. The lord also took a share of the income, which in effect led to neglect of the spiritual needs and function of the Church.

Attempts at reform were made from the 8th century onward, e.g., to control the type of person elected, and in the 9th century to strengthen episcopal authority (see FALSE DECRETALS).

Contrary to accepted opinion, the CLUNIAN REFORM had little direct influence on the system; nor did the popes of the early Gregorian reform (LEO IX to ALEXANDER II) attack the institution, but only its abuses. However, some laymen began to dispose of their churches and monasteries by donating them to other monasteries or by putting them under the protection of the Holy See.

GREGORY VII was the first to attack the system as such. His attack, together with the attempt to eliminate lay INVESTITURE, brought about a major struggle between the papacy and the lay powers. By the end of the 12th century, a compromise of lay and reform demands had been reached. The lay lord or monastery had become the patron. The patron would nominate the parish priest, who would receive the revenues, but the bishop had the right to approve the nominee. The transformation of the ius proprietatis into the ius patronatus was largely the work of the canonists, and it was to have significant effects on subsequent attitudes toward the LAITY IN THE MIDDLE AGES.

[J. GILCHRIST]

PROSPER OF AQUITAINE, ST.

Lay theologian and papal secretary; b. apparently Limoges, France, c. 390; d. probably Rome, Italy, after 455. Nothing is known of Prosper's background other than that he had an excellent classical education, was married, and read deeply in theology. He spent some time with the monks at Marseilles and proved himself a strong opponent of SEMIPELAGIANISM. With his friend Hilary he wrote to AUGUSTINE in Africa (428–429) concerning the opposition to Augustine's doctrine on grace among the monks (Aug. Epist. 225). Augustine wrote his De praedestinatione sanctorum and De dono perseverantiae in reply.

With Hilary, Prosper journeyed to Rome in 431 to obtain a favorable judgment of Augustine's doctrine from Pope CELESTINE I. In Rome he seems to have modified the strict Augustinian doctrine by insisting on God's universal, salvific will and to have participated in the formulation of the Roman document called the Capitula Caelestiana sent to the bishops of Gaul. After 440 he was associated with Pope LEO I and aided the pope with his correspondence and theological writings against the NESTORIANS, and particularly with Leo's tome to Flavian (Gennadius, Vir. ill. 48).

Adopting the technique used by St. Augustine in his anti-Donatist hymns for popular chanting, Prosper wrote a 1,102 hexameter poem De ingratis (On Those without Grace); Poema conjugis ad uxorem (Poem of a Husband to His Wife) in 16 anacreontic verses and 53 distichs found among the works of PAULINUS OF NOLA (Corpus scriptorum ecclesiasticorum latinorum 30:341–344) is probably Prosper's. The De providentia divina in 876 hexameters and 48 distichs is almost certainly not authentic, as it appears to have been written c. 417. A series of epigrams, including three against the Semipelagians and an ironic Epitaphium Nestoriana et Pelagianae haereseos, seem to be of his composition. Another series of Epigrammata ex sententiis s. Augustini represent a summa of Sententiae ex operibus s. Augustini. Prosper also wrote a defense of Augustine against VINCENT OF LÉRINS and two Genoan priests (Pro Augustino responsiones); a Contra collatorem, against John CASSIAN; and a Psalmorum a C ad CL expositio after the Council of Ephesus. Although the authorship of a Confessio and the Letter to Demetrias have been questioned, the second is most probably authentic.

His Epitoma chronicorum is a synthesis of the chronicles of JEROME (to A.D. 378), SULPICIOUS SEVERUS, and OROSIUS (to 433), but appears to reflect his own experience from 433 to 455. It was reedited and added to by CASSIODORUS and PAUL THE DEACON.

In De vocatione omnium gentium, Prosper tried to modify Augustine's views on predestination. He considered the problem of the great mass of mankind who have no certain knowledge of salvation in Christ and asked how this fact can be reconciled with the scriptural statement that God wills the salvation of all. Augustine held that God predestined a part of mankind and simply refrained from selecting others. Since man has free will but needs specific graces to achieve salvation, the nonpredes-tinued are damned. Prosper threw the mystery of damnation back to God's foreknowledge. He insisted on the gratuitousness of grace and of human freedom and on God's salvific will for all. Although he did not solve the problem, he softened the Augustinian rigidity and left room for later development. The Letter to Demetrias is one of several received by this Roman lady from contemporary Church leaders in reference to her vocation to an ascetic way of life.

PROSTITUTION

Prostitution is common lewdness for hire, the act or practice of a woman who permits a man who will pay her price to have sexual intercourse with her. It is a universal phenomenon with moral, social, cultural, psychological, medical, and other aspects. Although male prostitution is also found, that involving males exclusively is best considered as part of the general problem of HOMOSEXUALITY.

History. Social attitudes toward prostitution have changed through the ages and go on changing. It is difficult to generalize about primitive societies in which prostitution was generally obviated by an early age of marriage, the existence of polygamy or ease of divorce, and the sexual freedoms of some peoples. Instances of prostitution of slaves captured in war are reported, as are customs providing for the earning of dowries by prostitution. In a few African and American Indian tribes, parents and husbands prostituted their women for gain. Some advanced peoples also associated prostitution with puberty rites or fertility cults, and some type of prostitution as a religious duty was common among the peoples of the eastern Mediterranean or western Asia. See PROSTITUTION (SACRED). Although condemned, prostitution was prevalent in ancient Palestine.

In ancient Greece expectations of chastity were confined to wives and daughters and to prohibitions against adultery. After 451 B.C., when Athenian citizenship was rigidly defined, the main profession left open to alien women was that of the hetaerae (companions). A large proportion of women of this class, including most of the temple prostitutes, were slaves, often obtained by rearing female infants exposed by fathers unwilling to rear them; freedwomen in this class were mostly freeborn aliens. The virtual lack of any sense of degradation in prostitution allowed the hetaerae to rise socially to the level of their intellectual attainments (which, because of the freedom permitted them, were often superior to those of other women). There was a profitable, organized, international traffic in prostitution.

While the Greeks had few principles of sexual morality but a well-preserved sense of public decency, the Romans held much more exalted personal and family ideals but came to exhibit a general moral depravity of which prostitution was only one form. In this development prostitution remained shameful per se, for both parties. A system of police registration and taxation was developed very early. The names of prostitutes could never be removed from the register, they were required to wear distinctive dress, and they were deprived of full civil rights. Greek influence, along with the increase of wealth and luxury, assisted in the spiritual decay of the Republic until even the upper strata of society yielded recruits to prostitution. Corrective measures attempted by some emperors were unsuccessful, as was a sixth-century attempt at a monastic refuge established by Justinian, who also removed some of the civil disabilities of prostitutes.

Christianity, while condemning the procurer, introduced a charitable attitude toward the prostitute. There developed an interest in the reformation of prostitutes and the suppression of vice. The Church established rescue missions, convents for the reception of penitents, and dowries to enable prostitutes to marry. Innocent III commended the marrying of a prostitute. Gregory IX denounced those who drew profit from prostitution, counseled that brothel-keepers should not be allowed to prevent prostitutes from attending missions, and urged bachelors to marry repentant girls or the latter to enter the cloister.

In general, however, prostitution was tolerated as a necessary evil throughout the Middle Ages. The availability of prostitutes was commonly thought to protect the integrity of families. Systems of local regulation and licensing were used to control disorders. Traffic in women became financially profitable, as always, and some cities even established public brothels for revenue. Opinion began to change at the end of the 15th century as a result of fears associated with the spread of syphilis, which devastated first southern, then northern Europe. Demands for the closing of brothels also resulted from the Reformation and Counter Reformation. Venereal disease persisted nevertheless, and by the end of the 17th century attempts at the suppression of prostitution gave way to sanitary control. This was usually a matter of police regulation. In Great Britain, brothels were made illegal about the middle of the 18th century.

Prostitution increased again during the 19th century, largely as a result of the growth of urban communities after the industrial revolution. Official regulation was instituted over a large part of Europe. The British Criminal Law Amendment Act of 1885 was an attempt to stop importation of women from the Continent. In the U.S., although in most states houses of ill repute were never legal, prostitution flourished in the "redlight districts" of cities. The reports of successive municipal investigations, such as the Lexow Investigation in New York during the 1890s, reflect the prevalence of these districts and the large number of houses of ill-repute within them. Police corruption was almost universal, and political control was widespread. Shortly after 1900, civic groups that sprang up in many places called for abolition of the districts. They attained their first success in Chicago, in 1912, and subsequently virtually every city abolished such districts. Meanwhile the Congress passed, in 1910, the Mann Act or White Slave Traffic Act, which made interstate transportation of women for immoral purposes a federal offense.

PROSTITUTION (SACRED)

A rite or form of worship connected with certain fertility cults. It is first attested historically for ancient Babylonia, where it appears in a fully developed form in the Code of Hammurabi and is assumed as a traditional institution in the Epic of Gilgamesh. The practice is to be explained as an act of acknowledgment for the blessings of fertility to the great Mother Goddess or Goddess of Love and as an expression of a desire for their continuance. It is necessary to distinguish two forms of sacred prostitution. Every Babylonian woman was expected before marriage to serve at least once as a prostitute in a temple. After fulfilling this obligation, she was free to return home and was held in esteem for having offered her virginity to the goddess. The more typical prostitutes were the hierodules who engaged more or less permanently in their profession within the temple precincts and whose earnings were a source of temple revenue. However, their service was regarded as an essential part of the cult.

Imitative magic was combined with religion in this fertility cult and was evident especially in the annual sacred marriage between the king or high priest and a priestess. The priestess, however, should not be identified with the ordinary hierodules; she had a special status. This marriage was intended to symbolize in a realistic way, and to guarantee, the reawakening of the great cosmic forces of nature and their promotion of fertility in plants, animals, and men.

Sacred prostitution had a wide distribution in the area influenced by Babylonian civilization, in Canaanite religion, in Egyptian religion, in the cult of the Great Mother of Asia Minor, and in the cult of Aphrodite at Corinth. Male prostitution of this kind is also found, but to a rather limited degree. There is a survival of sacred prostitution connected with certain temples in modern India.

PROTERIUS, PATRIARCH OF ALEXANDRIA, ST.

Patriarchate 451–57; d. Alexandria, Egypt, March 28, 457. As the archpriest, Proterius was chosen by the nobles of Alexandria at the suggestion of the emperor MARCIAN to replace DIOSCORUS as patriarch after Dioscorus had been deposed by the Council of CHALCEDON (451). To maintain his position against popular uprisings in favor of Dioscorus stimulated by the Egyptian monks, Proterius had to depend on the imperial soldiery. He attempted to conciliate the monastic leaders TIMOTHY AELURUS and Peter Mongus, but in 456 he had them exiled from the city. Upon the death of Marcian (Jan. 24, 457) Timothy Aelurus returned to Alexandria and had himself consecrated patriarch (March 16, 457) to succeed Dioscorus, who had died in exile (Sept. 4, 454). The imperial governor was unable to prevent the followers of Timothy from invading the city and taking possession of the churches. On March 28 they besieged the church of St. Quirinus, where Proterius was celebrating the Liturgy, assassinated Proterius, dragged his body through the streets, burned it, and scattered the ashes. His name was erased from the diptychs; but he was later accepted by the bishops of Thrace as a martyr.

PROTMANN, REGINA, BL.

Foundress of the Sisters of Saint Catherine (Katharinenschwestern); named sometimes spelled Prothmann; b. c. 1552, Braunsberg, Warmia (Ermland; now Braniewo, Poland); d. there Jan. 18, 1613.

Regina, daughter of the merchants Peter Protmann and Regina Tingels, left her family in 1571 to serve God with two other young women, who were soon joined by others. They lived as Beguines in an inherited house and tended the sick daily in their homes. In 1583, Protmann wrote the group's ascetic rule and placed the fledgling congregation under the patronage of Saint Catherine of Alexandria. On Mar. 3, 1583 their ministry received the approbation of Bishop Martin Kromer (c. 1512–89) and spiritual direction from the Jesuits.

Initially the Sisters of St. Catherine cared for plague victims in modern northeastern Poland. As they spread to Wormditt (1586), Heilsberg (c. 1586), and Rössel (c. 1593), their contemplative spirituality was combined with further active Apostolates, including instructing children and providing pastoral care to women. A new rule, written with the assistance of two Jesuits, was approved by the bishop and recognized by the papal nuncio (1602). Since that time the congregation has been closely associated with the Jesuits, as acknowledged in the writings of Jesuit Superior General Claudius Acquaviva.

The first vita (Das Leben der gottseligen Jungfrau Regina Protmann, 1623) of Mother Regina is presumed to have been written by her Jesuit spiritual director, Engelberg Keilert. Uncharacteristic for the period, Protmann had her spiritual daughters instructed in theology. By the time of her death, the order had 35 sisters in four convents.

Regina Protmann was declared venerable on Dec. 17, 1996. A miracle attributed to her intercession was approved on Apr. 6, 1998, leading to her beatification in Warsaw, Poland, by John Paul II on June 13, 1999.

PROTO-EVANGELIUM

The term Proto-evangelium, meaning “the first gospel or good news,” is traditionally applied to Gn 3.15 where God curses the serpent who had just enticed the first woman to break His commandment. It reads:

I will put enmity between you and the woman, between your seed and her seed; He shall crush your head, and you shall lie in wait for his heel.

Christian tradition has seen in this passage the first announcement of the salvation to come. However, there is much disagreement among modern exegetes about its exact interpretation. Five problems are involved in the dispute: the Vulgate translation, the identity and significance of the serpent, the identity of the woman and her descendants, the meaning of the key word šûp, and the use of this verse in Christian tradition.

Vulgate Translation. The translation of Gn 3.15 has been a source of difficulty in the past. The pronoun “he” in the CCD construes the Hebrew pronoun hû’ which refers to “her seed” and could be translated as “it” (ipsum), or, since it relates back to a collective noun, as “they.” In the LXX, because of a more specific development of messianic ideas, hû’ was translated by the masculine pronoun αὐτός, although the antecedent Greek noun is neuter. This may be an intended reference to the Messiah who would “grasp” the head of the serpent. Finally, in the Vulgate as it is now, hû’ is translated by ipsa, “she,” although the Old Latin versions have ipse, “he” (very likely the original Vulgate reading too). Whether by scribal error or intent, the ipsa, referring to the woman, later called Eve (Gn 3.20), has greatly influenced the Latin tradition concerning this passage. It agrees with no other version and is certainly wrong. Latin theologians, however, have constantly evoked from this mistranslation the picture of Mary Immaculate crushing the head of the serpent in her role as the new Eve.

The Serpent. The serpent (nāḥāš) is clearly described as an enemy of God and man, an evil personal force who entices the woman to break the single covenant law of PARADISE. He is later identified as the DEVIL or the adversary or SATAN in Wis 2.24 (see also Jn 8.4; Rv 12.9; 20.2; Jb 1.6) and in the whole of Christian tradition. The reason for using this image for God’s archenemy is found in the complex serpent symbolism of the ancient Near East. The primary symbolism comes from the Canaanite fertility cults, which have left to us many representations of fertility goddesses with serpents in their hands or entwined around their bodies. Serpents were also thought to have magical qualities and were often deified by Israel’s neighbors. Because of his enticement, the serpent is cursed by God and condemned to a continual battle with the descendants of the woman. Thus, the Canaanite cults of nature worship, fertility rites, and magic, which were a constant temptation to Israel, are condemned by the sacred author.

The Woman. Most independent authors reject any allusion to Mary in our text. Catholic scholars, however, are generally of the opinion that, behind the literal sense, some Mariological meaning is to be found in either a typical or fuller sense. (See HERMENEUTICS, BIBLICAL)

From the context it is clear that the woman is the one who has just committed the first sin. She is the first man’s ’iššâ, woman or wife (Gn 2.23). Obviously, therefore, the image of Mary has been found in our text only because of some hidden signification not patent there.

Although the LXX has taken the seed of the woman as a male individual, the Hebrew word is collective and refers to all mankind, the woman’s offspring. The enmity, therefore, will be between the serpent and the woman and between their races. Both groups will be injured, but not equally.

The Key Word. In Gn 3.15b of the CCD the verbs “crush” and “lie in wait” are traditional translations from the Vulgate of the same word šûp, the meaning of which is obscure in the three places it occurs in the MT—here, Jb 9.17; Ps 138(139).11. It would seem preferable to use an identical verb in both clauses as does the LXX and many modern versions, such as, “grasp,” “bruise,” or “strike.” Nevertheless, because of the relative position of the “attackers,” one striking at the head, the other at the heel, we are left to infer that the woman’s seed will be victorious. This inference is strengthened by the fact that the verse is found in the malediction of the serpent. If man were not victorious, would not the serpent’s punishment be incomplete? And so many have seen here a promise that man will triumph over the serpent’s evil power.

Christian Tradition. In the New Testament, Jesus Christ, “born of a woman” (Gal 4.4), is proclaimed as the definitive victor over “the prince of the world” by His Passion, Death, and Resurrection (Jn 12.31; 16.11; 1 Jn 3.8). St. Paul describes an antithetical relationship between Adam and Christ (Rom. 5.12–19) which later suggested a similar antithesis between Eve and Mary. Many Fathers of the Church contrasted Eve, who brought sin and death into the world, with Mary who gave birth to the victor over sin and, thus, became the mother of all those alive in Christ. These Fathers did not use Gn 3.15 to support their thesis because they saw no reference to Mary there. It was only after the sixth century, because of the erroneous Vulgate reading, that Latin writers made frequent use of the Proto-evangelium to express Mary’s victory over evil and the devil.

Some theologians argue that, since Gn 3.15 has been used in a Mariological sense in the encyclicals Ineffabilis Deus of Pius IX and Munificentissimus Deus and Fulgens corona of Pius XII, the literal sense must apply to Mary. However, these documents refer to the traditional Latin interpretation of Gn 3.15 as a witness of the common belief that Mary conquered all sin in her Immaculate Conception. They do not intend to settle all questions concerning the literal meaning of the text.

As Biblical studies advance, the question of the Proto-evangelium will receive new clarification and will, no doubt, be extended to other texts of the third chapter of Genesis that reveal God's loving concern for His creatures even after they had sinned.

PROTUS AND HYACINTH, SS.

Third-century martyrs mentioned in the Depositio martyrum (c. 350) as buried in the cemetery of Bassilla on the Via Salaria. The grave of Protus and Hyacinth was identified in 1845 in a double crypt; the loculus was intact with the epitaph of Hyacinth still in place; but the remains of the martyrs were carbonized. The tomb had been obstructed by a 4th-century landslide and had been repaired by Pope DAMASUS I. In the late and legendary Passio S. Eugeniae (Bibliotheca hagiographica latina antiquae et mediae aetatis, 2 v. [Brussels 1898–1901; suppl. 1911] 2666) they are described as brothers, who as eunuchs served the noblewoman St. Eugenia, accompanied her to Alexandria, and were given to the virgin (St.) Bassilla, whom they converted to Christianity. During the persecution of VALERIAN (257) they were arrested after a popular uprising and taken to a temple to offer sacrifice. When their prayer reduced the statue of the god to dust, the prefect Nicetius had them executed.

PROVENCHER, JOSEPH NORBERT

First bishop of Saint Boniface and founder of the Catholic hierarchy of the Canadian West; b. Baye-du-Febvre, Quebec, Canada, Feb. 12, 1787; d. Saint Boniface, Canada, June 7, 1853. He was the son of Jean Baptiste and Elizabeth (Proulx) Provencher. After attending the local seminary, he was ordained Dec. 21, 1811. In 1818 he went to Red River and lived temporarily at Fort Douglas of the Selkirk colony while awaiting the building of small lodgings that were to serve as a rectory and church. A year later he began the construction of a separate church, which was completed in 1825. He was named bishop, with the title of Juliopolis, and vicar apostolic of the Northwest in 1820, and was consecrated May 30, 1822, by Bp. Joseph O. Plessis of Quebec, whose auxiliary for the Northwest he was. In a land where everything was yet to be done, he had to serve as missionary and bishop and concern himself with the religious, intellectual, and even material needs of a local population made up of Canadians, métis, Indians, Scotch colonists, Meuron soldiers, and others. The school he established, where Latin was taught to two pupils, was the foundation of what later became the College of Saint Boniface. He also established a school of household arts directed by two young ladies. In 1833 he began building a stone cathedral, which was completed in 1839 and destroyed by fire Dec. 14, 1860. To help minister to his people, including the native people spread out over his vast territory—Cree, Saulteaux, Chippewayans, and others—he secured the services of Rev. G. A. Belcourt (1831), Rev. J. B. Thibault (1833), four Grey Nuns (of Charity) of Mére D'Youville (1844), and the Oblates of Mary Immaculate (1845). Under his direction missions were established slowly, and the Native American groups were visited in the North, along the Mackenzie River, in the West and Southwest, as far as the Pacific, and along the lower Columbia. There two bishoprics were established through his efforts, one at Vancouver, the other in the American territory then called Oregon. At his request A. A. TACHE, OMI, was appointed coadjutor in 1851. Provencher's remains lie in the crypt of the cathedral of Saint Boniface.

PROVERBS, BOOK OF

The Hebrew title of the Book of Proverbs is mišlê šelōmōh. The Greek renders the Hebrew title as Προϋμῶν Σο(α) λομῶντος. The title in the Vulgate is Proverbia Salomonis, whence comes the English title, Proverbs of Solomon, or Proverbs. Neither the term parable nor proverb does justice to the Hebrew term māšāl (plural, mišlê), which has a more comprehensive signification. Māšāl denotes a relatively brief saying, universal in scope, but quite specific as to the object described and its application. Such wisdom sayings are usually cast in one of the molds that has come to be called parallelism (see HEBREW POETRY). Satire, hyperbole, irony, and wit are often present. As for the subject matter of such a "proverb," few areas of human activity or interest seem excluded. For information concerning the nature and rise of wisdom literature in the ancient Near East and in Israel, see WISDOM (IN THE BIBLE).

This article treats the relation of Solomon to the book and gives an analysis of each of the nine collections of proverbs.

Solomonic Authorship. In Israel, as in her neighboring lands, the literary genre of "proverbs" or "wisdom sayings" is very old. And, in Israel, as in the other ancient Near Eastern lands, the life-setting of the proverbs was the royal court (see 1 Kings 4.29–34; 10.1–9). The titles of the collections referring to SOLOMON, King Lamuel, and Agur reflect this courtly background and indicate that the compiler is publishing the sayings as a collection of royal wisdom.

The book is called Proverbs of Solomon because it contains collections of wise sayings which were anciently attributed to Solomon. Collections II (10.1–22.16) and V (25.1–29.27) are the most ancient in the book and are ascribed to Solomon. In view of the many references made in the Bible to Solomon's wisdom, and in view of all that is known of the influence of Egyptian institutions on Israel's court life (see EGYPT, ANCIENT, 3), it cannot be doubted that Solomon and the learned men around him promoted the wisdom movement in Israel; but it is impossible to determine their precise contributions. The tradition that is represented in these collections goes back at least to the time of Solomon, who may have composed or collected the original nucleus. Collection I (1.1–9.18) is also attributed to Solomon in 1.1, but this collection is generally considered to be postexilic, even though its phraseology depends on earlier biblical books.

The book as a whole represents the final stage of a long tradition which was put in final form in postexilic time. It was completed, however, before the end of the Persian period, for Hellenistic influence cannot be proved with certainty anywhere in the book.

Nine Collections. A step-by-step analysis of the nine constituent parts of the Book of Proverbs will show plainly its anthological nature.

Collection I (1.1–9.18). This collection forms the introduction to the whole book. A few pivotal ideas are developed at length in prose-like fashion, not in the brief, pithy manner of the classical proverb with its parallel stichs. After the title, the author states his purpose: to teach wisdom. Then, in verse 7, he defines true knowledge in almost dogmatic fashion: "The fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge." Some of the external forms of traditional wisdom literature are prominent, e.g., the affectionate "Hear, my son" (1.8); "My son" (1.10, 15; 2.1; 3.1); "Hear, O children" (4.1); and every effort is made to arouse the interest of the reader. A subtle substructure underlies this first section, alluded to in 9.1: "Wisdom has built her house, she has set up her seven columns." These "seven columns" are to be found in the arrangement of chapters 2 to 7 into seven units of 22 verses each [see P. W. Skehan, "The Seven Columns of Wisdom's House in Proverbs 1–9," and "A Single Editor for the Whole Book of Proverbs," The Catholic Biblical Quarterly 9 (1947) 190–98; 10 (1948) 115–30.]

Collection II (10.1–22.16). These 375 Solomonic proverbs, the core of the book, are cast mostly in antithetic parallelism as far as ch. 16, and thereafter, mostly in synthetic parallelism. The tone of the couplets is entirely different from the tone of the preceding part; the environment of the royal court is sensed repeatedly; a primitive shrewdness shows through. However, its earthy humanism has been subjected to the spiritual dynamism of Yahwistic religion and given a spiritual orientation, even though this may not be directly evident in many instances. That "the fear of the Lord is the beginning of knowledge" (1.7) casts its aura over the whole book should not be forgotten.

Collection III (22.17–24.22). A difference in style is immediately noticed in “the sayings of the wise.” Instead of unrelated, simple, two-lined maxims, ideas are spelled out in strophe form. The tone, as in Collection I, is direct and personal, like that of a father admonishing his son or a teacher instructing his pupil. Of special note is the author’s indubitable sympathy for Egyptian wisdom, shown by the formerly vexing line, “Have I not written for you the ‘Thirty’” (22.20), preceded in the Confraternity Version by the explicit mention of Amen-em-Ope (a solid conjectural reading for the obscure Hebrew text). Since the publication, in 1923, of the Instruction of Amen-em-Ope, a collection of maxims in 30 chapters or “houses,” as he called them (J. B. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament, 421–24), a comparison of the judgments in this part of Proverbs with the statements of that Egyptian sage are to be found in most commentaries. The parallels, at times annoyingly close, are always intriguing.

Collection IV (24.23–34). The caption in verse 23, “These also are the sayings of the wise,” sets these 12 verses apart as a separate collection. The influence of Amen-em-Ope is no longer present, but the general style is the same as that of the preceding section. Notable in particular is the advanced ethical thinking of verse 29, “Say not, ‘As he did to me, so will I do to him; I will repay the man according to his deeds.’”

Collection V (25.1–29.27). This part consists of Solomonic proverbs, similar in form and content to those in the first Solomonic collection. The editor’s note preceding the first proverb contains an authentic message: there is no reason to deny that scribes at the court of Hezekiah compiled an anthology of contemporary wisdom sayings. However, since wisdom was a common possession, later sages, including the final editor of Proverbs, felt free to modify the arrangement, the slant, and the contents. There is no way of reconstructing the Hezekian original apart from the application of specifics touching the theological, cultural and linguistic variations proper to the kingdom and the postexilic era.

Collection VI (30.1–14). This section is entitled “The words of Agur, son of Yakeh, the Massaite.” Whether the reflections of this unknown individual terminate with verse 6 or continue on to verse 14 is debated. The style, exclusive of that of verse 10, can hardly be called typically proverbial. Agur’s short message is most concerned with a frequent theme in wisdom literature: the inaccessibility of wisdom for man.

Collection VII (30.15–33). The position of this collection of numerical proverbs in the Septuagint (after 24.34) as well as the mode of employing digits in it, sets it apart as an independent collection. The numerical style follows this pattern: a number is given (for instance, 3) in the first member; then in the second member the next higher number (here, 4) is given; and in the following members the same number of persons, things, or situations as the number given in the second member are enumerated. The purpose of this procedure is not to affirm the value of the number but to fix attention on the completeness of the enumeration. It would be best not to seek moral lessons in these numerical proverbs, at least not in their original form. Observations on nature and the habits of animals occasion sentiments of wonder, astonishment, incomprehensibility. The collection gives evidence of antiquity; it is cited as an exemplification of 1 Kgs 4.33, “And he [Solomon] treated about trees from the cedar that is in Lebanon, unto the hyssop that cometh out of the wall; and he discoursed on beasts, and of fowls, and of creeping things, and of fishes.”

Collection VIII (31.1–9). The instruction given Lamuel by his mother comprises the collection; it warns against dissipation and exhorts to care for the poor. As is suggested in 31.1, this brief unit with its somewhat unusual message and numerous Aramaisms may well have had its origin in the Ismaelite tribe of Massa in northern Arabia (see Gn 25.14). The incorporation of a passage authored by a woman, especially a non-Israelite, into Israel’s sacred writings is a rarity.

Collection IX (31.10–31). The concern of this part is the ideal wife. Harsh statements made about women throughout the book are counterbalanced by a concluding unit—an alphabetic poem of 22 verses, each of which begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. Apart from 31.30b, which could possibly be a later scribal modification, the virtues attributed to the ideal wife are wholly in the natural order: she seemingly has no other purpose than laboring for husband and household. However, these passages may be a final example of how secular compositions were taken over by the wisdom editors and spiritualized by being immersed in the wisdom context, which oriented all human endeavor toward God. Verse 30b, then, would be an authentic expression of the sacred author’s mind and purpose.

In the Septuagint the collections are found in the following order: 1, 2, 3, 6, 4, 7, 8, 5, 9. The secondary collections are enclosed between the two great Solomonic syntheses, while wisdom personified as a woman begins the compilation, and wisdom exemplified in the ideal housewife ends it.

PROVIDENCE OF GOD (IN THE BIBLE)

In the Bible God's providence, that is, his loving care of men, is a well-known theme. Although Hebrew has no technical term to express it, p^equddâ, meaning care or charge, is used in Jb 10.12 of God's providence. The Greek word πρόνοια, literally "forethought," often expresses the idea of divine providence (Wis 14.3; 17.2).

In the Old Testament. For the inspired authors the concept of God's providence embraces the creation, government, and care of all things in the created order and their subjection to His will [Gn 8.21–22; Jer 5.22–24; Psalm 103(104); 148.6]. Perhaps its most beautiful expression is in Job ch. 38 to 43 and Psalm 138(139). The idea is closely related to that of God's activity in the world expressed by the Hebrew word bārā' (to create: Ex 34.10; Nm 16.30; Is 43.1, 15; 45.7; 48.7), considered as continuous creation through preservation and governance of all that is created. Not only does God's providence embrace all things in the lower orders of nature, but with special significance does it encompass man [Ps 103(104).29–30; Is 42.5; Jb 10.8–11]. Closely related is God's election of certain men for special roles and functions (Gn 12.1–3; 18.19; Ex 3.1–4; Nm 17.20; Am 7.15; Is 6.8; Jer 1.5–10; Ex 2.2–8).

God's providence especially is evident in the election of Israel, chosen by Him from all the peoples of the world for unique relationship in the covenant of Sinai [Ex 19.4–6; Psalm 89(90); 94(95).6; Is 43.1, 15], delivered by Him from servitude (Ex 12.31–36), guided by divinely selected leaders in the desert of Sinai (Ex 14.10–31), nourished by Him there (Ex 16.1–35), and brought at last into the land promised to its fathers (Jos 3.10). Israel is eminently the beneficiary of divine solicitude, witnessing in its own history God's providential care. Throughout the OT, God's acts on behalf of His people are constantly extolled as proofs of His providence [Ps 77(78); 104(105); 105(106); Jos ch. 24; Jgs ch. 5]. It is evident in the elevation of the Prophets to speak His word. God's care of Israel is the great argument pointing to the unique malice of its infidelity to His will [Ps 105(106); Dt 7.6–9; Ez 16.59–63].

Gradually there emerges, especially in the writings of Amos, the idea that God's providence embraces not only Israel, but all the nations of the world directed by Him to carry out His plans even against their will (Am ch. 1–2; Is 7.17–19; 10.5–14; Jer 25.9–14). All is ordered to the establishment of the kingdom of Yahweh (Is 2.2–5; 10.12; 18.7). The whole tradition of the DEUTERONOMISTS sets the history of Israel in the light of divine providence. Historical events are God's acts in reward or punishment of Israel in accordance with its observance or violation of the conditions of the covenant (Jgs 2.11–22; 3.7–12; 4.14; 10.6–9).

The problem of evil in relation to divine providence is treated in several ways in the OT. To the Semitic mind, God is the cause of all things; there is no direct recognition of the interplay of secondary causes (Gn 16.2; Is 45.7; Am 3.6). The physical evil of suffering and misfortune is seen as a means of discipline, conversion, and purification (Jb 33.15–30; Wis 3.5; 11.9–11; 12.13–27; 2 Mc 6.16; 7.18, 32–36). The Israelites await a future solution of physical evil in the Day of the Lord when the Messianic restoration will bring an end to Israel's trials (Jl ch. 3–4). The inspired writers of the later books of the OT see retribution for suffering in the resurrection from the dead in the messianic kingdom (Dn 12.2–3) and the reward in the hereafter as recompense for suffering on earth (2 Mc 7.9, 13, 23, 26; Wis 3.1–9; 5.15–16).

Moral evil, always regarded as incompatible with God's holiness, has its cause in the free will of man, which is emphatically affirmed and always presupposed in the OT (Dt 11.26–28; 30.15–20; Jer 31.8; Sir 15.11–20). God's dominion over man's will is equally affirmed and always presupposed [Jer 18.6; Prv 21.1; Ps 32(33).15; Zec 12.1]. True to Semitic mentality, no effort is made to reconcile these seemingly variant truths. God's activity is the cause of all, and yet that activity is not seen as taking away man's freedom and responsibility for his own acts. There is complete omission of reference to any secondary cause; God is said even "to harden men's heart" in punishment for sin (Ex 4.21; 7.3; 10.1; Dt 2.30; Jos 11.20; Jgs 9.23; 2 Sm 17.14; Is 29.10; 63.17). Even of actions in which the human will cooperates, the Semitic mind attributes the whole effect to God and makes no distinction between what He directly causes and what He merely permits or occasions (2 Sm 24.1). But where evil is encountered, it is always presented as serving the order of God's providence. Even in the seeming irrationality of the prosperity of the evil-doers and of the suffering of the righteous, God's providence is effective.

In the New Testament. The same perspective and thought categories as those of the OT are retained in the NT. However, God's providence in the NT is more strongly emphasized, especially in its universal and infallible aspect (Mt 5.45; Lk 6.35; Mt 6.25; 10.28; Acts 14.15–17; 17.26–28; Rom 1.19–20; 11.14–16). There is a clearer delineation of the concept in relation to the total eternal salvific plan (Rom 10.9; 1 Cor 1.21; 1 Pt 3.21). God's providence is seen as the constant manifestation and realization of His love for His creatures and His will to save them; it is stressed as the motive for complete and absolute confidence in Him (Rom 8.2–4; Gal 4.7). The meaning of suffering is set in clearer focus (Mt 10.24, 38–39; 16.24–26; Rom 5.3; 8.28; 1 Cor 1.27). All is ordered to bring man to divine adoption and ultimate glorification in Christ (Rom 8.9–22; Eph 1.3–14).

PROVIDENCE OF GOD (THEOLOGY OF)

God's providence, which pertains to His intelligence and will, is the act whereby He causes, cares for, and directs all creatures to their particular ends, in attaining which each one contributes to the final purpose of the universe—the manifestation of His external glory. (See GLORY OF GOD [END OF CREATION].) Other related questions arise: how is the existence of providence consistent with the presence of evil in the world and with the existence of human freedom? The definition, while precise in Catholic theology, undergoes various modifications in other cultures, depending on their understanding of God's nature and attributes and of the destiny of man.

In Greek Philosophy. For the present consideration, among the Greek philosophers Aristotle is taken as the focal point. Democritus and the atomists, Socrates, and Plato precede him; the pantheism of the Stoics and the materialism of the Epicureans follow.

The atomists denied providence, explaining the world not by intelligent purpose but by an accidental and mechanical interplay of atoms. For Socrates the principle of causality pointed to the existence of the gods; yet he was not especially concerned with monotheism. Whatever has a use must be the work of intelligence or wisdom. This is present in all things, determining them according to its good pleasure. Plato's thoughts on the subject were conditioned by contemporary mythology. He seems to have admitted a threefold providence: (1) that of the supreme god, whose main concern is for spiritual beings and then for universal categories, such as classes, species, causes; (2) that of lesser gods, who move the heavenly bodies and take care of individual things; and (3) that of the demons, who are midway between man and the gods and who look after human affairs.

Aristotle held to one god, whose life is contemplative thought—with which the exercise of providence over individual things would be incompatible. Ordinarily his care extends to species only. He is interested in particular things only insofar as they share in this common nature (cf. St. Thomas, In 1 sent. 39.2.2).

An interpretation of providence according to the Stoics must take into consideration their teaching on god as the soul of the universe. There are two ultimate principles, matter and force. The first is without motion and form; the second is active, inseparably joined to the former. In the universe this force is god; in man it is the soul, which is part of the deity. Epicurus, accepting the atomism of Democritus, found it unnecessary to postulate mind as a moving cause. The gods exist, but interest in human affairs would be inconsistent with their happiness. Under the influence of fear and ignorance—the basis of religion—men attribute natural happenings to providence.

In Jewish Thought. The term “providence” (πρόνοια) is used in Jewish literature for the first time in the Septuagint. The idea, however, is biblical. Among these people the notion of the Divinity was more exalted than that held in pagan circles. Likewise, under successive revelations their knowledge of the future life, of human responsibility, and of the problem of evil became more explicit. God is the omniscient author of the universe and cares for all creatures. Everything happens according to His plan. A distinction is not always made between His absolute and permissive will; at times there is a tendency to consider the effects of secondary causes as His direct action.

Among the Hellenistic Jews Philo showed a somewhat different development. He firmly held to divine providence; he wrote a book on the subject. Yet he followed the Platonic notion that God can have no direct contact with finite beings. His explanation of the production of the world through the Logoi, as the intermediaries of the divine action, is a mixture of Plato's teaching on preexisting ideas, of the Stoic idea of world-soul, of the biblical account of the angels, and of the Greek concept of the demons in their mythology.
